Perhaps some other light is to be understood in this passage of the book, where we read, "God said: Let there be light, and there was light," and some other darkness is meant by the words, "God divided the light from the darkness." Even so, consider these two angelic societies. The one enjoys God; the other is swollen with arrogance. To the one it is said, "Worship him, all you his angels"; the other has a prince who says, "All these I will give you, if you fall down and worship me." The one is ablaze with the holy love of God; the other smolders with the unclean love of its own exaltation. And since, as it is written, "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble," the one dwells in the heaven of heavens, while the other, cast down from there, riots in this lowest, airy heaven. The one is tranquil in luminous devotion; the other is turbulent with dark cravings. The one, at God's bidding, mercifully brings help and justly takes vengeance; the other seethes with its own arrogance and with the lust for subjugating and harming.[39]

The one is the servant of God's goodness, so that it may help as much as it wishes; the other is bridled by God's power, so that it may not harm as much as it wishes. The one mocks the other, so that by its persecutions the other does good against its will; the other envies the first when it gathers in its pilgrims. These two angelic societies, then, unlike each other and opposed—one good by nature

38 2 Peter 2:4; Ephesians 5:8.
39 Genesis 1:4; Psalm 96:7 (97:7 in most English Bibles); Matthew 4:9; James 4:6 and 1 Peter 5:5.

LATIN

nomen est genesis, lucis tenebrarumque uocabulis significatas existimauimus, etiamsi aliud hoc loco sensit forte qui scripsit, non est inutiliter obscuritas huius pertractata sententiae, quia, etsi uoluntatem auctoris libri huius indagare nequiuimus, a regula tamen fidei, quae per alias eiusdem auctoritatis sacras litteras satis fidelibus nota est, non abhorruimus.

Etsi enim corporalia hic commemorata sunt opera Dei, habent procul dubio nonnullam similitudinem spiritalium, secundum quam dicit apostolus: Omnes enim uos filii lucis estis et filii diei, non sumus noctis neque tenebrarum. Si autem hoc sensit etiam ille qui scripsit, ad perfectiorem disputationis finem nostra peruenit intentio, ut homo Dei tam eximiae diuinaeque sapientiae, immo per eum Spiritus Dei in commemorandis operibus Dei, quae omnia sexto die dixit esse perfecta, nullo modo angelos praetermisisse credatur siue in principio, quia primo fecit, siue quod conuenientius intellegitur, in principio, quia in Verbo unigenito fecit, scriptum sit: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram; quibus nominibus uniuersalis est significata creatura, uel spiritalis et corporalis, quod est credibilius, uel magnae duae mundi partes, quibus omnia quae creata sunt continentur, ut primitus eam totam proponeret ac deinde partes eius secundum mysticum dierum numerum exsequeretur.

ENGLISH

and upright in will, the other good by nature but perverse in will—are made clear by other, more explicit testimonies of the divine Scriptures. We have judged that they are signified in this book too, which is called Genesis, by the words "light" and "darkness." Even if the writer perhaps meant something else in this place, the obscurity of this passage has not been discussed to no purpose. For even if we have not been able to trace the intention of the author of this book, we have not strayed from the rule of faith, which is known well enough to the faithful through other sacred writings of the same authority.

For although it is bodily works of God that are recorded here, they doubtless bear some likeness to spiritual ones. It is in this sense that the apostle says: "For you are all children of light and children of the day; we are not of the night or of darkness." But if the writer also meant this, our inquiry reaches a more complete conclusion. We may believe that the man of God, of such outstanding and divine wisdom—or rather the Spirit of God through him—in recounting the works of God, all of which he said were completed on the sixth day, in no way left out the angels. Perhaps "In the beginning God made heaven and earth" was written "in the beginning" because he made these first. Or perhaps, as is more fittingly understood, it was written "in the beginning" because he made them in the only-begotten Word. Either way, by these names the whole of creation is signified. It may be spiritual and bodily creation, which is more credible. Or it may be the two great parts of the world in which all created things are contained. In that case he first set out creation as a whole and then went through its parts according to the mystical number of the days.[40]

THE VIEW OF SOME THAT THE ANGELS ARE MEANT BY THE NAME OF THE WATERS SEPARATED AT THE MAKING OF THE FIRMAMENT, AND OF OTHERS THAT THE WATERS WERE NOT CREATED

Some read the waters above the firmament as angels; Augustine rejects the claim that waters were never created.

LATIN

11.34 Quamquam nonnulli putauerint aquarum nomine significatos quodam modo populos angelorum et hoc esse quod dictum est: Fiat firmamentum inter aquam et aquam, ut supra firmamentum angeli intellegantur, infra

ENGLISH

And yet some have thought that the name "waters" in some way signifies the peoples of angels. On this view, that is what is meant by "Let there be a firmament between water and water." Above the 40 1 Thessalonians 5:5.

LATIN

uero uel aquae istae uisibiles uel malorum angelorum multitudo uel omnium hominum gentes. Quod si ita est, non illic apparet ubi facti sint angeli, sed ubi discreti; quamuis et aquas, quod peruersissimae adque inpiae uanitatis est, negent quidam factas a Deo, quoniam nusquam scriptum est: Dixit Deus: Fiant aquae. Quod possunt simili uanitate etiam de terra dicere; nusquam enim legitur: Dixit Deus: Fiat terra. Sed, inquiunt, scriptum est: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram. Illic ergo et aqua intellegenda est; uno enim nomine utrumque conprehensum est.

Nam ipsius est mare, sicut in psalmo legitur, et ipse fecit illud, et aridam terram manus eius finxerunt. Sed hi, qui in nomine aquarum, quae super caelos sunt, angelos intellegi uolunt, ponderibus elementorum mouentur et ideo non putant aquarum fluuidam grauemque naturam in superioribus mundi locis potuisse constitui; qui secundum rationes suas, si ipsi hominem facere possent, non ei pituitam, quod Graece φλέγμα dicitur et tamquam in elementis corporis nostri aquarum uicem obtinet, in capite ponerent.

Ibi enim sedes est phlegmatis, secundum Dei opus utique aptissime, secundum istorum autem coniecturam tam absurde, ut, si hoc nesciremus et in hoc libro similiter scriptum esset, quod Deus umorem fluuidum et frigidum ac per hoc grauem in superiore omnibus ceteris humani corporis parte posuerit, isti trutinatores elementorum nequaquam crederent, et si auctoritati eiusdem scripturae subditi essent, aliquid aliud ex hoc intellegendum esse censerent.

Sed quoniam, si diligenter singula scrutemur adque tractemus, quae in illo diuino libro de constitutione mundi scripta sunt, et multa dicenda et a proposito instituti operis longe digrediendum est, iamque de duabus istis diuersis inter se adque contrariis societatibus angelorum, in quibus sunt quaedam exordia duarum etiam in rebus humanis ciuitatum, de quibus deinceps dicere institui, quantum satis esse uisum est, disputauimus: hunc quoque librum aliquando claudamus.

ENGLISH

firmament the angels are to be understood. Below it are to be understood either these visible waters, or the multitude of evil angels, or the nations of all mankind. If this is so, the passage does not show where the angels were made, but where they were separated. Some people, indeed, deny that the waters were made by God, and this is a most perverse and impious folly. Their reason is that it is nowhere written: "God said: Let there be waters." With similar folly they could say the same of the earth too, for nowhere do we read: "God said: Let there be earth." But, they say, it is written: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." Then water too must be understood there, for both are included under one name.[41]

For "the sea is his," as we read in the psalm, "and he made it, and his hands formed the dry land." But those who want the waters above the heavens to be understood as angels are swayed by the weights of the elements. So they do not think that the fluid and heavy nature of water could have been placed in the upper regions of the world. By their reasoning, if they could make a human being themselves, they would not put phlegm in the head. Phlegm is called φλέγμα [phlegma, phlegm] in Greek, and among the elements of our body it holds, as it were, the place of water.[42]

For that is where phlegm has its seat. This is most fitting according to God's work, but so absurd according to these men's conjecture that, if we did not know it, and this book had said likewise that God put a fluid and cold, and therefore heavy, humor in the highest part of the human body, above all the rest, these weighers of the elements would never believe it. And if they were subject to the authority of the same Scripture, they would decide that something else must be understood by it.

But if we were to examine and treat carefully every single thing written in that divine book about the establishment of the world, there would be a great deal to say, and we would have to digress far from the plan of the work we have undertaken. We have now discussed these two angelic societies, different from each other and opposed, as much as seemed sufficient. In them lie certain beginnings of the two cities in human affairs as

41 Genesis 1:6.
42 Psalm 94:5 (95:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	well, which I have set out to speak about next. So let us at last bring this book too to a close.

Book XII

The angels' wills and the creation of humanity
Why some angels fell; against cyclical time; the creation of the first man.

THE ONE NATURE OF THE GOOD AND THE EVIL ANGELS

Good and evil angels share one good nature; they differ by will, clinging to God or turning to themselves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.1	Antequam de institutione hominis dicam, ubi duarum ciuitatum, quantum ad rationalium mortalium genus adtinet, apparebit exortus, sicut superiore libro apparuisse in angelis iam uidetur: prius mihi quaedam de ipsis angelis uideo esse dicenda, quibus demonstretur, quantum a nobis potest, quam non inconueniens neque incongrua dicatur esse hominibus angelisque societas, ut non quattuor (duae scilicet angelorum totidemque hominum), sed duae potius ciuitates, hoc est societates, merito esse dicantur, una in bonis, altera in malis non solum angelis, uerum etiam hominibus constitutae.	Before I speak about the creation of man, I must first say some things about the angels themselves. The creation of man is where the origin of the two cities, as far as the race of rational mortals is concerned, will come into view, just as in the previous book it seems already to have come into view among the angels. What I say about the angels should show, as far as we are able, how fitting and appropriate it is to speak of a fellowship between human beings and angels. It follows that there are rightly said to be not four cities (two of angels, that is, and as many of human beings), but rather two cities, that is, two societies. One is made up of the good and the other of the evil, and each includes not only angels but also human beings.
	Angelorum bonorum et malorum inter se contrarios adpetitus non naturis principiisque diuersis, cum Deus omnium substantiarum bonus auctor et conditor utrosque creauerit, sed uoluntatibus et cupiditatibus extitisse dubitare fas non est, dum alii constanter in communi omnibus bono, quod ipse illis Deus est, adque in eius aeternitate ueritate caritate persistunt; alii sua potestate potius delectati, uelut bonum suum sibi ipsi essent, a superiore communi omnium beatifico bono ad propria defluxerunt et habentes elationis fastum pro excelsissima aeternitate, uanitatis astutiam pro certissima ueritate, studia partium pro indiuidua caritate superbi fallaces inuidi effecti sunt. Beatitudinis igitur illorum causa est adhaerere Deo; quocirca istorum miseriae causa ex contrario est intellegenda, quod est non adhaerere Deo.	The good and the evil angels have opposing inclinations. It is not right to doubt that these arose not from different natures and first principles, since God, the good author and founder of all substances, created both, but from their wills and desires. Some remain steadfastly in the good that is common to all, which for them is God himself, and in his eternity, truth and love. Others, delighting rather in their own power, as if they were their own good, slipped away from the higher good, common to all and the source of happiness for all, to what was their own. They had arrogant pride in place of the most exalted eternity, the cunning of vanity in place of the most certain truth, and partisan zeal in place of undivided love, and so they became proud, deceitful and envious. The cause of the happiness of the first, then, is to cling to God. Therefore the cause of the misery of the others must be understood as the opposite, which is not to cling to God.

LATIN

Quam ob rem si, cum quaeritur, quare illi beati sint, recte respondetur: Quia Deo adhaerent; et cum quaeritur, quur isti sint miseri, recte respondetur: Quia non adhaerent Deo: non est creaturae rationalis uel intellectualis bonum, quo beata sit, nisi Deus. Ita quamuis non omnis beata possit esse creatura (neque enim hoc munus adipiscuntur aut capiunt ferae ligna saxa et si quid huius modi est), ea tamen, quae potest, non ex se ipsa potest, quia ex nihilo creata est, sed ex illo, a quo creata est. Hoc enim adepto beata, quo amisso misera est. Ille uero qui non alio, sed se ipso bono beatus est, ideo miser non potest esse, quia non se potest amittere.

Dicimus itaque incommutabile bonum non esse nisi unum uerum beatum Deum; ea uero, quae fecit, bona quidem esse, quod ab illo, uerum tamen mutabilia, quod non de illo, sed de nihilo facta sunt. Quamquam ergo summa non sint, quibus est Deus maius bonum: magna sunt tamen ea mutabilia bona, quae adhaerere possunt, ut beata sint, inmutabili bono, quod usque adeo bonum eorum est, ut sine illo misera esse necesse sit. Nec ideo cetera in hac creaturae uniuersitate meliora sunt, quia misera esse non possunt; neque enim cetera membra corporis nostri ideo dicendum est oculis esse meliora, quia caeca esse non possunt.

Sicut autem melior est natura sentiens et cum dolet quam lapis qui dolere nullo modo potest: ita rationalis natura praestantior etiam misera, quam illa quae rationis uel sensus est expers, et ideo in eam non cadit miseria. Quod cum ita sit, huic naturae, quae in tanta excellentia creata est, ut, licet sit ipsa mutabilis, inhaerendo tamen incommutabili bono, id est summo Deo, beatitudinem consequatur, nec expleat indigentiam suam nisi utique beata sit, eique explendae non sufficiat nisi Deus, profecto non illi adhaerere uitium est. Omne autem uitium naturae nocet ac per hoc contra naturam est. Ab illa igitur, quae adhaeret Deo, non natura differt ista, sed uitio; quo tamen etiam uitio ualde magna multumque laudabilis ostenditur ipsa natura.

ENGLISH

So when it is asked why the first are happy, the right answer is, "Because they cling to God." When it is asked why the others are miserable, the right answer is, "Because they do not cling to God." If both answers are right, then there is no good for a rational or intellectual creature by which it may be happy except God. Not every creature can be happy, for wild beasts, trees, stones and anything of that kind neither attain nor are capable of this gift. Yet the creature that can be happy cannot be so of itself, since it was created from nothing. It can be happy only from him by whom it was created. For when it has attained him it is happy, and when it has lost him it is miserable. But he who is happy through no other good but himself cannot be miserable, because he cannot lose himself.

We say, therefore, that there is no unchangeable good except the one, true, happy God. The things he made are indeed good, because they are from him. Yet they are changeable, because they were made not out of him but out of nothing. They are not supreme goods, then, since God is a greater good than they are. Still, those changeable goods are great that can cling to the unchangeable good in order to be happy. That good is so truly their good that without it they must be miserable. Nor are the other things in this whole creation better simply because they cannot be miserable. We should not say that the other members of our body are better than the eyes because they cannot be blind.

A nature that has sensation, even when it feels pain, is better than a stone, which cannot feel pain at all. In the same way a rational nature, even in misery, is superior to one that lacks reason or sensation and is therefore not subject to misery. Consider, then, this rational nature. It was created with such excellence that, though itself changeable, it attains happiness by clinging to the unchangeable good, that is, to the supreme God. It cannot satisfy its need unless it is happy, and nothing but God is enough to satisfy that need. For such a nature, surely, not to cling to God is a flaw. Every flaw, however, harms the nature, and is therefore contrary to nature. So this nature differs from the one that clings to God not by nature but by a flaw. Yet by this very flaw the nature itself is shown to be very great and highly praiseworthy.

LATIN

Cuius enim recte uituperatur uitium, procul dubio natura laudatur. Nam recta uitii uituperatio est, quod illo dehonestatur natura laudabilis. Sicut ergo, cum uitium oculorum dicitur caecitas, id ostenditur, quod ad naturam oculorum pertinet uisus; et cum uitium aurium dicitur surditas, ad earum naturam pertinere demonstratur auditus: ita, cum uitium creaturae angelicae dicitur, quo non adhaeret Deo, hinc apertissime declaratur, eius naturae ut Deo adhaereat conuenire. Quam porro magna sit laus adhaerere Deo, ut ei uiuat, inde sapiat, illo gaudeat tantoque bono sine morte sine errore sine molestia perfruatur, quis digne cogitare possit aut eloqui? Quapropter etiam uitio malorum angelorum, quo non adhaerent Deo, quoniam omne uitium naturae nocet, satis manifestatur Deum tam bonam eorum creasse naturam, cui noxium sit non esse cum Deo.

ENGLISH

When something's flaw is rightly censured, its nature is without doubt praised. The censure of a flaw is right precisely because the flaw disfigures a praiseworthy nature. When blindness is called a flaw of the eyes, this shows that sight belongs to the nature of the eyes. When deafness is called a flaw of the ears, it is shown that hearing belongs to their nature. In the same way, when we speak of a flaw in the angelic creature by which it does not cling to God, this declares most plainly that it befits its nature to cling to God. And who could worthily conceive or express how praiseworthy it is to cling to God? To cling to him is to live for him, to draw wisdom from him, to rejoice in him, and to enjoy so great a good without death, without error, without trouble. Every flaw harms the nature. Therefore the very flaw of the evil angels, by which they do not cling to God, makes it clear enough that God created their nature so good that it is harmful to it not to be with God.

THAT NO ESSENCE IS CONTRARY TO GOD, SINCE WHAT IS WHOLLY DIFFERENT FROM HIM WHO SUPREMELY AND ALWAYS IS, IS WHAT IS NOT

God supremely is, so the only contrary to him is non-being; no nature is contrary to him.

LATIN

12.2 Haec dicta sint, nec quisquam, cum de angelis apostaticis loquimur, existimet eos aliam uelut ex alio principio habere potuisse naturam, nec eorum naturae auctorem Deum. Cuius erroris inpietate tanto quisque carebit expeditius et facilius, quanto perspicacius intellegere potuerit, quod per angelum Deus dixit, quando Moysen mittebat ad filios Israel: Ego sum, qui sum.

Cum enim Deus summa essentia sit, hoc est summe sit, et ideo inmutabilis sit: rebus, quas ex nihilo creauit, esse dedit, Sed non summe esse, sicut est ipse; et aliis dedit esse amplius, aliis minus, adque ita naturas essentiarum gradibus ordinauit (sicut enim ab eo, quod est sapere, uocatur sapientia, sic ab eo, quod est esse, uocatur essentia, nouo quidem nomine, quo usi ueteres non sunt Latini sermonis auctores, sed iam nostris temporibus usitato, ne deesset etiam linguae nostrae, quod Graeci appellant οὐσίαν; hoc enim uerbum e uerbo expressum est, ut diceretur essentia); ac per hoc ei naturae, quae summe est, qua faciente sunt quaecumque sunt,

ENGLISH

I have said all this so that no one, when we speak of the apostate angels, may suppose that they could have had a different nature, as if from a different first principle, or that God was not the author of their nature. Anyone will be free of this impious error the more quickly and easily, the more clearly he is able to understand what God said through an angel when he was sending Moses to the children of Israel: "I am who I am."[1]

For God is the supreme essence, that is, he supremely is, and is therefore unchangeable. To the things he created from nothing he gave being, but not supreme being, such as he himself has. To some he gave more being, to others less, and so he arranged natures in an order of degrees of essence. (Just as "wisdom" [sapientia] is named from "being wise" [sapere], so "essence" [essentia] is named from "being" [esse]. It is a new word, which the ancient writers of the Latin language did not use, but which has become customary in our own times, so that our language too might not lack 1 Exodus 3:14. The error is chiefly that of the Manichaeans, who held that evil derives from a second first principle opposed to God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
contraria natura non est, nisi quae non est. Ei quippe, quod est, non esse contrarium est.	what the Greeks call οὐσία [being]. Essentia was coined as a word-for-word rendering of that term.) And for this reason the nature that supremely is, and by whose making all things that are exist, has no contrary nature except that which is not. For to what is, not being is the contrary.
Et propterea Deo, id est summae essentiae et auctori omnium qualiumcumque essentiarum, essentia nulla contraria est.	And therefore no essence is contrary to God, that is, to the supreme essence and the author of all essences of whatever kind.

THE ENEMIES OF GOD, WHO ARE SUCH NOT BY NATURE BUT BY A CONTRARY WILL, WHICH, IN HARMING THEM, HARMS A GOOD NATURE, SINCE A FAULT THAT DOES NO HARM IS NO FAULT

God's enemies oppose him by fault, not nature, and harm only themselves.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.3 Dicuntur autem in scripturis inimici Dei, qui non natura, sed uitiis aduersantur eius imperio, nihil ei ualentes nocere, sed sibi. Inimici enim sunt resistendi uoluntate, non potestate laedendi. Deus namque inmutabilis est et omni modo incorruptibilis. Idcirco uitium, quo resistunt Deo qui eius appellantur inimici, non est Deo, sed ipsis malum, neque hoc ob aliud, nisi quia corrumpit in eis naturae bonum. Natura igitur contraria non est Deo sed uitium, quia malum contrarium est bono. Quis autem neget Deum summe bonum? Vitium ergo contrarium est Deo, tamquam malum bono. Porro autem bonum est et natura quam uitiat; unde et huic bono utique contrarium est; sed Deo tantummodo tamquam bono malum, naturae uero, quam uitiat, non tantum malum, sed etiam noxium.	Scripture does speak of enemies of God. They oppose his rule not by their nature but by their flaws, and they are powerless to harm him, but only themselves. They are enemies by their will to resist, not by any power to injure. For God is unchangeable and in every way incorruptible. Therefore the flaw by which those called his enemies resist God is an evil not to God but to themselves. It is an evil to them for no other reason than that it corrupts the good of their nature. It is not nature, then, that is contrary to God, but the flaw, because evil is contrary to good. And who would deny that God is supremely good? The flaw, therefore, is contrary to God as evil is contrary to good. Furthermore, the nature that it damages is also a good, so the flaw is certainly contrary to this good too. But to God it is contrary only as evil to good, whereas to the nature that it damages it is not only evil but also harmful.
Nulla quippe mala Deo noxia sed mutabilibus corruptibilibusque naturis, bonis tamen ipsorum quoque testimonio uitiorum. Si enim bonae non essent, eis uitia nocere non possent. Nam quid eis nocendo faciunt, nisi adimunt integritatem pulchritudinem, salutem uirtutem et quidquid boni naturae per uitium detrahi siue minui consueuit? Quod si omnino desit, nihil boni adimendo non nocet ac per hoc nec uitium est. Nam esse uitium et non nocere non potest. Unde colligitur, quamuis non possit uitium nocere incommutabili bono, non tamen posse nocere nisi bono, quia non inest, nisi ubi nocet. Hoc etiam isto modo dici potest, uitium esse nec in summo posse bono nec nisi in aliquo bono.	For no evils are harmful to God. They harm only natures that are changeable and corruptible. These natures are nonetheless good, as even the flaws themselves bear witness, for if they were not good, flaws could not harm them. When flaws harm them, what do they do but take away their integrity, beauty, health, strength, and whatever good is usually stripped away or diminished in a nature through a flaw? If good is wholly absent, then a flaw takes away no good and so does no harm, and therefore it is not a flaw at all. For it is impossible to be a flaw and to do no harm. From this we gather that, although a flaw cannot harm the unchangeable good, it can harm nothing but a good, because it exists only where it does harm.

LATIN

ENGLISH

This can also be put another way: a flaw cannot exist in the supreme good, and it cannot exist except in some good.

Sola ergo bona alicubi esse possunt, sola mala nusquam; quoniam naturae etiam illae, quae ex malae uoluntatis initio uitiatae sunt, in quantum uitiosae sunt, malae sunt, in quantum autem naturae sunt, bonae sunt. Et cum in poenis est natura uitiosa, excepto eo, quod natura est, etiam hoc ibi bonum est, quod inpunita non est. Hoc enim est iustum et omne iustum procul dubio bonum. Non enim quisquam de uitiis naturalibus, sed de uoluntariis poenas luit. Nam etiam quod uitium consuetudine nimioue progressu roboratum uelut naturaliter inoleuit, a uoluntate sumsit exordium. De uitiis quippe nunc loquimur eius naturae, cui mens inest capax intellegibilis lucis, qua discernitur iustum ab iniusto.

Good things alone, then, can exist somewhere, while evil things alone can exist nowhere. Even those natures that have been flawed by an evil will from the outset are evil insofar as they are flawed, but good insofar as they are natures. And when a flawed nature is being punished, there is, besides the fact that it is a nature, this further good in it: it is not unpunished. For this is just, and everything just is without doubt good. No one pays the penalty for natural flaws, only for voluntary ones. Even a flaw that has been strengthened by habit or by excessive growth, and has become ingrained as if by nature, took its beginning from the will. We are speaking here, of course, of the flaws of that nature which has a mind capable of the intelligible light by which the just is distinguished from the unjust.

THE NATURES OF BEINGS WITHOUT REASON OR WITHOUT LIFE, WHICH IN THEIR OWN KIND AND ORDER DO NOT CLASH WITH THE BEAUTY OF THE UNIVERSE

The decay of irrational and lifeless things belongs to the order and beauty of passing time.

LATIN

ENGLISH

12.4 Ceterum uitia pecorum et arborum aliarumque rerum mutabilium adque mortalium uel intellectu uel sensu uel uita omnino carentium, quibus eorum dissolubilis natura corrumpitur, damnabilia putare ridiculum est, cum istae creaturae eum modum nutu Creatoris acceperint, ut cedendo ac succedendo peragant infimam pulchritudinem temporum in genere suo istius mundi partibus congruentem. Neque enim caelestibus fuerant terrena coaequanda, aut ideo uniuersitati deesse ista debuerunt, quoniam sunt illa meliora. Cum ergo in his locis, ubi esse talia conpetebat, aliis alia deficientibus oriuntur et succumbunt minora maioribus adque in qualitates superantium superata uertuntur, rerum est ordo transeuntium. Cuius ordinis decus nos propterea non delectat, quoniam parti eius pro condicione nostrae mortalitatis intexti uniuersum, cui particulae, quae nos offendunt, satis apte decenterque conueniunt, sentire non possumus.

Animals, trees and other changeable and mortal things lack understanding, or sensation, or life altogether. It is ridiculous to regard as damnable the flaws in them by which their perishable nature is corrupted. At the Creator's bidding these creatures received a mode of being such that, by passing away and giving place to others, they complete the lowest kind of beauty, the beauty of passing time, which in its own kind fits the parts of this world. Earthly things were not meant to be made equal to heavenly things. Nor should they have been missing from the universe just because heavenly things are better. In the places where such things belong, some arise as others fail, the lesser succumb to the greater, and the conquered are transformed into the qualities of their conquerors. This is the order of things that pass away. We do not delight in the beauty of this order because, as our mortal condition requires, we are woven into one part of it. We cannot perceive the whole, into which the small parts that offend us fit quite suitably and becomingly.

LATIN

Unde nobis, in quibus eam contemplari minus idonei sumus, rectissime credenda praecipitur prouidentia Conditoris, ne tanti artificis opus in aliquo reprehendere uanitate humanae temeritatis audeamus. Quamquam et uitia rerum terrenarum non uoluntaria neque poenalia naturas ipsas, quarum nulla omnino est, cuius non sit auctor et conditor Deus, si prudenter adtendamus, eadem ratione commendant, quia et in eis hoc nobis per uitium tolli displicet, quod in natura placet; nisi quia hominibus etiam ipsae naturae plerumque displicent, cum eis fiunt noxiae, non eas considerantibus, sed utilitatem suam, sicut illa animalia, quorum abundantia Aegyptiorum superbia uapulauit. Sed isto modo possunt et solem uituperare, quoniam quidam peccantes uel debita non reddentes poni a iudicibus iubentur ad solem.

ENGLISH

Hence, where we are less able to contemplate the Creator's providence, we are quite rightly commanded to trust in it. In the vanity of human rashness we must not dare to find fault with any part of the work of so great an artist. And yet, if we consider carefully, even the flaws of earthly things that are neither voluntary nor penal commend those very natures for the same reason. There is absolutely none of those natures of which God is not the author and founder. In them too, what displeases us when a flaw takes it away is the very thing that pleases us in the nature. It is true that people are often displeased even with the natures themselves when they become harmful to them. They consider not the natures but their own advantage, as with those animals whose great numbers scourged the pride of the Egyptians. But in that way they could even find fault with the sun, since certain offenders, or those who fail to pay their debts, are ordered by judges to be set out in the sun.[2]

Non itaque ex commodo uel incommodo nostro, sed per se ipsam considerata natura dat artifici suo gloriam. Sic est et natura ignis aeterni sine ulla dubitatione laudabilis, quamuis damnatis inpiis futura poenalis. Quid enim est igne flammante uigente lucente pulchrius? quid calfaciente curante coquente utilius? quamuis eo nihil sit urente molestius. Idem igitur ipse aliter adpositus perniciosus, qui conuenienter adhibitus commodissimus inuenitur. Nam eius in uniuerso mundo utilitates uerbis explicare quis sufficit? Nec audiendi sunt, qui laudant in igne lucem, ardorem autem uituperant, uidelicet non ex ui naturae, sed ex suo commodo uel incommodo. Videre enim uolunt, ardere nolunt.

So it is not by our advantage or disadvantage that a nature gives glory to its maker. It does so when it is considered in itself. Thus the nature of the eternal fire too is beyond doubt praiseworthy, even though it will be the punishment of the damned and ungodly. For what is more beautiful than fire as it blazes, thrives and shines? What is more useful than fire as it warms, heals and cooks? And yet nothing is more painful than fire when it burns. So the same fire that is destructive when applied one way is found most beneficial when used fittingly. Who could adequately explain in words its uses throughout the whole world? Nor should we listen to those who praise the light of fire but find fault with its heat, judging, of course, not by the power of its nature but by their own advantage or disadvantage. They want to see; they do not want to burn.

Sed parum adtendunt eam ipsam lucem, quae certe et illis placet, oculis infirmis per inconuenientiam nocere, et in illo ardore, qui eis displicet, nonnulla animalia per conuenientiam salubriter uiuere.

But they pay little attention to two facts. That very light, which certainly pleases them too, harms weak eyes because it is not suited to them. And in that heat which displeases them some animals live in good health because it is suited to them.

2 The plagues of Egypt (Exodus 7–10), which included swarms of frogs, gnats, flies and locusts.

THAT THE CREATOR IS TO BE PRAISED IN EVERY KIND AND MEASURE OF NATURE

Every nature has measure, form and peace, and so gives praise to its Creator.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.5	Naturae igitur omnes, quoniam sunt et ideo habent modum suum, speciem suam et quandam secum pacem suam, profecto bonae sunt; et cum ibi sunt, ubi esse per naturae ordinem debent, quantum acceperunt, suum esse custodiunt; et quae semper esse non acceperunt, pro usu motuque rerum, quibus Creatoris lege subduntur, in melius deteriusue mutantur, in eum diuina prouidentia tendentes exitum, quem ratio gubernandae uniuersitatis includit; ita ut nec tanta corruptio, quanta usque ad interitum naturas mutabiles mortalesque perducit, sic faciat non esse quod erat, ut non inde fiat consequenter quod esse debebat.	All natures, then, are certainly good, since they exist and therefore have their own measure, their own form, and a certain peace with themselves. When they are where they ought to be according to the order of nature, they preserve their being to the extent that they have received it. Those that have not received everlasting being are changed for better or for worse, according to the use and movement of the things to which the Creator's law subjects them. Under divine providence they tend toward the end that the plan for governing the universe includes. So even a corruption great enough to bring changeable and mortal natures to destruction does not make what was cease to be in such a way that what ought to be does not follow from it in due course.
	Quae cum ita sint, Deus, qui summe est adque ob hoc ab illo facta est omnis essentia, quae non summe est (quia neque illi aequalis esse deberet, quae de nihilo facta esset, neque ullo modo esse posset, si ab illo facta non esset), nec ullorum uitiorum offensione uituperandus et omnium naturarum consideratione laudandus est.	Since this is so, God is not to be blamed when any flaws offend us, and he is to be praised when we consider all natures. He supremely is, and therefore every essence that does not supremely exist was made by him. (What was made from nothing ought not to be equal to him, and it could not exist at all if it had not been made by him.)

THE CAUSE OF THE GOOD ANGELS' HAPPINESS AND THE CAUSE OF THE EVIL ANGELS' MISERY

The good angels cling to God; the fallen turned to themselves in pride.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.6	Proinde causa beatitudinis angelorum bonorum ea uerissima reperitur, quod ei adhaerent qui summe est. Cum uero causa miseriae malorum angelorum quaeritur, ea merito occurrit, quod ab illo, qui summe est, auersi ad se ipsos conuersi sunt, qui non summe sunt; et hoc uitium quid aliud quam superbia nuncupetur? Initium quippe omnis peccati superbia. Noluerunt ergo ad illum custodire fortitudinem suam, et qui magis essent, si ei qui summe est adhaererent, se illi praeferendo id quod minus est praetulerunt. Hic primus defectus et prima inopia primumque uitium eius naturae, quae ita creata est, ut nec summe esset, et tamen ad beatitudinem habendam eo, qui summe est, frui posset, a quo auersa non quidem nulla, sed tamen minus esset adque ob hoc misera fieret.	Accordingly, the truest cause of the good angels' happiness is found to be this: they cling to him who supremely is. But when we ask the cause of the evil angels' misery, the answer that rightly presents itself is this: they turned away from him who supremely is and turned toward themselves, who do not supremely exist. And what else should this flaw be called but pride? For "pride is the beginning of all sin." They would not, then, keep their strength for him. They would have been more if they had clung to him who supremely is, but by preferring themselves to him they preferred what is less. This was the first failing, the first deprivation, and the first flaw of that nature. It was so created that it did not supremely exist, and yet, in order to have happiness, it could enjoy him who supremely is. Once it turned away from

LATIN

Huius porro malae uoluntatis causa efficiens si quaeratur, nihil inuenitur. Quid est enim quod facit uoluntatem malam, cum ipsa faciat opus malum? Ac per hoc mala uoluntas efficiens est operis mali, malae autem uoluntatis efficiens nihil est. Quoniam si res aliqua est, aut habet aut non habet aliquam uoluntatem; si habet, aut bonam profecto habet aut malam; si bonam, quis ita desipiat, ut dicat quod bona uoluntas faciat uoluntatem malam? Erit enim, si ita est, bona uoluntas causa peccati, quo absurdius putari nihil potest. Si autem res ista, quae putatur facere uoluntatem malam, ipsa quoque habet uoluntatem malam, etiam eam quae fecerit res consequenter interrogo, adque ita, ut sit aliquis inquirendi modus, causam primae malae uoluntatis inquiro.

Non est enim prima uoluntas mala, quam fecit uoluntas mala; sed illa prima est, quam nulla fecit. Nam si praecessit a qua fieret, illa prior est, quae alteram fecit. Si respondetur quod eam nulla res fecerit et ideo semper fuerit: quaero utrum in aliqua natura fuerit. Si enim in nulla fuit, omnino non fuit; si autem in aliqua, uitiabat eam et corrumpebat eratque illi noxia ac per hoc bono priuabat. Et ideo in mala natura uoluntas mala esse non poterat, sed in bona, mutabili tamen, cui uitium hoc posset nocere. Si enim non nocuit, non utique uitium fuit, ac per hoc nec mala uoluntas fuisse dicenda est. Porro si nocuit, bonum auferendo uel minuendo utique nocuit.

Non igitur esse potuit sempiterna uoluntas mala in ea re, in qua bonum naturale praecesserat, quod mala uoluntas nocendo posset adimere. Si ergo non erat sempiterna, quis eam fecerit quaero. Restat ut dicatur, quod ea res fecerit malam uoluntatem, in qua nulla uoluntas fuit. Haec utrum superior sit, requiro, an inferior, an aequalis. Sed superior utique melior; quo modo ergo nullius, ac non potius bonae uoluntatis? Hoc idem profecto et aequalis. Duo quippe quamdiu sunt pariter uoluntatis bonae, non facit alter in altero uoluntatem malam. Relinquitur ut inferior res, cui nulla uoluntas est, fecerit him it would not become nothing, but it would be less, and for that reason it would become miserable.[3]

ENGLISH

If we ask for the efficient cause of this evil will, none is found. For what is it that makes the will evil, when it is the will itself that makes the act evil? So an evil will is the efficient cause of an evil act, but an evil will has no efficient cause. For suppose it is some thing. Either that thing has a will or it does not. If it has one, it certainly has either a good will or an evil one. If a good one, who would be so foolish as to say that a good will makes a will evil? If that were so, a good will would be the cause of sin, and nothing more absurd can be imagined. But suppose this thing that is thought to make the will evil itself also has an evil will. Then I go on to ask what thing made that will. And so, that there may be some limit to the inquiry, I ask for the cause of the first evil will.

For an evil will made by an evil will is not the first. The first is the one that nothing made, for if another preceded it and made it, the one that made the other is prior. Suppose the answer is that nothing made it and that it has therefore always existed. Then I ask whether it existed in some nature. If it existed in none, it did not exist at all. But if it existed in some nature, it was flawing and corrupting that nature and was harmful to it, and so was depriving it of good. So the evil will could not exist in an evil nature, but only in a good one, though a changeable one, which this flaw could harm. For if it did no harm, it was certainly not a flaw, and so it should not be called an evil will either. And if it did harm, it certainly harmed by taking away or diminishing good.

An evil will, then, could not be everlasting in a thing in which a natural good had preceded it, a good that the evil will could take away by doing harm. If, then, it was not everlasting, I ask who made it. The only answer left is that the evil will was made by a thing in which there was no will. I ask whether this thing is superior, inferior or equal. A superior thing is certainly better. How then could it have no will, and not rather a good will? The same certainly holds for an equal thing. For as long as two beings both have a good will, one does not produce an evil will in the other. It

3 Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 10:13. "Keep their strength for him" echoes Psalm 58:10 (59:9 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

angelicae naturae, quae prima peccauit, uoluntatem malam.

Sed etiam res ipsa quaecumque est inferior usque ad infimam terram, quoniam natura et essentia est, procul dubio bona est, habens modum et speciem suam in genere adque ordine suo. Quo modo ergo res bona efficiens est uoluntatis malae? Quo modo, inquam, bonum est causa mali? Cum enim se uoluntas relicto superiore ad inferiora conuertit, efficitur mala, non quia malum est, quo se conuertit, sed quia peruersa est ipsa conuersio. Idcirco non res inferior uoluntatem malam fecit, sed rem inferiorem praue adque inordinate, ipsa quia facta est, adpetiuit.

Si enim aliqui duo aequaliter affecti animo et corpore uideant, unius corporis pulchritudinem, qua uisa unus eorum ad inlicite fruendum moueatur, alter in uoluntate pudica stabilis perseueret, quid putamus esse causae, ut in illo fiat, in illo non fiat uoluntas mala? Quae illam res fecit in quo facta est? Neque enim pulchritudo illa corporis; nam eam non fecit in ambobus, quando quidem amborum non dispariliter occurrit aspectibus. An caro intuentis in causa est? quur non et illius? An uero animus? quur non utriusque? Ambos enim et animo et corpore aequaliter affectos fuisse praediximus. An dicendum est alterum eorum occulta maligni spiritus suggestione tentatum, quasi non eidem suggestioni et qualicumque suasioni propria uoluntate consenserit?

Hanc igitur consensionem, hanc malam quam male suadenti adhibuit uoluntatem, quae in eo res fecerit, quaerimus. Nam ut hoc quoque inpedimentum ab ista quaestione tollatur, si eadem tentatione ambo tententur, et unus ei cedat adque consentiat, alter idem qui fuerat perseueret: quid aliud apparet, nisi unum noluisse, alterum uoluisse a castitate deficere? Unde, nisi propria uoluntate, ubi eadem fuerat in utroque corporis et animi affectio? Amborum oculis pariter uisa est eadem pulchritudo, ambobus pariter institit occulta tentatio; propriam igitur in uno eorum uoluntatem malam res quae fecerit scire uolentibus, si bene intueantur, nihil occurrit. Si enim dixerimus quod ipse eam fecerit, quid remains that an inferior thing, which has no will, made the evil will of the angelic nature that first sinned.

ENGLISH

But even that inferior thing, whatever it is, all the way down to the lowest earth, is beyond doubt good, since it is a nature and an essence and has its own measure and form in its own kind and order. How then can a good thing be the efficient cause of an evil will? How, I say, can good be the cause of evil? When the will abandons what is higher and turns to what is lower, it becomes evil. It does so not because what it turns to is evil, but because the turning itself is perverse. Therefore it was not the inferior thing that made the will evil. Rather, the will itself, because it was made, desired the inferior thing in a depraved and disordered way.

Suppose two people, alike in their disposition of mind and body, see the beauty of one and the same body. At the sight one of them is moved to enjoy it unlawfully, while the other remains steadfast in a chaste will. What do we suppose is the reason an evil will arises in the one and not in the other? What thing produced it in the one in whom it arose? Not the beauty of that body, for it did not produce it in both, since it was presented to the eyes of both alike. Is the flesh of the one who looks the cause? Why not the flesh of the other as well? Or is it the mind? Why not the mind of both? For we have already said that both were alike in mind and body. Or should we say that one of them was tempted by the secret suggestion of an evil spirit? That would be to suggest that he had not consented to that suggestion, and to whatever persuasion it was, by his own will.

It is this consent, then, this evil will that he gave to the one persuading him to evil, that we are asking about: what thing produced it in him? To remove this obstacle from the question as well, suppose both are tempted by the same temptation. One yields and consents to it, while the other remains just as he was. What else is apparent but that one was unwilling and the other willing to fall away from chastity? Where could this come from, if not from his own will, since the disposition of body and mind had been the same in both? The same beauty was seen equally by the eyes of both. The same secret temptation pressed upon both equally. So those who want to know what thing erat ipse ante uoluntatem malam nisi natura bona, cuius auctor Deus, qui est inmutabile bonum?	produced the evil will that belongs to one of them find nothing, if they look carefully. Suppose we say that he himself produced it. What was he before the evil will but a good nature, whose author is God, who is the unchangeable good?

LATIN	ENGLISH
Qui ergo dicit eum, qui consensit tentanti adque suadenti, cui non consensit alius, ad inlicite utendum pulchro corpore, quod uidendum ambobus pariter adfuit, cum ante illam uisionem ac tentationem similes ambo animo et corpore fuerint, ipsum sibi fecisse uoluntatem malam, qui utique bonus ante uoluntatem malam fuerit: quaerat quur eam fecerit, utrum quia natura est, an quia ex nihilo facta est, et inueniet uoluntatem malam non ex eo esse incipere quod natura est, sed ex eo quod de nihilo facta natura est. Nam si natura causa est uoluntatis malae, quid aliud cogimur dicere, nisi a bono fieri malum et bonum esse causam mali? si quidem a natura bona fit uoluntas mala.	Someone may say, then, that the man made the evil will for himself. This is the man who consented to the one tempting and persuading him to make unlawful use of a beautiful body, when the other did not consent. That body was before the eyes of both alike, and before that sight and that temptation the two were alike in mind and body. Certainly this man was good before the evil will. Let whoever says this ask why he made it: was it because he is a nature, or because he was made from nothing? He will find that the evil will begins not from the fact that it is a nature, but from the fact that it is a nature made from nothing. For if nature is the cause of the evil will, what else are we forced to say but that evil comes from good and that good is the cause of evil, since an evil will comes from a good nature?
Quod unde fieri potest, ut natura bona, quamuis mutabilis, antequam habeat uoluntatem malam, faciat aliquid mali, hoc est ipsam uoluntatem malam?	For how can it happen that a good nature, however changeable, should do something evil before it has an evil will, that is, should produce the evil will itself?

THAT NO EFFICIENT CAUSE OF AN EVIL WILL SHOULD BE SOUGHT

An evil will has no efficient cause, only a deficient one, like darkness or silence.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.7 Nemo igitur quaerat efficientem causam malae uoluntatis; non enim est efficiens sed deficiens, quia nec illa effectio sed defectio. Deficere namque ab eo, quod summe est, ad id, quod minus est, hoc est incipere habere uoluntatem malam. Causas porro defectionum istarum, cum efficientes non sint, ut dixi, sed deficientes, uelle inuenire tale est, ac si quisquam uelit uidere tenebras uel audire silentium, quod tamen utrumque nobis notum est, neque illud nisi per oculos, neque hoc nisi per aures, non sane in specie, sed in speciei priuatione. Nemo ergo ex me scire quaerat, quod me nescire scio, nisi forte ut nescire discat, quod sciri non posse sciendum est.	No one, then, should look for the efficient cause of an evil will. Its cause is not efficient but deficient, because the evil will itself is not an effecting but a defecting. To defect from that which supremely is to that which has less being—this is what it is to begin to have an evil will. Moreover, wanting to discover the causes of these defections, which, as I have said, are not efficient but deficient, is like wanting to see darkness or hear silence. Yet both of these are known to us, the one only through the eyes, the other only through the ears—not, of course, by their form, but by the absence of form. So let no one try to learn from me what I know that I do not know—unless perhaps to learn not to know what must be known to be unknowable.
Ea quippe quae non in specie, sed in eius priuatione sciuntur, si dici aut intellegi potest, quodam modo	Things that are known not by their form but by its absence are known, if this can be said or under-

LATIN	ENGLISH
nesciendo sciuntur, ut sciendo nesciantur. Cum enim acies etiam oculi corporalis currit per species corporales, nusquam tenebras uidet, nisi ubi coeperit non uidere. Ita etiam non ad aliquem alium sensum, sed ad solas aures pertinet sentire silentium, quod tamen nullo modo nisi non audiendo sentitur. Sic species intellegibiles mens quidem nostra intellegendo conspicit; sed ubi deficiunt, nesciendo condiscit. Delicta enim quis intellegit?	stood, in a sense by not knowing them, so that in being known they remain unknown. When the gaze even of the bodily eye passes over bodily forms, it sees darkness nowhere except where it begins not to see. In the same way, perceiving silence belongs to no other sense but to the ears alone, and yet silence is perceived in no way except by not hearing. So too our mind beholds intelligible forms by understanding them; but where they fail, it learns by not knowing. For "who understands his failings?"[4]

THE PERVERSE LOVE BY WHICH THE WILL FALLS AWAY FROM THE UNCHANGEABLE GOOD TO A CHANGEABLE GOOD

Sin is not in the things loved but in loving them perversely, against the order of goods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.8 Hoc scio, naturam Dei numquam, nusquam, nulla ex parte posse deficere, et ea posse deficere, quae ex nihilo facta sunt. Quae tamen quanto magis sunt et bona faciunt (tunc enim aliquid faciunt), causas habent efficientes; in quantum autem deficiunt et ex hoc mala faciunt (quid enim tunc faciunt nisi uana?). causas habent deficientes. Itemque scio, in quo fit mala uoluntas, id in eo fieri, quod si nollet non fieret, et ideo non necessarios, sed uoluntarios defectus iusta poena consequitur. Deficitur enim non ad mala, sed male, id est non ad malas naturas, sed ideo male, quia contra ordinem naturarum ab eo quod summe est ad id quod minus est.	This I know: that the nature of God can never, nowhere, in no respect fail, and that things made from nothing can fail. Yet these things, insofar as they have more being and do good (for then they are doing something), have efficient causes; but insofar as they fail and so do evil (for what are they doing then but what is empty?), they have deficient causes. I also know that when an evil will arises in anyone, what arises in him is something that would not arise if he did not will it. That is why just punishment follows failings that are not necessary but voluntary. For one does not fall away to evil things; one falls away evilly. That is, the falling away is not to natures that are evil; it is evil because, against the order of natures, it turns from that which supremely is to that which has less being.
Neque enim auri uitium est auaritia, sed hominis peruerse amantis aurum iustitia derelicta, quae incomparabiliter auro debuit anteponi; nec luxuria uitium est pulchrorum suauiumque corporum, sed animae peruerse amantis corporeas uoluptates neglecta temperantia, qua rebus spiritaliter pulchrioribus et incorruptibiliter suauioribus coaptamur; nec iactantia uitium est laudis humanae, sed animae peruerse amantis laudari ab hominibus spreto testimonio conscientiae; nec superbia uitium est dantis potestatem uel ipsius etiam potestatis, sed animae peruerse amantis potestatem suam potentioris iustiore contemta. Ac per hoc qui peruerse amat cuiuslibet naturae bonum, etiamsi	Greed is not a fault in gold but in the person who perversely loves gold and abandons justice, which ought to be preferred to gold beyond all comparison. Sensuality is not a fault in beautiful and pleasant bodies but in the soul that perversely loves bodily pleasures and neglects temperance, which fits us for things spiritually more beautiful and incorruptibly more pleasant. Boastfulness is not a fault in human praise but in the soul that perversely loves to be praised by others and scorns the testimony of conscience. Pride is not a fault in the one who gives power, or in power itself, but in the soul that perversely loves its own power and

4 Psalm 18:13 (19:12 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
adipiscatur, ipse fit in bono malus et miser meliore priuatus.	despises the juster power of one who is mightier. And so whoever perversely loves the good of any nature whatever, even if he obtains it, himself becomes evil in the midst of good, and wretched, because he is deprived of what is better.

WHETHER THE HOLY ANGELS HAVE THE SAME AUTHOR OF THEIR GOOD WILL AS OF THEIR NATURE, THROUGH THE LOVE POURED INTO THEM BY THE HOLY SPIRIT

The good angels' good will, like their nature, was made by God and given by his love.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.9 Cum ergo malae uoluntatis efficiens naturalis uel, si dici potest, essentialis nulla sit causa (ab ipsa quippe incipit spirituum mutabilium malum, quo minuitur adque deprauatur naturae bonum, nec talem uoluntatem facit nisi defectio, qua deseritur Deus, cuius defectionis etiam causa utique deficit): si dixerimus nullam esse efficientem causam etiam uoluntatis bonae, cauendum est, ne uoluntas bona bonorum angelorum non facta, sed Deo coaeterna esse credatur. Cum ergo ipsi facti sint, quo modo illa non esse facta dicetur? Porro quia facta est, utrum cum ipsis facta est, an sine illa fuerunt prius?	There is, then, no natural or—if the word may be used—essential efficient cause of an evil will. For the evil of mutable spirits begins from the evil will itself, and by it the good of their nature is diminished and corrupted; and nothing produces such a will except defection, by which God is deserted—a defection whose cause is itself, of course, deficient. But if we say that there is no efficient cause of a good will either, we must take care not to let anyone believe that the good will of the good angels was not made but is coeternal with God. Since the angels themselves were made, how can their will be said not to have been made? And since it was made, was it made together with them, or did they first exist without it?
Sed si cum ipsis, non dubium quod ab illo facta sit, a quo et ipsi; simulque ut facti sunt, ei a quo facti sunt, amore, cum quo facti sunt, adhaeserunt; eoque sunt isti ab illorum societate discreti, quod illi in eadem bona uoluntate manserunt, isti ab ea deficiendo mutati sunt, mala scilicet uoluntate hoc ipso quod a bona defecerunt; a qua non defecissent, si utique noluissent. Si autem boni angeli fuerunt prius sine bona uoluntate eamque in se ipsi Deo non operante fecerunt, ergo meliores a se ipsis quam ab illo facti sunt. Absit. Quid enim erant sine bona uoluntate nisi mali?	If it was made together with them, there is no doubt that it was made by the one who made them. As soon as they were made, they clung to him who made them by the love with which they were made. And the fallen angels were separated from their company in this: the good ones remained in that same good will, while the others were changed by falling away from it—changed into an evil will, that is, by the very fact that they fell away from the good one; and they would not have fallen away from it had they not willed to. But if the good angels at first existed without a good will, and produced it in themselves by themselves, without God working in them, then they were made better by themselves than by him. Far from it! For what were they without a good will but evil?
Aut si propterea non mali, quia nec mala uoluntas eis inerat (neque enim ab ea, quam nondum coeperant habere, defecerant), certe nondum tales, nondum tam boni quam esse cum bona uoluntate coeperunt. At si non potuerunt se ipsos facere meliores, quam eos ille fecerat, quo nemo melius quidquam facit: profecto et bonam	Or, if they were not evil because there was no evil will in them either (for they had not fallen away from a good will that they had not yet begun to have), they were certainly not yet such as they became—not yet as good as they began to be once they had a good will. But if they could not make uoluntatem, qua meliores essent, nisi operante adiutorio Creatoris habere non possent.

LATIN

Et cum id egit eorum uoluntas bona, ut non ad se ipsos, qui minus erant, sed ad illum, qui summe est, conuerterentur eique adhaerentes magis essent eiusque participatione sapienter beateque uiuerent: quid aliud ostenditur nisi uoluntatem quamlibet bonam inopem fuisse in solo desiderio remansuram, nisi ille, qui bonam naturam ex nihilo sui capacem fecerat, ex se ipso faceret inplendo meliorem, prius faciens excitando auidiorem?

Nam et hoc discutiendum est, si boni angeli ipsi in se fecerunt bonam uoluntatem, utrum aliqua eam an nulla uoluntate fecerunt. Si nulla, utique nec fecerunt. Si aliqua, utrum mala an bona? Si mala, quo modo esse potuit mala uoluntas bonae uoluntatis effectrix? Si bona, iam ergo habebant. Et istam quis fecerat nisi ille, qui eos cum bona uoluntate, id est cum amore casto quo illi adhaererent, creauit, simul eis et condens naturam et largiens gratiam? Unde sine bona uoluntate, hoc est Dei amore, numquam sanctos angelos fuisse credendum est.

Isti autem, qui, cum boni creati essent, tamen mali sunt (mala propria uoluntate, quam bona natura non fecit, nisi cum a bono sponte defecit, ut mali causa non sit bonum, sed defectus a bono), aut minorem acceperunt diuini amoris gratiam quam illi, qui in eadem perstiterunt, aut si utrique boni aequaliter creati sunt, istis mala uoluntate cadentibus illi amplius adiuti ad eam beatitudinis plenitudinem, unde se numquam casuros certissimi fierent, peruenerunt; sicut iam etiam in libro, quem sequitur iste, tractauimus.

Confitendum est igitur cum debita laude Creatoris non ad solos sanctos homines pertinere, uerum etiam de sanctis angelis posse dici, quod caritas Dei diffusa sit in eis per Spiritum sanctum, qui datus est eis; nec tantum hominum, sed primitus praecipueque angelorum bonum themselves better than he had made them, than whom no one makes anything better, then surely they could not have had the good will by which they would be better except by the working help of the Creator.

ENGLISH

Their good will brought it about that they turned not to themselves, who had less being, but to him who supremely is, so that by clinging to him they might have more being and live wisely and happily by sharing in him. What does this show, if not that any will, however good, would have remained destitute, in mere longing, had not he who made their good nature out of nothing, capable of receiving him, made it better out of himself by filling it—having first made it more eager by stirring it up?

This question too must be examined: if the good angels themselves produced a good will in themselves, did they do so by some will or by none? If by none, then they did not produce it at all. If by some will, was that will evil or good? If evil, how could an evil will produce a good will? If good, then they already had one. And who had made that will but he who created them with a good will —that is, with the chaste love by which they might cling to him—at one and the same time establishing their nature and bestowing grace upon them? We must therefore believe that the holy angels were never without a good will, that is, without the love of God.

But those who, though created good, are nevertheless evil (evil by their own will, which their good nature did not produce except when it freely fell away from the good, so that the cause of evil is not the good but falling away from the good) either received a lesser grace of divine love than those who persevered in it, or else, if both were created equally good, then, while the former fell through their evil will, the latter received greater help and attained that fullness of happiness which made them completely certain that they would never fall. We have already discussed this in the book preceding this one.

We must therefore acknowledge, with the praise due to the Creator, that it is not only of holy human beings but also of the holy angels that it can be said that "the love of God has been poured out in them through the Holy Spirit, who has been giv-

LATIN	ENGLISH
esse, quod scriptum est: Mihi autem adhaerere Deo bonum est. Hoc bonum quibus commune est, habent et cum illo cui adhaerent et inter se sanctam societatem et sunt una ciuitas Dei eademque uiuum sacrificium eius uiuumque templum eius. Cuius pars, quae coniungenda inmortalibus angelis ex mortalibus hominibus congregatur et nunc mortaliter peregrinatur in terris uel in eis, qui mortem obierunt, secretis animarum receptaculis sedibusque requiescit, eodem Deo creante quem ad modum exorta sit, sicut de angelis dictum est, iam uideo esse dicendum.	en to them." And what is written—"But for me it is good to cling to God"—is the good not only of human beings but first and foremost of angels. Those who share this good in common have a holy fellowship both with him to whom they cling and with one another, and they are one city of God, and at the same time his living sacrifice and his living temple. Part of this city is being gathered from mortal human beings to be joined to the immortal angels; it is now on pilgrimage on earth in mortal fashion, or, in those who have died, it rests in the hidden resting places and abodes of souls. I see that I must now explain how this part came into being, by the creative work of the same God, as I have done for the angels.[5]
Ex uno quippe homine, quem primum Deus condidit, humanum genus sumsit exordium secundum sanctae scripturae fidem, quae mirabilem auctoritatem non inmerito habet in orbe terrarum adque in omnibus gentibus, quas sibi esse crediturus inter cetera uera, quae dixit, uera diuinitate praedixit.	For according to the faith of holy Scripture, the human race took its beginning from one man, whom God created first. Not without reason does this Scripture have marvelous authority throughout the world and among all the nations; among the other true things it has spoken, it foretold, with true divinity, that they would believe in it.

THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO THINK THE HUMAN RACE, LIKE THE WORLD ITSELF, HAS ALWAYS EXISTED

Some hold that humanity, like the world, has always existed, destroyed and renewed by floods and fires.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.10 Omittamus igitur coniecturas hominum nescientium quid loquantur de natura uel institutione generis humani. Alii namque, sicut de ipso mundo crediderunt, semper fuisse homines opinantur. Unde et ait Apuleius, cum hoc animantium genus describeret: Singillatim mortales, cuncti tamen uniuerso genere perpetui.	Let us then set aside the conjectures of people who do not know what they are talking about when they speak of the nature or origin of the human race. Some think, as they believed about the world itself, that there have always been human beings. So Apuleius, describing this kind of living creature, says: "Individually mortal, yet collectively, as a whole race, everlasting."[6]
Et cum illis dictum fuerit, si semper fuit humanum genus, quonam modo uerum eorum loquatur historia narrans qui fuerint quarumque rerum inuentores, qui primi liberalium disciplinarum aliarumque artium institutores, uel a quibus primum illa uel illa regio parsque terrarum, illa adque illa insula incoli coeperit, respondent diluuiis et conflagrationibus per certa interualla temporum non quidem omnia, sed plurima terrarum ita uastari, ut redigantur homines ad exiguam paucitatem, ex quorum progenie rursus multitudo pristina reparetur; ac sic	They are asked: if the human race has always existed, how can their own history be telling the truth when it records who invented this or that, who first established the liberal disciplines and the other arts, or by whom this or that region and part of the earth, this or that island, first began to be inhabited? They reply that at certain intervals of time floods and conflagrations lay waste, not indeed the whole earth, but most of it, so that human beings are reduced to a tiny few, from whose

5 Romans 5:5; Psalm 72:28 (73:28 in most English Bibles).
6 From Apuleius, On the God of Socrates.

LATIN	ENGLISH
identidem reperiri et institui quasi prima, cum restituantur potius, quae fuerant illis nimiis uastationibus interrupta et extincta; ceterum hominem nisi ex homine existere omnino non posse. Dicunt autem quod putant, non quod sciunt.	offspring the former multitude is restored. And so, they say, things are again and again discovered and established as if for the first time, when in fact what is happening is rather the restoration of what those overwhelming devastations had interrupted and extinguished; but a human being could not come into existence at all except from a human being. They say what they think, however, not what they know.

THE FALSITY OF THE HISTORY THAT ASSIGNS MANY THOUSANDS OF YEARS TO PAST AGES

Egyptian claims of vast antiquity are false; Scripture counts under six thousand years since man.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.11 Fallunt eos etiam quaedam mendacissimae litterae, quas perhibent in historia temporum multa annorum milia continere, cum ex litteris sacris ab institutione hominis nondum conpleta annorum sex milia conputemus. Unde ne multa disputem quem ad modum illarum litterarum, in quibus longe plura annorum milia referuntur, uanitas refellatur et nulla in illis rei huius idonea reperiatur auctoritas: illa epistula Alexandri Magni ad Olympiadem matrem suam, quam scripsit narrationem cuiusdam Aegyptii sacerdotis insinuans, quam protulit ex litteris quae sacrae aput illos haberentur, continet etiam regna, quae Graeca quoque nouit historia;	They are also misled by certain thoroughly lying writings which, they claim, record many thousands of years of history, whereas from the sacred writings we reckon that not yet six thousand years have passed since man was first made. I will not argue at length how the emptiness of those writings, which report far more thousands of years, is refuted, and how no adequate authority on this matter is to be found in them. That letter of Alexander the Great to his mother Olympias, in which he passes on the account of a certain Egyptian priest, drawn by the priest from writings regarded as sacred among the Egyptians, also includes kingdoms that Greek history knows as well;[7]
in quibus regnum Assyriorum in eadem epistula Alexandri quinque milia excedit annorum; in Graeca uero historia mille ferme et trecentos habet ab ipsius Beli principatu, quem regem et ille Aegyptius in eiusdem regni ponit exordio; Persarum autem et Macedonum imperium usque ad ipsum Alexandrum, cui loquebatur, plus quam octo annorum milia ille constituit, cum aput Graecos Macedonum usque ad mortem Alexandri quadringenti octoginta quinque reperiantur, Persarum uero, donec ipsius Alexandri uictoria finiretur, ducenti et triginta tres conputentur.	and among these, the kingdom of the Assyrians, in that same letter of Alexander, exceeds five thousand years, whereas in Greek history it runs to about thirteen hundred from the reign of Belus himself, whom the Egyptian too places as king at the beginning of that kingdom. The empire of the Persians and of the Macedonians, up to Alexander himself, whom he was addressing, the priest puts at more than eight thousand years; but among the Greeks the Macedonian kingdom is found to last four hundred eighty-five years up to Alexander's death, and the Persian is reckoned at two hundred thirty-three years until it was ended by Alexander's own victory.[8]
Longe itaque hi numeri annorum illis Aegyptiis sunt minores, nec eis, etiamsi ter tantum conputarentur, aequarent. Perhibentur enim Aegyptii quondam tam breues annos habuisse, ut quaternis mensibus finirentur;	These figures, then, are far smaller than the Egyptian ones, and would not equal them even if they were counted three times over. For the Egyptians are said once to have had years so short that each

7 Alexander the Great (356–323 BC), king of Macedon; the letter, probably a later forgery, circulated widely in antiquity.
8 Belus was the legendary first king of Assyria, often identified with the Babylonian god Bel.

LATIN	ENGLISH
unde annus plenior et uerior, qualis nunc et nobis et illis est, tres eorum annos conplectebatur antiquos. Sed ne sic quidem, ut dixi, Graeca Aegyptiae numero temporum concordat historia. Et ideo Graecae potius fides habenda est, quia ueritatem non excedit annorum, qui litteris nostris, quae uere sacrae sunt, continentur.	ended after four months; hence the fuller and truer year, such as both we and they now have, comprised three of their old years. But even so, as I said, Greek history does not agree with the Egyptian in its reckoning of time. And so the Greek should rather be trusted, because it does not exceed the true number of years contained in our writings, which are truly sacred.
Porro si haec epistula Alexandri, quae maxime innotuit, multum abhorret in spatiis temporum a probabili fide rerum: quanto minus credendum est illis litteris, quas, plenas fabulosis uelut antiquitatibus proferre uoluerint contra auctoritatem notissimorum diuinorumque librorum, quae totum orbem sibi creditum esse praedixit, et cui totus orbis, sicut ab ea praedictum est, credidit; quae uera se narrasse praeterita ex his, quae futura praenuntiauit, cum tanta ueritate inplentur, ostendit.	Further, if this letter of Alexander, which has become very well known, departs so far from credible fact in its spans of time, how much less should we believe those writings, full of fabulous so-called antiquities, which they have chosen to bring forward against the authority of the best-known and divine books! That authority foretold that the whole world would believe it, and the whole world, as it foretold, has believed it; and it shows that it has told the truth about the past by the fact that what it foretold of the future is being fulfilled with such great truth.

THOSE WHO THINK THIS WORLD IS NOT EVERLASTING, BUT HOLD THAT EITHER COUNTLESS WORLDS, OR THIS SAME ONE, ARE ALWAYS BORN AND DISSOLVED AT A FIXED END OF THE AGES

Those who believe in many worlds, or one world reborn, must admit humanity once began without parents.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.12 Alii uero, qui mundum istum non existimant sempiternum, siue non eum solum, sed innumerabiles opinentur, siue solum quidem esse, sed certis saeculorum interuallis innumerabiliter oriri et occidere, necesse est fateantur hominum genus prius sine hominibus gignentibus extitisse. Neque enim ut alluuionibus incendiisque terrarum, quas illi non putant toto prorsus orbe contingere, et ideo paucos homines, ex quibus multitudo pristina reparetur, semper remanere contendunt, ita et hi possunt putare, quod aliquid hominum pereunte mundo relinquatur in mundo; sed sicut ipsum mundum ex materia sua renasci existimant, ita in illo ex elementis eius genus humanum ac deinde a parentibus progeniem pullulare mortalium, sicut aliorum animalium.	Others, however, do not consider this world everlasting. Some think there is not just this one world but innumerable worlds; others that there is indeed only one, but that at fixed intervals of ages it arises and perishes innumerable times. Either way, they must admit that the human race first came into existence without human parents to beget it. The former group hold that the floods and conflagrations of the earth do not affect the whole world entirely, and so they contend that a few human beings always survive, from whom the former multitude is restored. These others cannot suppose in the same way that some part of humanity is left in the world when the world perishes. Rather, just as they think the world itself is reborn from its own matter, so they think that within it the human race springs up from its elements, and that thereafter the offspring of mortals springs from parents, as with other animals.

WHAT TO ANSWER THOSE WHO COMPLAIN THAT THE FIRST CREATION OF HUMANITY CAME LATE

Any finite span is nothing compared with eternity, so the question "why not earlier?" never ends.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.13	Quod autem respondimus, cum de mundi origine quaestio uerteretur, eis, qui nolunt credere non eum semper fuisse, sed esse coepisse, sicut etiam Plato apertissime confitetur, quamuis a nonnullis contra quam loquitur sensisse credatur: hoc etiam de prima hominis conditione responderim, propter eos, qui similiter mouentur, quur homo per innumerabilia adque infinita retro tempora creatus non sit tamque sero sit creatus, ut minus quam sex milia sint annorum, ex quo esse coepisse in sacris litteris inuenitur. Si enim breuitas eos offendit temporis, quod tam pauci eis uidentur anni, ex quo institutus homo in nostris auctoritatibus legitur: considerent nihil esse diuturnum, in quo est aliquid extremum, et omnia saeculorum spatia definita, si aeternitati interminae comparentur, non exigua existimanda esse, sed nulla.	When the question concerned the origin of the world, I gave a reply to those who refuse to believe that it has not always existed but had a beginning —as even Plato quite plainly admits, although some believe he held the contrary of what he says. I would give the same reply concerning the first creation of man, for the sake of those who are similarly troubled about why man was not created through innumerable and infinite ages past, but was created so late that, according to the sacred writings, it is less than six thousand years since he began to exist. If the shortness of the time offends them, because so few years seem to them to have passed since man was made, as we read in our authoritative texts, let them consider that nothing is long-lasting that has an end, and that all the finite spans of the ages, compared with endless eternity, must be considered not small but nothing at all.[9]
	Ac per hoc si non quinque uel sex, uerum etiam sexaginta milia siue sescenta, aut sexagiens, aut sescentiens, aut sescentiens miliens dicerentur annorum, aut itidem per totidem totiens multiplicaretur haec summa, ubi iam nullum numeri nomen haberemus, ex quo Deus hominem fecit: similiter quaeri posset, quur ante non fecerit.	And so, if it were said that not five or six thousand years, but sixty thousand or six hundred thousand, or sixty times or six hundred times as many, or six hundred thousand times as many, had passed since God made man—or if this sum were again multiplied as many times over by as much, until we had no name left for the number—the same question could still be asked: why did he not make him earlier?
	Dei quippe ab hominis creatione cessatio retrorsus aeterna sine initio tanta est, ut, si ei conferatur quamlibet magna et ineffabilis numerositas temporum, quae tamen fine conclusa certi spatii terminatur, nec saltem tanta uideri debeat, quanta si umoris breuissimam guttam uniuerso mari, etiam quantum oceanus circumfluit, conparemus; quoniam istorum duorum unum quidem perexiguum est, alterum incomparabiliter magnum, sed utrumque finitum; illud uero temporis spatium, quod ab aliquo initio progreditur et aliquo termino cohercetur, magnitudine quantacumque tendatur, conparatum illi, quod initium non habet, nescio utrum pro minimo an potius pro nullo deputandum est.	For God's abstention from creating man, stretching back eternally without beginning, is so vast that any number of ages, however great and unspeakable, if it is still bounded by an end and limited to a definite span, should not seem even as large, compared with it, as the tiniest drop of water compared with the whole sea, including all that the ocean flows around. For of these two, one is indeed very tiny and the other incomparably great, but both are finite. But a span of time that proceeds from some beginning and is confined by some end, however great its extent, when compared with that which has no beginning—I do not know whether it should be reckoned as the very least or rather as nothing.

9 Plato's Timaeus describes the world as having come into being; some later Platonists read this figuratively. Augustine's earlier reply is in Book 11.

LATIN

Hinc enim si a fine uel breuissima siugillatim momenta detrahantur, decrescente numero licet tam ingenti, ut uocabulum non inueniat, retrorsum redeundo (tamquam si hominis dies ab illo, in quo nunc uiuit, usque ad illum, in quo natus est, detrahas) quandoque ad initium illa detractio perducetur. Si autem detrahantur retrorsus in spatio, quod a nullo coepit exordio, non dico singillatim minuta momenta uel horarum aut dierum aut mensum aut annorum etiam quantitates, sed tam magna spatia, quanta illa summa conprehendit annorum, quae iam dici a quibuslibet conputatoribus non potest, quae tamen momentorum minutatim detractione consumitur, et detrahantur haec tanta spatia non semel adque iterum saepiusque, sed semper: quid fit, quid agitur, quando numquam ad initium, quod omnino nullum est, peruenitur?

ENGLISH

For if from this finite span even the briefest moments are subtracted one by one from the end, working backward, then, as the number decreases —however vast it may be, so vast that it can find no word for itself—that subtraction will at some point arrive at the beginning, just as if you were to subtract a man's days from the one on which he is now living back to the one on which he was born. But suppose one subtracts backward in a span that began from no starting point—I do not mean tiny moments one by one, or quantities of hours or days or months or even years, but spans as great as that sum of years which no calculator can any longer name, though it is used up by the subtraction of moments one at a time—and suppose these vast spans are subtracted not once or twice or many times, but forever. What happens, what is achieved, when one never arrives at the beginning, since there is no beginning at all?

Quapropter quod nos modo quaerimus post quinque milia et quod excurrit annorum, possent et posteri etiam post annorum sescentiens miliens eadem curiositate requirere, si in tantum haec mortalitas hominum exoriendo et occubando et inperita perseueraret infirmitas. Potuerunt et qui fuerunt ante nos ipsis recentibus hominis creati temporibus istam mouere quaestionem. Ipse denique primus homo uel postridie uel eodem die postea quam factus est potuit inquirere, quur non ante sit factus; et quandocumque antea factus esset, non uires tunc alias et alias nunc uel etiam postea ista de initio rerum temporalium controuersia reperiret.

So the question we are asking now, after five thousand years and somewhat more, our descendants might ask with the same curiosity even after six hundred thousand times as many years, if human mortality, with its births and deaths, and its ignorant weakness were to last so long. Those who lived before us, in the times when the creation of man was still recent, could also have raised this question. Indeed, the first man himself, the day after he was made, or later that same day, could have asked why he was not made earlier. And however much earlier he had been made, this dispute about the beginning of temporal things would have had no different force then than it has now, or will have later.

THE CYCLES OF AGES, AT WHOSE FIXED END SOME PHILOSOPHERS BELIEVED ALL THINGS WOULD ALWAYS RETURN TO THE SAME ORDER AND FORM

Philosophers invented endless cycles of repetition; Augustine denies that Plato will teach again and again.

LATIN

12.14 Hanc autem se philosophi mundi huius non aliter putauerunt posse uel debere dissoluere, nisi ut circuitus temporum inducerent, quibus eadem semper fuisse renouata adque repetita in rerum natura adque ita deinceps fore sine cessatione adseuerarent uolumina uenientium et praetereuntium saeculorum; siue in mundo permanente isti circuitus fierent, siue certis interuallis oriens et occidens mundus eadem semper quasi noua, quae transacta et uentura sunt, exhiberet. A

ENGLISH

The philosophers of this world, however, have thought that they could and should resolve this dispute only by introducing cycles of time. In these cycles, they asserted, the same things have always been renewed and repeated in the natural order, and so the revolutions of ages coming and going would continue from then on without ceasing—whether these cycles took place within a permanent world, or the world, arising and perishing quo ludibrio prorsus inmortalem animam, etiam cum sapientiam perceperit, liberare non possunt, euntem sine cessatione ad falsam beatitudinem et ad ueram miseriam sine cessatione redeuntem. Quo modo enim uera beatitudo est, de cuius numquam aeternitate confiditur, dum anima uenturam miseriam aut inperitissime in ueritate nescit aut infelicissime in beatitudine pertimescit?

LATIN

At si ad miserias numquam ulterius reditura ex his ad beatitudinem pergit: fit ergo aliquid noui in tempore, quod finem non habet temporis. Quur non ergo et mundus? quur non et homo factus in mundo? ut illi nescio qui falsi circuitus a falsis sapientibus fallacibusque conperti in doctrina sana tramite recti itineris euitentur.

Nam quidam et illud, quod legitur in libro Salomonis, qui uocatur ecclesiastes: Quid est quod fuit? Ipsum quod erit. Et quid est quod factum est? Ipsum quod fiet; et non est omne recens sub sole. Qui loquetur et dicet: Ecce hoc nouum est: iam fuit saeculis quae fuerunt ante nos, propter hos circuitus in eadem redeuntes et in eadem cuncta reuocantes dictum intellegi uolunt; quod ille aut de his rebus dixit, de quibus superius loquebatur, hoc est de generationibus aliis euntibus, aliis uenientibus, de solis anfractibus, de torrentium lapsibus: aut certe de omnium rerum generibus, quae oriuntur adque occidunt. Fuerunt enim homines ante nos, sunt et nobiscum, erunt et post nos: ita quaeque animantia uel arbusta.

Monstra quoque ipsa, quae inusitata nascuntur, quamuis inter se diuersa sint et quaedam eorum semel facta narrentur, tamen secundum id, quod generaliter miracula et monstra sunt, utique et fuerunt et erunt, nec recens et nouum est, ut monstrum sub sole nascatur. Quamuis haec uerba quidam sic intellexerint, tamquam in praedestinatione Dei iam facta fuisse omnia sapiens ille uoluisset intellegi, et ideo nihil recens esse sub sole.

ENGLISH

at fixed intervals, always presented as if new the same things that had happened and were yet to come. From this mockery they cannot free even the immortal soul, even when it has attained wisdom: it goes without ceasing to a false happiness and returns without ceasing to a true misery. For how can that be true happiness whose eternity one can never be confident of, while the soul either, though in possession of truth, is most ignorantly unaware of the misery to come, or, though in happiness, most unhappily dreads it?

But if the soul passes from these miseries to happiness, never to return to them again, then something new happens in time that has no end in time. Why not, then, the world as well? Why not man, too, made in the world? Thus, by following the path of the right road in sound doctrine, we may avoid those false cycles, whatever they are, discovered by false and fallacious sages.

Some people want the passage in the book of Solomon called Ecclesiastes to be understood as referring to these cycles that return to the same point and bring everything back to the same state: "What is it that has been? The very thing that will be. And what is it that has been done? The very thing that will be done; and there is nothing new under the sun. Who will speak and say, 'Look, this is new'? It has already been in the ages that were before us." But he said this either of the things he was speaking of just before—generations going and others coming, the circuits of the sun, the rushing of torrents—or certainly of the kinds of all things that arise and pass away. For there were human beings before us, there are human beings with us, and there will be human beings after us; and so with every kind of animal and plant.[10]

Even monstrous births, which come in unusual forms, though they differ from one another and some of them are reported to have happened only once, nevertheless, considered generally as marvels and prodigies, certainly have been and will be; and it is nothing recent or new for a monstrous birth to occur under the sun. Some, however, have understood these words to mean that the wise man wanted us to understand that all things had already been made in God's predestination, and that therefore there is nothing new under the sun.

10 Ecclesiastes 1:9–10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Absit autem a recta fide, ut his Salomonis uerbis illos circuitus significatos esse credamus, quibus illi putant sic eadem temporum temporaliumque rerum uolumina repeti, ut uerbi gratia, sicut isto saeculo Plato philosophus in urbe Atheniensi et in ea schola, quae Academia dicta est, discipulos docuit, ita per innumerabilia retro saecula multum quidem prolixis interuallis, sed tamen certis, et idem Plato et eadem ciuitas et eadem schola idemque discipuli repetiti et per innumerabilia deinde saecula repetendi sint. Absit, inquam, ut nos ista credamus.	But far be it from right faith for us to believe that these words of Solomon refer to those cycles in which, as these people think, the same revolutions of times and of temporal things are repeated—so that, for example, just as in this age the philosopher Plato taught his students in the city of Athens, in the school called the Academy, so through innumerable ages past, at intervals very long indeed but fixed, the same Plato, the same city, the same school, and the same students have been repeated, and are to be repeated through innumerable ages to come. Far be it, I say, for us to believe such things.
Semel enim Christus mortuus est pro peccatis nostris; surgens autem a mortuis iam non moritur, et mors ei ultra non dominabitur; et nos post resurrectionem semper cum Domino erimus, cui modo dicimus, quod sacer admonet psalmus: Tu, Domine, seruabis nos et custodies nos a generatione hac et in aeternum. Satis autem istis existimo conuenire quod sequitur: In circuitu inpii ambulabunt; non quia per circulos, quos opinantur, eorum uita est recursura, sed quia modo talis est erroris eorum uia, id est falsa doctrina.	For "Christ died once for our sins"; and "rising from the dead he dies no more, and death will no longer have dominion over him." And after the resurrection "we shall always be with the Lord," to whom we now say, as the sacred psalm urges us: "You, Lord, will preserve us and guard us from this generation and forever." And I think what follows suits these people well enough: "The ungodly will walk in a circle"—not because their life is going to come round again through the cycles they imagine, but because such is now the path of their error, that is, their false doctrine.[11]

THE CREATION OF THE HUMAN RACE IN TIME, WHICH GOD MADE BY NO NEW DECISION AND NO CHANGEABLE WILL

God created the human race in time by an eternal, unchangeable plan, according to his hidden depth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.15 Quid autem mirum est, si in his circuitibus errantes nec aditum nec exitum inueniunt? quia genus humanum adque ista nostra mortalitas nec quo initio coepta sit sciunt, nec quo fine claudatur; quando quidem altitudinem Dei penetrare non possunt, qua, cum ipse sit aeternus et sine initio, ab aliquo tamen initio exorsus est tempora et hominem, quem numquam antea fecerat, fecit in tempore, non tamen nouo et repentino, sed inmutabili aeternoque consilio. Quis hanc ualeat altitudinem inuestigabilem uestigare et inscrutabilem perscrutari, secundum quam Deus hominem temporalem, ante quem nemo umquam hominum fuit, non mutabili uoluntate in tempore condidit et genus humanum ex uno multiplicauit?	What wonder is it, then, if those who wander in these circuits find neither a way in nor a way out? For they do not know how the human race and this mortal condition of ours began, nor by what end it will be closed. They cannot penetrate the depth of God. Though he himself is eternal and without beginning, by that depth he nevertheless began time from some beginning, and in time he made the human being whom he had never made before. He did this not by a new and sudden plan, but by an unchangeable and eternal one. Who could trace this untraceable depth and search out this unsearchable one? According to it God, with no change of will, created in time a temporal hu-

11 1 Peter 3:18; Romans 6:9; 1 Thessalonians 4:17; Psalm 11:8–9 (12:7–8 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	man being, before whom no human being had ever existed, and multiplied the human race from one.
Quando quidem psalmus ipse cum praemisisset adque dixisset: Tu, Domine, seruabis nos et custodies nos a generatione hac et in aeternum, ac deinde repercussisset eos, in quorum stulta inpiaque doctrina nulla liberationis et beatitudinis animae seruatur aeternitas, continuo subiciens: In circuitu inpii ambulabunt: tamquam ei diceretur: Quid ergo tu credis, sentis, intellegis? numquidnam existimandum est subito Deo placuisse hominem facere, quem numquam antea infinita retro aeternitate fecisset, cui nihil noui accidere potest, in quo mutabile aliquid non est? continuo respondit ad ipsum Deum loquens: Secundum altitudinem tuam multiplicasti filios hominum. Sentiant, inquit, homines quod putant, et quod eis placet opinentur et disputent: Secundum altitudinem tuam, quam nullus potest nosse hominum, multiplicasti filios hominum.	For the psalm itself first said, "You, Lord, will preserve us and guard us from this generation and forever." Then it struck back at those whose foolish and impious teaching preserves no eternity of liberation and happiness for the soul, adding at once, "The ungodly will walk in a circle." Then, as though someone asked it, "What, then, do you believe, think, understand? Are we to suppose that it suddenly pleased God to make man, whom he had never made before through an infinite eternity past—God, to whom nothing new can happen, in whom there is nothing changeable?"—it immediately answered, speaking to God himself: "According to your depth you have multiplied the children of men." Let people think what they think, it says, and let them hold and argue whatever they please: "According to your depth," which no human being can know, "you have multiplied the children of men."[12]
Valde quippe altum est et semper fuisse, et hominem, quem numquam fecerat, ex aliquo tempore primum facere uoluisse, nec consilium uoluntatemque mutasse.	For it is truly deep that he should both have always existed and yet have willed, from a certain time, to make for the first time the human being he had never made before, without changing his plan or his will.

WHETHER, SO THAT GOD MAY BE UNDERSTOOD TO HAVE ALWAYS BEEN LORD, WE MUST BELIEVE THERE WAS NEVER A TIME WITHOUT A CREATURE FOR HIM TO RULE; AND HOW SOMETHING CAN BE CALLED ALWAYS CREATED THAT CANNOT BE CALLED COETERNAL

Was God always Lord over some creature? Augustine weighs time and the angels without asserting an answer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.16 Ego quidem sicut Dominum Deum aliquando dominum non fuisse dicere non audeo, ita hominem numquam antea fuisse et ex quodam tempore primum hominem creatum esse dubitare non debeo. Sed cum cogito cuius rei dominus semper fuerit, si semper creatura non fuit, adfirmare aliquid pertimesco, quia et me ipsum intueor et scriptum esse recolo: Quis hominum potest scire consilium Dei, aut quis poterit cogitare quid uelit Dominus? Cogitationes enim mortalium timidae et incertae adinuentiones nostrae. Corruptibile enim corpus adgrauat animam, et deprimit terrena inhabitatio sensum multa cogitantem.	For my part, just as I dare not say that the Lord God was ever not a lord, so I ought not to doubt that man had never existed before and that the first man was created at a certain time. But when I consider what he was always lord of, if there was not always a creation, I am afraid to assert anything. For I look at myself, and I recall that it is written: "Who among men can know the counsel of God, or who can think what the Lord wills? For the thoughts of mortals are timid, and our inventions uncertain. For the corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly dwelling presses down the mind that thinks many things."[13]

12 The last line follows the Greek and Latin text of the psalm.

LATIN

Ex his igitur, quae in hac terrena inhabitatione multa cogito (ideo utique multa, quia unum, quod ex illis uel praeter illa, quod forte non cogito, uerum est, inuenire non possum), si dixero semper fuisse creaturam, cuius dominus esset, qui semper est dominus nec dominus umquam non fuit; sed nunc illam, nunc aliam per alia adque alia temporum spatia, ne aliquam Creatori coaeternam esse dicamus, quod fides ratioque sana condemnat: cauendum est, ne sit absurdum et a luce ueritatis alienum mortalem quidem per uices temporum semper fuisse creaturam, decedentem aliam, aliam succedentem; inmortalem uero non esse coepisse, nisi cum ad nostrum saeculum uentum est, quando et angeli creati sunt, si eos recte lux illa primum facta significat aut illud potius caelum, de quo dictum est: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram, cum tamen non fuerint, antequam fierent, ne inmortales, si semper fuisse dicuntur, Deo coaeterni esse credantur.

Si autem dixero non in tempore creatos angelos, sed ante omnia tempora et ipsos fuisse, quorum Deus dominus esset, qui numquam nisi dominus fuit: quaeretur a me etiam, si ante omnia tempora facti sunt, utrum semper potuerint esse qui facti sunt. Hic respondendum forte uideatur: Quo modo non semper, cum id, quod est omni tempore, non inconuenienter semper esse dicatur? Usque adeo autem isti omni tempore fuerunt, ut etiam ante omnia tempora facti sint; si tamen a caelo coepta sunt tempora, et illi iam erant ante caelum.

At si tempus non a caelo, uerum et ante caelum fuit; non quidem in horis et diebus et mensibus et annis (nam istae dimensiones temporalium spatiorum, quae usitate ac proprie dicuntur tempora, manifestum est quod a motu siderum coeperint; unde et Deus, cum haec institueret, dixit: Et sint in signa et in tempora et in dies et in annos), sed in aliquo mutabili motu, cuius aliud prius, aliud posterius praeterit, eo quod simul esse non possunt; — si ergo ante caelum in angelicis motibus tale aliquid fuit et ideo tempus iam fuit adque angeli, ex quo facti sunt,

ENGLISH

Among these many things, then, that I think in this earthly dwelling (many, precisely because I cannot find the one thing among them, or apart from them—perhaps something I do not think of—that is true), suppose I say that there was always a creation for him to be lord of, he who is always lord and never was not lord; but that it was now this creation, now another, through one stretch of time after another, so that we may not call any of them coeternal with the Creator, which faith and sound reason condemn. Then I must beware lest it be absurd and foreign to the light of truth to hold that mortal creation has always existed through the succession of ages, one passing away and another succeeding, while immortal creation did not begin to exist until our own age was reached, when the angels too were created—if the light that was made first rightly signifies them, or rather that heaven of which it was said, "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." For they at least did not exist before they were made; otherwise, if they were said always to have existed, they would be believed, being immortal, to be coeternal with God.[14]

But if I say that the angels were not created in time, but existed before all times, so that God was lord of them, he who was never anything but lord, I will be asked further: if they were made before all times, could beings that were made have always existed? Here one might perhaps answer: "How not always, since what exists at every time may fittingly be said to exist always?" And these have existed at every time to such a degree that they were made even before all times—if indeed times began with the heaven, and they already existed before the heaven.

But suppose time began not with the heaven but existed even before the heaven—not, indeed, in hours and days and months and years (for it is clear that these measurements of temporal stretches, which are customarily and properly called times, began from the motion of the stars; which is why God, when he established them, said, "And let them be for signs and for times and for days and for years"), but in some changeable movement, in which one thing passes earlier and temporaliter mouebantur: etiam sic omni tempore fuerunt, quando quidem cum illis facta sunt tempora. Quis autem dicat: Non semper fuit, quod omni tempore fuit?

13 Wisdom 9:13–15.
14 Genesis 1:1.

LATIN

ENGLISH

another later, because they cannot exist at once. If, then, something of this kind existed before the heaven in the movements of the angels, and so time already existed, and the angels moved temporally from the moment they were made, then even so they have existed at every time, since times were made together with them. And who would say, "What existed at every time did not always exist"?[15]

Sed si hoc respondero, dicetur mihi: Quo modo ergo non coaeterni Creatori, si semper ille, semper illi fuerunt? Quo modo etiam creati dicendi sunt, si semper fuisse intelleguntur? Ad hoc quid respondebitur? An dicendum est et semper eos fuisse, quoniam omni tempore fuerunt, qui cum tempore facti sunt, aut cum quibus facta sunt tempora, et tamen creatos? Neque enim et ipsa tempora creata esse negabimus, quamuis omni tempore tempus fuisse nemo ambigat. Nam si non omni tempore fuit tempus, erat ergo tempus, quando nullum erat tempus. Quis hoc stultissimus dixerit?

But if I give this answer, I will be told: "How, then, are they not coeternal with the Creator, if he always existed and they always existed? And how can they be called created, if they are understood always to have existed?" What answer shall be given to this? Should we say that they always existed, since they existed at every time—they who were made with time, or with whom times were made—and yet were created? For we shall not deny that times themselves were created either, although no one doubts that time has existed at every time. For if time did not exist at every time, then there was a time when there was no time. Who would be foolish enough to say that?

Possumus enim recte dicere: Erat tempus, quando non erat Roma; erat tempus, quando non erat Hierusalem; erat tempus, quando non erat Abraham; erat tempus, quando non erat homo, et si quid huius modi; postremo si non cum initio temporis, sed post aliquod tempus factus est mundus, possumus dicere: Erat tempus, quando non erat mundus; at uero: Erat tempus, quando nullum erat tempus, tam inconuenienter dicimus, ac si quisquam dicat: Erat homo, quando nullus erat homo, aut: Erat iste mundus, quando iste non erat mundus.

We can rightly say, "There was a time when Rome did not exist; there was a time when Jerusalem did not exist; there was a time when Abraham did not exist; there was a time when man did not exist," and anything else of this kind. Finally, if the world was made not with the beginning of time but after some time, we can say, "There was a time when the world did not exist." But to say, "There was a time when there was no time," is as unfitting as if someone were to say, "There was a man when there was no man," or, "This world existed when this world did not exist."

Si enim de alio adque alio intellegatur, potest dici aliquo modo, hoc est: Erat alius homo, quando non erat iste homo; sic ergo: Erat aliud tempus, quando non erat hoc tempus, recte possumus dicere; at uero: Erat tempus, quando nullum erat tempus, quis uel insipientissimus dixerit? Sicut ergo dicimus creatum tempus, cum ideo semper fuisse dicatur, quia omni tempore tempus fuit: ita non est consequens, ut, si semper fuerunt angeli, ideo non sint creati, ut propterea semper fuisse dicantur, quia omni tempore fuerunt, et propterea omni tempore fuerunt, quia nullo modo sine his ipsa tempora esse potuerunt.

If it is understood of one thing and another, it can be said in a way—that is, "There was another man when this man did not exist." So we can rightly say, "There was another time when this time did not exist." But who, even the most senseless, would say, "There was a time when there was no time"? Just as we say, then, that time was created, although it is said always to have existed because time existed at every time, so it does not follow that, if the angels always existed, they were therefore not created. They are said always to have exis-

15 Genesis 1:14.

LATIN

Ubi enim nulla creatura est, cuius mutabilibus motibus tempora peragantur, tempora omnino esse non possunt; ac per hoc etsi semper fuerunt, creati sunt, nec si semper fuerunt, ideo Creatori coaeterni sunt. Ille enim semper fuit aeternitate inmutabili; isti autem facti sunt; sed ideo semper fuisse dicuntur, quia omni tempore fuerunt, sine quibus tempora nullo modo esse potuerunt; tempus autem quoniam mutabilitate transcurrit, aeternitati inmutabili non potest esse coaeternum.

Ac per hoc etiamsi inmortalitas angelorum non transit in tempore, nec praeterita est quasi iam non sit, nec futura quasi nondum sit: tamen eorum motus, quibus tempora peraguntur, ex futuro in praeteritum transeunt, et ideo Creatori, in cuius motu dicendum non est uel fuisse quod iam non sit, uel futurum esse quod nondum sit, coaeterni esse non possunt.

Quapropter si Deus semper dominus fuit, semper habuit creaturam suo dominatui seruientem; uerum tamen non de ipso genitam, sed ab ipso de nihilo factam nec ei coaeternam; erat quippe ante illam, quamuis nullo tempore sine illa; non eam spatio transcurrente, sed manente perpetuitate praecedens. Sed hoc si respondero eis qui requirunt, quo modo semper creator, semper dominus fuit, si creatura seruiens non semper fuit; aut quo modo creata est et non potius creatori coaeterna est, si semper fuit: uereor ne facilius iudicer adfirmare quod nescio, quam docere quod scio. Redeo igitur ad id, quod creator noster scire nos uoluit; illa uero, quae uel sapientioribus in hac uita scire permisit uel omnino perfectis in alia uita scienda seruauit, ultra uires meas esse confiteor.

Sed ideo putaui sine adfirmatione tractanda, ut qui haec legunt uideant, a quibus quaestionum periculis debeant temperare, nec ad omnia se idoneos arbitrentur potiusque intellegant quam sit apostolo obtemperandum praecipienti salubriter, ubi ait: Dico autem per gratiam Dei quae data est mihi omnibus qui sunt in uobis, non plus sapere quam oportet sapere, sed sapere ad ted because they existed at every time; and they existed at every time because times themselves could in no way exist without them.

ENGLISH

For where there is no creature through whose changeable movements times run their course, there can be no times at all. And so, even if they always existed, they were created; and if they always existed, they are not for that reason coeternal with the Creator. For he always existed in unchangeable eternity, whereas they were made. They are said always to have existed because they existed at every time, since without them times could not exist at all. But time, since it runs on through changeableness, cannot be coeternal with unchangeable eternity.

And so, even if the immortality of the angels does not pass away in time—it is neither past, as if it no longer existed, nor future, as if it did not yet exist—yet their movements, by which times run their course, pass from future into past. Therefore they cannot be coeternal with the Creator, in whose movement we must not say either that something was which no longer is, or that something will be which is not yet.

Therefore, if God was always lord, he always had a creation serving his lordship—yet one not begotten from him but made by him from nothing, and not coeternal with him. For he was before it, though at no time without it, preceding it not by an elapsing interval but by abiding perpetuity. But if I give this answer to those who ask how he was always creator, always lord, if a serving creation did not always exist; or how it was created, and is not rather coeternal with its creator, if it always existed—I fear I may more readily be judged to be asserting what I do not know than teaching what I know. I return, therefore, to what our creator has willed us to know. As for the things he has allowed wiser people to know in this life, or has reserved to be known by the wholly perfected in the other life, I confess that they are beyond my powers.

But I thought these matters should be discussed without assertion, so that those who read them may see from what perilous questions they should restrain themselves, and may not think themselves equal to everything, but may rather understand how much we must obey the apostle, whose instruction is so wholesome when he says: “By the

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	temperantiam, unicuique sicut Deus partitus est mensuram fidei. Si enim pro uiribus suis alatur infans, fiet, ut crescendo plus capiat; si autem uires suae capacitatis excedat, deficiet antequam crescat.	grace of God given to me I say to all who are among you: do not be wiser than you ought to be wise, but be wise with restraint, each according to the measure of faith God has assigned." For if an infant is fed according to its strength, it will come about that as it grows it takes in more; but if it goes beyond the strength of its capacity, it will waste away before it grows.[16]

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE ETERNAL LIFE PROMISED TO HUMANITY BY GOD BEFORE ETERNAL TIMES

Paul speaks of "eternal times" before which God promised eternal life, fixed in his predestination.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.17	Quae saecula praeterierint antequam genus institueretur humanum, me fateor ignorare; non tamen dubito nihil omnino creaturae Creatori esse coaeternum. Dicit etiam apostolus tempora aeterna, nec ea futura, sed, quod magis est mirandum, praeterita. Sic enim ait: In spem uitae aeternae, quam promisit non mendax Deus ante tempora aeterna; manifestauit autem temporibus suis uerbum suum. Ecce dixit retro quod fuerint tempora aeterna, quae tamen non fuerint Deo coaeterna, si quidem ille ante tempora aeterna non solum erat, uerum etiam promisit uitam aeternam, quam manifestauit temporibus suis, id est congruis, quid aliud quam Verbum suum? Hoc est enim uita aeterna.	What ages passed before the human race was established, I confess I do not know; yet I do not doubt that nothing at all in creation is coeternal with the Creator. The apostle even speaks of eternal times—and not future ones but, what is more remarkable, past ones. For he says: "In hope of eternal life, which God, who does not lie, promised before eternal times; but in his own times he has revealed his word." See: he has said that in the past there were eternal times, which nevertheless were not coeternal with God. For God not only existed before eternal times, but also promised eternal life, which he revealed in his own times—that is, the fitting ones. And what is that but his Word? For this is eternal life.[17]
	Quo modo autem promisit, cum hominibus utique promiserit, qui nondum erant ante tempora aeterna, nisi quia in eius aeternitate adque in ipso Verbo eius eidem coaeterno iam praedestinatione fixum erat, quod suo tempore futurum erat?	But how did he promise it, since he certainly made the promise to human beings, who did not yet exist before eternal times—unless it was because in his eternity, and in his very Word coeternal with him, what was to come about in its own time was already fixed by predestination?

WHAT SOUND FAITH HOLDS ABOUT GOD'S UNCHANGEABLE COUNSEL AND WILL, AGAINST THE REASONING OF THOSE WHO CLAIM THAT GOD'S WORKS, REPEATED FROM ETERNITY, ALWAYS RETURN IN THE SAME CYCLES OF AGES

Augustine rejects the argument that God must repeat the same works in cycles to know them.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.18	Illud quoque non dubito, antequam homo primus creatus esset, numquam quemquam fuisse hominem; nec eundem ipsum nescio quibus circuitibus nescio quotiens reuolutum, nec alium aliquem, natura similem. Neque ab	This too I do not doubt: before the first man was created, there never was any man—neither that same man brought round again in who knows what cycles, who knows how many times, nor any

16 Romans 12:3.
17 Titus 1:2–3; the closing words echo 1 John 5:20.

LATIN

hac fide me philosophorum argumenta deterrent, quorum acutissimum illud putatur, quod dicunt nulla infinita ulla scientia posse conprehendi; ac per hoc Deus, inquiunt, rerum quas facit omnium finitarum omnes finitas aput se rationes habet; bonitas autem eius numquam uacua fuisse credenda est, ne sit temporalis eius operatio, cuius retro fuerit aeterna cessatio, quasi paenituerit eum prioris sine initio uacationis ac propterea sit operis adgressus initium;

et ideo necesse est, inquiunt, eadem semper repeti eademque semper repetenda transcurrere, uel manente mundo mutabiliter, qui licet numquam non fuerit et sine initio temporis tamen factus est, uel eius quoque ortu et occasu semper illis circuitibus repetito semperque repetendo; ne uidelicet, si aliquando primum Dei opera coepta dicuntur, priorem suam sine initio uacationem tamquam inertem ac desidiosam et ideo sibi displicentem damnasse quodam modo adque ob hoc mutasse credatur; si autem semper quidem temporalia, sed alia adque alia perhibetur operatus ac sic aliquando etiam ad hominem faciendum, quem numquam antea fecerat, peruenisse, non scientia, qua putant non posse quaecumque infinita conprehendi, sed quasi ad horam, sicut ueniebat in mentem, fortuita quadam inconstantia uideatur fecisse quae fecit.

Porro si illi circuitus admittantur, inquiunt, quibus uel manente mundo uel ipso quoque reuolubiles ortus suos et occasus eisdem circuitibus inserente eadem temporalia repetuntur, nec ignauum otium, praesertim tam longae sine initio diuturnitatis, Deo tribuitur, nec inprouida temeritas operum suorum; quoniam si non eadem repetantur, non possunt infinita diuersitate uariata ulla eius scientia uel praescientia conprehendi.

Has argumentationes, quibus inpii nostram simplicem pietatem, ut cum illis in circuitu ambulemus, de uia recta conantur auertere, si ratio refutare non posset, fides other like him in nature. Nor do the arguments of the philosophers frighten me away from this faith. The sharpest of them is thought to be their claim that nothing infinite can be comprehended by any knowledge. Therefore, they say, God holds within himself finite ideas of all the finite things he makes. Yet his goodness must never be believed to have been idle, they say, lest his activity be temporal, preceded by an eternal inactivity, as if he regretted his earlier leisure without beginning and therefore set about making a beginning of work; and therefore, they say, the same things must always be repeated, and must always pass by to be repeated again—either while the world continues in its changes (a world which, though it never failed to exist and is without beginning in time, was nevertheless made), or with its rising and setting too always repeated, and always to be repeated, in those cycles. Otherwise, if God's works are said to have begun at some point for the first time, he would be believed to have somehow condemned his previous idleness without beginning as inert and sluggish, and so displeasing to himself, and to have changed on that account. But if he is held always to have made temporal things, though one after another, and so at some point to have come to the making of man, whom he had never made before, then he would seem to have made what he made not by knowledge—by which, they think, nothing infinite can be comprehended—but as if on the spur of the moment, as things came into his mind, with a kind of random fickleness.

ENGLISH

On the other hand, they say, if those cycles are admitted, in which the same temporal things are repeated—whether the world continues, or itself also inserts its own revolving risings and settings into the same cycles—then neither lazy idleness, especially of so long a duration without beginning, is attributed to God, nor reckless lack of foresight in his works. For if the same things are not repeated, things varied by infinite diversity cannot be comprehended by any knowledge or foreknowledge of his.

These are the arguments by which the impious try to turn our simple piety from the right road, so that we may walk in a circle with them. If reason inridere deberet. Huc accedit, quod in adiutorio Domini Dei nostri hos uolubiles circulos, quos opinio confingit, ratio manifesta confringit. Hinc enim maxime isti errant, ut in circuitu falso ambulare quam uero et recto itinere malint, quod mentem diuinam omnino inmutabilem, cuiuslibet infinitatis capacem et innumera omnia sine cogitationis alternatione numerantem, de sua humana mutabili angustaque metiuntur; et fit illis quod ait apostolus: Conparantes enim semet ipsos sibimet ipsis non intellegunt.

LATIN

Nam quia illis quidquid noui faciendum uenit in mentem, nouo consilio faciunt (mutabiles quippe mentes gerunt): profecto non Deum, quem cogitare non possunt, sed semet ipsos pro illo cogitantes, non illum, sed se ipsos, nec illi, sed sibi conparant. Nobis autem fas non est credere, aliter affici Deum cum uacat, aliter cum operatur; quia nec affici dicendus est, tamquam in eius natura fiat aliquid, quod ante non fuerit. Patitur quippe qui afficitur, et mutabile est omne quod aliquid patitur. Non itaque in eius uacatione cogitetur ignauia desidia inertia, sicut nec in eius opere labor conatus industria. Nouit quiescens agere et agens quiescere. Potest ad opus nouum non nouum, sed sempiternum adhibere consilium; nec paenitendo, quia prius cessauerat, coepit facere quod non fecerat.

Sed et si prius cessauit et posterius operatus est (quod nescio quem ad modum ab homine possit intellegi): hoc procul dubio, quod dicitur prius et posterius, in rebus prius non existentibus et posterius existentibus fuit; in illo autem non alteram praecedentem altera subsequens mutauit aut abstulit uoluntatem, sed una eademque sempiterna et inmutabili uoluntate res, quas condidit, et ut prius non essent egit, quamdiu non fuerunt, et ut posterius essent, quando esse coeperunt, hinc eis, qui talia uidere possunt, mirabiliter fortassis ostendens, quam non eis indiguerit, sed eas gratuita bonitate condiderit, cum sine illis ex aeternitate initio carente in non minore beatitate permansit.

ENGLISH

could not refute them, faith ought to laugh at them. But there is more: with the help of the Lord our God, clear reason breaks apart these revolving circles that opinion has forged. For these people go astray chiefly in this—and so prefer to walk in a false circle rather than on the true and straight road—that they measure the divine mind, wholly unchangeable, able to grasp any infinity, and numbering all innumerable things without any alternation of thought, by their own human mind, changeable and narrow. And what the apostle says happens to them: "For comparing themselves with themselves, they do not understand."[18]

For since, whenever it comes into their minds to do something new, they do it by a new plan (for they have changeable minds), they are surely thinking not of God, whom they cannot conceive, but of themselves in his place; and they compare not him but themselves, and not with him but with themselves. But it is not right for us to believe that God is affected one way when he is at rest and another way when he is working; for he should not even be said to be affected, as though something came about in his nature that was not there before. For whoever is affected undergoes something, and everything that undergoes anything is changeable. So let no laziness, sluggishness or inertia be imagined in his rest, just as no toil, effort or exertion in his work. He knows how to act while resting and to rest while acting. He can apply to a new work not a new but an everlasting plan; and it was not out of regret for having previously been inactive that he began to make what he had not made.

And even if he was inactive before and worked afterward (and I do not know how a human being could understand this), this "before" and "after," without doubt, lay in the things, which did not exist before and existed afterward. In him, however, no later will changed or removed an earlier one. Rather, by one and the same everlasting and unchangeable will he brought it about, regarding the things he created, both that they should not exist earlier, so long as they did not exist, and that they should exist later, when they began to exist. In this way he perhaps shows, wonderfully, to those who can see such things, how little he needed them,

18 2 Corinthians 10:12.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	and that he created them out of freely given goodness, since without them he remained, from an eternity without beginning, in no less happiness.

AGAINST THOSE WHO SAY THAT INFINITE THINGS CANNOT BE COMPREHENDED EVEN BY GOD'S KNOWLEDGE

God knows all numbers, though they are infinite, so infinity does not limit his knowledge.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.19 Illud autem aliud quod dicunt, nec Dei scientia quae infinita sunt posse conprehendi: restat eis, ut dicere audeant adque huic se uoragini profundae inpietatis inmergant, quod non omnes numeros Deus nouerit. Eos quippe infinitos esse, certissimum est; quoniam in quocumque numero finem faciendum putaueris, idem ipse, non dico uno addito augeri, sed quamlibet sit magnus et quamlibet ingentem multitudinem continens, in ipsa ratione adque scientia numerorum non solum duplicari, uerum etiam multiplicari potest. Ita uero suis quisque numerus proprietatibus terminatur, ut nullus eorum par esse cuicumque alteri possit. Ergo et dispares inter se adque diuersi sunt, et singuli quique finiti sunt, et omnes infiniti sunt. Itane numeros propter infinitatem nescit omnes Deus, et usque ad quandam summam numerorum scientia Dei peruenit, ceteros ignorat?	As for that other claim of theirs, that not even God's knowledge can comprehend infinite things, it only remains for them to dare to say—and so plunge themselves into this deep whirlpool of impiety—that God does not know all numbers. That numbers are infinite is perfectly certain. For whatever number you might think to stop at, that very number can—I do not say be increased by adding one—but, however great it is and however vast a multitude it contains, by the very principle and science of numbers be not only doubled but multiplied. Moreover, each number is so bounded by its own properties that none of them can be equal to any other. So they are both unequal to and different from one another, and each one is finite, and all together are infinite. Does God, then, not know all numbers because of their infinity? Does God's knowledge reach as far as some sum of numbers and fail to know the rest?
Quis hoc etiam dementissimus dixerit? Nec audebunt isti contemnere numeros et eos dicere ad Dei scientiam non pertinere, aput quos Plato Deum magna auctoritate commendat mundum numeris fabricantem. Et aput nos Deo dictum legitur: Omnia in mensura et numero et pondere disposuisti; de quo et propheta dicit: Qui profert numerose saeculum, et Saluator in euangelio: Capilli, inquit, uestri omnes numerati sunt. Absit itaque ut dubitemus, quod ei notus sit omnis numerus, cuius intellegentiae, sicut in psalmo canitur, non est numerus. Infinitas itaque numeri, quamuis infinitorum numerorum nullus sit numerus, non est tamen inconprehensibilis ei, cuius intellegentiae non est numerus. Quapropter si, quidquid scientia conprehenditur, scientis conprehensione finitur: profecto et omnis infinitas quodam ineffabili modo Deo finita est, quia scientiae ipsius inconprehensibilis non est.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	Who would be so mad as to say this? Nor will these people dare to despise numbers and say that they do not pertain to God's knowledge—these people among whom Plato, with great authority, presents God as building the world by numbers. And among us we read the words addressed to God: "You have arranged all things in measure and number and weight." Of him the prophet also says, "He who brings out the world by number," and the Savior says in the gospel, "Your hairs are all numbered." Far be it from us, then, to doubt that every number is known to him whose understanding, as the psalm sings, is beyond number. So the infinity of number, though there is no numbering of infinite numbers, is not incomprehensible to him whose understanding is beyond number. Therefore, if whatever is comprehended by knowledge is bounded by the comprehension of the knower, then surely every infinity is in some inexpressible way finite to God, because it is not incomprehensible to his knowledge.[19]
Quare si infinitas numerorum scientiae Dei, qua conprehenditur, esse non potest infinita: qui tandem nos sumus homunculi, qui eius scientiae limites figere praesumamus, dicentes quod, nisi eisdem circuitibus temporum eadem temporalia repetantur, non potest Deus cuncta quae facit uel praescire ut faciat, uel scire cum fecerit? cuius sapientia simpliciter multiplex et uniformiter multiformis tam inconprehensibili conprehensione omnia inconprehensibilia conprehendit, ut, quaecumque noua et dissimilia consequentia praecedentibus si semper facere uellet, inordinata et inprouisa habere non posset, nec ea prouideret ex proximo tempore, sed aeterna praescientia contineret.	So if the infinity of numbers cannot be infinite to the knowledge of God, by which it is comprehended, who are we, mere little humans, to presume to fix limits to his knowledge, saying that unless the same temporal things are repeated in the same cycles of time, God cannot either foreknow all that he makes in order to make it, or know it once he has made it? His wisdom, simply manifold and uniformly multiform, comprehends all incomprehensible things with so incomprehensible a comprehension that, if he always willed to make new things that followed upon earlier ones and were unlike them, he could not hold them as disordered and unforeseen; nor would he foresee them just ahead of time, but would contain them in eternal foreknowledge.

THE AGES OF AGES

"The ages of ages" may mean several things, but none of them supports the cycles.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.20 Quod utrum ita faciat, et continuata sibi conexione copulentur quae appellantur saecula saeculorum, alia tamen adque alia ordinata dissimilitudine procurrentia, eis dumtaxat, qui ex miseria liberantur, in sua beata	Whether he does so, I do not dare to decide. Perhaps what are called "the ages of ages" are joined to one another in a continuous chain, yet run on one after another in an ordered diversity, while 19 Plato's Timaeus; then Wisdom 11:20, Isaiah 40:26 (in the Greek and Latin text), Matthew 10:30, and Psalm 146:5 (147:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
inmortalitate sine fine manentibus; an ita dicantur saecula saeculorum, ut intellegantur saecula in sapientia Dei inconcussa stabilitate manentia istorum, quae cum tempore transeunt, tamquam efficientia saeculorum, definire non audeo. Fortassis enim possit dici saeculum, quae sunt saecula, ut nihil aliud perhibeatur saeculum saeculi quam saecula saeculorum, sicut nihil aliud dicitur caelum caeli quam caeli caelorum. Nam caelum Deus uocauit firmamentum super quod sunt aquae; et tamen psalmus: Et aquae, inquit, quae super caelos, laudent nomen Domini.	only those who are freed from misery remain without end in their happy immortality. Or perhaps they are called "the ages of ages" in the sense that the ages which abide in God's wisdom with unshaken stability are, so to speak, the causes that produce these ages which pass away with time. For perhaps "age" can be said for what are "ages," so that "the age of the age" means nothing other than "the ages of ages," just as "the heaven of heaven" means nothing other than "the heavens of heavens." For God called the firmament, above which are the waters, "heaven"; and yet the psalm says: "And let the waters that are above the heavens praise the name of the Lord."[20]
Quid ergo istorum duorum sit, an praeter haec duo aliquid aliud de saeculis saeculorum possit intellegi, profundissima quaestio est, neque hoc quod nunc agimus inpedit, si indiscussa interim differatur; siue aliquid in ea definire ualeamus, siue nos faciat cautiores diligentior ipsa tractatio, ne in tanta obscuritate rerum adfirmare temere aliquid audeamus. Nunc enim contra opinionem disputamus, qua illi circuitus adseruntur, quibus semper eadem per interualla temporum necesse esse repeti existimantur.	Which of these two it is, or whether something else besides these two can be understood by "the ages of ages," is a very deep question. Nor does it hinder our present task if it is set aside for now without discussion. Either we may be able to settle something about it, or the more careful treatment itself may make us more cautious, so that in such obscurity we do not dare to affirm anything rashly. For at present we are arguing against the view that asserts those cycles in which the same things are thought to be necessarily repeated at intervals of time.
Quaelibet autem illarum sententiarum de saeculis saeculorum uera sit, ad hos circuitus nihil pertinet; quoniam siue saecula saeculorum sint non eadem repetita, sed alterum ex altero conexione ordinatissima procurrentia, liberatorum beatitudine sine ullo recursu miseriarum certissima permanente, siue saecula saeculorum aeterna sint temporalium tamquam dominantia subditorum, circuitus illi eadem reuoluentes locum non habent, quos maxime refellit aeterna uita sanctorum.	Whichever of those opinions about the ages of ages is true, it has nothing to do with these cycles. For the ages of ages may not be the same ages repeated, but ages running on one from another in a most ordered connection, while the happiness of the freed remains utterly secure with no return of miseries. Or the ages of ages may be eternal ages, ruling, as it were, over the temporal ones subject to them. Either way, those cycles that roll the same things round again have no place—and they are refuted above all by the eternal life of the saints.

THE IMPIETY OF THOSE WHO CLAIM THAT SOULS THAT SHARE IN SUPREME AND TRUE HAPPINESS WILL RETURN AGAIN AND AGAIN THROUGH CYCLES OF TIME TO THE SAME MISERIES AND LABORS

It is monstrous to claim that souls who reach God's happiness must fall back into misery forever.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.21 Quorum enim aures piorum ferant post emensam tot tantisque calamitatibus uitam (si tamen uita ista dicenda est, quae potius mors est, ita grauis, ut mors, quae ab hac	For what devout ears could bear to hear the following? After a life spent through so many and such great calamities (if indeed it should be called 20 "Ages of ages" is the Latin biblical idiom usually rendered "forever and ever." The quotation is Psalm 148:4–5.

LATIN

liberat, mortis huius amore timeatur), post tam magna mala tamque multa et horrenda tandem aliquando per ueram religionem adque sapientiam expiata adque finita ita peruenire ad conspectum Dei adque ita fieri beatum contemplatione incorporeae lucis per participationem inmutabilis inmortalitatis eius, cuius adipiscendae amore flagramus, ut eam quandoque necesse sit deseri et eos, qui deserunt, ab illa aeternitate ueritate felicitate deiectos tartareae mortalitati, turpi stultitiae, miseriis exsecrabilibus inplicari, ubi Deus amittatur, ubi odio ueritas habeatur, ubi per inmundas nequitias beatitudo quaeratur, et hoc itidem adque itidem sine ullo fine priorum et posteriorum certis interuallis et dimensionibus saeculorum factum et futurum; et hoc propterea, ut possint Deo circuitibus definitis euntibus semper adque redeuntibus per nostras falsas beatitudines et ueras miserias alternatim quidem, sed reuolutione incessabili sempiternas nota esse opera sua, quoniam neque a faciendo quiescere neque sciendo potest ea, quae infinita sunt, indagare?

Quis haec audiat? quis credat? quis ferat? Quae si uera essent, non solum tacerentur prudentius, uerum etiam (ut quo modo ualeo dicam quod uolo) doctius nescirentur. Nam si haec illic in memoria non habebimus et ideo beati erimus, quur hic per eorum scientiam grauatur amplius nostra miseria? Si autem ibi ea necessario scituri sumus, hic saltem nesciamus, ut hic felicior sit expectatio quam illic adeptio summi boni; quando hic aeterna uita consequenda expectatur; ibi autem beata, sed non aeterna, quandoque amittenda cognoscitur.

Si autem dicunt neminem posse ad illam beatitudinem peruenire, nisi hos circuitus, ubi beatitudo et miseria uicissim alternant, in huius uitae eruditione cognouerit: quo modo ergo fatentur, quanto plus quisque amauerit Deum, tanto eum facilius ad beatitudinem peruenturum, qui ea docent, quibus amor ipse torpescat? Nam quis non remissius et tepidius amet eum, quem se cogitat necessario deserturum et contra eius ueritatem sapientiamque sensurum, et hoc cum ad eius plenam pro life, when it is rather death—a death so heavy that the death which frees us from it is feared out of love for this death); after evils so great, so many and so dreadful have at long last been expiated and ended through true religion and wisdom, a person is to arrive at the sight of God and become happy by contemplating the incorporeal light, through sharing in his unchangeable immortality, which we burn with love to attain. Yet this is to happen in such a way that it must at some point be abandoned, and those who abandon it, thrown down from that eternity, truth and happiness, must be entangled in hellish mortality, shameful folly and accursed miseries, where God is lost, where truth is hated, where happiness is sought through unclean wickedness. And this has happened, and is to happen, again and again without any end, at fixed intervals and measured spans of ages, earlier and later; and all this so that God may be able to know his own works, by means of fixed cycles forever going and returning through our false happinesses and true miseries—alternating, to be sure, but everlasting in their ceaseless revolution—since he can neither rest from making nor, by knowing, track down things that are infinite?

ENGLISH

Who would listen to this? Who would believe it? Who would bear it? If these things were true, it would be wiser not only to keep silent about them but even (to say what I mean as best I can) more learned not to know them. For if we shall not remember them there, and shall be happy for that very reason, why is our misery here made heavier by knowing them? But if we must necessarily know them there, let us at least not know them here, so that our expectation here may be happier than our attainment of the supreme good there. For here we expect to attain eternal life; there, however, we shall know that life to be happy but not eternal, and destined someday to be lost.

But suppose they say that no one can reach that happiness unless, in the training of this life, he has come to know these cycles, in which happiness and misery alternate by turns. How then can they admit that the more a person loves God, the more easily he will reach happiness—they who teach things that make love itself grow numb? For who would not love more slackly and lukewarmly sua capacitate notitiam beatitudinis perfectione peruenerit? quando nec hominem amicum possit quisque amare fideliter, cui se futurum nouit inimicum. Sed absit ut uera sint, quae nobis minantur ueram miseriam numquam finiendam, sed interpositionibus falsae beatitudinis saepe ac sine fine rumpendam.

LATIN

Quid enim illa beatitudine falsius adque fallacius, ubi nos futuros miseros aut in tanta ueritatis luce nesciamus aut in summa felicitatis arce timeamus? Si enim uenturam calamitatem ignoraturi sumus, peritior est hic nostra miseria, ubi uenturam beatitudinem nouimus; si autem nos illic clades inminens non latebit, beatius tempora transigit anima misera, quibus transactis ad beatitudinem subleuetur, quam beata, quibus transactis in miseriam reuoluatur. Adque ita spes nostrae infelicitatis est felix et felicitatis infelix. Unde fit, ut, quia hic mala praesentia patimur, ibi metuimus inminentia, uerius semper miseri quam beati aliquando esse possimus.

Sed quoniam haec falsa sunt clamante pietate, conuincente ueritate (illa enim nobis ueraciter promittitur uera felicitas, cuius erit semper retinenda et nulla infelicitate rumpenda certa securitas): uiam rectam sequentes, quod nobis est Christus, eo duce ac saluatore a uano et inepto inpiorum circuitu iter fidei mentemque auertamus. Si enim de istis circuitibus et sine cessatione alternantibus itionibus et reditionibus animarum Porphyrius Platonicus suorum opinionem sequi noluit, siue ipsius rei uanitate permotus siue iam tempora Christiana reueritus, et, quod in libro decimo commemoraui, dicere maluit animam propter cognoscenda mala traditam mundo, ut ab eis liberata adque purgata, cum ad Patrem redierit, nihil ulterius tale patiatur: quanto magis nos istam inimicam Christianae fidei falsitatem detestari ac deuitare debemus!

ENGLISH

one whom he thinks he must necessarily abandon, and against whose truth and wisdom he will come to think—and this when he has reached, as far as his capacity allows, full knowledge of him in the perfection of happiness? No one can love even a human friend faithfully if he knows that he will become his enemy. But far be it that these things should be true, which threaten us with a true misery that will never end, only to be broken often and without end by interludes of false happiness.

For what could be more false and deceptive than that happiness in which, amid so great a light of truth, we either do not know that we shall be miserable, or, on the very summit of happiness, we fear it? If we are to be ignorant of the coming calamity, then our misery here is better informed, since here we know of the happiness to come. But if the impending disaster will not be hidden from us there, then the soul in misery passes its times more happily—for when they are over it will be lifted up to happiness—than the happy soul passes its times, for when they are over it will be rolled back into misery. And so the hope of our unhappiness is happy, and the hope of our happiness unhappy. The result is that, since here we suffer present evils and there we fear impending ones, we could more truly be always miserable than ever happy.

But these things are false: piety cries it aloud, and truth proves it. For that true happiness is truthfully promised to us, whose sure security will always be kept and will be broken by no unhappiness. So let us follow the right way, which for us is Christ, and with him as our guide and Savior let us turn the path of our faith and our minds away from the empty and foolish cycle of the ungodly. For Porphyry the Platonist refused to follow the opinion of his own school on these cycles and on the ceaselessly alternating goings and returnings of souls—whether he was moved by the sheer emptiness of the idea or was already in awe of Christian times. As I mentioned in the tenth book, he preferred to say that the soul was given to the world so that it might come to know evils, and that, once freed and cleansed of them and returned to the Father, it would suffer nothing of the kind again. If he did so, how much more ought we to detest and shun this falsehood, which is hostile to the Christian faith![21]

LATIN

ENGLISH

SOMETHING NEW WITHOUT A CHANGE IN GOD

With the cycles refuted, God can make new things, including humanity, without changing his will.

LATIN

ENGLISH

His autem circuitibus euacuatis adque frustratis nulla necessitas nos conpellit ideo putare non habere initium temporis ex quo esse coeperit genus humanum, quia per nescio quos circuitus nihil sit in rebus noui, quod non et antea certis interuallis temporum fuerit et postea sit futurum. Si enim liberatur anima non reditura ad miserias, sicut numquam antea liberata est, fit in illa aliquid, quod antea numquam factum est, et hoc quidem ualde magnum, id est quae numquam desinat aeterna felicitas. Si autem in natura inmortali fit tanta nouitas nullo repetita, nullo repetenda circuitu, quur in rebus mortalibus fieri non posse contenditur?

Now that these cycles have been emptied and defeated, no necessity compels us to think that the human race has no beginning in time from which it began to exist, on the ground that, through some cycles or other, there is nothing new in the world that has not existed before at fixed intervals of time and will not exist again later. For if a soul is freed never to return to miseries, as it was never freed before, then something happens in it that never happened before—and indeed something very great, namely an eternal happiness that never ceases. But if such great newness occurs in an immortal nature, repeated in no cycle and to be repeated in none, why do they insist that it cannot occur in mortal things?

Si dicunt non fieri in anima beatitudinis nouitatem, quoniam ad eam reuertitur, in qua semper fuit, ipsa certe liberatio noua fit, cum de miseria liberatur in qua numquam fuit, et ipsa miseriae nouitas in ea facta est quae numquam fuit. Haec autem nouitas si non in rerum, quae diuina prouidentia gubernantur, ordinem uenit, sed casu potius euenit, ubi sunt illi determinati dimensique circuitus, in quibus nulla noua fiunt, sed repetuntur eadem quae fuerunt? Si autem et haec nouitas ab ordinatione prouidentiae non excluditur, siue data sit anima siue lapsa sit: possunt fieri noua, quae neque antea facta sint nec tamen a rerum ordine aliena sint.

If they say that no new happiness arises in the soul, since it returns to the happiness in which it always was, then surely the liberation itself is new, since it is freed from a misery in which it had never been; and the very newness of that misery arose in it, which had never existed. Now if this newness does not fall within the order of things governed by divine providence, but rather comes about by chance, where are those determined and measured cycles in which nothing new happens, but the same things that were are repeated? But if this newness too is not excluded from the ordering of providence—whether the soul was given to the world or fell into it—then new things can happen that never happened before and yet are not foreign to the order of things.

Et si potuit anima per inprudentiam facere sibi nouam miseriam, quae non esset inprouisa diuinae prouidentiae, ut hanc quoque in rerum ordine includeret et ab hac eam non inprouide liberaret: qua tandem temeritate humanae uanitatis audemus negare diuinitatem facere posse res, non sibi, sed mundo nouas, quas neque antea fecerit nec umquam habuerit inprouisas? Si autem dicunt liberatas quidem animas ad miseriam non reuersuras, sed cum hoc fit in rebus nihil noui fieri, quoniam semper aliae adque

And if the soul could, through its folly, make for itself a new misery that was not unforeseen by divine providence, so that providence included this too in the order of things and, not without foresight, freed the soul from it, by what rashness of human vanity, then, do we dare to deny that the divinity can make things that are new—not to itself, but to the world—things it never made before and yet never failed to foresee? But suppose they 21 Augustine discussed Porphyry's views in Book 10 (especially 10.30).

LATIN

aliae liberatae sunt et liberantur et liberabuntur: hoc certe concedunt, si ita est, nouas animas fieri, quibus sit et noua miseria et noua liberatio.

ENGLISH

say that the freed souls will indeed not return to misery, but that when this happens nothing new happens in the world, since some souls after others always have been, are being and will be freed. Then, if that is so, they certainly grant that new souls come into being, for whom there is both a new misery and a new liberation.

Nam si antiquas eas esse dicunt et retrorsum sempiternas, ex quibus cottidie noui fiant homines, de quorum corporibus, si sapienter uixerint, ita liberentur, ut numquam ad miserias reuoluantur, consequenter dicturi sunt infinitas. Quantuslibet namque finitus numerus fuisset animarum, infinitis retro saeculis sufficere non ualeret, ut ex illo semper homines fierent, quorum essent animae ab ista semper mortalitate liberandae, numquam ad eam deinceps rediturae. Nec ullo modo explicabunt, quo modo in rebus, quas, ut Deo notae esse possint, finitas uolunt, infinitus sit numerus animarum.

For if they say that these souls are ancient and everlasting into the past, and that from them new human beings come into being every day, from whose bodies the souls, if they have lived wisely, are freed in such a way that they never roll back into miseries, then it follows that they will have to call them infinite. For however large a finite number of souls there had been, it could not have sufficed for infinite ages past, so that human beings might always come from it, whose souls were always to be freed from this mortality and never afterward to return to it. Nor will they in any way explain how there can be an infinite number of souls among things that they want to be finite, so that these can be known to God.

Quapropter quoniam circuitus illi iam explosi sunt, quibus ad easdem miserias necessario putabatur anima reditura: quid restat conuenientius pietati quam credere non esse inpossibile Deo et ea, quae numquam fecerit, noua facere et ineffabili praescientia uoluntatem mutabilem non habere? Porro autem utrum animarum liberatarum nec ulterius ad miserias rediturarum numerus possit semper augeri, ipsi uiderint, qui de rerum infinitate cohibenda tam subtiliter disputant; nos uero ratiocinationem nostram ex utroque latere terminamus. Si enim potest, quid causae est, ut negetur creari potuisse quod numquam antea creatum esset, si liberatarum animarum numerus, qui numquam antea fuit, non solum factus est semel, sed fieri numquam desinet?

Therefore, since those cycles have now been hissed off the stage—the cycles by which the soul was thought necessarily to return to the same miseries—what remains more in keeping with piety than to believe that it is not impossible for God both to make new things he has never made and, in his ineffable foreknowledge, not to have a changeable will? As for whether the number of souls that are freed and will never return to miseries can keep on increasing, let those see to it who argue so subtly about restricting the infinity of things. We, for our part, close off our reasoning on both sides. If it can increase, what reason is there to deny that something could be created that had never been created before, if the number of freed souls, which never existed before, has not only been made once but will never cease to be made?

Si autem oportet ut certus sit liberatarum aliquis numerus animarum, quae ad miseriam numquam redeant, neque iste numerus ulterius augeatur: etiam ipse sine dubio, quicumque erit, ante utique numquam fuit; qui profecto crescere et ad suae quantitatis terminum peruenire sine aliquo non posset initio; quod initium eo modo antea numquam fuit. Hoc ergo ut esset, creatus est homo, ante quem nullus fuit.

But if there must be some fixed number of freed souls that never return to misery, and this number is not to increase any further, then this number too, whatever it will be, certainly never existed before. And it surely could not grow and reach the limit of its size without some beginning; and that beginning never existed before in that way. It was so that this might exist that man was created, before whom there was no one.

THE CREATION OF ONE FIRST HUMAN BEING, AND OF THE HUMAN RACE IN HIM

God made humanity from one man, unlike the animals, to bind the human race in kinship.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.22	Hac igitur quaestione difficillima propter aeternitatem Dei noua creantis sine nouitate aliqua uoluntatis, quantum potuimus, explicata non est arduum uidere multo fuisse melius quod factum est, ut ex uno homine, quem primum condidit, multiplicaret genus humanum, quam si id incohasset a pluribus. Nam cum animantes alias solitarias et quodam modo soliuagas, id est, quae solitudinem magis adpetant, sicuti sunt aquilae milui, leones lupi et quaecumque ita sunt, alias congreges instituerit, quae congregatae adque in gregibus malint uiuere, ut sunt columbi sturni, cerui damulae et cetera huius modi: utrumque tamen genus non ex singulis propagauit, sed plura simul iussit existere.	This very difficult question, raised by God's eternity in creating new things without any newness of will, has now been explained as far as we were able. So it is not hard to see that it was much better for things to be done as they were—that God multiplied the human race from one man, whom he created first—than if he had begun it from many. For some animals he made solitary and, so to speak, lone wanderers, that is, animals that prefer solitude, such as eagles and kites, lions and wolves, and any others of that kind. Others he made gregarious, preferring to live together in flocks and herds, such as doves and starlings, deer and fallow deer, and others of this sort. Yet he did not propagate either kind from single individuals, but commanded many to come into existence at once.
	Hominem uero, cuius naturam quodam modo mediam inter angelos bestiasque condebat, ut, si Creatori suo tamquam uero domino subditus praeceptum eius pia oboedientia custodiret, in consortium transiret angelicum, sine morte media beatam inmortalitatem absque ullo termino consecutus; si autem Dominum Deum suum libera uoluntate superbe adque inoboedienter usus offenderet, morti addictus bestialiter uiueret, libidinis seruus aeternoque post mortem supplicio destinatus, unum ac singulum creauit, non utique solum sine humana societate deserendum, sed ut eo modo uehementius ei commendaretur ipsius societatis unitas uinculumque concordiae, si non tantum inter se naturae similitudine, uerum etiam cognationis affectu homines necterentur; quando ne ipsam quidem feminam copulandam uiro sicut ipsum creare illi placuit, sed ex ipso, ut omnino ex homine uno diffunderetur genus humanum.	Man, however, he created one and single. He was making man's nature a kind of middle ground between angels and beasts. If man remained subject to his Creator as to his true lord and kept his command with devout obedience, he would pass into the fellowship of the angels, attaining happy immortality without end and without any death in between. But if he offended the Lord his God by using his free will proudly and disobediently, he would be handed over to death and live like a beast, a slave of lust, destined after death to eternal punishment. God did not create him single, of course, so that he would be left alone without human fellowship, but so that the unity of that fellowship and the bond of harmony might be commended to him all the more forcefully, if human beings were bound together not only by likeness of nature but also by the affection of kinship. For it did not please God to create even the woman who was to be joined to the man in the way he had created the man himself; he created her from him, so that the human race might spread entirely from one human being.

THAT GOD FOREKNEW THAT THE FIRST HUMAN BEING HE MADE WOULD SIN, AND FORESAW AT THE SAME TIME HOW GREAT A PEOPLE OF THE DEVOUT FROM HIS RACE HE WOULD BRING BY HIS GRACE INTO THE COMPANY OF THE ANGELS

God foresaw human sin and war, and also a people of the devout to be joined with the angels.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.23	Nec ignorabat Deus hominem peccaturum et morti iam obnoxium morituros propagaturum eoque progressuros peccandi inmanitate mortales, ut tutius adque pacatius inter se rationalis uoluntatis expertes bestiae sui generis uiuerent, quarum ex aquis et terris plurium pullulauit exordium, quam homines, quorum genus ex uno est ad commendandam concordiam propagatum. Neque enim umquam inter se leones aut inter se dracones, qualia homines, bella gesserunt. Sed praeuidebat etiam gratia sua populum piorum in adoptionem uocandum remissisque peccatis iustificatum Spiritu sancto sanctis angelis in aeterna pace sociandum, nouissima inimica morte destructa; cui populo esset huius rei consideratio profutura, quod ex uno homine Deus ad commendandum hominibus, quam ei grata sit etiam in pluribus unitas, genus instituisset humanum.	God knew that man would sin and, once subject to death, would beget others who would die. He knew too that mortals would go so far in the savagery of their sinning that beasts without a rational will would live more safely and peacefully among their own kind than human beings do. Those beasts sprang in the beginning from many individuals, out of the waters and the earth, whereas the human race was propagated from one man in order to commend concord. For never have lions among themselves, or serpents among themselves, waged wars like the wars of men. But God also foresaw that by his grace a people of the godly would be called to adoption, would have their sins forgiven and be justified by the Holy Spirit, and would be joined with the holy angels in eternal peace once the last enemy, death, had been destroyed. To this people it would be a help to reflect that God had established the human race from one man in order to commend to human beings how pleasing unity is to him, even among many.[22]

THE NATURE OF THE HUMAN SOUL, CREATED IN THE IMAGE OF GOD

God made man's soul in his image, formed the man from dust and the woman from his side.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.24	Fecit ergo Deus hominem ad imaginem suam. Talem quippe illi animam creauit, qua per rationem adque intellegentiam omnibus esset praestantior animalibus terrestribus et natatilibus et uolatilibus, quae mentem huius modi non haberent. Et cum uirum terreno formasset ex puluere eique animam qualem dixi siue quam iam fecerat sufflando indidisset siue potius sufflando fecisset eumque flatum, quem sufflando fecit (nam quid est aliud sufflare quam flatum facere?), animam hominis esse uoluisset, etiam coniugem illi in adiutorium generandi ex eius latere osse detracto fecit, ut Deus. Neque enim haec carnali consuetudine cogitanda sunt, ut uidere solemus opifices ex materia quacumque terrena corporalibus membris, quod artis	So God made man in his own image. For he created for him a soul of such a kind that by reason and understanding he would surpass all the creatures of land, water and air, which did not have a mind of this kind. He formed the man from the dust of the earth and put into him a soul of the kind I have described. Either he had already made that soul and placed it in him by breathing, or, more probably, he made it by breathing and willed that the breath he made by breathing should be the soul of man (for what else is breathing out than making breath?). Then he also made him a wife, to help in begetting, from a bone taken from his side, and he did it as God does. For we 22 "The last enemy, death" echoes 1 Corinthians 15:26.

LATIN	ENGLISH
industria potuerint, fabricantes. Manus Dei potentia Dei est, qui etiam uisibilia inuisibiliter operatur.	must not think of these things in a fleshly way, by our habits, as we usually see craftsmen working some earthly material with their bodily limbs and fashioning whatever the skill of their art can achieve. God's hand is God's power, and he works even visible things invisibly.[23]
Sed haec fabulosa potius quam uera esse arbitrantur, qui uirtutem ac sapientiam Dei, qua nouit et potest etiam sine seminibus ipsa certe facere semina, ex his usitatis et cottidianis metiuntur operibus; ea uero, quae primitus instituta sunt, quoniam non nouerunt, infideliter cogitant; quasi non haec ipsa, quae nouerunt de humanis conceptibus adque partubus, si inexpertis narrarentur, incredibiliora uiderentur; quamuis et ea ipsa plerique magis naturae corporalibus causis quam operibus diuinae mentis adsignent.	But some people think these things are fables rather than truth. They measure the power and wisdom of God, by which he knows how, and is able, to make even seeds without seeds, by these familiar, everyday works. As for the things that were established at the beginning, they do not know them, and so they think about them without faith. It is as if the very things they do know about human conception and birth would not seem even more incredible if they were described to people who had never experienced them! Yet even these things most people attribute to the bodily causes of nature rather than to the works of the divine mind.

WHETHER ANGELS CAN BE CALLED CREATORS OF EVEN THE SMALLEST CREATURE

Angels, which the Platonists call gods, are not the creators of any living thing.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.25 Sed cum his nullum nobis est in his libris negotium, qui diuinam mentem facere uel curare ista non credunt. Illi autem qui Platoni suo credunt non ab illo summo Deo, qui fabricatus est mundum, sed ab aliis minoribus, quos quidem ipse creauerit, permissu siue iussu eius animalia facta esse cuncta mortalia, in quibus homo praecipuum disque ipsis cognatum teneret locum, si superstitione careant, qua quaerunt unde iuste uideantur sacra et sacrificia facere quasi conditoribus suis, facile carebunt etiam huius opinionis errore. Neque enim fas est ullius naturae quamlibet minimae mortalisque creatorem nisi Deum credere ac dicere, et antequam possit intellegi.	But in these books we have no business with those who do not believe that the divine mind makes these things or cares for them. Then there are those who believe their Plato. He held that all mortal living things were made not by the supreme God who fashioned the world but by other, lesser gods, whom he himself had created, acting by his permission or command, and that among these creatures man held the chief place, akin to the gods themselves. If these people rid themselves of the superstition that makes them look for a way to seem justified in performing rites and sacrifices to those gods as their makers, they will easily rid themselves of the error of this opinion as well. For it is not right to believe or to say that anyone but God is the creator of any nature, however tiny and mortal, and that is true even before it can be understood.[24]
Angeli autem, quos illi deos libentius appellant, etiamsi adhibent uel iussi uel permissi operationem suam rebus	As for the angels, whom they prefer to call gods: even if, by command or by permission, they apply their activity to the things that come to birth in 23 See Genesis 1:27, 2:7 and 2:21–22.

24 Augustine refers to Plato's Timaeus, in which the supreme craftsman delegates the making of mortal creatures to lesser gods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quae gignuntur in mundo, tam non eos dicimus creatores animalium, quam nec agricolas frugum adque arborum.	the world, we no more call them creators of living things than we call farmers creators of crops and trees.

THAT EVERY NATURE AND EVERY FORM OF ALL CREATION IS MADE AND FORMED ONLY BY THE WORK OF GOD

Only God gives natures their inner form, as he gave the sun and an eye their roundness.

LATIN	ENGLISH
12.26 Cum enim alia sit species, quae adhibetur extrinsecus cuicumque materiae corporali, sicut operantur homines figuli et fabri adque id genus opifices, qui etiam pingunt et effingunt formas similes corporibus animalium; alia uero, quae intrinsecus efficientes causas habet de secreto et occulto naturae uiuentis adque intellegentis arbitrio, quae non solum naturales corporum species, uerum etiam ipsas animantium animas, dum non fit, facit: supra dicta illa species artificibus quibusque tribuatur; haec autem altera non nisi uni artifici, creatori et conditori Deo, qui mundum ipsum et angelos sine ullo mundo et sine ullis angelis fecit.	For there is one kind of form that is applied from outside to some bodily material. This is how human potters, smiths and craftsmen of that sort work, and they also paint and sculpt shapes resembling the bodies of animals. But there is another kind of form whose efficient causes work from within, from the secret, hidden will of a living and intelligent nature. That nature, while it is not itself made, makes not only the natural forms of bodies but even the very souls of living things. The first kind of form may be ascribed to any craftsmen. But this second kind belongs to only one craftsman, God the creator and founder, who made the world itself and the angels without the help of any world or any angels.
Qua enim ui diuina et, ut ita dicam, effectiua, quae fieri nescit, sed facere, accepit speciem, cum mundus fieret, rutunditas caeli et rutunditas solis: eadem ui diuina et effectiua, quae fieri nescit, sed facere, accepit speciem rutunditas oculi et rutunditas pomi et ceterae figurae naturales, quas uidemus in rebus quibusque nascentibus non extrinsecus adhiberi, sed intima Creatoris potentia, qui dixit: Caelum et terram ego inpleo, et cuius sapientia est, quae adtingit a fine usque ad finem fortiter et disponit omnia suauiter. Proinde facti primitus angeli cuius modi ministerium praebuerint Creatori cetera facienti nescio; nec tribuere illis audeo quod forte non possunt, nec debeo derogare quod possunt.	There is a divine and, so to speak, effective power that does not know how to be made, only how to make. By that power the roundness of the sky and the roundness of the sun received their form when the world was made. By that same divine and effective power, which does not know how to be made, only how to make, the roundness of the eye and the roundness of an apple received their form, along with the other natural shapes we see in everything that comes to birth. These shapes are not applied from outside. They come from the innermost power of the Creator, who said, "I fill heaven and earth," and whose wisdom it is that "reaches mightily from end to end and orders all things sweetly." What kind of service the angels, who were made first, rendered to the Creator as he made the rest, I do not know. I do not dare ascribe to them what perhaps they cannot do, nor ought I to deny them what they can.[25]
Creationem tamen conditionemque omnium naturarum, qua fit ut omnino naturae sint, eis quoque fauentibus illi Deo tribuo, cui se etiam ipsi debere quod sunt cum gratiarum actione nouerunt. Non solum igitur agricolas	Yet the creation and founding of all natures, by which they come to be natures at all, I ascribe to God, and the angels themselves approve. They know, and give thanks for it, that they too owe non dicimus fructuum quorumque creatores, cum legamus: Neque qui plantat est aliquid neque qui rigat, sed qui incrementum dat Deus; sed ne ipsam quidem terram, quamuis mater omnium fecunda uideatur, quae germinibus erumpentia promouet et fixa radicibus continet, cum itidem legamus: Deus illi dat corpus quo modo uoluerit et unicuique seminum proprium corpus. Ita nec feminam sui puerperii creatricem appellare debemus, sed potius illum qui cuidam famulo suo dixit: Priusquam te formarem in utero, noui te.

25 Jeremiah 23:24; Wisdom 8:1.

LATIN

Et quamuis anima sic uel sic affecta praegnantis ualeat aliquibus uelut induere qualitatibus fetum, sicut de uirgis uariatis fecit Iacob, ut pecora colore uaria gignerentur: naturam tamen illam, quae gignitur, tam ipsa non fecit, quam nec ipsa se fecit. Quaelibet igitur corporales uel seminales causae gignendis rebus adhibeantur, siue operationibus angelorum aut hominum aut quorumque animalium siue marium feminarumque mixtionibus; quaelibet etiam desideria motusue animae matris ualeant aliquid liniamentorum aut colorum aspergere teneris mollibusque conceptibus: ipsas omnino naturas, quae sic uel sic in suo genere afficiantur, non facit nisi summus Deus, cuius occulta potentia cuncta penetrans incontaminabili praesentia facit esse quidquid aliquo modo est, in quantumcumque est; quia nisi faciente illo non tale uel tale esset, sed prorsus esse non posset.

Quapropter si in illa specie, quam forinsecus corporalibus opifices rebus inponunt, urbem Romam et urbem Alexandriam non fabros et architectos, sed reges, quorum uoluntate consilio imperio fabricatae sunt, illam Romulum, illam Alexandrum habuisse dicimus conditores: quanto potius non nisi Deum debemus conditorem dicere naturarum, qui neque ex ea materia facit aliquid, quam ipse non fecerit, nec operarios habet, nisi quos ipse creauerit; et si potentiam suam, ut ita dicam, fabricatoriam rebus subtrahat, ita non erunt, sicut ante quam fierent non fuerunt. Sed ante dico aeternitate, non tempore. Quis enim alius creator est temporum, nisi qui fecit ea, quorum motibus currerent tempora?

ENGLISH

their very being to him. So we do not call farmers the creators of any fruits, since we read, "Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the growth." Nor do we even call the earth itself their creator, though it seems to be the fruitful mother of all things, pushing forward what bursts out in shoots and holding fast what is fixed by roots. For again we read, "God gives it a body as he has willed, and to each of the seeds its own body." In the same way we ought not to call a woman the creator of her child. That title belongs to him who said to one of his servants, "Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you."[26]

The soul of a pregnant woman, affected in this way or that, may be able to clothe the unborn child, as it were, with certain qualities. Jacob did something similar with the streaked rods, so that the flocks were born with varied colors. Yet the mother no more made the nature that is born than she made herself. Whatever bodily or seminal causes are applied to the generation of things, whether through the operations of angels or of humans or of any animals, or through the union of males and females; and whatever desires or emotions of the mother's soul may be able to sprinkle features or colors on the tender, soft beings she has conceived: the natures themselves, which are affected in this way or that within their kind, are made by none but the supreme God. His hidden power penetrates all things with a presence that nothing can defile. It makes whatever exists in any way exist, to whatever extent it exists. For without his making, a thing would not be of this sort or that sort; it could not exist at all.[27]

Take the form that craftsmen impose from outside on bodily things. Even there we say that the city of Rome and the city of Alexandria had as their founders not builders and architects but kings, by whose will, plan and command they were built: Romulus founded the one, Alexander the other. How much more, then, ought we to call none but God the founder of natures! He makes nothing out of material that he did not himself make, and he has no workers except those he himself created. If he were to withdraw his, so to speak, constructive power from things, they would cease to exist, just 26 1 Corinthians 3:7; 1 Corinthians 15:38; Jeremiah 1:5.

27 Genesis 30:37–39, where Jacob sets peeled, streaked rods before the breeding flocks.

LATIN

ENGLISH

as they did not exist before they were made. But when I say "before," I mean in eternity, not in time. For who else is the creator of times but he who made the things by whose motions times would run?

THE OPINION OF THE PLATONISTS, WHO THOUGHT THE ANGELS WERE INDEED MADE BY GOD BUT WERE THEMSELVES THE MAKERS OF HUMAN BODIES

If bodies are prisons, the Platonists' maker-gods are jailers; in fact every body is God's gift.

LATIN

ENGLISH

12.27 Ita sane Plato minores et a summo Deo factos deos effectores esse uoluit animalium ceterorum, ut inmortalem partem ab ipso sumerent, ipsi uero mortalem adtexerent. Proinde animarum nostrarum eos creatores noluit esse, sed corporum. Unde quoniam Porphyrius propter animae purgationem dicit corpus omne fugiendum simulque cum suo Platone aliisque Platonicis sentit eos, qui inmoderate adque inhoneste uixerint, propter luendas poenas ad corpora redire mortalia, Plato quidem etiam bestiarum, Porphyrius tantummodo ad hominum: sequitur eos, ut dicant deos istos, quos a nobis uolunt quasi parentes et conditores nostros coli, nihil esse aliud quam fabros conpedum carcerumue nostrorum, nec institutores, sed inclusores adligatoresque nostros ergastulis aerumnosis et grauissimis uinculis.

Plato, it is true, wanted the lesser gods, made by the supreme God, to be the makers of the other living things. They were to receive the immortal part from him and themselves weave the mortal part onto it. So he wanted them to be the creators not of our souls but of our bodies. Now Porphyry says that every body must be fled for the soul to be purified. He also holds, with his Plato and the other Platonists, that those who have lived without restraint and without honor return to mortal bodies to pay penalties. Plato says they may return even to the bodies of beasts, Porphyry only to those of humans. It follows that these gods, whom they want us to worship as our parents and founders, must be nothing but the forgers of our fetters and our prisons. They are not our makers but our jailers, who lock us up in wretched slave-prisons and bind us with the heaviest chains.

Aut ergo desinant Platonici poenas animarum ex istis corporibus comminari, aut eos nobis deos colendos non praedicent, quorum in nobis operationem, ut quantum possumus fugiamus et euadamus, hortantur, cum tamen sit utrumque falsissimum. Nam neque ita luunt poenas animae, cum ad istam uitam denuo reuoluuntur, et omnium uiuentium siue in caelo siue in terra nullus est conditor, nisi a quo facta sunt caelum et terra. Nam si nulla causa est uiuendi in hoc corpore nisi propter pendenda supplicia: quo modo dicit idem Plato aliter mundum fieri non potuisse pulcherrimum adque optimum, nisi omnium animalium, id est et inmortalium et mortalium, generibus inpleretur?

So either the Platonists should stop threatening souls with punishment through these bodies, or they should stop preaching to us that we must worship gods whose work in us they urge us to flee and escape as far as we can. In fact both claims are utterly false. Souls do not pay penalties in this way when they are rolled back again into this life. And of all living things, whether in heaven or on earth, there is no founder but the one by whom heaven and earth were made. Besides, if there is no reason to live in this body except to pay punishments, how can the same Plato say that the world could not have become most beautiful and best unless it were filled with every kind of living thing, that is, with both immortal and mortal ones?

Si autem nostra institutio, qua uel mortales conditi sumus, diuinum munus est: quo modo poena est ad ista corpora, id est ad diuina beneficia, remeare? Et si Deus, quod adsidue Plato commemorat, sicut mundi uniuersi, ita omnium animalium species aeterna intellegentia

But if our formation, by which we were made even as mortals, is a divine gift, how can it be a punishment to return to these bodies, that is, to divine benefits? And if God, as Plato constantly reminds us, held in his eternal intelligence the forms of all

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	continebat: quo modo non ipse cuncta condebat? An aliquorum esse artifex nollet, quorum efficiendorum artem ineffabilis eius et ineffabiliter laudabilis mens haberet?	living things, just as he held the form of the whole world, how could he not have founded them all himself? Or would he refuse to be the craftsman of some things when his mind, ineffable and ineffably worthy of praise, possessed the art of making them?

THAT THE WHOLE FULLNESS OF THE HUMAN RACE AROSE IN THE FIRST MAN, IN WHOM GOD FORESAW WHICH PART WOULD BE HONORED WITH REWARD AND WHICH CONDEMNED TO PUNISHMENT

From the first man, by God's foreknowledge, the two cities already took their beginning.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
12.28	Merito igitur uera religio, quem mundi uniuersi, eum animalium quoque uniuersorum, hoc est et animarum et corporum, conditorem agnoscit et praedicat. In quibus terrenis praecipuus ab illo ad eius imaginem homo propter eam causam, quam dixi, et si qua forte alia maior latet, factus est unus, sed non relictus est solus. Nihil enim est quam hoc genus tam discordiosum uitio, tam sociale natura. Neque commodius contra uitium discordiae uel cauendum ne existeret, uel sanandum cum extitisset, natura loqueretur humana, quam recordationem illius parentis, quem propterea Deus creare uoluit unum, de quo multitudo propagaretur, ut hac admonitione etiam in multis concors unitas seruaretur. Quod uero femina illi ex eius latere facta est, etiam hic satis significatum est quam cara mariti et uxoris debeat esse coniunctio.	Rightly, then, true religion recognizes and proclaims that the founder of the whole world is also the founder of all living things, that is, of both souls and bodies. Among these earthly creatures, man, the chief of them, was made by God in his image. He was made one, for the reason I have given and perhaps for some other, greater reason that lies hidden, but he was not left alone. For no race is so quarrelsome by vice and so social by nature as this one. And against the vice of discord, whether to guard against its arising or to heal it once it had arisen, human nature could say nothing more fitting than to recall that first parent. God willed to create him as one so that a multitude might be propagated from him, and so that by this reminder a harmonious unity might be preserved even among many. The fact that the woman was made for him from his side also shows clearly enough how dear the union of husband and wife ought to be.
	Haec opera Dei propterea sunt utique inusitata, quia prima. Qui autem ista non credunt, nulla facta prodigia debent credere; neque enim et ipsa, si usitato naturae curriculo gignerentur, prodigia dicerentur. Quid autem sub tanta gubernatione diuinae prouidentiae, quamuis eius causa lateat, frustra gignitur? Ait quidam psalmus sacer: Venite et uidete opera Domini, quae posuit prodigia super terram. Quur ergo ex latere uiri femina facta sit, et hoc primum quodam modo prodigium quid praefigurauerit, dicetur alio loco, quantum me Deus adiuuerit.	These works of God are unusual, of course, precisely because they are the first. Those who do not believe them ought not to believe in any wonders at all, for these too would not be called wonders if they were produced in the usual course of nature. Yet under so great a governance of divine providence, what is produced in vain, even if its cause is hidden? A sacred psalm says, "Come and see the works of the Lord, what wonders he has set upon the earth." Why, then, the woman was made from the man's side, and what this first wonder, so to speak, prefigured, will be explained elsewhere, as far as God helps me.[28]
	Nunc quoniam liber iste claudendus est, in hoc homine, qui primitus factus est, nondum quidem secundum	Now, since this book must be brought to a close, let us hold that in this first-made man there arose euidentiam, iam tamen secundum Dei praescientiam exortas fuisse existimemus in genere humano societates tamquam ciuitates duas. Ex illo enim futuri erant homines, alii malis angelis in supplicio, alii bonis in praemio sociandi, quamuis occulto Dei iudicio, sed tamen iusto. Cum enim scriptum sit: Uniuersae uiae Domini misericordia et ueritas: nec iniusta eius gratia nec crudelis potest esse iustitia.

LATIN

ENGLISH

in the human race two societies, two cities as it were. They did not yet exist visibly, but they already existed in God's foreknowledge. For from him human beings were to come, some to be joined with the evil angels in punishment, others with the good angels in reward, by a judgment of God that is hidden but nonetheless just. For since it is written, "All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth," his grace cannot be unjust, nor his justice cruel.[29]

28 Psalm 45:9 (46:8 in most English Bibles).
29 Psalm 24:10 (25:10 in most English Bibles).

Book XIII

Death

Death as the punishment of sin; the soul, the body, and the resurrection body.

THE FALL OF THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS, THROUGH WHICH MORTALITY WAS CONTRACTED

Augustine turns to the fall of the first humans and the origin of death as its just punishment.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.1	Expeditis de nostri saeculi exortu et de initio generis humani difficillimis quaestionibus nunc iam de lapsu primi hominis, immo primorum hominum, et de origine ac propagine mortis humanae disputationem a nobis institutam rerum ordo deposcit. Non enim eo modo, quo angelos, condiderat Deus homines, ut etiam si peccassent mori omnino non possent; sed ita ut perfunctos oboedientiae munere sine interuentu mortis angelica inmortalitas et beata aeternitas sequeretur; inoboedientes autem mors plecteret damnatione iustissima; quod etiam in libro superiore iam diximus.	We have now dealt with the very difficult questions about the origin of our world and the beginning of the human race. The order of our subject next requires us to take up the discussion we have undertaken of the fall of the first man, or rather of the first human beings, and of the origin and spread of human death. For God had not made human beings as he made the angels, so that they could not die at all even if they sinned. He made them so that, once they had fulfilled the duty of obedience, angelic immortality and blessed eternity would follow without death coming in between. If they disobeyed, however, death would punish them by a most just condemnation. We have already said this in the previous book as well.

THE DEATH THAT CAN BEFALL THE SOUL, WHICH WILL ALWAYS LIVE IN SOME WAY, AND THE DEATH TO WHICH THE BODY IS SUBJECT

The soul dies when God abandons it, the body when the soul leaves; the second death is eternal punishment.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.2	Sed de ipso genere mortis uideo mihi paulo diligentius disserendum. Quamuis enim anima humana ueraciter inmortalis perhibeatur, habet tamen quandam etiam ipsa mortem suam. Nam ideo dicitur inmortalis, quia modo quodam quantulocumque non desinit uiuere adque sentire; corpus autem ideo mortale, quoniam deseri omni uita potest nec per se ipsum aliquatenus uiuit. Mors igitur animae fit, cum eam deserit Deus, sicut corporis, cum id deserit anima. Ergo utriusque rei, id est totius hominis, mors est, cum anima Deo deserta deserit corpus. Ita enim nec ex Deo uiuit ipsa nec corpus ex ipsa. Huius modi autem totius hominis mortem illa sequitur, quam secundam mortem diuinorum eloquiorum appellat auctoritas. Hanc Saluator significauit, ubi ait: Eum	But I see that I must discuss the kind of death itself a little more carefully. For although the human soul is truly said to be immortal, it too has a certain death of its own. It is called immortal because in some way, however slight, it never ceases to live and to feel. The body, on the other hand, is called mortal because it can be abandoned by all life and has no life at all of itself. The death of the soul, then, occurs when God abandons it, just as the death of the body occurs when the soul abandons it. Therefore the death of both, that is, of the whole human being, occurs when the soul, abandoned by God, abandons the body. For then the soul does not live from God, and the body does not live from the soul. This death of the whole human being is timete, qui habet potestatem et corpus et animam perdere in gehennam.

LATIN

Quod cum ante non fiat, quam cum anima corpori sic fuerit copulata, ut nulla diremtione separentur: mirum uideri potest quo modo corpus ea morte dicatur occidi, qua non anima deseritur, sed animatum sentiensque cruciatur. Nam in illa ultima poena ac sempiterna, de qua suo loco diligentius disserendum est, recte mors animae dicitur, quia non uiuit ex Deo; mors autem corporis quonam modo, cum uiuat ex anima? Non enim aliter potest ipsa corporalia, quae post resurrectionem futura sunt, sentire tormenta. An quia uita qualiscumque aliquod bonum est, dolor autem malum, ideo nec uiuere corpus dicendum est, in quo anima non uiuendi causa est, sed dolendi?

Viuit itaque anima ex Deo, cum uiuit bene; non enim potest bene uiuere nisi Deo in se operante quod bonum est; uiuit autem corpus ex anima, cum anima uiuit in corpore, seu uiuat ipsa seu non uiuat ex Deo. Inpiorum namque in corporibus uita non animarum, sed corporum uita est; quam possunt eis animae etiam mortuae, hoc est Deo deserente, quantulacumque propria uita, ex qua et inmortales sunt, non desistente, conferre. Verum in damnatione nouissima quamuis homo sentire non desinat, tamen, quia sensus ipse nec uoluptate suauis nec quiete salubris, sed dolore poenalis est, non inmerito mors est potius appellata quam uita. Ideo autem secunda, quia post illam primam est, qua fit cohaerentium diremtio naturarum, siue Dei et animae siue animae et corporis.

De prima igitur corporis morte dici potest, quod bonis bona sit, malis mala; secunda uero sine dubio sicut nullorum bonorum est, ita nulli bona.

ENGLISH

followed by the one that the authority of the divine Scriptures calls the second death. The Savior pointed to it when he said: "Fear him who has the power to destroy both body and soul in hell."[1]

This second death does not happen until the soul has been joined to the body in such a way that no parting can separate them. So it may seem strange that the body can be said to be killed by a death in which the soul does not abandon it, and in which it is tormented while still animated and able to feel. In that final and everlasting punishment, which must be discussed more carefully in its proper place, we rightly speak of the death of the soul, because the soul does not live from God. But how can it be the death of the body, when the body lives from the soul? For otherwise it could not feel the bodily torments that are to come after the resurrection. Or is it this: since life of any kind is something good, and pain is evil, the body should not be said to live at all when the soul is in it as a cause not of living but of suffering?

So the soul lives from God when it lives well, for it cannot live well unless God works in it what is good. The body lives from the soul when the soul lives in the body, whether or not the soul itself lives from God. For the life of the ungodly in their bodies is the life not of their souls but of their bodies. Their souls can give them this life even when the souls are dead, that is, abandoned by God, because the souls' own life, however slight, never ceases, and this is why they are immortal. But in the final condemnation, although a person does not cease to feel, that feeling is neither sweet with pleasure nor wholesome with rest but full of punishing pain. So it is not without reason called death rather than life. It is called the second death because it comes after the first, in which natures that cling together are parted, whether God and the soul or the soul and the body.

Of the first death, the death of the body, it can therefore be said that it is good to the good and evil to the evil. But the second death, beyond doubt, belongs to none of the good, and so it is good to no one.

1 Matthew 10:28. The phrase "the second death" comes from Revelation 20:14.

WHETHER DEATH, WHICH PASSED THROUGH THE SIN OF THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS TO ALL, IS A PUNISHMENT OF SIN EVEN FOR THE SAINTS

Death, the punishment of the first sin, passed to all descendants because human nature was changed for the worse.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.3	Non autem dissimulanda nascitur quaestio, utrum re uera mors, qua separantur anima et corpus, bonis sit bona; quia si ita est, quo modo poterit obtineri, quod etiam ipsa sit poena peccati? Hanc enim primi homines, nisi peccauissent, perpessi utique non fuissent. Quo pacto igitur bona esse possit bonis, quae accidere non posset nisi malis? Et rursus si non nisi malis posset accidere, non deberet bonis bona esse, sed nulla. Quur enim esset ulla poena in quibus non essent ulla punienda? Quapropter fatendum est primos quidem homines ita fuisse institutos, ut, si non peccassent, nullum mortis experirentur genus; sed eosdem primos peccatores ita fuisse morte multatos, ut etiam quidquid de eorum stirpe esset exortum eadem poena teneretur obnoxium.	But here a question arises that must not be passed over. Is the death by which soul and body are separated really good to the good? If it is, how can we maintain that it is also the punishment of sin? For the first human beings would certainly not have suffered it if they had not sinned. How then can it be good to the good, when it could happen only to the wicked? And again, if it could happen only to the wicked, it ought not to be good to the good. It ought not to exist for them at all. For why should there be any punishment for those in whom there was nothing to punish? We must therefore admit two things. The first human beings were so created that, had they not sinned, they would not have experienced any kind of death. But as the first sinners they were punished with death in such a way that whatever sprang from their stock would also be held liable to the same penalty.
	Non enim aliud ex eis, quam quod ipsi fuerant, nasceretur. Pro magnitudine quippe culpae illius naturam damnatio mutauit in peius, ut, quod poenaliter praecessit in peccantibus hominibus primis, etiam naturaliter sequeretur in nascentibus ceteris. Neque enim ita homo ex homine, sicut homo ex puluere. Puluis namque homini faciendo materies fuit, homo, autem homini gignendo parens. Proinde quod est terra, non hoc est caro, quamuis ex terra facta sit caro; quod est autem parens homo, hoc est et proles homo. In primo igitur homine per feminam in progeniem transiturum uniuersum genus humanum fuit, quando illa coniugum copula diuinam sententiam suae damnationis excepit; et quod homo factus est, non cum crearetur, sed cum peccaret et puniretur, hoc genuit, quantum quidem adtinet ad peccati et mortis originem.	For nothing could be born of them other than what they themselves had become. In proportion to the greatness of that guilt, the condemnation changed human nature for the worse. What came first as a penalty in the first human beings who sinned therefore followed as nature in all the others who were born. For a human being does not come from a human being in the same way as a human being came from dust. Dust was the material for making a human being, but a human being is the parent for begetting a human being. So flesh is not what earth is, although flesh was made from earth; but whatever the human parent is, the human offspring is as well. In the first man, then, the whole human race was present, to pass through the woman into its descendants, when that married couple received God's sentence condemning them. And what man became, not when he was created but when he sinned and was punished, is what he begot, at least as far as the origin of sin and death is concerned.
	Non enim ad infantilem hebetudinem et infirmitatem animi et corporis, quam uidemus in paruulis, peccato uel poena ille redactus est (quae Deus uoluit esse tamquam primordia catulorum, quorum parentes in bestialem uitam mortemque deiecerat; sicut enim scriptum est:	Sin and punishment did not reduce the first man to the infantile dullness and weakness of mind and body that we see in little children. (God willed these to be like the first stage of young animals, whose parents he had cast down into a beastly life

LATIN	ENGLISH
Homo in honore cum esset, non intellexit; conparatus est pecoribus non intellegentibus et similis factus est illis; nisi quod infantes infirmiores etiam cernimus in usu motuque membrorum et sensu adpetendi adque uitandi, quam sunt aliorum tenerrimi fetus animalium; tamquam se tanto adtollat excellentius supra cetera animantia uis humana, quanto magis inpetum suum, uelut sagitta cum arcus extenditur, retrorsum reducta distulerit); — non ergo ad ista infantilia rudimenta praesumtione inlicita et damnatione iusta prolapsus uel inpulsus est primus homo; sed hactenus in eo natura humana uitiata adque mutata est, ut repugnantem pateretur in membris inoboedientiam concupiscendi et obstringeretur necessitate moriendi, adque ita id, quod uitio poenaque factus est, id est obnoxios peccato mortique generaret.	and death. As it is written: "Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he was compared to the senseless cattle and became like them." Yet we see that infants are even weaker in the use and movement of their limbs, and in the sense for seeking and avoiding things, than the most tender young of other animals. It is as though human power rose more eminently above the other living creatures the further back it has drawn its thrust, like an arrow when the bow is bent.) So it was not into these infantile beginnings that the first man fell, or was driven, by his unlawful presumption and his just condemnation. Rather, human nature was corrupted and changed in him to this extent: he suffered the rebellious disobedience of desire in his members and was bound by the necessity of dying. And so he begot what he had become through fault and punishment, that is, offspring liable to sin and death.[2]
A quo peccati uinculo si per Mediatoris Christi gratiam soluuntur infantes, hanc solam mortem perpeti possunt, quae animam seiungit a corpore; in secundam uero illam sine fine poenalem liberati a peccati obligatione non transeunt.	If infants are released from this bond of sin through the grace of Christ the Mediator, they can suffer only the death that separates the soul from the body. Freed from the debt of sin, they do not pass into that second death, whose punishment has no end.

WHY DEATH, THE PUNISHMENT OF SIN, IS NOT TAKEN AWAY FROM THOSE FREED FROM SIN BY THE GRACE OF REBIRTH

The baptized still die so that faith may be tested, and martyrs turn the penalty of sin into victory.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.4 Si quem uero mouet, quur uel ipsam patiantur, si et ipsa peccati poena est, quorum per gratiam reatus aboletur: iam ista quaestio in alio nostro opere, quod scripsimus de baptismo paruulorum, tractata ac soluta est; ubi dictum est ad hoc relinqui animae experimentum separationis a corpore, quamuis ablato iam criminis nexu, quoniam, si regenerationis sacramentum continuo sequeretur inmortalitas corporis, ipsa fides eneruaretur, quae tunc est fides, quando expectatur in spe, quod in re nondum uidetur. Fidei autem robore adque certamine, in maioribus dumtaxat aetatibus, etiam mortis fuerat superandus timor, quod in sanctis martyribus maxime eminuit; cuius profecto certaminis esset nulla uictoria, nulla gloria (quia nec ipsum omnino posset esse certamen), si post lauacrum regenerationis iam sancti non possent mortem perpeti corporalem.	Someone may be troubled by a further question. If this death too is the punishment of sin, why do those whose guilt is wiped out by grace suffer even this? I have already treated and resolved that question in another work of mine, which I wrote on the baptism of infants. There I said that the soul is left to experience separation from the body, even though the bond of guilt has been removed, because faith itself would be weakened if the body's immortality followed immediately on the sacrament of rebirth. Faith is faith only when what is not yet seen in reality is awaited in hope. By the strength and struggle of faith, at least in those of riper age, even the fear of death had to be overcome, and this was most evident in the holy martyrs. There would certainly be no victory and

2 Psalm 48:13 (49:12 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

no glory in that struggle, since there could be no struggle at all, if after the washing of rebirth the saints could no longer suffer bodily death.[3]

Cum paruulis autem baptizandis quis non ad Christi gratiam propterea potius curreret, ne a corpore solueretur? Adque ita non inuisibili praemio probaretur fides, sed iam nec fides esset, confestim sui operis quaerendo et sumendo mercedem. Nunc uero maiore et mirabiliore gratia Saluatoris in usus iustitiae peccati poena conuersa est. Tunc enim dictum est homini: Morieris, si peccaueris: nunc dicitur martyri: Morere, ne pecces. Tunc dictum est: Si mandatum transgressi fueritis, morte moriemini; nunc dicitur: Si mortem recusaueritis, mandatum transgrediemini. Quod tunc timendum fuerat, ut non peccaretur, nunc suscipiendum est, ne peccetur. Sic per ineffabilem Dei misericordiam et ipsa poena uitiorum transit in arma uirtutis, et fit iusti meritum etiam supplicium peccatoris. Tunc enim mors est adquisita peccando, nunc inpletur iustitia moriendo.

Who would not then rush to the grace of Christ with little children to be baptized, chiefly to avoid being released from the body? Then faith would not be tested by an invisible reward. Indeed, it would no longer be faith at all, since it would seek and take the wage for its work at once. As it is, by a greater and more wonderful grace of the Savior, the punishment of sin has been turned to the service of righteousness. Then it was said to man: "You will die if you sin." Now it is said to the martyr: "Die, so that you may not sin." Then it was said: "If you transgress the commandment, you shall die by death." Now it is said: "If you refuse death, you will transgress the commandment." What had then to be feared so that no one would sin must now be accepted so that no one may sin. Thus, by the inexpressible mercy of God, even the punishment of vices passes into the weapons of virtue, and even the sinner's penalty becomes the merit of the righteous. For then death was gained by sinning; now righteousness is fulfilled by dying.[4]

Verum hoc in sanctis martyribus, quibus alterutrum a persecutore proponitur, ut aut deserant fidem aut sufferant mortem. Iusti enim malunt credendo perpeti, quod sunt primi iniqui non credendo perpessi. Nisi enim peccassent illi, non morerentur; peccabunt autem isti, nisi moriantur. Mortui ergo sunt illi, quia peccauerunt; non peccant isti, quia moriuntur. Factum est per illorum culpam, ut ueniretur in poenam; fit per istorum poenam, ne ueniatur in culpam; non quia mors bonum aliquod facta est, quae antea malum fuit; sed tantam Deus fidei praestitit gratiam, ut mors, quam uitae constat esse contrariam, instrumentum fieret, per quod transiretur ad uitam.

This holds, however, for the holy martyrs, to whom the persecutor offers a choice: either abandon the faith or suffer death. The righteous prefer to suffer by believing what the first wrongdoers suffered by not believing. Unless those had sinned, they would not have died; but these will sin unless they die. Those, then, died because they sinned; these do not sin because they die. Through the guilt of those it came about that punishment was reached; through the punishment of these it comes about that guilt is not reached. This is not because death, which was formerly an evil, has become something good. It is because God has granted such grace to faith that death, which is plainly the opposite of life, has become the instrument by which one passes over to life.

3 Augustine refers to On the Merits and Forgiveness of Sins, and on the Baptism of Infants (AD 411–412).
4 The words spoken "then" paraphrase God's warning in Genesis 2:17.

THAT AS THE WICKED MAKE BAD USE OF THE LAW, WHICH IS GOOD, SO THE RIGHTEOUS MAKE GOOD USE OF DEATH, WHICH IS EVIL

As the wicked make bad use of the good law, the righteous make good use of evil death.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.5	Apostolus cum uellet ostendere, quantum peccatum gratia non subueniente ad nocendum ualeret, etiam ipsam legem, qua prohibetur peccatum, non dubitauit dicere uirtutem esse peccati. Aculeus, inquit, mortis est peccatum, uirtus autem peccati lex. Verissime omnino. Auget enim prohibitio desiderium operis inliciti, quando iustitia non sic diligitur, ut peccandi cupiditas eius delectatione uincatur. Ut autem diligatur et delectet uera iustitia, non nisi diuina subuenit gratia. Sed ne propterea lex putaretur malum, quoniam uirtus est dicta peccati: ideo ipse alio loco uersans huius modi quaestionem: Itaque, inquit, lex quidem sancta et mandatum sanctum et iustum et bonum. Quod ergo bonum est, inquit, mihi factum est mors? Absit. Sed peccatum, ut appareat peccatum, per bonum mihi operatum est mortem, ut fiat super modum peccator aut peccatum per mandatum.	The Apostle wished to show how much power sin has to do harm when grace does not come to our help. So he did not hesitate to say that even the law, by which sin is forbidden, is the power of sin. "The sting of death," he says, "is sin, and the power of sin is the law." This is entirely true. For prohibition increases the desire for the unlawful act whenever righteousness is not loved enough for delight in it to overcome the craving to sin. And only divine grace helps us to love true righteousness and to delight in it. But so that the law would not be thought evil because it was called the power of sin, he takes up a question of this kind in another passage and says: "So the law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good. Did what is good, then, become death to me? By no means. But sin, so that it might be shown to be sin, worked death in me through what is good, so that through the commandment the sinner, or sin, might become sinful beyond measure."[5]
	Super modum dixit, quia etiam praeuaricatio additur, cum peccandi aucta libidine etiam lex ipsa contemnitur. Quur hoc commemorandum putauimus? Quia scilicet, sicut lex non est malum, quando auget peccantium concupiscentiam, ita nec mors bonum est, quando auget patientium gloriam, cum uel illa pro iniquitate deseritur et efficit praeuaricatores, uel ista pro ueritate suscipitur et efficit martyres. Ac per hoc lex quidem bona est, quia prohibitio est peccati; mors autem mala, quia stipendium est peccati; sed quem ad modum iniustitia male utitur non tantum malis, uerum etiam bonis: ita iustitia bene non tantum bonis, sed etiam malis. Hinc fit, ut et mali male lege utantur, quamuis sit lex bonum, et boni bene moriantur, quamuis sit mors malum.	He said "beyond measure" because transgression is added too, when the lust for sinning has grown and the law itself is despised. Why have I thought this worth mentioning? Because the law is not evil when it increases the desire of sinners, and in the same way death is not good when it increases the glory of those who suffer it. In the one case the law is abandoned for the sake of wickedness and makes transgressors; in the other, death is accepted for the sake of truth and makes martyrs. The law, then, is good, because it is the prohibition of sin; but death is evil, because it is the wages of sin. Yet injustice makes bad use not only of evil things but also of good ones, and justice makes good use not only of good things but also of evil ones. This is why the wicked make bad use of the law, although the law is good, and the good die well, although death is evil.

5 The Apostle Paul: 1 Corinthians 15:56; Romans 7:12–13.

THE GENERAL EVIL OF DEATH, BY WHICH THE UNION OF SOUL AND BODY IS BROKEN

The separation of soul and body is harsh and unnatural, a punishment even when borne with patience.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.6	Quapropter quod adtinet ad corporis mortem, id est separationem animae a corpore, cum eam patiuntur, qui morientes appellantur, nulli bona est. Habet enim asperum sensum et contra naturam uis ipsa, qua utrumque diuellitur, quod fuerat in uiuente coniunctum adque consertum, quamdiu moratur, donec omnis adimatur sensus, qui ex ipso inerat animae carnisque conplexu. Quam totam molestiam nonnumquam unus ictus corporis uel animae raptus intercipit nec eam sentiri praeueniente celeritate permittit. Quidquid tamen illud est in morientibus, quod cum graui sensu adimit sensum, pie fideliterque tolerando auget meritum patientiae, non aufert uocabulum poenae.	Therefore, as regards the death of the body, that is, the separation of the soul from the body, it is good to no one while it is being suffered by those we call dying. In the living person soul and body had been joined and interwoven, and the very force that tears them apart is a harsh experience and contrary to nature. It lasts until all the feeling that came from this embrace of soul and flesh is taken away. Sometimes a single blow to the body or a sudden snatching away of the soul cuts all this distress short, and its swiftness does not allow it to be felt. Yet whatever it is in the dying that takes away feeling through painful feeling, bearing it with devotion and faith increases the merit of patience. It does not remove the name of punishment.
	Ita cum ex hominis primi perpetuata propagine procul dubio sit mors poena nascentis, tamen si pro pietate iustitiaque pendatur, fit gloria renascentis; et cum sit mors peccati retributio, aliquando inpetrat, ut nihil retribuatur peccato.	So death, passed down through the unbroken line of descent from the first man, is beyond doubt the punishment of everyone who is born. Yet if it is paid for the sake of devotion and righteousness, it becomes the glory of everyone who is reborn. And although death is the retribution for sin, it sometimes secures that sin receives no retribution at all.

THE DEATH THAT SOME WHO ARE NOT REBORN UNDERGO FOR CONFESSING CHRIST

Dying while confessing Christ forgives sins as fully as baptism, even for the unbaptized.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.7	Nam quicumque etiam non percepto regenerationis lauacro pro Christi confessione moriuntur, tantum eis ualet ad dimittenda peccata, quantum si abluerentur sacro fonte baptismatis. Qui enim dixit: Si quis non renatus fuerit ex aqua et spiritu, non intrabit in regnum caelorum, alia sententia istos fecit exceptos, ubi non minus generaliter ait: Qui me confessus fuerit coram hominibus confitebor eum coram Patre meo qui in caelis est; et alio loco: Qui perdiderit animam suam propter me, inueniet eam. Hinc est quod scriptum est: Pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum eius. Quid enim pretiosius quam mors, per quam fit ut et delicta omnia dimittantur et merita cumulatius augeantur?

LATIN

ENGLISH

For those who die confessing Christ, even without having received the washing of rebirth, find that their death avails as much for the forgiveness of their sins as if they had been washed in the holy font of baptism. He who said, "Unless someone is reborn of water and the Spirit, he will not enter the kingdom of heaven," made an exception for them in another saying, which is no less universal: "Whoever confesses me before others, I will confess him before my Father who is in heaven." And in another place: "Whoever loses his life for my sake will find it." Hence it is written: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." For what is more precious than a death through which all offenses are forgiven and merits are increased all the more abundantly?[6]

Neque enim tanti sunt meriti, qui, cum mortem differre non possent, baptizati sunt deletisque omnibus peccatis ex hac uita emigrarunt, quanti sunt hi, qui mortem, cum possent, ideo non distulerunt, quia maluerunt Christum confitendo finire uitam quam eum negando ad eius baptismum peruenire. Quod utique si fecissent, etiam hoc eis in illo lauacro dimitteretur, quod timore mortis negauerant Christum, in quo lauacro et illis facinus tam inmane dimissum est, qui occiderant Christum. Sed quando sine abundantia gratiae Spiritus illius, qui ubi uult spirat, tantum Christum amare possent, ut eum in tanto uitae discrimine sub tanta spe ueniae negare non possent?

Some could not postpone death, were baptized, and departed this life with all their sins wiped away. They are not of such great merit as those who could have postponed death but did not, because they preferred to end their life confessing Christ rather than to deny him and so come to his baptism. Had they done that, even their denial of Christ out of fear of death would surely have been forgiven them in that washing. In that same washing even so monstrous a crime was forgiven to those who had killed Christ. But without the abundance of the grace of that Spirit who blows where he wills, how could they ever love Christ so much that they could not deny him, in so great a danger to their lives and with so great a hope of pardon?[7]

Mors igitur pretiosa sanctorum, quibus cum tanta gratia est praemissa et praerogata mors Christi, ut ad eum adquirendum suam non cunctarentur inpendere, in eos usus redactum esse monstrauit, quod ad poenam peccati antea fuerat constitutum, ut inde iustitiae fructus uberior nasceretur. Mors ergo non ideo bonum uideri debet, quia in tantam utilitatem non ui sua, sed diuina opitulatione conuersa est, ut, quae tunc metuenda proposita est, ne peccatum committeretur, nunc suscipienda proponatur, ut peccatum non committatur commissumque deleatur magnaeque uictoriae debita iustitiae palma reddatur.

So the precious death of the saints has shown something. For them the death of Christ was sent ahead and granted beforehand with such great grace that they did not hesitate to spend their own death to gain him. Their death has shown that what had earlier been established as the punishment of sin has been turned to such uses that a richer harvest of righteousness springs from it. Death, therefore, ought not to seem good because it has been turned to such great benefit, not by its own power but by divine help. What was then set before us as something to fear, so that sin would not be committed, is now set before us as something to accept, so that sin may not be committed,

6 John 3:5; Matthew 10:32; Matthew 10:39; Psalm 115:15 (116:15 in most English Bibles).
7 "The Spirit who blows where he wills" echoes John 3:8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	so that sin already committed may be blotted out, and so that the palm owed to righteousness for a great victory may be awarded.

THAT FOR THE SAINTS, ACCEPTING THE FIRST DEATH FOR THE TRUTH IS THE ABOLITION OF THE SECOND DEATH

Martyrs accept the first death to escape the second; the souls of the godly rest until the resurrection.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.8 Si enim diligentius consideremus, etiam cum quisque pro ueritate fideliter et laudabiliter moritur, mors cauetur. Ideo quippe aliquid eius suscipitur, ne tota contingat et secunda insuper, quae numquam finiatur, accedat. Suscipitur enim animae a corpore separatio, ne Deo ab anima separato etiam ipsa separetur a corpore, ac sic totius hominis prima morte conpleta secunda excipiat sempiterna. Quocirca mors quidem, ut dixi, cum eam morientes patiuntur cumque in eis ut moriantur facit, nemini bona est, sed laudabiliter toleraretur pro tenendo uel adipiscendo bono; cum uero in ea sunt, qui iam mortui nuncupantur, non absurde dicitur et malis mala et bonis bona.	For if we consider more carefully, even when someone dies faithfully and admirably for the truth, it is death that is being avoided. Part of it is accepted precisely so that the whole of it may not befall him, with the second death, which never ends, added on top. The separation of the soul from the body is accepted so that the soul, once separated from God, may not also be separated from the body. Then the first death of the whole person would be complete, and the everlasting second death would follow it. Therefore death, as I said, is good to no one while the dying suffer it and while it works in them to make them die. But it is borne admirably for the sake of keeping or gaining what is good. When, however, those who are now called dead are in it, it is not absurd to say that it is evil to the evil and good to the good.
In requie sunt enim animae piorum a corpore separatae, inpiorum autem poenas luunt, donec istarum ad aeternam uitam, illarum uero ad aeternam mortem, quae secunda dicitur, corpora reuiuescant.	For the souls of the godly, separated from the body, are at rest, while the souls of the ungodly pay penalties. This lasts until the bodies of the godly come back to life for eternal life, and the bodies of the ungodly for eternal death, which is called the second death.

WHETHER THE TIME OF DEATH, IN WHICH THE SENSE OF LIFE IS TAKEN AWAY, SHOULD BE SAID TO BELONG TO THE DYING OR TO THE DEAD

When exactly is someone in death? While he feels, he is alive; once dead, he is after death.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.9 Sed id tempus, quo animae a corpore separatae aut in bonis sunt aut in malis, utrum post mortem potius an in morte dicendum est? Si enim post mortem est, iam non ipsa mors, quae transacta adque praeterita est, sed post eam uita praesens animae bona seu mala est. Mors autem tunc eis mala erat, quando erat, hoc est quando eam patiebantur, cum morerentur, quoniam grauis et molestus eius inerat sensus; quo malo bene utuntur boni. Peracta autem mors quonam modo uel bona uel mala est, quae iam non est? Porro si adhuc diligentius adtendamus,	But the time in which souls separated from the body are either in good or in evil: should it be said to be after death rather than in death? If it is after death, then what is good or evil is no longer death itself, which is over and past, but the soul's present life after it. Death was evil to them while it existed, that is, while they were suffering it in dying, because it brought a grievous and distressing feeling. The good make good use of this evil. But once death is over, how can it be either good or evil, since it no longer exists? Further, if we look nec illa mors esse apparebit, cuius grauem ac molestum in morientibus diximus sensum.

LATIN

Quamdiu enim sentiunt, adhuc utique uiuunt, et si adhuc uiuunt, ante mortem quam in morte potius esse dicendi sunt; quia illa, cum uenerit, aufert omnem corporis sensum, qui ea propinquante molestus est. Ac per hoc quo modo morientes dicamus eos, qui nondum mortui sunt, sed inminente morte iam extrema et mortifera adflictione iactantur, explicare difficile est, etiamsi recte isti appellantur morientes, quia, cum mors quae iam inpendet aduenerit, non morientes, sed mortui nuncupantur. Nullus est ergo moriens nisi uiuens, quoniam, cum in tanta est extremitate uitae, in quanta sunt quos agere animam dicimus, profecto qui nondum anima caruit adhuc uiuit.

Idem ipse igitur simul et moriens est et uiuens, sed morti accedens, uita cedens; adhuc tamen in uita, quia inest anima corpori; nondum autem in morte, quia nondum abscessit a corpore. Sed si, cum abscesserit, nec tunc in morte, sed post mortem potius erit: quando sit in morte quis dixerit? Nam neque ullus moriens erit, si moriens et uiuens simul esse nullus potest. Quamdiu quippe anima in corpore est, non possumus negare uiuentem. Aut si moriens potius dicendus est, in cuius iam corpore agitur ut moriatur, nec simul quisquam potest esse uiuens et moriens: nescio quando sit uiuens.

ENGLISH

still more closely, it will appear that even the thing whose grievous and distressing feeling in the dying we spoke of was not death.

For as long as people feel, they are certainly still alive. And if they are still alive, they ought to be said to be before death rather than in death, because death, when it comes, takes away all the bodily feeling that is so distressing while death approaches. It is therefore hard to explain how we can call people dying who have not yet died but are tossed about by the final, deadly affliction as death draws near. Yet they are rightly called dying, because once the death now looming has arrived, they are called not dying but dead. No one, then, is dying except someone living. When a person has reached the extremity of life of those we say are giving up their soul, he has not yet been deprived of his soul, and so he is surely still alive.

The same person, then, is at once dying and living, drawing near to death and drawing away from life. He is still in life, because the soul is in the body; he is not yet in death, because the soul has not yet left the body. But if, when it has left, he will not be in death even then but rather after death, who could say when he is in death? Nor will anyone be dying, if no one can be dying and living at the same time. For as long as the soul is in the body, we cannot deny that the person is living. Or suppose that the one in whose body the work of dying is already under way should rather be called dying, and that no one can be living and dying at the same time. Then I do not know when he is living.

WHETHER THE LIFE OF MORTALS SHOULD BE CALLED DEATH RATHER THAN LIFE

Life in a mortal body is a steady race toward death, so perhaps we are always in death.

LATIN

13.10 Ex quo enim quisque in isto corpore morituro esse coeperit, numquam in eo non agitur ut mors ueniat. Hoc enim agit eius mutabilitas toto tempore uitae huius (si tamen uita dicenda est), ut ueniatur in mortem. Nemo quippe est, qui non ei post annum sit, quam ante annum fuit, et cras quam hodie, et hodie quam heri, et paulo post quam nunc, et nunc quam paulo ante propinquior; quoniam, quidquid temporis uiuitur, de spatio uiuendi demitur, et cottidie fit minus minusque quod restat, ut omnino nihil sit aliud tempus uitae huius, quam cursus ad mortem, in quo nemo uel paululum stare uel aliquanto

ENGLISH

From the moment anyone begins to exist in this body that is bound to die, there is never a moment in it when the work of bringing death is not going on. Its changeableness works at this through the whole time of this life (if it should even be called life): to arrive at death. There is no one, after all, who is not nearer to death a year from now than a year ago, tomorrow than today, today than yesterday, a little later than now, and now than a little while ago. Whatever time is lived is subtracted from the span of living, and what remains grows less and less every day. So the time of this life is tardius ire permittitur; sed urgentur omnes pari motu nec diuerso inpelluntur accessu.

LATIN

Neque enim, cui uita breuior fuit, celerius diem duxit quam ille, cui longior; sed cum aequaliter et aequalia momenta raperentur ambobus, alter habuit propius, alter remotius, quo non inpari uelocitate ambo currebant. Aliud est autem amplius uiae peregisse, aliud tardius ambulasse. Qui ergo usque ad mortem productiora spatia temporis agit, non lentius pergit, sed plus itineris conficit. Porro si ex illo quisque incipit mori, hoc est esse in morte, ex quo in illo agi coeperit ipsa mors, id est uitae detractio (quia, cum detrahendo finita fuerit, post mortem iam erit, non in morte): profecto, ex quo esse incipit in hoc corpore, in morte est.

Quid enim aliud diebus horis momentisque singulis agitur, donec ea consumta mors, quae agebatur, inpleatur, et incipiat iam tempus esse post mortem, quod, cum uita detraheretur, erat in morte? Numquam igitur in uita homo est, ex quo est in isto corpore moriente potius quam uiuente, si et in uita et in morte simul non potest esse. An potius et in uita et in morte simul est; in uita scilicet, in qua uiuit, donec tota detrahatur; in morte autem, quia iam moritur, cum uita detrahitur? Si enim non est in uita, quid est quod detrahitur, donec eius fiat perfecta consumtio? Si autem non est in morte, quid est uitae ipsa detractio?

Non enim frustra, cum uita fuerit corpori tota detracta, post mortem iam dicitur, nisi quia mors erat, cum detraheretur. Nam si ea detracta non est homo in morte, sed post mortem: quando, nisi cum detrahitur, erit in morte?

ENGLISH

nothing at all but a race toward death, in which no one is allowed to stand still even for a moment or to go a little more slowly. All are pressed on at the same pace and driven forward at no different rate.

The one whose life was shorter did not get through his days more quickly than the one whose life was longer. Moments were snatched from both equally and in equal measure. One simply had nearer, the other farther away, the goal toward which both were running at the same speed. It is one thing to have covered more road, another to have walked more slowly. So whoever spends longer stretches of time on the way to death does not go more slowly; he completes more of the journey. Further, suppose each person begins to die, that is, to be in death, from the moment death itself begins its work in him, that is, the taking away of life. (When that taking away is complete, he will be after death, not in death.) Then surely he is in death from the moment he begins to exist in this body.

For what else is going on through each day, hour and moment, until they are used up and the death that was in progress is completed? Then the time after death begins, whereas while life was being taken away, the time was in death. So a human being is never in life from the moment he is in this body, which is dying rather than living—if he cannot be in life and in death at the same time. Or is he rather in life and in death at once? In life, that is, because he lives until all of it is taken away; in death, because he is already dying while life is being taken away. For if he is not in life, what is it that is being taken away until it is completely used up? And if he is not in death, what is this very taking away of life?

It is not for nothing that, once life has been entirely taken from the body, a person is said to be "after death"; this is only because death was going on while life was being taken away. For if, when life has been taken away, a man is not in death but after death, when will he be in death, if not while it is being taken away?

WHETHER ANYONE CAN BE BOTH LIVING AND DEAD AT THE SAME TIME

The moment of dying cannot be pinned down, like the present instant; even the Latin verb resists inflection.

LATIN

ENGLISH

13.11

LATIN

Si autem absurdum est, ut hominem, antequam ad mortem perueniat, iam esse dicamus in morte (cui enim propinquat peragendo uitae suae tempora, si iam in illa est?), maxime quia nimis est insolens, ut simul et uiuens esse dicatur et moriens, cum uigilans et dormiens simul esse non possit: quaerendum est quando erit moriens. Etenim antequam mors ueniat, non est moriens, sed uiuens; cum uero mors uenerit, mortuus erit, non moriens. Illud ergo est adhuc ante mortem, hoc iam post mortem. Quando ergo in morte? Tunc enim est moriens, ut, quem ad modum tria sunt cum dicimus ante mortem, in morte, post mortem, ita tria singulis singula uiuens, moriens mortuusque reddantur.

Quando itaque sit moriens, id est in morte, ubi neque sit uiuens, quod est ante mortem, neque mortuus, quod est post mortem, sed moriens, id est in morte, difficillime definitur. Quamdiu quippe est anima in corpore, maxime si etiam sensus adsit, procul dubio uiuit homo, qui constat ex anima et corpore, ac per hoc adhuc ante mortem, non in morte esse dicendus est; cum uero anima abscesserit omnemque abstulerit corporis sensum, iam post mortem mortuusque perhibetur. Perit igitur inter utrumque, quo moriens uel in morte sit; quoniam si adhuc uiuit, ante mortem est; si uiuere destitit, iam post mortem est. Numquam ergo moriens, id est in morte, esse conprehenditur.

Ita etiam in transcursu temporum quaeritur praesens, nec inuenitur, quia sine ullo spatio est, per quod transitur ex futuro in praeteritum. Nonne ergo uidendum est, ne ista ratione mors corporis nulla esse dicatur? Si enim est, quando est, quae in ullo et in qua ullus esse non potest? Quando quidem si uiuitur, adhuc non est, quia hoc ante mortem, non in morte; si autem uiuere iam cessatum est, iam non est, quia et hoc post mortem est, non in morte. Sed rursus si nulla mors est ante quid uel post, quid est quod dicitur ante mortem siue post mortem? Nam et hoc inaniter dicitur, si mors nulla est. Adque utinam in paradiso bene uiuendo egissemus, ut re uera nulla mors esset.

ENGLISH

But it is absurd to say that a man is already in death before he reaches death. For what is he approaching as he lives through the seasons of his life, if he is already in it? It is especially absurd because it is quite unheard of for someone to be called living and dying at the same time, when he cannot be waking and sleeping at the same time. So we must ask when he will be dying. Before death comes, he is not dying but living; and when death has come, he will be dead, not dying. The first state, then, is still before death; the second is already after death. When, then, is he in death? For that is when he is dying, so that, just as there are three things when we say "before death," "in death" and "after death," so three terms may be assigned, one to each: "living," "dying" and "dead."

So it is extremely hard to define when he is dying, that is, in death—when he is neither living, which is before death, nor dead, which is after death, but dying, that is, in death. As long as the soul is in the body, especially if sensation is also present, a human being, who consists of soul and body, is beyond doubt alive. For that reason he must be said to be still before death, not in death. But when the soul has departed and taken all sensation away from the body, he is described as already after death, and dead. Between the two, then, the state in which he would be dying, or in death, vanishes. If he is still alive, he is before death; if he has ceased to live, he is already after death. So he is never caught being dying, that is, in death.

In the same way, in the passing of time we look for the present and cannot find it, because the point at which we pass from future to past has no extension at all. Must we not take care, then, that this reasoning does not lead us to say that bodily death does not exist? For if it exists, when does it exist, since it can be in no one and no one can be in it? If one is living, it does not yet exist, because this is before death, not in death; and if living has already ceased, it no longer exists, because this too is after death, not in death. But again, if there is no death for anything to be before or after, what do we mean when we say "before death" or "after death"? That too would be said in vain, if death is nothing. If only we had lived well in paradise, so that there truly were no death!

LATIN

Nunc autem non solum est, uerum etiam tam molesta est, ut nec ulla explicari locutione possit nec ulla ratione uitari.

Loquamur ergo secundum consuetudinem (non enim aliter debemus) et dicamus ante mortem, priusquam mors accidat; sicut scriptum est: Ante mortem ne laudes hominem quemquam. Dicamus etiam cum acciderit: Post mortem illius uel illius factum est illud aut illud. Dicamus et de praesenti tempore ut possumus, uelut cum ita loquimur: Moriens ille testatus est, et: Illis adque illis illud adque illud moriens dereliquit; quamuis hoc nisi uiuens omnino facere non posset et potius hoc ante mortem fecerit, non in morte. Loquamur etiam sicut loquitur scriptura diuina, quae mortuos quoque non post mortem, sed in morte esse non dubitat dicere. Hinc enim est illud: Quoniam non est in morte, qui memor sit tui.

Donec enim reuiuescant, recte esse dicuntur in morte, sicut in somno esse quisque, donec euigilet, dicitur; quamuis in somno positos dicamus dormientes, nec tamen eo modo possumus dicere eos, qui iam sunt mortui, morientes. Non enim adhuc moriuntur, qui, quantum adtinet ad corporis mortem, de qua nunc disserimus, iam sunt a corporibus separati. Sed hoc est, quod dixi explicari aliqua locutione non posse, quonam modo uel morientes dicantur uiuere uel iam mortui etiam post mortem adhuc esse dicantur in morte. Quo modo enim post mortem, si adhuc in morte?

praesertim cum eos nec morientes dicamus, sicuti eos, qui in somno sunt, dicimus dormientes, et qui in languore, languentes, et qui in dolore, utique dolentes, et qui in uita, uiuentes; at uero mortui, priusquam resurgant, esse dicuntur in morte, nec tamen possunt appellari morientes. Unde non inportune neque incongrue arbitror accidisse, etsi non humana industria, iudicio fortasse diuino, ut hoc uerbum, quod est moritur, in Latina lingua nec grammatici declinare potuerint, ea regula qua cetera talia declinantur. Namque ab eo quod est oritur, fit uerbum praeteriti temporis ortus est; et si qua similia sunt, per temporis praeteriti participia declinantur. Ab eo uero, quod est moritur, si quaeramus

ENGLISH

As it is, however, death not only exists but is so grievous that no form of speech can explain it and no reasoning can escape it.

Let us speak, then, according to ordinary usage—for we ought not to do otherwise—and say "before death" of the time before death occurs, as it is written: "Praise no one before his death." Let us also say, once it has occurred: "After the death of this or that person, this or that happened." Let us speak of the present time too, as best we can, as when we say: "As he was dying, he made his will," and: "When he was dying, he left this and that to these and those people"—though he could not have done this at all unless he was living, and he did it before death rather than in death. Let us also speak as divine Scripture speaks, which does not hesitate to say that even the dead are not after death but in death. Hence the verse: "For there is no one in death who remembers you."[8]

Until they come back to life, they are rightly said to be in death, just as someone is said to be in sleep until he wakes up. Yet although we call those who are in sleep "sleeping," we cannot in the same way call those who are already dead "dying." For those who, as far as the death of the body is concerned—the death we are now discussing—are already separated from their bodies are no longer in the process of dying. But this is what I said cannot be explained by any form of speech: how the dying can be said to be living, or how the already dead, even after death, can be said still to be in death. For how can they be after death, if they are still in death?

This is all the more puzzling since we do not call them "dying," as we call those who are in sleep "sleeping," those in sickness "sick," those in pain "suffering," and those in life "living." Yet the dead, before they rise again, are said to be in death, and still they cannot be called dying. Hence I think it has come about—not inappropriately or unfittingly, and if not by human design, then perhaps by divine judgment—that even the grammarians have been unable to inflect the Latin verb moritur ["he dies"] by the rule by which other verbs of its kind are inflected. From oritur ["he rises"] comes the past-tense form ortus est ["he has risen"], and 8 Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 11:28; Psalm 6:5 (6:6 in the Latin and Hebrew verse numbering).

LATIN	ENGLISH
praeteriti temporis uerbum, responderi adsolet mortuus est, u littera geminata.	similar verbs are inflected through their past participles. But if we ask for the past-tense form of moritur, the usual answer is mortuus est [“he has died”], with the letter u doubled.
Sic enim dicitur mortuus, quo modo fatuus, arduus, conspicuus et si qua similia, quae non sunt praeteriti temporis, sed quoniam nomina sunt, sine tempore declinantur. Illud autem, quasi ut declinetur, quod declinari non potest, pro participio praeteriti temporis ponitur nomen. Conuenienter itaque factum est, ut, quem ad modum id quod significat non potest agendo, ita ipsum uerbum non posset loquendo declinari. Agi tamen potest in adiutorio gratiae Redemtoris nostri, ut saltem secundam mortem declinare possimus. Illa est enim grauior et omnium malorum pessima, quae non fit separatione animae et corporis, sed in aeternam poenam potius utriusque conplexu. Ibi e contrario non erunt homines ante mortem adque post mortem, sed semper in morte; ac per hoc numquam uiuentes, numquam mortui, sed sine fine morientes.	For mortuus is formed in the same way as fatuus [“foolish”], arduus [“steep”], conspicuus [“conspicuous”] and similar words. These are not past-tense forms; being adjectives, they are declined without tense. Yet mortuus is put in place of the past participle, as if to decline what cannot be declined. So it has fittingly come about that, just as the thing the word signifies cannot be declined in action, so the word itself cannot be declined in speech. Yet with the help of the grace of our Redeemer it can be brought about that we may at least decline the second death. That death is more grievous and the worst of all evils. It consists not in the separation of soul and body but in their being joined together for eternal punishment. There, on the contrary, people will not be before death and after death, but always in death; and so never living, never dead, but dying without end.[9]
Numquam enim erit homini peius in morte, quam ubi erit mors ipsa sine morte.	A human being will never be worse off in death than where death itself will be without death.

WHAT DEATH GOD THREATENED THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS WITH IF THEY BROKE HIS COMMAND

The death God threatened for disobedience included every kind of death, up to the second death.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.12 Cum ergo requiritur, quam mortem Deus primis hominibus fuerit comminatus, si ab eo mandatum transgrederentur acceptum nec oboedientiam custodirent, utrum animae an corporis an totius hominis an illam quae appellatur secunda: respondendum est: Omnes. Prima enim constat ex duabus, ex omnibus tota. Sicut enim uniuersa terra ex multis terris et uniuersa ecclesia ex multis constat ecclesiis: sic uniuersa mors ex omnibus. Quoniam prima constat ex duabus, una animae, altera corporis; ut sit prima totius hominis mors, cum anima sine Deo et sine corpore ad tempus poenas luit; secunda uero, ubi anima sine Deo cum corpore poenas aeternas luit.	So when it is asked what death God threatened the first human beings with if they transgressed the command they had received from him and failed to keep obedience—whether the death of the soul, or of the body, or of the whole human being, or the death called the second—we must answer: all of them. The first death consists of two; death in its totality consists of all. Just as the whole earth consists of many lands and the whole Church of many churches, so death as a whole consists of all deaths. The first consists of two, one of the soul and the other of the body. Thus the first death is the death of the whole human being, when the soul, without God and without the body, pays its penalty for a time; the second is when the soul, without God but with the body, pays an eternal penalty.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quando ergo dixit Deus primo illi homini, quem in paradiso constituerat, de cibo uetito: Quacumque die ederitis ex illo, morte moriemini: non tantum primae mortis partem priorem, ubi anima priuatur Deo, nec tantum posteriorem, ubi corpus priuatur anima, nec solam ipsam totam primam, ubi anima et a Deo et a corpore separata punitur; sed quidquid mortis est usque ad nouissimam, quae secunda dicitur, qua est nulla posterior, comminatio illa conplexa est.	When, then, God said to that first man, whom he had placed in paradise, about the forbidden food, "On whatever day you eat of it, you shall die by death," that threat did not include only the first part of the first death, in which the soul is deprived of God. Nor did it include only the later part, in which the body is deprived of the soul, nor only the whole first death itself, in which the soul, separated both from God and from the body, is punished. It embraced every kind of death, right up to the last, which is called the second death and after which there is no other.[10]

WHAT FIRST PUNISHMENT THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS FELT AFTER THEIR TRANSGRESSION

After the sin, the first humans felt their flesh move in disobedience against them and were ashamed.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.13 Nam postea quam praecepti facta transgressio est, confestim gratia deserente diuina de corporum suorum nuditate confusi sunt. Unde etiam foliis ficulneis, quae forte a perturbatis prima conperta sunt, pudenda texerunt; quae prius eadem membra erant, sed pudenda non erant. Senserunt ergo nouum motum inoboedientis carnis suae, tamquam reciprocam poenam inoboedientiae suae. Iam quippe anima libertate in peruersum propria delectata et Deo dedignata seruire pristino corporis seruitio destituebatur, et quia superiorem dominum suo arbitrio deseruerat, inferiorem famulum ad suum arbitrium non tenebat, nec omni modo habebat subditam carnem, sicut semper habere potuisset, si Deo subdita ipsa mansisset. Tunc ergo coepit caro concupiscere aduersus spiritum, cum qua controuersia nati sumus, trahentes originem mortis et in membris nostris uitiataque natura contentionem eius siue uictoriam de prima praeuaricatione gestantes.	As soon as the command had been transgressed, divine grace forsook them, and they were ashamed of the nakedness of their bodies. That is why they covered their shameful parts with fig leaves, which were perhaps the first thing they came across in their confusion. These were the same members as before, but before they had not been shameful. So they felt a new motion of their disobedient flesh, as a punishment matching their own disobedience. For the soul, now delighting in its own freedom to do wrong and disdaining to serve God, lost the body's former service. Because it had deserted its higher Lord by its own choice, it no longer held its lower servant subject to its choice. It no longer had the flesh wholly subject to it, as it could always have had if it had itself remained subject to God. It was then that the flesh began to set its desire against the spirit. We are born with this conflict, inheriting the origin of death, and carrying in our members and our corrupted nature the flesh's struggle, or its victory, which comes from the first transgression.[11]

9 Augustine plays on declinare, which means both to inflect a word grammatically and to turn aside from or avoid something.
10 Genesis 2:17.
11 Galatians 5:17.

WHAT KIND OF BEING GOD MADE THE HUMAN BEING, AND INTO WHAT CONDITION HE FELL BY THE CHOICE OF HIS OWN WILL

God made man upright; corrupted by his own will, Adam passed on a corrupted and condemned nature.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.14	Deus enim creauit hominem rectum, naturarum auctor, non utique uitiorum; sed sponte deprauatus iusteque damnatus deprauatos damnatosque generauit. Omnes enim fuimus in illo uno, quando omnes fuimus ille unus, qui per feminam lapsus est in peccatum, quae de illo facta est ante peccatum. Nondum erat nobis singillatim creata et distributa forma, in qua singuli uiueremus; sed iam erat natura seminalis, ex qua propagaremur; qua scilicet propter peccatum uitiata et uinculo mortis obstricta iusteque damnata non alterius condicionis homo ex homine nasceretur. Ac per hoc a liberi arbitrii malo usu series calamitatis huius exorta est, quae humanum genus origine deprauata, uelut radice corrupta, usque ad secundae mortis exitium, quae non habet finem, solis eis exceptis qui per Dei gratiam liberantur, miseriarum conexione perducit.	God, the author of natures and certainly not of vices, created man upright. But man, corrupted by his own will and justly condemned, begot corrupted and condemned offspring. For we were all in that one man, since we all were that one man who fell into sin through the woman, who had been made from him before sin. The particular form in which each of us would live had not yet been created and allotted to us individually; but the seminal nature from which we were to be propagated already existed. Since this nature was corrupted by sin, bound by the chain of death and justly condemned, no human being could be born of a human being in any other condition. And so from the misuse of free will arose this whole train of calamity. It leads the human race, corrupted at its origin as if at a diseased root, through a chain of miseries all the way to the ruin of the second death, which has no end—with the sole exception of those who are set free by the grace of God.[12]

THAT ADAM, ABOUT TO SIN, ABANDONED GOD BEFORE HE WAS ABANDONED BY GOD, AND THAT THE SOUL'S FIRST DEATH WAS ITS DEPARTURE FROM GOD

The soul abandoned God before God abandoned it; the body's death followed as a further penalty.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.15	Quam ob rem etiamsi in eo quod dictum est: Morte moriemini, quoniam non est dictum: Mortibus, eam solam intellegamus, quae fit cum anima deseritur sua uita, quod illi Deus est (non enim deserta est ut desereret, sed ut desereretur deseruit; ad malum quippe eius prior est uoluntas eius; ad bonum uero eius prior est uoluntas Creatoris eius; siue ut eam faceret, quae nulla erat, siue ut reficiat, quia lapsa perierat), — etiamsi ergo hanc intellegamus Deum denuntiasse mortem in eo quod ait: Qua die ederitis ex illo, morte moriemini, tamquam diceret: Qua die me deserueritis per inoboedientiam, deseram uos per iustitiam: profecto in ea morte etiam ceterae denuntiatae sunt, quae procul dubio fuerant secuturae.	Consider, then, the words "You shall die by death." Since the text does not say "by deaths," we may take it to mean only the death that occurs when the soul is forsaken by its own life, which for the soul is God. (It was not forsaken so that it forsook; it forsook so that it was forsaken. In its evil, its own will comes first; in its good, the will of its Creator comes first—whether to make it when it did not exist, or to remake it, since it had fallen and perished.) Even if, then, we understand this to be the death God announced when he said, "On the day you eat of it, you shall die by death"—as though he were saying, "On the day you forsake me through disobedience, I will forsake you through justice"—surely the other deaths were also 12 Ecclesiastes 7:29 (7:30 in the Latin Bible).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	announced in that death, since they were bound to follow.
Nam in eo, quod inoboediens motus in carne animae inoboedientis exortus est, propter quem pudenda texerunt, sensa est mors una, in qua deseruit animam Deus. Ea significata est uerbis eius, quando timore dementi sese abscondenti homini dixit: Adam, ubi es? non utique ignorando quaerens, sed increpando admonens, ut adtenderet ubi esset, in quo Deus non esset. Cum uero corpus anima ipsa deseruit aetate corruptum et senectute confectum, uenit in experimentum mors altera, de qua Deus peccatum adhuc puniens homini dixerat: Terra es et in terram ibis; ut ex his duabus mors illa prima, quae totius est hominis, conpleretur, quam secunda in ultimo sequitur, nisi homo per gratiam liberetur.	When the disobedient motion arose in the flesh of the disobedient soul—the motion that made them cover their shameful parts—one death was felt: the death in which God forsook the soul. This was signified by his words when he said to the man, who was hiding in senseless fear, "Adam, where are you?" He was not asking out of ignorance, but rebuking and admonishing him to consider where he was, now that God was not in him. But when the soul itself forsook the body, decayed by age and worn out by old age, the other death came to be experienced, the one of which God, still punishing sin, had said to the man: "You are earth, and to earth you shall go." So from these two deaths that first death, which is the death of the whole human being, was completed; and the second death follows it at the end, unless a person is set free through grace.[13]
Neque enim corpus, quod de terra est, rediret in terram nisi sua morte, quae illi accidit, cum deseritur sua uita, id est anima. Unde constat inter Christianos ueraciter catholicam tenentes fidem etiam ipsam nobis corporis mortem non lege naturae, qua nullam mortem homini Deus fecit, sed merito inflictam esse peccati, quoniam peccatum uindicans Deus dixit homini, in quo tunc omnes eramus: Terra es et in terram ibis.	The body, which is from the earth, would not return to the earth except by its own death, which befalls it when it is forsaken by its life, that is, the soul. Hence Christians who truly hold the Catholic faith agree that even the death of the body was inflicted on us not by a law of nature—for God made no death for man—but as the just desert of sin. For God, punishing sin, said to the man, in whom we all were at that time: "You are earth, and to earth you shall go."

THE PHILOSOPHERS WHO DO NOT THINK THE SEPARATION OF THE SOUL FROM THE BODY IS A PUNISHMENT, THOUGH PLATO DEPICTS THE SUPREME GOD PROMISING THE LESSER GODS THAT THEY WILL NEVER BE STRIPPED OF THEIR BODIES

Against Platonists who mock bodily resurrection, Augustine cites Plato's supreme god promising the lesser gods everlasting bodies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.16 Sed philosophi, contra quorum calumnias defendimus ciuitatem Dei, hoc est eius ecclesiam, sapienter sibi uidentur inridere, quod dicimus animae a corpore separationem inter poenas eius esse deputandam, quia uidelicet eius perfectam beatitudinem tunc illi fieri existimant, cum omni prorsus corpore exuta ad Deum simplex et sola et quodam modo nuda redierit. Ubi si nihil, quo ista refelleretur opinio, in eorum litteris inuenirem, operosius mihi disputandum esset, quo	But the philosophers, against whose slanders we are defending the city of God, that is, his Church, think they are being clever when they laugh at our saying that the separation of the soul from the body should be counted among its punishments. For they hold that the soul's perfect happiness comes about precisely when, stripped entirely of every body, it returns to God simple, alone, and in a sense naked. If I found nothing in their own

13 Genesis 3:9 and 3:19.

LATIN

demonstrarem non corpus esse animae, sed corruptibile corpus onerosum. Unde illud est quod de scripturis nostris in superiore libro commemorauimus: Corpus enim corruptibile adgrauat animam. Addendo utique corruptibile non qualicumque corpore, sed quale factum est ex peccato consequente uindicta, animam perhibuit adgrauari. Quod etiamsi non addidisset, nihil aliud intellegere deberemus.

Sed cum apertissime Plato deos a summo Deo factos habere inmortalia corpora praedicet eisque ipsum Deum, a quo facti sunt, inducat pro magno beneficio pollicentem, quod in aeternum cum suis corporibus permanebunt nec ab eis ulla morte soluentur: quid est quod isti ad exagitandam Christianam fidem fingunt se nescire quod sciunt, aut etiam sibi repugnantes aduersum se ipsos malunt dicere, dum nobis non desinant contradicere? Nempe Platonis haec uerba sunt, sicut ea Cicero in Latinum uertit, quibus inducit summum deum deos quos fecit adloquentem ac dicentem: Vos, qui deorum satu orti estis, adtendite: quorum operum ego parens effectorque sum, haec sunt indissolubilia me inuito, quamquam omne conligatum solui potest; sed haudquaquam bonum est ratione uinctum uelle dissoluere.

Sed quoniam estis orti, inmortales uos quidem esse et indissolubiles non potestis; ne utiquam tamen dissoluemini, neque uos ulla mortis fata periment, nec erunt ualentiora quam consilium meum, quod maius est uinculum ad perpetuitatem uestram, quam illa quibus estis conligati. Ecce deos Plato dicit et corporis animaeque conligatione mortales, et tamen inmortales dei a quo facti sunt uoluntate adque consilio. Si ergo animae poena est in qualicumque corpore conligari, quid est quod eos adloquens deus tamquam sollicitos, ne forte moriantur, id est dissoluantur a corpore, de sua facit inmortalitate securos; non propter eorum naturam, quae sit conpacta, non simplex, sed propter suam inuictissimam uoluntatem, qua potens est facere, ut nec writings to refute this opinion, I would have to argue at greater length to show that it is not the body as such that is a burden to the soul, but the corruptible body. Hence the passage from our Scriptures that we cited in the previous book: "For the corruptible body weighs down the soul." By adding "corruptible," the writer surely showed that the soul is weighed down not by any body whatever, but by the kind of body that resulted from sin when punishment followed. Even if he had not added the word, we ought to understand nothing else.[14]

ENGLISH

But Plato declares in the plainest terms that the gods made by the supreme God have immortal bodies. He brings in God himself, by whom they were made, promising them as a great benefit that they will remain with their bodies forever and never be released from them by any death. Why, then, do these people, in order to harass the Christian faith, pretend not to know what they know? Or why do they even prefer to contradict themselves and argue against their own position, provided they never stop contradicting us? These, in fact, are Plato's words, as Cicero translated them into Latin, in which he brings in the supreme god addressing the gods he made: "You who have sprung from the seed of gods, attend. The works of which I am the parent and maker are indissoluble unless I will it, although everything that is bound together can be undone; but it is in no way good to wish to dissolve what reason has joined.[15]

"But since you have come into being, you cannot be immortal and indissoluble. Yet you will by no means be dissolved, nor will any fated death destroy you, nor will it prove stronger than my purpose, which is a greater bond for your perpetuity than the bonds by which you are bound together." See: Plato says that the gods are mortal because of the binding together of body and soul, and yet immortal by the will and purpose of the god who made them. If, then, it is a punishment for the soul to be bound in a body of any kind, why does the god address them as if they were anxious that they might die, that is, be dissolved from the body, and reassure them about their immortality? And he

14 Wisdom 9:15.
15 Plato, Timaeus 41a–b; Cicero's Latin translation of the Timaeus survives in part.

LATIN	ENGLISH
orta occidant nec conexa soluantur, sed incorruptibiliter perseuerent?	does so not on account of their nature, which is composite, not simple, but on account of his own utterly invincible will, by which he has the power to make things that have come into being not perish, and things that are joined not be dissolved, but endure incorruptibly.
Et hoc quidem utrum Plato uerum de sideribus dicat, alia quaestio est. Neque enim ei continuo concedendum est globos istos luminum siue orbiculos luce corporea super terras seu die seu nocte fulgentes suis quibusdam propriis animis uiuere eisque intellectualibus et beatis, quod etiam de ipso uniuerso mundo, tamquam uno animali maximo, quo cuncta cetera continerentur animalia, instanter adfirmat. Sed haec, ut dixi, alia quaestio est, quam nunc discutiendam non suscepimus.	Whether what Plato says here about the stars is true is another question. We need not immediately grant him that those globes or disks of light, shining over the earth with bodily light by day or by night, live by souls of their own, and souls that are intellectual and happy. He also insistently affirms this about the whole universe itself, as though it were one huge living being in which all other living beings are contained. But this, as I said, is another question, which I have not undertaken to discuss now.
Hoc tantum contra istos commemorandum putaui, qui se Platonicos uocari uel esse gloriantur, cuius superbia nominis erubescunt esse Christiani, ne commune illis cum uulgo uocabulum uilem faciat palliatorum tanto magis inflatam, quanto magis exiguam paucitatem; et quaerentes, quid in doctrina Christiana reprehendant, exagitant aeternitatem corporum, tamquam haec sint inter se contraria, ut et beatitudinem quaeramus animae et eam semper esse uelimus in corpore, uelut aerumnoso uinculo conligatam; cum eorum auctor et magister Plato donum a deo summo dis ab illo factis dicat esse concessum, ne aliquando moriantur, id est a corporibus, quibus eos conexuit, separentur.	I thought I should mention only this against those who boast of being called Platonists, or of being Platonists. Out of pride in that name they are ashamed to be Christians, for fear that a name shared with the common people might cheapen their little band of cloaked philosophers, all the more puffed up the fewer they are. Looking for something to criticize in Christian teaching, they attack the eternity of bodies, as if it were self-contradictory both to seek the happiness of the soul and to want it to be always in a body, bound to it as if by a wretched chain. Yet their own founder and teacher Plato says that the supreme god granted the gods he had made the gift that they would never die, that is, never be separated from the bodies to which he had joined them.[16]

AGAINST THOSE WHO CLAIM THAT EARTHLY BODIES CANNOT BECOME INCORRUPTIBLE AND ETERNAL

If the world and the star-gods keep their bodies forever, God can make earthly bodies immortal too.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.17 Contendunt etiam isti terrestria corpora sempiterna esse non posse, cum ipsam uniuersam terram dei sui, non quidem summi, sed tamen magni, id est totius huius mundi, membrum in medio positum et sempiternum esse non dubitent. Cum ergo deus ille summus fecerit eis alterum quem putant deum, id est istum mundum, ceteris dis, qui infra eum sunt, praeferendum, eundemque esse existiment animantem, anima scilicet, sicut adserunt, rationali uel intellectuali in tam magna	They also argue that earthly bodies cannot be everlasting. Yet they have no doubt that the whole earth itself is a limb of their god—not the supreme god, it is true, but still a great one, namely this whole world—set in the middle, and that it is everlasting. Consider, then, what they think. The supreme god made for them another god, namely this world, to be ranked above the other gods who

16 The pallium, a Greek cloak, was the distinctive dress of philosophers.

LATIN

mole corporis eius inclusa, ipsiusque corporis tamquam membra locis suis posita adque digesta quattuor constituerit elementa, quorum iuncturam, ne umquam deus eorum tam magnus moriatur, insolubilem ac sempiternam uelint: quid causae est, ut in corpore maioris animantis tamquam medium membrum aeterna sit terra, et aliorum animantium terrestrium corpora, si Deus sicut illud uelit, aeterna esse non possint?

Sed terrae, inquiunt, terra reddenda est, unde animalium terrestria sumta sunt corpora; ex quo fit, inquiunt, ut ea sit necesse dissolui et emori et eo modo terrae stabili ac sempiternae, unde fuerant sumta, restitui. Si quis hoc etiam de igne similiter adfirmet et dicat reddenda esse uniuerso igni corpora, quae inde sumta sunt, ut caelestia fierent animalia: nonne inmortalitas, quam talibus dis, uelut deo summo loquente, promisit Plato, tamquam uiolentia disputationis huius intercidet? An ibi propterea non fit, quia Deus non uult, cuius uoluntatem, ut ait Plato, nulla uis uincit?

Quid ergo prohibet, ut hoc etiam de terrestribus corporibus Deus possit efficere, quandoquidem, ut nec ea quae orta sunt occidant nec ea quae sunt uincta soluantur nec ea quae sunt ex elementis sumta reddantur adque ut animae in corporibus constitutae nec umquam ea deserant et cum eis inmortalitate ac sempiterna beatitudine perfruantur, posse Deum facere confitetur Plato? Quur ergo non possit, ut nec terrestria moriantur? An Deus non est potens quo usque Christiani credunt, sed quo usque Platonici uolunt? Nimirum quippe consilium Dei et potestatem potuerunt philosophi, nec potuerunt nosse prophetae; cum potius e contrario Dei prophetas ad enuntiandam eius, quantum dignatus est, uoluntatem Spiritus eius docuerit, philosophos autem in ea cognoscenda coniectura humana deceperit.

Verum non usque adeo decipi debuerunt, non solum ignorantia, uerum etiam peruicacia, ut et sibi apertissime are beneath him. They believe this god is a living being, with a soul, rational or intellectual as they assert, enclosed in the vast mass of his body. And the supreme god set up the four elements as the limbs of that body, each placed and arranged in its own position, and they want the joining of these elements to be indissoluble and everlasting, so that so great a god of theirs may never die. If so, what reason is there for the earth to be eternal as a middle limb in the body of a greater living being, while the bodies of other, earthly living beings could not be eternal if God willed it, as he wills that?

ENGLISH

"But earth," they say, "must be given back to earth, from which the earthly bodies of living creatures were taken. It follows," they say, "that these bodies must necessarily be dissolved and die, and in that way be restored to the stable and everlasting earth from which they were taken." Suppose someone were to assert the same about fire as well, and say that the bodies taken from it to make the heavenly living beings must be given back to the universal fire. Would not the immortality that Plato promised to such gods, with the supreme god speaking, as it were, be swept away by the violence of this argument? Or does that not happen there because God does not will it—God, whose will, as Plato says, no force overcomes?

What, then, prevents God from being able to bring this about for earthly bodies too? For Plato admits that God can bring it about that things which have come into being do not pass away, that things bound together are not loosed, that things taken from the elements are not given back, and that souls placed in bodies never desert them but enjoy with them immortality and everlasting happiness. Why, then, could he not bring it about that earthly bodies also do not die? Or is God not as powerful as Christians believe, but only as powerful as Platonists permit? No doubt the philosophers were able to know God's plan and power, and the prophets were not! The truth is rather the reverse: God's Spirit taught his prophets to declare his will, so far as he deigned to do so, while human guesswork deceived the philosophers in their attempt to know it.

Yet they ought not to have been deceived to such a degree—not only through ignorance but also refragentur magnis disputationum uiribus adserentes animae, ut beata esse possit, non terrenum tantum, sed omne corpus esse fugiendum, et deos rursus dicentes habere beatissimas animas et tamen aeternis corporibus inligatas, caelestes quidem igneis, Iouis autem ipsius animam, quem mundum istum uolunt, omnibus omnino corporeis elementis, quibus haec tota moles a terra in caelum surgit, inclusam.

LATIN

Hanc enim animam Plato ab intimo terrae medio, quod geometrae centron uocant, per omnes partes eius usque ad caeli summa et extrema diffundi et extendi per numeros musicos opinatur, ut sit iste mundus animal maximum beatissimum sempiternum, cuius anima et perfectam sapientiae felicitatem teneret et corpus proprium non relinqueret, cuiusque corpus et in aeternum ex illa uiueret et eam quamuis non simplex, sed tot corporibus tantisque conpactum hebetare adque tardare non posset. Cum igitur suspicionibus suis ista permittant, quur nolunt credere, diuina uoluntate adque potentia inmortalia corpora fieri posse terrena, in quibus animae nulla ab eis morte separatae, nullis eorum oneribus adgrauatae sempiterne ac feliciter uiuant, quod deos suos posse adserunt in corporibus igneis Iouemque ipsum eorum regem in omnibus corporeis elementis?

Nam si animae, ut beata sit, corpus est omne fugiendum, fugiant di eorum de globis siderum, fugiat Iuppiter de caelo et terra; aut si non possunt, miseri iudicentur. Sed neutrum isti uolunt, qui neque a corporibus separationem audent dare dis suis, ne illos mortales colere uideantur, nec beatitudinis priuationem, ne infelices eos esse fateantur. Non ergo ad beatitudinem consequendam omnia fugienda sunt corpora; sed corruptibilia molesta, grauia moribunda; non qualia fecit primis hominibus bonitas Dei, sed qualia esse conpulit poena peccati.

ENGLISH

through obstinacy—that they contradict themselves quite openly. With great force of argument they assert that, for the soul to be happy, it must flee not only an earthly body but every body. And then they say that the gods have supremely happy souls, and yet souls bound to eternal bodies: the heavenly gods to bodies of fire, while the soul of Jupiter himself, whom they take to be this world, is enclosed in absolutely all the bodily elements of which this whole mass is built up, rising from earth to heaven.

For Plato holds that this soul is diffused from the innermost middle of the earth, which geometers call the center (centron), through all its parts up to the highest and outermost reaches of heaven, and is extended according to musical numbers. So this world is a living being—the greatest, the happiest, everlasting. Its soul would both possess the perfect happiness of wisdom and never leave its own body; and its body would both live forever from that soul and be unable to dull or slow it down, even though the body is not simple but compacted of so many bodies, and such great ones. Since, then, they give their conjectures this much license, why are they unwilling to believe that by the divine will and power earthly bodies can be made immortal—bodies in which souls live everlastingly and happily, separated from them by no death and weighed down by no burdens of theirs? For they assert that their gods can do this in bodies of fire, and Jupiter himself, their king, in all the bodily elements.[17]

For if, to be happy, the soul must flee every body, then let their gods flee from the globes of the stars, let Jupiter flee from heaven and earth; or, if they cannot, let them be judged wretched. But these men want neither. They dare not grant their gods separation from bodies, lest they seem to worship mortal beings; nor dare they grant them deprivation of happiness, lest they admit that they are unhappy. So it is not all bodies that must be fled to attain happiness, but bodies that are corruptible, troublesome, heavy, and dying—not such as God's goodness made for the first human beings, but such as the punishment of sin forced them to become.

17 Augustine is drawing on Plato's Timaeus, where the world is a single living being whose soul is structured according to musical ratios.

EARTHLY BODIES, WHICH THE PHILOSOPHERS CLAIM CANNOT BE IN HEAVEN BECAUSE WHAT IS EARTHLY IS DRAWN BACK TO EARTH BY ITS NATURAL WEIGHT

Natural weight is no obstacle: God can let incorruptible earthly bodies dwell in heaven.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
13.18	Sed necesse est, inquiunt, ut terrena corpora naturale pondus uel in terra teneat uel cogat ad terram et ideo in caelo esse non possint. Primi quidem illi homines in terra erant nemorosa adque fructuosa, quae paradisi nomen obtinuit; sed quia et ad hoc respondendum est uel propter Christi corpus cum quo ascendit in caelum uel propter sanctorum qualia in resurrectione futura sunt, intueantur paulo adtentius pondera ipsa terrena.	"But," they say, "the natural weight of earthly bodies must necessarily either hold them on the earth or drive them toward it, and so they cannot be in heaven." The first human beings, it is true, were on earth, in a wooded and fruitful land which came to be called paradise. But since this objection too must be answered—both for the sake of the body of Christ, with which he ascended into heaven, and for the sake of the bodies of the saints as they will be in the resurrection—let them look a little more closely at these earthly weights themselves.
	Si enim ars humana efficit, ut ex metallis, quae in aquis posita continuo submerguntur, quibusdam modis uasa fabricata etiam natare possint: quanto credibilius et efficacius occultus aliquis modus operationis Dei, cuius omnipotentissima uoluntate Plato dicit nec orta interire nec conligata posse dissolui, cum multo mirabilius incorporea corporeis quam quaecumque corpora quibuscumque corporibus copulentur, potest molibus praestare terrenis, ut nullo in ima pondere deprimantur, ipsisque animis perfectissime beatis, ut quamuis terrena, tamen incorruptibilia iam corpora ubi uolunt ponant et quo uolunt agant, situ motuque facillimo! An uero si hoc angeli faciant et quaelibet animalia terrestria rapiant unde libet constituantque ubi libet, aut eos non posse aut onera sentire credendum est?	If human skill can take metals, which sink at once when placed in water, and by certain techniques fashion them into vessels that even float, how much more credibly and effectively can some hidden mode of God's working do this! It is by his all-powerful will, Plato says, that things which have come into being cannot perish and things bound together cannot be loosed; and it is far more wonderful for incorporeal things to be joined to corporeal ones than for any bodies whatever to be joined to any other bodies. Such a working of God can grant to earthly masses that no weight presses them down to the depths, and to perfectly happy souls themselves that they may place their bodies —earthly, yet now incorruptible—wherever they wish and move them wherever they wish, with the greatest ease of position and motion! Or if angels were to do this, snatching up any earthly creatures from anywhere they like and setting them down wherever they like, are we to believe that they either cannot do it or that they feel the burden?
	Quur ergo sanctorum perfectos et beatos diuino munere spiritus sine ulla difficultate posse ferre quo uoluerint et sistere ubi uoluerint sua corpora non credamus? Nam cum terrenorum corporum, sicut onera in gestando sentire consueuimus, quanto maior est quantitas, tanto sit maior et grauitas, ita ut plura pondo quam pauciora plus premant: membra tamen suae carnis leuiora portat anima, cum in sanitate robusta sunt quam in languore cum macra sunt. Et cum aliis gestantibus onerosior sit saluus et ualidus quam exilis et morbidus, ipse tamen ad suum corpus mouendum adque portandum agilior est, cum in bona ualetudine plus habet molis, quam cum in	Why, then, should we not believe that the spirits of the saints, made perfect and happy by God's gift, can without any difficulty carry their bodies wherever they will and set them down wherever they will? Among earthly bodies, as we commonly feel with the loads we carry, the greater the bulk, the greater the weight, so that many pounds press harder than few. Yet the soul carries the limbs of its own flesh more lightly when they are sturdy in health than when they are thin in sickness. And though a healthy, strong man is a heavier load for others to carry than a thin, sickly one, he himself

LATIN	ENGLISH
peste uel fame minimum roboris. Tantum ualet in habendis etiam terrenis corporibus, quamuis adhuc corruptibilibus adque mortalibus, non quantitatis pondus, sed temperationis modus.	is nimbler at moving and carrying his own body when he has more bulk in good health than when, in plague or famine, he has very little strength. So much does it matter, in having even earthly bodies —though still corruptible and mortal—not the weight of their quantity but the right balance of their constitution.
Et quis uerbis explicat, quantum distet inter praesentem quam dicimus sanitatem et inmortalitatem futuram? Non itaque nostram fidem redarguunt philosophi de ponderibus corporum. Nolo enim quaerere, quur non credant terrenum esse posse corpus in caelo, cum terra uniuersa libretur in nihilo. Fortassis enim de ipso medio mundi loco, eo quod in eum coeant quaeque grauiora, etiam argumentatio ueri similior habeatur.	And who can explain in words how great the distance is between what we now call health and the immortality to come? So the philosophers do not refute our faith by appeal to the weights of bodies. I do not wish to ask why they do not believe that an earthly body can be in heaven, when the whole earth is poised on nothing. For perhaps a more plausible argument might be made about the very middle place of the world, because all heavier things converge on it.
Illud dico: Si di minores, quibus inter animalia terrestria cetera etiam hominem faciendum commisit Plato, potuerunt, sicut dicit, ab igne remouere urendi qualitatem, lucendi relinquere quae per oculos emicaret: itane Deo summo concedere dubitabimus, cuius ille uoluntati potestatique concessit, ne moriantur quae orta sint, et tam diuersa, tam dissimilia, id est corporea et incorporea, sibimet conexa nulla possint dissolutione seiungi, ut de carne hominis, cui donat inmortalitatem, corruptionem auferat, naturam relinquat, congruentiam figurae membrorumque detineat, detrahat ponderis tarditatem? Sed de fide resurrectionis mortuorum et de corporibus eorum inmortalibus diligentius, si Deus uoluerit, in fine huius operis disserendum est.	This is what I say. Plato entrusted to the lesser gods the making of man, among the other earthly living creatures; and, as he says, they were able to remove from fire its property of burning while leaving its property of shining, which was to flash out through the eyes. If so, shall we hesitate to grant to the supreme God—to whose will and power Plato conceded that things which have come into being do not die, and that things so diverse and so unlike, the corporeal and the incorporeal, once joined to each other, cannot be separated by any dissolution—that from the flesh of man, to whom he gives immortality, he can take away corruption while leaving its nature, keep the harmony of its shape and limbs, and remove the sluggishness of its weight? But the faith in the resurrection of the dead and in their immortal bodies must be discussed more carefully, God willing, at the end of this work.

AGAINST THE DOCTRINES OF THOSE WHO DO NOT BELIEVE THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS WOULD HAVE BEEN IMMORTAL IF THEY HAD NOT SINNED, AND WHO WANT SOULS TO BE ETERNAL WITHOUT BODIES

Plato's souls cycling back into bodies, and Porphyry's escape from all bodies, are set against Christian resurrection.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.19 Nunc de corporibus primorum hominum quod instituimus explicemus; quoniam nec mors ista, quae bona perhibetur bonis nec tantum paucis intellegentibus siue credentibus, sed omnibus nota est, qua fit animae a corpore separatio, qua certe corpus animantis, quod euidenter uiuebat, euidenter emoritur, eis potuisset accidere, nisi peccati meritum sequeretur. Licet enim	Now let us explain what we set out to explain about the bodies of the first human beings. Not even this death could have befallen them unless it had followed as the desert of sin—this death which is said to be good for the good, and which is known not only to a few who understand or believe but to everyone; the death by which the soul

LATIN

iustorum ac piorum animae defunctorum quod in requie uiuant dubitare fas non sit, usque adeo tamen eis melius esset cum suis corporibus bene ualentibus uiuere, ut etiam illi, qui omni modo esse sine corpore beatissimum existimant, hanc opinionem suam sententia repugnante conuincant.

Neque enim quisquam audebit illorum sapientes homines, siue morituros siue iam mortuos, id est aut carentes corporibus aut corpora relicturos, dis inmortalibus anteponere, quibus Deus summus aput Platonem munus ingens, indissolubilem scilicet uitam, id est aeternum cum suis corporibus consortium, pollicetur. Optime autem cum hominibus agi arbitratur idem Plato, si tamen hanc uitam pie iusteque peregerint, ut a suis corporibus separati in ipsorum deorum, qui sua corpora numquam deserunt, recipiantur sinum, Scilicet inmemores supera ut conuexa reuisant Rursus et incipiant in corpora uelle reuerti; quod Vergilius ex Platonico dogmate dixisse laudatur.

Ita quippe animas mortalium nec in suis corporibus semper esse posse existimat, sed mortis necessitate dissolui, nec sine corporibus durare perpetuo, sed alternantibus uicibus indesinenter uiuos ex mortuis et ex uiuis mortuos fieri putat; ut a ceteris hominibus hoc uideantur differre sapientes, quod post mortem feruntur ad sidera, ut aliquanto diutius in astro sibi congruo quisque requiescat adque inde rursus miseriae pristinae oblitus et cupiditate habendi corporis uictus redeat ad labores aerumnasque mortalium; illi uero, qui stultam duxerint uitam, ad corpora suis meritis debita siue hominum siue bestiarum de proximo reuoluantur.

In hac itaque durissima condicione constituit etiam bonas adque sapientes animas, quibus non talia corpora distributa sunt, cum quibus semper adque inmortaliter uiuerent, ut neque in corporibus permanere neque sine his possint in aeterna puritate durare. De quo Platonico dogmate iam in libris superioribus diximus Christiano tempori erubuisse Porphyrium et non solum ab animis humanis remouisse corpora bestiarum, uerum etiam is separated from the body, by which the body of a living creature, plainly alive before, plainly dies. For although it is not right to doubt that the souls of the righteous and godly dead live in rest, it would still be so much better for them to live with their bodies in good health that even those who think it supremely blessed to be wholly without a body refute this opinion of theirs by another, contradictory view of their own.

ENGLISH

For none of them will dare to rank wise men, whether about to die or already dead—that is, either without bodies or about to leave them—above the immortal gods, to whom the supreme God in Plato promises an immense gift: indissoluble life, that is, eternal partnership with their bodies. Yet the same Plato thinks that the best that can happen to human beings, provided they have lived this life piously and justly, is to be separated from their bodies and received into the bosom of those very gods who never desert their bodies —"so that, of course, forgetting, they may revisit the vaults above and begin again to wish to return into bodies." Virgil is praised for having said this on the basis of Platonic doctrine.[18]

For Plato thinks that the souls of mortals can neither be in their bodies always, since they are dissolved by the necessity of death, nor last forever without bodies; rather, in ceaseless alternation, the living come from the dead and the dead from the living. Thus the wise seem to differ from other people in this: after death they are carried to the stars, so that each may rest somewhat longer in the star suited to him, and from there, forgetting his former misery and overcome by the desire to have a body, may return once again to the toils and sorrows of mortals; while those who have led a foolish life are rolled back at once into bodies due to their deserts, whether of humans or of beasts.

So he placed even good and wise souls in this harshest of conditions: they were not assigned bodies with which they could live always and immortally, and so they can neither remain in bodies nor endure without them in eternal purity. As we said in earlier books, Porphyry was ashamed of this Platonic doctrine in this Christian age. He not only removed the bodies of beasts from human 18 Virgil, Aeneid 6.750–751, from Anchises' account of the souls in the underworld awaiting rebirth.

LATIN

sapientium animas ita uoluisse de corporeis nexibus liberari, ut corpus omne fugientes beatae aput Patrem sine fine teneantur. Itaque ne a Christo uinci uideretur uitam sanctis pollicente perpetuam, etiam ipse purgatas animas sine ullo ad miserias pristinas reditu in aeterna felicitate constituit; et ut Christo aduersaretur, resurrectionem incorruptibilium corporum negans non solum sine terrenis, sed sine ullis omnino corporibus eas adseruit in sempiternum esse uicturas.

ENGLISH

souls but also wanted the souls of the wise to be freed from bodily bonds in such a way that, fleeing every body, they would be kept in happiness with the Father without end. So, lest he seem to be outdone by Christ, who promises everlasting life to the saints, he too established purified souls in eternal happiness with no return to their former miseries; and, to oppose Christ, he denied the resurrection of incorruptible bodies and asserted that these souls will live forever not only without earthly bodies but without any bodies whatsoever.[19]

Nec tamen ista qualicumque opinione praecepit saltem ne dis corporatis religionis obsequio subderentur. Quid ita, nisi quia eas, quamuis nulli corpori sociatas, non credidit illis esse meliores? Quapropter, si non audebunt isti, sicut eos ausuros esse non arbitror, dis beatissimis et tamen in aeternis corporibus constitutis humanas animas anteponere: quur eis uidetur absurdum, quod fides Christiana praedicat, et primos homines ita fuisse conditos, ut, si non peccassent, nulla morte a suis corporibus soluerentur, sed pro meritis oboedientiae custoditae inmortalitate donati cum eis uiuerent in aeternum; et talia sanctos in resurrectione habituros ea ipsa, in quibus hic laborauerunt, corpora, ut nec eorum carni aliquid corruptionis uel difficultatis nec eorum beatitudini aliquid doloris et infelicitatis possit accidere?

Yet, whatever this opinion of his was worth, he did not at least teach that such souls should not be subjected in religious worship to embodied gods. Why so, unless because he did not believe these souls, though joined to no body, to be better than those gods? Therefore, if these men will not dare—and I do not think they will dare—to rank human souls above gods who are supremely happy and yet placed in eternal bodies, why does what the Christian faith proclaims seem absurd to them? It proclaims that the first human beings were so created that, had they not sinned, they would not have been separated from their bodies by any death, but, endowed with immortality as the reward of the obedience they had kept, would have lived with them forever; and that in the resurrection the saints will have the very bodies in which they toiled here, but such bodies that no corruption or hardship can befall their flesh, and no pain or unhappiness their happiness.

THAT THE FLESH OF THE SAINTS, WHICH NOW RESTS IN HOPE, WILL BE RESTORED TO A BETTER CONDITION THAN THAT OF THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS BEFORE SIN

The saints' flesh rests in hope and will rise spiritual, better even than Adam's body before sin.

LATIN

13.20 Proinde nunc sanctorum animae defunctorum ideo non habent grauem mortem, qua separatae sunt a corporibus suis, quia caro eorum requiescit in spe, quaslibet sine ullo iam sensu contumelias accepisse uideatur. Non enim, sicut Platoni uisum est, corpora obliuione desiderant, sed potius, quia meminerunt quid sibi ab eo sit promissum, qui neminem fallit, qui eis etiam de capillorum suorum integritate securitatem dedit, resurrectionem corporum, in quibus multa dura perpessi sunt, nihil in eis ulterius

ENGLISH

Accordingly, the souls of the saints who have died do not now find grievous the death by which they have been separated from their bodies, because their flesh rests in hope, whatever indignities it may seem to have suffered, now without any sensation. For they do not long for bodies through forgetfulness, as Plato thought. Rather, because they remember what has been promised them by the 19 Porphyry (c. AD 234–305) was a Neoplatonist philosopher, the pupil and editor of Plotinus, and author of a major work against the Christians.

LATIN	ENGLISH
tale sensuri desiderabiliter et patienter expectant. Si enim carnem suam non oderant, quando eam suae menti infirmitate resistentem spiritali iure cohercebant, quanto magis eam diligunt etiam ipsam spiritalem futuram!	one who deceives no one, who has even assured them that the hairs of their heads will be kept intact, they wait with longing and patience for the resurrection of the bodies in which they endured many hardships, and in which they will never again feel any such thing. For if they did not hate their flesh when, in its weakness, it resisted their mind and they restrained it by spiritual law, how much more do they love it now that it too is to become spiritual!
Sicut enim spiritus carni seruiens non incongrue carnalis, ita caro spiritui seruiens recte appellabitur spiritalis, non quia in spiritum conuertetur, sicut nonnulli putant ex eo quod scriptum est: Seminatur corpus animale, surget corpus spiritale, sed quia spiritui summa et mirabili obtemperandi facilitate subdetur usque ad inplendam inmortalitatis indissolubilis securissimam uoluntatem, omni molestiae sensu, omni corruptibilitate et tarditate detracta. Non solum enim non erit tale, quale nunc est in quauis optima ualetudine, sed nec tale quidem, quale fuit in primis hominibus ante peccatum, qui licet morituri non essent, nisi peccassent, alimentis tamen ut homines utebantur, nondum spiritalia, sed adhuc animalia corpora terrena gestantes.	For just as a spirit that serves the flesh is not inappropriately called fleshly, so flesh that serves the spirit will rightly be called spiritual. This is not because it will be turned into spirit, as some think on the basis of what is written, "It is sown an animal body, it will rise a spiritual body," but because it will be subject to the spirit with a supreme and wonderful readiness to obey, to the point of fulfilling the utterly secure will of indissoluble immortality, with all sense of trouble, all corruptibility and sluggishness removed. For it will not only be unlike what it is now even in the best of health; it will not even be like what it was in the first human beings before sin. Although they would not have died had they not sinned, they still used food as human beings do, since the earthly bodies they bore were not yet spiritual but still animal.[20]
Quae licet senio non ueterescerent, ut necessitate perducerentur ad mortem (qui status eis de ligno uitae, quod in medio paradiso cum arbore uetita simul erat, mirabili Dei gratia praestabatur), tamen et alios sumebant cibos praeter unam arborem, quae fuerat interdicta, non quia ipsa erat malum, sed propter commendandum purae et simplicis oboedientiae bonum, quae magna uirtus est rationalis creaturae sub Creatore Domino constitutae. Nam ubi nullum malum tangebatur, profecto, si prohibitum tangeretur, sola inoboedientia peccabatur.	Those bodies did not grow old with age so as to be brought by necessity to death—a condition granted them by God's wonderful grace from the tree of life, which stood in the middle of paradise together with the forbidden tree. Yet they also ate other foods, apart from the one tree which had been forbidden—forbidden not because it was itself an evil, but to commend the good of pure and simple obedience, which is a great virtue for a rational creature placed under the Lord its Creator. For where nothing evil was being touched, surely, if what was forbidden was touched, the only sin was disobedience.
Agebatur ergo aliis quae sumebant, ne animalia corpora molestiae aliquid esuriendo ac sitiendo sentirent; de ligno autem uitae propterea gustabatur, ne mors eis undecumque subreperet uel senectute confecta decursis temporum spatiis interirent; tamquam cetera essent	So the other things they ate served to keep their animal bodies from feeling any discomfort from hunger and thirst; while they tasted of the tree of life so that death might not creep upon them from any quarter, and they might not perish worn out 20 1 Corinthians 15:44. Augustine's animale ("animal," i.e. animated by the soul, anima) is usually rendered "natural" in English Bibles.

LATIN	ENGLISH
alimento, illud sacramento; ut sic fuisse accipiatur lignum uitae in paradiso corporali, sicut in spiritali, hoc est intellegibili, paradiso sapientia Dei, de qua scriptum est: Lignum uitae est amplectentibus eam.	by old age after the long course of time. It was as though the other foods were for nourishment, that one for a sacrament. Thus the tree of life in the bodily paradise may be understood to have been what the wisdom of God is in the spiritual—that is, the intelligible—paradise, the wisdom of which it is written, "She is a tree of life to those who embrace her."[21]

THE PARADISE IN WHICH THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS LIVED: THAT SOMETHING SPIRITUAL IS RIGHTLY UNDERSTOOD BY IT, WHILE THE TRUTH OF THE HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF A PHYSICAL PLACE IS KEPT

Paradise may be read allegorically of the soul or the Church, but it was also a real place.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.21 Unde nonnulli totum ipsum paradisum, ubi primi homines parentes generis humani sanctae scripturae ueritate fuisse narrantur, ad intellegibilia referunt arboresque illas et ligna fructifera in uirtutes uitae moresque conuertunt; tamquam uisibilia et corporalia illa non fuerint, sed intellegibilium significandorum causa eo modo dicta uel scripta sint. Quasi propterea non potuerit esse paradisus corporalis, quia potest etiam spiritalis intellegi; tamquam ideo non fuerint duae mulieres, Agar et Sarra, et ex eis duo filii Abrahae, unus de ancilla, alius de libera, quia duo testamenta in eis figurata dicit apostolus; aut ideo de nulla petra Moyse percutiente aqua defluxerit, quia potest illic figurata significatione etiam Christus intellegi, eodem apostolo dicente: Petra autem erat Christus.	Hence some refer the whole of that paradise—where, by the truth of holy Scripture, the first human beings, the parents of the human race, are related to have lived—to intelligible things, and turn those trees and fruit-bearing plants into the virtues and moral habits of life, as though they were not visible and bodily things but had been spoken or written of in that way to signify intelligible ones. As if there could not have been a bodily paradise just because a spiritual one can also be understood! As if there were not two women, Hagar and Sarah, and two sons of Abraham born from them, one of the slave woman and the other of the free, just because the apostle says that the two covenants were prefigured in them! Or as if no water flowed from any rock when Moses struck it, just because Christ too can be understood there in a figurative sense, as the same apostle says: "And the rock was Christ."[22]
Nemo itaque prohibet intellegere paradisum uitam beatorum, quattuor eius flumina quattuor uirtutes, prudentiam, fortitudinem, temperantiam adque iustitiam, et ligna eius omnes utiles disciplinas, et lignorum fructus mores piorum, et lignum uitae ipsam bonorum omnium matrem sapientiam, et lignum scientiae boni et mali transgressi mandati experimentum. Poenam enim peccatoribus bene utique, quoniam iuste, constituit Deus, sed non suo bono experitur homo. Possunt haec etiam in ecclesia intellegi, ut ea melius accipiamus tamquam prophetica indicia praecedentia futurorum; paradisum scilicet ipsam ecclesiam, sicut de illa legitur in cantico canticorum; quattuor autem paradisi flumina quattuor euangelia,	So no one forbids us to understand paradise as the life of the blessed; its four rivers as the four virtues—prudence, fortitude, temperance, and justice; its trees as all useful disciplines; the fruits of the trees as the moral habits of the godly; the tree of life as wisdom herself, the mother of all good things; and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil as the experience of a commandment transgressed. For God established punishment for sinners well, certainly, since he did so justly; but man does not experience it to his own good. These things can also be understood of the Church, so that we take them better as prophetic signs going

21 Proverbs 3:18.
22 On Hagar and Sarah, see Galatians 4:22–24; the quotation is 1 Corinthians 10:4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ligna fructifera sanctos, fructus autem eorum opera eorum, lignum uitae sanctum sanctorum utique Christum, lignum scientiae boni et mali proprium uoluntatis arbitrium.	before things to come: paradise as the Church herself, as we read of her in the Song of Songs; the four rivers of paradise as the four Gospels; the fruit-bearing trees as the saints, and their fruits as their works; the tree of life as the Holy of Holies, who is surely Christ; and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil as the will's own free choice.[23]
Nec se ipso quippe homo diuina uoluntate contemta nisi perniciose uti potest, adque ita discit, quid intersit, utrum inhaereat communi omnibus bono an proprio delectetur. Se quippe amans donatur sibi, ut inde timoribus maeroribusque conpletus cantet in psalmo, si tamen mala sua sentit: Ad me ipsum turbata est anima mea; correctusque iam dicat: Fortitudinem meam ad te custodiam. Haec et si qua alia commodius dici possunt de intellegendo spiritaliter paradiso nemine prohibente dicantur, dum tamen et illius historiae ueritas fidelissima rerum gestarum narratione commendata credatur.	For once he has scorned the divine will, a man can make only ruinous use of himself, and so he learns what difference it makes whether he clings to the good common to all or takes delight in his own. For in loving himself he is handed over to himself, so that, filled with fears and sorrows, he sings in the psalm—if indeed he is aware of his ills—"My soul is troubled at myself"; and, once corrected, he may say, "I will keep my strength for you." Let these things, and any others that can be said more fittingly about understanding paradise spiritually, be said, with no one forbidding it—provided that the truth of that history, too, commended to us by a most faithful narrative of events, is also believed.[24]

THE BODIES OF THE SAINTS AFTER THE RESURRECTION, WHICH WILL BE SPIRITUAL WITHOUT THE FLESH BEING TURNED INTO SPIRIT

Resurrection bodies will not need food, though they can eat, as the risen Christ did.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.22 Corpora ergo iustorum, quae in resurrectione futura sunt, neque ullo ligno indigebunt, quo fiat ut nullo morbo uel senectute inueterata moriantur, neque ullis aliis corporalibus alimentis, quibus esuriendi ac sitiendi qualiscumque molestia deuitetur; quoniam certo et omni modo inuiolabili munere inmortalitatis induentur, ut non nisi uelint, possibilitate, non necessitate uescantur. Quod angeli quoque uisibiliter et tractabiliter apparentes, non quia indigebant, sed quia uolebant et poterant, ut hominibus congruerent sui ministerii quadam humanitate, fecerunt. Neque enim in phantasmate angelos edisse credendum est, quando eos homines hospitio susceperunt, quamuis utrum angeli essent ignorantibus simili nobis indigentia uesci uiderentur. Unde est quod ait angelus in libro Tobiae: Videbatis me manducare, sed uisu uestro uidebatis; id est necessitate reficiendi corporis, sicut uos facitis, me cibum sumere putabatis.	The bodies of the righteous, then, as they will be in the resurrection, will need no tree to keep them from dying of disease or of worn-out old age. Nor will they need any other bodily nourishment to ward off hunger and thirst and whatever discomfort these bring. For they will be clothed with the gift of immortality, which is certain and in every way inviolable, so that they will eat only if they wish to: because they can, not because they must. The angels did the same when they appeared in visible and tangible form. They did not eat because they needed to, but because they wished to and were able to, so as to adapt themselves to human beings by a certain humanity in their ministry. We should not believe that the angels ate only in appearance when people received them as guests, even though to those who did not know they were angels they seemed to eat out of a need

23 In the Song of Songs (4:12–13) the bride is called an enclosed garden, an orchard (paradisus) of fruit trees.
24 Psalm 41:7 (42:6 in most English Bibles) and Psalm 58:10 (59:9 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	like ours. Hence the angel says in the book of Tobit: "You saw me eat, but you saw with your own sight." That is, you thought I was taking food out of the need to refresh my body, as you do.[25]
Sed si forte de angelis aliud credibilius disputari potest, certe fides Christiana de ipso Saluatore non dubitat, quod etiam post resurrectionem, iam quidem in spiritali carne, sed tamen uera, cibum ac potum cum discipulis sumsit. Non enim potestas, sed egestas edendi ac bibendi talibus corporibus auferetur. Unde et spiritalia erunt, non quia corpora esse desistent, sed quia spiritu uiuificante subsistent.	Even if some other, more credible account can perhaps be given of the angels, Christian faith certainly has no doubt about the Savior himself. Even after the resurrection, in flesh that was now spiritual but nonetheless real, he took food and drink with his disciples. For what will be taken away from such bodies is not the power to eat and drink but the need. That is why they will be spiritual: not because they will cease to be bodies, but because they will subsist by the life-giving spirit.

WHAT WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND BY THE ANIMAL BODY AND THE SPIRITUAL BODY, AND WHO DIE IN ADAM AND WHO ARE MADE ALIVE IN CHRIST

Paul contrasts the animal body Adam received with the spiritual body of the resurrection.

LATIN	ENGLISH
13.23 Nam sicut ista, quae habent animam uiuentem, nondum spiritum uiuificantem, animalia dicuntur corpora, nec tamen animae sunt, sed corpora: ita illa spiritalia uocantur corpora; absit tamen ut spiritus ea credamus futura, sed corpora carnis habitura substantiam, sed nullam tarditatem corruptionemque carnalem spiritu uiuificante passura. Tunc iam non terrenus, sed caelestis homo erit; non quia corpus, quod de terra factum est, non ipsum erit; sed quia dono caelesti iam tale erit, ut etiam caelo incolendo non amissa natura, sed mutata qualitate conueniat. Primus autem homo de terra terrenus in animam uiuentem factus est, non in spiritum uiuificantem, quod ei post oboedientiae meritum seruabatur.	Bodies that have a living soul but not yet a life-giving spirit are called animal bodies, and yet they are not souls but bodies. In the same way, those bodies are called spiritual. Yet heaven forbid that we should believe they will be spirits. They will be bodies with the substance of flesh, but the life-giving spirit will spare them all the sluggishness and corruption of the flesh. Then man will no longer be earthly but heavenly. This is not because the body that was made from the earth will not be the same body. It is because a heavenly gift will make it fit to dwell even in heaven, not by losing its nature but by a change in its qualities. The first man, however, earthly and from the earth, was made a living soul, not a life-giving spirit. That was being kept for him as the reward of obedience.[26]
Ideo corpus eius, quod cibo ac potu egebat,: ne fame adficeretur ac siti, et non inmortalitate illa absoluta adque indissolubili, sed ligno uitae a mortis necessitate prohibebatur adque in iuuentutis flore tenebatur, non spiritale, sed animale fuisse non dubium est, nequaquam tamen moriturum, nisi in Dei praedicentis minantisque sententiam delinquendo conruisset et alimentis quidem etiam extra paradisum non negatis, a ligno tamen uitae prohibitus traditus esset tempori uetustatique finiendus,	His body, therefore, needed food and drink so as not to suffer hunger and thirst. It was kept from the necessity of death and held in the flower of youth not by that absolute and indissoluble immortality but by the tree of life. There is no doubt, then, that it was not spiritual but animal. Yet it would by no means have died had he not fallen, by his transgression, under the sentence that God had foretold and threatened. Then, although food

25 Abraham and Lot received angels as guests (Genesis 18–19). The quotation is Tobit 12:19.
26 "Living soul" and "life-giving spirit" come from 1 Corinthians 15:45.

LATIN	ENGLISH
in ea dumtaxat uita, quam in corpore licet animali, donec spiritale oboedientiae merito fieret, posset in paradiso nisi peccasset habere perpetuam.	was not denied him even outside paradise, he was barred from the tree of life and handed over to time and age to be brought to an end. This end concerned that life which, had he not sinned, he could have had forever in paradise, in a body that was animal, it is true, until it became spiritual as the reward of obedience.
Quapropter etiamsi mortem istam manifestam, qua fit animae a corpore separatio, intellegamus simul significatam in eo quod Deus dixerat: Qua die ederitis ex illo, morte moriemini: non ideo debet absurdum uideri, quia non eo prorsus die a corpore sunt soluti, quo cibum interdictum mortiferumque sumserunt. Eo quippe die mutata in deterius uitiataque natura adque a ligno uitae separatione iustissima mortis in eis etiam corporalis necessitas facta est, cum qua nos necessitate nati sumus. Propter quod apostolus non ait: Corpus quidem moriturum est propter peccatum, sed ait: Corpus quidem mortuum est, propter peccatum, spiritus autem uita est propter iustitiam.	God had said: "On the day you eat of it, you shall die by death." Suppose we take these words to signify at the same time this evident death, in which the soul is separated from the body. It should not seem absurd that they were not released from the body on the very day they took the forbidden and deadly food. For on that day their nature was changed for the worse and corrupted. And by their entirely just separation from the tree of life, the necessity of bodily death also came upon them, the necessity with which we are born. That is why the apostle does not say, "The body is going to die because of sin," but, "The body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness."[27]
Deinde subiunxit: Si autem spiritus eius, qui suscitauit Christum a mortuis, habitat in uobis: qui suscitauit Christum a mortuis uiuificabit et mortalia corpora uestra per inhabitantem spiritum eius in uobis. Tunc ergo erit corpus in spiritum uiuificantem, quod nunc est in animam uiuentem; et tamen mortuum dicit apostolus, quia iam moriendi necessitate constrictum est. Tunc autem ita erat in, animam uiuentem, quamuis non in spiritum uiuificantem, ut tamen mortuum dici non recte posset, quia nisi perpetratione peccati necessitatem moriendi habere non posset. Cum uero Deus et dicendo: Adam, ubi es?	Then he added: "But if the Spirit of him who raised Christ from the dead dwells in you, he who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies through his Spirit dwelling in you." So the body, which now exists as a living soul, will then exist as a life-giving spirit. And yet the apostle calls it dead, because it is already bound by the necessity of dying. Back then, however, it was a living soul, though not a life-giving spirit, in such a way that it could not rightly be called dead. It could not have come under the necessity of dying except by committing sin. When God said, "Adam, where are you?"[28] mortem significauerit animae, quae facta est illo deserente, et dicendo: Terra es et in terram ibis mortem significauerit corporis, quae illi fit anima discedente: propterea de morte secunda nihil dixisse credendus est, quia occultam esse uoluit propter dispensationem testamenti noui, ubi secunda mors apertissime declaratur; ut prius ista mors prima, quae communis est omnibus, proderetur ex illo uenisse peccato, quod in uno commune factum est omnibus; mors uero secunda non utique communis est omnibus propter eos, qui secundum propositum uocati sunt, quos ante praesciuit et	he signified the death of the soul, which came about when he forsook it. When he said, "You are earth, and to earth you shall go," he signified the death of the body, which befalls it when the soul departs. We should therefore believe that he said nothing about the second death because he wished it to stay hidden for the sake of the dispensation of the New Testament, where the second death is declared most plainly. In this way the first death, which is common to all, would first be shown to have come from that sin which, in 27 Genesis 2:17; Romans 8:10.

28 Romans 8:11; Genesis 3:9.

LATIN

praedestinauit, sicut ait apostolus, conformes imaginis filii sui, ut sit ipse primogenitus in multis fratribus, quos a secunda morte per Mediatorem Dei gratia liberauit.

In corpore ergo animali primum hominem factum sic apostolus loquitur. Volens enim ab spiritali, quod in resurrectione futurum est, hoc quod nunc est animale discernere: Seminatur, inquit, in corruptione, surget in in corruptione; seminatur in contumelia, surget in gloria; seminatur in infirmitate, surget in uirtute; seminatur corpus animale, surget corpus spiritale. Deinde ut hoc probaret: Si est, inquit, corpus animale, est et spiritale. Et ut quid esset animale corpus ostenderet: Sic, inquit, scriptum est: Factus est primus homo in animam uiuentem. Isto igitur modo uoluit ostendere quid sit corpus animale, quamuis scriptura non dixerit de homine primo, qui est appellatus Adam, quando illi anima flatu Dei creata est: Et factus est homo in corpore animali; sed: Factus est homo in animam uiuentem.

In eo ergo quod scriptum est: Factus est primus homo in animam uiuentem, uoluit apostolus intellegi corpus hominis animale. Spiritale autem quem ad modum intellegendum esset, ostendit addendo: Nouissimus Adam in spiritum uiuificantem, procul dubio Christum significans, qui iam ex mortuis ita resurrexit, ut mori deinceps omnino non possit. Denique sequitur et dicit: Sed non primum quod spiritale est, sed quod animale, postea spiritale. Ubi multo apertius declarauit se animale corpus insinuasse in eo quod scriptum est factum esse primum hominem in animam uiuentem, spiritale autem in eo quod ait: Nouissimus Adam in spiritum uiuificantem.

Prius est enim animale corpus, quale habuit primus Adam, quamuis non moriturum, nisi peccasset; quale nunc habemus et nos, hactenus eius mutata uitiataque natura, quatenus in illo, postea quam peccauit, effectum one man, became common to all. The second death, by contrast, is certainly not common to all. It does not touch those who "are called according to his purpose." These are the ones whom, as the apostle says, "he foreknew and predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son, so that he might be the firstborn among many brothers." God's grace has freed them from the second death through the Mediator.[29]

ENGLISH

The apostle speaks of the first man as made in an animal body in the following way. He wishes to distinguish the present animal body from the spiritual one that will exist in the resurrection, and so he says: "It is sown in corruption, it will rise in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor, it will rise in glory. It is sown in weakness, it will rise in power. It is sown an animal body, it will rise a spiritual body." Then, to prove this, he says: "If there is an animal body, there is also a spiritual one." And to show what an animal body is, he says: "Thus it is written: 'The first man was made a living soul.'" In this way, then, he wished to show what an animal body is. Yet when the first man, who was called Adam, had his soul created by the breath of God, Scripture did not say of him, "And man was made in an animal body," but, "Man was made a living soul."[30]

In the words "The first man was made a living soul," then, the apostle wished us to understand man's animal body. He showed how the spiritual body was to be understood by adding: "The last Adam, a life-giving spirit." Here he undoubtedly means Christ, who has now risen from the dead in such a way that he can never die again. Then he goes on to say: "But it is not the spiritual that comes first, but the animal, and afterward the spiritual." There he declared far more plainly what he had meant. The animal body is indicated in the words of Scripture that the first man was made a living soul. The spiritual body is indicated in his own words: "The last Adam, a life-giving spirit."[31]

For the animal body comes first. The first Adam had a body of this kind, though it would not have died had he not sinned. We too now have such a body, since his nature has been changed and cor-

29 Genesis 3:19; Romans 8:28–29.
30 1 Corinthians 15:42–45, quoting Genesis 2:7.
31 1 Corinthians 15:45–46.

LATIN	ENGLISH
est, unde haberet iam moriendi necessitatem; tale pro nobis etiam Christus primitus habere dignatus est, non quidem necessitate, sed potestate; postea uero spiritale, quale iam praecessit in Christo tamquam in capite nostro, secuturum est autem in membris eius ultima resurrectione mortuorum.	rupted in us to the same extent as it was in him after he sinned, which put him under the necessity of dying from then on. Christ too, for our sake, deigned at first to have such a body, not by necessity but by his own power. Afterward comes the spiritual body. It has already gone before in Christ as our head, and it will follow in his members at the final resurrection of the dead.

THE EARTHLY AND THE HEAVENLY MAN

We bear the image of the earthly Adam by birth and of the heavenly Christ by rebirth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Adiungit deinde apostolus duorum istorum hominum euidentissimam differentiam dicens: Primus homo de terra terrenus, secundus homo de caelo caelestis. Qualis terrenus, tales et terreni; qualis caelestis, tales et caelestes. Et quo modo induimus imaginem terreni, induamus et imaginem eius, qui de caelo est. Hoc apostolus ita posuit, ut nunc quidem in nobis secundum sacramentum regenerationis fiat, sicut alibi dicit: Quotquot in Christo baptizati estis, Christum induistis; re autem ipsa tunc perficietur, cum et in nobis, quod est animale nascendo, spiritale factum fuerit resurgendo. Ut enim eius itidem uerbis utar: Spe salui facti sumus.	Then the apostle adds a perfectly plain difference between these two men, saying: "The first man was from the earth, earthly; the second man is from heaven, heavenly. As was the earthly, so are those who are earthly; as is the heavenly, so are those who are heavenly. And just as we have put on the image of the earthly man, let us also put on the image of him who is from heaven." The apostle put this in such a way that it happens in us now according to the sacrament of rebirth. As he says elsewhere: "All of you who have been baptized in Christ have put on Christ." But in reality it will be completed only when, in us too, what is animal by birth has become spiritual by resurrection. For, to use his words again: "In hope we have been saved."[32]
Induimus autem imaginem terreni hominis propagatione praeuaricationis et mortis, quam nobis intulit generatio; sed induimus imaginem caelestis hominis gratia indulgentiae uitaeque perpetuae, quod nobis praestat regeneratio, non nisi per mediatorem Dei et hominum, hominem Christum Iesum; quem caelestem hominem uult intellegi, quia de caelo uenit, ut terrenae mortalitatis corpore uestiretur, quod caelesti inmortalitate uestiret. Caelestes uero ideo appellat et alios, quia fiunt per gratiam membra eius, ut cum illis sit unus Christus, uelut caput et corpus. Hoc in, eadem epistula euidentius ita ponit: Per hominem mors, et per hominem resurrectio mortuorum.	We have put on the image of the earthly man through the transmission of transgression and death, which our generation brought upon us. But we put on the image of the heavenly man through the grace of pardon and everlasting life, which our regeneration grants us. This comes only through "the mediator between God and humankind, the man Christ Jesus." The apostle wants us to understand Christ as the heavenly man because he came from heaven to be clothed in a body of earthly mortality, so that he might clothe it with heavenly immortality. He calls others heavenly too, because by grace they become his members, so that with them he is one Christ, as head and body. He puts this more clearly in the same letter: "Through a man, death; and through a man, the resurrection of the dead."[33]

32 1 Corinthians 15:47–49; Galatians 3:27; Romans 8:24.
33 1 Timothy 2:5; 1 Corinthians 15:21.

LATIN

Sicut enim in Adam omnes moriuntur, sic et in Christo omnes uiuificabuntur; iam utique in corpore spiritali quod erit in spiritum uiuificantem; non quia omnes, qui in Adam moriuntur, membra erunt Christi (ex illis enim multo plures secunda in aeternum morte plectentur); sed ideo dictum est omnes adque omnes, quia, sicut nemo corpore animali nisi in Adam moritur, ita nemo corpore spiritali nisi in Christo uiuificatur. Proinde nequaquam putandum est nos in resurrectione tale corpus habituros, quale habuit homo primus ante peccatum; nec illud, quod dictum est: Qualis terrenus, tales et terreni, secundum id intellegendum, quod factum est admissione peccati. Non enim existimandum est eum prius, quam peccasset, spiritale corpus habuisse et peccati merito in animale mutatum.

Ut enim hoc putetur, parum adtenduntur tanti uerba doctoris, qui ait: Si est corpus animale, est et spiritale; sic et scriptum est: Factus est primus homo Adam in animam uiuentem. Numquid hoc post peccatum factum est, cum sit ista hominis prima conditio, de qua beatissimus paulus ad corpus animale monstrandum hoc testimonium legis adsumsit?

ENGLISH

"For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ all will be made alive." This means, of course, alive in a spiritual body, which will be a life-giving spirit. It does not mean that all who die in Adam will be members of Christ, for far more of them will be punished with the second death forever. "All" is said in both places because no one dies in an animal body except in Adam, and in the same way no one is made alive in a spiritual body except in Christ. We must by no means think, therefore, that in the resurrection we shall have the kind of body the first man had before sin. Nor is the saying "As was the earthly, so are those who are earthly" to be understood of what came about through the commission of sin. We must not suppose that he had a spiritual body before he sinned and that it was changed into an animal one as the penalty of sin.[34]

Anyone who thinks this pays too little attention to the words of so great a teacher, who says: "If there is an animal body, there is also a spiritual one; thus it is also written: 'The first man Adam was made a living soul.'" Did this happen after sin? It was man's first creation, and the most blessed Paul took this testimony of the law from it to demonstrate the animal body.

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND BOTH GOD'S BREATHING, BY WHICH THE FIRST MAN BECAME A LIVING SOUL, AND THE LORD'S, WHEN HE SAID TO HIS DISCIPLES, "RECEIVE THE HOLY SPIRIT"

God's breathing into Adam gave him a created soul, not the Holy Spirit, as the Greek words show.

LATIN

13.24 Unde et illud parum considerate quibusdam uisum est, in eo quod legitur: Inspirauit Deus in faciem eius spiritum uitae, et factus est homo in animam uiuentem, non tunc animam primo homini datam, sed eam, quae iam inerat, Spiritu sancto uiuificatam. Mouet enim eos, quod Dominus Iesus, postea quam resurrexit a mortuis, insufflauit dicens discipulis suis: Accipite Spiritum sanctum. Unde tale aliquid factum existimant, quale tunc factum est, quasi et hic secutus euangelista dixerit: Et facti sunt in animam uiuentem. Quod quidem si dictum esset, hoc intellegeremus, quod animarum quaedam uita sit Spiritus Dei, sine quo animae rationales mortuae deputandae sunt, quamuis earum praesentia uiuere corpora uideantur.

ENGLISH

So too some people have concluded, with too little thought, that the passage "God breathed into his face the spirit of life, and man was made a living soul" does not mean that a soul was then given to the first man for the first time. In their view, the soul already present in him was given life by the Holy Spirit. They are swayed by the fact that the Lord Jesus, after he rose from the dead, breathed on his disciples and said: "Receive the Holy Spirit." From this they suppose that something happened like what happened then, as if here too the evangelist had gone on to say, "And they were made a living soul." If that had been said, we would take it to mean that the Spirit of God is a kind of life of souls. Without this Spirit, rational souls must be counted dead, even though bodies seem to live by their presence.[35]

34 1 Corinthians 15:22.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Sed non ita factum, quando est conditus homo, satis ipsa libri uerba testantur, quae ita se habent: Et formauit Deus hominem puluerem de terra. Quod quidam planius interpretandum putantes dixerunt: Et finxit Deus hominem de limo terrae, quoniam superius dictum fuerat: Fons autem ascendebat de terra et inrigabat omnem faciem terrae; ut ex hoc limus intellegendus uideretur, umore scilicet terraque concretus. Ubi enim hoc dictum est, continuo sequitur: Et formauit Deus hominem puluerem de terra, sicut Graeci codices habent, unde in Latinam linguam scriptura ipsa conuersa est. Siue autem formauit siue finxit quis dicere uoluerit, quod Graece dicitur ἔπλασεν, ad rem nihil interest; magis tamen proprie dicitur finxit.

But the very words of the book are enough to show that this is not what happened when man was created. They run as follows: "And God formed man as dust from the earth." Some people thought this should be translated more plainly and rendered it: "And God fashioned man from the mud of the earth." They did so because just before it had been said: "But a spring rose up from the earth and watered the whole face of the earth." From this it seemed that mud was meant, compacted of moisture and earth. For immediately after these words there follows: "And God formed man as dust from the earth." That is the reading of the Greek manuscripts from which the Scripture was translated into Latin. The Greek says ἔπλασεν [he molded]. Whether one chooses to render it "formed" or "fashioned" makes no difference to the matter, though "fashioned" is the more precise term.[36]

Sed ambiguitas uisa est deuitanda eis, qui formauit dicere maluerunt, eo quod in Latina lingua illud magis obtinuit consuetudo, ut hi dicantur fingere, qui aliquid mendacio simulante conponunt. Hunc igitur formatum hominem de terrae puluere siue limo (erat enim puluis umectus) — hunc, inquam, ut expressius dicam, sicut scriptura locuta est, puluerem de terra animale corpus factum esse docet apostolus, cum animam accepit: Et factus est iste homo in animam uiuentem, id est, formatus iste puluis factus est in animam uiuentem.

But those who preferred to say "formed" thought an ambiguity should be avoided, because in Latin usage the word fingere has come to be applied mostly to people who put something together by lying pretense. This man, then, formed from the dust or mud of the earth (for it was moistened dust)—this man, I say, or, to put it more exactly in Scripture's own words, this "dust from the earth"—became an animal body, so the apostle teaches, when he received a soul: "And this man was made a living soul," that is, this formed dust was made a living soul.

Iam, inquiunt, habebat animam, alioquin non appellaretur homo, quoniam homo non est corpus solum uel anima sola, sed qui et anima constat et corpore. Hoc quidem uerum est, quod non totus homo, sed pars melior hominis anima est; nec totus homo corpus, sed inferior hominis pars est; sed cum est utrumque coniunctum simul, habet hominis nomen; quod tamen et singula non amittunt, etiam cum de singulis loquimur. Quis enim dicere prohibetur cottidiani quadam lege sermonis: Homo ille defunctus est et nunc in requie est uel in poenis, cum de anima sola possit hoc dici, et: Illo aut illo loco homo ille sepultus est, cum hoc nisi de solo corpore non possit intellegi? An dicturi sunt sic loqui scripturam non solere diuinam?

"He already had a soul," they say, "otherwise he would not have been called a man, since a man is not a body alone or a soul alone, but what consists of both soul and body." This much is true: the soul is not the whole man but the better part of a man, and the body is not the whole man but the lower part of a man. When both are joined together, the whole bears the name "man." Yet each part does not lose that name even when we speak of the parts separately. For who is forbidden, by a kind of rule of everyday speech, to say, "That man has died and is now at rest," or "in torment," though this can be said of the soul alone? Or, "That man is buried in such and such a place," though this can

35 John 20:22.

36 Genesis 2:7 and 2:6. "Fashioned" renders Latin finxit, from fingere, which can also mean "to invent" or "to feign."

LATIN	ENGLISH
	be understood only of the body alone? Or will they say that divine Scripture does not usually speak this way?
Immo uero illa ita nobis in hoc adtestatur, ut etiam cum duo ista coniuncta sunt et uiuit homo, tamen etiam singula hominis uocabulo appellet, animam scilicet interiorem hominem, corpus autem exteriorem hominem uocans, tamquam duo sint homines, cum simul utrumque sit homo unus. Sed intellegendum est, secundum quid dicatur homo ad imaginem Dei et homo terra adque iturus in terram. Illud enim secundum animam rationalem dicitur, qualem Deus insufflando uel, si commodius dicitur, inspirando indidit homini, id est hominis corpori; hoc autem secundum corpus, qualem hominem Deus finxit ex puluere, cui data est anima, ut fieret corpus animale, id est homo in animam uiuentem.	On the contrary, Scripture so supports us on this point that, even when these two are joined and a man is alive, it still calls each of them by the name "man," calling the soul the inner man and the body the outer man, as if there were two men, though together both are one man. But we must understand in what respect man is said to be in the image of God, and in what respect man is said to be earth and destined to return to the earth. The first is said with respect to the rational soul, such as God placed in man—that is, in man's body—by breathing on him or, if it is better put, by breathing into him. The second is said with respect to the body, such as the man whom God fashioned from dust, to whom a soul was given so that he might become an animal body, that is, a man made a living soul.
Quapropter in eo, quod Dominus fecit, quando insufflauit dicens: Accipite Spiritum sanctum, nimirum hoc intellegi uoluit, quod Spiritus sanctus non tantum sit Patris, uerum etiam ipsius Unigeniti Spiritus. Idem ipse est quippe Spiritus, et Patris et Filii, cum quo est trinitas Pater et Filius et Spiritus sanctus, non creatura, sed Creator. Neque enim flatus ille corporeus de carnis ore procedens substantia erat Spiritus sancti adque natura, sed potius significatio, qua intellegeremus, ut dixi, Spiritum sanctum Patri esse Filioque communem, quia non sunt eis singulis singuli, sed unus amborum est.	Therefore, in what the Lord did when he breathed on them, saying, "Receive the Holy Spirit," he surely meant it to be understood that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit not only of the Father but also of the Only-begotten himself. For he is one and the same Spirit, of the Father and of the Son, with whom the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are the Trinity—not a creature, but the Creator. For that bodily breath coming from a mouth of flesh was not the substance and nature of the Holy Spirit. It was rather a sign by which we might understand, as I said, that the Holy Spirit is common to the Father and the Son, since there is not a separate spirit for each of them, but one Spirit of both.[37]

BREATH AND SPIRIT

Genesis uses the Greek pnoē, breath, not pneuma, spirit, so Adam's soul was created.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Semper autem iste Spiritus in scripturis sanctis Graeco uocabulo πνεῦμα dicitur, sicut eum et hoc loco Iesus appellauit, quando eum corporalis sui oris flatu significans discipulis dedit; et locis omnibus diuinorum eloquiorum non mihi aliter umquam nuncupatus occurrit. Hic uero, ubi legitur: Et finxit Deus hominem puluerem de terra et insufflauit siue inspirauit in faciem eius spiritum uitae, non ait Graecus πνεῦμα, quod solet	Now in the Holy Scriptures this Spirit is always called by the Greek word πνεῦμα [spirit], as Jesus also called him in this passage when he gave him to the disciples, signifying him by the breath of his bodily mouth; and in all the passages of the divine oracles I have never found him named in any other way. But here, where we read, "And God

37 John 20:22.

LATIN

dici Spiritus sanctus, sed πνοήν, quod nomen in creatura quam in Creatore frequentius legitur; unde nonnulli etiam Latini propter differentiam hoc uocabulum non spiritum, sed flatum appellare maluerunt. Hoc enim est in Graeco etiam illo loco aput Esaiam, ubi Deus dicit: Omnem flatum ego feci, omnem animam sine dubitatione significans.

Quod itaque Graece πνοή dicitur, nostri aliquando flatum, aliquando spiritum, aliquando inspirationem uel aspirationem, quando etiam Dei dicitur, interpretati sunt; πνεῦμα uero numquam nisi spiritum, siue hominis (de quo ait apostolus: Quis enim scit hominum quae sunt hominis, nisi spiritus hominis qui in ipso est?) siue pecoris (sicut in Salomonis libro scriptum est: Quis scit si spiritus hominis ascendat sursum in caelum et spiritus pecoris descendat deorsum in terram?)

siue istum corporeum, qui etiam uentus dicitur, (nam eius hoc nomen est, ubi in psalmo canitur: Ignis, grando, nix, glacies spiritus tempestatis) siue iam non creatum, sed Creatorem, sicut est de quo dicit Dominus in euangelio: Accipite Spiritum sanctum, eum corporei sui oris flatu significans, et ubi ait: Ite, baptizate omnes gentes in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus sancti, ubi ipsa trinitas excellentissime et euidentissime commendata est, et ubi legitur: Deus spiritus est, et aliis plurimis sacrarum litterarum locis. In his quippe omnibus testimoniis scripturarum, quantum ad Graecos adtinet, non πνοήν uidemus scriptum esse, sed πνεῦμα; quantum autem ad Latinos, non flatum, sed spiritum.

Quapropter in eo, quod scriptum est: Inspirauit, uel si magis proprie dicendum est: Insufflauit in faciem eius spiritum uitae, si Graecus non πνοήν, sicut ibi legitur, sed πνεῦμα; posuisset, nec sic esset consequens, ut Creatorem Spiritum, qui proprie dicitur in trinitate Spiritus sanctus, fashioned man as dust from the earth and breathed upon (or breathed into) his face the spirit of life," the Greek does not say πνεῦμα, the word normally used for the Holy Spirit, but πνοήν [breath], a word found more often of the creature than of the Creator. That is why some Latin translators too, for the sake of the distinction, preferred to render this word not as "spirit" but as "breath." For this is also the word in the Greek in that passage of Isaiah where God says, "I have made every breath," undoubtedly meaning every soul.[38]

ENGLISH

So the word πνοή in Greek our translators have rendered sometimes as "breath," sometimes as "spirit," sometimes as "inspiration" or "aspiration," even when it is used of God. But πνεῦμα they have never rendered except as "spirit"—whether the spirit of man (of which the apostle says, "For what man knows the things of a man, except the spirit of man that is in him?"), or the spirit of a beast (as is written in the book of Solomon: "Who knows whether the spirit of man goes up into heaven, and the spirit of the beast goes down into the earth?"),[39] or this bodily spirit, which is also called wind (for that is its name where the psalm sings, "Fire, hail, snow, ice, the spirit of the storm"), or even the Spirit who is not created but the Creator. This last is the Spirit of whom the Lord says in the gospel, "Receive the Holy Spirit," signifying him by the breath of his bodily mouth. It is also he of whom he says, "Go, baptize all nations in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," where the Trinity itself is set before us most excellently and most clearly. And it is he of whom we read, "God is spirit," and so in very many other passages of the sacred writings. In all these testimonies of Scripture, as far as the Greek is concerned, we see written not πνοήν [breath] but πνεῦμα [spirit]; and as far as the Latin is concerned, not flatus [breath] but spiritus [spirit].[40]

Therefore, in the text "He breathed into," or, to speak more precisely, "He blew into his face the spirit of life," even if the Greek had put not πνοήν, as we read there, but πνεῦμα, it still would not follow that we were compelled to understand the 38 Isaiah 57:16.

39 1 Corinthians 2:11; Ecclesiastes 3:21, a book traditionally ascribed to Solomon.
40 Psalm 148:8; John 20:22; Matthew 28:19; John 4:24.

LATIN

intellegere cogeremur; quando quidem πνεῦμα, ut dictum est, non solum de Creatore, sed etiam de creatura dici solere manifestum est.

Sed cum dixisset, inquiunt, spiritum, non adderet uitae, nisi illum sanctum Spiritum uellet intellegi; et cum dixisset: Factus est homo in animam, non adderet uiuentem, nisi animae uitam significaret, quae illi diuinitus inpertitur dono Spiritus Dei. Cum enim uiuat anima, inquiunt, proprio suae uitae modo, quid opus erat addere uiuentem, nisi ut ea uita intellegeretur, quae illi per sanctum Spiritum datur? Hoc quid est aliud nisi diligenter pro humana suspicione contendere et scripturas sanctas neglegenter adtendere? Quid enim magnum erat non ire longius, sed in eodem ipso libro paulo superius legere: Producat terra animam uiuentem, quando animalia terrestria cuncta creata sunt?

Deinde aliquantis interpositis, in eodem tamen ipso libro quid magnum erat aduertere quod scriptum est: Et omnia, quae habent spiritum uitae, et omnis, qui erat super aridam, mortuus est, cum insinuaret omnia quae uiuebant in terra perisse diluuio? Si ergo et animam uiuentem et spiritum uitae etiam in pecoribus inuenimus, sicut loqui diuina scriptura consueuit, et cum hoc quoque loco, ubi legitur: Omnia quae habent spiritum uitae, non Graecus πνεῦμα, sed πνοήν dixerit: quur non dicimus: Quid opus erat ut adderet uiuentem, cum anima nisi uiuat esse non possit? aut quid opus erat ut adderet uitae, cum dixisset spiritum?

Sed intellegimus animam uiuentem et spiritum uitae scripturam suo more dixisse, cum animalia, id est animata corpora, uellet intellegi, quibus inesset per animam perspicuus iste etiam corporis sensus. In hominis autem conditione obliuiscimur, quem ad modum loqui scriptura consueuerit, cum suo prorsus more locuta sit, quo insinuaret hominem etiam rationali anima accepta, quam non sicut aliarum carnium aquis et terra producentibus, sed Deo flante creatam uoluit intellegi, sic tamen factum, ut in corpore animali, quod fit anima in eo uiuente, sicut illa animalia uiueret, de quibus dixit:

ENGLISH

Creator Spirit, who in the Trinity is properly called the Holy Spirit. For, as has been said, it is clear that πνεῦμα is regularly used not only of the Creator but also of the creature.[41]

"But," they say, "once Scripture had said 'spirit,' it would not have added 'of life' unless it wanted the Holy Spirit to be understood. And once it had said, 'Man was made a soul,' it would not have added 'living' unless it meant the life of the soul, which is imparted to him by God through the gift of the Spirit of God. For since the soul lives by its own proper mode of life," they say, "what need was there to add 'living,' unless what was meant was the life given to it through the Holy Spirit?" What is this but to argue carefully for a human guess and to read the holy Scriptures carelessly? For what great effort would it have been—without going any further—to read a little earlier in that very same book, "Let the earth bring forth the living soul," where all the land animals were created?[42]

Then, a little further on, but still in that same book, what great effort would it have been to notice what is written: "And all things that have the spirit of life, and everyone who was on the dry land, died," where it is indicating that everything that lived on the earth perished in the flood? If, then, we find both "living soul" and "spirit of life" even in beasts, as is the habit of divine Scripture, and if in this passage too, where we read "all things that have the spirit of life," the Greek said not πνεῦμα but πνοήν, why do we not ask, "What need was there to add 'living,' since a soul cannot exist unless it lives?" Or, "What need was there to add 'of life,' once it had said 'spirit'?"[43]

But we understand that Scripture, in its customary way, said "living soul" and "spirit of life" when it wanted animals to be understood—that is, animate bodies, in which there was, through the soul, this evident bodily sense-perception as well. In the creation of man, however, we forget how Scripture usually speaks, even though it spoke there entirely in its usual way. It wanted to indicate that man, although he had also received a rational soul—a soul it wanted us to understand as created not, like that of other flesh, by the waters and the earth bring-

41 Genesis 2:7.
42 Genesis 2:7 and 1:24.
43 Genesis 7:22.

LATIN

Producat terra animam uiuentem, et quae itidem dixit habuisse in se spiritum uitae; ubi etiam in Graeco non dixit πνεῦμα, sed πνοήν; non utique Spiritum sanctum, sed eorum animam tali exprimens nomine.

Sed enim Dei flatus, inquiunt, Dei ore exisse intellegitur, quem si animam crediderimus, consequens erit, ut eiusdem fateamur esse substantiae paremque illius sapientiae, quae dicit: Ego ex ore Altissimi prodii. Non quidem dixit sapientia ore Dei efflatam se fuisse, sed ex eius ore prodisse. Sicut autem nos possumus non de nostra natura, qua homines sumus, sed de isto aere circumfuso, quem spirando ac respirando ducimus ac reddimus, flatum facere cum sufflamus: ita omnipotens Deus non de sua natura neque subiacenti creatura, sed etiam de nihilo potuit facere flatum, quem corpori hominis inserendo inspirasse uel insufflasse conuenientissime dictus est, incorporeus incorporeum, sed inmutabilis mutabilem, quia non creatus creatum.

Verum tamen ut sciant isti, qui de scripturis loqui uolunt et scripturarum locutiones non aduertunt, non hoc solum dici exire ex ore Dei, quod est aequalis eiusdemque naturae, audiant uel legant quod Deo dicente scriptum est: Quoniam tepidus es et neque calidus neque frigidus, incipiam te reicere ex ore meo.

Nulla itaque causa est, quur apertissime loquenti resistamus apostolo, ubi ab spiritali corpore corpus animale discernens, id est ab illo in quo futuri sumus hoc in quo nunc sumus, ait: Seminatur corpus animale, surget corpus spiritale; si est corpus animale, est et spiritale; sic et scriptum est: Factus est primus homo Adam in animam uiuentem, nouissimus Adam in spiritum uiuificantem.

ENGLISH

ing it forth, but by God breathing—was nevertheless made in such a way that, in an animal body (which comes to be through a soul living in it), he would live as those animals lived of which it said, "Let the earth bring forth the living soul," and which it likewise said had in them the spirit of life. There too, even in the Greek, it said not πνεῦμα but πνοήν, certainly expressing by that name not the Holy Spirit but their soul.

"But God's breath," they say, "is understood to have come out of God's mouth. If we believe that it is the soul, it will follow that we must confess it to be of the same substance as that Wisdom, and equal to her, who says, 'I came forth from the mouth of the Most High.'" Wisdom, however, did not say that she had been breathed out of God's mouth, but that she had come forth from his mouth. Now we, when we blow, can make a breath not out of our own nature, by which we are human beings, but out of the air around us, which we draw in and give back as we breathe in and out. In the same way almighty God could make a breath not out of his own nature, nor out of some underlying creature, but even out of nothing. And by putting it into the man's body he is most fittingly said to have breathed or blown it in—the incorporeal breathing the incorporeal, but the unchangeable the changeable, because the uncreated breathed the created.[44]

Even so, these people want to talk about the Scriptures without paying attention to the Scriptures' ways of speaking. So that they may know that "to come out of the mouth of God" is not said only of what is equal to him and of the same nature, let them hear or read what is written, where God says: "Because you are lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I am about to spit you out of my mouth."[45]

There is therefore no reason for us to resist the apostle when he speaks so very plainly. He distinguishes the animal body from the spiritual body, that is, the body we are in now from the one we shall be in, and says: "It is sown an animal body; it will rise a spiritual body. If there is an animal body, there is also a spiritual one. So it is also writ-

44 Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 24:3.
45 Revelation 3:16.

LATIN

Sed non primum quod spiritale est, sed quod animale, postea spiritale. Primus homo de terra terrenus, secundus homo de caelo caelestis. Qualis terrenus, tales et terreni, et qualis caelestis, tales et caelestes. Et quo modo induimus imaginem terreni, induamus et imaginem eius qui de caelo est. De quibus omnibus apostolicis uerbis superius locuti sumus.

Corpus igitur animale, in quo primum hominem Adam factum esse dicit apostolus, sic erat factum, non ut mori omnino non posset, sed ut non moreretur, nisi homo peccasset. Nam illud, quod spiritu uiuificante spiritale erit et inmortale, mori omnino non poterit, sicut anima creata est inmortalis, quae licet peccato mortua perhibeatur carens quadam uita sua, hoc est dei Spiritu, quo etiam sapienter et beate uiuere poterat, tamen propria quadam, licet misera, uita sua non desinit uiuere, quia inmortalis est creata; sicut etiam desertores angeli, licet secundum quendam modum mortui sint peccando, quia fontem uitae deseruerunt, qui Deus est, quem potando sapienter et beate poterant uiuere, tamen non sic mori potuerunt, ut omni modo desisterent uiuere adque sentire, quoniam inmortales creati sunt; adque ita in secundam mortem post ultimum praecipitabuntur iudicium, ut nec illic uita careant, quando quidem etiam sensu, cum in doloribus futuri sunt, non carebunt.

Sed homines ad Dei gratiam pertinentes, ciues sanctorum angelorum in beata uita manentium, ita spiritalibus corporibus induentur, ut neque peccent amplius neque moriantur; ea tamen inmortalitate uestiti, quae sicut angelorum, nec peccato possit auferri; natura quidem manente carnis, sed nulla omnino carnali corruptibilitate uel tarditate remanente.

Sequitur autem quaestio necessario pertractanda et Domino Deo ueritatis adiuuante soluenda: Si libido membrorum inoboedientium ex peccato inoboedientiae in illis primis hominibus, cum illos diuina gratia ten: 'The first man, Adam, was made a living soul; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit.' But it is not the spiritual that comes first, but the animal, and afterward the spiritual. The first man was from the earth, earthly; the second man is from heaven, heavenly. As was the earthly, so are those who are earthly; and as is the heavenly, so are those who are heavenly. And just as we have put on the image of the earthly, let us also put on the image of the one who is from heaven." We have already discussed all these words of the apostle above.[46]

ENGLISH

The animal body, then, in which the apostle says the first man, Adam, was made, was made in such a way that it was not altogether unable to die, but would not die unless man sinned. For the body that will be spiritual and immortal through the life-giving spirit will be altogether unable to die, just as the soul was created immortal. The soul, it is true, is said to be dead through sin, since it lacks a certain life of its own, that is, the Spirit of God, by whom it could also live wisely and happily. Yet it does not cease to live by a certain life of its own, however miserable, because it was created immortal. So too the deserter angels: although in a certain sense they died by sinning, because they deserted the fountain of life, which is God, by drinking from whom they could have lived wisely and happily, they still could not die in such a way as to cease entirely from living and feeling, since they were created immortal. And so, after the last judgment, they will be hurled into the second death in such a way that not even there will they lack life, since they will not lack even feeling when they are in torment.

But human beings who belong to the grace of God, fellow citizens of the holy angels who abide in the happy life, will be clothed with spiritual bodies in such a way that they will neither sin any more nor die. They will be clothed with an immortality that, like the angels', cannot be taken away even by sin. The nature of flesh will indeed remain, but no carnal corruptibility or sluggishness of any kind will remain.

There follows, however, a question that must be thoroughly examined and, with the help of the Lord God of truth, resolved. The lust of the dis-

46 1 Corinthians 15:44–49; the inner quotation is Genesis 2:7.

LATIN

deseruisset, exorta est; unde in suam nuditatem oculos aperuerunt, id est eam curiosius aduerterunt, et quia inpudens motus uoluntatis arbitrio resistebat, pudenda texerunt: quo modo essent filios propagaturi, si, ut creati fuerant, sine praeuaricatione mansissent. Sed quia et liber iste claudendus est nec tanta quaestio in sermonis angustias coartanda, in eum qui sequitur commodiore dispositione differtur.

ENGLISH

obedient members arose in those first human beings from the sin of disobedience, when divine grace had deserted them. That is why their eyes were opened to their nakedness, that is, they paid it more inquisitive attention; and because that shameless motion resisted the choice of the will, they covered their shameful parts. If so, how would they have propagated children if they had remained as they had been created, without transgression? But since this book must be brought to a close, and so great a question should not be squeezed into the narrow limits of a short discussion, it is postponed to the next book, where it can be treated more conveniently.

Book XIV

Sin, the passions, and two loves
Living by the flesh and by the spirit; the first sin; two loves made two cities.

THAT BECAUSE OF THE DISOBEDIENCE OF THE FIRST MAN, ALL WOULD HAVE FALLEN INTO THE ENDLESSNESS OF THE SECOND DEATH, HAD NOT GOD'S GRACE FREED MANY

One sin brought death to all, and humanity divides into two cities, of the flesh and of the spirit.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.1	Diximus iam superioribus libris ad humanum genus non solum naturae similitudine sociandum, uerum etiam quadam cognationis necessitudine in unitatem concordem pacis uinculo conligandum ex homine uno Deum uoluisse homines instituere, neque hoc genus fuisse in singulis quibusque moriturum, nisi duo primi, quorum creatus est unus ex nullo, altera ex illo, id inoboedientia meruissent, a quibus admissum est tam grande peccatum, ut in deterius eo natura mutaretur humana, etiam in posteros obligatione peccati et mortis necessitate transmissa. Mortis autem regnum in homines usque adeo dominatum est, ut omnes in secundam quoque mortem, cuius nullus est finis, poena debita praecipites ageret, nisi inde quosdam indebita Dei gratia liberaret.	We have already said in the earlier books that God chose to create human beings from one man. He did this so that the human race might be united not only by likeness of nature but also bound by a kind of family kinship into a harmonious unity, by the bond of peace. We also said that this race would not have died, person by person, had not the first two deserved it by disobedience. Of these two, one was created from nothing and the other from him. They committed so great a sin that human nature was changed for the worse by it, and the liability to sin and the necessity of death were passed on to their descendants as well. The reign of death came to dominate human beings so completely that the punishment they deserved would have driven them all headlong into the second death as well, which has no end, had not the undeserved grace of God set some free from it.
	Ac per hoc factum est, ut, cum tot tantaeque gentes per terrarum orbem diuersis ritibus moribusque uiuentes multiplici linguarum armorum uestium sint uarietate distinctae, non tamen amplius quam duo quaedam genera humanae societatis existerent, quas ciuitates duas secundum scripturas nostras merito appellare pos semus. Una quippe est hominum secundum carnem, altera secundum spiritum uiuere in sui cuiusque generis pace uolentium et, cum id quod expetunt adsequuntur, in sui cuiusque generis pace uiuentium.	And so it has come about that there are so many great nations throughout the world, living by different rites and customs and distinguished by a manifold variety of languages, weapons and dress. Even so, there have arisen no more than two kinds of human society, which, following our Scriptures, we may rightly call two cities. One is the city of those who wish to live according to the flesh, the other of those who wish to live according to the spirit, each in its own kind of peace. And when they obtain what they seek, each lives in its own kind of peace.

LIVING ACCORDING TO THE FLESH, WHICH MUST BE UNDERSTOOD TO COME FROM THE VICES NOT ONLY OF THE BODY BUT ALSO OF THE MIND

In Scripture flesh can mean the whole person, so the works of the flesh include vices of the mind.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.2	Prius ergo uidendum est, quid sit secundum carnem, quid secundum spiritum uiuere. Quisquis enim hoc quod diximus prima fronte inspicit, uel non recolens uel minus aduertens quem ad modum scripturae sanctae loquantur, potest putare philosophos quidem Epicureos secundum carnem uiuere, quia summum bonum hominis in corporis uoluptate posuerunt, et si qui alii sunt, qui quoquo modo corporis bonum summum bonum esse hominis opinati sunt, et eorum omne uulgus, qui non aliquo dogmate uel eo modo philosophantur, sed procliues ad libidinem nisi ex uoluptatibus, quas corporeis sensibus capiunt, gaudere nesciunt; Stoicos autem, qui summum bonum hominis in animo ponunt, secundum spiritum uiuere, quia et hominis animus quid est nisi spiritus? Sed sicut loquitur scriptura diuina, secundum carnem uiuere utrique monstrantur.	First, then, we must see what it is to live according to the flesh, and what it is to live according to the spirit. Someone may look at what we have said only at first glance, either not remembering or not noticing how the holy Scriptures speak. Such a person may think that the Epicurean philosophers live according to the flesh, because they placed man's supreme good in bodily pleasure. He may think the same of any others who held in any way that the good of the body is man's supreme good. He may also include the whole mass of those who do not philosophize by any doctrine or in that manner at all, but who are prone to lust and know no joy except from the pleasures they take through the bodily senses. The Stoics, on the other hand, place man's supreme good in the mind, so he may think that they live according to the spirit. After all, what is the human mind but spirit? But as divine Scripture speaks, both are shown to live according to the flesh.
	Carnem quippe appellat non solum corpus terreni adque mortalis animantis (ueluti cum dicit: Non omnis caro eadem caro; alia quidem hominis, alia autem caro pecoris, alia uolucrum, alia piscium), sed et aliis multis modis significatione huius nominis utitur, inter quos uarios locutionis modos saepe etiam ipsum hominem, id est naturam hominis, carnem nuncupat, modo locutionis a parte totum, quale est: Ex operibus legis non iustificabitur omnis caro. Quid enim uoluit intellegi nisi omnis homo? Quod apertius paulo post ait: In lege nemo iustificatur, et ad Galatas: Scientes autem quia non iustificatur homo ex operibus legis. Secundum hoc intellegitur: Et Verbum caro factum est, id est homo; quod non recte accipientes quidam putauerunt Christo humanam animam defuisse.	For Scripture calls "flesh" not only the body of an earthly and mortal living creature, as when it says, "Not all flesh is the same flesh: there is one flesh of human beings, another of cattle, another of birds, another of fish." It also uses this word in many other senses. Among these various ways of speaking, it often calls man himself, that is, human nature, "flesh," by the figure of speech that names the whole from the part. An example is "No flesh will be justified by the works of the law." For what did it mean us to understand but every human being? He says this more plainly a little later: "In the law no one is justified." And he writes to the Galatians: "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law." In this sense we understand "And the Word became flesh," that is, man. Some have taken this wrongly and supposed that Christ lacked a human soul.[1]
	Sicut enim a toto pars accipitur, ubi Mariae Magdalenae uerba in euangelio leguntur dicentis: Tulerunt Dominum meum et nescio ubi posuerunt eum, cum de sola Christi carne loqueretur, quam sepultam de monumento putabat	The part is understood from the whole where we read in the Gospel the words of Mary Magdalene: "They have taken away my Lord, and I do not know where they have laid him." She was speak-

1 1 Corinthians 15:39; Romans 3:20; Galatians 3:11; Galatians 2:16; John 1:14.

LATIN

ablatam: ita et a parte totum carne nominata intellegitur homo, sicuti ea sunt quae supra commemorauimus.

Cum igitur multis modis, quos perscrutari et colligere longum est, diuina scriptura nuncupet carnem: quid sit secundum carnem uiuere (quod profecto malum est, cum ipsa carnis natura non sit malum) ut indagare possimus, inspiciamus diligenter illum locum epistulae Pauli apostoli quam scripsit ad Galatas, ubi ait: Manifesta autem sunt opera carnis, quae sunt fornicationes, inmunditiae, luxuria, idolorum seruitus, ueneficia, inimicitiae, contentiones, aemulationes, animositates, dissensiones, haereses, inuidiae, ebrietates, comisationes et his similia; quae praedico uobis, sicut praedixi, quoniam qui talia agunt regnum Dei non possidebunt. Iste totus epistulae apostolicae locus, quantum ad rem praesentem satis esse uidebitur, consideratus poterit hanc dissoluere quaestionem, quid sit secundum carnem uiuere.

In operibus namque carnis, quae manifesta esse dixit eaque commemorata damnauit, non illa tantum inuenimus, quae ad uoluptatem pertinent carnis, sicuti sunt fornicationes, inmunditiae, luxuria, ebrietates, comisationes; uerum etiam illa, quibus animi uitia demonstrantur a uoluptate carnis aliena. Quis enim seruitutem, quae idolis exhibetur, ueneficia, inimicitias, contentiones, aemulationes, animositates, dissensiones, haereses, inuidias non potius intellegat animi uitia esse quam carnis? Quando quidem fieri potest, ut propter idololatriam uel haeresis alicuius errorem a uoluptatibus corporis temperetur; et tamen etiam tunc homo, quamuis carnis libidines continere adque cohibere uideatur, secundum carnem uiuere hac apostolica auctoritate conuincitur, et in eo, quod abstinet a uoluptatibus carnis, damnabilia opera carnis agere demonstratur. Quis inimicitias non in animo habeat?

aut quis ita loquatur, ut inimico suo uel quem putat inimicum dicat: Malam carnem, ac non potius: Malum

ENGLISH

ing only of Christ's flesh, which she thought had been buried and then taken from the tomb. In just the same way, the whole is understood from the part when man is called "flesh," as in the passages we mentioned above.[2]

Divine Scripture, then, uses the word "flesh" in many senses, which it would take too long to examine and collect. We want to discover what it is to live according to the flesh, which is certainly evil, though the nature of the flesh itself is not evil. To find out, let us look carefully at the passage of the letter that the apostle Paul wrote to the Galatians, where he says: "Now the works of the flesh are plain: they are fornications, impurities, licentiousness, the service of idols, sorceries, enmities, strife, jealousies, animosities, dissensions, heresies, envyings, drunkenness, carousings, and things like these. I warn you, as I warned you before, that those who do such things will not possess the kingdom of God." This whole passage of the apostle's letter, considered as far as seems sufficient for the present matter, will be able to settle this question of what it is to live according to the flesh.[3]

He said the works of the flesh were plain, and he listed and condemned them. Among them we find not only those that belong to the pleasure of the flesh, such as fornications, impurities, licentiousness, drunkenness and carousings. We also find those that reveal vices of the mind which have nothing to do with the pleasure of the flesh. For who would not understand the service paid to idols, sorceries, enmities, strife, jealousies, animosities, dissensions, heresies and envyings to be vices of the mind rather than of the flesh? Indeed, it can happen that someone abstains from bodily pleasures for the sake of idolatry or through the error of some heresy. Yet even then, though he seems to restrain and curb the lusts of the flesh, this apostolic authority convicts him of living according to the flesh. In the very act of abstaining from the pleasures of the flesh, he is shown to be doing damnable works of the flesh. Who does not harbor enmities in his mind?

Or who would speak to his enemy, or to someone he thinks his enemy, and say, "Your flesh is ill-dis-

2 John 20:13.
3 Galatians 5:19–21.

LATIN

animum habes aduersus me? Postremo sicut carnalitates, ut ita dicam, si quis audisset, non dubitaret carni tribuere, ita nemo dubitat animositates ad animum pertinere. Quur ergo haec omnia et his similia doctor gentium in fide et ueritate opera carnis appellat, nisi quia eo locutionis modo, quo totum significatur a parte, ipsum hominem uult nomine carnis intellegi?

ENGLISH

posed toward me," rather than, "Your mind is ill-disposed toward me"? Finally, anyone who heard of "carnalities," if I may use the word, would not hesitate to assign them to the flesh. In the same way, no one doubts that animosities belong to the mind (animus). Why, then, does the teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth call all these things, and others like them, works of the flesh? It can only be because he wants the word "flesh" to be understood as man himself, by the figure of speech in which the whole is signified by the part.[4]

THAT THE CAUSE OF SIN CAME FROM THE SOUL, NOT FROM THE FLESH, AND THAT THE CORRUPTION CONTRACTED FROM SIN IS NOT SIN BUT PUNISHMENT

Sin began in the soul, not the flesh: the devil has no body, yet is supremely proud and envious.

LATIN

14.3 Quod si quisquam dicit carnem causam esse in malis moribus quorumcumque uitiorum, eo quod anima carne adfecta sic uiuit, profecto non uniuersam hominis naturam diligenter aduertit. Nam corpus quidem corruptibile adgrauat animam. Unde etiam idem apostolus agens de hoc corruptibili corpore, de quo paulo ante dixerat: Etsi exterior homo noster corrumpitur: Scimus, inquit, quia, terrena nostra domus habitationis resoluatur, aedificationem habemus ex Deo, domum non manu factam aeternam in caelis. Etenim in hoc ingemescimus, habitaculum nostrum quod de caelo est superindui cupientes; si tamen et induti, non nudi inueniamur. Etenim qui sumus in hac habitatione, ingemescimus grauati, in quo nolumus exspoliari, sed superuestiri, ut absorbeatur mortale a uita.

Et adgrauamur ergo corruptibili corpore, et ipsius adgrauationis causam non naturam substantiamque corporis, sed eius corruptionem scientes nolumus corpore spoliari, sed eius inmortalitate uestiri. Et tunc enim erit, sed quia corruptibile non erit, non grauabit. Adgrauat ergo nunc animam corpus corruptibile, et deprimit terrena inhabitatio sensum multa cogitantem. Verum tamen qui omnia mala animae ex corpore putant accidisse, in errore sunt.

ENGLISH

Someone may say that the flesh is the cause of every kind of vice in bad conduct, on the ground that the soul lives as it does because it is affected by the flesh. If so, he has certainly not paid careful attention to the whole nature of man. It is true that "the corruptible body weighs down the soul." So the same apostle also discusses this corruptible body, of which he had said a little earlier, "Even though our outer man is being corrupted." He says: "We know that if our earthly house, our dwelling, is dissolved, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, longing to be clothed over with our dwelling that is from heaven, if indeed, having been clothed, we shall not be found naked. For we who are in this dwelling groan, being weighed down, because we do not wish to be stripped but to be clothed over, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life."[5]

So we are weighed down by the corruptible body. Yet we know that the cause of this burden is not the nature and substance of the body but its corruption. For that reason we do not wish to be stripped of the body, but to be clothed with its immortality. For then too there will be a body, but because it will not be corruptible, it will not be a burden. For now, then, "the corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly dwelling presses down the mind that ponders many

4 "Teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth" is Paul's description of himself in 1 Timothy 2:7.
5 Wisdom 9:15; 2 Corinthians 4:16 and 5:1–4.

LATIN

Quamuis enim Vergilius Platonicam uideatur luculentis uersibus explicare sententiam dicens: Igneus est illis uigor et caelestis origo
Seminibus, quantum non noxia corpora tardant Terrenique hebetant artus moribundaque membra, omnesque illas notissimas quattuor animi perturbationes, cupiditatem timorem, laetitiam tristitiam, quasi origines omnium peccatorum adque uitiorum uolens intellegi ex corpore accidere subiungat et dicat: Hinc metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque, nec auras Suspiciunt, clausae tenebris et carcere caeco: tamen aliter se habet fides nostra. Nam corruptio corporis, quae adgrauat animam, non peccati primi est causa, sed poena; nec caro corruptibilis animam peccatricem, sed anima peccatrix fecit esse corruptibilem carnem.

Ex qua corruptione carnis licet existant quaedam incitamenta uitiorum et ipsa desideria uitiosa, non tamen omnia uitae iniquae uitia tribuenda sunt carni, ne ab his omnibus purgemus diabolum, qui non habet carnem. Etsi enim diabolus fornicator uel ebriosus uel si quid huius modi mali est, quod ad carnis pertinet uoluptates, non potest dici, cum sit etiam talium peccatorum suasor et instigator occultus: est tamen maxime superbus adque inuidus. Quae illum uitiositas sic obtinuit, ut propter hanc esset in carceribus caliginosi huius aeris aeterno supplicio destinatus. Haec autem uitia, quae tenent in diabolo principatum, carni tribuit apostolus, quam certum est diabolum non habere.

Dicit enim inimicitias, contentiones, aemulationes, animositates, inuidias opera esse carnis; quorum omnium malorum caput adque origo superbia est, quae sine carne regnat in diabolo. Quis autem illo est inimicior sanctis? Quis aduersus eos contentiosior, animosior et magis aemulus adque inuidus inuenitur? At haec omnia cum habeat sine carne, quo modo sunt ista opera carnis, nisi quia opera sunt hominis, quem, sicut dixi, nomine carnis appellat? Non enim habendo carnem, quam non habet diabolus, sed uiuendo secundum se ipsum, hoc est secundum hominem, factus est homo similis diabolo; quia et ille secundum se ipsum uiuere uoluit, quando in things." Yet those who think that all the evils of the soul have come from the body are mistaken.

ENGLISH

Virgil, it is true, seems to set out the Platonic view in splendid verses when he says: "Those seeds have a fiery vigor and a heavenly origin, so far as harmful bodies do not slow them, and earthly limbs and dying members do not dull them." He wants all four of the well-known disturbances of the mind (desire and fear, joy and sorrow) to be understood as arising from the body, as the origins, so to speak, of all sins and vices. So he goes on to say: "Hence they fear and desire, grieve and rejoice, and do not look up to the open air, shut in darkness and a blind prison." But our faith holds otherwise. For the corruption of the body, which weighs down the soul, is not the cause of the first sin but its punishment. It was not corruptible flesh that made the soul sinful; it was the sinful soul that made the flesh corruptible.[6]

Certain incitements to vice, and vicious desires themselves, may arise from this corruption of the flesh. Still, not all the vices of a wicked life are to be attributed to the flesh. Otherwise we would clear the devil of all of them, since he has no flesh. The devil cannot be called a fornicator or a drunkard, or anything else of this evil kind that belongs to the pleasures of the flesh, though he is the secret persuader and instigator even of such sins. Even so, he is supremely proud and envious. This viciousness took such hold of him that because of it he was destined to eternal punishment in the prison of this murky air. Yet these vices, which hold first place in the devil, the apostle attributes to the flesh, which the devil certainly does not have.

For he says that enmities, strife, jealousies, animosities and envyings are works of the flesh. The head and origin of all these evils is pride, which reigns in the devil without any flesh. Who is more hostile to the saints than he is? Who is found more contentious against them, more full of animosity, more jealous and envious? Yet he has all these without flesh. How, then, are they works of the flesh, unless because they are works of man, whom, as I said, the apostle calls by the name of flesh? For man has become like the devil not by 6 Virgil, Aeneid 6.730–734, where Aeneas' father Anchises explains the nature of souls in the underworld.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ueritate non stetit, ut non de Dei, sed de suo mendacium loqueretur, qui non solum mendax, uerum etiam mendacii pater est.	having flesh, which the devil does not have, but by living according to himself, that is, according to man. The devil too wished to live according to himself when he did not stand fast in the truth. So he spoke a lie out of what was his own, not out of what was God's. For he is not only a liar but the father of lies.[7]
Primus est quippe mentitus, et a quo peccatum, ab illo coepit esse mendacium.	He was, after all, the first to lie, and lying began with the one with whom sin began.

WHAT IT IS TO LIVE ACCORDING TO MAN, AND WHAT ACCORDING TO GOD

To live according to man rather than according to God is to live a lie, like the devil.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.4 Cum ergo uiuit homo secundum hominem, non secundum Deum, similis est diabolo; quia nec angelo secundum angelum, sed secundum Deum uiuendum fuit, ut staret in ueritate et ueritatem de illius, non de suo mendacium loqueretur. Nam et de homine alio loco idem apostolus ait: Si autem ueritas Dei in meo mendacio abundauit. Nostrum dixit mendacium, ueritatem Dei. Cum itaque uiuit homo secundum ueritatem, non uiuit secundum se ipsum, sed secundum Deum. Deus est enim qui dixit: Ego sum ueritas.	So when man lives according to man and not according to God, he is like the devil. For not even an angel should have lived according to an angel. He should have lived according to God, so as to stand fast in the truth and speak truth from what is God's, not lies from what is his own. The same apostle says of man as well, in another place: "But if the truth of God has abounded through my lie." He called the lie ours and the truth God's. So when man lives according to truth, he does not live according to himself but according to God. For it is God who said, "I am the truth."[8]
Cum uero uiuit secundum se ipsum, hoc est secundum hominem, non secundum Deum, profecto secundum mendacium uiuit; non quia homo ipse mendacium est, cum sit eius auctor et creator Deus, qui non est utique auctor creatorque mendacii, sed quia homo ita factus est rectus, ut non secundum se ipsum, sed secundum eum, a quo factus est, uiueret, id est illius potius quam suam faceret uoluntatem: non ita uiuere, quem ad modum est factus ut uiueret, hoc est mendacium. Beatus quippe uult esse etiam non sic uiuendo ut possit esse. Quid est ista uoluntate mendacius? Unde non frustra dici potest omne peccatum esse mendacium. Non enim fit peccatum nisi ea uoluntate, qua uolumus ut bene sit nobis uel nolumus ut male sit nobis.	But when he lives according to himself, that is, according to man and not according to God, he certainly lives according to a lie. This is not because man himself is a lie, since his author and creator is God, who is surely not the author and creator of a lie. It is because man was made upright on the condition that he should live not according to himself but according to the one who made him. In other words, he was to do God's will rather than his own. Not to live in the way he was made to live: that is the lie. For he wants to be happy even while not living in the way that would allow him to be happy. What could be more of a lie than such a will? So it can be said, not without reason, that every sin is a lie. For sin is committed only by the will by which we want things to go well with us, or do not want them to go badly with us.
Ergo mendacium est, quod, cum fiat ut bene sit nobis, hinc potius male est nobis, uel cum fiat ut melius sit nobis, hinc potius peius est nobis. Unde hoc, nisi quia de	So it is a lie when something is done so that things may go well with us, and instead they go badly for us because of it. It is a lie when something is done

7 John 8:44.
8 Romans 3:7; John 14:6.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Deo potest bene esse homini, quem delinquendo deserit, non de se ipso, secundum quem uiuendo delinquit?	so that things may be better for us, and instead they become worse because of it. Why is this so? It is because man's well-being can come from God, whom he forsakes by sinning, and not from himself, by living according to whom he sins.
Quod itaque diximus, hinc extitisse duas ciuitates diuersas inter se adque contrarias, quod alii secundum carnem, alii secundum spiritum uiuerent: potest etiam isto modo dici quod alii secundum hominem, alii secundum Deum uiuant Apertissime quippe Paulus ad Corinthios dicit: Cum enim sint inter uos aemulatio et contentio, nonne carnales estis et secundum hominem ambulatis? Quod ergo est ambulare secundum hominem, hoc est esse carnalem, quod a carne, id est a parte hominis, intellegitur homo. Eosdem ipsos quippe dixit superius animales, quos postea carnales, ita loquens: Quis enim scit, inquit, hominum, quae sunt hominis, nisi spiritus hominis, qui in ipso est? Sic et quae Dei sunt, nemo scit nisi spiritus Dei.	We said that two cities, different from and opposed to each other, arose from the fact that some live according to the flesh and others according to the spirit. This can also be put another way: some live according to man, others according to God. For Paul says very plainly to the Corinthians: "For since there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not carnal, and walking according to man?" So to walk according to man is the same as to be carnal, since by "flesh," which is a part of man, man is understood. Earlier he called "natural" the very people he afterward called "carnal," speaking thus: "For who among men," he says, "knows the things of a man except the spirit of the man that is in him? So too no one knows the things of God except the Spirit of God."[9]
Nos autem, inquit, non spiritum huius mundi accepimus, sed spiritum qui ex Deo est, ut sciamus quae a Deo donata sunt nobis; quae et loquimur, non in sapientiae humanae doctis uerbis, sed doctis spiritu, spiritalibus spiritalia conparantes. Animalis autem homo non percipit quae sunt spiritus Dei; stultitia est enim illi. Talibus igitur, id est animalibus, paulo post dicit: Et ego, fratres, non potui loqui uobis quasi spiritalibus, sed quasi carnalibus; et illud et hoc eodem loquendi modo, id est a parte totum.	"But we," he says, "have received not the spirit of this world but the Spirit that is from God, so that we may know the things that have been given us by God. These we also speak, not in words taught by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. But the natural man does not perceive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him." To such people, then, that is, to the natural, he says a little later: "And I, brothers, could not speak to you as to spiritual people, but as to carnal." Both the one expression and the other use the same manner of speaking, that is, the whole from the part.[10]
Et ab anima namque et a carne, quae sunt partes hominis, potest totum significari, quod est homo; adque ita non est aliud animalis homo, aliud carnalis, sed idem ipsum est utrumque, id est secundum hominem uiuens homo; sicut non aliud quam homines significantur, siue ubi legitur: Ex operibus legis non iustificabitur omnis caro, siue quod scriptum est: Septuaginta quinque animae descenderunt cum Iacob in Aegyptum. Et ibi enim per omnem carnem omnis homo, et ibi per septuaginta quinque animas septuaginta quinque homines intelleguntur. Et quod	For the whole, which is man, can be signified both by the soul and by the flesh, which are parts of man. And so the natural man is not one thing and the carnal man another. Both are one and the same, namely man living according to man. In the same way, nothing but human beings is meant either where we read, "No flesh will be justified by the works of the law," or where it is written, "Seventy-five souls went down with Jacob into Egypt." In the one, "flesh" is understood as every human

9 1 Corinthians 3:3; 2:11. "Natural" renders animalis (Greek psychikos), formed from anima, "soul"; Augustine's argument turns on this link.
10 1 Corinthians 2:12–14; 3:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
dictum est: Non in sapientiae humanae doctis uerbis, potuit dici: Non in sapientiae carnalis; sicut quod dictum est: Secundum hominem ambulatis, potuit dici: Secundum carnem.	being; in the other, seventy-five souls are understood as seventy-five human beings. And where it says, "not in words taught by human wisdom," it could have said, "not in words of carnal wisdom." Likewise, where it says, "you walk according to man," it could have said, "according to the flesh."[11]
Magis autem hoc apparuit in his quae subiunxit: Cum enim quis dicat: Ego quidem sum Pauli, alius autem: Ego Apollo, nonne homines estis? Quod dicebat: Animales estis, et: Carnales estis, expressius dixit: Homines estis, quod est: Secundum hominem uiuitis, non secundum Deum, secundum quem si uiueretis, di essetis.	This became even clearer in what he added: "For when one says, 'I belong to Paul,' and another, 'I to Apollos,' are you not men?" What he had been saying with "You are natural" and "You are carnal," he put more explicitly with "You are men." That is: "You live according to man, not according to God. If you lived according to him, you would be gods."[12]

THAT THE PLATONISTS' VIEW OF THE NATURE OF BODY AND SOUL IS MORE TOLERABLE THAN THE MANICHEES', YET MUST ITSELF BE REJECTED, SINCE IT ASCRIBES THE CAUSES OF ALL VICES TO THE NATURE OF THE FLESH

The Platonists, though wiser than the Manichaeans, wrongly blame the body for the soul's disturbances.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.5 Non igitur opus est in peccatis uitiisque nostris ad Creatoris iniuriam carnis accusare naturam, quae in genere adque ordine suo bona est; sed deserto Creatore bono uiuere secundum creatum bonum non est bonum, siue quisque secundum carnem siue secundum animam siue secundum totum hominem, qui ex anima constat et carne (unde et nomine solius animae et nomine solius carnis significari potest) eligat uiuere. Nam qui uelut summum bonum laudat animae naturam et tamquam malum naturam carnis accusat, profecto et animam carnaliter adpetit et carnem carnaliter fugit, quoniam id uanitate sentit humana, non ueritate diuina.	There is no need, then, to blame the nature of the flesh for our sins and vices, to the Creator's dishonor, for in its own kind and order it is good. But to forsake the good Creator and live according to a created good is not good. That is true whether one chooses to live according to the flesh, or according to the soul, or according to the whole man. Man consists of soul and flesh, which is why he can be signified by the name of soul alone or by the name of flesh alone. For whoever praises the nature of the soul as the supreme good and condemns the nature of the flesh as evil certainly both seeks the soul in a carnal way and flees the flesh in a carnal way. His view comes from human vanity, not from divine truth.
Non quidem Platonici sicut Manichaei desipiunt, ut tamquam mali naturam terrena corpora detestentur, cum omnia elementa, quibus iste mundus uisibilis contrectabilisque conpactus est, qualitatesque eorum Deo artifici tribuant; uerum tamen ex terrenis artubus moribundisque membris sic adfici animas opinantur, ut hinc eis sint morbi cupiditatum et timorum et laetitiae siue tristitiae; quibus quattuor uel perturbationibus, ut Cicero appellat, uel passionibus, ut plerique uerbum e uerbo Graeco exprimunt, omnis humanorum morum	The Platonists, it is true, are not as foolish as the Manichaeans, who detest earthly bodies as the very nature of evil. The Platonists ascribe to God as their maker all the elements of which this visible and tangible world is composed, and their qualities too. Yet they hold that souls are so affected by earthly limbs and dying members that from these come their diseases of desire and fear, and of joy or sorrow. Cicero calls these four "disturbances"; most writers call them "passions," ren-11 Genesis 46:27 in the Greek and Old Latin text (the Hebrew has seventy); compare Acts 7:14.

12 1 Corinthians 3:4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uitiositas continetur. Quod si ita est, quid est quod Aeneas aput Vergilium, cum audisset a patre aput inferos animas rursus ad corpora redituras, hanc opinionem miratur exclamans: O pater, anne aliquas ad caelum hinc ire putandum est Sublimes animas iterumque ad tarda reuerti Corpora? Quae lucis miseris tam dira cupido?	dering the Greek word word for word. In them is contained all the viciousness of human conduct. But if this is so, why does Aeneas in Virgil marvel at this belief? When he has heard from his father in the underworld that souls will return to bodies again, he exclaims: "O father, must we think that some souls go up from here to the sky on high, and return again to sluggish bodies? What is this dreadful craving for the light in these wretched souls?"[13]
Numquidnam haec tam dira cupido ex terrenis artubus moribundisque membris adhuc inest animarum illi praedicatissimae puritati? Nonne ab huius modi corporeis, ut dicit, pestibus omnibus eas adserit esse purgatas, cum rursus incipiunt in corpora uelle reuerti? Unde colligitur, etiamsi ita se haberet, quod est omnino uanissimum, uicissim alternans incessabiliter euntium adque redeuntium animarum mundatio et inquinatio, non potuisse ueraciter dici omnes culpabiles adque uitiosos motus animarum eis ex terrenis corporibus inolescere, si quidem secundum ipsos illa, ut locutor nobilis ait, dira cupido usque adeo non est ex corpore, ut ab omni corporea peste purgatam et extra omne corpus animam constitutam ipsam esse conpellat in corpore.	Can it be that this dreadful craving, arising from earthly limbs and dying members, is still present in that much-vaunted purity of souls? Does he not assert that they have been cleansed of all such bodily plagues, as he calls them, when they begin once more to want to return to bodies? From this it follows that, even if this ceaseless alternation of cleansing and defilement in souls departing and returning were true, and it is utterly empty, it still could not truthfully be said that all the culpable and vicious impulses of souls grow in them from earthly bodies. For by their own account, that "dreadful craving," as the noble poet puts it, is so far from coming from the body that it drives the soul into a body, even after the soul has been cleansed of every bodily plague and placed outside every body.
Unde etiam illis fatentibus non ex carne tantum adficitur anima, ut cupiat metuat, laetetur aegrescat, uerum etiam ex se ipsa his potest motibus agitari.	Hence, even by their own admission, the soul is not only affected by the flesh so as to desire and fear, rejoice and grieve. It can also be stirred by these impulses from within itself.

THE QUALITY OF THE HUMAN WILL, BY WHOSE JUDGMENT THE EMOTIONS OF THE MIND ARE HELD TO BE EITHER WRONG OR RIGHT

The emotions are acts of will, good or bad as the will is right or perverse.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.6 Interest autem qualis sit uoluntas hominis; quia si peruersa est, peruersos habebit hos motus; si autem recta est, non solum inculpabiles, uerum etiam laudalibes erunt. Voluntas est quippe in omnibus; immo omnes nihil aliud quam uoluntates sunt. Nam quid est cupiditas et laetitia nisi uoluntas in eorum consensione quae uolumus? Et quid est metus adque tristitia nisi uoluntas in dissensione ab his quae nolumus? Sed cum consentimus adpetendo ea quae uolumus, cupiditas; cum	What matters is the quality of a person's will. If the will is perverse, these emotions will be perverse. If it is right, they will be not only blameless but praiseworthy. For will is present in all of them; indeed, they are all nothing other than acts of will. What are desire and gladness but the will agreeing with the things we want? And what are fear and sorrow but the will disagreeing with the things we do not want? When we agree by seeking 13 The Manichaeans were followers of the third-century prophet Mani, who taught that matter is the substance of evil; Augustine had once belonged to them. Virgil, Aeneid 6.719–721.

LATIN	ENGLISH
autem consentimus fruendo his quae uolumus, laetitia uocatur. Itemque cum dissentimus ab eo quod accidere nolumus, talis uoluntas metus est; cum autem dissentimus ab eo quod nolentibus accidit, talis uoluntas tristitia est.	what we want, it is called desire; when we agree by enjoying what we want, it is called gladness. Likewise, when we disagree with something we do not want to happen, that act of will is fear; and when we disagree with something that happens against our will, that act of will is sorrow.
Et omnino pro uarietate rerum, quae adpetuntur adque fugiuntur, sicut adlicitur uel offenditur uoluntas hominis, ita in hos uel illos adfectus mutatur et uertitur. Quapropter homo, qui secundum Deum, non secundum hominem uiuit, oportet ut sit amator boni; unde fit consequens ut malum oderit. Et quoniam nemo natura, sed quisquis malus est, uitio malus est: perfectum odium debet malis, qui secundum Deum uiuit, ut nec propter uitium oderit hominem nec amet uitium propter hominem, sed oderit uitium, amet hominem. Sanato enim uitio totum quod amare, nihil autem quod debeat odisse remanebit.	In general, a person's will is attracted or repelled by the variety of things that are sought or shunned, and it is changed and turned into this or that feeling accordingly. Therefore the person who lives according to God, and not according to man, must be a lover of the good; and it follows that he hates evil. And since no one is evil by nature, but whoever is evil is evil through vice, the one who lives according to God owes a perfect hatred to the wicked. He should neither hate the person because of the vice nor love the vice because of the person, but hate the vice and love the person. For once the vice is healed, all that will remain is what he ought to love, and nothing that he ought to hate.[14]

THAT IN SCRIPTURE THE WORDS amor AND dilectio ARE USED WITHOUT DISTINCTION FOR BOTH GOOD AND EVIL LOVE

Scripture uses its words for love without distinction; the emotions are good or bad as love is.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.7 Nam cuius propositum est amare Deum et non secundum hominem, sed secundum Deum amare proximum, sicut etiam se ipsum: procul dubio propter hunc amorem dicitur uoluntatis bonae, quae usitatius in scripturis sanctis caritas appellatur; sed amor quoque secundum easdem sacras litteras dicitur. Nam et amatorem boni apostolus dicit esse debere, quem regendo populo praecipit eligendum, et ipse Dominus Petrum apostolum interrogans cum dixisset: Diligis me plus his? ille respondit: Domine, tu scis quia amo te; et iterum Dominus quaesiuit, non utrum amaret, sed utrum diligeret eum Petrus; at ille respondit iterum: Domine, tu scis quia amo te; tertia uero interrogatione et ipse Iesus non ait: Diligis me? sed: Amas me? ubi secutus ait euangelista: Contristatus est Petrus, quia dixit ei tertio: Amas me?	Take someone whose purpose is to love God, and to love his neighbor as himself, not according to man but according to God. Because of this love he is without doubt said to be a person of good will. This is more usually called caritas in the holy Scriptures, but according to the same sacred writings it is also called amor. For the apostle says that the man to be chosen to govern the people must be a lover (amator) of the good. And the Lord himself, questioning the apostle Peter, said, "Do you love (diligis) me more than these?" and Peter answered, "Lord, you know that I love (amo) you." Again the Lord asked, not whether Peter loved him with amor, but whether he loved him with dilectio; and Peter answered again, "Lord, you know that I love (amo) you." But at the third question Jesus himself did not say, "Do you love (diligis) me?" but "Do you love (amas) me?" At this point the evangelist went on to say, "Peter was grieved because he said to him the third time, 'Do you love (amas) me?'"[15]

14 "Perfect hatred" echoes Psalm 138:22 (139:22 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

cum Dominus non tertio, sed semel dixerit: Amas me? bis autem dixerit: Diligis me? Unde intellegimus, quod etiam cum dicebat Dominus: Diligis me? nihil aliud dicebat quam: Amas me? Petrus autem non mutauit huius unius rei uerbum, sed etiam tertio: Domine, inquit, tu omnia scis, tu scis quia amo te.

Hoc propterea commemorandum putaui, quia nonnulli arbitrantur aliud esse dilectionem siue caritatem, aliud amorem. Dicunt enim dilectionem accipiendam esse in bono, amorem in malo. Sic autem nec ipsos auctores saecularium litterarum locutos esse certissimum est. Sed uiderint philosophi utrum uel qua ratione ista discernant; amorem tamen eos in bonis rebus et erga ipsum Deum magni pendere, libri eorum satis loquuntur. Sed scripturas religionis nostrae, quarum auctoritatem ceteris omnibus litteris anteponimus, non aliud dicere amorem, aliud dilectionem uel caritatem, insinuandum fuit. Nam et amorem in bono dici iam ostendimus.

Sed ne quis existimet amorem quidem et in malo et in bono, dilectionem autem non nisi in bono esse dicendam, illud adtendat quod in psalmo scriptum est: Qui autem diligit iniquitatem, odit animam suam, et illud apostoli Iohannis: Si quis dilexerit mundum, non est dilectio Patris in illo. Ecce uno loco dilectio et in bono et in malo. Amorem autem in malo (quia in bono iam ostendimus) ne quisquam flagitet, legat quod scriptum est: Erunt enim homines se ipsos amantes, amatores pecuniae. Recta itaque uoluntas est bonus amor, et uoluntas peruersa malus amor. Amor ergo inhians habere quod amatur, cupiditas est, id autem habens eoque fruens laetitia; fugiens quod ei aduersatur, timor est, idque si acciderit sentiens tristitia est.

Proinde mala sunt ista, si malus amor est; bona, si bonus. Quod dicimus, de scripturis probemus. Concupiscit apostolus dissolui et esse cum Christo; et: Concupiuit anima mea desiderare iudicia tua, uel si adcommodatius

ENGLISH

Yet the Lord had said "Do you love (amas) me?" not three times but only once, and "Do you love (diligis) me?" twice. From this we understand that even when the Lord said diligis, he meant nothing other than amas. Peter, for his part, did not change his word for this one thing, but the third time too he said, "Lord, you know all things; you know that I love (amo) you."

I thought this worth mentioning because some people think that dilectio or caritas is one thing and amor another. They say that dilectio is to be taken in a good sense and amor in a bad one. It is quite certain, however, that not even the authors of secular literature spoke this way. Whether the philosophers make this distinction, or on what principle, is their affair; but their books make it plain enough that they set great value on amor when it is directed to good things and toward God himself. What had to be shown was that the Scriptures of our religion, whose authority we place above all other writings, do not treat amor as one thing and dilectio or caritas as another. And we have already shown that amor is used in a good sense.

But in case anyone thinks that amor may be used in both a bad and a good sense, while dilectio may be used only in a good one, let him consider what is written in the psalm: "But whoever loves (diligit) iniquity hates his own soul"; and the words of the apostle John: "If anyone loves (dilexerit) the world, the love (dilectio) of the Father is not in him." Here, in a single passage, is dilectio in both a good and a bad sense. And in case anyone demands an example of amor in a bad sense (since we have already shown it in a good one), let him read what is written: "For people will be lovers (amantes) of themselves, lovers (amatores) of money." A right will, then, is good love, and a perverse will is bad love. So love that longs to have what it loves is desire; when it has it and enjoys it, it is gladness; when it flees what opposes it, it is fear; and when it feels that thing if it happens, it is sorrow.[16]

Accordingly, these emotions are bad if the love is bad, and good if it is good. Let us prove from Scripture what we are saying. The apostle desires (concupiscit) to depart and be with Christ. And:

15 Augustine's Latin Gospel uses two verbs for "love," diligere and amare; John 21:15–17. The overseer as "lover of the good": Titus 1:8.

16 Psalm 10:6 (11:5 in most English Bibles); 1 John 2:15; 2 Timothy 3:2.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	dicitur: Desiderauit anima mea concupiscere iudicia tua; et: Concupiscentia sapientiae perducit ad regnum. Hoc tamen loquendi obtinuit consuetudo, ut, si cupiditas uel concupiscentia dicatur nec addatur cuius rei sit, non nisi in malo possit intellegi. Laetitia in bono est: Laetamini in Domino et exultate iusti; et: Dedisti laetitiam in cor meum; et: Adinplebis me laetitia cum uultu tuo.	"My soul has desired (concupiuit) to long for your judgments"—or, if it is put more fittingly, "My soul has longed to desire (concupiscere) your judgments." And: "The desire (concupiscentia) for wisdom leads to a kingdom." Even so, usage has established that if cupiditas or concupiscentia is mentioned without saying what it is a desire for, it can only be understood in a bad sense. Gladness is used in a good sense: "Be glad in the Lord, and rejoice, you righteous"; and "You have put gladness into my heart"; and "You will fill me with gladness with your countenance."[17]
	Timor in bono est aput apostolum, ubi ait: Cum timore et tremore uestram ipsorum salutem operamini; et: Noli altum sapere, sed time; et: Timeo autem, ne, sicut serpens Euam seduxit astutia sua, sic et uestrae mentes corrumpantur a castitate, quae est in Christo. De tristitia uero, quam Cicero magis aegritudinem appellat, dolorem autem Vergilius, ubi ait: dolent gaudentque, (sed ideo malui tristitiam dicere, quia aegritudo uel dolor usitatius in corporibus dicitur) scrupulosior quaestio est, utrum inueniri possit in bono.	Fear is used in a good sense by the apostle when he says, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling"; and "Do not be high-minded, but fear"; and "But I fear that, as the serpent seduced Eve by his cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ." Then there is sorrow, which Cicero prefers to call aegritudo [distress] and Virgil calls dolor [grief] where he says, "they grieve and rejoice." (I have preferred to say tristitia [sorrow] because aegritudo and dolor are more commonly used of the body.) Whether sorrow can be found in a good sense is a more delicate question.[18]

THE THREE EMOTIONS THAT THE STOICS ALLOWED IN THE MIND OF THE WISE MAN, EXCLUDING PAIN OR SADNESS, WHICH THE VIRTUE OF THE MIND OUGHT NOT TO FEEL

The Stoics allow the wise three good feelings but no sorrow; Augustine tests this against Scripture and usage.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.8	Quas enim Graeci appellant εὐπαθείας, Latine autem Cicero constantias nominauit, Stoici tres esse uoluerunt pro tribus perturbationibus in animo sapientis, pro cupiditate uoluntatem, pro laetitia gaudium, pro metu cautionem; pro aegritudine uero uel dolore, quam nos uitandae ambiguitatis gratia tristitiam maluimus dicere, negauerunt esse posse aliquid in animo sapientis. Voluntas quippe, inquiunt, adpetit bonum, quod facit sapiens: gaudium de bono adepto est, quod ubique adipiscitur sapiens; cautio deuitat malum, quod debet sapiens deuitare; tristitia porro quia de malo est, quod iam accidit, nullum autem malum existimant posse accidere sapienti, nihil in eius animo pro illa esse posse dixerunt.	The Greeks speak of εὐπαθείας [good feelings], which Cicero in Latin called constantiae [steady states]. The Stoics held that there are three of these in the soul of the wise man, in place of three disturbances: will (uoluntas) in place of desire, joy (gaudium) in place of gladness, and caution in place of fear. But in place of distress or grief—which, to avoid ambiguity, we have preferred to call sorrow—they denied that there could be anything in the wise man's soul. For will, they say, seeks the good, and this the wise man does. Joy is over a good attained, and the wise man attains it everywhere. Caution avoids evil, which the wise man ought to avoid. But sorrow concerns an evil that has already happened; and since they hold 17 Philippians 1:23; Psalm 118:20 (119:20 in most English Bibles); Wisdom 6:20; Psalm 31:11 (32:11); Psalm 4:7; Psalm 15:11 (16:11).

18 Philippians 2:12; Romans 11:20; 2 Corinthians 11:3. The Virgil line is Aeneid 6.733.

LATIN

ENGLISH

that no evil can happen to the wise man, they said that nothing could exist in his soul in its place.[19]

Sic ergo illi loquuntur, ut uelle gaudere cauere negent nisi sapientem; stultum autem non nisi cupere laetari, metuere contristari; et illas tres esse constantias, has autem quattuor perturbationes secundum Ciceronem, secundum autem plurimos passiones. Graece autem illae tres, sicut dixi, appellantur εὐπάθειαι; istae autem quattuor πάθη. Haec locutio utrum scripturis sanctis congruat, cum quaererem quantum potui diligenter, illud inueni quod ait propheta: Non est gaudere inpiis, dicit Dominus; tamquam inpii laetari possint potius quam gaudere de malis, quia gaudium proprie bonorum et piorum est. Item illud in euangelio: Quaecumque uultis ut faciant uobis homines, haec et uos facite illis, ita dictum uidetur, tamquam nemo possit aliquid male uel turpiter uelle, sed cupere.

So they speak in such a way as to deny that anyone but the wise man wills, rejoices or is cautious, while the fool only desires, is glad, fears and is saddened. The first three are the constancies; the latter four are the disturbances, as Cicero calls them, or the passions, as most call them. In Greek, as I said, the three are called εὐπάθειαι, and the four πάθη [passions]. When I inquired as carefully as I could whether this usage agrees with the holy Scriptures, I found the saying of the prophet: "There is no rejoicing (gaudere) for the wicked, says the Lord"—as though the wicked could be glad (laetari) about evil things rather than rejoice in them, since joy properly belongs to the good and the godly. Likewise the saying in the gospel, "Whatever you want (uultis) people to do to you, do the same to them," seems to have been put as though no one could will anything evil or shameful, but only desire (cupere) it.[20]

Denique propter consuetudinem locutionis nonnulli interpretes addiderunt bona et ita interpretati sunt: Quaecumque uultis ut faciant uobis homines bona. Cauendum enim putauerunt, ne quisquam inhonesta uelit sibi fieri ab hominibus, ut de turpioribus taceam, certe luxuriosa conuiuia, in quibus se, si et ipse illis faciat, hoc praeceptum existimet inpleturum. Sed in Graeco euangelio, unde in Latinum translatum est, non legitur bona, sed: Quaecumque uultis ut faciant uobis homines, haec et uos facite illis; credo propterea, quia in eo quod dixit uultis, iam uoluit intellegi bona. Non enim ait cupitis.

Indeed, because of ordinary usage, some translators added "good" and rendered it, "Whatever good things you want people to do to you." They thought they had to keep anyone from wanting indecent things done to him by others—lavish banquets at least, to say nothing of fouler things—and then supposing that by doing the same for them he would be fulfilling this commandment. But in the Greek gospel, from which the Latin was translated, "good" is not found; it reads, "Whatever you want people to do to you, do the same to them." I believe this is because by saying "you want" he already meant good things to be understood. For he does not say "you desire."

Non tamen semper his proprietatibus locutio nostra frenanda est, sed interdum his utendum est; et cum legimus eos, quorum auctoritati resultare fas non est, ibi sunt intellegendae, ubi rectus sensus alium exitum non potest inuenire; sicut ista sunt, quae exempli gratia partim ex propheta, partim ex euangelio commemorauimus. Quis enim nescit inpios exultare laetitia? et tamen: Non est gaudere inpiis, dicit Dominus. Unde, nisi quia gaudere aliud est, quando proprie signateque hoc uerbum ponitur? Item quis negauerit non recte praecipi hominibus, ut quaecumque ab aliis sibi

Still, our language need not always be reined in by these precise distinctions, though sometimes they should be used. When we read those whose authority it is not right to contradict, the distinctions must be understood wherever a correct sense can find no other way out—as in the examples we have cited, partly from the prophet and partly from the gospel. For who does not know that the wicked exult with gladness? And yet: "There is no rejoicing for the wicked, says the Lord." How can this be, unless rejoicing is something different when the 19 The Stoic doctrine is reported by Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 4.12–14.

20 Isaiah 48:22 in the Greek Septuagint wording, which Augustine's Latin follows; Matthew 7:12.

LATIN

fieri cupiunt, haec eis et ipsi faciant; ne se inuicem turpitudine inlicitae uoluptatis oblectent? et tamen saluberrimum uerissimumque praeceptum est: Quaecumque uultis ut faciant uobis homines, eadem et uos facite illis.

Et hoc unde, nisi quia hoc loco modo quodam proprio uoluntas posita est, quae in malo accipi non potest? Locutione uero usitatiore, quam frequentat maxime consuetudo sermonis, non utique diceretur: Noli uelle mentiri omne mendacium, nisi esset et uoluntas mala, a cuius prauitate illa distinguitur, quam praedicauerunt angeli dicentes: Pax in terra hominibus bonae uoluntatis. Nam ex abundanti additum est bonae si esse non potest nisi bona. Quid autem magnum in caritatis laudibus dixisset apostolus, quod non gaudeat super iniquitate, nisi quia ita malignitas gaudet? Et aput auctores saecularium litterarum talis istorum uerborum indifferentia reperitur. Ait enim Cicero orator amplissimus: (Cupio, patres conscripti, me esse clementem.)

Quia id uerbum in bono posuit, quis tam peruerse doctus existat, qui non eum Cupio, sed Volo potius dicere debuisse contendat? Porro aput Terentium flagitiosus adulescens insana flagrans cupidine:. Nihil uolo aliud, inquit, nisi Philumenam. Quam uoluntatem fuisse libidinem responsio, quae ibi serui eius sanioris inducitur, satis indicat. Ait namque domino suo: Quanto satius est,
Te id dare operam, qui istum amorem ex animo amoueas tuo, Quam id loqui, quo magis libido frustra accendatur tua?
Gaudium uero eos et in malo posuisse ille ipse Vergilianus testis est uersus, ubi has quattuor perturbationes summa breuitate conplexus est: Hinc metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque. Dixit etiam idem auctor: Mala mentis gaudia.

Proinde uolunt cauent gaudent et boni et mali; adque ut eadem aliis uerbis enuntiemus, cupiunt timent laetantur et boni et mali; sed illi bene, isti male, sicut hominibus word is used properly and precisely? Likewise, who would deny that it would be wrong to instruct people to do to others whatever they desire others to do to them, for then they might delight one another with the shamefulness of illicit pleasure? And yet this is a most wholesome and true commandment: "Whatever you want people to do to you, do the same to them."

ENGLISH

How can this be, unless in this passage "will" is used in a special, proper sense that cannot be taken in a bad sense? But in more ordinary usage, the kind everyday speech employs most, it certainly would not be said, "Do not will to tell any lie at all," unless there were also an evil will. It is from the depravity of that evil will that the will proclaimed by the angels is distinguished when they said, "Peace on earth to people of good will." For "good" would have been added needlessly if will could only be good. And what great thing would the apostle have said in praise of love, that it "does not rejoice in iniquity," unless malice does rejoice in that way? Among the authors of secular literature, too, these words are found used without distinction. For Cicero, that most eminent orator, says: "I desire, senators, to be merciful."[21]

Since he used that word in a good sense, who would be so perversely pedantic as to insist that he ought to have said not "I desire" but rather "I wish"? Again, in Terence a dissolute young man, burning with mad desire, says: "I want nothing else but Philumena." That this "want" was lust is shown clearly enough by the reply the playwright gives there to his more level-headed slave, who says to his master: "How much better it would be for you to set about driving that love out of your heart than to say things that only inflame your lust to no purpose!" As for joy, that they used it in a bad sense too is attested by that very line of Virgil in which he summed up these four disturbances with the utmost brevity: "Hence they fear and desire, grieve and rejoice." The same author also spoke of "the evil joys of the mind."[22]

So both the good and the wicked will, are cautious and rejoice; or, to say the same thing in other words, both the good and the wicked desire, fear

21 Sirach 7:13; Luke 2:14; 1 Corinthians 13:6. Cicero, Against Catiline 1.4.
22 Terence, The Woman of Andros 306–308: the young man is Charinus, the slave Byrria. The Virgil passages are Aeneid 6.733 and 6.278–279.

LATIN	ENGLISH
seu recta seu peruersa uoluntas est. Ipsa quoque tristitia, pro qua Stoici nihil in animo sapientis inueniri posse putauerunt, reperitur in bono et maxime aput nostros. Nam laudat apostolus Corinthios, quod contristati fuerint secundum Deum. Sed fortasse quis dixerit illis apostolum fuisse congratulatum, quod contristati fuerint paenitendo, qualis tristitia, nisi eorum qui peccauerint, esse non potest. Ita enim dicit: Video quod epistula illa, etsi ad horam, contristauit uos; nunc gaudeo, non quia contristati estis, sed quia contristati estis in paenitentiam. Contristati enim estis secundum Deum, ut in nullo detrimentum patiamini ex nobis.	and are glad. But the good do so well and the wicked badly, according as their will is right or perverse. Even sorrow itself, in whose place the Stoics thought nothing could be found in the soul of the wise man, is found in a good sense, especially in our writers. For the apostle praises the Corinthians because they were saddened in a godly way. But perhaps someone will say that the apostle congratulated them because they were saddened by repenting, and that kind of sorrow can belong only to those who have sinned. For this is what he says: "I see that that letter saddened you, if only for a while. Now I rejoice, not because you were saddened, but because you were saddened into repentance. For you were saddened in a godly way, so that you suffered no loss through us in anything.[23]
Quae enim secundum Deum est tristitia, paenitentiam in salutem inpaenitendam operatur; mundi autem tristitia mortem operatur. Ecce enim id ipsum secundum Deum contristari quantam perfecit in uobis industriam. Ac per hoc possunt Stoici pro suis partibus respondere, ad hoc uideri utilem esse tristitiam, ut peccasse paeniteat; in animo autem sapientis ideo esse non posse, quia nec peccatum in eum cadit, cuius paenitentia contristetur, nec ullum aliud malum, quod perpetiendo et sentiendo sit tristis. Nam et Alcibiadem ferunt (si me de nomine hominis memoria non fallit), cum sibi beatus uideretur, Socrate disputante et ei quam miser esset, quoniam stultus esset, demonstrante fleuisse. Huic ergo stultitia fuit causa etiam huius utilis optandaeque tristitiae, qua homo esse se dolet, quod esse non debet.	For godly sorrow produces a repentance that leads to salvation and is not to be regretted; but the sorrow of the world produces death. See what diligence this very thing, being saddened in a godly way, has produced in you." In reply, the Stoics can argue on their own behalf that sorrow appears useful for this purpose, that one may repent of having sinned. But, they will say, it cannot exist in the soul of the wise man, because no sin befalls him over which repentance could sadden him, nor any other evil whose endurance and experience could make him sad. For they tell how Alcibiades (if my memory does not fail me about the man's name), who thought himself happy, wept when Socrates argued with him and showed him how wretched he was because he was a fool. For him, then, folly was the cause even of this useful and desirable sorrow, by which a person grieves that he is what he ought not to be.[24]
Stoici autem non stultum, sed sapientem aiunt tristem esse non posse.	The Stoics, however, say that it is not the fool but the wise man who cannot be sad.

THE EMOTIONS OF THE MIND WHOSE RIGHT EXPRESSIONS ARE FOUND IN THE LIFE OF THE RIGHTEOUS

Citizens of the city of God rightly feel fear, desire, grief and joy, as Paul and Christ himself did.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.9 Verum his philosophis, quod ad istam quaestionem de animi perturbationibus adtinet, iam respondimus in nono huius operis libro, ostendentes eos non tam de	But we have already answered these philosophers, as far as this question of the soul's disturbances is concerned, in the ninth book of this work. There

23 2 Corinthians 7:8–11.
24 Alcibiades was an Athenian statesman and follower of Socrates; the story is told by Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.77.

LATIN	ENGLISH
rebus, quam de uerbis cupidiores esse contentionis quam ueritatis. Aput nos autem iuxta scripturas sanctas sanamque doctrinam ciues sanctae ciuitatis Dei in huius uitae peregrinatione secundum Deum uiuentes metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque, et quia rectus est amor eorum, istas omnes adfectiones rectas habent. Metuunt poenam aeternam, cupiunt uitam aeternam; dolent in re, quia ipsi in semet ipsis adhuc ingemescunt adoptionem, expectantes redemtionem corporis sui; gaudent in spe, quia fiet sermo, qui scriptus est: Absorpta est mors in uictoriam. Item metuunt peccare, cupiunt perseuerare; dolent in peccatis, gaudent in operibus bonis.	we showed that, arguing not so much about things as about words, they are more eager for contention than for truth. Among us, however, in accordance with the holy Scriptures and sound doctrine, the citizens of the holy city of God, who live according to God in the pilgrimage of this life, fear and desire, grieve and rejoice; and because their love is right, all these affections of theirs are right. They fear eternal punishment, and they desire eternal life. They grieve in the present reality, because they themselves still groan inwardly, waiting for adoption, the redemption of their body; they rejoice in hope, because the saying that is written will come to pass: "Death is swallowed up in victory." Likewise they fear to sin and desire to persevere; they grieve over their sins and rejoice in good works.[25]
Ut enim metuant peccare, audiunt: Quoniam abundabit iniquitas, refrigescet caritas multorum; ut cupiant perseuerare, audiunt quod scriptum est: Qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit; ut doleant in peccatis, audiunt: Si dixerimus quia peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus, et ueritas in nobis non est; ut gaudeant in operibus bonis, audiunt: Hilarem datorem diligit Deus. Item sicuti se infirmitas eorum firmitasque habuerit, metuunt tentari, cupiunt tentari; dolent in tentationibus, gaudent in tentationibus.	That they may fear to sin, they hear: "Because iniquity will abound, the love of many will grow cold." That they may desire to persevere, they hear what is written: "Whoever perseveres to the end will be saved." That they may grieve over their sins, they hear: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." That they may rejoice in good works, they hear: "God loves a cheerful giver." Likewise, depending on their weakness or their strength, they fear to be tempted and desire to be tempted; they grieve in temptations and rejoice in temptations.[26]
Ut enim metuant tentari, audiunt: Si quis praeoccupatus fuerit in aliquo delicto, uos, qui spiritales estis, instruite huius modi in spiritu mansuetudinis, intendens te ipsum, ne et tu tenteris; ut autem cupiant tentari, audiunt quendam uirum fortem ciuitatis Dei dicentem: Proba me, Domine, et tenta me; ure renes meos et cor meum; ut doleant in tentationibus, uident Petrum flentem; ut gaudeant in tentationibus, audiunt Iacobum dicentem: Omne gaudium existimate, fratres mei, cum in tentationes uarias incideritis.	That they may fear to be tempted, they hear: "If anyone is caught in some fault, you who are spiritual should instruct such a person in a spirit of gentleness, looking to yourself, lest you too be tempted." That they may desire to be tempted, they hear a valiant man of the city of God saying: "Test me, Lord, and tempt me; burn my inmost being and my heart." That they may grieve in temptations, they see Peter weeping. That they may rejoice in temptations, they hear James saying: "Count it all joy, my brothers, when you fall into various temptations."[27]
Non solum autem propter se ipsos his mouentur adfectibus, uerum etiam propter eos, quos liberari cupiunt et ne pereant metuunt, et dolent si pereunt et gaudent si liberantur. Illum quippe optimum et	They are moved by these affections not only for their own sake but also for the sake of those whom they desire to see set free and fear may perish; they grieve if such people perish and rejoice if 25 Book 9, chapters 4–5. Romans 8:23; 1 Corinthians 15:54.

26 Matthew 24:12; Matthew 10:22; 1 John 1:8; 2 Corinthians 9:7.
27 Galatians 6:1; Psalm 25:2 (26:2 in most English Bibles); Matthew 26:75; James 1:2.

LATIN

fortissimum uirum, qui in suis infirmitatibus gloriatur, ut eum potissimum commemoremus, qui in ecclesiam Christi ex gentibus uenimus, doctorem gentium in fide et ueritate, qui et plus omnibus suis coapostolis laborauit et pluribus epistulis populos Dei, non eos tantum, qui praesentes ab illo uidebantur, uerum etiam illos, qui futuri praeuidebantur, instruxit;

illum, inquam, uirum, athletam Christi, doctum ab illo, unctum de illo, crucifixum cum illo, gloriosum in illo, in theatro huius mundi, cui spectaculum factus est et angelis et hominibus, legitime magnum agonem certantem et palmam supernae uocationis in anteriora sectantem, oculis fidei libentissime spectant gaudere cum gaudentibus, flere cum flentibus, foris habentem pugnas, intus timores, cupientem dissolui et esse cum Christo, desiderantem uidere Romanos, ut aliquem fructum habeat et in illis sicut et in ceteris gentibus, aemulantem Corinthios et ipsa aemulatione metuentem, ne seducantur eorum mentes a castitate, quae in Christo est, magnam tristitiam et continuum dolorem cordis de Israelitis habentem, quod ignorantes Dei iustitiam et suam uolentes constituere iustitiae Dei non essent subiecti; nec solum dolorem, uerum etiam luctum suum denuntiantem quibusdam, qui ante peccauerunt et non egerunt paenitentiam super inmunditia et fornicationibus suis.

Hi motus, hi adfectus de amore boni et de sancta caritate uenientes si uitia uocanda sunt, sinamus, ut ea, quae uere uitia sunt, uirtutes uocentur. Sed cum rectam rationem sequantur istae adfectiones, quando ubi oportet adhibentur, quis eas tunc morbos seu uitiosas passiones audeat dicere? Quam ob rem etiam ipse Dominus in forma serui agere uitam dignatus humanam, sed nullum habens omnino peccatum adhibuit eas, ubi adhibendas esse iudicauit. Neque enim, in quo uerum erat hominis corpus et uerus hominis animus, falsus erat humanus adfectus.

ENGLISH

they are set free. Consider in particular—for we have come into the Church of Christ from the Gentiles—that excellent and most valiant man who glories in his weaknesses, the teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth, who labored more than all his fellow apostles, and who by more letters than any instructed the peoples of God, not only those whom he saw in person but also those whom he foresaw would come after—[28]

that man, I say, the athlete of Christ, taught by him, anointed by him, crucified with him, glorious in him, who in the theater of this world became a spectacle to angels and to human beings, competing lawfully in the great contest and pressing on toward what lies ahead for the prize of the upward call. The citizens of God's city watch him most gladly with the eyes of faith. They see him rejoicing with those who rejoice and weeping with those who weep, with battles without and fears within. They see him desiring to depart and be with Christ; longing to see the Romans, that he might reap some harvest among them as among the other Gentiles; jealous for the Corinthians, and in that very jealousy fearing that their minds might be led astray from the chastity that is in Christ. They see him with great sorrow and unceasing pain of heart over the Israelites, because, ignorant of God's righteousness and wishing to establish their own, they had not submitted to the righteousness of God. And they see him declaring not only his pain but even his mourning over some who had sinned before and had not repented of their impurity and fornications.[29]

If these emotions, these affections, which come from love of the good and from holy love, are to be called vices, then let us allow what are truly vices to be called virtues. But since these affections follow right reason when they are applied where they ought to be, who would dare to call them diseases or vicious passions? That is why even the Lord himself, who deigned to live a human life in the form of a servant, though without any sin at all, displayed them where he judged they should be displayed. For in one who had a true human 28 Paul, alluding to 2 Corinthians 12:9, 1 Timothy 2:7 and 1 Corinthians 15:10.

29 A mosaic of Paul's own words, e.g., 1 Corinthians 4:9, Philippians 3:13–14, Romans 12:15, Romans 9:2 and 10:3, 2 Corinthians 12:21.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	body and a true human soul, human feeling was not false.[30]
Cum ergo eius in euangelio ista referuntur, quod super duritia cordis Iudaeorum cum ira contristatus sit, quod dixerit: Gaudeo propter uos, ut credatis, quod Lazarum suscitaturus etiam lacrimas fuderit, quod concupiuerit cum discipulis suis manducare pascha, quod propinquante passione tristis fuerit anima eius: non falso utique referuntur. Verum ille hos motus certae dispensationis gratia ita cum uoluit suscepit animo humano, ut cum uoluit factus est homo.	So when the gospel reports such things of him—that he was grieved with anger at the hardness of heart of the Jews; that he said, "I am glad for your sakes, so that you may believe"; that when he was about to raise Lazarus he even shed tears; that he earnestly desired to eat the Passover with his disciples; that as his passion drew near his soul was sorrowful—these things are certainly not reported falsely. But for the sake of a definite plan he took on these emotions in his human soul when he willed, just as he became man when he willed.[31]
Proinde, quod fatendum est, etiam cum rectas et secundum Deum habemus has adfectiones, huius uitae sunt, non illius, quam futuram speramus, et saepe illis etiam inuiti cedimus. Itaque aliquando, quamuis non culpabili cupiditate, sed laudabili caritate moueamur, etiam dum nolumus flemus. Habemus ergo eas ex humanae condicionis infirmitate; non autem ita Dominus Iesus, cuius et infirmitas fuit ex potestate. Sed dum uitae huius infirmitatem gerimus, si eas omnino nullas habeamus, tunc potius non recte uiuimus. Vituperabat enim et detestabatur apostolus quosdam, quos etiam esse dixit sine adfectione. Culpauit etiam illos sacer psalmus, de quibus ait: Sustinui qui simul contristaretur, et non fuit.	Accordingly—and this must be admitted—even when our affections are right and according to God, they belong to this life, not to the life we hope is to come, and we often yield to them even against our will. So sometimes, though moved not by blameworthy craving but by praiseworthy love, we weep even when we do not want to. We have these affections, then, because of the weakness of the human condition. But it was not so with the Lord Jesus, whose very weakness came from his power. Yet as long as we bear the weakness of this life, if we had none of these affections at all, it is then rather that we would not be living rightly. For the apostle reproached and denounced certain people whom he even described as being without affection. The sacred psalm, too, blamed those of whom it says, "I waited for someone to grieve with me, and there was no one."[32]

FREEDOM FROM PASSION

Stoic apatheia is impossible in this life, and total numbness would be worse than any vice.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam omnino non dolere, dum sumus in hoc loco miseriae, profecto, sicut quidam etiam aput saeculi huius litteratos sensit et dixit, non sine magna mercede contingit inmanitatis in animo, stuporis in corpore. Quocirca illa, quae ἀπάθεια Graece dicitur (quae si Latine posset inpassibilitas diceretur), si ita intellegenda est (in animo quippe, non in corpore accipitur), ut sine his adfectionibus uiuatur, quae contra rationem accidunt mentemque perturbant, bona plane et maxime optanda	For to feel no pain at all while we are in this place of misery is certainly not achieved, as a certain man of letters of this world also thought and said, without a heavy price: savagery in the mind and numbness in the body. Consider, then, what in Greek is called ἀπάθεια [freedom from passion], which in Latin, if the word could be used, would be called inpassibilitas [impassibility]. If it is to be understood—and it refers to the mind, not the 30 "The form of a servant": Philippians 2:7.

31 Mark 3:5; John 11:15; John 11:35; Luke 22:15; Matthew 26:38.
32 Romans 1:31; Psalm 68:21 (69:20 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

est, sed nec ipsa huius est uitae. Non enim qualiumcumque hominum uox est, sed maxime piorum multumque iustorum adque sanctorum: Si dixerimus, quoniam peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus et ueritas in nobis non est. Tunc itaque ἀπάθεια ista erit, quando peccatum in homine nullum erit.

Nunc uero satis bene uiuitur, si sine crimine; sine peccato autem qui se uiuere existimat, non id agit, ut peccatum non habeat, sed ut ueniam non accipiat. Porro, si ἀπάθεια illa dicenda est, cum animum contingere omnino non potest ullus adfectus, quis hunc stuporem non omnibus uitiis iudicet esse peiorem? Potest ergo non absurde dici perfectam beatitudinem sine stimulo timoris et sine ulla tristitia futuram; non ibi autem futurum amorem gaudiumque quis dixerit, nisi omni modo a ueritate seclusus? Si autem ἀπάθεια illa est, ubi nec metus ullus exterret nec angit dolor, auersanda est in hac uita, si recte, hoc est secundum Deum, uiuere uolumus; in illa uero beata, quae sempiterna promittitur, plane speranda est.

Timor namque ille, de quo dicit apostolus Iohannes: Timor non est in caritate, sed perfecta caritas foras mittit timorem, quia timor poenam habet; qui autem timet, non est perfectus in caritate, non est eius generis timor, cuius ille, quo timebat apostolus Paulus, ne Corinthii serpentina seducerentur astutia; hunc enim timorem habet caritas, immo non habet nisi caritas; sed illius generis est timor, qui non est in caritate, de quo ipse apostolus Paulus ait: Non enim accepistis spiritum seruitutis iterum in timore. Timor uero ille castus permanens in saeculum saeculi, si erit et in futuro saeculo, (nam quo alio modo potest intellegi permanere in saeculum saeculi?) non est timor exterrens a malo quod accidere potest, sed tenens in bono quod amitti non potest.

Ubi enim boni adepti amor inmutabilis est, profecto, si dici potest, mali cauendi timor securus est. Timoris quippe casti nomine ea uoluntas significata est, qua nos body—as living without those affections that arise contrary to reason and disturb the mind, then it is plainly good and greatly to be desired. But it too does not belong to this life. For it is the voice not of just any people but especially of the godly and of the thoroughly just and holy: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." This ἀπάθεια, therefore, will exist only when there is no sin in a human being.[33]

ENGLISH

As things are now, we live well enough if we live without crime. But whoever thinks he lives without sin does not succeed in having no sin; he succeeds only in receiving no pardon. Further, if ἀπάθεια is the name for the state in which no affection at all can touch the mind, who would not judge such numbness to be worse than all the vices? It can be said, then, without absurdity, that perfect happiness will be without the sting of fear and without any sorrow. But who would say that love and joy will not be there, unless he is wholly shut off from the truth? If, however, ἀπάθεια is the state in which no fear terrifies and no pain torments, it is to be shunned in this life, if we want to live rightly, that is, according to God; but in that happy life which is promised as everlasting, it is clearly to be hoped for.

Consider the fear of which the apostle John says, "There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear, because fear involves punishment; and whoever fears is not perfect in love." That fear is not of the same kind as the fear with which the apostle Paul feared that the Corinthians might be led astray by the serpent's cunning; for love has that fear—indeed, only love has it. Rather, it is of the kind that is not in love, of which the same apostle Paul says, "For you did not receive the spirit of slavery to fall back into fear." But as for that chaste fear "enduring forever and ever": if it is to exist in the age to come as well (and how else can "enduring forever and ever" be understood?), it is not a fear that frightens us away from an evil that may happen, but one that holds us fast in a good that cannot be lost.[34]

For where the love of the good once attained is unchangeable, the fear of avoiding evil is surely, if one may put it so, a fear without anxiety. By the 33 The man of letters is Crantor, an early Academic philosopher, quoted by Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.12.

34 1 John 4:18; Romans 8:15. "Chaste fear … enduring forever and ever": Psalm 18:10 (19:9 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

necesse erit nolle peccare, et non sollicitudine infirmitatis, ne forte peccemus, sed tranquillitate caritatis cauere peccatum. Aut si nullius omnino generis timor esse poterit in illa certissima securitate perpetuorum feliciumque gaudiorum, sic est dictum: Timor Domini castus permanens in saeculum saeculi, quem ad modum dictum est: Patientia pauperum non peribit in aeternum. Neque enim aeterna erit ipsa patientia, quae necessaria non est, nisi ubi toleranda sunt mala; sed aeternum erit, quo per patientiam peruenitur. Ita fortasse timor castus in saeculum saeculi dictus est permanere, quia id permanebit, quo timor ipse perducit.

Quae cum ita sint, quoniam recta uita ducenda est, qua perueniendum sit ad beatam, omnes adfectus istos uita recta rectos habet, peruersa peruersos. Beata uero eademque aeterna amorem habebit et gaudium non solum rectum, uerum etiam certum; timorem autem ac dolorem nullum. Unde iam apparet utcumque, quales esse debeant in hac peregrinatione ciues ciuitatis Dei, uiuentes secundum spiritum, non secundum carnem, hoc est secundum Deum, non secundum hominem, et quales in illa, quo tendunt, inmortalitate futuri sint. Ciuitas porro, id est societas, inpiorum non secundum Deum, sed secundum hominem uiuentium et in ipso cultu falsae contemtuque uerae diuinitatis doctrinas hominum daemonumue sectantium his adfectibus prauis tamquam morbis et perturbationibus quatitur.

Et si quos ciues habet, qui moderari talibus motibus et eos quasi temperare uideantur, sic inpietate superbi et elati sunt, ut hoc ipso sint in eis maiores tumores, quo minores dolores. Et si nonnulli tanto inmaniore, quanto rariore uanitate hoc in se ipsis adamauerint, ut nullo prorsus erigantur et excitentur, nullo flectantur adque inclinentur adfectu: humanitatem totam potius amittunt, quam ueram adsequuntur tranquillitatem. Non enim quia durum aliquid, ideo rectum, aut quia stupidum est, ideo sanum.

ENGLISH

name "chaste fear" is meant that will by which we shall necessarily not wish to sin, and shall avoid sin not out of the anxiety of weakness, lest we should happen to sin, but out of the tranquillity of love. Or, if there can be no fear of any kind at all in that utterly certain security of everlasting and happy joys, then "The chaste fear of the Lord endures forever and ever" was said in the same way as "The patience of the poor will not perish forever." For patience itself will not be eternal, since it is needed only where evils have to be endured; but what is reached through patience will be eternal. So perhaps chaste fear is said to endure forever and ever because what fear leads us to will endure.[35]

This being so, since we must lead a right life by which to reach the happy life, a right life has all these affections right, and a perverse life has them perverse. But the happy life, which is also the eternal life, will have love and joy that are not only right but certain, and no fear or pain at all. From this it is already in some measure clear what the citizens of the city of God ought to be like in this pilgrimage, living according to the spirit, not according to the flesh—that is, according to God, not according to man—and what they will be like in that immortality toward which they are traveling. The city—that is, the society—of the ungodly, on the other hand, consists of those who live not according to God but according to man, and who, in their very worship of a false divinity and contempt for the true one, follow the teachings of men or of demons. That city is shaken by these depraved affections as by diseases and disturbances.

And if that city has some citizens who seem to restrain such emotions and, as it were, to temper them, they are so proud and puffed up in their impiety that in them the swelling is all the greater for the smarting being less. And if some, with a vanity as monstrous as it is rare, have become so enamored of this in themselves that they are not roused or stirred by any emotion at all, nor bent or swayed by any, they lose all their humanity rather than attain true tranquillity. For a thing is not right because it is hard, nor healthy because it is numb.

35 Psalm 9:19 (9:18 in most English Bibles).

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS IN PARADISE WERE AFFECTED BY ANY EMOTIONS BEFORE THEY SINNED

Before sin the first couple knew untroubled love and joy, without fear or grief.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.10	Sed utrum primus homo uel primi homines (duorum erat quippe coniugium) habebant istos adfectus in corpore animali ante peccatum, quales in corpore spiritali non habebimus omni purgato finitoque peccato, non inmerito quaeritur. Si enim habebant, quo modo erant beati in illo memorabili beatitudinis loco, id est paradiso? Quis tandem absolute dici beatus potest, qui timore adficitur uel dolore? Quid autem timere aut dolere poterant illi homines in tantorum tanta afluentia bonorum, ubi nec mors metuebatur nec ulla corporis mala ualetudo, nec aberat quicquam, quod bona uoluntas adipisceretur, nec inerat quod carnem animumue hominis feliciter uiuentis offenderet? Amor erat inperturbatus in Deum adque inter se coniugum fida et sincera societate uiuentium, et ex hoc amore grande gaudium, non desistente quod amabatur ad fruendum.	But it is not unreasonable to ask whether the first man, or rather the first human beings (for theirs was a marriage of two), had these emotions in their animal body before sin—emotions such as we shall not have in the spiritual body, when all sin has been purged away and brought to an end. For if they had them, how were they happy in that memorable place of happiness, that is, paradise? Who, after all, can be called happy without qualification if he is affected by fear or grief? And what could those human beings fear or grieve over, amid such an abundance of so many goods, where neither death was dreaded nor any ill health of the body, where nothing was lacking that a good will might obtain, and nothing was present that could hurt the flesh or the mind of a man living in happiness? Their love was untroubled, both toward God and toward each other, as husband and wife living in faithful and sincere partnership; and from this love came great joy, since what they loved never ceased to be there for them to enjoy.
	Erat deuitatio tranquilla peccati, qua manente nullum omnino alicunde malum, quod contristaret, inruebat. An forte cupiebant prohibitum lignum ad uescendum contingere, sed mori metuebant, ac per hoc et cupiditas et metus iam tunc illos homines etiam in illo perturbabat loco? Absit ut hoc existimemus fuisse, ubi nullum erat omnino peccatum. Neque enim nullum peccatum est ea quae lex Dei prohibet concupiscere adque ab his abstinere timore poenae, non amore iustitiae. Absit, inquam, ut ante omne peccatum iam ibi fuerit tale peccatum, ut hoc de ligno admitterent, quod de muliere Dominus ait: Si quis uiderit mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, iam moechatus est eam in corde suo.	There was a calm avoidance of sin, and as long as it lasted no evil from any quarter broke in to sadden them. Or did they perhaps desire to touch the forbidden tree and eat from it, but fear to die, so that even then both desire and fear were troubling those human beings, even in that place? Far be it from us to think that this was so where there was no sin at all. For it is certainly a sin to desire what the law of God forbids and to abstain from it out of fear of punishment, not out of love of justice. Far be it, I say, that before any sin there should already have been such a sin there—that they committed in regard to the tree what the Lord says about a woman: "Whoever looks at a woman to desire her has already committed adultery with her in his heart."[36]
	Quam igitur felices erant et nullis agitabantur perturbationibus animorum, nullis corporum laedebantur incommodis: tam felix uniuersa societas esset humana, si nec illi malum, quod etiam in posteros traicerent, nec quisquam ex eorum stirpe iniquitate	As happy, then, as they were—troubled by no disturbances of mind and harmed by no discomforts of body—so happy would the whole of human society have been, if neither they had committed the evil that they would also pass on to their descend-

36 Matthew 5:28.

LATIN	ENGLISH
committeret, quod damnationem reciperet; adque ista permanente felicitate, donec per illam benedictionem, qua dictum est: Crescite et multiplicamini, praedestinatorum sanctorum numerus conpleretur, alia maior daretur, quae beatissimis angelis data est, ubi iam esset certa securitas peccaturum neminem neminemque moriturum, et talis esset uita sanctorum post nullum laboris doloris mortis experimentum, qualis erit post haec omnia in incorruptione corporum reddita resurrectione mortuorum.	ants, nor anyone of their stock had committed by wickedness anything that would incur condemnation. And while this happiness lasted, until, through that blessing in which it was said, "Increase and multiply," the number of the predestined saints was complete, another and greater happiness would have been given: the one given to the most blessed angels, in which there would be the sure security that no one would sin and no one would die. And the life of the saints, without any experience of toil, pain, or death, would have been such as it will be after all these things, in the incorruption of bodies, once the resurrection of the dead has been granted.[37]

THE FALL OF THE FIRST MAN, IN WHICH A NATURE WELL MADE WAS CORRUPTED, AND CAN BE RESTORED ONLY BY ITS MAKER

God foresaw the fall; the devil deceived Eve through the serpent, and Adam sinned out of loyalty to her.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.11 Sed quia Deus cuncta praesciuit et ideo quoque hominem peccaturum ignorare non potuit: secundum id, quod praesciuit adque disposuit, ciuitatem sanctam debemus adserere, non secundum illud, quod in nostram cognitionem peruenire non potuit, quia in Dei dispositione non fuit. Neque enim homo peccato suo diuinum potuit perturbare consilium, quasi Deum quod statuerat mutare conpulerit; cum Deus praesciendo utrumque praeuenerit, id est, et homo, quem bonum ipse creauit, quam malus esset futurus, et quid boni etiam sic de illo esset ipse facturus. Deus enim etsi dicitur statuta mutare (unde tropica locutione in scripturis etiam paenituisse legitur Deum), iuxta id dicitur, quod homo sperauerat uel naturalium causarum ordo gestabat, non iuxta id, quod se Omnipotens facturum esse praesciuerat.	But since God foreknew all things, and therefore could not be unaware that man too would sin, we ought to give our account of the holy city according to what he foreknew and ordained, not according to what could not come to our knowledge because it was not part of God's plan. For man could not by his sin throw the divine counsel into disorder, as if he had forced God to change what he had decided. God in his foreknowledge anticipated both things: how evil the man whom he himself had created good would become, and what good he himself would make of him even so. For even if God is said to change his decisions (which is why in the Scriptures, by a figure of speech, we even read that God repented), this is said with respect to what man had expected, or what the order of natural causes was bringing about, not with respect to what the Almighty had foreknown he would do.
Fecit itaque Deus, sicut scriptum est, hominem rectum ac per hoc uoluntatis bonae. Non enim rectus esset bonam non habens uoluntatem. Bona igitur uoluntas opus est Dei; cum ea quippe ab illo factus est homo. Mala uero uoluntas prima, quoniam omnia opera mala praecessit in homine, defectus potius fuit quidam ab opere Dei ad sua opera quam opus ullum, et ideo mala opera, quia secundum se, non secundum Deum; ut eorum operum	So God made man, as it is written, upright, and therefore with a good will. For he would not be upright if he did not have a good will. A good will, then, is the work of God; for man was made by him with it. But the first evil will, since it preceded all evil works in man, was rather a kind of falling away from the work of God to its own works than any work at all. And those works were

37 Genesis 1:28.

LATIN	ENGLISH
tamquam fructuum malorum uoluntas ipsa esset uelut arbor mala aut ipse homo in quantum malae uoluntatis.	evil because they were according to self, not according to God. So the will itself, or man himself insofar as he had an evil will, was like an evil tree, and those works were like its evil fruit.
Porro mala uoluntas quamuis non sit secundum naturam, sed contra naturam, quia uitium est, tamen eius naturae est, cuius est uitium, quod nisi in natura non potest esse; sed in ea, quam creauit ex nihilo, non quam genuit Creator de semet ipso, sicut genuit Verbum, per quod facta sunt omnia; quia, etsi de terrae puluere Deus finxit hominem, eadem terra omnisque terrena materies omnino de nihilo est, animamque de nihilo factam dedit corpori, cum factus est homo.	Further, although an evil will is not according to nature but against nature, since it is a fault, it still belongs to the nature whose fault it is, for a fault cannot exist except in a nature. But it exists in a nature which the Creator created out of nothing, not one which he begot from himself, as he begot the Word, through whom all things were made. For although God fashioned man from the dust of the earth, that same earth and all earthly matter come entirely from nothing; and when man was made, God gave the body a soul made from nothing.[38]
Usque adeo autem mala uincuntur a bonis, ut, quamuis sinantur esse ad demonstrandum quam possit et ipsis bene uti iustitia prouidentissima Creatoris, bona tamen sine malis esse possint, sicut Deus ipse uerus et summus, sicut omnis super istum caliginosum aerem caelestis inuisibilis uisibilisque creatura; mala uero sine bonis esse non possint, quoniam naturae, in quibus sunt, in quantum naturae sunt, utique bonae sunt. Detrahitur porro malum non aliqua natura, quae accesserat, uel ulla eius parte sublata, sed ea, quae uitiata ac deprauata fuerat, sanata adque correcta. Arbitrium igitur uoluntatis tunc est uere liberum, cum uitiis peccatisque non seruit. Tale datum est a Deo; quod amissum proprio uitio, nisi a quo dari potuit, reddi non potest.	Evils are so thoroughly overcome by goods that, although they are permitted to exist in order to show how the Creator's most provident justice can make good use even of them, goods can nevertheless exist without evils—as God himself, the true and supreme God, does, and every heavenly creature, invisible and visible, above this murky air. But evils cannot exist without goods, because the natures in which they exist are certainly good insofar as they are natures. Moreover, an evil is removed not by taking away some nature that had been added, or any part of it, but by healing and correcting the nature that had been vitiated and depraved. The choice of the will, then, is truly free when it is not a slave to vices and sins. Such was the choice God gave; and once it has been lost through its own fault, it cannot be restored except by him who was able to give it.
Unde Veritas dicit: Si uos Filius liberauerit, tunc uere liberi eritis. Id ipsum est autem, ac si diceret: Si uos Filius saluos fecerit, tunc uere salui eritis. Inde quippe liberator, unde saluator.	Hence the Truth says: "If the Son sets you free, then you will be truly free." This is the same as if he had said: "If the Son saves you, then you will be truly saved." For he is our liberator on the very ground on which he is our Savior.[39]
Viuebat itaque homo secundum Deum in paradiso et corporali et spiritali. Neque enim erat paradisus corporalis propter corporis bona et propter mentis non erat spiritalis; aut uero erat spiritalis quo per interiores, et non erat corporalis quo per exteriores sensus homo frueretur. Erat plane utrumque propter utrumque.	So man lived according to God in a paradise that was both bodily and spiritual. For it was not a bodily paradise for the goods of the body without being a spiritual one for the goods of the mind; nor was it a spiritual one for man to enjoy through his inner senses without being a bodily one for him to

38 John 1:3.
39 John 8:36; "the Truth" is Christ, who calls himself the truth in John 14:6.

LATIN

Postea uero quam superbus ille angelus ac per hoc inuidus per eandem superbiam a Deo ad semet ipsum conuersus et quodam quasi tyrannico fastu gaudere subditis quam esse subditus eligens de spiritali paradiso cecidit (de cuius lapsu sociorumque eius, qui ex angelis Dei angeli eius effecti sunt, in libris undecimo et duodecimo huius operis satis, quantum potui, disputaui), malesuada uersutia in hominis sensum serpere adfectans, cui utique stanti, quoniam ipse ceciderat, inuidebat, colubrum in paradiso corporali, ubi cum duobus illis hominibus, masculo et femina, animalia etiam terrestria cetera subdita et innoxia uersabantur, animal scilicet lubricum et tortuosis anfractibus mobile, operi suo congruum, per quem loqueretur, elegit; eoque per angelicam praesentiam praestantioremque naturam spiritali nequitia sibi subiecto et tamquam instrumento abutens fallacia sermocinatus est feminae, a parte scilicet inferiore illius humanae copulae incipiens, ut gradatim perueniret ad totum, non existimans uirum facile credulum nec errando posse decipi, sed dum alieno cedit errori.

Sicut enim Aaron erranti populo ad idolum fabricandum non consensit inductus, sed cessit obstrictus, nec Salomonem credibile est errore putasse idolis esse seruiendum, sed blanditiis femineis ad illa sacrilegia fuisse conpulsum: ita credendum est illum uirum suae feminae, uni unum, hominem homini, coniugem coniugi, ad Dei legem transgrediendam non tamquam uerum loquenti credidisse seductum, sed sociali necessitudine paruisse. Non enim frustra dixit apostolus: Adam non est seductus, mulier autem seducta est, nisi quia illa quod ei serpens locutus est, tamquam uerum esset, accepit, ille autem ab unico noluit consortio dirimi nec in communione peccati; nec ideo minus reus, si sciens prudensque peccauit.

ENGLISH

enjoy through his outer senses. It was plainly both, for the sake of both.

That proud angel—and, because proud, envious—turned by that same pride away from God toward himself, and, choosing with a kind of tyrannical arrogance to rejoice in having subjects rather than to be a subject, he fell from the spiritual paradise. (I have argued sufficiently, as far as I was able, in the eleventh and twelfth books of this work, about his fall and that of his companions, who from being angels of God became his angels.) After this, seeking to creep into man's mind with a cunning that urges to evil—for he envied man for standing, since he himself had fallen—he chose a snake in the bodily paradise, where the other land animals too lived with those two human beings, male and female, subject to them and harmless. It was, of course, a slippery animal, moving in twisting coils, well suited to his work, and through it he would speak. Having subjected it to himself by spiritual wickedness, through his angelic presence and superior nature, and misusing it as an instrument, he spoke deceitfully to the woman. He began, that is, with the lower part of that human couple, so that he might reach the whole by degrees; for he did not think that the man was easily credulous or could be deceived by falling into error himself, but only by yielding to another's error.

Aaron did not consent to the erring people's making of an idol because he was persuaded, but gave in because he was constrained; nor is it credible that Solomon mistakenly thought idols should be served, but rather that he was driven to those sacrileges by the blandishments of women. In the same way, we must believe that the man—one with his one, human being with human being, spouse with spouse—was not led astray into transgressing God's law by believing his wife as if she spoke the truth, but obeyed her out of the bond of their partnership. For the apostle did not say without reason, "Adam was not deceived, but the woman was deceived," except because she accepted what the serpent said to her as though it were true, while he refused to be separated from his only companion, even in a partnership of sin. Nor was he any less guilty for that, since he sinned knowingly and with his eyes open.[40]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Unde et apostolus non ait: Non peccauit sed: Non est seductus; nam utique ipsum ostendit, ubi dicit: Per unum hominem peccatum intrauit in mundum, et paulo post apertius: In similitudine, inquit, praeuaricationis Adae. Hos autem seductos intellegi uoluit, qui id, quod faciunt, non putant esse peccatum; ille autem sciuit. Alioquin quo modo uerum erit: Adam non est seductus? Sed inexpertus diuinae seueritatis in eo falli potuit, ut ueniale crederet esse commissum. Ac per hoc in eo quidem, quo mulier seducta est, non est ille seductus, sed eum fefellit, quo modo fuerat iudicandum quod erat dicturus: Mulier, quam dedisti mecum, ipsa mihi dedit, et manducaui. Quid ergo pluribus? Etsi credendo non sunt ambo decepti, peccando tamen ambo sunt capti et diaboli laqueis inplicati.	That is why the apostle did not say, "He did not sin," but, "He was not deceived." For he certainly shows that Adam sinned when he says, "Through one man sin entered the world," and a little later, more plainly, "in the likeness of Adam's transgression." By "deceived" he meant those who do not think that what they are doing is a sin; but Adam knew. Otherwise how will it be true that "Adam was not deceived"? But having no experience of divine severity, he could be mistaken in this, that he believed what he had committed was pardonable. And so, though he was not deceived in the way the woman was deceived, he was mistaken about how the plea he was going to make would be judged: "The woman you gave to be with me, she gave it to me, and I ate." Why say more? Even if they were not both deceived by believing, they were both caught by sinning and entangled in the devil's snares.[41]

THE NATURE OF THE SIN COMMITTED BY THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS

The sin was grave because obeying so easy a command would have been so easy.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.12 Si quem uero mouet, quur aliis peccatis sic natura non mutetur humana, quem ad modum illa duorum primorum hominum praeuaricatione mutata est, ut tantae corruptioni, quantam uidemus adque sentimus, et per hanc subiaceret et morti ac tot et tantis tamque inter se contrariis perturbaretur et fluctuaret adfectibus, qualis in paradiso ante peccatum, licet in corpore animali esset, utique non fuit — si quis hoc mouetur, ut dixi, non ideo debet existimare leue ac paruum illud fuisse commissum, quia in esca factum est, non quidem mala nec noxia, nisi quia prohibita; neque enim quidquam mali Deus in illo tantae felicitatis loco crearet adque plantaret.	Someone may be troubled by the question why human nature is not changed by other sins in the way it was changed by that transgression of the first two human beings. By it, human nature became subject to the great corruption we see and feel, and through this to death, and it is disturbed and tossed about by so many, such great, and such conflicting emotions—which it certainly was not in paradise before sin, even though it was in an animal body. If anyone, as I said, is troubled by this, he should not think that the offense was light and small because it was committed in the matter of food—food that was not bad or harmful, except in being forbidden. For God would not create and plant anything evil in that place of such great happiness.
Sed oboedientia commendata est in praecepto, quae uirtus in creatura rationali mater quodam modo est omnium custosque uirtutum; quando quidem ita facta est, ut ei subditam esse sit utile; perniciosum autem suam, non eius a quo creata est facere uoluntatem. Hoc itaque de uno cibi genere non edendo, ubi aliorum tanta	But obedience was what the commandment enjoined, and in a rational creature this virtue is in a sense the mother and guardian of all the virtues, since such a creature was made in such a way that it is beneficial for it to be subject to him, and ruinous for it to do its own will rather than the will of 40 Aaron made the golden calf (Exodus 32), and Solomon's wives turned him to idols (1 Kings 11). The quotation is 1 Timothy 2:14.

41 Romans 5:12 and 5:14; Adam's plea is Genesis 3:12.

LATIN	ENGLISH
copia subiacebat, tam leue praeceptum ad obseruandum, tam breue ad memoria retinendum, ubi praesertim nondum uoluntati cupiditas resistebat, quod de poena transgressionis postea subsecutum est, tanto maiore iniustitia uiolatum est, quanto faciliore posset obseruantia custodiri.	him who created it. So this commandment—not to eat one kind of food, where such an abundance of others lay at hand—was so light to keep and so short to remember, especially since desire did not yet resist the will (that came afterward as the penalty of transgression). And it was violated with an injustice all the greater, the more easily it could have been observed and kept.

THAT IN ADAM'S TRANSGRESSION AN EVIL WILL CAME BEFORE THE EVIL ACT

Pride came first, in secret: the evil will preceded the evil act as self-pleasing turned away from God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.13 In occulto autem mali esse coeperunt, ut in apertam inoboedientiam laberentur. Non enim ad malum, opus perueniretur, nisi praecessisset uoluntas mala. Porro malae uoluntatis initium quae potuit esse nisi superbia? Initium enim omnis peccati superbia est. Quid est autem superbia nisi peruersae celsitudinis adpetitus? Peruersa enim est celsitudo deserto eo, cui debet animus inhaerere, principio sibi quodam modo fieri adque esse principium. Hoc fit, cum sibi nimis placet. Sibi uero ita placet, cum ab illo bono inmutabili deficit, quod ei magis placere debuit quam ipse sibi.	But they began to be evil in secret, and so they slid into open disobedience. For the evil deed would never have been reached unless an evil will had come first. And what could be the beginning of an evil will but pride? For "pride is the beginning of all sin." And what is pride but a craving for perverse exaltation? For it is a perverse exaltation to abandon the source to which the soul ought to cling, and in a sense to become and to be one's own source. This happens when the soul is too pleased with itself. And it is pleased with itself in this way when it falls away from that unchangeable good which ought to have pleased it more than it pleases itself.[42]
Spontaneus est autem iste defectus, quoniam, si uoluntas in amore superioris inmutabilis boni, a quo inlustrabatur ut uideret et accendebatur ut amaret, stabilis permaneret, non inde ad sibi placendum auerteretur et ex hoc tenebresceret et frigesceret, ut uel illa crederet uerum dixisse serpentem, uel ille Dei mandato uxoris praeponeret uoluntatem putaretque se uenialiter transgressorem esse praecepti, si uitae suae sociam non desereret etiam in societate peccati. Non ergo malum opus factum est, id est illa transgressio ut cibo prohibito uescerentur, nisi ab eis qui iam mali erant. Neque enim fieret ille fructus malus nisi ab arbore mala. Ut autem esset arbor mala, contra naturam factum est, quia nisi uitio uoluntatis, quod contra naturam est, non utique fieret.	This falling away is of the will's own accord. For if the will had remained steadfast in love for the higher, unchangeable good, by which it was illumined so that it might see and kindled so that it might love, it would not have turned away from that good to please itself, and so grown dark and cold. Then neither would she have believed that the serpent had spoken the truth, nor would he have put his wife's will ahead of God's command and thought that he would be a pardonable transgressor of the commandment if he did not desert the companion of his life even in a partnership of sin. So the evil deed—that is, the transgression of eating the forbidden food—was committed only by those who were already evil. For that evil fruit could only come from an evil tree. But that the tree became evil happened against nature, since it could certainly not have happened except through a fault of the will, which is against nature.
Sed uitio deprauari nisi ex nihilo facta natura non posset. Ac per hoc ut natura sit, ex eo habet quod a Deo facta est; ut autem ab eo quod est deficiat, ex hoc quod de nihilo facta est. Nec sic defecit homo, ut omnino nihil esset, sed ut inclinatus ad se ipsum minus esset, quam erat, cum ei qui summe est inhaerebat. Relicto itaque Deo esse in semet ipso, hoc est sibi placere, non iam nihil esse est, sed nihilo propinquare. Unde superbi secundum scripturas sanctas alio nomine appellantur sibi placentes. Bonum est enim sursum habere cor; non tamen ad se ipsum, quod est superbiae, sed ad Dominum, quod est oboedientiae, quae nisi humilium non potest esse.

LATIN

ENGLISH

But only a nature made from nothing could be depraved by a fault. And so its being a nature it has from having been made by God; but its falling away from what it is it has from having been made from nothing. Yet man did not fall away so far as to be nothing at all, but, turned toward himself, he was less than he was when he clung to him who supremely is. So to abandon God and to exist in oneself—that is, to please oneself—is not yet to be nothing, but it is to draw near to nothing. That is why, according to the holy Scriptures, the proud are called by another name: "self-pleasers." For it is good to have the heart lifted up—not to oneself, which belongs to pride, but to the Lord, which belongs to obedience, and obedience can belong only to the humble.[43]

Est igitur aliquid humilitatis miro modo quod sursum faciat cor, et est aliquid elationis quod deorsum faciat cor. Hoc quidem quasi contrarium uidetur, ut elatio sit deorsum et humilitas sursum. Sed pia humilitas facit subditum superiori; nihil est autem superius Deo; et ideo exaltat humilitas, quae facit subditum Deo. Elatio autem, quae in uitio est, eo ipso respuit subiectionem et cadit ab illo, quo non est quidquam superius, et ex hoc erit inferius et fit quod scriptum est: Deiecisti eos, cum extollerentur. Non enim ait: Cum elati fuissent ut prius extollerentur et postea deicerentur; sed cum extollerentur, tunc deiecti sunt. Ipsum quippe extolli iam deici est.

There is, then, something in humility which, in a wonderful way, lifts the heart up, and something in self-exaltation which brings the heart down. This seems a contradiction, that exaltation should lead downward and humility upward. But devout humility makes one subject to what is higher; and nothing is higher than God; and therefore humility, which makes one subject to God, exalts. Self-exaltation, on the other hand, which is a fault, by that very fact spurns subjection, falls away from him than whom nothing is higher, and so will be lower. Thus what is written comes to pass: "You cast them down when they were being lifted up." For it does not say, "when they had been lifted up," as if they were first raised and afterward cast down; but at the very moment they were being lifted up, they were cast down. For to be lifted up is itself already to be cast down.[44]

Quapropter quod nunc in ciuitate Dei et ciuitati Dei in hoc peregrinanti saeculo maxime commendatur humilitas et in eius rege, qui est Christus, maxime praedicatur contrariumque huic uirtuti elationis uitium in eius aduersario, qui est diabolus, maxime dominari sacris litteris edocetur: profecto ista est magna differentia, qua ciuitas, unde loquimur, utraque discernitur, una scilicet societas piorum hominum, altera inpiorum, singula quaeque cum angelis ad se pertinentibus, in quibus praecessit hac amor Dei, hac amor sui. Manifesto ergo apertoque peccato, ubi factum est quod Deus fieri prohibuerat, diabolus hominem non

Therefore humility is most highly commended in the city of God, and to the city of God on pilgrimage in this world, and it is most highly proclaimed in its king, who is Christ; and the sacred writings teach that the opposite vice, self-exaltation, holds sway above all in its adversary, who is the devil. Surely this is the great difference by which the two cities we are speaking of are distinguished: the one a society of devout people, the other of the impious, each with the angels belonging to it—cities in which love of God came first on the one side, 42 Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 10:13.

43 "Self-pleasers" is 2 Peter 2:10 in Augustine's Latin; "lift up the heart" echoes the liturgy's "Lift up your hearts."
44 Psalm 72:18 (73:18 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

cepisset, nisi iam ille sibi ipsi placere coepisset. Hinc enim et delectauit quod dictum est: Eritis sicut di. Quod melius esse possent summo ueroque principio cohaerendo per oboedientiam, non suum sibi existendo principium per superbiam.

Di enim creati non sua ueritate, sed Dei ueri participatione sunt di. Plus autem adpetendo minus est, qui, dum sibi sufficere deligit, ab illo, qui ei uere sufficit, deficit. Illud itaque malum, quo, cum sibi homo placet, tamquam sit et ipse lumen, auertitur ab eo lumine, quod ei si placeat et ipse fit lumen — illud, inquam, malum praecessit in abdito, ut sequeretur hoc malum quod perpetratum est in aperto. Verum est enim quod scriptum est: Ante ruinam exaltatur cor et ante gloriam humiliatur. Illa prorsus ruina, quae fit in occulto, praecedit ruinam, quae fit in manifesto, dum illa ruina esse non putatur. Quis enim exaltationem ruinam putat, cum iam ibi sit defectus, quo est relictus Excelsus?

Quis autem ruinam esse non uideat, quando fit mandati euidens adque indubitata transgressio? Propter hoc Deus illud prohibuit, quod cum esset admissum, nulla defendi posset imaginatione iustitiae. Et audeo dicere superbis esse utile cadere in aliquod apertum manifestumque peccatum, unde sibi displiceant, qui iam sibi placendo ceciderant. Salubrius enim Petrus sibi displicuit, quando fleuit, quam sibi placuit, quando praesumsit. Hoc dicit et sacer psalmus: Inple facies eorum ignominia, et quaerent nomen tuum, Domine, id est, ut tu eis placeas quaerentibus nomen tuum, qui sibi placuerant quaerendo suum.

ENGLISH

love of self on the other. So the devil would not have caught man in the manifest and open sin of doing what God had forbidden, if man had not already begun to be pleased with himself. This is why he was delighted by what was said: "You will be like gods." And they could have been this better by clinging to the supreme and true source through obedience, not by being their own source through pride.[45]

For created gods are gods not by their own truth but by participation in the true God. By craving more, one becomes less: while he chooses to suffice for himself, he falls away from the one who truly suffices for him. So that evil by which man, pleasing himself as if he himself were light, turns away from that light which, if it pleased him, would make him light too—that evil, I say, came first in secret, so that there followed this evil which was committed in the open. For what is written is true: "Before a fall the heart is exalted, and before glory it is humbled." The fall that happens in secret precedes the fall that happens in the open, while the first is not thought to be a fall. For who thinks exaltation is a fall, though the falling away by which the Most High has been forsaken is already there?[46]

But who does not see that it is a fall when an evident and unmistakable transgression of the commandment takes place? This is why God forbade something that, once committed, could not be defended by any pretense of justice. And I venture to say that it is useful for the proud to fall into some open and manifest sin, so that they may become displeasing to themselves—they who had already fallen by being pleasing to themselves. For Peter was in a healthier state when he was displeased with himself and wept than when he was pleased with himself and presumed. The sacred psalm says this too: "Fill their faces with shame, and they will seek your name, O Lord"—that is, so that you may please them as they seek your name, they who had pleased themselves by seeking their own.[47]

45 Genesis 3:5.
46 Proverbs 18:12.
47 Peter boasted he would never deny Christ, then wept bitterly after denying him (Matthew 26:33–75). The psalm is Psalm 82:17 (83:16 in most English Bibles).

THE PRIDE OF THE TRANSGRESSOR, WHICH WAS WORSE THAN THE TRANSGRESSION ITSELF

Adam and Eve made their sin worse by excusing themselves and blaming another.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.14	Sed est peior damnabiliorque superbia, qua etiam in peccatis manifestis suffugium excusationis inquiritur; sicut illi primi homines, quorum et illa dixit: Serpens seduxit me, et manducaui, et ille dixit: Mulier, quam dedisti mecum, haec mihi dedit a ligno, et edi. Nusquam hic sonat petitio ueniae, nusquam inploratio medicinae. Nam licet isti non sicut Cain quod commiserunt negent, adhuc tamen superbia in aliud quaerit referre quod perperam fecit: superbia mulieris in serpentem, superbia uiri in mulierem. Sed accusatio potius quam excusatio uera est, ubi mandati diuini est aperta transgressio. Neque enim hoc propterea non fecerunt, quia id mulier serpente suadente, uir muliere inpertiente commisit, quasi quidquam Deo, cui uel crederetur uel cederetur, anteponendum fuit.	But worse and more damnable is the pride that looks for the refuge of an excuse even when the sins are open ones. So it was with those first human beings. She said, "The serpent deceived me, and I ate," and he said, "The woman you gave to be with me—she gave me fruit from the tree, and I ate." Nowhere here is there any sound of a plea for pardon, nowhere an entreaty for healing. For although they do not deny what they committed, as Cain did, pride still seeks to shift onto someone else what it did wrong: the woman's pride onto the serpent, the man's pride onto the woman. But where a divine command has been openly transgressed, this is really an accusation rather than an excuse. Nor are they any less the doers of the deed because the woman committed it at the serpent's persuasion and the man at the woman's offering—as if anything ought to have been put before God, whom they should have believed and to whom they should have yielded![48]

THE JUSTICE OF THE RETRIBUTION THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS RECEIVED FOR THEIR DISOBEDIENCE

Disobedience was punished with disobedience: man can no longer command even his own mind and body.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.15	Quia ergo contemtus est Deus iubens, qui creauerat, qui ad suam imaginem fecerat, qui ceteris animalibus praeposuerat, qui in paradiso constituerat, qui rerum omnium copiam salutisque praestiterat, qui praeceptis nec pluribus nec grandibus nec difficilibus onerauerat, sed uno breuissimo adque leuissimo ad oboedientiae salubritatem adminiculauerat, quo eam creaturam, cui libera seruitus expediret, se esse Dominum commonebat: iusta damnatio subsecuta est, talisque damnatio, ut homo, qui custodiendo mandatum futurus fuerat etiam carne spiritalis, fieret etiam mente carnalis et, qui sua superbia sibi placuerat, Dei iustitia sibi donaretur; nec sic, ut in sua esset omnimodis potestate, sed a se ipse quoque dissentiens sub illo, cui peccando consensit, pro libertate, quam concupiuit, duram miseramque ageret seruitutem, mortuus spiritu uolens et corpore moriturus inuitus, desertor aeternae uitae etiam aeterna, nisi gratia liberaret, morte damnatus.	So God was held in contempt when he commanded. He had created man and made him in his own image. He had set him above the other animals and placed him in paradise. He had supplied him with an abundance of all things and of well-being. He had burdened him with commands neither many nor great nor difficult, but had supported him, for the healthiness of obedience, with one command, very brief and very light, by which he reminded that creature, for whom free service was beneficial, that he was its Lord. Because this God was despised, a just condemnation followed. And the condemnation was such that man, who by keeping the commandment would have become spiritual even in his flesh, became carnal even in his mind. He who had pleased himself in his pride was, by God's justice, handed over to himself. Yet not in such a way that he was wholly in his own 48 Genesis 3:13 and 3:12. Cain denied killing his brother Abel (Genesis 4:9).

LATIN

ENGLISH

power. Instead, at odds even with himself, under the one with whom he sided by sinning, he lived, in place of the freedom he craved, a harsh and wretched slavery: dead in spirit by his own will, and destined to die in body against his will; a deserter of eternal life, condemned to a death that would also be eternal, unless grace set him free.

Quisquis huius modi damnationem uel nimiam uel iniustam putat, metiri profecto nescit, quanta fuerit iniquitas in peccando, ubi tanta erat non peccandi facilitas. Sicut enim Abrahae non inmerito magna oboedientia praedicatur, quia, ut occideret filium, res difficillima est imperata: ita in paradiso tanto maior inboedientia fuit, quanto id, quod praeceptum est, nullius difficultatis fuit. Et sicut oboedientia secundi hominis eo praedicabilior, quo factus est oboediens usque ad mortem: ita inoboedientia primi hominis eo detestabilior, quo factus est inoboediens usque ad mortem. Ubi enim magna est inoboedientiae poena proposita et res a Creatore facilis imperata, quisnam satis explicet, quantum malum sit non oboedire in re facili et tantae potestatis imperio et tanto terrente supplicio?

Whoever thinks this kind of condemnation either excessive or unjust certainly does not know how to measure how great the wickedness of sinning was, when not sinning was so easy. For just as Abraham's obedience is rightly proclaimed great, because he was commanded something extremely difficult—to kill his son—so in paradise the disobedience was all the greater, the less difficult the command was. And just as the obedience of the second man is all the more praiseworthy because he became obedient even to death, so the disobedience of the first man is all the more detestable because he became disobedient even to death. For where a great penalty for disobedience has been set forth and the Creator has commanded something easy, who could adequately explain how great an evil it is not to obey in an easy matter, when so great a power commands it and so great a punishment threatens?[49]

Denique, ut breuiter dicatur, in illius peccati poena quid inoboedientiae nisi inoboedientia retributa est? Nam quae hominis est alia miseria nisi aduersus eum ipsum inoboedientia eius ipsius, ut, quoniam noluit quod potuit, quod non potest uelit? In paradiso enim etiamsi non omnia poterat ante peccatum, quidquid tamen non poterat, non uolebat, et ideo poterat omnia quae uolebat; nunc uero sicut in eius stirpe cognoscimus et diuina scriptura testatur: Homo uanitati similis factus est. Quis enim enumerat, quam multa quae non potest uelit, dum sibi ipse, id est uoluntati eius ipse animus eius eoque inferior caro eius, non obtemperat?

In short, to put it briefly: in the punishment of that sin, what was the retribution for disobedience if not disobedience? For what other misery does man have than his own disobedience against himself—so that, because he would not do what he could, he now wills what he cannot? In paradise, even if he could not do everything before he sinned, still whatever he could not do he did not will, and so he could do everything he willed. But now, as we recognize in his offspring and as divine Scripture testifies, "Man has become like vanity." For who can count how many things he wills that he cannot do, while he does not obey himself—that is, while his own mind, and his flesh, which is lower than his mind, do not obey his will?[50]

Ipso namque inuito et animus plerumque turbatur et caro dolet et ueterescit et moritur, et quidquid aliud patimur, quod non pateremur inuiti, si uoluntati nostrae nostra natura omni modo adque ex omnibus partibus oboediret. At enim aliquid caro patitur, quo seruire non

For against his will the mind is often disturbed, and the flesh feels pain, grows old and dies; and so with whatever else we suffer that we would not suffer against our will if our nature obeyed our will in every way and in all its parts. But, it may be 49 Abraham was commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac (Genesis 22). "Obedient even to death" echoes Philippians 2:8, said of Christ.

50 Psalm 143:4 (144:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

sinitur. Quid interest unde, dum tamen per iustitiam dominantis Dei, cui subditi seruire noluimus, caro nostra nobis, quae subdita fuerat, non seruiendo molesta sit, quamuis nos Deo non seruiendo molesti nobis potuerimus esse, non illi? Neque enim sic ille nostro, ut nos seruitio corporis indigemus, et ideo nostra est quod recipimus, non illius poena quod fecimus. Dolores porro, qui dicuntur carnis, animae sunt in carne et ex carne. Quid enim caro per se ipsam sine anima uel dolet uel concupiscit?

Sed quod concupiscere caro dicitur uel dolere, aut ipse homo est, sicut disseruimus, aut aliquid animae, quod carnis adficit passio, uel aspera, ut faciat dolorem, uel lenis, ut uoluptatem. Sed dolor carnis tantum modo offensio est animae ex carne et quaedam ab eius passione, dissensio, sicut animi dolor, quae tristitia nuncupatur, dissensio est ab his rebus, quae nobis nolentibus acciderunt. Sed tristitiam plerumque praecedit metus, qui et ipse in anima est, non in carne. Dolorem autem carnis non praecedit ullus quasi metus carnis, qui ante dolorem in carne sentiatur. Voluptatem uero praecedit adpetitus quidam, qui sentitur in carne quasi cupiditas eius, sicut fames et sitis et ea, quae in genitalibus usitatius libido nominatur, cum hoc sit generale uocabulum omnis cupiditatis.

Nam et ipsam iram nihil aliud esse quam ulciscendi libidinem ueteres definierunt; quamuis nonnumquam homo, ubi uindictae nullus est sensus, etiam rebus inanimis irascatur, et male scribentem stilum conlidat uel calamum frangat iratus. Verum et ista licet inrationabilior, tamen quaedam ulciscendi libido est, ut nescio qua, ut ita dixerim, quasi umbra retributionis, ut qui male faciunt, mala patiantur. Est igitur libido ulciscendi, quae ira dicitur; est libido habendi pecuniam, quae auaritia; est libido quomodocumque uincendi, quae peruicacia; est libido gloriandi, quae iactantia nuncupatur. Sunt multae uariaeque libidines, quarum nonnullae habent etiam uocabula propria, quaedam uero non habent. Quis enim facile dixerit, quid uocetur libido dominandi, quam tamen plurimum ualere in tyrannorum animis etiam ciuilia bella testantur?

ENGLISH

said, the flesh undergoes something that does not let it serve. What does it matter from what source, so long as, through the justice of God our master—whom we, his subjects, refused to serve—our flesh, which had been subject to us, troubles us by not serving us? We, by not serving God, could trouble ourselves, but not him. For he does not need our service as we need the service of the body; and so what we receive is a punishment for us, but what we did is no punishment for him. Moreover, the pains that are called pains of the flesh are pains of the soul, in the flesh and arising from the flesh. For what can the flesh, by itself and without the soul, feel either pain or desire?

When the flesh is said to desire or to feel pain, it is either the man himself, as we have argued, or some part of the soul that is affected by what the flesh undergoes—harshly, so as to cause pain, or gently, so as to cause pleasure. But pain of the flesh is simply the soul's being offended by the flesh, a kind of disagreement with what the flesh undergoes; just as the pain of the mind, which is called sadness, is a disagreement with things that have happened to us against our will. Sadness, however, is generally preceded by fear, which is itself in the soul, not in the flesh. Pain of the flesh, on the other hand, is not preceded by any kind of fear of the flesh, felt in the flesh before the pain. Pleasure, though, is preceded by a certain appetite, which is felt in the flesh as its craving—like hunger and thirst, and the one in the genitals that is most commonly called lust, though this is a general word for every craving.

Indeed, the ancients defined anger itself as nothing other than the lust for revenge—although sometimes a person grows angry even with inanimate things, where there is no sense of vengeance at all, and in anger smashes a stylus that writes badly or breaks a reed pen. But even this, though more irrational, is still a kind of lust for revenge: a sort of shadow, so to speak, of retribution, that those who do evil should suffer evil. So there is a lust for revenge, which is called anger; a lust for possessing money, which is called avarice; a lust for winning by any means, which is called obstinacy; a lust for glorying, which is called boastfulness. There are many different lusts, some of which have names of their own, while others do not. For who could easily say what the lust for domination is called? Yet the civil wars testify how powerful it is in the minds of tyrants.

LATIN	ENGLISH

THE EVIL OF LUST, A WORD THAT FITS MANY VICES BUT IS PROPERLY APPLIED TO THE STIRRINGS OF OBSCENE HEAT

Sexual lust overwhelms the mind more than any other, yet defies even the will of those who want it.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.16 Cum igitur sint multarum libidines rerum, tamen, cum libido dicitur neque cuius rei libido sit additur, non fere adsolet animo occurrere nisi illa, qua obscenae partes corporis excitantur. Haec autem sibi non solum totum corpus nec solum extrinsecus, uerum etiam intrinsecus uindicat totumque commouet hominem animi simul adfectu cum carnis adpetitu coniuncto adque permixto, ut ea uoluptas sequatur, qua maior in corporis uoluptatibus nulla est; ita ut momento ipso temporis, quo ad eius peruenitur extremum, paene omnis acies et quasi uigilia cogitationis obruatur.	Although, then, there are lusts for many things, when "lust" is mentioned without saying what it is lust for, what usually comes to mind is only the lust that arouses the shameful parts of the body. This lust lays claim not only to the whole body, and not only outwardly but inwardly as well. It stirs the whole person, the emotion of the mind joined and mingled with the appetite of the flesh, so that a pleasure follows that is greater than any other bodily pleasure. So much so that at the very moment its climax is reached, almost all the sharpness and, as it were, the watchfulness of thought is overwhelmed.
Quis autem amicus sapientiae sanctorumque gaudiorum coniugalem agens uitam, sed, sicut apostolus monuit, sciens suum uas possidere in sanctificatione et honore, non in morbo desiderii, sicut et gentes, quae ignorant Deum, non mallet, si posset, sine hac libidine filios procreare, ut etiam in hoc serendae prolis officio sic eius menti ea, quae ad hoc opus creata sunt, quem ad modum cetera suis quaeque operibus distributa membra seruirent, nutu uoluntatis acta, non aestu libidinis incitata?	But is there any lover of wisdom and of holy joys, living a married life yet knowing, as the apostle advised, "how to possess his vessel in holiness and honor, not in the disease of desire, like the Gentiles who do not know God," who would not prefer, if he could, to beget children without this lust? Then, even in this duty of sowing offspring, the members created for this work would serve his mind as all the other members serve it, each assigned to its own tasks—set in motion at the nod of the will, not stirred up by the surge of lust.[51]
Sed neque ipsi amatores huius uoluptatis siue ad concubitus coniugales siue ad inmunditias flagitiorum cum uoluerint commouentur; sed aliquando inportunus est ille motus poscente nullo, aliquando autem destituit inhiantem, et cum in animo concupiscentia ferueat, friget in corpore; adque ita mirum in modum non solum generandi uoluntati, uerum etiam lasciuiendi libidini libido non seruit, et cum tota plerumque menti cohibenti aduersetur, nonnumquam et aduersus se ipsam diuiditur commotoque animo in commouendo corpore se ipsa non sequitur.	But not even the lovers of this pleasure are aroused when they wish, whether for marital intercourse or for the impurities of shameful acts. Sometimes that motion is importunate when no one asks for it; at other times it deserts the one who longs for it, and while desire blazes in the mind, it is cold in the body. And so, strangely, lust fails to serve not only the will to beget but even the lust for wantonness. Though for the most part it wholly opposes the mind that restrains it, sometimes it is divided even against itself: having stirred the mind, it fails to follow through itself in stirring the body.

51 1 Thessalonians 4:4–5.

THE NAKEDNESS OF THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS, WHICH AFTER THEIR SIN THEY SAW AS SHAMEFUL AND TO BE COVERED

After sinning, Adam and Eve covered their genitals, which had begun to move against their will.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.17	Merito huius libidinis maxime pudet, merito et ipsa membra, quae suo quodam, ut ita dixerim, iure, non omni modo ad arbitrium nostrum mouet aut non mouet, pudenda dicuntur, quod ante peccatum hominis non fuerunt. Nam sicut scriptum est: Nudi erant, et non confundebantur, non quod eis sua nuditas esset incognita, sed turpis nuditas nondum erat, quia nondum libido membra illa praeter arbitrium commouebat, nondum ad hominis inoboedientiam redarguendam sua inoboedientia caro quodam modo testimonium perhibebat. Neque enim caeci creati erant, ut inperitum uulgus opinatur; quando quidem et ille uidit animalia, quibus nomina inposuit, et de illa legitur: Vidit mulier quia bonum lignum in escam et quia placet oculis ad uidendum.	Rightly, then, is this lust the chief cause of shame. And rightly are the very members that it moves or does not move by its own right, so to speak, and not wholly at our discretion, called pudenda, the parts that cause shame—which they were not before man sinned. For as it is written, "They were naked and were not ashamed." This was not because their nakedness was unknown to them, but because nakedness was not yet disgraceful. Lust did not yet move those members apart from their will; the flesh did not yet, as it were, bear witness by its own disobedience to convict man of his disobedience. For they were not created blind, as the uneducated crowd supposes. He saw the animals to which he gave names, and of her we read, "The woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasing to the eyes to look at."[52]
	Patebant ergo oculi eorum, sed ad hoc non erant aperti, hoc est non adtenti, ut cognoscerent quid eis indumento gratiae praestaretur, quando membra eorum uoluntati repugnare nesciebant. Qua gratia remota, ut poena reciproca inoboedientia plecteretur, extitit in motu corporis quaedam inpudens nouitas, unde esset indecens nuditas, et fecit adtentos reddiditque confusos. Hinc est quod, postea quam mandatum Dei aperta transgressione uiolarunt, scriptum est de illis: Et aperti sunt oculi amborum et agnouerunt quia nudi erant, et consuerunt folia fici et fecerunt sibi campestria. Aperti sunt, inquit, oculi amborum, non ad uidendum, nam et antea uidebant, sed ad discernendum inter bonum quod amiserant et malum quo ceciderant.	Their eyes, then, were open, but they were not opened to this—that is, not attentive to it—so as to recognize what the garment of grace was granting them, when their members did not know how to resist their will. When that grace was removed, so that disobedience might be punished by a matching penalty, there appeared in the movement of the body a certain shameless novelty, which made nakedness indecent. It made them attentive and left them confounded. That is why, after they had violated God's commandment by open transgression, it is written of them: "And the eyes of both were opened, and they recognized that they were naked, and they sewed fig leaves together and made themselves campestria." "The eyes of both were opened," it says—not to see, for they could see before, but to distinguish between the good they had lost and the evil into which they had fallen.[53]
	Unde et ipsum lignum, eo quod istam faceret dignoscentiam, si ad uescendum contra uetitum tangeretur, ex ea re nomen accepit, ut appellaretur lignum sciendi boni et mali. Experta enim morbi molestia euidentior fit etiam iucunditas sanitatis. Cognouerunt	This is also why the tree itself took its name from this: because it would produce this discernment if it were touched and eaten against the prohibition, it was called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. For once the discomfort of illness has been

52 Genesis 2:25 and 3:6.
53 Genesis 3:7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ergo quia nudi erant, nudati scilicet ea gratia, qua fiebat ut nuditas corporis nulla eos lege peccati menti eorum repugnante confunderet. Hoc itaque cognouerunt, quod felicius ignorarent, si Deo credentes et oboedientes non committerent, quod eos cogeret experiri infidelitas et inoboedientia quid noceret. Proinde confusi inoboedientia carnis suae, tamquam teste poena inoboedientiae suae, consuerunt folia fici et fecerunt sibi campestria, id est succinctoria genitalium. Nam quidam interpretes succinctoria posuerunt.	experienced, the pleasantness of health becomes all the clearer. They recognized, then, that they were naked—stripped, that is, of the grace that kept the nakedness of their bodies from confounding them, since no law of sin was yet resisting their mind. So they came to know what they would have been happier not knowing, if, believing and obeying God, they had not committed what forced them to learn by experience the harm done by unbelief and disobedience. Thus, confounded by the disobedience of their flesh, as by a punishment bearing witness to their own disobedience, "they sewed fig leaves together and made themselves campestria"—that is, coverings girded around the genitals. For some translators have put succinctoria [girdles].
Porro autem campestria latinum quidem uerbum est, sed ex eo dictum, quod iuuenes, qui nudi exercebantur in campo, pudenda operiebant; unde qui ita succincti sunt, campestratos uulgus appellat. Quod itaque aduersus damnatam culpa inoboedientiae uoluntatem libido inoboedienter mouebat, uerecundia pudenter tegebat. Ex hoc omnes gentes, quoniam ab illa stirpe procreatae sunt, usque adeo tenent insitum pudenda uelare, ut quidam barbari illas corporis partes nec in balneis nudas habeant, sed cum earum tegimentis lauent. Per opacas quoque Indiae solitudines, cum quidam nudi philosophentur, unde gymnosophistae nominantur, adhibent tamen genitalibus tegmina, quibus per cetera membrorum carent.	Now campestria is indeed a Latin word, but it comes from the fact that young men who exercised naked on the field (campus) covered their private parts; hence those girded in this way are commonly called campestrati. So what lust disobediently set in motion, against a will condemned for the guilt of disobedience, modesty modestly covered. From this, all nations, since they are descended from that stock, hold so firmly to the ingrained custom of veiling the private parts that some foreign peoples do not leave those parts of the body bare even in the baths, but bathe with their coverings on. And in the dark solitudes of India, though certain men practice philosophy naked, and are therefore called gymnosophists, they still put coverings on their genitals, though they have none on the rest of their bodies.[54]

THE SHAME ATTACHED TO INTERCOURSE, NOT ONLY ILLICIT BUT ALSO MARRIED

Intercourse, even lawful married intercourse, seeks privacy and shuns being seen.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.18 Opus uero ipsum, quod libidine tali peragitur, non solum in quibusque stupris, ubi latebrae ad subterfugienda humana iudicia requiruntur, uerum etiam in usu scortorum, quam terrena ciuitas licitam turpitudinem fecit, quamuis id agatur, quod eius ciuitatis nulla lex uindicat, deuitat tamen publicum etiam permissa adque inpunita libido conspectum, et uerecundia naturali habent prouisum lupanaria ipsa secretum faciliusque	As for the act itself that is carried out with such lust, it shuns public view. This is true not only of every kind of illicit intercourse, where hiding places are needed to escape human judgment, but even of the use of prostitutes, a baseness that the earthly city has made lawful. Although what is done there is something that no law of that city punishes, lust, even when permitted and unpun-

54 The campus is the Campus Martius at Rome, used for exercise. "Gymnosophists" is Greek for "naked philosophers," the Greek name for Indian ascetics.

LATIN	ENGLISH
potuit inpudicitia non habere uincla prohibitionis, quam inpudentia remouere latibula illius foeditatis. Sed hanc etiam ipsi turpes turpitudinem uocant, cuius licet sint amatores, ostentatores esse non audent. Quid? concubitus coniugalis, qui secundum matrimonialium praescripta tabularum procreandorum fit causa liberorum, nonne et ipse quamquam sit licitus et honestus, remotum ab arbitris cubile conquirit?	ished, still avoids being seen in public. Out of natural shame the brothels themselves have provided for privacy, and unchastity found it easier to be free of the chains of prohibition than shamelessness did to do away with the hiding places of that foulness. Even the base call this baseness: though they love it, they do not dare to put it on display. And what of marital intercourse, which takes place for the sake of begetting children, as the marriage contract prescribes? Lawful and honorable as it is, does it not also seek a bedroom removed from witnesses?
Nonne omnes famulos adque ipsos etiam paranymphos et quoscumque ingredi quaelibet necessitudo permiserat, ante mittit foras, quam uel blandiri coniux coniugi incipiat? Et quoniam, sicut ait etiam quidam Romani maximus auctor eloquii, omnia recte facta in luce se conlocari uolunt, id est adpetunt sciri: hoc recte factum sic adpetit sciri, ut tamen erubescat uideri. Quis enim nescit, ut filii procreentur, quid inter se coniuges agant? quando quidem ut id agatur, tanta celebritate ducuntur uxores; et tamen cum agitur, unde filii nascantur, nec ipsi filii, si qui inde iam nati sunt, testes fieri permittuntur. Sic enim hoc recte factum ad sui notitiam lucem adpetit animorum, ut tamen refugiat oculorum. Unde hoc, nisi quia sic geritur quod deceat ex natura, ut etiam quod pudeat comitetur ex poena?	Does it not send outside all the servants, and even the groomsmen and anyone whom some tie of family had allowed in, before husband and wife so much as begin to caress each other? A certain supreme master of Roman eloquence says that all right actions wish to be set in the light—that is, they seek to be known. Yet this right action seeks to be known in such a way that it still blushes to be seen. For who does not know what married couples do with each other so that children may be born? It is precisely so that this may be done that wives are married with such ceremony. And yet when the act from which children are born is performed, not even the children already born from it are allowed to witness it. Thus this right action seeks the light of minds, so as to be known, yet flees the light of eyes. Why is this, if not because what is fitting by nature is done in such a way that something shameful, by way of punishment, accompanies it?[55]

THAT THE IMPULSES OF ANGER AND LUST, WHICH STIR SO VICIOUSLY IN HUMAN BEINGS THAT THEY MUST BE CHECKED BY THE REINS OF WISDOM, DID NOT EXIST IN NATURE'S SOUND STATE BEFORE SIN

Anger and lust need reason's reins now but were not faulty in paradise; lust alone controls the genitals.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.19 Hinc est quod et illi philosophi, qui ueritati propius accesserunt, iram adque libidinem uitiosas animi partes esse confessi sunt, eo quod turbide adque inordinate mouerentur ad ea etiam, quae sapientia perpetrari uetat, ac per hoc opus habere moderatrice mente adque ratione. Quam partem animi tertiam uelut in arce quadam ad istas regendas perhibent conlocatam, ut illa imperante, istis seruientibus possit in homine iustitia ex omni animi parte seruari.	This is why even those philosophers who came closer to the truth admitted that anger and lust are faulty parts of the soul: they are moved turbulently and without order even toward things that wisdom forbids us to do, and so they need a mind and reason to govern them. This third part of the soul, they say, is placed as if in a citadel to rule the other two, so that, with it commanding and them

55 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 2.64.

LATIN

ENGLISH

serving, justice may be preserved in a person among all the parts of the soul.[56]

Hae igitur partes, quas et in homine sapiente ac temperante fatentur esse uitiosas, ut eas ab his rebus, ad quas iniuste mouentur, mens conpescendo et cohibendo refrenet ac reuocet adque ad ea permittat, quae sapientiae lege concessa sunt (sicut iram ad exercendam iustam cohercitionem, sicut libidinem ad propagandae prolis officium) — hae, inquam, partes in paradiso ante peccatum uitiosae non erant. Non enim contra rectam uoluntatem ad aliquid mouebantur, unde necesse esset eas rationis tamquam frenis regentibus abstinere. Nam quod nunc ita mouentur et ab eis, qui temperanter et iuste et pie uiuunt, alias facilius, alias difficilius, tamen cohibendo et repugnando modificantur, non est utique sanitas ex natura, sed languor ex culpa.

These parts, then, they admit are faulty even in a wise and temperate person. The mind must therefore curb and restrain them, reining them in and calling them back from the things toward which they are wrongly moved, and permitting them to go toward the things allowed by the law of wisdom—anger, for instance, to exercise just correction, and lust for the duty of propagating offspring. These parts, I say, were not faulty in paradise before sin. For they were not moved toward anything against a right will, so that they had to be held back by reason, governing them like reins. Now, indeed, they are moved in this way, and those who live temperately, justly and devoutly keep them in measure by restraining and resisting them, sometimes more easily, sometimes with more difficulty. But this is certainly not the health of nature; it is the sickness of guilt.

Quod autem irae opera aliarumque adfectionum in quibusque dictis adque factis non sic abscondit uerecundia, ut opera libidinis, quae fiunt genitalibus membris, quid causae est, nisi quia in ceteris membra corporis non ipsae adfectiones, sed, cum eis consenserit, uoluntas mouet, quae in usu eorum omnino dominatur? Nam quisquis uerbum emittit iratus uel etiam quemquam percutit, non posset hoc facere, nisi lingua et manus iubente quodam modo uoluntate mouerentur; quae membra, etiam cum ira nulla est, mouentur eadem uoluntate. At uero genitales corporis partes ita libido suo iuri quodam modo mancipauit, ut moueri non ualeant, si ipsa defuerit et nisi ipsa uel ultro uel excitata surrexerit.

Why is it, then, that shame does not hide the works of anger and of the other emotions, in all sorts of words and deeds, as it hides the works of lust performed by the genital members? What is the reason, if not that in the other cases it is not the emotions themselves that move the members of the body, but the will, once it has consented to them—and the will has complete mastery in their use? For whoever utters a word in anger, or even strikes someone, could not do so unless his tongue and hand were moved, in a sense, at the command of the will; and these same members are moved by the same will even when there is no anger at all. But lust has, so to speak, made the genital parts of the body its own property, so that they cannot move if it is absent, unless it has risen, either of its own accord or when aroused.

Hoc est quod pudet, hoc est quod intuentium oculos erubescendo deuitat; magisque fert homo spectantium multitudinem, quando iniuste irascitur homini, quam uel unius aspectum et quando iuste miscetur uxori.

This is what causes shame; this is what blushes and shuns the eyes of onlookers. A man will more readily bear a crowd of spectators when he is unjustly angry with another person than the gaze of a single one when he is justly united with his wife.

56 The division of the soul into reason, spirit (anger) and appetite (desire), with reason enthroned in the head, comes from Plato's Republic and Timaeus.

THE UTTERLY EMPTY INDECENCY OF THE CYNICS

The Cynics' doctrine of public intercourse was shameless and short-lived, and natural shame prevailed.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.20 Hoc illi canini philosophi, hoc est Cynici, non uiderunt, proferentes contra humanam uerecundiam quid aliud quam caninam, hoc est inmundam inpudentemque sententiam? ut scilicet, quoniam iustum est quod fit in uxore, palam non pudeat id agere nec in uico aut platea qualibet coniugalem concubitum deuitare. Vicit tamen pudor naturalis opinionem huius erroris. Nam etsi perhibent, hoc aliquando gloriabundum fecisse Diogenem, ita putantem sectam suam nobiliorem futuram, si in hominum memoria insignior eius inpudentia figeretur, postea tamen a Cynicis fieri cessatum est, plusque ualuit pudor, ut erubescerent homines hominibus, quam error, ut homines canibus esse similes adfectarent. Unde et illum uel illos, qui hoc fecisse referuntur, potius arbitror concumbentium motus dedisse oculis hominum nescientium quid sub pallio gereretur, quam humano premente conspectu potuisse illam peragi uoluptatem.	This is what those dog-philosophers, the Cynics, failed to see when they put forward against human modesty a view that is nothing if not doglike—that is, unclean and shameless. They held that, since what is done with one's wife is just, one should not be ashamed to do it openly, nor avoid marital intercourse in any street or square. Yet natural shame has overcome the opinion born of this error. For though it is said that Diogenes once did this, glorying in it, in the belief that his school would become more renowned if his shamelessness were fixed more conspicuously in people's memory, the Cynics afterward stopped doing it. Shame, which makes human beings blush before human beings, prevailed over error, which made human beings aspire to be like dogs. So I rather think that he, or they, who are reported to have done this merely presented the movements of intercourse to the eyes of onlookers who did not know what was happening under the cloak, rather than that such pleasure could actually be consummated under the pressure of human gaze.[57]
Ibi enim philosophi non erubescebant uideri se uelle concumbere, ubi libido ipsa erubesceret surgere. Et nunc uidemus adhuc esse philosophos Cynicos; hi enim sunt, qui non solum amiciuntur pallio, uerum etiam clauam ferunt; nemo tamen eorum audet hoc facere, quod si aliqui ausi essent, ut non dicam ictibus lapidantium, certe conspuentium saliuis obruerentur. Pudet igitur huius libidinis humanam sine ulla dubitatione naturam, et merito pudet.	For there the philosophers did not blush to be seen wanting to have intercourse, where lust itself would have blushed to rise. Even now we see that there are still Cynic philosophers: they are the ones who not only wear the cloak but also carry a club. Yet none of them dares to do this. If any had dared, they would be overwhelmed—I will not say by the blows of people stoning them, but certainly by the spittle of people spitting on them. Human nature, then, is beyond any doubt ashamed of this lust, and rightly so.
In eius quippe inoboedientia, quae genitalia corporis membra solis suis motibus subdidit et potestati uoluntatis eripuit, satis ostenditur, quid sit hominis illi primae inoboedientiae retributum; quod in ea parte maxime oportuit apparere, qua generatur ipsa natura, quae illo primo et magno in deterius est mutata peccato; a cuius nexu nullus eruitur, nisi id quod, cum omnes in uno essent, in communem perniciem perpetratum est et Dei iustitia uindicatum, Dei gratia in singulis expietur.	For in the disobedience of this lust, which has subjected the genital members of the body to its own motions alone and snatched them from the power of the will, it is shown clearly enough what was paid back to man for that first disobedience. And it was fitting that this should appear most of all in the part by which nature itself is generated—the nature that was changed for the worse by that first great sin. From its bond no one is set free unless what was committed to the common ruin when all 57 The name "Cynic" comes from the Greek for "dog." Diogenes of Sinope (4th century BC) was the most famous of the Cynics.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	were in one, and was punished by God's justice, is expiated in each individual by God's grace.

THE BLESSING OF MULTIPLYING HUMAN OFFSPRING, GIVEN BEFORE SIN, WHICH THE TRANSGRESSION DID NOT TAKE AWAY, THOUGH THE DISEASE OF LUST WAS ADDED TO IT

God's blessing to increase and multiply was given before sin and did not depend on lust.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.21 Absit itaque, ut credamus illos coniuges in paradiso constitutos per hanc libidinem, de qua erubescendo eadem membra texerunt, inpleturos fuisse quod in sua benedictione Deus dixit: Crescite et multiplicamini et replete terram. Post peccatum quippe orta est haec libido; post peccatum eam natura non inpudens amissa potestate, cui corpus ex omni parte seruiebat, sensit adtendit, erubuit ciuitate. Illa uero benedictio nuptiarum, ut coniugati crescerent et multiplicarentur et inplerent terram, quamuis et in delinquentibus manserit, tamen antequam delinquerent data est, ut cognosceretur procreationem filiorum ad gloriam conubii, non ad poenam pertinere peccati.	Far be it from us, then, to believe that the married couple placed in paradise would have fulfilled through this lust what God said in his blessing: "Increase and multiply and fill the earth." This was the lust that made them blush and cover those very members. For this lust arose after sin. It was after sin that nature, which was not shameless, lost the power to which the body had been subject in every part; then it felt this lust, noticed it, blushed at it, and covered it. But that blessing of marriage, that the married should increase and multiply and fill the earth, remained even in those who had sinned. Yet it was given before they sinned, so that it might be recognized that the procreation of children belongs to the glory of marriage, not to the punishment of sin.[58]
Sed nunc homines, profecto illius quae in paradiso fuit felicitatis ignari, nisi per hoc, quod experti sunt, id est per libidinem, de qua uidemus etiam ipsam honestatem erubescere nuptiarum, non potuisse gigni filios opinantur, alii scripturas diuinas, ubi legitur post peccatum puduisse nuditatis et pudenda esse contecta, prorsus non accipientes, sed infideliter inridentes; alii uero quamuis eas accipiant et honorent, illud tamen quod dictum est: Crescite et multiplicamini, non secundum carnalem fecunditatem uolunt intellegi, quia et secundum animam legitur tale aliquid dictum: Multiplicabis me in anima mea in uirtute, ut id, quod in genesi sequitur: Et inplete terram et dominamini eius, terram intellegant carnem, quam praesentia sua inplet anima eiusque maxime dominatur, cum in uirtute multiplicatur; carnales autem fetus sine libidine, quae post peccatum exorta inspecta, confusa uelata est, nec tunc nasci potuisse, sicut neque nunc possunt, nec in paradiso futuros fuisse, sed foris, sicut et factum est.	But people now are, of course, ignorant of the happiness that existed in paradise. So they suppose that children could not have been begotten except in the way they have experienced, that is, through lust, at which we see even the honorable state of marriage blush. Some of them do not accept the divine Scriptures at all, where we read that after sin the first couple were ashamed of their nakedness and covered their shameful parts; instead they mock them in unbelief. Others accept and honor the Scriptures, yet they want the words "Increase and multiply" to be understood not of fleshly fruitfulness. Their reason is that we read something similar said with reference to the soul: "You will multiply me in my soul in virtue." So they take what follows in Genesis, "And fill the earth and have dominion over it," and understand "earth" to mean the flesh, which the soul fills with its presence and over which it has the greatest dominion when it is multiplied in virtue. Fleshly offspring, however, they say, could not have been born then without lust, any more than they can be now. This lust arose after sin, was noticed, caused

58 Genesis 1:28.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	shame, and was covered. Nor, they say, would such offspring have been in paradise, but outside it, as indeed happened.[59]
Nam postea quam inde dimissi sunt, ad gignendos filios coierunt eosque genuerunt.	For it was only after they had been sent out from there that they came together to beget children and begot them.

THE BOND OF MARRIAGE, INSTITUTED AND BLESSED BY GOD FROM THE BEGINNING

Marriage between male and female was instituted and blessed by God from the beginning.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.22 Nos autem nullo modo dubitamus secundum benedictionem Dei crescere et multiplicari et inplere terram donum esse nuptiarum, quas Deus ante peccatum hominis ab initio constituit, creando masculum et feminam, qui sexus euidens utique in carne est. Huic quippe operi Dei etiam benedictio ipsa subiuncta est. Nam cum scriptura dixisset: Masculum et feminam fecit eos, continuo subdidit: Et benedixit eos Deus dicens: Crescite et multiplicamini et inplete terram et dominamini eius, et cetera.	We, however, have no doubt at all that to increase and multiply and fill the earth, in accordance with God's blessing, is the gift of marriage. God established marriage from the beginning, before man's sin, by creating male and female, and this difference of sex is certainly evident in the flesh. Indeed, the blessing itself was attached to this very work of God. For when Scripture had said, "Male and female he made them," it immediately added: "And God blessed them, saying, 'Increase and multiply and fill the earth and have dominion over it,'" and so on.[60]
Quae omnia quamquam non inconuenienter possint etiam ad intellectum spiritalem referri, masculum tamen et feminam non sicut simile aliquid etiam in homine uno intellegi potest, quia uidelicet in eo aliud est quod regit, aliud quod regitur; sed sicut euidentissime apparet in diuersi sexus corporibus, masculum et feminam ita creatos, ut prolem generando crescerent et multiplicarentur et inplerent terram, magnae absurditatis est reluctari.	All of this could, not inappropriately, also be given a spiritual interpretation. Still, "male and female" cannot be understood as referring to something similar within a single human being, namely, that in him there is one part that rules and another that is ruled. Rather, as is most evidently apparent in bodies of different sex, male and female were created so that by begetting offspring they might increase and multiply and fill the earth. To resist this is a great absurdity.
Neque enim de spiritu qui imperat et carne quae obtemperat, aut de animo rationali qui regit et inrationali cupiditate quae regitur, aut de uirtute contemplatiua quae excellit et de actiua quae subditur, aut de intellectu mentis et sensu corporis, sed aperte de uinculo coniugali, quo inuicem sibi uterque sexus obstringitur, Dominus interrogatus utrum liceret quacumque causa dimittere uxorem, quoniam propter duritiam cordis Israelitarum Moyses dari permisit libellum repudii, respondit adque ait: Non legistis, quia, qui fecit ab initio, masculum et feminam fecit eos et dixit: Propter hoc dimittet homo patrem et matrem et adhaerebit uxori suae, et erunt duo in carne una? Itaque	The Lord was asked whether it was lawful to divorce one's wife for any cause, since Moses, because of the hardness of heart of the Israelites, had permitted a certificate of divorce to be given. He answered and said: "Have you not read that he who made them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, 'For this reason a man shall leave father and mother and cling to his wife, and the two shall be in one flesh'? So they are no longer two, but one flesh. What therefore God has joined together, let no one separate." Here he was not speaking of the spirit that commands and the flesh that obeys, nor of the rational mind that

59 Psalm 137:3 (138:3 in most English Bibles).
60 Genesis 1:27–28.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	iam non sunt duo, sed una caro. Quod ergo Deus coniunxit, homo non separet.	rules and the irrational craving that is ruled, nor of the contemplative virtue that excels and the active virtue that is subordinate, nor of the understanding of the mind and the sense of the body. He was speaking plainly of the marriage bond, by which each sex is bound to the other.[61]
	Certum est igitur masculum et feminam ita primitus institutos, ut nunc homines duos diuersi sexus uidemus et nouimus, unum autem dici uel propter coniunctionem uel propter originem feminae, quae de masculi latere creata est. Nam et apostolus per hoc primum, quod Deo instituente praecessit, exemplum singulos quosque admonet, ut uiri uxores suas diligant.	It is certain, then, that male and female were established at the beginning just as we now see and know two human beings of different sex to be. They are called one either because of their union or because of the origin of the woman, who was created from the side of the man. For the apostle too uses this first example, which came first by God's own institution, to admonish each and every husband to love his wife.[62]

WHETHER CHILDREN WOULD HAVE BEEN BORN EVEN IN PARADISE IF NO ONE HAD SINNED, AND WHETHER THE REASON OF CHASTITY WOULD HAVE HAD TO FIGHT THERE AGAINST THE HEAT OF LUST

Without sin, children would have been begotten in paradise with the sexual organs obeying the will.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.23	Quisquis autem dicit non fuisse coituros nec generaturos, nisi peccassent, quid dicit, nisi propter numerositatem sanctorum necessarium hominis fuisse peccatum? Si enim non peccando soli remanerent, quia, sicut putant, nisi peccassent, generare non possent: profecto ut non soli duo iusti homines possent esse, sed multi, necessarium peccatum fuit. Quod si credere absurdum est, illud potius est credendum, quod sanctorum numerus quantus conplendae illi sufficit beatissimae ciuitati, tantus existeret, etsi nemo peccasset, quantus nunc per Dei gratiam de multitudine colligitur peccatorum, quo usque filii saeculi huius generant et generantur.	But whoever says that they would not have had intercourse or begotten children unless they had sinned—what is he saying but that man's sin was necessary to make up the number of the saints? For if by not sinning they would have remained alone, since, as these people think, they could not have begotten children unless they had sinned, then certainly sin was necessary so that there could be not just two righteous human beings but many. But if that is absurd to believe, we should believe instead that, even if no one had sinned, there would have come into being a number of saints large enough to complete that most blessed city—as large as the number now gathered by the grace of God out of the multitude of sinners, for as long as the children of this age beget and are begotten.
	Et ideo illae nuptiae dignae felicitate paradisi, si peccatum non fuisset, et diligendam prolem gignerent et pudendam libidinem non haberent. Sed quo modo id fieri posset, nunc non est quo demonstretur exemplo. Nec ideo tamen incredibile debet uideri etiam illud unum sine ista libidine uoluntati potuisse seruire, cui tot membra nunc seruiunt. An uero manus et pedes mouemus, cum uolumus, ad ea quae his membris agenda sunt, sine ullo	And so, if there had been no sin, that marriage, worthy of the happiness of paradise, would have produced offspring to be loved and would not have had lust to be ashamed of. How this could have happened, there is now no example to demonstrate. Yet that is no reason why it should seem incredible that this one member too could have served the will without this lust, when so

61 Matthew 19:4–6.
62 The apostle Paul, in Ephesians 5:25–33.

LATIN

renisu, tanta facilitate, quanta et in nobis et in aliis uidemus, maxime in artificibus quorumque operum corporalium, ubi ad exercendam infirmiorem tardioremque naturam agilior accessit industria; et non credimus ad opus generationis filiorum, si libido non fuisset, quae peccato inoboedientiae retributa est, oboedienter hominibus ad uoluntatis nutum similiter ut cetera potuisse illa membra seruire?

Nonne Cicero in libris de re publica, cum de imperiorum differentia disputaret et huius rei similitudinem ex natura hominis adsumeret, ut filiis dixit imperari corporis membris propter oboediendi facilitatem; uitiosas uero animi partes ut seruos asperiore imperio coherceri? Et utique ordine naturali animus anteponitur corpori, et tamen ipse animus imperat corpori facilius quam sibi. Verum tamen haec libido, de qua nunc disserimus, eo magis erubescenda extitit, quod animus in ea nec sibi efficaciter imperat, ut omnino non libeat, nec omni modo corpori, ut pudenda membra uoluntas potius quam libido commoueat; quod si ita esset, pudenda non essent. Nunc uero pudet animum resisti sibi a corpore, quod ei natura inferiore subiectum est.

In aliis quippe adfectionibus cum sibi resistit, ideo minus pudet, quia, cum a se ipso uincitur, ipse se uincit; etsi inordinate adque uitiose, quia ex his partibus, quae rationi subici debent, tamen a partibus suis ac per hoc, ut dictum est, a se ipso uincitur. Nam cum ordinate se animus uincit, ut inrationabiles motus eius menti rationique subdantur, si tamen et illa Deo subdita est, laudis adque uirtutis est. Minus tamen pudet, cum sibi animus ex uitiosis suis partibus non obtemperat, quam cum ei corpus, quod alterum ab illo est adque infra illum est et cuius sine illo natura non uiuit, uolenti iubentique non cedit.

ENGLISH

many members serve it now. We move our hands and feet when we will, to do the tasks proper to these members, without any resistance and with such ease as we see both in ourselves and in others —especially in craftsmen of every kind of bodily work, where a more agile skill has been added to train a weaker and slower nature. Do we, then, not believe that for the work of begetting children those members could have served human beings obediently at the will's command, just like the others, if there had been no lust, which was the retribution for the sin of disobedience?

Did not Cicero, in his books On the Republic, when he was discussing the different kinds of rule and drew an analogy from human nature, say that the members of the body are ruled like children because they obey so readily, but that the vicious parts of the soul are restrained like slaves by a harsher rule? Certainly in the natural order the soul is placed above the body, and yet the soul commands the body more easily than it commands itself. Nevertheless, this lust we are now discussing has become all the more shameful because in it the soul neither commands itself effectively, so as to feel no desire at all, nor commands the body fully, so that the will rather than lust should move the shameful members. If that were so, they would not be shameful. As it is, the soul is ashamed to be resisted by the body, which by its inferior nature is subject to it.[63]

For in other passions, when the soul resists itself, it is less ashamed, because when it is overcome by itself, it is itself that overcomes itself. This may happen in a disordered and vicious way, since it is overcome by those parts which ought to be subject to reason; still, it is overcome by its own parts, and so, as has been said, by itself. For when the soul overcomes itself in an orderly way, so that its irrational impulses are subjected to the mind and to reason—provided that the mind itself is subject to God—this deserves praise and is a mark of virtue. Even so, the soul is less ashamed when it is not obeyed by its own vicious parts than when the body, which is other than the soul and beneath it, and whose nature cannot live without it, refuses to yield when the soul wills and commands.

63 The passage survives only in fragments of Cicero's dialogue On the Republic (Book 3).

LATIN

Sed cum alia membra retinentur uoluntatis imperio, sine quibus illa, quae contra uoluntatem libidine concitantur, id quod adpetunt inplere non possunt, pudicitia custoditur, non amissa, sed non permissa delectatione peccati. Hunc renisum, hanc repugnantiam, hanc uoluntatis et libidinis rixam uel certe ad uoluntatis sufficientiam libidinis indigentiam procul dubio, nisi culpabilis inoboedientia poenali inoboedientia plecteretur, in paradiso nuptiae non haberent, sed uoluntati membra, ut cetera, ita cuncta seruirent.

Ita genitale aruum uas in hoc opus creatum seminaret, ut nunc terram manus, et quod modo de hac re nobis uolentibus diligentius disputare uerecundia resistit et conpellit ueniam honore praefato a pudicis auribus poscere, quur id fieret nulla causa esset, sed in omnia, quae de huius modi membris sensum cogitantis adtingerent, sine ullo timore obscenitatis liber sermo ferretur, nec ipsa uerba essent, quae uocarentur obscena, sed quidquid inde diceretur, tam honestum esset, quam de aliis cum loquimur corporis partibus. Quisquis ergo ad has litteras inpudicus accedit, culpam refugiat, non naturam; facta denotet suae turpitudinis, non uerba nostrae necessitatis; in quibus mihi facillime pudicus et religiosus lector uel auditor ignoscit, donec infidelitatem refellam, non de fide rerum inexpertarum, sed de sensu expertarum argumentantem.

Legit enim haec sine offensione, qui non exhorret apostolum horrenda feminarum flagitia reprehendentem, quae inmutauerunt naturalem usum in eum usum, qui est contra naturam, praecipue quia nos non damnabilem obscenitatem nunc, sicut ille, commemoramus adque reprehendimus, sed in explicandis, quantum possumus, humanae generationis effectibus uerba tamen, sicut ille, obscena uitamus.

ENGLISH

But when the other members are held in check by the command of the will—the members without which those aroused by lust against the will cannot accomplish what they seek—chastity is preserved. The delight in sin has not been lost, but it has not been permitted. This resistance, this opposition, this quarrel between will and lust, or at least this need for lust to be added before the will is sufficient—marriage in paradise would undoubtedly not have had it, had guilty disobedience not been punished by disobedience as its penalty. Instead, all the members, these as well as the rest, would have served the will.

So the organ created for this work would have sown the field of generation as the hand now sows the earth. As it is, when I wish to discuss this subject more carefully, modesty resists me and compels me to ask pardon of chaste ears with a respectful apology in advance. Then there would have been no reason for this. Instead, speech would have ranged freely, without any fear of obscenity, over everything that might come to mind when one thinks about members of this kind. There would not even be words called obscene; whatever was said about these matters would be as decent as what we say when we speak of other parts of the body. Whoever, then, comes to these pages with an unchaste mind, let him shun the guilt, not the nature; let him condemn the deeds of his own depravity, not the words my argument makes necessary. In these words the chaste and religious reader or listener will very readily pardon me, while I refute an unbelief that argues not from faith in things it has not experienced, but from its perception of things it has.

For anyone who does not shudder at the apostle when he rebukes the dreadful shameful acts of women who "exchanged the natural use for that which is against nature" will read these things without offense—especially since I am not now, as he was, mentioning and rebuking damnable obscenity. Rather, in explaining as far as I can the workings of human generation, I nevertheless, like him, avoid obscene words.[64]

64 Romans 1:26.

THAT HUMAN BEINGS WITHOUT SIN, REMAINING IN PARADISE BY THE MERIT OF OBEDIENCE, WOULD HAVE USED THEIR SEXUAL ORGANS TO BEGET CHILDREN JUST AS THEY USE THEIR OTHER MEMBERS, AT THE COMMAND OF THE WILL

Some people control unusual bodily functions at will, so unfallen humans could have begotten children without lust.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.24	Seminaret igitur prolem uir, susciperet femina genitalibus membris, quando id opus esset et quantum opus esset, uoluntate motis, non libidine concitatis. Neque enim ea sola membra mouemus ad nutum, quae conpactis articulata sunt ossibus, sicut manus et pedes et digitos, uerum etiam illa, quae mollibus remissa sunt neruis, cum uolumus, mouemus agitando et porrigendo producimus et torquendo flectimus et constringendo duramus, sicut ea sunt, quae in ore ac facie, quantum potest, uoluntas mouet. Pulmones denique ipsi omnium, nisi medullarum, mollissimi uiscerum et ob hoc antro pectoris communiti, ad spiritum ducendum ac remittendum uocemque emittendam seu modificandam, sicut folles fabrorum uel organorum, flantis, respirantis, loquentis, clamantis, cantantis seruiunt uoluntati.	The man, then, would have sown the offspring and the woman would have received it, with the genital members moved by the will, when it was needed and as much as was needed, not aroused by lust. For we move at our command not only those members that are jointed with solid bones, such as hands, feet, and fingers, but also those made of soft, slack sinews. When we will, we move these by shaking them, extend them by stretching, bend them by twisting, and stiffen them by contracting, as with the parts of the mouth and face that the will moves as far as it can. Even the lungs themselves, the softest of all the internal organs except the marrow, and for that reason protected in the cavern of the chest, serve the will, like the bellows of smiths or of organs, for drawing breath and letting it out and for producing or modulating the voice, whenever one blows, breathes, speaks, shouts, or sings.
	Omitto quod animalibus quibusdam naturaliter inditum est, ut tegmen, quo corpus omne uestitur, si quid in quocumque loco eius senserint abigendum, ibi tantum moueant, ubi sentiunt, nec solum insidentes muscas, uerum etiam haerentes hastas cutis tremore discutiant. Numquid quia id non potest homo, ideo Creator quibus uoluit animantibus donare non potuit? Sic ergo et ipse homo potuit oboedientiam etiam inferiorum habere membrorum, quam sua inoboedientia perdidit. Neque enim Deo difficile fuit sic illum condere, ut in eius carne etiam illud non nisi eius uoluntate moueretur, quod nunc nisi libidine non mouetur.	I pass over the fact that certain animals have it naturally implanted in them that, if they feel something that needs driving off anywhere on the covering that clothes their whole body, they can move that covering only at the spot where they feel it, and by a shiver of the skin shake off not only flies that settle on them but even spears that stick in them. Just because a human being cannot do this, was the Creator therefore unable to grant it to whatever living creatures he wished? In the same way, then, man himself could also have had the obedience even of his lower members, which he lost by his own disobedience. For it was not difficult for God to create him in such a way that even that part of his flesh which is now moved only by lust would have been moved only by his will.
	Nam et hominum quorundam naturas nouimus multum ceteris dispares et ipsa raritate mirabiles nonnulla ut uolunt de corpore facientium, quae alii nullo modo possunt et audita uix credunt. Sunt enim, qui et aures moueant uel singulas uel ambas simul. Sunt qui totam caesariem capite inmoto, quantum capilli occupant, deponunt ad frontem reuocantque cum uolunt. Sunt qui eorum quae uorauerint incredibiliter plurima et uaria	For we know, too, that some people have natures very different from the rest, remarkable for their very rarity, and can do certain things with their bodies at will which others cannot do at all and scarcely believe when they hear of them. There are people who move their ears, either one at a time or both together. There are people who, without moving the head, bring all their hair, as paululum praecordiis contrectatis tamquam de sacculo quod placuerit integerimum proferunt. Quidam uoces auium pecorumque et aliorum quorumlibet hominum sic imitantur adque exprimunt, ut, nisi uideantur, discerni omnino non possint. Nonnulli ab imo sine putore ullo ita numerosos pro arbitrio sonitus edunt, ut ex illa etiam parte cantare uideantur. Ipse sum expertus sudare hominem solere, cum uellet.

LATIN

Notum est quosdam flere, cum uolunt, adque ubertim lacrimas fundere. Iam illud multo est incredibilius, quod plerique fratres memoria recentissima experti sunt. Presbyter fuit quidam Restitutus nomine in paroecia Calamensis ecclesiae. Quando ei placebat (rogabatur autem ut hoc faceret ab eis, qui rem mirabilem coram scire cupiebant), ad imitatas quasi lamentantis cuiuslibet hominis uoces ita se auferebat a sensibus et iacebat simillimus mortuo, ut non solum uellicantes adque pungentes minime sentiret, sed aliquando etiam igne ureretur admoto sine ullo doloris sensu nisi postmodum ex uulnere; non autem obnitendo, sed non sentiendo non mouere corpus eo probabatur, quod tamquam in defuncto nullus inueniebatur anhelitus; hominum tamen uoces, si clarius loquerentur, tamquam de longinquo se audire postea referebat.

Cum itaque corpus etiam nunc quibusdam, licet in carne corruptibili hanc aerumnosam ducentibus uitam, ita in plerisque motionibus et adfectionibus extra usitatum naturae modum mirabiliter seruiat: quid causae est, ut non credamus ante inoboedientiae peccatum corruptionisque supplicium ad propagandam prolem sine ulla libidine seruire uoluntati humanae humana membra potuisse? Donatus est itaque homo sibi, quia deseruit Deum placendo sibi, et non oboediens Deo non potuit oboedire nec sibi. Hinc euidentior miseria, qua homo non uiuit ut uult. Nam si ut uellet uiueret, beatum se putaret; sed nec sic tamen esset, si turpiter uiueret.

ENGLISH

far as it extends, down onto the forehead and draw it back again when they wish. There are people who swallow an incredible number of different objects and then, with a slight squeeze of the diaphragm, bring up whichever one they please, perfectly intact, as if from a bag. Some imitate and reproduce the voices of birds and beasts and of any other people so exactly that, unless they are seen, they cannot be told apart at all. Some, without any stench, produce at will such rhythmic sounds from their lower end that they seem to be singing even from that part. I myself have known a man who used to sweat whenever he wished.

It is well known that some people can weep when they wish and shed floods of tears. But what follows is far more incredible, and a great many of the brothers witnessed it quite recently. There was a priest named Restitutus in the parish of the church of Calama. Whenever he pleased, he would do this. People who wanted to see this marvel with their own eyes used to ask him to. At the sound of voices imitating someone in mourning, he would withdraw from his senses and lie there exactly like a dead man. He felt nothing at all when people pinched and pricked him, and sometimes he was even burned by fire held close to him without any sensation of pain, except afterward from the wound. That his body was motionless not because he was resisting but because he felt nothing was proved by the fact that, as in a dead man, no breath could be detected. Yet afterward he reported that he had heard people's voices, if they spoke rather loudly, as if from far away.[65]

Even now, then, the body serves certain people marvelously in many movements and states beyond the usual limits of nature, though they lead this wretched life in corruptible flesh. Since this is so, what reason do we have not to believe that, before the sin of disobedience and the punishment of corruption, human members could have served the human will for the begetting of offspring without any lust? So man was handed over to himself, because he abandoned God by pleasing himself. Not obeying God, he could not obey even himself. Hence the more obvious misery, that man does not live as he wills. For if he lived as he 65 Calama (modern Guelma, Algeria) was a town in Numidia not far from Augustine's Hippo.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	wanted, he would think himself happy. But even so he would not be happy, if he lived shamefully.

THE TRUE HAPPINESS THAT TEMPORAL LIFE DOES NOT ATTAIN

No one lives as he wills unless he is happy, and true happiness must be eternal.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.25 Quamquam si diligentius adtendamus, nisi beatus non uiuit ut uult, et nullus beatus nisi iustus. Sed etiam ipse iustus non uiuet ut uult, nisi eo peruenerit, ubi mori falli offendi omnino non possit eique sit certum ita semper futurum. Hoc enim natura expetit, nec plene adque perfecte beata erit nisi adepta quod expetit. Nunc uero quis hominum potest ut uult uiuere, quando ipsum uiuere non est in potestate? Viuere enim uult, mori cogitur. Quo modo ergo uiuit ut uult, qui non uiuit quamdiu uult? Quod si mori uoluerit, quo modo potest ut uult uiuere, qui non uult uiuere?	And yet, if we look into it more carefully, no one lives as he wills unless he is happy, and no one is happy unless he is just. But even the just person will not live as he wills until he arrives where he cannot die, be deceived or be harmed in any way, and is certain that it will always be so. For this is what nature longs for, and it will not be fully and perfectly happy unless it gains what it longs for. But now what human being can live as he wills, when living itself is not in his power? He wants to live; he is compelled to die. How then does he live as he wills, when he does not live as long as he wills? And if he wishes to die, how can he live as he wills, when he does not will to live?
Et si ideo mori uelit, non quo nolit uiuere, sed ut post mortem melius uiuat: nondum ergo ut uult uiuit, sed cum ad id quod uult moriendo peruenerit. Verum ecce uiuat ut uult, quoniam sibi extorsit sibique imperauit non uelle quod non potest, adque hoc uelle quod potest, sicut ait Terentius: Quoniam non potest id fieri quod uis, / Id uelis quod possis: num ideo beatus est, quia patienter miser est? Beata quippe uita si non amatur, non habetur. Porro si amatur et habetur, ceteris omnibus rebus excellentius necesse est ametur, quoniam propter hanc amandum est quidquid aliud amatur.	Perhaps he wants to die not because he does not want to live, but in order to live better after death. Then he does not yet live as he wills. He will do so only when, by dying, he has reached what he wills. But suppose he does live as he wills, because he has forced himself and commanded himself not to want what he cannot have and to want what he can. As Terence says, "Since what you want cannot be, want what can." Is he happy, then, because he is patiently miserable? For if the happy life is not loved, it is not possessed. Further, if it is loved and possessed, it must be loved more than all other things, since whatever else is loved must be loved for its sake.[66]
Porro si tantum amatur, quantum amari digna est (non enim beatus est, a quo ipsa beata uita non amatur ut digna est): fieri non potest, ut eam, qui sic amat, non aeternam uelit. Tunc igitur beata erit, quando aeterna erit.	Further, suppose it is loved as much as it deserves to be loved, for no one is happy who does not love the happy life itself as it deserves. Then it is impossible that one who loves it in this way should not want it to be eternal. Therefore it will be a happy life only when it is eternal.

66 Terence, The Woman of Andros 305–306.

THAT WE SHOULD BELIEVE THE HAPPY PEOPLE LIVING IN PARADISE COULD HAVE FULFILLED THE DUTY OF BEGETTING CHILDREN WITHOUT SHAMEFUL DESIRE

Life in paradise was tranquil, and procreation there would have been an act of calm will.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.26	Viuebat itaque homo in paradiso sicut uolebat, quamdiu hoc uolebat quod Deus iusserat; uiuebat fruens Deo, ex quo bono erat bonus; uiuebat sine ulla egestate, ita semper uiuere habens in potestate. Cibus aderat ne esuriret, potus ne sitiret, lignum uitae ne illum senecta dissolueret. Nihil corruptionis in corpore uel ex corpore ullas molestias ullis eius sensibus ingerebat. Nullus intrinsecus morbus, nullus ictus metuebatur extrinsecus. Summa in carne sanitas, in animo tota tranquillitas. Sicut in paradiso nullus aestus aut frigus, sic in eius habitatore nulla ex cupiditate uel timore accidebat bonae uoluntatis offensio. Nihil omnino triste, nihil erat inaniter laetum.	So man lived in paradise as he willed, as long as he willed what God had commanded. He lived enjoying God, the good from whom his own goodness came. He lived without any want, and it was in his power to live so forever. Food was at hand so that he would not hunger, drink so that he would not thirst, and the tree of life so that old age would not wear him away. No corruption in the body, or arising from the body, inflicted any discomfort on any of his senses. No disease from within and no blow from without was feared. There was perfect health in the flesh and complete tranquillity in the soul. Just as in paradise there was no heat or cold, so in its inhabitant no craving or fear arose to thwart his good will. There was nothing sad at all, and nothing glad in an empty way.
	Gaudium uerum perpetuabatur ex Deo, in quem flagrabat caritas de corde puro et conscientia bona et fide non ficta, adque inter se coniugum fida ex honesto amore societas, concors mentis corporisque uigilia et mandati sine labore custodia. Non lassitudo fatigabat otiosum, non somnus premebat inuitum. In tanta facilitate rerum et felicitate hominum absit ut suspicemur non potuisse prolem seri sine libidinis morbo, sed eo uoluntatis nutu mouerentur membra illa quo cetera, et sine ardoris inlecebroso stimulo cum tranquillitate animi et corporis nulla corruptione integritatis infunderetur gremio maritus uxoris.	True joy flowed unceasingly from God, toward whom love blazed "from a pure heart and a good conscience and sincere faith." Between husband and wife there was a faithful partnership grounded in honorable love, a harmonious watchfulness of mind and body, and an effortless keeping of the commandment. No weariness tired man in his leisure, and no sleep overcame him against his will. Things were so easy and human beings so happy that we must never suspect that offspring could not have been begotten without the disease of lust. Rather, those members would have been moved at the bidding of the will like the others. Without the seductive goad of passion, with tranquillity of mind and body, and with no loss of her virginity, the husband would have been poured into his wife's embrace.[67]
	Neque enim quia experientia probari non potest, ideo credendum non est, quando illas corporis partes non ageret turbidus calor, sed spontanea potestas, sicut opus esset, adhiberet, ita tunc potuisse utero coniugis salua integritate feminei genitalis uirile semen inmitti, sicut nunc potest eadem integritate salua ex utero uirginis fluxus menstrui cruoris emitti. Eadem quippe uia posset illud inici, qua hoc potest eici. Ut enim ad pariendum non doloris gemitus, sed maturitatis inpulsus feminea uiscera	We should not refuse to believe this simply because it cannot be proved by experience. No turbulent heat would then have driven those parts of the body. Instead, a voluntary power would have employed them as needed. So the male seed could then have been introduced into the wife's womb with the integrity of the female genitals preserved, just as now, with that same integrity preserved, the flow of menstrual blood can be dis-

67 1 Timothy 1:5. The image of the husband "poured into his wife's embrace" echoes Virgil, Aeneid 8.406.

LATIN

relaxaret, sic ad fetandum et concipiendum non libidinis adpetitus, sed uoluntarius usus naturam utramque coniungeret. De rebus loquimur nunc pudendis et ideo, quamuis, antequam earum puderet, quales esse potuissent coniciamus ut possumus, tamen necesse est, ut nostra disputatio magis frenetur ea, quae nos reuocat, uerecundia, quam eloquentia, quae nobis parum subpetit, adiuuetur.

Nam cum id quod dico nec ipsi experti fuerint, qui experiri potuerunt (quoniam praeoccupante peccato exilium de paradiso ante meruerunt, quam sibi in opere serendae propaginis tranquillo arbitrio conuenirent), quo modo nunc, cum ista commemorantur, sensibus occurrit humanis nisi experientia libidinis turbidae, non coniectura placidae uoluntatis? Hinc est quod inpedit loquentem pudor, etsi non deficiat ratio cogitantem.

Verum tamen omnipotenti Deo, summo ac summe bono creatori omnium naturarum, uoluntatum autem bonarum adiutori et remuneratori, malarum autem relictori et damnatori, utrarumque ordinatori, non defuit utique consilium, quo certum numerum ciuium in sua sapientia praedestinatum etiam ex damnato genere humano suae ciuitatis inpleret, non eos iam meritis, quando quidem uniuersa massa tamquam in uitiata radice damnata est, sed gratia discernens et liberatis non solum de ipsis, uerum etiam de non liberatis, quid eis largiatur, ostendens. Non enim debita, sed gratuita bonitate tunc se quisque agnoscit erutum malis, cum ab eorum hominum consortio fit inmunis, cum quibus illi iusta esset poena communis.

Quur ergo non crearet Deus, quos peccaturos esse praesciuit, quando quidem in eis et ex eis, et quid eorum culpa mereretur, et quid sua gratia donaretur, posset ostendere, nec sub illo creatore ac dispositore peruersa inordinatio delinquentium rectum peruerteret ordinem rerum?

ENGLISH

charged from the womb of a virgin. For the one could be introduced by the same path by which the other can be expelled. In childbirth, it would have been not the groans of pain but the impulse of maturity that opened the woman's body. In the same way, for impregnation and conception it would have been not the craving of lust but a voluntary act that joined the two sexes. We are now speaking of shameful things. We are conjecturing as best we can what they might have been like before they were shameful. Even so, our discussion must be restrained by the modesty that holds us back rather than helped by eloquence, of which we have too little.

Even those who could have experienced what I am describing did not experience it. Sin came first, and they deserved exile from paradise before they could come together by tranquil choice in the work of begetting offspring. So now, when these things are mentioned, how can anything present itself to human senses except the experience of turbulent lust, rather than a conjecture about a calm will? This is why shame hinders the speaker, even though reason does not fail the thinker.

Nevertheless, God is almighty. He is the supreme and supremely good Creator of all natures, the helper and rewarder of good wills, the one who abandons and condemns bad wills, and the one who orders both. He certainly did not lack a plan by which to fill up the fixed number of citizens of his city, predestined in his wisdom, even from the condemned human race. He distinguishes them not by merits, since the whole mass has been condemned as if in a corrupted root, but by grace. And he shows those who are set free what he bestows on them, not only from their own case but also from the case of those not set free. For each person recognizes that he has been rescued from evils by a goodness that is not owed but freely given, when he is exempted from the company of those with whom he would justly have shared a common punishment.

Why, then, should God not create those whom he foreknew would sin? In them and through them he could show both what their guilt deserved and what his grace bestowed. And under such a Creator and Disposer, the perverse disorder of wrongdoers could not pervert the right order of things.

SINNERS, BOTH ANGELS AND HUMAN BEINGS, WHOSE PERVERSITY DOES NOT DISTURB PROVIDENCE

God foresaw that angels and humans would sin and permitted it, knowing how he would use their evil.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
14.27	Proinde peccatores, et angeli et homines, nihil agunt, quo inpediantur magna opera Domini, exquisita in omnes uoluntates eius, quoniam qui prouidenter adque omnipotenter sua cuique distribuit, non solum bonis, uerum etiam malis bene uti nouit. Ac per hoc propter meritum primae malae uoluntatis ita damnato adque obdurato angelo malo, ut iam bonam uoluntatem ulterius non haberet, bene utens Deus quur non permitteret, ut ab illo primus homo, qui rectus, hoc est bonae uoluntatis, creatus fuerat, tentaretur? Quando quidem sic erat institutus, ut, si de adiutorio Dei fideret bonus homo, malum angelum uinceret; si autem creatorem adque adiutorem Deum superbe sibi placendo desereret, uinceretur; meritum bonum habens in adiuta diuinitus uoluntate recta, malum uero in deserente Deum uoluntate peruersa.	Accordingly, sinners, both angels and humans, do nothing to hinder "the great works of the Lord, sought out according to all his wills." For he who providently and omnipotently assigns to each its own knows how to make good use not only of the good but also of the evil. The evil angel had been so condemned and hardened, in recompense for his first evil will, that he would never again have a good will. God makes good use of him. Why, then, should God not permit the first man, who had been created upright, that is, with a good will, to be tempted by this angel? For man had been so constituted that, if as a good man he trusted in God's help, he would conquer the evil angel. But if he proudly abandoned God, his Creator and helper, by pleasing himself, he would be conquered. He would have good merit in an upright will helped by God, and bad merit in a perverse will that abandoned God.[68]
	Quia et ipsum fidere de adiutorio Dei non quidem posset sine adiutorio Dei, nec tamen ideo ab his diuinae gratiae beneficiis sibi placendo recedere non habebat in potestate. Nam sicut in hac carne uiuere sine adiumentis alimentorum in potestate non est, non autem in ea uiuere in potestate est, quod faciunt qui se ipsos necant: ita bene uiuere sine adiutorio Dei etiam in paradiso non erat in potestate; erat autem in potestate male uiuere, sed beatitudine non permansura et poena iustissima secutura. Cum igitur huius futuri casus humani Deus non esset ignarus, quur eum non sineret inuidi angeli malignitate tentari? nullo modo quidem quod uinceretur incertus, sed nihilo minus praescius quod ab eius semine adiuto sua gratia idem ipse diabolus fuerat sanctorum gloria maiore uincendus.	For even trusting in God's help was something he certainly could not do without God's help. Yet this did not mean that he lacked the power to withdraw from these benefits of divine grace by pleasing himself. It is not in our power to live in this flesh without the support of food, but it is in our power not to live in it, as those do who kill themselves. In the same way, it was not in man's power, even in paradise, to live well without God's help. But it was in his power to live badly, though then his happiness would not last and a most just punishment would follow. Since, then, God was not ignorant of this future fall of man, why should he not allow him to be tempted by the malice of the envious angel? God was not at all uncertain that man would be conquered. But no less did he foreknow that this same devil was to be conquered by man's offspring, helped by his grace, to the greater glory of the saints.
	Ita factum est, ut nec Deum aliquid futurorum lateret, nec praesciendo quemquam peccare conpelleret et, quid interesset inter propriam cuiusque praesumtionem et suam tuitionem, angelicae et humanae rationali creaturae consequenti experientia demonstraret. Quis	So it came about that nothing in the future was hidden from God, and yet by foreknowing he compelled no one to sin. And through the experience that followed he demonstrated to the rational creation, angelic and human, what a difference there

68 Psalm 110:2 (111:2 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
enim audeat credere aut dicere, ut neque angelus neque homo caderet, in Dei potestate non fuisse? Sed hoc eorum potestati maluit non auferre adque ita, et quantum mali eorum superbia et quantum boni sua gratia ualeret, ostendere.	is between each one's own presumption and his protection. For who would dare to believe or say that it was not in God's power to ensure that neither angel nor man fell? But he preferred not to take this out of their power. In this way he showed both how much evil their pride could do and how much good his grace could do.

THE NATURE OF THE TWO CITIES, THE EARTHLY AND THE HEAVENLY

Two loves made two cities: love of self the earthly city, love of God the heavenly city.

LATIN	ENGLISH
14.28 Fecerunt itaque ciuitates duas amores duo, terrenam scilicet amor sui usque ad contemtum Dei, caelestem uero amor Dei usque ad contemtum sui. Denique illa in se ipsa, haec in Domino gloriatur. Illa enim quaerit ab hominibus gloriam; huic autem Deus conscientiae testis maxima est gloria. Illa in gloria sua exaltat caput suum; haec dicit Deo suo: Gloria mea et exaltans caput meum. Illi in principibus eius uel in eis quas subiugat nationibus dominandi libido dominatur; in hac seruiunt inuicem in caritate et praepositi consulendo et subditi obtemperando. Illa in suis potentibus diligit uirtutem suam; haec dicit Deo suo: Diligam te, Domine, uirtus mea.	Two loves have made two cities: the earthly city, love of self even to contempt of God; the heavenly city, love of God even to contempt of self. In short, the one glories in itself, the other in the Lord. For the one seeks glory from human beings, but for the other the greatest glory is God, the witness of conscience. The one lifts up its head in its own glory. The other says to its God, "My glory, and the one who lifts up my head." In the one, the lust for domination dominates its princes and the nations it subjugates. In the other, people serve one another in love, the leaders by taking counsel for others, the subjects by obeying. The one loves its own strength in its powerful men. The other says to its God, "I will love you, O Lord, my strength."[69]
Ideoque in illa sapientes eius secundum hominem uiuentes aut corporis aut animi sui bona aut utriusque sectati sunt, aut qui potuerunt cognoscere Deum, non ut Deum honorauerunt aut gratias egerunt, sed euanuerunt in cogitationibus suis, et obscuratum est insipiens cor eorum; dicentes se esse sapientes (id est dominante sibi superbia in sua sapientia sese extollentes) stulti facti sunt et inmutauerunt gloriam incorruptibilis Dei in similitudinem imaginis corruptibilis hominis et uolucrum et quadrupedum et serpentium (ad huiusce modi enim simulacra adoranda uel duces populorum uel sectatores fuerunt), et coluerunt adque seruierunt creaturae potius quam Creatori, qui est benedictus in saecula; in hac autem nulla est hominis sapientia nisi pietas, qua recte colitur uerus Deus, id expectans praemium in societate sanctorum non solum hominum, uerum etiam angelorum, ut sit Deus omnia in omnibus.	And so in the one city, its wise men, living according to man, have pursued the goods of the body or of their own mind, or of both. Or else those who were able to know God "did not honor him as God or give thanks, but became futile in their thinking, and their foolish heart was darkened. Claiming to be wise"—that is, exalting themselves in their own wisdom, under the domination of pride—"they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of an image of corruptible man and of birds and four-footed beasts and serpents." In the worship of such idols they were either the leaders of the peoples or their followers. "And they worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever." In the other city, however, there is no human wisdom except godliness, by which the true God is rightly worshiped. This godliness looks for its reward in the fellowship of the saints, not only 69 Psalm 3:4 (3:3 in most English Bibles); Psalm 17:2 (18:1 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	of humans but also of angels: “that God may be all in all.”[70]

70 Romans 1:21–25; 1 Corinthians 15:28.

Book XV

Cain and Abel to the flood
The two cities in history from Cain and Abel to Noah's ark.

THE TWO LINES OF THE HUMAN RACE, RUNNING FROM THE BEGINNING TOWARD DIFFERENT ENDS

The two cities' course through history begins with Cain, a citizen of this world, and Abel, a pilgrim.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
15.1	De felicitate paradisi uel de ipso paradiso et de uita ibi primorum hominum eorumque peccato adque supplicio multi multa senserunt, multa dixerunt, multa litteris mandauerunt. Nos quoque secundum scripturas sanctas uel quod in eis legimus uel quod ex eis intellegere potuimus earum congruentes auctoritati de his rebus in superioribus libris diximus. Enucleatius autem si ista quaerantur, multiplices adque multimodas pariunt disputationes, quae pluribus intexendae sint uoluminibus, quam hoc opus tempusque deposcit, quod non ita largum habemus, ut in omnibus, quae possunt requirere otiosi et scrupulosi, paratiores ad interrogandum quam capaciores ad intellegendum, nos oporteat inmorari.	On the happiness of paradise, on paradise itself, on the life the first human beings led there, and on their sin and punishment, many people have held many opinions, said many things and committed many things to writing. We too have spoken of these matters in the preceding books, following the holy Scriptures. We set out either what we read in them or what we were able to understand from them in keeping with their authority. If these questions are pursued in finer detail, however, they give rise to discussions of many kinds and many forms. These would need to be woven into more volumes than this work and the time allow. And our time is not so ample that we ought to linger over every question that might be raised by people with leisure and fastidious minds, who are readier to ask questions than able to understand the answers.
	Arbitror tamen satis nos iam fecisse magnis et difficillimis quaestionibus de initio uel mundi uel animae uel ipsius generis humani, quod in duo genera distribuimus, unum eorum, qui secundum hominem, alterum eorum, qui secundum Deum uiuunt; quas etiam mystice appellamus ciuitates duas, hoc est duas societates hominum, quarum est una quae praedestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum diabolo. Sed iste finis est earum, de quo post loquendum est. Nunc autem quoniam de exortu earum siue in angelis, quorum numerus ignoratur a nobis, siue in duobus primis hominibus satis dictum est, iam mihi uidetur earum adgrediendus excursus, ex quo illi duo generare coeperunt, donec homines generare cessabunt.	Still, I think we have now done enough with the great and very difficult questions about the beginning of the world, of the soul and of the human race itself. We have divided that race into two kinds: one made up of those who live according to man, the other of those who live according to God. In a mystical sense we also call these two cities, that is, two societies of human beings. One is predestined to reign forever with God, the other to undergo eternal punishment with the devil. But that is their end, which must be discussed later. Enough has now been said about their origin, whether among the angels, whose number is unknown to us, or in the first two human beings. So it seems to me that I must now take up their course, from the time when those two began to have children until human beings cease to have children.

LATIN

Hoc enim uniuersum tempus siue saeculum, in quo cedunt morientes succeduntque nascentes, istarum duarum ciuitatum, de quibus disputamus, excursus est.

Natus est igitur prior Cain ex illis duobus generis humani parentibus, pertinens ad hominum ciuitatem, posterior Abel, ad ciuitatem Dei. Sicut enim in uno homine, quod dixit apostolus, experimur, quia non primum quod spiritale est, sed quod animale, postea spiritale (unde unusquisque, quoniam ex damnata propagine exoritur, primo sit necesse est ex Adam malus adque carnalis; quod si in Christum renascendo profecerit, post erit bonus et spiritalis): sic in uniuerso genere humano, cum primum duae istae coeperunt nascendo adque moriendo procurrere ciuitates, prior est natus ciuis huius saeculi, posterius autem isto peregrinus in saeculo et pertinens ad ciuitatem Dei, gratia praedestinatus gratia electus, gratia peregrinus deorsum gratia ciuis sursum.

Nam quantum ad ipsum adtinet, ex eadem massa oritur, quae originaliter est tota damnata; sed tamquam figulus Deus (hanc enim similitudinem non inpudenter, sed prudenter introducit apostolus) ex eadem massa fecit aliud uas in honorem, aliud in contumeliam. Prius autem factum est uas in contumeliam, post uero alterum in honorem, quia et in ipso uno, sicut iam dixi, homine prius est reprobum, unde necesse est incipiamus et ubi non est necesse ut remaneamus, posterius uero probum, quo proficientes ueniamus et quo peruenientes maneamus. Proinde non quidem omnis homo malus erit bonus, nemo tamen erit bonus qui non erat malus; sed quanto quisque citius mutatur in melius, hoc in se facit nominari quod adprehendit celerius, et posteriore cooperit uocabulum prius.

Scriptum est itaque de Cain, quod condiderit ciuitatem; Abel autem tamquam peregrinus non condidit. Superna est enim sanctorum ciuitas, quamuis hic pariat ciues, in quibus peregrinatur, donec regni eius tempus adueniat, cum congregatura est omnes in suis corporibus resurgentes, quando eis promis sum dabitur regnum, ubi

ENGLISH

For this whole stretch of time, this age in which the dying give way and the newborn take their place, is the course of these two cities we are discussing.

So Cain was born first of those two parents of the human race, and he belonged to the city of men. Abel was born after him, and he belonged to the city of God. In each individual human being we experience what the apostle said: "It is not the spiritual that comes first, but the animal, and afterward the spiritual." Hence each of us, since we spring from a condemned stock, must first be bad and carnal, from Adam. But if we advance by being reborn into Christ, we will afterward be good and spiritual. So it is with the whole human race. When these two cities first began to run their course through birth and death, the citizen of this world was born first. After him came the one who was a pilgrim in this world and belonged to the city of God: predestined by grace, chosen by grace, by grace a pilgrim below, by grace a citizen above.[1]

For as far as he himself is concerned, he springs from the same lump, which is wholly condemned from its origin. But God, like a potter, made from the same lump one vessel for honor and another for dishonor. The apostle introduces this comparison not impudently but prudently. The vessel for dishonor was made first, and the other, for honor, afterward. For in each individual human being too, as I have already said, what is reprobate comes first. We must begin there, but we need not remain there. What is approved comes later. We arrive at it by making progress, and once we have reached it we remain there. Accordingly, not every bad person will become good, yet no one will be good who was not bad. But the sooner anyone is changed for the better, the more quickly he has himself called by what he has grasped, and he covers the earlier name with the later one.[2]

Accordingly, Scripture says of Cain that he founded a city, while Abel, as a pilgrim, founded none. For the city of the saints is on high, although it gives birth here to citizens, and in them it lives as a pilgrim until the time of its kingdom arrives.

1 1 Corinthians 15:46.
2 Romans 9:21.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	cum suo principe rege saeculorum sine ullo temporis fine regnabunt.	Then it will gather together all of them, rising again in their bodies, and the promised kingdom will be given to them. There they will reign with their prince, the King of the ages, without any end of time.[3]

THE CHILDREN OF THE FLESH AND THE CHILDREN OF THE PROMISE

Paul's allegory of Hagar and Sarah shows how the earthly Jerusalem served as an image of the heavenly city.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
15.2	Umbra sane quaedam ciuitatis huius et imago prophetica ei significandae potius quam praesentandae seruiuit in terris, quo eam tempore demonstrari oportebat, et dicta est etiam ipsa ciuitas sancta merito significantis imaginis, non expressae, sicut futura est, ueritatis. De hac imagine seruiente et de illa, quam significat, libera ciuitate sic apostolus ad Galatas loquitur: Dicite mihi, inquit, sub lege uolentes esse legem non audistis? Scriptum est enim, quod Abraham duos filios habuit, unum de ancilla et unum de libera. Sed ille quidem, qui de ancilla, secundum carnem natus est; qui autem de libera, per repromissionem; quae sunt in allegoria.	To be sure, a kind of shadow of this city, a prophetic image of it, served on earth at the time when it had to be shown. It served to signify the city rather than to make it present. This shadow too was called the holy city, by virtue of the image that signified, not of the truth expressed as it will be in the future. Of this image that serves, and of the free city it signifies, the apostle speaks to the Galatians in this way: "Tell me," he says, "you who want to be under the law, have you not heard the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by the slave woman and one by the free woman. The son of the slave woman was born according to the flesh, but the son of the free woman was born through the promise. These things are an allegory.[4]
	Haec enim sunt duo testamenta, unum quidem a monte Sina in seruitutem generans, quod est Agar; Sina enim mons est in Arabia, quae coniuncta est huic quae nunc est Hierusalem; seruit enim cum filiis suis. Quae autem sursum est Hierusalem, libera est, quae est mater nostra. Scriptum est enim: Laetare sterilis, quae non paris, erumpe et exclama, quae non parturis; quoniam multi filii desertae, magis quam eius quae habet uirum. Nos autem, fratres, secundum Isaac promissionis filii sumus. Sed sicut tunc, qui secundum carnem natus fuerat, persequebatur eum, qui secundum spiritum: ita et nunc. Sed quid dicit scriptura? Eice ancillam et filium eius; non enim heres erit filius ancillae cum filio liberae.	"For these are the two covenants. One, from Mount Sinai, bears children for slavery; this is Hagar. For Sinai is a mountain in Arabia, which is joined to the present Jerusalem, for she is in slavery with her children. But the Jerusalem above is free, and she is our mother. For it is written: 'Rejoice, you barren one who do not bear; break forth and cry aloud, you who are not in labor; for the children of the desolate woman are many, more than of her who has a husband.' Now we, brothers, are children of the promise, like Isaac. But just as at that time the one born according to the flesh persecuted the one born according to the spirit, so it is now also. But what does Scripture say? 'Cast out the slave woman and her son; for the son of the slave woman shall not be heir with the son of the free woman.'[5]
	Nos autem, fratres, non sumus ancillae filii, sed liberae, qua libertate Christus nos liberauit. Haec forma	Now we, brothers, are not children of the slave woman but of the free woman, with the freedom

3 Genesis 4:17.
4 Galatians 4:21–24.
5 Galatians 4:24–30, quoting Isaiah 54:1 and Genesis 21:10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
intellegendi de apostolica auctoritate descendens locum nobis aperit, quem ad modum scripturas duorum testamentorum, ueteris et noui, accipere debeamus. Pars enim quaedam terrenae ciuitatis imago caelestis ciuitatis effecta est, non se significando, sed alteram, et ideo seruiens. Non enim propter se ipsam, sed propter aliam significandam est instituta, et praecedente alia significatione et ipsa praefigurans praefigurata est.	with which Christ has set us free." This way of understanding comes down to us from apostolic authority, and it shows us how we ought to read the Scriptures of the two Testaments, the Old and the New. For one part of the earthly city was made an image of the heavenly city. It signified not itself but the other, and therefore it served. It was established not for its own sake but to signify another. And since it was itself preceded by another signification, the very thing that prefigured was itself prefigured.[6]
Namque Agar ancilla Sarrae eiusque filius imago quaedam huius imaginis fuit; et quoniam transiturae erant umbrae luce ueniente, ideo dixit libera Sarra, quae significabat liberam ciuitatem, cui rursus alio modo significandae etiam illa umbra seruiebat: Eice ancillam et filium eius; non enim heres erit filius ancillae cum filio meo Isaac, quod ait apostolus: Cum filio liberae. Inuenimus ergo in terrena ciuitate duas formas, unam suam praesentiam demonstrantem, alteram caelesti ciuitati significandae sua praesentia seruientem. Parit autem ciues terrenae ciuitatis peccato uitiata natura, caelestis uero ciuitatis ciues parit a peccato naturam liberans gratia unde illa uocantur uasa irae, ista uasa misericordiae.	For Hagar, Sarah's slave woman, and her son were a kind of image of this image. And since the shadows were to pass away when the light came, Sarah, the free woman, spoke. She signified the free city, which that shadow also served to signify in yet another way. She said: "Cast out the slave woman and her son; for the son of the slave woman shall not be heir with my son Isaac." The apostle puts this as "with the son of the free woman." So we find two forms in the earthly city: one displays its own presence, while the other serves by its presence to signify the heavenly city. Now nature, vitiated by sin, gives birth to the citizens of the earthly city. But grace, which frees nature from sin, gives birth to the citizens of the heavenly city. Hence the former are called vessels of wrath, and the latter vessels of mercy.[7]
Significatum est hoc etiam in duobus filiis Abrahae, quod unus de ancilla, quae dicebatur Agar, secundum carnem natus est Ismael, alter est autem de Sarra libera secundum repromissionem natus Isaac. Uterque quidem de semine Abrahae; sed illum genuit demonstrans consuetudo naturam, illum uero dedit promissio significans gratiam; ibi humanus usus ostenditur, hic diuinum beneficium commendatur.	This was also signified in Abraham's two sons. One, Ishmael, was born according to the flesh, of the slave woman called Hagar. The other, Isaac, was born according to the promise, of Sarah, the free woman. Both, indeed, were of Abraham's seed. But the one was begotten by ordinary custom, which displays nature, while the other was given by the promise, which signifies grace. In the one case human usage is shown; in the other, a divine gift is commended.

THE BARRENNESS OF SARAH, WHICH GOD'S GRACE MADE FRUITFUL

Isaac, born to barren Sarah by God's promise, signifies the children of grace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.3 Sarra quippe sterilis erat et desperatione prolis saltem de ancilla sua concupiscens habere, quod de se ipsa non se posse cernebat, dedit eam fetandam uiro, de quo parere	Sarah, you see, was barren. Despairing of offspring, she longed at least to have through her slave woman what she saw she could not have

6 Galatians 4:31–5:1.
7 Genesis 21:10; the phrases "vessels of wrath" and "vessels of mercy" come from Romans 9:22–23.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uoluerat nec potuerat. Exegit itaque etiam sic debitum de marito utens iure suo in utero alieno. Natus est ergo Ismael, sicut nascuntur homines, permixtione sexus utriusque, usitata lege naturae. Ideo dictum est: Secundum carnem; non quod ista beneficia Dei non sint aut non illa operetur Deus, cuius opifex sapientia adtingit, sicut scriptum est, a fine usque in finem fortiter et disponit omnia suauiter; sed ubi significandum fuerat Dei donum, quod indebitum hominibus gratia largiretur, sic oportuit dari filium, quem ad modum naturae non debebatur excursibus.	through herself. So she gave her to her husband to bear him children, the husband by whom she had wanted to bear children but could not. In this way, too, she claimed what her husband owed her, exercising her right through another woman's womb. Ishmael, then, was born as human beings are born, from the union of the two sexes, by the usual law of nature. That is why it is said: "according to the flesh." This is not because such things are not gifts of God, or because God does not bring them about. As it is written, his craftsman wisdom "reaches mightily from one end to the other and orders all things sweetly." But where God's gift was to be signified, a gift that grace bestows on human beings though it is not owed them, a son had to be given in a way not owed to the ordinary course of nature.[8]
Negat enim natura iam filios tali commixtioni maris et feminae, qualis esse poterat Abrahae et Sarrae in illa iam aetate, etiam mulieris accedente sterilitate, quae nec tunc parere potuit, quando non aetas fecunditati, sed aetati fecunditas defuit. Quod ergo naturae sic adfectae fructus posteritatis non debebatur, significat quod natura generis humani peccato uitiata ac per hoc iure damnata nihil uerae felicitatis in posterum merebatur. Recte igitur significat Isaac, per repromissionem natus, filios gratiae, ciues ciuitatis liberae, socios pacis aeternae, ubi sit non amor propriae ac priuatae quodam modo uoluntatis, sed communi eodemque inmutabili bono gaudens adque ex multis unum cor faciens, id est perfecte concors oboedientia caritatis.	For nature by then denies children to such a union of man and woman as Abraham and Sarah could have at that age. Besides, the wife was barren. She could not bear children even at the time when it was not her age that lacked fertility but her fertility that failed her age. A nature in that condition was not owed the fruit of descendants. This signifies that the nature of the human race, vitiated by sin and therefore justly condemned, deserved nothing of true happiness for the future. Rightly, then, does Isaac, born through the promise, signify the children of grace, the citizens of the free city, the partners in eternal peace. There will be no love of one's own will, a will that is in a sense private. Instead there will be an obedience of love that rejoices in a good common to all and unchangeable, and that makes one heart out of many. That is, there will be an obedience of love in perfect concord.

THE STRIFE OR THE PEACE OF THE EARTHLY CITY

The earthly city seeks peace through war; its goods are real, but lesser goods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.4 Terrena porro ciuitas, quae sempiterna non erit (neque enim, cum extremo supplicio damnata fuerit, iam ciuitas erit), hic habet bonum suum, cuius societate laetatur, qualis esse de talibus laetitia rebus potest. Et quoniam non est tale bonum, ut nullas angustias faciat amatoribus suis, ideo ciuitas ista aduersus se ipsam plerumque	The earthly city, however, will not be everlasting, for once it has been condemned to the final punishment it will no longer be a city. It has its good here, and it rejoices in sharing it, with such joy as can come from things of that kind. And since this is not the kind of good that causes its lovers no dis-

8 Wisdom 8:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
diuiditur litigando, bellando adque pugnando et aut mortiferas aut certe mortales uictorias requirendo. Nam ex quacumque sui parte aduersus alteram sui partem bellando surrexerit, quaerit esse uictrix gentium, cum sit captiua uitiorum; et si quidem, cum uicerit, superbius extollitur, etiam mortifera; si uero condicionem cogitans casusque communes magis quae accidere possunt aduersis angitur, quam eis quae prouenerunt secundis rebus inflatur, tantummodo mortalis est ista uictoria.	tress, this city is for the most part divided against itself by lawsuits, wars and battles. It seeks victories that are either deadly or, at the very least, mortal. For whatever part of it rises up in war against another part seeks to be the conqueror of nations, though it is itself the captive of vices. If, when it has conquered, it is lifted up in greater pride, its victory is also deadly. But it may reflect on the human condition and the misfortunes common to all, and be more troubled by the adversities that may befall it than puffed up by the successes that have come its way. Then its victory is merely mortal.
Neque enim semper dominari poterit permanendo eis, quos potuerit subiugare uincendo. Non autem recte dicitur ea bona non esse, quae concupiscit haec ciuitas, quando est et ipsa in suo humano genere melior. Concupiscit enim terrenam quandam pro rebus infimis pacem; ad eam namque desiderat peruenire bellando; quoniam si uicerit et qui resistat non fuerit, pax erit, quam non habebant partes in uicem aduersantes et pro bis rebus, quas simul habere non poterant, infelici egestate certantes. Hanc pacem requirunt laboriosa bella, hanc adipiscitur quae putatur gloriosa uictoria. Quando autem uincunt qui causa iustiore pugnabant, quis dubitet gratulandam esse uictoriam et prouenisse optabilem pacem? Haec bona sunt et sine dubio Dei dona, sunt.	For it will not be able to dominate permanently those whom it has been able to subjugate by conquest. Yet it is not right to say that the things this city desires are not goods, since even this city, in its own human kind, is better. For it desires a kind of earthly peace for the sake of the lowest things, and it longs to reach this peace by waging war. If it conquers and no one is left to resist, there will be peace. The opposing sides did not have this peace while they fought one another in unhappy want over things they could not both possess at once. This is the peace that toilsome wars seek. This is the peace won by what is thought a glorious victory. And when those who fought for the juster cause are victorious, who would doubt that the victory deserves congratulation and that a desirable peace has come? These things are goods, and without doubt they are gifts of God.
Sed si neglectis melioribus, quae ad supernam pertinent ciuitatem, ubi erit uictoria in aeterna et summa pace secura, bona ista sic concupiscuntur, ut uel sola esse credantur uel his, quae meliora creduntur, amplius diligantur: necesse est miseria consequatur et quae inerat augeatur.	But the better things belong to the city on high, where victory will be secure in eternal and supreme peace. If these better things are neglected, and these lesser goods are so desired that they are believed to be the only goods, or are loved more than the things believed to be better, then misery must follow, and the misery already present must increase.

THE FIRST FOUNDER OF THE EARTHLY CITY, A FRATRICIDE, WHOSE IMPIETY THE FOUNDER OF THE CITY OF ROME MATCHED BY KILLING HIS BROTHER

Cain killed Abel and Romulus killed Remus: the earthly city is founded in fratricide and divided against itself.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.5 Primus itaque fuit terrenae ciuitatis conditor fratricida; nam suum fratrem ciuem ciuitatis aeternae in hac terra peregrinantem inuidentia uictus occidit. Unde mirandum non est, quod tanto post in ea ciuitate condenda, quae	So the first founder of the earthly city was a fratricide. Overcome by envy, he killed his own brother, a citizen of the eternal city on pilgrimage in this earth. It is no wonder, then, that the same pattern fuerat huius terrenae ciuitatis, de qua loquimur, caput futura et tam multis gentibus regnatura, huic primo exemplo et, ut Graeci appellant, ἀρχετύπῳ quaedam sui generis imago respondit. Nam et illic, sicut ipsum facinus quidam poeta commemorauit illorum, Fraterno primi maduerunt sanguine muri. Sic enim condita est Roma, quando occisum Remum a fratre Romulo Romana testatur historia; nisi quod isti terrenae ciuitatis ambo ciues erant. Ambo gloriam de Romanae rei publicae institutione quaerebant, sed ambo eam tantam, quantam, ni unus esset,- habere non poterant.

LATIN

ENGLISH

returned so long afterward. When that city was founded which was to be the capital of this earthly city we are discussing, and to reign over so many nations, a kind of image of its own kind answered to this first example, to what the Greeks call ἀρχετύπῳ [the archetype]. For there too, as one of their poets put it when recalling that very crime, "the first walls were soaked with a brother's blood." That is how Rome was founded: Roman history attests that Remus was killed by his brother Romulus. The difference is that these two were both citizens of the earthly city. Both sought glory from establishing the Roman commonwealth, but both could not have as much glory as one would have alone.[9]

Qui enim uolebat dominando gloriari, minus utique dominaretur, si eius potestas uiuo consorte minueretur. Ut ergo totam dominationem haberet unus, ablatus est socius, et scelere creuit in peius, quod innocentia minus esset et melius. Hi autem fratres Cain et Abel non habebant ambo inter se similem rerum terrenarum cupiditatem, nec in hoc alter alteri inuidit, quod eius dominatus fieret angustior, qui alterum occidit, si ambo dominarentur (Abel quippe non quaerebat dominationem in ea ciuitate, quae condebatur a fratre), sed inuidentia illa diabolica, qua inuident bonis mali, nulla alia causa, nisi quia illi boni sunt, illi mali. Nullo enim modo fit minor accedente seu permanente consorte possessio bonitatis, immo possessio bonitas, quam tanto latius, quanto concordius indiuidua sociorum possidet caritas.

For one who wanted to glory in domination would surely have less dominion if a living partner diminished his power. So, that one man might have the whole dominion, his partner was removed. What would have been smaller and better through innocence grew into something worse through crime. The brothers Cain and Abel, however, did not both share a similar craving for earthly things. Nor did the one who killed the other envy him because his own dominion would be narrower if both ruled, for Abel was not seeking dominion in the city his brother was founding. It was rather that diabolical envy with which the bad envy the good, for no other reason than that the ones are good and the others bad. For the possession of goodness is in no way diminished when a partner joins in or remains. Indeed, goodness is a possession that the undivided love of partners holds all the more widely the more harmoniously they hold it.

Non habebit denique istam possessionem, qui eam noluerit habere communem, et tanto eam reperiet ampliorem, quanto amplius ibi potuerit amare consortem. Illud igitur, quod inter Remum et Romulum exortum est, quem ad modum aduersus se ipsam terrena ciuitas diuidatur, ostendit; quod autem inter Cain et Abel, inter duas ipsas ciuitates, Dei et hominum, inimicitias demonstrauit. Pugnant ergo inter se mali et mali; item pugnant inter se mali et boni: boni uero et boni, si perfecti sunt, inter se pugnare non possunt. Proficientes autem nondumque perfecti ita possunt, ut bonus quisque ex ea parte pugnet contra alterum, qua etiam contra

In short, whoever is unwilling to share this possession will not have it. And he will find it all the larger the more he is able to love the one who shares it. What arose between Remus and Romulus, then, shows how the earthly city is divided against itself. What arose between Cain and Abel displayed the enmity between the two cities themselves, the city of God and the city of men. So the bad fight with the bad, and the bad also fight with the good. But the good cannot fight with the good, if they are perfect. Those who are making progress but are not yet perfect can fight in this sense: each good 9 The poet is Lucan (Pharsalia 1.95). Romulus and Remus were the legendary twin founders of Rome.

LATIN	ENGLISH
semet ipsum; et in uno quippe homine caro concupiscit aduersus spiritum et spiritus aduersus carnem.	person fights against another in the same respect in which he also fights against himself. For even within a single human being "the flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh."[10]
Concupiscentia ergo spiritalis contra alterius potest pugnare carnalem uel concupiscentia carnalis contra alterius spiritalem, sicut inter se pugnant boni et mali; uel certe ipsae concupiscentiae carnales inter se duorum bonorum, nondum utique perfectorum, sicut inter se pugnant mali et mali, donec eorum, qui curantur, ad ultimam uictoriam sanitas perducatur.	So the spiritual desire of one person can fight against the carnal desire of another, or the carnal desire of one against the spiritual desire of another, just as the good and the bad fight each other. Or indeed the carnal desires of two good people, who are of course not yet perfect, can fight each other, just as the bad fight the bad. This goes on until the health of those who are being healed is brought to final victory.

THE WEAKNESSES THAT EVEN CITIZENS OF THE CITY OF GOD SUFFER AS A PUNISHMENT OF SIN DURING THE PILGRIMAGE OF THIS LIFE, AND FROM WHICH THEY ARE HEALED BY GOD'S CARE

Citizens of God's city are healed of their weaknesses by mutual forgiveness and by God's inward grace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.6 Languor est quippe iste, id est illa inoboedientia, de qua in libro quarto decimo disseruimus, primae inoboedientiae supplicium, et ideo non natura, sed uitium; propter quod dicitur proficientibus bonis et ex fide in hac peregrinatione uiuentibus: In uicem onera uestra portate, et sic adinplebitis legem Christi; item alibi dicitur: Corripite inquietos, consolamini pusillanimes, suscipite infirmos, patientes estote ad omnes; uidete ne quis malum pro malo alicui reddat; item alio loco: Si praeoccupatus fuerit homo in aliquo delicto, uos, qui spiritales estis, instruite huius modi in spiritu mansuetudinis, intendens te ipsum, ne et tu tenteris; et alibi: Sol non occidat super iracundiam uestram; et in euangelio: Si peccauerit in te frater tuus, corripe eum inter te et ipsum; item de peccatis, in quibus multorum cauetur offensio, apostolus dicit: Peccantes coram omnibus argue, ut ceteri timorem habeant.	For this weakness is the disobedience we discussed in the fourteenth book. It is the punishment of the first disobedience, and therefore it is not nature but a flaw. That is why the good who are making progress and living by faith during this pilgrimage are told: "Bear one another's burdens, and so you will fulfill the law of Christ." Again, elsewhere it is said: "Rebuke the restless, comfort the fainthearted, support the weak, be patient with all. See that no one repays anyone evil for evil." Again, in another place: "If someone has been caught in some fault, you who are spiritual should instruct such a person in a spirit of gentleness, looking to yourself, lest you too be tempted." And elsewhere: "Do not let the sun go down on your anger." And in the Gospel: "If your brother sins against you, rebuke him between you and him alone." Again, the apostle speaks of sins where care must be taken not to give offense to many: "Rebuke those who sin in front of everyone, so that the rest may stand in fear."[11]
Propter hoc et de uenia in uicem danda multa praecipiuntur et magna cura propter tenendam pacem, sine qua nemo poterit uidere Deum; ubi ille terror, quando iubetur seruus decem milium talentorum reddere debita, quae illi fuerant relaxata, quoniam	For this reason many precepts are given about granting pardon to one another, and great care is taken over keeping the peace, without which no one will be able to see God. Here belongs that terrifying passage where the servant is ordered to

10 Galatians 5:17.
11 Galatians 6:2; 1 Thessalonians 5:14–15; Galatians 6:1; Ephesians 4:26; Matthew 18:15; 1 Timothy 5:20.

LATIN	ENGLISH
debitum denariorum centum conseruo suo non relaxauit; qua similitudine proposita Dominus Iesus adiecit adque ait: Sic et uobis faciet Pater uester caelestis, si non dimiseritis unusquisque fratri suo de cordibus uestris. Hoc modo curantur ciues ciuitatis Dei in hac terra peregrinantes et paci supernae patriae suspirantes. Spiritus autem sanctus operatur intrinsecus, ut ualeat aliquid medicina, quae adhibetur extrinsecus.	pay back the debt of ten thousand talents that had been forgiven him. This was because he did not forgive his fellow servant a debt of a hundred denarii. Having set out this parable, the Lord Jesus added: "So also will your heavenly Father do to you, if each of you does not forgive his brother from your hearts." In this way the citizens of the city of God are healed while they live as pilgrims on this earth and sigh for the peace of their homeland above. But the Holy Spirit works within, so that the medicine applied from without may have some effect.[12]
Alioquin etiamsi Deus ipse utens creatura sibi subdita in aliqua specie humana sensus adloquatur humanos, siue istos corporis siue illos, quos istis simillimos habemus in somnis, nec interiore gratia mentem regat adque agat, nihil prodest homini omnis praedicatio ueritatis. Facit autem hoc Deus a uasis misericordiae irae uasa discernens, dispensatione qua ipse nouit multum occulta, sed tamen iusta.	Otherwise, suppose God himself, using a creature subject to him, were to address human senses in some human form. These might be the bodily senses, or those very similar senses we have in dreams. If he did not also rule and move the mind by inward grace, all preaching of the truth would be of no benefit to a person. But God does this, distinguishing vessels of wrath from vessels of mercy. He does so by a dispensation that he himself knows, deeply hidden, yet just.
Ipso quippe adiuuante mirabilibus et latentibus modis, cum peccatum quod habitat in membris nostris, quae potius iam poena peccati est, sicut apostolus praecipit, non regnat in nostro mortali corpore ad oboediendum desideriis eius nec ei membra nostra uelut iniquitatis arma exhibemus, conuertitur ad mentem non sibi ad mala, Deo regente, consentientem et eam regentem tranquillius nunc habebit, postea sanitate perfecta adque inmortalitate percepta homo sine ullo peccato in aeterna pace regnabit.	For he helps us in wonderful and hidden ways. Sin dwells in our members, though it is now rather the punishment of sin. As the apostle commands, it must not reign in our mortal body so that we obey its desires, and we must not offer our members to it as weapons of iniquity. When this is so, a person is turned toward a mind that, under God's rule, does not consent to sin for evil ends. He will now have that mind ruling more calmly. Afterward, when health has been made perfect and immortality received, he will reign without any sin in eternal peace.[13]

THE CAUSE OF CAIN'S CRIME AND HIS OBSTINACY IN IT, FROM WHICH NOT EVEN GOD'S WORD CALLED HIM BACK ONCE HE HAD CONCEIVED IT

God warned Cain to master his sin, but envy drove him to murder his brother.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.7 Sed hoc ipsum, quod sicut potuimus exposuimus, cum Deus locutus esset ad Cain eo more, quo cum primis hominibus per creaturam subiectam uelut eorum socius forma congrua loquebatur, quid ei profuit? Nonne conceptum scelus in necando fratre etiam post uerbum diuinae admonitionis inpleuit? Nam cum sacrificia	God spoke to Cain in the way he used to speak with the first human beings: through a creature subject to him, in a fitting form, as if he were their companion. We have explained this as well as we could. But what good did it do Cain? Did he not carry out the crime he had conceived, the murder

12 Hebrews 12:14; Matthew 18:23–35.
13 Romans 6:12–13; compare Romans 7:17.

LATIN

discreuisset amborum, in illius respiciens, huius despiciens, quod non dubitandum est potuisse cognosci signo aliquo adtestante uisibili, et hoc ideo fecisset Deus, quia mala erant opera huius, fratris uero eius bona: contristatus est Cain ualde et concidit facies eius. Sic enim scriptum est: Et dixit Dominus ad Cain: Quare tristis factus es et quare concidit facies tua? Nonne si recte offeras, recte autem non diuidas, peccasti? Quiesce; ad te enim conuersio eius, et tu dominaberis illius.

In hac admonitione uel monitu, quem Deus protulit ad Cain, illud quidem quod dictum est: Nonne si recte offeras, recte autem non diuidas, peccasti? quia non elucet quur uel unde sit dictum, multos sensus peperit eius obscuritas, cum diuinarum scripturarum quisque tractator secundum fidei regulam id conatur exponere. Recte quippe offertur sacrificium, cum offertur Deo uero, cui uni tantummodo sacrificandum est.

Non autem recte diuiditur, dum non discernuntur recte uel loca uel tempora uel res ipsae quae offeruntur uel qui offert et cui offertur uel hi, quibus ad uescendum distribuitur quod oblatum est, ut diuisionem hic discretionem intellegamus; siue cum offertur ubi non oportet, aut quod non ibi sed alibi oportet, siue cum offertur quando non oportet, aut quod non tunc sed alias oportet, siue cum id offertur, quod nusquam et numquam penitus debuit, siue cum electiora sibi eiusdem generis rerum tenet homo, quam sunt ea, quae offert Deo, siue eius rei, quae oblata est, fit particeps profanus aut quilibet quem fas non est fieri. In quo autem horum Deo displicuerit Cain, facile non potest inueniri.

Sed quoniam Iohannes apostolus, cum de his fratribus loqueretur: Non sicut Cain, inquit, ex maligno erat et occidit fratrem suum; et cuius rei gratia occidit? Quia opera illius maligna fuerunt, fratris autem eius iusta:

ENGLISH

of his brother, even after the word of divine warning? God had distinguished between the sacrifices of the two, regarding the one's and disregarding the other's. There is no doubt that this could have been recognized by some visible sign bearing witness to it. God had done this because Cain's works were evil and his brother's good. Then Cain was very sad, and his face fell. For so it is written: "And the Lord said to Cain: 'Why have you become sad, and why has your face fallen? If you offer rightly but do not divide rightly, have you not sinned? Be still; for its turning is toward you, and you shall rule over it.'"[14]

This admonition, or warning, was delivered by God to Cain. In it the words "If you offer rightly but do not divide rightly, have you not sinned?" do not make clear why or on what basis they were said. Their obscurity has therefore given birth to many interpretations, as each commentator on the divine Scriptures tries to explain them according to the rule of faith. A sacrifice is rightly offered, of course, when it is offered to the true God, the only one to whom sacrifice must be made.

But it is not rightly divided when there is no right discernment of the places, or the times, or the things offered, or the one who offers and the one to whom the offering is made, or those among whom what has been offered is distributed to be eaten. Here, that is, we take "division" to mean "discernment." So it is not rightly divided when something is offered where it should not be, or when something is offered there that ought to be offered elsewhere. The same is true when it is offered when it should not be, or when something is offered then that ought to be offered at another time. It is also true when something is offered that should never have been offered at all, anywhere or at any time. Or a person keeps for himself choicer things of the same kind than those he offers to God. Or a profane person, or anyone for whom it is not lawful, comes to share in what has been offered. But in which of these ways Cain displeased God cannot easily be discovered.

The apostle John, however, speaking of these brothers, says: "Not like Cain, who was of the evil one and killed his brother. And why did he kill him? Because his works were evil, but his broth-

14 Genesis 4:6–7, in the form of the Greek Septuagint, which Augustine's Latin Bible followed here.

LATIN

datur intellegi propterea Deum non respexisse in munus eius, quia hoc ipso male diuidebat, dans Deo aliquid suum, sibi autem se ipsum. Quod omnes faciunt, qui non Dei, sed suam sectantes uoluntatem, id est non recto, sed peruerso corde uiuentes, offerunt tamen Deo munus, quo putant eum redimi, ut eorum non opituletur sanandis prauis cupiditatibus, sed explendis. Et hoc est terrenae proprium ciuitatis, Deum uel deos colere, quibus adiuuantibus regnet in uictoriis et pace terrena, non caritate consulendi, sed dominandi cupiditate.

Boni quippe ad hoc utuntur mundo, ut fruantur Deo; mali autem contra, ut fruantur mundo, uti uolunt Deo; qui tamen eum uel esse uel res humanas curare iam credunt. Sunt enim multo deteriores, qui ne hoc quidem credunt. Cognito itaque Cain quod super eius germani sacrificium, nec super suum respexerat Deus, utique fratrem bonum mutatus imitari, non elatus debuit aemulari. Sed contristatus est et concidit facies eius. Hoc peccatum maxime arguit Deus, tristitiam de alterius bonitate, et hoc fratris. Hoc quippe arguendo interrogauit dicens: Quare contristatus es, et quare concidit facies tua? Quia enim fratri inuidebat, Deus uidebat et hoc arguebat.

Nam hominibus, quibus absconditum est cor alterius, esse posset ambiguum et prorsus incertum, utrum illa tristitia malignitatem suam, in qua se Deo displicuisse didicerat, an fratris doluerit bonitatem, quae Deo placuit, cum in sacrificium eius adspexit. Sed rationem reddens Deus, quur eius oblationem accipere noluerit, ut sibi ipse potius merito quam ei frater inmerito displiceret, cum esset iniustus non recte diuidendo, hoc est non recte uiuendo, et indignus cuius adprobaretur oblatio, quam esset iniustior, quod fratrem iustum gratis odisset, ostendit.

ENGLISH

er's righteous." From this we are given to understand why God did not look with favor on Cain's gift. By this very act he was dividing badly, giving God something of his own but keeping himself for himself. All people do this who follow not God's will but their own. They live not with an upright heart but with a perverse one, and yet they offer God a gift, by which they think he can be bought. They want him to help them, not to heal their depraved cravings, but to satisfy them. And this is characteristic of the earthly city: to worship God or gods with whose help it may reign in victories and earthly peace, not out of the love that seeks to serve others, but out of the craving for domination.[15]

The good use the world in order to enjoy God. The wicked, on the contrary, want to use God in order to enjoy the world. These are at least people who already believe that he exists or that he cares about human affairs, for those who do not even believe this are much worse. So when Cain learned that God had looked with favor on his brother's sacrifice and not on his own, he certainly ought to have changed and imitated his good brother, not swelled with pride and envied him. But he was sad, and his face fell. This is the sin God rebukes most of all: sadness at another's goodness, and that the goodness of a brother. It was in rebuking this that he asked, "Why are you sad, and why has your face fallen?" For God saw that he envied his brother, and this is what he rebuked.[16]

Human beings cannot see into another's heart. To them it could be doubtful and wholly uncertain what that sadness grieved over. It might have been his own wickedness, by which, as he had learned, he displeased God. Or it might have been his brother's goodness, which pleased God when he looked with favor on his sacrifice. But God gave the reason why he refused to accept Cain's offering, so that Cain might be displeased with himself, as he deserved, rather than with his brother, who did not deserve it. In doing so God showed something more. Cain was unrighteous in not dividing rightly, that is, in not living rightly, and he was un-

15 1 John 3:12.
16 Augustine distinguishes "using" (uti) something as a means from "enjoying" (frui) something for its own sake, which is rightly done only with God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	worthy to have his offering approved. But he was far more unrighteous in hating his righteous brother without cause.

RULING OVER SIN

"You shall rule over it" means Cain should master his sin, or the envy of the flesh.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Non tamen eum dimittens sine mandato sancto, iusto et bono: Quiesce, inquit; ad te enim conuersio eius, et tu dominaberis illius. Numquid fratris? Absit. Cuius igitur, nisi peccati? Dixerat enim: Peccasti, tum deinde addidit: Quiesce; ad te enim conuersio eius, et tu dominaberis illius. Potest quidem ita intellegi ad ipsum hominem conuersionem esse debere peccati, ut nulli alii quam sibi sciat tribuere debere quod peccat. Haec est enim salubris paenitentiae medicina et ueniae petitio non incongrua, ut, ubi ait: Ad te enim conuersio eius, non subaudiatur erit, sed (sit); praecipientis uidelicet, non praedicentis modo. Tunc enim dominabitur quisque peccato, si id sibi non defendendo praeposuerit, sed paenitendo subiecerit; alioquin et illi seruiet dominanti, si patrocinium adhibuerit accidenti.	Yet God did not send him away without a command that was holy, just, and good. "Be still," he said; "for its turning is toward you, and you shall rule over it." Rule over his brother? Far from it. Over what, then, if not over sin? For God had said, "You have sinned," and then he added, "Be still; for its turning is toward you, and you shall rule over it." This can indeed be understood to mean that the turning of sin must be toward the man himself. He must know that he should attribute his sinning to no one but himself. This is the healing medicine of repentance and a fitting plea for pardon. On this reading, where it says, "For its turning is toward you," we should supply not "will be" but "let it be." The words are then those of one who commands, not of one who foretells. For each person will rule over sin only if he does not set it above himself by defending it, but subjects it to himself by repenting. Otherwise, if he acts as its advocate when it befalls him, he will also be its slave, and it will be his master.
Sed ut peccatum intellegatur concupiscentia ipsa carnalis, de qua dicit apostolus: Caro concupiscit aduersus spiritum, in cuius carnis fructibus et inuidiam commemorat, qua utique Cain stimulabatur et accendebatur in fratris exitium: bene subauditur erit, id est: Ad te enim conuersio eius erit, et tu dominaberis illius. Cum enim commota fuerit pars ipsa carnalis, quam peccatum appellat apostolus, ubi dicit: Non ego operor illud, sed quod habitat in me peccatum (quam partem animi etiam philosophi dicunt esse uitiosam, non quae mentem debeat trahere, sed cui mens debeat imperare eamque ab inlicitis operibus ratione cohibere); — cum ergo commota fuerit ad aliquid perperam committendum, si quiescatur et obtemperetur dicenti apostolo: Nec exhibueritis membra uestra arma iniquitatis peccato, ad mentem domita et uicta conuertitur, ut subditae ratio dominetur.

LATIN

ENGLISH

But "sin" may be understood as carnal desire itself. The apostle says of it, "The flesh desires against the spirit," and among the fruits of this flesh he also mentions envy. It was certainly envy that goaded and inflamed Cain to destroy his brother. On this reading it is right to supply "will be," that is: "For its turning will be toward you, and you shall rule over it." The apostle calls that carnal part itself "sin" when he says, "It is not I who do it, but sin that dwells in me." (Even the philosophers call this part of the soul vicious. It ought not to drag the mind along with it. Instead the mind ought to command it and use reason to restrain it from unlawful acts.) Suppose, then, that this part has been stirred to commit some wrong. If one keeps still and obeys the apostle when he says, "Do not present your members to sin as weapons of iniquity," it turns back toward the mind, tamed and conquered, so that reason rules over it as its subject.[17]

Hoc praecepit Deus huic, qui facibus inuidiae inflammabatur in fratrem et, quem debuerat imitari, cupiebat auferri. Quiesce, inquit; manus ab scelere contine, non regnet peccatum in tuo mortali corpore ad oboediendum desideriis eius, nec exhibeas membra tua iniquitatis arma peccato. Ad te enim conuersio eius, dum non adiuuatur relaxando, sed quiescendo frenatur; et tu dominaberis illius, ut, cum forinsecus non permittitur operari, sub potestate mentis regentis et beneuolentis adsuescat etiam intrinsecus non moueri. Dictum est tale aliquid in eodem diuino libro et de muliere, quando post peccatum Deo interrogante adque iudicante damnationis sententias acceperunt, in serpente diabolus et in se ipsis illa et maritus.

This is what God commanded the man who was inflamed by the torches of envy against his brother and who wanted to be rid of the one he ought to have imitated. "Be still," he says. Keep your hands from crime. Do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its desires, and do not present your members to sin as weapons of iniquity. "For its turning is toward you," as long as it is not encouraged by slackened reins but held in check by your keeping still. "And you shall rule over it." When it is not allowed to act outwardly, it may then grow used to not being stirred even inwardly, under the power of a mind that rules it and wishes it well. Something similar is said in the same divine book about the woman too. After the sin, God questioned and judged them, and they received their sentences of condemnation: the devil in the serpent, and she and her husband in their own persons.

Cum enim dixisset ei: Multiplicans multiplicabo tristitias tuas et gemitum tuum, et in tristitiis paries filios, deinde addidit: Et ad uirum tuum conuersio tua, et ipse tui dominabitur. Quod dictum est ad Cain de peccato uel de uitiosa carnis concupiscentia, hoc isto loco de peccatrice femina; ubi intellegendum est uirum ad regendam uxorem animo carnem regenti similem esse oportere. Propter quod dicit apostolus: Qui diligit uxorem suam, se

For when he had said to her, "I will greatly multiply your sorrows and your groaning, and in sorrows you shall bear children," he then added, "And your turning shall be toward your husband, and he shall rule over you." What was said to Cain about sin, or about the vicious desire of the flesh, is said in this passage about the sinful woman. Here we must understand that the husband, in rul-

17 Galatians 5:17 (for the "fruits," or works, of the flesh, Galatians 5:19–21); Romans 7:17; Romans 6:13.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ipsum diligit; nemo enim umquam carnem suam odio habuit. Sananda sunt enim haec sicut nostra, non sicut aliena damnanda. Sed illud Dei praeceptum Cain sicut praeuaricator accepit. Inualescente quippe inuidentiae uitio fratrem insidiatus occidit. Talis erat terrenae conditor ciuitatis.	ing his wife, should be like the mind ruling the flesh. That is why the apostle says, "He who loves his wife loves himself; for no one ever hated his own flesh." These things, then, are to be healed as our own, not condemned as alien. But Cain received God's command as a transgressor. As the vice of envy grew strong in him, he lay in wait for his brother and killed him. Such was the founder of the earthly city.[18]
Quo modo autem significauerit etiam Iudaeos, a quibus Christus occisus est pastor ouium hominum, quem pastor ouium pecorum praefigurabat Abel, quia in allegoria prophetica res est, parco nunc dicere, et quaedam hinc aduersus Faustum Manichaeum dixisse me recolo.	Cain also signified the Jews, by whom Christ was killed. Christ is the shepherd of sheep who are human beings, and he was prefigured by Abel, the shepherd of sheep that are animals. How Cain signified them I refrain from saying now, since this belongs to prophetic allegory. I recall, too, that I have said something on this point against Faustus the Manichaean.[19]

WHY CAIN FOUNDED A CITY AT THE VERY BEGINNING OF THE HUMAN RACE

Cain could found a city because the long-lived early generations multiplied greatly.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.8 Nunc autem defendenda mihi uidetur historia, ne sit scriptura incredibilis, quae dicit aedificatam ab uno homine ciui tatem eo tempore, quo non plus quam uiri quattuor uel potius tres, postea quam fratrem frater occidit, fuisse uidentur in terra, id est primus homo pater omnium et ipse Cain et eius filius Enoch, ex cuius nomine ipsa ciuitas nuncupata est. Sed hoc quos mouet, parum considerant non omnes homines, qui tunc esse potuerunt, scriptorem sacrae huius historiae necesse habuisse nominare, sed eos solos, quos operis suscepti ratio postulabat.	But now I think I must defend the historical account, lest Scripture be thought incredible. It says that a city was built by one man at a time when, after brother had killed brother, there seem to have been no more than four men on earth, or rather three. These were the first man, the father of all; Cain himself; and Cain's son Enoch, after whom the city itself was named. But those who are troubled by this fail to consider that the writer of this sacred history did not need to name everyone who could have existed then. He needed to name only those whom the plan of the work he had undertaken required.
Propositum quippe scriptoris illius fuit, per quem sanctus Spiritus id agebat, per successiones certarum generationum ex uno homine propagatarum peruenire ad Abraham ac deinde ex eius semine ad populum Dei, in quo distincto a ceteris gentibus praefigurarentur et praenuntiarentur omnia, quae de ciuitate, cuius aeternum erit regnum, et de rege eius eodemque conditore Christo in Spiritu praeuidebantur esse uentura; ita ut nec de altera societate hominum taceretur, quam terrenam dicimus ciuitatem, quantum ei	The Holy Spirit was acting through that writer. His purpose was to trace the succession of particular generations descended from one man until he reached Abraham, and then to move from Abraham's seed to the people of God. In this people, set apart from the other nations, everything was to be prefigured and foretold that was foreseen in the Spirit as coming to pass. This concerned the city whose kingdom will be eternal, and its king, who is also its founder, Christ. Yet he was not to be si-

18 Genesis 3:16; Ephesians 5:28–29.
19 Augustine's Against Faustus the Manichaean (c. AD 400) answers Faustus of Milevis, a Manichaean bishop; Book 12 treats Cain and Abel as figures of the Jews and Christ.

LATIN

commemorandae satis esset, ut ciuitas Dei etiam suae aduersariae conparatione clarescat.

Cum igitur scriptura diuina, ubi et numerum annorum, quos illi homines uixerunt, commemorat, ita concludat, ut dicat de illo, de quo loquebatur: Et genuit filios et filias, et fuerunt omnes dies illius uel illius quos uixit anni tot, et mortuus est: numquid quia eosdem filios et filias non nominat, ideo intellegere non debemus per tam multos annos, quibus tunc in saeculi huius prima aetate uiuebant, nasci potuisse plurimos homines, quorum coetibus condi possent etiam plurimae ciuitates?

Sed pertinuit ad Deum, quo ista inspirante conscripta sunt, has duas societates suis diuersis generationibus primitus digerere adque distinguere, ut seorsum hominum, hoc est secundum hominem uiuentium, seorsum autem filiorum Dei, id est hominum secundum Deum uiuentium, generationes contexerentur usque diluuium, ubi ambarum societatum discretio concretioque narratur; discretio quidem, quod ambarum separatim generationes commemorantur, unius fratricidae Cain, alterius autem qui uocabatur Seth; natus quippe fuerat et ipse de Adam pro illo, quem frater occidit; concretio autem, quia bonis in deterius declinantibus tales uniuersi facti fuerant, ut diluuio delerentur, excepto uno iusto, cui nomen erat Noe, et eius coniuge et tribus filiis totidemque nuribus, qui homines octo ex illa omnium uastatione mortalium per arcam euadere meruerunt.

Quod igitur scriptum est: Et cognouit Cain uxorem, suam, et concipiens peperit Enoch; et erat aedificans ciuitatem in nomine filii sui Enoch: non est quidem consequens, ut istum primum filium genuisse credatur. Neque enim hoc ex eo putandum est, quia dictus est cognouisse uxorem suam, quasi tunc se illi primitus concumbendo miscuisset. Nam et de ipso patre omnium Adam non tunc solum hoc dictum est, quando conceptus est Cain, quem primogenitum uidetur habuisse: uerum etiam posterius eadem scriptura: Cognouit, inquit, Adam Euam uxorem suam, et concepit et peperit filium, et nominauit nomen lent about the other society of human beings, which we call the earthly city. He was to say as much about it as was needed, so that the city of God might shine out more clearly by comparison even with its adversary.

ENGLISH

Divine Scripture also records the number of years those men lived. Where it does so, it ends by saying of the man it has been speaking about: "And he begot sons and daughters, and all the days of So-and-so that he lived were so many years, and he died." It does not name those sons and daughters. But should we therefore fail to understand that very many people could have been born over the many years that men then lived, in the first age of this world? Communities of these people could have founded even a great many cities.

These things were written under God's inspiration, and it was his concern from the beginning to arrange and distinguish these two societies by their different generations. One set of generations belonged to men, that is, to those living according to man. Another, kept separate, belonged to the sons of God, that is, to men living according to God. Both were to be traced down to the flood, where the narrative tells of both the separation and the mingling of the two societies. There is separation because the generations of each are recorded separately: one line belongs to Cain the fratricide, the other to the man called Seth. (Seth too had been born of Adam, in place of the one his brother killed.) There is mingling because, as the good declined toward the worse, all became so corrupt that they were destroyed by the flood. The only exceptions were one righteous man, named Noah, together with his wife, his three sons, and as many daughters-in-law. These eight people were found worthy to escape through the ark from the destruction of all mortals.

It is written: "And Cain knew his wife, and she conceived and bore Enoch; and he was building a city in the name of his son Enoch." But it does not follow that we must believe this was his first son. We should not infer this from the statement that he "knew" his wife, as if he had then united with her in intercourse for the first time. For this was said of Adam himself, the father of all, not only when Cain was conceived, who seems to have been his firstborn. Later the same Scripture also illius Seth. Unde intellegitur ita solere illam scripturam loqui, quamuis non semper cum in ea legitur factos hominum fuisse conceptus, non tamen solum cum primum sibi sexus uterque miscetur.

LATIN

Nec illud necessario est argumento, ut primogenitum patri existimemus Enoch, quod eius nomine illa ciuitas nuncupata est. Non enim ab re est, ut propter aliquam causam, cum et alios haberet, diligeret eum pater ceteris amplius. Neque enim et Iudas primogenitus fuit, a quo Iudaea cognominata est et Iudaei. Sed etiamsi conditori ciuitatis illius iste filius primus est natus, non ideo putandum est tunc a patre conditae ciuitati nomen eius inpositum, quando natus est, quia nec constitui tunc ab uno poterat ciuitas, quae nihil est aliud quam hominum multitudo aliquo societatis uinculo conligata; sed cum illius hominis familia tanta numerositate cresceret, ut haberet iam populi quantitatem, tunc potuit utique fieri, ut et constitueret et nomen primogeniti sui constitutae inponeret ciuitati.

Tam longa quippe uita illorum hominum fuit, ut illic memoratorum, quorum et anni taciti non sunt, qui uixit minimum ante diluuium, ad septingentos quinquaginta tres perueniret. Nam plures nongentos annos etiam transierunt, quamuis nemo ad mille peruenerit. Quis itaque dubitauerit per unius hominis aetatem tantum multiplicari potuisse genus humanum, ut esset unde constituerentur non una, sed plurimae ciuitates? Quod ex hoc conici facillime potest, quia ex uno Abraham non multo amplius quadringentis annis numerositas Hebraeae gentis tanta procreata est, ut in exitu eiusdem populi ex Aegypto sescenta hominum milia fuisse referantur bellicae iuuentutis: ut omittamus gentem Idumaeorum non pertinentem ad populum Israel, quam genuit frater eius Esau, nepos Abrahae, et alias natas ex semine ipsius Abrahae non per Sarram coniugem procreato.

ENGLISH

says, "Adam knew Eve his wife, and she conceived and bore a son, and called his name Seth." From this we understand that Scripture regularly speaks this way. It does not do so every time we read in it that human beings were conceived. Still, it does not speak this way only when the two sexes unite for the first time.[20]

Nor does the fact that the city was named after Enoch prove that we should consider him his father's firstborn. It is not unreasonable to think that his father, though he had other sons too, loved him more than the rest for some reason. After all, Judah was not the firstborn either, and yet Judea and the Jews took their name from him. And even if this son was the first born to the founder of that city, we should not suppose that his father gave his name to the city at the time he was born. One man could not establish a city then, since a city is nothing other than a multitude of human beings bound together by some bond of fellowship. But once that man's household had grown so numerous that it was already the size of a people, he could certainly have founded a city and given it the name of his firstborn.

For the lives of those men were very long. Of those recorded there whose years are given, the one who lived the shortest time before the flood still reached seven hundred and fifty-three. Many even passed nine hundred years, though no one reached a thousand. Who, then, would doubt that within one man's lifetime the human race could have multiplied enough to establish not one city but a great many? This is very easy to infer from another fact. From one man, Abraham, the Hebrew nation grew so numerous in not much more than four hundred years that at the exodus of this people from Egypt there are said to have been six hundred thousand men of fighting age. And that leaves aside the nation of the Idumeans, which does not belong to the people of Israel and was fathered by Israel's brother Esau, Abraham's grandson. It also leaves aside other nations born of the seed of Abraham himself, though not through his wife Sarah.[21]

20 Genesis 4:17; Genesis 4:25.

21 The shortest life was that of Lamech, Noah's father, 753 years in the Greek text Augustine used (Genesis 5:31). The Idumeans are the Edomites, traditionally descended from Esau.

THE LONG LIFE OF HUMAN BEINGS BEFORE THE FLOOD, AND THE GREATER SIZE OF HUMAN BODIES

Early humans lived far longer and had larger bodies, as ancient bones and writers attest.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
15.9	Quam ob rem nullus prudens rerum existimator dubitauerit Cain non solum aliquam, uerum etiam magnam potuisse condere ciuitatem, quando in tam longum tempus protendebatur uita mortalium; nisi forte infidelium quispiam ex ipsa numerositate annorum nobis ingerat quaestionem, qua uixisse tunc homines scriptum est in auctoritatibus nostris, et hoc neget esse credendum. Ita quippe non credunt etiam magnitudines corporum longe ampliores tunc fuisse quam nunc sunt. Unde et nobilissimus eorum poeta Vergilius de ingenti lapide, quem in agrorum limite infixum uir fortis illorum temporum pugnans et rapuit et cucurrit et intorsit et misit: Vix illum — inquit — lecti bis sex ceruice subirent, / Qualia nunc hominum producit corpora tellus, significans maiora tunc corpora producere solere tellurem.	So no sensible judge of things would doubt that Cain could have founded a city, and even a large one, when human life stretched over so long a time. Perhaps, though, some unbeliever will raise an objection to us from the very number of years our authoritative writings say people lived then, and will deny that this should be believed. In the same way, after all, such people refuse to believe that human bodies were then far larger than they are now. Their most celebrated poet, Virgil, writes of a huge stone set as a boundary marker between fields, which a brave man of those times seized in battle, ran with, whirled around, and hurled. "Scarcely," he says, "could twice six chosen men lift it onto their necks, men with such bodies as the earth produces now." He means that the earth used to produce larger bodies then.[22]
	Quanto magis igitur temporibus recentioribus mundi ante illud nobile diffamatumque diluuium! Sed de corporum magnitudine plerumque incredulos nudata per uetustatem siue per uim fluminum uariosque casus sepulcra conuincunt, ubi apparuerunt uel unde ceciderunt incredibilis magnitudinis ossa mortuorum. Vidi ipse non solus, sed aliquot mecum in Uticensi litore, molarem hominis dentem tam ingentem, ut, si in nostrorum dentium modulos minutatim concideretur, centum nobis uideretur facere potuisse. Sed illum gigantis alicuius fuisse crediderim. Nam praeter quod erant omnium multo quam nostra maiora tunc corpora, gigantes longe ceteris anteibant; sicut aliis deinde nostrisque temporibus rara quidem, sed numquam ferme defuerunt; quae modum aliorum plurimum excederent.	How much larger, then, must bodies have been in the times when the world was still young, before that famous and widely reported flood! But as for the size of bodies, unbelievers are usually refuted by tombs laid bare by age, by the force of rivers, or by various accidents. Bones of the dead of incredible size have come to light in them or have fallen out of them. I myself saw, and not alone but with several others, a human molar on the shore at Utica. It was so enormous that, had it been cut up into pieces the size of our teeth, we thought it could have made a hundred. But I would think it belonged to some giant. For the bodies of everyone then were much larger than ours, and besides this the giants far surpassed the rest. In the same way, in later times and in our own, there have almost always been bodies that greatly exceeded the measure of others, though such bodies have been rare.[23]
	Plinius Secundus, doctissimus homo, quanto magis magisque praeterit saeculi excursus, minora corpora naturam ferre testatur; quod etiam Homerum commemorat saepe carmine fuisse conquestum, non haec uelut poetica figmenta deridens, sed in historicam fidem tamquam miraculorum naturalium scriptor adsumens.	Pliny Secundus, a most learned man, testifies that the further the course of the ages runs on, the smaller the bodies nature produces. He mentions that Homer too often lamented this in his poetry. Pliny does not mock these laments as poetic fictions. As a writer on the wonders of nature, he ac-

22 Virgil, Aeneid 12.899–900, where Turnus hurls a boundary stone at Aeneas.
23 Utica was an ancient city on the North African coast, northwest of Carthage.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Verum, ut dixi, antiquorum magnitudines corporum inuenta plerumque ossa, quoniam diuturna sunt, etiam multo posterioribus saeculis produnt. Annorum autem numerositas cuiusque hominis, quae temporibus illis fuit, nullis nunc talibus documentis uenire in experimentum potest. Nec tamen ideo fides sacrae huic historiae deroganda est, cuius tanto inpudentius narrata non credimus, quanto inpleri certius praenuntiata conspicimus. Dicit tamen etiam idem Plinius esse adhuc gentem, ubi ducentos annos uiuitur. Si ergo humanarum uitarum diuturnitates, quas experti non sumus, hodie habere creduntur incognita nobis loca, quur non habuisse credantur et tempora?	cepts them as historical fact. But, as I said, bones that are found often reveal the size of ancient bodies even to much later ages, because bones last a long time. The great number of years that each person lived in those times, however, cannot now be put to the test by any such evidence. Yet that is no reason to withhold belief from this sacred history. The more surely we see its predictions fulfilled, the more shameless it would be for us to disbelieve its narratives. The same Pliny also says that there is still a nation where people live two hundred years. Places unknown to us are believed to have, even today, lifespans we have never experienced. Why, then, should we not believe that past times had them too?[24]
	An uero credibile est alicubi esse quod hic non est, et incredibile est aliquando fuisse quod nunc non est?	Or is it credible that what is not here exists somewhere, and incredible that what does not exist now existed at some time?

THE DISCREPANCY IN THE NUMBERS OF YEARS BETWEEN THE HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS AND OURS

The Hebrew text and the Septuagint differ on the patriarchs' ages, though their totals mostly agree.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
15.10	Quocirca etsi inter Hebraeos et nostros codices de ipso numero annorum nonnulla uidetur esse distantia, quod ignoro qua ratione sit factum: non tamen tanta est, ut illos homines tam longaeuos fuisse dissentiant. Nam ipse homo primus Adam, antequam gigneret filium, qui est appellatus Seth, ducentos triginta uixisse annos reperitur in codicibus nostris, in Hebraeis autem centum triginta perhibetur; sed postea quam eum genuit, septingentos uixisse legitur in nostris, octingentos uero in illis; adque ita in utrisque uniuersitatis summa concordat. Ac deinde per consequentes generationes antequam gignatur, qui gigni commemoratur, minus uixisse aput Hebraeos pater eius inuenitur centum annos; sed postea quam est genitus idem ipse, centum minus quam in Hebraeis inueniuntur in nostris; adque ita et hinc et inde numeri uniuersitas consonat.	So although there seems to be some discrepancy between the Hebrew manuscripts and ours over the actual number of years, though how this came about I do not know, it is not so great that they disagree about those men having lived so long. For the first man himself, Adam, is found in our manuscripts to have lived two hundred and thirty years before he fathered the son who was called Seth, while the Hebrew gives one hundred and thirty. After he fathered him, however, we read in ours that he lived seven hundred years, but in theirs eight hundred. And so in both the grand total agrees. Then, through the following generations, the father is found in the Hebrew to have lived a hundred years less before the son who is mentioned as being born was fathered. After that same son was fathered, however, a hundred fewer are found in ours than in the Hebrew. And so, from either side, the total number comes out the same.
	In sexta autem generatione nusquam utrique codices discrepant. In septima uero, ubi ille qui natus est Enoch non mortuus, sed quod Deo placuerit translatus esse narratur, eadem dissonantia est, quae in superioribus	In the sixth generation, however, the two sets of manuscripts nowhere differ. In the seventh, where Enoch was born, who is said not to have died but to have been taken up because he pleased God, 24 Pliny the Elder (Gaius Plinius Secundus, AD 23/24–79), author of the Natural History; see Natural History 7.16.73–74 on shrinking bodies and 7.48.154 on the two-hundred-year lifespan.

LATIN

quinque de centum annis antequam gigneret eum, qui ibi commemoratus est, filium, adque in summa similis consonantia. Vixit enim annos, antequam transferretur, secundum utrosque codices trecentos sexaginta quinque. Octaua generatio habet quidem nonnullam diuersitatem, sed minorem ac dissimilem ceteris. Mathusalam quippe, quem genuit Enoch, antequam gigneret eum, qui in ipso ordine sequitur, secundum Hebraeos non centum minus, sed uiginti amplius uixit annos; qui rursus in nostris, postea quam eum genuit, reperiuntur additi, et in utrisque sibi summa uniuersi numeri occurrit.

In sola nona generatione, id est in annis Lamech, filii Mathusalae, patris autem Noe, summa uniuersitatis discrepat, sed non plurimum. Viginti enim et quattuor annos plus uixisse in Hebraeis quam in nostris codicibus inuenitur. Namque antequam gigneret filium, qui uocatus est Noe, sex minus habet in Hebraeis quam in nostris; postea uero quam eum genuit, triginta amplius in eisdem quam in nostris. Unde sex illis detractis restant uiginti quattuor, ut dictum est.

ENGLISH

there is the same discrepancy as in the five earlier ones: a hundred years before he fathered the son mentioned there. There is also a similar agreement in the total. For according to both sets of manuscripts he lived three hundred and sixty-five years before he was taken up. The eighth generation does show some difference, but a smaller one, and unlike the others. According to the Hebrew, Methuselah, whom Enoch fathered, lived not a hundred years less but twenty years more before fathering the one who follows him in that line. In ours these twenty are found added back after he fathered him, and in both the total of the whole number comes out the same.

Only in the ninth generation, that is, in the years of Lamech, son of Methuselah and father of Noah, does the grand total differ, and not by much. For he is found to have lived twenty-four years more in the Hebrew than in our manuscripts. Before fathering the son who was called Noah, he has six fewer in the Hebrew than in ours. After fathering him, however, he has thirty more in the Hebrew than in ours. Subtract those six, and twenty-four remain, as has been said.

THE YEARS OF METHUSELAH, WHOSE AGE SEEMS TO EXTEND FOURTEEN YEARS BEYOND THE FLOOD

By the Septuagint's figures Methuselah outlived the flood by fourteen years, which Augustine examines.

LATIN

15.11 Per hanc autem discrepantiam Hebraeorum codicum adque nostrorum exoritur illa famosissima quaestio, ubi Mathusalam quattuordecim annos uixisse post diluuium conputatur, cum scriptura ex omnibus, qui in terra tunc fuerant, solos octo homines in arca exitium commemoret euasisse diluuii, in quibus Mathusalam non fuit. Secundum codices enim nostros Mathusalam priusquam gigneret illum, quem uocauit Lamech, uixit annos centum sexaginta septem; deinde ipse Lamech, antequam ex illo natus esset Noe, uixit annos centum octoginta octo, qui fiunt simul trecenti quinquaginta quinque; his adduntur sescenti Noe, quoto eius anno diluuium factum est: qui fiunt nongenti quinquaginta quinque, ex quo Mathusalam natus est usque ad annum diluuii.

Omnes enim anni uitae Mathusalam nongenti sexaginta nouem conputantur, quia, cum uixisset annos centum sexaginta septem et genuisset filium, qui est appellatus

ENGLISH

Out of this discrepancy between the Hebrew manuscripts and ours arises that very famous problem, in which Methuselah is calculated to have lived fourteen years after the flood. Yet Scripture records that of all who were then on earth only eight people escaped destruction by the flood in the ark, and Methuselah was not among them. For according to our manuscripts Methuselah lived one hundred and sixty-seven years before he fathered the son he called Lamech. Then Lamech himself lived one hundred and eighty-eight years before Noah was born of him. Together these make three hundred and fifty-five. To these are added Noah's six hundred, since the flood came in that year of his life. That makes nine hundred and fifty-five years from Methuselah's birth to the year of the flood.

For all the years of Methuselah's life are reckoned at nine hundred and sixty-nine. Having lived one hundred and sixty-seven years and fathered the Lamech, post eum genitum uixit annos octingentos duo; qui omnes, ut diximus, nongenti sexaginta nouem fiunt. Unde detractis nongentis quinquaginta quinque ab ortu Mathusalae usque ad diluuium remanent quattuordecim, quibus uixisse creditur post diluuium. Propter quod eum nonnulli, etsi non in terra, ubi omnem carnem, quam uiuere in aquis natura non sinit, constat fuisse deletam, cum patre suo qui translatus fuerat aliquantum fuisse adque ibi, donec diluuium praeteriret, uixisse arbitrantur, nolentes derogare fidem codicibus, quos in auctoritatem celebriorem suscepit ecclesia, et credentes Iudaeorum potius quam istos non habere quod uerum est.

LATIN

Non enim admittunt, quod magis hic esse potuerit error interpretum, quam in ea lingua esse falsum, unde in nostram per Graecam scriptura ipsa translata est, sed inquiunt non esse credibile septuaginta inter pretes, qui uno simul tempore unoque sensu interpretati sunt, errare potuisse aut ubi nihil eorum intererat uoluisse mentiri; Iudaeos uero, dum nobis inuident, quod lex et prophetae ad nos interpretando transierint, mutasse quaedam in codicibus suis, ut nostris minueretur auctoritas. Hanc opinionem uel / suspicionem accipiat quisque ut putauerit; certum est tamen non uixisse Mathusalam post diluuium, sed eodem anno fuisse defunctum, si uerum est quod de numero annorum in Hebraeis codicibus inuenitur.

De illis autem septuaginta interpretibus quid mihi uideatur, suo loco diligentius inserendum est, cum ad ipsa tempora, quantum necessitas huius operis postulat, commemoranda adiuuante Domino uenerimus. Praesenti enim sufficit quaestioni secundum utrosque codices tam longas habuisse uitas illius aeui homines, ut posset aetate unius, qui de duobus, quos solos terra tunc habuit, parentibus primus est natus, ad constituendam etiam ciuitatem multiplicari genus humanum.

ENGLISH

son called Lamech, he lived eight hundred and two years after fathering him, and all these together, as we said, make nine hundred and sixty-nine. So when the nine hundred and fifty-five from Methuselah's birth to the flood are subtracted, fourteen remain, during which he is believed to have lived after the flood. For this reason some suppose that for a while he was with his father, who had been taken up, and that he lived there until the flood had passed. He was not on earth, they say, for all flesh that nature does not allow to live in water is known to have been destroyed there. They do not wish to undermine the trustworthiness of the manuscripts which the Church has received as carrying the more widely recognized authority. They believe instead that it is the manuscripts of the Jews, rather than ours, that do not contain the truth.

For they do not grant that an error of the translators is more likely to have occurred here than a falsehood in the language from which Scripture itself was translated into ours by way of Greek. Instead they say it is not credible that the seventy translators could have erred, since they translated at one and the same time and with one mind. Nor is it credible, they say, that these translators would have wished to lie where nothing was at stake for them. The Jews, on the other hand, were envious of us because the Law and the Prophets passed to us through translation, and so they altered certain things in their own manuscripts in order to diminish the authority of ours. Let each person take this opinion, or suspicion, as he sees fit. It is certain, however, that Methuselah did not live after the flood but died in that same year, if what is found about the number of years in the Hebrew manuscripts is true.[25]

What I think about those seventy translators must be set out more carefully in its proper place, when, with the Lord's help, we come to that period itself, to be recounted as far as the needs of this work require. For the present question it is enough that, according to both sets of manuscripts, the people of that age had lives so long that the human race could multiply even to the point of founding a city. It could do so within the lifetime of one man, 25 The seventy translators produced the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures made at Alexandria in the 3rd century BC, from which the Old Latin Bible was translated.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	the first son born of the two parents who were then the only ones on earth.

THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO DO NOT BELIEVE THAT PEOPLE IN THE EARLIEST TIMES LIVED AS LONG AS SCRIPTURE SAYS

Some claim ancient years were a tenth as long as ours; Augustine shows this leads to absurdities.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.12 Neque enim ullo modo audiendi sunt, qui putant aliter annos illis temporibus conputatos, id est tantae breuitatis, ut unus annus noster decem illos habuisse credatur. Quapropter, inquiunt, cum audierit quisque uel legerit nongentos annos quemque uixisse, debet intellegere nonaginta; decem quippe illi anni unus est noster et decem nostri centum illi fuerunt.	Nor should we by any means listen to those who think that years were reckoned differently in those times. They take these years to have been so short that one of our years is believed to have contained ten of them. "So," they say, "when anyone hears or reads that someone lived nine hundred years, he ought to understand ninety. For ten of those years are one of ours, and ten of ours were a hundred of theirs."
Ac per hoc, ut putant, uiginti trium annorum fuit Adam, quando genuit Seth, et ipse Seth uiginti agebat et sex menses, quando ex illo natus est Enos, quos appellat scriptura ducentos et quinque annos; quoniam sicut isti suspicantur, quorum exponimus opinionem, unum annum, qualem nunc habemus, in decem partes illi diuidebant et easdem partes annos uocabant; quarum partium habet una quadratum senarium, eo quod sex diebus Deus perfecerit opera sua, ut in septimo requiesceret (de qua re in libro undecimo, sicut potui, disputaui); sexiens autem seni, qui numerus quadratum senarium facit, triginta sex dies sunt; qui multiplicati deciens ad trecentos sexaginta perueniunt, id est duodecim menses lunares.	So, as they suppose, Adam was twenty-three years old when he fathered Seth. Seth himself was twenty years and six months old when Enosh was born of him, which Scripture calls two hundred and five years. For, as those whose opinion we are setting out conjecture, people then divided one year of the kind we have now into ten parts and called these parts years. Each of these parts contains the square of six, because God completed his works in six days so as to rest on the seventh (a subject I discussed as well as I could in Book Eleven). Six times six, the number that makes the square of six, is thirty-six days. Multiplied by ten, these come to three hundred and sixty days, that is, twelve lunar months.
Propter quinque dies enim reliquos, quibus solaris annus inpletur, et diei quadrantem, propter quem quater ductum eo anno, quo bissextum uocant, unus dies adicitur, addebantur a ueteribus postea dies, ut occurreret numerus annorum, quos dies Romani intercalares uocabant. Proinde etiam Enos, quem genuit Seth, decem et nouem agebat annos, quando ex illo natus est filius eius Cainan, quos annos dicit scriptura centum nonaginta.	There remain the five days that complete the solar year, and the quarter of a day. Taken four times, that quarter adds one day in the year they call bissextile. On account of these, the ancients later added days so that the count of years would come out right, and the Romans called these intercalary days. Likewise Enosh, whom Seth fathered, was nineteen years old when his son Kenan was born of him, years which Scripture calls one hundred and ninety.[26]
Et deinceps per omnes generationes, in quibus hominum anni commemorantur ante diluuium, nullus fere in nostris codicibus inuenitur, qui, cum esset centum annorum uel infra uel etiam centum uiginti aut non multo amplius, genuerit filium; sed qui minima aetate	The same holds through all the generations before the flood in which people's ages are recorded. Virtually no one is found in our manuscripts who fathered a son when he was a hundred years old or less, or even a hundred and twenty, or not much 26 The bissextile year is the Roman leap year, so called because the sixth day before the Kalends of March was counted twice.

LATIN

genuerunt, centum sexaginta, et quod excurrit, fuisse referuntur; quia nemo, inquiunt, decem annorum homo potest gignere filios, qui numerus centum appellabantur anni ab illis hominibus; sed in annis sedecim est matura pubertas et proli iam idonea procreandae, quos centum et sexaginta annos illa tempora nuncupabant. Ut autem aliter annum tunc fuisse conputatum non sit incredibile, adiciunt quod aput plerosque scriptores historiae reperitur, Aegyptios habuisse annum quattuor mensum, Acarnanas sex mensum, Lauinios tredecim mensum.

Plinius Secundus cum commemorasset relatum fuisse in litteras quendam uixisse centum quinquaginta duos annos, aliam decem amplius, alios ducentorum annorum habuisse uitam, alios trecentorum, quosdam ad quingentos, alios ad sescentos, nonnullos ad octingentos etiam peruenisse, haec omnia inscitia temporum accidisse arbitratus est. Alii quippe, inquit, aestate unum determinabant annum et alterum hieme, alii quadripertitis temporibus, sicut Arcades, inquit, quorum anni trimenstres fuerunt. Adiecit etiam aliquando Aegyptios, quorum paruos annos quaternorum mensum fuisse supra diximus, lunae fine limitasse annum. Itaque aput eos, inquit, et singula milia annorum uixisse produntur.

His uelut probabilibus argumentis quidam non destruentes fidem sacrae huius historiae, sed adstruere nitentes, ne sit incredibile quod tam multos annos uixisse referuntur antiqui, persuaserunt sibi, nec se suadere inpudenter existimant, tam exiguum spatium temporis tunc annum uocatum, ut illi decem sint unus noster et decem nostri centum illorum. Hoc autem esse falsissimum documento euidentissimo ostenditur. Quod antequam faciam, non mihi tacendum uidetur, quae credibilior possit esse suspicio. Poteramus certe hanc adseuerationem ex Hebraeis codicibus redarguere adque conuincere, ubi Adam non ducentorum tringinta, sed centum triginta annorum fuisse reperitur, quando tertium genuit filium; qui anni si tredecim nostri sunt, procul dubio, primum quando genuit, undecim uel non more. Those who fathered children at the youngest age are reported to have been a hundred and sixty and something over. This is because, they say, no man of ten years can father children, and that number was what those people called a hundred years. At sixteen, however, puberty is mature and already fit for begetting offspring, and those times called that age a hundred and sixty years. To make it seem credible that the year was then reckoned differently, they add what is found in many historians: that the Egyptians had a year of four months, the Acarnanians one of six months, and the Lavinians one of thirteen months.[27]

ENGLISH

Pliny Secundus recorded what had been reported in writing: that a certain man lived a hundred and fifty-two years, and a woman ten years more; that others had lives of two hundred years, others of three hundred; that some reached five hundred, others six hundred, and some even eight hundred. He judged that all this arose from ignorance of how time was reckoned. "For some," he says, "counted one year in summer and another in winter. Others counted by the four seasons, like the Arcadians," he says, "whose years were three months long." He added that the Egyptians, whose short years we said above were four months long, sometimes fixed the limit of a year by the end of the moon's cycle. "And so among them," he says, "people are reported to have lived even a thousand years each."[28]

Certain people have used these arguments as if they were plausible. They do not seek to destroy the trustworthiness of this sacred history but are trying to support it, so that it may not seem incredible that the ancients are reported to have lived so many years. They have persuaded themselves, and do not think it shameless to persuade others, that so small a span of time was then called a year that ten of those years make one of ours, and ten of ours a hundred of theirs. That this is utterly false is shown by the clearest proof. Before I present it, I think I should not pass over in silence what might be a more credible conjecture. We could certainly refute and disprove this claim from the Hebrew manuscripts, in which Adam is found to have been not two hundred and thirty 27 The Acarnanians lived in western Greece; the Lavinians were the people of Lavinium, an ancient town in Latium.

28 Natural History 7.48.153–155.

LATIN	ENGLISH
multo amplius annorum fuit. Quis potest hac aetate generare usitata ista nobisque notissima lege naturae?	but one hundred and thirty years old when he fathered his third son. If these years are thirteen of ours, then without doubt he was eleven years old, or not much more, when he fathered his first son. Who can beget a child at that age by the ordinary law of nature so familiar to us?
Sed hunc omittamus, qui fortasse etiam quando creatus est potuit; non enim eum tam paruum, quam infantes nostri sunt, factum fuisse credibile est. Seth filius eius non ducentorum quinque, sicut nos legimus, sed centum quinque fuit, quando genuit Enos; ac per hoc secundum istos nondum habebat undecim annos aetatis. Quid dicam de Cainan eius filio, qui cum aput nos centum septuaginta reperiatur, aput Hebraeos septuaginta legitur fuisse, quando genuit Maleleel? Quis generat homo septennis, si tunc anni septuaginta nuncupabantur qui septem fuerunt?	But let us leave Adam aside, since perhaps he could do so even from the moment he was created; for it is not credible that he was made as small as our infants are. His son Seth was not two hundred and five, as we read, but one hundred and five when he fathered Enosh. So, according to these people, he was not yet eleven years old. What shall I say of Enosh's son Kenan? In our text he is found to have been one hundred and seventy when he fathered Mahalalel, but in the Hebrew we read that he was seventy. What man fathers a child at the age of seven, if what were then called seventy years were really seven?

WHETHER IN RECKONING YEARS WE SHOULD FOLLOW THE AUTHORITY OF THE HEBREW TEXT RATHER THAN THAT OF THE SEVENTY TRANSLATORS

The discrepancies probably go back to one copyist, and the Hebrew should be trusted for the numbers.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.13 Sed cum hoc dixero, continuo referetur illud Iudaeorum esse mendacium, de quo superius satis actum est; nam septuaginta interpretes laudabiliter celebratos uiros non potuisse mentiri. Ubi si quaeram, quid sit credibilius, Iudaeorum gentem tam longe lateque diffusam in hoc conscribendum men dacium uno consilio conspirare potuisse et, dum aliis inuident auctoritatem, sibi abstulisse ueritatem, an septuaginta homines, qui etiam ipsi Iudaei erant, uno in loco positos, quoniam rex Aegyptius Ptolomaeus eos ad hoc opus asciuerat, ipsam ueritatem gentibus alienigenis inuidisse et communicato istuc fecisse consilio: quis non uideat quid procliuius faciliusque credatur?	But when I say this, the reply will at once be that this is that lie of the Jews which has been dealt with sufficiently above. For the seventy translators, men deservedly celebrated, could not have lied. So I ask which of two things is more credible. Is it that the Jewish nation, spread so far and wide, could have conspired with one design to write down this lie, and so, in begrudging others authority, deprived themselves of the truth? Or is it that seventy men begrudged the truth itself to foreign nations and did this by common design? These men were themselves Jews too, and were gathered in one place because the Egyptian king Ptolemy had summoned them for this work. Who does not see which is more readily and easily believed?[29]
Sed absit ut prudens quispiam uel Iudaeos cuiuslibet peruersitatis adque malitiae tantum potuisse credat in codicibus tam multis et tam longe lateque dispersis, uel septuaginta illos memorabiles uiros hoc de inuidenda gentibus ueritate unum communicasse consilium. Credibilius ergo quis dixerit, cum primum de bibliotheca	But far be it from any sensible person to believe either of these things. He should not believe that the Jews, however perverse and malicious, could have done so much in so many manuscripts spread so far and wide. Nor should he believe that those seventy memorable men agreed on a single 29 Ptolemy II Philadelphus, king of Egypt (285–246 BC), who according to tradition commissioned the Septuagint for the library at Alexandria.

LATIN

Ptolomaei describi ista coeperunt, tunc aliquid tale fieri potuisse in codice uno, sed primitus inde descripto, unde iam latius emanaret; ubi potuit quidem accidere etiam scriptoris error. Sed hoc in illa quae! stione de uita Mathusalae non absurdum est suspicari, et in illo alio, ubi superantibus uiginti quattuor annis summa non conuenit.

In his autem, in quibus continuatur ipsius mendositatis similitudo, ita ut ante genitum filium, qui ordini inseritur, alibi supersint centum anni, alibi desint; post genitum autem ubi deerant supersint, ubi supererant desint, ut summa conueniat; et hoc in prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, quinta, septima generatione inuenitur: uidetur habere quandam, si s dici potest, error ipse constantiam nec casum redolet, sed industriam.

. Itaque illa diuersitas numerorum aliter se habentium in codicibus Graecis et Latinis, aliter in Hebraeis, ubi non est ista de centum annis prius adbitis et postea detractis per tot generationes continuata parilitas, nec malitiae Iudaeorum nec diligentiae uel prudentiae septuaginta interpretum, sed scriptoris tribuatur errori, qui de bibliotheca supradicti regis codicem describendum primus accepit. Nam etiam nunc, ubi numeri non faciunt intentum ad aliquid, quod facile possit intellegi uel quod appareat utiliter disci, et neglegenter describuntur et neglegentius emendantur. Quis enim sibi existimet esse discendum, quot milia hominum tribus Israel singillatim habere potuerunt? quoniam prodesse aliquid non putatur; et quotus quisque hominum est, cui profunditas utilitatis huius appareat?

Hic uero, ubi per tot contextas generationes centum anni alibi adsunt, alibi desunt, et post natum, qui commemorandus fuerat, filium desunt ubi adfuerunt, adsunt ubi defuerunt, ut summa concordet: nimirum cum uellet persuadere, qui hoc fecit, ideo numerosissimos annos uixisse antiquos, quod eos breuissimos common design to begrudge the truth to the nations. It would be more credible, then, for someone to say that something of this sort could have happened when these texts first began to be copied from Ptolemy's library. It could have happened in a single manuscript, but in the one first copied from there, from which it then spread more widely; and there a copyist's error could also have occurred. It is not absurd to suspect this in the problem about Methuselah's life, and in that other case where the total does not agree, with twenty-four years too many.

ENGLISH

But there are other cases where the same pattern of error continues. Before the birth of the son who is entered in the line, there are a hundred years too many in one text and a hundred too few in the other. After his birth there are too many where there were too few, and too few where there were too many, so that the total agrees. This is found in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth and seventh generations. In these cases the error itself seems to have a kind of consistency, if one may say so, and smells not of chance but of design.

So consider that difference in the numbers, which stand one way in the Greek and Latin manuscripts and another way in the Hebrew. In the Hebrew there is no such consistent pattern of a hundred years first added and later subtracted through so many generations. That difference should be attributed neither to the malice of the Jews nor to the diligence or wisdom of the seventy translators. It should be attributed to the error of the copyist who first received the manuscript from the library of the king mentioned above to copy. For even now, where numbers do not direct attention to anything that can easily be understood or that seems useful to learn, they are carelessly copied and still more carelessly corrected. Who would think he needs to learn how many thousands of men each of the tribes of Israel could have had? No one thinks it is of any use. And how few people there are to whom the depth of its usefulness is apparent!

Here, however, the case is different. Through so many linked generations a hundred years are present in one text and missing in the other. After the birth of the son who was to be mentioned, they are missing where they had been present and nuncupabant, et hoc de maturitate pubertatis, qua idonea filii gignerentur, conaretur ostendere, adque ideo in illis centum annis decem nostros insinuandos putaret incredulis, ne homines tamdiu uixisse recipere in fidem nollent, addidit centum, ubi gignendis filiis habilem non inuenit aetatem, eosdemque post genitos filios, ut congrueret summa, detraxit. Sic quippe uoluit credibiles facere idonearum generandae proli conuenientias aetatum, ut tamen numero non fraudaret uniuersas aetates uiuentium singulorum.

LATIN

ENGLISH

present where they had been missing, so that the total agrees. Clearly the one who did this wanted to persuade people that the ancients had lived a great many years because they called very short periods years. He tried to show this from the maturity of puberty at which one becomes fit to beget children. So he thought that ten of our years should be suggested to the incredulous under those hundred years, so that they would not refuse to believe that people had lived so long. He therefore added a hundred where he did not find an age fit for begetting children, and subtracted the same hundred after the children were born, so that the total would agree. In this way he wanted to make it credible that the ages for begetting offspring were suitable, while still not cheating the individuals of their full number of years.

Quod autem id in sexta generatione non fecit, hoc ipsum est quod magis mouet ideo illum fecisse, cum res, quam dicimus, postulauit, quia non fecit, ubi non postulauit. Inuenit namque in eadem generatione aput Hebraeos uixisse Iared, antequam genuisset Enoch, centum sexaginta duos (annos), qui secundum illam rationem breuium annorum fiunt anni sedecim et aliquid minus quam menses duo; quae iam aetas apta est ad gignendum, et ideo addere centum annos breues, ut nostri uiginti sex fierent, necesse non fuit, nec post natum Enoch eos detrahere, quos non addiderat ante natum. Sic factum est ut hic nulla esset inter codices utrosque uarietas.

He did not do this in the sixth generation, and that very fact more strongly persuades us that he did it when the circumstance we describe required it, since he did not do it where it did not. For in that generation he found in the Hebrew that Jared lived one hundred and sixty-two years before fathering Enoch. By that reckoning of short years, this makes sixteen years and a little less than two months, an age already fit for begetting. So there was no need to add a hundred short years to make twenty-six of ours. Nor was there any need to subtract after Enoch's birth what he had not added before it. That is how it came about that here there was no difference between the two sets of manuscripts.

Sed rursus mouet, quur in octaua generatione, antequam de Mathusalam nasceretur Lamech, cum aput Hebraeos legantur centum octoginta duo anni, uiginti minus inueniuntur in codicibus nostris, ubi potius addi centum solent, et post genitum Lamech conplendam restituuntur ad summam, quae in codicibus utrisque non discrepat. Si enim centum septuaginta annos propter pubertatis maturitatem decem et septem uolebat intellegi, sicut nihil addere, ita nihil detrahere iam debebat, quia inuenerat aetatem idoneam generationi filiorum, propter quam in aliis centum illos annos, ubi eam non inueniebat, addebat. Hoc autem de uiginti annis merito putaremus casu mendositatis accidere potuisse, nisi eos, sicut prius detraxerat, restituere postea curaret, ut summae conueniret integritas.

But again it is puzzling why, in the eighth generation, before Lamech was born of Methuselah, the Hebrew reads one hundred and eighty-two years while twenty fewer are found in our manuscripts, where a hundred are usually added instead. After Lamech's birth these twenty are restored to complete the total, which does not differ between the two sets of manuscripts. For if he wanted one hundred and seventy years to be understood as seventeen, to account for mature puberty, then he ought to have subtracted nothing, just as he ought to have added nothing. He had found an age fit for begetting children, and it was for the lack of that age, in the other cases, that he added those hundred years. We would rightly suppose that the change of twenty years could have arisen by accident, were it not that he took care to restore them later, having subtracted them earlier, so that the total would agree in full.

LATIN	ENGLISH
An forte astutius factum existimandum est, ut illa, qua centum anni prius solent adici et postea detrahi, occultaretur industria, cum et illic, ubi necesse non fuerat, non quidem de centum annis, uerum tamen de quantulocumque numero prius detracto, post reddito, tale aliquid fieret? Sed quomodolibet istuc accipiatur, siue credatur ita esse factum siue non credatur, siue postremo ita siue non ita sit: recte fieri nullo modo dubitauerim, ut, cum diuersum aliquid in utrisque codicibus inuenitur, quando quidem ad fidem rerum gestarum utrumque esse non potest uerum, ei linguae potius credatur, unde est in aliam per interpretes facta translatio. Nam in quibusdam etiam codicibus Graecis tribus et uno Latino et uno etiam Syro inter se consentientibus inuentus est Mathusalam sex annis ante diluuium fuisse defunctus.	Or should we perhaps think that this was done more cunningly, to conceal the design by which a hundred years are usually first added and then subtracted? On this view, something of the same sort was done even where it had not been necessary. It was done not with a hundred years, admittedly, but with some small number first subtracted and later given back. However this is taken, whether it is believed to have been done this way or not, or finally whether it is so or not, I would have no doubt at all about one thing. When something differs between the two sets of manuscripts, both cannot be true as a record of what happened. In that case it is right to trust the language from which translators made the translation into another. For in some manuscripts too, three Greek, one Latin and one Syriac, all agreeing with one another, Methuselah has been found to have died six years before the flood.

THAT YEARS WERE OF THE SAME LENGTH IN EARLIER AGES AS NOW

The dates of Noah's flood prove that days, months and years then were as long as ours.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.14 Nunc iam uideamus quonam modo euidenter possit ostendi, non tam breues, ut illi decem unus esset noster, sed tantae prolixitatis annos, quantae nunc habemus (quos utique circuitus conficit solis), in illorum hominum uita prolixissima conputatos. Sescentensimo nempe anno uitae Noe scriptum est factum esse diluuium. Quur ergo ibi legitur: Et aqua diluuii facta est super terram sescentensimo anno in uita Noe, secundi mensis, septima et uicensima mensis, si annus ille minimus, quales decem faciunt unum nostrum, triginta sex habebat dies? Tantillus quippe annus, si antiquo more hoc nomen accepit, aut non habet menses, aut mensis eius est triduum, ut habeat duodecim menses.	Now let us see how it can be clearly shown that the years counted in the very long lives of those men were not so short that ten of them made one of ours. They were as long as the years we have now, which are, of course, the years that the circuit of the sun completes. Scripture says, after all, that the flood took place in the six hundredth year of Noah's life. Why, then, do we read there, "And the water of the flood came upon the earth in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month," if that year was a tiny one, of the kind ten of which make one of ours, and had thirty-six days? Such a little year, if it received this name by ancient usage, either has no months, or its month is three days long, so that it can have twelve months.[30]
Quo modo igitur hic dictum est: Sescentensimo anno, secundi mensis, septima et uicensima mensis, nisi quia tales, quales nunc sunt, etiam tunc erant menses? Nam quo pacto aliter uicensimo et septimo die secundi mensis diceretur coeptum esse diluuium? Deinde postea in fine	How, then, could it be said here, "in the six hundredth year, in the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month," unless the months then were just like the months now? How else could the flood be said to have begun on the twenty-seventh

30 Genesis 7:11. Augustine's text, following the Septuagint, reads "twenty-seventh" where the Hebrew has "seventeenth."

LATIN

diluuii ita legitur: Et sedit arca in mense septimo, septima et uicensima mensis, super montes Ararat. Aqua autem minuebatur usque ad undecimum mensem; in undecimo autem mense prima die mensis paruerunt capita montium. Si igitur tales menses erant, tales profecto et anni erant, quales nunc habemus. Menses quippe illi triduani uiginti et septem dies habere non poterant.

Aut si pars tricensima tridui tunc appellabatur dies, ut omnia proportione minuantur: ergo nec toto quadriduo nostro factum est illud tam grande diluuium, quod memoratur factum quadraginta diebus et noctibus. Quis hanc absurditatem et uanitatem ferat? Proinde remoueatur hic error, qui coniectura falsa ita uult adstruere scripturarum nostrarum fidem, ut alibi destruat.

Prorsus tantus etiam tunc dies fuit, quantus et nunc est, quem uiginti quattuor horae diurno curriculo nocturnoque determinant; tantus mensis, quantus et nunc est, quem luna coepta et finita concludit; tantus annus, quantus et nunc est, quem duodecim menses lunares additis propter cursum solarem quinque diebus et quadrante consummant, quanti anni sescentensimi uitae Noe secundus erat mensis eiusque mensis uicensimus et septimus dies, quando coepit esse diluuium, in quo dies quadraginta continuatae ingentes pluuiae memorantur, qui dies non binas ac paulo amplius horas habebant, sed uicenas et quaternas die noctuque transactas.

Ac per hoc tam magnos annos uixerunt illi antiqui usque amplius quam nongentos, quantos postea uixit Abraham centum septuaginta et post eum filius eius Isaac centum octoginta et filius eius Iacob prope centum quinquaginta, et quantos interposita aliquanta aetate Moyses centum uiginti, et quantos etiam nunc uiuunt homines septuaginta uel octoginta uel non multo amplius, de quibus dictum est: Et amplius eis labor et dolor.

ENGLISH

day of the second month? Then later, at the end of the flood, we read: "And the ark came to rest in the seventh month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat. And the water went on decreasing until the eleventh month; and in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month, the tops of the mountains appeared." If, then, the months were like ours, the years too were certainly like the years we have now. For three-day months could not have had twenty-seven days.[31]

Or suppose that a thirtieth part of three days was then called a day, so that everything is scaled down in proportion. In that case that enormous flood, which is recorded as lasting forty days and nights, did not last even four whole days of ours. Who could put up with such absurd nonsense? So let this error be removed. By false conjecture it tries to build up the credibility of our Scriptures in one place, only to demolish it in another.

Quite simply, the day was as long then as it is now, bounded by twenty-four hours in its course through day and night. The month was as long as it is now, enclosed by the beginning and end of the moon. The year was as long as it is now, completed by twelve lunar months with five and a quarter days added to match the course of the sun. It was in the second month of such a year, the six hundredth of Noah's life, and on the twenty-seventh day of that month, that the flood began. During it, we are told, huge rains continued for forty days. Those days did not have just two hours and a little more each, but twenty-four, running through day and night.

And so those ancients lived years just as long, up to more than nine hundred of them, as the years in which Abraham later lived a hundred and seventy, and after him his son Isaac a hundred and eighty, and his son Jacob nearly a hundred and fifty. They were as long as the years in which, after some interval of time, Moses lived a hundred and twenty, and as long as those in which people even now live seventy or eighty or not much more, of whom it is said, "And beyond that, their lot is toil and pain."[32]

31 Genesis 8:4–5.
32 Psalm 89:10 (90:10 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

Illa uero numerorum uarietas, quae inter codices Hebraeos inuenitur et nostros, neque de hac antiquorum longaeuitate dissentit, et si quid habet ita diuersum, ut uerum esse utrumque non possit, rerum gestarum fides ab ea lingua repetenda est, ex qua interpretatum est quod habemus. Quae facultas cum uolentibus ubique gentium praesto sit, non tamen uacat, quod septuaginta interpretes in plurimis, quae diuersa dicere uidentur, ex Hebraeis codicibus emendare ausus est nemo. Non enim est illa diuersitas putata mendositas; nec ego ullo modo putandam existimo: sed ubi non est scriptoris error, aliquid eos diuino spiritu, ubi sensus esset consentaneus ueritati et praedicans ueritatem, non interpretantium munere, sed prophetantium libertate aliter dicere uoluisse credendum est.

ENGLISH

As for the discrepancy in the numbers found between the Hebrew manuscripts and ours, it does not disagree about this longevity of the ancients. And if it contains anything so different that both cannot be true, the true account of events must be sought from the language from which our text was translated. Anyone anywhere in the world who wants this resource can have it. Yet it is not for nothing that no one has dared to correct the seventy translators from the Hebrew manuscripts in the many places where they seem to say something different. For that difference has not been regarded as corruption, and I do not think it should be so regarded in any way. Rather, where it is not a copyist's error, we must believe that they chose, by the divine Spirit, to say something differently, where the sense would agree with the truth and proclaim the truth. They did so not in the role of translators but with the freedom of prophets.

Unde merito non solum Hebraeis, uerum etiam ipsis, cum adhibet testimonia de scripturis, uti apostolica inuenitur auctoritas. Sed hinc me opportuniore loco, si Deus adiuuerit, promisi diligentius locuturum; nunc quod instat expediam. Non enim ambigendum est ab homine, qui ex primo homine primus est natus, quando tamdiu uiuebant, potuisse constitui ciuitatem, sane terrenam, non illam, quae dicitur ciuitas Dei, de qua ut scriberemus, laborem tanti huius operis in manus sumsimus.

That is why the authority of the apostles is rightly found, when it cites testimonies from Scripture, to use not only the Hebrew text but theirs as well. I have promised, God willing, to speak about this more carefully in a more suitable place. For now I will deal with the matter at hand. There is no need to doubt that, when people lived so long, a city could have been founded by the man who was the first to be born of the first man. It was an earthly city, of course, not the one called the city of God, which is the city we took up the labor of this great work to write about.

WHETHER IT IS BELIEVABLE THAT THE MEN OF THE FIRST AGE ABSTAINED FROM INTERCOURSE UNTIL THE AGE AT WHICH THEY ARE SAID TO HAVE FATHERED CHILDREN

The sons named in the genealogies need not be firstborn; others born earlier went unrecorded.

LATIN

15.15 Dicet ergo aliquis: Itane credendum est hominem filios generaturum nec habentem propositum continentiae centum et amplius, uel secundum Hebraeos non multo minus, id est octoginta, septuaginta, sexaginta annos a concumbendi opere uacuisse, aut si non uacaret, nihil prolis gignere potuisse? Haec quaestio duobus modis soluitur. Aut enim tanto serior fuit proportione pubertas, quanto uitae totius maior annositas; aut, quod magis uideo esse credibile, non hic primogeniti filii commemorati sunt, sed quos successionis ordo poscebat, ut perueniretur ad Noe, a quo rursus ad Abraham

ENGLISH

Someone will say, then: "Are we really to believe that a man who was going to father children, and who had no intention of living in continence, abstained from intercourse for a hundred years and more, or, according to the Hebrew, not much less, that is, eighty, seventy, or sixty years? Or, if he did not abstain, that he was unable to beget any offspring?" This question can be resolved in two ways. Either puberty came later in proportion as the whole life was longer. Or, what I think more uidemus esse peruentum, ac deinde usque ad certum articulum temporis, quantum oportebat signari etiam generationibus commemoratis cursum gloriosissimae ciuitatis in hoc mundo peregrinantis et supernam patriam requirentis. Quod enim negari non potest, prior omnibus Cain ex coniunctione maris et feminae natus est.

LATIN

Neque enim illo nato dixisset Adam, quod dixisse legitur: Adquisiui hominem per Deum, nisi illis duobus ipse fuisset homo nascendo additus primus. Hunc secutus Abel, quem maior frater occidit, praefigurationem quandam peregrinantis ciuitatis Dei, quod ab inpiis et quodam modo terrigenis, id est terrenam originem diligentibus et terrenae ciuitatis terrena felicitate gaudentibus, persecutiones iniquas passura fuerat, primus ostendit. Sed quot annorum erat Adam, cum eos genuit, non apparet. Exinde digeruntur generationes aliae de Cain, aliae de illo, quem genuit Adam in eius successionem, quem frater occidit, et appellauit nomen illius Seth dicens, ut scriptum est: Suscitauit enim mihi Deus semen aliud pro Abel, quem occidit Cain.

Cum itaque istae duae series generationum, una de Seth, altera de Cain, has duas, de quibus agimus, distinctis ordinibus insinuent ciuitates, unam caelestem in terris peregrinantem, alteram terrenam terrenis tamquam sola sint gaudiis inhiantem uel inhaerentem: nullus de progenie Cain, cum dinumerata sit connumerato Adam usque ad octauam generationem, quot annorum fuisset expressus est, quando genuit eum, qui commemoratur post eum. Noluit enim Spiritus Dei in terrenae ciuitatis generationibus tempora notare ante diluuium, sed in caelestis maluit, tamquam essent memoria digniores. Porro autem Seth quando natus est, non quidem taciti sunt anni patris eius, sed iam genuerat alios; et utrum solos Cain et Abel, adfirmare quis audeat?

Non enim quia soli nominati sunt propter ordines generationum quas commemorare oportebat, ideo credible, the sons mentioned here are not the first-born, but those required by the line of succession, so that it might reach Noah. From Noah, in turn, we see it reach Abraham, and then on to a certain point in time, as far as it was fitting to mark, by recording generations as well, the course of the most glorious city that is a pilgrim in this world and seeks its homeland above. What cannot be denied is that Cain was the first of all to be born from the union of male and female.

ENGLISH

Adam would not have said at Cain's birth what we read that he said, "I have acquired a man through God," unless Cain had been the first man added to those two by being born. After him came Abel, whom his elder brother killed. Abel was the first to show in advance a kind of prefiguring of the pilgrim city of God, in that it would suffer unjust persecutions from the wicked and, so to speak, earth-born. These are people who love their earthly origin and delight in the earthly happiness of the earthly city. But how old Adam was when he fathered them is not stated. From there the generations are set out in separate lines: some from Cain, others from the son whom Adam fathered to succeed the one his brother killed. Adam named him Seth, saying, as it is written, "For God has raised up for me another offspring in place of Abel, whom Cain killed."[33]

These two lines of descent, then, one from Seth and the other from Cain, suggest in their distinct sequences the two cities we are discussing. One is heavenly and a pilgrim on earth. The other is earthly, gaping after earthly joys or clinging to them as if they were the only ones. Cain's progeny is enumerated down to the eighth generation, counting Adam, yet for none of them is it stated how old he was when he fathered the one listed after him. For the Spirit of God did not wish to mark the times before the flood in the generations of the earthly city, but preferred to do so in those of the heavenly city, as being more worthy of remembrance. Moreover, when Seth was born, his father's years are indeed not passed over in silence, but by then Adam had already fathered others. And who would dare to assert that these were only Cain and Abel?

They alone are named because of the lines of descent that needed to be recorded. That should not consequens uideri debet solos fuisse tunc generatos ex Adam. Cum enim silentio coopertis omnium nominibus ceterorum legatur eum genuisse filios et filias: quota fuerit ista proles eius, quis praesumat adserere, si culpam temeritatis euitat? Potuit quippe Adam diuinitus admonitus dicere, postea quam Seth natus est: Suscitauit enim mihi Deus semen aliud pro Abel, quoniam talis erat futurus, qui inpleret illius sanctitatem, non quod ipse prior post eum temporis ordine nasceretur. Deinde quod scriptum est: Vixit autem Seth quinque et ducentos annos (uel secundum Hebraeos quinque et centum annos), et genuit Enos: quis possit nisi inconsideratus adseuerare hunc eius primogenitum fuisse?

LATIN

ENGLISH

make it seem to follow that they were the only children Adam had fathered by then. We read that he fathered sons and daughters, while the names of all the others are covered in silence. Who, then, would presume to state how many children he had, if he wants to avoid the charge of rashness? Adam could well have said, under divine prompting, after Seth was born, "For God has raised up for me another offspring in place of Abel," because Seth was to be the kind of man who would fulfill Abel's holiness, not because he was the next to be born after Abel in order of time. Then again, it is written, "Seth lived two hundred and five years (or according to the Hebrew, one hundred and five years), and fathered Enosh." Who but a thoughtless person could assert that Enosh was his firstborn,[34] ut admirantes merito requiramus, quo modo per tot annos inmunis fuerit a conubio sine ullo proposito continentiae uel non genuerit coniugatus; quando quidem etiam de ipso legitur: Et genuit filios et filias, et fuerunt omnes dies Seth duodecim et nongenti anni, et mortuus est. Adque ita deinceps, quorum anni commemorantur, nec filios filiasque genuisse reticentur. Ac per hoc non apparet omnino, utrum, qui nominatur genitus, ipse fuerit primogenitus; immo uero, quoniam credibile non est patres illos aetate tam longa aut inpuberes fuisse aut coniugibus caruisse uel fetibus, nec illos eorum filios primos eis natos fuisse credibile est.

and so leave us rightly wondering how Seth remained free from marriage for so many years with no intention of continence, or, if married, fathered no children? After all, we read of him too: "And he fathered sons and daughters, and all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years, and he died." And so on in turn: for those whose years are recorded, Scripture does not leave unsaid that they fathered sons and daughters. Consequently, it is not at all clear whether the son who is named as fathered was himself the firstborn. Indeed, it is not credible that those fathers, over so long a lifetime, were either below the age of puberty or without wives or offspring. Neither, then, is it credible that those sons of theirs were the first to be born to them.[35]

Sed cum sacrae scriptor historiae ad ortum uitamque Noe, cuius tempore diluuium factum est, per successiones generationum notatis temporibus intenderet peruenire, eas utique commemorauit, non quae primae suis parentibus fuerint, sed quae in propagationis ordinem uenerint.

But the writer of the sacred history intended to arrive at the birth and life of Noah, in whose time the flood took place, through the successions of generations with their times noted. So he naturally recorded not the generations that were first born to their parents, but those that came into the line of descent.

Exempli gratia, quo id fiat apertius, aliquid interponam, unde nullus ambigat fieri potuisse quod dico. Euangelista Matthaeus generationem dominicae carnis per seriem parentum uolens commendare memoriae, ordiens a patre Abraham adque ad Dauid primitus ut perueniret

To make this clearer, let me insert an example, which will leave no one in doubt that what I say could have happened. The evangelist Matthew wanted to set down for remembrance the generation of the Lord's flesh through a series of ancest-

33 Genesis 4:1 and 4:25.
34 Genesis 5:6.
35 Genesis 5:7–8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
intendens: Abraham, inquit, genuit Isaac; quur non dixit Ismael, quem primitus genuit? Isaac autem, inquit, genuit Iacob; quur non dixit Esau, qui eius primogenitus fuit? Quia scilicet per illos ad Dauid peruenire non posset. Deinde sequitur: Iacob autem genuit ludam et fratres eius; numquid ludas primogenitus fuit? ludas, inquit, genuit Phares et Zarat; nec istorum geminorum aliquis fuit primogenitus Iudae, sed ante illos iam tres genuerat. Eos itaque tenuit in ordine generationum, per quos ad Dauid adque inde quo intenderat perueniret.	ors. He began from father Abraham and aimed first to reach David. "Abraham," he says, "fathered Isaac." Why did he not say Ishmael, whom Abraham fathered first? "And Isaac," he says, "fathered Jacob." Why did he not say Esau, who was Isaac's firstborn? Because, of course, he could not reach David through them. Then follows: "And Jacob fathered Judah and his brothers." Was Judah the firstborn? "Judah," he says, "fathered Perez and Zerah." Neither of these twins was Judah's firstborn either, for he had already fathered three before them. So Matthew kept in the line of generations those through whom he could reach David, and from there the goal he was aiming at.[36]
Ex quo intellegi potest, ueteres quoque homines ante diluuium non primogenitos, sed eos fuisse commemoratos, per quos ordo succedentium generationum ad Noe patriarcham duceretur, ne serae pubertatis illorum obscura et non necessaria quaestio nos fatiget.	From this we can understand that among the ancient men before the flood, too, those mentioned were not the firstborn. They were the ones through whom the line of succeeding generations would lead to the patriarch Noah. So the obscure and unnecessary question of their late puberty need not wear us out.

THE LAW OF MARRIAGE, WHICH IN THE FIRST MARRIAGES WAS DIFFERENT FROM LATER ONES

The first humans had to marry siblings; later, spreading kinship more widely made such marriages wrong.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.16 Cum igitur genus humanum post primam copulam uiri facti ex puluere et coniugis eius ex uiri latere marium feminarumque coniunctione opus haberet, ut gignendo multiplicaretur, nec essent ulli homines, nisi qui ex illis duobus nati fuissent: uiri sorores suas coniuges acceperunt; quod profecto quanto est antiquius conpellente necessitate, tanto postea factum est damnabilius religione prohibente. Habita est enim ratio rectissima caritatis, ut homines, quibus esset utilis adque honesta concordia, diuersarum necessitudinum uinculis necterentur, nec unus in uno multas haberet, sed singulae spargerentur in singulos ac sic ad socialem uitam diligentius conligandam plurimae plurimos obtinerent. Pater quippe et socer duarum sunt necessitudinum nomina. Ut ergo alium quisque habeat patrem, alium socerum, numerosius se caritas porrigit.	After the first union of the man made from dust and his wife made from the man's side, the human race needed the union of males and females in order to multiply by procreation. And there were no human beings except those born from those two. So men took their sisters as wives. The more ancient this practice is, compelled by necessity, the more damnable it later became, once religion forbade it. For in this a perfectly right account was taken of love. People for whom harmony was useful and honorable were to be bound together by the ties of different relationships. No one person was to combine many relationships in one other person. Each relationship was to be assigned to a separate person, and so, to bind social life together more closely, a great many relationships would take in a great many people. "Father" and "father-in-law," after all, are the names of two relationships. So when each person has one man as father and another as father-in-law, love extends itself to more people.

36 Matthew 1:2–3.

LATIN

Utrumque autem unus Adam esse cogebatur et filiis et filiabus suis, quando fratres sororesque conubio iungebantur. Sic et Eua uxor eius utrique sexui filiorum fuit et socrus et mater; quae si duae feminae fuissent, mater altera et socrus altera, copiosius se socialis dilectio conligaret. Ipsa denique iam soror, quod etiam uxor fiebat, duas tenebat una necessitudines; quibus per singulas distributis, ut altera esset soror, altera uxor, hominum numero socialis propinquitas augeretur. Sed hoc unde fieret tunc non erat, quando nisi fratres et sorores ex illis duobus primis nulli homines erant. Fieri ergo debuit quando potuit, ut existente copia inde ducerentur uxores, quae non erant iam sorores, et non solum illud ut fieret nulla necessitas esset, uerum etiam si fieret nefas esset.

ENGLISH

But Adam alone was forced to be both of these to his sons and to his daughters, when brothers and sisters were joined in marriage. In the same way Eve his wife was both mother-in-law and mother to her children of both sexes. If these had been two women, one the mother and the other the mother-in-law, social love would have bound itself together more widely. Again, the sister herself, by also becoming a wife, held two relationships by herself. If these had been distributed one apiece, so that one woman was a sister and another a wife, the social bond of kinship would have been increased in the number of people it reached. But at that time there was no way to do this, since there were no human beings except the brothers and sisters born of those first two. It had to be done, then, as soon as it could be done. Once there were enough people, wives were to be taken from among those who were no longer sisters. Then not only was there no longer any necessity for that earlier practice, but if it were done, it would be a crime.

Nam si et nepotes primorum hominum, qui iam consobrinas poterant accipere coniuges, sororibus matrimonio iungerentur, non iam duae, sed tres in homine uno necessitudines fierent, quae propter caritatem numerosiore propinquitate nectendam disseminari per singulos singulae debuerunt. Esset enim unus homo filiis suis, fratri scilicet sororique coniugibus, et pater et socer et auunculus; ita et uxor eius eisdem communibus filiis et mater et amita et socrus; idemque inter se filii eorum non solum essent fratres adque coniuges, uerum etiam consobrini, quia et fratrum filii.

Suppose that even the grandchildren of the first humans, who could by then take their cousins as wives, were joined in marriage to their sisters. Then there would be not two but three relationships in one person. Yet these relationships ought to have been spread out, one to each person, so that love might be bound together by a more numerous kinship. For one man would be father, father-in-law and uncle to his own children, a brother and sister married to each other. Likewise his wife would be mother, aunt and mother-in-law to those same children of theirs. And their children in turn would be to one another not only brother and sister and spouses, but also cousins, since they were the children of siblings.

Omnes autem istae necessitudines, quae uni homini tres homines conectebant, nouem conecterent, si essent in singulis singulae, ut unus homo haberet alteram sororem, alteram uxorem, alteram consobrinam, alterum patrem, alterum auunculum, alterum socerum, alteram matrem, alteram amitam, alteram socrum; adque ita se non in paucitate coartatum, sed latius adque numerosius propinquitatibus crebris uinculum sociale diffunderet.

But all these relationships, which tied three people to one person, would tie nine if each were held by a different person. One person would have one woman as sister, another as wife and another as cousin; one man as father, another as uncle and another as father-in-law; one woman as mother, another as aunt and another as mother-in-law. In this way the social bond would not be cramped within a small number, but would spread itself more widely and more numerously through many kinships.

LATIN

Quod humano genere crescente et multiplicato etiam inter inpios deorum multorum falsorumque cultores sic obseruari cernimus, ut, etiamsi peruersis legibus permittantur fraterna coniugia, melior tamen consuetudo ipsam malit exhorrere licentiam, et cum sorores accipere in matrimonium primis humani generis temporibus omnino licuerit, sic auersetur, quasi numquam licere potuerit. Ad humanum enim sensum uel adliciendum uel offendendum mos ualet plurimum; qui cum in hac causa inmoderationem concupiscentiae coherceat, eum dissignari adque corrumpi merito esse nefarium iudicatur. Si enim est iniquum auiditate possidendi transgredi limitem agrorum, quanto est iniquius libidine concumbendi subuertere limitem morum!

Experti autem sumus in conubiis consobrinarum etiam nostris temporibus propter gradum propinquitatis fraterno gradui proximum quam raro per mores fiebat, quod fieri per leges licebat, quia id nec diuina prohibuit et nondum prohibuerat lex humana. Verum tamen factum etiam licitum propter uicinitatem horrebatur inliciti et, quod fiebat cum consobrina, paene cum sorore fieri uidebatur; quia et ipsi inter se propter tam propinquam consanguinitatem fratres uocantur et paene germani sunt. Fuit autem antiquis patribus religiosae curae, ne ipsa propinquitas se paulatim propaginum ordinibus dirimens longius abiret et propinquitas esse desisteret, eam nondum longe positam rursus matrimonii uinculo conligare et quodam modo reuocare fugientem.

Unde iam pleno hominibus orbe terrarum, non quidem sorores ex patre uel matre uel ex ambobus suis parentibus natas, sed tamen amabant de suo genere ducere uxores. Verum quis dubitet honestius hoc tempore etiam consobrinorum prohibita esse coniugia? non solum secundum ea, quae disputauimus, propter multiplicandas adfinitates, ne habeat duas necessitudines una persona, cum duae possint eas habere et numerus propinquitatis augeri; sed etiam quia nescio quo modo inest humanae uerecundiae quiddam naturale adque laudabile, ut, cui debet causa propinquitatis reuerendum honorem, ab ea contineat, quamuis generatricem, tamen

ENGLISH

As the human race grew and multiplied, we see this observed even among the ungodly worshipers of many false gods. Even where perverse laws permit marriages between brother and sister, better custom still prefers to shudder at that license. Taking sisters in marriage was entirely permitted in the earliest times of the human race, yet custom turns away from it as though it could never have been permitted. For custom has very great power either to attract or to offend human feeling. Since in this matter it restrains the excess of desire, it is rightly judged wicked to break and corrupt it. If it is wrong, out of greed for possession, to cross the boundary of another's fields, how much more wrong is it, out of lust for intercourse, to overturn the boundary of custom!

We have also seen, even in our own times, how rarely custom permitted in practice what law permitted in marriages between cousins, because their degree of kinship is next to that of siblings. Divine law did not forbid such marriages, and human law had not yet forbidden them. Nevertheless, the act, though lawful, was shunned because it came so close to the unlawful. What was done with a cousin seemed almost to be done with a sister. For cousins, because of their close blood relationship, call one another brothers and sisters, and are almost true siblings. The ancient fathers, however, took religious care that kinship itself should not gradually divide itself through the generations of descent, drift too far away and cease to be kinship. So, before it had gone far, they bound it back again by the tie of marriage, and in a way called it back as it fled.[37]

So even when the world was already full of people, they still liked to take wives from their own family line, though not sisters born of the same father or mother or of both parents. But who would doubt that it is more honorable that in our time even marriages between cousins have been forbidden? One reason is the one we have discussed: to multiply ties by marriage, so that one person should not hold two relationships when two people could hold them and the number of kin could be increased. Another reason is that there is somehow in human modesty something natural and praise-

37 Marriage between first cousins was banned in Roman law by the emperor Theodosius I, around AD 384.

LATIN

libidinem, de qua erubescere uidemus et ipsam pudicitiam coniugalem.

Copulatio igitur maris et feminae, quantum adtinet ad genus mortalium, quoddam seminarium est ciuitatis; sed terrena ciuitas generatione tantummodo, caelestis autem etiam regeneratione opus habet, ut noxam generationis euadat. Utrum autem aliquod fuerit, uel si fuit, quale fuerit corporale adque uisibile regenerationis signum ante diluuium, sicut Abrahae circumcisio postea est imperata, sacra historia tacet. Sacrificasse tamen Deo etiam illos antiquissimos homines non tacet; quod et in duobus primis fratribus claruit, et Noe post diluuium, cum de arca fuisset egressus, hostias Deo legitur immolasse. De qua re in praecedentibus libris iam diximus, non ob aliud daemones adrogantes sibi diuinitatem deosque se credi cupientes sibi expetere sacrificium et gaudere huius modi honoribus, nisi quia uerum sacrificium uero Deo deberi sciunt.

ENGLISH

worthy. Toward a woman to whom it owes the respect due to kinship, it holds back lust, procreative though lust is. We see that even the chastity of marriage blushes at that lust.

The union of male and female, then, is a kind of seedbed of the city, as far as the mortal race is concerned. But the earthly city needs only generation, while the heavenly city needs regeneration as well, in order to escape the guilt that comes with generation. Later, circumcision was commanded to Abraham. Whether there was any comparable bodily and visible sign of regeneration before the flood, or, if there was, what it was, the sacred history does not say. It does not keep silent, however, about the fact that even those most ancient people offered sacrifice to God. This was made clear in the case of the first two brothers, and we read that Noah, after the flood, when he had come out of the ark, offered victims to God. On this subject we have already said in the preceding books why the demons claim divinity for themselves and want to be believed gods. They demand sacrifice for themselves and delight in honors of this kind for one reason only: they know that true sacrifice is owed to the true God.

THE TWO FATHERS AND FOUNDERS BORN OF ONE PARENT

Cain means possession and Enoch dedication, signs of the earthly city; Seth means resurrection.

LATIN

15.17 Cum ergo esset Adam utriusque generis pater, id est et cuius series ad terrenam, et cuius series ad caelestem pertinet ciuitatem, occiso Abel adque in eius interfectione commendato mirabili sacramento facti sunt duo patres singulorum generum, Cain et Seth, in quorum filiis, quos commemorari oportebat, duarum istarum ciuitatum in genere mortalium euidentius indicia clarere coeperunt. Cain quippe genuit Enoch, in cuius nomine condidit ciuitatem, terrenam scilicet, non peregrinantem in hoc mundo, sed in eius temporali pace ac felicitate quiescentem. Cain autem interpretatur possessio; unde dictum est, quando natus est, siue a patre siue a matre eius: Adquisiui hominem per Deum. Enoch uero dedicatio; hic enim dedicatur terrena ciuitas, ubi conditur, quoniam hic habet eum, quem intendit et adpetit, finem.

ENGLISH

Adam, then, was the father of both lines: the line that belongs to the earthly city and the line that belongs to the heavenly city. When Abel was killed, and a wonderful mystery was set forth in his murder, two fathers were established, one for each line: Cain and Seth. In their sons, those whom it was fitting to record, the signs of these two cities among mortal humankind began to show more clearly. For Cain fathered Enoch, and in his name he founded a city. It was an earthly city, of course, not one on pilgrimage in this world but one at rest in this world's temporal peace and happiness. Now Cain means "possession." Hence the words spoken when he was born, whether by his father or by his mother: "I have acquired a man through God." Enoch, on the other hand, means "dedication." For the earthly city is dedicated here, where it is founded, since it is here that it has the end it aims at and seeks.[38]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Porro ille Seth interpretatur resurrectio et Enos filius eius interpretatur homo; non sicut Adam. Et ipsum enim nomen homo interpretatur; sed commune perhibetur esse in illa lingua, id est Hebraea, masculo et feminae. Nam sic de illo scriptum est: Masculum et feminam fecit illos et benedixit illos et cognominauit nomen eorum Adam. Unde non ambigitur sic appellatam fuisse feminam Euam proprio nomine, ut tamen Adam, quod interpretatur homo, nomen esset amborum. Enos autem sic interpretatur homo, ut hoc non posse feminam nuncupari periti linguae illius adseuerent, tamquam filius resurrectionis, ubi non nubent neque uxores ducent. Non enim erit ibi generatio, cum illuc perduxerit regeneratio.

Seth, further, means "resurrection," and his son Enosh means "man," though not in the way Adam does. That name too means "man," but in that language, Hebrew, it is said to be common to male and female. For this is what is written about him: "Male and female he made them, and he blessed them, and he named them Adam." So there is no doubt that the woman was called Eve as her own proper name, while Adam, which means "man," was the name of both. Enosh, however, means "man" in such a way that a woman cannot be called by it, as experts in that language assert. He is, as it were, the son of the resurrection, where they will neither marry nor take wives. For there will be no generation there, once regeneration has brought us there.[39]

Quare et hoc non incassum notandum arbitror, quod in eis generationibus, quae propagantur ex illo qui est appellatus Seth, cum genuisse filios filiasque dicantur, nulla ibi genita nominatim femina expressa est; in his autem, quae propagantur ex Cain, in ipso fine, quo usque, pertendunt, nouissima femina genita nominatur. Sic enim legitur: Mathusael genuit Lamech; et sumsit sibi Lamech duas uxores, nomen uni Ada et nomen secundae Sella, et peperit Ada Iobel; hic erat pater habitantium in tabernaculis pecuariorum. Et nomen fratris eius Iobal; hic fuit qui ostendit psalterium et citharam. Sella autem peperit et ipsa Tobel; et erat malleator aerarius aeramenti et ferri. Soror autem Tobel Noemma.

For this reason I think it worth noting, and not without purpose, that in the generations descended from the man called Seth no woman born among them is mentioned by name, although they are said to have fathered sons and daughters. In the generations descended from Cain, by contrast, at the very end to which they extend, the last person born who is named is a woman. For this is how it reads: "Methushael fathered Lamech. And Lamech took two wives; the name of one was Adah and the name of the second Zillah. And Adah bore Jabal; he was the father of those who live in tents and keep livestock. And his brother's name was Jubal; he was the one who introduced the harp and the lyre. Zillah also bore Tubal; he was a hammerer, a smith of bronze and iron. And Tubal's sister was Naamah."[40]

Huc usque porrectae sunt generationes ex Cain, quae sunt omnes ab Adam octo adnumerato ipso Adam, septem scilicet usque ad Lamech, qui duarum maritus uxorum fuit, et octaua est generatio in filiis eius, in quibus commemoratur et femina. Ubi eleganter significatum est terrenam ciuitatem usque in sui finem carnales habituram generationes, quae marium feminarumque coniunctione proueniunt. Unde et ipsae, quod praeter Euam nusquam reperitur ante diluuium, nominibus propriis exprimuntur uxores illius hominis, qui nominatur hic nouissimus pater.

This is as far as the generations from Cain are carried. There are eight of them in all from Adam, counting Adam himself: seven, that is, down to Lamech, who was the husband of two wives, while the eighth generation is in his children, among whom a woman is also recorded. Here it is elegantly signified that the earthly city will have, right up to its end, fleshly generations that come from the union of men and women. That is also why the wives of the man named here as the last father are

38 Genesis 4:1.
39 Genesis 5:2. The phrase about not marrying alludes to Jesus' words in Luke 20:35.
40 Genesis 4:18–22.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	themselves given their own names, something found nowhere before the flood except for Eve.
Sicut autem Cain, quod interpretatur possessio, terrenae conditor ciuitatis, et filius eius, in cuius nomine condita est, Enoch, quod interpretatur dedicatio, indicat istam ciuitatem et initium et finem habere terrenum, ubi nihil speratur amplius, quam in hoc saeculo cerni potest: ita Seth, quod interpretatur resurrectio, cum sit generationum seorsus commemoratarum pater, quid de filio eius sacra haec historia dicat, intuendum est.	Cain, which means "possession," was the founder of the earthly city, and his son Enoch, in whose name it was founded, means "dedication." Together they indicate that this city has both an earthly beginning and an earthly end, a city in which nothing more is hoped for than can be seen in this world. In the same way we must look at Seth, which means "resurrection." Since he is the father of the generations recorded separately, we must consider what this sacred history says about his son.

WHAT WAS SIGNIFIED IN ABEL, SETH, AND ENOSH THAT CLEARLY RELATES TO CHRIST AND HIS BODY, THE CHURCH

Abel, Seth and Enosh prefigure Christ's death and resurrection and the city that lives in hope.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.18 Et Seth, inquit, natus est filius, et nominauit nomen eius Enos; hic sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei. Nempe clamat adtestatio ueritatis. In spe igitur uiuit homo filius resurrectionis; in spe uiuit, quamdiu peregrinatur hic, ciuitas Dei, quae gignitur ex fide resurrectionis Christi. Ex duobus namque illis hominibus, Abel, quod interpretatur luctus, et eius fratre Seth, quod interpretatur resurrectio, mors Christi et uita eius ex mortuis figuratur. Ex qua fide gignitur hic ciuitas Dei, id est homo, qui sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei. Spe enim salui facti sumus, ait apostolus. Spes autem quae uidetur, non est spes. Quod enim uidet quis, quid sperat? Si autem quod non uidemus speramus, per patientiam exspectamus. Nam quis uacare hoc existimet ab altitudine sacramenti?	"And to Seth," it says, "a son was born, and he named him Enosh; he hoped to call on the name of the Lord God." Here, surely, the testimony of truth cries aloud. Man, the son of the resurrection, lives in hope, then. As long as it is on pilgrimage here, the city of God lives in hope, the city that is born of faith in the resurrection of Christ. For in those two men, Abel, which means "grief," and his brother Seth, which means "resurrection," the death of Christ and his life from the dead are prefigured. From this faith the city of God is born here, that is, the man who hoped to call on the name of the Lord God. "For in hope we were saved," says the apostle. "But hope that is seen is not hope. For who hopes for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience." Could anyone think that this lacks the depth of a mystery?[41]
Numquid enim Abel non sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei, cuius sacrificium scriptura tam acceptum Deo fuisse commemorat? Numquid ipse Seth non sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei, de quo dictum est: Suscitauit enim mihi Deus semen aliud pro Abel? Quur ergo huic proprie tribuitur, quod piorum omnium intellegitur esse commune, nisi quia oportebat in eo, qui de patre generationum in meliorem partem, hoc est supernae ciuitatis, separatarum, primus commemoratur exortus, praefigurari hominem, id est hominum	For did Abel not hope to call on the name of the Lord God, when Scripture records that his sacrifice was so acceptable to God? Did Seth himself not hope to call on the name of the Lord God, when of him it was said: "For God has raised up for me another offspring in place of Abel"? Why, then, is something attributed specifically to this man that is understood to be common to all the godly? It can only be because he is the first recorded as born from the father of the generations set apart

41 Genesis 4:26; Romans 8:24–25.

LATIN

societatem, quae non secundum hominem in re felicitatis terrenae, sed secundum Deum uiuit in spe felicitatis aeternae? Nec dictum est: Hic sperauit in Dominum Deum, aut: Hic inuocauit nomen Domini Dei, sed: sperauit, inquit, inuocare nomen Domini Dei.

Quid sibi hoc uult: Sperauit inuocare, nisi quia prophetia est exorturum populum, qui secundum electionem gratiae inuocaret nomen Domini Dei? Hoc est, quod per alium prophetam dictum apostolus de hoc populo intellegit ad Dei gratiam pertinente: Et erit, omnis qui inuocauerit nomen Domini saluus erit. Hoc ipsum enim quod dicitur: Et nominauit nomen eius Enos, quod interpretatur homo, ac deinde additur: Hic sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei, satis ostenditur, quod non in se ipso spem ponere debeat homo; maledictus enim omnis (sicut alibi legitur), qui spem suam ponit in homine, ac per hoc nec in se, ut sit ciuis alterius ciuitatis, quae non secundum filium Cain dedicatur hoc tempore, id est mortalis huius saeculi labente transcursu, sed in illa inmortalitate beatitudinis sempiternae.

ENGLISH

for the better part, that is, for the city above. In him there had to be prefigured "man," that is, the society of human beings that lives not according to man, in the actual possession of earthly happiness, but according to God, in the hope of eternal happiness. Nor is it said, "He hoped in the Lord God," or "He called on the name of the Lord God." Instead it says: "He hoped to call on the name of the Lord God."[42]

What does "He hoped to call" mean, if not that it is a prophecy that a people would arise who, according to the election of grace, would call on the name of the Lord God? This is what was said through another prophet, and the apostle understands it of this people that belongs to the grace of God: "And it shall be that everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." For this very statement, "And he named him Enosh," which means "man," followed by the addition, "He hoped to call on the name of the Lord God," shows clearly enough that man should not place his hope in himself. For, as we read elsewhere, "cursed is everyone who places his hope in man." Neither, therefore, should he place it in himself, if he is to be a citizen of the other city. That city is not dedicated in this present time, after the manner of Cain's son, that is, in the passing course of this mortal world. It is dedicated in that immortality of everlasting happiness.[43]

WHAT IS SHOWN BY THE TAKING UP OF ENOCH

Enoch, taken up in the seventh generation, prefigures our own dedication, postponed until the end.

LATIN

15.19 Nam et ista propago, cuius est pater Seth, in ea generatione habet dedicationis nomen, quae septima est ex Adam adnumerato Adam. Septimus enim ab illo natus est Enoch, quod interpretatur dedicatio. Sed ipse est ille translatus, quoniam placuit Deo, et insigni numero in ordine generationum, quo sabbatum consecratum est, septimo scilicet ab Adam. Ab ipso autem patre istarum generationum, quae discernuntur a progenie Cain, id est a Seth, sextus est; quoto die factus est homo et consummauit Deus omnia opera sua. Sed huius Enoch translatio nostrae dedicationis est praefigurata dilatio.

ENGLISH

For this line too, whose father is Seth, has the name "dedication" in the generation that is seventh from Adam, counting Adam. The seventh born from him was Enoch, which means "dedication." But this is the Enoch who was taken up because he pleased God. He also stands at a notable number in the order of generations, the number by which the Sabbath was consecrated, namely the seventh from Adam. From Seth himself, the father of these generations that are distinguished from Cain's descendants, he is sixth, which corresponds to the day on which man was made and God

42 Genesis 4:25.
43 Joel 2:32, quoted by Paul in Romans 10:13; Jeremiah 17:5.

LATIN

ENGLISH

completed all his works. But this Enoch's being taken up prefigures the postponement of our own dedication.[44]

Quae quidem iam facta est in Christo capite nostro, qui sic resurrexit, ut non moriatur ulterius, sed etiam ipse translatus est; restat autem altera dedicatio uniuersae domus, cuius ipse Christus est fundamentum, quae differtur in finem, quando erit omnium resurrectio non morituroruм amplius. Siue autem domus Dei dicatur siue templum Dei siue ciuitas Dei, id ipsum est nec abhorret a Latini eloquii consuetudine. Nam et Vergilius imperiosissimam ciuitatem domum appellat Assaraci, Romanos uolens intellegi, qui de Assaraco per Troianos originem ducunt; et domum Aeneae eosdem ipsos, quia eo duce Troiani cum Italiam uenissent ab eis condita est Roma. Imitatus namque est poeta ille litteras sacras, in quibus dicitur domus Iacob iam ingens populus Hebraeorum.

That dedication has indeed already taken place in Christ, our head, who rose again so as to die no more, and was himself also taken up. But there remains the other dedication, that of the whole house of which Christ himself is the foundation. It is postponed until the end, when there will be the resurrection of all, never to die again. Whether we say the house of God, or the temple of God, or the city of God, it is the same thing, and the expression is not foreign to Latin usage. Virgil too calls the city of supreme dominion "the house of Assaracus," meaning the Romans, who trace their origin from Assaracus through the Trojans. He also calls the same people "the house of Aeneas," because the Trojans came to Italy under his leadership and Rome was founded by them. That poet was imitating the sacred writings, in which the Hebrew people, already vast, is called "the house of Jacob."[45]

WHY CAIN'S LINE ENDS AT THE EIGHTH GENERATION FROM ADAM, WHILE AMONG THE DESCENDANTS OF THE SAME FATHER ADAM, NOAH IS FOUND IN THE TENTH

Augustine asks why Cain's line is traced only to the eighth generation, while Seth's runs to Noah.

LATIN

ENGLISH

15.20 Dicet aliquis: Si hoc intendebat scriptor huius historiae in commemorandis generationibus ex Adam per filium eius Seth, ut per illas perueniret ad Noe, sub quo factum est diluuium, a quo rursus contexeretur ordo nascentium, quo perueniret ad Abraham, a quo Matthaeus euangelista incipit generationes, quibus ad Christum peruenit aeternum regem ciuitatis Dei: quid intendebat in generationibus ex Cain et quo eas perducere uolebat? Respondetur: Usque ad diluuium, quo totum illud genus terrenae ciuitatis absumtum est, sed reparatum est ex filiis Noe. Neque enim deesse poterit haec terrena ciuitas societasque hominum secundum hominem uiuentium usque ad huius saeculi finem, de quo Dominus ait: Filii saeculi huius generant et generantur.

Someone will object: "The writer of this history recorded the generations from Adam through his son Seth in order to reach Noah, in whose time the flood took place. From Noah the line of births would again be traced so as to reach Abraham, with whom the evangelist Matthew begins the generations by which he reaches Christ, the eternal king of the city of God. If that was his aim, what did he intend in the generations from Cain, and where did he want to take them?" The answer is: down to the flood, by which that whole race of the earthly city was destroyed, though it was restored from the sons of Noah. For this earthly city, this society of human beings living according to man, can never fail to exist until the end of this age, of which the Lord says: "The children of this age beget and are begotten."[46]

44 Genesis 5:24; Hebrews 11:5.
45 Assaracus was a legendary king of Troy and ancestor of Aeneas; the phrases come from Virgil's Aeneid 1.284 and 3.97.
46 Luke 20:34.

LATIN

Ciuitatem uero Dei peregrinantem in hoc saeculo regeneratio perducit ad alterum saeculum, cuius filii nec generant nec generantur. Hic ergo generari et generare ciuitati utrique commune est; quamuis Dei ciuitas habeat etiam hic multa ciuium milia, quae ab opere generandi se abstineant; sed habet etiam illa ex imitatione quadam, licet errantium. Ad eam namque pertinent etiam, qui deuiantes ab huius fide diuersas haereses condiderunt; secundum hominem quippe uiuunt, non secundum Deum. Et Indorum gymnosophistae, qui nudi perhibentur philosophari in solitudinibus Indiae, cibi esu et a generando se cohibent. Non est enim hoc bonum, nisi cum fit secundum fidem summi boni, qui Deus est.

Hoc tamen nemo fecisse ante diluuium reperitur; quando quidem etiam ipse Enoch septimus ab Adam, qui translatus refertur esse non mortuus, genuit filios et filias antequam transferretur; in quibus fuit Mathusalam, per quem generationum memorandarum ordo transcurrit.

Quur ergo tanta paucitas successionum commemoratur in generationibus ex Cain, si eas usque ad diluuium perduci oportebat, nec erat diuturna aetas praeueniens pubertatem, quae centum uel amplius annos uacaret a fetibus? Nam si non intendebat auctor libri huius aliquem, ad quem necessario perduceret seriem generationum, sicut in illis, quae ueniunt de semine Seth, intendebat peruenire ad Noe, a quo rursus ordo necessarius sequeretur: quid opus erat praetermittere primogenitos filios, ut perueniretur ad Lamech, in cuius filiis finitur illa contextio, octaua generatione scilicet ex Adam, septima ex Cain, quasi esset inde aliquid deinceps conectendum, unde perueniretur uel ad Israeliticum populum, in quo caelesti ciuitati etiam terrena Hierusalem figuram propheticam praebuit, uel ad Christum secundum carnem, qui est super omnia Deus benedictus in saecula, supernae Hierusalem fabricator adque regnator, cum tota progenies Cain diluuio sit deleta?

ENGLISH

But the city of God, on pilgrimage in this age, is led by regeneration to the other age, whose children neither beget nor are begotten. Here, then, being begotten and begetting are common to both cities. The city of God, it is true, has even here many thousands of citizens who abstain from the work of begetting. But the other city also has such people, through a kind of imitation, though they are people in error. To it belong also those who strayed from the faith of the city of God and founded various heresies, for they live according to man, not according to God. The gymnosophists of India, too, who are said to practice philosophy naked in the solitudes of India, abstain from eating food and from begetting. For this is not a good unless it is done in accordance with faith in the supreme good, which is God.

Yet no one is found to have done this before the flood. Even Enoch himself, seventh from Adam, who is reported to have been taken up and not to have died, fathered sons and daughters before he was taken up. Among them was Methuselah, through whom the line of recorded generations runs.

Why, then, is so small a number of successions recorded in the generations from Cain, if they had to be carried down to the flood, and there was no long period before puberty that would leave a hundred years or more without offspring? Perhaps the author of this book had no one in view to whom he had to bring the series of generations, as in the line from Seth's seed he aimed to reach Noah, from whom the necessary line would continue once more. In that case, what need was there to pass over firstborn sons in order to arrive at Lamech, in whose children that sequence ends, namely in the eighth generation from Adam and the seventh from Cain? It is as though something were to be linked on from there, by which one might arrive either at the people of Israel, in whom even the earthly Jerusalem provided a prophetic figure of the heavenly city, or at Christ according to the flesh, "who is God over all, blessed forever," the builder and ruler of the Jerusalem above. Yet the whole progeny of Cain was wiped out by the flood.[47]

47 Romans 9:5.

LATIN

Unde uideri potest in eodem ordine generationum primogenitos fuisse commemoratos. Quur ergo tam pauci sunt? Non enim usque ad diluuium tot esse potuerunt, non uacantibus usque ad centenariam pubertatem patribus ab officio generandi, si non erat tunc proportione longaeuitatis illius etiam sera pubertas. Ut enim peraeque triginta annorum fuerint, cum filios generare coeperunt, octiens triceni (quoniam octo sunt generationes cum Adam et cum eis quos genuit Lamech) ducenti et quadraginta sunt anni: num itaque toto deinde tempore usque ad diluuium non generauerunt? Qua tandem causa, qui haec scripsit, generationes commemorare noluit quae sequuntur? Nam ex Adam usque ad diluuium conputantur anni secundum codices nostros duo milia ducenti sexaginta duo; secundum Hebraeos autem mille sescenti quinquaginta sex.

ENGLISH

From this it might seem that it was the firstborn who were recorded in this line of generations. Why, then, are there so few? Only so many generations could not have filled the time down to the flood unless puberty was then late in proportion to that long life span, so that the fathers were kept from the duty of begetting until a puberty at a hundred years. For suppose they were all thirty years old when they began to father children. Eight times thirty, since there are eight generations counting Adam and those whom Lamech fathered, makes two hundred and forty years. Are we to think that they did not beget at all during the whole time after that, down to the flood? For what reason, then, did the one who wrote this choose not to record the generations that followed? For from Adam to the flood, according to our manuscripts, the years are reckoned as two thousand two hundred and sixty-two, but according to the Hebrew, one thousand six hundred and fifty-six.[48]

Ut ergo istum numerum minorem credamus esse ueriorem, de mille sescentis quinquaginta sex annis ducenti quadraginta detrahantur: numquid credibile est per mille quadringentos, et quod excurrit, annos, qui restant usque diluuium, progeniem Cain a generationibus uacare potuisse?

Suppose, then, that we take this smaller number to be the truer one, and subtract two hundred and forty years from the one thousand six hundred and fifty-six. Is it credible that during the fourteen hundred years and more that remain until the flood the progeny of Cain could have been without any generations?

Sed qui ex hoc mouetur, meminerit, cum quaererem, quo modo credendum sit antiquos illos homines per tam multos annos a gignendis filiis cessare potuisse, duobus modis istam solutam esse quaestionem: aut de sera pubertate, proportione tam longae uitae, aut de filiis qui commemorantur in generationibus, quod non fuerint primogeniti, sed hi, per quos ad eum, quem intendebat auctor libri, poterat perueniri, sicut ad Noe in generationibus Seth. Proinde in generationibus Cain, si non occurrit qui deberet intendi, ad quem praetermissis primogenitis per eos, qui commemorati sunt, perueniri oportebat, sera pubertas intellegenda restabit, ut aliquanto post centum annos puberes habilesque ad gignendum facti fuerint, ut ordo generationum per primogenitos curreret et usque diluuium ad numerum annorum tantae quantitatis occurreret.

But anyone troubled by this should remember an earlier question I raised: how we are to believe that those ancient men could have refrained from fathering children for so many years. That question was resolved in two ways. Either puberty came late, in proportion to so long a life, or the sons recorded in the generations were not the firstborn but those through whom it was possible to reach the person the author of the book had in view, as Noah is reached in the generations of Seth. Accordingly, in the generations of Cain, there may be no one who ought to be the goal, someone to be reached through those who are recorded by passing over the firstborn. If so, we are left to understand a late puberty. They would have become mature and capable of begetting some while after a hundred years, so that the line of generations ran through the firstborn and still matched so great a number of years down to the flood.

48 Augustine's Latin Bible followed the Greek Septuagint, whose chronology of the early generations differs from the Hebrew text.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quamuis fieri possit, ut propter aliquam secretiorem causam, quae me latet, usque ad Lamech et eius filios generationum perueniente contextu commendaretur haec ciuitas, quam dicimus esse terrenam, ac deinde cessaret scriptor libri commemorare ceteras, quae usque ad diluuium esse potuerunt. Potest et illa esse causa, quur non ordo generationum per primogenitos duceretur, ut necesse non sit in illis hominibus tam seram credere pubertatem, quod scilicet eadem ciuitas, quam Cain in nomine Enoch filii sui condidit, longe lateque regnare potuerit et reges habere non simul plures, sed suis aetatibus singulos, quos genuissent sibi successuros quicumque regnassent.

It is possible, however, that for some more hidden reason which escapes me, this city, which we call earthly, is presented by bringing the sequence of generations down to Lamech and his children, and that the writer of the book then ceased to record the others that may have existed down to the flood. There may also be another reason why the line of generations was not traced through the firstborn, one that makes it unnecessary to believe in so late a puberty among those men. The very city which Cain founded in the name of his son Enoch may have reigned far and wide and had kings. These would not have ruled several at once but one at a time, each in his own period, and each reigning king would have fathered his successor.

Horum regum primus esse potuit ipse Cain, secundus filius eius Enoch, in cuius nomine, ubi regnaretur, condita est ciuitas; tertius Gaidad, quem genuit Enoch; quartus Meuia, quem genuit Gaidad; quintus Mathusael, quem genuit Meuia; sextus Lamech, quem genuit Mathusael, qui est septimus ab Adam per Cain. Non autem erat consequens, ut primogeniti regum regnantibus succederent patribus, sed quos regnandi meritum propter uirtutem terrenae utilem ciuitati, uel sors aliqua reperiret, uel ille potissimum succederet patri hereditario quodam iure regnandi, quem prae ceteris filiis dilexisset. Potuit autem uiuente adhuc Lamech adque regnante fieri diluuium, ut ipsum cum aliis omnibus hominibus, exceptis qui in arca fuerunt, quem perderet inueniret.

The first of these kings could have been Cain himself. The second could have been his son Enoch, in whose name the city was founded as the seat of the kingdom. The third could have been Irad, whom Enoch fathered; the fourth Mehujael, whom Irad fathered; the fifth Methushael, whom Mehujael fathered; and the sixth Lamech, whom Methushael fathered, who is seventh from Adam through Cain. But it did not follow that the firstborn sons of kings succeeded their reigning fathers. Rather, the successor would be the one whom merit for ruling singled out, through some virtue useful to the earthly city, or whom some chance selected. Or the son who succeeded his father by a sort of hereditary right to rule would be the one whom the father had loved above his other sons. And the flood could have come while Lamech was still alive and reigning, so that it found him there to destroy along with all other human beings, except those who were in the ark.

Neque enim mirandum est, si uaria quantitate numerositatis annorum interposita per tam longam aetatem ab Adam usque diluuium non aequalis numeri generationes habuit utraque progenies, sed per Cain septem, per Seth autem decem; septimus est enim, ut iam dixi, ab Adam Lamech, decimus Noe; et ideo non unus filius Lamech, sicut in ceteris superius, sed plures commemorati sunt, quia incertum erat quis ei fuisset mortuo successurus, si regnandi tempus inter ipsum et diluuium remansisset.

Nor should it be surprising that, with differing numbers of years intervening over so long a span from Adam to the flood, the two lines did not have an equal number of generations, Cain's line seven and Seth's ten. For Lamech, as I have already said, is seventh from Adam, and Noah tenth. That is why not one son of Lamech is recorded, as with the others above, but several. It was uncertain who would succeed him at his death, if any time for reigning had remained between him and the flood.

ELEVEN, THE NUMBER OF SIN

Cain's line ends with eleven names, one beyond ten, the number of the law.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed quoquo modo se habeat siue per primogenitos siue per reges ex Cain generationum ordo decurrens, illud mihi nullo pacto praetereundum silentio uidetur, quod, cum Lamech septimus ab Adam fuisset inuentus, tot eius adnumerati sunt filii, donec undenarius numerus inpleretur, quo significatur peccatum. Adduntur enim tres filii et una filia. Uxores autem aliud possunt significare, non hoc quod nunc commendandum uidetur. Nunc enim de generationibus loquimur; illae uero unde sint genitae, tacitum est. Quoniam ergo lex denario numero praedicatur, unde est memorabilis ille decalogus, profecto numerus undenarius, quoniam transgreditur denarium, transgressionem legis ac per hoc peccatum significat. Hinc est quod in tabernaculo testimonii, quod erat in itinere populi Dei uelut templum ambulatorium, undecim uela cilicina fieri praecepta sunt.	But however it may be with the line of generations from Cain, whether it runs through firstborn sons or through kings, there is one point that I think must by no means be passed over in silence. When Lamech had been found to be seventh from Adam, enough of his children were added to complete the number eleven, which signifies sin. For three sons and one daughter are added. The wives may signify something else, not the point that now seems worth drawing out. For we are now speaking of descendants, and where the wives came from is not stated. Since the law, then, is proclaimed by the number ten, hence that memorable Decalogue, the number eleven surely signifies transgression of the law, and so sin, since it transgresses, or goes beyond, ten. That is why in the tabernacle of the testimony, which served as a kind of portable temple for God's people on their journey, eleven curtains of goats' hair were ordered to be made.[49]
In cilicio quippe recordatio est peccatorum propter haedos ad sinistram futuros; quod confitentes in cilicio prosternimur tamquam dicentes quod in psalmo scriptum est: Et peccatum meum ante me est semper. Progenies ergo ex Adam per Cain sceleratum undenario numero finitur, quo peccatum significatur; et ipse numerus femina clauditur, a quo sexu initium factum est peccati, per quod omnes morimur. Commissum est autem, ut et uoluptas carnis, quae spiritui resisteret, sequeretur. Nam et ipsa filia Lamech Noemma uoluptas interpretatur. Per Seth autem ab Adam usque ad Noe denarius insinuatur legitimus numerus.	For haircloth calls sins to mind, because of the goats who are to stand on the left hand. So when we confess, we prostrate ourselves in haircloth, as if saying what is written in the psalm: "And my sin is ever before me." The progeny from Adam through the wicked Cain, then, ends with the number eleven, which signifies sin. And the number itself is completed by a woman, the sex from which the beginning of sin came, the sin through which we all die. And sin was committed with the result that the pleasure of the flesh, which resists the spirit, followed as well. For Lamech's daughter Naamah herself means "pleasure." But through Seth, from Adam to Noah, the lawful number ten is indicated.[50]
Cui Noe tres adiciuntur filii, unde uno lapso duo benedicuntur a patre, ut remoto reprobo et probatis filiis ad numerum additis etiam duodenarius numerus intimetur, qui et in patriarcharum et in apostolorum numero insignis est, propter septenarii partes alteram per alteram multiplicatas. Nam ter quaterni uel quater terni ipsum faciunt. His ita se habentibus uideo	To Noah are added three sons. One of them fell, and two were blessed by their father, so that, with the reprobate removed and the approved sons added to the number, the number twelve is also suggested. This number is notable both in the number of the patriarchs and in that of the apostles, because it is formed by multiplying the parts of sev-

49 The Decalogue is the Ten Commandments; the eleven curtains are prescribed in Exodus 26:7.
50 The goats on the left: Matthew 25:33. Psalm 50:5 (51:3 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
considerandum et commemorandum, ista utraque progenies, quae distinctis generationibus duas insinuat ciuitates, unam terrigenarum, alteram regeneratorum, quo modo postea sic commixta fuerit adque confusa, ut uniuersum genus humanum exceptis octo hominibus diluuio perire mereretur.	en by each other: three fours or four threes make twelve. This being so, I see that I must consider and recount how these two progenies, which by their distinct generations suggest two cities, one of the earthborn and the other of the reborn, later became so mixed and confused that the whole human race, except eight people, deserved to perish in the flood.[51]

WHY, AFTER ENOCH SON OF CAIN IS MENTIONED, THE ACCOUNT OF HIS WHOLE LINE CONTINUES TO THE FLOOD, WHILE AFTER ENOSH SON OF SETH IS MENTIONED, IT GOES BACK TO THE BEGINNING OF THE HUMAN RACE

Scripture restarts the count from Adam with Seth's line, setting the two cities side by side.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.21 Primo autem intuendum est, quem ad modum, cum ex Cain generationes enumerarentur, commemorato ante ceteros posteros eius illo, in cuius nomine condita est ciuitas, id est Enoch, contexti sunt ceteri usque ad illum finem, de quo locutus sum, donec illud genus adque uniuersa propago diluuio deleretur; cum uero filius Seth unus commemoratus fuisset Enos, nondum usque ad diluuium additis ceteris articulus quidam interponitur et dicitur: Hic liber natiuitatis hominum, qua die fecit Deus Adam, ad imaginem Dei fecit illum. Masculum et feminam fecit illos, et benedixit illos, et cognominauit nomen eorum Adam, qua die fecit illos.	First we should notice how the genealogy from Cain is handled. Among his descendants, the one in whose name the city was founded, Enoch, is mentioned first, and then the rest are listed in sequence down to the end I spoke of, when that race and all its offspring were wiped out by the flood. But when Enosh, a single son of Seth, has been mentioned, the others down to the flood are not yet added. Instead, a kind of break is inserted, and it says: "This is the book of the generation of human beings. On the day God made Adam, he made him in the image of God. Male and female he made them, and he blessed them, and he gave them the name Adam, on the day he made them."[52]
Quod mihi uidetur ad hoc interpositum, ut hinc rursus inciperet ab ipso Adam dinumeratio temporum, quam noluit facere, qui haec scripsit, in ciuitate terrena; tamquam eum Deus sic commoneret, ut non conputaret. Sed quare hinc reditur ad istam recapitulationem, postea quam commemoratus est filius Seth, homo qui sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei, nisi quia sic oportebat istas duas proponere ciuitates, unam per homicidam usque ad homicidam (nam et Lamech duabus uxoribus suis se perpetrasse homicidium confitetur), alteram per eum, qui sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei? Hoc est quippe in hoc mundo peregrinantis ciuitatis Dei totum adque summum in hac mortalitate negotium, quod per unum hominem, quem sane occisi resurrectio genuit, commendandum fuit.	This seems to me to have been inserted so that the reckoning of time could begin again from Adam himself. The writer chose not to make such a reckoning for the earthly city, as if God were prompting him not to count it. But why return to this recapitulation after mentioning Seth's son, the man who "hoped to call on the name of the Lord God"? Surely because this was the right way to set out these two cities: one running from a murderer to a murderer (for Lamech, too, confesses to his two wives that he has committed murder), the other running through the man who "hoped to call on the name of the Lord God." For this is the whole and supreme business of the city of God, on pilgrimage in this world, during this mortal life. It had to be commended through one man—a man 51 The son who fell is Ham, whose offense led Noah to curse Ham's son Canaan and bless Shem and Japheth (Genesis 9:20–27).

52 Genesis 5:1–2.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	born, as it were, of the resurrection of the one who was murdered.[53]
Homo quippe ille unus totius supernae ciuitatis est unitas, nondum quidem conpleta, sed praemissa ista prophetica praefiguratione conplenda. Filius ergo Cain, hoc est filius possessionis, (cuius nisi terrenae?) habeat nomen in ciuitate terrena, quia in eius nomine condita est. De his est enim, de quibus cantatur in psalmo: inuocabunt nomina eorum in terris ipsorum; propter quod sequitur eos quod in alio psalmo scriptum est: Domine, in ciuitate tua imaginem eorum ad nihilum rediges.	For that one man represents the unity of the whole city above. That unity is not yet complete, but it is to be completed, as this prophetic prefiguration announced in advance. So let the son of Cain—that is, the son of possession (and what possession but an earthly one?)—have his name in the earthly city, since the city was founded in his name. For he is one of those of whom the psalm sings: "They will call their names after themselves in their lands." That is why what is written in another psalm follows them: "Lord, in your city you will bring their image to nothing."[54]
Filius autem Seth, hoc est filius resurrectionis, speret inuocare nomen Domini Dei; eam quippe societatem hominum praefigurat quae dicit: Ego autem sicut oliua fructifera in domo Dei speraui in misericordia Dei; uanas autem glorias famosi in terra nominis non requirat; beatus est enim uir, cuius est nomen Domini spes eius, et non respexit in uanitates et insanias mendaces.	But let the son of Seth—that is, the son of resurrection—hope to call on the name of the Lord God. For he prefigures that society of human beings which says: "But I, like a fruitful olive tree in the house of God, have hoped in the mercy of God." Let him not seek the empty glories of a name famous on earth. For "blessed is the man whose hope is the name of the Lord, and who has not looked to vanities and lying follies."[55]
Propositis itaque duabus ciuitatibus, una in re huius saeculi, altera in spe Dei, tamquam ex communi, quae aperta est in Adam, ianua mortalitatis egressis, ut procurrant et excurrant ad discretos proprios ac debitos fines, incipit dinumeratio temporum; in qua et aliae generationes adiciuntur, facta recapitulatione ex Adam, ex cuius origine damnata, ueluti massa una meritae damnationi tradita, facit Deus alia in contumeliam uasa irae, alia in honorem uasa misericordiae, illis reddens quod debetur in poena, istis donans quod non debetur in gratia; ut ex ipsa etiam conparatione uasorum irae superna ciuitas discat, quae peregrinatur in terris, non fidere libertate arbitrii sui, sed speret inuocare nomen Domini Dei.	Two cities, then, have been set before us: one grounded in the reality of this world, the other in hope in God. Both have come out, as it were, through the common door of mortality that was opened in Adam, so that they may run forward and on toward their separate ends—each its own, each its due. And so the reckoning of time begins. In it further generations are added, after a recapitulation starting from Adam. From his condemned origin, as from a single lump handed over to the condemnation it deserved, God makes some vessels of wrath for dishonor and others vessels of mercy for honor. To the first he renders what is owed, as punishment; to the second he gives what is not owed, as grace. In this way the city above, which is on pilgrimage on earth, is to learn from the very comparison with the vessels of wrath not to trust in the freedom of its own will, but to "hope to call on the name of the Lord God."[56]
Quoniam uoluntas in natura, quae facta est bona a Deo bono, sed mutabilis ab inmutabili, quia ex nihilo, et a	For the will exists in a nature that was made good by the good God, yet changeable by the unchange-

53 Genesis 4:26, in the Latin text Augustine used; Lamech's confession to his wives is in Genesis 4:23–24.
54 Psalm 48:12 (49:11 in most English Bibles); Psalm 72:20 (73:20 in most English Bibles).
55 Psalm 51:10 (52:8 in most English Bibles); Psalm 39:5 (40:4 in most English Bibles).
56 The vessels of wrath and mercy allude to Romans 9:21–23.

LATIN	ENGLISH
bono potest declinare, ut faciat malum, quod fit libero arbitrio, et a malo, ut faciat bonum, quod non fit sine diuino adiutorio.	able God, because it was made from nothing. So the will can turn away from good to do evil, and this happens by free choice; and it can turn away from evil to do good, but this does not happen without divine help.

THE FALL OF THE SONS OF GOD, CAPTIVATED BY LOVE OF FOREIGN WOMEN, FOR WHICH ALL EXCEPT EIGHT PEOPLE DESERVED TO PERISH IN THE FLOOD

The sons of God, Seth's descendants, loved the beautiful daughters of men, and the two cities mingled.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.22 Hoc itaque libero uoluntatis arbitrio genere humano progrediente adque crescente facta est permixtio et iniquitate participata quaedam utriusque confusio ciuitatis. Quod malum a sexu femineo causam rursus inuenit; non quidem illo modo quo ab initio (non enim cuiusquam etiam tunc fallacia seductae illae feminae persuaserunt peccatum uiris); sed ab initio quae prauis moribus fuerant in terrena ciuitate, id est in terrigenarum societate, amatae sunt a filiis Dei, ciuibus scilicet peregrinantis in hoc saeculo alterius ciuitatis, propter pulchritudinem corporis. Quod bonum Dei quidem donum est; sed propterea id largitur etiam malis, ne magnum bonum uideatur bonis.	So, as the human race advanced and grew through this free choice of the will, the two cities became mingled, and through shared wickedness a kind of confusion of the two came about. Once again this evil found its cause in the female sex—though not in the way it did at the beginning. For these women had not been led astray by anyone's deceit, as Eve was, nor did they persuade the men to sin. Rather, women who had been of depraved character from the beginning, in the earthly city—that is, in the society of the earth-born—were loved for their physical beauty by the sons of God, that is, by the citizens of the other city, the one on pilgrimage in this world. Beauty is indeed a good and a gift of God; but he bestows it even on the wicked precisely so that the good may not think it a great good.
Deserto itaque bono magno et bonorum proprio lapsus est factus ad bonum minimum, non bonis proprium, sed bonis malisque commune; ac sic filii Dei filiarum hominum amore sunt capti, adque ut eis coniugibus fruerentur, in mores societatis terrigenae defluxerunt, deserta pietate, quam in sancta societate seruabant. Sic enim corporis pulchritudo, a Deo quidem factum, sed temporale carnale infimum bonum, male amatur postposito Deo, aeterno interno sempiterno bono, quem ad modum iustitia deserta et aurum amatur ab auaris, nullo peccato auri, sed hominis. Ita se habet omnis creatura. Cum enim bona sit, et bene amari potest et male: bene scilicet ordine custodito, male ordine perturbato. Quod in laude quadam Cerei breuiter uersibus dixi: Haec tua sunt, bona sunt, quia tu bonus ista creasti.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	So a great good, one that belongs to the good alone, was abandoned, and there was a fall to a very small good, one that does not belong to the good alone but is common to good and wicked alike. In this way the sons of God were captivated by love for the daughters of men, and in order to enjoy them as wives they slid into the ways of the earth-born society, abandoning the devotion they had kept in the holy society. For bodily beauty is a good made by God, but a temporal, fleshly and lowly one; and it is loved wrongly when God, the eternal, inward and everlasting good, is put after it. In the same way gold is loved by the greedy at the cost of justice—through no sin of the gold, but of the man. This is how it is with every created thing. Since it is good, it can be loved either well or badly: well when order is kept, badly when order is overturned. I put this briefly in verse in a poem in praise of the candle: "These things are yours; they are good, because you, who are good, created them."[57]
/ Nil nostrum est in eis, nisi quod peccamus amantes / Ordine neglecto pro te, quod conditur abs te. Creator autem si ueraciter ametur, hoc est si ipse, non aliud pro illo quod non est ipse, ametur, male amari non potest. Nam et amor ipse ordinate amandus est, quo bene amatur quod amandum est, ut sit in nobis uirtus qua uiuitur bene. Unde mihi uidetur, quod definitio breuis et uera uirtutis ordo est amoris; propter quod in sancto cantico canticorum cantat sponsa Christi, ciuitas Dei: Ordinate in me caritatem. Huius igitur caritatis, hoc est dilectionis et amoris, ordine perturbato Deum filii Dei neglexerunt et filias hominum dilexerunt. Quibus duobus nominibus satis ciuitas utraque discernitur.	"Nothing in them is ours, except that we sin when, neglecting order, we love instead of you what is made by you." But if the Creator is truly loved—that is, if he himself is loved, and not something else in his place that is not he—he cannot be loved wrongly. For love itself must also be loved in an orderly way, the love by which we rightly love what ought to be loved, so that there may be in us the virtue by which we live rightly. This is why I think that a brief and true definition of virtue is "the order of love." That is why, in the holy Song of Songs, the bride of Christ, the city of God, sings: "Set love in order in me." So when the order of this love (caritas, that is, dilectio and amor) was thrown into disorder, the sons of God neglected God and loved the daughters of men. These two names are enough to distinguish the two cities.[58]
Neque enim et illi non erant filii hominum per naturam; sed aliud nomen coeperant habere per gratiam. Nam in eadem scriptura, ubi dicti sunt dilexisse filias hominum filii Dei, idem dicti sunt etiam angeli Dei. Unde illos multi putant non homines fuisse, sed angelos.	Not that the former were not also sons of men by nature; but by grace they had begun to bear another name. For in the same Scripture, where the sons of God are said to have loved the daughters of men, these same sons of God are also called angels of God. That is why many think they were not humans at all, but angels.

57 Augustine's verses in praise of the candle, probably the Easter candle blessed at the Easter Vigil, are known only from this quotation.

58 Song of Songs 2:4, in Augustine's Latin text.

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT ANGELS, WHO ARE SPIRITUAL BEINGS, FELL IN LOVE WITH BEAUTIFUL WOMEN, MARRIED THEM, AND FATHERED GIANTS

The sons of God were men, not angels, and giants were born both before and after these marriages.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.23 Quam quaestionem nos transeunter commemoratam in tertio huius operis libro reliquimus insolutam, utrum possint angeli, cum spiritus sint, corporaliter coire cum feminis. Scriptum est enim: Qui facit angelos suos spiritus, id est eos, qui natura spiritus sunt, facit esse angelos suos, iniungendo eis officium nuntiandi. Qui enim Graece dicitur ἄγγελος, quod nomen Latina declinatione angelus perhibetur, Latina lingua nuntius interpretatur. Sed utrum eorum corpora consequenter adiunxerit dicendo: Et ministros suos ignem ardentem, an quod caritate tamquam igne spiritali feruere debeant ministri eius, ambiguum est. Apparuisse tamen hominibus angelos in talibus corporibus, ut non solum uideri, uerum etiam tangi possent, eadem ueracissima scriptura testatur.	In the third book of this work we mentioned this question in passing and left it unresolved: whether angels, since they are spirits, can have bodily intercourse with women. For it is written: "He makes his angels spirits"—that is, those who are spirits by nature he makes to be his angels by assigning them the task of bearing messages. For the word that in Greek is ἄγγελος [messenger], which takes the Latin form angelus, is rendered in Latin as nuntius, "messenger." But whether he goes on to refer to their bodies when he says, "and his ministers a burning fire," or means that his ministers ought to blaze with love as with a spiritual fire, is unclear. Still, the same utterly truthful Scripture testifies that angels have appeared to human beings in bodies such that they could not only be seen but also touched.[59]
Et quoniam creberrima fama est multique se expertos uel ab eis, qui experti essent, de quorum fide dubitandum non esset, audisse confirmant, Siluanos et Panes, quos uulgo incubos uocant, inprobos saepe extitisse mulieribus et earum adpetisse ac peregisse concubitum; et quosdam daemones, quos Dusios Galli nuncupant, adsidue hanc inmunditiam et tentare et efficere, plures talesque adseuerant, ut hoc negare inpudentiae uideatur: non hinc aliquid audeo definire, utrum aliqui spiritus elemento aerio corporati (nam hoc elementum etiam cum agitatur flabello sensu corporis tactuque sentitur) possint hanc etiam pati libidinem, ut, quo modo possunt, sentientibus feminis misceantur.	There is also a very widespread report, and many affirm that they have experienced it themselves or have heard it from people who had, people whose trustworthiness there was no reason to doubt. They say that Silvani and Pans, commonly called incubi, have often behaved shamelessly toward women, seeking to sleep with them and succeeding; and that certain demons, which the Gauls call Dusii, constantly attempt this impurity and carry it out. So many people, and of such a kind, assert this that it would seem impudent to deny it. Even so, I do not venture to decide on this basis whether some spirits with bodies made of the element of air (for even this element, when stirred by a fan, is felt by the bodily sense of touch) can also be subject to this lust, so that they can unite, in whatever way they are able, with women who feel them.[60]
Dei tamen angelos sanctos nullo modo illo tempore sic labi potuisse crediderim; nec de his dixisse apostolum Petrum: Si enim Deus angelis peccantibus non pepercit, sed carceribus caliginis inferi retrudens tradidit in iudicio puniendos reseruari; sed potius de illis, qui primum apostatantes a Deo cum diabolo suo principe ceciderunt, qui primum hominem per inuidiam	Yet I could never believe that God's holy angels could have fallen in that way at that time. Nor do I believe that the apostle Peter was speaking of them when he said: "For if God did not spare the angels who sinned, but thrust them down into the prisons of the darkness of the underworld and 59 The earlier mention is in Book 3, chapter 5. The quotation is Psalm 103:4 (104:4 in most English Bibles).

60 Silvanus and Pan were Roman and Greek gods of woods and fields; incubi were spirits thought to lie with sleeping women. The Dusii were Gallic spirits of the same kind.

LATIN	ENGLISH
serpentina fraude deiecit. Angelos autem fuisse etiam Dei homines nuncupatos eadem scriptura sancta locupletissima testis est. Nam et de Iohanne scriptum est: Ecce mitto angelum meum ante faciem tuam, qui praeparabit uiam tuam, et Malachiel propheta propria quadam, id est proprie sibi inpertita gratia dictus est angelus.	handed them over to be kept for punishment at the judgment." He was speaking rather of those who first apostatized from God and fell together with the devil, their chief, the one who out of envy brought down the first man by the serpent's deceit. But that men of God, too, have been called angels, the same holy Scripture is an abundant witness. For it is written of John: "See, I am sending my angel before your face, who will prepare your way." And the prophet Malachi was called an angel by a grace of his own, that is, one granted specifically to him.[61]
Verum hoc mouet quosdam, quod ex illis, qui dicti sunt angeli Dei, et ex mulieribus, quas amauerunt, non quasi homines generis nostri, sed gigantes legimus esse natos. Quasi uero corpora hominum modum nostrum longe excedentia, quod etiam supra commemoraui, non etiam nostris temporibus nata sunt. Nonne ante paucos annos, cum Romanae urbis quod a Gothis factum est adpropinquaret excidium, Romae fuit femina cum suo patre et sua matre, quae corpore quodam modo giganteo longe ceteris praemineret? Ad quam uisendam mirabilis fiebat usquequaque concursus. Et hoc erat maxime admirationi, quod ambo parentes eius nec saltem tam longi homines erant, quam longissimos uidere consueuimus.	But some are troubled because we read that those called angels of God and the women they loved produced not human beings like those of our race, but giants. As if human bodies far exceeding our usual size, as I also mentioned above, had not been born even in our own times! A few years ago, when the destruction of the city of Rome at the hands of the Goths was approaching, was there not a woman living in Rome with her father and mother whose almost gigantic body towered far above everyone else? People came flocking from every side to see her, in astonishing numbers. And what amazed them most was that neither of her parents was even as tall as the tallest people we are used to seeing.[62]
Potuerunt igitur gigantes nasci, et prius quam filii Dei, qui et angeli Dei dicti sunt, filiabus hominum, hoc est secundum hominem uiuentium, miscerentur; filii scilicet Seth filiis Cain. Nam et canonica scriptura sic loquitur, in quo libro haec legimus, cuius uerba ista sunt: Et factum est, postquam coeperunt homines multi fieri super terram, et filiae natae sunt illis; uidentes autem angeli Dei filias hominum, quia bonae sunt, sumserunt sibi uxores ex omnibus quas elegerunt. Et dixit Dominus Deus: Non permanebit spiritus meus in hominibus his in aeternum, propter quod caro sunt. Erunt autem dies eorum centum uiginti anni.	So giants could have been born even before the sons of God, who were also called angels of God, mingled with the daughters of men—that is, of those who live according to man: the sons of Seth, that is, with the children of Cain. For this is what canonical Scripture says, in the book where we read these things. Its words are these: "And it came to pass, after human beings began to multiply on the earth and daughters were born to them, that the angels of God, seeing that the daughters of men were good, took for themselves wives from all whom they chose. And the Lord God said, 'My spirit shall not remain in these men forever, because they are flesh. Their days shall be a hundred and twenty years.'[63]
Gigantes autem erant super terram in diebus illis et post illud, cum intrarent filii Dei ad filias hominum, et	Now there were giants on the earth in those days, and after that, when the sons of God went in to the 61 2 Peter 2:4; Mark 1:2, quoting Malachi 3:1 (the Latin angelus also means "messenger"). Malachi's name means "my messenger" in Hebrew.

62 The Goths under Alaric sacked Rome in AD 410.
63 Genesis 6:1–3.

LATIN

generabant sibi; illi erant gigantes a saeculo homines nominati. Haec libri uerba diuini satis indicant iam illis diebus fuisse gigantes super terram, quando filii Dei acceperunt uxores filias hominum, cum eas amarent bonas, id est pulchras. Consuetudo quippe scripturae huius est, etiam speciosos corpore bonos uocare. Sed et postquam hoc factum est, nati sunt gigantes. Sic enim ait: Gigantes autem erant super terram in diebus illis et post illud, cum intrarent filii Dei ad filias hominum. Ergo et ante in illis diebus et post illud.

ENGLISH

daughters of men, and they fathered children for themselves; these were the giants, men renowned from ancient times." These words of the divine book show clearly enough that there were already giants on the earth in those days, when the sons of God took the daughters of men as wives because they loved them as good, that is, beautiful. For it is this Scripture's custom to call those who are beautiful in body "good" as well. But giants were also born after this happened. For it says: "Now there were giants on the earth in those days, and after that, when the sons of God went in to the daughters of men." So there were giants both before, in those days, and after that.[64]

Quod autem ait: Et, generabant sibi, satis ostendit, quod prius, antequam sic caderent filii Dei, Deo generabant, non sibi, id est non dominante libidine coeundi, sed seruiente officio propagandi; non familiam fastus sui, sed ciues ciuitatis Dei, quibus adnuntiarent tamquam angeli Dei, ut ponerent in Deo spem suam, similes illius, qui natus est de Seth, filius resurrectionis, et sperauit inuocare nomen Domini Dei; in qua spe essent cum suis posteris coheredes aeternorum bonorum et sub Deo patre fratres filiorum.

And the words "they fathered children for themselves" show clearly enough that before the sons of God fell in this way, they fathered children for God, not for themselves. That is, lust for intercourse was not in command; it served the duty of propagation. They produced not a household for their own pride but citizens of the city of God. Like angels of God, they would tell these citizens to place their hope in God, like the man born of Seth, the son of resurrection, who "hoped to call on the name of the Lord God." In that hope they and their descendants would be joint heirs of eternal goods and, under God the Father, brothers of their own sons.

Non autem illos ita fuisse angelos Dei, ut homines non essent, sicut quidam putant, sed homines procul dubio fuisse, scriptura ipsa sine ulla ambiguitate declarat. Cum enim praemissum esset, quod uidentes angeli Dei filias hominum, quia bonae sunt, sumserunt sibi uxores ex omnibus quas elegerunt, mox adiunctum est: Et dixit Dominus Deus: Non permanebit spiritus meus in hominibus his in aeternum, propter quod caro sunt. Spiritu Dei quippe fuerant facti angeli Dei et filii Dei, sed declinando ad inferiora dicuntur homines nomine naturae, non gratiae; dicuntur et caro, desertores spiritus et deserendo deserti. Et septuaginta quidem interpretes et angelos Dei dixerunt istos et filios Dei; quod quidem non omnes codices habent, nam quidam nisi filios Dei non habent.

But Scripture itself declares without any ambiguity that they were not angels of God in the sense that they were not human, as some think, but were beyond doubt human beings. For after first stating that "the angels of God, seeing that the daughters of men were good, took for themselves wives from all whom they chose," it immediately adds: "And the Lord God said, 'My spirit shall not remain in these men forever, because they are flesh.'" It was by the Spirit of God that they had been made angels of God and sons of God. But by sinking to lower things they are called "men," a name of nature, not of grace. They are also called "flesh," as deserters of the Spirit who, by deserting, were deserted. The seventy translators, indeed, called them both angels of God and sons of God. Not all manuscripts have this, though, for some have only "sons of God."

64 Genesis 6:4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Aquila autem, quem interpretem Iudaei ceteris anteponunt, non angelos Dei, nec filios Dei, sed filios deorum interpretatus est. Utrumque autem uerum est. Nam et filii Dei erant, sub quo patre suorum patrum etiam fratres erant; et filii deorum, quoniam dis geniti erant, cum quibus et ipsi di erant iuxta illud psalmi: Ego dixi: Di estis et filii Excelsi omnes. Merito enim creduntur septuaginta interpretes accepisse propheticum spiritum, ut, si quid eius auctoritate mutarent adque aliter quam erat quod interpretabantur dicerent, neque hoc diuinitus dictum esse dubitaretur. Quamuis hoc in Hebraeo esse perhibeatur ambiguum, ut et filii Dei et filii deorum posset interpretari.	Aquila, however, whom the Jews prefer to the other translators, rendered it neither "angels of God" nor "sons of God" but "sons of the gods." Both are true. For they were sons of God, under whom as Father they were also brothers of their own fathers. And they were sons of gods, since they had been born of gods, along with whom they themselves were gods, according to that saying of the psalm: "I said, 'You are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High.'" For the seventy translators are rightly believed to have received the prophetic Spirit, so that if by its authority they changed anything and said something different from the text they were translating, no one should doubt that this too was spoken by God. And indeed the Hebrew is said to be ambiguous here, so that it could be translated either "sons of God" or "sons of the gods."[65]

ENOCH AND THE APOCRYPHA

Books ascribed to Enoch lack canonical authority; the giants before the flood were human.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Omittamus igitur earum scripturarum fabulas, quae apocryphae nuncupantur, eo quod earum occulta origo non claruit patribus, a quibus usque ad nos auctoritas ueracium scripturarum certissima et notissima successione peruenit. In his autem apocryphis etsi inuenitur aliqua ueritas, tamen propter multa falsa nulla est canonica auctoritas. Scripsisse quidem nonnulla diuine illum Enoch, septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus, cum hoc in epistula canonica ludas apostolus dicat. Sed non frustra non sunt in eo canone scripturarum, qui seruabatur in templo Hebraei populi succedentium diligentia sacerdotum, nisi quia ob antiquitatem suspectae fidei iudicata sunt, nec utrum haec essent, quae ille scripsisset, poterat inueniri, non talibus proferentibus, qui ea per seriem successionis reperirentur rite seruasse.	Let us pass over, then, the fables found in the writings called apocryphal, so called because their origin was hidden and not clear to the fathers, from whom the authority of the true Scriptures has come down to us through a most certain and well-known succession. Although some truth is found in these apocryphal writings, their many falsehoods deprive them of any canonical authority. We cannot deny that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, wrote some things by divine inspiration, since the apostle Jude says so in a canonical letter. But there is good reason why these writings are not in the canon of Scripture that was preserved in the temple of the Hebrew people through the care of successive priests. Because of their great age they were judged to be of doubtful reliability, and it could not be established whether these were the writings Enoch had composed, since those who produced them were not people who could be shown to have preserved them properly through an unbroken line of succession.[66]
Unde illa, quae sub eius nomine proferuntur et continent istas de gigantibus fabulas, quod non habuerint homines	Hence the writings put forward under his name, which contain those fables about giants—that they 65 Aquila was a convert to Judaism who made a very literal Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible in the 2nd century AD. The quotation is Psalm 81:6 (82:6 in most English Bibles).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	patres, recte a prudentibus iudicantur non ipsius esse credenda; sicut multa sub nominibus et aliorum prophetarum et recentiora sub nominibus apostolorum ab haereticis proferuntur, quae omnia nomine apocryphorum ab auctoritate canonica diligenti examinatione remota sunt. Igitur secundum scripturas canonicas Hebraeas adque Christianas multos gigantes ante diluuium fuisse non dubium est, et hos fuisse ciues terrigenae societatis hominum; Dei autem filios, qui secundum carnem de Seth propagati sunt, in hanc societatem deserta iustitia declinasse. Nec mirandum est, quod etiam de ipsis gigantes nasci potuerunt. Neque enim omnes gigantes, sed magis multi utique tunc fuerunt, quam post diluuium temporibus ceteris.	did not have human fathers—are rightly judged by prudent people not to be genuinely his. In the same way, heretics put forward many writings under the names of other prophets and, more recently, under the names of apostles; after careful examination, all of these have been excluded from canonical authority under the name of apocrypha. So, according to the canonical Scriptures, both Hebrew and Christian, there is no doubt that there were many giants before the flood, and that they were citizens of the earth-born society of human beings; and that the sons of God, descended from Seth according to the flesh, abandoned righteousness and sank into this society. Nor is it surprising that giants could be born even from them. For not all were giants then; but there were certainly many more of them then than in other times after the flood.
	Quos propterea creare placuit Creatori, ut etiam hinc ostenderetur non solum pulchritudines, uerum etiam magnitudines et fortitudines corporum non magni pendendas esse sapienti, qui spiritalibus adque inmortalibus longe melioribus adque firmioribus et bonorum propriis, non bonorum malorumque communibus beatificatur bonis. Quam rem alius propheta commendans ait: Ibi fuerunt gigantes illi nominati, qui ab initio fuerunt staturosi, scientes proelium. Non hos elegit Dominus, nec uiam scientiae dedit illis; sed interierunt, quia non habuerunt sapientiam, perierunt propter inconsiderantiam.	It pleased the Creator to create them so that this too might show that not only beauty but also size and strength of body should not be valued highly by the wise. For the wise person is made happy by spiritual and immortal goods, which are far better and more lasting, and which belong to the good alone, not to good and wicked alike. Another prophet commends this point when he says: "There were the famous giants, who were of great stature from the beginning, skilled in war. The Lord did not choose these, nor did he give them the way of knowledge; but they perished because they had no wisdom; they were destroyed through their thoughtlessness."[67]

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND WHAT THE LORD SAID OF THOSE WHO WERE TO PERISH IN THE FLOOD: "THEIR DAYS SHALL BE A HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS"

The hundred and twenty years count the time left before the flood, not a limit on lifespans.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
15.24	Quod autem dixit Deus: Erunt dies eorum centum uiginti anni, non sic accipiendum est, quasi praenuntiatum sit post haec homines centum uiginti annos uiuendo non transgredi, cum et post diluuium etiam quingentos excessisse inueniamus; sed intellegendum est hoc Deum dixisse, cum circa finem quingentorum annorum esset Noe, id est quadringentos octoginta uitae annos ageret, quos more suo scriptura quingentos uocat, nomine totius maximam partem plerumque significans; sescentensimo	As for God's words, "Their days shall be a hundred and twenty years," they should not be taken as a prediction that from then on human beings would not live beyond a hundred and twenty years, since we find that even after the flood some lived more than five hundred. Rather, we should understand that God said this when Noah was nearing the end of his five hundred years—that is, when he was in 66 Jude 14–15 quotes the Book of Enoch, a Jewish apocalyptic work of the last centuries BC attributed to the patriarch Enoch.

67 Baruch 3:26–28.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quippe anno uitae Noe, secundo mense factum est diluuium; ac sic centum uiginti anni praedicti sunt futuri uitae hominum perituroru m, quibus transactis diluuio delerentur.	the four hundred and eightieth year of his life. Scripture, in its usual way, calls this five hundred, often designating the largest part by the name of the whole. For the flood came in the second month of the six hundredth year of Noah's life. So a hundred and twenty years were foretold as the remaining lifetime of the people who were to perish; when these had passed, they would be wiped out by the flood.
Nec frustra creditur sic factum esse diluuium, iam non inuentis in terra qui non erant digni tali morte defungi, qua in inpios uindicatum est; non quo quicquam bonis quandoque morituris tale genus mortis faciat aliquid, quod eis possit obesse post mortem; uerum tamen nullus eorum diluuio mortuus est, quos de semine Seth propagatos sancta scriptura commemorat. Sic autem diuinitus diluuii causa narratur: Videns, inquit, Dominus Deus, quia multiplicatae sunt malitiae hominum super terram, et omnis quisque cogitat in corde suo diligenter super maligna omnes dies, et cogitauit Deus, quia fecit hominem super terram, et recogitauit, et dixit Deus: Deleam hominem, quem feci, a facie terrae, ab homine usque ad pecus et a repentibus usque ad uolatilia caeli, quia iratus sum, quoniam feci eos.	Nor is it without reason that the flood is believed to have come at a time when no one was left on earth who did not deserve to die the kind of death by which vengeance was taken on the wicked. Not that this kind of death would do anything to the good, who must die at some point anyway, that could harm them after death. Nevertheless, none of those whom holy Scripture records as descended from the seed of Seth died in the flood. Here is how the cause of the flood is told by divine inspiration: "The Lord God," it says, "seeing that the wickedness of human beings had multiplied on the earth, and that each and every one was diligently pondering evil in his heart all his days, God thought about having made man on the earth, and thought it over again, and God said, 'I will wipe out man, whom I have made, from the face of the earth, from man to beast, and from creeping things to the birds of the sky, because I am angry that I made them.'"[68]

THE ANGER OF GOD, WHICH NO INFLAMMATION DISTURBS IN HIS UNCHANGEABLE CALM

God's anger and second thoughts are figures of speech for his unchanging judgment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.25 Ira Dei non perturbatio animi eius est, sed iudicium quo inrogatur poena peccato. Cogitatio uero eius et recogitatio mutandarum rerum est inmutabilis ratio. Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum cuiusquam facti sui paenitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia quam certa praescientia. Sed si non utatur scriptura talibus uerbis, non se quodam modo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus uult esse consultum, ut et perterreat superbientes et excitet neglegentes, et exerceat quaerentes et alat intellegentes; quod non faceret, si non se prius inclinaret et quodam modo descenderet ad iacentes. Quod autem etiam interitum omnium animalium terrenorum uolatiliumque	God's anger is not a disturbance of his mind. It is the judgment by which punishment is imposed on sin. His thinking and rethinking, likewise, is the unchangeable reason by which changeable things are changed. For God does not repent of anything he has done, as a human being does. His judgment on absolutely all things is as fixed as his foreknowledge is certain. But if Scripture did not use such words, it would not, so to speak, make itself more familiar to every kind of human being, whose good it wishes to serve. It wants to terrify the proud and rouse the careless, to exercise those who seek and nourish those who understand. It

68 Genesis 6:5–7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
denuntiat: magnitudinem futurae cladis effatur, non animantibus rationis expertibus, tamquam et ipsa peccauerint, minatur exitium.	would not do this if it did not first stoop down and, in a way, descend to those who lie low. As for its announcing the destruction of all the animals of the land and the birds as well, it is declaring how great the coming disaster will be. It is not threatening destruction to creatures that lack reason, as though they too had sinned.

THAT THE ARK NOAH WAS ORDERED TO BUILD SIGNIFIES CHRIST AND THE CHURCH IN EVERY RESPECT

The ark's proportions, door and decks signify Christ's body and the Church.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.26 Iam uero quod Noe homini iusto et, sicut de illo scriptura ueridica loquitur, in sua generatione perfecto (non utique sicut perficiendi sunt ciues ciuitatis Dei in illa inmortalitate, qua aequabuntur angelis Dei, sed sicut esse possunt in hac peregrinatione perfecti) imperat Deus, ut arcam faciat, in qua cum suis, id est uxore, filiis et nuribus, et cum animalibus, quae ad illum ex Dei praecepto in arcam ingressa sunt, liberaretur a diluuii uastitate: procul dubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc saeculo ciuitatis Dei, hoc est ecclesiae, quae fit salua per lignum, in quo pependit mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus. Nam et mensurae ipsae longitudinis et altitudinis et latitudinis eius significant corpus humanum, in cuius ueritate ad homines praenuntiatus est uenturus et uenit.	Now God commands Noah to build an ark. Noah was a righteous man and, as truthful Scripture says of him, "perfect in his generation." This does not mean perfect in the way the citizens of the city of God are to be made perfect in that immortality in which they will be equal to the angels of God. It means perfect in the way they can be on this pilgrimage. In the ark he was to be saved from the devastation of the flood together with his family, that is, his wife, his sons and his daughters-in-law, and with the animals that came to him into the ark at God's command. Without any doubt this is a figure of the city of God on pilgrimage in this world, that is, of the Church. The Church is saved by the wood on which hung "the mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." For even the measurements of the ark's length, height and breadth signify the human body. It was in the reality of a human body that he was foretold to humanity as one who would come, and in it he came.[69]
Humani quippe corporis longitudo a uertice usque ad uestigia sexiens tantum habet quam latitudo, quae est ab uno latere ad alterum latus, et deciens tantum quam altitudo, cuius altitudinis mensura est in latere a dorso ad uentrem; uelut si iacentem hominem metiaris supinum seu pronum, sexiens tantum longus est a capite ad pedes, quam latus a dextra in sinistram uel a sinistra in dextram, et deciens, quam altus a terra. Unde facta est arca trecentorum in longitudine cubitorum et quinquaginta in latitudine et triginta in altitudine. Et quod ostium in latere accepit, profecto illud est uulnus, quando latus crucifixi lancea perforatum est; hac quippe ad illum uenientes ingrediuntur, quia inde sacramenta manarunt, quibus credentes initiantur.	For the length of a human body, from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet, is six times its breadth from one side to the other. It is ten times its height, and that height is measured on the side, from back to belly. Suppose you measure a man lying on his back or face down. He is six times as long from head to feet as he is wide from right to left or from left to right, and ten times as long as he is high off the ground. That is why the ark was made three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth and thirty in height. And it was given a door in its side. Surely that is the wound made when the side of the crucified one was pierced by the lance. Through this door those who come to 69 Genesis 6:9; 1 Timothy 2:5.

LATIN

ENGLISH

him enter, because from there flowed the sacraments by which believers are initiated.[70]

Et quod de lignis quadratis fieri iubetur, undique stabilem uitam sanctorum significat: quacumque enim uerteris quadratum, stabit; et cetera, quae in eiusdem arcae constructione dicuntur, ecclesiasticarum signa sunt rerum.

It is ordered to be made of squared timbers, and this signifies the life of the saints, stable on every side. For whichever way you turn a square, it will stand. The other details given about the building of this ark are likewise signs of things in the Church.

Sed ea nunc persequi longum est; et hoc iam fecimus in opere, quod aduersus Faustum Manichaeum scripsimus, negantem in Hebraeorum libris aliquid de Christo esse prophetatum. Et fieri quidem potest, ut et nobis quispiam et alius alio exponat haec aptius, dum tamen ea, quae dicuntur, ad hanc de qua loquimur Dei ciuitatem in hoc saeculo maligno tamquam in diluuio peregrinantem omnia referantur, si ab eius sensu, qui ista conscripsit, non uult longe aberrare, qui exponit.

But it would take too long to go through them now. I have already done this in the work I wrote against Faustus the Manichaean, who denied that anything was prophesied about Christ in the books of the Hebrews. It may well be that someone could explain these things more aptly than I have, and one person more aptly than another. The condition is that everything said must be referred to this city of God of which we are speaking, which is on pilgrimage in this evil world as if in a flood. The interpreter must hold to this if he does not want to stray far from the meaning of the one who wrote these things.

Exempli gratia, uelut si quispiam, quod hic scriptum est: Inferiora bicamerata et tricamerata facies eam, non quod ego in illo opere dixi uelit intellegi, quia ex omnibus gentibus ecclesia congregatur, bicameratam dictam propter duo genera hominum, circumcisionem scilicet et praeputium, quos apostolus et alio modo dicit Iudaeos et Graecos; tricameratam uero eo, quod omnes gentes de tribus filiis Noe post diluuium reparatae sunt; sed aliud dicat aliquid, quod a fidei regula non sit alienum.

Take an example. Here it is written, "You shall make it with lower parts, two-storied and three-storied." Suppose someone does not want this understood as I explained it in that work. There I said that the Church is gathered from all nations, and so it is called two-storied because of the two kinds of people, namely the circumcision and the uncircumcision, whom the apostle elsewhere calls Jews and Greeks. It is called three-storied because all nations were restored after the flood from the three sons of Noah. That reader may say something else instead, so long as it is not foreign to the rule of faith.[71]

Nam quoniam non solas in inferioribus mansiones habere arcam uoluit, uerum etiam in superioribus (et haec dixit bicamerata) et in superioribus superiorum (et haec appellauit tricamerata), ut ab imo sursum uersus tertia consurgeret habitatio: possunt hic intellegi et tria illa, quae commendat apostolus, fides, spes, caritas; possunt etiam multo conuenientius tres illae ubertates euangelicae, tricena, sexagena, centena, ut in infimo habitet pudicitia coniugalis, supra uidualis adque hac superior uirginalis, et si quid melius secundum fidem ciuitatis huius intellegi et dici potest. Hoc etiam de ceteris, quae hic exponenda sunt, dixerim, quia, etsi non

God wanted the ark to have rooms not only on the lower level but also on the level above, and these he called two-storied. He also wanted rooms on the level above that, and these he called three-storied, so that a third dwelling rose from the bottom upward. Here we can understand those three things the apostle commends: faith, hope and love. Or, much more fittingly, we can understand the three yields of the gospel, thirtyfold, sixtyfold and a hundredfold. Then married chastity dwells on the lowest level, the chastity of widows above

70 Allusion to John 19:34.
71 Genesis 6:16.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uno disseruntur modo, ad unam tamen catholicae fidei concordiam reuocanda sunt.	it, and virginity higher still. Or there may be something better that can be understood and said in keeping with the faith of this city. I would say the same about the other things that need explaining here. Even if they are discussed in more than one way, they must still be brought back to the one harmony of the Catholic faith.[72]

THE ARK AND THE FLOOD: WE SHOULD AGREE NEITHER WITH THOSE WHO ACCEPT ONLY THE HISTORY WITHOUT ALLEGORICAL MEANING, NOR WITH THOSE WHO DEFEND ONLY THE FIGURES AND REJECT THE HISTORICAL TRUTH

The flood is both real history and a figure of the Church; objections about the ark are answered.

LATIN	ENGLISH
15.27 Non tamen quisquam putare debet aut frustra haec esse conscripta, aut tantummodo rerum gestarum ueritatem sine ullis allegoricis significationibus hic esse quaerendam, aut e contrario haec omnino gesta non esse, sed solas esse uerborum figuras, aut quidquid illud est nequaquam ad prophetiam ecclesiae pertinere. Quis enim nisi mente peruersus inaniter scriptos esse contendat libros per annorum milia tanta religione et tam ordinatae successionis obseruantia custoditos, aut solas res gestas illic intuendas, ubi certe, ut alia omittam, si numerositas animalium cogebat arcae tantam fieri magnitudinem, inmunda bina et munda septena intromitti animalia quid cogebat, cum aequalis numeri possent utraque seruari? Aut uero Deus, qui propter genus reparandum seruanda praecepit, eo modo illa, quo instituerat, restituere non ualebat?	Still, no one should think that these things were written to no purpose. Nor should anyone think that we must seek here only the historical truth of events, without any allegorical meanings. Nor, on the contrary, that these events never happened at all and are merely figures of speech. Nor that, whatever they are, they have nothing to do with prophecy about the Church. For who but a person of perverse mind would contend that these books were written to no purpose, when they have been guarded for thousands of years with such reverence and such careful observance of an orderly succession? Who would claim that only the events are to be considered in them? To leave other points aside, consider this. If the number of animals required the ark to be made so large, what required unclean animals to be brought in by twos and clean ones by sevens, when both could have been preserved in equal numbers? Or was God, who commanded them to be preserved so that their kinds might be restored, unable to restore them in the same way he had first established them?
Qui uero non esse gesta, sed solas rerum significandarum figuras esse contendunt, primum opinantur tam magnum fieri non potuisse diluuium, ut altissimos montes quindecim cubitis aqua crescendo transcenderet, propter Olympi uerticem montis, supra quem perhibentur nubes non posse concrescere, quod tam sublime iam caelum sit, ut non ibi sit aer iste crassior, ubi uenti nebulae imbresque gignuntur; nec adtendunt omnium elementorum crassissimam terram ibi esse potuisse. An forte negant esse terram uerticem montis? Quur igitur	Then there are those who contend that these things did not happen and are merely figures signifying other things. First, they suppose that no flood could have been so great that the water rose fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. They point to the summit of Mount Olympus, above which clouds supposedly cannot form. The sky there is said to be already so high that there is none of the thicker air in which winds, mists and rains are produced. They fail to notice that earth, 72 Allusions to 1 Corinthians 13:13 and to the parable of the sower (Matthew 13:8).

LATIN	ENGLISH
usque ad illa caeli spatia terris exaltari licuisse, et aquis exaltari non licuisse contendunt, cum isti mensores et pensores elementorum aquas terris perhibeant superiores adque leuiores?	the densest of all the elements, could be up there. Or do they perhaps deny that a mountain's summit is earth? Why, then, do they contend that earth was allowed to rise up to those regions of the sky, while water was not? After all, these measurers and weighers of the elements declare that water lies above earth and is lighter.
Quid itaque rationis adferunt, quare terra grauior et inferior locum caeli tranquillioris inuaserit per uolumina tot annorum, et aqua leuior ac superior permissa non sit hoc facere saltem ad tempus exiguum?	So what reason do they give? Earth, which is heavier and lower, has occupied the region of the calmer sky through the course of so many years. Why, then, was water, which is lighter and higher, not permitted to do the same even for a short time?
Dicunt etiam non potuisse capere arcae illius quantitatem animalium genera tam multa in utroque sexu, bina de inmundis, septena de mundis. Qui mihi uidentur non conputare nisi trecenta cubita longitudinis et latitudinis quinquaginta, nec cogitare aliud tantum esse in superioribus itemque aliud tantum in superioribus superiorum, ac per hoc ter ducta illa cubita fieri nongenta super centum quinquaginta. Si autem cogitemus quod Origenes non ineleganter adstruxit, Moysen scilicet hominem Dei eruditum, sicut scriptum est, omni sapientia Aegyptiorum, qui geometricam dilexerunt, geometrica cubita significare potuisse, ubi unum quantum sex nostra ualere adseuerant, quis non uideat quantum rerum capere illa potuit magnitudo?	They also say that the ark could not have held so many kinds of animals of both sexes, two of each unclean kind and seven of each clean kind. These people seem to me to count only the three hundred cubits of length and the fifty of breadth. They do not consider that there was as much again on the upper level, and as much again on the level above that. Multiplied by three, then, those cubits become nine hundred by one hundred and fifty. Origen also argued, with some elegance, that Moses could have meant geometrical cubits. Moses, the man of God, was, as it is written, "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," and the Egyptians loved geometry. One geometrical cubit, they assert, is worth six of ours. If we take this into account, who can fail to see how much a vessel of that size could hold?[73]
Nam illud quod disputant tantae magnitudinis arcam non potuisse conpingi, ineptissime calumniantur, cum sciant inmensas urbes fuisse constructas, nec adtendunt centum annos, quibus arca illa est fabricata; nisi forte lapis lapidi adhaerere potest sola calce coniunctus, ut murus per tot milia circumagatur, et lignum ligno per suscudines, epiros, clauos, gluten bituminis non potest adhaerere, ut fabricetur arca non curuis, sed rectis lineis longe lateque porrecta, quam nullus in mare mittat conatus hominum, sed leuet unda, cum uenerit, naturali ordine ponderum, magisque diuina prouidentia quam humana prudentia natantem gubernet, ne incurrat ubicumque naufragium.	They also argue that an ark of such size could not have been built. This is a most foolish quibble, since they know that immense cities have been constructed. They also forget the hundred years it took to build that ark. Can stone stick to stone, joined only by lime, so that a wall runs around for so many miles? And yet wood cannot be made to stick to wood by dovetails, pegs, nails and bitumen glue, so that an ark could be built stretching far and wide in straight lines rather than curved ones? No human effort had to launch it into the sea. The water lifted it when it came, by the natural order of weights. And divine providence rather than human prudence steered it as it floated, so that it would not run aground and be wrecked anywhere.

73 Origen (c. AD 185–254), the great biblical scholar of Alexandria. The quotation is Acts 7:22.

LATIN

Quod autem scrupulosissime quaeri solet de minutissimis bestiolis, non solum quales sunt mures et stelliones, uerum etiam quales lucustae, scarabei, muscae denique et pulices, utrum non amplioris numeri in arca illa fuerint, quam qui est definitus, cum hoc imperaret Deus, prius admonendi sunt, quos haec mouent, sic accipiendum esse quod dictum est: Quae repunt super terram, ut necesse non fuerit conseruari in arca, quae possunt in aquis uiuere, non solum mersa, sicut pisces, uerum etiam supernatantia, sicut multae alites.

Deinde cum dicitur: Masculus et femina erunt, profecto intellegitur ad reparandum genus dici; ac per hoc nec illa necesse fuerat ibi esse, quae possunt sine concubitu de quibusque rebus uel rerum corruptionibus nasci; uel si fuerunt, sicut in domibus esse consuerunt, sine ullo numero definito esse potuisse; aut si mysterium sacratissimum, quod agebatur, et tantae rei figura etiam ueritate facti aliter non posset inpleri, nisi ut omnia ibi certo illo numero essent, quae uiuere in aquis natura prohibente non possent, non fuit ista cura illius hominis uel illorum hominum, sed diuina. Non enim ea Noe capta intromittebat, sed uenientia et intrantia permittebat.

Ad hoc enim ualet quod dictum est: Intrabunt ad te; non scilicet hominis actu, sed Dei nutu; ita sane, ut non illic fuisse credenda sint, quae sexu carent. Praescriptum enim adque definitum est: Masculus et femina erunt. Alia sunt quippe quae de quibusque rebus sine concubitu ita nascuntur, ut postea concumbant et generent, sicut muscae; alia uero in quibus nihil sit maris et feminae, sicut apes. Ea porro quae sic habent sexum, ut non habeant fetum, sicut muli et mulae, mirum si fuerunt ibi, ac non potius parentes eorum ibi fuisse suffecerit, equinum uidelicet adque asininum genus; et si qua alia sunt, quae commixtione diuersi generis genus aliquod gignunt. Sed si et hoc ad mysterium pertinebat, ibi erant.

ENGLISH

A further question is often raised, with excessive scruple, about the tiniest creatures. These include not only mice and geckos but also locusts, beetles, and even flies and fleas. Were there not more of them in the ark than the number God fixed when he gave his command? Those who are troubled by this must first be reminded how to understand the words "that creep upon the earth." They mean that there was no need to preserve in the ark creatures that can live in water. This includes not only those that live under the water, like fish, but also those that float on its surface, like many birds.[74]

Next, when it is said, "They shall be male and female," this is surely understood to refer to restoring the species. So there was no need for creatures to be there that can be born without mating, from various things or from the decay of things. Or, if they were there, they could have been there without any fixed number, as they commonly are in houses. Or suppose the most sacred mystery being enacted, the figure of so great a reality, could not be fulfilled in the truth of the event as well, unless every creature that by nature cannot live in water was there in that exact number. Even then, this was not the concern of that man or those men, but of God. For Noah did not catch the animals and bring them in. He let them in as they came and entered.[75]

That is the point of the words, "They shall come in to you." They came, that is, not by human action but at God's bidding. Of course, it follows that we should not believe that creatures without sex were there, for it was prescribed and laid down: "They shall be male and female." Some creatures are born without mating from various things in such a way that they later mate and reproduce, like flies. Others have nothing of male and female, like bees. Then there are those that have sex but produce no offspring, like male and female mules. It would be surprising if they were there. It would more likely have been enough for their parents to be there, namely the horse and the donkey kinds. The same applies to any other creatures that produce a kind by crossing different kinds. But if this too belonged to the mystery, then they were there.[76]

74 Genesis 6:20.
75 Genesis 6:19.
76 Genesis 6:20.

LATIN

Habet enim et hoc genus masculum et feminam.

Solet etiam mouere nonnullos, genera escarum, quae illic habere poterant animalia, quae non nisi carne uesci putantur, utrum praeter numerum ibi fuerint sine transgressione mandati, quae aliorum alendorum necessitas illic coegisset includi; an uero, quod potius est credendum, praeter carnes aliqua alimenta esse potuerint, quae omnibus conuenirent. Nouimus enim quam multa animalia, quibus caro cibus est, frugibus pomisque uescantur et maxime fico adque castaneis. Quid ergo mirum, si uir ille sapiens et iustus, etiam diuinitus admonitus quid cuique congrueret, sine carnibus aptam cuique generi alimoniam praeparauit et condidit? Quid est autem, quo uesci non cogeret fames? aut quid non suaue ac salubre facere posset Deus, qui etiam, ut sine cibo uiuerent, diuina facilitate donaret, nisi ut pascerentur etiam hoc inplendae figurae tanti mysterii conueniret?

Non autem ad praefigurandam ecclesiam pertinere tam multiplicia rerum signa gestarum, nisi fuerit, contentiosus, nemo permittitur opinari. Iam enim gentes ita ecclesiam repleuerunt, mundique et inmundi, donec certum ueniatur ad finem, ita eius unitatis quadam conpagine continentur, ut ex hoc uno manifestissimo etiam de ceteris, quae obscurius aliquanto dicta sunt et difficilius agnosci queunt, dubitare fas non sit. Quae cum ita sint, sic nec inaniter ista esse conscripta putare quisquam uel durus audebit, nec nihil significare cum gesta sint, nec sola dicta esse significatiua non facta, nec aliena esse ab ecclesia significanda probabiliter dici potest; sed magis credendum est et sapienter esse memoriae litterisque mandata, et gesta esse, et significare aliquid, et ipsum aliquid ad praefigurandam ecclesiam pertinere.

Iam usque ad hunc articulum perductus liber iste claudendus est, ut ambarum ciuitatum cursus, terrenae scilicet secundum hominem uiuentis et caelestis secundum Deum, post diluuium et deinceps in rebus consequentibus requiratur.

ENGLISH

For this kind too has male and female.

Some people are also troubled about the kinds of food available in the ark to animals that are thought to eat nothing but meat. Were there animals beyond the prescribed number, without any breach of the command, which the need to feed the others had made it necessary to shut in there? Or, as is more to be believed, could there have been other foods besides meat that suited them all? For we know how many animals whose food is meat also eat grain and fruit, especially figs and chestnuts. So what wonder is it if that wise and righteous man, also instructed by God about what suited each one, prepared and stored suitable food for each kind without meat? And what would hunger not drive them to eat? What could God not make pleasant and wholesome? With divine ease he could have granted them to live without food at all, had it not been fitting that they be fed, as part of fulfilling the figure of so great a mystery.

No one, unless he is merely quarrelsome, may suppose that such manifold signs in these events have nothing to do with prefiguring the Church. For the nations have already filled the Church, and clean and unclean are held together in the framework of its unity until the appointed end comes. This one point is so plain that it is not right to doubt the rest, even those things that are expressed rather more obscurely and are harder to recognize. This being so, no one, however obstinate, will dare to think that these things were written to no purpose. Nor can anyone plausibly say that they signify nothing even though they happened. Nor that they are only words with a meaning and not events. Nor that what they signify has nothing to do with the Church. Rather, we should believe four things. They were wisely committed to memory and to writing. They happened. They signify something. And that something has to do with prefiguring the Church.

Now that this book has been brought this far, it must be closed. Then we can trace the course of both cities after the flood and through the events that follow: the earthly city, which lives according to man, and the heavenly city, which lives according to God.

Book XVI

Noah to David
The city of God traced from Noah through Abraham and the patriarchs to the kings.

WHETHER ANY FAMILIES LIVING ACCORDING TO GOD ARE FOUND AFTER THE FLOOD, FROM NOAH TO ABRAHAM

Scripture names no godly person between Noah and Abraham, except in Noah's blessing of Shem and Japheth.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.1	Post diluuium procurrentis sanctae uestigia ciuitatis utrum continuata sint an intercurrentibus inpietatis interrupta temporibus, ita ut nullus hominum ueri unius Dei cultor existeret, ad liquidum scripturis loquentibus inuenire difficile est, propterea quia in canonicis libris post Noe, qui cum coniuge ac tribus filiis totidemque nuribus suis meruit per arcam uastatione diluuii liberari, non inuenimus usque Abraham cuiusquam pietatem euidenti diuino eloquio praedicatam, nisi quod Noe duos filios suos Sem et Iapheth prophetica benedictione commendat, intuens et praeuidens quod longe fuerat post futurum. Unde factum est etiam illud, ut filium suum medium, hoc est primogenito iuniorem ultimoque maiorem, qui peccauerat in patrem, non in ipso, sed in filio eius suo nepote malediceret his uerbis: Maledictus Chanaan puer, famulus erit fratribus suis.	After the flood the holy city went on its course. Did its footprints continue unbroken, or were they interrupted by periods of ungodliness, so that not a single human being worshiped the one true God? This is hard to determine clearly from what the Scriptures say. The reason is that in the canonical books, after Noah, we find no one, until Abraham, whose piety is proclaimed by an explicit word of God. Noah, with his wife, his three sons and as many daughters-in-law, earned deliverance through the ark from the devastation of the flood. The one exception is that Noah commends two of his sons, Shem and Japheth, with a prophetic blessing, looking ahead and foreseeing what was to happen long afterward. Hence it also came about that he cursed his middle son, younger than the firstborn and older than the last, who had sinned against his father. He cursed him not in his own person but in his son, Noah's grandson, with these words: "Cursed be Canaan the servant; he shall be a slave to his brothers."[1]
	Chanaan porro natus fuerat ex Cham, qui patris dormientis nec texerat, sed potius prodiderat nuditatem. Unde etiam quod secutus adiunxit benedictionem duorum maximi et minimi filiorum dicens: Benedictus Dominus Deus Sem, et erit Chanaan puer illius; latificet Deus Iapheth, et habitet in domibus Sem, sicut ipsa eiusdem Noe et uineae plantatio et ex eius fructu inebriatio et dormientis enudatio, et quae ibi cetera facta adque conscripta sunt, propheticis sunt grauidata sensibus et uelata tegminibus.	Canaan, moreover, had been born of Ham, who had not covered his sleeping father's nakedness but had instead exposed it. Next Noah added the blessing of his two other sons, the eldest and the youngest: "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant; may God enlarge Japheth, and may he dwell in the houses of Shem." This blessing is pregnant with prophetic meanings and wrapped in veils, as is Noah's planting of the vineyard, his drunkenness from its fruit, his being uncovered as he slept, and everything else that was done and written down there.[2]

1 Genesis 9:25.
2 Genesis 9:26–27.

WHAT WAS PROPHETICALLY FORESHADOWED IN THE SONS OF NOAH

Shem, Japheth and Ham prefigure Christ, the Church of the nations, and the heretics.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.2	Sed nunc rerum effectu iam in posteris consecuto, quae operta fuerant, satis aperta sunt. Quis enim haec diligenter et intellegenter aduertens non agnoscat in Christo? Sem quippe, de cuius semine in carne natus est Christus, interpretatur nominatus. Quid autem nominatius Christo, cuius nomen ubique iam fragrat, ita ut in cantico canticorum etiam ipsa praecedente prophetia unguento conparetur effuso; in cuius domibus, id est ecclesiis, habitat gentium latitudo? Nam Iapheth latitudo interpretatur. Cham porro, quod interpretatur calidus, medius Noe filius, tamquam se ab utroque discernens et inter utrumque remanens, nec in primitiis Israelitarum nec in plenitudine gentium, quid significat nisi haereticorum genus calidum, non spiritu sapientiae, sed inpatientiae, quo solent haereticorum feruere praecordia et pacem perturbare sanctorum?	But now that the outcome has come about in his descendants, what had been covered is plain enough. For who, attending to these things carefully and intelligently, would not recognize them in Christ? Shem, from whose seed Christ was born in the flesh, means "named." And what is more "named" than Christ, whose name now spreads its fragrance everywhere? So much so that in the Song of Songs, by a prophecy that went before, it is even compared to ointment poured out. And in his houses, that is, in the churches, the breadth of the nations dwells, for Japheth means "breadth." Ham, moreover, means "hot." He is Noah's middle son, as if separating himself from both and remaining between the two, belonging neither to the first fruits of the Israelites nor to the fullness of the nations. What does he signify but the hot breed of heretics? They are hot not with the spirit of wisdom but with the spirit of impatience, which commonly makes the hearts of heretics seethe and disturb the peace of the saints.[3]
	Sed haec in usum cedunt proficientium, iuxta illud apostoli: Oportet et haereses esse, ut probati manifesti fiant in uobis. Unde etiam scriptum est: Filius eruditus sapiens erit, inprudente autem ministro utetur. Multa quippe ad fidem catholicam pertinentia, dum haereticorum calida inquietudine exagitantur, ut aduersus eos defendi possint, et considerantur diligentius et intelleguntur clarius et instantius praedicantur, et ab aduersario mota quaestio discendi existit occasio. Quamuis non solum qui sunt apertissime separati, uerum omnes, qui Christiano uocabulo gloriantur et perdite uiuunt, non absurde possunt uideri medio Noe filio figurati; passionem quippe Christi, quae illius hominis nuditate significata est, et adnuntiant profitendo, et male agendo exhonorant. De talibus ergo dictum est: Ex fructibus eorum cognoscetis eos.	Yet these things turn to the benefit of those who are making progress, as the apostle says: "There must also be heresies, so that those who are approved may be made manifest among you." Hence it is also written: "The well-taught son will be wise, and he will make use of the foolish servant." For many points of the catholic faith are stirred up by the hot restlessness of heretics. Then, so that they can be defended against them, they are examined more carefully, understood more clearly and preached more insistently, and a question raised by an adversary becomes an occasion for learning. Yet Noah's middle son can reasonably be seen as a figure not only of those who have most openly separated themselves. He also figures all who glory in the name of Christian and live dissolute lives. For they proclaim Christ's passion, which was signified by that man's nakedness, by professing it, and they dishonor it by doing evil. Of such people, then, it was said: "By their fruits you will know them."[4]

3 Song of Songs 1:3: "your name is ointment poured out."
4 1 Corinthians 11:19; Proverbs 10:4 in the Greek version; Matthew 7:16.

LATIN

Ideo Cham in filio suo maledictus est, tamquam in fructu suo, id est in opere suo. Unde conuenienter et ipse filius eius Chanaan interpretatur motus eorum; quod aliud quid est quam opus eorum? Sem uero et Iapheth tamquam circumcisio et praeputium, uel sicut alio modo eos appellat apostolus, ludaei et Graeci, sed uocati et iustificati, cognita quoquo modo nuditate patris, qua significabatur passio Saluatoris, sumentes uestimentum posuerunt supra dorsa sua et intrauerunt auersi et operuerunt nuditatem patris sui, nec uiderunt quod reuerendo texerunt. Quodam enim modo in passione Christi et quod pro nobis factum est honoramus et Iudaeorum facinus auersamur.

ENGLISH

That is why Ham was cursed in his son, as in his fruit, that is, in his work. So, fittingly, his son Canaan's name means "their movement," and what is that but their work? Shem and Japheth, on the other hand, are like the circumcision and the uncircumcision, or, as the apostle calls them in another way, Jews and Greeks, but those who are called and justified. In some way they learned of their father's nakedness, which signified the Savior's passion. Then they took a garment and laid it on their backs, went in with their faces turned away and covered their father's nakedness, and they did not see what they covered out of reverence. For in a certain way, in Christ's passion, we both honor what was done for us and turn away from the crime of the Jews.

Vestimentum significat sacramentum, dorsa memoriam praeteritorum, quia passionem Christi eo scilicet iam tempore, quo habitat Iapheth in domibus Sem et malus frater in medio eorum, transactam celebrat ecclesia, non adhuc prospectat futuram.

The garment signifies the sacrament; their backs signify the memory of things past. For the Church celebrates Christ's passion as already accomplished, no longer looking forward to it as still to come. It does so now, in the time when Japheth dwells in the houses of Shem and the bad brother lives in their midst.

Sed malus frater in filio suo, hoc est in opere suo, puer, id est seruus est fratrum bonorum, cum ad exercitationem patientiae uel ad prouectum sapientiae scienter utuntur malis boni. Sunt enim teste apostolo, qui Christum adnuntiant non caste; sed siue occasione, inquit, siue ueritate Christus adnuntietur. Ipse quippe plantauit uineam, de qua dicit propheta: Vinea Domini Sabaoth domus Israel est, et bibit de uino eius (siue ille calix hic intellegatur, de quo dicit: Potestis bibere calicem, quem ego bibiturus sum?

But the bad brother, in his son, that is, in his work, is a servant, that is, a slave, to his good brothers. This happens when the good knowingly make use of the bad to exercise their patience or to grow in wisdom. For, as the apostle testifies, there are those who proclaim Christ without pure motives; "but whether in pretense," he says, "or in truth, let Christ be proclaimed." For he himself planted the vineyard of which the prophet says: "The vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel." And he drank of its wine (whether we understand here that cup of which he says, "Can you drink the cup that I am about to drink?"[5] et: Pater, si fieri potest, transeat calix iste, quo suam sine dubio significat passionem; siue, quia uinum fructus est uineae, hoc potius illo significatum est, quod ex ipsa uinea, hoc est ex genere Israelitarum, carnem pro nobis et sanguinem, ut pati posset, adsumsit), et inebriatus est, id est passus est, et nudatus est; ibi namque nudata est, id est apparuit, eius infirmitas, de qua dicit apostolus: Etsi crucifixu.s est ex infirmitate. Unde idem dicit: Infirmum Dei fortius est hominibus, et stultum Dei sapientius est hominibus. Quod uero cum dictum esset: Et nudatus est, addidit scriptura: In domo sua, eleganter ostendit, quod a and, "Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass," by which he undoubtedly signifies his passion; or whether, since wine is the fruit of the vine, the meaning is rather that he took on flesh and blood for us from that very vineyard, that is, from the race of the Israelites, so that he could suffer). And he became drunk, that is, he suffered, and he was uncovered. For there his weakness was uncovered, that is, it appeared. Of this weakness the apostle says: "Even though he was crucified out of 5 Philippians 1:18; Isaiah 5:7; Matthew 20:22.

LATIN

suae carnis gente et domesticis sanguinis sui, utique Iudaeis, fuerat crucem mortemque passurus.

Hanc passionem Christi foris in sono tantum uocis reprobi adnuntiant; non enim quod adnuntiant intellegunt. Probi autem in interiore homine habent tam grande mysterium adque honorant intus in corde infirmum et stultum Dei, quia fortius et sapientius est hominibus. Huius rei figura est, quod Cham exiens hoc nuntiauit foris; Sem uero et Iapheth, ut hoc uelarent, id est honorarent, ingressi sunt, hoc est interius id egerunt.

Haec scripturae secreta diuinae indagamus, ut possumus, alius alio magis minusue congruenter, uerum tamen fideliter certum tenentes non ea sine aliqua praefiguratione futurorum gesta adque conscripta neque nisi ad Christum et eius ecclesiam, quae ciuitas Dei est, esse referenda; cuius ab initio generis humani non defuit praedicatio, quam per omnia uidemus inpleri. Benedictis igitur duobus filiis Noe adque uno in medio eorum maledicto deinceps usque ad Abraham de iustorum aliquorum, qui pie Deum colerent, commemoratione silentium est per annos amplius quam mille. Nec eos defuisse crediderim, sed si omnes commemorarentur, nimis longum fieret, et esset haec historica magis diligentia quam prophetica prouidentia.

Illa itaque exsequitur litterarum sacrarum scriptor istarum uel potius per eum Dei Spiritus, quibus non solum narrentur praeterita, uerum etiam praenuntientur futura, quae tamen pertinent ad ciuitatem Dei; quia et de hominibus, qui non sunt ciues eius, quidquid hic dicitur, ad hoc dicitur, ut illa ex conparatione contraria uel proficiat uel emineat. Non sane omnia, quae gesta narrantur, aliquid etiam significare putanda sunt; sed propter illa, quae aliquid significant, etiam ea, quae nihil significant, adtexuntur.

ENGLISH

weakness." Hence the same apostle says: "The weakness of God is stronger than human beings, and the foolishness of God is wiser than human beings." Scripture, after saying "And he was uncovered," added "in his house." With this it neatly shows that he was going to suffer the cross and death at the hands of the people of his own flesh, the household of his own blood, namely the Jews.[6]

The reprobate proclaim this passion of Christ outwardly, in the mere sound of their voices, for they do not understand what they proclaim. The upright, however, hold so great a mystery in the inner self. Inwardly, in their hearts, they honor the weakness and foolishness of God, because it is stronger and wiser than human beings. This is figured by the fact that Ham went out and reported it outside. Shem and Japheth, by contrast, went in to veil it, that is, to honor it; in other words, they did it inwardly.

We search out these secrets of divine Scripture as best we can, some more aptly and some less so than others. Yet we faithfully hold as certain that these things were not done or written down without some prefiguring of what was to come. We also hold that they are to be referred only to Christ and his Church, which is the city of God. From the beginning of the human race this city has never lacked proclamation, and we see that proclamation fulfilled in every respect. So after the blessing of Noah's two sons and the cursing of the one between them, there is silence for more than a thousand years, down to Abraham. Scripture does not mention any righteous people who worshiped God devoutly. I would not believe that there were none. But if all of them were recorded, it would take too long, and this would be the diligence of history rather than the foresight of prophecy.

So the writer of these sacred books, or rather the Spirit of God through him, pursues those things through which future events are foretold and not merely past ones narrated, provided they concern the city of God. For whatever is said here even about people who are not its citizens is said so that, by the contrast, the city may either profit or stand out. Not everything that is narrated as having happened, of course, should be thought to signify something as well. But for the sake of the things that do signify something, those that signify nothing are woven in too.

6 Matthew 26:39; 2 Corinthians 13:4; 1 Corinthians 1:25.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Solo enim uomere terra proscinditur; sed ut hoc fieri possit, etiam cetera aratri membra sunt necessaria; et soli nerui in citharis adque huius modi uasis musicis aptantur ad cantum; sed ut aptari possint, insunt et cetera in conpagibus organorum, quae non percutiuntur a canentibus, sed ea, quae percussa resonant, his conectuntur. Ita in prophetica historia dicuntur et aliqua, quae nihil significant, sed quibus adhaereant quae significant et quodam modo religentur.	For only the plowshare cuts into the earth, yet for this to be possible the other parts of the plow are also needed. And only the strings of lyres and similar musical instruments are fitted for making music. Yet so that they can be fitted, the framework of the instruments also contains other parts which the players do not strike, but to which the parts that resound when struck are attached. In the same way, prophetic history also tells some things that signify nothing, but to which the things that do signify something are attached and, in a sense, tied.

THE GENERATIONS OF THE THREE SONS OF NOAH

The seventy-three descendants of Noah's sons are listed; they are nations, not single men.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.3 Generationes ergo filiorum Noe deinceps intuendae, et quod de his dicendum uidetur, adtexendum est huic operi, quo ciuitatis utriusque, terrenae scilicet et caelestis, per tempora procursus ostenditur. Coeptae sunt enim commemorari a minimo filio, qui uocatus est Iapheth, cuius filii octo nominati sunt, nepotes autem septem de duobus filiis eius, tres ex uno, quattuor ex altero; fiunt itaque omnes quindecim. Filii autem Cham, hoc est medii filii Noe, quattuor et nepotes quinque ex uno eius filio, pronepotes duo ex nepote uno; fit eorum summa undecim. Quibus enumeratis reditur tamquam ad caput et dicitur: Chus autem genuit Nebroth; hic coepit esse gigans super terram. Hic erat gigans uenator contra Dominum Deum. Propter hoc dicunt: Sicut Nebroth gigans uenator contra Dominum.	Next, then, we must consider the generations of Noah's sons. Whatever seems worth saying about them must be woven into this work, which sets out the course of both cities through time, the earthly and the heavenly. The account of them begins with the youngest son, who was called Japheth. Eight of his sons are named, and seven grandsons from two of those sons, three from one and four from the other, making fifteen in all. The sons of Ham, Noah's middle son, are four. There are five grandsons from one of his sons and two great-grandsons from one grandson, so their total comes to eleven. After these have been listed, the text returns, as it were, to the head of the line and says: "Cush fathered Nimrod; he began to be a giant on the earth. He was a giant hunter against the Lord God. That is why they say, 'Like Nimrod, a giant hunter against the Lord.'[7]
Et factum est initium regni eius Babylon, Oreg, Archad et Chalemne in terra Sennaar. De terra illa exiuit Assur et aedificauit Nineuen et Roboth ciuitatem et Chalach et Dasem inter medium Nineuae et Chalach: haec ciuitas magna. Iste porro Chus, pater gigantis Nebroth, primus nominatus est in filiis Cham, cuius quinque filii iam fuerant conputati et nepotes duo. Sed istum gigantem aut post nepotes suos natos genuit, aut, quod est credibilius, seorsum de illo propter eius eminentiam scriptura locuta	And the beginning of his kingdom was Babylon, Erech, Akkad and Calneh in the land of Shinar. From that land Asshur went out and built Nineveh, and the city of Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah: this is the great city." Now this Cush, father of the giant Nimrod, is named first among the sons of Ham, and his five sons and two grandsons had already been counted. Either he fathered this giant after his grand-

7 Genesis 10:8–9. Augustine's Latin, following the Greek Septuagint, reads "giant" and "against the Lord."

LATIN

est; quando quidem et regnum eius commemoratum est, cuius initium erat illa nobilissima Babylon ciuitas, et quae iuxta commemoratae sunt siue ciuitates siue regiones.

Quod uero dictum est de terra illa, id est de terra Sennaar, quae pertinebat ad regnum Nebroth, exisse Assur et aedificasse Nineuen et alias quas contexuit ciuitates, longe postea factum est, quod ex hac occasione perstrinxit propter nobilitatem regni Assyriorum, quod mirabiliter dilatauit Ninus, Beli filius, conditor Nineuae ciuitatis magnae; cuius ciuitatis nomen ex illius nomine deriuatum est, ut a Nino Nineue uocaretur. Assur autem, unde Assyrii, non fuit in filiis Cham, medii filii Noe, sed in filiis Sem reperitur, qui fuit Noe maximus filius. Unde apparet de progenie Sem, exortos fuisse, qui postea regnum gigantis illius obtinerent et inde procederent adque alias conderent ciuitates, quarum prima est a Nino, appellata Nineue.

Hinc reditur ad alium filium Cham, qui uocabatur Mesraim, et commemorantur quos genuit, non tamquam singuli homines, sed nationes septem. Et de sexta, uelut de sexto filio, gens commemoratur exisse, quae appellatur Philistiim; unde fiunt octo. Inde iterum ad Chanaan reditur, in quo filio maledictus est Cham, et quos genuit undecim nominantur. Deinde usque ad quos fines peruenerint commemoratis quibusdam ciuitatibus dicitur. Ac per hoc filiis nepotibusque conputatis de progenie Cham triginta unus geniti referuntur. Restat commemorare filios Sem, maximi filii Noe; ad eum quippe gradatim generationum istarum peruenit a minimo exorta narratio. Sed unde incipiunt commemorari filii Sem, habet quiddam obscuritatis, quod expositione inlustrandum est, quia et multum ad rem pertinet, quam requirimus.

Sic enim legitur: Et Sem natus est, et ipsi patri omnium filiorum, Heber, fratri Iapheth maiori. Ordo uerborum est: Et Sem natus est Heber, etiam ipsi, id est ipsi Sem, natus est Heber, qui Sem pater est omnium filiorum. Sem sons were born, or, more plausibly, Scripture spoke of the giant separately because of his eminence. After all, his kingdom is also mentioned. Its beginning was that most renowned city of Babylon, together with the cities or regions mentioned beside it.[8]

ENGLISH

The text also says that Asshur went out from that land, the land of Shinar, which belonged to Nimrod's kingdom, and built Nineveh and the other cities listed with it. That happened long afterward. Scripture touched on it in passing on this occasion because of the fame of the Assyrian kingdom. That kingdom was marvelously enlarged by Ninus son of Belus, the founder of the great city of Nineveh, whose name was derived from his: it was called Nineveh after Ninus. Asshur, however, from whom the Assyrians descend, was not among the sons of Ham, Noah's middle son. He is found among the sons of Shem, who was Noah's eldest son. Hence it appears that those who later took possession of that giant's kingdom sprang from the progeny of Shem. From there they went out and founded other cities, the first of which was called Nineveh after Ninus.[9]

From here the text returns to another son of Ham, called Mizraim, and lists those he fathered. They are not individual men but seven nations. From the sixth of these, as if from a sixth son, a people called the Philistines is said to have come, making eight. Then the text returns again to Canaan, the son in whom Ham was cursed, and names the eleven he fathered. Next it states how far their territories reached, naming certain cities. And so, counting sons and grandsons, the text records thirty-one descendants of Ham. It remains to mention the sons of Shem, Noah's eldest son, for the account of these generations, which began with the youngest, reaches him step by step. But the point where the list of Shem's sons begins contains an obscurity that needs explanation to clear it up, since it bears greatly on the matter we are investigating.

For it reads thus: "And to Shem was born, to him also, the father of all the sons, Eber; to the elder brother of Japheth." The order of the words is: "And to Shem was born Eber"; "also to him," that

8 Genesis 10:10–12.
9 In Greek tradition Ninus, son of Belus, was the legendary founder of the Assyrian empire.

LATIN

ergo patriarcham intellegi uoluit omnium, qui de stirpe eius exorti sunt, quos commemoraturus est, siue sint filii, siue nepotes et pronepotes et deinceps indidem exorti. Non sane istum Heber genuit Sem, sed ab illo quintus in progenitorum serie reperitur. Sem quippe inter alios filios genuit Arphaxat, Arphaxat genuit Cainan, Cainan genuit Sala, Sala genuit Heber.

ENGLISH

is, to Shem himself, "was born Eber"; and Shem is the father of all the sons. So Scripture meant Shem to be understood as the patriarch of all who sprang from his stock, whom it is about to list, whether sons, or grandsons and great-grandsons, and all those descended from the same source after them. Shem did not, of course, father this Eber directly. Eber is found fifth from him in the line of descent. For among other sons Shem fathered Arphaxad, Arphaxad fathered Cainan, Cainan fathered Shelah, and Shelah fathered Eber.[10]

Non itaque frustra ipse primus est nominatus in progenie ueniente de Sem et praelatus etiam filiis, cum sit quintus nepos, nisi quia uerum est, quod traditur, ex illo Hebraeos esse cognominatos, tamquam Heberaeos; cum et alia possit esse opinio, ut ex Abraham tamquam Abrahaei dicti esse uideantur; sed nimirum hoc uerum est, quod ex Heber Heberaei appellati sunt, ac deinde una detrita littera Hebraei, quam linguam solus Israel populus potuit obtinere, in quo Dei ciuitas et in sanctis peregrinata est et in omnibus sacramento adumbrata. Igitur filii Sem prius sex nominantur, deinde ex uno eorum nati sunt quattuor nepotes eius, itemque alter filiorum Sem genuit eius nepotem, adque ex illo itidem pronepos natus est adque inde abnepos, qui est Heber.

So it is not for nothing that Eber is named first in the progeny descending from Shem, ranked even ahead of the sons, though he is a descendant of the fifth generation. The reason can only be that the tradition is true that the Hebrews took their name from him, as Heberaei. Another opinion is possible, that they were called "Abrahamites," as it were, after Abraham. But surely the truth is that they were called Heberaei after Eber, and then, with one letter worn away, Hebraei, Hebrews. Only the people of Israel were able to keep this language. In that people the city of God was on pilgrimage in the saints and was foreshadowed in all of them by sacramental signs. So first six sons of Shem are named. Then four grandsons of his were born from one of them. Likewise another of Shem's sons fathered a grandson of his, and from him in turn a great-grandson was born, and from him a great-great-grandson, who is Eber.[11]

Genuit autem Heber duos filios, quorum unum appellauit Phalech, quod interpretatur diuidens. Deinde scriptura subiungens rationemque huius nominis reddens: Quia diebus, inquit, eius diuisa est terra. Hoc autem quid sit, postea apparebit. Alius uero, qui natus est ex Heber, genuit duodecim filios; ac per hoc fiunt omnes progeniti de Sem uiginti septem. In summa igitur omnes progeniti de tribus filiis Noe, id est quindecim de Iapheth, triginta unus de Cham, uiginti septem de Sem fiunt septuaginta tres. Deinde sequitur scriptura dicens: Hi filii Sem in tribubus suis secundum linguas suas in regionibus suis et in gentibus suis; itemque de omnibus: Haec, inquit, tribus filiorum Noe secundum generationes eorum, secundum gentes eorum. Ab his dispersae sunt insulae gentium super terram post diluuium.

Eber fathered two sons, one of whom he called Peleg, which means "dividing." Then Scripture adds the reason for this name: "For in his days," it says, "the earth was divided." What this means will become clear later. The other son born to Eber fathered twelve sons, and so all the descendants of Shem come to twenty-seven. In total, then, the descendants of Noah's three sons come to seventy-three: fifteen from Japheth, thirty-one from Ham, twenty-seven from Shem. Then Scripture goes on: "These are the sons of Shem by their tribes, according to their languages, in their lands and in their nations." And likewise of all of them: "These," it says, "are the tribes of the sons of Noah according to their generations, according to their 10 Genesis 10:21. Augustine reads Eber as the one "born" to Shem.

11 In Augustine's Latin Eber is spelled Heber, which makes the derivation of Hebraei (Hebrews) plain.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	nations. From them the islands of the nations were scattered over the earth after the flood."[12]
Unde colligitur septuaginta tres uel potius (quod postea demonstrabitur) septuaginta duas gentes tunc fuisse, non homines. Nam et prius, cum fuissent commemorati filii Iapheth, ita conclusum est: Ex his segregatae sunt insulae gentium in terra sua, unus quisque secundum linguam in tribubus suis et in gentibus suis.	From this we gather that there were then seventy-three nations, or rather seventy-two, as will be shown later, and that these were nations, not individual men. For earlier too, when the sons of Japheth had been listed, the conclusion was: "From these the islands of the nations were separated in their land, each according to its language, in their tribes and in their nations."[13]
Iam uero in filiis Cham quodam loco apertius gentes commemoratae sunt, sicut superius ostendi. Mesraim genuit eos, qui dicuntur Ludiim; et eodem modo ceterae usque ad septem gentes. Et enumeratis omnibus postea concludens: Hi filii Cham, inquit, in tribubus suis secundum linguas suas in regionibus suis et in gentibus suis. Propterea ergo multorum filii non sunt commemorati, quia gentibus aliis nascendo accesserunt, ipsi autem gentes facere nequiuerunt. Nam qua alia causa, cum filii Iapheth octo enumerentur, ex duobus eorum tantum filii nati commemorantur, et cum filii Cham quattuor nominentur, ex tribus tantum qui nati sunt adiciuntur, et cum filii Sem nominentur sex, duorum tantum posteritas adtexitur? Numquid ceteri sine filiis remanserunt?	Among the sons of Ham, moreover, nations are mentioned more openly in one place, as I showed above. Mizraim fathered those called the Ludim, and so on with the rest, up to seven nations. And after listing them all, Scripture concludes: "These are the sons of Ham by their tribes, according to their languages, in their lands and in their nations." This, then, is why the sons of many are not mentioned. By their birth they were added to other nations, but they were unable to form nations themselves. For what other reason could there be? Eight sons of Japheth are listed, yet sons are mentioned as born to only two of them. Four sons of Ham are named, yet only the sons of three are added. Six sons of Shem are named, yet the posterity of only two is woven in. Did the rest remain without sons?[14]
Absit hoc credere; sed gentes, propter quas commemorari digni essent, non utique fecerunt, quia, sicut nascebantur, aliis gentibus addebantur.	Heaven forbid we should believe that! But they certainly did not form nations that would make them worth mentioning, because, as they were born, they were added to other nations.

THE DIVERSITY OF LANGUAGES AND THE BEGINNING OF BABYLON

Genesis tells how one language became many at Babylon, the city of Nimrod, "a giant hunter against the Lord."

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.4 Cum ergo in suis linguis istae gentes fuisse referantur, redit tamen narrator ad illud tempus, quando una lingua omnium fuit, et inde iam exponit, quid acciderit, ut linguarum diuersitas nasceretur. Et erat, inquit, omnis terra labium unum et uox una omnibus. Et factum est, cum mouerent ipsi ab Oriente, inuenerunt campum in terra Sennaar, et habitauerunt ibi. Et dixit homo proximo: Venite, faciamus lateres et coquamus illos igni. Et facti sunt illis lateres in lapidem, et bitumen erat illis	These nations, then, are reported to have each had their own languages. Even so, the narrator returns to the time when there was one language for all, and from there he explains what happened to give rise to the diversity of languages. "And the whole earth," he says, "was one lip, and there was one speech for all. And it came about, as they moved from the East, that they found a plain in the land

12 Genesis 10:25, 31–32.
13 Genesis 10:5.
14 Genesis 10:20.

LATIN

lutum, et dixerunt: Venite, aedificemus nobismet ipsis ciuitatem et turrem, cuius caput erit usque ad caelum, et faciamus nostrum nomen antequam dispergamur in faciem omnis terrae. Et descendit Dominus uidere ciuitatem et turrem, quam aedificauerunt filii hominum.

Et dixit Dominus Deus: Ecce genus unum et labium unum omnium; et hoc inchoauerunt facere, et nunc non deficient ex illis omnia quae conati fuerint facere; uenite, et descendentes, confundamus ibi linguam eorum, ut non audiant unusquisque uocem proximi. Et dispersit eos Dominus inde super faciem omnis terrae, et cessauerunt aedificantes ciuitatem et turrem. Propter hoc appellatum est nomen illius confusio, quia ibi confudit Dominus labia omnis terrae; et inde dispersit illos Dominus Deus super faciem omnis terrae. Ista ciuitas, quae appellata est confusio, ipsa est Babylon, cuius mirabilem constructionem etiam gentium commendat historia. Babylon quippe interpretatur confusio.

Unde colligitur, gigantem illum Nebroth fuisse illius conditorem, quod superius breuiter fuerat intimatum, ubi, cum de illo scriptura loqueretur, ait initium regni eius fuisse Babylonem, id est quae ciuitatum ceterarum gereret principatum, ubi esset tamquam in metropoli habitaculum regni; quamuis perfecta non fuerit usque in tantum modum, quantum superba cogitabat inpietas. Nam nimia disponebatur altitudo, quae dicta est usque in caelum, siue unius turris eius, quam praecipuam moliebantur inter alias, siue omnium turrium, quae per numerum singularem ita significatae sunt, ut dicitur miles et intelleguntur milia militum; ut rana, ut lucusta; sic enim appellata est multitudo ranarum ac lucustarum in plagis, quibus Aegyptii percussi sunt per Moysen.

Quid autem factura fuerat humana et uana praesumtio, si cuiuslibet et quantumlibet in caelum aduersus Deum altitudinem molis extolleret? quando montes transcenderet uniuersos, quando spatium nebulosi aeris of Shinar, and they settled there. And a man said to his neighbor, 'Come, let us make bricks and bake them with fire.' And they had bricks for stone, and bitumen was their mortar. And they said, 'Come, let us build ourselves a city and a tower whose top will reach to heaven, and let us make a name for ourselves before we are scattered over the face of the whole earth.' And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the sons of men had built.[15]

ENGLISH

And the Lord God said, 'Look, they are one race, and all of them have one lip. They have begun to do this, and now nothing that they attempt to do will fail them. Come, let us go down and confuse their language there, so that none of them hears his neighbor's voice.' And the Lord scattered them from there over the face of the whole earth, and they stopped building the city and the tower. For this reason its name was called Confusion, because there the Lord confused the lips of the whole earth; and from there the Lord God scattered them over the face of the whole earth." This city that was called Confusion is Babylon, whose marvelous construction is praised even in pagan history. For Babylon means "confusion."

From this we gather that the giant Nimrod was its founder. This had been briefly hinted above, where Scripture, speaking of him, said that the beginning of his kingdom was Babylon. That is to say, Babylon held the leadership over the other cities and was the seat of the kingdom, as in a metropolis. It was not, however, completed to the extent that proud ungodliness had in mind. For the planned height was excessive; it was said to reach to heaven. This may refer to one tower of the city, which they were building as the chief among the others. Or it may refer to all the towers, signified by the singular number, just as one says "the soldier" and means thousands of soldiers, or "the frog," or "the locust." For that is how the multitude of frogs and of locusts was named in the plagues with which the Egyptians were struck through Moses.

But what would empty human presumption have accomplished, however high it raised a mass of any kind into the sky against God? What if it overtopped all the mountains, or rose beyond the re-

15 Genesis 11:1–9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
huius euaderet? Quid denique noceret Deo quantacumque uel spiritalis uel corporalis elatio? Tutam ueramque in caelum uiam molitur humilitas, sursum leuans cor ad Dominum, non contra Dominum, sicut dictus est gigans iste uenator contra Dominum. Quod non intellegentes nonnulli ambiguo Graeco falsi sunt, ut non interpretarentur contra Dominum, sed ante Dominum; ἐναντίον quippe et contra et ante significat. Hoc enim uerbum est in psalmo: Et ploremus ante Dominum qui nos fecit; et hoc uerbum est etiam in libro Iob, ubi scriptum est: In furorem erupisti contra Dominum. Sic ergo intellegendus est gigans iste uenator contra Dominum.	gion of this cloudy air? In the end, what harm could any exaltation do to God, however great, whether spiritual or bodily? It is humility that builds a safe and true road to heaven, lifting up the heart to the Lord, not against the Lord, as this giant is called a hunter against the Lord. Some, not understanding this, were misled by an ambiguous Greek word, so that they translated not "against the Lord" but "before the Lord." For ἐναντίον [enantion] means both "against" and "before." This is the word in the psalm: "And let us weep before the Lord who made us." It is also the word in the book of Job, where it is written: "You have burst out in fury against the Lord." This, then, is how we should understand this giant: a hunter against the Lord.[16]
Quid autem hic significatur hoc nomine, quod est uenator, nisi animalium terrigenarum deceptor obpressor extinctor? Erigebat ergo cum suis populis turrem contra Deum, qua est inpia significata superbia. Merito autem malus punitur adfectus, etiam cui non succedit effectus. Genus uero ipsum poenae quale fuit? Quoniam dominatio imperantis in lingua est, ibi est damnata superbia, ut non intellegeretur iubens homini, qui noluit intellegere ut oboediret Deo iubenti. Sic illa conspiratio dissoluta est, cum quisque ab eo, quem non intellegebat, abscederet nec se nisi ei, cum quo loqui poterat, adgregaret; et per linguas diuisae sunt gentes dispersaeque per terras, sicut Deo placuit, qui hoc modis occultis nobisque inconprehensibilibus fecit.	And what does this word "hunter" signify here but a deceiver, oppressor and destroyer of earthborn creatures? So he and his peoples were raising a tower against God, and that tower signifies ungodly pride. Rightly is an evil intent punished, even when it does not achieve its effect. And what kind of punishment was it? A ruler's domination lies in his tongue, so that was where pride was condemned. He would not understand God's commands so as to obey them, and so he was not understood when he gave commands to human beings. Thus that conspiracy was dissolved. Each one withdrew from the one he did not understand and joined himself only to the one he could speak with. And the nations were divided by languages and scattered across the lands, as it pleased God, who did this in hidden ways beyond our comprehension.

THE LORD'S COMING DOWN TO CONFUSE THE LANGUAGE OF THE TOWER BUILDERS

God does not move from place to place; he "comes down" by acting on earth, perhaps through angels.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.5 Quod enim scriptum est: Et descendit Dominus uidere ciuitatem et turrem, quam aedificauerunt filii hominum, hoc est non filii Dei, sed illa societas secundum hominem uiuens, quam terrenam dicimus ciuitatem: non loco mouetur Deus, qui semper est ubique totus, sed descendere dicitur, cum aliquid facit in terra, quod praeter usitatum naturae cursum mirabiliter factum praesentiam quodam modo eius ostendat; nec uidendo	Scripture says, "And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the sons of men had built." The "sons of men" are not the sons of God but that society which lives according to man, the one we call the earthly city. Yet God does not move from place to place, since he is always wholly present everywhere. He is said to "come down" when he does something on earth that is done

16 Psalm 94:6 (95:6 in most English Bibles); Job 15:13.

LATIN	ENGLISH
discit ad tempus, qui numquam potest aliquid ignorare, sed ad tempus uidere et cognoscere dicitur, quod uideri et cognosci facit. Non sic ergo uidebatur illa ciuitas, quo modo eam Deus uideri fecit, quando sibi quantum displiceret ostendit.	wondrously, outside the usual course of nature, and so in some way shows his presence. Nor does he learn anything at a particular time by seeing it, since he can never be ignorant of anything. He is said to see and know at a particular time what he causes to be seen and known. So that city was not being seen in the way God caused it to be seen when he showed how much it displeased him.[17]
Quamuis possit intellegi Deus ad illam ciuitatem descendisse, quia descenderunt angeli eius in quibus habitat: ut, quod adiunctum est: Et dixit Dominus Deus: Ecce genus unum et labium unum omnium, et cetera, ac deinde additum: Venite et descendentes confundamus ibi linguam eorum, recapitulatio sit, demonstrans quem ad modum factum sit, quod dictum fuerat: Descendit Dominus. Si enim iam descenderat, quid sibi uult: Venite et descendentes confundamus (quod intellegitur angelis dictum), nisi quia per angelos descendebat, qui in angelis descendentibus erat? Et bene non ait: Venite et descendentes confundite, sed: Confundamus ibi linguam eorum; ostendens ita se operari per ministros suos, ut sint etiam ipsi cooperatores Dei, sicut apostolus dicit: Dei enim sumus cooperarii.	It could also be understood that God came down to that city because his angels, in whom he dwells, came down. On this reading, what is added—"And the Lord God said, 'Look, they are one race, and all of them have one lip,'" and so on—and then the further words, "Come, let us go down and confuse their language there," would be a recapitulation, showing how the thing came about that had already been stated: "The Lord came down." For if he had already come down, what does "Come, let us go down and confuse" mean (words understood to be addressed to the angels), unless that he was coming down through the angels, since he was in the angels who came down? And it is fitting that he does not say, "Come, go down and confuse," but, "Let us confuse their language there." He shows in this way that he works through his ministers in such a manner that they too are God's coworkers, as the apostle says: "For we are God's fellow workers."[18]

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE SPEECH BY WHICH GOD SPEAKS TO THE ANGELS

"Let us make" points to the Trinity; God speaks to angels in his own ineffable way.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.6 Poterat et illud, quando factus est homo, de angelis intellegi quod dictum est: Faciamus hominem, quia non dixit: Faciam; sed quia sequitur ad imaginem nostram, nec fas est credere ad imaginem angelorum hominem factum, aut eandem esse imaginem angelorum et Dei: recte illic intellegitur pluralitas trinitatis. Quae tamen trinitas quia unus Deus est, etiam cum dixisset: Faciamus: Et fecit, inquit, Deus hominem adimaginem Dei, non dixit fecerunt di aut ad imaginem deorum.	The words spoken when man was made, "Let us make man," could also have been understood of the angels, since he did not say, "Let me make." But what follows is "in our image," and it is not right to believe that man was made in the image of the angels, or that the angels and God share the same image. So the plural there is rightly understood as the plurality of the Trinity. Yet because this Trinity is one God, even after saying, "Let us make," Scripture says, "And God made man in the image of God." It did not say, "The gods made," or "in the image of the gods."[19]

17 Genesis 11:5.
18 Genesis 11:6–7; 1 Corinthians 3:9.
19 Genesis 1:26–27.

LATIN

Poterat et hic eadem intellegi trinitas, tamquam Pater dixerit ad Filium et Spiritum sanctum: Venite, et descendentes confundamus ibi linguam eorum, si aliquid esset, quod angelos prohiberet intellegi, quibus potius conuenit uenire ad Deum motibus sanctis, hoc est cogitationibus piis, quibus ab eis consulitur incommutabilis Veritas, tamquam lex aeterna in illa eorum curia superna. Neque enim sibi ipsi sunt ueritas, sed creatricis participes Veritatis ad illam mouentur, tamquam ad fontem uitae, ut, quod non habent ex se ipsis, capiant ex ipsa.

Et eorum stabilis est iste motus, quo ueniunt, qui non recedunt Nec sic loquitur angelis Deus, quo modo nos in uicem nobis uel Deo uel angelis uel ipsi angeli nobis siue per illos Deus nobis, sed ineffabili suo modo; nobis autem hoc indicatur nostro modo. Dei quippe sublimior ante suum factum locutio ipsius sui facti est inmutabilis ratio, quae non habet sonum strepentem adque transeuntem, sed uim sempiterne manentem et temporaliter operantem. Hac loquitur angelis sanctis, nobis autem aliter longe positis. Quando autem etiam nos aliquid talis locutionis interioribus auribus capimus, angelis propinquamus. Non itaque mihi adsidue reddenda ratio est in hoc opere de locutionibus Dei.

Aut enim Veritas incommutabilis per se ipsam ineffabiliter loquitur rationalis creaturae mentibus, aut per mutabilem creaturam loquitur, siue spiritalibus imaginibus nostro spiritui siue corporalibus uocibus corporis sensui.

Illud sane quod dictum est: Et nunc non deficient ex illis omnia, quae conati fuerint facere, non dictum est confirmando, sed tamquam interrogando, sicut solet a comminantibus dici, quem ad modum ait quidam: Non arma expedient totaque ex urbe sequentur? Sic ergo accipiendum est, tamquam dixerit: Nonne omnia deficient ex illis, quae conati fuerint facere? Sed si ita dicatur, non exprimit comminantem. Verum propter tardiusculos addidimus particulam, id est ne, ut diceremus nonne, quoniam uocem pronuntiantis non possumus scribere.

ENGLISH

Here too the same Trinity could be understood, as though the Father had said to the Son and the Holy Spirit, "Come, let us go down and confuse their language there"—if there were anything that ruled out understanding it of the angels. But it is more fitting for the angels to come to God by holy movements, that is, by devout thoughts, through which they consult the unchangeable Truth as the eternal law in that heavenly senate-house of theirs. For they are not their own truth. Rather, as sharers in the creating Truth they move toward it as toward the fountain of life, so as to receive from it what they do not have from themselves.

And this movement by which they come is a steady one in those who never draw away. Nor does God speak to the angels as we speak to one another, or to God, or to the angels, or as the angels speak to us, or God speaks to us through them. He speaks in his own ineffable way, and this is conveyed to us in our way. For God's loftier speech, prior to his act, is the unchangeable rationale of that very act. It has no noisy, passing sound, but a power that abides eternally and works in time. With this he speaks to the holy angels, but to us, who are set far off, in another way. And when we too catch something of such speech with our inner ears, we draw near to the angels. So I need not keep giving an account in this work of how God speaks.

For either the unchangeable Truth speaks ineffably through itself to the minds of rational creatures, or it speaks through a changeable creature, whether by spiritual images to our spirit or by bodily voices to the bodily sense.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	As for the words, "And now they will not fall short in anything they have tried to do," they were not said as a statement but as a kind of question, the way people making threats tend to speak. So someone says, "Will they not get their weapons ready and pursue from all over the city?" This is how the passage must be taken, as if he had said, "Will they not fall short in everything they have tried to do?" But put that way, it does not convey the threatening tone. For the benefit of slower readers, though, we have added a particle, namely ne, so as to say nonne ["will they not?"], since we cannot write down the tone of the speaker's voice.[20]
Ex illis igitur tribus hominibus, Noe filiis, septuaginta tres, uel potius, ut ratio declaratura est, septuaginta duae gentes totidemque linguae per terras esse coeperunt, quae crescendo et insulas inpleuerunt. Auctus est autem numerus gentium multo amplius quam linguarum. Nam et in Africa barbaras gentes in una lingua plurimas nouimus, et homines quidem multiplicato genere humano ad insulas inhabitandas nauigio transire potuisse, quis ambigat?	From those three men, then, the sons of Noah, seventy-three nations—or rather, as reasoning will show, seventy-two—and as many languages began to exist throughout the earth, and as they grew they filled even the islands. But the number of nations increased far more than that of languages. For in Africa too we know of a great many foreign peoples who share a single language. And who would doubt that, once the human race had multiplied, people could have crossed by ship to settle the islands?

WHETHER EVEN THE MOST REMOTE ISLANDS RECEIVED EVERY KIND OF ANIMAL FROM THOSE SAVED IN THE ARK FROM THE FLOOD

Wild animals may have reached distant islands by human transport, angels, or new births from the earth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.7 Sed quaestio est de omni genere bestiarum, quae sub cura hominum non sunt neque sicuti ranae nascuntur ex terra, sed sola commixtione maris et feminae propagantur, sicut lupi adque huius modi, cetera, quo modo post diluuium, quo ea, quae in arca non erant, cuncta deleta sunt, etiam in insulis esse potuerint, si reparata non sunt nisi ex his, quorum genera in utroque sexu arca seruauit. Possunt quidem credi ad insulas natando transisse, sed proximas. Sunt autem quaedam tam longe positae a continentibus terris, ut ad eas nulla uideatur natare potuisse bestiarum.	But there is a question about all the kinds of beasts that are not under human care and are not born from the earth, as frogs are, but propagate only through the mating of male and female, such as wolves and others of that sort. After the flood, in which everything that was not in the ark was destroyed, how could they have existed even on islands, if they were restored only from those whose kinds the ark preserved in both sexes? They could, of course, be thought to have swum across to islands, but only to nearby ones. Yet some islands lie so far from the mainland that it seems none of the beasts could have swum to them.
Quod si homines eas captas secum aduexerunt et eo modo ubi habitabant earum genera instituerunt uenandi	It is not incredible that people captured them and brought them along, and in this way established

20 Genesis 11:6; the quotation is Virgil, Aeneid 4.592, Dido's words as Aeneas sails away.

LATIN

studio, fieri potuisse incredibile non est; quamuis iussu Dei siue permissu etiam opere angelorum negandum non sit potuisse transferri. Si uero terra exortae sunt secundum originem primam, quando dixit Deus: Producat terra animam uiuam, multo clarius apparet non tam reparandorum animalium causa quam figurandarum uariarum gentium propter ecclesiae sacramentum in arca fuisse omnia genera, si in insulis, quo transire non possent, multa animalia terra produxit.

ENGLISH

their kinds where they lived, out of a passion for hunting. Nor should it be denied that they could have been carried across by the work of angels, at God's command or with his permission. But if they sprang from the earth according to their first origin, when God said, "Let the earth bring forth the living creature," then it becomes much clearer that all the kinds were in the ark not so much to restore the animals as to prefigure the various nations, for the sake of the mystery of the Church—that is, if the earth brought forth many animals on islands to which they could not cross.[21]

WHETHER CERTAIN MONSTROUS RACES OF HUMAN BEINGS DESCENDED FROM ADAM OR FROM THE SONS OF NOAH

Any race that is truly rational and mortal, however strange its body, descends from Adam.

LATIN

16.8 Quaeritur etiam, utrum ex filiis Noe uel potius ex illo uno homine, unde etiam ipsi extiterunt, propagata esse credendum sit quaedam monstrosa hominum genera, quae gentium narrat historia, sicut perhibentur quidam unum habere oculum in fronte media, quibusdam plantas uersas esse post crura, quibusdam utriusque sexus esse naturam et dextram mammam uirilem, sinistram muliebrem, uicibusque inter se coeundo et gignere et parere; aliis ora non esse eosque per nares tantummodo halitu uiuere, alios statura esse cubitales, quos Pygmaeos a cubito Graeci uocant, alibi quinquennes concipere feminas et octauum uitae annum non excedere.

Item ferunt esse gentem, ubi singula crura in pedibus habent nec poplitem flectunt, et sunt mirabilis celeritatis; quos Sciopodas uocant, quod per aestum in terra iacentes resupini umbra se pedum protegant; quosdam sine ceruice oculos habentes in umeris, et cetera hominum uel quasi hominum genera, quae in maritima platea Carthaginis musiuo picta sunt, ex libris depromta uelut curiosioris historiae. Quid dicam de Cynocephalis, quorum canina capita adque ipse latratus magis bestias quam homines confitetur? Sed omnia genera hominum, quae dicuntur esse, credere non est necesse. Verum quisquis uspiam nascitur homo, id est

ENGLISH

It is also asked whether we should believe that certain monstrous races of human beings, which the histories of the nations tell of, descended from the sons of Noah, or rather from that one man from whom they too came. Some are said to have a single eye in the middle of the forehead; some to have the soles of their feet turned backward behind their legs; some to have the nature of both sexes, with the right breast a man's and the left a woman's, and by taking turns in intercourse with one another both to beget and to bear. Others are said to have no mouths and to live only by breathing through their noses; others to be a cubit tall, whom the Greeks call Pygmies from the word for cubit; and elsewhere the women are said to conceive at five and not to live beyond their eighth year.[22]

They also say there is a people who have a single leg below the knee, which they do not bend, and who are wonderfully fast. They call them Sciapods, because in hot weather they lie on their backs on the ground and shade themselves with their feet. Others are said to have no neck and to have their eyes in their shoulders. And there are the other races of human beings, or near-human beings, depicted in mosaic on the seafront promenade at Carthage, drawn from books of what passes for more curious history. What shall I say

21 Genesis 1:24.

22 The Greek pygmē is a measure of length from the elbow to the knuckles.

LATIN	ENGLISH
animal rationale mortale, quamlibet nostris inusitatam sensibus gerat corporis formam seu colorem siue motum siue sonum siue qualibet ui, qualibet parte, qualibet qualitate naturam: ex illo uno protoplasto originem ducere nullus fidelium dubitauerit.	of the Cynocephali, whose dog's heads and very barking proclaim them beasts rather than human beings? But there is no need to believe in all the races of human beings that are said to exist. Yet whoever is born anywhere as a human being—that is, a rational mortal animal—however unusual to our senses the shape of his body, or his color, or movement, or voice, or however unusual his nature in any power, any part, any quality, none of the faithful will doubt that he traces his origin from that one first-formed man.[23]
Apparet tamen quid in pluribus natura obtinuerit et quid sit ipsa raritate mirabile.	Still, it is clear what nature has established in the majority, and what is remarkable precisely because it is rare.
Qualis autem ratio redditur de monstrosis aput nos hominum partubus, talis de monstrosis quibusdam gentibus reddi potest. Deus enim creator est omnium, qui ubi et quando creari quid oporteat uel oportuerit, ipse nouit, sciens uniuersitatis pulchritudinem quarum partium uel similitudine uel diuersitate contexat. Sed qui totum inspicere non potest, tamquam deformitate partis offenditur, quoniam cui congruat et quo referatur ignorat. Pluribus quam quinis digitis in manibus et pedibus nasci homines nouimus; et haec leuior est quam ulla distantia; sed tamen absit, ut quis ita desipiat, ut existimet in numero humanorum digitorum errasse Creatorem, quamuis nesciens quur hoc fecerit. Ita etsi maior diuersitas oriatur, scit ille quid egerit, cuius opera iuste nemo reprehendit.	The same account that is given of monstrous human births among us can be given of certain monstrous races. For God is the creator of all things. He himself knows where and when anything should be or should have been created, since he knows from which parts, by likeness or by difference, he weaves the beauty of the universe. But someone who cannot see the whole is offended by what looks like the deformity of a part, because he does not know what it fits with or what it relates to. We know of people born with more than five fingers on their hands and toes on their feet. This is a slighter deviation than any other. Still, heaven forbid that anyone should be so foolish as to think the Creator made a mistake in the number of human fingers, even if he does not know why he did this. So even if a greater diversity arises, he knows what he has done, whose works no one rightly finds fault with.
Aput Hipponem Zaritum est homo quasi lunatas habens plantas et in eis binos tantummodo digitos, similes et manus. Si aliqua gens talis esset, illi curiosae adque mirabili adderetur historiae. Num igitur istum propter hoc negabimus ex illo uno, qui primus creatus est, esse propagatum? Androgyni, quos etiam Hermaphroditos nuncupant, quamuis admodum rari sint, difficile est tamen ut temporibus desint, in quibus sic uterque sexus apparet, ut, ex quo potius debeant accipere nomen, incertum sit; a meliore tamen, hoc est a masculino, ut appellarentur, loquendi consuetudo praeualuit. Nam nemo umquam Androgynaecas aut Hermaphroditas nuncupauit. Ante annos aliquot, nostra certe memoria, in	At Hippo Zaritus there is a man whose soles are crescent-shaped, with only two toes on each, and his hands are similar. If there were a whole people like this, it would be added to that curious and wonder-filled history. Shall we then deny, on this account, that this man descended from that one man who was created first? Androgynes, whom people also call hermaphrodites, are very rare, yet it is hard for any age to be without them. In them both sexes appear in such a way that it is uncertain from which they ought to take their name. Yet the custom of speech has prevailed of naming them from the better one, that is, the masculine.

23 Sciapods means "shade-feet"; Cynocephali means "dog-heads."

LATIN	ENGLISH
Oriente duplex homo natus est superioribus membris, inferioribus simplex.	For no one has ever called them androgynaecae or hermaphroditae. Some years ago, certainly within our memory, a person was born in the East who was double in the upper parts of the body and single in the lower.[24]
Nam duo erant capita, duo pectora, quattuor manus, uenter autem unus, et pedes duo, sicut uni homini; et tam diu uixit, ut multos ad eum uidendum fama contraheret. Quis autem omnes commemorare possit humanos fetus longe dissimiles his, ex quibus eos natos esse certissimum est? Sicut ergo haec ex illo uno negari non possunt originem ducere, ita quaecumque gentes in diuersitatibus corporum ab usitato naturae cursu, quem plures et prope omnes tenent, uelut exorbitasse traduntur, si definitione illa includuntur, ut rationalia animalia sint adque mortalia, ab eodem ipso uno primo patre omnium stirpem trahere confitendum est, si tamen uera sunt quae de illarum nationum uarietate et tanta inter se adque nobiscum diuersitate traduntur.	There were two heads, two chests, four hands, but one belly and two feet, as in a single person. And he lived long enough for his fame to draw many people to see him. But who could list all the human offspring that are very unlike those from whom they were quite certainly born? Just as it cannot be denied that these trace their origin from that one man, so too with whatever races are reported to have, as it were, strayed in their bodily differences from the usual course of nature that most, indeed almost all, keep to. If they fall under that definition—that they are rational and mortal animals—it must be admitted that they draw their lineage from that same one first father of all. That is, if what is reported about the variety of those peoples, and their great difference from one another and from us, is true.
Nam et simias et cercopithecos et sphingas si nesciremus non homines esse, sed bestias, possent illi historici de sua curiositate gloriantes uelut gentes aliquas hominum nobis inpunita uanitate mentiri. Sed si homines sunt, de quibus illa mira conscripta sunt: quid, si propterea Deus uoluit etiam nonnullas gentes ita creare, ne in his monstris, quae aput nos oportet ex hominibus nasci, eius sapientiam, qua naturam fingit humanam, uelut artem cuiuspiam minus perfecti opificis, putaremus errasse? Non itaque nobis uideri debet absurdum, ut, quem ad modum in singulis quibusque gentibus quaedam monstra sunt hominum, ita in uniuerso genere humano quaedam monstra sint gentium.	For if we did not know that apes, long-tailed monkeys and sphinxes are not human beings but beasts, those historians who boast of their curiosity could lie to us with impunity and pass them off as races of human beings. But if those about whom such wonders have been written are human, what if God chose to create even some whole races this way so that we would not think that his wisdom, by which he shapes human nature, had erred like the skill of some less accomplished craftsman in the case of the monsters that must be born of human beings among us? So it should not seem absurd to us that, just as within each individual nation there are certain human monsters, so within the whole human race there are certain monstrous nations.[25]
Quapropter ut istam quaestionem pedetemtim cauteque concludam: aut illa, quae talia de quibusdam gentibus scripta sunt, omnino nulla sunt; aut si sunt, homines non sunt; aut ex Adam sunt, si homines sunt.	So, to close this question step by step and with caution: either what has been written about certain races of this kind is entirely without foundation; or, if such races exist, they are not human; or, if they are human, they are descended from Adam.

24 Hippo Zaritus (Hippo Diarrhytus) is modern Bizerte in Tunisia. The Latin forms Augustine cites would be feminine ones.
25 The ancients used "sphinx" for a kind of ape, perhaps a baboon.

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT THE LOWER PART OF THE EARTH, OPPOSITE TO WHERE WE LIVE, HAS ANTIPODES

Augustine rejects belief in people living on the opposite side of the earth.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.9	Quod uero et antipodas esse fabulantur, id est homines a contraria parte terrae, ubi sol oritur, quando occidit nobis, aduersa pedibus nostris calcare uestigia, nulla ratione credendum est. Neque hoc ulla historica cognitione didicisse se adfirmant, sed quasi ratiocinando coniectant, eo quod intra conuexa caeli terra suspensa sit, eundemque locum mundus habeat et infimum et medium; et ex hoc opinantur alteram terrae partem, quae infra est, habitatione hominum carere non posse. Nec adtendunt, etiamsi figura conglobata et rutunda mundus esse credatur siue aliqua ratione monstretur, non tamen esse consequens, ut etiam ex illa parte ab aquarum congerie nuda sit terra; deinde etiamsi nuda sit, neque hoc statim necesse esse, ut homines habeat.	As for the tale that there are antipodes—that is, people on the opposite side of the earth, where the sun rises when it sets for us, who plant their footsteps opposite to our feet—there is no reason at all to believe it. Those who claim this do not say they learned it from any historical knowledge. They conjecture it by a sort of reasoning: the earth is suspended within the vault of the sky, and the same place in the universe is both the lowest and the middle; from this they suppose that the other part of the earth, the part below, cannot be without human inhabitants. They do not notice that even if the universe is believed, or shown by some argument, to be spherical and round, it does not follow that the earth on that side is bare of the mass of waters. And then, even if it is bare, it does not immediately follow that it has people on it.
	Quoniam nullo modo scriptura ista mentitur, quae narratis praeteritis facit fidem eo, quod eius praedicta conplentur, nimisque absurdum est, ut dicatur aliquos homines ex hac in illam partem, Oceani inmensitate traiecta, nauigare ac peruenire potuisse, ut etiam illic ex uno illo primo homine genus institueretur humanum. Quapropter inter illos tunc hominum populos, qui per septuaginta duas gentes et totidem linguas colliguntur fuisse diuisi, quaeramus, si possumus inuenire, illam in terris peregrinantem ciuitatem Dei, quae usque ad diluuium arcamque perducta est adque in filiis Noe per eorum benedictiones perseuerasse monstratur, maxime in maximo, qui est appellatus Sem, quando quidem Iapheth ita benedictus est, ut in eius, fratris sui, domibus habitaret.	For this Scripture in no way lies; it wins belief for its account of the past because its predictions are being fulfilled. And it is quite absurd to say that some people could have sailed from this side to that, crossing the immensity of the Ocean, and arrived there, so that a human race was established there too from that one first man. So let us look among those peoples of that time, who we gather were divided into seventy-two nations and as many languages, to see if we can find the city of God on its pilgrimage on earth. It was carried through to the flood and the ark, and is shown to have continued in the sons of Noah through their blessings—most of all in the eldest, who was named Shem, since Japheth was blessed in such a way that he would dwell in the houses of this brother of his.[26]

THE DESCENDANTS OF SHEM, IN WHOSE LINE THE ORDER OF THE CITY OF GOD IS DIRECTED TOWARD ABRAHAM

The line from Shem to Abraham is traced, with the years from the flood to Abraham.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.10	Tenenda est igitur series generationum ab ipso Sem, ut ipsa ostendat post diluuium ciuitatem Dei, sicut eam	We must therefore keep to the line of generations from Shem himself, so that it may show us the city

26 See Genesis 9:26–27.

LATIN

series generationum ab illo, qui est appellatus Seth, ostendebat ante diluuium. Propter hoc ergo scriptura diuina cum terrenam ciuitatem in Babylone, hoc est in confusione, monstrasset, ad patriarcham Sem recapitulando reuertitur et orditur inde generationes usque ad Abraham, commemorato etiam numero annorum, quanto quisque ad hanc seriem pertinentem filium genuisset quantoque uixisset. Ubi certe agnoscendum est, quod ante promiseram, ut appareat quare sit dictum de filiis Heber: Nomen unius Phalech, quia in diebus eius diuisa est terra. Quid enim aliud intellegendum est terram esse diuisam nisi diuersitate linguarum?

Omissis igitur ceteris filiis Sem ad hanc rem non pertinentibus illi conectuntur in ordine generationum, per quos possit ad Abraham perueniri; sicut illi conectebantur ante diluuium, per quos ueniretur ad Noe generationibus, quae propagatae sunt ex illo Adam filio, qui est appellatus Seth. Sic ergo incipit generationum ista contextio: Et hae generationes Sem. Sem filius centum annorum, cum genuit Arphaxat, secundo anno post diluuium. Et uixit Sem, postquam genuit Arphaxat, quingentos annos et genuit filios et filias et mortuus est.

Sic exsequitur ceteros dicens, quoto quisque anno uitae suae filium genuerit ad istum generationum ordinem pertinentem, qui pertendit ad Abraham, et quot annos postmodum uixerit, intimans eum filios filiasque genuisse; ut intellegamus unde potuerint populi adcrescere, ne in paucis qui commemorantur hominibus occupati pueriliter haesitemus, unde tanta spatia terrarum adque regnorum repleri potuerint de genere Sem, maxime propter Assyriorum regnum; unde Ninus ille Orientalium domitor usquequaque populorum ingenti prosperitate regnauit et latissimum ac fundatissimum regnum, quod diuturno tempore duceretur, suis posteris propagauit.

Sed nos, ne diutius quam opus est inmoremur, non quot annos quisque in ista generationum serie uixerit, sed of God after the flood, just as the line of generations from the one named Seth showed it before the flood. That is why divine Scripture, after showing the earthly city in Babylon—that is, in "confusion"—goes back by way of recapitulation to the patriarch Shem and traces the generations from him down to Abraham. It also records the number of years: how old each man was when he fathered the son belonging to this line, and how long he lived. Here we must certainly recognize what I promised earlier, so that it becomes clear why it was said of the sons of Eber, "The name of one was Peleg, because in his days the earth was divided." For what else are we to understand by the earth being divided but the diversity of languages?[27]

ENGLISH

So the other sons of Shem, who are not relevant to this matter, are left out, and those are linked in the order of generations through whom Abraham can be reached—just as before the flood those were linked through whom Noah was reached by the generations descended from the son of Adam named Seth. This, then, is how this chain of generations begins: "These are the generations of Shem. Shem was a hundred years old when he fathered Arphaxad, in the second year after the flood. And Shem lived five hundred years after he fathered Arphaxad, and fathered sons and daughters, and died."[28]

In the same way it goes through the others, saying in what year of his life each fathered the son belonging to this order of generations that extends to Abraham, and how many years he lived afterward, mentioning that he fathered sons and daughters. This is so that we may understand how the peoples could have grown, and not get stuck childishly on the few men who are mentioned, wondering how such great expanses of lands and kingdoms could have been filled from the race of Shem—especially because of the kingdom of the Assyrians. From it came the famous Ninus, conqueror of the peoples of the East far and wide, who reigned with immense success and handed down to his descendants a vast and well-founded kingdom, destined to last a long time.[29]

But to avoid dwelling on this longer than necessary, we record in this order not how many years

27 Genesis 10:25.
28 Genesis 11:10–11.

LATIN

quoto anno uitae suae genuerit filium, hoc ordine memorandum tantummodo ponimus, ut et numerum annorum a transacto diluuio usque ad Abraham colligamus et propter illa, in quibus nos cogit necessitas inmorari, breuiter alia cursimque tangamus.

Secundo igitur anno post diluuium Sem genuit Arphaxat; Arphaxat autem, cum esset centum triginta quinque annorum, genuit Cainan; qui cum esset centum triginta, genuit Sala; porro etiam ipse Sala totidem annorum erat, quando genuit Heber; centum uero et triginta et quattuor agebat annos Heber, cum genuit Phalech, in cuius diebus diuisa est terra; ipse autem Phalech uixit centum triginta, et genuit Ragau; et Ragau centum triginta duo, et genuit Seruch; et Seruch centum triginta, et genuit Nachor; et Nachor septuaginta nouem, et genuit Thara; Thara autem septuaginta, et genuit Abram; quem postea Deus mutato uocabulo nominauit Abraham. Fiunt itaque anni a diluuio usque ad Abraham mille septuaginta et duo secundum uulgatam editionem, hoc est interpretum septuaginta.

In Hebraeis autem codicibus longe pauciores annos perhibent inueniri, de quibus rationem aut nullam aut difficillimam reddunt.

Cum ergo quaerimus in illis septuaginta duabus gentibus ciuitatem Dei, non possumus adfirmare illo tempore, quo erat eis labium unum, id est loquella una, tunc iam genus humanum alienatum fuisse a cultu ueri Dei, ita ut in solis istis generationibus pietas uera remaneret, quae descendunt de semine Sem per Arphaxat et tendunt ad Abraham; sed ab illa superbia aedificandae turris usque in caelum, qua inpia significatur elatio, apparuit ciuitas, hoc est societas, inpiorum. Utrum itaque ante non fuerit an latuerit, an potius utraque permanserit, pia scilicet in duobus filiis Noe, qui benedicti sunt, eorumque posteris; inpia uero in eo, qui maledictus est, adque eius progenie, ubi etiam exortus est gigans uenator contra Dominum, non est diiudicatio facilis.

ENGLISH

each man in this line of generations lived, but only in what year of his life he fathered his son. In this way we can add up the number of years from the end of the flood to Abraham, and also touch briefly and in passing on other matters for the sake of those on which necessity compels us to dwell.

So in the second year after the flood Shem fathered Arphaxad. Arphaxad, when he was a hundred and thirty-five, fathered Cainan. Cainan, at a hundred and thirty, fathered Shelah. Shelah too was the same age when he fathered Eber. Eber was a hundred and thirty-four when he fathered Peleg, in whose days the earth was divided. Peleg himself lived a hundred and thirty years and fathered Reu; Reu, a hundred and thirty-two, and fathered Serug; Serug, a hundred and thirty, and fathered Nahor; Nahor, seventy-nine, and fathered Terah; Terah, seventy, and fathered Abram, whose name God later changed to Abraham. So the years from the flood to Abraham come to one thousand and seventy-two according to the common edition, that is, the edition of the Seventy translators.[30]

In the Hebrew manuscripts, however, far fewer years are said to be found, and for this they give either no explanation or a very difficult one.

So when we look for the city of God among those seventy-two nations, we cannot assert that at the time when they had one language, that is, one speech, the human race had already turned away from the worship of the true God, so that true piety survived only in these generations that descend from the seed of Shem through Arphaxad and lead to Abraham. But from the time of that pride in building a tower up to heaven, which signifies ungodly self-exaltation, a city—that is, a society—of the ungodly appeared. Whether it did not exist before or was hidden, or rather whether both cities continued—the godly one in the two sons of Noah who were blessed and in their descendants, and the ungodly one in the son who was cursed and in his offspring, from whom arose the giant who was a hunter against the Lord—is not easy to decide.

29 Ninus was the legendary founder of the Assyrian empire and of Nineveh.
30 The Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible traditionally ascribed to seventy (or seventy-two) translators.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Fortassis enim, quod profecto est credibilius, et in filiis duorum illorum iam tunc, antequam Babylonia coepisset institui, fuerunt contemtores Dei, et in filiis Cham cultores Dei; utrumque tamen hominum genus terris numquam defuisse credendum est. Si quidem et quando dictum est: Omnes declinauerunt, simul inutiles facti sunt; non est qui faciat bonum, non est usque ad unum, in utroque psalmo, ubi haec uerba sunt, et hoc legitur: Nonne cognoscent omnes, qui operantur iniquitatem, qui deuorant populum meum in cibo panis? Erat ergo etiam tunc populus Dei. Unde illud, quod dictum est: Non est qui faciat bonum, non est usque ad unum, de filiis hominum dictum est, non de filiis Dei.	For perhaps—and this is certainly more believable—even then, before Babylon began to be founded, there were despisers of God among the sons of those two, and worshipers of God among the sons of Ham. Yet we must believe that the earth has never lacked either kind of people. For when it was said, "All have turned aside, together they have become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one," in both psalms where these words occur we also read this: "Will not all who work iniquity come to know, those who devour my people as they eat bread?" So even then there was a people of God. Hence the words "There is no one who does good, not even one" were said of the sons of men, not of the sons of God.[31]
Nam praemissum est: Deus de caelo prospexit super filios hominum, ut uideret si est intellegens aut requirens Deum, ac deinde illa subiuncta, quae omnes filios hominum, id est, ad ciuitatem pertinentes, quae uiuit secundum hominem, non secundum Deum, reprobos esse demonstrant.	For it was said beforehand: "God looked down from heaven upon the sons of men, to see if there is anyone who understands or seeks God." Then come those words which show that all the sons of men—that is, those who belong to the city that lives according to man and not according to God—are reprobate.[32]

THAT THE ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF HUMANITY WAS THE ONE LATER CALLED HEBREW AFTER EBER, AND THAT IT REMAINED IN HIS FAMILY WHEN LANGUAGES WERE DIVIDED

The first common language survived in Eber's household and was later called Hebrew.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.11 Quam ob rem sicut lingua una cum esset omnium, non ideo filii pestilentiae defuerunt (nam et ante diluuium una erat lingua, et tamen omnes praeter unam Noe iusti domum deleri diluuio meruerunt): ita, quando merito elatioris inpietatis gentes linguarum diuersitate punitae adque diuisae sunt et ciuitas inpiorum confusionis nomen accepit, hoc est, appellata est Babylon, non defuit domus Heber, ubi ea quae antea fuit omnium lingua remaneret. Unde, sicut supra memoraui, cum coepissent enumerari filii Sem, qui singuli gentes singulas procrearunt, primus est commendatus Heber, cum sit abnepos ipsius, hoc est ab illo quintus inueniatur exortus. Quia ergo in eius familia remansit haec lingua, diuisis per alias linguas ceteris gentibus, quae lingua prius humano generi non inmerito creditur fuisse communis, ideo deinceps Hebraea est nuncupata.	Therefore, just as the sons of pestilence were not lacking when all people had one language (for before the flood, too, there was one language, and yet everyone except the single household of righteous Noah deserved to be wiped out by the flood), so, when the nations were punished for their more arrogant impiety by the diversity of languages and were divided, and the city of the ungodly received the name of confusion, that is, was called Babylon, the household of Eber was not lacking. In it the language that had formerly belonged to all could remain. This is why, as I mentioned above, when the list of Shem's sons began, each of whom founded a nation, Eber was singled out first, although he was Shem's great-great-grandson, that is, he is found to be fifth in descent from him. So, because this language remained in his family while the other nations were divided among other lan-

31 Psalm 13:3–4 (14:3–4 in most English Bibles); compare Psalm 52 (53).
32 Psalm 13:2 (14:2 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

guages, this language, which is believed, not without reason, to have been common to the human race before, was from then on called Hebrew.[33]

Tunc enim opus erat eam distingui ab aliis linguis nomine proprio, sicut aliae quoque uocatae sunt nominibus propriis. Quando autem erat una, nihil aliud quam humana lingua uel humana locutio uocabatur, qua sola uniuersum genus humanum loquebatur.

For at that point it needed to be distinguished from the other languages by a name of its own, just as the others were also called by names of their own. But when there was only one, it was called nothing other than the human language, or human speech, since it was the only one in which the whole human race spoke.

Dixerit aliquis: Si in diebus Phalech filii Heber diuisa est terra per linguas, id est homines, qui tunc erant in terra, ex eius nomine potius debuit appellari lingua illa, quae fuit omnibus ante communis. Sed intellegendum est ipsum Heber propterea tale nomen inposuisse filio suo, ut uocaretur Phalech, quod interpretatur diuisio, quia tunc ei natus est, quando per linguas terra diuisa est, id est ipso tempore, ut hoc sit quod dictum est: In diebus eius diuisa est terra. Nam nisi adhuc Heber uiueret quando linguarum facta est multitudo, non ex eius nomine nomen acciperet lingua, quae aput illum potuit permanere.

Someone might say: "If the earth was divided by languages in the days of Peleg, Eber's son (that is, the people then on the earth were divided), then the language that had previously been common to all should rather have been named after him." But we must understand that Eber gave his son the name Peleg, which means "division," precisely because the boy was born to him when the earth was divided by languages, that is, at that very time. This is the meaning of the words: "In his days the earth was divided." For if Eber had not still been alive when the multitude of languages came about, the language that was able to remain with him would not have taken its name from his.[34]

Et ideo credenda est ipsa fuisse prima illa communis, quoniam de poena uenit illa multiplicatio mutatioque linguarum et utique praeter hanc poenam esse debuit populus Dei. Nec frustra lingua haec est, quam tenuit Abraham, nec in omnes suos filios transmittere potuit, sed in eos tantum, qui propagati per Iacob et insignius adque eminentius in Dei populum coalescentes Dei testamenta et stirpem Christi habere potuerunt. Nec Heber ipse eandem linguam in uniuersam progeniem suam refudit, sed in eam tantum, cuius generationes perducuntur ad Abraham. Quapropter etiamsi non euidenter expressum est fuisse aliquod pium genus hominum, quando ab inpiis Babylonia condebatur, non ad hoc ualuit haec obscuritas, ut quaerentis fraudaretur, sed potius ut exerceretur intentio.

And so this must be believed to have been that first common language, since the multiplication and change of languages came as a punishment, and the people of God surely ought to have been exempt from this punishment. Nor is it without reason that this is the language Abraham kept. He could not pass it on to all his sons, but only to those who, descended through Jacob and growing together more conspicuously and prominently into the people of God, were able to have God's covenants and the lineage of Christ. Nor did Eber himself pour out this same language on all his descendants, but only on the line whose generations lead down to Abraham. Therefore, even if Scripture does not plainly state that there was some godly race of men when Babylon was being founded by the ungodly, this obscurity served not to cheat the inquirer's effort but rather to exercise it.

Cum enim legitur unam fuisse linguam primitus omnium et ante omnes filios Sem commendatur Heber, quamuis

For we read that originally there was one language for all. Eber is singled out before all the sons of 33 Eber (Latin Heber) is the ancestor from whose name Augustine derives "Hebrew" (Genesis 10:21–25). Babylon (Babel) was taken to mean "confusion" (Genesis 11:9).

34 Genesis 10:25.

LATIN

ex illo quintus oriatur, et Hebraea uocatur lingua, quam patriarcharum et prophetarum non solum in sermonibus suis, uerum etiam in litteris sacris custodiuit auctoritas: profecto, cum quaeritur in diuisione linguarum, ubi lingua illa remanere potuerit, quae fuit ante communis (quae sine ulla dubitatione ubi remansit, non ibi fuit illa poena, quae facta est mutatione linguarum), quid aliud occurrit, nisi quod in huius gente remanserit, a cuius nomine nomen accepit, et hoc iustitiae gentis huius non paruum apparuisse uestigium, quod, cum aliae gentes plecterentur mutatione linguarum, ad istam non peruenit tale supplicium?

Sed adhuc illud mouet, quo modo potuerunt singulas gentes facere Heber et filius eius Phalech, si una lingua permansit ambobus. Et certe una est Hebraea gens ex Heber propagata usque ad Abraham et per eum deinceps, donec magnus fieret populus Israel. Quo modo igitur omnes filii, qui commemorati sunt, trium filiorum Noe fecerunt singulas gentes, si Heber et Phalech singulas non fecerunt? Nimirum illud est probabilius, quod gigans ille Nebroth fecerit etiam ipse gentem suam, sed propter excellentiam dominationis et corporis seorsum eminentius nominatus est, ut maneat numerus septuaginta duarum gentium adque linguarum. Phalech autem propterea commemoratus est, non quod gentem fecerit (nam eadem ipsa est eius gens Hebraea eademque lingua), sed propter tempus insigne, quod in diebus eius terra diuisa sit.

Nec mouere nos debet, quo modo potuerit gigans Nebroth ad illud aetatis occurrere, quo Babylon condita est et confusio facta linguarum adque ex hoc diuisio gentium. Non enim quia Heber sextus est a Noe, ille autem quartus, ideo non potuerunt ad idem tempus conuenire uiuendo. Hoc enim contigit, cum plus uiuerent ubi pauciores sunt generationes, minus ubi plures; aut serius nati essent ubi pauciores, maturius ubi plures. Sane intellegendum est, quando terra diuisa est, non solum iam natos ceteros filios filiorum Noe, qui commemorantur patres gentium, sed etiam eius aetatis fuisse, ut numerosas familias haberent, quae dignae fuissent nominibus gentium. Unde nequaquam

ENGLISH

Shem, although he arose fifth from him. And the language is called Hebrew, the language that the authority of the patriarchs and prophets preserved not only in their speech but also in the sacred writings. So when we ask where, at the division of languages, the formerly common language could have remained (and wherever it remained, beyond any doubt, the punishment that came through the change of languages did not fall there), what else suggests itself? Surely it remained in the nation of the man from whose name it took its name. And this was no small trace of the righteousness of this nation: when other nations were struck by the change of languages, no such penalty reached it.

But one point still troubles us: how Eber and his son Peleg could each have founded a nation if one language remained for both. And certainly there is one Hebrew nation, descended from Eber down to Abraham and through him thereafter, until Israel became a great people. How, then, did all the listed sons of the three sons of Noah each found a nation, if Eber and Peleg did not each found one? The more probable explanation, surely, is that the giant Nimrod also founded his own nation. He was named separately and more prominently because of the eminence of his dominion and his body, so that the number of seventy-two nations and languages still holds. Peleg, on the other hand, was mentioned not because he founded a nation (for his nation is the very same Hebrew one, with the same language), but because of the notable time: in his days the earth was divided.[35]

Nor should it trouble us how the giant Nimrod could have lived to the time when Babylon was founded, when the confusion of languages took place and, as a result, the division of nations. Eber is sixth from Noah and Nimrod is fourth, but that does not mean they could not have been alive at the same time. This came about because people lived longer in the line where there are fewer generations and less long where there are more, or else those in the line with fewer generations were born later and those in the line with more were born earlier. Clearly we must understand that when the earth was divided, the other sons of Noah's sons, who are recorded as fathers of na-

35 Nimrod, "a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Genesis 10:8–9), whom Augustine's Latin Bible calls a giant.

LATIN	ENGLISH
putandum, quod eo fuerint ordine geniti, quo commemorati leguntur.	tions, were not only already born but were also old enough to have numerous families worthy of the names of nations. Hence we should by no means suppose that they were born in the order in which we read them listed.
Alioquin duodecim filii Iectan, qui erat alius filius Heber, frater Phalech, quo modo potuerunt iam gentes facere, si post Phalech fratrem suum Iectan natus est, sicut post eum commemoratus est; quando quidem tempore, quo natus est Phalech, diuisa est terra. Proinde intellegendum est priorem quidem nominatum, sed longe post fratrem suum Iectan fuisse natum, cuius Iectan duodecim filii tam grandes iam familias haberent, ut in linguas proprias diuidi possent. Sic enim potuit prior commemorari, qui erat aetate posterior, quem ad modum prius commemorati sunt ex tribus filiis Noe procreati filii Iapheth, qui erat minimus eorum; deinde filii Cham, qui erat medius; postremo filii Sem, qui erat primus et maximus.	Otherwise, how could the twelve sons of Joktan, another son of Eber and brother of Peleg, already have founded nations, if Joktan was born after his brother Peleg, as he is listed after him? After all, the earth was divided at the time Peleg was born. So we must understand that Peleg was indeed named first but was born long after his brother Joktan, whose twelve sons already had such large families that they could be divided into languages of their own. For the one who was younger could be mentioned first, just as, among the three sons of Noah, the sons of Japheth, the youngest of them, were listed first; then the sons of Ham, the middle one; and last the sons of Shem, the first and eldest.
Illarum autem gentium uocabula partim manserunt, ita ut hodieque appareat unde fuerint deriuata, sicut ex Assur Assyrii et ex Heber Hebraei; partim temporis uetustate mutata sunt, ita ut uix homines doctissimi antiquissimas historias perscrutantes, nec omnium, sed aliquarum ex istis origines gentium potuerint reperire. Nam quod ex filio Cham, qui uocabatur Mesraim, Aegyptii perhibentur exorti, nulla hic resonat origo uocabuli; sicut nec Aethiopum, qui dicuntur ad eum filium Cham pertinere, qui Chus appellatus est. Et si omnia considerentur, plura mutata quam manentia nomina apparent.	Some of the names of those nations have remained, so that even today one can see where they came from, as the Assyrians from Asshur and the Hebrews from Eber. Others have changed over the long course of time, so that even the most learned men, searching the most ancient histories, have barely been able to find the origins, not of all these nations, but of some of them. When the Egyptians are said to have sprung from Ham's son called Mizraim, for example, no echo of the original name sounds here. Nor does one sound in the case of the Ethiopians, who are said to belong to Ham's son named Cush. And if everything is considered, more names appear to have changed than to have remained.

THE POINT IN TIME AT ABRAHAM, FROM WHOM A NEW ORDER OF HOLY SUCCESSION IS TRACED

With Abraham the city of God becomes clearer; Terah's household alone kept true worship.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.12 Nunc iam uideamus procursum ciuitatis Dei etiam ab illo articulo temporis, qui factus est in patre Abraham, unde incipit esse notitia eius euidentior, et ubi clariora leguntur promissa diuina, quae nunc in Christo uidemus inpleri. Sicut ergo scriptura sancta indicante didicimus, in regione Chaldaeorum natus est Abraham, quae terra ad regnum Assyrium pertinebat. Aput Chaldaeos autem iam etiam tunc superstitiones inpiae praeualebant, quem ad modum per ceteras gentes.	Let us now look at the progress of the city of God from the juncture of time marked by our father Abraham. From there our knowledge of it begins to be clearer, and there we read plainer divine promises, which we now see fulfilled in Christ. As we have learned, then, from holy Scripture, Abraham was born in the region of the Chaldeans, a land that belonged to the Assyrian kingdom. And among the Chaldeans, even then, ungodly superstitions prevailed, as they did among the other nations.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Una igitur Tharae domus erat, de quo natus est Abraham, in qua unius ueri Dei cultus et, quantum credibile est, in qua iam sola etiam Hebraea lingua remanserat (quamuis et ipse, sicut iam manifestior Dei populus in Aegypto, ita in Mesopotamia seruisse dis alienis Iesu Naue narrante referatur) ceteris ex progenie illius Heber in linguas paulatim alias et in nationes alias defluentibus. Proinde sicut per aquarum diluuium una domus Noe remanserat ad reparandum genus humanum, sic in diluuio multarum superstitionum per uniuersum mundum una remanserat domus Tharae, in qua custodita est plantatio ciuitatis Dei.	There was, therefore, only one household, that of Terah, Abraham's father, in which the worship of the one true God had remained. In it alone, so far as can be believed, the Hebrew language had also survived by then, while the rest of Eber's descendants were gradually drifting away into other languages and other nations. (Terah himself, however, is reported by Joshua son of Nun to have served foreign gods in Mesopotamia, just as the people of God, by then more clearly identified, did in Egypt.) So, just as in the flood of waters the one household of Noah had remained to restore the human race, so in the flood of many superstitions throughout the whole world the one household of Terah had remained, and in it the seedling of the city of God was preserved.[36]
Denique sicut illic enumeratis supra generationibus usque ad Noe simul cum annorum numeris et exposita diluuii causa, priusquam Deus inciperet de arca fabricanda loqui ad Noe, dicitur: Hae autem generationes Noe: ita et hic enumeratis generationibus ab illo, qui est appellatus Sem, filio Noe, usque ad Abraham, deinde insignis articulus similiter ponitur ut dicatur: Hae sunt generationes Tharae. Thara genuit Abram et Nachor et Arran, et Arran genuit Loth. Et mortuus est Arran coram Thara patre suo in terra in qua natus est, in regione Chaldaeorum. Et sumsit Abram et Nachor sibi uxores; nomen mulieris Abram Sara et nomen mulieris Nachor Melcha, filia Arran. Iste Arran pater Melchae fuit et pater Iescae, quae Iesca creditur ipsa esse etiam Sarra uxor Abrahae.	Earlier, after the generations down to Noah had been listed with their numbers of years and the cause of the flood had been explained, Scripture says, before God began to speak to Noah about building the ark: "These are the generations of Noah." Here, likewise, after the generations from Noah's son, the one called Shem, down to Abraham have been listed, a notable juncture is marked in the same way, with the words: "These are the generations of Terah. Terah fathered Abram and Nahor and Haran, and Haran fathered Lot. And Haran died in the presence of his father Terah in the land in which he was born, in the region of the Chaldeans. And Abram and Nahor took wives for themselves. The name of Abram's wife was Sarai, and the name of Nahor's wife was Milcah, daughter of Haran." This Haran was the father of Milcah and the father of Iscah, and this Iscah is believed to be the same as Sarah, Abraham's wife.[37]

WHY NO MENTION IS MADE OF NAHOR, SON OF TERAH, WHEN TERAH LEFT THE CHALDEANS AND MOVED TO MESOPOTAMIA

Nahor is left out of the move to Haran, probably because he had lapsed into Chaldean superstition.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.13 Deinde narratur quem ad modum Thara cum suis regionem reliquerit Chaldaeorum et uenerit in	Next it is told how Terah left the region of the Chaldeans with his family, came into Mesopot-

36 Joshua 24:2.
37 Genesis 6:9 and 11:27–29. Before God renamed them (16.28), Abraham and Sarah were called Abram and Sarai.

LATIN

Mesopotamiam et habitauerit in Charra. Tacetur autem de uno eius filio, qui uocabatur Nachor, tamquam eum non duxerit secum. Nam ita narratur: Et sumsit Thara Abram filium suum et Loth filium Arran, filium filii sui, et Saram nurum suam uxorem Abram filii sui, et eduxit illos de regione Chaldaeorum ire in terram Chanaan; et uenit in Charran et habitauit ibi. Nusquam hic nominatus est Nachor et uxor eius Melcha. Sed inuenimus postea, cum seruum suum mitteret Abraham ad accipiendam uxorem filio suo Isaac, ita scriptum: Et accepit puer decem camelos de camelis domini sui et de omnibus bonis domini sui secum, et exsurgens profectus est in Mesopotamiam in ciuitatem Nachor.

Isto et aliis sacrae huius historiae testimoniis ostenditur etiam Nachor frater Abrahae exisse de regione Chaldaeorum sedesque constituisse in Mesopotamia, ubi cum patre suo habitauerat Abraham. Quur ergo eum scriptura non commemorauit, quando ex gente Chaldaea cum suis profectus est Thara et habitauit in Mesopotamia; ubi non solum Abraham filius eius, uerum etiam Sarra nurus et Loth nepos eius commemorantur, quod eos duxerit secum? Quur, putamus, nisi forte quod a paterna et fraterna pietate desciuerat et superstitioni adhaeserat Chaldaeorum et postea inde siue paenitendo siue persecutionem passus, quod suspectus haberetur, et ipse emigrauit?

In libro enim qui inscribitur Iudith, cum quaereret Holofernes, hostis Israelitarum, quaenam illa gens esset, utrum aduersus eam bellandum fuisset, sic ei respondit Achior dux Ammanitarum: Audiat dominus noster uerbum de ore pueri sui, et referam tibi ueritatem de populo, qui habitat iuxta te montanam hanc, et non exibit mendacium de ore serui tui. Haec enim progenies populi est Chaldaeorum, et antea habitauerunt Mesopotamiam, quia noluerunt sequi deos patrum suorum, qui fuerunt in terra Chaldaeorum gloriosi, sed declinauerunt de uia parentum suorum et adorauerunt Deum caeli, quem cognouerunt, et proiecerunt eos a facie deorum suorum et fugerunt Mesopotamiam et habitauerunt ibi dies multos.

ENGLISH

amia and settled in Haran. Nothing is said, however, of one of his sons, named Nahor, as if Terah had not taken him along. For the account runs thus: "And Terah took Abram his son and Lot the son of Haran, his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, the wife of his son Abram, and led them out of the region of the Chaldeans to go into the land of Canaan. And he came to Haran and settled there." Nahor and his wife Milcah are not named anywhere here. But later, when Abraham sent his servant to get a wife for his son Isaac, we find this written: "And the servant took ten camels from his master's camels, and some of all his master's goods with him, and he rose and set out for Mesopotamia, to the city of Nahor."[38]

This and other testimonies of this sacred history show that Nahor, Abraham's brother, also left the region of the Chaldeans and settled in Mesopotamia, where Abraham had lived with his father. Why, then, did Scripture not mention him when Terah set out from the Chaldean nation with his family and settled in Mesopotamia? There it mentions not only his son Abraham but also his daughter-in-law Sarah and his grandson Lot as having been taken with him. Why, do we suppose, unless perhaps because Nahor had fallen away from the godliness of his father and brother and attached himself to the superstition of the Chaldeans? Afterward he emigrated too, either out of repentance or because he was suspected and suffered persecution.

For in the book entitled Judith, when Holofernes, the enemy of the Israelites, asked what nation that was and whether he should make war on it, Achior, the leader of the Ammonites, answered him: "Let my lord hear a word from the mouth of his servant, and I will tell you the truth about the people who live near you in this hill country, and no lie will come out of your servant's mouth. For this race is descended from the people of the Chaldeans, and formerly they lived in Mesopotamia, because they would not follow the gods of their fathers, who were glorious in the land of the Chaldeans. Instead, they turned aside from the way of their ancestors and worshiped the God of heaven, whom they had come to know. And the Chaldeans cast them out from the presence of 38 Genesis 11:31 and 24:10. The city of Haran (Latin Charra) is distinct from Terah's son Haran (Latin Arran).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		their gods, and they fled to Mesopotamia and lived there many days.[39]
	Dixitque illis Deus eorum, ut exirent de habitatione sua et irent in terram Chanaan, et illic habitauerunt, et cetera, quae narrat Achior Ammanites. Unde manifestum est domum Tharae persecutionem passam fuisse a Chaldaeis pro uera pietate, qua unus et uerus ab eis colebatur Deus.	And their God told them to leave their dwelling place and go into the land of Canaan, and they lived there," and so on, as Achior the Ammonite tells it. From this it is clear that the household of Terah suffered persecution from the Chaldeans for the true godliness with which they worshiped the one true God.

THE YEARS OF TERAH, WHO COMPLETED HIS LIFE IN HARAN

Terah lived two hundred and five years and completed his life in Haran.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.14	Defuncto autem Thara in Mesopotamia, ubi uixisse perhibetur ducentos et quinque annos, iam incipiunt indicari factae ad Abraham promissiones Dei, quod ita scriptum est: Et fuerunt dies Tharae in Charra quinque et ducenti anni, et mortuus est Thara in Charra. Non sic autem accipiendum est, quasi omnes hos dies ibi egerit, sed quia omnes dies uitae suae, qui fuerunt anni ducenti quinque, ibi conpleuerit; alioquin nescietur quot annos uixerit Thara, quoniam non legitur quoto anno uitae suae in Charran uenerit; et absurdum est existimare in ista serie generationum, ubi diligenter commemoratur quot annos quisque uixerit, huius solius numerum annorum uitae non commendatum esse memoriae.	Terah died in Mesopotamia, where he is said to have lived two hundred and five years, and after his death Scripture begins to set out the promises God made to Abraham. It is written thus: "And the days of Terah in Haran were two hundred and five years, and Terah died in Haran." This is not to be taken to mean that he spent all these days there, but that he completed there all the days of his life, which came to two hundred and five years. Otherwise we would not know how many years Terah lived, since we do not read in what year of his life he came to Haran. And it is absurd to suppose that in this series of generations, where the number of years each man lived is carefully recorded, the number of years of this one man's life alone was not committed to memory.[40]
	Quod enim quorundam, quos eadem scriptura commemorat, tacentur anni, non sunt in hoc ordine, in quo temporum dinumeratio decessione gignentium et genitorum successione contexitur, iste autem ordo, qui dirigitur ab Adam usque ad Noe et inde usque ad Abraham, sine numero annorum uitae suae neminem continet.	For some people mentioned by the same Scripture have their years passed over in silence, but they are not in this line, in which the reckoning of time is woven together from the passing of fathers and the succession of sons. This line, running from Adam to Noah and from there to Abraham, contains no one without the number of years of his life.

THE TIME OF ABRAHAM'S DEPARTURE, WHEN AT GOD'S COMMAND HE LEFT HARAN

Abraham left Haran at seventy-five, while his father was still alive; Stephen's account agrees.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.15	Quod uero commemorata morte Tharae, patris Abraham, deinde legitur: Et dixit Dominus ad Abram: Exi de terra	After the death of Terah, Abraham's father, has been recorded, we then read: "And the Lord said to 39 Judith 5:5–9 in Augustine's Latin Bible. Holofernes is the Assyrian general whose siege of an Israelite town is the subject of the book.

40 Genesis 11:32.

LATIN

tua et de cognatione tua et de domo patris tui et cetera, non, quia hoc sequitur in sermone libri, hoc etiam in rerum gestarum tempore sequi existimandum est. Erit quippe, si ita est, insolubilis quaestio. Post haec enim uerba Dei, quae ad Abraham facta sunt, scriptura sic loquitur: Et exiit Abram, quem ad modum locutus est ei Dominus, et abiit cum eo Loth. Abram autem erat quinque et septuaginta annorum, cum exiit ex Charra. Quo modo potest hoc esse uerum, si post mortem patris sui exiit de Charra?

Cum enim esset Thara septuaginta annorum, sicut supra intimatum est, genuit Abraham; cui numero additis septuaginta quinque annis, quos agebat Abraham, quando egressus est de Charra, fiunt anni centum quadraginta quinque. Tot igitur annorum erat Thara, quando exiit Abraham de illa Mesopotamiae ciuitate; agebat enim annum aetatis suae septuagensimum quintum, ac per hoc pater eius, qui eum septuagensimo anno suo genuerat, agebat, ut dictum est, centensimum quadragensimum et quintum. Non ergo inde post mortem patris, id est post ducentos quinque annos, quibus pater eius uixit, egressus est; sed annus de illo loco profectionis eius, quoniam ipsius septuagensimus quintus erat, procul dubio patris eius, qui eum septuagensimo suo anno genuerat, centensimus quadragensimus quintus fuisse colligitur.

Ac per hoc intellegendum est more suo scripturam redisse ad tempus, quod iam narratio illa transierat; sicut superius, cum filios filiorum Noe commemorasset, dixit illos fuisse in linguis et gentibus suis, et tamen postea, quasi hoc etiam in ordine temporum sequeretur: Et erat, inquit, omnis terra labium unum et uox una omnibus. Quo modo ergo secundum suas gentes et secundum suas linguas erant, si una erat omnibus, nisi quia ad illud quod iam transierat recapitulando est reuersa narratio?

Sic ergo et hic cum dictum esset: Et fuerunt dies Tharae in Charra quinque et ducenti anni, et mortuus est Thara in Charra, deinde scriptura redeundo ad id, quod ideo praetermiserat, ut prius de Thara id quod incohatum fuerat conpleretur: Et dixit, inquit, Dominus ad Abram: Exi de terra tua et cetera. Post quae Dei uerba subiungitur: Et exiit Abram, quem ad modum locutus est

ENGLISH

Abram: 'Leave your country and your kindred and your father's house,'" and so on. But we must not suppose that, because this follows in the text of the book, it also followed in the time of the events. If that were so, the problem would be insoluble. For after these words of God addressed to Abraham, Scripture says: "And Abram went out, as the Lord had told him, and Lot went with him. Abram was seventy-five years old when he went out from Haran." How can this be true if he left Haran after his father's death?[41]

For Terah was seventy years old when he fathered Abraham, as was indicated above. Add to this number the seventy-five years Abraham had when he left Haran, and the total is one hundred and forty-five. Terah, then, was that old when Abraham left that city of Mesopotamia. Abraham was in his seventy-fifth year, and therefore his father, who had fathered him in his own seventieth year, was, as has been said, in his hundred and forty-fifth. So Abraham did not leave there after his father's death, that is, after the two hundred and five years his father lived. Rather, the year of his departure from that place was his own seventy-fifth, and so it is beyond doubt that it was the hundred and forty-fifth of his father, who had fathered him in his seventieth year.

So we must understand that Scripture, as is its custom, went back to a time that the narrative had already passed. Earlier, in the same way, after mentioning the sons of Noah's sons, it said that they were in their languages and nations. Yet afterward, as though this also followed in the order of time, it says: "And the whole earth was one lip, and there was one speech for all." How, then, were they divided according to their nations and according to their languages, if there was one language for all? Only because the narrative went back to recapitulate what it had already passed.[42]

So here, too, Scripture first says: "And the days of Terah in Haran were two hundred and five years, and Terah died in Haran." It had passed over the next event so as to finish what it had begun about Terah, and now it goes back to it and says: "And the Lord said to Abram: 'Leave your country,'" and so on. After these words of God it adds: "And Ab-illi Dominus, et abiit cum eo Loth. Abram autem erat quinque et septuaginta annorum, cum exiit ex Charra. Tunc itaque factum est, quando pater eius centensimum quadragensimum et quintum annum agebat aetatis; tunc enim fuit huius septuagensimus quintus.

41 Genesis 12:1 and 12:4.
42 Genesis 10:31 and 11:1.

LATIN

Soluta est autem ista quaestio et aliter, ut septuaginta quinque anni Abrahae, quando egressus est de Charra, ex illo conputarentur, ex quo de igne Chaldaeorum liberatus, non ex quo natus est, tamquam tunc potius natus habendus sit.

Sed beatus Stephanus in actibus apostolorum cum ista narraret: Deus, inquit, gloriae apparuit Abrahae patri nostro, cum esset in Mesopotamia, priusquam habitaret in Charra, et ait ad illum: Exi de terra tua et de cognatione tua et de domo patris tui, et ueni in terram, quam tibi demonstrabo. Secundum haec uerba Stephani non post mortem patris eius locutus est Deus Abrahae, qui utique in Charra mortuus est, ubi cum illo et ipse filius habitauit, sed priusquam habitaret in eadem ciuitate, iam tamen cum esset in Mesopotamia. Iam ergo exierat a Chaldaeis.

Quod itaque adiungit Stephanus: Tunc Abraham egressus est de terra Chaldaeorum et habitauit in Charra, non quid sit factum, postea quam locutus est illi Deus (neque enim post illa Dei uerba egressus est de terra Chaldaeorum, cum dicat ei locutum Deum cum esset, in Mesopotamia), sed ad totum illud tempus pertinet quod ait: Tunc, id est, ex quo egressus est a Chaldaeis et habitauit in Charra. Item quod sequitur: Et inde postquam mortuus est pater eius, conlocauit illum in terra hac, in qua uos nunc habitatis et patres uestri, non ait: Postquam mortuus est pater eius, exiit de Charra; sed: Inde hic eum conlocauit, postquam mortuus est pater eius.

Intellegendum est igitur locutum Deum fuisse ad Abraham, cum esset in Mesopotamia, priusquam habitaret in Charra; sed eum in Charram peruenisse cum patre, retento aput se praecepto Dei, et inde exisse septuagensimo et quinto suo, patris autem sui centensimo quadragensimo et quinto anno.

ENGLISH

ram went out, as the Lord had told him, and Lot went with him. Abram was seventy-five years old when he went out from Haran." So this happened when his father was in his hundred and forty-fifth year of age, for that was Abraham's seventy-fifth.

This problem has also been solved in another way. On this view, Abraham's seventy-five years when he left Haran are counted from the time he was delivered from the fire of the Chaldeans, not from his birth, as if he should be regarded as having been born at that point instead.[43]

But blessed Stephen, when telling these events in the Acts of the Apostles, says: "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran, and said to him: 'Leave your country and your kindred and your father's house, and come into the land that I will show you.'" According to these words of Stephen, God did not speak to Abraham after the death of his father, who certainly died in Haran, where his son lived with him. He spoke to him before he lived in that city, although he was already in Mesopotamia. So Abraham had already left the Chaldeans.[44]

So when Stephen adds, "Then Abraham went out from the land of the Chaldeans and lived in Haran," he is not saying what happened after God spoke to him. For Abraham did not leave the land of the Chaldeans after those words of God, since Stephen says that God spoke to him when he was in Mesopotamia. Rather, the word "Then" refers to that whole period, that is, from the time he left the Chaldeans and lived in Haran. Likewise, in what follows, "And from there, after his father died, he settled him in this land in which you and your fathers now live," Stephen does not say, "After his father died, he left Haran," but, "From there he settled him here, after his father died."[45]

We must understand, therefore, that God spoke to Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran. Abraham then came to Haran with his father, keeping God's command to himself, and left from there in his own seventy-fifth year, his father's hundred and forty-fifth. Stephen says that 43 A Jewish tradition read "Ur of the Chaldeans" as "the fire of the Chaldeans" (Hebrew ur, "fire") and told of Abraham's rescue from a furnace.

44 Acts 7:2–3.
45 Acts 7:4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Conlocationem uero eius in terra Chanaan, non profectionem de Charra post mortem patris eius factam esse dicit, quia iam mortuus erat pater eius, quando emit terram, cuius ibi iam suae rei coepit esse possessor. Quod autem iam in Mesopotamia constituto, hoc est iam egresso de terra Chaldaeorum, dicit Deus: Exi de terra tua et de cognatione tua et de domo patris tui, non ut corpus inde eiceret, quod iam fecerat, sed ut animum auelleret, dicitur.	it was his settlement in the land of Canaan, not his departure from Haran, that took place after his father's death, because his father was already dead when Abraham bought land there and began to own it as his own property. When Abraham was already established in Mesopotamia, that is, had already left the land of the Chaldeans, God said to him: "Leave your country and your kindred and your father's house." This was said not so that he should remove his body from there, which he had already done, but so that he should tear his mind away.
Non enim exierat inde animo, si spe redeundi et desiderio tenebatur, quae spes et desiderium Deo iubente ac iuuante et illo oboediente fuerat amputandum. Non sane incredibiliter existimatur, cum postea secutus esset Nachor patrem suum, tunc Abraham praeceptum Domini inplesse, ut cum Sarra coniuge sua et Loth filio fratris sui exiret de Charra.	For he had not left there in his mind if he was still held by the hope of returning and by longing for it. That hope and that longing had to be cut off, by God's command and help and by Abraham's obedience. It is certainly not incredible to suppose that, after Nahor later followed his father, Abraham then fulfilled the Lord's command to leave Haran with his wife Sarah and his brother's son Lot.

THE ORDER AND NATURE OF GOD'S PROMISES MADE TO ABRAHAM

God promised Abraham two things: the land of Canaan for his seed, and blessing for all nations.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.16 Iam considerandae sunt promissiones Dei factae ad Abraham. In his enim apertiora Dei nostri, hoc est Dei ueri, oracula apparere coeperunt de populo piorum, quem prophetica praenuntiauit auctoritas. Harum prima ita legitur: Et dixit Dominus ad Abram: Exi de terra tua et de cognatione tua et de domo patris tui in terram, quam tibi demonstrauero; et faciam te in gentem magnam et benedicam te et magnificabo nomen tuum, et eris benedictus, et benedicam benedicentes te et maledicentes te maledicam, et benedicentur in te omnes tribus terrae.	Now we must consider the promises God made to Abraham. For in them clearer oracles of our God, that is, of the true God, began to appear concerning the people of the godly, whom prophetic authority foretold. The first of these reads as follows: "And the Lord said to Abram: 'Go out from your land and from your kindred and from your father's house into the land that I will show you; and I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you and make your name great, and you shall be blessed; and I will bless those who bless you, and those who curse you I will curse; and in you all the tribes of the earth shall be blessed.'"[46]
Aduertendum est igitur duas res promissas Abrahae; unam scilicet, quod terram Chanaan possessurum fuerat semen eius, quod significatur, ubi dictum est: Vade in terram, quam tibi demonstrauero, et faciam te in gentem magnam; aliam uero longe praestantiorem non de carnali, sed de spiritali semine, per quod pater est non unius gentis Israeliticae, sed omnium gentium, quae fidei eius uestigia consequuntur, quod promitti coepit his uerbis: Et benedicentur in te omnes tribus terrae. Hanc	We should note, then, that two things were promised to Abraham. One was that his seed would possess the land of Canaan. This is signified where it is said: "Go into the land that I will show you, and I will make of you a great nation." The other, far more excellent, concerns not the carnal but the spiritual seed, through which he is the father not of the one nation of Israel but of all the nations that follow in the footsteps of his faith. This prom-

46 Genesis 12:1–3.

LATIN	ENGLISH
promissionem factam arbitratur Eusebius septuagensimo quinto anno aetatis Abrahae, tamquam mox ut facta est de Charra exierit Abraham; quoniam scripturae contradici non potest, ubi legitur: Abraham erat quinque et septuaginta annorum, cum exiit ex Charra. Sed si eo anno facta est ista promissio, iam utique in Charra cum patre suo demorabatur Abraham.	ise began to be made in these words: "And in you all the tribes of the earth shall be blessed." Eusebius thinks this promise was made in the seventy-fifth year of Abraham's life, as though Abraham left Haran as soon as it was made, since Scripture cannot be contradicted where we read: "Abraham was seventy-five years old when he left Haran." But if this promise was made in that year, then Abraham was certainly already living in Haran with his father.[47]
Neque enim exire inde posset, nisi prius ibi habitasset. Numquidnam ergo contradicitur Stephano dicenti: Deus gloriae apparuit Abrahae patri nostro, cum esset in Mesopotamia, priusquam habitaret in Charra? Sed intellegendum est, quod eodem anno facta sint omnia, et Dei promissio, antequam in Charra habitaret Abraham, et in Charra habitatio eius et inde profectio; non solum quia Eusebius in chronicis ab anno huius promissionis conputat et ostendit post quadringentos et triginta annos exitum esse de Aegypto, quando lex data est, uerum etiam quia id commemorat apostolus Paulus.	For he could not have left it unless he had first lived there. Is Stephen, then, contradicted when he says: "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran"? But we must understand that everything happened in the same year: God's promise before Abraham lived in Haran, his stay in Haran, and his departure from there. We know this not only because Eusebius in his chronicles counts from the year of this promise and shows that the exodus from Egypt, when the law was given, came four hundred and thirty years later, but also because the apostle Paul mentions it.[48]

THE THREE OUTSTANDING KINGDOMS OF THE NATIONS, ONE OF WHICH, THE ASSYRIAN, WAS ALREADY PREEMINENT WHEN ABRAHAM WAS BORN

In Abraham's time the Sicyonian, Egyptian and Assyrian kingdoms flourished; Assyria under Ninus was supreme.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.17 Per idem tempus eminentia regna erant gentium, in quibus terrigenarum ciuitas, hoc est societas hominum secundum.. hominem uiuentium, sub dominatu angelorum desertorum insignius excellebat, regna uidelicet tria, Sicyoniorum, Aegyptiorum, Assyriorum. Sed Assyriorum multo erat potentius adque sublimius. Nam rex ille Ninus Beli filius excepta India uniuersae Asiae populos subiugauerat. Asiam nunc dico non illam partem quae huius maioris Asiae una prouincia est, sed eam quae uniuersa Asia nuncupatur, quam quidam in altera duarum, plerique autem in tertia totius orbis parte posuerunt, ut sint omnes Asia, Europa et Africa; quod non aequali diuisione fecerunt. Namque ista, quae Asia nuncupatur, a meridie per orientem usque ad septentrionem peruenit; Europa uero a septentrione usque ad occidentem, adque inde Africa ab occidente usque ad meridiem.	In that same period there were eminent kingdoms of the nations, in which the city of the earth-born —that is, the fellowship of people who live according to man—stood out most conspicuously under the dominion of the angels who had deserted God. These were three kingdoms: those of the Sicyonians, the Egyptians, and the Assyrians. But the kingdom of the Assyrians was far more powerful and exalted. For the famous king Ninus, son of Belus, had subjugated the peoples of all Asia except India. By Asia I now mean not that part which is one province of this greater Asia, but what is called Asia as a whole. Some have placed it as one of two parts of the whole world, but most as one of three, so that the parts altogether are Asia, Europe, and Africa—though they did not make the 47 Eusebius of Caesarea (c. AD 260–339), church historian, whose Chronicle Augustine follows for biblical and world dates. The quotation is Genesis 12:4.

48 Acts 7:2.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	division equal. For the part called Asia reaches from the south through the east to the north; Europe from the north to the west; and Africa from there, from the west to the south.[49]
Unde uidentur orbem dimidium duae tenere, Europa et Africa, alium uero dimidium sola Asia. Sed ideo illae duae partes factae sunt, quia inter utramque ab Oceano ingreditur, quidquid aquarum terras interluit; et hoc mare magnum nobis facit. Quapropter si in duas partes orbem diuidas, Orientis et Occidentis, Asia erit in una, in altera uero Europa et Africa. Quam ob rem trium regnorum, quae tunc praecellebant, Sicyoniorum non erat sub Assyriis, quia in Europa sunt; Aegyptiorum autem quo modo eis non subiacebat, a quibus tota Asia tenebatur, solis Indis, ut perhibetur, exceptis? In Assyria igitur praeualuerat dominatus inpiae ciuitatis; huius caput erat illa Babylon, cuius terrigenae ciuitatis nomen aptissimum est, id est confusio.	So it seems that two, Europe and Africa, hold half the world, and Asia alone the other half. But those two have been made separate parts because between them flows in from the Ocean all the water that runs among the lands, and this forms for us the Great Sea. Therefore, if you divide the world into two parts, East and West, Asia will be in one, and Europe and Africa in the other. So of the three kingdoms that then excelled, that of the Sicyonians was not under the Assyrians, since it lies in Europe. But how could that of the Egyptians not be subject to those who held all Asia, with only the Indians, as is reported, excepted? In Assyria, therefore, the dominion of the ungodly city had prevailed. Its capital was that Babylon whose name, meaning "confusion," is most fitting for the earth-born city.[50]
Ibi iam Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnauerat sexaginta quinque annos. Filius uero eius Ninus, qui defuncto patri successit in regnum, quinquaginta duos regnauit annos, et habebat in regno quadraginta tres, quando natus est Abraham, qui erat annus circiter millensimus ducentensimus ante conditam Romam, ueluti alteram in occidente Babyloniam.	There Ninus was already reigning after the death of his father Belus, who had been the first to reign there, for sixty-five years. His son Ninus, who succeeded his father on the throne after his death, reigned fifty-two years, and was in the forty-third year of his reign when Abraham was born. That was about the twelve hundredth year before the founding of Rome, which is, as it were, a second Babylon in the west.

GOD'S SECOND ADDRESS TO ABRAHAM, IN WHICH THE LAND OF CANAAN IS PROMISED TO HIM AND HIS OFFSPRING

At Shechem God promises the land to Abraham's seed according to the flesh.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.18 Egressus ergo Abraham de Charra septuagensimo quinto anno aetatis suae, centensimo autem quadragensimo et quinto patris sui, cum Loth filio fratris et Sarra coniuge perrexit in terram Chanaan et peruenit usque ad Sichem, ubi rursus diuinum accepit oraculum, de quo ita scriptum est: Et apparuit Dominus Abrahae, et dixit illi: Semini tuo dabo terram hanc. Nihil hic de illo semine dictum est, in quo pater factus est omnium gentium, sed de illo solo, de quo pater est unius Israeliticae gentis; ab hoc enim semine terra illa possessa est.	So Abraham left Haran in the seventy-fifth year of his life and the hundred and forty-fifth of his father's, and went on with Lot, his brother's son, and Sarah his wife into the land of Canaan. He came as far as Shechem, where he again received a divine oracle, of which it is written: "And the Lord appeared to Abraham and said to him: 'To your seed I will give this land.'" Nothing is said here about that seed through which he was made the father of 49 Sicyon was a city in the northern Peloponnese whose list of kings ancient chronographers counted among the oldest. Ninus was the legendary founder of the Assyrian empire, son of Belus.

50 The Great Sea is the Mediterranean.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		all nations, but only about the seed through which he is the father of the one nation of Israel; for it was by this seed that that land was possessed.[51]

SARAH'S CHASTITY, PROTECTED BY GOD IN EGYPT, WHEN ABRAHAM HAD SAID SHE WAS NOT HIS WIFE BUT HIS SISTER

In Egypt Abraham calls Sarah his sister, and God protects her from Pharaoh.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.19	Deinde aedificato ibi altari et inuocato Deo Abraham profectus est inde et habitauit in eremo adque inde ire in Aegyptum famis necessitate conpulsus est. Ubi uxorem suam dixit sororem, nihil mentitus; erat enim et hoc, quia propinqua erat sanguine; sicut etiam Loth eadem propinquitate, cum fratris eius esset filius, frater eius est dictus. Itaque uxorem tacuit, non negauit, coniugis tuendam pudicitiam committens Deo et humanas insidias cauens ut homo; quoniam, si periculum quantum caueri poterat non caueret, magis tentaret Deum, quam speraret in Deum. De qua re contra calumniantem Faustum Manichaeum satis diximus. Denique factum est, quod de Domino praesumsit Abraham. Nam Pharao rex Aegypti, qui eam sibi uxorem acceperat, grauiter adflictus marito reddidit.	Then, having built an altar there and called upon God, Abraham set out from there and lived in the desert, and from there he was forced by the pressure of famine to go into Egypt. There he called his wife his sister, without telling any lie; for she was that too, since she was a close blood relative—just as Lot, by the same kind of kinship, being his brother's son, is called his brother. So he kept silent that she was his wife, but did not deny it. He entrusted the protection of his wife's chastity to God, while as a man he guarded against human treachery; for if he had not guarded against the danger as far as it could be guarded against, he would have been tempting God rather than hoping in God. I have said enough about this matter in reply to the slanders of Faustus the Manichaean. In the end, what Abraham had presumed of the Lord came to pass. For Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who had taken her as his wife, was severely afflicted and gave her back to her husband.[52]
	Ubi absit ut credamus alieno concubitu fuisse pollutam, quia multo est credibilius, hoc Pharaonem facere adflictionibus magnis non fuisse permissum.	Far be it from us to believe that she was defiled here by intercourse with another man; for it is much more credible that Pharaoh was prevented from doing this by great afflictions.

THE PARTING OF LOT AND ABRAHAM, AGREED ON WITH THEIR LOVE UNBROKEN

Abraham and Lot part peacefully, and the elder divides while the younger chooses.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.20	Reuerso igitur Abraham ex Aegypto in locum unde uenerat, nunc Loth fratris filius ab illo in terram Sodomorum salua caritate discessit. Diuites quippe facti erant pastoresque multos pecorum habere coeperant, quibus inter se rixantibus eo modo familiarum suarum pugnacem discordiam uitauerunt. Poterat quippe hinc, ut sunt humana, etiam inter ipsos aliqua rixa consurgere. Proinde hoc malum praecauentis Abrahae uerba ista sunt	So when Abraham had returned from Egypt to the place from which he had come, Lot, his brother's son, now parted from him for the land of Sodom, with their love unimpaired. For they had grown rich and had begun to have many herdsmen for their livestock; and since these were quarreling among themselves, they avoided in this way a combative discord between their households. For

51 Genesis 12:7.

52 Augustine's Against Faustus the Manichaean (Book 22) defends the patriarchs against the attacks of Faustus, a Manichaean bishop.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ad Loth: Non sit rixa inter me et te, et inter pastores meos et inter pastores tuos, quia homines fratres nos sumus. Nonne ecce tota terra ante te est? Discede a me; si tu in sinistram, ego in dextram; uel si tu in dextram, ego in sinistram.	from this, human nature being what it is, some quarrel might also have arisen between the two of them. Accordingly, these are the words Abraham spoke to Lot to guard against this evil: "Let there be no quarrel between me and you, and between my herdsmen and your herdsmen, for we are brothers. Look, is not the whole land before you? Separate from me: if you go to the left, I will go to the right; or if you go to the right, I will go to the left."[53]
Hinc fortassis effecta est inter homines pacifica consuetudo, ut, quando terrenorum aliquid partiendum est, maior diuidat, minor eligat.	Perhaps it is from this that the peaceable custom arose among people that, when some earthly property has to be shared, the elder divides and the younger chooses.

GOD'S THIRD PROMISE, IN WHICH HE PLEDGES THE LAND OF CANAAN TO ABRAHAM AND HIS OFFSPRING FOREVER

God promises Abraham's seed the land forever and numbers as many as the sand.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.21 Cum ergo digressi essent separatimque habitarent Abraham et Loth necessitate sustentandae familiae, non foeditate discordiae, et Abraham in terra Chanaan, Loth autem esset in Sodomis, oraculo tertio dixit Dominus ad Abraham: Respiciens oculis tuis uide a loco, in quo nunc tu es, ad aquilonem et Africum et orientem et mare, quia omnem terram, quam tu uides, tibi dabo eam et semini tuo usque in saeculum, et faciam semen tuum tamquam harenam terrae. Si potest aliquis dinumerare harenam terrae, et semen tuum dinumerabitur. Surgens perambula terram in longitudinem eius et in latitudinem, quia tibi dabo eam. In hac promissione utrum sit etiam illa, qua pater factus est omnium gentium, non euidenter apparet.	So Abraham and Lot parted and lived separately—out of the need to support their households, not from the ugliness of discord—Abraham in the land of Canaan and Lot in Sodom. Then the Lord said to Abraham in a third oracle: "Look around with your eyes and see, from the place where you now are, toward the north and the southwest and the east and the sea; for all the land that you see I will give to you and to your seed forever, and I will make your seed like the sand of the earth. If anyone can count the sand of the earth, your seed too will be counted. Rise and walk through the land in its length and in its breadth, for I will give it to you." Whether this promise also includes the one by which he was made the father of all nations is not clearly evident.[54]
Potest enim uideri ad hoc pertinere: Et faciam semen tuum tamquam harenam terrae, quod ea locutione dictum est, quam Graeci uocant hyperbolen; quae utique tropica est, non propria. Quo tamen modo, ut ceteris tropis, uti solere scripturam, nullus qui eam didicit ambigit. Iste autem tropus, id est modus locutionis, fit, quando id quod dicitur longe est amplius, quam quod eo dicto significatur. Quis enim non uideat, quam sit incomparabiliter amplior harenae numerus, quam potest esse hominum omnium ab ipso Adam usque ad terminum	For this might seem to refer to it: "And I will make your seed like the sand of the earth." This is said in the figure of speech the Greeks call hyperbole, which is certainly figurative, not literal. No one who has studied Scripture doubts that it habitually uses this figure, as it does the others. This figure—that is, this manner of speaking—occurs when what is said is far greater than what is meant by it. For who does not see how incomparably larger the number of grains of sand is than

53 Genesis 13:8–9.
54 Genesis 13:14–17.

LATIN	ENGLISH
saeculi? Quanto ergo magis quam semen Abrahae, non solum quod pertinet ad Israeliticam gentem, uerum etiam quod est et futurum est secundum imitationem fidei toto orbe terrarum in omnibus gentibus!	the number of all human beings could be, from Adam himself to the end of the world? How much larger, then, than the seed of Abraham—not only the seed that belongs to the nation of Israel, but also the seed that exists and will exist throughout the whole world among all nations by imitation of his faith!
Quod semen in conparatione multitudinis inpiorum profecto in paucis est; quamuis et ipsi pauci faciant innumerabilem multitudinem suam, quae significata est secundum hyperbolen per harenam terrae. Sane ista multitudo, quae promittitur Abrahae, non Deo est innumerabilis, sed hominibus; Deo autem nec harena terrae. Proinde quia non tantum gens Israelitica, sed uniuersum semen Abrahae, ubi est et promissio non secundum carnem, sed secundum spiritum plurium filiorum, congruentius harenae multitudini conparatur: potest hic intellegi utriusque rei facta promissio. Sed ideo diximus, quod non euidenter appareat, quia et illius gentis unius multitudo, quae secundum carnem nata est ex Abraham per eius nepotem Iacob, in tantum creuit, ut paene omnes partes orbis inpleuerit.	Compared with the multitude of the ungodly, this seed is surely found among few; yet even these few form a countless multitude of their own, which is signified by hyperbole through the sand of the earth. Of course, this multitude promised to Abraham is countless not to God but to human beings; to God not even the sand of the earth is countless. Therefore, since not only the nation of Israel but the whole seed of Abraham—which includes the promise of many children not according to the flesh but according to the spirit—is more fittingly compared to the multitude of the sand, the promise can be understood here as made about both. But we said that this is not clearly evident because the multitude of that single nation too, born of Abraham according to the flesh through his grandson Jacob, has grown so much that it has filled almost every part of the world.
Et ideo potuit et ipsa secundum hyperbolen harenae multitudini conparari, quia et haec sola innumera est homini. Terram certe illam solam significatam, quae appellata est Chanaan, ambigit nemo. Sed quod dictum est: Tibi dabo eam et semini tuo usque in saeculum, potest mouere nonnullos, si usque in saeculum intellegant in aeternum. Si autem in saeculum hoc loco sic accipiant, quem ad modum fideliter tenemus initium futuri saeculi a fine praesentis ordiri, nihil eos mouebit; quia, etsi expulsi sunt Israelitae de Hierosolymis, manent tamen in aliis ciuitatibus terrae Chanaan, et usque in finem manebunt; et uniuersa terra illa cum a Christianis inhabitatur, etiam ipsum semen est Abrahae.	So it too could be compared by hyperbole to the multitude of the sand, since it alone is also countless to a human being. Certainly no one doubts that only the land called Canaan is meant. But the words "I will give it to you and to your seed forever" may trouble some, if they understand "forever" as meaning for eternity. But if they take "forever" here in the sense that, as we faithfully hold, the beginning of the age to come starts from the end of the present one, nothing will trouble them. For although the Israelites have been expelled from Jerusalem, they still remain in other cities of the land of Canaan and will remain there until the end; and when that whole land is inhabited by Christians, they too are the seed of Abraham.[55]

55 The Latin usque in saeculum ("forever," literally "until the age") can mean either for all eternity or for the whole of this present age.

ABRAHAM'S VICTORY OVER THE ENEMIES OF SODOM, WHEN HE RESCUED LOT FROM CAPTIVITY AND WAS BLESSED BY THE PRIEST MELCHIZEDEK

Abraham rescues Lot and is blessed by Melchizedek, a figure of the Christian sacrifice.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.22	Hoc responso promissionis accepto migrauit Abraham et mansit in alio eiusdem terrae loco, iuxta quercum Mambre, quae erat Chebron. Deinde ab hostibus, qui Sodomis inruerant, cum quinque reges aduersus quattuor bellum gererent et uictis Sodomitis etiam Loth captus esset, liberauit eum Abraham adductis secum in proelium trecentis decem et octo uernaculis suis et uictoriam fecit regibus Sodomorum nihilque spoliorum auferre uoluit, cum rex cui uicerat obtulisset. Sed plane tunc benedictus est a Melchisedech, qui erat sacerdos Dei excelsi; de quo in epistula, quae inscribitur ad Hebraeos, quam plures Pauli apostoli esse dicunt, quidam uero negant, multa et magna conscripta sunt.	Having received this promise in answer, Abraham moved and settled in another place in the same land, by the oak of Mamre, which was at Hebron. Later, five kings were waging war against four; the people of Sodom were defeated, and Lot too was taken captive. Abraham freed him from the enemies who had attacked Sodom, leading into battle three hundred and eighteen slaves born in his household. He won the victory for the kings of Sodom and refused to take any of the spoils, though the king for whom he had won it offered them. And it was then that he was blessed by Melchizedek, who was a priest of God Most High. Many great things are written about him in the epistle entitled To the Hebrews, which many say is by the apostle Paul, though some deny it.[56]
	Ibi quippe primum apparuit sacrificium, quod nunc a Christianis offertur Deo toto orbe terrarum, inpleturque illud, quod longe post hoc factum per prophetiam dicitur ad Christum, qui fuerat adhuc uenturus in carne: Tu es sacerdos in aeternum secundum ordinem Melchisedech; non scilicet secundum ordinem Aaron, qui ordo fuerat auferendus inlucescentibus rebus, quae illis umbris praenotabantur.	For there first appeared the sacrifice that is now offered to God by Christians throughout the whole world. And so is fulfilled what was said long after this event, through prophecy, to Christ, who was still to come in the flesh: "You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek"—not, that is, according to the order of Aaron, an order that was to be removed when the realities dawned that were foreshadowed by those shadows.[57]

THE LORD'S WORD TO ABRAHAM PROMISING HIM DESCENDANTS AS MANY AS THE STARS; BELIEVING IT, HE WAS JUSTIFIED WHILE STILL UNCIRCUMCISED

Abraham's seed will be like the stars; his faith is reckoned as righteousness before circumcision.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.23	Etiam tunc factum est uerbum Domini ad Abraham in uisu. Qui cum ei protectionem mercedemque promitteret ualde multam, ille de posteritate sollicitus quendam Eliezer uernaculum suum futurum sibi dixit heredem, continuoque illi promissus est heres, non ille uernaculus, sed qui de ipso Abraham fuerat exiturus, rursusque semen innumerabile, non sicut harena terrae, sed sicut stellae caeli; ubi mihi magis uidetur promissa posteritas caelesti felicitate sublimis. Nam quantum ad multitudinem pertinet, quid sunt stellae caeli ad	Then too the word of the Lord came to Abraham in a vision. When God promised him protection and a very great reward, Abraham, anxious about his posterity, said that a certain Eliezer, a slave born in his household, would be his heir. At once an heir was promised him—not that household slave, but one who would come forth from Abraham himself—and again a countless seed, not like the sand of the earth but like the stars of heaven. Here, it seems to me, what is promised is rather a 56 Melchizedek, king of Salem, appears in Genesis 14:18–20; Hebrews 5–7 interprets him as a figure of Christ.

57 Psalm 109:4 (110:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
harenam terrae? nisi quis et istam conparationem in tantum esse similem dicat, in quantum etiam stellae dinumerari non ualent, quia nec omnes eas uideri posse credendum est. Nam quanto quisque acutius intuetur, tanto plures uidet.	posterity exalted in heavenly happiness. For as far as number goes, what are the stars of heaven compared with the sand of the earth? Unless someone says that this comparison too is apt insofar as the stars also cannot be counted, since we must believe that not all of them can be seen. For the more keenly one looks, the more one sees.[58]
Unde et acerrime cernentibus aliquas occultas esse merito existimatur, exceptis eis sideribus, quae in alia parte orbis a nobis remotissima oriri et occidere perhibentur. Postremo quicumque uniuersum stellarum numerum conprehendisse et conscripsisse iactantur, sicut Aratus uel Eudoxus uel si qui alii sunt, eos libri huius contemnit auctoritas. Hic sane illa sententia ponitur, cuius apostolus meminit propter Dei gratiam commendandam: Credidit Abraham Deo, et deputatum est illi ad iustitiam; ne circumcisio gloriaretur gentesque incircumcisas ad fidem Christi nollet admitti. Hoc enim quando factum est, ut credenti Abrahae deputaretur fides ad iustitiam, nondum fuerat circumcisus.	So it is rightly thought that some are hidden even from those with the sharpest sight, not to mention the stars that are said to rise and set in another part of the world very far from us. Finally, all who boast of having grasped and recorded the whole number of the stars, like Aratus or Eudoxus or any others there may be, are set at nothing by the authority of this book. Here, of course, is placed the statement the apostle recalls in order to commend the grace of God: "Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness"—so that the circumcision should not boast and refuse to admit the uncircumcised nations to faith in Christ. For when this happened, when Abraham believed and his faith was reckoned to him as righteousness, he had not yet been circumcised.[59]

THE MEANING OF THE SACRIFICE ABRAHAM WAS COMMANDED TO OFFER WHEN HE ASKED TO BE TAUGHT ABOUT WHAT HE HAD BELIEVED

The heifer, goat, ram and birds of Abraham's sacrifice prefigure Israel, the spiritual, and the last judgment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.24 In eodem uisu cum loqueretur ei Deus, etiam hoc ait ad illum: Ego Deus, qui eduxi te de regione Chaldaeorum, ut dem tibi terram hanc, ut heres sis eius. Ubi cum interrogasset Abraham secundum quid sciret, quod heres eius erit, dixit illi Deus: Accipe mihi iuuencam trimam et capram trimam et arietem trimum et turturem et columbam. Accepit autem illi haec omnia et diuisit illa media et posuit ea contra faciem alterum alteri; aues autem non diuisit. Et descenderunt, sicut scriptum est, aues supra corpora quae diuisa erant, et consedit illis Abram.	In the same vision, as God was speaking to him, he also said this to him: "I am God, who brought you out of the region of the Chaldeans, to give you this land, that you may be its heir." When Abraham asked by what he would know that he would be its heir, God said to him: "Take for me a three-year-old heifer, a three-year-old she-goat, a three-year-old ram, a turtledove, and a dove." He took all these for him, divided them in the middle, and laid each half facing the other; but the birds he did not divide. And, as it is written, "birds came down upon the bodies that had been divided, and Abram sat down by them."[60]
Circa solis autem occasum pauor inruit super Abram, et ecce timor tenebrosus magnus incidit ei; et dictum est ad Abram: Sciendo scies, quia peregrinum erit semen tuum	"About sunset a dread fell upon Abram, and behold, a great dark fear came upon him; and it was

58 Genesis 15:1–5.
59 Aratus (3rd century BC) wrote the astronomical poem Phaenomena; Eudoxus of Cnidus (4th century BC) was an astronomer and mathematician. The quotation is Genesis 15:6, cited in Romans 4:3.
60 Genesis 15:7–11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
in terra non propria, et in seruitutem redigent eos et adfligent eos quadringentis annis; gentem autem, cui seruierint, iudicabo ego. Post haec uero exibunt hoc cum supellectili multa. Tu autem ibis ad patres tuos cum pace nutritus in senecta bona. Quarta uero generatione conuertent se hoc. Nondum enim inpleta sunt peccata Amorrhaeorum usque adhuc. Cum autem iam sol erat ad occasum, flamma facta est, et ecce fornax fumabunda et lampades ignis, quae pertransierunt per media diuisa illa.	said to Abram: 'Know for certain that your seed will be a stranger in a land not its own, and they will reduce them to slavery and afflict them for four hundred years; but the nation they serve I will judge. After this they will come out to this place with many possessions. But you shall go to your fathers in peace, nourished in a good old age. In the fourth generation they will return here. For the sins of the Amorites are not yet complete up to now.' And when the sun was already setting, a flame appeared, and behold, a smoking furnace and lamps of fire, which passed through between those divided pieces."[61]
In die illa disposuit Dominus Deus testamentum ad Abram, dicens: Semini tuo dabo terram hanc, a flumine Aegypti usque ad flumen magnum flumen Euphraten, Cenaeos et Cenezaeos et Cedmonaeos et Chettaeos et Pherezaeos et Raphaim et Amorrhaeos et Chananaeos et Euaeos et Gergesaeos et Iebusaeos.	"On that day the Lord God made a covenant with Abram, saying: 'To your seed I will give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates: the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Hivites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.'"[62]
Haec omnia in uisu facta diuinitus adque dicta sunt, de quibus singulis enucleate disserere longum est et intentionem operis huius excedit. Quod ergo satis est nosse debemus. Postea quam dictum est credidisse Abraham Deo et deputatum illi ad iustitiam, non eum in fide defecisse, ut diceret: Dominator Domine, secundum quid sciam, quia heres eius ero? (terrae quippe illius promissa erat hereditas) — non enim ait: Unde sciam? quasi adhuc non crederet; sed ait: Secundum quid sciam? ut ei rei, quam crediderat, aliqua similitudo adhiberetur, qua eius modus agnosceretur; sicut non est uirginis Mariae diffidentia quod ait: Quo modo fiet istud, quoniam uirum non cognosco?	All these things were done and said by God in a vision. To discuss each of them in detail would take too long and would go beyond the purpose of this work. So we ought to know what is enough: that after it was said that Abraham believed God and it was reckoned to him as righteousness, he did not lapse in faith when he said, "Lord and Master, by what shall I know that I will be its heir?" (for it was the inheritance of that land that had been promised). For he does not say, "How shall I know?" as though he did not yet believe; he says, "By what shall I know?"—asking that some likeness be applied to the thing he had believed, by which its manner might be recognized. In the same way, it is no distrust on the part of the Virgin Mary when she says: "How shall this be, since I do not know a man?"[63]
quod enim futurum esset, certa erat; modum quo fieret inquirebat, et hoc cum quaesisset, audiuit —: denique et hic similitudo data est de animalibus, iuuenca et capra et ariete et duabus uolucribus, turture et columba, ut secundum haec futurum sciret, quod futurum esse iam non ambigeret.	for she was certain about what would happen; she was asking about the manner in which it would happen, and when she had asked, she heard it. So here too a likeness was given from the animals—a heifer, a she-goat, a ram, and two birds, a turtledove and a dove—so that he might know that what he no longer doubted would happen would happen in accordance with these.

61 Genesis 15:12–17.
62 Genesis 15:18–21.
63 Luke 1:34.

LATIN

Siue ergo per iuuencam significata sit plebs posita sub iugo legis, per capram eadem plebs peccatrix futura, per arietem eadem plebs etiam regnatura (quae animalia propterea trima dicuntur, quia, cum sint insignes articuli temporum ab Adam usque ad Noe et inde usque ad Abraham et inde usque ad Dauid, qui reprobato Saule primus in regno gentis Israeliticae Domini est uoluntate fundatus, in hoc ordine tertio, qui tenditur ex Abraham usque ad Dauid, tamquam tertiam aetatem gerens ille populus adoleuit), siue aliquid aliud conuenientius ista significent: nullo modo tamen dubitauerim spiritales in ea praefiguratos additamento turturis et columbae.

Et ideo dictum est: Aues autem non diuisit, quoniam carnales inter se diuiduntur, spiritales autem nullo modo, siue a negotiosis conuersationibus hominum se remoueant, sicut turtur, siue inter illas degant, sicut columba; utraque tamen auis est simplex et innoxia, significans et in ipso Israelitico populo, cui terra illa danda erat, futuros indiuiduos filios promissionis et heredes regni in aeterna felicitate mansuri. Aues autem descendentes supra corpora, quae diuisa erant, non boni aliquid, sed spiritus indicant aeris huius, pastum quendam suum de carnalium diuisione quaerentes. Quod autem illis consedit Abraham, significat etiam inter illas carnalium diuisiones ueros usque in finem perseueraturos fideles.

Et circa solis occasum quod pauor inruit in Abraham et timor tenebrosus magnus significat circa huius saeculi finem magnam perturbationem ac tribulationem futuram fidelium, de qua Dominus dicit in euangelio: Erit enim tunc tribulatio magna, qualis non fuit ab initio.

Quod uero dictum est ad Abraham: Sciendo scies, quia peregrinum erit semen tuum in terra non propria, et in seruitutem redigent eos et adfligent eos quadringentis annis, de populo Israel, qui fuerat in Aegypto seruiturus, apertissime prophetatum est; non quod in eadem seruitute sub Aegyptiis adfligentibus quadringentos annos ille populus fuerat peracturus, sed in ipsis

ENGLISH

Perhaps the heifer signifies the people placed under the yoke of the law; the she-goat the same people, destined to be sinful; the ram the same people, destined also to reign. (These animals are said to be three years old because there are notable junctures of time from Adam to Noah, from Noah to Abraham, and from Abraham to David—who, after Saul was rejected, was the first established by the Lord's will in the kingship of the nation of Israel—and in this third period, which extends from Abraham to David, that people grew up, as if passing through its third stage of life.) Or perhaps these things signify something else more fitting. Either way, I would in no way doubt that the spiritual were prefigured in them by the addition of the turtledove and the dove.

That is why it is said, "But the birds he did not divide": the carnal are divided among themselves, but the spiritual in no way—whether they withdraw from the busy dealings of human life, like the turtledove, or live in their midst, like the dove. Yet both birds are simple and harmless, signifying that even within the people of Israel itself, to whom that land was to be given, there would be undivided children of the promise and heirs of the kingdom who would abide in eternal happiness. The birds descending upon the bodies that had been divided indicate nothing good, but rather the spirits of this air, seeking some food of their own in the division of the carnal. And Abraham's sitting down by them signifies that even amid those divisions of the carnal the true faithful will persevere to the end.

And the dread that fell upon Abraham about sunset, and the great dark fear, signify that about the end of this age there will be great turmoil and tribulation for the faithful, of which the Lord says in the gospel: "For then there will be great tribulation, such as has not been from the beginning."[64]

As for what was said to Abraham—"Know for certain that your seed will be a stranger in a land not its own, and they will reduce them to slavery and afflict them for four hundred years"—this is a very plain prophecy about the people of Israel, who were to be enslaved in Egypt. It does not mean that this people was to spend four hundred years quadringentis annis praenuntiatum est hoc futurum. Quem ad modum enim scriptum est de Thara patre Abrahae: Et fuerunt dies Tharae in Charra quinque et ducenti anni, non quia ibi omnes acti sunt, sed quia ibi conpleti sunt: ita et hic propterea interpositum est: Et in seruitutem redigent eos et adfligent eos quadringentis annis, quoniam iste numerus in eadem adflictione conpletus est, non quia ibi uniuersus peractus est.

64 Matthew 24:21.

LATIN

Quadringenti sane dicuntur anni propter numeri plenitudinem, quamuis aliquanto amplius sint, siue ex hoc tempore conputentur, quo ista promittebantur Abrahae, siue ex quo natus est Isaac, propter semen Abrahae, de quo ista praedicuntur. Conputantur enim, sicut superius iam diximus, ab anno septuagensimo et quinto Abrahae, quando ad eum facta est prima promissio, usque ad exitum Israel ex Aegypto quadringenti et triginta anni; quorum apostolus ita meminit: Hoc autem dico, inquit: testamentum confirmatum a Deo post quadringentos triginta annos facta lex non infirmat ad euacuandam promissionem.

Iam ergo isti quadringenti et triginta anni quadringenti poterant nuncupari, quia non sunt multo amplius: quanto magis cum aliquot iam ex isto numero praeterissent, quando illa in uisu demonstrata et dicta sunt Abrahae, uel quando Isaac natus est centenario patri suo, a prima promissione post uiginti quinque annos, cum iam ex istis quadringentis triginta quadringenti et quinque remanerent, quos Deus quadringentos uoluit nominare. Et cetera, quae sequuntur in uerbis praenuntiantis Dei, nullus dubitauerit ad Israeliticum populum pertinere.

Quod uero adiungitur: Cum autem iam sol erat ad occasum, flamma facta est, et ecce fornax fumabunda et lampades ignis, quae pertransierunt per media diuisa illa, significat iam in fine saeculi per ignem iudicandos esse carnales. Sicut enim adflictio ciuitatis Dei, qualis antea numquam fuit, quae sub Antichristo futura speratur, significatur tenebroso timore Abrahae circa solis occasum, id est propinquante iam fine saeculi: sic ad solis in that slavery under the oppressing Egyptians, but that this would happen within those four hundred years. For it is written of Terah, Abraham's father, "And the days of Terah in Haran were two hundred and five years," not because they were all spent there, but because they were completed there. In the same way, the words "and they will reduce them to slavery and afflict them for four hundred years" were inserted here because this number was completed during that affliction, not because it was spent there in its entirety.[65]

ENGLISH

The years are said to be four hundred, of course, as a full, round number, though they are somewhat more, whether they are counted from the time when these things were promised to Abraham, or from the birth of Isaac, because of the seed of Abraham of which these things are foretold. For, as we have already said above, from Abraham's seventy-fifth year, when the first promise was made to him, to Israel's exodus from Egypt, four hundred and thirty years are counted. The apostle mentions them in this way: "This is what I mean," he says: "the law, which came four hundred and thirty years later, does not annul a covenant confirmed by God, so as to nullify the promise."[66]

So these four hundred and thirty years could already be called four hundred, since they are not many more. How much more so, since some of this number had already passed when those things were shown and spoken to Abraham in the vision, or when Isaac was born to his hundred-year-old father, twenty-five years after the first promise. At that point four hundred and five of those four hundred and thirty years remained, and these God chose to call four hundred. And no one would doubt that the rest of what follows in God's prediction refers to the people of Israel.

Then what is added—"And when the sun was already setting, a flame appeared, and behold, a smoking furnace and lamps of fire, which passed through between those divided pieces"—signifies that at the end of the world the carnal will be judged by fire. For the affliction of the city of God, such as has never been before, which is expected to come under the Antichrist, is signified by Abra-

65 Genesis 11:32.
66 Galatians 3:17.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	occasum, id est ad ipsum iam finem, significatur isto igne dies iudicii dirimens carnales per ignem saluandos et igne damnandos. Deinde testamentum factum ad Abraham terram Chanaan proprie manifestat et nominat in ea undecim gentes a flumine Aegypti usque ad flumen magnum Euphraten.	ham's dark fear about sunset, that is, when the end of the world is already drawing near. In the same way, at sunset, that is, at the very end, this fire signifies the day of judgment, which separates the carnal who are to be saved through fire from those who are to be damned in fire. Next, the covenant made with Abraham specifically points out the land of Canaan and names eleven nations in it, from the river of Egypt to the great river Euphrates.
	Non ergo a flumine magno Aegypti, hoc est Nilo, sed a paruo, quod diuidit inter Aegyptum et Palaestinam, ubi est ciuitas Rhinocorura.	So it is not from the great river of Egypt, that is, the Nile, but from the small one that divides Egypt from Palestine, where the city of Rhinocorura stands.[67]

HAGAR, SARAH'S SLAVE WOMAN, WHOM SARAH HERSELF WANTED TO BE ABRAHAM'S CONCUBINE

Abraham took Hagar to have children at Sarah's wish, not out of lust.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.25	Iam hinc tempora consequuntur filiorum Abrahae, unius de Agar ancilla, alterius de Sarra libera, de quibus in libro superiore iam diximus. Quod autem adtinet ad rem gestam, nullo modo est inurendum de hac concubina crimen Abrahae. Usus est ea quippe ad generandam prolem, non ad explendam libidinem, nec insultans, sed potius oboediens coniugi, quae suae sterilitatis credidit esse solacium, si fecundum ancillae uterum, quoniam natura non poterat, uoluntate faceret suum, et eo iure, quo dicit apostolus: Similiter et uir non habet potestatem corporis sui, sed mulier, uteretur mulier ad pariendum ex altera, quod non poterat ex se ipsa. Nulla est hic cupido lasciuiae, nulla nequitiae turpitudo.	From here on follow the times of Abraham's sons, one by Hagar the slave woman and the other by Sarah the free woman. We have already spoken of them in the previous book. As for what was actually done, Abraham must in no way be branded with any crime on account of this concubine. For he used her to beget offspring, not to satisfy lust. He did so not to insult his wife but rather in obedience to her. She believed it would be a consolation for her barrenness if, since nature could not make the fertile womb of her slave woman her own, she could do so by her will. By that right of which the apostle says, "Likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does," a wife might use another woman to bear what she could not bear herself. Here there is no craving for wantonness, no foulness of wickedness.[68]
	Ab uxore causa prolis ancilla marito traditur, a marito causa prolis accipitur; ab utroque non culpae luxus, sed naturae fructus exquiritur. Denique cum ancilla grauida dominae sterili superbiret et hoc Sarra suspicione muliebri uiro potius inputaret, etiam ibi demonstrauit Abraham non se amatorem seruum, sed liberum fuisse genitorem et in Agar Sarrae coniugii, pudicitiam custodisse nec uoluptatem suam, sed uoluntatem illius inpleuisse; accepisse nec petisse, accessisse nec haesisse, seminasse nec amasse. Ait enim: Ecce ancilla tua in	The slave woman is handed over by the wife to the husband for the sake of offspring, and she is received by the husband for the sake of offspring. Both seek not the indulgence of guilt but the fruit of nature. Later, once the slave woman was pregnant, she grew proud toward her barren mistress, and Sarah, with a woman's suspicion, chose to blame her husband for it. Even then Abraham showed that he had been not an enslaved lover but a free begetter. He showed that in Hagar he had

67 Rhinocorura is modern El-Arish on the coast of Sinai. The stream there, the Wadi el-Arish, is the biblical "Brook of Egypt."
68 1 Corinthians 7:4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
manibus tuis, utere ea quo modo tibi placuerit, o uirum uiriliter utentem feminis, coniuge temperanter, ancilla obtemperanter, nulla intemperanter!	guarded the chastity of his marriage to Sarah, and had fulfilled not his own pleasure but her will. He had received her, not sought her; gone in to her, not clung to her; sown seed, not loved. For he says, "Look, your slave woman is in your hands; treat her as you please." What a man, using women in a manly way: his wife temperately, his slave woman compliantly, none intemperately![69]

GOD'S ASSURANCE TO ABRAHAM, IN WHICH HE PROMISES THE OLD MAN A SON BY BARREN SARAH, MAKES HIM FATHER OF NATIONS, AND SEALS THE PROMISE WITH THE SACRAMENT OF CIRCUMCISION

God renames Abram, promises Isaac and the nations, and commands circumcision on the eighth day.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.26 Post haec natus est Ismael ex Agar, in quo putare posset inpletum, quod ei promissum fuerat, cum sibi uernaculum suum adoptare uoluisset. Deo dicente: Non erit heres tuus hic; sed qui exiet de te, ille erit heres tuus. Hoc ergo promissum ne in ancillae filio putaret inpletum, iam cum esset annorum nonaginta et nouem, apparuit ei Dominus et dixit illi: Ego sum Deus, place in conspectu meo et esto sine querella, et ponam testamentum meum inter me et inter te et inplebo te ualde. Et procidit Abraham in faciem suam.	After this Ishmael was born of Hagar. In him Abraham might have thought that the promise made to him had been fulfilled. That promise came when he had wished to adopt his home-born slave, and God said, "This man shall not be your heir; but the one who will come out of you, he shall be your heir." So that he would not think this promise fulfilled in the slave woman's son, the Lord appeared to him when he was already ninety-nine years old. He said to him: "I am God; be pleasing in my sight and be blameless, and I will set my covenant between me and you, and I will fill you to abundance." And Abraham fell on his face.[70]
Et locutus est illi Deus dicens: Et ego, ecce testamentum meum tecum, et eris pater multitudinis gentium; et non appellabitur adhuc nomen tuum Abram, sed erit nomen tuum Abraham, quia patrem multarum gentium posui te; et augeam te ualde ualde et ponam te in gentes, et reges ex te exibunt: et statuam testamentum meum inter me et te et inter semen tuum post te in generationes eorum in testamentum aeternum, ut sim tibi Deus et semini tuo post te. Et dabo tibi et semini tuo post te terram, in qua incola es, omnem terram Chanaan in possessionem aeternam, et ero illis Deus. Et dixit Deus ad Abraham: Tu autem testamentum meum conseruabis, tu et semen tuum post te in progenies suas.	"And God spoke to him, saying: 'As for me, see, my covenant is with you, and you shall be the father of a multitude of nations. Your name shall no longer be called Abram, but your name shall be Abraham, because I have made you the father of many nations. I will increase you very greatly, and I will make you into nations, and kings shall come out of you. And I will establish my covenant between me and you and between your seed after you throughout their generations as an eternal covenant, to be God to you and to your seed after you. And I will give to you and to your seed after you the land in which you are a sojourner, all the land of Canaan, as an eternal possession, and I will be their God.' And God said to Abraham: 'But you shall keep my covenant, you and your seed after you throughout their generations.'
Et hoc est testamentum, quod conseruabis inter me et uos et inter semen tuum post te in generationes suas:	And this is the covenant that you shall keep between me and you, and between your seed after

69 Genesis 16:6.

70 Genesis 15:4; 17:1–3. Augustine's word for "covenant," testamentum, also means "testament," as in the Old and New Testaments.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Circumcidetur uestrum omne masculinum, et circumcidemini carnem praeputii uestri, et erit in signo testamenti inter me et uos. Et puer octo dierum circumcidetur, uestrum omne masculinum in progenies uestras. Vernaculus et emticius ab omni filio alieno, qui non est de semine tuo, circumcisione circumcidetur uernaculus domus tuae et emticius. Et erit testamentum meum in carne uestra in testamento aeterno. Et qui non fuerit circumcisus masculus, qui non circumcidetur carnem praeputii sui octauo die, interibit anima illa de genere eius, quia testamentum meum dissipauit. Et dixit Deus ad Abraham: Sara uxor tua, non appellabitur nomen eius Sara, sed Sarra erit nomen eius.	you throughout their generations: every male among you shall be circumcised, and you shall be circumcised in the flesh of your foreskin, and it shall be a sign of the covenant between me and you. A child of eight days shall be circumcised, every male among you throughout your generations. The home-born slave and the one bought from any foreigner who is not of your seed—both the slave born in your house and the one bought shall be circumcised with circumcision. And my covenant shall be in your flesh as an eternal covenant. And the male who has not been circumcised, who is not circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin on the eighth day—that soul shall perish from its people, because he has broken my covenant.' And God said to Abraham: 'Sarai your wife—her name shall not be called Sarai, but Sarah shall be her name.[71]
Benedicam autem illam et dabo tibi ex ea filium, et benedicam illum, et erit in nationes, et reges gentium ex eo erunt. Et procidit Abraham super faciem suam et risit et dixit in animo suo dicens: Si mihi centum annos habenti nascetur, et si Sarra annorum nonaginta pariet? Dixit autem Abraham ad Deum: Ismael hic uiuat in conspectu tuo. Dixit autem Deus ad Abraham: Ita, ecce Sarra uxor tua pariet tibi filium, et uocabis nomen eius Isaac; et statuam testamentum meum ad illum in testamentum aeternum, esse illi Deus et semini eius post illum. De Ismael autem ecce exaudiui te; ecce benedixi eum et ampliabo illum et multiplicabo eum ualde. Duodecim gentes generabit, et dabo illum in magnam gentem.	I will bless her and give you a son by her, and I will bless him, and he shall become nations, and kings of nations shall come from him.' And Abraham fell on his face and laughed, and said in his heart: 'Shall a child be born to me, who am a hundred years old, and shall Sarah, at ninety years, give birth?' And Abraham said to God: 'Let this Ishmael live in your sight.' And God said to Abraham: 'Yes. See, Sarah your wife shall bear you a son, and you shall call his name Isaac. I will establish my covenant with him as an eternal covenant, to be God to him and to his seed after him. As for Ishmael, see, I have heard you; see, I have blessed him, and I will enlarge him and multiply him greatly. He shall father twelve nations, and I will make him a great nation.
Testamentum autem meum statuam ad Isaac, quem pariet tibi Sarra in tempore hoc ad annum sequentem.	But my covenant I will establish with Isaac, whom Sarah will bear to you at this season next year.'"
Hic apertiora promissa sunt de uocatione gentium in Isaac, id est in filio promissionis, quo significatur gratia, non natura, quia de sene et anu sterili promittitur filius. Quamuis enim et naturalem procreationis excursum Deus operetur: ubi tamen euidens opus Dei est uitiata et cessante natura, ibi euidentius intellegitur gratia. Et quia hoc non per generationem, sed per regenerationem futurum erat, ideo nunc imperata est circumcisio, quando de Sarra promissus est filius. Et quod omnes non solum filios, uerum etiam seruos uernaculos et emticios circumcidi iubet, ad omnes istam gratiam pertinere	Here the promises about the calling of the nations in Isaac—that is, in the son of the promise—are made plainer. In him grace is signified, not nature, because the son is promised from an old man and a barren old woman. God also works the natural course of procreation. Yet where the work of God is evident because nature is impaired and has ceased, there grace is more evidently recognized. This was to come about not through generation but through regeneration. That is why circum-

71 Augustine's Latin spells the names Sara and Sarra; English Bibles have Sarai and Sarah.

LATIN	ENGLISH
testatur. Quid enim aliud circumcisio significat quam naturam exuta uetustate renouatam? Et quid aliud quam Christum octauus dies, qui hebdomade conpleta, hoc est post sabbatum, resurrexit?	cision was commanded now, when a son was promised from Sarah. He orders that all be circumcised—not only sons but also slaves, whether born in the house or bought. By this he testifies that this grace belongs to all. For what else does circumcision signify but nature renewed by stripping off its oldness? And what else does the eighth day signify but Christ, who rose again when the week was complete, that is, after the Sabbath?
Parentum mutantur et nomina: omnia resonant nouitatem, et in testamento uetere obumbratur nouum. Quid est enim quod dicitur testamentum uetus nisi noui occultatio? Et quid est aliud quod dicitur nouum nisi ueteris reuelatio? Risus Abrahae exultatio est gratulantis, non inrisio diffidentis. Verba quoque eius illa in animo suo: Si mihi centum annos habenti nascetur filius et si Sarra annorum nonaginta pariet, non sunt dubitantis, sed admirantis.	Even the parents' names are changed. Everything rings with newness, and in the old covenant the new is foreshadowed. For what is what we call the Old Testament but the concealment of the New? And what is what we call the New but the revelation of the Old? Abraham's laughter is the exultation of one who rejoices, not the mockery of one who distrusts. His words in his heart are likewise not those of one who doubts but of one who marvels: "Shall a son be born to me, who am a hundred years old, and shall Sarah, at ninety years, give birth?"
Si quem uero mouet quod dictum est: Et dabo tibi et semini tuo post te terram, in qua tu incola es, omnem terram Chanaan in possessionem aeternam, quo modo accipiatur inpletum siue adhuc expectetur inplendum, cum possessio quaecumque terrena aeterna cuilibet genti esse non possit: sciat aeternum a nostris interpretari, quod Graeci appellant αἰώνιον, quod a saeculo deriuatum est; alwv quippe Graece saeculum nuncupatur. Sed non sunt ausi Latini hoc dicere saeculare, ne longe in aliud mitterent sensum. Saecularia quippe dicuntur multa, quae in hoc saeculo sic aguntur, ut breui etiam tempore transeant: αἰώνιον autem quod dicitur, aut non habet finem aut usque in huius saeculi tenditur finem.	But someone may be troubled by what was said: "And I will give to you and to your seed after you the land in which you are a sojourner, all the land of Canaan, as an eternal possession." He may ask how it is to be taken as fulfilled, or whether it is still awaited to be fulfilled, since no earthly possession of any kind can be eternal for any nation. Let him know this. Our translators render as "eternal" what the Greeks call αἰώνιον [aiōnion], which is derived from the word for "age," for in Greek αἰών [aiōn] means "age." But the Latin translators did not dare to call it saeculare ["of the age"], for fear of sending the meaning far off in another direction. For many things are called saecularia ["worldly"] that are done in this age in such a way that they pass away even in a short time. But what is called αἰώνιον either has no end or extends to the end of this age.

THE MALE WHO, IF NOT CIRCUMCISED ON THE EIGHTH DAY, IS CUT OFF BECAUSE HE HAS BROKEN GOD'S COVENANT

An uncircumcised infant "breaks the covenant" through original sin, the first covenant broken in Adam.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.27 Item potest mouere, quo modo intellegi oporteat quod hic dictum est: Masculus, qui non circumcidetur carnem praeputii sui octauo die, interibit anima illa de genere eius, quia testamentum meum dissipauit, cum haec nulla	Again, one may be troubled about how we should understand what was said here: "The male who is not circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin on the eighth day—that soul shall perish from its people, culpa sit paruuli, cuius dixit animam perituram, nec ipse dissipauerit testamentum Dei, sed maiores, qui eum circumcidere non curarunt; nisi quia etiam paruuli, non secundum suae uitae proprietatem, sed secundum communem generis humani originem omnes in illo uno testamentum Dei dissipauerunt, in quo omnes peccauerunt. Multa quippe appellantur testamenta Dei exceptis illis duobus magnis, uetere et nouo, quod licet cuique legendo cognoscere. Testamentum autem primum, quod factum est ad hominem primum, profecto illud est: Qua die ederitis, morte moriemini. Unde scriptum est in libro, qui ecclesiasticus appellatur: Omnis caro sicut uestis ueterescit.

LATIN

Testamentum enim a saeculo: Morte morieris. Cum enim lex euidentior postea data sit, et dicat apostolus: Ubi autem non est lex, nec praeuaricatio, quo pacto in psalmo quod legitur uerum est: Praeuaricatores aestimaui omnes peccatores terrae, nisi quia omnes legis alicuius praeuaricatae sunt rei, qui aliquo peccato tenentur obstricti? Quam ob rem, si etiam paruuli, quod uera fides habet, nascuntur non proprie, sed originaliter peccatores, unde illis gratiam remissionis peccatorum necessariam confitemur: profecto eo modo, quo sunt peccatores, etiam praeuaricatores legis illius, quae in paradiso data est, agnoscuntur; ut uerum sit utrumque, quod scriptum est, et: Praeuaricatores aestimaui omnes peccatores terrae, et: Ubi lex non est, nec praeuaricatio.

Ac per hoc, quia circumcisio signum regenerationis fuit et non inmerito paruulum propter originale peccatum, quo primum Dei dissipatum est testamentum, generatio disperdet, nisi regeneratio liberet: sic intellegenda sunt haec uerba diuina, tamquam dictum sit: Qui non fuerit regeneratus, interibit anima illa de genere eius, quia testamentum Dei dissipauit, quando in Adam cum omnibus etiam ipse peccauit. Si enim dixisset: Quia hoc testamentum meum dissipauit, non nisi de ista circumcisione intellegi cogeret; nunc uero, quoniam non expressit cuius modi testamentum paruulus dissipauerit, liberum est intellegere de illo testamento dictum, cuius dissipatio pertinere posset ad paruulum.

ENGLISH

because he has broken my covenant." This is no fault of the little child whose soul he said would perish. Nor did the child himself break God's covenant; his elders did, who did not take care to circumcise him. Unless the answer is that even little children have all broken God's covenant in that one man in whom all sinned—not by anything personal to their own lives, but by the common origin of the human race. Many things are called covenants of God besides those two great ones, the old and the new, as anyone may learn by reading. But the first covenant, made with the first man, is surely this: "On the day you eat, you shall die the death." Hence it is written in the book called Ecclesiasticus: "All flesh grows old like a garment.[72]

For the covenant from the beginning of the age is: 'You shall die the death.'" A clearer law was given later, and the apostle says, "But where there is no law, there is no transgression." How, then, is what we read in the psalm true, "I have counted all the sinners of the earth as transgressors"? Only because all who are held bound by any sin are guilty of transgressing some law. As the true faith holds, even little children are born sinners, not personally but by origin, which is why we confess that they need the grace of the forgiveness of sins. If so, then surely, in the same way that they are sinners, they are also recognized as transgressors of that law which was given in paradise. Thus both things that are written are true: "I have counted all the sinners of the earth as transgressors," and "Where there is no law, there is no transgression."[73]

And so circumcision was a sign of regeneration. Generation, because of the original sin by which God's first covenant was broken, will not undeservedly destroy a little child unless regeneration sets him free. These divine words should therefore be understood as if it had been said: "Whoever has not been regenerated, that soul shall perish from its people, because he has broken God's covenant," since he too sinned in Adam together with all. For if he had said, "Because he has broken this covenant of mine," it would compel us to understand it only of this circumcision. As it is, he did not specify what kind of covenant the little child had broken. So we are 72 Genesis 2:17; Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 14:17. "In whom all sinned" echoes Romans 5:12 in Augustine's Latin.

73 Romans 4:15; Psalm 118:119 (119:119 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	free to understand it as said of that covenant whose breaking could apply to a little child.
Si autem hoc quisquam non nisi de ista circumcisione dictum esse contendit, quod in ea testamentum Dei, quoniam non est circumcisus, dissipauerit paruulus: quaerat locutionis aliquem modum, quo non absurde possit intellegi, ideo dissipasse testamentum, quia licet non ab illo, tamen in illo est dissipatum. Verum sic quoque animaduertendum est nulla in se neglegentia sua iniuste interire incircumcisi animam paruuli nisi originalis obligatione peccati.	But someone may contend that this was said only of this circumcision—that the little child broke God's covenant in it by not being circumcised. If so, let him look for some manner of speaking by which it could be understood, without absurdity, that the child broke the covenant because, though it was not broken by him, it was nevertheless broken in him. But even so, we must note that the soul of an uncircumcised little child, in whom there is no negligence of his own, would perish unjustly, were it not for the bond of original sin.

THE CHANGE OF THE NAMES OF ABRAHAM AND SARAH, WHO RECEIVED THE GIFT OF FERTILITY THOUGH THEY COULD NOT HAVE CHILDREN, SHE BECAUSE OF BARRENNESS AND BOTH BECAUSE OF OLD AGE

Abraham and Sarah receive new names and, though old and barren, the power to have a child.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.28 Facta igitur promissione tam magna tamque dilucida ad Abraham, cui euidentissime dictum est: Patrem multarum gentium posui te; et augeam te ualde ualde et ponam te in gentes, et reges ex te exibunt. Et dabo tibi ex Sarra filium, et benedicam illum, et erit in nationes, et reges gentium ex eo erunt (quam promissionem nunc in Christo cernimus reddi), ex illo deinceps illi coniuges non uocantur in scripturis, sicut antea uocabantur, Abram et Sara, sed sicut eos nos ab initio uocauimus, quoniam sic iam uocantur ab omnibus, Abraham et Sarra. Quur autem mutatum sit nomen Abrahae, reddita est ratio: Quia patrem, inquit, multarum gentium posui te. Hoc ergo significare intellegendum est; Abram uero, quod ante uocabatur, interpretatur pater excelsus.	So then, a promise so great and so clear was made to Abraham, to whom it was said most plainly: "I have made you the father of many nations; and I will increase you very greatly, and I will make you into nations, and kings shall come out of you. And I will give you a son by Sarah, and I will bless him, and he shall become nations, and kings of nations shall come from him." (We now see this promise being fulfilled in Christ.) From that point on the couple are no longer called in the Scriptures what they were called before, Abram and Sarai. They are called what we have called them from the beginning, since that is now how everyone calls them: Abraham and Sarah. The reason why Abraham's name was changed is given: "Because," he says, "I have made you the father of many nations." This, then, is what the name must be understood to mean, whereas Abram, as he was called before, means "exalted father."
De nomine autem mutato Sarrae non est reddita ratio; sed, sicut aiunt, qui scripserunt interpretationes nominum Hebraeorum, quae his sacris litteris continentur, Sara interpretatur princeps mea, Sarra autem uirtus. Unde scriptum est in epistula ad Hebraeos: Fide et ipsa Sarra uirtutem accepit ad emissionem seminis. Ambo enim seniores erant, sicut scriptura testatur; sed illa etiam sterilis et cruore menstruo iam destituta, propter quod iam parere non posset, etiam si sterilis non fuisset. Porro si femina ita sit prouectioris	No reason is given for the change of Sarah's name. But according to those who have written interpretations of the Hebrew names contained in these sacred writings, Sarai means "my princess," and Sarah means "strength." Hence it is written in the Letter to the Hebrews: "By faith Sarah herself also received strength for the emission of seed." Both were old, as Scripture testifies. But she was also barren and had already ceased to have menstrual blood, so that she could no longer bear children

LATIN	ENGLISH
aetatis, ut ei solita mulierum adhuc fluant, de iuuene parere potest, de seniore non potest; quamuis adhuc possit ille senior, sed de adulescentula gignere, sicut Abraham post mortem Sarrae de Cettura potuit, quia uiuidam eius inuenit aetatem.	even if she had not been barren. Moreover, a woman may be well advanced in age yet still have the usual courses of women. Such a woman can bear by a young man but not by an old one. Yet that old man can still beget, though only by a young girl. Thus Abraham could beget by Keturah after Sarah's death, because he found her of vigorous age.[74]
Hoc ergo est, quod mirum commendat apostolus, et ad hoc dicit Abrahae iam fuisse corpus emortuum, quoniam non ex omni femina, cui adhuc esset aliquod pariendi tempus extremum, generare ipse in illa aetate adhuc posset. Ad aliquid enim emortuum corpus intellegere debemus, non ad omnia. Nam si ad omnia, non iam senectus uiui, sed cadauer est mortui. Quamuis etiam sic solui soleat ista quaestio, quod de Cettura postea genuit Abraham, quia donum gignendi, quod a Domino accepit, etiam post obitum mansit uxoris. Sed propterea mihi uidetur illa, quam secuti sumus, huius quaestionis solutio praeferenda, quia centenarius quidem senex, sed temporis nostri, de nulla potest femina gignere; non tunc, quando adhuc tamdiu uiuebant, ut centum anni nondum facerent hominem decrepitae senectutis.	This, then, is what the apostle commends as wonderful. That is why he says that Abraham's body was already as good as dead: at that age he could no longer beget by just any woman who still had some last remaining time for bearing. We must understand his body as dead in a certain respect, not in every respect. If it were dead in every respect, it would no longer be the old age of a living man but the corpse of a dead one. This question is also commonly resolved another way. Some say that Abraham afterward begot children by Keturah because the gift of begetting that he had received from the Lord remained even after his wife's death. But the solution we have followed seems to me preferable, for this reason. An old man of a hundred in our time can indeed beget by no woman. But it was not so then, when people still lived so long that a hundred years did not yet make a man decrepit with age.[75]

THE THREE MEN OR ANGELS IN WHOM THE LORD IS SAID TO HAVE APPEARED TO ABRAHAM AT THE OAK OF MAMRE

The three visitors at Mamre were angels, in whom Abraham and Lot recognized the Lord.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.29 Item Deus apparuit Abrahae ad quercum Mambre in tribus uiris, quos dubitandum non est angelos fuisse; quamuis quidam existiment unum in eis fuisse Dominum Christum, adserentes eum etiam ante indumentum carnis fuisse uisibilem. Est quidem diuinae potestatis et inuisibilis, incorporalis inmu: tabilisque naturae, sine ulla sui mutatione etiam mortalibus adspectibus apparere, non per id quod est, sed per aliquid quod sibi subditum est; quid autem illi subditum non est?	Again, God appeared to Abraham at the oak of Mamre in three men. There can be no doubt that they were angels, although some think that one of them was the Lord Christ, claiming that he was visible even before he put on flesh. It does indeed belong to the divine power, and to an invisible, incorporeal and unchangeable nature, to appear even to mortal sight without any change in itself. It appears not through what it is but through something subject to it. And what is not subject to it?[76]
Verum tamen si propterea confirmant horum trium aliquem fuisse Christum, quia, cum tres uidisset, ad	Some affirm that one of these three was Christ on the grounds that Abraham, though he had seen

74 Hebrews 11:11. The standard work on the Hebrew names was Jerome's Book of Hebrew Names.
75 Romans 4:19.

LATIN

Dominum singulariter est locutus (sic enim scriptum est: Et ecce tres uiri stabant super eum, et uidens procucurrit in obuiam illis ab ostio tabernaculi sui, et adorauit super terram et dixit: Domine, si inueni gratiam ante te, et cetera): quur non et illud aduertunt, duos ex eis uenisse, ut Sodomitae delerentur, cum adhuc Abraham ad unum loqueretur, Dominum appellans et intercedens, ne simul iustum cum inpio in Sodomis perderet? Illos autem duos sic suscepit Loth, ut etiam ipse in conloquio cum illis suo singulariter Dominum appellet.

Nam cum eis pluraliter dixisset: Ecce, domini, declinate in domum pueri uestri, et cetera quae ibi dicuntur, postea tamen ita legitur: Et tenuerunt angeli manum eius et manum uxoris eius et manus duarum filiarum eius, ip eo quod parceret Dominus ipsi. Et factum est, mox ut eduxerunt illum foras, et dixerunt: Saluam fac animam tuam, ne respexeris retro, nec steteris in tota regione; in monte saluum te fac, ne quando conprehendaris. Dixit autem Loth ad illos: Oro, Domine, quia inuenit puer tuus misericordiam ante te, et quae sequuntur. Deinde post haec uerba singulariter illi respondet et Dominus, cum in duobus angelis esset, dicens: Ecce miratus sum faciem tuam, et cetera.

Unde multo est credibilius, quod et Abraham in tribus et Loth in duobus uiris Dominum agnoscebant, cui per singularem numerum loquebantur, etiam cum eos homines esse arbitrarentur; neque enim aliam ob causam sic eos susceperunt, ut tamquam mortalibus et humana refectione indigentibus ministrarent; sed erat profecto aliquid, quo ita excellebant, licet tamquam homines, ut in eis esse Dominum, sicut esse adsolet in prophetis, hi, qui hospitalitatem illis exhibebant, dubitare non possent; adque ideo et ipsos aliquando pluraliter et in eis Dominum aliquando singulariter appellabant. Angelos autem fuisse scriptura testatur, non solum in hoc genesis libro, ubi haec gesta narrantur, uerum etiam in epistula ad Hebraeos, ubi, cum hospitalitas laudaretur: Per hanc, inquit, etiam quidam nescientes hospitio receperunt angelos.

ENGLISH

three, spoke to the Lord in the singular. For so it is written: "And behold, three men stood over him, and seeing them he ran to meet them from the door of his tent, and bowed down to the ground and said: 'Lord, if I have found favor before you,'" and so on. If so, why do they not also notice something else? Two of them came to destroy the people of Sodom while Abraham was still speaking to one. He called him Lord and interceded with him not to destroy the righteous along with the wicked in Sodom. And Lot received those two in such a way that he too, in his conversation with them, addresses them as Lord in the singular.[77]

He had said to them in the plural, "Look, my lords, turn aside into your servant's house," and the rest that is said there. Yet afterward we read: "And the angels took his hand and his wife's hand and the hands of his two daughters, because the Lord was sparing him. And as soon as they had brought him outside, they said: 'Save your life; do not look back, and do not stop anywhere in the whole region; save yourself on the mountain, lest you be caught.' And Lot said to them: 'I pray you, Lord, since your servant has found mercy before you,'" and what follows. Then, after these words, the Lord too answers him in the singular, though he was in two angels, saying, "See, I have shown regard for your face," and the rest.[78]

So it is much more credible that both Abraham in the three men and Lot in the two recognized the Lord, whom they addressed in the singular, even while they thought them to be men. For they received them as they did, serving them as mortals in need of human refreshment, for no other reason. But there was surely something by which they so excelled, even as men, that those who showed them hospitality could not doubt that the Lord was in them, as he usually is in the prophets. That is why they sometimes addressed the men themselves in the plural, and sometimes addressed the Lord in them in the singular. But Scripture testifies that they were angels. It does so not only in this book of Genesis, where these events are narrated, but also in the Letter to the Hebrews, which says

76 Genesis 18:1–2.
77 Genesis 18:2–3.
78 Genesis 19:2, 16–21.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	in praise of hospitality: "Through this some have even entertained angels without knowing it."[79]
Per illos igitur tres uiros, cum rursus filius Isaac de Sarra promitteretur Abrahae, diuinum datum est etiam tale responsum, ut diceretur: Abraham erit in magnam gentem et multam, et benedicentur in eo omnes gentes terrae. Et hic duo illa breuissime plenissimeque promissa sunt, gens Israel secundum carnem et omnes gentes secundum fidem.	So through those three men, when Abraham was again promised a son, Isaac, to be born of Sarah, a divine answer was also given in these words: "Abraham shall become a great and numerous nation, and in him all the nations of the earth shall be blessed." Here two things are promised, most briefly and most fully: the nation of Israel according to the flesh, and all the nations according to faith.[80]

LOT'S DELIVERANCE FROM SODOM, THE DESTRUCTION OF SODOM BY FIRE FROM HEAVEN, AND ABIMELECH, WHOSE DESIRE COULD NOT HARM SARAH'S CHASTITY

Sodom is destroyed, Lot's wife becomes salt, and Sarah stays untouched by Abimelech.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.30 Post hanc promissionem liberato de Sodomis Loth et ueniente igneo imbre de caelo tota illa regio inpiae ciuitatis in cinerem uersa est, ubi stupra in masculos in tantam consuetudinem conualuerant, quantam leges solent aliorum factorum praebere licentiam. Verum et hoc eorum supplicium specimen futuri iudicii diuini fuit. Nam quo pertinet quod prohibiti sunt qui liberabantur ab angelis retro respicere, nisi quia non est animo redeundum ad ueterem uitam, qua per gratiam regeneratus exuitur, si ultimum euadere iudicium cogitamus? Denique uxor Loth, ubi respexit, remansit et in salem conuersa hominibus fidelibus quoddam praestitit condimentum, quo sapiant aliquid, unde illud caueatur exemplum.	After this promise, Lot was rescued from Sodom, and a fiery rain came down from heaven. That whole region of the ungodly city was turned to ashes, a city where sexual violation of males had grown into so established a custom that it enjoyed as much license as laws usually grant to other acts. Yet this punishment of theirs was also a preview of the divine judgment to come. For why were those whom the angels were rescuing forbidden to look back, if not because we must not return in spirit to the old life, which one who is reborn through grace puts off, if we mean to escape the final judgment? Lot's wife, indeed, stayed where she was when she looked back. Turned into salt, she gave the faithful a kind of seasoning, to give them the savor of wisdom to beware of that example.[81]
Inde rursus Abraham fecit in Geraris aput regem ciuitatis illius Abimelech, quod in Aegypto de coniuge fecerat, eique intacta similiter reddita est. Ubi sane Abraham obiurganti regi, quur tacuisset uxorem sororemque dixisset, aperiens quid timuerit etiam hoc addidit: Etenim uere soror mea est de patre, sed non de matre, quia de patre suo soror erat Abrahae, de quo propinqua eius erat. Tantae autem pulchritudinis fuit, ut etiam in illa aetate posset adamari.	After this, at Gerar, Abraham again did with Abimelech, the king of that city, what he had done in Egypt concerning his wife, and she was likewise returned to him untouched. There, when the king reproached him for keeping silent that she was his wife and calling her his sister, Abraham explained what he had feared and added this as well: "And indeed she truly is my sister, on my father's side, but not on my mother's." For she was Abraham's sister through her father, and through him she 79 Hebrews 13:2.

80 Genesis 18:18.
81 The Latin verb sapere means both "to have flavor" and "to be wise."

LATIN	ENGLISH
	was related to Abraham. She was so beautiful that even at that age she could be desired.[82]

ISAAC, BORN ACCORDING TO THE PROMISE, WHOSE NAME CAME FROM THE LAUGHTER OF BOTH PARENTS

Isaac, "laughter," is born; Hagar and Ishmael are sent away, figures of the two covenants.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.31 Post haec natus est Abrahae secundum promissionem Dei de Sarra filius, eumque nominauit Isaac, quod interpretatur risus. Riserat enim et pater, quando ei promissus est, admirans in gaudio; riserat et mater, quando per illos tres uiros iterum promissus est, dubitans in gaudio; quamuis exprobrante angelo, quod risus ille, etiamsi gaudii fuit, tamen plenae fidei non fuit, post ab eodem angelo in fide etiam confirmata est. Ex hoc ergo puer nomen accepit. Nam quod risus ille non ad inridendum obprobrium, sed ad celebrandum gaudium pertinebat, nato Isaac et eo nomine uocato Sarra monstrauit; ait quippe: Risum mihi fecit Dominus; quicumque enim audierit, congaudebit mihi.	After this a son was born to Abraham by Sarah, according to God's promise, and he named him Isaac, which means "laughter." For his father had laughed when the son was promised to him, marveling in joy. His mother too had laughed when he was promised again through those three men, doubting in joy. The angel reproached her because that laughter, though it was a laughter of joy, was not one of full faith. Afterward, however, she was confirmed in faith by that same angel. It was from this, then, that the boy received his name. For when Isaac was born and called by that name, Sarah showed that the laughter belonged not to scornful mockery but to celebrating joy. She said: "The Lord has made laughter for me; whoever hears of it will rejoice with me."[83]
Sed post aliquantulum tempus ancilla de domo eicitur cum filio suo, et duo illa secundum apostolum testamenta significantur, uetus et nouum, ubi Sarra illa supernae Hierusalem, hoc est ciuitatis Dei, figuram gerit.	But some time later the slave woman is driven out of the house with her son. According to the apostle, these two women signify the two covenants, the old and the new, and in this Sarah is a figure of the Jerusalem above, that is, of the city of God.[84]

ABRAHAM'S OBEDIENCE AND FAITH, TESTED BY THE COMMAND TO SACRIFICE HIS SON, AND THE DEATH OF SARAH

Abraham is ready to sacrifice Isaac, trusting God to raise him; the ram prefigures Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.32 Inter haec, quae omnia commemorare nimis longum est, tentatur Abraham de immolando dilectissimo filio ipso Isaac, ut pia eius oboedientia probaretur, saeculis in notitiam proferenda, non Deo. Neque enim omnis est culpanda tentatio, quia et gratulanda est, qua fit probatio. Et plerumque aliter animus humanus sibi ipsi innotescere non potest, nisi uires suas sibi non uerbo, sed experimento tentatione quodam modo interrogante respondeat; ubi si Dei munus agnouerit, tunc pius est,	Among these events, which would take too long to recount in full, Abraham is tested by the command to sacrifice his most beloved son, Isaac himself. This was so that his devout obedience might be proved and brought to the knowledge of the ages, not of God. For not every testing is to be blamed; indeed, the testing that yields proof is to be welcomed. Very often the human mind cannot come to know itself in any other way. Testing, as it

82 Genesis 20:12.
83 Genesis 21:6.
84 Galatians 4:22–26.

LATIN

tunc solidatur firmitate gratiae, non inflatur inanitate iactantiae. Numquam sane crederet Abraham, quod uictimis Deus delectaretur humanis; quamuis diuino intonante praecepto oboediendum sit, non disputandum; uerum tamen Abraham confestim filium, cum fuisset immolatus, resurrecturum credidisse laudandus est.

Dixerat namque illi Deus, cum de ancilla et filio eius foras eiciendis uoluntatem coniugis nollet inplere: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen. Et certe ibi sequitur ac dicitur: Et filium autem ancillae huius in magnam gentem faciam illum, quia semen tuum est. Quo modo ergo dictum est: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen, cum et Ismaelem Deus semen eius uocauerit? Exponens autem apostolus quid sit: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen: Id est, inquit, non qui filii carnis, hi filii Dei, sed filii promissionis deputantur in semine. Ac per hoc filii promissionis, ut sint semen Abrahae, in Isaac uocantur, hoc est in Christo uocante gratia congregantur.

Hanc ergo promissionem pater pius fideliter tenens, quia per hunc oportebat inpleri, quem Deus iubebat occidi, non haesitauit, quod sibi reddi poterat immolatus, qui dari potuit non speratus. Sic intellectum est et in epistula ad Hebraeos, et sic expositum. Fide, inquit, praecessit Abraham Isaac tentatus et unicum obtulit, qui promissiones suscepit, ad quem dictum est: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen, cogitans quia et ex mortuis suscitare potest Deus. Proinde addidit: Pro hoc etiam eum et in similitudinem adduxit; cuius similitudinem, nisi illius unde dicit apostolus: Qui proprio filio non pepercit, sed pro nobis omnibus tradidit eum? Propterea et Isaac, sicut Dominus crucem suam, ita sibi ligna ad uictimae locum, quibus fuerat inponendus, ipse portauit.

Postremo quia Isaac occidi non oportebat, postea quam est pater ferire prohibitus, quis erat ille aries, quo were, questions it, and it must answer about its own strength, not in words but by experience. Then, if it acknowledges God's gift, it is devout. It is made solid by the firmness of grace, not puffed up by the emptiness of boasting. Abraham, of course, would never have believed that God delighted in human victims. Yet when a divine command thunders forth, one must obey, not argue. Still, Abraham deserves praise for believing at once that his son, once sacrificed, would rise again.

ENGLISH

For God had said to him, when he was unwilling to carry out his wife's wish that the slave woman and her son be driven out: "In Isaac your seed shall be called." Certainly what follows there says: "And the son of this slave woman I will also make into a great nation, because he is your seed." How, then, is it said, "In Isaac your seed shall be called," when God called Ishmael his seed too? The apostle explains what "In Isaac your seed shall be called" means: "That is," he says, "it is not the children of the flesh who are the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted as seed." And so the children of the promise, in order to be Abraham's seed, are called in Isaac. That is, they are gathered together in Christ as grace calls them.[85]

So the devout father held faithfully to this promise. Since it had to be fulfilled through the very son whom God was commanding him to kill, he did not doubt that the son who could be given when no one hoped for him could be given back to him after being sacrificed. This is how it is understood and explained in the Letter to the Hebrews as well. "By faith," it says, "Abraham, when he was tested, went before Isaac and offered his only son. He had received the promises, and it was to him that it had been said: 'In Isaac your seed shall be called.' He reasoned that God is able to raise even from the dead." Then it added: "For this reason he also brought him as a likeness." A likeness of whom, if not of the one of whom the apostle says: "He did not spare his own Son, but handed him over for us all"? That is why Isaac, just as the Lord carried his cross, himself carried to the place of sacrifice the wood on which he was to be laid.[86]

Finally, since Isaac was not to be killed and his father was forbidden to strike, who was that ram

85 Genesis 21:12–13; Romans 9:8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
immolato inpletum est significatiuo sanguine sacrificium? Nempe quando eum uidit Abraham, cornibus in frutice tenebatur. Quis ergo illo figurabatur, nisi Iesus, antequam immolaretur, spinis Iudaicis coronatus?	whose sacrifice completed the offering with symbolic blood? Surely, when Abraham saw it, it was caught by its horns in a thicket. Who, then, was prefigured by it, if not Jesus, crowned with the thorns of the Jews before he was sacrificed?
Sed diuina per angelum uerba potius audiamus. Ait quippe scriptura: Et extendit Abraham manum suam sumere machaeram, ut occideret filium suum. Et uocauit illum angelus Domini de caelo et dixit: Abraham! Ille autem dixit: Ecce ego. Et dixit: Non inicias manum tuam super puerum, neque facias illi quicquam; nunc enim sciui quia times Deum tuum, et non pepercisti filio tuo dilecto propter me. Nunc sciui dictum est nunc sciri feci; neque enim hoc nondum sciebat Deus. Deinde ariete illo immolato pro Isaac filio suo uocauit, ut legitur, Abraham nomen loci illius: Dominus uidit; ut dicant hodie: In monte Dominus apparuit.	But let us rather listen to the divine words spoken through the angel. Scripture says: "And Abraham stretched out his hand to take the knife, to kill his son. And the angel of the Lord called to him from heaven and said: 'Abraham!' And he said: 'Here I am.' And he said: 'Do not lay your hand on the boy, and do nothing to him. For now I know that you fear your God, and you have not spared your beloved son for my sake.'" "Now I know" is said for "now I have made it known," since it is not that God did not yet know this. Then, after that ram had been sacrificed in place of his son Isaac, Abraham, as we read, called the name of that place "The Lord saw," so that people say today: "On the mountain the Lord appeared."[87]
Sicut dictum est: Nunc sciui, pro eo quod est nunc sciri feci: ita hic Dominus uidit, pro eo quod est Dominus apparuit, hoc est uideri se fecit. Et uocauit angelus Domini Abraham secundo de caelo dicens: Per me ipsum iuraui, dicit Dominus, propter quod fecisti uerbum hoc et non pepercisti filio tuo dilecto propter me, nisi benedicens benedicam te, et multiplicans multiplicabo semen tuum tamquam stellas caeli et tamquam harenam, quae iuxta labium maris. Et hereditate possidebit semen tuum ciuitates aduersariorum, et benedicentur in semine tuo omnes gentes terrae, quia obaudisti uocem meam. Hoc modo est illa de uocatione gentium in semine Abrahae post holocaustum, quo significatus est Christus, etiam iuratione Dei firmata promissio. Saepe enim promiserat, sed numquam iurauerat.	Just as "Now I know" is said in place of "now I have made it known," so here "The Lord saw" is said in place of "The Lord appeared," that is, "made himself seen." "And the angel of the Lord called Abraham a second time from heaven, saying: 'By myself I have sworn, says the Lord, because you have done this thing and have not spared your beloved son for my sake: I will surely bless you, and I will surely multiply your seed like the stars of heaven and like the sand on the seashore. And your seed shall possess as an inheritance the cities of its enemies, and in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, because you obeyed my voice.'" In this way, after the burnt offering that signified Christ, the promise about the calling of the nations in the seed of Abraham was confirmed even by an oath of God. For he had often promised, but he had never sworn.[88]
Quid est autem Dei ueri ueracisque iuratio nisi promissi confirmatio et infidelium quaedam increpatio?	And what is the oath of the true and truthful God, if not a confirmation of what he promised and a kind of rebuke to those who do not believe?
Post haec Sarra mortua est, centensimo uicensimo septimo anno uitae suae, centensimo autem et tricensimo septimo uiri sui. Decem quippe annis eam praecedebat	After this Sarah died, in the hundred and twenty-seventh year of her life and the hundred and thirty-seventh of her husband's. For he was ten 86 Hebrews 11:17–19; Romans 8:32.

87 Genesis 22:10–14.
88 Genesis 22:16–18.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	aetate; sicut ipse, quando sibi ex illa promissus est filius, ait: Si mihi annorum centum nascetur, et si Sarra annorum nonaginta pariet. Tunc emit agrum Abraham, in quo sepeliuit uxorem. Tunc ergo secundum narrationem Stephani in terra illa est conlocatus, quoniam coepit ibi esse possessor; post mortem scilicet patris sui, qui colligitur ante biennium fuisse defunctus.	years older than she, as he himself said when a son by her was promised to him: "Shall a son be born to me when I am a hundred years old, and shall Sarah give birth at ninety?" Then Abraham bought a field and buried his wife in it. It was then, according to Stephen's account, that he was settled in that land, since he then began to own property there. This was after the death of his father, who, we may infer, had died two years earlier.[89]

REBEKAH, GRANDDAUGHTER OF NAHOR, WHOM ISAAC TOOK AS HIS WIFE

Isaac marries Rebekah; Abraham's oath under his thigh points to Christ's flesh.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.33	Deinde Rebeccam neptem Nachor patrui sui, cum annorum quadraginta esset Isaac, duxit uxorem, centensimo scilicet et quadragensimo anno uitae patris sui, triennio post mortem matris suae. Ut autem illam duceret, quando ab eius patre in Mesopotamiam seruus missus est, quid aliud demonstratum est, cum eidem seruo dixit Abraham: Pone manum tuam sub femore meo, et adiurabo te per Dominum Deum caeli et Dominum terrae, ut non sumas uxorem filio meo Isaac a filiabus Chananaeorum, nisi Dominum Deum caeli et Dominum terrae in carne, quae ex illo femore trahebatur, fuisse uenturum? Numquid haec parua sunt praenuntiatae indicia ueritatis, quam conpleri uidemus in Christo?	Next, when Isaac was forty years old, he married Rebekah, the granddaughter of his uncle Nahor. This was in the hundred and fortieth year of his father's life, three years after his mother's death. So that he might marry her, his father sent a servant to Mesopotamia. Abraham said to that servant: "Put your hand under my thigh, and I will make you swear by the Lord, the God of heaven and the Lord of the earth, that you will not take a wife for my son Isaac from the daughters of the Canaanites." What else did this show, if not that the Lord, the God of heaven and the Lord of the earth, was to come in the flesh descended from that thigh? Are these small signs of the truth foretold, which we see fulfilled in Christ?[90]

WHAT WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND BY ABRAHAM TAKING KETURAH AS HIS WIFE AFTER SARAH'S DEATH

Abraham's late marriage to Keturah may signify carnal Christians, or show that remarriage is no sin.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.34	Quid autem sibi uult, quod Abraham post mortem Sarrae Cetturam duxit uxorem? Ubi absit ut incontinentiam suspicemur, praesertim in illa iam aetate et in illa fidei sanctitate. An adhuc procreandi filii quaerebantur, cum iam Deo promittente tanta multiplicatio filiorum ex Isaac per stellas caeli et harenam terrae fide probatissima teneretur? Sed profecto si Agar et Ismael, doctore apostolo, significauerunt carnales ueteris testamenti, quur non etiam Cettura et filii eius significent carnales, qui se ad testamentum nouum existimant pertinere?	And what does it mean that after Sarah's death Abraham took Keturah as his wife? Far be it from us to suspect lack of self-control here, especially at that age and with that holiness of faith. Or was he still seeking to beget children? Yet he already held, with a faith thoroughly proven, God's promise of so great a multiplication of children from Isaac, like the stars of heaven and the sand of the earth. But surely, if Hagar and Ishmael, as the apostle teaches, signified the carnal people of the old covenant, why should Keturah and her sons not signi-

89 Genesis 17:17; for Stephen's account, Acts 7:4.
90 Genesis 24:2–3.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ambae quippe et uxores Abrahae et concubinae sunt appellatae; Sarra uero numquam dicta est concubina.	fy the carnal people who think they belong to the new covenant? For both women were called both wives and concubines of Abraham, whereas Sarah was never called a concubine.
Nam et quando data est Agar Abrahae, ita scriptum est: Et adprehendit Sara uxor Abram Agar Aegyptiam ancillam suam post decem annos, quam habitauerat Abram in terra Chanaan, et dedit eam Abram uiro suo ipsi uxorem. De Cettura autem, quam post obitum Sarrae accepit, sic legitur: Adiciens autem Abraham sumsit uxorem, cui nomen Cettura. Ecce ambae dicuntur uxores; ambae porro concubinae fuisse reperiuntur, postea dicente scriptura: Dedit autem Abraham omnem censum suum Isaac filio suo, et filiis concubinarum suarum dedit Abraham dationes et dimisit eos ab Isaac filio suo adhuc se uiuo ad orientem, in terram orientis.	For when Hagar was given to Abraham, it is written thus: "And Sarai, Abram's wife, took Hagar the Egyptian, her slave woman, ten years after Abram had settled in the land of Canaan, and gave her to Abram her husband as his wife." And of Keturah, whom he took after Sarah's death, we read this: "And Abraham took another wife, whose name was Keturah." See, both are called wives. Yet both are found to have been concubines, since Scripture later says: "Abraham gave all his property to his son Isaac. And to the sons of his concubines Abraham gave gifts, and while he was still living he sent them away from his son Isaac toward the east, to the land of the east."[91]
Habent ergo nonnulla munera filii concubinarum, sed non perueniunt ad regnum promissum, nec haeretici, nec Iudaei carnales, quia praeter Isaac nullus est heres, et non qui filii carnis, hi filii Dei, sed filii promissionis deputantur in semine, de quo dictum est: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen. Neque enim uideo, quur etiam Cettura post uxoris mortem ducta, nisi propter hoc mysterium, dicta sit concubina. Sed quisquis haec non uult in istis significationibus accipere, non calumnietur Abrahae. Quid si enim et hoc prouisum est contra haereticos futuros secundarum aduersarios nuptiarum, ut in ipso patre multarum gentium post obitum coniugis iterum coniugari demonstraretur non esse peccatum? Et mortuus est Abraham, cum esset annorum centum septuaginta quinque. Annorum ergo septuaginta quinque Isaac filium dereliquit, quem centenarius genuit.	So the sons of the concubines do receive some gifts, but they do not attain the promised kingdom. Neither do the heretics, nor the carnal Jews, because apart from Isaac there is no heir, and "it is not the children of the flesh who are the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted as seed." Of this seed it was said: "In Isaac your seed shall be called." For I do not see why Keturah too, though married after his wife's death, should have been called a concubine, except for the sake of this mystery. But whoever does not want to take these things in these symbolic senses should not slander Abraham. For what if this too was provided against heretics yet to come, opponents of second marriages? In the very father of many nations it would be shown that to marry again after one's spouse has died is no sin. And Abraham died at the age of a hundred and seventy-five. He therefore left behind his son Isaac at seventy-five, having fathered him at a hundred.

WHAT THE DIVINE ANSWER INDICATED ABOUT THE TWINS STILL IN THEIR MOTHER REBEKAH'S WOMB

God tells Rebekah that the elder twin will serve the younger, a sign of grace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.35 Iam ex hoc, quem ad modum per posteros Abrahae ciuitatis Dei procurrant tempora, uideamus. A primo igitur anno uitae Isaac usque ad sexagensimum, quo ei nati sunt filii, illud memorabile est, quod, cum illi Deum	Now let us see how, from this point on, the times of the city of God run their course through Abraham's descendants. From the first year of Isaac's life to the sixtieth, when sons were born to him,

91 Genesis 16:3; 25:1; 25:5–6.

LATIN	ENGLISH
roganti ut pareret uxor eius, quae sterilis erat, concessisset Dominus quod petebat, adque haberet illa conceptum, gestiebant gemini adhuc in utero eius inclusi. Qua molestia cum angeretur, Dominum interrogauit accepitque responsum: Duae gentes in utero tuo sunt et duo populi de uentre tuo separabuntur et populus populum superabit et maior seruiet minori.	one thing is worth recalling. He asked God that his wife, who was barren, might bear a child. The Lord granted what he asked, and she conceived, and the twins still enclosed in her womb were struggling. Distressed by this trouble, she asked the Lord and received this answer: "Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples shall be separated from your body. One people shall overcome the other, and the elder shall serve the younger."[92]
Quod Paulus apostolus magnum uult intellegi gratiae documentum, quia nondum illis natis nec aliquid agentibus boni seu mali sine ullis bonis meritis eligitur minor maiore reprobato; quando procul dubio, quantum adtinet ad originale peccatum, ambo pares erant; quantum autem ad proprium, ullius eorum nullum erat. Sed nunc de hac re dicere aliquid latius instituti operis ratio non sinit, unde in aliis iam multa diximus. Quod autem dictum est: Maior seruiet minori, nemo fere nostrorum aliter intellexit, quam maiorem populum Iudaeorum minori Christiano populo seruiturum.	The apostle Paul wants this to be understood as a great proof of grace. Before they were born, and before they had done anything good or bad, the younger is chosen without any good merits and the elder is rejected. Yet beyond doubt, as far as original sin is concerned, both were equal, and as far as personal sin is concerned, neither had any. But the plan of the present work does not allow me to say anything more at length on this subject now, and I have already said much about it in other works. As for the words "The elder shall serve the younger," hardly anyone among us has understood them otherwise than that the elder people, the Jews, would serve the younger, Christian people.
Et re uera quamuis in gente Idumaeorum, quae nata est de maiore, cui duo nomina erant (nam et Esau uocabatur et Edom, unde Idumaei), hoc uideri possit inpletum, quia postea superanda fuerat a populo, qui ortus est ex minore, id est Israelitico, eique fuerat futura subiecta: tamen in aliquid maius intentam fuisse istam prophetiam, qua dictum est: Populus populum superabit et maior seruiet minori, conuenientius creditur. Et quid est hoc, nisi quod in Iudaeis et Christianis euidenter inpletur?	This might indeed seem to have been fulfilled in the nation of the Idumaeans, which was born of the elder son. He had two names, being called both Esau and Edom, and from Edom come the Idumaeans. That nation was later to be overcome by the people that sprang from the younger son, that is, the Israelite people, and was to be subject to it. Still, it is more fitting to believe that the prophecy in which it was said, "One people shall overcome the other, and the elder shall serve the younger," was aimed at something greater. And what is this, if not what is evidently fulfilled in the Jews and the Christians?[93]

THE ORACLE AND BLESSING THAT ISAAC RECEIVED JUST AS HIS FATHER HAD, LOVED FOR HIS FATHER'S SAKE

God renews to Isaac the promises made to Abraham, for his father's sake.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.36 Accepit etiam Isaac tale oraculum, quale aliquotiens pater eius acceperat. De quo oraculo sic scriptum est: Facta est autem fames super terram praeter famem, quae	Isaac also received an oracle like those his father had received several times. Of this oracle it is written thus: "Now there was a famine in the land, be-

92 Genesis 25:23.
93 The Idumaeans, or Edomites, were the people of Edom, south of the Dead Sea.

LATIN

prius facta est in tempore Abrahae. Abiit autem Isaac ad Abimelech regem Philistinorum in Gerara. Apparuit autem illi Dominus et dixit: Noli descendere in Aegyptum; habita autem in terra, quam tibi dixero, et incole in terra hac; et ero tecum et benedicam te.

Tibi enim et semini tuo dabo omnem terram hanc, et statuam iuramentummeum, quod iuraui Abrahae patri tuo; et multiplicabo semen tuum tamquam stellas caeli, et dabo semini tuo omnem terram hanc, et benedicentur in semine tuo omnes gentes terrae, pro eo quod obaudiuit Abraham pater tuus uocem meam et custodiuit praecepta mea et mandata mea et iustificationes meas et legitima mea. Iste patriarcha nec uxorem habuit aliam nec aliquam concubinam, sed posteritate duorum geminorum ex uno concubitu procreatorum contentus fuit. Timuit sane etiam ipse periculum de pulchritudine coniugis, cum habitaret inter alienos, fecitque quod pater, ut eam sororem diceret, taceret uxorem; erat enim ei propinqua et paterno et materno sanguine; sed etiam ipsa ab alienis, cognito quod uxor esset, mansit intacta.

Nec ideo tamen istum patri eius praeferre debemus, quia iste nullam feminam praeter unam coniugem nouerat. Erant enim procul dubio paternae fidei et oboedientiae merita potiora, in tantum, ut propter illum dicat Deus huic se facere bona quae facit.

Benedicentur, inquit, in semine tuo omnes gentes terrae, pro eo quod obaudiuit Abraham pater tuus uocem meam et custodiuit praecepta mea et mandata mea et iustificationes meas et legitima mea; et alio rursus oraculo: Ego sum, inquit, Deus Abraham patris tui, noli timere; tecum enim sum et benedixi te et multiplicabo semen tuum propter Abraham patrem tuum; ut intellegamus quam caste Abraham fecerit, quod hominibus inpudicis et nequitiae suae de scripturis sanctis patrocinia requirentibus uidetur fecisse libidine; deinde ut etiam hoc nouerimus, non ex bonis singulis inter se homines conparare, sed in uno quoque consideremus uniuersa. Fieri enim potest, ut habeat aliquid in uita et moribus quispiam, quo superat alium, idque sit longe praestabilius, quam est illud, unde ab alio superatur.

ENGLISH

sides the famine that had occurred earlier in the time of Abraham. And Isaac went to Abimelech, king of the Philistines, at Gerar. And the Lord appeared to him and said: 'Do not go down into Egypt. Live in the land that I will tell you of, and dwell as a stranger in this land. I will be with you and will bless you.[94]

For to you and to your seed I will give all this land, and I will establish the oath that I swore to Abraham your father. I will multiply your seed like the stars of heaven, and I will give all this land to your seed, and in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, because Abraham your father obeyed my voice and kept my precepts, my commandments, my ordinances, and my statutes.'" This patriarch had no other wife and no concubine. He was content with the offspring of twins begotten from a single union. He too, of course, feared danger on account of his wife's beauty when he was living among foreigners. He did as his father had done: he called her his sister and kept silent that she was his wife, for she was related to him by both his father's and his mother's blood. But she too remained untouched by the foreigners once they learned that she was his wife.

Yet we should not rank him above his father simply because he knew no woman but his one wife. For his father's merits of faith and obedience were beyond doubt greater, so much so that God says it is for Abraham's sake that he does Isaac the good he does.

"In your seed," he says, "all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, because Abraham your father obeyed my voice and kept my precepts, my commandments, my ordinances, and my statutes." And again, in another oracle: "I am," he says, "the God of Abraham your father. Do not be afraid, for I am with you. I have blessed you and will multiply your seed for the sake of Abraham your father." This is so that we may understand how chastely Abraham acted in a matter that shameless people think he did out of lust, since they look to the holy Scriptures for a defense of their own wickedness. It is also so that we may learn not to compare people with one another by single good qualities, but to consider everything in each one. For it can happen that someone has something in his life

94 Genesis 26:1–5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	and character in which he surpasses another, and that this is far more excellent than the quality in which the other surpasses him.[95]
Ac per hoc sano ueroque iudicio, cum continentia coniugio praeferatur, melior est tamen homo fidelis coniugatus quam continens infidelis. Sed infidelis homo non solum minus laudandus, uerum etiam maxime detestandus est. Constituamus ambos bonos; etiam sic profecto melior est coniugatus fidelissimus et oboedientissimus Deo quam continens minoris fidei minorisque oboedientiae. Si uero paria sint cetera, continentem coniugato praeferre quis ambigat?	And so, by sound and true judgment, although celibacy is ranked above marriage, a married believer is still better than a celibate unbeliever. Indeed, the unbeliever is not only less to be praised but utterly to be detested. Let us suppose that both are good. Even so, surely, a married man who is most faithful and most obedient to God is better than a celibate one of less faith and less obedience. But if all else is equal, who would hesitate to rank the celibate above the married?

WHAT WAS MYSTICALLY FORESHADOWED IN ESAU AND JACOB

Jacob receives Isaac's blessing in place of Esau, a mystery of Christ blessed among the nations.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.37 Duo igitur Isaac filii Esau et Iacob pariter crescunt. Primatus maioris transfunditur in minorem ex pacto et placito inter illos, eo quod lenticulam, quem cibum minor parauerat, maior inmoderatius concupiuit, eoque pretio primogenita sua fratri iuratione interposita uendidit. Ubi discimus in uescendo non cibi genere, sed auiditate inmodesta quemque culpandum. Senescit Isaac eiusque oculis per senectam uisus aufertur. Vult benedicere filium maiorem et pro illo nesciens benedicit minorem, pro fratre maiore, qui erat pilosus, se paternis manibus subponentem, haedinis sibi pelliculis coaptatis uelut aliena peccata portantem. Iste dolus Iacob ne putaretur fraudulentus dolus et non in eo magnae rei mysterium quaereretur, superius praedixit scriptura: Et erat Esau homo sciens uenari, agrestis; Iacob autem homo simplex, habitans domum. Hoc nostri quidam interpretati sunt sine dolo.	So the two sons of Isaac, Esau and Jacob, grow up together. The elder's primacy passes to the younger by an agreement and bargain between them. The elder craved too greedily the lentils that the younger had prepared as food, and for that price he sold his birthright to his brother, with an oath sworn. From this we learn that in eating, a person is to be blamed not for the kind of food but for immoderate greed. Isaac grows old, and with old age the sight of his eyes is taken from him. He wants to bless his elder son, and without knowing it he blesses the younger instead. The younger put himself under his father's hands in place of his hairy elder brother, having fitted himself with little goatskins, as if bearing the sins of another. Scripture took care that this guile of Jacob's would not be thought fraudulent guile, and that the mystery of a great matter would be sought in it. So it had said beforehand: "And Esau was a man skilled in hunting, a man of the fields; but Jacob was a simple man, living at home." Some of our translators have rendered this "without guile."[96]
Siue autem sine dolo siue simplex siue potius sine fictione dicatur, quod est Graece ἄπλαστος: quis est in ista percipienda benedictione dolus hominis sine dolo? Quis est dolus simplicis, quae fictio non mentientis, nisi profundum mysterium ueritatis? Ipsa autem benedictio qualis est? Ecce, inquit, odor filii mei tamquam odor agri	But whether he is called "without guile," or "simple," or rather "without pretense"—in Greek ἄπλαστος [unfeigned]—what guile is there when a man without guile receives this blessing? What guile belongs to the simple, what pretense to one who does not lie, if not a deep mystery of the pleni, quem benedixit Dominus. Et det tibi Deus de rore caeli et de ubertate terrae et multitudinem frumenti et uini, et seruiant tibi gentes et adorent te principes et fiere dominus fratris tui et adorabunt te filii patris tui. Qui maledixerit te, maledictus; et qui benedixerit te, benedictus. Benedictio igitur Iacob praedicatio est Christi in omnibus gentibus. Hoc fit, hoc agitur.

95 Genesis 26:24.
96 Genesis 25:27.

LATIN

Lex et prophetia est Isaac; etiam per os Iudaeorum Christus ab illa benedicitur, uelut a nesciente, quia ipsa nescitur. Odore nominis Christi, sicut ager, mundus inpletur; eius est benedictio de rore caeli, hoc est de uerborum pluuia diuinorum, et de ubertate terrae, hoc est congregatione populorum; eius est multitudo frumenti et uini, hoc est multitudo quam colligit frumentum et uinum in sacramento corporis eius et sanguinis. Ei seruiunt gentes, ipsum adorant principes; ipse est dominus fratris sui, quia populus eius dominatur Iudaeis; ipsum adorant filii patris eius, hoc est filii Abrahae secundum fidem, quia et ipse filius est Abrahae secundum carnem; ipsum qui maledixerit, maledictus, et qui benedixerit, benedictus est.

Christus, inquam, noster etiam ex ore Iudaeorum quamuis errantium, sed tamen legem prophetasque cantantium benedicitur, id est ueraciter dicitur; et alius benedici putatur, qui ab eis errantibus exspectatur. Ecce benedictionem promissam repetente maiore expauescit Isaac, et alium se pro alio benedixisse cognoscit; miratur et quisnam ille sit percontatur; nec tamen se deceptum esse conqueritur; immo confestim reuelato sibi intus in corde magno sacramento deuitat indignationem, confirmat benedictionem. Quis ergo, inquit, uenatus est mihi uenationem et intulit mihi, et manducaui ab omnibus, antequam tu uenires? et benedixi eum, et benedictus sit. Quis non hic maledictionem potius exspectaret irati, si haec non superna inspiratione, sed terreno more gererentur? o res gestas, sed prophetice gestas; in terra, sed caelitus; per homines, sed diuinitus!

ENGLISH

truth? And what kind of blessing is it? "See," he says, "the smell of my son is like the smell of a full field that the Lord has blessed. May God give you of the dew of heaven and of the richness of the earth, and abundance of grain and wine. Let nations serve you, and princes bow down to you. Be lord of your brother, and your father's sons shall bow down to you. Whoever curses you, let him be cursed; and whoever blesses you, let him be blessed." The blessing of Jacob, then, is the proclamation of Christ among all the nations. This is happening; this is being done now.[97]

Isaac is the Law and prophecy. Even through the mouth of the Jews Christ is blessed by it, as if by one who does not know, because the Law itself is not understood. The world, like a field, is filled with the fragrance of Christ's name. His is the blessing of the dew of heaven, that is, of the rain of divine words, and of the richness of the earth, that is, of the gathering of the peoples. His is the abundance of grain and wine, that is, the multitude that grain and wine gather together in the sacrament of his body and blood. The nations serve him; princes bow down to him. He is lord of his brother, because his people rules over the Jews. The sons of his father bow down to him, that is, the sons of Abraham according to faith, because he himself is also a son of Abraham according to the flesh. Whoever curses him is cursed, and whoever blesses him is blessed.

Our Christ, I say, is blessed even from the mouth of the Jews. Though they are in error, they still sing the Law and the Prophets, and so through them he is blessed, that is, spoken of truly. Yet they think it is another who is being blessed, the one they in their error are waiting for. Look: when the elder son asks for the promised blessing, Isaac is terrified and realizes that he has blessed one son in place of the other. He wonders and asks who it could have been. Yet he does not complain that he was deceived. On the contrary, the great mystery is at once revealed to him inwardly, in his heart, and he holds back his indignation and confirms the blessing. "Who, then," he says, "was it that hunted game for me and brought it to me, and I ate of it all before you came? I blessed him, and blessed he shall be." Who would not have expected

97 Genesis 27:27–29.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	an angry man's curse here instead, if these things were being done not by inspiration from above but in an earthly way? O deeds truly done, but done prophetically; on earth, but from heaven; by human beings, but by God![98]
Si excutiantur singula tantis fecunda mysteriis, multa sunt inplenda uolumina; sed huic operi modus moderate inponendus nos in alia festinare conpellit.	If each of these details, so rich in great mysteries, were examined one by one, many volumes would have to be filled. But the measured limit that must be set on this work compels us to hurry on to other matters.

JACOB'S BEING SENT TO MESOPOTAMIA TO TAKE A WIFE, THE VISION HE DREAMED ON THE WAY, AND HIS FOUR WOMEN, THOUGH HE HAD ASKED FOR ONE WIFE

Jacob sees the ladder to heaven and marries four women, but sought only one wife.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.38 Mittitur Iacob a parentibus in Mesopotamiam, ut ibi ducat uxorem. Patris mittentis uerba haec sunt: Non accipies uxorem ex filiabus Chananaeorum; surgens fuge in Mesopotamiam in domum Bathuel, patris matris tuae, et sume tibi inde uxorem de filiabus. Laban, fratris matris tuae. Deus autem meus benedicat te et augeat te et multiplicet te; et eris in congregationes gentium; et det tibi benedictionem Abraham patris tui, tibi et semini tuo post te, ut heres fias terrae incolatus tui, quam dedit Deus Abraham. Hic iam intellegimus segregatum semen Iacob ab alio semine Isaac, quod factum est per Esau.	Jacob is sent by his parents to Mesopotamia to take a wife there. These are the words of his father as he sends him: "You shall not take a wife from the daughters of the Canaanites. Rise and flee to Mesopotamia, to the house of Bethuel, your mother's father, and take a wife for yourself from there, from the daughters of Laban, your mother's brother. And may my God bless you and increase you and multiply you, and you shall become a gathering of nations. And may he give you the blessing of Abraham your father, to you and to your seed after you, so that you may become heir of the land where you sojourn, which God gave to Abraham." Here we now understand that the seed of Jacob has been set apart from the other seed of Isaac, the one that came through Esau.[99]
Quando enim dictum est: In Isaac uocabitur tibi semen, pertinens utique semen ad ciuitatem Dei, separatum est inde aliud semen Abrahae, quod erat in ancillae filio, et quod futurum erat in filiis Cetturae. Sed adhuc erat ambiguum de duobus geminis filiis Isaac, ad utrumque an ad unum eorum illa benedictio pertineret: et si ad unum, quisnam esset illorum. Quod nunc declaratum est, cum prophetice a patre benedicitur Iacob et dicitur ei: Et eris in congregationes gentium, et det tibi benedictionem Abraham patris tui.	When it was said, "In Isaac your seed shall be called," that seed belonged, of course, to the city of God. Another seed of Abraham was then separated from it: the one in the son of the slave woman, and the one that would be in the sons of Keturah. But it was still uncertain whether that blessing belonged to both of Isaac's twin sons or to only one of them, and if to one, which of them it was. This has now been made clear, when Jacob is prophetically blessed by his father and is told: "And you shall become a gathering of nations, and may he give you the blessing of Abraham your father."[100]
Pergens itaque in Mesopotamiam Iacob in somnis accepit oraculum, de quo sic scriptum est: Et exiit Iacob a puteo	So, as Jacob was on his way to Mesopotamia, he received an oracle in a dream, of which it is written:

98 Genesis 27:33.

LATIN	ENGLISH
iurationis et profectus est in Charran et deuenit in locum et dormiuit ibi; occiderat enim sol; et sumsit ex lapidibus loci et posuit ad caput suum et dormiuit in loco illo et somniauit. Et ecce scala stabilita super terram, cuius caput pertingebat ad caelum; et angeli.	"And Jacob went out from the well of the oath and set out for Haran. He came to a place and slept there, for the sun had set. He took some of the stones of the place, put them at his head, slept in that place, and dreamed. And there was a ladder set up on the earth, whose top reached to heaven; and the angels[101]
Dei ascendebant et descendebant per illam, et Dominus incumbebat super illam et dixit: Ego sum Deus Abraham patris tui et Deus Isaac, noli timere; terram, in qua tu dormis super eam, tibi dabo illam et semini tuo; et erit semen tuum sicut harena terrae, et dilatabitur supra mare et in Africum et in aquilonem et ad orientem; et benedicentur in te omnes tribus terrae et in semine tuo. Et ecce ego sum tecum, custodiens te in omni uia quacumque ibis, et reducam te in terram hanc, quia non te derelinquam, donec faciam omnia, quae tecum locutus sum. Et surrexit Iacob de somno suo et dixit: Quia est Dominus in loco hoc, ego autem nesciebam. Et timuit et dixit: Quam terribilis locus hic!	of God were going up and coming down on it, and the Lord was leaning over it, and he said: 'I am the God of Abraham your father and the God of Isaac; do not be afraid. The land on which you are sleeping I will give to you and to your seed. Your seed shall be like the sand of the earth, and it shall spread out over the sea, and to the southwest, and to the north, and to the east; and in you and in your seed all the tribes of the earth shall be blessed. And see, I am with you, guarding you on every road you take, and I will bring you back to this land; for I will not abandon you until I have done all that I have spoken to you.' And Jacob rose from his sleep and said, 'The Lord is in this place, and I did not know it.' And he was afraid and said, 'How awesome this place is!
non est hoc nisi domus Dei et haec porta est caeli. Et surrexit Iacob et sumsit lapidem, quem subposuit ibi sub caput suum, et statuit illum titulum et superfudit oleum in cacumen eius; et uocauit Iacob nomen loci illius: domus Dei. Hoc ad prophetiam pertinet; nec more idolatriae lapidem perfudit oleo Iacob, uelut faciens illum Deum; neque enim adorauit eundem lapidem uel ei sacrificauit; sed quoniam Christi nomen a chrismate est, id est ab unctione, profecto figuratum est hic aliquid, quod ad magnum pertineat sacramentum.	This is nothing other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.' And Jacob rose and took the stone that he had put under his head there, set it up as a monument, and poured oil on its top; and Jacob called the name of that place House of God." This belongs to prophecy. Jacob did not pour oil over the stone in the manner of idolatry, as if making it a god; for he neither worshiped that stone nor sacrificed to it. But since the name of Christ comes from chrisma, that is, from anointing, something was surely prefigured here that pertains to a great mystery.[102]
Scalam uero istam intellegitur ipse Saluator nobis in memoriam reuocare in euangelio, ubi, cum dixisset de Nathanael: Ecce uere Israelita, in quo dolus non est, quia Israel uiderat istam uisionem (ipse est enim Iacob), eodem loco ait: Amen, amen, dico uobis, uidebitis caelum apertum et angelos Dei ascendentes et descendentes super filium hominis.	This ladder, moreover, is understood to be what the Savior himself recalls to our minds in the gospel. He had said of Nathanael, "Here is truly an Israelite in whom there is no deceit," because Israel had seen this vision (for Israel is Jacob). In the same passage he then says: "Truly, truly, I tell you, you will see heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man."[103]

99 Genesis 28:1–4.
100 Genesis 21:12. The slave woman's son is Ishmael, son of Hagar.
101 Genesis 28:10–19. The "well of the oath" is Beersheba.
102 Greek christos means "anointed."
103 John 1:47, 51.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Perrexit ergo Iacob in Mesopotamiam, ut inde acciperet uxorem. Unde autem illi acciderit quattuor habere feminas, de quibus duodecim filios et unam filiam procreauit, cum earum nullam concupisset inlicite, indicat scriptura diuina. Ad unam quippe accipiendam uenerat; sed cum illi altera subposita fuisset, nec ipsam dimisit, qua nesciens usus fuerat in nocte, ne ludibrio eam uideretur habuisse, et eo tempore, quando multiplicandae posteritatis causa plures uxores lex nulla prohibebat, accepit etiam illam, cui uni iam futuri coniugii fidem fecerat. Quae cum esset sterilis, ancillam suam, de qua filios ipsa susciperet, marito dedit; quod etiam maior soror eius, quamuis peperisset, imitata, quoniam multiplicare prolem cupiebat, effecit.	So Jacob went on to Mesopotamia to take a wife from there. How it came about that he had four women, by whom he fathered twelve sons and one daughter, though he had desired none of them unlawfully, divine Scripture makes known. He had come, after all, to take one; but when another had been substituted for her, he did not send that one away either, since he had had relations with her unknowingly in the night, lest he seem to have made a mockery of her. And at a time when no law forbade several wives for the sake of multiplying posterity, he also took the one to whom alone he had already pledged his future marriage. Since she was barren, she gave her slave woman to her husband, so that she herself might have children by her. Her elder sister, though she had borne children, did the same in imitation, because she wanted to multiply her offspring.[104]
Nullam Iacob legitur petisse praeter unam, nec usus plurimis nisi gignendae prolis officio, coniugali iure seruato, ut neque hoc faceret, nisi uxores eius id fieri flagitassent, quae corporis uiri sui habebant legitimam potestatem. Genuit ergo duodecim filios et unam filiam ex quattuor mulieribus. Deinde ingressus est in Aegyptum per filium suum Ioseph, qui uenditus ab inuidentibus fratribus eo perductus fuit adque ibidem sublimatus.	We do not read that Jacob sought any woman but one, nor that he had relations with several except for the duty of begetting offspring, keeping to the rights of marriage; so that he would not have done even this unless his wives had demanded it, since they had lawful authority over their husband's body. So he fathered twelve sons and one daughter by four women. Then he entered Egypt through his son Joseph, who had been sold by his envious brothers, taken there, and raised to high rank in that very place.

WHY JACOB WAS ALSO CALLED ISRAEL

Jacob wrestles with an angel and is named Israel, blessed and lamed at once.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.39 Iacob autem etiam Israel, sicut paulo ante dixi, uocabatur, quod nomen magis populus ex illo procreatus obtinuit. Hoc autem nomen illi ab angelo inpositum est, qui cum illo fuerat in itinere de Mesopotamia redeunte luctatus, typum Christi euidentissime gerens. Nam quod ei praeualuit Iacob, utique uolenti, ut mysterium figuraret, significat passionem Christi, ubi uisi sunt ei praeualere Iudaei. Et tamen benedictionem ab eodem angelo, quem superauerat, inpetrauit; ac sic huius nominis inpositio benedictio fuit. Interpretatur autem Israel uidens Deum quod erit in fine praemium sanctorum omnium. Tetigit porro illi idem angelus ueluti praeualenti latitudinem femoris eumque isto modo	Jacob, as I said a little earlier, was also called Israel, a name that came to belong more to the people descended from him. This name was given to him by the angel who wrestled with him on the road as he was returning from Mesopotamia, and who quite plainly bore the figure of Christ. For the fact that Jacob prevailed over him—who was of course willing, so as to prefigure a mystery—signifies the passion of Christ, when the Jews seemed to prevail over him. And yet Jacob obtained a blessing from the very angel he had overcome; and so the giving of this name was itself a blessing. Now

104 Leah was substituted for Rachel; their slave women were Zilpah and Bilhah (Genesis 29–30).

LATIN	ENGLISH
claudum reddidit. Erat itaque unus adque idem Iacob et benedictus et claudus: benedictus in eis, qui in Christum ex eodem populo crediderunt, adque in infidelibus claudus.	Israel means "seeing God," which will be the reward of all the saints at the end. Moreover, the same angel touched him, as though he were the one prevailing, on the broad part of his thigh, and in this way made him lame. So one and the same Jacob was both blessed and lame: blessed in those of that same people who believed in Christ, and lame in the unbelievers.[105]
Nam femoris latitudo generis multitudo est. Plures quippe sunt in ea stirpe, de quibus prophetice praedictum est: Et claudicauerunt a semitis suis.	For the broad part of the thigh is the multitude of the race. Indeed, the greater part of that stock are those of whom it was prophetically foretold: "And they limped away from their paths."[106]

HOW JACOB IS SAID TO HAVE ENTERED EGYPT WITH SEVENTY-FIVE SOULS, THOUGH MOST OF THOSE LISTED WERE BORN LATER

The seventy-five who "entered Egypt" include descendants born during Joseph's lifetime.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.40 Ingressi itaque referuntur in Aegyptum simul cum ipso Iacob septuaginta quinque homines, adnumerato ipso filiis suis. In quo numero duae tantum feminae commemorantur, una filia, neptis altera. Sed res diligenter considerata non indicat, quod tantus numerus fuerit in progenie Iacob die uel anno quo ingressus est Aegyptum. Commemorati sunt quippe in eis etiam pronepotes Ioseph, qui nullo modo iam tunc esse potuerunt, quoniam tunc centum triginta annorum erat Iacob, filius uero eius Ioseph triginta nouem; quem cum accepisse tricensimo anno suo uel amplius constet uxorem, quo modo potuit per nouem annos habere pronepotes de filiis, quos ex eadem uxore suscepit?	So we are told that seventy-five people entered Egypt together with Jacob himself, counting him with his sons. In this number only two women are mentioned, one a daughter, the other a granddaughter. But when the matter is carefully considered, it does not indicate that Jacob's descendants numbered so many on the day or in the year when he entered Egypt. For among them are listed even Joseph's great-grandsons, who could not possibly have existed by then, since Jacob was then a hundred and thirty years old and his son Joseph thirty-nine. Since it is established that Joseph took a wife in his thirtieth year or later, how could he within nine years have great-grandsons through the sons he had by that same wife?[107]
Cum igitur nec filios haberent Ephraem et Manasses, filii Ioseph, sed eos pueros infra quam nouennes Iacob Aegyptum ingressus inuenerit, quo pacto eorum non solum filii, sed etiam nepotes in illis septuaginta quinque numerantur, qui tunc Aegyptum ingressi sunt cum Iacob? Nam commemoratur ibi Machir, filius Manasse, nepos Ioseph, et eiusdem Machir filius, id est Galaad, nepos Manasse, pronepos Ioseph; ibi est et quem genuit Ephraem, alter filius Ioseph, id est Utalaam, nepos Ioseph, et filius ipsius Utalaae Edem, nepos Ephraem, pronepos Ioseph; qui nullo modo esse potuerunt, quando Iacob in Aegyptum uenit et filios Ioseph, nepotes suos,	Since, then, Ephraim and Manasseh, Joseph's sons, had no sons of their own, but Jacob on entering Egypt found them boys under nine years old, how is it that not only their sons but even their grandsons are counted among those seventy-five who entered Egypt with Jacob at that time? For listed there is Machir, son of Manasseh and grandson of Joseph, and Machir's son Gilead, grandson of Manasseh and great-grandson of Joseph. There too is the son whom Ephraim, Joseph's other son, fathered, Utalaam, grandson of Joseph, and Utalaam's son Edem, grandson of Ephraim and great-

105 Genesis 32:24–32.
106 Psalm 17:46 (18:45 in most English Bibles).
107 Genesis 46:8–27 in the Greek Septuagint, which gives seventy-five (the Hebrew text has seventy).

LATIN

auos istorum, minores quam nouem annorum pueros inuenit.

Sed nimirum introitus Iacob in Aegyptum, quando eum in septuaginta quinque hominibus scriptura commemorat, non unus dies uel unus annus, sed totum illud est tempus, quamdiu uixit loseph, per quem factum est ut intrarent. Nam de ipso Ioseph eadem scriptura sic loquitur: Et habitauit Ioseph in Aegypto, ipse et fratres eius et omnis cohabitatio patris eius, et uixit annos centum decem, et uidit Ioseph Ephraem filios usque in tertiam generationem. Ipse est ille pronepos eius ab Ephraem tertius. Generationem quippe tertiam dicit filium, nepotem, pronepotem. Deinde sequitur: Et filii Machir, filii Manasse, nati sunt supra femora Ioseph. Et hic ille ipse est nepos Manasse, pronepos Ioseph.

Sed pluraliter appellati sunt, sicut scriptura consueuit, quae unam quoque filiam Iacob filias nuncupauit; sicut in Latinae linguae consuetudine liberi dicuntur pluraliter filii, etiamsi non sint uno amplius. Cum ergo ipsius Ioseph praedicetur felicitas, quia potuit uidere pronepotes, nullo modo putandi sunt iam fuisse tricensimo nono anno proaui sui Ioseph, quando ad eum in Aegyptum Iacob pater eius aduenit. Illud autem est, quod fallit minus ista diligenter intuentes, quoniam scriptum est: Haec autem nomina filiorum Israel, qui intrauerunt in Aegyptum simul cum Iacob patre suo. Hoc enim dictum est, quia simul cum illo conputantur septuaginta quinque, non quia simul iam erant omnes, quando Aegyptum ingressus est ipse; sed, ut dixi, totum tempus habetur eius ingressus, quo uixit Ioseph, per quem uidetur ingressus.

ENGLISH

grandson of Joseph. These could not possibly have existed when Jacob came to Egypt and found Joseph's sons—his own grandsons, the grandfathers of these men—to be boys under nine.[108]

But clearly Jacob's entry into Egypt, when Scripture records it as an entry of seventy-five people, is not one day or one year, but the whole period during which Joseph lived, through whom it came about that they entered. For of Joseph himself the same Scripture says: "And Joseph lived in Egypt, he and his brothers and all his father's household; and he lived a hundred and ten years, and Joseph saw Ephraim's children to the third generation." That is his great-grandson, the third from Ephraim; for by the third generation it means son, grandson and great-grandson. Then it continues: "And the sons of Machir, son of Manasseh, were born upon Joseph's knees." And this is that very grandson of Manasseh, great-grandson of Joseph.[109]

They are referred to in the plural, as Scripture customarily does; it even called Jacob's one daughter "daughters," just as in Latin usage one's children are called liberi, a plural, even when there is no more than one. Since, then, Joseph's happiness is proclaimed precisely in that he was able to see great-grandsons, they are by no means to be thought to have already existed in the thirty-ninth year of their great-grandfather Joseph, when his father Jacob came to him in Egypt. What misleads those who look at these things less carefully is that it is written: "Now these are the names of the sons of Israel who entered Egypt together with Jacob their father." This is said because seventy-five are counted together with him, not because they were all already together with him when he himself entered Egypt. Rather, as I said, the whole period during which Joseph lived, through whom the entry appears to have taken place, is treated as the time of his entry.[110]

108 Augustine's Utalaam and Edem correspond to Shuthelah and Eran in most English Bibles (Numbers 26:35–36).
109 Genesis 50:22–23.
110 Genesis 46:8.

THE BLESSING JACOB PROMISED TO HIS SON JUDAH

Jacob's blessing of Judah foretells Christ's death, resurrection and rule.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
16.41	Igitur propter populum Christianum, in quo Dei ciuitas peregrinatur in terris, si carnem Christi in Abrahae semine requiramus, remotis concubinarum filiis occurrit Isaac; si in semine Isaac, remoto Esau, qui est etiam Edom, occurrit Iacob, qui est et Israel; si in semine ipsius Israel, remotis ceteris occurrit ludas, quia de tribu Iuda exortus est Christus. Ac per hoc cum in Aegypto moriturus Israel suos filios benediceret, quem ad modum ludam prophetice benedixerit, audiamus: Iuda, inquit, te laudabunt fratres tui. Manus tuae super dorsum inimicorum tuorum; adorabunt te filii patris tui. Catulus leonis Iuda; ex germinatione, fili mi, ascendisti; recumbens dormisti ut leo et ut catulus leonis; quis suscitabit eum?	Therefore, for the sake of the Christian people, in whom the city of God is a pilgrim on earth, if we look for the flesh of Christ in Abraham's seed, setting aside the sons of the concubines, we come upon Isaac; if in Isaac's seed, setting aside Esau, who is also Edom, we come upon Jacob, who is also Israel; if in the seed of Israel himself, setting aside the rest, we come upon Judah, because Christ sprang from the tribe of Judah. And so, when Israel was about to die in Egypt and was blessing his sons, let us hear how he blessed Judah prophetically. "Judah," he says, "your brothers shall praise you. Your hands shall be on the back of your enemies; your father's sons shall worship you. Judah is a lion's cub; from the shoot, my son, you have gone up. Lying down you have slept like a lion and like a lion's cub; who will rouse him?[111]
	Non deficiet princeps ex Iuda et dux de femoribus eius, donec ueniant quae reposita sunt ei; et ipse exspectatio gentium; adligans ad uitem pullum suum et cilicio pullum asinae suae lauabit in uino stolam suam et in sanguine uuae amictum suum. Fului oculi eius a uino et dentes candidiores lacte. Exposui haec aduersus Manichaeum Faustum disputans et satis esse arbitror, quantum ueritas prophetiae huius elucet; ubi et mors Christi praedicta est uerbo dormitionis et non necessitas, sed potestas in morte nomine leonis. Quam potestatem in euangelio ipse praedicat dicens: Potestatem habeo ponendi animam meam et potestatem habeo iterum sumendi eam. Nemo eam tollit a me; sed ego eam pono a me, et iterum sumo eam. Sic leo fremuit, sic quod dixit inpleuit.	A ruler shall not be lacking from Judah, nor a leader from his thighs, until the things stored up for him come; and he is the expectation of the nations. Binding his colt to the vine, and the colt of his donkey with haircloth, he will wash his robe in wine and his garment in the blood of the grape. His eyes are tawny with wine, and his teeth whiter than milk." I have expounded this in my disputation against the Manichaean Faustus, and I think that is enough, so clearly does the truth of this prophecy shine out. Here the death of Christ is foretold by the word "sleep," and by the name "lion" his death is shown to be not necessity but power. This power he himself proclaims in the gospel, saying: "I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it up again. No one takes it from me; but I lay it down of myself, and I take it up again." So the lion roared; so he fulfilled what he said.[112]
	Ad eam namque pertinet potestatem, quod de resurrectione eius adiunctum est: Quis suscitabit eum? hoc est, quia nullus hominum, nisi se ipse, qui etiam de corpore suo dixit: Soluite templum hoc, et in triduo resuscitabo illud. Ipsum autem genus mortis, hoc est sublimitas crucis, in uno uerbo intellegitur, quod ait:	For to that power belongs what is added about his resurrection: "Who will rouse him?" That is, no human being, but only he himself, who also said of his own body: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again." The very manner of his death, that is, the height of the cross, is

111 Genesis 49:8–12.
112 John 10:18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ascendisti. Quod uero addidit: Recumbens dormisti, euangelista exponit, ubi dicit: Et inclinato capite tradidit spiritum; aut certe sepultura eius agnoscitur, in qua recubuit dormiens, et unde illum nullus hominum, sicut prophetae aliquos uel sicut ipse alios, suscitauit, sed sicut a somno ipse surrexit.	understood in the single word "You have gone up." And what he adds, "Lying down you have slept," the evangelist explains when he says: "And bowing his head he gave up his spirit." Or else his burial is meant, in which he lay down sleeping, and from which no human being raised him, as prophets raised some or as he himself raised others; rather, he rose by himself, as if from sleep.[113]
Stola porro eius, quam lauat in uino, id est mundat a peccatis in sanguine suo, cuius sanguinis sacramentum baptizati sciunt, unde et adiungit: Et in sanguine uuae amictum suum, quid est nisi ecclesia? Et fului oculi eius a uino spiritales eius inebriati poculo eius, de quo canit psalmus: Et calix tuus inebrians quam praeclarus est! Et dentes eius candidiores lacte, quod potant aput apostolum paruuli, uerba scilicet nutrientia, nondum idonei solido cibo. Ipse igitur est, in quo reposita erant promissa Iudae, quae donec uenirent numquam principes, hoc est reges Israel, ab illa stirpe defuerunt. Et ipse exspectatio gentium; quod clarius est uidendo quam fit exponendo.	Further, his robe, which he washes in wine—that is, cleanses from sins in his own blood, the sacrament of which blood the baptized know, and so he adds, "and his garment in the blood of the grape"—what is it but the Church? "And his eyes tawny with wine" are his spiritual ones, made drunk by his cup, of which the psalm sings: "And your cup that makes drunk, how splendid it is!" "And his teeth whiter than milk": that milk which, in the apostle, the little ones drink—nourishing words, that is, for those not yet ready for solid food. He, then, is the one in whom the promises to Judah were stored up; and until they came, rulers—that is, kings of Israel—were never lacking from that stock. "And he is the expectation of the nations": this is clearer to see than it is to explain.[114]

THE SONS OF JOSEPH, WHOM JACOB BLESSED BY PROPHETICALLY CROSSING HIS HANDS

Jacob crosses his hands to bless Joseph's younger son above the elder.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.42 Sicut autem duo Isaac filii. Esau et Iacob, figuram praebuerunt duorum populorum in Iudaeis et Christianis (quamuis, quod ad carnis propaginem pertinet, nec Iudaei uenerint de semine Esau, sed Idumaei; nec Christianae gentes de Iacob, sed potius Iudaei; ad hoc enim tantum figura ualuit, quod dictum est: Maior seruiet minori): ita factum est etiam in duobus filiis Ioseph; nam maior gessit typum Iudaeorum, Christianorum autem minor. Quos cum benediceret Iacob, manum dextram ponens super minorem quem habebat ad sinistram, sinistram super maiorem quem habebat ad dextram: graue uisum est patri eorum, et admonuit patrem uelut corrigens eius errorem et quisnam eorum esset maior ostendens. At ille mutare manus noluit, sed dixit: Scio, fili, scio.	The two sons of Isaac, Esau and Jacob, provided a figure of two peoples, the Jews and the Christians—although, as far as physical descent goes, it was not the Jews who came from the seed of Esau but the Idumaeans, nor the Christian nations who came from Jacob but rather the Jews; for the figure held good only for what was said: "The elder shall serve the younger." In the same way, this also happened with the two sons of Joseph: the elder bore the figure of the Jews, the younger that of the Christians. When Jacob was blessing them, he placed his right hand on the younger, whom he had on his left, and his left hand on the elder, whom he had on his right. Their father thought this wrong, and he warned his own father, as though correcting his mistake and showing him which of them was the elder. But Jacob refused to 113 John 2:19; John 19:30.

114 Psalm 22:5 (23:5 in most English Bibles); the apostle is Paul, 1 Corinthians 3:2.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	change his hands, and said: "I know, my son, I know.[115]
Et hic erit in populum, et hic exaltabitur; sed frater eius iunior maior illo erit, et semen eius erit in multitudinem gentium. Etiam hic duo illa promissa demonstrat. Nam ille in populum, iste in multitudinem gentium. Quid euidentius quam his duabus promissionibus contineri populum Israelitarum orbemque terrarum in semine Abrahae, illum secundum carnem, istum secundum fidem?	He too shall become a people, and he too shall be exalted; but his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." Here too he points to those two promises: the one is to become a people, the other a multitude of nations. What could be more evident than that these two promises comprise, in the seed of Abraham, the people of Israel and the whole world —the one according to the flesh, the other according to faith?

THE TIMES OF MOSES, OF JOSHUA SON OF NUN, OF THE JUDGES, AND THEN OF THE KINGS, OF WHOM SAUL WAS THE FIRST BUT DAVID THE CHIEF, BOTH IN SACRAMENTAL MEANING AND IN MERIT

From Moses to David: the exodus, the law, the conquest, the judges and the first kings.

LATIN	ENGLISH
16.43 Defuncto Iacob, defuncto etiam Ioseph per reliquos centum quadraginta quattuor annos, donec exiretur de terra Aegypti, in modum incredibilem illa gens creuit, etiam tantis adtrita persecutionibus, ut quodam tempore nati masculi necarentur, cum mirantes Aegyptios nimia populi illius incrementa terrerent. Tunc Moyses subtractus furto trucidatoribus paruulorum ad domum regiam, ingentia per eum Deo praeparante, peruenit nutritusque et adoptatus a filia Pharaonis (quod nomen in Aegypto omnium regum fuit) in tantum prouenit uirum, ut ipse illam gentem mirabiliter multiplicatam ex durissimo et grauissimo, quod ibi ferebat, iugo seruitutis extraheret, immo per eum Deus, qui hoc promiserat Abrahae. Prius quippe exinde fugiens, quod, cum Israelitam defenderet, Aegyptum occiderat et territus fuerat, postea diuinitus missus in potestate spiritus Dei superauit Pharaonis resistentes magos.	After Jacob died, and Joseph died too, during the remaining hundred and forty-four years until the departure from the land of Egypt, that nation grew to an incredible degree, even though it was worn down by persecutions so severe that at one time its newborn males were put to death, since the Egyptians were astonished and terrified by that people's excessive growth. Then Moses, secretly rescued from the slaughterers of infants, reached the royal house, as God was preparing great things through him. Raised and adopted by Pharaoh's daughter (Pharaoh was the name of all the kings in Egypt), he grew into so great a man that he himself brought that wonderfully multiplied nation out from the extremely hard and heavy yoke of slavery it bore there—or rather, God did so through him, God who had promised this to Abraham. Earlier he had fled from there, because in defending an Israelite he had killed an Egyptian and had become afraid; afterwards, sent by God, in the power of the Spirit of God he overcame Pharaoh's magicians who resisted him.
Tunc per eum Aegyptiis inlatae sunt decem memorabiles plagae, cum dimittere populum Dei nollent, aqua in sanguinem uersa, rana et sciniphes, cynomyia, mors pecorum, ulcera, grando, lucusta, tenebrae, mors primogenitorum. Ad extremum Israelitas, quos plagis tot tantisque perfracti tandem aliquando dimiserant, Aegyptii in mari Rubro dum persequuntur extincti sunt.	Then through him ten memorable plagues were brought upon the Egyptians when they refused to let God's people go: water turned into blood, frogs and gnats, dog-flies, the death of livestock, sores, hail, locusts, darkness, and the death of the firstborn. Finally, the Egyptians, who, broken by so many great plagues, had at long last let the Israel-

115 Genesis 25:23; the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh is in Genesis 48:13–19.

LATIN

Illis quippe abeuntibus diuisum mare uiam fecit; hos autem insequentes in se rediens unda submersit. Deinde per annos quadraginta duce Moyse Dei populus in deserto actus est, quando tabernaculum testimonii nuncupatum est, ubi Deus sacrificiis futura praenuntiantibus colebatur, cum scilicet iam data lex fuisset in monte multum terribiliter; adtestabatur enim euidentissima mirabilibus signis uocibusque diuinitas.

Quod factum est, mox ut exitum est de Aegypto et in deserto populus esse coepit, quinquagensimo die post celebratum Pascha per ouis immolationem; qui usque adeo typus Christi est praenuntians eum per uictimam passionis de hoc mundo transiturum ad Patrem (Pascha quippe Hebraea lingua transitus interpretatur), ut iam cum reuelaretur testamentum nouum, postea quam Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus, quinquagensimo die ueniret de caelo Spiritus sanctus, qui dictus est in euangelio digitus Dei, ut recordationem nostram in primi praefigurati facti memoriam reuocaret, quia et legis illae tabulae digito Dei scriptae referuntur.

Defuncto Moyse populum rexit Iesus Naue et in terram promissionis introduxit eamque populo diuisit. Ab his duobus mirabilibus ducibus bella etiam prosperrime ac mirabiliter gesta sunt, Deo contestante non tam propter merita Hebraei populi quam propter peccata earum, quae debellabantur, gentium illas eis prouenisse uictorias. Post istos duces iudices fuerunt, iam in terra promissionis populo conlocato, ut inciperet interim reddi Abrahae prima promissio de gente una, id est Hebraea, et terra Chanaan, nondum de omnibus gentibus et toto orbe terrarum; quod Christi aduentus in carne et non ueteris legis obseruationes, sed euangelii fides fuerat inpletura.

ENGLISH

ites go, were destroyed in the Red Sea while pursuing them. For as the Israelites departed, the sea divided and made a way for them; but as the Egyptians pursued, the waters flowed back together and drowned them. Then for forty years God's people were led through the desert under Moses' leadership. It was then that the tabernacle of the testimony received its name, where God was worshiped with sacrifices that foretold things to come; this was after the law had already been given on the mountain in a most terrifying way, for the divinity bore witness with most evident wondrous signs and voices.

This happened as soon as they had come out of Egypt and the people began their life in the desert, on the fiftieth day after the Passover had been celebrated by the sacrifice of a sheep. The Passover is so clearly a figure of Christ, foretelling that through the sacrifice of his passion he would pass from this world to the Father (for in Hebrew Pascha means "passing over"), that when the new covenant was revealed, after Christ our Passover had been sacrificed, the Holy Spirit came from heaven on the fiftieth day. He is the one called in the gospel "the finger of God," and he came then to call our minds back to the memory of that first event which prefigured it, since the tablets of the law too are said to have been written by the finger of God.[116]

After Moses died, Joshua son of Nun ruled the people, led them into the land of promise, and divided it among them. Under these two wonderful leaders wars too were waged with great success and in wonderful ways, God bearing witness that those victories came to them not so much because of the merits of the Hebrew people as because of the sins of the nations that were being conquered. After these leaders there were judges, the people now being settled in the land of promise, so that the first promise to Abraham might meanwhile begin to be fulfilled: the promise about one nation, the Hebrews, and the land of Canaan, not yet the promise about all nations and the whole world. That was to be fulfilled by the coming of Christ in the flesh, and not by the observances of the old law but by the faith of the gospel.

116 "Christ our Passover" echoes 1 Corinthians 5:7; "finger of God" is from Luke 11:20 and Exodus 31:18.

LATIN

Cuius rei praefiguratio facta est, quod non Moyses, qui legem populo acceperat in monte Sina, sed Iesus, cui etiam nomen Deo praecipiente mutatum fuerat ut Iesus uocaretur, populum in terram promissionis induxit. Temporibus autem iudicum, sicut se habebant et peccata populi et misericordia Dei, alternauerunt prospera et aduersa bellorum.

Inde uentum est ad regum tempora, quorum primus regnauit Saul; cui reprobato et bellica clade prostrato eiusque stirpe reiecta, ne inde reges orerentur, Dauid successit in regnum, cuius maxime Christus dictus est filius. In quo articulus quidam factus est et exordium quodam modo iuuentutis populi Dei; cuius generis quaedam uelut adulescentia ducebatur ab ipso Abraham usque ad hunc Dauid. Neque enim frustra Matthaeus euangelista sic generationes commemorauit, ut hoc primum interuallum quattuordecim geneTationibus commendaret, ab Abraham scilicet usque ad Dauid. Ab adulescentia quippe incipit homo posse generare; propterea generationum ex Abraham sumsit exordium; qui etiam pater gentium constitutus est, quando mutatum nomen accepit.

Ante hunc ergo uelut pueritia fuit huius generis populi Dei a Noe usque ad ipsum Abraham; et ideo in lingua inuenta est, id est Hebraea. A pueritia namque homo incipit loqui post infantiam, quae hinc appellata est, quod fari non potest. Quam profecto aetatem primam demergit obliuio, sicut aetas prima generis humani est deleta diluuio. Quotus enim quisque est, qui suam recordetur infantiam? Quam ob rem in isto procursu ciuitatis Dei, sicut superior unam eandemque primam, ita duas aetates secundam et tertiam liber iste contineat, in qua tertia propter uaccam trimam, capram trimam, arietem trimum et inpositum est legis iugum et apparuit abundantia peccatorum et regni terreni surrexit exordium, ubi non defuerunt spiritales, quorum in turture et columba figuratum est sacramentum.

ENGLISH

A prefiguration of this was given when it was not Moses, who had received the law for the people on Mount Sinai, but Jesus—whose name had been changed at God's command so that he would be called Jesus—who led the people into the land of promise. In the times of the judges, success and defeat in war alternated, according to the state of the people's sins and of God's mercy.[117]

From there we come to the times of the kings, the first of whom to reign was Saul. When he had been rejected and laid low by defeat in battle, and his line had been cast off so that no kings should arise from it, David succeeded to the kingdom, and it is above all as his son that Christ is spoken of. With him a kind of turning point was reached and, in a sense, the beginning of the youth of the people of God; for a kind of adolescence of this race had run from Abraham himself down to this David. It was not without reason that Matthew the evangelist listed the generations in such a way as to mark off this first interval with fourteen generations, namely from Abraham to David. For it is in adolescence that a human being becomes able to generate; and so he began the generations from Abraham, who was also made father of the nations when he received his changed name.[118]

Before him, then, from Noah down to Abraham himself, there was a kind of childhood of this race, the people of God; and that is why it is found in possession of a language, namely Hebrew. For a human being begins to speak in childhood, after infancy, which takes its name from the fact that it cannot speak. That first age is surely drowned in forgetfulness, just as the first age of the human race was wiped out by the flood; for how many people remember their infancy? Therefore, in this onward course of the city of God, just as the previous book contained one age, the first, so this book is to contain two, the second and the third. In this third age, in keeping with the three-year-old heifer, the three-year-old she-goat and the three-year-old ram, the yoke of the law was imposed, an abundance of sins appeared, and the beginning of the earthly kingdom arose. Yet spiritual people were not lacking in it, whose mystery was prefigured in the turtledove and the dove.[119]

117 In Latin and Greek, Joshua and Jesus are the same name (Iesus); Moses renamed Hoshea as Joshua (Numbers 13:16).
118 Matthew 1:17; Abram was renamed Abraham, "father of many nations," in Genesis 17:5.

119 Latin infans literally means “not speaking.” The animals and birds are those of Abraham’s sacrifice in Genesis 15:9.

Book XVII

The age of the prophets
Prophecies of Christ and the Church in Samuel, the Psalms, and the books of the kings.

THE TIMES OF THE PROPHETS

From Samuel to the return from Babylon is the age of the prophets.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.1	Promissiones Dei, quae factae sunt ad Abraham, cuius semini et gentem Israeliticam secundum carnem et omnes gentes deberi secundum fidem Deo pollicente didicimus, quem ad modum conpleantur, per ordinem temporum procurrens Dei ciuitas indicabit. Quoniam ergo superioris libri usque ad regnum Dauid factus est finis, nunc ab eodem regno, quantum suscepto operi sufficere uidetur, cetera quae sequuntur adtingimus. Hoc itaque tempus, ex quo sanctus Samuel prophetare coepit, et deinceps, donec populus Israel captiuus in Babyloniam duceretur adque inde secundum sancti Hieremiae prophetiam post septuaginta annos reuersis Israelitis Dei domus instauraretur, totum tempus est prophetarum.	We have learned that God promised Abraham two things for his seed: the Israelite nation according to the flesh, and all nations according to faith. How these promises of God made to Abraham are fulfilled, the city of God will show as it runs its course through the order of the ages. The previous book ended at the reign of David. So now, beginning from that reign, we take up the rest of what follows, as far as seems sufficient for the work we have undertaken. The period from the time when holy Samuel began to prophesy, and onward until the people of Israel were led captive into Babylon and, in accordance with the prophecy of holy Jeremiah, the Israelites returned after seventy years and the house of God was rebuilt—that whole period is the age of the prophets.[1]
	Quamuis enim et ipsum Noe patriarcham, in cuius diebus uniuersa diluuio terra diluta est, et alios supra et infra usque ad hoc tempus, quo reges in Dei populo esse coeperunt, propter quaedam per eos futura siue quoquo modo significata siue praedicta, quae pertinerent ad ciuitatem Dei regnumque caelorum, non inmerito possumus appellare prophetas, praesertim quia nonnullos eorum id expressius legimus nuncupatos, sicut Abraham, sicut Moysen: tamen dies prophetarum praecipue maximeque hi dicti sunt, ex quo coepit prophetare Samuel, qui et Saulem prius et eo reprobato ipsum Dauid Deo praecipiente unxit in regem, de cuius ceteri stirpe succederent, quousque illos succedere sic oporteret.	Certainly we may with good reason call the patriarch Noah himself a prophet, in whose days the whole earth was washed away by the flood. We may also call others prophets, both before him and after him, up to the time when kings began to rule among God's people. Through them certain future things concerning the city of God and the kingdom of heaven were in some way signified or foretold. This is especially true since we read that some of them, such as Abraham and Moses, were explicitly given that name. Nevertheless, the days of the prophets are chiefly and above all said to be those from the time when Samuel began to prophesy. At God's command Samuel anointed as king first Saul and then, when Saul had been rejected, David himself. From David's stock the rest were to succeed, for as long as it was fitting that they should succeed in this way.
	Quae igitur a prophetis sint praedicta de Christo, cum moriendo decedentibus et nascendo succedentibus suis	Throughout these times the city of God was running its course, its members departing by death

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	membris ciuitas Dei per ista curreret tempora, si omnia uelim commemorare, in inmensum pergitur, primum quia ipsa scriptura, quae per ordinem reges eorumque facta et euenta digerens uidetur tamquam historica diligentia rebus gestis occupata esse narrandis, si adiuuante Dei spiritu considerata tractetur, uel magis uel certe non minus praenuntiandis futuris quam praeteritis enuntiandis inuenietur intenta; (et hoc perscrutando indagare ac disserendo monstrare quam sit operosum adque prolixum et quam multis indiguum uoluminibus, quis ignorat, qui haec uel mediocriter cogitat?)	and succeeding by birth. If I wished to record everything the prophets foretold about Christ during them, I would go on without end. First, this scripture sets out the kings, their deeds and their fortunes in order, and so it seems to be occupied, with something like a historian's diligence, in narrating events. Yet if it is examined and treated with the help of God's Spirit, it will be found to be intent on foretelling the future more than—or at any rate no less than—on reporting the past. (And who that thinks about these things even moderately does not know how laborious and lengthy it is, and how many volumes it would require, to search this out by investigation and to demonstrate it by discussion?)
	deinde quia ea ipsa, quae ad prophetiam non ambigitur pertinere, ita sunt multa de Christo regnoque caelorum, quae ciuitas Dei est, ut ad hoc aperiendum maior sit disputatio necessaria, quam huius operis modus flagitat. Proinde ita, si potuero, stilo moderabor meo, ut huic operi in Dei uoluntate peragendo nec ea quae supersunt dicam nec ea quae satis sunt praetermittam.	Second, the passages that undoubtedly belong to prophecy are so many, concerning Christ and the kingdom of heaven, which is the city of God, that laying them open would require a longer discussion than the scale of this work demands. Therefore, if I can, I shall so restrain my pen that, in completing this work according to God's will, I neither say what is superfluous nor leave out what is necessary.

WHEN GOD'S PROMISE ABOUT THE LAND OF CANAAN, WHICH EVEN FLESHLY ISRAEL RECEIVED AS A POSSESSION, WAS FULFILLED

The promise of Canaan was fulfilled under David and Solomon; the spiritual promise awaited Christ.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.2	In praecedente libro diximus ab initio ad Abraham promissionum Dei duas res fuisse promissas, unam scilicet, quod terram Chanaan possessurum fuerat semen eius (quod significatur, ubi dictum est: Vade in terram, quam tibi demonstrauero, et faciam te in gentem magnam), aliam uero longe praestantiorem non de carnali, sed de spiritali semine, per quod pater est non unius gentis Israeliticae, sed omnium gentium, quae fidei eius uestigia consequuntur; quod promitti coepit his uerbis: Et benedicentur in te omnes tribus terrae; et deinceps aliis multis admodum testimoniis haec duo promissa esse monstrauimus.	In the preceding book we said that from the beginning of God's promises to Abraham two things were promised. One was that his seed would possess the land of Canaan; this is signified where it is said: "Go into the land which I will show you, and I will make you into a great nation." The other, far more excellent, concerned not his carnal but his spiritual seed. Through this seed he is father not of the one Israelite nation but of all the nations that follow in the footsteps of his faith. This second promise began to be made in these words: "And in you all the tribes of the earth shall be blessed." And we went on to show by a great many other testimonies that these two things were promised.[2]
	Erat igitur iam in terra promissionis semen Abrahae, id est populus Israel, secundum carnem adque ibi non	So the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, that is, the people of Israel, was now in the promised

1 Jeremiah foretold seventy years of exile in Babylon (Jeremiah 25:11–12; 29:10).
2 Genesis 12:1–3.

LATIN

solum tenendo ac possidendo ciuitates aduersariorum, uerum etiam reges habendo regnare iam coeperat, inpletis de ipso populo promissionibus Dei magna iam ex parte, non solum quae tribus illis patribus Abraham Isaac et Iacob, et quaecumque aliae temporibus eorum, uerum etiam quae per ipsum Moysen, per quem populus idem de seruitute Aegyptia liberatus et per quem cuncta praeterita reuelata sunt, temporibus eius, cum populum per eremum duceret, factae fuerant.

Neque autem per insignem ducem Iesum Naue, per quem populus ille in promissionis inductus est terram expugnatisque gentibus eam duodecim tribubus, quibus Deus iusserat, diuisit et mortuus est, neque post illum toto tempore iudicum inpleta fuerat promissio Dei de terra Chanaan a quodam flumine Aegypti usque ad flumen magnum Euphraten; nec tamen adhuc prophetabatur futurum, sed exspectabatur inplendum. Inpletum est autem per Dauid et eius filium Salomonem, cuius regnum tanto, quanto promissum fuerat, spatio dilatatum est; uniuersos quippe illos subdiderunt tributariosque fecerunt.

Sic igitur in terra promissionis secundum carnem, hoc est in terra Chanaan, sub his regibus semen Abrahae fuerat constitutum, ut nihil deinde superesset, quo terrena illa Dei promissio conpleretur, nisi ut in eadem terra, quantum ad prosperitatem adtinet temporalem, per posteritatis successionem inconcusso statu usque ad mortalis huius saeculi terminum gens permaneret Hebraea, si Domini Dei sui legibus oboediret. Sed quoniam Deus nouerat hoc eam non esse facturam, usus est eius etiam temporalibus poenis ad exercendos in ea paucos fideles suos et admonendos qui postea futuri erant in omnibus gentibus, quod eos admoneri oportebat, in quibus alteram promissionem reuelato nouo testamento per incarnationem Christi fuerat inpleturus.

ENGLISH

land. There it had already begun to reign, not only by holding and possessing the cities of its adversaries but also by having kings. By this time God's promises concerning that people had in large part been fulfilled. These included not only the promises made to those three fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and any others made in their times, but also those made through Moses himself in his own times, when he was leading the people through the desert. It was through Moses that this same people was freed from slavery in Egypt, and through him that all past events were revealed.

Joshua son of Nun was an illustrious leader. Through him that people was led into the promised land, and after conquering the nations he divided the land among the twelve tribes, as God had commanded, and then died. But God's promise about the land of Canaan, stretching from a certain river of Egypt to the great river Euphrates, had not been fulfilled through him, nor after him during the whole period of the judges. Yet it was no longer being prophesied as something to come; it was being awaited as something to be fulfilled. It was fulfilled through David and his son Solomon, whose kingdom was extended over as wide an area as had been promised. For they subdued all those peoples and made them pay tribute.

Under these kings, then, the seed of Abraham had been established in the promised land according to the flesh, that is, in the land of Canaan. Nothing more remained for that earthly promise of God to be fulfilled except this: that the Hebrew nation, so far as temporal prosperity is concerned, should remain in that same land in an unshaken state through the succession of its descendants until the end of this mortal age, if it obeyed the laws of the Lord its God. But God knew that it would not do this. So he used even temporal punishments on it, to train the few faithful he had in it, and to give warning to those who would later be found among all the nations. They needed this warning, for in them he was going to fulfill the other promise, when the new covenant was revealed through the incarnation of Christ.

THE THREE KINDS OF MEANING IN THE PROPHETS, WHICH REFER NOW TO THE EARTHLY JERUSALEM, NOW TO THE HEAVENLY, AND NOW TO BOTH

Prophecies refer to the earthly Jerusalem, the heavenly Jerusalem, or both.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.3	Quocirca sicut oracula illa diuina ad Abraham Isaac et Iacob et quaecumque alia signa uel dicta prophetica in sacris litteris praecedentibus facta sunt, ita etiam ceterae ab isto regum tempore prophetiae partim pertinent ad gentem carnis Abrahae, partim uero ad illud semen eius, in quo benedicuntur omnes gentes coheredes Christi per testamentum nouum ad possidendam uitam aeternam regnumque caelorum; partim ergo ad ancillam, quae in seruitutem generat, id est terrenam Hierusalem, quae seruit cum filiis suis, partim uero ad liberam ciuitatem Dei, id est ueram Hierusalem aeternam in caelis, cuius filii homines secundum Deum uiuentes peregrinantur in terris; sed sunt in eis quaedam, quae ad utramque pertinere intelleguntur, ad ancillam proprie, ad liberam figurate.	Consider the divine oracles given to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and whatever other prophetic signs or sayings appear in the earlier sacred writings. In the same way, the rest of the prophecies from this time of the kings onward relate partly to the nation descended from Abraham's flesh. Partly, however, they relate to that seed of his in which all the nations are blessed as co-heirs of Christ through the new covenant, to possess eternal life and the kingdom of heaven. Partly, then, they relate to the slave woman who bears children into slavery, that is, the earthly Jerusalem, "which is in slavery with her children." Partly they relate to the free city of God, that is, the true Jerusalem, eternal in the heavens, whose children are people living according to God as pilgrims on earth. But there are some among them that are understood to relate to both: to the slave woman literally, and to the free woman figuratively.[3]
	Tripertita itaque reperiuntur eloquia prophetarum, si quidem aliqua sunt ad terrenam Hierusalem spectantia, aliqua ad caelestem, nonnulla ad utramque. Exemplis uideo probandum esse quod dico. Missus est Nathan propheta, qui regem Dauid argueret de peccato graui et ei, quae consecuta sunt mala, futura praediceret. Haec adque huius modi siue publice, id est pro salute uel utilitate populi, siue priuatim, cum pro suis quisque rebus diuina promereretur eloquia, quibus pro usu temporalis uitae futuri aliquid nosceretur, ad terrenam ciuitatem pertinuisse quis ambigat?	The utterances of the prophets, then, are found to be of three kinds: some look to the earthly Jerusalem, some to the heavenly, and some to both. I see that I must prove what I say by examples. The prophet Nathan was sent to rebuke King David for a grave sin and to foretell to him the evils that would follow. Some such utterances are public, that is, for the welfare or benefit of the people. Others are private, when someone earned divine utterances for his own affairs, so that he might know something of the future for the needs of temporal life. Who would doubt that these, and things like them, belonged to the earthly city?[4]
	Ubi autem legitur: Ecce dies ueniunt, dicit Dominus, et consummabo domui Israel et domui Iuda testamentum nouum, non secundum testamentum, quod disposui patribus eorum in die, qua adprehendi manum eorum, ut educerem eos de terra Aegypti, quoniam ipsi non permanserunt in testamento meo, et ego neglexi eos, dicit Dominus. Quia hoc est testamentum, quod constituam domui Israel post dies illos, dicit Dominus, dando leges meas in mentem eorum et super corda	But we also read: "Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, when I will complete a new covenant for the house of Israel and the house of Judah. It will not be like the covenant that I arranged for their fathers on the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; for they did not remain in my covenant, and I disregarded them, says the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will establish for the house of Israel after 3 Galatians 4:22–26, where Paul treats Hagar and Sarah as figures of the two covenants and the two Jerusalems.

4 2 Samuel 12, after David's adultery with Bathsheba and the killing of her husband Uriah.

LATIN

eorum scribam eas, et uidebo eos, et ero illis in Deum, et ipsi erunt mihi in plebem: Hierusalem sine dubio superna prophetatur, cuius Deus ipse praemium est, eumque habere adque ipsius esse summum ibi est adque totum bonum.

Ad utramque uero pertinet hoc ipsum, quod Hierusalem dicitur Dei ciuitas, et in ea prophetatur futura domus Dei, eaque prophetia uidetur inpleri, cum Salomon rex aedificat illud nobilissimum templum. Haec enim et in terrena Hierusalem secundum historiam contigerunt, et caelestis Hierusalem figurae fuerunt.

Quod genus prophetiae ex utroque ueluti conpactum adque commixtum in libris ueteribus canonicis, quibus rerum gestarum narrationes continentur, ualet plurimum multumque exercuit et exercet ingenia scrutantium litteras sacras, ut, quod historice praedictum conpletumque legitur in semine Abrahae secundum carnem, etiam in semine Abrahae secundum fidem quid inplendum allegorice significet inquiratur; in tantum ut quibusdam uisum sit nihil esse in eisdem libris uel praenuntiatum et effectum, uel effectum quamuis non praenuntiatum, quod non insinuet aliquid ad supernam ciuitatem Dei eiusque filios in hac uita peregrinos figurata significatione referendum. Sed si hoc ita est, iam bipertita, non tripertita erunt eloquia prophetarum, uel potius illarum scripturarum omnium, quae ueteris instrumenti appellatione censentur.

Nihil enim erit illic, quod ad Hierusalem terrenam tantum pertineat, si, quidquid ibi de illa uel propter illam dicitur adque conpletur, significat aliquid, quod etiam ad Hierusalem caelestem allegorica praefiguratione referatur; sed erunt sola duo genera, unum quod ad Hierusalem liberam, alterum quod ad utramque pertineat. Mihi autem sicut multum uidentur errare, qui nullas res gestas in eo genere litterarum aliquid aliud praeter id, quod eo modo gestae sunt, significare arbitrantur, ita multum audere, qui prorsus ibi omnia significationibus allegoricis inuoluta esse contendunt. Ideo tripertita, non bipertita esse dixi. Hoc enim those days, says the Lord: putting my laws into their mind, I will also write them upon their hearts; and I will look upon them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." Here, without doubt, it is the Jerusalem above that is prophesied. God himself is its reward, and to have him and to be his is there the supreme and entire good.[5]

ENGLISH

Some things, however, relate to both cities. Jerusalem is called the city of God, and it is prophesied that the house of God will be in it. That prophecy appears to be fulfilled when King Solomon builds that most renowned temple. For these things both happened in the earthly Jerusalem as history and were figures of the heavenly Jerusalem.

This kind of prophecy, compounded and mingled, as it were, of both, carries very great weight in the old canonical books that contain narratives of past events. It has greatly exercised, and still exercises, the minds of those who search the sacred writings. When they read of something historically foretold and fulfilled in the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, they inquire what it may also signify allegorically, as something to be fulfilled in the seed of Abraham according to faith. Some have gone so far as to think that there is nothing in those books that does not hint at something to be referred, by figurative meaning, to the city of God above and to her children who are pilgrims in this life. This applies, they say, whether a thing was foretold and accomplished or accomplished without being foretold. But if this is so, the utterances of the prophets will be of two kinds, not three. Or rather, this will be true of all the scriptures that are classed under the name of the Old Testament.

For there will be nothing there that relates to the earthly Jerusalem alone, if whatever is said and fulfilled there about it or because of it signifies something that is also to be referred to the heavenly Jerusalem by allegorical prefiguration. There will be only two kinds: one relating to the free Jerusalem, the other to both. Some think that the events recorded in that kind of literature signify nothing beyond the fact that they happened as they did; to me they seem to err greatly. Others maintain that absolutely everything there is wrapped in allegorical meanings; to me they seem existimo, non tamen culpans eos, qui potuerint illic de quacumque re gesta sensum intellegentiae spiritalis exsculpere, seruata dumtaxat primitus historiae ueritate.	very bold. That is why I have said there are three kinds, not two. This is my view. Yet I do not blame those who have been able to carve out a spiritual sense from any event there, provided only that the truth of the history is preserved first.

5 Jeremiah 31:31–33.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ceterum quae ita dicuntur, ut rebus humanitus seu diuinitus gestis siue gerendis conuenire non possint, quis fidelis dubitet non esse inaniter dicta? Quis ea non ad intellegentiam spiritalem reuocet, si possit, aut ab eo qui potest reuocanda esse fateatur?	On the other hand, some things are said in such a way that they cannot fit any events done or to be done by human or divine agency. What believer would doubt that these were not said idly? Who would not refer them to a spiritual understanding if he could, or else admit that they must be so referred by someone who can?

THE FORESHADOWED CHANGE OF ISRAEL'S KINGSHIP AND PRIESTHOOD, AND WHAT HANNAH, MOTHER OF SAMUEL, PROPHESIED IN THE PERSON OF THE CHURCH

Samuel replacing Eli and David replacing Saul prefigure the new priest and king; Hannah's song begins.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.4 Procursus igitur ciuitatis Dei ubi peruenit ad regum tempora, quando Dauid Saule reprobato ita regnum primus obtinuit, ut eius deinde posteri in terrena Hierusalem diuturna successione regnarent, dedit figuram, re gesta significans adque praenuntians, quod non est praetereundum silentio, de rerum mutatione futurarum, quod adtinet ad duo testamenta, uetus et nouum, ubi sacerdotium regnumque mutatum est per sacerdotem eundemque regem nouum ac sempiternum, qui est Christus Iesus. Nam et Heli sacerdote reprobato substitutus in Dei ministerium Samuel simul officio functus sacerdotis et iudicis, et Saule abiecto rex Dauid fundatus in regno hoc quod dico figurauerunt.	So the onward course of the city of God reached the times of the kings, when David, after Saul's rejection, first obtained the kingdom in such a way that his descendants afterward reigned in the earthly Jerusalem in a long succession. At that point it gave a figure, signifying and foretelling by an actual event something that must not be passed over in silence. This was the change of things to come with respect to the two covenants, the old and the new, when priesthood and kingship were changed by a new and eternal priest who is also king, Christ Jesus. For when the priest Eli was rejected, Samuel was put in his place in God's service and performed the office of priest and judge at once. And when Saul was cast off, King David was established in the kingdom. Both these events prefigured what I am speaking of.[6]
Mater quoque ipsa Samuelis Anna, quae prius fuit sterilis et posteriore fecunditate laetata est, prophetare aliud non uidetur, cum gratulationem suam Domino fundit exultans, quando eundem puerum natum et ablactatum Deo reddidit eadem, pietate, qua uouerat. Dicit enim: Confirmatum est cor meum in Domino, exaltatum est cornu meum in Deo meo. Dilatatum est super inimicos meos os meum, laetata sum in salutari tuo. Quoniam non est sanctus sicut Dominus, et non est iustus sicut Deus noster; non est sanctus praeter te. Nolite gloriari et nolite loqui excelsa, neque procedat magniloquium de ore uestro. Quoniam Deus scientiarum Dominus, et Deus	Samuel's mother Hannah, too, had at first been barren and later rejoiced in fruitfulness. She seems to prophesy nothing else when she pours out her thanksgiving to the Lord in exultation, as she gives that same boy, now born and weaned, back to God with the same devotion with which she had vowed him. For she says: "My heart is strengthened in the Lord; my horn is exalted in my God. My mouth is enlarged over my enemies; I have rejoiced in your salvation. For there is none holy as the Lord, and none just as our God; there is none holy besides you. Do not boast, and do not

6 Eli was the priest at Shiloh whose house God rejected (1 Samuel 2–4).

LATIN	ENGLISH
praeparans adinuentiones suas. Arcum potentium fecit infirmum, et infirmi praecincti sunt uirtute. Pleni panibus minorati sunt, et esurientes transierunt terram.	speak lofty things, and let no proud talk come out of your mouth. For the Lord is a God of knowledge, and a God who prepares his own designs. He has made the bow of the mighty weak, and the weak are girded with strength. Those who were full of bread have been lessened, and the hungry have passed beyond the earth.[7]
Quia sterilis peperit septem, et multa in filiis infirmata est. Dominus mortificat et uiuificat, deducit ad inferos et reducit. Dominus pauperes facit et ditat, humiliat et exaltat. Suscitat a terra pauperem et de stercore erigit inopem, ut conlocet eum cum potentibus populi, et sedem gloriae hereditatem dans eis; dans uotum uouenti, et benedixit annos iusti, quoniam non in uirtute potens est uir. Dominus infirmum faciet aduersarium suum, Dominus sanctus. Non glorietur prudens in prudentia sua, et non glorietur potens in potentia sua, et non glorietur diues in diuitiis suis; sed in hoc glorietur, qui gloriatur, intellegere et scire Dominum et facere iudicium et iustitiam in medio terrae.	For the barren woman has borne seven, and she who had many children has grown weak. The Lord puts to death and gives life; he brings down to the underworld and brings back. The Lord makes poor and makes rich; he humbles and exalts. He raises the poor man from the earth and lifts the needy from the dunghill, to set him with the mighty of the people, giving them a throne of glory as their inheritance; giving the vow to the one who vows; and he has blessed the years of the just, for it is not by strength that a man is mighty. The Lord will make his adversary weak, the Lord who is holy. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, and let not the mighty man glory in his might, and let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him who glories glory in this: to understand and know the Lord, and to do judgment and justice in the midst of the earth.
Dominus ascendit in caelos et tonuit; ipse iudicabit extrema terrae, quia iustus est; et dat uirtutem regibus nostris, et exaltabit cornu christi sui.	The Lord has gone up into the heavens and thundered; he will judge the ends of the earth, for he is just; and he gives strength to our kings, and will exalt the horn of his anointed."[8]

HANNAH'S SONG AS THE CHURCH'S VOICE

Hannah's song speaks for the Church: the proud fall, the humble rise, the barren bears seven.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Itane uero uerba haec unius putabuntur esse mulierculae, de nato sibi filio gratulantis? Tantumne mens hominum a luce ueritatis auersa est, ut non sentiat supergredi modum feminae huius dicta quae fudit? Porro qui rebus ipsis, quae iam coeperunt etiam in hac terrena peregrinatione conpleri, conuenienter mouetur, nonne intendit et adspicit et agnoscit per hanc mulierem, cuius etiam nomen, id est Anna, gratia eius interpretatur, ipsam religionem Christianam, ipsam ciuitatem Dei, cuius rex est et conditor Christus, ipsam postremo Dei gratiam prophetico spiritu sic locutam, a qua superbi alienantur, ut cadant, qua humiles inplentur, ut surgant, quod	Are these words, then, to be thought the words of a mere woman rejoicing over a son born to her? Is the human mind so turned away from the light of truth that it does not perceive that the words this woman poured out go beyond the measure of a woman? Moreover, anyone who is fittingly moved by the very events that have already begun to be fulfilled even in this earthly pilgrimage will attend, and look, and recognize what spoke through this woman. Her very name, Hannah, means "his grace." Through her it was the Christian religion itself, the city of God itself, whose king and 7 1 Samuel 2:1–10, the Song of Hannah.

8 "His anointed" translates the Latin christus, "anointed one," the word from which the title Christ comes.

LATIN

maxime hymnus iste personuit? Nisi quisquam forte dicturus est nihil istam prophetasse mulierem, sed Deum tantummodo propter filium, quem precata inpetrauit, exultanti praedicatione laudasse.

Quid ergo sibi uult quod ait: Arcum potentium fecit infirmum, et infirmi praecincti sunt uirtute; pleni panibus minorati sunt, et esurientes transierunt terram; quia sterilis peperit septem, et multa in filiis infirmata est? Numquid septem ipsa pepererat, quamuis sterilis fuerit? Unicum habebat, quando ista dicebat; sed nec postea septem peperit, siue sex, quibus septimus esset ipse Samuel, sed tres mares et duas feminas. Deinde in illo populo cum adhuc nemo regnaret, quod in extremo posuit: Dat uirtutem regibus nostris, et exaltabit cornu christi sui, unde dicebat, si non prophetabat?

Dicat ergo ecclesia Christi, ciuitas regis magni, gratia plena, prole fecunda, dicat quod tanto ante de se prophetatum per os huius piae matris agnoscit: Confirmatum est cor meum in Domino, exaltatum est cornu meum in Deo meo. Vere confirmatum cor et cornu uere exaltatum, quia non in se, sed in Domino Deo suo. Dilatatum est super inimicos meos os meum; quia et in angustiis pressurarum sermo Dei non est adligatus nec in praeconibus adligatis. Laetata sum, inquit, in salutari tuo. Christus est iste Iesus, quem Simeon, sicut in euangelio legitur, senex amplectens paruum, agnoscens magnum: Nunc dimittis, inquit. Domine, seruum tuum in pace, quoniam uiderunt oculi mei salutare tuum.

Dicat itaque ecclesia: Laetata sum in salutari tuo; quoniam non est sanctus, sicut Dominus, et non est iustus, sicut Deus noster; tamquam sanctus et sanctificans, iustus et iustificans. Non est sanctus praeter te, quia nemo fit nisi abs te. Denique sequitur: Nolite founder is Christ, in short the grace of God itself, that spoke in this way by the prophetic spirit. From this grace the proud are estranged so that they fall; by it the humble are filled so that they rise. And this is what the hymn has proclaimed above all. Unless, perhaps, someone is going to say that this woman prophesied nothing, but only praised God in exultant proclamation because of the son she had obtained by her prayers.

ENGLISH

What, then, does she mean when she says: "He has made the bow of the mighty weak, and the weak are girded with strength; those who were full of bread have been lessened, and the hungry have passed beyond the earth; for the barren woman has borne seven, and she who had many children has grown weak"? Had she herself borne seven, although she had been barren? She had only one when she said this. And even later she did not bear seven, nor six, so that Samuel himself would make the seventh, but three sons and two daughters. Again, no one was yet reigning among that people. So where did the words she placed at the end come from—"He gives strength to our kings, and will exalt the horn of his anointed"—if she was not prophesying?

Let the Church of Christ, then, the city of the great king, full of grace, fruitful in offspring, say what she recognizes was prophesied about herself so long before through the mouth of this devout mother: "My heart is strengthened in the Lord; my horn is exalted in my God." The heart is truly strengthened and the horn truly exalted, because this is not in herself but in the Lord her God. "My mouth is enlarged over my enemies"; for even in the straits of affliction the word of God is not bound, not even in heralds who are bound. "I have rejoiced," she says, "in your salvation." This salvation is Christ Jesus. As we read in the Gospel, old Simeon embraced him as a little child while recognizing him as great, and said: "Now, Lord, you let your servant depart in peace, for my eyes have seen your salvation."[9]

Let the Church say, then: "I have rejoiced in your salvation; for there is none holy as the Lord, and none just as our God"—as the one who is holy and makes holy, just and makes just. "There is none

9 Luke 2:29–30.

LATIN

gloriari et nolite loqui excelsa, neque exeat magniloquium de ore uestro; quoniam Deus scientiarum Dominus. Ipse uos scit, et ubi nemo scit; quoniam qui putat se aliquid esse, cum nihil sit, se ipsum seducit.

Haec dicuntur aduersariis ciuitatis Dei ad Babyloniam pertinentibus, de sua uirtute praesumentibus, in se, non in Domino gloriantibus; ex quibus sunt etiam carnales Israelitae, terrenae Hierusalem ciues terrigenae, qui, ut dicit apostolus, ignorantes Dei iustitiam (id est, quam dat homini Deus, qui solus est iustus adque iustificans) et suam uolentes constituere (id est uelut a se sibi partam, non ab illo inpertitam) iustitiae Dei non sunt subiecti, utique quia superbi, de suo putantes, non de Dei, posse placere se Deo, qui est Deus scientiarum adque ideo et arbiter conscientiarum, ibi uidens cogitationes hominum, quoniam uanae sunt, si hominum sunt et ab illo non sunt. Et praeparans, inquit, adinuentiones suas. Quas adinuentiones putamus, nisi ut superbi cadant et humiles surgant?

Has quippe adinuentiones exsequitur dicens: Arcus potentium infirmatus est, et infirmi praecincti sunt uirtute. Infirmatus est arcus, id est intentio eorum, qui tam potentes sibi uidentur, ut sine Dei dono adque adiutorio humana sufficientia diuina possint inplere mandata, et praecinguntur uirtute, quorum interna uox est: Miserere mei, Domine, quoniam infirmus sum. Pleni panibus, inquit, minorati sunt, et esurientes transierunt terram. Qui sunt intellegendi pleni panibus, nisi idem ipsi quasi potentes, id est Israelitae, quibus credita sunt eloquia Dei? Sed in eo populo ancillae filii minorati sunt (quo uerbo minus quidem Latine, bene tamen expressum est, quod ex maioribus minores facti sunt), quia et in ipsis panibus, id est diuinis eloquiis, quae Israelitae soli tunc ex omnibus gentibus acceperunt, terrena sapiunt.

ENGLISH

holy besides you," because no one becomes holy except through you. Then comes: "Do not boast, and do not speak lofty things, and let no proud talk go out of your mouth; for the Lord is a God of knowledge." He knows you, even where no one else knows; for "whoever thinks he is something, when he is nothing, deceives himself."[10]

These things are said to the adversaries of the city of God, those who belong to Babylon, who presume on their own strength and glory in themselves, not in the Lord. Among them are also the carnal Israelites, earth-born citizens of the earthly Jerusalem. As the apostle says, "being ignorant of God's justice"—that is, the justice that God gives to man, he who alone is just and makes just—"and seeking to establish their own"—that is, a justice obtained, as it were, by themselves for themselves, not bestowed by him—"they have not submitted to God's justice." This is surely because they are proud. They think they can please God by what is their own, not by what is God's. But he is the God of knowledge, and therefore also the judge of consciences. There he sees the thoughts of human beings, that they are vain if they are merely human and do not come from him. "And a God," she says, "who prepares his own designs." What designs do we suppose these are, except that the proud should fall and the humble rise?[11]

She goes on to describe these designs, saying: "The bow of the mighty has been weakened, and the weak are girded with strength." The bow is weakened—that is, the aim of those who think themselves so mighty that they can fulfill the divine commandments by human sufficiency, without God's gift and help. And those are girded with strength whose inner voice is: "Have mercy on me, Lord, for I am weak." "Those who were full of bread," she says, "have been lessened, and the hungry have passed beyond the earth." Who are to be understood as full of bread, if not those same people who were seemingly mighty, the Israelites, to whom the oracles of God were entrusted? But among that people the children of the slave woman were lessened. (The Latin word here, minorati, is not good Latin, but it expresses well that from greater they were made lesser.) For even

10 Galatians 6:3.
11 Romans 10:3.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	in the bread itself—that is, in the divine oracles, which at that time the Israelites alone of all the nations received—they savor earthly things.[12]
Gentes autem, quibus lex illa non erat data, postea quam per nouum testamentum ad eloquia illa uenerunt, multum esuriendo terram transierunt, quia in eis non terrena, sed caelestia sapuerunt. Et hoc uelut quaereretur causa quur factum sit: Quia sterilis, inquit, peperit septem, et multa in filiis infirmata est. Hic totum quod propbetabatur eluxit agnoscentibus numerum septenarium, quo est uniuersae ecclesiae significata perfectio. Propter quod et Iohannes apostolus ad septem scribit ecclesias, eo modo se ostendens ad unius plenitudinem scribere; et in prouerbiis Salomonis hoc antea praefigurans Sapientia aedificauit sibi domum et subfulsit columnas septem. Sterilis enim erat in omnibus gentibus Dei ciuitas, antequam iste fetus, quem cernimus, oreretur.	But the nations, to whom that law had not been given, came to those oracles through the new covenant, and afterward, hungering greatly, passed beyond the earth. For in those oracles they savored not earthly but heavenly things. And as if the cause of this were being asked, she says: "For the barren woman has borne seven, and she who had many children has grown weak." Here the whole of what was being prophesied shines out to those who recognize the number seven, which signifies the perfection of the universal Church. That is why the apostle John, too, writes to seven churches, showing in this way that he is writing to the fullness of the one Church. And in the Proverbs of Solomon this was prefigured long before: "Wisdom has built herself a house and propped it up with seven pillars." For the city of God was barren among all the nations before this offspring that we now see came to birth.[13]
Cernimus etiam, quae multa in filiis erat, nunc infirmatam Hierusalem terrenam; quoniam quicumque filii liberae in ea erant, uirtus eius erant; nunc uero ibi quoniam littera est et spiritus non est, amissa uirtute infirmata est.	We also see that the earthly Jerusalem, which had many children, is now weakened. For whatever children of the free woman were in her were her strength. But now, since the letter is there and the spirit is not, she has lost her strength and grown weak.

THE LORD PUTS TO DEATH AND GIVES LIFE

The Lord kills and gives life, raises the poor, and will judge the ends of the earth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Dominus mortificat et uiuificat; mortificauit illam, quae multa erat in filiis, et uiuificauit hanc sterilem, quae peperit septem. Quamuis commodius possit intellegi eosdem uiuificare, quos mortificauerit. Id enim uelut repetiuit addendo: Deducit ad inferos et reducit Quibus enim dicit apostolus: Si mortui estis cum Christo, quae sursum sunt quaerite, ubi Christus est in dextera Dei sedens, salubriter utique mortificantur a Domino: quibus adiungit: Quae sursum sunt sapite, non quae super terram; ut ipsi sint illi, qui esurientes transierunt terram. Mortui enim estis, inquit; ecce quo modo salubriter mortificat Deus; deinde sequitur: Et uita uestra abscondita est cum Christo in Deo; ecce quo modo	"The Lord puts to death and gives life." He put to death her who had many children, and gave life to this barren one who has borne seven. It can, however, be understood more fittingly that he gives life to the very ones he has put to death. For she repeats the thought, as it were, by adding: "He brings down to the underworld and brings back." The apostle says to some: "If you have died with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God." These are surely put to death by the Lord for their salvation. And to them he adds: "Savor the things that are above, not those on earth," so that they are the

12 Psalm 6:2.
13 Revelation 1:4; Proverbs 9:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
eosdem ipsos uiuificat Deus. Sed numquid eosdem deduxit ad inferos et reduxit?	very ones who, hungering, passed beyond the earth. "For you have died," he says—see how God puts to death for salvation. Then follows: "and your life is hidden with Christ in God"—see how God gives life to these same people. But did he bring these same people down to the underworld and bring them back?[14]
Hoc utrumque sine controuersia fidelium in illo potius uidemus inpletum, capite scilicet nostro, cum quo uitam nostram in Deo apostolus dixit absconditam. Nam cum proprio filio non pepercit, sed pro nobis omnibus tradidit eum, isto modo utique mortificauit eum; et quia resuscitauit a mortuis, eundem rursus uiuificauit. Et quia in prophetia uox eius agnoscitur: Non derelinques animam meam in inferno, eundem deduxit ad inferos et reduxit. Hac eius paupertate ditati sumus. Dominus enim pauperes facit et ditat. Nam quid hoc sit ut sciamus, quod sequitur audiamus: Humiliat et exaltat; utique superbos humiliat et humiles exaltat. Quod enim alibi legitur: Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam, hoc totus habet sermo huius, cuius nomen interpretatur gratia eius.	Believers agree without dispute that we see both of these fulfilled rather in him who is our head, with whom, the apostle said, our life is hidden in God. For when "he did not spare his own Son but handed him over for us all," in that way he certainly put him to death. And because he raised him from the dead, he gave the same one life again. And because his voice is recognized in the prophecy, "You will not leave my soul in the underworld," he brought the same one down to the underworld and brought him back. By this poverty of his we have been made rich. For "the Lord makes poor and makes rich." To know what this means, let us listen to what follows: "He humbles and exalts"—that is, he humbles the proud and exalts the humble. What we read elsewhere, "God resists the proud but gives grace to the humble," is the whole content of the song of this woman whose name means "his grace."[15]
Iam uero quod adiungitur: Suscitat a terra pauperem, de nullo melius quam de illo intellego, qui propter nos pauper factus est, cum diues esset, ut eius paupertate, sicut paulo ante dictum est, ditaremur. Ipsum enim de terra suscitauit tam cito, ut caro eius non uideret corruptionem. Nec illud ab illo alienabo, quod additum est: Et de stercore erigit inopem. Inops quippe idem, qui pauper; stercus uero, unde erectus est, rectissime intelleguntur persecutores Iudaei, in quorum numero cum se dixisset apostolus ecclesiam persecutum: Quae mihi fuerunt, inquit, lucra, haec propter Christum damna esse duxi; nec solum detrimenta, uerum etiam stercora existimaui esse, ut Christum lucri facerem.	Next it adds: "He raises the poor man from the earth." I understand this of no one better than of him who, "though he was rich, became poor for our sake, so that by his poverty," as was said a little earlier, "we might be made rich." For God raised him from the earth so quickly that his flesh did not see corruption. Nor shall I separate from him what is added: "and lifts the needy from the dunghill." The needy one is the same as the poor one. And the dunghill from which he was lifted is most rightly understood as the persecuting Jews. The apostle counted himself among their number when he said that he had persecuted the Church: "What things were gain to me," he says, "these I have counted as loss for Christ's sake; and not only as losses, but I have considered them dung, that I might gain Christ."[16]
De terra ergo suscitatus est ille supra omnes diuites pauper, et de illo stercore erectus est supra omnes	So that poor man was raised from the earth above all the rich, and that needy man was lifted from 14 Colossians 3:1–3.

15 Romans 8:32; Psalm 15:10 (16:10 in most English Bibles); James 4:6.
16 2 Corinthians 8:9; Philippians 3:7–8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
opulentos ille inops, ut sedeat cum potentibus populi, quibus ait: Sedebitis super duodecim sedes, et sedem gloriae hereditatem dans eis; dixerant enim potentes illi: Ecce nos dimisimus omnia et secuti sumus te. Hoc uotum potentissime uouerant. Sed unde hoc eis, nisi ab illo, de quo hic continuo dictum est: Dans uotum uouenti? Alioquin ex illis essent potentibus, quorum infirmatus est arcus. Dans, inquit, uotum uouenti. Non enim Domino quisquam quidquam rectum uoueret, nisi qui ab illo acciperet quod uoueret. Sequitur: Et benedixit annos iusti, ut cum illo scilicet sine fine uiuat, cui dictum est: Et anni tui non deficient.	that dunghill above all the wealthy, "to sit with the mighty of the people." To them he says: "You will sit upon twelve thrones," "giving them a throne of glory as their inheritance." For those mighty ones had said: "See, we have left everything and followed you." This vow they had vowed most mightily. But where did they get this, if not from him of whom it is said here immediately after: "giving the vow to the one who vows"? Otherwise they would belong to those mighty ones whose bow was weakened. "Giving," she says, "the vow to the one who vows." For no one would vow anything right to the Lord unless he received from him what he vowed. Then follows: "and he has blessed the years of the just"—that is, so that the just may live without end with him to whom it was said: "and your years will not fail."[17]
Ibi enim stant anni, hic autem transeunt, immo pereunt; antequam ueniant enim, non sunt; cum autem uenerint, non erunt, quia cum suo fine ueniunt. Horum autem duorum, id est dans uotum uouenti, et benedixit annos iusti, unum est quod facimus, alterum quod sumimus. Sed hoc alterum Deo largitore non sumitur, nisi cum ipso adiutore primum illud efficitur: Quia non in uirtute potens est uir. Dominus infirmum faciet aduersarium eius; illum scilicet, qui homini uouenti inuidet et resistit, ne ualeat inplere quod uouit. Potest ex ambiguo Graeco intellegi et aduersarium suum. Cum enim Dominus possidere nos coeperit, profecto aduersarius, qui noster fuerat, ipsius fit, et uincetur a nobis, sed non uiribus nostris, quia non in uirtute potens est uir.	For there the years stand still, but here they pass away—or rather, they perish. Before they come, they do not yet exist; and once they have come, they will no longer exist, because they come bringing their own end with them. Of these two phrases, "giving the vow to the one who vows" and "he has blessed the years of the just," the first is something we do and the second something we receive. But the second is not received from God as giver unless the first is first accomplished with God as helper. "For it is not by strength that a man is mighty. The Lord will make his adversary weak"—that is, the one who envies and resists a person making a vow, so that he may not be able to fulfill what he vowed. Because the Greek is ambiguous, it can also be understood as "his own adversary." For when the Lord has begun to possess us, the adversary who was ours certainly becomes his. And he will be overcome by us, but not by our own powers, because "it is not by strength that a man is mighty."[18]
Dominus ergo infirmum faciet aduersarium suum, Dominus sanctus; ut uincatur a sanctis, quos Dominus sanctus sanctorum efficit sanctos.	So the Lord will make his own adversary weak—the holy Lord—so that the adversary may be overcome by the holy ones, whom the Lord, the Holy One of the holy, makes holy.
Ac per hoc non glorietur prudens in sua prudentia, et non glorietur potens in sua potentia, et non glorietur diues in diuitiis suis; sed in hoc glorietur, qui gloriatur,	And so, "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, and let not the mighty man glory in his might, and let not the rich man glory in his riches. But let him

17 Matthew 19:28 and 19:27; Psalm 101:28 (102:27 in most English Bibles).
18 1 Samuel 2:9–10, from the song of Hannah (1 Kings in Augustine's Latin Bible). The Greek pronoun can refer either to the man or to the Lord.

LATIN

intellegere et scire Dominum et facere iudicium et iustitiam in medio terrae. Non parua ex parte intellegit et scit Dominum, qui intellegit et scit etiam hoc a Domino sibi dari, ut intellegat et sciat Dominum. Quid enim habes, ait apostolus, quod non accepisti? Si autem et accepisti, quid gloriaris, quasi non acceperis? id est, quasi a te ipso tibi sit, unde gloriaris. Facit autem iudicium et iustitiam, qui recte uiuit.

Recte autem uiuit, qui obtemperat praecipienti Deo; et finis praecepti, id est, ad quod refertur praeceptum, caritas est de corde puro et conscientia bona et fide non ficta. Porro ista caritas, sicut Iohannes apostolus testatur, ex Deo est. Facere igitur iudicium et iustitiam ex Deo est. Sed quid est: In medio terrae? Neque enim non debent facere iudicium et iustitiam qui habitant in extremis terrae. Quis hoc dixerit? Quur ergo additum est: In medio terrae? Quod si non adderetur et tantummodo diceretur: Facere iudicium et iustitiam, magis hoc praeceptum ad utrosque homines pertineret, et mediterraneos et maritimos.

Sed ne quisquam putaret post finem uitae, quae in hoc agitur corpore, superesse tempus iudicium iustitiamque faciendi, quam dum esset in carne non fecit, et sic diuinum euadi posse iudicium: in medio terrae mihi uidetur dictum cum quisque uiuit in corpore. In hac quippe uita suam terram quisque circumfert, quam moriente homine recipit terra communis, resurgenti utique redditura. Proinde in medio terrae, id est, cum anima nostra isto terreno clauditur corpore, faciendum est iudicium adque iustitia, quod nobis prosit in posterum, quando recipit quisque secundum ea, quae per corpus gessit, siue bonum siue malum. Per corpus quippe ibi dixit apostolus per tempus, quo uixit in corpore.

ENGLISH

who glories glory in this: to understand and know the Lord, and to do judgment and justice in the midst of the earth." Whoever understands and knows that even this—to understand and know the Lord—is given to him by the Lord understands and knows the Lord in no small measure. "For what do you have," says the apostle, "that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you glory as if you had not received it?" That is, why glory as though what you glory in came to you from yourself? Now, the one who does judgment and justice is the one who lives rightly.[19]

And the one who lives rightly is the one who obeys God when he commands. "The end of the commandment"—that is, what the commandment is directed toward—"is love from a pure heart, a good conscience, and sincere faith." Moreover, this love, as the apostle John testifies, "is from God." Therefore to do judgment and justice is from God. But what does "in the midst of the earth" mean? Surely those who live at the ends of the earth are not excused from doing judgment and justice. Who would say that? Why, then, was "in the midst of the earth" added? If it had not been added, and the text had said only "to do judgment and justice," this commandment would apply all the more to both kinds of people, those of the midlands and those of the coasts.[20]

But someone might think that after the end of this life, which is lived in this body, there is still time left to do the judgment and justice he failed to do while he was in the flesh, and that in this way the divine judgment can be escaped. To prevent this, it seems to me, "in the midst of the earth" was said of the time when each person lives in the body. For in this life each of us carries his own earth around with him. When a person dies, the common earth takes it back, and will certainly give it back when he rises again. Therefore it is "in the midst of the earth"—that is, while our soul is enclosed in this earthly body—that judgment and justice must be done. This will benefit us hereafter, when "each one receives according to what he has done through the body, whether good or evil." For there, by "through the body," the apostle 19 This passage stands in the Greek version of Hannah's song (1 Samuel 2:10) and closely matches Jeremiah 9:23–24. The apostle is Paul, 1 Corinthians 4:7.

20 1 Timothy 1:5; 1 John 4:7.

LATIN

ENGLISH

meant through the time during which a person lived in the body.[21]

Neque enim si quis maligna mente adque inpia cogitatione blasphemet neque id ullis membris corporis operetur, ideo non erit reus, quia id non motu corporis gessit, cum hoc per illud tempus gesserit, quo gessit et corpus. Isto modo congruenter intellegi potest etiam illud, quod in psalmo legitur: Deus autem rex noster ante saecula operatus est salutem in medio terrae; ut Dominus Iesus accipiatur Deus noster, qui est ante saecula, quia per ipsum facta sunt saecula, operatus salutem nostram in medio terrae, cum Verbum caro factum est et terreno habitauit in corpore.

For if someone blasphemes with a malicious mind and impious thoughts, but does not carry it out with any member of his body, he will not therefore be guiltless just because he did not do it by a movement of the body. He carried it out during the time in which he also carried his body. In this way we can also fittingly understand what we read in the psalm: "But God our King, before the ages, has worked salvation in the midst of the earth." Here the Lord Jesus is to be understood as our God, who is before the ages—since the ages were made through him—and who worked our salvation in the midst of the earth when the Word became flesh and dwelt in an earthly body.[22]

Deinde postea quam prophetatum est in his uerbis Annae, quo modo gloriari debeat, qui gloriatur, non in se utique, sed in Domino, propter retributionem, quae in die iudicii futura est: Dominus ascendit, inquit, in caelos et tonuit; ipse iudicabit extrema terrae, quia iustus est. Prorsus ordinem tenuit confessionis fidelium. Ascendit enim in caelum Dominus Christus, et inde uenturus est ad uiuos et mortuos iudicandos. Nam quis ascendit, sicut dicit apostolus, nisi qui et descendit in inferiores partes terrae? Qui descendit, ipse est et qui ascendit super omnes caelos, ut adinpleret omnia. Per nubes ergo suas tonuit, quas sancto Spiritu cum ascendisset inpleuit. De quibus ancillae Hierusalem, hoc est ingratae uineae, comminatus est aput Esaiam prophetam, ne pluant super eam imbrem.

Then, after these words of Hannah have prophesied how the one who glories ought to glory—not in himself, of course, but in the Lord—on account of the reward to come on the day of judgment, she says: "The Lord ascended into the heavens and thundered; he will judge the ends of the earth, because he is just." She has kept precisely to the order of the believers' confession of faith. For the Lord Christ ascended into heaven, and from there he will come to judge the living and the dead. For, as the apostle says, "Who ascended, if not the one who also descended into the lower parts of the earth? He who descended is the same one who also ascended above all the heavens, so that he might fill all things." So he thundered through his clouds, which he filled with the Holy Spirit when he had ascended. It was with these clouds that, through the prophet Isaiah, he threatened the handmaid Jerusalem—that is, the ungrateful vineyard—that they would rain no rain upon her.[23]

Sic autem dictum est: Ipse iudicabit extrema terrae, ac si diceretur: Etiam extrema terrae. Non enim alias partes non iudicabit, qui omnes homines procul dubio iudicabit. Sed melius intelleguntur extrema terrae extrema hominis: quoniam non iudicabuntur, quae in melius uel in deterius medio tempore commutantur, sed in quibus extremis inuentus fuerit, qui iudicabitur. Propter quod dictum est: Qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit. Qui ergo perseueranter facit iudicium et iustitiam in

Now, "He will judge the ends of the earth" was said as if it meant "even the ends of the earth." For he who will undoubtedly judge all people will not leave the other parts unjudged. But "the ends of the earth" are better understood as the end of a human being. For what will be judged is not what changes for better or worse in the meantime, but the final state in which the one to be judged is found. That is why it was said: "Whoever per-

21 2 Corinthians 5:10.
22 Psalm 73:12 (74:12 in most English Bibles).
23 1 Samuel 2:10 in the Greek version; Ephesians 4:9–10; Isaiah 5:6, from the song of the vineyard.

LATIN	ENGLISH
medio terrae, non damnabitur, cum iudicabuntur extrema terrae. Et dat, inquit, uirtutem regibus nostris; ut non eos iudicando condemnet. Dat eis uirtutem, qua carnem sicut reges regant et in illo mundum, qui propter eos fudit sanguinem, uincant. Et exaltabit cornu christi sui. Quo modo Christus exaltabit cornu christi sui?	severes to the end will be saved." So whoever perseveres in doing judgment and justice in the midst of the earth will not be condemned when the ends of the earth are judged. "And he gives strength," she says, "to our kings"—so that in judging he does not condemn them. He gives them strength by which, like kings, they may rule the flesh and, in him who shed his blood for them, overcome the world. "And he will exalt the horn of his christ." How will Christ exalt the horn of his christ?[24]
De quo enim supra dictum est: Dominus ascendit in caelos, et intellectus est Dominus Christus: ipse, sicut hic dicitur, exaltabit cornu christi sui. Quis ergo est christus Christi? An cornu exaltabit uniuscuiusque fidelis sui, sicut ista ipsa in principio huius hymni ait: Exaltatum est cornu meum in Deo meo? Omnes quippe unctos eius chrismate recte christos possumus dicere; quod tamen totum cum suo capite corpus unus est Christus. Haec Anna prophetauit, Samuelis mater, sancti uiri multumque laudati; in quo quidem tunc figurata est mutatio ueteris sacerdotii et nunc inpleta, quando infirmata est quae multa erat in filiis, ut nouum haberet in Christo sacerdotium sterilis, quae peperit septem.	For the one of whom it was said above, "The Lord ascended into the heavens," and who was understood to be the Lord Christ, is the same one who, as is said here, "will exalt the horn of his christ." Who, then, is the christ of Christ? Will he exalt the horn of each of his faithful ones, as Hannah herself says at the beginning of this hymn: "My horn is exalted in my God"? For we can rightly call all who are anointed with his chrism christs; and yet this whole body, together with its head, is one Christ. These things were prophesied by Hannah, the mother of Samuel, a holy and much-praised man. In him the change of the old priesthood was prefigured at that time, and it is fulfilled now, when "she who had many children has grown weak," so that the barren woman who has borne seven might have a new priesthood in Christ.[25]

WHAT THE MAN OF GOD, SPEAKING BY THE SPIRIT OF PROPHECY, SAID TO THE PRIEST ELI, SIGNIFYING THAT THE PRIESTHOOD ESTABLISHED AFTER AARON WOULD BE TAKEN AWAY

A man of God tells Eli that the priesthood of Aaron's house will be taken away.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.5 Sed hoc euidentius ad ipsum Heli sacerdotem missus loquitur homo Dei, cuius quidem nomen tacetur, sed intellegitur officio ministerioque suo sine dubitatione propheta. Sic enim scriptum est: Et uenit homo Dei ad Heli et dixit: Haec dicit Dominus: Reuelatus reuelatus sum ad domum patris tui, cum essent in terra Aegypti serui in domo Pharao; et elegi domum patris tui ex omnibus sceptris Israel mihi sacerdotio fungi, ut ascenderent ad altare meum et incenderent incensum et portarent Ephod; et dedi domui patris tui omnia, quae sunt ignis filiorum Israel, in escam. Et ut quid respexisti in incensum meum et in sacrificium meum inpudenti	But a man of God who was sent to Eli the priest himself speaks of this more plainly. His name is not given, but from his office and ministry he is understood without any doubt to be a prophet. For it is written: "And a man of God came to Eli and said, 'Thus says the Lord: I revealed myself, I revealed myself to your father's house when they were slaves in the land of Egypt in Pharaoh's house. I chose your father's house out of all the scepters of Israel to serve me as priests, to go up to my altar, to burn incense, and to wear the ephod. And I gave your father's house as food all the fire 24 Matthew 10:22. In Latin christus is also the ordinary word for "anointed one," and Augustine plays on the title and the common noun.

25 1 Samuel 2:1 and 2:5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
oculo et glorificasti filios tuos super me, benedicere primitias omnis sacrificii in Israel in conspectu meo?	offerings of the children of Israel. Why then have you looked upon my incense and my sacrifice with a shameless eye, and honored your sons above me, letting them bless the firstfruits of every sacrifice in Israel in my sight?[26]
Propter hoc haec dicit Dominus Deus Israel: Dixi: Domus tua et domus patris tui transibunt coram me usque in aeternum. Et nunc dicit Dominus: Nequaquam, sed glorificantes me glorificabo, et qui spernit me, spernetur. Ecce dies ueniunt, et exterminabo semen tuum et semen domus patris tui, et non erit tibi senior in domo mea omnibus diebus, et uirum exterminabo tibi ab altari meo, ut deficiant oculi eius et defluat anima eius; et omnis qui superauerit domus tuae, decident in gladio uirorum. Et hoc tibi signum, quod ueniet super duos filios tuos hos, Ophni et Phinees: una die morientur ambo.	Therefore thus says the Lord, the God of Israel: I said, Your house and your father's house shall pass before me forever. But now the Lord says: Not at all; rather, those who glorify me I will glorify, and whoever despises me shall be despised. Behold, the days are coming when I will root out your seed and the seed of your father's house, and you will have no elder in my house all the days. I will root out a man of yours from my altar, so that his eyes fail and his soul wastes away; and all of your house who survive shall fall by the sword of men. And this shall be a sign to you, which will come upon these two sons of yours, Hophni and Phinehas: both of them shall die on one day.
Et suscitabo mihi sacerdotem fidelem, qui omnia, quae in corde meo et quae in anima mea, faciat; et aedificabo ei domum fidelem, et transibit coram Christo meo omnibus diebus. Et erit, qui superauerit in domo tua, ueniet adorare ei obolo argenti dicens: lacta me in unam partem sacerdotii tui manducare panem.	And I will raise up for myself a faithful priest, who shall do all that is in my heart and in my soul; and I will build him a faithful house, and it shall pass before my Christ all the days. And it shall be that whoever survives in your house will come to worship him with a silver obol, saying: Cast me into a single share of your priesthood, to eat bread.'"[27]
Non est ut dicatur ista prophetia, ubi sacerdotii ueteris tanta manifestatione praenuntiata mutatio est, in Samuele fuisse conpleta. (Quamquam enim non esset de alia tribu Samuel, quam quae constituta, fuerat a Domino, ut seruiret altari, tamen non erat de filiis Aaron, cuius progenies fuerat deputata, unde fierent sacerdotes; ac per hoc in ea quoque re gesta eadem mutatio quae per Christum Iesum futura fuerat, adumbrata est, et ad uetus testamentum proprie, figurate uero pertinebat ad nouum prophetia facti etiam ipsa, non uerbi, id scilicet facto significans, quod uerbo ad Heli sacerdotem dictum est per prophetam.)	There are no grounds for saying that this prophecy, in which the change of the old priesthood was foretold so clearly, was fulfilled in Samuel. (Samuel was indeed from no other tribe than the one the Lord had appointed to serve the altar; yet he was not one of the sons of Aaron, whose descendants had been designated as the line from which priests were to come. And so in this event, too, the same change that was to come through Christ Jesus was foreshadowed. This too was a prophecy—a prophecy of deed, not of word—which belonged literally to the Old Testament but figuratively to the New. By a deed it signified what was said in words to Eli the priest through the prophet.)
Nam fuerunt postea sacerdotes ex genere Aaron, sicut Sadoc et Abiathar, regnante Dauid, et alii deinceps, antequam tempus ueniret, quo ista, quae de sacerdotio mutando tanto ante praedicta sunt, effici per Christum oportebat. Quis autem nunc fideli oculo haec intuens non	For afterward there were priests of the line of Aaron, such as Zadok and Abiathar in the reign of David, and others after them, before the time came when the things foretold so long beforehand

26 1 Samuel 2:27–36 (1 Kings in Augustine's Latin Bible).
27 An obol was a small coin of little value.

LATIN

uideat esse conpleta? Quando quidem nullum tabernaculum, nullum templum, nullum altare, nullum sacrificium et ideo nec ullus sacerdos remansit ludaeis, quibus, ut de semine Aaron ordinaretur, in Dei fuerat lege mandatum. Quod et hic commemoratum est illo dicente propheta: Haec dicit Dominus Deus Israel: Dixi: Domus tua et domus patris tui transibunt coram me usque in aeternum. Et nunc dicit Dominus: Nequaquam, sed glorificantes me glorificabo, et qui me spernit, spernetur.

ENGLISH

about the change of the priesthood were to be accomplished through Christ. But who now, looking at these things with the eye of faith, does not see that they have been fulfilled? For the Jews have been left no tabernacle, no temple, no altar, no sacrifice, and therefore no priest either—though God's law had commanded them to ordain their priest from the seed of Aaron. This too is mentioned here, when the prophet says: "Thus says the Lord, the God of Israel: I said, Your house and your father's house shall pass before me forever. But now the Lord says: Not at all; rather, those who glorify me I will glorify, and whoever despises me shall be despised."[28]

Quod enim nominat domum patris eius, non eum de proximo patre dicere, sed de illo Aaron, qui primus sacerdos est institutus, de cuius progenie ceteri sequerentur, superiora demonstrant, ubi ait: Reuelatus sum ad domum patris tui, cum essent in terra Aegypti serui in domo Pharao, et elegi domum patris tui ex omnibus sceptris Israel mihi sacerdotio fungi. Quis patrum fuit huius in illa Aegyptia seruitute, unde cum liberati essent, electus est ad sacerdotium, nisi Aaron? De huius ergo stirpe isto loco dixit futurum fuisse, ut non essent ulterius sacerdotes; quod iam uidemus inpletum. Vigilet fides, praesto sunt res, cernuntur, tenentur et uidere nolentium oculis ingeruntur.

When he speaks of his father's house, the earlier words show that he does not mean Eli's immediate father, but Aaron, who was appointed the first priest, from whose descendants the rest were to follow. For he says: "I revealed myself to your father's house when they were slaves in the land of Egypt in Pharaoh's house, and I chose your father's house out of all the scepters of Israel to serve me as priests." Which of Eli's forefathers was in that Egyptian slavery and, after they had been freed from it, was chosen for the priesthood, if not Aaron? It is of his stock, then, that he said in this passage that the time would come when they would no longer be priests—and this we now see fulfilled. Let faith keep watch: the facts are before us; they are seen, they are grasped, and they are thrust before the eyes of those who do not want to see.

Ecce, inquit, dies ueniunt, et exterminabo semen tuum et semen domus patris tui, et non erit tibi senior in domo mea omnibus diebus, et uirum exterminabo tibi ab altari meo, ut deficiant oculi eius et defluat anima eius. Ecce dies, qui praenuntiati sunt, iam uenerunt. Nullus sacerdos est secundum ordinem Aaron; et quicumque ex eius genere est homo, cum uidet sacrificium Christianorum toto orbe pollere, sibi autem honorem illum magnum esse subtractum, deficiunt oculi eius et defluit anima eius tabe maeroris.

"Behold," he says, "the days are coming when I will root out your seed and the seed of your father's house, and you will have no elder in my house all the days. I will root out a man of yours from my altar, so that his eyes fail and his soul wastes away." Behold, the days that were foretold have now come. There is no priest according to the order of Aaron. And whenever any man of his line sees the sacrifice of the Christians flourishing throughout the world, while that great honor has been taken away from himself, his eyes fail and his soul wastes away, consumed by grief.

28 Zadok and Abiathar served together as high priests under King David.

THE FAITHFUL PRIEST AND HIS HOUSE

The faithful priest is Christ, and the survivor who begs a share of his priesthood is the believer.

LATIN

Proprie autem ad huius domum Heli, cui haec dicebantur, quod sequitur pertinet: Et omnis qui superauerit domus tuae, decident in gladio uirorum. Et hoc tibi signum, quod ueniet super duos filios tuos hos, Ophni et Phinees: die uno morientur ambo. Hoc ergo signum factum est mutandi sacerdotii de domo huius, quo signo significatum est mutandum sacerdotium domus Aaron. Mors quippe filiorum huius significauit mortem non hominum, sed ipsius sacerdotii de filiis Aaron. Quod autem sequitur, ad illum iam pertinet sacerdotem, cuius figuram gessit huic succedendo Samuel. Proinde quae sequuntur, de Christo Iesu noui testamenti uero sacerdote dicuntur: Et suscitabo mihi sacerdotem fidelem, qui omnia quae in corde meo et quae in anima mea faciat; et aedificabo ei domum fidelem. Ipsa est aeterna et superna Hierusalem.

Et transibit, inquit, coram Christo meo omnibus diebus. Transibit dixit conuersabitur; sicut superius dixerat de domo Aaron: Dixi: Domus tua et domus patris tui transibunt coram me in aeternum. Quod autem ait: Coram Christo meo transibit, de ipsa domo utique intellegendum est, non de illo sacerdote, qui est Christus ipse mediator adque saluator. Domus ergo eius coram illo transibit. Potest et transibit intellegi de morte ad uitam, omnibus diebus, quibus peragitur usque in finem saeculi huius ista mortalitas. Quod autem ait Deus: Qui omnia quae in corde meo et quae in anima mea faciat: non arbitremur habere animam Deum, cum sit conditor animae; sed ita hoc de Deo tropice, non proprie dicitur, sicut manus et pes et alia corporis membra.

Et ne secundum hoc credatur homo in carnis huius effigie factus ad imaginem Dei, adduntur et alae, quas utique non habet homo, et dicitur Deo: Sub umbra alarum tuarum proteges me; ut intellegant homines de illa ineffabili natura, non propriis, sed translatis rerum uocabulis ista dici.

ENGLISH

But what follows applies properly to the house of this Eli to whom these things were said: "And all of your house who survive shall fall by the sword of men. And this shall be a sign to you, which will come upon these two sons of yours, Hophni and Phinehas: both of them shall die on one day." This, then, became the sign that the priesthood was to be transferred from his house, and by this sign it was signified that the priesthood of the house of Aaron was to be changed. For the death of Eli's sons signified the death not of men but of the priesthood itself among the sons of Aaron. What comes next, however, concerns that priest whose figure Samuel bore by succeeding Eli. Accordingly, the words that follow are said of Christ Jesus, the true priest of the New Testament: "And I will raise up for myself a faithful priest, who shall do all that is in my heart and in my soul; and I will build him a faithful house." That house is the eternal Jerusalem above.

"And it shall pass," he says, "before my Christ all the days." By "it shall pass" he meant "it shall go about its life," just as he had said earlier about the house of Aaron: "I said, Your house and your father's house shall pass before me forever." But when he says, "It shall pass before my Christ," this must certainly be understood of the house itself, not of that priest who is Christ himself, the mediator and Savior. So it is his house that will pass before him. "It shall pass" can also be understood as passing from death to life, through all the days in which this mortal condition runs its course until the end of this age. And when God says, "who shall do all that is in my heart and in my soul," let us not suppose that God has a soul, since he is the creator of the soul. Rather, this is said of God figuratively, not literally, just as hands and feet and the other members of the body are.

And so that no one may conclude from this that man was made in the image of God in the shape of this flesh of ours, wings are also attributed to God —which man certainly does not have—and it is said to God: "Under the shadow of your wings you will protect me." In this way people may understand that these things are said of that ineffable nature using not the literal but the transferred names of things.[29]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quod uero adiungitur: Et erit, qui superauerit in domo tua, ueniet adorare ei, non proprie de domo dicitur huius Heli, sed illius Aaron, de qua usque ad aduentum Iesu Christi homines remanserunt, de quo genere etiam nunc usque non desunt. Nam de illa domo huius Heli iam supra dictum erat: Et omnis qui superauerit domus tuae, decident in gladio uirorum. Quo modo ergo hic uere dici potuit: Et erit, qui superauerit in domo tua, ueniet adorare ei, si illud est uerum, quod ultore gladio nemo inde superarit? nisi quia illos intellegi uoluit, qui pertinent ad stirpem, sed illius totius sacerdotii secundum ordinem Aaron.

Now the words that are added—"And it shall be that whoever survives in your house will come to worship him"—are said not properly of the house of this Eli, but of the house of Aaron. People of that house remained until the coming of Jesus Christ, and even now there are still some of that line. For about this house of Eli it had already been said above: "And all of your house who survive shall fall by the sword of men." How, then, could it truly be said here, "And it shall be that whoever survives in your house will come to worship him," if it is true that no one from that house survived the avenging sword? Only if he meant us to understand those who belong to the stock—but the stock of that whole priesthood according to the order of Aaron.

Ergo si de illis est praedestinatis reliquiis, de quibus alius propheta dixit: Reliquiae saluae fient (unde et apostolus: Sic ergo, inquit, et in hoc tempore reliquiae per electionem gratiae factae sunt), quia de talibus reliquiis bene intellegitur esse, de quo dictum est: Qui superauerit in domo tua: profecto credit in Christum; sicut temporibus apostolorum ex ipsa gente plurimi crediderunt, neque nunc desunt, qui, licet rarissime, tamen credant; et inpletur in eo quod hic iste homo Dei continuo secutus adiunxit: Veniet adorare ei obolo argenti. Cui adorare, nisi summo illi sacerdoti, qui et Deus est? Neque enim in illo sacerdotio secundum ordinem Aaron ad hoc ueniebant homines ad templum uel altare Dei, ut sacerdotem adorarent.

So suppose this refers to that predestined remnant of which another prophet said, "The remnant shall be saved" (which is why the apostle too says, "So too at this present time a remnant has come into being, chosen by grace"). Since the one of whom it was said, "whoever survives in your house," is rightly understood to belong to such a remnant, he surely believes in Christ—just as in the time of the apostles a great many of that very nation believed, and even now there are some who believe, though very rarely. And in him is fulfilled what this man of God immediately went on to add: "He will come to worship him with a silver obol." To worship whom, if not that supreme priest who is also God? For in that priesthood according to the order of Aaron people did not come to the temple or to the altar of God in order to worship the priest.[30]

Quid est autem quod ait: Obolo argenti, nisi breuitate uerbi fidei, de quo commemorat apostolus dictum: Verbum consummans et breuians faciet Dominus super terram? Argentum autem pro eloquio poni psalmus testis est, ubi canitur: Eloquia Domini eloquia casta, argentum igne examinatum.

And what does he mean by "with a silver obol," if not the brevity of the word of faith? The apostle recalls the saying about it: "The Lord will accomplish a word upon the earth, completing it and cutting it short." That silver stands for speech, a psalm bears witness, where it is sung: "The words of the Lord are pure words, silver tested in the fire."[31]

29 Psalm 16:8 (17:8 in most English Bibles).
30 Isaiah 10:22, quoted by Paul in Romans 9:27; Romans 11:5.
31 Romans 9:28, quoting Isaiah 10:23; Psalm 11:7 (12:6 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quid ergo dicit iste, qui uenit adorare sacerdoti Dei et sacerdoti Deo? Iacta me in partem sacerdotii tui, manducare panem. Nolo in patrum meorum conlocari honore, qui nullus est; iacta me in partem sacerdotii tui. Elegi enim abiectus esse in domo Dei; qualecumque et quantulumcumque membrum esse cupio sacerdotii tui. Sacerdotium quippe hic ipsam plebem dicit, cuius plebis ille sacerdos est mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus. Cui plebi dicit apostolus Petrus: Plebs sancta, regale sacerdotium. Quamuis nonnulli sacrificii tui sint interpretati, non sacerdotii tui; quod nihilo minus eundem significat populum Christianum. Unde dicit apostolus Paulus: Unus panis, unum corpus multi sumus.	What, then, does he say, this one who comes to worship the priest of God, the priest who is God? "Cast me into a share of your priesthood, to eat bread." I do not wish to be placed in the honor of my fathers, which is nothing; cast me into a share of your priesthood. For "I have chosen to be cast down in the house of God"; I long to be a member of your priesthood, whatever kind of member, however small. For by "priesthood" here he means the people itself, of which that priest is the "mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." It is to this people that the apostle Peter says: "A holy people, a royal priesthood." Some, it is true, have translated it "of your sacrifice," not "of your priesthood"; but this nonetheless signifies the same Christian people. That is why the apostle Paul says: "We, though many, are one bread, one body."[32]
Quod ergo addidit: Manducare panem, etiam ipsum sacrificii genus eleganter expressit, de quo dicit sacerdos ipse: Panis, quem ego dedero, caro mea est pro saeculi uita. Ipsum est sacrificium; non secundum ordinem Aaron, sed secundum ordinem Melchisedech, qui legit, intellegat. Breuis itaque ista confessio et salubriter humilis, qua dicitur: Iacta me in partem sacerdotii tui manducare panem; ipse est obolus argenti, quia et breue est et eloquium Domini est habitantis in corde credentis. Quia enim dixerat superius, dedisse se cibos domui Aaron de uictimis ueteris testamenti, ubi ait: Dedi domui patris tui omnia, quae sunt ignis filiorum Israel, in escam (haec quippe fuerant sacrificia Iudaeorum): ideo hic dixit: Manducare panem, quod est in nouo testamento sacrificium Christianorum.	So when he added "to eat bread," he also aptly expressed the very kind of sacrifice of which the priest himself says: "The bread that I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world." This is the sacrifice—not according to the order of Aaron but according to the order of Melchizedek. Let the reader understand. Brief, then, and wholesomely humble is this confession that says, "Cast me into a share of your priesthood, to eat bread." It is itself the silver obol, for it is both brief and the word of the Lord who dwells in the heart of the believer. He had said earlier that he had given the house of Aaron food from the victims of the Old Testament, when he said, "I gave your father's house as food all the fire offerings of the children of Israel" (for these had been the sacrifices of the Jews). That is why here he said "to eat bread," which in the New Testament is the sacrifice of the Christians.[33]

THE JEWISH PRIESTHOOD AND KINGSHIP, WHICH, THOUGH SAID TO BE ESTABLISHED FOREVER, DID NOT LAST, SO THAT OTHER THINGS MIGHT BE UNDERSTOOD WHOSE ETERNITY IS PROMISED

The "eternal" priesthood and kingdom of Israel were shadows of the eternal ones to come.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.6 Cum igitur haec tanta tunc altitudine praenuntiata sint, tanta nunc manifestatione clarescant, non frustra tamen moueri quispiam potest ac dicere: Quo modo confidimus uenire omnia, quae in libris illis uentura praedicta sunt,	These things were foretold back then with such depth, and they now shine out with such clarity. Even so, someone may with good reason be troubled and say: "How can we be confident that

32 Psalm 83:11 (84:10 in most English Bibles); 1 Timothy 2:5; 1 Peter 2:9; 1 Corinthians 10:17.
33 John 6:51. Melchizedek is the priest-king of Genesis 14, whose order is invoked in Psalm 109:4 (110:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

si hoc ipsum, quod ibi diuinitus dictum est: Domus tua et domus patris tui transibunt coram meinaeternum, effectum habere non potuit? quoniam uidemus illud sacerdotium fuisse mutatum, et quod illi domui promissum est, nec sperari aliquando conplendum, quia illud, quod ei reprobato mutatoque succedit, hoc potius praedicatur aeternum. Hoc qui dicit, nondum intellegit aut non recolit etiam ipsum secundum ordinem Aaron sacerdotium tamquam umbram futuri aeterni sacerdotii constitutum; ac per hoc, quando aeternitas ei promissa est, non ipsi umbrae ac figurae, sed ei, quod per ipsam adumbrabatur figurabaturque, promissum est.

Sed ne putaretur ipsa umbra esse mansura, ideo etiam mutatio eius debuit prophetari.

Regnum quoque isto modo etiam Saulis ipsius, qui certe reprobatus adque reiectus est, futuri regni erat umbra in aeternitate mansuri. Oleum quippe illud, quo unctus est et ab eo chrismate christus est dictus, mystice accipiendum et magnum sacramentum intellegendum est; quod in eo tantum ueneratus est ipse Dauid, ut percusso corde pauitauerit, quando in tenebroso occultatus antro, quo etiam Saul urgente intrauerat necessitate naturae, exiguam particulam uestis eius retrorsum latenter abscidit, ut haberet unde monstraret, quo modo ei pepercerit, cum posset occidere, adque ita suspicionem de animo eius, qua sanctum Dauid putans inimicum suum uehementer persequebatur, auferret. Ne itaque reus esset tanti sacramenti in Saule uiolati, quia uel indumentum eius sic adtrectauit, extimuit.

Ita enim scriptum est: Et percussit cor Dauid super eum, quia abstulit pinnulam chlamydis eius. Viris autem, qui cum illo erant et, ut Saulem in manus suas traditum interimeret, suadebant: Non mihi, inquit, contingat a Domino, si fecero hoc uerbum domino meo christo Domini, inferre manum meam super eum; quia christus Domini est hic. Huic ergo umbrae futuri non propter ipsam, sed propter illud, quod praefigurabat, tanta ueneratio exhibebatur.

ENGLISH

everything those books foretold will come to pass, if this very thing that was divinely spoken there, 'Your house and your father's house shall pass before me forever,' could not take effect? For we see that this priesthood has been changed. What was promised to that house cannot be hoped ever to be fulfilled, since what is proclaimed eternal is rather the priesthood that succeeded it once it was rejected and changed." Whoever says this does not yet understand, or does not remember, that the priesthood after the order of Aaron was itself established as a shadow of the eternal priesthood to come. So when eternity was promised to it, the promise was made not to the shadow and figure itself but to what was foreshadowed and prefigured through it.[34]

But so that no one would think the shadow itself was going to last, its change also had to be prophesied.

In the same way, the kingdom of Saul himself, who was certainly rejected and cast off, was a shadow of a kingdom to come that would last for eternity. For the oil with which he was anointed, the anointing from which he was called "christ," that is, "anointed," must be taken in a mystical sense and understood as a great sacred sign. David himself revered it so deeply in Saul that his heart was struck with dread. Hidden in a dark cave, which Saul had also entered to relieve himself, David secretly cut off a small piece of Saul's garment from behind. He did this so that he would have proof of how he had spared him when he could have killed him, and so might remove the suspicion that made Saul think holy David his enemy and hunt him down so fiercely. Yet he was afraid that by touching even Saul's clothing in this way he had made himself guilty of violating so great a sacred sign in Saul.

For this is what is written: "And David's heart struck him because he had cut off the edge of Saul's cloak." His men were urging him to kill Saul, now delivered into his hands. But he said to them, "The Lord forbid that I should do this thing to my lord, the Lord's anointed, and lay my hand on him, for he is the Lord's anointed." Such great reverence was shown to this shadow of what was to come, 34 1 Samuel 2:30.

LATIN

ENGLISH

then, not for its own sake but for the sake of what it prefigured.[35]

Unde et illud, quod ait Sauli Samuel: Quoniam non seruasti mandatum meum, quod mandauit tibi Dominus, quem ad modum nunc parauerat Dominus regnum tuum usque in aeternum super Israel: et nunc regnum tuum non stabit tibi, et quaeret Dominus sibi hominem secundum cor suum, et mandabit ei Dominus esse in principem super populum suum; quia non custodisti quae mandauit tibi Dominus, non sic accipiendum est, ac si ipsum Saulem Deus in aeternum praeparauerit regnaturum, et hoc postea noluerit seruare peccanti (neque enim eum peccaturum esse nesciebat); sed praeparauerat regnum eius, in quo figura regni esset aeterni. Ideo addidit: Et nunc regnum tuum non stabit tibi.

Samuel also said to Saul: "Because you have not kept my command, which the Lord commanded you—just as the Lord had now prepared your kingdom over Israel forever—now your kingdom will not stand for you. The Lord will seek for himself a man after his own heart, and the Lord will command him to be ruler over his people, because you have not kept what the Lord commanded you." This is not to be taken as if God had prepared Saul himself to reign forever and later chose not to keep that promise because Saul sinned, for God was not unaware that he would sin. Rather, God had prepared Saul's kingdom so that it would contain a figure of the eternal kingdom. That is why he added, "Now your kingdom will not stand for you."[36]

Stetit ergo et stabit, quod in illo significatum est; sed non huic stabit, quia non in aeternum ipse fuerat regnaturus, nec progenies eius, ut saltem per posteros alterum alteri succedentes uideretur inpleri quod dictum est: In aeternum. Et quaeret, inquit, Dominus sibi hominem; siue Dauid siue ipsum Mediatorem significans testamenti noui, qui figurabatur in chrismate etiam, quo unctus est ipse Dauid et progenies eius. Non autem quasi nesciat ubi sit, ita sibi hominem Deus quaerit; sed per hominem more hominum loquitur, quia et sic loquendo nos quaerit. Non solum enim Deo Patri, uerum ipsi quoque Unigenito eius, qui uenit quaerere quod perierat, usque adeo iam eramus noti, ut in ipso essemus electi ante constitutionem mundi. Quaeret sibi ergo dixit suum habebit.

What was signified in Saul has stood, then, and will stand. But it will not stand for him, because neither he nor his offspring was going to reign forever, so that the word "forever" might at least seem fulfilled through descendants succeeding one another. "And the Lord," he says, "will seek for himself a man." This signifies either David or the Mediator of the new covenant himself, who was also prefigured in the anointing with which David and his offspring were anointed. God does not seek a man for himself as if he did not know where to find one. He speaks through a man in the way men speak, because by speaking in this way he is seeking us. For we were already so well known, not only to God the Father but also to his only-begotten Son, who "came to seek what was lost," that we were chosen in him "before the foundation of the world." So when he said "he will seek for himself," he meant "he will have as his own."[37]

Unde in Latina lingua hoc uerbum accipit praepositionem et adquirit dicitur; quod satis apertum est quid significet. Quamquam et sine additamento praepositionis quaerere intellegatur adquirere; ex quo lucra uocantur et quaestus.

That is why in Latin this verb takes a prefix and becomes adquirit, "he acquires," and its meaning is clear enough. Yet even without the added prefix, quaerere, "to seek," is understood as "to acquire." This is why gains are also called quaestus.

35 1 Samuel 24:5–6.
36 1 Samuel 13:13–14.
37 Luke 19:10; Ephesians 1:4.

THE SPLITTING OF THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL, FORESHADOWING THE PERMANENT DIVISION OF SPIRITUAL ISRAEL FROM FLESHLY ISRAEL

Saul's torn cloak foretells Israel's permanent division into those for and against Christ.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.7	Rursus peccauit Saul per inoboedientiam, et rursus Samuel in uerbo Domini ait illi: Quia spreuisti uerbum Domini, spreuit te Dominus, ut non sis rex super Israel. Et rursus pro eodem peccato, cum id confiteretur Saul et ueniam precaretur rogaretque Samuelem, ut reuerteretur cum illo ad placandum Deum: Non reuertar, inquit, tecum; quia spreuisti uerbum Domini, et spernet te Dominus, ne sis rex super Israel. Et conuertit Samuel faciem suam, ut abiret; et tenuit Saul pinnulam diploidis eius et disrupit eam. Et dixit ad eum Samuel: Disrupit Dominus regnum ab Israel de manu tua hodie et dabit proximo tuo bono super te, et diuidetur Israel in duo; et non conuertetur neque paenitebit eum; quoniam non est sicut homo, ut paeniteat eum; ipse minatur, et non permanet.	Saul sinned again through disobedience, and again Samuel said to him in the word of the Lord: "Because you have despised the word of the Lord, the Lord has despised you, so that you shall not be king over Israel." Saul then confessed this same sin, begged for pardon, and asked Samuel to go back with him to appease God. Again Samuel said: "I will not go back with you. Because you have despised the word of the Lord, the Lord will despise you, so that you shall not be king over Israel." And Samuel turned his face to go away, and Saul took hold of the edge of his cloak and tore it. And Samuel said to him: "The Lord has torn the kingdom from Israel out of your hand today, and he will give it to your neighbor, who is good above you. And Israel will be divided in two. He will not turn back, nor will he repent, for he is not like a man, that he should repent. He threatens, and does not abide by it."[38]
	Iste, cui dicitur: Spernet te Dominus, ne sis rex super Israel, et: Disrupit Dominus regnum ab Israel de manu tua hodie, quadraginta regnauit annos super Israel, tanto scilicet spatio temporis, quanto et ipse Dauid, et audiuit hoc primo tempore regni sui; ut intellegamus ideo dictum, quia nullus de stirpe eius fuerat regnaturus, et respiciamus ad stirpem Dauid, unde exortus est secundum carnem mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus.	This man, to whom it was said, "The Lord will despise you, so that you shall not be king over Israel," and "The Lord has torn the kingdom from Israel out of your hand today," reigned over Israel for forty years—just as long a time as David himself. He heard these words early in his reign. We are meant to understand that this was said because no one from his line would reign, and to look instead to the line of David. From that line, according to the flesh, came "the mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."[39]
	Non autem habet scriptura, quod in plerisque Latinis codicibus legitur: Disrupit Dominus regnum Israel de manu tua; sed sicut a nobis positum est inuentum in Graecis: Disrupit Dominus regnum ab Israel de manu tua; ut hoc intellegatur de manu tua, quod est ab Israel. Populi ergo Israel personam figurate gerebat homo iste, qui populus regnum fuerat amissurus, Christo Iesu Domino nostro per nouum testamentum non carnaliter, sed spiritaliter regnaturo. De quo cum dicitur: Et dabit illud proximo tuo, ad carnis cognationem id refertur; ex Israel enim Christus secundum carnem, unde et Saul.	Scripture does not have what we read in most Latin manuscripts, "The Lord has torn the kingdom of Israel out of your hand." It has what I have quoted, as found in the Greek: "The Lord has torn the kingdom from Israel out of your hand." So "out of your hand" is to be understood as meaning "from Israel." This man, then, figuratively represented the people of Israel. That people was going to lose the kingdom, since Christ Jesus our Lord was to reign through the new covenant, not in a carnal but in a spiritual way. When it is said of 38 1 Samuel 15:23, 26–29.

39 1 Timothy 2:5. Saul's forty-year reign comes from Acts 13:21.

LATIN

ENGLISH

him, "and he will give it to your neighbor," this refers to kinship in the flesh. For Christ came from Israel according to the flesh, and so did Saul.

Quod uero additum est: bono super te, potest quidem intellegi meliori te; nam et quidam sic sunt interpretati; sed melius sic accipitur bono super te, ut, quia ille bonus est, ideo sit super te, iuxta illud aliud propheticum: Donec ponam omnes inimicos tuos sub pedibus tuis; in quibus est et Israel, cui suo persecutori regnum abstulit Christus; quamuis fuerit illic et Israel, in quo dolus non erat, quoddam quasi frumentum illarum palearum; nam utique inde erant apostoli, inde tot martyres, quorum prior Stephanus: inde tot ecclesiae, quas apostolus Paulus commemorat, in conuersione eius magnificantes Deum.

The added words "who is good above you" can indeed be understood as "better than you," and some have translated them that way. But it is better to take "good above you" to mean that because he is good, he is therefore above you. This agrees with that other prophetic saying: "Until I put all your enemies under your feet." Among these enemies is Israel, Christ's persecutor, from whom Christ took away the kingdom. Yet there was also an Israel there "in whom there was no guile," a kind of grain among that chaff. For the apostles certainly came from there, and so did many martyrs, the first of whom was Stephen. So did the many churches that the apostle Paul mentions as glorifying God for his conversion.[40]

De qua re non dubito intellegendum esse quod sequitur: Et diuidetur Israel in duo, in Israel scilicet inimicum Christo et Israel adhaerentem Christo, in Israel ad ancillam et Israel ad liberam pertinentem. Nam ista duo genera primum simul erant, uelut Abraham adhuc adhaereret ancillae, donec sterilis per Christi gratiam fecundata clamaret: Eice ancillam et filium eius. Propter peccatum quidem Salomonis regnante filio eius Roboam scimus Israel in duo fuisse diuisum adque ita perseuerasse, habentibus singulis partibus reges suos, donec illa gens tota a Chaldaeis esset ingenti uastatione subuersa adque translata. Sed hoc quid ad Saulem, cum, si tale aliquid comminandum esset, ipsi Dauid fuerit potius comminandum, cuius erat filius Salomon?

I have no doubt that what follows is to be understood of this: "And Israel will be divided in two." That is, into an Israel hostile to Christ and an Israel holding fast to Christ, into an Israel that belongs to the slave woman and an Israel that belongs to the free woman. At first these two kinds were together, as if Abraham were still attached to the slave woman. Then the barren woman, made fruitful by the grace of Christ, cried out: "Cast out the slave woman and her son." We know, of course, that because of Solomon's sin Israel was divided in two in the reign of his son Rehoboam. It remained so, each part having its own kings, until the whole nation was overthrown by the Chaldeans in a great devastation and carried off into exile. But what does that have to do with Saul? If any such thing was to be threatened, it would rather have been threatened against David himself, whose son Solomon was.[41]

Postremo nunc inter se gens Hebraea diuisa non est, sed indifferenter in eiusdem erroris societate dispersa per terras. Diuisio uero illa, quam Deus sub persona Saulis, illius regni et populi figuram gerentis, eidem regno populoque minatus est, aeterna adque inmutabilis significata est per hoc, quod adiunctum est: Et non conuertetur neque paenitebit eum; quoniam non est sicut homo, ut paeniteat eum; ipse minatur, et non permanet; id est, homo minatur, et non permanet: non autem Deus,

Finally, the Hebrew nation is not now divided within itself. It is scattered across the lands, all alike in the fellowship of the same error. But the division that God threatened against that kingdom and people, in the person of Saul who represented them figuratively, was shown to be eternal and unchangeable by the added words: "He will not turn back, nor will he repent, for he is not like a man, that he should repent. He threatens, and does not 40 Psalm 109:1 (110:1 in most English Bibles); John 1:47; Galatians 1:24. Stephen was the first Christian martyr (Acts 7).

41 Genesis 21:10, read through Paul's allegory in Galatians 4:21–31. The kingdom split under Rehoboam is told in 1 Kings 12.

LATIN

quem non paenitet, sicut hominem. Ubi enim legitur, quod paeniteat eum, mutatio rerum significatur, inmutabili praescientia manente diuina. Ubi ergo non paenitere dicitur, non mutare intellegitur.

Prorsus insolubilem uidemus per haec uerba prolatam diuinitus fuisse sententiam de ista diuisione populi Israel et omnino perpetuam. Quicumque enim ad Christum transierunt uel transeunt uel transibunt inde, non erant inde secundum Dei praescientiam, non secundum generis humani unam eandemque naturam. Prorsus quicumque ex Israelitis adhaerentes Christo perseuerant in illo, numquam erunt cum eis Israelitis, qui eius inimici usque in finem uitae huius esse persistunt; sed in diuisione, quae hic praenuntiata est, perpetuo permanebunt. Nihil enim prodest testamentum uetus de monte Sina in seruitutem generans, nisi quia testimonium perhibet testamento nouo. Alioquin, quamdiu legitur Moyses, uelamen super corda eorum positum est; cum autem inde quisque transierit ad Christum, auferetur uelamen.

Transeuntium quippe intentio ipsa mutatur de uetere ad nouum, ut iam non quisque intendat accipere carnalem, sed spiritalem felicitatem. Propter quod ipse magnus propheta Samuel, antequam unxisset regem Saul, quando exclamauit ad Dominum pro Israel, et exaudiuit eum, et, cum offerret holocaustosim, accedentibus alienigenis ad pugnam contra populum Dei tonuit Dominus super eos, et confusi sunt et offenderunt coram Israel adque superati sunt: adsumsit lapidem unum et statuit illum inter Massephat nouam et ueterem, et uocauit nomen eius Abennezer, quod est Latine lapis adiutoris, et dixit: Usque hoc adiuuit nos Dominus. Massephat interpretatur intentio.

Lapis ille adiutoris medietas est Saluatoris, per quem transeundum est a Massephat uetere ad nouam, id est ab intentione, qua exspectabatur in carnali regno beatitudo falsa carnalis, ad intentionem, qua per nouum testamentum exspectatur in regno caelorum beatitudo abide by it." That is, a man threatens and does not abide by it—but not God, who does not repent as a man does. For where we read that he repents, a change in things is meant, while God's foreknowledge remains unchangeable. So where he is said not to repent, it is understood that he does not change.

ENGLISH

We see, then, that through these words a divine sentence was pronounced on this division of the people of Israel, one that cannot be undone and is entirely permanent. For all who have crossed over, are crossing over, or will cross over from there to Christ were not of that people in God's foreknowledge, whatever they were by the one nature shared by the human race. All those Israelites who hold fast to Christ and persevere in him will never be with those Israelites who persist in being his enemies to the end of this life. They will remain forever in the division foretold here. For the old covenant from Mount Sinai, which bears children into slavery, is of no use except in that it bears witness to the new covenant. Otherwise, "as long as Moses is read, a veil lies over their hearts; but when anyone crosses over from there to Christ, the veil will be taken away."[42]

For the very intention of those who cross over is changed from the old to the new, so that each no longer aims at receiving a carnal happiness but a spiritual one. This is why the great prophet Samuel acted as he did before he anointed Saul king. He cried out to the Lord for Israel, and the Lord heard him. While he was offering a burnt offering, foreigners came to fight against the people of God, and the Lord thundered over them. They were thrown into confusion, stumbled before Israel, and were defeated. Then Samuel took a stone and set it up between new Mizpah and old Mizpah. He called it Ebenezer, which in Latin means "stone of the helper," and said: "Thus far the Lord has helped us." Mizpah means "intention."[43]

That stone of the helper is the mediation of the Savior. Through him we must cross over from old Mizpah to new, that is, from the intention that expected a false, carnal happiness in a carnal kingdom to the intention that, through the new covenant, expects the truest, spiritual happiness in the 42 Galatians 4:24; 2 Corinthians 3:15–16.

43 1 Samuel 7:9–12. Augustine's Latin has the forms Massephat and Abennezer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uerissima spiritalis; qua quoniam nihil est melius, huc usque adiuuat Deus.	kingdom of heaven. Since nothing is better than this, it is thus far that God helps us.

THE PROMISES MADE TO DAVID ABOUT HIS SON, WHICH ARE NOT AT ALL FULFILLED IN SOLOMON BUT MOST FULLY IN CHRIST

Nathan's promise of a son and an eternal house for David points to Christ, not Solomon.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.8 Iam nunc uideo esse monstrandum, quid ipsi Dauid, qui Sauli successit in regnum, cuius mutatione finalis illa mutatio figurata est, propter quam diuinitus cuncta dicta, cuncta conscripta sunt, Deus promiserit, quod ad rem de qua agimus pertinet. Cum regi Dauid multa prospera prouenissent, cogitauit facere Deo domum, templum illud scilicet excellentissime diffamatum, quod a rege Salomone filio eius postea fabricatum est. Hoc eo cogitante factum est uerbum Dei ad Nathan prophetam, quod perferret ad regem.	Now I think I must show what God promised to David himself, as far as it bears on our subject. David succeeded Saul in the kingship, and in that change the final change was prefigured, the one for whose sake everything was divinely spoken and everything written down. After King David had enjoyed much success, he planned to build a house for God—the famous temple, renowned far and wide, that was later built by his son, King Solomon. While he was planning this, the word of God came to the prophet Nathan, for him to carry to the king.
Ubi cum dixisset Deus, quod non ab ipso Dauid sibi aedificaretur domus, neque per tantum tempus se mandasse cuiquam in populo suo, ut sibi fieret domus cedrina: Et nunc, inquit, haec dices seruo meo Dauid: Haec dicit Dominus omnipotens: Accepi te de ouili ouium, ut esses in ducem super populum meum super Israel, et eram tecum in omnibus quibus ingrediebaris, et exterminaui omnes inimicos tuos a facie tua, et feci te nominatum secundum nomen magnorum, qui sunt super terram; et ponam locum populo meo Israel, et plantabo illum, et inhabitabit seorsum, et non sollicitus erit ultra; et non adponet filius iniquitatis humiliare eum, sicut ab initio a diebus, quibus constitui iudices super populum meum Israel; et requiem tibi dabo ab omnibus inimicis tuis, et nuntiabit tibi Dominus, quoniam domum aedificabis ipsi.	There God said that his house would not be built by David himself, and that in all that time he had not commanded anyone among his people to build him a house of cedar. Then he said: "And now you shall say this to my servant David: This is what the Lord Almighty says: I took you from the sheepfold to be leader over my people, over Israel. I was with you in everything you undertook, and I destroyed all your enemies before you, and I made you renowned like the great ones who are on the earth. And I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and I will plant them, and they will dwell apart and will no longer be anxious. The son of wickedness will no more oppress them, as he did from the beginning, from the days when I appointed judges over my people Israel. And I will give you rest from all your enemies, and the Lord will tell you that you will build a house for him."[44]
Et erit, cum repleti fuerint dies tui, et dormies cum patribus tuis, et suscitabo semen tuum post te, qui erit de uentre tuo, et praeparabo regnum eius. Hic aedificabit mihi domum nomini meo, et dirigam thronum illius usque in aeternum. Ego ero illi in patrem, et ille erit mihi in filium. Et si uenerit iniquitas eius, redarguam illum in uirga uirorum et in tactibus filiorum hominum; misericordiam autem meam non amoueam ab eo, sicut amoui, a quibus amoui faciem meam; et fidelis erit domus	"And when your days are fulfilled and you sleep with your fathers, I will raise up your seed after you, who will come from your own body, and I will prepare his kingdom. He will build me a house for my name, and I will establish his throne forever. I will be a father to him, and he will be a son to me. And if he falls into wrongdoing, I will rebuke him with the rod of men and with the touches of the sons of men. But I will not take my 44 2 Samuel 7:8–16, Nathan's prophecy to David.

LATIN

eius et regnum eius usque in aeternum coram me, et thronus eius erit erectus usque in aeternum.

ENGLISH

mercy away from him, as I took it away from those from whom I turned away my face. His house and his kingdom will be faithful forever before me, and his throne will be set up forever."

Hanc tam grandem promissionem qui putat in Salomone fuisse conpletam, multum errat. Adtendit enim quod dictum est: Hic aedificabit mihi domum, quoniam Salomon templum illud nobile struxit, et non adtendit: Fidelis erit domus eius et regnum eius usque in aeternum coram me. Adtendat ergo et adspiciat Salomonis domum plenam mulieribus alienigenis colentibus deos falsos et ipsum ab eis regem aliquando sapientem in eandem idolatriam seductum adque deiectum; et non audeat existimare Deum uel hoc promisisse mendaciter uel talem Salomonem domumque eius futuram non potuisse praescire. Non hinc autem deberemus ambigere, nec si non in Christo Domino nostro, qui factus est ex semine Dauid secundum carnem, iam uideremus ista conpleri, ne uane adque inaniter hic alium aliquem requiramus, sicut carnales Iudaei.

Whoever thinks that this great promise was fulfilled in Solomon is badly mistaken. He pays attention to the words "He will build me a house," because Solomon built that famous temple. But he pays no attention to "His house and his kingdom will be faithful forever before me." Let him pay attention, then, and look at Solomon's house, full of foreign women worshiping false gods. Let him look at the king himself, once wise, led astray by them into the same idolatry and brought down. And let him not dare to think either that God made this promise falsely or that he could not foreknow what Solomon and his house would become. Even if we did not already see these things fulfilled in Christ our Lord, who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, we ought not to be in doubt on this point. Otherwise we would vainly and pointlessly look for someone else here, as the carnal-minded Jews do.[45]

Nam et ipsi usque adeo filium, quem loco isto regi Dauid promissum legunt, intellegunt non fuisse Salomonem, ut eo, qui promissus est tanta iam manifestatione, declarato adhuc mirabili caecitate alium sperare se dicant. Facta est quidem nonnulla imago rei futurae etiam in Salomone, in eo quod templum aedificauit et pacem habuit secundum nomen suum (Salomon quippe pacificus est Latine) et in exordio regni sui mirabiliter laudabilis fuit; sed eadem sua persona per umbram futuri praenuntiabat etiam ipse Christum Dominum, non exhibebat. Unde quaedam de illo ita scripta sunt, quasi de ipso ista praedicta sint, dum scriptura sancta etiam rebus gestis prophetans quodam modo in eo figuram deliniat futurorum.

For even they understand that the son they read of as promised to King David in this passage was not Solomon. They are so sure of it that, now that the one promised has been revealed so plainly, they still say, with astonishing blindness, that they are hoping for another. There was indeed some image of what was to come in Solomon too. He built the temple and had peace in keeping with his name, for "Solomon" means pacificus, "the peaceable one," in Latin. At the start of his reign he was wonderfully praiseworthy. But in his own person, as a shadow of what was to come, he foretold Christ the Lord; he did not present him. That is why some things are written about him as if these predictions concerned Solomon himself. For holy Scripture, which prophesies even through historical events, in a sense sketches in him the figure of things to come.

Nam praeter libros diuinae historiae, ubi regnasse narratur, psalmus etiam septuagensimus primus titulo nominis eius inscriptus est; in quo tam multa dicuntur, quae omnino ei conuenire non possunt, Domino autem Christo aptissima perspicuitate conueniunt, ut euidenter appareat, quod in illo figura qualiscumque adumbrata sit,

Besides the books of sacred history that tell of his reign, Psalm 71 also bears his name in its title. It says so many things that cannot possibly fit him, but that fit Christ the Lord with perfect clarity, that it is plainly evident that in Solomon some sort 45 Romans 1:3. Solomon's foreign wives and his idolatry are told in 1 Kings 11.

LATIN

in isto autem ipsa ueritas praesentata. Notum est enim, quibus, terminis regnum conclusum fuerat Salomonis; et tamen in eo psalmo legitur, ut alia taceam: Dominabitur a mari usque ad mare et a flumine usque ad terminos orbis terrae, quod in Christo uidemus inpleri. A flumine quippe dominandi sumsit exordium, ubi baptizatus a Iohanne eodem, monstrante coepit agnosci a discipulis, qui eum non solum magistrum, uerum etiam Dominum appellauerunt.

Nec ob aliud uiuente adhuc patre suo Dauid regnare coepit Salomon, quod nulli regum illorum contigit, nisi ut hinc quoque satis eluceat non esse ipsum, quem prophetia ista praesignat, quae ad eius patrem loquitur dicens: Et erit, cum repleti fuerint dies tui, et dormies cum patribus tuis, et suscitabo semen tuum post te, qui erit de uentre tuo, et praeparabo regnum illius. Quo modo ergo propter id quod sequitur: Hic aedificabit mihi domum, iste Salomon putabitur prophetatus, et non potius propter id quod praecedit: Cum repleti fuerint dies tui et dormies cum patribus tuis, suscitabo semen tuum post te, alius pacificus intellegitur esse promissus, qui non ante, sicut iste, sed post mortem Dauid praenuntiatus est suscitandus?

Quamlibet enim longo interposito tempore Iesus Christus ueniret, procul dubio post mortem regis Dauid, cui sic est promissus, eum uenire oportebat, qui aedificaret domum Deo, non de lignis et lapidibus, sed de hominibus, qualem illum aedificare gaudemus. Huic enim domui dicit apostolus, hoc est fidelibus Christi: Templum enim Dei sanctum est, quod estis uos.

ENGLISH

of figure was sketched in shadow, while in Christ the truth itself was presented. For it is well known within what borders Solomon's kingdom was confined. Yet in that psalm we read, to say nothing of other things: "He shall rule from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth." We see this fulfilled in Christ. For he began his rule from the river. There he was baptized by John, and when John pointed him out he began to be recognized by the disciples, who called him not only Teacher but also Lord.[46]

Solomon began to reign while his father David was still alive, something that happened to none of those kings. This was for no other reason than to make it quite clear, from this fact as well, that he is not the one whom this prophecy foreshadows. For the prophecy speaks to his father and says: "And when your days are fulfilled and you sleep with your fathers, I will raise up your seed after you, who will come from your own body, and I will prepare his kingdom." How, then, can Solomon be thought the subject of the prophecy because of what follows, "He will build me a house"? Should we not rather, because of what comes before —"When your days are fulfilled and you sleep with your fathers, I will raise up your seed after you"— understand that another peaceable one was promised, one who was foretold to be raised up not before David's death, as Solomon was, but after it?[47]

For however long the interval before Jesus Christ came, it was beyond doubt necessary that he come after the death of King David, to whom he had been promised in this way. He was the one who would build a house for God, not of wood and stones but of human beings, such a house as we rejoice to see him building. For it is to this house, that is, to Christ's faithful, that the apostle says: "For God's temple is holy, and that temple is you."[48]

46 Psalm 71:8 (72:8 in most English Bibles); compare John 13:13.
47 Solomon's accession during David's lifetime is told in 1 Kings 1.
48 1 Corinthians 3:17.

HOW LIKE THE PROPHECY ABOUT CHRIST IN PSALM 88 IS TO THE PROMISES MADE THROUGH THE PROPHET NATHAN IN THE BOOKS OF KINGS

Psalm 88 repeats the promises to David, fulfilled in Christ and his body the Church.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.9	Propter quod et in psalmo octogensimo octauo, cuius est titulus: Intellectus ipsi Aethan Israelitae, commemorantur promissiones Dei factae regi Dauid, et istis, quae in libro regnorum sunt posita, quaedam ibi similia dicuntur, sicut est: Iuraui Dauid seruo meo: Usque in aeternum praeparabo semen tuum; et iterum: Tunc locutus es in adspectu filiis tuis et dixisti: Posui adiutorium super potentem, exaltaui electum de populo meo. Inueni Dauid seruum meum, in oleo sancto meo unxi eum. Manus enim mea auxiliabitur ei et bracchium meum confortabit eum. Non proficiet inimicus in eo et filius iniquitatis non adponet nocere ei. Et concidam inimicos eius a facie eius, et eos, qui oderunt eum, fugabo. Et ueritas mea et misericordia mea cum ipso, et in nomine meo exaltabitur cornu eius.	That is why Psalm 88, whose title is "Of understanding, for Ethan the Israelite," also recalls the promises God made to King David. Some of what it says there is similar to what is set down in the book of Kingdoms, such as: "I have sworn to David my servant: I will prepare your seed forever." And again: "Then you spoke in the sight of your sons and said: I have laid help upon one who is mighty; I have exalted one chosen from my people. I have found David my servant; with my holy oil I have anointed him. For my hand will help him, and my arm will strengthen him. The enemy will gain no advantage over him, and the son of iniquity will not go on to harm him. And I will cut down his enemies before his face, and I will put to flight those who hate him. And my truth and my mercy will be with him, and in my name his horn will be exalted."[49]
	Et ponam in mari manum eius et in fluminibus dexteram eius. Ipse inuocabit me: Pater meus es tu, Deus meus et susceptor salutis meae. Et ego primogenitum ponam eum, excelsum aput reges terrae. In aeternum seruabo ei misericordiam meam et testamentum meum fidele ipsi. Et ponam in saeculum saeculi semen eius, et thronum eius sicut dies caeli. Quae omnia de Domino Iesu intelleguntur, quando recte intelleguntur, sub nomine Dauid propter formam serui, quam de semine Dauid idem Mediator adsumsit ex uirgine. Continuo etiam dicitur de peccatis filiorum eius tale aliquid, quale in regnorum libro positum est et quasi de Salomone procliuius accipitur.	"And I will set his hand on the sea and his right hand on the rivers. He will call upon me: You are my Father, my God and the upholder of my salvation. And I will make him my firstborn, high among the kings of the earth. I will keep my mercy for him forever, and my covenant will be faithful to him. And I will establish his seed forever and ever, and his throne as the days of heaven." All these things are understood of the Lord Jesus, when they are rightly understood. They are said under the name of David because of the form of a servant that the same Mediator took from the seed of David, from a virgin. Immediately afterward, something is also said about the sins of his sons. It is much like what is set down in the book of Kingdoms, which is more readily taken as though it were about Solomon.
	Ibi namque, hoc est in regnorum libro: Et si uenerit, inquit, iniquitas eius, redarguam illum in uirga uirorum et in tactibus filiorum hominum; misericordiam autem meam non amoueam ab eo; tactibus significans plagas correptionis. Unde illud est: Ne tetigeritis christos meos. Quod quid est aliud, quam Ne laeseritis? In psalmo uero	For there, that is, in the book of Kingdoms, he says: "And if his iniquity comes, I will rebuke him with the rod of men and with the touches of the sons of men; but my mercy I will not take away from him." By "touches" he means the blows of correction. Hence the saying: "Do not touch my 49 Psalm 88 (89 in most English Bibles). The "book of Kingdoms" is Augustine's name for the books now called 1–2 Samuel and 1–2 Kings; the promise to David is in 2 Samuel 7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
cum ageret tamquam de Dauid, ut quiddam eius modi etiam ibi diceret: Si dereliquerint, inquit, filii eius legem meam et in iudiciis meis non ambulauerint; si iustificationes meas profanauerint et mandata mea non custodierint: uisitabo in uirga iniquitates eorum et in flagellis delicta eorum; misericordiam autem meam non dispergam ab eo. Non dixit ab eis cum loqueretur de filiis eius, non de ipso; sed dixit ab eo, quod bene intellectum tantundem ualet.	anointed ones." What does this mean but "Do not harm them"? In the psalm, however, when he was speaking as if about David, so as to say something of the same kind there too, he says: "If his sons forsake my law and do not walk in my judgments; if they profane my statutes and do not keep my commandments, I will visit their iniquities with the rod and their offenses with scourges; but my mercy I will not scatter from him." He did not say "from them," although he was speaking of his sons, not of him; he said "from him," which, rightly understood, amounts to the same thing.[50]
Non enim Christi ipsius, quod est caput ecclesiae, possent inueniri ulla peccata, quae opus esset humanis correptionibus seruata misericordia diuinitus coherceri; sed in eius corpore ac membris, quod populus eius est. Ideo in libro regnorum: Iniquitas eius dicitur; in psalmo autem: Filiorum eius; ut intellegamus de ipso dici quodam modo, quod de eius corpore dicitur. Propter quod etiam ipse de caelo, cum corpus eius, quod sunt fideles eius, Saulus persequeretur: Saule, inquit, Saule, quid me persequeris? Deinde in consequentibus psalmi: Neque nocebo, inquit, in ueritate mea, neque profanabo testamentum meum, et quae procedunt de labiis meis non reprobabo. Semel iuraui in sancto meo, si Dauid mentiar; id est, nequaquam Dauid mentiar. Solet enim sic loqui scriptura.	For no sins could be found in Christ himself, who is the head of the Church, that would need to be restrained by God through human correction while his mercy was preserved. Such sins are found in his body and members, which is his people. That is why the book of Kingdoms says "his iniquity," but the psalm says "of his sons": so that we may understand that what is said of his body is in a certain way said of him. For this reason, too, when Saul was persecuting his body, which is his faithful, he himself said from heaven: "Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?" Then, in what follows in the psalm, he says: "Nor will I do harm against my truth, nor will I profane my covenant, and what proceeds from my lips I will not reject. Once I have sworn by my holiness, if I lie to David"—that is, I will by no means lie to David. For this is how Scripture usually speaks.[51]
Quid autem non mentiatur, adiungit et dicit: Semen eius in aeternum manet; et sedes eius sicut sol in con-. spectu meo, et sicut luna perfecta in aeternum, et testis in caelo fidelis.	And what it is that he will not lie about, he adds, saying: "His seed endures forever, and his throne is like the sun in my sight, and like the full moon forever, and a faithful witness in heaven."

HOW DIFFERENT THE EVENTS IN THE KINGDOM OF THE EARTHLY JERUSALEM WERE FROM WHAT GOD HAD PROMISED, SO THAT THE TRUTH OF THE PROMISE MIGHT BE UNDERSTOOD TO CONCERN THE GLORY OF ANOTHER KING AND KINGDOM

The fall of David's earthly kingdom shows that the promised anointed one was still to come.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.10 Post haec tantae promissionis ualidissima firmamenta, ne putarentur in Salomone conpleta, tamquam id speraretur nec inueniretur: Tu uero, inquit, reppulisti et ad nihilum deduxisti, Domine. Hoc quippe factum est de regno Salomonis in posteris eius usque ad euersionem ipsius	After these mighty pillars of so great a promise, so that they would not be thought to have been fulfilled in Solomon—as if that were what was hoped for and yet was not found there—he says: "But you have rejected and brought to nothing, O Lord."

50 2 Samuel 7:14–15; "Do not touch my anointed ones" is Psalm 104:15 (105:15 in most English Bibles).
51 Acts 9:4.

LATIN

terrenae Hierusalem, quae regni eiusdem sedes fuit, et maxime ipsius templi labem, quod fuerat a Salomone constructum. Sed ne ob hoc putaretur Deus contra sua promissa fecisse, continuo subiecit: Distulisti christum tuum. Non ergo est ille Salomon, sed nec ipse Dauid, si dilatus est christus Domini.

Cum enim christi eius dicerentur omnes reges mystico illo chrismate consecrati, non solum a rege Dauid et deinceps, sed ab illo etiam Saule, qui populo eidem rex primus est unctus (ipse quippe Dauid eum christum Domini appellat): erat tamen unus uerus christus, cuius illi figuram prophetica unctione gestabant; qui secundum opinionem hominum, qui eum putabant in Dauid uel in Salomone intellegendum, differebatur in longum; secundum dispositionem autem Dei uenturus suo tempore parabatur.

Interea dum ille differtur, quid factum sit de regno terrenae Hierusalem, ubi sperabatur utique regnaturus, secutus iste psalmus adiunxit adque ait: Euertisti testamentum serui tui, profanasti in terra sanctitatem eius; destruxisti omnes macerias eius, posuisti munitiones eius formidinem; diripuerunt eum omnes transeuntes uiam, factus est obprobrium uicinis suis; exaltasti dexteram inimicorum eius, iucundasti omnes inimicos eius; auertisti adiutorium gladii eius et non es opitulatus ei in bello; dissoluisti eum ab emundatione, sedem eius in terram conlisisti; minuisti dies sedis eius, perfudisti eum confusione. Haec omnia uenerunt super ancillam Hierusalem, in qua regnauerunt nonnulli etiam filii liberae, regnum illud tenentes in dispensatione temporaria, regnum autem caelestis Hierusalem, cuius erant filii, in uera fide habentes et in uero Christo sperantes.

Quo modo autem ista uenerint super illud regnum, index est rerum gestarum, si legatur, historia.

ENGLISH

This indeed happened to the kingdom of Solomon in his descendants, down to the overthrow of the earthly Jerusalem itself, which was the seat of that kingdom, and above all to the ruin of the very temple that Solomon had built. But so that God would not be thought on this account to have acted against his promises, he immediately added: "You have put off your anointed." So that anointed one is not Solomon, nor even David himself, if the Lord's anointed has been put off.

For all the kings consecrated with that mystical chrism were called his anointed—not only from King David onward, but also that Saul who was the first king anointed over that same people (David himself, in fact, calls him the Lord's anointed). Yet there was one true Christ, whose figure they bore by their prophetic anointing. In the opinion of men, who thought he was to be understood as David or Solomon, he was being put off for a long time; but in God's plan he was being made ready to come in his own time.

Meanwhile, while he is put off, what became of the kingdom of the earthly Jerusalem, where he was certainly expected to reign, the psalm goes on to add, saying: "You have overturned the covenant of your servant; you have profaned his holiness on the earth. You have destroyed all his walls; you have turned his strongholds into dread. All who pass along the way have plundered him; he has become a reproach to his neighbors. You have exalted the right hand of his enemies; you have made all his enemies rejoice. You have turned back the help of his sword and have not aided him in battle. You have cut him off from cleansing; you have dashed his throne to the ground. You have shortened the days of his throne; you have covered him with confusion." All these things came upon Jerusalem the slave woman. In her some sons of the free woman also reigned: they held that kingdom under a temporary dispensation, but they possessed the kingdom of the heavenly Jerusalem, whose sons they were, in true faith, and they hoped in the true Christ.

How these things came upon that kingdom, the history of events, if one reads it, makes plain.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE PEOPLE OF GOD, WHICH IS IN CHRIST THROUGH HIS TAKING ON FLESH, WHO ALONE HAD POWER TO RESCUE HIS OWN SOUL FROM THE UNDERWORLD

The psalmist prays; Christ, the substance of Israel, alone rescued his soul from the underworld.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.11	Post haec autem prophetata ad precandum Deum propheta conuertitur; sed et ipsa precatio prophetatio est. Usque quo, Domine, auertis in finem? subauditur faciem tuam, sicut alibi dicitur: Quo usque auertis faciem tuam a me? Nam ideo quidam codices hic non habent auertis, sed auerteris; quamquam possit intellegi: Auertis misericordiam tuam, quam promisisti Dauid. Quod autem dixit: In finem, quid est nisi usque in finem? Qui finis intellegendus est ultimum tempus, quando in Christum Iesum etiam gens illa est creditura, ante quem finem illa fieri oportebat, quae superius aerumnosa defleuit. Propter quae et hic sequitur: Exardescit sicut ignis ira tua: memento quae est mea substantia. Nihil hic melius quam ipse Iesus intellegitur substantia populi eius, ex quo natura est carnis eius.	After these prophecies, the prophet turns to prayer to God; but the prayer itself is also a prophecy. "How long, O Lord, do you turn away to the end?" Understood here is "your face," as is said elsewhere: "How long will you turn your face away from me?" That is why some manuscripts here do not have "do you turn away" but "are you turned away"; although it could also be understood as "do you turn away your mercy, which you promised David." And when he said "to the end," what does it mean but "until the end"? This end is to be understood as the last time, when that nation too will believe in Christ Jesus. Before that end, the miseries he lamented above had to take place. Because of them, here too there follows: "Your anger blazes like fire: remember what my substance is." Nothing is better understood here than Jesus himself as the substance of his people, from which people his flesh takes its nature.[52]
	Non enim uane, inquit, constituisti omnes filios hominum. Nisi enim esset unus filius hominis substantia Israel, per quem filium hominis liberarentur multi filii hominum, uane utique constituti essent omnes filii hominum. Nunc uero omnis quidem humana natura per peccatum primi hominis in uanitatem de ueritate conlapsa est, propter quod dicit alius psalmus: Homo uanitati similis factus est, dies eius uelut umbra praetereunt; sed non uane Deus constituit omnes filios hominum, quia et multos a uanitate liberat per mediatorem Iesum, et quos liberandos non esse praesciuit, ad utilitatem liberandorum et conparationem duarum inter se a contrario ciuitatum non utique uane in totius rationalis creaturae pulcherrima adque iustissima ordinatione constituit. Deinde sequitur: Quis est homo, qui uiuet et non uidebit mortem, eruet animam suam de manu inferi?	"For not in vain," he says, "have you established all the sons of men." For unless there were one Son of man as the substance of Israel, one Son of man through whom many sons of men would be set free, all the sons of men would certainly have been established in vain. As it is, the whole of human nature has indeed fallen from truth into vanity through the sin of the first man—which is why another psalm says: "Man has become like vanity; his days pass away like a shadow." But God has not established all the sons of men in vain. He frees many from vanity through Jesus the mediator; and those whom he foreknew would not be freed he has established—certainly not in vain—within the most beautiful and most just ordering of the whole rational creation, for the benefit of those who are to be freed and for the contrast between the two cities set against each other. Then follows: "Who is the man who will live and not see death, who will rescue his soul from the hand of the underworld?"[53]
	Quis est iste, nisi substantia illa Israel ex semine Dauid, Christus Iesus? De quo dicit apostolus, quod surgens a	Who is this but that substance of Israel from the seed of David, Christ Jesus? Of him the apostle

52 Psalm 12:1 (13:1 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
mortuis iam non moritur, et mors ei ultra non dominabitur. Sic enim uiuet et non uidebit mortem, ut tamen mortuus fuerit, sed animam suam eruerit de manu inferni, quo propter quorundam soluenda inferna uincula descenderat; eruerit autem potestate illa, de qua in euangelio dicit: Potestatem habeo ponendi animam meam et potestatem habeo iterum sumendi eam.	says that, rising from the dead, he dies no more, and death will no longer have dominion over him. For he will live and not see death in such a way that he nevertheless died, but rescued his soul from the hand of the underworld, into which he had descended to loosen the bonds of the underworld for some. And he rescued it by that power of which he speaks in the Gospel: "I have power to lay down my soul, and I have power to take it up again."[54]

TO WHOM THE PLEA FOR THE PROMISES BELONGS, OF WHICH THE PSALM SAYS, "WHERE ARE YOUR MERCIES OF OLD, LORD," AND THE REST

"Where are your mercies of old?" is best heard as the prayer of persecuted Christians.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.12 Sed cetera psalmi huius, quae ita se habent: Ubi sunt miserationes tuae antiquae, Domine, quas iurasti Dauid in ueritate tua? Memento, Domine, obprobrii seruorum tuorum, quod continui in sinu meo multarum gentium; quod exprobrauerunt inimici tui, Domine; quod exprobrauerunt, commutationem Christi tui, utrum ex persona dicta sint illorum Israelitarum, qui desiderabant reddi sibi promissionem, quae facta est ad Dauid, an potius Christianorum, qui non secundum carnem, sed secundum spiritum sunt Israelitae, merito quaeri potest. Dicta sunt quippe ista uel scripta tempore, quo fuit Aethan, de cuius nomine titulum iste psalmus accepit; et idem tempus regni Dauid fuit; ac per hoc non diceretur: Ubi sunt miserationes tuae antiquae, Domine, quas iurasti Dauid in ueritate tua?	As for the rest of this psalm, which runs: "Where are your mercies of old, O Lord, which you swore to David in your truth? Remember, O Lord, the reproach of your servants from many nations, which I have held in my bosom; with which your enemies have reproached, O Lord; with which they have reproached the change of your Christ"—one may rightly ask whether these words are spoken in the person of those Israelites who longed for the promise made to David to be fulfilled for them, or rather in the person of the Christians, who are Israelites not according to the flesh but according to the spirit. For these words were spoken or written at the time when Ethan lived, from whose name this psalm took its title; and that was also the time of David's reign. So it would not be said, "Where are your mercies of old, O Lord, which you swore to David in your truth?"
nisi eorum personam in se propheta transfiguraret, qui longe postea futuri erant, quibus hoc tempus esset antiquum, quando regi Dauid ista promissa sunt. Potest autem intellegi multas gentes, quando Christianos persequebantur, exprobrasse illis passionem Christi, quam scriptura commutationem uocat, quoniam moriendo inmortalis est factus. Potest et commutatio Christi secundum hoc accipi exprobrata Israelitis, quia, cum eorum sperareturfuturus, factus est gentium, et hoc eis nunc exprobrant multae gentes, quae crediderunt in eum per testamentum nouum, illis in uetustate remanentibus, ut ideo dicatur: Memento, Domine, obprobrii seruorum tuorum, quia non eos obliuiscente,	unless the prophet were taking on himself the person of those who were to come long afterward, for whom the time when these promises were made to King David would be ancient. It can also be understood that many nations, when they were persecuting the Christians, reproached them with the passion of Christ, which Scripture calls a "change," since by dying he became immortal. The "change of Christ" can also be taken as a reproach against the Israelites in this sense: that although he was expected to be theirs, he became the nations'. And many nations who have believed in him through

53 Psalm 143:4 (144:4 in most English Bibles).
54 Romans 6:9; John 10:18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sed potius miserante Domino et ipsi post hoc obprobrium crediturі sunt. Sed ille, quem prius posui, conuenientior mihi sensus uidetur.	the new covenant now reproach them with this, while they remain in the old. On this reading the words "Remember, O Lord, the reproach of your servants" are said because the Lord does not forget them but rather has mercy on them, and they too will believe after this reproach. But the sense I gave first seems to me more fitting.
Inimicis enim Christi, quibus exprobratur, quod eos ad gentes transiens reliquerit Christus, incongrue uox ista coaptatur: Memento, Domine, obprobrii seruorum tuorum; non enim serui Dei nuncupandi sunt tales Iudaei; sed eis uerba ista conpetunt, qui, cum graues humilitates persecutionum pro Christi nomine paterentur, recordari potuerunt excelsum regnum semini Dauid fuisse promissum, et eius desiderio dicere, non desperando, sed petendo quaerendo pulsando: Ubi sunt miserationes tuae antiquae, Domine, quas iurasti Dauid in ueritate tua? Memento, Domine, obprobrii seruorum tuorum, quod continui in sinu meo multarum gentium (hoc est, in interioribus meis patienter pertuli); quod exprobrauerunt inimici tui. Domine; quod exprobrauerunt, commutationem Christi tui; non eam putantes commutationem sed consumtionem.	For the words "Remember, O Lord, the reproach of your servants" are ill suited to the enemies of Christ, who are reproached with the fact that Christ left them and passed over to the nations; for such Jews are not to be called servants of God. These words fit rather those who, while they suffered the heavy humiliations of persecution for the name of Christ, could remember that a lofty kingdom had been promised to the seed of David. Longing for it, they could say—not in despair, but asking, seeking, knocking: "Where are your mercies of old, O Lord, which you swore to David in your truth? Remember, O Lord, the reproach of your servants from many nations, which I have held in my bosom" (that is, which I have patiently endured within myself), "with which your enemies have reproached, O Lord, with which they have reproached the change of your Christ"—for they thought it was not a change but an extinction.[55]
Quid est autem: Memento, Domine, nisi ut miserearis et pro tolerata patienter humilitate mea reddas celsitudinem, quam iurasti Dauid in ueritate tua? Si autem Iudaeis adsignemus haec uerba, illi serui Dei talia dicere potuerunt, qui expugnata terrena Hierusalem, antequam Iesus Christus humanitus nasceretur, in captiuitatem ducti sunt, intellegentes commutationem Christi, quia scilicet non per eum terrena carnalisque felicitas, qualis paucis annis regis Salomonis apparuit, sed caelestis ac spiritalis esset fideliter exspectanda; quam tunc ignorans infidelitas gentium, cum Dei populum exultabat adque insultabat esse captiuum, quid aliud quam Christi commutationem, sed scientibus nesciens, exprobrabat?	And what does "Remember, O Lord" mean, if not that you should have mercy and, in return for my humiliation patiently endured, give back the loftiness that you swore to David in your truth? If, however, we assign these words to the Jews, those servants of God could have said such things who were led into captivity after the earthly Jerusalem was conquered, before Jesus Christ was born as a man. They understood the change of Christ: namely, that through him one was faithfully to expect not an earthly and carnal happiness, such as appeared for a few years under King Solomon, but a heavenly and spiritual one. The unbelief of the nations, ignorant of this at the time, exulted and insulted God's people for being captive. What else was it reproaching them with but the change of Christ—though in its ignorance it reproached those who knew?
Et ideo quod sequitur, ubi psalmus iste concluditur: Benedictio Domini in aeternum: fiat, fiat, uniuerso	And so what follows, where this psalm closes —"The blessing of the Lord forever: so be it, so be 55 "Asking, seeking, knocking" echoes Matthew 7:7.

LATIN

populo Dei ad caelestem Hierusalem pertinenti siue in illis, qui latebant in testamento uetere, antequam reuelaretur nouum, siue in his, qui iam testamento nouo reuelato manifeste pertinere cernuntur ad Christum, satis congruit. Benedictio quippe Domini in semine Dauid non ad aliquod tempus, qualis diebus Salomonis apparuit, sed in aeternum speranda est, in qua certissima spe dicitur: Fiat, fiat. Illius enim spei est confirmatio uerbi huius iteratio. Hoc ergo intellegens Dauid ait in secundo regnorum libro, unde ad istum psalmum digressi sumus: Et locutus es pro domo serui tui in longinquum.

Ideo autem post paululum ait: Nunc incipe et benedic domum serui tui usque in aeternum et cetera, quia tunc geniturus erat filium, ex quo progenies eius duceretur ad Christum, per quem futura erat domus eius aeterna eademque domus Dei. Domus enim Dauid propter genus Dauid; domus autem Dei eadem ipsa propter templum Dei de hominibus factum, non de lapidibus, ubi habitet in aeternum populus cum Deo et in Deo suo, et Deus cum populo adque in populo suo; ita ut Deus sit inplens populum suum, et populus plenus Deo suo, cum Deus erit omnia in omnibus, ipse in pace praemium, qui uirtus in bello.

Ideo cum in uerbis Nathan dictum sit: Et nuntiabit tibi Dominus, quoniam domum aedificabis ipsi, postea dictum est in uerbis Dauid: Quoniam tu Dominus omnipotens Deus Israel, reuelasti aurem serui tui dicens: Domum aedificabo tibi. Hanc enim domum et nos aedificamus bene uiuendo, et Deus ut bene uiuamus opitulando; quia nisi Dominus aedificauerit domum, in uanum laborant aedificantes eam. Cuius domus cum uenerit ultima dedicatio, tunc fiet illud, quod hic per Nathan locutus est Deus dicens: Et ponam locum populo meo Israel, et plantabo illum, et inhabitabit seorsum, et non sollicitus erit ultra, et non adponet filius iniquitatis humiliare eum, sicut ab initio a diebus, quibus constitui iudices super populum meum Israel.

ENGLISH

it"—fits well enough the whole people of God belonging to the heavenly Jerusalem: both those who lay hidden in the old covenant before the new was revealed, and those who, now that the new covenant has been revealed, are plainly seen to belong to Christ. For the Lord's blessing in the seed of David is to be hoped for not for some period of time, such as appeared in the days of Solomon, but forever; and in that most certain hope it is said, "So be it, so be it." For the repetition of this word is the confirmation of that hope. Understanding this, then, David says in the second book of Kingdoms, from which we digressed to this psalm: "And you have spoken concerning the house of your servant for a long time to come."[56]

A little later he says, "Now begin, and bless the house of your servant forever," and so on, because he was then about to beget a son from whom his line would be carried down to Christ, through whom his house was to be eternal and at the same time the house of God. It is the house of David because of David's lineage; but the very same house is the house of God because of the temple of God made of human beings, not of stones. There the people will dwell forever with God and in their God, and God with his people and in his people; so that God fills his people, and the people are full of their God, when God will be all in all—he who is our courage in war will himself be our reward in peace.[57]

That is why, when it was said in the words of Nathan, "And the Lord will announce to you that you will build him a house," it was afterward said in the words of David, "For you, O Lord almighty, God of Israel, have opened the ear of your servant, saying: I will build you a house." For we too build this house by living well, and God builds it by helping us to live well; for "unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain." When the final dedication of this house comes, then will be fulfilled what God spoke here through Nathan, saying: "And I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and I will plant them, and they will dwell apart, and they will no longer be anxious, and the son of iniquity will not again humble them, as 56 2 Samuel 7:19.

57 2 Samuel 7:29; "all in all" is from 1 Corinthians 15:28.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	from the beginning, from the days when I appointed judges over my people Israel."[58]

WHETHER THE TRUTH OF THE PROMISED PEACE CAN BE ASCRIBED TO THE TIMES THAT PASSED UNDER SOLOMON

The promised peace was not Solomon's; it is the secure dwelling of the eternal Jerusalem.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.13 Hoc tam magnum bonum quisquis in hoc saeculo et in hac terra sperat, insipienter sapit. An quispiam putabit in pace regni Salomonis id esse conpletum? Pacem quippe illam scriptura in umbra futuri excellenti praedicatione commendat. Sed huic suspicioni uigilanter occursum est, cum postea quam dictum est: Et non adponet filius iniquitatis humiliare eum, continuo subiunctum est: Sicut ab initio a diebus, quibus constitui iudices super populum meum Israel. Iudices namque, priusquam reges ibi esse coepissent, super illum populum fuerant constituti, ex quo terram promissionis accepit.	Whoever hopes for so great a good in this world and on this earth is foolish in his wisdom. Or will anyone think it was fulfilled in the peace of Solomon's reign? Scripture does indeed commend that peace with outstanding praise, as a shadow of what was to come. But this suspicion has been watchfully headed off: after the words "And the son of iniquity will not again humble them," there was immediately added, "as from the beginning, from the days when I appointed judges over my people Israel." For judges had been appointed over that people, before there began to be kings there, from the time it received the land of promise.
Et utique humiliabat eum filius iniquitatis, hoc est hostis alienigena, per interualla temporum, quibus leguntur paces alternasse cum bellis; et inueniuntur illic pacis tempora prolixiora quam Salomon habuit, qui quadraginta regnauit annos; nam sub eo iudice, qui est appellatus Aod, octoginta anni pacis fuerunt. Absit ergo ut Salomonis tempora in hac promissione praedicta esse credantur; multo minus itaque cuiuslibet regis alterius. Non enim quisquam eorum in tanta, quanta ille, pace regnauit; nec umquam omnino gens illa ita regnum tenuit, ut sollicita non fuerit ne hostibus subderetur; quia in tanta mutabilitate rerum humanarum nulli aliquando populo concessa est tanta securitas, ut huic uitae hostiles non formidaret incursus.	And certainly the son of iniquity—that is, a foreign enemy—did humble them at intervals, during which, as we read, periods of peace alternated with wars. And periods of peace are found there that were longer than the one Solomon had, who reigned forty years; for under the judge called Ehud there were eighty years of peace. Far be it, then, that Solomon's times should be believed to have been foretold in this promise; much less, then, the times of any other king. For none of them reigned in as much peace as he did; nor did that nation ever hold its kingdom in such a way that it was not anxious about being subjected to enemies. For amid such great mutability of human affairs, no people has ever been granted such security that it did not fear hostile incursions upon this life.[59]
Locus ergo iste, qui promittitur tam pacatae ac securae habitationis, aeternus est aeternisque debetur in matre Hierusalem libera, ubi erit ueraciter populus Israel; hoc enim nomen interpretatur uidens Deum; cuius praemii desiderio pia per fidem uita in hac aerumnosa peregrinatione ducenda est.	This place, then, the promise of so peaceful and secure a dwelling, is eternal, and it is owed to the eternal, in Jerusalem, our free mother, where there will truly be the people of Israel; for this name means "seeing God." In longing for that reward, we must lead a devout life by faith in this toilsome pilgrimage.[60]

58 2 Samuel 7:11, 7:27 and 7:10–11; Psalm 126:1 (127:1 in most English Bibles).
59 Ehud (Latin Aod) was one of the judges of Israel; the eighty years of peace are in Judges 3:30.
60 Galatians 4:26.

DAVID'S CARE IN ARRANGING THE PSALMS AND THEIR MYSTERY

David arranged the psalms as a musical figure of the well-ordered city; he wrote all of them.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.14	Procurrente igitur per tempora ciuitate Dei, primo in umbra futuri, in terrena scilicet Hierusalem, regnauit Dauid. Erat autem Dauid uir in canticis eruditus, qui harmoniam musicam non uulgari uoluptate, sed fideli uoluntate dilexerit eaque Deo suo, qui uerus est Deus, mystica rei magnae figuratione seruierit. Diuersorum enim sonorum rationabilis moderatusque concentus concordi uarietate conpactam bene ordinatae ciuitatis insinuat unitatem. Denique omnis fere prophetia eius in psalmis est, quos centum quinquaginta, liber continet, quem psalmorum uocamus. In quibus nonnulli uolunt eos solos factos esse a Dauid, qui eius nomine inscripti sunt. Sunt item qui putant non ab eo factos, nisi qui praenotantur: Ipsius Dauid; qui uero habent in titulis: Ipsi Dauid, ab aliis factos personae ipsius fuisse coaptatos.	So, as the city of God ran its course through time, David reigned, at first in a shadow of what was to come—that is, in the earthly Jerusalem. David was a man skilled in song. He loved musical harmony not from a vulgar pleasure but from a faithful purpose, and with it he served his God, who is the true God, by mystically prefiguring a great reality. For the rational and measured blending of different sounds, held together in harmonious variety, suggests the unity of a well-ordered city. In fact, almost all his prophecy is in the psalms. There are one hundred and fifty of them, contained in the book we call the Book of Psalms. Some hold that, of these, only the ones headed with his name were composed by David. There are also those who think that only the ones headed "Of David himself" were composed by him, while those that have "For David himself" in their titles were composed by others and adapted to his person.[61]
	Quae opinio uoce euangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait, quod ipse Dauid in spiritu Christum dixerit esse Dominum suum; quoniam psalmus centensimus nonus sic incipit: Dixit Dominus Domino meo: Sede a dextris meis, donec ponam inimicos tuos scabellum pedum tuorum. Et certe idem psalmus non habet in titulo: Ipsius Dauid, sed: Ipsi Dauid, sicut plurimi. Mihi autem credibilius uidentur existimare, qui omnes illos centum et quinquaginta psalmos eius operi tribuunt eumque aliquos praenotasse etiam nominibus aliorum aliquid, quod ad rem pertineat, figurantibus, ceteros autem nullius hominis nomen in titulis habere uoluisse, sicut ei uarietatis huius dispositionem, quamuis latebrosam, non tamen inanem Dominus inspirauit.	This opinion is refuted by the words of the Savior himself in the Gospel, where he says that David himself, in the Spirit, called Christ his Lord. For Psalm 109 begins: "The Lord said to my Lord: Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies the footstool of your feet." And this same psalm certainly does not have "Of David himself" in its title, but "For David himself," like most of them. To me, however, the more credible view seems to be held by those who attribute all one hundred and fifty psalms to his work. On their view, he headed some psalms with the names of others as well, names that prefigure something relevant to the matter, while he chose to have no man's name in the titles of the rest. In this he followed the Lord, who inspired him to arrange this variety, which is obscure but not meaningless.[62]
	Nec mouere debet ad hoc non credendum, quod nonnullorum nomina prophetarum, qui longe post Dauid regis tempora fuerunt, quibusdam psalmis in eo libro leguntur inscripta et quae ibi dicuntur uelut ab eis dici uidentur. Neque enim non potuit propheticus spiritus prophetanti regi Dauid haec etiam futurorum	Nor should anyone be led to disbelieve this by the fact that the names of some prophets who lived long after King David's time are found written over certain psalms in that book, so that what is said there seems to be said by them. For the prophetic Spirit was certainly able to reveal to King David, 61 The Latin titles distinguish ipsius David (genitive, "of David") from ipsi David (dative, "to" or "for David").

62 Psalm 109 (110 in most English Bibles); Jesus cites it in Matthew 22:43–45.

LATIN	ENGLISH
prophetarum nomina reuelare, ut aliquid, quod eorum personae conueniret, prophetice cantaretur; sicut rex Iosias exorturus et regnaturus post annos amplius quam trecentos cuidam prophetae, qui etiam facta eius futura praedixit, cum suo nomine reuelatus est.	as he prophesied, even these names of future prophets, so that something fitting their persons might be sung prophetically. In the same way King Josiah was revealed by name to a certain prophet, who also foretold his future deeds, though Josiah was to arise and reign more than three hundred years later.[63]

WHETHER EVERYTHING THE PSALMS PROPHESY ABOUT CHRIST AND THE CHURCH SHOULD BE BROUGHT INTO THE COURSE OF THIS WORK

Augustine explains why he cannot expound every psalm that prophesies Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.15 Nunc iam exspectari a me uideo, ut hoc loco libri huius aperiam quid in psalmis Dauid de Domino Iesu Christo uel eius ecclesia prophetauerit. Ego autem ut hoc non ita faciam, sicut uidetur ipsa exspectatio postulare (quamuis iam in uno fecerim), copia quam inopia magis inpedior; omnia enim ponere uitandae prolixitatis causa prohibeor. Vereor autem ne, cum aliqua elegero, multis, qui ea nouerunt, uidear magis necessaria praeterisse; deinde quia testimonium, quod profertur, de contextione totius psalmi debet habere suffragium aut certe nihil sit, quod ei refragetur, si non omnia suffragantur, ne more centonum ad rem, quam uolumus, tamquam uersiculos decerpere uideamur, uelut de grandi carmine, quod non de re illa, sed de alia longeque diuersa reperiatur esse conscriptum.	Now I can see that at this point in this book I am expected to reveal what David prophesied in the psalms about the Lord Jesus Christ and his Church. If I do not do this in the way that this very expectation seems to demand (though I have already done so in one case), it is abundance rather than scarcity that hinders me. The need to avoid excessive length prevents me from setting everything down. Yet I fear that if I choose some passages, I may seem to many who know them to have passed over more essential ones. Then too, any testimony that is cited ought to have the support of the whole psalm's context, or at least nothing in the psalm should contradict it, even if not everything supports it. Otherwise we might seem, in the manner of patchwork poems, to be plucking out little verses for the point we want, as if from a long poem that turns out to have been written not about that subject but about another, very different one.[64]
Hoc autem ut in quocumque psalmo possit ostendi, exponendus est totus; quod quanti operis sit et aliorum et nostra uolumina, in quibus hoc fecimus, satis indicant. Legat ergo illa, qui uoluerit et potuerit; inueniet quot et quanta rex Dauid idemque propheta de Christo et eius ecclesia prophetauerit, de rege scilicet et ciuitate quam condidit.	But to show this for any psalm, the whole psalm must be expounded. How great a labor that is, the volumes of others, and my own in which I have done it, show well enough. So let anyone who wishes and is able read them. He will find how many and how great were the prophecies that David, who was both king and prophet, made about Christ and his Church—that is, about the king and the city he founded.[65]

63 The unnamed "man of God" from Judah in 1 Kings 13:2 foretold Josiah by name.
64 A cento was a poem stitched together from lines of an earlier poet, often Virgil, to say something new.
65 Augustine refers to his own Expositions of the Psalms, which cover the entire Psalter.

WHAT IN PSALM 44 IS SAID, OPENLY OR FIGURATIVELY, ABOUT CHRIST AND THE CHURCH

Psalm 44 celebrates Christ the anointed king and the Church his bride and queen.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.16	Quamlibet enim de quacumque re propriae sint adque manifestae propheticae locutiones, necesse est ut eis etiam tropicae misceantur; quae maxime propter tardiores ingerunt doctoribus laboriosum disputandi exponendique negotium. Quaedam tamen Christum et ecclesiam ipsa prima facie, mox ut dicuntur, ostendunt; etsi ex otio restant exponenda, quae in eis minus intelleguntur; quale illud est in eodem psalmorum libro: Eructauit cor meum uerbum bonum, dico ego opera mea regi. Lingua mea calamus scribae uelociter scribentis. Speciosus forma prae filiis hominum; diffusa est gratia in labiis tuis, propterea benedixit te Deus in aeternum. Accingere gladio tuo circa femur, potentissime specie tua et pulchritudine tua, et intende et prospere procede et regna propter ueritatem et mansuetudinem et iustitiam, et deducet te mirabiliter dextera tua.	For however literal and plain prophetic statements may be on any subject, figurative ones are inevitably mixed in with them. It is these, chiefly for the sake of slower readers, that impose on teachers the laborious task of discussion and exposition. Some passages, however, point to Christ and the Church at first sight, as soon as they are spoken, even if the parts of them that are less understood remain to be explained at leisure. Such is this passage in the same Book of Psalms: "My heart has poured forth a good word; I speak my works to the king. My tongue is the pen of a scribe who writes swiftly. You are beautiful in form beyond the sons of men; grace is poured out on your lips; therefore God has blessed you forever. Gird your sword upon your thigh, O most mighty one, in your splendor and your beauty; press on, advance prosperously, and reign, for the sake of truth and gentleness and justice, and your right hand will lead you wonderfully.[66]
	Sagittae tuae acutae, potentissimae (populi sub te cadent) in corda inimicorum regis. Sedes tua, Deus, in saecula saeculorum, uirga directionis uirga regni tui Dilexisti iustitiam et odio habuisti iniquitatem; propterea unxit te Deus, Deus tuus oleo exultationis prae participibus tuis. Myrrha et gutta et casia a uestimentis tuis, a domibus eburneis; ex quibus te delectauerunt filiae regum in honore tuo. Quis non hic Christum, quem praedicamus et in quem credimus, quamlibet sit tardus, agnoscat, cum audiat Deum, cuius sedes est in saecula saeculorum, et unctum a Deo, utique sicut unguit Deus, non uisibili, sed spiritali adque intellegibili chrismate?	Your arrows are sharp, most mighty one (the peoples will fall beneath you), in the hearts of the king's enemies. Your throne, O God, is forever and ever; the scepter of your kingdom is a scepter of uprightness. You have loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your companions. Myrrh and balm and cassia waft from your garments, from the ivory houses; with them the daughters of kings have delighted you in your honor." However slow a reader may be, who would not recognize here the Christ whom we preach and in whom we believe? He hears of God, whose throne is forever and ever, and of one anointed by God—anointed, of course, as God anoints, not with a visible chrism but with a spiritual and intelligible one.
	Quis enim tam rudis est in hac religione uel tam surdus aduersus eius famam longe lateque diffusam, ut Christum a chrismate, hoc est ab unctione appellatum esse non nouerit? Agnito autem rege Christo, iam cetera, quae hic tropice dicta sunt, quo modo sit speciosus forma prae filiis hominum, quadam tanto magis amanda adque	For who is so untaught in this religion, or so deaf to its fame spread far and wide, as not to know that Christ is named from chrism, that is, from anointing? Once Christ the king is recognized, let anyone who is now subject to him who reigns for the sake of truth and gentleness and justice in-miranda, quanto minus corporea pulchritudine, quis gladius eius, quae sagittae, et cetera isto modo non proprie, sed tropice posita iam subditus ei, qui regnat propter ueritatem et mansuetudinem et iustitiam, inquirat ei otio.

66 Psalm 44 (45 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

Deinde adspiciat eius ecclesiam tanto uiro suo spiritali conubio et diuino amore coniunctam, de qua dicitur in his quae sequuntur. Adstitit regina a dextris tuis in uestitu deaurato, circumamicta uarietate. Audi, filia, et uide et inclina aurem tuam, et obliuiscere populum tuum et domum patris tui; quoniam concupiuit rex speciem tuam, quia ipse est Deus tuus. Et adorabunt eum filiae Tyri in muneribus; uultum tuum deprecabuntur diuites plebis. Omnis gloria eius filiae regis intrinsecus, in fimbriis aureis circumamicta uarietate. Adferentur regi uirgines post eam, proximae eius adferentur tibi. Adferentur cum laetitia et exultatione; adducentur in templum regis. Pro patribus tuis nati sunt tibi filii; constitues eos principes super omnem terram. Memores erunt nominis tui in omni generatione et generatione.

Propterea populi confitebuntur tibi in aeternum et in saeculum saeculi. Non opinor quemquam ita desipere, ut hic aliquam mulierculam praedicari credat adque describi; coniugem uidelicet illius, cui dictum est: Sedes tua, Deus, in saecula saeculorum; uirga directionis uirga regni tui. Dilexisti iustitiam et odio habuisti iniquitatem; propterea unxit te Deus, Deus tuus oleo exultationis prae participibus tuis; Christum utique prae Christianis. Hi sunt enim participes eius, ex quorum in omnibus gentibus unitate adque concordia fit ista regina, sicut in alio psalmo de illa dicitur: Ciuitas regis magni. Ipsa est Sion spiritaliter; quod nomen Latine interpretatum speculatio est; speculatur enim futuri saeculi magnum bonum, quoniam illuc dirigitur eius intentio. Ipsa est et Hierusalem eodem modo spiritaliter, unde multa iam diximus.

ENGLISH

quire at leisure into the rest of what is said here figuratively. He may ask how Christ is beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, with a beauty all the more to be loved and admired the less bodily it is. He may ask what his sword is, what his arrows are, and the other things set down in this way, not literally but figuratively.

Then let him look upon Christ's Church, joined to so great a husband in spiritual marriage and divine love. Of her it is said in the words that follow: "The queen stands at your right hand in a robe of gold, clothed all around in many colors. Hear, daughter, and see, and incline your ear; and forget your people and your father's house; for the king has desired your beauty, because he is your God. And the daughters of Tyre will worship him with gifts; the rich among the people will entreat your face. All the glory of the king's daughter is within, in golden fringes, clothed all around in many colors. Virgins will be brought to the king after her; her companions will be brought to you. They will be brought with joy and gladness; they will be led into the king's temple. In place of your fathers, sons have been born to you; you will make them princes over all the earth. They will remember your name from generation to generation.

Therefore the peoples will give you praise forever, and forever and ever." I do not suppose anyone is so foolish as to believe that some ordinary woman is being praised and described here. She is the wife, of course, of him to whom it was said: "Your throne, O God, is forever and ever; the scepter of your kingdom is a scepter of uprightness. You have loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your companions"—that is, Christ above Christians. For these are his companions, and from their unity and concord among all the nations this queen is formed. As another psalm says of her: "The city of the great king." In the spiritual sense she is Zion, a name that in Latin means "watching." For she watches for the great good of the age to come, since that is where her attention is directed. In the same spiritual sense she is also Jerusalem, about which we have already said much.[67]

67 Psalm 47:3 (48:2 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

Eius inimica est ciuitas diaboli Babylon, quae confusio interpretatur; ex qua tamen Babylone regina ista in omnibus gentibus regeneratione liberatur et a pessimo rege ad optimum regem, id est a diabolo transit ad Christum. Propter quod ei dicitur: Obliuiscere populum tuum et domum patris tui. Cuius ciuitatis inpiae portio sunt et Israelitae sola carne, non fide; inimici etiam ipsi, magni huius regis eiusque reginae. Ad ipsos enim ueniens et ab eis Christus occisus magis aliorum factus est, quos non uidit in carne. Unde per cuiusdam psalmi prophetiam dicit ipse rex noster: Erues me de contradictionibus populi, constitues me in capite gentium. Populus, quem non cognoui, seruiuit mihi; in obauditu auris obaudiuit mihi.

ENGLISH

Her enemy is the devil's city, Babylon, a name that means "confusion." Yet out of that Babylon this queen, among all the nations, is set free by regeneration and passes from the worst of kings to the best of kings, that is, from the devil to Christ. That is why she is told: "Forget your people and your father's house." Those who are Israelites by flesh alone, and not by faith, are also part of that wicked city. They too are enemies of this great king and of his queen. For Christ came to them and was killed by them, and so became instead the possession of others, whom he did not see in the flesh. Hence our king himself says, through the prophecy of a certain psalm: "You will rescue me from the contradictions of the people; you will make me head of the nations. A people I did not know has served me; at the hearing of the ear it has obeyed me."[68]

Populus ergo iste gentium, quem non cognouit Christus praesentia corporali, in quem tamen Christum sibi adnuntiatum credidit, ut merito de illo diceretur: In obauditu auris obaudiuit mihi, quia fides ex auditu est — iste, inquam, populus additus ueris et carne et fide Israelitis ciuitas est Dei, quae ipsum quoque secundum carnem peperit Christum, quando in solis illis Israelitis fuit. Inde quippe erat uirgo Maria, in qua carnem Christus, ut homo esset, adsumsit. De qua ciuitate psalmus alius ait: Mater Sion, dicet homo, et homo factus est in ea, et ipse fundauit eam Altissimus. Quis est iste Altissimus nisi Deus? Ac per hoc Christus Deus, antequam in illa ciuitate per Mariam fieret homo, ipse in patriarchis et prophetis fundauit eam.

This people of the nations, then, did not know Christ by his bodily presence. Yet it believed in Christ when he was proclaimed to it, so that it could rightly be said of it, "At the hearing of the ear it has obeyed me," since "faith comes from hearing." This people, I say, joined to those who are true Israelites both in flesh and in faith, is the city of God. It is this city that also gave birth to Christ himself according to the flesh, when it existed only in those Israelites. For from them came the virgin Mary, in whom Christ took on flesh in order to be a man. Of this city another psalm says: "'Mother Zion,' a man will say, and a man was made in her, and the Most High himself founded her." Who is this Most High but God? And so Christ, who is God, himself founded that city in the patriarchs and prophets before he became man in it through Mary.[69]

Cum igitur huic reginae ciuitati Dei tanto ante dictum sit per prophetiam, quod iam uidemus inpletum: Pro patribus tuis nati sunt tibi filii, constitues eos principes super omnem terram (ex filiis quippe eius per omnem terram sunt praepositi et patres eius, cum confiteantur ei populi concurrentes ad eam confessionem laudis aeternae in saeculum saeculi): procul dubio quidquid hic tropicis locutionibus subobscure dictum est, quoquo modo intellegatur, debet his rebus manifestissimis conuenire.

So this queen, the city of God, was told by prophecy, so long beforehand, what we now see fulfilled: "In place of your fathers, sons have been born to you; you will make them princes over all the earth." (For it is from among her sons that her leaders and fathers come, throughout the whole earth, as the peoples give her praise, flocking together to that acknowledgment of eternal praise forever and ever.) Since this is so, there can be no doubt that whatever is said here somewhat ob-

68 Psalm 17:44–45 (18:43–44 in most English Bibles).
69 Romans 10:17; Psalm 86:5 (87:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	scurely in figurative expressions, however it is understood, must agree with these most evident facts.

WHAT IN PSALM 109 RELATES TO CHRIST'S PRIESTHOOD, AND WHAT IN PSALM 21 TO HIS PASSION

Psalm 109 shows Christ the eternal priest; Psalm 21 foretells the crucifixion in detail.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.17 Sicut etiam in illo psalmo, ubi sacerdos Christus, quem ad modum hic rex, apertissime praedicatur: Dixit Dominus Domino meo: Sede a dextris meis, donec ponam inimicos tuos scabellum pedum tuorum. Sedere Christus ad dexteram Patris creditur, non uidetur; eius etiam inimicos poni sub pedibus eius nondum apparet; id agitur, apparebit in fine; etiam hoc nunc creditur, post uidebitur. Verum quod sequitur: Virgam uirtutis tuae emittet Dominus ex Sion, et dominare in medio inimicorum tuorum, ita clarum est, ut non solum infideliter et infeliciter, sed etiam inpudenter negetur. Et ipsi quippe fatentur inimici ex Sion missam fuisse legem Christi, quod euangelium nos uocamus, et eam uirgam uirtutis eius agnoscimus.	The same holds for that psalm in which Christ is proclaimed most openly as priest, just as he is proclaimed here as king: "The Lord said to my Lord: Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies the footstool of your feet." That Christ sits at the Father's right hand is believed, not seen. That his enemies are being put under his feet is also not yet evident. This is under way, and it will become evident at the end. This too is now believed; later it will be seen. But what follows—"The Lord will send forth the rod of your power from Zion; rule in the midst of your enemies"—is so clear that to deny it would be not only faithless and luckless, but shameless as well. For even his enemies admit that the law of Christ, which we call the gospel, was sent out from Zion, and we recognize it as the rod of his power.
Dominari uero eum in medio inimicorum suorum idem ipsi, inter quos dominatur, dentibus frendendo et tabescendo et nihil aduersus eum ualendo testantur. Deinde quod paulo post dicit: Iurauit Dominus, ot non paenitebit eum, quibus uerbis inmutabile futurum esse significat, quod adiungit: Tu es sacerdos in aeternum secundum ordinem Melchisedech, ex eo quod iam nusquam est sacerdotium et sacrificium secundum ordinem Aaron et ubique offertur sub sacerdote Christo, quod protulit Melchisedech, quando benedixit Abraham, quis ambigere permittitur, de quo ista dicantur? Ad haec itaque manifesta referuntur, quae paulo obscurius in eodem psalmo posita sunt, quando recte intelleguntur; quod in nostris iam popularibus sermonibus fecimus.	And that he rules in the midst of his enemies, those very enemies among whom he rules bear witness by gnashing their teeth, by wasting away, and by being powerless against him. Then there is what the psalm says a little later: "The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent." By these words it indicates that what it adds will be unchangeable: "You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek." The priesthood and sacrifice according to the order of Aaron now exist nowhere. Meanwhile, everywhere under Christ as priest there is offered what Melchizedek brought out when he blessed Abraham. Who, then, can be allowed to doubt of whom these things are said? So the things set down somewhat more obscurely in the same psalm, when rightly understood, are to be referred to these evident ones. I have already done this in my sermons to the people.[70]
Sic et in illo, ubi humilitatem passionis suae per prophetiam Christus eloquitur dicens: Foderunt manus meas et pedes, dinumerauerunt omnia ossa mea; ipsi uero considerauerunt et conspexerunt me (quibus utique	So too in that psalm in which Christ, through prophecy, speaks of the humiliation of his passion, saying: "They pierced my hands and feet; they counted all my bones; and they looked and 70 What Melchizedek brought out was bread and wine (Genesis 14:18).

LATIN	ENGLISH
uerbis in cruce corpus significauit extentum manibus pedibusque confixis et clauorum transuerberatione confossis, eoque modo se spectaculum considerantibus et conspicientibus praebuisse), addens etiam: Diuiserunt sibi uestimenta mea et super uestimentum meum miserunt sortem, quae prophetia quem ad modum inpleta sit euangelica narratur historia, tunc profecto et alia recte intelleguntur, quae ibi minus aperte dicta sunt, cum congruunt his, quae tanta manifestatione claruerunt: praesertim quia et illa, quae non transacta credimus, sed praesentia contuemur, sicut in eodem psalmo leguntur tanto ante praedicta, ita nunc exhibita iam toto orbe cernuntur.	stared at me." By these words he signified his body stretched out on the cross, his hands and feet fastened and pierced through by the driving of the nails. He also signified that in this way he made himself a spectacle for those who looked and stared. He adds as well: "They divided my garments among them, and for my clothing they cast lots." How this prophecy was fulfilled is told in the Gospel narrative. Surely, then, the other things said less openly in that psalm are rightly understood when they agree with these, which have shone forth so plainly. This is especially so because there are things we do not believe as past but behold as present. Just as we read them foretold so long before in the same psalm, so we now see them displayed throughout the whole world.[71]
Ibi enim paulo post dicitur: Commemorabuntur et conuertentur ad Dominum uniuersi fines terrae et adorabunt in conspectu eius uniuersae patriae gentium; quoniam Domini est regnum, et ipse dominabitur gentium.	For a little later it says there: "All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the homelands of the nations will worship in his sight; for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he will rule over the nations."

PSALMS 3, 40, 15, AND 67, IN WHICH THE LORD'S DEATH AND RESURRECTION ARE PROPHESIED

Psalms 3, 40, 15 and 67 foretell Christ's betrayal, death and resurrection.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.18 De resurrectione quoque eius nequaquam psalmorum oracula tacuerunt. Nam quid est aliud quod in psalmo tertio ex persona eius canitur: Ego dormiui et somnum cepi; exsurrexi, quoniam Dominus suscepit me? An forte quisquam ita desipit, ut credat uelut aliquid magnum nobis indicare uoluisse prophetam, quod dormierit et exsurrexerit, nisi somnus iste mors esset et euigilatio resurrectio, quam de Christo sic oportuit prophetari? Nam et in quadragensimo multo manifestius id ostenditur, ubi ex persona eiusdem Mediatoris more solito tamquam praeterita narrantur, quae futura prophetabantur; quoniam, quae uentura erant, iam in praedestinatione et praescientia Dei uelut facta erant. Inimici, inquit, mei dixerunt mala mihi: Quando morietur et peribit nomen eius? Et si ingrediebatur ut uideret, uana locutum est cor eius, congregauit iniquitatem ipsi.	Nor were the oracles of the psalms silent about his resurrection. For what else is meant by what is sung in his person in the third psalm: "I slept and took my rest; I rose up, for the Lord upheld me"? Is anyone so foolish as to believe that the prophet wanted to tell us something great by saying that he slept and got up? That would only be so if that sleep was death and that awakening the resurrection, which it was fitting to prophesy of Christ in this way. And in the fortieth psalm this is shown much more plainly. There, in the person of the same Mediator, things that were being prophesied as future are told, in the usual way, as if they were past. For what was to come had, in God's predestination and foreknowledge, already been done, as it were. "My enemies," it says, "spoke evil against me: 'When will he die, and his name perish?' And if one came in to see me, his heart spoke empty words; it heaped up iniquity for itself."[72]
Egrediebatur foras et loquebantur simul in unum. Aduersus me susurrabant omnes inimici mei, aduersus	"He went outside, and they spoke together as one. All my enemies whispered against me; against me

71 Psalm 21 (22 in most English Bibles); the casting of lots is told in John 19:23–24.

LATIN

me cogitabant mala mihi. Verbum iniquum disposuerunt aduersus me: Numquid qui dormit non adiciet ut resurgat? Hic certe ita posita sunt uerba haec, ut nihil aliud dixisse intellegatur, quam si diceret: Numquid qui moritur, non adiciet ut reuiuescat? Superiora quippe demonstrant mortem ipsius cogitasse et disposuisse inimicos eius, et hoc actum esse per eum, qui ingrediebatur ut uideret, et egrediebatur ut proderet. Cui autem hic non ocurrat ex discipulo eius factus traditor ludas? Quia ergo facturi erant quod moliebantur, id est occisuri erant eum, ostendens illos uana malitia frustra occisuros resurrecturum, sic adiecit hunc uersum, uelut diceret: Quid agitis uani?

quod uestrum scelus erit, meus somnus erit: Numquid qui dormit non adiciet ut resurgat? Et tamen eos tam magnum nefas non inpune facturos consequentibus indicat uersibus dicens: Etenim homo pacis meae, in quem speraui, qui edebat panes meos, ampliauit super me calcaneum, hoc est conculcauit me. Tu autem, inquit, Domine, miserere mei et resuscita me, et reddam illis. Quis hoc iam neget, qui Iudaeos post passionem resurrectionemque Christi de sedibus suis bellica strage et excidio funditus eradicatos uidet? Occisus enim ab eis resurrexit et reddidit eis interim temporariam disciplinam, excepto quod non correctis seruat, quando uiuos et mortuos iudicabit.

Nam Dominus ipse Iesus istum ipsum traditorem suum per panem porrectum ostendens apostolis hunc etiam uersum psalmi huius commemorauit et in se dixit inpletum: Qui edebat panes meos, ampliauit super me calcaneum. Quod autem ait: In quem speraui, non congruit capiti, sed corpori. Neque enim nesciebat eum ipse Saluator, de quo ante iam dixerat: Unus ex uobis diabolus est. Sed solet in se membrorum suorum transferre personam et sibi tribuere quod esset illorum, quia caput et corpus unus est Christus; unde illud est in euangelio: Esuriui, et dedistis mihi manducare, quod exponens ait: Quando uni ex minimis meis fecistis, mihi fecistis. Se itaque dixit sperasse, quod tunc sperauerant they plotted evil for me. They devised a wicked word against me: 'Will he who sleeps not rise again?'" Here these words are certainly so placed that they can only be understood to mean what he would have meant had he said, "Will he who dies not come to life again?" For the preceding verses show that his enemies plotted and arranged his death, and that this was done through the one who came in to see and went out to betray. And to whom does Judas not come to mind here, who turned from being his disciple into his betrayer? They were going to do what they were plotting, that is, they were going to kill him. So, to show that in their empty malice they would kill in vain one who would rise again, he added this verse, as if to say: "What are you doing, you vain men?

ENGLISH

What will be your crime will be my sleep: 'Will he who sleeps not rise again?'" And yet in the verses that follow he indicates that they would not commit so great an outrage unpunished. He says: "For even the man of my peace, in whom I hoped, who ate my bread, has raised his heel high against me"—that is, has trampled on me. "But you, Lord," he says, "have mercy on me and raise me up, and I will repay them." Who would now deny this, when he sees that after Christ's passion and resurrection the Jews were uprooted from their homes by the slaughter and destruction of war? For, killed by them, he rose again and has meanwhile repaid them with a temporal chastisement. This is apart from what he holds in store for those who are not set right, when he will judge the living and the dead.[73]

Indeed the Lord Jesus himself, when he pointed out this very betrayer to the apostles by the bread he handed him, also quoted this verse of this psalm and said it was fulfilled in him: "He who ate my bread has raised his heel against me." But the words "in whom I hoped" do not fit the head, but the body. For the Savior himself was not ignorant of the man of whom he had already said, "One of you is a devil." But he often takes on himself the person of his members and attributes to himself what belongs to them, because head and body are one Christ. Hence the saying in the Gospel, "I was hungry, and you gave me something to eat," which 72 Psalm 3:6 (3:5 in most English Bibles); Psalm 40 (41 in most English Bibles).

73 Augustine has in mind the Roman suppression of the Jewish revolts, including the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70.

LATIN

de Iuda discipuli eius, quando est connumeratus apostolis.

ENGLISH

he explains by saying, "When you did it to one of the least of mine, you did it to me." So he said that he had hoped what his disciples had hoped about Judas when he was counted among the apostles.[74]

Iudaei autem Christum, quem sperant, moriturum esse non sperant. Ideo quem lex et prophetae adnuntiauerunt, nostrum esse non putant, sed nescio quem suum, quem sibi alienum a mortis passione confingunt. Ideo mirabili uanitate adque caecitate uerba, quae posuimus, non mortem et resurrectionem, sed somnum et euigilationem significasse contendunt. Sed clamat eis etiam psalmus quintus decimus: Propter hoc iucundatum est cor meum et exultauit lingua mea, insuper et caro mea requiescet in spe; quoniam non derelinques animam meam in inferno, nec dabis sanctum tuum uidere corruptionem. Quis in ea spe diceret requieuisse carnem suam, ut non derelicta anima sua in inferno, sed cito ad eam redeunte reuiuesceret, ne corrumperetur, sicut cadauera corrumpi solent, nisi qui die tertio resurrexit?

The Jews, however, do not expect that the Christ they are expecting will die. That is why they do not think that the one whom the Law and the Prophets announced is ours. They think he is some figure of their own, whom they imagine as exempt from suffering death. That is why, with astonishing emptiness and blindness, they maintain that the words I have cited signified not death and resurrection, but sleep and waking. But the fifteenth psalm, too, cries out to them: "Therefore my heart was glad and my tongue rejoiced; moreover my flesh too will rest in hope; for you will not abandon my soul in the underworld, nor let your holy one see corruption." Who could say that his flesh had rested in this hope? The hope was that his soul would not be abandoned in the underworld but would quickly return to his flesh, so that his flesh would come back to life and not decay, as corpses usually decay. Who could say this, except the one who rose on the third day?[75]

Quod utique dicere non possunt de propheta et rege Dauid. Clamat et sexagensimus septimus: Deus noster Deus saluos faciendi, et Domini exitus mortis. Quid apertius diceretur? Deus enim saluos faciendi Dominus est Iesus, quod interpretatur saluator siue salutaris. Nam ratio nominis huius haec reddita est, quando priusquam ex uirgine nasceretur dictum est: Pariet filium, et uocabis nomen eius Iesum. Ipse enim saluum faciet populum suum a peccatis eorum. In quorum peccatorum remissionem quoniam sanguis eius effusus est, non utique oportuit eum de hac uita exitus alios habere quam mortis. Ideo cum dictum esset: Deus noster Deus saluos faciendi, continuo subiunctum est: Et Domini exitus mortis, ut ostenderetur moriendo saluos esse facturus.

And this they certainly cannot say of David, prophet and king. The sixty-seventh psalm cries out too: "Our God is the God of saving, and the Lord's ways out are those of death." What could be said more plainly? For the God of saving is the Lord Jesus, a name that means "savior" or "saving." The reason for this name was given when it was said, before he was born of the virgin: "She will bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus; for he will save his people from their sins." Since his blood was shed for the forgiveness of those sins, it was surely not fitting for him to have any other ways out of this life than those of death. That is why, after it had been said, "Our God is the God of saving," there was added at once, "and the Lord's ways out are those of death." This was to show that he would save by dying.[76]

Sed mirando dictum est: Et Domini; tamquam diceretur: Talis est ista uita mortalium, ut nec ipse Dominus aliter ab illa exiret, nisi per mortem.

But "and the Lord's" is said in a tone of wonder, as if it were said: "Such is this life of mortals that not even the Lord himself would leave it except by death."

74 John 13:18, 26; John 6:70; Matthew 25:35, 40.
75 Psalm 15:9–10 (16:9–10 in most English Bibles).
76 Psalm 67:21 (68:20 in most English Bibles); Matthew 1:21.

PSALM 68, IN WHICH THE UNBELIEF AND OBSTINACY OF THE JEWS ARE DECLARED

Psalm 68 foretells the Jews' blindness to the plain fulfillment of prophecy.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.19	Sed ut Iudaei tam manifestis huius prophetiae testimoniis etiam rebus ad effectum tam clarum certumque perductis omnino non cedant, profecto in eis illud inpletur, quod in eo psalmo, qui hunc sequitur, scriptum est. Cum enim et illic ex persona Christi, quae ad eius passionem pertinent, prophetice dicerentur, commemoratum est, quod in euangelio patuit: Dederunt in escam meam fel et in siti mea potum mihi dederunt acetum. Et uelut post tale conuiuium epulasque sibi huiusce modi exhibitas mox intulit: Fiat mensa eorum coram ipsis in muscipulam et in retributionem et in scandalum; obscurentur oculi eorum ne uideant, et dorsum eorum semper incurua, et cetera, quae non optando sunt dicta, sed optandi specie prophetando praedicta.	But the fact that the Jews refuse to yield at all to such plain testimonies of this prophecy, even when events have brought it to so clear and certain a fulfillment, surely means that in them is fulfilled what is written in the psalm that follows this one. For there too, when things belonging to his passion were being spoken prophetically in the person of Christ, mention was made of what became plain in the gospel: "They gave me gall for my food, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." And, as if after such a banquet, and such a feast set before him, he went on at once: "Let their table become a snare before them, and a retribution, and a stumbling block; let their eyes be darkened so that they cannot see, and bend their back always," and the rest. These words were not spoken as a wish. They were foretold by prophecy in the form of a wish.[77]
	Quid ergo mirum, si haec manifesta non uident, quorum oculi sunt obscurati, ne uideant? Quid mirum, si caelestia non suspiciunt, qui ut in terrena sint proni, dorsum eorum semper incuruum est? His enim uerbis translatis a corpore uitia significantur animorum. Ista de psalmis, hoc est de prophetia regis Dauid, satis dicta sint, ut aliquis modus sit. Ignoscant autem qui haec legunt et cuncta illa nouerunt, et de his, quae fortasse firmiora me praetermisisse uel intellegunt uel existimant, non querantur.	Why then is it any wonder if they do not see these plain things, when their eyes have been darkened so that they cannot see? Why any wonder if they do not look up to heavenly things, when their back is always bent, so that they stoop toward earthly ones? For in these words, transferred from the body, the vices of the mind are signified. Let this be enough said about the psalms, that is, about the prophecy of King David, so that there may be some limit. Those who read this and already know all those passages must forgive me. And they must not complain about passages, perhaps stronger ones, that they know or suppose I have left out.

THE REIGN AND MERIT OF DAVID, HIS SON SOLOMON, AND THE PROPHECY RELATING TO CHRIST FOUND EITHER IN THE BOOKS JOINED TO SOLOMON'S WRITINGS OR IN THOSE THAT ARE UNDOUBTEDLY HIS

David repents and reigns; Solomon's books and those attributed to him foretell Christ.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.20	Regnauit ergo Dauid in terrena Hierusalem, filius caelestis Hierusalem, diuino multum testimonio praedicatus, quia et delicta eius tanta pietate superata sunt per saluberrimam paenitendi humilitatem, ut prorsus inter eos sit, de quibus ipse ait: Beati quorum	So David reigned in the earthly Jerusalem, a son of the heavenly Jerusalem, greatly praised by divine testimony. For even his sins were overcome by such great devotion, through the most wholesome humility of repentance, that he is certainly among

77 Psalm 68:22–24 (69:21–23 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

remissae sunt iniquitates et quorum tecta sunt peccata. Post hunc regnauit eidem populo uniuerso Salomon filius eius, qui, ut supra dictum est, patre suo uiuente coepit regnare. Hic bonis initiis malos exitus habuit. Quippe secundae res, quae sapientium animos fatigant, magis huic obfuerunt, quam profuit ipsa sapientia, etiam nunc et deinceps memorabilis, et tunc longe lateque laudata. Prophetasse etiam ipse reperitur in suis libris, qui tres recepti sunt in auctoritatem canonicam: Prouerbia, ecclesiastes et canticum canticorum.

Alii uero duo, quorum unus sapientia, alter ecclesiasticus dicitur, propter eloquii nonnullam similitudinem, ut Salomonis dicantur, obtinuit consuetudo; non autem esse ipsius non dubitant doctiores; eos tamen in auctoritatem maxime occidentalis antiquitus recepit ecclesia. Quorum in uno, qui appellatur sapientia Salomonis, passio Christi apertissime prophetatur. Inpii quippe interfectores eius commemorantur dicentes: Circumueniamus iustum, quoniam insuauis est nobis et contrarius est operibus nostris et inproperat nobis peccata legis et infamatis in nos peccata disciplinae nostrae. Promittit scientiam Dei se habere et filium Dei se nominat. Factus est nobis in traductionem cogitationum nostrarum. Grauis est nobis etiam ad uidendum, quoniam dissimilis est aliis uita illius et inmutatae uiae eius.

Tamquam nugaces aestimati sumus ab illo, et abstinet se a uiis nostris quasi ab inmunditiis; praefert nouissima iustorum et gloriatur patrem Deum se habere. Videamus ergo si sermones illius ueri sunt, et tentemus quae uentura sunt illi, et sciemus quae erunt nouissima illius. Si enim est iustus filius Dei, suscipiet illum et liberabit eum de manu contrariorum. Contumelia et tormento interrogemus illum, ut sciamus reuerentiam illius et probemus patientiam ipsius. Morte turpissima condemnemus illum; erit enim ei respectus ex sermonibus illius. Haec cogitauerunt et errauerunt; excaecauit enim illos malitia ipsorum. In ecclesiastico autem fides gentium futura praedicitur isto modo: Miserere nostri, dominator Deus omnium, et inmitte those of whom he himself says: "Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven and whose sins are covered." After him his son Solomon reigned over the same whole people. As was said above, he began to reign while his father was still alive. He made good beginnings but came to a bad end. For prosperity, which wears down the minds of the wise, did him more harm than his very wisdom did him good—a wisdom memorable even now and for ages to come, and praised far and wide in his own time. He too is found to have prophesied in his books, three of which have been received into canonical authority: Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs.[78]

ENGLISH

The other two books, one called Wisdom and the other Ecclesiasticus, have come by custom to be called Solomon's because of a certain resemblance of style. But the more learned have no doubt that they are not his. Yet the Church, especially in the West, received them into authority from ancient times. In one of them, which is called the Wisdom of Solomon, the passion of Christ is prophesied most openly. For his wicked killers are recorded as saying: "Let us lie in wait for the righteous man, because he is disagreeable to us and opposed to our deeds. He reproaches us with sins against the law, and spreads abroad against us the sins of our upbringing. He professes to have knowledge of God and calls himself a son of God. He has become a reproof of our thoughts. He is a burden to us even to look at, for his life is unlike that of others, and his ways are different.[79]

"We are regarded by him as frivolous, and he keeps away from our ways as from filth. He extols the final end of the righteous and boasts that he has God for his father. Let us see, then, whether his words are true, and let us test what will happen to him, and we shall know what his end will be. For if the righteous man is God's son, God will take him up and deliver him from the hand of his adversaries. Let us examine him with insult and torture, so that we may learn his reverence and prove his patience. Let us condemn him to a most shameful death, for, by his own words, he will be watched over." They thought these things and went astray, for their own malice blinded them. In

78 Psalm 31:1 (32:1 in most English Bibles).
79 Wisdom 2:12–21. Ecclesiasticus is also known as Sirach or the Wisdom of Ben Sira.

LATIN	ENGLISH
timorem tuum super omnes gentes; extolle manum tuam super gentes alienas et uideant potentiam tuam.	Ecclesiasticus, the faith of the nations that was to come is foretold in this way: "Have mercy on us, Lord God of all, and send your fear upon all the nations. Lift up your hand against the foreign nations, and let them see your power.[80]
Sicut coram illis sanctificatus es in nobis, ita coram nobis magnificeris in illis, et agnoscant te secundum quod et nos agnouimus te, quia non est Deus praeter te, Domine. Hanc optandi et precandi specie prophetiam per Iesum Christum uidemus inpletam. Sed aduersus contradictores non tanta firmitate proferuntur, quae scripta non sunt in canone Iudaeorum.	"As you have been sanctified in us before their eyes, so may you be magnified in them before our eyes. And let them acknowledge you, as we too have acknowledged you, that there is no God besides you, Lord." This prophecy, in the form of a wish and a prayer, we see fulfilled through Jesus Christ. But writings that are not in the canon of the Jews do not carry such weight when they are brought forward against those who contradict us.
In tribus uero illis, quos Salomonis esse constat et Iudaei canonicos habent, ut ostendatur ad Christum et ecclesiam pertinere quod in eis eius modi reperitur, operosa disputatio necessaria est, quae nos ultra quam oportet, si nunc adhibetur, extendit. Tamen quod in prouerbiis legitur, uiros inpios dicere: Abscondamus in terra uirum iustum iniuste, absorbeamus uero eum tamquam infernus uiuentem et auferamus eius memoriam de terra, possessionem eius pretiosam adprehendamus, non ita obscurum est, ut de Christo et possessione eius ecclesia sine laboriosa expositione non possit intellegi. Tale quippe aliquid etiam Dominus ipse Iesus per euangelicam parabolam ostendit dixisse malos colonos: Hic est heres, uenite, occidamus eum, et nostra erit hereditas.	In those three books, however, which are agreed to be Solomon's and which the Jews hold as canonical, a laborious discussion is needed to show that what is found in them of this kind belongs to Christ and the Church. If that discussion were undertaken now, it would carry us further than is fitting. Still, there is what we read in Proverbs, that wicked men say: "Let us hide the righteous man in the earth unjustly; let us swallow him alive like the underworld, and take away his memory from the earth; let us seize his precious possession." This is not so obscure that it cannot be understood, without laborious exposition, of Christ and of his possession, the Church. For the Lord Jesus himself, too, through a parable in the gospel, showed that the wicked tenants said something like this: "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours."[81]
Itemque illud in eodem libro, quod iam ante perstrinximus, cum ageremus de sterili, quae peperit septem, non nisi de Christo et ecclesia, mox ut fuerit, pronuntiatum consueuit intellegi ab eis, qui Christum sapientiam Dei esse nouerunt: Sapientia aedificauit sibi domum et subfulsit columnas septem; immolauit suas uictimas, miscuit in cratere uinum suum et parauit mensam suam. Misit seruos suos conuocans cum excellenti praedicatione ad craterem dicens: Quis est insipiens? Diuertat ad me. Et inopibus sensu dixit: Venite, manducate de meis panibus et bibite uinum quod miscui uobis.	Likewise there is the passage in the same book which we touched on earlier, when we were dealing with the barren woman who bore seven. As soon as it has been read out, it is customarily understood only of Christ and the Church by those who know that Christ is the Wisdom of God: "Wisdom has built herself a house and has set up seven pillars. She has slaughtered her victims, mixed her wine in the bowl, and prepared her table. She has sent out her servants, calling with a loud proclamation to the bowl, saying: 'Who is foolish? Let him turn aside to me.' And to those lacking sense she said: 'Come, eat of my bread and drink the wine that I have mixed for you.'"[82]

80 Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 36:1–5.
81 Proverbs 1:11–13, in Augustine's Latin text; Matthew 21:38.

LATIN

Hic certe agnoscimus Dei sapientiam, hoc est Verbum Patri coaeternum, in utero uirginali domum sibi aedificasse corpus humanum et huic, tamquam capiti membra, ecclesiam subiunxisse, martyrum uictimas immolasse, mensam in uino et panibus praeparasse, ubi apparet etiam sacerdotium secundum ordinem Melchisedech, insipientes et inopes sensu uocasse, quia, sicut dicit apostolus, infirma huius mundi elegit, ut confunderet fortia. Quibus tamen infirmis quod sequitur dicit: Derelinquite insipientiam, ut uiuatis, et quaerite prudentiam, ut habeatis uitam. Participem autem fieri mensae illius, ipsum est incipere habere uitam.

Nam et in alio libro, qui uocatur ecclesiastes, ubi ait: Non est bonum homini, nisi quod manducabit et bibet, quid credibilius dicere intellegitur, quam quod ad participationem mensae huius pertinet, quam sacerdos ipse Mediator testamenti noui exhibet secundum ordinem Melchisedech de corpore et sanguine suo? Id enim sacrificium successit omnibus illis sacrificiis ueteris testamenti, quae immolabantur in umbra futuri; propter quod etiam uocem illam in psalmo tricensimo et nono eiusdem Mediatoris per prophetiam loquentis agnoscimus: Sacrificium et oblationem noluisti, corpus autem perfecisti mihi; quia pro illis omnibus sacrificiis et oblationibus corpus eius offertur et participantibus ministratur.

Nam istum ecclesiasten in hac sententia manducandi et bibendi, quam saepe repetit plurimumque commendat, non sapere carnalis epulas uoluptatis, satis illud ostendit, ubi ait: Melius est ire in domum luctus quam ire in domum potus; et paulo post: Cor, inquit, sapientium in domo luctus et cor insipientium in domo epularum. Sed illud magis commemorandum existimo de hoc libro, quod pertinet ad ciuitates duas, unam diaboli, alteram Christi, et earum reges diabolum et Christum: Vae tibi, terra, inquit, cuius rex adulescens, et principes tui mane comedunt. Beata tu, terra, cuius rex tuus filius ingenuorum, et principes tui in tempore comedunt, in fortitudine, et non in confusione.

ENGLISH

Here we certainly recognize that the Wisdom of God, that is, the Word coeternal with the Father, built himself a house, a human body, in the virgin's womb. He joined the Church to it, as members to a head. He slaughtered the victims of the martyrs. He prepared a table with wine and bread —and here the priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek also appears. He called the foolish and those lacking sense, because, as the apostle says, he chose the weak things of this world to put to shame the strong. Yet to these weak ones he says what follows: "Leave foolishness behind, that you may live, and seek prudence, that you may have life." And to become a partaker of that table is itself to begin to have life.[83]

So too in the other book, called Ecclesiastes, he says: "There is nothing good for a man except what he will eat and drink." What can he more credibly be understood to mean than what pertains to sharing in this table? This is the table which the priest himself, the Mediator of the new covenant, provides according to the order of Melchizedek from his own body and blood. For that sacrifice succeeded all those sacrifices of the old covenant which were offered as a shadow of what was to come. That is why we also recognize the voice of the same Mediator, speaking through prophecy, in the thirty-ninth psalm: "Sacrifice and offering you did not want, but a body you have prepared for me." For in place of all those sacrifices and offerings his body is offered and served to those who partake.[84]

This Ecclesiastes often repeats this saying about eating and drinking and strongly commends it. But he does not have in mind the feasts of carnal pleasure, as he shows clearly enough where he says: "It is better to go into the house of mourning than to go into the house of drinking"; and a little later: "The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, and the heart of the foolish in the house of feasting." But I think it more worth mentioning the passage from this book that pertains to the two cities, one the devil's and the other Christ's, and to their kings, the devil and Christ: "Woe to you, O land," he says, "whose king is a 82 Proverbs 9:1–5. The barren woman who bore seven comes from Hannah's song (1 Samuel 2:5), discussed in 17.4.

83 The apostle is Paul (1 Corinthians 1:27); the quotation is Proverbs 9:6.
84 Ecclesiastes 8:15; Psalm 39:7 (40:6 in most English Bibles), in the Greek-based form also quoted in Hebrews 10:5.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		youth, and whose princes eat in the morning. Happy are you, O land, whose king is the son of the freeborn, and whose princes eat at the proper time, in strength and not in confusion."[85]
	Adulescentem dixit diabolum propter stultitiam et superbiam et temeritatem et petulantiam ceteraque uitia, quae huic aetati adsolent abundare; Christum autem filium ingenuorum, sanctorum scilicet patriarcharum, pertinentium ad liberam ciuitatem, ex quibus est in carne progenitus. Principes illius ciuitatis mane manducantes, id est ante horam congruam, quia non exspectant opportunam, quae uera est, in futuro saeculo felicitatem, festinanter beari huius saeculi celebritate cupientes; principes autem ciuitatis Christi tempus non fallacis beatitudinis patienter exspectant. Hoc ait: In fortitudine, et non in confusione, quia non eos fallit spes, de qua dicit apostolus: Spes autem non confundit; dicit et psalmus: Etenim qui te exspectant, non confundentur. Iam uero canticum canticorum spiritalis quaedam sanctarum est uoluptas mentium in coniugio illius regis et reginae ciuitatis, quod est Christus et ecclesia.	He called the devil a youth because of the folly, pride, rashness, insolence, and other vices that usually abound at that age. But he called Christ the son of the freeborn, namely of the holy patriarchs, who belong to the free city and from whom he was born in the flesh. The princes of that other city eat in the morning, that is, before the proper hour, because they do not wait for the happiness that comes in its due time, the true happiness, in the world to come. In their haste they desire to be made happy by the celebrations of this world. But the princes of Christ's city patiently wait for the time of a happiness that does not deceive. This is what he means by "in strength and not in confusion," because they are not deceived by the hope of which the apostle says: "And hope does not confound"; and the psalm too says: "For those who wait for you shall not be confounded." Now the Song of Songs is a kind of spiritual delight of holy minds in the marriage of that king and queen of the city—that is, Christ and the Church.[86]
	Sed haec uoluptas allegoricis tegminibus inuoluta est, ut desideretur ardentius nudeturque iucundius, et appareat sponsus, cui dicitur in eodem cantico: Aequitas dilexit te, et sponsa, quae ibi audit: Caritas in deliciis tuis. Tacita multa transimus cura huius operis terminandi.	But this delight is wrapped in allegorical coverings, so that it may be longed for more ardently and uncovered more joyfully. And so the bridegroom appears, to whom it is said in the same Song: "Uprightness has loved you," and the bride, who hears there: "Love is in your delights." We pass over many things in silence out of concern to finish this work.[87]

THE KINGS AFTER SOLOMON, IN JUDAH AND IN ISRAEL

After Solomon the kingdom splits into Judah and Israel, by God's will.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.21	Ceteri post Salomonem reges Hebraeorum uix inueniuntur per aliqua aenigmata dictorum suorum rerumue gestarum, quod ad Christum et ecclesiam pertineat, prophetasse, siue in Iuda siue in Israel. Sic enim appellatae sunt illius populi partes, ex quo propter Salomonis offensam tempore filii eius Roboam, qui patri successit in regnum, Deo uindicante diuisus est. Proinde	The other kings of the Hebrews after Solomon, whether in Judah or in Israel, are scarcely found to have prophesied anything pertaining to Christ and the Church through any riddles in their sayings or deeds. For these were the names given to the parts of that people from the time when it was divided by God's punishment for Solomon's offense. This 85 Ecclesiastes 7:2–4 and 10:16–17.

86 Romans 5:5; Psalm 24:3 (25:3 in most English Bibles).
87 Song of Songs 1:4 and 7:6, in Augustine's Latin text.

LATIN

tribus decem, quas accepit Hieroboam, seruus Salomonis, rex eis in Samaria constitutus, proprie uocabantur Israel, quamuis hoc uniuersi illius populi nomen esset. Duabus uero tribubus, Iudae scilicet et Beniamin, quae propter Dauid ne penitus regnum stirpis eius fuisset eradicatum, remanserant subiacentes ciuitati Hierusalem, Iudae nomen fuit, quia ipsa erat tribus unde Dauid. Beniamin uero tribus altera ad idem regnum, sicut dixi, pertinens erat, unde fuit Saul rex ante Dauid.

Sed simul istae duae tribus, ut dictum est, Iuda uocabantur, et hoc nomine discernebantur, ab Israel, quod appellabantur proprie decem tribus habentes suum regem. Nam tribus Leui, quoniam sacerdotalis fuit, Dei, non regum seruitio mancipata, tertia decima numerabatur. Ioseph quippe unus ex duodecim filiis Israel, non unam, sicut ceteri singulas, sed duas tribus fecit, Ephraem et Manassen. Verum tamen etiam tribus Leui ad regnum Hierosolymitanum pertinebat magis, ubi erat Dei templum, cui seruiebat. Diuiso igitur populo primus regnauit in Hierusalem Roboam, rex Iuda, filius Salomonis, et in Samaria Hieroboam, rex Israel, seruus Salomonis. Et cum uoluisset Roboam tamquam tyrannidem diuisae illius partis bello persequi, prohibitus est populus pugnare cum fratribus suis dicente Deo per prophetam se hoc fecisse.

Unde apparuit nullum in ea re uel regis Israel uel populi fuisse peccatum, sed uoluntatem Dei uindicantis inpletam. Qua cognita pars utraque inter se pacata conquieuit; non enim religionis, sed regni fuerat facta diuisio.

ENGLISH

happened in the time of his son Rehoboam, who succeeded his father on the throne. Thus the ten tribes received by Jeroboam, Solomon's servant, who was made their king in Samaria, were properly called Israel, although this was the name of that whole people. The two tribes, namely Judah and Benjamin, had remained subject to the city of Jerusalem for David's sake, so that the kingdom of his line should not be entirely uprooted. They bore the name Judah, because that was the tribe from which David came. The other tribe, Benjamin, which, as I said, belonged to the same kingdom, was the one from which Saul came, the king before David.[88]

But together these two tribes, as was said, were called Judah, and by this name were distinguished from Israel, which was the name properly given to the ten tribes that had their own king. For the tribe of Levi, since it was priestly and devoted to the service of God, not of kings, was counted as the thirteenth. Joseph, one of the twelve sons of Israel, produced not one tribe, as each of the others did, but two, Ephraim and Manasseh. Yet even the tribe of Levi belonged rather to the kingdom of Jerusalem, where the temple of God was, which it served. When the people had been divided, then, the first to reign in Jerusalem was Rehoboam, king of Judah, Solomon's son, and in Samaria Jeroboam, king of Israel, Solomon's servant. And when Rehoboam wanted to make war on that breakaway part, as though on a usurper's rule, the people were forbidden to fight against their brothers, for God said through a prophet that he himself had done this.[89]

From this it became clear that there had been no sin in this matter on the part of either the king of Israel or the people, but that the will of God in punishing had been carried out. Once this was known, both parts settled down at peace with each other. For the division that had been made was not one of religion, but of the kingdom.

88 The division of the kingdom is told in 1 Kings 11–12.
89 The prophet was Shemaiah (1 Kings 12:22–24).

JEROBOAM, WHO PROFANED THE PEOPLE UNDER HIM WITH THE IMPIETY OF IDOLATRY, THOUGH GOD DID NOT CEASE TO INSPIRE PROPHETS AMONG THEM AND TO KEEP MANY FROM THE CRIME OF IDOLATRY

Jeroboam leads Israel into idolatry, yet God sends prophets like Elijah and Elisha.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.22	Verum rex Israel Hieroboam mente peruersa non credens Deo, quem ueracem promisso sibi regno datoque probauerat, timuit ne ueniendo ad templum Dei, quod erat in Hierusalem, quo secundum diuinam legem sacrificandi causa uniuersae illi genti ueniendum fuit, seduceretur ab eo populus et stirpi Dauid tamquam regio semini redderetur, et instituit, idolatriam n regno suo et populum Dei secum simulacrorum cultu obstrictum nefanda inpietate decepit. Nec tamen omni modo cessauit Deus non solum illum regem, uerum etiam successores eius et inpietatis imitatores populumque ipsum arguere per prophetas.	But Jeroboam, king of Israel, with a perverse mind, did not trust God, though he had proved him truthful when the kingdom was promised and given to him. According to the divine law, that whole nation had to come to God's temple in Jerusalem to offer sacrifice. Jeroboam feared that by coming there the people would be drawn away from him and returned to David's line as the royal seed. So he established idolatry in his kingdom and, with abominable impiety, deceived God's people, binding them along with himself to the worship of images. Yet God did not by any means cease to rebuke through prophets not only that king, but also his successors and imitators in impiety, and the people themselves.[90]
	Nam ibi exstiterunt et magni illi insignesque prophetae, qui etiam mirabilia multa fecerunt, Helias et Helisaeus discipulus eius; ibi etiam dicenti Heliae: Domine, prophetas tuos occiderunt, altaria tua suffoderunt, et ego relictus sum solus, et quaerunt animam meam, responsum est esse illic septem milia uirorum, qui non curuauerunt genua ante Bahal.	For it was there that those great and distinguished prophets arose who also performed many wonders, Elijah and Elisha his disciple. There too, when Elijah said: "Lord, they have killed your prophets, they have dug up your altars, and I alone am left, and they seek my life," the answer was that there were seven thousand men there who had not bowed the knee before Baal.[91]

THE CHANGING STATE OF BOTH HEBREW KINGDOMS UNTIL BOTH PEOPLES WERE LED INTO CAPTIVITY AT DIFFERENT TIMES, JUDAH BEING AFTERWARD RESTORED TO ITS KINGDOM, WHICH AT LAST PASSED INTO THE POWER OF THE ROMANS

Both kingdoms rise and fall until captivity; Judah returns but ends under Rome.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
17.23	Itemque in regno Iuda pertinente ad Hierusalem etiam regum succedentium temporibus non defuerunt prophetae; sicut Deo placebat eos mittere uel ad praenuntiandum, quod opus erat, uel ad corripienda peccata praecipiendamque iustitiam. Nam et illic, etsi longe minus quam in Israel, tamen exstiterunt reges, qui suis inpietatibus Deum grauiter offenderent et moderatis flagellis cum populo simili plecterentur. Piorum sane regum merita ibi non parua laudantur; in Israel autem reges alios magis, alios minus, omnes tamen reprobos legimus.	Likewise in the kingdom of Judah, which belonged to Jerusalem, there was no lack of prophets in the times of the succeeding kings. God was pleased to send them, either to foretell what was needed or to rebuke sins and enjoin righteousness. For there too, though far less than in Israel, kings arose who gravely offended God by their impieties and were punished with moderate scourges along with a people like them. Certainly the merits of the godly kings there receive no small praise. But in Israel, 90 Jeroboam set up golden calves at Bethel and Dan (1 Kings 12:26–33).

91 1 Kings 19:10, 18, in the form quoted by Paul in Romans 11:3–4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	as we read, the kings were all reprobate, some more, some less.
Utraque igitur pars, sicut iubebat diuina prouidentia uel sinebat, uariis et erigebatur prosperitatibus et aduersitatibus premebatur, et sic adfligebatur non solum externis, uerum etiam inter se ciuilibus bellis, ut certis exsistentibus causis misericordia Dei uel ira patesceret, donec eius indignatione crescente uniuersa gens illa a Chaldaeis debellantibus non solum subuerteretur in sedibus suis, sed etiam ex maxima sui parte transferretur in terras Assyriorum; prius illa pars, quae uocabatur Israel in tribubus decem; postea uero etiam ludas, euersa Hierusalem et templo illo nobilissimo; in quibus terris per annos septuaginta captiuum egit otium.	Each part, then, as divine providence commanded or permitted, was raised up by various kinds of prosperity and pressed down by adversities. It was afflicted not only by foreign wars but also by civil wars among themselves, so that, as definite causes arose, the mercy or the wrath of God was made manifest. This went on until, as his indignation grew, the Chaldeans conquered that whole nation. It was not only overthrown in its own homeland but also, for the most part, carried off into the lands of the Assyrians: first the part called Israel, in the ten tribes, and later Judah too, when Jerusalem and that most famous temple were destroyed. In those lands it spent seventy years in captive idleness.[92]
Post quos inde dimissa templum, quod euersum fuerat, instaurauit; et quamuis plurimi eius in alienigenarum degerent terris, non habuit tamen deinceps duas regni partes et duos diuersos in singulis partibus reges; sed in Hierusalem princeps eorum erat unus, adque ad Dei templum, quod ibi erat, omnes undique, ubicumque essent et undecumque possent, per certa tempora ueniebant. Sed nec tunc eis hostes ex aliis gentibus expugnatoresque defuerunt; nam etiam Romanorum iam tributarios eos Christus inuenit.	Released from there after those years, the nation restored the temple that had been destroyed. Very many of its people lived in the lands of foreigners. Even so, it no longer had two parts of the kingdom with two different kings, one in each part. Instead there was one ruler of theirs in Jerusalem, and all of them came at fixed times to the temple of God that was there, from everywhere, wherever they were and from wherever they could. But not even then did they lack enemies and conquerors from other nations. Indeed, when Christ came he found them already paying tribute to the Romans.

THE LAST PROPHETS AMONG THE JEWS, AND THOSE WHOM THE GOSPEL HISTORY SHOWS AROUND THE TIME OF CHRIST'S BIRTH

After Malachi there are no prophets until those around Christ's birth, ending with John.

LATIN	ENGLISH
17.24 Toto autem illo tempore, ex quo redierunt de Babylonia, post Malachiam, Aggaeum et Zachariam, qui tunc prophetauerunt, et Esdram non habuerunt prophetas usque ad Saluatoris aduentum, nisi alium Zachariam patrem Iohannis et Elisabeth eius uxorem, Christi natiuitate iam proxima, et eo iam nato Simeonem senem et Annam uiduam iamque grandaeuam et ipsum Iohannem nouissimum; qui iuuenis iam iuuenem Christum non quidem futurum praedixit, sed tamen incognitum prophetica cognitione monstrauit; propter quod ipse Dominus ait: Lex et prophetae usque ad Iohannem. Sed istorum quinque prophetatio ex euangelio	In all that time after they returned from Babylon, after Malachi, Haggai and Zechariah, who prophesied then, and Ezra, they had no prophets until the Savior's coming. The exceptions were another Zechariah, the father of John, and his wife Elizabeth, when Christ's birth was already very near. After he was born, there were the aged Simeon, and Anna, a widow already far advanced in years, and John himself, the last of all. John, as a young man, pointed out Christ, also a young man. He did not foretell him as one still to come, but by prophetic knowledge he revealed him while he was still 92 Israel fell to Assyria in 722 BC; Jerusalem and its temple were destroyed by the Babylonians (Chaldeans) in 587/586 BC.

LATIN

nobis nota est, ubi et ipsa uirgo mater Domini ante Iohannem prophetasse inuenitur. Sed hanc istorum prophetiam Iudaei reprobi non accipiunt; acceperunt autem, qui ex eis innumerabiles euangelio crediderunt.

Tunc enim est uere Israel diuisus in duo diuisione illa, quae per Samuelem prophetam Sauli regi est inmutabilis praenuntiata. Malachiam uero, Aggaeum, Zachariam et Esdram etiam Iudaei reprobi in auctoritatem canonicam receptos nouissimos habent. Sunt enim et scripta eorum, sicut aliorum, qui in magna multitudine prophetarum perpauci ea scripserunt, quae auctoritatem canonis obtinerent. De quorum praedictis, quae ad Christum ecclesiamque eius pertinent, nonnulla mihi in hoc opere uideo esse ponenda; quod commodius fiet adiuuante Domino sequenti libro, ne hunc tam prolixum ulterius oneremus.

ENGLISH

unrecognized. That is why the Lord himself says: "The law and the prophets were until John." But the prophecy of these five is known to us from the gospel, where the virgin mother of the Lord herself is also found to have prophesied before John. The reprobate Jews do not accept the prophecy of these people. But it was accepted by the countless numbers of them who believed the gospel.[93]

For it was then that Israel was truly divided in two, by that division which the prophet Samuel foretold to King Saul as unchangeable. Malachi, Haggai, Zechariah and Ezra, however, even the reprobate Jews hold to be the last ones received into canonical authority. For these men also left writings, as did the others—the very few, out of the great multitude of prophets, who wrote works that would obtain canonical authority. I see that some of their predictions concerning Christ and his Church must be set out in this work. With the Lord's help, this will be done more conveniently in the next book, so as not to burden this one, already so long, any further.[94]

93 Luke 16:16; the figures named appear in Luke 1–3.
94 Samuel's prophecy to Saul is in 1 Samuel 15:28–29, discussed in 17.7.

Book XVIII

The two cities side by side
World history from Abraham to Christ, with the prophets, the Sibyl, and the Septuagint.

WHAT HAS BEEN DISCUSSED IN SEVENTEEN BOOKS, UP TO THE TIMES OF THE SAVIOR

Augustine reviews his plan and turns back to trace the earthly city from Abraham.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.1	De ciuitatum duarum, quarum Dei una, saeculi huius est altera, in qua est, quantum ad hominum genus pertinet, etiam ista peregrina, exortu et procursu et debitis finibus me scripturum esse promisi, cum prius inimicos ciuitatis Dei, qui conditori eius Christo deos suos praeferunt et liuore sibi perniciosissimo atrociter inuident Christianis, quantum me adiuuaret eius gratia, refellissem, quod uoluminibus decem prioribus feci. De hac uero mea, quam modo commemoraui, tripertita promissione decimum sequentibus quattuor libris ambarum est digestus exortus, deinde procursus ab homine primo usque ad diluuium libro uno, qui est huius operis quintus decimus, adque inde usque ad Abraham rursus ambae, sicut in temporibus, ita et in nostris litteris cucurrerunt.	I promised to write about the rise, the progress and the appointed ends of the two cities. One of them is God's; the other is this world's, and in this world the city of God, as far as the human race is concerned, is now living as a pilgrim. But I promised to do this only after I had first refuted, so far as his grace helped me, the enemies of the city of God, who prefer their own gods to Christ its founder and, with a malice that is deadly to themselves, fiercely resent the Christians. This I did in the first ten books. Of the threefold promise I have just mentioned, the rise of both cities was set out in the four books that follow the tenth. Their progress from the first man to the flood was set out in one book, the fifteenth of this work. From there to Abraham, both cities again ran their course together, in my writing just as in time itself.
	Sed a patre Abraham usque ad regum tempus Israelitarum, ubi sextum decimum uolumen absoluimus, et inde usque ad ipsius in carne Saluatoris aduentum, quo usque septimus decimus liber tenditur, sola uidetur in meo stilo cucurrisse Dei ciuitas; cum in hoc saeculo non sola cucurrerit, sed ambae utique in genere humano, sicut ab initio, simul suo procursu tempora uariauerint. Verum hoc ideo feci, ut prius, ex quo apertiores Dei promissiones esse coeperunt, usque ad eius ex uirgine natiuitatem, in quo fuerant quae primo promittebantur inplenda, sine interpellatione a contrario alterius ciuitatis ista, quae Dei est, procurrens distinctius appareret; quamuis usque ad reuelationem testamenti noui non in lumine, sed in umbra cucurrerit.	But from our father Abraham to the time of the kings of Israel, where I finished the sixteenth book, and from there to the coming of the Savior himself in the flesh, which is as far as the seventeenth book reaches, the city of God seems to have run its course alone under my pen. Yet in this world it did not run alone. Both cities, as from the beginning, certainly shaped the changing ages together by their course through the human race. I did this, however, for a reason. From the time when God's promises began to be clearer, up to his birth from the virgin, in whom what had first been promised was to be fulfilled, I wanted this city, the one that is God's, to appear more distinctly as it ran its course, without interruption from the opposing city—although until the revelation of the New Testament it ran its course not in light but in shadow.
	Nunc ergo, quod intermiseram, uideo esse faciendum, ut ex Abrahae temporibus quo modo etiam illa cucurrerit,	Now, then, I see that I must do what I had left aside. I must touch on how that other city, too, ran quantum satis uidetur, adtingam, ut ambae inter se possint consideratione legentium conparari.	its course from the times of Abraham, as far as seems sufficient, so that readers may consider the two cities and compare them with each other.

LATIN	ENGLISH

THE KINGS AND TIMES OF THE EARTHLY CITY THAT CORRESPOND TO THE TIMES OF THE SAINTS RECKONED FROM THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM

Human society is divided by conquest; Assyria and Rome are the two great kingdoms.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.2	Societas igitur usquequaque mortalium diffusa per terras et in locorum quantislibet diuersitatibus unius tamen eius-.. demque naturae quadam communione deuincta utilitates et cupiditates suas quibusque sectantibus, dum id quod adpetitur aut nemini aut non omnibus sufficit, quia non est id ipsum, aduersus se ipsam plerumque diuiditur, et pars partem, quae praeualet, obprimit. Victrici enim uicta subcumbit, dominationi scilicet uel etiam libertati qualemcumque pacem praeferens ac salutem, ita ut magnae fuerint admirationi, qui perire quam seruire maluerunt. Nam in omnibus fere gentibus quodam modo uox naturae ista personuit, ut subiugari uictoribus mallent, quibus contigit uinci, quam bellica omnifariam uastatione deleri. Hinc factum est, ut non sine Dei prouidentia, in cuius potestate est, ut quisque bello aut subiugetur aut subiuget, quidam essent regnis praediti, quidam regnantibus subditi.	The society of mortals, then, is spread everywhere over the earth, and for all the diversity of its places it is bound together by a certain fellowship of one and the same nature. Yet each pursues his own interests and desires, and what is sought is enough either for no one or not for all, because it is not the Selfsame. So this society is for the most part divided against itself, and the part that prevails oppresses the other. For the conquered part submits to the conquering one, preferring peace and survival on any terms to dominion, or even to liberty. That is why those who chose to perish rather than be slaves have been so greatly admired. For in almost all nations the voice of nature has somehow rung out: those who happen to be conquered prefer to be subjugated to the victors rather than be wiped out by the total devastation of war. Hence it has come about, not without the providence of God, in whose power it lies whether anyone in war subjugates or is subjugated, that some have been granted kingdoms and others made subject to those who reign.[1]
	Sed inter plurima regna terrarum, in quae terrenae utilitatis uel cupiditatis est diuisa societas (quam ciuitatem mundi huius uniuersali uocabulo nuncupamus), duo regna cernimus longe ceteris prouenisse clariora, Assyriorum primum, deinde Romanorum, ut temporibus, ita locis inter se ordinata adque distincta. Nam quo modo illud prius, hoc posterius: eo modo illud in Oriente, hoc in Occidente surrexit; denique in illius fine huius initium confestim fuit. Regna cetera ceterosque reges uelut adpendices istorum dixerim.	Among the very many kingdoms of the earth into which the society of earthly interest or desire is divided (the society we call, by a general term, the city of this world), we see two that have turned out far more illustrious than the rest. The first is that of the Assyrians, then that of the Romans, set in order and kept distinct from each other in place as in time. For just as the one came earlier and the other later, so the one arose in the East and the other in the West. And in the end, the beginning of the latter followed immediately on the end of the former. The other kingdoms and kings I would call mere appendages of these.
	Ninus ergo iam secundus rex erat Assyriorum, qui patri suo Belo successerat, regni illius primo regi, quando in	Ninus, then, was already the second king of the Assyrians, having succeeded his father Belus, the terra Chaldaeorum natus est Abraham. Erat etiam tempore illo regnum Sicyoniorum admodum paruum, a quo ille undecumque doctissimus Marcus Varro scribens de gente populi Romani, uelut antiquo tempore, exorsus est. Ab his enim Sicyoniorum regibus ad Athenienses peruenit, a quibus ad Latinos, inde Romanos. Sed ante conditam Romam in conparatione regni Assyriorum perexigua ista memorantur; quamuis Athenienses in Graecia plurimum claruisse fateatur etiam Sallustius Romanus historicus; plus tamen fama quam re ipsa. Nam loquens de illis: Atheniensium, inquit, res gestae, sicuti ego existimo, satis amplae magnificaeque fuere; uerum aliquanto minores tamen, quam fama feruntur.

1 "The Selfsame" (id ipsum) is Augustine's term for God, the unchanging being who alone can satisfy all who seek him.

LATIN

Sed quia prouenere ibi scriptorum magna ingenia, per terrarum orbem Atheniensium facta pro maximis celebrantur. Ita eorum qui fecere uirtus tanta habetur, quantum eam uerbis potuere extollere praeclara ingenia. Accedit huic ciuitati non parua etiam ex litteris et philosophis gloria, quod ibi potissimum talia studia uiguerunt. Nam quantum adtinet ad imperium, nullum maius primis temporibus quam Assyriorum fuit, nec tam longe lateque diffusum, quippe ubi Ninus rex, Beli filius, uniuersam Asiam, quae totius orbis ad numerum partium tertia dicitur, ad magnitudinem uero dimidia reperitur, usque ad Libyae fines subegisse traditur. Solis quippe Indis in partibus Orientis non dominabatur, quos tamen eo defuncto Samiramis uxor eius est adgressa bellando.

Ita factum est, ut, quicumque in illis terris populi siue reges erant, Assyriorum regno dicionique parerent et quidquid imperaretur efficerent. Abraham igitur in eo regno aput Chaldaeos Nini temporibus natus est. Sed quoniam res Graecae multo sunt nobis quam Assyriae notiores, et per Graecos ad Latinos ac deinde ad Romanos, qui etiam ipsi Latini sunt, temporum seriem deduxerunt qui gentem populi Romani in originis eius antiquitate rimati sunt: ob hoc debemus, ubi opus est, Assyrios memorare reges, ut appareat quem ad modum Babylonia, quasi prima Roma, cum peregrina in hoc mundo Dei ciuitate procurrat; res autem, quas propter first king of that realm, when Abraham was born in the land of the Chaldeans. At that time there was also the very small kingdom of the Sicyonians. Marcus Varro, a man learned in every field, began from it, as from a time of remote antiquity, when he wrote about the origin of the Roman people. For from these Sicyonian kings he passes to the Athenians, from them to the Latins, and from there to the Romans. But before Rome was founded, these kingdoms are recorded as very slight compared with the kingdom of the Assyrians. Even Sallust, the Roman historian, admits that the Athenians were exceedingly renowned in Greece, but more in fame than in reality. Speaking of them, he says: "The deeds of the Athenians, in my judgment, were ample and magnificent enough, but nevertheless somewhat less than fame reports them.[2]

ENGLISH

"But because writers of great talent arose there, the deeds of the Athenians are celebrated throughout the world as the greatest. So the virtue of those who performed them is held to be as great as brilliant minds were able to exalt it in words." This city also gains no small glory from its literature and philosophers, because such studies flourished there above all. As far as empire is concerned, however, none in the earliest times was greater than that of the Assyrians, nor spread so far and wide. King Ninus, son of Belus, is said to have subdued all Asia as far as the borders of Libya. In the number of its parts Asia is called a third of the whole world, but in size it is found to be half. In the regions of the East the Indians alone were not under his rule, and after his death his wife Semiramis made war on them.

So it came about that whatever peoples or kings there were in those lands obeyed the kingdom and authority of the Assyrians and carried out whatever was commanded. Abraham, then, was born in that kingdom, among the Chaldeans, in the time of Ninus. But Greek history is far better known to us than Assyrian. Those who have probed the ancient origins of the Roman people have also traced the sequence of the ages through the Greeks to the Latins, and then to the Romans, who are themselves Latins as well. For this reason

2 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC) was Rome's most learned antiquarian; the work is his On the Origin of the Roman People. Sallust (86–35 BC) was a Roman historian; the quotation is from The War with Catiline 8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
conparationem ciuitatis utriusque, terrenae scilicet et caelestis, huic operi oportet inserere, magis ex Graecis et Latinis, ubi et ipsa Roma quasi secunda Babylonia est, debemus adsumere.	we must mention the Assyrian kings where necessary, so that it may be clear how Babylon, a kind of first Rome, runs its course alongside the city of God, which is a pilgrim in this world. But the material that must be inserted into this work for the sake of comparing the two cities, the earthly and the heavenly, we should take mostly from the Greeks and Latins, among whom Rome itself is a kind of second Babylon.
Quando ergo natus est Abraham, secundi reges erant aput Assyrios Ninus, aput Sicyonios Europs; primi autem illic Belus, hic Aegialeus fuerunt. Cum uero egresso Abraham de Babylonia promisit ei Deus ex illo magnam gentem futuram et in eius semine omnium gentium benedictionem. Assyrii quartum regem habebant, Sicyonii quintum; aput illos enim regnabat filius Nini post matrem Samiramidem: quae ab illo interfecta perhibetur, ausa filium mater incestare concubitu. Hanc putant nonnulli condidisse Babylonem, quam quidem potuit instaurare. Quando autem uel quo modo condita fuerit, in sexto decimo libro diximus. Filium porro Nini et Samiramidis, qui matri successit in regnum, quidam etiam ipsum Ninum, quidam uero deriuato a patre uocabulo Ninyan uocant. Sicyoniorum autem regnum tunc tenebat Telxion.	When Abraham was born, then, the second kings were Ninus among the Assyrians and Europs among the Sicyonians; the first had been Belus in the one kingdom and Aegialeus in the other. When Abraham had left Babylonia, God promised him that a great nation would come from him and that in his seed all nations would be blessed. At that time the Assyrians had their fourth king and the Sicyonians their fifth. Among the Assyrians the son of Ninus was reigning after his mother Semiramis. She is said to have been killed by him when she, his own mother, dared to defile her son by incestuous intercourse. Some think that she founded Babylon, though she may in fact have restored it. When or how it was founded I discussed in the sixteenth book. The son of Ninus and Semiramis, who succeeded his mother on the throne, is called by some Ninus as well, and by others Ninyas, a name derived from his father's. The kingdom of the Sicyonians at that time was held by Telxion.
Quo regnante usque adeo ibi mitia et laeta tempora fuerunt, ut eum defunctum uelut deum colerent sacrificando et ludos celebrando, quos ei primitus institutos ferunt.	Under his reign the times there were so gentle and happy that, when he died, they worshiped him as a god, offering sacrifices and celebrating games, which are said to have been instituted first in his honor.

WHO REIGNED OVER THE ASSYRIANS AND THE SICYONIANS WHEN ISAAC WAS BORN BY PROMISE TO ABRAHAM AT A HUNDRED, AND WHEN THE TWINS ESAU AND JACOB WERE BORN TO REBEKAH WHEN ISAAC WAS SIXTY

Kings reigning in Assyria, Sicyon and Argos at the births of Isaac, Esau and Jacob.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.3 Huius temporibus etiam Isaac ex promissione Dei natus est centenario patri filius Abrahae de Sarra coniuge, quae sterilis et anus iam spem prolis amiserat. Tunc et Assyriis quintus erat rex Arrius. Ipsi uero Isaac sexagenario nati sunt gemini, Esau et Iacob, quos ei Rebecca uxor peperit, auo eorum Abraham adhuc uiuente et centum sexaginta aetatis annos agente, qui expletis centum septuaginta	In his times Isaac, too, was born by God's promise. He was the son of Abraham, who was then a hundred years old, by his wife Sarah, who, being barren and old, had already lost hope of offspring. At that time Arrius was the fifth king of the Assyrians. When Isaac himself was sixty, twins were quinque defunctus est, regnantibus aput Assyrios Xerse illo antiquiore, qui etiam Baleus uocabatur, et aput Sicyonios Thuriaco, quem quidam Thurimachum scribunt, septimis regibus. Regnum autem Argiuorum simul cum Abrahae nepotibus ortum est, ubi primus regnauit Inachus. Sane, quod praetereundum non fuit, etiam aput sepulcrum septimi sui regis Thuriaci sacrificare Sicyonios solere Varro refert.

LATIN

Regnantibus porro octauis regibus, Armamitre Assyriorum, Sicyoniorum Leucippo et primo Argiuorum Inacho Deus locutus est ad Isaac adque ipsi quoque eadem, quae patri eius, duo illa promisit, semini scilicet eius terram Chanaan et in eius semine benedictionem cunctarum gentium. Haec ipsa promissa sunt etiam filio eius, nepoti Abrahae, qui est appellatus primo Iacob, post Israel, cum iam Belocus rex nonus Assyriae et Phoroneus Inachi filius secundus regnaret Argiuis, Leucippo adhuc aput Sicyonios permanente. His temporibus Graecia sub Phoroneo Argolico rege legum et iudiciorum quibusdam clarior facta est institutis. Phegous tamen frater huius Phoronei iunior cum esset mortuus, ad eius sepulcrum templum est constitutum, in quo coleretur ut Deus et ei boues immolarentur.

Credo honore tanto ideo dignum putarunt, quia in regni sui parte (pater quippe loca ambobus distribuerat, in quibus eo uiuente regnarent) iste sacella constituerat ad colendos deos et docuerat obseruari tempora per menses adque annos, quid eorum quatenus metirentur adque numerarent. Haec in eo noua mirantes rudes adhuc homines morte obita deum esse factum siue opinati sunt siue uoluerunt. Nam et Io filia Inachi fuisse perhibetur, quae postea Isis appellata ut magna dea culta est in Aegypto; quamuis alii scribant eam ex Aethiopia in Aegyptum uenisse reginam, et quod late iusteque imperauerit eisque multa commoda et litteras instituerit, hunc honorem illi habitum esse diuinum, postea quam ibi mortua est, et tantum honorem, ut capitali crimine reus fieret, si quis eam fuisse hominem diceret.

ENGLISH

born to him, Esau and Jacob, whom his wife Rebekah bore him. Their grandfather Abraham was still alive and in his hundred and sixtieth year. Abraham died when he had completed a hundred and seventy-five years, during the reigns of the seventh kings: among the Assyrians the elder Xerxes, who was also called Baleus, and among the Sicyonians Thuriacus, whose name some write as Thurimachus. The kingdom of the Argives arose at the same time as Abraham's grandsons, and its first king was Inachus. One point should not be passed over: Varro reports that the Sicyonians used to offer sacrifice even at the tomb of Thuriacus, their seventh king.

Then, during the reigns of the eighth kings—Armamitres of the Assyrians and Leucippus of the Sicyonians—and of Inachus, the first king of the Argives, God spoke to Isaac. He promised him, too, the same two things he had promised his father: the land of Canaan to his seed, and in his seed the blessing of all nations. These same things were promised also to Isaac's son, Abraham's grandson, who was first called Jacob and later Israel. Belocus was then reigning as the ninth king of Assyria, and Phoroneus, son of Inachus, as the second king of the Argives, while Leucippus still continued among the Sicyonians. In these times Greece, under Phoroneus king of Argos, became more renowned for certain institutions of laws and courts. Yet when Phegous, the younger brother of this Phoroneus, died, a temple was established at his tomb, where he was to be worshiped as a god and oxen sacrificed to him.

I suppose they thought him worthy of so great an honor because in his part of the kingdom (their father had assigned each of them territories to rule during his lifetime) he had set up shrines for the worship of the gods. He had also taught people to keep track of time by months and years, and how far they should measure and count each of these. Marveling at these novelties in him, people who were still unsophisticated either supposed, or chose to believe, that after his death he had become a god. For Io, too, is said to have been the daughter of Inachus. She was later called Isis and worshiped as a great goddess in Egypt. Others, however, write that she came into Egypt from Ethiopia as a queen. Because she ruled widely and justly and established many benefits for the Egyptians, including writing, this divine honor was paid to her after she died there. So great was the honor that anyone who said she had been a human being was charged with a capital crime.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

THE TIMES OF JACOB AND HIS SON JOSEPH

Isaac dies; Joseph is sold, rises in Egypt, and Jacob joins him.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.4	Regnantibus Assyriorum decimo rege Baleo et Sicyoniorum nono Messapo, qui etiam Cephisos a quibusdam traditur (si tamen duorum nominum homo unus fuit ac non potius alterum pro altero putauerunt fuisse hominem, qui in suis posuerunt scriptis alterum nomen), cum rex Argiuorum tertius Apis esset, mortuus est Isaac annorum centum octoginta et reliquit geminos suos annorum centum et uiginti; quorum minor Iacob pertinens ad ciuitatem Dei, de qua scribimus, maiore utique reprobato, habebat duodecim filios, quorum illam, qui uocabatur Ioseph, mercatoribus in Aegyptum transeuntibus fratres adhuc Isaac auo eorum uiuente uendiderant.	Baleus was reigning as the tenth king of the Assyrians and Messapus as the ninth of the Sicyonians. Some record that Messapus was also called Cephisus—if indeed one man had two names, and it is not rather that the writers who put the other name in their works thought it was a different man. Apis was then the third king of the Argives. At that time Isaac died at the age of a hundred and eighty, leaving his twins aged a hundred and twenty. The younger of them, Jacob, belonged to the city of God of which we are writing, while the elder was rejected. Jacob had twelve sons. One of them, named Joseph, had been sold by his brothers to merchants on their way to Egypt while their grandfather Isaac was still alive.
	Stetit autem ante Pharaonem Ioseph, quando ex humilitate, quam pertulit, sublimatus est, cum triginta esset annorum; quoniam somnia regis diuine interpretatus praenuntiauit septem ubertatis annos futuros, quorum abundantiam praepollentem consequentes alii septem steriles fuerant consumturi, et ob hoc eum rex praefecerat Aegypto de carcere liberatum, quo eum coniecerat integritas castitatis, quam fortiter seruans male amanti dominae et male credulo domino mentiturae ueste etiam derelicta de manibus adtrahentis aufugiens non consensit ad stuprum. Secundo autem anno septem annorum no sterilium Iacob in Aegyptum cum suis omnibus uenit ad filium, agens annos centum et triginta, sicut interroganti regi ipse respondit, cum Ioseph ageret triginta et nouem, ad triginta scilicet, quos agebat, quando a rege honoratus est, additis septem ubertatis et duobus famis.	Joseph stood before Pharaoh at the age of thirty, when he was raised to high position from the humiliation he had endured. By interpreting the king's dreams through divine inspiration, he had foretold that seven years of plenty were coming, and that seven barren years following them would consume their overflowing abundance. For this the king had freed him from prison and set him over Egypt. He had been thrown into that prison because of the integrity of his chastity. Steadfastly preserving it, he would not consent to adultery with his mistress, who loved him wickedly and was going to lie to his master, who would wrongly believe her. He even left his garment in her hands as she pulled at him, and fled. In the second of the seven barren years Jacob came into Egypt with all his household to his son. He was a hundred and thirty, as he himself told the king when asked. Joseph was then thirty-nine: to the thirty years he was when the king honored him, add the seven years of plenty and two of famine.

APIS, KING OF THE ARGIVES, WHOM THE EGYPTIANS WORSHIPED WITH DIVINE HONOR UNDER THE NAME SERAPIS

Apis of Argos became the Egyptian god Serapis, and demons deceived Egypt with the Apis bull.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.5	His temporibus rex Argiuorum Apis nauibus transuectus in Aegyptum, cum ibi mortuus fuisset, factus est Serapis omnium maximus Aegyptiorum deus. Nominis autem huius, quur non Apis etiam post mortem, sed Serapis appellatus sit, facillimam rationem Varro reddidit. Quia enim arca, in qua mortuus ponitur, quod omnes iam sarcophagum uocant, σορὸς dicitur Graece, et ibi eum uenerari sepultum coeperant, priusquam templum eius esset exstructum: uelut soros et Apis Sorapis primo, deinde una littera, ut fieri adsolet, commutata Serapis dictus est. Et constitutum est etiam de illo, ut, quisquis eum hominem fuisse dixisset, capitalem penderet poenam.	In these times Apis, king of the Argives, crossed by ship into Egypt. When he died there, he became Serapis, the greatest of all the gods of the Egyptians. As for the name—why after his death he was called not Apis but Serapis—Varro gave a very simple explanation. The chest in which a dead person is laid, which everyone now calls a sarcophagus, is called σορὸς [coffin] in Greek. They had begun to venerate him buried in such a chest before his temple was built. So he was at first called Sorapis, as if from soros and Apis, and then, by the change of one letter, as commonly happens, Serapis. In his case, too, it was decreed that anyone who said he had been a man would pay the death penalty.
	Et quoniam fere in omnibus templis, ubi colebantur Isis et Serapis, erat etiam simulacrum, quod digito labiis inpresso admonere uideretur, ut silentium fieret: hoc significare idem Varro existimat, ut homines eos fuisse taceretur. Ille autem bos, quem mirabili uanitate decepta Aegyptus in eius honorem deliciis afluentibus alebat, quoniam eum sine sarcophago uiuum uenerabantur, Apis, non Serapis uocabatur. Quo boue mortuo quoniam quaerebatur et reperiebatur uitulus coloris eiusdem, hoc est albis quibusdam maculis similiter insignitus, mirum quiddam et diuinitus sibi procuratum esse credebant. Non enim magnum erat daemonibus ad eos decipiendos phantasiam talis tauri, quam sola cerneret, ostentare uaccae concipienti adque praegnanti, unde libido matris adtraheret, quod in eius fetu iam corporaliter appareret; sicut Iacob de uirgis uariatis, ut oues et caprae uariae nascerentur, effecit.	In almost all the temples where Isis and Serapis were worshiped there was also a statue that seemed, with a finger pressed to its lips, to warn that silence should be kept. Varro likewise thinks that this signified that silence should be kept about their having been human beings. The bull, on the other hand, which Egypt, deceived by an astonishing folly, kept in his honor amid overflowing luxury, was called Apis, not Serapis, because they venerated it while alive, without a sarcophagus. When that bull died, they would seek and find a calf of the same coloring, that is, marked in the same way with certain white spots. They believed that this was something marvelous, divinely provided for them. Yet it was no great feat for the demons, in order to deceive them, to show a cow, as she conceived and while she was pregnant, an image of such a bull that she alone could see. From it the mother's desire would draw what would then appear in bodily form in her offspring—just as Jacob, with his streaked rods, brought it about that spotted sheep and goats were born.[3]
	Quod enim homines coloribus et corporibus ueris, hoc daemones figuris fictis facillime possunt animalibus concipientibus exhibere.	For what human beings can do with real colors and real objects, demons can very easily present to animals as they conceive by means of illusory shapes.

3 Jacob's rods: Genesis 30:37–39.

WHO WAS KING OF THE ARGIVES AND OF THE ASSYRIANS WHEN JACOB DIED IN EGYPT

Jacob dies in Egypt prophesying Christ; Argus and others are deified in Greece.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.6	Apis ergo rex, non Aegyptiorum, sed Argiuorum, mortuus est in Aegypto. Huic filius Argus successit in regnum, ex cuius nomine et Argi et ex hoc Argiui appellati sunt; superioribus autem regibus nondum uel locus uel gens habebat hoc nomen. Hoc regnante aput Argiuos et aput Sicyonios Erato, aput Assyrios uero adhuc manente Baleo mortuus est Iacob in Aegypto annorum centum quadraginta septem, cum moriturus filios suos et nepotes ex Ioseph benedixisset Christumque apertissime prophetasset, dicens in benedictione Iudae: Non deficiet princeps ex Iuda et dux de femoribus eius, donec ueniant quae reposita sunt ei; et ipse exspectatio gentium. Regnante Argo suis coepit uti frugibus Graecia et habere segetes in agricultura, delatis aliunde seminibus. Argus quoque post obitum deus haberi coepit, templo et sacrificiis honoratus.	Apis, then, a king not of the Egyptians but of the Argives, died in Egypt. His son Argus succeeded him on the throne, and from his name both Argos and, from that, the Argives were named. Under the earlier kings neither the place nor the people yet had this name. While Argus was reigning among the Argives and Eratus among the Sicyonians, and Baleus still remained king among the Assyrians, Jacob died in Egypt at the age of a hundred and forty-seven. Before he died he blessed his sons and his grandsons by Joseph, and he prophesied Christ most plainly, saying in the blessing of Judah: "A ruler shall not be lacking from Judah, nor a leader from his thighs, until the things stored up for him come; and he is the expectation of the nations." During the reign of Argus Greece began to use its own crops and to have harvests from farming, after seeds had been brought in from elsewhere. Argus, too, came to be regarded as a god after his death, honored with a temple and sacrifices.[4]
	Qui honor eo regnante ante illum delatus est homini priuato et fulminato cuidam Homogyro, eo quod primus ad aratrum boues iunxerit.	During his reign this honor had already been conferred, before it was given to him, on a private man struck by lightning, one Homogyrus, because he was the first to yoke oxen to the plow.

IN WHOSE REIGNS JOSEPH DIED IN EGYPT

Joseph dies, and Israel multiplies in Egypt under oppression.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.7	Regnantibus Assyriorum duodecimo Mamytho et undecimo Sicyoniorum Plemmeo et Argis adhuc manente Argo mortuus est Ioseph in Aegypto annorum centum decem. Post cuius mortem populus Dei mirabiliter crescens mansit in Aegypto centum quadraginta quinque annos, tranquille prius, donec morerentur quibus Ioseph notus fuit; deinde quia inuidebatur incrementis eius erantque suspecta, quo usque inde liberaretur, persecutionibus (inter quas tamen diuinitus fecundata multiplicatione crescebat) et laboribus premebatur intolerabilis seruitutis. In Assyria uero et Graecia per idem tempus regna eadem permanebant.	Mamythus was reigning as the twelfth king of the Assyrians and Plemmeus as the eleventh of the Sicyonians, and Argus still remained king at Argos, when Joseph died in Egypt at the age of a hundred and ten. After his death the people of God, growing wonderfully, remained in Egypt for a hundred and forty-five years. At first they lived in peace, until those who had known Joseph died. Then, because their growth was envied and regarded with suspicion, they were oppressed, until they were set free from there, by persecutions and by the toil of an intolerable slavery—though even amid these persecutions they kept growing, their numbers

4 Genesis 49:10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	multiplied by God's gift of fruitfulness. Meanwhile, during the same period, the same kingdoms continued in Assyria and Greece.

IN WHOSE REIGNS MOSES WAS BORN, AND THE WORSHIP OF WHICH GODS BEGAN AT THAT TIME

Moses is born; Greece begins making gods of Prometheus, Atlas, Mercury, Hercules and Minerva.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.8 Cum ergo regnaret Assyriis quartus decimus Saphrus et Sicyoniis duodecimus Orthopolis et Criasus quintus Argiuis, natus est in Aegypto Moyses, per quem populus Dei de seruitute Aegyptia liberatus est, in qua eum ad desiderandum sui Creatoris auxilium sic exerceri oportebat. Regnantibus memoratis regibus fuisse a quibusdam creditur Prometheus, quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiae doctor fuisse perhibetur; nec tamen ostenditur, qui eius temporibus fuerint sapientes. Frater eius Atlans magnus fuisse astrologus dicitur; unde occasionem fabula inuenit, ut eum caelum portare confingeret; quamuis mons eius nomine nuncupetur, cuius altitudine potius caeli portatio in opinionem uulgi uenisse uideatur.	When, then, Saphrus was reigning as the fourteenth king of the Assyrians, Orthopolis as the twelfth of the Sicyonians, and Criasus as the fifth of the Argives, Moses was born in Egypt. Through him the people of God was freed from slavery in Egypt, a slavery in which it had to be tested in this way so that it would long for the help of its Creator. Some believe that Prometheus lived during the reigns of these kings. They say he formed human beings out of clay because he is reported to have been an excellent teacher of wisdom; yet no one shows who the wise men of his time were. His brother Atlas is said to have been a great astronomer. From this the myth found occasion to invent the story that he carries the sky—though a mountain is named after him, and it seems more likely that its height gave rise to the popular belief that he carries the sky.
Multa quoque alia ex illis in Graecia temporibus confingi fabulosa coeperunt; sed usque ad Cecropem regem Atheniensium, quo regnante eadem ciuitas etiam tale nomen accepit, et quo regnante Deus per Moysen eduxit ex Aegypto populum suum, relati sunt in deorum numerum aliquot mortui caeca et uana consuetudine ac superstitione Graecorum. In quibus Criasi regis coniux Melantomice et Phorbas filius eorum, qui post patrem rex Argiuorum sextus fuit, et septimi regis Triopae filius Iasus et rex nonus Sthenelas siue Stheneleus siue Sthenelus, uarie quippe in diuersis auctoribus inuenitur. His temporibus etiam Mercurius fuisse perhibetur, nepos Atlantis ex Maia filia, quod uulgatiores etiam litterae personant. Multarum autem artium peritus claruit, quas et hominibus tradidit; quo merito eum post mortem deum esse uoluerunt siue etiam crediderunt.	Many other myths, too, began to be invented in Greece from those times on. Up to the reign of Cecrops, king of the Athenians—in whose reign that city also received its name, and in whose reign God led his people out of Egypt through Moses—a number of the dead were enrolled among the gods by the blind and empty custom and superstition of the Greeks. Among them were Melantomice, wife of King Criasus, and Phorbas their son, who after his father became the sixth king of the Argives; Iasus, son of Triopas the seventh king; and the ninth king, Sthenelas or Stheneleus or Sthenelus, for the name appears in various forms in different authors. In these times, too, Mercury is said to have lived, the grandson of Atlas through his daughter Maia, as even the more popular literature proclaims. He was renowned for his skill in many arts, which he also passed on to human beings. Because of this merit they chose to make him a god after his death—or even believed that he was one.[5]

5 Cecrops was the legendary first king of Athens.

LATIN

Posterior fuisse Hercules dicitur, ad ea tamen tempora pertinens Argiuorum; quamuis nonnulli eum Mercurio praeferant tempore; quos falli existimo. Sed quolibet tempore nati sint, constat inter historicos graues, qui haec antiqua litteris mandauerunt, ambos homines fuisse, et quod mortalibus ad istam uitam commodius ducendam beneficia multa contulerint, honores ab eis meruisse diuinos. Minerua uero longe his antiquior; nam temporibus Ogygi ad lacum, qui Tritonis dicitur, uirginali apparuisse fertur aetate, unde et Tritonia nuncupata est; multorum sane operum inuentrix et tanto procliuius dea credita, quanto minus origo eius innotuit. Quod enim de capite Iouis nata canitur, poetis et fabulis, non historiae rebusque gestis est adplicandum.

Quamquam Ogygus ipse quando fuerit, cuius temporibus etiam diluuium magnum factum est, non illud maximum, in quo nulli homines euaserunt, nisi qui in arca esse potuerunt, quod gentium nec Graeca nec Latina nouit historia, sed tamen maius quam postea tempore Deucalionis fuit, inter scriptores historiae non conuenit. Nam Varro inde exorsus est librum, cuius mentionem superius feci, et nihil sibi, ex quo perueniat ad res Romanas, proponit antiquius quam Ogygi diluuium, hoc est Ogygi factum temporibus. Nostri autem qui chronica scripserunt, prius Eusebius, post Hieronymus, qui utique praecedentes aliquos historicos in hac opinione seeuti sunt, post annos amplius quam trecentos iam secundo Argiuorum Phoroneo rege regnante Ogygi diluuium fuisse commemorant.

Sed quolibet tempore fuerit, iam tamen Minerua tamquam dea colebatur regnante Atheniensibus Cecrope, sub quo rege etiam ipsam uel instauratam ferunt uel conditam ciuitatem.

ENGLISH

Hercules is said to have come later, though he still belongs to the same period of Argive history. Some, however, place him earlier than Mercury, but I think they are mistaken. Whenever they were born, serious historians who have committed these ancient matters to writing agree that both were human beings, and that they earned divine honors from mortals because they conferred many benefits on them for making this life more comfortable. Minerva, however, is far older than these. In the times of Ogygus she is said to have appeared, in the form of a maiden, by the lake called Triton, and for this reason she was also named Tritonia. She was certainly the inventor of many crafts, and she was believed to be a goddess all the more readily the less her origin was known. As for the poets' song that she was born from Jupiter's head, that must be assigned to poetry and myth, not to history and actual events.[6]

When Ogygus himself lived, however, is not agreed among writers of history. In his time a great flood also took place. It was not that greatest flood, from which no human beings escaped except those who could fit in the ark, a flood of which neither Greek nor Latin history of the nations knows anything. Yet it was greater than the later one in the time of Deucalion. Varro began from there the book I mentioned above, and as his starting point for reaching Roman history he sets before himself nothing older than the flood of Ogygus, that is, the flood that took place in the times of Ogygus. But our own writers of chronicles —first Eusebius, then Jerome—who certainly followed some earlier historians in this view, record that the flood of Ogygus occurred more than three hundred years later, when Phoroneus, the second king of the Argives, was already reigning.[7]

But whenever it happened, Minerva was already being worshiped as a goddess when Cecrops reigned over the Athenians. Under this king, they say, the city itself was either restored or founded.

6 Ogygus (Ogyges) was a legendary primeval king of Greece, in whose time a great flood was said to have occurred.
7 Jerome (c. AD 347–420) translated Eusebius's Chronicle into Latin and continued it.

WHEN THE CITY OF ATHENS WAS FOUNDED, AND WHAT REASON VARRO GIVES FOR ITS NAME

Athens is named after Minerva by a vote of the women, who are then punished.

LATIN

18.9 Nam ut Athenae uocarentur, quod certe nomen a Minerua est, quae Graece Ἀθηνᾶ dicitur, hanc causam Varro indicat. Cum apparuisset illic repeute oliuae arbor et alio loco aqua erupisset, regem prodigia ista mouerunt, et misit ad Apollinem Delphicum sciscitatum quid intellegendum esset quidue faciendum. Ille respondit, quod olea Mineruam significaret, unda Neptunum, et quod esset in ciuium potestate, ex cuius potius nomine duorum deorum, quorum illa signa essent, ciuitas uocaretur. Isto Cecrops oraculo accepto ciues omnes utriusque sexus (mos enim tunc in eisdem locis erat, ut etiam feminae publicis consultationibus interessent) ad ferendum suffragium conuocauit. Consulta igitur multitudine mares pro Neptuno, feminae pro Minerua tulere sententias, et quia una plus inuenta est feminarum, Minerua uicit.

Tunc Neptunus iratus marinis fluctibus exaestuantibus terras Atheniensium populatus est; quoniam spargere latius quaslibet aquas difficile daemonibus non est. Cuius ut iracundia placaretur, triplici supplicio dicit idem auctor ab Atheniensibus adfectas esse mulieres, ut nulla ulterius ferrent suffragia, ut nullus nascentium maternum nomen acciperet, ut ne quis eas Athenaeas uocaret. Ita illa ciuitas, mater aut nutrix liberalium doctrinarum et tot tantorumque philosophorum, qua nihil habuit Graecia clarius adque nobilius, ludificantibus daemonibus de lite deorum suorum, maris et feminae, et de uictoria per feminas feminae Athenas nomen accepit, et a uicto laesa ipsam uictricis uictoriam punire conpulsa est, plus aquas Neptuni quam Mineruae arma formidans.

Nam in mulieribus, quae sic punitae sunt, et Minerua quae uicerat uicta est; nec adfuit suffragatricibus suis, ut suffragiorum deinceps perdita potestate et alienatis filiis a nominibus matrum Athenaeas saltem uocari liceret et eius deae mereri uocabulum, quam uiri dei uictricem fecerant ferendo suffragium. Quae et quanta hinc dici possent, nisi sermo ad alia properaret!

ENGLISH

For Varro gives the following reason why the city came to be called Athens, a name that certainly comes from Minerva, who in Greek is called Ἀθηνᾶ [Athena]. An olive tree had suddenly appeared there, and in another place water had burst forth. These prodigies troubled the king, and he sent to Delphic Apollo to ask what they meant and what should be done. Apollo replied that the olive signified Minerva and the water Neptune, and that it was up to the citizens to decide which of the two gods, whose signs these were, the city should rather be named after. On receiving this oracle Cecrops called together all the citizens of both sexes to cast their votes, for at that time it was the custom in those parts for women also to take part in public deliberations. So the people were consulted: the men voted for Neptune, the women for Minerva, and because the women were found to outnumber the men by one, Minerva won.

Then Neptune, in his anger, laid waste the lands of the Athenians with surging waves of the sea, for it is not hard for demons to spread any waters they please over a wider area. To appease his wrath, the same author says, the Athenians inflicted a threefold punishment on the women: they were never to vote again, no child born was to take its mother's name, and no one was to call them Athenians. So that city, the mother or nurse of the liberal arts and of so many great philosophers, the most famous and noble thing that Greece possessed, received the name Athens through a mockery staged by demons. It came from a quarrel between its gods, a male and a female, and from the victory of the female won by the females. And then, injured by the loser, the city was forced to punish the very victory of the winner, since it feared Neptune's waters more than Minerva's arms.

For in the women who were punished in this way, Minerva, who had won, was defeated as well. She did not stand by the women who had voted for her. They lost the right to vote from then on, and their sons were cut off from their mothers' names; yet she did not even secure for them the right to be called Athenians and to earn the name of the goddess whom they had made victorious over the male god by casting their votes. How much, and what, could be said on this point, if my discussion were not hurrying on to other matters!

	LATIN	ENGLISH

WHAT VARRO REPORTS ABOUT THE NAMING OF THE AREOPAGUS AND ABOUT THE FLOOD OF DEUCALION

Varro rejects myths about the Areopagus but tells the flood of Deucalion as history.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.10	Et tamen Marcus Varro non uult fabulosis aduersus deos fidem adhibere figmentis, ne de maiestatis eorum dignitate indignum aliquid sentiat. Et ideo nec Areon pagon, ubi cum Atheniensibus Paulus apostolus disputauit, ex quo loco Areopagitae appellati sunt curiales urbis eiusdem, uult inde accepisse nomen, quod Mars, qui Graece Ἄρης dicitur, cum homicidii crimine reus fieret, iudicantibus duodecim dis in eo pago sex sententiis absolutus est (quia ubi paris numeri sententiae fuissent, praeponi absolutio damnationi solebat);	And yet Marcus Varro does not want to put faith in mythical fictions that discredit the gods, lest he think something unworthy of the dignity of their majesty. Take the Areopagus, where the apostle Paul debated with the Athenians, and from which the members of that city's council are called Areopagites. Varro will not allow that it took its name from the following story: Mars, who in Greek is called Ἄρης [Ares], was put on trial for the crime of homicide, and on that hill, with twelve gods sitting as judges, he was acquitted by six votes (for when the votes were evenly divided, acquittal was customarily preferred to condemnation).[8]
	sed contra istam, quae multo amplius est celebrata, opinionem aliam quandam de obscurarum notitia litterarum causam nominis huius conatur adstruere, ne Areon pagon Athenienses de nomine Martis et pagi quasi Martis pagum nominasse credantur, in iniuriam uidelicet numinum, a quibus litigia uel iudicia existimat aliena; non minus hoc, quod de Marte dicitur, falsum esse adseuerans, quam illud quod de tribus deabus, Iunone scilicet et Minerua et Venere, quae pro malo aureo adipiscendo aput iudicem Paridem de pulchritudinis excellentia certasse narrantur et ad placandos ludis deos, qui delectantur seu ueris seu falsis istis criminibus suis, inter theatricos plausus cantantur adque saltantur.	Instead, against this view, which is far more widely celebrated, he tries to build up some other explanation of the name from his knowledge of obscure writings. He does not want people to believe that the Athenians named the Areopagus from the names of Mars and "hill," as if it were "Mars' hill." That, of course, would insult the deities, to whom he thinks lawsuits and trials are foreign. He asserts that this story about Mars is no less false than the one about the three goddesses, Juno, Minerva and Venus. They are said to have competed before Paris as judge over which of them was most beautiful, to win the golden apple; and their story is sung and danced amid the applause of the theater at the games held to appease the gods, who take delight in these crimes of theirs, whether true or false.
	Haec Varro non credit, ne deorum naturae seu moribus credat incongrua; et tamen non fabulosam, sed historicam rationem de Athenarum uocabulo reddens tantam Neptuni et Mineruae litem suis litteris inserit, de cuius nomine potius illa ciuitas uocaretur, ut, cum prodigiorum ostentatione contenderent, inter eos iudicare nec Apollo consultus auderet, sed deorum	Varro does not believe these things, lest he believe something unbecoming to the nature or character of the gods. And yet, giving not a mythical but a historical account of the name of Athens, he inserts into his writings a quarrel between Neptune and Minerva over whose name the city should rather take, so fierce that, when they contended

8 The Areopagus, the "Hill of Ares" in Athens, was the seat of the city's ancient council; Paul's speech there is recounted in Acts 17.

LATIN	ENGLISH
iurgium finiendum, sicut memoratarum trium dearum ad Paridem Iuppiter, ita et iste ad homines mitteret, ubi uinceret Minerua suffragiis et in poena suarum suffragatricium uinceretur, quae in aduersariis suis uiris obtinere Athenas potuit, et amicas suas feminas Athenaeas habere non potuit.	by displaying prodigies, not even Apollo dared to judge between them when he was consulted. Instead, just as Jupiter sent the three goddesses I mentioned to Paris, so Apollo too sent the gods' dispute to human beings to settle. There Minerva won by the votes and was defeated in the punishment of the women who voted for her. She could secure Athens against her opponents, the men, but she could not keep her friends, the women, as Athenians.
His temporibus, ut Varro scribit, regnante Atheniensibus Cranao, successore Cecropis, ut autem nostri Eusebius et Hieronymus, adhuc eodem Cecrope permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis, eo quod ipse regnabat in earum terrarum partibus, ubi maxime factum est. Hoc autem diluuium nequaquam ad Aegyptum adque ad eius uicina peruenit.	In these times, as Varro writes, when Cranaus, Cecrops' successor, was reigning over the Athenians—or, according to our own Eusebius and Jerome, while Cecrops himself was still on the throne—there occurred the flood that has been called Deucalion's, because he was ruling in those parts of the world where it chiefly took place. But this flood in no way reached Egypt or the regions near it.

WHEN MOSES LED THE PEOPLE OF GOD OUT OF EGYPT, AND IN WHOSE REIGNS JOSHUA SON OF NUN, HIS SUCCESSOR, DIED

Moses leads Israel out and gives the law; Joshua settles the land and dies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.11 Eduxit ergo Moyses ex Aegypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium regis, cum aput Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, aput Sicyonios Marathus, aput Argiuos Triopas. Educto autem populo in monte Sina diuinitus acceptam tradidit legem, quod uetus dicitur testamentum, quia promissiones terrenas habet, et per Iesum Christum futurum fuerat testamentum nouum, quo regnum caelorum promitteretur. Hunc enim ordinem seruari oportebat, sicut in uno quoque homine, qui in Deum proficit, id agitur, quod ait apostolus, ut non sit prius quod spiritale est; sed quod animale, postea spiritale; quoniam sicut dicit et uerum est, primus homo de terra, terrenus; secundus homo de caelo.	Moses, then, led the people of God out of Egypt at the very end of the reign of Cecrops, king of the Athenians, when Ascatades was reigning among the Assyrians, Marathus among the Sicyonians, and Triopas among the Argives. After leading the people out, he handed down on Mount Sinai the law he had received from God. This is called the Old Testament, because it contains earthly promises; and through Jesus Christ there was to come the New Testament, in which the kingdom of heaven would be promised. For this order had to be kept, just as in each individual who advances toward God there takes place what the apostle describes: "It is not the spiritual that comes first, but the natural, and afterward the spiritual." For, as he says, and truly, "the first man was from the earth, earthly; the second man is from heaven."[9]
Rexit autem populum Moyses per annos quadraginta in deserto et mortuus est annorum centum et uiginti, cum Christum etiam ipse prophetasset per figuras obseruationum carnalium in tabernaculo et sacerdotio et sacrificiis aliisque mysticis plurimisque mandatis. Moysi	Moses ruled the people for forty years in the desert and died at the age of one hundred and twenty. He too had prophesied Christ, through the figures of the bodily observances in the tabernacle, the priesthood, the sacrifices and a great

9 1 Corinthians 15:46–47.

LATIN	ENGLISH
successit Iesus Naue et in terra promissionis introductum populum conlocauit ex auctoritate diuina debellatis gentibus, a quibus eadem loca tenebantur. Qui cum populum rexisset post mortem Moysi uiginti et septem annos, etiam ipse defunctus est regnante aput Assyrios octauo decimo Amynta, aput Sicyonios sexto decimo Corace, aput Argiuos decimo Danao, aput Athenienses quarto Erichthonio.	many other mystical commandments. Moses was succeeded by Joshua son of Nun, who brought the people into the land of promise and settled them there by divine authority, after defeating the nations that held those regions. He ruled the people for twenty-seven years after Moses' death and then he too died, when Amyntas, the eighteenth king, was reigning among the Assyrians, Corax, the sixteenth, among the Sicyonians, Danaus, the tenth, among the Argives, and Erichthonius, the fourth, among the Athenians.

THE RITES OF FALSE GODS INSTITUTED BY THE KINGS OF GREECE IN THE PERIOD FROM ISRAEL'S EXODUS FROM EGYPT TO THE DEATH OF JOSHUA

Greek kings found rites recalling the flood; Dionysus, Apollo's games and Hercules appear.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.12 Per haec tempora, id est ab exitu Israel ex Aegypto usque ad mortem Iesu Naue, per quem populus idem terram promissionis accepit, sacra sunt instituta dis falsis a regibus Graeciae, quae memoriam diluuii et ab eo liberationis hominum uitaeque tunc aerumnosae modo ad alta, modo ad plana migrantium sollemni celebritate reuocarunt. Nam et Lupercorum per sacram uiam adscensum adque descensum sic interpretantur, ut ab eis significari dicant homines, qui propter aquae inundationem summa montium petiuerunt et rursus eadem residente ad ima redierunt. His temporibus Dionysum, qui etiam Liber pater dictus est et post mortem deus habitus, uitem ferunt ostendisse in Attica terra hospiti suo.	During these times—that is, from Israel's departure from Egypt to the death of Joshua son of Nun, through whom that people received the land of promise—the kings of Greece instituted rites to false gods. With solemn festivals these rites recalled the memory of the flood, of humanity's deliverance from it, and of the hard life of that time, when people moved now to the heights, now to the plains. Indeed, they interpret the ascent and descent of the Luperci along the Sacred Way as signifying the people who made for the mountaintops because of the flood waters and came back down to the lowlands when the waters subsided. In these times, they say, Dionysus, who was also called Father Liber and was regarded as a god after his death, showed the vine to his host in Attica.[10]
Tunc Apollini Delphico instituti sunt ludi musici, ut placaretur ira eius, qua putabant adflictas esse sterilitate Graeciae regiones, quia non defenderint templum eius, quod rex Danaus, cum easdem terras bello inuasisset, incendit. Hos autem ludos ut instituerent, oraculo sunt eius admoniti. In Attica uero rex Erichthonius ei ludos primus instituit, nec ei tantum, sed etiam Mineruae, ubi praemium uictoribus oleum ponebatur, quod eius fructus inuentricem Mineruam, sicut uini Liberum tradunt. Per eos annos a rege Xantho Cretensium, cuius aput alios aliud nomen inuenimus, rapta perhibetur Europa, et inde geniti Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon et Minos, quos magis ex eadem muliere filios Iouis esse uulgatum est.	At that time musical games were instituted for Delphic Apollo to appease his anger. They believed that the regions of Greece had been struck with barrenness by that anger because they had not defended his temple, which King Danaus had burned when he invaded those lands in war. It was his oracle that advised them to institute these games. In Attica, King Erichthonius was the first to institute games for him—and not only for him but also for Minerva, at which oil was offered as the prize for the victors, because they record Minerva as the discoverer of the olive's fruit, as they record Liber

10 The Luperci were the priests of the Roman festival of the Lupercalia; the Sacred Way was the main street through the Roman Forum.

LATIN

ENGLISH

as the discoverer of wine. During those years Europa is said to have been carried off by Xanthus, king of the Cretans (we find him called by another name in other authors), and from that union were born Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos, who are more commonly said to be sons of Jupiter by the same woman.

Sed talium deorum cultores illud, quod de rege Cretensium diximus, historicae ueritati, hoc autem, quod de Ioue poetae cantant, theatra concrepant, populi celebrant, uanitati deputant fabularum, ut esset unde ludi fierent placandis numinibus etiam falsis eorum criminibus. His temporibus Hercules in Syria clarus habebatur; sed nimirum alius, non ille, de quo supra, locuti sumus. Secretiore quippe historia plures fuisse dicuntur et Liberi patres et Hercules. Hunc sane Herculem, cuius ingentia duodecim facta numerant, inter quae Antaei Afri necem non commemorant, quod ea res ad alterum Herculem pertinet, in Oeta monte a se ipso incensum produnt suis litteris, cum ea uirtute, qua multa subegerat, morbum tamen, quo languebat, sustinere non posset.

But the worshipers of such gods assign what we said about the king of the Cretans to historical truth, while what the poets sing about Jupiter, what the theaters ring with and the people celebrate, they put down to the emptiness of myths—so that there might be material for games to appease the deities, even with crimes of theirs that are false. In these times Hercules was renowned in Syria—but evidently another Hercules, not the one we spoke of above. For in more recondite history there are said to have been several figures named Father Liber and several named Hercules. As for this Hercules, whose twelve mighty labors they count—among which they do not include the killing of Antaeus the African, since that deed belongs to the other Hercules—their writings record that he burned himself to death on Mount Oeta, because, for all the strength with which he had overcome so much, he could not bear the disease from which he was suffering.

Illo tempore uel rex uel potius tyrannus Busiris suis dis suos hospites immolabat, quem filium perhibent fuisse Neptuni ex matre Libya, filia Epaphi. Verum non credatur hoc stuprum perpetrasse Neptunus, ne di accusentur; sed poetis et theatris ista tribuantur, ut sit unde placentur. Erichthonii regis Atheniensium, cuius nouissimis annis Iesus Naue mortuus reperitur, Vulcanus et Minerua parentes fuisse dicuntur. Sed quoniam Mineruam uirginem uolunt, in amborum contentione Vulcanum commotum effudisse aiunt semen in terram adque inde homini nato ob eam causam tale inditum nomen. Graeca enim lingua ἔρις contentio, χθὼν terra est, ex quibus duobus conpositum uocabulum est Erichthonius.

At that time Busiris, a king or rather a tyrant, used to sacrifice his guests to his gods. They say he was the son of Neptune by Libya, the daughter of Epaphus. But let no one believe that Neptune committed this illicit act, lest the gods be accused; let such things be assigned to the poets and the theaters, so that there may be material for appeasing the gods. Vulcan and Minerva are said to have been the parents of Erichthonius, king of the Athenians, in whose last years Joshua son of Nun is found to have died. But since they want Minerva to be a virgin, they say that during a struggle between the two, Vulcan, in his arousal, spilled his seed on the ground, and that the human being born from it was given this name for that reason. For in Greek ἔρις means "struggle" and χθών means "earth," and the name Erichthonius is compounded from these two words.

Verum, quod fatendum est, refellunt et a suis dis repellunt ista doctiores, qui hanc opinionem fabulosam hinc exortam ferunt, quia in templo Vulcani et Mineruae, quod ambo unum habebant Athenis, expositus inuentus

But, it must be admitted, the more learned refute these stories and keep them away from their gods. They say this mythical notion arose because in the temple of Vulcan and Minerva, which the two

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	est puer dracone inuolutus, qui eum significauit magnum futurum, et propter commune templum, cum essent parentes eius ignoti, Vulcani et Mineruae dictum esse filium. Nominis tamen eius originem fabula illa potius quam ista designat historia. Sed quid ad nos?	shared at Athens, an exposed baby boy was found with a serpent coiled around him, which signified that he would become great. Because of the shared temple, and since his parents were unknown, he was called the son of Vulcan and Minerva. Yet the origin of his name is explained by that myth rather than by this history. But what does it matter to us?
	Hoc in ueracibus libris homines instruat religiosos, illud in fallacibus ludis daemones delectet inpuros; quos tamen illi religiosi tamquam deos colunt, et cum de illis haec negant, ab omni eos crimine purgare non possunt, quoniam ludos eis poscentibus exhibent, ubi turpiter aguntur, quae uelut sapienter negantur, et his falsis ac turpibus di placantur, ubi etsi fabula cantat crimen numinum falsum, delectari tamen falso, crimine crimen est uerum.	Let the history, in truthful books, instruct religious people; let the myth, in lying shows, delight unclean demons. Yet those same religious people worship these demons as gods. And when they deny such things about them, they cannot clear them of all guilt, because they put on shows at the demons' demand, in which the very things they so wisely deny are acted out shamefully, and the gods are appeased by these false and shameful performances. There, even if the myth sings of a false crime of the deities, to take delight in a false crime is a real crime.

WHAT FABLES WERE INVENTED AT THE TIME WHEN JUDGES BEGAN TO RULE THE HEBREWS

In the time of the judges the Greeks invent famous myths and deify more men.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.13	Post mortem Iesu Naue populus Dei iudices habuit, quibus temporibus alternauerunt aput eos et humilitates laborum pro eorum peccatis, et prosperitates consolationum propter miserationem Dei. His temporibus fabulae fictae sunt de Triptolemo, quod iubente Cerere anguibus portatus alitibus indigentibus terris frumenta uolando contulerit; de Minotauro, quod bestia fuerit inclusa Labyrintho, quo cum intrassent homines, inextricabili errore inde exire non poterant; de Centauris, quod equorum hominumque fuerit natura coniuncta; de Cerbero, quod sit triceps inferorum canis; de Phryxo et Helle eius sorore, quod uecti ariete uolauerint;	After the death of Joshua son of Nun, the people of God had judges. In those times they experienced by turns the humiliation of hardships because of their sins and the prosperity of consolations because of God's mercy. In these times myths were invented: about Triptolemus, that at Ceres' command he was carried by winged serpents and, flying through the air, brought grain to lands in need; about the Minotaur, that it was a beast shut up in the Labyrinth, and that people who went in could not find their way out because its maze was impossible to untangle; about the Centaurs, that in them the nature of horses and humans was combined; about Cerberus, that he is the three-headed dog of the underworld; about Phrixus and his sister Helle, that they flew through the air riding on a ram;
	de Gorgone, quod fuerit crinita serpentibus et adspicientes conuertebat in lapides; de Bellerophonte, quod equo pennis uolante sit uectus, qui equus Pegasus dictus est; de Amphione, quod citharae suauitate lapides mulserit et adtraxerit; de fabro Daedalo et eius Icaro filio, quod sibi coaptatis pinnis uolauerint; de Oedipo, quod monstrum quoddam, quae Sphinga dicebatur, humana	about the Gorgon, that her hair was made of snakes and that she turned those who looked at her to stone; about Bellerophon, that he rode a horse that flew on wings, the horse being called Pegasus; about Amphion, that by the sweetness of his lyre he charmed and drew stones to him; about Daedalus the craftsman and his son Icarus, that facie quadrupedem, soluta quae ab illa proponi soleret uelut insolubili quaestione suo praecipitio perire conpulerit; de Antaeo, quem necauit Hercules, quod filius terrae fuerit, propter quod cadens in terram fortior soleret adsurgere; et si qua forte alia praetermisi.

LATIN

Hae fabulae bellum ad usque Troianum, ubi secundum librum Marcus Varro de populi Romani gente finiuit, ex occasione historiarum, quae res ueraciter gestas continent, ita sunt ingeniis hominum fictae, ut non sint obprobriis numinum adfixae. Porro autem quicumque finxerunt a Ioue ad stuprum raptum pulcherrimum puerum Ganymedem, quod nefas rex Tantalus fecit et Ioui fabula tribuit, uel Danaes per imbrem aureum adpetisse concubitum, ubi intellegitur pudicitia mulieris auro fuisse corrupta, quae illis temporibus uel facta uel ficta sunt, aut facta ab aliis et ficta de Ioue, dici non potest quantum mali de hominum praesumserint cordibus, quod possent ista patienter ferre mendacia, quae tamen etiam libenter amplexi sunt. Qui utique quanto deuotius Iouem colunt, tanto eos, qui haec de illo dicere ausi sunt, seuerius punire debuerunt.

Nunc uero non solum eis, qui ista finxerunt, irati non sunt, sed ut talia figmenta etiam in theatris agerent, ipsos deos potius iratos habere timuerunt. His temporibus Latona Apollinem peperit, non illum, cuius oracula solere consuli superius loquebamur, sed illum, qui cum Hercule seruiuit Admeto; qui tamen sic est deus creditus, ut plurimi ac paene omnes unum eundemque Apollinem fuisse opinentur. Tunc et Liber pater bellauit in India, qui multas habuit in exercitu feminas, quae Bacchae appellatae sunt, non tam uirtute nobiles quam furore.

Aliqui sane et uictum scribunt istum Liberum et uinctum; nonnulli et occisum in pugna a Perseo, nec ubi fuerit they flew with wings they had fitted to themselves; about Oedipus, that he forced a certain monster called the Sphinx, a four-footed creature with a human face, to throw herself to her death, by solving the riddle she used to pose as if it could not be solved; about Antaeus, whom Hercules killed, that he was the son of the Earth, and that for this reason whenever he fell to the ground he would rise up stronger; and any others I may have passed over.

ENGLISH

These myths, down to the Trojan War, where Marcus Varro ended his second book On the Race of the Roman People, were invented by human ingenuity, taking their occasion from histories that record what truly happened, in such a way that they did not attach slanders to the deities. But consider whoever invented the story that Jupiter abducted the beautiful boy Ganymede to violate him—a wicked deed that King Tantalus committed and the myth attributed to Jupiter—or that he sought to lie with Danaë by means of a shower of gold, which is understood to mean that a woman's chastity was corrupted by gold. Whether these things were done or invented in those times, or done by others and invented about Jupiter, it is impossible to say how much evil such people presumed to be in human hearts, to think that they could patiently tolerate such lies. And yet people even embraced them gladly. Surely the more devoutly they worship Jupiter, the more severely they ought to have punished those who dared to say such things about him.[11]

As it is, not only are they not angry with those who invented these things, but they were afraid instead of having the gods themselves angry with them, so that they even acted out such fictions in the theaters. In these times Latona gave birth to Apollo—not the one whose oracles we spoke of above as being regularly consulted, but the one who, together with Hercules, was a servant to Admetus. Yet he was so far believed to be a god that most people, indeed almost everyone, think there was one and the same Apollo. At that time, too, Father Liber waged war in India, with many women in his army, called Bacchae, noted not so much for courage as for frenzy.

Some, indeed, write that this Liber was both vanquished and chained; some even that he was

LATIN	ENGLISH
sepultus tacent; et tamen eius uelut dei nomine per inmundos daemones Bacchanalia sacra uel potius sacrilegia sunt instituta, de quorum rabiosa turpitudine post tam multos annos sic senatus erubuit, ut in urbe Roma esse prohiberet. Per ea tempora Perseus et uxor eius Andromeda postea quam sunt mortui, sic eos in caelum receptos esse crediderunt, ut imagines eorum stellis designare eorumque appellare nominibus non erubescerent, non timerent.	killed in battle by Perseus, and they do not keep quiet about where he was buried. And yet in his name, as if he were a god, unclean demons brought about the institution of the Bacchanalian rites—or rather sacrileges—whose raving obscenity, so many years later, so shamed the senate that it banned them from the city of Rome. During those times, after Perseus and his wife Andromeda died, people believed they had been received into heaven, so much so that they felt neither shame nor fear in marking out their images in the stars and calling those stars by their names.[12]

THE THEOLOGICAL POETS

Orpheus, Musaeus and Linus sing of the gods; Ino and Melicertes become gods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.14 Per idem temporis interuallum exstiterunt poetae, qui etiam theologi dicerentur, quoniam de dis carmina faciebant, sed talibus dis, qui licet magni homines, tamen homines fuerunt aut mundi huius, quem uerus Deus fecit, elementa sunt aut in principatibus et potestatibus pro uoluntate Creatoris et suis meritis ordinati, et si quid de uno uero Deo inter multa uana et falsa cecinerunt, colendo cum illo alios, qui di non sunt, eisque exhibendo famulatum, qui uni tantum debetur Deo, non ei utique rite seruierunt nec a fabuloso deorum suorum dedecore etiam sibi se abstinere potuerunt — Orpheus, Musaeus, Linus. Verum isti theologi deos coluerunt, non pro dis culti sunt; quamuis Orpheum nescio quo modo infernis sacris uel potius sacrilegiis praeficere soleat ciuitas inpiorum.	During the same period there arose poets who were also called theologians, because they composed poems about the gods. But these were gods of a certain kind: either men—great men, but still men—or elements of this world, which the true God made, or beings set among the principalities and powers according to the Creator's will and their own merits. And if, amid much that was empty and false, they sang something about the one true God, they certainly did not serve him rightly, since they worshiped alongside him others who are not gods and paid them the service owed to the one God alone; nor could they keep even themselves from the mythical disgrace of their gods. These poets were Orpheus, Musaeus and Linus. But these theologians worshiped gods; they were not worshiped as gods—although the city of the ungodly does, somehow or other, make Orpheus the presiding figure of the rites, or rather the sacrileges, of the underworld.[13]
Uxor autem regis Athamantis, quae uocabatur Ino, et eius filius Melicertes praecipitio spontaneo in mari perierunt et opinione hominum in deos relati sunt, sicut alii homines eorum temporum, Castor et Pollux. Illam sane Melicertis matrem Leucothean Graeci, Matutam Latini uocauerunt, utrique tamen putantes deam.	The wife of King Athamas, whose name was Ino, and her son Melicertes perished by deliberately throwing themselves into the sea, and in popular belief they were enrolled among the gods, as were other people of their time, Castor and Pollux. That mother of Melicertes the Greeks called Leucothea and the Latins Matuta, but both peoples considered her a goddess.

11 This work of Varro is lost.
12 The Roman senate suppressed the Bacchanalia by decree in 186 BC.
13 Orpheus, Musaeus and Linus were legendary early Greek poets and singers to whom religious poems were attributed.

THE FALL OF THE KINGDOM OF THE ARGIVES, AT THE TIME WHEN PICUS SON OF SATURN FIRST RECEIVED THE KINGDOM AMONG THE LAURENTINES

The Laurentine kingdom begins with Picus, son of Saturn, while Deborah judges Israel.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.15	Per ea tempora regnum finitum est Argiuorum, translatum ad Mycenas, unde fuit Agamemnon, et exortum est regnum Laurentum, ubi Saturni filius Picus regnum primus accepit, iudicante aput Hebraeos femina Debbora; sed per illam Dei spiritus id agebat; nam etiam prophetissa erat, cuius prophetia minus aperta est, quam ut possimus eam sine diuturna expositione de Christo demonstrare prolatam. Iam ergo regnabant Laurentes utique in Italia, ex quibus euidentior ducitur origo Romana post Graecos; et tamen adhuc regnum Assyrium permanebat, ubi erat rex uicensimus et tertius Lampares, cum primus Laurentum Picus esse coepisset. De huius Pici patre Saturno uiderint quid sentiant talium deorum cultores, qui negant hominem fuisse; de quo et alii scripserunt, quod ante.	During those times the kingdom of the Argives came to an end and was transferred to Mycenae, the home of Agamemnon. And the kingdom of the Laurentines arose, where Picus son of Saturn was the first to receive the throne, while a woman, Deborah, was judging among the Hebrews. But it was the Spirit of God who was acting through her, for she was also a prophetess—though her prophecy is too obscure for us to show, without a long explanation, that it was spoken about Christ. So the Laurentines were by then reigning in Italy, and it is from them, after the Greeks, that the origin of Rome is more clearly traced. And yet the Assyrian kingdom still endured, where Lampares was the twenty-third king when Picus became the first king of the Laurentines. As for Picus' father, Saturn, let the worshipers of such gods, who deny he was a man, decide what they think. Others too have written of him that, before[14]
	Picum filium suum in Italia ipse regnauerit, et Vergilius notioribus litteris dicit: Is genus indocile et dispersum montibus altis Conposuit legesque dedit Latiumque uocari Maluit, his quoniam latuisset tutus in oris. Aurea quae perhibent illo sub rege fuere Saecula.	his son Picus, he himself reigned in Italy; and Virgil says, in better-known writings: "He brought together the unruly race, scattered over the high mountains, and gave them laws, and chose that the land be called Latium, since he had lain hidden safely on these shores. Under that king were the ages they call golden."[15]
	Sed haec poetica opinentur esse figmenta et Pici patrem Stercen potius fuisse adseuerent, a quo peritissimo agricola inuentum ferunt, ut fimo animalium agri fecundarentur, quod ab eius nomine stercus est dictum; hunc quidam Stercutium uocatum ferunt. Qualibet autem ex causa eum Saturnum appellare uoluerint, certe tamen hunc Stercen siue Stercutium merito agriculturae fecerunt deum. Picum quoque similiter eius filium in talium deorum numerum receperunt, quem praeclarum augurem et belligeratorem fuisse adserunt. Picus Faunum genuit, Laurentum regem secundum; etiam iste deus illis uel est uel fuit. Hos ante Troianum bellum diuinos honores mortuis hominibus detulerunt.	But let them think these are poetic fictions, and let them insist instead that Picus' father was Sterces, a highly skilled farmer, who, they say, discovered that fields could be made fertile with animal dung, which is called stercus after his name; some say he was called Stercutius. Whatever reason they had for wanting to call him Saturn, they certainly made this Sterces, or Stercutius, a god for his services to agriculture. Likewise they admitted his son Picus into the number of such gods, claiming that he was an outstanding augur and warrior. Picus fathered Faunus, the second king of the Laurentines; he too is, or was, a god to them. These dead men they honored with divine honors before the Trojan War.

14 Deborah's story is told in Judges 4–5.
15 Virgil, Aeneid 8.321–325; the name Latium is derived from latuisset, "he had lain hidden."

DIOMEDES, MADE A GOD AFTER THE FALL OF TROY, WHOSE COMPANIONS WERE BELIEVED TO HAVE BEEN TURNED INTO BIRDS

After Troy, Diomedes is deified and his companions are said to have become birds.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.16	Troia uero euersa excidio illo usquequaque cantato puerisque notissimo, quod et magnitudine sui et scriptorum excellentibus linguis insigniter diffamatum adque uulgatum est gestumque regnante iam Latino Fauni filio, ex quo Latinorum regnum dici coepit Laurentumque cessauit, Graeci uictores deletam Troiam relinquentes et ad propria remeantes diuersis et horrendis cladibus dilacerati adque contriti sunt; et tamen etiam ex eis deorum suorum numerum auxerunt. Nam et Diomeden fecerunt deum, quem poena diuinitus inrogata perhibent ad suos non reuertisse: eiusque socios in uolucres fuisse conuersos non fabuloso poeticoque mendacio, sed historica adtestatione confirmant; quibus nec deus, ut putant, factus humanam reuocare naturam uel ipse potuit uel certe a Ioue suo rege tamquam caelicola nouicius inpetrauit.	Then Troy was overthrown, in that destruction sung of everywhere and familiar to every schoolchild. Both by its own magnitude and through the brilliant pens of writers it has become famous and widely known. It happened when Latinus son of Faunus was already reigning, after whom the kingdom began to be called that of the Latins, and the name of the Laurentines ceased. The victorious Greeks, leaving Troy in ruins and returning home, were torn apart and crushed by various horrible disasters; and yet from among them, too, they increased the number of their gods. For they made Diomedes a god, though they say that, by a punishment sent from heaven, he never returned to his people. And they affirm, not with mythical and poetic falsehood but with historical testimony, that his companions were turned into birds. Yet Diomedes, though made a god, as they suppose, could not restore them to human nature himself, nor did he obtain this from Jupiter, his king, as a newcomer among the dwellers in heaven.
	Quin etiam templum eius esse aiunt in insula Diomedea, non longe a monte Gargano, qui est in Apulia, et hoc templum circumuolare adque incolere has alites tam mirabili obsequio, ut aquam inpleant et adspergant; et eo si Graeci uenerint uel Graecorum stirpe prognati, non solum quietas esse, uerum et insuper adulare; si autem alienigenas uiderint, subuolare ad capita tamque grauibus ictibus, ut etiam perimant, uulnerare. Nam duris et grandibus rostris satis ad haec proelia perhibentur armatae.	They even say that his temple stands on the island of Diomedea, not far from Mount Garganus in Apulia, and that these birds fly around this temple and dwell in it with such wonderful devotion that they take up water and sprinkle it. If Greeks or people of Greek descent come there, the birds are not only calm but even fawn on them; but if they see foreigners, they fly up at their heads and wound them with such heavy blows that they even kill them. For they are said to be well armed for these battles with hard, large beaks.

WHAT VARRO REPORTS ABOUT UNBELIEVABLE TRANSFORMATIONS OF HUMAN BEINGS

Varro tells of Circe and of Arcadians turned into wolves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.17	Hoc Varro ut adstruat, commemorat alia non minus incredibilia de illa maga famosissima Circe, quae socios quoque Ulixis mutauit in bestias, et de Arcadibus, qui sorte ducti tranatabant quoddam stagnum adque ibi conuertebantur in lupos et cum similibus feris per illius regionis deserta uiuebant. Si autem carne non	To support this, Varro relates other things no less incredible about that most notorious sorceress Circe, who also changed the companions of Ulysses into beasts. He also tells of the Arcadians who, chosen by lot, used to swim across a certain pool, were turned into wolves there, and lived

LATIN	ENGLISH
uescerentur humana, rursus post nouem annos eodem renatato stagno reformabantur in homines. Denique etiam nominatim expressit quendam Demaenetum gustasse de sacrificio, quod Arcades immolato puero deo suo Lycaeo facere solerent, et in lupum fuisse mutatum et anno decimo in figuram propriam restitutum pugilatum sese exercuisse et Olympiaco uicisse certamine.	with wild animals like themselves in the wilderness of that region. If they did not eat human flesh, after nine years they swam back across the same pool and were changed back into men. He even names one particular man, Demaenetus. Demaenetus, he says, tasted the sacrifice that the Arcadians used to offer to their god Lycaeus by slaughtering a boy, and was changed into a wolf. In the tenth year he was restored to his own shape, trained as a boxer, and won at the Olympic games.[16]
Nec idem propter aliud arbitratur historicus in Arcadia tale nomen adfictum Pani Lycaeo et loui Lycaeo nisi propter hanc in lupos hominum mutationem, quod eam nisi ui diuina fieri non putarent. Lupus enim Graece λύκος dicitur, unde Lycaei nomen apparet inflexum. Romanos etiam Lupercos ex illorum mysteriorum ueluti semine dicit exortos.	The same historian thinks that the name "Lycaean" was given in Arcadia to Pan Lycaeus and Jupiter Lycaeus for no other reason than this transformation of men into wolves, because people thought it could happen only by divine power. For a wolf is called λύκος [lykos] in Greek, and the name Lycaeus is evidently derived from it. He also says that the Roman Luperci sprang, as it were, from the seed of those mysteries.

WHAT WE SHOULD BELIEVE ABOUT THE TRANSFORMATIONS THAT SEEM TO HAPPEN TO HUMAN BEINGS THROUGH THE ART OF DEMONS

Demons cannot truly transform bodies; they create illusions through a person's phantom image.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.18 Sed de ista tanta ludificatione daemonum nos quid dicamus, qui haec legent, fortassis exspectent. Et quid dicemus, nisi de medio Babylonis esse fugiendum? Quod praeceptum propheticum ita spiritaliter intellegitur, ut de huius saeculi ciuitate, quae profecto et angelorum et hominum societas inpiorum est, fidei passibus, quae per dilectionem operatur, in Deum uiuum proficiendo fugiamus. Quanto quippe in haec ima potestatem daemonum maiorem uidemus, tanto tenacius Mediatori est inhaerendum, per quem de imis ad summa conscendimus. Si enim dixerimus ea non esse credenda, non desunt etiam nunc, qui eius modi quaedam uel certissima audisse uel etiam expertos se esse adseuerent.	But those who read this may perhaps expect us to say something about such great trickery on the part of the demons. And what shall we say, except that we must flee from the midst of Babylon? This prophetic command is understood spiritually. It means that we should flee from the city of this world, which is in fact a fellowship of ungodly angels and men. We flee by advancing toward the living God with the steps of faith, which works through love. For the greater the power of the demons we see in these lower regions, the more firmly we must cling to the Mediator, through whom we climb from the lowest to the highest. If we say that these things are not to be believed, there are even now people who claim to have heard of such things on the surest authority, or even to have experienced them.[17]
Nam et nos cum essemus in Italia audiebamus talia de quadam regione illarum partium, ubi stabularias	For when we were in Italy, we too used to hear such things about a certain region in those parts.

16 Lycaeus is Zeus (Jupiter) of Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia. Legend linked his cult with human sacrifice and with men turned into wolves.

17 Jeremiah 51:6 (compare Isaiah 48:20). "Faith, which works through love" is from Galatians 5:6.

LATIN

mulieres inbutas his malis artibus in caseo dare solere dicebant quibus uellent seu possent uiatoribus, unde in iumenta ilico uerterentur et necessaria quaeque portarent postque perfuncta opera iterum ad se redirent; nec tamen in eis mentem fieri bestialem, sed rationalem humanamque seruari, sicut Apuleius in libris, quos asini aurei titulo inscripsit, sibi ipsi accidisse, ut accepto ueneno humano animo permanente asinus fieret, aut indicauit aut finxit.

ENGLISH

People said that women who kept inns there, steeped in these wicked arts, would give something in cheese to whatever travelers they wished or could. The travelers were at once turned into beasts of burden and carried whatever was needed, and after the work was done they returned to themselves again. Yet their minds did not become bestial but remained rational and human. In the same way Apuleius, in the books he entitled The Golden Ass, either reported or invented that it happened to him that, after taking a potion, he became an ass while keeping his human mind.[18]

Haec uel falsa sunt uel tam inusitata, ut merito non credantur. Firmissime tamen credendum est omnipotentem Deum posse omnia facere quae uoluerit, siue uindicando siue praestando, nec daemones aliquid operari secundum naturae suae potentiam (quia et ipsa angelica creatura est, licet proprio uitio sit maligna) nisi quod ille permiserit, cuius iudicia occulta sunt multa, iniusta nulla. Nec sane daemones naturas creant, si aliquid tale faciunt, de qualibus factis ista uertitur quaestio; sed specie tenus, quae a uero Deo sunt creata, commutant, ut uideantur esse quod non sunt.

These things are either false or so extraordinary that they are rightly disbelieved. Yet we must believe most firmly that almighty God can do whatever he wills, whether in punishing or in bestowing favor. We must also believe that demons accomplish nothing by the power of their nature except what he permits. That nature too is an angelic creation, though it has become evil by its own fault. Many of God's judgments are hidden, but none is unjust. Nor do demons create natures, if they do anything of the kind this question concerns. Rather, they change things created by the true God in appearance only, so that they seem to be what they are not.

Non itaque solum animum, sed ne corpus quidem ulla ratione crediderim daemonum arte uel potestate in membra et liniamenta bestialia ueraciter posse conuerti, sed phantasticum hominis, quod etiam cogitando siue somniando per rerum innumerabilia genera uariatur et, cum corpus non sit, corporum tamen similes mira celeritate formas capit, sopitis aut obpressis corporeis hominis sensibus ad aliorum sensum nescio quo ineffabili modo figura corporea posse perduci; ita ut corpora ipsa hominum alicubi iaceant, uiuentia quidem, sed multo grauius adque uehementius quam somno suis sensibus obseratis; phantasticum autem illud ueluti corporatum in alicuius animalis effigie appareat sensibus alienis talisque etiam sibi esse homo uideatur, sicut talis sibi uideri posset in somnis, et portare onera; quae onera si uera sunt corpora, portantur a daemonibus, ut inludatur hominibus, partim uera onerum corpora, partim iumentorum falsa cernentibus.

I would not believe, then, on any account, that the art or power of demons could really transform not only the mind but even the body into the limbs and features of a beast. What I believe is this. There is a person's phantom self, which takes on the shapes of countless kinds of things even in thought or in dreams. Though it is not a body, it takes on forms like bodies with marvelous speed. While the person's bodily senses are lulled or suppressed, this phantom can, in some indescribable way, be conveyed in bodily shape to the senses of others. The people's actual bodies lie somewhere, alive indeed, but with their senses shut off far more heavily and forcibly than in sleep. Meanwhile that phantom, as if embodied, appears to the senses of others in the likeness of some animal. The man even seems to himself to be such an animal, as he might seem so to himself in dreams, and to carry loads. If these loads are real bodies, 18 Apuleius was a North African writer of the 2nd century AD. His novel, also called the Metamorphoses, tells of a man turned into an ass.

LATIN

ENGLISH

they are carried by the demons, so as to deceive people who see partly the real bodies of the loads and partly the false bodies of the pack animals.

Nam quidam nomine Praestantius patri suo contigisse indicabat, ut uenenum illud per caseum in domo sua sumeret et iaceret in lecto suo quasi dormiens, qui tamen nullo modo poterat excitari. Post aliquot autem dies eum uelut euigilasse dicebat et quasi somnia narrasse quae passus est, caballum se scilicet factum annonam inter alia iumenta baiulasse militibus, quae dicitur Retica, quoniam ad Retias deportatur. Quod ita, ut narrauit, factum fuisse conpertum est; quae tamen ei sua somnia uidebantur. Indicauit et alius se domi suae per noctem, antequam requiesceret, uidisse uenientem ad se philosophum quendam sibi notissimum sibique exposuisse nonnulla Platonica, quae antea rogatus exponere noluisset.

A man named Praestantius used to tell what had happened to his father. In his own house his father took that drug in cheese and lay in his bed as if asleep, yet nothing could wake him. After several days, he said, his father woke up, as it were, and told what he had experienced as though it had been a dream. He said that he had become a horse and, along with other pack animals, had carried supplies for the soldiers—the provisions called Raetian, because they are carried to Raetia. It was found that this had happened just as he told it, yet to him it seemed to have been his own dream. Another man also reported something. In his own house at night, before he went to sleep, he saw a philosopher whom he knew very well come to him and explain some Platonic doctrines that he had earlier refused to explain when asked.[19]

Et cum ab eodem philosopho quaesitum fuisset, quur in domo eius fecerit, quod in domo sua petenti negauerat: Non feci, inquit, sed me fecisse somniaui. Ac per hoc alteri per imaginem phantasticam exhibitum est uigilanti, quod alter uidit in somnis.

That same philosopher was asked why he had done in the other man's house what he had refused to do in his own house when asked. He said, "I did not do it, but I dreamed that I did." And so what one man saw in his dreams was presented to the other, while awake, by means of a phantom image.

Haec ad nos non quibuscumque, qualibus credere putaremus indignum, sed eis referentibus peruenerunt, quos nobis non existimaremus fuisse mentitos. Proinde quod homines dicuntur mandatumque est litteris ab dis uel potius daemonibus Arcadibus in lupos solere conuerti, et quod Carminibus Circe socios mutauit Ulixi, secundum istum modum mihi uidetur fieri potuisse, quem dixi, si tamen factum est. Diomedeas autem uolucres, quando quidem genus earum per successionem propaginis durare perhibetur, non mutatis hominibus factas, sed subtractis credo fuisse subpositas, sicut cerua pro Iphigenia, regis Agamemnonis filia. Neque enim daemonibus iudicio Dei permissis huius modi praestigiae difficiles esse potuerunt; sed quia illa uirgo postea uiua reperta est, subpositam pro illa esse ceruam facile cognitum est.

These stories reached us not from just anyone, from people we would think unworthy of belief, but from those who we judged would not have lied to us. People say, and it has been committed to writing, that Arcadians used to be turned into wolves by the gods, or rather by demons, and that "Circe changed the companions of Ulysses by her spells." It seems to me that such things could have happened in the way I have described, if indeed they happened at all. As for the birds of Diomedes, their species is said to continue through successive generations. So I believe they were not made by changing men, but were substituted for men who had been removed, as a deer was substituted for Iphigenia, daughter of King Agamemnon. Deceptions of this kind could not have been difficult for demons when God's judgment permitted them. But because that maiden was later found alive, it 19 Raetia was a Roman province in the Alps, roughly modern eastern Switzerland and southern Germany.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	was easily recognized that a deer had been substituted for her.[20]
Socii uero Diomedis quia nusquam subito conparuerunt et postea nullo loco apparuerunt, perdentibus eos ultoribus angelis malis, in eas aues, quae pro illis sunt occulte ex aliis locis, ubi est hoc genus auium, ad ea loca perductae ac repente subpositae, creduntur esse conuersi. Quod autem Diomedis templo aquam rostris adferunt et adspergunt, et quod blandiuntur Graecigenis adque alienigenas persequuntur, mirandum non est fieri daemonum instinctu, quorum interest persuadere deum factum esse Diomeden ad decipiendos homines, ut falsos deos cum ueri Dei iniuria multos colant et hominibus mortuis, qui nec cum uiuerent uere uixerunt, templis altaribus, sacrificiis sacerdotibus (quae omnia cum recta sunt non nisi uni Deo uiuo et uero debentur) inseruiant.	The companions of Diomedes suddenly vanished and afterward appeared nowhere, because the evil angels destroyed them as avengers. For this reason they are believed to have been turned into those birds. In fact the birds were secretly brought to those places from other places where this species lives, and suddenly put in their place. The birds carry water in their beaks to the temple of Diomedes and sprinkle it, and they fawn on those of Greek descent and attack foreigners. It is no wonder that this happens at the instigation of demons. It is in their interest to persuade people that Diomedes was made a god, in order to deceive them. In this way people worship many false gods, to the insult of the true God, and serve dead men, who did not truly live even when they were alive, with temples and altars, sacrifices and priests. When these things are rightly offered, all of them are owed only to the one living and true God.

THAT AENEAS CAME TO ITALY WHEN ABDON WAS JUDGE OVER THE HEBREWS

Aeneas reaches Italy and is deified; Codrus dies for Athens.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.19 Eo tempore post captam Troiam adque deletam Aeneas cum uiginti nauibus, quibus portabantur reliquiae Troianorum, in Italiam uenit, regnante ibi Latino et aput Athenienses Menestheo, aput Sicyonios Polyphide, aput Assyrios Tautane, aput Hebraeos autem iudex Labdon fuit. Mortuo autem Latino regnauit Aeneas tribus annis, eisdem in supradictis locis manentibus regibus, nisi quod Sicyoniorum iam Pelasgus erat et Hebraeorum iudex Samson; qui cum mirabiliter fortis esset, putatus est Hercules. Sed Aenean, quoniam quando mortuus est non conparuit, deum sibi fecerunt Latini. Sabini etiam regem suum primum Sancum siue, ut aliqui appellant, Sanctum, rettulerunt in deos. Per idem tempus Codrus rex Atheniensium Peloponnensibus eiusdem hostibus ciuitatis se interficiendum ignotus obiecit; et factum est. Hoc modo eum praedicant patriam liberasse.	At that time, after Troy had been captured and destroyed, Aeneas came to Italy with twenty ships carrying what remained of the Trojans. Latinus was reigning there, Menestheus among the Athenians, Polyphides among the Sicyonians, and Tautanes among the Assyrians, while among the Hebrews Abdon was judge. When Latinus died, Aeneas reigned for three years. The same kings remained in the places mentioned, except that the Sicyonians now had Pelasgus and the Hebrews had Samson as judge. Because Samson was marvelously strong, he was thought to be Hercules. Aeneas vanished when he died, and so the Latins made him their god. The Sabines also enrolled their first king, Sancus, or Sanctus as some call him, among the gods. About the same time Codrus, king of the Athenians, offered himself in disguise to be killed by the Peloponnesians, who were enemies of that city, and so it was done. In this way, they proclaim, he set his country free.[21]

20 The quoted line is from Virgil, Eclogues 8.70. In the legend, Artemis replaced Iphigenia with a deer at the moment of her sacrifice at Aulis.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Responsum enim acceperant Peloponnenses tum demum se superaturos, si eorum regem non occidissent. Fefellit ergo eos habitu pauperis apparendo et in suam necem per iurgium prouocando. Unde ait Vergilius: Et iurgia Codri. Et hunc Athenienses tamquam deum sacrificiorum honore coluerunt. Quarto Latinorum rege Siluio Aeneae filio, non de Creusa, de qua fuit Ascanius, qui tertius ibi regnauit, sed de Lauinia Latini filia, quem postumum Aeneas dicitur habuisse, Assyriorum autem uicensimo et nono Oneo et Melantho Atheniensium sexto decimo, iudice autem Hebraeorum Heli sacerdote regnum Sicyoniorum consumtum est, quod per annos nongentos quinquaginta et nouem traditur fuisse porrectum.	The Peloponnesians had received an oracle that they would win only if they did not kill the Athenians' king. So Codrus deceived them by appearing dressed as a poor man and provoking them, by a quarrel, to kill him. Hence Virgil speaks of "the quarrels of Codrus." And the Athenians worshiped him as a god with the honor of sacrifices. The fourth king of the Latins was Silvius, son of Aeneas. He was not the son of Creusa, mother of Ascanius, who reigned there third, but of Lavinia, daughter of Latinus; Aeneas is said to have had him as a posthumous son. The twenty-ninth king of the Assyrians was Oneus, the sixteenth king of the Athenians was Melanthus, and the judge of the Hebrews was Eli the priest. At that time the kingdom of the Sicyonians came to an end, having lasted, it is said, for nine hundred and fifty-nine years.[22]

THE SUCCESSION OF THE ROYAL LINE AMONG THE ISRAELITES AFTER THE TIME OF THE JUDGES

Israel's kings begin with Saul; the Silvii rule in Latium and Alba is founded.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.20 Mox eisdem per loca memorata regnantibus Israelitarum regnum finito tempore iudicum a Saule rege sumsit exordium, quo tempore fuit propheta Samuel. Ab illo igitur tempore hi reges Latinorum esse coeperunt, quos cognominabant Siluios; ab eo quippe, qui filius Aeneae primus dictus est Siluius, ceteris subsecutis et propria nomina inponebantur et hoc non defuit cognomentum; sicut longe postea Caesares cognominati sunt, qui successerunt Caesari Augusto. Reprobato autem Saule, ne quisquam ex eius stirpe regnaret, eoque defuncto Dauid successit in regnum post annos a Saulis imperio quadraginta. Tunc Athenienses habere deinde reges post Codri interitum destiterunt et magistratus habere coeperunt administrandae rei publicae. Post Dauid, qui etiam ipse quadraginta regnauit annos, filius eius Salomon rex Israelitarum fuit, qui templum illud nobilissimum Dei Hierosolymitanum condidit.	Soon afterward, while the same kings were reigning in the places mentioned, the period of the judges ended and the kingdom of the Israelites began with King Saul. At that time Samuel was the prophet. From that time, then, began the kings of the Latins whom they surnamed Silvii. The son of Aeneas was the first to be called Silvius. The kings who followed him were given their own names, but none lacked this surname, just as much later those who succeeded Caesar Augustus were surnamed Caesars. Saul was rejected, so that none of his line should reign. After his death David succeeded to the kingdom, forty years after the start of Saul's rule. At that time the Athenians, after the death of Codrus, ceased to have kings and began to have magistrates to administer the commonwealth. After David, who also reigned forty years, his son Solomon was king of the Israelites. Solomon built that most renowned temple of God in Jerusalem.
Cuius tempore aput Latinos condita est Alba, ex qua deinceps non Latinorum, sed Albanorum reges appellari, in eodem tamen Latio, coeperunt. Salomoni successit	In his time Alba was founded among the Latins. From then on its kings began to be called kings not of the Latins but of the Albans, though still in 21 Abdon (Augustine's "Labdon") was a judge of Israel; see Judges 12:13–15.

22 Virgil, Eclogues 5.11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
filius eius Roboam, sub quo in duo regna populus ille diuisus est, et singulae partes suos singulos reges habere coeperunt.	the same Latium. Solomon was succeeded by his son Rehoboam, under whom that people was divided into two kingdoms, and each part began to have its own kings.

THE KINGS OF LATIUM, OF WHOM THE FIRST, AENEAS, AND THE TWELFTH, AVENTINUS, WERE MADE GODS

Latium's kings lead to Romulus; the Assyrian empire ends and Romulus and Remus are born.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.21 Latium post Aenean, quem deum fecerunt, undecim reges habuit, quorum nullus deus factus est. Auentinus autem, qui duodecimo loco Aenean sequitur, cum esset prostratus in bello et sepultus in eo monte, qui etiam nunc eius nomine nuncupatur, deorum talium, quales sibi faciebant, numero est additus. Alii sane noluerunt eum in proelio scribere occisum, sed non conparuisse dixerunt; nec ex eius uocabulo appellatum montem, sed ex aduentu auium dictum Auentinum. Post hunc non est deus factus in Latio nisi Romulus conditor Romae. Inter istum autem et illum reges reperiuntur duo, quorum primus est, ut eum Vergiliano uersu eloquar:	After Aeneas, whom they made a god, Latium had eleven kings, and none of them was made a god. Aventinus, however, who comes twelfth after Aeneas, was struck down in war and buried on the hill that still bears his name. He was added to the number of gods of the kind they made for themselves. Some, indeed, would not write that he was killed in battle, but said that he vanished. They also said that the hill was not named after him but was called the Aventine from the coming (adventus) of birds. After him no one was made a god in Latium except Romulus, the founder of Rome. Between these two, however, we find two kings. The first of them, to put it in a line of Virgil, is:
Proximus ille Procas, Troianae gloria gentis. Cuius tempore quia iam quodam modo Roma parturiebatur, illud omnium regnorum maximum Assyrium finem tantae diuturnitatis accepit. Ad Medos quippe translatum est post annos ferme mille trecentos quinque, ut etiam Beli, qui Ninum genuit et illic paruo contentus imperio primus rex fuit, tempora conputentur. Procas autem regnauit ante Amulium. Porro Amulius fratris sui Numitoris filiam, Rheam nomine, quae etiam Ilia uocabatur, Romuli matrem, Vestalem uirginem fecerat, quam uolunt de Marte geminos concepisse, isto modo stuprum eius honorantes uel excusantes, et adhibentes argumentum, quod infantes expositos lupa nutriuerit.	"Next is Procas, glory of the Trojan race." In his time Rome was already, in a way, in labor to be born, and that greatest of all kingdoms, the Assyrian, came to the end of its long duration. For it passed to the Medes after about one thousand three hundred and five years, if we also count the reign of Belus. Belus fathered Ninus and was the first king there, content with a small empire. Procas reigned before Amulius. Amulius had made a Vestal virgin of his brother Numitor's daughter, named Rhea and also called Ilia, who was the mother of Romulus. They claim that she conceived twins by Mars, and in this way they honor or excuse her loss of chastity. As proof they offer the story that a she-wolf nursed the infants when they had been exposed.[23]
Hoc enim genus bestiae ad Martem existimant pertinere, ut uidelicet ideo lupa credatur admouisse ubera paruulis, quia filios domini sui Martis agnouit; quamuis non desint qui dicant, cum expositi uagientes iacerent, a nescio qua primum meretrice fuisse collectos et primas eius suxisse mamillas (meretrices autem lupas uocabant, unde etiam	For they consider this kind of animal to belong to Mars. So the she-wolf is evidently believed to have offered her teats to the little ones because she recognized them as the sons of her master Mars. Yet some say otherwise. They say that when the in-

23 Virgil, Aeneid 6.767.

LATIN	ENGLISH
nunc turpia loca earum lupanaria nuncupantur), et eos postea ad Faustulum peruenisse pastorem adque ab eius Acca uxore nutritos. Quamquam si ad arguendum hominem regem, qui eos in aquam proici crudeliter iusserat, eis infantibus, per quos tanta ciuitas condenda fuerat, de aqua diuinitus liberatis per lactantem feram Deus uoluit subuenire, quid mirum est?	fants lay crying after being exposed, they were first picked up by some prostitute or other and sucked her breasts first. Prostitutes used to be called lupae, "she-wolves," which is why their shameful houses are still called lupanaria. Afterward, they say, the twins came to the shepherd Faustulus and were nursed by his wife Acca. And yet God may have wished to rebuke the human king who had cruelly ordered them thrown into the water. He may have chosen to aid, through a nursing wild animal, those infants whom he had divinely rescued from the water and through whom so great a city was to be founded. What is surprising about that?
Amulio successit in regnum Latiare frater eius Numitor, auus Romuli, cuius Numitoris primo anno condita est Roma; ac per hoc cum suo deinceps, id est Romulo, nepote regnauit.	Amulius was succeeded in the kingdom of Latium by his brother Numitor, grandfather of Romulus. Rome was founded in the first year of this Numitor, and so from then on he reigned together with his grandson, that is, Romulus.

THAT ROME WAS FOUNDED AT THE TIME THE ASSYRIAN KINGDOM CAME TO AN END AND HEZEKIAH WAS REIGNING IN JUDAH

Rome, a second Babylon, is founded to subdue and unite the world.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.22 Ne multis morer, condita est ciuitas Roma uelut altera Babylon et uelut prioris filia Babylonis, per quam Deo placuit orbem debellare terrarum et in unam societatem rei publicae legumque perductum longe lateque pacare. Erant enim iam populi ualidi et fortes et armis gentes exercitatae, quae non facile cederent, et quas opus esset ingentibus periculis et uastatione utrimque non parua adque horrendo labore superari. Nam quando regnum Assyriorum totam paene Asiam subiugauit, licet bellando sit factum, non tamen multum asperis et difficilibus bellis fieri potuit, quia rudes adhuc ad resistendum gentes erant nec tam multae uel magnae.	To be brief: the city of Rome was founded like a second Babylon, the daughter, as it were, of the former Babylon. Through Rome it pleased God to subdue the world and to pacify it far and wide by bringing it into a single fellowship of commonwealth and laws. For by then there were strong and vigorous peoples and nations trained in arms, who would not easily yield. They had to be overcome at great risk, with no small devastation on both sides and with dreadful toil. When the kingdom of the Assyrians subjugated almost all of Asia, this was done by warfare, but it could be done without very harsh and difficult wars. The nations were still unskilled at resistance, and they were neither so many nor so great.
Si quidem post illud maximum adque uniuersale diluuium, cum in arca Noe octo soli homines euaserunt, anni non multo amplius quam mille transierant, quando Ninus Asiam totam excepta India subiugauit. Roma uero tot gentes Orientis et Occidentis, quas imperio Romano subditas cernimus, non ea celeritate ac facilitate perdomuit, quoniam paulatim crescendo robustas eas et bellicosas, quaqua uersum dilatabatur, inuenit. Tempore igitur, quo Roma condita est, populus Israel habebat in	That greatest, universal flood, when only eight people escaped in Noah's ark, had happened not much more than a thousand years before Ninus subjugated all of Asia except India. Rome, however, did not subdue so quickly or easily the many nations of East and West that we see subject to Roman rule. It grew little by little, and wherever it expanded it found them strong and warlike. At the time when Rome was founded, then, the people of terra promissionis annos septingentos decem et octo. Ex quibus uiginti septem pertinent ad Iesum Naue, deinde ad tempus iudicum trecenti uiginti nouem. Ex quo autem reges ibi esse coeperant, anni erant trecenti sexaginta duo.	Israel had been in the promised land for seven hundred and eighteen years. Of these, twenty-seven belong to Joshua son of Nun, and then three hundred and twenty-nine to the period of the judges. Since kings had begun to reign there, three hundred and sixty-two years had passed.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Et rex tunc erat in Iuda, cuius nomen erat Achaz uel, sicut alii conputant, qui ei successit Ezechias, quem quidem constat optimum et piissimum regem Romuli regnasse temporibus. In ea uero Hebraei populi parte, quae appellabatur Israel, regnare coeperat Osee.	At that time the king in Judah was named Ahaz, or, as others reckon, it was his successor Hezekiah. It is agreed that Hezekiah, an excellent and most devout king, reigned in the time of Romulus. In the part of the Hebrew people called Israel, Hoshea had begun to reign.

THE ERYTHRAEAN SIBYL, WHO IS KNOWN AMONG THE OTHER SIBYLS FOR HAVING SUNG MANY THINGS CLEARLY ABOUT CHRIST

The Erythraean Sibyl's acrostic spells "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior" and forms the fish sign.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.23 Eodem tempore nonnulli Sibyllam Erythraeam uaticinatam ferunt. Sibyllas autem Varro prodit plures fuisse, non unam. Haec sane Erythraea Sibylla quaedam de Christo manifesta conscripsit; quod etiam nos prius in Latina lingua uersibus male Latinis et non stantibus legimus per nescio cuius interpretis inperitiam, sicut post cognouimus. Nam uir clarissimus. Flaccianus, qui etiam proconsul fuit, homo facillimae facundiae multaeque doctrinae, cum de Christo conloqueremur, Graecum nobis codicem protulit, carmina esse dicens Sibyllae Erythraeae, ubi ostendit quodam loco in capitibus uersuum ordinem litterarum ita se habentem, ut haec in eo uerba legerentur: Ἰησοῦς Χρειστὸς Θεοῦ υἱὸς σωτήρ, quod est Latine, Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator.	Some say that the Erythraean Sibyl prophesied at this same time. Varro, however, reports that there were several Sibyls, not one. This Erythraean Sibyl certainly wrote some things clearly about Christ. We first read this in Latin, in poor Latin verses that did not scan, the work of some incompetent translator or other, as we later learned. For the distinguished Flaccianus, who was also proconsul, a man of most fluent eloquence and great learning, once brought out a Greek manuscript when we were talking about Christ. He said it contained the poems of the Erythraean Sibyl. In one passage he showed us that the letters at the beginnings of the lines were arranged so that these words could be read in them: Ἰησοῦς Χρειστὸς Θεοῦ υἱὸς σωτήρ [Iēsous Chreistos Theou huios sōtēr], which in Latin is "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior."[24]
Hi autem uersus, quorum primae litterae istum sensum, quem diximus, reddunt, sicut eos quidam Latinis et stantibus uersibus est interpretatus, hoc continent: I Iudicii signum tellus sudore madescet. H E caelo rex adueniet per saecla futurus, Σ Scilicet ut carnem praesens, ut iudicet orbem. O Unde Deum cernent incredulus adque fidelis Y Celsum cum sanctis aeui iam termino in ipso. Σ Sic animae cum carne aderunt, quas iudicat ipse, X Cum iacet incultus densis in uepribus orbis, P Reicient simulacra uiri, cunctam quoque gazam,	Someone has translated these lines into Latin verses that do scan. The first letters of the lines yield the sense we have mentioned, and they run as follows: "I In sign of judgment the earth will be drenched with sweat. H From heaven will come the King who is to reign through the ages, Σ present in the flesh, that is, to judge the world. O Hence unbeliever and believer alike will see God Y on high with his saints, now at the very end of time. Σ So souls will be present with their flesh, and he himself judges them, X when the world lies 24 The Erythraean Sibyl was a prophetess of Erythrae in Asia Minor; the verses come from the Sibylline Oracles (book 8). Flaccianus was proconsul of Africa in AD 393.

LATIN

E Exuret terras ignis pontumque polumque
I Inquirens taetri portas effringet Auerni. Σ Sanctorum sed enim cunctae lux libera carni
T Tradetur, sontes aeterna flamma cremabit.

ENGLISH

untilled amid thick thorns. P Men will cast away their idols and all their treasure too. E Fire will burn up the lands, the sea and the sky, I and, searching, will break down the gates of grim Avernus. Σ But the light of freedom will be given to all the flesh of the saints; T the guilty the eternal flame will burn."[25]

O Occultos actus retegens tunc quisque loquetur
Σ Secreta, adque Deus reserabit pectora luci. Θ Tunc erit et luctus, stridebunt dentibus omnes. E Eripitur solis iubar et chorus interit astris. O Voluetur caelum, lunaris splendor obibit;
Y Deiciet colles, ualles extollet ab imo. Y Non erit in rebus hominum sublime uel altum.
I Iam aequantur campis montes et caerula ponti
O Omnia cessabunt, tellus confracta peribit:
Σ Sic pariter fontes torrentur fluminaque igni. Σ Sed tuba tum sonitum tristem demittet ab alto
Ω Orbe, gemens facinus miserum uariosque labores, T Tartareumque chaos monstrabit terra dehiscens. H Et coram hic Domino reges sistentur ad unum. P Reccidet e caelo ignisque et sulphuris amnis.

"O Uncovering hidden deeds, each will then speak Σ his secrets, and God will open hearts to the light. Θ Then there will be weeping, and all will gnash their teeth. E The sun's radiance is snatched away, and the dance of the stars dies. O The sky will be rolled up, and the moon's brightness will perish. Y He will cast down the hills and raise the valleys from the depths. Y Nothing in human affairs will be lofty or high. I Now the mountains are leveled with the plains, and the blue expanses of the sea, O all things will cease; the earth will be shattered and perish. Σ So springs and rivers alike are scorched by fire. Σ But then the trumpet will send down a mournful sound from the heights Ω of heaven, lamenting wretched crime and manifold toils, T and the earth, gaping open, will reveal the chaos of Tartarus. H And here, before the Lord, kings will stand, every one of them. P From heaven will fall both fire and a river of sulfur."

In his Latinis uersibus de Graeco utcumque translatis ibi non potuit ille sensus occurrere, qui fit, cum litterae, quae sunt in eorum capitibus, conectuntur, ubi Y littera in Graeco posita est, quia non potuerunt Latina uerba inueniri, quae ab eadem littera inciperent et sententiae conuenirent. Hi autem sunt uersus tres, quintus et octauus decimus et nonus decimus. Denique si litteras quae sunt in capitibus omnium uersuum conectentes horum trium quae scriptae sunt non legamus, sed pro eis Y litteram, tamquam in eisdem locis ipsa sit posita, recordemur, exprimitur in quinque uerbis: Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator; sed cum Graece hoc dicitur, non Latine. Et sunt uersus uiginti et septem, qui numerus quadratum ternarium solidum reddit.

In these Latin verses, translated from the Greek after a fashion, the sense that emerges when the letters at the beginnings of the lines are joined could not come through where the letter Y [upsilon] stands in the Greek. No Latin words could be found that begin with that letter and fit the meaning. There are three such lines: the fifth, the eighteenth and the nineteenth. So if, in joining the letters at the beginnings of all the lines, we do not read the letters written at the head of these three, but recall instead the letter Y, as if it stood in those places, five words come out: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior"—but only when this is said in Greek, not in Latin. And there are twenty-seven lines, a number that is the square of three made solid—three cubed.

Tria enim ter ducta fiunt nouem; et ipsa nouem si ter ducantur, ut ex lato in altum figura consurgat, ad uiginti septem perueniunt. Horum autem Graecorum quinque uerborum, quae sunt Ἰησοῦς Χρειστὸς Θεοῦ υἱὸς σωτήρ, quod est Latine Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator, si

For three taken three times makes nine. If nine itself is taken three times, so that the figure rises from breadth into height, it comes to twenty-seven. Now join the first letters of these five Greek 25 Avernus, a lake near Cumae, was thought to be an entrance to the underworld.

LATIN

primas litteras iungas, erit ἰχθύς, id est piscis, in quo nomine mystice intellegitur Christus, eo quod in huius mortalitatis abysso uelut in aquarum profunditate uiuus, hoc est sine peccato, esse potuerit.

Haec autem Sibylla siue Erythraea siue, ut quidam magis credunt, Cumaea ita nihil habet in toto carmine suo, cuius exigua ista particula est, quod ad deorum falsorum siue factorum cultum pertineat, quin immo ita etiam contra eos et contra cultores eorum loquitur, ut in eorum numero deputanda uideatur, qui pertinent ad ciuitatem Dei. Inserit etiam Lactantius operi suo quaedam de Christo uaticinia Sibyllae, quamuis non exprimat cuius. Sed quae ipse singillatim posuit, ego arbitratus sum coniuncta esse ponenda, tamquam unum sit prolixum, quae ille plura commemorauit et breuia. In manus, inquit, infidelium postea ueniet; dabunt autem Deo alapas manibus incestis et inpurato ore exspuent uenenatos sputus; dabit uero ad uerbera simpliciter sanctum dorsum.

Et colaphos accipiens tacebit, ne quis agnoscat, quod uerbum uel unde uenit, ut inferis loquatur et corona spinea coronetur. Ad cibum autem fel et ad sitim acetum dederunt; inhospitalitatis hanc monstrabunt mensam. Ipsa enim insipiens tuum Deum non intellexisti, ludentem mortalium mentibus, sed spinis coronasti et horridum fel miscuisti. Templi uero uelum scindetur; et medio die nox erit tenebrosa nimis in tribus horis. Et morte morietur tribus diebus somno suscepto; et tunc ab inferis regressus ad lucem ueniet primus resurrectionis principio reuocatis ostenso. Ista Lactantius carptim per interualla disputationis suae, sicut ea poscere uidebantur, quae probare intenderat, adhibuit testimonia Sibyllina, quae nos nihil interponentes, sed in unam seriem conexa ponentes solis capitibus, si tamen scriptores deinceps ea seruare non neglegant, distinguenda curauimus.

ENGLISH

words, Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ υἱὸς σωτήρ, which in Latin is "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior." You will get ἰχθύς [ichthys], that is, "fish." In this name Christ is understood in a mystical sense, because in the abyss of this mortality, as in the depths of the waters, he was able to stay alive, that is, to be without sin.

This Sibyl may be the Erythraean or, as some rather believe, the Cumaean. Either way, in her entire poem, of which this is a tiny part, she has nothing that relates to the worship of false or man-made gods. On the contrary, she speaks so strongly against them and against their worshipers that she seems to deserve to be counted among those who belong to the city of God. Lactantius also includes in his work certain prophecies of the Sibyl about Christ, though he does not specify which Sibyl. He cited them as several short passages, set down separately. I have thought it best to set them down together, as if they were one long passage. "Afterward," she says, "he will come into the hands of the unbelievers. They will strike God with unholy hands and spit poisonous spittle from polluted mouths, but he will simply offer his holy back to the lashes.[26]

"And he will be silent as he receives the blows, so that no one may recognize what Word he is or where he comes from, and so that he may speak to the dead below and be crowned with a crown of thorns. For food they gave him gall, and for his thirst vinegar; this is the table of inhospitality they will show him. For you yourself, foolish one, did not understand your God, who was playing with the minds of mortals. Instead you crowned him with thorns and mixed bitter gall for him. The veil of the temple will be torn, and at midday there will be night, exceedingly dark, for three hours. And he will die a death, taking sleep for three days. Then, returning from the dead, he will come to the light, the first to show the beginning of the resurrection to those called back." Lactantius used these Sibylline testimonies piecemeal, at intervals in his argument, as the points he meant to prove seemed to require. We have inserted nothing, but have set them out joined in a single sequence. We have taken care to mark them off 26 Lactantius (c. AD 250–325) was a Christian rhetorician; the passages come from his Divine Institutes, book 4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	only by initial letters, provided the copyists do not neglect to preserve these in the future.
Nonnulli sane Erythraeam Sibyllam non Romuli, sed belli Troiani tempore fuisse scripserunt.	Some, indeed, have written that the Erythraean Sibyl lived not in the time of Romulus but in the time of the Trojan War.

THAT THE SEVEN SAGES FLOURISHED IN THE REIGN OF ROMULUS, WHEN THE TEN TRIBES CALLED ISRAEL WERE LED INTO CAPTIVITY BY THE CHALDEANS, AND THAT ROMULUS WAS GIVEN DIVINE HONOR AT HIS DEATH

Thales lives under Romulus, Israel's ten tribes are exiled, and Romulus is deified.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.24 Eodem Romulo regnante Thales Milesius fuisse perhibetur, unus e septem sapientibus, qui post theologos poetas, in quibus Orpheus maxime omnium nobilitatus est, σοφοὶ appellati sunt, quod est Latine sapientes. Per idem tempus decem tribus, quae in diuisione populi uocatae sunt Israel, debellatae a Chaldaeis et in eas terras captiuae ductae sunt, remanentibus in Iudaea terra duabus illis tribubus, quae nomine Iudae uocabantur sedemque regni habebant Hierusalem.	Thales of Miletus is said to have lived during the reign of this same Romulus. He was one of the seven sages. After the theologian poets, among whom Orpheus was the most renowned of all, these men were called σοφοί [wise men], which in Latin is sapientes. About the same time the ten tribes that were called Israel when the people was divided were conquered by the Chaldeans and led captive into their lands. The two tribes that bore the name of Judah, and had Jerusalem as the seat of their kingdom, remained in the land of Judea.[27]
Mortuum Romulum, cum et ipse non conparuisset, in deos, quod et uulgo notissimum est, rettulere Romani; quod usque adeo fieri iam desierat (nec postea nisi adulando, non errando, factum est temporibus Caesarum), ut Cicero magnis Romuli laudibus tribuat, quod non rudibus et indoctis temporibus, quando facile homines fallebantur, sed iam expolitis et eruditis meruerit hos honores, quamuis nondum efferbuerat ac pullulauerat philosophorum subtilis et acuta loquacitas.	When Romulus died, the Romans enrolled him among the gods, since he too had vanished from sight. This is very widely known. But by then the practice had so far fallen out of use that Cicero counts it greatly to Romulus's praise that he earned these honors not in rough and unlearned times, when people were easily deceived, but in times already refined and educated—though the subtle and sharp talkativeness of the philosophers had not yet boiled up and sprouted. Afterward it was done again only in the times of the Caesars, and then out of flattery, not error.[28]
Sed etiamsi posteriora tempora deos homines mortuos non instituerunt, tamen ab antiquis institutos colere ut deos et habere non destiterunt; quin etiam simulacris, quae ueteres non habebant, auxerunt uanae adque inpiae superstitionis inlecebram, id efficientibus inmundis in eorum corde daemonibus per fallacia quoque oracula decipientibus, ut fabulosa etiam crimina deorum, quae iam urbaniore saeculo non fingebantur, per ludos tamen in eorundem falsorum numinum obsequium turpiter agerentur. Regnauit deinde Numa post Romulum, qui cum illam ciuitatem putauerit deorum profecto falsorum	Later times did not make gods of dead men. Even so, they did not stop worshiping as gods, and treating as gods, those whom the ancients had made gods. They even added images, which the people of old did not have, and so increased the allure of a vain and impious superstition. The unclean demons brought this about in their hearts, deceiving them also through lying oracles. As a result, even the mythical crimes of the gods were shamefully acted out in the games, in homage to these same false divinities, although in a more cultiv-

27 Thales of Miletus (6th century BC) was traditionally counted the first Greek natural philosopher.
28 Cicero makes this point in On the Republic, Book 2.

LATIN	ENGLISH
numerositate muniendam, in eandem turbam referri mortuus ipse non meruit, tamquam ita putatus sit caelum multitudine numinum constipasse, ut locum ibi reperire non posset. Hoc regnante Romae et aput Hebraeos initio regni Manasse, a quo inpio rege propheta Esaias perhibetur occisus, Samiam fuisse Sibyllam ferunt.	ated age they were no longer being invented. After Romulus, Numa reigned. He believed that city ought to be fortified with a great number of gods, false ones of course. Yet when he died he himself did not earn a place in that same crowd. It was as if he were thought to have packed heaven so tightly with a multitude of divinities that he could find no room there. While he reigned at Rome, and at the beginning of the reign of Manasseh among the Hebrews, the Sibyl of Samos is said to have lived. Manasseh was the impious king by whom the prophet Isaiah is said to have been killed.[29]

THE PHILOSOPHERS WHO BECAME FAMOUS WHEN TARQUINIUS PRISCUS REIGNED AT ROME AND ZEDEKIAH AMONG THE HEBREWS, WHEN JERUSALEM WAS TAKEN AND THE TEMPLE DESTROYED

Jerusalem falls to Babylon; the Seven Sages and the first natural philosophers flourish.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.25 Regnante uero aput Hebraeos Sedechia et aput Romanos Tarquinio Prisco, qui successerat Anco Marcio, ductus est captiuus in Babyloniam populus Iudaeorum euersa Hierusalem et templo illo a Salomone constructo. Increpantes enim eos prophetae de iniquitatibus et inpietatibus suis haec eis uentura praedixerant, maxime Hieremias, qui etiam numerum definiuit annorum. Eo tempore Pittacus Mitylenaeus, alius e septem sapientibus, fuisse perhibetur. Et quinque ceteros, qui, ut septem numerentur, Thaleti, quem supra commemorauimus, et huic Pittaco adduntur, eo tempore fuisse scribit Eusebius, quo captiuus Dei populus in Babylonia tenebatur. Hi sunt autem: Solon Atheniensis, Chilon Lacedaemonius, Periandrus Corinthius, Cleobulus Lindius, Bias Prienaeus. Omnes hi, septem appellati sapientes, post poetas theologos claruerunt, quia genere uitae quodam laudabili praestabant hominibus ceteris et morum nonnulla praecepta sententiarum breuitate conplexi sunt.	Zedekiah was reigning among the Hebrews, and Tarquinius Priscus, who had succeeded Ancus Marcius, among the Romans, when Jerusalem was overthrown together with the temple Solomon had built, and the Jewish people were led captive into Babylonia. The prophets had rebuked them for their iniquities and impieties and had foretold that these things would come upon them. Jeremiah did so above all, and he even fixed the number of years. At that time Pittacus of Mytilene, another of the seven sages, is said to have lived. Thales, mentioned above, and this Pittacus are joined by five others to make the seven, and Eusebius writes that these five lived at the time when God's people were held captive in Babylonia. They are Solon of Athens, Chilon of Sparta, Periander of Corinth, Cleobulus of Lindos and Bias of Priene. All these men, called the seven sages, became famous after the theologian poets. They excelled other people by a certain praiseworthy way of life, and they summed up a number of moral precepts in brief maxims.
Nihil autem monumentorum, quod ad litteras adtinet, posteris reliquerunt, nisi quod Solon quasdam leges Atheniensibus dedisse perhibetur; Thales uero physicus fuit et suorum dogmatum libros reliquit. Eo captiuitatis Iudaicae tempore et Anaximander et Anaximenes et Xenophanes physici claruerunt. Tunc et Pythagoras, ex quo coeperunt appellari philosophi.	As far as written works go, however, they left no monuments to posterity, except that Solon is said to have given certain laws to the Athenians. Thales, though, was a natural philosopher and left books setting out his doctrines. In that time of the Jewish captivity the natural philosophers Anaximander, Anaximenes and Xenophanes also became 29 A Jewish tradition, preserved in the Ascension of Isaiah, held that Isaiah was martyred under King Manasseh.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		famous. So did Pythagoras, from whom people began to be called philosophers.[30]

THAT AT THE TIME WHEN THE CAPTIVITY OF THE JEWS ENDED AFTER SEVENTY YEARS, THE ROMANS TOO WERE FREED FROM THE RULE OF KINGS

Cyrus frees the Jews, and Rome expels its kings at about the same time.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.26	Per idem tempus Cyrus, rex Persarum, qui etiam Chaldaeis et Assyriis imperabat, relaxata aliquanta captiuitate Iudaeorum, quinquaginta milia hominum ex eis ad instaurandum templum regredi fecit. A quibus tantum prima coepta fundamina et altare constructum est. Incursantibus autem hostibus nequaquam progredi aedificando ualuerunt, dilatumque opus est usque ad Darium. Per idem tempus etiam illa sunt gesta, quae conscripta sunt in libro Iudith; quem sane in canone scripturarum Iudaei non recepisse dicuntur. Sub Dario ergo rege Persarum inpletis septuaginta annis, quos Hieremias propheta praedixerat, reddita est Iudaeis soluta captiuitate libertas, regnante Romanorum septimo rege Tarquinio. Quo expulso etiam ipsi a regum suorum dominatione liberi esse coeperunt.	About the same time Cyrus, king of the Persians, who also ruled the Chaldeans and Assyrians, eased the captivity of the Jews somewhat and had fifty thousand of them return to restore the temple. They managed only to lay the first foundations and build the altar. Enemies kept raiding them, so they could make no further progress with the building, and the work was put off until the time of Darius. The events recorded in the book of Judith also took place about this time. The Jews, however, are said not to have accepted that book into the canon of the scriptures. So under Darius, king of the Persians, when the seventy years foretold by the prophet Jeremiah were completed, the captivity was ended and freedom was restored to the Jews. At Rome, Tarquin, the seventh king of the Romans, was then reigning. When he was driven out, the Romans too began to be free of the domination of their kings.[31]
	Usque ad hoc tempus prophetas habuit populus Israel; qui cum multi fuerint, paucorum et aput Iudaeos et aput nos canonica scripta retinentur. De quibus me aliqua positurum esse promisi in hoc libro, cum clauderem superiorem, quod iam uideo esse faciendum.	Up to this time the people of Israel had prophets. There were many of them, but the canonical writings of only a few are preserved, both among the Jews and among us. When I was closing the previous book, I promised that I would set down something about them in this one, and I see that this must now be done.

THE TIMES OF THE PROPHETS WHOSE ORACLES ARE CONTAINED IN BOOKS AND WHO SANG MUCH ABOUT THE CALLING OF THE NATIONS WHEN THE ROMAN KINGDOM BEGAN AND THE ASSYRIAN CAME TO AN END

Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, Micah, Jonah and Joel prophesy as Rome begins and Assyria ends.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.27	Tempora igitur eorum ut possimus aduertere, in anteriora paululum recurramus. In capite libri Osee prophetae, qui primus in duodecim ponitur, ita scriptum est: Verbum Domini, quod factum est ad Osee in diebus Oziae et Ioatham et Achaz et Ezechiae regum Iuda. Amos	So that we can take note of their times, let us go back a little. At the head of the book of the prophet Hosea, who is placed first among the twelve, it is written: "The word of the Lord that came to Hosea in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, 30 Pythagoras was said to have called himself a philosophos, a "lover of wisdom," rather than a wise man.

31 Judith, the story of a Jewish widow who saves her people by killing the enemy general Holofernes, is not in the Hebrew Bible.

LATIN

quoque diebus regis Oziae prophetasse se scribit; addit etiam Hieroboam regem Israel, qui per eosdem dies fuit. Nec non Esaias, filius Amos, siue supradicti prophetae siue, quod magis perhibetur, alterius qui non propheta eodem nomine uocabatur, eosdem reges quattuor, quos posuit Osee, in capite libri sui ponit, quorum diebus se prophetasse praeloquitur. Michaeas etiam eadem suae prophetiae commemorat tempora post dies Oziae. Nam tres qui sequuntur reges nominat, quos et Osee nominauit, Ioatham et Achaz et Ezechian.

Hi sunt, quos eodem tempore simul prophetasse ex eorum litteris inuenitur. His adiungitur Ionas eodem Ozia rege regnante et Ioel, cum iam regnaret Ioatham, qui successit Oziae. Sed istorum prophetarum duorum tempora in chronicis, non in eorum libris potuimus inuenire, quoniam de suis diebus tacent.

Tenduntur autem hi dies a rege Latinorum Proca siue superiore Auentino usque ad regem Romulum iam Romanum, uel etiam usque ad regni primordia successoris eius Numae Pompilii (Ezechias quippe rex Iuda eo usque regnauit); ac per hoc per ea tempora isti uelut fontes prophetiae pariter eruperunt, quando regnum defecit Assyrium coepitque Romanum; ut scilicet, quem ad modum regni Assyriorum primo tempore exstitit Abraham, cui promissiones apertissimae fierent in eius semine benedictionis omnium gentium, ita occidentalis Babylonis exordio, qua fuerat Christus imperante uenturus, in quo inplerentur illa promissa, oracula prophetarum non solum loquentium, uerum etiam scribentium in tantae rei futurae testimonium soluerentur.

Cum enim prophetae numquam fere defuissent populo Israel, ex quo ibi reges esse coeperunt, in usum tantummodo eorum fuere, non gentium; quando autem scriptura manifestius prophetica condebatur, quae gentibus quandoque prodesset, tunc oportebat inciperet, quando condebatur haec ciuitas, quae gentibus imperaret.

ENGLISH

kings of Judah." Amos also writes that he prophesied in the days of King Uzziah, and he adds Jeroboam, king of Israel, who lived in those same days. Isaiah son of Amos, too, names at the head of his book the same four kings Hosea named, and states that he prophesied in their days. His father was either the prophet just mentioned or, as is more generally held, another man of the same name who was not a prophet. Micah also records the same times for his prophecy, after the days of Uzziah. For he names the three kings who follow, whom Hosea also named: Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah.[32]

These are the prophets who, according to their own writings, prophesied together at the same time. To them are added Jonah, in the reign of the same King Uzziah, and Joel, when Jotham, who succeeded Uzziah, was already reigning. But we were able to find the times of these two prophets only in the chronicles, not in their books, since they say nothing about their own days.

These days stretch from Proca, king of the Latins, or from his predecessor Aventinus, to Romulus, who was by then king of the Romans, or even to the beginning of the reign of his successor Numa Pompilius, since Hezekiah, king of Judah, reigned until then. So in those times, when the Assyrian kingdom came to an end and the Roman began, these prophets burst out together like springs of prophecy. Abraham had appeared in the first period of the Assyrian kingdom, and to him were made the clearest promises that all nations would be blessed in his offspring. In the same way, at the beginning of the western Babylon, under whose rule Christ was to come and fulfill those promises, the oracles of the prophets were to be let loose, prophets who not only spoke but also wrote, as testimony to so great an event to come.[33]

For prophets had almost never been lacking to the people of Israel from the time they began to have kings, but these prophets served only their own use, not that of the nations. When scripture of a more openly prophetic kind was being composed, which would one day benefit the nations, it was

32 Hosea 1:1; Amos 1:1. In Hebrew, Isaiah's father Amoz and the prophet Amos have different names, but Augustine's Latin Bible spells both "Amos."

33 Proca and Aventinus were legendary kings of Alba Longa. "The western Babylon" is Augustine's name for Rome.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	fitting that it should begin when this city was being founded, the city that would rule the nations.

WHAT HOSEA AND AMOS PROPHESIED THAT RELATES TO THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST

Hosea foretells the calling of the nations and the third-day resurrection; Amos the rebuilt tent of David.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.28 Osee igitur propheta, quanto profundius quidem loquitur, tanto operosius penetratur. Sed aliquid inde sumendum est et hic ex nostra promissione ponendum. Et erit, inquit, in loco quo dictum est eis: Non populus meus uos, uocabuntur et ipsi filii Dei uiui. Hoc testimonium propheticum de uocatione populi gentium, qui prius non per tinebat ad Deum, etiam apostoli intellexerunt. Et quia ipse quoque populus gentium spiritaliter est in filiis Abrahae ac per hoc recte dicitur Israel, propterea sequitur et dicit: Et congregabuntur filii Iuda et filii Israel in id ipsum, et ponent sibi principatum unum et adscendent a terra. Hoc si adhuc uelimus exponere, eloquii prophetici obtundetur sapor.	The deeper the prophet Hosea speaks, the harder he is to fathom. But something must be taken from him and set down here, as I promised. "And it shall be," he says, "that in the place where it was said to them, 'You are not my people,' they too shall be called children of the living God." The apostles also understood this prophetic testimony as referring to the calling of the people of the nations, which formerly did not belong to God. And because the people of the nations is itself, spiritually, among the children of Abraham, and so is rightly called Israel, the prophet goes on to say: "And the children of Judah and the children of Israel shall be gathered together into one, and they shall appoint for themselves one leadership, and they shall go up from the land." If we tried to explain this any further, we would blunt the savor of the prophetic language.[34]
Recolatur tamen lapis ille angularis et duo parietes, unus ex Iudaeis, alter ex gentibus; ille nomine filiorum Iuda, iste nomine filiorum Israel, eidem uni principatui suo in id ipsum innitentes et adscendentes agnoscantur a terra. Istos autem carnaliter Israelitas, qui nunc nolunt credere in Christum, postea credituros, id est filios eorum (nam utique isti in suum locum moriendo transibunt), idem propheta testatur dicens: Quoniam diebus multis sedebunt filii Israel sine rege, sine principe, sine sacrificio, sine altari, sine sacerdotio, sine manifestationibus. Quis non uideat nunc sic esse Iudaeos? Sed quid adiungat, audiamus. Et postea, inquit, reuertentur filii Israel et inquirent Dominum Deum suum et Dauid regem suum, et stupescent in Domino et in bonis ipsius in nouissimis diebus.	Still, let us recall that cornerstone and the two walls, one from the Jews and the other from the nations. Let the one be recognized under the name "children of Judah," the other under the name "children of Israel," both resting together on their one same leadership and going up from the land. As for those who are Israelites according to the flesh and now refuse to believe in Christ, the same prophet testifies that they will believe later, that is, their descendants will, for these themselves will of course pass by death to their own place. He says: "For many days the children of Israel shall sit without king, without prince, without sacrifice, without altar, without priesthood, without manifestations." Who does not see that this is the state of the Jews now? But let us hear what he adds: "And afterward the children of Israel shall return and seek the Lord their God and David their king, and they shall stand in awe of the Lord and of his good gifts in the last days."[35]
Nihil est ista prophetia manifestius, cum Dauid regis nomine significatus intellegitur Christus, quia factus est,	Nothing is clearer than this prophecy, once we understand that Christ is signified by the name of 34 Hosea 1:10–11, applied to the Gentiles in Romans 9:25–26 and 1 Peter 2:10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sicut dicit apostolus, ex semine Dauid secundum carnem. Praenuntiauit iste propheta etiam tertio die Christi resurrectionem futuram, sicut eam prophetica altitudine praenuntiari oportebat, ubi ait: Sanabit nos post biduum, in die tertio resurgemus. Secundum hoc enim nobis dicit apostolus: Si resurrexistis cum Christo, quae sursum sunt quaerite.	King David, because, as the apostle says, he was "made from the seed of David according to the flesh." This prophet also foretold that Christ would rise again on the third day, foretelling it as was fitting, with prophetic depth, when he says: "He will heal us after two days; on the third day we shall rise again." It is in keeping with this that the apostle says to us: "If you have risen with Christ, seek the things that are above."[36]
Amos quoque de rebus talibus sic prophetat: Praepara, inquit, te, ut inuoces Deum tuum Israel; quia ecce ego firmans tonitrum et creans spiritum et adnuntians in hominibus Christum suum; et alio loco: In illa die, inquit, resuscitabo tabernaculum Dauid, quod cecidit, et reaedificabo, quae ceci, derunt eius, et destructa eius resuscitabo et reaedificabo ea sicut dies saeculi; ita ut exquirant me residui hominum et omnes gentes, in quibus inuocatum est nomen meum super eos, dicit Dominus faciens haec.	Amos too prophesies about such things in this way: "Prepare yourself, Israel, to call upon your God. For see, I am the one who makes the thunder firm and creates the wind, and announces his Christ among men." And in another place he says: "On that day I will raise up the tent of David that has fallen, and I will rebuild what of it has fallen, and I will raise up what of it was destroyed, and I will rebuild it as in the days of old, so that the rest of humankind may seek me, and all the nations over whom my name has been called, says the Lord who does these things."[37]

WHAT ISAIAH FORETOLD ABOUT CHRIST AND THE CHURCH

Isaiah's suffering servant foretells Christ's passion, and the barren woman the Church.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.29 Esaias propheta non est in libro duodecim prophetarum, qui propterea dicuntur minores, quia sermones eorum sunt breues in eorum conparatione, qui maiores ideo uocantur, quia prolixa uolumina condiderunt; ex quibus est hic Esaias, quem propter eadem prophetiae tempora subiungo supradictis duobus. Esaias ergo inter illa, quae arguit iniqua et iusta praecepit et peccatori populo mala futura praedixit, etiam de Christo et ecclesia, hoc est de rege et ea quam condidit ciuitate, multo plura quam ceteri prophetauit, ita ut a quibusdam euangelista quam propheta potius diceretur. Sed propter rationem operis terminandi unum de multis hoc loco ponam. Ex persona quippe Dei Patris loquens: Ecce, inquit, intelleget puer meus et exaltabitur et glorificabitur ualde.	The prophet Isaiah is not in the book of the Twelve Prophets. These are called minor because their discourses are short compared with those of the prophets called major, who composed long books. Isaiah is one of the major prophets, and I add him to the two just mentioned because he prophesied at the same time. Isaiah, then, along with his denunciations of wickedness, his commands of what is just, and his warnings of the evils to come upon a sinful people, also prophesied far more than the others about Christ and the Church, that is, about the King and the city he founded. Indeed, some have said he should be called an evangelist rather than a prophet. But so that this work may be brought to an end, I will set down here only one passage out of many. Speaking in the person of God the Father, he says: "See, my servant shall understand, and he shall be exalted and greatly glorified.[38]

35 The cornerstone joining two walls alludes to Ephesians 2:14–20. The prophecy is Hosea 3:4–5.
36 Romans 1:3; Hosea 6:2; Colossians 3:1.
37 Amos 4:12–13 and 9:11–12.
38 Jerome called Isaiah an evangelist rather than a prophet. The passage that follows is Isaiah 52:13–53:12.

LATIN

Quem ad modum stupescent super te multi, ita gloria priuabitur ab hominibus species tua et gloria tua ab hominibus; ita mirabuntur gentes multae super eum et continebunt reges os suum; quoniam quibus non est nuntiatum de illo, uidebunt, et qui non audierunt, intellegent. Domine, quis credidit auditui nostro, et brachium Domini cui reuelatum est? Adnuntiauimus coram illo, ut infans, ut radix in terra sitienti: non est species illi neque gloria. Et uidimus eum, et non habebat speciem neque decorem; sed species eius sine honore, deficiens prae omnibus hominibus. Homo in plaga positus et sciens ferre infirmitatem; quoniam auersa est facies eius, inhonoratus est nec magni aestimatus est.

Hic peccata nostra portat et pro nobis dolet; et nos existimauimus illum esse in dolore et in plaga et in adflictione. Ipse autem uulneratus est propter iniquitates nostras et infirmatus est propter peccata nostra. Eruditio pacis nostrae in eo; liuore eius nos sanati sumus. Omnes ut oues errauimus, homo a uia sua errauit; et Dominus tradidit illum pro peccatis nostris; et ipse, propter quod adflictus est, non aperuit os. Ut ouis ad immolandum ductus est et ut agnus ante eum, qui se tonderet, sine uoce, sic non aperuit os suum. In humilitate iudicium eius sublatum est. Generationem eius quis enarrabit? Quoniam tolletur de terra uita eius. Ab iniquitatibus populi mei ductus est ad mortem. Et dabo malignos pro sepultura eius et diuites pro morte eius.

Quoniam iniquitatem non fecit nec dolum in ore suo; et Dominus uult purgare eum de plaga. Si dederitis pro peccato animam uestram, uidebitis semen longaeuum; et Dominus uult auferre a dolore animam eius, ostendere illi lucem et formare intellectum, iustificare iustum bene seruientem pluribus; et peccata eorum ipse portabit. Propterea ipse hereditabit plures et fortium diuidet spolia, propter quod tradita est ad mortem anima eius, et inter iniquos aestimatus est et ipse peccata multorum portauit, et propter peccata eorum traditus est. Haec de Christo Iam uero de ecclesia, quod sequitur, audiamus. Laetare, inquit, sterilis, quae non paris; erumpe et clama, quae non parturis; quoniam multi filii desertae magis quam eius, quae habet uirum.

ENGLISH

Just as many shall be astonished at you, so your appearance shall be robbed of glory by men, and your glory by men. So many nations shall marvel at him, and kings shall shut their mouths. For those to whom nothing was announced about him shall see, and those who have not heard shall understand. Lord, who has believed our report, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed? We made our announcement before him like an infant, like a root in thirsty ground. He has no form or glory. And we saw him, and he had no form or beauty. His appearance was without honor, falling short of all men. He was a man stricken with a blow, who knew how to bear weakness. Because his face was turned away, he was dishonored and held of no account.

He bears our sins and suffers pain for us, and we thought that he was in pain, stricken, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our iniquities and weakened for our sins. The discipline that brings us peace was upon him; by his bruises we are healed. All of us have gone astray like sheep; each man has strayed from his way. And the Lord handed him over for our sins, and he, because he was afflicted, did not open his mouth. He was led like a sheep to the slaughter, and like a lamb that is silent before its shearer, so he did not open his mouth. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away. Who will tell of his generation? For his life shall be taken from the earth. Because of the iniquities of my people he was led to death. And I will give the wicked for his burial, and the rich for his death.

For he did no iniquity, and there was no deceit in his mouth. And the Lord wills to cleanse him of his wound. If you give your soul for sin, you shall see a long-lived offspring. And the Lord wills to take his soul away from pain, to show him light and to form understanding, to justify the just one who serves many well. And he himself shall bear their sins. Therefore he shall inherit many and shall divide the spoils of the strong, because his soul was handed over to death, and he was counted among the wicked, and he bore the sins of many, and for their sins he was handed over." This is about Christ. Now let us hear what follows about the Church. "Rejoice," he says, "you barren one, who do not bear; break out and cry aloud, you who are not in labor; for the children of the desolate woman are more than those of her who has a husband.[39]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Dilata locum tabernaculi tui et aulaearum tuarum; fige, noli parcere, prolonga funiculos tuos et palos tuos conforta, adhuc in dextram et sinistram partem extende. Et semen tuum hereditabit gentes, et ciuitates desertas inhabitabis. Ne timeas, quoniam confusa es, neque reuerearis, quia exprobrata es; quoniam confusionem aeternam obliuisceris et obprobrium uiduitatis tuae non eris memor. Quoniam Dominus faciens te, Dominus Sabaoth nomen ei; et qui eruit te, ipse Deus Israel uniuersae terrae uocabitur; et cetera. Verum ista sint satis; et in eis sunt exponenda nonnulla; sed sufficere arbitror quae ita sunt aperta, ut etiam inimici intellegere cogantur inuiti.	Enlarge the place of your tent and of your curtains. Fix them firmly, do not hold back. Lengthen your cords and strengthen your stakes. Spread out still further to the right and to the left. And your offspring shall inherit the nations, and you shall inhabit the deserted cities. Do not be afraid because you have been put to shame, and do not be dismayed because you have been reproached. For you shall forget your everlasting shame and shall no longer remember the reproach of your widowhood. For the Lord is the one who makes you; the Lord of Hosts is his name. And he who rescues you, the God of Israel himself, shall be called God of the whole earth," and so on. But let this be enough. Some things in it would need explaining, but I think it is enough to give passages so plain that even our enemies are forced to understand them against their will.

WHAT MICAH, JONAH, AND JOEL PROPHESIED IN AGREEMENT WITH THE NEW TESTAMENT

Micah foretells Bethlehem, Jonah's three days figure the resurrection, and Joel the Spirit's outpouring.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.30 Michaeas propheta Christum in figura ponens magni cuiusdam montis haec loquitur: Erit in nouissimis diebus manifestus mons Domini paratus super uertices montium et exaltabitur super colles. Et festinabunt ad eum plebes, et ibunt gentes multae et dicent: Venite, ascendamus in montem Domini et in domum Dei Iacob, et ostendet nobis uiam suam, et ibimus in semitis eius; quia ex Sion procedet lex et uerbum Domini ex Hierusalem. Et iudicabit inter plebes multas, et redarguet gentes potentes usque in longinquum. Praedicens iste propheta et locum in quo natus est Christus: Et tu, inquit, Bethleem, domus Ephrata, minima es, ut sis in milibus Iuda; ex te mihi prodiet, ut sit in principem Israel; et egressus eius ab initio et ex diebus aeternitatis.	The prophet Micah, presenting Christ under the figure of a great mountain, says this: "In the last days the mountain of the Lord shall be made manifest, established on the tops of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills. And peoples shall hasten to it, and many nations shall go and say, 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and to the house of the God of Jacob. He will show us his way, and we will walk in his paths.' For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many peoples and rebuke mighty nations far away." This prophet also foretells the place where Christ was born: "And you, Bethlehem, house of Ephrathah," he says, "are the least among the thousands of Judah. From you shall come forth for me one who is to be ruler in Israel, and his going forth is from the beginning, from the days of eternity.[40]
Propterea dabit eos usque ad tempus parturientis, pariet, et residui fratres eius conuertentur ad filios Israel. Et	Therefore he will give them up until the time when she who is in labor gives birth, and the rest

39 Isaiah 54:1–5.
40 Micah 4:1–3 and 5:2–4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
stabit et uidebit et pascet gregem suum in uirtute Domini, et in honore nominis Domini Dei sui erunt; quoniam nunc magnificabitur usque ad summum terrae. Ionas autem propheta non tam sermone Christum, quam sua quadam passione prophetauit, profecto apertius, quam si eius mortem et resurrectionem uoce clamaret. Ut quid enim exceptus est uentre beluino et die tertio redditus, nisi ut significaret Christum de profundo inferni die tertio rediturum?	of his brothers shall turn back to the children of Israel. And he shall stand and see, and feed his flock in the strength of the Lord, and they shall dwell in the honor of the name of the Lord their God. For now he shall be magnified to the ends of the earth." The prophet Jonah, however, prophesied Christ not so much by his words as by something he suffered, and he did so more plainly than if he had proclaimed Christ's death and resurrection aloud. For why was he taken into the belly of the sea monster and given back on the third day, if not to signify that Christ would return on the third day from the depths of the underworld?
Ioel omnia, quae prophetat, multis uerbis conpellit exponi, ut quae pertinent ad Christum et ecclesiam dilucescant. Unum tamen, quod etiam apostoli commemorauerunt, quando in congregatos credentes Spiritus sanctus, sicut a Christo promissus fuerat, desuper uenit, non praetermittam. Et erit, inquit, post haec, et effundam de spiritu meo super omnem carnem; et prophetabunt filii uestri et filiae uestrae, et seniores uestri somnia somniabunt, et iuuenes uestri uisa uidebunt; et quidem in seruos et ancillas meas in illis diebus effundam de spiritu meo.	Everything Joel prophesies requires many words of explanation if what concerns Christ and the Church is to come to light. But there is one passage I will not pass over, which the apostles too recalled when the Holy Spirit came down from above upon the assembled believers, as Christ had promised. "And it shall come to pass after this," he says, "that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh. Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions. Even upon my menservants and maidservants I will pour out my spirit in those days."[41]

WHAT IS FOUND FORETOLD IN OBADIAH, NAHUM, AND HABAKKUK ABOUT THE SALVATION OF THE WORLD IN CHRIST

Obadiah, Nahum and Habakkuk foretell salvation through Christ for the nations.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.31 Tres prophetae de minoribus, Abdias, Naum, Ambacum, nec tempora sua dicunt ipsi, nec in chronicis Eusebii et Hieronymi, quando prophetauerint, inuenitur. Abdias enim positus est quidem ab eis cum Michaea, sed non eo loco, ubi notantur tempora, quando Michaeam prophetasse ex eius litteris constat; quod errore neglegenter describentium labores alienos existimo contigisse; duos uero alios commemoratos in codicibus chronicorum, quos habuimus, non potuimus inuenire. Tamen quia canone continentur, nec ipsi oportet praetereantur a nobis. Abdias, quantum ad scripturam eius adtinet, omnium breuissimus prophetarum, aduersus Idumaeam loquitur, gentem scilicet Esau, ex duobus geminis filiis Isaac, nepotibus Abrahae, maioris illius reprobati.	Three of the minor prophets, Obadiah, Nahum and Habakkuk, do not state their own times, and the chronicles of Eusebius and Jerome do not show when they prophesied either. Obadiah is indeed placed there with Micah, but not at the point where the dates are noted at which Micah, according to his own writing, is known to have prophesied. I think this happened through the error of people who carelessly copy the work of others. The other two I could not find mentioned in the copies of the chronicles we had. Still, since they are contained in the canon, we should not pass them over either. Obadiah, whose writing is the shortest of all the prophets, speaks against Idumea, that is, against the nation of Esau. Esau

41 Joel 2:28–29, quoted by Peter at Pentecost in Acts 2:17–18.

LATIN

ENGLISH

was the elder of the twin sons of Isaac, Abraham's grandsons, and he was the one rejected.

Porro si Idumaeam modo locutionis, quo intellegitur a parte totum, accipiamus positam esse pro gentibus: possumus de Christo agnoscere, quod ait inter cetera: In monte autem Sion erit salus et erit sanctum; et paulo post in fine ipsius prophetiae: Et adscendent, inquit, resaluati ex monte Sion, ut defendant montem Esau, et erit Domino regnum. Apparet quippe id esse conpletum, cum resaluati ex monte Sion, id est ex Iudaea credentes in Christum, qui praecipue agnoscuntur apostoli, adscenderunt, ut defenderent montem Esau. Quo modo defenderent, nisi per euangelii praedicationem saluos faciendo eos qui crediderunt, ut eruerentur de potestate tenebrarum et transferrentur in regnum Dei? Quod consequenter expressit addendo: Et erit Domino regnum.

Now suppose we take Idumea as standing for the nations, by the figure of speech in which the whole is understood from a part. Then we can recognize what refers to Christ when he says, among other things: "But on Mount Zion there shall be salvation, and there shall be what is holy." A little later, at the end of the prophecy, he says: "And those who are saved again shall go up from Mount Zion to defend Mount Esau, and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." Clearly this was fulfilled when those saved again from Mount Zion went up to defend Mount Esau. These were the believers in Christ from Judea, among whom the apostles are recognized above all. How would they defend it, except by saving, through the preaching of the gospel, those who believed, so that they might be rescued from the power of darkness and brought over into the kingdom of God? This is what he went on to express by adding: "And the kingdom shall be the Lord's."[42]

Mons enim Sion Iudaeam significat, ubi futura praedicta est salus et sanctum, quod est Christus Iesus. Mons uero Esau Idumaea est, per quam significata est ecclesia gentium, quam defenderunt, sicut exposui, resaluati ex monte Sion, ut esset Domino regnum. Hoc obscurum erat, antequam fieret; sed factum quis non fidelis agnoscat?

For Mount Zion signifies Judea, where salvation and what is holy, namely Christ Jesus, were foretold to come. Mount Esau is Idumea, which signifies the Church of the nations. As I have explained, those saved again from Mount Zion defended it, so that the kingdom might be the Lord's. This was obscure before it happened. Now that it has happened, what believer would not recognize it?

Naum uero propheta, immo per illum Deus: Exterminabo, inquit, sculptilia et conflatilia, ponam sepulturam tuam; quia ueloces ecce super montes pedes euangelizantis et adnuntiantis pacem. Celebra, Iuda, dies festos tuos, redde uota tua; quia iam non adicient ultra, ut transeant in uetustatem. Consummatum est, consumtum est, ablatum est. Adscendit, qui insufflat in faciem tuam, eripiens te ex tribulatione. Quis adscenderit ab inferis et insufflauerit in faciem Iudae, hoc est Iudaeorum discipulorum, Spiritum sanctum, recolat qui meminit euangelium. Ad nouum enim testamentum pertinent, quorum dies festi ita spiritaliter innouantur, ut in uetustatem transire non possint. Porro per euangelium exterminata sculptilia et conflatilia, id est idola deorum falsorum, et obliuioni tamquam sepulturae tradita iam uidemus et hanc etiam in hac re prophetiam conpletam esse cognoscimus.

The prophet Nahum, or rather God through him, says: "I will destroy the carved and molten images; I will make your burial. For see, upon the mountains are the swift feet of one who brings good news and proclaims peace. Celebrate your feast days, Judah, pay your vows; for never again will they go on to pass into oldness. It is finished, it is consumed, it is taken away. He has gone up who breathes into your face, rescuing you from tribulation." Who it was that rose from the underworld and breathed the Holy Spirit into the face of Judah, that is, of the Jewish disciples, anyone who remembers the gospel may recall. For these words belong to the new covenant, whose feast days are so spiritually renewed that they cannot pass into oldness. Furthermore, we now see that through 42 Obadiah 17 and 21.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	the gospel the carved and molten images, that is, the idols of the false gods, have been destroyed and handed over to oblivion as to a burial. So we recognize that in this matter too the prophecy has been fulfilled.[43]
Ambacum de quo alio quam de Christi aduentu, qui futurus fuerat, intellegitur dicere: Et respondit Dominus ad me et dixit: Scribe uisum aperte in buxo, ut adsequatur qui legit ea; quia adhuc uisio ad tempus, et orietur in fine et non in uacuum; si tardauerit, sustine eum, quia ueniens ueniet et non morabitur?.	About what else but the coming of Christ, which was still to happen, is Habakkuk understood to be speaking when he says: "And the Lord answered me and said: Write the vision plainly on a tablet of boxwood, so that whoever reads it may grasp it. For the vision is still for its appointed time; it will rise at the end, and not in vain. If he delays, wait for him, for he will surely come and will not linger"?[44]

THE PROPHECY CONTAINED IN THE PRAYER AND SONG OF HABAKKUK

Habakkuk's prayer is read line by line as a prophecy of Christ and the Church.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.32 In oratione autem sua cum cantico cui nisi Domino Christo dicit: Domine, audiui auditionem tuam, et timui; Domine, consideraui opera tua, et expaui? Quid enim hoc est nisi praecognitae nouae ac repentinae salutis hominum ineffabilis admiratio? In medio duorum anima lium cognosceris quid est nisi aut in medio duorum testamentorum, aut in medio duorum latronum, aut in medio Moysi et Heliae cum illo in monte sermocinantium? Dum adpropinquant anni, nosceris; in aduentu temporis ostenderis, nec exponendum est. In eo cum turbata fuerit anima mea, in ira misericordiae memor eris quid est nisi quod Iudaeos in se transfigurauit, quorum gentis fuit, qui cum magna ira turbati crucifigerent Christum, ille misericordiae memor dixit: Pater ignosce illis, quia nesciunt quod faciunt?	In his prayer with a song, moreover, to whom but the Lord Christ does he say, "Lord, I have heard your report, and I was afraid; Lord, I have considered your works, and I was terrified"? What is this but the inexpressible wonder of one who foresaw the new and sudden salvation of humankind? "In the midst of two living creatures you will be known." What is this but either in the midst of the two testaments, or in the midst of the two robbers, or in the midst of Moses and Elijah talking with him on the mountain? "As the years draw near, you will be known; at the coming of the time you will be shown." This needs no explaining. "When my soul is troubled at him, in wrath you will remember mercy." What is this but that he put himself in the place of the Jews, to whose nation he belonged? For when they, troubled with great wrath, crucified Christ, he remembered mercy and said, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing."[45]
Deus de Theman ueniet et sanctus de monte umbroso et condenso. Quod hic dictum est: De Theman ueniet, alii interpretati sunt ab Austro uel Africo; per quod significatur meridies, id est feruor caritatis et splendor ueritatis. Montem uero umbrosum adque condensum,	"God will come from Teman, and the Holy One from the shady and densely wooded mountain." Where it says here, "He will come from Teman," others have translated "from the south wind" or "from the southwest wind." This signifies noon, 43 Nahum 1:14–15 and 2:1 in Augustine's text. The risen Christ breathes the Holy Spirit on the disciples in John 20:22.

44 Habakkuk 2:2–3.
45 Habakkuk 3:2. Augustine's Latin follows the Greek Septuagint, which differs considerably from the Hebrew; the last words are Luke 23:34.

LATIN

quamuis multis modis possit intellegi, libentius acceperim scripturarum altitudinem diuinarum, quibus prophetatus est Christus. Multa ibi quippe umbrosa adque condensa sunt, quae mentem quaerentis exerceant. Inde autem uenit, cum ibi eum, qui intellegit, inuenit. Operuit caelos uirtus eius, et laudis eius plena est terra quid est nisi quod etiam in psalmo dicitur: Exaltare super caelos, Deus, et super omnem terram gloria tua? Splendor eius ut lumen erit quid est nisi fama eius credentes inluminabit? Cornua in manibus eius sunt quid est nisi tropaeum crucis?

Et posuit caritatem firmam fortitudinis suae nec exponendum est. Ante faciem eius ibit uerbum, et prodiet in campum post pedes eius quid est nisi quod et antequam huc ueniret praenuntiatus est, et postea quam hinc reuersus est, adnuntiatus est? Stetit, et terra commota est quid est nisi stetit ad subueniendum, et terra commota est ad credendum? Respexit, et tabuerunt gentes, hoc est misertus est et fecit populos paenitentes. Contriti sunt montes uiolentia, hoc est uim facientibus miraculis elatorum est contrita superbia. Defluxerunt colles aeternales, hoc est humiliati sunt ad tempus, ut erigerentur in aeternum Ingressus aeternos eius pro laboribus uidi, hoc est (non sine mercede aeternitatis laborem caritatis adspexi.

Tabernacula Aethiopum expauescent et tabernacula terrae Madiam, hoc est gentes repente perterritae nuntio mirabilium tuorum etiam quae non sunt in iure Romano erunt in populo Christiano. Numquid in fluminibus iratus es, Domine, aut in fluminibus furor tuus aut in mari impetus tuus? hoc ideo dictum est, quia non uenit nunc ut iudicet mundum, sed ut saluetur mundus per ipsum. Quia adscendes super equos tuos, et equitatio tua salus, hoc est euangelistae tui portabunt te, qui reguntur a te, et euangelium tuum salus erit eis, qui credunt in te/ Intendens intendes arcum tuum super sceptra, dicit Dominus hoc est comminaberis iudicium tuum etiam regibus terrae.

ENGLISH

that is, the heat of love and the brilliance of truth. As for the shady and densely wooded mountain, although it can be understood in many ways, I would prefer to take it as the depth of the divine Scriptures, in which Christ was prophesied. For there are many shady and dense places there, to exercise the mind of the one who searches. And he comes from there when the one who understands finds him there. "His power covered the heavens, and the earth is full of his praise." What is this but what is also said in the psalm: "Be exalted above the heavens, O God, and your glory over all the earth"? "His brightness will be like the light." What is this but that his fame will enlighten believers? "Horns are in his hands." What is this but the trophy of the cross?[46]

"And he established the firm love of his strength." This needs no explaining. "The word will go before his face, and will go out into the field behind his feet." What is this but that he was foretold before he came here, and proclaimed after he returned from here? "He stood, and the earth was shaken." What is this but that he stood to bring help, and the earth was shaken into believing? "He looked, and the nations melted away"—that is, he had mercy and made the peoples repent. "The mountains were shattered by violence"—that is, by miracles that acted with force the pride of the haughty was shattered. "The everlasting hills flowed down"—that is, they were humbled for a time, so as to be raised up forever. "I saw his eternal goings in return for labors"—that is, I saw that the labor of love is not without the reward of eternity.

"The tents of the Ethiopians will be terrified, and the tents of the land of Midian"—that is, nations suddenly struck with terror at the news of your wonders, even those that are not under Roman law, will be among the Christian people. "Were you angry at the rivers, Lord, or was your fury against the rivers, or your onslaught against the sea?" This is said because he does not come now to judge the world, but so that the world may be saved through him. "For you will mount your horses, and your riding is salvation"—that is, your evangelists, who are guided by you, will carry you, and your gospel will be salvation for those who believe in you. "Bending, you will bend your bow against scepters, says the Lord"—that is, you will threaten even the kings of the earth with your judgment.

46 Psalm 56:6 (57:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

Fluminibus scindetur terra, hoc est influentibus sermonibus praedicantium te aperientur ad confitendum hominum corda, quibus est dictum: Scindite corda uestra et non uestimenta. Quid est: Videbunt te et dolebunt populi, nisi ut lugendo sint beati? Quid est: Dispergens aquas incessu, an ambulando in eis, qui te usque quaque adnuntiant, hac adque hac dispergis fluenta doctrinae? Quid est: Dedit abyssus uocem suam, an profunditas cordis humani quid ei uideretur expressit? Altitudo phantasiae suae tamquam uersus superioris est expositio; altitudo enim est abyssus. Quod autem ait: Phantasiae suae, subaudiendum est (uocem dedit); hoc est, quod diximus, quid ei uideretur expressit). Phantasia quippe uisio est, quam non tenuit, non operuit, sed confitendo eructauit.

"The earth will be split by rivers"—that is, by the inflowing words of those who preach you, human hearts will be opened to confession, the hearts to which it was said, "Tear your hearts and not your garments." What is "The peoples will see you and grieve," but that by mourning they may be blessed? What is "Scattering waters as you go," but that, walking in those who proclaim you everywhere, you scatter the streams of teaching this way and that? What is "The abyss gave forth its voice," but that the depth of the human heart expressed what appeared to it? "The depth of its imagination" is, as it were, an explanation of the previous line, for the abyss is a depth. And where he says "of its imagination," we should understand "it gave forth its voice"—that is, as we said, it expressed what appeared to it. For an imagination is a vision, which it did not hold back or conceal, but poured out in confession.[47]

Eleuatus est sol, et luna stetit in ordine suo, hoc est adscendit Christus in caelum, et ordinata est ecclesia sub rege suo. In lucem iacula tua ibunt, hoc est non in occultum, sed in manifestum tua uerba mittentur. In splendorem coruscationis armorum tuorum, subaudiendum est iacula tua ibunt Dixerat enim suis: Quae dico uobis in tenebris, dicite in lumine. In comminatione minorabis terram, id est comminando humiliabis homines. Et in furore deicies gentes, quia eos, qui se exaltant, uindicando conlides. Existi in salutem populi tui, ut saluos facias christos tuos; misisti in capita iniquorum mortem, nihil horum est exponendum. Excitasti uincula usque ad collum, et bona hic possunt intellegi uincula sapientiae, ut iniciantur pedes in conpedes eius et collum in torquem eius.

"The sun was lifted up, and the moon stood in its order"—that is, Christ ascended into heaven, and the Church was set in order under its king. "Your darts will go into the light"—that is, your words will be sent out not in secret but in the open. "Into the brightness of the flashing of your weapons"—we should understand "your darts will go." For he had said to his own, "What I tell you in the dark, speak in the light." "In threatening you will diminish the earth"—that is, by threatening you will humble human beings. "And in fury you will cast down the nations"—because by punishing them you will crush those who exalt themselves. "You went out for the salvation of your people, to save your anointed ones; you sent death upon the heads of the wicked." None of this needs explaining. "You raised up bonds as far as the neck." Here too good bonds can be understood, the bonds of wisdom, so that the feet may be put into its fetters and the neck into its collar.[48]

Praecidisti in stupore mentis, subaudimus (uincula); excitauit enim bona, praecidit mala, de quibus ei dicitur: Disrupisti uincula mea, et hoc in stupore mentis, id est

"You cut them off in amazement of mind." We understand "bonds": for he raised up the good bonds and cut off the bad, of which it is said to him, "You 47 Joel 2:13.

48 Matthew 10:27. The bonds of wisdom allude to Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 6:24.

LATIN

mirabiliter. Capita potentium mouebuntur in ea, in ea scilicet admiratione. Adaperient morsus suos, sicut edens pauper absconse. Potentes enim quidam Iudaeorum ueniebant ad Dominum facta eius et uerba mirati, et esurientes panem doctrinae manducabant absconse propter metum Iudaeorum, sicut eos prodidit euangęlium. Et inmisisti in mare equos tuos turbantes aquas multas, quae nihil sunt aliud quam populi multi; non enim alii timore conuerterentur, alii furore persequerentur, nisi omnes turbarentur. Obseruaui, et expauit uenter meus a uoce orationis labiorum meorum; et introiit tremor in ossa mea, et subtus me turbata est habitudo mea.

Intendit in ea, quae dicebat, et ipsa sua est oratione perterritus, quam prophetice fundebat et in qua futura cernebat; turbatis enim populis multis uidit inminentes ecclesiae tribulationes; continuoque se membrum eius agnouit adque ait: Requiescam in die tribulationis, tamquam ad eos pertinens, qui sunt spe gaudentes, in tribulatione patientes. Ut adscendam, inquit, ad populum peregrinationis meae, recedens utique a populo maligno carnalis cognationis suae, non peregrinante in hac terra nec supernam patriam requirente. Quoniam ficus, inquit, non adferet fructus, et non erunt natiuitates in uineis; mentietur opus oliuae, et campi non facient escam. Defecerunt ab esca oues, et non supersunt in praesepibus boues.

Vidit eam gentem, quae Christum fuerat occisura, ubertatem copiarum spiritalium perdituram, quas per terrenam fecunditatem more prophetico figurauit Et quia iram Dei talem propterea passa est illa gens, quia ignorans Dei iustitiam suam uoluit constituere, iste continuo: Ego autem, inquit, in Domino exultabo, gaudebo in Deo salutari meo. Dominus Deus meus uirtus mea, statuit pedes meos in consummationem; super excelsa inponet me, ut uincam in cantico eius, illo scilicet cantico, de quo similia quaedam dicuntur in psalmo: Statuit super petram pedes meos et direxit gressus meos, et inmisit in os meum canticum nouum, hymnum Deo have broken my bonds"—and this "in amazement of mind," that is, wondrously. "The heads of the mighty will be moved in it"—in that amazement, of course. "They will open their jaws like a poor man eating in secret." For some powerful men among the Jews came to the Lord, marveling at his deeds and words, and, being hungry, they ate the bread of his teaching in secret for fear of the Jews, as the gospel has revealed. "And you sent your horses into the sea, troubling many waters"—which are nothing other than many peoples. For some would not have been converted through fear, and others would not have persecuted through fury, unless all had been troubled. "I watched, and my belly trembled at the voice of the prayer of my lips; and trembling entered into my bones, and my whole being was troubled beneath me."[49]

ENGLISH

He turned his attention to what he was saying, and was terrified by his own prayer, which he was pouring out prophetically and in which he saw things to come. For when the many peoples were troubled, he saw the tribulations that threatened the Church. And at once he recognized himself as a member of it and said, "I will rest in the day of tribulation," as one belonging to those who are "rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation." "That I may go up," he says, "to the people of my pilgrimage"—withdrawing, of course, from the wicked people of his kin according to the flesh, who were not pilgrims in this land and did not seek the heavenly homeland. "For the fig tree will not bear fruit," he says, "and there will be no yield in the vines; the work of the olive will fail, and the fields will produce no food. The sheep have failed for lack of food, and no oxen are left in the stalls."[50]

He saw that the nation which was going to kill Christ would lose its abundance of spiritual riches, which, in the prophetic manner, he represented by the fertility of the earth. And because that nation suffered such wrath of God precisely because, being ignorant of God's righteousness, it wanted to establish its own, he at once says: "But I will exult in the Lord, I will rejoice in God my Savior. The Lord my God is my strength; he will set my feet firm to the end; he will set me upon the heights, so that I may conquer in his song." That

49 Psalm 115:16 (116:16 in most English Bibles).
50 Romans 12:12.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	nostro. Ipse ergo uincit in cantico Domini, qui placet in eius laude non sua, ut qui gloriatur, in Domino glorietur.	song, of course, about which some similar things are said in the psalm: "He set my feet upon a rock and directed my steps, and he put a new song in my mouth, a hymn to our God." So the one who conquers in the Lord's song is the one who takes pleasure in God's praise, not his own, so that "whoever glories should glory in the Lord."[51]
	Melius autem mihi uidentur quidam codices habere: Gaudebo in Deo Iesu meo, quam hi, qui uolentes id Latine ponere, nomen ipsum non posuerunt, quod est nobis amicius et dulcius nominare.	Some manuscripts, however, seem to me to have a better reading—"I will rejoice in God my Jesus"—than those whose translators, wanting to put it into Latin, did not give the name itself, which for us is dearer and sweeter to speak.[52]

WHAT JEREMIAH AND ZEPHANIAH FORETOLD BY THE SPIRIT OF PROPHECY ABOUT CHRIST AND THE CALLING OF THE NATIONS

Jeremiah and Zephaniah foretell Christ, the new covenant and the calling of the nations.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.33	Hieremias propheta de maioribus est, sicut Esaias, non de minoribus, sicut ceteri, de quorum scriptis nonnulla iam posui. Prophetauit autem regnante Iosia in Hierusalem et aput Romanos Anco Marcio, iam propinquante captiuitate Iudaeorum Tetendit autem prophetiam usque ad quintum mensem captiuitatis, sicut in eius litteris inuenimus. Sophonias autem unus de minoribus adiungitur ei. Nam et ipse in diebus Iosiae prophetasse se dicit; sed quousque, non dicit. Prophetauit ergo Hieremias non solum Anci Marcii, uerum etiam Tarquinii Prisci temporibus, quem Romani habuerunt quintum regem. Ipse enim, quando illa captiuitas facta est, regnare iam coeperat. Prophetans ergo de Christo Hieremias: Spiritus, inquit, oris nostri Christus Dominus captus est in peccatis nostris, sic breuiter ostendens et Dominum nostrum Christum et passum esse pro nobis.	The prophet Jeremiah is one of the major prophets, like Isaiah, not one of the minor ones, like the others from whose writings I have already set down several passages. He prophesied while Josiah reigned in Jerusalem and Ancus Marcius among the Romans, when the captivity of the Jews was already drawing near. And he continued his prophecy up to the fifth month of the captivity, as we find in his writings. Zephaniah, one of the minor prophets, is paired with him. For he too says that he prophesied in the days of Josiah, but he does not say until when. So Jeremiah prophesied not only in the time of Ancus Marcius but also in that of Tarquinius Priscus, whom the Romans had as their fifth king; for he had already begun to reign when that captivity took place. Prophesying of Christ, then, Jeremiah says: "The breath of our mouth, Christ the Lord, was taken in our sins," thus briefly showing both that Christ is our Lord and that he suffered for us.[53]
	Item loco alio: Hic Deus meus, inquit, et non aestimabitur alter ad eum; qui inuenit omnem uiam prudentiae et dedit eam Iacob puero suo et Israel dilecto suo; post haec in terra uisus est et cum hominibus conuersatus est. Hoc testimonium quidam non Hieremiae, sed scribae eius adtribuunt, qui uocabatur Baruch; sed Hieremiae celebratius habetur. Rursus idem propheta de ipso: Ecce,	Again, in another place: "This is my God," he says, "and no other will be reckoned beside him. He found every way of understanding and gave it to Jacob his servant and to Israel his beloved. Afterward he was seen on earth and lived among human beings." Some attribute this testimony not to 51 Psalm 39:3–4 (40:2–3 in most English Bibles); the last words are 1 Corinthians 1:31.

52 The name Jesus means "savior" or "salvation" in Hebrew, so most Latin versions rendered it as "my Savior."
53 Lamentations 4:20, traditionally ascribed to Jeremiah. Ancus Marcius and Tarquinius Priscus were the legendary fourth and fifth kings of Rome.

LATIN	ENGLISH
inquit, dies ueniunt, ait Dominus, et suscitabo Dauid germen iustum, et regnabit rex et sapiens erit et faciet iudicium et iustitiam in terra. In diebus illis saluabitur Iuda, et Israel habitabit confidenter; et hoc est nomen, quod uocabunt eum: Dominus iustus noster.	Jeremiah but to his scribe, who was called Baruch; but it is more widely held to be Jeremiah's. Again the same prophet says of him: "Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, when I will raise up for David a righteous branch, and a king will reign and will be wise and will execute judgment and justice on the earth. In those days Judah will be saved, and Israel will dwell in confidence; and this is the name by which they will call him: the Lord our Righteous One."[54]
De uocatione etiam gentium, quae fuerat futura et eam nunc inpletam cernimus, sic locutus est: Domine Deus meus et refugium meum in die malorum, ad te gentes uenient ab extremo terrae et dicent: Vere mendacia coluerunt patres nostri simulacra, et non est in illis utilitas. Quia uero non erant eum agnituri Iudaei, a quibus eum et occidi oportebat, sic idem propheta significat: Graue cor per omnia, et homo est, et quis agnoscit eum? Huius est etiam illud quod in libro septimo decimo posui de testamento nouo, cuius est mediator Christus. Ipse quippe Hieremias ait: Ecce dies ueniunt, dicit Dominus, et consummabo super domum Iacob testamentum nouum, et cetera quae ibi leguntur.	Of the calling of the nations, too, which was to come and which we now see fulfilled, he spoke thus: "O Lord my God, my refuge in the day of evils, to you the nations will come from the end of the earth and say, 'Truly our fathers worshiped lying images, and there is no profit in them.'" And because the Jews, by whom he also had to be killed, were not going to recognize him, the same prophet indicates it thus: "The heart is heavy in all things, and he is a man, and who recognizes him?" His too is the passage I set down in the seventeenth book about the new covenant, whose mediator is Christ. For Jeremiah himself says: "Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, and I will accomplish a new covenant for the house of Jacob," and the rest that is read there.[55]
Sophoniae autem prophetae, qui cum Hieremia prophetabat, haec praedicta de Christo interim ponam: Exspecta me, dicit Dominus, in die resurrectionis meae in futurum: quia iudicium meum, ut congregem gentes et colligam regna. Et iterum: Horribilis, inquit, Dominus super eos, et exterminabit omnes deos terrae, et adorabit eum uir de loco suo, omnes insulae gentium. Et paulo post: Tunc, inquit, transuertam in populos linguam et progenies eius, ut inuocent omnes nomen Domini et seruiant ei sub iugo uno; a finibus fluminum Aethiopiae adferent hostias mihi.	From the prophet Zephaniah, who prophesied alongside Jeremiah, I will for the present set down these predictions about Christ: "Wait for me, says the Lord, on the day of my resurrection in the future; for my judgment is to gather the nations and assemble the kingdoms." And again: "The Lord will be terrible against them," he says, "and he will destroy all the gods of the earth, and each man will worship him from his own place, all the islands of the nations." And a little later: "Then," he says, "I will turn a tongue toward the peoples and their offspring, so that all may call on the name of the Lord and serve him under one yoke; from the ends of the rivers of Ethiopia they will bring me sacrifices.[56]
In illo die confunderis ex omnibus adinuentionibus tuis, quas inpie egisti in me; quia tunc auferam abs te prauitates iniuriae tuae; et iam non adicies, ut magnificeris super montem sanctum meum, et	On that day you will be put to shame for all your devices, which you wickedly carried out against me; for then I will take away from you the perversities of your wrongdoing, and you will no

54 Baruch 3:35–37 and Jeremiah 23:5–6; Baruch was Jeremiah's secretary, to whom the Book of Baruch is attributed.
55 Jeremiah 16:19, 17:9 and 31:31.
56 Zephaniah 3:8, 2:11 and 3:9–12.

LATIN	ENGLISH
subrelinquam in te populum mansuetum et humilem; et uerebuntur a nomine Domini, qui reliqui fuerint Israel. Hae sunt reliquiae, de quibus alibi prophetatur, quod apostolus etiam commemorat: Si fuerit numerus filiorum Israel sicut harena maris, reliquiae saluae fient. Hae quippe in Christum illius gentis reliquiae crediderunt.	longer go on exalting yourself upon my holy mountain. And I will leave in you a meek and humble people; and those who are left of Israel will stand in awe of the name of the Lord." These are the remnant of which it is prophesied elsewhere, as the apostle also recalls: "Though the number of the children of Israel be like the sand of the sea, a remnant will be saved." For these are the remnant of that nation who believed in Christ.[57]

THE PROPHECY OF DANIEL AND EZEKIEL, WHICH AGREES IN POINTING TO CHRIST AND THE CHURCH

Daniel foresees the Son of Man's eternal kingdom; Ezekiel foresees one shepherd, David.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.34 In ipsa porro Babyloniae captiuitate prius prophetauerunt Daniel et Hiezechiel, alii scilicet duo ex prophetis maioribus. Quorum Daniel etiam tempus, quo uenturus fuerat Christus adque passurus, numero definiuit annorum; quod longum est conputando monstrare, et ab aliis factitatum est ante nos. De potestate uero eius et ecclesia sic locutus est: Videbam, inquit, in uisu noctis, et ecce cum nubibus caeli ut filius hominis ueniens erat; et usque ad uetustum dierum peruenit, et in conspectu eius praelatus est; et ipsi datus est principatus et honor et regnum, et omnes populi, tribus, linguae ipsi seruient. Potestas eius potestas perpetua, quae non transibit, et regnum eius non corrumpetur.	Earlier, during the Babylonian captivity itself, Daniel and Ezekiel prophesied—two more, that is, of the major prophets. Of these, Daniel even fixed by a number of years the time when Christ was to come and to suffer; it would take long to show this by calculation, and it has often been done by others before us. Of his power and of the Church he spoke thus: "I was watching," he says, "in a vision of the night, and behold, with the clouds of heaven one like a son of man was coming; and he came to the Ancient of Days and was presented before him. And to him were given dominion and honor and the kingdom, and all peoples, tribes and tongues will serve him. His power is an everlasting power, which will not pass away, and his kingdom will not be destroyed."[58]
Hiezechiel quoque more prophetico per Dauid Christum significans, quia carnem de Dauid semine adsumsit (propter quam formam serui, qua factus est homo, etiam seruus Dei dicitur idem Dei filius), sic eum prophetando praenuntiat ex persona Dei Patris: Et suscitabo, inquit, super pecora mea pastorem unum qui pascat ea, seruum meum Dauid; et ipse pascet ea et ipse erit his in pastorem. Ego autem Dominus ero eis in Deum, et seruus meus Dauid princeps in medio eorum; ego Dominus locutus sum. Et alio loco: Et rex, inquit, unus erit omnibus imperans; et non erunt ultra duae gentes, nec diuidentur amplius in duo regna; neque polluentur ultra in idolis suis et abominationibus et in cunctis iniquitatibus suis.	Ezekiel too, signifying Christ by David in the prophetic manner, because he took flesh from the seed of David (and because of this form of a servant, in which he became man, the same Son of God is also called the servant of God), foretells him thus in prophecy, speaking in the person of God the Father: "And I will raise up over my flocks one shepherd to feed them, my servant David; he will feed them and he will be their shepherd. And I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them; I the Lord have spoken." And in another place: "And one king," he says, "will rule over all; and there will no longer be two nations, nor will they be divided any more into two kingdoms; nor will they defile themselves any 57 Isaiah 10:22, quoted by Paul in Romans 9:27.

58 Daniel 7:13–14. The reckoning of years refers to the "seventy weeks" of Daniel 9:24–27.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	more with their idols and abominations and all their iniquities.[59]
Et saluos eos faciam de uniuersis sedibus suis, in quibus peccauerunt, et mundabo eos; et erunt mihi populus, et ego ero eis Deus; et seruus meus Dauid rex super eos, et pastor unus erit omnium eorum.	"And I will save them from all their dwelling places in which they sinned, and I will cleanse them; and they will be my people, and I will be their God; and my servant David will be king over them, and there will be one shepherd for them all."

THE PROPHECY OF THREE PROPHETS, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, AND MALACHI

Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi foretell Christ's coming, the new sacrifice and the judgment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.35 Restant tres minores prophetae, qui prophetauerunt in fine captiuitatis, Aggaeus, Zacharias, Malachias. Quorum Aggaeus Christum et ecclesiam hac apertius breuitate prophetat: Haec dicit Dominus exercituum: Adhuc unum modicum est, et ego commouebo caelum et terram et mare et aridam, et mouebo omnes gentes, et ueniet desideratus cunctis gentibus. Haec prophetia partim conpleta iam cernitur, partim speratur in fine conplenda. Mouit enim caelum angelorum et siderum testimonio, quando incarnatus est Christus; mouit terram ingenti miraculo de ipso uirginis partu; mouit mare et aridam, cum et in insulis et in orbe toto Christus adnuntiatur: ita moueri omnes gentes uidemus ad fidem. Iam uero quod sequitur: Et ueniet desideratus cunctis gentibus, de nouissimo eius exspectatur aduentu. Ut enim esset desideratus exspectantibus, prius oportuit eum dilectum esse credentibus.	There remain three minor prophets who prophesied at the end of the captivity: Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. Of these, Haggai prophesies Christ and the Church quite plainly in this brief passage: "Thus says the Lord of hosts: Yet one little while, and I will shake heaven and earth, the sea and the dry land, and I will move all nations, and the one desired by all nations will come." This prophecy we see already partly fulfilled; in part it is hoped to be fulfilled at the end. For he moved heaven by the testimony of angels and stars when Christ became incarnate; he moved the earth by the immense miracle of the virgin birth itself; he moved the sea and the dry land when Christ is proclaimed both in the islands and in the whole world. So we see all nations moved to faith. But what follows, "and the one desired by all nations will come," is awaited at his last coming. For in order to be desired by those who wait for him, he first had to be loved by those who believe.[60]
Zacharias de Christo et ecclesia: Exulta, inquit, ualde, filia Sion, iubila, filia Hierusalem; ecce rex tuus uenit tibi iustus et saluator; ipse pauper et adscendens super asinum et super pullum filium asinae; et potestas eius a mari usque ad mare et a fluminibus usque ad fines terrae. Hoc quando factum sit, ut Dominus Christus in itinere iumento huius generis uteretur, in euangelio legitur, ubi et haec prophetia commemoratur ex parte, quantum illi loco sufficere uisum est. Alio loco ad ipsum Christum in spiritu prophetiae loquens de remissione peccatorum per eius sanguinem: Tu quoque, inquit, in sanguine testamenti tui emisisti uinctos tuos de lacu, in quo non	Zechariah, of Christ and the Church: "Rejoice greatly," he says, "daughter of Zion; shout for joy, daughter of Jerusalem. Behold, your king comes to you, just and a savior; he is poor and riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey; and his power is from sea to sea and from the rivers to the ends of the earth." When this was done—when the Lord Christ on a journey made use of an animal of this kind—is read in the gospel, where this prophecy too is recalled in part, as much as seemed sufficient for that passage. In another place, speaking in the spirit of prophecy to Christ himself about 59 Ezekiel 34:23–24 and 37:22–24.

60 Haggai 2:6–7.

LATIN

est aqua. Quid per hunc lacum uelit intellegi, possunt diuersa sentiri etiam secundum rectam fidem.

Mihi tamen uidetur non eo significari melius, nisi humanae miseriae profunditatem siccam quodam modo et sterilem, ubi non sunt fluenta iustitiae, sed iniquitatis lutum. De hoc quippe etiam in psalmo dicitur: Et eduxit me de lacu miseriae et de luto limi.

Malachias prophetans ecclesiam, quam per Christum cernimus propagatam, Iudaeis apertissime dicit ex persona Dei: Non est mihi uoluntas in uobis, et munus non suscipiam de manu uestra. Ab ortu enim solis usque ad occasum magnum nomen meum in gentibus, et in omni loco sacrificabitur et offeretur nomini meo oblatio munda; quia magnum nomen meum in gentibus, dicit Dominus. Hoc sacrificium per sacerdotium Christi secundum ordinem Melchisedech cum in omni loco a solis ortu usque ad occasum Deo iam uideamus offerri, sacrificium autem Iudaeorum, quibus dictum est: Non est mihi uoluntas in uobis, nec accipiam munus de manibus uestris, cessasse negare non possunt: quid adhuc exspectant alium Christum, cum hoc, quod prophetatum legunt et inpletum uident, inpleri non potuerit nisi per ipsum?

Dicit enim paulo post de ipso ex persona Dei: Testamentum meum erat cum eo uitae et pacis, et.dedi ei, ut timore timeret me, et a facie nominis mei reuereretur. Lex ueritatis erat in ore ipsius, in pace dirigens ambulauit mecum et multos conuertit ab iniquitate; quoniam labia sacerdotis custodient scientiam et legem inquirent ex ore eius; quoniam angelus Domini omnipotentis est. Nec mirandum est, quia Domini omnipotentis angelus dictus est Christus Iesus. Sicut enim seruus propter formam serui, in qua uenit ad homines, sic angelus propter euangelium, quod nuntiauit hominibus. Nam si Graeca ista interpretemur, et euangelium bona nuntiatio est et angelus nuntius.

ENGLISH

the forgiveness of sins through his blood, he says: "You also, by the blood of your covenant, have sent your prisoners out of the pit in which there is no water." What he wants to be understood by this pit may be interpreted in different ways, even in keeping with right faith.[61]

To me, however, it seems that nothing is better signified by it than the depth of human misery, dry, as it were, and barren, where there are no streams of righteousness but only the mire of iniquity. For of this it is also said in the psalm: "And he brought me up out of the pit of misery and out of the miry clay."[62]

Malachi, prophesying the Church that we see spread abroad through Christ, says most plainly to the Jews, speaking in the person of God: "I have no pleasure in you, and I will not accept an offering from your hand. For from the rising of the sun to its setting my name is great among the nations, and in every place sacrifice will be made and a pure offering will be offered to my name; for my name is great among the nations, says the Lord." We now see this sacrifice being offered to God in every place, from the rising of the sun to its setting, through the priesthood of Christ after the order of Melchizedek. And they cannot deny that the sacrifice of the Jews, to whom it was said, "I have no pleasure in you, and I will not accept an offering from your hands," has ceased. Why then do they still await another Christ, when what they read as prophesied and see fulfilled could not have been fulfilled except through him?[63]

For a little later he says of him, in the person of God: "My covenant of life and peace was with him, and I granted him to fear me with fear and to stand in awe before my name. The law of truth was in his mouth; guiding in peace, he walked with me and turned many away from iniquity. For the lips of the priest will guard knowledge, and they will seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord Almighty." Nor should it surprise us that Christ Jesus is called the angel of the Lord Almighty. For just as he is called a servant because of the form of a servant in which he came to human beings, so he is called an angel because of the 61 Zechariah 9:9–11; the gospel passage is Matthew 21:1–11.

62 Psalm 39:3 (40:2 in most English Bibles).
63 Malachi 1:10–11.

LATIN

ENGLISH

gospel he announced to human beings. For if we translate these Greek words, "gospel" means "good news" and "angel" means "messenger."[64]

De ipso quippe iterum dicit: Ecce mittam angelum meum, et prospiciet uiam ante faciem meam; et subito ueniet in templum suum Dominus, quem uos quaeritis, et angelus testamenti, quem uos uultis. Ecce uenit, dicit Dominus omnipotens; et quis sustinebit diem introitus eius? aut quis resistet in adspectu eius? Hoc loco et primum et secundum Christi praenuntiauit aduentum; primum scilicet, de quo ait: Et subito ueniet in templum suum, id est in carnem suam, de qua dixit in euangelio: Soluite templum hoc, et in triduo resuscitabo illud; secundum uero, ubi ait: Ecce uenit, dicit Dominus omnipotens, et quis sustinebit diem introitus eius? aut quis resistet in adspectu eius?

For again he says of him: "Behold, I will send my angel, and he will survey the way before my face; and suddenly the Lord whom you seek will come to his temple, and the angel of the covenant whom you desire. Behold, he comes, says the Lord Almighty; and who will endure the day of his entrance? Or who will stand against his gaze?" In this passage he foretold both the first and the second coming of Christ. The first, of course, where he says, "And suddenly he will come to his temple," that is, into his flesh, of which he said in the gospel, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." The second, where he says, "Behold, he comes, says the Lord Almighty; and who will endure the day of his entrance? Or who will stand against his gaze?"[65]

Quod autem dixit: Dominus, quem uos quaeritis, et angelus testamenti, quem uos uultis, significauit utique etiam Iudaeos secundum scripturas, quas legunt, Christum quaerere et uelle. Sed multi eorum, quem quaesierunt et uoluerunt, uenisse non agnouerunt, excaecati in cordibus suis praecedentibus meritis suis. Quod sane hic nominat testamentum, uel supra, ubi ait: Testamentum meum erat cum eo, uel hic, ubi eum dixit angelum testamenti, nouum procul dubio testamentum debemus accipere, ubi sempiterna, non uetus, ubi temporalia sunt promissa; quae pro magno habentes plurimi infirmi et Deo uero talium rerum mercede seruientes, quando uident eis inpios abundare, turbantur.

And when he said, "the Lord whom you seek, and the angel of the covenant whom you desire," he certainly indicated that the Jews too, according to the Scriptures they read, seek and desire Christ. But many of them did not recognize that the one they sought and desired had come, for they were blinded in their hearts by their own previous deserts. As for what he here calls the covenant—whether above, where he says, "My covenant was with him," or here, where he called him the angel of the covenant—we must without doubt understand the new covenant, in which eternal things are promised, not the old, in which temporal things are promised. Very many weak people regard these temporal things as something great and serve the true God for the reward of such things; and so, when they see the wicked abounding in them, they are disturbed.

Propter quod idem propheta, ut noui testamenti aeternam beatitudinem, quae non dabitur nisi bonis, distingueret a ueteris terrena felicitate, quae plerumque datur et malis: Ingrauastis, inquit, super me uerba uestra, dicit Dominus, et dixistis: In quo detraximus de te? Dixistis: Vanus est omnis, qui seruit Deo, et quid plus, quia custodiuimus obseruationes eius, et quia ambulauimus supplicantes ante faciem Domini omnipotentis? Et nunc nos beatificamus alienos, et

That is why the same prophet, in order to distinguish the eternal happiness of the new covenant, which will be given only to the good, from the earthly happiness of the old, which is often given to the wicked as well, says: "You have made your words heavy against me, says the Lord, and you said, 'In what have we spoken against you?' You said, 'Everyone who serves God is a fool; and what more have we gained because we kept his observ-

64 Malachi 2:5–7. Greek euangelion means "good news" and angelos "messenger."
65 Malachi 3:1–2; John 2:19.

LATIN	ENGLISH
reaedificantur omnes, qui faciunt iniqua; et aduersati sunt Deo, et salui facti sunt. Haec oblocuti sunt, qui timebant Dominum, unusquisque ad proximum suum; et animaduertit Dominus et audiuit; et scripsit librum memoriae in conspectu suo eis, qui timent Dominum et reuerentur nomen eius. Isto libro significatum est testamentum nouum.	ances, and because we walked as suppliants before the face of the Lord Almighty? And now we call strangers happy, and all who do wicked things are built up again; they opposed God and were saved.' These were the complaints of those who feared the Lord, each to his neighbor; and the Lord took notice and heard, and he wrote a book of remembrance in his presence for those who fear the Lord and revere his name." By this book the new covenant is signified.[66]
Denique quod sequitur audiamus: Et erunt mihi, dicit Dominus omnipotens, in diem qua ego facio in adquisitionem, et eligam eos sicut eligit homo filium suum seruientem sibi; et conuertimini, et uidebitis inter iustum et iniustum, et inter seruientem Deo et non seruientem. Quoniam ecce dies uenit ardens sicut clibanus et concremabit eos, et erunt omnes alienigenae et omnes facientes iniquitatem stipula, et incendet illos dies, qui adueniet, dicit Dominus omnipotens; et non derelinquetur eorum radix neque sarmentum. Et orietur uobis timentibus nomen meum sol iustitiae, et sanitas in pinnis eius; et exibitis et exultabitis sicut uituli ex uinculis resoluti; et conculcabitis iniquos, et erunt cinis sub pedibus uestris in die, in quo ego facio, dicit Dominus omnipotens.	Finally, let us hear what follows: "And they will be mine, says the Lord Almighty, as a possession on the day that I am making; and I will choose them as a man chooses his son who serves him. And you will turn and see the difference between the just and the unjust, between the one who serves God and the one who does not serve him. For behold, the day comes, burning like an oven, and it will consume them; and all the foreigners and all who do wickedness will be stubble, and the day that is coming will set them on fire, says the Lord Almighty, and neither root nor branch of them will be left. And for you who fear my name the sun of righteousness will rise, with healing in its wings; and you will go out and leap for joy like calves let loose from their bonds. And you will trample the wicked, and they will be ashes under your feet on the day that I am making, says the Lord Almighty."[67]
Hic est qui dicitur dies iudicii; de quo suo loco, si Deus uoluerit, loquemur uberius.	This is what is called the day of judgment, of which, God willing, we shall speak more fully in its proper place.[68]

ESDRAS AND THE BOOKS OF THE MACCABEES

Ezra's story of truth's victory points to Christ; the Maccabees are accepted by the Church.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.36 Post hos tres prophetas, Aggaeum, Zachariam, Malachiam, per idem tempus liberationis populi ex Babylonica seruitute scripsit etiam Esdras, qui magis rerum gestarum scriptor est habitus quam propheta (sicuti est et liber, qui appellatur Esther, cuius res gesta in laudem Dei non longe ab his temporibus inuenitur); nisi forte Esdras in eo Christum prophe tasse intellegendus est, quod inter quosdam iuuenes orta quaestione, quid	After these three prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, Ezra also wrote during the same period of the people's release from bondage in Babylon. He has been regarded more as a writer of history than as a prophet. The same is true of the book called Esther, whose story, told to the praise of God, is found to belong not far from these times. Unless, perhaps, Ezra is to be understood as hav-

66 Malachi 3:13–16.
67 Malachi 3:17–4:3.
68 Augustine treats the Last Judgment in Book 20.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	amplius ualeret in rebus, cum reges unus dixisset, alter uinum, tertius mulieres, quae plerumque regibus imperarent, idem tamen tertius ueritatem super omnia demonstrauit es, e uictricem. Consulto autem euangelio Christum esse cognoscimus ueritatem.	ing prophesied Christ in the following passage. A question arose among certain young men as to what had the greatest power in the world. One said kings, another wine, and a third women, who often command kings. Yet this same third man then showed that truth is victorious over all. And when we consult the Gospel, we learn that Christ is the truth.[69]
	Ab hoc tempore aput Iudaeos restituto templo non reges, sed principes fuerunt usque ad Aristobolum: quorum subputatio temporum non in scripturis sanctis, quae appellantur canonicae, sed in aliis inuenitur, in quibus sunt et Macchabaeorum libri, quos non Iudaei, sed ecclesia pro canonicis habet propter quorundam martyrum passiones uehementes adque mirabiles, qui, antequam Christus uenisset in carne, usque ad mortem pro Dei lege certarunt et mala grauissima adque horribilia pertulerunt.	From this time, after the temple had been restored, the Jews had not kings but rulers, down to Aristobulus. The reckoning of their dates is found not in the holy scriptures called canonical but in other writings. Among these are the books of the Maccabees, which the Church, though not the Jews, holds as canonical. It does so because of the intense and wonderful sufferings of certain martyrs who, before Christ had come in the flesh, fought to the death for the law of God and endured the most grievous and horrible evils.[70]

THAT THE AUTHORITY OF THE PROPHETS IS FOUND TO BE OLDER THAN ANY ORIGIN OF PAGAN PHILOSOPHY

The Hebrew prophets, and Moses above all, are older than the Greek philosophers.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.37	Tempore igitur prophetarum nostrorum, quorum iam scripta ad notitiam fere omnium gentium peruenerunt, et multo magis post eos fuerunt philosophi gentium, qui hoc etiam nomine uocarentur, quod coepit a Samio Pythagora, qui eo tempore, quo Iudaeorum est soluta captiuitas, coepit excellere adque cognosci. Multo magis ergo ceteri philosophi post prophetas reperiuntur fuisse. Nam ipse Socrates Atheniensis, magister omnium, qui tunc maxime claruerunt, tenens in ea parte, quae moralis uel actiua dicitur, principatum, post Esdram in chronicis inuenitur. Non multo post etiam Plato natus est, qui longe ceteros Socratis discipulos anteiret.	So it was in the time of our prophets, whose writings have now come to the knowledge of nearly all nations, and much more after them, that there were philosophers among the nations who were actually called by that name. The name began with Pythagoras of Samos, who began to be prominent and well known at the time when the captivity of the Jews came to an end. All the more, then, are the other philosophers found to have lived after the prophets. For Socrates of Athens himself, the teacher of all who were most famous at that time, who holds first place in the branch of philosophy called moral or practical, is placed after Ezra in the chronicles. Not long after him Plato too was born, who far surpassed the other disciples of Socrates.
	Quibus si addamus etiam superiores, qui nondum philosophi uocabantur, septem scilicet sapientes ac deinde physicos, qui Thaleti successerunt in perscrutanda natura rerum studium eius imitati,	To these we may also add the earlier thinkers, who were not yet called philosophers: the Seven Sages, and then the natural philosophers who succeeded Thales and imitated his zeal in investigating the

69 The contest of the three young men is told in the apocryphal book 1 Esdras (3 Esdras in the Latin Bible), chapters 3–4; compare John 14:6, "I am the way, the truth and the life."
70 Aristobulus I, of the Hasmonean (Maccabean) dynasty, was the first of these rulers to take the title of king, in 104 BC.

LATIN

Anaximandrum scilicet et Anaximenem et Anaxagoram aliosque nonnullos, antequam Pythagoras philosophum primus profiteretur: nec illi prophetas nostros uniuersos temporis antiquitate praecedunt, quando quidem Thales, post quem ceteri fuerunt, regnante Romulo eminuisse fertur, quando de fontibus Israel in eis litteris, quae toto orbe manarent, prophetiae flumen erupit. Soli igitur illi theologi poetae, Orpheus, Linus, Musaeus et si quis alius aput Graecos fuit, his prophetis Hebraeis, quorum scripta in auctoritate habemus, annis reperiuntur priores.

Sed nec ipsi uerum theologum nostrum Moysen, qui unum uerum Deum ueraciter praedicauit, cuius nunc scripta in auctoritatis canone prima sunt, tempore praeuenerunt; ac per hoc, quantum ad Graecos adtinet, in qua lingua litterae huius saeculi maxime ferbuerunt, nihil habent unde sapientiam suam iactent, quo religione nostra, ubi uera sapientia est, si non superior, saltem uideatur antiquior. Verum, quod fatendum est, non quidem in Graecia, sed in barbaris gentibus, sicut in Aegypto, iam fuerat ante Moysen nonnulla doctrina, quae illorum sapientia diceretur; alioquin non scriptum esset in libris sanctis, Moysen eruditum fuisse omni sapientia Aegyptiorum, tunc utique, quando ibi natus et a filia Pharaonis adoptatus adque nutritus etiam liberaliter educatus est.

Sed nec sapientia Aegyptiorum sapientiam prophetarum nostrorum tempore antecedere potuit, quando quidem et Abraham propheta fuit. Quid autem sapientiae potuit esse in Aegypto, antequam eis Isis, quam mortuam tamquam magnam deam colendam putarunt, litteras traderet? Isis porro Inachi filia fuisse proditur, qui primus regnare coepit Argiuis, quando Abrahae iam nepotes reperiuntur exorti.

ENGLISH

nature of things, such as Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras and several others, before Pythagoras first professed himself a philosopher. Even so, not even they precede all our prophets in antiquity. For Thales, after whom the others came, is said to have flourished in the reign of Romulus, when the river of prophecy burst forth from the springs of Israel in those writings that were to flow over the whole world. Only the theological poets, then—Orpheus, Linus, Musaeus and any others there were among the Greeks—are found to be earlier in years than those Hebrew prophets whose writings we hold as authoritative.

But not even they came before our true theologian Moses, who truthfully proclaimed the one true God and whose writings now stand first in the canon of authority. And so, as far as the Greeks are concerned—in whose language the literature of this world flourished most—they have nothing on which to pride themselves for their wisdom, as if it might seem, if not superior to our religion, where true wisdom is, at least older. It must be admitted, however, that among foreign peoples, though not in Greece—in Egypt, for example—there had already been before Moses some learning which could be called their wisdom. Otherwise it would not have been written in the holy books that Moses was educated in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. That was, of course, when he was born there and, adopted and raised by Pharaoh's daughter, was also given a liberal education.[71]

But not even the wisdom of the Egyptians could precede the wisdom of our prophets in time, since Abraham too was a prophet. And what wisdom could there have been in Egypt before Isis gave them letters—Isis, whom they thought, after her death, should be worshiped as a great goddess? Isis, moreover, is reported to have been the daughter of Inachus, who was the first to reign over the Argives, at a time when Abraham's grandsons are found to have already been born.

71 Acts 7:22.

THAT THE CHURCH'S CANON DID NOT ACCEPT CERTAIN WRITINGS OF HOLY MEN BECAUSE OF THEIR EXCESSIVE ANTIQUITY, SO THAT FALSE THINGS MIGHT NOT BE SLIPPED IN AMONG THE TRUE UNDER COVER OF THEM

Writings ascribed to Noah and Enoch are excluded from the canon as doubtful.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.38	Iam uero si longe antiquiora repetam, et ante illud grande diluuium noster erat utique Noe patriarcha, quem prophetam quoque non inmerito dixerim; si quidem ipsa arca, quam fecit et in qua cum suis euasit, prophetia nostrorum temporum fuit. Quid Enoch septimus ab Adam, nonne etiam in canonica epistula apostoli Iudae prophetasse praedicatur? Quorum scripta ut aput Iudaeos et aput nos in auctoritate non essent, nimia fecit antiquitas, propter quam uidebantur habenda esse suspecta, ne proferrentur falsa pro ueris. Nam et proferuntur quaedam quae ipsorum esse dicantur ab eis, qui pro suo sensu passim quod uolunt credunt. Sed ea castitas canonis non recepit, non quod eorum hominum, qui Deo placuerunt, reprobetur auctoritas, sed quod ista esse non credantur ipsorum.	Now if I go back to far more ancient times, even before that great flood there was, of course, our patriarch Noah, whom I might with good reason also call a prophet, since the very ark he built, in which he escaped with his family, was a prophecy of our times. What of Enoch, the seventh from Adam? Is he not also said, in the canonical letter of the apostle Jude, to have prophesied? Their writings have no authority among the Jews or among us because of their excessive antiquity, which made it seem that they should be held suspect, for fear that false things might be put forward as true. For certain writings are indeed put forward, said to be theirs, by people who indiscriminately believe whatever they like according to their own taste. But the purity of the canon did not admit them—not because the authority of those men who pleased God is rejected, but because these writings are not believed to be theirs.[72]
	Nec mirum debet uideri, quod suspecta habentur, quae sub tantae antiquitatis nomine proferuntur; quando quidem in ipsa historia regum Iuda et regum Israel, quae res gestas continet, de quibus eidem scripturae canonicae credimus, commemorantur plurima, quae ibi non explicantur et in libris dicuntur aliis inueniri, quos prophetae scripserunt, et alicubi eorum quoque prophetarum nomina non tacentur; nec tamen inueniuntur in canone, quem recepit populus Dei.	Nor should it seem surprising that writings put forward under the name of such great antiquity are held suspect. For in the very history of the kings of Judah and the kings of Israel, which contains the events we believe on the authority of that same canonical scripture, a great many things are mentioned which are not explained there and are said to be found in other books written by prophets; and in some places the names of those prophets are given too. Yet these books are not found in the canon that the people of God received.
	Cuius rei, fateor, causa me latet, nisi quod existimo etiam ipsos, quibus ea, quae in auctoritate religionis esse deberent, sanctus utique Spiritus reuelabat, alia sicut homines historica diligentia, alia sicut prophetas inspiratione diuina scribere potuisse, adque haec ita fuisse distincta, ut illa tamquam ipsis, ista uero tamquam Deo per ipsos loquenti iudicarentur esse tribuenda, ac sic illa pertinerent ad uber, tatem cognitionis, haec ad religionis auctoritatem, in qua auctoritate custoditur canon, praeter quem iam si qua etiam sub nomine uerorum prophetarum scripta proferuntur, nec ad ipsam	The reason for this, I confess, escapes me. I can only suppose that even those to whom the Holy Spirit revealed the things that ought to carry religious authority could write some things as men, with a historian's diligence, and others as prophets, by divine inspiration. These two kinds were kept so distinct that the former were judged to be attributed to the writers themselves, the latter to God speaking through them. Thus the former served the abundance of knowledge, the latter the authority of religion; and it is by that authority

72 Jude 14–15, which quotes the apocryphal Book of Enoch.

LATIN	ENGLISH
copiam scientiae ualent, quoniam utrum eorum sint, quorum esse dicuntur, incertum est; et ob hoc eis non habetur fides, maxime his, in quibus etiam contra fidem librorum canonicorum quaedam leguntur, propter quod ea prorsus non esse apparet illorum.	that the canon is safeguarded. Outside the canon, if any writings are now put forward even under the name of true prophets, they are of no value even for the store of knowledge, since it is uncertain whether they belong to those to whom they are ascribed. For this reason they are not trusted—especially those in which we read things that even go against the trustworthiness of the canonical books, which makes it plain that they are not theirs at all.

THE HEBREW LETTERS, WHICH ALWAYS EXISTED WITH THE PROPER CHARACTER OF THEIR LANGUAGE

Hebrew writing is ancient; Egyptian learning came after the patriarchs.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.39 Non itaque credendum est, quod nonnulli arbitrantur, Hebraeam tantum linguam per illum, qui uocabatur Heber, unde Hebraeorum uocabulum est, fuisse seruatam, adque inde peruenisse ad Abraham, Hebraeas autem litteras a lege coepisse, quae data est per Moysen, sed potius per illam successionem patrum memoratam linguam cum suis litteris custoditam. Denique Moyses in populo constituit qui docendis litteris praeessent, priusquam diuinae legis ullas litteras nossent. Hos appellat scriptura γραμματοεισαγωγούς, qui Latine dici possunt litterarum inductores uel introductores, eo quod eas inducant, id est introducant, quodam modo in corda discentium uel in eas potius ipsos quos docent.	We should not believe, then, as some suppose, that only the Hebrew language was preserved through the man called Eber, from whom the name "Hebrews" comes, and passed from him to Abraham, while Hebrew letters began only with the law given through Moses. Rather, that language was kept, along with its letters, through that succession of fathers. In fact, Moses appointed men among the people to be in charge of teaching letters before they knew any letters of the divine law. Scripture calls these men γραμματοεισαγωγούς [introducers of letters], which in Latin can be rendered litterarum inductores or introductores—those who lead letters in, or introduce them—because in a way they lead letters into the hearts of learners, that is, introduce them, or rather lead those they teach into the letters.[73]
Nulla igitur gens de antiquitate suae sapientiae super patriarchas et prophetas nostros, quibus diuina inerat sapientia, ulla se uanitate iactauerit, quando nec Aegyptus inuenitur, quae solet falso et inaniter de suarum doctrinarum antiquitate gloriari, qualicumque sapientia sua patriarcharum nostrorum tempore praeuenisse sapientiam. Neque enim quisquam dicere audebit mirabilium disciplinarum eos peritissimos fuisse, antequam litteras nossent, id est, antequam Isis eo uenisset easque ibi docuisset. Ipsa porro eorum memorabilis doctrina, quae appellata est sapientia, quid erat nisi maxime astronomia et si quid aliud talium disciplinarum magis ad exercenda ingenia quam ad inluminandas uera sapientia mentes solet ualere?	Let no nation, then, vainly boast that the antiquity of its wisdom surpasses our patriarchs and prophets, in whom there was divine wisdom. For not even Egypt, which is accustomed to glory falsely and idly in the antiquity of its learning, is found to have preceded the wisdom of our patriarchs in time with any wisdom of its own. No one will dare to say that the Egyptians were highly skilled in wonderful sciences before they knew letters, that is, before Isis came there and taught them. And that celebrated learning of theirs, which was called wisdom—what was it but chiefly astronomy and any other such disciplines, which usually serve more to exercise the intellect than to illuminate minds with true wisdom?

73 The Greek term occurs in the Septuagint, e.g., Deuteronomy 1:15.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam quod adtinet ad philosophiam, quae se docere profitetur aliquid, unde fiant homines beati, circa tempora Mercurii, quem Trismegistum uocauerunt, in illis terris eius modi studia claruerunt, longe quidem ante sapientes uel philosophos Graeciae, sed tamen post Abraham et Isaac et Iacob et Ioseph, nimirum etiam post ipsum Moysen. Eo quippe tempore, quo Moyses natus est, fuisse reperitur Atlans ille magnus astrologus, Promethei frater, maternus auus Mercurii maioris, cuius nepos fuit Trismegistus iste Mercurius.	As for philosophy, which professes to teach something by which people may become happy, studies of that kind became famous in those lands around the time of Mercury, whom they called Trismegistus. That was long before the sages or philosophers of Greece, indeed, but still after Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph—and evidently even after Moses himself. For at the time Moses was born, there is found to have lived Atlas, that great astronomer, brother of Prometheus and maternal grandfather of the elder Mercury, whose grandson was this Mercury Trismegistus.[74]

THE UTTERLY LYING VANITY OF THE EGYPTIANS, WHO ASCRIBE A HUNDRED THOUSAND YEARS TO THE ANTIQUITY OF THEIR LEARNING

Egypt's claim to a hundred thousand years of learning is a laughable falsehood.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.40 Frustra itaque uanissima praesumtione garriunt quidam dicentes, ex quo Aegyptus rationem siderum conprehendit, amplius quam centum annorum milia numerari. In quibus enim libris istum numerum collegerunt, qui non multum ante annorum duo milia litteras magistra Iside didicerunt? Non enim paruus auctor est in historia Varro, qui hoc prodidit, quod a litterarum etiam diuinarum ueritate non dissonat. Cum enim ab ipso primo homine, qui est appellatus Adam, nondum sex annorum milia conpleantur, quo modo non isti ridendi potius quam refellendi sunt, qui de spatio temporum tam diuersa et huic exploratae ueritati tam contraria persuadere conantur? Cui enim melius narranti praeterita credimus, quam qui etiam futura praedixit, quae praesentia iam uidemus?	So some people chatter in vain, with the emptiest presumption, when they say that more than a hundred thousand years have passed since Egypt grasped the reckoning of the stars. From what books did they gather this number, when they learned letters, with Isis as their teacher, not much more than two thousand years ago? For Varro, who reported this, is no small authority in history, and what he says does not conflict with the truth of the divine writings either. Since not yet six thousand years have been completed from the first man, who was called Adam, how should those people not be laughed at rather than refuted who try to convince us of something so different about the span of time and so contrary to this established truth? For whom do we better believe when he tells of the past than one who also foretold the future, which we now see present?
Nam et ipsa historicorum inter se dissonantia copiam nobis praebet, ut ei potius credere debeamus, qui diuinae, quam tenemus, non repugnat historiae. Porro autem ciues inpiae ciuitatis diffusi usquequaque per terras cum legunt doctissimos homines, quorum nullius contemnenda uideatur auctoritas, inter se de rebus gestis ab aetatis nostrae memoria remotissimis discrepantes, cui potius credere debeant, non inueniunt. Nos uero in nostrae religionis historia fulti auctoritate diuina, quidquid ei resistit, non dubitamus esse falsissimum,	Indeed, the very disagreement of historians among themselves gives us good reason to believe instead the one who does not contradict the divine history we hold. But the citizens of the ungodly city, scattered everywhere over the earth, read the most learned men, none of whose authority seems negligible, disagreeing among themselves about events very remote from the memory of our age, and they cannot find whom they ought rather to believe. We, on the other hand, supported by di-

74 Hermes (Mercury) Trismegistus, "thrice-greatest," was a legendary Egyptian sage to whom a body of philosophical and religious writings was ascribed.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quomodolibet sese habeant cetera in saecularibus litteris, quae seu uera seu falsa sint, nihil momenti adferunt, quo recte beateque uiuamus.	vine authority in the history of our religion, do not doubt that whatever opposes it is utterly false, however the rest may stand in secular literature. Whether that is true or false, it contributes nothing of importance to our living rightly and happily.

THE DISAGREEMENTS OF PHILOSOPHICAL OPINIONS AND THE HARMONY OF THE CANONICAL SCRIPTURES IN THE CHURCH

Philosophers contradict one another freely, while the canonical authors agree.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.41 Ut autem iam cognitionem omittamus historiae, ipsi philosophi, a quibus ad ista progressi sumus, qui non uidentur laborasse in studiis suis, nisi ut inuenirent quo modo uiuendum esset adcommodate ad beatitudinem capessendam, quur dissenserunt et a magistris discipuli, et inter se condiscipuli, nisi quia ut homines humanis sensibus et humanis ratiocinationibus ista quaesierunt?	But to leave historical knowledge aside now: the philosophers themselves, from whom we moved on to these matters, seem to have labored in their studies for no other purpose than to find out how one should live so as to attain happiness. Why, then, did they disagree—disciples with their masters, and fellow disciples among themselves—if not because, as men, they sought these things with human senses and human reasoning?
Ubi quamuis esse potuerit et studium gloriandi, quo quisque alio sapientior et acutior uideri cupit nec sententiae quodam modo addictus alienae, sed sui dogmatis et opinionis inuentor, tamen ut nonnullos uel etiam plurimos eorum fuisse concedam, quos a suis doctoribus uel discendi sociis amor ueritatis abruperit, ut pro ea certarent, quam ueritatem putarent, siue illa esset, siue non esset: quid agit aut quo uel qua, ut ad beatitudinem perueniatur, humana se porrigit infelicitas, si diuina non ducit auctoritas? Denique auctores nostri, in quibus non frustra sacrarum litterarum figitur et terminatur canon, absit ut inter se aliqua ratione dissentiant.	There may also have been a desire for glory in this, by which each wishes to seem wiser and sharper than another, not bound, so to speak, to someone else's view, but the inventor of his own doctrine and opinion. Still, let me grant that some, or even most of them, were torn away from their teachers or fellow students by the love of truth, so as to fight for what they thought was the truth, whether it was or not. What does human unhappiness accomplish, where does it reach out to, or by what way, in order to attain happiness, if divine authority does not lead it? Our authors, by contrast—in whom the canon of sacred scripture is, not without reason, fixed and closed—far be it from them to disagree among themselves in any respect.
Unde non inmerito, cum illa scriberent, eis Deum uel per eos locutum, non pauci in scholis adque gymnasiis litigiosis disputationibus garruli, sed in agris adque urbibus cum doctis adque indoctis tot tantique populi crediderunt. Ipsi sane pauci esse debuerunt, ne multitudine uilesceret, quod religione carum esse oporteret; nec tamen ita pauci, ut eorum non sit miranda consensio. Neque enim in multitudine philosophorum, qui labore etiam litterario monumenta suorum dogmatum reliquerunt, facile quis inuenerit, inter quos cuncta quae sensere conueniant: quod ostendere hoc opere longum est.	Hence it is not without reason that people have believed that, when they wrote those things, God spoke to them or through them. And those who believed were not a few chatterers in schools and gymnasia engaged in contentious debates, but so many great peoples, learned and unlearned alike, in the countryside and in cities. These authors, of course, had to be few, so that what ought to be precious in religion should not become cheap through numbers; yet not so few that their agreement is not cause for wonder. For among the multitude of philosophers who have left records of their doctrines through literary labor as well, one would not easily find any who agree in everything they thought—but to show this would take too long in this work.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quis autem sectae cuiuslibet auctor sic est in hac daemonicola ciuitate adprobatus, ut ceteri inprobarentur, qui diuersa et aduersa senserunt? Nonne aput Athenas et Epicurei clarebant, adserentes res humanas ad deorum curam non pertinere, et Stoici, qui contraria sentientes eas regi adque muniri dis adiutoribus et tutoribus disputabant? Unde miror quur Anaxagoras reus factus sit, quia solem dixit esse lapidem ardentem, negans utique deum, cum in eadem ciuitate gloria floruerit Epicurus uixeritque securus, non solum solem uel ullum siderum deum esse non credens, sed nec Iouem nec ullum deorum omnino in mundo habitare contendens, ad quem preces hominum supplicationesque perueniant.

And what founder of any school has been approved in this demon-worshiping city in such a way that the others, who held different and opposing views, were disapproved? Did not the Epicureans flourish at Athens, asserting that human affairs are no concern of the gods, and the Stoics too, who held the contrary and argued that human affairs are governed and protected by the gods as helpers and guardians? So I wonder why Anaxagoras was put on trial for saying that the sun is a burning stone—thereby, of course, denying that it is a god—when in the same city Epicurus flourished in glory and lived in safety. Yet he not only did not believe that the sun or any star was a god, but maintained that neither Jupiter nor any of the gods at all dwells in the world, for human prayers and supplications to reach.[75]

Nonne ibi Aristippus in uoluptate corporis summum bonum ponens, ibi Antisthenes uirtute animi potius hominem fieri beatum adseuerans, duo philosophi nobiles et ambo Socratici, in tam diuersis adque inter se contrariis finibus uitae summam locantes, quorum etiam ille fugiendam, iste administrandam sapienti dicebat esse rem publicam, ad suam quisque sectam sectandam discipulos congregabat?

Was it not there that Aristippus, who placed the supreme good in bodily pleasure, and Antisthenes, who asserted instead that a person becomes happy through the virtue of the mind—two famous philosophers, both followers of Socrates—set the sum of life in ends so different and so contrary to each other? The former said that the wise man should shun public life, the latter that he should take part in governing the commonwealth. And did not each of them gather disciples to follow his own school?[76]

Nempe palam in conspicua et notissima porticu, in gymnasiis, in hortulis, in locis publicis ac priuatis cateruatim pro sua quisque opinione certabant, alii adserentes unum, alii innumerabiles mundos; ipsum autem unum alii ortum esse, alii uero initium non habere; alii interiturum, alii semper futurum; alii mente diuina, alii fortuito et casibus agi; alii inmortales esse animas, alii mortales; et qui inmortales, alii reuolui in bestias, alii nequaquam; qui uero mortales, alii mox interire post corpus, alii uiuere etiam postea uel paululum uel diutius, non tamen semper; alii in corpore constituentes finem boni, alii in animo, alii in utroque, alii extrinsecus posita etiam bona ad animum et corpus

Indeed, openly, in the conspicuous and very famous Porch, in gymnasia, in gardens, in public and private places, they fought in crowds, each for his own opinion. Some asserted that there is one world, others that there are countless worlds. Of this one world, some said that it had come into being, others that it had no beginning; some that it would perish, others that it would last forever; some that it was governed by a divine mind, others by chance and accident. Some said that souls are immortal, others that they are mortal. Of those who held them immortal, some said that they pass back into animals, others that they by no means 75 Anaxagoras (5th century BC) was prosecuted for impiety at Athens; Epicurus (341–270 BC) taught that the gods live apart from the world and take no part in it.

76 Aristippus of Cyrene founded the hedonist Cyrenaic school; Antisthenes was regarded as the forerunner of the Cynics.

LATIN

addentes; alii sensibus corporis semper, alii non semper, alii numquam putantes esse credendum.

Has et alias paene innumerabiles dissensiones philosophorum quis umquam populus, quis senatus, quae potestas uel dignitas publica inpiae ciuitatis diiudicandas et alias probandas ac recipiendas, alias inprobandas repudiandasque curauit, ac non passim sine ullo iudicio confuseque habuit in gremio suo tot controuersias hominum dissidentium, non de agris et domibus uel quacumque pecuniaria ratione, sed de his rebus, quibus aut misere uiuitur aut beate? Ubi etsi aliqua uera dicebantur, eadem licentia dicebantur et falsa, prorsus ut non frustra talis ciuitas mysticum uocabulum Babylonis acceperit. Babylon interpretatur quippe confusio, quod nos iam dixisse meminimus. Nec interest diaboli regis eius, quam contrariis inter se rixentur erroribus, quos merito multae uariaeque inpietatis pariter possidet.

At uero gens illa, ille populus, illa ciuitas, illa res publica, illi Israelitae, quibus credita sunt eloquia Dei, nullo modo pseudoprophetas cum ueris prophetis parilitate licentiae confuderunt, sed concordes inter se adque in nullo dissentientes sacrarum litterarum ueraces ab eis agnoscebantur et tenebantur auctores. Ipsi eis erant philosophi, hoc est amatores sapientiae, ipsi sapientes, ipsi theologi, ipsi prophetae, ipsi doctores probitatis adque pietatis. Quicumque secundum illos sapuit et uixit, non secundum homines, sed secundum Deum, qui per eos locutus est, sapuit et uixit. Ibi si prohibitum est sacrilegium, Deus prohibuit. Si dictum est: Honora patrem et matrem tuam, Deus iussit. Si dictum est: Non moechaberis, non homicidium facies, non furaberis, et cetera huius modi, non haec ora humana, sed oracula diuina fuderunt.

ENGLISH

do; of those who held them mortal, some said that they perish soon after the body, others that they live on afterward for a little while or a longer time, yet not forever. Some set the end of good in the body, others in the mind, others in both, others added external goods as well to mind and body. Some thought that the bodily senses should always be trusted, others not always, others never.[77]

What people, what senate, what public authority or office of the ungodly city ever took care to judge these and almost countless other disagreements of philosophers, approving and accepting some, disapproving and rejecting others? Did it not rather hold in its bosom, indiscriminately, without any judgment and in confusion, all these controversies of men at odds with one another—not over fields and houses or any matter of money, but over the things that make one's life either miserable or happy? There, even if some true things were said, false things were said with the same license, so that it is not without reason that such a city received the mystical name of Babylon. For Babylon means "confusion," as I recall we have already said. Nor does it matter to the devil, its king, how much they quarrel among themselves with contrary errors, since he possesses them all alike, as they deserve for their many and varied impieties.

But that nation, that people, that city, that commonwealth, those Israelites to whom the words of God were entrusted, in no way confused false prophets with true prophets by granting them equal license. Rather, they recognized and held as the truthful authors of the sacred writings those who were in harmony among themselves and disagreed on no point. These were their philosophers, that is, lovers of wisdom; these were their sages, their theologians, their prophets, their teachers of uprightness and piety. Whoever was wise and lived according to them was wise and lived not according to men but according to God, who spoke through them. If sacrilege was forbidden there, God forbade it. If it was said, "Honor your father and your mother," God commanded it. If it was said, "You shall not commit adultery, you shall not murder, you shall not steal," and other things of this kind, it was not human mouths but divine oracles that poured these forth.[78]

77 The Porch is the Painted Stoa at Athens, from which the Stoics took their name; the gardens recall the Garden where Epicurus taught.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quidquid philosophi quidam inter falsa, quae opinati sunt, uerum uidere potuerunt et laboriosis disputationibus persuadere moliti sunt, quod mundum istum Deus fecerit eumque ipse prouidentissimus administret, de honestate uirtutum, de amore patriae; de fide amicitiae, de bonis operibus adque omnibus ad mores probos pertinentibus rebus, quamuis nescientes ad quem finem et quonam modo essent ista omnia referenda, propheticis, hoc est diuinis, uocibus, quamuis per homines, in illa ciuitate populo commendata sunt, non argumentationum concertationibus inculcata, ut non hominis ingenium, sed Dei eloquium contemnere formidaret, qui illa cognosceret.

Certain philosophers, amid the false things they believed, were able to see some truths and labored to persuade others of them through painstaking arguments: that God made this world and himself governs it with the utmost providence; and truths about the honor of the virtues, love of country, loyalty in friendship, good works and everything that pertains to upright conduct—though they did not know to what end and in what way all these things should be referred. All of this was commended to the people in that city by prophetic, that is, divine, voices, though through human beings. It was not drilled in through contentious argument, so that whoever came to know these things should fear to despise not a human intellect but the word of God.

BY WHAT ARRANGEMENT OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE THE SACRED SCRIPTURES OF THE OLD TESTAMENT WERE TRANSLATED FROM HEBREW INTO GREEK, SO THAT THEY MIGHT BECOME KNOWN TO THE NATIONS

Ptolemy Philadelphus has the Scriptures translated into Greek by seventy-two scholars.

LATIN

ENGLISH

18.42 Has sacras litteras etiam unus Ptolomaeorum regum Aegypti nosse studuit et habere. Nam post Alexandri Macedonis, qui etiam Magnus cognominatus est, mirificentissimam minimeque diuturnam potentiam, qua uniuersam Asiam, immo paene totum orbem, partim ui et armis, partim terrore subegerat, quando inter cetera Orientis etiam Iudaeam ingressus obtinuit; eo mortuo comites eius cum regnum illud amplissimum non pacifice inter se possessuri diuisissent, sed potius dissipassent bellis omnia uastaturi, Ptolomaeos reges habere coepit Aegyptus; quorum primus, Lagi filius, multos ex Iudaea captiuos in Aegyptum transtulit.

One of the Ptolemies, the kings of Egypt, was also eager to know and to have these sacred writings. Alexander of Macedon, who was also surnamed the Great, had wielded a most marvelous but short-lived power, by which he had subdued all Asia—indeed nearly the whole world—partly by force of arms, partly by terror, and among other regions of the East he also entered and took Judea. After his death his companions did not divide that vast kingdom among themselves to possess it in peace, but rather tore it apart, set on laying everything waste by wars. Egypt then began to have the Ptolemies as kings. The first of them, the son of Lagus, carried many captives from Judea into Egypt.

Huic autem succedens alius Ptolomaeus, qui est appellatus Philadelphus, omnes, quos ille adduxerat subiugatos, liberos redire permisit; insuper et dona regia in templum Dei misit petiuitque ab Eleazaro tunc pontifice dari sibi scripturas, quas profecto audierat fama praedicante diuinas, et ideo concupiuerat habere in bibliotheca, quam nobilissimam fecerat. Has ei cum idem

His successor, another Ptolemy, called Philadelphus, allowed all those whom the former had brought there in subjection to return as free men. In addition, he sent royal gifts to the temple of God and asked Eleazar, then high priest, to give him the scriptures. He had heard them proclaimed by report as divine, and so he had longed to have 78 The phrase about the words of God echoes Romans 3:2; the commandments are from Exodus 20:12–15.

LATIN	ENGLISH
pontifex misisset Hebraeas, post ille etiam interpretes postulauit; et dati sunt septuaginta duo, de singulis duodecim tribubus seni homines, linguae utriusque doctissimi, Hebraeae scilicet adque Graecae, quorum interpretatio ut Septuaginta uocetur, iam obtinuit consuetudo.	them in the library he had made most renowned. When the high priest sent them to him in Hebrew, he then asked for translators too; and seventy-two were provided, six men from each of the twelve tribes, highly learned in both languages, Hebrew and Greek. Custom has by now established that their translation is called the Septuagint.[79]
Traditur sane tam mirabilem ac stupendum planeque diuinum in eorum uerbis fuisse consensum, ut, cum ad hoc opus separatim singuli sederint (ita enim eorum fidem Ptolomaeo placuit explorare), in nullo uerbo, quod idem significaret et tantundem ualeret, uel in uerborum ordine alter ab altero discreparet; sed tamquam unus esset interpres, ita quod omnes interpretati sunt unum erat; quoniam re uera spiritus erat unus in omnibus. Et ideo tam mirabile Dei munus acceperant, ut illarum scripturarum non tamquam humanarum, sed, sicut erant, tamquam diuinarum etiam isto modo commendaretur auctoritas, credituris quandoque gentibus profutura, quod iam uidemus effectum.	It is reported, indeed, that there was so marvelous, astounding and plainly divine an agreement in their words that, although each sat at this work separately (for this was how Ptolemy chose to test their trustworthiness), they did not differ from one another in a single word—not even by using a different word of the same meaning and force—or in the order of the words. Instead, as if there were one translator, what all of them had translated was one and the same, because in truth there was one Spirit in them all. And they had received so marvelous a gift of God so that the authority of those scriptures might be commended in this way as well—not as human writings but, as they truly were, as divine—to benefit the nations that would one day believe. This we now see accomplished.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE SEVENTY TRANSLATORS, WHICH, WITH DUE RESPECT TO THE HEBREW TEXT, IS TO BE PREFERRED TO ALL OTHER TRANSLATORS

The Septuagint and the Hebrew are both authoritative; the same Spirit spoke through both.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.43 Nam cum fuerint et alii interpretes, qui ex Hebraea lingua in Graecam sacra illa eloquia transtulerunt, sicut Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion; sicut etiam illa est interpretatio, cuius auctor non apparet et ob hoc sine nomine interpretis quinta editio nuncupatur: hanc tamen, quae Septuaginta est, tamquam sola esset, sic recepit ecclesia, eaque utuntur Graeci populi Christiani, quorum plerique utrum alia sit aliqua ignorant. Ex hac Septuaginta interpretatione etiam in Latinam linguam interpretatum est, quod ecclesiae Latinae tenent; quamuis non defuerit temporibus nostris presbyter Hieronymus, homo doctissimus et omnium trium linguarum peritus, qui non ex Graeco, sed ex Hebraeo in Latinum eloquium easdem, scripturas conuerterit.	Other translators have also rendered those sacred words from Hebrew into Greek, such as Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion. There is also a translation whose author is unknown, and which is therefore called the Fifth Edition, without a translator's name. Yet the Church has received this one, the Septuagint, as though it were the only one. The Greek Christian peoples use it, and most of them do not know whether any other exists. The Latin translation that the Latin churches hold was also made from this Septuagint translation. In our own time, it is true, there has been the presbyter Jerome, a most learned man and expert in all three languages, who translated these same Scriptures into Latin not from the Greek but from the Hebrew.[80]
Sed eius tam litteratum laborem quamuis Iudaei fateantur esse ueracem, septuaginta uero interpretes in	The Jews admit that his learned labor is accurate, and they contend that the seventy translators

LATIN

multis errasse contendant: tamen ecclesiae Christi tot hominum auctoritati ab Eleazaro tunc pontifice ad hoc tantum opus electorum neminem iudicant praeferendum; quia, etsi non in eis unus apparuisset spiritus sine dubitatione diuinus, sed inter se uerba interpretationis suae septuaginta docti more hominum contulissent, ut, quod placuisset omnibus, hoc maneret, nullus eis unus interpres debuit anteponi; cum uero tantum in eis signum diuinitatis apparuerit, profecto quisquis alius illarum scripturarum ex Hebraea in quamlibet aliam linguam interpres est uerax, aut congruit illis septuaginta interpretibus, aut si non congruere uidetur, altitudo ibi prophetica esse credenda est.

Spiritus enim, qui in prophetis erat, quando illa dixerunt, idem ipse erat etiam in septuaginta uiris, quando illa interpretati sunt; qui profecto auctoritate diuina et aliud dicere potuit, tamquam propheta ille utrumque dixisset, quia utrumque idem Spiritus diceret, et hoc ipsum aliter, ut, si non eadem uerba, idem tamen sensus bene intellegentibus dilucesceret, et aliquid praetermittere et aliquid addere, ut etiam hinc ostenderetur non humanam fuisse in illo opere seruitutem, quam uerbis debebat interpres, sed diuinam potius potestatem, quae mentem replebat et regebat interpretis.

Nonnulli autem codices Graecos interpretationis Septuaginta ex Hebraeis codicibus emendandos putarunt; nec tamen ausi sunt detrahere, quod Hebraei non habebant et Septuaginta posuerunt; sed tantum modo addiderunt, quae in Hebraeis inuenta aput Septuaginta non erant, eaque signis quibusdam in stellarum modum factis ad capita eorundem uersuum notauerunt, quae signa asteriscos uocant. Illa uero, quae non habent Hebraei, habent autem Septuaginta, similiter ad capita uersuum iacentibus uirgulis, sicut scribuntur unciae, signauerunt. Et multi codices has notas habentes usquequaque diffusi sunt et Latini. Quae autem non praetermissa uel addita, sed aliter dicta sunt, siue alium sensum faciant etiam ipsum non abhorrentem, siue alio went wrong in many places. Even so, the churches of Christ judge that no one should be preferred to the authority of so many men, chosen by Eleazar, then high priest, for so great a task. Suppose a single spirit, undoubtedly divine, had not appeared in them. Suppose instead that the seventy scholars had compared the wording of their translation with one another in the ordinary human way, so that whatever all of them agreed on would stand. Even then, no single translator ought to be placed above them. But since so great a sign of divinity did appear in them, any other accurate translator of those Scriptures from Hebrew into any other language either agrees with those seventy translators or, where he seems not to agree, we must believe that a prophetic depth lies in that passage.

ENGLISH

For the Spirit who was in the prophets when they spoke those words was the very same Spirit who was in the seventy men when they translated them. By divine authority he could certainly say something different, as though the prophet had said both, since the same Spirit would be saying both. He could also say the same thing differently, so that, even if the words were not the same, the same meaning would still shine through to those who understand rightly. And he could leave something out and add something, so that this too might show that in that work there was not the human servitude that a translator owes to words. Rather, there was a divine power that filled and governed the translator's mind.

Some people, however, thought that the Greek manuscripts of the Septuagint translation ought to be corrected from the Hebrew manuscripts. Yet they did not dare to remove what the Septuagint included and the Hebrew lacked. They only added what was found in the Hebrew but was not in the Septuagint. They marked these additions at the beginning of the relevant lines with certain signs shaped like stars, which they call asterisks. What the Hebrew lacks but the Septuagint has, they likewise marked at the beginning of the lines with short horizontal strokes, like those used in writing ounces. Many manuscripts bearing these marks 80 Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion made Greek versions of the Hebrew Scriptures in the 2nd century AD. Jerome's translation from the Hebrew became the core of the later Latin Vulgate.

79 Ptolemy II Philadelphus reigned 283–246 BC; the story of the translation is told in the Letter of Aristeas.

LATIN	ENGLISH
modo eundem sensum explicare monstrentur, nisi utrisque codicibus inspectis nequeunt reperiri.	have spread everywhere, Latin ones too. But some passages have not been omitted or added but expressed differently. They may yield a different meaning that is itself not incompatible, or they may be shown to express the same meaning in another way. These cannot be found except by examining both sets of manuscripts.[81]
Si ergo, ut oportet, nihil aliud intueamur in scripturis illis, nisi quid per homines dixerit Dei Spiritus, quidquid est in Hebraeis codicibus et non est aput interpretes septuaginta, noluit ea per istos, sed per illos prophetas Dei Spiritus dicere. Quidquid uero est aput Septuaginta, in Hebraeis autem codicibus non est, per istos ea maluit quam per illos idem Spiritus dicere, sic ostendens utrosque fuisse prophetas. Isto enim modo alia per Esaiam, alia per Hieremiam, alia per alium aliumque prophetam uel aliter eadem per hunc ac per illum dixit, ut uoluit.	So we should look for nothing in those Scriptures except what the Spirit of God has said through human beings. If we do that, then whatever is in the Hebrew manuscripts and not in the seventy translators, the Spirit of God chose to say not through these men but through those prophets. And whatever is in the Septuagint but not in the Hebrew manuscripts, the same Spirit preferred to say through these men rather than through those, thus showing that both were prophets. In just this way he said some things through Isaiah, others through Jeremiah, and others through one prophet or another. Or he said the same things differently through this one and that one, as he willed.
Quidquid porro aput utrosque inuenitur, per utrosque dicere uoluit unus adque idem Spiritus; sed ita ut illi praecederent prophetando, isti sequerentur prophetice illos interpretando; quia sicut in illis uera et concordantia dicentibus unus pacis Spiritus fuit, sic et in istis non secum conferentibus et tamen tamquam ore uno cuncta interpretantibus idem Spiritus unus apparuit.	Further, whatever is found in both, the one and the same Spirit willed to say through both. But he did so in such a way that the prophets went first by prophesying, and the translators followed by translating them prophetically. For there was one Spirit of peace in the prophets when they spoke truly and in harmony. In the same way, the same one Spirit appeared in the translators, who did not consult one another and yet translated everything as if with one mouth.

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE DESTRUCTION OF NINEVEH, WHOSE ANNOUNCEMENT IN THE HEBREW EXTENDS OVER FORTY DAYS, BUT IN THE SEPTUAGINT IS CONFINED TO THREE

Jonah's forty days and the Septuagint's three both signify Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.44 Sed ait aliquis: Quo modo sciam quid Ionas propheta dixerit Nineuitis, utrum: Triduum, et Nineue euertetur, an: Quadraginta dies? Quis enim non uideat non potuisse utrumque tunc dici a propheta, qui missus fuerat terrere comminatione inminenti exitii ciuitatem? Cui si tertio die fuerat futurus interitus, non utique quadragensimo die; si autem quadragensimo, non utique tertio. Si ergo a me quaeritur, quid horum Ionas dixerit, hoc puto potius quod legitur in Hebraeo: Quadraginta dies, et Nineue	But someone says: "How am I to know what the prophet Jonah said to the Ninevites? Was it 'Three days, and Nineveh will be overthrown,' or 'Forty days'?" For who does not see that the prophet could not have said both at that time? He had been sent to terrify the city with the threat of imminent destruction. If its ruin was to come on the third day, then certainly not on the fortieth, and if on the fortieth, then certainly not on the third. So if I

81 This system of critical signs goes back to Origen's edition of the Old Testament in parallel columns, the Hexapla (3rd century AD). The horizontal stroke was called an obelus.

LATIN

euertetur. Septuaginta quinque longe posterius interpretati aliud dicere potuerunt, quod tamen ad rem pertineret et in unum eundemque sensum, quamuis sub altera significatione, concurreret, admoneretque lectorem utraque auctoritate non spreta ab historia sese adtollere ad ea requirenda, propter quae significanda historia ipsa conscripta est.

Gesta sunt quippe illa in, Nineue ciuitate, sed aliquid etiam significauerunt, quod modum illius ciuitatis excedat; sicut gestum est, quod ipse propheta in uentre ceti triduo fuit, et tamen alium significauit in profundo inferni triduo futurum, qui dominus est omnium prophetarum.

Quapropter si per illam ciuitatem recte accipitur ecclesia gentium prophetice figurata, euersa scilicet per paenitentiam, ut qualis fuerat iam non esset, hoc quoniam per Christum factum est in ecclesia gentium, cuius illa Nineue figuram gerebat, siue per quadraginta dies siue per triduum idem ipse significatus est Christus; per quadraginta scilicet, quia tot dies peregit cum discipulis suis post resurrectionem et adscendit in caelum; per triduum uero, quia die tertio resurrexit; tamquam lectorem nihil aliud quam historiae rerum gestarum inhaerere cupientem de somno excitauerint septuaginta interpretes idemque prophetae ad perscrutandam altitudinem prophetiae et quodam modo dixerint: In quadraginta diebus ipsum quaere, in quo et triduum potueris inuenire; illud in adscensione, hoc in eius resurrectione reperies.

Propter quod utroque numero significari conuenientissime potuit, quorum unum per Ionam prophetam, alterum per septuaginta interpretum prophetiam, tamen unus adque idem Spiritus dixit. Longitudinem fugio, ut non haec per multa demonstrem, in quibus ab Hebraica ueritate putantur septuaginta interpretes discrepare et bene intellecti inueniuntur esse concordes. Unde etiam ego pro meo modulo uestigia sequens apostolorum, quia et ipsi ex utriusque, id est ex Hebraeis et ex Septuaginta, testimonia prophetica am asked which of these Jonah said, I think it was rather what is read in the Hebrew: "Forty days, and Nineveh will be overthrown." The seventy, translating much later, could say something different. Yet it still bore on the matter and converged on one and the same meaning, though under a different sign. It would also prompt the reader, while despising neither authority, to rise above the history and seek out the things the history itself was written to signify.[82]

ENGLISH

Those events really did take place in the city of Nineveh, but they also signified something beyond the scope of that city. In the same way, it really happened that the prophet himself was in the belly of the sea monster for three days. Yet this signified another, the Lord of all the prophets, who would be in the depths of the underworld for three days.

So that city may rightly be taken as a prophetic figure of the Church of the nations, overthrown through repentance, so that it was no longer what it had been. This was done through Christ in the Church of the nations, of which that Nineveh was a figure. Therefore it is the very same Christ who is signified, whether by forty days or by three. He is signified by forty because he spent that many days with his disciples after his resurrection and then ascended into heaven. He is signified by three because he rose on the third day. Some readers want to cling to nothing but the history of events. It is as if the seventy translators, who were also prophets, roused such a reader from sleep to search out the depth of the prophecy, and in a way said: "Seek in the forty days the one in whom you may also find the three days. You will find the former in his ascension, the latter in his resurrection."

That is why it could be signified most fittingly by either number. One was spoken through the prophet Jonah and the other through the prophecy of the seventy translators, yet both by one and the same Spirit. I avoid going on at length, and so I will not demonstrate this through the many passages in which the seventy translators are thought to differ from the Hebrew truth but, rightly understood, are found to agree. I too, in my small measure, follow in the footsteps of the apostles, who 82 Jonah 3:4. The Hebrew reads "forty days"; the Septuagint reads "three days."

LATIN	ENGLISH
posuerunt, utraque auctoritate utendum putaui, quoniam utraque una adque diuina est. Sed iam quae restant, ut possumus, exsequamur.	themselves cited prophetic testimonies from both, that is, from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint. So I have thought it right to use both authorities, since both are one and divine. But now let us pursue, as best we can, what remains.

THAT AFTER THE REBUILDING OF THE TEMPLE THE JEWS CEASED TO HAVE PROPHETS AND FROM THEN UNTIL THE BIRTH OF CHRIST WERE AFFLICTED WITH CONTINUAL ADVERSITY, WHICH PROVES THAT THE PROPHETS' WORDS PROMISED THE BUILDING OF ANOTHER TEMPLE

After the return the Jews lose their prophets and suffer one disaster after another until Herod.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.45 Postea quam gens Iudaea coepit non habere prophetas, procul dubio deterior facta est, eo scilicet tempore, quo se sperabat instaurato templo post captiuitatem, quae fuit in Babylonia, futuram esse meliorem. Sic quippe intellegebat populus ille carnalis, quod praenuntiatum est per Aggaeum prophetam dicentem: Magna erit gloria domus istius nouissimae, plus quam primae; quod de nouo testamento dictum esse paulo superius demonstrauit, ubi ait aperte Christum promittens: Et mouebo omnes gentes, et ueniet desideratus cunctis gentibus. Quo loco septuaginta interpretes alium sensum magis corpori quam capiti, hoc est magis ecclesiae quam Christo, conuenientem prophetica auctoritate dixerunt: Venient quae electa sunt Domini de cunctis gentibus, id est homines, de quibus ipse Iesus in euangelio: Multi, inquit, uocati, pauci uero electi.	After the Jewish nation ceased to have prophets, it undoubtedly grew worse. This happened at the very time when it hoped to become better, once the temple had been restored after the captivity in Babylon. For that was how that carnal people understood what was foretold through the prophet Haggai, when he said: "The glory of this latter house will be great, greater than that of the first." A little earlier he showed that this was said of the New Testament, where he plainly promises Christ: "And I will move all nations, and the one desired by all nations will come." In this passage the seventy translators, with prophetic authority, gave another sense, one more fitting to the body than to the head, that is, to the Church rather than to Christ: "What is chosen of the Lord will come from all nations." They mean human beings, of whom Jesus himself says in the gospel: "Many are called, but few are chosen."[83]
Talibus enim electis gentium domus aedificatur Dei per testamentum nouum lapidibus uiuis, longe gloriosior, quam templum illud fuit, quod a rege Salomone constructum est et post captiuitatem instauratum. Propter hoc ergo nec prophetas ex illo tempore habuit illa gens et multis cladibus adflicta est ab alienigenis regibus ipsisque Romanis, ne hanc Aggaei prophetiam in illa instauratione templi opinaretur inpletam.	For with such chosen ones from the nations, the house of God is being built out of living stones through the New Testament. It is far more glorious than that temple which was built by King Solomon and restored after the captivity. This is why that nation had no prophets from that time on, and was afflicted with many disasters by foreign kings and by the Romans themselves. It was so that the nation would not suppose that this prophecy of Haggai had been fulfilled in that restoration of the temple.
Non multo post enim adueniente Alexandro subiugata est, quando etsi nulla est facta uastatio, quoniam non sunt ei ausi resistere et ideo placatum facillime subditi receperunt, non erat tamen gloria tanta domus illius, quanta fuit in suorum regum libera potestate. Hostias	For not long afterward, when Alexander came, the nation was subjugated. No devastation took place, since they did not dare resist him, and so they submitted and received him, and he was very easily appeased. Still, the glory of that house was not 83 Haggai 2:9 and 2:7; Matthew 22:14.

LATIN

sane Alexander immolauit in Dei templo, non ad eius cultum uera pietate conuersus, sed inpia uanitate cum dis eum falsis colendum putans. Deinde Ptolomaeus, Lagi filius, quod supra memoraui, post Alexandri mortem captiuos inde in Aegyptum transtulit, quos eius successor Ptolomaeus Philadelphus beneuolentissime inde dimisit; per quem factum est, quod paulo ante narraui, ut septuaginta interpretum scripturas haberemus. Deinde contriti sunt bellis, quae in Macchabaeorum libris explicantur.

Post haec capti a rege Alexandriae Ptolomaeo, qui est appellatus, Epiphanes; inde ab Antiocho rege Syriae multis et grauissimis malis ad idola colenda conpulsi, templumque ipsum repletum sacrilegis superstitionibus gentium, quod tamen dux eorum strenuissimus ludas, qui etiam Macchabaeus dictus est, Antiochi ducibus pulsis ab omni illa idolatriae contaminatione mundauit.

Non autem multo post Alcimus quidam per ambitionem, cum a genere sacerdotali esset alienus, quod nefas erat, pontifex factus est. Hinc iam post annos ferme quinquaginta, in quibus eis tamen pax non fuit, quamuis aliqua et prospere gesserint, primus aput eos Aristobolus adsumto diademate et rex et pontifex factus est. Antea quippe, ex quo de Babyloniae captiuitate reuersi sunt templumque instauratum est, non reges, sed duces uel principes habuerunt; quamuis et qui rex est possit dici princeps a principatu imperandi et dux eo, quod sit ductor exercitus; sed non continuo, quicumque principes uel duces sunt, etiam reges dici possunt, quod iste Aristobolus fuit. Cui successit Alexander, etiam ipse rex et pontifex, qui crudeliter in suos regnasse traditur.

Post hunc uxor eius Alexandra regina Iudaeorum fuit, ex cuius tempore deinceps mala sunt eos secuta grauiora. Filii quippe huius Alexandrae Aristobolus et Hyrcanus inter se de imperio dimicantes uires aduersus Israeliticam gentem prouocauere Romanas. Hyrcanus namque ab eis contra fratrem poposcit auxilium. Tunc as great as it had been under the free rule of their own kings. Alexander did indeed offer sacrifices in the temple of God. Yet this was not because he had turned to God's worship in true piety. In his impious vanity he thought God should be worshiped along with false gods. Then, after Alexander's death, Ptolemy son of Lagus carried captives from there to Egypt, as I mentioned above. His successor Ptolemy Philadelphus released them with the greatest kindness. It was through him, as I recounted a little earlier, that we came to have the Scriptures of the seventy translators. After that they were crushed by the wars described in the books of the Maccabees.

ENGLISH

After this they were captured by Ptolemy, king of Alexandria, who was called Epiphanes. Then Antiochus, king of Syria, forced them by many grievous sufferings to worship idols, and the temple itself was filled with the sacrilegious superstitions of the nations. Yet their most vigorous leader Judas, also called Maccabeus, drove out Antiochus's generals and cleansed the temple of all that defilement of idolatry.[84]

Not long afterward a certain Alcimus became high priest through ambition, though he was not of priestly lineage, which was unlawful. After this came about fifty years in which they had no peace, though they did have some successes. Then Aristobulus became the first among them to assume the diadem and become both king and high priest. Before that, from the time they returned from captivity in Babylon and the temple was restored, they had not kings but leaders or princes. Of course, a king can also be called a prince, from the princely power of commanding, and a leader, because he leads an army. But it does not follow that all princes or leaders can also be called kings, as this Aristobulus was. He was succeeded by Alexander, who was also both king and high priest and is said to have reigned cruelly over his own people.[85]

After him his wife Alexandra was queen of the Jews, and from her time on, worse evils followed them. This Alexandra's sons, Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, fought each other for power and so provoked Roman forces against the nation of Israel, for Hyrcanus asked the Romans for help against 84 Antiochus IV Epiphanes desecrated the temple in 167 BC, and Judas Maccabeus rededicated it in 164 BC.

85 Aristobulus I reigned 104–103 BC; Alexander Jannaeus, 103–76 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
iam Roma subiugauerat Africam, subiugauerat Graeciam lateque etiam aliis orbis partibus imperans, tamquam se ipsam non ualens ferre, sua se quodam modo magnitudine fregerat. Peruenerat quippe ad seditiones domesticas graues? adque inde ad bella socialia moxque ciuilia, tantumque se comminuerat et adtriuerat, ut ei mutandus rei publicae status, quo regeretur regibus, inmineret.	his brother. By then Rome had subjugated Africa and had subjugated Greece. It ruled far and wide over other parts of the world too, and, as if unable to bear its own weight, it had in a sense broken itself by its own greatness. For it had come to serious uprisings at home, then to the wars with its allies, and soon to the civil wars. It had so weakened and worn itself down that a change in the constitution of the commonwealth was imminent, by which it would be ruled by kings.[86]
Pompeius ergo, populi Romani praeclarissimus princeps, Iudaeam cum exercitu ingressus ciuitatem capit, templum reserat, non deuotione supplicis, sed iure uictoris, et ad sancta sanctorum, quo nisi summum sacerdotem non licebat intrare, non ut uenerator, sed ut profanator accedit; confirmatoque Hyrcani pontificatu et subiugatae genti inposito custode Antipatro, quos tunc procuratores uocabant, uinctum secum Aristobolum ducit. Ex illo Iudaei etiam tributarii Romanorum esse coeperunt. Postea Cassius etiam templum exspoliauit. Deinde post paucos annos etiam Herodem alienigenam regem habere meruerunt, quo regnante natus est Christus. Iam enim uenerat plenitudo temporis significata prophetico spiritu per os patriarchae Iacob, ubi ait: Non deficiet princeps ex Iuda, neque dux de femoribus eius, donec ueniat cui repositum est, et ipse exspectatio gentium.	So Pompey, a most illustrious leader of the Roman people, entered Judea with an army and captured the city. He opened up the temple, not with the devotion of a suppliant but by a conqueror's right. He approached the Holy of Holies, which no one but the high priest was permitted to enter, not as a worshiper but as a profaner. He confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood and set Antipater over the subjugated nation as guardian, an office then called procurator. Then he led Aristobulus away with him in chains. From then on the Jews also became tributaries of the Romans. Later Cassius even plundered the temple. Then, after a few years, they deserved to have even a foreigner, Herod, as their king, and in his reign Christ was born. For the fullness of time had now come, as the prophetic Spirit had signified through the mouth of the patriarch Jacob, where he says: "A ruler shall not be lacking from Judah, nor a leader from his thighs, until he comes for whom it is stored up; and he is the expectation of the nations."[87]
Non ergo defuit Iudaeorum princeps ex Iudaeis usque ad istum Herodem, quem primum acceperunt alienigenam regem. Tempus ergo iam erat, ut ueniret ille, cui repositum erat, quod nouo promissum est testamento, ut ipse esset exspectatio gentium. Fieri autem non posset, ut exspectarent eum gentes uenturum, sicut eum cernimus exspectari, ut ueniat ad faciendum iudicium in claritate potentiae, nisi prius in eum crederent, cum uenit ad patiendum iudicium in humilitate patientiae.	So the Jews did not lack a ruler from among the Jews until this Herod, the first foreign king they received. It was therefore now time for the coming of him for whom was stored up what the New Testament promises: that he himself would be the expectation of the nations. We see the nations expecting him to come and execute judgment in the brightness of power. But they could not expect this unless they had first believed in him when he came to undergo judgment in the humility of patience.

86 The "wars with its allies" are the Social War (91–88 BC) between Rome and its Italian allies.
87 Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 BC; Cassius, one of Julius Caesar's assassins, governed Syria in the 50s and 40s BC. The quotation is Genesis 49:10.

THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOR, AS THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH, AND THE SCATTERING OF THE JEWS AMONG ALL NATIONS, AS HAD BEEN PROPHESIED

Christ is born under Herod and Augustus; the scattered Jews bear witness to the prophecies.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.46	Regnante ergo Herode in Iudaea, aput Romanos autem iam mutato rei publicae statu imperante Caesare Augusto et per eum orbe pacato natus est Christus secundum praecedentem prophetiam in Bethleem Iudae, homo manifestus ex homine uirgine, Deus occultus ex Deo Patre. Sic enim propheta praedixerat: Ecce uirgo accipiet in utero et pariet filium, et uocabunt nomen eius Emmanuel, quod est interpretatum: Nobiscum Deus. Qui ut in se commendaret Deum, miracula multa fecit, ex quibus quaedam, quantum ad eum praedicandum satis esse uisum est, scriptura euangelica continet. Quorum primum est, quod tam mirabiliter natus est; ultimum autem, quod cum suo resuscitato a mortuis corpore adscendit in caelum.	So while Herod was reigning in Judea, the constitution of the Roman commonwealth had now changed, Caesar Augustus was emperor, and the world had been brought to peace through him. At that time, as earlier prophecy had foretold, Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judah: a man plainly seen, born of a human virgin; God hidden, born of God the Father. For thus the prophet had foretold: "See, a virgin will conceive in her womb and bear a son, and they will call his name Emmanuel," which is interpreted, "God with us." To commend the God within him, he performed many miracles. The gospel Scripture contains some of them, as many as seemed sufficient for proclaiming him. The first of these is that he was born in so wonderful a way. The last is that he ascended into heaven with his own body, raised from the dead.[88]
	Iudaei autem, qui eum occiderunt et in eum credere noluerunt, quia oportebat eum mori et resurgere, uastati infelicius a Romanis funditusque a suo regno, ubi iam eis alienigenae dominabantur, eradicati dispersique per terras (quando quidem ubique non desunt) per scripturas suas testimonio nobis sunt prophetias nos non finxisse de Christo; quas plurimi eorum considerantes et ante passionem et maxime post eius resurrectionem crediderunt in eum, de quibus praedictum est: Si fuerit numerus filiorum Israel sicut harena maris, reliquiae saluae fient. Ceteri uero excaecati sunt, de quibus praedictum est: Fiat mensa eorum in laqueum et in retributionem et scandalum. Obscurentur oculi eorum, ne uideant; et dorsum illorum semper incurua. Proinde cum scripturis nostris non credunt, conplentur in eis suae, quas caeci legunt.	But the Jews killed him and refused to believe in him, because it was necessary for him to die and rise again. They were then laid waste more wretchedly by the Romans and uprooted completely from their kingdom, where foreigners were already ruling over them. They were scattered throughout the lands, since they are found everywhere. Through their own Scriptures they bear witness for us that we did not invent the prophecies about Christ. Very many of them reflected on these prophecies and believed in him, both before his passion and especially after his resurrection. Of them it was foretold: "Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant will be saved." The rest were blinded, and of them it was foretold: "Let their table become a snare, a retribution and a stumbling block. Let their eyes be darkened so that they do not see, and bend their backs always." So when they do not believe our Scriptures, their own Scriptures, which they read without seeing, are fulfilled in them.[89]
	Nisi forte quis dixerit illas prophetias Christianos finxisse de Christo, quae Sibyllae nomine proferuntur uel	Perhaps someone will say that the Christians invented those prophecies about Christ that are put 88 Isaiah 7:14, as quoted in Matthew 1:23.

89 Isaiah 10:22 (quoted in Romans 9:27) and Psalm 68:23–24 (69:22–23 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

aliorum, si quae sunt, quae non pertinent ad populum Iudaeorum. Nobis quidem illae sufficiunt, quae de nostrorum inimicorum codicibus proferuntur, quos agnoscimus propter hoc testimonium, quod nobis inuiti perhibent eosdem codices habendo adque seruando, per omnes gentes etiam ipsos esse dispersos, quaqua uersum Christi ecclesia dilatatur. Nam prophetia in psalmis, quos legunt etiam, de hac re praemissa est, ubi scriptum est: Deus meus, misericordia eius praeueniet me; Deus meus demonstrauit mihi in inimicis meis, ne occideris eos, ne quando obliuiscantur legem tuam; disperge eos in uirtute tua.

Demonstrauit ergo Deus ecclesiae in eius inimicis Iudaeis gratiam misericordiae suae, quoniam, sicut dicit apostolus, delictum illorum salus gentibus; et ideo non eos occidit, id est non in eis perdidit quod sunt Iudaei, quamuis a Romanis fuerint deuicti et obpressi, ne obliti legem Dei ad hoc, de quo agimus, testimonium nihil ualerent. Ideo parum fuit, ut diceret: Ne occideris eos, ne quando obliuiscantur legem tuam, nisi adderet etiam: Disperge eos; quoniam si cum isto testimonio scripturarum in sua tantummodo terra, non ubique essent, profecto ecclesia, quae ubique est, eos prophetiarum, quae de Christo praemissae sunt, testes in omnibus gentibus habere non posset.

ENGLISH

forward under the name of the Sibyl, or of others, if there are any, who do not belong to the Jewish people. For us, certainly, the prophecies brought forward from the books of our enemies are enough. These enemies bear this testimony for us against their will by having and preserving those books. And we recognize that they themselves have been scattered among all nations for the sake of this testimony, wherever the Church of Christ spreads. For a prophecy about this was given in advance in the Psalms, which they also read, where it is written: "My God, his mercy will go before me. My God has shown me concerning my enemies: do not kill them, lest they ever forget your law; scatter them in your might."[90]

So God has shown the Church the grace of his mercy in its enemies the Jews, since, as the apostle says, "their offense is salvation for the nations." And so he has not killed them. That is, he has not destroyed in them the fact that they are Jews, although they were conquered and oppressed by the Romans. Otherwise they might forget the law of God and be of no use for the testimony we are discussing. That is why it was not enough to say, "Do not kill them, lest they ever forget your law," without adding, "Scatter them." For suppose they possessed this testimony of the Scriptures only in their own land, and not everywhere. Then the Church, which is everywhere, certainly could not have them among all nations as witnesses to the prophecies given beforehand about Christ.[91]

WHETHER BEFORE CHRISTIAN TIMES THERE WERE ANY OUTSIDE THE RACE OF ISRAEL WHO BELONGED TO THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE HEAVENLY CITY

Some outside Israel, like Job, belonged to the heavenly city.

LATIN

18.47 Quapropter quisquis alienigena, id est non ex Israel progenitus nec ab illo populo in canonem sacrarum litterarum receptus, legitur aliquid prophetasse de Christo, si in nostram notitiam uenit aut uenerit, ad cumulum a nobis commemorari potest; non quo necessarius sit, etiamsi desit, sed quia non incongrue creditur fuisse et in aliis gentibus homines, quibus hoc mysterium, reuelatum est, et qui haec etiam praedicere inpulsi sunt, siue participes eiusdem gratiae fuerint siue expertes, sed per malos angelos docti sunt, quos etiam

ENGLISH

Therefore some foreigner may be read to have prophesied something about Christ: someone not descended from Israel and not received by that people into the canon of sacred writings. If such a person has come or comes to our knowledge, we can mention him as additional support. This is not because he is necessary, for we would lack nothing without him. It is because it is not unfitting to believe that among other nations too there were

90 Psalm 58:11–12 (59:10–11 in most English Bibles).
91 Romans 11:11.

LATIN

praesentem Christum, quem Iudaei non agnoscebant, scimus fuisse confessos. Nec ipsos Iudaeos existimo audere contendere neminem pertinuisse ad Deum praeter Israelitas, ex quo propago Israel esse coepit, reprobato eius fratre maiore.

Populus enim re uera, qui proprie Dei populus diceretur, nullus alius fuit; homines autem quosdam non terrena, sed caelesti societate ad ueros Israelitas supernae ciues patriae pertinentes etiam in aliis gentibus fuisse negare non possunt: quia si negant, facillime conuincuntur de sancto et mirabili uiro Iob, qui nec indigena nec proselytus, id est aduena populi Israel fuit, sed ex gente Idumaea genus ducens, ibi ortus, ibidem mortuus est; qui diuino sic laudatur eloquio, ut, quod ad iustitiam pietatemque adtinet, nullus ei homo suorum temporum coaequetur. Quae tempora eius quamuis non inueniamus in Chronicis, colligimus tamen ex libro eius, quem pro sui merito Israelitae in auctoritatem canonicam receperunt, tertia generatione posteriorem fuisse quam Israel.

Diuinitus autem prouisum fuisse non dubito, ut ex hoc uno sciremus etiam per alias gentes esse potuisse, qui secundum Deum uixerunt eique placuerunt, pertinentes ad spiritalem Hierusalem. Quod nemini concessum fuisse credendum est, nisi cui diuinitus reuelatus est unus mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus, qui uenturus in carne sic antiquis sanctis praenuntiabatur, quem ad modum nobis uenisse nuntiatus est, ut una eademque per ipsum fides omnes in Dei ciuitatem, Dei domum, Dei templum praedestinatos perducat ad Deum. Sed quaecumque aliorum prophetiae de Dei per Iesum Christum gratia proferuntur, possunt putari a Christianis esse confictae.

Ideo nihil est firmius ad conuincendos quoslibet alienos, si de hac re contenderint, nostrosque faciendos, si recte people to whom this mystery was revealed, and who were moved to foretell these things as well. They may have shared in the same grace. Or they may have lacked it and been taught by evil angels, who, as we know, confessed Christ when he was present, though the Jews did not recognize him. Nor do I think the Jews themselves dare to contend that no one belonged to God except the Israelites, from the time the line of Israel began and his elder brother was rejected.[92]

ENGLISH

For in truth there was no other people that could properly be called the people of God. But they cannot deny that among other nations too there were certain people who belonged to the true Israelites, citizens of the homeland above, not by an earthly fellowship but by a heavenly one. If they deny it, they are very easily refuted by the case of the holy and wonderful man Job. He was neither a native nor a proselyte, that is, a newcomer to the people of Israel. He traced his descent from the Idumaean nation, and he was born there and died there. The divine word praises him so highly that no one of his times equals him in righteousness and piety. We do not find his times in the Chronicles. Yet we gather from his book, which the Israelites received into canonical authority because of its merit, that he lived three generations after Israel.[93]

I have no doubt that this was arranged by divine providence. From this one case we might know that there could also be people among other nations who lived according to God and pleased him, and who belonged to the spiritual Jerusalem. We must believe that this was granted to no one unless the one mediator between God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus, was divinely revealed to him. He was foretold to the saints of old as one who would come in the flesh, just as he has been announced to us as having come. So one and the same faith through him may lead to God all who are predestined for the city of God, the house of God, the temple of God. But whatever prophecies of others are brought forward concerning God's grace through Jesus Christ could be thought to have been fabricated by Christians.[94]

Some outsiders may argue about this matter. Nothing is more effective for refuting them, and 92 Israel is Jacob; his elder brother was Esau (Genesis 25–27).

93 The "Chronicles" are probably Eusebius's Chronicle in Jerome's Latin version, which Augustine relies on throughout Book 18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sapuerint, quam ut diuina praedicta de Christo ea proferantur, quae in Iudaeorum codicibus scripta sunt; quibus auulsis de sedibus propriis et propter hoc testimonium toto orbe dispersis Christi usquequaque creuit ecclesia.	for making them ours if they are wise, than to bring forward the divine predictions about Christ that are written in the books of the Jews. The Jews have been torn from their own homes and scattered over the whole world for the sake of this testimony, and meanwhile the Church of Christ has grown everywhere.

THAT HAGGAI'S PROPHECY, IN WHICH HE SAID THE GLORY OF GOD'S HOUSE WOULD BE GREATER THAN AT FIRST, WAS FULFILLED NOT IN THE REBUILDING OF THE TEMPLE BUT IN THE CHURCH OF CHRIST

Haggai's greater house is the Church built of living stones.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.48 Haec domus Dei maioris est gloriae, quam fuerat illa prima lignis et lapidibus ceterisque pretiosis rebus metallisque constructa. Non itaque Aggaei prophetia in templi illius instauratione conpleta est. Ex quo enim est instauratum, numquam ostenditur habuisse tantam gloriam, quantam habuit tempore Salomonis; immo potius ostenditur primum cessatione prophetiae fuisse domus illius gloriam diminutam, deinde ipsius gentis cladibus tantis usque ad ultimum excidium, quod factum est a Romanis, sicut ea, quae supra sunt commemorata testantur. Haec autem domus ad nouum pertinens testamentum tanto utique maioris est gloriae, quanto meliores sunt lapides uiui, quibus credentibus renouatisque construitur. Sed ideo per instaurationem templi illius significata est, quia ipsa renouatio illius aedificii significat eloquio prophetico alterum testamentum, quod appellatur nouum.	This house of God has greater glory than the first one had, which was built of wood and stone and other precious materials and metals. So Haggai's prophecy was not fulfilled in the restoration of that temple. For from the time it was restored, it is never shown to have had as much glory as it had in Solomon's time. On the contrary, the glory of that house is shown to have been diminished, first by the cessation of prophecy, and then by the great disasters of the nation itself, down to the final destruction carried out by the Romans, as the events recorded above bear witness. But this house, which belongs to the new covenant, has a glory greater by as much as the living stones it is built of, believers who have been renewed, are better. Yet it was signified by the restoration of that temple, because in prophetic language the very renewal of that building signifies the other covenant, the one called new.[95]
Quod ergo Deus dixit per memoratum prophetam: Et dabo pacem in loco isto, per significantem locum ille, qui eo significatur, intellegendus est; ut, quia illo loco instaurato significata est ecclesia, quae fuerat aedificanda per Christum, nihil aliud accipiatur, quod dictum est: Dabo pacem in loco isto, nisi dabo pacem in loco, quem significat locus iste. Quoniam omnia significantia uidentur quodam modo earum rerum, quas significant, sustinere personas; sicut dictum est ab apostolo: Petra erat Christus, quoniam petra illa, de qua hoc dictum est, significabat utique Christum. Maior est itaque gloria domus huius noui testamenti quam domus prioris ueteris testamenti, et tunc apparebit maior cum dedicabitur. Tunc enim ueniet desideratus cunctis	So when God said through that prophet, "And I will give peace in this place," we must understand by the place that signifies the place that is signified by it. Since the restored place signified the Church that was to be built by Christ, the words "I will give peace in this place" are to be taken to mean nothing other than "I will give peace in the place which this place signifies." For all things that signify seem in some way to take on the role of the things they signify. Thus the apostle said, "The rock was Christ," because the rock of which this was said certainly signified Christ. So the glory of this house of the new covenant is greater than that of the earlier house of the old covenant, and it will 94 "One mediator between God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus" quotes 1 Timothy 2:5.

95 Augustine is interpreting Haggai 2:9: "The glory of this latter house will be greater than that of the former."

LATIN	ENGLISH
gentibus, sicut legitur in Hebraeo. Nam primus eius aduentus nondum erat desideratus omnibus gentibus.	appear greater when it is dedicated. For then "the one desired by all nations will come," as we read in the Hebrew. For his first coming was not yet desired by all nations.[96]
Non enim quem deberent desiderare sciebant, in quem non crediderant. Tunc etiam secundum septuaginta interpretes (quia et ipse propheticus sensus est) uenient quae electa sunt Domini de cunctis gentibus. Tunc enim uere non uenient nisi electa, de quibus dicit apostolus: Sicut elegit nos in ipso ante mundi constitutionem. Ipse quippe architectus, qui dixit: Multi uocati, pauci uero electi, non de his, qui uocati sic uenerunt, ut de conuiuio proicerentur, sed de electis demonstraturus est aedificatam domum, quae nullam ruinam deinceps formidabit. Nunc autem, quando et hi replent ecclesias, quos tamquam in area uentilatio separabit, non apparet tanta gloria domus huius, quanta tunc apparebit, quando, quisquis ibi erit, semper erit.	For they did not know whom they ought to desire, since they had not believed in him. Then too, according to the Septuagint translators (for theirs is also a prophetic sense), "there will come the chosen of the Lord from all nations." For then truly none will come but the chosen, of whom the apostle says, "Just as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world." For the architect himself, who said, "Many are called, but few are chosen," will reveal the house built not of those who were called and came in such a way that they were thrown out of the banquet, but of the chosen —a house that will fear no collapse ever after. Now, however, when the churches are filled also with those whom the winnowing will separate out, as on a threshing floor, the glory of this house does not appear as great as it will appear then, when whoever is there will be there forever.[97]

THE INDISCRIMINATE GROWTH OF THE CHURCH, IN WHICH MANY REPROBATES ARE MIXED WITH THE ELECT IN THIS WORLD

Good and bad are mixed in the Church until the end, like fish in a net.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.49 In hoc ergo saeculo maligno, in his diebus malis, ubi per humilitatem praesentem futuram conparat ecclesia celsitudinem et timorum stimulis, dolorum tormentis, laborum molestiis, tentationum periculis eruditur, sola spe gaudens, quando sanum gaudet, multi reprobi miscentur bonis et utrique tamquam in sagenam euangelicam colliguntur et in hoc mundo tamquam in mari utrique inclusi retibus indiscrete natant, donec perueniatur ad litus, ubi mali segregentur a bonis, et in bonis tamquam in templo suo sit Deus omnia in omnibus. Proinde uocem nunc agnoscimus eius inpleri, qui loquebatur in psalmo adque dicebat: Adnuntiaui et locutus sum, multiplicati sunt super numerum. Hoc fit nunc, ex quo primum per os praecursoris sui Iohannis, deinde per os proprium adnuntiauit et locutus est dicens: Agite paenitentiam, adpropinquauit enim regnum caelorum.	In this evil world, then, in these evil days, the Church gains its future exaltation through its present humility. It is trained by the goads of fear, the torments of pain, the hardships of toil, the dangers of temptation, rejoicing in hope alone, when its joy is sound. Here many reprobates are mixed with the good, and both are gathered, as it were, into the net of the gospel. In this world, as in a sea, both swim without distinction, enclosed in the nets, until the shore is reached. There the bad will be separated from the good, and in the good, as in his temple, God will be all in all. So we now recognize the fulfillment of the voice of him who spoke in the psalm and said, "I proclaimed and I spoke; they were multiplied beyond number." This has been happening ever since he proclaimed and spoke, first through the mouth of his forerunner

96 Haggai 2:9 and 2:7; 1 Corinthians 10:4.
97 Ephesians 1:4; Matthew 22:14.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	John, then through his own mouth, saying, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near."[98]
Elegit discipulos, quos et apostolos nominauit, humiliter natos, inhonoratos, inlitteratos, ut, quidquid magnum essent et facerent, ipse in eis esset et faceret. Habuit inter eos unum, quo malo utens bene et suae passionis inpleret dispositum et ecclesiae suae tolerandorum malorum praeberet exemplum. Seminato, quantum per eius oportebat praesentiam corporalem, sancto euangelio passus est, mortuus est, resurrexit, passione ostendens quid sustinere pro ueritate, resurrectione quid sperare in aeternitate debeamus, excepta altitudine sacramenti, qua sanguis eius in remissionem fusus est peccatorum.	He chose disciples, whom he also named apostles —men of lowly birth, without honor, without learning—so that whatever greatness they had and whatever great things they did, it would be he himself who was and acted in them. He had among them one whose evil he used well, both to fulfill the plan of his passion and to give his Church an example of bearing with the wicked. When the holy gospel had been sown as far as his bodily presence required, he suffered, died, and rose again. By his passion he showed what we ought to endure for the truth, and by his resurrection what we ought to hope for in eternity—to say nothing of the depth of the mystery by which his blood was shed for the remission of sins.
Conuersatus est in terra quadraginta dies cum discipulis suis adque ipsis uidentibus adscendit in caelum et post dies decem misit promissum Spiritum sanctum; cuius uenientis in eos qui crediderant tunc signum erat maximum et maxime necessarium, ut unusquisque eorum linguis omnium gentium loqueretur; ita significans unitatem catholicae ecclesiae per omnes gentes futuram ac sic linguis omnibus locuturam.	He spent forty days on earth with his disciples, ascended into heaven as they watched, and after ten days sent the promised Holy Spirit. When the Spirit came upon those who had believed, the greatest and most necessary sign was that each of them spoke in the languages of all nations. This signified that the unity of the catholic Church would extend through all nations and so would speak in all languages.

THE PREACHING OF THE GOSPEL, MADE MORE GLORIOUS AND MORE POWERFUL BY THE SUFFERINGS OF ITS PREACHERS

The gospel spreads from Jerusalem through the sufferings of the martyrs.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.50 Deinde secundum illam prophetiam: Ex Sion lex prodiet et uerbum Domini ex Hierusalem, et secundum ipsius Domini Christi praedicta, ubi post resurrectionem stupentibus eum discipulis suis aperuit sensum, ut intellegerent scripturas, et dixit eis, quoniam sic scriptum est, et sic oportebat Christum pati et resurgere a mortuis tertio die et praedicari in nomine eius paenitentiam et remissionem peccatorum per omnes gentes, incipientibus ab Hierusalem, et ubi rursus eis de aduentu eius nouissimo requirentibus respondit adque ait: Non est uestrum scire tempora quae Pater posuit in sua potestate; sed accipietis uirtutem Spiritus sancti superuenientem in uos, et eritis mihi testes in Hierusalem et in totam Iudaeam et Samariam et usque in fines terrae, primum se ab Hierusalem diffudit ecclesia,	Then the Church spread out, first from Jerusalem. This was in accordance with the prophecy, "Out of Zion the law will go forth, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," and with the predictions of Christ the Lord himself. After the resurrection, when his disciples were astonished at him, he opened their minds so that they understood the Scriptures, and told them, "Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day, and for repentance and the remission of sins to be preached in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem." And again, when they asked about his final coming, he answered and said, "It is not for you to know the times which the Father has set in his 98 Psalm 39:6 (40:5 in most English Bibles); Matthew 3:2 and 4:17.

LATIN

et cum in Iudaea adque Samaria plurimi credidissent, et in alias gentes itum est, eis adnuntiantibus euangelium, quos ipse sicut luminaria et aptauerat uerbo et accenderat Spiritu sancto.

ENGLISH

own power; but you will receive the power of the Holy Spirit coming upon you, and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the ends of the earth." And when very many in Judea and Samaria had believed, the Church went on to other nations as well. The gospel was proclaimed by those whom he himself had prepared like lamps by his word and kindled by the Holy Spirit.[99]

Dixerat enim eis: Nolite timere eos, qui corpus occidunt, animam autem non possunt occidere. Qui ut frigidi timore non essent, igne caritatis ardebant. Denique non solum per ipsos, qui eum et ante passionem et post resurrectionem uiderant et audierant, uerum etiam post obitum eorum per posteros eorum inter horrendas persecutiones et uarios cruciatus ac funera martyrum praedicatum est toto orbe euangelium, contestante Deo signis et ostentis et uariis uirtutibus et Spiritus sancti muneribus; ut populi gentium credentes in eum, qui pro eorum redemtione crucifixus est, Christiano amore uenerarentur sanguinem martyrum, quem diabolico furore fuderunt, ipsique reges, quorum legibus uastabatur ecclesia, ei nomini salubriter subderentur, quod de terra crudeliter auferre conati sunt, et falsos deos inciperent persequi, quorum causa cultores Dei ueri fuerant antea persecuti.

For he had told them, "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul." So that they would not be chilled by fear, they burned with the fire of love. In short, the gospel was preached throughout the world not only by those who had seen and heard him both before his passion and after his resurrection, but also, after their death, by their successors, amid horrifying persecutions, all kinds of tortures, and the deaths of martyrs. God bore witness with signs and wonders, with various miracles and gifts of the Holy Spirit. As a result the peoples of the nations, believing in him who was crucified for their redemption, came to venerate with Christian love the blood of the martyrs that they themselves had shed in diabolical fury. The very kings by whose laws the Church was being ravaged submitted, to their own salvation, to the name they had cruelly tried to remove from the earth, and began to persecute the false gods for whose sake they had earlier persecuted the worshipers of the true God.[100]

THAT THE CATHOLIC FAITH IS STRENGTHENED EVEN BY THE DISSENSIONS OF HERETICS

Heretics and persecutors only exercise the Church's patience, wisdom and love.

LATIN

ENGLISH

18.51 Videns autem diabolus templa daemonum deseri et in nomen liberantis Mediatoris currere genus humanum, haereticos mouit, qui sub uocabulo Christiano doctrinae resisterent Christianae, quasi possent indifferenter sine ulla correptione haberi in ciuitate Dei, sicut ciuitas confusionis indifferenter habuit philosophos inter se diuersa et aduersa sentientes. Qui ergo in ecclesia Christi morbidum aliquid prauumque sapiunt, si correpti, ut sanum rectumque sapiant, resistunt contumaciter suaque pestifera et mortifera dogmata emendare nolunt, sed defensare persistunt, haeretici fiunt et foras exeuntes

But the devil, seeing the temples of demons deserted and the human race running to the name of the Mediator who sets free, stirred up heretics to resist Christian teaching under the Christian name. It was as if they could be kept in the city of God without distinction and without any correction, just as the city of confusion kept, without distinction, philosophers who held views different from and opposed to one another. So those in the Church of Christ who hold some unhealthy and perverse opinion, if, when corrected so that they 99 Isaiah 2:3; Luke 24:45–47; Acts 1:7–8.

100 Matthew 10:28.

LATIN

habentur in exercentibus inimicis. Etiam sic quippe ueris illis catholicis membris Christi malo suo prosunt, dum Deus utitur et malis bene et diligentibus eum omnia cooperantur in bonum.

ENGLISH

may think what is sound and right, they stubbornly resist, refuse to amend their pestilent and deadly doctrines, and persist in defending them—these become heretics. Going outside, they are counted among the enemies who serve to exercise the Church. For even in this way they benefit, by their own evil, the true catholic members of Christ, since God makes good use even of the wicked, and all things work together for good for those who love him.[101]

Inimici enim omnes ecclesiae, quolibet errore caecentur uel malitia deprauentur, si accipiunt potestatem corporaliter adfligendi, exercent eius patientiam; si tantummodo male sentiendo aduersantur, exercent eius sapientiam; ut autem etiam inimici diligantur, exercent eius beneuolentiam aut etiam beneficentiam, siue suadibili doctrina cum eis agatur siue terribili disciplina. Ac per hoc diabolus princeps inpiae ciuitatis aduersus peregrinantem in hoc mundo ciuitatem Dei uasa propria commouendo nihil ei nocere permittitur, cui procul dubio et rebus prosperis consolatio, ut non frangatur aduersis, et rebus aduersis exercitatio, ut non corrumpatur prosperis, per diuinam prouidentiam procuratur, adque ita temperatur utrumque ab alterutro, ut in psalmo illam uocem non aliunde agnoscamus exortam: Secundum multitudinem dolorum meorum in corde meo consolationes tuae iucundauerunt animam meam.

For all the enemies of the Church, whatever error blinds them or malice corrupts them, exercise its patience if they receive the power to inflict bodily harm; if they oppose it only by thinking wrongly, they exercise its wisdom; and since even enemies are to be loved, they exercise its benevolence, or even its beneficence, whether it deals with them by persuasive teaching or by fearsome discipline. And so the devil, the prince of the ungodly city, though he stirs up his own vessels against the city of God on pilgrimage in this world, is permitted to do it no harm. For without doubt divine providence provides it with consolation in prosperity, so that it is not broken by adversity, and with exercise in adversity, so that it is not corrupted by prosperity. Each is so tempered by the other that we recognize this voice in the psalm as springing from nothing else: "According to the multitude of my sorrows in my heart, your consolations have gladdened my soul."[102]

Hinc est et illud apostoli: Spe gaudentes, in tribulatione patientes.

Hence also the apostle's words: "Rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation."[103]

Nam et id, quod ait idem doctor: Quicumque uolunt in Christo pie uiuere, persecutionem patiuntur, nullis putandum est deesse posse temporibus. Quia et cum ab eis, qui foris sunt, non saeuientibus uidetur esse tranquillitas et re uera est plurimumque consolationis adfert, maxime infirmis: non tamen desunt, immo multi sunt intus, qui corda pie uiuentium suis perditis moribus cruciant; quoniam per eos blasphematur Christianum et catholicum nomen; quod quanto est carius eis, qui uolunt pie uiuere in Christo, tanto magis dolent, quod per malos intus positos fit, ut minus, quam piorum mentes desiderant, diligatur.

For when the same teacher says, "All who want to live a godly life in Christ suffer persecution," we must not suppose there can be any time when this does not hold. Even when there seems to be tranquillity, because those outside are not raging—and there really is, and it brings much consolation, especially to the weak—still there is no lack of people within, indeed there are many, who torment the hearts of those living godly lives by their depraved conduct, since through them the Christian and catholic name is blasphemed. The dearer that name is to those who want to live a godly life in Christ, the more they grieve that, because of the 101 The closing words echo Romans 8:28.

102 Psalm 93:19 (94:19 in most English Bibles).
103 Romans 12:12.

LATIN

ENGLISH

wicked within, it is loved less than the minds of the godly desire.[104]

Ipsi quoque haeretici, cum cogitantur habere nomen et sacramenta Christiana et scripturas et professionem, magnum dolorem faciunt in cordibus piorum; quia et multi uolentes esse Christiani propter eorum dissensiones haesitare coguntur et multi maledici etiam in his inueniunt materiam blasphemandi Christianum nomen, quia et ipsi quoquo modo Christiani appellantur. His adque huius modi prauis moribus et erroribus hominum persecutionem patiuntur, qui uolunt in Christo pie uiuere, etiam nullo infestante neque uexante corpus illorum. Patiuntur quippe hanc persecutionem non in corporibus, sed in cordibus. Unde illa uox est: Secundum multitudinem dolorum meorum in corde meo. Non enim ait: In corpore meo.

The heretics too, when one considers that they have the Christian name and sacraments, the Scriptures and the profession of faith, cause great grief in the hearts of the godly. For many who want to become Christians are driven to hesitate by their dissensions, and many slanderers find in them, too, material for blaspheming the Christian name, since they also are called Christians after a fashion. Through these and similar depraved ways and errors of men, those who want to live a godly life in Christ suffer persecution, even when no one attacks or harasses their bodies. For they suffer this persecution not in their bodies but in their hearts. Hence that voice: "According to the multitude of my sorrows in my heart." It does not say, "in my body."

Sed rursus quoniam cogitantur inmutabilia diuina promissa, et quod ait apostolus: Nouit Dominus qui sunt eius (quos enim praesciuit et praedestinauit conformes imaginis filii sui, ex eis perire nullus potest): ideo sequitur in illo psalmo: Consolationes tuae iucundauerunt animam meam. Dolor autem ipse, qui fit in cordibus piorum, quos persequuntur mores Christianorum malorum siue falsorum, prodest dolentibus, quoniam de caritate descendit, qua eos perire nolunt nec inpedire aliorum salutem. Denique magnae consolationes fiunt etiam de correctionibus eorum, quae piorum animas tanta iucunditate perfundunt, quantis doloribus de sua perditione cruciauerunt.

But again, since one considers the unchangeable promises of God, and the apostle's words, "The Lord knows those who are his" (for of those whom he foreknew and predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son, none can perish), the psalm goes on: "Your consolations have gladdened my soul." Moreover, the very grief that arises in the hearts of the godly, who are persecuted by the conduct of bad or false Christians, benefits those who grieve, since it comes from love, the love by which they do not want those others to perish or to hinder the salvation of others. Finally, great consolations come also from their correction, flooding the souls of the godly with as much joy as the sorrows with which their perdition had tormented them.[105]

Sic in hoc saeculo, in his diebus malis non solum a tempore corporalis praesentiae Christi et apostolorum eius, sed ab ipso Abel, quem primum iustum inpius frater occidit, et deinceps usque in huius saeculi finem inter persecutiones mundi et consolationes Dei peregrinando procurrit ecclesia.

Thus in this world, in these evil days, not only from the time of the bodily presence of Christ and his apostles, but from Abel himself, the first righteous man, whom his ungodly brother killed, and from then on until the end of this world, the Church presses forward on its pilgrimage amid the persecutions of the world and the consolations of God.

104 2 Timothy 3:12.
105 2 Timothy 2:19; Romans 8:29.

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE, AS SOME THINK, THAT AFTER THE TEN PERSECUTIONS THAT HAVE TAKEN PLACE, NONE REMAINS EXCEPT AN ELEVENTH, WHICH WILL COME IN THE TIME OF ANTICHRIST HIMSELF

Augustine refuses to fix the number of persecutions at ten before Antichrist.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.52	Proinde ne illud quidem temere puto esse dicendum siue credendum, quod nonnullis uisum est uel uidetur, non amplius ecclesiam passuram persecutiones usque ad tempus Antichristi, quam quot iam passa est, id est decem, ut undecima eademque nouissima sit ab Antichristo. Primam quippe conputant a Nerone quae facta est, secundam a Domitiano, a Traiano tertiam, quartam ab Antonino, a Seuero quintam, sextam a Maximino, a Decio septimam, octauam a Valeriano, ab Aureliano nonam, decimam a Diocletiano et Maximiano. Plagas enim Aegyptiorum, quoniam decem fuerunt, antequam exire inde inciperet populus Dei, putant ad hunc intellectum esse referendas, ut nouissima Antichristi persecutio similis uideatur undecimae plagae, qua Aegyptii, dum hostiliter sequerentur Hebraeos, in mari Rubro populo Dei per siccum transeunte perierunt.	Accordingly, I do not think we should rashly assert or believe even what some have thought, or still think: that until the time of Antichrist the Church will suffer no more persecutions than it has already suffered, that is, ten, so that the eleventh and last will come from Antichrist. They count the first as the one carried out by Nero, the second by Domitian, the third by Trajan, the fourth by Antoninus, the fifth by Severus, the sixth by Maximinus, the seventh by Decius, the eighth by Valerian, the ninth by Aurelian, the tenth by Diocletian and Maximian. For since there were ten plagues of the Egyptians before the people of God began to leave, they think the plagues should be referred to this meaning, so that the last persecution, by Antichrist, appears like an eleventh plague, the one in which the Egyptians, pursuing the Hebrews as enemies, perished in the Red Sea while the people of God crossed over on dry ground.[106]
	Sed ego illa re gesta in Aegypto istas persecutiones prophetice significatas esse non arbitror; quamuis ab eis, qui hoc putant, exquisite et ingeniose illa singula his singulis conparata uideantur, non prophetico spiritu, sed coniectura mentis humanae, quae aliquando ad uerum peruenit, aliquando fallitur.	But I do not think that those events in Egypt were a prophetic sign of these persecutions—even though those who hold this view seem to have matched each of those events to each of these with care and ingenuity. They have done so not by a prophetic spirit but by the conjecture of the human mind, which sometimes arrives at the truth and sometimes is deceived.
	Quid enim, qui hoc sentiunt, dicturi sunt de persecutione, qua ipse Dominus crucifixus est? in quo eam numero posituri? Si autem hac excepta existimant conputandum, tamquam illae numerandae sint, quae ad corpus pertinent, non qua ipsum caput est adpetitum et occisum: quid agent de illa, quae, postea quam Christus adscendit in caelum, Hierosolymis facta est, ubi beatus Stephanus lapidatus est, ubi Iacobus frater Iohannis gladio trucidatus, ubi apostolus Petrus ut occideretur inclusus et per angelum liberatus, ubi fugati adque dispersi de Hierosolymis fratres, ubi Saulus, qui postea Paulus apostolus factus est, uastabat ecclesiam, ubi ipse	For what will those who hold this view say about the persecution in which the Lord himself was crucified? Where will they place it in their count? But if they think the count should be made leaving this one aside—as though we should count the persecutions that concern the body, not the one in which the head itself was attacked and killed—what will they do about the one that took place in Jerusalem after Christ ascended into heaven? That was the persecution in which blessed Stephen was stoned; in which James, the brother of John, was put to the sword; in which the apostle Peter was 106 These emperors range from Nero (AD 54–68) to Diocletian (284–305); the scheme of ten persecutions also appears in Augustine's contemporary Orosius.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quoque iam fidem, quam persequebatur, euangelizans, qualia faciebat, est passus, siue per Iudaeam siue per alias gentes, quacumque Christum feruentissimus praedicabat?	imprisoned to be killed and was set free by an angel; in which the brothers were driven out of Jerusalem and scattered; in which Saul, who later became the apostle Paul, was ravaging the Church; and in which he too, now preaching the faith he used to persecute, suffered the kind of things he used to inflict, whether in Judea or among other nations, wherever he preached Christ with the greatest fervor.[107]
Quur ergo eis a Nerone uidetur ordiendum, cum ad Neronis tempora inter atrocissimas persecutiones, de quibus nimis longum est cuncta dicere, ecclesia crescendo peruenerit? Quod si a regibus factas persecutiones in numero existimant esse debere: rex fuit Herodes, qui etiam post adscensum Domini grauissimam fecit. Deinde quid respondent etiam de Iuliano, quem non numerant in decem? An ipse non est ecclesiam persecutus, qui Christianos liberales litteras docere ac discere uetuit?	Why, then, do they think the count should begin with Nero, when the Church had grown its way to Nero's time through the most atrocious persecutions, which would take far too long to recount in full? But if they think that only persecutions carried out by kings should be counted, Herod was a king, and he carried out a most severe one even after the Lord's ascension. Then what do they say about Julian, whom they do not count among the ten? Did he not persecute the Church, he who forbade Christians to teach or to study the liberal arts?[108]
Sub quo Valentinianus maior, qui post eum tertius imperator fuit, fidei Christianae confessor exstitit militiaque priuatus est; ut omittam quae aput Antiochiam facere coeperat, nisi unius fidelissimi et constantissimi iuuenis, qui multis, ut torquerentur, adprehensis per totum diem primus est tortus, inter ungulas cruciatusque psallentis libertatem adque hilaritatem miratus horruisset et in ceteris deformius erubescere timuisset. Postremo nostra memoria Valens, supradicti Valentiniani frater, Arianus, nonne magna persecutione per Orientis partes catholicam uastauit ecclesiam? Quale est autem, non considerare ecclesiam per totum mundum fructificantem adque crescentem posse in aliquibus gentibus persecutionem pati a regibus, et quando in aliis non patitur?	Under him Valentinian the elder, who was the third emperor counting from him, stood out as a confessor of the Christian faith and was stripped of his military rank. And I say nothing of what Julian had begun to do at Antioch. He would have gone further had he not been struck with awe by one young man of the greatest faith and steadfastness. Of the many who had been seized for torture, this young man was the first to be tortured, all day long. Julian marveled at the freedom and cheerfulness with which he sang psalms amid the hooks and torments, shrank back, and feared that he would disgrace himself even more shamefully with the rest. Lastly, within our own memory, did not Valens, the brother of this Valentinian, an Arian, ravage the Catholic Church throughout the East with a great persecution? And what kind of reasoning is it not to consider that the Church, bearing fruit and growing throughout the whole world, can suffer persecution from kings in some nations even when it is not suffering it in others?[109]
Nisi forte non est persecutio conputanda, quando rex Gothorum in ipsa Gothia persecutus est Christianos	Or perhaps we should not count it as a persecution when the king of the Goths, in Gothia itself, perse-107 See Acts 7–8 (Stephen and the scattering of the believers) and Acts 12:1–11 (James and Peter).

108 Herod is Herod Agrippa I, who executed James and imprisoned Peter (Acts 12). Julian "the Apostate," emperor AD 361–363, barred Christians from teaching classical literature in 362.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	crudelitate mirabili, cum ibi non essent nisi catholici, quorum plurimi martyrio coronati sunt, sicut a quibusdam fratribus, qui tunc illic pueri fuerant et se ista uidisse incunctanter recordabantur, audiuimus? Quid modo in Perside? Nonne ita in Christianos ferbuit persecutio (si tamen iam quieuit), ut fugientes inde nonnulli usque ad Romana oppida peruenerint? Haec adque huius modi mihi cogitanti non uidetur esse definiendus numerus persecutionum, quibus exerceri oportet ecclesiam. Sed rursus adfirmare aliquas futuras a regibus praeter illam nouissimam, de qua nullus ambigit Christianus, non minoris est temeritatis. Itaque hoc in medio relinquimus neutram partem quaestionis huius adstruentes siue destruentes, sed tantummodo ab adfirmandi quodlibet horum audaci praesumtione reuocantes.	cuted the Christians with astonishing cruelty, at a time when there were none but Catholics there, very many of whom were crowned with martyrdom—as we have heard from certain brothers who had been boys there at the time and remembered without hesitation that they had seen these things? And what of Persia at present? Has not the persecution against Christians raged there so fiercely (if indeed it has now died down) that some fleeing from it have made their way as far as Roman towns? When I consider these and similar things, it seems to me that we should not fix the number of persecutions by which the Church must be tested. On the other hand, it is no less rash to assert that there will be further persecutions by kings besides that last one, about which no Christian has any doubt. So we leave this question open, neither building up nor tearing down either side of it, but only calling people back from the bold presumption of asserting either.[110]

THE TIME OF THE LAST PERSECUTION, REVEALED TO NO HUMAN BEING

No one can know when the last persecution and the end will come.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
18.53	Illam sane nouissimam persecutionem, quae ab Antichristo futura est, praesentia sua exstinguet ipse Iesus. Sic enim scriptum est, quod eum interficiet spiritu oris sui et euacuabit inluminatione praesentiae suae. Hic quaeri solet: Quando istud erit? Inportune omnino. Si enim hoc nobis nosse prodesset, a quo melius quam ab ipso Deo magistro interrogantibus discipulis diceretur? Non enim siluerunt inde aput eum, sed a praesente quaesierunt dicentes: Domine, si hoc tempore repraesentabis regnum Israel? At ille: Non est, inquit, uestrum scire tempora, quae Pater posuit in sua potestate. Non utique illi de hora uel die uel anno, sed de tempore interrogauerant, quando istud accepere responsum.	That last persecution, the one to come from Antichrist, Jesus himself will extinguish by his presence. For so it is written: "he will kill him with the breath of his mouth and bring him to nothing by the brightness of his presence." Here people commonly ask, "When will this be?" A wholly untimely question. For if it were good for us to know this, who would have told it better than God himself, our teacher, when his disciples asked him? For they did not keep silent about it with him, but asked him face to face, saying, "Lord, will you at this time restore the kingdom of Israel?" And he said, "It is not for you to know the times which the Father has placed in his own power." They had certainly not asked about the hour or the day or the year, but about the time, when they received that answer.[111]
	Frustra igitur annos, qui remanent huic saeculo, conputare ac definire conamur, cum hoc scire non esse	It is useless, then, for us to try to count and fix the years that remain for this world, since we hear

109 Valentinian I was emperor AD 364–375; his brother Valens, emperor in the East 364–378, favored the Arians, who denied that the Son is equal to the Father. The young man at Antioch is named by Rufinus as Theodore.
110 The Gothic king is Athanaric, who persecuted Christians among his people in the AD 370s. The Persian persecution under Yazdegerd I and Bahram V began around 420.
111 2 Thessalonians 2:8; Acts 1:6–7.

LATIN

nostrum ex ore Veritatis audiamus; quos tamen alii quadringentos, alii quingentos, alii etiam mille ab adscensione Domini usque ad eius ultimum aduentum conpleri posse dixerunt. Quem ad modum autem quisque eorum adstruat opinionem suam, longum est demonstrare et non necessarium. Coniecturis quippe utuntur humanis, non ab eis aliquid certum de scripturae canonicae auctoritate profertur. Omnium uero de hac re calculantium digitos resoluit et quiescere iubet ille, qui dicit: Non est uestrum scire tempora, quae Pater posuit in sua potestate.

Sed haec quia euangelica sententia est, mirum non est non ea repressos fuisse deorum multorum falsorumque cultores, quominus fingerent daemonum responsis, quos tamquam deos colunt, definitum esse quanto tempore mansura esset religio Christiana. Cum enim uiderent nec tot tantisque persecutionibus eam potuisse consumi, sed his potius mira incrementa sumsisse, excogitauerunt nescio quos uersus Graecos tamquam consulenti cuidam diuino oraculo effusos, ubi Christum quidem ab huius tamquam sacrilegii crimine faciunt innocentem. Petrum autem maleficia fecisse subiungunt, ut coleretur Christi nomen per trecentos sexaginta quinque annos, deinde conpleto memorato numero annorum, sine mora sumeret finem, o hominum corda doctorum!

o ingenia litterata digna credere ista de Christo, quae credere non uultis in Christum, quod eius discipulus Petrus ab eo magicas artes non didicerit, sed, ipso innocente, tamen eius maleficus fuerit nomenque illius quam suum coli maluerit magicis artibus suis, magnis laboribus et periculis suis, postremo etiam effusione sanguinis sui! Si Petrus maleficus fecit, ut Christum sic diligeret mundus, quid fecit innocens Christus, ut eum sic diligeret Petrus? Respondeant igitur ipsi sibi et si possunt intellegant illa superna gratia factum esse, ut propter aeternam uitam Christum diligeret mundus, qua gratia factum est, ut et propter aeternam uitam ab illo accipiendam et usque ad temporariam mortem pro illo patiendam Christum diligeret Petrus.

ENGLISH

from the mouth of Truth that it is not for us to know this. Yet some have said that four hundred years, others five hundred, others even a thousand, could be completed from the Lord's ascension to his final coming. How each of them builds up his opinion would take long to show, and is unnecessary. For they rely on human conjectures; nothing certain is brought forward by them from the authority of canonical Scripture. But the fingers of all who calculate about this matter are unclenched and bidden to rest by the one who says, "It is not for you to know the times which the Father has placed in his own power."

But since this is a saying of the Gospel, it is no wonder that it did not restrain the worshipers of many false gods from pretending that the responses of the demons, whom they worship as gods, had fixed how long the Christian religion would last. For when they saw that it could not be destroyed even by so many great persecutions, but had rather grown wonderfully through them, they invented some Greek verses or other, supposedly poured out by a divine oracle to someone who consulted it. In these verses they make Christ innocent of the charge of this supposed sacrilege, but they go on to say that Peter worked sorcery so that the name of Christ would be worshiped for three hundred and sixty-five years, and then, once that number of years was completed, would come to an end without delay. O hearts of learned men!

O literary minds, so well suited to believing such things about Christ, you who refuse to believe in Christ! You believe that his disciple Peter did not learn the magic arts from him, but that, though Christ himself was innocent, Peter was nevertheless a sorcerer on his behalf, and preferred that Christ's name rather than his own be worshiped—through his magic arts, through his great labors and dangers, and finally even through the shedding of his own blood! If Peter the sorcerer made the world love Christ so, what did the innocent Christ do to make Peter love him so? Let them answer themselves, then, and, if they can, understand that it was by grace from above that the world came to love Christ for the sake of eternal life—the same grace by which Peter came to love Christ, both for the sake of the eternal life he was to receive from him and to the point of suffering temporal death for him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Deinde isti di qui sunt, qui possunt ista praedicere nec possunt auertere, ita succumbentes uni malefico et uni sceleri magico, quo puer, ut dicunt, anniculus occisus et dilaniatus et ritu nefario sepultus est, ut sectam sibi aduersariam tam prolixo tempore conualescere, tot tantarumque persecutionum horrendas crudelitates non resistendo, sed patiendo superare et ad suorum simulacrorum templorum, sacrorum oraculorum euersionem peruenire permitterent? Quis postremo est deus, non noster utique, sed ipsorum, qui uel inlectus tanto scelere uel inpulsus est ista praestare? Non enim alicui daemoni, sed deo dicunt illi uersus haec Petrum arte magica definisse. Talem deum habent, qui Christum non habent.	Next, who are these gods, who can predict such things but cannot avert them? They yield so completely to one sorcerer and one magical crime—in which, as they say, a year-old boy was killed, torn apart and buried with an abominable rite—that they allowed a sect hostile to them to grow strong for so long a time, to overcome the horrifying cruelties of so many great persecutions not by resisting but by enduring, and to bring about the overthrow of their images, temples, rites and oracles. And finally, what god is this—certainly not ours, but theirs—who was either enticed or driven by so great a crime to grant these things? For the verses say that Peter, by his magic art, laid down these terms not for some demon but for a god. That is the kind of god they have who do not have Christ.

THE UTTERLY FOOLISH LIE OF THE PAGANS, WHO PRETENDED THAT THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION WOULD LAST NO MORE THAN THREE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIVE YEARS

The pagan oracle that Christianity would last 365 years has already proved false.

LATIN	ENGLISH
18.54 Haec adque huius modi multa colligerem, si nondum annus ipse transisset, quem diuinatio ficta promisit et decepta uanitas credidit. Cum uero, ex quo nominis Christi cultus per eius in carne praesentiam et per apostolos institutus est, ante aliquot annos anni trecenti sexaginta quinque conpleti sint, quid aliud quaerimus, unde ista falsitas refellatur? Ut enim in Christi natiuitate huius rei non ponamus initium, quia infans et puer discipulos non habebat, tamen quando habere coepit, procul dubio tunc innotuit per eius corporalem praesentiam doctrina et religio Christiana, id est, postea quam in fluuio Iordane ministerio Iohannis est baptizatus. Propter hoc enim de illo prophetia illa praecesserat: Dominabitur a mari usque ad mare et a flumine usque ad terminos orbis terrae.	I would gather many arguments of this kind, if that very year had not already passed which the fabricated divination promised and deluded folly believed. But since the three hundred and sixty-five years—counting from the time when the worship of Christ's name was established through his presence in the flesh and through the apostles—were completed some years ago, what else do we need to refute this falsehood? For even if we do not place the beginning of this at Christ's birth, since as an infant and a boy he had no disciples, still, when he began to have them, the Christian teaching and religion undoubtedly became known through his bodily presence—that is, after he was baptized in the river Jordan through the ministry of John. It was for this reason that the prophecy had gone before concerning him: "He shall rule from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."[112]
Sed quoniam, priusquam passus esset et resurrexisset a mortuis, nondum fides omnibus fuerat definita (in resurrectione quippe Christi definita est, nam sic apostolus Paulus Atheniensibus loquitur dicens: Iam nunc adnuntiat hominibus omnes ubique agere	But before he had suffered and risen from the dead, faith had not yet been defined for all. (It was defined in Christ's resurrection, for so the apostle Paul speaks to the Athenians: "Now he commands all people everywhere to repent, because he has

112 Psalm 71:8 (72:8 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

paenitentiam, eo quod statuit diem iudicare orbem in aequitate in uiro quo definiuit fidem omnibus resuscitans illum a mortuis): melius in hac quaestione soluenda inde initium sumimus; praesertim quia tunc datus est etiam Spiritus sanctus, sicut eum dari post resurrectionem Christi oportebat in ea ciuitate, ex qua debuit incipere lex secunda, hoc est testamentum nouum. Prima enim fuit ex monte Sina per Moysen, quod testamentum uocatur uetus. De hac autem, quae per Christum danda erat, praedictum est: Ex Sion lex prodiet et uerbum Domini ex Hierusalem.

Unde et ipse per omnes gentes dixit praedicari oportere in nomine suo paenitentiam, sed tamen incipientibus ab Hierusalem. Ibi ergo exorsus est huius nominis cultus, ut in Iesum Christum, qui crucifixus fuerat et resurrexerat, crederetur. Ibi haec fides tam insignibus initiis incanduit, ut aliquot hominum milia in Christi nomen mirabili alacritate conuersa uenditis suis rebus, ut egenis distribuerentur, proposito sancto et ardentissima caritate ad paupertatem uoluntariam peruenirent adque inter frementes et sanguinem sitientes Iudaeos se usque ad mortem pro ueritate certare non armata potentia, sed potentiore patientia praepararent. Hoc si nullis magicis artibus factum est, quur credere dubitant eadem uirtute diuina per totum mundum id fieri potuisse, qua hoc factum est?

Si autem ut Hierosolymis sic ad cultum nominis Christi accenderetur tanta hominum multitudo, quae illum in cruce uel fixerat prensum uel riserat fixum, iam maleficium illud fecerat Petrus, ex ipso anno quaerendum est, quando trecenti sexaginta quinque conpleti sint. Mortuus est ergo Christus duobus Geminis consulibus octauo Kalendas Aprilis. Resurrexit tertio die, sicut apostoli suis etiam sensibus probauerunt. Deinde post quadraginta dies adscendit in caelum; post decem dies, id est quinquagensimo post suam resurrectionem die, misit Spiritum sanctum. Tunc tria milia hominum apostolis eum praedicantibus crediderunt. Tunc itaque nominis illius cultus exorsus est, sicut nos credimus et ueritas habet, efficacia Spiritus sancti; sicut autem finxit uanitas inpia uel putauit, magicis artibus Petri.

ENGLISH

fixed a day to judge the world in equity by the man in whom he has defined faith for all, by raising him from the dead.") So in solving this question we do better to take our starting point from there—especially because that was also when the Holy Spirit was given, as he was to be given after Christ's resurrection in that city from which the second law, that is, the New Testament, was to begin. For the first law came from Mount Sinai through Moses, and it is called the Old Testament. But of the law that was to be given through Christ it was foretold: "Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."[113]

This is why he himself said that repentance must be preached in his name among all nations, but beginning from Jerusalem. There, then, the worship of this name began: belief in Jesus Christ, who had been crucified and had risen again. There this faith blazed up with such remarkable beginnings that several thousand people, turned to Christ's name with wonderful eagerness, sold their possessions to be distributed to the needy, and by holy resolve and most ardent love embraced voluntary poverty. Among Jews who raged and thirsted for blood, they prepared themselves to contend for the truth even to death—not with armed might, but with a mightier patience. If this was done without any magic arts, why do they hesitate to believe that the same divine power by which this was done could have done it throughout the whole world?[114]

But if Peter had already performed that sorcery so that so great a multitude at Jerusalem—a multitude that had either seized Christ and nailed him to the cross or mocked him once he was nailed there—should be fired with zeal for the worship of Christ's name, then we must count from that very year to find when the three hundred and sixty-five years were completed. Christ died, then, in the consulship of the two Gemini, on March 25. He rose on the third day, as the apostles verified even with their own senses. Then, forty days later, he ascended into heaven; ten days after that, that is, on the fiftieth day after his resurrection, he sent the Holy Spirit. Then three thousand people believed as the apostles preached him. So it was then 113 Acts 17:30–31; Isaiah 2:3.

114 Luke 24:47.

LATIN

ENGLISH

that the worship of his name began—as we believe and as the truth is, through the power of the Holy Spirit; but as impious folly has invented or supposed, through the magic arts of Peter.[115]

Paulo post etiam signo mirabili facto, quando ad uerbum ipsius Petri quidam mendicus ab utero matris ita claudus, ut ab aliis portaretur et ad portam templi, ubi stipem peteret, poneretur, in nomine Iesu Christi saluus exsiliuit, quinque hominum milia crediderunt; ac deinde aliis adque aliis accessibus credentium creuit ecclesia. Ac per hoc colligitur etiam dies, ex quo annus ipse sumsit initium, scilicet quando missus est Spiritus sanctus, id est per Idus Maias. Numeratis proinde consulibus trecenti sexaginta quinque anni reperiuntur inpleti per easdem Idus consulatu Honorii et Eutychiani.

A little later a wonderful sign was also performed: at the word of Peter himself, a beggar who had been lame from his mother's womb—so lame that he was carried by others and set down at the gate of the temple to ask for alms—leapt up healed in the name of Jesus Christ, and five thousand people believed. After that the Church grew as more and more believers joined it. From this we can also work out the day on which that year began: namely, when the Holy Spirit was sent, that is, around May 15. Counting the consuls, then, we find that the three hundred and sixty-five years were completed around that same date in the consulship of Honorius and Eutychianus.[116]

Porro sequenti anno, consule Mallio Theodoro, quando iam secundum illud oraculum daemonum aut figmentum hominum nulla esse debuit religio Christiana, quid per alias terrarum partes forsitan factum sit, non fuit necesse perquirere; interim, quod scimus, in ciuitate notissima et eminentissima Carthagine Africae Gaudentius et Iouius comites imperatoris Honorii quarto decimo Kalendas Aprilis falsorum deorum templa euerterunt et simulacra fregerunt. Ex quo usque ad hoc tempus per triginta ferme annos quis non uideat quantum creuerit cultus nominis Christi, praesertim postea quam multi eorum Christiani facti sunt, qui tamquam uera illa diuinatione reuocabantur a fide eamque conpleto eodem numero annorum inanem ridendamque uiderunt?

Then in the following year, in the consulship of Mallius Theodorus, when, according to that oracle of demons or fabrication of men, there should no longer have been any Christian religion, there was no need to inquire what may have happened in other parts of the world. Meanwhile, what we do know is this: in the most famous and eminent city of Carthage in Africa, Gaudentius and Jovius, counts of the emperor Honorius, overthrew the temples of the false gods and smashed their images on March 19. From then until now, for almost thirty years, who does not see how much the worship of Christ's name has grown—especially since many have become Christians who had been held back from the faith by that supposedly true divination, and who saw, when that number of years was completed, that it was empty and laughable?[117]

Nos ergo, qui sumus uocamurque Christiani, non in Petrum credimus, sed in quem credidit Petrus; Petri de Christo aedificati sermonibus, non carminibus uenenati; nec decepti maleficiis, sed beneficiis eius adiuti. Ille Petri magister Christus in doctrina, quae ad uitam ducit aeternam, ipse est magister et noster.

We, then, who are Christians and are called Christians, do not believe in Peter but in the one in whom Peter believed. We have been built up by Peter's preaching about Christ, not poisoned by his spells; we have not been deceived by his sorceries, but helped by his kindnesses. Christ, Peter's teacher in the doctrine that leads to eternal life, is our teacher too.

Sed aliquando iam concludamus hunc librum, huc usque disserentes et quantum satis uisum est demonstrantes,

But let us at last bring this book to a close. Up to this point we have discussed and shown, as far as 115 The consuls Gaius Fufius Geminus and Lucius Rubellius Geminus held office in AD 29.

LATIN

quisnam sit duarum ciuitatum, caelestis adque terrenae, ab initio usque in finem permixtarum mortalis excursus; quarum illa, quae terrena est, fecit sibi quos uoluit uel undecumque uel etiam ex hominibus falsos deos, quibus sacrificando seruiret; illa autem, quae caelestis peregrinatur in terra, falsos deos non facit, sed a uero Deo ipsa fit, cuius uerum sacrificium ipsa sit. Ambae tamen temporalibus uel bonis pariter utuntur uel malis pariter adfliguntur, diuersa fide, diuersa spe, diuerso amore, donec ultimo iudicio separentur, et percipiat unaquaeque suum finem, cuius nullus est finis; de quibus ambarum finibus deinceps disserendum est.

ENGLISH

seemed sufficient, what the mortal course is of the two cities, the heavenly and the earthly, which are mingled together from beginning to end. Of these, the earthly city has made for itself false gods as it wished, from any source whatever, even from human beings, in order to serve them with sacrifices. But the heavenly city, which is on pilgrimage on earth, does not make false gods; rather, it is itself made by the true God, and is itself to be his true sacrifice. Yet both alike make use of temporal goods, or are alike afflicted by temporal evils, with different faith, different hope, different love, until they are separated at the last judgment and each receives its own end—an end that has no end. It is these ends of both cities that we must discuss next.

116 Honorius and Eutychianus were consuls in AD 398.
117 Mallius Theodorus was consul in AD 399; Gaudentius and Jovius were imperial officials sent to close pagan temples in Africa.

Book XIX

The supreme good and peace
Philosophy's search for happiness; the miseries of life; peace in the two cities; what a commonwealth is.

THAT VARRO FOUND THAT TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHT SECTS ARE POSSIBLE ON THE QUESTION, DEBATED BY PHILOSOPHERS, OF THE ENDS OF GOOD AND EVIL

Varro counts 288 possible philosophical schools on the question of the supreme good.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.1	Quoniam de ciuitatis utriusque, terrenae scilicet et caelestis, debitis finibus deinceps mihi uideo disputandum: prius exponenda sunt, quantum operis huius terminandi ratio patitur, argumenta mortalium, quibus sibi ipsi beatitudinem facere in huius uitae infelicitate moliti sunt, ut ab eorum rebus uanis spes nostra quid differat, quam Deus nobis dedit, et res ipsa, hoc est uera beatitudo, quam dabit, non tantum auctoritate diuina, sed adhibita etiam ratione, qualem propter infideles possumus adhibere, clarescat. De finibus enim bonorum et malorum multa et multipliciter inter se philosophi disputarunt; quam quaestionem maxima intentione uersantes inuenire conati sunt, quid efficiat hominem beatum.	I see that I must next discuss the proper ends of both cities, the earthly and the heavenly. So I must first set out, as far as the plan for bringing this work to a close allows, the arguments by which mortals have tried to make happiness for themselves in the unhappiness of this life. In this way it may become clear how our hope, which God has given us, differs from their empty concerns, and how the reality itself, that is, the true happiness he will give, differs from them too. And this should become clear not only by divine authority but also by bringing in reason, of the kind we can use for the sake of unbelievers. For philosophers have argued among themselves at great length and in many different ways about the ends of good and evil. Turning this question over with the greatest concentration, they have tried to discover what makes a human being happy.
	Illud enim est finis boni nostri, propter quod adpetenda sunt cetera, ipsum autem propter se ipsum; et illud finis mali, propter quod uitanda sunt cetera, ipsum autem propter se ipsum. Finem boni ergo nunc dicimus, non quo consumatur, ut non sit, sed quo perficiatur, ut plenum sit; et finem mali, non quo esse desinat, sed quo usque nocendo perducat. Fines itaque isti sunt summum bonum et summum malum.	For the end of our good is that for the sake of which everything else is to be sought, while it is itself sought for its own sake. The end of evil is that on account of which everything else is to be avoided, while it is itself avoided for its own sake. By “the end of good,” then, we do not now mean that by which it is used up so that it ceases to be, but that by which it is brought to completion so that it is full. By “the end of evil” we do not mean that by which it ceases to be, but the point to which its harm finally carries us. These ends, therefore, are the supreme good and the supreme evil.
	De quibus inueniendis adque in hac uita summo bono adipiscendo, uitando autem summo malo, multum, sicut dixi, laborauerunt, qui studium sapientiae in saeculi huius uanitate professi sunt; nec tamen eos, quamuis diuersis errantes modis, naturae limes in tantum ab	As I said, those who professed the pursuit of wisdom amid the vanity of this world have labored hard to find these ends, and to attain the supreme good and avoid the supreme evil in this life. Yet although they went astray in different ways, the itinere ueritatis deuiare permisit, ut non alii in animo, alii in corpore, alii in utroque fines bonorum ponerent et malorum. Ex qua tripertita uelut generalium distributione sectarum Marcus Varro in libro de philosophia tam multam dogmatum uarietatem diligenter et subtiliter scrutatus aduertit, ut ad ducentas octoginta et octo sectas, non quae iam essent, sed quae esse possent, adhibens quasdam differentias facillime perueniret.

LATIN

Quod ut breuiter ostendam, inde oportet incipiam, quod ipse aduertit et posuit in libro memorato, quattuor esse quaedam, quae homines sine magistro, sine ullo doctrinae adminiculo, sine industria uel arte uiuendi, quae uirtus dicitur et procul dubio discitur, uelut naturaliter adpetunt, aut uoluptatem, qua delectabiliter mouetur corporis sensus, aut quietem, qua fit ut nullam molestiam corporis quisque patiatur, aut utramque, quam tamen uno nomine uoluptatis Epicurus appellat, aut uniuersaliter prima naturae, in quibus et haec sunt et alia, uel in corpore, ut membrorum integritas et salus adque incolumitas eius, uel in animo, ut sunt ea, quae uel parua uel magna in hominum reperiuntur ingeniis.

Haec igitur quattuor, id est uoluptas, quies, utrumque, prima naturae, ita sunt in nobis, ut uel uirtus, quam postea doctrina inserit, propter haec adpetenda sit, aut ista propter uirtutem, aut utraque propter se ipsa; ac per hoc fiunt hinc duodecim sectae; per hanc enim rationem singulae triplicantur; quod cum in una demonstrauero, difficile non erit id in ceteris inuenire. Cum ergo uoluptas corporis animi uirtuti aut subditur aut praefertur aut iungitur, tripertita uariatur diuersitate sectarum. Subditur autem uirtuti, quando in usum uirtutis adsumitur. Pertinet quippe ad uirtutis officium et uiuere patriae et propter patriam filios procreare, quorum neutrum fieri potest sine corporis uoluptate; nam sine illa nec cibus potusque sumitur, ut uiuatur, nec concumbitur, ut generatio propagetur.

ENGLISH

boundary set by nature did not let them stray so far from the path of truth that they failed to place the ends of good and evil in the mind, in the body, or in both. Starting from this threefold division into general schools, as it were, Marcus Varro, in his book On Philosophy, examined the doctrines with care and subtlety and observed so great a variety among them that, by introducing certain distinctions, he very easily arrived at two hundred and eighty-eight schools. These were not schools that actually existed, but schools that could exist.[1]

To show this briefly, I must begin from what he himself observed and set down in the book I have mentioned. There are four things, he says, that people seek as if by nature: without a teacher, without any help from instruction, and without effort or the art of living that is called virtue and is undoubtedly learned. The first is pleasure, by which the bodily sense is agreeably stirred. The second is rest, which keeps a person from suffering any bodily discomfort. The third is both together, which Epicurus nevertheless calls by the single name of pleasure. The fourth, more generally, is the primary things of nature, which include these and others as well. Some are in the body, such as the soundness of its limbs, its health and its safety. Others are in the mind, such as the abilities, small or great, that are found in human talents.[2]

These four, then (pleasure, rest, both together, and the primary things of nature), are in us in such a way that one of three things holds. Either virtue, which instruction later implants, is to be sought for their sake, or they are to be sought for the sake of virtue, or both are to be sought for their own sake. From this come twelve schools, since by this reasoning each of the four is tripled. Once I have shown this in one case, it will not be hard to find it in the others. When bodily pleasure, then, is subordinated to the virtue of the mind, or preferred to it, or joined with it, it gives rise to a threefold variety of schools. It is subordinated to virtue when it is taken up for virtue's use. For it belongs to the duty of virtue both to live for one's country and to beget children for one's country, and neither can

1 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC) was the most learned Roman scholar of his age. His On Philosophy is lost and known chiefly from this passage.

2 Epicurus (341–270 BC) was the Greek philosopher who made pleasure, understood chiefly as freedom from pain, the goal of life.

LATIN

Cum uero praefertur uirtuti, ipsa adpetitur propter se ipsam, uirtus autem adsumenda creditur propter illam, id est, ut nihil uirtus agat nisi ad consequendam uel conseruandam corporis uoluptatem; quae uita deformis est quidem, quippe ubi uirtus seruit dominae uoluptati, quamuis nullo modo haec dicenda sit uirtus; sed tamen etiam ista horribilis turpitudo habuit quosdam philosophos patronos et defensores suos. Virtuti porro uoluptas iungitur, quando neutra earum propter alteram, sed propter se ipsas ambae adpetuntur. Quapropter sicut uoluptas uel subdita uel praelata uel iuncta uirtuti tres sectas facit, ita quies, ita utrumque, ita prima naturae alias ternas inueniuntur efficere. Pro uarietate quippe humanarum opinionum uirtuti aliquando subduntur, aliquando praeferuntur, aliquando iunguntur, ac sic ad duodenarium sectarum numerum peruenitur.

Sed iste quoque numerus duplicatur adhibita una differentia, socialis uidelicet uitae, quoniam, quisquis sectatur aliquam istarum duodecim sectam, profecto aut propter se tantum id agit aut etiam propter socium, cui debet hoc uelle quod sibi. Quocirca duodecim sunt eorum, qui propter se tantum unamquamque tenendam putant, et aliae duodecim eorum, qui non solum propter se sic uel sic philosophandum esse decernunt, sed etiam propter alios, quorum bonum adpetunt sicut suum. Hae autem sectae uiginti quattuor iterum geminantur addita differentia ex Academicis nouis et fiunt quadraginta octo.

Illarum quippe uiginti quattuor unamquamque sectarum potest quisque sic tenere ac defendere ut certam, quem ad modum defenderunt Stoici, quod hominis bonum, quo beatus esset, in animi tantummodo uirtute consisteret; potest alius ut incertam, sicut defenderunt Academici noui, quod eis etsi non certum, tamen ueri simile uidebatur. Viginti quattuor ergo fiunt per eos, qui eas uelut certas propter ueritatem, et aliae uiginti quattuor per eos, qui easdem quamuis incertas propter ueri similitudinem sequendas putant. Rursus, quia unamquamque istarum quadraginta octo sectarum potest be done without bodily pleasure. Without it we would neither take food and drink in order to live, nor lie together in order to propagate the race.

ENGLISH

But when pleasure is preferred to virtue, pleasure is sought for its own sake, and virtue is thought worth adopting for pleasure's sake. In other words, virtue does nothing except to obtain or preserve bodily pleasure. This is indeed a shameful life, since in it virtue is the slave of pleasure as its mistress, though such a thing should in no way be called virtue. Yet even this horrible depravity has had certain philosophers as its patrons and defenders. Pleasure, again, is joined with virtue when neither is sought for the sake of the other, but both for their own sake. So just as pleasure, whether subordinated to virtue, preferred to it or joined with it, makes three schools, rest, both together and the primary things of nature are each found to produce three more. For according to the variety of human opinions they are sometimes subordinated to virtue, sometimes preferred to it, and sometimes joined with it. In this way we arrive at the number of twelve schools.

But this number too is doubled when one further distinction is introduced, namely that of social life. For whoever follows any one of these twelve schools surely does so either for his own sake alone or also for the sake of a companion, for whom he ought to want what he wants for himself. So there are twelve schools of those who think each position should be held for their own sake alone. There are another twelve of those who decide that one should philosophize in this way or that not only for one's own sake but also for the sake of others, whose good they seek as their own. These twenty-four schools are doubled again by adding a distinction drawn from the New Academics, and they become forty-eight.

For anyone can hold and defend each of those twenty-four schools as certain, in the way the Stoics defended the view that the human good, which makes a person happy, consists solely in the virtue of the mind. Someone else can hold the same school as uncertain, as the New Academics defended what seemed to them, if not certain, at least likely to be true. So there are twenty-four schools of those who think these views should be followed as certain because they are true. There are another twenty-four of those who think the

LATIN	ENGLISH
quisque sequi habitu ceterorum philosophorum, itemque alius potest habitu Cynicorum, ex hac etiam differentia duplicantur et nonaginta sex fiunt.	same views should be followed, though uncertain, because they resemble the truth. Again, anyone can follow each of these forty-eight schools in the garb of the other philosophers, and someone else can follow it in the garb of the Cynics. This distinction too doubles them, and they become ninety-six.[3]
Deinde quia earum singulas quasque ita tueri homines possunt adque sectari, ut aut otiosam diligant uitam, sicut hi, qui tantummodo studiis doctrinae uacare uoluerunt adque ualuerunt, aut negotiosam, sicut hi, qui cum philosopharentur tamen administratione rei publicae regendisque rebus humanis occupatissimi fuerunt, aut ex utroque genere temperatam, sicut hi, qui partim erudito otio partim necessario negotio alternantia uitae suae tempora tribuerunt: propter has differentias potest etiam triplicari numerus iste sectarum et ad ducentas octoginta octo perduci.	Next, people can defend and follow each of these schools while preferring one of three kinds of life. Some prefer a life of leisure, like those who wished, and were able, to devote themselves solely to the pursuits of learning. Some prefer a life of business, like those who, though they philosophized, were fully occupied in administering the commonwealth and governing human affairs. Others prefer a life balanced between the two, like those who divided their time into alternating periods, given partly to learned leisure and partly to necessary business. Because of these distinctions this number of schools can also be tripled, bringing it to two hundred and eighty-eight.
Haec de Varronis libro, quantum potui, breuiter ac dilucide posui, sententias eius meis explicans uerbis. Quo modo autem refutatis ceteris unam eligat, quam uult esse Academicorum ueterum (quos a Platone institutos usque ad Polemonem, qui ab illo quartus eius scholam tenuit, quae Academia dicta est, habuisse certa dogmata uult uideri et ob hoc distinguit ab Academicis nouis, quibus incerta sunt omnia, quod philosophiae genus ab Arcesila coepit successore Polemonis), eamque sectam, id est ueterum Academicorum, sicut dubitatione ita omni errore carere arbitretur, longum est per omnia demonstrare; nec tamen omni ex parte res omittenda est. Remouet ergo prius illas omnes differentias, quae numerum multiplicauere sectarum, quas ideo remouendas putat, quia non in eis est finis boni.	This is what I have taken from Varro's book, set out as briefly and clearly as I could, explaining his views in my own words. After refuting the others, he chooses one school, which he holds to be that of the Old Academics. (He wants it to be thought that these, founded by Plato and continuing down to Polemon, the fourth after Plato to head his school, which was called the Academy, held definite doctrines. On this ground he distinguishes them from the New Academics, for whom everything is uncertain, a kind of philosophy that began with Arcesilaus, Polemon's successor.) He also judges that this school, that of the Old Academics, is free from all error, just as it is free from doubt. To show in every detail how he does all this would take a long time; yet the matter should not be passed over entirely. First, then, he sets aside all the distinctions that multiplied the number of schools. He thinks they should be set aside because the end of good does not lie in them.[4]
Neque enim existimat ullam philosophiae sectam esse dicendam, quae non eo distet a ceteris, quod diuersos habeat fines bonorum et malorum. Quando quidem nulla	For he does not think that any philosophical school deserves the name unless it differs from the others by having different ends of good and

3 The Cynics, followers of Diogenes of Sinope (4th century BC), rejected social convention and were known for their coarse cloak, beggar's life and shameless public behavior.
4 Polemon headed Plato's Academy at Athens from about 314 to 270 BC. His successor Arcesilaus (c. 316–241 BC) turned it toward skepticism, giving rise to the "New Academy."

LATIN

est homini causa philosophandi, nisi ut beatus sit; quod autem beatum facit, ipse est finis boni; nulla est igitur causa philosophandi, nisi finis boni: quam ob rem quae nullum boni finem sectatur, nulla philosophiae secta dicenda est.

Cum ergo quaeritur de sociali uita, utrum sit tenenda sapienti, ut summum bonum, quo fit homo beatus, ita uelit et curet amici sui, quem ad modum suum, an suae tantummodo beatitudinis causa faciat quidquid facit: non de ipso summo bono quaestio est, sed de adsumendo uel non adsumendo socio ad huius participationem boni, non propter se ipsum, sed propter eundem socium, ut eius bono ita gaudeat, sicut gaudet suo.

Item cum quaeritur de Academicis nouis, quibus incerta sunt omnia, utrum ita sint res habendae, in quibus philosophandum est, an, sicut aliis philosophis placuit, certas eas habere debeamus: non quaeritur quid in boni fine sectandum sit, sed de ipsius boni ueritate, quod sectandum uidetur, utrum sit necne dubitandum; hoc est, ut id planius eloquar, utrum ita sectandum sit, ut, qui sectatur, dicat esse uerum, an ita, ut, qui sectatur, dicat uerum sibi uideri, etiamsi forte sit falsum, tamen uterque sectetur unum adque idem bonum. In illa etiam differentia, quae adhibetur ex habitu et consuetudine Cynicorum, non quaeritur, quisnam sit finis boni, sed utrum in illo habitu et consuetudine sit uiuendum ei, qui uerum sectatur bonum, quodlibet ei uerum uideatur esse adque sectandum.

Denique fuerunt, qui cum diuersa sequerentur bona finalia, alii uirtutem, alii uoluptatem, eundem tamen habitum et consuetudinem tenebant, ex qua Cynici appellabantur. Ita illud quidquid est, unde philosophi Cynici discernuntur a ceteris, ad eligendum ac tenendum bonum, quo beati fierent, utique nil ualebat. Nam si aliquid ad hoc interesset, profecto idem habitus eundem finem sequi cogeret, et diuersus habitus eundem sequi finem non sineret.

ENGLISH

evil. There is no reason for a human being to philosophize except to be happy, and what makes one happy is the end of good itself. It follows that there is no reason to philosophize except the end of good. Hence a school that pursues no end of good should not be called a philosophical school at all.

So take the question about social life. Should the wise man embrace it, wanting and caring for the supreme good, which makes a human being happy, for his friend just as for himself? Or does he do whatever he does solely for the sake of his own happiness? Here the question is not about the supreme good itself. It is about whether or not to take a companion into a share in this good, not for one's own sake but for the companion's, so as to rejoice in his good just as one rejoices in one's own.

Likewise, take the question raised by the New Academics, for whom everything is uncertain. Should the matters we philosophize about be regarded in that way? Or, as other philosophers have held, ought we to regard them as certain? Here the question is not what should be pursued as the end of good. It is about the truth of the good itself that seems worth pursuing: should it be doubted or not? To put it more plainly, should one pursue it in such a way that the pursuer says it is true? Or in such a way that the pursuer says it seems true to him, even if it is perhaps false? Either way, both pursue one and the same good. The distinction drawn from the garb and habits of the Cynics works the same way. The question there is not what the end of good is. It is whether one who pursues the true good, whatever good seems to him true and worth pursuing, should live in that garb and with those habits.

In fact, there were some who pursued different final goods, some virtue and others pleasure, and yet kept the same garb and habits, which earned them the name of Cynics. So whatever it is that distinguishes Cynic philosophers from the rest, it certainly counted for nothing in choosing and holding the good that would make them happy. For if it made any difference to this, the same garb would surely compel people to pursue the same end, and different garb would not allow them to pursue the same end.

HOW VARRO, SETTING ASIDE ALL DIFFERENCES THAT MAKE NOT SECTS BUT QUESTIONS, ARRIVES AT A THREEFOLD DEFINITION OF THE SUPREME GOOD, OF WHICH ONE MUST BE CHOSEN

Varro discards the distinctions that do not concern the supreme good and keeps three schools.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.2	In tribus quoque illis uitae generibus, uno scilicet non segniter, sed in contemplatione uel inquisitione ueritatis otioso, altero in gerendis rebus humanis negotioso, tertio ex utroque genere temperato, cum quaeritur quid horum sit potius eligendum, non finis boni habet controuersiam: sed quid horum trium difficultatem uel facilitatem adferat ad consequendum uel retinendum finem boni, id in ista quaestione uersatur. Finis enim boni, cum ad eum quisque peruenerit, protinus beatum facit; in otio autem litterato, uel in negotio publico, uel quando utrumque uicibus agitur, non continuo quisque beatus est. Multi quippe in quolibet horum trium possunt uiuere, et in adpetendo boni fine, quo fit homo beatus, errare.	The same is true of those three kinds of life. The first is leisured, not in sloth but in contemplating or investigating the truth. The second is busy with the conduct of human affairs. The third is balanced between the two. When the question is which of these is preferable, the dispute is not about the end of good. What the question deals with is which of the three makes it harder or easier to attain or keep the end of good. For the end of good, once a person reaches it, makes him happy at once. But a person is not immediately happy in literary leisure, or in public business, or when he engages in both by turns. Indeed, many people can live in any one of these three and still go astray in seeking the end of good that makes a human being happy.
	Alia est igitur quaestio de finibus bonorum et malorum, quae unamquamque philosophorum sectam facit, et aliae sunt quaestiones de sociali uita, de cunctatione Academicorum, de uestitu et uictu Cynicorum, de tribus uitae generibus, otioso, actuoso, ex utroque modificato; quarum nulla est, in qua de bonorum et malorum finibus disputatur.	So the question about the ends of good and evil, which is what constitutes each philosophical school, is one thing. The questions about social life, about the Academics' suspension of judgment, about the clothing and diet of the Cynics, and about the three kinds of life (leisured, active, and a blend of both) are another. In none of these is the debate about the ends of good and evil.
	Proinde quoniam Marcus Varro has quattuor adhibens differentias, id est ex uita sociali, ex Academicis nouis, ex Cynicis, ex isto uitae genere tripertito ad sectas ducentas octoginta octo peruenit, et si quae aliae possunt similiter adici: remotis eis omnibus, quoniam de sectando summo bono nullam inferunt quaestionem et ideo sectae nec sunt nec uocandae sunt, ad illas duodecim, in quibus quaeritur, quod sit bonum hominis, quo adsecuto fit beatus, ut ex eis unam ueram, ceteras falsas ostendat esse, reuertitur. Nam remoto illo tripertito genere uitae duae partes huius numeri detrahuntur et sectae nonaginta sex remanent. Remota uero differentia ex Cynicis addita ad dimidium rediguntur et quadraginta octo fiunt. Auferamus etiam quod ex Academicis nouis adhibitum est: rursus dimidia pars remanet, id est uiginti quattuor.	Marcus Varro, then, applied these four distinctions, drawn from social life, from the New Academics, from the Cynics, and from the threefold kind of life, and arrived at two hundred and eighty-eight schools, along with any others that might be added in the same way. But he sets all these aside, since they raise no question about pursuing the supreme good, and therefore neither are schools nor should be called schools. He returns to the twelve in which the question is what the good of a human being is, the good whose attainment makes him happy. His aim is to show that one of them is true and the rest false. For when the threefold kind of life is removed, two-thirds of the number are taken away and ninety-six schools remain. When the distinction added from the Cynics is removed, they are reduced by half and become forty-eight. Let us also take away what was introduced from the New Academics: again half remains, that is, twenty-four.

LATIN

De sociali quoque uita quod accesserat similiter auferatur: duodecim sunt reliquae, quas ista differentia, ut uiginti quattuor fierent, duplicauerat. De his ergo duodecim nihil dici potest, quur sectae non sint habendae. Nihil quippe aliud in eis quaeritur quam fines bonorum et malorum. Inuentis autem bonorum finibus profecto e contrario sunt malorum. Hae autem ut fiant duodecim sectae, illa quattuor triplicantur, uoluptas, quies, utrumque et prima naturae, quae primigenia Varro uocat.

Haec quippe quattuor dum singillatim uirtuti aliquando subduntur, ut non propter se ipsa, sed propter officium uirtutis adpetenda uideantur, aliquando praeferuntur, ut non propter se ipsa, sed propter haec adipiscenda uel conseruanda necessaria uirtus putetur, aliquando iunguntur, ut propter se ipsa et uirtus et ista adpetenda credantur, quaternarium numerum triplum reddunt et ad duodecim sectas perueniunt. Ex illis autem quattuor rebus Varro tres tollit, uoluptatem scilicet et quietem et utrumque; non quod eas inprobet, sed quod primigenia illa naturae et uoluptatem in se habeant et quietem. Quid ergo opus est ex his duabus tria quaedam facere, duo scilicet, cum singillatim adpetuntur uoluptas aut quies, et tertium cum ambae simul, quando quidem prima naturae et ipsas et praeter ipsas alia multa contineant?

De tribus ergo sectis ei placet diligenter esse tractandum, quaenam sit potius eligenda. Non enim ueram plus quam unam uera ratio esse permittit, siue in his tribus sit siue alicubi alibi, quod post uidebimus. Interim de his tribus quo modo unam Varro eligat, quantum breuiter aperteque possumus, disseramus. Istae nempe tres sectae ita fiunt, cum uel prima naturae propter uirtutem, uel uirtus propter prima naturae, uel utraque, id est et uirtus et prima naturae, propter se ipsa sunt expetenda.

ENGLISH

Likewise let what had been added from social life be taken away. Twelve are left, which that distinction had doubled to make twenty-four. About these twelve, then, there is nothing to be said for not counting them as schools. For nothing else is sought in them but the ends of good and evil, and once the ends of good are found, the ends of evil are surely their opposites. To make these twelve schools, the four things are tripled: pleasure, rest, both together, and the primary things of nature, which Varro calls primigenia [the primal things].

These four, taken one at a time, are sometimes subordinated to virtue, so that they seem worth seeking not for their own sake but for the sake of virtue's duty. Sometimes they are preferred to it, so that virtue is thought necessary not for its own sake but in order to obtain or preserve them. Sometimes they are joined with it, so that both virtue and they are believed worth seeking for their own sake. In this way they triple the number four and arrive at twelve schools. Of those four things, however, Varro removes three, namely pleasure, rest and both together. He does not disapprove of them, but those primal things of nature already include both pleasure and rest. What need is there, then, to make three things out of these two? There would be two when pleasure or rest is sought singly, and a third when both are sought together. Yet the primary things of nature contain both of them and many other things besides.

So he thinks the three schools must be carefully examined, to decide which one should be chosen. For true reason does not allow more than one to be true, whether it is among these three or somewhere else, as we shall see later. Meanwhile, let us discuss, as briefly and clearly as we can, how Varro chooses one of these three. These three schools arise, of course, in this way: either the primary things of nature are to be sought for the sake of virtue, or virtue for the sake of the primary things of nature, or both, that is, virtue and the primary things of nature, for their own sake.

WHICH OF THE THREE SECTS SEEKING THE SUPREME HUMAN GOOD VARRO SAYS SHOULD BE CHOSEN, FOLLOWING THE VIEW OF THE OLD ACADEMY ON THE AUTHORITY OF ANTIOCHUS

Varro, following Antiochus and the Old Academy, holds that the supreme good combines goods of soul and body.

LATIN

ENGLISH

19.3

LATIN

Quid ergo istorum trium sit uerum adque sectandum, isto modo persuadere conatur. Primum, quia summum bonum in philosophia non arboris, non pecoris, non Dei, sed hominis quaeritur, quid sit ipse homo, quaerendum putat. Sentit quippe in eius natura duo esse quaedam, corpus et animam, et horum quidem duorum melius esse animam longeque praestabilius omnino non dubitat, sed utrum anima sola sit homo, ut ita sit ei corpus tamquam equus equiti (eques enim non homo et equus, sed solus homo est; ideo tamen eques dicitur, quod aliquo modo se habeat ad equum), an corpus solum sit homo, aliquo modo se habens ad animam, sicut poculum ad potionem (non enim calix et potio, quam continet calix, simul dicitur poculum, sed calix solus; ideo tamen quod potioni continendae sit adcommodatus), an uero nec anima sola nec solum corpus, sed simul utrumque sit homo, cuius sit pars una siue anima siue corpus, ille autem totus ex utroque constet, ut homo sit (sicut duos equos iunctos bigas uocamus, quorum siue dexter siue sinister pars est bigarum, unum uero eorum, quoquo modo se habeat ad alterum, bigas non dicimus, sed ambo simul).

Horum autem trium hoc elegit tertium hominemque nec animam solam nec solum corpus, sed animam simul et corpus esse arbitratur. Proinde summum bonum hominis, quo fit beatus, ex utriusque rei bonis constare dicit, et animae scilicet et corporis. Ac per hoc prima illa naturae propter se ipsa existimat expetenda ipsamque uirtutem, quam doctrina inserit uelut artem uiuendi, quae in animae bonis est excellentissimum bonum.

Quapropter eadem uirtus, id est ars agendae uitae, cum acceperit prima naturae, quae sine illa erant, sed tamen erant etiam quando eis doctrina adhuc deerat, omnia propter se ipsa adpetit simulque etiam se ipsam, omnibusque simul et se ipsa utitur, eo fine, ut omnibus delectetur adque perfruatur, magis minusque, ut quaeque inter se maiora adque minora sunt, tamen omnibus gaudens et quaedam minora, si necessitas postulat, propter maiora uel adipiscenda uel tenenda contemnens. Omnium autem bonorum uel animi uel corporis nihil sibi

ENGLISH

Which of these three, then, is true and should be followed? He tries to persuade us of the answer in this way. First, he notes that in philosophy the supreme good sought is not that of a tree, or of a beast, or of God, but of a human being. So he thinks we must first ask what a human being is. He perceives that there are two things in human nature, body and soul, and he has no doubt at all that of these two the soul is better and far superior. But is the soul alone the human being, so that the body is to it as a horse is to a rider? (For a rider is not a man plus a horse, but the man alone; yet he is called a rider because he stands in a certain relation to the horse.) Or is the body alone the human being, standing in a certain relation to the soul as a drinking cup does to its drink? (For it is not the vessel together with the drink it holds that is called a drinking cup, but the vessel alone; yet it is so called because it is suited to holding drink.) Or, finally, is the human being neither the soul alone nor the body alone, but both together? In that case soul and body are each one part of him, while the whole consists of both so as to be a human being. (Similarly, we call two horses yoked together a pair. The right horse and the left horse are each part of the pair, but we do not call either of them a pair, however it is related to the other; we use the word only of both together.)

Of these three he chose the third. He holds that a human being is neither the soul alone nor the body alone, but soul and body together. Accordingly, he says that the supreme good of a human being, which makes him happy, consists of the goods of both, that is, of soul and of body. For this reason he thinks that the primary things of nature are to be sought for their own sake. The same goes for virtue itself, which instruction implants as the art of living, and which is the most excellent of the goods of the soul.

This virtue, then, is the art of conducting life. It receives the primary things of nature, which existed without it, and existed even while instruction was still lacking to them. It then seeks all of them for their own sake, and itself as well. It uses all of them and itself together, with this end in view: to delight in them all and enjoy them all. It enjoys each more or less according as each is greater or less than the others, yet it rejoices in all of them. If necessity demands, it disregards some lesser uirtus omnino praeponit. Haec enim bene utitur et se ipsa et ceteris, quae hominem faciunt beatum, bonis.

LATIN

Ubi uero ipsa non est, quamlibet multa sint bona, non bono eius sunt, cuius sunt, ac per hoc iam nec eius bona dicenda sunt, cui male utenti utilia esse non possunt. Haec ergo uita hominis, quae uirtute et aliis animi et corporis bonis, sine quibus uirtus esse non potest, fruitur, beata esse dicitur; si uero et aliis, sine quibus esse uirtus potest, uel ullis uel pluribus, beatior; si autem prorsus omnibus, ut nullum omnino bonum desit uel animi uel corporis, beatissima. Non enim hoc est uita, quod uirtus, quoniam non omnis uita, sed sapiens uita uirtus est; et tamen qualiscumque uita sine ulla uirtute potest esse; uirtus uero sine ulla uita non potest esse.

Hoc et de memoria dixerim adque ratione, et si quid tale aliud est in homine. Sunt enim haec et ante doctrinam, sine his autem non potest esse ulla doctrina, ac per hoc nec uirtus, quae utique discitur. Bene autem currere, pulchrum esse corpore, uiribus ingentibus praeualere et cetera huius modi talia sunt, ut et uirtus sine his esse possit et ipsa sine uirtute; bona sunt tamen, et secundum istos etiam ipsa propter se ipsam diligit uirtus, utiturque illis et fruitur, sicut uirtutem decet.

Hanc uitam beatam etiam socialem perhibent esse, quae amicorum bona propter se ipsa diligat sicut sua eisque propter ipsos hoc uelit quod sibi; siue in domo sint, sicut coniux et liberi et quicumque domestici, siue in loco, ubi domus est eius, sicuti est urbs, ut sunt hi qui ciues uocantur, siue in orbe toto, ut sunt gentes quas ei societas humana coniungit, siue in ipso mundo, qui censetur nomine caeli et terrae, sicut esse dicunt deos, quos uolunt amicos esse homini sapienti, quos nos familiarius angelos dicimus.

ENGLISH

goods in order to obtain or keep greater ones. But of all goods, whether of mind or of body, virtue ranks nothing at all above itself. For it makes good use both of itself and of the other goods that make a human being happy.

But where virtue is absent, however many goods there may be, they do not serve the good of the one who has them. So they should not even be called his goods, since they cannot be of use to someone who uses them badly. This human life, then, is called happy when it enjoys virtue and the other goods of mind and body without which virtue cannot exist. It is happier if it also enjoys some or many of the other goods, those without which virtue can exist. It is happiest if it enjoys absolutely all of them, so that no good whatever of mind or body is lacking. For life is not the same thing as virtue, since virtue is not every life, but only a wise life. A life of some kind can exist without any virtue; but virtue cannot exist without any life.

I would say the same of memory and reason, and of anything else of that kind in a human being. These exist even before instruction, and without them there can be no instruction, and therefore no virtue either, since virtue is certainly learned. But running well, having a beautiful body, excelling in great strength and other things of this sort are different. Virtue can exist without them, and they without virtue. Yet they are goods, and according to these philosophers virtue loves even them for their own sake, and uses and enjoys them as befits virtue.

They maintain that this happy life is also social. It loves the goods of friends for their own sake, as its own, and wants for them, for their sake, what it wants for itself. These friends may be in the household, such as a spouse, children and any other members of the household. They may be in the place where one has one's home, such as a city, like those called fellow citizens. They may be in the whole earth, like the nations to which human fellowship joins us. Or they may be in the world itself, which goes by the name of heaven and earth. Such, they say, are the gods, whom they hold to be friends of the wise man, and whom we more familiarly call angels.

LATIN

De bonorum autem et e contrario malorum finibus negant ullo modo esse dubitandum et hanc inter se et nouos Academicos adfirmant esse distantiam, nec eorum interest quidquam, siue Cynico siue alio quolibet habitu et uictu in his finibus, quos ueros putant, quisque philosophetur. Ex tribus porro illis uitae generibus, otioso, actuoso et quod ex utroque conpositum est, hoc tertium sibi placere adseuerant. Haec sensisse adque docuisse Academicos ueteres Varro adserit, auctore Antiocho, magistro Ciceronis et suo, quem sane Cicero in pluribus fuisse Stoicum quam ueterem Academicum uult uideri. Sed quid ad nos, qui potius de rebus ipsis iudicare debemus, quam pro magno de hominibus quid quisque senserit scire?

ENGLISH

As for the ends of good and, conversely, of evil, they deny that there should be any doubt at all about them, and they declare that this is the difference between themselves and the New Academics. Nor does it matter to them whether a person philosophizes within these ends, which they think true, in the garb and diet of the Cynics or in any other. Of the three kinds of life, moreover (the leisured, the active and the one compounded of both), they assert that they favor the third. Varro states that the Old Academics held and taught these views, on the authority of Antiochus, who was Cicero's teacher and his own. Cicero, to be sure, would have it thought that Antiochus was in more respects a Stoic than an Old Academic. But what is that to us? We ought rather to judge the matters themselves than to set great store by knowing what each person thought about them.[5]

WHAT CHRISTIANS BELIEVE ABOUT THE SUPREME GOOD AND THE SUPREME EVIL, AGAINST THE PHILOSOPHERS WHO SAID THE SUPREME GOOD IS WITHIN THEMSELVES

The city of God answers: eternal life is the supreme good, and happiness here exists only in hope.

LATIN

19.4 Si ergo quaeratur a nobis, quid ciuitas Dei de his singulis interrogata respondeat ac primum de finibus bonorum malorumque quid sentiat: respondebit aeternam uitam esse summum bonum, aeternam uero mortem summum malum; propter illam proinde adipiscendam istamque uitandam recte nobis esse uiuendum. Propter quod scriptum est: Iustus ex fide uiuit; quoniam neque bonum nostrum iam uidemus, unde oportet ut credendo quaeramus, neque ipsum recte uiuere nobis ex nobis est, nisi credentes adiuuet et orantes qui et ipsam fidem dedit, qua nos ab illo adiuuandos esse credamus.

Illi autem, qui in ista uita fines bonorum et malorum esse putauerunt, siue in corpore siue in animo siue in utroque ponentes summum bonum, adque, ut id explicatius eloquar, siue in uoluptate siue in uirtute siue in utraque; siue in quiete siue in uirtute siue in utraque; siue in uoluptate simul et quiete siue in uirtute siue in utrisque, siue in primis naturae siue in uirtute siue in utrisque; hic beati esse et a se ipsis beati fieri mira uanitate uoluerunt. Inrisit hos Veritas per prophetam dicentem: Dominus

ENGLISH

If, then, we are asked what the city of God answers when questioned on each of these points, and first what it thinks about the ends of good and evil, it will answer that eternal life is the supreme good and eternal death the supreme evil, and that we must live rightly in order to obtain the one and avoid the other. That is why it is written: "The righteous lives by faith." For we do not yet see our good, and so we must seek it by believing. Nor does our very living rightly come from ourselves, unless he helps us as we believe and pray. He also gave us that very faith by which we believe that we need his help.[6]

Others have thought that the ends of good and evil lie in this life. They placed the supreme good in the body, or in the mind, or in both. Or, to spell it out more fully, they placed it in pleasure, or in virtue, or in both; in rest, or in virtue, or in both; in pleasure and rest together, or in virtue, or in both; in the primary things of nature, or in virtue, or in both. With astonishing vanity, these people

5 Antiochus of Ascalon (c. 130–68 BC) was a philosopher who claimed to restore the doctrines of the Old Academy. Cicero heard his lectures in Athens in 79 BC.
6 Habakkuk 2:4, quoted by Paul in Romans 1:17.

LATIN

nouit cogitationes hominum uel, sicut hoc testimonium posuit apostolus Paulus: Dominus nouit cogitationes sapientium, quoniam uanae sunt.

ENGLISH

wanted to be happy here and to be made happy by their own efforts. The Truth mocked them through the prophet who says: "The Lord knows the thoughts of human beings." Or, as the apostle Paul set down this testimony: "The Lord knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain."[7]

Quis enim sufficit quantouis eloquentiae flumine uitae huius miserias explicare? Quam lamentatus est Cicero in consolatione de morte filiae, sicut potuit; sed quantum est quod potuit? Ea quippe, quae dicuntur prima naturae, quando, ubi, quo modo tam bene se habere in hac uita possunt, ut non sub incertis casibus fluctuent? Quis enim dolor contrarius uoluptati, quae inquietudo contraria quieti in corpus cadere sapientis non potest? Membrorum certe amputatio uel debilitas hominis expugnat incolumitatem, deformitas pulchritudinem, inbecillitas sanitatem, uires lassitudo, mobilitatem torpor aut tarditas; et quid horum est, quod nequeat in carnem sapientis inruere? Status quoque corporis adque motus, cum decentes et congruentes sunt, inter naturae prima numerantur; sed quid si aliqua mala ualetudo membra tremore concutiat?

For who, however great the flood of his eloquence, is equal to setting out the miseries of this life? Cicero lamented them as best he could in his Consolation on the death of his daughter. But how much was his best? As for what are called the primary things of nature: when, where, and how can they be so secure in this life that they are not tossed about at the mercy of uncertain chance? For what pain, the opposite of pleasure, and what disturbance, the opposite of rest, cannot befall the body of the wise man? Certainly the amputation or crippling of limbs destroys a person's soundness. Disfigurement destroys his beauty, weakness his health, fatigue his strength, numbness or sluggishness his agility. Which of these cannot assail the flesh of the wise man? The posture and movement of the body, too, when they are seemly and fitting, are counted among the primary things of nature. But what if some illness shakes the limbs with trembling?[8] quid si usque ad ponendas in terra manus dorsi spina curuetur et hominem quodam modo quadrupedem faciat? Nonne omnem statuendi corporis et mouendi speciem decusque peruertet? Quid ipsius animi primigenia quae appellantur bona, ubi duo prima ponunt propter conprehensionem perceptionemque ueritatis sensum et intellectum? Sed qualis quantusque remanet sensus, si, ut alia taceam, fiat homo surdus et caecus? Ratio uero et intellegentia quo recedet, ubi sopietur, si aliquo morbo efficiatur insanus? Phrenetici multa absurda cum dicunt uel faciunt, plerumque a bono suo proposito et moribus aliena, immo suo bono proposito moribusque contraria, siue illa cogitemus siue uideamus, si digne consideremus, lacrimas tenere uix possumus aut forte nec possumus. Quid dicam de his, qui daemonum patiuntur incursus?

What if the spine is so bent that the hands reach the ground, turning the man into a sort of four-footed creature? Will this not ruin all beauty and grace in the way the body stands and moves? What of the so-called primal goods of the mind itself? Here they put two first, sense and intellect, because they grasp and perceive truth. But what kind of sense remains, and how much of it, if—to say nothing of other things—a man becomes deaf and blind? And where will reason and intelligence withdraw to, where will they fall asleep, if some disease drives him insane? The frenzied say or do many absurd things, mostly foreign to their good purposes and character, indeed contrary to their good purposes and character. When we think of these things or see them, and consider them as they deserve, we can scarcely hold back our tears, or perhaps cannot hold them back at all. What shall I say of those who suffer the assaults of demons?

7 Psalm 93:11 (94:11 in most English Bibles), quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 3:20.
8 Cicero wrote a Consolation, now lost, after the death of his daughter Tullia in 45 BC.

LATIN

Ubi habent absconditam uel obrutam intellegentiam suam, quando secundum suam uoluntatem et anima eorum et corpore malignus utitur spiritus? Et quis confidit hoc, malum in hac uita euenire non posse sapienti? Deinde perceptio ueritatis in hac carne qualis aut quanta est, quando, sicut legimus in ueraci libro sapientiae, corpus corruptibile adgrauat animam et deprimit terrena inhabitatio sensum multa cogitantem? Inpetus porro uel adpetitus actionis, si hoc modo recte Latine appellatur ea, quam Graeci uocant ὁρμήν, quia et ipsam primis naturae deputant bonis, nonne ipse est, quo geruntur etiam insanorum illi miserabiles motus et facta, quae horremus, quando peruertitur sensus ratioque sopitur?

ENGLISH

Where do they keep their intelligence, hidden or buried, when an evil spirit uses both their soul and their body as it pleases? And who is confident that this evil cannot happen to a wise man in this life? Then again, what sort of perception of truth do we have in this flesh, and how much, when, as we read in the truthful book of Wisdom, "the corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly dwelling presses down the mind that thinks of many things"? Further, there is impulse, or appetite for action, if that is the right Latin name for what the Greeks call ὁρμήν [hormē, impulse]. They count this too among the primary things of nature. Yet is it not this very impulse that drives those pitiable movements and deeds of the insane that horrify us, when sense is perverted and reason is asleep?[9]

Porro ipsa uirtus, quae non est inter prima naturae, quoniam eis postea doctrina introducente superuenit, cum sibi bonorum culmen uindicet humanorum, quid hic agit nisi perpetua bella cum uitiis, nec exterioribus, sed interioribus, nec alienis, sed plane nostris et propriis, maxime illa, quae Graece σωφροσύνη, Latine temperantia nominatur, qua carnales frenantur libidines, ne in quaeque flagitia mentem consentientem trahant? Neque enim nullum est uitium, cum, sicut dicit apostolus, caro concupiscit aduersus spiritum; cui uitio contraria uirtus est, cum, sicut idem dicit, spiritus, concupiscit aduersus carnem. Haec enim, inquit, inuicem aduersantur, ut non ea quae uultis faciatis. Quid autem facere uolumus, cum perfici uolumus fine summi boni, nisi ut caro aduersus spiritum non concupiscat, nec sit in nobis hoc uitium, contra quod spiritus concupiscat?

Then there is virtue itself. It is not among the primary things of nature, since it comes upon them later, brought in by teaching. It claims for itself the summit of human goods. Yet what does it do here but wage perpetual war with vices? These are not external vices but internal ones, not other people's but plainly our very own. This is above all the task of the virtue called in Greek σωφροσύνη [sōphrosynē, self-control] and in Latin temperance, which reins in the lusts of the flesh so that they do not drag the mind into consenting to every kind of depravity. For it is not as though there were no vice in us, since, as the apostle says, "the flesh desires against the spirit." The virtue opposed to this vice is present when, as he also says, "the spirit desires against the flesh." "For these," he says, "are opposed to each other, so that you do not do what you want." But what do we want to do, when we want to be made perfect in the end of the supreme good? Only this: that the flesh should not desire against the spirit, and that there should be in us no such vice for the spirit to desire against.[10]

Quod in hac uita, quamuis uelimus, quoniam facere non ualemus, id saltem in adiutorio Dei facimus, ne carni concupiscenti aduersus spiritum spiritu succumbente cedamus et ad perpetrandum peccatum nostra consensione pertrahamur. Absit ergo ut, quamdiu in hoc bello intestino sumus, iam nos beatitudinem, ad quam uincendo uolumus peruenire, adeptos esse credamus. Et

In this life we cannot accomplish that, however much we want to. So with God's help we at least do this: we do not let the spirit succumb and give way to the flesh that desires against it, and we are not dragged by our own consent into committing sin. Far be it from us, then, as long as we are in this civil war within, to believe that we have already 9 Wisdom 9:15, from the Wisdom of Solomon.

10 Galatians 5:17.

LATIN

quis est usque adeo sapiens, ut contra libidines nullum habeat omnino conflictum?

Quid illa uirtus, quae prudentia dicitur, nonne tota uigilantia sua bona discernit a malis, ut in illis adpetendis istisque uitandis nullus error obrepat, ac per hoc et ipsa nos in malis uel mala in nobis esse testatur? Ipsa enim docet malum esse ad peccandum consentire bonumque esse ad peccandum non consentire libidini. Illud tamen malum, cui nos non consentire docet prudentia, facit temperantia, nec prudentia nec temperantia tollit huic uitae. Quid iustitia, cuius munus est sua cuique tribuere (unde fit in ipso homine quidam iustus ordo naturae, ut anima subdatur Deo et animae caro, ac per hoc Deo et anima et caro), nonne demonstrat in eo se adhuc opere laborare potius quam in huius operis iam fine requiescere?

ENGLISH

attained the happiness we wish to reach by conquering. And who is so wise that he has no conflict at all against his lusts?

What of the virtue called prudence? Does it not use all its vigilance to distinguish good from evil, so that no error creeps in as we seek the one and avoid the other? And by that very fact, does it not testify that we are among evils, or that evils are within us? For it teaches that consenting to lust so as to sin is evil, and that refusing that consent is good. Yet prudence teaches us not to consent to that evil, and temperance makes us not consent to it, but neither prudence nor temperance removes it from this life. What of justice, whose task is to give each his own? From it there arises in man himself a certain just order of nature: the soul is subject to God and the flesh to the soul, and thus both soul and flesh are subject to God. Does justice not show that it is still laboring at this work, rather than already resting at its completion?

COURAGE AND THE STOICS

Courage witnesses to life's evils; the Stoics who call suicide a remedy cannot call such a life happy.

LATIN

Tanto minus quippe anima subditur Deo, quanto minus Deum in ipsis suis cogitationibus concipit; et tanto minus animae subditur caro, quanto magis aduersus spiritum concupiscit. Quamdiu ergo nobis inest haec infirmitas, haec pestis, hic languor, quo modo nos iam saluos, et si nondum saluos, quo modo iam beatos illa finali beatitudine dicere audebimus? Iam uero illa uirtus, cuius nomen est fortitudo, in quantacumque sapientia euidentissima testis est humanorum malorum, quae conpellitur patientia tolerare. Quae mala Stoici philosophi miror qua fronte mala non esse contendant, quibus fatentur, si tanta fuerint, ut ea sapiens uel non possit uel non debeat sustinere, cogi eum mortem sibimet inferre adque ex hac uita emigrare.

Tantus autem superbiae stupor est in his hominibus hic se habere finem boni et a se ipsis fieri beatos putantibus, ut sapiens eorum, hoc est, qualem mirabili uanitate describunt, etiamsi excaecetur obsurdescat obmutescat, membris debilitetur doloribus crucietur et, si quid aliud

ENGLISH

For the less the soul conceives of God in its very thoughts, the less it is subject to God. And the more the flesh desires against the spirit, the less it is subject to the soul. So long, then, as this weakness, this plague, this sickness is in us, how shall we dare to call ourselves already saved? And if we are not yet saved, how shall we dare to call ourselves already happy with that final happiness? Then there is the virtue whose name is courage. However great the wisdom in which it is found, it is the clearest witness to human evils, which it is compelled to bear with patience. I wonder how the Stoic philosophers have the face to maintain that these evils are not evils. They themselves admit that if the evils become so great that the wise man cannot or should not bear them, he is compelled to inflict death on himself and depart from this life.

These men think that they have the end of good here and are made happy by themselves. Yet so great is the stupor of their pride that their wise man—such as they describe him, with astonishing vanity—is not ashamed to call this life happy, talium malorum dici aut cogitari potest, incidat in eum, quo sibi mortem cogatur inferre, hanc in his malis uitam constitutam eum non pudeat beatam uocare, o uitam beatam, quae ut finiatur mortis quaerit auxilium! Si beata est, maneatur in ea. Quo modo ista non sunt mala, quae uincunt fortitudinis bonum eandemque fortitudinem non solum sibi cedere, uerum etiam delirare conpellunt, ut eandem uitam et dicat beatam et persuadeat esse fugiendam?

LATIN

Quis usque adeo caecus est, ut non uideat, quod, si beata esset, fugienda non esset? Sed aperta infirmitatis uoce fugiendam fatentur. Quid igitur causae est, quur non etiam miseram fracta superbiae ceruice fateantur? Utrum, obsecro, Cato ille patientia an potius inpatientia se peremit? Non enim hoc fecisset, nisi uictoriam Caesaris inpatienter tulisset. Ubi est fortitudo? Nempe cessit, nempe succubuit, nempe usque adeo superata est, ut uitam beatam derelinqueret desereret fugeret. An non erat iam beata? Misera ergo erat. Quo modo igitur mala non erant, quae uitam miseram fugiendamque faciebant?

Quapropter etiam ipsi, qui mala ista esse confessi sunt, sicut Peripatetici, sicut ueteres Academici, quorum sectam Varro defendit, tolerabilius quidem loquuntur, sed eorum quoque mirus est error, quod in his malis, etsi tam grauia sint, ut morte fugienda sint ab ipso sibimet inlata, qui haec patitur, uitam beatam tamen esse contendunt. Mala sunt, inquit, tormenta adque cruciatus corporis, et tanto sunt peiora, quanto potuerint esse maiora; quibus ut careas, ex hac uita fugiendum est. Qua uita, obsecro? Hac, inquit, quae tantis adgrauatur malis. Certe ergo beata est in eisdem ipsis malis, propter quae dicis esse fugiendam? An ideo beatam dicis, quia licet tibi ab his malis morte discedere?

Quid si ergo in eis aliquo diuino iudicio tenereris nec permittereris mori nec umquam sine illis esse sinereris? Nempe tunc saltem miseram talem diceres uitam. Non igitur propterea misera non est, quia cito relinquitur.

ENGLISH

though it is set amid all these evils. He may go blind, deaf, and mute. He may be crippled in his limbs and tortured with pains. Any other such evil that can be named or imagined may befall him, until he is compelled to inflict death on himself. O happy life, which seeks the help of death to end it! If it is happy, let him remain in it. How can these things not be evils? They overcome the good of courage. They compel that same courage not only to yield to them but to rave, so that it both calls that same life happy and urges that it must be fled.

Who is so blind as not to see that if it were happy, it would not have to be fled? But they confess, in the plain voice of weakness, that it must be fled. What reason is there, then, why they should not break the neck of their pride and confess that it is also miserable? Was it by patience, I ask you, or rather by impatience that the famous Cato killed himself? For he would not have done it had he not borne Caesar's victory impatiently. Where is his courage? Surely it yielded, surely it succumbed, surely it was so thoroughly defeated that it abandoned, deserted, and fled the happy life. Or was that life no longer happy? Then it was miserable. How, then, were they not evils, when they made life miserable and something to be fled?[11]

Others have admitted that these things are evils, such as the Peripatetics and the Old Academics, whose school Varro defends. These do speak more tolerably, it is true. But their error too is astonishing. They maintain that life is still happy amid these evils, even if the evils are so severe that the one who suffers them must flee them by a death he inflicts on himself. "Tortures and torments of the body are evils," Varro says, "and the greater they can become, the worse they are. To be rid of them, one must flee from this life." From what life, I ask? "From this one," he says, "which is weighed down by such great evils." So then it is certainly happy amid those very evils because of which you say it must be fled? Or do you call it happy because you are free to depart from these evils by death?

What, then, if some divine judgment held you in them, and you were not permitted to die, and never allowed to be without them? Then surely you 11 Cato the Younger, the Stoic statesman, killed himself at Utica in 46 BC rather than live under Julius Caesar's victory.

LATIN

Quando quidem si sempiterna sit, etiam abs te ipso misera iudicatur; non itaque propterea, quoniam breuis est, nulla miseria debet uideri aut, quod est absurdius, quia breuis miseria est, ideo etiam beatitudo appellari.

Magna uis est in eis malis, quae cogunt hominem secundum ipsos etiam sapientem sibimet auferre quod homo est; cum dicant et uerum dicant, hanc esse naturae primam quodam modo et maximam uocem, ut homo concilietur sibi et propterea mortem naturaliter fugiat, ita sibi amicus, ut esse se animal et in hac coniunctione corporis adque animae uiuere uelit uehementer adque adpetat. Magna uis est in eis malis, quibus iste naturae uincitur sensus, quo mors omni modo omnibus uiribus conatibusque uitatur, et ita uincitur, ut, quae uitabatur optetur adpetatur et, si non potuerit aliunde contingere, ab homine ipso sibimet inferatur.

Magna uis est in eis malis, quae fortitudinem faciunt homicidam; si tamen adhuc dicenda est fortitudo, quae ita his malis uincitur, ut hominem, quem sicut uirtus regendum tuendumque suscepit, non modo non possit per patientiam custodire, sed ipsa insuper cogatur occidere. Debet quidem etiam mortem sapiens ferre patienter, sed quae accidit aliunde. Secundum istos autem si eam sibi ipse inferre conpellitur, profecto fatendum est eis non solum mala, sed intolerabilia etiam mala esse, quae hoc eum perpetrare conpellunt.

Vita igitur, quae istorum tam magnorum tamque grauium malorum aut premitur oneribus aut subiacet casibus, nullo modo beata diceretur, si homines, qui hoc dicunt, sicut uicti malis ingrauescentibus, cum sibi ingerunt mortem, cedunt infelicitati, ita uicti certis rationibus, cum quaerunt beatam uitam, dignarentur cedere ueritati et non sibi putarent in ista mortalitate fine summi boni esse gaudendum, ubi uirtutes ipsae, quibus hic certe nihil melius adque utilius in homine reperitur, quanto maiora sunt adiutoria contra uim periculorum laborum dolorum, tanto fideliora testimonia miseriarum.

ENGLISH

would at least call such a life miserable. So it is not free of misery just because it is quickly left behind. Indeed, if it were everlasting, even you yourself would judge it miserable. Therefore it ought not to seem no misery at all because it is short. Still less should it be called happiness because the misery is short, which is even more absurd.

Great is the power of those evils which, by their own account, compel a man, even a wise man, to deprive himself of his very being as a man. They say, and say truly, that the first and in a sense the greatest voice of nature is this: a human being should be drawn into friendship with himself, and therefore naturally flee death. He is so much his own friend that he vehemently wills and seeks to be a living being and to live in this union of body and soul. Great is the power of those evils which overcome this sense of nature. By this sense death is avoided in every way, with all one's strength and effort. And it is so overcome that what was avoided is wished for and sought. If death cannot come from elsewhere, the man inflicts it upon himself.

Great is the power of those evils which turn courage into a killer—if indeed it should still be called courage. It is so overcome by these evils that it cannot keep safe through patience the person it undertook, as a virtue, to govern and protect. Worse, it is itself compelled to kill him. The wise man ought indeed to bear even death patiently, but a death that comes from elsewhere. If, however, on their view he is compelled to inflict it on himself, they must surely admit that the things which compel him to do this are not only evils, but unbearable evils.

A life, then, that is either weighed down by the burdens of such great and grievous evils or exposed to their chances would in no way be called happy, if only the men who say this would yield to truth. When they inflict death on themselves, overcome by worsening evils, they yield to misfortune. Let them likewise, when they seek the happy life, be overcome by sound reasons and deign to yield to truth. Then they would not think that they are to rejoice in the end of the supreme good in this mortal condition. Here the virtues themselves are certainly the best and most useful things to be found in man. Yet the greater the help they give against the force of dangers, toils, and pains, the more faithful their witness to our miseries.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Si enim uerae uirtutes sunt, quae nisi in eis, quibus uera inest pietas, esse non possunt: non se profitentur hoc posse, ut nullas miserias patiantur homines, in quibus sunt (neque enim mendaces sunt uerae uirtutes, ut hoc profiteantur), sed ut uita humana, quae tot et tantis huius saeculi malis esse cogitur misera, spe futuri saeculi sit beata, sicut et salua. Quo modo enim beata est, quae nondum salua est? Unde et apostolus Paulus non de hominibus inprudentibus inpatientibus, intemperantibus et iniquis, sed de his, qui secundum ueram pietatem uiuerent et ideo uirtutes, quas haberent, ueras haberent, ait: Spe enim salui facti sumus. Spes autem quae uidetur, non est spes. Quod enim uidet quis, quid et sperat? Si autem quod non uidemus speramus, per patientiam expectamus.	For true virtues can exist only in those in whom there is true godliness. If these virtues are true, they do not claim the power to keep the people in whom they exist from suffering any miseries. True virtues are not liars, to make such a claim. What they claim is this: human life is compelled to be miserable by the many great evils of this age, but in the hope of the age to come it is happy, just as it is saved in that hope. For how can a life be happy that is not yet saved? The apostle Paul was not speaking of people who were imprudent, impatient, intemperate, and unjust. He was speaking of those who lived according to true godliness, and whose virtues, therefore, were true ones. That is why he says: "For in hope we were saved. But hope that is seen is not hope. For who hopes for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience."[12]
Sicut ergo spe salui, ita spe beati facti sumus, et sicut salutem, ita beatitudinem non iam tenemus praesentem, sed exspectamus futuram, et hoc per patientiam; quia in malis sumus, quae patienter tolerare debemus, donec ad illa ueniamus bona, ubi omnia erunt, quibus ineffabiliter delectemur, nihil erit autem, quod iam tolerare debeamus. Talis salus, quae in futuro erit saeculo, ipsa erit etiam finalis beatitudo. Quam beatitudinem isti philosophi, quoniam non uidentes nolunt credere, hic sibi conantur falsissimam fabricare, quanto superbiore, tanto mendaciore uirtute.	Just as we have been saved in hope, then, so we have been made happy in hope. Like salvation, happiness is something we do not yet hold as present but await as future, and await "with patience." For we are among evils that we must patiently endure until we come to those goods where there will be everything to delight us beyond words, and nothing that we must still endure. Such salvation, which will be in the age to come, will itself also be final happiness. These philosophers do not see this happiness, and so they refuse to believe in it. Instead they try to manufacture for themselves here a happiness that is utterly false, by means of a virtue that is all the more deceitful for being all the more proud.

SOCIAL LIFE, WHICH, THOUGH MOST DESIRABLE, IS OFTEN OVERTURNED BY MANY TROUBLES

Household and city, the first two circles of social life, are full of treachery and strife.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.5 Quod autem socialem uitam uolunt esse sapientis, nos multo amplius adprobamus. Nam unde ista Dei ciuitas, de qua huius operis ecce iam undeuicensimum librum uersamus in manibus, uel inchoaretur exortu uel progrederetur excursu uel adprehenderet debitos fines, si non esset socialis uita sanctorum? Sed in huius mortalitatis aerumna quot et quantis abundet malis	They hold that the life of the wise man is social, and we approve this much more fully than they do. For how could this city of God have had its beginning, or advanced on its course, or reached its due end, if the life of the saints were not social? And we are now handling the nineteenth book of this work about that city. But in the hardship of

12 Romans 8:24–25.

LATIN

humana societas, quis enumerare ualeat? quis aestimare sufficiat? Audiant aput comicos suos hominem cum sensu adque consensu omnium hominum dicere: Duxi uxorem; quam ibi miseriam uidi! Nati filii. Alia cura. Quid itidem illa, quae in amore uitia commemorat idem Terentius, iniuriae suspiciones, inimicitiae bellum, pax rursum: nonne res humanas ubique inpleuerunt? nonne et in amicorum honestis amoribus plerumque contingunt?

nonne his usquequaque plenae sunt res humanae, ubi iniurias suspiciones, inimicitias bellum mala certa sentimus; pacem uero incertum bonum, quoniam corda eorum, cum quibus eam tenere uolumus, ignoramus, et si hodie nosse possemus qualia cras futura essent utique nesciremus. Qui porro inter se amiciores solent esse uel debent, quam qui una etiam continentur domo? Et tamen quis inde securus est, cum tanta saepe mala ex eorum occultis insidiis exstiterint, tanto amariora, quanto pax dulcior fuit, quae uera putata est, cum astutissime fingeretur? Propter quod omnium pectora sic adtingit, ut cogat in gemitum, quod ait Tullius: Nullae sunt occultiores insidiae quam hae, quae latent in simulatione officii aut in aliquo necessitudinis nomine.

Nam eum, qui palam est aduersarius, facile cauendo uitare possis; hoc uero occultum intestinum ac domesticum malum non solum exsistit, uerum etiam obprimit, antequam prospicere adque explorare potueris. Propter quod etiam diuina uox illa: Et inimici hominis domestici eius cum magno dolore cordis auditur, quia, etsi quisque tam fortis sit, ut aequo animo perferat, uel tam uigilans, ut prouido consilio caueat, quae aduersus eum molitur amicitia simulata, eorum tamen hominum perfidorum malo, cum eos esse pessimos experitur, si ipse bonus est, grauiter excrucietur necesse est, siue semper mali fuerint et se bonos finxerint, siue in istam malitiam ex bonitate mutati sint.

ENGLISH

this mortal condition, who could count how many and how great are the evils with which human society abounds? Who could reckon them? Let them listen to a character in their own comic playwrights, who speaks with the sense and consent of all mankind: "I took a wife—what misery I found there! Children were born—another worry." And what of those failings of love that the same Terence lists: "wrongs, suspicions, enmities, war, then peace again"? Have they not filled human affairs everywhere? Do they not often occur even in the honorable loves of friends?[13]

Are not human affairs full of them everywhere? We experience wrongs, suspicions, enmities, and war as certain evils, but peace as an uncertain good. We do not know the hearts of those with whom we want to keep it. Even if we could know them today, we certainly would not know what they would be like tomorrow. And who are, or ought to be, more friendly to one another than those who live in the same household? Yet who is secure even there? Great evils have often arisen from the hidden treachery of such people. These evils were the more bitter, the sweeter the peace had been. That peace was thought genuine while it was being most cunningly feigned. That is why the words of Cicero touch every heart so deeply as to force a groan: "No treachery is more hidden than that which lurks under the pretense of duty or under some name of close relationship."[14]

For an open adversary you can easily avoid by being on your guard. But this hidden evil, inside the household and the family, not only arises but overwhelms you before you have been able to foresee and detect it. That is why that divine saying, "And a man's enemies will be those of his own household," is heard with great sorrow of heart. A person may be strong enough to bear calmly what a pretended friendship plots against him, or vigilant enough to guard against it with foresight. Still, if he himself is good, he cannot help being grievously tormented by the wickedness of those faithless people, once experience shows him how utterly bad they are. Perhaps they were always bad and pretended to be good. Perhaps they turned from goodness to this malice.[15]

13 Terence, the Roman comic playwright of the 2nd century BC: The Brothers 867–868; the second quotation is from his Eunuch 59–61.
14 Cicero, Against Verres 2.1.39.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Si ergo domus, commune perfugium in his malis humani generis, tuta non est, quid ciuitas, quae quanto maior est, tanto forum eius litibus et ciuilibus et criminalibus plenius, etiamsi quiescant non solum turbulentae, uerum saepius et cruentae seditiones ac bella ciuilia, a quorum euentis sunt aliquando liberae ciuitates, a periculis numquam?	If, then, the home, the common refuge of the human race from these evils, is not safe, what of the city? The larger it is, the fuller its forum is of lawsuits, both civil and criminal. And that is so even when there is a lull in riots and civil wars, which are not only turbulent but more often bloody. Cities are sometimes free from their outbreak, but never from their danger.

THE ERROR OF HUMAN JUDGMENTS WHEN THE TRUTH IS HIDDEN

A judge who cannot see consciences tortures and condemns the innocent, and still must judge.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.6 Quid ipsa iudicia hominum de hominibus, quae ciuitatibus in quantalibet pace manentibus deesse non possunt, qualia putamus esse, quam misera, quam dolenda? Quando quidem hi iudicant, qui conscientias eorum, de quibus iudicant, cernere nequeunt. Unde saepe coguntur tormentis innocentium testium ad alienam causam pertinentem quaerere ueritatem. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur et, cum quaeritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur et innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas poenas, non quia illud commisisse detegitur, sed quia non commisisse nescitur? Ac per hoc ignorantia iudicis plerumque est calamitas innocentis. Et quod est intolerabilius magisque plangendum rigandumque, si fieri possit, fontibus lacrimarum, cum propterea iudex torqueat accusatum, ne occidat nesciens innocentem, fit per ignorantiae miseriam, ut et tortum et innocentem occidat, quem ne innocentem occideret torserat.	And what of the judgments that human beings pass on one another? Cities cannot do without them, however deep the peace they enjoy. What are we to think they are like—how wretched, how lamentable? For those who judge cannot see the consciences of those they judge. So they are often forced to seek the truth by torturing innocent witnesses in a case that is not their own. And what of the case in which a man is tortured in his own cause? When the question is whether he is guilty, he is tormented; and though innocent, he pays the most certain penalties for an uncertain crime—not because it is discovered that he committed it, but because it is not known that he did not. And so the judge's ignorance is very often the innocent man's calamity. And there is something still more intolerable, more to be lamented and, if it were possible, washed with fountains of tears. The judge tortures the accused precisely so as not to kill an innocent man unknowingly; yet through the misery of ignorance it comes about that he kills a man both tortured and innocent—the very man he had tortured so as not to kill an innocent man.
Si enim secundum istorum sapientiam delegerit ex hac uita fugere quam diutius illa sustinere tormenta: quod non commisit, commisisse se dicit. Quo damnato et occiso, utrum nocentem an innocentem iudex occiderit, adhuc nescit, quem ne innocentem nesciens occideret torsit; ac per hoc innocentem et ut sciret torsit, et dum nesciret occidit. In his tenebris uitae socialis sedebit iudex ille sapiens an non audebit? Sedebit plane. Constringit enim eum et ad hoc officium pertrahit humana societas, quam deserere nefas ducit.	For if, following the wisdom of these philosophers, the accused has chosen to escape from this life rather than endure those tortures any longer, he confesses to what he did not commit. Once he is condemned and executed, the judge still does not know whether he has killed a guilty man or an innocent one—the man he tortured so as not to kill an innocent man unknowingly. And so he tortured an innocent man in order to know, and killed him while still not knowing. In this darkness of social life, will that wise judge take his seat on the bench, 15 Matthew 10:36, echoing Micah 7:6.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	or will he not dare? He will certainly take it. For human society, which he thinks it wicked to desert, constrains him and drags him to this duty.
Hoc enim nefas esse non ducit, quod testes innocentes in causis torquentur alienis; quod hi, qui arguuntur, ui doloris plerumque superati et de se falsa confessi etiam puniuntur innocentes, cum iam torti fuerint innocentes; quod, etsi non morte puniantur, in ipsis uel ex ipsis tormentis plerumque moriuntur; quod aliquando et ipsi, qui arguunt, humanae societati fortasse, ne crimina inpunita sint, prodesse cupientes et mentientibus testibus reoque ipso contra tormenta durante inmaniter nec fatente probare quod obiciunt non ualentes, quamuis uera obiecerint, a iudice nesciente damnantur. Haec tot et tanta mala non deputat esse peccata; non enim haec facit sapiens iudex nocendi uoluntate, sed necessitate nesciendi, et tamen, quia cogit humana societas, necessitate etiam iudicandi.	For he does not think it wicked that innocent witnesses are tortured in other people's cases; that the accused, often overcome by the force of pain and confessing falsely against themselves, are punished though innocent, after already having been tortured though innocent; that even if they are not punished with death, they very often die under the tortures or as a result of them. Nor does he think it wicked that sometimes the accusers themselves—who perhaps desire to benefit human society by seeing that crimes do not go unpunished—are condemned by a judge who does not know the truth, because the witnesses lie and the defendant holds out savagely against the tortures and will not confess, so that the accusers cannot prove what they charge, even though their charges were true. All these evils, so many and so great, he does not reckon to be sins. For the wise judge does not do these things from a will to harm, but from the necessity of not knowing—and yet, because human society compels him, also from the necessity of judging.
Haec est ergo quam dicimus miseria certe hominis, etsi non malitia sapientis. An uero necessitate nesciendi adque iudicandi torquet insontes, punit insontes, et parum est illi, quod non est reus, si non sit insuper et beatus? Quanto consideratius et homine dignius agnoscit in ista necessitate miseriam eamque odit in se et, si pie sapit, clamat ad Deum: De necessitatibus meis erue me!	This, then, is what we call the misery of man—certainly that, even if not the wickedness of the wise man. Or does he, through the necessity of not knowing and of judging, torture the guiltless and punish the guiltless, and yet is it too little for him to be free of guilt, unless he is happy as well? How much more thoughtful and worthy of a human being it is for him to recognize the misery in this necessity, to hate it in himself, and, if his wisdom is godly, to cry out to God: "Deliver me from my necessities!"[16]

THE DIVERSITY OF LANGUAGES, WHICH DIVIDES HUMAN SOCIETY, AND THE MISERY OF WARS, EVEN THOSE CALLED JUST

Different languages divide humanity; empire brings wars, and even just wars are cause for grief.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.7 Post ciuitatem uel urbem sequitur orbis terrae, in quo tertium gradum ponunt societatis humanae, incipientes a domo adque inde ad urbem, deinde ad orbem progrediendo uenientes; qui utique, sicut aquarum congeries, quanto maior est, tanto periculis plenior. In	After the civic community or city comes the world, which they set as the third level of human society. They begin from the household, proceed from there to the city, and then come to the world. And the world, like a mass of waters, is the fuller

16 Psalm 24:17 (25:17 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

quo primum linguarum diuersitas hominem alienat ab homine. Nam si duo sibimet inuicem fiant obuiam neque praeterire, sed simul esse aliqua necessitate cogantur, quorum neuter linguam nouit alterius: facilius sibi muta animalia, etiam diuersi generis, quam illi, cum sint homines ambo, sociantur. Quando enim quae sentiunt inter se communicare non possunt propter solam diuersitatem linguae, nihil prodest ad consociandos homines tanta similitudo naturae; ita ut libentius homo sit cum cane suo quam cum homine alieno.

At enim opera data est, ut imperiosa ciuitas non solum iugum, uerum etiam linguam suam domitis gentibus per pacem societatis inponeret, per quam non deesset, immo et abundaret etiam interpretum copia. Verum est; sed hoc quam multis et quam grandibus bellis, quanta strage hominum, quanta effusione humani sanguinis conparatum est? Quibus transactis, non est tamen eorundem malorum finita miseria. Quamuis enim non defuerint neque desint hostes exterae nationes, contra quas semper bella gesta sunt et geruntur: tamen etiam ipsa imperii latitudo peperit peioris generis bella, socialia scilicet et ciuilia, quibus miserabilius quatitur humanum genus, siue cum belligeratur, ut aliquando conquiescant, siue cum timetur, ne rursus exsurgant.

Quorum malorum multas et multiplices clades, duras et diras necessitates si ut dignum est eloqui uelim, quamquam nequaquam sicut res postulat possim: quis erit prolixae disputationis modus? Sed sapiens, inquiunt, iusta bella gesturus est. Quasi non, si se hominem meminit, multo magis dolebit iustorum necessitatem sibi extitisse bellorum, quia nisi iusta essent, ei gerenda non essent, ac per hoc sapienti nulla bella essent. Iniquitas enim partis aduersae iusta bella ingerit gerenda sapienti; quae iniquitas utique homini est dolenda, quia hominum est, etsi nulla ex ea bellandi necessitas nasceretur. Haec itaque mala tam magna, tam horrenda, tam saeua quisquis cum dolore considerat, miseriam fateatur; quisquis autem uel patitur ea sine animi dolore uel cogitat, multo utique miserius ideo se putat beatum, quia et humanum perdidit sensum.

ENGLISH

of dangers the larger it is. Here, first of all, the diversity of languages estranges one human being from another. For if two people meet, neither of whom knows the other's language, and they are forced by some necessity not to pass each other by but to stay together, then mute animals, even of different species, associate with each other more easily than these two do, though both are human. For when they cannot communicate what they feel to each other, simply because of the difference of language, so great a likeness of nature is of no help in bringing people together—so much so that a man would rather be with his own dog than with a human stranger.

But, it will be said, the imperial city has taken pains to impose on the conquered nations not only its yoke but also its language, through the peace of a shared society, so that there should be no lack of interpreters—indeed, an abundance of them. True. But at the cost of how many and how great wars, how much slaughter of men, how much shedding of human blood was this achieved? And when these were over, the misery of those same evils still did not come to an end. For although there have been, and still are, enemies—foreign nations against which wars have always been waged and are still being waged—yet the very breadth of the empire has given birth to wars of a worse kind, namely social and civil wars. By these the human race is shaken more wretchedly, whether while war is waged so that they may at last subside, or while it is feared that they will rise up again.[17]

If I wanted to describe, as they deserve, the many and manifold disasters of these evils, their harsh and dreadful necessities—though I could by no means do it as the matter requires—what limit would there be to this lengthy discussion? But the wise man, they say, will wage just wars. As if, remembering that he is human, he will not grieve far more that the necessity of just wars has fallen to him! For if they were not just, he would not have to wage them, and so the wise man would have no wars at all. It is the wickedness of the opposing side that forces just wars on the wise man; and that wickedness is certainly something for a human being to grieve over, because it belongs to human beings, even if no necessity of waging war

17 "Social" wars are wars against allies (socii), like Rome's war with its Italian allies in 91–88 BC.

LATIN

ENGLISH

arose from it. So let everyone who reflects with grief on these evils, so great, so horrifying, so cruel, admit that this is misery. But whoever endures them, or thinks about them, without grief of mind certainly thinks himself happy in a far more wretched way, because he has lost even human feeling.

THAT THE FRIENDSHIP OF GOOD PEOPLE CANNOT BE FREE OF CARE, SINCE WE MUST FEAR THE DANGERS OF THIS LIFE

The more good friends we have, the more we fear for them, and their deaths grieve us.

LATIN

ENGLISH

19.8 Si autem non contingat quaedam ignorantia similis dementiae, quae tamen in huius uitae misera condicione saepe contingit, ut credatur uel amicus esse, qui inimicus est, uel inimicus, qui amicus est: quid nos consolatur in hac humana societate erroribus aerumnisque plenissima nisi fides non ficta et mutua dilectio uerorum et bonorum amicorum? Quos quanto plures et in locis pluribus habemus, tanto longius latiusque metuimus, ne quid eis contingat mali de tantis malorum aggeribus huius saeculi. Non enim tantummodo solliciti sumus, ne fame, ne bellis, ne morbis, ne captiuitatibus adfligantur, ne in eadem seruitute talia patiantur, qualia nec cogitare sufficimus; uerum etiam, ubi timor est multo amarior, ne in perfidiam malitiam nequitiamque mutentur.

Suppose we are spared a certain ignorance resembling madness—which nonetheless often befalls us in the wretched condition of this life—by which someone who is an enemy is believed to be a friend, or someone who is a friend is believed to be an enemy. Even so, what consoles us in this human society, so full of errors and hardships, except the unfeigned faith and mutual love of true and good friends? Yet the more of them we have, and in the more places, the farther and wider we fear that some evil may befall them out of the huge heaps of evils in this world. For we are anxious not only that they may be afflicted by famine, war, disease or captivity, and that in that slavery they may suffer things we cannot even imagine; but also—and here the fear is far more bitter—that they may be changed into treachery, malice and wickedness.

Et quando ista contingunt (tanto utique plura, quanto illi sunt plures) et in nostram notitiam perferuntur, quibus cor nostrum flagris uratur, quis potest, nisi qui talia sentit, aduertere? Mortuos quippe audire mallemus, quamuis et hoc sine dolore non possimus audire. Quorum enim nos uita propter amicitiae solacia delectabat, unde fieri potest, ut eorum mors nullam nobis ingerat maestitudinem? Quam qui prohibet, prohibeat, si potest, amica conloquia, interdicat amicalem uel intercidat adfectum, humanarum omnium necessitudinum uincula mentis inmiti stupore disrumpat aut sic eis utendum censeat, ut nulla ex eis animum dulcedo perfundat. Quod si fieri nullo modo potest, etiam hoc quo pacto futurum est, ut eius nobis amara mors non sit, cuius dulcis est uita?

And when these things happen—more often, of course, the more friends we have—and are brought to our knowledge, who can grasp, except one who feels such things, the lashes with which they burn our heart? We would indeed rather hear that they were dead, although we cannot hear even this without grief. For how can it be that the death of those whose life delighted us with the comforts of friendship should bring us no sorrow? Whoever forbids that sorrow, let him forbid, if he can, friendly conversation; let him prohibit or cut off friendly affection; let him, with a harsh numbness of mind, burst the bonds of all human relationships, or decree that they be used in such a way that no sweetness from them floods the soul. But if that can in no way be done, how is it to come about that the death of one whose life is sweet to us should not be bitter?

LATIN	ENGLISH
Hinc enim est et luctus quoddam non inhumani cordis quasi uulnus aut ulcus, cui sanando adhibentur officiosae consolationes. Non enim propterea non est quod sanetur, quoniam quanto est animus melior, tanto in eo citius faciliusque sanatur. Cum igitur etiam de carissimorum mortibus, maxime quorum sunt humanae societati officia necessaria, nunc mitius, nunc asperius adfligatur uita mortalium: mortuos tamen eos, quos diligimus, quam uel a fide uel a bonis moribus lapsos, hoc est in ipsa anima mortuos, audire seu uidere mallemus. Qua ingenti materia malorum plena est terra, propter quod scriptum est: Numquid non tentatio est uita humana super terram? et propter quod ipse Dominus ait: Vae mundo ab scandalis, et iterum: Quoniam abundauit, inquit, iniquitas, refrigescet caritas multorum.	Hence comes grief, a kind of wound or sore of a heart that is not inhuman, and dutiful consolations are applied to heal it. For it does not follow that there is nothing to be healed simply because the better the mind is, the more quickly and easily the healing takes place in it. Mortal life, then, is afflicted, now more gently, now more harshly, even by the deaths of those dearest to us, especially those whose services are necessary to human society. Yet we would rather hear or see that those we love were dead than that they had fallen away from faith or from good morals—that is, had died in the soul itself. The earth is full of this vast supply of evils. That is why it is written: "Is not human life on earth a trial?" and why the Lord himself says: "Woe to the world because of stumbling blocks!" and again: "Because wickedness has abounded," he says, "the love of many will grow cold."[18]
Ex quo fit, ut bonis amicis mortuis gratulemur et, cum mors eorum nos contristet, ipsa nos certius consoletur, quoniam caruerunt malis, quibus in hac uita etiam boni homines uel conteruntur uel deprauantur uel in utroque periclitantur.	So it is that we rejoice for our good friends when they die; and though their death saddens us, it also consoles us more surely, since they have escaped the evils by which, in this life, even good people are crushed or corrupted, or are in danger of both.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE HOLY ANGELS, WHICH CANNOT BE CLEAR TO HUMAN BEINGS IN THIS WORLD BECAUSE OF THE DECEIT OF THE DEMONS, INTO WHOSE POWER FELL THOSE WHO THOUGHT MANY GODS SHOULD BE WORSHIPED

The angels cannot be friends to us as humans are, and demons can pose as angels.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.9 In societate uero sanctorum angelorum, quam philosophi illi, qui nobis deos amicos esse uoluerunt, quarto constituerunt loco, uelut ad mundum uenientes ab orbe terrarum, ut sic quodam modo conplecterentur et caelum, nullo modo quidem metuimus, ne tales amici uel morte nos sua uel deprauatione contristent. Sed quia nobis non ea, qua homines, familiaritate miscentur quod etiam ipsum ad aerumnas huius pertinet uitae et aliquando Satanas, sicut legimus, transfigurat se uelut angelum lucis ad tentandos eos, quos ita uel erudiri opus est uel decipi iustum est: magna Dei misericordia necessaria est, ne quisquam, cum bonos angelos amicos se habere putat, habeat malos daemones fictos amicos, eosque tanto nocentiores, quanto astutiores ac fallaciores, patiatur inimicos.	Then there is the society of the holy angels. Those philosophers who held that the gods are our friends placed it fourth, as if passing from the earth to the universe, so as somehow to take in heaven as well. Here, indeed, we have no fear at all that such friends will sadden us by their death or by their corruption. But they do not mingle with us on the same familiar terms as human beings do—and this too belongs to the hardships of this life. Moreover, as we read, Satan sometimes transforms himself as if into an angel of light, to tempt those who need to be taught in this way or who deserve to be deceived. So God's great mercy is necessary, lest anyone, thinking he has good angels for friends, should have evil demons as false

18 Job 7:1; Matthew 18:7; Matthew 24:12.

LATIN

ENGLISH

friends, and suffer them as enemies—all the more harmful the more cunning and deceitful they are.[19]

Et cui magna ista Dei misericordia necessaria est nisi magnae humanae miseriae, quae ignorantia tanta premitur, ut facile istorum simulatione fallatur? Et illos quidem philosophos in inpia ciuitate, qui deos sibi amicos esse dixerunt, in daemones malignos incidisse certissimum est, quibus tota ipsa ciuitas subditur, aeternum cum eis habitura supplicium. Ex eorum quippe sacris uel potius sacrilegiis, quibus eos colendos, et ex ludis inmundissimis, ubi eorum crimina celebrantur, quibus eos placandos putarunt eisdem ipsis auctoribus et exactoribus talium tantorumque dedecorum, satis ab eis qui colantur apertum est.

And who needs this great mercy of God but human beings in their great misery, weighed down by so much ignorance that they are easily deceived by these demons' pretense? As for those philosophers in the ungodly city who said the gods were their friends, it is quite certain that they fell among evil demons, to whom that whole city is subject and with whom it will suffer eternal punishment. Their rites—or rather their sacrileges—by which they thought those gods should be worshiped, and the filthiest shows, in which the gods' crimes are celebrated and by which they thought the gods should be appeased, make it clear enough what kind of beings they worship; for these same gods were the authors and exactors of such great disgraces.

WHAT REWARD THE SAINTS GAIN FROM OVERCOMING THE TEMPTATIONS OF THIS LIFE

The saints' temptations make them long for the secure peace where virtue no longer has to fight.

LATIN

ENGLISH

19.10 Sed neque sancti et fideles unius ueri Dei summique cultores ab eorum fallaciis et multiformi tentatione securi sunt. In hoc enim loco infirmitatis et diebus malignis etiam ista sollicitudo non est inutilis, ut illa securitas, ubi pax plenissima adque certissima est, desiderio feruentiore quaeratur. Ibi enim erunt naturae munera, hoc est, quae naturae nostrae ab omnium naturarum creatore donantur, non solum bona, uerum etiam sempiterna, non solum in animo, qui sanatur per sapientiam, uerum etiam in corpore, quod resurrectione renouabitur; ibi uirtutes, non contra ulla uitia uel mala quaecumque certantes, sed habentes uictoriae praemium aeternam pacem, quam nullus aduersarius inquietet. Ipsa est enim beatitudo finalis, ipse perfectionis finis, qui consumentem non habet finem.

But not even the saints and the faithful, worshipers of the one true and supreme God, are safe from the demons' deceptions and many-sided temptations. Yet in this place of weakness and in these evil days even this anxiety is not useless, for it makes us seek with more fervent desire that security where peace is most complete and most certain. For there the gifts of nature—that is, the gifts bestowed on our nature by the creator of all natures—will be not only good but everlasting, not only in the soul, which is healed by wisdom, but also in the body, which will be renewed by resurrection. There the virtues will not be struggling against any vices or evils whatever, but will have as the prize of victory eternal peace, which no adversary will disturb. That is the final happiness; that is the end of perfection, an end that has no ending to consume it.

Hic autem dicimur quidem beati, quando pacem habemus, quantulacumque hic haberi potest in uita bona; sed haec beatitudo illi, quam finalem dicimus, beatitudini conparata prorsus miseria reperitur. Hanc ergo pacem, qualis hic potest esse, mortales homines in rebus

Here, indeed, we are called happy when we have peace, however little of it can be had here in a good life; but compared with the happiness we call final, this happiness turns out to be utter misery. So when we mortals, amid mortal things,

19 2 Corinthians 11:14.

LATIN	ENGLISH
mortalibus quando habemus, si recte uiuimus, bonis eius recte utitur uirtus; quando uero eam non habemus, etiam malis, quae homo patitur, bene utitur uirtus. Sed tunc est uera uirtus, quando et omnia bona, quibus bene utitur, et quidquid in bono usu bonorum et malorum facit, et se ipsam ad eum finem refert, ubi nobis talis et tanta pax erit, qua melior et maior esse non possit.	have such peace as there can be here, then, if we live rightly, virtue makes right use of its goods; and when we do not have it, virtue makes good use even of the evils that a human being suffers. But virtue is true virtue only when it refers to that end all the goods it uses well, whatever it does in its good use of goods and evils, and itself as well—that end where we shall have a peace of such a kind and so great that there could be none better or greater.

THE HAPPINESS OF ETERNAL PEACE, WHICH IS THE SAINTS' END, THAT IS, THEIR TRUE FULFILLMENT

The end of the city of God may be called peace in eternal life or eternal life in peace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.11 Quapropter possemus dicere fines bonorum nostrorum esse pacem, sicut aeternam diximus uitam, praesertim quia ipsi ciuitati Dei, de qua nobis est ista operosissima disputatio, in sancto dicitur psalmo: Lauda Hierusalem Dominum, conlauda Deum tuum Sion; quoniam confirmauit seras portarum tuarum, benedixit filios tuos in te, qui posuit fines tuos pacem. Quando enim confirmatae fuerint serae portarum eius, iam in illam nullus intrabit nec ab illa ullus exibit. Ac per hoc fines eius eam debemus hic intellegere pacem, quam uolumus demonstrare finalem. Nam et ipsius ciuitatis mysticum nomen, id est Hierusalem, quod et ante iam diximus, uisio pacis interpretatur.	We could therefore say that the end of our goods is peace, just as we said it is eternal life. This is especially so because a holy psalm says to the very city of God, the subject of this most laborious discussion: "Praise the Lord, Jerusalem; praise your God, Zion. For he has strengthened the bars of your gates; he has blessed your children within you—he who has made peace your borders." For when the bars of its gates have been strengthened, no one will any longer enter it, and no one will leave it. And so by its "borders"—its ends—we must understand here the peace that we wish to show is final. For the mystical name of that city, Jerusalem, as we have said before, means "vision of peace."[20]
Sed quoniam pacis nomen etiam in his rebus mortalibus frequentatur, ubi utique non est uita aeterna, propterea finem ciuitatis huius, ubi erit summum bonum eius, aeternam uitam maluimus commemorare quam pacem. De quo fine apostolus ait: Nunc uero liberati a peccato, serui autem facti Deo, habetis fructum uestrum in sanctificationem, finem uero uitam aeternam.	But since the word "peace" is often used also of these mortal things, where there is certainly no eternal life, we have preferred to speak of the end of this city, where its supreme good will be, as eternal life rather than as peace. Of this end the apostle says: "But now, set free from sin and made slaves to God, you have your fruit in sanctification, and as your end, eternal life."[21]
Sed rursus quia uita aeterna ab eis, qui familiaritatem non habent cum scripturis sanctis, potest accipi etiam malorum uita, uel secundum quosdam etiam philosophos propter animae inmortalitatem uel secundum etiam fidem nostram propter poenas interminabiles inpiorum, qui utique in aeternum cruciari non poterunt, nisi etiam uixerint in aeternum: profecto finis ciuitatis huius, in quo summum habebit bonum, uel pax in uita aeterna uel uita	But again, those who are not familiar with the holy Scriptures could take "eternal life" to mean the life of the wicked as well—either, as some philosophers hold, because of the immortality of the soul, or, as our own faith also holds, because of the endless punishments of the ungodly, who certainly cannot be tormented forever unless they also live forever. So the end of this city, in which it will

20 NOTE:Psalm 147:1–3 (147:12–14 in most English Bibles). Latin fines means both "borders" and "ends," and Augustine plays on both.

21 Romans 6:22; "the apostle" is Paul.

LATIN	ENGLISH
aeterna in pace dicendus est, ut facilius ab omnibus possit intellegi. Tantum est enim pacis bonum, ut etiam in rebus terrenis adque mortalibus nihil gratius soleat audiri, nihil desiderabilius concupisci, nihil postremo possit melius inueniri.	have its supreme good, should surely be called either peace in eternal life or eternal life in peace, so that everyone can understand it more easily. For the good of peace is so great that even in earthly and mortal affairs nothing is usually heard with more pleasure, nothing is longed for with more desire, nothing, in short, can be found that is better.
De quo si aliquanto diutius loqui uoluerimus, non erimus, quantum arbitror, onerosi legentibus, et propter finem ciuitatis huius, de qua nobis sermo est, et propter ipsam dulcedinem pacis, quae omnibus cara est.	If we wish to speak about it at somewhat greater length, we shall not, I think, be burdensome to our readers, both because of the end of this city which is our subject, and because of the very sweetness of peace, which is dear to all.

THAT EVEN THE SAVAGERY OF THOSE AT WAR, AND ALL HUMAN UNREST, DESIRE TO REACH THE GOAL OF PEACE, WITHOUT THE LONGING FOR WHICH NO NATURE EXISTS

Everyone wants peace, even those who make war, robbers, and the monster Cacus.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.12 Quod enim mecum quisquis res humanas naturamque communem utcumque intuetur agnoscit, sicut nemo est qui gaudere nolit, ita nemo est qui pacem habere nolit. Quando quidem et ipsi, qui bella uolunt, nihil aliud quam uincere uolunt; ad gloriosam ergo pacem bellando cupiunt peruenire. Nam quid est aliud uictoria nisi subiectio repugnantium? quod cum factum fuerit, pax erit. Pacis igitur intentione geruntur et bella, ab his etiam, qui uirtutem bellicam student exercere imperando adque pugnando. Unde pacem constat belli esse optabilem finem. Omnis enim homo etiam belligerando pacem requirit; nemo autem bellum pacificando. Nam et illi qui pacem, in qua sunt, perturbari uolunt, non pacem oderunt, sed eam pro arbitrio suo cupiunt commutari. Non ergo ut sit pax nolunt, sed ut ea sit quam uolunt.	For anyone who looks in any way at human affairs and at our common nature will recognize with me that, just as there is no one who does not wish to be joyful, so there is no one who does not wish to have peace. Indeed, even those who want war want nothing but to win; so by waging war they desire to arrive at a glorious peace. For what is victory but the subjugation of those who resist? And when this has been done, there will be peace. So even wars are waged with peace as their aim, even by those who are eager to exercise military courage in command and combat. Hence it is clear that peace is the desired end of war. For every man seeks peace even by waging war, but no one seeks war by making peace. Even those who want the peace they live in to be disturbed do not hate peace; they want it changed to suit their own will. So it is not that they do not want peace to exist; they want it to be the peace they want.
Denique etsi per seditionem se ab aliis separauerint, cum eis ipsis conspiratis uel coniuratis suis nisi qualemcumque speciem pacis teneant, non efficiunt quod intendunt. Proinde latrones ipsi, ut uehementius et tutius infesti sint paci ceterorum, pacem uolunt habere sociorum. Sed etsi unus sit tam praepollens uiribus et conscios ita cauens, ut nulli socio se committat solusque insidians et praeualens quibus potuerit obpressis et exstinctis praedas agat, cum eis certe, quos occidere non potest et quos uult latere quod facit, qualemcumque umbram pacis tenet. In domo autem sua cum uxore et	In short, even if they have separated themselves from others by sedition, they do not achieve what they intend unless they maintain some semblance of peace with their own fellow conspirators or sworn confederates. So too robbers themselves, in order to assault the peace of others more violently and more safely, want to have peace with their comrades. But suppose there is one robber so overwhelming in strength and so wary of accomplices that he trusts himself to no partner, and, lying in wait alone and prevailing alone, takes his cum filiis, et si quos, alios illic habet, studet profecto esse pacatus; eis quippe ad nutum obtemperantibus sine dubio delectatur.	plunder after overpowering and killing whomever he can. Even he certainly keeps some shadow of peace with those whom he cannot kill and from whom he wishes to hide what he does. And in his own home, with his wife and children and any others he has there, he surely strives to be at peace; he is undoubtedly delighted when they obey him at a nod.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam si non fiat, indignatur corripit uindicat et domus suae pacem, si ita necesse sit, etiam saeuiendo conponit, quam sentit esse non posse, nisi cuidam principio, quod ipse in domo sua est, cetera in eadem domestica societate subiecta sint. Ideoque si offerretur ei seruitus plurium, uel ciuitatis uel gentis, ita ut sic ei seruirent, quem ad modum sibi domi suae seruiri uolebat: non se iam latronem latebris conderet, sed regem conspicuum sublimaret, cum eadem in illo cupiditas et malitia permaneret. Pacem itaque cum suis omnes habere cupiunt, quos ad arbitrium suum uolunt uiuere. Nam et cum quibus bellum gerunt, suos facere, si possint, uolunt eisque subiectis leges suae pacis inponere.	For if they do not, he is indignant, he rebukes, he punishes, and, if need be, he sets the peace of his house in order even by savagery. He feels that this peace cannot exist unless all the other members of that domestic society are subject to a certain head, which in his own house he himself is. So if he were offered the service of many—of a city or a nation—so that they served him as he wanted to be served in his own home, he would no longer hide himself as a robber in his lairs but would raise himself up as a king for all to see, while the same craving and malice remained in him. Thus all desire to have peace with their own people, whom they want to live according to their will. For even those against whom they wage war they want, if they can, to make their own, and, once these are subjected, to impose on them the laws of their own peace.

EVEN A MONSTER WANTS PEACE

Even the solitary monster Cacus wanted peace in his cave and in his own body.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed faciamus aliquem, qualem canit poetica et fabulosa narratio, quem fortasse propter ipsam insociabilem feritatem semihominem quam hominem dicere maluerunt. Quamuis ergo huius regnum dirae speluncae fuerit solitudo tamque malitia singularis, ut ex hac ei nomen inuentum sit (Graece namque malus κακὸς dicitur, quod ille uocabatur), nulla coniux ei blandum ferret referretque sermonem, nullis filiis uel adluderet paruulis uel grandiusculis imperaret, nullo amici conloquio frueretur, nec Vulcani patris, quo uel hinc tantum non parum felicior fuit, quia tale monstrum ipse non genuit; nihil cuiquam daret, sed a quo posset quidquid uellet et quando posset et cum uellet auferret: tamen in ipsa sua spelunca solitaria, cuius, ut describitur, semper recenti caede tepebat humus, nihil aliud quam pacem uolebat, in qua nemo illi molestus esset, nec eius quietem uis ullius terrorue turbaret.	But let us imagine someone such as poetic and mythical narrative sings of—someone whom, perhaps because of his very unsociable ferocity, they preferred to call a half-man rather than a man. His kingdom was the solitude of a dreadful cave, and his malice was so singular that his name was derived from it (for in Greek a bad man is called κακός [kakos, bad], and that was his name). No wife exchanged tender words with him; he had no children to play with when they were small or to command when they were somewhat older; he enjoyed no conversation with a friend, not even with his father Vulcan—than whom he was happier, and not a little, on this count at least, that he himself fathered no such monster. He gave nothing to anyone, but took from whomever he could whatever he wanted, whenever he could and whenever he wished. Yet in that solitary cave of his, whose floor, as it is described, "was always warm with fresh slaughter," he wanted nothing else but peace —a peace in which no one would trouble him, and no one's violence or terror would disturb his quiet.[22]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Cum corpore denique suo pacem habere cupiebat, et quantum habebat, tantum bene illi erat. Quando quidem membris obtemperantibus imperabat, et ut suam mortalitatem aduersum se ex indigentia rebellantem ac seditionem famis ad dissociandam adque excludendam de corpore animam concitantem quanta posset festinatione pacaret, rapiebat necabat uorabat et quamuis inmanis ac ferus paci tamen suae uitae ac salutis inmaniter ac ferociter consulebat; ac per hoc si pacem, quam in sua spelunca adque in se ipso habere satis agebat, etiam cum aliis habere uellet, nec malus nec monstrum nec semihomo uocaretur. Aut si eius corporis forma et atrorum ignium uomitus ab eo deterrebat hominum societatem, forte non nocendi cupiditate, sed uiuendi necessitate saeuiebat.

Lastly, he desired to have peace with his own body, and the more of it he had, the better off he was. For he gave commands to limbs that obeyed him. And his mortal nature rebelled against him out of need and stirred up the sedition of hunger to sever the soul from the body and drive it out; so, to pacify it with all possible haste, he seized, killed and devoured. Though monstrous and savage, he still provided, monstrously and savagely, for the peace of his own life and safety. And so, if he had been willing to have with others too the peace he was so busy maintaining in his cave and within himself, he would not be called bad, or a monster, or a half-man. Or if the shape of his body and his vomiting of black fires frightened human company away from him, perhaps he was savage not from a craving to harm but from the necessity of staying alive.

Verum iste non fuerit uel, quod magis credendum est, non talis fuerit, qualis poetica uanitate describitur; nisi enim nimis accusaretur Cacus, parum Hercules laudaretur. Talis ergo homo siue semihomo melius, ut dixi, creditur non fuisse, sicut multa figmenta poetarum. Ipsae enim saeuissimae ferae, unde ille partem habuit feritatis (nam et semiferus dictus est), genus proprium quadam pace custodiunt, coeundo gignendo pariendo, fetus fouendo adque nutriendo, cum sint pleraeque insociabiles et soliuagae; non scilicet ut cerui columbae sturni apes, sed ut leones uulpes aquilae noctuae. Quae enim tigris non filiis suis mitis inmurmurat et pacata feritate blanditur? Quis miluus, quantumlibet solitarius rapinis circumuolet, non coniugium copulat, nidum congerit, oua confouet, pullos alit et quasi cum sua matre familias societatem domesticam quanta potest pace conseruat?

But perhaps he never existed, or—what is more to be believed—was not such as poetic fancy describes him; for unless Cacus were excessively blamed, Hercules would be too little praised. So such a man, or half-man, is better believed, as I said, never to have existed, like many of the poets' fictions. For even the most savage beasts, from which he had a share of his ferocity (he was also called half-beast), preserve their own kind by a sort of peace—by mating, begetting, giving birth, warming and nourishing their young—though most of them are unsociable and solitary wanderers: not, that is, like deer, doves, starlings and bees, but like lions, foxes, eagles and owls. For what tigress does not purr gently over her cubs and caress them, her ferocity calmed? What kite, however solitary as it circles in search of prey, does not mate, build a nest, warm its eggs, feed its chicks, and preserve with its mate, the mother of its household as it were, a domestic society with as much peace as it can?

Quanto magis homo fertur quodam modo naturae suae legibus ad ineundam societatem pacemque cum hominibus, quantum in ipso est, omnibus obtinendam,

How much more is a human being carried, in a sense, by the laws of his nature to enter into society and to maintain peace with all human beings, 22 Cacus, a fire-breathing monster, son of Vulcan, killed by Hercules on the site of Rome; Augustine draws on Virgil, Aeneid 8.190–267.

LATIN

cum etiam mali pro suorum pace belligerent omnesque, si possint, suos facere uelint, ut uni cuncti et cuncta deseruiant; quo pacto, nisi in eius pacem uel amando uel timendo consentiant? Sic enim superbia peruerse imitatur Deum. Odit namque cum sociis aequalitatem sub illo, sed inponere uult sociis dominationem suam pro illo. Odit ergo iustam pacem Dei et amat iniquam pacem suam. Non amare tamen qualemcumque pacem nullo modo potest. Nullius quippe uitium ita contra naturam est, ut naturae deleat etiam extrema uestigia.

Itaque pacem iniquorum in pacis conparatione iustorum ille uidet nec pacem esse dicendam, qui nouit praeponere recta prauis et ordinata peruersis. Quod autem peruersum est, etiam hoc necesse est ut in aliqua et ex aliqua et cum aliqua rerum parte pacatum sit, in quibus est uel ex quibus constat; alioquin nihil esset omnino.

Velut si quisquam capite deorsum pendeat, peruersus est utique situs corporis et ordo membrorum, quia id, quod desuper esse natura postulat, subter est, et quod illa subter uult esse, desuper factum est; conturbauit carnis pacem ista peruersitas et ideo molesta est: uerum tamen anima corpori suo pacata est et pro eius salute satagit, et ideo est qui doleat: quae si molestiis eius exclusa discesserit, quamdiu conpago membrorum manet, non est sine quadam partium pace quod remanet, et ideo est adhuc qui pendeat.

Et quod terrenum corpus in terram nititur et uinculo quo suspensum est renititur, in suae pacis ordinem tendit et locum quo requiescat quodam modo uoce ponderis poscit, iamque exanime ac sine ullo sensu a pace tamen naturali sui ordinis non recedit, uel cum tenet eam, uel cum fertur ad eam. Si enim adhibeantur medicamenta adque curatio, quae formam cadaueris dissolui dilabique non sinat, adhuc pax quaedam partes partibus iungit totamque molem adplicat terreno et conuenienti ac per hoc pacato loco. Si autem nulla adhibeatur cura condendi, sed naturali cursui relinquatur, tamdiu quasi tumultuatur dissidentibus exhalationibus et nostro inconuenientibus sensui (id enim est quod in putore as far as lies in him! For even the wicked wage war for the peace of their own people, and would, if they could, make everyone their own, so that all people and all things would serve one man. And how could that happen, unless they consented to his peace, through either love or fear? For thus pride perversely imitates God. It hates equality with its fellows under him, but wants to impose its own domination on its fellows in his place. So it hates the just peace of God and loves its own unjust peace. Yet it cannot help loving peace of some kind. For no one's vice is so contrary to nature as to destroy even the last traces of nature.

ENGLISH

So the one who knows how to prefer right to wrong, and the ordered to the perverse, sees that the peace of the unjust, compared with the peace of the just, should not even be called peace. But even what is perverse must be at peace in some part, and from some part, and with some part of the things in which it exists or of which it is composed; otherwise it would be nothing at all.

Suppose, for example, that someone hangs head downward. The position of the body and the order of the limbs are certainly perverse, because what nature requires to be above is below, and what nature wants below has been put above. This perversity has disturbed the peace of the flesh and is therefore painful. Yet the soul is at peace with its body and strives for its well-being, and that is why there is someone to feel the pain. And if the soul departs, driven out by these pains, then as long as the framework of the limbs holds together, what remains is not without a certain peace among its parts, and that is why there is still something hanging there.

And when the earthly body tends toward the earth and strains against the bond by which it is hung, it is moving toward the order of its own peace and, by the voice of its weight, as it were, demands a place in which to rest. Even when it is lifeless and without any sensation, it does not depart from the natural peace of its order, whether it holds that peace or is being borne toward it. For if embalming and treatment are applied that do not let the form of the corpse dissolve and decay, a certain peace still joins part to part and attaches the whole mass to an earthly place, one suited to it and therefore peaceful. If, however, no care is sentitur), donec mundi conueniat elementis et in eorum pacem paulatim particulatimque discedat.	taken to preserve it, and it is left to its natural course, it is in a kind of tumult, with exhalations at odds with one another and offensive to our senses (that is what we perceive in the stench), until it accords with the elements of the world and passes away, little by little and particle by particle, into their peace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nullo modo tamen inde aliquid legibus summi illius creatoris ordinatorisque subtrahitur, a quo pax uniuersitatis administratur; quia, etsi de cadauere maioris animantis animalia minuta nascantur, eadem lege creatoris quaeque corpuscula in salutis pace suis animulis seruiunt; etsi mortuorum carnes ab aliis animalibus deuorentur, easdem leges per cuncta diffusas ad salutem generis cuiusque mortalium congrua congruis pacificantes, quaqua uersum trahantur et rebus quibuscumque iungantur et in res quaslibet conuertantur et commutentur, inueniunt.	Yet in no way is anything thereby withdrawn from the laws of that supreme creator and orderer by whom the peace of the universe is governed. For even if tiny animals are born from the corpse of a larger animal, by the same law of the creator each of those little bodies serves its own little soul in the peace of its well-being. And even if the flesh of the dead is devoured by other animals, then wherever it is carried, whatever it is joined to, whatever it is converted and changed into, it finds those same laws, diffused through all things for the preservation of every mortal kind, bringing what is fitting into peace with what is fitting.

THE UNIVERSAL PEACE THAT THE LAW OF NATURE DOES NOT ALLOW TO BE LOST AMID ANY DISTURBANCES, SINCE UNDER A JUST JUDGE EACH COMES BY ORDINANCE TO WHAT HE HAS DESERVED BY HIS WILL

Augustine defines peace at every level, ending with peace as "the tranquillity of order."

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.13 Pax itaque corporis est ordinata temperatura partium, pax animae inrationalis ordinata requies adpetitionum, pax animae rationalis ordinata cognitionis actionisque consensio, pax corporis et animae ordinata uita et salus animantis, pax hominis mortalis et Dei ordinata in fide sub aeterna lege oboedientia, pax hominum ordinata concordia, pax domus ordinata imperandi oboediendique concordia cohabitantium, pax ciuitatis ordinata imperandi adque oboediendi concordia ciuium, pax caelestis ciuitatis ordinatissima et concordissima societas fruendi Deo et inuicem in Deo, pax omnium rerum tranquillitas ordinis. Ordo est parium dispariumque rerum sua cuique loca tribuens dispositio.	The peace of the body, then, is the ordered proportion of its parts. The peace of the irrational soul is the ordered repose of its appetites. The peace of the rational soul is the ordered agreement of knowledge and action. The peace of body and soul is the ordered life and health of the living creature. The peace between mortal man and God is ordered obedience in faith under the eternal law. The peace of human beings is ordered concord. The peace of a household is the ordered concord in commanding and obeying among those who live together. The peace of a city is the ordered concord in commanding and obeying among its citizens. The peace of the heavenly city is a perfectly ordered and perfectly harmonious fellowship in the enjoyment of God and of one another in God. The peace of all things is the tranquillity of order. Order is the arrangement of things equal and unequal that assigns to each its own place.
Proinde miseri, quia, in quantum miseri sunt, utique in pace non sunt, tranquillitate quidem ordinis carent, ubi	The wretched, accordingly, insofar as they are wretched, are certainly not at peace, and so they perturbatio nulla est; uerum tamen quia merito iusteque sunt miseri, in ea quoque ipsa miseria sua praeter ordinem esse non possunt; non quidem coniuncti beatis, sed ab eis tamen ordinis lege seiuncti. Qui cum sine perturbatione sunt, rebus, in quibus sunt, quantacumque congruentia coaptantur; ac per hoc inest eis ordinis nonnulla tranquillitas, inest ergo nonnulla pax. Verum ideo miseri sunt, quia, etsi in aliqua securitate non dolent, non tamen ibi sunt, ubi securi esse ac dolere non debeant; miseriores autem, si pax eis cum ipsa lege non est, qua naturalis ordo administratur.

LATIN

Cum autem dolent, ex qua parte dolent, pacis perturbatio facta est; in illa uero adhuc pax est, in qua nec dolor urit nec conpago ipsa dissoluitur. Sicut ergo est quaedam uita sine dolore, dolor autem sine aliqua uita esse non potest: sic est quaedam pax sine ullo bello, bellum uero esse sine aliqua pace non potest; non secundum id, quod bellum est, sed secundum id, quod ab eis uel in eis geritur, quae aliquae naturae sunt; quod nullo modo essent, si non qualicumque pace subsisterent.

Quapropter est natura, in qua nullum malum est uel etiam in qua nullum esse malum potest; esse autem natura, in qua nullum bonum sit, non potest. Proinde nec ipsius diaboli natura, in quantum natura est, malum est; sed peruersitas eam malam facit. Itaque in ueritate non stetit, sed ueritatis iudicium non euasit; in ordinis tranquillitate non mansit, nec ideo tamen a potestate ordinatoris effugit. Bonum Dei, quod illi est in natura, non eum subtrahit iustitiae Dei, qua ordinatur in poena; nec ibi Deus bonum insequitur quod creauit, sed malum quod ille commisit. Neque enim totum aufert quod naturae dedit, sed aliquid adimit, aliquid relinquit, ut sit qui doleat quod ademit. Et ipse dolor testimonium est boni ademti et boni relicti.

ENGLISH

lack the tranquillity of order, in which there is no disturbance. Yet because they are wretched deservedly and justly, they cannot be outside order even in their very wretchedness. They are not joined to the blessed, but it is by the law of order that they are separated from them. And when they are free from disturbance, they are fitted to the conditions in which they find themselves with some degree of harmony, however small. So there is in them some tranquillity of order, and therefore some peace. But they are wretched precisely because, even if they feel no pain in some freedom from care, they are still not where they ought to be free from care and ought not to suffer. They are more wretched still if they are not at peace with the very law by which the natural order is governed.

When they do suffer, a disturbance of peace has arisen in the part where they suffer; but there is still peace in the part where pain does not burn and the very frame of the body is not dissolved. Just as there is a kind of life without pain, then, while pain cannot exist without some life, so there is a kind of peace without any war, while war cannot exist without some peace. This is not because of what war is in itself, but because it is waged by or within beings that are natures of some kind—and they would not exist at all unless they subsisted in some sort of peace.

LATIN

ENGLISH

There can, therefore, be a nature in which there is no evil, or even in which no evil can exist; but there cannot be a nature in which there is no good. Accordingly, not even the nature of the devil himself, insofar as it is a nature, is evil; it is perversity that makes it evil. So he did not stand in the truth, but he did not escape the judgment of the truth. He did not remain in the tranquillity of order, yet he did not on that account escape the power of the one who orders all things. The good of God that is in his nature does not withdraw him from God's justice, by which he is set in his place in punishment; nor does God there pursue the good that he created, but the evil that the devil committed. For God does not take away all that he gave to the nature: he takes away something and leaves something, so that there may be someone to feel pain at what he has taken away. And the pain itself is evidence both of the good taken away and of the good that is left.[23]

Nisi enim bonum relictum esset, bonum amissum dolere non posset. Nam qui peccat, peior est, si laetatur in damno aequitatis; qui uero cruciatur, si nihil inde adquirat boni, dolet damnum salutis. Et quoniam aequitas ac salus utrumque bonum est bonique amissione dolendum est potius quam laetandum (si tamen non sit conpensatio melioris; melior est autem animi aequitas quam corporis sanitas): profecto conuenientius iniustus dolet in supplicio, quam laetatus est in delicto. Sicut ergo laetitia deserti boni in peccato testis est uoluntatis malae, ita dolor amissi boni in supplicio testis est naturae bonae. Qui enim dolet amissam naturae suae pacem, ex aliquibus reliquiis pacis id dolet, quibus fit, ut sibi amica natura sit.

For unless some good had been left, he could not grieve for the good that was lost. One who sins is worse if he rejoices in the loss of uprightness; but one who is tormented, if he gains no good from it, grieves at the loss of his well-being. Uprightness and well-being are both goods, and the loss of a good is cause for grief rather than for joy—unless there is compensation by something better, and uprightness of mind is better than health of body. So it is surely more fitting for the unjust man to grieve in his punishment than it was for him to rejoice in his offense. Just as joy at a good forsaken in sin testifies to a bad will, therefore, so grief at a good lost in punishment testifies to a good nature. For whoever grieves at the lost peace of his nature grieves from some remnants of peace, and by these it comes about that his nature is still a friend to itself.

Hoc autem in extremo supplicio recte fit, ut iniqui et inpii naturalium bonorum damna in cruciatibus defleant, sentientes eorum ablatorem iustissimum Deum, quem contemserunt benignissimum largitorem. Deus ergo naturarum omnium sapientissimus conditor et iustissimus ordinator, qui terrenorum ornamentorum maximum instituit mortale genus humanum, dedit hominibus quaedam bona huic uitae congrua, id est pacem temporalem pro modulo mortalis uitae in ipsa

In the final punishment, then, it is right that the wicked and ungodly should weep in their torments over the loss of their natural goods, feeling that the one who takes them away is the supremely just God, whom they despised as the supremely generous giver. God, then, the wisest creator and most just orderer of all natures, who established the mortal human race as the greatest ornament of earthly things, gave human beings

23 "He did not stand in the truth" echoes John 8:44.

LATIN	ENGLISH
salute et incolumitate ac societate sui generis, et quaeque huic paci uel tuendae uel recuperandae necessaria sunt (sicut ea, quae apte et conuenienter adiacent sensibus, lux uox, aurae spirabiles aquae potabiles, et quidquid ad alendum tegendum curandum ornandumque corpus congruit), eo pacto aequissimo, ut, qui mortalis talibus bonis paci mortalium adcommodatis recte usus fuerit, accipiat ampliora adque meliora, ipsam scilicet inmortalitatis pacem eique conuenientem gloriam et honorem in uita aeterna ad fruendum Deo et proximo in Deo; qui autem perperam, nec illa accipiat et haec amittat.	certain goods suited to this life. These are temporal peace, in the measure that mortal life allows, consisting in health, safety and fellowship with their own kind, together with whatever is necessary either to protect or to recover this peace—such as the things fitly and suitably available to the senses, light and sound, breathable air and drinkable water, and whatever is suitable for feeding, clothing, caring for and adorning the body. He gave them on a most equitable condition: that any mortal who rightly uses such goods, adapted to the peace of mortals, should receive greater and better ones, namely the very peace of immortality and the glory and honor that befit it in eternal life, for the enjoyment of God and of one's neighbor in God; but that whoever uses them wrongly should not receive those and should lose these as well.

THE ORDER AND LAW, EARTHLY OR HEAVENLY, BY WHICH EVEN THOSE WHO RULE SERVE HUMAN SOCIETY, AND THOSE WHO SERVE IT ARE CARED FOR

Humans subordinate bodily peace to the peace of reason, and both to obedience to God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.14 Omnis igitur usus rerum temporalium refertur ad fructum pacis terrenae in terrena ciuitate; in caelesti autem ciuitate refertur ad fructum pacis aeternae. Quapropter si inrationalia essemus animantia, nihil adpeteremus praeter ordinatam temperaturam partium corporis et requiem adpetitionum; nihil ergo praeter quietem carnis et copiam uoluptatum, ut pax corporis prodesset paci animae. Si enim desit pax corporis, inpeditur etiam inrationalis animae pax, quia requiem adpetitionum consequi non potest. Utrumque autem simul ei paci prodest, quam inter se habent anima et corpus, id est ordinatae uitae ac salutis. Sicut enim pacem corporis amare se ostendunt animantia, cum fugiunt dolorem, et pacem animae, cum propter explendas indigentias adpetitionum uoluptatem sequuntur: ita mortem fugiendo satis indicant, quantum dili, gant pacem, qua sibi conciliantur anima et corpus.	All use of temporal things, then, is directed in the earthly city toward the enjoyment of earthly peace, but in the heavenly city toward the enjoyment of eternal peace. So if we were irrational animals, we would seek nothing beyond the ordered proportion of the body's parts and the repose of the appetites—nothing, then, beyond bodily rest and an abundance of pleasures—so that the peace of the body might benefit the peace of the soul. For if the peace of the body is lacking, the peace of the irrational soul is also hindered, since it cannot attain the repose of its appetites. Both together, moreover, benefit the peace that soul and body have with each other, that is, the peace of ordered life and health. For just as animals show that they love the peace of the body when they flee pain, and the peace of the soul when they pursue pleasure to satisfy the needs of their appetites, so by fleeing death they show clearly enough how much they love the peace by which soul and body are bound together.
Sed quia homini rationalis anima inest, totum hoc, quod habet commune cum bestiis, subdit paci animae rationalis, ut mente aliquid contempletur et secundum hoc aliquid agat, ut sit ei ordinata cognitionis actionisque consensio, quam pacem rationalis animae dixeramus. Ad	But because man has a rational soul, he subordinates all that he has in common with the beasts to the peace of the rational soul, so that he may contemplate something with his mind and act in accordance with it, and so may have that ordered hoc enim uelle debet nec dolore molestari nec desiderio perturbari nec morte dissolui, ut aliquid utile cognoscat et secundum eam cognitionem uitam moresque conponat. Sed ne ipso studio cognitionis propter humanae mentis infirmitatem in pestem alicuius erroris incurrat, opus habet magisterio diuino, cui certus obtemperet, et adiutorio, ut liber obtemperet.

LATIN

ENGLISH

agreement of knowledge and action which we called the peace of the rational soul. It is for this purpose that he ought to wish not to be troubled by pain, not to be disturbed by desire, and not to be dissolved by death: so that he may come to know something useful and order his life and conduct according to that knowledge. But lest the weakness of the human mind should lead him, through the very pursuit of knowledge, into the plague of some error, he needs divine teaching, which he may obey with certainty, and divine help, so that he may obey it freely.

Et quoniam, quamdiu est in isto mortali corpore, peregrinatur a Domino: ambulat per fidem, non per speciem; ac per hoc omnem pacem uel corporis uel animae uel simul corporis et animae refert ad illam pacem, quae homini mortali est cum inmortali Deo, ut ei sit ordinata in fide sub aeterna lege oboedientia.

And since, as long as he is in this mortal body, he is a pilgrim away from the Lord, he "walks by faith, not by sight." Therefore he refers all peace, whether of body or of soul or of body and soul together, to that peace which mortal man has with the immortal God, so that he may have ordered obedience in faith under the eternal law.[24]

Iam uero quia duo praecipua praecepta, hoc est dilectionem Dei et dilectionem proximi, docet magister Deus, in quibus tria inuenit homo quae diligat, Deum, se ipsum et proximum, adque ille in se diligendo non errat, qui Deum diligit: consequens est, ut etiam proximo ad diligendum Deum consulat, quem iubetur sicut se ipsum diligere (sic uxori, sic filiis, sic domesticis, sic ceteris quibus potuerit hominibus), et ad hoc sibi a proximo, si forte indiget, consuli uelit; ac per hoc erit pacatus, quantum in ipso est, omni homini pace hominum, id est ordinata concordia, cuius hic ordo est, primum ut nulli noceat, deinde ut etiam prosit cui potuerit.

Now God, our teacher, teaches two chief commandments, love of God and love of neighbor, and in them a man finds three things to love: God, himself and his neighbor. And the man who loves God does not go wrong in loving himself. It follows, then, that he should also help his neighbor to love God, since he is commanded to love his neighbor as himself—and so with his wife, his children, his household, and all the other people he can reach—and that he should wish his neighbor to do the same for him, if he happens to need it. In this way he will be at peace, as far as lies in him, with every human being, in the peace of human beings, that is, in ordered concord. The order of this concord is, first, that he harm no one, and second, that he also help anyone he can.

Primitus ergo inest ei suorum cura; ad eos quippe habet opportuniorem facilioremque aditum consulendi, uel naturae ordine uel ipsius societatis humanae. Unde apostolus dicit: Quisquis autem suis et maxime domesticis non prouidet, fidem denegat et est infideli deterior. Hinc itaque etiam pax domestica oritur, id est ordinata imperandi oboediendique concordia cohabitantium. Imperant enim, qui consulunt; sicut uir uxori, parentes filiis, domini seruis. Oboediunt autem quibus consulitur; sicut mulieres maritis, filii parentibus, serui dominis. Sed in domo iusti uiuentis ex fide et adhuc ab illa caelesti ciuitate peregrinantis etiam qui imperant

His first concern, then, is for his own people, since he has more ready and easier opportunity to provide for them, whether by the order of nature or by the order of human society itself. Hence the apostle says: "Anyone who does not provide for his own, and especially for those of his household, has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." From this, then, domestic peace also arises, that is, the ordered concord in commanding and obeying among those who live together. For those who care for others give the commands: the husband to his wife, parents to their children,

24 2 Corinthians 5:6–7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
seruiunt eis, quibus uidentur imperare. Neque enim dominandi cupiditate imperant, sed officio consulendi, nec principandi superbia, sed prouidendi misericordia.	masters to their slaves. And those who are cared for obey: wives their husbands, children their parents, slaves their masters. But in the household of the just man who lives by faith and is still a pilgrim far from that heavenly city, even those who command serve those whom they appear to command. For they command not from a craving to dominate but from a duty to care for others, not from pride in ruling but from compassion in providing.[25]

NATURAL FREEDOM AND SLAVERY, WHOSE FIRST CAUSE IS SIN, SINCE A PERSON OF EVIL WILL, EVEN IF NOT ANOTHER PERSON'S SLAVE, IS A SLAVE OF HIS OWN LUST

God made humans to rule beasts, not one another; slavery is the result of sin.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.15 Hoc naturalis ordo praescribit, ita Deus hominem condidit.	This is what the natural order prescribes; this is how God created man.
Nam: Dominetur, inquit, piscium maris et uolatilium caeli et omnium repentium, quae repunt super terram. Rationalem factum ad imaginem suam noluit nisi inrationabilibus dominari; non hominem homini, sed hominem pecori. Inde primi iusti pastores pecorum magis quam reges hominum constituti sunt, ut etiam sic insinuaret Deus, quid postulet ordo creaturarum, quid exigat meritum peccatorum. Condicio quippe seruitutis iure intellegitur inposita peccatori. Proinde nusquam scripturarum legimus seruum, antequam hoc uocabulo Noe iustus peccatum filii uindicaret. Nomen itaque istuc culpa meruit, non natura. Origo autem uocabuli seruorum in Latina lingua inde creditur ducta, quod hi, qui iure belli possent occidi, a uictoribus cum seruabantur serui fiebant, a seruando appellati; quod etiam ipsum sine peccati merito non est.	For he says: "Let him have dominion over the fish of the sea and the birds of the sky and all creeping things that creep upon the earth." He did not will that the rational being, made in his own image, should have dominion over any but irrational creatures—not man over man, but man over beast. That is why the first just men were set up as shepherds of flocks rather than as kings of men, so that in this way too God might indicate what the order of creation requires and what the deserts of sin demand. For the condition of slavery is rightly understood to have been imposed on the sinner. Accordingly, we nowhere read the word "slave" in the Scriptures until the just man Noah punished his son's sin with this name. So it was guilt that earned this name, not nature. The Latin word for slaves, servi, is believed to come from the fact that those who could have been killed by right of war became slaves when the victors spared them: they were called servi from servare, "to preserve." And even this does not happen apart from what sin deserves.[26]
Nam et cum iustum geritur bellum, pro peccato e contrario dimicatur; et omnis uictoria, cum etiam malis prouenit, diuino iudicio uictos humiliat uel emendans peccata uel puniens. Testis est homo Dei Daniel, cum in captiuitate positus peccata sua et peccata populi sui confitetur Deo et hanc esse causam illius captiuitatis pio	For even when a just war is waged, it is in defense of sin that the opposing side fights; and every victory, even when it falls to the wicked, humbles the vanquished by divine judgment, either correcting their sins or punishing them. The man of God Daniel bears witness to this: in captivity he con-

25 1 Timothy 5:8.
26 Genesis 1:26. Noah cursed Canaan, son of Ham, to be a slave after Ham's offense (Genesis 9:25).

LATIN	ENGLISH
dolore testatur. Prima ergo seruitutis causa peccatum est, ut homo homini condicionis uinculo subderetur; quod non fit nisi Deo iudicante, aput quem non est iniquitas et nouit diuersas poenas meritis distribuere delinquentium. Sicut autem supernus Dominus dicit: Omnis, qui facit peccatum, seruus est peccati, ac per hoc multi quidem religiosi dominis iniquis, non tamen liberis seruiunt: A quo enim quis deuictus est, huic et seruus addictus est.	fesses to God his own sins and the sins of his people, and with devout grief testifies that this was the cause of that captivity. The first cause of slavery, then, is sin, so that man was subjected to man by the bond of his condition. This happens only by the judgment of God, in whom there is no injustice and who knows how to assign different penalties according to the deserts of the offenders. But, as the Lord on high says, "Everyone who commits sin is a slave of sin"; and so many devout people are indeed slaves of wicked masters, who are themselves not free. "For whatever overcomes a person, to that he is also bound as a slave."[27]
Et utique felicius seruitur homini, quam libidini, cum saeuissimo dominatu uastet corda mortalium, ut alias omittam, libido ipsa dominandi. Hominibus autem illo pacis ordine, quo aliis alii subiecti sunt, sicut prodest humilitas seruientibus, ita nocet superbia dominantibus. Nullus autem natura, in qua prius Deus hominem condidit, seruus est hominis aut peccati. Verum et poenalis seruitus ea lege ordinatur, quae naturalem ordinem conseruari iubet, perturbari uetat; quia si contra eam legem non esset factum, nihil esset poenali seruitute cohercendum.	And it is certainly a happier lot to be the slave of a human being than of a lust, since—to say nothing of others—the very lust for domination ravages the hearts of mortals with the most savage tyranny. Among human beings, in that order of peace by which some are subject to others, humility benefits those who serve just as pride harms those who dominate. But by nature, in which God first created man, no one is the slave either of a human being or of sin. Yet penal slavery too is ordered by that law which commands that the natural order be preserved and forbids it to be disturbed; for if nothing had been done against that law, there would be nothing to restrain by penal slavery.
Ideoque apostolus etiam seruos monet subditos esse dominis suis et ex animo eis cum bona uoluntate seruire; ut scilicet, si non possunt a dominis liberi fieri, suam seruitutem ipsi quodam modo liberam faciant, non timore subdolo, sed fideli dilectione seruiendo, donec transeat iniquitas et euacuetur omnis principatus et potestas humana et sit Deus omnia in omnibus.	That is why the apostle also admonishes slaves to be subject to their masters and to serve them from the heart with good will. His point is that, if they cannot be set free by their masters, they may themselves make their slavery in a sense free, by serving not with deceitful fear but with faithful love, until injustice passes away and all rule and human authority are abolished, and God is all in all.[28]

JUST RULE OVER OTHERS

Godly heads of households care for all members alike and correct them for their own good.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.16 Quocirca etiamsi habuerunt seruos iusti patres nostri, sic administrabant domesticam pacem, ut secundum haec temporalia bona filiorum sortem a seruorum condicione distinguerent; ad Deum autem colendum, in quo aeterna bona speranda sunt, omnibus domus suae membris pari	Therefore, although our righteous forefathers had slaves, they managed the peace of their households in such a way that, as regards these temporal goods, they distinguished the lot of their children from the condition of their slaves; but in the 27 Daniel's confession is in Daniel 9. The quotations are John 8:34 and 2 Peter 2:19.

28 Ephesians 6:5–7; the closing words echo 1 Corinthians 15:24, 28.

LATIN

dilectione consulerent. Quod naturalis ordo ita praescribit, ut nomen patrum familias hinc exortum sit et tam late uulgatum, ut etiam inique dominantes hoc se gaudeant appellari. Qui autem ueri patres familias sunt, omnibus in familia sua tamquam filiis ad colendum et promerendum Deum consulunt, desiderantes adque optantes uenire ad caelestem domum, ubi necessarium non sit officium imperandi mortalibus, quia necessarium non erit officium consulendi iam in illa inmortalitate felicibus; quo donec ueniatur, magis debent patres quod dominantur, quam serui tolerare quod seruiunt.

Si quis autem in domo per inoboedientiam domesticae paci aduersatur, corripitur seu uerbo seu uerbere seu quolibet alio genere poenae iusto adque licito, quantum societas humana concedit, pro eius qui corripitur utilitate, ut paci unde dissiluerat coaptetur. Sicut enim non est beneficentiae adiuuando efficere, ut bonum quod maius est amittatur: ita non est innocentiae parcendo sinere, ut in malum grauius incidatur. Pertinet ergo ad innocentis officium, non solum nemini malum inferre, uerum etiam cohibere a peccato uel punire peccatum, ut aut ipse qui plectitur corrigatur experimento, aut alii terreantur exemplo.

Quia igitur hominis domus initium siue particula debet esse ciuitatis, omne autem initium ad aliquem sui generis finem et omnis pars ad uniuersi, cuius pars est, integritatem refertur, satis apparet esse consequens, ut ad pacem ciuicam pax domestica referatur, id est, ut ordinata imperandi oboediendique concordia cohabitantium referatur ad ordinatam imperandi oboediendique concordiam ciuium. Ita fit, ut ex lege ciuitatis praecepta sumere patrem familias oporteat, quibus domum suam sic regat, ut sit paci adcommoda ciuitatis.

ENGLISH

worship of God, in whom eternal goods are to be hoped for, they took thought for all the members of their household with equal love. The natural order prescribes this so clearly that the name paterfamilias [father of the household] arose from it, and it has spread so widely that even those who rule unjustly are glad to be called by it. But those who are true fathers of their households care for everyone in their household as if they were their children, so that they may worship God and win his favor. They desire and long to reach the heavenly home, where the duty of commanding mortals will not be necessary, because the duty of caring for those who are already happy in that immortality will not be necessary. Until that home is reached, fathers ought to bear the burden of being masters more than slaves bear the burden of being slaves.[29]

If anyone in the household opposes domestic peace by disobedience, he is corrected by word or by blow or by any other kind of punishment that is just and lawful, as far as human society permits, for the benefit of the one corrected, so that he may be fitted back into the peace from which he had broken away. For just as it is not kindness to help someone in a way that makes him lose a greater good, so it is not innocence to spare someone in a way that lets him fall into a graver evil. It belongs to the duty of the innocent man, therefore, not only to do harm to no one but also to restrain others from sin or to punish sin, so that either the one punished may be corrected by the experience or others may be deterred by the example.

Since, then, a man's household ought to be the beginning, or a small part, of the city, and every beginning is directed to some end of its own kind, and every part to the completeness of the whole of which it is a part, it is quite clear that domestic peace is directed to civic peace—that is, that the ordered concord in commanding and obeying among those who live together is directed to the ordered concord in commanding and obeying among citizens. So it is that the father of a household ought to take from the law of the city the precepts by which he governs his household, so that it may be in harmony with the peace of the city.

29 The Roman familia included the slaves of the household, all under the authority of the paterfamilias.

WHAT MAKES FOR PEACE AND WHAT FOR DISCORD BETWEEN THE HEAVENLY SOCIETY AND THE EARTHLY CITY

The heavenly city uses earthly peace and obeys earthly laws, but not in matters of religion.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.17	Sed domus hominum, qui non uiuunt ex fide, pacem terrenam ex huius temporalis uitae rebus commodisque sectatur: domus autem hominum ex fide uiuentium exspectat ea, quae in futurum aeterna promissa sunt, terrenisque rebus ac temporalibus tamquam peregrina utitur, non quibus capiatur et auertatur quo tendit in Deum, sed quibus sustentetur ad facilius toleranda minimeque augenda onera corporis corruptibilis, quod adgrauat animam. Idcirco rerum uitae huic mortali necessariarum utrisque hominibus et utrique domui communis est usus; sed finis utendi cuique suus proprius multumque diuersus. Ita etiam terrena ciuitas, quae non uiuit ex fide, terrenam pacem adpetit in eoque defigit imperandi oboediendique concordiam ciuium, ut sit eis de rebus ad mortalem uitam pertinentibus humanarum quaedam conpositio uoluntatum.	But the household of people who do not live by faith pursues earthly peace from the things and advantages of this temporal life, whereas the household of people who live by faith looks for the eternal things promised for the future, and uses earthly and temporal things like a pilgrim. It does not use them so as to be captured by them and turned aside from its course toward God, but so as to be sustained by them, bearing more easily, and not increasing in the least, the burdens of the corruptible body that weighs down the soul. Hence the use of the things necessary for this mortal life is common to both kinds of people and to both kinds of household; but each has its own end in using them, and the ends are very different. So too the earthly city, which does not live by faith, seeks earthly peace, and it fixes the concord of its citizens in commanding and obeying on this: that there should be a certain agreement of human wills about the things that pertain to mortal life.[30]
	Ciuitas autem caelestis uel potius pars eius, quae in hac mortalitate peregrinatur et uiuit ex fide, etiam ista pace necesse est utatur, donec ipsa, cui talis pax necessaria est, mortalitas transeat; ac per hoc, dum aput terrenam ciuitatem uelut captiuam uitam suae peregrinationis agit, iam promissione redemtionis et dono spiritali tamquam pignore accepto legibus terrenae ciuitatis, quibus haec administrantur, quae sustentandae mortali uitae adcommodata sunt, obtemperare non dubitat, ut, quoniam communis est ipsa mortalitas, seruetur in rebus ad eam pertinentibus inter ciuitatem utramque concordia.	But the heavenly city—or rather the part of it that is on pilgrimage in this mortal condition and lives by faith—must also make use of this peace, until this mortal condition itself, for which such peace is necessary, passes away. Therefore, while it leads the life of its pilgrimage within the earthly city as if in captivity, having already received the promise of redemption and the spiritual gift as a pledge, it does not hesitate to obey the laws of the earthly city by which the things suited to sustaining mortal life are administered. Since this mortal condition is common to both, it does this so that concord may be maintained between the two cities in the things that pertain to it.
	Verum quia terrena ciuitas habuit quosdam suos sapientes, quos diuina inprobat disciplina, qui uel suspicati uel decepti a daemonibus crederent multos deos conciliandos esse rebus humanis, ad quorum diuersa quodam modo officia diuersa subdita pertinerent, ad alium corpus, ad alium animum, inque ipso corpore ad alium caput, ad alium ceruicem et cetera singula ad singulos; similiter in animo ad alium ingenium, ad alium	Now the earthly city has had certain wise men of its own whom divine teaching rejects. Either from their own conjecture or deceived by demons, they believed that many gods had to be won over to human affairs, and that different things were in a sense subject to their different offices: the body to one, the mind to another; and within the body itself, the head to one, the neck to another, and each 30 "The corruptible body that weighs down the soul" is from Wisdom 9:15.

LATIN

doctrinam, ad alium iram, ad alium concupiscentiam; inque ipsis rebus uitae adiacentibus ad alium pecus, ad alium triticum, ad alium uinum, ad alium oleum, ad alium siluas, ad alium nummos, ad alium nauigationem, ad alium bella adque uictorias, ad alium coniugia, ad alium partum ac fecunditatem et ad alios alia cetera:

caelestis autem ciuitas cum unum Deum solum colendum nosset eique tantum modo seruiendum seruitute illa, quae Graece λατρεία dicitur et non nisi Deo debetur, fideli pietate censeret: factum est, ut religionis leges cum terrena ciuitate non posset habere communes proque his ab ea dissentire haberet necesse adque oneri esse diuersa sentientibus eorumque iras et odia et persecutionum inpetus sustinere, nisi cum animos aduersantium aliquando terrore suae multitudinis et semper diuino adiutorio propulsaret.

Haec ergo caelestis ciuitas dum peregrinatur in terra, ex omnibus gentibus ciues euocat adque in omnibus linguis peregrinam colligit societatem, non curans quidquid in moribus legibus institutisque diuersum est, quibus pax terrena uel conquiritur uel tenetur, nihil eorum rescindens uel destruens, immo etiam seruans ac sequens, quod licet diuersum in diuersis nationibus, ad unum tamen eundemque finem terrenae pacis intenditur, si religionem, qua unus summus et uerus Deus colendus docetur, non inpedit.

Utitur ergo etiam caelestis ciuitas in hac sua peregrinatione pace terrena et de rebus ad mortalem hominum naturam pertinentibus humanarum uoluntatum conpositionem, quantum salua pietate ac religione conceditur, tuetur adque adpetit eamque terrenam pacem refert ad caelestem pacem,: quae uere ita pax est, ut rationalis dumtaxat creaturae sola pax habenda adque dicenda sit, ordinatissima scilicet et concordissima societas fruendi Deo et inuicem in Deo; quo cum uentum erit, non erit uita mortalis, sed plane certeque uitalis nec corpus animale, quod, dum corrumpitur, adgrauat animam, sed spiritale sine ulla indigentia ex omni parte subditum uoluntati.

ENGLISH

of the remaining parts to a separate god; likewise within the mind, natural talent to one, learning to another, anger to one, desire to another; and among the things connected with life itself, livestock to one, wheat to another, wine to one, oil to another, forests to one, money to another, navigation to one, wars and victories to another, marriages to one, childbirth and fertility to another, and all the rest to others.

The heavenly city, by contrast, knew that the one God alone was to be worshiped, and with faithful devotion held that to him alone was owed that service which in Greek is called λατρεία [latreia, worship] and is due to none but God. As a result, it could not share laws of religion with the earthly city; for their sake it had to dissent from it and to be a burden to those who thought otherwise, and to endure their anger and hatred and the assaults of persecution—except when it repelled the hostility of its opponents, sometimes by the fear its numbers inspired, and always by divine help.

This heavenly city, then, while it is on pilgrimage on earth, calls out citizens from all nations and gathers a pilgrim society of every language. It does not care about any differences in customs, laws and institutions by which earthly peace is achieved or maintained. It annuls or destroys none of them; rather, it even preserves and follows whatever, though different among different nations, is directed to one and the same end of earthly peace—provided it does not hinder the religion which teaches that the one supreme and true God is to be worshiped.

So the heavenly city too, in this pilgrimage of its own, makes use of earthly peace. It protects and seeks the agreement of human wills about the things that pertain to mortal human nature, as far as is permitted without harm to piety and religion, and it refers that earthly peace to heavenly peace. This is so truly peace that it alone should be regarded and called peace for the rational creature: namely, a perfectly ordered and perfectly harmonious fellowship in the enjoyment of God and of one another in God. When we arrive there, life will not be a dying life but one fully and surely living; and the body will not be an animal body, which weighs down the soul as it decays, but a spiritual body, lacking nothing and in every part subject to the will.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Hanc pacem, dum peregrinatur in fide, habet adque ex hac fide iuste uiuit, cum ad illam pacem adipiscendam refert quidquid bonarum actionum gerit erga Deum et proximum, quoniam uita ciuitatis utique socialis est.	This peace it possesses while on pilgrimage in faith, and by this faith it lives justly, when it refers to the attainment of that peace every good action it performs toward God and neighbor; for the life of a city is certainly a social life.

HOW DIFFERENT THE DOUBTING OF THE NEW ACADEMY IS FROM THE STEADFASTNESS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH

Against the New Academy, the city of God trusts reason, the senses and Scripture.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.18 Quod autem adtinet ad illam differentiam, quam de Academicis nouis Varro adhibuit, quibus incerta sunt omnia, omnino ciuitas Dei talem dubitationem tamquam dementiam detestatur, habens de rebus, quas mente adque ratione conprehendit, etiamsi paruam propter corpus corruptibile, quod adgrauat animam (quoniam, sicut dicit apostolus, ex parte scimus), tamen certissimam scientiam, creditque sensibus in rei cuiusque euidentia, quibus per corpus animus utitur, quoniam miserabilius fallitur, qui numquam putat eis esse credendum: credit etiam scripturis sanctis et ueteribus et nouis, quas canonicas appellamus, unde fides ipsa concepta est, ex qua iustus uiuit; per quam sine dubitatione ambulamus, quamdiu peregrinamur a Domino; qua salua adque certa de quibusdam rebus, quas neque sensu neque ratione percepimus neque nobis per scripturam canonicam claruerunt nec per testes, quibus non credere absurdum est, in nostram notitiam peruenerunt, sine iusta reprehensione dubitamus.	As for the distinction Varro brought in from the New Academics, for whom everything is uncertain, the city of God utterly detests such doubt as madness. About the things it grasps by mind and reason, its knowledge is small, because of the corruptible body that weighs down the soul (for, as the apostle says, "we know in part"), but that knowledge is still most certain. It also trusts the senses, which the mind uses through the body, in what each thing plainly shows, for anyone who thinks the senses should never be trusted is deceived more wretchedly still. It believes, too, the holy Scriptures, both old and new, which we call canonical. From them comes the very faith by which the just person lives, and through which we walk without doubting as long as we are on pilgrimage away from the Lord. While this faith stays safe and certain, we may, without deserving reproach, doubt about some things: things we have not perceived by sense or by reason, that canonical Scripture has not made clear to us, and that have not come to our knowledge through witnesses whom it would be absurd not to believe.[31]

THE DRESS AND CUSTOMS OF THE CHRISTIAN PEOPLE

Christians may keep any dress or way of life; leisure and action are balanced by love.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.19 Nihil sane ad istam pertinet ciuitatem quo habitu uel more uiuendi, si non est contra diuina praecepta, istam fidem, qua peruenitur ad Deum, quisque sectetur; unde ipsos quoque philosophos, quando Christiani fiunt, non habitum uel consuetudinem uictus, quae nihil inpedit religionem, sed falsa dogmata mutare conpellit. Unde illam quam Varro adhibuit ex Cynicis differentiam, si nihil turpiter adque intemperanter agat, omnino non	It makes no difference at all to this city in what dress or manner of life anyone follows the faith by which we come to God, provided it is not contrary to God's commandments. So when philosophers too become Christians, it compels them to change not their dress or their customary way of living, which is no hindrance to religion, but their false doctrines. It therefore cares nothing at all for the

31 1 Corinthians 13:9.

LATIN

curat. Ex tribus, uero illis uitae generibus, otioso, actuoso et ex utroque conposito, quamuis salua fide quisque possit in quolibet eorum uitam ducere et ad sempiterna praemia peruenire, interest tamen quid amore teneat ueritatis, quid officio caritatis inpendat. Nec sic esse quisque debet otiosus, ut in eodem otio utilitatem non cogitet proximi, nec sic actuosus, ut contemplationem non requirat Dei.

In otio non iners uacatio delectare debet, sed aut inquisitio aut inuentio ueritatis, ut in ea quisque proficiat et quod inuenerit ne alteri inuideat. In actione uero non amandus est honor in hac uita siue potentia, quoniam omnia uana sub sole, sed opus ipsum, quod per eundem honorem uel potentiam fit, si recte adque utiliter fit, id est, ut ualeat ad eam salutem subditorum, quae secundum Deum est; unde iam superius disputauimus. Propter quod ait apostolus: Qui episcopatum desiderat, bonum opus desiderat. Exponere uoluit quid sit episcopatus, quia nomen est operis, non honoris.

Graecum est enim adque inde ductum uocabulum, quod ille qui praeficitur eis quibus praeficitur superintendit, curam scilicet eorum gerens; σκοπὸς quippe intentio est; ergo ἐπισκοπεῖν, si uelimus, Latine superintendere possumus dicere, ut intellegat non se esse episcopum, qui praeesse dilexerit, non prodesse. Itaque ab studio cognoscendae ueritatis nemo prohibetur, quod ad laudabile pertinet otium; locus uero superior, sine quo regi populus non potest, etsi ita teneatur adque administretur ut decet, tamen indecenter adpetitur. Quam ob rem otium sanctum quaerit caritas ueritatis; negotium iustum suscipit necessitas caritatis. Quam sarcinam si nullus inponit, percipiendae adque intuendae uacandum est ueritati; si autem inponitur, suscipienda est propter caritatis necessitatem: sed nec sic omni modo ueritatis delectatio deserenda est, ne subtrahatur illa suauitas et obprimat ista necessitas.

ENGLISH

distinction Varro brought in from the Cynics, as long as a person does nothing shameful or intemperate. As for those three kinds of life—the leisured, the active, and the one compounded of both—anyone can, with faith kept safe, lead his life in any of them and reach the eternal rewards. Still, it matters what a person holds to out of love of truth, and what he spends in the duty of love. No one ought to be so leisured that in his leisure he gives no thought to his neighbor's good, nor so active that he does not seek the contemplation of God.

In leisure, what should delight us is not idle inactivity but the search for truth or its discovery, so that each person may make progress in it and not begrudge another what he has found. In action, on the other hand, what we should love is not honor or power in this life, since "all is vanity under the sun." We should love the work itself that is done through that honor or power, if it is done rightly and usefully—that is, if it serves the salvation of those under us, the salvation that is according to God. We have already discussed this above. That is why the apostle says, "Whoever desires the office of bishop desires a good work." He wanted to explain what the episcopate is: it is the name of a work, not of an honor.[32]

The word is Greek, and it comes from the fact that the one placed over others oversees those he is placed over—that is, he takes care of them. For σκοπός [skopos] means "attention," so ἐπισκοπεῖν [episkopein] we could, if we wished, render in Latin as superintendere, "to oversee." The point is that whoever loves to preside over others, and not to be of service to them, should understand that he is no bishop. So no one is barred from the pursuit of knowing the truth, which belongs to praiseworthy leisure. But a high position, without which a people cannot be governed, is unfittingly sought, even if it is held and administered as is fitting. Therefore the love of truth seeks holy leisure; the necessity of love takes up righteous business. If no one lays this burden on us, we should give our time to perceiving and contemplating truth. But if it is laid on us, it must be taken up because of the necessity of love. Yet even then the delight of truth must not be wholly abandoned, lest that sweetness be taken away and this necessity crush us.

32 Ecclesiastes 1:2–3; 1 Timothy 3:1.

THAT THE CITIZENS OF THE SAINTS ARE HAPPY IN HOPE DURING THE TIME OF THIS LIFE

Life here is happy only in hope of eternal peace; without that hope it is misery.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.20	Quam ob rem summum bonum ciuitatis Dei cum sit pax aeterna adque perfecta, non per quam mortales transeant nascendo adque moriendo, sed in qua inmortales maneant nihil aduersi omnino patiendo: quis est qui illam uitam uel beatissimam neget uel in eius comparatione istam, quae hic agitur, quantislibet animi et corporis externarumque rerum bonis plena sit, non miserrimam iudicet? Quam tamen quicumque sic habet, ut eius usum referat ad illius finem, quam diligit ardentissime ac fidelissime sperat, non absurde dici etiam nunc beatus potest, spe illa potius quam re ista.	Since, then, the supreme good of the city of God is eternal and perfect peace—not a peace through which mortals pass as they are born and die, but one in which they remain immortal, suffering nothing adverse at all—who would deny that that life is supremely happy? Or who would not judge this life lived here, however full it may be of goods of soul and body and of external things, utterly miserable by comparison? Yet whoever holds this life in such a way that he directs its use toward the end of that other life, which he loves most ardently and hopes for most faithfully, may without absurdity be called happy even now—by that hope rather than by this reality.
	Res ista uero sine spe illa beatitudo falsa et magna miseria est; non enim ueris animi bonis utitur, quoniam non est uera sapientia, quae intentionem suam in his, quae prudenter discernit, gerit fortiter, cohibet temperanter iusteque distribuit, non in illum dirigit finem, ubi erit Deus omnia in omnibus, aeternitate certa et pace perfecta.	But this reality without that hope is a false happiness and a great misery. For it does not make use of the true goods of the soul. That is no true wisdom which, in the things it discerns with prudence, carries out with courage, restrains with temperance and distributes with justice, does not direct its aim toward that end where God will be all in all, in secure eternity and perfect peace.[33]

WHETHER, BY THE DEFINITIONS OF SCIPIO IN CICERO'S DIALOGUE, THERE EVER WAS A ROMAN COMMONWEALTH

By Scipio's definition of a people as bound by justice, Rome was never a true commonwealth.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.21	Quapropter nunc est locus, ut quam potero breuiter ac dilucide expediam, quod in secundo huius operis libro me demonstraturum esse promisi, secundum definitiones, quibus aput Ciceronem utitur Scipio in libris de re publica, numquam rem publicam fuisse Romanam. Breuiter enim rem publicam definit esse rem populi. Quae definitio si uera est, numquam fuit Romana res publica, quia numquam fuit res populi, quam definitionem uoluit esse rei publicae. Populum enim esse definiuit coetum multitudinis iuris consensu et utilitatis communione sociatum. Quid autem dicat iuris consensum, disputando explicat, per hoc ostendens geri sine iustitia non posse rem publicam; ubi ergo iustitia uera non est, nec ius potest esse.	This, then, is the place to set out, as briefly and clearly as I can, what I promised in the second book of this work to demonstrate: that, according to the definitions Scipio uses in Cicero's books On the Republic, there never was a Roman commonwealth. For he briefly defines the commonwealth as "the affair of the people." If this definition is true, there never was a Roman commonwealth, because it never was the people's affair, and that is how he wanted the commonwealth to be defined. For he defined a people as "a gathering of a multitude united by agreement on what is right and by a sharing of interests." What he means by agreement on what is right, he explains in the course of the discussion, showing that a commonwealth

33 1 Corinthians 15:28.

LATIN

ENGLISH

cannot be carried on without justice. So where there is no true justice, there can be no right either.[34]

Quod enim iure fit, profecto iuste fit; quod autem fit iniuste, nec iure fieri potest Non enim iura dicenda sunt uel putanda iniqua hominum constituta, cum illud etiam ipsi ius esse dicant, quod de iustitiae fonte manauerit, falsumque esse, quod a quibusdam non recte sentientibus dici solet, id esse ius, quod ei, qui plus potest, utile est. Quocirca ubi non est uera iustitia, iuris consensu sociatus coetus hominum non potest esse et ideo nec populus iuxta illam Scipionis uel Ciceronis definitionem; et si non populus, nec res populi, sed qualiscumque multitudinis, quae populi nomine digna non est.

For what is done by right is surely done justly, and what is done unjustly cannot be done by right. Unjust human enactments are not to be called or thought rights, since even they themselves say that right is what has flowed from the fountain of justice. They also say it is false—though some who think wrongly commonly claim it—that right is whatever is advantageous to the stronger. Therefore, where there is no true justice, there can be no gathering of human beings united by agreement on what is right, and so no people according to that definition of Scipio, or Cicero. And if there is no people, there is no affair of the people either, but only the affair of some sort of multitude not worthy of the name of a people.[35]

Ac per hoc, si res publica res est populi et populus non est, qui consensu non sociatus est iuris, non est autem ius, ubi nulla iustitia est: procul dubio colligitur, ubi iustitia non est, non esse rem publicam. Iustitia porro ea uirtus est, quae sua cuique distribuit. Quae igitur iustitia est hominis, quae ipsum hominem Deo uero tollit et inmundis daemonibus subdit? Hocine est sua cuique distribuere? An qui fundum aufert eius, a quo emtus est, et tradit ei, qui nihil habet in eo iuris, iniustus est; et qui se ipsum aufert dominanti Deo, a quo factus est, et malignis seruit spiritibus, iustus est?

Consequently, if a commonwealth is the affair of the people, and there is no people that is not united by agreement on what is right, and there is no right where there is no justice, it undoubtedly follows that where there is no justice there is no commonwealth. Now justice is the virtue that gives to each his own. What kind of justice in a human being is it, then, that takes that very human being away from the true God and subjects him to unclean demons? Is this giving to each his own? Is someone who takes a farm away from the one who bought it and hands it over to someone with no right to it unjust, while someone who takes himself away from the God who rules him and made him, and serves evil spirits, is just?

Disputatur certe acerrime adque fortissime in eisdem ipsis de re publica libris aduersus iniustitiam pro iustitia. Et quoniam, cum prius ageretur pro iniustitiae partibus contra iustitiam et diceretur nisi per iniustitiam rem publicam stare augerique non posse, hoc ueluti ualidissimum positum erat, iniustum esse, ut homines hominibus dominantibus seruiant; quam tamen iniustitiam nisi sequatur imperiosa ciuitas, cuius est magna res publica, non eam posse prouinciis imperare: responsum est a parte iustitiae ideo iustum esse, quod talibus hominibus sit utilis seruitus, et pro utilitate eorum fieri, cum recte fit, id est cum inprobis aufertur

Certainly, in those same books On the Republic, the case for justice against injustice is argued most keenly and powerfully. Earlier, the side of injustice had been pleaded against justice, and it was said that a commonwealth could not stand or grow except through injustice. The strongest point put forward was this: it is unjust for human beings to be slaves to other human beings who are their masters, and yet unless an imperial city, whose commonwealth is great, follows this injustice, it cannot rule its provinces. To this the side of justice replied that it is just, because slavery is beneficial 34 Scipio Aemilianus (185–129 BC) is the main speaker in Cicero's dialogue On the Republic (written 54–51 BC); the promise was made in 2.21. The Latin plays on res publica (commonwealth, literally "public affair") and res populi ("the people's affair").

35 The view that justice is the advantage of the stronger is put in the mouth of Thrasymachus in Plato's Republic.

LATIN

iniuriarum licentia, et domiti melius se habebunt, quia indomiti deterius se habuerunt; subditumque est, ut ista ratio firmaretur, ueluti a natura sumtum nobile exemplum adque dictum est: Quur igitur Deus homini, animus imperat corpori, ratio libidini ceterisque uitiosis animi partibus?

Plane hoc exemplo satis edoctum est quibusdam esse utilem seruitutem, et Deo quidem ut seruiatur utile esse omnibus. Seruiens autem Deo animus recte imperat corpori, inque ipso animo ratio Deo Domino subdita recte imperat libidini uitiisque ceteris. Quapropter ubi homo Deo non seruit, quid in eo putandum est esse iustitiae? quando quidem Deo non seruiens nullo modo potest iuste animus corpori aut humana ratio uitiis imperare. Et si in homine tali non est ulla iustitia, procul dubio nec in hominum coetu, qui ex hominibus talibus constat. Non est hic ergo iuris ille consensus, qui hominum multitudinem populum facit, cuius res dicitur esse res publica. Nam de utilitate quid dicam, cuius etiam communione sociatus coetus hominum, sicut sese habet ista definitio, populus nuncupatur?

Quamuis enim, si diligenter adtendas, nec utilitas sit ulla uiuentium, qui uiuunt inpie, sicut uiuit omnis, qui non seruit Deo seruitque daemonibus, tanto magis inpiis, quanto magis sibi, cum sint inmundissimi spiritus, tamquam dis sacrificari uolunt: tamen quod de iuris consensu diximus satis esse arbitror, unde appareat per hanc definitionem non esse populum, cuius res publica esse dicatur, in quo iustitia non est. Si enim dicunt non spiritibus inmundis, sed dis bonis adque sanctis in sua re publica seruisse Romanos: numquid eadem totiens repetenda sunt, quae iam satis, immo ultra quam satis est diximus? Quis enim ad hunc locum per superiores huius operis libros peruenit, qui dubitare adhuc possit malis et inpuris daemonibus seruisse Romanos, nisi uel nimium stolidus uel inpudentissime contentiosus?

ENGLISH

to such people, and is done for their benefit when it is done rightly—that is, when the wicked are deprived of license to do wrong. Once subdued, they will be better off, because unsubdued they were worse off. And to support this reasoning a noble example was added, as if drawn from nature, and it was said: "Why, then, does God command man, the mind the body, reason lust and the other vicious parts of the mind?"[36]

This example plainly shows well enough that slavery is beneficial to some, and that to serve God is beneficial to all. The mind that serves God rightly commands the body, and within the mind itself reason, subject to the Lord God, rightly commands lust and the other vices. So where a human being does not serve God, what justice are we to suppose there is in him? For a mind that does not serve God can in no way justly command the body, nor human reason the vices. And if there is no justice in such a person, there is certainly none in a gathering of people made up of such persons. So here there is not that agreement on what is right which makes a multitude of human beings a people, whose affair is said to be the commonwealth. And what shall I say about interest, by the sharing of which, too, a gathering of human beings is called a people, as the definition has it?

For if you consider carefully, there is no benefit at all for those who live impiously—as everyone lives who does not serve God but serves demons, demons who are the more impious the more they want sacrifices offered to themselves as if to gods, though they are the most unclean of spirits. Still, I think what we have said about agreement on what is right is enough to show that, by this definition, a people in which there is no justice is not a people whose affair could be called a commonwealth. If they say that the Romans in their commonwealth served not unclean spirits but good and holy gods, must we really repeat over and over the same things we have already said enough—indeed more than enough? Who that has reached this point through the earlier books of this work could still doubt that the Romans served evil and impure demons, unless he were either utterly dull-witted or shamelessly contentious?

36 In Book 3 of Cicero's On the Republic, Philus argues the case for injustice, following the skeptic Carneades, and Laelius the case for justice.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed ut taceam quales sint, quos sacrificiis colebant: in lege ueri Dei scriptum est: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur nisi Domino tantum. Nec bonis igitur nec malis dis sacrificari uoluit, qui hoc cum tanta comminatione praecepit.	But to say nothing of what kind of beings they were whom they worshiped with sacrifices: in the law of the true God it is written, "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted, except to the Lord alone." So he who gave this command with so great a threat wished no sacrifice to be offered to gods, whether good or bad.[37]

WHETHER THE GOD WHOM CHRISTIANS SERVE IS THE TRUE GOD, TO WHOM ALONE SACRIFICE SHOULD BE OFFERED

The God Christians worship is the God of the prophets, whom even Varro and Porphyry acknowledged.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.22 Sed responderi potest: Quis iste Deus est aut unde dignus probatur, cui deberent obtemperare Romani, ut nullum deorum praeter ipsum colerent sacrificiis? Magnae caecitatis est, adhuc quaerere, quis iste sit Deus. Ipse est Deus, cuius prophetae praedixerunt ista quae cernimus. Ipse est Deus, a quo responsum accepit Abraham: In semine tuo benedicentur omnes gentes. Quod in Christo fieri, qui secundum carnem de illo semine exortus est, idem ipsi qui remanserunt huius nominis inimici, uelint nolintue, cognoscunt. Ipse est Deus, cuius diuinus Spiritus per eos locutus est, quorum praedicta adque conpleta per ecclesiam, quam uidemus toto orbe diffusam, in libris superioribus posui.	But someone may reply: "Who is this God, or how is he proved worthy, that the Romans should have obeyed him and worshiped none of the gods but him with sacrifices?" It shows great blindness to be still asking who this God is. He is the God whose prophets foretold the things we see. He is the God from whom Abraham received the answer, "In your seed all nations shall be blessed." That this is fulfilled in Christ, who according to the flesh sprang from that seed, is acknowledged, whether they like it or not, by the very people who have remained enemies of this name. He is the God whose divine Spirit spoke through those whose prophecies, fulfilled through the Church that we see spread throughout the whole world, I set out in the earlier books.[38]
Ipse est Deus, quem Varro doctissimus Romanorum Iouem putat, quamuis nesciens quid loquatur; quod tamen ideo commemorandum putaui, quoniam uir tantae scientiae nec nullum istum Deum potuit existimare nec uilem. Hunc enim eum esse credidit, quem summum putauit deum. Postremo ipse est Deus, quem doctissimus philosophorum, quamuis Christianorum acerrimus inimicus, etiam per eorum oracula, quos deos putat, deum magnum Porphyrius confitetur.	He is the God whom Varro, the most learned of the Romans, takes to be Jupiter, though he does not know what he is saying. I thought this worth mentioning because a man of such learning could not think this God either nonexistent or contemptible, since he believed him to be the one he thought the supreme god. Finally, he is the God whom Porphyry, the most learned of philosophers, though the bitterest enemy of the Christians, acknowledges as a great god, even through the oracles of those whom he takes to be gods.[39]

37 Exodus 22:20.
38 Genesis 22:18.
39 Porphyry (c. AD 234–305), pupil of Plotinus, was a Neoplatonist philosopher who wrote a work against the Christians.

WHAT PORPHYRY SAYS THE ORACLES OF THE GODS ANSWERED ABOUT CHRIST

Porphyry quotes oracles that condemn Christians yet praise Christ as a pious man.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.23	Nam in libris, quos ἐκ λογίων φιλοσοφίας appellat, in quibus exsequitur adque conscribit rerum ad philosophiam pertinentium uelut diuina responsa, ut ipsa uerba eius, quem ad modum ex Graeca lingua in Latinam interpretata sunt, ponam: Interroganti, inquit, quem deum placando reuocare possit uxorem suam a Christianismo, haec ait uersibus Apollo/ Deinde uerba uelut Apollinis ista sunt: Forte magis poteris in aqua inpressis litteris scribere aut adinflans leues pinnas per aera auis uolare, quam pollutae reuoces inpiae uxoris sensum. Pergat quo modo uult inanibus fallaciis mortuum Deum cantans, quem iudicibus recta sentientibus perditum pessima in speciosis ferro uincta mors interfecit.	In the books he calls ἐκ λογίων φιλοσοφίας [Philosophy from Oracles], he collects and writes down what are supposedly divine responses on matters belonging to philosophy. To give his very words, as they have been translated from Greek into Latin: "To someone who asked," he says, "what god he could appease so as to call his wife back from Christianity, Apollo said this in verse." Then come these words, supposedly Apollo's: "You might perhaps more easily write in letters pressed into water, or spread light wings and fly through the air like a bird, than call back the mind of your impious wife once she is polluted. Let her go on as she likes, singing in empty delusions to a dead god—a ruined man condemned by judges who judged rightly, and killed in full view by the worst of deaths, bound with iron."
	Deinde post hos uersus Apollinis, qui non stante metro Latine interpretati sunt, subiunxit adque ait: lIn his quidem inremediabile sententiae eorum manifestauit dicens, quoniam Iudaei suscipiunt Deum magis quam isti. Ecce, ubi decolorans Christum Iudaeos praeposuit Christianis, confitens quod Iudaei suscipiant Deum. Sic enim exposuit uersus Apollinis, ubi a iudicibus recta sentientibus Christum dicit occisum, tamquam illis iuste iudicantibus merito sit ille punitus. Viderim quid de Christo uates mendax Apollinis dixerit adque iste crediderit aut fortasse uatem, quod non dixit, dixisse iste ipse confinxerit. Quam sibi constet uel ipsa oracula inter se faciat conuenire, postea uidebimus; hic tamen Iudaeos, tamquam Dei susceptores, recte dicit iudicasse de Christo, quod eum morte pessima excruciandum esse censuerint.	Then, after these verses of Apollo, which have been translated into Latin without keeping the meter, he added: "In these words he revealed the incurable nature of their opinion, saying that the Jews accept God more than these people do." See how, in denigrating Christ, he has put the Jews above the Christians, admitting that the Jews accept God. For this is how he explained the verses of Apollo that say Christ was killed by judges who judged rightly—as if, since they judged justly, he was deservedly punished. I leave aside what Apollo's lying prophet said about Christ and what Porphyry believed, or whether perhaps he himself invented the claim that the prophet said what he did not say. How consistent he is with himself, or how he makes the oracles agree with one another, we shall see later. Here, at any rate, he says that the Jews, as those who accept God, judged rightly about Christ when they decided he should be tortured to death by the worst of deaths.
	Deus itaque Iudaeorum, cui perhibet testimonium, audiendus fuit dicens: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur, nisi Domino tantum. Sed ad manifestiora ueniamus et audiamus quam magnum Deum dicat esse Iudaeorum. Item ad ea, quae interrogauit Apollinem, quid melius, uerbum siue ratio an lex: Respondit, inquit, uersibus haec dicens. Ac deinde subicit Apollinis uersus, in quibus et isti sunt, ut quantum satis est inde decerpam: (In Deum	So the God of the Jews, to whom he bears witness, ought to have been heeded when he says, "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted, except to the Lord alone." But let us come to plainer statements and hear how great he says the God of the Jews is. Again, in reply to what he asked Apollo—which is better, the word (that is, reason) or the law—"He answered," he says, "speaking these uero, inquit, generatorem et in regem ante omnia, quem tremit et caelum et terra adque mare et infernorum abdita et ipsa numina perhorrescunt; quorum lex est Pater, quem ualde sancti honorant Hebraei.) Tali oraculo dei sui Apollinis Porphyrius tam magnum Deum dixit Hebraeorum, ut eum et ipsa numina perhorrescant.	verses." Then he adds Apollo's verses, among which are these—I take from them only as much as is enough: "But in God," he says, "the begetter, and king before all things, before whom heaven and earth and sea and the hidden places of the underworld tremble, and the very divinities shudder; their law is the Father, whom the holy Hebrews greatly honor." By such an oracle of his god Apollo, Porphyry has called the God of the Hebrews so great that even the divinities themselves shudder before him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Cum ergo Deus iste dixerit: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur, miror quod ipse Porphyrius non perhorruerit et sacrificans dis eradicari non formidauerit.	Since, then, this God has said, "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted," I am amazed that Porphyry himself did not shudder, and was not afraid of being uprooted for sacrificing to gods.
Dicit etiam bona philosophus iste de Christo, quasi oblitus illius, de qua paulo ante locuti sumus, contumeliae suae, aut quasi in somnis di eius maledixerint Christo et euigilantes eum bonum esse cognouerint digneque laudauerint. Denique tamquam mirabile aliquid adque incredibile prolaturus: Praeter opinionem, inquit, profecto quibusdam uideatur esse quod dicturi sumus. Christum enim di piissimum pronuntiauerunt et inmortalem factum et cum bona praedicatione eius meminerunt; Christianos uero pollutos, inquit, et contaminatos et errore inplicatos esse dicunt et multis talibus aduersus eos blasphemiis utuntur. Deinde subicit uelut oracula deorum blasphemantium Christianos et post haec: De Christo autem, inquit, interrogantibus si est Deus, ait Hecate: Quoniam quidem inmortalis anima post corpus ut incedit, nosti; a sapientia autem abscisa semper errat.	This philosopher also says good things about Christ, as if he had forgotten the insult of his that we spoke of a little earlier—or as if his gods had cursed Christ in their sleep and, on waking, recognized that he was good and praised him as he deserved. Indeed, as if about to bring out something marvelous and incredible, he says: "What we are about to say may well seem to some contrary to expectation. For the gods have declared Christ most pious, and say he has become immortal, and they remember him with high praise. But the Christians," he says, "they call polluted and defiled and entangled in error, and they use many such blasphemies against them." Then he adds supposed oracles of the gods blaspheming the Christians, and after these he says: "To those who asked whether Christ is God, Hecate said: 'You know how the immortal soul goes on after the body; but when it is cut off from wisdom, it wanders forever.[40]
Viri pietate praestantissimi est illa anima; hanc colunt aliena a se ueritate.	That soul belongs to a man most outstanding in piety; they worship it, though the truth is foreign to them.'"
Deinde post uerba huius quasi oraculi sua ipse contexens: Piissimum igitur uirum, inquit, eum dixit et eius animam, sicut et aliorum piorum, post obitum inmortalitate dignatam et hanc colere Christianos ignorantes. Interrogantibus autem, inquit: Quur ergo damnatus est? oraculo respondit dea: Corpus quidem debilitantibus tormentis semper obpositum est; anima autem piorum caelesti sedi insidet. Illa uero anima aliis animabus	Then, weaving his own words onto those of this so-called oracle, he says: "So she said he was a most pious man, and that his soul, like the souls of other pious men, was granted immortality after death, and that the Christians worship it in ignorance. And to those who asked," he says, "'Why, then, was he condemned?' the goddess replied in an oracle: 'The body is always exposed to torments

40 Hecate was a Greek goddess associated with magic, crossroads and the underworld.

LATIN

fataliter dedit, quibus fata non adnuerunt deorum dona obtinere neque habere Iouis inmortalis agnitionem, errore inplicari. Propterea ergo dis exosi, quia, quibus fato non fuit nosse Deum nec dona ab dis accipere, his fataliter dedit iste errore inplicari. Ipse uero pius et in caelum, sicut pii, concessit. Itaque hunc quidem non blasphemabis, misereberis autem hominum dementiam, ex eo in eis facile praecepsque periculum.

Quis ita stultus est, ut non intellegat aut ab homine callido eoque Christianis inimicissimo haec oracula fuisse conficta aut consilio simili ab inpuris daemonibus ista fuisse responsa, ut scilicet, quoniam laudant Christum, propterea credantur ueraciter uituperare Christianos adque ita, si possint, intercludant uiam salutis aeternae, in qua fit quisque Christianus?

Suae quippe nocendi astutiae milleformi sentiunt non esse contrarium, si credatur eis laudantibus Christum, dum tamen credatur etiam uituperantibus Christianos; ut eum, qui utrumque crediderit, talem Christi faciant laudatorem, ne uelit esse Christianus, ac sic quamuis ab illo laudatus ab istorum tamen daemonum dominatu eum non liberet Christus; praesertim quia ita laudant Christum, ut, quisquis in eum talem crediderit, qualis ab eis praedicatur, Christianus uerus non sit, sed Photinianus haereticus, qui tantummodo hominem, non etiam Deum nouerit Christum, et ideo per eum saluus esse non possit nec istorum mendaciloquorum daemonum laqueos uitare uel soluere. Nos autem neque Apollinem uituperantem Christum neque Hecaten possumus adprobare laudantem. Ille quippe tamquam iniquum Christum uult credi, quem iudicibus recta sentientibus dicit occisum; ista hominem piissimum, sed hominem tantum.

Una est tamen et illius et huius intentio, ut nolint homines esse Christianos, quia, nisi Christiani erunt, ab eorum erui potestate non poterunt. Iste uero philosophus, uel potius qui talibus aduersus Christianos that weaken it, but the soul of the pious dwells in a heavenly seat. That soul, however, by fate gave to other souls—those to whom the fates did not grant to obtain the gifts of the gods or to have knowledge of immortal Jupiter—to be entangled in error. They are therefore hated by the gods, because those for whom it was not fated to know God or to receive gifts from the gods were given by fate, through him, to be entangled in error. But he himself was pious, and like the pious he went to heaven. So you shall not blaspheme him, but you shall pity the madness of men; from him comes their easy and headlong danger.'"

ENGLISH

Who is so foolish as not to understand that these oracles were either invented by a cunning man, and one most hostile to the Christians, or given as responses by impure demons with a similar purpose? The aim, of course, is that because they praise Christ, they may be believed to be telling the truth when they disparage Christians, and so, if they can, block the way of eternal salvation, the way in which each person becomes a Christian.

For they see that it does not run counter to their thousand-shaped cunning in doing harm if they are believed when they praise Christ, so long as they are also believed when they disparage Christians. In this way they make anyone who believes both into the kind of praiser of Christ who does not want to be a Christian; and so, although Christ is praised by him, Christ does not set him free from the domination of these demons. All the more so because they praise Christ in such a way that whoever believes in him as they portray him is not a true Christian but a Photinian heretic, one who knows Christ only as a man and not also as God. So he cannot be saved through him, nor avoid or loosen the snares of these lying demons. We, however, can approve neither Apollo when he disparages Christ nor Hecate when she praises him. He wants Christ to be believed wicked, since he says he was killed by judges who judged rightly; she wants him believed a most pious man, but only a man.[41]

Yet the aim of both is one and the same: they do not want people to be Christians, because unless they are Christians they cannot be rescued from 41 Photinus, a fourth-century bishop of Sirmium, was condemned for teaching that Christ was only a man.

LATIN

quasi oraculis credunt, prius faciant, si possunt, ut inter se de ipso Christo Hecate adque Apollo concordent eumque aut ambo condemnent aut ambo conlaudent. Quod si facere potuissent, nihilo minus nos et uituperatores et laudatores Christi fallaces daemones uitaremus. Cum uero eorum deus et dea inter se de Christo, ille uituperando, ista laudando dissentiant: profecto eis blasphemantibus Christianos non credunt homines, si recte ipsi sentiant.

Sane Christum laudans uel Porphyrius uel Hecate, cum dicat eum ipsum fataliter dedisse Christianis, ut inplicarentur errore, causas tamen eiusdem, sicut putat, pandit erroris. Quas antequam ex uerbis eius exponam, prius quaero, si fataliter dedit Christus Christianis erroris inplicationem, utrum nolens an nolens dederit. Si uolens, quo modo iustus? Si nolens, quo modo beatus? Sed iam causas ipsius audiamus erroris. Sunt, inquit, spiritus terreni minimi loco quodam malorum daemonum potestati subiecti. Ab his sapientes Hebraeorum (quorum unus iste etiam Iesus fuit, sicut audisti diuina Apollinis, quae superius dicta sunt) — ab his ergo Hebraei daemonibus pessimis et minoribus spiritibus uetabant religiosos et ipsis uacare prohibebant; uenerari autem magis caelestes deos, amplius autem uenerari Deum Patrem.

Hoc autem, inquit, et di praecipiunt et in superioribus ostendimus, quem ad modum animum aduertere ad Deum monent et illum colere ubique imperant. Verum indocti et inpiae naturae, quibus uere fatum non concessit ab dis dona obtinere neque habere Iouis inmortalis notionem, non audientes et deos et diuinos uiros deos quidem omnes recusauerunt, prohibitos autem daemones et hos non odisse, sed reuereri. Deum autem simulantes colere, ea sola, per quae Deus adoratur, non agunt. Nam Deus quidem, utpote omnium Pater, nullius indiget; sed nobis est bene, cum eum per iustitiam et castitatem aliasque uirtutes adoramus, ipsam uitam precem ad ipsum facientes per imitationem et inquisitionem de ipso. Inquisitio enim purgat, inquit; imitatio deificat adfectionem ad ipsum operando.

ENGLISH

their power. But let this philosopher—or rather those who believe such so-called oracles against the Christians—first, if they can, make Hecate and Apollo agree with each other about Christ, so that they either both condemn him or both praise him. Even if they could do that, we would nonetheless shun the deceitful demons, whether they disparaged Christ or praised him. But since their god and goddess disagree with each other about Christ, he disparaging and she praising, people surely do not believe them when they blaspheme Christians—if they themselves think rightly.

Now Porphyry—or Hecate—in praising Christ, while saying that he himself by fate gave Christians to be entangled in error, nonetheless lays out what he thinks are the causes of that error. Before I set them out from his own words, I first ask: if Christ by fate gave Christians entanglement in error, did he do so willingly or unwillingly? If willingly, how is he just? If unwillingly, how is he happy? But now let us hear the causes of that error. "There are," he says, "earthly spirits, very small, subject in a certain place to the power of evil demons. From these the wise men of the Hebrews—one of whom was this Jesus too, as you heard from the divine sayings of Apollo quoted above—from these worst of demons and lesser spirits, then, the Hebrews kept religious people away and forbade them to give their attention to them. Rather, they told them to venerate the heavenly gods, and still more to venerate God the Father."

"This," he says, "the gods also command, and we showed above how they urge us to turn the mind toward God, and order us to worship him everywhere. But the uneducated and those of impious nature, to whom fate truly did not grant to obtain gifts from the gods or to have a notion of immortal Jupiter, would not listen to the gods and to divine men. They have rejected all the gods, while the forbidden demons they not only do not hate but revere. And though they pretend to worship God, they do not do the only things by which God is adored. For God, as the Father of all, needs nothing; but it goes well with us when we adore him through justice and chastity and the other virtues, making our very life a prayer to him through imitation of him and inquiry into him. For inquiry purifies," he says, "and imitation deifies, by working our disposition toward him."

LATIN

ENGLISH

Bene quidem praedicauit Deum Patrem, et quibus sit colendus moribus dixit; quibus praeceptis prophetici libri pleni sunt Hebraeorum, quando sanctorum uita siue imperatur siue laudatur. Sed in Christianis tantum errat aut tantum calumniatur, quantum uolunt daemones, quos opinatur deos; quasi cuiquam difficile sit recolere, quae turpia, quae dedecora erga deorum obsequium in theatris agebantur et templis, et adtendere quae legantur dicantur audiantur in ecclesiis, uel Deo uero quid offeratur, et hinc intellegere ubi aedificium, et ubi ruina sit morum. Quis autem huic dixit uel inspirauit, nisi diabolicus spiritus, tam uanum apertumque mendacium, quod daemones ab Hebraeis coli prohibitos reuereantur potius, quam oderint Christiani?

He has indeed spoken well of God the Father, and has said by what way of life he is to be worshiped. The prophetic books of the Hebrews are full of such precepts, where the life of the saints is either commanded or praised. But about the Christians he errs, or slanders, exactly as much as the demons he takes for gods wish him to. As if it were hard for anyone to recall the shameful and disgraceful things done in theaters and temples in the service of the gods, and to consider what is read, said and heard in the churches, or what is offered to the true God, and from this to understand where morals are built up and where they are torn down! And who but a diabolical spirit told or inspired in him so empty and obvious a lie as that Christians revere, rather than hate, the demons whose worship the Hebrews forbade?

Sed Deus ille, quem coluerunt sapientes Hebraeorum, etiam caelestibus sanctis angelis et uirtutibus Dei, quos beatissimos tamquam ciues in hac nostra peregrinatione mortali ueneramur et amamus, sacrificari uetat intonans in lege sua, quam dedit Hebraeo populo suo, et ualde minaciter dicens: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur.

But that God whom the wise men of the Hebrews worshiped forbids sacrifice to be offered even to the holy angels of heaven and the powers of God, whom we venerate and love as most blessed fellow citizens during this mortal pilgrimage of ours. He thunders this in his law, which he gave to his Hebrew people, saying with great menace: "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted."

Et ne quisquam putaret daemonibus pessimis terrenisque spiritibus, quos iste dicit minimos uel minores, ne sacrificetur esse praeceptum (quia et ipsi in scripturis sanctis dicti sunt di, non Hebraeorum, sed gentium; quod euidenter in psalmo septuaginta interpretes posuerunt, dicentes: Quoniam di gentium daemonia), — ne quis ergo putaret istis quidem daemoniis prohibitum, caelestibus autem uel omnibus uel aliquibus sacrificari esse permissum, mox addidit: Nisi Domino soli, id est nisi Domino tantum; ne forte in eo, quod ait: Domino soli, Dominum solem credat esse quispiam, cui sacrificandum putet; quod non ita esse intellegendum in scripturis Graecis facillime reperitur.

Someone might think the command was only that sacrifice not be offered to the worst demons and earthly spirits, whom this man calls very small or lesser. (These too are called gods in the holy Scriptures—gods not of the Hebrews but of the nations, as the Seventy translators plainly put it in the psalm, saying, "For the gods of the nations are demons.") So that no one, then, would think it was forbidden to sacrifice to these demons but permitted to sacrifice to the heavenly beings, whether all or some of them, he at once added, "except to the Lord alone," that is, "except to the Lord only." This was so that no one, from the words Domino soli, might perhaps believe the Lord to be the sun and think sacrifice should be offered to him; and that this is not the meaning is very easily found in the Greek Scriptures.[42]

Deus igitur Hebraeorum, cui tam magnum tantus etiam iste philosophus perhibet testimonium, legem dedit

So the God of the Hebrews, to whom even this great philosopher bears such great testimony, gave his Hebrew people a law written in the Hebrew language—not obscure and unknown, but now spread abroad among all nations—and in that law it is written: "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted, except to the Lord alone." What need is there to search out many passages on this subject in his law and his prophets? Or rather, not to search them out, for they are not hidden or rare, but to gather up those that are plain and frequent and put them into this discussion of mine—passages that make it clearer than daylight that the true and supreme God wished sacrifice to be offered to no one at all except himself alone? Here is this one saying, spoken briefly—or rather grandly—menacingly but truthfully by that God whom their most learned men proclaim so excellently: let it be heard, feared and fulfilled, lest uprooting overtake the disobedient.

LATIN

Hebraeo populo suo, Hebraeo sermone conscriptam, non obscuram et incognitam, sed omnibus iam gentibus diffamatam, in qua lege scriptum est: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur nisi Domino tantum. Quid opus est in hac eius lege eiusque prophetis de hac re multa perquirere; immo non perquirere, non enim abstrusa uel rara sunt, sed aperta et crebra colligere et in hac disputatione mea ponere, quibus luce clarius apparet nulli omnino nisi tantum sibi Deum uerum et summum uoluisse sacrificari? Ecce hoc unum breuiter, immo granditer, minaciter, sed ueraciter dictum ab illo Deo, quem tam excellenter eorum doctissimi praedicant, audiatur timeatur inpleatur, ne inoboedientes eradicatio consequatur.

ENGLISH

THE TRUE SACRIFICE AND THE TRUE PEOPLE

True sacrifice is God's city itself; without the justice of serving God there is no people.

LATIN

Sacrificans, inquit, dis eradicabitur nisi Domino tantum; non quo rei egeat alicuius, sed quia nobis expedit, ut res eius simus. Huic enim canitur in sacris litteris Hebraeorum: Dixi Domino: Deus meus es tu, quoniam bonorum meorum non eges. Huius autem praeclarissimum adque optimum sacrificium nos ipsi sumus, hoc est ciuitas eius, cuius rei mysterium celebramus oblationibus nostris, quae fidelibus notae sunt, sicut in libris praecedentibus disputauimus. Cessaturas enim uictimas, quas in umbra futuri offerebant Iudaei, et unum sacrificium gentes a solis ortu usque ad occasum, sicut iam fieri cernimus, oblaturas per prophetas Hebraeos oracula increpuere diuina; ex quibus quantum satis uisum est, nonnulla protulimus et huic iam, operi adspersimus.

Quapropter ubi non est ista iustitia, ut secundum suam gratiam ciuitati oboedienti Deus imperet unus et summus, ne cuiquam sacrificet nisi tantum sibi, et per hoc in omnibus hominibus ad eandem ciuitatem pertinentibus adque oboedientibus Deo animus etiam corpori adque ratio uitiis ordine legitimo fideliter

ENGLISH

"Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be uprooted," he says, "except to the Lord alone." This is not because he needs anything, but because it is to our benefit to be his. For to him it is sung in the sacred writings of the Hebrews: "I said to the Lord: You are my God, for you have no need of my goods." His most glorious and best sacrifice is we ourselves, that is, his city. We celebrate the mystery of this in our offerings, which are known to the faithful, as we argued in the preceding books. For divine oracles rang out through the Hebrew prophets that the victims the Jews offered as a shadow of what was to come would cease, and that the nations, from the rising of the sun to its setting, would offer one sacrifice, as we now see happening. We have brought forward some of these oracles, as many as seemed sufficient, and have already scattered them through this work.[43]

Consider, then, the justice by which the one supreme God rules a city that obeys him according to his grace, so that it sacrifices to no one but him alone. Through it, in all the people who belong to that city and obey God, the soul also faithfully

42 Psalm 95:5 (96:5 in most English Bibles), in the Septuagint, the Greek translation traditionally made by seventy translators. Latin soli can mean "alone" or "to the sun"; the Greek has no such ambiguity.
43 Exodus 22:20; Psalm 15:2 (16:2 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
imperet; ut, quem ad modum iustus unus, ita coetus populusque iustorum uiuat ex fide, quae operatur per dilectionem, qua homo diligit Deum, sicut diligendus est Deus, et proximum sicut semet ipsum, — ubi ergo non est ista iustitia, profecto non est coetus hominum iuris consensu et utilitatis communione, sociatus. Quod si non est, utique populus non est si uera est haec populi definitio. Ergo nec res publica est, quia res populi non est, ubi ipse populus non est.	rules the body, and reason rules the vices in lawful order. So, just as the individual righteous person does, the community and people of the righteous live by faith, which works through love. This is the love by which a person loves God as God ought to be loved, and his neighbor as himself. Where, then, this justice is absent, there is certainly no gathering of human beings united by agreement on what is right and by a sharing of interests. And if there is no such gathering, there is certainly no people, if this definition of a people is true. Therefore there is no commonwealth either, for where there is no people, there is no "affair of the people."

BY WHAT DEFINITION NOT ONLY THE ROMANS BUT OTHER KINGDOMS TOO MAY RIGHTLY CLAIM THE NAMES OF A PEOPLE AND A COMMONWEALTH

Defined as a multitude united by what it loves, Rome was a people and a commonwealth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
19.24 Si autem populus non isto, sed alio definiatur modo, uelut si dicatur: Populus est coetus multitudinis rationalis rerum quas diligit concordi communione sociatus, profecto, ut uideatur qualis quisque populus sit, illa sunt intuenda, quae diligit. Quaecumque tamen diligat, si coetus est multitudinis non pecorum, sed rationalium creaturarum et eorum quae diligit concordi communione sociatus est, non absurde populus nuncupatur; tanto utique melior, quanto in melioribus, tantoque deterior, quanto est in deterioribus concors. Secundum istam definitionem nostram Romanus populus populus est et res eius sine dubitatione res publica.	But suppose a people is defined in some other way. One might say, for example: "A people is a gathering of a multitude of rational beings united by a harmonious sharing in the things it loves." Then, to see what kind of people each one is, we must certainly look at what it loves. Yet whatever it loves, it is not absurd to call it a people, provided it is a gathering of a multitude, not of cattle but of rational creatures, united by a harmonious sharing in the things it loves. It is a better people the better the things on which it agrees, and a worse one the worse the things on which it agrees. By this definition of ours, the Roman people is a people, and its affair is without doubt a commonwealth.
Quid autem primis temporibus suis quidue sequentibus populus ille dilexerit et quibus moribus ad cruentissimas seditiones adque inde ad socialia adque ciuilia bella perueniens ipsam concordiam, quae salus est quodam modo populi, ruperit adque corruperit, testatur historia; de qua in praecedentibus libris multa posuimus. Nec ideo tamen uel ipsum non esse populum uel eius rem dixerim non esse rem publicam, quamdiu manet qualiscumque rationalis multitudinis coetus, rerum quas diligit concordi communione sociatus. Quod autem de isto populo et de ista re publica dixi, hoc de Atheniensium uel quorumcumque Graecorum, hoc de Aegyptiorum, hoc de illa priore Babylone Assyriorum, quando in rebus publicis suis imperia uel parua uel magna tenuerunt, et de alia	What that people loved in its earliest times and in the times that followed, history bears witness. History also shows what morals brought it to the bloodiest factional strife, and from there to the Social and Civil Wars, breaking and corrupting that very concord which is, in a sense, the health of a people. We have set out much of this in the earlier books. Yet I would not on that account say either that it is not a people or that its affair is not a commonwealth, so long as there remains some sort of gathering of a rational multitude, united by a harmonious sharing in the things it loves. And what I have said of this people and this commonwealth should be understood as said and meant of the quacumque aliarum gentium intellegar dixisse adque sensisse.	commonwealth of the Athenians or of any of the Greeks, of the Egyptians, and of that earlier Babylon of the Assyrians, when in their commonwealths they held empires small or great. The same holds for any other commonwealth of any other nations.[44]

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Generaliter quippe ciuitas inpiorum, cui non imperat Deus oboedienti sibi, ut sacrificium non offerat nisi tantummodo sibi, et per hoc in illa et animus corpori ratioque uitiis recte ac fideliter imperet, caret iustitiae ueritate.	For in general, the city of the ungodly lacks true justice. In it, God does not rule an obedient city so that it offers sacrifice to no one but him alone. As a result, the soul does not rightly and faithfully rule the body in it, nor does reason rule the vices.

THAT THERE CAN BE NO TRUE VIRTUES WHERE THERE IS NO TRUE RELIGION

Virtues not referred to God are vices rather than virtues.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.25	Quamlibet enim uideatur animus corpori et ratio uitiis laudabiliter imperare, si Deo animus et ratio ipsa non seruit, sicut sibi esse seruiendum ipse Deus praecepit, nullo modo corpori uitiisque recte imperat. Nam qualis corporis adque uitiorum potest esse mens domina ueri Dei nescia nec eius imperio subiugata, sed uitiosissimis daemonibus corrumpentibus prostituta? Proinde uirtutes, quas habere sibi uidetur, per quas imperat corpori et uitiis, ad quodlibet adipiscendum uel tenendum rettulerit nisi ad Deum, etiam ipsae uitia sunt potius quam uirtutes. Nam licet a quibusdam tunc uerae adque honestae putentur esse uirtutes, cum referuntur ad se ipsas nec propter aliud expetuntur: etiam tunc inflatae ac superbae sunt, et ideo non uirtutes, sed uitia iudicanda sunt.	However praiseworthy the soul's rule over the body and reason's rule over the vices may appear, if the soul and reason itself do not serve God as God himself has commanded that he be served, they do not rule the body and the vices rightly at all. For what kind of mistress of the body and the vices can a mind be if it does not know the true God and is not subject to his rule, but is prostituted to the most vicious demons, who corrupt it? Hence the virtues it seems to itself to possess, through which it rules the body and the vices, are themselves vices rather than virtues if it refers them to obtaining or keeping anything other than God. Some think that virtues are true and honorable when they are referred to themselves and sought for no other end. But even then they are puffed up and proud, and so they must be judged not virtues but vices.
	Sicut enim non est a carne sed super carnem, quod carnem facit uiuere: sic non est ab homine, sed super hominem, quod hominem facit beate uiuere; nec solum hominem, sed etiam quamlibet potestatem uirtutemque caelestem.	For what makes the flesh live does not come from the flesh but is above it. In the same way, what makes a human being live happily does not come from man but is above man. This is true not only of man, but of every heavenly power and virtue as well.

44 The Social War (91–88 BC) was fought between Rome and its Italian allies; the Civil Wars followed, from Marius and Sulla to Octavian.

THE PEACE OF THE PEOPLE ESTRANGED FROM GOD, WHICH THE PEOPLE OF GOD USE FOR GODLINESS WHILE ON PILGRIMAGE IN THIS WORLD

The people of God make use of Babylon's earthly peace and pray for it.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.26	Quocirca ut uita carnis anima est, ita beata uita hominis Deus est, de quo dicunt sacrae litterae Hebraeorum: Beatus populus, cuius est Dominus Deus ipsius. Miser igitur populus ab isto alienatus Deo. Diligit tamen etiam ipse quandam pacem suam non inprobandam, quam quidem non habebit in fine, quia non ea bene utitur ante finem. Hanc autem ut interim habeat in hac uita, etiam nostri interest; quoniam, quamdiu permixtae sunt ambae ciuitates, utimur et nos pace Babylonis; ex qua ita per fidem populus Dei liberatur, ut aput hanc interim peregrinetur.	Therefore, as the soul is the life of the flesh, so God is the happy life of a human being. Of him the sacred writings of the Hebrews say: "Happy the people whose God is the Lord." Wretched, then, is the people estranged from that God. Yet even such a people loves a peace of its own, which is not to be condemned. It will not have that peace at the end, however, because it does not use it well before the end. Still, it is in our interest too that it should have this peace in the meantime, in this life. For as long as the two cities are intermingled, we also make use of the peace of Babylon. The people of God is set free from Babylon by faith, but in such a way that for the present it lives as a pilgrim alongside it.[45]
	Propter quod et apostolus admonuit ecclesiam, ut oraret pro regibus eius adque sublimibus, addens et dicens: Ut quietam et tranquillam uitam agamus cum omni pietate et caritate, et propheta Hieremias, cum populo Dei ueteri praenuntiaret captiuitatem et diuinitus imperaret, ut oboedienter irent in Babyloniam Deo suo etiam ista patientia seruientes monuit et ipse ut oraretur pro illa dicens: Quia in eius est pace pax uestra, utique interim temporalis, quae bonis malisque communis est.	For this reason the apostle also admonished the Church to pray for its kings and those in high places, adding: "that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life in all godliness and love." The prophet Jeremiah foretold captivity to the ancient people of God. By divine command, he told them to go obediently into Babylon, serving their God even by this patience. He too urged that prayer be made for Babylon, saying: "For in its peace is your peace." This is, of course, a temporal peace for the time being, which is common to good and bad alike.[46]

THE PEACE OF THOSE WHO SERVE GOD, WHOSE PERFECT TRANQUILLITY CANNOT BE GRASPED IN THIS TEMPORAL LIFE

Our peace and justice here consist more in forgiveness of sins than in perfect virtue.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.27	Pax autem nostra propria et hic est cum Deo per fidem et in aeternum erit cum illo per speciem. Sed hic siue illa communis siue nostra propria talis est pax, ut solacium miseriae sit potius quam beatitudinis gaudium. Ipsa quoquo nostra iustitia, quamuis uera sit propter uerum boni finem, ad quem refertur, tamen tanta est in hac uita, ut potius remissione peccatorum constet quam perfectione uirtutum. Testis est oratio totius ciuitatis Dei,	Our own peace, however, is with God both here, through faith, and in eternity, when it will be with him through sight. But here, whether it is the common peace or our own, peace is such that it is a solace for misery rather than the joy of happiness. Even our justice, though it is true because of the true end of good to which it is referred, is in this life such that it consists in the forgiveness of sins

45 Psalm 143:15 (144:15 in most English Bibles).
46 1 Timothy 2:2; Jeremiah 29:7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quae peregrinatur in terris. Per omnia quippe membra sua clamat ad Deum: Dimitte nobis debita nostra, sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris. Nec pro eis est efficax haec oratio, quorum fides sine operibus mortua est; sed pro eis, quorum fides per dilectionem operatur.	rather than in the perfection of virtues. The prayer of the whole city of God on pilgrimage on earth is witness to this. For through all its members it cries out to God: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." This prayer is not effective for those whose faith without works is dead. It is effective for those whose faith works through love.[47]
Quia enim Deo quidem subdita, in hac tamen condicione mortali et corpore corruptibili, quod adgrauat animam, non perfecte uitiis imperat ratio, ideo necessaria est iustis talis oratio. Nam profecto quamquam imperetur, nequaquam sine conflictu uitiis imperatur; et utique subrepit aliquid in hoc loco infirmitatis etiam bene confligenti siue hostibus talibus uictis subditisque dominanti, unde si non facili operatione, certe labili locutione aut uolatili cogitatione peccetur. Et ideo, quamdiu uitiis imperatur, plena pax non est, quia et illa, quae resistunt, periculoso debellantur proelio, et illa, quae uicta sunt, nondum securo triumphantur otio, sed adhuc sollicito premuntur imperio. In his ergo tentationibus, de quibus omnibus in diuinis eloquiis breuiter dictum est: Numquid non tentatio est uita humana super terram?	For reason, though subject to God, does not perfectly rule the vices in this mortal condition and in the corruptible body, which weighs down the soul. That is why such a prayer is necessary for the righteous. Certainly, although the vices are ruled, they are by no means ruled without conflict. In this place of weakness, something creeps in even on one who fights well, or on one who has conquered and subdued such enemies and is master over them. So sin is committed, if not by an easy deed, then surely by a slip of the tongue or a fleeting thought. And therefore, as long as the vices are being ruled, there is no full peace. The vices that resist are subdued in perilous battle. The vices that have been conquered are not yet triumphed over in secure repose, but are still held down by an anxious rule. In these temptations, then—all of which are briefly summed up in the divine words, "Is not human life on earth a temptation?"—[48]
quis ita uiuere se praesumat, ut dicere Deo: Dimitte nobis debita nostra necesse non habeat nisi homo elatus? nec uero magnus, sed inflatus ac tumidus, cui per iustitiam resistit, qui gratiam largitur humilibus. Propter quod scriptum est: Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam. Hic itaque in unoquoque iustitia est, ut oboedienti Deus homini, animus corpori, ratio autem uitiis etiam repugnantibus imperet, uel subigendo uel resistendo, adque ut ab ipso Deo petatur et meritorum gratia et uenia delictorum ac de acceptis bonis gratiarum actio persoluatur.	who would presume to live in such a way that he has no need to say to God, "Forgive us our debts," except a man exalted in his own eyes? Such a man is not truly great, but puffed up and swollen. He who bestows grace on the humble justly resists him. That is why it is written: "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble." Here, therefore, justice in each individual consists in this: God rules the obedient human being, the soul rules the body, and reason rules the vices, even when they rebel, either by subduing them or by resisting them. It also consists in seeking from God himself both grace for merits and pardon for sins, and in giving thanks for the good things received.[49]
In illa uero pace finali, quo referenda et cuius adipiscendae causa habenda est ista iustitia, quoniam	That final peace is the goal to which this justice must be referred, and it must be kept in order to 47 Matthew 6:12; James 2:17.

48 Job 7:1.
49 James 4:6; 1 Peter 5:5.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	sanata inmortalitate adque incorruptione natura uitia non habebit nec unicuique nostrum uel ab alio uel a se ipso quippiam repugnabit, non opus erit ut ratio uitiis, quae nulla erunt, imperet; sed imperabit Deus homini, animus corpori, tantaque ibi erit oboediendi suauitas et facilitas, quanta uiuendi regnandique felicitas. Et hoc illic in omnibus adque in singulis aeternum erit aeternumque esse certum erit, et ideo pax beatitudinis huius uel beatitudo pacis huius summum bonum erit.	attain it. In that peace our nature, healed by immortality and incorruption, will have no vices. Nothing will resist any of us, either from another or from ourselves. So there will be no need for reason to rule the vices, since there will be none. Instead, God will rule man, and the soul will rule the body, and the sweetness and ease of obeying there will be as great as the happiness of living and reigning. There this will be eternal in all and in each, and it will be certain that it is eternal. Therefore the peace of this happiness, or the happiness of this peace, will be the supreme good.

TO WHAT END THE WICKED WILL COME

The end of the wicked is the second death, a war without end within themselves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
19.28	Eorum autem, qui non pertinent ad istam ciuitatem Dei, erit e contrario miseria sempiterna, quae mors etiam secunda dicitur, quia nec anima ibi uiuere dicenda est, quae a uita Dei alienata erit, nec corpus, quod aeternis doloribus subiacebit; ac per hoc ideo durior ista secunda mors erit, quia finiri morte non poterit. Sed quoniam sicut miseria beatitudini et mors uitae, ita bellum paci uidetur esse contrarium: merito quaeritur, sicut pax in bonorum finibus praedicata est adque laudata, quod uel quale bellum e contrario in finibus malorum possit intellegi. Verum qui hoc quaerit, adtendat quid in bello noxium perniciosumque sit, et uidebit nihil aliud quam rerum esse inter se aduersitatem adque conflictum.	But for those who do not belong to this city of God there will be, on the contrary, everlasting misery, which is also called the second death. It is called death because neither the soul nor the body can be said to live there. The soul will be estranged from the life of God, and the body will be subject to eternal pains. For this reason that second death will be harsher, because it cannot be ended by death. Misery seems to be the opposite of happiness and death of life, and in the same way war seems to be the opposite of peace. Peace has been proclaimed and praised as the end of goods. So it is fair to ask what war, or what kind of war, can be understood by contrast as the end of evils. Whoever asks this, let him consider what is harmful and destructive in war. He will see that it is nothing other than the opposition and conflict of things with one another.
	Quod igitur bellum grauius et amarius cogitari potest, quam ubi uoluntas sic aduersa est passioni et passio uoluntati, ut nullius earum uictoria tales inimicitiae finiantur, et ubi sic confligit cum ipsa natura corporis uis doloris, ut neutrum alteri cedat?	What war, then, can be imagined more grievous and bitter than one in which the will is so opposed to passion, and passion to the will, that their hostility can be ended by the victory of neither? What could be worse than one in which the force of pain so wars with the very nature of the body that neither yields to the other?
	Hic enim quando contingit iste conflictus, aut dolor uincit et sensum mors adimit, aut natura uincit et dolorem sanitas tollit. Ibi autem et dolor permanet ut adfligat, et natura perdurat ut sentiat; quia utrumque ideo non deficit, ne poena deficiat. Ad hos autem fines bonorum et malorum, illos expetendos, istos cauendos,	For here, when this conflict occurs, either pain wins and death takes away sensation, or nature wins and health removes the pain. But there, pain remains to torment, and nature endures to feel it. Neither fails, so that the punishment may not fail. These are the ends of good and evil, the former to quoniam per iudicium transibunt ad illos boni, ad istos mali: de hoc iudicio, quantum Deus donauerit, in consequenti uolumine disputabo.	be sought, the latter to be avoided. It is through judgment that the good will pass to the former and the bad to the latter. So I will discuss this judgment, so far as God grants, in the following book.

LATIN	ENGLISH

Book XX

The Last Judgment
The two resurrections, the thousand years, Antichrist, and the judgment in Scripture.

THAT ALTHOUGH GOD JUDGES AT ALL TIMES, THIS BOOK IS PROPERLY ABOUT HIS LAST JUDGMENT

God judges always, but this book concerns the last judgment when Christ comes.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.1	De die ultimi iudicii Dei quod ipse donauerit locuturi eumque adserturi aduersus inpios et incredulos tamquam in aedificii fundamento prius ponere testimonia diuina debemus: quibus qui nolunt credere, humanis ratiunculis falsis adque fallacibus contrauenire conantur, ad hoc ut aut aliud significare contendant quod adhibetur testimonium de litteris sacris, aut omnino diuinitus esse dictum negent. Nam nullum existimo esse mortalium, qui cum ea, sicut dicta sunt, intellexerit et a summo ac uero Deo per animas sanctas dicta esse crediderit, non eis cedat adque consentiat, siue id etiam ore fateatur siue aliquo uitio fateri erubescat aut metuat, uel etiam peruicacia simillima insaniae id, quod falsum esse nouit aut credit, etiam contentiosissime defendere moliatur.	I am going to speak, so far as God himself grants, about the day of God's last judgment, and to defend it against the ungodly and the unbelieving. So I must first lay down the divine testimonies, like the foundation of a building. Those who refuse to believe them try to oppose them with petty human arguments that are false and deceptive. They either contend that a testimony brought from the sacred writings means something else, or deny altogether that it was spoken by God. For I do not think there is any mortal who, once he has understood those testimonies as they were spoken and has believed that they were spoken by the supreme and true God through holy souls, would not yield to them and agree. He may also confess this aloud. Or, because of some fault, he may be ashamed or afraid to confess it. Or he may even, with an obstinacy very like madness, strive with the utmost contentiousness to defend what he knows or believes to be false.
	Quod ergo in confessione ac professione tenet omnis ecclesia Dei ueri Christum de caelo esse uenturum ad uiuos ac mortuos iudicandos, hunc diuini iudicii ultimum diem dicimus, id est nouissimum tempus. Nam per quot dies hoc iudicium tendatur, incertum est; sed scripturarum more sanctarum diem poni solere pro tempore nemo, qui illas litteras quamlibet neglegenter legerit, nescit.	The whole Church of the true God holds, in its confession and profession of faith, that Christ will come from heaven to judge the living and the dead. This is what we call the last day of divine judgment, that is, the final time. For over how many days this judgment will extend is uncertain. But no one who has read the holy Scriptures, however carelessly, is unaware that in their usage "day" is regularly put for "time."
	Ideo autem, cum diem iudicii Dei dicimus, addimus ultimum uel nouissimum, quia et nunc iudicat et ab humani generis initio iudicauit dimittens de paradiso et a ligno uitae separans primos homines peccati magni perpetratores; immo etiam quando angelis peccantibus non pepercit, quorum princeps homines a se ipso subuersus inuidendo subuertit, procul dubio iudicauit; nec sine illius alto iustoque iudicio et in hoc aerio caelo et	When we speak of the day of God's judgment, we add "last" or "final" because he judges even now, and has judged from the beginning of the human race. He judged when he expelled the first human beings from paradise and cut them off from the tree of life, as the perpetrators of a great sin. Indeed, when he did not spare the angels who in terris et daemonum et hominum miserrima est uita, erroribus aerumnisque plenissima. Verum etsi nemo peccasset, non sine bono rectoque iudicio uniuersam rationalem creaturam perseuerantissime sibi suo Domino cohaerentem in aeterna beatitudine retineret. Iudicat etiam non solum uniuersaliter de genere daemonum adque hominum, ut miseri sint propter primorum meritum peccatorum; sed etiam de singulorum operibus propriis, quae gerunt arbitrio uoluntatis.

LATIN

Nam et daemones ne torqueantur precantur, nec utique iniuste uel parcitur eis uel pro sua quique inprobitate torquentur; et homines plerumque aperte, semper occulte, luunt pro suis factis diuinitus poenas siue in hac uita siue post mortem: quamuis nullus hominum agat recte, nisi diuino adiuuetur auxilio; nullus daemonum aut hominum agat inique, nisi diuino eodemque iustissimo iudicio permittatur. Sicut enim ait apostolus, non est iniquitas aput Deum; etiam sicut ipse alibi dicit, inscrutabilia sunt iudicia eius et inuestigabiles uiae eius. Non igitur in hoc libro de illis primis nec de istis mediis Dei iudiciis, sed de ipso nouissimo, quantum ipsi tribuerit, disputabo, quando Christus de caelo uenturus est uiuos iudicaturus et mortuos.

Iste quippe dies iudicii proprie iam uocatur, eo quod nullus ibi erit inperitae querellae locus, quur iniustus ille sit felix et quur ille iustus infelix. Omnium namque tunc nonnisi bonorum uera et plena felicitas et omnium nonnisi malorum digna et summa infelicitas apparebit.

ENGLISH

sinned, whose prince, overthrown by himself, overthrew human beings out of envy, he undoubtedly judged. Nor is it without his deep and just judgment that the life of both demons and human beings, in this airy heaven and on earth, is utterly wretched and filled to the brim with errors and hardships. Yet even if no one had sinned, it would not have been without good and right judgment that he would keep the whole rational creation in eternal happiness, clinging with unwavering perseverance to him, its Lord. He judges, moreover, not only universally concerning the race of demons and of humans, that they should be wretched because of what the first sins deserved, but also concerning the individual works of each, which they do by the choice of their will.

For the demons too pray not to be tormented, and it is certainly not unjust either that they are spared or that each of them is tormented for his own wickedness. Human beings, too, pay penalties imposed by God for their deeds, often openly and always secretly, whether in this life or after death. Yet no human being acts rightly unless helped by divine aid, and no demon or human acts wickedly unless permitted by divine judgment, a judgment that is also perfectly just. For, as the apostle says, "There is no injustice with God"; and, as he also says elsewhere, "His judgments are unsearchable and his ways inscrutable." In this book, then, I shall discuss, so far as he grants, neither those first judgments of God nor these intermediate ones, but the very last, when Christ is to come from heaven to judge the living and the dead.[1]

This is the day that is now properly called the day of judgment, because there will be no room then for the ignorant complaint asking why this unjust man is happy and that just man unhappy. For then the true and full happiness of all the good, and only the good, and the deserved and supreme unhappiness of all the wicked, and only the wicked, will be plain to see.

1 Romans 9:14 and Romans 11:33.

THE CHANGEABILITY OF HUMAN AFFAIRS, IN WHICH GOD'S JUDGMENT CANNOT BE SAID TO BE ABSENT, THOUGH IT CANNOT BE TRACED

God's judgments are hidden now, as good and bad fortune fall to good and wicked alike.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.2	Nunc autem et mala aequo animo ferre discimus, quae patiuntur et boni, et bona non magnipendere, quae adipiscuntur et mali; ac per hoc etiam in his rebus, in quibus non apparet diuina iustitia, salutaris est diuina doctrina.	Now, however, we learn to bear with equanimity the evils that good people also suffer, and not to set great value on the goods that wicked people also obtain. And so, even in matters where divine justice is not evident, divine teaching brings salvation.
	Nescimus enim quo iudicio Dei bonus ille sit pauper, malus ille sit diues; iste gaudeat, quem pro suis perditis moribus cruciari debuisse maeroribus arbitramur, contristetur ille, quem uita laudabilis gaudere debuisse persuadet; exeat de iudicio non solum inultus, uerum etiam damnatus innocens, aut iniquitate iudicis pressus aut falsis obrutus testimoniis, e contrario scelestus aduersarius eius non solum inpunitus, uerum etiam uindicatus insultet; inpius optime ualeat, pius languore tabescat; latrocinentur sanissimi iuuenes, et qui nec uerbo quemquam laedere potuerunt, diuersa morborum atrocitate adfligantur infantes; utilis rebus humanis inmatura morte rapiatur, et qui uidetur nec nasci debuisse, diutissime insuper uiuat; plenus criminibus sublimetur honoribus, et hominem sine querella tenebrae ignobilitatis abscondant, et cetera huius modi, quae quis colligit, quis enumerat?	For we do not know by what judgment of God this good man is poor while that wicked man is rich. We do not know why this man is joyful, though we think he ought to have been tormented with sorrows for his depraved conduct, while that man is sad, though his praiseworthy life convinces us he ought to have been joyful. We do not know why an innocent man leaves the court not only unavenged but even condemned, crushed by the injustice of the judge or overwhelmed by false testimony, while his criminal opponent exults not only unpunished but even vindicated. Nor do we know why the ungodly man enjoys excellent health while the godly man wastes away in sickness. The healthiest young men turn to robbery, while infants, who could not hurt anyone even with a word, are afflicted by all kinds of cruel diseases. A person useful to human affairs is snatched away by an untimely death, while one who seems never to have deserved to be born lives on, and for a very long time besides. A man steeped in crimes is raised high in honors, while the darkness of obscurity hides a blameless man. And so on. Who could collect all such things? Who could count them?
	Quae si haberent in ipsa uelut absurditate constantiam, ut in hac uita, in qua homo, sicut sacer psalmus eloquitur, uanitati similis factus est et dies eius uelut umbra praetereunt, nonnisi mali adipiscerentur transitoria bona ista adque terrena, nec nisi boni talia paterentur mala: posset hoc referri ad iudicium iustum Dei siue etiam benignum, ut, qui non erant adsecuturi bona aeterna, quae faciunt beatos, temporalibus uel deciperentur pro malitia sua, uel pro Dei misericordia consolarentur bonis, et qui non erant passuri aeterna tormenta, temporalibus uel pro suis quibuscumque et quantuliscumque peccatis adfligerentur, uel propter inplendas uirtutes exercerentur malis.	Suppose these things were at least consistent in their very absurdity, so to speak. Suppose that in this life, in which, as the sacred psalm declares, "man has become like vanity, and his days pass away like a shadow," only the wicked obtained these transitory and earthly goods, and only the good suffered such evils. Then this could be referred to God's just, or even kindly, judgment. Those who were not going to attain the eternal goods that make people happy would be either deceived by temporal goods because of their wickedness, or consoled by them because of God's mercy. And those who were not going to suffer eternal

LATIN	ENGLISH
	torments would be either afflicted by temporal evils for their sins, whatever they were and however small, or trained by those evils so that their virtues might be brought to perfection.[2]
Nunc uero, quando non solum in malo sunt boni et in bono mali, quod uidetur iniustum, uerum etiam plerumque et malis mala eueniunt et bonis bona proueniunt: magis inscrutabilia fiunt iudicia Dei et inuestigabiles uiae eius. Quamuis ergo nesciamus quo iudicio Deus ista uel faciat uel fieri sinat, aput quem summa uirtus est et summa sapientia, summa iustitia, nulla infirmitas, nulla temeritas, nulla iniquitas: salubriter tamen discimus non magnipendere seu bona seu mala, quae uidemus esse bonis malisque communia, et illa bona quaerere, quae bonorum, adque illa mala maxime fugere, quae propria sunt malorum.	As it is, however, not only are the good in evil circumstances and the wicked in good ones, which seems unjust, but often evil things also befall the wicked and good things come to the good. So God's judgments become all the more unsearchable and his ways inscrutable. We do not know, then, by what judgment God does these things or allows them to be done—God, in whom there is supreme power, supreme wisdom and supreme justice, no weakness, no rashness and no injustice. Nevertheless, we learn to our salvation not to set great value on the goods or the evils that we see to be common to good and wicked alike. We learn to seek those goods that belong to the good, and above all to flee those evils that are proper to the wicked.
Cum uero ad illud Dei iudicium uenerimus, cuius tempus iam proprie dies iudicii et aliquando dies Domini nuncupatur: non solum quaecumque tunc iudicabuntur, uerum etiam quaecumque ab initio iudicata et quaecumque usque ad illud tempus adhuc iudicanda sunt, apparebunt esse iustissima. Ubi hoc quoque manifestabitur, quam iusto iudicio Dei fiat, ut nunc tam multa ac paene omnia iusta iudicia Dei lateant sensus mentesque mortalium, cum tamen in hac re piorum fidem non lateat, iustum esse quod latet.	But when we come to that judgment of God, whose time is now properly called the day of judgment, and sometimes the day of the Lord, all things will be seen to be perfectly just. This will hold not only for whatever will be judged then, but also for whatever has been judged from the beginning and whatever is still to be judged until that time. Then it will also become clear how just is the judgment of God by which so many—indeed almost all—of God's just judgments are now hidden from the senses and minds of mortals. Yet in this matter it is not hidden from the faith of the godly that what is hidden is just.

WHAT SOLOMON ARGUED IN THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES ABOUT THE THINGS COMMON TO THE GOOD AND THE WICKED IN THIS LIFE

Ecclesiastes laments that the same things happen to the just and the unjust under the sun.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.3 Nempe Salomon, sapientissimus rex Israel, qui regnauit in Hierusalem, librum, qui uocatur ecclesiastes et a Iudaeis quoque habetur in sacrarum canone litterarum, sic exorsus est: Vanitas uanitantium, dixit ecclesiastes; uanitas uanitantium, omnia uanitas. Quae abundantia homini in omni labore suo, quo laborat sub sole? Et cum ex hac sententia conecteret cetera, commemorans aerumnas erroresque uitae huius et uanescentes interea	Indeed Solomon, the wisest king of Israel, who reigned in Jerusalem, began the book called Ecclesiastes, which the Jews too include in the canon of sacred writings, with these words: "Vanity of the vain, said the Preacher; vanity of the vain, all is vanity. What does a man gain from all the labor at which he labors under the sun?" Linking the rest to this statement, he recalls the hardships and er-

2 Psalm 143:4 (144:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

temporum lapsus, ubi nihil solidum, nihil stabile retinetur: in ea rerum uanitate sub sole illud etiam deplorat quodam, modo, quod, cum sit abundantia sapientiae super insipientiam, sicut abundantia lucis super tenebras, sapientisque oculi sint in capite ipsius et stultus in tenebris ambulet, unus tamen incursus incurrat omnibus, utique in hac uita quae sub sole agitur, significans uidelicet ea mala, quae bonis et malis uidemus esse communia.

Dicit etiam illud, quod et boni patiantur mala, tamquam mali sint, et mali, tamquam boni sint, adipiscantur bona, ita loquens: Est, inquit, uanitas, quae facta est super terram, quia sunt iusti, super quos uenit sicut factum inpiorum, et sunt inpii super quos uenit sicut factum iustorum. Dixi quoniam hoc quoque uanitas. In hac uanitate, cui quantum satis uisum est intimandae totum istum librum uir sapientissimus deputauit (non utique ob aliud, nisi ut eam uitam desideremus, quae uanitatem non habet sub hoc sole, sed ueritatem sub illo qui fecit hunc solem), — in hac ergo uanitate numquid nisi iusto Dei rectoque iudicio similis eidem uanitati factus uanesceret homo?

In diebus tamen uanitatis suae interest plurimum, utrum resistat an obtemperet ueritati, et utrum sit expers uerae pietatis an particeps; non propter uitae huius uel bona adquirenda uel mala uitanda uanescendo transeuntia, sed propter futurum iudicium, per quod erunt et bonis bona et malis mala sine fine mansura. Denique iste sapiens hunc librum sic conclusit, ut diceret: Deum time et mandata eius custodi, quia hoc est omnis homo; quia omne hoc opus Deus adducet in iudicium in omni despecto, siue bonum siue malum. Quid breuius, uerius, salubrius dici potuit? Deum, inquit, time et mandata eius custodi, quia hoc est omnis homo.

Quicumque enim est, hoc est, custos utique mandatorum Dei; quoniam qui hoc non est, nihil est; non enim ad

ENGLISH

rors of this life and the vanishing flow of time, in which nothing solid and nothing stable is retained. Amid this vanity of things under the sun he also laments, in a way, that although wisdom excels folly as light excels darkness, and the wise man's eyes are in his head while the fool walks in darkness, yet one and the same fate befalls all—in this life, that is, which is lived under the sun. He means, of course, those evils that we see to be common to good and wicked alike.[3]

He also says that the good suffer evils as though they were wicked, and the wicked obtain goods as though they were good. These are his words: "There is a vanity that is done on the earth: there are righteous people to whom it happens as though they had done the deeds of the ungodly, and there are ungodly people to whom it happens as though they had done the deeds of the righteous. I said that this too is vanity." This wise man devoted his whole book to bringing home this vanity, as far as he thought sufficient. Surely he did so for no other reason than that we should long for that life which has no vanity under this sun, but has truth under him who made this sun. In this vanity, then, would man, made like that very vanity, vanish away except by God's just and right judgment?[4]

Yet in the days of his vanity it makes a very great difference whether he resists the truth or obeys it, and whether he lacks true godliness or shares in it. This matters not for the sake of acquiring the goods or avoiding the evils of this life, which pass away and vanish, but for the sake of the coming judgment. Through that judgment good things will remain for the good, and evil things for the wicked, without end. Finally, this wise man concluded his book by saying: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is every man; for God will bring every work into judgment, in every one who is despised, whether good or evil." What could be said more briefly, more truly or more wholesomely? "Fear God," he says, "and keep his commandments, for this is every man."[5]

For whoever truly exists is this, namely a keeper of God's commandments; whoever is not this is noth-

3 Ecclesiastes 1:2–3 and 2:13–14. "Ecclesiastes" is Greek for "the Preacher," one who addresses an assembly.
4 Ecclesiastes 8:14.
5 Ecclesiastes 12:13–14. Augustine's Latin Bible differs here from modern versions.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ueritatis imaginem reformatur, remanens in similitudine uanitatis. Quia omne hoc opus, id est, quod ab homine fit in hac uita, siue bonum siue malum, Deus adducet in iudicium in omni despecto, id est in omni etiam qui contemtibilis hic uidetur et ideo nec uidetur; quoniam Deus et ipsum uidet nec eum despicit nec cum iudicat praeterit.	ing. Such a person is not re-formed in the image of truth, but remains in the likeness of vanity. "For God will bring every work"—that is, whatever a person does in this life—"whether good or evil, into judgment, in every one who is despised." That means even in every one who seems contemptible here and is therefore not even seen. For God sees him too. God does not despise him, and does not pass him over when he judges.

THAT IN DISCUSSING GOD'S LAST JUDGMENT HE WILL FIRST BRING FORWARD TESTIMONIES FROM THE NEW TESTAMENT AND THEN FROM THE OLD

Augustine will cite the New Testament first, then the Old.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.4	Huius itaque ultimi iudicii Dei testimonia de scripturis sanctis, quae ponere institui, prius eligenda sunt de libris instrumenti noui, postea de ueteris. Quamuis enim uetera priora sint tempore, noua tamen anteponenda sunt dignitate, quoniam illa uetera praeconia sunt nouorum. Noua igitur ponentur prius, quae ut firmius probemus, adsumentur et uetera. In ueteribus habentur lex et prophetae, in nouis euangelium et apostolicae litterae. Ait autem apostolus: Per legem enim cognitio peccati. Nunc autem sine lege iustitia Dei manifestata est, testificata per legem et prophetas; iustitia autem Dei per fidem Iesu Christi in omnes qui credunt. Haec iustitia Dei ad nouum pertinet testamentum et testimonium habet a ueteribus libris, hoc est lege ac prophetis. Prius igitur ipsa causa ponenda est, et postea testes introducendi.	I have undertaken to set out testimonies from the holy Scriptures concerning this last judgment of God. They should be chosen first from the books of the New Testament, and afterward from the Old. For though the old books come first in time, the new are to be placed first in dignity, since the old are heralds of the new. So the new will be set out first, and the old will be brought in to prove them more firmly. In the old are the Law and the Prophets; in the new, the Gospel and the apostolic letters. Now the apostle says: "For through the law comes knowledge of sin. But now, apart from the law, the righteousness of God has been made manifest, attested by the law and the prophets—the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ, for all who believe." This righteousness of God belongs to the New Testament and receives its testimony from the old books, that is, from the Law and the Prophets. So the case itself must be stated first, and the witnesses brought in afterward.[6]
	Hunc et ipse Christus Iesus ordinem seruandum esse demonstrans: Scriba, inquit, eruditus in regno Dei similis est uiro patri familias proferenti de thesauro suo noua et uetera. Non dixit: Vetera et noua, quod utique dixisset, nisi maluisset meritorum ordinem seruare quam temporum.	Christ Jesus himself shows that this order should be kept when he says: "A scribe instructed in the kingdom of God is like a householder who brings out of his treasure things new and old." He did not say "old and new," as he certainly would have done had he not preferred to keep the order of merit rather than the order of time.[7]

6 Romans 3:20–22.
7 Matthew 13:52.

THE SAYINGS BY WHICH THE LORD AND SAVIOR DECLARES THAT A DIVINE JUDGMENT WILL COME AT THE END OF THE WORLD

Gospel sayings of Jesus foretell a judgment that will come with the resurrection of the dead.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.5	Ergo ipse Saluator cum obiurgaret ciuitates, in quibus uirtutes magnas fecerat neque crediderant, et eis alienigenas anteponeret: Verum tamen, inquit, dico uobis, Tyro et Sidoni remissius erit in die iudicii quam uobis; et paulo post alteri ciuitati: Amen, inquit, dico uobis, quia terrae Sodomorum remissius erit in die iudicii quam tibi (hic euidentissime praedicat diem iudicii esse uenturum); et alio loco: Viri Nineuitae, inquit, surgent in iudicio cum generatione ista et condemnabunt eam; quia paenitentiam egerunt in praedicatione Ionae, et ecce plus quam Iona hic. Regina Austri surget in iudicio cum generatione ista et condemnabit eam; quia uenit a finibus terrae audire sapientiam Salomonis, et ecce plus quam Salomon hic. Duas res hoc loco discimus, et uenturum esse iudicium et cum mortuorum resurrectione uenturum.	So the Savior himself rebuked the cities in which he had done great miracles and which had not believed, and he ranked foreigners above them. "But I tell you," he says, "it will be more bearable for Tyre and Sidon on the day of judgment than for you." A little later he says to another city: "Truly I tell you, it will be more bearable for the land of Sodom on the day of judgment than for you." Here he proclaims most clearly that a day of judgment is to come. And in another place he says: "The men of Nineveh will rise up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and look, something greater than Jonah is here. The queen of the South will rise up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, because she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and look, something greater than Solomon is here." In this passage we learn two things: that a judgment is coming, and that it will come together with the resurrection of the dead.[8]
	De Nineuitis enim et regina Austri quando ista dicebat, de mortuis sine dubio loquebatur, quos tamen in die iudicii resurrecturos esse praedixit. Nec ideo dixit: Condemnabunt, quia ipsi iudicabunt; sed quia ex ipsorum conparatione isti merito damnabuntur.	For when he said this about the Ninevites and the queen of the South, he was undoubtedly speaking of the dead. Yet he foretold that they would rise again on the day of judgment. He said "will condemn" not because they will themselves be judges, but because by comparison with them these people will rightly be condemned.
	Rursus alio loco, cum de hominum bonorum et malorum nunc permixtione, postea separatione, quae utique die iudicii futura est, loqueretur, adhibuit similitudinem de tritico seminato et superseminatis zizaniis, eamque suis exponens discipulis: Qui seminat, inquit, bonum semen, est filius hominis; ager autem est mundus: bonum uero semen hi sunt filii regni; zizania autem filii sunt nequam; inimicus autem, qui seminauit ea, est diabolus; messis uero consummatio saeculi est, messores autem angeli sunt. Sicut ergo colliguntur zizania et igni comburuntur: sic erit in consummatione saeculi. Mittet filius hominis angelos suos, et colligunt de regno eius omnia scandala et eos, qui faciunt iniquitatem, et mittunt eos in caminum	Again, in another place, he spoke of the present mingling of good and wicked people and of their later separation, which will certainly take place on the day of judgment. He used the comparison of the wheat that was sown and the weeds sown over it, and he explained it to his disciples: "The one who sows the good seed is the Son of Man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; the weeds are the children of the evil one; the enemy who sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels. Just as the weeds are gathered and burned in the fire, so it will be at the end of the world. The Son of Man will send his angels,

8 Matthew 11:22, 24 and 12:41–42.

LATIN

ignis; ibi erit fletus et stridor dentium. Tunc iusti fulgebunt sicut sol in regno patris eorum.

Qui habet aures, audiat. Hic iudicium quidem uel diem iudicii non nominauit, sed eum multo clarius ipsis rebus expressit et in fine saeculi futurum esse praedixit.

Item discipulis suis: Amen, inquit, dico uobis, quod uos, qui secuti estis me, in regeneratione, cum sederit filius hominis in sede maiestatis suae, sedebitis et uos super sedes duodecim iudicantes duodecim tribus Israel. Hic discimus cum suis discipulis iudicaturum Iesum. Unde et alibi Iudaeis dixit: Si ego in Beelzebub eicio daemonia, filii uestri in quo eiciunt? Ideo ipsi iudices erunt uestri. Nec quoniam super duodecim sedes sessuros esse ait, duodecim solos homines cum illo iudicaturos putare debemus.

Duodenario quippe, numero uniuersa quaedam significata est iudicantium multitudo propter duas partes numeri septenarii, quo significatur plerumque uniuersitas; quae duae partes, id est tria et quattuor, altera per alteram multiplicatae duodecim faciunt, nam et quattuor ter et tria quater duodecim sunt, et si qua alia huius duodenarii numeri, quae ad hoc ualeat, ratio reperitur. Alioquin, quoniam in locum Iudae traditoris apostolum Matthiam legimus ordinatum, apostolus Paulus, qui plus omnibus illis laborauit, ubi ad iudicandum sedeat non habebit; qui profecto cum aliis sanctis ad numerum iudicum se pertinere demonstrat, cum dicit: Nescitis quia angelos iudicabimus? De ipsis quoque iudicandis in hoc numero duodenario similis causa est.

Non enim quia dictum est: Iudicantes duodecim tribus Israel, tribus Leui, quae tertia decima est, ab eis iudicanda non erit, aut solum illum populum, non etiam gentes cet.eras iudicabunt. Quod autem ait: In regeneratione, procul dubio mortuorum resurrectionem nomine uoluit regenerationis intellegi. Sic enim caro and they will gather out of his kingdom all causes of stumbling and those who do iniquity, and throw them into the furnace of fire; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father."[9]

ENGLISH

"Whoever has ears, let him hear." Here he did not name the judgment or the day of judgment. Yet he expressed it much more clearly through the very events he described, and he foretold that it would come at the end of the world.

Again, he said to his disciples: "Truly I tell you that you who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man sits on the throne of his majesty, you too will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Here we learn that Jesus will judge together with his disciples. Hence he also said to the Jews elsewhere: "If I cast out demons by Beelzebub, by whom do your sons cast them out? Therefore they will be your judges." He says they will sit on twelve thrones, but that is no reason to think that only twelve men will judge with him.[10]

For the number twelve signifies the entire multitude of those who will judge. This is because of the two parts of the number seven, which commonly signifies totality. Those two parts, three and four, multiplied by each other make twelve, for four times three and three times four are both twelve. There may also be some other explanation of this number twelve that serves the purpose. Otherwise, since we read that the apostle Matthias was ordained in place of Judas the traitor, the apostle Paul, who labored more than all of them, would have nowhere to sit in judgment. Yet he plainly shows that he belongs, with the other saints, to the number of the judges when he says: "Do you not know that we shall judge angels?" The same reasoning applies to the number twelve as regards those who are to be judged.[11]

For the words "judging the twelve tribes of Israel" do not mean that the tribe of Levi, which is the thirteenth, will not be judged by them. Nor do they mean that the disciples will judge only that people and not the other nations as well. And when he says "in the regeneration," he un-

9 Matthew 13:37–43.
10 Matthew 19:28 and 12:27.
11 1 Corinthians 6:3.

LATIN

nostra regenerabitur per incorruptionem, quem ad modum est anima nostra regenerata per fidem.-

Multa praetereo, quae de ultimo iudicio ita dici uidentur, ut diligenter considerata reperiantur ambigua uel magis ad aliud pertinentia, siue scilicet ad eum Saluatoris aduentum, quo per totum hoc tempus in ecclesia sua uenit, hoc est in membris suis, particulatim adque paulatim, quoniam tota corpus est eius; siue ad excidium terrenae Hierusalem; quia et de illo cum loquitur, plerumque sic loquitur, tamquam de fine saeculi adque illo die iudicii nouissimo et magno loquatur; ita ut dignosci non possit omnino, nisi ea, quae aput tres euangelistas Matthaeum, Marcum et Lucam de hac re similiter dicta sunt, inter se omnia conferantur. Quaedam quippe alter obscurius, alter explicat planius, ut ea, quae ad unam rem pertinentia dicuntur, appareat unde dicantur.

Quod facere utcumque curaui in quadam epistula, quam rescripsi ad beatae memoriae uirum Hesychium, Salonitanae urbis episcopum, cuius epistulae titulus est: De fine saeculi.

Proinde iam illud hic dicam, quod in euangelio secundum Matthaeum de separatione bonorum et malorum legitur per iudicium praesentissimum adque nouissimum Christi. Cum autem uenerit, inquit, filius hominis in maiestate sua, et omnes angeli cum eo, tunc sedebit super sedem maiestatis suae, et congregabuntur ante eum omnes gentes, et separabit eos ab inuicem, sicut pastor segregat oues ab haedis, et statuet oues quidem a dextris suis, haedos autem a sinistris. Tunc dicet rex his, qui a dextris eius erunt: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum a constitutione mundi. Esuriui enim, et dedistis mihi manducare; sitiui, et dedistis mihi bibere; hospes eram, et collegistis me; nudus, et operuistis me; in carcere eram, et uenistis ad me.

ENGLISH

doubtedly meant the resurrection of the dead to be understood by the word "regeneration." For our flesh will be regenerated through incorruption, just as our soul has been regenerated through faith.

I pass over many sayings that seem to speak of the last judgment but which, on careful examination, prove to be ambiguous or to refer rather to something else. Some refer to the coming of the Savior by which, throughout this whole time, he comes in his Church, that is, in his members, part by part and little by little, since the whole Church is his body. Others refer to the destruction of the earthly Jerusalem. For when he speaks of that event too, he often speaks as though he were speaking of the end of the world and that last and great day of judgment. As a result, the two cannot be distinguished at all unless all the similar sayings on this subject in the three evangelists, Matthew, Mark and Luke, are compared with one another. For one evangelist sets out certain things more obscurely and another more plainly, so that it becomes clear what the sayings about a single subject actually refer to.[12]

I have tried to do this, after a fashion, in a letter I wrote in reply to Hesychius of blessed memory, bishop of the city of Salona. The title of that letter is On the End of the World.[13]

So here I shall cite only what we read in the Gospel according to Matthew about the separation of the good from the wicked through Christ's most manifest and final judgment. "When the Son of Man comes in his majesty," he says, "and all the angels with him, then he will sit on the throne of his majesty, and all the nations will be gathered before him. He will separate them from one another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats, and he will put the sheep at his right hand and the goats at his left. Then the king will say to those at his right hand: 'Come, you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave me food; I was thirsty, and you gave me drink; I was a stranger, and you took 12 The destruction of Jerusalem and its temple by the Romans in AD 70.

13 Hesychius was bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, near modern Split in Croatia. Augustine's reply is his Letter 199.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	me in; naked, and you clothed me; I was in prison, and you came to me.'"[14]
Tunc respondebunt ei iusti dicentes: Domine, quando te uidimus esurientem, et pauimus; sitientem, et dedimus potum? Quando autem te uidimus hospitem, et collegimus te; aut nudum, et cooperuimus te? Aut quando te uidimus infirmum aut in carcere, et uenimus ad te? Et respondens rex dicet illis: Amen dico uobis, quamdiu fecistis uni de his fratribus meis minimis, mihi fecistis. Tunc dicet, inquit, et his qui a sinistris erunt: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis eius. Deinde similiter etiam his enumerat, quod illa non fecerint, quae dextros fecisse memorauit.	"Then the righteous will answer him, saying: 'Lord, when did we see you hungry and feed you, or thirsty and give you drink? When did we see you a stranger and take you in, or naked and clothe you? Or when did we see you sick or in prison and come to you?' And the king will answer them: 'Truly I tell you, inasmuch as you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me.'" "Then," he says, "he will also say to those at his left: 'Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels.'" Then in the same way he lists for them too that they failed to do the very things he had said those on his right had done.
Similiterque interrogantibus, quando eum uiderint in horum indigentia constitutum: quod minimis suis non factum est, sibi factum non fuisse respondet; sermonemque concludens: Et ibunt, inquit, hi in supplicium aeternum, iusti autem in uitam aeternam. Iohannes uero euangelista apertissime narrat eum in resurrectione mortuorum futurum praedixisse iudicium. Cum enim dixisset: Neque enim Pater iudicat quemquam, sed iudicium omne dedit Filio, ut omnes honorificent Filium, sicut honorificant Patrem; qui non honorificat Filium, non honorificat Patrem, qui misit illum: protinus addidit: Amen, amen dico uobis, quia, qui uerbum meum audit et credit ei qui misit me, habet uitam aeternam, et in iudicium non uenit, sed transiit a morte in uitam. Ecce hic dixit fideles suos in iudicium non uenire.	Likewise, when they ask when they saw him in such need, he answers that what was not done to his least ones was not done to him. He concludes his discourse with the words: "And these will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." The evangelist John, for his part, relates most plainly that Jesus foretold the judgment would take place at the resurrection of the dead. For after saying: "The Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son, so that all may honor the Son as they honor the Father; whoever does not honor the Son does not honor the Father who sent him," he immediately added: "Truly, truly I tell you, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life, and does not come into judgment, but has passed from death to life." Notice that here he said that his faithful do not come into judgment.[15]
Quo modo ergo per iudicium separabuntur a malis et ad eius dexteram stabunt, nisi quia hoc loco iudicium pro damnatione posuit? In tale quippe iudicium non uenient, qui audiunt uerbum eius et credunt ei, qui misit illum.	How, then, will they be separated from the wicked through the judgment and stand at his right hand, unless in this passage he used "judgment" to mean "condemnation"? Into that kind of judgment, certainly, those who hear his word and believe him who sent him will not come.

WHAT THE FIRST RESURRECTION IS, AND WHAT THE SECOND

The first resurrection is of souls, now; the second, of bodies, at the end.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.6 Deinde adiungit et dicit: Amen, amen dico uobis, quia uenit hora et nunc est, quando mortui audient uocem filii	Then he goes on to say: "Truly, truly, I tell you, the hour is coming and now is, when the dead will

LATIN

Dei, et qui audierint uiuent. Sicut enim Pater habet uitam in semet ipso, sic dedit et Filio habere uitam in semet ipso. Nondum de secunda resurrectione, id est corporum, loquitur, quae in fine futura est, sed de prima, quae nunc est. Hanc quippe ut distingueret, ait: Venit hora, et nunc est. Non autem ista corporum, sed animarum est. Habent enim et animae mortem suam in inpietate adque peccatis, secundum quam mortem mortui sunt, de quibus idem Dominus ait: Sine mortuos sepelire mortuos suos; ut scilicet in anima mortui in corpore mortuos sepelirent.

Propter istos ergo inpietate et iniquitate in anima mortuos: Venit, inquit, hora, et nunc est, quando mortui audient uocem filii Dei; et qui audierint, uiuent. Qui audierint dixit qui oboedierint, qui crediderint et usque in finem perseuerauerint Nec fecit hic ullam differentiam bonorum et malorum. Omnibus enim bonum est audire uocem eius et uiuere ad uitam pietatis ex inpietatis morte transeundo. De qua morte ait apostolus Paulus: Ergo omnes mortui sunt, et pro omnibus mortuus est, ut qui uiuunt iam non sibi uiuant, sed ei, qui pro ipsis mortuus est et resurrexit.

Omnes itaque mortui sunt in peccatis, nemine prorsus excepto, siue originalibus siue etiam uoluntate additis, uel ignorando uel sciendo nec faciendo quod iustum est; et pro omnibus mortuis uiuus mortuus est unus, id est nullum habens omnino peccatum; ut, qui per remissionem peccatorum uiuunt, iam non sibi uiuant, sed ei, qui pro omnibus mortuus est propter peccata nostra et resurrexit propter iustificationem nostram, ut credentes in eum, qui iustificat inpium, ex inpietate iustificati, tamquam ex morte uiuificati, ad primam resurrectionem, quae nunc est, pertinere possimus. Ad hanc enim primam non pertinent, nisi qui beati erunt in aeternum; ad secundam uero, de qua mox locuturus est, et beatos pertinere docebit et miseros. Ista est misericordiae, illa iudicii.

ENGLISH

hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live. For as the Father has life in himself, so he has also granted the Son to have life in himself." He is not yet speaking of the second resurrection, the resurrection of bodies, which will take place at the end. He is speaking of the first, which is now. It was precisely to distinguish this one that he says: "The hour is coming, and now is." This resurrection is not of bodies but of souls. For souls too have their own death, in ungodliness and sins. It is by this death that those people are dead of whom the same Lord says: "Let the dead bury their own dead"—meaning, of course, that those dead in soul should bury those dead in body.[16]

It is with reference to these, then, who are dead in soul through ungodliness and wickedness, that he says: "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live." By "those who hear" he meant those who obey, who believe, and who persevere to the end. Nor did he make any distinction here between good and bad. For it is good for everyone to hear his voice and to live, passing from the death of ungodliness to the life of godliness. Of this death the apostle Paul says: "Therefore all have died, and he died for all, so that those who live might no longer live for themselves, but for him who died for them and rose again."[17]

So all have died in sins, with absolutely no one excepted. These may be original sins or sins added by their own will, whether through ignorance or through knowing what is right and not doing it. And for all the dead one living man died, that is, one who had no sin whatever. He died so that those who live through the forgiveness of sins might no longer live for themselves, but for him who died for all because of our sins and rose again for our justification. Then, believing in him who justifies the ungodly, and justified from ungodliness as though brought to life from death, we may belong to the first resurrection, which is now. For only those who will be happy forever belong to this first resurrection. But he will teach that both the happy and the wretched belong to the second,

15 John 5:22–24.
14 Matthew 25:31–46.
16 John 5:25–26; Matthew 8:22.
17 2 Corinthians 5:14–15.

LATIN

Propter quod in psalmo scriptum est: Misericordiam et iudicium cantabo tibi, Domine.

De quo iudicio consequenter adiunxit adque ait: Et potestatem dedit ei iudicium facere, quia filius hominis est. Hic ostendit, quod in ea carne ueniet iudicaturus, in qua uenerat iudicandus. Ad hoc enim ait: Quoniam filius hominis est. Ac deinde subiungens unde agimus: Nolite, inquit, mirari hoc, quia ueniet hora, in qua omnes, qui in monumentis sunt, audient uocem eius et procedent, qui bona fecerunt, in resurrectionem uitae; qui uero mala egerunt, in resurrectionem iudicii.

Hoc est illud iudicium, quod paulo ante, sicut nunc, pro damnatione posuerat dicens: Qui uerbum meum audit et credit ei qui misit me, habet uitam aeternam et in iudicium non uenit, sed transiit a morte in uitam, id est, pertinendo ad primam resurrectionem, qua nunc transitur a morte ad uitam, in damnationem non ueniet, quam significauit appellatione iudicii, sicut etiam hoc loco, ubi ait: Qui mala egerunt, in resurrectionem iudicii, id est damnationis. Resurgat ergo in prima, qui non uult in secunda resurrectione damnari.

Venit enim hora, et nunc est, quando mortui audient uocem filii Dei, et qui audierint, uiuent, id est, in damnationem non uenient, quae secunda mors dicitur: in quam mortem post secundam, quae corporum futura est, resurrectionem praecipitabuntur, qui in prima, quae animarum est, non resurgunt. Veniet enim hora (ubi non ait: Et nunc est, quia in fine erit saeculi, hoc est in ultimo et maximo iudicio Dei), quando omnes, qui in monumentis sunt, audient uocem eius et procedent. Non dixit quem ad modum in prima: Et qui audierint, uiuent. Non enim omnes uiuent, ea uita scilicet, quae, quoniam beata est, sola uita dicenda est. Nam utique non sine qualicumque uita possent audire et de monumentis resurgente carne procedere.

ENGLISH

of which he is about to speak. The one is the resurrection of mercy, the other of judgment.[18]

That is why it is written in the psalm: "Of mercy and judgment I will sing to you, O Lord."[19]

Of this judgment he next added: "And he has given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man." Here he shows that he will come to judge in the same flesh in which he had come to be judged. That is why he says: "because he is the Son of Man." Then he adds the point we are dealing with: "Do not marvel at this, for the hour will come in which all who are in the tombs will hear his voice and come forth—those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment."[20]

This is the judgment that he had used a little earlier, as he does now, in the sense of condemnation. He said then: "Whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and does not come into judgment, but has passed from death to life." That is, by belonging to the first resurrection, by which one now passes from death to life, he will not come into condemnation. Condemnation is what he signified by the word "judgment," just as he does in this passage too, where he says: "those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment"—that is, of condemnation. Whoever does not wish to be condemned in the second resurrection, then, should rise in the first.[21]

For "the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live." That is, they will not come into condemnation, which is called the second death. Those who do not rise in the first resurrection, the resurrection of souls, will be hurled into that death after the second resurrection, the resurrection of bodies, which is still to come. For "the hour will come" (here he does not say "and now is," because it will be at the end of the world, that is, at God's last and greatest judgment) "when all who are in the tombs will hear his voice and come forth." He did not say, as he did of the first, "and those who hear will live." For not all will live—not, that is, with the life which alone de-

18 Romans 4:25 and 4:5.
19 Psalm 100:1 (101:1 in most English Bibles).
20 John 5:27–29.
21 John 5:24.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	serves to be called life, because it is happy. Certainly they could not hear and come forth from the tombs, as their flesh rises, without some sort of life.
Quare autem non omnes uiuent, in eo quod sequitur docet; qui bona, inquit, fecerunt, in resurrectionem uitae, hi sunt qui uiuent; qui uero mala egerunt, in resurrectionem iudicii, hi sunt qui non uiuent, quia secunda morte morientur. Mala quippe egerunt, quoniam male uixerunt; male autem uixerunt, quia in prima, quae nunc est, animarum resurrectione non reuixerunt aut in eo, quod reuixerant, non in finem usque manserunt.	He teaches in what follows why not all will live. "Those who have done good," he says, "to the resurrection of life"—these are the ones who will live. "But those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment"—these are the ones who will not live, because they will die the second death. They have done evil because they lived evil lives. And they lived evil lives because they did not come back to life in the first resurrection, the resurrection of souls, which is now, or else they did not remain to the end in the life to which they had come back.
Sicut ergo duae sunt regenerationes, de quibus iam supra locutus sum, una secundum fidem, quae nunc fit per baptismum; alia secundum carnem, quae fit in eius incorruptione adque inmortalitate per iudicium magnum adque nouissimum: ita sunt et resurrectiones duae, una prima, quae et nunc est et animarum est, quae uenire non permittit in mortem secundam; alia secunda, quae non nunc, sed in saeculi fine futura est, nec animarum, sed corporum est, quae per ultimum iudicium alios mittet in secundam mortem, alios in eam uitam, quae non habet mortem.	There are two regenerations, then, of which I have already spoken above. One is according to faith, and takes place now through baptism. The other is according to the flesh, and will take place in the flesh's incorruption and immortality through the great and final judgment. In the same way there are also two resurrections. The first is both now and of souls, and it does not allow us to come into the second death. The second is not now but will come at the end of the world. It is not of souls but of bodies, and through the last judgment it will send some into the second death and others into that life which has no death.

WHAT IS WRITTEN IN THE REVELATION OF JOHN ABOUT THE TWO RESURRECTIONS AND THE THOUSAND YEARS, AND WHAT MAY REASONABLY BE THOUGHT ABOUT THEM

Revelation's thousand years are not a future earthly reign; the devil is bound now.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.7 De his duabus resurrectionibus idem Iohannes euangelista in libro, qui dicitur apocalypsis, eo modo locutus est, ut earum prima a quibusdam nostris non intellecta insuper etiam in quasdam ridiculas fabulas uerteretur. Ait quippe in libro memorato Iohannes apostolus: Et uidi angelum descendentem de caelo, habentem clauem abyssi et catenam in manu sua. Et tenuit draconem illum serpentem antiquum, qui cognominatus est diabolus et satanas; adligauit illum mille annis et misit illum in abyssum; et clusit et signauit super eum, ut non seduceret iam gentes, donec finiantur mille anni; post haec oportet eum solui breui tempore. Et uidi sedes et sedentes super eas, et iudicium datum est.	The same John the Evangelist spoke of these two resurrections in the book called the Apocalypse. But he spoke in such a way that some of our own people did not understand the first of them, and even turned it into certain ridiculous fables. For in the book mentioned the apostle John says: "And I saw an angel coming down from heaven, holding the key of the abyss and a chain in his hand. And he seized the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years, and threw him into the abyss, and shut it and sealed it over him, so that he would no longer lead the nations astray until the thousand years are ended; after this he must be released for a short time. And I saw thrones and those seated on them, and judgment was given."[22]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Et animae occisorum propter testimonium Iesu et propter uerbum Dei, et si qui non adorauerunt bestiam nec imaginem eius, neque acceperunt inscriptionem in fronte aut in manu sua, et regnauerunt cum Iesu mille annis; reliqui eorum non uixerunt, donec finiantur mille anni. Haec resurrectio prima est. Beatus et sanctus est, qui habet in hac prima resurrectione partem. In istis secunda mors non habet potestatem; sed erunt sacerdotes Dei et Christi et regnabunt cum eo mille annis.

"And the souls of those who were slain for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God, and any who had not worshiped the beast or its image, nor received its mark on their foreheads or on their hands; and they reigned with Jesus for a thousand years. The rest of them did not live until the thousand years are ended. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he who has a share in this first resurrection. Over these the second death has no power; but they will be priests of God and of Christ, and will reign with him for a thousand years."[23]

Qui propter haec huius libri uerba primam resurrectionem futuram suspicati sunt corporalem, inter cetera maxime numero annorum mille permoti sunt, tamquam oporteret in sanctis eo modo uelut tanti temporis fieri sabbatismum, uacatione scilicet sancta post labores annorum sex milium, ex quo creatus est homo et magni illius peccati merito in huius mortalitatis aerumnas de paradisi felicitate dimissus est, ut, quoniam scriptum est: Unus dies aput Dominum sicut mille anni, et mille anni sicut dies unus, sex annorum milibus tamquam sex diebus inpletis, sequatur uelut septimus sabbati in annis mille postremis, ad hoc scilicet sabbatum celebrandum resurgentibus sanctis. Quae opinio esset utcumque tolerabilis, si aliquae deliciae spiritales in illo sabbato adfuturae sanctis per Domini praesentiam crederentur. Nam etiam nos hoc opinati fuimus aliquando.

Some have supposed, on account of these words of this book, that the first resurrection will be bodily. Among other things, they have been moved chiefly by the number of a thousand years. They think that the saints ought to have a kind of Sabbath rest lasting that long—a holy leisure, that is, after the labors of the six thousand years since man was created and was sent out from the happiness of paradise into the hardships of this mortal life, in punishment for that great sin. For it is written: "One day with the Lord is like a thousand years, and a thousand years like one day." So, they argue, when six thousand years have been completed, like six days, a kind of seventh day of Sabbath will follow in the final thousand years, and the saints will rise to celebrate this Sabbath. This opinion would be tolerable to some degree if it were believed that the saints would enjoy some spiritual delights in that Sabbath through the presence of the Lord. Indeed, we ourselves once held this opinion too.[24]

Sed cum eos, qui tunc resurrexerint, dicant inmoderatissimis carnalibus epulis uacaturos, in quibus cibus sit tantus ac potus, ut non solum nullam modestiam teneant, sed modum quoque ipsius incredulitatis excedant: nullo modo ista possunt nisi a carnalibus credi. Hi autem qui spiritales sunt, istos ista credentes χιλιαστὰς appellant Graeco uocabulo; quos uerbum e uerbo exprimentes nos possemus miliarios nuncupare. Eos autem longum est refellere ad singula; sed potius, quem ad modum scriptura haec accipienda sit, iam debemus ostendere.

But they say that those who rise then will spend their leisure in the most immoderate fleshly banquets, with so much food and drink that it not only keeps to no moderation but oversteps the measure even of the incredible. Such things can in no way be believed except by the carnal. Those who are spiritual call the people who believe these things by the Greek name χιλιαστὰς [chiliasts]; translating it word for word, we could call them "millenarians." It would take a long time to refute them

22 The Apocalypse is the Book of Revelation; this is Revelation 20:1–4.
23 Revelation 20:4–6.
24 2 Peter 3:8.

LATIN

ENGLISH

point by point. Rather, we ought now to show how this passage of Scripture is to be understood.

Ait ipse Dominus Iesus Christus: Nemo potest introire in domum fortis et uasa eius eripere, nisi prius adligauerit fortem, diabolum uolens intellegi fortem, quia ipse genus humanum potuit tenere captiuum; uasa uero eius, quae fuerat erepturus, fideles suos futuros, quos ille in diuersis peccatis adque inpietatibus possidebat. Ut ergo adligaretur hic fortis, propterea uidit iste apostolus in apocalypsi angelum descendentem de caelo, habentem clauem abyssi et catenam in manu sua. Et tenuit, inquit, draconem illum serpentem antiquum, qui cognominatus est diabolus et satanas, et adligauit illum mille annis, hoc est, eius potestatem ab eis seducendis ac possidendis, qui fuerant liberandi, cohibuit adque frenauit.

The Lord Jesus Christ himself says: "No one can enter a strong man's house and carry off his goods unless he first binds the strong man." By the strong man he wants the devil to be understood, because the devil was able to hold the human race captive. By his goods, which the Lord was going to carry off, he means his own future faithful, whom the devil held in his possession through various sins and acts of ungodliness. It was so that this strong man might be bound, then, that this apostle saw in the Apocalypse "an angel coming down from heaven, holding the key of the abyss and a chain in his hand. And he seized," he says, "the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years." That is, he checked and curbed the devil's power to lead astray and to possess those who were to be set free.[25]

Mille autem anni duobus modis possunt, quantum mihi occurrit, intellegi: aut quia in ultimis annis mille ista res agitur, id est sexto annorum miliario tamquam sexto die, cuius nunc spatia posteriora uoluuntur, secuturo deinde sabbato, quod non habet uesperam, requie scilicet sanctorum, quae non habet finem, ut huius miliarii tamquam diei nouissimam partem, quae remanebat usque ad terminum saeculi, mille annos appellauerit eo loquendi modo, quo pars significatur a toto; aut certe mille annos pro annis omnibus huius saeculi posuit, ut perfecto numero notaretur ipsa temporis plenitudo. Millenarius quippe numerus denarii numeri quadratum solidum reddit. Decem quippe deciens ducta fiunt centum, quae iam figura quadrata, sed plana est; ut autem in altitudinem surgat et solida fiat, rursus centum deciens multiplicantur, et mille sunt.

As far as I can see, the thousand years can be understood in two ways. The first is that this takes place in the last thousand years, that is, in the sixth millennium, as if in the sixth day, whose later stretches are now rolling by. This is to be followed by a Sabbath that has no evening, namely the rest of the saints, which has no end. On this view he called the last part of this millennium—the last part of the day, as it were, which remained until the end of the world—a thousand years, by the figure of speech in which a part is signified by the whole. The second is that he has put a thousand years for all the years of this world, so that the very fullness of time is marked by a perfect number. For the number one thousand gives the solid square of the number ten. Ten multiplied by ten makes a hundred, which is already a square figure, but a plane one. To rise into height and become solid, a hundred is multiplied again by ten, and that makes a thousand.

Porro si centum ipsa pro uniuersitate aliquando ponantur, quale illud est, quod Dominus omnia sua dimittenti et eum sequenti promisit dicens: Accipiet in hoc saeculo centuplum, quod exponens quodam modo apostolus ait: Quasi nihil habentes, et omnia possidentes; quia et ante iam dictum erat: Fidelis hominis totus mundus diuitiarum est: quanto magis mille pro

Sometimes, moreover, a hundred itself is used for the whole. An example is what the Lord promised to the one who leaves all he has and follows him: "He will receive a hundredfold in this world." The apostle explains this, in a way, when he says: "as having nothing, and yet possessing all things," uniuersitate ponuntur, ubi est soliditas ipsius denariae quadraturae? Unde nec illud melius intellegitur, quod in psalmo legitur: Memor fuit in saeculum testamenti sui uerbi, quod mandauit in mille generationes, id est in omnes.

25 Matthew 12:29.

LATIN

Et misit illum, inquit, in abyssum; utique diabolum misit in abyssum, quo nomine significata est multitudo innumerabilis inpiorum, quorum in malignitate aduersus ecclesiam Dei multum profunda sunt corda; non quia ibi diabolus ante non erat; sed ideo illuc dicitur missus, quia exclusus a credentibus plus coepit inpios possidere. Plus namque possidetur a diabolo, qui non solum est alienatus a Deo, uerum etiam gratis odit seruientes Deo. Et clausit, inquit, et signauit super eum, ut non seduceret iam gentes, donec finiantur mille anni. Clausit super eum dictum est interdixit ei, ne posset exire, id est uetitum transgredi. Signauit autem, quod addidit, significasse mihi uidetur, quia occultum esse uoluit, qui pertineant ad partem diaboli, et qui non pertineant.

Hoc quippe in saeculo isto prorsus latet, quia et qui uidetur stare, utrum sit casurus, et qui uidetur iacere, utrum sit surrecturus, incertum est. Ab eis autem gentibus seducendis huius interdicti uinculo et claustro diabolus prohibetur adque cohibetur, quas pertinentes ad Christum seducebat antea uel tenebat. Has enim Deus elegit ante mundi constitutionem eruere de potestate tenebrarum et transferre in regnum filii caritatis suae, sicut apostolus dicit. Nam seducere illum gentes etiam nunc et secum trahere in aeternam poenam, sed non praedestinatas in aeternam uitam, quis fidelis ignorat? Nec moueat, quod saepe diabolus seducit etiam illos, qui regenerati iam in Christo uias ingrediuntur Dei. Nouit enim Dominus qui sunt eius; ex his in aeternam damnationem neminem ille seducit.

ENGLISH

since it had also been said before: "The whole world of riches belongs to the faithful man." If a hundred is used this way, how much more is a thousand used for the whole, since it is the solid form of the square of ten! Hence there is no better way to understand what we read in the psalm: "He has remembered his covenant forever, the word that he commanded for a thousand generations"—that is, for all generations.[26]

"And he threw him," he says, "into the abyss." That is, he threw the devil into the abyss. By this name is meant the countless multitude of the ungodly, whose hearts are very deep in malice against the Church of God. It is not that the devil was not there before. He is said to have been thrown there because, shut out from believers, he began to possess the ungodly more fully. For a person is more fully possessed by the devil who is not only estranged from God but also hates without cause those who serve God. "And he shut it," he says, "and sealed it over him, so that he would no longer lead the nations astray until the thousand years are ended." "He shut it over him" means that he laid a prohibition on him, so that he could not go out, that is, could not cross the forbidden line. As for "sealed," which he added, it seems to me to signify that he willed it to remain hidden who belong to the devil's side and who do not.

For this is entirely hidden in this world, since it is uncertain whether the one who seems to stand will fall, and whether the one who seems to lie fallen will rise. By the bond and enclosure of this prohibition, however, the devil is prevented and restrained from leading astray those nations which belong to Christ, but which he formerly led astray or held. For God chose these nations before the foundation of the world, to rescue them from the power of darkness and transfer them into the kingdom of the Son of his love, as the apostle says. What believer does not know that even now the devil leads nations astray and drags them with him into eternal punishment—but not those predestined to eternal life? Nor should it trouble anyone that the devil often leads astray even those who have already been reborn in Christ and are walking in the ways of God. For "the Lord knows 26 Matthew 19:29 and Mark 10:30; 2 Corinthians 6:10; Proverbs 17:6 (found only in the Greek version); Psalm 104:8 (105:8 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

those who are his"; of these the devil leads no one astray into eternal damnation.[27]

Sic enim eos nouit Dominus, ut Deus, quem nil latet etiam futurorum, non ut homo, qui hominem ad praesens uidet (si tamen uidet, cuius cor non uidet). qualis autem postea sit futurus nec se ipsum uidet. Ad hoc ergo ligatus est diabolus et inclusus in abysso, ut iam non seducat gentes, ex quibus constat ecclesia, quas antea seductas tenebat, antequam essent ecclesia. Neque, enim dictum est ut non seduceret aliquem, sed ut non seduceret, inquit, iam gentes, in quibus ecclesiam procul dubio uoluit intellegi, donec finiantur, inquit, mille anni, id est, aut quod remanet de sexto die, qui constat ex mille annis, aut omnes anni, quibus deinceps hoc saeculum peragendum est.

For the Lord knows them as God knows, from whom nothing is hidden, not even the future. He does not know them as a man does, who sees another man only in the present (if indeed he sees one whose heart he does not see), and does not even see what kind of person he himself will be later. This, then, is why the devil was bound and shut up in the abyss: so that he might no longer lead astray the nations of which the Church consists, which he had led astray and held captive before they were the Church. For it was not said, "so that he would not lead anyone astray," but "so that he would no longer lead," he says, "the nations astray." By the nations he undoubtedly wanted the Church to be understood. "Until the thousand years are ended," he says—that is, either what remains of the sixth day, which consists of a thousand years, or all the years over which this world is still to run its course.

Nec sic accipiendum est quod ait: Ut non Seduceret gentes, donec finiantur mille anni, quasi postea sit seducturus eas dumtaxat gentes, ex quibus praedestinata constat ecclesia, a quibus seducendis illo est uinculo claustroque prohibitus. Sed aut illa locutione dictum est, quae in scripturis aliquotiens inuenitur, qualis est in psalmo: Sic oculi nostri ad Dominum Deum nostrum, donec misereatur nostri; neque enim, cum misertus fuerit, non erunt oculi seruorum eius ad Dominum Deum suum; aut certe iste est ordo uerborum: Et clausit et signauit super eum, donec finiantur mille anni; quod uero interposuit: Ut non seduceret iam gentes, ita se habet, ut ab huius ordinis conexione sit liberum et seorsus intellegendum, uelut si post adderetur, ut sic se haberet tota sententia: Et clausit et signauit super eum, donec finiantur mille anni, ut non seduceret iam gentes; id est, ideo clausit donec finiantur mille anni, ut non seduceret iam gentes.

Nor should the words "so that he would not lead the nations astray until the thousand years are ended" be taken to mean that afterward he will lead astray precisely those nations of which the predestined Church consists, from leading which astray he was prevented by that bond and enclosure. Rather, there are two possibilities. The first is that it is said by a figure of speech found several times in the Scriptures, as in the psalm: "So our eyes are on the Lord our God, until he has mercy on us." When he has had mercy, the eyes of his servants will not therefore cease to be on the Lord their God. The second is that the order of the words is this: "And he shut it and sealed it over him until the thousand years are ended." The clause he inserted, "so that he would no longer lead the nations astray," stands free of this connection and is to be understood separately, as if it were added afterward. The whole sentence would then read: "And he shut it and sealed it over him until the thousand years are ended, so that he would no longer lead the nations astray." That is, he shut it until the thousand years are ended for this purpose: so that he would no longer lead the nations astray.[28]

27 Ephesians 1:4; Colossians 1:13; 2 Timothy 2:19.
28 Psalm 122:2 (123:2 in most English Bibles).

THE BINDING AND LOOSING OF THE DEVIL

The devil's binding restrains his power to seduce the Church until his brief final release.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.8	Post haec, inquit, oportet eum solui breui tempore. Si hoc est diabolo ligari et includi, ecclesiam non posse seducere, haec ergo erit solutio eius, ut possit? Absit: numquam enim ab illo ecclesia seducetur praedestinata et electa ante mundi constitutionem, de qua dictum est: Nouit Dominus qui sunt eius. Et tamen hic erit etiam illo tempore, quo soluendus est diabolus, sicut, ex quo est instituta, hic fuit et erit omni tempore, in suis utique qui succedunt nascendo morientibus. Nam paulo post dicit, quod solutus diabolus seductas gentes toto orbe terrarum adtrahet in bellum aduersus eam, quorum hostium numerus erit ut harena maris.	"After this," he says, "he must be released for a short time." If the devil's being bound and shut up means that he cannot lead the Church astray, will his release mean, then, that he can? Far from it! The Church predestined and chosen before the foundation of the world, of which it was said, "The Lord knows those who are his," will never be led astray by him. And yet the Church will be here even at the time when the devil is to be released. It has been here ever since it was founded, and it will be here at all times—in its own members, of course, who by being born take the place of those who die. For a little later he says that the devil, once released, will draw the nations he has led astray throughout the whole world into war against the Church, and that the number of these enemies will be like the sand of the sea.[29]
	Et adscenderunt, inquit, supra terrae latitudinem, et cinxerunt castra sanctorum et dilectam ciuitatem, et descendit ignis de caelo a Deo et comedit eos; et diabolus, qui seducebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuris, ubi et bestia et pseudopropheta; et cruciabuntur die et nocte in saecula saeculorum. Sed hoc iam ad iudicium nouissimum pertinet, quod nunc propterea commemorandum putaui, ne quis existimet eo ipso paruo tempore, quo soluetur diabolus, in hac terra ecclesiam non futuram, illo hic eam uel non inueniente, cum fuerit solutus, uel absumente, cum fuerit modis omnibus persecutus.	"And they went up," he says, "over the breadth of the earth, and surrounded the camp of the saints and the beloved city; and fire came down from heaven from God and devoured them. And the devil who had led them astray was thrown into the lake of fire and sulfur, where the beast and the false prophet are too; and they will be tormented day and night forever and ever." But this already belongs to the last judgment. I thought it should be mentioned now so that no one may think that the Church will not exist on this earth during that short time when the devil is released—either because he does not find it here when he is released, or because he destroys it after persecuting it in every way.[30]
	Non itaque per totum hoc tempus, quod liber iste conplectitur, a primo scilicet aduentu Christi usque in saeculi finem, qui erit secundus eius aduentus, ita diabolus adligatur, ut eius haec ipsa sit adligatio, per hoc interuallum, quod mille annorum numero appellat, non seducere ecclesiam, quando quidem illam nec solutus utique seducturus est. Nam profecto ei si adligari est non posse seducere siue non permitti: quid erit solui nisi posse seducere siue permitti? Quod absit ut fiat; sed adligatio diaboli est non permitti exserere totam	So it is not the case that throughout this whole time which the book covers—from Christ's first coming, that is, to the end of the world, which will be his second coming—the devil is bound in such a way that his binding consists in precisely this: that during this interval, which the book calls by the number of a thousand years, he does not lead the Church astray. For he will certainly not lead it astray even when he is released. Surely, if being bound means for him being unable, or not permit-

29 Revelation 20:3; the war is described in Revelation 20:7–8.
30 Revelation 20:9–10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
tentationem, quam potest uel ui uel dolo ad seducendos homines in partem suam cogendo uiolenter fraudulenterue fallendo.	ted, to lead astray, what will being released mean but being able, or permitted, to lead astray? God forbid that this should happen! Rather, the binding of the devil consists in his not being permitted to exert the whole force of temptation that he can, whether by force or by guile, to lead people astray to his side—compelling them by violence or deceiving them by fraud.
Quod si permitteretur in tam longo tempore et tanta infirmitate multorum, plurimos tales, quales Deus id perpeti non uult, et fideles deiceret et ne crederent inpediret; quod ne faceret, adligatus est.	If he were permitted to do this over so long a time and amid such weakness in so many, he would bring down a great many people of a kind whom God does not will to undergo this: he would both throw down believers and prevent others from believing. It is to keep him from doing this that he has been bound.
Tunc autem soluetur, quando et breue tempus erit. (Nam tribus annis et sex mensibus legitur totis suis suorumque uiribus saeuiturus) et tales erunt, cum quibus ei belligerandum est, ut uinci tanto eius inpetu insidiisque non possint.	But he will be released when the time will also be short. (For we read that he will rage with all his own forces and those of his followers for three years and six months.) And those against whom he must wage war will be such that they cannot be conquered by all his onslaught and all his snares.[31]
Si autem numquam solueretur, minus appareret eius maligna potentia, minus sanctae ciuitatis fidelissima patientia probaretur, minus denique perspiceretur, quam magno eius malo tam bene fuerit usus Omnipotens, qui eum nec omnino abstulit a tentatione sanctorum, quamuis ab eorum interioribus hominibus, ubi in Deum creditur, foras missum, ut eius forinsecus obpugnatione proficerent; et in eis, qui sunt ex parte ipsius, adligauit, ne quantam posset effundendo et exercendo malitiam innumerabiles infirmos, ex quibus ecclesiam multiplicari et inpleri oportebat, alios credituros, alios iam credentes, a fide pietatis hos deterreret, hos frangeret: et soluet in fine, ut, quam fortem aduersarium Dei ciuitas superauerit, cum ingenti gloria sui redemtoris adiutoris liberatoris adspiciat. In eorum sane, qui tunc futuri sunt, sanctorum adque fidelium conparatione quid sumus?	If, however, he were never released, his malicious power would be less apparent, the most faithful patience of the holy city would be less tested, and, finally, it would be less clearly seen how well the Almighty has used so great an evil as his. For God has not removed him altogether from tempting the saints, though he has cast him out of their inner selves, where faith in God resides, so that they might profit from his attacks from outside. And he has bound him in those who belong to his side, so that he might not pour out and exercise all the malice he could. Otherwise he would turn away from the faith of godliness the countless weak, from whom the Church had to grow and be filled—some who were going to believe and some who already believed—frightening off the first and breaking the second. And he will release him at the end, so that the city of God may behold what a strong adversary it has overcome, to the immense glory of its Redeemer, Helper and Deliverer. Indeed, what are we in comparison with the saints and believers who will be living then?
Quando quidem ad illos probandos tantus soluetur inimicus, cum quo nos ligato tantis periculis dimicamus.	For so great an enemy will be released to test them —the very one against whom we fight at such great 31 Augustine has in mind the "time, times, and half a time" of Daniel 7:25 and Revelation 12:14.

LATIN

Quamuis et hoc temporis interuallo quosdam milites Christi tam prudentes et fortes fuisse adque esse non dubium est, ut, etiamsi tunc in ista mortalitate uiuerent, quando ille soluetur, omnes insidias eius adque inpetus et cauerent sapientissime et patientissime sustinerent.

Haec autem adligatio diaboli non solum facta est, ex quo coepit ecclesia praeter Iudaeam terram in nationes alias adque alias dilatari; sed etiam nunc fit et fiet usque ad terminum saeculi, quo soluendus est, quia et nunc homines ab infidelitate, in qua eos ipse possidebat, conuertuntur ad fidem et usque in illum finem sine dubio conuertentur; et utique unicuique iste fortis tunc adligatur, quando ab illo tamquam uas eius eripitur; et abyssus, ubi inclusus est, non in eis consumta est, quando sunt mortui, qui tunc erant quando esse coepit inclusus; sed successerunt eis alii nascendo adque succedunt, donec finiatur hoc saeculum, qui oderint Christianos, in quorum cottidie, uelut in abysso, caecis et profundis cordibus includatur.

Utrum autem etiam illis ultimis tribus annis et mensibus sex, quando solutus totis uiribus saeuiturus est, aliquis, in qua non fuerat, sit accessurus ad fidem, nonnulla quaestio est. Quo modo enim stabit quod dictum est: Quis intrat in domum fortis, ut uasa eius eripiat, nisi prius adligauerit fortem, si etiam soluto eripiuntur? Ac per hoc ad hoc cogere uidetur ista sententia, ut credamus illo licet exiguo tempore neminem accessurum esse populo Christiano, sed cum eis, qui iam Christiani, reperti fuerint, diabolum pugnaturum; ex quibus etiamsi aliqui uicti secuti eum fuerint, non eos ad praedestinatum filiorum Dei numerum pertinere.

Neque enim frustra idem Iohannes apostolus, qui et hanc apocalypsin scripsit, in epistula sua de quibusdam dicit: Ex nobis exierunt, sed non erant ex nobis; nam si fuissent ex nobis, mansissent utique nobiscum. Sed quid fit de paruulis? Nimium quippe incredibile est nullos iam natos et nondum baptizatos praeoccupari Christianorum filios illo tempore infantes, nullos etiam ipsis nasci iam diebus; aut si erunt, non eos a parentibus suis ad lauacrum regenerationis modo quocumque perduci. Quod si fiet, peril even while he is bound. Yet there is no doubt that even in this interval of time there have been, and are, some soldiers of Christ so wise and so brave that, if they were living in this mortal state at the time when he is released, they would guard most wisely against all his snares and endure all his assaults most patiently.

ENGLISH

Moreover, this binding of the devil did not take place only from the time when the Church began to spread beyond the land of Judea into one nation after another. It is happening now as well, and will go on happening until the end of the world, when he is to be released. For even now people are being converted to faith from the unbelief in which he held them, and without doubt they will go on being converted until that end. And this strong man is bound in each person at the very moment when that person is carried off from him as one of his goods. Nor was the abyss in which he was shut up used up with the death of those who were alive when he began to be shut up. Others have taken their place by being born, and still are taking it, and will until this world comes to an end—people who hate Christians. In their blind and deep hearts he is shut up daily, as in an abyss.

There is a considerable question, however, whether even in those last three years and six months, when he is released and will rage with all his strength, anyone will come to the faith who was not in it before. For how will the saying stand, "Who enters a strong man's house to carry off his goods unless he first binds the strong man?" if his goods are carried off even when he is released? This text, therefore, seems to compel us to believe that during that time, short as it is, no one will join the Christian people. Instead, the devil will fight with those who are found to be Christians already; and if some of them are conquered and follow him, they do not belong to the predestined number of the children of God.

For it is not for nothing that the same apostle John, who also wrote this Apocalypse, says of certain people in his letter: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would surely have remained with us." But what happens to little children? It is quite beyond belief that no children of Christians will be overtaken by that time as infants, already born but not yet bapquo pacto soluto iam diabolo uasa ista eripientur, in cuius domum nemo intrat, ut uasa eius eripiat, nisi prius adligauerit eum?

LATIN

Immo uero id potius est credendum, nec qui cadant de ecclesia nec qui accedant ecclesiae illo tempore defuturos; sed profecto tam fortes erunt et parentes pro baptizandis paruulis suis et hi, qui tunc primitus crediturі sunt, ut illum fortem uincant etiam non ligatum, id est omnibus, qualibus antea numquam, uel artibus insidiantem uel urgentem uiribus et uigilanter intellegant et toleranter ferant, ac sic illi etiam non ligato eripiantur. Nec ideo falsa erit euangelica illa sententia: Quis intrat in domum fortis, ut uasa eius eripiat, nisi prius adligauerit fortem?

Secundum eius enim sententiae ueritatem ordo iste seruatus est, ut prius adligaretur fortis ereptisque uasis eius longe lateque in omnibus gentibus ex firmis et infirmis ita multiplicaretur ecclesia, ut ex ipsa rerum diuinitus praedictarum et inpletarum robustissima fide etiam soluto uasa posset auferre.

Sicut enim fatendum est multorum refrigescere caritatem, cum abundat iniquitas, et inusitatis maximisque persecutionibus adque fallaciis diaboli iam soluti eos, qui in libro uitae scripti non sunt, multos esse cessuros: ita cogitandum est non solum quos bonos fideles illud tempus inueniet, sed nonnullos etiam, qui foris adhuc erunt, adiuuante Dei gratia per considerationem scripturarum, in quibus et alia et finis ipse praenuntiatus est, quem uenire iam sentiunt, ad credendum quod non credebant futuros esse firmiores et ad uincendum etiam non ligatum diabolum fortiores. Quod si ita erit, propterea praecessisse dicenda est eius adligatio, ut et ligati et soluti exspoliatio sequeretur; quoniam de hac re dictum est: Quis intrabit in domum fortis, ut uasa eius eripiat, nisi prius adligauerit fortem?

ENGLISH

tized, and that none will be born during those very days. It is equally beyond belief that, if there are such children, their parents will not bring them in some way or other to the washing of rebirth. And if this happens, how will these goods be carried off when the devil is already released, since no one enters his house to carry off his goods unless he first binds him?[32]

No—we should rather believe that at that time there will be no lack either of those who fall away from the Church or of those who join it. But surely both the parents seeking baptism for their little ones and those who will then believe for the first time will be so strong that they will overcome that strong man even when he is not bound. That is, though he lies in wait with every kind of art, or presses with all his forces, as never before, they will both recognize him with vigilance and bear him with patience. And so they will be snatched from him even though he is not bound. Nor will that saying of the Gospel be false on that account: "Who enters a strong man's house to carry off his goods unless he first binds the strong man?"

For in accordance with the truth of that saying this order has been kept. First the strong man was bound. Then, as his goods were carried off, the Church was multiplied far and wide among all the nations, out of the strong and the weak alike. It grew so much that, through a faith made most robust by the very events that God foretold and fulfilled, it could carry off his goods even when he is released.

For we must admit that the love of many grows cold when wickedness abounds, and that many who are not written in the book of life will give way under the unprecedented and very great persecutions and deceptions of the devil, who will then be released. Just so, we must also consider that some will become firmer in believing what they did not believe, and stronger to conquer the devil even when he is released. These will include not only the good and faithful whom that time will find, but also some who will still be outside. God's grace will help them through their study of the Scriptures, in which, among other things, the very end that they now feel to be coming has been foretold. If this is so, then his binding must be said to have come first precisely so that he might be plundered, both bound and released. For it is about this that it was said: "Who will enter the house of a strong man to snatch away his goods, unless he first binds the strong man?"[33]

32 1 John 2:19.

LATIN	ENGLISH

WHAT THE REIGN OF THE SAINTS WITH CHRIST FOR A THOUSAND YEARS IS, AND HOW IT DIFFERS FROM THE ETERNAL KINGDOM

The saints reign with Christ now, in the Church, during the thousand years.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.9 Interea dum mille annis ligatus est diabolus, sancti regnant cum Christo etiam ipsis mille annis, eisdem sine dubio et eodem modo intellegendis, id est isto iam tempore prioris eius aduentus. Excepto quippe illo regno, de quo in fine dicturus est: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum, nisi alio aliquo modo, longe quidem inpari, iam nunc regnarent cum illo sancti eius, quibus ait: Ecce ego uobiscum sum usque in consummationem saeculi: profecto non etiam nunc diceretur ecclesia regnum eius regnumue caelorum.	Meanwhile, while the devil is bound for a thousand years, the saints reign with Christ, also for a thousand years. These are without doubt the same years and are to be understood in the same way, that is, as this present time of his first coming. At the end he will speak of a kingdom: "Come, you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you." But apart from that kingdom, his saints, to whom he says, "See, I am with you until the end of the world," must already be reigning with him now in some other way, though a far unequal one. Otherwise the Church would certainly not be called his kingdom, or the kingdom of heaven, even now.[34]
Nam utique isto tempore in regno Dei eruditur scriba ille, qui profert de thensauro suo noua et uetera, de quo supra locuti sumus; et de ecclesia collecturi sunt zizania messores illi, quae permisit cum tritico simul crescere usque ad messem; quod exponens ait: Messis est finis saeculi, messores autem angeli sunt. Sicut ergo colliguntur zizania et igni comburuntur, sic erit in consummatione saeculi; mittet filius hominis angelos suos, et colligent de regno eius omnia scandala. Numquid de regno illo, ubi nulla sunt scandala? De isto ergo regno eius, quod est hic ecclesia, colligentur. Item dicit: Qui soluerit unum de mandatis istis minimis et docuerit sic homines, minimus uocabitur in regno caelorum; qui autem fecerit et sic docuerit, magnus uocabitur in regno caelorum.	For it is surely in this present time that the scribe we spoke of above, who brings out of his treasure things new and old, is trained in the kingdom of God. And it is from the Church that those reapers will gather the weeds that he allowed to grow together with the wheat until the harvest. Explaining this, he says: "The harvest is the end of the age, and the reapers are the angels. Just as the weeds are gathered and burned with fire, so it will be at the end of the age: the Son of Man will send his angels, and they will gather out of his kingdom all stumbling blocks." Surely not out of that kingdom in which there are no stumbling blocks? It is out of this kingdom of his, then, which here is the Church, that they will be gathered. Again he says: "Whoever breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches people to do so will be called least in the kingdom of heaven; but whoever does them and teaches them will be called great in the kingdom of heaven."[35]

33 Matthew 24:12; Revelation 13:8; Matthew 12:29.
34 Matthew 25:34; Matthew 28:20.
35 Matthew 13:52; 13:24–30, 39–41; 5:19.

LATIN

Utrumque dicit in regno caelorum, et qui non facit mandata quae docet (hoc est enim soluere: non seruare, non facere), et illum qui facit et sic docet; sed istum minimum, illum magnum. Et continuo secutus adiungit: Dico enim uobis quia, nisi abundauerit iustitia uestra super scribarum et Pharisaeorum, id est super eos, qui soluunt quod docent (de scribis enim et Pharisaeis dicit alio loco: Quoniam dicunt, et non faciunt), — nisi ergo super hos abundauerit iustitia uestra, id est, ut uos non soluatis, sed faciatis potius quod docetis, non intrabitis, inquit, in regnum caelorum.

Alio modo igitur intellegendum est regnum caelorum, ubi ambo sunt, et ille scilicet qui soluit quod docet, et ille qui facit; sed ille minimus, ille magnus: alio modo autem regnum caelorum dicitur, quo non intrat nisi ille qui facit. Ac per hoc ubi utrumque genus est, ecclesia est, qualis nunc est: ubi autem illud solum erit, ecclesia est, qualis tunc erit, quando malus in ea non erit. Ergo et nunc ecclesia regnum Christi est regnumque caelorum. Regnant itaque cum illo etiam nunc sancti eius, aliter quidem, quam tunc regnabunt; nec tamen cum illo regnant zizania, quamuis in ecclesia cum tritico crescant.

Regnant enim cum illo, qui faciunt quod ait apostolus: Si resurrexistis cum Christo, quae sursum sunt sapite, ubi Christus est in dextera Dei sedens; quae sursum sunt quaerite, non quae super terram; de qualibus item dicit, quod eorum conuersatio sit in caelis. Postremo regnant cum illo, qui eo modo sunt in regno eius, ut sint etiam ipsi regnum eius. Quo modo autem sunt regnum Christi, qui, ut alia taceam, quamuis ibi sint donec colligantur in fine saeculi de regno eius omnia scandala, tamen illic sua quaerunt, non quae Iesu Christi?

De hoc ergo regno militiae, in quo adhuc cum hoste confligitur et aliquando repugnatur pugnantibus uitiis,

ENGLISH

He says that both are in the kingdom of heaven. One is the man who does not do the commandments he teaches (for that is what "breaking" means: not keeping them, not doing them). The other is the man who does them and teaches them. But the first is least, the second great. And he immediately goes on to add: "For I tell you that unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees"—that is, exceeds those who break what they teach (for of the scribes and Pharisees he says elsewhere, "For they say, and do not do")—so unless your righteousness exceeds theirs, that is, unless you do not break but rather do what you teach, "you will not enter," he says, "the kingdom of heaven."[36]

So the kingdom of heaven must be understood in one sense where both are found, namely the one who breaks what he teaches and the one who does it, the former least, the latter great. In another sense, the kingdom of heaven is the one into which only the one who does it enters. Hence where both kinds are found, that is the Church as it now is. But where only the latter kind will be found, that is the Church as it will be then, when no evil person will be in it. Therefore the Church, even now, is the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of heaven. So his saints reign with him even now, though otherwise than they will reign then. And yet the weeds do not reign with him, though they grow in the Church together with the wheat.

For those reign with him who do what the apostle says: "If you have risen with Christ, set your minds on the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not those on earth." Of such people he also says that their way of life is in heaven. In short, those reign with him who are in his kingdom in such a way that they themselves are also his kingdom. But others, to say nothing of their other faults, seek there their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ, although they are in the kingdom until all stumbling blocks are gathered out of it at the end of the age. How are they the kingdom of Christ?[37]

This book, then, speaks of this kingdom at war, and of this first resurrection, which is happening

36 Matthew 5:20; Matthew 23:3.

LATIN

aliquando cedentibus imperatur, donec ueniatur ad illud pacatissimum regnum, ubi sine hoste regnabitur, et de hac prima resurrectione, quae nunc est, liber iste sic loquitur. Cum enim dixisset adligari diabolum mille annis, et postea solui breui tempore, tum recapitulando quid in istis mille annis agat ecclesia uel agatur in ea: Et uidi, inquit, sedes et sedentes super eas, et iudicium datum est Non hoc putandum est de ultimo iudicio dici; sed sedes praepositorum et ipsi praepositi intellegendi sunt, per quos nunc ecclesia gubernatur.

Iudicium autem datum nullum melius accipiendum uidetur, quam id quod dictum est: Quae ligaueritis in terra, ligata erunt et in caelo; et quae solueritis in terra, soluta erunt et in caelo. Unde apostolus: Quid enim mihi est, inquit, de his, qui foris sunt, iudicare? Nonne de his qui intus sunt uos iudicatis? Et animae, inquit, occisorum propter testimonium Iesu et propter uerbum Dei; subauditur quod postea dicturus est: Regnauerunt cum Iesu mille anuis; animae scilicet martyrum nondum sibi corporibus suis redditis. Neque enim piorum animae mortuorum separantur ab ecclesia, quae nunc etiam est regnum Christi.

Alioquin nec ad altare Dei fieret eorum memoria in communicatione corporis Christi; nec aliquid prodesset ad eius baptismum in periculis currere, ne sine illo finiatur haec uita; nec ad reconciliationem, si forte per paenitentiam malamue conscientiam quisque ab eodem corpore separatus est. Quur enim fiunt ista, nisi quia fideles etiam defuncti membra sunt eius? Quamuis ergo cum suis corporibus nondum, iam tamen eorum animae regnant cum illo, dum isti anni mille decurrunt. Unde in hoc eodem libro et alibi legitur: Beati mortui, qui in Domino moriuntur. Amodo etiam dicit Spiritus, ut requiescant a laboribus suis; nam opera eorum sequuntur eos. Regnat itaque cum Christo nunc primum ecclesia in uiuis et mortuis. Propterea enim, sicut dicit apostolus, mortuus est Christus, ut et uiuorum et mortuorum dominetur.

ENGLISH

now. In this kingdom there is still conflict with the enemy. Sometimes we resist vices that fight back, and sometimes we rule vices that yield, until we come to that most peaceful kingdom where we shall reign without an enemy. It has said that the devil is bound for a thousand years and afterward loosed for a short time. It then recapitulates what the Church does, or what is done in it, during those thousand years: "And I saw," it says, "thrones, and those seated on them, and judgment was given." This must not be thought to refer to the last judgment. Rather, we should understand the thrones of those in authority, and those in authority themselves, by whom the Church is now governed.[38]

And the judgment given seems best taken as nothing other than what was said: "Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven too, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven too." Hence the apostle says: "For what business is it of mine to judge those outside? Is it not those inside whom you judge?" "And the souls," it says, "of those slain for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God"—here we must supply what it will say later: "reigned with Jesus for a thousand years." It means the souls of the martyrs, whose bodies have not yet been restored to them. For the souls of the godly dead are not separated from the Church, which even now is the kingdom of Christ.[39]

Otherwise they would not be remembered at the altar of God in the communion of the body of Christ. Nor would it do any good, in times of danger, to hurry to his baptism so that this life should not end without it. Nor would it help to hurry to reconciliation, if someone has perhaps been separated from that same body through penance or a bad conscience. Why are these things done, unless it is because the faithful, even when dead, are his members? So although they do not yet reign with their bodies, their souls already reign with him while these thousand years run their course. Hence we read in this same book, as elsewhere too: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Yes, says the Spirit, from now on, that 37 Colossians 3:1–2; Philippians 3:20; Philippians 2:21.

38 Revelation 20:4.
39 Matthew 18:18; 1 Corinthians 5:12; Revelation 20:4.

LATIN

ENGLISH

they may rest from their labors; for their works follow them." So the Church reigns with Christ now, at this first stage, in the living and the dead. For, as the apostle says, Christ died for this reason: that he might be Lord of both the living and the dead.[40]

Sed ideo tantummodo martyrum animas commemorauit, quia ipsi praecipue regnant mortui, qui usque ad mortem pro ueritate certarunt. Sed a parte totum etiam ceteros mortuos intellegimus pertinentes ad ecclesiam, quod est regnum Christi.

But it mentions only the souls of the martyrs because those who fought for the truth even to death are the ones who above all reign after they die. But taking the part for the whole, we understand it to include the rest of the dead who belong to the Church, which is the kingdom of Christ.

Quod uero sequitur: Et si qui non adorauerunt bestiam nec imaginem eius neque acceperunt inscriptionem in fronte aut in manu sua, simul de uiuis et mortuis debemus accipere. Quae sit porro ista bestia, quamuis sit diligentius requirendum, non tamen abhorret a fide recta, ut ipsa inpia ciuitas intellegatur et populus infidelium contrarius populo fideli et ciuitati Dei. Imago uero eius simulatio eius mihi uidetur, in eis uidelicet hominibus, qui uelut fidem profitentur et infideliter uiuunt. Fingunt enim se esse quod non sunt, uocanturque non ueraci effigie, sed fallaci imagine Christiani. Ad eandem namque bestiam pertinent non solum aperte inimici nominis Christi et eius gloriosissimae ciuitatis, sed etiam zizania, quae de regno eius, quod est ecclesia, in fine saeculi colligenda sunt.

As for what follows, "And any who had not worshiped the beast or its image, nor received its mark on their forehead or on their hand," we should take it of the living and the dead together. Now, the question of what this beast is calls for more careful inquiry. Still, it is not at odds with the true faith to understand it as the ungodly city itself, the people of unbelievers opposed to the faithful people and to the city of God. Its image, however, seems to me to be its pretense, found in those people who profess the faith, as it were, and live faithlessly. For they pretend to be what they are not, and are called Christians not by a true likeness but by a deceptive image. For to this same beast belong not only the open enemies of the name of Christ and of his most glorious city, but also the weeds that are to be gathered out of his kingdom, which is the Church, at the end of the age.

Et qui sunt qui non adorant bestiam nec imaginem eius, nisi qui faciunt quod ait apostolus: Ne sitis iugum ducentes cum infidelibus? Non adorant enim est non consentiunt, non subiciuntur; neque accipiunt inscriptionem, notam scilicet criminis, in fronte propter professionem, in manu propter operationem. Ab his igitur malis alieni, siue adhuc in ista mortali carne uiuentes siue defuncti, regnant cum Christo iam nunc modo quodam huic tempori congruo per totum hoc interuallum, quod numero mille significatur annorum. Reliqui eorum, inquit, non uixerunt. Hora enim nunc est, cum mortui audiunt uocem filii Dei, et qui audierint uiuent; reliqui ergo eorum non uiuent. Quod uero subdidit: Donec finiantur mille anni, intellegendum est, quod eo tempore non uixerunt, quo uiuere debuerunt, ad uitam scilicet de morte transeundo.

And who are those who do not worship the beast or its image, if not those who do what the apostle says: "Do not be yoked together with unbelievers"? For "they do not worship" means they do not consent, do not submit. Nor do they receive the mark, that is, the brand of guilt, on the forehead, which signifies what they profess, or on the hand, which signifies what they do. Those, then, who are strangers to these evils, whether still living in this mortal flesh or dead, reign with Christ even now, in a way suited to this time, through this whole interval which is signified by the number of a thousand years. "The rest of them," it says, "did not live." For "the hour is now when the dead hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will 40 Revelation 14:13; Romans 14:9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	live"; so the rest of them will not live. As for what it adds, "until the thousand years are ended," it must be understood that they did not live at the time when they should have lived, that is, by passing from death to life.[41]
Et ideo cum dies uenerit, quo fiat et corporum resurrectio, non ad uitam de monumentis procedent, sed ad iudicium; ad damnationem scilicet, quae secunda mors dicitur. Donec finiantur enim mille anni, quicumque non uixerit, id est, toto isto tempore, quo agitur prima resurrectio, non audierit uocem filii Dei et ad uitam de morte transierit, profecto in secunda resurrectione, quae carnis est, in mortem secundam cum ipsa carne transibit. Sequitur enim et dicit: Haec resurrectio prima est. Beatus et sanctus qui habet in hac prima resurrectione partem, id est particeps eius est. Ipse est autem particeps eius, qui non solum a morte, quae in peccatis est, reuiuescit, uerum etiam in eo, quod reuixerit, permanebit. In istis, inquit, secunda mors non habet potestatem.	And so, when the day comes on which the resurrection of bodies also takes place, they will come forth from the tombs not to life but to judgment, that is, to condemnation, which is called the second death. For consider whoever has not lived until the thousand years are ended, that is, whoever has not heard the voice of the Son of God and passed from death to life during this whole time in which the first resurrection is taking place. He will certainly, at the second resurrection, which is that of the flesh, pass into the second death together with that very flesh. For it goes on to say: "This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is the one who has a share in this first resurrection," that is, who partakes in it. And the one who partakes in it is he who not only comes back to life from the death that consists in sins, but also remains in the life to which he has come back. "Over these," it says, "the second death has no power."[42]
Habet ergo in reliquis, de quibus superius ait: Reliqui eorum non uixerunt, donec finiantur mille anni; quoniam toto isto temporis interuallo, quod mille annos uocat, quantumcumque in eo quisque eorum uixit in corpore, non reuixit a morte, in qua eum tenebat inpietas, ut sic reuiuescendo primae resurrectionis particeps fieret adque in eo potestatem secunda mors non haberet.	So it does have power over the rest, of whom it said above, "The rest of them did not live until the thousand years were ended." For during that whole interval of time which it calls a thousand years, however long each of them lived in the body, he did not come back to life from the death in which ungodliness held him. Had he done so, he would have become a partaker in the first resurrection, and the second death would have had no power over him.

WHAT TO ANSWER THOSE WHO THINK THE RESURRECTION CONCERNS ONLY BODIES AND NOT ALSO SOULS

Against those who say only bodies can rise, Scripture speaks of souls rising too.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.10 Sunt qui putant resurrectionem dici non posse nisi corporum ideoque istam quoque primam in corporibus futuram esse contendunt. Quorum enim est, inquiunt, cadere, eorum est resurgere. Cadunt autem corpora moriendo; nam et a cadendo cadauera nuncupantur. Non ergo animarum, inquiunt, resurrectio potest esse, sed	There are some who think that resurrection can be spoken of only in relation to bodies, and so they contend that this first resurrection too will be in bodies. "For to rise again," they say, "belongs to what falls. And bodies fall in dying; indeed, corpses (cadauera) get their name from falling (ca-

41 2 Corinthians 6:14; Revelation 20:5; John 5:25.
42 Revelation 20:6.

LATIN

corporum. Sed quid contra apostolum dicunt, qui eam resurrectionem appellat? Nam secundum interiorem, non secundum exteriorem hominem utique resurrexerant, quibus ait: Si resurrexistis cum Christo, quae sursum sunt sapite. Quem sensum uerbis aliis alibi posuit dicens: Ut, quem ad modum Christus resurrexit a mortuis per gloriam Patris, sic et nos in nouitate uitae ambulemus. Hinc est et illud: Surge qui dormis et exsurge a mortuis, et inluminabit te Christus.

Quod autem dicunt non posse resurgere, nisi qui cadunt, et ideo putant resurrectionem ad corpora, non ad animas pertinere, quia corporum est cadere: quur non audiunt: Non recedatis ab illo, ne cadatis, et: Suo Domino stat aut cadit; et: Qui se putat stare, caueat ne cadat? Puto enim quod in anima, non in corpore casus iste cauendus est. Si igitur cadentium est resurrectio, cadunt autem et animae: profecto et animas resurgere confitendum est.

Quod autem, cum dixisset: In istis secunda mors non habet potestatem, adiunxit adque ait: Sed erunt sacerdotes Dei et Christi et regnabunt cum eo mille annis: non utique de solis episcopis et presbyteris dictum est, qui proprie iam uocantur in ecclesia sacerdotes; sed sicut omnes christos dicimus propter mysticum chrisma, sic omnes sacerdotes, quoniam membra sunt unius sacerdotis; de quibus apostolus Petrus: Plebs, inquit, sancta, regale sacerdotium. Sane, licet breuiter adque transeunter, insinuauit esse Deum Christum dicendo: Sacerdotes Dei et Christi, hoc est Patris et Filii; quamuis propter formam serui sicut hominis filius, ita etiam sacerdos Christus effectus sit in aeternum secundum ordinem Melchisedech. De qua re in hoc opere non semel diximus.

ENGLISH

dere). So there cannot be a resurrection of souls," they say, "but only of bodies." But what do they say against the apostle, who calls it a resurrection? For those to whom he says, "If you have risen with Christ, set your minds on the things that are above," had certainly risen in the inner self, not the outer. He expressed the same meaning elsewhere in other words, saying: "so that, just as Christ rose from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we too may walk in newness of life." Hence also this: "Rise, you who sleep, and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light."[43]

They say that only those who fall can rise again, and so they think that resurrection pertains to bodies, not souls, because it is bodies that fall. Why, then, do they not listen to these words: "Do not withdraw from him, lest you fall," and "It is before his own Lord that he stands or falls," and "Let anyone who thinks he stands take care that he does not fall"? For I suppose this is a fall to be guarded against in the soul, not in the body. If, then, resurrection belongs to those who fall, and souls also fall, we must certainly acknowledge that souls also rise again.[44]

After saying, "Over these the second death has no power," it went on to add: "But they will be priests of God and of Christ, and will reign with him for a thousand years." This is certainly not said only of the bishops and presbyters, who are now properly called priests in the Church. Rather, just as we call all believers "christs" because of the mystical anointing, so we call them all priests, because they are members of the one Priest. Of them the apostle Peter says: "a holy people, a royal priesthood." Indeed, briefly and in passing, the book has intimated that Christ is God by saying "priests of God and of Christ," that is, of the Father and of the Son. Yet it was on account of the form of a servant that Christ became Son of Man, and on the same account he became a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. I have spoken of this more than once in this work.[45]

43 Colossians 3:1; Romans 6:4; Ephesians 5:14.
44 Sirach 2:7; Romans 14:4; 1 Corinthians 10:12.
45 Revelation 20:6; 1 Peter 2:9. Melchizedek is the priest-king of Genesis 14, after whose order the Messiah is called a priest in Psalm 109:4 (110:4 in most English Bibles).

GOG AND MAGOG, WHOM THE DEVIL, WHEN LOOSED NEAR THE END OF THE WORLD, WILL STIR UP TO PERSECUTE THE CHURCH OF GOD

Gog and Magog are not a particular people but the devil's followers throughout the world.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
20.11	Et cum finiti fuerint, inquit, mille anni, soluetur satanas de custodia sua, et exibit ad seducendas nationes, quae sunt in quattuor angulis terrae, Gog et Magog, et trahet eos in bellum, quorum numerus est ut harena maris. Ad hoc ergo tunc seducet, ut in hoc bellum trahat. Nam et antea modis quibus poterat per mala multa et uaria seducebat. Exibit autem dictum est in apertam persecutionem de latebris erumpet odiorum. Haec enim erit nouissima persecutio, nouissimo inminente iudicio, quam sancta ecclesia toto terrarum orbe patietur, uniuersa scilicet ciuitas Christi ab uniuersa diaboli ciuitate, quantacumque erit utraque super terram.	"And when the thousand years are ended," it says, "Satan will be released from his prison, and will come out to deceive the nations that are at the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, and will draw them into war; their number is like the sand of the sea." So he will deceive them then for this purpose: to draw them into this war. For before this, too, he used to deceive by whatever means he could, through many and various evils. And "will come out" means that he will burst forth from hidden hatreds into open persecution. For this will be the last persecution, with the last judgment at hand. The holy Church will suffer it throughout the whole world. The whole city of Christ will suffer it at the hands of the whole city of the devil, however great each of them will be on earth.[46]
	Gentes quippe istae, quas appellat Gog et Magog, non sic sunt accipiendae, tamquam sint aliqui in aliqua parte terrarum barbari constituti, siue quos quidam suspicantur Getas et Massagetas propter litteras horum nominum primas, siue aliquos alios alienigenas et a Romano iure seiunctos. Toto namque orbe terrarum significati sunt isti esse, cum dictum est nationes quae sunt in quattuor angulis terrae, easque subiecit esse Gog et Magog. Quorum interpretationem nominum esse comperimus Gog tectum, Magog de tecto; tamquam domus et ipse qui procedit de domo. Gentes ergo sunt, in quibus diabolum uelut in abysso superius intellegebamus inclusum, et ipse de illis quodam modo sese efferens et procedens; ut illae sint tectum, ipse de tecto.	For these nations which it calls Gog and Magog are not to be taken as though they were some foreign peoples settled in some part of the world. Some suspect that they are the Getae and Massagetae, because of the initial letters of these names. Others might take them for some other peoples of foreign stock outside Roman jurisdiction. But they are signified as being throughout the whole world, when it is said, "the nations that are at the four corners of the earth," and it added that these are Gog and Magog. We find that the meaning of these names is: Gog, "roof"; Magog, "from the roof"—as if to say the house and the one who comes out of the house. They are therefore the nations in which, as we understood above, the devil is shut up as if in the abyss. And he himself, in a sense, rises up and comes out from them, so that they are the roof, and he is "from the roof."[47]
	Si autem utrumque referamus ad gentes, non unum horum ad illas, alterum ad diabolum: et tectum ipsae sunt, quia in eis nunc includitur et quodam modo tegitur inimicus antiquus; et de tecto ipsae erunt, quando in apertum odium de operto erupturae sunt.	But we might refer both names to the nations, rather than one to them and the other to the devil. Then they themselves are the roof, because in them the ancient enemy is now shut in and in a sense covered. And they themselves will be "from the roof" when they are about to burst out of hiding into open hatred.

46 Revelation 20:7–8. Gog and Magog are drawn from the prophecy of Ezekiel 38–39.
47 The Getae and Massagetae were peoples living beyond the Danube and the Caspian Sea, respectively.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quod uero ait: Et adscenderunt supra terrae latitudinem et cinxerunt castra sanctorum et dilectam ciuitatem: non utique ad unum locum uenisse uel uenturi esse significati sunt, quasi uno aliquo loco futura sint castra sanctorum et dilecta ciuitas, cum haec non sit nisi Christi ecclesia toto terrarum orbe diffusa; ac per hoc ubicumque tunc erit, quae in omnibus gentibus erit, quod significatum est nomine latitudinis terrae, ibi erunt castra sanctorum, ibi erit dilecta Deo ciuitas eius, ibi ab omnibus inimicis suis, quia et ipsi in omnibus cum illa gentibus erunt, persecutionis illius inmanitate cingetur, hoc est, in angustias tribulationis artabitur urgebitur concludetur; nec militiam suam deseret, quae uocabulo est appellata castrorum.	Then it says: "And they went up over the breadth of the earth and surrounded the camp of the saints and the beloved city." They are certainly not signified as having come, or being about to come, to a single place, as if the camp of the saints and the beloved city were to be in some one place. For this city is nothing but the Church of Christ spread throughout the whole world. And therefore, wherever it will be then—and it will be among all nations, which is what is signified by the term "the breadth of the earth"—there will be the camp of the saints, and there will be his city beloved by God. There all its enemies will surround it with the savagery of that persecution, for they too will be among all nations along with it. That is, it will be hemmed in, pressed hard, and shut in by the straits of tribulation. Yet it will not desert its military service, which is why it is called by the name of a camp.[48]

WHETHER THE FIRE THAT CAME DOWN FROM HEAVEN AND DEVOURED THEM BELONGS TO THE FINAL PUNISHMENT OF THE WICKED

The fire from heaven is the saints' steadfastness, or Christ's blow at his coming, not final punishment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.12 Quod uero ait: Et descendit ignis de caelo et comedit eos: non extremum putandum est id esse supplicium, quod erit, cum dicetur: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum. Tunc quippe in ignem mittentur ipsi, non ignis de caelo ueniet in ipsos. Hic autem bene intellegitur ignis de caelo de ipsa firmitate sanctorum, qua non cessuri sunt saeuientibus, ut eorum faciant uoluntatem. Firmamentum est enim caelum, cuius firmitate illi cruciabuntur ardentissimo zelo, quoniam non poterunt adtrahere in partes Antichristi sanctos Christi. Et ipse erit ignis, qui comedet eos, et hoc a Deo, quia Dei munere insuperabiles fiunt sancti, unde excruciantur inimici. Sicut enim in bono positum est: Zelus domus tuae comedit me: ita e contrario: Zelus occupauit plebem ineruditam, et nunc ignis contrarios comedet.	Next it says: "And fire came down from heaven and devoured them." This is not to be thought the final punishment, which will come when it is said, "Depart from me, you accursed, into the eternal fire." For then they will be cast into the fire; fire will not come from heaven upon them. Here, however, the fire from heaven is well understood as the very steadfastness of the saints, which will keep them from yielding to those who rage against them and doing their will. For heaven is the firmament, and by its firmness those enemies will be tormented with burning zeal, because they will not be able to draw the saints of Christ over to the side of Antichrist. And this will be the fire that devours them. It comes from God, since it is by God's gift that the saints become unconquerable, and this is what torments their enemies. For just as it is said in a good sense, "Zeal for your house has devoured me," so it is said in the opposite sense: "Zeal has seized an untaught people, and now fire will devour the adversaries."[49]

48 Revelation 20:9.
49 Revelation 20:9; Matthew 25:41; Psalm 68:10 (69:9 in most English Bibles); Isaiah 26:11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Et nunc utique, excepto scilicet ultimi illius igne iudicii. Aut si eam plagam, qua percutiendi sunt ecclesiae persecutores ueniente iam Christo, quos uiuentes inueniet super terram, quando interficiet Antichristum spiritu oris sui, ignem appellauit descendentem de caelo eosque comedentem: neque hoc ultimum supplicium erit inpiorum, sed illud quod facta corporum resurrectione passuri sunt.	"And now"—that is, apart, of course, from the fire of that last judgment. When Christ comes, he will slay Antichrist with the breath of his mouth, and he will strike the persecutors of the Church whom he finds alive on earth. Or perhaps it is this blow that the book has called fire coming down from heaven and devouring them. Even so, this will not be the final punishment of the ungodly. That will be the punishment they are to suffer once the resurrection of bodies has taken place.[50]

WHETHER THE TIME OF ANTICHRIST'S PERSECUTION SHOULD BE COUNTED IN THE THOUSAND YEARS

The saints reign with Christ even during the three and a half years of Antichrist.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.13 Haec persecutio nouissima, quae futura est ab Antichristo (sicut iam diximus, quia et in hoc libro superius et aput Danielem prophetam positum est), tribus annis et sex mensibus erit. Quod tempus, quamuis exiguum, utrum ad mille annos pertineat, quibus et diabolum ligatum dicit et sanctos regnare cum Christo, an eisdem annis hoc paruum spatium superaddatur adque extra sit, merito ambigitur; quia, si dixerimus ad eosdem annos hoc pertinere, non tanto tempore, sed prolixiore cum Christo regnum sanctorum reperietur extendi quam diabolus adligari. Profecto enim sancti cum suo rege etiam in ipsa praecipue persecutione regnabunt mala tanta uincentes, quando iam diabolus non erit adligatus, ut eos persequi omnibus uiribus possit.	This last persecution, which the Antichrist will bring, will last three years and six months, as we have already said, since this is stated both earlier in this book and in the prophet Daniel. This period is short. But does it belong to the thousand years in which, he says, the devil is bound and the saints reign with Christ, or is this short span added to those years and outside them? The question is a fair one. If we say that it belongs to the same years, the reign of the saints with Christ will turn out to last longer than the binding of the devil, not the same length of time. For surely the saints will reign with their King even in that persecution, and especially in it, overcoming such great evils, at a time when the devil will no longer be bound and can persecute them with all his strength.[51]
Quo modo ergo ista scriptura eisdem mille annis utrumque determinat, diaboli scilicet adligationem regnumque sanctorum, cum trium annorum et sex mensum interuallo prius desinat adligatio diaboli quam regnum sanctorum in his annis mille cum Christo? Si autem dixerimus paruum persecutionis huius hoc spatium non conputandum in mille annis, sed eis inpletis potius adiciendum, ut proprie possit intellegi, quod, cum dixisset: Sacerdotes Dei et Christi regnabunt cum eo mille annis, adiecit: Et cum finiti fuerint mille anni, soluetur satanas de custodia sua;	How, then, does this scripture assign both things, the binding of the devil and the reign of the saints, to the same thousand years, when the devil's binding ends three years and six months before the saints' reign with Christ in these thousand years? Suppose instead we say that this short span of persecution is not to be counted within the thousand years but added after they are completed. Then we could take in its proper sense the fact that, after saying, "The priests of God and of Christ will reign with him a thousand years," he added, "And when the thousand years are ended, Satan will be released from his prison";[52]
isto enim modo et regnum sanctorum et uinculum diaboli simul cessatura esse significat, ut deinde persecutionis	for in this way he indicates that the reign of the saints and the bondage of the devil will end at the 50 2 Thessalonians 2:8.

51 Daniel 7:25 and 12:7 speak of "a time, times, and half a time," understood as three and a half years.

LATIN

illius tempus nec ad sanctorum regnum nec ad custodiam satanae, quorum utrumque in mille annis est, pertinere, sed superadditum et extra conputandum esse credatur: cogemur fateri sanctos in illa persecutione regnaturos non esse cum Christo; sed quis audeat tunc cum illo non regnatura sua membra, quando ei maxime adque fortissime cohaerebunt, et quo tempore, quanto erit acrior inpetus belli, tanto maior gloria non cedendi, tanto densior corona martyrii?

Aut si propter tribulationes, quas passuri sunt, non dicendi sunt regnaturi: consequens erit, ut etiam superioribus diebus in eisdem mille annis, quicumque tribulabantur sanctorum, eo ipso tempore tribulationis suae cum Christo non regnasse dicantur; ac per hoc et illi, quorum animas auctor libri huius uidisse se scribit occisorum propter testimonium Iesu et propter uerbum Dei, non regnabant cum Christo, quando patiebantur persecutionem, et ipsi regnum Christi non erant, quos Christus excellentius possidebat. Absurdissimum id quidem et omni modo auersandum. Sed certe animae uictrices gloriosissimorum martyrum omnibus doloribus ac laboribus superatis adque finitis, postea quam mortalia membra posuerunt, cum Christo utique regnauerunt et regnant, donec finiantur mille anni, ut postea receptis etiam corporibus iam inmortalibus regnent.

Proinde tribus illis annis adque dimidio animae occisorum pro eius martyrio, et quae antea de corporibus exierunt, et quae ipsa nouissima persecutione sunt exiturae, regnabunt cum illo, donec finiatur mortale saeculum et ad illud regnum, ubi mors non erit, transeatur. Quocirca cum Christo regnantium sanctorum plures anni erunt quam uinculi diaboli adque custodiae, quia illi cum suo rege Dei filio iam diabolo non ligato etiam per tres illos annos ac semissem regnabunt.

Remanet igitur, ut, cum audimus: Sacerdotes Dei et Christi regnabunt cum eo mille annis, et cum finiti same time. The time of that persecution would then be thought to belong neither to the reign of the saints nor to the imprisonment of Satan, both of which fall within the thousand years, but to be added on and counted outside them. But then we shall be forced to admit that the saints will not reign with Christ during that persecution. And who would dare to say that his members will not reign with him then? At that time they will cling to him most closely and most firmly. At that time, the fiercer the onslaught of war, the greater will be the glory of not yielding, and the richer the crown of martyrdom.

ENGLISH

Or perhaps they are not to be said to reign because of the tribulations they will suffer. In that case it will follow that in the earlier days within these same thousand years, any of the saints who suffered tribulation must also be said not to have reigned with Christ during the time of their tribulation. And so even those whose souls the author of this book writes that he saw, the souls of those slain for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God, were not reigning with Christ when they suffered persecution. They themselves would not have been Christ's kingdom, even though Christ possessed them in a more excellent way. That is utterly absurd and must be rejected entirely. Surely the victorious souls of the most glorious martyrs overcame all their pains and toils and came to the end of them. After they laid aside their mortal members, they reigned with Christ and still reign, until the thousand years are ended. Afterward they will reign with their bodies restored as well, and those bodies will then be immortal.

Accordingly, during those three and a half years the souls of those slain for their witness to him will reign with him. This includes both those that left their bodies earlier and those that will leave them in that last persecution. They will reign until this mortal age comes to an end and we pass into that kingdom where there will be no death. Therefore the years of the saints reigning with Christ will be more than the years of the devil's chain and prison. For they will reign with their King, the Son of God, during those three and a half years as well, when the devil is no longer bound.

It remains, then, that when we hear, "The priests of God and of Christ will reign with him a thou-

LATIN	ENGLISH
fuerint mille anni, soluetur satanas de custodia sua, aut non regni huius sanctorum intellegamus annos mille finiri, sed uinculi diaboli adque custodiae, ut annos mille, id est annos omnes suos, quaeque pars habeat diuersis ac propriis prolixitatibus finiendos, ampliore sanctorum regno, breuiore diaboli uinculo; aut certe, quoniam trium annorum et sex mensum breuissimum spatium est, conputari noluisse credatur, siue quod minus satanae uinculum, siue quod amplius uidetur regnum habere sanctorum, sicut de quadringentis annis in sexto decimo huius operis uolumine disputaui; quoniam plus aliquid erant, et tamen quadringenti sunt nuncupati; et talia saepe reperiuntur in litteris sacris, si quis aduertat.	sand years, and when the thousand years are ended, Satan will be released from his prison," we must understand one of two things. The first possibility is that it is not the thousand years of this reign of the saints that end, but those of the devil's bondage and prison. Each would then have its thousand years, that is, all its years, ending after different spans of its own: the saints' reign longer, the devil's bondage shorter. The other possibility is that, since three years and six months is a very short span, Scripture chose not to count it, either because Satan's bondage seems to fall short of it or because the saints' reign seems to exceed it. I argued in the same way about the four hundred years in the sixteenth book of this work: they were somewhat more, and yet they were called four hundred. Such things are often found in the sacred writings, if one pays attention.[53]

THE CONDEMNATION OF THE DEVIL WITH HIS FOLLOWERS, AND, BY WAY OF RECAPITULATION, THE BODILY RESURRECTION OF ALL THE DEAD AND THE JUDGMENT OF FINAL REWARD AND PUNISHMENT

Revelation's great white throne, the books, and the judgment of all the dead.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.14 Post hanc autem commemorationem nouissimae persecutionis breuiter conplectitur totum, quod ultimo iam iudicio diabolus et cum suo principe ciuitas inimica passura est. Dicit enim: Et diabolus, qui seducebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuris, quo et bestia et pseudopropheta; et cruciabuntur die ac nocte in saecula saeculorum. Bestiam bene intellegi ipsam inpiam ciuitatem supra diximus. Pseudopropheta uero eius aut Antichristus est aut imago illa, id est figmentum, de quo ibi locuti sumus. Post haec ipsum nouissimum iudicium, quod erit in secunda resurrectione mortuorum, quae corporum est, recapitulando narrans quo modo sibi fuerit reuelatum: Et uidi, inquit, thronum magnum et candidum et sedentem super eum, cuius a facie fugit caelum et terra, et locus eorum inuentus non est.	After this mention of the last persecution, he briefly sums up everything that the devil, and the hostile city together with its prince, will suffer at the last judgment. For he says: "And the devil, who deceived them, was thrown into the lake of fire and sulfur, where the beast and the false prophet also are; and they will be tormented day and night forever and ever." We said above that the beast is rightly understood as the ungodly city itself. Its false prophet is either the Antichrist or that image, that is, the counterfeit, which we discussed there. After this he goes back over the ground and tells how the last judgment itself was revealed to him. That judgment will take place at the second resurrection of the dead, which is the resurrection of the body. "And I saw," he says, "a great white throne and one seated on it, from whose face heaven and earth fled, and no place was found for them."[54]
Non ait: Vidi thronum magnum et candidum et sedentem super eum, et ab eius facie fugit caelum et terra, quoniam non tunc factum est, id est, antequam esset de uiuis et	He does not say, "I saw a great white throne and one seated on it, and heaven and earth fled from

52 Revelation 20:6–7.
53 See City of God 16.24, on the four hundred years of Genesis 15:13.
54 Revelation 20:10–11.

LATIN

mortuis iudicatum; sed eum se uidisse dixit in throno sedentem, a cuius facie fugit caelum et terra, sed postea. Peracto quippe iudicio, tunc esse desinet hoc caelum et haec terra, quando incipiet esse caelum nouum et terra noua. Mutatione namque rerum, non omni modo interitu transibit hic mundus. Unde et apostolus dicit: Praeterit enim figura huius mundi, uolo uos sine sollicitudine esse. Figura ergo praeterit, non natura.

Cum ergo se Iohannes uidisse dixisset sedentem super thronum, cuius a facie, quod postea futurum est, fugit caelum et terra: Et uidi, inquit, mortuos magnos et pusillos, et aperti sunt libri; et alius liber apertus est, qui est uitae uniuscuiusque; et iudicati sunt mortui ex ipsis scripturis librorum secundum facta sua. Libros dixit esse apertos et librum; sed librum cuius modi non tacuit: Qui est, inquit, uitae uniuscuiusque. Ergo illi libri, quos priore loco posuit, intellegendi sunt sancti, et ueteres et noui, ut in illis ostenderetur, quae Deus fieri sua mandata iussisset; in illo autem, qui est uitae uniuscuiusque, quid horum quisque non fecisset siue fecisset. Qui liber si carnaliter cogitetur, quis eius magnitudinem aut longitudinem ualeat aestimare?

Aut quanto tempore legi poterit liber, in quo scriptae sunt uniuersae uitae uniuersorum? An tantus angelorum numerus aderit, quantus hominum erit, et uitam suam quisque ab angelo sibi adhibito audiet recitari? Non ergo unus liber erit omnium, sed singuli singulorum. Scriptura uero ista unum uolens intellegi: Et alius, inquit, liber apertus est. Quaedam igitur uis est intellegenda diuina, qua fiet, ut cuique opera sua, uel bona uel mala, cuncta in memoriam reuocentur et mentis intuitu mira celeritate cernantur, ut accuset uel excuset scientia conscientiam adque ita simul et omnes et singuli iudicentur. Quae nimirum uis diuina libri nomen accepit. In ea quippe quodam modo legitur, quidquid ea faciente recolitur.

ENGLISH

his face." That did not happen then, that is, before judgment had been passed on the living and the dead. What he said is that he saw seated on the throne one from whose face heaven and earth fled, but this fleeing came later. For once the judgment is complete, this heaven and this earth will cease to be, when a new heaven and a new earth begin to be. This world will pass away through a change in things, not through total destruction. That is why the apostle also says: "For the form of this world is passing away; I want you to be free from anxiety." So it is the form that passes away, not the nature.[55]

John had said that he saw one seated on the throne from whose face heaven and earth fled, which is something that will happen later. He then says: "And I saw the dead, great and small, and books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of each person's life; and the dead were judged by what was written in those books, according to their deeds." He said that books were opened, and also a book. And he did not leave unsaid what kind of book this was: "which is," he says, "the book of each person's life." So the books he mentioned first are to be understood as the holy books, both Old and New, which show the commandments God ordered to be carried out. The other book, the book of each person's life, shows which of these commandments each person failed to do or did. If this book is pictured in bodily terms, who could estimate its size or length?[56]

And how long would it take to read a book in which all the lives of all people are written? Will there be as many angels present as there will be human beings, and will each person hear his life read aloud by an angel assigned to him? Then there would not be one book for all, but a separate book for each. But this scripture wants us to understand one book: "And another book," it says, "was opened." We must therefore understand a kind of divine power that will bring all of each person's works, good or bad, back to memory, so that the mind sees them all with marvelous speed. In this way knowledge will accuse or excuse conscience, and all will be judged at once, and each

55 1 Corinthians 7:31–32.
56 Revelation 20:12.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	one individually. This divine power, no doubt, is what received the name of a book. For in it, in a certain sense, is read whatever its action brings back to mind.
Ut autem ostendat, qui mortui iudicandi sint, pusilli et magni, recapitulando dicit tamquam ad id rediens, quod praeterierat potiusue distulerat: Et exhibuit mortuos mare, qui in eo erant, et mors et infernus reddiderunt mortuos, quos in se habebant. Hoc procul dubio prius factum est, quam essent mortui iudicati; et tamen illud prius dictum est. Hoc est ergo quod dixi, recapitulando eum ad id redisse quod intermiserat. Nunc autem ordinem tenuit, adque ut explicaretur ipse ordo, commodius etiam de iudicatis mortuis, quod iam dixerat, suo repetiuit loco. Cum enim dixisset: Et ex hibuit mortuos mare, qui in eo erant, et mors et infernus reddiderunt mortuos, quos in se habebant: mox addidit quod paulo ante posuerat: Et iudicati sunt singuli secundum facta sua.	Next he wants to show which dead are to be judged, small and great. So he goes back over the ground, as if returning to something he had passed over, or rather put off: "And the sea gave up the dead who were in it, and death and the underworld gave back the dead that they held." This undoubtedly happened before the dead were judged, and yet the judgment was mentioned first. This is what I meant when I said that, in going back over the ground, he returned to what he had left out. Here, though, he kept to the order. And to set that order out, he also, more fittingly, repeated in its proper place what he had already said about the judging of the dead. For when he had said, "And the sea gave up the dead who were in it, and death and the underworld gave back the dead that they held," he immediately added what he had stated a little earlier: "And they were judged, each according to their deeds."[57]
Hoc est enim quod supra dixerat: Et iudicati sunt mortui secundum facta sua.	For this is what he had said above: "And the dead were judged according to their deeds."

WHO THE DEAD ARE WHOM THE SEA GAVE UP FOR JUDGMENT, AND WHOM DEATH AND THE UNDERWORLD GAVE BACK

The sea that gives up its dead stands for this world; death and the underworld for the rest.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.15 Sed qui sunt mortui, quos exhibuit mare, qui in eo erant? Neque enim qui in mari moriuntur, non sunt in inferno, aut corpora eorum seruantur in mari, aut, quod est absurdius, mare habebat bonos mortuos et infernus malos. Quis hoc putauerit? Sed profecto conuenienter quidam hoc loco mare pro isto saeculo positum accipiunt. Cum ergo et quos hic inueniet Christus in corpore constitutos simul significaret cum eis, qui resurrecturi sunt, iudicandos, etiam ipsos mortuos appellauit, et bonos, quibus dicitur: Mortui enim estis, et uita uestra abscondita est cum Christo in Deo, et malos, de quibus dicitur: Sine mortuos sepelire mortuos suos.	But who are the dead whom the sea gave up, the ones who were in it? It cannot mean that those who die at sea are not in the underworld, or that their bodies are kept in the sea. Still more absurd would be the idea that the sea held the good dead and the underworld the wicked. Who would think that? Some, quite fittingly, take "the sea" in this passage to stand for this world. Christ will find some people here still living in the body. The writer wanted to show that they will be judged together with those who are to rise again, and so he called them "dead" too. This covers both the good, to whom it is said, "For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God," and the wicked, of whom it is said, "Let the dead bury their own dead."[58]

57 Revelation 20:13.

LATIN

Possunt mortui etiam propter hoc dici, quod mortalia gerunt corpora; unde apostolus: Corpus quidem, inquit, mortuum est propter peccatum; spiritus autem uita est propter iustitiam, utrumque in homine uiuente adque in hoc corpore constituto esse demonstrans, et corpus mortuum et spiritum uitam. Nec tamen dixit corpus mortale, sed mortuum, quamuis eadem paulo post etiam mortalia corpora, sicut usitatius uocantur, appellet. Hos ergo mortuos exhibuit mare, qui in eo erant, id est, exhibuit homines hoc saeculum, quicumque in eo erant, quia nondum obierant. Et mors et infernus, inquit, reddiderunt mortuos, quos in se habebant. Mare exhibuit, quia, sicut inuenti sunt, adfuerunt; mors uero et infernus reddiderunt, quoniam uitae, de qua iam exierant, reuocarunt.

ENGLISH

They can also be called dead because they bear mortal bodies. Hence the apostle says: "The body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness." He shows that both are present in a person who is alive and still in this body: a dead body and a spirit that is life. Yet he did not say a "mortal" body but a "dead" one, although a little later he calls the same bodies "mortal," as they are more usually called. These, then, are the dead whom the sea gave up, the ones who were in it. That is, this world gave up all the people who were in it, because they had not yet died. "And death and the underworld," he says, "gave back the dead that they held." The sea gave up its dead, because they came forward just as they were found. Death and the underworld gave back theirs, because they called them back to the life they had already left.[59]

Nec frustra fortasse non satis fuit ut diceret mors aut infernus, sed utrumque dictum est: mors propter bonos, qui tantummodo mortem perpeti potuerunt, non et infernum; infernus autem propter malos, qui etiam poenas aput inferos pendunt. Si enim non absurde credi uidetur antiquos etiam sanctos, qui uenturi Christi tenuerunt fidem, locis quidem a tormentis inpiorum remotissimis, sed aput inferos fuisse, donec eos inde Christi sanguis et ad ea loca descensus erueret, profecto deinceps boni fideles effuso illo pretio iam redemti prorsus inferos nesciunt, donec etiam receptis corporibus bona recipiant, quae merentur.

And perhaps there is a reason why it was not enough to say "death" or "the underworld," and both were said. Death is mentioned for the sake of the good, who could undergo only death and not the underworld as well. The underworld is mentioned for the sake of the wicked, who also pay penalties in the underworld. It does not seem absurd to believe that even the holy people of old, who held faith in the Christ who was to come, were in the underworld until Christ's blood and his descent into those places rescued them. They were in places far removed from the torments of the ungodly, but still in the underworld. If so, then surely from that time on good believers, redeemed by the price that was poured out, know nothing of the underworld at all. They remain so until they receive their bodies back as well, together with the good things they deserve.

Cum autem dixisset: Et iudicati sunt singuli secundum facta sua, breuiter subiecit, quem ad modum fuerint iudicati: Et mors et infernus, inquit, missi sunt in stagnum ignis, his nominibus significans diabolum, quoniam mortis est auctor infernarumque poenarum, uniuersamque simul daemonum societatem. Hoc est enim quod supra euidentius praeoccupando iam dixerat: Et diabolus, qui seducebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuris. Quod uero ibi obscurius adiunxerat dicens: Quo et bestia et pseudopropheta, hic apertius: Et

When he had said, "And they were judged, each according to their deeds," he briefly added how they were judged: "And death and the underworld," he says, "were thrown into the lake of fire." By these names he means the devil, since the devil is the author of death and of the penalties of the underworld, and with him the whole fellowship of demons. This is what he had already said above, more clearly and in anticipation: "And the devil, who deceived them, was thrown into the lake of 58 Colossians 3:3; Matthew 8:22.

59 Romans 8:10–11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
qui non sunt, inquit, inuenti in libro uitae scripti, missi sunt in stagnum ignis. Non Deum liber iste commemorat, ne obliuione fallatur; sed praedestinationem significat eorum, quibus aeterna dabitur uita.	fire and sulfur." What he had added there more obscurely, "where the beast and the false prophet also are," he states here more openly: "And those who were not found written in the book of life were thrown into the lake of fire." This book is not a reminder for God, as though forgetfulness might lead him astray. Rather, it signifies the predestination of those to whom eternal life will be given.[60]
Neque enim nescit eos Deus et in hoc libro legit, ut sciat; sed potius ipsa eius praescientia de illis, quae falli non potest, liber est uitae, in quo sunt scripti, id est ante praecogniti.	For it is not that God does not know them and reads this book in order to know them. Rather, his foreknowledge of them, which cannot be mistaken, is itself the book of life. They are written in it, that is, known in advance.

THE NEW HEAVEN AND THE NEW EARTH

After the judgment this world will pass away by fire and be renewed.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.16 Finito autem iudicio, quo praenuntiauit iudicandos malos, restat ut etiam de bonis dicat. Iam enim explicauit quod breuiter a Domino dictum est: Sic ibunt isti in supplicium aeternum; sequitur ut explicet, quod etiam ibi conectitur: Iusti autem in uitam aeternam. Et uidi, inquit, caelum nouum et terram nouam. Nam primum caelum et terra recesserunt, et mare iam non est. Isto fiet ordine, quod superius praeoccupando iam dixit, uidisse se super thronum sedentem, cuius a facie fugit caelum et terra.	Now that he has finished with the judgment in which, as he foretold, the wicked are to be judged, it remains for him to speak of the good as well. He has already explained what the Lord said briefly: "So these will go away into eternal punishment." Next he must explain what is joined to it there: "but the righteous into eternal life." "And I saw," he says, "a new heaven and a new earth. For the first heaven and earth had passed away, and the sea is no more." This will happen in the order he already indicated earlier, in anticipation, when he said he saw one seated on the throne, from whose face heaven and earth fled.[61]
Iudicatis quippe his, qui scripti non sunt in libro uitae, et in aeternum ignem missis (qui ignis cuius modi et in qua mundi uel rerum parte futurus sit, hominem scire arbitror neminem, nisi forte cui Spiritus diuinus ostendit), tunc figura huius mundi mundanorum ignium conflagratione praeteribit, sicut factum est mundanarum aquarum inundatione diluuium. Illa itaque, ut dixi, conflagratione mundana elementorum corruptibilium qualitates, quae corporibus nostris corruptibilibus congruebant, ardendo penitus interibunt, adque ipsa substantia eas qualitates habebit, quae corporibus inmortalibus mirabili mutatione conueniant; ut scilicet mundus in melius innouatus apte adcommodetur hominibus etiam carne in melius innouatis. Quod autem ait: Et mare iam non est: utrum maximo illo ardore	Those who are not written in the book of life will be judged and sent into the eternal fire. What kind of fire that is, and in what part of the world or of the universe it will be, I think no human being knows, unless perhaps someone to whom the divine Spirit has revealed it. Then the form of this world will pass away in a burning of the world's fires, just as the flood came about through an inundation of the world's waters. In that burning of the world, as I said, the qualities of the corruptible elements, which suited our corruptible bodies, will perish utterly in the fire. The substance itself will then have those qualities which, by a marvelous change, befit immortal bodies. In this way the world, renewed for the better, will be fittingly

60 Revelation 20:14–15.
61 Matthew 25:46; Revelation 21:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
siccetur an et ipsum uertatur in melius, non facile dixerim.	adapted to human beings who have also been renewed for the better in their flesh. As for his saying, "and the sea is no more," I could not easily say whether the sea will be dried up by that intense heat or whether it too will be changed for the better.
Caelum quippe nouum et terram nouam futuram legimus, de mari autem nouo aliquid me uspiam legisse non recolo; nisi quod in hoc eodem libro reperitur: Tamquam mare uitreum simile crystallo.	For we read that there will be a new heaven and a new earth, but I do not recall having read anything anywhere about a new sea. The only exception is what is found in this same book: "something like a sea of glass, like crystal."[62]
Sed tunc non de isto fine saeculi loquebatur, nec proprie dixisse uidetur mare, sed tamquam mare. Quamuis et nunc, sicut amat prophetica locutio propriis uerbis translata miscere ac sic quodam modo uelare quod dicitur, potuit de illo mari dicere: Et mare iam non est, de quo supra dixerat: Et exhibuit mortuos mare, qui in eo erant. Iam enim tunc non erit hoc saeculum uita mortalium turbulentum et procellosum, quod maris nomine figurauit.	But there he was not speaking of this end of the world. Nor does he seem to have said "sea" in the literal sense, but "something like a sea." Prophetic language loves to mix figurative words with literal ones and so, in a way, to veil what is said. So even here he could have meant, by "and the sea is no more," the same sea of which he had said above: "And the sea gave up the dead who were in it." For then this world, turbulent and stormy with the life of mortals, will no longer exist, and it was this world that he represented by the name "sea."

THE GLORIFICATION OF THE CHURCH WITHOUT END AFTER THE END

The new Jerusalem's glory, with no tears or death, belongs to the world to come.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.17 Et ciuitatem, inquit, magnam Hierusalem nouam uidi descendentem de caelo a Deo, aptatam, quasi nouam nuptam ornatam marito suo. Et audiui uocem magnam de throno dicentem: Ecce tabernaculum Dei cum hominibus, et habitabit cum eis, et erunt ipsi populus eius, et ipse Deus erit cum eis. Et absterget omnem lacrimam ab oculis eorum: et mors iam non erit neque luctus neque clamor, sed nec dolor ullus, quia priora abierunt. Et dixit sedens in throno: Ecce noua facio omnia. De caelo descendere ista ciuitas dicitur, quoniam caelestis est gratia, qua Deus eam fecit. Propter quod ei dicit etiam per Esaiam: Ego sum Dominus faciens te.	"And I saw," he says, "the great city, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared like a new bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a loud voice from the throne saying: 'See, the dwelling of God is with human beings, and he will dwell with them, and they will be his people, and God himself will be with them. And he will wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death will be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor any pain, for the former things have passed away.' And the one seated on the throne said: 'See, I am making all things new.'" This city is said to come down from heaven because the grace by which God made it is heavenly. That is why he also says to it through Isaiah: "I am the Lord who made you."[63]
Et de caelo quidem ab initio sui descendit, ex quo per huius saeculi tempus gratia Dei desuper ueniente per	Indeed, it has been coming down from heaven since its beginning. Throughout the time of this

62 Revelation 4:6.
63 Revelation 21:2–5; Isaiah 45:8 (in the Greek version).

LATIN

lauacrum regenerationis in Spiritu sancto misso de caelo subinde ciues eius adcrescunt. Sed per iudicium Dei, quod erit nouissimum per eius filium Iesum Christum, tanta eius et tam noua de Dei munere claritas apparebit, ut nulla remaneant uestigia uetustatis; quando quidem et corpora ad incorruptionem adque inmortalitatem nouam ex uetere corruptione ac mortalitate transibunt. Nam hoc de isto tempore accipere, quo regnat cum rege suo mille annis, inpudentiae nimiae mihi uidetur, cum apertissime dicat: Absterget omnem lacrimam ab oculis eorum; et mors iam non erit neque luctus neque clamor, sed nec dolor ullus.

Quis uero tam sit absurdus et obstinatissima contentione uesanus, qui audeat adfirmare in huius mortalitatis aerumnis, non dico populum sanctum, sed unumquemque sanctorum, qui hanc uel ducat uel ducturus sit uel duxerit uitam, nullas habentem lacrimas et dolores; cum potius quanto est quisque sanctior et desiderii sancti plenior, tanto sit eius in orando fletus uberior? An non est uox ciuitatis supernae Hierusalem: Factae sunt mihi lacrimae meae panis die ac nocte, et: Lauabo per singulas noctes lectum meum, in lacrimis meis stratum meum rigabo, et: Gemitus meus non est absconditus a te, et: Dolor meus renouatus est?

Aut uero non eius filii sunt, qui ingemescunt grauati, in quo nolunt spoliari, sed superuestiri, ut absorbeatur mortale a uita? Nonne ipsi sunt, qui primitias habentes Spiritus in semet ipsis ingemescunt, adoptionem exspectantes, redemtionem corporis sui? An ipse apostolus Paulus non erat supernus Hierosolymitanus, uel non multo magis hoc erat, quando pro Israelitis carnalibus fratribus suis tristitia illi erat magna et continuus dolor cordi eius? Quando autem mors non erit in ista ciuitate, nisi quando dicetur: Ubi est, mors, contentio tua? Ubi est, mors, aculeus tuus? Aculeus autem mortis est peccatum. Quod tunc utique non erit, quando dicetur: Ubi est?

Nunc uero non quilibet infimus ciuis illius ciuitatis, sed idem iste Iohannes in epistula sua clamat: Si dixerimus, age, the grace of God comes from above through the washing of regeneration in the Holy Spirit sent from heaven, and so its citizens keep increasing. But through God's judgment, the last judgment, which will be carried out through his Son Jesus Christ, God's gift will reveal a splendor in it so great and so new that no trace of the old will remain. For even bodies will pass from their old corruption and mortality into a new incorruption and immortality. Some take this to refer to the present time, in which the city reigns with its King for a thousand years. That seems to me far too shameless, since he says most plainly: "He will wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death will be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor any pain."

ENGLISH

Who could be so absurd, so out of his mind with stubborn contentiousness, as to dare to claim that someone amid the hardships of this mortal life has no tears and no pains? I do not mean the holy people as a whole, but any single one of the saints who is living this life, will live it, or has lived it. On the contrary, the holier a person is and the fuller of holy longing, the more abundant are his tears in prayer. Is it not the voice of the city on high, Jerusalem, that says: "My tears have been my bread day and night"? And: "Every night I will wash my bed; I will drench my couch with my tears"? And: "My groaning is not hidden from you"? And: "My sorrow has been renewed"?[64]

Or are they not her children who groan under their burden, because they do not want to be stripped but to be clothed over, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life? Are they not the very ones who have the firstfruits of the Spirit and groan within themselves, awaiting adoption, the redemption of their body? Was the apostle Paul himself not a citizen of the Jerusalem on high? Was he not all the more so when he had great sorrow and unceasing pain in his heart for the Israelites, his brothers according to the flesh? And when will there be no death in that city, except when it is said: "Where, O death, is your struggle? Where, O death, is your sting? The sting of death is sin"? Sin will certainly not exist then, when it is said: "Where is it?"[65]

But now it is not some lowly citizen of that city who cries out. It is this same John, who says in his

LATIN	ENGLISH
quia peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus, et ueritas in nobis non est. Et in hoc quidem libro, cuius nomen est apocalypsis, obscure multa dicuntur, ut mentem legentis exerceant, et pauca in eo sunt, ex quorum manifestatione indagentur cetera cum labore; maxime quia sic eadem multis modis repetit, ut alia adque alia dicere uideatur, cum aliter adque aliter haec ipsa dicere uestigetur.	letter: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." In this book, called the Apocalypse, many things are indeed said obscurely, in order to exercise the reader's mind. Only a few things in it are clear enough to let us track down the rest, and even then only with effort. This is above all because it repeats the same things in so many ways that it seems to be saying one thing and then another. Yet on investigation it turns out to be saying the very same things, now one way and now another.[66]
Verum in his uerbis, ubi ait: Absterget omnem lacrimam ab oculis eorum, et mors iam non erit neque luctus neque clamor, sed nec dolor ullus, tanta luce dicta sunt de saeculo futuro et de inmortalitate adque aeternitate sanctorum (tunc enim solum adque ibi solum ista non erunt), ut nulla debeamus in litteris sacris quaerere uel legere manifesta, si haec putauerimus obscura.	But consider these words, where he says: "He will wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death will be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor any pain." These things are said with such clarity about the world to come and about the immortality and eternity of the saints that, if we think them obscure, we should not look for or read anything plain in the sacred writings at all. For only then, and only there, will these things cease to exist.

WHAT THE APOSTLE PETER PREACHED ABOUT GOD'S LAST JUDGMENT

Peter foretells that the present heavens and earth are kept for fire on the day of judgment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.18 Nunc iam uideamus, quid etiam apostolus Petrus de hoc iudicio scripserit: Venient, inquit, in nouissimo dierum inlusione inludentes, secundum proprias concupiscentias suas euntes et dicentes: Ubi est promissum praesentiae ipsius? Ex quo enim patres dormierunt, sic omnia perseuerant ab initio creaturae. Latet enim illos hoc uolentes, quia caeli erant olim et terra de aqua, et per aquam constituta Dei uerbo, per quae qui tunc erat mundus, aqua inundatus deperiit. Qui autem nunc sunt caeli et terra, eodem uerbo repositi sunt, igni reseruandi in diem iudicii et perditionis hominum inpiorum. Hoc unum uero non lateat uos, carissimi, quia unus dies aput Dominum sicut mille anni et mille anni sicut dies unus.	Now let us see what the apostle Peter also wrote about this judgment. "In the last of the days," he says, "scoffers will come with their scoffing, following their own desires and saying: 'Where is the promise of his presence? For ever since the fathers fell asleep, all things have continued as they were from the beginning of creation.' For they willingly overlook this: that there were heavens long ago, and an earth formed out of water and through water by the word of God, and through these the world that then existed was flooded with water and perished. But the heavens and the earth that exist now have been set in place again by the same word, reserved for fire on the day of judgment and of the destruction of ungodly people. But do not let this one thing escape you, beloved: that with the Lord one day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years like one day.[67]
Non tardat Dominus promissum, sicut quidam tarditatem existimant; sed patienter fert propter uos, nolens	The Lord is not slow about his promise, as some reckon slowness; rather, he is patient for your 65 2 Corinthians 5:4; Romans 8:23; Romans 9:2–3; 1 Corinthians 15:55–56.

64 Psalms 41:4, 6:7, 37:10, 38:3 (42:3, 6:6, 38:9, 39:2 in most English Bibles).
66 1 John 1:8.

LATIN

aliquem perire, sed omnes in paenitentiam conuerti. Veniet autem dies Domini ut fur, in quo caeli magno inpetu transcurrent, elementa autem ardentia resoluentur et terra et quae in ipsa sunt opera exurentur. His ergo omnibus pereuntibus quales oportet esse uos in sanctis conuersationibus exspectantes et properantes ad praesentiam diei Domini, per quam caeli ardentes soluentur et elementa ignis ardore decoquentur?

Nouos uero caelos et terram nouam secundum promissa ipsius exspectamus, in quibus iustitia inhabitat. Nihil hic dixit de resurrectione mortuorum, sed sane de perditione mundi huius satis. Ubi etiam commemorans factum ante diluuium uidetur admonuisse quodam modo, quatenus in fine huius saeculi mundum istum periturum esse credamus. Nam et illo tempore perisse dixit, qui tunc erat, mundum; nec solum orbem terrae, uerum etiam caelos, quos utique istos aerios intellegimus, quorum locum ac spatium tunc aqua crescendo superauerat. Ergo totus aut paene totus aer iste uentosus (quod caelum uel potius caelos uocat, sed utique istos imos, non illos supremos, ubi sol et luna et sidera constituta sunt) conuersus fuerat in umidam qualitatem adque hoc modo cum terra perierat, cuius terrae utique prior facies fuerat deleta diluuio.

Qui autem nunc sunt, inquit, caeli et terra, eodem uerbo repositi sunt, igni reseruandi in diem iudicii et perditionis hominum inpiorum. Proinde qui caeli et quae terra, id est, qui mundus pro eo mundo, qui diluuio periit, ex eadem aqua repositus est, ipse igni nouissimo reseruatur in diem iudicii et perditionis hominum inpiorum. Nam et hominum propter magnam quandam commutationem non dubitat dicere perditionem futuram, cum tamen eorum quamuis in aeternis poenis sit mansura natura. Quaerat forsitan aliquis, si post factum iudicium iste mundus ardebit, antequam pro illo caelum nouum et terra noua reponatur, eo ipso tempore conflagrationis eius ubi erunt sancti, cum eos habentes corpora in aliquo corporali loco esse necesse sit.

ENGLISH

sake, not wanting anyone to perish, but all to turn to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come like a thief. On that day the heavens will pass away with a great rush, the elements will burn and be dissolved, and the earth and the works that are in it will be burned up. Since all these things are perishing, then, what sort of people ought you to be in holy ways of life, as you wait for and hasten toward the presence of the day of the Lord, through which the heavens will burn and be dissolved, and the elements will melt in the heat of the fire?

But according to his promises we are waiting for new heavens and a new earth, in which righteousness dwells." Here he has said nothing about the resurrection of the dead, but certainly enough about the destruction of this world. And by recalling what happened before the flood, he seems in a way to have given us a hint as to how far we should believe that this world will perish at the end of this age. For he said that at that time too the world that then existed perished—and not only the globe of the earth but also the heavens. By these we certainly understand the heavens of the air, whose place and space the water had then overtopped as it rose. So all or nearly all of this windy air (which he calls heaven, or rather heavens—but surely these lowest ones, not those highest ones where the sun, the moon and the stars are set) had been turned into a moist quality, and in this way had perished together with the earth, whose former face had of course been wiped out by the flood.

"But the heavens and the earth that exist now," he says, "have been set in place again by the same word, reserved for fire on the day of judgment and of the destruction of ungodly people." Accordingly, the heavens and the earth—that is, the world—that were set in place out of the same water, in place of the world that perished in the flood, are themselves reserved for the final fire on the day of judgment and of the destruction of ungodly people. For he does not hesitate to speak of a future destruction of human beings too, because of a great change, even though their nature will continue to exist, albeit in eternal punishment. Someone may perhaps ask: if this world is going to burn after the judgment has taken place, before a 67 2 Peter 3:3–13, quoted through the next two chunks.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	new heaven and a new earth are put in its place, where will the saints be at the very time of its conflagration, since, having bodies, they must be in some bodily place?
Possumus respondere futuros eos esse in superioribus partibus, quo ita non adscendet flamma illius incendii, quem ad modum nec unda diluuii. Talia quippe illis inerunt corpora, ut illic sint, ubi esse uoluerint. Sed nec ignem conflagrationis illius pertimescent inmortales adque incorruptibiles facti, si uirorum trium corruptibilia corpora adque mortalia in camino ardenti inlaesa uiuere potuerunt.	We can answer that they will be in the upper regions, to which the flame of that fire will not rise, just as the waves of the flood did not. For they will have bodies of such a kind that they will be wherever they wish to be. Nor, once they have been made immortal and incorruptible, will they dread the fire of that conflagration, if the corruptible and mortal bodies of the three men were able to live unharmed in the burning furnace.[68]

WHAT THE APOSTLE PAUL WROTE TO THE THESSALONIANS ABOUT THE APPEARING OF ANTICHRIST, WHOSE TIME THE DAY OF THE LORD WILL FOLLOW

Paul says Antichrist must come first; Augustine admits he cannot explain what "holds him back."

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.19 Multas euangelicas apostolicasque sententias de diuino isto iudicio nouissimo uideo mihi esse praetereundas, ne hoc uolumen in nimiam longitudinem prouoluatur; sed nullo modo est praetereundus apostolus Paulus, qui scribens ad Thessalonicenses: Rogamus, inquit, uos, fratres, per aduentum Domini nostri Iesu Christi et nostrae congregationis in ipsum, ut non cito moueamini mente neque terreamini neque per spiritum neque per uerbum neque per epistulam tamquam per nos, quasi instet dies Domini, ne quis uos seducat ullo modo; quoniam nisi uenerit refuga primum et reuelatus fuerit homo peccati, filius interitus, qui aduersatur et superextollitur supra omne, quod dicitur Deus aut quod colitur, ita ut in templo dei sedeat, ostentans se tamquam sit Deus. Non retinetis in memoria, quod adhuc cum essem aput uos haec dicebantur uobis?	I see that I must pass over many sayings of the Gospels and the apostles about this last judgment of God, so that this volume may not roll on to excessive length. But I must on no account pass over the apostle Paul, who, writing to the Thessalonians, says: "We ask you, brothers, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our gathering together to him, not to be quickly shaken in mind or alarmed, whether by a spirit or by a word or by a letter as if from us, as though the day of the Lord were at hand. Let no one deceive you in any way. For unless the deserter comes first and the man of sin is revealed, the son of destruction, who opposes and exalts himself above everything that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he sits in the temple of God, displaying himself as if he were God. Do you not remember that when I was still with you these things were being told to you?[69]
et nunc quid, detineat scitis, ut reueletur in suo tempore. Iam enim mysterium iniquitatis operatur. Tantum qui modo tenet teneat, donec de medio fiat; et tunc reuelabitur iniquus, quem Dominus Iesus interficiet spiritu oris sui, et euacuabit inluminatione praesentiae suae eum, cuius est praesentia secundum operationem satanae, in omni uirtute et signis et prodigiis mendacii et in omni seductione iniquitatis his, qui pereunt, pro eo quod dilectionem ueritatis non receperunt, ut salui	And now you know what is holding him back, so that he may be revealed in his own time. For the mystery of iniquity is already at work. Only let him who now holds hold on until he comes out of the midst; and then the wicked one will be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus will kill with the breath of his mouth and bring to nothing by the brightness of his presence—the one whose presence is according to the working of Satan, with all 68 The three young men—Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego—thrown into the furnace by Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 3).

69 2 Thessalonians 2:1–11, quoted through the next chunk.

LATIN

fierent. Et ideo mittet illis Deus operationem erroris, ut credant mendacio et iudicentur omnes, qui non crediderunt ueritati, sed consenserunt iniquitati.

Nulli dubium est eum de Antichristo ista dixisse, diemque iudicii (hunc enim appellat diem Domini) non esse uenturum, nisi ille prior uenerit, quem refugam uocat, utique a Domino Deo. Quod si de omnibus inpiis merito dici potest, quanto magis de isto! Sed in quo templo Dei sit sessurus, incertum est; utrum in illa ruina templi, quod a Salomone rege constructum est, an uero in ecclesia. Non enim templum alicuius idoli aut daemonis templum Dei apostolus diceret.

Unde nonnulli non ipsum principem, sed uniuersum quodam modo corpus eius, id est ad eum pertinentem hominum, multitudinem, simul cum ipso suo principe hoc loco intellegi Antichristum uolunt; rectiusque putant etiam Latine dici, sicut in Graeco est, non in templo Dei, sed in templum Dei sedeat, tamquam ipse sit templum Dei, quod est ecclesia; sicut dicimus; Sedet in amicum, id est uelut amicus, uel si quid aliud isto locutionis genere dici solet. Quod autem ait: Et nunc quid detineat scitis, id est, quid sit in mora, quae causa sit dilationis eius, ut reueletur in suo tempore, scitis: quoniam scire illos dixit, aperte hoc dicere noluit.

Et ideo nos, qui nescimus quod illi sciebant, peruenire cum labore ad id, quod sensit apostolus, cupimus nec ualemus; praesertim quia et illa, quae addidit, hunc sensum faciunt obscuriorem. Nam quid est: Iam enim mysterium iniquitatis operatur. Tantum qui modo tenet teneat, donec de medio fiat; et tunc reuelabitur iniquus? Ego prorsus quid dixerit me fateor ignorare. Suspiciones tamen hominum, quas uel audire uel legere potui, non tacebo.

ENGLISH

power and lying signs and wonders, and with every deception of iniquity for those who are perishing, because they did not receive the love of the truth so that they might be saved. And therefore God will send them a working of error, so that they believe a lie, and so that all may be judged who did not believe the truth but consented to iniquity."

No one doubts that he said these things about the Antichrist, and that the day of judgment (for this is what he calls the day of the Lord) will not come unless that one comes first whom he calls the deserter—a deserter, of course, from the Lord God. And if this can rightly be said of all the ungodly, how much more of him! But in which temple of God he will sit is uncertain: whether in the ruins of the temple that was built by King Solomon, or rather in the Church. For the apostle would not call the temple of some idol or demon the temple of God.

That is why some want the Antichrist in this passage to be understood not as the ruler himself but, in a way, as his whole body—that is, the multitude of people who belong to him—together with their ruler himself. And they think it would be more correct to say in Latin too, as it is in the Greek, not in templo Dei ("in the temple of God") but in templum Dei ("as the temple of God"), as though he himself were the temple of God, which is the Church—just as we say sedet in amicum, meaning "he sits as a friend," or anything else that is usually said with this kind of idiom. As for his saying, "And now you know what is holding him back"—that is, you know what is causing the delay, what the reason for his postponement is, so that he may be revealed in his own time—since he said that they knew, he did not want to say it openly.[70]

And so we, who do not know what they knew, long to arrive with effort at what the apostle meant, and we cannot—especially since the words he added make this meaning even more obscure. For what does this mean: "For the mystery of iniquity is already at work. Only let him who now holds hold on until he comes out of the midst; and then the wicked one will be revealed"? I confess that I simply do not know what he meant. Still, I will not 70 Latin in with the accusative can mean "as" or "by way of"; the Greek of 2 Thessalonians 2:4 has eis ("into").

LATIN

ENGLISH

keep silent about the conjectures of others that I have been able to hear or read.

Quidam putant hoc de imperio dictum fuisse Romano, et propterea Paulum apostolum non id aperte scribere uoluisse, ne calumniam uidelicet incurreret, quod Romano imperio male optauerit, cum speraretur aeternum; ut hoc quod dixit: Iam enim mysterium iniquitatis operatur, Neronem uoluerit intellegi, cuius iam facta uelut Antichristi uidebantur. Unde nonnulli ipsum resurrecturum et futurum Antichristum suspicantur; alii uero nec occisum putant, sed subtractum potius, ut putaretur occisus, et uiuum occultari in uigore ipsius aetatis, in qua fuit, cum crederetur exstinctus, donec suo tempore reueletur et restituatur in regnum. Sed multum mihi mira est haec opinantium tanta praesumtio.

Some think this was said of the Roman Empire, and that the apostle Paul did not want to write it openly for this reason—namely, so as not to incur the false charge of wishing ill on the Roman Empire, when people hoped it would be eternal. On this view, by saying, "For the mystery of iniquity is already at work," he meant Nero to be understood, whose deeds already looked like the Antichrist's. Hence some suspect that Nero himself will rise again and be the Antichrist. Others think that he was not even killed but rather withdrawn, so that he would be thought dead, and that he is being kept hidden alive, in the vigor of the very age he had reached when he was believed to have perished, until he is revealed in his own time and restored to his kingdom. But the great presumption of those who hold this opinion astonishes me greatly.[71]

Illud tamen, quod ait apostolus: Tantum qui modo tenet teneat, donec de medio fiat, non absurde de ipso Romano imperio creditur dictum, tamquam dictum sit: Tantum qui modo imperat imperet, donec de medio fiat, id est de medio tollatur. Et tunc reuelabitur iniquus, quem significari Antichristum nullus ambigit. Alii uero et quod ait: Quid detineat scitis et mysterium operari iniquitatis non putant dictum nisi de malis et fictis, qui sunt in ecclesia, donec perueniant ad tantum numerum, qui Antichristo magnum populum faciat; et hoc esse mysterium iniquitatis, quia uidetur occultum; hortari autem apostolum fideles, ut in fide quam tenent tenaciter perseuerent, dicendo: Tantum qui modo tenet teneat, donec de medio fiat, hoc, est, donec exeat de medio ecclesiae mysterium iniquitatis, quod nunc occultum est.

Still, the apostle's words, "Only let him who now holds hold on until he comes out of the midst," are not absurdly believed to have been said of the Roman Empire itself, as if it were said: "Only let him who now rules rule until he comes out of the midst"—that is, until he is taken out of the midst. "And then the wicked one will be revealed": no one doubts that this signifies the Antichrist. Others, however, think that both "You know what is holding him back" and "the mystery of iniquity is at work" were said only of the wicked and the pretenders who are in the Church, until they reach so great a number as to make up a great people for the Antichrist. This, they say, is the mystery of iniquity, because it seems hidden. And the apostle, they say, is urging the faithful to persevere tenaciously in the faith they hold when he says, "Only let him who now holds hold on until he comes out of the midst"—that is, until the mystery of iniquity, which is now hidden, goes out from the midst of the Church.

Ad ipsum enim mysterium pertinere arbitrantur, quod ait in epistula sua Iohannes euangelista: Pueri, nouissima hora est; et sicut audistis, quod Antichristus sit uenturus, nunc autem Antichristi multi facti sunt; unde cognoscimus quod nouissima sit hora. Ex nobis exierunt; sed non erant ex nobis. Quod si fuissent ex nobis,

For they consider that what John the evangelist says in his letter belongs to this same mystery: "Children, it is the last hour; and as you have heard that the Antichrist is coming, so now many antichrists have arisen; by this we know that it is 71 Nero, Roman emperor AD 54–68, the first to persecute Christians; legends circulated that he had not died or would return.

LATIN

permansissent utique nobiscum. Sicut ergo ante finem in hac hora, inquiunt, quam Iohannes nouissimam dicit, exierunt multi haeretici de medio ecclesiae, quos multos dicit Antichristos: ita omnes tunc inde exibunt, qui non ad Christum, sed ad illum nouissimum Antichristum pertinebunt, et tunc reuelabitur.

Alius ergo sic, alius autem sic apostoli obscura uerba coniectant; quod tamen eum dixisse non dubium est: non ueniet ad uiuos et mortuos iudicandos Christus, nisi prius uenerit ad seducendos in anima mortuos aduersarius eius Antichristus; quamuis ad occultum iam iudicium Dei pertineat, quod ab illo seducentur. Praesentia quippe eius erit, sicut dictum est, secundum operationem satanae in omni uirtute et signis et prodigiis mendacii et in omni seductione iniquitatis his, qui pereunt. Tunc enim soluetur satanas et per illum Antichristum in omni sua uirtute mirabiliter quidem, sed mendaciter operabitur.

Quae solet ambigi utrum propterea dicta sint signa et prodigia mendacii, quoniam mortales sensus per phantasmata decepturus est, ut quod non facit facere uideatur, an quia illa ipsa, etiamsi erunt uera prodigia, ad mendacium pertrahent crediturus non ea potuisse nisi diuinitus fieri, uirtutem diaboli nescientes, maxime quando tantam, quantam numquam habuit, acceperit potestatem. Non enim quando de caelo ignis cecidit et tantam familiam cum tantis gregibus pecorum sancti Iob uno inpetu absumsit et turbo inruens et domum deiciens filios eius occidit, phantasmata fuerunt; quae tamen fuerunt opera satanae, cui Deus dederat hanc potestatem. Propter quid horum ergo dicta sint prodigia et signa mendacii, tunc potius apparebit.

Sed propter quodlibet horum dictum sit, seducentur eis signis adque prodigiis, qui seduci merebuntur, pro eo quod dilectionem, inquit, ueritatis non receperunt, ut salui fierent. Nec dubitauit apostolus addere ac dicere:

ENGLISH

the last hour. They went out from us, but they were not of us. For if they had been of us, they would surely have remained with us." "So," they say, "just as before the end, in this hour which John calls the last, many heretics went out from the midst of the Church, whom he calls many antichrists, so at that time all who belong not to Christ but to that last Antichrist will go out from there, and then he will be revealed."[72]

So one person conjectures one thing about the apostle's obscure words, another another. But what he undoubtedly did say is this: Christ will not come to judge the living and the dead unless his adversary, the Antichrist, comes first to deceive those who are dead in soul—although the fact that they will be deceived by him already belongs to God's hidden judgment. For his presence, as was said, will be "according to the working of Satan, with all power and lying signs and wonders, and with every deception of iniquity for those who are perishing." For then Satan will be let loose, and through that Antichrist he will work with all his power—wondrously indeed, but deceitfully.

It is commonly debated whether they are called lying signs and wonders because he will deceive mortal senses with phantoms, so that he seems to do what he does not do, or because these very things, even if they are real wonders, will draw into a lie those who will believe that they could only have been done by divine power, since they do not know the power of the devil—especially when he has received such power as he never had before. For when fire fell from heaven and in a single onslaught consumed holy Job's large household along with his great flocks and herds, and a whirlwind rushed in, threw down the house and killed his children, these were not phantoms; and yet they were works of Satan, to whom God had given this power. So on which of these accounts they are called lying wonders and signs will become clearer at that time.[73]

But whichever of these is the reason they are so called, those who deserve to be deceived will be deceived by these signs and wonders, "because," he says, "they did not receive the love of the truth

72 1 John 2:18–19.
73 Job 1:13–19.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ideo mittet illis Deus operationem erroris ut credant mendacio. Deus enim mittet, quia Deus diabolum facere ista permittet, iusto ipse iudicio, quamuis faciat ille iniquo malignoque consilio: Ut iudicentur, inquit, omnes, qui non crediderunt ueritati, sed consenserunt iniquitati. Proinde iudicati seducentur et seducti iudicabuntur. Sed iudicati seducentur illis iudiciis Dei occulte iustis, iuste occultis, quibus ab initio peccati rationalis creaturae numquam iudicare cessauit; seducti autem iudicabuntur nouissimo manifestoque iudicio per Christum Iesum, iustissime iudicaturum, iniustissime iudicatum.	so that they might be saved." Nor did the apostle hesitate to go on and say: "Therefore God will send them a working of error, so that they believe a lie." For God will send it, because God will permit the devil to do these things—by a just judgment of his own, even though the devil does them with an unjust and malicious purpose. "So that," he says, "all may be judged who did not believe the truth but consented to iniquity." Accordingly, having been judged, they will be deceived; and having been deceived, they will be judged. But having been judged, they will be deceived by those judgments of God that are hiddenly just and justly hidden, by which he has never ceased to judge since rational creatures first sinned; and having been deceived, they will be judged in the last and open judgment through Christ Jesus, who will judge most justly, having been judged most unjustly.

WHAT THE SAME APOSTLE TAUGHT ABOUT THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD IN HIS FIRST LETTER TO THE SAME PEOPLE

Paul describes the dead rising and the living caught up to meet Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.20 Sed hic apostolus tacuit de resurrectione mortuorum; ad eosdem autem scribens in epistula prima: Nolumus, inquit, ignorare uos, fratres, de dormientibus, ut non contristemini, sicut et ceteri, qui spem non habent. Nam si credimus, quod Iesus mortuus est et resurrexit: ita et Deus eos, qui dormierunt per Iesum, adducet cum illo. Hoc enim uobis dicimus in uerbo Domini, quia nos uiuentes, qui reliqui sumus in aduentum Domini, non praeueniemus eos, qui ante dormierunt; quoniam ipse Dominus in iussu et in uoce archangeli et in tuba Dei descendet de caelo, et mortui in Christo resurgent primo; deinde nos uiuentes, qui reliqui sumus, simul cum illis rapiemur in nubibus in obuiam Christi in aera, et ita semper cum Domino erimus.	But here the apostle said nothing about the resurrection of the dead. Writing to the same people in his first letter, however, he says: "We do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, about those who are asleep, so that you may not grieve as the others do who have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, so too God will bring with him those who have fallen asleep through Jesus. For this we tell you by the word of the Lord: that we who are alive, who are left until the coming of the Lord, will not go ahead of those who have fallen asleep before us. For the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a command, with the voice of an archangel and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first; then we who are alive, who are left, will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet Christ in the air; and so we shall always be with the Lord."[74]
Haec uerba apostolica resurrectionem mortuorum futuram, quando ueniet Christus, utique ad uiuos et mortuos iudicandos, praeclarissime ostendunt.	These words of the apostle show most clearly that there will be a resurrection of the dead when Christ comes—to judge, of course, the living and the dead.

74 1 Thessalonians 4:13–17.

LATIN

Sed quaeri solet, utrum illi, quos hic uiuentes inuenturus est Christus, quorum personam in se adque illos, qui tunc secum uiuebant, transfigurabat apostolus, numquam omnino morituri sint, an ipso temporis puncto, quo cum resurgentibus rapientur in nubibus in obuiam Christo in aera, ad inmortalitatem per mortem mira celeritate transibunt. Neque enim dicendum est fieri non posse, ut, dum per aera in sublime portantur, in illo spatio et moriantur et reuiuescant. Quod enim ait: Et ita semper cum Domino erimus, non sic accipiendum est, tamquam in aere nos dixerit semper cum Domino esse mansuros; quia nec ipse utique ibi manebit, quia ueniens transiturus est; uenienti quippe ibitur obuiam, non manenti; sed ita cum Domino erimus, id est, sic erimus habentes corpora sempiterna, ubicumque cum illo fuerimus.

Ad hunc autem sensum, quo existimemus etiam illos, quos hic uiuos inuenturus est Dominus, in ipso paruo spatio et passuros mortem et accepturos inmortalitatem, ipse apostolus nos uidetur urgere, ubi dicit: In Christo omnes uiuificabuntur; cum alio loco de ipsa loquens resurrectione corporum dicat: Tu quod seminas, non uiuificatur, nisi moriatur. Quo modo igitur, quos uiuentes hic Christus inueniet, per inmortalitatem in illo uiuificabuntur, etsi non moriantur, cum uideamus propter hoc esse dictum: Tu quod seminas, non uiuificatur, nisi moriatur?

Aut si recte non dicimus seminari nisi ea corpora hominum, quae moriendo quoquo modo reuertuntur in terram (sicut sese habet etiam illa in transgressorem patrem generis humani diuinitus prolata sententia: Terra es, et in terram ibis): fatendum est istos, quos nondum de corporibus egressos cum ueniet Christus inueniet, et istis uerbis apostoli et illis de genesi non teneri; quoniam sursum in nubibus rapti non utique seminantur, quia nec eunt in terram nec redeunt, siue nullam prorsus experiantur mortem siue paululum in aere moriantur.

ENGLISH

But it is commonly asked about those whom Christ will find alive here—a role the apostle was applying to himself and to those who were living with him at the time—whether they are never to die at all, or whether, at the very moment when they are caught up with those who are rising in the clouds to meet Christ in the air, they will pass through death to immortality with wondrous speed. For we must not say that it is impossible for them both to die and to come back to life within that interval while they are being carried aloft through the air. For when he says, "And so we shall always be with the Lord," this must not be taken as if he meant that we shall remain always with the Lord in the air. Surely he himself will not remain there either, since he will pass through on his way; one goes out to meet someone who is coming, not someone who is staying put. Rather, "so we shall be with the Lord" means: we shall be in this state, having everlasting bodies, wherever we may be with him.

Now the apostle himself seems to press us toward this interpretation—that we should think that even those whom the Lord will find alive here will, in that brief interval, both suffer death and receive immortality—when he says: "In Christ all will be made alive"; for in another place, speaking of the resurrection of bodies itself, he says: "What you sow is not made alive unless it dies." How, then, will those whom Christ finds alive here be made alive in him through immortality, if they do not die, when we see that this was said for this very reason: "What you sow is not made alive unless it dies"?[75]

Or, if we cannot rightly speak of sowing except for those human bodies that in dying somehow return to the earth (as indeed the sentence divinely pronounced against the transgressing father of the human race has it: "You are earth, and to earth you shall go"), then we must admit that those whom Christ, when he comes, will find not yet departed from their bodies are bound neither by these words of the apostle nor by those from Genesis. For when they are caught up on high in the clouds, they are certainly not sown, since they neither go into the earth nor return to it—whether 75 1 Corinthians 15:22 and 15:36.

LATIN

ENGLISH

they experience no death at all or die for a little while in the air.[76]

Sed aliud rursus occurrit, quod idem dixit apostolus, cum de resurrectione corporum ad Corinthios loqueretur: Omnes resurgemus, uel sicut alii codices habent: Omnes dormiemus. Cum ergo nec resurrectio fieri, nisi mors praecesserit, possit, nec dormitionem possimus illo loco intellegere nisi mortem: quo modo omnes uel dormient uel resurgent, si tam multi, quos in corpore inuenturus est Christus, nec dormient nec resurgent?

But again something else comes up, which the same apostle said when he was speaking to the Corinthians about the resurrection of bodies: "We shall all rise again," or, as other manuscripts have it, "We shall all sleep." Since, then, resurrection cannot take place unless death has gone before it, and since in that passage we can understand sleep only as death, how will all either sleep or rise again, if so many whom Christ will find in the body will neither sleep nor rise again?[77]

Si ergo sanctos, qui reperientur Christo ueniente uiuentes eique in obuiam rapientur, crediderimus in eodem raptu de mortalibus corporibus exituros et ad eadem mox inmortalia redituros, nullas in uerbis apostoli patiemur angustias, siue ubi dicit: Tu quod seminas, non uiuificatur, nisi moriatur, siue ubi dicit: Omnes resurgemus ant: Omnes dormiemus; quia nec illi per inmortalitatem uiuificabuntur, nisi, quamlibet paululum, tamen ante moriantur, ac per hoc et a resurrectione non erunt alieni, quam dormitione praecedunt, quamuis breuissima, non tamen nulla.

If, then, we believe that the saints who are found alive at Christ's coming and are caught up to meet him will, in that same rapture, leave their mortal bodies and immediately return to those same bodies, now immortal, we shall face no difficulties in the apostle's words—either where he says, "What you sow is not made alive unless it dies," or where he says, "We shall all rise again" or "We shall all sleep." For those people will not be made alive through immortality unless they first die, however briefly; and for this reason they will not be strangers to the resurrection either, since they precede it with a sleep that is very brief, yet not nonexistent.

Quur autem nobis incredibile uideatur illam multitudinem corporum in aere quodam modo seminari adque ibi protinus inmortaliter adque incorruptibiliter reuiuescere, cum credamus, quod idem ipse apostolus apertissime dicit, in ictu oculi futuram resurrectionem et in membra sine fine uictura tanta facilitate tamque inaestimabili uelocitate rediturum antiquissimorum cadauerum puluerem? Nec ab illa sententia, qua homini dictum est: Terra es et in terram ibis, futuros illos sanctos arbitremur inmunes, si eorum morientium in terram non recident corpora, sed, sicut in ipso raptu morientur, ita et resurgent, dum ferentur in aera.

And why should it seem incredible to us that that multitude of bodies should in a sense be sown in the air and there immediately come back to life, immortal and incorruptible, when we believe what the same apostle says most plainly—that the resurrection will take place in the twinkling of an eye, and that the dust of the most ancient corpses will return with such ease and such inconceivable speed into limbs that will live without end? Nor should we think that those saints will be exempt from the sentence by which it was said to man, "You are earth, and to earth you shall go," if their bodies, when they die, do not fall back to the earth, but, just as they will die in the very rapture, so too will rise again while they are being borne into the air.

In terram quippe ibis est in hoc ibis amissa uita, quod eras antequam sumeres uitam: id est, hoc eris exanimatus, quod eras antequam esses animatus (terrae quippe insufflauit Deus in faciem flatum uitae, cum

For "to earth you shall go" means: when you have lost life, you shall go into what you were before you received life. That is, once lifeless, you will be

76 Genesis 3:19.

77 1 Corinthians 15:51; the Latin manuscripts Augustine knew differed at this verse.

LATIN	ENGLISH
factus est homo in animam uiuam); tamquam diceretur: Terra es animata, quod non eras: terra eris exanimis, sicut eras; quod sunt et antequam putrescant omnia corpora mortuorum; quod erunt et illa, si morientur, ubicumque moriantur, cum uita carebunt, quam continuo receptura sunt. Sic ergo ibunt in terram, quia ex uiuis hominibus terra erunt, quem ad modum it in cinerem, quod fit cinis; it in uetustatem, quod fit uetus; it in testam, quod ex luto fit testa: et alia sescenta sic loquimur.	what you were before you were given life (for God breathed the breath of life into the face of earth when man was made a living soul). It is as if it were said: "You are living earth, which you were not; you will be lifeless earth, as you were." This is what all the bodies of the dead are even before they decay; and this is what those bodies too will be, if they die, wherever they die, when they are without life—a life they are to receive back immediately. So they will go to earth in this sense: from living human beings they will become earth—just as we say that what becomes ash "goes to ash," what grows old "goes to old age," what is made from clay into pottery "goes into pottery"; and we speak this way of countless other things.[78]
Quo modo autem sit futurum, quod nunc pro nostrae ratiunculae uiribus utcumque conicimus, tunc erit potius, ut nosse possimus. Resurrectionem quippe mortuorum futuram et in carne, quando Christus uenturus est uiuos iudicaturus et mortuos, oportet, si Christiani esse uolumus, ut credamus; sed non ideo de hac re inanis est fides nostra, si, quem ad modum futura sit, perfecte conprehendere non ualemus.	But how this will come about—which we are now conjecturing as best we can with the strength of our poor little reason—will then rather be something we can know. For if we want to be Christians, we must believe that there will be a resurrection of the dead, and in the flesh, when Christ comes to judge the living and the dead. But our faith on this matter is not empty just because we cannot fully grasp how it will come about.
Verum iam, sicut supra promisimus, de hoc iudicio Dei nouissimo etiam prophetici ueteres libri quid praenuntiauerint, quantum satis esse uidebitur, debemus ostendere; quae, sicut arbitror, non tanta mora necesse erit tractari et exponi, si istis, quae praemisimus, lector curauerit adiuuari.	But now, as we promised above, we must show, so far as seems sufficient, what the ancient prophetic books too foretold about this last judgment of God. These will not, I think, need to be discussed and explained at such length, if the reader takes care to make use of the help of what we have set out beforehand.

WHAT THE PROPHET ISAIAH SAID ABOUT THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD AND THE REWARD OF JUDGMENT

Isaiah prophesies the resurrection, the comfort of the good and the punishment of the wicked.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.21 Propheta Esaias: Resurgent, inquit, mortui et resurgent qui erant in sepulcris, et laetabuntur omnes qui sunt in terra; ros enim, qui abs te est, sanitas illis est; terra uero inpiorum cadet. Totum illud superius ad resurrectionem pertinet beatorum. Quod autem ait: Terra uero inpiorum cadet, bene intellegitur dictum: Corpora uero inpiorum ruina damnationis excipiet. Iam porro si de bonorum resurrectione quod dictum est diligentius et distinctius uelimus intueri, ad primam referendum est quod dictum est: Resurgent mortui; ad secundam uero quod sequitur:	The prophet Isaiah says: "The dead will rise again, and those who were in the tombs will rise again, and all who are on the earth will rejoice; for the dew that comes from you is health to them; but the earth of the ungodly will fall." All of the first part refers to the resurrection of the blessed. But the words "But the earth of the ungodly will fall" are well understood as meaning: "But the ruin of damnation will receive the bodies of the ungodly."

78 Genesis 2:7.

LATIN

Et resurgent qui erant in sepulcris. Iam si et illos inquiramus sanctos, quos hic uiuos inuenturus est Dominus, eis congrue deputabitur quod adiunxit: Et laetabuntur omnes qui sunt in terra; ros enim, qui abs te est, sanitas illis est.

Sanitatem loco isto inmortalitatem rectissime accipimus; ea namque est plenissima sanitas, quae non reficitur alimentis tamquam cottidianis medicamentis. Item de iudicii die spem prius dans bonis, deinde terrens malos idem propheta sic loquitur: Haec dicit Dominus: Ecce ego declino in eos ut flumen pacis et ut torrens inundans gloriam gentium. Filii eorum super umeros portabuntur et super genua consolabuntur. Quem ad modum si quem mater consoletur, ita ego uos consolabor; et in Hierusalem consolabimini, et uidebitis, et gaudebit cor uestrum et ossa uestra ut herba exorientur. Et cognoscetur manus Domini colentibus eum, et comminabitur contumacibus. Ecce enim Dominus ut ignis ueniet, et ut tempestas currus eius, reddere in indignatione uindictam et uastationem in flamma ignis.

In igne enim Domini iudicabitur omnis terra et in gladio eius omnis caro; multi uulnerati erunt a Domino. In bonorum promissione flumen pacis profecto abundantiam pacis illius debemus accipere, qua maior esse non possit. Hac utique in fine rigabimur; de qua in praecedenti libro abundanter locuti sumus. Hoc flumen se in eos declinare dicit, quibus tantam beatitudinem pollicetur, ut intellegamus in illius felicitatis regione, quae in caelis est, hoc flumine omnia satiari; sed quia et terrenis corporibus pax incorruptionis adque inmortalitatis inde influet, ideo declinare se dixit hoc flumen, ut de supernis quodam modo etiam inferiora perfundat et homines aequales angelis reddat. Hierusalem quoque, non illam quae seruit cum filiis suis, sed liberam matrem nostram intellegamus secundum apostolum aeternam in caelis.

ENGLISH

Further, suppose we want to look more carefully and more precisely at what is said about the resurrection of the good. Then "The dead will rise again" should be referred to the first resurrection, and what follows, "and those who were in the tombs will rise again," to the second. And if we also ask about those saints whom the Lord will find still alive here, what he added will fittingly be assigned to them: "And all who are on the earth will rejoice; for the dew that comes from you is health to them."[79]

In this passage we are entirely right to take "health" to mean immortality. For that is the fullest health, which is not restored by food as if by daily medicines. Likewise, speaking of the day of judgment, the same prophet first gives hope to the good and then terrifies the wicked: "This is what the Lord says: See, I bend down toward them like a river of peace and like a flooding torrent of the glory of the nations. Their children will be carried on shoulders and comforted on knees. As a mother comforts someone, so I will comfort you; and you will be comforted in Jerusalem, and you will see, and your heart will rejoice, and your bones will spring up like grass. And the hand of the Lord will be known to those who worship him, and he will threaten the defiant. For see, the Lord will come like fire, and his chariots like a storm, to repay vengeance in indignation and devastation in a flame of fire."[80]

"For by the fire of the Lord all the earth will be judged, and all flesh by his sword; many will be wounded by the Lord." In the promise to the good, by the "river of peace" we must surely understand the abundance of that peace than which there can be none greater. With this peace, certainly, we shall be watered at the end, and we spoke of it abundantly in the previous book. He says that this river bends down toward those to whom he promises such great happiness. We are to understand that in the region of that happiness which is in heaven all things are satisfied by this river. But because the peace of incorruption and immortality will flow from there into earthly bodies as well, he said that this river bends down, so that from on high it may in some way pour over even the lower

79 Isaiah 26:19.
80 Isaiah 66:12–16.

LATIN

ENGLISH

things and make human beings equal to the angels. By Jerusalem, too, let us understand not the one that is in slavery with her children, but, as the apostle says, our free mother, eternal in heaven.[81]

Ibi post labores aerumnarum curarumque mortalium consolabimur, tamquam paruuli eius in umeris genibusque portati. Rudes enim nos et nouos blandissimis adiutoriis insolita nobis beatitudo illa suscipiet. Ibi uidebimus, et gaudebit cor nostrum. Nec expressit quid uidebimus; sed quid nisi Deum? ut inpleatur in nobis promissum euangelicum: Beati mundicordes, quoniam ipsi Deum uidebunt, et omnia illa, quae nunc non uidemus, credentes autem pro modulo capacitatis humanae longe minus quam sunt adque incomparabiliter cogitamus. Et uidebitis, inquit, et gaudebit cor uestrum. Hic creditis, ibi uidebitis.

There, after the toils of mortal hardships and cares, we shall be comforted like her little ones carried on her shoulders and knees. For that happiness, so unfamiliar to us, will take us up, raw and new as we are, with the tenderest help. There we shall see, and our heart will rejoice. He did not specify what we shall see—but what else than God? So the promise of the gospel will be fulfilled in us: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God." We shall also see all those things that we do not see now, but that we, believing, think of according to the small measure of human capacity—far less than they are, and incomparably less. "And you will see," he says, "and your heart will rejoice." Here you believe; there you will see.[82]

Sed quoniam dixit: Et gaudebit cor uestrum, ne putaremus illa bona Hierusalem ad nostrum tantummodo spiritum pertinere: Et ossa, inquit, uestra ut herba exorientur; ubi resurrectionem corporum strinxit, uelut quod non dixerat reddens; neque enim cum uiderimus fiet, sed cum fuerit facta uidebimus. Nam et de caelo nouo ac terra noua iam supra dixerat, dum ea, quae sanctis promittuntur in fine, saepe ac multiformiter diceret. Erit, inquit, caelum nouum et terra noua, et non erunt memores priorum, nec adscendet in cor ipsorum, sed laetitiam et exsultationem inuenient in ea.

But since he had said, "And your heart will rejoice," he added, so that we would not think those good things of Jerusalem belong only to our spirit: "And your bones will spring up like grass." Here he touched briefly on the resurrection of bodies, as though supplying what he had not yet said. For it will not happen once we have seen; rather, we shall see once it has happened. He had already spoken earlier of the new heaven and the new earth, while describing often and in many forms the things promised to the saints at the end: "There will be," he says, "a new heaven and a new earth, and they will not remember the former things, nor will these come up into their heart; but they will find gladness and exultation in it."[83]

Ecce ego faciam Hierusalem exsultationem et populum meum laetitiam; et exsultabo in Hierusalem et laetabor in populo meo; et ultra non audietur in illa uox fletus, et cetera, quae quidam ad illos carnales mille annos referre conantur. Locutiones enim tropicae propriis prophetico more miscentur, ut ad intellectum spiritalem intentio sobria cum quodam utili ac salubri labore perueniat; pigritia uero carnalis uel ineruditae adque inexercitatae tarditas mentis contenta litterae superficie nihil putat interius requirendum. Haec de propheticis uerbis, quae ante istum locum scripta sunt, satis dixerim. In hoc

"See, I will make Jerusalem an exultation and my people a gladness; and I will exult in Jerusalem and be glad in my people; and the sound of weeping will no longer be heard in her," and the rest, which some try to refer to those carnal thousand years. For, as is the prophetic custom, figurative expressions are mixed with literal ones, so that a sober attention may reach the spiritual meaning through a certain useful and wholesome labor. But carnal laziness, or the sluggishness of an untaught and untrained mind, is content with the surface of 81 The previous book is Book 19, on peace. The apostle: Galatians 4:25–26.

82 Matthew 5:8.
83 Isaiah 65:17–18.

LATIN

autem loco, unde ad illa digressi sumus, cum dixisset: Et ossa uestra ut herba exorientur, ut resurrectionem carnis quidem, sed tamen bonorum se nunc commemorare monstraret, adiunxit: Et cognoscetur manus Domini colentibus eum.

Quid est hoc nisi manus distinguentis cultores suos a contemtoribus suis? De quibus sequentia contexens: Et comminabitur, inquit, contumacibus, siue, ut ait alius interpres, incredulis. Nec tunc comminabitur, sed quae nunc dicuntur minaciter, tunc efficaciter inplebuntur. Ecce enim Dominus, inquit, ut ignis ueniet et ut tempestas currus eius, reddere in indignatione uindictam et uastationem in flamma ignis. In igne enim Domini iudicabitur omnis terra et in gladio eius omnis caro; multi uulnerati erunt a Domino. Siue igne, siue tempestate, siue gladio poenam iudicii significat: quando quidem ipsum Dominum quasi ignem dicit esse uenturum, eis profecto quibus poenalis erit eius aduentus. Currus uero eius (nam pluraliter dicti sunt) angelica ministeria non inconuenienter accipimus.

Quod autem ait omnem terram et omnem carnem in eius igne et gladio iudicari, non etiam hic spiritales intellegamus et sanctos, sed terrenos adque carnales, de qualibus dictum est: Qui terrena sapiunt, et: Sapere secundum carnem mors est; et quales omnino caro appellantur a Domino, ubi dicit: Non permanebit spiritus meus in hominibus istis, quoniam caro sunt. Quod uero hic positum est: Multi uulnerati erunt a Domino, isto fiet uulnere mors secunda. Potest quidem et ignis et gladius et uulnus accipi in bono.

Nam et ignem Dominus uelle se dixit mittere in mundum, et uisae sunt illis linguae diuisae uelut ignis, quando uenit Spiritus sanctus: et: Non ueni, inquit idem Dominus, pacem mittere in terram, sed gladium, et the letter and thinks that nothing deeper need be sought. Let what I have said about the prophetic words written before this passage be enough. But in the passage from which we digressed to those words, after saying, "And your bones will spring up like grass," he wanted to show that he was now speaking of the resurrection of the flesh—but of the good. So he added: "And the hand of the Lord will be known to those who worship him."[84]

ENGLISH

What is this but the hand of one who distinguishes his worshipers from those who despise him? Continuing about these, he says: "And he will threaten the defiant"—or, as another translator puts it, "the unbelieving." Nor will he threaten them then; rather, what is now spoken as a threat will then be fulfilled in fact. "For see," he says, "the Lord will come like fire, and his chariots like a storm, to repay vengeance in indignation and devastation in a flame of fire. For by the fire of the Lord all the earth will be judged, and all flesh by his sword; many will be wounded by the Lord." Whether by fire, or storm, or sword, he signifies the punishment of the judgment, since he says that the Lord himself will come like fire—to those, of course, for whom his coming will be punishment. As for his chariots (for they are spoken of in the plural), we may quite fittingly take them as the ministries of angels.

When he says that all the earth and all flesh will be judged by his fire and his sword, let us not understand here the spiritual and the saints as well, but the earthly and carnal. Of such people it is said, "who set their minds on earthly things," and, "To set the mind on the flesh is death"; and it is such people whom the Lord calls simply flesh when he says: "My spirit will not remain in these people, because they are flesh." And as for what is put here, "Many will be wounded by the Lord," it is by this wound that the second death will come about. Fire and sword and wound can, it is true, also be taken in a good sense.[85]

For the Lord said that he wished to cast fire on the world; and when the Holy Spirit came, divided tongues as of fire appeared to them; and the same Lord said, "I have not come to bring peace on 84 Isaiah 65:18–19. The "carnal thousand years" are the millenarian reading of Revelation 20, which Augustine rejected earlier in this book.

85 Philippians 3:19; Romans 8:6; Genesis 6:3.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sermonem Dei dicit scriptura gladium bis acutum propter aciem geminam testamentorum duorum, et in cantico canticorum caritate se dicit sancta ecclesia uulneratam, uelut amoris inpetu sagittatam. Sed hic cum legimus uel audimus ultorem Dominum esse uenturum, quem ad modum haec intellegenda sint, clarum est.	earth, but a sword." Scripture calls the word of God a two-edged sword because of the double edge of the two testaments; and in the Song of Songs the holy Church says she has been wounded with love, as though shot through by the onset of love. But here, when we read or hear that the Lord will come as an avenger, it is clear how these things are to be understood.[86]

ISAIAH'S FINAL CHAPTER

Isaiah's last chapter runs from the spread of the Church to the final separation of good and wicked.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Deinde breuiter commemoratis eis, qui per hoc iudicium consumentur, sub figura ciborum in lege uetere uetitorum, a quibus se non abstinuerunt, peccatores inpiosque significans recapitulat ab initio gratiam noui testamenti a primo Saluatoris aduentu usque ad ultimum iudicium, de quo nunc agimus, perducens finiensque sermonem. Narrat namque Dominum dicere se uenire, ut congreget omnes gentes, easque uenturas et uisuras eius gloriam. Omnes enim, sicut dicit apostolus, peccauerunt et egent gloria Dei.	Then he briefly mentions those who will be consumed by this judgment, signifying sinners and the ungodly under the figure of the foods forbidden in the old law, from which they did not abstain. After that he recapitulates from the beginning the grace of the new testament, from the first coming of the Savior down to the last judgment, which we are now discussing, carrying his discourse through to that point and ending it there. For he relates that the Lord says he is coming to gather all the nations, and that they will come and see his glory. For, as the apostle says, "all have sinned and are in need of the glory of God."[87]
Et relicturum se dicit super eos signa, quae utique mirantes credant in eum: et emissurum ex illis saluatos in gentes diuersas et in longinquas insulas, quae non audierunt nomen eius neque uiderunt eius gloriam; et adnuntiaturos gloriam eius in gentibus et adducturos fratres istorum, quibus loquebatur, id est in fide sub Deo Patre fratres Israelitarum electorum; adducturos autem ex omnibus gentibus munus Domino in iumentis et uehiculis (quae iumenta et uehicula bene intelleguntur adiutoria esse diuina per cuiusque generis ministeria Dei, uel angelica uel humana) in sanctam ciuitatem Hierusalem, quae nunc in sanctis fidelibus est diffusa per terras. Ubi enim diuinitus adiuuantur, ibi credunt, et ubi credunt, ibi ueniunt.	He says, too, that he will leave signs among them, so that, marveling at them, they may believe in him. He says that he will send some of them who have been saved to various nations and to distant islands that have not heard his name or seen his glory; that they will proclaim his glory among the nations and bring the brothers of those to whom he was speaking—that is, brothers in faith, under God the Father, of the chosen Israelites; and that they will bring them from all nations as an offering to the Lord on beasts of burden and in carriages to the holy city Jerusalem, which is now spread throughout the earth in the faithful saints. (These beasts and carriages are well understood as divine help given through God's ministers of every kind, whether angelic or human.) For where people are helped by God, there they believe; and where they believe, there they come.[88]
Conparauit autem illos Dominus tamquam per similitudinem filiis Israel offerentibus ei suas hostias cum	The Lord compared them, by way of a likeness, to the children of Israel offering him their sacrificial

86 Luke 12:49; Acts 2:3; Matthew 10:34; Hebrews 4:12; Song of Songs 2:5.
87 Isaiah 66:17–18; Romans 3:23.

LATIN

psalmis in domo eius, quod ubique iam facit ecclesia: et promisit ab ipsis se accepturum sibi sacerdotes et Leuitas; quod nihilo minus fieri nunc uidemus. Non enim ex genere carnis et sanguinis, sicut erat primum secundum ordinem Aaron; sed, sicut oportebat in testamento nouo, ubi secundum ordinem Melchisedech summus sacerdos est Christus, pro cuiusque merito, quod in eum gratia diuina contulerit, sacerdotes et Leuitas eligi nunc uidemus; qui non isto nomine, quod saepe adsequuntur indigni, sed ea, quae non est bonis malisque communis, sanctitate pensandi sunt.

Haec cum de ista, quae nunc inpertitur ecclesiae, perspicua nobisque notissima Dei miseratione dixisset, promisit et fines, ad quos per ultimum iudicium facta bonorum malorumque discretione uenietur, dicens per prophetam, uel de Domino dicens ipse propheta: Quo modo enim caelum nouum et terra noua manebit coram me, dicit Dominus, sic stabit semen uestrum et nomen uestrum, et erit mensis ex mense et sabbatum ex sabbato. Veniet omnis caro in conspectu meo adorare in Hierusalem! dixit Dominus; et egredientur et uidebunt membra hominum, qui praeuaricati sunt in me. Vermis eorum non morietur, et ignis eorum non exstinguetur, et erunt uisui omni carni. Ad hoc iste propheta terminauit librum, ad quod terminabitur saeculum.

Quidam sane non interpretati sunt: Membra hominum, sed cadauera uirorum, per cadauera significantes euidentem corporum poenam; quamuis cadauer nisi caro exanimis non soleat nuncupari, illa uero animata erunt corpora, alioquin nulla poterunt sentire tormenta; nisi forte, quia mortuorum erunt corpora, id est eorum, qui in secundam mortem cadent, ideo non absurde etiam cadauera dici possunt. Unde est et illud, quod ab eodem propheta dictum iam supra posui: Terra uero inpiorum cadet. Quis autem non uideat a cadendo esse appellata cadauera? Virorum autem pro eo posuisse illos interpretes, quod est hominum manifestum est. Neque enim quisquam dicturus est praeuaricatrices feminas in illo supplicio non futuras; sed ex potiore, praesertim de quo femina facta est, uterque sexus accipitur.

ENGLISH

victims with psalms in his house—something the Church now does everywhere. And he promised that he would take for himself from among them priests and Levites—which we see happening now no less. For we now see priests and Levites chosen not by descent of flesh and blood, as it was at first according to the order of Aaron, but, as was fitting in the new testament, where Christ is high priest according to the order of Melchizedek, according to the merit that divine grace has conferred on each. They are to be weighed not by that title, which the unworthy often obtain, but by the holiness that is not shared by good and bad alike.[89]

He had said these things about the mercy of God now imparted to the Church, a mercy plain and well known to us. Then he also promised the ends to which we shall come through the last judgment, once the good and the wicked have been separated—speaking through the prophet, or rather the prophet himself speaking about the Lord: "For just as the new heaven and the new earth will remain before me, says the Lord, so your seed and your name will stand; and there will be month after month and Sabbath after Sabbath. All flesh will come before me to worship in Jerusalem! said the Lord; and they will go out and see the limbs of the people who have transgressed against me. Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be quenched, and they will be a spectacle to all flesh." The prophet ended his book at the very point at which the world will end.[90]

Some, it is true, did not translate "the limbs of the people" but "the corpses of men," signifying by "corpses" the manifest punishment of bodies. Yet "corpse" is not usually said except of lifeless flesh, whereas those bodies will be alive; otherwise they could feel no torments. Unless perhaps, since they will be the bodies of the dead—that is, of those who fall into the second death—they can for that reason quite reasonably be called corpses too. Hence also the saying of the same prophet that I quoted above: "But the earth of the ungodly will fall." And who does not see that cadauera [corpses] are named from cadere [to fall]? It is obvious, too, that those translators put "men" for what means

88 Isaiah 66:19–20.
89 Isaiah 66:20–21.
90 Isaiah 66:22–24.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	"people." For no one is going to say that women who transgressed will not be in that punishment; rather, both sexes are understood under the name of the principal one, especially since it was from him that woman was made.
Verum, quod ad rem maxime pertinet, cum et in bonis dicitur: Veniet omnis caro, quia ex omni genere hominum populus ille constabit (non enim omnes homines ibi erunt, quando in poenis plures erunt), — sed, ut dicere coeperam, cum et in bonis caro et in malis membra uel cadauera nominantur: profecto post resurrectionem carnis, cuius fides his rerum uocabulis omnino firmatur, illud, quo boni et mali suis finibus dirimentur, futurum esse iudicium declaratur.	But—and this is most to the point—it is said of the good, "All flesh will come," because that people will be made up of every kind of human being (for not all human beings will be there, since more will be in punishment). As I had begun to say, then: when the good are called "flesh" and the wicked "limbs" or "corpses," it is surely being declared that the judgment by which the good and the wicked will be separated into their own ends will take place after the resurrection of the flesh—and faith in that resurrection is fully confirmed by these terms.

WHAT THE GOING OUT OF THE SAINTS TO SEE THE PUNISHMENTS OF THE WICKED WILL BE LIKE

The saints will "go out" to see the punishment of the wicked by knowledge, not bodily movement.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.22 Sed quo modo egredientur boni ad uidendas poenas malorum? Numquid corporis motu beatas illas relicturi sunt sedes et ad loca poenalia perrecturi, ut malorum tormenta conspiciant praesentia corporali? Absit; sed egredientur per scientiam. Hoc enim uerbo significatum est eos qui cruciabuntur extra futuros. Propter quod et Dominus ea loca tenebras exteriores uocat, quibus contrarius est ille ingressus, de quo dicitur seruo bono: Intra in gaudium Domini tui; ne illuc mali putentur ingredi, ut sciantur, sed ad illos potius uelut egredi scientia, qua eos cognituri sunt, boni, quia id quod extra est cognituri sunt. Qui enim erunt in poenis, quid agatur intus in gaudio Domini nescient; qui uero erunt in illo gaudio, quid agatur foris in illis tenebris exterioribus scient.	But how will the good go out to see the punishments of the wicked? Will they, by bodily movement, leave those blessed abodes and make their way to the places of punishment, to look upon the torments of the wicked in bodily presence? Far from it. They will go out by knowledge. For this word signifies that those who are tormented will be outside. That is why the Lord, too, calls those places the outer darkness, which is the opposite of the entering of which the good servant is told: "Enter into the joy of your Lord." So the wicked are not to be thought of as entering there in order to be known; rather, the good, as it were, go out to them by the knowledge by which they will know them, because what they will know is outside. For those who are in punishment will not know what is happening within, in the joy of the Lord; but those who are in that joy will know what is happening outside, in that outer darkness.[91]
Ideo dictum est: Egredientur, quia eos etiam qui foris ab eis erunt utique non latebunt. Si enim haec prophetae nondum facta nosse potuerunt per hoc, quod erat Deus, quantulumcumque erat, in eorum mortalium mentibus: quo modo inmortales sancti iam facta tunc nescient, cum Deus erit omnia in omnibus? Stabit ergo in illa	That is why it says, "They will go out": because even those who are outside, apart from them, will certainly not be hidden from them. For if the prophets could know these things before they had happened, because God was in their minds, mortal though they were, in however small a measure, 91 Matthew 25:21; the "outer darkness" is from Matthew 8:12 and 25:30.

LATIN	ENGLISH
beatitudine sanctorum semen in nomen; semen scilicet de quo Iohannes ait: Et semen eius in ipso manet; nomen uero de quo per hunc Esaiam dictum est: Nomen aeternum dabo eis Erit eis et mensis ex mense et sabbatum ex sabbato, tamquam luna ex luna et requies ex requie, quorum utrumque ipsi erunt cum ex his umbris ueteribus et temporalibus in illa lumina noua ac sempiterna transibunt.	how will the immortal saints not know them once they have happened, when God will be all in all? So in that happiness the seed and the name of the saints will stand—the seed, that is, of which John says, "And his seed remains in him," and the name of which it was said through this same Isaiah, "I will give them an everlasting name." They will have month after month and Sabbath after Sabbath—as it were, moon after moon and rest after rest. And they themselves will be both, when they pass from these old and temporal shadows into those new and everlasting lights.[92]
In poenis autem malorum et inexstinguibilis ignis et uiuacissimus uermis ab aliis adque aliis aliter adque aliter est expositus. Alii quippe utrumque ad corpus, alii utrumque ad animum rettulerunt; alii proprie ad corpus ignem, tropice ad animum uermem, quod esse credibilius uidetur. Sed nunc de hac differentia non est temporis disputare. De iudicio namque ultimo, quo fiet diremtio bonorum et malorum, hoc uolumen inplere suscepimus; de ipsis uero praemiis et poenis alias diligentius disserendum est.	As for the punishments of the wicked, the unquenchable fire and the ever-living worm have been explained in different ways by different people. Some have referred both to the body, others both to the soul; others have referred the fire literally to the body and the worm figuratively to the soul, which seems more credible. But this is not the time to debate this difference. For I undertook to fill this volume with the last judgment, by which the separation of the good and the wicked will be made; the rewards and punishments themselves must be discussed more carefully elsewhere.

WHAT DANIEL PROPHESIED ABOUT THE PERSECUTION OF ANTICHRIST, THE JUDGMENT OF GOD, AND THE KINGDOM OF THE SAINTS

Daniel foresees four kingdoms, Antichrist's brief reign and the eternal kingdom of the saints.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.23 Daniel de hoc ultimo iudicio sic prophetat, ut Antichristum quoque prius uenturum esse praenuntiet adque ad aeternum regnum sanctorum perducat narrationem suam. Cum enim uisione prophetica quattuor bestias significantes quattuor regna uidisset, ipsumque quartum a quodam rege superatum, qui Antichristus agnoscitur, et post haec aeternum regnum filii hominis, qui intellegitur Christus: Horruit, inquit, spiritus meus, ego Daniel, in habitudine mea, et uisus capitis mei conturbabant me. Et accessi, inquit, ad unum de stantibus, et ueritatem quaerebam ab eo de omnibus his, et dixit mihi ueritatem.	Daniel prophesies about this last judgment in such a way that he also foretells that the Antichrist will come first, and he carries his narrative through to the eternal kingdom of the saints. In a prophetic vision he had seen four beasts signifying four kingdoms, and the fourth of them overcome by a certain king, who is recognized as the Antichrist, and after these things the eternal kingdom of the Son of Man, who is understood to be Christ. Then he says: "My spirit shuddered within my frame—I, Daniel—and the visions of my head troubled me. And I approached," he says, "one of those standing by, and I asked him the truth about all these things, and he told me the truth."[93]
Deinde, quid audierit ab illo, a quo de omnibus his quaesiuit, tamquam eo sibi exponente sic loquitur: Hae	Then he tells what he heard from the one he had asked about all these things, as that one explained

92 1 Corinthians 15:28; 1 John 3:9; Isaiah 56:5.

LATIN

bestiae magnae quattuor quattuor regna surgent in terra, quae auferentur, et accipient regnum sancti Altissimi et obtinebunt illud usque in saeculum et usque in saeculum saeculorum. Et quaerebam, inquit, diligenter de bestia quarta, quae erat differens prae omni bestia, terribilis amplius — dentes eius ferrei et ungues eius aerei, manducans et comminuens et reliqua pedibus suis conculcans —, et de cornibus eius decem, quae, erant in capite eius, et de altero, quod adscendit et excussit de prioribus tria; cornu illud in quo erant oculi et os loquens magna, et uisus eius maior ceteris.

Videbam, et cornu illud faciebat bellum cum sanctis, et praeualebat ad ipsos, donec uenit uetustus dierum, et regnum dedit sanctis Altissimi; et tempus peruenit, et regnum obtinuerunt sancti. Haec Daniel quaesisse se dixit. Deinde quid audierit continuo subiungens: Et dixit, inquit (id est ille, a quo quaesierat, respondit et dixit): Bestia quarta quartum regnum erit in terra, quod praeualebit omnibus regnis; et manducabit omnem terram, et conculcabit eam et concidet. Et decem cornua eius decem reges surgent; et post eos surget alius, qui superabit malis omnes, qui ante eum fuerunt; et tres reges humiliabit et uerba aduersus Altissimum loquetur et sanctos Altissimi conteret et suspicabitur mutare tempora et legem: et dabitur in manu eius usque ad tempus et tempora et dimidium tempus.

Et iudicium sedebit, et principatum remouebunt ad exterminandum et perdendum usque in finem; et regnum et potestas et magnitudo regum, qui sub omni caelo sunt, data est sanctis Altissimi. Et regnum eius regnum sempiternum; et omnes principatus ipsi seruient et obaudient. Huc usque, inquit, finis sermonis. Ego Daniel; multum cogitationes meae conturbabant me, et forma mea inmutata est super me, et uerbum in corde meo conseruaui. Quattuor illa regna exposuerunt quidam Assyriorum, Persarum, Macedonum et Romanorum. Quam uero conuenienter id fecerint, qui nosse desiderant, legant presbyteri Hieronymi librum in Danielem satis erudite diligenterque conscriptum.

ENGLISH

it to him: "These four great beasts are four kingdoms that will arise on the earth, which will be taken away; and the saints of the Most High will receive the kingdom and possess it forever, and forever and ever. And I inquired carefully," he says, "about the fourth beast, which was different from every other beast, more terrible—its teeth of iron and its claws of bronze, devouring and crushing and trampling the rest with its feet—and about its ten horns, which were on its head, and about the other one, which came up and struck out three of the earlier ones: that horn which had eyes and a mouth speaking great things, and whose appearance was greater than the others."[94]

"I watched, and that horn was making war with the saints and prevailing over them, until the Ancient of Days came and gave the kingdom to the saints of the Most High; and the time came, and the saints possessed the kingdom." Daniel said that he had asked about these things. Then, immediately adding what he heard, he says: "And he said"—that is, the one he had asked answered and said—"The fourth beast will be a fourth kingdom on the earth, which will prevail over all kingdoms; and it will devour the whole earth, and trample it and cut it down. And its ten horns are ten kings who will arise; and after them another will arise, who will surpass in evils all who were before him; and he will humble three kings, and speak words against the Most High, and wear down the saints of the Most High, and he will think to change times and the law; and it will be given into his hand until a time and times and half a time."[95]

"And the judgment will sit, and they will take away his dominion, to destroy and ruin it to the end; and the kingdom and the power and the greatness of the kings who are under the whole heaven was given to the saints of the Most High. And his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and all dominions will serve and obey him. Here," he says, "is the end of the account. I, Daniel—my thoughts greatly troubled me, and my appearance was changed upon me, and I kept the word in my heart." Some have explained those four kingdoms as those of the Assyrians, the Persians, the Mace-

93 Daniel 7:15–16.
94 Daniel 7:17–20.
95 Daniel 7:21–25.

LATIN

Antichristi tamen aduersus ecclesiam saeuissimum regnum licet exiguo spatio temporis sustinendum, donec Dei ultimo iudicio regnum sancti accipiant sempiternum, qui uel dormitans haec legit, dubitare non sinitur.

ENGLISH

donians and the Romans. How fittingly they did so, those who wish to know may read the book on Daniel by the priest Jerome, written with considerable learning and care. But that the reign of the Antichrist against the Church will be most savage, though it is to be endured for only a short space of time, until by God's last judgment the saints receive the everlasting kingdom—this no one who reads these words, even half asleep, can be allowed to doubt.[96]

Tempus quippe et tempora et dimidium temporis unum annum esse et duo et dimidium ac per hoc tres annos et semissem etiam numero dierum posterius posito dilucescit, aliquando in scripturis et mensum numero declaratur. Videntur enim tempora indefinite hic dicta lingua Latina; sed per dualem numerum dicta sunt, quem Latini non habent. Sicut autem Graeci, ita hunc dicuntur habere et Hebraei. Sic ergo dicta sunt tempora, tamquam dicerentur duo tempora. Vereri me sane fateor, ne in decem regibus, quos tamquam decem homines uidetur inuenturus Antichristus, forte fallamur, adque ita ille inopinatus adueniat, non exsistentibus tot regibus in orbe Romano.

For that "a time and times and half a time" means one year and two years and a half, and therefore three and a half years, becomes clear also from the number of days given later; and in the Scriptures it is sometimes stated by the number of months as well. In Latin, "times" seems here to be said indefinitely; but it is said in the dual number, which Latin speakers do not have. The Hebrews, like the Greeks, are said to have it. So "times" is said as if "two times" were said. I confess, indeed, that I fear we may perhaps be mistaken about the ten kings whom the Antichrist seems likely to find as ten individual men, and that he may thus arrive unexpectedly, when there are not that many kings in the Roman world.[97]

Quid si enim numero isto denario uniuersitas regum significata est, post quos ille uenturus est; sicut millenario, centenario, septenario significatur plerumque uniuersitas, et aliis adque aliis numeris, quos nunc commemorare non est necesse?

For what if this number ten signifies the totality of the kings after whom he is to come—just as totality is often signified by a thousand, a hundred, or seven, and by various other numbers that there is no need to mention now?

Alio loco idem Daniel: Et erit, inquit, tempus tribulationis, qualis non fuit ex quo nata est gens super terram usque ad tempus illud. Et in tempore illo saluabitur populus tuus omnis, qui inuentus fuerit scriptus in libro. Et multi dormientium in terrae aggere exsurgent: hi in uitam aeternam, et hi in obprobrium et in confusionem aeternam. Et intellegentes fulgebunt sicut claritas firmamenti, et ex iustis multi sicut stellae in saecula et adhuc. Sententiae illi euangelicae est locus iste simillimus de resurrectione dumtaxat corporum mortuorum.

In another place the same Daniel says: "And there will be a time of tribulation such as has not been since a nation was born upon the earth until that time. And at that time your people will be saved, everyone who is found written in the book. And many of those who sleep in the mound of the earth will rise, some to eternal life, and some to reproach and to eternal confusion. And those who understand will shine like the brightness of the firmament, and many of the righteous like the stars forever and beyond." This passage is very similar to that saying in the gospel, at least as regards the resurrection of the bodies of the dead.[98]

Nam qui illic dicti sunt esse in monumentis, ipsi hic dormientes in terrae aggere, uel, sicut alii interpretati

For those who are said there to be in the tombs are the same as those who here sleep in the mound of 96 Daniel 7:26–28. Jerome (c. AD 347–420), the biblical scholar and translator, wrote his Commentary on Daniel around AD 407.

97 The days are given in Daniel 12:11–12; the months (forty-two) in Revelation 11:2 and 13:5.
98 Daniel 12:1–3. The gospel saying is John 5:28–29.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sunt, in terrae puluere; et sicut ibi procedent dictum est, ita hic exsurgent; sicut ibi qui bona, fecerunt, in resurrectionem uitae; qui autem mala egerunt, in resurrectionem iudicii: ita et isto loco hi in uitam aeternam, et hi in obprobrium et in confusionem aeternam. Non autem diuersum putetur, quod, cum ibi positum sit omnes qui sunt in monumentis, hic non ait propheta omnes, sed multi dormientium in terrae aggere. Ponit enim aliquando scriptura pro omnibus multos. Propterea et Abrahae dictum est: Patrem multarum gentium posui te, cui tamen alio loco: In semine, inquit, tuo benedicentur omnes gentes.	the earth—or, as others have translated it, in the dust of the earth. Just as it is said there, "they will come forth," so here, "they will rise." Just as it is said there, "those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment," so too in this passage, "some to eternal life, and some to reproach and to eternal confusion." Nor should it be thought a difference that, whereas it says there, "all who are in the tombs," here the prophet does not say "all," but "many of those who sleep in the mound of the earth." For Scripture sometimes puts "many" for "all." That is why it was said to Abraham, "I have made you the father of many nations," though in another place it says to him, "In your seed all nations will be blessed."[99]
De tali autem resurrectione huic quoque ipsi prophetae Danieli paulo post dicitur: Et tu ueni et requiesce; adhuc enim dies in conpletionem consummationis, et requiesces et resurges in sorte tua in fine dierum.	And of such a resurrection it is said to this same prophet Daniel a little later: "And you, come and rest; for there are still days until the completion of the consummation; and you will rest and rise again in your lot at the end of the days."[100]

WHAT IS PROPHESIED IN THE PSALMS OF DAVID ABOUT THE END OF THIS WORLD AND GOD'S LAST JUDGMENT

The Psalms say the heavens will perish and that God will come openly to judge.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.24 Multa de iudicio nouissimo dicuntur in psalmis, sed eorum plura transeunter et strictim. Hoc tamen quod de fine huius saeculi apertissime ibi dictum est, nequaquam silentio praeteribo. Principio terram tu fundasti, Domine, et opera manuum tuarum sunt caeli. Ipsi peribunt, tu autem permanes; et omnes sicut uestimentum ueterescent, et sicut opertorium mutabis eos, et mutabuntur: tu autem idem ipse es, et anni tui non deficient. Quid est quod Porphyrius, cum pietatem laudet Hebraeorum, qua magnus et uerus et ipsis numinibus terribilis ab eis colitur Deus, Christianos ob hoc arguit maximae stultitiae etiam ex oraculis deorum suorum, quod istum mundum dicunt esse periturum? Ecce in litteris pietatis Hebraeorum dicitur Deo, quem confitente tanto philosopho etiam ipsa numina perhorrescunt: Opera manuum tuarum sunt caeli, ipsi peribunt.	Many things are said about the last judgment in the Psalms, but most of them in passing and briefly. Yet what is said there most plainly about the end of this world I will by no means pass over in silence: "In the beginning you founded the earth, O Lord, and the heavens are the works of your hands. They will perish, but you remain; and they will all grow old like a garment, and like a covering you will change them, and they will be changed. But you are the same, and your years will not fail." How is it, then, that Porphyry praises the piety of the Hebrews, by which they worship the God who is great and true and dreaded even by the deities themselves, and yet accuses the Christians of the greatest folly, even citing the oracles of his gods, for saying that this world will perish? Look: in the writings of the Hebrews' piety it is said to God, whom even the deities themselves hold in dread, as so great a philosopher admits:

99 Genesis 17:5; Genesis 22:18.
100 Daniel 12:13.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	"The heavens are the works of your hands; they will perish."[101]
Numquid quando caeli peribunt, mundus, cuius idem caeli superior pars est et tutior, non peribit? Si haec sententia Ioui displicet, cuius, ut scribit iste philosophus, uelut grauioris auctoritatis oraculo in Christianorum credulitate culpatur: quur non similiter sapientiam tamquam stultitiam culpat Hebraeorum, in quorum libris piissimis inuenitur? Porro si in illa sapientia, quae Porphyrio tam multum placet, ut eam deorum quoque suorum uocibus praedicet, legitur caelos esse perituros: quur usque adeo uana est ista fallacia, ut in fide Christianorum uel inter cetera uel prae ceteris hoc detestentur, quod in ea periturus creditur mundus, quo utique nisi pereunte caeli perire non possunt?	When the heavens perish, will the world not perish, when those same heavens are its higher and safer part? If this view displeases Jupiter, whose oracle, so this philosopher writes, carries greater authority and condemns it as part of the Christians' credulity, why does he not likewise condemn the wisdom of the Hebrews as folly, since the view is found in their most pious books? Further, we read in that wisdom that the heavens will perish. Porphyry likes that wisdom so much that he even proclaims it through the voices of his own gods. Why, then, is this deceit so empty that, among the other things in the Christian faith or above all the rest, they abhor this: that in it the world is believed destined to perish? Surely the heavens cannot perish unless the world perishes.
Et in litteris quidem sacris, quae proprie nostrae sunt, non Hebraeis nobisque communes, id est in euangelicis et apostolicis libris legitur: Praeterit figura huius mundi; legitur: Mundus transit: legitur: Caelum et terra transibunt. Sed puto, quod praeterit, transit, transibunt aliquanto mitius dicta sunt quam peribunt.	And in the sacred writings that are properly ours and not shared by the Hebrews and us—that is, in the Gospels and the apostolic books—we do read: "The form of this world is passing away"; we read: "The world passes away"; we read: "Heaven and earth will pass away." But I suppose that "is passing away," "passes away" and "will pass away" are put somewhat more mildly than "will perish."[102]
In epistula quoque apostoli Petri, ubi aqua inundatus qui tunc erat perisse dictus est mundus, satis clarum est, et quae pars mundi a toto significata, et quatenus perisse sit dicta, et qui caeli repositi igni reseruandi in diem iudicii et perditionis hominum inpiorum; et in eo quod paulo post ait: Veniet dies Domini ut fur, in quo caeli magno inpetu transcurrent, elementa autem ardentia resoluentur, et terra et quae in ipsa sunt opera exurentur: ac deinde subiecit: His omnibus pereuntibus quales oportet esse uos?	The epistle of the apostle Peter also says that the world that then existed perished when it was flooded with water. There it is clear enough what part of the world was signified by the whole, and in what sense it is said to have perished. It is equally clear which heavens are "stored up, kept for fire until the day of judgment and destruction of the ungodly." A little later he says: "The day of the Lord will come like a thief; on it the heavens will pass away with great violence, the elements will burn and melt, and the earth and the works that are in it will be burned up." Then he added: "Since all these things are perishing, what sort of people ought you to be?"[103]
possunt illi caeli intellegi perituri, quos dixit repositos igni reseruandos, et elementa accipi arsura, quae in hac ima mundi parte subsistunt procellosa et turbulenta, in qua eosdem caelos dixit esse repositos, saluis illis	In these words the heavens that will perish can be understood as those he said were stored up and kept for fire. The elements that will burn can be taken as those that exist, stormy and turbulent, in

101 Psalm 101:26–28 (102:25–27 in most English Bibles).
102 1 Corinthians 7:31; 1 John 2:17; Matthew 24:35.
103 2 Peter 3:6–7, 10–11.

LATIN

superioribus et in sua integritate manentibus, in quorum firmamento sunt sidera constituta. Nam et illud quod scriptum est, stellas de caelo esse casuras, praeter quod potest multo probabilius et aliter intellegi, magis ostendit mansuros esse illos caelos, si tamen stellae inde casurae sunt; cum uel tropica sit locutio, quod est credibilius, uel in isto imo caelo futurum sit, utique mirabilius quam nunc fit. Unde et illa stella Vergiliana facem ducens multa cum luce cucurrit, et Idaea se condidit silua.

Hoc autem quod de psalmo commemoraui, nullum caelorum uidetur relinquere, quod periturum esse non dixerit. Ubi enim dicitur: Opera manuum tuarum sunt caeli, ipsi peribunt, quam nullum eorum ab opere Dei, tam nullum eorum a perditione secernitur. Non enim dignabuntur de Petri apostoli locutione, quem uehementer oderunt, Hebraeorum defendere pietatem, deorum suorum oraculis adprobatam, ut saltem, ne totus mundus periturus esse credatur, sic a toto pars accipiatur in eo, quod dictum est: Ipsi peribunt, cum soli caeli infimi perituri sint, quem ad modum in apostolica illa epistula a toto pars accipitur, quod diluuio perisse dictus est mundus, quamuis sola eius cum suis caelis pars ima perierit.

Sed quia hoc, ut dixi, non dignabuntur, ne uel apostoli Petri adprobent sensum, uel tantum concedant conflagrationi nouissimae, quantum dicimus ualuisse diluuium, qui nullis aquis, nullis flammis totum genus humanum perire posse contendunt: restat ut dicant, quod propterea di eorum Hebraeam sapientiam laudauerunt, quia istum psalmum non legerant.

In psalmo etiam quadragensimo nono de iudicio Dei nouissimo intellegitur dictum: Deus manifestus ueniet, Deus noster, et non silebit. Ignis in conspectu eius ardebit, et in circuitu eius tempestas ualida. Aduocabit caelum sursum et terram discernere populum suum. Congregate illi iustos eius, qui disponunt testamentum eius super sacrificia. Hoc nos de Domino Iesu Christo this lowest part of the world, in which he said those same heavens were stored up. Meanwhile the higher heavens, in whose firmament the stars are set, remain safe and whole. For even the scripture that says the stars will fall from heaven rather shows that those heavens will remain, if indeed the stars are to fall from there. Besides, it can be understood otherwise, and much more plausibly. Either the expression is figurative, which is more credible, or it will happen in this lowest heaven, though certainly in a more wondrous way than happens now. So too that star in Virgil, "trailing a torch, ran with a great light" and "hid itself in the forest of Ida."[104]

ENGLISH

But the passage I cited from the psalm seems to leave none of the heavens that it does not say will perish. For where it says, "The heavens are the works of your hands; they will perish," none of them is excluded from destruction, just as none of them is excluded from being God's work. They will not deign to defend the piety of the Hebrews, approved by the oracles of their own gods, by appealing to the language of the apostle Peter, whom they fiercely hate. Such an appeal would at least spare them from believing that the whole world will perish. The part could then be taken for the whole in the words "they will perish," since only the lowest heavens are to perish. In just this way, in that apostolic epistle, the part is taken for the whole when the world is said to have perished in the flood, though only its lowest part perished, along with its heavens.

But, as I said, they will not deign to do this. They do not want to endorse the meaning of the apostle Peter, or to grant the final conflagration as much power as we say the flood had, since they maintain that the whole human race cannot perish by any waters or any flames. So it remains for them to say that their gods praised the wisdom of the Hebrews because they had not read this psalm.

In the forty-ninth psalm, too, these words are understood to speak of God's last judgment: "God will come openly, our God, and he will not keep silent. Fire will blaze before him, and around him a mighty storm. He will summon heaven on high, and the earth, to separate his people. Gather to 104 Virgil, Aeneid 2.694–697, describing a shooting star seen as an omen at the fall of Troy, near which Mount Ida stands.

LATIN	ENGLISH
intellegimus, quem speramus de caelo esse uenturum ad uiuos et mortuos iudicandos. Manifestus enim ueniet inter iustos et iniustos iudicaturus iuste, qui prius uenit occultus ab iniustis iudicandus iniuste.	him his righteous ones, who establish his covenant upon sacrifices." We understand this of the Lord Jesus Christ, whom we expect to come from heaven to judge the living and the dead. For he will come openly to judge justly between the just and the unjust, he who first came hidden to be judged unjustly by the unjust.[105]
Ipse, inquam, manifestus ueniet et non silebit, id est, in uoce iudicis euidens apparebit, qui prius cum uenisset occultus, ante iudicem siluit, quando sicut ouis ad immolandum ductus est et sicut agnus coram tondente fuit sine uoce, quem ad modum de illo per Esaiam legimus prophetatum et in euangelio uidemus inpletum. De igne uero et tempestate, cum in Esaiae prophetia tale aliquid tractaremus, quo modo essent haec intellegenda, iam diximus. Quod uero dictum est: Aduocabit caelum sursum: quoniam sancti et iusti recte caelum appellantur, nimirum hoc est, quod ait apostolus: Simul cum illis rapiemur in nubibus in obuiam Christo in aera. Nam secundum litterae superficiem, quo modo aduocatur caelum sursum, quasi possit esse nisi sursum?	He, I say, will come openly and will not keep silent. That is, he will appear plainly, with the voice of a judge. When he first came hidden, he kept silent before his judge, when he was led like a sheep to the slaughter and was voiceless like a lamb before its shearer. We read this prophesied of him through Isaiah and see it fulfilled in the Gospel. As for the fire and the storm, we have already said how these should be understood, when we were discussing something similar in the prophecy of Isaiah. Then come the words "He will summon heaven on high." The saints and the righteous are rightly called heaven, so this is no doubt what the apostle says: "Together with them we shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Christ in the air." For if we take the surface of the letter, how is heaven summoned on high, as if it could be anywhere but on high?[106]
Quod autem adiunctum est: Et terram discernere populum suum, si tantummodo subaudiatur aduocabit, id est aduocabit et terram, nec subaudiatur sursum, hunc uidetur habere sensum secundum rectam fidem, ut caelum intellegatur in eis, qui cum illo iudicaturi sunt, et terra in eis, qui iudicandi sunt; ut aduocabit caelum sursum non hic intellegamus rapiet in aera, sed in iudiciarias eriget sedes. Potest et illud intellegi aduocabit caelum sursum aduocabit angelos in supernis et excelsis locis, cum quibus descendat ad faciendum iudicium; aduocabit et terram, id est homines in terra utique iudicandos.	Then comes what is added: "and the earth, to separate his people." Suppose only "he will summon" is understood here, that is, "he will summon the earth too," and "on high" is not understood. Then, in keeping with right faith, it seems to mean this: heaven is understood in those who are to judge with him, and earth in those who are to be judged. In that case we should take "he will summon heaven on high" here to mean not "he will catch them up into the air" but "he will raise them to the seats of judgment." It can also be understood this way: "he will summon heaven on high" means "he will summon the angels in the high and lofty places, and with them he will descend to carry out the judgment"; "he will summon the earth too" means the human beings on earth, who are, of course, to be judged.
Si autem utrumque subaudiendum est, cum dicitur et terram, id est et aduocabit, et sursum, ut iste sit sensus: Aduocabit caelum sursum, et terram aduocabit sursum: nihil melius intellegi existimo quam omnes qui rapientur	But perhaps both are to be understood when it says "and the earth," that is, both "he will summon" and "on high." Then the sense would be: "He will summon heaven on high, and he will sum-

105 Psalm 49:3–5 (50:3–5 in most English Bibles).
106 Isaiah 53:7; 1 Thessalonians 4:17.

LATIN	ENGLISH
in obuiam Christo in aera, sed caelum dictum propter animas, terram propter corpora. Discernere porro populum suum, quid est nisi per iudicium separare bonos a malis, tamquam oues ab haedis? Deinde conuersio sermonis ad angelos facta est: Congregate illi iustos eius; profecto enim per angelicum ministerium res tanta peragenda est. Si autem quaerimus, quos iustos ei congregaturi sunt angeli: Qui disponunt, inquit, testamentum eius super sacrificia. Haec est omnis uita iustorum: disponere testamentum Dei super sacrificia.	mon the earth on high." In that case I think nothing better can be understood than all those who will be caught up to meet Christ in the air. They are called "heaven" on account of their souls and "earth" on account of their bodies. Next, "to separate his people"—what is this but to divide the good from the bad through judgment, as sheep from goats? Then the speech turns to the angels: "Gather to him his righteous ones." For surely so great a work is to be carried out through the ministry of angels. And if we ask which righteous ones the angels will gather to him, it says: "Those who establish his covenant upon sacrifices." This is the whole life of the righteous: to establish God's covenant upon sacrifices.
Aut enim opera misericordiae sunt super sacrificia, id est sacrificiis praeponenda, iuxta sententiam Dei dicentis: Misericordiam uolo quam sacrificium; aut si super sacrificia (in sacrificiis) intellegitur dictum, quo modo super terram fieri dicitur quod fit utique in terra: profecto ipsa opera misericordiae sunt sacrificia, quibus placetur Deo, sicut in libro huius operis decimo me disseruisse reminiscor; in quibus operibus disponunt iusti testamentum Dei, quia propter promissiones, quae nouo eius testamento continentur, haec faciunt. Unde congregatis sibi iustis suis et ad suam dexteram constitutis nouissimo utique iudicio dicturus est Christus: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum a constitutione mundi. Esuriui enim, et dedistis mihi manducare, et cetera quae ibi proferuntur de bonorum operibus bonis et eorum praemiis sempiternis per ultimam sententiam iudicantis.	There are two ways to take this. Either works of mercy are "upon sacrifices," that is, to be ranked above sacrifices, in keeping with the saying of God: "I desire mercy rather than sacrifice." Or "upon sacrifices" is understood to mean "in sacrifices," just as something done on the earth is said to be done "upon the earth." In that case works of mercy are themselves the sacrifices by which God is pleased, as I remember arguing in the tenth book of this work. In these works the righteous establish God's covenant, because they do them for the sake of the promises contained in his new covenant. Hence, when his righteous ones have been gathered to him and set at his right hand, Christ will say at the last judgment: "Come, you who are blessed by my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave me food to eat." The rest that is set out there tells of the good works of the good and of their everlasting rewards, given through the final sentence of the judge.[107]

THE PROPHECY OF MALACHI, IN WHICH GOD'S LAST JUDGMENT IS DECLARED AND A CLEANSING OF SOME THROUGH PURIFYING PUNISHMENTS IS SPOKEN OF

Malachi foretells a judgment that refines some through purifying punishment.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.25 Propheta Malachiel siue Malachi, qui et angelus dictus est, qui etiam Esdras sacerdos, cuius alia in canonem scripta recepta sunt, ab aliquibus creditur nam de illo hanc esse Hebraeorum opinionem dicit Hieronymus,	The prophet Malachiel, or Malachi, prophesies the last judgment. He is also called "the angel," and some believe he is also Ezra the priest, other writings of whom have been received into the canon, 107 Hosea 6:6; Matthew 25:34–35.

LATIN

iudicium nouissimum prophetat dicens: Ecce uenit, dicit Dominus omnipotens; et quis sustinebit diem introitus eius, aut quis ferre poterit ut adspiciat eum? Quia ipse ingreditur quasi ignis conflatorii et quasi herba lauantium; et sedebit conflans et emundans sicut argentum et sicut aurum, et emundabit filios Leui, et fundet eos sicut aurum et argentum; et erunt Domino offerentes hostias in iustitia, et placebit Domino sacrificium Iudae et Hierusalem, sicut diebus pristinis et sicut annis prioribus.

Et accedam ad uos in iudicio, et ero testis uelox super maleficos et super adulteros et super eos, qui iurant in nomine meo mendaciter, et qui fraudant mercedem mercennario et obprimunt per potentiam uiduas et percutiunt pupillos et peruertunt iudicium aduenae, et qui non timent me, dicit Dominus omnipotens; quoniam ego Dominus Deus uester, et non mutor. Ex his quae dicta sunt uidetur euidentius apparere in illo iudicio quasdam quorundam purgatorias poenas futuras. Ubi enim dicitur: Quis sustinebit diem introitus eius, aut quis ferre poterit, ut adspiciat eum? Quia ipse ingreditur quasi ignis conflatorii et quasi herba lauantium; et sedebit conflans et emundans sicut argentum et sicut aurum et emundabit filios Leui, et fundet eos sicut aurum et argentum: quid aliud intellegendum est?

Dicit tale aliquid et Esaias: Lauabit Dominus sordes filiorum et filiarum Sion, et sanguinem emundabit de medio eorum spiritu iudicii et spiritu combustionis. Nisi forte sic eos dicendum est emundari a sordibus et eliquari quodam modo, cum ab eis mali per poenale iudicium separantur, ut illorum segregatio adque damnatio purgatio sit istorum, quia sine talium de cetero permixtione uicturi sunt. Sed cum dicit: Et emundabit filios Leui et fundet eos sicut aurum et argentum; et erunt Domino offerentes hostias in iustitia, et placebit Domino sacrificium Iudae et Hierusalem, utique ostendit eos ipsos, qui emundabuntur, deinceps in sacrificiis iustitiae Domino esse placituros, ac per hoc ipsi a sua iniustitia mundabuntur, in qua Domino displicebant. Hostiae porro in plena perfectaque iustitia, cum mundati fuerint, ipsi erunt.

ENGLISH

for Jerome says that this is the opinion of the Hebrews about him. Malachi says: "See, he comes," says the Lord Almighty, "and who will endure the day of his coming, or who will be able to bear to look on him? For he enters like a refiner's fire and like the washers' herb. He will sit refining and cleansing as silver and as gold. He will cleanse the sons of Levi and melt them like gold and silver, and they will present offerings to the Lord in righteousness. And the sacrifice of Judah and Jerusalem will please the Lord, as in the days of old and as in former years.[108]

And I will draw near to you in judgment, and I will be a swift witness against sorcerers and against adulterers and against those who swear falsely in my name. I will witness against those who cheat the hired worker of his wages, who oppress widows by their power, strike orphans and pervert justice for the stranger, and against those who do not fear me," says the Lord Almighty, "for I am the Lord your God, and I do not change." From what has been said, it seems to appear more clearly that in that judgment there will be certain purifying punishments for certain people. For consider the words: "Who will endure the day of his coming, or who will be able to bear to look on him? For he enters like a refiner's fire and like the washers' herb. He will sit refining and cleansing as silver and as gold. He will cleanse the sons of Levi and melt them like gold and silver." What else is to be understood by them?

Isaiah too says something similar: "The Lord will wash away the filth of the sons and daughters of Zion, and will cleanse the blood from their midst by a spirit of judgment and a spirit of burning." Unless perhaps we should say that they are cleansed of filth, and in a sense refined, when the wicked are separated from them through penal judgment. The separation and condemnation of the one group would then be the purification of the other, since from then on they will live without any mingling with such people. But he also says: "He will cleanse the sons of Levi and melt them like gold and silver, and they will present offerings to the Lord in righteousness, and the sacrifice of Judah and Jerusalem will please the Lord." Here he surely shows that the very ones 108 The name Malachi means "my messenger" (Latin angelus). The passage quoted is Malachi 3:1–6.

LATIN

ENGLISH

who will be cleansed will afterward please the Lord with sacrifices of righteousness. Therefore they themselves will be cleansed of their own unrighteousness, in which they displeased the Lord. And once they have been cleansed, they themselves will be the offerings, in full and perfect righteousness.[109]

Quid enim acceptius Deo tales offerunt quam se ipsos? Verum ista quaestio de purgatoriis poenis, ut diligentius pertractetur, in tempus aliud differenda est. Filios autem Leui et ludam et Hierusalem ipsam Dei ecclesiam debemus accipere, non ex Hebraeis tantum, sed ex aliis etiam gentibus congregatam; nec talem, qualis nunc est, ubi, si dixerimus, quia peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus, et ueritas in nobis non est; sed qualis tunc erit, uelut area per uentilationem, ita per iudicium purgata nouissimum, eis quoque igne mundatis, quibus talis mundatio necessaria est, ita ut nullus omnino sit, qui offerat sacrificium pro peccatis suis. Omnes enim qui sic offerunt, profecto in peccatis sunt, pro quibus dimittendis offerunt, ut, cum obtulerint acceptumque Deo fuerit, tunc dimittantur.

For what more acceptable thing do such people offer to God than themselves? But this question of purifying punishments must be put off to another time, so that it may be treated more carefully. Now, by the sons of Levi and Judah and Jerusalem we ought to understand the Church of God itself, gathered not only from the Hebrews but from other nations too. This is not the Church as it is now, where "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." It is the Church as it will be then, purified by the last judgment as a threshing floor is purified by winnowing. Those who need such cleansing will also have been cleansed by fire, so that there will be no one at all who offers sacrifice for his sins. For all who offer in that way are surely in sins. They offer to have those sins forgiven, so that once they have offered and the offering has been accepted by God, their sins may then be forgiven.[110]

THE SACRIFICES THAT THE SAINTS WILL OFFER TO GOD, WHICH WILL PLEASE HIM AS THEY DID IN THE DAYS OF OLD AND IN FORMER YEARS

The sacrifices pleasing "as in former days" recall humanity's sinless state in paradise.

LATIN

ENGLISH

20.26 Volens autem Deus ostendere ciuitatem suam tunc in ista consuetudine non futuram dixit filios Leui oblaturos hostias in iustitia; non ergo in peccato ac per hoc non pro peccato. Unde intellegi potest in eo quod secutus adiunxit adque ait: Et placebit Domino sacrificium Iudae et Hierusalem, sicut diebus pristinis et sicut annis prioribus, frustra sibi Iudaeos secundum legem ueteris testamenti sacrificiorum suorum praeterita tempora polliceri. Non enim tunc in iustitia, sed in peccatis hostias offerebant, quando pro peccatis praecipue ac primitus offerebant, usque adeo ut sacerdos ipse, quem debemus utique credere ceteris fuisse iustiorem, secundum Dei mandatum soleret pro suis primum offerre peccatis, deinde pro populi. Quapropter exponere nos

But God wished to show that his city will not then follow this practice, and so he said that the sons of Levi would present offerings in righteousness—not, therefore, in sin, and hence not for sin. He went on to add: "and the sacrifice of Judah and Jerusalem will please the Lord, as in the days of old and as in former years." From this it can be understood that the Jews promise themselves in vain a return to the past times of their sacrifices under the law of the old covenant. For in those times they presented their offerings not in righteousness but in sins, since they offered chiefly and first of all for sins. So much was this the case that even the priest, who we must certainly believe was 109 Isaiah 4:4.

110 1 John 1:8.

LATIN

oportet, quo modo sit accipiendum quod dictum est: Sicut diebus pristinis et sicut annis prioribus.

Fortassis enim tempus illud commemorat, quo primi homines in paradiso fuerunt. Tunc enim puri adque integri ab omni sorde ac labe peccati se ipsos Deo mundissimas hostias offerebant; ceterum ex quo commissae praeuaricationis causa inde dimissi sunt adque humana in eis natura damnata est, excepto uno Mediatore et post lauacrum regenerationis quibusque adhuc paruulis nemo mundus a sorde, sicut scriptum est, nec infans, cuius est unius diei uita super terram.

Quod si respondetur etiam eos merito dici posse offerre hostias in iustitia, qui offerunt in fide (iustus enim ex fide uiuit; quamuis se ipsum seducat, si dixerit se non habere peccatum, et ideo non dicat, quia ex fide uiuit): numquid dicturus est quispiam hoc fidei tempus illi fini esse coaequandum, quando igne iudicii nouissimi mundabuntur, qui offerant hostias in iustitia? Ac per hoc quoniam post talem mundationem nullum peccatum iustos habituros esse credendum est, profecto illud tempus, quantum adtinet ad non habere peccatum, nulli tempori conparandum est, nisi quando primi homines in paradiso ante praeuaricationem innocentissima felicitate uixerunt. Recte itaque intellegitur hoc significatum esse, cum dictum est:

Sicut diebus pristinis et sicut annis prioribus. Nam et per Esaiam postea quam caelum nouum et terra noua promissa est, inter cetera, quae ibi de sanctorum beatitudine per allegorias et aenigmata exsequitur, quibus expositionem congruam reddere nos prohibuit uitandae longitudinis cura: Secundum dies, inquit, ligni uitae erunt dies populi mei. Quis autem sacras litteras adtigit et ignorat ubi Deus plantauerit lignum uitae, a cuius cibo separatis illis hominibus, quando eos sua de paradiso eiecit iniquitas, eidem ligno circumposita est ignea terribilisque custodia?

ENGLISH

more righteous than the rest, regularly offered by God's command first for his own sins and then for those of the people. We must therefore explain how the words "as in the days of old and as in former years" are to be taken.

Perhaps it recalls the time when the first human beings were in paradise. For then, pure and untouched by any filth or stain of sin, they offered themselves to God as the purest offerings. But ever since they were sent away from there because of the transgression they committed, and human nature was condemned in them, no one is "clean from filth," apart from the one Mediator and those who are still little children after the washing of rebirth. As it is written, "not even an infant whose life on earth is a single day."[111]

Someone may reply that those who offer in faith can also rightly be said to present offerings in righteousness. For "the righteous lives by faith," although he deceives himself if he says he has no sin, and so he does not say it, because he lives by faith. But will anyone claim that this time of faith is to be equated with that end? At that end, those who are to present offerings in righteousness will be cleansed by the fire of the last judgment. And so, since we must believe that after such cleansing the righteous will have no sin, that time surely cannot be compared, as far as having no sin is concerned, with any other time. The only exception is the time when the first human beings lived in paradise before the transgression, in a happiness of perfect innocence. It is rightly understood, therefore, that this is what is meant when it is said:[112]

"As in the days of old and as in former years." For through Isaiah, too, a new heaven and a new earth are promised. After that promise he sets out other things about the happiness of the saints in allegories and riddles; concern to avoid length has kept us from giving them a fitting explanation. Among these he says: "The days of my people will be like the days of the tree of life." And who that has so much as touched the sacred scriptures does not know where God planted the tree of life? Its food was withheld from those first human beings when their wickedness drove them out of paradise, and 111 Job 14:4–5, in the Greek and Old Latin versions.

112 Habakkuk 2:4, quoted in Romans 1:17.

LATIN

ENGLISH

a fiery and terrible guard was set around that same tree.[113]

Quod si quisquam illos dies ligni uitae, quos commemorauit propheta Esaias, istos qui nunc aguntur ecclesiae Christi dies esse contendit ipsumque Christum lignum uitae prophetice dictum, quia ipse est sapientia Dei, de qua Salomon ait: Lignum uitae est omnibus amplectentibus eam; nec annos egisse aliquos in paradiso illos primos homines, unde tam cito eiecti sunt, ut nullum ibi gignerent filium, et ideo non posse illud tempus intellegi in eo quod dictum est: Sicut diebus pristinis et sicut annis prioribus: istam praetereo quaestionem, ne cogar, quod prolixum est, cuncta discutere, ut aliquid horum ueritas manifesta confirmet. Video quippe alterum sensum, ne dies pristinos et annos priores carnalium sacrificiorum nobis pro magno munere per prophetam promissos fuisse credamus.

But suppose someone contends that those days of the tree of life mentioned by the prophet Isaiah are these present days of the Church of Christ. He might say that Christ himself is prophetically called the tree of life, because he is the wisdom of God, of which Solomon says, "She is a tree of life to all who embrace her." He might add that those first human beings did not spend any years in paradise, since they were thrown out so quickly that they had no child there. In that case that time cannot be understood in the words "as in the days of old and as in former years." I pass over this question. Otherwise I would be forced into the lengthy task of examining everything, so that the plain truth might confirm one of these views. For I see another meaning, which keeps us from believing that the prophet promised us, as a great gift, the days of old and the former years of carnal sacrifices.[114]

Hostiae namque illae ueteris legis in quibusque pecoribus inmaculatae ac sine ullo prorsus uitio iubebantur offerri, et significabant homines sanctos, qualis solus inuentus est Christus, sine ullo omnino peccato. Proinde quia post iudicium, cum fuerint etiam igne mundati, qui eius modi mundatione sunt digni, in omnibus sanctis nullum inuenietur omnino peccatum, adque ita se ipsos offerent in iustitia, ut tales hostiae omni modo inmaculatae ac sine ullo uitio sint futurae, erunt profecto sicut pristinis diebus et sicut annis prioribus, quando in umbra huius rei futurae mundissimae offerebantur hostiae. Haec erit namque munditia tunc in inmortali carne ac mente sanctorum, quae figurabatur in illarum corporibus hostiarum.

For those offerings of the old law, whatever animals they came from, were commanded to be offered spotless and wholly without blemish. They signified holy human beings, such as Christ alone has been found to be—without any sin at all. Accordingly, after the judgment, those who deserve such cleansing will also have been cleansed by fire, and no sin at all will be found in any of the saints. They will offer themselves in righteousness, and these offerings will be spotless in every respect and without any blemish. Since this is so, things will surely be as in the days of old and as in former years. In those days the purest offerings were offered in the shadow of this thing to come. For then there will be in the immortal flesh and mind of the saints the purity that was prefigured in the bodies of those sacrificial animals.

Deinde propter eos, qui non mundatione, sed damnatione sunt digni: Et accedam, inquit, ad uos in iudicium, et ero testis uelox super maleficos et super adulteros, et cetera, quibus damnabilibus enumeratis criminibus addidit: Quoniam ego Dominus Deus uester, et non mutor; tamquam diceret: Cum uos mutauerit et in deterius culpa uestra et in melius gratia mea, ego non mutor. Testem

Then he turns to those who deserve not cleansing but condemnation: "And I will draw near to you in judgment," he says, "and I will be a swift witness against sorcerers and against adulterers," and so on. After listing these damnable crimes he added: "For I am the Lord your God, and I do not change." It is as if he said: "Your guilt has changed you for 113 Isaiah 65:22, in the Greek version.

114 Proverbs 3:18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uero se dicit futurum, quia in iudicio suo non indiget testibus, eumque uelocem, siue quia repente uenturus est eritque iudicium ipso inopinato eius aduentu celerrimum, quod tardissimum uidebatur, siue quia ipsas conuincet sine ulla sermonis prolixitate conscientias.	the worse, and my grace has changed you for the better, but I do not change." He says he will be a witness because in his judgment he needs no witnesses. He calls himself swift for one of two reasons. Either he will come suddenly, and the judgment that seemed so very slow will be very swift because his coming is so unexpected. Or he will convict consciences themselves without any lengthy speech.
In cogitationibus enim, sicut scriptum est, inpii interrogatio erit; et apostolus: Cogitationibus, inquit, accusantibus uel etiam excusantibus in die, qua iudicabit Deus occulta hominum secundum euangelium meum per Iesum Christum. Etiam sic ergo Dominus futurus testis intellegendus est uelox, cum sine mora reuocaturus est in memoriam, unde conuincat puniatque conscientiam.	For, as it is written, "In the thoughts of the ungodly there will be an inquiry." And the apostle says: "Their thoughts accuse or even excuse them, on the day when God will judge the secrets of human beings according to my gospel, through Jesus Christ." In this way too, then, the Lord is to be understood as a swift witness. Without delay he will call back to memory the things by which he will convict and punish the conscience.[115]

THE SEPARATION OF THE GOOD AND THE WICKED, BY WHICH THE DISTINCTION MADE AT THE LAST JUDGMENT IS DECLARED

Malachi foretells the day that will show the difference between the just and the wicked.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.27 Illud etiam, quod aliud agens in octauo decimo libro ex isto propheta posui, ad iudicium nouissimum pertinet, ubi ait: Erunt mihi, dicit Dominus omnipotens, in die qua ego facio in adquisitionem, et eligam eos sicut eligit homo filium suum qui seruit ei; et conuertar et uidebitis quid sit inter iustum et iniquum, et inter seruientem Deo et eum qui non seruit ei. Quia ecce dies uenit ardens sicut clibanus et conburet eos, et erunt omnes alienigenae et uniuersi, qui faciunt iniquitatem, stipula, et succendet eos dies ueniens, dicit Dominus omnipotens, et non relinquetur in eis radix neque ramus.	Another passage I quoted from this same prophet in Book 18, while dealing with a different subject, also concerns the last judgment. There he says: "They shall be mine, says the Lord Almighty, on the day when I act to make them my own possession, and I will choose them as a man chooses his son who serves him. And I will turn, and you shall see what difference there is between the just and the unjust, between the one who serves God and the one who does not serve him. For see, the day is coming, burning like an oven, and it shall burn them up. All the foreigners and all who do wickedness shall be stubble, and the coming day shall set them on fire, says the Lord Almighty, and neither root nor branch shall be left of them.[116]
Et orietur uobis, qui timetis nomen meum, sol iustitiae, et sanitas in pinnis eius, et egrediemini et salietis sicut uituli de uinculis relaxati; et conculcabitis iniquos, et erunt cinis sub pedibus uestris, dicit Dominus omnipotens. Haec distantia praemiorum adque poenarum iustos dirimens ab iniustis, quae sub isto sole in huius uitae uanitate non cernitur, quando sub illo sole	And for you who fear my name the sun of justice shall rise, with healing in its wings. You shall go out and leap like calves let loose from their tethers, and you shall trample the wicked, and they shall be ashes under your feet, says the Lord Almighty." This difference of rewards and punishments, which separates the just from the unjust, is 115 Wisdom 1:9; Romans 2:15–16.

116 Malachi 3:17–4:1. Augustine had quoted the passage earlier in Book 18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
iustitiae in illius uitae manifestatione clarebit, tunc profecto erit iudicium quale numquam fuit.	not seen under this sun, in the vanity of this life. But it will shine out clearly under that sun of justice, when that other life is made manifest. Then, surely, there will be a judgment such as there has never been.

THAT THE LAW OF MOSES MUST BE UNDERSTOOD SPIRITUALLY, SO THAT A FLESHLY UNDERSTANDING MAY NOT FALL INTO DAMNABLE MURMURING

Malachi calls for remembering the law of Moses, to be read spiritually as pointing to Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.28 Quod uero subiungit idem propheta: Mementote legis Moysi serui mei, quam mandaui ei in Choreb ad omnem Israel, praecepta et iudicia opportune commemorat post declaratum futurum tam magnum inter obseruatores legis contemtoresque discrimen; simul etiam ut discant legem spiritaliter intellegere et inueniant in ea Christum, per quem iudicem facienda est inter bonos et malos ipsa discretio. Non enim frustra idem Dominus ait Iudaeis: Si crederetis Moysi, crederetis et mihi; de me enim ille scripsit. Carnaliter quippe accipiendo legem et eius promissa terrena rerum caelestium figuras esse nescientes in illa murmura conruerunt, ut dicere auderent: Vanus est qui seruit Deo, et quid amplius, quia custodiuimus mandata eius et quia ambulauimus supplices ante faciem Domini omnipotentis?	The same prophet then adds: "Remember the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded him at Horeb for all Israel, its precepts and its judgments." He fittingly recalls these after declaring that there will be so great a distinction between those who keep the law and those who despise it. At the same time, he does so that they may learn to understand the law spiritually and find Christ in it, through whom, as judge, that very separation between the good and the wicked is to be made. For it was not for nothing that the same Lord said to the Jews: "If you believed Moses, you would believe me too; for he wrote about me." By taking the law carnally, and not knowing that its earthly promises were figures of heavenly things, they fell into those murmurings, and even dared to say: "It is futile to serve God. What more have we gained because we kept his commandments, and because we walked as suppliants before the face of the Lord Almighty?[117]
Et nunc nos beatos dicimus alienos, et aedificantur omnes qui faciunt iniquitatem. Quibus eorum uerbis quodam modo propheta conpulsus est nouissimum praenuntiare iudicium, ubi mali nec saltem falso sint beati, sed apertissime miserrimi appareant, et boni nulla temporali saltem miseria laborent, sed clara ac sempiterna beatitudine perfruantur. Dixerat quippe istorum talia quaedam uerba etiam superius dicentium: Omnis, qui facit malum, bonus est in conspectu Domini, et tales ei placent. Ad haec, inquam, contra Deum murmura peruenerunt legem Moysi accipiendo carnaliter. Unde et ille in psalmo septuagensimo secundo paene commotos dicit fuisse pedes suos et effusos gressus suos, utique in lapsum, quia zelauit in peccatoribus, pacem peccatorum intuens; ita ut inter cetera diceret: Quo modo sciuit Deus, et si est scientia in Altissimo?	And now we call strangers happy, and all who do wickedness are built up." By these words of theirs the prophet was in a way compelled to foretell the last judgment. Then the wicked will not be happy even falsely but will plainly appear most wretched, and the good will not suffer even temporal misery but will enjoy a clear and everlasting happiness. Earlier, too, he had reported similar words from these same people: "Everyone who does evil is good in the sight of the Lord, and such people please him." To these murmurings against God, I say, they came by taking the law of Moses carnally. That is why the psalmist, too, in Psalm 72, says that his feet had almost been shaken and his steps had almost slipped away—slipped, that is, into a fall—because he envied sinners when he 117 Malachi 4:4; John 5:46; Malachi 3:14–15.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	saw the peace of sinners. He went so far as to say, among other things: "How does God know, and is there knowledge in the Most High?"[118]
diceret etiam: Numquid uano iustificaui cor meum et laui in innocentibus manus meas? Ut autem solueret hanc difficillimam quaestionem, quae fit, cum uidentur boni esse miseri et felices mali: Hoc, inquit, labor est ante me, donec introeam in sanctuarium Dei et intellegam in nouissima. Iudicio quippe nouissimo non sic erit; sed in aperta iniquorum miseria et aperta felicitate iustorum longe quam nunc est aliud apparebit.	and also: "Was it for nothing that I justified my heart and washed my hands among the innocent?" But to resolve this most difficult question, which arises when the good seem wretched and the wicked happy, he says: "This is a labor before me, until I enter the sanctuary of God and understand the last things." For at the last judgment it will not be so. In the open misery of the wicked and the open happiness of the just, things will appear far otherwise than they do now.[119]

THE COMING OF ELIJAH BEFORE THE JUDGMENT, WHEN THE JEWS, AS HIS PREACHING UNLOCKS THE SECRETS OF SCRIPTURE, WILL BE CONVERTED TO CHRIST

Elijah will return before the judgment and the Jews will come to believe in Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.29 Cum autem admonuisset, ut meminissent legis Moysi (quoniam praeuidebat eos multo adhuc tempore non eam spiritaliter, sicut oportuerat, accepturos), continuo subiecit? Et ecce ego mittam uobis Heliam Thesbiten, antequam ueniat dies Domini magnus et inlustris, qui conuertet cor patris ad filium et cor hominis ad proximum suum, ne forte ueniens percutiam terram penitus. Per hunc Heliam magnum mirabilemque prophetam exposita sibi lege ultimo tempore ante iudicium Iudaeos in Christum uerum, id est in Christum nostrum, esse credituros, celeberrimum est in sermonibus cordibusque fidelium. Ipse quippe ante aduentum iudicis Saluatoris non inmerito speratur esse uenturus, quia etiam nunc uiuere non inmerito creditur. Curru namque igneo raptus est de rebus humanis, quod euidentissime sancta scriptura testatur.	He had urged them to remember the law of Moses, because he foresaw that for a long time yet they would not take it spiritually, as they ought. Then he immediately added: "And see, I will send you Elijah the Tishbite before the great and glorious day of the Lord comes. He will turn the heart of the father to the son and the heart of a man to his neighbor, lest when I come I strike the earth utterly." Through this Elijah, the great and wonderful prophet, the law will be expounded to the Jews in the last time before the judgment, and they will believe in the true Christ, that is, in our Christ. This is a familiar theme in the conversation and the hearts of the faithful. Not without reason is he expected to come before the coming of the Savior as judge, since not without reason is he believed to be alive even now. For he was carried away from human affairs in a chariot of fire, as holy Scripture most plainly testifies.[120]
Cum uenerit ergo, exponendo legem spiritaliter, quam nunc Iudaei carnaliter sapiunt, conuertet cor patris ad filium, id est cor patrum ad filios: singularem quippe pro numero plurali interpretes septuaginta posuerunt; et est sensus, ut etiam filii sic intellegant legem, id est Iudaei, quem ad modum eam patres intellexerunt, id est prophetae, in quibus erat et ipse Moyses; sic enim cor	When he comes, then, he will expound spiritually the law that the Jews now understand carnally, and so he will turn the heart of the father to the son—that is, the heart of the fathers to the sons, for the Seventy translators put the singular for the plural. The sense is that the sons, that is, the Jews, will understand the law as the fathers understood 118 Malachi 3:15 and 2:17; Psalm 72:2–3, 11 (73 in most English Bibles).

119 Psalm 72:13, 16–17 (73 in most English Bibles).
120 Malachi 4:5–6. Elijah's being taken up in a chariot of fire is told in 2 Kings 2:11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
patrum conuertetur ad filios, cum intellegentia patrum perducetur ad intellegentiam filiorum; et cor filiorum ad patres eorum, dum in id, quod senserunt illi, consentiunt et isti; ubi Septuaginta dixerunt: Et cor hominis ad proximum suum. Sunt enim inter se ualde proximi patres et filii.	it, that is, the prophets, among whom was Moses himself. For in this way the heart of the fathers will be turned to the sons, when the understanding of the fathers is carried through to the understanding of the sons. And the heart of the sons will be turned to their fathers, when the sons come to think as the fathers thought. At this point the Seventy said: "and the heart of a man to his neighbor." For fathers and sons are very near neighbors to one another.[121]
Quamquam in uerbis septuaginta interpretum, qui prophetice interpretati sunt, potest alius sensus idemque electior inueniri, ut intellegatur Helias cor Dei Patris conuersurus ad Filium: non utique agendo ut Pater diligat Filium, sed docendo quod Pater diligat Filium; ut et Iudaei, quem prius oderant, diligant eundem, qui noster est, Christum. Iudaeis enim nunc auersum cor habet Deus a Christo nostro, quia hoc putant. Eis ergo tunc cor eius conuertetur ad Filium, cum ipsi conuerso corde didicerint dilectionem Patris in Filium. Quod uero sequitur: Et cor hominis ad proximum suum, id est, conuertet Helias et cor hominis ad proximum suum: quid melius intellegitur quam cor hominis ad hominem Christum? Cum enim sit in forma Dei Deus noster, formam serui accipiens esse dignatus est etiam proximus noster.	Yet in the words of the Seventy, who translated prophetically, another sense can be found, and a better one. On this reading, Elijah is to turn the heart of God the Father to the Son—not, of course, by bringing it about that the Father loves the Son, but by teaching that the Father loves the Son. Then the Jews too will love the same Christ, our Christ, whom they previously hated. For in the Jews' view God now has his heart turned away from our Christ, because that is what they believe. For them, then, his heart will be turned to the Son when they, with their own hearts turned, have learned the Father's love for the Son. Then follows: "and the heart of a man to his neighbor"—that is, Elijah will also turn the heart of a man to his neighbor. What better meaning can be found than the heart of a man turned to the man Christ? For though in the form of God he is our God, in taking the form of a servant he deigned to become our neighbor as well.
Hoc ergo faciet Helias. Ne forte, inquit, ueniam et percutiam terram penitus. Terra sunt enim, qui terrena sapiunt, sicut Iudaei carnales usque nunc; ex quo uitio contra Deum murmura illa uenerunt: Quia mali ei placent, et: Vanus est qui seruit Deo.	This, then, is what Elijah will do. "Lest perhaps," he says, "I come and strike the earth utterly." For those who set their minds on earthly things are earth, as the carnal Jews are to this day. From this fault came those murmurings against God: "The wicked please him," and, "It is futile to serve God."

THAT IN THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, WHEN GOD IS SAID TO BE ABOUT TO JUDGE, THE PERSON OF CHRIST IS NOT PLAINLY SHOWN, YET FROM CERTAIN TESTIMONIES IN WHICH THE LORD GOD SPEAKS IT APPEARS BEYOND DOUBT THAT HE IS CHRIST

Where the Old Testament says God will come to judge, the Lord God is Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
20.30 Multa alia sunt scripturarum testimonia diuinarum de nouissimo iudicio Dei, quae si omnia colligam, nimis longum erit. Satis ergo sit, quod et nouis et ueteribus	There are many other testimonies in the divine Scriptures about God's last judgment, but to collect them all would take far too long. Let it be 121 The Seventy are the translators of the Septuagint, the Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures, traditionally said to be the work of seventy (or seventy-two) scholars.

LATIN

litteris sacris hoc praenuntiatum esse probauimus. Sed ueteribus per Christum futurum esse iudicium, id est iudicem Christum de caelo esse uenturum, non tam, quam nouis, euidenter expressum est, propterea quia, cum ibi dicit Dominus Deus se esse uenturum uel Dominum Deum dicitur esse uenturum, non consequenter intellegitur Christus. Dominus enim Deus et Pater est et Filius et Spiritus sanctus; neque hoc tamen intestatum relinquere nos oportet.

Primo itaque demonstrandum est, quem ad modum Iesus Christus tamquam Dominus Deus loquatur in propheticis libris, et tamen Iesus Christus euidenter appareat, ut et quando non sic apparet et tamen ad illud ultimum iudicium Dominus Deus dicitur esse uenturus, possit Iesus Christus intellegi. Est locus aput Esaiam prophetam, qui hoc quod dico euidenter ostendit. Deus enim per prophetam: Audi me, inquit, Iacob et Israel quem ego uoco. Ego sum primus et ego in sempiternum, et manus mea fundauit terram, et dextera mea firmauit caelum. Vocabo eos, et stabunt simul, et congregabuntur omnes et audient. Quis ei nuntiauit haec? Diligens te feci uoluntatem tuam super Babylonem, ut auferrem semen Chaldaeorum. Et locutus sum et ego uocaui; adduxi eum et prosperam feci uiam eius.

Accedite ad me et audite haec. Non a principio in abscondito locutus sum; quando fiebant, ibi eram. Et nunc Dominus Deus misit me et Spiritus eius. Nempe ipse est, qui loquebatur sicut Dominus Deus; nec tamen intellegeretur Iesus Christus, nisi addidisset: Et nunc Dominus Deus misit me et Spiritus eius. Dixit hoc enim secundum formam serui, de re futura utens praeteriti temporis uerbo, quem ad modum aput eundem prophetam legitur: Sicut ouis ad immolandum ductus est. Non enim ait: ducetur, sed pro eo, quod futurum erat, praeteriti temporis uerbum posuit. Et adsidue prophetia sic loquitur.

Est alius locus aput Zachariam, qui hoc euidenter ostendit, quod omnipotentem misit omnipotens: quis quem, nisi Deus Pater Deum Filium? Nam ita scriptum est: Haec dicit Dominus omnipotens: Post gloriam misit enough, then, that we have shown it to have been foretold in both the New and the Old sacred writings. But that the judgment will take place through Christ—that is, that Christ will come from heaven as judge—is not stated as plainly in the Old as in the New. The reason is that when the Lord God says there that he will come, or the Lord God is said to be coming, it does not follow that Christ is meant. For the Lord God is the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. Even so, we must not leave this point without evidence.

ENGLISH

First, then, we must show how Jesus Christ speaks in the prophetic books as the Lord God, and yet plainly appears as Jesus Christ. Then, even where he does not appear so plainly, and yet the Lord God is said to be coming to that last judgment, Jesus Christ can be understood. There is a passage in the prophet Isaiah that plainly shows what I mean. God says through the prophet: "Hear me, Jacob, and Israel whom I call. I am the first, and I am forever. My hand founded the earth, and my right hand made the heavens firm. I will call them, and they will stand together, and they will all be gathered and will hear. Who told him these things? Because I love you, I did your will against Babylon, to take away the seed of the Chaldeans. I spoke, and I called; I brought him and made his way prosper.[122]

Come near to me and hear this. From the beginning I have not spoken in secret; when these things were being done, I was there. And now the Lord God has sent me, and his Spirit." Surely it is he who was speaking as the Lord God. Yet he would not be understood to be Jesus Christ had he not added: "And now the Lord God has sent me, and his Spirit." For he said this according to the form of a servant, using a verb in the past tense about a future event. So too we read in the same prophet: "Like a sheep he was led to the slaughter." He did not say "will be led"; in place of what was still to come he put a past-tense verb. And prophecy constantly speaks in this way.[123]

There is another passage, in Zechariah, which plainly shows that the Almighty sent the Almighty. Who sent whom, if not God the Father God the Son? For it is written: "Thus says the Lord

122 Isaiah 48:12–16.
123 Isaiah 53:7.

LATIN

me super gentes, quae spoliauerunt uos; quia qui tetigerit uos, quasi tangit pupillam oculi eius. Ecce ego inferam manum meam super eos, et erunt spolia his, qui seruierant eis et cognoscetis quia Dominus omnipotens misit me. Ecce dicit Dominus omnipotens a Domino omnipotente se missum. Quis hic audeat intellegere nisi Christum loquentem, scilicet ouibus quae perierant domus Israel? Ait namque in euangelio: Non sum missus nisi ad oues quae perierunt domus Israel; quas hic comparauit pupillae oculi Dei propter excellentissimum dilectionis adfectum; ex quo genere ouium etiam ipsi apostoli fuerunt.

Sed post gloriam resurrectionis utique suae (quae antequam fieret, ait euangelista: Iesus nondum erat glorificatus) etiam super gentes missus est in apostolis suis, ac sic inpletum est quod in psalmo legitur: Erues me de contradictionibus populi, constitues me in caput gentium, ut, qui spoliauerant Israelitas quibusque Israelitae seruierant, quando sunt gentibus subditi, non uicissim eodem modo spoliarentur, sed ipsi spolia fierent Israelitarum (hoc enim apostolis promiserat dicens: Faciam uos piscatores hominum, et uni eorum: Ex hoc iam, inquit, homines eris capiens); spolia ergo fierent, sed in bonum, tamquam erepta uasa illi forti, sed fortius adligato.

Item per eundem prophetam Dominus loquens: Et erit, inquit, in die illa quaeram auferre omnes gentes quae ueniunt contra Hierusalem, et effundam super domum Dauid et super habitatores Hierusalem spiritum gratiae et misericordiae; et adspicient ad me pro eo quod insultauerunt, et plangent super eo planctum quasi super carissimum, et dolebunt dolore quasi super unigenitum. Numquid nisi Dei est auferre omnes gentes inimicas sanctae ciuitatis Hierusalem, quae ueniunt contra eam, id est contrariae sunt ei, uel, sicut alii sunt interpretati, ueniunt super… eam, id est, ut eam sibi subiciant; aut effundere super domum Dauid et super habitatores eiusdem ciuitatis spiritum gratiae et misericordiae?

ENGLISH

Almighty: After glory he has sent me upon the nations that plundered you; for whoever touches you is like one who touches the pupil of his eye. See, I will bring my hand upon them, and they will become plunder for those who had served them, and you will know that the Lord Almighty has sent me." See, the Lord Almighty says that he was sent by the Lord Almighty. Who would dare to understand this as anyone but Christ speaking—speaking, that is, to the lost sheep of the house of Israel? For he says in the Gospel: "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." These sheep he here compared to the pupil of God's eye, because of his surpassing tenderness of love. And the apostles themselves were of this flock.[124]

But "after glory"—after the glory of his resurrection, that is, before which the evangelist says, "Jesus was not yet glorified"—he was sent upon the nations as well, in his apostles. So was fulfilled what we read in the psalm: "You will rescue me from the contradictions of the people; you will make me head of the nations." Those who had plundered the Israelites, and whom the Israelites had served when they were subject to the nations, were not in their turn plundered in the same way. Instead they themselves became plunder for the Israelites. (This is what he had promised the apostles when he said, "I will make you fishers of men," and to one of them, "From now on you will be catching men.") They became plunder, then, but for their good, like goods snatched from that strong man—strong, but more strongly bound.[125]

Again, the Lord speaks through the same prophet: "And it shall be on that day that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. I will pour out on the house of David and on the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and mercy. They will look on me because they have mocked, and they will mourn over him with mourning as for one most dear, and they will grieve with grief as for an only son." Whose work is it, if not God's, to destroy all the nations hostile to the holy city of Jerusalem, which "come against" it—that is, are opposed to it—or, as others have translated, "come upon" it, that is, to subject 124 Zechariah 2:8–9; Matthew 15:24.

125 John 7:39; Psalm 17:44 (18:43 in most English Bibles); Matthew 4:19; Luke 5:10. The bound "strong man" alludes to Matthew 12:29.

LATIN

ENGLISH

it to themselves? Whose work is it, if not God's, to pour out on the house of David and on the inhabitants of that city the spirit of grace and mercy?[126]

Hoc utique Dei est, et ex persona Dei dicitur per prophetam; et tamen hunc Deum haec tam magna et tam diuina facientem se Christus ostendit adiungendo adque dicendo: Et adspicient ad me pro eo quod insultauerunt, et plangent super eo planctum quasi super carissimum (siue dilectum) et dolebunt dolore quasi super unigenitum. Paenitebit quippe Iudaeos in die illa, etiam eos, qui accepturi sunt spiritum gratiae et misericordiae, quod in eius passione insultauerint Christo, cum ad eum adspexerint in sua maiestate uenientem eumque esse cognouerint, quem prius humilem in suis parentibus inluserunt; quamuis et ipsi parentes eorum tantae illius inpietatis auctores resurgentes uidebunt eum, sed puniendi iam, non adhuc corrigendi.

This is certainly the work of God, and it is spoken by the prophet in the person of God. And yet Christ shows that he is this God who does such great and divine things, by going on to say: "They will look on me because they have mocked, and they will mourn over him with mourning as for one most dear (or beloved), and they will grieve with grief as for an only son." For on that day the Jews will repent—even those who are to receive the spirit of grace and mercy—that they mocked Christ in his passion. This will happen when they look on him coming in his majesty and recognize that he is the one whom they mocked, in the persons of their ancestors, when he was lowly. Their ancestors too, the authors of that great impiety, will rise again and see him—but now to be punished, no longer to be corrected.

Non itaque hoc loco ipsi intellegendi sunt, ubi dictum est: Et effundam super domum Dauid et super habitatores Hierusalem spiritum gratiae et misericordiae; et adspicient ad me pro eo quod insultauerunt; sed tamen de illorum stirpe uenientes, qui per Heliam illo tempore credituri sunt. Sed sicut dicimus Iudaeis: Vos occidistis Christum, quamuis hoc parentes eorum fecerint: sic et isti se dolebunt fecisse quodam modo, quod fecerunt illi, ex quorum stirpe descendunt. Quamuis ergo accepto spiritu gratiae et misericordiae iam fideles non damnabuntur cum inpiis parentibus suis, dolebunt tamen tamquam ipsi fecerint, quod ab illis factum est. Non igitur dolebunt reatu criminis, sed pietatis adfectu.

So in this passage it is not the ancestors who are meant, where it is said: "I will pour out on the house of David and on the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and mercy; and they will look on me because they have mocked." It means those descended from their stock, who will believe through Elijah at that time. But just as we say to the Jews, "You killed Christ," although it was their ancestors who did it, so these too will grieve that in a sense they did what was done by those from whose stock they descend. They will have received the spirit of grace and mercy, and as believers they will not be condemned with their impious ancestors. Yet they will grieve as if they themselves had done what those others did. So they will grieve not from guilt for the crime but from the feeling of devotion.

Sane ubi dixerunt septuaginta interpretes: Et adspicient ad me pro eo quod insultauerunt, sic interpretatum est ex Hebraeo: Et adspicient ad me, quem confixerunt; quo quidem uerbo euidentius Christus crucifixus apparet. Sed illa insultatio, quam septuaginta ponere maluerunt, eius uniuersae non defuit passioni. Nam et detento et adligato et adiudicato et obprobrio ignominiosae uestis induto et spinis coronato et calamo in capite percusso et inridenter fixis genibus adorato et crucem suam portanti et in ligno iam pendenti utique insultauerunt. Proinde

Where the Seventy translators said, "They will look on me because they have mocked," the translation from the Hebrew reads: "They will look on me, whom they pierced." This wording shows Christ crucified more plainly. But the mocking that the Seventy chose to put was not absent from any part of his passion. They mocked him when he was arrested, when he was bound, when he was condemned, when he was dressed in the insult of a shameful robe, when he was crowned with 126 Zechariah 12:9–10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
interpretationem non sequentes unam, sed utramque iungentes, cum et insultauerunt et confixerunt legimus, plenius ueritatem dominicae passionis agnoscimus.	thorns, struck on the head with a reed, and worshiped in derision on bended knee, when he carried his cross, and when at last he hung on the tree. So if we follow not one translation but join both, reading both "they mocked" and "they pierced," we recognize the truth of the Lord's passion more fully.[127]
Cum ergo in propheticis litteris ad nouissimum iudicium faciendum Deus legitur esse uenturus, etsi eius alia distinctio non ponatur, tantummodo propter ipsum iudicium Christus debet intellegi, quia etsi Pater iudicabit, per aduentum filii hominis iudicabit. Nam ipse per suae praesentiae manifestationem non iudicat quemquam, sed omne iudicium dedit Filio, qui manifestabitur homo iudicaturus, sicut homo est iudicatus. Quis est enim alius, de quo item Deus loquitur per Esaiam sub nomine Iacob et Israel, de cuius semine corpus accepit? quod ita scriptum est: Iacob puer meus, suscipiam illum; Israel electus meus, adsumsit eum anima mea. Dedi Spiritum meum in illum, iudicium gentibus proferet. Non clamabit neque cessabit neque audietur foris uox eius. Calamum quassatum non conteret et linum fumans non exstinguet; sed in ueritate proferet iudicium.	So when we read in the prophetic writings that God is coming to hold the last judgment, Christ should be understood simply because of the judgment itself, even if nothing else marks the distinction. For although the Father will judge, he will judge through the coming of the Son of Man. He himself, by the manifestation of his own presence, judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son. The Son will be manifested as a man in order to judge, just as he was judged as a man. For who else is it of whom God likewise speaks through Isaiah under the name of Jacob and Israel, from whose seed he took a body? It is written: "Jacob my servant, I will uphold him; Israel my chosen, my soul has taken him to itself. I have put my Spirit upon him; he will bring forth judgment to the nations. He will not cry out, nor will he cease, nor will his voice be heard outside. A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not quench; but he will bring forth judgment in truth.[128]
Refulgebit et non confringetur, donec ponat in terra iudicium; et in nomine eius gentes sperabunt. In Hebraeo non legitur Iacob et Israel: sed quod ibi legitur seruus meus, nimirum septuaginta interpretes uolentes admonere quatenus id accipiendum sit, quia scilicet propter formam serui dictum est, in qua se Altissimus humillimum praebuit, ipsius hominis nomen ad eum significandum posuerunt, de cuius genere eadem serui forma suscepta est.	He will shine out and will not be broken, until he establishes judgment on the earth; and in his name the nations will hope." In the Hebrew we do not read "Jacob" and "Israel"; what we read there is "my servant." Evidently the Seventy translators wanted to show how this should be taken: that it was said with reference to the form of a servant, in which the Most High showed himself most lowly. So, to signify him, they put the name of the very man from whose line that form of a servant was taken.
Datus est in eum Spiritus sanctus, quod et columbae specie euangelio teste monstratum est; iudicium gentibus protulit, quia praenuntiauit futurum, quod gentibus erat occultum; mansuetudine non clamauit, nec tamen in praedicanda ueritate cessauit; sed non est audita foris uox eius nec auditur, quando quidem ab eis, qui foris ab eius corpore praecisi sunt, non illi oboeditur; ipsosque	The Holy Spirit was given upon him, as was also shown in the form of a dove, according to the Gospel's testimony. He brought forth judgment to the nations, because he foretold what was to come, which was hidden from the nations. In his gentleness he did not cry out, and yet he did not cease preaching the truth. But his voice was not heard 127 The translation from the Hebrew is Jerome's; the reading "whom they pierced" is also quoted in John 19:37.

128 John 5:22; Isaiah 42:1–4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
suos persecutores Iudaeos, qui calamo quassato perdita integritate lino fumanti amisso lumine conparati sunt, non contriuit, non exstinxit, quia pepercit eis, qui nondum uenerat eos iudicare, sed iudicari ab eis. In ueritate sane protulit iudicium praedicens eis, quando puniendi essent, si in sua malignitate persisterent.	outside, nor is it heard now, since he is not obeyed by those who are outside, cut off from his body. As for the Jews themselves, his persecutors, they are compared to a bruised reed, having lost their wholeness, and to a smoldering wick, having lost their light. Yet he did not break them and did not quench them, because he spared them: he had not yet come to judge them, but to be judged by them. He did indeed bring forth judgment in truth, foretelling to them when they would be punished if they persisted in their malice.
Refulsit in monte facies eius, in orbe fama eius; nec confractus siue contritus est, quia neque in se neque in ecclesia sua, ut esse desisteret, persecutoribus cessit; et ideo non est factum nec fiet, quod inimici eius dixerunt uel dicunt: Quando morietur et peribit nomen eius? donec ponat in terra iudicium. Ecce manifestatum est quod absconditum quaerebamus; hoc enim est nouissimum iudicium, quod ponet in terra, cum uenerit ipse de caelo, de quo iam uidemus inpletum, quod hic ultimum positum est: Et nomine eius gentes sperabunt. Per hoc certe quod negari non potest etiam illud credatur quod inpudenter negatur. Quis enim speraret, quod etiam hi, qui nolunt adhuc credere in Christum, iam nobiscum uident et quoniam negare non possunt, dentibus suis frendent et tabescunt?	His face shone on the mountain, his fame throughout the world. Nor was he broken or crushed, since neither in himself nor in his Church did he yield to his persecutors so as to cease to exist. And so what his enemies said, and still say, has not happened and will not happen: "When will he die, and his name perish?"—"until he establishes judgment on the earth." See, what we were looking for as hidden has been made plain. For this is the last judgment, which he will establish on the earth when he himself comes from heaven. We already see fulfilled what is placed last here: "And in his name the nations will hope." Through this, which cannot be denied, let that also be believed which is shamelessly denied. For who would have hoped for what even those who still refuse to believe in Christ now see along with us? Because they cannot deny it, they gnash their teeth and waste away.[129]
Quis, inquam, speraret gentes in Christi nomine speraturas, quando tenebatur ligabatur, caedebatur inludebatur, crucifigebatur, quando et ipsi discipuli spem perdiderant, quam in illo habere iam coeperant? Quod tunc uix unus latro sperauit in cruce, nunc, sperant gentes longe lateque diffusae, et ne in aeternum moriantur, ipsa in qua ille mortuus est cruce signantur.	Who, I say, would have hoped that the nations would hope in the name of Christ, when he was being seized and bound, scourged and mocked, and crucified—when even his own disciples had lost the hope they had begun to place in him? What scarcely one thief hoped for then, on the cross, the nations spread far and wide now hope for. And so as not to die forever, they are signed with the very cross on which he died.

THE ORDER OF THE LAST THINGS

Augustine lists the last events in order and announces the last two books.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nullus igitur uel negat uel dubitat per Christum Iesum tale, quale istis sacris litteris praenuntiatur, nouissimum futurum esse iudicium, nisi qui eisdem litteris nescio qua incredibili animositate seu caecitate non credit, quae iam	No one, then, denies or doubts that a last judgment such as these sacred writings foretell will take place through Christ Jesus—no one except a person who, from some incredible animosity or

129 Psalm 40:6 (41:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ueritatem suam orbi demonstrauere terrarum. In illo itaque iudicio uel circa illud iudicium has res didicimus esse uenturas, Heliam Thesbiten, fidem Iudaeorum, Antichristum persecuturum, Christum iudicaturum, mortuorum resurrectionem, bonorum malorumque diremtionem, mundi conflagrationem eiusdemque renouationem. Quae omnia quidem uentura esse credendum est; sed quibus modis et quo ordine ueniant, magis tunc docebit rerum experientia, quam nunc ad perfectum hominum intellegentia ualet consequi. Existimo tamen eo quo a me commemorata sunt ordine esse uentura.

Duo nobis ad hoc opus pertinentes reliqui sunt libri, ut adiuuante Domino promissa conpleamus; quorum erit unus de malorum supplicio, alius de felicitate iustorum; in quibus maxime, sicut Deus donauerit, argumenta refellentur humana, quae contra praedicta ac promissa diuina sapienter sibi miseri rodere uidentur et salubris fidei nutrimenta uelut falsa et ridenda contemnunt. Qui uero secundum Deum sapiunt, omnia, quae incredibilia uidentur hominibus et tamen scripturis sanctis, quarum iam ueritas multis modis adserta est, continentur, maximum argumentum tenent ueracem Dei omnipotentiam, quem certum habent nullo modo in eis potuisse mentiri et posse facere quod inpossibile est infideli.

ENGLISH

blindness, does not believe these writings, which have already demonstrated their truth to the whole world. At that judgment, then, or around the time of it, we have learned that these things will come: Elijah the Tishbite, the faith of the Jews, Antichrist who will persecute, Christ who will judge, the resurrection of the dead, the separation of the good and the wicked, the burning of the world and its renewal. All these things must be believed to be coming. But in what ways and in what order they will come, experience of the events will teach better then than human understanding can fully grasp now. I think, however, that they will come in the order in which I have listed them.

Two books belonging to this work remain for us, so that with the Lord's help we may fulfill our promises. One will be on the punishment of the wicked, the other on the happiness of the just. In them above all, as God grants, we will refute the human arguments that wretched people think they are wisely gnawing on against what God has foretold and promised, while they despise the nourishment of saving faith as false and laughable. But those who are wise according to God hold one argument as the greatest for all the things that seem incredible to human beings and yet are contained in the holy Scriptures, whose truth has already been established in many ways: the truthful omnipotence of God. They are certain that he could in no way have lied in those Scriptures, and that he can do what is impossible to the unbeliever.

Book XXI

The punishment of the damned
Can bodies burn forever? Against those who deny or soften eternal punishment.

THE ORDER OF THE DISCUSSION: WHY THE ETERNAL PUNISHMENT OF THE DAMNED WITH THE DEVIL MUST BE DISCUSSED BEFORE THE ETERNAL HAPPINESS OF THE SAINTS

Augustine treats the punishment of the damned before the happiness of the saints, since bodily torment seems less credible.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.1	Cum per Christum Dominum nostrum, iudicem uiuorum adque mortuorum, ad debitos fines ambae peruenerint ciuitates, quarum est una Dei, altera diaboli, cuius modi supplicium sit futurum diaboli et omnium ad eum pertinentium, in hoc libro nobis, quantum ope diuina ualebimus, diligentius disputandum est. Ideo autem hunc tenere ordinem malui, ut postea disseram de felicitate sanctorum, quoniam utrumque cum corporibus erit et incredibilius uidetur esse in aeternis corpora durare cruciatibus quam sine dolore ullo in aeterna beatitudine permanere; ac per hoc cum illam poenam non debere esse incredibilem demonstrauero, adiuuabit me plurimum, ut multo facilius omni carens molestia inmortalitas corporum in sanctis futura credatur.	When, through Christ our Lord, the judge of the living and the dead, the two cities have reached their due ends—the one the city of God, the other the city of the devil—what kind of punishment will the devil and all who belong to him suffer? That is what we must examine more carefully in this book, as far as divine help enables us. I have chosen to keep this order, and to discuss the happiness of the saints afterward, because both will involve bodies. It seems more incredible that bodies should endure in eternal torments than that they should continue without any pain in eternal happiness. So once I have shown that that punishment ought not to be incredible, it will help me greatly: it will be much easier to believe that the saints will have bodies that are immortal and free from all distress.
	Nec a diuinis ordo iste abhorret eloquiis, ubi aliquando quidem bonorum beatitudo prius ponitur, ut est illud: Qui bona fecerunt, in resurrectionem uitae; qui autem mala egerunt, in resurrectionem iudicii; sed aliquando et posterius, ut est: Mittet filius hominis angelos suos, et colligent de regno eius omnia scandala et mittent in caminum ignis ardentem; illic erit fletus et stridor dentium; tunc iusti fulgebunt sicut sol in regno Patris sui, et illud: Sic ibunt isti in supplicium aeternum, iusti autem in uitam aeternam; et in prophetis, quod commemorare longum est, nunc ille, nunc iste ordo, si quis inspiciat, inuenitur. Sed ego istum qua causa elegerim, dixi.	Nor is this order at odds with the divine Scriptures. Sometimes they place the happiness of the good first, as in this passage: "Those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment." But sometimes it comes later, as here: "The Son of Man will send his angels, and they will gather out of his kingdom all causes of stumbling and throw them into the blazing furnace of fire; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." And here: "So these will go into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." In the prophets too, anyone who looks will find now one order, now the other, though it would take too long to list them. But I have said why I chose this one.[1]

1 John 5:29; Matthew 13:41–43; Matthew 25:46.

WHETHER BODIES CAN LAST FOREVER IN BURNING FIRE

Unbelievers want an example from nature, not an appeal to God's power, of bodies living in fire.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.2	Quid igitur ostendam, unde conuincantur increduli, posse humana corpora animata adque uiuentia non solum numquam morte dissolui, sed in aeternorum quoque ignium durare tormentis? Nolunt enim hoc ad Omnipotentis nos referre potentiam, sed aliquo exemplo persuaderi sibi flagitant.	What, then, can I point to that will convince unbelievers that human bodies, animated and alive, can not only never be dissolved by death but also endure the torments of eternal fire? They do not want us to appeal to the power of the Almighty; they demand to be persuaded by some example.
	Quibus si respondebimus esse animalia profecto corruptibilia, quia mortalia, quae tamen in mediis ignibus uiuant; nonnullum etiam genus uermium in aquarum calidarum scaturrigine reperiri, quarum feruorem nemo inpune contrectat; illos autem non solum sine ulla sui laesione ibi esse, sed extra esse non posse: aut nolunt credere, si ostendere non ualemus; aut, si ualuerimus siue oculis demonstrare res ipsas siue per testes idoneos edocere, non satis esse hoc ad exemplum rei, de qua quaestio est, eadem infidelitate contendent, quia haec animalia nec semper uiuunt et in illis feruoribus sine doloribus uiuunt: suae quippe naturae conuenientibus uegetantur illis, non cruciantur elementis; quasi non incredibilius sit uegetari quam cruciari talibus rebus. Mirabile est enim dolere in ignibus et tamen uiuere, sed mirabilius uiuere in ignibus nec dolere.	Suppose we answer them that there are animals, certainly corruptible because they are mortal, which nevertheless live in the midst of fire. Suppose we add that a certain kind of worm is found where hot springs gush out, springs whose heat no one can touch without harm, and that these worms not only live there without any injury to themselves but cannot live outside them. Then either they refuse to believe it, if we cannot show it to them; or, if we manage to show them the things themselves or to inform them through reliable witnesses, they will argue, with the same unbelief, that this is not an adequate example of the matter in question. These animals, they will say, do not live forever, and they live in that heat without pain: they thrive in those elements because the elements suit their nature, and are not tortured by them. As if it were not more incredible to thrive in such things than to be tortured by them! For it is wonderful to feel pain in fire and still live, but it is more wonderful to live in fire and feel no pain.
	Si autem hoc creditur, quur non et illud?	But if the second is believed, why not the first as well?

WHETHER BODILY PAIN MUST RESULT IN THE DESTRUCTION OF THE FLESH

Pain proves life, not death; the soul feels pain yet is immortal, and so the damned bodies may be.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.3	Sed nullum est, inquiunt, corpus, quod dolere possit nec possit mori. Et hoc unde scimus? Nam de corporibus quis certus est daemonum, utrum in eis doleant, quando se adfligi magnis cruciatibus confitentur? Quod si respondetur terrenum corpus solidum scilicet adque conspicuum nullum esse, adque ut uno potius nomine id explicem, nullam esse carnem, quae dolere possit morique non possit: quid aliud dicitur, nisi quod sensu corporis homines et experientia collegerunt? Nullam namque carnem nisi mortalem sciunt; et haec est eorum	"But there is no body," they say, "that can feel pain and yet cannot die." And how do we know this? Who is certain about the bodies of demons, whether they feel pain in them, when the demons confess that they are afflicted with great torments? Perhaps the answer is that there is no earthly body, solid and visible, or, to put it in a single word, no flesh that can feel pain and cannot die. But what is that, except what people have gathered tota ratio, ut, quod experti non sunt, nequaquam esse posse arbitrentur. Nam cuius rationis est dolorem facere mortis argumentum, cum uitae potius sit indicium?

LATIN

Etsi enim quaerimus, utrum semper possit uiuere: certum tamen est uiuere omne quod dolet doloremque omnem nisi in re uiuente esse non posse. Necesse est ergo ut uiuat dolens, non est necesse ut occidat dolor, quia nec corpora ista mortalia et utique moritura omnis dolor occidit, et ut dolor aliquis possit occidere, illa causa est, quoniam sic est anima conexa huic corpori, ut summis doloribus cedat adque discedat; quoniam et ipsa conpago membrorum adque uitalium sic infirma est, ut eam uim, quae magnum uel summum dolorem facit, non ualeat sustinere. Tunc autem tali corpori anima et eo conectetur modo, ut illud uinculum, sicut nulla temporis longitudine soluetur, ita nullo dolore rumpatur.

Proinde etiamsi caro nunc talis nulla est, quae sensum doloris perpeti possit mortemque non possit: erit tamen tunc talis caro, qualis nunc non est, sicut talis erit et mors qualis nunc non est. Non enim nulla, sed sempiterna mors erit, quando nec uiuere anima poterit Deum non habendo nec doloribus corporis carere moriendo. Prima mors animam nolentem pellit e corpore, secunda mors animam nolentem tenet in corpore; ab utraque morte communiter id habetur, ut quod non uult anima de suo corpore patiatur.

Adtendunt autem isti contradictores nullam esse nunc carnem, quae dolorem pati possit mortemque non possit, et non adtendunt esse tamen aliquid tale quod corpore maius sit. Ipse quippe animus, cuius praesentia corpus uiuit et regitur, et dolorem pati potest et mori non potest. Ecce inuenta res est, quae, cum sensum doloris habeat, inmortalis est. Hoc igitur erit tunc etiam in corporibus damnatorum, quod nunc esse scimus in animis omnium. Si autem consideremus diligentius, dolor, qui dicitur corporis, magis ad animam pertinet. Animae est enim dolere, non corporis, etiam quando ei dolendi causa exsistit a corpore, cum in eo loco dolet, ubi laeditur corpus.

ENGLISH

from bodily sense and experience? They know no flesh except mortal flesh, and this is their whole argument: that what they have not experienced cannot possibly exist. And what kind of reasoning makes pain an argument for death, when it is rather an indication of life?

Even if we ask whether a thing that feels pain can live forever, it is certain at any rate that everything that feels pain is alive, and that pain cannot exist except in a living thing. It is necessary, then, that whatever feels pain be alive; it is not necessary that pain kill. Not every pain kills even these mortal bodies of ours, which are certainly going to die. The reason some pain can kill is that the soul is so joined to this body that it yields to the greatest pains and departs. Another reason is that the very structure of our limbs and vital organs is so frail that it cannot withstand the force that produces great or extreme pain. But at that time the soul will be joined to such a body, and in such a way, that the bond will be broken by no pain, just as it will be dissolved by no length of time.

So even if no flesh now exists that can suffer the sensation of pain but cannot suffer death, then there will be flesh of a kind that does not exist now, just as there will also be a death of a kind that does not exist now. For there will not be no death; there will be everlasting death, when the soul will be unable to live, because it does not have God, and unable to escape the pains of the body by dying. The first death drives the soul out of the body against its will; the second death holds the soul in the body against its will. Both deaths have this in common: the soul suffers from its own body what it does not want.

These objectors notice that there is now no flesh that can suffer pain but cannot suffer death. Yet they do not notice that something of this kind does exist, something greater than the body. The soul itself, by whose presence the body lives and is governed, can suffer pain and cannot die. Here, then, we have found something that has the sensation of pain and is immortal. So what we now know to be true of everyone's soul will then be true also of the bodies of the damned. Indeed, if we consider more carefully, the pain that is called bodily belongs rather to the soul. It is the soul that feels pain, not the body, even when the cause of its pain comes from the body, as when it feels pain in the place where the body is injured.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Sicut ergo dicimus corpora sentientia et corpora uiuentia, cum ab anima sit corpori sensus et uita: ita corpora dicimus et dolentia, cum dolor corpori nisi ab anima esse non possit. Dolet itaque anima cum corpore in eo loco eius, ubi aliquid contingit ut doleat; dolet et sola, quamuis sit in corpore, cum aliqua causa etiam inuisibili tristis est ipsa corpore incolumi; dolet etiam non in corpore constituta; nam utique dolebat diues ille aput inferos, quando dicebat: Crucior in hac flamma. Corpus autem nec exanime dolet nec animatum sine anima dolet. Si ergo a dolore argumentum recte sumeretur ad mortem, ut ideo mors possit accidere, quia potuit accidere et dolor, magis ad animam pertineret mori, ad quam magis pertinet et dolere.

We speak of bodies that feel and bodies that live, although feeling and life come to the body from the soul. In the same way we speak of bodies that feel pain, although pain cannot come to the body except from the soul. So the soul feels pain together with the body in the part of it where something happens to cause pain. It also feels pain alone, though it is in the body, when it is sad from some cause, even an invisible one, while the body is unharmed. It feels pain even when it is not in a body: that rich man in the underworld was certainly in pain when he said, "I am tormented in this flame." The body, on the other hand, does not feel pain when it is lifeless, nor does it feel pain without the soul when it is alive. If, then, it were valid to argue from pain to death, so that death can occur because pain could occur, dying would belong more to the soul, since feeling pain also belongs more to the soul.[2]

Cum uero illa, quae magis dolere potest, non possit mori, quid momenti adfert quur illa corpora, quoniam futura sunt in doloribus, ideo etiam moritura esse credamus? Dixerunt quidem Platonici ex terrenis corporibus moribundisque membris esse animae et metuere et cupere et dolere adque gaudere; unde Vergilius: Hinc, inquit, (id est ex moribundis terreni corporis membris) metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque. Sed conuicimus eos in duodecimo huius operis libro, habere animas secundum ipsos ab omni etiam corporis labe purgatas diram cupiditatem, quae rursus incipiunt in corpora uelle reuerti. Ubi autem potest esse cupiditas, profecto etiam dolor potest. Frustrata quippe cupiditas, siue non perueniendo quo tendebat, siue amittendo quo peruenerat, uertitur in dolorem.

But since the soul, which is more capable of pain, cannot die, what grounds are there for believing that those bodies will die just because they will be in pain? The Platonists, it is true, said that the soul's fearing and desiring, feeling pain and rejoicing come from earthly bodies and dying limbs. So Virgil says: "From this," that is, from the dying limbs of the earthly body, "they fear and desire, feel pain and rejoice." But in the twelfth book of this work we proved against them that, on their own account, souls purged of every stain of the body still have a dreadful craving, which makes them begin once more to want to return into bodies. And where there can be craving, there can surely also be pain. For frustrated craving turns into pain, whether by failing to reach what it was aiming at or by losing what it had reached.[3]

Quapropter si anima, quae uel sola uel maxime dolet, habet tamen quandam pro suo modo inmortalitatem suam, non ideo mori poterunt illa corpora, quia dolebunt. Postremo si corpora faciunt, ut animae doleant, quur eis dolorem possunt, mortem uero inferre non possunt, nisi quia non est consequens, ut mortem faciat quod dolorem facit? Quur ergo incredibile est ita ignes illis corporibus

The soul, then, feels pain alone or chiefly, and yet it has a kind of immortality of its own, after its own manner. So those bodies will not be able to die just because they will feel pain. Finally, if bodies cause souls to feel pain, why can they inflict pain on them but not death? Surely because it does not follow that what causes pain causes death.

2 Luke 16:24.
3 Virgil, Aeneid 6.733.

LATIN	ENGLISH
dolorem posse inferre, non mortem, sicut ipsa corpora dolere animas faciunt, quas tamen non ideo mori cogunt? Non est igitur necessarium futurae mortis argumentum dolor.	Why, then, is it incredible that fire can inflict pain on those bodies but not death, just as bodies make souls feel pain without thereby forcing them to die? Pain, therefore, is not a necessary argument that death will follow.

EXAMPLES FROM NATURE SHOWING THAT LIVING BODIES CAN SURVIVE AMID TORMENTS

The salamander, Etna, undecaying peacock flesh, quicklime, diamond and magnet show how strange nature already is.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.4 Quapropter si, ut scripserunt qui naturas animalium curiosius indagarunt, salamandra in ignibus uiuit et quidam notissimi Siciliae montes, qui tanta temporis diuturnitate ac uetustate usque nunc ac deinceps flammis aestuant adque integri perseuerant, satis idonei testes sunt non omne, quod ardet, absumi et anima indicat non omne, quod dolere potest, posse etiam mori: quid adhuc a nobis rerum poscuntur exempla, quibus doceamus non esse incredibile, ut hominum corpora sempiterno supplicio punitorum et in igne animam non amittant et sine detrimento ardeant et sine interitu doleant?	Those who have investigated the natures of animals with particular care have written that the salamander lives in fire. Certain very famous mountains of Sicily have been seething with flames for so many ages, down to the present and on into the future, and yet remain intact. These are quite adequate witnesses that not everything that burns is consumed, and the soul shows that not everything that can feel pain can also die. If so, why are we still asked for examples from the world of things to teach that it is not incredible that human bodies punished with everlasting punishment should keep their souls in the fire, burn without being consumed, and feel pain without perishing?[4]
Habebit enim tunc istam carnis substantia qualitatem ab illo inditam, qui tam miras et uarias tot rebus indidit, quas uidemus, ut eas, quia multae sunt, non miremur. Quis enim nisi Deus creator omnium dedit carni pauonis mortui ne putesceret? Quod cum auditum incredibile uideretur, euenit ut aput Carthaginem nobis cocta adponeretur haec auis, de cuius pectore pulparum, quantum uisum est, decerptum seruari iussimus; quod post dierum tantum spatium, quanto alia caro quaecumque cocta putesceret, prolatum adque oblatum nihilo nostrum offendit olfactum. Itemque repositum post dies amplius quam triginta idem quod erat inuentum est, idemque post annum, nisi quod aliquantum corpulentiae siccioris et contractioris fuit. Quis paleae dedit uel tam frigidam uim, ut obrutas niues seruet, uel tam feruidam, ut poma inmatura maturet?	For the substance of the flesh will then have this quality, given to it by the one who gave such wonderful and varied qualities to so many things we see that, because there are so many of them, we do not wonder at them. Who but God, the creator of all things, gave the flesh of a dead peacock the property of not decaying? When I heard of this it seemed incredible. Then it happened at Carthage that this bird was served to us cooked, and I had a portion of meat taken from its breast, as much as seemed right, and kept. It was brought out and set before us after as many days as it would take any other cooked meat to decay, and it did not offend our sense of smell at all. It was put away again, and after more than thirty days it was found just as it had been; and the same after a year, except that it was somewhat drier and more shrunken. Who gave straw a power so cold that it preserves snow packed in it, or so warm that it ripens unripe fruit?
De ipso igne mira quis explicet, quo quaeque adusta nigrescunt, cum ipse sit lucidus, et paene omnia, quae	Who can explain the marvels of fire itself? Everything it scorches turns black, though fire it-

4 The mountains are chiefly Mount Etna, the volcano of eastern Sicily.

LATIN

ambit et lambit, colore pulcherrimus decolorat adque ex pruna fulgida carbonem taeterrimum reddit? Neque id quasi regulariter definitum est; nam e contrario lapides igne candente percocti et ipsi fiunt candidi, et quamuis magis ille rubeat, illi albicent, congruit tamen luci quod album est, sicut nigrum tenebris. Cum itaque ignis in lignis ardeat, ut lapides coquat, contrarios habet non in contrariis rebus effectus. Etsi enim lapides et ligna diuersa sunt, contraria tamen non sunt, sicut album et nigrum, quorum in lapidibus unum facit, alterum in lignis, clarus illos clarificans, haec obfuscans, cum in illis deficeret, nisi in istis uiueret.

Quid, in carbonibus nonne miranda est et tanta infirmitas, ut ictu leuissimo frangantur, pressu facillimo conterantur, et tanta firmitas, ut nullo umore corrumpantur, nulla aetate uincantur, usque adeo ut eos substernere soleant, qui limites figunt, ad conuincendum litigatorem, quisquis post quantalibet tempora exstiterit fixumque lapidem limitem non esse contenderit? Quis eos in terra umida infossos, ubi ligna putescerent, tamdiu durare incorruptibiliter posse nisi rerum ille corruptor ignis effecit?

Intueamur etiam miraculum calcis. Excepto eo, de quo iam satis diximus, quod igne candicat, quo alia taetra redduntur, etiam occultissime ab igne ignem concipit eumque iam gleba tangentibus frigida tam latenter seruat, ut nulli nostro sensui prorsus appareat, sed conpertus experimento, etiam dum non apparet, sciatur inesse sopitus. Propter quod eam uiuam calcem loquimur, uelut ipse ignis latens anima sit inuisibilis uisibilis corporis. Iam uero quam mirum est, quod, cum exstinguitur, tunc accenditur! Ut enim occulto igne careat, aquae infunditur aquaue perfunditur, et cum ante sit frigida, inde feruescit, unde feruentia cuncta frigescunt.

Velut exspirante ergo illa gleba discedens ignis, qui latebat, apparet, ac deinde tamquam morte sic frigida est, ut adiecta unda non sit arsura et quam calcem self is bright. Its own color is most beautiful, yet it discolors almost everything it encircles and licks, and turns a glowing ember into an ugly black coal. Nor is this laid down as a fixed rule. On the contrary, stones baked in white-hot fire turn white themselves; and though fire is rather red and they are whitish, white is akin to light, as black is to darkness. So when fire burns in wood in order to bake stones, it has contrary effects on things that are not contrary. Stones and wood are different, but they are not contrary, as white and black are. Fire produces one of these in the stones and the other in the wood: bright itself, it brightens the stones and darkens the wood, though it would die out in the stones if it were not alive in the wood.

ENGLISH

And charcoal: is it not wonderful? It is so weak that it breaks at the lightest blow and crumbles under the slightest pressure, and yet so strong that no moisture corrupts it and no age overcomes it. So much so that those who set up boundary stones usually lay charcoal underneath them. That way they can refute any litigant who comes forward, after however long a time, and claims that the stone fixed there is not a boundary marker. Who made it possible for charcoal buried in damp earth, where wood would rot, to last so long without corruption, if not fire, that great corrupter of things?

Let us also consider the marvel of lime. I have already said enough about one point: that it turns white in the fire that makes other things black. Besides this, it takes fire from fire in a most hidden way. Then, when it is already a lump cold to the touch, it keeps that fire so secretly that it is not apparent to any of our senses at all. Yet once the fire has been discovered by experiment, it is known to be present, asleep, even while it does not appear. That is why we call it quicklime, "living" lime, as if the hidden fire were the invisible soul of a visible body. And how marvelous it is that it is kindled at the very moment it is quenched! To rid it of its hidden fire, it is put into water or water is poured over it; and though it was cold before, it grows hot from the very thing that makes all hot things grow cold.

So the lump seems to breathe its last; the fire that lay hidden departs and appears; and then, as if in death, the lump is so cold that if water is added it uocabamus uiuam, uocemus exstinctam. Quid est quod huic miraculo addi posse uideatur? et tamen additur. Nam si non adhibeas aquam, sed oleum, quod magis fomes est ignis, nulla eius perfusione uel infusione feruescit. Hoc miraculum si de aliquo Indico lapide legeremus siue audiremus et in nostrum experimentum uenire non posset, profecto aut mendacium putaremus aut certe granditer miraremur. Quarum uero rerum ante nostros oculos cottidiana documenta uersantur, non genere minus mirabili, sed ipsa adsiduitate uilescunt, ita ut ex ipsa India, quae remota est pars orbis a nobis, desierimus nonnulla mirari, quae ad nos potuerunt miranda perduci.

LATIN

Adamantem lapidem multi aput nos habent et maxime aurifices insignitoresque gemmarum, qui lapis nec ferro nec igni nec alia ui ulla perhibetur praeter hircino sanguine uinci. Sed qui eum habent adque nouerunt, numquid ita mirantur ut hi, quibus primum potentia eius ostenditur? Quibus autem non ostenditur, fortasse nec credunt; aut si credunt, inexperta mirantur; et si contigerit experiri, adhuc quidem mirantur insolita, sed adsiduitas experiendi paulatim subtrahit admirationis incitamentum. Magnetem lapidem nouimus mirabilem ferri esse raptorem; quod cum primum uidi, uehementer inhorrui.

Quippe cernebam a lapide ferreum anulum raptum adque suspensum; deinde tamquam ferro, quod rapuerat, uim dedisset suam communemque fecisset, idem anulus alteri admotus est eundemque suspendit, adque ut ille prior lapidi, sic alter anulus priori anulo cohaerebat; accessit eodem modo tertius, accessit et quartus; iamque sibi per mutua circulis nexis non inplicatorum intrinsecus, sed extrinsecus adhaerentium quasi catena pependerat anulorum. Quis istam uim lapidis non stuperet, quae illi non solum inerat, uerum etiam per tot suspensa transibat et inuisibilibus ea uinculis subligabat? Sed multo est mirabilius, quod a fratre et coepiscopo meo Seuero Mileuitano de isto lapide comperi.

ENGLISH

will not burn, and the lime we used to call "living" we now call "extinguished." What could possibly be added to this marvel? And yet something is. If you apply not water but oil, which feeds fire even more, no amount of pouring it over or into the lime makes it grow hot. If we read or heard of this marvel concerning some stone from India, and it could not come within our own experience, we would surely think it a lie or at least be greatly amazed. But things whose proofs pass before our eyes every day become cheap through their very familiarity, though they are no less marvelous in kind. So much so that we have even stopped marveling at some things from India itself, a part of the world far from us, which could be brought to us to be marveled at.

Many people here have the diamond, especially goldsmiths and gem engravers. It is a stone which, they say, can be overcome neither by iron nor by fire nor by any other force except goat's blood. But do those who have it and know it marvel at it as much as those to whom its power is shown for the first time? Those to whom it is not shown perhaps do not even believe it; or if they believe, they marvel at what they have not experienced. And if they happen to experience it, they still marvel at the unusual, but constant experience gradually removes the stimulus of wonder. We know that the magnet is a marvelous stone that snatches up iron. When I first saw this, I was struck with awe.

I saw an iron ring snatched up by the stone and suspended from it. Then, as if the stone had given its own power to the iron it had snatched and shared it, that same ring was brought near another ring and lifted it up. Just as the first ring clung to the stone, so the second ring clung to the first. A third was added in the same way, and then a fourth. And now there hung a kind of chain of rings joined to one another, not linked through the middle but clinging on the outside. Who would not be astonished at this power of the stone, which was not only in the stone itself but also passed through so many suspended objects and bound them with invisible bonds? But much more marvelous is what I learned about this stone from my brother and fellow bishop Severus of Milevis.[5] 5 Severus, bishop of Milevis in Numidia, was a close friend of Augustine.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Se ipsum namque uidisse narrauit, quem ad modum Bathanarius quondam comes Africae, cum aput eum conuiuaretur episcopus, eundem protulerit lapidem et tenuerit sub argento ferrumque super argentum posuerit; deinde sicut subter mouebat manum, qua lapidem tenebat, ita ferrum desuper mouebatur, adque argento medio nihilque patiente concitatissimo cursu ac recursu infra lapis ab homine, supra ferrum rapiebatur a lapide. Dixi quod ipse conspexi, dixi quod ab illo audiui, cui tamquam ipse uiderim credidi. Quid etiam de isto magnete legerim dicam. Quando iuxta eum ponitur adamans, non rapit ferrum, et si iam rapuerat, ut ei propinquauerit, mox remittit.	He told me that he himself had seen Bathanarius, formerly count of Africa, do this when the bishop was dining with him. Bathanarius brought out this same stone, held it under a silver plate, and placed a piece of iron on top of the silver. Then, as he moved the hand holding the stone underneath, the iron on top moved too. The silver in between was not affected at all, while below the stone was moved by the man and above the iron was pulled along by the stone, darting back and forth at great speed. I have told what I saw myself, and I have told what I heard from Severus, whom I believed as if I had seen it myself. Let me also tell what I have read about this magnet. When a diamond is placed near it, it does not snatch up iron; and if it has already done so, it lets the iron go as soon as the diamond comes near.[6]
India mittit hos lapides; sed si eos nos cognitos iam desistimus admirari, quanto magis illi, a quibus ueniunt, si eos facillimos habent, sic forsitan habent, ut nos calcem, quam miro modo aqua feruescentem, qua solet ignis exstingui, et oleo non feruescentem, quo solet ignis accendi, quia in promtu nobis est, non miramur.	India sends these stones. But if we, who already know them, have stopped marveling at them, how much more must the people they come from, if these stones are very easy for them to obtain, regard them perhaps as we regard lime. We do not marvel at lime, because it is readily at hand. Yet it marvelously grows hot with water, which usually puts fire out, and does not grow hot with oil, which usually kindles fire.

HOW MANY THINGS THERE ARE WHOSE EXPLANATION CANNOT BE KNOWN, YET WHOSE TRUTH IS NOT IN DOUBT

Unbelievers must explain the marvels of Agrigentine salt, strange springs and Sodom's fruit before demanding reasons from Christians.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.5 Verum tamen homines infideles, qui, cum diuina uel praeterita uel futura miracula praedicamus, quae illis experienda non ualemus ostendere, rationem a nobis earum flagitant rerum, quam quoniam non possumus reddere (excedunt enim uires mentis humanae), existimant falsa esse quae dicimus, ipsi de tot mirabilibus rebus, quas uel uidere possumus uel uidemus, debent reddere rationem. Quod si fieri ab homine non posse peruiderint, fatendum est eis non ideo aliquid non fuisse uel non futurum esse, quia ratio inde non potest reddi, quando quidem sunt ista, de quibus similiter non potest. Non itaque pergo per plurima, quae mandata sunt litteris, non gesta adque transacta, sed in locis quibusque	When we proclaim divine miracles, past or future, which we cannot show unbelievers so that they may experience them, they demand that we give a reason for those things. Because we cannot give one, since such things exceed the powers of the human mind, they think that what we say is false. Very well: these same people ought to give a reason for all the marvels that we either can see or actually do see. If they perceive that no human being can do this, they must admit that a thing has not failed to happen, or will not fail to happen, simply because no reason can be given for it, since these things exist and no reason can be given for them either. So I will not go through the many things re-

6 Bathanarius, military count of Africa, was put to death in AD 408.

LATIN

manentia; quo si quisquam ire uoluerit et potuerit, utrum uera sint, explorabit; sed pauca commemoro.

Agrigentinum Siciliae salem perhibent, cum fuerit admotus igni, uelut in aqua fluescere; cum uero ipsi aquae, uelut in igne crepitare. Aput Garamantas quendam fontem tam frigidum diebus, ut non bibatur, tam feruidum noctibus, ut non tangatur. In Epiro alium fontem, in quo faces, ut in ceteris, exstinguuntur accensae, sed, non ut in ceteris, accenduntur exstinctae. Asbeston Arcadiae lapidem propterea sic uocari, quod accensus semel iam non possit exstingui. Lignum cuiusdam ficus Aegyptiae, non ut ligna cetera in aquis natare, sed mergi; et, quod est mirabilius, cum in imo aliquamdiu fuerit, inde ad aquae superficiem rursus emergere, quando madefactum debuit umoris pondere praegrauari. Poma in terra Sodomorum gigni quidem et ad maturitatis faciem peruenire; sed morsu pressuue tentata in fumum ac fauillam corio fatiscente uanescere.

Pyriten lapidem Persicum tenentis manum, si uehementius prematur, adurere, propter quod ab igne nomen accepit. In eadem Perside gigni etiam lapidem seleniten, cuius interiorem candorem cum luna crescere adque deficere. In Cappadocia etiam uento equas concipere, eosdemque fetus non amplius triennio uiuere. Tylon Indiae insulam eo praeferri ceteris terris, quod omnis arbor, quae in ea gignitur, numquam nudatur tegmine foliorum.

De his adque aliis innumerabilibus mirabilibus, quae historia non factorum et transactorum, sed manentium locorum tenet, mihi autem aliud agenti ea persequi nimis longum est, reddant rationem, si possunt, infideles isti, qui nolunt diuinis litteris credere; quid aliud quam non putantes eas esse diuinas, eo quod res habeant incredibiles, sicuti hoc est unde nunc agimus. Non enim admittit, inquiunt, ulla ratio, ut caro ardeat nec absumatur, doleat neque moriatur; ratiocinatores uidelicet magni, qui de omnibus rebus, quas esse mirabiles constat, possint reddere rationem, reddant ergo de his, quae pauca posuimus, quae procul dubio si corded in writing, things not done and past but remaining in particular places, where anyone who wishes and is able to go can find out whether they are true. I mention only a few.

ENGLISH

They say that the salt of Agrigentum in Sicily melts as if in water when brought near fire, but crackles as if in fire when put in water. Among the Garamantes, they say, there is a spring so cold by day that no one can drink from it, and so hot by night that no one can touch it. In Epirus there is another spring in which lighted torches are put out, as in other springs, but, unlike other springs, extinguished torches are lit. The stone of Arcadia called asbestos [“unquenchable”] is so named, they say, because once lit it can never be put out. The wood of a certain Egyptian fig tree does not float in water like other wood but sinks. More wonderful still, after it has stayed at the bottom for a while it rises again to the surface, when, soaked through, it ought to be weighed down by the weight of the water. In the land of Sodom fruit grows and takes on the look of ripeness; but when tested by biting or squeezing, the skin bursts and the fruit vanishes into smoke and ash.[7]

The Persian stone pyrites, they say, burns the hand of anyone who holds it if it is squeezed too hard, which is why it takes its name from fire. Also in Persia a stone called selenite [“moonstone”] is found, whose inner whiteness waxes and wanes with the moon. In Cappadocia, they say, mares conceive by the wind, and their foals live no longer than three years. Tylos, an island of India, is preferred to all other lands because no tree that grows there ever loses its covering of leaves.[8]

These and countless other marvels are recorded by history, a history not of events done and past but of places that still remain, though, since I am engaged on another task, it would take me too long to pursue them. Let those unbelievers who refuse to believe the divine Scriptures give a reason for them, if they can. And why do they refuse, except that they do not think the Scriptures are divine because they contain incredible things, like the matter we are now dealing with? “No reason,” they say, “allows that flesh should burn and not be consumed, feel pain and not die.” Great reasoners

7 The Garamantes were a people of the Libyan Sahara.
8 Tylos is modern Bahrain, which ancient writers associated with India.

LATIN

esse nescirent et ea futura esse diceremus, multo minus crederent quam quod nunc dicentibus nobis nolunt credere aliquando uenturum.

Quis enim eorum nobis crederet, si, quem ad modum dicimus futura hominum uiua corpora, quae semper arsura adque dolitura nec tamen aliquando moritura sint, ita diceremus in futuro saeculo futurum salem, quem faceret ignis uelut in aqua fluescere, eundemque faceret aqua uelut in igne crepitare; aut futurum fontem, cuius aqua in refrigerio noctis sic ardeat, ut non possit tangi, in aestibus uero diei sic algeat, ut non possit bibi; aut futurum lapidem, uel eum qui suo calore manum constringentis adureret, uel eum qui undecumque accensus exstingui omnino non posset, et cetera quae praetermissis aliis innumeris commemoranda interim duxi?

Haec ergo in illo saeculo, quod futurum est, si diceremus futura nobisque increduli responderent: Si uultis ut ea credamus, de singulis reddite rationem: nos non posse confiteremur, eo quod istis et similibus Dei miris operibus infirma mortalium ratiocinatio uinceretur; fixam tamen aput nos esse rationem, non sine ratione Omnipotentem facere, unde animus humanus infirmus rationem non potest reddere; et in multis quidem rebus incertum nobis esse quid uelit, illud tamen esse certissimum, nihil eorum illi esse inpossibile, quaecumque uoluerit; eique nos credere praedicenti, quem neque inpotentem neque mentientem possumus credere. Hi tamen fidei reprehensores exactoresque rationis quid ad ista respondent, de quibus ratio reddi ab homine non potest, et tamen sunt, et ipsi rationi naturae uidentur esse contraria?

Quae si futura esse diceremus, similiter a nobis, sicut eorum quae futura esse dicimus, ab infidelibus ratio posceretur. Ac per hoc, cum in talibus operibus Dei deficiat ratio cordis et sermonis humani, sicut ista non ideo non sunt, sic non ideo etiam illa non erunt, quoniam ratio de utrisque ab homine non potest reddi.

ENGLISH

indeed, able to give a reason for all the things that are known to be marvels! Then let them give one for the few we have set out. If they did not know that these things existed, and we said they would exist in the future, they would doubtless believe them much less than they now believe what we say will come about one day, which they refuse to believe.

For which of them would believe us if we said these things? We say that there will be living human bodies which will always burn and feel pain and yet never die. Suppose that in the same way we said that in the world to come there will be a salt which fire makes melt as if in water, and which water makes crackle as if in fire. Or a spring whose water will be so hot in the cool of the night that it cannot be touched, but so cold in the heat of the day that it cannot be drunk. Or a stone, either one that burns with its own heat the hand of whoever squeezes it, or one that, once lit from any source, can never be put out at all. Or the other things which, leaving aside countless others, I have thought worth mentioning for now.

Suppose, then, that we said these things would exist in the world to come, and unbelievers replied: "If you want us to believe them, give a reason for each one." We would confess that we could not, because the feeble reasoning of mortals is overcome by these and similar wonderful works of God. Yet we would say that we hold a fixed reason: that the Almighty does nothing without reason, even where the feeble human mind cannot give the reason. In many things, we would say, it is uncertain to us what he wills; but this is most certain, that nothing he wills is impossible for him. And we would say that we believe him when he foretells things, since we cannot believe him to be either powerless or a liar. Yet what do these critics of faith, these demanders of reasons, say in reply about these things? No human being can give a reason for them; and yet they exist, and seem contrary to the very reason of nature.

If we said that these things would exist in the future, unbelievers would demand a reason from us for them, just as they do for the things we say will exist. And so, since in such works of God the reasoning of the human heart and of human speech fails, it does not follow that these things do not exist; and in the same way it does not follow that those other things will not exist, simply because no human being can give a reason for either.

LATIN	ENGLISH

THAT NOT ALL MARVELS ARE NATURAL, BUT MANY ARE CONTRIVED BY HUMAN SKILL AND MANY BY THE ART OF DEMONS

The unquenchable lamp of Venus may be human contrivance, magic or demons, which only proves God's greater power.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.6 Hic forte respondeant: Prorsus nec ista sunt nec ista credimus; falsa de his dicta, falsa conscripta sunt; et adiciant ratiocinantes adque dicentes: Si talia credenda sunt, credite et uos quod in easdem litteras est relatum, fuisse uel esse quoddam Veneris fanum adque ibi candelabrum et in eo lucernam sub diuo sic ardentem, ut eam nulla tempestas, nullus imber exstingueret, unde sicut ille lapis, ita ista λύχνος ἄσβεστος, λύχνος ἄσβεστος, id est lucerna inexstinguibilis, nominata est. Quod propterea poterunt dicere, ut respondendi nobis angustias ingerant; quia si dixerimus non esse credendum, scripta illa miraculorum infirmabimus; si autem credendum esse concesserimus, firmabimus numina paganorum.	Here they may perhaps reply: "Those things simply do not exist, and we do not believe them. What has been said about them is false; what has been written about them is false." And they may add, by way of argument: "If such things are to be believed, then you too must believe what is reported in the same writings: that there was, or is, a certain shrine of Venus, and in it a lampstand, and on the lampstand a lamp burning in the open air in such a way that no storm and no rain could put it out. Hence, like that stone, it too was named λύχνος ἄσβεστος, lychnos asbestos, that is, 'the unquenchable lamp.'" They will be able to say this in order to put us in a tight spot when we answer. For if we say it is not to be believed, we will weaken those written accounts of marvels; but if we grant that it is to be believed, we will strengthen the deities of the pagans.[9]
Sed nos, sicut iam in libro duodeuicensimo huius operis dixi, non habemus necesse omnia credere, quae historia continet gentium, cum et ipsi inter se historici, sicut ait Varro, quasi data opera et quasi ex industria per multa dissentiant; sed ea, si uolumus, credimus, quae non aduersantur libris, quibus non dubitamus oportere nos credere. De his autem miraculorum locis nobis ad ea, quae futura persuadere incredulis uolumus, satis illa sufficiunt, quae nos quoque possumus experiri, et eorum testes idoneos non difficile est inuenire. De isto autem fano Veneris et lucerna inexstinguibili non solum in nullas coartamur angustias, uerum etiam latitudinis nobis campus aperitur.	But, as I already said in the eighteenth book of this work, we are under no obligation to believe everything that the history of the nations contains. For the historians themselves, as Varro says, disagree among themselves on many points, as if on purpose and deliberately. Rather, we believe, if we wish, those things that do not conflict with the books which we have no doubt we ought to believe. As for these marvels of particular places, for what we want to persuade unbelievers will happen in the future, those are quite sufficient which we too can test by experience, and for which it is not hard to find reliable witnesses. As for this shrine of Venus and its unquenchable lamp, far from being squeezed into any tight spot, we find a wide field opening before us.[10]
Addimus enim ad istam lucernam inexstinguibilem et humanarum et magicarum, id est per homines daemonicarum artium et ipsorum per se ipsos daemonum multa miracula; quae si negare uoluerimus,	For to that unquenchable lamp we add many marvels: marvels of human art, marvels of magic—that is, of demonic arts practiced through human beings—and marvels of demons acting by them-

9 The Greek asbestos means "unquenchable"; Augustine described the asbestos stone in the previous chapter.
10 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), the most learned of Roman scholars, whose antiquarian works Augustine uses throughout.

LATIN

eidem ipsi cui credimus sacrarum litterarum aduersabimur ueritati. Aut ergo in lucerna illa mechanicum aliquid de lapide asbesto ars humana molita est aut arte magica factum est, quod homines illo mirarentur in templo, aut daemon quispiam sub nomine Veneris tanta se efficacia praesentauit, ut hoc ibi prodigium et appareret hominibus et diutius permaneret. Inliciuntur autem daemones ad inhabitandum per creaturas, quas non ipsi, sed Deus condidit, delectabilibus pro sua diuersitate diuersis, non ut animalia cibis, sed ut spiritus signis, quae cuiusque delectationi congruunt, per uaria genera lapidum herbarum, lignorum animalium, carminum rituum.

Ut autem inliciantur ab hominibus, prius eos ipsi astutissima calliditate seducunt, uel inspirando eorum cordibus uirus occultum uel etiam fallacibus amicitiis apparendo, eorumque paucos discipulos suos faciunt plurimorumque doctores. Neque enim potuit, nisi primum ipsis docentibus, disci quid quisque illorum adpetat, quid exhorreat, quo inuitetur nomine, quo cogatur; unde magicae artes earumque artifices exstiterunt. Maxime autem possident corda mortalium, qua potissimum possessione gloriantur, cum se transfigurant in angelos lucis. Sunt ergo facta eorum plurima, quae quanto magis mirabilia confitemur, tanto cautius uitare debemus; sed ad hoc, unde nunc agimus, nobis etiam ipsa proficiunt. Si enim haec inmundi daemones possunt, quanto potentiores sunt sancti angeli, quanto potentior est his omnibus Deus, qui tantorum miraculorum effectores etiam ipsos angelos fecit!

Quam ob rem si tot et tanta mirifica, quae μηχανήματα appellant, Dei creatura utentibus humanis artibus fiunt, ut ea qui nesciunt opinentur esse diuina (unde factum est, ut in quodam templo lapidibus magnetibus in solo et camera proportione magnitudinis positis simulacrum ferreum aeris illius medio inter utrumque lapidem ignorantibus, quid sursum esset ac deorsum, quasi numinis potestate penderet: quale aliquid etiam in illa selves. If we chose to deny these, we would be setting ourselves against the truth of the very sacred writings we believe. So either human skill contrived some mechanical device in that lamp out of asbestos stone; or it was done by magic art, so that people might marvel at it in that temple; or some demon, under the name of Venus, presented himself with such efficacy that this prodigy both appeared to people there and lasted for a long time. Demons are lured to take up residence by means of creatures, which not they but God created. They are lured by delights as varied as they themselves are varied—not as animals are lured by food, but as spirits are lured by signs that suit each one's taste—through various kinds of stones and herbs, woods and animals, spells and rites.

ENGLISH

But in order to be lured by human beings, the demons first seduce them with the most cunning craft, either by breathing a hidden poison into their hearts or by appearing to them in deceitful friendships. They make a few of them their disciples, and these become the teachers of very many. For it could not have been learned, unless they themselves had first taught it, what each of them craves, what he abhors, by what name he is invited, by what name compelled. That is how the magic arts and their practitioners came into being. But above all they take possession of the hearts of mortals—the possession in which they glory most—when they transform themselves into angels of light. So there are very many deeds of theirs, and the more marvelous we admit them to be, the more carefully we must shun them. Yet for the matter we are now dealing with, even these are of use to us. For if unclean demons can do such things, how much more powerful are the holy angels! And how much more powerful than all of them is God, who made even those angels who bring about such great miracles![11]

Therefore, consider this. So many and such great wonders, which they call μηχανήματα [mechanical contrivances], are produced by human arts using God's creation that those who do not understand them suppose them to be divine. (This is how it happened that in a certain temple, with magnets set in the floor and in the ceiling in proportion to their size, an iron image hung in midair between 11 An allusion to 2 Corinthians 11:14.

LATIN

lucerna Veneris de lapide asbesto ab artifice fieri potuisse iam diximus); si magorum opera, quos nostra scriptura ueneficos et incantatores uocat, in tantum daemones extollere potuerunt, ut congruere hominum sensibus sibi nobilis poeta uideretur, de quadam femina, quae tali arte polleret, dicens:

Haec se carminibus promittit soluere mentes
Quas uelit, ast aliis duras inmittere curas,
Sistere aquam fluuiis et uertere sidera retro;-
Nocturnosque ciet manes: mugire uidebis
Sub pedibus terram et descendere montibus ornos:
quanto magis Deus potens est facere quae infidelibus sunt incredibilia, sed illius facilia potestati; quando quidem ipse lapidum aliarumque uim rerum et hominum ingenia, qui ea miris utuntur modis, angelicasque naturas omnibus terrenis potentiores animantibus condidit, uniuersa mirabilia mirabili uincente uirtute et operandi iubendi sinendique sapientia, utens omnibus tam mirabiliter, quam creauit.

ENGLISH

the two stones, so that to those who did not know what was above and below it seemed to be suspended by the power of a deity. And we have already said that something of the sort could have been done by a craftsman in that lamp of Venus, using asbestos stone.) Again, the works of magicians, whom our Scripture calls sorcerers and enchanters, were able to exalt demons so highly that a famous poet felt he was in tune with common belief when he said of a certain woman who was powerful in that art:

"She promises by her spells to set free the minds of whom she will, but to send harsh cares upon others; to halt the water in the rivers and turn the stars backward; she summons the ghosts of the night: you will see the earth groan beneath your feet and the ash trees come down from the mountains." If all this is so, how much more is God able to do what is incredible to unbelievers but easy for his power! For it was he who created the power of stones and other things, and the talents of the people who use them in wonderful ways, and the natures of angels, more powerful than all earthly living beings. His wonderful power surpasses all wonders, as does his wisdom in working, commanding and permitting; and he uses all things as wonderfully as he created them.

THAT IN MARVELOUS THINGS THE HIGHEST REASON FOR BELIEF IS THE ALMIGHTINESS OF THE CREATOR

To say 'it is their nature' is no better an explanation than 'it is God's will.'

LATIN

21.7 Quur itaque facere non possit Deus, ut et resurgant corpora mortuorum et igne aeterno crucientur corpora damnatorum, qui fecit mundum in caelo in terra, in aere in aquis innumerabilibus miraculis plenum, cum sit omnibus quibus plenus est procul dubio maius et excellentius etiam mundus ipse miraculum?

Sed isti, cum quibus uel contra quos agimus, qui et Deum esse credunt, a quo factus est mundus, et deos ab illo factos, per quos ab illo administratur mundus, et miraculorum effectrices siue spontaneorum siue cultu et ritu quolibet inpetratorum siue etiam magicorum mundanas uel non negant uel insuper et praedicant potestates, quando eis rerum uim mirabilem proponimus aliarum, quae nec animalia sunt rationalia nec ulla

ENGLISH

Why, then, should God not be able to make the bodies of the dead rise again, and the bodies of the damned be tormented in eternal fire? He made a world full of countless marvels in the sky and on the earth, in the air and in the waters—and the world itself is without doubt a greater and more excellent marvel than all the things with which it is filled.

But consider these people with whom, or rather against whom, we are arguing. They believe that there is a God by whom the world was made, and that there are gods made by him, through whom the world is governed by him. They do not deny—indeed they go further and proclaim—that there are cosmic powers that bring about marvels, whether spontaneous, or obtained through some ratione praediti spiritus, sicut sunt ea, quorum pauca commemorauimus, respondere adsolent: Vis est ista naturae, natura eorum sic se habet, propriarum sunt istae efficaciae naturarum. Tota itaque ratio est, quur Agrigentinum salem flamma fluere faciat, aqua crepitare, quia haec est natura eius.

LATIN

At hoc esse potius contra naturam uidetur, quae non igni, sed aquae dedit salem soluere, torrere autem igni, non aquae. Sed ista, inquiunt, salis huius naturalis est uis, ut his contraria patiatur. Haec igitur ratio redditur et de illo fonte Garamantico, ubi una uena friget diebus, noctibus feruet, ui utraque molesta tangentibus; haec et de illo alio, qui cum sit contrectantibus frigidus et facem sicut alii fontes exstinguat accensam, dissimiliter tamen adque mirabiliter idem ipse accendit exstinctam; haec et de lapide asbesto, qui cum ignem nullum habeat proprium, accepto tamen sic ardet alieno, ut non possit exstingui; haec de ceteris, quae piget retexere, quibus licet uis insolita contra naturam inesse uideatur, alia tamen de illis non redditur ratio, nisi ut dicatur hanc eorum esse naturam.

Breuis sane ista est ratio, fateor, sufficiensque responsio. Sed cum Deus auctor sit naturarum omnium, quur nolunt fortiorem nos reddere rationem, quando aliquid uelut inpossibile nolunt credere eisque redditionem rationis poscentibus respondemus hanc esse uoluntatem omnipotentis Dei? qui certe non ob aliud uocatur omnipotens, nisi quoniam quidquid uult potest, qui potuit creare tam multa, quae nisi ostenderentur aut a credendis hodieque dicerentur testibus, profecto inpossibilia putarentur, non solum quae ignotissima aput nos, uerum etiam quae notissima posui. Illa enim quae praeter eos, quorum de his libros legimus, non habent testem et ab eis conscripta sunt, qui non sunt diuinitus docti adque humanitus falli forte potuerunt, licet cuique sine recta reprehensione non credere.

ENGLISH

form of worship and ritual, or even magical. Yet when we put before them the marvelous power of other things, which are neither rational animals nor spirits endowed with any reason—such as the few we have mentioned—they usually answer: "This is a power of nature; their nature is like that; these are the properties of their own natures." So the whole explanation of why Agrigentine salt is made to melt by flame and to crackle in water is that this is its nature.[12]

Yet this seems rather to be contrary to nature, which gave the power of dissolving salt not to fire but to water, and the power of roasting it to fire, not to water. "But this," they say, "is the natural property of this salt: that it is affected in the opposite way." This, then, is the explanation given for that Garamantian spring as well, where a single stream is cold by day and boiling by night, and in either state painful to those who touch it. This is the explanation for that other spring which, though cold to the touch and though it puts out a lighted torch as other springs do, nevertheless—unlike them and marvelously—rekindles that same torch once it is extinguished. This is the explanation for the asbestos stone, which has no fire of its own, yet once it receives fire from elsewhere burns so that it cannot be put out. This is the explanation for the rest, which it would be tedious to go over again. Though an unusual power contrary to nature seems to be present in them, no other explanation is given for them except to say that this is their nature.

This is certainly a brief explanation, I admit, and a sufficient answer. But since God is the author of all natures, why do they refuse to let us give a stronger explanation? When they refuse to believe something as if it were impossible, and demand an explanation, we answer that this is the will of almighty God. Surely he is called almighty for no other reason than that he can do whatever he wills. He was able to create so many things that, if they were not shown to us or reported even today by witnesses who deserve belief, would certainly be thought impossible—not only the things I have set down that are least known among us, but also those that are best known. As for those things which have no witness except the authors whose books on these matters we have read, and which were written by people who were not divinely taught and could perhaps have been deceived, as humans may be, anyone is free to disbelieve them without just reproach.

12 Agrigentum (modern Agrigento) in Sicily; Augustine described its salt in the previous chapter.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Nam nec ego uolo temere credi cuncta quae posui, quia nec a me ipso ita creduntur, tamquam nulla de illis sit in mea cogitatione dubitatio, exceptis his, quae uel ipse sum expertus et cuiuis facile est experiri; sicut de calce, quod feruet in aqua, in oleo frigida est; de magnete lapide, quod nescio qua sorbitione insensibili stipulam non moueat et ferrum rapiat; de carne non putescente pauonis, cum putuerit et Platonis; de palea sic frigente, ut Fluescere niuem non sinat, sic calente ut maturescere poma conpellat; de igne fulgido, quod secundum suam fulgorem lapides coquendo candificet et contra eundem suum fulgorem urendo plurima obfuscet.

For I do not wish everything I have set down to be believed rashly, since I myself do not believe it all in such a way that no doubt about it remains in my mind—except for those things which I have experienced myself and which anyone can easily experience. Such are quicklime, which boils in water and stays cold in oil; the magnet, which by some imperceptible suction does not move a straw but snatches up iron; the flesh of the peacock, which does not rot, though even Plato's has rotted; straw, so cold that it does not let snow melt, and so warm that it forces fruit to ripen; and bright fire, which in keeping with its brightness whitens stones by baking them, and contrary to that same brightness blackens most things by burning them.

Tale est et quod nigrae maculae offunduntur ex oleo splendido, similiter nigrae lineae de candido inprimuntur argento, de carbonibus etiam, quod accendente igne sic uertantur in contrarium, ut de lignis pulcherrimis taetri, fragiles de duris, inputribiles de putribilibus fiant. Haec ipse quaedam cum multis, quaedam cum omnibus noui, et alia plurima, quae huic libro inserere longum fuit. De his autem, quae posui non experta, sed lecta, praeter de fonte illo, ubi faces exstinguuntur ardentes et accenduntur exstinctae, et de pomis terrae Sodomorum forinsecus quasi maturis, intrinsecus fumeis, nec testes aliquos idoneos, a quibus utrum uera essent audirem, potui reperire. Et illum quidem fontem non inueni qui in Epiro uidisse se dicerent, sed qui in Gallia similem nossent non longe a Gratianopoli ciuitate.

Similar is the fact that black stains spread from bright oil, and likewise black lines are traced by white silver; and also charcoal, which, when the fire kindles it, is turned into its opposite: from the most beautiful wood it becomes ugly, from hard it becomes brittle, from perishable imperishable. Some of these things I have known along with many people, some along with everyone, and many others too, which would have taken too long to include in this book. But of the things I have set down not from experience but from reading, apart from that spring where burning torches are put out and extinguished ones are lit, and the fruits of the land of Sodom, ripe-looking on the outside and smoke within, I have not been able to find any reliable witnesses from whom I could hear whether they were true. Indeed, I found no one who said he had seen that spring in Epirus; but I did find people who knew a similar one in Gaul, not far from the city of Grenoble.

De fructibus autem arborum Sodomitarum non tantum litterae fide dignae indicant, uerum etiam tam multi se loquuntur expertos, ut hinc dubitare non possim. Cetera uero sic habeo, ut neque neganda neque adfirmanda decreuerim; sed ideo etiam ipsa posui, quoniam aput eorum, contra quos agimus, historicos legi, ut ostenderem qualia multa multique illorum nulla reddita ratione in suorum litteratorum scripta litteris credant, qui nobis credere, quando id, quod eorum experientiam

As for the fruits of the trees of Sodom, not only do trustworthy writings report them, but so many people say they have experienced them that I cannot doubt it. The rest I regard in such a way that I have decided neither to deny nor to affirm them. But I have included them too, because I read them in the historians of those against whom we are arguing. I wanted to show how many such things

LATIN	ENGLISH
sensumque transgreditur, omnipotentem Deum dicimus esse facturum, nec reddita ratione dignantur. Nam quae melior et ualidior ratio de rebus talibus redditur, quam cum Omnipotens ea posse facere perhibetur et facturus dicitur, quae praenuntiasse ibi legitur, ubi alia multa praenuntiauit, quae fecisse monstratur?	many of them believe, without any explanation being given, in the writings of their own men of letters—these same people who do not deign to believe us even when an explanation is given, when we say that almighty God will do something that goes beyond their experience and perception. For what better and stronger explanation can be given for such things than to declare that the Almighty is able to do them, and to say that he will do what we read he foretold, in the very place where he foretold many other things that he is shown to have done?
Ipse quippe faciet, quia se facturum esse praedixit, quae inpossibilia putantur, qui promisit et fecit ut ab incredulis gentibus incredibilia crederentur.	He himself will do the things thought impossible, because he foretold that he would do them—he who promised, and brought it about, that unbelievable things should be believed by unbelieving nations.

THAT IT IS NOT AGAINST NATURE WHEN SOMETHING WHOSE NATURE IS KNOWN BEGINS TO BE DIFFERENT FROM WHAT WAS KNOWN OF IT

Varro's account of Venus changing color and course shows that God can alter any known nature.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.8 Si autem respondent propterea se non credere quae de humanis semper arsuris nec umquam morituris corporibus dicimus, quia humanorum corporum naturam nouimus longe aliter institutam, unde nec illa ratio hinc reddi potest, quae de illis naturis mirabilibus reddebatur, ut dici possit: Vis ista naturalis est, rei huius ista natura est; quoniam scimus humanae carnis istam non esse naturam: habemus quidem quod respondeamus de litteris sacris, hanc ipsam scilicet humanam carnem aliter institutam fuisse ante peccatum, id est, ut posset numquam perpeti mortem; aliter autem post peccatum, qualis in aerumna huius mortalitatis innotuit, ut perpetem uitam tenere non possit; sic ergo aliter, quam nobis nota est, instituetur in resurrectione mortuorum.	But suppose they answer that they do not believe what we say about human bodies that will burn forever and never die, because, they say, we know that the nature of human bodies was established quite differently. So, they argue, the explanation given for those marvelous natures cannot be given here—one cannot say, "This is a natural power; this is the nature of this thing"—since we know that this is not the nature of human flesh. To this we do indeed have an answer from the sacred writings: namely, that this very human flesh was constituted one way before sin, that is, so that it could never suffer death; and another way after sin, as it has become known to us in the hardship of this mortality, so that it cannot hold on to everlasting life. So too, then, in the resurrection of the dead it will be constituted otherwise than as we know it.
Sed quoniam istis non credunt litteris, ubi legitur qualis in paradiso uixerit homo quantumque fuerit a necessitate mortis alienus (quibus utique si crederent, non cum illis de poena damnatorum, quae futura est, operosius ageremus): de litteris eorum, qui doctissimi aput illos fuerunt, aliquid proferendum est, quo appareat posse fieri, ut aliter se habeat quaeque res, quam prius in rebus innotuerat suae determinatione naturae.	But they do not believe those writings, in which we read what kind of life man lived in paradise and how far removed he was from the necessity of death. (If they did believe them, we would not have to argue with them so laboriously about the future punishment of the damned.) So we must bring forward something from the writings of those who were most learned among them, which may show that it is possible for any thing to become otherwise than it had previously been known to be, by the defining limits of its own nature.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Est in Marci Varronis libris, quorum inscriptio est: De gente populi Romani, quod eisdem uerbis, quibus ibi legitur, et hic ponam: In caelo, inquit, mirabile exstitit portentum: nam stellam Veneris nobilissimam, quam Plautus Vesperuginem, Homerus Hesperon appellat, pulcherrimam dicens, Castor scribit tantum portentum exstitisse, ut mutaret colorem, magnitudinem, figuram, cursum; quod factum ita neque antea nec postea sit. Hoc factum Ogygo rege dicebant Adrastos Cyzicenos et Dion Neapolites, mathematici nobiles. Hoc certe Varro tantus auctor portentum non appellaret, nisi esse contra naturam uideretur. Omnia quippe portenta contra naturam dicimus esse; sed non sunt. Quo modo est enim contra naturam, quod Dei fit uoluntate, cum uoluntas tanti utique conditoris conditae rei cuiusque natura sit? Portentum ergo fit non contra naturam, sed contra quam est nota natura.

In the books of Marcus Varro entitled On the Race of the Roman People there is a passage which I will set down here in the very words in which it is read there. "In the sky," he says, "a marvelous portent appeared. For Castor writes that in the case of the most famous star of Venus, which Plautus calls Vesperugo and Homer calls Hesperos, saying it is the most beautiful, so great a portent occurred that it changed its color, size, shape and course—something that had never happened before and has not happened since. Adrastus of Cyzicus and Dion of Naples, famous astrologers, said that this happened in the reign of King Ogyges." Varro, so great an authority, would certainly not have called this a portent unless it seemed to be contrary to nature. For we say that all portents are contrary to nature; but they are not. How can something be contrary to nature that happens by the will of God, when the will of so great a Creator is surely the nature of each created thing? A portent, then, happens not contrary to nature, but contrary to nature as it is known.[13]

Quis autem portentorum numerat multitudinem, quae historia gentium continetur? Sed nunc in hoc uno adtendamus, quod ad rem, de qua agimus, pertinet. Quid ita dispositum est ab auctore naturae caeli et terrae, quem ad modum cursus ordinatissimus siderum? Quid tam ratis legibus fixisque firmatum? Et tamen, quando ille uoluit, qui summo regit imperio ac potestate quod condidit, stella prae ceteris magnitudine ac splendore notissima colorem, magnitudinem, figuram et (quod est mirabilius) sui cursus ordinem legemque mutauit. Turbauit profecto tunc, si ulli iam fuerunt, canones astrologorum, quos uelut inerrabili conputatione de praeteritis ac futuris astrorum motibus conscriptos habent, quos canones sequendo ausi sunt dicere, hoc, quod de Lucifero contigit, nec antea nec postea contigisse.

But who can count the multitude of portents contained in the history of the nations? Let us now attend to this one alone, which bears on the matter we are dealing with. What has been so carefully arranged by the author of the nature of heaven and earth as the perfectly ordered course of the stars? What is so firmly established by settled and fixed laws? And yet, when he willed it—he who rules what he created with supreme authority and power—a star, the best known of all for its size and brilliance, changed its color, size, shape and (what is more wonderful still) the order and law of its course. Surely it threw into confusion at that time, if any yet existed, the tables of the astrologers, which they have written up as if by infallible calculation of the past and future motions of the stars. It was by following these tables that they dared to say that what happened to Lucifer had never happened before or since.[14]

Nos autem in diuinis libris legimus etiam solem ipsum et stetisse, cum hoc a Domino Deo petiuisset uir sanctus

We, however, read in the divine books that the sun itself both stood still, when the holy man Joshua

LATIN

Iesus Naue, donec coeptum proelium uictoria terminaret, et retrorsum redisse, ut regi Ezechiae quindecim anni ad uiuendum additi hoc etiam prodigio promissioni Dei significarentur adiuncto. Sed ista quoque miracula, quae meritis sunt concessa sanctorum, quando credunt isti facta, magicis artibus tribuunt. Unde illud est, quod superius commemoraui dixisse Vergilium: Sistere aquam fluuiis et uertere sidera retro. Nam et fluuium stetisse superius inferiusque fluxisse, cum populus Dei ductore supra memorato Iesu Naue uiam carperet, et Helia propheta transeunte ac postea discipulo eius Helisaeo id esse factum in sacris litteris legimus, et retro uersum fuisse maximum sidus regnante Ezechia modo commemorauimus.

Quod uero de Lucifero Varro scripsit, non est illic dictum alicui petenti homini id fuisse concessum.

Non ergo de notitia naturarum caliginem sibi faciant infideles, quasi non possit in aliqua re diuinitus fieri aliud, quamdiu eius natura per humanam suam experientiam cognouerunt; quamuis et ipsa, quae in rerum natura omnibus nota sunt, non minus mira sint, essentque stupenda considerantibus cunctis, si, solerent homines mirari mira nisi rara. Quis enim consulta ratione non uideat in hominum innumerabili numerositate et tanta naturae similitudine ualde mirabiliter sic habere singulos singulas facies, ut nisi inter se similes essent, non discerneretur species eorum ab animalibus ceteris; et rursus nisi inter se dissimiles essent, non discernerentur singuli ab hominibus ceteris? Quos ergo similes confitemur, eosdem dissimiles inuenimus. Sed mirabilior est consideratio dissimilitudinis, quoniam similitudinem iustius uidetur exposcere natura communis.

ENGLISH

son of Nun had asked this of the Lord God until he could end in victory the battle he had begun, and went backward, so that the fifteen years added to King Hezekiah's life might be signified by this prodigy too, joined to God's promise. But even these miracles, granted to the merits of the saints, these people attribute to magic arts, when they believe they happened at all. Hence the line I mentioned above that Virgil wrote: "to halt the water in the rivers and turn the stars backward." For we read in the sacred writings that a river stood still upstream and flowed away downstream when the people of God were making their way under the leadership of Joshua son of Nun, mentioned above; and that this also happened when the prophet Elijah crossed, and afterward his disciple Elisha. And we have just mentioned that the greatest star was turned back in the reign of Hezekiah.

But as for what Varro wrote about Lucifer, it is not said there that this was granted to any man who asked for it.

So let unbelievers not make a fog for themselves out of their knowledge of natures, as if God could not bring about something different in some thing simply because they have come to know its nature through their own human experience. And yet even the things in the natural world that are known to everyone are no less wonderful, and would astonish all who consider them, if people were in the habit of marveling at marvels other than rare ones. For who, if he reasons it out, does not see how very wonderful it is that among the countless multitude of human beings, with so great a likeness of nature, each individual has a face of his own? If they were not alike, their species would not be distinguished from the other animals; and again, if they were not unlike one another, individuals would not be distinguished from other human beings. So those whom we acknowledge to be alike, we find to be unlike. But their unlikeness is the more wonderful to consider, since a common nature seems more rightly to demand likeness.

And yet, because it is the rare things that are wonderful, we marvel far more when we find two 14 Lucifer, "light-bringer," is the morning star—the planet Venus, which is also the evening star.

13 Castor of Rhodes (1st century BC) compiled a world chronology; Ogyges was a legendary primeval king in Greece.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Et tamen quoniam quae sunt rara ipsa sunt mira, multo amplius admiramur quando duos ita similes reperimus, ut in eis discernendis aut semper aut frequenter erremus.	people so alike that we always, or often, make mistakes in telling them apart.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF SODOM

Sodom, once fertile, was turned to soot and ash, proof that God changes the natures he made.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed quod dixi scriptum a Varrone, licet eorum sit historicus idemque doctissimus, fortasse uere factum esse non credunt; aut quia non diu mansit alius eiusdem sideris cursus, sed reditum est ad solitum, minus isto mouentur exemplo. Habent ergo aliud, quod etiam nunc possit ostendi eisque puto debere sufficere, quo commoneantur, cum aliquid aduerterint in aliqua institutione naturae eamque sibi notissimam fecerint, non se inde Deo debere praescribere, quasi eam non possit in longe aliud, quam eis cognita est, uertere adque mutare. Terra Sodomorum non fuit utique ut nunc est, sed iacebat simili ceteris facie eademque uel etiam uberiore fecunditate pollebat; nam Dei paradiso in diuinis eloquiis conparata est.	But as for the event I said Varro recorded, though he is their own historian and a most learned one, perhaps they do not believe it really happened; or, because that star's altered course did not last long but returned to its usual one, they are less moved by this example. So they have another, which can be shown even now and which I think ought to be enough for them. Let it remind them that when they have noticed something in some ordering of nature and made it very familiar to themselves, they should not on that basis lay down rules for God, as if he could not turn and change it into something far different from what they know. The land of Sodom was certainly not as it is now. It lay there with an appearance like other lands and enjoyed the same fertility, or even greater; for in the divine words it is compared to God's paradise.
Haec postea quam tacta de caelo est, sicut illorum quoque adtestatur historia et nunc ab eis qui ueniunt ad loca illa conspicitur, prodigiosa fuligine horrori est et poma eius interiorem fauillam mendaci superficie maturitatis includunt. Ecce non erat talis, et talis est. Ecce a conditore naturarum natura eius in hanc foedissimam diuersitatem mirabili mutatione conuersa est; et quod post tam longum accidit tempus, tam longo tempore perseuerat.	After it was struck from heaven, as even their own history attests and as is now seen by those who come to those places, it is a thing of horror with its uncanny soot, and its fruits enclose ashes within under a deceptive surface of ripeness. See: it was not like this, and like this it is. See: its nature was changed by the Creator of natures, through a wonderful transformation, into this most hideous difference; and what happened after so long a time has persisted for so long a time.
Sicut ergo non fuit inpossibile Deo, quas uoluit instituere, sic ei non est inpossibile, in quidquid uoluerit, quas instituit, mutare naturas. Unde illorum quoque miraculorum multitudo siluescit, quae monstra ostenta, portenta prodigia nuncupantur; quae recolere et commemorare si uelim, huius operis quis erit finis? Monstra sane dicta perhibent a monstrando, quod aliquid significando demonstrent, et ostenta ab ostendendo, et portenta a portendendo, id est praeostendendo, et prodigia, quod porro dicant, id est futura praedicant. Sed uiderint eorum coniectores, quo modo ex eis siue fallantur siue instinctu spirituum, quibus cura est tali poena dignos animos hominum noxiae curiositatis	Just as it was not impossible for God to establish the natures he willed, so it is not impossible for him to change the natures he established into whatever he wills. Hence the multitude of those miracles too, which grows like a forest, the things called monsters, signs, portents and prodigies. If I wished to recall and record them, what end would there be to this work? People say that monstra [monsters] are so called from monstrare [to show], because they demonstrate something by signifying it; ostenta [signs] from ostendere [to display]; portenta [portents] from portendere [to portend], that is, to display beforehand; and prodigia [prodi-

LATIN	ENGLISH
retibus inplicare, etiam uera praedicant, siue multa dicendo aliquando in aliquid ueritatis incurrant.	gies] because they speak porro [ahead], that is, foretell future things. But let their interpreters see to it how, from these, they are either deceived; or, prompted by spirits whose concern is to entangle human minds that deserve such punishment in the nets of harmful curiosity, they even foretell true things; or, by saying many things, they now and then stumble on some truth.
Nobis tamen ista, quae uelut contra naturam fiunt et contra naturam fieri dicuntur (quo more hominum locutus est et apostolus dicendo contra naturam in olea insitum oleastrum factum esse participem pinguedinis oleae) et monstra ostenta, portenta prodigia nuncupantur, hoc monstrare debent, hoc ostendere uel praeostendere, hoc praedicere, quod facturus sit Deus, quae de corporibus hominum se praenuntiauit esse facturum, nulla inpediente difficultate, nulla praescribente lege naturae. Quo modo autem praenuntiauerit, satis in libro superiore docuisse me existimo, decerpendo de scripturis sanctis et nouis et ueteribus non quidem omnia ad hoc pertinentia, sed quae sufficere huic operi iudicaui.	For us, however, these things that happen as if contrary to nature and are said to happen contrary to nature (the apostle too spoke in this human way, when he said that the wild olive, grafted contrary to nature into the olive, was made to share in the richness of the olive), and that are called monsters, signs, portents and prodigies, ought to show us this, display this or display it beforehand, foretell this: that God will do what he has foretold he will do concerning human bodies, with no difficulty hindering him and no law of nature setting limits for him. How he foretold it, I think I have shown sufficiently in the previous book, gathering from the holy Scriptures, both New and Old, not indeed everything bearing on this, but what I judged sufficient for this work.[15]

HELL AND THE NATURE OF ETERNAL PUNISHMENTS

The undying worm and unquenchable fire may be taken literally of the body, or the worm of the mind.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.9 Quod igitur de sempiterno supplicio damnatorum per suum prophetam Deus dixit, fiet, omnino fiet: Vermis eorum non morietur et ignis eorum non exstinguetur. Ad hoc enim uehementius commendandum etiam Dominus Iesus, cum membra quae hominem scandalizant pro his hominibus poneret, quos ut sua membra dextra quis diligit, eaque praeciperet amputari: Bonum est tibi, inquit, debilem introire in uitam quam duas manus habentem ire in gehennam, in ignem inexstinguibilem, ubi uermis eorum non morietur et ignis non exstinguetur. Similiter de pede: Bonum est tibi, inquit, claudum introire in uitam aeternam quam duos pedes habentem mitti in gehennam ignis inexstinguibilis, ubi uermis eorum non moritur et ignis non exstinguitur.	What God said through his prophet about the everlasting punishment of the damned will happen. It will most certainly happen: "Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be quenched." The Lord Jesus too wanted to impress this on us more forcefully. He used the members of the body that cause a person to stumble to stand for those people whom one loves as dearly as one's own right limbs, and he commanded that they be cut off. "It is better for you," he said, "to enter life maimed than to have two hands and go into hell, into the unquenchable fire, where their worm will not die and the fire will not be quenched." He said the same about the foot: "It is better for you to enter eternal life lame than to have two feet and be thrown into the hell of unquenchable fire, where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched."[16]

15 See Romans 11:17–24.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Non aliter ait et de oculo: Bonum est tibi luscum introire in regnum Dei quam duos oculos habentem mitti in gehennam ignis, ubi uermis eorum non moritur et ignis non exstinguitur. Non eum piguit uno loco eadem uerba ter dicere. Quem non terreat ista repetitio et illius poenae commonitio tam uehemens ore diuino?	He speaks in just the same way about the eye: "It is better for you to enter the kingdom of God with one eye than to have two eyes and be thrown into the hell of fire, where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched." He did not hesitate to say the same words three times in one passage. Who would not be terrified by this repetition, and by so forceful a warning of that punishment from the mouth of God?[17]
Utrumque autem horum, ignem scilicet adque uermem, qui uolunt ad animi poenas, non ad corporis pertinere, dicunt etiam uri dolore animi sero adque infructuose paenitentes eos, qui fuerint a regno Dei separati, et ideo ignem pro isto dolore urente non incongrue poni potuisse contendunt; unde illud apostoli est: Quis scandalizatur, et non ego uror? Eundem etiam uermem putant intellegendum esse. Nam scriptum est, inquiunt: Sicut tinea uestimentum et uermis lignum, sic maeror excruciat cor uiri. Qui uero poenas et animi et corporis in illo supplicio futuras esse non dubitant, igne uri corpus, animum autem rodi quodam modo uerme maeroris adfirmant.	Some people want both of these, the fire and the worm, to refer to punishments of the mind, not of the body. They say that those who have been separated from the kingdom of God also burn with anguish of mind, because they repent too late and to no purpose. So they contend that "fire" could quite fittingly be used for this burning anguish. Hence the apostle's words: "Who is made to stumble, and I do not burn?" They think the worm too should be understood in the same way. For it is written, they say: "As the moth eats the garment and the worm the wood, so grief tortures a man's heart." But those who have no doubt that in that punishment there will be pains of both mind and body maintain that the body is burned by fire, while the mind is gnawed, in a sense, by the worm of grief.[18]
Quod etsi credibilius dicitur, quia utique absurdum est ibi dolorem aut corporis aut animi defuturum: ego tamen facilius est ut ad corpus dicam utrumque pertinere quam neutrum, et ideo tacitum in illis diuinae scripturae uerbis animi dolorem, quoniam consequens esse intellegitur, etiamsi non dicatur, ut corpore sic dolente animus quoque sterili paenitentia crucietur. Legitur quippe et in ueteribus scripturis: Vindicta carnis inpii, ignis et uermis. Potuit breuius dici: Vindicta inpii. Quur ergo dictum est: carnis inpii, nisi quia utrumque, id est et ignis et uermis, poena erit carnis?	This view is indeed more credible, since it would certainly be absurd for pain of either body or mind to be absent there. Yet it is easier for me to say that both refer to the body than that neither does. On this view the pain of the mind is left unspoken in those words of divine Scripture because it is understood to follow even if it is not stated: when the body is in such pain, the mind too is tormented by fruitless repentance. For we also read in the old Scriptures: "The punishment of the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worm." It could have been put more briefly: "The punishment of the ungodly." Why, then, does it say "of the flesh of the ungodly," unless both, that is, fire and worm, will be a punishment of the flesh?[19]
Aut si uindictam carnis propterea dicere uoluit, quia hoc in homine uindicabitur, quod secundum carnem uixerit (propter hoc enim ueniet in mortem secundam, quam	Or perhaps the writer chose to say "the punishment of the flesh" because what will be punished in a person is that he lived according to the flesh.

16 Isaiah 66:24; Mark 9:43–46.
17 Mark 9:47–48.
18 2 Corinthians 11:29; Proverbs 25:20 in the Greek and Old Latin versions (absent from most English Bibles).
19 Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 7:17.

LATIN

significauit apostolus dicens: Si enim secundum carnem uixeritis, moriemini), eligat quisque quod placet, aut ignem tribuere corpori, animo uermem, hoc proprie, illud tropice, aut utrumque proprie corpori. Iam enim satis superius disputaui posse animalia etiam in ignibus uiuere, in ustione sine consumtione, in dolore sine morte, per miraculum omnipotentissimi Creatoris; cui hoc possibile esse qui negat, a quo sit quidquid in naturis omnibus miratur ignorat. Ipse est enim Deus, qui omnia in hoc mundo magna et parua miracula, quae commemorauimus, et inconparabiliter plura, quae non commemorauimus, fecit eademque ipso mundo uno adque omnium maximo miraculo inclusit.

ENGLISH

For that is why he will come to the second death, which the apostle indicated when he said, "For if you live according to the flesh, you will die." If so, let each choose what he likes. He may assign the fire to the body and the worm to the mind, the one literally, the other figuratively. Or he may assign both literally to the body. For I have already argued sufficiently above that living creatures can live even in fire, burning without being consumed, in pain without dying, through a miracle of the all-powerful Creator. Whoever denies that this is possible for him does not know from whom comes whatever he marvels at in all of nature. For it is God himself who made all the miracles in this world, great and small, the ones we have mentioned and incomparably more that we have not. And he enclosed them in the world itself, the one miracle greatest of all.[20]

Eligat ergo unum e duobus quisque quod placet, utrum et uermem ad corpus proprie an ad animum translato a corporalibus ad incorporalia uocabulo existimet pertinere. Quid autem horum uerum sit, res ipsa expeditius indicabit, quando erit scientia tanta sanctorum, ut eis cognoscendarum illarum poenarum necessaria non sit experientia, sed ea, quae tunc erit plena adque perfecta, ad hoc quoque sciendum sapientia sola sufficiat (nunc enim ex parte scimus, donec ueniat quod perfectum est); dum tamen nullo modo illa corpora talia futura esse credamus, ut nullis ab igne adficiantur doloribus.

So let each choose whichever of the two he likes. He may think that the worm too refers literally to the body. Or he may think it refers to the mind, with the word transferred from bodily things to incorporeal ones. Which of these is true, the reality itself will show more readily. The knowledge of the saints will then be so great that they will not need experience to know those punishments. The wisdom that will then be full and perfect will by itself be enough to know this too (for now we know in part, until what is perfect comes). Only, let us in no way believe that those bodies will be such that the fire causes them no pain at all.[21]

WHETHER THE FIRE OF HELL, IF IT IS PHYSICAL, CAN BURN EVIL SPIRITS, THAT IS, BODILESS DEMONS, BY CONTACT

Demons, whether airy-bodied or bodiless, can still be tormented by the same corporeal fire as humans.

LATIN

21.10 Hic occurrit quaerere: Si non erit ignis incorporalis, sicut est animi dolor, sed corporalis, tactu noxius, ut eo possint corpora cruciari: quo modo in eo erit etiam poena spirituum malignorum? Idem quippe ignis erit, supplicio scilicet hominum adtributus et daemonum, dicente Christo: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis eius. Nisi quia sunt quaedam sua etiam daemonibus corpora, sicut doctis hominibus uisum est, ex isto aere crasso adque umido, cuius inpulsus uento flante sentitur. Quod genus elementi

ENGLISH

Here a question arises. Suppose the fire is not incorporeal, like the pain of the mind, but corporeal, harmful to the touch, so that bodies can be tormented by it. How then will evil spirits also be punished in it? For it will be the same fire, assigned to the punishment of both humans and demons, as Christ says: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire which has been prepared for the devil and his angels." Perhaps

20 Romans 8:13.
21 1 Corinthians 13:9–10.

LATIN

si nihil igne perpeti posset, non ureret feruefactus in balneis. Ut enim urat, prior uritur facitque cum patitur. Si autem quisquam nulla habere corpora daemones adseuerat, non est de hac re aut laborandum operosa inquisitione aut contentiosa disputatione certandum.

Quur enim non dicamus, quamuis miris, tamen ueris modis etiam spiritus incorporeos posse poena corporalis ignis adfligi, si spiritus hominum, etiam ipsi profecto incorporei, et nunc potuerunt includi corporalibus membris et tunc poterunt corporum suorum uinculis insolubiliter adligari? Adhaerebunt ergo, si eis nulla sunt corpora, spiritus daemonum, immo spiritus daemones, licet incorporei corporeis ignibus cruciandi, non ut ignes ipsi, quibus adhaerebunt, eorum iunctura inspirentur et animalia fiant, quae constent spiritu et corpore, sed, ut dixi, miris et ineffabilibus modis adhaerendo, accipientes ex ignibus poenam, non dantes ignibus uitam; quia et iste alius modus, quo corporibus adhaerent spiritus et animalia fiunt, omnino mirus est nec conprehendi ab homine potest, et hoc ipse homo est.

Dicerem quidem sic arsuros sine ullo suo corpore spiritus, sicut ardebat aput inferos ille diues, quando dicebat: Crucior in hac flamma, nisi conuenienter responderi cernerem talem fuisse illam flammam, quales oculi quos leuauit et Lazarum uidit, qualis lingua cui umorem exiguum desiderauit infundi, qualis digitus Lazari de quo id sibi fieri postulauit; ubi tamen erant sine corporibus animae. Sic ergo incorporalis et illa flamma qua exarsit et illa guttula quam poposcit, qualia sunt etiam uisa dormientium siue in ecstasi cernentium res incorporales, habentes tamen similitudinem corporum. Nam et ipse homo cum spiritu, non corpore, sit in talibus uisis, ita se tamen tunc similem suo corpori uidet, ut discernere omnino non possit.

ENGLISH

demons too have bodies of their own, as learned men have held, made of this thick, moist air whose force we feel when the wind blows. If this kind of element could suffer nothing from fire, it would not scald when it is heated in the baths. For in order to burn, it is first burned itself, and it acts while it is being acted upon. But if anyone asserts that demons have no bodies at all, we need neither labor over the question with painstaking inquiry nor fight over it in contentious debate.[22]

Why should we not say that even incorporeal spirits can be afflicted by the punishment of corporeal fire, in ways that are wondrous yet real? Human spirits are certainly incorporeal too, yet they could even now be enclosed in bodily members, and then they will be bound inseparably by the bonds of their bodies. So, if they have no bodies, the spirits of demons, or rather the demons who are spirits, will cling to corporeal fires to be tormented by them, even though they are incorporeal. This does not mean that the fires they cling to will be animated by being joined to them and become living creatures made of spirit and body. Rather, as I said, they will cling in wondrous and inexpressible ways, receiving punishment from the fires without giving life to the fires. For that other way too, by which spirits cling to bodies and become living creatures, is altogether wondrous and beyond human comprehension. And this is what a human being is.

I would indeed say that spirits will burn without any body of their own, just as that rich man was burning in the underworld when he said, "I am in torment in this flame." But I see that one could fittingly reply that the flame was of the same kind as the eyes he lifted up to see Lazarus. It was like the tongue on which he longed to have a little moisture poured, and like the finger of Lazarus by which he asked that this be done for him. And yet the souls there were without bodies. So the flame in which he burned and the little drop he begged for were likewise incorporeal. They were like the visions of people asleep, or of those in ecstasy who see incorporeal things that nonetheless have the likeness of bodies. For in such visions a person is present in spirit, not in body. Yet he then sees him-

22 Matthew 25:41.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		self so like his own body that he cannot tell the difference at all.[23]
	At uero gehenna illa, quod etiam stagnum ignis et sulphuris dictum est, corporeus ignis erit et cruciabit corpora damnatorum, aut et hominum et daemonum, solida hominum, aeria daemonum, aut tantum hominum corpora cum spiritibus, daemones autem spiritus sine corporibus haerentes sumendo poenam, non inpertiendo uitam corporalibus ignibus. Unus quippe utrisque ignis erit, sicut Veritas dixit.	But that hell, which is also called the lake of fire and sulfur, will be corporeal fire, and it will torment the bodies of the damned. Perhaps it will torment the bodies of both humans and demons, the solid bodies of humans and the airy bodies of demons. Or perhaps it will torment only the bodies of humans, along with their spirits, while the demons, spirits without bodies, cling to the corporeal fires, receiving punishment from them and not imparting life to them. For there will be one fire for both, as the Truth has said.[24]

WHETHER JUSTICE REQUIRES THAT THE TIME OF PUNISHMENT BE NO LONGER THAN THE TIME OF THE SINS

Human penalties too far outlast the crimes; punishment is measured by the gravity of the deed, not its duration.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.11	Sic autem quidam eorum, contra quos defendimus ciuitatem Dei, iniustum putant, ut pro peccatis quamlibet magnis, paruo scilicet tempore perpetratis, poena quisque damnetur aeterna, quasi ullius id umquam iustitia legis adtendat, ut tanta mora temporis quisque puniatur, quanta mora temporis unde puniretur admisit. Octo genera poenarum in legibus esse scribit Tullius, damnum, uincla, uerbera, talionem, ignominiam, exsilium, mortem, seruitutem. Quid horum est quod in breue tempus pro cuiusque peccati celeritate coartetur, ut tanta uindicetur morula, quanta deprehenditur perpetratum, nisi forte talio? Id enim agit, ut hoc patiatur quisque quod fecit. Unde illud est legis: Oculum pro oculo, dentem pro dente. Fieri enim potest, ut tam breui tempore quisque amittat oculum seueritate uindictae, quam tulit ipse alteri inprobitate peccati.	Now some of those against whom we are defending the city of God think it unjust that anyone should be condemned to eternal punishment for sins, however great, that were committed in a short time. As if the justice of any law ever required that a person be punished for as long as it took him to commit the deed for which he is punished! Cicero writes that the laws contain eight kinds of penalty: fines, imprisonment, flogging, retaliation in kind, disgrace, exile, death, and slavery. Which of these is compressed into a short time to match the speed of each offense, so that the punishment lasts only as briefly as the deed is found to have lasted? Retaliation, perhaps, but nothing else. Its aim is that each person should suffer what he did. Hence that saying of the law: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." For it can happen that a person loses an eye by the severity of punishment in as short a time as he took to deprive another of one by the wickedness of his offense.[25]
	Porro autem si alienae feminae osculum infixum rationis sit uerbere uindicare, nonne qui illud puncto temporis fecerit, inconparabili horarum spatio uerberatur et suauitas uoluptatis exiguae diuturno dolore punitur? Quid, in uinculis numquid tamdiu quisque iudicandus est	Furthermore, suppose it is reasonable to punish a kiss planted on another man's wife with a flogging. The man did it in a moment, yet is he not flogged for an incomparably longer stretch of hours, so that the sweetness of a brief pleasure is punished

23 Luke 16:19–31; the quotation is Luke 16:24.
24 Revelation 20:10. "The Truth" is Christ (John 14:6), referring to Matthew 25:41.
25 Cicero's list of penalties is known only from Augustine's citation; Exodus 21:24.

LATIN

esse debere, quamdiu fecit unde meruit adligari; cum iustissime annosas poenas seruus in conpedibus pendat, qui uerbo aut ictu celerrime transeunte uel lacessiuit dominum uel plagauit? Iam uero damnum, ignominia, exsilium, seruitus cum plerumque sic infliguntur, ut nulla uenia relaxentur, nonne pro huius uitae modo similia poenis uidentur aeternis?

Ideo quippe aeterna esse non possunt, quia nec ipsa uita, quae his plectitur, porrigitur in aeternum; et tamen peccata, quae uindicantur longissimi temporis poenis, breuissimo tempore perpetrantur; nec quisquam exstitit qui censeret tam cito nocentium finienda esse tormenta, quam cito factum est uel homicidium uel adulterium uel sacrilegium uel quodlibet aliud scelus non temporis longitudine, sed iniquitatis et inpietatis magnitudine metiendum. Qui uero pro aliquo grandi crimine morte multatur, numquid mora qua occiditur, quae perbreuis est, eius supplicium leges aestimant et non quod eum in sempiternum auferunt de societate uiuentium? Quod est autem de ista ciuitate mortali homines supplicio primae mortis, hoc est de illa ciuitate inmortali homines supplicio secundae mortis auferre.

Sicut enim non efficiunt leges huius ciuitatis, ut in eam quisque reuocetur occisus: sic nec illius, ut in uitam reuocetur aeternam secunda morte damnatus. Quo modo ergo uerum est, inquiunt, quod ait Christus uester: In qua mensura mensi fueritis, in ea remetietur uobis, si temporale peccatum supplicio punitur aeterno? Nec adtendunt non propter aequale temporis spatium, sed propter uicissitudinem mali, id est ut qui mala fecerit mala patiatur, eandem dictam fuisse mensuram. Quamuis hoc in ea re proprie possit accipi, de qua Dominus cum hoc diceret loquebatur, id est de iudiciis et condemnationibus. Proinde qui iudicat et condemnat iniuste, si iudicatur et condemnatur iuste, in eadem mensura recipit, quamuis non hoc quod dedit.

ENGLISH

with lasting pain? And what about imprisonment? Must a person be judged to deserve chains only for as long as it took him to do what earned him his bonds? Yet a slave quite justly pays a penalty of years in fetters for provoking or striking his master with a word or a blow that was over in an instant. And fines, disgrace, exile and slavery are often inflicted in such a way that no pardon relaxes them. Do they not then seem, on the scale of this life, like eternal punishments?

The only reason they cannot be eternal is that the life they punish does not itself extend into eternity. And yet the sins that are avenged with very long punishments are committed in a very short time. No one has ever thought that the torments of the guilty should end as quickly as a murder, an adultery or a sacrilege was committed. The same holds for any other crime, which must be measured not by its length in time but by the magnitude of its wrongdoing and impiety. When someone is punished with death for some great crime, do the laws reckon his punishment by the time it takes to kill him, which is very brief? Or do they reckon it by the fact that they remove him forever from the fellowship of the living? Removing people from this mortal city by the punishment of the first death corresponds to removing people from that immortal city by the punishment of the second death.

The laws of this city do not bring an executed man back into it. In the same way, the laws of that city do not bring someone condemned to the second death back to eternal life. "How, then," they say, "is it true, what your Christ said: 'With the measure you use, it will be measured back to you,' if a temporal sin is punished with eternal punishment?" They do not notice that the "same measure" refers not to an equal span of time but to the repayment of evil, that is, that one who has done evil should suffer evil. The saying can also be taken strictly, as referring to the matter the Lord was speaking about when he said it, namely judgments and condemnations. On that reading, one who judges and condemns unjustly receives back in the same measure if he is judged and condemned justly, even though he does not receive what he gave.[26]

26 Matthew 7:2.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Iudicio enim fecit, iudicio patitur; quamuis fecerit damnatione quod iniquum est, patiatur damnatione quod iustum est.	For he acted by judgment, and he suffers by judgment. By condemnation he did what is unjust, but by condemnation he suffers what is just.

THE GREATNESS OF THE FIRST TRANSGRESSION, FOR WHICH ETERNAL PUNISHMENT IS DUE TO ALL WHO ARE OUTSIDE THE SAVIOR'S GRACE

The first sin was so great that the whole human race became a condemned mass, saved only by grace.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.12	Sed poena aeterna ideo dura et iniusta sensibus uidetur humanis, quia in hac infirmitate moribundorum sensuum deest ille sensus altissimae purissimaeque sapientiae, quo sentiri possit quantum nefas in illa prima praeuaricatione commissum sit. Quanto enim magis homo fruebatur Deo, tanto maiore inpietate dereliquit Deum et factus est malo dignus aeterno, qui hoc in se peremit bonum, quod esse posset aeternum. Hinc est uniuersa generis humani massa damnata; quoniam, qui hoc primus admisit, cum ea quae in illo fuerat radicata sua stirpe punitus est, ut nullus ab hoc iusto debitoque supplicio nisi misericordi et indebita gratia liberetur adque ita dispertiatur genus humanum, ut in quibusdam demonstretur quid ualeat misericors gratia, in ceteris quid iusta uindicta.	Eternal punishment seems harsh and unjust to human senses because, in the weakness of our dying senses, we lack that sense of the highest and purest wisdom by which one could sense how great a wickedness was committed in that first transgression. For the more fully man enjoyed God, the greater the impiety with which he abandoned God. And he became deserving of eternal evil, since he destroyed in himself a good that could have been eternal. Hence the whole mass of the human race is condemned. He who first committed this sin was punished together with his whole stock, which had been rooted in him. So no one is freed from this just and deserved punishment except by merciful and undeserved grace. And the human race is divided so that some may show what merciful grace can do, and the rest what just retribution can do.
	Neque enim utrumque demonstraretur in omnibus, quia, si omnes remanerent in poenis iustae damnationis, in nullo appareret misericors gratia; rursus si omnes a tenebris transferrentur in lucem, in nullo appareret ueritas ultionis. In qua propterea multo plures quam in illa sunt, ut sic ostendatur, quid omnibus deberetur. Quod si omnibus redderetur, iustitiam uindicantis iuste nemo reprehenderet; quia uero tam multi exinde liberantur, est unde agantur maximae gratiae gratuito muneri liberantis.	Both could not be shown in everyone. If all remained in the punishments of just condemnation, merciful grace would appear in no one. Again, if all were brought out of darkness into light, the truth of retribution would appear in no one. And there are far more under retribution than under grace, so that it may be shown what was owed to all. If it were paid to all, no one could justly find fault with the justice of the one who punishes. But because so many are freed from it, there is reason for the deepest gratitude for the gracious gift of the one who sets them free.

AGAINST THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO THINK THAT PUNISHMENTS ARE APPLIED TO SINNERS AFTER DEATH FOR THE SAKE OF PURIFICATION

Against the Platonists, not all punishment purifies; some temporary punishments come before the judgment, but eternal ones follow it.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.13	Platonici quidem, quamuis inpunita nulla uelint esse peccata, tamen omnes poenas emendationi adhiberi putant, uel humanis inflictas legibus uel diuinis, siue in	The Platonists hold that no sins go unpunished. Yet they think that all punishments serve to correct, whether human laws or divine laws inflict hac uita siue post mortem, si aut parcatur hic cuique aut ita plectatur ut hic non corrigatur. Hinc est Maronis illa sententia, ubi, cum dixisset de terrenis corporibus moribundisque membris, quod animae Hinc metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque, nec auras Suspiciunt, clausae tenebris et carcere caeco, secutus adiunxit adque ait: Quin et supremo cum lumine uita reliquit (id est cum die nouissimo reliquit eas ista uita), Non tamen (inquit) omne malum miseris, nec funditus omnes

LATIN

Corporeae excedunt pestes, penitusque necesse est
Multa diu concreta modis inolescere miris.

/ Ergo exercentur poenis ueterumque malorum
Supplicia expendunt; aliae panduntur inanes
Suspensae ad uentos, aliis sub gurgite uasto
Infectum eluitur scelus aut exuritur igni. Qui hoc opinantur, nullas poenas nisi purgatorias uolunt esse post mortem, ut, quoniam terris superiora sunt elementa aqua, aer, ignis, ex aliquo istorum mundetur per expiatorias poenas, quod terrena contagione contractum est. Aer quippe accipitur in eo quod ait: Suspensae ad uentos; aqua in eo quod ait: Sub gurgite uasto; ignis autem suo nomine expressus est, cum dixit: Aut exuritur igni. Nos uero etiam in hac quidem mortali uita esse quasdam poenas purgatorias confitemur, non quibus adfliguntur, quorum uita uel non inde fit melior, uel potius inde fit peior; sed illis sunt purgatoriae, qui eis coherciti corriguntur.

Ceterae omnes poenae, siue temporariae siue sempiternae, sicut unusquisque diuina prouidentia tractandus est, inferuntur uel pro peccatis siue praeteritis siue in quibus adhuc uiuit ille qui plectitur, uel pro exercendis declarandisque uirtutibus per homines et angelos seu bonos seu malos. Nam etsi quisque mali aliquid alterius inprobitate uel errore patiatur, peccat quidem homo, qui uel ignorantia uel iniustitia cuiquam mali aliquid facit; sed non peccat Deus, qui iusto, quamuis occulto, iudicio fieri sinit. Sed temporarias poenas alii in hac uita tantum, alii post mortem, alii et nunc et tunc, uerum tamen ante iudicium illud seuerissimum nouissimumque patiuntur. Non autem omnes ueniunt in them, and whether in this life or after death. The punishment after death applies if a person is spared here, or is punished here in a way that does not correct him. Hence that thought of Virgil. He speaks of earthly bodies and dying members, and says that because of them souls "fear and desire, feel pain and rejoice, and do not look up to the open sky, shut in darkness and a blind prison." Then he goes on to add: "Even when, with the last light, life has left them" (that is, when this life has left them on their last day), "yet not all evil," he says, "nor all the plagues of the body wholly leave the wretched. And many things long ingrained must take root deep within in wondrous ways."[27]

ENGLISH

"So they are disciplined with punishments and pay the penalty for old evils. Some are hung outstretched, empty, to the winds. For others the stain of crime is washed out beneath a vast whirlpool, or burned away by fire." Those who hold this view want there to be no punishments after death except purifying ones. Water, air and fire are elements higher than earth, so whatever has been contracted from earthly contamination is cleansed by one of them through expiatory punishments. Air is meant where he says, "hung to the winds," and water where he says, "beneath a vast whirlpool." Fire is named outright when he says, "or burned away by fire." We, for our part, acknowledge that even in this mortal life there are indeed some purifying punishments. They do not purify people who are afflicted by them but whose lives do not become better as a result, or rather become worse. They purify those who are restrained by them and corrected.

All other punishments, whether temporary or everlasting, are inflicted according to how each person is to be dealt with by divine providence. They may be for sins, whether past sins or sins in which the person punished is still living. Or they may serve to exercise and display virtues, and they come through human beings and angels, whether good or evil. Someone may suffer some evil through another's wickedness or error. In that case the human being who does evil to someone through ignorance or injustice does indeed sin. But God, who permits it by a just, though hidden, judgment, does not sin. As for temporary punish-

27 Virgil, Aeneid 6.733–742.

LATIN	ENGLISH
sempiternas poenas, quae post illud iudicium sunt futurae, qui post mortem sustinent temporales.	ments, some suffer them in this life only, some after death, and some both now and then. All of these, however, come before that last and most severe judgment. But not all who undergo temporal punishments after death come into the everlasting punishments that will follow that judgment.
Nam quibusdam, quod in isto non remittitur, remitti in futuro saeculo, id est, ne futuri saeculi aeterno supplicio puniantur, iam supra diximus.	For we have already said above that for some, what is not forgiven in this age is forgiven in the age to come, so that they are not punished with the eternal punishment of the age to come.[28]

THE TEMPORAL PUNISHMENTS OF THIS LIFE, TO WHICH THE HUMAN CONDITION IS SUBJECT

Life itself is a punishment, from children's beatings at school to the assaults of evil spirits on infants.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.14 Rarissimi sunt autem qui nullas in hac uita, sed tantum post eam poenas luunt. Fuisse tamen aliquos, qui usque ad decrepitam senectutem ne leuissimam quidem febriculam senserint quietamque duxerint uitam, et ipsi nouimus et audiuimus; quamquam uita ipsa mortalium tota poena sit, quia tota tentatio est, sicut sacrae litterae personant, ubi scriptum est: Numquid non tentatio est uita humana super terram? Non enim parua poena est ipsa insipientia uel inperitia, quae usque adeo fugienda merito iudicatur, ut per poenas doloribus plenas pueri cogantur quaeque artificia uel litteras discere; ipsumque discere, ad quod poenis adiguntur, tam poenale est eis, ut nonnumquam ipsas poenas, per quas conpelluntur discere, malint ferre quam discere.	Very rare are those who pay no penalties in this life but only after it. Still, there have been some who lived right up to decrepit old age without feeling even the slightest touch of fever, and who led a peaceful life. We ourselves both know of such people and have heard of them. And yet the whole life of mortals is itself a punishment, because it is all temptation, as the sacred writings proclaim: "Is not human life on earth a temptation?" For ignorance itself, or lack of skill, is no small punishment. It is rightly judged so much to be avoided that children are forced, through punishments full of pain, to learn various crafts or their letters. And the learning itself, to which punishments drive them, is so much a punishment to them that they sometimes prefer to endure the very punishments that compel them to learn rather than learn.[29]
Quis autem non exhorreat et mori eligat, si ei proponatur aut mors perpetienda aut rursus infantia? Quae quidem quod non a risu, sed a fletu orditur hanc lucem, quid malorum ingressa sit nesciens prophetat quodam modo. Solum, quando natus est, ferunt risisse Zoroastrem, nec ei boni aliquid monstruosus risus ille portendit. Nam magicarum artium fuisse perhibetur inuentor; quae quidem illi nec ad praesentis uitae uanam felicitatem contra suos inimicos prodesse potuerunt; a Nino quippe rege Assyriorum, cum esset ipse Bactrianorum, bello superatus est.	Who would not shudder and choose to die, if he were offered the choice between enduring death and becoming an infant again? Infancy begins this life not with laughter but with tears, and so in a way it prophesies, without knowing it, the evils it has entered. Zoroaster alone, they say, laughed when he was born, and that unnatural laugh portended nothing good for him. He is said to have invented the magic arts. Yet these could not help him against his enemies, even for the empty happiness of this present life. He was king of the Bactrians, and Ninus, king of the Assyrians, defeated him in war.[30]
Prorsus quod scriptum est: Graue iugum super filios Adam a die exitus de uentre matris eorum usque in diem	Scripture says: "A heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam from the day they come out of their moth-

LATIN	ENGLISH
sepulturae in matrem omnium, usque adeo inpleri necesse est, ut ipsi paruuli per lauacrum regenerationis ab originalis peccati, quo solo tenebantur, uinculo iam soluti mala multa patientes nonnulli et incursus spirituum malignorum aliquando patiantur. Quae quidem passio absit ut eis obsit, si hanc uitam in illa aetate etiam ipsa passione ingrauescente et animam de corpore excludente finierint.	er's womb until the day of their burial in the mother of all." This must be fulfilled so completely that even little children suffer many evils, and some at times even suffer the assaults of evil spirits. Yet they have already been freed through the washing of regeneration from the bond of original sin, by which alone they were held. Far be it, however, that this suffering should harm them, if they end this life at that age, even when the suffering grows worse and drives the soul from the body.[31]

THAT THE WHOLE WORK OF GOD'S GRACE, WHICH RESCUES US FROM THE DEPTH OF THE OLD EVIL, LOOKS TO THE NEWNESS OF THE WORLD TO COME

Life's miseries teach us that grace looks to the new age; meanwhile the flesh wars against the spirit.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.15 Verum tamen in graui iugo, quod positum est super filios Adam a die exitus de uentre matris eorum usque in diem sepulturae in matrem omnium, etiam hoc malum mirabile reperitur, ut sobrii simus adque intellegamus hanc uitam de peccato illo nimis nefario, quod in paradiso perpetratum est, factam nobis esse poenalem totumque, quod nobiscum agitur per testamentum nouum, non pertinere nisi ad noui saeculi hereditatem nouam, ut hic pignore accepto illud cuius hoc pignus est suo tempore consequamur, nunc autem ambulemus in spe et proficientes de die in diem spiritu facta carnis mortificemus. Nouit enim Dominus qui sunt eius; et quotquot spiritu Dei aguntur, hi filii sunt Dei, sed gratia, non natura.	Yet in the heavy yoke that is laid on the sons of Adam from the day they come out of their mother's womb until the day of their burial in the mother of all, even this evil turns out to be wonderful. It makes us sober and helps us understand that this life has become a punishment for us because of that utterly wicked sin committed in paradise. It also shows that everything done with us under the new covenant pertains only to the new inheritance of the new age: having received the pledge here, we are to obtain in due time that of which this is the pledge. Meanwhile we are to walk in hope and, making progress day by day, put to death the deeds of the flesh by the Spirit. For "the Lord knows those who are his," and "all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God"—but by grace, not by nature.[32]
Unicus enim natura Dei filius propter nos misericordia factus est hominis filius, ut nos, natura filii hominis, filii Dei per illum gratia fieremus. Manens quippe ille inmutabilis naturam nostram, in qua nos susciperet, suscepit a nobis et tenax diuinitatis suae nostrae infirmitatis particeps factus est; ut nos in melius commutati, quod peccatores mortalesque sumus, eius inmortalis et iusti participatione amittamus et, quod in natura nostra bonum fecit, inpletum summo bono in eius naturae bonitate seruemus. Sicut enim per unum	For the only Son of God by nature became, out of mercy, the son of man for our sake, so that we, who are by nature sons of men, might become sons of God through him by grace. Remaining unchangeable himself, he took our nature from us, so that in it he might take us up. Holding fast to his own divinity, he became a sharer in our weakness. So we, changed for the better, are to lose what we are—sinners and mortals—by sharing in his immortality and righteousness. And we are to keep 30 Zoroaster, the Persian prophet, was regarded in Greek and Roman legend as the founder of magic. Ninus was the legendary founder of the Assyrian empire.

29 Job 7:1; modern versions read "hard service" where Augustine's text has "temptation."
28 Echoing Matthew 12:32.
31 Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 40:1. "The washing of regeneration" (Titus 3:5) is baptism.
32 2 Timothy 2:19; Romans 8:14.

LATIN	ENGLISH
hominem peccantem in hoc tam graue malum deuenimus, ita per unum hominem eundemque Deum iustificantem ad illud bonum tam sublime ueniemus.	whatever good he made in our nature, brought to fullness by the supreme good in the goodness of his nature. For just as through one man who sinned we fell into this grievous evil, so through one man who justifies, and who is also God, we shall come to that sublime good.
Nec quisquam se debet ab isto ad illum transisse confidere, nisi cum ibi fuerit, ubi tentatio nulla erit; nisi pacem tenuerit, quam belli huius, in quo caro concupiscit aduersus spiritum et spiritus aduersus carnem, multis et uariis certaminibus quaerit. Hoc autem bellum numquam ullum esset, si natura humana per liberum arbitrium in rectitudine, in qua facta est, perstitisset. Nunc uero, quae pacem felix cum Deo habere noluit, secum pugnat infelix, et cum sit hoc malum miserabile, melius est tamen quam priora uitae huius. Melius confligitur quippe cum uitiis, quam sine ulla conflictione dominantur. Melius est, inquam, bellum cum spe pacis aeternae quam sine ulla liberationis cogitatione captiuitas.	Yet no one ought to feel sure that he has passed from the first man to the second until he is where there will be no temptation. He must first hold the peace that he seeks through the many and varied battles of this war, in which "the flesh desires against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh." There would never have been any such war if human nature had persisted, by free will, in the uprightness in which it was made. As it is, the nature that in its happiness refused to have peace with God now fights with itself in its unhappiness. This is a pitiable evil, yet it is still better than the earlier stages of this life. For it is better to fight against vices than to let them rule without any fight. It is better, I say, to have war with the hope of eternal peace than captivity with no thought of release.[33]
Cupimus quidem etiam hoc bello carere et ad capessendam ordinatissimam pacem, ubi firmissima stabilitate potioribus inferiora subdantur, igne diuini amoris accendimur. Sed si (quod absit) illius tanti boni spes nulla esset, malle debuimus in huius conflictationis molestia remanere quam uitiis in nos dominationem non eis resistendo permittere.	We long, indeed, to be free even of this war. We are set on fire by divine love to attain that perfectly ordered peace, in which the lower is subjected to the higher with unshakable stability. But even if (God forbid) there were no hope of so great a good, we ought to have preferred to remain in the trouble of this conflict rather than let the vices dominate us by failing to resist them.

THE LAWS OF GRACE UNDER WHICH ALL THE AGES OF THE REBORN ARE PLACED

Baptized infants are spared purgatorial pains; adults must fight their vices with the love of God that grace gives.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.16 Verum tamen tanta est Dei misericordia in uasa misericordiae, quae praeparauit in gloriam, ut etiam prima hominis aetas, id est infantia, quae sine ullo renisu subiacet carni, et secunda, quae pueritia nuncupatur, ubi nondum ratio suscepit hanc pugnam et fere sub omnibus uitiosis delectationibus iacet, quia, licet fari iam ualeat et ideo infantiam transisse uideatur, nondum in ea est praecepti capax infirmitas mentis, si sacramenta Mediatoris acceperit, etiamsi hanc in eis annis uitam finiat, translata scilicet a potestate tenebrarum in regnum Christi non solum poenis non praeparetur aeternis, sed ne ulla quidem post mortem purgatoria	Yet so great is God's mercy toward the "vessels of mercy, which he has prepared for glory," that this holds true even of the first age of human life and of the second. The first is infancy, which submits to the flesh without any resistance. The second is called childhood, in which reason has not yet taken up this fight and lies subject to almost every vicious pleasure. For although the child can now speak and so seems to have left infancy behind, the weakness of the mind at this stage is not yet capable of receiving a commandment. If someone at either age has received the sacraments of the 33 Galatians 5:17.

LATIN

tormenta patiatur. Sufficit enim sola spiritalis regeneratio, ne post mortem obsit quod carnalis generatio cum morte contraxit.

ENGLISH

Mediator, then even if he ends this life in those years, he is transferred, of course, from the power of darkness into the kingdom of Christ. He is not only spared eternal punishment, but does not even suffer any purgatorial torments after death. For spiritual regeneration alone is enough to keep what carnal generation contracted along with death from doing harm after death.[34]

Cum autem uentum fuerit ad aetatem, quae praeceptum iam capit et subdi potest legis imperio, suscipiendum est bellum contra uitia et gerendum acriter, ne ad damnabilia peccata perducat. Et si quidem nondum uictoriarum consuetudine roborata sunt, facilius uincuntur et cedunt; si autem uincere adque imperare consuerunt, laboriosa difficultate superantur. Neque id fit ueraciter adque sinceriter nisi uerae delectatione iustitiae; haec est autem in fide Christi. Nam si lex iubens adsit et spiritus iuuans desit, per ipsam prohibitionem desiderio crescente adque uincente peccati etiam reatus praeuaricationis accedit. Nonnumquam sane apertissima uitia aliis uitiis uincuntur occultis, quae putantur esse uirtutes, in quibus regnat superbia et quaedam sibi placendi altitudo ruinosa.

But when one reaches the age that can now receive a commandment and be subjected to the authority of the law, war must be taken up against the vices and waged fiercely, so that they do not lead on to damnable sins. If the vices have not yet been strengthened by the habit of winning, they are more easily conquered and give way. But if they are used to conquering and ruling, they are overcome only with laborious difficulty. This does not happen truly and sincerely except through delight in true righteousness, and that is found in faith in Christ. For if the law is present to command and the Spirit is absent to help, the very prohibition makes the desire for sin grow and prevail, and the guilt of transgression is added as well. Sometimes, indeed, the most open vices are conquered by other, hidden vices that are thought to be virtues. In these pride reigns, and a kind of lofty self-satisfaction that ends in ruin.

Tunc itaque uicta uitia deputanda sunt, cum Dei amore uincuntur, quem nisi Deus ipse non donat nec aliter nisi per mediatorem Dei et hominum, hominem Christum Iesum, qui factus est particeps mortalitatis nostrae, ut nos participes faceret diuinitatis suae. Paucissimi autem sunt tantae felicitatis, ut ab ipsa ineunte adulescentia nulla damnabilia peccata committant uel in flagitiis uel in facinoribus uel in nefariae cuiusquam inpietatis errore, sed magna spiritus largitate obprimant, quidquid eis posset carnali delectatione dominari. Plurimi uero praecepto legis accepto, cum prius uicti fuerint praeualentibus uitiis et praeuaricatores eius effecti, tunc ad gratiam confugiunt adiuuantem, qua fiant et amarius paenitendo et uehementius pugnando prius Deo subdita adque ita carni praeposita mente uictores.

So vices are to be counted as conquered only when they are conquered by the love of God. That love no one gives but God himself, and he gives it only through the "mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," who became a sharer in our mortality to make us sharers in his divinity. Very few, however, have the great happiness of committing no damnable sins from the very beginning of adolescence—whether shameful acts, or crimes, or the error of some abominable impiety. Such people suppress, by a great generosity of the Spirit, whatever could dominate them through carnal pleasure. Most people, by contrast, receive the commandment of the law and are first conquered by the overpowering vices, becoming transgressors of the law. Then they take refuge in helping grace. Through it they become victors by repenting more bitterly and fighting more vigorously, their mind first subjected to God and so set over the flesh.[35]

34 Romans 9:23; Colossians 1:13.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quisquis igitur cupit poenas euadere sempiternas, non solum baptizetur, uerum etiam iustificetur in Christo, ac sic uere transeat a diabolo ad Christum. Purgatorias autem poenas nullas futuras opinetur, nisi ante illud ultimum tremendumque iudicium. Nequaquam tamen negandum est etiam ipsum aeternum ignem pro diuersitate meritorum quamuis malorum aliis leuiorem, aliis futurum esse grauiorem, siue ipsius uis adque ardor pro poena digna cuiusque uarietur, siue ipse aequaliter ardeat, sed non aequali molestia sentiatur.	Whoever, then, wishes to escape eternal punishment, let him not only be baptized but also be justified in Christ, and so truly pass over from the devil to Christ. And let him not suppose that there will be any purgatorial punishments except before that last and dreadful judgment. Yet it is by no means to be denied that the eternal fire itself will be lighter for some and heavier for others, according to the differences in their deserts, evil though those deserts are. Either its force and heat will vary according to the punishment each one deserves, or it will burn equally but not be felt with equal pain.

THOSE WHO THINK THAT NO ONE'S PUNISHMENT WILL LAST FOREVER

Augustine turns to merciful Christians who deny eternal punishment, and recalls why the Church rejected Origen.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.17 Nunc iam cum misericordibus nostris agendum esse uideo et pacifice disputandum, qui uel omnibus illis hominibus, quos iustissimus iudex dignos gehennae supplicio iudicabit, uel quibusdam eorum nolunt credere poenam sempiternam futuram, sed post certi temporis metas pro cuiusque peccati quantitate longioris siue breuioris eos inde existimant liberandos. Qua in re misericordior profecto fuit Origenes, qui et ipsum diabolum adque angelos eius post grauiora pro meritis et diuturniora supplicia ex illis cruciatibus eruendos et sociandos sanctis angelis credidit.	Now I see that I must deal with our merciful friends and argue with them peaceably. They refuse to believe that punishment will be eternal, either for all those whom the most just Judge will judge worthy of the punishment of hell, or at least for some of them. They think instead that after fixed limits of time, longer or shorter according to the magnitude of each one's sin, these people will be set free from it. On this point Origen was certainly more merciful still. He believed that even the devil himself and his angels, after more severe and longer-lasting punishments, as they deserved, would be rescued from those torments and joined to the holy angels.[36]
Sed illum et propter hoc et propter alia nonnulla et maxime propter alternantes sine cessatione beatitudines et miserias et statutis saeculorum interuallis ab istis ad illas adque ab illis ad istas itus ac reditus interminabiles non inmerito reprobauit ecclesia; quia et hoc, quod misericors uidebatur, amisit faciendo sanctis ueras miserias, quibus poenas luerent, et falsas beatitudines, in quibus uerum ac securum, hoc est sine timore certum, sempiterni boni gaudium non haberent. Longe autem aliter istorum misericordia humano errat adfectu, qui hominum illo iudicio damnatorum miserias temporales, omnium uero qui uel citius uel tardius liberantur aeternam felicitatem putant. Quae sententia si propterea	But the Church has rightly rejected him, both for this and for several other things. It rejected him especially for his endless alternation of happiness and misery, with unending departures and returns from the one to the other and back again at fixed intervals of ages. For he lost even what seemed merciful in his view by giving the saints real miseries, in which to pay penalties, and a false happiness, in which they would not have true and secure joy in eternal good—that is, joy that is certain and free from fear. Quite differently, the mercy of these other people goes astray through human feeling. They suppose that the miseries of those condemned at that judgment are

35 1 Timothy 2:5.

36 Origen (c. AD 185–254) was a Greek Christian theologian and biblical scholar of Alexandria.

LATIN

bona et uera quia misericors est, tanto erit melior et uerior quanto misericordior.

Extendatur ergo ac profundatur fons huius misericordiae usque ad damnatos angelos saltem post multa adque prolixa quantumlibet saecula liberandos. Quur usque uniuersam naturam manat humanam, et cum ad angelicam uentum fuerit, mox arescit? Non audent tamen se ulterius miserando porrigere et ad liberationem ipsius quoque diaboli peruenire. Verum si aliquis audeat, uincit nempe istos. Et tamen tanto inuenitur errare deformius et contra recta Dei uerba peruersius, quanto sibi uidetur sentire clementius.

ENGLISH

temporary, while the happiness of all, who are set free sooner or later, is eternal. Now if this opinion is good and true because it is merciful, then the more merciful it is, the better and truer it will be.

Let the fountain of this mercy, then, be extended and deepened even to the damned angels, so that they too may be freed, at least after as many long ages as you like. Why does it flow as far as the whole of human nature, and then dry up the moment it reaches angelic nature? These people do not dare, however, to stretch their pity any further and reach the liberation of the devil himself. But if someone did dare, he would surely outdo them. And yet he would be found to err all the more grotesquely, and all the more perversely against the right words of God, the more lenient he thinks his view is.

THOSE WHO THINK THAT AT THE LAST JUDGMENT NO ONE WILL BE DAMNED, BECAUSE OF THE INTERCESSION OF THE SAINTS

Some argue the saints' prayers will win pardon for all, citing the psalm and Nineveh's reprieve.

LATIN

21.18 Sunt etiam, quales in conlocutionibus nostris ipse sum expertus, qui, cum uenerari uideantur scripturas sanctas, moribus inprobandi sunt et agendo causam suam multo maiorem quam isti misericordiam Deo tribuunt erga humanum genus. Dicunt enim de malis et infidelibus hominibus diuinitus quidem uerum praedictum esse, quod digni sunt; sed cum ad iudicium uentum fuerit, misericordiam esse superaturam. Donabit enim eos, inquiunt, misericors Deus precibus et intercessionibus sanctorum suorum. Si enim orabant pro illis, quando eos patiebantur inimicos, quanto magis quando uidebunt humiles supplicesque prostratos! Neque enim credendum est, aiunt, tunc amissuros sanctos uiscera misericordiae, cum fuerint plenissimae ac perfectissimae sanctitatis, ut, qui tunc orabant pro inimicis suis, quando et ipsi sine peccato non erant, tunc non orent pro supplicibus suis, quando nullum coeperint habere peccatum.

Aut uero Deus tunc eos non exaudiet tot et tales filios suos, quando in tanta eorum sanctitate nullum inueniet orationis inpedimentum? Testimonium uero psalmi et illi quidem, qui permittunt infideles adque inpios homines saltem longo tempore cruciari et postea de malis

ENGLISH

There are also people—I have met them myself in conversation—who seem to revere the holy Scriptures but whose conduct deserves reproach. Pleading their own cause, they attribute to God a far greater mercy toward the human race than these others do. They say that what God foretold about wicked and unbelieving people is indeed true, since it is what they deserve; but that when it comes to the judgment, mercy will prevail. "For the merciful God," they say, "will pardon them at the prayers and intercessions of his saints. If the saints prayed for them when they had to endure them as enemies, how much more will they pray when they see them lying prostrate, humble and suppliant! Nor are we to believe," they say, "that the saints will lose their heart of mercy at the very time when they are of the fullest and most perfect holiness. Would those who prayed for their enemies back when they themselves were not without sin fail to pray for their suppliants at a time when they no longer have any sin at all?"

"Or will God not listen to so many children of his, and such children, at a time when he finds no obstacle to their prayer in their great holiness?" Then there is the testimony of the psalm. Both those who allow unbelieving and impious people omnibus erui, sed magis isti pro se dicunt esse, ubi legitur: Numquid obliuiscetur misereri Deus aut continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? Ira eius est, inquiunt, ut omnes indigni beatitudine sempiterna ipso iudicante puniantur supplicio sempiterno. Sed si uel longum uel prorsus ullum esse permiserit, profecto, ut possit hoc fieri, continebit in ira sua miserationes suas, quod eum psalmus dicit non esse facturum. Non enim ait: Numquid diu continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? sed quod prorsus non continebit ostendit.

LATIN

Sic ergo isti uolunt iudicii Dei comminationem non esse mendacem, quamuis sit neminem damnaturus, quem ad modum eius comminationem, qua dixit euersurum se esse Nineuen ciuitatem, mendacem non possumus dicere; et tamen factum non est, inquiunt, quod sine ulla condicione praedixit. Non enim ait: Nineue euertetur, si non egerint paenitentiam seque correxerint; sed hoc non addito praenuntiauit futuram euersionem illius ciuitatis. Quam comminationem propterea ueracem putant, quia hoc praedixit Deus quod uere digni erant pati, quamuis hoc non esset ipse facturus. Nam etsi paenitentibus pepercit, inquiunt, utique illos paenitentiam non ignorabat acturos, et tamen absolute ac definite eorum euersionem futuram esse praedixit.

Hoc ergo erat, inquiunt, in ueritate seueritatis, quia id erant digni; sed in ratione miserationis non erat, quam non continuit in ira sua, ut ab ea poena supplicibus parceret, quam fuerat contumacibus comminatus. Sic ergo tunc pepercit, aiunt, quando sanctum suum prophetam fuerat parcendo contristaturus, quanto magis tunc miserabilius supplicantibus parcet, quando ut parcat omnes sancti eius orabunt! Sed hoc, quod ipsi suis cordibus suspicantur, ideo putant scripturas tacuisse diuinas, ut multi se corrigant uel prolixarum uel aeternarum timore poenarum, et sint qui possint orare pro eis, qui non se correxerint; nec tamen opinantur omni modo id eloquia diuina tacuisse.

ENGLISH

to be tormented at least for a long time and then rescued from all evils, and still more these people, claim it supports them. It reads: "Will God forget to be merciful, or will he in his anger hold back his compassion?" "His anger," they say, "would consist in this: that all who are unworthy of eternal happiness should be punished, by his own judgment, with eternal punishment. But if he allows that punishment to last long, or to exist at all, then for this to happen he will be holding back his compassion in his anger—which the psalm says he will not do. For it does not say, 'Will he hold back his compassion in his anger for long?' but shows that he will not hold it back at all."[37]

So these people hold that the threat of God's judgment is not a lie, even though he is going to condemn no one. In the same way we cannot call his threat a lie when he said he would overthrow the city of Nineveh. "And yet," they say, "what he foretold without any condition did not happen. For he did not say, 'Nineveh will be overthrown unless they repent and mend their ways.' Without adding this, he foretold the coming overthrow of that city." They think this threat was truthful because God foretold what the people truly deserved to suffer, even though he himself was not going to do it. "For although he spared them when they repented," they say, "he certainly knew they would repent, and yet he foretold their overthrow absolutely and definitely."[38]

"This, then," they say, "belonged to the truth of his severity, because that is what they deserved. But it did not belong to the reckoning of his compassion, which he did not hold back in his anger, so that he spared the suppliants the punishment with which he had threatened the defiant. If he spared them then," they say, "when by sparing them he was going to grieve his holy prophet, how much more will he spare those who beg still more pitifully at that time, when all his saints will pray that he spare them!" As for what they suspect in their own hearts, they think the divine Scriptures have kept silent about it for a reason. Many are to correct themselves out of fear of punishments either long or eternal, and there are to be people able to pray

37 Psalm 76:10 (77:9 in most English Bibles).
38 Jonah 3:4–10, where the prophet Jonah announces that Nineveh will be overthrown in forty days, and God spares the city when it repents.

LATIN

ENGLISH

for those who have not corrected themselves. Still, they do not think the divine words have been entirely silent about it.

Nam quo pertinet, inquiunt, quod scriptum est: Quam multa multitudo dulcedinis tuae, Domine, quam abscondisti timentibus te, nisi ut intellegamus propter timorem fuisse absconditam misericordiae diuinae tam multam secretamque dulcedinem? Addunt etiam propterea dixisse apostolum: Conclusit enim Deus omnes in infidelitate, ut omnium misereatur, quo significaret, quod ab illo nemo damnabitur. Nec isti tamen, qui hoc sentiunt, hanc opinionem suam usque ad liberationem uel nullam damnationem diaboli adque angelorum eius extendunt; humana quippe circa solos homines mouentur misericordia et causam maxime agunt suam, per generalem in genus humanum quasi Dei miserationem inpunitatem falsam suis perditis moribus pollicentes; ac per hoc superabunt eos in praedicanda Dei misericordia, qui hanc inpunitatem etiam principi daemonum et eius satellitibus pollicentur.

"For what is the point," they say, "of the words 'How great is the abundance of your sweetness, O Lord, which you have hidden from those who fear you,' if not that we should understand that the great and secret sweetness of divine mercy was hidden for the sake of fear?" They add that the apostle said, "For God has shut up all in unbelief, that he may have mercy on all," in order to signify that no one will be condemned by him. Yet even those who hold this view do not extend their opinion to the liberation, or the non-condemnation, of the devil and his angels. They are moved by human mercy toward human beings alone, and they are chiefly pleading their own cause. Through a supposedly general compassion of God toward the human race, they promise a false impunity to their own depraved conduct. And so they will be outdone in proclaiming God's mercy by those who promise this impunity to the prince of demons and his henchmen as well.[39]

THOSE WHO PROMISE FREEDOM FROM PUNISHMENT FOR ALL SINS EVEN TO HERETICS, BECAUSE THEY SHARE IN THE BODY OF CHRIST

Some promise eventual release to everyone baptized who has received Christ's body, however they lived.

LATIN

ENGLISH

21.19 Item sunt alii ab aeterno supplicio liberationem nec ipsis saltem omnibus hominibus promittentes, sed tantummodo Christi baptismate ablutis, qui participes fiunt corporis eius, quomodolibet uixerint, in quacumque haeresi uel inpietate fuerint, propter illud quod ait Iesus: Hic est panis qui de caelo descendit, ut, si quis ex ipso manducauerit, non moriatur. Ego sum panis uiuus, qui de caelo descendi. Si quis manducauerit ex hoc pane, uiuet in aeternum. Ab aeterna ergo morte, inquiunt, necesse est istos erui et ad uitam aeternam quandocumque perduci.

Again, there are others who promise liberation from eternal punishment not even to all human beings, but only to those washed in Christ's baptism who become partakers of his body. This holds, they say, however they may have lived and whatever heresy or impiety they may have fallen into. They base this on what Jesus said: "This is the bread that comes down from heaven, so that anyone who eats of it may not die. I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever." "Therefore," they say, "these people must be rescued from eternal death and at some point brought to eternal life."[40]

39 Psalm 30:20 (31:19 in most English Bibles); Romans 11:32.
40 John 6:50–51.

THOSE WHO PROMISE PARDON NOT TO ALL, BUT ONLY TO THOSE REBORN AMONG CATHOLICS, EVEN IF THEY LATER FALL INTO MANY CRIMES AND ERRORS

Others restrict the promise to Catholics, even if they later fall into heresy or idolatry.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.20	Item sunt, qui hoc nec omnibus habentibus baptismatis Christi et eius corporis sacramentum, sed solis catholicis quamuis male uiuentibus pollicentur, quia non solo sacramento, sed re ipsa manducauerunt corpus Christi, in ipso eius corpore constituti, de quo dicit apostolus: Unus panis, unum corpus multi sumus; ut, etiamsi postea in aliquam haeresim uel etiam in gentilium idolatriam lapsi fuerint, tantum quia in corpore Christi, id est in catholica ecclesia, sumserunt baptismum Christi et manducauerunt corpus Christi, non moriantur in aeternum, sed uitam quandoque consequantur aeternam; adque illa omnis inpietas, quanto maior fuerit, non eis ualeat ad aeternitatem, sed ad diuturnitatem magnitudinemque poenarum.	Again, there are those who promise this not to all who have the sacrament of Christ's baptism and of his body, but only to Catholics, even if they live badly. Their reason is that Catholics have eaten the body of Christ not merely in the sacrament but in reality, since they are placed within his very body, of which the apostle says, "We, though many, are one bread, one body." Consequently, even if such people later fall into some heresy or even into the idolatry of the pagans, simply because they received Christ's baptism and ate Christ's body within the body of Christ—that is, in the Catholic Church—they will not die forever, but will at some time attain eternal life. And all that impiety of theirs, however great it has been, will serve not to make their punishment eternal, but only to make it long and severe.[41]

THOSE WHO DECLARE THAT THOSE WHO REMAIN IN THE CATHOLIC FAITH WILL BE SAVED BECAUSE OF THE FOUNDATION OF FAITH, EVEN IF THEY HAVE LIVED VERY BADLY AND DESERVED TO BE BURNED FOR IT

Others say Catholics who persevere in the Church will be saved through fire on the foundation of Christ.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.21	Sunt autem, qui propter id quod scriptum est: Qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit, non nisi in ecclesia catholica perseuerantibus, quamuis in ea male uiuentibus, hoc promittunt, per ignem uidelicet saluandis merito fundamenti, de quo ait apostolus: Fundamentum enim aliud nemo potest ponere praeter id, quod positum est, quod est Christus Iesus. Si quis autem aedificat super fundamentum aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos, ligna, fenum, stipulam: uniuscuiusque opus manifestabitur; dies enim declarabit, quoniam in igne reuelabitur, et uniuscuiusque opus quale sit ignis probabit. Si cuius opus permanserit quod superaedificauit, mercedem accipiet. Si cuius autem opus arserit, damnum patietur; ipse autem saluus erit, sic tamen quasi per ignem.	There are also those who, because of the text "Whoever perseveres to the end will be saved," promise this only to those who persevere in the Catholic Church, even if they live badly in it. Such people, they hold, are to be saved through fire on the strength of the foundation of which the apostle says: "For no one can lay any other foundation than the one that has been laid, which is Christ Jesus. Now if anyone builds on the foundation with gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, straw, each one's work will become manifest; for the day will disclose it, because it will be revealed by fire, and the fire will test what sort of work each one has done. If anyone's work that he has built on it survives, he will receive a reward. But if anyone's work is burned up, he will suffer loss; he himself will be saved, but only as through fire."[42]

41 1 Corinthians 10:17.
42 Matthew 10:22; 1 Corinthians 3:11–15.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Dicunt ergo cuiuslibet uitae catholicum Christianum Christum habere in fundamento, quod fundamentum nulla haeresis habet a corporis eius unitate praecisa; et ideo propter hoc fundamentum, etiamsi malae uitae fuerit catholicus Christianus, uelut qui superaedificauerit ligna, fenum, stipulam, putant eum saluum fieri per ignem, id est post poenas ignis illius liberari, quo igne in ultimo iudicio punientur mali.	They say, then, that a Catholic Christian, whatever his life, has Christ as his foundation, a foundation that no heresy possesses, since every heresy is cut off from the unity of his body. Therefore, because of this foundation, even if a Catholic Christian has lived a wicked life, like one who has built wood, hay, and straw upon it, they think he will be saved through fire. That is, he will be set free after the punishment of that fire with which the wicked will be punished at the last judgment.

THOSE WHO THINK THE CRIMES COMMITTED ALONG WITH WORKS OF ALMSGIVING WILL NOT BE CALLED TO THE JUDGMENT OF DAMNATION

Others say only those who neglect almsgiving will burn forever, citing James and the Lord's Prayer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.22 Comperi etiam quosdam putare eos tantummodo arsuros illius aeternitate supplicii, qui pro peccatis suis facere dignas elemosynas neglegunt, iuxta illud apostoli Iacobi: Iudicium autem sine misericordia illi, qui non fecit misericordiam. Qui ergo fecit, inquiunt, quamuis mores in melius non mutauerit, sed inter ipsas suas elemosynas nefarie ac nequiter uixerit, iudicium illi cum misericordia futurum est, ut aut nulla damnatione plectatur aut post aliquod tempus siue paruum siue prolixum ab illa damnatione liberetur. Ideo iudicem ipsum uiuorum adque mortuorum noluisse existimant aliud commemorare se esse dicturum siue dextris, quibus est uitam daturus aeternam, siue sinistris, quos aeterno supplicio damnaturus, nisi elemosynas siue factas siue non factas.	I have also found that some think the only people who will burn in that eternal punishment are those who neglect to give alms adequate to their sins. They cite the saying of the apostle James: "Judgment without mercy to the one who has shown no mercy." "So the one who has shown mercy," they say, "will have judgment with mercy, even if he has not changed his ways for the better but has lived wickedly and viciously in the midst of his almsgiving. Either he will suffer no condemnation at all, or he will be freed from that condemnation after some time, short or long." That is why they suppose that the very Judge of the living and the dead chose to mention nothing else that he would say to those on his right, to whom he will give eternal life, or to those on his left, whom he will condemn to eternal punishment, except the alms they had given or failed to give.[43]
Ad hoc pertinere aiunt et in oratione Dominica cottidianam postulationem: Dimitte nobis debita nostra, sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris. Quisquis enim illi, qui in eum peccauit, dimittit ignoscendo peccatum, procul dubio elemosynam facit. Quam rem Dominus ipse sic commendauit, ut diceret: Si enim dimiseritis peccata hominibus, dimittet uobis et pater uester peccata uestra; si autem non dimiseritis hominibus, neque pater uester, qui in caelis est, dimittet uobis. Ergo et ad hoc genus elemosynarum pertinet quod ait apostolus Iacobus iudicium futurum sine misericordia ei, qui non fecit misericordiam. Nec dixit Dominus,	They say that the daily petition in the Lord's Prayer also bears on this: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." For whoever pardons someone who has sinned against him, forgiving the sin, is undoubtedly giving alms. The Lord himself commended this so highly that he said: "For if you forgive people their sins, your Father will also forgive you your sins; but if you do not forgive people, neither will your Father who is in heaven forgive you." So this kind of almsgiving too is covered by what the apostle James says, that there will be judgment without mercy for the one who has shown no mercy. "And the Lord did not say,"

43 James 2:13. The Judge's words to those on his right and left are in the Last Judgment scene of Matthew 25:31–46.

LATIN	ENGLISH
inquiunt, magna uel parua, sed: Dimittet uobis pater uester peccata uestra, si et uos dimiseritis hominibus.	they point out, "'great sins' or 'small ones,' but 'Your Father will forgive you your sins, if you also forgive people.'"[44]
Ac per hoc putant etiam eis, qui perdite uixerint, donec claudant diem uitae huius extremum, per hanc orationem, qualiacumque et quantacumque fuerint, omnia cottidie peccata dimitti, sicut ipsa cottidie frequentatur oratio, si hoc tantummodo custodire meminerint, ut, quando ab eis ueniam petunt, qui eos peccato qualicumque laeserunt, ex corde dimittant. Cum ad haec omnia Deo donante respondero, liber iste claudendus est.	And so they think that even for those who have lived depraved lives right up to the end of their last day in this life, all their sins, whatever their kind and however great, are forgiven daily through this prayer, just as the prayer itself is said daily. There is only one condition: they must remember to forgive from the heart when those who have wronged them by any sin ask their pardon. When, with God's help, I have replied to all these views, this book must be brought to a close.

AGAINST THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO SAY THAT NEITHER THE DEVIL'S PUNISHMENTS NOR THOSE OF WICKED HUMAN BEINGS WILL BE EVERLASTING

Scripture calls the devil's punishment eternal; the same word for humans means it too has no end.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.23 Ac primum quaeri oportet adque cognosci, quur ecclesia ferre nequiuerit hominum disputationem diabolo etiam post maximas et diuturnissimas poenas purgationem uel indulgentiam pollicentem. Neque enim tot sancti et sacris ueteribus ac nouis litteris eruditi mundationem et regni caelorum beatitudinem post qualiacumque et quantacumque supplicia qualibuscumque et quantiscumque angelis inuiderunt, sed potius uiderunt diuinam uacuari uel infirmari non posse sententiam, quam se Dominus praenuntiauit in iudicio prolaturum adque dicturum: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis eius (sic quippe ostendit aeterno igne diabolum et angelos eius arsuros); et quod scriptum est in apocalypsi: Diabolus, qui seducebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuris, quo et bestia et pseudopropheta; et cruciabuntur die ac nocte in saecula saeculorum.	First we must ask and understand why the Church has been unable to tolerate the argument of those who promise the devil purification or pardon, even after the greatest and longest punishments. It was not that so many saints, learned in the sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, begrudged angels of whatever kind and however many their cleansing and the happiness of the kingdom of heaven after punishments of whatever kind and however great. Rather, they saw that the divine sentence cannot be made void or weakened. This is the sentence that the Lord foretold he would pronounce at the judgment: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire that has been prepared for the devil and his angels." (In this way he showed that the devil and his angels will burn in eternal fire.) They also saw what is written in the Apocalypse: "The devil, who deceived them, was cast into the lake of fire and sulfur, where the beast and the false prophet also are; and they will be tormented day and night forever and ever."[45]
Quod ibi dictum est aeternum, hic dictum est in sae, cula saeculorum, quibus uerbis nihil scriptura diuina significare consueuit, nisi quod finem non habet temporis. Quam ob rem prorsus nec alia causa nec iustior adque manifestior inueniri potest, quur uerissima pietate	What is called "eternal" in the first passage is called "forever and ever" in the second, and by these words divine Scripture regularly means nothing other than what has no end in time. Therefore no other reason can be found, and cer-

44 Matthew 6:12; Matthew 6:14–15.
45 Matthew 25:41; Revelation 20:10.

LATIN

teneatur fixum et inmobile nullum regressum ad iustitiam uitamque sanctorum diabolum et angelos eius habituros, nisi quia scriptura, quae neminem fallit, dicit eis Deum non pepercisse, et sic ab illo esse interim praedamnatos, ut carceribus caliginis inferi retrusi traderentur seruandi adque ultimo iudicio puniendi, quando eos aeternus ignis accipiet, ubi cruciabuntur in saecula saeculorum.

Quod si ita est, quo modo ab huius aeternitate poenae uel uniuersi uel quidam homines post quantumlibet temporis subtrahentur, ac non statim eneruabitur fides, qua creditur sempiternum daemonum futurum esse supplicium? Si enim quibus dicetur: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis eius, uel uniuersi uel aliqui eorum non semper ibi erunt, quid causae est quur diabolus et angeli eius semper ibi futuri esse credantur? An forte Dei sententia, quae in malos et angelos et homines proferetur, in angelos uera erit, in homines falsa? Ita plane hoc erit, si non quod Deus dixit, sed quod suspicantur homines plus ualebit.

Quod fieri quia non potest, non argumentari aduersus Deum, sed diuino potius, dum tempus est, debent parere praecepto, qui sempiterno cupiunt carere supplicio. Deinde quale est aeternum supplicium pro igne diuturni temporis existimare et uitam aeternam credere sine fine, cum Christus eodem ipso loco, in una eademque sententia dixerit utrumque conplexus: Sic ibunt isti in supplicium aeternum, iusti autem in uitam aeternam? Si utrumque aeternum, profecto aut utrumque cum fine diuturnum aut utrumque sine fine perpetuum debet intellegi. Par pari enim relata sunt, hinc supplicium aeternum, inde uita aeterna. Dicere autem in hoc uno eodemque sensu: Vita aeterna sine fine erit, supplicium aeternum finem habebit multum absurdum est.

ENGLISH

tainly no juster or clearer one, why true piety holds it fixed and immovable that the devil and his angels will never return to the righteousness and life of the saints. The reason is simply that Scripture, which deceives no one, says that God did not spare them. Scripture also says that he has meanwhile condemned them in advance, so that they were thrust down into the prisons of the darkness of the underworld and handed over to be kept there and punished at the last judgment. Then the eternal fire will receive them, and there they will be tormented forever and ever.[46]

If this is so, how can all human beings, or some of them, be withdrawn from the eternity of this punishment after however long a time, without at once weakening the faith by which we believe that the punishment of demons will be everlasting? For if all or some of those to whom it will be said, "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire that has been prepared for the devil and his angels," will not be there forever, what reason is there to believe that the devil and his angels will be there forever? Or will God's sentence, pronounced against wicked angels and wicked human beings alike, perhaps be true for the angels and false for the humans? Plainly it will be so, if what humans suspect counts for more than what God has said.

Since that cannot happen, those who want to escape everlasting punishment ought not to argue against God. They ought rather to obey the divine command while there is still time. Next, what sort of reasoning is it to take eternal punishment to mean fire lasting a long time, and yet to believe that eternal life is without end? For Christ, in the very same place and in one and the same sentence, included both when he said: "So these will go into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." If both are eternal, then surely both must be understood either as long-lasting but with an end, or as perpetual and without end. Like has been set beside like: on one side eternal punishment, on the other eternal life. But to say, in one and the same sense, "Eternal life will be without end, but eternal punishment will have an end," is utterly absurd.[47]

46 An allusion to 2 Peter 2:4.
47 Matthew 25:46.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Unde, quia uita aeterna sanctorum sine fine erit, supplicium quoque aeternum quibus erit finem procul dubio non habebit.	Therefore, since the eternal life of the saints will be without end, eternal punishment too will undoubtedly have no end for those who suffer it.

AGAINST THE VIEW OF THOSE WHO THINK THAT AT GOD'S JUDGMENT ALL THE GUILTY WILL BE SPARED BECAUSE OF THE PRAYERS OF THE SAINTS

At the judgment the saints will not pray for the damned, as the Church never prays for the devil.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.24 Hoc autem et aduersus eos ualet, qui suas agentes causas contra Dei uenire uerba uelut misericordia maiore conantur, ut ideo uidelicet uera sint, quia ea, quae dixit homines esse passuros, pati digni sunt, non quia passuri sunt. Donabit enim eos, inquiunt, precibus sanctorum suorum, etiam tunc tanto magis orantium pro inimicis suis, quanto sunt utique sanctiores, eorumque efficacior est oratio et exauditione Dei dignior, iam nullum habentium omnino peccatum. Quur ergo eadem perfectissima sanctitate et cuncta inpetrare ualentibus mundissimis et misericordissimis precibus etiam pro angelis non orabunt, quibus paratus est ignis aeternus, ut Deus sententiam suam mitiget et reflectat in melius eosque ab illo igne faciat alienos?	This argument also holds against those who plead their own cause and try to oppose God's words with what seems a greater mercy. Their view, of course, is that those words are true in the sense that people deserve to suffer what God said they would suffer, not in the sense that they will actually suffer it. "For he will pardon them," they say, "in answer to the prayers of his saints. The holier the saints are then, the more they will pray for their enemies, and their prayer will be all the more effective and worthy of God's hearing because they will no longer have any sin at all." Why, then, will the saints not pray also for the angels for whom eternal fire has been prepared? They will have that same most perfect holiness, and their most pure and most merciful prayers will be able to obtain everything. Why will they not pray that God may soften his sentence, bend it toward something better, and put those angels beyond the reach of that fire?
An erit forsitan quisquam, qui et hoc futurum esse praesumat adfirmans etiam sanctos angelos simul cum sanctis hominibus, qui tunc aequales erunt angelis Dei, pro damnandis et angelis et hominibus oraturos, ut misericordia non patiantur, quod ueritate merentur pati? Quod nemo sanae fidei dixit, nemo dicturus est. Alioquin nulla causa est, quur non etiam nunc pro diabolo et angelis eius oret ecclesia, quam magister Deus pro inimicis suis iussit orare. Haec igitur causa, qua fit ut nunc ecclesia non oret pro malis angelis, quos suos esse nouit inimicos, eadem ipsa causa est, qua fiet ut in illo tunc iudicio etiam pro hominibus aeterno igne cruciandis, quamuis perfecta sit sanctitate, non oret.	Will there perhaps be someone who presumes that even this will happen? He would claim that the holy angels too, together with holy human beings, who will then be equal to the angels of God, will pray for the angels and humans who are to be damned, so that by mercy they may escape what by truth they deserve to suffer. No one of sound faith has ever said this, and no one ever will. Otherwise there would be no reason why the Church should not pray even now for the devil and his angels, since God her teacher has commanded her to pray for her enemies. So the reason why the Church does not now pray for the evil angels, whom she knows to be her enemies, is the very same reason why at that judgment she will not pray even for the human beings who are to be tormented in eternal fire, though she will then be perfect in holiness.
Nunc enim propterea pro eis orat, quos in genere humano habet inimicos, quia tempus est paenitentiae	She prays now for those of the human race whom she has as enemies precisely because this is the fructuosae. Nam quid maxime pro eis orat, nisi ut det illis Deus, sicut dicit apostolus, paenitentiam et resipiscant de diaboli laqueis, a quo captiui tenentur secundum ipsius uoluntatem? Denique si de aliquibus ita certa esset, ut qui sint illi etiam nosset, qui licet adhuc in hac uita sint constituti, tamen praedestinati sunt in aeternum ignem ire cum diabolo: tam pro eis non oraret, quam nec pro ipso. Sed quia de nullo certa est, orat pro omnibus dumtaxat hominibus inimicis suis in hoc corpore constitutis; nec tamen pro omnibus exauditur.

LATIN

ENGLISH

time when repentance bears fruit. For what does she chiefly pray for on their behalf, if not that God may grant them repentance, as the apostle says, and that they may come to their senses and escape the snares of the devil, who holds them captive to his will? Indeed, suppose she were so certain about some people that she even knew who they were: people who are still in this life, yet are predestined to go into eternal fire with the devil. She would no more pray for them than for him. But because she is certain about no one, she prays for all her enemies, though only for human beings still living in this body. Yet she is not heard for all of them.[48]

Pro his enim solis exauditur, qui, etsi aduersantur ecclesiae, ita sunt tamen praedestinati, ut pro eis exaudiatur ecclesia et filii efficiantur ecclesiae. Si qui autem usque ad mortem habebunt cor inpaenitens nec ex inimicis conuertentur in filios, numquid tamen pro eis, id est pro talium defunctorum spiritibus, orat ecclesia? Quid ita, nisi quia in parte iam diaboli conputatur, qui cum esset in corpore non est translatus ad Christum?

She is heard only for those who, though they oppose the Church, are nevertheless predestined in such a way that the Church is heard for them and they become children of the Church. But if some keep an unrepentant heart until death and are not converted from enemies into children, the Church does not still pray for them, does she—that is, for the spirits of such people after their death? And why is that, if not because anyone who was not brought over to Christ while he was in the body is now counted as belonging to the devil's side?

Eadem itaque causa est, quur non oretur tunc pro hominibus aeterno igne puniendis, quae causa est, ut neque nunc neque tunc oretur pro angelis malis; quae itidem causa est, ut, quamuis pro hominibus, tamen iam nec nunc oretur pro infidelibus inpiisque defunctis. Nam pro defunctis quibusdam uel ipsius ecclesiae uel quorundam piorum exauditur oratio, sed pro his, quorum in Christo regeneratorum nec usque adeo uita in corpore male gesta est, ut tali misericordia iudicentur digni non esse, nec usque adeo bene, ut talem misericordiam reperiantur necessariam non habere; sicut etiam facta resurrectione mortuorum non deerunt, quibus post poenas, quas patiuntur spiritus mortuorum, inpertiatur misericordia, ut in ignem non mittantur aeternum.

So the reason why no prayer will be offered then for the human beings who are to be punished in eternal fire is the same reason why no prayer is offered for the evil angels, either now or then. It is likewise the reason why, even now, no prayer is offered for unbelievers and the ungodly who have died, even though they are human beings. For the prayer of the Church itself, or of certain devout people, is indeed heard on behalf of some of the dead. But it is heard for those who have been reborn in Christ and whose life in the body was neither so bad that they are judged unworthy of such mercy, nor so good that they are found not to need it. In the same way, even after the resurrection of the dead has taken place, there will be some to whom mercy is granted after the punishments that the spirits of the dead suffer, so that they are not sent into eternal fire.

Neque enim de quibusdam ueraciter diceretur, quod non eis remittatur neque in hoc saeculo neque in futuro, nisi essent quibus, etsi non in isto, tamen remittitur in futuro. Sed cum dictum fuerit a iudice uiuorum adque

It would not truly be said of some that they will be forgiven neither in this age nor in the age to come, unless there were others who, though not forgiven

48 2 Timothy 2:25–26.

LATIN

mortuorum: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum a constitutione mundi, et aliis e contrario: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis eius, et ierint isti in supplicium aeternum, iusti autem in uitam aeternam: nimiae praesumtionis est dicere cuiquam eorum aeternum supplicium non futurum, quos Deus ituros in supplicium dixit aeternum, et per huius praesumtionis persuasionem facere, ut de ipsa quoque uita uel desperetur uel dubitetur aeterna.

Nemo itaque sic intellegat psalmum canentem: Numquid obliuiscetur misereri Deus, aut continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? ut opinetur de hominibus bonis ueram, de malis falsam, aut de bonis hominibus et malis angelis ueram, de malis autem hominibus falsam Dei esse sententiam. Hoc enim, quod ait psalmus, ad uasa misericordiae pertinet et ad filios promissionis, quorum erat unus etiam ipse pro pheta, qui cum dixisset: Numquid obliuiscetur misereri Deus aut continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? continuo subiecit: Et dixi: Nunc coepi, haec est inmutatio dexterae Excelsi. Exposuit profecto quid dixerit: Numquid continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? Ira enim Dei est etiam ista uita mortalis, ubi homo uanitati similis factus est: dies eius uelut umbra praetereunt.

In qua tamen ira non obliuiscitur misereri Deus, faciendo solem suum oriri super bonos et malos et pluendo super iustos et iniustos, ac sic non continet in ira sua miserationes suas; maximeque in eo, quod expressit hic psalmus dicendo: Nunc coepi, haec est inmutatio dexterae Excelsi, quoniam in hac ipsa aerumnosissima uita, quae ira Dei est, uasa misericordiae mutat in melius, quamuis adhuc in huius corruptionis miseria maneat ira eius, quia nec in ipsa ira sua continet miserationes suas. Cum ergo isto modo conpleatur diuini illius cantici ueritas, non est eam necesse etiam illic intellegi, ubi non pertinentes ad ciuitatem Dei sempiterno supplicio punientur.

ENGLISH

in this age, are forgiven in the age to come. But the judge of the living and the dead will say, "Come, you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," and to the others, by contrast, "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire that has been prepared for the devil and his angels." And these will go into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life. When all this has happened, it is excessive presumption to say that eternal punishment will not come to any of those of whom God has said that they will go into eternal punishment. It is excessive presumption, too, to persuade people of this, and so to make them either despair of eternal life itself or doubt it.[49]

So let no one take the psalm that sings, "Will God forget to be merciful, or will he hold back his compassion in his anger?" as if God's sentence were true of good people and false of bad ones, or true of good people and evil angels but false of evil people. What the psalm says concerns the vessels of mercy and the children of the promise, and the prophet himself was one of them. Having said, "Will God forget to be merciful, or will he hold back his compassion in his anger?" he went on at once: "And I said: Now I have begun; this is the change worked by the right hand of the Most High." He has surely explained what he meant by "Will he hold back his compassion in his anger?" For this mortal life too is God's anger, the life in which "man has become like emptiness; his days pass away like a shadow."[50]

Yet in this anger God does not forget to be merciful. He makes his sun rise on the good and the bad and sends rain on the just and the unjust, and so he does not hold back his compassion in his anger. He shows this most of all in what the psalm expressed by saying, "Now I have begun; this is the change worked by the right hand of the Most High." For in this very life, so full of hardship, which is God's anger, he changes the vessels of mercy for the better, even though his anger still remains in the misery of this corruption; for even in his anger he does not hold back his compassion. Since the truth of that divine song is fulfilled in this way, there is no need to understand it as ap-

49 Matthew 12:32; Matthew 25:34.
50 Psalm 76:11 (77:10 in most English Bibles); Psalm 143:4 (144:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

plying also to the place where those who do not belong to the city of God will be punished with everlasting punishment.[51]

Sed quibus placet istam sententiam usque ad illa inpiorum tormenta protendere, saltem sic intellegant, ut manente in eis ira Dei, quae in aeterno est praenuntiata supplicio, non contineat Deus in hac ira sua miserationes suas et faciat eos non tanta quanta digni sunt poenarum atrocitate cruciari; non ut eas poenas uel numquam subeant uel aliquando finiant, sed ut eas mitiores quam merita sunt eorum leuioresque patiantur. Sic enim et ira Dei manebit, et in ipsa ira sua miserationes suas non continebit. Quod quidem non ideo confirmo, quoniam non resisto.

But those who like to stretch this text to cover the torments of the ungodly should at least understand it this way. God's anger, which has been foretold as eternal punishment, remains upon them; yet in this anger of his God does not hold back his compassion, and he causes them to be tormented with a severity of punishment less than they deserve. This would not mean that they never undergo these punishments or that the punishments ever come to an end, but that they suffer them in a milder and lighter form than their deserts. In this way God's anger will remain, and yet in that very anger he will not hold back his compassion. I do not affirm this, however, merely because I do not oppose it.

THREATS THAT CAME TRUE

God's threats are true: Nineveh was overturned in its wickedness; the hidden sweetness belongs to those who hope.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Ceterum eos, qui putant minaciter potius quam ueraciter dictum: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, et: Ibunt isti in supplicium aeternum, et: Cruciabuntur in saecula saeculorum, et: Vermis eorum non morietur et ignis non exstinguetur, et cetera huius modi, non tam ego, quam ipsa scriptura diuina planissime adque plenissime redarguit ac refellit. Nineuitae quippe in hac uita egerunt paenitentiam et ideo fructuosam, uelut in hoc agro seminantes, in quo Deus uoluit cum lacrimis seminari, quod postea cum laetitia meteretur; et tamen quis negabit, quod Dominus praedixit in eis fuisse conpletum, nisi parum aduertat, quem ad modum peccatores Deus non solum iratus, uerum etiam miseratus euertat?

Some think that these things were said as threats rather than as truth: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire," and "These will go into eternal punishment," and "They will be tormented forever and ever," and "Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be quenched," and other sayings of this kind. It is not so much I as divine Scripture itself that refutes and disproves them, most plainly and most fully. The Ninevites repented in this life, and their repentance therefore bore fruit. They were sowing, as it were, in this field, where God willed that there be sowing with tears, so that later there might be reaping with joy. And yet who will deny that what the Lord foretold was fulfilled in them? Only someone who pays too little attention to how God overturns sinners, not only in anger but also in mercy.[52]

Euertuntur enim peccatores duobus modis, aut sicut Sodomitae, ut pro peccatis suis ipsi homines puniantur, aut sicut Nineuitae, ut ipsa hominum peccata paenitendo destruantur. Factum est ergo quod praedixit Deus; euersa est Nineue quae mala erat, et bona aedificata est quae non erat. Stantibus enim moenibus adque domibus Sinners are overturned in two ways. Either they are overturned like the people of Sodom, so that the people themselves are punished for their sins, or like the Ninevites, so that the people's sins themselves are destroyed by repentance. So what God foretold did take place: the Nineveh that was

51 Matthew 5:45.

52 Isaiah 66:24 (quoted in Mark 9:48); the sowing image is from Psalm 125:5 (126:5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

euersa est ciuitas in perditis moribus. Ac sic, quamuis propheta fuerit contristatus, quia non est factum quod illi homines timuerunt illo prophetante uenturum, factum est tamen quod fuerat Deo praesciente praedictum, quoniam nouerat qui praedixit, quo modo in melius esset inplendum.

Ut autem nouerint isti in peruersum misericordes quo pertineat quod scriptum est: Quam multa multitudo dulcedinis tuae, Domine, quam abscondisti timentibus te! legant quod sequitur: Perfecisti autem sperantibus in te. Quid est abscondisti timentibus, perfecisti sperantibus, nisi quia illis, qui timore poenarum suam iustitiam uolunt constituere quae in lege est, non est iustitia Dei dulcis, quia nesciunt eam? Non enim gustauerunt eam. In se namque sperant, non in ipso, et ideo eis absconditur multitudo dulcedinis Dei; quoniam timent quidem Deum, sed illo timore seruili, qui non est in caritate, quia perfecta caritas foras mittit timorem. Ideo sperantibus in eum perficit dulcedinem suam inspirando eis caritatem suam, ut timore casto, non quem caritas foras mittit, sed permanente in saeculum saeculi, cum gloriantur, in Domino glorientur.

Iustitia quippe Dei Christus est, qui factus est nobis, sicut dicit apostolus, sapientia a Deo et iustitia et sanctificatio et redemtio, ut, quem ad modum scriptum est, qui gloriatur, in Domino glorietur. Hanc Dei iustitiam, quam donat gratia sine meritis, nesciunt illi, qui suam iustitiam uolunt constituere, et ideo iustitiae Dei, quod est Christus, non sunt subiecti. In qua iustitia est multa multitudo dulcedinis Dei, propter quam dicitur in psalmo: Gustate et uidete quam dulcis est Dominus. Et hanc quidem in hac peregrinatione gustantes, non ad satietatem sumentes, esurimus eam potius ac sitimus, ut ea postea saturemur, cum uidebimus eum, sicuti est, et inplebitur quod scriptum est: Saturabor, cum evil was overturned, and a good Nineveh, which had not existed, was built. For while the walls and houses stood, the city was overturned in its depraved ways. And so, although the prophet was grieved because what those people had feared from his prophecy did not happen, what God in his foreknowledge had foretold did happen. For he who foretold it knew how it was to be fulfilled for the better.[53]

ENGLISH

These people, merciful in a perverse way, should learn what is meant by the text, "How great is the abundance of your sweetness, Lord, which you have hidden from those who fear you!" Let them read what follows: "But you have brought it to perfection for those who hope in you." What does it mean—"you have hidden it from those who fear," "you have brought it to perfection for those who hope"—except this? To those who, out of fear of punishment, want to establish their own righteousness, the righteousness that is in the law, the righteousness of God is not sweet, because they do not know it. They have not tasted it. They hope in themselves, not in him, and so the abundance of God's sweetness is hidden from them. They do indeed fear God, but with that servile fear which has no place in love, since "perfect love casts out fear." Therefore he brings his sweetness to perfection for those who hope in him by breathing his love into them. So with a chaste fear—not the fear that love casts out, but the fear that endures forever and ever—when they boast, they may boast in the Lord.[54]

For the righteousness of God is Christ, who, as the apostle says, "has been made for us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption, so that, as it is written, 'Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord.'" This righteousness of God, which grace bestows without any merits, is unknown to those who want to establish their own righteousness, and so they have not submitted to the righteousness of God, which is Christ. In this righteousness lies the great abundance of God's sweetness, and on account of it the psalm says: "Taste and see how sweet the Lord is." In this pilgrimage we taste this sweetness without taking our fill of it, and so we hunger and thirst for it all 53 Jonah had proclaimed, "Nineveh shall be overturned" (Jonah 3:4); Augustine plays on the word.

54 1 John 4:18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
manifestabitur gloria tua. Ita perficit Christus multam multitudinem dulcedinis suae sperantibus in eum.	the more, in order to be filled with it afterward. That will be when we see him as he is, and what is written will be fulfilled: "I shall be satisfied when your glory is revealed." In this way Christ brings the great abundance of his sweetness to perfection for those who hope in him.[55]
Porro autem si eam, quam illi putant, dulcedinem suam Deus abscondit timentibus eum, qua non est inpios damnaturus, ut hoc nescientes et damnari timentes recte uiuant ac sic possint esse qui orent pro non recte uiuentibus: quo modo eam perficit sperantibus in eum, quando quidem, sicut somniant, per hanc dulcedinem non damnaturus est eos, qui non sperant in eum? Illa igitur eius dulcedo quaeratur, quam perficit sperantibus in eum, non quam perficere putatur contemnentibus et blasphemantibus eum. Frustra itaque homo post hoc corpus inquirit, quod in hoc corpore sibi conparare neglexit.	Moreover, these people imagine a sweetness of God by which he will not damn the ungodly, and they suppose that he hides it from those who fear him, so that, not knowing this and fearing damnation, they may live rightly and so there may be people to pray for those who do not live rightly. But if that is so, how does he bring this sweetness to perfection for those who hope in him, when, as they dream, by this sweetness he will not damn those who do not hope in him? Let us seek, then, that sweetness of his which he brings to perfection for those who hope in him, not the one he is supposed to bring to perfection for those who despise and blaspheme him. It is in vain, therefore, that anyone seeks after this body what he neglected to obtain for himself while in this body.
Illud quoque apostolicum: Conclusit enim Deus omnes in infidelitate, ut omnium misereatur, non ideo dictum est, quod sit neminem damnaturus, sed superius apparet unde sit dictum. Nam cum de Iudaeis postea crediturus apostolus loqueretur ad gentes, ad quas utique iam credentes conscribebat epistulas: Sicut enim uos, inquit, aliquando non credidistis Deo, nunc autem misericordiam consecuti estis illorum incredulitate: sic et hi nunc non crediderunt in uestram misericordiam, ut et ipsi misericordiam consequantur. Deinde subiecit, unde isti sibi errando blandiuntur, adque ait: Conclusit enim Deus omnes in infidelitate, ut omnium misereatur. Quos omnes, nisi de quibus loquebatur, tamquam dicens: Et uos et illos?	Again, the apostle's saying, "For God has shut up all in unbelief, so that he may have mercy on all," was not said to mean that he will damn no one. What precedes makes clear why it was said. The apostle was speaking about the Jews who would later believe, and he was addressing the Gentiles, who were already believers and to whom, of course, he was writing his letter. He said: "For just as you once did not believe God, but now have obtained mercy through their unbelief, so they too have now not believed, for the sake of your mercy, so that they also may obtain mercy." Then he added the words with which these people, in their error, flatter themselves: "For God has shut up all in unbelief, so that he may have mercy on all." Who are these "all," if not the ones he was speaking of, as if he were saying, "both you and them"?[56]
Deus ergo et gentiles et Iudaeos, quos praesciuit et praedestinauit conformes imaginis filii sui, omnes in infidelitate conclusit, ut de amaritudine infidelitatis suae paenitendo confusi et ad dulcedinem misericordiae Dei credendo conuersi clamarent illud in psalmo: Quam multa multitudo dulcedinis tuae, Domine, quam abscondisti timentibus te, perfecisti autem sperantibus,	So God shut up all in unbelief—both Gentiles and Jews whom he foreknew and predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son—so that, put to shame by repenting of the bitterness of their unbelief and turned by faith to the sweetness of God's mercy, they might cry out the words of the psalm: "How great is the abundance of your sweet-

55 1 Corinthians 1:30–31; Psalm 33:9 (34:8 in most English Bibles); Psalm 16:15 (17:15 in most English Bibles).
56 Romans 11:30–32.

LATIN	ENGLISH
non in se, sed in te! Omnium itaque miseretur uasorum misericordiae. Quid est omnium? Et eorum scilicet quos ex gentibus, et eorum quos ex Iudaeis praedestinauit uocauit, iustificauit glorificauit, non hominum omnium, sed istorum omnium neminem damnaturus.	ness, Lord, which you have hidden from those who fear you, but have brought to perfection for those who hope"—not in themselves, but "in you!" So he has mercy on all the vessels of mercy. What does "all" mean? Clearly, both those from the Gentiles and those from the Jews whom he predestined, called, justified and glorified. He will damn none of these—not none of all human beings, but none of all these.[57]

WHETHER THOSE BAPTIZED AMONG HERETICS WHO LATER BECAME WORSE BY LIVING BADLY, OR THOSE REBORN AMONG CATHOLICS WHO WENT OVER TO HERESIES OR SCHISMS, OR THOSE WHO, REBORN AMONG CATHOLICS AND NOT LEAVING THEM, PERSISTED IN LIVING CRIMINALLY, CAN HOPE BY THE PRIVILEGE OF THE SACRAMENTS TO BE SPARED ETERNAL PUNISHMENT

Paul's list of the works of the flesh refutes promises of the kingdom to the wicked baptized.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.25 Sed iam respondeamus etiam illis, qui non solum diabolo et angelis eius, sicut nec isti, sed ne ipsis quidem omnibus hominibus liberationem ab aeterno igne promittunt, uerum eis tantum, qui Christi baptismate abluti et corporis eius et sanguinis participes facti sunt, quomodolibet uixerint, in quacumque haeresi uel inpietate fuerint. Sed contradicit eis apostolus dicens: Manifesta autem sunt opera carnis, quae sunt fornicatio, inmunditia, luxuria, idolorum seruitus, ueneficia, inimicitiae, contentiones, aemulationes, animositates, dissensiones, haereses, inuidiae, ebrietates, comisationes et his similia; quae praedico uobis, sicut praedixi, quoniam qui talia agunt regnum Dei non possidebunt. Haec profecto apostolica falsa sententia est, si tales post quantalibet tempora liberati regnum Dei possidebunt. Sed quoniam falsa non est, profecto regnum Dei non possidebunt.	But now let us reply also to those who promise deliverance from eternal fire not to the devil and his angels (nor do those we have just answered), and not even to all human beings, but only to those who have been washed in Christ's baptism and made partakers of his body and blood, however they may have lived and whatever heresy or ungodliness they may have fallen into. The apostle contradicts them, saying: "Now the works of the flesh are plain: they are fornication, impurity, debauchery, idolatry, sorcery, enmities, quarrels, jealousies, fits of anger, dissensions, heresies, envy, drunkenness, carousing and things like these. I warn you, as I warned you before, that those who do such things will not possess the kingdom of God." This sentence of the apostle is certainly false if such people, set free after however long a time, will possess the kingdom of God. But since it is not false, they certainly will not possess the kingdom of God.[58]
Et si in regni Dei possessione numquam erunt, aeterno supplicio tenebuntur; quoniam non est medius locus, ubi non sit in supplicio, qui illo non fuerit constitutus in regno.	And if they are never to possess the kingdom of God, they will be held in eternal punishment. For there is no middle place where anyone who has not been placed in that kingdom is not in punishment.
Quam ob rem quod ait Dominus Iesus: Hic est panis qui de caelo descendit, ut, si quis ex ipso manducauerit, non moriatur. Ego sum panis uiuus, qui de caelo descendi; si quis manducauerit ex hoc pane, uiuet in aeternum, quo	Therefore it is right to ask how we should take what the Lord Jesus says: "This is the bread that comes down from heaven, so that if anyone eats of it he will not die. I am the living bread that came

57 Romans 8:29–30.
58 Galatians 5:19–21.

LATIN

modo sit accipiendum, merito quaeritur. Et ab istis quidem, quibus nunc respondemus, hunc intellectum auferunt illi, quibus deinde respondendum est; hi sunt autem, qui hanc liberationem nec omnibus habentibus sacramentum baptismatis et corporis Christi, sed solis catholicis, quamuis male uiuentibus, pollicentur, quia non solo, inquiunt, sacramento, sed re ipsa manducauerunt corpus Christi, in ipso scilicet eius corpore constituti; de quo corpore ait apostolus: Unus panis, unum corpus multi sumus.

Qui ergo est in eius corporis unitate, id est in Christianorum conpage membrorum, cuius corporis sacramentum fideles communicantes de altari sumere consuerunt, ipse uere dicendus est manducare corpus Christi et bibere sanguinem Christi. Ac per hoc haeretici et schismatici ab huius unitate corporis separati possunt idem percipere sacramentum, sed non sibi utile, immo uero etiam noxium, quo iudicentur grauius, quam uel tardius liberentur. Non sunt quippe in eo uinculo pacis, quod illo exprimitur sacramento.

Sed rursus etiam isti, qui recte intellegunt, non dicendum esse manducare corpus Christi, qui in corpore non est Christi, non recte promittunt eis, qui uel in haeresim uel etiam in gentilium superstitionem ex illius corporis unitate labuntur, liberationem quandoque ab aeterni igne supplicii; primum, quia debent adtendere, quam sit intolerabile adque a sana doctrina nimis deuium, ut multi ac paene omnes, qui haereses inpias condiderunt exeuntes de catholica ecclesia et facti sunt haeresiarchae, meliores habeant causas, quam hi, qui numquam fuerunt catholici, cum in eorum laqueos incidissent, si illos haeresiarchas hoc facit liberari a supplicio sempiterno, quod in catholica ecclesia baptizati sunt et sacramentum corporis Christi in uero Christi corpore primitus acceperunt; cum peior sit utique desertor fidei et ex desertore obpugnator eius effectus quam ille, qui non deseruit quod numquam tenuit; deinde quia et his occurrit apostolus eadem uerba proferens et enumeratis illis carnis operibus eadem ueritate praedicens: Quoniam qui talia agunt, regnum Dei non possidebunt.

ENGLISH

down from heaven; if anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever." This interpretation, indeed, is taken away from those we are now answering by those whom we must answer next. These are the people who promise this deliverance not to all who have the sacrament of baptism and of the body of Christ, but only to Catholics, even if they live badly. For these, they say, have eaten the body of Christ not only in the sacrament but in reality, since they are placed within his very body—the body of which the apostle says, "We, though many, are one bread, one body."[59]

Whoever, then, is in the unity of his body—that is, in the fellowship of Christian members joined together, the body whose sacrament the faithful are accustomed to receive from the altar when they take communion—is the one who should truly be said to eat the body of Christ and drink the blood of Christ. And so heretics and schismatics, cut off from the unity of this body, can receive the same sacrament, but it does them no good. On the contrary, it actually harms them, so that they are judged more severely rather than set free, however late. For they are not in that bond of peace which that sacrament expresses.

But then again, these people too, who rightly understand that one who is not in the body of Christ should not be said to eat the body of Christ, are wrong to promise eventual deliverance from the fire of eternal punishment to those who slip away from the unity of that body into heresy, or even into the superstition of the pagans. First, they ought to consider how intolerable it is, and how far it strays from sound doctrine, that many, indeed nearly all, of those who left the Catholic Church, founded ungodly heresies and became leaders of heresies, should have a better case than those who were never Catholics but fell into their snares. Yet this follows, if what delivers those leaders of heresies from everlasting punishment is that they were baptized in the Catholic Church and first received the sacrament of the body of Christ in the true body of Christ. Surely a deserter of the faith, who has gone from deserter to assailant, is worse than one who did not desert what he never held. Second, the apostle confronts these people too, using the same words; after listing 59 John 6:50–51; 1 Corinthians 10:17.

LATIN

ENGLISH

those works of the flesh, he foretells with the same truth: "Those who do such things will not possess the kingdom of God."

Unde nec illi in perditis et damnabilibus moribus debent esse securi, qui usque in finem quidem uelut in communione ecclesiae catholicae perseuerant, intuentes quod dictum est: Qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit, et per uitae iniquitatem ipsam uitae iustitiam, quod eis Christus est, deserunt, siue fornicando siue alias inmunditias flagitiorum, quas nec exprimere apostolus uoluit, in suo corpore perpetrando, siue turpitudine luxuriae diffluendo siue aliquid aliud eorum agendo, de quibus ait: Quoniam qui talia agunt, regnum Dei non possidebunt; ac per hoc, quicumque agunt talia, nisi in sempiterno supplicio non erunt, quia in Dei regno esse non poterunt.

Hence even those who, to all appearances, persevere to the end in the communion of the Catholic Church should not feel secure in depraved and damnable ways of life. They look to the saying, "Whoever perseveres to the end will be saved," and yet through the wickedness of their lives they abandon the very righteousness of life, which Christ is for them. They do so by fornication, or by committing in their own body other impure vices which the apostle did not even want to name, or by dissolving in shameful debauchery, or by doing any other of those things of which he says, "Those who do such things will not possess the kingdom of God." And therefore all who do such things will be nowhere but in everlasting punishment, since they cannot be in the kingdom of God.[60]

In his enim perseuerando usque in huius uitae finem non utique dicendi sunt in Christo perseuerasse usque in finem, quia in Christo perseuerare est in eius fide perseuerare; quae fides, ut eam definit idem apostolus, per dilectionem operatur; dilectio autem, sicut ipse alibi dicit, malum non operatur. Nec isti ergo dicendi sunt manducare corpus Christi, quoniam nec in membris conputandi sunt Christi. Ut enim alia taceam, non possunt simul esse et membra Christi et membra meretricis. Denique ipse dicit: Qui manducat carnem meam et bibit sanguinem meum, in me manet, et ego in eo. Ostendit quid sit non sacramento tenus, sed re uera corpus Christi manducare et eius sanguinem bibere; hoc est enim in Christo manere, ut in illo maneat et Christus.

For by persevering in these things until the end of this life, they certainly cannot be said to have persevered in Christ to the end. To persevere in Christ is to persevere in faith in him; and that faith, as the same apostle defines it, works through love; and love, as he says elsewhere, does no evil. So these people should not be said to eat the body of Christ either, since they are not even to be counted among the members of Christ. To say nothing of other things, they cannot be at once members of Christ and members of a prostitute. Finally, he himself says: "Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him." He shows what it is to eat the body of Christ and drink his blood not merely as far as the sacrament goes, but in reality: it is to abide in Christ, in such a way that Christ also abides in him.[61]

Sic enim hoc dixit, tamquam diceret: Qui non in me manet, et in quo ego non maneo, non se dicat aut existimet manducare corpus meum aut bibere sanguinem meum. Non itaque manent in Christo, qui non sunt membra eius. Non sunt autem membra Christi, qui se faciunt membra meretricis, nisi malum illud paenitendo esse destiterint et ad hoc bonum reconciliatione redierint.

For he said this as if he were saying: "Whoever does not abide in me, and in whom I do not abide, should not say or think that he eats my body or drinks my blood." So those who are not his members do not abide in Christ. And those who make themselves members of a prostitute are not members of Christ, unless by repenting they cease to be that evil thing and return to this good through reconciliation.

60 Matthew 10:22.
61 Galatians 5:6; Romans 13:10; 1 Corinthians 6:15; John 6:56.

WHAT IT IS TO HAVE CHRIST AS THE FOUNDATION, AND TO WHOM SALVATION IS PROMISED AS IF THROUGH THE BURNING OF FIRE

Having Christ as foundation means putting nothing before him; the fire tests and burns away earthly loves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
21.26	Sed habent, inquiunt, Christiani catholici in fundamento Christum, a cuius unitate non recesserunt, tametsi huic fundamento superaedificauerunt quamlibet pessimam uitam, uelut ligna, fenum, stipulam; recta itaque fides, per quam Christus est fundamentum, quamuis cum damno, quoniam illa, quae superaedificata sunt, exurentur, tamen poterit eos quandoque ab illius ignis perpetuitate saluare. Respondeat eis breuiter apostolus Iacobus: Si quis dicat se fidem habere, opera autem non habeat, numquid poterit fides saluare eum? Et quis est, inquiunt, de quo dicit apostolus Paulus: Ipse autem saluus erit, sic tamen quasi per ignem?	But, they say, Catholic Christians have Christ as their foundation, and they have not withdrawn from unity with him, even though on this foundation they have built a life as wicked as you like, like wood, hay, and straw. So right faith, through which Christ is the foundation, will be able at some point to save them from the endlessness of that fire, though with loss, since the things built on it will be burned up. Let the apostle James give them a brief answer: "If someone says he has faith but does not have works, can faith save him?" And who, then, they ask, is the one of whom the apostle Paul says: "He himself will be saved, yet only as through fire"?[62]
	Simul quis iste sit, inquiramus; hunc tamen non esse certissimum est, ne duorum apostolorum sententias mittamus in rixam, si unus dicit: Etiamsi mala opera quis habuerit, saluabit eum per ignem fides; alius autem: Si opera non habeat, numquid poterit fides saluare eum?	Let us look into who this is together. But it is quite certain that it is not this man. Otherwise we would set the judgments of two apostles quarreling, if one says, "Even if someone has evil works, faith will save him through fire," and the other, "If he does not have works, can faith save him?"
	Inueniemus ergo quis possit saluari per ignem, si prius inuenerimus quid sit habere in fundamento Christum. Quod ut de ipsa similitudine quantocius aduertamus: nihil in aedificio praeponitur fundamento; quisquis itaque sic habet in corde Christum, ut ei terrena et temporalia nec ea quae licita sunt adque concessa praeponat, fundamentum habet Christum: si autem praeponit, etsi uideatur habere fidem Christi, non est tamen in eo fundamentum Christus, cui talia praeponuntur: quanto magis, si salutaria praecepta contemnens committat inlicita, non praeposuisse Christum, sed postposuisse conuincitur, quem posthabuit imperantem siue concedentem, dum contra eius imperata siue concessa suam per flagitia delegit explere libidinem! Si quis itaque Christianus diligit meretricem eique adhaerens unum corpus efficitur, iam in fundamento non habet Christum.	We shall find, then, who can be saved through fire if we first find out what it is to have Christ as one's foundation. Let us grasp this as quickly as possible from the image itself. In a building nothing is placed before the foundation. So whoever holds Christ in his heart in such a way that he does not put earthly and temporal things before him—not even those that are lawful and permitted—has Christ as his foundation. But if he does put them before him, then even if he seems to have faith in Christ, Christ is not his foundation, since such things are put before him. How much more, if he scorns the saving commandments and commits unlawful acts, is he shown not to have put Christ before, but behind! He has held Christ cheap both when Christ commands and when he permits, choosing to satisfy his own lust through shameful acts against what Christ commands or permits. So if any Christian loves a prostitute and, clinging to her, becomes one body with her, he no longer has Christ as his foundation.

62 James 2:14; 1 Corinthians 3:15. The image of building with wood, hay, and straw on the foundation of Christ comes from 1 Corinthians 3:11–15.

LATIN

Si quis autem diligit uxorem suam, si secundum Christum, quis ei dubitet in fundamento esse Chri stum? si uero secundum hoc saeculum, si carnaliter, si in morbo concupiscentiarum, sicut et gentes quae ignorant Deum, etiam hoc secundum ueniam concedit apostolus, immo per apostolum Christus. Potest ergo et iste in fundamento habere Christum. Si enim nihil ei talis adfectionis uoluptatisque praeponat, quamuis superaedificet ligna, fenum, stipulam, Christus est fundamentum, propter hoc saluus erit per ignem. Delicias quippe huius modi amoresque terrenos, propter coniugalem quidem copulam non damnabiles, tribulationis ignis exuret; ad quem pertinent ignem et orbitates et quaecumque calamitates quae auferunt haec.

Ac per hoc ei, qui aedificauit, erit aedificatio ista damnosa, quia non habebit, quod superaedificauit, et eorum amissione cruciabitur, quibus fruendo utique laetabatur; sed per hunc ignem saluus erit merito fundamenti, quia, etsi utrum id habere mallet an Christum a persecutore proponeretur, illud Christo non praeponeretur. Vide in apostoli uerbis hominem aedificantem super fundamentum aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos: Qui sine uxore est, inquit, cogitat quae sunt Dei, quo modo placeat Deo. Vide alium aedificantem ligna, fenum, stipulam: Qui autem matrimonio iunctus est, inquit, cogitat quae sunt mundi, quo modo placeat uxori. Uniuscuiusque opus manifestabitur; dies enim declarabit (dies utique tribulationis), quoniam in igne, inquit, reuelabitur. Eandem tribulationem ignem uocat, sicut alibi legitur: Vasa figuli probat fornax et homines iustos tentatio tribulationis.

Et uniuscuiusque opus quale sit, ignis probabit. Si cuius opus permanserit (permanet enim quod quisque cogitat quae sunt Dei, quo modo placeat Deo), quod superaedificauit mercedem accipiet (id est, unde cogitauit, hoc sumet); si cuius autem opus arserit, damnum patietur (quoniam quod dilexerat non habebit), ipse autem saluus erit (quia nulla eum tribulatio ab illius fundamenti stabilitate semouit); sic tamen quasi per

ENGLISH

But if someone loves his wife, and loves her as Christ would have him, who would doubt that Christ is his foundation? If, however, he loves her in the way of this world, carnally, in the sickness of desire, like the Gentiles who do not know God, even this the apostle permits by way of concession —or rather, Christ permits it through the apostle. So this man too can have Christ as his foundation. For if he puts nothing of such affection and pleasure before Christ, then even though he builds wood, hay, and straw on it, Christ is the foundation, and for this reason he will be saved through fire. For the fire of tribulation will burn up delights and earthly loves of this kind, which are not damnable because of the marriage bond. And to this fire belong bereavements and whatever calamities take these things away.[63]

And so this building will bring loss to the one who built it, because he will not keep what he built on the foundation, and he will be tormented by the loss of the things he certainly delighted to enjoy. But he will be saved through this fire by the merit of the foundation. For if a persecutor put it to him whether he would rather have those things or Christ, he would not put them before Christ. See in the apostle's words a man building gold, silver, and precious stones on the foundation: "The unmarried man," he says, "thinks about the things of God, how to please God." See another building wood, hay, and straw: "But the man joined in marriage," he says, "thinks about the things of the world, how to please his wife." "Each one's work will become manifest; for the day will disclose it"—the day of tribulation, of course—"because," he says, "it will be revealed in fire." He calls that same tribulation fire, as we read elsewhere: "The furnace tests the potter's vessels, and the trial of tribulation tests righteous men."[64]

"And the fire will test what sort of work each one has done. If anyone's work survives"—and the work of thinking about the things of God, how to please God, does survive—"he will receive a reward for what he built on it"—that is, he will receive the very thing he thought about. "If anyone's work burns up, he will suffer loss"—since he will not have what he had loved—"but he himself will 63 Allusions to 1 Thessalonians 4:5 and 1 Corinthians 7:6.

64 1 Corinthians 7:32–33; 1 Corinthians 3:13; Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 27:5.

LATIN

ignem (quod enim sine inliciente amore non habuit, sine urente dolore non perdit). Ecce, quantum mihi uidetur, inuentus est ignis, qui nullum eorum damnet, sed unum ditet, alterum damnificet, ambos probet.

ENGLISH

be saved"—because no tribulation moved him from the firmness of that foundation—"yet only as through fire"—for what he did not possess without an alluring love, he does not lose without a burning pain. There, as far as I can see, we have found the fire that condemns neither of them, but enriches the one, brings loss on the other, and tests both.

Si autem ignem illum loco isto uoluerimus accipere, de quo Dominus dicet sinistris: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum; ut in eis etiam isti esse credantur, qui aedificant super fundamentum ligna, fenum, stipulam, eosque ex illo igne post tempus pro malis meritis inpertitum liberet boni meritum fundamenti: quid arbitrabimur dextros quibus dicetur: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum, nisi eos, qui aedificauerunt super fundamentum aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos? Sed in illum ignem, de quo dictum est: Sic tamen quasi per ignem, si hoc modo est intellegendus, utrique mittendi sunt, et dextri scilicet et sinistri. Illo quippe igne utrique probandi sunt, de quo dictum est: Dies enim declarabit, quoniam in igne reuelabitur, et uniuscuiusque opus quale sit, ignis probabit.

But suppose we chose to take the fire in this passage to be the one of which the Lord will say to those on his left: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire." Then those who build wood, hay, and straw on the foundation would be believed to be among them, and the good merit of the foundation would free them from that fire after a period imposed for their evil deserts. In that case, whom shall we take those on the right to be, to whom it will be said, "Come, you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you," if not those who built gold, silver, and precious stones on the foundation? But if the fire is to be understood in this way, then both must be sent into that fire of which it was said, "yet only as through fire"—both those on the right, that is, and those on the left. For both are to be tested by that fire of which it was said: "For the day will disclose it, because it will be revealed in fire, and the fire will test what sort of work each one has done."[65]

Si ergo utrumque probabit ignis, ut, si cuius opus permanserit, id est non fuerit igne consumtum, quod superaedificauit mercedem accipiat; si cuius autem opus arserit, damnum patiatur: profecto non est ipse aeternus ille ignis. In illum enim soli sinistri nouissima et perpetua damnatione mittentur, iste autem dextros probat. Sed alios eorum sic probat, ut aedificium, quod super Christum fundamentum ab eis inuenerit esse constructum, non exurat adque consumat; alios autem aliter, id est, ut quod superaedificauerunt ardeat damnumque inde patiantur, salui fiant autem, quoniam Christum in fundamento stabiliter positum praecellenti caritate tenuerunt.

If, then, the fire will test both, so that if anyone's work survives—that is, is not consumed by the fire—he receives a reward for what he built on it, and if anyone's work burns up, he suffers loss, then surely this fire is not the eternal fire itself. For into that fire only those on the left will be sent, in the final and everlasting condemnation, whereas this fire tests those on the right. But it tests some of them in such a way that it does not burn up and consume the building it finds they have constructed on Christ the foundation; others it tests differently, that is, so that what they built on it burns and they suffer loss from it, yet they are saved, because they held fast to Christ, firmly laid as their foundation, with a love that set him above all else.

Si autem salui fient, profecto et ad dexteram stabunt et cum ceteris audient: Venite, benedicti patris mei, possidete paratum uobis regnum, non ad sinistram, ubi

But if they are to be saved, they will surely stand at the right hand and hear with the rest: "Come,

65 Matthew 25:41; Matthew 25:34.

LATIN	ENGLISH
illi erunt, qui salui non erunt et ideo audient: Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum. Nemo quippe ab illo igne saluabitur, quia in supplicium aeternum ibunt illi omnes, ubi uermis eorum non moritur et ignis non exstinguitur, quo cruciabuntur die ac nocte in saecula saeculorum.	you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you." They will not stand at the left, where those will be who will not be saved and who will therefore hear: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire." For no one will be saved from that fire, since all of them will go into eternal punishment, where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched, and where they will be tormented day and night forever and ever.[66]

A FIRE OF TRIAL AFTER DEATH?

A fire of tribulation after death may test builders of wood and hay; it is not eternal fire.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Post istius sane corporis mortem, donec ad illum ueniatur, qui post resurrectionem corporum futurus est damnationis et remunerationis ultimus dies, si hoc temporis interuallo spiritus defunctorum eius modi ignem dicuntur perpeti, quem non sentiant illi, qui non habuerunt tales mores et amores in huius corporis uita, ut eorum ligna, fenum, stipula consumatur; alii uero sentiant, qui eius modi secum aedificia portauerunt, siue ibi tantum, siue et hic et ibi, siue ideo hic ut non ibi saecularia, quamuis a damnatione uenialia, concremantem ignem transitoriae tribulationis inueniant: non redarguo, quia forsitan uerum est. Potest quippe ad istam tribulationem pertinere etiam mors ipsa carnis, quae de primi peccati perpetratione concepta est, ut secundum cuiusque aedificium tempus quod eam sequitur ab unoquoque sentiatur.	Now consider the time after the death of this body, until we come to that day, after the resurrection of bodies, which will be the last day of condemnation and reward. Suppose it is said that during this interval the spirits of the dead suffer a fire of this kind. It would not be felt by those who, in the life of this body, did not have such habits and loves that their wood, hay, and straw had to be consumed. But it would be felt by others, who carried buildings of that sort with them—whether they meet this fire of passing tribulation, which burns up worldly things that are pardonable and do not bring damnation, only there, or both here and there, or here so that they do not meet it there. If this is said, I do not refute it, for perhaps it is true. Indeed, even the death of the flesh itself, which was conceived from the commission of the first sin, may belong to this tribulation, so that the time that follows death is experienced by each person according to what he has built.
Persecutiones quoque, quibus martyres coronati sunt et quas patiuntur quicumque Christiani, probant utraque aedificia uelut ignis et alia consumunt cum ipsis aedificatoribus, si Christum in eis non inueniunt fundamentum; alia sine ipsis, si inueniunt, quia licet cum damno salui erunt ipsi; alia uero non consumunt, quia talia reperiunt quae maneant in aeternum. Erit etiam in fine saeculi tribulatio tempore Antichristi, qualis numquam antea fuit. Quam multa erunt tunc aedificia, siue aurea siue fenea, super optimum fundamentum, quod est Christus Iesus, ut ignis ille probet utraque et de aliis gaudium, de aliis inferat damnum, neutros tamen	Persecutions too, by which martyrs have been crowned and which Christians of every kind suffer, test both kinds of building like fire. Some buildings they consume together with the builders themselves, if they do not find Christ as their foundation. Others they consume without the builders, if they do find him, because the builders themselves will be saved, though with loss. Still others they do not consume, because they find them to be such as will last forever. There will also be, at the end of the world, a tribulation in the time of the Antichrist such as there never was be-66 Echoes of Matthew 25:46, Mark 9:44 (Isaiah 66:24), and Revelation 20:10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
perdat., in quibus haec inueniet, propter stabile fundamentum!	fore. How many buildings will there be then, whether of gold or of hay, on the best foundation, which is Christ Jesus, for that fire to test both kinds—bringing joy to some, loss to others, yet destroying neither those in whom it finds the one nor those in whom it finds the other, because of the firm foundation![67]
Quicumque autem, non dico uxorem, cuius etiam commixtione carnis ad carnalem utitur uoluptatem, sed ipsa quae ab eius modi delectationibus aliena sunt nomina pietatis humano more carnaliter diligendo Christo anteponit, non eum habet in fundamento et ideo non per ignem saluus erit, sed saluus non erit, quia esse cum Saluatore non poterit, qui de hac re apertissime loquens ait: Qui amat patrem aut matrem plus quam me, non est me dignus; et qui amat filium aut filiam super me, non est me dignus. Verum qui has necessitudines sic amat carnaliter ut tamen eas Christo Domino non praeponat, malitque ipsis, carere quam Christo, si ad hunc fuerit articulum tentationis adductus, per ignem erit saluus, quia et earum amissione tantum necesse est urat dolor, quantum haeserat amor.	But consider someone who puts before Christ—I do not say his wife, whose bodily union he uses for carnal pleasure, but even the very names of family affection, which are foreign to pleasures of that kind—loving them carnally, in a merely human way. He does not have Christ as his foundation. Therefore he will not be saved through fire; he will not be saved at all, because he will not be able to be with the Savior, who says most plainly on this matter: "Whoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and whoever loves son or daughter above me is not worthy of me." But whoever loves these relatives carnally, yet in such a way that he does not put them before Christ the Lord, and would rather lose them than lose Christ if he were brought to that critical point of trial, will be saved through fire. For when he loses them, grief must burn him as much as love had clung to them.[68]
Porro qui patrem matrem, filios filias secundum Christum dilexerit, ut ad eius regnum obtinendum eique cohaerendum illis consulat, uel hoc in eis diligat, quod membra sunt Christi: absit ut ista dilectio reperiatur in lignis, feno, stipula consumenda, sed prorsus aedificio aureo, argenteo, gemmeo deputabitur. Quo modo autem potest eos plus amare quam Christum, quos amat utique propter Christum?	On the other hand, someone may love father and mother, sons and daughters, as Christ would have him, so that he looks after their gaining Christ's kingdom and clinging to him; or he may love in them the fact that they are members of Christ. God forbid that such love should be found among the wood, hay, and straw that are to be consumed! It will certainly be counted as a building of gold, silver, and gems. And how can he love more than Christ those whom he loves precisely for Christ's sake?

AGAINST THE BELIEF OF THOSE WHO THINK THE SINS IN WHICH THEY PERSISTED WHILE GIVING ALMS WILL NOT HARM THEM

Alms cannot buy a license to keep sinning; worthy alms begin with amending one's own life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
21.27 Restat eis respondere, qui dicunt aeterno igne illos tantummodo arsuros, qui pro peccatis suis facere dignas elemosynas neglegunt, propter illud quod ait apostolus	It remains to answer those who say that the only people who will burn in eternal fire are those who neglect to give alms fitting for their sins. They rely 67 Allusion to Matthew 24:21. The Antichrist is the final adversary of Christ expected at the end of time (1 John 2:18).

68 Matthew 10:37.

LATIN

Iacobus: ludicium autem sine misericordia illi, qui non fecit misericordiam. Qui ergo fecit, inquiunt, quamuis non correxerit perditos mores, sed nefarie ac nequiter inter ipsas suas elemosynas uixerit, cum misericordia illi futurum est iudicium, ut aut non damnetur omnino aut post aliquod tempus a damnatione nouissima liberetur. Nec ob aliud existimant Christum de solo dilectu adque neglectu elemosynarum discretionem inter dextros et sinistros esse facturum, quorum alios in regnum, alios in supplicium mittat aeternum.

Ut autem cottidiana sibi opinentur, quae facere omnino non cessant, qualiacumque et quantacumque sint, per elemosynas dimitti posse peccata, orationem, quam docuit ipse Dominus, et suffragatricem sibi adhibere conantur et testem. Sicut enim nullus est, inquiunt, dies, quo a Christianis haec oratio non dicatur: ita nullum est cottidianum qualecumque peccatum, quod per illam non dimittatur, cum dicimus: Dimitte nobis debita nostra, si quod sequitur facere curemus: Sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris. Non enim ait Dominus, inquiunt: Si dimiseritis peccata hominibus, dimittet uobis Pater uester cottidiana parua peccata, sed: Dimittet, inquit, uobis peccata uestra. Qualicumque ergo uel quantacumque sint, etiamsi cottidie perpetrentur nec ab eis uita discedat in melius commutata: per elemosynam ueniae non negatae remitti sibi posse praesumunt.

Sed bene, quod isti dignas pro peccatis elemosynas commonent esse faciendas; quoniam si dicerent qualescumque elemosynas pro peccatis et cottidianis et magnis et quantacumque scelerum consuetudine misericordiam posse inpetrare diuinam, ut ea cottidiana remissio sequeretur, uiderent se rem dicere absurdam adque ridiculam. Sic enim cogerentur fateri fieri posse, ut opulentissimus homo decem nummulis diurnis in elemosynas inpensis homicidia et adulteria et nefaria quaeque facta redimeret.

Quod si absurdissimum adque insanissimum est dicere, profecto si quaeratur, quae dignae sint pro peccatis on what the apostle James says: "But judgment without mercy for the one who has shown no mercy." So, they say, whoever has shown mercy, even if he has not corrected his depraved habits but has lived wickedly and viciously in the very midst of his almsgiving, will face a judgment with mercy. Either he will not be condemned at all, or after some time he will be freed from the final condemnation. And for no other reason, they think, will Christ make the separation between those on the right and those on the left, sending some into the kingdom and others into eternal punishment, solely on the basis of their love or neglect of almsgiving.[69]

ENGLISH

They want to persuade themselves that daily sins, which they never stop committing, can be forgiven through almsgiving, whatever their nature and however great. To this end they try to enlist the prayer the Lord himself taught as both their advocate and their witness. For just as there is no day, they say, on which this prayer is not said by Christians, so there is no daily sin of any kind that is not forgiven through it, when we say, "Forgive us our debts," provided we take care to do what follows: "as we also forgive our debtors." For the Lord did not say, they argue, "If you forgive people their sins, your Father will forgive you your small daily sins," but he said, "He will forgive you your sins." So, whatever their nature and however great, even if they are committed every day and one's life never leaves them behind and changes for the better, they presume that these sins can be remitted to them through the alms of not withholding pardon.[70]

Still, it is good that these people insist that the alms given for sins must be fitting ones. For suppose they said that any alms whatever, given for sins both daily and grave, and for any habit of crime however great, could obtain God's mercy, so that daily remission would follow. They would see that they were saying something absurd and ridiculous. For they would then be forced to admit that a very rich man, by spending ten small coins a day on alms, could buy off murders and adulteries and every kind of wicked deed.

But if that is utterly absurd and utterly insane to say, then surely, if we ask what alms are worthy of elemosynae, de quibus etiam Christi praecursor ille dicebat: Facite ergo fructus dignos paenitentiae, procul dubio non inuenientur eas facere, qui uitam suam usque ad mortem cottidianorum criminum perpetratione confodiunt: primum, quia in auferendis rebus alienis longe plura diripiunt, ex quibus perexigua pauperibus largiendo Christum se ad hoc pascere existimant, ut licentiam malefactorum ab illo se emisse uel cottidie potius emere credentes securi damnabilia tanta committant. Qui si pro uno scelere omnia sua distribuerent indigentibus membris Christi, nisi desisterent a talibus factis habendo caritatem, quae non agit perperam, aliquid eis prodesse non potest. Qui ergo dignas pro suis peccatis elemosynas facit, prius eas facere incipit a se ipso.

LATIN

Indignum est enim, ut in se non faciat, qui facit in proximum, cum audiat dicentem Deum: Diliges proximum tuum tamquam te ipsum: itemque audiat: Miserere animae tuae placens Deo. Hanc elemosynam, id est, ut Deo placeat, non faciens animae suae quo modo dignas pro peccatis suis elemosynas facere dicendus est? Ad hoc enim et illud scriptum est: Qui sibi malignus est, cui bonus erit? Orationes quippe adiuuant elemosynae; et utique intuendum est quod legimus: Fili, peccasti, ne adicias iterum et de praeteritis deprecare, ut tibi dimittantur. Propter hoc ergo elemosynae faciendae sunt, ut, cum de praeteritis peccatis deprecamur, exaudiamur; non ut in eis perseuerantes licentiam malefaciendi nos per elemosynas conparare credamus.

Ideo autem Dominus et dextris elemosynas ab eis factas et sinistris non factas se inputaturum esse praedixit, ut hinc ostenderet quantum ualeant elemosynae ad priora delenda, non ad perpetua inpune committenda peccata. Tales autem elemosynas non dicendi sunt facere, qui uitam nolunt a consuetudine scelerum in melius commutare. Quia et in hoc quod ait: Quando uni ex minimis meis non fecistis, mihi non fecistis, ostendit eos non facere etiam quando se facere existimant. Si enim sins—the alms of which Christ's forerunner said, "Bear fruit, therefore, worthy of repentance"—we shall undoubtedly find that they are not given by people who stab their life through, right up to death, by committing crimes every day. First, because in taking what belongs to others they plunder far more than they give. They hand out a tiny portion of it to the poor and suppose that they are feeding Christ for a purpose: believing that they have bought from him a license for wrongdoing, or rather that they are buying it every day, they commit such damnable deeds without a care. Even if they distributed all they had to the needy members of Christ for a single crime, it could do them no good unless they gave up such deeds by having love, which "does not act wrongly." So whoever gives alms worthy of his sins begins by giving them first to himself.[71]

ENGLISH

For it is unfitting that someone who gives to his neighbor should not give to himself, since he hears God saying, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," and hears also, "Have mercy on your own soul by pleasing God." If he does not give his own soul this alms—that is, pleasing God—how can he be said to give alms worthy of his sins? It was for this very reason that it is also written, "Whoever is evil to himself, to whom will he be good?" Alms, of course, help prayers; and we must certainly attend to what we read: "My son, you have sinned; do not do so again, and pray about your past sins, that they may be forgiven you." So alms are to be given for this purpose: that when we pray about our past sins, we may be heard—not that, while persisting in them, we should think we are purchasing with our alms a license to do wrong.[72]

The Lord foretold that he would reckon to those on his right the alms they had given, and to those on his left the alms they had not given, precisely in order to show how much alms avail for wiping out past sins—not for committing sins continually with impunity. Those who refuse to change their life for the better and abandon their habit of crime are not to be said to give such alms. For in saying,

70 Matthew 6:12; Matthew 6:14.
69 James 2:13.
71 Matthew 3:8, spoken by John the Baptist; the description of love is from 1 Corinthians 13:4.
72 Matthew 22:39; then Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 30:24, 14:5 and 21:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Christiano esurienti panem tamquam Christiano darent, profecto sibi panem iustitiae, quod ipse Christus est, non negarent; quoniam Deus, non cui detur, sed quo animo detur, adtendit. Qui ergo Christum diligit in Christiano, hoc animo ei porrigit elemosynam, quo accedit ad Christum, non quo uult recedere inpunitus a Christo.	"When you did not do it for one of the least of mine, you did not do it for me," he also shows that they are not giving even when they think they are. If they gave bread to a hungry Christian as to a Christian, they would surely not deny themselves the bread of righteousness, which is Christ himself; for God looks not to whom something is given but in what spirit it is given. So whoever loves Christ in a Christian holds out alms to him in the spirit with which he draws near to Christ, not in the spirit with which he wants to withdraw from Christ unpunished.[73]
Tanto enim magis quisque deserit Christum, quanto magis diligit quod inprobat Christus. Nam quid cuiquam prodest, quod baptizatur, si non iustificatur? Nonne qui dixit: Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu, non intrabit in regnum Dei, ipse etiam dixit: Nisi abundauerit iustitia uestra super scribarum et Pharisaeorum, non intrabitis in regnum caelorum? Quur illud timendo multi currunt baptizari, et hoc non timendo non multi curant iustificari? Sicut ergo non fratri suo dicit: Fatue, qui cum hoc dicit non ipse fraternitati, sed peccato eius infensus est (alioquin reus erit gehennae ignis): ita e contrario, qui porrigit elemosynam Christiano, non Christiano porrigit, qui non in eo diligit Christum; non autem diligit Christum, qui iustificari recusat in Christo.	For the more a person loves what Christ condemns, the more he deserts Christ. What good does it do anyone to be baptized if he is not justified? Did not he who said, "Unless someone is reborn of water and the Spirit, he will not enter the kingdom of God," also say, "Unless your righteousness surpasses that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven"? Why do many run to be baptized because they fear the first saying, while not many take care to be justified, because they do not fear the second? So, just as a man who says "You fool" does not say it to his brother if, in saying it, he is hostile not to the brother but to his sin (otherwise he would be liable to the fire of hell), so, conversely, a man who holds out alms to a Christian does not hold them out to a Christian if he does not love Christ in him. And he does not love Christ who refuses to be justified in Christ.[74]
Et quem ad modum si quis praeoccupatus fuerit hoc delicto, ut fratri suo dicat: Fatue, id est, non eius peccatum uolens auferre conuicietur iniuste, parum est illi ad hoc redimendum elemosynas facere, nisi etiam quod ibi sequitur remedium reconciliationis adiungat (ibi enim sequitur: Si ergo offeres munus tuum ad altare et ibi recordatus fueris, quia frater tuus habet aliquid aduersum te, relinque ibi munus tuum ad altare et uade prius, reconciliari fratri tuo, et tunc ueniens offeres munus tuum): ita parum est elemosynas quantaslibet facere pro quocumque scelere et in consuetudine scelerum permanere.	Suppose someone has been caught in this fault of saying to his brother, "You fool"—that is, of insulting him unjustly, with no wish to remove his sin. It is not enough for him to give alms to redeem this unless he also adds the remedy of reconciliation that follows in that passage. For there it continues: "So if you are offering your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there at the altar, and go first and be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift." In the same way, it is not enough to give any amount of alms for any crime whatever while remaining in the habit of crime.[75]

73 Matthew 25:45.
74 John 3:5; Matthew 5:20; Matthew 5:22.
75 Matthew 5:23–24.

WHAT THE LORD'S PRAYER FORGIVES

The Lord's Prayer forgives the daily sins of the righteous, not crimes persisted in.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Oratio uero cottidiana, quam docuit ipse Iesus, unde et dominica nominatur, delet quidem cottidiana peccata, cam cottidie dicitur: Dimitte nobis debita nostra, adque id quod sequitur non solum dicitur, sed etiam fit: Sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris; sed quia fiunt peccata, ideo dicitur, non ut ideo fiant, quia dicitur. Per hanc enim nobis uoluit Saluator ostendere, quantumlibet iuste in huius uitae caligine adque infirmitate uiuamus, non nobis deesse peccata, pro quibus dimittendis debeamus orare et eis, qui in nos peccant, ut et nobis ignoscatur, ignoscere.	As for the daily prayer that Jesus himself taught—which is why it is called the Lord's Prayer—it does indeed wipe out daily sins, when every day we say, "Forgive us our debts," and when what follows is not only said but also done: "as we also forgive our debtors." But it is said because sins are committed, not so that sins may be committed because it is said. For by this prayer the Savior wanted to show us that, however righteously we may live in the darkness and weakness of this life, we are not without sins, for whose forgiveness we must pray; and that we must forgive those who sin against us, so that we too may be forgiven.[76]
Non utique propterea Dominus ait: Si dimiseritis peccata hominibus, dimittet uobis et Pater uester peccata uestra, ut de hac oratione confisi securi cottidiana scelera faceremus, uel potentia qua non timeremus hominum leges uel astutia qua ipsos homines falleremus; sed ut per illam disceremus non putare nos esse sine peccatis, etiamsi a criminibus essemus inmunes; sicut etiam legis ueteris sacerdotes hoc ipsum Deus de sacrificiis admonuit, quae iussit eos primum pro suis, deinde pro populi offerre peccatis. Nam et ipsa uerba tanti magistri et Domini nostri uigilanter intuenda sunt. Non enim ait: Si dimiseritis peccata hominibus, et Pater uester dimittet uobis qualiacumque peccata, sed ait: Peccata uestra. Cottidianam quippe orationem docebat et iustificatis utique discipulis loquebatur.	Certainly the Lord did not say, "If you forgive people their sins, your Father will also forgive you your sins," so that, relying on this prayer, we might commit crimes every day without a care, whether through power that would free us from fear of human laws or through cunning by which we might deceive people themselves. He said it so that through this prayer we might learn not to think ourselves without sins, even if we were free from crimes. In just the same way God warned the priests of the old law about this very thing through the sacrifices, which he commanded them to offer first for their own sins and then for the sins of the people. Indeed, the very words of our great Teacher and Lord must be carefully examined. He did not say, "If you forgive people their sins, your Father will also forgive you any sins whatever," but he said, "your sins." For he was teaching a daily prayer, and he was certainly speaking to disciples who had been justified.[77]
Quid est ergo: Peccata uestra nisi peccata sine quibus nec uos eritis, qui iustificati et sanctificati estis? Ubi ergo illi, qui per hanc orationem occasionem perpetrandorum cottidie scelerum quaerunt, dicunt Dominum significasse etiam magna peccata, quoniam non dixit: Dimittet uobis parua sed peccata uestra: ibi nos considerantes qualibus loquebatur et audientes dictum peccata uestra nihil aliud debemus existimare quam parua, quoniam talium iam non erant magna. Verum tamen nec ipsa magna, a quibus	What, then, does "your sins" mean, if not the sins without which even you will not be, you who have been justified and sanctified? Those who look to this prayer for an opportunity to commit crimes every day claim that the Lord meant great sins too, since he did not say, "He will forgive you small sins," but "your sins." We, however, considering what sort of people he was speaking to, and hearing the words "your sins," ought to understand

76 Matthew 6:12.
77 Matthew 6:14; for the priests' sacrifices see Leviticus 16:6–15.

LATIN	ENGLISH
omnino mutatis in melius moribus recedendum est, dimittuntur orantibus, nisi fiat quod ibi dicitur: Sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris.	nothing but small sins, since such people no longer had great ones. Yet not even great sins—which must be abandoned altogether by a thorough change of life for the better—are forgiven to those who pray, unless what is said there is done: "as we also forgive our debtors."
Si enim minima peccata, sine quibus non est etiam uita iustorum, aliter non remittuntur: quanto magis multis et magnis criminibus inuoluti, etiamsi ea perpetrare iam desinant, nullam indulgentiam consequuntur, si ad remittendum aliis, quod in eis quisque peccauerit, inexorabiles fuerint, cum dicat Dominus: Si autem non dimiseritis hominibus, neque Pater uester dimittet uobis. Ad hoc enim ualet quod etiam Iacobus apostolus ait, iudicium futurum sine misericordia illi, qui non fecit misericordiam. Venire quippe debet in mentem etiam seruus ille, cui debitori dominus eius relaxauit decem milia talentorum, quae postea iussit ut redderet, quia ipse non misertus est conserui sui, qui ei debebat centum denarios.	For if the smallest sins, without which not even the life of the righteous exists, are not forgiven in any other way, how much more will those entangled in many great crimes obtain no pardon—even if they now stop committing them—if they have been unrelenting in forgiving others whatever wrong anyone has done them! For the Lord says, "But if you do not forgive people, neither will your Father forgive you." That is the point of what the apostle James also says: that judgment will be without mercy for one who has shown no mercy. We should also call to mind that slave whose master canceled his debt of ten thousand talents, but afterward ordered him to repay it, because he himself had not taken pity on his fellow slave who owed him a hundred denarii.[78]

FRIENDS WHO RECEIVE US INTO ETERNAL DWELLINGS

Friends made with the mammon of unrighteousness may help some, but no one knows which sins they cover.

LATIN	ENGLISH
In his ergo, qui filii sunt promissionis et uasa misericordiae, ualet quod ait idem apostolus consequenter adiungens: Superexsultat autem misericordia iudicio, quoniam et illi iusti, qui tanta sanctitate uixerunt, ut alios quoque recipiant in tabernacula aeterna, a quibus amici facti sunt de mammona iniquitatis, ut tales essent, misericordia liberati sunt ab eo, qui iustificat inpium, inputans mercedem secundum gratiam, non secundum debitum. In eorum quippe numero est apostolus, qui dicit: Misericordiam consecutus sum, ut fidelis essem.	In those, then, who are children of the promise and vessels of mercy, what the same apostle adds next holds good: "But mercy exults over judgment." For even those righteous people who have lived with such holiness that they also receive others into the eternal dwellings—others who made friends of them out of the mammon of unrighteousness—were set free by mercy, so that they might become such people. They were set free by him who justifies the ungodly, reckoning the reward according to grace, not according to debt. Among their number, indeed, is the apostle who says, "I have obtained mercy so that I might be faithful."[79]
Illi autem, qui recipiuntur a talibus in tabernacula aeterna, fatendum est quod non sint his moribus praediti, ut eis liberandis sine suffragio sanctorum sua possit uita sufficere, ac per hoc multo amplius in eis superexsultat misericordia iudicio.	As for those who are received by such people into the eternal dwellings, it must be admitted that their character is not such that their own life could suffice to set them free without the help of 78 Matthew 6:15; James 2:13; the parable is in Matthew 18:23–35.

79 James 2:13; the phrases that follow echo Luke 16:9 and Romans 4:4–5, and the final quotation is 1 Corinthians 7:25.

LATIN

ENGLISH

the saints; and for this reason mercy exults over judgment in them all the more.

Nec tamen ideo putandus est quisquam sceleratissimus, nequaquam uita uel bona uel tolerabiliore mutatus, recipi in tabernacula aeterna, quoniam obsecutus est sanctis de mammona iniquitatis, id est de pecunia uel diuitiis, quae male fuerant adquisitae, aut etiamsi bene, non tamen ueris, sed quas iniquitas putat esse diuitias, quoniam nescit quae sint uerae diuitiae, quibus illi abundant, qui et alios recipiunt in tabernacula aeterna. Est itaque quidam uitae modus nec tam malae, ut his qui eam uiuunt nihil prosit ad capessendum regnum caelorum largitas elemosynarum, quibus etiam iustorum sustentatur inopia et fiunt amici qui in tabernacula aeterna suscipiant, nec tam bonae, ut ad tantam beatitudinem adipiscendam eis ipsa sufficiat, nisi eorum meritis, quos amicos fecerint, misericordiam consequantur.

Yet that is no reason to think that some utterly wicked man, whose life has in no way been changed into a good or even a more tolerable one, is received into the eternal dwellings because he has done favors for the saints with the mammon of unrighteousness. By that is meant money or riches that were wrongly acquired—or, even if rightly acquired, are not true riches, but only what unrighteousness takes for riches, since it does not know what true riches are: the riches in which those abound who also receive others into the eternal dwellings. There is, then, a certain way of life that is neither so bad that generous almsgiving does those who live it no good for gaining the kingdom of heaven—almsgiving by which even the poverty of the righteous is relieved, and friends are made who may receive them into the eternal dwellings—nor so good that it suffices by itself for them to attain such great happiness, unless they obtain mercy through the merits of those whom they have made their friends.

Mirari autem soleo etiam aput Vergilium reperiri istam Domini sententiam, ubi ait: Facite uobis amicos de mammona iniquitatis, ut et ipsi recipiant uos in tabernacula aeterna; cui est et illa simillima: Qui recipit prophetam in nomine prophetae, mercedem prophetae accipiet; et qui recipit iustum in nomine iusti, mercedem iusti accipiet. Nam cum Elysios campos poeta ille describeret, ubi putant habitare animas beatorum, non solum ibi posuit eos, qui propriis meritis ad illas sedes peruenire potuerunt, sed adiecit adque ait:

I am often struck that this saying of the Lord is found even in Virgil—the saying "Make friends for yourselves out of the mammon of unrighteousness, so that they too may receive you into the eternal dwellings." Very similar to it is another: "Whoever receives a prophet in the name of a prophet will receive a prophet's reward; and whoever receives a righteous man in the name of a righteous man will receive a righteous man's reward." For when that poet was describing the Elysian Fields, where they suppose the souls of the blessed dwell, he did not place there only those who had been able to reach those abodes by their own merits, but added these words:[80]

Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo, id est, qui promeruerunt alios eosque sui memores promerendo fecerunt; prorsus tamquam eis dicerent, quod frequentatur ore Christiano, cum se cuique sanctorum humilis quisque commendat et dicit: Memor mei esto, adque id ut esse possit promerendo efficit. Sed quis iste sit modus, et quae sint ipsa peccata, quae ita inpediunt peruentionem ad regnum Dei, ut tamen sanctorum amicorum meritis inpetrent indulgentiam, difficillimum

"and those who by deserving well made others mindful of them"—that is, those who deserved well of others and, by deserving well of them, made them mindful of them. It is exactly as if those others said to them what is often on Christian lips, when some humble person commends himself to one of the saints and says, "Remember me," and by deserving well brings it about that 80 Luke 16:9; Matthew 10:41. The Elysian Fields were the home of the blessed dead in the underworld, described in Book 6 of Virgil's Aeneid.

LATIN

est inuenire, periculosissimum definire. Ego certe usque ad hoc tempus cum inde satagerem ad eorum indaginem peruenire non potui. Et fortassis propterea latent, ne studium proficiendi ad omnia cauenda peccata pigrescat.

Quoniam si scirentur quae uel qualia sint delicta, pro quibus etiam permanentibus nec prouectu uitae melioris absumtis intercessio sit inquirenda et speranda iustorum, eis secura se obuolueret humana segnitia, nec euolui talibus inplicamentis ullius uirtutis expeditione curaret, sed tantummodo quaereret aliorum meritis liberari, quos amicos sibi de mammona iniquitatis elemosynarum largitate fecisset. Nunc uero dum uenialis iniquitatis, etiamsi perseueret, ignoratur modus, profecto et studium in meliora proficiendi orando et instando uigilantius adhibetur et faciendi de mammona iniquitatis sanctos amicos cura non spernitur.

Verum ista liberatio, quae fit siue suis quibusque orationibus siue intercedentibus sanctis, id agit ut in ignem quisque non mittatur aeternum, non ut, cum fuerit missus, post quantumcumque inde tempus eruatur. Nam et illi, qui putant sic intellegendum esse quod scriptum est, adferre terram bonam uberem fructum, aliam tricenum, aliam sexagenum, aliam centenum, ut sancti pro suorum diuersitate meritorum alii tricenos homines liberent, alii sexagenos, alii centenos, hoc in die iudicii futurum suspicari solent, non post iudicium.

Qua opinione quidam cum uideret homines inpunitatem sibi peruersissime pollicentes, eo quod omnes isto modo ad liberationem pertinere posse uideantur, elegantissime respondisse perhibetur, bene potius esse uiuendum, ut this can be so. But what that way of life is, and what those sins are which so obstruct entry into the kingdom of God that they may nonetheless obtain pardon through the merits of saintly friends, is very hard to discover and very dangerous to define. Certainly I, for my part, up to this time, though I have taken great pains over it, have not managed to track them down. And perhaps they are hidden so that zeal for making progress in avoiding all sins may not grow sluggish.[81]

ENGLISH

For suppose it were known which faults, or what kind, are those for which the intercession of the righteous is to be sought and hoped for even while they persist and have not been done away with by progress toward a better life. Human sluggishness would wrap itself up in them without a care. It would not trouble to work itself free from such entanglements through the unencumbered effort of any virtue, but would seek only to be set free by the merits of others—those it had made its friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness by generous almsgiving. As it is, however, since the measure of pardonable wrongdoing, even when it persists, is unknown, zeal for advancing to better things is surely applied more watchfully through prayer and persistence, and care to make saintly friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness is not neglected.

But this deliverance, whether it comes about through each person's own prayers or through the intercession of the saints, has the effect that a person is not sent into the eternal fire—not that, once he has been sent there, he is rescued from it after some length of time. For even those who think that what is written—that the good soil yields an abundant crop, some thirtyfold, some sixtyfold, some a hundredfold—is to be understood to mean that the saints, according to the differences in their merits, will set free some thirty people each, some sixty, some a hundred, usually suppose that this will happen on the day of judgment, not after the judgment.[82]

When someone saw people promising themselves impunity in a most perverse way because of this opinion—since on this view everyone could seem to qualify for deliverance—he is said to have 81 Virgil, Aeneid 6.664.

82 Matthew 13:8, 23.

LATIN

inter eos quisque reperiatur, qui pro aliis intercessuri sunt liberandis, ne tam pauci sint, ut cito ad numerum suum uel tricenum uel sexagenum uel centenum unoquoque eorum perueniente multi remaneant, qui erui iam de poenis illorum intercessione non possint et in eis inueniatur quisquis sibi spem fructus alieni temeritate uanissima pollicetur. Haec me illis respondisse suffecerit, qui sacrarum litterarum, quas communes habemus, auctoritatem non spernunt, sed eas male intellegendo non quod illae loquuntur, sed hoc potius putant futurum esse quod ipsi uolunt. Hac itaque responsione reddita librum, sicut promisimus, terminamus.

ENGLISH

replied very elegantly that we ought rather to live good lives, so that each of us may be found among those who are to intercede for the deliverance of others. Otherwise the intercessors might be so few that each of them would quickly reach his quota of thirty or sixty or a hundred, and many would be left over who could no longer be rescued from punishment by their intercession; and among these would be found anyone who, with the emptiest rashness, promises himself hope from another's harvest. Let this suffice as my reply to those who do not reject the authority of the sacred writings that we hold in common, but who, by misunderstanding them, think that what will happen is not what those writings say but rather what they themselves want. With this reply given, then, we bring the book to a close, as we promised.

Book XXII

The eternal happiness of the saints
Miracles, the resurrection of the body, and the vision of God in the everlasting Sabbath.

THE CREATION OF ANGELS AND HUMAN BEINGS

God made angels and humans with free will, foreseeing the fall, and will fill the heavenly city.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.1	Sicut in proximo libro superiore promisimus, iste huius totius operis ultimus disputationem de ciuitatis Dei aeterna beatitudine continebit, quae non propter aetatis per multa saecula longitudinem tamen quandocumque finiendam aeternitatis nomen accepit, sed quem ad modum scriptum est in euangelio, regni eius non erit finis; nec ita ut aliis moriendo decedentibus, aliis succedentibus oriendo species in ea perpetuitatis appareat, sicut in arbore, quae perenni fronde uestitur, eadem uidetur uiriditas permanere, dum labentibus? et cadentibus foliis subinde alia, quae nascuntur, faciem conseruant opacitatis; sed omnes in ea ciues inmortales erunt, adipiscentibus et hominibus, quod numquam sancti angeli perdiderunt. Faciet hoc Deus omnipotentissimus eius conditor. Promisit enim nec mentiri potest, et quibus fidem hinc quoque faceret, multa sua et non promissa et promissa iam fecit.	As I promised in the immediately preceding book, this one, the last of the whole work, will contain the discussion of the eternal happiness of the city of God. This happiness has received the name "eternal" not because it lasts through many ages and must still end at some point. It is eternal, as it is written in the Gospel, because "of his kingdom there will be no end." Nor is its eternity a mere appearance of permanence, produced while some depart by dying and others succeed them by being born. That is how an evergreen tree seems to keep the same greenness: as leaves wither and fall, others grow in their place and keep up its look of shade. Instead, all its citizens will be immortal, and human beings too will attain what the holy angels never lost. God, its all-powerful founder, will do this. For he has promised it, and he cannot lie. And to give us grounds for faith on this point too, he has already done many things, some he had promised and some he had not.[1]
	Ipse est enim, qui in principio condidit mundum, plenum bonis omnibus uisibilibus adque intellegibilibus rebus, in quo nihil melius instituit quam spiritus, quibus intellegentiam dedit et suae contemplationis habiles capacesque sui praestitit adque una societate deuinxit, quam sanctam et supernam dicimus ciuitatem, in qua res, qua sustententur beatique sint, Deus ipse illis est, tamquam uita uictusque communis: qui liberum arbitrium eidem intellectuali naturae tribuit tale, ut, si uellet deserere Deum, beatitudinem scilicet suam, continuo miseria sequeretur; qui cum praesciret angelos quosdam per elationem, qua ipsi sibi ad beatam uitam sufficere uellent, tanti boni desertores futuros, non eis ademit hanc potestatem, potentius et melius esse	For it is he who in the beginning created the world, full of all good things, both visible and intelligible. In it he made nothing better than spirits. He gave them intelligence, made them fit to contemplate him and able to receive him, and bound them together in one fellowship, which we call the holy and heavenly city. In that city what sustains them and makes them happy is God himself, as their common life and food. He gave this intellectual nature free will of such a kind that, if it chose to desert God, that is, its own happiness, misery would follow at once. He foreknew that certain angels would desert so great a good through the self-exaltation by which they wished to be sufficient to themselves for the happy life. Yet he did not take iudicans etiam de malis bene facere quam mala esse non sinere.

1 Luke 1:33.

LATIN

Quae omnino nulla essent, nisi natura mutabilis, quamuis bona et a summo Deo adque incommutabili bono, qui bona omnia condidit, instituta, peccando ea sibi ipsa fecisset; quo etiam peccato suo teste conuincitur bonam conditam se esse naturam. Nisi enim magnum et ipsa, licet non aequale Conditori, bonum esset, profecto desertio Dei tamquam luminis sui malum eius esse non posset.

Nam sicut caecitas oculi uitium est et idem ipsum indicat ad lumen uidendum esse oculum creatum ac per hoc etiam ipso uitio suo excellentius ostenditur ceteris membris membrum capax luminis (non enim alia causa esset uitium eius carere lumine): ita natura, quae fruebatur Deo, optimam se institutam docet etiam ipso uitio, quo ideo misera est quia non fruitur Deo; qui casum angelorum uoluntarium iustissima poena sempiternae infelicitatis obstrinxit adque in eo summo bono permanentibus ceteris, ut de sua sine fine permansione certi essent, tamquam ipsius praemium permansionis dedit. Qui fecit hominem etiam ipsum rectum cum eodem libero arbitrio, terrenum quidem animal, sed caelo dignum, si suo cohaereret auctori, miseria similiter, si eum desereret, secutura, qualis naturae huius modi conueniret.

Quem similiter cum praeuaricatione legis Dei per Dei desertionem peccaturum esse praesciret, nec illi ademit liberi arbitrii potestatem, simul praeuidens, quid boni de malo eius esset ipse facturus: qui de mortali progenie merito iusteque damnata tantum populum gratia sua colligit, ut inde subpleat et instauret partem, quae lapsa est angelorum, ac sic illa dilecta et superna ciuitas non fraudetur suorum numero ciuium, quin etiam fortassis et uberiore laetetur.

ENGLISH

this power from them, judging it more powerful and better to bring good even out of evils than not to allow evils to exist.

These evils would not exist at all had not a changeable nature made them for itself by sinning. That nature is good, and was created by the supreme God, the unchangeable good, who created all good things. By that very sin, as its own witness, it is proved to have been created a good nature. For unless it were itself a great good, though not equal to its Creator, deserting God, its light, certainly could not be an evil for it.

Blindness is a defect of the eye, and this very defect shows that the eye was created to see light. So by its very defect the eye is shown to be more excellent than the other members, since it is the member capable of light. Otherwise lacking light would be no defect in it. In the same way, the nature that enjoyed God shows that it was created very good even by the defect that makes it miserable, for it is miserable precisely because it does not enjoy God. God bound the voluntary fall of the angels with the most just punishment of everlasting unhappiness. To the others, who remained in that supreme good, he granted certainty that they would remain in it without end, as the reward for their remaining. He also made man upright, with the same free will. Man was an earthly animal, but worthy of heaven if he clung to his maker. Likewise, misery would follow if he deserted him, a misery fitting for a nature of that kind.

He likewise foreknew that man would sin by transgressing God's law and deserting God. Even so, he did not take the power of free will from him, foreseeing at the same time what good he himself would bring out of man's evil. From a mortal race, deservedly and justly condemned, he gathers by his grace so great a people that from it he may fill up and restore the part of the angels that fell. Thus that beloved and heavenly city will not be cheated of the full number of its citizens. Indeed, it may even rejoice in a greater number.

THE ETERNAL AND UNCHANGEABLE WILL OF GOD

God's will never changes; when he seems to change or will, it is his people who do.

LATIN

ENGLISH

22.2

LATIN	ENGLISH
Multa enim fiunt quidem a malis contra uoluntatem Dei; sed tantae est ille sapientiae tantaeque uirtutis, ut in eos exitus siue fines, quos bonos et iustos ipse praesciuit, tendant omnia, quae uoluntati eius uidentur aduersa. Ac per hoc cum Deus mutare dicitur uoluntatem, ut quibus lenis erat uerbi gratia reddatur iratus, illi potius quam ipse mutantur et eum quodam modo mutatum in his quae patiuntur inueniunt; sicut mutatur sol oculis sauciatis et asper quodam modo ex miti et ex delectabili molestus efficitur, cum ipse aput se ipsum maneat idem qui fuit. Dicitur etiam uoluntas Dei, quam facit in cordibus oboedientium mandatis eius, de qua dicit apostolus: Deus est enim, qui operatur in uobis et uelle.	Many things, it is true, are done by the wicked against the will of God. But such is his wisdom and such his power that all things which seem contrary to his will tend toward outcomes or ends that he himself foreknew to be good and just. And so, when God is said to change his will, so that, for example, he becomes angry with those to whom he was gentle, it is they rather than he who change. In what they suffer they find him changed, in a sense. In the same way the sun "changes" for injured eyes: from gentle it becomes harsh, in a way, and from delightful it becomes painful, while in itself it remains just what it was. We also speak of the will of God when we mean the will he produces in the hearts of those who obey his commands. Of this the apostle says: "For it is God who works in you even to will."[2]
Sicut iustitia Dei non solum qua ipse iustus est dicitur, sed illa etiam quam in homine, qui ab illo iustificatur, facit: sic et lex eius uocatur, quae potius est hominum, sed ab ipso data; nam utique homines erant, quibus ait Iesus: In lege uestra scriptum est, cum alio loco legamus: Lex Dei eius in corde eius. Secundum hanc uoluntatem quam Deus operatur in hominibus, etiam uelle dicitur, quod non ipse uult, sed suos id uolentes facit; sicut dicitur cognouisse, quod ut cognosceretur fecit, a quibus ignorabatur. Neque enim dicente apostolo: Nunc autem cognoscentes Deum, immo cogniti a Deo, fas est ut credamus, quod eos tunc cognouerit Deus praecognitos ante constitutionem mundi; sed tunc cognouisse dictus est, quod tunc ut cognosceretur effecit.	"The righteousness of God" means not only the righteousness by which he himself is righteous, but also the righteousness he produces in the human being whom he justifies. In the same way, "his law" is the name for what is rather the law of human beings, though given by him. For they were certainly human beings to whom Jesus said, "It is written in your law," while in another passage we read: "The law of his God is in his heart." According to this will which God works in human beings, he is also said to will what he does not himself will, but makes his people will. Likewise, he is said to have known what he caused to be known by those who did not know it. For when the apostle says, "But now that you know God, or rather are known by God," we may not believe that God came to know them only then, when he foreknew them before the foundation of the world. Rather, he is said to have known them then because he then brought it about that he was known.[3]
De his locutionum modis iam et in superioribus libris memini disputatum. Secundum hanc ergo uoluntatem, qua Deum uelle dicimus quod alios efficit uelle, quibus futura nesciuntur, multa uult nec facit.	I remember that I have discussed these ways of speaking in earlier books as well. According to this will, then, God wills many things that he does not do. By this will we say that God wills what he makes others will, others to whom the future is unknown.
Multa enim uolunt fieri sancti eius ab illo inspirata sancta uoluntate, nec fiunt, sicut orant pro quibusdam	For his saints, inspired by him with a holy will, will many things to happen that do not happen.

2 Philippians 2:13.
3 John 8:17; Psalm 36:31 (37:31 in most English Bibles); Galatians 4:9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
pie sancteque, et quod orant non facit, cum ipse in eis hanc orandi uoluntatem sancto Spiritu suo fecerit. Ac per hoc, quando secundum Deum uolunt et orant sancti, ut quisque sit saluus possumus illo modo locutionis dicere: Vult Deus et non facit; ut ipsum dicamus uelle, qui ut uelint isti facit. Secundum illam uero uoluntatem suam, quae cum eius praescientia sempiterna est, profecto in caelo et in terra omnia quaecumque uoluit non solum praeterita uel praesentia, sed etiam futura iam fecit.	They pray devoutly and in holiness for certain people, for example, and he does not do what they pray for, although by his Holy Spirit he himself produced in them this will to pray. So when the saints will and pray, in accordance with God, that each person be saved, we can use that manner of speaking and say: "God wills and does not do." We mean that he wills because he makes them will. But according to that will of his which is eternal together with his foreknowledge, he has certainly already done all things whatsoever he willed in heaven and on earth. This includes not only things past or present, but also things to come.
Verum antequam ueniat tempus, quo uoluit ut fieret, quod ante tempora uniuersa praesciuit adque disposuit, dicimus: Fiet quando Deus uoluerit; si autem non solum tempus quo futurum est, uerum etiam utrum futurum sit ignoramus, dicimus: Fiet, si Deus uoluerit; non quia Deus nouam uoluntatem, quam non habuit, tunc habebit; sed quia id, quod ex aeternitate in eius inmutabili praeparatum est uoluntate, tunc erit.	But before the time comes when he willed that what he foreknew and arranged before all ages should come to pass, we say: "It will happen when God wills." And if we know neither when it will happen nor even whether it will happen, we say: "It will happen if God wills." This is not because God will then have a new will that he did not have before. It is because what has been prepared from eternity in his unchangeable will shall then come to be.

THE PROMISE OF ETERNAL HAPPINESS FOR THE SAINTS AND EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT FOR THE WICKED

Prophecies already fulfilled guarantee that the promised resurrection and new heaven will also come.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.3 Quapropter, ut cetera tam multa praeteream, sicut nunc: in Christo uidemus inpleri quod promisit Abrahae dicens: In semine tuo benedicentur omnes gentes: ita quod eidem semini eius promisit inplebitur, ubi ait per prophetam: Resurgent qui erant in monumentis, et quod ait: Erit caelum nouum et terra noua, et non erunt memores priorum, nec adscendet in cor ipsorum, sed laetitiam et exsultationem inuenient in ea.	Therefore, to pass over so many other things, we now see fulfilled in Christ what God promised to Abraham when he said, "In your seed all nations shall be blessed." In the same way, what he promised to that same seed will be fulfilled. He says through the prophet: "Those who were in the tombs shall rise again." He also says: "There shall be a new heaven and a new earth, and they shall not remember the former things, nor shall these come into their heart; but they shall find joy and exultation in it.[4]
Ecce ego faciam Hierusalem exsultationem et populum meum laetitiam; et exsultabo in Hierusalem et laetabor in populo meo, et ultra non audietur in illa uox fletus; et per alium prophetam quod praenuntiauit dicens eidem prophetae: In tempore illo saluabitur populus tuus omnis qui inuentus fuerit scriptus in libro, et multi dormientium in terrae puluere (siue, ut quidam	"Behold, I will make Jerusalem an exultation and my people a joy; and I will exult in Jerusalem and rejoice in my people, and the voice of weeping shall no longer be heard in her." Through another prophet he foretold the same, saying to that prophet: "At that time your people shall be saved, everyone who is found written in the book; and

4 Genesis 22:18; Isaiah 26:19; Isaiah 65:17–19.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	interpretati sunt, aggere) exsurgent, hi in uitam aeternam et hi in obprobrium et in confusionem aeternam; et alio loco per eundem prophetam: Accipient regnum sancti Altissimi et obtinebunt illud usque in saeculum et usque in saeculum saeculorum; et paulo post: Regnum, inquit, eius regnum sempiternum: et alia quae ad hoc pertinentia in libro uicensimo posui, siue quae non posui et tamen in eisdem litteris scripta sunt, uenient et haec, sicut ista uenerunt, quae increduli non putabant esse uentura.	many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth (or, as some have translated it, in the mound of earth) shall rise, some to eternal life and some to reproach and eternal confusion." In another place, through the same prophet, he says: "The saints of the Most High shall receive the kingdom and shall possess it forever, even forever and ever." A little later he says: "His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom." These passages will be fulfilled, together with the others on this subject that I set out in the twentieth book, and those I did not set out but which are still written in the same Scriptures. They will come, just as those things have come which unbelievers thought would never come.[5]
	Idem quippe Deus utraque promisit, utraque uentura esse praedixit, quem perhorrescunt numina paganorum, etiam teste Porphyrio, nobilissimo philosopho paganorum.	For the same God promised both and foretold that both would come. He is the God before whom the deities of the pagans shudder, as even Porphyry, the most renowned philosopher of the pagans, testifies.[6]

AGAINST THE WISE MEN OF THE WORLD WHO THINK EARTHLY HUMAN BODIES CANNOT BE CARRIED UP TO A HEAVENLY DWELLING

Cicero's claim that earthly bodies cannot rise to heaven ignores the greater wonder of soul joined to body.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.4	Sed uidelicet homines docti adque sapientes contra uim tantae auctoritatis, quae omnia genera hominum, sicut tanto ante praedixit, in hoc credendum sperandumque conuertit, acute sibi argumentari uidentur aduersus corporum resurrectionem et dicere quod in tertio de re publica libro a Cicerone commemoratum est. Nam cum Herculem et Romulum ex hominibus deos esse factos adseueraret: Quorum non corpora, inquit, sunt in caelum elata; neque enim natura pateretur, ut id quod esset e terra nisi in terra maneret. Haec est magna ratio sapientium, quorum Dominus nouit cogitationes, quoniam uanae sunt.	But of course learned and wise men set themselves against the force of so great an authority, which, as it foretold so long before, has turned every kind of human being to believe and hope for this. They think they argue shrewdly against the resurrection of bodies, and they cite what Cicero records in the third book of his Republic. Asserting that Hercules and Romulus became gods after being men, he says: "Their bodies were not carried up into heaven; for nature would not allow what came from the earth to remain anywhere but on the earth." This is the great reasoning of the wise, whose "thoughts the Lord knows, that they are futile."[7]
	Si enim animae tantummodo essemus, id est sine ullo corpore spiritus, et in caelo habitantes terrena animalia nesciremus nobisque futurum esse diceretur, ut terrenis corporibus animandis quodam uinculo mirabili necteremur: nonne multo fortius argumentaremur id credere recusantes et diceremus naturam non pati, ut res	Suppose we were souls only, that is, spirits without any body, living in heaven and knowing nothing of earthly animals. Suppose we were told that in the future we would be joined by some wonderful bond to earthly bodies and give them

5 Daniel 12:1–2; 7:18; 7:27.
6 Porphyry (c. AD 234–305), Neoplatonist philosopher, pupil of Plotinus, and author of a treatise against the Christians.
7 Cicero's dialogue On the Republic survives only in part. The closing words quote Psalm 93:11 (94:11 in most English Bibles), as cited in 1 Corinthians 3:20.

LATIN	ENGLISH
incorporea ligamento corporeo uinciretur? Et tamen plena est terra uegetantibus animis haec membra terrena, miro sibi modo conexa et inplicita. Quur ergo eodem uolente Deo, qui fecit hoc animal, non poterit terrenum corpus in caeleste corpus adtolli, si animus omni ac per hoc etiam caelesti corpore praestabilior terreno corpori potuit inligari?	life. Would we not argue far more forcefully that we refused to believe it, and say that nature does not allow an incorporeal thing to be bound by a bodily tie? And yet the earth is full of souls that give life to these earthly members, joined to them and intertwined with them in a marvelous way. A soul is more excellent than any body, and therefore than a heavenly body too, and yet it could be bound to an earthly body. Why then, if the same God who made this living creature wills it, will an earthly body not be able to be raised up into a heavenly body?
An terrena particula tam exigua potuit aliquid caelesti corpore melius aput se tenere, ut sensum haberet et uitam, et eam sentientem adque uiuentem dedignabitur caelum suscipere aut susceptam non poterit sustinere, cum de re sentiat et uiuat ista meliore, quam est corpus omne caeleste? Sed ideo nunc non fit, quia nondum est tempus quo id fieri uoluit, qui hoc, quod uidendo iam uiluit, multo mirabilius quam illud, quod ab istis non creditur, fecit. Quur enim non uehementius admiramur incorporeos animos, caelesti corpore potiores, terrenis inligari corporibus quam corpora licet terrena sedibus quamuis caelestibus, tamen corporeis sublimari, nisi quia hoc uidere consueuimus et hoc sumus, illud uero nondum sumus nec aliquando adhuc uidimus?	So tiny a particle of earth could hold within itself something better than a heavenly body, so as to have sensation and life. Will heaven, then, disdain to receive it, sensing and living as it is? Or, once heaven has received it, will heaven be unable to hold it, when it senses and lives by something better than any heavenly body? The only reason this does not happen now is that the time has not yet come when he willed it to happen. He has already made something far more wonderful than what these people refuse to believe, though it has grown cheap from being seen. For why are we not more powerfully amazed that incorporeal souls, superior to a heavenly body, are bound to earthly bodies? Why does that not amaze us more than that bodies, even earthly ones, are raised to dwellings that are heavenly but still bodily? Surely only because we are used to seeing the former, and are the former ourselves, while the latter we are not yet and have never yet seen.
Nam profecto sobria ratione consulta mirabilioris esse diuini operis reperitur incorporalibus corporalia quodam modo adtexere quam licet diuersa, quia illa caelestia, ista terrestria, tamen corpora et corpora copulare.	Certainly, if sober reason is consulted, it is a more wonderful divine work to weave bodily things, in a certain way, into incorporeal things than to join bodies to bodies. Those bodies may differ, the one heavenly and the other earthly, but they are bodies all the same.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE FLESH, WHICH SOME DO NOT BELIEVE THOUGH THE WORLD BELIEVES IT

Three incredible things: Christ's resurrection, the world's belief in it, and its spread by a few fishermen.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.5 Sed hoc incredibile fuerit aliquando: ecce iam credidit mundus sublatum terrenum Christi corpus in caelum; resurrectionem carnis et adscensionem in supernas sedes, paucissimis remanentibus adque stupentibus uel doctis uel indoctis, iam crediderunt et docti et indocti. Si rem credibilem crediderunt, uideant quam sint stolidi,	But suppose this was once incredible. Look: the world has now believed that the earthly body of Christ was taken up into heaven. The learned and the unlearned alike have now believed in the resurrection of the flesh and its ascension to the dwellings above, and only very few, whether qui non credunt; si autem res incredibilis credita est, etiam hoc utique incredibile est, sic creditum esse, quod incredibile est. Haec igitur duo incredibilia, resurrectionem scilicet nostri corporis in aeternum et rem tam incredibilem mundum esse crediturum, idem Deus, antequam uel unum horum fieret, ambo futura esse praedixit.

LATIN

Unum duorum incredibilium iam factum uidemus, ut, quod erat incredibile, crederet mundus: quur id quod reliquum est desperatur, ut etiam hoc ueniat, quod incredibile credidit mundus, sicut iam uenit, quod similiter incredibile fuit, ut rem tam incredibilem crederet mundus, quando quidem hoc utrumque incredibile, quorum uidemus unum, alterum credimus, in eisdem litteris praedictum sit, per quas credidit mundus? Et ipse modus, quo mundus credidit, si consideretur, incredibilior inuenitur. Ineruditos liberalibus disciplinis et omnino, quantum ad istorum doctrinas adtinet, inpolitos, non peritos grammatica, non armatos dialectica, non rhetorica in flatos, piscatores Christus cum retibus fidei ad mare huius saeculi paucissimos misit adque ita et ex omni genere tam multos pisces et tanto mirabiliores, quanto rariores, etiam, ipsos philosophos cepit.

Duobus illis incredibilibus, si placet, immo quia placere debet, addamus hoc tertium. Iam ergo tria sunt incredibilia, quae tamen facta sunt. Incredibile est Christum resurrexisse in carne et in caelum adscendisse cum carne; incredibile est mundum rem tam incredibilem credidisse; incredibile est homines ignobiles, infimos, paucissimos, inperitos rem tam incredibilem tam efficaciter mundo et in illo etiam doctis persuadere potuisse. Horum trium incredibilium primum nolunt isti, cum quibus agimus, credere; secundum coguntur et cernere: quod non inueniunt unde sit factum, si non credunt tertium. Resurrectio certe Christi et in caelum cum carne in qua resurrexit adscensio toto iam mundo praedicatur et creditur; si credibilis non est, unde toto terrarum orbe iam credita est?

ENGLISH

learned or unlearned, remain astonished. If they believed something credible, let those who do not believe see how foolish they are. But if something incredible has been believed, this too is surely incredible: that something incredible has been believed in this way. Here, then, are two incredible things: the resurrection of our body to eternity, and the world's coming to believe so incredible a thing. Before either of them happened, the same God foretold that both would come to pass.

One of the two incredible things we already see accomplished: the world believed what was incredible. Why, then, do people despair of the remaining one? The world has believed, though it was incredible, that this too will come, just as the other, equally incredible, has already come: that the world would believe so incredible a thing. Both incredible things, the one we see and the one we believe, were foretold in the same Scriptures through which the world believed. And the very way in which the world believed proves, on consideration, even more incredible. Christ sent fishermen to the sea of this world with the nets of faith, very few of them. They had no training in the liberal arts and were wholly unpolished as far as these people's learning goes, not skilled in grammar, not armed with dialectic, not puffed up with rhetoric. And so he caught fish of every kind, and so many of them. The rarer they were, the more wonderful they were: he caught even the philosophers themselves.

To those two incredible things let us add this third, if you please, or rather because it ought to please you. So there are now three incredible things, and yet they have happened. It is incredible that Christ rose in the flesh and ascended into heaven with the flesh. It is incredible that the world believed so incredible a thing. It is incredible that men of no standing, of the lowest rank, very few and unskilled, were able to persuade the world, and even its learned men, of so incredible a thing so effectively. The people we are arguing with refuse to believe the first of these three incredible things. The second they are even compelled to see, and they cannot explain how it came about unless they believe the third. Certainly the resurrection of Christ, and his ascension into heaven with the flesh in which he rose, is now proclaimed and believed throughout the whole world.

LATIN

ENGLISH

If it is not credible, how has it come to be believed all over the earth?

Si multi, nobiles, sublimes, docti eam se uidisse dixerunt et quod uiderunt diffamare curarunt, eis mundum credidisse non mirum est sed istos adhuc credere nolle perdurum est; si autem, ut uerum est, paucis, obscuris, minimis, indoctis eam se uidisse dicentibus et scribentibus credidit mundus, quur pauci obstinatissimi, qui remanserunt, ipsi mundo iam credenti adhuc usque non credunt? qui propterea numero exiguo ignobilium, infimorum, inperitorum hominum credidit, quia in tam contemtibilibus testibus multo mirabilius diuinitas se ipsa persuasit. Eloquia namque persuadentium, quae dicebant, mira fuerunt facta, non uerba Qui enim Christum in carne resurrexisse et cum illa in caelum adscendisse non uiderant, id se uidisse narrantibus non loquentibus tantum, sed etiam mirifica facientibus signa credebant.

If many men of high birth, high rank and learning had said they saw it and had taken care to spread abroad what they saw, it would be no wonder that the world believed them, though it would be very stubborn of these people still to refuse belief. But the truth is that the world believed a few men, obscure, very humble and unlearned, who said and wrote that they had seen it. Why, then, do the few most obstinate people who remain still not believe the very world that now believes? The world believed a small number of men of no standing, of the lowest rank and unskilled, precisely because in such contemptible witnesses the divine power did its own persuading far more wonderfully. For the eloquence of those who persuaded, the things they said, consisted of wonderful deeds, not words. Those who had not seen Christ risen in the flesh and ascending into heaven with it believed those who reported that they had seen it. These witnesses did not merely speak; they also performed marvelous signs.

Homines quippe, quos unius uel, ut multum, duarum linguarum fuisse nouerant, repente linguis omnium gentium loquentes mirabiliter audiebant; claudum ab uteribus matris ad eorum uerbum in Christi nomine post quadraginta annos incolumem constitisse, sudaria de corporibus eorum ablata sanandis profuisse languentibus, in uia qua fuerant transituri positos in ordine innumerabiles morbis uariis laborantes, ut ambulantium super eos umbra transiret, continuo salutem solere recipere et alia multa stupenda in Christi nomine per eos facta, postremo etiam mortuos resurrexisse cernebant, Quae si, ut leguntur, gesta esse concedunt, ecce tot incredibilia tribus illis incredibilibus addimus, et ut credatur unum incredibile, quod de carnis resurrectione adque in caelum adscensione dicitur, multorum incredibilium testimonia tanta congerimus et nondum ad credendum horrenda duritia incredulos flectimus.

The people knew these men had one language, or at most two, and to their amazement they heard them suddenly speaking in the languages of all nations. At their word, in the name of Christ, they saw a man stand up sound after forty years, lame since he was at his mother's breast. Handkerchiefs taken from the apostles' bodies brought healing to the sick. Countless people suffering from various diseases were laid in rows along the road by which the apostles were to pass, so that their shadow might fall on them as they walked, and these regularly recovered their health at once. Many other astounding things were done through them in the name of Christ, and finally the people saw even the dead rise again. Suppose our opponents grant that these things happened as we read them. Then look: we are adding so many incredible things to those three. To get one incredible thing believed, namely the resurrection of the flesh and its ascension into heaven, we pile up such testimonies of many incredible things. And still we do not bend the unbelievers to belief, so dreadful is their hardness.[8]

Si uero per apostolos Christi, ut eis crederetur resurrectionem adque adscensionem praedicantibus

Perhaps they do not believe that Christ's apostles also performed these miracles in order to be be-

LATIN	ENGLISH
Christi, etiam ista miracula facta esse non credunt, hoc nobis unum grande miraculum sufficit, quod eam terrarum orbis sine ullis miraculis credidit.	lieved when they preached Christ's resurrection and ascension. In that case, this one great miracle is enough for us: the whole earth believed it without any miracles.

THAT ROME MADE ITS FOUNDER ROMULUS A GOD BECAUSE IT LOVED HIM, WHEREAS THE CHURCH LOVED CHRIST BECAUSE IT BELIEVED HIM TO BE GOD

Rome loved Romulus and so believed him a god; the Church believed Christ God and so loved him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.6 Recolamus etiam hoc loco illud, quod de Romuli credita diuinitate Tullius admiratur. Verba eius ut scripta sunt inseram. Magis est, inquit, in Romulo admirandum, quod ceteri, qui di ex hominibus facti esse dicuntur, minus eruditis hominum saeculis fuerunt, ut fingendi procliuis esset ratio, cum inperiti facile ad credendum inpellerentur; Romuli autem aetatem minus his sescentis annis iam inueteratis litteris adque doctrinis omnique illo antiquo ex inculta hominum uita errore sublato fuisse cernimus. Et paulo post de eodem Romulo ita loquitur, quod ad hunc pertinet sensum: Ex quo intellegi potest, inquit, permultis annis ante Homerum fuisse quam Romulum, ut iam doctis hominibus ac temporibus ipsis eruditis ad fingendum uix quicquam esset loci.	Let us also recall here what Cicero finds remarkable about the belief in Romulus' divinity. I will quote his words as they are written. "What is more to be wondered at in Romulus," he says, "is this. The others who are said to have become gods after being men lived in less educated ages of humankind, when people readily invented stories, since the unlearned were easily moved to believe. But we see that Romulus lived less than six hundred years ago, when letters and learning were already long established, and all that ancient error arising from the uncultivated life of mankind had been removed." A little later he speaks of the same Romulus to this effect: "From this it can be understood," he says, "that Homer lived very many years before Romulus. So with men already learned and the times themselves educated, there was scarcely any room left for invention.[9]
Antiquitas enim recipit fabulas, fictas etiam nonnumquam incondite; haec aetas autem iam exculta, praesertim eludens omne quod fieri non potest, respuit. Unus e numero doctissimorum hominum idemque eloquentissimus omnium Marcus Tullius Cicero propterea dicit diuinitatem Romuli mirabiliter creditam, quod erudita iam tempora fuerunt, quae falsitatem non reciperent fabularum. Quis autem Romulum deum nisi Roma credidit, adque id parua et incipiens?	"For antiquity accepted fables, sometimes even crudely invented; but this age, now refined and quick above all to mock everything that cannot happen, rejects them." Marcus Tullius Cicero, one of the most learned of men and the most eloquent of all, says that the divinity of Romulus was believed in a remarkable way precisely because the times were already educated and would not accept the falsehood of fables. But who believed Romulus a god except Rome, and Rome when it was small and just beginning?
Tum deinde posteris seruare fuerat necesse quod acceperant a maioribus, ut cum ista superstitione in lacte quodam modo matris ebibita cresceret ciuitas adque ad tam magnum perueniret imperium, ut ex eius fastigio, uelut ex altiore quodam loco, alias quoque gentes, quibus dominaretur, hac sua opinione perfunderet, ut non	After that, later generations had to preserve what they had received from their ancestors. So the city grew with this superstition drunk in, as it were, with its mother's milk, and came to so great an empire that from its height, as from some loftier place, it poured this belief of its own over the oth-

8 See Acts 2:1–13; 3:1–10; 19:11–12; 5:15; 9:36–42.
9 Cicero, On the Republic 2.18–19. Romulus, the legendary founder of Rome, was said to have been taken up to heaven and worshiped as the god Quirinus.

LATIN

quidem crederent, sed tamen dicerent deum Romulum, ne ciuitatem, cui seruiebant, de conditore eius offenderent, aliter eum nominando quam Roma, quae id non amore quidem huius erroris, sed tamen amoris errore crediderat. Christus autem quamquam sit caelestis et sempiternae conditor ciuitatis, non tamen eum, quoniam ab illo condita est, Deum credidit, sed ideo potius est condenda, quia credidit.

Roma conditorem suum iam constructa et dedicata tamquam deum coluit in templo; haec autem Hierusalem conditorem suum Deum Christum, ut construi posset et dedicari, posuit in fidei fundamento. Illa illum amando esse deum credidit, ista istum Deum esse credendo amauit. Sicut ergo praecessit unde amaret illa et de amato iam libenter etiam falsum bonum crederet: ita praecessit unde ista crederet, ut recta fide non temere quod falsum, sed quod uerum erat amaret.

Exceptis enim tot et tantis miraculis, quae persuaserunt Deum esse Christum, prophetiae quoque diuinae fide dignissimae praecesserunt, quae in illo non sicut a patribus adhuc creduntur inplendae, sed iam demonstrantur inpletae; de Romulo autem, quia condidit Romam in eaque regnauit, auditur legiturue quod factum est, non quod antequam fieret prophetatum; sed quod sit receptus in deos, creditum tenent litterae, non factum docent. Nullis quippe rerum mirabilium signis id ei uere prouenisse monstratur. Lupa quippe illa nutrix, quod uidetur quasi magnum exstitisse portentum, quale aut quantum est ad demonstrandum deum? Certe enim etsi non meretrix fuit lupa illa, sed bestia, cum commune fuerit ambobus, frater tamen eius non habetur deus.

Quis autem prohibitus est aut Romulum aut Herculem aut alios tales homines deos dicere et mori maluit quam non dicere? Aut uero aliqua gentium coleret inter deos suos Romulum, nisi Romani nominis metus cogeret? Quis porro numeret, quam multi quantalibet saeuitia crudelitatis occidi quam Christum Deum negare maluerunt? Proinde metus quamlibet leuis indignationis, er nations it ruled. They did not, indeed, believe it, but they still called Romulus a god. They did not want to offend the city they served by naming its founder otherwise than Rome did. Rome had believed it, not indeed from love of the error, but from the error of love. Christ, on the other hand, is the founder of the heavenly and eternal city, yet that city did not believe him to be God because he founded it. Rather, it is to be founded precisely because it believed.

ENGLISH

Rome, once built and dedicated, worshiped its founder as a god in a temple. But this Jerusalem set its founder, Christ God, on the foundation of faith so that it could be built and dedicated. Rome believed him a god because it loved him; this city loved him because it believed him God. In Rome, a reason for loving came first, so that it gladly believed even a false good of the one it already loved. In this city, a reason for believing came first, so that by right faith it loved, not rashly what was false, but what was true.

Apart from so many great miracles that convinced people Christ is God, there were also earlier divine prophecies, wholly worthy of belief. In his case these are not, as they were for the fathers, still believed to await fulfillment, but are now shown to have been fulfilled. About Romulus, on the other hand, we hear or read that he founded Rome and reigned in it. That is what happened, not what was prophesied before it happened. But as for his being received among the gods, the records hold this as a belief; they do not teach it as a fact. For no wonderful signs show that this truly befell him. Take the she-wolf that nursed him, which seems to have been a great portent. What sort of proof is that, or how strong a proof, that he was a god? Even if that lupa was not a prostitute but a beast, she was common to both of them, and yet his brother is not considered a god.[10]

But who was ever forbidden to call Romulus or Hercules or other such men gods, and preferred to die rather than not say it? Or would any nation worship Romulus among its gods unless fear of the Roman name compelled it? And who could count how many have chosen to be killed with whatever savage cruelty rather than deny that 10 Latin lupa means both "she-wolf" and "prostitute," and some ancient writers explained the legend of the twins' nurse this way. Romulus' twin brother was Remus.

LATIN

quae ab animis Romanorum, si non fieret, posse putabatur exsistere, conpellebat aliquas ciuitates positas sub iure Romano tamquam deum colere Romulum; a Christo autem Deo non solum colendo, uerum etiam confitendo tantam per orbis terrae populos martyrum multitudinem metus reuocare non potuit non leuis offensionis animorum, sed inmensarum uariarumque poenarum et ipsius mortis, quae plus ceteris formidatur.

Neque tunc ciuitas Christi, quamuis adhuc peregrinaretur in terris et haberet tamen magnorum agmina populorum, aduersus inpios persecutores suos pro temporali salute pugnauit; sed potius, ut obtineret aeternam, non repugnauit. Ligabantur includebantur, caedebantur torquebantur, urebantur laniabantur, trucidabantur — et multiplicabantur. Non erat eis pro salute pugnare nisi salutem pro Saluatore contemnere.

Scio in libro Ciceronis tertio, nisi fallor, de re publica disputari nullum bellum suscipi a ciuitate optima, nisi aut pro fide aut pro salute. Quid autem dicat pro salute uel intellegi quam salutem uelit, alio loco demonstrans: Sed his poenis, inquit, quas etiam stultissimi sentiunt, egestate exsilio, uinculis uerberibus, elabuntur saepe priuati oblata mortis celeritate; ciuitatibus autem mors ipsa poena est, quae uidetur a poena singulos uindicare. Debet enim constituta sic esse ciuitas, ut aeterna sit. Itaque nullus interitus est rei publicae naturalis, ut hominis, in quo mors non modo necessaria est, uerum etiam optanda persaepe. Ciuitas autem cum tollitur, deletur, exstinguitur: simile est quodam modo, ut parua magnis conferamus, ac si omnis hic mundus intereat et concidat.

Hoc ideo dixit Cicero, quia mundum non interiturum cum Platonicis sentit. Constat ergo eum pro ea salute uoluisse bellum suscipi a ciuitate, qua fit ut maneat hic ciuitas, sicut dicit, aeterna, quamuis morientibus et nascentibus singulis, sicut perennis est opacitas oleae uel lauri adque huius modi ceterarum arborum singulorum lapsu

ENGLISH

Christ is God? People thought that some slight indignation might arise in Roman minds if this were not done. Fear of that indignation, however slight, compelled certain cities under Roman rule to worship Romulus as a god. But fear could not turn so great a multitude of martyrs, among the peoples of the whole earth, away from worshiping Christ as God, and not only worshiping him but confessing him. That fear was not of some slight offense in people's minds. It was fear of immense and varied punishments, and of death itself, which is dreaded more than anything else.

At that time the city of Christ was still a pilgrim on earth, though it already had hosts of great peoples. Even so, it did not fight against its impious persecutors for its temporal safety. Rather, in order to obtain eternal safety, it did not fight back. Its people were bound and imprisoned, beaten and tortured, burned and torn apart, slaughtered—and they multiplied. For them, the only way to fight for their safety was to scorn safety for the sake of the Savior.

I know that in the third book of Cicero's Republic, if I am not mistaken, it is argued that the best state undertakes no war except for faith or for safety. What he means by "for safety," or what safety he wants us to understand, he shows in another passage. "But these punishments," he says, "which even the dullest people feel, such as poverty, exile, chains and flogging, private individuals often escape when death comes swiftly. For states, however, death itself is a punishment, though for individuals it seems to be a release from punishment. For a state ought to be so constituted that it is eternal. So there is no natural death for a commonwealth, as there is for a human being, for whom death is not only necessary but very often even desirable. But when a state is removed, destroyed, extinguished, it is in some way as if, to compare small things with great, this whole world were to perish and collapse."[11]

Cicero said this because he holds, with the Platonists, that the world will not perish. It is clear, then, what safety he meant a state to go to war for. It is the safety by which the state remains here, as he says, eternal, even while individuals die and are 11 Cicero, On the Republic 3.34–35; these fragments survive only because Augustine quotes them.

LATIN

ortuque foliorum. Mors quippe, ut dicit, non hominum singulorum, sed uniuersae poena est ciuitatis, quae a poena plerumque singulos uindicat. Unde merito quaeritur, utrum recte fecerint Saguntini, quando uniuersam ciuitatem suam interire maluerunt quam fidem frangere, qua cum ipsa Romana re publica tenebantur; in quo suo facto laudantur ab omnibus terrenae rei publicae ciuibus.

ENGLISH

born. In the same way the shade of an olive or a laurel, or of other trees of this kind, is perennial, while individual leaves fall and grow. For death, as he says, is a punishment not for individual human beings but for the whole state, and it often releases individuals from punishment. Hence it is rightly asked whether the Saguntines did right. They chose to let their whole city perish rather than break the faith by which they were bound to the Roman commonwealth itself. For this deed of theirs they are praised by all the citizens of the earthly commonwealth.[12]

Sed quo modo huic disputationi possent oboedire, non uideo, ubi dicitur nullum suscipiendum esse bellum nisi aut pro fide aut pro salute, nec dicitur, si in unum simul periculum ita duo ista concurrerint, ut teneri alterum sine alterius amissione non possit, quid sit potius eligendum. Profecto enim Saguntini si salutem eligerent, fides eis fuerat deserenda: si fides tenenda, amittenda utique salus, sicut factum est. Salus, autem ciuitatis Dei talis est, ut cum fide ac per fidem teneri uel potius adquiri possit; fide autem perdita ad eam quisque uenire non possit. Quae cogitatio firmissimi ac patientissimi cordis tot ac tantos martyres fecit, qualem ne unum quidem habuit uel habere potuit quando est deus creditus Romulus.

But I do not see how they could have obeyed this argument. It says that no war should be undertaken except for faith or for safety. It does not say which of the two should be chosen if they meet in a single danger in such a way that one cannot be kept without losing the other. For certainly, if the Saguntines chose safety, they would have had to abandon faith. If they kept faith, they would have had to lose safety, and that is what happened. But the safety of the city of God is such that it can be kept, or rather acquired, with faith and through faith; once faith is lost, no one can reach it. This thought, the thought of a most steadfast and most patient heart, made so many great martyrs. Not a single martyr of that kind existed, or could have existed, when Romulus was believed to be a god.

THAT THE WORLD'S BELIEF IN CHRIST WAS THE WORK OF DIVINE POWER, NOT HUMAN PERSUASION

In educated times, only divine power and miracles could have made the world believe the resurrection.

LATIN

22.7 Sed ualde ridiculum est de Romuli falsa diuinitate, cum de Christo loquimur, facere mentionem. Verum tamen cum sescentis ferme annis ante Ciceronem Romulus fuerit adque illa aetas iam fuisse doctrinis dicatur exculta, ut quod fieri non potest omne respueret: quanto magis post sescentos annos ipsius tempore Ciceronis maximeque postea sub Augusto adque Tiberio, eruditioribus utique temporibus, resurrectionem carnis Christi adque in caelum adscensionem, tamquam id quod fieri non potest, mens humana ferre non posset eludensque ab auribus cordibusque respueret, nisi eam fieri potuisse adque factam esse diuinitas ipsius ueritatis uel diuinitatis ueritas et contestantia miraculorum signa monstrarent; ut terrentibus et contradicentibus tam

ENGLISH

But it is quite absurd to mention the false divinity of Romulus when we are speaking of Christ. Still, Romulus lived nearly six hundred years before Cicero, and that age is said to have been already so refined by learning that it rejected everything that could not happen. How much more, then, six hundred years later, in Cicero's own time, and above all afterward under Augustus and Tiberius, in times that were certainly more educated, would the human mind have been unable to bear the resurrection of Christ's flesh and his ascension into heaven as something that cannot happen. It would have mocked them and shut them out of its ears 12 Saguntum, a city in Spain allied to Rome, was besieged and destroyed by Hannibal in 219 BC, an event that led to the Second Punic War.

LATIN

multis tamque magnis persecutionibus praecedens in Christo, deinde in ceteris ad nouum saeculum secutura resurrectio adque inmortalitas carnis et fidelissime crederetur et praedicaretur intrepide et per orbem terrae pullulatura fecundius cum martyrum sanguine sereretur.

ENGLISH

and hearts, had not the divinity of truth itself, or the truth of divinity, together with the corroborating signs of miracles, shown that this could happen and had happened. So, although so many great persecutions threatened and opposed it, the resurrection and immortality of the flesh, which came first in Christ and will follow in the rest at the coming of the new age, was believed most faithfully and proclaimed fearlessly. It was sown throughout the world with the blood of the martyrs, to spring up all the more fruitfully.[13]

Legebantur enim praeconia praecedentia prophetarum, concurrebant ostenta uirtutum, et persuadebatur ueritas noua consuetudini, non contraria rationi, donec orbis terrae, qui persequebatur furore, sequeretur fide.

For the prophets' earlier proclamations were read, displays of mighty works came together with them, and the truth was made persuasive: new to custom, but not contrary to reason. In the end the world, which had once pursued it in fury, came to follow it in faith.

THE MIRACLES THAT WERE DONE SO THAT THE WORLD MIGHT BELIEVE IN CHRIST, AND THAT DO NOT CEASE NOW THAT THE WORLD BELIEVES

Miracles still happen through the sacraments and the martyrs' shrines, though they are little known.

LATIN

22.8 Quur, inquiunt, nunc illa miracula, quae praedicatis facta esse, non fiunt? Possem quidem dicere necessaria fuisse, priusquam crederet mundus, ad hoc ut crederet mundus. Quisquis adhuc prodigia ut credat inquirit, magnum est ipse prodigium, qui mundo credente non credit. Verum hoc ideo dicunt, ut nec tunc illa miracula facta fuisse credantur. Unde ergo tanta fide Christus usquequaque cantatur in caelum cum carne sublatus? Unde temporibus eruditis et omne quod fieri non potest respuentibus sine ullis miraculis nimium mirabiliter incredibilia credidit mundus? An forte credibilia fuisse et ideo credita esse dicturi sunt? Quur ergo ipsi non credunt?

ENGLISH

"Why," they say, "do those miracles which you preach as having happened not happen now?" I could indeed say that they were necessary before the world believed, so that the world would believe. Whoever still demands prodigies in order to believe is himself a great prodigy, for he does not believe when the whole world believes. But they say this so that people will not believe that those miracles happened even then. Why, then, is Christ everywhere celebrated with such faith as having been taken up into heaven with his flesh? How is it that, in learned times that rejected everything that could not happen, the world believed incredible things without any miracles, and believed them in a truly miraculous way? Or will they perhaps say that these things were credible and were therefore believed? Then why do they not believe them themselves?

Breuis est igitur nostra conplexio: Aut incredibilis rei, quae non uidebatur, alia incredibilia, quae tamen fiebant et uidebantur, fecerunt fidem; aut certe res ita credibilis, ut nullis quibus persuaderetur miraculis indigeret, istorum nimiam redarguit infidelitatem. Hoc ad refellendos uanissimos dixerim. Nam facta esse multa

Our argument, then, is brief. Either other incredible things, which really happened and were seen, produced faith in an incredible thing that was not seen; or else the thing was so credible that it needed no miracles to persuade anyone, and then it convicts these people of excessive unbelief. I say 13 Augustus and Tiberius: the Roman emperors under whom Christ was born and crucified.

LATIN

miracula, quae adtestarentur illi uni grandi salubrique miraculo, quo Christus in caelum cum carne in qua resurrexit adscendit, negare non possumus. In eisdem quippe ueracissimis libris cuncta conscripta sunt, et quae facta sunt, et propter quod credendum facta sunt. Haec, ut fidem facerent, innotuerunt; haec per fidem, quam fecerunt, multo clarius innotescunt. Leguntur quippe in populis, ut credantur; nec in populis tamen nisi credita legerentur.

Nam etiam nunc fiunt miracula in eius nomine, siue per sacramenta eius siue per orationes uel memorias sanctorum eius; sed non eadem claritate inlustrantur, ut tanta quanta illa gloria diffamentur. Canon quippe sacrarum litterarum, quem definitum esse oportebat, illa facit ubique recitari et memoriae cunctorum inhaerere populorum; haec autem ubicumque fiunt, ibi sciuntur uix a tota ipsa ciuitate uel quocumque commanentium loco. Nam plerumque etiam ibi paucissimi sciunt ignorantibus ceteris, maxime si magna sit ciuitas; et quando alibi aliisque narrantur, non tanta ea commendat auctoritas, ut sine difficultate uel dubitatione credantur, quamuis Christianis fidelibus a fidelibus indicentur.

Miraculum, quod Mediolani factum est, cum illic essemus, quando inluminatus est caecus, ad multorum notitiam potuit peruenire, quia et grandis est ciuitas et ibi erat tunc imperator et inmenso populo teste res gesta est concurrente ad corpora martyrum Protasii et Geruasii; quae cum laterent et penitus nescirentur, episcopo Ambrosio per somnium reuelata reperta sunt; ubi caecus ille depulsis ueteribus tenebris diem uidit.

ENGLISH

this to refute the most frivolous of them. For we cannot deny that many miracles were done to bear witness to that one great and saving miracle by which Christ ascended into heaven with the flesh in which he rose. In those same most truthful books everything is written down: both the miracles that were done and the truth for whose belief they were done. These miracles became known in order to produce faith; through the faith they produced, they become known far more widely. For they are read among the peoples so that they may be believed; and yet they would not be read among the peoples unless they were believed.

For even now miracles are done in his name, whether through his sacraments or through the prayers or the shrines of his saints. But they are not lit up with the same brilliance, so as to be spread abroad with a fame as great as those had. For the canon of the sacred Scriptures, which had to be fixed, causes those miracles to be read aloud everywhere and to cling to the memory of all peoples. But these present miracles, wherever they happen, are known there hardly even to the whole city itself, or to whatever place people live in together. Often, in fact, even there very few know of them while the rest are unaware, especially if it is a large city. And when they are told elsewhere and to others, no authority commends them strongly enough for them to be believed without difficulty or doubt, even though they are reported by believing Christians to believing Christians.[14]

The miracle that took place at Milan while we were there, when a blind man received his sight, could come to the knowledge of many. For it is a large city, the emperor was there at the time, and the event took place with an immense crowd as witnesses, who had flocked to the bodies of the martyrs Protasius and Gervasius. These bodies had lain hidden and were entirely unknown, but they were revealed to Bishop Ambrose in a dream and found. And there that blind man, his old darkness driven away, saw the light of day.[15]

14 Shrines (memoriae): small shrines or chapels holding relics of the saints, especially the martyrs.
15 This happened in AD 386, when Augustine was living in Milan; Ambrose, bishop of Milan, baptized him the following year.

THE HEALING OF INNOCENTIUS

At Carthage a hidden fistula that surgeons were about to cut is found healed after fervent prayer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Aput Carthaginem autem quis nouit praeter admodum paucissimos salutem, quae facta est Innocentio, ex aduocato uicariae praefecturae, ubi nos interfuimus et oculis adspeximus nostris? Venientes enim de transmarinis me et fratrem meum Alypium, nondum quidem clericos, sed iam Deo seruientes, ut erat cum tota domo sua religiosissimus, ipse susceperat, et aput eum tunc habitabamus. Curabatur a medicis fistulas, quas numerosas adque perplexas habuit in posteriore adque ima corporis parte. Iam secuerant eum et artis suae cetera medicamentis agebant. Passus autem fuerat in sectione illa et diuturnos et acerbos dolores. Sed unus inter multos sinus fefellerat medicos adque ita latuerat, ut eum non tangerent, quem ferro aperire debuerant. Denique sanatis omnibus, quae aperta curabant, iste remanserat solus, cui frustra inpendebatur labor.	At Carthage, though, who besides a very few knows of the healing granted to Innocentius, formerly an advocate in the office of the deputy prefect? We were present at it and saw it with our own eyes. For when my brother Alypius and I came from overseas, not yet clergy but already serving God, he had taken us in, being, with his whole household, deeply religious; and we were living with him at the time. He was being treated by physicians for fistulas, many and complicated, which he had in the lower rear part of his body. They had already operated on him and were carrying out the rest of their art with medicines. In that operation he had suffered long and bitter pains. But one sinus among many had escaped the physicians and was so well hidden that they did not touch it, though they should have opened it with the knife. In the end, when all the others that they had opened and were treating had healed, this one alone remained, and all their labor on it was spent in vain.[16]
Quas moras ille suspectas habens multumque formidans, ne iterum secaretur (quod ei praedixerat alius medicus domesticus eius, quem non admiserant illi, ut saltem uideret, cum primum sectus est, quo modo id facerent, iratusque illum domo abiecerat uixque receperat), erupit adque ait: Iterum me secturi estis? Ad illius, quem noluistis esse praesentem, uerba uenturus sum? Inridere illi medicum inperitum metumque hominis bonis uerbis promissionibusque lenire. Praeterierunt alii dies plurimi nihilque proficiebat omne quod fiebat. Medici tamen in sua pollicitatione persistebant, non se illum sinum ferro, sed medicamentis esse clausuros. Adhibuerunt et alium grandaeuum iam medicum satisque in illa arte laudatum (adhuc enim uiuebat), Ammonium, qui loco inspecto idem quod illi ex eorum diligentia peritiaque promisit.	He regarded these delays with suspicion and was terribly afraid of being cut again. Another physician, a member of his household, had predicted this to him; when Innocentius was first operated on, the others had not let this man in even to watch how they did it, and Innocentius had angrily thrown him out of the house and had only reluctantly taken him back. So he burst out and said, "Are you going to cut me again? Am I going to end up just as that man said, the one you would not let be present?" They laughed at the unskilled physician and soothed the man's fear with kind words and promises. Many more days passed, and nothing that was done did any good. Yet the physicians persisted in their promise that they would close that sinus not with the knife but with medicines. They also called in another physician, Ammonius, already very old and highly esteemed in that art (he was still alive then), who examined the place and, trusting their care and skill, promised the same as they had.
Cuius ille factus auctoritate securus domestico suos medico, qui futuram praedixerat aliam sectionem, faceta	Made confident by his authority, Innocentius, as if already well, poked fun with witty good humor at hilaritate, uelut iam saluus, inlusit. Quid plura? Tot dies postea inaniter consumti transierunt, ut fessi adque confusi faterentur eum nisi ferro nullo modo posse sanari. Expauit, expalluit nimio timore turbatus, adque ubi se collegit farique potuit, abire illos iussit et ad se amplius non accedere; nec aliud occurrit fatigato lacrimis et illa iam necessitate constricto, nisi ut adhiberet Alexandrinum quendam, qui tunc chirurgus mirabilis habebatur, ut ipse faceret quod ab illis fieri nolebat iratus.

LATIN

Sed postea quam uenit ille laboremque illorum in cicatricibus sicut artifex uidit, boni uiri functus officio persuasit homini, ut illi potius, qui in eo tantum laborauerant, quantum ipse inspiciens mirabatur, suae curationis fine fruerentur, adiciens, quod re uera nisi sectus esset saluus esse non posset; ualde abhorrere a suis moribus, ut hominibus, quorum artificiosissimam operam industriam diligentiam mirans in cicatricibus eius uideret, propter exiguum quod remansit palmam tanti laboris auferret. Redditi sunt animo eius, et placuit ut eodem Alexandrino adsistente ipsi sinum illum ferro, qui iam consensu omnium aliter insanabilis putabatur, aperirent. Quae res dilata est in consequentem diem. Sed cum abissent illi, ex maerore nimio domini tantus est in domo illa exortus dolor, ut tamquam funeris planctus uix conprimeretur a nobis.

Visitabant eum cottidie sancti uiri, episcopus tunc Uzalensis, beatae memoriae Saturninus, et presbyter Gulosus ac diaconi Carthaginensis ecclesiae; in quibus erat et ex quibus solus est nunc in rebus humanis iam episcopus cum honore a nobis debito nominandus Aurelius, cum quo recordantes mirabilia operum Dei de hac re saepe conlocuti sumus eumque ualde meminisse, quod commemoramus, inuenimus. Qui cum eum, sicut solebant, uespere uisitarent, rogauit eos miserabilibus lacrimis, ut mane dignarentur esse praesentes suo funeri potius quam dolori. Tantus enim eum metus ex prioribus inuaserat poenis, ut se inter medicorum manus non his household physician, who had predicted another operation. What more need I say? So many days afterward passed, wasted to no purpose, that, worn out and embarrassed, they admitted that he could not possibly be healed except by the knife. He was terrified and turned pale, overwhelmed by fear; and when he had collected himself and could speak, he ordered them to leave and not to come near him again. Exhausted with weeping and now cornered by that necessity, he could think of nothing else but to call in a certain Alexandrian, who was then regarded as a marvelous surgeon, to do himself what Innocentius in his anger did not want the others to do.

ENGLISH

But after the Alexandrian came and, as a master of his craft, saw their work in the scars, he acted as a good man should. He persuaded Innocentius to let those who had labored on him so much—he marveled at it as he examined him—enjoy the completion of their treatment instead. He added that it was true that Innocentius could not be made well unless he was cut; but that it was quite foreign to his own character, for the sake of the little that remained, to snatch the prize for so great a labor from men whose most skillful work, diligence and care he saw with admiration in his scars. They were restored to his good graces, and it was agreed that, with the same Alexandrian present, they themselves would open with the knife that sinus, which everyone now agreed could not be healed any other way. The matter was put off until the following day. But when they had gone, the master's overwhelming sorrow caused such grief in that house that we could hardly hold it back; it was like the wailing at a funeral.

Holy men visited him every day: Saturninus of blessed memory, then bishop of Uzalis, the priest Gulosus, and the deacons of the church of Carthage. Among them was Aurelius, the only one of them still alive, now a bishop, whom I must name with the honor due to him. With him, as we recalled the marvelous works of God, I have often talked about this matter, and I found that he remembers well what I am relating. When they visited Innocentius in the evening, as they used to, he begged them with pitiable tears to be so kind as to attend his funeral in the morning, rather than his 16 Alypius: Augustine's closest friend, converted and baptized with him, later bishop of Thagaste.

LATIN	ENGLISH
dubitaret esse moriturum. Consolati sunt eum illi et hortati, ut in Deo fideret eiusque uoluntatem uiriliter ferret.	suffering. For such fear from his earlier pains had seized him that he had no doubt he would die in the physicians' hands. They comforted him and urged him to trust in God and to bear his will with courage.[17]
Inde ad orationem ingressi sumus; ubi nobis ex more genua figentibus adque incumbentibus terrae ille se ita proiecit, tamquam fuisset aliquo grauiter inpellente prostratus, et coepit orare: quibus modis, quo adfectu, quo motu animi, quo fluuio lacrimarum, quibus gemitibus adque singultibus subcutientibus omnia membra eius et paene intercludentibus spiritum, quis ullis explicet uerbis? Utrum orarent alii nec in haec eorum auerteretur intentio, nesciebam. Ego tamen prorsus orare non poteram; hoc tantummodo breuiter in corde meo dixi: Domine, quas tuorum preces exaudis, si has non exaudis? Nihil enim mihi uidebatur addi iam posse, nisi ut exspiraret orando. Surreximus et accepta ab episcopo benedictione discessimus, rogante illo ut mane adessent, illis ut aequo animo esset hortantibus.	Then we went in to pray. As we knelt in the usual way and bowed down to the ground, he threw himself down as if someone had violently pushed him over, and began to pray. In what manner, with what feeling, with what emotion of soul, with what flood of tears, with what groans and sobs that shook all his limbs and almost stopped his breath—who could explain it in any words? Whether the others were praying and their attention was not drawn away by all this, I did not know. I myself could not pray at all. I only said briefly in my heart: "Lord, what prayers of your people do you answer, if you do not answer these?" For it seemed to me that nothing more could be added, except that he should die praying. We rose and, after receiving the bishop's blessing, left; he begged them to be there in the morning, and they urged him to be calm.
Inluxit dies qui metuebatur, aderant serui Dei, sicut se adfuturos esse promiserant, ingressi sunt medici, parantur omnia quae hora illa poscebat, tremenda ferramenta proferuntur adtonitis suspensisque omnibus. Eis autem, quorum erat maior auctoritas, defectum animi eius consolando erigentibus ad manus secturi membra in lectulo conponuntur, soluuntur nodi ligamentorum, nudatur locus, inspicit medicus et secandum illum sinum armatus adque intentus inquirit Scrutatur oculis digitisque contrectat, tentat denique modis omnibus: inuenit firmissimam cicatricem. Iam laetitia illa et laus adque gratiarum actio misericordi et omnipotenti Deo, quae fusa est ore omnium lacrimantibus gaudiis, non est committenda meis uerbis: cogitetur potius quam dicatur.	The dreaded day dawned. The servants of God were there, as they had promised to be; the physicians came in. Everything that hour required is made ready; the fearsome instruments are brought out, while everyone is stunned and in suspense. Those with greater authority lift up his failing spirit with words of comfort, and his limbs are arranged on the bed for the hands of the surgeon. The knots of the bandages are undone, the place is laid bare; the physician examines it and, knife in hand and intent, searches for the sinus to be cut. He scrutinizes with his eyes, he feels with his fingers, he tries every way he can: he finds a perfectly firm scar. The joy then, the praise and thanksgiving to the merciful and almighty God that poured from everyone's lips amid tears of gladness, I must not entrust to my words: let it be imagined rather than told.

HEALINGS AT CARTHAGE AND BEYOND

A woman's breast cancer is healed by the sign of the cross; other cures follow at baptism and shrines.

LATIN	ENGLISH
In eadem Carthagine Innocentia, religiosissima femina, de primariis ipsius ciuitatis, in mamilla cancrum habebat,	In the same city of Carthage, Innocentia, a very devout woman from one of the leading families of rem, sicut medici dicunt, nullis medicamentis sanabilem. Aut ergo praecidi solet et a corpore separari membrum ubi nascitur, aut, ut aliquanto diutius homo uiuat, tamen inde morte quamlibet tardius adfutura, secundum Hippocratis ut ferunt sententiam omnis est omittenda curatio. Hoc illa a perito medico et suae domui familiarissimo acceperat et ad solum Deum se orando conuerterat. Admonetur in somnis propinquante Pascha, ut in parte feminarum obseruanti ad baptisterium, quaecumque illi baptizata primitus occurrisset, signaret ei locum signo Christi. Fecit, confestim sanitas consecuta est.

LATIN

Medicus sane, qui ei dixerat ut nihil curationis adhiberet, si paulo diutius uellet uiuere, cum inspexisset eam postea et sanissimam conperisset, quam prius habere illud malum tali inspectione cognouerat, quaesiuit ab ea uehementer quid adhibuisset, cupiens, quantum intellegi datur, nosse medicamentum, quo Hippocratis definitio uinceretur. Cumque ab ea quid factum esset audisset, uoce uelut contemnentis et uultu, ita ut illa metueret, ne aliquod contumeliosum uerbum proferret in Christum, religiosa urbanitate respondisse fertur: Putabam, inquit, magnum aliquid te mihi fuisse dicturam. Adque illa iam exhorrescente, mox addidit: Quid grande fecit Christus sanare cancrum, qui quadriduanum mortuum suscitauit?

Hoc ego cum audissem et uehementer stomacharer in illa ciuitate adque in illa persona non utique obscura factum tam ingens miraculum sic latere, hinc eam et admonendam et paene obiurgandam putaui. Quae cum mihi respondisset non se inde tacuisse, quaesiui ab eis, quas forte tunc matronas amicissimas secum habebat, utrum hoc antea scissent. Responderunt se omnino nescisse. Ecce, inquam, quo modo non taces, ut nec istae audiant, quae tibi tanta familiaritate iunguntur. Et quia breuiter ab ea quaesiueram, feci ut, illis audientibus multumque mirantibus et glorificantibus Deum, totum ex ordine, quem ad modum gestum fuerit, indicaret.

ENGLISH

the city, had a cancer in her breast—a thing, as physicians say, that no medicines can cure. So either the part where it arises is usually cut off and removed from the body, or, so that the patient may live a little longer, though death will come from it eventually however slowly, all treatment should be abandoned, which is said to be the opinion of Hippocrates. She had learned this from a skilled physician who was very close to her household, and she had turned to God alone in prayer. As Easter drew near, she was told in a dream that, as she kept watch at the baptistery on the women's side, the first newly baptized woman who met her should mark the place with the sign of Christ. She did so, and health followed immediately.[18]

Now the physician who had told her to apply no treatment if she wanted to live a little longer examined her afterward and found her perfectly healthy, though he had established by just such an examination that she had that disease before. He asked her urgently what she had used, wanting, as far as one can tell, to learn the remedy by which the verdict of Hippocrates could be overcome. When he heard from her what had happened, he is said to have answered, with a tone and a look as if of contempt, so that she feared he would utter some insulting word against Christ, but with devout wit: "I thought," he said, "you were going to tell me something great." And as she was already beginning to shudder, he quickly added: "What great thing has Christ done in healing a cancer, when he raised a man who had been dead four days?"[19]

When I heard this, I was extremely indignant that so great a miracle, done in that city and to a person who was certainly not obscure, should remain so hidden, and I thought she ought to be admonished and almost scolded for it. When she replied that she had not kept silent about it, I asked the ladies who happened to be with her at the time, her closest friends, whether they had known of this before. They answered that they had not known it at all. "There you are," I said. "This is how you have not kept silent: even these women, who are joined to you by such close friendship, 17 Aurelius: bishop of Carthage from c. AD 391 and primate of the African Church, Augustine's close ally.

18 Hippocrates: the famous Greek physician of the 5th century BC; his Aphorisms advise that hidden cancers are better left untreated.
19 An allusion to the raising of Lazarus (John 11).

LATIN

ENGLISH

have not heard of it." And since I had questioned her only briefly, I had her tell the whole story in order, just as it happened, while they listened, greatly amazed, and glorified God.

Medicum quendam podagrum in eadem urbe fuisse scimus; qui cum dedisset nomen ad baptismum et pridie quam baptizaretur in somnis a pueris nigris cirratis, quos intellegebat daemones, baptizari eodem anno prohibitus fuisset eisque non obtemperans etiam conculcantibus pedes eius in dolorem acerrimum, qualem numquam expertus est, aestuasset, magisque eos uincens lauacro regenerationis, ut uouerat, ablui non distulisset, in baptismate ipso non solum dolore, quo ultra solitum cruciabatur, uerum etiam podagra caruisse nec amplius, cum diu postea uixisset, pedes doluisse quis nouit? Nos tamen nouimus et paucissimi fratres ad quos id potuit peruenire.

We know that there was a physician in the same city who suffered from gout. He had given in his name for baptism. The day before he was to be baptized, he was forbidden in a dream to be baptized that year by black, curly-haired boys, whom he understood to be demons. He did not obey them, and when they even trampled on his feet, he burned with the sharpest pain, such as he had never experienced. But defeating them all the more, he did not put off being washed in the bath of rebirth, as he had vowed. Yet who knows that in baptism itself he was rid not only of the pain that was tormenting him beyond the usual but of the gout as well, and that, though he lived long afterward, his feet never hurt again? We know it, though, and so do a very few brothers whom the news could reach.

Ex mimo quidam Curubitanus non solum a paralysi, uerum etiam ab informi pondere genitalium, cum baptizaretur, saluus effectus est et liberatus utraque molestia, tamquam mali nihil habuisset in corpore, de fonte regenerationis adscendit. Quis hoc praeter Curubim nouit et praeter rarissimos aliquos, qui hoc ubicumque audire potuerunt? Nos autem cum hoc conperissemus, iubente sancto episcopo Aurelio etiam ut ueniret Carthaginem fecimus, quamuis a talibus prius audierimus, de quorum fide dubitare non possemus.

A former mime actor from Curubis was made well when he was baptized, not only of paralysis but also of a grotesque swelling of his genitals. Freed from both afflictions, he came up from the font of rebirth as though there had been nothing wrong in his body. Who knows of this besides the people of Curubis and a very rare few who may have heard of it here and there? But when we learned of it, at the instruction of the holy bishop Aurelius, we had him come to Carthage as well, although we had first heard of it from people whose good faith we could not doubt.[20]

Vir tribunicius Hesperius aput nos est; habet in territorio Fussalensi fundum (Zubedi appellatur); ubi cum adflictione animalium et seruorum suorum domum suam spirituum malignorum uim noxiam perpeti conperisset, rogauit nostros me absente presbyteros, ut aliquis eorum illo pergeret, cuius orationibus cederent. Perrexit unus, obtulit ibi sacrificium corporis Christi, orans quantum potuit, ut cessaret illa uexatio: Deo protinus miserante cessauit. Acceperat autem ab amico suo terram sanctam de Hierosolymis adlatam, ubi sepultus Christus die tertio resurrexit, eamque suspenderat in cubiculo suo, ne quid mali etiam ipse pateretur. Ast ubi domus eius ab illa infestatione purgata est, quid de illa terra fieret, Hesperius, a man of tribunician rank, lives among us. He has an estate in the district of Fussala, called Zubedi. When he discovered that his household was suffering from the harmful power of evil spirits, which afflicted his animals and his slaves, he asked our priests, while I was away, that one of them go there, so that the spirits might yield to his prayers. One went, offered there the sacrifice of the body of Christ, and prayed as hard as he could that the harassment would stop; and by God's mercy it stopped at once. Now Hesperius had received from a friend some holy earth brought from Jerusalem, where Christ was buried and rose 20 Curubis: a coastal town in Africa Proconsularis, on the Cape Bon peninsula in modern Tunisia.

LATIN

cogitabat, quam diutius in cubiculo suo reuerentiae causa habere nolebat.

Forte accidit, ut ego et collega tunc meus, episcopus Sinitensis ecclesiae Maximinus, in proximo essemus; ut ueniremus rogauit, et uenimus. Cumque nobis omnia rettulisset, etiam hoc petiuit, ut infoderetur alicubi adque ibi orationum locus fieret, ubi etiam Christiani possent ad celebranda quae Dei sunt congregari. Non restitimus; factum est. Erat ibi iuuenis paralyticus rusticanus. Hoc audito petiuit a parentibus suis, ut illum ad eum locum sanctum non cunctanter adferrent. Quo cum fuisset adlatus, orauit, adque inde continuo pedibus suis saluus abscessit.

Victoriana dicitur uilla, ab Hippone Regio minus triginta milibus abest. Memoria martyrum ibi est Mediolanensium Protasii et Geruasii. Portatus est eo quidam adulescens, qui cum die medio tempore aestatis equum ablueret in fluminis gurgite, daemonem incurrit. Ibi cum iaceret uel morti proximus uel simillimus mortuo, ad uespertinos illuc hymnos et orationes cum ancillis suis et quibusdam sanctimonialibus ex more domina possessionis intrauit adque hymnos cantare coeperunt. Qua uoce ille quasi percussus excussus est et cum terribili fremitu altare adprehensum mouere non audens siue non ualens, tamquam eo fuerit adligatus aut adfixus, tenebat et cum grandi eiulatu parci sibi rogans confitebatur, ubi adulescentem et quando et quo modo inuaserit.

Postremo se exiturum esse denuntians membra eius singula nominabat, quae se amputaturum exiens minabatur, adque inter haec uerba discessit ab homine. Sed oculus eius in maxillam fusus tenui uenula ab interiore quasi radice pendebat, totumque eius medium, quod nigellum fuerat, albicauerat. Quo uiso qui aderant (concurrerant autem etiam alii uocibus eius acciti et se omnes in orationem pro illo strauerant), quamuis eum sana mente stare gauderent, rursus tamen propter eius oculum contristati medicum quaerendum esse dicebant. Ibi maritus sororis eius, qui eum illo detulerat: Potens on the third day, and he had hung it up in his bedroom so that he himself would suffer no harm. But once his house had been cleansed of that infestation, he began to wonder what to do with that earth, since out of reverence he did not want to keep it in his bedroom any longer.

ENGLISH

It happened that my colleague at the time, Maximinus, bishop of the church of Sinitum, and I were nearby. He asked us to come, and we came. When he had told us everything, he also asked that the earth be buried somewhere and a place of prayer be made there, where Christians too could gather to celebrate the things of God. We did not object, and it was done. There was a young peasant there who was paralyzed. When he heard of this, he asked his parents to carry him to that holy place without delay. When he had been carried there, he prayed, and at once he walked away from there on his own feet, healed.

There is a country estate called Victoriana, less than thirty miles from Hippo Regius. It has a shrine of the Milanese martyrs Protasius and Gervasius. A young man was carried there who, while washing his horse in a deep pool of the river at midday in summer, had run into a demon. As he lay there, either close to death or very like a dead man, the lady of the estate came in, as was her custom, for evening hymns and prayers with her maidservants and some nuns, and they began to sing hymns. At the sound he was shaken as if struck, and with a terrible roar he seized the altar and held on to it, not daring or not able to move it, as if he had been tied or fastened to it. Then, with loud howling, begging to be spared, the demon confessed where, when and how it had seized the young man.[21]

Finally, announcing that it would leave, it named each of his limbs, threatening to cut them off as it went; and amid these words it departed from the man. But his eye had spilled down onto his cheek and was hanging by a thin little vein, as if from a root inside, and its whole center, which had been dark, had turned white. When those present saw this (others had also come running, summoned by his cries, and all had prostrated themselves in prayer for him), though they rejoiced to see him

21 Hippo Regius: Augustine's episcopal city on the coast of Numidia, modern Annaba in Algeria.

LATIN	ENGLISH
est, inquit, Deus sanctorum orationibus, qui fugauit daemonem, lumen reddere. Tum, sicut potuit, oculum lapsum adque pendentem loco suo reuocatum ligauit orario nec nisi post septem dies putauit esse soluendum. Quod cum fecisset, sanissimum inuenit.	standing there in his right mind, they were saddened again because of his eye and said that a physician must be sent for. Then his sister's husband, who had brought him there, said: "God, who drove away the demon, is able to restore his sight at the prayers of the saints." Then, as best he could, he put the eye that had fallen out and was hanging back in its place, bound it with a cloth, and decided that it should not be untied until seven days had passed. When he did untie it, he found the eye perfectly sound.
Sanati sunt illic et alii, de quibus dicere longum est.	Others were healed there too, but it would take too long to tell of them.
Hipponiensem quandam uirginem scio, cum se oleo perunxisset, cui pro illa orans presbyter instillauerat lacrimas suas, mox a daemonio fuisse sanatam. Scio etiam episcopum semel pro adulescente, quem non uidit, orasse illumque ilico daemone caruisse.	I know of a young woman of Hippo who anointed herself with oil into which the priest praying for her had let his tears fall, and who was soon freed from a demon. I also know that a bishop once prayed for a young man he had not seen, and that the young man was immediately rid of the demon.
Erat quidam senex Florentius Hipponiensis noster, homo religiosus et pauper; sartoris se arte pascebat; casulam perdiderat et unde sibi emeret non habebat; ad uiginti martyres, quorum memoria est aput nos celeberrima, clara uoce ut uestiretur orauit. Audierunt eum adulescentes qui forte aderant inrisores eumque discedentem exagitantes prosequebantur: quasi a martyribus quinquagenos folles, unde uestimentum emeret, petiuisset. At ille tacitus ambulans eiectum grandem piscem palpitantem uidit in litore eumque illis fauentibus adque adiuuantibus adprehendit et cuidam coquo, Catoso nomine, bene Christiano, ad coquinam conditariam, indicans quid gestum sit, trecentis follibus uendidit, lanam conparare inde disponens, ut uxor eius quo modo posset ei quo indueretur efficeret.	There was an old man of our Hippo named Florentius, a devout and poor man who earned his living as a tailor. He had lost his cloak and had nothing to buy another with. At the shrine of the Twenty Martyrs, which is very famous among us, he prayed aloud to be clothed. Some young men who happened to be there, scoffers, heard him, and as he left they followed him, taunting him as if he had asked the martyrs for fifty folles to buy a garment. But walking on in silence, he saw a large fish washed up on the shore, still flapping, and with their encouragement and help he caught it. He sold it for three hundred folles to a cook named Catosus, a good Christian, for his kitchen of preserved foods, telling him what had happened. He planned to buy wool with the money, so that his wife could make him something to wear as best she could.[22]
Sed coquus concidens piscem anulum aureum in uentriculo eius inuenit moxque miseratione flexus et religione perterritus homini eum reddidit dicens: Ecce quo modo te uiginti martyres uestierunt.	But the cook, cutting up the fish, found a gold ring in its belly. At once, moved by compassion and struck with religious awe, he gave it back to the man, saying, "See how the Twenty Martyrs have clothed you."

22 The Twenty Martyrs: a group of martyrs venerated at Hippo. Folles: small bronze coins of very low value.

THE RELICS OF SAINT STEPHEN

Relics of Saint Stephen bring sight, healing and even the raising of the dead in African towns.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ad aquas Tibilitanas episcopo adferente Praeiecto martyris gloriosissimi Stephani memoria ueniebat magnae multitudinis concursu et occursu. Ibi caeca mulier, ut ad episcopum portantem duceretur, orauit; flores, quos ferebat, dedit, recepit, oculis admouit, protinus uidit. Stupentibus qui aderant praeibat exsultans, uiam carpens et uiae ducem ulterius non requirens.	When Bishop Praeiectus was bringing relics of the most glorious martyr Stephen to Aquae Tibilitanae, a great crowd came flocking to meet them. There a blind woman begged to be led to the bishop who was carrying them. She gave him the flowers she was carrying, received them back, put them to her eyes, and immediately she could see. While those present were astounded, she went on ahead, rejoicing, making her own way and no longer needing anyone to guide her.[23]
Memorati memoriam martyris, quae posita est in castello Sinitensi, quod Hipponiensi coloniae uicinum est, eiusdem loci Lucilius episcopus populo praecedente adque sequente portabat. Fistula, cuius molestia iam diu laborauerat et familiarissimi sui medici, qui eum secaret, opperiebatur manus, illius piae sarcinae uectatione repente sanata est; nam deinceps eam in suo corpore non inuenit.	Lucilius, bishop of the town of Sinitum, which is near the colony of Hippo, was carrying the relic of that same martyr which is housed there, with the people going before and following after. He had long suffered from a troublesome fistula and was waiting for a physician, a close friend of his, to operate on it. Through carrying that holy burden it was suddenly healed; from then on he found no trace of it in his body.
Eucharius est presbyter ex Hispania, Calamae habitat, uetere morbo calculi laborabat; per memoriam supradicti martyris, quam Possidius illo aduexit episcopus, saluus factus est. Idem ipse postea morbo alio praeualescente mortuus sic iacebat, ut ei iam pollices ligarentur; opitulatione memorati martyris, cum de memoria eius reportata esset et super iacentis corpus missa ipsius presbyteri tunica, suscitatus est.	Eucharius is a priest from Spain who lives at Calama. He suffered from a long-standing illness of the stone, and through the relic of the martyr mentioned above, which Bishop Possidius brought there, he was healed. Later this same man, when another illness got the better of him, lay dead, so that his thumbs were already being tied. Through the help of that martyr, when the priest's own tunic had been taken to the shrine and brought back and laid over his body as he lay there, he was raised to life.[24]
Fuit ibi uir in ordine suo primarius, nomine Martialis, aeuo iam grauis et multum abhorrens a religione Christiana. Habebat sane fidelem filiam et generum eodem anno baptizatum. Qui cum eum aegrotantem multis et magnis lacrimis rogarent, ut fieret Christianus, prorsus abnuit eosque a se turbida indignatione submouit. Visum est genero eius, ut iret ad memoriam sancti Stephani et illic pro eo quantum posset oraret, ut Deus illi daret mentem bonam, qua credere non differret in Christum. Fecit hoc ingenti gemitu et fletu et	There was a man there named Martialis, a leading member of the town council, already advanced in years and strongly opposed to the Christian religion. He did, however, have a believing daughter, and a son-in-law who had been baptized that same year. When, during his illness, they begged him with many tears to become a Christian, he flatly refused and drove them away in angry indignation. His son-in-law decided to go to the shrine of Saint Stephen and pray for him there with all his 23 Stephen: the first Christian martyr (Acts 7), whose relics were discovered in AD 415 and soon reached Africa. Aquae Tibilitanae: a spa town in Numidia, modern Hammam Debagh in Algeria.

24 Calama: a town in Numidia, modern Guelma in Algeria. Possidius was its bishop, Augustine's friend and later his biographer.

LATIN

sinceriter ardente pietatis adfectu; deinde abscedens aliquid de altari florum, quod occurrit, tulit eique, cum iam nox esset, ad caput posuit; tum dormitum est. Et ecce ante diluculum clamat, ut ad episcopum curreretur, qui mecum forte tunc erat aput Hipponem.

Cum ergo eum audisset absentem, uenire presbyteros postulauit. Venerunt, credere se dixit, admirantibus adque gaudentibus omnibus baptizatus est. Hoc, quamdiu uixit, in ore habebat: Christe, accipe spiritum meum; cum haec uerba beatissimi Stephani, quando lapidatus est a Iudaeis, ultima fuisse nesciret; quae huic quoque ultima fuerunt; nam non multo post etiam ipse defunctus est.

Sanati sunt illic per eundem martyrem etiam podagri duo ciues, peregrinus unus: sed ciues omni modo; peregrinus autem per reuelationem, quid adhiberet quando doleret, audiuit; et cum hoc fecerit, dolor continuo conquiescit.

Audurus nomen est fundi, ubi ecclesia et in ea memoria martyris Stephani. Puerum quendam paruulum, cum in area luderet, exorbitantes boues, qui uehiculum trahebant, rota obtriuerunt, et confestim palpitauit exspirans. Hunc mater arreptum ad eandem memoriam posuit, et non solum reuixit, uerum etiam inlaesus apparuit.

Sanctimonialis quaedam in uicina possessione, quae Caspaliana dicitur, cum aegritudine laboraret ac desperaretur, ad eandem memoriam tunica eius adlata est; quae antequam reuocaretur, illa defuncta est. Hac tamen tunica operuerunt cadauer eius parentes, et recepto spiritu salua facta est. Aput Hipponem Bassus quidam Syrus ad memoriam eiusdem martyris orabat pro aegrotante et periclitante filia eoque secum uestem eius adtulerat, cum ecce pueri de domo cucurrerunt, qui ei mortuam nuntiarent. Sed cum orante illo ab amicis eius exciperentur, prohibuerunt eos illi dicere, ne per publicum plangeret. Qui cum domum redisset iam might, that God would give him a good mind, so that he would not put off believing in Christ. He did this with great groaning and weeping and with a sincere and burning devotion. Then, as he left, he took some flowers from the altar, whatever came to hand, and since it was already night, he placed them by Martialis's head; then the household went to sleep. And look: before dawn Martialis cries out for someone to run to the bishop, who happened at that time to be with me at Hippo.

ENGLISH

So when he heard that the bishop was away, he asked for the priests to come. They came; he said he believed; and to everyone's wonder and joy he was baptized. As long as he lived, these words were on his lips: "Christ, receive my spirit." He did not know that these had been the last words of the most blessed Stephen when he was stoned by the Jews. They were his last words too, for not long afterward he also died.[25]

Through the same martyr two citizens suffering from gout were also healed there, and one visitor from elsewhere. The citizens were healed completely; but the visitor was told in a revelation what to apply whenever he felt pain, and when he does this, the pain at once subsides.

Audurus is the name of an estate where there is a church, and in it a shrine of the martyr Stephen. A little boy was playing on the threshing floor when the oxen pulling a wagon swerved off the track and crushed him under the wheel, and at once he lay convulsing as he breathed his last. His mother snatched him up and laid him at that same shrine; and not only did he come back to life, but he was also found to be unhurt.

A nun on a neighboring estate called Caspaliana was ill and her life despaired of, and her tunic was taken to the same shrine; but before it could be brought back, she died. Her parents nevertheless covered her corpse with the tunic, and her breath returned and she was made well. At Hippo a Syrian named Bassus was praying at the shrine of the same martyr for his daughter, who was sick and in danger, and he had brought her clothing there with him. And look: servants came running from the house to tell him she was dead. But while he

25 Acts 7:59.

LATIN	ENGLISH
suorum eiulatibus personantem et uestem filiae, quam ferebat, super eam proiecisset, reddita est uitae.	was still praying, they were met by his friends, who forbade them to tell him, so that he would not mourn in public. When he came home to a house already ringing with the wailing of his family and threw his daughter's garment, which he was carrying, over her, she was restored to life.
Rursus ibidem aput nos Irenaei cuiusdam collectarii filius aegritudine exstinctus est. Cumque corpus iaceret exanime adque a lugentibus et lamentantibus exsequiae pararentur, amicorum eius quidam inter aliorum consolantium uerba suggessit, ut eiusdem martyris oleo corpus perungueretur. Factum est, et reuixit.	Again, here among us at Hippo, the son of a certain Irenaeus, a tax collector, died of an illness. While the body lay lifeless and the mourners, weeping and lamenting, were preparing the funeral, one of the father's friends, among the words of the others who were consoling him, suggested that the body be anointed with oil of the same martyr. It was done, and the boy came back to life.
Itemque aput nos uir tribunicius Eleusinus super memoriam martyrum, quae in suburbano eius est, aegritudine exanimatum posuit infantulum filium, et post orationem, quam multis cum lacrimis ibi fudit, uiuentem leuauit.	Likewise among us, Eleusinus, a man of tribunician rank, laid his infant son, who had died of an illness, on the shrine of the martyrs that stands on his estate outside the city. After the prayer he poured out there with many tears, he lifted the child up alive.

WRITTEN ACCOUNTS OF HEALINGS

Augustine has accounts of healings read in church; nearly seventy at Hippo in under two years.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quid faciam? Urget huius operis inplenda promissio, ut non hic possim omnia commemorare quae scio; et procul dubio plerique nostrorum, cum haec legent, dolebunt me praetermisisse tam multa, quae utique mecum sciunt. Quos iam nunc, ut ignoscant, rogo, et cogitent quam prolixi laboris sit facere, quod me hic non facere suscepti operis necessitas cogit. Si enim miracula sanitatum, ut alia taceam, ea tantummodo uelim scribere, quae per hunc martyrem, id est gloriosissimum Stephanum, facta sunt in colonia Calamensi et in nostra, plurimi conficiendi sunt libri, nec tamen omnia colligi poterunt, sed tantum de quibus libelli dati sunt, qui recitarentur in populis. Id namque fieri uoluimus, cum uideremus antiquis similia diuinarum signa uirtutum etiam nostris temporibus frequentari et ea non debere multorum notitiae deperire.	What am I to do? The promise to complete this work presses on me, so I cannot record here everything I know. No doubt many of our people, when they read this, will be sorry that I have passed over so many things that they certainly know as well as I do. I ask them now to forgive me, and to consider how long a labor it would be to do what the demands of the work I have undertaken compel me not to do here. For suppose I wished to write, to say nothing of other things, only of the miracles of healing worked through this martyr, the most glorious Stephen, in the colony of Calama and in our own town. Many books would have to be produced, and even then they could not all be collected, but only those for which written accounts have been submitted to be read out to the congregations. We wanted this done because we saw that signs of divine power like those of old were occurring frequently in our own times too, and that they ought not to be lost from the knowledge of many.
Nondum est autem biennium, ex quo aput Hipponem Regium coepit esse ista memoria, et multis, quod nobis	It is not yet two years since this shrine began to exist at Hippo Regius. Many accounts of the woncertissimum est, non datis libellis de his, quae mirabiliter facta sunt, illi ipsi qui dati sunt ad septuaginta ferme numerum peruenerant, quando ista conscripsi. Calamae uero, ubi et ipsa memoria prius esse coepit et crebrius dantur, inconparabili multitudine superant.

LATIN

Uzali etiam, quae colonia Uticae uicina est, multa praeclara per eundem martyrem facta cognouimus; cuius ibi memoria longe prius quam aput nos ab episcopo Euodio constituta est. Sed libellorum dandorum ibi consuetudo non est uel potius non fuit; nam fortasse nunc esse iam coepit. Cum enim nuper illic essemus, Petroniam, clarissimam feminam, quae ibi mirabiliter ex magno adque diuturno, in quo medicorum adiutoria cuncta defecerant, languore sanata est, hortati sumus, uolente supradicto loci episcopo, ut libellum daret, qui recitaretur in populo, et oboedientissime paruit. In quo, posuit etiam, quod hic reticere non possum, quamuis ad ea, quae hoc opus urgent, festinare conpellar.

A quodam ludaeo dixit sibi fuisse persuasum, ut anulum capillacio uinculo insereret, quo sub omni ueste ad nuda corporis cingeretur; qui anulus haberet sub gemma lapidem in renibus inuentum bouis. Hoc adligata quasi remedio ad sancti martyris limina ueniebat. Sed profecta a Carthagine, cum in confinio fluminis Bagradae in sua possessione mansisset, surgens ut iter perageret ante pedes suos illum iacentem anulum uidit et capillaciam zonam, qua fuerat adligatus, mirata tentauit. Quam cum omnino suis nodis firmissimis, sicut erat, conperisset adstrictam, crepuisse adque exsiluisse anulum suspicata est; qui etiam ipse cum integerrimus fuisset inuentus, futurae salutis quodam modo pignus de tanto miraculo se accepisse praesumsit adque illud uinculum soluens simul cum eodem anulo proiecit in flumen.

Non credant hoc, qui etiam Dominum legum per integra matris uirginalia enixum et ad discipulos ostiis clausis ingressum fuisse non credunt; sed hoc certe quaerant et, derful things done there have not been submitted; this we know for certain. Yet those that have been submitted had reached almost seventy in number by the time I wrote this. At Calama, however, where the shrine was established earlier and accounts are submitted more often, they far outnumber ours.

ENGLISH

At Uzalis too, a colony near Utica, we know of many remarkable things done through the same martyr. His shrine was established there by Bishop Evodius long before ours. But there the custom of submitting written accounts does not exist, or rather did not, for perhaps it has now begun. When we were there recently, we urged Petronia, a woman of senatorial rank, to submit an account to be read to the people, with the consent of the bishop of the place I have mentioned. She had been wonderfully cured there of a serious and long-lasting illness for which all the help of physicians had failed, and she complied most obediently. In her account she included something I cannot pass over in silence here, although I am pressed to hurry on to the matters this work demands.[26]

She said that a Jew had persuaded her to thread a ring onto a cord made of hair and to wear it tied around her bare body under all her clothes. Under its gem the ring held a stone found in the kidneys of an ox. Bound with this as if with a remedy, she was making her way to the shrine of the holy martyr. She set out from Carthage and stopped at her own estate near the river Bagradas. When she got up to continue her journey, she saw the ring lying before her feet. Astonished, she felt the girdle of hair with which it had been tied on. She found it still fastened exactly as it had been, with all its very firm knots, and supposed that the ring had cracked and sprung off. But when the ring too was found completely intact, she took it that from so great a miracle she had received, as it were, a pledge of her coming cure. She untied the cord and threw it, together with the ring, into the river.[27]

Let those who do not believe that the Lord Jesus was born leaving his mother's virginity intact, and that he came in to his disciples when the doors

26 Evodius, bishop of Uzalis (near Utica, in modern Tunisia), was a lifelong friend of Augustine.
27 The Bagradas is the modern Medjerda, the chief river of Tunisia, flowing into the sea near Carthage and Utica.

LATIN

si uerum inuenerint, illa credant. Clarissima femina est, nobiliter nata, nobiliter nupta, Carthagini habitat; ampla ciuitas, ampla persona rem quaerentes latere non sinit. Martyr certe ipse, quo inpetrante illa sanata est, in filium permanentis uirginis credidit: in eum, qui ostiis clausis ad discipulos ingressus est, credidit; postremo, propter quod omnia ista dicuntur a nobis, in eum, qui adscendit in caelum cum carne, in qua resurrexerat, credidit; et ideo per eum tanta fiunt, quia pro ista fide animam posuit.

ENGLISH

were shut, refuse to believe this as well. But let them at least investigate it, and if they find it true, let them believe those other things too. She is a woman of senatorial rank, nobly born and nobly married, and she lives in Carthage. A great city and a great lady do not allow the matter to stay hidden from those who look into it. The martyr himself, at whose intercession she was healed, certainly believed in the Son of the ever-virgin mother. He believed in him who came in to his disciples when the doors were shut. And finally, and this is why we are saying all this, he believed in him who ascended into heaven in the flesh in which he had risen. That is why such great things are done through him: because he laid down his life for this faith.

Fiunt ergo etiam nunc multa miracula eodem Deo faciente per quos uult et quem ad modum uult, qui et illa quae legimus fecit: sed ista nec similiter innotescunt neque, ut non excidant animo, quasi glarea memoriae, crebra lectione tunduntur. Nam et ubi diligentia est, quae nunc aput nos esse coepit, ut libelli eorum, qui beneficia percipiunt, recitentur in populo, semel hoc audiunt qui adsunt pluresque non adsunt, ut nec illi, qui adfuerunt, post aliquot dies quod audierunt mente retineant et uix quisque reperiatur illorum, qui ei, quem non adfuisse cognouerit, indicet quod audiuit.

So even now many miracles are done. The same God who did those we read of works them through whom he wills and as he wills. But these do not become equally well known, nor are they pounded into the memory by frequent reading, like gravel into a road, so that they do not slip from the mind. Even where there is the care, now begun among us, to have the accounts of those who receive these benefits read out to the people, those present hear it only once, and more people are absent than present. So even those who were present do not retain what they heard for more than a few days, and scarcely anyone among them is found who will tell what he heard to someone he knows was not there.

THE TREMBLING BROTHER AND SISTER

A brother and sister from Cappadocia, cursed with trembling, are healed at Stephen's shrine on Easter.

LATIN

Unum est aput nos factum, non maius quam illa quae dixi, sed tam clarum adque inlustre miraculum, ut nullum arbitrer esse Hipponiensium, qui hoc non uel uiderit uel didicerit, nullum qui obliuisci ulla ratione potuerit. Decem quidam fratres (quorum septem sunt mares, tres feminae) de Caesarea Cappadociae, suorum ciuium non ignobiles, maledicto matris recenti patris eorum obitu destitutae, quae iniuriam sibi ab eis factam acerbissime tulit, tali poena sunt diuinitus coherciti, ut horribiliter quaterentur omnes tremore membrorum; in qua foedissima specie oculos suorum ciuium non ferentes, quaqua uersum cuique ire uisum est, toto paene uagabantur orbe Romano. Ex his etiam ad nos uenerunt

ENGLISH

One miracle happened among us that was no greater than those I have mentioned, but so clear and conspicuous that I think there is no one in Hippo who did not either see it or hear of it, and no one who could possibly have forgotten it. There were ten brothers and sisters, seven male and three female, from Caesarea in Cappadocia, people of some standing among their fellow citizens. Their mother had been left alone by their father's recent death, and she took very bitterly a wrong they had done her. Through her curse they were punished by God with such a penalty that all of them were horribly shaken by a trembling of duo, frater et soror, Paulus et Palladia, multis aliis locis miseria diffamante iam cogniti.

LATIN

Venerunt autem ante Pascha ferme dies quindecim, ecclesiam cottidie et in ea memoriam gloriosissimi Stephani frequentabant, orantes ut iam sibi placaretur Deus et salutem pristinam redderet. Et illic et quacumque ibant conuertebant in se ciuitatis adspectum. Nonnulli, qui eos alibi uiderant causamque tremoris eorum nouerant, aliis, ut cuique poterant, indicabant. Venit et Pascha, adque ipso die dominico mane, cum iam frequens populus praesens esset et loci sancti cancellos, ubi martyrium erat, idem iuuenis orans teneret, repente prostratus est et dormienti simillimus iacuit, non tamen tremens, sicut etiam per somnum solebant. Stupentibus qui aderant adque aliis pauentibus, aliis dolentibus, cum eum quidam uellent erigere, nonnulli prohibuerunt et potius exitum exspectandum esse dixerunt. Et ecce surrexit, et non tremebat, quoniam sanatus erat, et stabat incolumis, intuens intuentes.

Quis ergo se tenuit a laudibus Dei? Clamantium gratulantiumque uocibus ecclesia usquequaque conpleta est. Inde ad me curritur, ubi sedebam iam processurus; inruit alter quisque post alterum, omnis posterior quasi nouum, quod alius prior dixerat, nuntiantes; meque gaudente et aput me Deo gratias agente ingreditur etiam ipse cum pluribus, inclinatur ad genua mea, erigitur ad osculum meum. Procedimus ad populum, plena erat ecclesia, personabat uocibus gaudiorum: Deo gratias, Deo laudes! nemine tacente hinc adque inde clamantium. Salutaui populum, et rursus eadem feruentiore uoce clamabant. Facto tandem silentio scripturarum diuinarum sunt lecta sollemnia. Ubi autem uentum est ad mei sermonis locum, dixi pauca pro tempore et pro illius iucunditate laetitiae. Magis enim eos in opere diuino quandam Dei eloquentiam non audire, sed considerare permisi.

ENGLISH

the limbs. In this most unsightly condition they could not bear the eyes of their fellow citizens, and they wandered over almost the whole Roman world, each wherever he chose. Two of them came to us as well, a brother and a sister, Paul and Palladia. They were already known in many other places, since their misery had spread their story abroad.[28]

They arrived about fifteen days before Easter. Every day they came to the church, and in it to the shrine of the most glorious Stephen, praying that God would at last be reconciled to them and restore their former health. There, and wherever they went, they drew the eyes of the city to themselves. Some who had seen them elsewhere and knew the cause of their trembling told others as best they could. Easter came. On the Lord's day itself, in the morning, a large crowd was already present, and the young man was praying and holding on to the railings of the holy place where the martyr's shrine was. Suddenly he fell down and lay there just like someone asleep, yet not trembling, though they used to tremble even in their sleep. Those present were amazed, some frightened, others distressed. Some wanted to lift him up, but others prevented them and said they should rather wait to see the outcome. And look: he got up, and he was not trembling, because he had been healed. He stood there sound and well, gazing at those who were gazing at him.

Who then could hold back from praising God? The whole church was filled with the voices of people shouting and rejoicing. From there they came running to me where I was sitting, about to go out. They burst in one after another, each newcomer announcing as news what someone else had already told me. While I was rejoicing and thanking God within myself, the young man himself came in too with several others. He knelt at my knees and was raised up for my kiss. We went out to the people. The church was full and ringing with cries of joy: "Thanks be to God! Praise be to God!" No one was silent; people were shouting on every side. I greeted the people, and they cried out the same words again with even more fervent voices. When at last there was silence, the appointed readings from the divine Scriptures were read.

28 Caesarea in Cappadocia is modern Kayseri in central Turkey.

LATIN

ENGLISH

When we came to the place for my sermon, I said a few words suited to the occasion and to the delight of that joy. For I let them not so much hear as contemplate a kind of eloquence of God in his divine work.

Nobiscum homo prandit et diligenter nobis omnem suae fraternaeque ac maternae calamitatis indicauit historiam. Sequenti itaque die post sermonem redditum narrationis eius libellum in crastinum populo recitandum promisi. Quod cum ex dominico Paschae die tertio fieret in gradibus exedrae, in qua de superiore loquebar loco, feci stare ambos fratres, cum eorum legeretur libellus. Intuebatur populus uniuersus sexus utriusque unum stantem sine deformi motu, alteram membris omnibus contrementem. Et qui ipsum non uiderant, quid in eo diuinae misericordiae factum esset, in eius sorore cernebant. Videbant enim quid in illo gratulandum, quid pro illa esset orandum.

The man dined with us and told us carefully the whole story of his own misfortune and that of his brothers, his sisters, and his mother. So the following day, after delivering my sermon, I promised that a written account of his story would be read to the people the next day. This was done on the third day after Easter Sunday. While their account was being read, I had the brother and sister both stand on the steps of the apse, from whose raised platform I was speaking. The whole congregation, men and women alike, gazed at the one standing without any unsightly movement and at the other trembling in every limb. Those who had not seen him saw in his sister what divine mercy had done in him. For they saw what there was to rejoice over in him and what they had to pray for on her behalf.

Inter haec recitato eorum libello de conspectu populi eos abire praecepi, et de tota ipsa causa aliquanto diligentius coeperam disputare, cum ecce me disputante uoces aliae de memoria martyris nouae gratulationis audiuntur. Conuersi sunt eo, qui me audiebant, coeperuntque concurrere. Illa enim, ubi de gradibus descendit in quibus steterat, ad sanctum martyrem orare perrexerat; quae mox ut cancellos adtigit, conlapsa similiter uelut in somnum sana surrexit. Dum ergo requireremus quid factum fuerit, unde iste strepitus laetus exstiterit, ingressi sunt cum illa in basilicam, ubi eramus, adducentes eam sanam de martyris loco. Tum uero tantus ab utroque sexu admirationis clamor exortus est, ut uox continuata cum lacrimis non uideretur posse finiri. Perducta est ad eum locum, ubi paulo ante steterat tremens.

Meanwhile, when their account had been read, I told them to leave the people's sight, and I had begun to discuss the whole matter somewhat more thoroughly. Suddenly, while I was speaking, other voices were heard from the martyr's shrine, cries of fresh rejoicing. Those who were listening to me turned that way and began to run there together. When she came down from the steps on which she had stood, she had gone on to pray to the holy martyr. As soon as she touched the railings she collapsed in the same way, as if falling asleep, and got up healed. So while we were asking what had happened and where this joyful noise had come from, they came with her into the basilica where we were, bringing her healed from the martyr's place. Then such a cry of wonder rose from men and women alike that the continuous shouting, mixed with tears, seemed as if it could never end. She was led to the place where a little earlier she had stood trembling.

Exsultabant eam similem fratri, cui doluerant remansisse dissimilem, et nondum fusas preces suas pro illa, iam tamen praeuiam uoluntatem tam cito exauditam esse cernebant. Exsultabant in Dei laudem uoce sine uerbis, tanto sonitu, quantum nostrae aures ferre uix possent. Quid erat in cordibus exsultantium nisi fides Christi, pro qua Stephani sanguis effusus est?

They had grieved that she remained unlike her brother, and now they exulted that she was like him. They saw that, though they had not yet poured out their prayers for her, the wish that went ahead of their prayers had already been heard, and so quickly. They exulted in God's praise with a voice without words, with such a noise that our ears could scarcely bear it. What was in the hearts of those who exulted but the faith of Christ, for which Stephen's blood was shed?

LATIN

ENGLISH

THAT ALL THE MIRACLES DONE THROUGH THE MARTYRS IN CHRIST'S NAME BEAR WITNESS TO THE FAITH BY WHICH THE MARTYRS BELIEVED IN CHRIST

The martyrs' miracles bear witness to the faith in Christ's bodily resurrection for which they died.

LATIN

ENGLISH

22.9 Cui, nisi huic fidei adtestantur ista miracula, in qua praedicatur Christus resurrexisse in carne et in caelum adscendisse cum carne? quia et ipsi martyres huius fidei martyres, id est huius fidei testes, fuerunt; huic fidei testimonium perhibentes mundum inimicissimum et crudelissimum pertulerunt, eumque non repugnando, sed moriendo uicerunt; pro ista fide mortui sunt, qui haec a Domino inpetrare possunt, propter cuius nomen occisi sunt; pro hac fide praecessit eorum mira patientia, ut in his miraculis tanta ista potentia sequeretur. Nam si carnis in aeternum resurrectio uel non praeuenit in Christo uel non uentura est, sicut praenuntiatur a Christo uel sicut praenuntiata est a prophetis, a quibus praenuntiatus est Christus: quur et mortui tanta possunt, qui pro ea fide, qua haec resurrectio praedicatur, occisi sunt?

To what do these miracles bear witness, if not to this faith, which proclaims that Christ rose in the flesh and ascended into heaven with the flesh? For the martyrs themselves were martyrs of this faith, that is, witnesses of this faith. Bearing witness to this faith, they endured a world that was most hostile and most cruel, and they overcame it not by fighting back but by dying. For this faith they died, and so they can obtain such things from the Lord for whose name they were killed. For this faith their wonderful endurance came first, so that this great power might follow in these miracles. For suppose the resurrection of the flesh for eternity either did not first take place in Christ, or will not come as Christ foretold it, or as the prophets foretold it, the prophets by whom Christ himself was foretold. Then why do even the dead have such power, men who were killed for the faith in which this resurrection is proclaimed?[29]

Siue enim Deus ipse per se ipsum miro modo, quo res temporales operatur aeternus, siue per suos ministros ista faciat; et eadem ipsa, quae per ministros facit, siue quaedam faciat etiam per martyrum spiritus, sicut per homines adhuc in corpore constitutos, siue omnia ista per angelos, quibus inuisibiliter, incorporaliter, inmutabiliter imperat, operetur, ut, quae per martyres fieri dicuntur, eis orantibus tantum et inpetrantibus, non etiam operantibus fiant; siue alia istis, alia illis modis, qui nullo modo conprehendi a mortalibus possunt: ei tamen adtestantur haec fidei, in qua carnis in aeternum resurrectio praedicatur.

God may do these things himself, by himself, in that wonderful way in which, eternal as he is, he works things in time. Or he may do them through his ministers. And of the things he does through ministers, he may do some even through the spirits of martyrs, as he does through human beings still living in the body. Or he may work all of them through angels, whom he commands invisibly, incorporeally, unchangeably, so that what is said to be done through the martyrs is done only by their praying and interceding, not also by their working. Or he may do some things in one way and some in another, in ways that mortals cannot comprehend at all. Whatever the case, these things bear witness to the faith that proclaims the resurrection of the flesh for eternity.

29 Martyr is the Greek word for "witness."

HOW MUCH MORE WORTHILY THE MARTYRS ARE HONORED, WHO OBTAIN MANY WONDERS SO THAT THE TRUE GOD MAY BE WORSHIPED, THAN THE DEMONS, WHO DO CERTAIN THINGS SO THAT THEY THEMSELVES MAY BE BELIEVED TO BE GODS

Pagan gods' wonders cannot compare with the martyrs', who are honored as men, not worshiped as gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.10	Hic forte dicturi sunt etiam deos suos aliqua mira fecisse. Bene, si iam incipiunt deos suos nostris mortuis hominibus conparare. An dicent etiam se habere deos ex hominibus mortuis, sicut Herculem, sicut Romulum, sicut alios multos, quos in deorum numerum receptos opinantur? Sed nobis martyres non sunt di, quia unum eundemque Deum et nostrum scimus et martyrum. Nec tamen miraculis, quae per memorias nostrorum martyrum fiunt, ullo modo sunt conparanda miracula, quae facta per templa perhibentur illorum. Verum si qua similia uidentur, sicut a Moyse magi Pharaonis, sic eorum di uicti sunt a martyribus nostris.	Here perhaps they will say that their gods too have done some wonderful things. Good, if they are now beginning to compare their gods to our dead human beings! Or will they say that they too have gods who were once dead human beings, like Hercules, like Romulus, like many others whom they believe to have been received into the number of the gods? But for us the martyrs are not gods, because we know that one and the same God is both ours and the martyrs'. Nor are the miracles said to have been done through their temples in any way comparable to the miracles that happen through the shrines of our martyrs. If some do seem similar, their gods have been overcome by our martyrs, just as Pharaoh's magicians were overcome by Moses.[30]
	Fecerunt autem illa daemones eo fastu inpurae superbiae, quo eorum di esse uoluerunt; faciunt autem ista martyres uel potius Deus aut cooperantibus aut orantibus eis, ut fides illa proficiat, qua eos non deos nostros esse, sed unum Deum nobiscum habere credamus. Denique illi talibus dis suis et templa aedificauerunt et statuerunt aras, et sacerdotes instituerunt et sacrificia fecerunt; nos autem martyribus nostris non templa sicut dis, sed memorias sicut hominibus mortuis, quorum aput Deum uiuunt spiritus, fabricamus; nec ibi erigimus altaria, in quibus sacrificemus martyribus, sed uni Deo et martyrum et nostro; ad quod sacrificium sicut homines Dei, qui mundum in eius confessione uicerunt, suo loco et ordine nominantur, non tamen a sacerdote, qui sacrificat, inuocantur.	The demons performed those wonders with the haughtiness of the unclean pride by which they wanted to be gods to those people. But these wonders are performed by the martyrs, or rather by God, with the martyrs either cooperating or praying, so that the faith may advance by which we believe that they are not our gods, but have one God together with us. In short, those people built temples to such gods of theirs, set up altars, appointed priests, and offered sacrifices. But for our martyrs we build not temples, as for gods, but shrines, as for dead human beings whose spirits are alive with God. Nor do we set up altars there on which to sacrifice to the martyrs; we sacrifice to the one God, who is both the martyrs' God and ours. At this sacrifice they are named in their own place and order, as men of God who overcame the world by confessing him; but they are not invoked by the priest who offers the sacrifice.
	Deo quippe, non ipsis sacrificat, quamuis in memoria sacrificet eorum, quia Dei sacerdos est, non illorum. Ipsum uero sacrificium corpus est Christi, quod non offertur ipsis, quia hoc sunt et ipsi. Quibus igitur potius credendum est miracula facientibus? Eisne qui se ipsos uolunt haberi deos ab his quibus ea faciunt, an eis qui, ut	For he sacrifices to God, not to them, even though he sacrifices at their shrine, because he is God's priest, not theirs. And the sacrifice itself is the body of Christ, which is not offered to them, because they too are that body. Which miracle-workers, then, should we rather believe? Those who 30 Exodus 7–8, where Moses' signs outdo those of Pharaoh's magicians.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	in Deum credatur, quod et Christus est, faciunt quidquid mirabile faciunt? Eisne qui sacra sua etiam crimina sua esse uoluerunt, an eis qui nec laudes suas uolunt esse sacra sua, sed totum, quod ueraciter laudantur, ad eius gloriam proficere in quo laudantur? in Domino quippe laudantur animae eorum. Credamus ergo eis et uera dicentibus et mira facientibus. Dicendo enim uera passi sunt, ut possint facere mira.	want to be regarded as gods by the people for whom they perform them, or those who do whatever wonders they do so that people may believe in God, which is what Christ also is? Those who wanted even their crimes to be their rites, or those who do not want even their praises to be their rites, but want all the praise they truly receive to serve the glory of him in whom they are praised? For "their souls are praised in the Lord." Let us therefore believe them, since they both speak the truth and do wonders. For they suffered for speaking the truth, so that they might be able to do wonders.[31]
	In eis ueris est praecipuum, quod Christus resurrexit a mortuis et inmortalitatem resurrectionis in sua carne primus ostendit, quam nobis adfuturam uel in principio noui saeculi uel in huius fine promisit.	Among those truths, the chief is that Christ rose from the dead and was the first to show in his own flesh the immortality of the resurrection. He promised that it would come to us either at the beginning of the new age or at the end of this one.

AGAINST THE PLATONISTS, WHO ARGUE FROM THE NATURAL WEIGHTS OF THE ELEMENTS THAT AN EARTHLY BODY CANNOT BE IN HEAVEN

Against the Platonists' argument from the weights of the elements, earthly bodies can dwell in heaven.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.11	Contra quod magnum Dei donum ratiocinatores isti, quorum cogitationes nouit Dominus quoniam uanae sunt, de ponderibus elementorum argumentantur; quoniam scilicet magistro Platone didicerunt mundi duo corpora maxima adque postrema duobus mediis, aere scilicet et aqua, esse copulata adque coniuncta. Ac per hoc, inquiunt, quoniam terra abhinc sursum uersus est prima, secunda aqua super terram, tertius aer super aquam, quartum super aera caelum, non potest esse terrenum corpus in caelo; momentis enim propriis, ut ordinem suum teneant, singula elementa librantur. Ecce qualibus argumentis omnipotentiae Dei humana contradicit infirmitas, quam possidet uanitas. Quid ergo faciunt in aere terrena tot corpora, cum a terra sit aer tertius?	Against this great gift of God these reasoners, "whose thoughts the Lord knows to be futile," argue from the weights of the elements. They have learned, you see, from their master Plato that the two greatest and outermost bodies of the world are linked and joined by two intermediate ones, namely air and water. "And therefore," they say, "since earth is first going upward from here, water second above the earth, air third above the water, and heaven fourth above the air, an earthly body cannot be in heaven. For each element is balanced by its own weight so as to keep its place in the order." See what kind of arguments human weakness, possessed by futility, uses to contradict the omnipotence of God! What, then, are so many earthly bodies doing in the air, when air is third from the earth?[32]
	Nisi forte, qui per plumarum et pennarum leuitatem donauit auium terrenis corporibus, ut portentur in aere, inmortalibus factis corporibus hominum non poterit donare uirtutem, qua etiam in summo caelo ualeant habitare. Animalia quoque ipsa terrena, quae uolare non	Unless perhaps he who granted the earthly bodies of birds the ability to be carried in the air, through the lightness of their down and feathers, will be unable to give human bodies, once made immortal, the power to dwell even in the highest heaven!

31 An adaptation of Psalm 33:3 (34:2 in most English Bibles): "My soul shall be praised in the Lord."
32 The scheme of the elements comes from Plato's Timaeus.

LATIN

possunt, in quibus et homines sunt, sicut sub aqua pisces, quae sunt aquarum animalia, ita sub terra uiuere debuerunt. Quur ergo non saltem de secundo, id est de aquis, sed de elemento tertio terrenum animal carpit hanc uitam? Quare, cum pertineat ad terram, in secundo, quod super terram est, elemento uiuere si cogatur, continuo suffocatur et ut uiuat uiuit in tertio? An errat hic ordo elementorum, uel potius non in natura rerum, sed in istorum argumentationibus deficit?

Omitto dicere, quod iam in tertio decimo libro dixi, quam multa grauia terrena sint corpora, sicut plumbum, et formam tamen ab artifice accipiant, qua natare ualeant super aquam; et ut accipiat qualitatem corpus humanum, qua ferri in caelum et esse possit in caelo, omnipotenti artifici contradicitur?.

Iam uero contra illud, quod dixi superius, etiam istum considerantes adque tractantes elementorum ordinem, quo confidunt, non inueniunt omnino quod dicant. Sic est enim hinc sursum uersus terra prima, aqua secunda, tertius aer, quartum caelum, ut super omnia sit animae natura. Nam et Aristoteles quintum corpus eam dixit esse et Plato nullum.

Si quintum esset, certe superius esset ceteris; cum uero nullum est, multo magis superat omnia. In terreno ergo quid facit corpore? In hac mole quid agit subtilior omnibus? In hoc pondere quid agit leuior omnibus? In hac tarditate quid agit celerior omnibus? Itane per huius tam excellentis naturae meritum non poterit effici, ut corpus eius leuetur in caelum, et cum ualeat nunc natura corporum terrenorum deprimere animas deorsum, aliquando et animae leuare sursum terrena corpora non ualebunt?

Iam si ad eorum miracula ueniamus, quae facta a dis suis obponunt martyribus nostris, nonne etiam ipsa pro nobis facere et nobis reperientur omnino proficere? Nam inter magna miracula deorum suorum profecto magnum illud est, quod Varro commemorat, Vestalem uirginem, cum periclitaretur falsa suspicione de stupro, cribrum

ENGLISH

By their reasoning, the earthly animals that cannot fly, human beings among them, ought to have lived under the earth, just as fish, the creatures of the water, live under the water. Why then does an earthly animal draw its life not at least from the second element, the waters, but from the third? Though it belongs to the earth, why is it that if it is forced to live in the second element, which lies above the earth, it at once suffocates, and in order to live it lives in the third? Is this order of the elements mistaken, or rather does it fail not in the nature of things but in these people's arguments?

I pass over what I already said in the thirteenth book: how many earthly bodies, like lead, are heavy, and yet receive from a craftsman a shape that lets them float on water. And is the almighty Craftsman to be denied the power to give the human body a quality by which it can be carried into heaven and exist in heaven?

Now, even if they consider and examine this order of the elements in which they trust, they find nothing whatever to say against what I said above. For earth is first going upward from here, water second, air third, heaven fourth, in such a way that the nature of the soul is above them all. Aristotle said it was a fifth body, and Plato that it was no body at all.[33]

If it were a fifth body, it would certainly be higher than the rest; but since it is no body at all, it surpasses them all much more. What, then, is it doing in an earthly body? What is the subtlest of all things doing in this bulk? What is the lightest of all doing in this weight? What is the swiftest of all doing in this sluggishness? Will it really be impossible, by the merit of so excellent a nature, to bring it about that its body is lifted into heaven? The nature of earthly bodies can now press souls downward; will souls one day be unable to lift earthly bodies upward as well?

Now if we come to their miracles, which they set against our martyrs as works of their gods, will not even these be found to support us and to be entirely to our advantage? Surely one of the great miracles of their gods is the one Varro records. A Vestal virgin, in danger because of a false suspi-

33 Aristotle posited a fifth element (the aether, or "quintessence"), and ancient writers such as Cicero reported that he made it the substance of the mind.

LATIN

inplesse aqua de Tiberi et ad suos iudices nulla eius parte stillante portasse. Quis aquae pondus supra cribrum tenuit? Quis tot cauernis patentibus nihil inde in terram cadere permisit? Responsuri sunt: Aliquis deus aut aliquis daemon. Si deus, numquid maior est Deo, qui fecit hunc mundum? Si daemon, numquid potentior est angelo, qui Deo seruit, a quo factus est mundus?

Si ergo deus minor uel angelus uel daemon potuit pondus umidi elementi sic suspendere, ut aquarum uideatur mutata fuisse natura: itane Deus omnipotens, qui omnia ipsa creauit elementa, terreno corpori graue pondus auferre non poterit, ut in eodem elemento habitet uiuificatum corpus, in quo uoluerit uiuificans spiritus?

Deinde cum aera medium ponant inter ignem desuper et aquam subter, quid est quod eum inter aquam et aquam et inter aquam et terram saepe inuenimus? Quid enim uolunt esse aquosas nubes, inter quas et maria aer medius reperitur? Quonam, quaeso, elementorum pondere adque ordine efficitur, ut torrentes uiolentissimi adque undosissimi, antequam sub aere in terris currant, super aera in nubibus pendeant? Quur denique aer est medius inter summa caeli et nuda terrarum, quaqua uersum orbis extenditur, si locus eius inter caelum et aquas, sicut aquarum inter ipsum et terras est constitutus?

Postremo si ita est elementorum ordo dispositus, ut secundum Platonem duobus mediis, id est aere et aqua, duo extrema, id est ignis et terra, iungantur caelique obtineat ille summi locum, haec autem imi uelut fundaminis mundi, et ideo in caelo esse non potest terra: quur est ipse ignis in terra? Secundum hanc quippe rationem ita ista duo elementa in locis propriis, imo ac summo, terra et ignis esse debuerunt, ut, quem ad modum nolunt in summo esse posse quod imi est, ita nec in imo posset esse quod summi est. Sicut ergo nullam putant uel esse uel futuram esse terrae particulam in caelo, ita nullam particulam uidere debuimus ignis in terra.

ENGLISH

cion of unchastity, filled a sieve with water from the Tiber and carried it to her judges without a drop leaking from any part of it. Who held the weight of the water above the sieve? Who allowed nothing to fall from it to the ground through so many open holes? They will answer: "Some god, or some demon." If a god, is he greater than God, who made this world? If a demon, is he more powerful than an angel who serves God, by whom the world was made?[34]

If, then, a lesser god, or an angel, or a demon could so suspend the weight of a liquid element that the very nature of water seems to have been changed, will almighty God, who created all the elements themselves, really be unable to remove its heavy weight from an earthly body, so that the body, brought to life, may dwell in whatever element the life-giving spirit wishes?

Next, since they place air in the middle, between fire above and water below, how is it that we often find it between water and water, and between water and earth? What do they make of the watery clouds, with air found in the middle between them and the seas? By what weight and order of the elements, I ask you, does it come about that the most violent and surging torrents hang above the air in the clouds before they run over the earth beneath the air? Why, finally, is air in the middle between the heights of heaven and the bare surface of the lands, wherever the world extends, if its place has been fixed between heaven and the waters, just as that of the waters is between air and the earth?

Lastly, suppose the order of the elements is arranged so that, according to Plato, the two extremes, fire and earth, are joined by two intermediates, air and water, and fire holds the place of the highest heaven, while earth holds the lowest, as the foundation, so to speak, of the world, and that therefore earth cannot be in heaven. Then why is fire itself on earth? By this reasoning these two elements, earth and fire, ought to have been in their proper places, lowest and highest, in such a way that, just as they will not allow what belongs to the lowest to be in the highest, so what belongs to the highest could not be in the lowest. So, just as they think that no particle of earth either is or 34 The Vestal Virgins, priestesses of Vesta, were bound to chastity on pain of death; tradition names this one Tuccia.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	will be in heaven, so we ought to see no particle of fire on earth.
Nunc uero non solum in terris, uerum etiam sub terris ita est, ut eum eructent uertices montium, praeter quod in usibus hominum et esse ignem in terra et eum nasci uidemus ex terra; quando quidem et de lignis et de lapidibus nascitur, quae sunt corpora sine dubitatione terrena. Sed ille, inquiunt, ignis est tranquillus, purus, innoxius, sempiternus; iste autem turbidus, fumeus, corruptibilis adque corruptor. Nec tamen corrumpit montes, in quibus iugiter aestuat, cauernasque terrarum. Verum esto, sit illi iste dissimilis, ut terrenis habitationibus congruat: quur ergo nolunt, ut credamus naturam corporum terrenorum aliquando incorruptibilem factam caelo conuenientem futuram, sicut nunc ignis corruptibilis his conuenit terris?	But in fact fire is not only on the earth but even beneath it, so much so that mountain peaks belch it forth. Besides, in human use we see both that fire is on earth and that it is born from earth, since it comes from wood and from stones, which are without doubt earthly bodies. "But that fire," they say, "is tranquil, pure, harmless, everlasting; this one is turbulent, smoky, corruptible and corrupting." Yet it does not corrupt the mountains in which it rages continually, or the caverns of the earth. But granted: let this fire be unlike that one, so as to suit earthly dwellings. Why then do they refuse to let us believe that the nature of earthly bodies, made incorruptible at some future time, will be suited to heaven, just as corruptible fire is now suited to these lands?
Nihil igitur adferunt ex ponderibus adque ordine elementorum, unde omnipotenti Deo, quominus faciat corpora nostra talia, ut etiam in caelo possint habitare, praescribant.	So they bring forward nothing from the weights and order of the elements on which to base an objection against almighty God, to stop him from making our bodies such that they can dwell even in heaven.

AGAINST THE SLANDERS OF UNBELIEVERS, WHO MOCK CHRISTIANS FOR BELIEVING IN THE RESURRECTION OF THE FLESH

Unbelievers mock the resurrection with questions about fetuses, size, hair, nails and cannibalism.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.12 Sed scrupulosissime quaerere et fidem, qua credimus resurrecturam carnem, ita quaerendo adsolent inridere: utrum fetus abortiui resurgant; et quoniam Dominus ait: Amen, dico uobis, capillus capitis uestri non peribit, utrum statura et robur aequalia futura sint omnibus an diuersae corporum quantitates. Si enim aequalitas erit corporum, unde habebunt quod hic non habuerunt in mole corporis illi abortiui, si resurgent et ipsi? Aut si non resurgent, quia nec nati sunt, sed effusi, eandem quaestionem de paruulis uersant, unde illis mensura corporis, quam nunc defuisse uidemus, accedat, cum in hac aetate moriuntur. Neque enim dicturi sumus eos non resurrecturos, qui non solum generationis, uerum etiam regenerationis capaces sunt. Deinde interrogant, quem modum ipsa aequalitas habitura sit.	But they are in the habit of asking questions with extreme scrupulousness, and by asking them to mock the faith by which we believe that the flesh will rise again. They ask whether aborted fetuses rise. And since the Lord says, "Truly I tell you, not a hair of your head will perish," they ask whether stature and strength will be equal for everyone, or whether bodies will differ in size. For if bodies are to be equal, where will those aborted fetuses get the bodily bulk they did not have here, if they too are to rise? Or if they will not rise, because they were not born but simply expelled, they turn the same question onto little children: where will they obtain the bodily size that we now see they lacked, when they die at that age? For we are certainly not going to say that those will not rise who are capable not only of being born but also of being reborn. Next they ask what standard this equality itself will follow.[35]

LATIN

Si enim tam magni et tam longi erunt omnes, quam fuerunt quicumque hic fuerunt maximi adque longissimi, non solum de paruulis, sed de plurimis quaerunt, unde illis accessurum sit, quod hic defuit, si hoc quisque recipiat, quod hic habuit; si autem, quod ait apostolus, occursuros nos omnes in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi, et illud alterum: Quos praedestinauit conformes imaginis filii sui, sic intellegendum est, ut statura et modus corporis Christi omnium, qui in regno eius erunt, humanorum corporum sit futurus: Multis erit, inquiunt, de magnitudine et longitudine corporis detrahendum; et ubi iam erit: capillus capitis uestri non peribit, si de ipsa corporis quantitate tam multum peribit? Quamuis et de ipsis capillis possit inquiri, utrum redeat quidquid tondentibus decidit.

Quod si rediturum est, quis non exhorreat illam deformitatem? Nam hoc et de unguibus uidetur necessario secuturum, ut redeat tam multum quod corporis curatura desecuit. Et ubi erit decus, quod certe maius, quam in ista esse corruptione potuit, in illa iam inmortalitate esse debebit? Si autem non redibit, ergo peribit Quo modo igitur, inquiunt, capillus capitis non peribit? De macie quoque uel pinguedine similiter disputant. Nam si aequales omnes erunt, non utique alii macri, alii pingues erunt. Accedet ergo aliis aliquid, aliis minuetur; ac per hoc non, quod erat, recipiendum, sed alicubi addendum est, quod non fuit, et alicubi perdendum, quod fuit.

De ipsis etiam corruptionibus et dilapsionibus corporum mortuorum, cum aliud uertatur in puluerem, in auras aliud exhaletur, sint quos bestiae, sint quos ignis absumit, naufragio uel quibuscumque aquis ita quidam pereant, ut eorum carnes in umorem putredo dissoluat, non mediocriter permouentur adque omnia ista recolligi in carnem et redintegrari posse non credunt. Consectantur etiam quasque foeditates et uitia, siue accidant siue nascantur, ubi et monstrosos partus cum horrore adque inrisione commemorant, et requirunt, quaenam cuiusque

ENGLISH

For if everyone is to be as large and as tall as the very largest and tallest people here have been, they raise the question not only about little children but about most people: where will they get what they lacked here, if each person receives back what he had here? But suppose we take what the apostle says, that we shall all come "to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ," and that other text, "Those whom he predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son," to mean that the stature and size of Christ's body will be the stature and size of all the human bodies that will be in his kingdom. Then, they say, a great deal will have to be taken away from the size and height of many bodies. And what then becomes of "not a hair of your head will perish," if so much of the very size of the body is going to perish? One might ask about the hair itself, too, whether everything that the barber has cut off comes back.[36]

And if it is going to come back, who would not shudder at such ugliness? For the same thing seems necessarily to follow for the nails as well: that all the great quantity which care of the body has trimmed away will return. And where will be the beauty which, in that immortality, ought certainly to be greater than it could be in this state of corruption? If, on the other hand, it does not return, then it will perish. How then, they say, will no hair of the head perish? They argue in the same way about thinness and fatness. For if all are to be equal, surely some will not be thin and others fat. So something will be added to some and taken away from others. And so it will not be a matter of receiving back what was, but of adding in one place what was not, and losing in another what was.

They are also greatly troubled by the very decay and dissolution of dead bodies. One part turns to dust, another evaporates into the air; there are some whom beasts devour, some whom fire consumes; some perish by shipwreck or in waters of whatever kind in such a way that decay dissolves their flesh into liquid. And they do not believe that all of this can be gathered back into flesh and restored whole. They also pursue every disfigurement and defect, whether it comes by accident or

35 Luke 21:18.
36 Ephesians 4:13; Romans 8:29.

LATIN

deformitatis resurrectio sit futura. Si enim nihil tale redire in corpus hominis dixerimus, responsionem nostram de locis uulnerum, cum quibus Dominum Christum resurrexisse praedicamus, se confutaturos esse praesumunt.

Sed inter haec omnia quaestio difficillima illa proponitur, in cuius carnem reditura sit caro, qua corpus alterius uescentis humana uiscera fame conpellente nutritur. In carnem quippe conuersa est eius, qui talibus uixit alimentis, et ea, quae macies ostenderat, detrimenta subpleuit. Utrum ergo illi redeat homini cuius caro prius fuit, an illi potius cuius postea facta est, ad hoc percontantur, ut fidem resurrectionis inludant ac sic animae humanae aut alternantes, sicut Plato, ueras infelicitates falsasque promittant beatitudines aut post multas itidem per diuersa corpora reuolutiones aliquando tamen eam, sicut Porphyrius, finire miserias et ad eas numquam redire fateantur; non tamen corpus habendo inmortale, sed corpus omne fugiendo.

ENGLISH

from birth. Here they bring up monstrous births with horror and ridicule, and ask what sort of resurrection each deformity will have. For if we say that nothing of the kind will return in a human body, they presume they will refute our answer by pointing to the places of the wounds with which, as we proclaim, the Lord Christ rose.

But among all these, the most difficult question put forward is this: into whose flesh will that flesh return which has gone to nourish the body of someone else, when hunger has driven him to eat human flesh? For it has been turned into the flesh of the man who lived on such food, and it made good the losses that his emaciation had displayed. So does it return to the man whose flesh it was first, or rather to the one whose flesh it later became? They ask this in order to mock the faith in the resurrection. In this way they either promise the human soul, as Plato does, true miseries and false happiness in alternation, or else admit, as Porphyry does, that after many cycles through different bodies the soul does at last end its miseries and never returns to them—yet not by having an immortal body, but by fleeing every body.[37]

WHETHER ABORTED FETUSES DO NOT BELONG TO THE RESURRECTION, IF THEY BELONG TO THE NUMBER OF THE DEAD

Augustine dares neither affirm nor deny that miscarried fetuses rise, but leans toward their resurrection.

LATIN

22.13 Ad haec ergo, quae ab eorum parte contraria me digerente mihi uidentur obposita, misericordia Dei meis nisibus opem ferente respondeam. Abortiuos fetus, qui, cum iam uixissent in utero, ibi sunt mortui, resurrecturos ut adfirmare, ita negare non audeo; quamuis non uideam quo modo ad eos non pertineat resurrectio mortuorum, si non eximuntur de numero mortuorum. Aut enim non omnes mortui resurgent et erunt aliquae humanae animae sine corporibus in aeternum, quae corpora humana, quamuis intra uiscera materna, gestarunt; aut si omnes animae humanae recipient resurgentia sua corpora, quae habuerunt, ubicumque uiuentia et morientia reliquerunt, non inuenio quem ad modum dicam ad resurrectionem non pertinere mortuorum quoscumque mortuos etiam in uteris matrum.

ENGLISH

To these objections, then, which as I have set them out seem to me to be raised by the opposing side, I shall now reply, with the mercy of God assisting my efforts. As for aborted fetuses, which had already lived in the womb and died there, I do not dare either to affirm or to deny that they will rise. Yet I do not see how the resurrection of the dead can fail to concern them, if they are not excluded from the number of the dead. For either not all the dead will rise, and there will be some human souls without bodies forever—souls that bore human bodies, even if only within their mothers' wombs. Or, if all human souls will receive back, as they rise, the bodies they had, wherever they left them, whether living or dying, then I cannot find any way to say that the resurrection of the dead does 37 Porphyry held that the purified soul escapes the cycle of rebirth for good, never again to be joined to a body.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	not concern those who died, even in their mothers' wombs.
Sed utrumlibet de his quisque sentiat., quod de iam natis infantibus dixerimus, hoc etiam de illis intellegendum est, si resurgent.	But whichever view anyone holds about them, what we shall say about infants already born must be understood of them as well, if they rise.

WHETHER INFANTS WILL RISE WITH THE BODILY BUILD THEY WOULD HAVE HAD AS THEY GREW OLDER

Infants will rise with the full stature that time would have given them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.14 Quid ergo de infantibus dicturi sumus, nisi quia non in ea resurrecturi sunt corporis exiguitate, qua mortui, sed quod eis tardius accessurum erat tempore, hoc sunt illo Dei opere miro adque celerrimo recepturi? In sententia quippe Domini, ubi ait: Capillus capitis uestri non peribit, dictum est non defuturum esse quod fuit, non autem negatum est adfuturum esse quod defuit. Defuit autem infanti mortuo perfecta quantitas sui corporis; perfecto quippe infanti deest utique perfectio magnitudinis corporalis, quae cum accesserit, iam statura longior esse non possit. Hunc perfectionis modum sic habent omnes, ut cum illo concipiantur adque nascantur; sed habent in ratione, non mole; sicut ipsa membra omnia iam sunt latenter in semine, cum etiam natis nonnulla adhuc desint, sicut dentes ac si quid eius modi.	What, then, are we to say about infants, except that they will not rise in the smallness of body in which they died, but will receive, by that wonderful and most swift work of God, what time would have added to them more slowly? For in the Lord's saying, "Not a hair of your head will perish," it is stated that what was there will not be lacking; it is not denied that what was lacking will be there. Now the infant who died lacked the full size of its body. For even a perfectly formed infant certainly lacks the perfection of bodily size, the point at which, once reached, the stature can grow no taller. All have this measure of perfection in such a way that they are conceived and born with it; but they have it in their formative principle, not in bulk. In the same way all the limbs are already hidden in the seed, although some are still lacking even after birth, such as the teeth and anything else of that kind.
In qua ratione uniuscuiusque materiae indita corporali iam quodam modo, ut ita dicam, liciatum uidetur esse, quod nondum est, immo quod latet, sed accessu temporis erit uel potius apparebit. In hac ergo infans iam breuis aut longus est, qui breuis longusue futurus est. Secundum hanc rationem profecto in resurrectione corporis detrimenta corporis non timemus, quia, etsi aequalitas futura esset omnium, ita ut omnes usque ad giganteas magnitudines peruenirent, ne illi, qui maximi fuerunt, minus haberent aliquid in statura, quod eis contra sententiam Christi periret, qui dixit nec capillum capitis esse periturum, Creatori utique, qui creauit cuncta de nihilo, quo modo deesse posset unde adderet quod addendum esse mirus artifex nosset?	In this principle, implanted in the bodily material of each individual, what does not yet exist—or rather, what lies hidden but will come to be, or better, will appear, as time goes on—seems already in a certain way to be, so to speak, threaded on the loom. In this principle, then, an infant who is going to be short or tall is already short or tall. In accordance with this principle we certainly need fear no bodily losses in the resurrection of the body. For suppose all were to be equal, so that everyone reached the size of giants, in order that those who were very large should not have less of their stature—which would then perish for them, contrary to the saying of Christ, who said that not even a hair of the head would perish. Even so, how could the Creator, who created all things out of nothing, lack the material from which to add what he, the wonderful craftsman, knew had to be added?

WHETHER THE BODIES OF ALL THE DEAD WILL RISE TO THE MEASURE OF THE LORD'S BODY

All will rise at the size of youthful maturity, the age Christ reached, not at his exact size.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.15	Sed utique Christus in ea mensura corporis, in qua mortuus est, resurrexit, nec fas est dicere, cum resurrectionis omnium tempus uenerit, accessuram corpori eius eam magnitudinem, quam non habuit, quando in ea discipulis, in qua illis erat notus, apparuit, ut longissimis fieri possit aequalis. Si autem dixerimus ad dominici corporis modum etiam quorumque maiora corpora redigenda, peribit de multorum corporibus plurimum, cum ipse nec capillum periturum esse promiserit.	But Christ certainly rose in the bodily size in which he died. Nor is it right to say that, when the time of the resurrection of all has come, his body will be given a size it did not have when he appeared to his disciples in the form in which they knew him, so that it could be made equal to the tallest. But if we say that everyone else's larger bodies must be reduced to the measure of the Lord's body, a great deal will perish from the bodies of many, though he himself promised that not even a hair would perish.
	Restat ergo, ut suam recipiat quisque mensuram, quam uel habuit in iuuentute, etiamsi senex est mortuus, uel fuerat habiturus, si est ante defunctus, adque illud, quod commemorauit apostolus de mensura aetatis plenitudinis Christi, aut propter aliud intellegamus dictum esse, id est, ut illi capiti in populis Christianis accedente omnium perfectione membrorum aetatis eius mensura conpleatur, aut, si hoc de resurrectione corporum dictum est, sic accipiamus dictum, ut nec infra nec ultra iuuenalem formam resurgant corpora mortuorum, sed in eius aetate et robore, usque ad quam Christum hic peruenisse cognouimus (circa triginta quippe annos definierunt esse etiam saeculi huius doctissimi homines iuuentutem; quae cum fuerit spatio proprio terminata, inde iam hominem in detrimenta uergere grauioris ac senilis aetatis); et ideo non esse dictum in mensuram corporis uel in mensuram staturae, sed in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi.	It remains, then, that each person receives his own measure: either the one he had in his youth, even if he died an old man, or the one he would have had, if he died before reaching it. As for what the apostle said about "the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ," we should understand it in one of two ways. Either it was said with reference to something else—namely, that the measure of Christ's age is completed for that Head when the perfection of all the members among the Christian peoples is added to it. Or, if it was said of the resurrection of bodies, we should take it to mean that the bodies of the dead will rise neither below nor beyond the form of youth, but in the age and strength that we know Christ reached here. (For even the most learned men of this world have defined youth as lasting to about thirty years; when it has run its proper span, a person begins from then on to decline toward the losses of the heavier age of old age.) And that is why it was not said "to the measure of the body" or "to the measure of stature," but "to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ."

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE CONFORMING OF THE SAINTS TO THE IMAGE OF THE SON OF GOD

Being conformed to the Son's image refers to the inner self or to immortality, not to bodily size.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.16	Illud etiam, quod ait praedestinatos conformes imaginis filii Dei, potest et secundum interiorem hominem intellegi (unde nobis alio loco dicit: Nolite conformari huic saeculo, sed reformamini in nouitate mentis uestrae; ubi ergo reformamur, ne conformemur huic saeculo, ibi conformamur Dei filio); potest et sic accipi, ut, quem ad	That other text, too, where he says that the predestined are "conformed to the image of the Son of God," can be understood with reference to the inner self. This is why he says to us in another place, "Do not be conformed to this world, but be reformed in the newness of your mind." So where

LATIN	ENGLISH
modum nobis ille mortalitate, ita nos illi efficiamur inmortalitate conformes; quod quidem et ad ipsam resurrectionem corporum pertinet. Si autem etiam in his uerbis, qua forma resurrectura sint corpora, sumus admoniti, sicut illa mensura, ita et ista conformatio non quantitatis intellegenda est, sed aetatis. Resurgent itaque omnes tam magni corpore, quam uel erant uel futuri erant aetate iuuenali; quamuis nihil oberit, etiamsi erit infantilis uel senilis corporis forma, ubi nec mentis, nec ipsius corporis ulla remanebit infirmitas.	we are reformed so as not to be conformed to this world, there we are conformed to the Son of God. It can also be taken to mean that, just as he became conformed to us in mortality, so we become conformed to him in immortality; and this certainly does concern the resurrection of bodies. But if in these words, too, we are being told in what form bodies will rise, then, like that "measure," this "conformity" is to be understood not of size but of age. So all will rise as large in body as they either were, or would have been, at the age of youth. And yet it will do no harm even if the body has the form of an infant or an old man, since there no weakness will remain, either of mind or of the body itself.[38]
Unde etiam si quis in eo corporis modo, in quo defunctus est, resurrecturum unumquemque contendit, non est cum illo laboriosa contradictione pugnandum.	So even if someone maintains that each person will rise in the bodily size in which he died, there is no need to fight him with laborious contradiction.

WHETHER WOMEN'S BODIES WILL BE RAISED AND REMAIN IN THEIR OWN SEX

Women will rise as women; sex is nature, not a defect, though there will be no lust or marriage.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.17 Nonnulli propter hoc, quod dictum est: Donec occurramus omnes in uirum perfectum, in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi, et: Conformes imaginis filii Dei, nec in sexu femineo resurrecturas feminas credunt, sed in uirili omnes aiunt, quoniam Deus solum uirum fecit ex limo, feminam ex uiro. Sed mihi melius sapere uidentur, qui utrumque sexum resurrecturum esse non dubitant. Non enim libido ibi erit, quae confusionis est causa. Nam priusquam peccassent, nudi erant, et non confundebantur uir et femina. Corporibus ergo illis uitia detrahentur, natura seruabitur.	Some, because of the words "until we all come to the perfect man, to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ," and "conformed to the image of the Son of God," believe that women will not rise in the female sex; they say that all will rise male, since God made only the man from clay, and the woman from the man. But those seem to me to be wiser who do not doubt that both sexes will rise. For there will be no lust there, which is the cause of shame. Before they sinned, "they were naked, and the man and the woman were not ashamed." So defects will be removed from those bodies, but their nature will be preserved.[39]
Non est autem uitium sexus femineus, sed natura, quae tunc quidem et a concubitu et a partu inmunis erit; erunt tamen membra feminea non adcommodata usui ueteri, sed decori nouo, quo non adliciatur adspicientis concupiscentia, quae nulla erit, sed Dei laudetur sapientia adque clementia, qui et quod non erat fecit et liberauit a corruptione quod fecit. Ut enim in exordio generis humani de latere uiri dormientis costa detracta femina fieret, Christum et ecclesiam tali facto iam tunc	Now the female sex is not a defect but nature. It will then indeed be free from intercourse and childbirth; yet the female organs will remain, suited not to their old use but to a new beauty. This beauty will not arouse the desire of the one who looks—there will be no such desire—but will move him to praise the wisdom and kindness of God, who both made what was not and freed from corruption what he made. For at the beginning of

38 Romans 12:2.
39 Genesis 2:25.

LATIN

prophetari oportebat. Sopor quippe ille uiri mors erat Christi, cuius exanimis in cruce pendentis latus lancea perforatum est adque inde sanguis et aqua profluxit; quae sacramenta esse nouimus, quibus aedificatur ecclesia.

Nam hoc etiam uerbo scriptura usa est, ubi non legitur formauit aut finxit, sed: Aedificauit eam in mulierem; unde et apostolus aedificationem dicit corporis Christi, quod est ecclesia. Creatura est ergo Dei femina sicut uir; sed ut de uiro fieret, unitas commendata; ut autem illo modo fieret, Christus, ut dictum est, et ecclesia figurata est. Qui ergo utrumque sexum instituit, utrumque restituet.

Denique ipse Iesus interrogatus a Sadducaeis, qui negabant resurrectionem, cuius septem fratrum erit uxor, quam singuli habuerunt, dum quisque eorum uellet defuncti semen, sicut lex praeceperat, excitare: Erratis, inquit, nescientes scripturas, neque uirtutem Dei; et cum locus esset, ut diceret: De qua enim me interrogatis, uir erit etiam ipsa, non mulier, non hoc dixit, sed dixit: In resurrectione enim neque nubent neque uxores ducent, sed sunt sicut angeli Dei in caelo; aequales utique angelis inmortalitate ac felicitate, non carne; sicut nec resurrectione, qua non indiguerunt angeli, quoniam nec mori potuerunt Nuptias ergo Dominus futuras negauit esse in resurrectione, non feminas, et ibi negauit, ubi talis quaestio uertebatur, ut eam negato sexu muliebri celeriore facilitate dissolueret, si eum ibi praenosceret non futurum; immo etiam futurum esse firmauit dicendo: Non nubent, quod ad feminas pertinet nec uxores ducent, quod ad uiros.

ENGLISH

the human race a woman was made from a rib taken from the side of the man as he slept; and it was fitting that by such a deed Christ and the Church should already then be foretold. That sleep of the man was the death of Christ, whose side, as he hung lifeless on the cross, was pierced with a spear, and from it flowed blood and water; and these, we know, are the sacraments by which the Church is built up.

For Scripture used this very word: we do not read "he formed" or "he fashioned," but "He built her into a woman." That is why the apostle too speaks of the building up of the body of Christ, which is the Church. So the woman is God's creature just as the man is. But by her being made from the man, unity is commended; and by her being made in that way, Christ and the Church, as has been said, were prefigured. He, then, who established both sexes will re-establish both.[40]

Finally, Jesus himself was asked by the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, whose wife the woman would be whom each of seven brothers had had in turn, as each sought to raise up offspring for his dead brother, as the law had commanded. He said, "You are wrong, because you know neither the Scriptures nor the power of God." Here there was an opening for him to say, "For the woman you are asking me about will herself be a man, not a woman." But he did not say this. Instead he said, "For in the resurrection they will neither be given in marriage nor take wives, but they are like the angels of God in heaven"—equal to the angels, that is, in immortality and happiness, not in flesh, just as they are not equal in resurrection either, which the angels did not need, since they could not die. So the Lord denied that there would be marriages in the resurrection, not that there would be women. And he denied it in a context where such a question was being discussed that he could have settled it more quickly and easily by denying the female sex, if he had foreknown that it would not exist there. Indeed, he even affirmed that it would exist, by saying, "They will not be given in marriage," which refers to women, "nor take wives," which refers to men.[41]

40 Genesis 2:22.
41 Matthew 22:29–30.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Erunt ergo, quae uel nubere hic solent, uel ducere uxores; sed ibi hoc non facient.	So there will be those who here are given in marriage, and those who here take wives; but there they will not do so.

THE PERFECT MAN, THAT IS, CHRIST, AND HIS BODY, THAT IS, THE CHURCH, WHICH IS HIS FULLNESS

The 'perfect man' is Christ with the whole Church as his body, not a rule for individual bodies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.18 Proinde quod ait apostolus, occursuros nos omnes in uirum perfectum, totius ipsius circumstantiam lectionis considerare debemus, quae ita se habet: Qui descendit, inquit, ipse est et qui adscendit super omnes caelos, ut adinpleret omnia. Et ipse dedit quosdam quidem apostolos, quosdam autem prophetas, quosdam uero euangelistas, quosdam autem pastores et doctores ad consummationem sanctorum in opus ministerii, in aedificationem corporis Christi, donec occurramus omnes in unitatem fidei et agnitionem filii Dei, in uirum perfectum, in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi; ut ultra non simus paruuli iactati et circumlati omni uento doctrinae, in inlusione hominum, in astutia ad machinationem erroris, ueritatem autem facientes in caritate augeamur in illo per omnia, qui est caput Christus; ex quo totum corpus conexum et conpactum per omnem tactum subministrationis secundum operationem in mensuram uniuscuiusque partis incrementum corporis facit in aedificationem sui in caritate.	Accordingly, as for the apostle's saying that we shall all come to the perfect man, we must consider the whole context of the passage, which runs as follows: "He who descended," he says, "is the same one who also ascended above all the heavens, so that he might fill all things. And he gave some as apostles, some as prophets, some as evangelists, some as pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of ministry, for the building up of the body of Christ, until we all come to the unity of faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, to the perfect man, to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ; so that we may no longer be children, tossed and carried about by every wind of doctrine, by human trickery, by cunning that contrives error; but that, doing the truth in love, we may grow up in all things in him who is the head, Christ. From him the whole body, joined and knit together by every contact that supplies it, according to the working in the measure of each part, brings about the body's growth, building itself up in love."[42]
Ecce qui est uir perfectus, caput et corpus, quod constat omnibus membris, quae suo tempore conplebuntur, cottidie tamen eidem corpori accedunt, dum aedificatur ecclesia, cui dicitur: Vos autem estis corpus Christi et membra, et alibi: Pro corpore, inquit, eius quod est ecclesia, itemque alibi: Unus panis, unum corpus multi sumus.	See who the perfect man is: the head and the body. The body consists of all the members, which will be completed in their own time, but which are added to that same body every day, while the Church is being built up. To the Church it is said, "Now you are the body of Christ and its members"; and elsewhere, "For the sake of his body," he says, "which is the Church"; and again elsewhere, "We, though many, are one bread, one body."[43]
De cuius corporis aedificatione et hic dictum est: Ad consummationem sanctorum in opus ministerii, in aedificationem corporis Christi ac deinde subiectum unde nunc agimus: Donec occurramus omnes in unitatem fidei et agnitionem filii Dei, in uirum perfectum, in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi, et cetera; donec eadem mensura in quo corpore intellegenda esset,	It is of the building up of this body that it is said here too: "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of ministry, for the building up of the body of Christ." Then comes the passage we are now dealing with: "until we all come to the unity of faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, to the perfect man, to the measure of the age of the full-

42 Ephesians 4:10–16.
43 1 Corinthians 12:27; Colossians 1:24; 1 Corinthians 10:17.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ostenderet dicens: Augeamur in illo per omnia, qui est caput Christus; ex quo totum corpus conexum et conpactum per omnem tactum subministrationis secundum operationem in mensuram uniuscuiusque partis. Sicut ergo est mensura uniuscuiusque partis, ita totius corporis, quod omnibus suis partibus constat, est utique mensura plenitudinis, de qua dictum est: In mensuram aetatis plenitudinis Christi.	ness of Christ," and so on—until he showed in what body that measure was to be understood, saying, "that we may grow up in all things in him who is the head, Christ. From him the whole body, joined and knit together by every contact that supplies it, according to the working in the measure of each part." So just as there is a measure of each part, so the whole body, which consists of all its parts, surely has a measure of fullness; and of this it is said, "to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ."
Quam plenitudinem etiam illo commemorauit loco, ubi ait de Christo: Et ipsum dedit caput super omnia ecclesiae, quae est corpus eius, plenitudo eius, qui omnia in omnibus inpletur. Verum si hoc ad resurrectionis formam, in qua erit unusquisque, referendum esset, quid nos inpediret nominato uiro intellegere et feminam, ut uirum pro homine positum acciperemus? sicut in eo quod dictum est: Beatus uir qui timet Dominum, utique ibi sunt et feminae, quae timent Dominum.	He also mentioned this fullness in the place where he says of Christ, "And he gave him as head over all things to the Church, which is his body, the fullness of him who is filled all in all." But even if this were to be referred to the form in which each person will exist at the resurrection, what would prevent us from understanding the woman as included when "man" is named, taking "man" to stand for "human being"? So in the saying "Blessed is the man who fears the Lord," women who fear the Lord are surely included too.[44]

THAT ALL BODILY DEFECTS THAT MAR HUMAN BEAUTY IN THIS LIFE WILL NOT BE PRESENT IN THE RESURRECTION, WHERE, THE NATURAL SUBSTANCE REMAINING, QUALITY AND QUANTITY WILL COME TOGETHER INTO ONE BEAUTY

Cut hair and nails will return to the body's substance without deformity; martyrs' scars may remain as honors.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.19 Quid iam respondeam de capillis adque unguibus? Semel quippe intellecto ita nihil periturum esse de corpore, ut deforme nihil sit in corpore, simul intellegitur ea, quae deformem factura fuerant enormitatem, massae ipsi accessura esse, non locis in quibus membrorum forma turpetur. Velut si de limo uas fieret, quod rursus in eundem limum redactum totum de toto iterum fieret, non esset necesse ut illa pars limi, quae in ansa fuerat, ad ansam rediret, aut quae fundum fecerat, ipsa rursus faceret fundum, dum tamen totum reuerteretur in totum, id est, totus ille limus in totum uas nulla sui perdita parte remearet.	What answer shall I give now about hair and nails? Once it is understood that nothing will perish from the body in such a way that nothing in the body will be unsightly, it is understood at the same time that whatever would have produced an unsightly excess will be added to the mass of the body as a whole, not to those places where it would spoil the shape of the limbs. Suppose a pot were made of clay, then reduced again to the same clay and made again, whole from the whole. It would not be necessary for the part of the clay that had been in the handle to return to the handle, or for the part that had formed the base to form the base again, provided only that the whole returned into the whole—that is, that all that clay returned into the whole pot, with no part of it lost.
Quapropter si capilli totiens tonsi unguesue desecti ad sua loca deformiter redeunt, non redibunt; nec tamen	Therefore, if hair cut so many times, or nails trimmed, would return to their own places in an 44 Ephesians 1:22–23; Psalm 111:1 (112:1 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

cuique resurgenti peribunt, quia in eandem carnem, ut quemcumque ibi locum corporis teneant, seruata partium congruentia materiae mutabilitate uertentur. Quamuis quod ait Dominus: Capillus capitis uestri non peribit, non de longitudine, sed de numero capillorum dictum multo aptius possit intellegi; unde et alibi dicit: Capilli capitis uestri numerati sunt. Neque hoc ideo dixerim, quod aliquid existimem corpori cuique periturum, quod naturaliter inerat; sed quod deforme natum fuerat (non utique ob aliud, nisi ut hinc quoque ostenderetur, quam sit poenalis condicio ista mortalium), sic esse rediturum, ut seruata integritate substantiae deformitas pereat.

Si enim statuam potest artifex homo, quam propter aliquam causam deformem fecerat, conflare et pulcherrimam reddere, ita ut nihil inde substantiae, sed sola deformitas pereat, ac si quid in illa figura priore indecenter exstabat nec parilitate partium congruebat, non de toto, unde fecerat, amputare adque separare, sed ita conspergere uniuerso adque miscere, ut nec foeditatem faciat nec minuat quantitatem: quid de omnipotenti artifice sentiendum est? Ergone non poterit quasque deformitates humanorum corporum, non modo usitatas, uerum etiam raras adque monstrosas, quae huic miserae uitae congruunt, abhorrent autem ab illa futura felicitate sanctorum, sic auferre ac perdere, ut, quascumque earum faciunt etsi naturalia, tamen indecora excrementa substantiae corporalis, nulla eius deminutione tollantur?

Ac per hoc non est macris pinguibusque metuendum, ne ibi etiam tales sint, quales si possent nec hic esse uoluissent. Omnis enim corporis pulchritudo est partium congruentia cum quadam coloris suauitate. Ubi autem non est partium congruentia, aut ideo quid offendit quia prauum est, aut ideo quia parum, aut ideo quia nimium. Proinde nulla erit deformitas, quam facit incongruentia partium, ubi et quae praua sunt corrigentur, et quod minus est quam decet, unde Creator nouit, inde unsightly way, they will not return there. Yet they will not perish for anyone who rises, because, through the changeability of matter, they will be turned into the same flesh, to occupy whatever place in the body they may, with the proportion of the parts preserved. And yet the Lord's words, "Not a hair of your head will perish," could be understood much more fittingly as said not of the length but of the number of the hairs; which is why he says elsewhere, "The hairs of your head are numbered." Nor do I say this because I think that anything naturally present in any body will perish. I mean rather that what had been born deformed—for no other reason, surely, than that this too might show how much this mortal condition is one of punishment—will return in such a way that the integrity of its substance is preserved while the deformity perishes.[45]

ENGLISH

For a human craftsman can melt down a statue that for some reason he had made ugly, and make it most beautiful, so that nothing of its substance but only the ugliness perishes. And if something in that first figure protruded unbecomingly and was out of proportion with the other parts, he need not cut it off and separate it from the whole he had made it from; he can spread and mix it through the whole in such a way as neither to create ugliness nor reduce the quantity. If so, what are we to think of the almighty Craftsman? Will he not be able to take away and destroy every deformity of human bodies—not only the common ones but also the rare and monstrous ones, which suit this wretched life but are utterly foreign to the future happiness of the saints? Will he not be able to remove them in such a way that whatever excrescences of bodily substance they produce, natural perhaps but unbecoming, are taken away without any diminution of that substance?

And so the thin and the fat need not fear that there they will be what they would not have wished to be even here, if they could have helped it. For all beauty of body is a proportion of parts together with a certain pleasing color. Where there is no proportion of parts, something offends either because it is misshapen, or because it is too small, or because it is too large. Accordingly, there will be no deformity caused by lack of proportion among

45 Matthew 10:30.

LATIN

subplebitur, et quod plus est quam decet, materiae seruata integritate detrahetur. Coloris porro suauitas quanta erit, ubi iusti fulgebunt sicut sol in regno Patris sui! Quae claritas in Christi corpore, cum resurrexit, ab oculis discipulorum potius abscondita fuisse quam defuisse credenda est.

Non enim eam ferret humanus adque infirmus adspectus, quando ille a suis ita deberet adtendi, ut posset agnosci. Quo pertinuit etiam, ut contrectantibus ostenderet suorum uulnerum cicatrices, ut etiam cibum potumque sumeret, non alimentorum indigentia, sed ea qua et hoc poterat potestate. Cum autem aliquid non uidetur, quamuis adsit, a quibus alia, quae pariter adsunt, uidentur, sicut illam claritatem dicimus adfuisse non uisam, a quibus alia uidebantur: ἀορασία Graece dicitur, quod nostri interpretes Latine dicere non ualentes in libro geneseos caecitatem interpretati sunt. Hanc enim sunt passi Sodomitae, quando quaerebant ostium iusti uiri nec poterant inuenire. Quae si caecitas fuisset, qua fit ut nihil possit uideri, non ostium qua ingrederentur, sed duces itineris a quibus inde abducerentur, inquirerent.

Nescio quo autem modo sic adficimur amore martyrum beatorum, ut uelimus in illo regno in eorum corporibus uidere uulnerum cicatrices, quae pro Christi nomine pertulerunt; et fortasse uidebimus. Non enim deformitas in eis, sed dignitas erit, et quaedam, quamuis in corpore, non corporis, sed uirtutis pulchritudo fulgebit. Nec ideo tamen si aliqua martyribus amputata et ablata sunt membra, sine ipsis membris erunt in resurrectione mortuorum, quibus dictum est: Capillus capitis uestri non peribit Sed si hoc decebit in illo nouo saeculo, ut indicia gloriosorum uulnerum in illa inmortali carne cernantur, ubi membra, ut praeciderentur, percussa uel secta sunt, ibi cicatrices, sed tamen eisdem membris redditis, non perditis, apparebunt.

ENGLISH

the parts. What is misshapen will be corrected; what is less than fitting will be supplied from the source the Creator knows; and what is more than fitting will be removed, with the integrity of the matter preserved. And how great will the pleasing color be, where "the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father"! We must believe that this brightness in Christ's body, when he rose, was hidden from the disciples' eyes rather than absent.[46]

For weak human sight could not have borne it, at a time when he had to be looked upon by his own in such a way that he could be recognized. This is also why he showed the scars of his wounds to those who touched him, and why he even took food and drink—not because he needed nourishment, but by the power by which he could do this as well. Now when something that is present is not seen by people who see other things equally present—as we say that this brightness was present but unseen by those who saw other things—the Greek term for it is ἀορασία (aorasia) [failure to see]. Our translators, unable to express it in Latin, rendered it "blindness" in the book of Genesis. For this is what the men of Sodom suffered when they were looking for the righteous man's door and could not find it. If it had been blindness, which makes it impossible to see anything at all, they would have been looking not for the door by which to get in, but for guides to lead them away from there.[47]

Somehow, though, we are so moved by love for the blessed martyrs that we would wish to see in that kingdom, on their bodies, the scars of the wounds they endured for the name of Christ; and perhaps we shall see them. For in them this will not be a deformity but a mark of honor, and a certain beauty will shine out—in the body, yet not of the body, but of virtue. Still, it does not follow that if some limbs were cut off and taken from the martyrs, they will be without those limbs in the resurrection of the dead; for it was to them that it was said, "Not a hair of your head will perish." But if it is fitting in that new age that the marks of their glorious wounds should be seen in that immortal flesh, then where limbs were struck or cut in or-

46 Matthew 13:43.
47 Genesis 19:11, where the men of Sodom, trying to break into Lot's house, are struck so that they cannot find the door.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	der to be severed, there scars will appear—but with those same limbs restored, not lost.
Quamuis itaque omnia quae acciderunt corpori uitia tunc non erunt, non sunt tamen deputanda uel appellanda uitia uirtutis indicia.	So although none of the defects that befell the body will exist then, the marks of virtue are not to be counted or called defects.

THAT IN THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD THE SUBSTANCE OF BODIES, HOWEVER SCATTERED, WILL BE FULLY CALLED BACK FROM WHEREVER IT IS

God can recall every particle; flesh eaten by the starving returns to its first owner.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.20 Absit autem, ut ad resuscitanda corpora uitaeque reddenda non possit omnipotentia Creatoris omnia reuocare, quae uel bestiae uel ignis absumsit, uel in puluerem cineremue conlapsum uel in umorem solutum uel in auras est exhalatum. Absit ut sinus ullus secretumque naturae ita recipiat aliquid subtractum sensibus nostris, ut omnium Creatoris aut cognitionem lateat aut effugiat potestatem. Deum certe uolens, sicut poterat, definire Cicero, tantus auctor ipsorum: Mens quaedam est, inquit, soluta et libera, secreta ab omni concretione mortali, omnia sentiens et mouens ipsaque praedita motu sempiterno. Hoc autem repperit in doctrinis magnorum philosophorum. Ut igitur secundum ipsos loquar, quo modo aliquid uel latet omnia sentientem uel inreuocabiliter fugit omnia mouentem?	Far be it from us to think that the Creator's omnipotence, in raising bodies and restoring them to life, cannot call back everything that beasts or fire have consumed, or that has crumbled into dust or ashes, dissolved into liquid, or evaporated into the air. Far be it from us to think that any recess or hidden place of nature can so hold something withdrawn from our senses that it escapes the knowledge or evades the power of the Creator of all things. Cicero, so great an authority among them, wanting to define God as best he could, says: "He is a kind of mind, free and unbound, separate from all mortal compound, perceiving and moving all things, and himself endowed with eternal motion." He found this in the teachings of great philosophers. So, to speak on their own terms: how can anything either be hidden from one who perceives all things, or escape beyond recall from one who moves all things?[48]
Unde iam etiam quaestio illa soluenda est, quae difficilior uidetur ceteris, ubi quaeritur, cum caro mortui hominis etiam alterius fit uiuentis caro, cui potius eorum in resurrectione reddatur. Si enim quispiam confectus fame adque conpulsus uescatur cadaueribus hominum, quod malum aliquotiens accidisse et uetus testatur historia et nostrorum temporum infelicia experimenta docuerunt: num quisquam ueridica ratione contendet totum digestum fuisse per imos meatus, nihil inde in eius carnem mutatum adque conuersum, cum ipsa macies, quae fuit et non est, satis indicet quae illis escis detrimenta subpleta sint? Iam itaque aliqua paulo ante praemisi, quae ad istum quoque nodum soluendum ualere debebunt. Quidquid enim carnium exhausit fames, utique in auras est exhalatum, unde diximus omnipotentem Deum posse reuocare, quod fugit.	From this we can now also solve the question that seems harder than the rest: when the flesh of a dead man becomes the flesh of another, living man, to which of the two will it be restored at the resurrection? Suppose someone, worn out and driven by hunger, eats human corpses. Ancient history attests that this evil has happened more than once, and the unhappy experiences of our own times have taught us the same. Will anyone argue, with sound reasoning, that it was all digested and passed out through the lower passages, and none of it was changed and converted into his flesh? His very emaciation, which once existed and now does not, shows plainly enough what losses that food made good. I have already set out, a little earlier, some points that ought to help untie

48 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.66.

LATIN

ENGLISH

this knot as well. For whatever flesh hunger has wasted away has certainly been exhaled into the air, and from there, as we said, almighty God can call back what has escaped.

Reddetur ergo caro illa homini, in quo esse caro humana primitus coepit. Ab illo quippe altero tamquam mutuo sumta deputanda est; quae sicut aes alienum ei redhibenda est, unde sumta est. Sua uero illi, quem fames exinanierat, ab eo, qui potest etiam exhalata reuocare, reddetur. Quamuis etsi omnibus perisset modis nec ulla eius materies in ullis naturae latebris remansisset, unde uellet, eam repararet Omnipotens. Sed propter sententiam Veritatis, qua dictum est: Capillus capitis uestri non peribit, absurdum est, ut putemus, cum capillus hominis perire non possit, tantas carnes fame depastas adque consumtas perire potuisse.

That flesh, then, will be restored to the man in whom it first began to be human flesh. For it must be regarded as borrowed, so to speak, by the other man; like a debt, it must be returned to the one from whom it was taken. And his own flesh, which hunger had drained away, will be restored to him by the one who can call back even what has been exhaled. Indeed, even if it had perished in every way, and none of its matter remained in any of nature's hiding places, the Almighty would restore it from wherever he wished. But in view of the saying of the Truth, "Not a hair of your head will perish," it is absurd to suppose that, when not even a hair of a person's head can perish, so much flesh devoured and consumed by hunger could have perished.[49]

Quibus omnibus pro nostro modulo consideratis adque tractatis haec summa conficitur, ut in resurrectione carnis in aeternum eas mensuras habeat corporum magnitudo, quas habebat perficiendae siue perfectae cuiusque indita corpori ratio iuuentutis, in membrorum quoque omnium modulis congruo decore seruato. Quod decus ut seruetur, si aliquid demtum fuerit indecenti alicui granditati in parte aliqua constitutae, quod per totum spargatur, ut neque id pereat et congruentia partium ubique teneatur: non est absurdum, ut aliquid inde etiam staturae corporis addi posse credamus, cum omnibus partibus, ut decorem custodiant, id distribuitur, quod si enormiter in una esset, utique non deceret.

When all this has been considered and discussed to the best of our small ability, the conclusion is this: in the resurrection of the flesh, bodies will forever have the size that the principle of youth, whether still to be completed or already complete, had implanted in each body, with a fitting beauty preserved in the proportions of all the limbs as well. To preserve this beauty, if something is taken away from an unseemly largeness located in some one part, it will be spread over the whole, so that it is not lost and the harmony of the parts is kept everywhere. It is not absurd, then, to believe that something may even be added from it to the body's stature, since it is distributed to all the parts so that they keep their beauty, whereas if it were all in one part, out of proportion, it would certainly be unseemly.

Aut si contenditur in ea quemque statura corporis resurrecturum esse, in qua defunctus est, non pugnaciter resistendum est; tantum absit omnis deformitas, omnis infirmitas, omnis tarditas omnisque corruptio, et si quid aliud illud non decet regnum, in quo resurrectionis et promissionis filii aequales erunt angelis Dei, si non corpore, non aetate, certe felicitate.

Or if it is maintained that each person will rise with the bodily stature he had when he died, we need not resist stubbornly—provided only that there is no deformity, no weakness, no sluggishness, no decay, nor anything else unbecoming to that kingdom in which the children of the resurrection and of the promise will be equal to the angels of God: if not in body, not in age, then certainly in happiness.

49 "The Truth" is Christ (John 14:6).

THE NEWNESS OF THE SPIRITUAL BODY, INTO WHICH THE FLESH OF THE SAINTS WILL BE CHANGED

Risen flesh will be spiritual, wholly subject to spirit, yet still flesh.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
22.21	Restituetur ergo quidquid de corporibus uiuis uel post mortem de cadaueribus periit, et simul cum eo, quod in sepulcris remansit, in spiritalis corporis nouitatem ex animalis corporis uetustate mutatum resurget incorruptione adque inmortalitate uestitum. Sed etsi uel casu aliquo graui uel inimicorum inmanitate totum penitus conteratur in puluerem adque in auras uel in aquas dispersum, quantum fieri potest, nusquam esse sinatur omnino: nullo modo subtrahi poterit omnipotentiae Creatoris, sed capillus in eo capitis non peribit. Erit ergo spiritui subdita caro spiritalis, sed tamen caro, non spiritus; sicut carni subditus fuit spiritus ipse carnalis, sed tamen spiritus, non caro. Cuius rei habemus experimentum in nostrae poenae deformitate.	Whatever has perished, then, from living bodies, or from corpses after death, will be restored. Together with what has remained in the tombs it will rise again, changed from the oldness of the natural body into the newness of the spiritual body, clothed in incorruption and immortality. And even if, through some grievous accident or the savagery of enemies, the whole body is ground utterly to dust, scattered to the winds or the waters, and left, as far as is possible, to exist nowhere at all, it can in no way be withdrawn from the omnipotence of the Creator; not a hair of its head will perish. The flesh, then, will be spiritual and subject to the spirit—yet still flesh, not spirit; just as the spirit itself was carnal and subject to the flesh —yet still spirit, not flesh. Of this we have experience in the deformity of our punishment.
	Non enim secundum carnem, sed utique secundum spiritum carnales erant, quibus ait apostolus: Non potui uobis loqui quasi spiritalibus, sed quasi carnalibus; et homo spiritalis sic in hac uita dicitur, ut tamen corpore adhuc carnalis sit et uideat aliam legem in membris suis repugnantem legi mentis suae; erit autem etiam corpore spiritalis, cum eadem caro sic resurrexerit, ut fiat quod scriptum est: Seminatur corpus animale, resurget corpus spiritale. Quae sit autem et quam magna spiritalis corporis gratia, quoniam nondum uenit in experimentum, uereor ne temerarium sit omne, quod de illa profertur, eloquium.	For those to whom the apostle says, "I could not speak to you as to spiritual people, but as to carnal ones," were carnal not according to the flesh but certainly according to the spirit. And a person is called spiritual in this life in such a way that he is still carnal in body and sees another law in his members warring against the law of his mind. But he will be spiritual in body as well when this same flesh has risen in such a way that what is written comes to pass: "It is sown a natural body; it will rise a spiritual body." But what the grace of the spiritual body is, and how great, has not yet come within our experience, and so I fear that anything said about it would be rash.[50]
	Verum tamen quia spei nostrae gaudium propter Dei laudem non est tacendum et de intimis ardentis sancti amoris medullis dictum est: Domine, dilexi decorem domus tuae: de donis eius, quae in hac aerumnosissima uita bonis malisque largitur, ipso adiuuante coniciamus, ut possumus, quantum sit illud, quod nondum experti utique digne eloqui non ualemus. Omitto enim, quando fecit hominem rectum; omitto uitam illam duorum coniugum in paradisi fecunditate felicem, quoniam tam breuis fuit, ut ad nascentium sensum nec ipsa peruenerit: in hac, quam nouimus, in qua adhuc sumus, cuius tentationes, immo quam totam tentationem, quamdiu in	Yet the joy of our hope must not be passed over in silence, for the sake of God's praise; and from the inmost marrow of burning holy love it was said, "Lord, I have loved the beauty of your house." So let us, with his help, infer as best we can, from the gifts he lavishes on good and bad alike in this most wretched life, how great that thing is which, having not yet experienced it, we certainly cannot describe worthily. I pass over the time when he made man upright. I pass over that happy life of the two spouses in the fruitfulness of paradise, since it was so brief that it did not even reach the 50 1 Corinthians 3:1; the second quotation is 1 Corinthians 15:44, and the "other law" alludes to Romans 7:23.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ea sumus, quantumlibet proficiamus, perpeti non desinimus, quae sint indicia circa genus humanum bonitatis Dei, quis poterit explicare?	awareness of their offspring. But in this life that we know, in which we still are, whose temptations—or rather, which is itself one whole temptation—we never cease to endure as long as we are in it, however far we advance: who will be able to set out the signs of God's goodness toward the human race?[51]

THE MISERIES AND EVILS TO WHICH THE HUMAN RACE IS SUBJECT BECAUSE OF THE FIRST TRANSGRESSION, AND FROM WHICH NO ONE IS FREED EXCEPT THROUGH THE GRACE OF CHRIST

The ignorance, vices and crimes of human life show that the whole race lies under condemnation.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.22 Nam quod ad primam originem pertinet, omnem mortalium progeniem fuisse damnatam, haec ipsa uita, si uita dicenda est, tot et tantis malis plena testatur. Quid enim aliud indicat horrenda quaedam profunditas ignorantiae, ex qua omnis error exsistit, qui omnes filios Adam tenebroso quodam sinu suscipit, ut homo ab illo liberari sine labore dolore timore non possit?	As for our first origin, that the whole progeny of mortals was condemned, this very life—if it should be called life—filled with so many and such great evils, bears witness. For what else is shown by that dreadful depth of ignorance from which all error arises, which takes all the children of Adam into its dark embrace, so that no one can be freed from it without toil, pain and fear?
Quid amor ipse tot rerum uanarum adque noxiarum et ex hoc mordaces curae, perturbationes, maerores, formidines, insana gaudia, discordiae, lites, bella, insidiae, iracundiae, inimicitiae, fallacia, adulatio, fraus, furtum, rapina, perfidia, superbia, ambitio, inuidentia, homicidia, parricidia, crudelitas, saeuitia, nequitia, luxuria, petulantia, inpudentia, inpudicitia, fornicationes, adulteria, incesta et contra naturam utriusque sexus tot stupra adque inmunditiae, quas turpe est etiam dicere, sacrilegia, haereses, blasphemiae, periuria, obpressiones innocentium, calumniae, circumuentiones, praeuaricationes, falsa testimonia, iniqua iudicia, uiolentiae, latrocinia et quidquid talium malorum in mentem non uenit et tamen de uita ista hominum non recedit? Verum haec hominum sunt malorum, ab illa tamen erroris et peruersi amoris radice uenientia, cum qua omnis filius Adam nascitur.	What else is shown by the very love of so many vain and harmful things, and the gnawing cares that come from it—disturbances, griefs, fears, mad joys, quarrels, lawsuits, wars, plots, fits of anger, enmities, deceit, flattery, fraud, theft, plunder, treachery, pride, ambition, envy, murders, parricides, cruelty, savagery, wickedness, debauchery, wantonness, shamelessness, unchastity, fornications, adulteries, incests, and so many violations and impurities against nature by both sexes, which it is shameful even to mention, sacrileges, heresies, blasphemies, perjuries, oppression of the innocent, slanders, swindles, betrayals of trust, false testimony, unjust judgments, acts of violence, banditry, and whatever other such evils do not come to mind and yet never depart from this human life? These, it is true, belong to evil people; yet they come from that root of error and perverted love with which every child of Adam is born.
Nam quis ignorat cum quanta ignorantia ueritatis, quae iam in infantibus manifesta est, et cum quanta abundantia uanae cupiditatis, quae in pueris incipit apparere, homo ueniat in hanc uitam, ita ut, si dimittatur uiuere ut uelit et facere quidquid uelit, in haec facinora et flagitia, quae commemoraui et quae commemorare non potui, uel cuncta uel multa perueniat?	For who does not know with how great an ignorance of the truth, already plain in infants, and with how great an abundance of vain craving, which begins to show itself in children, a human being comes into this life? So much so that, if he were left to live as he pleased and do whatever he pleased, he would arrive at all, or many, of the 51 Psalm 25:8 (26:8 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

crimes and outrages I have mentioned, and those I could not mention.

Sed diuina gubernatione non omni modo deserente damnatos et Deo non continente in ira sua miserationes suas in ipsis sensibus generis humani prohibitio et eruditio contra istas, cum quibus nascimur, tenebras uigilant et contra hos inpetus obponuntur, plenae tamen etiam ipsae laborum et dolorum. Quid enim sibi uolunt multimodae formidines, quae cohibendis paruulorum uanitatibus adhibentur? Quid paedagogi, quid magistri, quid ferulae, quid lora, quid uirgae, quid disciplina illa, qua scriptum sancta dicit dilecti filii latera esse tundenda, ne crescat indomitus domarique iam durus aut uix possit aut fortasse nec possit? Quid agitur his poenis omnibus, nisi ut debelletur inperitia et praua cupiditas infrenetur, cum quibus malis in hoc saeculum uenimus?

But divine governance does not altogether abandon the condemned, and God does not in his anger hold back his compassion; and so prohibition and instruction keep watch, in the very faculties of the human race, against these darknesses with which we are born, and are set against these impulses—though they too are full of toil and pain. For what is the purpose of the many kinds of fear used to restrain the follies of little children? What is the point of tutors and teachers, of canes, straps and rods, of that discipline by which, as holy Scripture says, the sides of a beloved son must be beaten, so that he does not grow up untamed and, once hardened, can scarcely be tamed, or perhaps cannot be tamed at all? What is achieved by all these punishments, except that ignorance is overcome and depraved craving reined in—the evils with which we come into this world?[52]

Quid est enim, quod cum labore meminimus, sine labore obliuiscimur; cum labore discimus, sine labore nescimus: cum labore strenui, sine labore inertes sumus? Nonne hinc apparet, in quid uelut pondere suo quam procliuis et prona sit uitiosa natura et quanta ope, ut hinc liberetur, indigeat? Desidia segnitia, pigritia neglegentia uitia sunt utique quibus labor fugitur, cum labor ipse, etiam qui est utilis, poena sit.

Why is it that we remember with effort and forget without effort; learn with effort and remain ignorant without effort; are active with effort and idle without effort? Does it not appear from this toward what our flawed nature is inclined and prone, as if by its own weight, and how much help it needs to be freed from this? Sloth, sluggishness, laziness and negligence are surely vices by which toil is avoided, since toil itself, even useful toil, is a punishment.

THE CALAMITIES OF HUMAN LIFE

Accidents, diseases, demons, dreams and disasters harass everyone; only Christ's grace frees us.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Sed praeter pueriles poenas, sine quibus disci non potest quod maiores uolunt, qui uix aliquid utiliter uolunt, quot et quantis poenis genus agitetur humanum, quae non ad malitiam nequitiamque iniquorum, sed ad condicionem pertinent miseriamque communem, quis ullo sermone digerit? quis ulla cogitatione conprehendit? Quantus est metus, quanta calamitas ab orbitatibus adque luctu, a damnis et damnationibus, a deceptionibus et mendaciis hominum, a suspicionibus falsis, ab omnibus uiolentis facinoribus et sceleribus alienis! quando quidem ab eis et depraedatio et captiuitas, et uincula et carceres, et exsilia et cruciatus, et amputatio membrorum et priuatio

But apart from the punishments of childhood, without which children cannot learn what their elders want—and their elders scarcely want anything useful—who can set out in any words, who can grasp in any thought, how many and how great are the punishments by which the human race is harassed? These belong not to the malice and wickedness of the unjust but to our common condition and misery. How great is the fear, how great the calamity, that comes from bereavement and mourning, from losses and legal condemna-

52 The beating of a son's sides refers to Sirach 30:12.

LATIN

sensuum, et obpressio corporis ad obscenam libidinem obprimentis explendam et alia multa horrenda saepe contingunt. Quid?

ab innumeris casibus quae forinsecus corpori formidantur, aestibus et frigoribus, tempestatibus imbribus adluuionibus, coruscatione tonitru, grandine fulmine, motibus hiatibusque terrarum, obpressionibus ruinarum, ab offensionibus et pauore uel etiam malitia iumentorum, a tot uenenis fruticum aquarum, aurarum bestiarum, a ferarum uel tantummodo molestis uel etiam mortiferis morsibus, a rabie quae contingit ex rabido cane, ut etiam blanda et amica suo domino bestia nonnumquam uehementius et amarius quam leones draconesque metuatur faciatque hominem, quem forte adtaminauerit, contagione pestifera ita rabiosum, ut a parentibus coniuge filiis peius omni bestia formidetur! Quae mala patiuntur nauigantes! quae terrena itinera gradientes! Quis ambulat ubicumque non inopinatis subiacens casibus? De foro quidam rediens domum sanis pedibus suis cecidit, pedem fregit et ex illo uulnere finiuit hanc uitam. Quid uidetur sedente securius?

De sella, in qua sedebat, cecidit Heli sacerdos et mortuus est. Agricolae, immo uero omnes homines, quot et quantos a caelo et terra uel a perniciosis animalibus casus metuunt agrorum fructibus! Solent tamen de frumentis tandem collectis et reconditis esse securi. Sed quibusdam, quod nouimus, prouentum optimum frumentorum fluuius inprouisus fugientibus hominibus de horreis eiecit adque abstulit. Contra milleformes daemonum incursus quis innocentia sua fidit? quando quidem, ne quis fideret, etiam paruulos baptizatos, quibus certe nihil est innocentius, aliquando sic uexant, ut in eis maxime Deo ista sinente monstretur huius uitae flenda calamitas et alterius desideranda felicitas.

ENGLISH

tions, from the deceptions and lies of others, from false suspicions, from all the violent crimes and wickedness of others! For from these often come plunder and captivity, chains and prisons, exile and torture, the cutting off of limbs and the loss of the senses, the overpowering of the body to satisfy the obscene lust of the one who overpowers it, and many other horrors. What more?

There is the dread of countless accidents that threaten the body from outside: heat and cold, storms, rains, floods, lightning and thunder, hail and thunderbolts, earthquakes and chasms in the earth, being crushed by collapsing buildings; the stumbling, the panic, or even the viciousness of beasts of burden; so many poisons in plants, waters, airs and animals; the bites of wild beasts, some merely painful, some deadly; the madness that comes from a rabid dog, so that even an animal gentle and friendly to its master is sometimes feared more intensely and more bitterly than lions and dragons, and makes the person it happens to infect so mad with its deadly contagion that he is dreaded by his parents, wife and children worse than any beast! What evils sailors suffer! What evils those who travel by land! Who walks anywhere without being exposed to unforeseen accidents? A man returning home from the forum, his feet perfectly sound, fell, broke his foot, and from that injury ended this life. What seems safer than sitting?

Eli the priest fell from the chair on which he was sitting, and died. Farmers—indeed all people—how many and how great are the accidents they fear for the crops of their fields, from sky and earth or from harmful creatures! Yet once the grain is finally harvested and stored, they usually feel safe about it. But some people, as we know, have had an excellent harvest of grain swept out of their granaries and carried off by a sudden flood of a river, while they themselves fled. Who trusts in his own innocence against the thousand forms of assault by demons? For, so that no one should trust in it, they sometimes torment even baptized infants—and surely nothing is more innocent than they—in such a way that in them especially, by God's permission, the lamentable calamity of this life and the desirable happiness of the other are displayed.[53]

LATIN

Iam uero de ipso corpore tot exsistunt morborum mala, ut nec libris medicorum cuncta conprehensa sint; in quorum pluribus ac paene omnibus etiam ipsa adiumenta et medicamenta tormenta sunt, ut homines a poenarum exitio poenali eruantur auxilio. Nonne ad hoc perduxit sitientes homines ardor inmanis, ut urinam quoque humanam uel etiam suam biberent? nonne ad hoc fames, ut a carnibus hominum se abstinere non possent nec inuentos homines mortuos, sed propter hoc a se occisos, nec quoslibet alienos, uerum etiam filios matres incredibili crudelitate, quam rabida esuries faciebat, absumerent?

Ipse postremo somnus, qui proprie quietis nomen accepit, quis uerbis explicet, saepe somniorum uisis quam sit inquietus et quam magnis, licet falsarum rerum, terroribus, quas ita exhibet et quodam modo exprimit, ut a ueris eas discernere nequeamus, animam miseram sensusque perturbet? Qua falsitate uisorum etiam uigilantes in quibusdam morbis et uenenis miserabilius agitantur; quamuis multimoda uarietate fallaciae homines etiam sanos maligni daemones nonnumquam decipiant talibus uisis, ut, etiamsi eos per haec ad sua traducere non potuerint, sensus tamen eorum solo adpetitu qualitercumque persuadendae falsitatis inludant.

Ab huius tam miserae quasi quibusdam inferis uitae non liberat nisi gratia Saluatoris Christi, Dei ac Domini nostri (hoc enim nomen est ipse Iesus; interpretatur quippe Saluator), maxime ne post hanc miserior ac sempiterna suscipiat, non uita, sed mors. Nam in ista quamuis sint per sancta et sanctos curationum magna solacia, tamen ideo non semper etiam ipsa beneficia tribuuntur petentibus, ne propter hoc religio quaeratur, quae propter aliam magis uitam, ubi mala non erunt omnino ulla, quaerenda est; et ad hoc meliores quosque in his malis adiuuat gratia, ut quanto fideliore, tanto fortiore corde tolerentur.

ENGLISH

Then from the body itself arise so many evils of disease that not even the books of physicians contain them all. In many of them, indeed almost all, even the aids and medicines are torments, so that people are rescued from deadly punishments by a help that is itself a punishment. Has not raging heat driven thirsty people to drink human urine, even their own? Has not hunger driven people to the point where they could not abstain from human flesh, and devoured not people they found dead but people they had killed for the purpose—and not just strangers, but mothers devouring their own children, with an unbelievable cruelty produced by ravenous hunger?

Finally, sleep itself, which has properly received the name of rest: who could describe in words how restless it often is with the visions of dreams, and with what great terrors—though of false things—it disturbs the wretched soul and the senses, presenting and in a way shaping those things so vividly that we cannot distinguish them from real ones? By such false visions even waking people are tossed about more wretchedly in certain diseases and under the effect of certain poisons. And sometimes, with every variety of deceit, malicious demons deceive even healthy people with such visions, so that, even if they cannot draw them over to their side by these means, they still play tricks on their senses, out of sheer desire to persuade them of falsehood in any way at all.

From this life, so wretched that it is a kind of hell, nothing frees us but the grace of Christ the Savior, our God and Lord (for this is what the name Jesus itself means: it is translated "Savior"). Above all, it frees us so that after this life we are not taken into one more wretched and everlasting, which is not life but death. For in this life, although there are great comforts of healing through holy things and holy people, even these benefits are not always granted to those who ask for them, precisely so that religion will not be sought for their sake; rather, it is to be sought for the sake of the other life, where there will be no evils at all. And to this end grace helps all the better people in these evils: that they may bear them with a heart as much stronger as it is more faithful.

53 Eli, priest and judge of Israel, fell from his seat and died on hearing of the ark's capture (1 Samuel 4:18).

LATIN

Ad quam rem etiam philosophiam prodesse dicunt docti huius saeculi, quam di quibusdam paucis, ait Tullius, ueram dederunt; nec hominibus, inquit, ab his aut datum est donum maius aut potuit ullum dari: usque adeo et ipsi, contra quos agimus, quoquo modo conpulsi sunt in habenda non quacumque, sed uera philosophia diuinam gratiam confiteri. Porro si paucis diuinitus datum est uerae philosophiae contra miserias huius uitae unicum auxilium, satis et hinc apparet humanum genus ad luendas miseriarum poenas esse damnatum. Sicut autem hoc, ut fatentur, nullum diuinum maius est donum, sic a nullo deo dari credendum est nisi ab illo, quo et ipsi qui multos deos colunt nullum dicunt esse maiorem.

ENGLISH

The learned of this world say that philosophy, too, helps in this matter—philosophy which the gods, says Cicero, have given in its true form to a few; and, he says, no greater gift has been given to human beings by them, nor could any be given. So true is it that even those we are arguing against have been compelled, one way or another, to acknowledge divine grace in the possession not of just any philosophy, but of true philosophy. Further, if the unique help of true philosophy against the miseries of this life has been given by divine gift to only a few, this too shows clearly enough that the human race has been condemned to pay the penalty of miseries. And just as, by their own admission, there is no greater divine gift than this, so we must believe it is given by no god except the one than whom even those who worship many gods say none is greater.

WHAT, BESIDES THE EVILS COMMON TO THE GOOD AND THE WICKED, BELONGS ESPECIALLY TO THE STRUGGLE OF THE RIGHTEOUS

The righteous also fight a constant inner war against vice, needing grace and daily forgiveness.

LATIN

22.23 Praeter haec autem mala huius uitae bonis malisque communia habent in ea iusti etiam proprios quosdam labores suos, quibus aduersus uitia militant et in talium proeliorum tentationibus periculisque uersantur. Aliquando enim concitatius, aliquando remissius, non tamen desinit caro concupiscere aduersus spiritum et spiritus aduersus carnem, ut non ea quae uolumus faciamus, omnem malam concupiscentiam consumendo, sed eam nobis, quantum diuinitus adiuti possumus, non ei consentiendo subdamus, uigiliis continuis excubantes, ne opinio ueri similis fallat, ne decipiat sermo uersutus, ne se tenebrae alicuius erroris offundant, ne quod bonum est malum aut quod malum est bonum esse credatur, ne ab his quae agenda sunt metus reuocet, ne in ea quae agenda non sunt cupido praecipitet, ne super iracundiam sol occidat, ne inimicitiae prouocent ad retributionem mali pro malo, ne absorbeat inhonesta uel inmoderata tristitia, ne inpertiendorum beneficiorum ingerat mens ingrata torporem, ne maledicis rumoribus bona conscientia fatigetur, ne temeraria de alio suspicio nos nostra decipiat, ne aliena de nobis falsa nos frangat, ne regnet peccatum in nostro mortali corpore ad oboediendum desideriis eius, ne membra nostra exhibeantur iniquitatis arma peccato, ne oculus sequatur concupiscentiam, ne uindicandi cupiditas uincat, ne in eo quod male delectat uel uisio uel cogitatio remoretur, ne

ENGLISH

Besides these evils of this life, common to good and bad alike, the righteous also have in it certain struggles of their own, in which they fight against vices and are caught up in the temptations and dangers of such battles. For sometimes more fiercely, sometimes more slackly, but without ever ceasing, the flesh desires against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, so that we do not do what we want, which is to destroy all evil desire. Instead, as far as we can with divine help, we subdue it by not consenting to it, keeping watch with unbroken vigilance: so that no plausible opinion misleads us, no cunning speech deceives us, no darkness of some error spreads over us; so that we do not believe good to be evil or evil to be good; so that fear does not hold us back from what ought to be done, nor desire hurl us headlong into what ought not to be done; so that the sun does not go down on our anger; so that enmities do not provoke us to repay evil for evil; so that shameful or immoderate sorrow does not swallow us up; so that an ungrateful mind does not make us sluggish in doing kindnesses; so that a good conscience is not worn down by slanderous rumors; so that our own rash suspicion of another does not deceive us,

LATIN	ENGLISH
inprobum aut indecens uerbum libenter audiatur, ne fiat quod non licet etiamsi libet, ne in hoc bello laborum periculorumque plenissimo uel de uiribus nostris speretur facienda uictoria uel uiribus nostris facta tribuatur, sed eius gratiae, de quo ait apostolus:	nor another's false suspicion of us break us; so that sin does not reign in our mortal body, making us obey its desires; so that our members are not offered to sin as weapons of wickedness; so that the eye does not follow desire; so that the craving for revenge does not win; so that neither sight nor thought lingers on what gives wrongful delight; so that no wicked or indecent word is listened to with pleasure; so that what is not allowed is not done, however much it is wanted; so that in this war, so full of struggle and danger, we do not hope to win the victory by our own strength, or credit the victory, once won, to our own strength, but to the grace of him of whom the apostle says:[54]
Gratias autem Deo, qui dat nobis uictoriam per Dominum nostrum legum Christum; qui et alio loco: In his, inquit, omnibus superuincimus per eum qui dilexit nos.	"But thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." And in another place he says: "In all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us."[55]
Sciamus tamen, quantalibet uirtute proeliandi uitiis repugnemus uel etiam uitia superemus et subiugemus, quamdiu sumus in hoc corpore, nobis deesse non posse unde dicamus Deo: Dimitte nobis debita nostra. In illo autem regno, ubi semper cum corporibus inmortalibus erimus, nec proelia nobis erunt ulla nec debita; quae nusquam et numquam essent, si natura nostra, sicut recta creata est, permaneret. Ac per hoc etiam noster iste conflictus, in quo periclitamur et de quo nos uictoria nouissima cupimus liberari, ad uitae huius mala pertinet, quam tot tantorumque testimonio malorum probamus esse damnatam.	Yet let us realize that, however much courage we show in fighting to resist our vices, or even in overcoming and subduing them, as long as we are in this body we cannot be without reason to say to God, "Forgive us our debts." But in that kingdom, where we shall live forever with immortal bodies, we shall have neither battles nor debts—which would have existed nowhere and never, if our nature had remained as it was created, upright. And so this conflict of ours too, in which we are in peril and from which we long to be freed by a final victory, belongs to the evils of this life, which we prove to be condemned by the testimony of so many and such great evils.[56]

THE GOOD THINGS WITH WHICH THE CREATOR HAS FILLED EVEN THIS LIFE, SUBJECT THOUGH IT IS TO CONDEMNATION

Even fallen humanity keeps God's gifts: fertility and the formation of bodies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.24 Iam nunc considerandum est hanc ipsam miseriam generis humani, in qua laudatur iustitia punientis, qualibus et quam multis inpleuerit bonis eiusdem bonitas cuncta quae creauit administrantis. Primum benedictionem illam, quam protulerat ante peccatum dicens: Crescite et multiplicamini et inplete terram, nec post peccatum uoluit inhibere mansitque in stirpe	Now we must consider this very misery of the human race, in which the justice of the one who punishes is praised, and ask with what kinds of goods, and how many, it has been filled by the goodness of the same God who governs all that he created. First, the blessing he had pronounced before sin, when he said, "Increase and multiply, and fill the 54 Augustine weaves in Galatians 5:17, Ephesians 4:26 and Romans 6:12–13.

55 1 Corinthians 15:57; Romans 8:37.
56 Matthew 6:12.

LATIN

damnata donata fecunditas; nec illam uim mirabilem seminum, immo etiam mirabiliorem qua efficiuntur et semina, inditam corporibus humanis et quodam modo intextam peccati uitium potuit auferre, quo nobis inpacta est etiam necessitas mortis; sed utrumque simul currit isto quasi fluuio adque torrente generis humani, malum quod a parente trahitur, et bonum quod a creante tribuitur. In originali malo duo sunt, peccatum adque supplicium; in originali bono alia duo, propagatio et conformatio.

Sed quantum ad praesentem pertinet intentionem nostram, de malis, quorum unum de nostra uenit audacia, id est peccatum, alterum de iudicio Dei, id est supplicium, iam satis diximus. Nunc de bonis Dei, quae ipsi quoque uitiatae damnataeque naturae contulit siue usque nunc confert, dicere institui. Neque enim damnando aut totum abstulit quod dederat, alioquin nec esset omnino; aut eam remouit a sua potestate, etiam cum diabolo poenaliter subdidit, cum nec ipsum diabolum a suo alienant imperio; quando quidem, ut ipsius quoque diaboli natura subsistat, ille facit qui summe est et facit esse quidquid aliquo modo est.

Duorum igitur illorum, quae diximus bona etiam in naturam peccato uitiatam supplicioque damnatam de bonitatis eius quodam ueluti fonte manare, propagationem in primis mundi operibus benedictione largitus est, a quibus operibus die septimo requieuit; conformatio uero in illo eius est opere, quo usque nunc operatur. Efficacem quippe potentiam suam si rebus subtrahat, nec progredi poterunt et suis dimensis motibus peragere tempora nec prorsus in eo quod creatae sunt aliquatenus permanebunt. Sic ergo creauit hominem Deus, ut ei adderet fertilitatem quandam, qua homines alios propagaret, congenerans eis etiam ipsam propagandi possibilitatem, non necessitatem: quibus tamen uoluit hominibus abstulit eam Deus, et steriles fuerunt; non tamen generi humano abstulit semel datam primis duobus coniugibus benedictione generali.

ENGLISH

earth," he did not choose to withhold even after sin, and the fertility he had granted remained in the condemned stock. Nor could the fault of sin, which also thrust the necessity of death upon us, take away that wonderful power of seeds—or rather the still more wonderful power by which the seeds themselves are produced—implanted in human bodies and in a sense woven into them. Instead, both run together in this river, so to speak, this torrent of the human race: the evil drawn from the parent, and the good bestowed by the Creator. In the original evil there are two things, sin and punishment; in the original good there are two others, propagation and formation.[57]

But as far as our present purpose is concerned, we have already said enough about the evils. One of them came from our own audacity, namely sin; the other came from God's judgment, namely punishment. Now I have undertaken to speak of God's goods, which he has conferred, and still confers to this day, even on a nature that is vitiated and condemned. For in condemning it he did not take away all that he had given, or it would not exist at all. Nor did he remove it from his own power, even when he subjected it to the devil as a punishment, since he does not withdraw even the devil himself from his rule. Indeed, even the devil's nature subsists only because it is made by him who supremely is, and who makes to be whatever in any way is.

We said that two goods flow, as from a kind of fountain of his goodness, even into a nature vitiated by sin and condemned by punishment. Of these, propagation he bestowed by his blessing in the first works of the world, the works from which he rested on the seventh day. Formation, however, belongs to that work of his by which he is working even now. For if he were to withdraw his effective power from things, they could neither move forward and run through their seasons in their measured motions, nor would they remain to any degree at all in what they were created to be. So God created man in such a way as to add to him a certain fertility, by which he would propagate other human beings, and he generated in them as well the very possibility of propagating, though not the necessity. From some people, as he chose, God did take it away, and they were barren; yet he did not take away from the human race what had once been given to the first couple by a general blessing.

57 Genesis 1:28.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Haec ergo propagatio quamuis peccato ablata non fuerit, non tamen etiam ipsa talis est, qualis fuisset, si nemo peccasset. Ex quo enim homo in honore positus, postea quam deliquit, conparatus est pecoribus, similiter generat; non in eo tamen penitus exstincta est quaedam uelut scintilla rationis, in qua factus est ad imaginem Dei. Huic autem propagationi si conformatio non adhiberetur, nec ipsa in sui generis formas modosque procederet. Si enim non concubuissent homines et nihilo minus Deus uellet inplere terras hominibus: quo modo creauit unum sine commixtione maris et feminae, sic posset omnes; concumbentes uero nisi illo creante generantes esse non possunt.

So although this propagation was not taken away by sin, it is still not such as it would have been if no one had sinned. For ever since man, who had been placed in honor, was compared to the beasts after he transgressed, he begets as they do. Yet a kind of spark of reason, so to speak, in which he was made in the image of God, has not been wholly extinguished in him. But if formation were not applied to this propagation, propagation itself would not proceed into the forms and measures of its kind. For if human beings had not lain together, and God still wished to fill the earth with people, then just as he created one man without the union of male and female, so he could have created all. But those who lie together cannot become begetters unless he creates.[58]

Sicut ergo ait apostolus de institutione spiritali, qua homo ad pietatem iustitiamque formatur: Neque qui plantat, est aliquid, neque qui rigat, sed qui incrementum dat Deus: ita etiam hic dici potest: Nec qui concumbit nec qui seminat, est aliquid, sed qui format Deus; nec mater, quae conceptum portat et partum nutrit, est aliquid, sed qui incrementum dat Deus. Ipsa namque operatione, qua usque nunc operatur, facit ut numeros suos explicent semina et a quibusdam latentibus adque inuisibilibus inuolucris in formas uisibiles huius quod adspicimus decoris euoluant; ipse incorpoream corporeamque naturam, illam praepositam, istam subiectam, miris modis copulans et conectens animantem facit.

The apostle speaks of the spiritual instruction by which a person is formed for godliness and righteousness: "Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the growth." In the same way it can be said here: "Neither he who lies with a woman nor he who sows the seed is anything, but God who forms; nor is the mother who carries what is conceived and nurses what is born anything, but God who gives the growth." For by that very working with which he works even now, he causes seeds to unfold their numbers and to develop out of certain hidden and invisible wrappings into the visible forms of the beauty we behold. It is he who, joining and binding together in wonderful ways an incorporeal and a corporeal nature, the one set over the other and the other subject to it, makes a living being.[59]

Quod opus eius tam magnum et mirabile est, ut non solum in homine, quod est animal rationale et ex hoc cunctis terrenis animantibus excellentius adque praestantius, sed in qualibet minutissima muscula bene consideranti stuporem mentis ingerat laudemque pariat Creatoris.

This work of his is so great and so wonderful that, for anyone who considers it well, it strikes the mind with amazement and gives birth to praise of the Creator—not only in a human being, a rational animal and therefore more excellent and outstanding than all the living things of earth, but in any tiny little fly.

58 An echo of Psalm 48:13 (49:12 in most English Bibles): "Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he was compared to the senseless beasts."
59 1 Corinthians 3:7.

THE GIFTS OF THE HUMAN MIND

The human mind, capable of virtue, has invented countless arts, sciences and crafts.

LATIN

Ipse itaque animae humanae mentem dedit, ubi ratio et intellegentia in infante sopita est quodam modo; quasi nulla sit, excitanda scilicet adque exserenda aetatis accessu, qua sit scientiae capax adque doctrinae et habilis perceptioni ueritatis et amoris boni; qua capacitate hauriat sapientiam uirtutibusque sit praedita, quibus prudenter, fortiter, temperanter et iuste aduersus errores et cetera ingenerata uitia dimicet eaque nullius rei desiderio nisi boni illius summi adque inmutabilis uincat. Quod etsi non faciat, ipsa talium bonorum capacitas in natura rationali diuinitus instituta quantum sit boni, quam mirabile opus Omnipotentis, quis conpetenter effatur aut cogitat?

Praeter enim artes bene uiuendi et ad inmortalem perueniendi felicitatem, quae uirtutes uocantur et sola Dei gratia, quae in Christo est, filiis promissionis regnique donantur, nonne humano ingenio tot tantaeque artes sunt inuentae et exercitae, partim necessariae partim uoluptariae, ut tam excellens uis mentis adque rationis in his etiam rebus, quas superfluas, immo et periculosas perniciosasque adpetit, quantum bonum habeat in natura, unde ista potuit uel inuenire uel discere uel exercere, testetur?

Vestimentorum et aedificiorum ad opera quam mirabilia, quam stupenda industria humana peruenerit; quo in agricultura, quo in nauigatione profecerit; quae in fabricatione quorumque uasorum uel etiam statuarum et picturarum uarietate excogitauerit et inpleuerit; quae in theatris mirabilia spectantibus, audientibus incredibilia facienda et exhibenda molita sit; in capiendis occidendis domandis inrationalibus animantibus quae et quanta reppererit; aduersus ipsos homines tot genera uenenorum, tot armorum, tot machinamentorum, et pro salute mortali tuenda adque reparanda quot medicamenta adque adiumenta conprehenderit: pro uoluptate faucium quot condimenta et gulae inritamenta reppererit; ad indicandas et suadendas cogitationes quam multitudinem uarietatemque signorum, ubi praecipuum

ENGLISH

It is he, then, who gave the human soul a mind. In an infant, reason and understanding lie in a sense asleep in it, as if they did not exist; but they are, of course, to be awakened and drawn out as age advances, so that the mind may become capable of knowledge and learning, and fit for perceiving truth and loving the good. By this capacity it may drink in wisdom and be endowed with the virtues, so that it may fight prudently, courageously, temperately, and justly against errors and the other vices born in us, and may overcome them by desiring nothing but that supreme and unchangeable good. And even if it does not do this, who can adequately express or even conceive how great a good this very capacity for such goods is, implanted by God in a rational nature, and how wonderful a work of the Almighty?

Apart from the arts of living well and of attaining immortal happiness, which are called virtues and are given solely by the grace of God that is in Christ to the children of the promise and of the kingdom, has not human ingenuity discovered and practiced so many and such great arts, some necessary and some for pleasure? So excellent is this power of mind and reason that even in the things it seeks that are superfluous, or rather dangerous and destructive, it bears witness to how great a good it has in its nature, the source from which it was able to discover these arts, or learn them, or practice them.

Think of the marvelous, astonishing works that human industry has achieved in clothing and in building; the progress it has made in agriculture and in navigation; what it has devised and executed in making all sorts of vessels, and in its variety of statues and paintings; what it has contrived to have performed and displayed in the theaters, wonders to those who watch and incredible to those who only hear of them. Think of what means it has found, and how many, for capturing, killing, and taming irrational animals; how many kinds of poisons, of weapons, of engines it has devised against human beings themselves, and how many medicines and remedies it has acquired for protecting and restoring mortal health; how many locum uerba et litterae tenent; ad delectandos animos quos elocutionis ornatus, quam diuersorum carminum copiam; ad mulcendas aures quot organa musica, quos cantilenae modos excogitauerit; quantam peritiam dimensionum adque numerorum, meatusque et ordines siderum quanta sagacitate conprehenderit; quam multa rerum mundanarum cognitione se inpleuerit, quis possit eloqui, maxime si uelimus non aceruatim cuncta congerere, sed in singulis inmorari?

LATIN

In ipsis postremo erroribus et falsitatibus defendendis quam magna claruerint ingenia philosophorum adque haereticorum, quis aestimare sufficiat? Loquimur enim nunc de natura mentis humanae, qua ista uita mortalis ornatur, non de fide adque itinere ueritatis, qua illa inmortalis adquiritur. Huius tantae naturae conditor cum sit utique Deus uerus et summus, ipso cuncta quae fecit administrante et summam potestatem summamque habente iustitiam numquam profecto in has miserias decidisset adque ex his praeter eos solos qui liberabuntur in aeternas esset itura, nisi nimis grande peccatum in homine primo, de quo ceteri exorti sunt, praecessisset.

Iam uero in ipso corpore, quamuis nobis sit cum beluis mortalitate commune multisque earum reperiatur infirmius, quanta Dei bonitas, quanta prouidentia tanti Creatoris apparet! Nonne ita sunt in eo loca sensuum et cetera membra disposita speciesque ipsa ac figura et statura totius corporis ita modificata, ut ad ministerium animae rationalis se indicet factum? Non enim ut animalia rationis expertia prona esse uidemus in terram, ita creatus est homo; sed erecta in caelum corporis forma admonet eum quae sursum sunt sapere. Porro mira mobilitas, quae linguae ac manibus adtributa est, ad loquendum et scribendum apta adque conueniens et ad opera artium plurimarum officiorumque conplenda, nonne satis ostendit, quali animae ut seruiret tale sit corpus adiunctum?

ENGLISH

seasonings and stimulants of appetite it has discovered for the pleasure of the palate. Think of the multitude and variety of signs it has devised for expressing thoughts and persuading others of them, among which words and letters hold the chief place; the ornaments of eloquence and the abundance of different kinds of poetry for delighting the mind; how many musical instruments and modes of song for soothing the ears. Think of how much skill in measurement and number it has gained, with what acuteness it has grasped the courses and orders of the stars, how much knowledge of the things of this world it has filled itself with. Who could put all this into words, especially if we wished not to heap everything together in a pile but to dwell on each thing in turn?

Finally, who could estimate how brilliantly the great minds of philosophers and heretics have shone even in defending errors and falsehoods? For we are now speaking of the nature of the human mind, with which this mortal life is adorned, not of faith and the way of truth, by which that immortal life is gained. The creator of so great a nature is certainly the true and supreme God, and he himself governs all that he has made, possessing supreme power and supreme justice. Surely, then, this nature would never have fallen into these miseries, nor would it be passing from them into eternal miseries—all but those alone who will be set free—had not an exceedingly great sin gone before in the first man, from whom all the rest have sprung.

Now in the body itself, though we share mortality with the beasts and it is found to be weaker than the bodies of many of them, how great is the goodness of God, how great the providence of so great a Creator that appears! Are not the seats of the senses and the other members so arranged in it, and the appearance, shape, and stature of the whole body so proportioned, that it shows it was made for the service of a rational soul? For man was not created like the animals that lack reason, which we see bent toward the ground. Rather, the form of his body, raised upright toward heaven, reminds him to set his mind on the things that are above. Moreover, the wonderful mobility given to the tongue and the hands, suited and fitted for speaking and writing and for carrying out the works of many arts and tasks—does it not show clearly enough what kind of soul such a body was joined to serve?

LATIN

ENGLISH

quamquam et detractis necessitatibus operandi ita omnium, partium congruentia numerosa sit et pulchra sibi parilitate respondeat, ut nescias utrum in eo condendo maior sit utilitatis habita ratio quam decoris. Certe enim nihil creatum uidemus in corpore utilitatis causa, quod non habeat etiam decoris locum. Plus autem nobis id appareret, si numeros mensurarum, quibus inter se cuncta conexa sunt et coaptata, nossemus; quos forsitan data opera in his, quae foris eminent, humana posset uestigare sollertia; quae uero tecta sunt adque a nostris remota conspectibus, sicuti est tanta perplexitas uenarum adque neruorum et uiscerum, secreta uitalium, inuenire nullus potest.

And yet, even setting aside the necessities of function, all its parts agree in such rhythmic proportion and answer one another in such beautiful symmetry that you could not tell whether greater account was taken of usefulness or of beauty in making it. Certainly we see nothing created in the body for the sake of usefulness that does not also have a place for beauty. This would be still more evident to us if we knew the numerical proportions by which all its parts are connected and fitted together. Human skill, with diligent effort, might perhaps trace these in the parts that stand out on the surface. But in what is covered and removed from our sight—such as the great tangle of veins, sinews, and inner organs, the secret places of the vital parts—no one can discover them.

Quia etsi medicorum diligentia nonnulla crudelis, quos anatomicos appellant, laniauit corpora mortuorum siue etiam inter manus secantis perscrutantisque morientium adque in carnibus humanis satis inhumane abdita cuncta rimata est, ut quid et quo modo quibus locis curandum esset addisceret: numeros tamen de quibus loquor, quibus coaptatio, quae ἁρμονία Graece dicitur, tamquam cuiusdam organi, extrinsecus adque intrinsecus totius corporis constat, quid dicam, nemo ualuit inuenire, quos nemo ausus est quaerere? qui si noti esse potuissent, in interioribus quoque uisceribus, quae nullum ostentant decus, ita delectaret pulchritudo rationis, ut omni formae apparenti, quae oculis placet, ipsius mentis, quae oculis utitur, praeferretur arbitrio.

Physicians called anatomists have, with a diligence that is in some measure cruel, cut up the bodies of the dead, and even of the dying under the hands of the one cutting and probing. Quite inhumanly, in human flesh, they have searched out everything hidden, in order to learn what should be treated, and how, and in what places. Yet those numbers I am speaking of, on which the fitting together of the whole body, outside and inside, depends, as of some musical instrument—what the Greeks call ἁρμονία [harmony]—why should I say that no one has been able to find them, when no one has dared to look for them? If they could have been known, then even in the inner organs, which display no beauty, the beauty of their design would delight us so much that the judgment of the mind, which uses the eyes, would prefer it to every visible form that pleases the eyes.

Sunt uero quaedam ita posita in corpore, ut tantummodo decorem habeant, non et usum; sicut habet pectus uirile mamillas, sicut facies barbam, quam non esse munimento, sed uirili ornamento indicant purae facies feminarum, quas utique infirmiores muniri tutius conueniret. Si ergo nullum membrum est, in his quidem conspicuis (unde ambigit nemo), quod ita sit alicui operi adcommodatum, ut non etiam sit decorum; sunt autem nonnulla, quorum solum decus et nullus est usus: puto facile intellegi in condicione corporis dignitatem necessitati fuisse praelatam. Transitura est quippe necessitas tempusque uenturum, quando sola inuicem pulchritudine sine ulla libidine perfruamur: quod

There are indeed some things placed in the body in such a way that they have beauty only, and no use: the male chest has nipples, for instance, and the face a beard. That the beard serves not for protection but as a male ornament is shown by the bare faces of women, who, being weaker, would certainly be more fittingly protected. If, then, there is no member—at least among those that are visible, about which no one is in doubt—so adapted to some function that it is not also beautiful, while there are some that have beauty alone and no use, I think it is easily understood that in the making of the body dignity was given preference

LATIN	ENGLISH
maxime ad laudem referendum est Conditoris, cui dicitur in psalmo: Confessionem et decorem induisti.	over necessity. For necessity will pass away, and a time will come when we shall enjoy one another's beauty alone, without any lust. This above all must redound to the praise of the Creator, to whom it is said in the psalm: "You have put on praise and beauty."[60]

THE BEAUTY OF THE WORLD

The beauty of creation, sea, sky and food are mere consolations for the condemned; what will the reward be?

LATIN	ENGLISH
Iam cetera pulchritudo et utilitas creaturae, quae homini, licet in istos labores miseriasque proiecto adque damnato, spectanda adque sumenda diuina largitate concessa est, quo sermone terminari potest? in caeli et terrae et maris multimoda et uaria pulchritudine, in ipsius lucis tanta copia tamque mirabili specie, in sole ac luna et sideribus, in opacitatibus nemorum, in coloribus et odoribus florum, in diuersitate ac multitudine uolucrum garrularum adque pictarum, in multiformi specie tot tantarumque animantium, quarum illae plus habent admirationis, quae molis minimum (plus enim formicularum et apicularum opera stupemus quam inmensa corpora balaenarum), in ipsius quoque maris tam grandi spectaculo, cum sese diuersis coloribus uelut uestibus induit et aliquando uiride adque hoc multis modis, aliquando purpureum, aliquando caeruleum est.	Then there is all the rest of the beauty and usefulness of creation, which God's generosity has granted to man to behold and to use, even though he has been cast out and condemned to these toils and miseries. What words could ever reach the end of it? There is the manifold and varied beauty of sky and earth and sea; the great abundance and wonderful appearance of light itself; the sun and moon and stars; the shade of the woods; the colors and scents of flowers; the variety and multitude of birds, chattering and brightly painted; the many forms of so many and such great living creatures, of which those smallest in bulk excite the most wonder (for we are more amazed at the works of tiny ants and bees than at the immense bodies of whales). There is the vast spectacle of the sea itself, when it clothes itself in different colors as if in garments, and is sometimes green, in many shades, sometimes purple, sometimes blue.
Quam porro delectabiliter spectatur etiam quandocumque turbatur, et fit inde maior suauitas, quia sic demulcet intuentem, ut non iactet et quatiat nauigantem! Quid ciborum usquequaque copia contra famem? quid saporum diuersitas contra fastidium, naturae diffusa diuitiis, non coquorum arte ac labore quaesita? quid in tam multis rebus tuendae aut recuperandae salutis auxilia! Quam grata uicissitudo diei alternantis et noctis! Aurarum quam blanda temperies! In fruticibus et pecoribus indumentorum conficiendorum quanta materies! Omnia commemorare quis possit? Haec autem sola, quae a me uelut in quendam sunt aggerem coartata, si uellem uelut conligata inuolucra soluere adque discutere, quanta mihi mora esset in singulis, quibus plurima continentur! Et haec omnia miserorum sunt damnatorumque solacia, non praemia beatorum.	And how delightful it is to watch even when it is stormy—and the pleasure is all the greater because it soothes the onlooker without tossing and shaking the sailor! What of the abundance of food everywhere against hunger? What of the variety of flavors against boredom, spread abroad by the riches of nature, not sought out by the art and labor of cooks? What of the aids for preserving or recovering health found in so many things! How welcome the alternation of day and night! How gentle the mildness of the breezes! What a wealth of material for making clothing in plants and in flocks! Who could mention everything? Even these few, which I have packed together into a kind of heap—if I wished to untie them, like bundled packets, and examine them, how long I would have to linger over each one, since each contains so very

60 Psalm 103:1 (104:1 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	many things! And all these are the consolations of the wretched and condemned, not the rewards of the blessed.
Quae igitur illa sunt, si tot et talia ac tanta sunt ista? Quid dabit eis quos praedestinauit ad uitam, qui haec dedit etiam eis quos praedestinauit ad mortem? Quae bona in illa beata uita faciet eos sumere, pro quibus in hac misera unigenitum suum filium uoluit usque ad mortem mala tanta perferre? Unde apostolus de ipsis in illud regnum praedestinatis loquens: Qui proprio, inquit, filio non pepercit, sed pro nobis omnibus tradidit eum, quo modo non et cum illo omnia nobis donabit? Cum haec promissio conplebitur, quid erimus! quales erimus! Quae bona in illo regno accepturi sumus, quando quidem Christo moriente pro nobis tale iam pignus accepimus!	What, then, will those rewards be, if these consolations are so many, of such a kind, and so great? What will he give to those whom he predestined to life, when he gave these things even to those whom he predestined to death? What goods will he have them receive in that blessed life, for whose sake he willed that his only-begotten Son should endure such evils in this wretched life, even to the point of death? Hence the apostle, speaking of those predestined to that kingdom, says: "He who did not spare his own Son, but handed him over for us all, how will he not also give us all things with him?" When this promise is fulfilled, what shall we be! What kind of beings shall we be! What goods shall we receive in that kingdom, since in Christ's dying for us we have already received such a pledge![61]
Qualis erit spiritus hominis nullum omnino habens uitium, nec sub quo iaceat, nec cui cedat, nec contra quod saltem laudabiliter dimicet, pacatissima uirtute perfectus! Rerum ibi omnium quanta, quam speciosa, quam certa scientia, sine errore aliquo uel labore, ubi Dei sapientia de ipso suo fonte potabitur, cum summa felicitate, sine ulla difficultate!. Quale erit corpus, quod omni modo spiritui subditum et eo sufficienter uiuificatum nullis alimoniis indigebit! Non enim animale, sed spiritale erit, habens quidem carnis, sed sine ulla carnali corruptione substantiam.	What will the human spirit be like, when it has no vice at all—none to lie beneath, none to yield to, none even to fight against, however praiseworthily—perfected in a virtue wholly at peace! How great, how beautiful, how certain will be the knowledge of all things there, without any error or toil, where the wisdom of God will be drunk from its very source, with supreme happiness and without any difficulty! What will the body be like, which, wholly subject to the spirit and given life by it to the full, will need no nourishment! For it will not be an animal body but a spiritual one, having indeed the substance of flesh, but without any fleshly corruption.

THE STUBBORNNESS OF SOME WHO ATTACK THE RESURRECTION OF THE FLESH, WHICH, AS WAS FORETOLD, THE WHOLE WORLD BELIEVES

The world has believed the resurrection as foretold; God cannot lie, and incorruptible flesh is no evil.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.25 Verum de animi bonis, quibus post hanc uitam beatissimus perfruetur, non a nobis dissentiunt philosophi nobiles: de carnis resurrectione contendunt, hanc quantum possunt negant. Sed credentes multi negantes paucissimos reliquerunt et ad Christum, qui hoc quod istis uidetur absurdum in sua resurrectione monstrauit, fideli corde conuersi sunt, docti et indocti,	As for the goods of the soul which it will enjoy in perfect happiness after this life, the famous philosophers do not disagree with us. It is the resurrection of the flesh that they dispute, and they deny it as much as they can. But the many who believe—the learned and the unlearned, the wise of this world and the foolish—have left very few who

61 Romans 8:32.

LATIN

sapientes mundi et insipientes. Hoc enim credidit mundus, quod praedixit Deus, qui etiam hoc praedixit, quod hanc rem mundus fuerat crediturus; neque enim Petri maleficiis eam cum laude credentium tanto ante praenuntiare conpulsus est. Ille est enim Deus, quem (sicut iam dixi aliquotiens, nec commonere me piget) confitente Porphyrio adque id oraculis deorum suorum probare cupiente ipsa numina perhorrescunt; quem sic laudauit, ut eum et Deum patrem et regem uocaret.

Absit enim, ut sic intellegenda sint quae praedixit, quo modo uolunt hi, qui hoc cum mundo non crediderunt, quod mundum crediturum esse praedixit. Quur enim non potius ita, sicut crediturus tanto ante praedictus est mundus, non sicut paucissimi garriunt, qui hoc cum mundo, quod crediturus praedictus est, credere noluerunt? Si enim propterea dicunt alio modo esse credenda, ne, si dixerint uana esse conscripta, iniuriam faciant illi Deo, cui tam magnum perhibent testimonium: tantam prorsus ei uel etiam grauiorem faciunt iniuriam, si aliter dicunt esse intellegenda, non sicut mundus ea credidit, quem crediturum ipse laudauit, ipse promisit, ipse conpleuit. Utrum enim non potest facere ut resurgat caro et uiuat in aeternum, an propterea credendum non est id eum esse facturum, quia malum est adque indignum Deo?

Sed de omnipotentia eius, qua tot et tanta facit incredibilia, iam multa diximus. Si uolunt inuenire quod omnipotens non potest, habent prorsus; ego dicam, mentiri non potest. Credamus ergo quod potest non credendo quod non potest. Non itaque credentes quod mentiri possit credant esse facturum quod se facturum esse promisit, et sic credant sicut id credidit mundus, quem crediturum esse praedixit, quem crediturum esse laudauit, quem crediturum esse promisit, quem credidisse iam ostendit. Hoc autem malum esse unde demonstrant? Non erit illic ulla corruptio, quod est corporis malum.

ENGLISH

deny it, and have turned with faithful hearts to Christ, who in his own resurrection displayed the very thing that seems absurd to these philosophers. For the world has believed what God foretold, and he also foretold that the world would believe it; nor was he compelled by Peter's sorceries to announce it so long beforehand, with praise for those who would believe. For he is the God before whom—as I have said several times already, and it does not weary me to remind you—the very deities tremble with dread, as Porphyry admits and is eager to prove from the oracles of his own gods; and Porphyry praised him so highly as to call him both God the Father and King.[62]

Far be it from us, then, to understand what he foretold in the way these people want, who have not believed, along with the world, what he foretold the world would believe. For why not understand it rather as the world believed it, the world foretold so long beforehand as going to believe, and not as a very few chatter, who refused to believe, along with the world, what the world was foretold to believe? They say these things must be believed in some other sense, so that they will not insult the God to whom they bear such great testimony by saying that what is written is empty. But if they say these things must be understood otherwise than as the world believed them, they do him just as great an insult, or even a graver one. For it was the world's believing that he himself praised, he himself promised, he himself brought about. Is it that he cannot make the flesh rise again and live forever? Or is it that we must not believe he will do it because it is evil and unworthy of God?

But we have already said a great deal about his omnipotence, by which he does so many and such great incredible things. If they want to find something the Almighty cannot do, they certainly have it; I will tell them: he cannot lie. Let us, then, believe what he can do by not believing what he cannot do. So let them, not believing that he can lie, believe that he will do what he promised he would do. And let them believe it as the world has believed it—the world which he foretold would believe, which he praised as going to believe, which he promised would believe, which he has now 62 The "sorceries" refer to a pagan oracle, discussed in Book 18, claiming that Peter used magic to make the worship of Christ last 365 years.

LATIN

ENGLISH

shown to have believed. But how do they show that this is evil? There will be no corruption there, and corruption is the evil of the body.

De ordine elementorum iam disputauimus; de aliis hominum coniecturis satis diximus; quanta sit futura in corpore incorruptibili facilitas motus, de praesentis bonae ualetudinis temperamento, quae utique nullo modo illi conparanda est inmortalitati, in libro tertio decimo satis, ut opinor, ostendimus. Legant superiora huius operis, qui uel non legerunt uel uolunt recolere quod legerunt.

We have already discussed the order of the elements; we have said enough about other human conjectures. How great the ease of movement will be in an incorruptible body, judging from the balance of good health in our present state—which in no way bears comparison with that immortality—we have shown sufficiently, I think, in the thirteenth book. Those who have not read the earlier parts of this work, or who wish to recall what they have read, should read them.

HOW PORPHYRY'S CLAIM THAT HAPPY SOULS MUST FLEE EVERY BODY IS OVERTHROWN BY THE VIEW OF PLATO HIMSELF, WHO SAYS THE SUPREME GOD PROMISED THE GODS THAT THEY WOULD NEVER BE STRIPPED OF THEIR BODIES

Plato's maker-god promised the gods immortality in their bodies, refuting Porphyry's flight from all bodies.

LATIN

ENGLISH

22.26 Sed Porphyrius ait, inquiunt, ut beata sit anima, corpus esse omne fugiendum. Nihil ergo prodest, quia incorruptibile diximus futurum corpus, si anima beata non erit, nisi omne corpus effugerit. Sed iam et hinc in libro memorato quantum oportuit disputaui; uerum hic unum inde tantum commemorabo. Emendet libros suos istorum omnium magister Plato et dicat eorum deos, ut beati sint, sua corpora fugituros, id est esse morituros, quos in caelestibus corporibus dixit inclusos; quibus tamen Deus, a quo facti sunt, quo possent esse securi, inmortalitatem, id est in eisdem corporibus aeternam permansionem, non eorum natura id habente, sed suo consilio praeualente, promisit. Ubi etiam illud euertit quod dicunt, quoniam est inpossibilis, ideo resurrectionem carnis non esse credendam.

"But Porphyry says," they object, "that for the soul to be happy it must flee every kind of body." So it is no use our saying that the body will be incorruptible, if the soul will not be happy unless it escapes every body. I have already discussed this as much as was needed in the book I mentioned; here I will recall just one point from that discussion. Let Plato, the teacher of all these men, correct his books and say that their gods, in order to be happy, will flee their bodies—that is, will die—the very gods whom he said were enclosed in heavenly bodies. Yet God, by whom they were made, promised them immortality so that they could be secure: that is, an everlasting abiding in those same bodies, not because their nature has this capacity but because his own design prevails. Here he also overturns their claim that the resurrection of the flesh should not be believed because it is impossible.

Apertissime quippe iuxta eundem philosophum, ubi dis a se factis promisit Deus non factus inmortalitatem, quod inpossibile est se dixit esse facturum. Sic enim eum locutum narrat Plato: Quoniam estis orti, inquit, inmortales esse et indissolubiles non potestis; non tamen dissoluemini neque uos ulla mortis fata periment nec erunt ualentiora quam consilium meum, quod maius est uinculum ad perpetuitatem uestram quam illa quibus estis conligati. Si non solum absurdi, sed surdi non sunt qui haec audiunt non utique dubitant dis factis ab illo

For according to that same philosopher, God who was not made, when he promised immortality to the gods he had made, said quite openly that he would do what is impossible. This is how Plato reports him as speaking: "Since you have come into being," he says, "you cannot be immortal and indissoluble. Yet you will not be dissolved, nor will any fate of death destroy you, nor will it be stronger than my design, which is a greater bond for your perpetual existence than those by which

LATIN	ENGLISH
Deo qui eos fecit secundum Platonem quod est inpossibile fuisse promissum. Qui enim dicit: Vos quidem inmortales esse non potestis, sed mea uoluntate inmortales eritis, quid aliud dicit quam id quod fieri non potest me faciente tamen eritis?	you are bound together." Unless those who hear this are not merely senseless but deaf as well, they surely do not doubt that, according to Plato, the God who made those gods promised them something impossible. For when he says, "You cannot be immortal, but by my will you will be immortal," what else is he saying but "By my doing you will be what cannot be"?[63]
Ille igitur carnem incorruptibilem, inmortalem, spiritalem resuscitabit, qui iuxta Platonem id quod inpossibile est se facturum esse promisit. Quid adhuc, quod promisit Deus, quod Deo promittenti credidit mundus, qui etiam ipse promissus est crediturus, esse inpossibile clamant, quando quidem nos Deum, qui etiam secundum Platonem facit inposnibilia, id facturum esse clamamus? Non ergo, ut beatae sint animae, corpus est omne fugiendum, sed corpus incorruptibile recipiendum. Et in quo conuenientius incorruptibili corpore laetabuntur, quam in quo corruptibili gemuerunt?	He, then, who according to Plato promised that he would do what is impossible will raise the flesh incorruptible, immortal and spiritual. Why do they still cry out that what God has promised is impossible—what the world has believed on God's promise, the world which was itself promised as going to believe—when we cry out that God, who even according to Plato does impossible things, will do it? It is not, therefore, every body that souls must flee in order to be happy; rather, they must receive an incorruptible body. And in what incorruptible body will they rejoice more fittingly than in the one in which, when it was corruptible, they groaned?
Sic enim non in eis erit illa dira cupiditas, quam posuit ex Platone Vergilius, ubi ait: Rursus et incipiant in corpora uelle reuerti; sic, inquam, cupiditatem reuertendi ad corpora non habebunt, cum corpora, in quae reuerti cupiunt, secum habebunt et sic habebunt, ut numquam non habeant, numquam ea prorsus uel ad exiguum quamlibet tempus ulla morte deponant.	So they will not have that dreadful craving which Virgil took from Plato, where he says: "and they begin to wish to return again into bodies." They will not, I say, have the craving to return to bodies, since they will have with them the bodies to which they crave to return—and will have them in such a way that they are never without them, and never lay them down by any death, even for the briefest moment.[64]

THE CONTRARY CLAIMS OF PLATO AND PORPHYRY, IN WHICH, IF EACH HAD YIELDED TO THE OTHER, NEITHER WOULD HAVE STRAYED FROM THE TRUTH

If Plato and Porphyry had pooled their truths, they would have reached the Christian resurrection.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.27 Singula quaedam dixerunt Plato adque Porphyrius, quae si inter se communicare potuissent, facti essent fortasse Christiani. Plato dixit sine corporibus animas in aeternum esse non posse. Ideo enim dixit etiam sapientum animas post quamlibet longum tempus, tamen ad corpora redituras. Porphyrius autem dixit animam purgatissimam, cum redierit ad Patrem, ad haec mala mundi numquam esse redituram. Ac per hoc, quod uerum uidit Plato, si dedisset Porphyrio, etiam iustorum	Plato and Porphyry each said certain things which, if they could have shared them with each other, might perhaps have made them Christians. Plato said that souls cannot exist forever without bodies. That is why he said that even the souls of the wise would, after however long a time, return to bodies. Porphyry, on the other hand, said that the thoroughly purified soul, once it has returned to the Father, will never return to the evils of this 63 Plato, Timaeus 41a–b, which Augustine quotes in Cicero's Latin translation.

64 Virgil, Aeneid 6.751.

LATIN

adque sapientum purgatissimas animas ad humana corpora redituras; rursus quod uerum uidit Porphyrius, si dedisset Plato, numquam redituras ad miserias corruptibilis corporis animas sanctas; ut non singuli haec singula, sed ambo et singuli utrumque dicerent: puto quod uiderent esse iam consequens, ut et redirent animae ad corpora et talia reciperent corpora, in quibus beate adque inmortaliter uiuerent.

Quoniam secundum Platonem etiam sanctae animae ad humana corpora redibunt; secundum Porphyrium ad mala mundi huius sanctae animae non redibunt: dicat itaque cum Platone Porphyrius: Redibunt ad corpora; dicat Plato cum Porphyrio: Non redibunt ad mala: et ad ea corpora redire consentient, in quibus nulla patiantur mala. Haec itaque non erunt nisi illa quae promittit Deus, beatas animas in aeternum cum sua aeterna carne facturus. Hoc enim, quantum existimo, iam facile nobis concederent ambo, ut, qui faterentur ad inmortalia corpora redituras animas esse sanctorum, ad sua illas redire permitterent, in quibus mala huius saeculi pertulerunt, in quibus Deum, ut his malis carerent, pie fideliterque coluerunt..

ENGLISH

world. Suppose, then, that Plato had passed on to Porphyry what he truly saw—that even the thoroughly purified souls of the just and wise will return to human bodies—and Porphyry in turn had passed on to Plato what he truly saw—that holy souls will never return to the miseries of a corruptible body—so that each did not say only his own point, but both together, and each of them, said both. Then, I think, they would see that it follows that souls both return to bodies and receive bodies of such a kind that they can live in them happily and immortally.

According to Plato, even holy souls will return to human bodies; according to Porphyry, holy souls will not return to the evils of this world. So let Porphyry say with Plato, "They will return to bodies"; let Plato say with Porphyry, "They will not return to evils"; and they will agree that souls return to bodies in which they suffer no evils. These bodies, then, will be none other than those which God promises, who will make souls happy forever with their own eternal flesh. For, as far as I can judge, both would now readily grant us this: having admitted that the souls of the saints will return to immortal bodies, they would allow them to return to their own bodies—the bodies in which they endured the evils of this world, and in which they worshiped God piously and faithfully so as to be free of those evils.

WHAT PLATO, LABEO, OR EVEN VARRO COULD HAVE CONTRIBUTED TO THE TRUE FAITH IN THE RESURRECTION IF THEIR OPINIONS HAD BEEN COMBINED INTO ONE VIEW

Plato's myth, Labeo's tale and Varro's rebirth after 440 years all concede bodies can return to life.

LATIN

22.28 Nonnulli nostri propter quoddam praeclarissimum loquendi genus et propter nonnulla, quae ueraciter sensit, amantes Platonem dicunt eum aliquid simile nobis etiam de mortuorum resurrectione sensisse. Quod quidem sic tangit in libris de re publica Tullius, ut eum lusisse potius, quam quod id uerum esset, adfirmet dicere uoluisse. Inducit enim hominem reuixisse et narrasse quaedam, quae Platonicis disputationibus congruebant. Labeo etiam duos dicit uno die fuisse defunctos et occurrisse inuicem in quodam compito, deinde ad corpora sua iussos fuisse remeare et constituisse inter se amicos se esse uicturos, adque ita esse factum, donec postea morerentur. Sed isti auctores talem resurrectionem corporis factam fuisse narrarunt, quales

ENGLISH

Some of our own people, who love Plato for his splendid style and for some things he truly perceived, say that he held a view similar to ours even about the resurrection of the dead. Cicero touches on this in his books On the Republic, but in such a way as to assert that Plato meant to play rather than to say that it was true. For Plato brings in a man who came back to life and told certain things that agreed with Platonic teaching. Labeo, too, says that two men died on the same day and met each other at a crossroads; then they were ordered to go back to their bodies, and agreed between themselves to live as friends, and so it was until they later died. But these authors have

LATIN	ENGLISH
fuerunt eorum, quos resurrexisse nouimus et huic quidem redditos uitae, sed non eo modo ut non morerentur ulterius.	told of a resurrection of the body like that of the people we know to have risen again and been restored to this life—though not in such a way that they would never die again.[65]
Mirabilius autem quiddam Marcus Varro ponit in libris, quos conscripsit de gente populi Romani, cuius putaui uerba ipsa ponenda. Genethliaci quidam scripserunt, inquit, esse in renascendis hominibus quam appellant παλιγγενεσίαν Graeci; hac scripserunt confici in annis numero quadringentis quadraginta, ut idem corpus et eadem anima, quae fuerint coniuncta in homine aliquando, eadem rursus redeant in coniunctionem. Iste Varro quidem siue illi genethliaci nescio qui (non enim nomina eorum prodidit, quorum commemorauit sententiam) aliquid dixerunt, quod licet falsum sit (cum enim semel ad eadem corpora quae gesserunt animae redierint, numquam ea sunt postea relicturae), tamen multa illius inpossibilitatis, qua contra nos isti garriunt, argumenta conuellit et destruit.	Marcus Varro records something more remarkable in the books he wrote On the Race of the Roman People, and I thought his actual words should be quoted. "Certain horoscope-casters," he says, "have written that in the rebirth of human beings there is what the Greeks call palingenesia [rebirth]. They wrote that it is completed in a span of four hundred and forty years, so that the same body and the same soul, which were once joined in a human being, return again into union." This Varro, or those unknown horoscope-casters (for he did not give the names of those whose opinion he reported), said something that is false: once souls have returned to the same bodies they once wore, they will never afterward leave them. Yet it uproots and demolishes many of the arguments for that impossibility with which these people chatter against us.[66]
Qui enim hoc sentiunt siue senserunt, non eis uisum est fieri non posse, ut dilapsa cadauera in auras in puluerem, in cinerem in umores, in corpora uescentium bestiarum uel ipsorum quoque hominum ad id rursus redeant, quod fuerunt. Quapropter Plato et Porphyrius, uel potius quicumque illos diligunt et adhuc uiuunt, si nobis consentiunt etiam sanctas animas ad corpora redituras, sicut ait Plato, nec tamen ad mala ulla redituras, sicut ait Porphyrius, ut ex his fiat consequens, quod fides praedicat Christiana, talia corpora recepturas, in quibus sine ullo malo in aeternum feliciter uiuant, adsumant etiam hoc de Varrone, ut ad eadem corpora redeant, in quibus antea fuerunt, et aput eos tota quaestio de carnis in aeternum resurrectione soluetur.	For those who hold or held this view did not think it impossible that corpses which had dissolved into air, into dust, into ashes, into moisture, into the bodies of beasts that fed on them, or even of human beings, should return again to what they had been. So Plato and Porphyry—or rather, whoever loves them and is still alive—agree with us that even holy souls will return to bodies, as Plato says, and yet will return to no evils, as Porphyry says; and from this follows what the Christian faith proclaims: that they will receive bodies of such a kind that they can live in them happily forever, without any evil. If so, let them also take this point from Varro, that souls return to the same bodies in which they were before, and for them the whole question of the resurrection of the flesh to eternal life will be solved.

THE NATURE OF THE VISION BY WHICH THE SAINTS WILL SEE GOD IN THE WORLD TO COME

The saints will see God in a peace that surpasses understanding, now glimpsed only in a mirror.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.29 . Nunc iam quid acturi sint in corporibus inmortalibus adque spiritalibus sancti, non adhuc eorum carne	Now let us see, as far as the Lord deigns to help us, what the saints will do in their immortal and spir-

65 Plato's Republic, book 10, tells the myth of Er, a soldier who returned to life; Cicero imitated it in book 6 of On the Republic. Cornelius Labeo was a pagan writer on religion, probably of the 3rd century AD.

LATIN

carnaliter, sed spiritaliter iam uiuente, quantum Dominus dignatur adiuuare uideamus. Et illa quidem actio uel potius quies adque otium quale futurum sit, si uerum uelim dicere, nescio. Non enim hoc umquam per sensus corporis uidi. Si autem mente, id est intellegentia, uidisse me dicam, quantum est aut quid est nostra intellegentia ad illam excellentiam? Ibi est enim pax Dei, quae, sicut ait apostolus, superat omnem intellectum; quem nisi nostrum, aut fortasse etiam sanctorum angelorum? non enim et Dei. Si ergo sancti in Dei pace uicturi sunt, profecto in ea pace uicturi sunt, quae superat omnem intellectum.

Quoniam nostrum quidem superat, non est dubium; si autem superat et angelorum, ut nec ipsos excepisse uideatur, qui ait omnem intellectum: secundum hoc dictum esse debemus accipere, quia pacem Dei, qua Deus, ipse pacatus est, sicut Deus nouit, non eam nos sic possumus nosse nec ulli angeli. Superat itaque omnem intellectum, non dubium quod praeter suum. Sed quia et nos pro modo nostro pacis eius participes facti summam in nobis adque inter nos et cum ipso pacem, quantum nostrum summum est obtinebimus: isto modo pro suo modo sciunt eam sancti angeli; homines autem nunc longe infra, quantumlibet prouectu mentis excellant.

Considerandum est enim quantus uir dicebat: Ex parte scimus et ex parte prophetamus, donec ueniat quod perfectum est; et: Videmus nunc per speculum in aenigmate, tunc autem facie ad faciem. Sic iam uident sancti angeli, qui etiam nostri angeli dicti sunt, quia eruti de potestate tenebrarum et accepto spiritus pignore translati ad regnum Christi ad eos angelos iam coepimus pertinere, cum quibus nobis erit sancta adque dulcissima, de qua iam tot libros scripsimus, Dei ciuitas ipsa communis. Sic sunt ergo angeli nostri, qui sunt angeli Dei, quem ad modum Christus Dei Christus est noster. Dei sunt, quia Deum non reliquerunt; nostri sunt quia suos ciues nos habere coeperunt. Dixit autem Dominus Iesus: Videte ne contemnatis unum de pusillis istis.

ENGLISH

itual bodies, when their flesh no longer lives in a fleshly way but spiritually. To tell the truth, I do not know what that activity—or rather that rest and leisure—will be like. For I have never seen it with the senses of the body. And if I were to say that I have seen it with the mind, that is, with the understanding, what is our understanding, how great is it, compared with that excellence? For there is the peace of God, which, as the apostle says, "surpasses all understanding." Whose understanding, if not ours—or perhaps also that of the holy angels? Certainly not God's. If, then, the saints are to live in the peace of God, they will surely live in that peace which surpasses all understanding.[67]

That it surpasses ours there is no doubt. But if it surpasses that of the angels too—for the one who said "all understanding" seems not to have made an exception even of them—then we must take it to have been said in this sense: that the peace of God, by which God himself is at peace, cannot be known by us, nor by any angels, in the way that God knows it. So it surpasses all understanding—except, no doubt, his own. But we too, made sharers in his peace according to our own measure, shall obtain the highest peace within ourselves, among ourselves and with him, as far as our highest goes. In this way the holy angels know it according to their measure; but human beings now know it far below that, however greatly they may excel in the progress of the mind.

For we must consider how great a man it was who said: "We know in part and we prophesy in part, until what is perfect comes"; and: "Now we see through a mirror, in a riddle, but then face to face." This is how the holy angels already see, who are also called our angels. For we have been rescued from the power of darkness, have received the pledge of the Spirit, and have been transferred to the kingdom of Christ; and so we have already begun to belong to those angels with whom we shall share that holy and most sweet city of God itself, about which we have now written so many books. So the angels of God are our angels, just as the Christ of God is our Christ. They are God's because they did not forsake God; they are ours be-66 This work of Varro's is lost.

67 Philippians 4:7.

LATIN

ENGLISH

cause they have begun to have us as their fellow citizens. And the Lord Jesus said: "See that you do not despise one of these little ones.[68]

Dico enim uobis, quia angeli eorum in caelis semper uident faciem patris mei, quia in caelis est. Sicut ergo illi uident, ita et nos uisuri sumus; sed nondum ita uidemus. Propter quod ait apostolus, quod paulo ante dixi: Videmus nunc per speculum in aenigmate, tunc autem facie ad faciem. Praemium itaque fidei nobis uisio ista seruatur, de qua et Iohannes apostolus loquens: Cum apparuerit, inquit, similes ei erimus, quoniam uidebimus eum sicuti est. Facies autem Dei manifestatio eius intellegenda est, non aliquod tale membrum, quale nos habemus in corpore adque isto nomine nuncupamus.

For I tell you, their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father, who is in heaven." As they see, then, so we too shall see; but we do not yet see in that way. That is why the apostle says what I quoted a little earlier: "Now we see through a mirror, in a riddle, but then face to face." This vision, then, is kept for us as the reward of faith; and the apostle John, speaking of it, says: "When he appears, we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is." By the face of God, however, we must understand his manifestation, not some member like the one we have in our body and call by that name.[69]

Quapropter cum ex me quaeritur, quid acturi sint sancti in illo corpore spiritali, non dico quod iam uideo, sed dico quod credo, secundum illud quod in psalmo lego: Credidi, propter quod locutus sum. Dico itaque: Visuri sunt Deum in ipso corpore; sed utrum per ipsum, sicut per corpus nunc uidemus solem, lunam, stellas, mare ac terram et quae sunt in ea, non parua quaestio est. Durum est enim dicere, quod sancti talia corpora tunc habebunt, ut non possint oculos claudere adque aperire cum uolent; durius autem, quod ibi Deum, quisquis oculos clauserit, non uidebit.

So when I am asked what the saints will do in that spiritual body, I do not say what I already see; I say what I believe, in keeping with what I read in the psalm: "I believed, and therefore I have spoken." I say, then: They will see God in the body itself. But whether they will see him through it, as we now see through the body the sun, the moon, the stars, the sea, the earth and the things on it, is no small question. For it is hard to say that the saints will then have bodies such that they cannot close and open their eyes when they wish; but it is harder still to say that anyone there who closes his eyes will not see God.[70]

Si enim propheta Helisaeus puerum suum Giezi absens corpore uidit accipientem munera, quae dedit ei Naeman Syrus, quem propheta memoratus a leprae deformitate mundauerat, quod seruus nequam domino suo non uidente latenter se fecisse putauerat: quanto magis in illo corpore spiritali uidebunt sancti omnia, non solum si oculos claudant, uerum etiam unde sunt corpore absentes! Tunc enim erit perfectum illud, de quo loquens apostolus: Ex parte, inquit, scimus et ex parte prophetamus; cum autem uenerit quod perfectum est, quod ex parte est euacuabitur.

The prophet Elisha, though absent in body, saw his servant Gehazi accepting the gifts given him by Naaman the Syrian, whom the prophet had cleansed of the disfigurement of leprosy—something the wicked servant thought he had done in secret, unseen by his master. If so, how much more will the saints in that spiritual body see all things, not only when they close their eyes, but even from places where they are absent in body! For then will come that perfection of which the apostle speaks when he says: "We know in part and we prophesy in part; but when what is perfect comes, what is in part will be done away."[71]

Deinde ut quo modo posset aliqua similitudine ostenderet, quantum ab illa quae futura est distet haec

Then, to show by some comparison, as far as he could, how far this life falls short of the life to 68 1 Corinthians 13:9–10, 12; Matthew 18:10.

69 1 John 3:2.
70 Psalm 115:10 (116:10 in most English Bibles).
71 The story is told in 2 Kings 5 (4 Kings in Augustine's Bible).

LATIN

uita, non qualiumcumque hominum, uerum etiam qui praecipua hic sanctitate sunt praediti: Cum essem, inquit, paruulus, quasi paruulus sapiebam, quasi paruulus loquebar, quasi paruulus cogitabam; cum autem factus sum uir, euacuaui ea quae paruuli erant. Videmus nunc per speculum in aenigmate, tunc autem facie ad faciem. Nunc scio ex parte, tunc autem cognoscam sicut et cognitus sum.

Si ergo in hac uita, ubi hominum mirabilium prophetia ita conparanda est illi uitae, quasi paruuli ad iuuenem, uidit tamen Helisaeus accipientem munera seruum suum, ubi ipse non erat: itane cum uenerit quod perfectum est, nec iam corpus corruptibile adgrauabit animam, sed incorruptibile nihil inpediet, illi sancti ad ea, quae uidenda sunt, oculis corporeis, quibus Helisaeus absens ad seruum suum uidendum non indiguit, indigebunt? Nam secundum interpretes septuaginta ista sunt ad Giezi uerba prophetae: Nonne cor meum iit tecum, quando conuersus est uir de curru suo in obuiam tibi et accepisti pecuniam? et cetera; sicut autem ex Hebraeo interpretatus est presbyter Hieronymus: Nonne cor meum, inquit, in praesenti erat, quando reuersus est homo de curru suo in occursum tui?

Corde suo ergo se dixit hoc uidisse propheta, adiuto quidem mirabiliter nullo dubitante diuinitus.

Sed quanto amplius tunc omnes munere isto abundabunt, cum Deus erit omnia in omnibus! Habebunt tamen etiam illi oculi corporei officium suum et in loco suo erunt, uteturque illis spiritus per spiritale corpus. Neque enim et ille propheta, quia non eis indiguit ut uideret absentem, non eis usus est ad uidenda praesentia; quae tamen spiritu uidere posset, etiamsi illos clauderet, sicut uidit absentia, ubi cum eis ipse non erat. Absit ergo, ut dicamus illos sanctos in illa uita Deum clausis oculis non uisuros, quem spiritu semper uidebunt.

ENGLISH

come—not the life of just anyone, but even of those who are endowed here with outstanding holiness—he says: "When I was a child, I understood like a child, I spoke like a child, I thought like a child; but when I became a man, I put away the things of a child. Now we see through a mirror, in a riddle, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then I shall know even as I am known."

In this life, then, the prophecy of wonderful men compares with that life as a small child with a young man; and yet here Elisha saw his servant accepting gifts in a place where he himself was not. When what is perfect comes, and the corruptible body no longer weighs down the soul, but an incorruptible one hinders nothing, are those saints really going to need bodily eyes to see what is to be seen—eyes that Elisha, though absent, did not need in order to see his servant? For according to the Seventy translators, the prophet's words to Gehazi are these: "Did not my heart go with you, when the man turned from his chariot to meet you, and you took the money?" and so on. But as the presbyter Jerome translated it from the Hebrew, he says: "Was not my heart present when the man turned back from his chariot to meet you?"[72]

So the prophet said that he saw this with his heart —which, no one doubts, was wonderfully aided by God.

But how much more fully will all then abound in this gift, when God will be all in all! Yet those bodily eyes too will have their function and will be in their place, and the spirit will use them through the spiritual body. For that prophet, too, did not fail to use his eyes to see things present just because he did not need them to see someone absent —though he could have seen those present things with the spirit even if he closed his eyes, just as he saw absent things when he was not there with them. Far be it from us, then, to say that the saints in that life will not see God when their eyes are closed, since they will always see him with the spirit.[73]

72 2 Kings 5:26. The "Seventy" are the translators of the Septuagint, the ancient Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures; Jerome (c. AD 347–420) made a new Latin translation from the Hebrew.
73 1 Corinthians 15:28.

SEEING GOD WITH THE EYES OF THE BODY

Will risen eyes see God? Perhaps spiritual eyes will see him present in all bodies everywhere.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed utrum uidebunt et per oculos corporis cum eos apertos habebunt, inde quaestio est. Si enim tantum poterunt in corpore spiritali eo modo utique etiam ipsi oculi spiritales, quantum possunt isti quales nunc habemus: procul dubio per eos Deus uideri non poterit. Longe itaque alterius erunt potentiae, si per eos uidebitur incorporea illa natura, quae non continetur loco, sed ubique tota est. Non enim quia dicimus Deum et in caelo esse et in terra (ipse quippe ait per prophetam: Caelum et terram ego inpleo), aliam partem dicturi sumus eum in caelo habere et in terra aliam; sed totus in caelo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul, quod nulla natura corporalis potest.	But whether they will also see him through the eyes of the body when they have them open—that is the question. For if, in the spiritual body, the eyes themselves, spiritual as they will be, can do only as much as the eyes we now have, then God will certainly not be able to be seen through them. They will therefore be of a very different power if through them that incorporeal nature is to be seen which is not contained in a place but is everywhere whole. For when we say that God is both in heaven and on earth—he himself says through the prophet, "I fill heaven and earth"—we are not going to say that he has one part in heaven and another part on earth. He is whole in heaven and whole on earth, not at alternate times but both at once, which no bodily nature can be.[74]
Vis itaque praepollentior oculorum erit illorum, non ut acrius uideant, quam quidam perhibentur uidere serpentes uel aquilae (quantalibet enim acrimonia cernendi eadem quoque animalia nihil aliud possunt uidere quam corpora), sed ut uideant et incorporalia. Et fortasse ista uirtus magna cernendi data fuerit ad horam etiam in isto mortali corpore oculis sancti uiri Iob, quando ait ad Deum: In obauditu auris audiebam te prius, nunc autem oculus meus uidet te; propterea despexi memet ipsum et distabui et existimaui me terram et cinerem; quamuis nihil hic prohibeat oculum cordis intellegi, de quibus oculis ait apostolus: Inluminatos oculos habere cordis uestri. Ipsis autem uideri Deum, cum uidebitur, Christianus ambigit nemo, qui fideliter accipit, quod ait Deus ille magister: Beati mundi corde, quoniam ipsi Deum uidebunt.	So the power of those eyes will be far greater—not so that they see more sharply than certain serpents or eagles are said to see (for however keen their sight, these animals too can see nothing but bodies), but so that they see even incorporeal things. And perhaps this great power of sight was given for a moment, even in this mortal body, to the eyes of the holy man Job, when he says to God: "Before, I heard you with the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees you; therefore I have despised myself and wasted away, and counted myself earth and ashes." Nothing here, however, prevents us from understanding the eye of the heart, the eyes of which the apostle says: "to have the eyes of your heart enlightened." That God is seen with these eyes, when he is seen, no Christian doubts who faithfully accepts what that God and teacher says: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."[75]
Sed utrum etiam corporalibus ibi oculis uideatur, hoc in ista quaestione uersamus.	But whether he will also be seen there with bodily eyes—that is what we are considering in this question.
Illud enim quod scriptum est: Et uidebit omnis caro salutare Dei, sine ullius nodo difficultatis sic intellegi potest, ac si dictum fuerit: Et uidebit omnis homo	For the text "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God" can be understood without any knot of difficulty, as if it had said: "And every human being 74 Jeremiah 23:24.

75 Job 42:5–6; Ephesians 1:18; Matthew 5:8.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Christum Dei, qui utique in corpore uisus est et in corpore uidebitur, quando uiuos et mortuos iudicabit. Quod autem ipse sit salutare Dei, multa sunt et alia testimonia scripturarum; sed euidentius uenerandi illius senis Symeonis uerba declarant, qui, cum infantem Christum accepisset in manus suas: Nunc, inquit, dimittis, Domine, seruum tuum secundum uerbum tuum in pace, quoniam uiderunt oculi mei salutare tuum. Illud etiam, quod ait supra memoratus Iob, sicut in exemplaribus, quae ex Hebraeo sunt, inuenitur: Et in carne mea uidebo Deum, resurrectionem quidem carnis sine dubio prophetauit, non tamen dixit: Per carnem meam.	shall see the Christ of God," who was indeed seen in a body and will be seen in a body when he judges the living and the dead. That he himself is the salvation of God is shown by many other testimonies of Scripture as well; but it is declared most plainly by the words of that venerable old man Simeon, who took the infant Christ into his hands and said: "Now, Lord, you let your servant go in peace, according to your word, for my eyes have seen your salvation." Again, in the saying of Job mentioned above, as it is found in the copies translated from the Hebrew—"And in my flesh I shall see God"—he certainly prophesied the resurrection of the flesh; yet he did not say "through my flesh."[76]
Quod quidem si dixisset, posset Deus Christus intellegi, qui per carnem in carne uidebitur; nunc uero potest et sic accipi: In carne mea uidebo Deum, ac si dixisset: In carne mea ero, cum uidebo Deum. Et illud, quod ait apostolus: Facie ad faciem, non cogit ut Deum per hanc faciem corporalem, ubi sunt oculi corporales, nos uisuros esse credamus, quem spiritu sine intermissione uidebimus. Nisi enim esset etiam interioris hominis facies, non diceret idem apostolus: Nos autem reuelata facie gloriam Domini speculantes in eandem imaginem transformamur, de gloria in gloriam, tamquam a Domini spiritu; nec aliter intellegimus et quod in psalmo canitur: Accedite ad eum et inluminamini, et facies uestrae non erubescent. Fide quippe acceditur ad Deum, quam cordis constat esse, non corporis.	If he had said that, it could be understood of God the Christ, who will be seen through the flesh in the flesh. As it is, "In my flesh I shall see God" can also be taken as if he had said: "I shall be in my flesh when I see God." And the apostle's words "face to face" do not compel us to believe that we shall see God through this bodily face, where the bodily eyes are, since we shall see him with the spirit without interruption. For if the inner man did not also have a face, the same apostle would not say: "But we, beholding the glory of the Lord with unveiled face, are transformed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord." Nor do we understand otherwise what is sung in the psalm: "Come to him and be enlightened, and your faces will not be ashamed." For it is by faith that we come to God, and faith clearly belongs to the heart, not to the body.[77]
Sed quia spiritale corpus nescimus quantos habebit accessus (de re quippe inexperta loquimur), ubi aliqua, quae aliter intellegi nequeat, diuinarum scripturarum non occurrit et succurrit auctoritas, necesse est ut contingat in nobis quod legitur in libro Sapientiae: Cogitationes mortalium timidae et incertae prouidentiae nostrae.	But we do not know how far the spiritual body will be able to reach—for we are speaking of something we have not experienced. So where no authority of the divine Scriptures comes forward to meet us and to aid us, one that cannot be understood in any other way, what we read in the book of Wisdom must necessarily happen to us: "The thoughts of mortals are timid, and our foresight uncertain."[78]
Ratiocinatio quippe illa philosophorum, qua disputant ita mentis adspectu intellegibilia uideri et sensu corporis sensibilia, id est corporalia, ut nec intellegibilia per	The philosophers reason that intelligible things are seen by the gaze of the mind and sensible, that 76 Luke 3:6 (quoting Isaiah 40:5); Luke 2:29–30; Job 19:26.

77 2 Corinthians 3:18; Psalm 33:6 (34:5 in most English Bibles).
78 Wisdom 9:14.

LATIN

corpus nec corporalia per se ipsam mens ualeat intueri, si posset nobis esse certissima, profecto certum esset per oculos corporis etiam spiritalis nullo modo posse uideri Deum. Sed istam ratiocinationem et uera ratio et prophetica inridet auctoritas. Quis enim ita sit auersus a uero, ut dicere audeat Deum corporalia ista nescire? Numquid ergo corpus habet, per cuius oculos ea possit addiscere? Deinde quod de propheta Helisaeo paulo ante diximus, nonne satis indicat etiam spiritu, non per corpus, corporalia posse cerni? Quando enim seruus ille munera accepit, utique corporaliter gestum est; quod tamen propheta non per corpus, sed per spiritum uidit.

Sicut ergo constat corpora uideri spiritu, quid si tanta erit potentia spiritalis corporis, ut corpore uideatur et spiritus? Spiritus enim est Deus. Deinde uitam quidem suam, qua nunc uiuit in corpore et haec terrena membra uegetat facitque uiuentia, interiore sensu quisque, non per corporeos oculos nouit; aliorum uero uitas, cum sint inuisibiles, per corpus uidet. Nam unde uiuentia discernimus a non uiuentibus corpora, nisi corpora simul uitasque uideamus, quas nisi per corpus uidere non possumus? Vitas autem sine corporibus corporeis oculis non uidemus.

Quam ob rem fieri potest ualdeque credibile est sic nos esse uisuros mundana corpora tunc caeli noui et terrae nouae, ut Deum ubique praesentem et uniuersa etiam corporalia gubernantem per corpora quae gestabimus et quae conspiciemus, quaqua uersum oculos duxerimus, clarissima perspicuitate uideamus, non sicut nunc inuisibilia Dei per ea, quae facta sunt, intellecta conspiciuntur per speculum in aenigmate et ex parte, ubi plus in nobis ualet fides, qua credimus, quam rerum corporalium species, quam per oculos cernimus corporales.

ENGLISH

is, bodily, things by the senses of the body, in such a way that the mind can neither behold intelligible things through the body nor bodily things by itself. If this reasoning could be entirely certain for us, it would surely be certain that God cannot in any way be seen through the eyes of a body, even a spiritual one. But both true reason and prophetic authority laugh at this reasoning. For who is so turned away from the truth as to dare to say that God does not know these bodily things? Does he then have a body, through whose eyes he could learn about them? Again, does not what we said a little earlier about the prophet Elisha show clearly enough that bodily things can also be perceived by the spirit, not through the body? For when that servant accepted the gifts, it was certainly a bodily event; yet the prophet saw it not through the body but through the spirit.

Since it is established, then, that bodies are seen by the spirit, what if the power of the spiritual body is so great that spirit too is seen by the body? For God is spirit. Again, each person knows his own life—the life by which he now lives in the body, and quickens these earthly limbs and makes them alive—by an inner sense, not through bodily eyes; but he sees the lives of others through the body, though lives are invisible. For how do we distinguish living bodies from those that are not living, unless we see bodies and lives together—lives which we cannot see except through the body? Lives without bodies we do not see with bodily eyes.[79]

It is therefore possible, and very credible, that we shall then see the material bodies of the new heaven and the new earth in such a way that, wherever we turn our eyes, we shall see God with the most brilliant clarity—present everywhere and governing all things, even bodily things—through the bodies we shall wear and through those we shall behold. It will not be as it is now, when "the invisible things of God are seen, being understood through the things that are made," through a mirror, in a riddle and in part, and when faith, by which we believe, counts for more in us than the appearance of bodily things which we perceive through bodily eyes.[80]

79 John 4:24.
80 Romans 1:20.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed sicut homines, inter quos uiuentes motusque uitales exserentes uiuimus, mox ut adspicimus, non credimus uiuere, sed uidemus, cum eorum uitam sine corporibus uidere nequeamus, quam tamen in eis per corpora remota omni ambiguitate conspicimus: ita quacumque spiritalia illa lumina corporum nostrorum circumferemus, incorporeum Deum omnia regentem etiam per corpora contuebimur.	Consider the people among whom we live, who are alive and show the movements of life: as soon as we look at them, we do not believe that they live—we see it. We cannot see their life without bodies, yet through their bodies we perceive it in them beyond all doubt. In the same way, wherever we turn those spiritual lights of our bodies, we shall behold the incorporeal God ruling all things, even through bodies.
Aut ergo sic per illos oculos uidebitur Deus, ut aliquid habeant in tanta excellentia menti simile, quo et incorporea natura cernatur, quod ullis exemplis siue scripturarum testimoniis diuinarum uel difficile est uel inpossibile ostendere; aut, quod est ad intellegendum facilius, ita Deus nobis erit notus adque conspicuus, ut uideatur spiritu a singulis nobis in singulis nobis, uideatur ab altero in altero, uideatur in se ipso, uideatur in caelo nouo et terra noua adque in omni, quae tunc fuerit, creatura, uideatur et per corpora in omni corpore, quocumque fuerint spiritalis corporis oculi acie perueniente directi. Patebunt etiam cogitationes nostrae inuicem nobis.	Either, then, God will be seen through those eyes in such a way that, in their great excellence, they have something like mind, by which even an incorporeal nature can be perceived—and this is hard or impossible to demonstrate by any examples or testimonies of the divine Scriptures. Or else—and this is easier to understand—God will be so known to us and so visible that he will be seen by the spirit by each of us in each of us; seen by one in another; seen in himself; seen in the new heaven and the new earth and in every creature that will then exist; seen also through bodies in every body, wherever the eyes of the spiritual body are directed and their gaze reaches. Our thoughts, too, will lie open to one another.
Tunc enim inplebitur, quod apostolus, cum dixisset: Nolite ante tempus iudicare quidquam, mox addidit: Donec ueniat Dominus, et inluminabit abscondita tenebrarum et manifestabit cogitationes cordis, et tunc laus erit unicuique a Deo.	For then will be fulfilled what the apostle added immediately after saying, "Do not judge anything before the time": "until the Lord comes, who will bring to light what is hidden in darkness and will reveal the thoughts of the heart; and then each will receive praise from God."[81]

THE ETERNAL HAPPINESS OF THE CITY OF GOD, AND THE EVERLASTING SABBATH

In heaven the saints will praise God without end, with degrees of glory but no envy.

LATIN	ENGLISH
22.30 Quanta erit illa felicitas, ubi nullum erit malum, nullum latebit bonum, uacabitur Dei laudibus, qui erit omnia in omnibus! Nam quid aliud agatur, ubi neque ulla desidia cessabitur neque ulla indigentia laborabitur, nescio. Admoneor etiam sancto cantico, ubi lego uel audio: Beati, qui habitant in domo tua, in saecula saeculorum laudabunt te. Omnia membra et uiscera incorruptibilis corporis, quae nunc uidemus per usus necessitatis uarios distributa, quoniam tunc non erit ipsa necessitas, sed plena certa, secura sempiterna felicitas, proficient in laudibus Dei. Omnes quippe illi, de quibus iam sum locutus, qui nunc latent, harmoniae corporalis numeri	How great that happiness will be, where there will be no evil, where no good will lie hidden, where we will be free for the praises of God, who will be all in all! For what else would be done there, where no one will stop out of idleness and no one will toil out of need, I do not know. I am reminded of this also by the holy song, where I read or hear: "Blessed are those who dwell in your house; they will praise you forever and ever." All the members and inner organs of the incorruptible body, which we now see assigned to the various uses of necessity, will contribute to the praises of God, since

81 1 Corinthians 4:5.

LATIN

non latebunt, intrinsecus et extrinsecus per corporis cuncta dispositi, et cum ceteris rebus, quae ibi magnae adque mirabiles uidebuntur, rationales mentes in tanti artificis laudem rationabilis pulchritudinis delectatione succendent.

Qui motus illic talium corporum sint futuri, temere definire non audeo, quod excogitare non ualeo; tamen et motus et status, sicut ipsa species, decens erit, ubi quicumque erit, quod non decebit non erit. Certe ubi uolet spiritus, ibi erit protinus corpus; nec uolet aliquid spiritus, quod nec spiritum possit decere nec corpus. Vera ibi gloria erit, ubi laudantis nec errore quisquam nec adulatione laudabitur; uerus honor, qui nulli negabitur digno, nulli deferetur indigno; sed nec ad eum ambiet ullus indignus, ubi nullus permittetur esse nisi dignus; uera pax, ubi nihil aduersi nec a se ipso nec ab aliquo quisque patietur. Praemium uirtutis erit ipse, qui uirtutem dedit eique se ipsum, quo melius et maius nihil possit esse, promisit.

Quid est enim aliud quod per prophetam dixit: Ero illorum Deus, et ipsi erunt mihi plebs, nisi: Ego ero unde satientur, ego ero quaecumque ab hominibus honeste desiderantur, et uita et salus et uictus et copia et gloria et honor et pax et omnia bona? Sic enim et illud recte intellegitur, quod ait apostolus: Ut sit Deus omnia in omnibus. Ipse finis erit desideriorum nostrorum, qui sine fine uidebitur, sine fastidio amabitur, sine fatigatione laudabitur. Hoc munus, hic adfectus, hic actus profecto erit omnibus, sicut ipsa uita aeterna, communis.

Ceterum qui futuri sint pro meritis praemiorum etiam gradus honorum adque gloriarum, quis est idoneus cogitare, quanto magis dicere? Quod tamen futuri sint, non est ambigendum. Adque id etiam beata illa ciuitas magnum in se bonum uidebit, quod nulli superiori ullus then there will be no necessity, but full, certain, secure, everlasting happiness. All those proportions of the body's harmony that I have already spoken of, which are now hidden, will be hidden no longer. They are arranged inside and out throughout the whole body, and together with the other things that will be seen there as great and wonderful, they will set rational minds on fire with delight in a beauty that speaks to reason, to the praise of so great an artist.[82]

ENGLISH

What the movements of such bodies will be there I do not dare to define rashly, since I cannot conceive it. Yet their movement and their rest, like their very form, will be seemly, for there, whoever is there, nothing unseemly will exist. Certainly, wherever the spirit wills, there the body will be at once; and the spirit will will nothing that could befit neither the spirit nor the body. There will be true glory, where no one will be praised through the error or the flattery of the one who praises; true honor, which will be denied to no one who is worthy and granted to no one who is unworthy—but no unworthy person will even seek it, where no one but the worthy will be allowed to be; true peace, where no one will suffer anything hostile, either from himself or from anyone else. The reward of virtue will be he himself who gave virtue and promised himself to it, than whom nothing better or greater could exist.

For what else did he mean when he said through the prophet, "I will be their God, and they will be my people," but this: "I will be what satisfies them; I will be whatever people honorably desire—life and health and food and abundance and glory and honor and peace and all good things"? This is also the right way to understand what the apostle says: "that God may be all in all." He himself will be the end of our desires, he who will be seen without end, loved without weariness, praised without tiring. This gift, this affection, this activity will surely be shared by all, as eternal life itself is.[83]

But as for the degrees of honor and glory that there will be, according to the merits that earn their rewards, who is capable of imagining them, let alone describing them? That there will be such degrees, however, is not to be doubted. And that

82 Psalm 83:5 (84:4 in most English Bibles).
83 Leviticus 26:12 (compare Jeremiah 31:33); 1 Corinthians 15:28.

LATIN

inferior inuidebit, sicut nunc non inuident archangelis angeli ceteri; tamque nolet esse unusquisque quod non accepit, quamuis sit pacatissimo concordiae uinculo ei qui accepit obstrictus, quam nec in corpore uult oculus esse qui est digitus, cum membrum utrumque contineat totius carnis pacata conpago. Sic itaque habebit donum alius alio minus, ut hoc quoque donum habeat, ne uelit amplius.

ENGLISH

blessed city will see in itself this great good as well: no one lower will envy anyone higher, just as now the other angels do not envy the archangels. Each will no more wish to be what he has not received—though he is bound to the one who has received it by the most peaceful bond of concord—than in the body the finger wishes to be the eye, since the peaceful structure of the whole flesh holds both members together. So one will have a lesser gift than another in such a way that he also has this further gift: not to want more.

FREEDOM THAT CANNOT SIN

Final freedom will be unable to sin; the saints will remember past evils only as knowledge.

LATIN

Nec ideo liberum arbitrium non habebunt, quia peccata eos delectare non poterunt. Magis quippe erit liberum a delectatione peccandi usque ad delectationem non peccandi indeclinabilem liberatum. Nam primum liberum arbitrium, quod homini datum est, quando primum creatus est rectus, potuit non peccare, sed potuit et peccare; hoc autem nouissimum eo potentius erit, quo peccare non poterit; uerum hoc quoque Dei munere, non suae possibilitate naturae. Aliud est enim esse Deum, aliud participem Dei. Deus natura peccare non potest; particeps uero Dei ab illo accipit, ut peccare non possit. Seruandi autem gradus erant diuini muneris, ut primum daretur liberum arbitrium, quo non peccare, homo posset, nouissimum, quo peccare non potest, adque illud ad conparandum meritum, hoc ad recipiendum praemium pertineret.

Sed quia peccauit ista natura cum peccare potuit, largiore gratia liberatur, ut ad eam perducatur libertatem, in qua peccare non possit. Sicut enim prima inmortalitas fuit, quam peccando Adam perdidit, posse non mori, nouissima erit non posse mori: ita primum liberum arbitrium posse non peccare, nouissimum non posse peccare. Sic enim erit inamissibilis uoluntas pietatis et aequitatis, quo modo felicitatis. Nam utique peccando nec pietatem nec felicitatem tenuimus, uoluntatem uero felicitatis nec perdita felicitate perdidimus. Certe Deus ipse numquid, quoniam peccare non potest, ideo liberum arbitrium habere negandus est?

ENGLISH

Nor will they lack free will simply because sins will be unable to delight them. Rather, it will be all the freer, set free from the delight of sinning to an unwavering delight in not sinning. For the first free will, given to man when he was first created upright, was able not to sin, but was also able to sin. This last free will, however, will be all the more powerful in that it will not be able to sin—yet this too will be by the gift of God, not by the capacity of its own nature. For to be God is one thing; to be a partaker of God is another. God by nature cannot sin; but one who partakes of God receives from him the gift of being unable to sin. And the stages of the divine gift had to be kept: first a free will was given by which man was able not to sin, and last one by which he is not able to sin; the first served to earn merit, the last to receive the reward.

But because this nature sinned when it was able to sin, it is set free by a more generous grace, so that it may be brought to that freedom in which it cannot sin. For just as the first immortality, which Adam lost by sinning, was the ability not to die, and the last will be the inability to die, so the first free will was the ability not to sin, and the last will be the inability to sin. In this way the will for piety and righteousness will be as impossible to lose as the will for happiness. For certainly by sinning we kept neither piety nor happiness; yet the will for happiness we did not lose, even when happiness was lost. Surely we are not to deny that God himself has free will just because he cannot sin?

LATIN

Erit ergo illius ciuitatis et una in omnibus et inseparabilis in singulis uoluntas libera, ab omni malo liberata et inpleta omni bono, fruens indeficienter aeternorum iucunditate gaudiorum, oblita culparum, oblita poenarum; nec ideo tamen suae liberationis oblita, ut liberatori suo non sit ingrata: quantum ergo adtinet ad scientiam rationalem, memor praeteritorum etiam malorum suorum; quantum autem ad experientis sensum, prorsus inmemor. Nam et peritissimus medicus, sicut arte sciuntur, omnes fere corporis morbos nouit; sicut autem corpore sentiuntur, plurimos nescit, quos ipse non passus est. Ut ergo scientiae malorum duae sunt, una, qua potentiam mentis non latent, altera, qua experientis sensibus inhaerent (aliter quippe sciuntur uitia omnia per sapientiae doctrinam, aliter per insipientis pessimam uitam): ita et obliuiones malorum duae sunt.

Aliter ea namque obliuiscitur eruditus et doctus, aliter expertus et passus; ille, si peritiam neglegat, iste, si miseria careat. Secundum hanc obliuionem, quam posteriore loco posui, non erunt memores sancti praeteritorum malorum; carebunt enim omnibus, ita ut penitus deleantur de sensibus eorum. Ea tamen potentia scientiae, quae magna in eis erit, non solum sua praeterita, sed etiam damnatorum eos sempiterna miseria non latebit. Alioquin si se fuisse miseros nescituri sunt, quo modo, sicut ait psalmus, misericordias Domini in aeternum cantabunt? Quo cantico in gloriam gratiae Christi, cuius sanguine liberati sumus, nihil erit profecto illi iucundius ciuitati.

ENGLISH

So in that city there will be a free will that is one in all and undivided in each, set free from every evil and filled with every good, enjoying without fail the delight of eternal joys, forgetful of faults, forgetful of punishments. Yet it will not be so forgetful of its own liberation as to be ungrateful to its liberator. As far as rational knowledge is concerned, then, it will remember even its own past evils; but as far as the felt experience is concerned, it will not remember them at all. For even a highly skilled physician knows nearly all the diseases of the body as they are known by his art; but as they are felt in the body, he does not know very many of them—those he has not suffered himself. So just as there are two kinds of knowledge of evils—one by which they are not hidden from the power of the mind, the other by which they cling to the senses of the one who experiences them (for all vices are known in one way through the teaching of wisdom, and in another through the wretched life of the foolish)—so there are also two kinds of forgetting evils.

The learned and educated person forgets them in one way, the one who has experienced and suffered them in another: the former if he neglects his expertise, the latter if he is free of misery. It is by this second kind of forgetting, the one I mentioned last, that the saints will not remember their past evils; for they will be free of them all, so completely that these will be wiped out of their feelings entirely. Yet by the power of knowledge, which will be great in them, not only their own past but also the everlasting misery of the damned will not be hidden from them. Otherwise, if they are not going to know that they were once miserable, how, as the psalm says, will they sing the mercies of the Lord forever? Nothing, surely, will be more delightful to that city than this song to the glory of the grace of Christ, by whose blood we have been set free.[84]

THE EVERLASTING SABBATH

The eternal Sabbath: history's seven ages end in rest, vision, love and praise without end.

LATIN

Ibi perficietur: Vacate et uidete quoniam ego sum Deus; quod erit uere maximum sabbatum non habens

ENGLISH

There the words will be fulfilled: "Be at rest and see that I am God." That will truly be the greatest uesperam, quod commendauit Dominus in primis operibus mundi, ubi legitur: Et requieuit Deus die septimo ab omnibus operibus suis, quae fecit, et benedixit Deus diem septimum et sanctifiicauit eum, quia in eo requieuit ab omnibus operibus suis, quae inchoauit Deus facere. Dies enim septimus etiam nos ipsi erimus, quando eius fuerimus benedictione et sanctificatione pleni adque refecti. Ibi uacantes uidebimus quoniam ipse est Deus; quod nobis ipsi esse uoluimus, quando ab illo cecidimus, audientes a seductore: Eritis sicut di et recedentes a uero Deo, quo faciente di essemus eius participatione, non desertione. Quid enim sine illo fecimus, nisi quod in ira eius defecimus?

LATIN

A quo refecti et gratia maiore perfecti uacabimus in aeternum, uidentes quia ipse est Deus, quo pleni erimus quando ipse erit omnia in omnibus. Nam et ipsa opera bona nostra, quando ipsius potius intelleguntur esse quam nostra, tunc nobis ad hoc sabbatum adipiscendum inputantur; quia si nobis ea tribuerimus, seruilia erunt, cum de sabbato dicatur: Omne opus seruile non facietis; propter quod et per Ezechielem prophetam dicitur: Et sabbata mea dedi eis in signum inter me et inter eos, ut scirent quia ego Dominus qui sanctifico eos. Hoc perfecte tunc sciemus, quando perfecte uacabimus, et perfecte uidebimus quia ipse est Deus.

Ipse etiam numerus aetatum, ueluti dierum, si secundum eos articulos temporis conputetur, qui scripturis uidentur expressi, iste sabbatismus euidentius apparebit, quoniam septimus inuenitur, ut prima aetas tamquam primus dies sit ab Adam usque ad diluuium, secunda inde usque ad Abraham, non aequalitate temporum, sed numero generationum; denas quippe, habere reperiuntur. Hinc iam, sicut Matthaeus euangelista determinat, tres aetates usque ad Christi subsequuntur aduentum, quae singulae denis et quaternis generationibus explicantur: ab Abraham usque ad Dauid una, altera inde usque ad transmigrationem in Babyloniam, tertia inde usque ad Christi carnalem natiuitatem. Fiunt itaque omnes quinque. Sexta nunc

ENGLISH

Sabbath, a Sabbath with no evening, which the Lord commended in the first works of the world, where we read: "And God rested on the seventh day from all his works which he had made; and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because on it he rested from all his works which God had begun to make." For we ourselves will be the seventh day, when we have been filled and restored by his blessing and sanctification. There, at rest, we shall see that he is God—which is what we wanted to be ourselves when we fell away from him, listening to the seducer, "You will be like gods," and withdrawing from the true God. Yet by his doing we would have been gods by participating in him, not by deserting him. For what have we done without him, except fail and waste away in his anger?[85]

Restored by him and perfected by a greater grace, we shall be at rest forever, seeing that he is God, with whom we shall be filled when he will be all in all. For even our good works themselves, when they are understood to be his rather than ours, are then credited to us for attaining this Sabbath. If we attribute them to ourselves, they will be servile works, and of the Sabbath it is said: "You shall do no servile work." That is why it is also said through the prophet Ezekiel: "And I gave them my Sabbaths as a sign between me and them, so that they might know that I am the Lord who sanctifies them." This we shall know perfectly then, when we are perfectly at rest and perfectly see that he is God.[86]

The very number of the ages, too, like that of the days, if it is reckoned according to the divisions of time that seem to be set out in the Scriptures, will make this Sabbath rest still more evident, since it turns out to be the seventh. The first age, like the first day, runs from Adam to the flood; the second from then to Abraham—equal not in length of time but in number of generations, for each is found to have ten. From there, as the evangelist Matthew marks out, three ages follow up to the coming of Christ, each unfolding over fourteen generations: one from Abraham to David, another from then to the deportation to Babylon, the third from then to

84 Psalm 88:2 (89:1 in most English Bibles).
85 Psalm 45:11 (46:10 in most English Bibles); Genesis 2:2–3; Genesis 3:5.
86 Leviticus 23:7 and elsewhere; Ezekiel 20:12.

LATIN	ENGLISH
agitur nullo generationum numero metienda propter id quod dictum est: Non est uestrum scire tempora, quae Pater posuit in sua potestate.	Christ's birth in the flesh. That makes five in all. The sixth is now in progress, and it is not to be measured by any number of generations, because of what was said: "It is not for you to know the times which the Father has set in his own authority."[87]
Post hanc tamquam in die septimo requiescet Deus, cum eundem diem septimum, quod nos erimus, in se ipso Deo faciet requiescere. De istis porro aetatibus singulis nunc diligenter longum est disputare; haec tamen septima erit sabbatum nostrum, cuius finis non erit uespera, sed dominicus dies uelut octauus aeternus, qui Christi resurrectione sacratus est, aeternam non solum spiritus, uerum etiam corporis requiem praefigurans. Ibi uacabimus et uidebimus, uidebimus et amabimus, amabimus et laudabimus. Ecce quod erit in fine sine fine. Nam quis alius noster est finis nisi peruenire ad regnum, cuius nullus est finis?	After this age God will rest, as on the seventh day, when he makes that same seventh day, which we shall be, rest in himself, in God. To discuss each of these ages carefully now would take too long. But this seventh will be our Sabbath, whose end will not be an evening but the Lord's Day, an eighth and eternal day, as it were, which has been made holy by the resurrection of Christ and prefigures the eternal rest not only of the spirit but also of the body. There we shall rest and see, see and love, love and praise. This is what will be in the end, without end. For what other end do we have but to reach the kingdom of which there is no end?
Videor mihi debitum ingentis huius operis adiuuante Domino reddidisse. Quibus parum uel quibus nimium est, mihi ignoscant; quibus autem satis est, non mihi, sed Deo mecum gratias congratulantes agant. Amen.	I think that, with the Lord's help, I have paid the debt of this huge work. Let those who find it too little, or too much, forgive me; but let those for whom it is enough give thanks, not to me, but to God, rejoicing with me. Amen.

87 Matthew 1:17; Acts 1:7.