The City of God

AUGUSTINE
AD 354–430

The City of God

De civitate Dei

Translated from the Latin with AI (Claude) and edited

FORAGE
forage.com

The City of God · Augustine (AD 354–430)

Translated from the Latin with AI (Claude) and edited. Parallel-text edition, Forage, October 2026. forage.com/augustine/city-of-god

Latin text: Emanuel Hoffmann (1825–1900), Sancti Aureli Augustini episcopi De civitate Dei libri XXII, Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 40.1–2 (Vienna: Tempsky, 1899–1900), public domain, from the Open Greek and Latin (github.com/OpenGreekAndLatin/csel-dev) digital text (University of Leipzig, CC BY-SA 4.0), corrected against the Internet Archive scans (archive.org/details/corpusscriptoru20wien-goog) of the printed volumes; the Greek words were transcribed from the scans. Hoffmann's chapter titles are given in English as headings; words he marks as spurious are omitted. English: translated from the Latin with AI (Claude), then edited for accuracy and consistency. Not reviewed by a human specialist. Free to reuse under CC BY-SA 4.0. Margin numbers are book and chapter.

The original text is in the public domain. This translation is free to share and adapt under the Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 4.0 International license (CC BY-SA 4.0): creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/4.0

Set in Source Serif 4, with Gentium Book Plus.

CONTENTS

Introduction xxv

Book I 1

Preface: the plan and subject of the work 1

The enemies of Christ's name, whom the invaders spared for Christ's sake when the City was sacked 2

That no war was ever fought in which the victors spared the vanquished for the sake of the gods of those they conquered 3

How foolish the Romans were to believe that the household gods who could not protect Troy would benefit them 4

The asylum of Juno at Troy, which freed no one from the Greeks, and the basilicas of the apostles, which protected from the invaders all who fled to them 6

What Cato thought of the general custom of enemies who destroy conquered cities 7

That not even the Romans, when they captured cities, spared the vanquished in their temples 7

That the harsh things done in the sack of the City came from the custom of war, but the merciful ones from the power of Christ's name 8

The advantages and disadvantages that are usually common to the good and the wicked 9

The reasons for the chastisements by which the good and the wicked are scourged alike 11

That the saints lose nothing when they lose temporal things 14

Paulinus of Nola and the true treasure 15

The end of temporal life, whether longer or shorter 17

The burial of human bodies: being denied it takes nothing from Christians 18

The reason for burying the bodies of the saints 19

The captivity of the saints, who never lacked divine consolation 21

Regulus, an example of captivity endured even willingly for religion, which still could not profit him because he worshiped the gods 21

Whether the rapes that captivity may have inflicted, even on consecrated virgins, could defile the virtue of the mind without the will's consent 24

Suicide out of fear of punishment or disgrace 24

The violent lust of another, which the mind suffers unwillingly in a body overpowered 25

Lucretia, who killed herself because of the rape inflicted on her 27

That there is no authority that gives Christians the right to kill themselves for any reason 29

The killings of human beings that are exempt from the charge of murder 31

Whether suicide can ever be a sign of greatness of soul 32

What kind of example Cato is, who killed himself because he could not bear Caesar's victory 33

That in the virtue in which Regulus surpassed Cato, Christians excel far more 34

That sin should not be avoided by sin 35

How we should understand acts of the saints that are known to have been done although they are not permitted 36

Whether voluntary death should be sought in order to avoid sin 38

By what judgment of God the lust of the enemy was allowed to sin against the bodies of the chaste 39

What the household of Christ should reply to unbelievers who taunt them that Christ did not free them from the enemy's fury 41

What shameful prosperity those who complain about Christian times want to abound in 42

By what stages of vice the lust for power grew among the Romans 43

The founding of the theatrical shows 44
The vices of the Romans, which the overthrow of their country did not correct 45
God's mercy, which softened the destruction of the City 46
The Church's hidden children among the ungodly, and the false Christians within the Church 46
What subjects are to be discussed in what follows 47

Book II 49
The limit that must be set to the need for argument 49
What was settled in the first book 50
That history must be called on to show what evils befell the Romans while they worshiped the gods, before the Christian religion grew strong 51
That the worshipers of the gods never received any precepts of goodness from them, and in their rites celebrated every kind of obscenity 52
The obscenities with which the mother of the gods was honored by her worshipers 53
That the gods of the pagans never laid down a teaching on how to live well 54
That the discoveries of philosophy are useless without divine authority, since a person inclined to vice is moved more by what the gods did than by what people argued 55
The theatrical shows, in which the gods are not offended by the display of their own disgraceful acts but appeased 57
What the early Romans thought about curbing the license of poets, which the Greeks, following the judgment of the gods, chose to leave free 57
With what skill in harm the demons want either false or true crimes told about themselves 59
How the Greeks admitted actors to the government of the state, on the ground that it was unjust to despise those who appeased the gods 60
That the Romans, by taking from poets the freedom against men that they allowed against the gods, thought better of themselves than of their gods 61
That the Romans should have understood that their gods, who demanded to be worshiped with disgraceful shows, were unworthy of divine honor 62
That Plato, who gave poets no place in a well-ordered city, was better than these gods who wanted to be honored with theatrical shows 63
That the Romans set up some of their gods not by reason but by flattery 66
That if the gods had any concern for justice, the Romans ought to have received rules for living from them rather than borrowing laws from other people 66
The rape of the Sabine women and other wrongs that flourished in the Roman state even in its praised times ...67
What Sallust's history reveals about the morals of the Romans, either restrained by fear or loosened by security 69
The corruption of the Roman commonwealth before Christ abolished the worship of the gods 71
What kind of happiness those who blame Christian times want to enjoy, and what morals they want to live by ..72
Cicero's opinion of the Roman commonwealth 74
What a commonwealth is 75
That the gods of the Romans never took any care that the commonwealth should not perish through bad morals 78
That the changes of temporal affairs depend not on the favor or hostility of demons but on the judgment of the true God 80
The deeds of Sulla, in which the demons boasted of being his helpers 82
How strongly evil spirits incite people to wickedness, when they lend the quasi-divine authority of their own example to the commission of crimes 84
The secret admonitions of the demons about good morals, while all wickedness was taught openly in their rites 86
With what ruin of public morals the Romans dedicated obscene shows to appease their gods 88
The saving power of the Christian religion 89
An exhortation to the Romans to abandon the worship of the gods 90

Book III 93
The adversities that alone the wicked fear, and that the world always suffered while it worshiped the gods 93
Whether the gods, worshiped alike by Romans and Greeks, had reasons for allowing Troy to be destroyed 94
That the gods could not have been offended by the adultery of Paris, since it is said to have been common among themselves 95
Varro's opinion that it is useful for people to pretend they are descended from gods 96
That there is no proof the gods punished the adultery of Paris, since they did not avenge it in the case of Romulus' mother 97
The fratricide of Romulus, which the gods did not avenge 97
The overthrow of Troy, which Fimbria, Marius' general, destroyed 98
Whether Rome should have been entrusted to the gods of Troy 100
Whether we should believe that the gods granted the peace of Numa's reign 100
Whether it was desirable for the Roman Empire to be enlarged by such fury of wars, when it could have been quiet and safe through the policy followed under Numa 102
The statue of Apollo at Cumae, whose weeping was believed to foretell the defeat of the Greeks, whom he could not help 103
How many gods the Romans added beyond Numa's establishment, and how their number did them no good . . 104
By what right and what treaty the Romans got their first wives 106
The impiety of the war the Romans waged on the Albans, and the victory won through the lust for domination 108
The lust for domination 109
What the life and end of the Roman kings were like 111
How the kings died 113
The first consuls of Rome, one of whom drove the other from the country and then, after the most atrocious murders of his own family, died wounded by a wounded enemy 115
The evils that troubled the Roman commonwealth after the beginning of the consulship, while the gods it worshiped gave no help 116
Where were the gods? 118
The disasters that wore down the Romans in the Punic Wars, while the protection of the gods was sought in vain 121
The affliction of the Second Punic War, in which the strength of both sides was exhausted 123
The end of the Saguntines, whom the Roman gods did not help when they perished for their friendship with Rome 125
How ungrateful the city of Rome was to Scipio, its deliverer, and what its morals were at the time Sallust describes as its best 127
The edict of Mithridates ordering the death of all Roman citizens found in Asia 129
The internal evils that troubled the Roman commonwealth, preceded by a portent: the madness of all the animals that serve human beings 130
The civil strife stirred up by the Gracchan revolts 130
The temple of Concord, built by decree of the senate on the scene of riots and killings 131
The various kinds of war that followed the building of the temple of Concord 132
The civil war of Marius and Sulla 133
What Sulla's victory was like, as avenger of Marius' cruelty 134
A comparison of the Gothic invasion with the disasters the Romans suffered from the Gauls or from the authors of the civil wars 136
The chain of very many and very grievous wars that came before the coming of Christ 137
How shamelessly those who are not allowed to worship the gods blame Christ for present troubles, when such great disasters happened while the gods were worshiped 138

Book IV 141
What was discussed in the first book 141

What the second and third books contain 142
Whether the breadth of an empire, which is won only by wars, should be counted among the goods of the wise or of the happy 144
How like robberies kingdoms are without justice 145
The runaway gladiators, whose power was like royal dignity 146
The greed of King Ninus, who was the first to make war on his neighbors in order to rule more widely 147
Whether earthly kingdoms are helped or abandoned by the aid of the gods in their rise and fall 148
Which gods the Romans think enlarged and preserved their empire, when they believed that each god could hardly be entrusted with the care of even a single thing 150
Whether the size and duration of the Roman Empire should be credited to Jupiter, whom his worshipers think the supreme god 151
What opinions were followed by those who set different gods over different parts of the world 152
The many gods whom the more learned pagans maintain are one and the same Jupiter 154
The opinion of those who thought God the soul of the world and the world the body of God 157
Those who claim that only rational living beings are parts of the one God 158
That the growth of kingdoms is wrongly credited to Jupiter, since if Victory is a goddess, as they claim, she alone would be enough for this business 158
Whether it befits good men to want to rule more widely 159
Why the Romans, who assigned a separate god to every thing and every movement, chose to have the temple of Quiet outside the gates 160
Whether, if Jupiter has supreme power, Victory too ought to be thought a goddess 161
How those who think Felicity and Fortune goddesses tell them apart 161
Women's Fortune 162
Virtue and Faith, which the pagans honored with temples and rites, passing over other goods that should have been worshiped likewise if divinity was rightly given to these 163
That those who did not understand the one God should at least have been content with Virtue and Felicity 164
The knowledge of how to worship the gods, which Varro boasts he gave the Romans 166
Felicity, whom the Romans, worshipers of many gods, long did not worship with divine honor, though she alone would have sufficed in place of all 167
How the pagans defend their worshiping divine gifts themselves among the gods 170
The one God alone who is to be worshiped: though his name is unknown, he is felt to be the giver of happiness 171
The theatrical shows that the gods demanded their worshipers celebrate for them 172
The three kinds of gods discussed by the pontiff Scaevola 173
Whether the worship of the gods helped the Romans gain and enlarge their empire 175
The falsity of the omen thought to show the strength and stability of the Roman kingdom 176
What even their worshipers admit they think about the gods of the nations 178
The opinions of Varro, who rejected popular belief and, though he did not reach knowledge of the true God, still held that one God should be worshiped 179
For what show of advantage the rulers of the nations wanted false religions to continue among the peoples subject to them 181
That the times of all kings and kingdoms are ordered by the judgment and power of the true God 182
The kingdom of the Jews, founded and preserved by the one true God as long as they remained in the true religion 183

Book V 185
Preface 185
That the cause of the Roman Empire and of all kingdoms is neither chance nor the position of the stars 185
The like and unlike health of twins 187
The argument the astrologer Nigidius took from the potter's wheel on the question of twins 188
Esau and Jacob, twins very unlike each other in character and conduct 189

How the astrologers are shown to profess an empty science 190
Twins of different sex 192
The choice of a day for taking a wife, or for planting or sowing in a field 194
Those who call by the name of fate not the position of the stars but the chain of causes depending on God's will 195
God's foreknowledge and human free will, against Cicero's definition 196
God's foreknowledge and our wills 199
Whether any necessity rules human wills 202
God's universal providence, by whose laws all things are held together 204
By what morals the ancient Romans deserved to have the true God enlarge their empire, though they did not worship him 204
Cato's speech 208
The love of praise, which, though a vice, is thought a virtue because greater vices are held in check by it 210
Cutting back the love of human praise, since all the glory of the just is in God 211
The temporal reward God gave to the good morals of the Romans 213
The reward of the holy citizens of the eternal city, to whom the Romans' examples of virtue are useful 214
What the Romans gained by their wars, and how much they gave those they conquered 214
How far from boasting Christians should be if they do something for love of the eternal country, when the Romans did so much for human glory and an earthly city 216
Roman poverty 219
How the desire for glory differs from the desire for domination 221
That it is as shameful for the virtues to serve human glory as to serve bodily pleasure 223
That the Roman kingdom was ordered by the true God, from whom is all power and by whose providence all things are ruled 225
That the length and outcome of wars depend on God's judgment 226
The war in which Radagaisus, king of the Goths and a worshiper of demons, was defeated in one day with his huge forces 227
What the happiness of Christian emperors is, and how true it is 229
The prosperity God granted to Constantine, the Christian emperor 230
The faith and piety of the emperor Theodosius 231

Book VI 235
Preface 235
Those who say they worship the gods not for the sake of this present life but for the sake of eternal life 236
What we should believe Varro thought of the gods of the nations, whose kinds and rites he exposed in such a way that he would have treated them more respectfully by saying nothing about them at all 239
How Varro divided his books on the antiquities of human and divine things 241
That from Varro's account, among the worshipers of the gods, human things are found to be older than divine things 242
The three kinds of theology according to Varro: the mythical, the natural, and the civil 244
Mythical (that is, fabulous) theology, and civil theology, against Varro 247
The likeness and agreement of mythical and civil theology 249
The interpretations from natural science that pagan teachers try to offer on behalf of their gods 252
The duties of the individual gods 254
The wedding-night gods 256
The frankness of Seneca, who attacked civil theology more vehemently than Varro attacked the mythical 259
What Seneca thought of the Jews 262
That once the emptiness of the gods of the nations is exposed, there can be no doubt that they cannot give anyone eternal life, since they cannot even help temporal life 263

Book VII 265
Preface 265
Whether, since it is clear that divinity is not found in civil theology, we should believe it can be found in the select gods 265
Who the select gods are, and whether they are exempt from the duties of the lesser gods 266
That no reason can be given for the selection of certain gods, since a more important function is assigned to many lower ones 267
That the lesser gods, who are not disgraced by any scandals, fared better than the select gods, whose great obscenities are celebrated 271
The more secret doctrine of the pagans and their explanations from natural science 272
Varro's opinion that God is the soul of the world, which nevertheless has in its parts many souls whose nature is divine 274
Whether it was reasonable to make Janus and Terminus two separate gods 274
Why the worshipers of Janus made his image with two faces, though they also want it seen with four 276
The power of Jupiter, and a comparison of him with Janus 277
Whether the distinction between Janus and Jupiter is sound 279
The surnames of Jupiter, which refer not to many gods but to one and the same 279
That Jupiter is also called Pecunia 281
That in explaining what Saturn is and what Genius is, both are shown to be the one Jupiter 282
The functions of Mercury and Mars 283
Certain stars that the pagans named after their gods 284
Apollo, Diana, and the other select gods whom they held to be parts of the world 285
That even Varro himself declared his opinions about the gods uncertain 286
What the more credible cause is by which pagan error grew up 287
The interpretations by which the reason for worshiping Saturn is pieced together 288
The rites of Ceres at Eleusis 289
The obscenity of the rites celebrated for Liber 290
Neptune, Salacia, and Venilia 291
Earth, whom Varro affirms to be a goddess because the soul of the world, which he thinks is god, also passes through this lowest part of its body and imparts divine power to it 292
The surnames of Tellus and their meanings, which, even if they indicated many things, should not have established belief in many gods 294
The interpretation of the castration of Attis that the learning of the Greek sages came up with 297
The obscenity of the rites of the Great Mother 298
The fictions of the natural philosophers, who neither worship the true divinity nor worship it with the worship due to the true divinity 300
That Varro's teaching on theology is consistent in no part 301
That everything the natural philosophers referred to the world and its parts they should have referred to the one true God 303
With what piety the Creator is distinguished from his creatures, so that not as many gods are worshiped in place of the one as there are works of the one maker 303
The particular benefits of God, beyond his general bounty, that the followers of truth enjoy 305
That the mystery of Christ's redemption was lacking in no past age and was always proclaimed by various signs 305
That only through the Christian religion could the deceit of evil spirits, who delight in human error, be exposed 306
The books of Numa Pompilius, which the senate ordered burned so that the reasons for the rites contained in them would not become known 307
Hydromancy, by which Numa was deceived through certain images of demons that he saw 308

Book VIII 311
That the question of natural theology must be discussed with philosophers of superior learning 311

The two schools of philosophers, the Italian and the Ionian, and their founders 312
The teaching of Socrates 314
Plato, the foremost of Socrates' disciples, who divided all philosophy into three parts 315
That theology is best debated with the Platonists, whose opinion should be ranked above the doctrines of all other philosophers 317
The view of the Platonists in the part of philosophy called physics 320
How far the Platonists should be thought to excel the rest in logic, that is, rational philosophy 322
That the Platonists hold first place in moral philosophy as well 322
The philosophy that has come closest to the truth of the Christian faith 324
The excellence of the religious Christian among the philosophical disciplines 324
Where Plato could have acquired the understanding by which he came close to Christian knowledge 326
That even the Platonists, though they thought rightly about the one true God, held that sacrifice should be offered to many gods 328
Plato's view that gods are only good and friends of virtue 329
The opinion of those who said there are three kinds of rational souls: in the gods of heaven, in the demons of the air, and in human beings on earth 331
That demons are not superior to human beings either because of their airy bodies or because of their higher dwelling places 333
What the Platonist Apuleius thought about the character and conduct of the demons 334
Whether it is right for human beings to worship spirits from whose vices they ought to be freed 336
What kind of religion it is that teaches that human beings must use demons as advocates to commend themselves to the good gods 337
The impiety of the magic arts, which rely on the patronage of evil spirits 338
Whether we should believe that the good gods would rather mix with demons than with human beings 340
Whether the gods use demons as messengers and interpreters, and whether they do not know or do not mind that they are deceived by them 341
Rejecting the worship of demons, against Apuleius 343
What Hermes Trismegistus thought about idolatry, and how he could have known that the superstitions of Egypt would be abolished 344
How Hermes openly admitted the error of his forefathers, yet lamented that it would be destroyed 347
Idols and the demons in them 350
What the holy angels and good human beings can have in common 352
That the whole religion of the pagans was bound up with dead human beings 353
The kind of honor that Christians pay to the martyrs 355

Book IX 359
What point the discussion has reached, and what remains of the question to be discussed 359
Whether among the demons, to whom the gods are superior, there is any good kind by whose protection the human soul could reach true happiness 360
What Apuleius attributes to the demons, to whom he assigns no virtue though he does not deny them reason .360
The opinion of the Peripatetics and the Stoics about the passions that befall the mind 362
That the passions that affect Christian souls do not draw them into vice but exercise virtue 365
The passions by which, as Apuleius admits, the demons are troubled, though he claims they help human beings with the gods 366
That the Platonists claim the gods are slandered by the poets' fictions about their contending factions, when these factions belong to demons, not gods 367
Apuleius the Platonist's definition of the gods of heaven, the demons of the air, and human beings on earth ...368
Whether the friendship of the gods of heaven can be secured for human beings through the intercession of demons 370
That, according to Plotinus, human beings are less wretched in a mortal body than demons in an eternal one .371

The opinion of the Platonists that human souls become demons after leaving their bodies 372
The three contraries by which, according to the Platonists, the nature of demons is distinguished from that of human beings 373
How demons, if they are neither happy with the gods nor wretched with human beings, can be in the middle between the two without sharing in either 374
Whether human beings, being mortal, can be happy with true happiness 376
The mediator between God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus 377
Whether the Platonists were reasonable in holding that the gods of heaven avoid earthly contamination and do not mix with human beings, whom the demons help toward the friendship of the gods 379
That to attain the happy life, which consists in sharing the supreme good, a human being needs not such a mediator as a demon is, but such as Christ alone is 381
That the deceit of the demons, while promising a way to God by their intercession, aims to turn human beings away from the way of truth 382
That even among their worshipers the name "demon" is no longer used to mean anything good 383
The kind of knowledge that makes the demons proud 384
To what extent the Lord was willing to make himself known to the demons 384
The difference between the knowledge of the holy angels and the knowledge of the demons 385
That the name "gods" is falsely given to the gods of the nations, though on the authority of Scripture it is shared by the holy angels and by righteous human beings 386

Book X 391
That even the Platonists defined true happiness, whether of angels or of human beings, as given by the one God; but it must be asked whether those they think should be worshiped for this reason want sacrifice offered only to the one God or also to themselves 391
What Plotinus the Platonist thought about illumination from above 394
The true worship of God, from which the Platonists, though they understood the creator of the universe, strayed by worshiping angels, good or evil, with divine honor 395
That sacrifice is owed to the one true God alone 397
The sacrifices that God does not require, but wished to be offered as signs of the things he does require 397
The true and perfect sacrifice 399
That the love of the holy angels for us is such that they want us to worship not themselves but the one true God 401
The miracles that God has deigned to add to his promises, even through the ministry of angels, to strengthen the faith of the devout 402
The unlawful arts connected with the worship of demons, in which the Platonist Porphyry wavers, approving some and seeming to disapprove others 404
Theurgy, which promises a false purification of souls by invoking demons 406
Porphyry's letter to Anebo the Egyptian, in which he asks to be taught about the different kinds of demons . . . 407
The miracles that the true God works through the ministry of the holy angels 410
The invisible God, who has often made himself visible, not as he is, but as those who saw him could bear 412
That the one God is to be worshiped not only for eternal but also for temporal benefits, since all things are in the power of his providence 413
The ministry of the holy angels, by which they serve the providence of God 414
Whether, about gaining the happy life, we should trust the angels who demand to be worshiped with divine honor, or those who command that holy worship be given not to themselves but to the one God 415
The ark of the covenant and the miraculous signs done by God to commend the authority of the law and the promise 418
Against those who deny that the Church's books should be believed about the miracles by which the people of God were taught 419
The reason for the visible sacrifice that true religion teaches should be offered to the one true and invisible God 421
The supreme and true sacrifice, which the mediator between God and human beings himself became 422

The measure of power given to the demons for the glorifying of the saints through enduring suffering, who overcame the spirits of the air not by appeasing them but by remaining in God 423
Where the saints' power against demons comes from, and where true purification of the heart comes from ...424
The principles in which the Platonists say the purification of the soul consists 425
The one true principle, which alone purifies and renews human nature 426
That all the saints, both under the law and in earlier ages, were justified in the mystery and the faith of Christ .427
The inconsistency of Porphyry, wavering between confessing the true God and worshiping demons 430
The impiety of Porphyry, by which he goes beyond even the error of Apuleius 431
The arguments that blinded Porphyry so that he could not recognize the true wisdom, which is Christ 434
The incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, which the impiety of the Platonists is ashamed to confess 435
How many of Plato's doctrines Porphyry refuted and corrected by disagreeing 439
Against the argument of the Platonists by which they claim the human soul is coeternal with God 441
The universal way of the soul's deliverance, which Porphyry did not find because he sought it wrongly, and which the grace of Christ alone has opened 442
The history that foretells 446

Book XI 449
The part of the work in which the origins and ends of the two cities, the heavenly and the earthly, begin to be shown 449
Knowing God, whom no one comes to know except through the mediator between God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus 450
The authority of the canonical Scripture, composed by the divine Spirit 451
The creation of the world, which is neither timeless nor ordained by a new decision of God, as if he later willed what he had not willed before 452
That we should no more imagine infinite stretches of time before the world than infinite stretches of space outside it, since just as there are no times before it, so there are no places outside it 454
That the creation of the world and of time had one beginning, and neither came before the other 456
The nature of the first days, which are said to have had evening and morning even before the sun was made ..457
What God's rest should be understood to be, and of what kind, when he rested on the seventh day after the works of six days 458
What we should believe about the creation of the angels according to the testimony of Scripture 459
The simple and unchangeable Trinity of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit, one God, in whom quality and substance are not different things 461
Whether we should believe that the spirits who did not stand fast in the truth shared in the happiness the holy angels have always had from their beginning 464
A comparison between the happiness of the righteous who have not yet received the reward of God's promise and that of the first human beings in paradise before sin 465
Whether all the angels were created in the same happiness, so that those who fell could not know they would fall, and those who stood received foreknowledge of their perseverance after the others fell 466
In what sense it is said of the devil that he did not stand fast in the truth, because the truth is not in him 468
How we should understand the saying, "The devil sins from the beginning" 468
The ranks and differences of creatures, which practical use weighs one way and the order of reason another ..469
That the fault of wickedness is not nature but against nature, and its cause in sinning is not the Creator but the will 470
The beauty of the universe, made more brilliant by God's ordering even through the opposition of contraries .471
How we should understand the words, "God divided the light from the darkness" 472
The words spoken after the separation of light and darkness, "And God saw the light, that it was good" 473
God's eternal and unchangeable knowledge and will, by which everything he made pleased him as something to be made, just as it pleased him when made 473
Those who dislike some things in a universe of things well made by a good Creator, and think some nature evil 475

The error for which the teaching of Origen is blamed 477
The divine Trinity, which has scattered signs of itself through all its works 479
The threefold division of all philosophy 481
The image of the supreme Trinity, which in a certain way is found even in the nature of a human being not yet made blessed 482
Being, knowledge, and the love of both 483
Whether we ought also to love the very love by which we love being and knowing, in order to come closer to the image of the divine Trinity 485
The knowledge of the holy angels, by which they know the Trinity in its very Godhead, and see the causes of works first in the art of the maker rather than in the works themselves 487
The perfection of the number six, the first number made up of the sum of its parts 488
The seventh day, in which fullness and rest are commended 489
The opinion of those who hold that the angels were created before the world 490
The two different and unequal communities of angels, which are fittingly understood to be called by the names of light and darkness 491
The view of some that the angels are meant by the name of the waters separated at the making of the firmament, and of others that the waters were not created 493

Book XII 497
The one nature of the good and the evil angels 497
That no essence is contrary to God, since what is wholly different from him who supremely and always is, is what is not 499
The enemies of God, who are such not by nature but by a contrary will, which, in harming them, harms a good nature, since a fault that does no harm is no fault 500
The natures of beings without reason or without life, which in their own kind and order do not clash with the beauty of the universe 501
That the Creator is to be praised in every kind and measure of nature 503
The cause of the good angels' happiness and the cause of the evil angels' misery 503
That no efficient cause of an evil will should be sought 506
The perverse love by which the will falls away from the unchangeable good to a changeable good 507
Whether the holy angels have the same author of their good will as of their nature, through the love poured into them by the Holy Spirit 508
The opinion of those who think the human race, like the world itself, has always existed 510
The falsity of the history that assigns many thousands of years to past ages 511
Those who think this world is not everlasting, but hold that either countless worlds, or this same one, are always born and dissolved at a fixed end of the ages 512
What to answer those who complain that the first creation of humanity came late 513
The cycles of ages, at whose fixed end some philosophers believed all things would always return to the same order and form 514
The creation of the human race in time, which God made by no new decision and no changeable will 516
Whether, so that God may be understood to have always been Lord, we must believe there was never a time without a creature for him to rule; and how something can be called always created that cannot be called coeternal . . . 517
How we should understand the eternal life promised to humanity by God before eternal times 521
What sound faith holds about God's unchangeable counsel and will, against the reasoning of those who claim that God's works, repeated from eternity, always return in the same cycles of ages 521
Against those who say that infinite things cannot be comprehended even by God's knowledge 524
The ages of ages 525
The impiety of those who claim that souls that share in supreme and true happiness will return again and again through cycles of time to the same miseries and labors 526
Something new without a change in God 529
The creation of one first human being, and of the human race in him 531

That God foreknew that the first human being he made would sin, and foresaw at the same time how great a people of the devout from his race he would bring by his grace into the company of the angels 532
The nature of the human soul, created in the image of God 532
Whether angels can be called creators of even the smallest creature 533
That every nature and every form of all creation is made and formed only by the work of God 534
The opinion of the Platonists, who thought the angels were indeed made by God but were themselves the makers of human bodies 536
That the whole fullness of the human race arose in the first man, in whom God foresaw which part would be honored with reward and which condemned to punishment 537

Book XIII 539
The fall of the first human beings, through which mortality was contracted 539
The death that can befall the soul, which will always live in some way, and the death to which the body is subject 539
Whether death, which passed through the sin of the first human beings to all, is a punishment of sin even for the saints 541
Why death, the punishment of sin, is not taken away from those freed from sin by the grace of rebirth 542
That as the wicked make bad use of the law, which is good, so the righteous make good use of death, which is evil 544
The general evil of death, by which the union of soul and body is broken 545
The death that some who are not reborn undergo for confessing Christ 545
That for the saints, accepting the first death for the truth is the abolition of the second death 547
Whether the time of death, in which the sense of life is taken away, should be said to belong to the dying or to the dead 547
Whether the life of mortals should be called death rather than life 548
Whether anyone can be both living and dead at the same time 549
What death God threatened the first human beings with if they broke his command 552
What first punishment the first human beings felt after their transgression 553
What kind of being God made the human being, and into what condition he fell by the choice of his own will . 554
That Adam, about to sin, abandoned God before he was abandoned by God, and that the soul's first death was its departure from God 554
The philosophers who do not think the separation of the soul from the body is a punishment, though Plato depicts the supreme god promising the lesser gods that they will never be stripped of their bodies 555
Against those who claim that earthly bodies cannot become incorruptible and eternal 557
Earthly bodies, which the philosophers claim cannot be in heaven because what is earthly is drawn back to earth by its natural weight 560
Against the doctrines of those who do not believe the first human beings would have been immortal if they had not sinned, and who want souls to be eternal without bodies 561
That the flesh of the saints, which now rests in hope, will be restored to a better condition than that of the first human beings before sin 563
The paradise in which the first human beings lived: that something spiritual is rightly understood by it, while the truth of the historical account of a physical place is kept 565
The bodies of the saints after the resurrection, which will be spiritual without the flesh being turned into spirit 566
What we should understand by the animal body and the spiritual body, and who die in Adam and who are made alive in Christ 567
The earthly and the heavenly man 570
How we should understand both God's breathing, by which the first man became a living soul, and the Lord's, when he said to his disciples, "Receive the Holy Spirit" 571
Breath and spirit 573

Book XIV 579
That because of the disobedience of the first man, all would have fallen into the endlessness of the second death, had not God's grace freed many 579
Living according to the flesh, which must be understood to come from the vices not only of the body but also of the mind 580
That the cause of sin came from the soul, not from the flesh, and that the corruption contracted from sin is not sin but punishment 582
What it is to live according to man, and what according to God 584
That the Platonists' view of the nature of body and soul is more tolerable than the Manichees', yet must itself be rejected, since it ascribes the causes of all vices to the nature of the flesh 586
The quality of the human will, by whose judgment the emotions of the mind are held to be either wrong or right 587
That in Scripture the words amor and dilectio are used without distinction for both good and evil love 588
The three emotions that the Stoics allowed in the mind of the wise man, excluding pain or sadness, which the virtue of the mind ought not to feel 590
The emotions of the mind whose right expressions are found in the life of the righteous 593
Freedom from passion 596
Whether we should believe that the first human beings in paradise were affected by any emotions before they sinned 599
The fall of the first man, in which a nature well made was corrupted, and can be restored only by its maker . . . 600
The nature of the sin committed by the first human beings 603
That in Adam's transgression an evil will came before the evil act 604
The pride of the transgressor, which was worse than the transgression itself 607
The justice of the retribution the first human beings received for their disobedience 607
The evil of lust, a word that fits many vices but is properly applied to the stirrings of obscene heat 610
The nakedness of the first human beings, which after their sin they saw as shameful and to be covered 611
The shame attached to intercourse, not only illicit but also married 612
That the impulses of anger and lust, which stir so viciously in human beings that they must be checked by the reins of wisdom, did not exist in nature's sound state before sin 613
The utterly empty indecency of the Cynics 615
The blessing of multiplying human offspring, given before sin, which the transgression did not take away, though the disease of lust was added to it 616
The bond of marriage, instituted and blessed by God from the beginning 617
Whether children would have been born even in paradise if no one had sinned, and whether the reason of chastity would have had to fight there against the heat of lust 618
That human beings without sin, remaining in paradise by the merit of obedience, would have used their sexual organs to beget children just as they use their other members, at the command of the will 621
The true happiness that temporal life does not attain 623
That we should believe the happy people living in paradise could have fulfilled the duty of begetting children without shameful desire 624
Sinners, both angels and human beings, whose perversity does not disturb providence 626
The nature of the two cities, the earthly and the heavenly 627

Book XV 629
The two lines of the human race, running from the beginning toward different ends 629
The children of the flesh and the children of the promise 631
The barrenness of Sarah, which God's grace made fruitful 632
The strife or the peace of the earthly city 633
The first founder of the earthly city, a fratricide, whose impiety the founder of the city of Rome matched by killing his brother 634

The weaknesses that even citizens of the city of God suffer as a punishment of sin during the pilgrimage of this life, and from which they are healed by God's care 636
The cause of Cain's crime and his obstinacy in it, from which not even God's word called him back once he had conceived it 637
Ruling over sin 640
Why Cain founded a city at the very beginning of the human race 642
The long life of human beings before the flood, and the greater size of human bodies 645
The discrepancy in the numbers of years between the Hebrew manuscripts and ours 646
The years of Methuselah, whose age seems to extend fourteen years beyond the flood 647
The opinion of those who do not believe that people in the earliest times lived as long as Scripture says 649
Whether in reckoning years we should follow the authority of the Hebrew text rather than that of the Seventy translators 651
That years were of the same length in earlier ages as now 654
Whether it is believable that the men of the first age abstained from intercourse until the age at which they are said to have fathered children 656
The law of marriage, which in the first marriages was different from later ones 659
The two fathers and founders born of one parent 662
What was signified in Abel, Seth, and Enosh that clearly relates to Christ and his body, the Church 664
What is shown by the taking up of Enoch 665
Why Cain's line ends at the eighth generation from Adam, while among the descendants of the same father Adam, Noah is found in the tenth 666
Eleven, the number of sin 670
Why, after Enoch son of Cain is mentioned, the account of his whole line continues to the flood, while after Enosh son of Seth is mentioned, it goes back to the beginning of the human race 671
The fall of the sons of God, captivated by love of foreign women, for which all except eight people deserved to perish in the flood 673
Whether we should believe that angels, who are spiritual beings, fell in love with beautiful women, married them, and fathered giants 675
Enoch and the apocrypha 678
How we should understand what the Lord said of those who were to perish in the flood: "Their days shall be a hundred and twenty years" 679
The anger of God, which no inflammation disturbs in his unchangeable calm 680
That the ark Noah was ordered to build signifies Christ and the Church in every respect 681
The ark and the flood: we should agree neither with those who accept only the history without allegorical meaning, nor with those who defend only the figures and reject the historical truth 683

Book XVI 687
Whether any families living according to God are found after the flood, from Noah to Abraham 687
What was prophetically foreshadowed in the sons of Noah 688
The generations of the three sons of Noah 691
The diversity of languages and the beginning of Babylon 694
The Lord's coming down to confuse the language of the tower builders 696
How we should understand the speech by which God speaks to the angels 697
Whether even the most remote islands received every kind of animal from those saved in the ark from the flood 699
Whether certain monstrous races of human beings descended from Adam or from the sons of Noah 700
Whether we should believe that the lower part of the earth, opposite to where we live, has antipodes 703
The descendants of Shem, in whose line the order of the city of God is directed toward Abraham 703
That the original language of humanity was the one later called Hebrew after Eber, and that it remained in his family when languages were divided 706
The point in time at Abraham, from whom a new order of holy succession is traced 709

Why no mention is made of Nahor, son of Terah, when Terah left the Chaldeans and moved to Mesopotamia . . . 710
The years of Terah, who completed his life in Haran . . . 712
The time of Abraham's departure, when at God's command he left Haran . . . 712
The order and nature of God's promises made to Abraham . . . 715
The three outstanding kingdoms of the nations, one of which, the Assyrian, was already preeminent when Abraham was born . . . 716
God's second address to Abraham, in which the land of Canaan is promised to him and his offspring . . . 717
Sarah's chastity, protected by God in Egypt, when Abraham had said she was not his wife but his sister . . . 718
The parting of Lot and Abraham, agreed on with their love unbroken . . . 718
God's third promise, in which he pledges the land of Canaan to Abraham and his offspring forever . . . 719
Abraham's victory over the enemies of Sodom, when he rescued Lot from captivity and was blessed by the priest Melchizedek . . . 721
The Lord's word to Abraham promising him descendants as many as the stars; believing it, he was justified while still uncircumcised . . . 721
The meaning of the sacrifice Abraham was commanded to offer when he asked to be taught about what he had believed . . . 722
Hagar, Sarah's slave woman, whom Sarah herself wanted to be Abraham's concubine . . . 726
God's assurance to Abraham, in which he promises the old man a son by barren Sarah, makes him father of nations, and seals the promise with the sacrament of circumcision . . . 727
The male who, if not circumcised on the eighth day, is cut off because he has broken God's covenant . . . 729
The change of the names of Abraham and Sarah, who received the gift of fertility though they could not have children, she because of barrenness and both because of old age . . . 731
The three men or angels in whom the Lord is said to have appeared to Abraham at the oak of Mamre . . . 732
Lot's deliverance from Sodom, the destruction of Sodom by fire from heaven, and Abimelech, whose desire could not harm Sarah's chastity . . . 734
Isaac, born according to the promise, whose name came from the laughter of both parents . . . 735
Abraham's obedience and faith, tested by the command to sacrifice his son, and the death of Sarah . . . 735
Rebekah, granddaughter of Nahor, whom Isaac took as his wife . . . 738
What we should understand by Abraham taking Keturah as his wife after Sarah's death . . . 738
What the divine answer indicated about the twins still in their mother Rebekah's womb . . . 739
The oracle and blessing that Isaac received just as his father had, loved for his father's sake . . . 740
What was mystically foreshadowed in Esau and Jacob . . . 742
Jacob's being sent to Mesopotamia to take a wife, the vision he dreamed on the way, and his four women, though he had asked for one wife . . . 744
Why Jacob was also called Israel . . . 746
How Jacob is said to have entered Egypt with seventy-five souls, though most of those listed were born later . . . 747
The blessing Jacob promised to his son Judah . . . 749
The sons of Joseph, whom Jacob blessed by prophetically crossing his hands . . . 750
The times of Moses, of Joshua son of Nun, of the judges, and then of the kings, of whom Saul was the first but David the chief, both in sacramental meaning and in merit . . . 751

Book XVII . . . 755
The times of the prophets . . . 755
When God's promise about the land of Canaan, which even fleshly Israel received as a possession, was fulfilled 756
The three kinds of meaning in the prophets, which refer now to the earthly Jerusalem, now to the heavenly, and now to both . . . 758
The foreshadowed change of Israel's kingship and priesthood, and what Hannah, mother of Samuel, prophesied in the person of the Church . . . 760
Hannah's song as the Church's voice . . . 761
The Lord puts to death and gives life . . . 764

What the man of God, speaking by the spirit of prophecy, said to the priest Eli, signifying that the priesthood established after Aaron would be taken away 769
The faithful priest and his house 772
The Jewish priesthood and kingship, which, though said to be established forever, did not last, so that other things might be understood whose eternity is promised 774
The splitting of the kingdom of Israel, foreshadowing the permanent division of spiritual Israel from fleshly Israel 777
The promises made to David about his son, which are not at all fulfilled in Solomon but most fully in Christ 780
How like the prophecy about Christ in Psalm 88 is to the promises made through the prophet Nathan in the books of Kings 783
How different the events in the kingdom of the earthly Jerusalem were from what God had promised, so that the truth of the promise might be understood to concern the glory of another king and kingdom 784
The substance of the people of God, which is in Christ through his taking on flesh, who alone had power to rescue his own soul from the underworld 786
To whom the plea for the promises belongs, of which the psalm says, "Where are your mercies of old, Lord," and the rest 787
Whether the truth of the promised peace can be ascribed to the times that passed under Solomon 790
David's care in arranging the psalms and their mystery 791
Whether everything the psalms prophesy about Christ and the Church should be brought into the course of this work 792
What in Psalm 44 is said, openly or figuratively, about Christ and the Church 793
What in Psalm 109 relates to Christ's priesthood, and what in Psalm 21 to his passion 796
Psalms 3, 40, 15, and 67, in which the Lord's death and resurrection are prophesied 797
Psalm 68, in which the unbelief and obstinacy of the Jews are declared 800
The reign and merit of David, his son Solomon, and the prophecy relating to Christ found either in the books joined to Solomon's writings or in those that are undoubtedly his 800
The kings after Solomon, in Judah and in Israel 804
Jeroboam, who profaned the people under him with the impiety of idolatry, though God did not cease to inspire prophets among them and to keep many from the crime of idolatry 806
The changing state of both Hebrew kingdoms until both peoples were led into captivity at different times, Judah being afterward restored to its kingdom, which at last passed into the power of the Romans 806
The last prophets among the Jews, and those whom the gospel history shows around the time of Christ's birth .807

Book XVIII 809
What has been discussed in seventeen books, up to the times of the Savior 809
The kings and times of the earthly city that correspond to the times of the saints reckoned from the birth of Abraham 810
Who reigned over the Assyrians and the Sicyonians when Isaac was born by promise to Abraham at a hundred, and when the twins Esau and Jacob were born to Rebekah when Isaac was sixty 812
The times of Jacob and his son Joseph 814
Apis, king of the Argives, whom the Egyptians worshiped with divine honor under the name Serapis 815
Who was king of the Argives and of the Assyrians when Jacob died in Egypt 816
In whose reigns Joseph died in Egypt 816
In whose reigns Moses was born, and the worship of which gods began at that time 817
When the city of Athens was founded, and what reason Varro gives for its name 819
What Varro reports about the naming of the Areopagus and about the flood of Deucalion 820
When Moses led the people of God out of Egypt, and in whose reigns Joshua son of Nun, his successor, died 821
The rites of false gods instituted by the kings of Greece in the period from Israel's exodus from Egypt to the death of Joshua 822
What fables were invented at the time when judges began to rule the Hebrews 824
The theological poets 826

The fall of the kingdom of the Argives, at the time when Picus son of Saturn first received the kingdom among the Laurentines 827
Diomedes, made a god after the fall of Troy, whose companions were believed to have been turned into birds .828
What Varro reports about unbelievable transformations of human beings 828
What we should believe about the transformations that seem to happen to human beings through the art of demons 829
That Aeneas came to Italy when Abdon was judge over the Hebrews 832
The succession of the royal line among the Israelites after the time of the judges 833
The kings of Latium, of whom the first, Aeneas, and the twelfth, Aventinus, were made gods 834
That Rome was founded at the time the Assyrian kingdom came to an end and Hezekiah was reigning in Judah 835
The Erythraean Sibyl, who is known among the other Sibyls for having sung many things clearly about Christ 836
That the Seven Sages flourished in the reign of Romulus, when the ten tribes called Israel were led into captivity by the Chaldeans, and that Romulus was given divine honor at his death 839
The philosophers who became famous when Tarquinius Priscus reigned at Rome and Zedekiah among the Hebrews, when Jerusalem was taken and the temple destroyed 840
That at the time when the captivity of the Jews ended after seventy years, the Romans too were freed from the rule of kings 841
The times of the prophets whose oracles are contained in books and who sang much about the calling of the nations when the Roman kingdom began and the Assyrian came to an end 841
What Hosea and Amos prophesied that relates to the gospel of Christ 843
What Isaiah foretold about Christ and the Church 844
What Micah, Jonah, and Joel prophesied in agreement with the New Testament 846
What is found foretold in Obadiah, Nahum, and Habakkuk about the salvation of the world in Christ 847
The prophecy contained in the prayer and song of Habakkuk 849
What Jeremiah and Zephaniah foretold by the spirit of prophecy about Christ and the calling of the nations ...853
The prophecy of Daniel and Ezekiel, which agrees in pointing to Christ and the Church 855
The prophecy of three prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi 856
Esdras and the books of the Maccabees 859
That the authority of the prophets is found to be older than any origin of pagan philosophy 860
That the Church's canon did not accept certain writings of holy men because of their excessive antiquity, so that false things might not be slipped in among the true under cover of them 862
The Hebrew letters, which always existed with the proper character of their language 863
The utterly lying vanity of the Egyptians, who ascribe a hundred thousand years to the antiquity of their learning 864
The disagreements of philosophical opinions and the harmony of the canonical Scriptures in the Church 865
By what arrangement of God's providence the sacred Scriptures of the Old Testament were translated from Hebrew into Greek, so that they might become known to the nations 868
The authority of the Seventy translators, which, with due respect to the Hebrew text, is to be preferred to all other translators 869
How we should understand the destruction of Nineveh, whose announcement in the Hebrew extends over forty days, but in the Septuagint is confined to three 871
That after the rebuilding of the temple the Jews ceased to have prophets and from then until the birth of Christ were afflicted with continual adversity, which proves that the prophets' words promised the building of another temple 873
The birth of our Savior, as the Word was made flesh, and the scattering of the Jews among all nations, as had been prophesied 876
Whether before Christian times there were any outside the race of Israel who belonged to the fellowship of the heavenly city 877
That Haggai's prophecy, in which he said the glory of God's house would be greater than at first, was fulfilled not in the rebuilding of the temple but in the Church of Christ 879

The indiscriminate growth of the Church, in which many reprobates are mixed with the elect in this world . . . 880
The preaching of the gospel, made more glorious and more powerful by the sufferings of its preachers 881
That the Catholic faith is strengthened even by the dissensions of heretics 882
Whether we should believe, as some think, that after the ten persecutions that have taken place, none remains except an eleventh, which will come in the time of Antichrist himself 885
The time of the last persecution, revealed to no human being 887
The utterly foolish lie of the pagans, who pretended that the Christian religion would last no more than three hundred and sixty-five years 889

Book XIX 893
That Varro found that two hundred and eighty-eight sects are possible on the question, debated by philosophers, of the ends of good and evil 893
How Varro, setting aside all differences that make not sects but questions, arrives at a threefold definition of the supreme good, of which one must be chosen 898
Which of the three sects seeking the supreme human good Varro says should be chosen, following the view of the Old Academy on the authority of Antiochus 899
What Christians believe about the supreme good and the supreme evil, against the philosophers who said the supreme good is within themselves 902
Courage and the Stoics 905
Social life, which, though most desirable, is often overturned by many troubles 908
The error of human judgments when the truth is hidden 910
The diversity of languages, which divides human society, and the misery of wars, even those called just 911
That the friendship of good people cannot be free of care, since we must fear the dangers of this life 913
The friendship of the holy angels, which cannot be clear to human beings in this world because of the deceit of the demons, into whose power fell those who thought many gods should be worshiped 914
What reward the saints gain from overcoming the temptations of this life 915
The happiness of eternal peace, which is the saints' end, that is, their true fulfillment 916
That even the savagery of those at war, and all human unrest, desire to reach the goal of peace, without the longing for which no nature exists 917
Even a monster wants peace 918
The universal peace that the law of nature does not allow to be lost amid any disturbances, since under a just judge each comes by ordinance to what he has deserved by his will 921
The order and law, earthly or heavenly, by which even those who rule serve human society, and those who serve it are cared for 924
Natural freedom and slavery, whose first cause is sin, since a person of evil will, even if not another person's slave, is a slave of his own lust 926
Just rule over others 927
What makes for peace and what for discord between the heavenly society and the earthly city 929
How different the doubting of the New Academy is from the steadfastness of the Christian faith 931
The dress and customs of the Christian people 931
That the citizens of the saints are happy in hope during the time of this life 933
Whether, by the definitions of Scipio in Cicero's dialogue, there ever was a Roman commonwealth 933
Whether the God whom Christians serve is the true God, to whom alone sacrifice should be offered 936
What Porphyry says the oracles of the gods answered about Christ 937
The true sacrifice and the true people 942
By what definition not only the Romans but other kingdoms too may rightly claim the names of a people and a commonwealth 943
That there can be no true virtues where there is no true religion 944
The peace of the people estranged from God, which the people of God use for godliness while on pilgrimage in this world 945

The peace of those who serve God, whose perfect tranquillity cannot be grasped in this temporal life 945
To what end the wicked will come 947

Book XX 949
That although God judges at all times, this book is properly about his last judgment 949
The changeability of human affairs, in which God's judgment cannot be said to be absent, though it cannot be traced 951
What Solomon argued in the book of Ecclesiastes about the things common to the good and the wicked in this life 952
That in discussing God's last judgment he will first bring forward testimonies from the New Testament and then from the Old 954
The sayings by which the Lord and Savior declares that a divine judgment will come at the end of the world . . 955
What the first resurrection is, and what the second 958
What is written in the Revelation of John about the two resurrections and the thousand years, and what may reasonably be thought about them 961
The binding and loosing of the devil 966
What the reign of the saints with Christ for a thousand years is, and how it differs from the eternal kingdom . . 970
What to answer those who think the resurrection concerns only bodies and not also souls 974
Gog and Magog, whom the devil, when loosed near the end of the world, will stir up to persecute the Church of God 976
Whether the fire that came down from heaven and devoured them belongs to the final punishment of the wicked 977
Whether the time of Antichrist's persecution should be counted in the thousand years 978
The condemnation of the devil with his followers, and, by way of recapitulation, the bodily resurrection of all the dead and the judgment of final reward and punishment 980
Who the dead are whom the sea gave up for judgment, and whom death and the underworld gave back 982
The new heaven and the new earth 984
The glorification of the Church without end after the end 985
What the apostle Peter preached about God's last judgment 987
What the apostle Paul wrote to the Thessalonians about the appearing of Antichrist, whose time the day of the Lord will follow 989
What the same apostle taught about the resurrection of the dead in his first letter to the same people 993
What the prophet Isaiah said about the resurrection of the dead and the reward of judgment 996
Isaiah's final chapter 1000
What the going out of the saints to see the punishments of the wicked will be like 1002
What Daniel prophesied about the persecution of Antichrist, the judgment of God, and the kingdom of the saints 1003
What is prophesied in the psalms of David about the end of this world and God's last judgment 1006
The prophecy of Malachi, in which God's last judgment is declared and a cleansing of some through purifying punishments is spoken of 1010
The sacrifices that the saints will offer to God, which will please him as they did in the days of old and in former years 1012
The separation of the good and the wicked, by which the distinction made at the last judgment is declared . . . 1015
That the law of Moses must be understood spiritually, so that a fleshly understanding may not fall into damnable murmuring 1016
The coming of Elijah before the judgment, when the Jews, as his preaching unlocks the secrets of Scripture, will be converted to Christ 1017
That in the books of the Old Testament, when God is said to be about to judge, the person of Christ is not plainly shown, yet from certain testimonies in which the Lord God speaks it appears beyond doubt that he is Christ . 1018
The order of the last things 1023

Book XXI 1025
The order of the discussion: why the eternal punishment of the damned with the devil must be discussed before the eternal happiness of the saints 1025
Whether bodies can last forever in burning fire 1026
Whether bodily pain must result in the destruction of the flesh 1026
Examples from nature showing that living bodies can survive amid torments 1029
How many things there are whose explanation cannot be known, yet whose truth is not in doubt 1032
That not all marvels are natural, but many are contrived by human skill and many by the art of demons 1035
That in marvelous things the highest reason for belief is the almightiness of the Creator 1037
That it is not against nature when something whose nature is known begins to be different from what was known of it 1040
The transformation of Sodom 1043
Hell and the nature of eternal punishments 1044
Whether the fire of hell, if it is physical, can burn evil spirits, that is, bodiless demons, by contact 1046
Whether justice requires that the time of punishment be no longer than the time of the sins 1048
The greatness of the first transgression, for which eternal punishment is due to all who are outside the Savior's grace 1050
Against the opinion of those who think that punishments are applied to sinners after death for the sake of purification 1050
The temporal punishments of this life, to which the human condition is subject 1052
That the whole work of God's grace, which rescues us from the depth of the old evil, looks to the newness of the world to come 1053
The laws of grace under which all the ages of the reborn are placed 1054
Those who think that no one's punishment will last forever 1056
Those who think that at the last judgment no one will be damned, because of the intercession of the saints . . . 1057
Those who promise freedom from punishment for all sins even to heretics, because they share in the body of Christ 1059
Those who promise pardon not to all, but only to those reborn among Catholics, even if they later fall into many crimes and errors 1060
Those who declare that those who remain in the Catholic faith will be saved because of the foundation of faith, even if they have lived very badly and deserved to be burned for it 1060
Those who think the crimes committed along with works of almsgiving will not be called to the judgment of damnation 1061
Against the opinion of those who say that neither the devil's punishments nor those of wicked human beings will be everlasting 1062
Against the view of those who think that at God's judgment all the guilty will be spared because of the prayers of the saints 1064
Threats that came true 1067
Whether those baptized among heretics who later became worse by living badly, or those reborn among Catholics who went over to heresies or schisms, or those who, reborn among Catholics and not leaving them, persisted in living criminally, can hope by the privilege of the sacraments to be spared eternal punishment 1070
What it is to have Christ as the foundation, and to whom salvation is promised as if through the burning of fire 1073
A fire of trial after death? 1076
Against the belief of those who think the sins in which they persisted while giving alms will not harm them . 1077
What the Lord's Prayer forgives 1081
Friends who receive us into eternal dwellings 1082

Book XXII 1087
The creation of angels and human beings 1087
The eternal and unchangeable will of God 1088

The promise of eternal happiness for the saints and everlasting punishment for the wicked 1090
Against the wise men of the world who think earthly human bodies cannot be carried up to a heavenly dwelling 1091
The resurrection of the flesh, which some do not believe though the world believes it 1092
That Rome made its founder Romulus a god because it loved him, whereas the Church loved Christ because it believed him to be God 1095
That the world's belief in Christ was the work of divine power, not human persuasion 1098
The miracles that were done so that the world might believe in Christ, and that do not cease now that the world believes 1099
The healing of Innocentius 1101
Healings at Carthage and beyond 1103
The relics of Saint Stephen 1108
Written accounts of healings 1110
The trembling brother and sister 1112
That all the miracles done through the martyrs in Christ's name bear witness to the faith by which the martyrs believed in Christ 1115
How much more worthily the martyrs are honored, who obtain many wonders so that the true God may be worshiped, than the demons, who do certain things so that they themselves may be believed to be gods 1116
Against the Platonists, who argue from the natural weights of the elements that an earthly body cannot be in heaven 1117
Against the slanders of unbelievers, who mock Christians for believing in the resurrection of the flesh 1120
Whether aborted fetuses do not belong to the resurrection, if they belong to the number of the dead 1122
Whether infants will rise with the bodily build they would have had as they grew older 1123
Whether the bodies of all the dead will rise to the measure of the Lord's body 1124
How we should understand the conforming of the saints to the image of the Son of God 1124
Whether women's bodies will be raised and remain in their own sex 1125
The perfect man, that is, Christ, and his body, that is, the Church, which is his fullness 1127
That all bodily defects that mar human beauty in this life will not be present in the resurrection, where, the natural substance remaining, quality and quantity will come together into one beauty 1128
That in the resurrection of the dead the substance of bodies, however scattered, will be fully called back from wherever it is 1131
The newness of the spiritual body, into which the flesh of the saints will be changed 1133
The miseries and evils to which the human race is subject because of the first transgression, and from which no one is freed except through the grace of Christ 1134
The calamities of human life 1135
What, besides the evils common to the good and the wicked, belongs especially to the struggle of the righteous 1138
The good things with which the Creator has filled even this life, subject though it is to condemnation 1139
The gifts of the human mind 1142
The beauty of the world 1145
The stubbornness of some who attack the resurrection of the flesh, which, as was foretold, the whole world believes 1146
How Porphyry's claim that happy souls must flee every body is overthrown by the view of Plato himself, who says the supreme God promised the gods that they would never be stripped of their bodies 1148
The contrary claims of Plato and Porphyry, in which, if each had yielded to the other, neither would have strayed from the truth 1149
What Plato, Labeo, or even Varro could have contributed to the true faith in the resurrection if their opinions had been combined into one view 1150
The nature of the vision by which the saints will see God in the world to come 1151
Seeing God with the eyes of the body 1155
The eternal happiness of the city of God, and the everlasting Sabbath 1158

Freedom that cannot sin 1160
The everlasting Sabbath 1161

INTRODUCTION

In AD 410 the Goths captured and sacked Rome, a city that had not fallen to a foreign enemy in eight hundred years. Pagans blamed the disaster on the Christians, who had abandoned the old gods. Augustine, bishop of Hippo in North Africa, began The City of God in answer, and worked on it for some thirteen years, until about AD 426.

The first ten books take apart the claim that the gods protected Rome and could give happiness in this life or the next, engaging Roman history, Varro's theology and the Platonist philosophers along the way. The last twelve tell a larger story: two cities, formed by two loves—"love of self, even to contempt of God" and "love of God, even to contempt of self"—mingled together in history from the fall of the angels to the Last Judgment.

It is one of the founding books of Western thought about history, politics, war, peace and the purpose of human life. Each of the twenty-two books is on its own page, and each chapter carries an English version of the title printed in the Latin edition.

Book I

The sack of Rome
Augustine answers pagans who blame Christianity for the Gothic sack of Rome in 410, and discusses suffering, rape and suicide.

PREFACE: THE PLAN AND SUBJECT OF THE WORK

Augustine dedicates the work to Marcellinus and sets out to defend the city of God against the proud.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.pr	Gloriosissimam ciuitatem Dei siue in hoc temporum cursu, cum inter inpios peregrinatur ex fide uiuens, siue in illa stabilitate sedis aeternae, quam nunc expectat per patientiam, quoadusque iustitia conuertatur in iudicium, deinceps adeptura per excellentiam uictoria ultima et pace perfecta, hoc opere ad te instituto et mea promissione debito defendere aduersus eos, qui conditori eius deos suos praeferunt, fili carissime Marcelline, suscepi, magnum opus et arduum, sed Deus adiutor noster est. Nam scio quibus uiribus opus sit, ut persuadeatur superbis quanta sit uirtus humilitatis, qua fit ut omnia terrena cacumina temporali mobilitate nutantia non humano usurpata fastu, sed diuina gratia donata celsitudo transcendat.	My dearest son Marcellinus, in this work, which I have undertaken for you and owe you by my promise, I have set out to defend the most glorious city of God against those who prefer their own gods to its founder. I defend it both as it is in this present course of time, when it lives by faith as a pilgrim among the ungodly, and as it will be in the security of that eternal home. It now awaits that home with patience, "until justice is turned into judgment," and will afterward attain it through its excellence, in final victory and perfect peace. It is a great and arduous task, but God is our helper. For I know what strength is needed to convince the proud how great the virtue of humility is. By humility, a height that is not seized by human arrogance but given by divine grace rises above all the earthly summits that totter with the instability of time.[1]
	Rex enim et conditor ciuitatis huius, de qua loqui instituimus, in scriptura populi sui sententiam diuinae legis aperuit, qua dictum est: Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam. Hoc uero, quod Dei est, superbae quoque animae spiritus inflatus adfectat amatque sibi in laudibus dici: Parcere subiectis et debellare superbos. Unde etiam de terrena ciuitate, quae cum dominari adpetit, etsi populi seruiant, ipsa ei dominandi libido dominatur, non est praetereundum silentio quidquid dicere suscepti huius operis ratio postulat et facultas datur.	For the King and Founder of this city we have set out to discuss has revealed, in the Scripture of his people, a pronouncement of divine law: "God resists the proud but gives grace to the humble." Yet this, which belongs to God, the swollen spirit of a proud soul also claims for itself, and it loves to hear in its own praise: "To spare the conquered and to war down the proud." So I must not pass over in silence the earthly city either. When it seeks to dominate, it is itself dominated by its lust for domination, even though nations serve it. I will say about it whatever the plan of the work I have undertaken requires and my ability allows.[2]

1 Flavius Marcellinus, an imperial official in Africa and Augustine's friend, urged him to write this work; he was executed in AD 413. "Until justice is turned into judgment" is Psalm 93:15 (94:15 in most English Bibles).
2 James 4:6 (also 1 Peter 5:5). The line of verse is Virgil, Aeneid 6.853, where Anchises describes Rome's mission.

THE ENEMIES OF CHRIST'S NAME, WHOM THE INVADERS SPARED FOR CHRIST'S SAKE WHEN THE CITY WAS SACKED

Pagans who escaped the sack by sheltering in Christian churches now blame Christ for Rome's disaster.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.1	Ex hac namque existunt inimici, aduersus quos defendenda est Dei ciuitas, quorum tamen multi correcto inpietatis errore ciues in ea fiunt satis idonei; multi uero in eam tantis exardescunt ignibus odiorum tamque manifestis beneficiis redemtoris eius ingrati sunt, ut hodie contra eam linguas non mouerent, nisi ferrum hostile fugientes in sacratis eius locis uitam, de qua superbiunt, inuenirent. An non etiam illi Romani Christi nomini infesti sunt, quibus propter Christum barbari pepercerunt? Testantur hoc martyrum loca et basilicae apostolorum, quae in illa uastatione Urbis ad se confugientes suos alienosque receperunt. Huc usque cruentus saeuiebat inimicus, ibi accipiebat limitem trucidatoris furor, illo ducebantur a miserantibus hostibus, quibus etiam extra ipsa loca pepercerant, ne in eos incurrerent, qui similem misericordiam non habebant.	For it is from this earthly city that the enemies arise against whom the city of God must be defended. Many of them, however, correct their ungodly error and become quite worthy citizens of it. But many others burn against it with such fires of hatred, and are so ungrateful for the plain benefits of its Redeemer, that they would not be wagging their tongues against it today had they not found in its sacred places, as they fled the enemy's sword, the very life they are now so proud of. Are not even those Romans hostile to the name of Christ whom the invaders spared for Christ's sake? The shrines of the martyrs and the basilicas of the apostles bear witness to this. In that devastation of the City they took in all who fled to them, their own people and outsiders alike. Up to that point the bloodthirsty enemy raged; there the killer's fury met its limit. To those places the enemy, moved by pity, led even those they had spared outside them, so that they would not fall into the hands of others who had no such mercy.[3]
	Qui tamen etiam ipsi alibi truces adque hostili more saeuientes posteaquam ad loca illa ueniebant, ubi fuerat interdictum quod alibi belli iure licuisset, tota feriendi refrenabatur inmanitas et captiuandi cupiditas frangebatur. Sic euaserunt multi, qui nunc Christianis temporibus detrahunt et mala, quae illa ciuitas pertulit, Christo inputant; bona uero, quae in eos ut uiuerent propter Christi honorem facta sunt, non inputant Christo nostro sed fato suo, cum potius deberent, si quid recti saperent, illa, quae ab hostibus aspera et dura perpessi sunt, illi prouidentiae diuinae tribuere, quae solet corruptos hominum mores bellis emendare adque conterere itemque uitam mortalium iustam adque laudabilem talibus adflictionibus exercere probatamque uel in meliora transferre uel in his adhuc terris propter usus alios detinere:	These same men, ferocious elsewhere and raging as enemies do, came to those places where what the law of war would have allowed elsewhere was forbidden; and there all their savagery in striking was reined in, and their craving to take captives was broken. In this way many escaped who now disparage these Christian times and blame Christ for the evils that city endured. But the good they received, when their lives were spared out of respect for Christ, they credit not to our Christ but to their own fate. If they had any sense, they ought rather to attribute the harsh and cruel things they suffered at the enemy's hands to divine providence. Providence habitually corrects and crushes the corrupt morals of human beings by wars; it likewise tests the righteous and praiseworthy lives of mortals by such afflictions, and once they are proved, either carries them over to better things or keeps them still on this earth for other purposes.
	illud uero, quod eis uel ubicumque propter Christi nomen uel in locis Christi nomini dicatissimis et amplissimis ac	As for the fact that the savage invaders, contrary to the custom of war, spared them—whether any-pro largiore misericordia ad capacitatem multitudinis electis praeter bellorum morem truculenti barbari pepercerunt, hoc tribuere temporibus Christianis, hinc Deo agere gratias, hinc ad eius nomen ueraciter currere, ut effugiant poenas ignis aeterni, quod nomen multi eorum mendaciter usurparunt, ut effugerent poenas praesentis exitii.	where at all for the sake of Christ's name, or in the places most devoted to Christ's name, the largest ones, chosen to hold a multitude so that mercy might reach more widely—this they ought to attribute to Christian times. For this they ought to thank God; for this they ought to run sincerely to his name, so as to escape the punishment of eternal fire. Many of them falsely took that name upon themselves to escape the punishment of immediate destruction.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam quos uides petulanter et procaciter insultare seruis Christi, sunt in eis plurimi, qui illum interitum clademque non euasissent, nisi seruos Christi se esse finxissent. Et nunc ingrata superbia adque inpiissima insania eius nomini resistunt corde peruerso, ut sempiternis tenebris puniantur, ad quod nomen ore uel subdolo confugerunt, ut temporali luce fruerentur.	For among those you see insolently and shamelessly insulting the servants of Christ, there are very many who would not have escaped that slaughter and disaster had they not pretended to be servants of Christ. And now, with ungrateful pride and the most ungodly madness, they resist his name with perverse hearts, to be punished with everlasting darkness—the very name to which they fled, if only with deceitful lips, so as to enjoy the light of this passing life.

THAT NO WAR WAS EVER FOUGHT IN WHICH THE VICTORS SPARED THE VANQUISHED FOR THE SAKE OF THE GODS OF THOSE THEY CONQUERED

No ancient war, at Troy or elsewhere, saw victors spare the defeated for the sake of the defeated's gods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.2 Tot bella gesta conscripta sunt uel ante conditam Romam uel ab eius exortu et imperio: legant et proferant sic ab alienigenis aliquam captam esse ciuitatem, ut hostes, qui ceperant, parcerent eis, quos ad deorum suorum templa confugisse compererant, aut aliquem ducem barbarorum praecepisse, ut inrupto oppido nullus feriretur, qui in illo uel illo templo fuisset inuentus. Nonne uidit Aeneas Priamum per aras Sanguine foedantem quos ipse sacrauerat ignes? Nonne Diomedes et Ulixes caesis summae custodibus arcis Corripuere sacram effigiem manibusque cruentis Virgineas ausi diuae contingere uittas? Nec tamen quod sequitur uerum est: Ex illo fluere ac retro sublabsa referri Spes Danaum. Postea quippe uicerunt, postea Troiam ferro ignibusque dele, uerunt, postea confugientem ad aram Priamum obtruncauerunt.	So many wars have been recorded, whether before Rome was founded or since its rise and rule. Let them read, and let them produce, a single case of a city captured by foreigners in which the enemy who took it spared those they found had fled to the temples of their gods; or in which some foreign commander ordered that, once the town was stormed, no one found in this or that temple should be struck. Did Aeneas not see Priam "at the altars, defiling with his blood the fires he himself had consecrated"? Did not Diomedes and Ulysses, "having slain the guards of the high citadel, seize the sacred image, and with bloody hands dare to touch the virgin goddess's sacred ribbons"? Yet what follows is not true: "From that moment the hopes of the Greeks began to ebb and, slipping, to fall back." For afterward they won; afterward they destroyed Troy with sword and fire; afterward they cut Priam down as he fled to the altar.[4]

3 The sack of Rome by the Goths under Alaric in August AD 410.
4 Virgil, Aeneid 2.501–502 and 2.166–170. Diomedes and Ulysses stole the Palladium, the image of Minerva on which Troy's safety was believed to depend.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nec ideo Troia periit, quia Mineruam perdidit. Quid enim prius ipsa Minerua perdiderat, ut periret? an forte custodes suos? Hoc sane uerum est; illis quippe interemtis potuit auferri. Neque enim homines a simulacro, sed simulacrum ab hominibus seruabatur. Quo modo ergo colebatur, ut patriam custodiret et ciues, quae suos non ualuit custodire custodes?	Nor did Troy perish because it lost Minerva. For what had Minerva herself lost first, that she should perish? Her guards, perhaps? That is certainly true: once they were killed, she could be carried off. For it was not the men who were protected by the image, but the image by the men. How, then, was she worshiped to guard the homeland and its citizens, when she could not guard her own guards?

HOW FOOLISH THE ROMANS WERE TO BELIEVE THAT THE HOUSEHOLD GODS WHO COULD NOT PROTECT TROY WOULD BENEFIT THEM

Troy's conquered household gods could not protect Troy, so the Romans were foolish to trust them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.3 Ecce qualibus dis Urbem Romani seruandam se commisisse gaudebant! o nimium miserabilem errorem! Et nobis suscensent, cum de dis eorum talia dicimus; nec suscensent auctoribus suis, quos ut ediscerent mercedem dederunt doctoresque ipsos insuper et salario publico et honoribus dignissimos habuerunt. Nempe aput Vergilium, quem propterea paruuli legunt, ut uidelicet poeta magnus omniumque praeclarissimus adque optimus teneris ebibitus animis non facile obliuione possit aboleri, secundum illud Horatii: Quo semel est inbuta recens seruabit odorem Testa diu aput hunc ergo Vergilium nempe Iuno inducitur infesta Troianis Aeolo uentorum regi aduersus eos inritando dicere: Gens inimica mihi Tyrrhenum nauigat aequor Ilium in Italiam portans uictosque penates. Itane istis penatibus uictis Romam, ne uinceretur, prudentes commendare debuerunt?	Look at the kind of gods to whom the Romans rejoiced to have entrusted the protection of the City! What a pitiable error! And they are angry with us when we say such things about their gods. Yet they are not angry with their own authors, whom they paid to learn by heart, and whose teachers they thought fully deserving of a public salary and honors besides. Take Virgil. Little children read him precisely so that this great poet, the most famous and the best of all, drunk in by tender minds, cannot easily be erased by forgetfulness—as Horace says: "The jar will long keep the scent of what it was steeped in when new." In this same Virgil, then, Juno is portrayed as hostile to the Trojans, and as she stirs up Aeolus, king of the winds, against them, she says: "A race hostile to me sails the Tyrrhenian sea, carrying Ilium and its conquered household gods into Italy." Should sensible men really have entrusted Rome to these conquered household gods, to keep it from being conquered?[5]
Sed haec Iuno dicebat uelut irata mulier, quid loqueretur ignorans. Quid Aeneas ipse, pius totiens appellatus, nonne ita narrat: Panthus Othryades, arcis Phoebique sacerdos, Sacra manu uictosque deos paruumque nepotem Ipse trahit cursuque amens ad limina tendit? Nonne deos ipsos, quos uictos non dubitat dicere, sibi potius quam se illis perhibet commendatos, cum ei dicitur: Sacra suosque tibi commendat Troia penates? Si igitur Vergilius tales deos et uictos dicit et, ut uel uicti quoquo modo	But Juno said this like an angry woman, not knowing what she was saying. What about Aeneas himself, so often called "dutiful"? Does he not tell the story like this: "Panthus, son of Othrys, priest of the citadel and of Phoebus, himself drags along the sacred objects, the conquered gods and his little grandson, and runs frantically to my door"? Does he not declare that these very gods, whom he does not hesitate to call conquered, were entrusted to him, rather than he to them, when he is 5 Horace, Epistles 1.2.69–70; Juno's words are Aeneid 1.67–68. The household gods (penates) were Troy's ancestral gods, which Aeneas was said to have carried to Italy.

LATIN

euaderent, homini commendatos: quae dementia est existimare his tutoribus Romam sapienter fuisse commissam et nisi eos amisisset non potuisse uastari? Immo uero uictos deos tamquam praesides ac defensores colere, quid est aliud quam tenere non numina bona, sed nomina mala?

Quanto enim sapientius creditur, non Romam ad istam cladem non fuisse uenturam, nisi prius illi periissent, sed illos potius olim fuisse perituros, nisi eos quantum potuisset Roma seruasset! Nam quis non, cum aduerterit, uideat quanta sit uanitate praesumtum non posse uinci sub defensoribus uictis et ideo periisse, quia custodes perdidit deos, cum uel sola esse potuerit causa pereundi custodes habere uoluisse perituros? Non itaque, cum de dis uictis illa conscriberentur adque canerentur, poetas libebat mentiri, sed cordatos homines cogebat ueritas confiteri.

Verum ista opportunius alio loco diligenter copioseque tractanda sunt: nunc, quod institueram de ingratis hominibus dicere, parumper expediam ut possum, qui ea mala, quae pro suorum morum peruersitate merito patiuntur, blasphemantes Christo inputant; quod autem illis etiam talibus propter Christum parcitur, nec dignantur adtendere et eas linguas aduersus eius nomen dementia sacrilegae peruersitatis exercent, quibus linguis usurpauerunt mendaciter ipsum nomen, ut uiuerent, uel quas linguas in locis ei sacratis metuendo presserunt, ut illic tuti adque muniti, ubi propter eum inlaesi ab hostibus fuerunt, inde in eum maledictis hostilibus prosilirent.

ENGLISH

told: "Troy entrusts to you its sacred objects and its household gods"? If, then, Virgil says that such gods were conquered, and that they were entrusted to a man so that, though conquered, they might somehow escape, what madness it is to think that Rome was wisely committed to these guardians, and that it could not have been sacked unless it had lost them! Indeed, to worship conquered gods as protectors and defenders—what is that but to hold on not to good divinities but to bad omens?[6]

How much wiser it is to believe, not that Rome would never have come to this disaster unless those gods had perished first, but rather that they would long ago have perished had Rome not preserved them as best it could! For who, once he stops to think, does not see how empty the assumption was that Rome could not be conquered under conquered defenders, and that it perished because it lost its guardian gods? The only cause of its perishing could well have been its wish to have guardians that were doomed to perish. So when these things were written and sung about the conquered gods, it was not that the poets enjoyed lying; rather, the truth compelled men of sense to admit it.

But these matters are better treated carefully and at length elsewhere. For now I shall briefly, as best I can, finish what I had begun to say about ungrateful people. They blasphemously blame Christ for the evils they deservedly suffer for the perversity of their morals; but the fact that, even such as they are, they are spared for Christ's sake, they do not deign to notice. With the madness of sacrilegious perversity they ply their tongues against his name—the same tongues with which they falsely claimed that name in order to live, or which they held in check out of fear in places sacred to him. So, safe and protected there, where for his sake they were unharmed by the enemy, they burst out from there to attack him with an enemy's curses.

6 The Latin plays on numina (divinities) and nomina (names, here names of ill omen).

THE ASYLUM OF JUNO AT TROY, WHICH FREED NO ONE FROM THE GREEKS, AND THE BASILICAS OF THE APOSTLES, WHICH PROTECTED FROM THE INVADERS ALL WHO FLED TO THEM

Juno's sanctuary at Troy held captives for the Greeks; the apostles' basilicas sheltered refugees from the invaders.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.4	Ipsa, ut dixi, Troia, mater populi Romani, sacratis locis deorum suorum munire non potuit ciues suos ab ignibus ferroque Graecorum, eosdem ipsos deos colentium; quin etiam Iunonis asylo Custodes lecti, Phoenix et dirus Ulixes, Praedam adseruabant; huc undique Troia gaza Incensis erepta adytis mensaeque deorum Crateresque auro solidi captiuaque uestis Congeritur. Pueri et pauidae longo ordine matres Stant circum. Electus est uidelicet locus tantae deae sacratus, non unde captiuos non liceret educere, sed ubi captiuos liberet includere. Conpara nunc asylum illud non cuiuslibet dei gregalis uel de turba plebis, sed Iouis ipsius sororis et coniugis et reginae omnium deorum cum memoriis nostrorum apostolorum.	Troy itself, as I said, the mother of the Roman people, could not protect its citizens in the sacred places of its gods from the fire and sword of the Greeks, though the Greeks worshiped those very same gods. On the contrary: "In Juno's sanctuary, chosen guards, Phoenix and dread Ulysses, kept watch over the plunder. Here Trojan treasure from every side, snatched from the burning shrines—the tables of the gods, bowls of solid gold and captured garments—was heaped up. Children and trembling mothers stand around in a long line." Clearly, a place consecrated to so great a goddess was chosen not as a place from which captives could not be taken, but as one in which captives might be locked up. Now compare that sanctuary—the sanctuary not of some common god from the rank and file, but of Jupiter's own sister and wife, the queen of all the gods—with the memorial shrines of our apostles.
	Illuc incensis templis et dis erepta spolia portabantur, non donanda uictis, sed diuidenda uictoribus; huc autem et quod alibi ad ea loca pertinere conpertum est cum honore et obsequio religiosissimo reportatum est. Ibi amissa, hic seruata libertas; ibi clausa, hic interdicta captiuitas; ibi possidendi a dominantibus hostibus premebantur, huc liberandi a miserantibus ducebantur: postremo illud Iunonis templum sibi elegerat auaritia et superbia leuium Graeculorum, istas Christi basilicas misericordia et humilitas etiam inmanium barbarorum. Nisi forte Graeci quidem in illa sua uictoria templis deorum communium pepercerunt adque illo confugientes miseros uictosque Troianos ferire uel captiuare non ausi sunt, sed Vergilius poetarum more illa mentitus est. Immo uero morem hostium ciuitates euertentium ille descripsit.	To that place were carried the spoils snatched from burning temples and from the gods, not to be given back to the conquered but to be divided among the conquerors. To these shrines, by contrast, even what was found elsewhere to belong to them was brought back with honor and the most devout respect. There freedom was lost, here it was preserved; there captivity was locked in, here it was forbidden; there people were penned in by domineering enemies to become their property, here they were led by compassionate enemies to be set free. In short, that temple of Juno was chosen by the greed and pride of the fickle Greeks; these basilicas of Christ by the mercy and humility of the invaders, savage as they were. Unless perhaps the Greeks, in that victory of theirs, really did spare the temples of the gods they shared, and did not dare to strike or capture the wretched, conquered Trojans who fled there, and Virgil, as poets do, made it all up? No—he described the custom of enemies who overthrow cities.

WHAT CATO THOUGHT OF THE GENERAL CUSTOM OF ENEMIES WHO DESTROY CONQUERED CITIES

Sallust's Cato describes the usual horrors of a captured city, temples included.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.5	Quem morem etiam Cato, sicut scribit Sallustius, nobilitatae ueritatis historicus, sententia sua, quam de coniuratis in senatu habuit, conmemorare non praetermittit: rapi uirgines pueros, diuelli liberos a parentum conplexu, matres familiarum pati quae uictoribus conlibuisset, fana adque domos spoliari, caedem incendia fieri: postremo armis cadaueribus cruore adque luctu omnia conpleri. Hic si fana tacuisset, deorum sedibus solere hostes parcere putaremus. Et haec non ab alienigenis hostibus, sed a Catilina et sociis eius, nobilissimis senatoribus et Romanis ciuibus, Romana templa metuebant. Sed hi uidelicet perditi et patriae parricidae.	Cato too, as Sallust, a historian renowned for his truthfulness, records, does not fail to mention this custom in the speech he delivered in the senate about the conspirators: virgins and boys are seized, children torn from their parents' embrace, mothers of families made to suffer whatever the victors please, shrines and houses plundered, slaughter and burning everywhere; in short, everything is filled with weapons, corpses, blood and mourning. Had he said nothing about the shrines, we might think that enemies usually spare the dwellings of the gods. And Roman temples feared these things not from foreign enemies but from Catiline and his associates, senators of the highest nobility and Roman citizens. But these, of course, were desperate men, murderers of their own country.[7]

THAT NOT EVEN THE ROMANS, WHEN THEY CAPTURED CITIES, SPARED THE VANQUISHED IN THEIR TEMPLES

Even Marcellus and Fabius, praised for restraint, never spared anyone who fled to a temple.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.6	Quid ergo per multas gentes, quae inter se bella gesserunt et nusquam uictis in deorum suorum sedibus pepercerunt, noster sermo discurrat? Romanos ipsos uideamus, ipsos, inquam, recolamus respiciamusque Romanos, de quorum praecipua laude dictum est: Parcere subiectis et debellare superbos, et quod accepta iniuria ignoscere quam persequi malebant: quando tot tantasque urbes, ut late dominarentur, expugnatas captasque euerterunt, legatur nobis quae templa excipere solebant, ut ad ea quisquis confugisset liberaretur. An illi faciebant et scriptores earundem rerum gestarum ista reticebant? Ita uero, qui ea quae laudarent maxime requirebant, ista praeclarissima secundum ipsos pietatis indicia praeterirent? Egregius Romani nominis Marcus Marcellus, qui Syracusas urbem ornatissimam cepit, refertur eam prius fleuisse ruituram et ante eius sanguinem suas illi lacrimas effudisse.	Why, then, should our discussion range over the many nations that waged war on one another and nowhere spared the conquered in the dwellings of their gods? Let us look at the Romans themselves; let us, I say, recall and consider the Romans themselves, of whom it was said, as their special glory, "To spare the conquered and to war down the proud," and that when wronged they preferred to forgive rather than to take revenge. When they stormed, captured and overthrew so many great cities in order to extend their rule far and wide, let someone read to us which temples they used to exempt, so that whoever fled to them would be set free. Or did they do this, and the historians of those very deeds kept silent about it? Really? Would men who searched above all for things to praise pass over these, which by their own standards are the most glorious proofs of piety? Marcus Marcellus, a distinguished bearer of the Roman

7 Sallust (86–c. 35 BC), The War with Catiline 51.9, on the conspiracy of 63 BC; in Sallust these words actually belong to Caesar's speech, not Cato's.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		name, who captured the splendid city of Syracuse, is said to have wept over it before it fell, and to have shed his own tears for it before its blood was shed.[8]
	Gessit et curam pudicitiae etiam in hoste seruandae. Nam priusquam oppidum uictor iussisset inuadi, constituit edicto, ne quis corpus liberum uiolaret. Euersa est tamen ciuitas more bellorum, nec uspiam legitur ab imperatore tam casto adque clementi fuisse praeceptum, ut quisquis ad illud uel illud templum fugisset haberetur inlaesus. Quod utique nullo modo praeteriretur, quando nec eius fletus nec quod edixerat pro pudicitia minime uiolanda potuit taceri. Fabius, Tarentinae urbis euersor, a simulacrorum depraedatione se abstinuisse, laudatur. Nam cum ei scriba suggessisset quid de signis deorum, quae multa capta fuerant, fieri iuberet, continentiam suam etiam iocando condiuit. Quaesiuit enim cuius modi essent, et cum ei non solum multa grandia, uerum etiam renuntiarentur armata, relinquamus, inquit Tarentinis deos iratos.	He also took care to preserve chastity, even in the enemy. For before he, as victor, ordered the town to be entered, he decreed by edict that no one should violate the body of a free person. Yet the city was overthrown in the usual way of war, and nowhere do we read that so chaste and merciful a commander ordered that anyone who fled to this or that temple should be left unharmed. That would certainly not have been passed over, since neither his weeping nor his edict for the protection of chastity could go unmentioned. Fabius, who destroyed the city of Tarentum, is praised for refraining from plundering its images. When his secretary asked him what he wanted done with the statues of the gods, a great many of which had been captured, he seasoned his restraint with a joke. He asked what they were like, and when he was told that many were not only large but armed, he said: "Let us leave the Tarentines their angry gods."[9]
	Cum igitur nec illius fletum nec huius risum, nec illius castam misericordiam nec huius facetam continentiam Romanarum rerum gestarum scriptores tacere potuerint: quando praetermitteretur, si aliquibus hominibus in honorem cuiuspiam deorum suorum sic pepercissent, ut in quoquam templo caedem uel captiuitatem fieri prohiberent?	Since, then, the historians of Roman affairs could not keep silent about the one man's weeping or the other's laughter, the one's chaste mercy or the other's witty restraint, would they ever have passed it over if the Romans had spared some people in honor of one of their gods, by forbidding slaughter or captivity in some temple?

THAT THE HARSH THINGS DONE IN THE SACK OF THE CITY CAME FROM THE CUSTOM OF WAR, BUT THE MERCIFUL ONES FROM THE POWER OF CHRIST'S NAME

The slaughter in Rome came from the custom of war; the mercy came from Christ's name.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.7	Quidquid ergo uastationis trucidationis depraedationis concremationis adflictionis in ista recentissima Romana clade commissum est, fecit hoc consuetudo bellorum; quod autem nouo more factum est, quod inusitata rerum facie inmanitas barbara tam mitis apparuit, ut amplissimae basilicae inplendae populo cui parceretur eligerentur et decernerentur, ubi nemo feriretur, unde nemo raperetur, quo liberandi multi a miserantibus hostibus ducerentur, unde captiuandi ulli nec a	So whatever devastation, slaughter, plunder, burning and suffering took place in this most recent disaster at Rome was the work of the custom of war. But something was done in a new way. In an unheard-of turn of events, the invaders' savagery showed itself so gentle that the largest basilicas were chosen and set apart to be filled with people who would be spared: places where no one would

8 Marcus Claudius Marcellus took Syracuse in 212 BC, during the Second Punic War. The words about forgiving wrongs come from Sallust, The War with Catiline 9.5.

9 Quintus Fabius Maximus recaptured Tarentum (modern Taranto) from Hannibal's allies in 209 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
crudelibus hostibus abducerentur: hoc Christi nomini, hoc Christiano tempori tribuendum quisquis non uidet, caecus, quisquis uidet nec laudat, ingratus, quisquis laudanti reluctatur, insanus est. Absit, ut prudens quisquam hoc feritati inputet barbarorum.	be struck, from which no one would be dragged away, to which many were led by compassionate enemies to be set free, and from which none were taken off into captivity even by cruel enemies. This must be credited to the name of Christ, to this Christian age. Whoever does not see this is blind; whoever sees it and does not praise it is ungrateful; whoever opposes the one who praises it is mad. Far be it from any sensible person to attribute this to the ferocity of the invaders.
Truculentissimas et saeuissimas mentes ille terruit, ille frenauit, e mirabiliter temperauit, qui per prophetam tanto ante dixit: isitabo in uirga iniquitates eorum et in flagellis peccata eorum; misericordiam autem meam non dispergam ab eis.	Those most savage and cruel minds were terrified, reined in and wonderfully tempered by him who said through the prophet so long before: "I will punish their iniquities with the rod and their sins with lashes; but I will not take my mercy away from them."[10]

THE ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES THAT ARE USUALLY COMMON TO THE GOOD AND THE WICKED

God gives temporal goods and evils to good and bad alike, but each uses them differently.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.8 Dicet aliquis: Quur ergo ista diuina misericordia etiam ad inpios ingratosque peruenit? Quur putamus, nisi quia eam ille praebuit, qui cottidie facit oriri solem suum super bonos et malos et pluit super iustos et iniustos? Quamuis enim quidam eorum ista cogitantes paenitendo ab inpietate se corrigant, quidam uero, sicut apostolus dicit, diuitias bonitatis et longanimitatis Dei contemnentes secundum duritiam cordis sui et cor inpaenitens thesaurizent sibi iram in die irae et reuelationis iusti iudicii Dei, qui reddet unicuique secundum opera eius: tamen patientia Dei ad paenitentiam inuitat malos, sicut flagellum Dei ad patientiam erudit bonos; itemque misericordia Dei fouendos amplectitur bonos, sicut seueritas Dei puniendos corripit malos.	Someone will say: "Why, then, did this divine mercy reach even the ungodly and ungrateful?" Why should we think, if not because it was shown by him who every day "makes his sun rise on the good and the evil, and sends rain on the just and the unjust"? For some of them, reflecting on this, repent and turn away from their ungodliness. Others, as the apostle says, "despising the riches of God's goodness and forbearance, by their hardness and impenitent heart store up wrath for themselves on the day of wrath and of the revelation of the just judgment of God, who will repay each one according to his works." Still, God's patience invites the wicked to repentance, just as God's scourge trains the good in patience; and likewise God's mercy embraces the good to cherish them, just as God's severity seizes the wicked to punish them.[11]
Placuit quippe diuinae prouidentiae praeparare in posterum bona iustis, quibus non fruentur iniusti, et mala inpiis, quibus non excruciabuntur boni; ista uero temporalia bona et mala utrisque uoluit esse communia, ut nec bona cupidius adpetantur, quae mali quoque habere cernuntur; nec mala turpiter euitentur, quibus et boni plerumque adficiuntur.	For it has pleased divine providence to prepare for the future good things for the just, which the unjust will not enjoy, and evil things for the ungodly, by which the good will not be tormented. But these temporal goods and evils it willed to be common to both, so that good things would not be sought too greedily, since the wicked are seen to

10 Psalm 88:33–34 (89:32–33 in most English Bibles).
11 Matthew 5:45; Romans 2:4–6.

LATIN

ENGLISH

have them too, and evil things would not be shamefully shunned, since the good too are often afflicted by them.

Interest autem plurimum, qualis sit usus uel earum rerum, quae prosperae, uel earum, quae dicuntur aduersae. Nam bonus temporalibus nec bonis extollitur nec malis frangitur; malus autem ideo huiusce modi infelicitate punitur, quia felicitate corrumpitur. Ostendit tamen Deus saepe etiam in his distribuendis euidentius operationem suam. Nam si nunc omne peccatum manifesta plecteret poena, nihil ultimo iudicio seruari; putaretur; rursus si nullum nunc peccatum puniret aperta diuinitas, nulla esse diuina prouidentia crederetur. Similiter in rebus secundis, si non eas Deus quibusdam petentibus euidentissima largitate concederet, non ad eum ista pertinere diceremus; itemque si omnibus eas petentibus daret, non nisi propter talia praemia seruiendum illi esse arbitraremur, nec pios nos faceret talis seruitus, sed potius cupidos et auaros.

But it makes a very great difference how one uses both what are called prosperous things and what are called adverse. For the good person is neither lifted up by temporal goods nor broken by temporal evils; the wicked person, on the other hand, is punished by this kind of unhappiness precisely because he is corrupted by happiness. Yet God often shows his working more clearly even in distributing these things. For if he now punished every sin with a visible penalty, nothing would be thought to be kept for the last judgment; and again, if the divinity punished no sin openly now, people would believe there was no divine providence. Likewise with prosperity: if God did not grant it with the plainest generosity to some who ask for it, we would say these things were not his concern; and again, if he gave it to everyone who asks, we would think he should be served only for such rewards, and such service would make us not devout but rather grasping and greedy.

Haec cum ita sint, quicumque boni et mali pariter adflicti sunt, non ideo ipsi distincti non sunt, quia distinctum non est quod utrique perpessi sunt. Manet enim dissimilitudo passorum etiam in similitudine passionum, et licet sub eodem tormento non est idem uirtus et uitium. Nam sicut sub uno igne aurum rutilat palea fumat, et sub eadem tribula stipulae comminuuntur frumenta purgantur, nec ideo cum oleo amurca confunditur, quia eodem praeli pondere exprimitur: ita una eademque uis inruens bonos probat purificat eliquat, malos damnat uastat exterminat. Unde in eadem adflictione mali Deum detestantur adque blasphemant, boni autem precantur et laudant. Tantum interest, non qualia, sed qualis quisque patiatur. Nam pari motu exagitatum et exhalat horribiliter caenum et suauiter fragrat unguentum.

This being so, when good and bad alike have been afflicted, they are not themselves indistinguishable just because what they both suffered is indistinguishable. For the difference between the sufferers remains even within the likeness of their sufferings, and though they are under the same torment, virtue and vice are not the same thing. Under one and the same fire gold glows and chaff smokes; under the same threshing sledge the straw is crushed and the grain is cleaned; and the dregs are not mixed with the oil just because both are pressed out by the same weight of the press. In the same way, one and the same force, falling upon them, tests, purifies and refines the good, and condemns, ruins and destroys the wicked. So in the same affliction the wicked curse and blaspheme God, while the good pray and give praise. What matters most, then, is not what kind of things one suffers, but what kind of person suffers them. For stirred by the same motion, filth gives off a horrible stench and perfume a sweet fragrance.

THE REASONS FOR THE CHASTISEMENTS BY WHICH THE GOOD AND THE WICKED ARE SCOURGED ALIKE

Good people suffer with the wicked because they love this life and fail to rebuke sin.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.9	Quid igitur in illa rerum uastitate Christiani passi sunt, quod non eis magis fideliter ista considerantibus ad prouectum ualeret? Primum quod ipsa peccata, quibus Deus indignatus inpleuit tantis calamitatibus mundum, humiliter cogitantes, quamuis longe absint a facinerosis flagitiosis adque inpiis, tamen non usque adeo se a delictis deputant alienos, ut nec temporalia pro eis mala perpeti se iudicent dignos.	What, then, did the Christians suffer in that devastation that would not rather serve their progress, if they considered these things faithfully? First, they reflect humbly on the very sins that angered God, so that he filled the world with such great calamities. And though they are far removed from criminals, the depraved and the ungodly, they still do not regard themselves as so free of wrongdoing that they deserve to suffer no temporal evils for those sins.
	Excepto enim quod unusquisque quamlibet laudabiliter uiuens cedit in quibusdam carnali concupiscentiae, etsi non ad facinorum inmanitatem et gurgitem flagitiorum adque inpietatis abominationem, ad aliqua tamen peccata uel rara uel tanto crebriora, quanto minora — hoc ergo excepto quis tandem facile reperitur, qui eosdem ipsos, propter quorum horrendam superbiam luxuriamque et auaritiam adque execrabiles iniquitates et inpietates Deus, sicut minando praedixit, conterit terras, sic habeat, ut habendi sunt? sic cum eis uiuat, ut cum talibus est uiuendum?	For everyone, however praiseworthy his life, gives way in some things to fleshly desire. He may not give way to monstrous crimes, a whirlpool of depravity and the abomination of ungodliness, but he does give way to some sins, either rare ones or ones that are more frequent the smaller they are. Leaving this aside, then, who is easily found who treats as they should be treated those very people whose horrible pride, luxury and greed, and accursed iniquities and impieties, are the reason God crushes the earth, as he foretold in his threats? Who lives with them as one ought to live with such people?
	Plerumque enim ab eis docendis ac monendis, aliquando etiam obiurgandis et corripiendis male dissimulatur, uel cum laboris piget, uel cum os eorum uerecundamur offendere, uel cum inimicitias deuitamus, ne inpediant et noceant in istis temporalibus rebus, siue quas adipisci adhuc adpetit nostra cupiditas, siue quas amittere formidat infirmitas, ita ut, quamuis bonis malorum uita displiceat et ideo cum eis non incidant in illam damnationem, quae post hanc uitam talibus praeparatur, tamen, quia propterea peccatis eorum damnabilibus parcunt, dum eos in suis licet leuibus et ueniabilibus, metuunt, iure cum eis temporaliter flagellantur, quamuis in aeternum minime puniantur, iure istam uitam, quando diuinitus adfliguntur cum eis, amaram sentiunt, cuius amando dulcedinem peccantibus eis amari esse noluerunt.	For very often we wrongly hold back from teaching and warning them, and sometimes also from rebuking and reproving them. Sometimes the effort irks us. Sometimes we shrink from offending them to their face. Sometimes we avoid their enmity, for fear they may hinder and harm us in these temporal things, whether those that our craving still seeks to obtain or those that our weakness fears to lose. So the good are displeased by the life of the wicked, and therefore do not fall with them into the damnation prepared for such people after this life. Yet they spare the damnable sins of the wicked because they fear them where their own sins are concerned, light and pardonable though these may be. For this reason they are rightly scourged with them in time, though they are by no means punished for eternity. And when God afflicts them along with the wicked, they rightly find this life bitter, since out of love for its sweetness they refused to be bitter to the wicked when they sinned.

LATIN

Nam si propterea quisque obiurgandis et corripiendis male agentibus parcit, quia opportunius tempus inquirit uel eisdem ipsis metuit, ne deteriores ex hoc efficiantur, uel ad bonam uitam et piam erudiendos inpediant alios infirmos et premant adque auertant a fide: non uidetur esse cupiditatis occasio, sed consilium caritatis. Illud est culpabile, quod hi, qui dissimiliter uiuunt et a malorum factis abhorrent, parcunt tamen peccatis alienis, quae dedocere aut obiurgare deberent, dum eorum offensiones cauent, ne sibi noceant in his rebus, quibus licite boni adque innocenter utuntur, sed cupidius, quam oportebat eos, qui in hoc mundo peregrinantur et spem supernae patriae prae se gerunt.

Non solum quippe infirmiores, uitam ducentes coniugalem, filios habentes uel habere quaerentes, domos ac familias possidentes, quos apostolus in ecclesiis adloquitur docens et monens quem ad modum uiuere debeant et uxores (cum maritis et mariti cum uxoribus, et filii cum parentibus et parentes cum filiis, et serui cum dominis et domini cum seruis) multa temporalia, multa terrena libenter adipiscuntur et moleste amittunt, propter quae non audent offendere homines, quorum sibi uita contaminatissima et consceleratissima displicet; uerum etiam hi, qui superiorem uitae gradum tenent nec coniugalibus uinculis inretiti sunt et uictu, paruo ac tegimento utuntur, plerumque, suae famae ac saluti dum insidias adque impetus malorum timent, ab eorum reprehensione sese abstinent, et quamuis non in tantum eos metuant, ut ad similia perpetranda quibuslibet eorum terroribus adque inprobitatibus cedant, ea ipsa tamen, quae cum eis non perpetrant, nolunt plerumque corripere, cum fortasse possint aliquos corripiendo corrigere, ne, si non potuerint, sua salus ac fama in periculum exitiumque perueniat, nec ea consideratione, qua suam famam ac salutem uident esse necessariam utilitati erudiendorum hominum, sed ea potius infirmitate, qua delectat lingua blandiens et humanus dies et reformidatur uulgi iudicium et carnis excruciatio

ENGLISH

Someone may refrain from rebuking and reproving wrongdoers because he is looking for a more suitable time. Or he may fear for those very people, that they will be made worse by it. Or he may fear that they will hinder others who are weak and need to be taught a good and godly life, that they will oppress them and turn them away from the faith. In such cases this seems to be not an occasion for craving but a counsel of love. What is blameworthy is this. There are people who live differently and shrink from the deeds of the wicked, yet they spare other people's sins, which they ought to teach them to abandon or ought to rebuke. They do so while guarding against giving offense, so that they may not be harmed in those things that the good use lawfully and innocently. But they use them more greedily than befits those who are pilgrims in this world and openly bear the hope of a heavenly homeland.

This is true not only of the weaker ones. These lead married lives, have children or seek to have them, and possess houses and households. The apostle addresses them in the churches, teaching and warning them how they ought to live (wives with husbands and husbands with wives, children with parents and parents with children, slaves with masters and masters with slaves). Such people gladly acquire many temporal and many earthly things and are distressed to lose them, and for the sake of these they do not dare to offend people whose utterly polluted and wicked lives displease them;[12] it is also true of those who hold a higher rank of life. They are not entangled in the bonds of marriage and make do with little food and clothing. Yet very often they refrain from reproaching the wicked, because they fear their plots and attacks against their own reputation and safety. They do not fear them so much that they would yield to any of their threats and outrages and commit similar deeds. Still, they are often unwilling to reprove the very things they refuse to commit along with them, when perhaps they could correct some of them by reproving them. They hold back for fear that, if they should fail, their own safety and reputation would be brought into danger and ruin.

12 See Ephesians 5:22–6:9 and Colossians 3:18–4:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uel pereratio, hoc est propter quaedam cupiditatis uincula, non propter officia caritatis.	Nor do they hold back because they see that their reputation and safety are necessary for the benefit of those who need instruction. Rather they hold back from that weakness which delights in a flattering tongue and in human approval, and which dreads the judgment of the crowd and the torment or death of the flesh. That is, they hold back because of certain chains of craving, not because of the duties of love.
Non mihi itaque uidetur haec parua esse causa, quare cum malis flagellentur et boni, quando Deo placet perditos mores etiam temporalium poenarum adflictione punire. Flagellantur enim simul, non quia simul agunt malam uitam, sed quia simul amant temporalem uitam, non quidem aequaliter, sed tamen simul, quam boni contemnere deberent, ut illi correpti adque correcti consequerentur aeternam, ad quam consequendam si nollent esse socii, ferrentur et diligerentur inimici, quia donec uiuunt semper incertum est utrum uoluntatem sint in melius mutaturi. Qua in re non utique parem, sed longe grauiorem habent causam, quibus per prophetam dicitur: Ille quidem in suo peccato morietur, sanguinem autem eius de manu speculatoris requiram. Ad hoc enim speculatores, hoc est populorum praepositi, constituti sunt in ecclesiis, ut non parcant obiurgando peccata.	So it does not seem to me a small reason why the good are scourged along with the wicked, when it pleases God to punish depraved morals even by inflicting temporal penalties. For they are scourged together not because they lead an evil life together, but because together they love the temporal life. They do not love it equally, indeed, but still together. Yet the good ought to despise it, so that the others, once reproved and corrected, might attain eternal life. And if the wicked would not be their companions in attaining it, they should still be endured and loved as enemies, since as long as they live it is always uncertain whether they will change their will for the better. In this matter some have a cause that is not equal but far graver. These are the people to whom it is said through the prophet: "He shall indeed die in his sin, but his blood I will require at the watchman's hand." For watchmen, that is, those set over the people, are appointed in the churches precisely so that they will not refrain from rebuking sins.[13]
Nec ideo tamen ab huius modi culpa penitus alienus est, qui, licet praepositus non sit, in eis tamen, quibus uitae huius necessitate coniungitur, multa monenda uel arguenda nouit et neglegit, deuitans eorum offensiones propter illa quibus in hac uita non indebitis utitur, sed plus quam debuit delectatur. Deinde habent aliam causam boni, quare temporalibus adfligantur malis, qualem habuit Iob: ut sibi ipse humanus animus sit probatus et cognitus, quanta uirtute pietatis gratis Deum diligat.	Yet a person is not entirely free of this kind of fault either, even if he is not set over others. In those to whom the necessities of this life bind him, he may know of many things that call for warning or reproof, and still neglect them. He avoids giving them offense for the sake of things that he does not use wrongly in this life, but in which he takes more delight than he should. Then the good have another reason for being afflicted with temporal evils, the reason Job had. Through it the human mind is tested and comes to know itself, learning with how much godly virtue it loves God for nothing.[14]

13 Ezekiel 33:6.

14 In Job 1:9 Satan asks whether Job fears God "for nothing," and Job's sufferings put the question to the test.

THAT THE SAINTS LOSE NOTHING WHEN THEY LOSE TEMPORAL THINGS

Faithful Christians lost nothing that mattered; those who stored treasure in heaven kept it.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.10	Quibus recte consideratis adque perspectis adtende utrum aliquid mali acciderit fidelibus et piis, quod eis non in bonum uerteretur, nisi forte putandum est apostolicam illam uacare sententiam, ubi ait: Scimus quia diligentibus Deum omnia cooperatur in bonum. Amiserunt omnia quae habebant Numquid fidem? numquid pietatem? numquid interioris hominis bona, qui est ante Deum diues? Hae sunt opes Christianorum, quibus opulentus dicebat apostolus: Est autem quaestus magnus pietas cum sufficientia. Nihil enim intulimus in hunc mundum, sed nec auferre aliquid possumus. Habentes autem uictum et tegumentum his contenti sumus. Nam qui uolunt diuites fieri, incidunt in tentationem et laqueum et desideria multa stulta et noxia, quae mergunt homines in interitum et perditionem.	When these things have been rightly considered and examined, ask yourself whether anything evil has befallen the faithful and godly that was not turned to their good. Or perhaps we should think that the apostle's statement is empty, where he says: "We know that for those who love God all things work together for good." They lost everything they had. Did they lose their faith? Their godliness? The goods of the inner self, which is rich before God? These are the riches of Christians, and the apostle was wealthy in them when he said: "Godliness with sufficiency is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and we cannot take anything out of it either. Having food and clothing, we are content with these. For those who want to become rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge people into ruin and destruction.[15]
	Radix enim est omnium malorum auaritia, quam quidam adpetentes a fide pererrauerunt et inseruerunt se doloribus multis.	For the root of all evils is greed, and some who have craved it have wandered from the faith and thrust themselves into many sorrows."
	Quibus ergo terrenae diuitiae in illa uastatione perierunt, si eas sic habebant, quem ad modum ab isto foris paupere, intus diuite audierant, id est, si mundo utebantur tamquam non utentes, potuerunt dicere, quod ille grauiter tentatus et minime superatus: Nudus exiui de utero matris meae, nudus reuertar in terram. Dominus dedit, Dominus abstulit, sicut Domino placuit, ita factum est; sit nomen Domini benedictum; ut bonus seruus magnas facultates haberet ipsam sui Domini uoluntatem, cui pedisequus mente ditesceret, nec contristaretur eis rebus uiuens relictus, quas cito fuerat moriens relicturus. Illi autem infirmiores, qui terrenis his bonis, quamuis ea non praeponerent Christo, aliquantula tamen cupiditate cohaerebant, quantum haec amando peccauerint, perdendo senserunt. Tantum quippe doluerunt, quantum se doloribus inseruerant, sicut apostolum dixisse supra commemoraui.	Some lost their earthly riches in that devastation. If they had held those riches as they had heard from this man, poor outwardly and rich within, that is, if they used the world as though not using it, then they could say what was said by that man who was grievously tempted and by no means overcome: "Naked I came out of my mother's womb, naked I shall return to the earth. The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so it has been done; blessed be the name of the Lord." In this way, like a good servant, he would count the very will of his Lord as his great wealth, and by attending closely on that will he would grow rich in mind. Nor would he grieve that, while still alive, he had been left by the things he would soon have left at his death. But the weaker ones clung to these earthly goods with some small craving, though they did not prefer them to Christ. By losing those goods they discovered how much they had sinned by loving them. For they grieved exactly as much as they 15 Romans 8:28; 1 Timothy 6:6–10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	had thrust themselves into sorrows, as I recalled above that the apostle said.[16]
Oportebat enim ut eis adderetur etiam experimentorum disciplina, a quibus tam diu fuerat neglecta uerborum. Nam cum dixit apostolus: Qui uolunt diuites fieri, incidunt in tentationem et cetera, profecto in diuitiis cupiditatem reprehendit, non facultatem, quoniam praecepit alibi dicens: Praecipe diuitibus huius mundi non superbe sapere neque sperare in incerto diuitiarum, sed in Deo uiuo, qui praestat nobis omnia abundanter ad fruendum; bene faciant, diuites sint in operibus bonis, facile tribuant, communicent, thesaurizent sibi fundamentum bonum in futurum, ut adprehendant ueram uitam. Haec qui de suis diuitiis faciebant, magnis sunt lucris leuia damna solati plusque laetati ex his, quae facile tribuendo tutius seruauerunt, quam contristati ex his, quae timide retinendo facilius amiserunt. Hoc enim potuit in terra perire, quod piguit inde transferre.	For it was fitting that those who had so long neglected the teaching of words should also receive the teaching of experience. When the apostle said, "Those who want to become rich fall into temptation," and so on, he was clearly condemning the craving in riches, not the means themselves. For elsewhere he gave this instruction: "Instruct the rich of this world not to be haughty, nor to set their hope on the uncertainty of riches, but on the living God, who provides us everything abundantly to enjoy. Let them do good, be rich in good works, give readily, share, and store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may lay hold of true life." Those who did this with their riches were consoled for light losses by great gains. They rejoiced more over what they kept more safely by giving it readily than they grieved over what they lost more easily by timidly holding on to it. For what could perish on earth was what they had been reluctant to transfer from it.[17]
Nam qui receperunt consilium Domini sui dicentis: Nolite uobis condere thesauros in terra, ubi tinea et rubigo exterminant et ubi fures effodiunt et furantur; sed thesaurizate uobis thesaurum in caelo, quo fur non accedit neque tinea corrumpit; ubi enim est thesaurus tuus, illic erit et cor tuum, tribulationis tempore probauerunt quam recte sapuerint non contemnendo ueracissimum praeceptorem et thesauri sui fidelissimum inuictissimumque custodem. Nam si multi gauisi sunt ibi se habuisse diuitias suas, quo contigit ut hostis non accederet: quanto certius et securius gaudere potuerunt, qui monitu Dei sui illuc migrauerunt, quo accedere omnino non posset!	Some accepted the counsel of their Lord when he said: "Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy and where thieves dig through and steal; but store up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where no thief comes near and no moth corrupts; for where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." In the time of trouble they proved how wisely they had judged in not despising that most truthful teacher, the most faithful and invincible guardian of their treasure. For many rejoiced that they had kept their riches in a place the enemy happened not to reach. How much more surely and securely, then, could those rejoice who, at the warning of their God, had moved their riches to a place the enemy could not reach at all![18]

PAULINUS OF NOLA AND THE TRUE TREASURE

Paulinus of Nola, held by the invaders, prayed knowing his treasure was safe with God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Unde Paulinus noster, Nolensis episcopus, ex opulentissimo diuite uoluntate pauperrimus et	Hence our friend Paulinus, bishop of Nola, was once a man of the greatest wealth and became by 16 "Used the world as though not using it" echoes 1 Corinthians 7:31; Job's words are Job 1:21.

17 1 Timothy 6:17–19.

LATIN

copiosissime sanctus, quando et ipsam Nolam barbari uastauerunt, cum ab eis teneretur, sic in corde suo, ut ab eo postea cognouimus, precabatur: Domine, non excrucier propter aurum et argentum; ubi enim sint omnia mea, tu scis. Ibi enim habebat omnia sua, ubi eum condere et thesaurizare ille monstrauerat, qui haec mala mundo uentura praedixerat. Ac per hoc qui Domino suo monenti oboedierant, ubi et quo modo thesaurizare deberent, nec ipsas terrenas diuitias barbaris incursantibus amiserunt. Quos autem non oboedisse paenituit, quid de talibus rebus faciendum esset, si non praecedente sapientia, certe consequente experientia didicerunt.

At enim quidam boni etiam Christiani tormentis excruciati sunt, ut bona sua hostibus proderent. Illi uero nec prodere nec perdere potuerunt bonum, quo ipsi boni erant. Si autem torqueri quam mammona iniquitatis prodere maluerunt, boni non erant. Admonendi autem fuerant, qui tanta patiebantur pro auro, quanta essent sustinenda pro Christo, ut eum potius diligere discerent, qui pro se passos aeterna felicitate ditaret, non aurum et argentum, pro quo pati miserrimum fuit, seu mentiendo occultaretur, seu uerum dicendo proderetur. Namque inter tormenta nemo Christum contitendo amisit, nemo anrum nisi negando seruauit. Quocirca utiliora erant fortasse tormenta, quae bonum incorruptibile amandum docebant, quam illa bona, quae sine ullo utili fructu dominos sui amore torquebant.

Sed quidam etiam non habentes quod proderent, dum non creduntur, torti sunt. Et hi forte habere cupiebant nec sancta uoluntate pauperes erant; quibus demonstrandum fuit non facultates, sed ipsas cupiditates talibus dignas esse cruciatibus. Si uero uitae melioris proposito reconditum aurum argentumque non habebant, nescio quidem utrum cuiquam talium his own choice utterly poor and most richly holy. When the invaders laid waste to Nola itself and he was held captive by them, he prayed in his heart, as we later learned from him: "Lord, let me not be tortured for gold and silver; for you know where all that I have is." For he kept all that he had where he had been shown to store and treasure it by the one who had foretold that these evils would come upon the world. And so those who had obeyed their Lord when he warned them where and how they ought to store up treasure did not lose even their earthly riches when the invaders overran them. But those who regretted not having obeyed learned what should be done with such things. If wisdom did not teach them beforehand, experience at least taught them afterward.[19]

ENGLISH

But, it is objected, some good people, even Christians, were tortured to make them hand over their goods to the enemy. Those people, however, could neither hand over nor lose the good by which they themselves were good. If, on the other hand, they preferred being tortured to handing over the mammon of iniquity, they were not good. But those who suffered so much for gold needed to be warned how much they ought to endure for Christ. Then they might learn to love him instead, who enriches with eternal happiness those who suffer for him. They should not love gold and silver, for which it was utterly wretched to suffer, whether the gold was hidden by lying or handed over by telling the truth. For under torture no one lost Christ by confessing him, and no one kept his gold except by denying it. So perhaps the tortures, which taught them to love the incorruptible good, were more useful than those goods, which brought their owners no useful return and tortured them through their love of them.[20]

But some who had nothing to hand over were tortured because they were not believed. Perhaps these too longed to have wealth and were not poor by holy choice. To them it had to be shown that it is not possessions but cravings themselves that deserve such torments. Others had no hidden gold and silver because they had resolved to lead a bet-

18 Matthew 6:19–21.
19 Paulinus of Nola (c. AD 354–431), a wealthy Roman senator who gave away his fortune and became bishop of Nola in Campania. Alaric's Goths sacked Nola in AD 410.
20 "Mammon of iniquity" comes from Luke 16:9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
acciderit, ut dum habere creditur torqueretur: uerum tamen etiamsi accidit, profecto, qui inter illa tormenta paupertatem sanctam confitebatur, Christum confitebatur. Quapropter etsi non meruit ab hostibus credi, non potuit tamen sanctae paupertatis confessor sine caelesti mercede torqueri.	ter life. I do not know whether any such person actually happened to be tortured because he was believed to have it. Yet even if it happened, surely whoever confessed holy poverty amid those tortures was confessing Christ. Therefore, even if he did not succeed in being believed by the enemy, a confessor of holy poverty could not be tortured without a heavenly reward.
Multos, inquiunt, etiam Christianos fames diuturna uastauit. Hoc quoque in usus suos boni fideles pie tolerando uerterunt. Quos enim fames necauit, malis uitae huius, sicut corporis morbus, eripuit: quos autem non necauit, docuit parcius uiuere, docuit productius ieiunare.	"Many Christians too," they say, "were wasted away by prolonged famine." This too the good and faithful turned to their own benefit by bearing it devoutly. Those whom famine killed, it snatched from the evils of this life, as a bodily illness does. Those whom it did not kill, it taught to live more sparingly and taught to fast for longer.

THE END OF TEMPORAL LIFE, WHETHER LONGER OR SHORTER

Death comes to everyone; what matters is not how one dies but where one goes.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.11 Sed enim multi etiam Christiani interfecti sunt, multi multarum mortium foeda uarietate consumti. Hoc si aegre ferendum est, omnibus, qui in hanc uitam procreati sunt, utique commune est. Hoc scio, neminem fuisse mortuum, qui non fuerat aliquando moriturus. Finis autem uitae tam longam quam breuem uitam hoc idem facit. Neque enim aliud melius et aliud deterius, aut aliud maius et aliud breuius est, quod iam pariter non est. Quid autem interest, quo mortis genere uita ista finiatur, quando ille, cui finitur, iterum mori non cogitur? Cum autem unicuique mortalium sub cottidianis uitae huius casibus innumerabiles mortes quodam modo comminentur, quamdiu incertum est quaenam earum uentura sit, quaero utrum satius sit unam perpeti moriendo an omnes timere uiuendo.	But, it is objected, many Christians were also killed, and many were destroyed by a hideous variety of many kinds of death. If this is hard to bear, it is certainly common to all who have been brought into this life. This I know: no one has died who was not going to die at some time. And the end of life makes a long life and a short one the same. For one is not better and another worse, or one greater and another shorter, when both alike no longer exist. What difference does it make by what kind of death this life is ended, when the one whose life is ended is not forced to die again? Countless deaths in a sense threaten every mortal amid the daily hazards of this life, and it is uncertain which of them will come. So I ask whether it is better to suffer one by dying or to fear them all by living.
Nec ignoro quam citius eligatur diu uiuere sub timore tot mortium quam semel moriendo nullam deinceps formidare. Sed aliud est quod carnis sensus infirmiter pauidus refugit, aliud quod mentis ratio diligenter enucleata conuincit. Mala mors putanda non est, quam bona uita praecesserit. Neque enim facit malam mortem, nisi quod sequitur mortem. Non itaque multum curandum est eis, qui necessario morituri sunt, quid accidat ut moriantur, sed moriendo quo ire cogantur. Cum igitur Christiani nouerint longe meliorem fuisse religiosi pauperis mortem inter lingentium canum linguas quam inpii diuitis in purpura et bysso, horrenda	I am well aware how much more readily people choose to live long under the fear of so many deaths than to die once and fear none thereafter. But the senses of the flesh, weak and timid, recoil from one thing, and the reason of the mind, carefully worked out, proves another. A death that a good life has preceded should not be thought bad. For nothing makes death bad except what follows death. Those who must die in any case need not care much about what happens to make them die. They should care where they will be forced to go

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	illa genera mortium quid mortuis obfuerunt, qui bene uixerunt?	by dying. Christians know that the death of the godly poor man among the licking tongues of the dogs was far better than that of the ungodly rich man in purple and fine linen. What harm, then, did those horrible kinds of death do to the dead who had lived well?[21]

THE BURIAL OF HUMAN BODIES: BEING DENIED IT TAKES NOTHING FROM CHRISTIANS

Lack of burial cannot harm the dead, whose bodies God will raise.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.12	At enim in tanta strage cadauerum nec sepeliri potuerunt. Neque istud pia fides nimium reformidat, tenens praedictum nec absumentes bestias resurrecturis corporibus obfuturas, quorum capillus capitis non peribit. Nullo modo diceret ueritas: Nolite timere eos, qui corpus occidunt, animam autem non possunt occidere, si quicquam obesset futurae uitae, quidquid inimici de corporibus occisorum facere uoluissent. Nisi forte quispiam sic absurdus est, ut contendat eos, qui corpus occidunt, non debere timeri ante mortem, ne corpus occidant, et timeri debere post mortem, ne corpus occisum sepeliri non sinant. Falsum est ergo quod ait: Qui corpus occidunt, et postea non habent quid faciant, si habent tanta, quae de cadaueribus faciant. Absit, ut falsum sit quod ueritas dixit.	But, it is objected, there was such a slaughter, with corpses everywhere, that the dead could not even be buried. Godly faith does not greatly dread this either. It holds to the promise that not even the beasts that devour them will harm bodies that are to rise again, bodies of which not a hair of the head shall perish. The Truth would in no way say, "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul," if anything that enemies chose to do with the bodies of the slain could harm the life to come. Perhaps someone is so absurd as to argue the following: that those who kill the body should not be feared before death, lest they kill the body, but should be feared after death, lest they refuse to let the slain body be buried. If so, what he says would be false: "Those who kill the body, and afterward have nothing more they can do." That would be false if they have so much they can do to corpses. Far be it that what the Truth has said should be false.[22]
	Dictum est enim aliquid eos facere cum occidunt, quia in corpore sensus est occidendo; postea uero nihil habere quod faciant, quia nullus sensus est in corpore occiso. Multa itaque corpora Christianorum terra non texit, sed nullum eorum quisquam a caelo et terra separauit, quam totam inplet praesentia sui, qui nouit unde resuscitet quod creauit. Dicitur quidem in psalmo: Posuerunt mortalia seruorum tuorum escas uolatilibus caeli, carnes sanctorum tuorum bestiis terrae; effuderunt sanguinem eorum sicut aquam in circuitu Hierusalem, et non erat qui sepeliret, sed magis ad exaggerandam crudelitatem eorum, qui ista fecerunt, non ad eorum infelicitatem, qui ista perpessi sunt. Quamuis enim haec in conspectu hominum dura et dira uideantur, sed pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum eius.	For it is said that they do something when they kill, because while they are killing there is feeling in the body. Afterward they have nothing they can do, because there is no feeling in a slain body. So the earth did not cover many Christian bodies. But no one separated any of them from heaven and earth. These he fills entirely with his presence, and he knows from where to raise again what he created. It is said, indeed, in a psalm: "They have given the dead bodies of your servants as food to the birds of the sky, the flesh of your saints to the beasts of the earth; they have poured out their blood like water around Jerusalem, and there was no one to bury them." But this was said rather to magnify the cruelty of those who did these things, 21 The parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke 16:19–31.

22 Luke 21:18; Matthew 10:28; Luke 12:4. "The Truth" is Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	not to show the misfortune of those who suffered them. For although these things seem harsh and dreadful in the sight of human beings, still "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."[23]
Proinde ista omnia, curatio funeris, conditio sepulturae, pompa exsequiarum, magis sunt uiuorum solacia quam subsidia mortuorum. Si aliquid prodest inpio sepultura pretiosa, oberit pio, uilis aut nulla. Praeclaras exequias in conspectu hominum exhibuit purpurato illi diuiti turba famulorum, sed multo clariores in conspectu Domini ulceroso illi pauperi ministerium praebuit angelorum, qui eum non extulerunt in marmoreum tumulum, sed in Abrahae gremium sustulerunt.	Therefore all these things are more a consolation for the living than a help to the dead: the care of the funeral, the manner of burial and the pomp of the procession. If a costly burial does the ungodly any good, then a cheap one or none at all will harm the godly. A crowd of servants provided a splendid funeral in the sight of human beings for that rich man dressed in purple. But the ministry of angels provided a far more glorious one in the sight of the Lord for that poor man covered with sores. They did not carry him out to a marble tomb, but bore him up into Abraham's bosom.
Rident haec illi, contra quos defendendam suscepimus ciuitatem Dei. Verum tamen sepulturae curam etiam eorum philosophi contemserunt. Et saepe uniuersi exercitus, dum pro terrena patria morerentur, ubi postea iacerent uel quibus bestiis esca fierent, non curarunt, licuitque de hac re poetis plausibiliter dicere: Caelo tegitur, qui non habet urnam. Quanto minus debent de corporibus insepultis insultare Christianis, quibus et ipsius carnis membrorumque omnium reformatio non solum ex terra, uerum etiam ex aliorum elementorum secretissimo sinu, quo dilapsa cadauera recesserunt, in temporis puncto reddenda et redintegranda promittitur.	Those against whom we have undertaken to defend the city of God laugh at these things. Yet even their own philosophers have scorned concern for burial. And often whole armies, while dying for their earthly fatherland, did not care where they would lie afterward or what beasts they would become food for. Poets have been free to say on this subject, to applause: "He who has no urn is covered by the sky." How much less, then, ought they to mock Christians over unburied bodies! Christians are promised that their very flesh and all their limbs will be restored and made whole again in an instant. This will happen not only from the earth but also from the most hidden recesses of the other elements, into which decaying corpses have withdrawn.[24]

THE REASON FOR BURYING THE BODIES OF THE SAINTS

Bodies of the righteous still deserve care, as Scripture's examples of burial show.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.13 Nec ideo tamen contemnenda et abicienda sunt corpora defunctorum maximeque iustorum adque fidelium, quibus tamquam organis et uasis ad omnia bona opera sancte usus est Spiritus. Si enim paterna uestis et anulus, ac si quid huius modi, tanto carius est posteris, quanto erga parentes maior adfectus: nullo modo ipsa spernenda sunt corpora, quae utique multo familiarius adque coniunctius quam quaelibet indumenta, gestamus. Haec	This does not mean, however, that the bodies of the dead are to be scorned and cast aside, least of all the bodies of the righteous and faithful, which the Spirit used in holiness as instruments and vessels for every good work. A father's clothes and ring, or anything of that kind, are dearer to his descendants the greater their affection for their parents. If so, then the bodies themselves are by 23 Psalm 78:2–3 (79:2–3 in most English Bibles); Psalm 115:15 (116:15 in most English Bibles).

24 Lucan, Civil War 7.819.

LATIN

enim non ad ornamentum uel adiutorium, quod adhibetur extrinsecus, sed ad ipsam naturam hominis pertinent. Unde et antiquorum iustorum funera officiosa pietate curata sunt et exsequiae celebratae et sepultura prouisa, ipsique cum uiuerent de sepeliendis uel etiam transferendis suis corporibus filiis mandauerunt, et Tobias sepeliendo mortuos Deum promeruisse teste angelo commendatur.

ENGLISH

no means to be spurned, since we wear them far more intimately and closely than any clothing. For bodies are not an ornament or an aid applied from outside. They belong to human nature itself. That is why, in ancient times, the funerals of the righteous were attended to with dutiful devotion, their funeral rites were celebrated and their burial was provided for. While they were still alive, they themselves gave their sons instructions about burying their bodies, or even about moving them. And Tobit is commended, on the testimony of an angel, for having won God's favor by burying the dead.[25]

Ipse quoque Dominus die tertio resurrecturus religiosae mulieris bonum opus praedicat praedicandumque commendat, quod unguentum pretiosum super membra eius effuderit adque hoc ad eum sepeliendum fecerit. Et laudabiliter commemorantur in euangelio qui corpus eius de cruce acceptum diligenter adque honorifice tegendum sepeliendumque curarunt. Verum istae auctoritates non hoc admonent, quod insit ullus cadaueribus sensus, sed ad Dei prouidentiam, cui placent etiam talia pietatis officia, corpora quoque mortuorum pertinere significant propter fidem resurrectionis adstruendam. Ubi et illud salubriter discitur, quanta possit esse remuneratio pro elemosynis, quas uiuentibus et sentientibus exhibemus, si neque hoc aput Deum perit, quod exanimis hominum membris officii diligentiaeque persoluitur.

The Lord himself, too, who was to rise on the third day, proclaims the good work of a devout woman and directs that it be proclaimed, because she poured precious ointment over his limbs and did this for his burial. And the Gospel mentions with praise those who took his body down from the cross and saw to it that it was carefully and honorably wrapped and buried. These authorities, however, do not teach that corpses have any feeling. Rather, they show that the bodies of the dead also fall within the providence of God, who is pleased even by such acts of devotion, and they do so to support faith in the resurrection. Here we also learn a wholesome lesson: how great the reward can be for the alms we give to those who are alive and can feel, if even what we render in duty and care to the lifeless limbs of human beings is not lost in God's sight.[26]

Sunt quidem et alia, quae sancti patriarchae de corporibus suis uel condendis uel transferendis prophetico spiritu dicta intellegi uoluerunt; non autem hic locus est, ut ea pertractemus, cum sufficiant ista, quae diximus. Sed si ea, quae sustentandis uiuentibus sunt necessaria, sicut uictus et amictus, quamuis cum graui adflictione desint, non frangunt in bonis perferendi tolerandique uirtutem nec eradicant ex animo pietatem, sed exercitatam faciunt fecundiorem: quanto magis, cum desunt ea, quae curandis funeribus condendisque corporibus defunctorum adhiberi solent, non efficiunt miseros in occultis piorum sedibus iam quietos! Ac per hoc quando ista cadaueribus Christianorum in illa magnae urbis uel etiam aliorum oppidorum uastatione

There are also other things that the holy patriarchs said about the burial or removal of their bodies, which they wanted to be understood as spoken by the prophetic spirit. But this is not the place to treat them at length, since what we have said is enough. Consider this, though. When the things needed to sustain the living, such as food and clothing, are lacking, even with severe hardship, they do not break the virtue of endurance and patience in good people, nor do they root devotion out of their souls. Instead, they exercise it and make it more fruitful. How much less, then, when the things customarily provided for funerals and for burying the bodies of the dead are lacking, 25 Jacob and Joseph gave such instructions about their bodies (Genesis 47:29–30; 50:25). Tobit, called Tobias in Augustine's Latin Bible, is praised by the angel Raphael in Tobit 12:12–13.

26 The woman's anointing is told in Matthew 26:6–13 and Mark 14:3–9. Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus buried Jesus (John 19:38–42).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	defuerunt, nec uiuorum culpa est, qui non potuerunt ista praebere, nec poena mortuorum, qui non possunt ista sentire.	do they make wretched those who are already at rest in the hidden dwellings of the godly! And so, when these things were lacking for the corpses of Christians in the devastation of that great city, or of other towns as well, it is neither the fault of the living, who could not provide them, nor a punishment for the dead, who cannot feel them.

THE CAPTIVITY OF THE SAINTS, WHO NEVER LACKED DIVINE CONSOLATION

Captives, like Daniel and Jonah, were never without God's comfort.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.14	Sed multi, inquiunt, Christiani etiam captiui ducti sunt. Hoc sane miserrimum est, si aliquo duci potuerunt, ubi Deum suum non inuenerunt. Sunt in scripturis sanctis huius etiam cladis magna solacia. Fuerunt in captiuitate tres pueri, fuit Daniel, fuerunt alii prophetae; nec Deus defuit consolator. Sic ergo non deseruit fideles suos sub dominatione gentis, licet barbarae, tamen humanae, qui prophetam non deseruit nec in uisceribus beluae. Haec quoque illi, cum quibus agimus, malunt inridere quam credere, qui tamen suis litteris credunt Arionem Methymnaeum, nobilissimum citharistam, cum esset deiectus e naui, exceptum delphini dorso et ad terras esse peruectum. Verum illud nostrum de Iona propheta incredibilius est. Plane incredibilius quia mirabilius, et mirabilius quia potentius.	"But many Christians," they say, "were even led away as captives." That would indeed be the most wretched thing of all, if they could have been led anywhere where they did not find their God. The holy Scriptures offer great consolations for this disaster too. The three young men were in captivity, Daniel was in captivity, other prophets were in captivity, and God did not fail them as a comforter. So he who did not abandon his prophet even in the belly of a sea monster did not abandon his faithful under the rule of a people that was foreign, yes, but still human. These things, too, the people we are arguing with prefer to mock rather than believe. Yet they believe their own literature when it says that Arion of Methymna, a most renowned lyre player, was thrown overboard from a ship, caught on a dolphin's back and carried to land. Granted, our story about the prophet Jonah is more incredible. Plainly more incredible, because more wonderful; and more wonderful, because it shows greater power.[27]

REGULUS, AN EXAMPLE OF CAPTIVITY ENDURED EVEN WILLINGLY FOR RELIGION, WHICH STILL COULD NOT PROFIT HIM BECAUSE HE WORSHIPED THE GODS

Regulus kept his oath to the gods and was tortured to death, so the gods give no earthly safety.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.15	Habent tamen isti de captiuitate religionis causa etiam sponte toleranda et in suis praeclaris uiris nobilissimum exemplum. M. Regulus, imperator populi Romani, captiuus aput Carthaginienses fuit. Qui cum sibi mallent a Romanis suos reddi quam eorum tenere captiuos, ad hoc inpetrandum etiam istum praecipue Regulum cum legatis suis Romam miserunt, prius iuratione constrictum, si	Yet these people have, among their own illustrious men, a most famous example of captivity endured for religion's sake, and endured voluntarily. Marcus Regulus, a general of the Roman people, was a captive among the Carthaginians. The Carthaginians preferred to have their own men returned by the Romans rather than to keep Roman captives.

27 The three young men are Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego (Daniel 3). Arion of Methymna, on Lesbos, was a legendary singer whose rescue by a dolphin is told by Herodotus (1.23–24).

LATIN	ENGLISH
quod uolebant minime peregisset, rediturum esse Carthaginem. Perrexit ille adque in senatu contraria persuasit, quoniam non arbitrabatur utile esse Romanae rei publicae mutare captiuos. Nec post hanc persuasionem a suis ad hostes redire conpulsus est, sed quia iurauerat, id sponte conpleuit. At illi eum excogitatis adque horrendis cruciatibus necauerunt.	To obtain this, they sent Regulus in particular to Rome with their envoys, having first bound him by oath to return to Carthage if he failed to accomplish what they wanted. He went, and in the senate he argued for the opposite, since he did not think an exchange of prisoners was in the interest of the Roman commonwealth. After he had won his case, his own people did not force him to return to the enemy; but because he had sworn, he did so of his own accord. And the Carthaginians put him to death with elaborately devised and horrifying tortures.[28]
Inclusum quippe angusto ligno, ubi stare cogeretur, clauisque acutissimis undique confixo, ut se in nullam eius partem sine poenis atrocissimis inclinaret, etiam uigilando peremerunt. Merito certe laudant uirtutem tam magna infelicitate maiorem. Et per deos ille iurauerat, quorum cultu prohibito has generi humano clades isti opinantur infligi. Qui ergo propterea colebantur, ut istam uitam prosperam redderent, si uerum iuranti has inrogari poenas seu uoluerunt seu permiserunt, quid periuro grauius irati facere potuerunt? Sed quur non ratiocinationem meam potius ad utrumque concludam? Deos certe ille sic coluit, ut propter iuris iurandi fidem nec maneret in patria, nec inde quolibet ire, sed ad suos acerrimos inimicos redire minime dubitaret. Hoc si huic uitae utile existimabat, cuius tam horrendum exitum meruit, procul dubio fallebatur.	They shut him in a narrow wooden box where he was forced to stand, studded on every side with very sharp nails, so that he could not lean against any part of it without the most excruciating pain. They killed him by keeping him from sleep as well. The pagans are certainly right to praise a virtue that was greater than such great misfortune. And he had sworn by the gods—the very gods whose worship, now forbidden, is in these people's view the reason why these disasters are being inflicted on the human race. These gods were worshiped precisely so that they would make this life prosperous. So if they either willed or allowed these punishments to be inflicted on a man who kept his oath, what worse could they have done in their anger to a perjurer? But why should I not rather frame my argument so that it covers both alternatives? He certainly worshiped the gods in such a way that, to keep faith with his oath, he would neither remain in his homeland nor go from there anywhere else he liked, but did not hesitate in the least to return to his bitterest enemies. If he thought this was of benefit for this present life, he was undoubtedly mistaken, since the end of that life he earned was so horrifying.
Suo quippe docuit exemplo nihil deos ad istam temporalem felicitatem suis prodesse cultoribus, quando quidem ille eorum deditus cultui et uictus et captiuus abductus et, quia noluit aliter quam per eos iurauerat facere, nouo ac prius inaudito nimiumque horribili supplicii genere cruciatus extinctus est. Si autem deorum cultus post hanc uitam uelut mercedem reddit felicitatem, quur calumniantur temporibus Christianis, ideo dicentes Urbi accidisse illam calamitatem, quia deos suos colere destitit, cum potuerit etiam illos	For he taught by his own example that the gods are of no use to their worshipers for this temporal happiness. Devoted as he was to their worship, he was defeated and carried off as a captive. And because he refused to act otherwise than as he had sworn by them, he was tortured to death by a new, previously unheard-of and utterly horrifying kind of punishment. But if the worship of the gods bestows happiness after this life as a kind of reward, 28 Marcus Atilius Regulus, a Roman consul, was captured by the Carthaginians in 255 BC during the First Punic War. His return to Carthage was a celebrated example of Roman good faith.

LATIN

diligentissime colens tam infelix fieri, quam ille Regulus fuit?

Nisi forte contra clarissimam ueritatem tanta quisquam dementia mirae caecitatis obnititur, ut contendere audeat uniuersam ciuitatem deos colentem infelicem esse non posse, unum uero hominem posse, quod uidelicet potentia deorum suorum multos potius sit idonea conseruare quam singulos, cum multitudo constet ex singulis.

Si autem dicunt M. Regulum etiam in illa captiuitate illisque cruciatibus corporis animi uirtute beatum esse potuisse, uirtus potius uera quaeratur, qua beata esse possit et ciuitas. Neque enim aliunde beata ciuitas, aliunde homo, cum aliud ciuitas non sit quam concors hominum multitudo. Quam ob rem nondum interim disputo, qualis in Regulo uirtus fuerit: sufficit nunc, quod isto nobilissimo exemplo coguntur fateri non propter corporis bona uel earum rerum, quae extrinsecus homini accidunt, colendos deos, quando quidem ille carere his omnibus maluit quam deos per quos iurauit offendere. Sed quid faciamus hominibus, qui gloriantur se talem habuisse ciuem, qualem timent habere ciuitatem?

Quod si non timent, tale ergo aliquid, quale accidit Regulo, etiam ciuitati tam diligenter quam ille deos colenti accidere potuisse fateantur et Christianis temporibus non calumnientur. Verum quia de illis Christianis orta quaestio est, qui etiam captiuati sunt, hoc intueantur et taceant, qui saluberrimae religioni hinc inpudenter adque inprudenter inludunt, quia, si dis eorum probro non fuit, quod adtentissimus cultor illorum, dum eis iuris iurandi fidem seruaret, patria caruit, cum aliam non haberet, captiuusque aput hostes per longam mortem supplicio nouae crudelitatis occisus est, multo minus nomen criminandum est Christianum in captiuitate sacratorum suorum, qui supernam patriam ueraci fide expectantes etiam in suis sedibus peregrinos se esse nouerunt.

ENGLISH

why do they slander Christian times? Why do they say that this calamity befell the City because it stopped worshiping its gods, when even if it had worshiped them most diligently it could have become as unhappy as Regulus was?

Unless perhaps someone is so insane, so remarkably blind, as to struggle against the clearest truth and dare to argue that a whole city that worships the gods cannot be unhappy, while a single man can—on the grounds, no doubt, that the power of their gods is better suited to preserving many people than individuals, even though a multitude is made up of individuals.

But suppose they say that Marcus Regulus, even in that captivity and in those bodily torments, could have been happy through the virtue of his soul. Then let us rather look for true virtue, the kind by which a city, too, can be happy. For a city does not become happy from one source and a human being from another, since a city is nothing other than a harmonious multitude of human beings. For the present, then, I am not yet discussing what kind of virtue Regulus had. It is enough for now that this most famous example forces them to admit that the gods are not to be worshiped for the sake of bodily goods, or of the things that happen to a person from outside, since he preferred to go without all of them rather than offend the gods by whom he had sworn. But what are we to do with people who boast of having had such a citizen, yet fear having such a city?

And if they do not fear it, let them admit that something like what happened to Regulus could also have happened to a city that worshiped the gods as diligently as he did, and let them stop slandering Christian times. But since the question arose about those Christians who were also taken captive, let those who shamelessly and senselessly mock the most saving religion on this account look at this example and be silent. Their most devoted worshiper, while keeping faith with his oath to the gods, lost his homeland, having no other, and as a captive among the enemy was put to death slowly, by a punishment of novel cruelty. If that brought no disgrace on their gods, then far less should the Christian name be accused because of the captivity of those consecrated to it. For they await their homeland on high with true faith, and know that even in their own homes they are pilgrims.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

WHETHER THE RAPES THAT CAPTIVITY MAY HAVE INFLICTED, EVEN ON CONSECRATED VIRGINS, COULD DEFILE THE VIRTUE OF THE MIND WITHOUT THE WILL'S CONSENT

Rape of Christian women, even consecrated virgins, cannot defile a mind that does not consent.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.16	Magnum sane crimen se putant obicere Christianis, cum eorum exaggerantes captiuitatem addunt etiam stupra commissa, non solum in aliena matrimonia uirginesque nupturas, sed etiam in quasdam sanctimoniales. Hic uero non fides, non pietas, non ipsa uirtus, quae castitas dicitur, sed nostra potius disputatio inter pudorem adque rationem quibusdam coartatur angustiis. Nec tantum hic curamus alienis responsionem reddere, quantum ipsis nostris consolationem. Sit igitur in primis positum adque firmatum uirtutem, qua recte uiuitur, ab animi sede membris corporis imperare sanctumque corpus usu fieri sanctae uoluntatis, qua inconcussa ac stabili permanente, quidquid alius de corpore uel in corpore fecerit, quod sine peccato proprio non ualeat euitari, praeter culpam esse patientis.	They certainly think they are leveling a serious charge against Christians when, exaggerating their captivity, they add that rapes were committed too—not only against other men's wives and girls about to be married, but even against some women consecrated to God. Here it is not faith, not devotion, not the virtue called chastity itself that is hemmed in; rather, it is our discussion that is squeezed into a narrow space between modesty and reason. And here our concern is not so much to give an answer to outsiders as to give consolation to our own. Let this, then, be laid down and established first of all: the virtue by which we live rightly commands the members of the body from its seat in the soul, and the body is made holy by being used by a holy will. As long as that will remains unshaken and steadfast, whatever someone else does with the body or in the body, if it cannot be avoided without sin on one's own part, involves no guilt on the part of the one who suffers it.
	Sed quia non solum quod ad dolorem, uerum etiam quod ad libidinem pertinet, in corpore alieno perpetrari potest: quidquid tale factum fuerit, etsi retentam constantissimo animo pudicitiam non excutit, tamen pudorem incutit, ne credatur factum cum mentis etiam uoluntate, quod fieri fortasse sine carnis aliqua uoluptate non potuit.	But not only acts that cause pain but also acts of lust can be perpetrated on another person's body. So when something of this kind is done, it may not drive out chastity, held fast by a most constant mind, but it does drive in shame—shame that people may believe that what perhaps could not happen without some pleasure of the flesh was also done with the consent of the mind.

SUICIDE OUT OF FEAR OF PUNISHMENT OR DISGRACE

Suicide to escape rape or disgrace is murder, since no one may kill an innocent person.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.17	Ac per hoc et quae se occiderunt, ne quidquam huius modi paterentur, quis humanus adfectus eis nolit ignosci et quae se occidere noluerunt, ne suo facinore alienum flagitium deuitarent, quisquis hoc crimini dederit, ipse crimen insipientiae non cauebit. Nam utique si non licet priuata potestate hominem occidere uel nocentem, cuius occidendi licentiam lex nulla concedit, profecto etiam qui se ipsum occidit homicida est, et tanto fit nocentior cum	And so, as for the women who killed themselves to avoid suffering anything of this kind, what human feeling would refuse to forgive them? And as for those who refused to kill themselves, so as not to escape another's wicked deed by a crime of their own, whoever counts this as a crime will not escape the crime of foolishness himself. For certainly, if it is not lawful to kill a human being on se occiderit, quanto innocentior in ea causa fuit, qua se occidendum putauit.	one's own private authority, even a guilty one, since no law grants a license to kill him, then surely someone who kills himself is also a murderer. And the more innocent he was in the matter for which he thought he should be killed, the guiltier he becomes in killing himself.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Nam si Iudae factum merito detestamur eumque ueritas iudicat, cum se laqueo suspendit, sceleratae illius traditionis auxisse potius quam expiasse commissum, quoniam Dei misericordiam desperando exitiabiliter paenitens nullum sibi salubris paenitentiae locum reliquit: quanto magis a sua nece se abstinere debet, qui tali supplicio quod in se puniat non habet. Iudas enim cum se occidit, sceleratum hominem occidit, et tamen non solum Christi., uerum etiam suae mortis reus finiuit hanc uitam, quia licet propter suum scelus alio suo scelere occisus est. Quur autem homo, qui mali nihil fecit, sibi malefaciat et se ipsum interficiendo hominem interficiat innocentem, ne alium patiatur nocentem, adque in se perpetret peccatum proprium, ne in eo perpetretur alienum?	We rightly detest what Judas did, and the truth judges that when he hanged himself with a noose he increased rather than expiated the guilt of that wicked betrayal. For in despairing of God's mercy he repented in a deadly way and left himself no room for a saving repentance. How much more, then, ought someone to refrain from killing himself who has nothing in himself to punish by such a penalty! For when Judas killed himself, he killed a wicked man; and yet he ended this life guilty not only of Christ's death but of his own, because, though he was killed on account of his crime, he was killed by another crime of his own. But why should a person who has done nothing wrong do wrong to himself? Why should he, by killing himself, kill an innocent human being so as not to suffer a guilty one, and commit a sin of his own against himself so that another's sin is not committed against him?

THE VIOLENT LUST OF ANOTHER, WHICH THE MIND SUFFERS UNWILLINGLY IN A BODY OVERPOWERED

Chastity is a virtue of the soul and is not lost when the body is overpowered.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.18	At enim, ne uel aliena polluat libido, metuitur. Non polluet, si aliena erit; si autem polluet, aliena non erit. Sed cum pudicitia uirtus sit animi comitemque habeat fortitudinem, qua potius quaelibet mala tolerare quam malo consentire decernit, nullus autem magnanimus et pudicus in potestate habeat, quid de sua carne fiat, sed tantum quid adnuat mente uel renuat: quis eadem sana mente putauerit perdere se pudicitiam, si forte in adprehensa et oppressa carne sua exerceatur et expleatur libido non sua? Si enim hoc modo pudicitia perit, profecto pudicitia uirtus animi non erit, nec pertinebit ad ea bona, quibus bene uiuitur, sed in bonis corporis numerabitur, qualia sunt uires pulchritudo saneualetudo, ac si quid huius modi est; quae bona, etiamsi minuantur, bonam iustamque uitam omnino non minuunt.	But, they say, the fear is that even another's lust may defile. It will not defile if it is another's; and if it does defile, it will not be another's. Chastity is a virtue of the soul, and it has as its companion courage, by which it resolves to endure any evil rather than consent to evil. Yet no one, however great-souled and chaste, has control over what is done to their flesh, but only over what they assent to or refuse in their mind. Given this, who in their right mind would think they lose their chastity if, perhaps, a lust not their own is exercised and satisfied on their flesh after it has been seized and overpowered? For if chastity is lost in this way, then chastity will certainly not be a virtue of the soul, nor will it belong among the goods by which we live well. It will be counted among the goods of the body, such as strength, beauty, sound health and anything of that kind—goods which, even if they are diminished, do not diminish a good and righteous life at all.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quod si tale aliquid est pudicitia, ut quid pro illa, ne amittatur, etiam periculo corporis laboratur? Si autem animi bonum est, etiam obpresso corpore non amittitur. Quin etiam sanctae continentiae bonum cum inmunditiae carnalium concupiscentiarum non cedit, et ipsum corpus sanctificatur, et ideo, cum eis non cedere inconcussa intentione persistit, nec de ipso corpore perit sanctitas, quia eo sancte utendi perseuerat uoluntas et, quantum est in ipso, etiam facultas.

If chastity is something of that sort, why do people struggle to keep from losing it even at the risk of their bodies? But if it is a good of the soul, it is not lost even when the body is overpowered. Indeed, when the good of holy continence refuses to yield to the uncleanness of carnal desires, the body itself is also made holy. And so, as long as continence persists with unshaken resolve in not yielding to them, holiness is not lost even from the body, because the will to use the body in holiness persists—and, as far as lies within its power, the ability as well.

Neque enim eo corpus sanctum est, quod eius membra sunt integra, aut eo, quod nullo contrectantur adtactu, cum possint diuersis casibus etiam uulnerata uim perpeti, et medici aliquando saluti opitulantes haec ibi faciant, quae horret aspectus. Obstetrix uirginis cuiusdam integritatem manu uelut explorans siue maleuolentia siue inscitia siue casu, dum inspicit, perdidit. Non opinor quemquam tam stulte sapere, ut huic perisse aliquid existimet etiam de ipsius corporis sanctitate, quamuis membri illius integritate iam perdita. Quocirca proposito animi permanente, per quod etiam corpus sanctificari meruit, nec ipsi corpori aufert sanctitatem uiolentia libidinis alienae, quam seruat perseuerantia continentiae suae.

For a body is not holy because its members are intact, or because they are untouched by any hand. Bodies can suffer violence through various accidents, even being wounded, and doctors working to restore health sometimes do things there that are horrible to see. A midwife examining a certain girl's virginity by hand destroyed it in the course of the examination, whether out of malice, ignorance or accident. I do not suppose anyone is so foolish in their thinking as to believe that this girl lost anything of the holiness even of her body, although the intactness of that part of her body was now lost. Therefore, as long as the soul's resolve remains, through which the body too was made worthy of being sanctified, the violence of another's lust does not take away holiness from the body itself, since perseverance in its own continence preserves it.

An uero si aliqua femina mente corrupta uiolatoque proposito, quod Deo uouerat, pergat uitianda ad deceptorem suum, ad hoc eam pergentem sanctam uel corpore dicimus, ea sanctitate animi, per quam corpus sanctificabatur, amissa adque destructa? Absit hic error et hinc potius admoneamur ita non amitti corporis sanctitatem manente animi sanctitate etiam corpore obpresso, sicut amittitur et corporis sanctitas uiolata animi sanctitate etiam corpore intacto. Quam ob rem non habet quod in se morte spontanea puniat femina sine ulla sua consensione uiolenter obpressa et alieno conpressa peccato; quanto minus antequam hoc fiat! ne admittatur homicidium certum, cum ipsum flagitium, quamuis alienum, adhuc pendet incertum.

Or suppose some woman, her mind corrupted and the vow she had made to God violated, goes off to her seducer to be defiled. As she goes off for this purpose, do we call her holy even in body, when the holiness of soul through which her body was made holy has been lost and destroyed? Far from us be this error! Let us rather learn from this that, just as holiness of body is not lost while holiness of soul remains, even when the body is overpowered, so holiness of body is lost when holiness of soul is violated, even if the body is untouched. Therefore a woman who has been violently overpowered without any consent of her own, and raped through another's sin, has nothing to punish in herself by a voluntary death—and how much less before it happens! She must not commit a murder that is certain while the crime itself, though another's, still hangs uncertain.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

LUCRETIA, WHO KILLED HERSELF BECAUSE OF THE RAPE INFLICTED ON HER

Lucretia, praised by Rome for killing herself after rape, was either an adulteress or a murderer.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.19	An forte huic perspicuae rationi, qua dicimus corpore obpresso nequaquam proposito castitatis ulla in malum consensione mutato illius tantum esse flagitium, qui obprimens concubuerit, non illius, quae obpressa concumbenti nulla uoluntate consenserit, contradicere audebunt hi, contra quos feminarum Christianarum in captiuitate obpressarum non tantum mentes, uerum etiam corpora sancta defendimus? Lucretiam certe, matronam nobilem ueteremque Romanam, pudicitiae magnis efferunt laudibus. Huius corpore cum uiolenter obpresso Tarquinii regis filius libidinose potitus esset, illa scelus inprobissimi iuuenis marito Collatino et propinquo Bruto, uiris clarissimis et fortissimis, indicauit eosque ad uindictam constrinxit. Deinde foedi in se commissi aegra adque inpatiens se peremit. Quid dicemus? Adultera haec an casta iudicanda est? Quis in hac controuersia laborandum putauerit?	Or perhaps they will dare to contradict this plain reasoning? We say that when the body is overpowered, and the resolve to be chaste is not changed by any consent to evil, the crime belongs only to the man who has intercourse by force, not to the woman who is overpowered and does not consent with any will of her own to the man who lies with her. Will they dare to contradict this—those against whom we are defending as holy not only the minds but also the bodies of the Christian women overpowered in captivity? They certainly extol Lucretia, a noble married woman of ancient Rome, with great praise for her chastity. When the son of King Tarquin had overpowered her by force and satisfied his lust on her body, she disclosed the wicked young man's crime to her husband Collatinus and her kinsman Brutus, most distinguished and courageous men, and bound them to take vengeance. Then, sick at heart and unable to bear the foul thing committed against her, she killed herself. What shall we say? Should she be judged an adulteress, or chaste? Who would think this question worth any effort?[29]
	Egregie quidam ex hoc ueraciterque declamans ait: Mirabile dictu, duo fuerunt et adulterium unus admisit. Splendide adque uerissime. Intuens enim in duorum corporum commixtione unius inquinatissimam cupiditatem, alterius castissimam uoluntatem, et non quid coniunctione membrorum, sed quid animorum diuersitate ageretur adtendens: Duo., inquit, fuerunt, et adulterium unus admisit.	A certain declaimer, speaking on this subject brilliantly and truthfully, said: "Remarkable to say: there were two, and only one committed adultery." Splendidly and most truly said. For he saw, in the union of two bodies, the foulest lust of the one and the most chaste will of the other. And attending not to what was done by the joining of bodies but to what was done by the difference of minds, he said: "There were two, and only one committed adultery."
	Sed quid est hoc, quod in eam grauius uindicatur, quae adulterium non admisit? Nam ille patria cum patre pulsus est, haec summo est mactata supplicio. Si non est illa inpudicitia qua inuita obprimitur, non est haec iustitia qua casta punitur. Vos appello, leges iudicesque Romani. Nempe post perpetrata facinora nec quemquam	But what does it mean that the woman who did not commit adultery is punished more severely? For he was driven from his homeland with his father, while she suffered the supreme penalty. If her being overpowered against her will was no un-

29 Lucretia was raped by Sextus Tarquinius, son of Rome's last king. Her death led Brutus and Collatinus to expel the Tarquins and found the Roman Republic (traditionally 509 BC).

LATIN	ENGLISH
scelestum indemnatum inpune uoluistis occidi. Si ergo ad uestrum iudicium quisquam deferret hoc crimen uobisque probaretur non solum indemnatam, uerum etiam castam et innocentem interfectam esse mulierem, nonne eum, qui id fecisset, seueritate congrua plecteretis? Hoc fecit illa Lucretia; illa, illa sic praedicata Lucretia innocentem, castam, uim perpessam Lucretiam insuper interemit. Proferte sententiam. Quod si propterea non potestis, quia non adstat quam punire possitis, quur interfectricem innocentis et castae tanta praedicatione laudatis?	chastity, then her being punished though chaste is no justice. I appeal to you, Roman laws and judges! Even after crimes had been committed, you would not let even a criminal be killed with impunity if he had not been condemned. So if someone brought this charge before your court, and it were proved to you that a woman had been killed who was not only uncondemned but chaste and innocent, would you not punish the one who did it with fitting severity? That is what Lucretia did. That Lucretia—yes, that much-celebrated Lucretia—went on to kill Lucretia: innocent, chaste, a victim of violence. Pronounce your sentence. And if you cannot do so because there is no one present for you to punish, why do you praise with such acclaim the killer of an innocent and chaste woman?
Quam certe aput infernos iudices etiam tales, quales poetarum uestrorum carminibus cantitantur, nulla ratione defenditis, constitutam inter illos scilicet, qui sibi letum Insontes peperere manu lucemque perosi Proiecere animas; cui ad superna redire cupienti Fas obstat, tristisque palus inamabilis undae Adligat.	Certainly you have no way of defending her before the judges of the underworld, even such judges as are celebrated in the songs of your poets. For she is placed, of course, among those "who, guiltless, brought death upon themselves by their own hand and, hating the light, flung away their lives." She longs to return to the world above, but "divine law stands in the way, and the gloomy marsh with its unlovely water holds her fast."[30]
An forte ideo ibi non est, quia non insontem, sed male sibi consciam se peremit? Quid si enim (quod ipsa tantummodo nosse poterat) quamuis iuueni uiolenter inruenti etiam sua libidine inlecta consensit idque in se puniens ita doluit, ut morte putaret expiandum? Quamquam ne sic quidem se occidere debuit, si fructuosam posset aput deos falsos agere paenitentiam. Verum tamen si forte ita est falsumque est illud, quod duo fuerunt et adulterium unus admisit, sed potius ambo adulterium commiserunt, unus manifesta inuasione, altera latente consensione, non se occidit insontem, et ideo potest a litteratis eius defensoribus dici non esse aput inferos inter illos, qui sibi letum insontes peperere manu.	Or perhaps she is not there because she killed herself not as one guiltless but as one with a guilty conscience? For what if—something only she herself could know—although the young man assaulted her violently, she was also enticed by her own lust and consented, and, punishing this in herself, was so grieved that she thought it had to be expiated by death? Even so, she should not have killed herself, if she could have repented fruitfully before her false gods. Still, perhaps that is how it was, and it is false that "there were two, and only one committed adultery"; perhaps both committed adultery, he by open assault, she by hidden consent. In that case she did not kill herself guiltless, and so her learned defenders can say that she is not in the underworld among those "who, guiltless, brought death upon themselves by their own hand."
Sed ita haec causa ex utroque latere coartatur, ut, si extenuatur homicidium, adulterium confirmetur; si purgatur adulterium, homicidium cumuletur; nec	But this case is so hemmed in on both sides that if the murder is played down, the adultery is confirmed, and if the adultery is cleared, the murder

30 Virgil, Aeneid 6.434–436 and 438–439, describing the suicides in the underworld.

LATIN	ENGLISH
omnino inuenitur exitus, ubi dicitur: Si adulterata, quur laudata; si pudica, quur occisa?	is compounded. There is no way out at all when it is said: "If adulterous, why praised? If chaste, why slain?"
Nobis tamen hoc tam nobili feminae huius exemplo ad istos refutandos, qui Christianis feminis in captiuitate conpressis alieni ab omni cogitatione sanctitatis insultant, sufficit quod in praeclaris eius laudibus dictum est: Duo fuerunt et adulterium unus admisit. Talis enim ab eis Lucretia magis credita est, quae se nullo adulterino potuerit maculare consensu. Quod ergo se ipsam, quoniam adulterum pertulit, etiam non adultera occidit, non est pudicitiae caritas, sed pudoris infirmitas. Puduit enim eam turpitudinis alienae in se commissae etiamsi non secum, et Romana mulier, laudis auida nimium, uerita est ne putaretur, quod uiolenter est passa cum uiueret, libenter passa si uiueret. Unde ad oculos hominum testem, mentis suae illam poenam adhibendam putauit, quibus conscientiam demonstrare non potuit.	For us, however, to refute these people who, strangers to every thought of holiness, insult the Christian women raped in captivity, it is enough to take the example of this noble woman and what was said in her splendid praise: "There were two, and only one committed adultery." For they preferred to believe that Lucretia was a woman who could not have stained herself by any adulterous consent. So the fact that she killed herself because she had suffered an adulterer, though she was no adulteress, comes not from love of chastity but from the weakness of shame. She was ashamed of the foul act another had committed on her, even if not with her. And as a Roman woman, all too eager for praise, she feared that what she had suffered by violence while she lived would be thought, if she went on living, to have been suffered willingly. That is why she thought she must offer that punishment as a witness to her state of mind before the eyes of people to whom she could not show her conscience.
Sociam quippe facti se credi erubuit, si, quod alius in ea fecerat turpiter, ferret ipsa patienter. Non hoc fecerunt feminae Christianae, quae passae similia uiuunt tamen nec in se ultae sunt crimen alienum, ne aliorum sceleribus adderent sua, si, quoniam hostes in eis concupiscendo stupra commiserant, illae in se ipsis homicidia erubescendo committerent. Habent quippe intus gloriam castitatis, testimonium conscientiae; habent autem coram oculis Dei sui nec requirunt amplius, ubi quid recte faciant non habent amplius, ne deuient ab auctoritate legis diuinae, cum male deuitant offensionem suspicionis humanae.	She blushed to be thought an accomplice in the deed if she bore patiently what another had shamefully done to her. Christian women did not do this. They have suffered similar things, yet they are still alive. They have not avenged another's crime on themselves, so as not to add crimes of their own to the crimes of others—as they would if, because the enemy had committed rapes on them out of lust, they committed murders on themselves out of shame. For they have within them the glory of chastity, the testimony of their conscience. They have it in the sight of their God, and they seek nothing further, since there is nothing further they could rightly do—lest they stray from the authority of God's law by wrongly trying to escape the offense of human suspicion.

THAT THERE IS NO AUTHORITY THAT GIVES CHRISTIANS THE RIGHT TO KILL THEMSELVES FOR ANY REASON

The commandment "You shall not kill" forbids killing oneself.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.20 Neque enim frustra in sanctis canonicis libris nusquam nobis diuinitus praeceptum permissumue reperiri potest,	It is not without reason that nowhere in the holy canonical books can we find any divine command ut uel ipsius adipiscendae inmortalitatis uel ullius cauendi carendiue mali causa nobismet ipsis necem inferamus. Nam et prohibitos nos esse intellegendum est, ubi lex ait: Non occides, praesertim quia non addidit: proximum tuum, sicut falsum testimonium cum uetaret: Falsum, inquit, testimonium non dices aduersus proximum tuum. Nec ideo tamen si aduersus se ipsum quisquam falsum testimonium dixerit, ab hoc crimine se putauerit alienum, quoniam regulam diligendi proximum a semet ipso dilector accepit, quando quidem scriptum est: Diliges proximum tuum tamquam te ipsum.

LATIN

Porro si falsi testimonii non minus reus est qui de se ipso falsum fatetur, quam si aduersus proximum hoc faceret, cum in eo praecepto, quo falsum testimonium prohibetur, aduersus proximum prohibeatur possitque non recte intellegentibus uideri non esse prohibitum, ut aduersus se ipsum quisque falsus testis adsistat: quanto magis intellegendum est non licere homini se ipsum occidere, cum in eo, quod scriptum est: Non occides, nihilo deinde addito, nullus, nec ipse utique cui praecipitur, intellegatur exceptus! Unde quidam hoc praeceptum etiam in bestias ac pecora conantur extendere, ut ex hoc nullum etiam illorum liceat occidere. Quur ergo non et herbas et quicquid humo radicitus alitur ac figitur?

Nam et hoc genus rerum, quamuis non sentiat, dicitur uiuere ac per hoc potest et mori, proinde etiam, cum uis adhibetur, occidi. Unde et apostolus, cum de huius modi seminibus loqueretur: Tu, inquit, quod seminas non uiuificatur, nisi moriatur; et in psalmo scriptum est: Occidit uites eorum in grandine. Num igitur ob hoc, cum audimus: Non occides, uirgultum uellere nefas ducimus et Manichaeorum errori insanissime adquiescimus?

His igitur deliramentis remotis cum legimus: Non occides, si propterea non accipimus hoc dictum de frutectis esse, quia nullus eis sensus est, nec de or permission to put ourselves to death, whether to gain immortality itself or to avoid or escape any evil. Indeed, we must understand that we are forbidden to do so where the law says, "You shall not kill." This is especially so because it did not add "your neighbor," as it did when it prohibited false witness: "You shall not bear false witness," it says, "against your neighbor." Yet that does not mean that anyone who bears false witness against himself should think himself free of this crime. The one who loves takes the rule for loving his neighbor from himself, since it is written, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself."[31]

ENGLISH

Now, someone who confesses something false about himself is no less guilty of false witness than if he did it against his neighbor. This is so even though the commandment that prohibits false witness prohibits it against one's neighbor, and those who do not understand it rightly might think it is not forbidden to stand as a false witness against oneself. How much more, then, must we understand that it is not lawful for a person to kill himself! For in the words "You shall not kill," with nothing added afterward, no one is understood to be excepted—not even, of course, the very person to whom the command is given. That is why some try to extend this commandment even to wild animals and livestock, so that on this basis it would be unlawful to kill any of them either. Then why not to plants too, and to whatever is nourished by the soil and fixed in it by roots?

For this kind of thing too, though it has no sensation, is said to live, and so it can also die, and accordingly, when force is applied, it can be killed. Hence the apostle, speaking of seeds of this kind, says, "What you sow does not come to life unless it dies"; and in the psalm it is written, "He killed their vines with hail." Are we then, on this account, when we hear "You shall not kill," to regard pulling up a shrub as a sacrilege, and to fall in, like utter madmen, with the error of the Manichaeans?[32]

So let us set these ravings aside. When we read "You shall not kill," we do not take this to be said of shrubs, because they have no sensation. Nor do 31 Exodus 20:13 and 20:16; Leviticus 19:18 (quoted in Matthew 22:39).

32 1 Corinthians 15:36; Psalm 77:47 (78:47 in most English Bibles). The Manichaeans, a dualist sect to which Augustine belonged in his youth, held that particles of divine light were imprisoned in plants.

LATIN	ENGLISH
inrationabilibus animantibus, uolatilibus natatilibus, ambulatilibus reptilibus, quia nulla nobis ratione sociantur, quam non eis datum est nobiscum habere communem (unde iustissima ordinatione creatoris et uita et mors eorum nostris usibus subditur): restat ut de homine intellegamus, quod dictum est: Non occides, nec alterum ergo nec te. Neque enim qui se occidit aliud quam hominem occidit.	we take it to be said of irrational animals—whatever flies, swims, walks or creeps—because they are not joined to us by any bond of reason, since it was not given to them to have reason in common with us (and so, by the most just ordering of the Creator, both their life and their death are subject to our use). It remains, then, that we understand "You shall not kill" as said of human beings: neither another, therefore, nor yourself. For whoever kills himself kills nothing other than a human being.

THE KILLINGS OF HUMAN BEINGS THAT ARE EXEMPT FROM THE CHARGE OF MURDER

Killing by God's command or by lawful public authority is not murder.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.21 Quasdam uero exceptiones eadem ipsa diuina fecit auctoritas, ut non liceat hominem occidi. Sed his exceptis, quos Deus occidi iubet siue data lege siue ad personam pro tempore expressa iussione, (non autem ipse occidit, qui ministerium debet iubenti, sicut adminiculum gladius utenti; et ideo nequaquam contra hoc praeceptum fecerunt, quo dictum est: Non occides, qui Deo auctore bella gesserunt aut personam gerentes publicae potestatis secundum eius leges, hoc est iustissimae rationis imperium, sceleratos morte punierunt; et Abraham non solum non est culpatus crudelitatis crimine, uerum etiam laudatus est nomine pietatis, quod uoluit filium nequaquam scelerate, sed oboedienter occidere;	But the same divine authority has made certain exceptions to the rule that it is not lawful to kill a human being. These exceptions are those whom God commands to be killed, either by a law he has given or by an explicit command addressed to a particular person for a particular time. (The one who owes his service to the one who commands does not himself kill; he is like a sword, an instrument in the hand of the one who uses it. And so those who waged wars on God's authority, or who, acting in the role of public power, punished criminals with death according to his laws—that is, by the command of the most just reason—in no way acted against this commandment that says, "You shall not kill." And Abraham was not only not blamed on a charge of cruelty but was even praised for his devotion, because he was willing to kill his son, not wickedly but in obedience;[33] et merito quaeritur utrum pro iussu Dei sit habendum, quod Iephte filiam, quae patri occurrit, occidit, cum id se uouisset immolaturum Deo, quod ei redeunti de proelio uictori primitus occurrisset; nec Samson aliter excusatur, quod se ipsum cum hostibus ruina domus obpressit, nisi quia spiritus latenter hoc iusserat, qui per illum miracula faciebat) — his igitur exceptis, quos uel lex iusta generaliter uel ipse fons iustitiae Deus specialiter occidi iubet, quisquis hominem uel se ipsum uel quemlibet occiderit, homicidii crimine innectitur.	and it is rightly asked whether we should regard as done at God's command Jephthah's killing of his daughter, who came out to meet her father, when he had vowed to sacrifice to God whatever first came out to meet him as he returned victorious from battle. Nor is Samson excused for crushing himself together with his enemies under the collapse of the house, except on the ground that the Spirit, who worked miracles through him, had secretly commanded it.) With these exceptions, then—those whom either a just law commands in general, or God himself, the source of justice, commands in particular to be killed—anyone who kills 33 Abraham's near-sacrifice of Isaac is told in Genesis 22.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		a human being, whether himself or anyone else, is caught in the crime of murder.[34]

WHETHER SUICIDE CAN EVER BE A SIGN OF GREATNESS OF SOUL

Suicide shows weakness of mind rather than greatness of soul.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.22	Et quicumque hoc in se ipsis perpetrauerunt, animi magnitudine fortasse mirandi, non sapientiae sanitate laudandi sunt. Quamquam si rationem diligentius consulas, ne ipsa quidem animi magnitudo recte nominabitur, ubi quisque non ualendo tolerare uel quaeque aspera uel aliena peccata se ipse interemerit. Magis enim mens infirma deprehenditur, quae ferre non potest uel duram sui corporis seruitutem uel stultam uulgi opinionem, maiorque animus merito dicendus est, qui uitam aerumnosam magis potest ferre quam fugere et humanum iudicium maximeque uulgare, quod plerumque caligine erroris inuoluitur, prae conscientiae luce ac puritate contemnere.	And all who have done this to themselves may perhaps be admired for greatness of mind, but they are not to be praised for soundness of wisdom. Yet if you consult reason more carefully, it will not even be right to call it greatness of mind when someone has killed himself because he could not bear hardships of some kind, or the sins of others. For what is revealed is rather a weak mind, one that cannot bear either the harsh enslavement of its body or the foolish opinion of the crowd. The greater spirit is rightly said to be the one that can bear a life of misery rather than flee it, and can despise human judgment—especially that of the crowd, which is usually wrapped in the fog of error—in comparison with the light and purity of conscience.
	Quam ob rem si magno animo fieri putandum est, cum sibi homo ingerit mortem, ille potius Theobrotus in hac animi magnitudine reperitur, quem ferunt lecto Platonis libro, ubi de inmortalitate animae disputauit, se praecipitem dedisse de muro adque ita ex hac uita emigrasse ad eam, quam credidit esse meliorem. Nihil enim urguebat aut calamitatis aut criminis seu uerum seu falsum, quod non ualendo ferre se auferret; sed ad capessendam mortem adque huius uitae suauia uincla rumpenda sola adfuit animi magnitudo. Quod tamen magne potius factum esse quam bene testis ei esse potuit Plato ipse quem legerat, qui profecto id praecipue potissimumque fecisset uel etiam praecepisset, nisi ea mente, qua inmortalitatem animae uidit, nequaquam faciendum, quin etiam prohibendum esse iudicasset.	So if we must think it is done from greatness of mind when a person inflicts death on himself, then it is rather that Theombrotus in whom we find this greatness of mind. They say that after reading Plato's book in which he discussed the immortality of the soul, he threw himself headlong from a wall and so departed from this life to the one he believed to be better. For no calamity and no crime, whether real or falsely charged, pressed upon him that he could not bear and so removed himself from; only greatness of mind was present to make him seize death and break the sweet bonds of this life. Yet that this was done greatly rather than well, Plato himself, whom he had read, could have testified to him. Plato would surely have done it himself first and foremost, or even prescribed it, had he not judged, with the same mind with which he saw the immortality of the soul, that it was by no means to be done—indeed, that it was to be forbidden.[35]
	At enim multi se interemerunt, ne in manus hostium peruenirent. Non modo quaerimus utrum sit factum, sed	"But," they say, "many have killed themselves to avoid falling into the hands of their enemies." We 34 Jephthah's vow is in Judges 11; Samson's death in Judges 16.

35 Theombrotus (or Cleombrotus) of Ambracia, whose story is told by Callimachus and by Cicero (Tusculan Disputations 1.84); the book was Plato's Phaedo.

LATIN	ENGLISH
utrum fuerit faciendum. Sana quippe ratio etiam exemplis anteponenda est, cui quidem et exempla concordant, sed illa, quae tanto digniora sunt imitatione, quanto excellentiora pietate. Non fecerunt patriarchae, non prophetae, non apostoli, quia et ipse Dominus Christus, quando eos, si persecutionem paterentur, fugere admonuit de ciuitate in ciuitatem, potuit admonere ut sibi manus inferrent, ne in manus persequentium peruenirent. Porro si hoc ille non iussit aut monuit, ut eo modo sui ex hac uita emigrarent, quibus migrantibus mansiones aeternas praeparaturum esse se promisit, quaelibet exempla proponant gentes, quae ignorant Deum, manifestum est hoc non licere colentibus unum uerum Deum.	are not now asking whether it has been done, but whether it should have been done. For sound reason must be placed even above examples—though examples too agree with it, namely those that are the more worthy of imitation the more they excel in devotion. The patriarchs did not do it, nor the prophets, nor the apostles. For the Lord Christ himself, when he advised them, if they suffered persecution, to flee from city to city, could have advised them to lay hands on themselves so as not to fall into the hands of their persecutors. Now if he did not command or advise his own to depart from this life in that way—he who promised that he would prepare eternal dwellings for them when they departed—then whatever examples the nations who do not know God may put forward, it is clear that this is not permitted to those who worship the one true God.[36]

WHAT KIND OF EXAMPLE CATO IS, WHO KILLED HIMSELF BECAUSE HE COULD NOT BEAR CAESAR'S VICTORY

Cato's suicide at Utica is a poor example, since he let his own son live under Caesar.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.23 Sed tamen etiam illi praeter Lucretiam, de qua supra quod uidebatur diximus, non facile reperiunt de cuius auctoritate praescribant, nisi illum Catonem, qui se Uticae occidit; non quia solus id fecit, sed quia uir doctus et probus habebatur, ut merito putetur etiam recte fieri potuisse uel posse quod fecit. De cuius facto quid potissimum dicam, nisi quod amici eius etiam docti quidam uiri, qui hoc fieri prudentius dissuadebant, inbecillioris quam fortioris animi facinus esse censuerunt, quo demonstraretur non honestas turpia praecauens, sed infirmitas aduersa non sustinens? Hoc et ipse Cato in suo carissimo filio iudicauit. Nam si turpe erat sub uictoria Caesaris uiuere, quur auctor huius turpitudinis filio fuit, quem de Caesaris benignitate omnia sperare praecepit? Quur non et illum secum coegit ad mortem?	Yet even they, apart from Lucretia, about whom we have already said what seemed right, do not easily find anyone whose authority they can cite as a precedent, except that Cato who killed himself at Utica. This is not because he was the only one who did it, but because he was considered a learned and upright man, so that it might reasonably be thought that what he did could have been, or could be, done rightly. What shall I say about his deed above all, except that his friends, some of them learned men too, who more wisely tried to dissuade him from doing it, judged it the act of a weaker rather than a stronger spirit? It showed, in their view, not an honor guarding against disgrace but a weakness unable to endure adversity. Cato himself passed this same judgment in the case of his dearly loved son. For if it was shameful to live under Caesar's victory, why did he make himself the author of this shame for his son, whom he instructed to hope for everything from Caesar's kindness? Why did he not force him to die with him as well?[37]

36 Matthew 10:23; John 14:2.
37 Cato the Younger (95–46 BC), Stoic and opponent of Julius Caesar, killed himself at Utica in North Africa after Caesar's victory at Thapsus in 46 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam si eum filium, qui contra imperium in hostem pugnauerat, etiam uictorem laudabiliter Torquatus occidit, quur uictus uicto filio pepercit Cato, qui non pepercit sibi? An turpius erat contra imperium esse uictorem, quam contra decus ferre uictorem? Nullo modo igitur Cato turpe esse iudicauit sub uictore Caesare uiuere; alioquin ab hac turpitudine paterno ferro filium liberaret. Quid ergo, nisi quod filium quantum amauit, cui parci a Caesare et sperauit et uoluit, tantum gloriae ipsius Caesaris, ne ab illo etiam sibi parceretur, ut ipse Caesar dixisse fertur, inuidit — ut aliquid nos mitius dicamus, erubuit?	For if Torquatus, to his credit, killed his son who had fought the enemy against orders, even though he was victorious, why did the defeated Cato spare his defeated son, when he did not spare himself? Or was it more shameful to be a victor against orders than to bear a victor against honor? In no way, therefore, did Cato judge it shameful to live under Caesar as victor; otherwise he would have freed his son from this shame with a father's sword. What then remains, except that as much as he loved his son, whom he both hoped and wished Caesar would spare, so much did he begrudge Caesar the glory of sparing him as well—as Caesar himself is said to have remarked—or, to put it more mildly, he was ashamed?[38]

THAT IN THE VIRTUE IN WHICH REGULUS SURPASSED CATO, CHRISTIANS EXCEL FAR MORE

Regulus, who endured captivity rather than kill himself, is a better model than Cato.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.24 Nolunt autem isti, contra quos agimus, ut sanctum uirum lob, qui tam horrenda mala in sua carne perpeti maluit quam inlata sibi morte omnibus carere cruciatibus, uel alios sanctos ex litteris nostris summa auctoritate celsissimis fideque dignissimis, qui captiuitatem dominationemque hostium ferre quam sibi necem inferre maluerunt, Catoni praeferamus; sed ex litteris eorum eundem illum M. Catoni Regulum praeferam. Cato enim numquam Caesarem uicerat, cui uictus dedignatus est subici et, ne subiceretur, a se ipso elegit occidi: Regulus autem Poenos iam uicerat imperioque Romano Romanus imperator non ex ciuibus dolendam, sed ex hostibus laudandam uictoriam reportauerat; ab eis tamen postea uictus maluit eos ferre seruiendo quam eis se auferre moriendo.	But those we are arguing against do not want us to prefer to Cato the holy man Job, who chose to suffer such horrible evils in his own flesh rather than be rid of all his torments by putting himself to death. Nor do they want us to prefer other saints from our Scriptures—which stand highest in supreme authority and are most worthy of belief—who chose to bear captivity and the domination of their enemies rather than kill themselves. Very well: from their own literature I will prefer to Marcus Cato that same Regulus. For Cato had never defeated Caesar; defeated by him, he scorned to submit to him, and to avoid submitting he chose to be killed by his own hand. Regulus, by contrast, had already defeated the Carthaginians, and as a Roman commander had won for Roman rule a victory not to be lamented, over fellow citizens, but to be praised, over enemies. Yet when he was later defeated by them, he chose to bear them as a slave rather than remove himself from them by dying.
Proinde seruauit et sub Carthaginiensium dominatione patientiam et in Romanorum dilectione constantiam, nec uictum auferens corpus ab hostibus nec inuictum animum a ciuibus. Nec quod se occidere noluit, uitae huius amore fecit. Hoc probauit, cum causa promissi iurisque iurandi ad eosdem hostes, quos grauius in	And so he kept both his endurance under Carthaginian domination and his constancy in his love for the Romans, removing neither his defeated body from the enemy nor his undefeated mind from his fellow citizens. Nor was his refusal to kill himself due to love of this life. He proved 38 Titus Manlius Torquatus, consul in 340 BC, had his son executed for engaging in single combat against orders, though the son won. Caesar is reported to have said that Cato had begrudged him the chance to save his life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
senatu uerbis quam bello armis offenderat, sine ulla dubitatione remeauit. Tantus itaque uitae huius contemtor, cum saeuientibus hostibus per quaslibet poenas eam finire quam se ipse perimere maluit, magnum scelus esse, si se homo interimat, procul dubio iudicauit. Inter omnes suos laudabiles et uirtutis insignibus inlustres uiros non proferunt Romani meliorem, quem neque felicitas corruperit, nam in tanta uictoria mansit pauperrimus, nec infelicitas fregerit, nam ad tanta exitia reuertit intrepidus.	this when, for the sake of his promise and his oath, he returned without any hesitation to those same enemies whom he had offended more gravely by his words in the senate than by his arms in war. So great a despiser of this life, then, who preferred to have it ended by raging enemies through any tortures rather than destroy himself, beyond doubt judged it a great crime for a person to kill himself. Among all their praiseworthy men, distinguished by the marks of virtue, the Romans bring forward none better. Good fortune did not corrupt him, for in so great a victory he remained very poor; nor did misfortune break him, for he returned fearless to so dreadful a death.
Porro si fortissimi et praeclarissimi uiri terrenae patriae defensores deorumque licet falsorum, non tamen fallaces cultores, sed ueracissimi etiam iuratores, qui hostes uictos more ac iure belli ferire potuerunt, hi ab hostibus uicti se ipsos ferire noluerunt et, cum mortem minime formidarent, uictores tamen dominos ferre quam eam sibi inferre maluerunt: quanto magis Christiani, uerum Deum colentes et supernae patriae suspirantes, ab hoc facinore temperabunt, si eos diuina dispositio uel probandos uel emendandos ad tempus hostibus subiugauerit, quos in illa humilitate non deserit, qui propter eos tam humiliter altissimus uenit, praesertim quos nullius militaris potestatis uel talis militiae iura constringunt ipsum hostem ferire superatum.	These were very brave and illustrious men, defenders of an earthly homeland, worshipers of gods who were false, yet not false worshipers themselves but most true to their oaths. They could have struck down defeated enemies by the custom and law of war, yet when they were defeated by enemies they refused to strike themselves down; and though they had no fear at all of death, they preferred to bear their conquerors as masters rather than inflict death on themselves. If so, how much more will Christians, who worship the true God and long for the heavenly homeland, refrain from this crime, if divine dispensation has for a time subjected them to their enemies, either to test them or to correct them! In that humiliation he does not desert them, he who, though the Most High, came so humbly for their sake. And this is all the more true since no rights of any military authority, or of such service, bind them to strike down even a defeated enemy.
Quis ergo tam malus error obrepit, ut homo se occidat, uel quia in eum peccauit, uel ne in eum peccet inimicus, cum uel peccatorem uel peccaturum ipsum occidere non audeat inimicum?	What error so wicked, then, creeps in, that a person kills himself either because an enemy has sinned against him, or to keep an enemy from sinning against him, when he would not dare to kill the enemy himself, whether that enemy has sinned or is about to sin?

THAT SIN SHOULD NOT BE AVOIDED BY SIN

One must not commit the certain sin of suicide to avoid a possible future sin.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.25 At enim timendum est et cauendum, ne libidini subditum corpus inlecebrosissima uoluptate animum adliciat consentire peccato. Proinde, inquiunt, non iam propter alienum, sed propter suum peccatum, antequam hoc	"But," it is said, "one must fear and guard against the danger that the body, subjected to lust, may by the most seductive pleasure entice the mind to consent to sin. So," they say, "each person ought to quisque committat, se debet occidere. Nullo modo quidem hoc faciet animus, ut consentiat libidini carnis suae aliena libidine concitatae, qui Deo potius eiusque sapientiae quam corpori eiusque concupiscentiae subiectus est. Verum tamen si detestabile facinus et damnabile scelus est etiam se ipsum hominem occidere, sicut ueritas manifesta proclamat, quis ita desipiat ut dicat: Iam nunc perpetremus homicidium, ne postea forte incidamus in adulterium? Nonne si tantum dominatur iniquitas, ut non innocentia, sed peccata potius eligantur, satius est incertum de futuro adulterium quam certum de praesenti homicidium?

LATIN

Nonne satius est flagitium committere, quod paenitendo sanetur, quam tale facinus, ubi locus salubris paenitentiae non relinquitur? Haec dixi propter eos uel eas, quae non alieni, sed proprii peccati deuitandi causa, ne sub alterius libidine etiam excitatae suae forte consentiant, uim sibi, qua moriantur, inferendam putant. Ceterum absit a mente Christiana, quae Deo suo fidit in eoque spe posita eius adiutorio nititur, absit, inquam, ut mens talis quibuslibet carnis uoluptatibus ad consensum turpitudinis cedat. Quod si illa concupiscentialis inoboedientia, quae adhuc in membris moribundis habitat, praeter nostrae uoluntatis legem quasi lege sua mouetur, quanto magis absque culpa est in corpore non consentientis, si absque culpa est in corpore dormientis!

ENGLISH

kill himself before committing that sin—now not on account of another's sin, but on account of his own." Certainly a mind that is subject to God and his wisdom rather than to the body and its desire will in no way consent to the lust of its own flesh, aroused by another's lust. And yet, if it is a detestable deed and a damnable crime for a person to kill even himself, as truth clearly proclaims, who would be so foolish as to say, "Let us commit murder now, in case we perhaps fall into adultery later"? If wickedness has such dominion that we are choosing not innocence but sins, is it not better to risk an adultery that is uncertain because it lies in the future than to commit a murder that is certain because it is in the present?

Is it not better to commit a disgraceful act that can be healed by repentance than a crime that leaves no room for saving repentance? I have said this because of those men or women who, to avoid not another's sin but their own—for fear that, subjected to another's lust, they might consent to their own when it is aroused—think they should do violence to themselves to the point of death. But far be it from a Christian mind, which trusts in its God and, having placed its hope in him, relies on his help—far be it, I say, that such a mind should yield to any pleasures of the flesh so as to consent to what is shameful. And if that disobedience of desire which still dwells in our dying members moves as if by a law of its own, apart from the law of our will, how much more is it free of guilt in the body of one who does not consent, if it is free of guilt in the body of one who is asleep!

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND ACTS OF THE SAINTS THAT ARE KNOWN TO HAVE BEEN DONE ALTHOUGH THEY ARE NOT PERMITTED

Holy women who drowned themselves may have acted on a divine command, like Samson.

LATIN

1.26 Sed quaedam, inquiunt, sanctae feminae tempore persecutionis, ut insectatores suae pudicitiae deuitarent, in rapturum adque necaturum se fluuium proiecerunt eoque modo defunctae sunt earumque martyria in catholica ecclesia ueneratione celeberrima frequentantur. De his nihil temere audeo iudicare. Utrum enim ecclesiae aliquibus fide dignis testificationibus, ut earum memoriam sic honoret, diuina persuaserit auctoritas, nescio; et fieri potest ut ita sit. Quid si enim hoc fecerunt, non humanitus deceptae, sed diuinitus

ENGLISH

"But," they say, "certain holy women in the time of persecution, to escape those who were assailing their chastity, threw themselves into a river that would carry them off and drown them, and died in that way; and their martyrdoms are celebrated in the Catholic Church with a veneration that draws great crowds." About these women I dare not pass any rash judgment. For I do not know whether divine authority, through some trustworthy testimonies, persuaded the Church to honor their iussae, nec errantes, sed oboedientes? sicut de Samsone aliud nobis fas non est credere. Cum autem Deus iubet seque iubere sine ullis ambagibus intimat, quis oboedientiam in crimen uocet? quis obsequium pietatis accuset? Sed non ideo sine scelere facit, quisquis Deo filium immolare decreuerit, quia hoc Abraham etiam laudabiliter fecit.

LATIN

ENGLISH

memory in this way; and it may be so. For what if they did this not misled by human reasoning but commanded by God—not erring, but obeying? In the case of Samson it is not right for us to believe anything else. When God commands, and makes known without any ambiguity that he is commanding, who would call obedience a crime? Who would accuse devout compliance? But it does not follow that anyone who decides to sacrifice his son to God does so without crime, just because Abraham did this too, and was praised for it.[39]

Nam et miles cum oboediens potestati, sub qualibet legitime constitutus est, hominem occidit, nulla, ciuitatis suae lege reus est homicidii, immo, nisi fecerit, reus est imperii deserti adque contemti; quod si sua sponte adque auctoritate fecisset, crimen effusi humani sanguinis incidisset. Itaque unde punitur si fecit iniussus, inde punietur nisi fecerit iussus. Quod si ita est iubente imperatore, quanto magis iubente creatore! Qui ergo audit non licere se occidere, faciat, si iussit cuius non licet iussa contemnere; tantummodo uideat utrum diuina iussio nullo nutet incerto. Nos per aurem conscientiam conuenimus, occultorum nobis iudicium non usurpamus. Nemo scit quid agatur in homine nisi spiritus hominis, qui in ipso est.

For when a soldier, obeying the authority under which he is lawfully placed, kills a human being, he is not guilty of murder under any law of his state; indeed, if he does not do it, he is guilty of desertion and contempt of command. But if he had done it on his own initiative and authority, he would have incurred the crime of shedding human blood. So for the very thing for which he is punished if he does it without orders, he will be punished if he does not do it when ordered. If this is so when a commander gives the order, how much more when the Creator gives it! So let anyone who hears that it is not lawful to kill himself do it, if he has been commanded by the one whose commands it is not lawful to disregard—only let him make sure that the divine command does not waver with any uncertainty. We reach the conscience only through the ear; we do not claim for ourselves the judgment of hidden things. "No one knows what is happening in a person except the spirit of the person, which is in him."[40]

Hoc dicimus, hoc adserimus, hoc modis omnibus adprobamus, neminem spontaneam mortem sibi inferre debere uelut fugiendo molestias temporales, ne incidat in perpetuas; neminem propter aliena peccata, ne hoc ipse incipiat habere grauissimum proprium, quem non polluebat alienum; neminem propter sua peccata praeterita, propter quae magis hac uita opus est, ut possint paenitendo sanari; neminem uelut desiderio uitae melioris, quae post mortem speratur, quia reos suae mortis melior post mortem uita non suscipit.

This we say, this we affirm, this we prove in every way: that no one ought to inflict a voluntary death on himself as a way of escaping temporal troubles, for fear of falling into eternal ones; no one on account of another's sins, for fear of beginning to have a very grave sin of his own, when he was not defiled by another's; no one on account of his own past sins, for which he needs this life all the more, so that they can be healed by repentance; no one out of longing, as it were, for a better life hoped for after death, because the better life after death does not receive those who are guilty of their own death.

39 Eusebius (Church History 8.12) tells of a mother and her two daughters from Antioch who drowned themselves in a river during the persecution under Diocletian.
40 1 Corinthians 2:11.

WHETHER VOLUNTARY DEATH SHOULD BE SOUGHT IN ORDER TO AVOID SIN

If suicide were a remedy for sin, the newly baptized should all kill themselves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.27	Restat una causa, de qua dicere coeperam, qua utile putatur ut se quisque interficiat, scilicet ne in peccatum inruat uel blandiente uoluptate uel dolore saeuiente. Quam causam si uoluerimus admittere, eo usque progressa perueniet, ut hortandi sint homines tunc se potius interimere, cum lauacro sanctae regenerationis abluti uniuersorum remissionem acceperint peccatorum. Tunc enim tempus est cauendi omnia futura peccata, cum sunt omnia deleta praeterita. Quod si morte spontanea recte fit, quur non tunc potissimum fit? Quur baptizatus sibi quisque parcit? Quur liberatum caput tot rursus uitae huius periculis inserit, cum sit facillimae potestatis inlata sibi nece omnia deuitare scriptumque sit: Qui amat periculum, incidet in illud?	One reason remains, which I had begun to discuss, for which it is thought useful for a person to kill himself: so as not to fall into sin, whether through the allure of pleasure or the savagery of pain. If we are willing to admit this reason, it will lead us so far that people should be urged to kill themselves at the very moment when, washed in the bath of holy regeneration, they have received the forgiveness of all their sins. For that is the time to guard against all future sins, when all past ones have been wiped away. If this is rightly done by a voluntary death, why is it not done then above all? Why does any baptized person spare himself? Why does he thrust his newly freed head back into all the many dangers of this life, when it is so easily in his power to escape them all by killing himself, and when it is written: "Whoever loves danger will fall into it"?[41]
	Quur ergo amantur tot et tanta pericula uel certe, etiamsi non amantur, suscipiuntur, cum manet in hac uita, cui abscedere licitum est? An uero tam insulsa peruersitas cor euertit et a consideratione ueritatis auertit, ut, si se quisque interimere debet, ne unius captiuantis dominatu conruat in peccatum, uiuendum sibi existimet, ut ipsum perferat mundum per omnes horas tentationibus plenum, et talibus, qualis sub uno domino formidatur, et innumerabilibus ceteris, sine quibus haec uita non ducitur?	Why, then, are so many and such great dangers loved, or at any rate, even if they are not loved, taken on, by someone who stays in this life when he is permitted to leave it? Or does so senseless a perversity overturn the heart and turn it away from considering the truth, that a person thinks this: if he ought to kill himself so as not to collapse into sin under the domination of a single captor, he must nevertheless go on living in order to endure the world itself, which is full at every hour of temptations? These include temptations like the one dreaded under a single master, and countless others, without which this life is not lived.
	Quid igitur causae est, quur in eis exhortationibus tempora consumamus, quibus baptizatos adloquendo studemus accendere siue ad uirginalem integritatem siue ad continentiam uidualem siue ad ipsam tori coniugalis fidem, cum habeamus meliora et ab omnibus peccandi periculis remota conpendia, ut, quibuscumque post remissionem recentissimam peccatorum adripiendam mortem sibique ingerendam persuadere potuerimus, eos ad Dominum saniores purioresque mittamus?	What reason is there, then, for us to spend our time on those exhortations in which we address the baptized and try to kindle in them a zeal for virginal integrity, or for the continence of widowhood, or for faithfulness in the marriage bed itself? We have better shortcuts, far removed from every danger of sinning. We could persuade anyone we can, immediately after the forgiveness of their sins, to seize death and inflict it on themselves, and so send them to the Lord healthier and purer.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Porro si, quisquis hoc adgrediendum et suadendum putat, non dico desipit, sed insanit: qua tandem fronte homini dicit: Interfice te, ne paruis tuis peccatis adicias grauius, dum uiuis sub domino barbaris moribus inpudico, qui non potest nisi sceleratissime dicere: Interfice te peccatis tuis omnibus absolutis, ne rursus talia uel etiam peiora committas, dum nimis in mundo tot inpuris uoluptatibus inlecebroso, tot nefandis crudelitatibus furioso, tot erroribus et terroribus inimico? Hoc quia nefas est dicere, nefas est profecto se occidere. Nam si hoc sponte faciendi ulla causa iusta esse posset, procul dubio iustior quam ista non esset. Quia uero nec ista est, ergo nulla est.	Now, anyone who thinks this should be attempted and urged on people is, I do not say foolish, but insane. With what face, then, can he say to someone, "Kill yourself, so that you do not add a graver sin to your small ones while you live under a master whose foreign ways know no shame"? He cannot, except with the utmost wickedness, say, "Kill yourself now that all your sins are absolved, so that you do not commit such sins again, or even worse ones, while you live in a world all too alluring with so many impure pleasures, so frenzied with so many unspeakable cruelties, so hostile with so many errors and terrors." Since it is wicked to say this, it is certainly wicked to kill oneself. For if there could be any just cause for doing this voluntarily, there would surely be none more just than this one. But since not even this one is just, there is none.

BY WHAT JUDGMENT OF GOD THE LUST OF THE ENEMY WAS ALLOWED TO SIN AGAINST THE BODIES OF THE CHASTE

God may have permitted the rapes to humble pride or to guard against it.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.28	Non itaque uobis, o fideles Christi, sit taedio uita uestra, si ludibrio fuit hostibus castitas uestra. Habetis magnam ueramque consolationem, si fidam conscientiam retinetis non uos consensisse peccatis eorum, qui in uos peccare permissi sunt. Quod si forte, quur permissi sint, quaeritis, alta quidem est prouidentia creatoris mundi adque rectoris, et inscrutabilia sunt iudicia eius et inuestigabiles uiae eius; uerum tamen interrogate fideliter animas uestras, ne forte de isto integritatis et continentiae uel pudicitiae bono uos inflatius extulistis et humanis laudibus delectatae in hoc etiam aliquibus inuidistis. Non accuso quod nescio, nec audio quod uobis interrogata uestra corda respondent. Tamen si ita esse responderint, nolite admirari hoc uos amisisse, unde hominibus placere gestistis, illud uobis remansisse, quod ostendi hominibus non potest.	So, you who are faithful to Christ, do not let your life be a burden to you if your chastity has been made a plaything by the enemy. You have a great and true consolation if you keep a sure conscience that you did not consent to the sins of those who were permitted to sin against you. If perhaps you ask why they were permitted, the providence of the Creator and Ruler of the world is indeed deep, and "his judgments are unsearchable and his ways past finding out." Yet question your own souls faithfully: perhaps you were too puffed up with pride over this good of integrity, of continence, or of chastity, and, delighting in human praise, even envied others in this respect. I do not accuse what I do not know, nor do I hear what your hearts answer when they are questioned. Still, if they answer that it is so, do not be amazed that you have lost what you longed to please people with, while what cannot be shown to people has remained yours.[42]
	Si peccantibus non consensistis, diuinae gratiae, ne amitteretur, diuinum accessit auxilium; humanae gloriae,	If you did not consent to those who sinned, divine help came to divine grace, so that it would not be 41 Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 3:26.

42 Romans 11:33.

LATIN

ne amaretur, humanum successit obprobrium. In utroque consolamini, pusillanimes, illinc probatae hinc castigatae, illinc iustificatae hinc emendatae. Quarum uero corda interrogata respondent numquam se de bono uirginitatis uel uiduitatis uel coniugalis pudicitiae superbisse, sed humilibus consentiendo de dono Dei cum tremore exultasse, nec inuidisse cuiquam paris excellentiam sanctitatis et castitatis, sed humana laude postposita, quae tanto maior deferri solet, quanto est bonum rarius quod exigit laudem, optasse potius ut amplior earum numerus esset, quam ut ipsae in paucitate amplius eminerent: nec istae, quae tales sunt, si earum quoque aliquas barbarica libido conpressit, permissum hoc esse causentur, nec ideo Deum credant ista neglegere, quia permittit quod nemo inpune committit.

Quaedam enim ueluti pondera malarum cupiditatum et per occultum praesens diuinum iudicium relaxantur et manifesto ultimo reseruantur. Fortassis autem istae, quae bene sibi sunt consciae non se ex isto castitatis bono cor inflatum extulisse, et tamen uim hostilem in carne perpessae sunt, habebant aliquid latentis infirmitatis, quae posset in superbiae fastum, si hanc humilitatem in uastatione illa euasissent, extolli. Sicut ergo quidam morte rapti sunt, ne malitia mutaret intellectum eorum, ita quiddam ab istis ui raptum est, ne prosperitas mutaret modestiam earum. Utrisque igitur, quae de carne sua, quod turpem nullius esset perpessa contactum, uel iam superbiebant uel superbire, si nec hostium uiolentia contrectata esset, forsitan poterant, non ablata est castitas, sed humilitas persuasa; illarum tumori succursum est inmanenti, istarum occursum est inminenti.

Quamquam et illud non sit tacendum, quod quibusdam, quae ista perpessae sunt, potuit uideri continentiae bonum in bonis corporalibus deputandum et tunc lost. Human disgrace came upon human glory, so that it would not be loved. Take comfort in both, you who are fainthearted: on the one side you were tested, on the other chastised; on the one side justified, on the other corrected. But some women's hearts, when questioned, answer that they have never been proud of the good of virginity, or widowhood, or marital chastity. Agreeing with the humble, they have rejoiced with trembling in God's gift. They have envied no one an excellence of holiness and chastity equal to their own. Setting aside human praise, which is usually paid all the more lavishly the rarer the good that calls for it, they have wished rather that their number were larger than that they themselves should stand out more by being few. Even these women, who are like this, must not complain that it was permitted if foreign lust violated some of them too. Nor should they believe that God neglects such things because he permits what no one commits with impunity.

ENGLISH

For certain burdens, so to speak, of evil desires are both let loose in the present through God's hidden judgment and reserved for his open judgment at the last. Perhaps, too, these women, who know well that their hearts were not puffed up with pride over this good of chastity, and who nevertheless suffered the enemy's violence in their flesh, had some hidden weakness. It could have swelled into arrogant pride if they had escaped this humiliation in that devastation. Just as some were "snatched away by death so that wickedness might not change their understanding," so something was snatched from these women by force so that prosperity might not change their modesty. Consider both groups: those who were already proud of their flesh because it had suffered no one's shameful touch, and those who might perhaps have become proud if it had not been handled by the enemy's violence. For both, chastity was not taken away. Instead, humility was instilled. For the first, help came to a swelling already present. For the second, a swelling about to arise was headed off.[43]

This too should not be passed over in silence. Some of the women who suffered these things may have thought several things about chastity.

43 Wisdom 4:11.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	manere, si nullius libidine corpus adtrectaretur; non esse autem positum in solo adiuto diuinitus robore uoluntatis, ut sit sanctum et corpus et spiritus; nec tale bonum esse, quod inuito animo non possit auferri: qui error eis fortasse sublatus est. Cum enim cogitant, qua conscientia Deo seruierint, et fide inconcussa non de illo sentiunt, quod ita sibi seruientes eumque inuocantes deserere ullo modo potuerit, quantumque illi castitas placeat dubitare non possunt, uident esse consequens nequaquam illum fuisse permissurum, ut haec acciderent sanctis suis, si eo modo perire posset sanctitas, quam contulit eis et diligit in eis.	They may have thought that the good of continence should be counted among bodily goods, and lasts only as long as the body is not handled by anyone's lust. They may also have thought that it does not reside solely in the strength of the will, assisted by God, so that both body and spirit may be holy, and that it is not the kind of good that cannot be taken away against the mind's will. That error has perhaps been taken from them. For they consider with what conscience they have served God, and with unshaken faith they do not think him capable of in any way abandoning those who served him and called upon him as they did. Nor can they doubt how much chastity pleases him. So they see that it follows that he would never have permitted these things to happen to his saints if the holiness he conferred on them, and loves in them, could perish in that way.

WHAT THE HOUSEHOLD OF CHRIST SHOULD REPLY TO UNBELIEVERS WHO TAUNT THEM THAT CHRIST DID NOT FREE THEM FROM THE ENEMY'S FURY

Christians answer the taunt "Where is your God?" by pointing to God's presence everywhere.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.29	Habet itaque omnis familia summi et ueri Dei consolationem suam, non fallacem nec in spe rerum nutantium uel labentium constitutam, uitamque etiam ipsam temporalem minime paenitendam, in qua eruditur ad aeternam, bonisque terrenis tamquam peregrina utitur nec capitur, malis autem aut probatur aut emendatur. Illi uero, qui probitati eius insultant eique dicunt, cum forte in aliqua temporalia mala deuenerit: Ubi est Deus tuus? ipsi dicant, ubi sint di eorum, cum talia patiuntur, pro quibus euitandis eos uel colunt uel colendos esse contendunt.	So the whole household of the supreme and true God has its own consolation. It does not deceive, and it is not founded on hope in things that totter or slip away. Nor need it regret even this temporal life, in which it is being trained for eternal life. It uses earthly goods like a pilgrim, without being captured by them, and by evils it is either tested or corrected. Others mock its uprightness, and when it happens to fall into some temporal evils, they say to it, "Where is your God?" Let them say where their own gods are when they suffer the very things they worship those gods, or insist they must be worshiped, in order to avoid.[44]
	Nam ista respondet: Dens meus ubique praesens, ubique totus, nusquam inclusus, qui possit adesse secretus, abesse non motus; ille cum me aduersis rebus exagitat, aut merita examinat aut peccata castigat mercedemque mihi aeternam pro toleratis pie malis temporalibus seruat; uos autem qui estis, cum quibus loqui dignum sit saltem de dis uestris, quanto minus de Deo meo, qui terribilis est super omnes deos, quoniam di gentium daemonia, Dominus autem caelos fecit.	For the household answers: "My God is present everywhere, wholly everywhere, enclosed nowhere. He can be present unseen and absent without moving. When he harasses me with adversity, he is either examining my merits or chastising my sins, and he keeps an eternal reward for me in return for temporal evils piously endured. But who are you, that it should be worth talking with you even about your gods, much less about my God? He 'is to be feared above all gods, for the

44 Psalm 41:4 (42:3 in most English Bibles).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens.'"[45]

WHAT SHAMEFUL PROSPERITY THOSE WHO COMPLAIN ABOUT CHRISTIAN TIMES WANT TO ABOUND IN

Those who blame Christian times only want luxury without fear, as Scipio Nasica foresaw.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.30	Si Nasica ille Scipio uester quondam pontifex uiueret, quem sub terrore belli Punici in suscipiendis Phrygiis sacris, cum uir optimus quaereretur, uniuersus senatus elegit, cuius os fortasse non auderetis aspicere, ipse uos ab hac inpudentia cohiberet. Quur enim adflicti rebus aduersis de temporibus querimini Christianis, nisi quia uestram luxuriam cupitis habere securam et perditissimis moribus remota omni molestiarum asperitate diffluere? Neque enim propterea cupitis habere pacem et omni genere copiarum abundare, ut his bonis honeste utamini, hoc est modeste sobrie, temperanter pie, sed ut infinita uarietas uoluptatum insanis effusionibus exquiratur, secundisque rebus ea mala oriantur in moribus, quae saeuientibus peiora sunt hostibus.	Think of that Scipio Nasica of yours, once your pontiff. Amid the terror of the Punic War, when the best man in Rome was sought to receive the Phrygian rites, the entire senate chose him. Perhaps you would not dare to look him in the face. If he were alive, he himself would restrain you from this shamelessness. For why, when afflicted by adversity, do you complain about Christian times? Is it not because you want your luxury left undisturbed, so that you may wallow in utterly depraved morals with every harsh trouble removed? You do not want peace and an abundance of every kind of plenty in order to use these goods honorably, that is, modestly, soberly, temperately, and piously. You want them so that an endless variety of pleasures may be pursued with insane extravagance, and so that, amid prosperity, evils may spring up in your morals that are worse than raging enemies.[46]
	At ille Scipio pontifex maximus uester, ille iudicio totius senatus uir optimus, istam uobis metuens calamitatem nolebat aemulam tunc imperii Romani Carthaginem dirui et decernenti ut diueretur contradicebat Catoni, timens infirmis animis hostem securitatem, et tamquam pupillis ciuibus idoneum tutorem necessarium uidens esse terrorem. Nec eum sententia fefellit: re ipsa probatum est quam uerum diceret.	But that Scipio, your chief pontiff, judged by the whole senate to be the best of men, feared this calamity for you. So he did not want Carthage, then the rival of Roman rule, to be destroyed, and he opposed Cato when Cato moved that it be destroyed. He feared security as an enemy of weak spirits, and he saw that fear was necessary as a suitable guardian for the citizens, as though they were wards. Nor was he mistaken in his judgment: events themselves proved how truly he spoke.[47]
	Deleta quippe Carthagine magno scilicet terrore Romanae rei publicae depulso et extincto tanta de rebus prosperis orta mala continuo subsecuta sunt, ut corrupta diruptaque concordia prius saeuis cruentisque seditionibus, deinde mox malarum conexione causarum bellis etiam ciuilibus tantae strages ederentur, tantus sanguis effunderetur, tanta cupiditate proscriptionum ac rapinarum ferueret inmanitas, ut Romani illi, qui uita	For once Carthage was destroyed, and the great terror of the Roman commonwealth had been driven off and extinguished, such great evils born of prosperity followed at once. Concord was corrupted and torn apart, first by savage and bloody seditions. Then, soon after, through a chain of evil causes, it was torn apart by civil wars as well. So much slaughter was wrought, so much blood was

45 Psalm 95:4–5 (96:4–5 in most English Bibles).

46 Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica was chosen in 204 BC as Rome's "best man" to receive the sacred image of the Phrygian Great Mother (Cybele). Augustine here merges him with his son, Scipio Nasica Corculum, chief pontiff, who opposed the destruction of Carthage.

47 Cato the Elder (234–149 BC), who famously insisted that Carthage must be destroyed. It was razed in 146 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
integriore mala metuebant ab hostibus, perdita integritate uitae crudeliora paterentur a ciuibus; eaque ipsa libido dominandi, quae inter alia uitia generis humani meracior inerat uniuerso populo Romano, postea quam in paucis potentioribus uicit, obtritos fatigatosque ceteros etiam iugo seruitutis obpressit.	shed, and such savagery seethed with greed for proscriptions and plunder, that those Romans who had feared evils from their enemies while their life was more upright now suffered crueler things from their fellow citizens, once that uprightness was lost. And that very lust for domination, which among the other vices of the human race was present in a purer form in the Roman people as a whole, prevailed at last in a few of the more powerful; and then it crushed the rest, worn down and exhausted, under the yoke of slavery as well.

BY WHAT STAGES OF VICE THE LUST FOR POWER GREW AMONG THE ROMANS

Prosperity after Carthage fell fed ambition, greed and the lust for domination.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.31 Nam quando illa quiesceret in superbissimis mentibus, donec continuatis honoribus ad potestatem regiam perueniret? Honorum porro continuandorum facultas non esset, nisi ambitio praeualeret. Minime autem praeualeret ambitio, nisi in populo auaritia luxuriaque corrupto. Auarus uero luxuriosusque populus secundis rebus effectus est, quas Nasica ille prouidentissime cauendas esse censebat, quando ciuitatem hostium maximam fortissimam opulentissimam nolebat auferri, ut timore libido premeretur, libido pressa non luxuriaretur luxuriaque cohibita nec auaritia grassaretur; quibus uitiis obseratis ciuitati utilis uirtus floreret et cresceret eique uirtuti libertas congrua permaneret.	For when would that lust have come to rest in those most proud minds before it reached royal power through a succession of offices? Yet there would have been no opportunity for holding office after office unless ambition prevailed. And ambition would hardly prevail except among a people corrupted by greed and luxury. The people became greedy and luxurious through prosperity. Nasica, with the greatest foresight, judged that this prosperity must be guarded against when he did not want the greatest, strongest, and richest of enemy cities to be removed. He wanted lust to be held down by fear, so that lust, held down, would not run riot in luxury, and luxury, restrained, would not let greed rampage either. With these vices barred, the virtue useful to the city would flourish and grow, and the liberty befitting that virtue would endure.
Hinc etiam erat et ex hac prouidentissima patriae caritate ueniebat, quod idem ipse uester pontifex maximus, a senatu illius temporis (quod saepe dicendum est) electus sine ulla sententiarum discrepantia uir optimus, caueam theatri senatum construere molientem ab hac dispositione et cupiditate conpescuit persuasitque oratione grauissima, ne Graecam luxuriam uirilibus patriae moribus paterentur obrepere et ad uirtutem labefactandam eneruandamque Romanam peregrinae consentire nequitiae, tantumque auctoritate ualuit, ut uerbis eius commota senatoria prouidentia etiam subsellia, quibus ad horam congestis in ludorum spectaculo iam uti ciuitas coeperat, deinceps prohiberet adponi. Quanto studio iste ab urbe Roma ludos ipsos scaenicos abstulisset, si auctoritati eorum, quos deos	The same reason, and the same most farsighted love of his country, lay behind another act. This same chief pontiff of yours was chosen as the best of men by the senate of that time without a single dissenting vote, a fact that must often be repeated. When the senate set about building a theater, he checked it in this plan and this craving. In a most weighty speech he persuaded them not to let Greek luxury creep into the manly ways of their country, and not to give in to foreign depravity so as to weaken and sap Roman virtue. His authority was so strong that the senate, moved by his words and acting with foresight, forbade from then on even the benches to be set out. These benches were piled up for the occasion at the shows of the putabat, resistere auderet, quos esse noxios daemones non intellegebat aut, si intellegebat, placandos etiam ipse potius quam contemnendos existimabat.	games, and the city had already begun to use them. How eagerly he would have removed the theatrical shows themselves from the city of Rome, if he had dared to resist the authority of those he thought were gods! He did not understand that they were harmful demons. Or, if he did understand, he too thought they should be placated rather than despised.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nondum enim fuerat declarata gentibus superna doctrina, quae fide cor mundans ad caelestia uel supercaelestia capessenda humili pietate humanum mutaret adfectum et a dominatu superborum daemonum liberaret.	For the teaching from above had not yet been made known to the nations. That teaching, cleansing the heart by faith, would change human affections through humble piety so that they would strive for heavenly and even more-than-heavenly things, and it would free them from the domination of proud demons.

THE FOUNDING OF THE THEATRICAL SHOWS

The gods themselves demanded theatrical shows, which corrupted Roman morals.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.32 Verum tamen scitote, qui ista nescitis et qui uos scire dissimulatis, aduertite, qui aduersus liberatorem a talibus dominis murmuratis: ludi scaenici, spectacula turpitudinum et licentia uanitatum, non hominum uitiis, sed deorum uestrorum iussis Romae instituti sunt. Tolerabilius diuinos honores deferretis illi Scipioni quam deos huius modi coleretis. Neque enim erant illi di suo pontifice meliores. Ecce adtendite, si mens tam diu potatis erroribus ebria uos aliquid sanum cogitare permittit! Di propter sedandam corporum pestilentiam ludos sibi scaenicos exhiberi iubebant; pontifex autem propter animorum cauendam pestilentiam ipsam scaenam constitui prohibebat. Si aliqua luce mentis animum corpori praeponitis, eligite quem colatis!	But know this, you who are ignorant of these things and you who pretend not to know them. Take note, you who grumble against the one who freed you from such masters. The theatrical shows, spectacles of obscenity and license for frivolity, were instituted at Rome not by human vices but by the commands of your gods. It would be more tolerable for you to pay divine honors to that Scipio than to worship gods of this kind. For those gods were no better than their own pontiff. Pay attention now, if a mind drunk on errors swallowed for so long allows you to think anything sane! The gods ordered theatrical shows to be put on for them in order to calm a plague of the body. But the pontiff forbade the stage itself to be built in order to guard against a plague of the soul. If you have any light of mind to rank the soul above the body, choose whom you will worship![48]
Neque enim et illa corporum pestilentia ideo conquieuit, quia populo bellicoso et solis antea ludis circensibus adsueto ludorum scaenicorum delicata subintrauit insania; sed astutia spirituum nefandorum praeuidens illam pestilentiam iam fine debito cessaturam aliam longe grauiorem, qua plurimum gaudet, ex hac occasione non corporibus, sed moribus curauit inmittere, quae animos miserorum tantis obcaecauit tenebris, tanta foedauit deformitate, ut etiam modo (quod incredibile	Nor did that plague of the body subside because the effete madness of theatrical shows crept in among a warlike people, previously accustomed only to the games of the circus. Rather, the cunning of the wicked spirits foresaw that the plague was about to cease when its due end came. So it used the occasion to send another plague, far more serious, in which it takes the greatest delight, and it sent this one not on bodies but on 48 According to Livy (7.2), stage shows were first introduced at Rome in 364 BC to appease the gods during a plague.

LATIN	ENGLISH
forsitan erit, si a nostris posteris audietur) Romana urbe uastata, quos pestilentia ista possedit adque inde fugientes Carthaginem peruenire potuerunt, in theatris cottidie certatim pro histrionibus insanirent.	morals. This plague blinded the minds of the wretched with such darkness, and disfigured them with such ugliness, that even now something has happened that will perhaps seem incredible when our descendants hear of it. After the city of Rome was devastated, those whom this plague possessed, and who managed to flee from there and reach Carthage, went mad every day in the theaters, competing with one another in their frenzy for the actors.

THE VICES OF THE ROMANS, WHICH THE OVERTHROW OF THEIR COUNTRY DID NOT CORRECT

Refugees from Rome crowded the theaters of Carthage while the East mourned the City.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.33 mentes amentes! quis est hic tantus non error, sed furor, ut exitium uestrum, sicut audiuimus, plangentibus orientalibus populis et maximis ciuitatibus in remotissimis terris publicum luctum maeroremque ducentibus uos theatra quaereretis intraretis inpleretis, et multo insaniora quam fuerant antea faceretis? Hanc animorum labem ac pestem, hanc probitatis et honestatis euersionem uobis Scipio ille metuebat, quando construi theatra prohibebat, quando rebus prosperis uos facile corrumpi adque euerti posse cernebat, quando uos securos esse ab hostili terrore nolebat. Neque enim censebat ille felicem esse rem publicam stantibus moenibus, ruentibus moribus. Sed in uobis plus ualuit quod daemones inpii seduxerunt, quam quod homines prouidi praecauerunt. Hinc est quod mala, quae facitis, uobis inputari non uultis, mala uero, quae patimini, Christianis temporibus inputatis.	O minds out of your minds! What is this enormous, not error, but madness? As we have heard, the peoples of the East bewailed your ruin, and the greatest cities in the most remote lands held public mourning and lamentation. Meanwhile you were seeking out the theaters, entering them, filling them, and behaving far more insanely than before! This corruption and plague of souls, this overthrow of uprightness and decency, is what that Scipio feared for you. He feared it when he forbade theaters to be built, when he saw that you could easily be corrupted and overthrown by prosperity, and when he did not want you to be free from fear of an enemy. For he did not think a commonwealth happy when its walls were standing and its morals were falling. But with you, the seductions of impious demons had more force than the warnings of farsighted men. That is why you do not want the evils you do to be charged to you, while you charge the evils you suffer to Christian times.
Neque enim in uestra securitate pacatam rem publicam, sed luxuriam quaeritis inpunitam, qui deprauati rebus prosperis nec corrigi potuistis aduersis. Volebat uos ille Scipio terreri ab hoste, ne in luxuriam flueretis: nec contriti ab hoste luxuriam repressistis, perdidistis utilitatem calamitatis, et miserrimi facti estis et pessimi permansistis.	For in your security you are not seeking a commonwealth at peace, but luxury unpunished. Corrupted by prosperity, you could not be corrected by adversity either. That Scipio wanted you to be frightened by an enemy so that you would not dissolve into luxury. Yet even when crushed by the enemy you did not curb your luxury. You lost the benefit of calamity: you have become most wretched, and you have remained most wicked.

GOD'S MERCY, WHICH SOFTENED THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY

The invaders, by sparing those in the churches, imitated Romulus's asylum.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.34	Et tamen quod uiuitis Dei est, qui uobis parcendo admonet, ut corrigamini paenitendo; qui uobis etiam ingratis praestitit, ut uel sub nomine seruorum eius uel in locis martyrum eius hostiles manus euaderetis. Romulus et Remus asylum constituisse perhibentur, quo quisquis confugeret ab omni noxa liber esset, augere quaerentes creandae multitudinem ciuitatis. Mirandum in honorem Christi processit exemplum. Hoc constituerunt euersores Urbis, quod constituerant antea conditores. Quid autem magnum, si hoc fecerunt illi, ut ciuium suorum numerus subpleretur, quod fecerunt isti, ut suorum hostium numerositas seruaretur?	And yet the fact that you are alive is God's doing. By sparing you he warns you to be corrected through repentance. Even though you are ungrateful, he granted that you should escape the hands of the enemy, either under the name of his servants or in the places of his martyrs. Romulus and Remus are said to have established an asylum, so that whoever fled there would be free from all punishment, for they sought to increase the population of the city they were founding. This precedent has turned out remarkably, to the honor of Christ. The destroyers of the City established what its founders had established before. But what is so great about the founders doing this to make up the number of their citizens, compared with the destroyers doing it to preserve a multitude of their enemies?[49]

THE CHURCH'S HIDDEN CHILDREN AMONG THE UNGODLY, AND THE FALSE CHRISTIANS WITHIN THE CHURCH

Hidden future citizens live among the enemies, and false Christians among the faithful.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
1.35	Haec et talia, si qua uberius et commodius potuerit, respondeat inimicis suis redemta familia domini Christi et peregrina ciuitas regis Christi. Meminerit sane in ipsis inimicis latere ciues futuros, ne infructuosum uel aput ipsos putet, quod, donec perueniat ad confessos, portat infensos; sicut ex illorum numero etiam Dei ciuitas habet secum, quamdiu peregrinatur in mundo, conexos communione sacramentorum, nec secum futuros in aeterna sorte sanctorum, qui partim in occulto, partim in aperto sunt, qui etiam cum ipsis inimicis aduersus Deum, cuius sacramentum gerunt, murmurare non dubitant, modo cum illis theatra, modo ecclesias nobiscum replentes. De correctione autem quorundam etiam talium multo minus est desperandum, si aput apertissimos aduersarios praedestinati amici latitant, adhuc ignoti etiam sibi.	These are the answers, and others like them, fuller and more fitting ones if it can find any, that the redeemed household of the Lord Christ and the pilgrim city of Christ the King should give to its enemies. But let it remember that among these very enemies future citizens lie hidden. Then it will not think it fruitless, even with regard to them, to bear with them while they are hostile, until it wins them over to confessing the faith. In the same way, as long as it is a pilgrim in the world, the city of God has with it some from the number of its enemies. They are joined to it by communion in the sacraments, but they will not be with it in the eternal lot of the saints. Some of them are hidden, some open. They do not even hesitate to join the enemies themselves in grumbling against God, whose sacrament they bear. At one time they fill the theaters with those enemies, at another the churches with us. But we have far less reason to despair of the correction of some even of these 49 According to Livy (1.8), Romulus opened a sanctuary on the Capitoline Hill to attract settlers to his new city.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	people, since among the most open adversaries predestined friends lie hidden, as yet unknown even to themselves.
Perplexae quippe sunt istae duae ciuitates in hoc saeculo inuicemque permixtae, donec ultimo iudicio dirimantur; de quarum exortu et procursu et debitis finibus quod dicendum arbitror, quantum diuinitus adiuuabor, expediam propter gloriam ciuitatis Dei, quae alienis a contrario comparatis clarius eminebit.	For in this age these two cities are entangled and mixed together until they are separated at the last judgment. Concerning their origin, their progress, and their appointed ends, I will set out what I think must be said, as far as God helps me. I will do so for the glory of the city of God, which will stand out more clearly by contrast with what is alien to it.

WHAT SUBJECTS ARE TO BE DISCUSSED IN WHAT FOLLOWS

Augustine outlines the arguments of the books to come.

LATIN	ENGLISH
1.36 Sed adhuc mihi quaedam dicenda sunt aduersus eos, qui Romanae rei publicae clades in religionem nostram referunt, qua dis suis sacrificare prohibentur. Commemoranda sunt enim quae et quanta occurrere potuerint uel satis esse uidebuntur mala, quae illa ciuitas pertulit uel ad eius imperium prouinciae pertinentes, antequam eorum sacrificia prohibita fuissent; quae omnia procul dubio nobis tribuerent, si iam uel illis clareret nostra religio, uel ita eos a sacris sacrilegis prohiberet. Deinde monstrandum est, quos eorum mores et quam ob causam Deus uerus ad augendum imperium adiuuare dignatus est, in cuius potestate sunt regna omnia, quamque nihil eos adiuuerint hi, quos deos putant, et potius quantum decipiendo et fallendo nocuerint.	But I still have some things to say against those who blame the disasters of the Roman commonwealth on our religion, because it forbids them to sacrifice to their gods. For I must recall the evils, as many and as great as occur to me or seem sufficient, that the city and the provinces belonging to its empire endured before their sacrifices were forbidden. They would no doubt attribute all of these to us, if our religion had already shone upon them too, or had forbidden them their sacrilegious rites as it does now. Then I must show which of their ways the true God, in whose power are all kingdoms, deigned to help in increasing their empire, and for what reason. I must also show how little those whom they think are gods helped them, and how much more those gods harmed them by deceiving and misleading them.
Postremo aduersus eos dicetur, qui manifestissimis documentis confutati adque conuicti conantur adserere non propter uitae praesentis utilitatem, sed propter eam, quae post mortem futura est, colendos deos. Quae, nisi fallor, quaestio multo erit operosior et subtiliore disputatione dignior, ut et contra philosophos in ea disseratur, non quoslibet, sed qui aput illos excellentissima gloria clari sunt et nobiscum multa sentiunt, et de animae inmortalitate et quod Deus uerus mundum condiderit et de prouidentia eius, qua uniuersum quod condidit regit. Sed quoniam et ipsi in illis, quae contra nos sentiunt, refellendi sunt, deesse huic officio non debemus, ut refutatis inpiis contradictionibus pro uiribus, quas Deus impertiet, adseramus ciuitatem Dei ueramque pietatem et Dei	Finally, I will speak against those who, refuted and convicted by the clearest evidence, try to maintain that the gods are to be worshiped not for the benefit of the present life but for the sake of the life that is to come after death. Unless I am mistaken, this question will be much more laborious and will deserve subtler discussion. In it I must argue against philosophers as well, and not just any philosophers. I mean those who are renowned among them for the most outstanding glory and who agree with us on many things: on the immortality of the soul, on the true God having created the world, and on his providence, by which he rules the whole of what he created. But since they too must be refuted on the points where they disagree with us, we must not fail in this duty. Having refuted impi-

LATIN	ENGLISH
cultum, in quo uno ueraciter sempiterna beatitudo promittitur.	ous objections with whatever strength God grants, we may then uphold the city of God, true piety, and the worship of God, in which alone eternal happiness is truthfully promised.
Hic itaque modus sit huius uoluminis, ut deinceps disposita ab alio sumamus exordio.	So let this be the limit of this book, so that we may take up what comes next in our plan with a new beginning.

Book II

Rome's moral decline
The gods never taught the Romans to live well; their shows and rites corrupted public morals.

THE LIMIT THAT MUST BE SET TO THE NEED FOR ARGUMENT

Some opponents will never stop arguing, so not every objection deserves a reply.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.1	Si rationi perspicuae ueritatis infirmus humanae consuetudinis sensus non auderet obsistere, sed doctrinae salubri languorem suum tamquam medicinae subderet, donec diuino adiutorio fide pietatis inpetrante sanaretur, non multo sermone opus esset ad conuincendum quemlibet uanae opinationis errorem his, qui recte sentiunt et sensa uerbis sufficientibus explicant. Nunc uero quoniam ille est maior et taetrior insipientium morbus animorum, quo inrationabiles motus suos, etiam post rationem plene redditam, quanta homini ab homine debetur, siue nimia caecitate, qua nec aperta cernuntur, siue obstinatissima peruicacia, qua et ea quae cernuntur non feruntur, tamquam ipsam rationem ueritatemque defendunt, fit necessitas copiosius dicendi plerumque res claras, uelut eas non spectantibus intuendas, sed quodam modo tangendas palpantibus et coniuentibus offeramus.	Suppose the weak understanding that comes from human habit did not dare to resist the reasoning of plain truth. Suppose it submitted its sickness to sound teaching as to a medicine, until it was healed by divine help won through devout faith. Then those who think rightly, and set out their thoughts in adequate words, would need no long discourse to refute any error of empty opinion. As it is, however, foolish minds suffer from a greater and more loathsome disease. Through it they defend their irrational impulses as if these were reason and truth itself, even after a reason has been fully given, as fully as one human being owes it to another. They do this either from excessive blindness, which keeps them from seeing even what is plain, or from the most obstinate perversity, which keeps them from accepting even what they see. So it becomes necessary to say a great deal about things that are mostly clear. It is as though we were presenting them not to people with open eyes, for them to look at, but, in a manner of speaking, to people groping with their eyes shut, for them to touch.
	Et tamen quis disceptandi finis erit et loquendi modus, si respondendum esse respondentibus semper existi memus? Nam qui uel non possunt intellegere quod dicitur, uel tam duri sunt aduersitate mentis, ut, etiamsi intellexerint, non oboediant, respondent, ut scriptum est, et loquuntur iniquitatem adque infatigabiliter uani sunt. Quorum dicta contraria si totiens uelimus refellere, quotiens obnixa fronte statuerint non cogitare quid dicant, dum quocumque modo nostris disputationibus contradicant, quam sit infinitum et aerumnosum et infructuosum uides.	And yet what end will there be to debate, what limit to talk, if we think we must always reply to those who reply? For some either cannot understand what is said, or are so hardened by the perversity of their minds that they will not yield even if they do understand. They "reply and speak wickedness," as it is written, and are tirelessly empty. Suppose we chose to refute their objections every time they resolved, with brazen face, not to think about what they say, so long as they contradict our arguments in any way at all. You see how endless, wearisome and fruitless that would be.[1]

1 Psalm 93:4 (94:4 in most English Bibles).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Quam ob rem, nec te ipsum, fili Marcelline, nec alios, quibus hic labor noster in Christi caritate utiliter ac liberaliter seruit, tales meorum scriptorum uelim iudices, qui responsionem semper desiderent, cum his quae leguntur audierint aliquid contradici, ne fiant similes earum muliercularum, quas commemorat apostolus semper discentes et numquam ad ueritatis scientiam peruenientes..	So, my son Marcellinus, I would not want you, or the others whom this work of mine serves usefully and freely in the love of Christ, to be the kind of judges of my writings who always want a reply whenever they hear something said against what they read. Otherwise they become like those foolish women the apostle mentions, "always learning and never arriving at knowledge of the truth."[2]

WHAT WAS SETTLED IN THE FIRST BOOK

Augustine summarizes Book 1 and announces Rome's earlier disasters as his next subject.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.2	Superiore itaque libro, cum de ciuitate Dei dicere instituissem, unde hoc uniuersum opus illo adiuuante in manus sumtum est, occurrit mihi resistendum esse primitus eis, qui haec bella, quibus mundus iste conteritur, maximeque Romanae urbis recentem a barbaris uastationem Christianae religioni tribuunt, qua prohibentur nefandis sacrificiis seruire daemonibus, cum potius hoc tribuere deberent Christo, quod propter eius nomen contra institutum moremque bellorum eis, quo confugerent, religiosa et amplissima loca barbari libera praebuerunt, adque in multis famulatum deditum Christo non solum uerum, sed etiam timore confictum sic honorauerunt, ut, quod in eos belli iure fieri licuisset, inlicitum sibi esse iudicarent. Inde incidit quaestio, quur haec diuina beneficia et ad inpios ingratosque peruenerint, et quur itidem illa dura, quae hostiliter facta sunt, pios cum inpiis pariter adflixerint?	In the previous book, then, I set out to speak about the city of God, the subject for which this whole work was undertaken with his help. It struck me that I must first resist those who blame the Christian religion for these wars that are grinding this world down, and above all for the recent devastation of the city of Rome by the invaders. They blame it because it forbids them to serve demons with abominable sacrifices. Instead, they ought to credit Christ with this: for the sake of his name, and against the custom and practice of war, the invaders left spacious religious places free for them to take refuge in. In many cases the invaders so honored service devoted to Christ, not only genuine service but even service feigned out of fear, that they judged it forbidden to themselves to do what the law of war would have permitted against these people. From this arose the question why these divine benefits came also to the ungodly and ungrateful, and why, likewise, the harsh things done by the enemy afflicted the godly together with the ungodly.
	Quam quaestionem per multa diffusam (in omnibus enim cottidianis uel Dei muneribus uel hominum cladibus, quorum utraque bene ac male uiuentibus permixte adque indiscrete saepe accidunt, solet multos mouere) ut pro suscepti operis necessitate dissoluerem, aliquantum inmoratus sum maxime ad consolandas sanctas feminas et pie castas, in quibus ab hoste aliquid perpetratum est, quod intulit uerecundiae dolorem, etsi non abstulit pudicitiae firmitatem, ne paeniteat eas uitae, quas non est unde possit paenitere nequitiae. Deinde pauca dixi in eos, qui Christianos aduersis illis rebus adfectos et praecipue pudorem humiliatarum feminarum quamuis	This question extends to many matters. It commonly troubles many people in the face of all the daily gifts of God and disasters of men, since both often befall those who live well and those who live badly, mixed together and without distinction. To resolve it, as the work I had undertaken required, I dwelt on it for some time. Above all I wished to console the holy and devoutly chaste women on whom the enemy perpetrated something that brought them the pain of shame, though it did not take away the firmness of their purity. They should not be sorry to be alive, since there is no

2 2 Timothy 3:7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
castarum adque sanctarum proteruitate inpudentissima exagitant, cum sint nequissimi et inreuerentissimi, longe ab eis ipsis Romanis degeneres, quorum praeclara multa laudantur et litterarum memoria celebrantur, immo illorum gloriae uehementer aduersi.	wickedness for them to be sorry for. Then I said a few things against those who, with the most shameless insolence, harass the Christians afflicted by those adversities, and especially mock the shame of women who were humiliated, chaste and holy though they were. These people are utterly wicked and irreverent, far degenerated from those very Romans whose many splendid deeds are praised and celebrated in literature. Indeed, they are vehemently opposed to the glory of those Romans.
Romam quippe partam ueterum auctamque laboribus foediorem stantem fecerant quam ruentem, quando quidem in ruina eius lapides et ligna, in istorum autem uita omnia non murorum, sed morum munimenta adque ornamenta ceciderunt, cum funestioribus eorum corda cupiditatibus quam ignibus tecta illius urbis arderent. Quibus dictis primum terminaui librum. Deinceps itaque dicere institui, quae mala ciuitas illa perpessa sit ab origine sua siue aput se ipsam siue in prouinciis sibi iam subditis, quae omnia Christianae religioni tribuerent, si iam tunc euangelica doctrina aduersus falsos et fallaces eorum deos testificatione liberrima personaret.	For Rome, founded and enlarged by the labors of the ancients, they had made fouler while it still stood than when it fell. In its fall, stones and timbers came down. In their lives, however, all the defenses and adornments fell, not of walls but of morals, since their hearts burned with cravings more deadly than the fires that burned the roofs of that city. With these words I ended the first book. Next, then, I resolved to describe the evils that city has suffered since its origin, whether at home or in the provinces already subject to it. They would blame all of these on the Christian religion if the teaching of the gospel had already been sounding forth then, bearing its free witness against their false and deceitful gods.

THAT HISTORY MUST BE CALLED ON TO SHOW WHAT EVILS BEFELL THE ROMANS WHILE THEY WORSHIPED THE GODS, BEFORE THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION GREW STRONG

Educated pagans know Rome suffered disasters long before Christ but hide it from the crowd.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.3 Memento autem me ista commemorantem adhuc contra inperitos agere, ex quorum inperitia illud quoque ortum est uulgare prouerbium: Pluuia defit, causa Christiani sunt. Nam qui eorum studiis liberalibus instituti amant historiam, facillime ista nouerunt; sed ut nobis ineruditorum turbas infestissimas reddant, se nosse dissimulant adque hoc aput uulgus confirmare nituntur, clades, quibus per certa interualla locorum et temporum genus humanum oportet adfligi, causa accidere nominis Christiani, quod contra deos suos ingenti fama et praeclarissima celebritate per cuncta diffunditur.	But remember that in recalling these things I am still dealing with the uneducated. Their ignorance gave rise to the common proverb: "No rain? The Christians are to blame." Those of them who have been trained in liberal studies and love history know these things perfectly well. But to make the crowds of the uninstructed as hostile to us as possible, they pretend not to know them. They strive to persuade the common people that the disasters which must afflict the human race at certain intervals of place and time happen because of the Christian name, which is spreading everywhere, against their gods, with immense fame and most brilliant renown.
Recolant ergo nobiscum, antequam Christus uenisset in carne, antequam eius nomen ea, cui frustra inuident, gloria populis innotesceret, quibus calamitatibus res	Let them recall with us, then, the many and various calamities by which the Roman state was ground down before Christ came in the flesh, and

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Romanae multipliciter uarieque contritae sint, et in his defendant, si possunt, deos suos, si propterea coluntur, ne ista mala patiantur cultores eorum; quorum si quid nunc passi fuerint, nobis inputanda esse contendunt. Quur enim ea, quae dicturus sum, permiserunt accidere cultoribus suis, antequam eos declaratum Christi nomen offenderet eorumque sacrificia prohiberet?	before his name became known to the nations with that glory which they envy in vain. In the face of these calamities, let them defend their gods if they can, if the gods are worshiped so that their worshipers may not suffer such evils. For if their worshipers suffer anything of the kind now, they insist that it must be blamed on us. Why, then, did those gods allow the things I am about to describe to happen to their worshipers, before the proclaimed name of Christ offended them and prohibited their sacrifices?

THAT THE WORSHIPERS OF THE GODS NEVER RECEIVED ANY PRECEPTS OF GOODNESS FROM THEM, AND IN THEIR RITES CELEBRATED EVERY KIND OF OBSCENITY

The gods never taught morals, and their festivals displayed obscenities Augustine saw as a young man.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.4	Primo ipsos mores ne pessimos haberent, quare di eorum curare noluerunt? Deus enim uerus eos, a quibus non colebatur, merito neglexit; di autem illi, a quorum cultu se prohiberi homines ingratissimi conqueruntur, cultores suos ad bene uiuendum quare nullis legibus adiuuerunt? Utique dignum erat, ut, quo modo isti illorum sacra, ita illi istorum facta curarent. Sed respondetur, quod uoluntate propria quisque malus est. Quis hoc negauerit? Verum tamen pertinebat ad consultores deos uitae bonae praecepta non occultare populis cultoribus suis, sed clara praedicatione praebere, per uates etiam conuenire adque arguere peccantes, palam minari poenas male agentibus, praemia recte uiuentibus polliceri. Quid umquam tale in deorum illorum templis prompta et eminenti uoce concrepuit?	First, why were their gods unwilling to see to it that their worshipers did not have the very worst morals? The true God rightly neglected those who did not worship him. But those gods, whose worship these most ungrateful people complain they are barred from, why did they not help their worshipers to live well by any laws at all? It was surely only fitting that, just as these people cared for those gods' rites, the gods should care for these people's deeds. But the reply comes that each person is evil by his own will. Who would deny it? Yet it was the business of gods who give counsel not to hide the precepts of a good life from the peoples who worshiped them. They should have set them out in clear preaching, met with sinners through their seers and rebuked them, openly threatened evildoers with punishment and promised rewards to those who live rightly. When did anything of the kind ever ring out, in a ready and lofty voice, in the temples of those gods?
	Veniebamus etiam nos aliquando adulescentes ad spectacula ludibriaque sacrilegiorum, spectabamus arrepticios, audiebamus synphoniacos, ludis turpissimis, qui dis deabusque exhibebantur, oblectabamur, Caelesti uirgini et Berecynthiae matri omnium, ante cuius lecticam die sollemni lauationis eius talia per publicum cantitabantur a nequissimis scaenicis, qualia, non dico matrem deorum, sed matrem qualiumcumque senatorum uel quorumlibet honestorum uirorum, immo uero qualia nec matrem ipsorum scaenicorum deceret audire. Habet enim quiddam erga parentes humana uerecundia, quod nec ipsa nequitia possit auferre. Illam proinde	We too, as young men, used sometimes to go to the spectacles and mockeries of sacrilege. We watched people in frenzies, we listened to the musicians, and we took pleasure in the most shameful shows put on for gods and goddesses. They were held for the Heavenly Virgin and for Berecynthia, mother of all. Before her litter, on the solemn day of her bathing, the most worthless actors sang such things in public as would be unfit for the ears, I do not say of the mother of the gods, but of the mother of any senator whatever or of any respectable man. Indeed, they would be unfit for the ears of

LATIN	ENGLISH
turpitudinem obscenorum dictorum adque factorum scaenicos ipsos domi suae proludendi causa coram matribus suis agere puderet, quam per publicum agebant coram deum matre spectante adque audiente utriusque sexus frequentissima multitudine. Quae si inlecta curiositate adesse potuit circumfusa, saltem offensa castitate debuit abire confusa.	the actors' own mothers. For human modesty has something in it toward parents that not even wickedness itself can take away. The actors would have been ashamed to rehearse at home, in front of their own mothers, the obscene filth of words and deeds that they performed in public before the mother of the gods, while a vast crowd of both sexes watched and listened. If curiosity could lure that crowd to gather around, at least its offended chastity ought to have sent it away abashed.[3]
Quae sunt sacrilegia, si illa sunt sacra? aut quae inquinatio, si illa lauatio? Et haec fercula appellabantur, quasi celebraretur conuiuium, quo uelut suis epulis inmunda daemonia pascerentur. Quis enim non sentiat cuius modi spiritus talibus obscenitatibus delectentur, nisi uel nesciens, utrum omnino sint ulli inmundi spiritus deorum nomine decipientes, uel talem agens uitam, in qua istos potius quam Deum uerum et optet propitios et formidet iratos?	What is sacrilege, if those are sacred rites? Or what is pollution, if that is a washing? And these were called "courses," as though a banquet were being celebrated at which unclean demons fed on their own feast. Who would not perceive what kind of spirits delight in such obscenities? Only someone who either does not know whether there are any unclean spirits at all, deceiving under the name of gods, or who leads the kind of life in which it is these, rather than the true God, whom he both longs to have favorable and dreads to have angry.[4]

THE OBSCENITIES WITH WHICH THE MOTHER OF THE GODS WAS HONORED BY HER WORSHIPERS

Scipio Nasica would never want his own mother honored like the Mother of the gods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.5 Nequaquam istos, qui flagitiosissimae consuetudinis uitiis oblectari magis quam obluctari student, sed illum ipsum Nasicam Scipionem, qui uir optimus a senatu electus est, cuius manibus eiusdem daemonis simulacrum susceptum est in Urbemque peruectum, habere de hac re iudicem uellem. Diceret nobis, utrum matrem suam tam optime de re publica uellet mereri, ut ei diuini honores decernerentur; sicut et Graecos et Romanos aliasque gentes constat quibusdam decreuisse mortalibus, quorum erga se beneficia magnipenderant, eosque inmortales factos adque in deorum numerum receptos esse crediderant. Profecto ille tantam felicitatem suae matri, si fieri posset, optaret.	I would like to have as judge in this matter not these people, who are more eager to delight in the vices of a most disgraceful custom than to fight against them, but that very Scipio Nasica. He was chosen by the senate as the best man, and the image of this demon was received by his hands and carried into the City. Let him tell us whether he would have wished his own mother to deserve so well of the commonwealth that divine honors were decreed for her. It is well known, after all, that the Greeks and Romans and other nations decreed such honors to certain mortals whose benefits to them they had valued highly, and that they believed these mortals had become immortal and been received into the number of the gods. Surely he would have wished such happiness for his mother, if it were possible.
Porro si ab illo deinde quaereremus, utrum inter eius diuinos honores uellet illa turpia celebrari: nonne se	Then again, suppose we asked him whether he would want those obscenities to be celebrated

3 The Heavenly Virgin (Caelestis) was the chief goddess of Carthage; Berecynthia is Cybele, the Great Mother, whose image was ceremonially bathed each year.

4 Fercula meant both the dishes of a banquet and the litters carrying sacred images in procession.

LATIN	ENGLISH
malle clamaret, ut sua mater sine ullo sensu mortua iaceret, quam ad hoc dea uiueret, ut illa libenter audiret? Absit, ut senator populi Romani ea mente praeditus, qua theatrum aedificari in urbe fortium uirorum prohibuit, sic uellet coli matrem suam, ut talibus dea sacris propitiaretur, qualibus matrona uerbis offenderetur. Nec ullo modo crederet uerecundiam laudabilis feminae ita in contrarium diuinitate mutari, ut honoribus eam talibus aduocarent cultores sui, qualibus conuiciis in quempiam iaculatis, cum inter homines uiueret, nisi aures clauderet seseque subtraheret, erubescerent pro illa et propinqui et maritus et liberi.	among her divine honors. Would he not cry out that he would rather his mother lay dead and without any feeling than live on as a goddess in order to listen to such things with pleasure? Far be it from us to think it of him. He was a senator of the Roman people, a man of the mind that made him forbid a theater to be built in the city of brave men. Such a man would not want his mother worshiped so that, as a goddess, she would be won over by rites whose words would have offended her as a matron. Nor would he in any way believe that divinity could so turn the modesty of a praiseworthy woman into its opposite that her worshipers would invoke her with such honors. Had insults like these been hurled at anyone in her presence while she lived among men, her relatives, her husband and her children would have blushed for her, unless she had stopped her ears and taken herself away.
Proinde talis mater deum, qualem habere matrem puderet quemlibet etiam pessimum uirum, Romanas occupatura mentes quaesiuit optimum uirum, non quem monendo et adiuuando faceret, sed quem fallendo deciperet, ei similis de qua scriptum est: Mulier autem uirorum pretiosas animas captat, ut ille magnae indolis animus hoc uelut diuino testimonio sublimatus et uere se optimum existimans ueram pietatem religionemque non quaereret, sine qua omne quamuis laudabile ingenium superbia uanescit et decidit. Quo modo igitur nisi insidiose quaereret dea illa optimum uirum, cum talia quaerat in suis sacris, qualia uiri optimi abhorrent suis adhibere conuiuiis?	So the mother of the gods was such that even the worst of men would be ashamed to have her as a mother. Intending to take possession of Roman minds, she sought out the best man. She did not mean to make him the best by warning and helping him. She meant to mislead and deceive him, like the woman of whom it is written: "But a woman captures the precious souls of men." Her aim was that this man of great natural gifts, exalted by what seemed a divine testimony and truly thinking himself the best, should not seek true piety and religion. Without these, every talent, however praiseworthy, vanishes in pride and falls. How, then, could that goddess seek the best man except treacherously, when she seeks in her rites the kind of things that the best men shrink from bringing into their own banquets?[5]

THAT THE GODS OF THE PAGANS NEVER LAID DOWN A TEACHING ON HOW TO LIVE WELL

No temple ever taught the precepts of good living that churches teach.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.6 Hinc est quod de uita et moribus ciuitatum adque populorum a quibus colebantur illa numina non curarunt, ut tam horrendis eos et detestabilibus malis non in agro et uitibus, non in domo adque pecunia, non denique in ipso corpore, quod menti subditur, sed in ipsa mente, in ipso rectore carnis animo, eos inpleri ac	This is why those divinities did not care about the life and morals of the cities and peoples who worshiped them. Without any terrifying prohibition of their own, they allowed them to be filled with such horrible and detestable evils and to become utterly wicked. These evils were not in their fields

5 Proverbs 6:26.

LATIN	ENGLISH
pessimos fieri sine ulla sua terribili prohibitione permitterent. Aut si prohibebant, hoc ostendatur potius, hoc probetur.	and vines, not in their houses and money, not even in the body itself, which is subject to the mind, but in the mind itself, in the very spirit that rules the flesh. Or, if they did forbid it, let that rather be shown, let that be proved.
Nec nobis nescio quos susurros paucissimorum auribus anhelatos et arcana uelut religione traditos iactent, quibus uitae probitas castitasque discatur; sed demonstrentur uel commemorentur loca talibus aliquando conuenticulis consecrata, non ubi ludi agerentur obscenis uocibus et motibus histrionum, nec ubi Fugalia celebrantur effusa omni licentia turpitudinum (et uere Fugalia, sed pudoris et honestatis); sed ubi populi audirent quid di praeciperent de cohibenda auaritia, ambitione frangenda, luxuria refrenanda, ubi discerent miseri, quod discendum Persius increpat dicens: Discite, o miseri, et causas cognoscite rerum, Quid sumus et quidnam uicturi gignimur, ordo Quis datus aut metae qua mollis flexus et unde, Quis modus argenti, quid fas optare, quid asper Utile nummus habet, patriae carisque propinquis Quantum largiri deceat, quem te Deus esse Iussit et humana qua parte locatus es in re.	And let them not boast to us of some whisperings or other, breathed into the ears of a very few and handed down as if in secret religion, from which honesty and chastity of life might be learned. Rather, let them point out or name places once consecrated to such gatherings. I do not mean places where games were held with the obscene words and gestures of actors, nor where the Fugalia are celebrated with every license of filth let loose (a festival of flight indeed, but the flight of modesty and decency). I mean places where the peoples might hear what the gods commanded about restraining greed, breaking ambition and curbing luxury, and where the wretched might learn what Persius rebukes them for needing to learn, when he says: "Learn, you wretched ones, and come to know the causes of things: what we are, and for what life we are born; what rank is assigned to us, or where the gentle turn around the post is to be taken, and from what point; what limit there is to money; what it is right to wish for; what use hard coin has; how much it is fitting to bestow on your country and your dear relatives; what God has commanded you to be, and in what place among human affairs you are set."[6]
Dicatur in quibus locis haec docentium deorum solebant praecepta recitari et a cultoribus eorum populis frequenter audiri, sicut nos ostendimus ad hoc ecclesias institutas, quaqua uersum religio Christiana diffunditur.	Let them say in what places these precepts of teaching gods used to be read aloud and frequently heard by the peoples who worshiped them. We, for our part, point to churches established for this very purpose wherever the Christian religion spreads.

THAT THE DISCOVERIES OF PHILOSOPHY ARE USELESS WITHOUT DIVINE AUTHORITY, SINCE A PERSON INCLINED TO VICE IS MOVED MORE BY WHAT THE GODS DID THAN BY WHAT PEOPLE ARGUED

Philosophy is human discovery, and worshipers imitate Jupiter rather than Plato.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.7 An forte nobis philosophorum scholas disputationesque memorabunt? Primo haec non Romana, sed Graeca sunt; aut si propterea iam Romana, quia et Graecia facta est Romana prouincia, non deorum praecepta sunt, sed	Or perhaps they will remind us of the schools and debates of the philosophers? First, these are not Roman but Greek. Or if they now count as Roman because Greece too has become a Roman

6 Persius (AD 34–62), Roman satirist; the lines are from Satires 3. The Fugalia is an obscure festival, and Augustine puns on its name, from fuga, "flight."

LATIN

hominum inuenta, qui utcumque conati sunt ingeniis acutissimis praediti ratiocinando uestigare, quid in rerum natura latitaret, quid in moribus adpetendum esset adque fugiendum, quid in ipsis ratiocinandi regulis certa conexione traheretur, aut quid non esset consequens uel etiam repugnaret. Et quidam eorum quaedam magna, quantum diuinitus adiuti sunt, inuenerunt; quantum autem humanitus inpediti sunt, errauerunt, maxime cum eorum superbiae iuste prouidentia diuina resisteret, ut uiam pietatis ab humilitate in superna surgentem etiam istorum conparatione monstraret; unde postea nobis erit in Dei ueri Domini uoluntate disquirendi ac disserendi locus.

ENGLISH

province, they are still not precepts of the gods but the discoveries of men. Endowed with the keenest intellects, these men tried as best they could to track down by reasoning what lay hidden in the nature of things. They sought what in conduct was to be pursued and what avoided, and what in the very rules of reasoning followed by sure connection, or did not follow, or was even contradictory. Some of them discovered certain great things, insofar as they had divine help. Insofar as they were held back by their humanity, however, they erred. This happened above all when divine providence justly resisted their pride, so as to show, even by comparison with them, the way of piety that rises from humility to the heights. We shall have occasion to investigate and discuss this later, if it is the will of the true God and Lord.

Verum tamen si philosophi aliquid inuenerunt, quod agendae bonae uitae beataeque adipiscendae satis esse possit: quanto iustius talibus diuini honores decernerentur! Quanto melius et honestius in Platonis templo libri eius legerentur, quam in templis daemonum Galli absciderentur, molles consecrarentur, insani secarentur, et quidquid aliud uel crudele uel turpe, uel turpiter crudele uel crudeliter turpe in sacris talium deorum celebrari solet! Quanto satius erat ad erudiendam iustitia iuuentutem publice recitari leges deorum quam laudari inaniter leges adque instituta maiorum! Omnes enim cultores talium deorum, mox ut eos libido perpulerit feruenti, ut ait Persius, tincta ueneno, magis intuentur quid Iuppiter fecerit, quam quid docuerit Plato uel censuerit Cato.

Still, if the philosophers discovered something that could suffice for leading a good life and attaining a happy one, how much more justly would divine honors be decreed to such men! How much better and more honorable it would be for Plato's books to be read in a temple of Plato than for Galli to be castrated, eunuch priests consecrated and madmen gashed in the temples of demons! The same goes for whatever else is usually celebrated in the rites of such gods, whether cruel or shameful, or shamefully cruel or cruelly shameful. How much more worthwhile it would be, for training the young in justice, to have the laws of the gods recited publicly than to praise the laws and institutions of the ancestors in vain! For all the worshipers of such gods, as soon as lust drives them on, "dipped in burning poison," as Persius says, look more at what Jupiter did than at what Plato taught or Cato judged.[7]

Hinc aput Terentium flagitiosus adulescens spectat tabulam quandam pictam in pariete, ubi inerat pictura haec, Iouem Quo pacto Danaae misisse aiunt quondam in gremium imbrem aureum, adque ab hac tanta auctoritate adhibet patrocinium turpitudini suae, cum in ea se iactat imitari deum.

Hence in Terence a dissolute young man looks at a picture painted on a wall. It showed "how Jupiter, they say, once sent a golden shower into Danaë's lap." From this great authority he draws a defense for his own depravity, boasting that in doing it he is imitating a god.[8]

"And what a god!" he says. "The one who shakes the temples of heaven with his mighty thunder.

7 The Galli were the castrated priests of Cybele, the Great Mother.
8 Terence, The Eunuch, where the young Chaerea justifies his assault on a girl by Jupiter's seduction of Danaë.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	At quem deum! inquit; qui templa caeli summo sonitu concutit. / Ego homuncio id non facerem? Ego uero illud feci ac libens.	Was I, a mere little man, not to do the same? Well, I did it, and gladly."

THE THEATRICAL SHOWS, IN WHICH THE GODS ARE NOT OFFENDED BY THE DISPLAY OF THEIR OWN DISGRACEFUL ACTS BUT APPEASED

The gods themselves required the theatrical shows that displayed their crimes.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.8	At enim non traduntur ista sacris deorum, sed fabulis poetarum. Nolo dicere illa mystica quam ista theatrica esse turpiora; hoc dico, quod negantes conuincit historia, eosdem illos ludos, in quibus regnant figmenta poetarum, non per inperitum obsequium sacris deorum suorum intulisse Romanos, sed ipsos deos, ut sibi sollemniter ederentur et honori suo consecrarentur, acerbe imperando et quodam modo extorquendo fecisse; quod in primo libro breui commemoratione perstrinxi. Nam ingrauescente pestilentia ludi scaenici auctoritate pontificum Romae primitus instituti sunt. Quis igitur in agenda uita non ea sibi potius sectanda arbitretur, quae actitantur ludis auctoritate diuina institutis, quam ea, quae scriptitantur legibus humano consilio promulgatis?	"But," they say, "these things are not handed down in the rites of the gods. They come from the tales of the poets." I do not wish to say that those mystic rites are more shameful than these theatrical ones. What I do say, and history refutes those who deny it, is this. The Romans did not bring those very shows, in which the inventions of the poets reign, into the rites of their gods out of ignorant deference. Rather, the gods themselves brought it about, by harsh commands and, in a sense, by extortion, that the shows be staged for them solemnly and consecrated to their honor. I touched on this briefly in the first book. For when a plague was growing worse, theatrical shows were first instituted at Rome by the authority of the pontiffs. In conducting his life, then, who would not think he should follow the things acted out over and over in shows instituted by divine authority, rather than the things written down in laws promulgated by human counsel?
	Adulterum Iouem si poetae fallaciter prodiderunt, di utique casti, quia tantum nefas per humanos ludos confictum est, non quia neglectum, irasci ac uindicare debuerunt. Et haec sunt scaenicorum tolerabiliora ludorum, comoediae scilicet et tragoediae, hoc est fabulae poetarum agendae in spectaculis multa rerum turpitudine, sed nulla saltem, sicut alia multa, uerborum obscenitate conpositae; quas etiam inter studia, quae honesta ac liberalia uocantur, pueri legere et discere coguntur a senibus.	If the poets falsely portrayed Jupiter as an adulterer, then surely the gods, being chaste, ought to have been angry and taken vengeance because such a crime was invented in human shows, not because the shows were neglected. And these are the more tolerable kinds of theatrical show, namely comedies and tragedies. These are poets' tales composed for performance at spectacles, with much shamefulness in their content but at least, unlike many others, no obscenity in their words. Boys are even made by their elders to read and learn them among the studies called honorable and liberal.

WHAT THE EARLY ROMANS THOUGHT ABOUT CURBING THE LICENSE OF POETS, WHICH THE GREEKS, FOLLOWING THE JUDGMENT OF THE GODS, CHOSE TO LEAVE FREE

Cicero reports that early Rome, unlike Greece, forbade poets to slander citizens.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.9

LATIN

Quid hinc autem senserint Romani ueteres, Cicero testatur in libris, quos de re publica scripsit, ubi Scipio disputans ait: Numquam comoediae, nisi consuetudo uitae pateretur, probare sua theatris flagitia potuissent. Et Graeci quidem antiquiores uitiosae suae opinionis quandam conuenientiam seruarunt, aput quos fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod uellet comoedia, de quo uellet, nominatim diceret. Itaque, sicut in eisdem libris loquitur Africanus, quem illa non adtigit, uel potius quem non uexauit? cui pepercit? Esto, populares homines inprobos, in re publica seditiosos, Cleonem, Cleophontem, Hyperbolum laesit. Patiamur, inquit, etsi eius modi ciues a censore melius est quam a poeta notari.

ENGLISH

What the ancient Romans thought about this, Cicero testifies in the books he wrote On the Commonwealth. There Scipio says in the discussion: "Comedies could never have made their outrages acceptable in the theaters if the customs of life had not allowed it." And the older Greeks at least kept their faulty opinion consistent. Among them it was even permitted by law for comedy to say whatever it wished, about whomever it wished, by name. So, as Africanus says in the same books: "Whom did it not touch, or rather, whom did it not harass? Whom did it spare? Granted, it wounded populist politicians, wicked men who stirred up sedition in public life: Cleon, Cleophon, Hyperbolus. Let us put up with that," he says, "even though it is better for such citizens to be branded by a censor than by a poet."[9]

Sed Periclen, cum iam suae ciuitati maxima auctoritate plurimos annos domi et belli praefuisset, uiolari uersibus et eos agi in scaena non plus decuit, quam si Plautus, inquit, noster uoluisset aut Naeuius Publio et Gn. Scipioni aut Caecilius Marco Catoni maledicere. Dein paulo post: Nostrae, inquit, contra duodecim tabulae cum perpaucas res capite sanxissent, in his hanc quoque sanciendam putauerunt, si quis occentauisset siue carmen condidisset, quod infamiam faceret flagitiumue alteri. Praeclare. Iudiciis enim magistratuum, disceptationibus legitimis propositam uitam, non poetarum ingeniis habere debemus, nec probrum audire nisi ea lege, ut respondere liceat et iudicio defendere. Haec ex Ciceronis quarto de re publica libro ad uerbum excerpenda arbitratus sum, nonnullis propter faciliorem intellectum uel praetermissis uel paululum commutatis.

"But Pericles had led his city with the greatest authority for very many years, in peace and in war. That he should be assaulted in verse, and the verses performed on stage, was no more fitting than if our Plautus," he says, "or Naevius had wanted to abuse Publius and Gnaeus Scipio, or Caecilius Marcus Cato." Then, a little later, he says: "Our Twelve Tables, by contrast, made very few offenses punishable by death, yet among these they thought this one too should be so punished: if anyone sang a mocking chant or composed a song that brought disgrace or dishonor on another. Excellent. For our lives ought to be exposed to the judgments of magistrates and to lawful trials, not to the wit of poets. Nor should we have to hear a reproach except on condition that we may reply and defend ourselves in court." I have thought it right to excerpt these passages word for word from the fourth book of Cicero's On the Commonwealth, though I have left out or slightly changed some things to make them easier to understand.[10]

Multum enim ad rem pertinet, quam molior explicare, si potero. Dicit deinde alia et sic concludit hunc locum, ut ostendat ueteribus displicuisse Romanis uel laudari quemquam in scaena uiuum hominem uel uituperari. Sed, ut dixi, hoc Graeci quamquam inuerecundius, tamen conuenientius licere uoluerunt, cum uiderent dis suis accepta et grata esse obprobria non tantum hominum,

For they bear closely on the point I am trying to explain, if I can. He then says other things, and concludes this passage by showing that the ancient Romans disliked having any living person either praised or blamed on stage. But, as I said, the Greeks wanted this to be permitted, more shamelessly but more consistently. They saw that 9 Cicero's dialogue On the Commonwealth, whose main speaker is Scipio Africanus the Younger, survives only in part. Cleon, Cleophon and Hyperbolus were Athenian demagogues mocked in comedy.

10 Plautus, Naevius and Caecilius were early Roman comic poets. The Twelve Tables were Rome's earliest written law code (c. 450 BC).

LATIN	ENGLISH
uerum et ipsorum deorum in scaenicis fabulis, siue a poetis essent illa conficta, siue flagitia eorum uera commemorarentur et agerentur in theatris adque ab eorum cultoribus utinam solo risu, ac non etiam imitatione digna uiderentur. Nimis enim superbum fuit famae parcere principum ciuitatis et ciuium, ubi suae famae parci numina noluerunt.	their gods welcomed and enjoyed reproaches in stage plays not only of men but even of the gods themselves. It made no difference whether the poets had invented these reproaches or whether the gods' real misdeeds were recounted and acted out in the theaters. If only their worshipers had thought those misdeeds worthy of laughter alone, and not of imitation too! For it would have been too arrogant to spare the reputation of the city's leading men and of its citizens, when the divinities did not want their own reputation spared.

WITH WHAT SKILL IN HARM THE DEMONS WANT EITHER FALSE OR TRUE CRIMES TOLD ABOUT THEMSELVES

Demons want even false crimes told about them, to lend vice divine authority.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.10 Nam quod adfertur pro defensione, non illa uera in deos dici, sed falsa adque conficta, id ipsum est scelestius, si pietatem consulas religionis; si autem malitiam daemonum cogites, quid astutius ad decipiendum adque callidius? Cum enim probrum iacitur in principem patriae bonum adque utilem, nonne tanto est indignius, quanto a ueritate remotius et a uita illius alienius? Quae igitur supplicia sufficiunt, cum deo fit ista tam nefaria, tam insignis iniuria?	They offer a defense: these things are said of the gods not truly but falsely, as inventions. That defense is itself the more wicked thing, if you consult the reverence that religion requires. But if you consider the malice of demons, what could be more cunning or more crafty as a means of deception? For when abuse is hurled at a leading man of one's country who is good and useful to it, is it not all the more outrageous the further it is from the truth and the more foreign to his life? What punishments, then, are enough when so wicked and so glaring an injury is done to a god?
Sed maligni spiritus, quos isti deos putant, etiam flagitia, quae non admiserunt, de se dici uolunt, dum tamen humanas mentes his opinionibus uelut retibus induant et ad praedestinatum supplicium secum trahant, siue homines ista commiserint, quos deos haberi gaudent, qui humanis erroribus gaudent, pro quibus se etiam colendos mille nocendi fallendique artibus interponunt; siue etiam non ullorum hominum illa crimina uera sint, quae tamen de numinibus fingi libenter accipiunt fallacissimi spiritus, ut ad scelesta ac turpia perpetranda uelut ab ipso caelo traduci in terras satis idonea uideatur auctoritas.	But the evil spirits whom these people take for gods want even crimes they never committed to be told of them, so long as they can wrap human minds in these beliefs as if in nets and drag them along with themselves to the punishment that has been predestined. Perhaps it was men who committed these things, men whom these spirits are glad to have regarded as gods. These spirits are glad of human errors, and by a thousand arts of harm and deceit they put themselves forward in those men's place to be worshiped. Or perhaps these crimes truly belong to no men at all, and yet these most deceitful spirits gladly accept their being invented about divinities. Either way, the aim is that an authority strong enough to justify wicked and shameful deeds may seem to have been brought down to earth from heaven itself.
Cum igitur Graeci talium numinum seruos se esse sentirent, inter tot et tanta eorum theatrica obprobria parcendum sibi a poetis nullo modo putauerunt, uel dis	Since, then, the Greeks felt themselves to be the slaves of such divinities, amid so many great insults to those divinities on the stage, they thought

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	suis etiam sic consimilari adpetentes, uel metuentes, ne honestiorem famam ipsi requirendo et eis se hoc modo praeferendo illos ad iracundiam prouocarent.	that the poets should by no means spare them. Either they desired to become like their gods even in this way, or they feared that, by seeking a more honorable reputation for themselves and so ranking themselves above the gods, they would provoke them to anger.

HOW THE GREEKS ADMITTED ACTORS TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE, ON THE GROUND THAT IT WAS UNJUST TO DESPISE THOSE WHO APPEASED THE GODS

The Greeks honored actors because their gods enjoyed the shows.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.11	Ad hanc conuenientiam pertinet, quod etiam scaenicos actores earundem fabularum non paruo ciuitatis honore dignos existimarunt, si quidem, quod in eo quoque de re publica libro commemoratur, Aeschines Atheniensis, uir eloquentissimus, cum adulescens tragoedias actitauisset, rem publicam capessiuit et Aristodemum, tragicum item actorem, maximis de rebus pacis ac belli legatum ad Philippum Athenienses saepe miserunt. Non enim consentaneum putabatur, cum easdem artes eosdemque scaenicos ludos etiam dis suis acceptos uiderent, illos, per quos agerentur, infamium loco ac numero deputare.	To this same consistency belongs the fact that they also thought the actors of those plays worthy of no small civic honor. Indeed, as is recorded in that same book On the Commonwealth, Aeschines of Athens, a most eloquent man, regularly acted in tragedies as a young man and then entered public life. The Athenians also often sent Aristodemus, likewise a tragic actor, as their envoy to Philip on the gravest matters of peace and war. For they saw that these same arts and these same theatrical shows were pleasing even to their gods, and so it was not thought consistent to class those who performed them among the disgraced.[11]
	Haec Graeci turpiter quidem, sed sane dis suis omnino congruenter, qui nec uitam ciuium lacerandam linguis poetarum et histrionum subtrahere ausi sunt, a quibus cernebant deorum uitam eisdem ipsis dis uolentibus et libentibus carpi, et ipsos homines, per quos ista in theatris agebantur, quae numinibus quibus subditi erant grata esse cognouerant, non solum minime spernendos in ciuitate, uerum etiam maxime honorandos putarunt. Quid enim causae reperire possent, quur sacerdotes honorarent, quia per eos uictimas dis acceptabiles offerebant, et scaenicos probrosos haberent, per quos illam uoluptatem siue honorem dis exhiberi petentibus et, nisi fieret, irascentibus eorum admonitione didicerant?	This the Greeks did shamefully, to be sure, but certainly in complete harmony with their gods. They did not dare to shield the lives of citizens from being torn to pieces by the tongues of poets and actors, since they saw these same men carping at the life of the gods with the gods' own will and pleasure. And the very men who performed these things in the theaters, things the Greeks knew were pleasing to the divinities they served, they thought not only far from contemptible in the city but worthy of the highest honor. What reason could they possibly find for honoring priests, because through them they offered victims acceptable to the gods, while holding actors in disgrace? For it was the gods' own instruction that had taught them to present this pleasure, or honor, to the gods, who demanded it and grew angry if it was not done.
	cum praesertim Labeo, quem huiusce modi rerum peritissimum praedicant, numina bona a numinibus malis ista etiam cultus diuersitate distinguat, ut malos	This is all the more so since Labeo, whom they proclaim the greatest expert in matters of this kind, distinguishes good divinities from evil ones

11 Aeschines (c. 390–c. 314 BC) was an Athenian orator and the rival of Demosthenes; Philip is Philip II of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great.

LATIN

deos propitiari caedibus et tristibus supplicationibus adserat, bonos autem obsequiis laetis adque iucundis, qualia sunt, ut ipse ait, ludi conuiuia lectisternia. Quod totum quale sit, postea, si Deus iuuerit, diligentius disseremus.

Nunc ad rem praesentem quod adtinet, siue omnibus omnia tamquam bonis permixte tribuantur (neque enim esse decet deos malos, cum potius isti, quia inmundi sunt spiritus, omnes sint mali), siue certa discretione, sicut Labeoni uisum est, illis illa, istis ista distribuantur obsequia, conpetentissime Graeci utrosque honori ducunt, et sacerdotes, per quos uictimae ministrantur, et scaenicos, per quos ludi exhibentur, ne uel omnibus dis suis, si et ludi omnibus grati sunt, uel, quod est indignius, his, quos bonos putant, si ludi ab eis solis amantur, facere conuincantur iniuriam.

ENGLISH

by this very difference in worship. He asserts that evil gods are appeased by slaughter and grim supplications, but good gods by joyful and pleasant services, such as, in his own words, games, banquets, and lectisternia. What all this amounts to we shall discuss more carefully later, God willing.[12]

As for the present matter, there are two possibilities. Perhaps all these services are offered indiscriminately to all the gods as though all were good (for it is not fitting for gods to be evil, though in fact these, being unclean spirits, are all evil). Or perhaps, by some fixed distinction, as Labeo thought, these services are allotted to some gods and those to others. Either way, the Greeks are entirely consistent in holding both groups in honor: the priests through whom the victims are offered and the actors through whom the shows are presented. Otherwise they might be convicted of wronging either all their gods, if the shows please them all, or, what is more outrageous, those gods they consider good, if the shows are loved by those alone.

THAT THE ROMANS, BY TAKING FROM POETS THE FREEDOM AGAINST MEN THAT THEY ALLOWED AGAINST THE GODS, THOUGHT BETTER OF THEMSELVES THAN OF THEIR GODS

Rome protected citizens from poets' abuse while letting its gods be mocked.

LATIN

2.12 At Romani, sicut in illa de re publica disputatione Scipio gloriatur, probris et iniuriis poetarum subiectam uitam famamque habere noluerunt, capite etiam sancientes, tale carmen condere si quis auderet. Quod erga se quidem satis honeste constituerunt, sed erga deos suos superbe et inreligiose; quos cum scirent non solum patienter, uerum etiam libenter poetarum probris maledictisque lacerari, se potius quam illos huiusce modi iniuriis indignos esse duxerunt seque ab eis etiam lege munierunt, illorum autem ista etiam sacris sollemnitatibus miscuerunt. Itane tandem, Scipio, laudas hanc poetis Romanis negatam esse licentiam, ut cuiquam obprobrium infligerent Romanorum, cum uideas eos nulli deorum pepercisse uestrorum?

ENGLISH

But the Romans, as Scipio boasts in that dialogue On the Commonwealth, did not want their lives and reputations exposed to the abuse and insults of poets, and they even made it a capital offense for anyone to dare to compose such a song. Toward themselves this was an honorable enough provision, but toward their gods it was arrogant and irreligious. They knew that their gods allowed themselves to be torn apart by the abuse and slanders of poets, not only patiently but gladly. Yet they judged that they themselves, rather than the gods, did not deserve injuries of this kind. They even fortified themselves against them by law, while they mixed the gods' disgraces into their sacred solemnities as well. Do you really, Scipio, praise the fact that Roman poets were denied the license to inflict disgrace on any Roman, when you see that they spared none of your gods?

12 Cornelius Labeo was a writer on Roman religion, probably of the 3rd century AD. Lectisternia were ceremonial banquets at which images of the gods were placed on couches before laden tables.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Itane pluris tibi habenda est existimatio curiae uestrae quam Capitolii, immo Romae unius quam caeli totius, ut linguam maledicam in ciues tuos exercere poetae etiam lege prohiberentur, et in deos tuos securi tanta conuicia nullo senatore nullo censore, nullo principe nullo pontifice prohibente iacularentur? Indignum uidelicet fuit, ut Plautus aut Naeuius Gn. Scipioni aut Caecilius M. Catoni malediceret, et dignum fuit, ut Terentius uester flagitio Iouis optimi maximi adulescentium nequitiam concitaret?	Do you really value the reputation of your senate house more than that of the Capitol, indeed of Rome alone more than that of all heaven? Is that why poets were forbidden even by law to use a slanderous tongue against your fellow citizens, while they could hurl such great insults at your gods in safety, with no senator, no censor, no leading man, no pontiff to stop them? It was outrageous, apparently, for Plautus or Naevius to slander Gnaeus Scipio, or for Caecilius to slander Marcus Cato. Yet was it fitting for your Terence to stir up the wickedness of young men by the disgraceful example of Jupiter Best and Greatest?

THAT THE ROMANS SHOULD HAVE UNDERSTOOD THAT THEIR GODS, WHO DEMANDED TO BE WORSHIPED WITH DISGRACEFUL SHOWS, WERE UNWORTHY OF DIVINE HONOR

The Romans despised actors yet worshiped gods who demanded acting, which proves those gods false.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.13 Sed responderet mihi fortasse, si uiueret: Quo modo nos ista inpunita esse nollemus, quae ipsi di sacra esse uoluerunt, cum ludos scaenicos, ubi talia celebrantur dictitantur actitantur, et Romanis moribus inuexerunt et suis honoribus dicari exhiberique iusserunt? Quur non ergo hinc magis ipsi intellecti sunt non esse di ueri nec omnino digni, quibus diuinos honores deferret illa res publica? Quos enim coli minime deceret minimeque oporteret, si ludos expeterent agendos conuiciis Romanorum, quo modo quaeso colendi putati sunt, quo modo non detestandi spiritus intellecti, qui cupiditate fallendi inter suos honores sua celebrari crimina poposcerunt?	But perhaps, if he were alive, he would answer me: "How could we want these things to go unpunished, when the gods themselves willed them to be sacred? They introduced into Roman custom the theatrical shows in which such things are celebrated, recited, and acted, and they ordered those shows to be dedicated and presented in their honor." Then why was it not rather understood from this very fact that they were not true gods, nor in any way worthy of receiving divine honors from that commonwealth? It would have been wholly unfitting and wholly wrong to worship gods who demanded shows performed with insults against the Romans. How, then, I ask, were they thought worthy of worship? How were they not recognized as detestable spirits, who out of a craving to deceive demanded that their own crimes be celebrated among their honors?
Itemque Romani, quamuis iam superstitione noxia premerentur, ut illos deos colerent, quos uidebant sibi uoluisse scaenicas turpitudines consecrari, suae tamen dignitatis memores ac pudoris actores talium fabularum nequaquam honorauerunt more Graecorum, sed, sicut aput Ciceronem idem Scipio loquitur, cum artem ludicram scaenamque totam in probro ducerent, genus id hominum non modo honore ciuium reliquorum carere, sed etiam tribu moueri notatione censoria uoluerunt. Praeclara sane et Romanis laudibus adnumeranda prudentia; sed uellem se ipsa sequeretur, se imitaretur. Ecce enim recte, quisquis ciuium Romanorum esse	Likewise the Romans were already oppressed by a harmful superstition, so that they worshiped gods whom they saw wanted theatrical obscenities consecrated to them. Even so, mindful of their own dignity and sense of shame, they by no means honored the actors of such plays as the Greeks did. Instead, as the same Scipio says in Cicero, since they regarded the art of acting and the whole stage as a disgrace, they decided that this class of men should not only be deprived of the honors open to the other citizens but even be removed from their tribe by the censor's mark. An admirable piece of scaenicus elegisset, non solum ei nullus ad honorem dabatur locus, uerum etiam censoris nota tribum tenere propriam minime sinebatur, o animum ciuitatis laudis auidum germaneque Romanum!	prudence, certainly, and one to be counted among the Romans' merits. But I wish it had followed itself and been consistent with itself. For look: quite rightly, any Roman citizen who chose to become an actor was not only given no path to public office, but was not even allowed, under the censor's mark, to keep his own tribe. O spirit of a city eager for praise, and truly Roman!

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed respondeatur mihi: qua consentanea ratione homines scaenici ab omni honore pelluntur, et ludi scaenici deorum honoribus admiscentur? Illas theatricas artes diu uirtus Romana non nouerat, quae si ad oblectamentum uoluptatis humanae quaererentur, uitio morum inreperent humanorum. Di eas sibi exhiberi petierunt: quo modo ergo abicitur scaenicus, per quem colitur Deus? et theatricae illius turpitudinis qua fronte notatur actor, si adoratur exactor? In hac controuersia Graeci Romanique concertent. Graeci putant recte se honorare homines scaenicos, quia colunt ludorum scaenicorum flagitatores deos; Romani uero hominibus scaenicis nec plebeiam tribum, quanto minus senatoriam curiam dehonestari sinunt. In hac disceptatione huiusce modi ratiocinatio summam quaestionis absoluit. Proponunt Graeci: Si di tales colendi sunt, profecto etiam tales homines honorandi. Adsumunt Romani: Sed nullo modo tales homines honorandi sunt.	But let someone answer me: by what consistent reasoning are actors driven from every honor, while theatrical shows are mixed into the honors of the gods? For a long time Roman virtue knew nothing of those theatrical arts. If they had been sought out to amuse human pleasure, they would have crept in through the corruption of human morals. But it was the gods who demanded that these arts be presented to them. How, then, is the actor cast aside, through whom a god is worshiped? And with what effrontery is the actor of that theatrical obscenity branded, if the god who exacts it is adored? In this dispute let the Greeks and the Romans contend. The Greeks think they are right to honor actors, because they worship gods who demand theatrical shows. The Romans, however, do not allow actors to disgrace even a plebeian tribe, much less the senate house. In this debate the following line of reasoning settles the whole question. The Greeks propose: "If such gods are to be worshiped, then surely such men are also to be honored." The Romans add: "But such men are by no means to be honored."
Concludunt Christiani: Nullo modo igitur di tales colendi sunt.	The Christians conclude: "Therefore such gods are by no means to be worshiped."

THAT PLATO, WHO GAVE POETS NO PLACE IN A WELL-ORDERED CITY, WAS BETTER THAN THESE GODS WHO WANTED TO BE HONORED WITH THEATRICAL SHOWS

Plato, who banished poets, deserved divine honors more than the gods who demanded shows.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.14 Deinde quaerimus, ipsi poetae talium fabularum conpositores, qui duodecim tabularum lege prohibentur famam laedere ciuium, tam probrosa in deos conuicia iaculantes quur non ut scaenici habeantur inhonesti. Qua ratione rectum est, ut poeticorum figmentorum et ignominiosorum deorum infamentur actores, honorentur auctores? An forte Graeco Platoni potius palma danda est, qui cum ratione formaret, qualis esse ciuitas debeat, tamquam aduersarios ueritatis poetas censuit urbe pellendos? Iste uero et deorum iniurias indigne tulit et	Next we ask about the poets themselves, the composers of such plays. They are forbidden by the law of the Twelve Tables to damage the reputation of citizens, yet they hurl such shameful insults at the gods. Why are they not held to be disreputable like the actors? By what reasoning is it right that the actors who perform poetic fictions and portray disgraced gods are branded with infamy, while the authors are honored? Or should the palm perhaps go instead to the Greek Plato? When he was shap-

LATIN	ENGLISH
fucari corrumpique figmentis animos ciuium noluit. Confer nunc Platonis humanitatem a ciuibus decipiendis poetas urbe pellentem cum deorum diuinitate honori suo ludos scaenicos expetente. Ille, ne talia uel scriberentur, etsi non persuasit disputando, tamen suasit leuitati lasciuiaeque Graecorum; isti, ut talia etiam agerentur, iubendo extorserunt grauitati et modestiae Romanorum.	ing by reason what a city ought to be, he held that poets should be expelled from the city as enemies of the truth. He, at any rate, both resented the insults to the gods and refused to let the minds of citizens be painted over and corrupted by fictions. Now compare Plato's humanity, which expels poets from the city so that citizens may not be deceived, with the divinity of the gods, which demands theatrical shows in its own honor. Plato, though he did not persuade them by his arguments, at least urged on Greek frivolity and wantonness that such things should not even be written. The gods, by their command, extorted from Roman seriousness and restraint that such things should actually be performed.[13]
Nec tantum haec agi uoluerunt, sed sibi dicari, sibi sacrari, sibi sollemniter exhiberi. Cui tandem honestius diuinos honores decerneret ciuitas? utrum Platoni haec turpia et nefanda prohibenti, an daemonibus hac hominum deceptione gaudentibus, quibus ille uera persuadere non potuit?	Nor did the gods want these things merely performed, but dedicated to them, consecrated to them, solemnly presented to them. To whom, then, would the city more honorably have decreed divine honors? To Plato, who forbade these shameful and abominable things, or to the demons, who delight in this deception of men whom Plato could not persuade of the truth?
Hunc Platonem Labeo inter semideos commemorandum putauit, sicut Herculem, sicut Romulum. Semideos autem heroibus anteponit; sed utrosque inter numina conlocat. Verum tamen istum, quem appellat semideum, non heroibus tantum, sed etiam dis ipsis praeferendum esse non dubito. Propinquant autem Romanorum leges disputationibus Platonis, quando ille cuncta poetica figmenta condemnat, isti autem poetis adimunt saltem in homines maledicendi licentiam; ille poetas ab urbis ipsius habitatione, isti saltem actores poeticarum fabularum remouent a societate ciuitatis; et si contra deos ludorum scaenicorum expeditores aliquid auderent, forte undique remouerent. Nequaquam igitur leges ad instituendos bonos aut corrigendos malos mores a dis suis possent accipere seu sperare Romani, quos legibus suis uincunt adque conuincunt.	Labeo thought that this Plato should be listed among the demigods, like Hercules, like Romulus. He ranks demigods above heroes, but places both among the divinities. Yet I have no doubt that this man whom he calls a demigod should be preferred not only to the heroes but even to the gods themselves. The laws of the Romans do come close to Plato's arguments. He condemns all poetic fictions, while they at least take away from poets the license to slander human beings. He bars poets from living in the city itself, while they at least bar the actors of poetic plays from fellowship in the civic community. And if the Romans had dared to do anything against the gods who call for theatrical shows, they might perhaps have barred the actors altogether. So the Romans could by no means receive or hope for laws from their gods that would establish good morals or correct bad ones, since by their own laws they outdo those gods and convict them.
Illi enim honori suo deposcunt ludos scaenicos, isti ab honoribus omnibus repellunt homines scaenicos; illi celebrari sibi iubent figmentis poeticis obprobria deorum, isti ab obprobriis hominum deterrent	For the gods demand theatrical shows in their own honor, while the Romans bar theatrical men from all honors. The gods order the disgraces of 13 Plato banishes the poets from his ideal city in the Republic (books 2–3 and 10).

LATIN

inpudentiam poetarum. Semideus autem ille Plato et talium deorum libidini restitit, et ab indole Romanorum quid perficiendum esset ostendit, qui poetas ipsos uel pro arbitrio mentientes uel hominibus miseris quasi deorum facta pessima imitanda proponentes omnino in ciuitate bene instituta uiuere noluit. Nos quidem Platonem nec deum nec semideum perhibemus, nec ulli sancto angelo summi Dei nec ueridico prophetae nec apostolo alicui nec cuilibet Christi martyri nec cuiquam Christiano homini conparamus; cuius nostrae sententiae ratio Deo prosperante suo loco explicabitur.

Sed eum tamen, quando quidem ipsi uolunt fuisse semideum, praeferendum esse censemus, si non Romulo et Herculi (quamuis istum nec fratrem occidisse, nec aliquod perpetrasse flagitium quisquam historicorum uel poetarum dixit aut finxit), certe uel Priapo uel alicui Cynocephalo, postremo uel Febri, quae Romani numina partim peregrina receperunt, partim sua propria sacrauerunt.

Quo modo igitur tanta animi et morum mala bonis praeceptis et legibus uel inminentia prohiberent, uel insita extirpanda curarent di tales, qui etiam seminanda et augenda flagitia curauerunt, talia uel sua uel quasi sua facta per theatricas celebritates populis innotescere cupientes, ut tamquam auctoritate diuina sua sponte nequissima libido accenderetur humana, frustra hoc exclamante Cicerone, qui cum de poetis ageret: Ad quos cum accessit, inquit, clamor et adprobatio populi quasi cuiusdam magni et sapientis magistri, quas illi obducunt tenebras, quos inuehunt metus, quas inflammant cupiditates!

ENGLISH

the gods to be celebrated for them in poetic fictions, while the Romans restrain the shamelessness of poets from disgracing men. And that demigod Plato both resisted the lust of such gods and showed what ought to be brought to completion, building on the Roman character. He would not allow the poets themselves to live at all in a well-ordered city, whether they lie as they please or set before wretched human beings the gods' supposed worst deeds for imitation. We, for our part, do not call Plato either a god or a demigod. We do not compare him with any holy angel of the supreme God, or any truthful prophet, or any apostle, or any martyr of Christ, or any Christian person at all. The reason for this view of ours will be explained in its proper place, with God's help.

But since they themselves will have it that he was a demigod, we judge that he should be preferred, if not to Romulus and Hercules (though no historian or poet has ever said or invented that Plato killed his brother or committed any crime), then certainly to Priapus, or to some Cynocephalus, or finally to Fever. These divinities the Romans partly received from abroad and partly consecrated as their own.[14]

How, then, could such gods use good precepts and laws either to forbid such great evils of mind and morals when they threatened, or to see that they were rooted out once they had taken hold? These gods actually saw to it that disgraceful deeds were sown and multiplied. They wanted such acts, whether their own or presented as their own, to become known to whole peoples through theatrical festivals, so that the most wicked human lust might be kindled of its own accord, as if by divine authority. In vain does Cicero cry out against this. Speaking of the poets, he says: "When to them is added the shouting and approval of the people, as if of some great and wise teacher, what darkness they draw over us, what fears they bring in, what desires they inflame!"

14 Priapus was a fertility god; the "Dog-headed" (Cynocephalus) was the Egyptian Anubis; Fever (Febris) was worshiped as a Roman goddess. Romulus killed his brother Remus.

THAT THE ROMANS SET UP SOME OF THEIR GODS NOT BY REASON BUT BY FLATTERY

Rome gave Romulus a flamen but never honored Plato with even a shrine.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.15	Quae autem illic eligendorum deorum etiam ipsorum falsorum ratio ac non potius adulatio est? quando istum Platonem, quem semideum uolunt, tantis disputationibus laborantem, ne animi malis, quae praecipue cauenda sunt, mores corrumperentur humani, nulla sacra aedicula dignum putarunt, et Romulum suum dis multis praetulerunt, quamuis et ipsum semideum potius quam deum uelut secretior eorum doctrina commendet. Nam etiam flaminem illi instituerunt, quod sacerdotii genus adeo in Romanis sacris testante apice excelluit, ut tres solos flamines haberent tribus numinibus institutos, Dialem Ioui, Martialem Marti, Quirinalem Romulo. Nam beneuolentia ciuium uelut receptus in caelum Quirinus est postea nominatus.	And what reasoning, rather than mere flattery, is there in their choice even of these false gods? This Plato, whom they want to be a demigod, labored through such long discussions so that human morals might not be corrupted by evils of the mind, the evils most of all to be guarded against. Yet they did not think him worthy of even a little shrine. Their Romulus, on the other hand, they ranked above many gods, even though their more esoteric teaching, so to speak, commends him as a demigod rather than a god. For they even instituted a flamen for him. This kind of priesthood was so preeminent in Roman rites, as the flamen's peaked cap bears witness, that they had only three flamens, established for three divinities: the flamen of Jupiter, the flamen of Mars, and the flamen of Quirinus for Romulus. For through the goodwill of the citizens Romulus was, as it were, received into heaven and afterward named Quirinus.[15]
	Ac per hoc et Neptuno et Plutoni, fratribus Iouis, et ipsi Saturno, patri eorum, isto Romulus honore praelatus est, ut pro magno sacerdotium, quod Ioui tribuerant, hoc etiam huic tribuerent, et Marti tamquam patri eius forsitan propter ipsum.	And so by this honor Romulus was preferred to Neptune and Pluto, the brothers of Jupiter, and even to Saturn, their father. The priesthood they had granted to Jupiter as something great, they granted to Romulus as well, and to Mars as his father, perhaps on Romulus' account.

THAT IF THE GODS HAD ANY CONCERN FOR JUSTICE, THE ROMANS OUGHT TO HAVE RECEIVED RULES FOR LIVING FROM THEM RATHER THAN BORROWING LAWS FROM OTHER PEOPLE

Rome borrowed Solon's laws because its gods never gave it laws for living.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.16	Si autem a dis suis Romani uiuendi leges accipere potuissent, non aliquot annos post Romam conditam ab Atheniensibus mutuarentur leges Solonis, quas tamen non ut acceperunt tenuerunt, sed meliores et emendatiores facere conati sunt, quamuis Lycurgus Lacedaemoniis leges ex Apollinis auctoritate se instituisse confinxerit, quod prudenter Romani credere noluerunt, propterea non inde acceperunt. Numa Pompilius, qui Romulo successit in regnum, quasdam leges, quae quidem regendae ciuitati nequaquam sufficerent, condidisse fertur, qui eis multa etiam sacra constituit; non tamen perhibetur easdem leges a	If the Romans had been able to receive laws for living from their gods, they would not have borrowed the laws of Solon from the Athenians some years after Rome was founded. Moreover, they did not keep those laws as they received them, but tried to make them better and more correct. Lycurgus, it is true, pretended that he had established laws for the Spartans on the authority of Apollo, but the Romans wisely refused to believe this, and so did not take their laws from that source. Numa Pompilius, who succeeded Romulus as king, is said to have framed certain laws, 15 A flamen was a priest devoted to a single god; the three major flamens wore a distinctive conical cap called the apex.

LATIN	ENGLISH
numinibus accepisse. Mala igitur animi, mala uitae, mala morum, quae ita magna sunt, ut his doctissimi eorum uiri etiam stantibus urbibus res publicas perire confirment, di eorum, ne suis cultoribus acciderent, minime curarunt.	though they were by no means sufficient for governing the city, and he also established many rites for the Romans. Yet he is not reported to have received those laws from the divinities. So the evils of the mind, the evils of life, the evils of morals are so great that the Romans' most learned men affirm that commonwealths perish through them even while their cities stand. Yet their gods took no care at all to keep these evils from befalling their worshipers.[16]

THE RAPE OF THE SABINE WOMEN AND OTHER WRONGS THAT FLOURISHED IN THE ROMAN STATE EVEN IN ITS PRAISED TIMES

The rape of the Sabine women, Collatinus's exile and Camillus's trial show Rome's early injustice.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.17 An forte populo Romano propterea leges non sunt a numinibus constitutae, quia, sicut Sallustius ait, ius bonumque aput eos non legibus magis quam natura ualebat? Ex hoc iure ac bono credo raptas Sabinas. Quid enim iustius et melius quam filias alienas fraude spectaculi inductas non a parentibus accipi, sed ui, ut quisque poterat, auferri? Nam si inique facerent Sabini negare postulatas, quanto fuit iniquius rapere non datas? Iustius autem bellum cum ea gente geri potuit, quae filias suas ad matrimonium conregionalibus et confinalibus suis negasset petitas, quam cum ea, quae repetebat ablatas. Illud ergo potius fieret; ibi Mars filium suum pugnantem iuuaret, ut coniugiorum negatorum armis ulcisceretur iniuriam, et eo modo ad feminas, quas uoluerat, perueniret.	Or was it perhaps because, as Sallust says, "justice and goodness prevailed among them by nature no less than by laws," that the divinities laid down no laws for the Roman people? It was by this justice and goodness, I suppose, that the Sabine women were carried off. For what could be more just and better than for other men's daughters, lured by the trick of a show, to be not received from their parents but carried off by force, each man seizing what he could? If the Sabines acted unjustly in refusing their daughters when they were asked for, how much more unjust was it to seize them when they were not given? A war could more justly have been waged against a people that had refused its daughters in marriage to the neighbors of its own region and borders who asked for them, than against one that was demanding them back after they had been taken. That, then, is what should rather have happened. Then Mars would have helped his son in battle, so that he might avenge by arms the wrong of the marriages refused and in that way obtain the women he wanted.[17]
Aliquo enim fortasse iure belli iniuste negatas iuste uictor auferret; nullo autem iure pacis non datas rapuit et iniustum bellum cum earum parentibus iuste suscensentibus gessit. Hoc sane utilius feliciusque successit, quod, etsi ad memoriam fraudis illius circensium spectaculum mansit, facinoris tamen in illa ciuitate et imperio non placuit exemplum, faciliusque	For perhaps by some right of war a victor might justly carry off women who had been unjustly refused. But by no right of peace did he seize women who had not been given to him, and he waged an unjust war against their parents, who were justly angry. This much, admittedly, turned out more usefully and happily: though the circus games re-

16 Solon (c. 640–c. 560 BC) was the Athenian lawgiver whose laws Roman envoys reportedly studied before the Twelve Tables were drawn up (451–450 BC). Lycurgus was the legendary lawgiver of Sparta.
17 The War with Catiline 9.1. Legend told that Romulus invited the neighboring Sabines to games and had his men seize their daughters as wives.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Romani in hoc errauerunt, ut post illam iniquitatem deum sibi Romulum consecrarent, quam ut in feminis rapiendis factum eius imitandum lege ulla uel more permitterent. Ex hoc iure ac bono post expulsum cum liberis suis regem Tarquinium, cuius filius Lucretiam stupro uiolenter obpresserat. Iunius Brutus consul L. Tarquinium Conlatinum, maritum eiusdem Lucretiae, collegam suum, bonum adque innocentem uirum, propter nomen et propinquitatem Tarquiniorum coegit magistratu se abdicare nec uiuere in ciuitate permisit.	mained as a memorial of that fraud, the example of the crime found no favor in that city and empire. The Romans more readily went astray by consecrating Romulus as their god after that wrongdoing than by permitting, through any law or custom, his deed to be imitated in the seizing of women. It was by this justice and goodness that, after King Tarquin had been driven out with his children—the king whose son had violently raped Lucretia—the consul Junius Brutus forced his colleague Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of that same Lucretia, a good and innocent man, to resign his office because of his name and his kinship with the Tarquins, and would not allow him to live in the city.[18]
Quod scelus fauente uel patiente populo fecit, a quo populo consulatum idem Conlatinus sicut etiam ipse Brutus acceperat. Ex hoc iure ac bono M. Camillus, illius temporis uir egregius, qui Veientes, grauissimos hostes populi Romani, post decennale bellum, quo Romanus exercitus totiens male pugnando grauiter adflictus est, iam ipsa Roma de salute dubitante adque trepidante facillime superauit eorumque urbem opulentissimam cepit, obtrectatorum inuidia uirtutis suae et insolentia tribunorum plebis reus factus est tamque ingratam sensit quam liberauerat ciuitatem, ut de sua damnatione certissimus in exilium sponte discederet et decem milia aeris absens etiam damnaretur, mox iterum a Gallis uindex patriae futurus ingratae.	Brutus committed this crime with the people favoring or tolerating it, the same people from whom Collatinus, like Brutus himself, had received the consulship. It was by this justice and goodness that Marcus Camillus, an outstanding man of his time, was put on trial. After a ten-year war in which the Roman army had so often fought badly and suffered heavy losses, when Rome itself was already doubting and trembling for its survival, he defeated with great ease the people of Veii, the most dangerous enemies of the Roman people, and captured their very wealthy city. Yet through the envy of those who disparaged his virtue and the insolence of the tribunes of the plebs, he was put on trial. He found the city he had liberated so ungrateful that, quite certain of his condemnation, he went into exile of his own accord, and in his absence he was even fined ten thousand pieces of bronze money—he who was soon to be once more the avenger of his ungrateful country against the Gauls.[19]
Multa commemorare iam piget foeda et iniusta, quibus agitabatur illa ciuitas, cum potentes plebem sibi subdere conarentur plebsque illis subdi recusaret, et utriusque partis defensores magis studiis agerent amore uincendi, quam aequum et bonum quidquam cogitarent.	I am weary now of recounting the many foul and unjust things that shook that city, when the powerful tried to subject the common people to themselves and the people refused to be subjected. The champions of each side acted more from partisan zeal and the love of winning than from any thought of what was fair and good.

18 Lucius Junius Brutus and Collatinus were the first consuls (509 BC) after the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud; the rape of Lucretia by Tarquin's son Sextus, and her suicide, had sparked the revolt.
19 Marcus Furius Camillus captured the Etruscan city of Veii, near Rome, around 396 BC; recalled from exile, he was credited with saving Rome after the Gauls sacked it around 390 BC.

WHAT SALLUST'S HISTORY REVEALS ABOUT THE MORALS OF THE ROMANS, EITHER RESTRAINED BY FEAR OR LOOSENED BY SECURITY

Sallust admits Rome's virtue came from fear of enemies and collapsed after Carthage fell.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.18	Itaque habebo modum et ipsum Sallustium testem potius adhibebo, qui cum in laude Romanorum dixisset, unde nobis iste sermo ortus est: lus bonumque aput eos non legibus magis quam natura ualebat, praedicans illud tempus, quo expulsis regibus incredibiliter ciuitas breui aetatis spatio plurimum creuit, idem tamen in primo historiae suae libro adque ipso eius exordio fatetur etiam tunc, cum ad consules a regibus esset translata res publica, post paruum interuallum iniurias ualidiorum et ob eas discessionem plebis a patribus aliasque in Urbe dissensiones fuisse.	So I will restrain myself and call Sallust himself as a witness instead. In praising the Romans, he made the remark from which this whole discussion of ours arose: "Justice and goodness prevailed among them not more by laws than by nature." He was extolling the period when, after the kings had been expelled, the city grew to an incredible extent in a short span of time. Yet this same Sallust admits, in the first book of his Histories and at its very opening, that even then the trouble began soon. A short time after the commonwealth had passed from the kings to the consuls, there were wrongs done by the more powerful. Because of these wrongs there was a secession of the plebs from the patricians, and there were other dissensions in the City.[20]
	Nam cum optimis moribus et maxima concordia populum Romanum inter secundum et postremum bellum Carthaginiense commemorasset egisse causamque huius boni non amorem iustitiae, sed stante Carthagine metum pacis infidae fuisse dixisset (unde et Nasica ille ad reprimendam nequitiam seruandosque istos mores optimos, ut metu uitia cohiberentur, Carthaginem nolebat euerti): continuo subiecit idem Sallustius et ait: (At discordia et auaritia adque ambitio et cetera secundis rebus oriri sueta mala post Carthaginis excidium maxime aucta sunt, ut intellegeremus etiam ante oriri solere et augeri: Unde subnectens quur hoc dixerit: Nam iniuriae, inquit, ualidiorum et ob eas discessio plebis a patribus aliaeque dissensiones domi fuere iam inde a principio, neque amplius quam regibus exactis, dum metus a Tarquinio et bellum graue cum Etruria positum est, aequo et modesto iure agitatum.	For he had recorded that the Roman people lived with the best morals and in the greatest harmony between the second and the last Carthaginian wars. He said that the cause of this good was not love of justice but fear of an untrustworthy peace while Carthage still stood. That is why the famous Nasica did not want Carthage destroyed: he wanted to check wickedness and preserve those excellent morals, so that vices might be held in check by fear. Then Sallust immediately added: "But discord, greed, ambition, and the other evils that usually arise in prosperity increased enormously after the destruction of Carthage." The point is that we should understand that they usually arose and increased even before. He then went on to give the reason for saying this: "For the wrongs done by the more powerful," he says, "and because of them the secession of the plebs from the patricians, and other dissensions at home, existed right from the beginning. Affairs were conducted with fair and moderate justice only after the kings had been driven out, and only while the fear of Tarquin and the heavy war with Etruria lasted."
	Vides quem ad modum etiam illo breui tempore, ut regibus exactis, id est eiectis, aliquantum aequo et modesto iure ageretur, metum dixit fuisse causam,	You see how, even in that short time after the kings were driven out (that is, thrown out), affairs were conducted with a measure of fair and moder-

20 The quoted line is from The War with Catiline 9.1; Sallust's Histories survive only in fragments.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quoniam metuebatur bellum, quod rex Tarquinius regno adque Urbe pulsus Etruscis sociatus contra Romanos gerebat. Adtende itaque quid deinde contexat: Dein, inquit, seruili imperio patres plebem exercere, de uita adque tergo regio more consulere, agro pellere et ceteris expertibus soli in imperio agere. Quibus saeuitiis et maxime faenore obpressa plebes cum adsiduis bellis tributum et militiam simul toleraret, armata montem sacrum adque Auentinum insedit, tumque tribunos plebis et alia iura sibi parauit. Discordiarum et certaminis utrimque finis fuit secundum Punicum bellum.)	ate justice, and he said the cause was fear. The Romans feared the war that King Tarquin, driven from his kingdom and from the City, was waging against them in alliance with the Etruscans. Now notice what he adds next: "Then the patricians began to treat the plebs as slaves. They disposed of their lives and their backs as the kings had done, drove them from their land, and held power alone, with everyone else shut out. The plebs were crushed by these cruelties and above all by debt, since in continual wars they had to bear both taxes and military service. So they took up arms and occupied the Sacred Mount and the Aventine, and then secured for themselves tribunes of the plebs and other rights. The end of the discord and strife on both sides came with the Second Punic War."
Cernis ex quo tempore, id est paruo interuallo post reges exactos, quales Romani fuerint, de quibus ait: Ius bonumque aput eos non legibus magis quam natura ualebat.	You see what kind of people the Romans were from that time on, that is, from a short while after the kings were driven out. Yet these are the people of whom he says: "Justice and goodness prevailed among them not more by laws than by nature."
Porro si illa tempora talia reperiuntur, quibus pulcherrima adque optima fuisse praedicatur Romana res publica, quid iam de consequenti aetate dicendum aut cogitandum arbitramur, cum paulatim mutata, ut eiusdem historici uerbis utar, ex pulcherrima adque optima pessima ac flagitiosissima facta est, post Carthaginis uidelicet, ut commemorauit, excidium? Quae tempora ipse Sallustius quem ad modum breuiter recolat et describat, in eius historia legi potest; quantis malis morum, quae secundis rebus exorta sunt, usque ad bella ciuilia demonstret esse peruentum. Ex quo tempore, ut ait, maiorum mores non paulatim ut antea, sed torrentis modo praecipitati, adeo iuuentus luxu adque auaritia corrupta, ut merito dicatur genitos esse, qui neque ipsi habere possent res familiares neque alios pati.	Now if this is what we find in the times when the Roman commonwealth is proclaimed to have been at its finest and best, what do we suppose should be said or thought about the age that followed? To use the same historian's words, "changing little by little, from the finest and best it became the worst and most shameful." As he recorded, this happened after the destruction of Carthage. How Sallust himself briefly recalls and describes those times can be read in his Histories. He shows to what great moral evils, born of prosperity, things came, down to the civil wars. "From that time," as he says, "the morals of our ancestors were swept headlong, no longer little by little as before, but like a torrent. The young were so corrupted by luxury and greed that it may rightly be said that a generation was born who could neither keep property of their own nor let others keep theirs."
Dicit deinde plura Sallustius de Syllae uitiis ceteraque foeditate rei publicae, et alii scriptores in haec consentiunt, quamuis eloquio multum inpari.	Sallust then says much more about the vices of Sulla and the rest of the commonwealth's disgrace, and other writers agree with him on these things, though they are far from his equal in eloquence.[21]
Cernis tamen, ut opinor, et quisquis aduerterit, facillime perspicit, conluuie morum pessimorum quo illa ciuitas	Yet you see, I think, into what a cesspool of the worst morals that city had sunk before the coming 21 Lucius Cornelius Sulla (c. 138–78 BC), general and dictator, whose proscriptions made him a byword for cruelty.

LATIN	ENGLISH
prolapsa fuerit ante nostri superni regis aduentum. Haec enim gesta sunt non solum antequam Christus in carne praesens docere coepisset, uerum etiam antequam de uirgine natus esset. Cum igitur tot et tanta mala temporum illorum uel tolerabiliora superius, uel post euersam Carthaginem intoleranda et horrenda dis suis inputare non audeant, opiniones humanis mentibus, unde talia uitia siluescerent, astutia maligna inserentibus: quur mala praesentia Christo inputant, qui doctrina saluberrima et falsos ac fallaces deos coli uetat et istas hominum noxias flagitiosasque cupiditates diuina auctoritate detestans adque condemnans his malis tabescenti ac labenti mundo ubique familiam suam sensim subtrahit, qua condat aeternam et non plausu uanitatis, sed iudicio ueritatis gloriosissimam ciuitatem?	of our heavenly King. Anyone who pays attention can see it very easily. For these things happened not only before Christ, present in the flesh, had begun to teach, but even before he was born of the Virgin. Their gods, with malignant cunning, planted in human minds the opinions from which such vices grew wild like a forest. Yet these people do not dare to blame their gods for all the many great evils of those times, whether the more tolerable earlier ones or the intolerable and horrifying ones after Carthage was overthrown. Why, then, do they blame the present evils on Christ? By his most wholesome teaching he forbids the worship of false and deceitful gods. He detests and condemns with divine authority these harmful and shameful human cravings. And from a world wasting away and sinking under these evils he is gradually drawing out his household everywhere, so that with it he may found an eternal city, most glorious not by the applause of vanity but by the judgment of truth.

THE CORRUPTION OF THE ROMAN COMMONWEALTH BEFORE CHRIST ABOLISHED THE WORSHIP OF THE GODS

Rome became the worst and most shameful commonwealth long before Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.19 Ecce Romana res publica (quod non ego primus dico, sed auctores eorum, unde haec mercede didicimus, tanto ante dixerunt ante Christi aduentum) paulatim mutata ex pulcherrima adque optima pessima ac flagitiosissima facta est. Ecce ante Christi aduentum, post deletam Carthaginem maiorum mores non paulatim, ut antea, sed torrentis modo praecipitati, adeo iuuentus luxu adque auaritia corrupta est. Legant nobis contra luxum et auaritiam praecepta deorum suorum populo Romano data; cui utinam tantum casta et modesta reticerent, ac non etiam ab illo probrosa et ignominiosa deposcerent, quibus per falsam diuinitatem perniciosam conciliarent auctoritatem.	Look: the Roman commonwealth, "changing little by little, from the finest and best became the worst and most shameful." I am not the first to say this. Their own authors, from whom we learned these things for a fee, said it long before the coming of Christ. Look: before the coming of Christ, after Carthage was destroyed, "the morals of our ancestors were swept headlong, no longer little by little as before, but like a torrent; the young were so corrupted by luxury and greed." Let them read out to us the precepts against luxury and greed that their gods gave to the Roman people! If only those gods had merely kept silent about chastity and moderation! Instead they also demanded from that people disgraceful and shameful things, and through their false divinity lent those things a pernicious authority.
Legant nostra et per prophetas et per sanctum euangelium, et per apostolicos actus et per epistulas tam multa contra auaritiam adque luxuriam ubique populis ad hoc congregatis quam excellenter, quam diuine non tamquam ex philosophorum concertationibus strepere,	Let them read ours. Through the prophets and the holy gospel, through the Acts of the Apostles and through the letters, so many precepts against greed and luxury are proclaimed everywhere to peoples gathered for this very purpose. How ex-

LATIN	ENGLISH
sed tamquam ex oraculis et Dei nubibus intonare. Et tamen luxu adque auaritia saeuisque ac turpibus moribus ante aduentum Christi rem publicam pessimam ac flagitiosissimam factam non inputant dis suis; adflictionem uero eius, quamcumque isto tempore superbia deliciaeque eorum perpessae fuerint, religioni increpitant Christianae.	cellently, how divinely they sound! They do not clatter like the quarrels of philosophers; they thunder as if from oracles and from the clouds of God. And yet these people do not blame their gods for the fact that, before the coming of Christ, luxury and greed and cruel and disgraceful morals made the commonwealth the worst and most shameful. But the commonwealth's affliction, whatever their pride and pleasures may have suffered in our time, they lay at the door of the Christian religion.
Cuius praecepta de iustis probisque moribus si simul audirent adque curarent reges terrae et omnes populi, principes et omnes iudices terrae, iuuenes et uirgines, seniores cum iunioribus, aetas omnis capax et uterque sexus, et quos baptista Iohannes adloquitur, exactores ipsi adque milites: et terras uitae praesentis ornaret sua felicitate res publica, et uitae aeternae culmen beatissime regnatura conscenderet.	Suppose all these were to hear and heed together its precepts about just and upright living: the kings of the earth and all peoples, princes and all judges of the earth, young men and young women, the old with the young, every age able to understand and both sexes, and those whom John the Baptist addresses, the tax collectors themselves and the soldiers. Then the commonwealth would adorn the lands of this present life with its happiness, and would ascend to the summit of eternal life, there to reign in perfect happiness.[22]
Sed quia iste audit, ille contemnit, pluresque uitiis male blandientibus quam utili uirtutum asperitati sunt amiciores: tolerare Christi famuli iubentur, siue sint reges siue principes siue iudices, siue milites siue prouinciales, siue diuites siue pauperes, siue liberi siue serui, utriuslibet sexus, etiam pessimam, si ita necesse est, flagitiosissimamque rem publicam et in illa angelorum quadam sanctissima adque augustissima curia caelestique re publica, ubi Dei uoluntas lex est, clarissimum sibi locum etiam ista conparare tolerantia.	But one person hears and another scorns, and more people are friendlier to vices that flatter to their harm than to the useful harshness of the virtues. So the servants of Christ are commanded to endure even the worst and most shameful commonwealth, if they must. This holds whether they are kings or princes or judges, soldiers or provincials, rich or poor, free or slaves, of either sex. By this very endurance they are to win for themselves a most glorious place in that most holy and most august senate of the angels, the heavenly commonwealth, where God's will is law.

WHAT KIND OF HAPPINESS THOSE WHO BLAME CHRISTIAN TIMES WANT TO ENJOY, AND WHAT MORALS THEY WANT TO LIVE BY

Augustine imagines the pagans' ideal: a city of pleasure where nothing is forbidden.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.20 Verum tales cultores et dilectores deorum istorum, quorum etiam imitatores in sceleribus et flagitiis se esse laetantur, nullo modo curant pessimam ac flagitiosissimam non esse rem publicam. Tantum stet, inquiunt, tantum floreat copiis referta, uictoriis gloriosa, uel, quod est felicius, pace secura sit. Et quid ad nos? Immo id ad nos magis pertinet, si diuitias quisque augeat	But such worshipers and lovers of those gods, whose imitators in crimes and vices they even rejoice to be, do not care in the least whether the commonwealth is the worst and most shameful. "Just let it stand," they say, "just let it flourish, filled with wealth, glorious with victories, or, better still, secure in peace. What else does it matter

22 Echoing Psalm 148:11–12; John the Baptist's counsel to tax collectors and soldiers is in Luke 3:12–14.

LATIN

semper, quae cottidianis effusionibus subpetant, per quas sibi etiam infirmiores subdat quisque potentior. Obsequantur diuitibus pauperes causa saturitatis adque ut eorum patrociniis quieta inertia perfruantur, diuites pauperibus ad clientelas et ad ministerium sui fastus abutantur. Populi plaudant non consultoribus utilitatum suarum, sed largitoribus uoluptatum. Non dura iubeantur, non prohibeantur inpura. Reges non curent quam bonis, sed quam subditis regnent.

Prouinciae regibus non tamquam rectoribus morum, sed tamquam rerum dominatoribus et deliciarum suarum prouisoribus seruiant, eosque non sinceriter honorent, sed seruiliter timeant. Quid alienae uineae potius quam quid suae uitae quisque noceat, legibus aduertatur. Nullus ducatur ad iudicem, nisi qui alienae rei domui saluti uel cuiquam inuito fuerit inportunus aut noxius; ceterum de suis uel cum suis uel cum quibusque uolentibus faciat quisque quod libet. Abundent publica scorta uel propter omnes, quibus frui placuerit, uel propter eos maxime, qui habere priuata non possunt. Exstruantur amplissimae adque ornatissimae domus, opipara conuiuia frequententur, ubi cuique libuerit et potuerit, diu noctuque ludatur bibatur, uomatur diffluatur. Saltationes undique concrepent, theatra inhonestae laetitiae uocibus adque omni genere siue crudelissimae siue turpissimae uoluptatis exaestuent.

Ille sit publicus inimicus, cui haec felicitas displicet; quisquis eam mutare uel auferre tentauerit, eum libera multitudo auertat ab auribus, euertat a sedibus, auferat a uiuentibus. Illi habeantur di ueri, qui hanc adipiscendam populis procurauerint adeptamque seruauerint. Colantur ut uoluerint, ludos exposcant quales uoluerint, quos cum suis uel de suis possint habere cultoribus: tantum efficiant, ut tali felicitati nihil ab hoste, nihil a peste, nihil ab ulla clade timeatur. — Quis hanc rem publicam sanus, non dicam Romano imperio, sed domui Sardanapali conparauerit? qui quondam rex ita fuit uoluptatibus deditus, ut in sepulcro suo scribi fecerit ea sola se habere mortuum, quae libido eius, etiam cum uiueret, hauriendo consumserat.

ENGLISH

to us? What matters more to us is that everyone should keep increasing his riches. Those riches must keep up with his daily extravagance, and through them the more powerful can bring the weaker under his control. Let the poor court the rich to get their fill, and to enjoy quiet idleness under their patronage. Let the rich use the poor to supply clients and to serve their own arrogance. Let the people applaud not those who look after their interests but those who lavish pleasures on them. Let nothing hard be commanded and nothing impure forbidden. Let kings care not how good their subjects are, but how submissive.

"Let the provinces serve their kings not as guides of morals but as lords of property and providers of their pleasures. Let them not honor their kings sincerely but fear them slavishly. Let the laws attend to the damage a man does to another's vineyard rather than the damage he does to his own life. Let no one be brought before a judge unless he has been a nuisance or a harm to another's property, house or safety, or to someone against that person's will. Otherwise let everyone do as he pleases with his own property, with his own household, or with anyone willing. Let there be plenty of public prostitutes, both for all who care to enjoy them and especially for those who cannot keep private ones. Let huge and lavishly decorated houses be built, and let sumptuous banquets be thronged. Wherever anyone likes and can, let there be gaming and drinking, vomiting and dissipation, day and night. Let dances resound everywhere. Let the theaters seethe with cries of indecent glee and with every kind of pleasure, whether the cruelest or the most shameful.

"Let anyone who dislikes this happiness be a public enemy. Whoever tries to change it or take it away, let the free multitude turn him away from their ears, turn him out of his home, turn him out of the land of the living. Let those be held to be true gods who have secured this happiness for the peoples and preserved it once it was gained. Let them be worshiped as they wish. Let them demand whatever shows they wish, shows they can enjoy with their worshipers or at their worshipers' expense. Only let them see to it that such happiness has nothing to fear from an enemy, nothing from plague, nothing from any disaster." What sane person would compare such a commonwealth, I will not say to the Roman Empire, but to the house of Sardanapalus? He was a king long ago, so given over to pleasures that he had it inscribed on his tomb that in death he possessed only what his lust had swallowed up and consumed while he was alive.[23]

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Quem regem si isti haberent sibi in talibus indulgentem nec in eis cuiquam ulla seueritate aduersantem, huic libentius quam Romani ueteres Romulo templum et flaminem consecrarent.	If these people had such a king, one who indulged them in these things and opposed no one in them with any severity, they would dedicate a temple and a flamen to him more gladly than the ancient Romans did to Romulus.

CICERO'S OPINION OF THE ROMAN COMMONWEALTH

Cicero's Scipio argues that without justice there is no commonwealth at all.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.21	Sed si contemnitur qui Romanam rem publicam pessimam ac flagitiosissimam dixit, nec curant isti quanta morum pessimorum ac flagitiosissimorum labe ac dedecore inpleatur, sed tantummodo ut consistat et maneat: audiant eam non, ut Sallustius narrat, pessimam ac flagitiosissimam factam, sed, sicut Cicero disputat, iam tunc prorsus perisse et nullam omnino remansisse rem publicam. Inducit enim Scipionem, eum ipsum qui Carthaginem extinxerat, de re publica disputantem, quando praesentiebatur ea corruptione, quam describit Sallustius, iam iamque peritura. Eo quippe tempore disputatur, quo iam unus Gracchorum occisus fuit, a quo scribit seditiones graues coepisse Sallustius. Nam mortis eius fit in eisdem libris commemoratio.	But perhaps they scorn the man who said that the Roman commonwealth had become the worst and most shameful. Perhaps they do not care how full it is of the stain and disgrace of the worst and most shameful morals, but only that it should hold together and last. If so, let them hear that it did not merely become the worst and most shameful, as Sallust relates. As Cicero argues, it had already perished altogether, and no commonwealth at all remained. For Cicero brings in Scipio, the very man who had wiped out Carthage, discussing the commonwealth at a time when people already sensed that it was about to perish through the corruption Sallust describes. The discussion is set after one of the Gracchi had been killed, and Sallust writes that serious seditions began with him. His death is mentioned in those same books.[24]
	Cum autem Scipio in secundi libri fine dixisset, ut in fidibus aut tibiis adque cantu ipso ac uocibus concentus est quidam tenendus ex distinctis sonis, quem inmutatum aut discrepantem aures eruditae ferre non possunt, isque concentus ex dissimillimarum uocum moderatione concors tamen efficitur et congruens: sic ex summis et infimis et mediis interiectis ordinibus, ut sonis, moderata ratione ciuitatem consensu dissimillimorum concinere, et quae harmonia a musicis dicitur in cantu, eam esse in ciuitate concordiam, artissimum adque optimum omni in re publica uinculum incolumitatis, eamque sine iustitia nullo pacto esse posse,	At the end of the second book Scipio had made a comparison. With strings or pipes, and in singing and in voices, a certain harmony must be kept among distinct sounds, and trained ears cannot bear it if that harmony is altered or out of tune. This harmony is produced by the controlled blending of very unlike voices, and yet it is concordant and consistent. In the same way, he said, a city is made up of the highest, the lowest and the middle orders between them, as if they were sounds, and it is harmonious through the agree-

23 Sardanapalus, the legendary last king of Assyria, was proverbial for luxury; Cicero quotes his epitaph in the Tusculan Disputations (5.101).

24 Cicero's dialogue On the Commonwealth (De re publica) is set in 129 BC, with Scipio Aemilianus, who destroyed Carthage in 146 BC, as its main speaker. Tiberius Gracchus, the reforming tribune, was killed in 133 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ac deinde cum aliquanto latius et uberius disseruisset, quantum prodesset iustitia ciuitati quantumque obesset, si afuisset, suscepit deinde Philus, unus eorum qui disputationi aderant, et poposcit, ut haec ipsa quaestio diligentius tractaretur ac de iustitia plura dicerentur, propter illud, quod iam uulgo ferebatur rem publicam regi sine iniuria non posse.	ment of very unlike elements under a controlled proportion. What musicians call harmony in song is concord in a city. That concord is the tightest and best bond of security in any commonwealth, and it cannot possibly exist without justice. He then discussed somewhat more fully and richly how much justice benefits a city and how much harm its absence would do. After that Philus, one of those present at the discussion, took up the matter. He asked that this very question be treated more carefully and that more be said about justice. His reason was a saying then commonly current, that a commonwealth cannot be governed without injustice.[25]
Hanc proinde quaestionem discutiendam et enodandam esse adsensus est Scipio responditque nihil esse, quod adhuc de re publica dictum putaret, quo possent longius progredi, nisi esset confirmatum non modo falsum esse illud, sine iniuria non posse, sed hoc uerissimum esse, sine summa iustitia rem publicam regi non posse. Cuius quaestionis explicatio cum in diem consequentem dilata esset, in tertio libro magna conflictione res acta est. Suscepit enim Philus ipse disputationem eorum, qui sentirent sine iniustitia geri non posse rem publicam, purgans praecipue, ne hoc ipse sentire crederetur, egitque sedulo pro iniustitia contra iustitiam, ut hanc esse utilem rei publicae, illam uero inutilem, ueri similibus rationibus et exemplis uelut conaretur ostendere.	Scipio agreed that this question should be discussed and untangled. He replied that, in his view, nothing yet said about the commonwealth would let them go any further unless one thing were established. It must be shown not only that the claim "it cannot be governed without injustice" is false, but that this is perfectly true: a commonwealth cannot be governed without the highest justice. The treatment of this question was put off to the following day, and in the third book the matter was fought out in a great contest. For Philus himself took up the case of those who held that a commonwealth cannot be run without injustice. Above all he took care that no one should think he held this view himself. He argued diligently for injustice against justice, trying, as it were, to show by plausible reasons and examples that injustice is useful to a commonwealth and justice useless.
Tum Laelius rogantibus omnibus iustitiam defendere adgressus est adseruitque, quantum potuit, nihil tam inimicum quam iniustitiam ciuitati nec omnino nisi magna iustitia geri aut stare rem publicam..	Then, at everyone's request, Laelius undertook to defend justice. He maintained as strongly as he could that nothing is so hostile to a city as injustice, and that a commonwealth cannot be run, or stand at all, except by great justice.[26]

WHAT A COMMONWEALTH IS

Scipio defines a commonwealth as the affair of a people united by agreement about right.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Qua quaestione, quantum satis uisum est, pertractata Scipio ad intermissa reuertitur recolitque suam adque commendat breuem rei publicae definitionem, qua	When this question had been treated as fully as seemed sufficient, Scipio returns to what had been interrupted. He recalls and commends his brief

25 Lucius Furius Philus, consul in 136 BC, is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue.
26 Gaius Laelius, consul in 140 BC, was Scipio's close friend.

LATIN

dixerat eam esse rem populi. Populum autem non omnem coetum multitudinis, sed coetum iuris consensu et utilitatis communione sociatum esse determinat. Docet deinde quanta sit in disputando definitionis utilitas, adque ex illis suis definitionibus colligit tunc esse rem publicam, id est rem populi, cum bene ac iuste geritur siue ab uno rege siue a paucis optimatibus siue ab uniuerso populo.

Cum uero iniustus est rex, quem tyrannum more Graeco appellauit, aut iniusti optimates, quorum consensum dixit esse factionem, aut iniustus ipse populus, cui nomen usitatum non repperit, nisi ut etiam ipsum tyrannum uocaret: non iam uitiosam, sicut pridie fuerat disputatum, sed, sicut ratio ex illis definitionibus conexa docuisset, omnino nullam esse rem publicam, quoniam non esset res populi, cum tyrannus eam factioue capesseret, nec ipse populus iam populus esset, si esset iniustus, quoniam non esset multitudo iuris consensu et utilitatis communione sociata, sicut populus fuerat definitus.

Quando ergo res publica Romana talis erat, qualem illam describit Sallustius, non iam pessima ac flagitiosissima, sicut ipse ait, sed omnino nulla erat secundum istam rationem, quam disputatio de re publica inter magnos eius tum principes habita patefecit. Sicut etiam ipse Tullius non Scipionis nec cuiusquam alterius, sed suo sermone loquens in principio quinti libri commemorato prius Ennii poetae uersu, quo dixerat:. Moribus antiquis res stat Romana uirisque, quem quidem ille uersum, inquit, uel breuitate uel ueritate tamquam ex oraculo quodam mihi effatus uidetur. Nam neque uiri, nisi ita morata ciuitas fuisset, neque mores, nisi hi uiri praefuissent, aut fundare aut tam diu tenere potuissent tantam et tam iuste longe lateque imperantem rem publicam.

Itaque ante nostram memoriam et mos ipse patrius praestantes uiros adhibebat, et ueterem morem ac maiorum instituta retinebant excellentes uiri. Nostra definition of the commonwealth (res publica): it is the people's affair (res populi). He specifies that a people is not every gathering of a multitude, but a gathering united by agreement about what is right and by a partnership in common interest. He then explains how useful definition is in argument. From these definitions of his he concludes that a commonwealth, that is, the people's affair, exists when it is well and justly administered, whether by a single king, by a few aristocrats, or by the whole people.

ENGLISH

But the king may be unjust, and him he called a tyrant, in the Greek fashion. The aristocrats may be unjust, and their combination he called a faction. Or the people itself may be unjust, and for this he found no customary name except to call it, too, a tyrant. In any of these cases the commonwealth is no longer merely flawed, as had been argued the day before. As reasoning drawn from those definitions had shown, there is no commonwealth at all. It would not be the people's affair when a tyrant or a faction had seized it. Nor would the people itself still be a people if it were unjust, since it would no longer be a multitude united by agreement about what is right and by a partnership in common interest, which was how a people had been defined.

When, then, the Roman commonwealth was such as Sallust describes, it was no longer merely "the worst and most shameful," as he says. By the reasoning set out in the discussion of the commonwealth held among its great leaders of that time, it did not exist at all. Cicero himself says the same at the beginning of the fifth book, speaking not as Scipio or anyone else but in his own voice. He first quotes the line of the poet Ennius in which he had said: "The Roman state stands on its ancient ways and on its men." "That line," Cicero says, "for its brevity as much as its truth, seems to me to have been uttered as if by an oracle. For the men could not have founded so great a commonwealth, ruling so justly far and wide, or held it for so long, if the city had not had such ways. Nor could the ways have done so, if these men had not led it.[27]

"And so, before our own time, ancestral custom itself brought forward outstanding men, and excel-

27 Quintus Ennius (239–169 BC), early Roman epic poet; the line comes from his Annals.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uero aetas cum rem publicam sicut picturam accepisset egregiam, sed euanescentem uetustate, non modo eam coloribus isdem quibus fuerat renouare neglexit, sed ne id quidem curauit, ut formam saltem eius et extrema tamquam liniamenta seruaret. Quid enim manet ex antiquis moribus, quibus ille dixit rem stare Romanam, quos ita obliuione obsoletos uidemus, ut non modo non colantur, sed iam ignorentur? Nam de uiris quid dicam? Mores enim ipsi interierunt uirorum penuria, cuius tanti mali non modo reddenda ratio nobis, sed etiam tamquam reis capitis quodam modo dicenda causa est.	lent men preserved the old custom and the institutions of our ancestors. But our age received the commonwealth like a splendid painting fading with age. It not only neglected to restore it with the same colors it once had, but did not even take care to preserve at least its shape and, so to speak, its outlines. For what remains of those ancient ways on which he said the Roman state stood? We see them so worn out by forgetfulness that they are not only no longer practiced but no longer even known. And what am I to say about the men? For the ways themselves have perished through a lack of men. For so great an evil we must not only give an account; in a sense we must plead our case like men on trial for our lives.
Nostris enim uitiis, non casu aliquo, rem publicam uerbo retinemus, re ipsa uero iam pridem amisimus.	"For it is through our own vices, not by some accident, that we keep the commonwealth in name but have long since lost it in reality."
Haec Cicero fatebatur, longe quidem post mortem Africani, quem in suis libris fecit de re publica disputare, adhuc tamen ante aduentum Christi; quae si diffamata et praeualescente religione Christiana sentirentur adque dicerentur, quis non istorum ea Christianis inputanda esse censeret? Quam ob rem quur non curarunt di eorum, ne tunc periret adque amitteretur illa res publica, quam Cicero longe, antequam Christus in carne uenisset, tam lugubriter deplorat amissam? Viderint laudatores eius etiam illis antiquis uiris et moribus qualis fuerit, utrum in ea uiguerit uera iustitia an forte nec tunc fuerit uiua moribus, sed picta coloribus; quod et ipse Cicero nesciens, cum eam praeferret, expressit. Sed alias, si Deus uoluerit, hoc uidebimus.	Cicero admitted this long after the death of Africanus, whom he made a speaker on the commonwealth in his books, but still before the coming of Christ. If such things had been felt and said after the Christian religion had spread and come to prevail, which of these people would not hold that they should be blamed on the Christians? Why, then, did their gods not take care that the commonwealth should not perish and be lost back then? Long before Christ came in the flesh, Cicero mourned it so bitterly as lost. Let its admirers consider what it was like even in the days of those ancient men and ways. Did true justice flourish in it? Or was it perhaps, even then, not alive in its morals but only painted in colors? Cicero himself expressed this without realizing it, while he was praising the commonwealth. But we will look into this elsewhere, God willing.[28]
Enitar enim suo loco, ut ostendam secundum definitiones ipsius Ciceronis, quibus quid sit res publica et quid sit populus loquente Scipione breuiter posuit (adtestantibus etiam multis siue ipsius siue eorum quos loqui fecit in eadem disputatione sententiis), numquam illam fuisse rem publicam, quia numquam in ea fuerit uera iustitia. Secundum probabiliores autem definitiones pro suo modo quodam res publica fuit, et melius ab antiquioribus Romanis quam a posterioribus administrata est; uera autem iustitia non est nisi in ea re publica, cuius conditor rectorque Christus est, si et ipsam rem publicam placet	In its proper place I will try to show that it never was a commonwealth, because there never was true justice in it. I will argue this from Cicero's own definitions, in which, through Scipio as speaker, he briefly set out what a commonwealth is and what a people is. Many statements in that same discussion, whether his own or those of the speakers he created, also bear witness to this. According to more plausible definitions, though, it was a commonwealth after its own fashion, and 28 Africanus here is Scipio Aemilianus, who earned the name by destroying Carthage; he died in 129 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
dicere, quoniam eam rem populi esse negare non possumus.	the earlier Romans administered it better than the later ones. But true justice exists only in that commonwealth whose founder and ruler is Christ, if we may call it a commonwealth too, since we cannot deny that it is the people's affair.[29]
Si autem hoc nomen, quod alibi aliterque uulgatum est, ab usu nostrae locutionis est forte remotius, in ea certe ciuitate est uera iustitia, de qua scriptura sancta dicit: Gloriosa dicta sunt de te, ciuitas Dei.	But this word is used commonly elsewhere in other senses, and it may be rather remote from our usual way of speaking. If so, true justice certainly exists in that city of which holy Scripture says: "Glorious things are said of you, city of God."[30]

THAT THE GODS OF THE ROMANS NEVER TOOK ANY CARE THAT THE COMMONWEALTH SHOULD NOT PERISH THROUGH BAD MORALS

The gods gave no laws to keep the commonwealth from perishing through vice.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.22 Sed quod pertinet ad praesentem quaestionem, quamlibet laudabilem dicant istam fuisse uel esse rem publicam, secundum eorum auctores doctissimos iam longe ante Christi aduentum pessima ac flagitiosissima facta erat; immo uero nulla erat adque omnino perierat perditissimis moribus. Ut ergo non periret, di custodes eius populo cultori suo dare praecipue uitae ac morum praecepta debuerunt, a quo tot templis, tot sacerdotibus et sacrificiorum generibus, tam multiplicibus uariisque sacris, tot festis sollemnitatibus, tot tantorumque ludorum celebritatibus colebantur; ubi nihil daemones nisi negotium suum egerunt, non curantes quem ad modum illi uiuerent, immo curantes ut etiam perdite uiuerent, dum tamen honori suo illa omnia metu subditi ministrarent.	But as far as the present question goes, however praiseworthy they claim that commonwealth was or is, their own most learned authors say that long before Christ's coming it had become "the worst and most shameful." Or rather, it no longer existed at all: it had perished completely through utterly abandoned morals. So, to keep it from perishing, the gods who guarded it ought above all to have given rules for life and morals to the people who worshiped them. That people worshiped them with so many temples, so many priests and kinds of sacrifice, such manifold and varied rites, so many festal solemnities, so many crowded celebrations of so many great games. Yet in all this the demons did nothing but mind their own business. They did not care how those people lived. Indeed, they cared that they should live even depravedly, so long as the people, kept in subjection by fear, performed all these services in their honor.
Aut si dederunt, proferatur ostendatur legatur, quas deorum leges illi ciuitati datas contemserint Gracchi, ut seditionibus cuncta turbarent, quas Marius et Cinna et Carbo, ut in bella etiam progrederentur ciuilia causis iniquissimis suscepta et crudeliter gesta crudeliusque finita, quas denique Sylla ipse, cuius uitam mores facta describente Sallustio aliisque scriptoribus historiae quis non exhorreat? quis illam rem publicam non tunc perisse fateatur?	Or if they did give such rules, let them be produced, displayed, read out. Which laws of the gods given to that city did the Gracchi despise, so as to throw everything into turmoil with their seditions? Which did Marius and Cinna and Carbo despise, so as to go on even to civil wars, undertaken for the most unjust causes, waged cruelly and ended more cruelly still? Which, finally, did Sulla himself despise? Who would not shudder at his life, character and deeds, as Sallust and other his-

29 Augustine returns to this argument in Book 19 (chapters 21–24).
30 Psalm 86:3 (87:3 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

torians describe them? Who would not admit that the commonwealth perished then?[31]

An forte propter huiusce modi ciuium mores Vergilianam illam sententiam, sicut solent, pro defensione deorum suorum obponere audebunt:. Discessere omnes adytis arisque relictis / Di, quibus imperium hoc steterat? Primum si ita est, non habent quur querantur de religione Christiana, quod hac offensi eos di sui deseruerint, quoniam quidem maiores eorum iam pridem moribus suis ab Urbis altaribus tam multos ac minutos deos tamquam muscas abegerunt. Sed tamen haec numinum turba ubi erat, cum longe antequam mores corrumperentur antiqui a Gallis Roma capta et incensa est? An praesentes forte dormiebant? Tunc enim tota Urbe in hostium potestatem redacta collis solus Capitolinus remanserat, qui etiam ipse caperetur, nisi saltem anseres dis dormientibus uigilarent.

Or perhaps, because of the morals of such citizens, they will dare, as they usually do, to set against us in defense of their gods that line of Virgil: "All the gods on whom this empire had stood departed, leaving their shrines and altars"? First, if that is so, they have no reason to complain of the Christian religion, claiming that their gods were offended by it and deserted them. For their ancestors long ago drove so many tiny gods away from the City's altars by their morals, like flies. But in any case, where was this crowd of divinities when Rome was captured and burned by the Gauls, long before the ancient morals were corrupted? Were they there, perhaps, but asleep? For at that time the whole City had been brought under the enemy's power and only the Capitoline hill remained. It too would have been taken, had not the geese at least stayed awake while the gods slept.[32]

Unde paene in superstitionem Aegyptiorum bestias auesque colentium Roma deciderat, cum anseri sollemnia celebrabant. Verum de his aduenticiis et corporis potius quam animi malis, quae uel ab hostibus uel alia clade accidunt, nondum interim disputo: nunc ago de labe morum, quibus primum paulatim decoloratis, deinde torrentis modo praecipitatis tanta quamuis integris tectis moenibusque facta est ruina rei publicae, ut magni auctores eorum eam tunc amissam non dubitent dicere. Recte autem abscesserant, ut amitteretur, omnes adytis arisque relictis di, si eorum de bona uita adque iustitia ciuitas praecepta contemserat. Nunc uero quales, quaeso, di fuerunt, si noluerunt cum populo cultore suo uiuere, quem male uiuentem non docuerant bene uiuere?

This is how Rome nearly sank into the superstition of the Egyptians, who worship beasts and birds: they used to hold a solemn festival in honor of a goose. But for the moment I am not yet discussing these external evils, which belong to the body rather than the mind and come from enemies or some other disaster. Now I am dealing with the decay of morals. First they faded little by little, then they rushed headlong like a torrent. They brought such ruin on the commonwealth, though its houses and walls stood intact, that their great authors do not hesitate to say it was lost at that time. And the gods would indeed have been right to depart, "leaving their shrines and altars," and let it be lost, if the city had despised their rules about good living and justice. But as it is, what sort of gods were they, I ask, if they refused to live with the people who worshiped them, when they had not taught that people, living badly, to live well?

31 The Gracchi brothers, Tiberius and Gaius, were reforming tribunes killed in civil strife (133 and 121 BC); Marius, Cinna, Carbo and Sulla led the opposing sides in the civil wars of the 80s BC.

32 Virgil, Aeneid 2.351–352. The Gauls sacked Rome around 390 BC, and the sacred geese of Juno were said to have raised the alarm that saved the Capitol.

THAT THE CHANGES OF TEMPORAL AFFAIRS DEPEND NOT ON THE FAVOR OR HOSTILITY OF DEMONS BUT ON THE JUDGMENT OF THE TRUE GOD

Marius prospered and Regulus suffered, so earthly fortune does not depend on the gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.23	Quid quod etiam uidentur eorum adfuisse cupiditatibus inplendis, et ostenduntur non praefuisse refrenandis, qui enim Marium nouum hominem et ignobilem, cruentissimum auctorem bellorum ciuilium adque gestorem, ut septiens consul fieret adiuuerunt adque ut in septimo suo consulatu moreretur senex nec in manus Syllae futuri mox uictoris inrueret. Si enim ad haec eum di eorum non iuuerunt, non parum est quod fatentur etiam non propitiis dis suis posse accidere homini istam temporalem, quam nimis diligunt, tantam felicitatem et posse homines, sicut fuit Marius, salute uiribus, opibus honoribus, dignitate longaeuitate cumulari et perfrui dis iratis; posse etiam homines, sicut fuit Regulus, captiuitate seruitute inopia, uigiliis doloribus excruciari et emori dis amicis. Quod si ita esse concedunt, conpendio nihil eos prodesse et coli superfluo confitentur.	What of the fact that they even seem to have helped fulfill these people's cravings, and are shown not to have taken charge of curbing them? For it was they who helped Marius, a new man of humble birth, the bloodiest instigator and conductor of civil wars, to become consul seven times. They also helped him to die an old man in his seventh consulship, so that he did not fall into the hands of Sulla, who was soon to be victor. But if their gods did not help him to these things, they make no small admission. They admit that this temporal happiness, which they love too much, can come to a man in such measure even without the favor of their gods. Men like Marius can be heaped with health and strength, wealth and honors, rank and long life, and enjoy them to the full, while the gods are angry. And men like Regulus can be tormented by captivity, slavery and destitution, by sleeplessness and pain, and die of them, while the gods are their friends. If they concede that this is so, they confess in short that the gods are of no use and are worshiped for nothing.[33]
	Nam si uirtutibus animi et probitati uitae, cuius praemia post mortem speranda sunt, magis contraria ut populus disceret institerunt; si nihil etiam in his transeuntibus et temporalibus bonis uel eis quos oderunt nocent, uel eis quos diligunt prosunt, ut quid coluntur, ut quid tanto studio colendi requiruntur? Quur laboriosis tristibusque temporibus, tamquam offensi abscesserint, murmuratur et propter eos Christiana religio conuiciis indignissimis laeditur? Si autem habent in his rebus uel beneficii uel maleficii potestatem, quur in eis adfuerunt pessimo uiro Mario, et optimo Regulo defuerunt? An ex hoc ipsi intelleguntur iniustissimi et pessimi? Quod si propterea magis timendi et colendi putantur, neque hoc putentur; neque enim minus eos inuenitur Regulus coluisse quam Marius.	For suppose they insisted that the people learn things opposed to the virtues of the mind and integrity of life, whose rewards are to be hoped for after death. Suppose also that even in these passing, temporal goods they neither harm those they hate nor help those they love. Then why are they worshiped? Why are they sought out to be worshiped with such zeal? Why, in hard and gloomy times, is there grumbling that they have departed as if offended? Why is the Christian religion attacked with the most outrageous abuse on their account? But if they do have power in these matters to do good or harm, why did they stand by Marius, the worst of men, and fail Regulus, the best? Does this show that they themselves are most unjust and most wicked? And if people think that for this very reason they should be feared and worshiped all the more, let them not think that either. For Regulus is not found to have worshiped them any less than Marius did.

33 A "new man" (novus homo) was the first of his family to reach the consulship; Marius died in 86 BC.

LATIN

Nec ideo uita pessima eligenda uideatur, quia magis Mario quam Regulo di fauisse existimantur. Metellus enim Romanorum laudatissimus, qui habuit quinque filios consulares, etiam rerum temporalium felix fuit, et Catilina pessimus obpressus inopia et in bello sui sceleris prostratus infelix, et uerissima adque certissima felicitate praepollent boni Deum colentes, a quo solo conferri potest.

Illa igitur res publica malis moribus cum periret, nihil di eorum pro dirigendis uel pro corrigendis egerunt moribus, ne periret; immo deprauandis et corrumpendis addiderunt moribus, ut periret. Nec se bonos fingant, quod uelut offensi ciuium iniquitate discesserint. Prorsus ibi erant; produntur, conuincuntur; nec subuenire praecipiendo nec latere tacendo potuerunt. Omitto quod Marius a miserantibus Minturnensibus Maricae deae in luco eius commendatus est, ut ei omnia prosperaret, et ex summa desperatione reuersus incolumis in Urbem duxit crudelem crudelis exercitum; ubi quam cruenta, quam inciuilis hostilique inmanior eius uictoria fuerit, eos qui scripserunt legant qui uolunt.

Sed hoc, ut dixi, omitto, nec Maricae nescio cui tribuo Marii sanguineam felicitatem, sed occultae potius prouidentiae Dei ad istorum ora claudenda eosque ab errore liberandos, qui non studiis agunt, sed haec prudenter aduertunt, quia, etsi aliquid in his rebus daemones possunt, tantum possunt, quantum secreto omnipotentis arbitrio permittuntur, ne magnipendamus terrenam felicitatem, quae sicut Mario malis etiam plerumque conceditur, nec eam rursus quasi malam arbitremur, cum ea multos etiam pios ac bonos unius ueri Dei cultores inuitis daemonibus praepolluisse uideamus, nec eosdem inmundissimos spiritus uel propter haec ipsa bona malaue terrena propitiandos aut timendos existimemus, quia, sicut ipsi mali homines in tena, sic etiam illi non omnia quae uolunt facere possunt, nisi

ENGLISH

Nor should anyone conclude that the worst life is the one to choose because the gods are thought to have favored Marius more than Regulus. For Metellus, the most highly praised of the Romans, who had five sons who became consuls, was happy even in temporal things. Catiline, the worst of men, was crushed by poverty and laid low in the war his own crime had started, and was unhappy. And good people who worship God surpass all others in the truest and most certain happiness, which he alone can bestow.[34]

So when that commonwealth was perishing through bad morals, their gods did nothing to guide or correct those morals so that it would not perish. On the contrary, they helped to deprave and corrupt them, so that it would perish. And let them not pretend to be good on the ground that they departed as if offended at the citizens' wickedness. They were certainly there. They are exposed, they are convicted. They could neither come to the rescue by giving rules nor hide by keeping silent. I pass over the fact that the people of Minturnae, pitying Marius, commended him to the goddess Marica in her grove, so that she might make everything prosper for him. Returning safe from utter despair, he led a cruel army into the City, cruel himself. How bloody that victory of his was, how unworthy of fellow citizens, how much more savage than an enemy's, let anyone who wishes read in those who have written of it.[35]

But, as I said, I pass over this. I do not attribute Marius's bloodstained good fortune to some Marica or other. Rather, I attribute it to the hidden providence of God, which closes the mouths of these people and frees from error those who do not act out of partisan zeal but consider these things wisely. For even if demons have some power in these matters, they have only as much as the secret decision of the Almighty permits them. This is so that we may not prize earthly happiness highly, since it is often granted even to the wicked, as it was to Marius. Nor, on the other hand, should we think it bad, since we see that many devout and good worshipers of the one true God have en-34 Quintus Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus (second century BC) was proverbial for his good fortune and his sons' honors. Catiline led a conspiracy against the republic in 63 BC and was killed in battle the next year.

35 Minturnae was a town south of Rome where Marius, fleeing Sulla in 88 BC, was captured and then released; Marica was a local goddess with a sacred grove nearby.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	quantum illius ordinatione sinitur, cuius plene iudicia nemo conprehendit, iuste nemo reprehendit.	joyed it in abundance, in spite of the demons. Nor should we suppose that these most unclean spirits must be appeased or feared for the sake of these earthly goods or evils. For just as wicked men on earth cannot do all they want, neither can those spirits, except so far as the ordering of God allows. No one fully comprehends his judgments, and no one justly reprehends them.

THE DEEDS OF SULLA, IN WHICH THE DEMONS BOASTED OF BEING HIS HELPERS

The gods foretold Sulla's victories but never warned him against his crimes.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.24	Sylla certe ipse, cuius tempora talia fuerunt, ut superiora, quorum uindex esse uidebatur, illorum conparatione quaererentur, cum primum ad Urbem contra Marium castra mouisset, adeo laeta exta immolanti fuisse scribit Liuius, ut custodiri se Postumius haruspex uoluerit capitis supplicium subiturus, nisi ea, quae in animo Sylla haberet, dis iuuantibus inpleuisset. Ecce non discesserant adytis adquo aris relictis di, quando de rerum euentu praedicebant nihilque de ipsius Syllae correctione curabant. Promittebant praesagando felicitatem magnam nec malam cupiditatem minando frangebant. Deinde cum esset in Asia bellum Mithridaticum gerens, per Lucium Titium ei mandatum est a Ioue, quod esset Mithridatem superaturus, et factum est.	Sulla himself, certainly, made his own times so terrible that people longed, by comparison, for the earlier times he seemed to be avenging. Livy writes that when Sulla first moved his camp toward the City against Marius, the entrails were so favorable as he sacrificed that the diviner Postumius asked to be kept under guard. He was ready to suffer the death penalty if Sulla did not, with the gods' help, accomplish what he had in mind. Look: the gods had not departed, "leaving their shrines and altars," when they were foretelling the outcome of events and cared nothing about correcting Sulla himself. They promised him great happiness by their prophecies, but did not break his evil craving with threats. Later, when he was in Asia waging the Mithridatic war, Jupiter sent him word through Lucius Titius that he would defeat Mithridates. And so it happened.[36]
	Ac postea molienti redire in Urbem et suas amicorumque iniurias ciuili sanguine ulcisci, iterum mandatum est ab eodem Ioue per militem quendam legionis sextae, prius se de Mithridate praenuntiasse uictoriam, et tunc promittere daturum se potestatem, qua recuperaret ab inimicis rem publicam non sine multo sanguine. Tum percontatus Sylla, quae forma militi uisa fuerit, cum ille indicasset, eam recordatus est, quam prius ab illo audierat, qui de Mithridatica uictoria ab eodem mandata pertulerat. Quid hic responderi potest, quare di curauerint uelut felicia ista nuntiare, et nullus eorum curauerit Syllam monendo corrigere mala tanta facturum scelestis armis ciuilibus, qualia non foedarent, sed auferrent omnino rem publicam?	And afterward, as Sulla was preparing to return to the City and avenge with citizens' blood the wrongs done to himself and his friends, the same Jupiter again sent him word, through a soldier of the Sixth Legion. Jupiter said that he had earlier foretold the victory over Mithridates, and now promised to give Sulla the power to recover the commonwealth from his enemies, though not without much bloodshed. Then Sulla asked what form had appeared to the soldier. When the soldier described it, Sulla recognized the form he had earlier heard described by the man who had brought him the message from the same god about the Mithridatic victory. What answer can be given here? Why did the gods take care to announce 36 Livy was the great historian of Rome under Augustus. Mithridates VI, king of Pontus, fought Rome in the 80s BC.

LATIN

ENGLISH

these supposedly happy events, while not one of them took care to correct Sulla by warning him? Yet Sulla was going to commit such great evils with wicked civil arms that they would not merely disfigure the commonwealth but destroy it altogether.

Nempe intelleguntur daemones, sicut saepe dixi notumque nobis est in litteris sacris resque ipsae satis indicant, negotium suum agere, ut pro dis habeantur et colantur, ut ea illis exhibeantur, quibus hi qui exhibent sociati unam pessimam causam cum eis habeant in iudicio Dei.

Clearly, as I have often said, as we know from the sacred writings, and as the facts themselves sufficiently show, the demons are seen to be minding their own business. They want to be taken for gods and worshiped, and to have things offered to them. Those who offer these things become their partners and share with them one and the same very bad case at the judgment of God.

Deinde cum uenisset Tarentum Sylla adque ibi sacrificasset, uidit in capite uitulini iecoris similitudinem coronae aureae. Tunc Postumius haruspex ille respondit praeclaram significare uictoriam iussitque ut extis illis solus uesceretur. Postea paruo interuallo seruus cuiusdam Lucii Pontii uaticinando clamauit: a Bellona nuntius uenio, uictoria tua est, Sylla. Deinde adiecit arsurum esse Capitolium. Hoc cum dixisset, continuo egressus e castris postero die concitatior reuersus est et Capitolium arsisse clamauit. Arserat autem re uera Capitolium. Quod quidem daemoni et praeuidere facile fuit et celerrime nuntiare. Illud sane intende, quod ad causam maxime pertinet, sub qualibus dis esse cupiant, qui blasphemant Saluatorem uoluntates fidelium a dominatu daemonum liberantem.

Then, when Sulla had come to Tarentum and sacrificed there, he saw on the head of a calf's liver the likeness of a golden crown. The diviner Postumius then declared that it signified a splendid victory, and ordered Sulla to eat those entrails alone. A little while afterward a slave of a certain Lucius Pontius cried out in prophecy: "I come as a messenger from Bellona. The victory is yours, Sulla." Then he added that the Capitol would burn. Having said this, he at once left the camp. He came back the next day in greater agitation and cried out that the Capitol had burned. And the Capitol had in fact burned. This was certainly easy for a demon both to foresee and to report very quickly. But do notice this, which is most relevant to the case: what kind of gods they long to live under, those who blaspheme the Savior who frees the wills of the faithful from the domination of demons.[37]

Clamauit homo uaticinando: uictoria tua est, Sylla, adque ut id diuino spiritu clamare crederetur, nuntiauit etiam aliquid et prope futurum et mox factum, unde longe aberat per quem ille spiritus loquebatur; non tamen clamauit: ab sceleribus parce, Sylla, quae illic uictor tam horrenda commisit, cui corona aurea ipsius uictoriae inlustrissimum signum in uitulino iecore apparuit, qualia signa si di iusti dare solerent ac non daemones inpii, profecto illis extis nefaria potius adque ipsi Syllae grauiter noxia mala futura monstrarent. Neque enim eius dignitati tantum profuit illa uictoria, quantum nocuit cupiditati; qua factum est, ut inmoderatis inhians et secundis rebus elatus ac praecipitatus magis ipse periret in moribus, quam inimicos in corporibus perderet.

The man cried out in prophecy, "The victory is yours, Sulla." And so that he would be believed to cry this out by a divine spirit, he also announced something that was about to happen and soon did happen, in a place far from where the man was through whom that spirit spoke. Yet he did not cry, "Hold back from crimes, Sulla"—the crimes so horrible that Sulla committed there as victor, the man to whom a golden crown, the most illustrious sign of that very victory, had appeared in the calf's liver. If just gods, and not impious demons, were in the habit of giving such signs, they would surely have shown in those entrails the abominable evils 37 Bellona was the Roman goddess of war. The temple of Jupiter on the Capitol burned in 83 BC.

LATIN

ENGLISH

to come, gravely harmful to Sulla himself. For that victory did not profit his standing as much as it harmed his cravings. Because of it he gaped after things beyond all measure, and, exalted and thrown headlong by success, he himself perished in his morals more than he destroyed his enemies in their bodies.

Haec illi di uere tristia uereque lugenda non extis, non auguriis, non cuiusquam somnio uel uaticinio praenuntiabant. Magis enim timebant ne corrigeretur quam ne uinceretur. Immo satis agebant, ut uictor ciuium gloriosus uictus adque captiuus nefandis uitiis et per haec ipsis etiam daemonibus multo obstrictius subderetur.

These things, truly sad and truly lamentable, those gods did not foretell—not by entrails, not by auguries, not by anyone's dream or prophecy. For they feared his being corrected more than his being defeated. Indeed, they were busy making sure that this glorious conqueror of his fellow citizens would be conquered and taken captive by abominable vices, and through them bound in far tighter subjection to the demons themselves.

HOW STRONGLY EVIL SPIRITS INCITE PEOPLE TO WICKEDNESS, WHEN THEY LEND THE QUASI-DIVINE AUTHORITY OF THEIR OWN EXAMPLE TO THE COMMISSION OF CRIMES

Demons staged phantom battles to make civil war look godlike.

LATIN

ENGLISH

2.25 Illinc uero quis non intellegat, quis non uideat, nisi qui tales deos imitari magis elegit quam diuina gratia ab eorum societate separari, quantum moliantur maligni isti spiritus exemplo suo uelut diuinam auctoritatem praebere sceleribus? quod etiam in quadam Campaniae lata planitie, ubi non multo post ciuiles acies nefario proelio conflixerunt, ipsi inter se prius pugnare uisi sunt. Namque ibi auditi sunt primum ingentes fragores, moxque multi se uidisse nuntiarunt per aliquot dies duas acies proeliari. Quae pugna ubi destitit, uestigia quoque uelut hominum et equorum, quanta de illa conflictatione exprimi poterant, inuenerunt.

From this, who would not understand, who would not see—unless he has chosen to imitate such gods rather than be separated from their company by divine grace—how hard these evil spirits strive to lend crimes a sort of divine authority by their own example? They were even seen fighting among themselves on a broad plain in Campania, where not long afterward armies of citizens clashed in an impious battle. First, huge crashes were heard there, and soon many reported that for several days they had seen two armies in combat. When this fight ended, people also found footprints, as of men and horses, as many as such a clash could have stamped out.

Si ergo ueraciter inter se numina pugnauerunt, iam bella ciuilia excusantur humana; consideretur tamen quae sit talium deorum uel malitia uel miseria: si autem se pugnasse finxerunt, quid aliud egerunt, nisi ut sibi Romani bellando ciuiliter tamquam deorum exemplo nullum nefas admittere uiderentur? Iam enim coeperant bella ciuilia, et aliquot nefandorum proeliorum strages exsecranda praecesserat. Iam multos mouerat, quod miles quidam, dum occiso spolia detraheret, fratrem nudato cadauere agnouit ac detestatus bella ciuilia se ipsum ibi perimens fraterno corpori adiunxit. Ut ergo huius tanti mali minime taederet, sed armorum scelestorum magis magisque ardor increscerent, noxii

So if divinities really fought one another, human civil wars are now excused. Still, let us consider what malice or what wretchedness such gods must have. But if they only pretended to have fought, what else were they doing but making the Romans, when fighting civil wars, seem to commit no crime, as if following the example of the gods? For civil wars had already begun, and the accursed slaughter of several abominable battles had already taken place. Many had already been moved by the case of a soldier who, while stripping the spoils from a man he had killed, recognized his brother once the corpse was bared. Curs-daemones, quos illi deos putantes colendos et uenerandos arbitrabantur, inter se pugnantes hominibus apparere uoluerunt, ne imitari tales pugnas ciuica trepidaret adfectio, sed potius humanum scelus diuino excusaretur exemplo.

LATIN

Hac astutia maligni spiritus etiam ludos, unde multa iam dixi, scaenicos sibi dicari sacrarique iusserunt, ubi tanta deorum flagitia theatricis canticis adque fabularum actionibus celebrata et quisquis eos fecisse crederet et quisquis non crederet, sed tamen illos libentissime sibi talia exhiberi cerneret, securus imitaretur. Ne quis itaque existimaret in deos conuicia potius quam eis dignum aliquid scriptitasse, ubicumque illos inter se pugnasse poetae commemorarunt, ipsi ad decipiendos homines poetarum carmina firmauerunt, pugnas uidelicet suas non solum per scaenicos in theatro, uerum etiam per se ipsos in campo humanis oculis exhibentes.

Haec dicere conpulsi sumus, quoniam pessimis moribus ciuium Romanam rem publicam iam antea perditam fuisse nullamque remansisse ante aduentum Christi Iesu domini nostri auctores eorum dicere et scribere minime dubitarunt. Quam perditionem dis suis non inputant, qui mala transitoria, quibus boni, seu uiuant seu moriantur, perire non possunt, Christo nostro inputant: cum Christus noster tanta frequentet pro moribus optimis praecepta contra perditos mores; di uero ipsorum nullis talibus praeceptis egerint aliquid cum suo cultore populo pro illa re publica, ne periret; immo eosdem mores uelut suis exemplis auctoritate noxia corrumpendo egerunt potius, ut periret.

ENGLISH

ing civil wars, he killed himself on the spot and joined himself to his brother's body. So, to keep people from being sickened by so great an evil, and instead to make the passion for wicked arms grow more and more, the harmful demons chose to appear to men fighting among themselves. These were the demons whom those people took for gods and thought should be worshiped and revered. Their aim was that civic affection would not shrink from imitating such battles, but that human crime would instead be excused by divine example.

With this same cunning the evil spirits also ordered that the theatrical shows, about which I have already said a great deal, be dedicated and consecrated to them. In these shows the gods' great outrages were celebrated in theatrical songs and in the staging of stories. As a result, anyone who believed the gods had done such things, and anyone who did not believe it but still saw how gladly they had such things performed for them, could imitate them without a qualm. Someone might have thought that the poets had written insults against the gods rather than anything worthy of them. To prevent this, wherever the poets recorded that the gods had fought among themselves, the gods themselves confirmed the poets' verses in order to deceive people. They displayed their battles to human eyes not only through actors in the theater but also in person on the open field.

We have been compelled to say this because their own authors did not hesitate in the least to say and write that the citizens' utterly corrupt morals had already ruined the Roman commonwealth before the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that nothing of it remained. They do not blame this ruin on their gods. Yet they blame on our Christ the passing evils, which cannot destroy good people, whether they live or die. And they do so although our Christ repeatedly gives so many commands in favor of the best morals and against corrupt ones. Their gods, by contrast, issued no such commands to the people who worshiped them and did nothing of the kind to keep that commonwealth from perishing. On the contrary, they corrupted those same morals with the harmful authority of their own example, as it were, and so worked rather to make it perish.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quam non ideo tunc perisse quisquam, ut arbitror, iam dicere audebit, quia discessere omnes adytis arisque relictis di, uelut amici uirtutibus, cum uitiis hominum offenderentur; quia tot signis extorum auguriorum uaticiniorum, quibus se tamquam praescios futurorum adiutoresque proeliorum iactare et commendare gestiebant, conuincuntur fuisse praesentes; qui si uere abscessissent, mitius Romani in bella ciuilia suis cupiditatibus quam illorum instigationibus exarsissent.	No one, I think, will now dare to say that it perished at that time because "all the gods departed, leaving their shrines and altars," as though they were friends of virtue offended by human vices. They are proved to have been present by all those signs from entrails, auguries and prophecies, by which they were so eager to boast of themselves and recommend themselves as knowing the future in advance and as helpers in battle. Had they really gone away, the Romans, driven only by their own desires, would have flared up into civil war less fiercely than they did at the gods' incitement.

THE SECRET ADMONITIONS OF THE DEMONS ABOUT GOOD MORALS, WHILE ALL WICKEDNESS WAS TAUGHT OPENLY IN THEIR RITES

Demons may whisper moral advice in secret, but they teach vice in public.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.26 Quae cum ita sint, cum palam aperteque turpitudines crudelitatibus mixtae, obprobria numinum et crimina, siue prodita siue conficta, ipsis exposcentibus et nisi fieret irascentibus etiam certis et statis sollemnitatibus consecrata illis et dicata claruerint adque ad omnium oculos ut imitanda proponerentur, spectanda processerint: quid est, quod idem ipsi daemones, qui se huiusce modi uoluptatibus inmundos esse spiritus confitentur, qui suis flagitiis et facinoribus, siue indicatis siue simulatis, eorumque sibi celebratione petita ab inpudentibus, extorta a pudentibus auctores se uitae scelestae inmundaeque testantur, perhibentur tamen in adytis suis secretisque penetralibus dare quaedam bona praecepta de moribus quibusdam uelut electis sacratis suis? Quod si ita est, hoc ipso callidior aduertenda est et conuincenda malitia spirituum noxiorum.	Since this is so, consider what has been done openly and plainly. Disgraceful acts mixed with cruelties have been consecrated and dedicated to these deities, along with their own shameful deeds and crimes, whether revealed or invented. This was done at their own demand, and they grew angry if it was not done, even at fixed and appointed festivals. And all this has been put on show before everyone's eyes as models for imitation. Why is it, then, that these same demons are nevertheless said to give certain good moral precepts in their shrines and secret sanctuaries to some chosen initiates of theirs? By delighting in pleasures of this kind they confess themselves to be unclean spirits. By their own outrages and crimes, whether disclosed or feigned, they testify that they are the authors of a wicked and unclean life. And they demand that these be celebrated, a demand pressed on the shameless and extorted from the decent. If they really do give such precepts, the malice of these harmful spirits must be noted and exposed as all the more cunning for this very reason.
Tanta enim uis est probitatis et castitatis, ut omnis uel paene omnis eius laude moueatur humana natura, nec usque adeo sit turpitudine uitiosa, ut totum sensum honestatis amiserit. Proinde malignitas daemonum, nisi alicubi se, quem ad modum scriptum in nostris litteris nouimus, transfiguret in angelos lucis, non inplet negotium deceptionis. Foris itaque populis celeberrimo strepitu inpietas inpura circumsonat, et intus paucis	For such is the power of uprightness and chastity that all of human nature, or nearly all, is moved by praise of it. Nor is human nature ever so corrupted by vice that it has lost all sense of what is honorable. So the malice of demons does not complete its work of deception unless at some point it "transforms itself into angels of light," as we know is written in our Scriptures. Outside, then, unclean castitas simulata uix sonat; praebentur propatula pudendis et secreta laudandis; decus latet et dedecus patet; quod malum geritur omnes conuocat spectatores, quod bonum dicitur uix aliquos inuenit auditores, tamquam honesta erubescenda sint et inhonesta glorianda. Sed ubi hoc nisi in daemonum templis? ubi nisi in fallaciae deuersoriis? Illud enim fit, ut honestiores, qui pauci sunt, capiantur; hoc autem, ne plures, qui sunt turpissimi, corrigantur.

LATIN

ENGLISH

impiety roars around the crowds with the loudest din; inside, a feigned chastity barely whispers to a few. The shameful is offered in the open, the praiseworthy in secret. Honor lies hidden, and dishonor lies open. The evil that is done summons every spectator; the good that is spoken scarcely finds any listeners. It is as if the honorable were something to blush at and the dishonorable something to boast of. But where does this happen except in the temples of demons? Where but in the lodging houses of deceit? The secret teaching is meant to catch the more honorable, who are few. The public display is meant to keep the many, who are utterly base, from being reformed.[38]

Ubi et quando sacrati Caelestis audiebant castitatis praecepta, nescimus; ante ipsum tamen delubrum, ubi simulacrum illud locatum conspiciebamus, uniuersi undique confluentes et ubi quisque poterat stantes ludos qui agebantur intentissimi spectabamus, intuentes alternante conspectu hinc meretriciam pompam, illinc uirginem deam: illam suppliciter adorari, ante illam turpia celebrari; non ibi pudibundos mimos, nullam uerecundiorem scaenicam uidimus; cuncta obscenitatis inplebantur officia. Sciebatur uirginali numini quid placeret, et exhibebatur quod de templo domum matrona doctior reportaret. Nonnullae pudentiores auertebant faciem ab inpuris motibus scaenicorum et artem flagitii furtiua intentione discebant. Hominibus namque uerecundabantur, ne auderent inpudicos gestus ore libero cernere; sed multo minus audebant sacra eius, quam uenerabantur, casto corde damnare.

Where and when the initiates of Caelestis heard precepts of chastity, we do not know. But in front of the shrine itself, where we used to see that image set up, we all flocked in from every side. We stood wherever each of us could find room and watched the shows being performed with the closest attention. We looked by turns at the procession of prostitutes on one side and at the virgin goddess on the other. We saw her worshiped by suppliants, and disgraceful things performed before her. We saw no modest mimes there, no actress with any more decency than the rest; every service of obscenity was carried out in full. Everyone knew what pleased the virgin deity, and the performance was such that a married woman would carry home from the temple a better education in vice. Some of the more modest women turned their faces away from the actors' lewd movements, yet they learned the art of vice by stealthy watching. For they were embarrassed before men and did not dare to look openly at the indecent gestures. But they dared far less to condemn with a chaste heart the rites of the goddess they revered.[39]

Hoc tamen palam discendum praebebatur in templo, ad quod perpetrandum saltem secretum quaerebatur in domo, mirante nimium, si ullus ibi erat, pudore mortalium, quod humana flagitia non libere homines committerent, quae aput deos etiam religiose discerent iratos habituri, nisi etiam exhibere curarent. Quis enim alius spiritus occulto instinctu nequissimas agitans mentes et instat faciendis adulteriis et pascitur factis,

Yet this was offered openly to be learned in the temple, while people at least sought privacy at home in order to commit it. Human modesty, if there was any there, must have been utterly amazed. People did not commit freely the human outrages that they learned as a religious duty in the presence of the gods. And they knew the gods would be angry with them unless they also took

38 2 Corinthians 11:14.

39 Caelestis ("the Heavenly One") was the great goddess of Carthage, where Augustine studied as a young man.

LATIN	ENGLISH
nisi qui etiam sacris talibus oblectatur, constituens in templis simulacra daemonum, amans in ludis simulacra uitiorum, susurrans in occulto uerba iustitiae ad decipiendos etiam paucos bonos, frequentans in aperto inuitamenta nequitiae ad possidendos innumerabiles malos?	care to stage those outrages. For what other spirit stirs the most wicked minds by a hidden prompting, urges on the commission of adultery and feeds on it once committed? Who else can it be but the one who also delights in such rites? He sets up images of demons in the temples and loves images of vices in the shows. He whispers words of justice in secret to deceive even the few who are good, and he multiplies enticements to wickedness in the open to take possession of the countless who are wicked.

WITH WHAT RUIN OF PUBLIC MORALS THE ROMANS DEDICATED OBSCENE SHOWS TO APPEASE THEIR GODS

Cicero himself had to appease Flora with obscene games.

LATIN	ENGLISH
2.27 Vir grauis et philosophaster Tullius aedilis futurus clamat in auribus ciuitatis, inter cetera sui magistratus officia sibi Floram matrem ludorum celebritate placandam; qui ludi tanto deuotius, quanto turpius celebrari solent. Dicit alio loco iam consul in extremis periculis ciuitatis, et ludos per decem dies factos, neque rem ullam quae ad placandos deos pertineret praetermissam; quasi non satius erat tales deos inritare temperantia quam placare luxuria, et eos honestate etiam ad inimicitias prouocare quam tanta deformitate lenire. Neque enim grauius fuerant quamlibet crudelissima inmanitate nocituri homines, propter quos placabantur, quam nocebant ipsi, cum uitiositate foedissima placarentur.	Cicero, a serious man and a philosopher of sorts, was about to become aedile. He proclaims in the hearing of the city that among the other duties of his office he must appease Mother Flora by celebrating games. These are games that are usually celebrated the more devoutly, the more indecently. Elsewhere, when he was already consul and the city was in extreme danger, he says that games had been held for ten days and that nothing which might help to appease the gods had been left undone. As if it would not have been better to provoke such gods by restraint than to appease them by debauchery. It would have been better even to stir them to hostility by decency than to soothe them with such foulness. For the men on whose account the gods were being appeased could not have done more harm, however monstrous their cruelty, than the gods themselves did when they were appeased by the foulest depravity.[40]
Quando quidem ut auerteretur quod metuebatur ab hoste in corporibus, eo modo di conciliabantur, quo uirtus debellaretur in mentibus, qui non obponerentur defensores obpugnatoribus moenium, nisi prius fierent expugnatores morum bonorum. Hanc talium numinum placationem petulantissimam inpurissimam inpudentissimam nequissimam inmundissimam, cuius actores laudanda Romanae uirtutis indoles honore priuauit, tribu mouit, agnouit turpes, fecit infames, hanc, inquam, pudendam ueraeque religioni auersandam et detestandam talium numinum placationem, fabulas in	Indeed, to avert the bodily harm feared from the enemy, the gods were won over in a way that vanquished virtue in people's minds. These gods would not stand as defenders against those attacking the walls unless they first became the attackers of good morals. Consider this appeasement of such deities, utterly wanton, impure, shameless, wicked and unclean. The admirable character of Roman virtue deprived its performers of their civic honor, removed them from their tribe, 40 Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.36 (70 BC), and Against Catiline 3.20, from his consulship in 63 BC. Flora's games, the Floralia, were notorious for their indecency.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	deos inlecebrosas adque criminosas, haec ignominiosa deorum uel scelerate turpiterque facta uel sceleratius turpiusque conficta oculis et auribus publicis ciuitas tota discebat, haec commissa numinibus placere cernebat, et ideo non solum illis exhibenda, sed sibi quoque imitanda credebat, non illud nescio quid uelut bonum et honestum, quod tam paucis et tam occulte dicebatur (si tamen dicebatur), ut magis ne innotesceret, quam ne non fieret, timeretur.	branded them as base and declared them infamous. Consider, I say, this appeasement of such deities, shameful, and to be shunned and detested by true religion. Consider these seductive and criminal stories about the gods, and these disgraceful acts of the gods, whether wickedly and shamefully done or more wickedly and shamefully invented. All this the whole city learned with its public eyes and ears. It saw that these things, once performed, pleased the deities. It therefore believed that they should not only be displayed for the gods but also imitated by the city itself. It did not learn that supposedly good and honorable something which was spoken to so few and so secretly (if indeed it was spoken at all) that the real fear seemed to be that it might become known, rather than that it might not be practiced.[41]

THE SAVING POWER OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION

The Church gathers people to hear how to live well, not to watch obscenity.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.28	Ab istarum inmundissimarum potestatum tartareo iugo et societate poenali erui per Christi nomen homines et in lucem saluberrimae pietatis ab illa perniciosissimae inpietatis nocte transferri queruntur et murmurant iniqui et ingrati et illo nefario spiritu altius obstrictiusque possessi, quia populi confluunt ad ecclesiam casta celebritate, honesta utriusque sexus discretione, ubi audiant quam bene hic ad tempus uiuere debeant, ut post hanc uitam beate semperque uiuere mereantur, ubi sancta scriptura iustitiaeque doctrina de superiore loco in conspectu omnium personante et qui faciunt audiant ad praemium, et qui non faciunt audiant ad iudicium. Quo etsi ueniunt quidam talium praeceptorum inrisores, omnis eorum petulantia aut repentina mutatione deponitur, aut timore uel pudore conprimitur.	Through the name of Christ, human beings are rescued from the hellish yoke of these most unclean powers and from sharing in their punishment. They are brought out of that night of most destructive impiety into the light of most saving piety. Yet the unjust and ungrateful, possessed more deeply and more tightly by that wicked spirit, complain and grumble about it. They grumble because the peoples flock to church in a chaste gathering, with men and women decently separated. There they may hear how well they ought to live here for a time, so as to deserve to live happily and forever after this life. There holy Scripture and the teaching of justice ring out from a raised place in the sight of all. Those who practice it hear it to their reward, and those who do not hear it to their judgment. Some who mock such precepts do come there. But all their insolence is either laid aside through a sudden change of heart or held in check by fear or shame.
	Nihil enim eis turpe ac flagitiosum spectandum imitandumque proponitur, ubi ueri Dei aut praecepta insinuantur aut miracula narrantur, aut dona laudantur aut beneficia postulantur.	For nothing shameful or disgraceful is set before them to watch and imitate in that place. There the commands of the true God are taught, or his miracles told, or his gifts praised, or his benefits asked for.

41 At Rome actors were legally disgraced: the censors could bar them from office and strike them from their voting tribe.

AN EXHORTATION TO THE ROMANS TO ABANDON THE WORSHIP OF THE GODS

Augustine urges the Romans to leave false gods and seek the heavenly homeland.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
2.29	Haec potius concupisce o indoles Romana laudabilis o progenies Regulorum Scaeuolarum Scipionum Fabriciorum; haec potius concupisce, haec ab illa turpissima uanitate et fallacissima daemonum malignitate discerne. Si quid in te laudabile naturaliter eminet, non nisi uera pietate purgatur adque perficitur, inpietate autem disperditur et punitur. Nunc iam elige quid sequaris, ut non in te, sed in Deo uero sine ullo errore lauderis. Tunc enim tibi gloria popularis adfuit, sed occulto diuinae prouidentiae iudicio uera religio quam eligeres defuit. Expergiscere, dies est, sicut experrecta es in quibusdam, de quorum uirtute perfecta et pro fide uera etiam passionibus gloriamur, qui usquequaque aduersus potestates inimicissimas confligentes easque fortiter moriendo uincentes sanguine nobis hanc patriam peperere suo.	Long for these things instead, O admirable Roman spirit, O descendants of men like Regulus, Scaevola, Scipio and Fabricius! Long for these instead, and distinguish them from that utterly base vanity and the utterly deceitful malice of demons. If anything praiseworthy stands out in you by nature, only true piety purifies and perfects it, while impiety ruins and punishes it. Choose now what you will follow, so that you may be praised without any error, not in yourself but in the true God. For in those days you had the people's glory, but by a hidden judgment of divine providence you lacked the true religion to choose. Wake up, it is day! You have already woken up in some of your own people. We glory in their perfect virtue and even in their sufferings for the true faith. They struggled everywhere against the most hostile powers and conquered them by dying bravely, and "with their blood they won this homeland for us."[42]
	Ad quam patriam te inuitamus et exhortamur, ut eius adiciaris numero ciuium, cuius quodam modo asylum est uera remissio peccatorum. Non audias degeneres tuos Christo Christianisue detrahentes et accusantes uelut tempora mala, cum quaerant tempora, quibus non sit quieta uita, sed potius secura nequitia. Haec tibi numquam nec pro terrena patria placuerunt. Nunc iam caelestem arripe, pro qua minimum laborabis, et in ea ueraciter semperque regnabis. Illic enim tibi non Vestalis focus, non lapis Capitolinus, sed Deus unus et uerus nec metas rerum nec tempora ponit, / Imperium sine fine dabit.	To that homeland we invite and urge you, so that you may be added to the number of its citizens. Its asylum, in a sense, is the true forgiveness of sins. Do not listen to your degenerate offspring who disparage Christ or Christians and accuse them of bringing bad times. What they seek are times in which life is not peaceful but wickedness is safe. Such times never pleased you, not even for the sake of your earthly homeland. Seize the heavenly one now. For it you will labor very little, and in it you will reign truly and forever. For there neither the hearth of Vesta nor the stone of the Capitol awaits you, but the one true God, who "sets no limits to things nor time, and will grant an empire without end."[43]
	Noli deos falsos fallacesque requirere; abice potius adque contemne in ueram emicans libertatem. Non sunt di, maligni sunt spiritus, quibus aeterna tua felicitas poena est. Non tam Iuno Troianis, a quibus carnalem originem ducis, arces uidetur inuidisse Romanas, quam isti	Do not seek after false and deceitful gods. Rather, cast them off and despise them as you spring forth into true freedom. They are not gods. They are evil spirits, and your eternal happiness is a torment to them. Juno seems to have begrudged the Trojans, 42 Heroes of the early Republic, famed for keeping faith, enduring pain and refusing bribes; the Scipios defeated Carthage. The closing words echo Virgil, Aeneid 11.24–25.

43 The "asylum" recalls the refuge Romulus opened to populate early Rome. The closing words adapt Jupiter's promise to Rome in Virgil, Aeneid 1.278–279.

LATIN

daemones, quos adhuc deos putas, omni generi hominum sedes inuident sempiternas. Et tu ipsa non parua ex parte de talibus spiritibus iudicasti, quando ludis eos placasti et per quos homines eosdem ludos fecisti, infames esse uoluisti. Patere adseri libertatem tuam aduersus inmundos spiritus, qui tuis ceruicibus inposuerant sacrandam sibi et celebrandam ignominiam suam. Actores criminum diuinorum remouisti ab honoribus tuis: supplica Deo uero, ut a te remoueat illos deos, qui delectantur criminibus suis, seu ueris, quod ignominiosissimum est, seu falsis, quod malitiosissimum.

Bene, quod tua sponte histrionibus et scaenicis societatem ciuitatis patere noluisti; euigila plenius! Nullo modo his artibus placatur diuina maiestas, quibus humana dignitas inquinatur. Quo igitur pacto deos, qui talibus delectantur obsequiis, haberi putas in numero sanctarum caelestium potestatum, cum homines, per quos eadem aguntur obsequia, non putasti habendos in numero qualiumcumque ciuium Romanorum? Incomparabiliter superna est ciuitas clarior, ubi uictoria ueritas, ubi dignitas sanctitas, ubi pax felicitas, ubi uita aeternitas. Multo minus habet in sua societate tales deos, si tu in tua tales homines habere erubuisti. Proinde si ad beatam peruenire desideras ciuitatem, deuita daemonum societatem. Indigne ab honestis coluntur, qui per turpes placantur. Sic isti a tua pietate remoueantur purgatione Christiana, quo modo illi a tua dignitate remoti sunt notatione censoria.

De bonis autem carnalibus, quibus solis mali perfrui uolunt, et de malis carnalibus, quae sola perpeti nolunt, quod neque in his habeant quam putantur habere isti daemones potestatem (quamquam si haberent, deberemus potius etiam ista contemnere, quam propter ista illos colere et eos colendo ad illa, quae nobis inuident, peruenire non posse), — tamen nec in istis eos hoc ualere, quod hi putant, qui propter haec eos coli oportere contendunt, deinceps uidebimus, ut hic sit huius uoluminis modus.

ENGLISH

from whom you trace your physical descent, the citadels of Rome. Yet she begrudged them less than these demons, whom you still think are gods, begrudge the whole human race its everlasting dwelling places. And you yourself have passed judgment on such spirits to no small extent. You appeased them with shows, and yet you chose to brand as infamous the men through whom you staged those shows. Allow your freedom to be claimed back from the unclean spirits who had laid on your neck the burden of consecrating and celebrating their own disgrace. You have removed the performers of divine crimes from your offices of honor. Now pray to the true God to remove from you those gods who delight in their crimes, whether those crimes are real, which is most disgraceful, or false, which is most malicious.[44]

It is good that you refused of your own accord to open citizenship to actors and stage performers. Now wake up more fully! In no way is the divine majesty appeased by arts that defile human dignity. How, then, can you think that gods who delight in such services are to be counted among the holy heavenly powers? You did not think that the men who perform those same services should be counted among Roman citizens of any sort at all. Incomparably more glorious is the city on high. There victory is truth, dignity is holiness, peace is happiness, and life is eternity. If you were ashamed to admit such men into your community, far less does that city admit such gods into its own. So if you desire to reach the blessed city, shun the company of demons. Gods who are appeased through the base are worshiped unworthily by the honorable. So let Christian cleansing remove these gods from your piety, just as the censors' mark removed those men from your dignity.

There remain bodily goods, which are the only goods the wicked want to enjoy, and bodily evils, which are the only evils they refuse to endure. These demons do not have the power over such things that they are thought to have. And even if they did have it, we ought rather to despise these things as well than worship the demons for their sake, and by worshiping them be unable to reach the goods they begrudge us. Even in these matters, I say, the demons do not have the power claimed 44 Juno's hatred of the Trojans, and her efforts to keep them from founding Rome, drive the plot of Virgil's Aeneid.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	by those who argue that they should be worshiped for these things. This we shall see next, so that this book may end here.

Book III

Rome's disasters before Christ
Wars, civil strife and calamities struck Rome long before Christianity, while the gods were worshiped.

THE ADVERSITIES THAT ALONE THE WICKED FEAR, AND THAT THE WORLD ALWAYS SUFFERED WHILE IT WORSHIPED THE GODS

The gods did not shield their worshipers even from famine, war and captivity.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.1	Iam satis dictum arbitror de morum malis et animorum, quae praecipue cauenda sunt, nihil deos falsos populo cultori suo, quo minus eorum malorum aggere premeretur, subuenire curasse, sed potius, ut maxime premeretur, egisse. Nunc de illis malis uideo dicendum, quae sola isti perpeti nolunt, qualia sunt fames morbus, bellum exspoliatio, captiuitas trucidatio, et si qua similia iam in primo libro commemorauimus. Haec enim sola mali deputant mala, quae non faciunt malos; nec erubescunt inter bona, quae laudant, ipsi mali esse qui laudant, magisque stomachantur, si uillam malam habeant, quam si uitam, quasi hoc sit hominis maximum bonum, habere bona omnia praeter se ipsum. Sed neque talia mala, quae isti sola formidant, di eorum, quando ab eis libere colebantur, ne illis acciderent obstiterunt.	I think enough has now been said about the evils of character and of soul, which are the ones above all to be guarded against. The false gods took no care to help the people who worshiped them avoid being crushed under the heap of those evils; rather, they worked to see that they were crushed as heavily as possible. Now I see that I must speak of the evils that are the only ones these people refuse to endure: famine and disease, war and plunder, captivity and slaughter, and anything similar that we already mentioned in the first book. For the wicked count as evils only those things that do not make people wicked. Nor are they ashamed that, surrounded by the goods they praise, they who praise them are themselves bad. They are more upset if they have a bad villa than if they have a bad life—as if the greatest good for a human being were to have everything good except himself. Yet not even evils of this kind, the only ones these people dread, did their gods prevent from befalling them back when they worshiped those gods freely.
	Cum enim uariis per diuersa temporibus ante aduentum Redemtoris nostri innumerabilibus nonnullisque etiam incredibilibus cladibus genus contereretur humanum, quos alios quam istos deos mundus colebat, excepto uno populo Hebraeo et quibusdam extra ipsum populum, ubicumque gratia diuina digni occultissimo adque iustissimo Dei iudicio fuerunt? Verum ne nimis longum faciam, tacebo aliarum usquequaque gentium mala grauissima: quod ad Romam pertinet Romanumque imperium tantum loquar, id est ad ipsam proprie ciuitatem et quaecumque illi terrarum uel societate coniunctae uel condicione subiectae sunt, quae sint perpessae ante aduentum Christi, cum iam ad eius quasi corpus rei publicae pertinerent.	For at various times and in various places before the coming of our Redeemer, the human race was being ground down by countless disasters, some of them even beyond belief. What gods did the world worship then, other than these? The only exceptions were the one Hebrew people and certain individuals outside that people, wherever they were found worthy of divine grace by the most hidden and most just judgment of God. But so as not to go on too long, I will pass over the grievous evils of other nations everywhere. I will speak only of what concerns Rome and the Roman Empire—that is, the City itself in the proper sense, and whatever lands were joined to it by alliance or made subject to it by treaty—and of what they suffered before the coming of Christ, when they already belonged, so to speak, to the body of its commonwealth.

LATIN	ENGLISH

WHETHER THE GODS, WORSHIPED ALIKE BY ROMANS AND GREEKS, HAD REASONS FOR ALLOWING TROY TO BE DESTROYED

If the gods punished Troy for Laomedon's perjury, they were poor prophets and builders.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.2 Primum ipsa Troia uel Ilium, unde origo est populi Romani, (neque enim praetereundum aut dissimulandum est, quod et in primo libro adtigi) eosdem habens deos et colens quur a Graecis uictum, captum adque deletum est? Priamo, inquiunt, sunt reddita Laomedontea paterna periuria. Ergo uerum est, quod Apollo adque Neptunus eidem Laomedonti mercennariis operibus seruierunt? Illis quippe promisisse mercedem falsumque iurasse perhibetur. Miror Apollinem nominatum diuinatorem in tanto opificio laborasse nescientem quod Laomedon fuerat promissa negaturus. Quamquam nec ipsum Neptunum, patruum eius, fratrem Iouis, regem maris, decuit ignarum esse futurorum.	First, Troy itself, or Ilium, from which the Roman people take their origin (for I must not pass over or gloss over what I also touched on in the first book): it had the same gods and worshiped them—so why was it conquered, captured and destroyed by the Greeks? "Priam," they say, "paid for the perjuries of his father Laomedon." Is it true, then, that Apollo and Neptune served this same Laomedon as hired laborers? For he is said to have promised them wages and then sworn falsely. I am surprised that Apollo, famous as a prophet, toiled at so great a construction without knowing that Laomedon was going to deny what he had promised. Then again, it was hardly fitting for Neptune himself—Apollo's uncle, Jupiter's brother, king of the sea—to be ignorant of the future.[1]
Nam hunc Homerus de stirpe Aeneae, a cuius posteris Roma est, cum ante illam urbem conditam idem poeta fuisse dicatur, inducit magnum aliquid diuinantem, quem etiam nube rapuit, ut dicit, ne ab Achille occideretur, cuperet cum uertere ab imo, quod aput Vergilium confitetur, Structa suis manibus periurae moenia Troiae. Nescientes igitur tanti di, Neptunus et Apollo, Laomedontem sibi negaturum esse mercedem, structores moenium Troianorum gratis et ingratis fuerunt. Videant ne grauius sit tales deos credere quam dis talibus peierare. Hoc enim nec ipse Homerus facile credidit, qui Neptunum quidem contra Troianos, Apollinem autem pro Troianis pugnantem facit, cum illo periurio ambos fabula narret offensos.	For Homer, who is said to have lived before that city was founded, brings Neptune on stage prophesying something great about the line of Aeneas, from whose descendants Rome came. Neptune even snatched Aeneas away in a cloud, as he himself says, so that he would not be killed by Achilles—although, as he admits in Virgil, he longed "to overturn from their foundations the walls of perjured Troy, built by his own hands." So these great gods, Neptune and Apollo, not knowing that Laomedon would deny them their wages, built the walls of Troy unpaid and unthanked. Let these people consider whether it is not a graver thing to believe in such gods than to break an oath sworn to them. For not even Homer himself found this easy to believe: he has Neptune fighting against the Trojans but Apollo fighting for them, although the story says that both were offended by that perjury.[2]

1 Laomedon, king of Troy and father of Priam, was said to have cheated Apollo and Neptune of the wages promised for building Troy's walls.

2 Homer, Iliad 20, where Poseidon (Neptune) rescues Aeneas and foretells that his line will rule; Virgil, Aeneid 5.810–811.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Si igitur fabulis credunt, erubescant talia colere numina; si fabulis non credunt, non obtendant Troiana periuria, aut mirentur deos periuria punisse Troiana, amasse Romana. Unde enim coniuratio Catilinae in tanta tamque corrupta ciuitate habuit etiam eorum grandem copiam, quos manus adque lingua periurio aut sanguine ciuili alebat? Quid enim aliud totiens senatores corrupti in iudiciis, totiens populus in suffragiis uel in quibusque causis, quae aput eum contionibus agebantur, nisi etiam peierando peccabant? Namque corruptissimis moribus ad hoc mos iurandi seruabatur antiquus, non ut ab sceleribus metu religionis prohiberentur, sed ut periuria quoque sceleribus ceteris adderentur.	If, then, they believe the myths, let them blush to worship such divinities; if they do not believe the myths, let them not put forward Trojan perjuries as an excuse—or else let them marvel that the gods punished Trojan perjuries but loved Roman ones. For how else did Catiline's conspiracy, in so great and so corrupt a city, find such an abundant supply of men whose hands and tongues kept them fed by perjury or by the blood of fellow citizens? For what else were the senators doing, so often bribed in the courts, and the people, so often bribed in elections or in whatever cases were handled before them in public assemblies, but sinning by perjury as well? Amid utterly corrupt morals the ancient custom of swearing oaths was kept up, not so that people would be held back from crimes by religious fear, but so that perjuries too might be added to their other crimes.

THAT THE GODS COULD NOT HAVE BEEN OFFENDED BY THE ADULTERY OF PARIS, SINCE IT IS SAID TO HAVE BEEN COMMON AMONG THEMSELVES

Gods who committed adultery themselves cannot have punished Troy for Paris's adultery.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.3 Nulla itaque causa est, quare di, quibus, ut dicunt, steterat illud imperium, cum a Graecis praeualentibus probentur uicti, Troianis peierantibus fingantur irati. Nec adulterio Paridis, ut rursus a quibusdam defenduntur, ut Troiam desererent, suscensuerunt. Auctores enim doctoresque peccatorum esse adsolent, non ultores. Urbem Romam, inquit Sallustius, sicuti ego accepi, condidere adque habuere initio Troiani, qui Aenea duce profugi sedibus incertis uagabantur. Si ergo adulterium Paridis uindicandum numina censuerunt, aut magis in Romanis aut certe etiam in Romanis puniendum fuit, quia Aeneae mater hoc fecit. Sed quo modo in illo illud flagitium oderant, qui in sua socia Venere non oderant (ut alia omittam) quod cum Anchise commiserat, ex quo Aenean pepererat? An quia illud factum est indignante Menelao, illud autem concedente Vulcano?	There is no reason, then, to imagine that the gods by whom, as they say, that empire had stood were angry with the perjured Trojans, when it is proven that they were simply beaten by the stronger Greeks. Nor was it out of anger at Paris's adultery—another defense some offer for them—that they deserted Troy. For they are usually the authors and teachers of sins, not their avengers. "The city of Rome," says Sallust, "as I have learned, was founded and at first inhabited by Trojans who, exiles under Aeneas's leadership, were wandering without a settled home." If, then, the divinities judged that Paris's adultery had to be avenged, it should have been punished more among the Romans, or at least among the Romans too, since Aeneas's mother did that very thing. But how could they hate that outrage in Paris when they did not hate in their colleague Venus (to say nothing of other cases) what she had committed with Anchises, by whom she bore Aeneas? Is it because the one was done to Menelaus's indignation, the other with Vulcan's consent?[3]
Di enim, credo, non zelant coniuges suas usque adeo, ut eas etiam cum hominibus dignentur habere communes.	For the gods, I suppose, are so far from jealous of their wives that they even condescend to share

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Inridere fabulas fortassis existimor nec grauiter agere tanti ponderis causam. Non ergo credamus, si placet, Aenean esse Veneris filium: ecce concedo, si nec Romulum Martis. Si autem illud, quur non et illud? An deos hominibus feminis, mares autem homines deabus misceri nefas? Dura uel potius non credenda condicio, quod ex iure Veneris in concubitu Marti licuit, hoc in iure suo ipsi Veneri non licere. At utrumque firmatum est auctoritate Romana. Neque enim minus credidit recentior Caesar auiam Venerem quam patrem antiquior Romulus Martem.	them with human beings. Perhaps I will be thought to be mocking the myths and not treating so weighty a matter seriously. Very well, then: let us not believe, if you like, that Aeneas is the son of Venus. There—I grant it, provided that Romulus is not the son of Mars either. But if the one, why not the other? Or is it right for gods to mingle with human women, but wrong for human men to mingle with goddesses? A harsh condition, or rather an incredible one: that what Venus's rights in love-making allowed to Mars should not be allowed to Venus herself under her own rights. Yet both stories have been confirmed by Roman authority. For the more recent Caesar believed in his ancestress Venus no less than the more ancient Romulus believed in his father Mars.[4]

VARRO'S OPINION THAT IT IS USEFUL FOR PEOPLE TO PRETEND THEY ARE DESCENDED FROM GODS

Varro says belief in divine descent is useful even if false.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.4	Dixerit aliquis: Itane tu ista credis? Ego uero ista non credo. Nam et uir doctissimus eorum Varro falsa haec esse, quamuis non audacter neque fidenter, paene tamen fatetur. Sed utile ciuitatibus esse dicit, ut se uiri fortes, etiamsi falsum sit, dis genitos esse credant, ut eo modo animus humanus uelut diuinae stirpis fiduciam gerens res magnas adgrediendas praesumat audacius, agat uehementius et ob hoc inpleat ipsa securitate felicius. Quae Varronis sententia expressa, ut potui, meis uerbis cernis quam latum locum aperiat falsitati, ubi intellegamus plura iam sacra et quasi religiosa potuisse confingi, ubi putata sunt ciuibus etiam de ipsis dis prodesse mendacia.	Someone may say: "Do you really believe these things?" No, I certainly do not believe them. For even Varro, their most learned man, all but admits that they are false, though not boldly or confidently. But he says it is useful for cities that brave men should believe themselves born of gods, even if it is false. In that way the human mind, bearing the confidence of divine descent, will undertake great enterprises more boldly, carry them out more vigorously, and so, through that very assurance, accomplish them more successfully. You see how wide a field this opinion of Varro's, which I have expressed in my own words as best I could, opens up for falsehood. From it we can understand that many rites and quasi-religious practices could have been fabricated wherever lies, even about the gods themselves, were thought to benefit the citizens.[5]

3 Sallust, The War with Catiline 6.1.
4 Julius Caesar's family, the Julii, claimed descent from Venus through Aeneas's son Iulus.
5 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), the most learned Roman scholar, whose lost Antiquities Augustine draws on throughout.

THAT THERE IS NO PROOF THE GODS PUNISHED THE ADULTERY OF PARIS, SINCE THEY DID NOT AVENGE IT IN THE CASE OF ROMULUS' MOTHER

If the gods hated adultery, they should have punished Rome for Romulus's mother.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.5	Sed utrum potuerit Venus ex concubitu Anchisae Aenean parere uel Mars ex concubitu filiae Numitoris Romulum gignere, in medio relinquamus. Nam paene talis quaestio etiam de scripturis nostris oboritur, qua quaeritur, utrum praeuaricatores angeli cum filiabus hominum concubuerint, unde natis gigantibus, hoc est nimium grandibus ac fortibus uiris, tunc terra conpleta est. Proinde ad utrumque interim modo nostra disputatio referatur. Si enim uera sunt, quae aput illos de matre Aeneae et de patre Romuli lectitantur, quo modo possunt dis adulteria displicere hominum, quae in se ipsis concorditer ferunt? Si autem falsa sunt, ne sic quidem possunt irasci ueris adulteriis humanis, qui etiam falsis delectantur suis.	But whether Venus could have borne Aeneas from intercourse with Anchises, or Mars fathered Romulus from intercourse with Numitor's daughter, let us leave undecided. For an almost identical question arises from our own Scriptures too, where it is asked whether the rebel angels slept with the daughters of men, from whom giants—that is, exceedingly large and strong men—were born, and with whom the earth was then filled. So for the time being let our argument apply to either alternative. For if what they read about Aeneas's mother and Romulus's father is true, how can human adulteries displease the gods, when they tolerate adulteries so amicably among themselves? But if it is false, even so they cannot be angry at real human adulteries, since they take delight even in false adulteries of their own.[6]
	Huc accedit, quoniam, si illud de Marte non creditur, ut hoc quoque de Venere non credatur, nullo diuini concubitus obtentu matris Romuli causa defenditur. Fuit autem sacerdos illa Vestalis, et ideo di magis in Romanos sacrilegum illud flagitium quam in Troianos Paridis adulterium uindicare debuerunt. Nam et ipsi Romani antiqui in stupro detectas Vestae sacerdotes uiuas etiam defodiebant, adulteras autem feminas, quamuis aliqua damnatione, nulla tamen morte plectebant: usque adeo grauius quae putabant adyta diuina quam humana cubilia uindicabant.	Add to this that if the story about Mars is not believed, so that the story about Venus need not be believed either, then the case of Romulus's mother cannot be defended by any pretext of intercourse with a god. Moreover, she was a priestess of Vesta, and so the gods ought to have avenged that sacrilegious outrage on the Romans rather than Paris's adultery on the Trojans. For the ancient Romans themselves used to bury alive priestesses of Vesta caught in sexual misconduct, whereas adulterous women, though they punished them with some penalty, they never punished with death. So much more severely did they avenge what they took to be divine sanctuaries than they avenged human marriage beds.

THE FRATRICIDE OF ROMULUS, WHICH THE GODS DID NOT AVENGE

The gods punished Paris's adultery but ignored Romulus's murder of his brother.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.6	Aliud adicio, quia, si peccata hominum illis numinibus displicerent, ut offensi Paridis facto desertam Troiam ferro ignibusque donarent, magis eos contra Romanos moueret Romuli frater occisus quam contra Troianos Graecus maritus inlusus; magis inritaret parricidium	I add another point. If the sins of human beings displeased those divinities, so that, offended by Paris's deed, they deserted Troy and handed it over to sword and fire, then the murder of Romulus's brother should have stirred them more

6 Numitor's daughter, the Vestal Rhea Silvia, was the mother of Romulus and Remus. The biblical question concerns Genesis 6:1–4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
nascentis quam regnantis adulterium ciuitatis. Nec ad causam, quam nunc agimus, interest, utrum hoc fieri Romulus iusserit aut Romulus fecerit, quod multi inpudentia negant, multi pudore dubitant, multi dolore dissimulant. Nec nos itaque in ea re diligentius requirenda per multorum scriptorum perpensa testimonia demoremur: Romuli fratrem palam constat occisum, non ab hostibus, non ab alienis. Si aut perpetrauit aut imperauit hoc Romulus, magis ipse fuit Romanorum quam Paris Troianorum caput; quur igitur Troianis iram deorum prouocauit ille alienae coniugis raptor, et eorundem deorum tutelam Romanis inuitauit iste sui fratris extinctor?	against the Romans than the deceiving of a Greek husband stirred them against the Trojans. Fratricide in a city being born should have provoked them more than adultery in a city already reigning. Nor does it matter for the case we are now arguing whether Romulus ordered this to be done or did it himself—something many deny out of shamelessness, many doubt out of shame, many gloss over out of grief. So let us not linger over a more careful investigation of the matter by weighing the testimony of many writers. It is plainly established that Romulus's brother was killed, and not by enemies or by strangers. If Romulus either committed this crime or commanded it, he was more truly the head of the Romans than Paris was of the Trojans. Why, then, did that abductor of another man's wife provoke the anger of the gods against the Trojans, while this killer of his own brother invited the protection of those same gods for the Romans?[7]
Si autem illud scelus a facto imperioque Romuli alienum est: quoniam debuit utique uindicari, tota hoc illa ciuitas fecit, quod tota contemsit, et non iam fratrem, sed patrem, quod est peius, occidit. Uterque enim fuit conditor, ubi alter scelere ablatus non permissus est esse regnator. Non est, ut arbitror, quod dicatur quid mali Troia meruerit, ut eam di desererent, quo posset extingui, et quid boni Roma, ut eam di inhabitarent, quo posset augeri; nisi quod uicti inde fugerunt et se ad istos, quos pariter deciperent, contulerunt; immo uero et illic manserunt ad eos more suo decipiendos, qui rursus easdem terras habitarent, et hic easdem artes fallaciae suae magis etiam exercendo maioribus honoribus gloriati sunt.	But if that crime had nothing to do with Romulus's act or command, then, since it certainly ought to have been avenged, the whole city committed it, because the whole city disregarded it; and it killed not just a brother but—what is worse—a father. For both were founders, though one was removed by crime and not allowed to become ruler. There is nothing, I think, that can be said about what evil Troy deserved, that the gods should desert it so that it could be destroyed, or what good Rome deserved, that the gods should take up residence in it so that it could grow—unless it is that, once defeated, they fled from Troy and betook themselves to the Romans, to deceive them in the same way. Or rather, they both stayed there, to deceive in their usual fashion those who would later inhabit those same lands, and here, by practicing those same arts of deceit even more, they gloried in greater honors.

THE OVERTHROW OF TROY, WHICH FIMBRIA, MARIUS' GENERAL, DESTROYED

Fimbria, a Roman, destroyed Ilium for staying loyal to Sulla, and the gods did nothing.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.7 Certe enim ciuilibus iam bellis scatentibus quid miserum commiserat Ilium, ut a Fimbria, Marianarum partium homine pessimo, euerteretur, multo ferocius adque	Surely, when civil wars were already breaking out on every side, what wretched offense had Ilium committed that it should be destroyed by Fimbria,

7 Romulus's twin brother Remus was killed at the founding of Rome.

LATIN

crudelius quam olim a Graecis? Nam tunc et multi inde fugerunt et multi captiuati saltem in seruitute uixerunt; porro autem Fimbria prius edictum proposuit, ne cui parceretur, adque urbem totam cunctosque in ea homines incendio concremauit. Hoc meruit Ilium non a Graecis quos sua inritauerat iniquitate, sed a Romanis quos sua calamitate propagauerat, dis illis communibus ad haec repellenda nihil iuuantibus seu, quod uerum est, nihil ualentibus. Numquid et tunc Abscessere omnes adytis arisque relictis / Di, quibus illud oppidum steterat post antiquos Graecorum ignes ruinasque reparatum? Si autem abscesserant, causam requiro, et oppidanorum quidem quanto inuenio meliorem, tanto deteriorem deorum.

ENGLISH

a man of the worst sort from the party of Marius, far more savagely and cruelly than it had once been destroyed by the Greeks? For back then many escaped from it, and many who were captured at least lived on in slavery. Fimbria, however, first issued an edict that no one was to be spared, and then burned the whole city and everyone in it. This is what Ilium earned—not from the Greeks, whom it had provoked by its own wrongdoing, but from the Romans, whom it had propagated through its own disaster—while those gods the two shared did nothing to help ward this off, or, which is the truth, had no power to do so. Did then, too, "all the gods depart, leaving their shrines and altars"—the gods by whom that town had stood after it was rebuilt from the ancient fires and ruins left by the Greeks? But if they had departed, I ask the reason. And the better I find the townspeople's cause, the worse I find the gods'.[8]

Illi enim contra Fimbriam portas clauserant, ut Syllae seruarent integram ciuitatem; hinc eos iratus incendit uel potius penitus extinxit. Adhuc autem meliorum partium ciuilium Sylla dux fuit, adhuc armis rem publicam recuperare moliebatur; horum bonorum initiorum nondum malos euentus habuit. Quid ergo melius ciues urbis illius facere potuerunt, quid honestius, quid fidelius, quid Romana parentela dignius quam meliori causae Romanorum ciuitatem seruare et contra parricidam Romanae rei publicae portas claudere? At hoc eis in quantum exitium uerterit, adtendant defensores deorum.

For they had shut their gates against Fimbria in order to keep their city intact for Sulla; that is why he burned them in his anger, or rather wiped them out completely. At that time Sulla was still the leader of the better side in the civil conflict; he was still striving to recover the commonwealth by arms; these good beginnings had not yet produced their evil outcomes. What better, then, could the citizens of that city have done—what more honorable, what more loyal, what more worthy of their kinship with Rome—than to preserve their city for the better cause of the Romans and shut their gates against a parricide of the Roman commonwealth? But let the defenders of the gods take note how utterly this led to their ruin.

Deseruerint di adulteros Iliumque flammis Graecorum reliquerint, ut ex eius cineribus Roma castior nasceretur: quur et postea deseruerunt eandem ciuitatem Romanis cognatam, non rebellantem aduersus Romam nobilem filiam, sed iustioribus eius partibus fidem constantissimam piissimamque seruantem, eamque delendam reliquerunt non Graecorum uiris fortibus, sed uiro spurcissimo Romanorum? Aut si displicebat dis causa partium Syllanarum, cui seruantes urbem miseri portas clauserant: quur eidem Syllae tanta bona promittebant et praenuntiabant? An et hic agnoscuntur adulatores felicium potius quam infelicium defensores? Non ergo Ilium etiam tunc, ab eis cum desereretur,

Suppose the gods did desert the adulterers and abandon Ilium to the flames of the Greeks so that a more chaste Rome might be born from its ashes. Why, then, did they later also desert that same city, kin to the Romans? It was not rebelling against Rome, its noble daughter; it was keeping the most steadfast and dutiful faith with Rome's more righteous party. And yet they abandoned it to be destroyed—not by brave Greek warriors, but by the foulest of the Romans. Or if the cause of Sulla's party displeased the gods—the cause for which the wretched townspeople had shut their gates to preserve their city—why were they prom-

8 Gaius Flavius Fimbria, a commander of Marius's party, sacked Ilium in 85 BC. The quotation is Virgil, Aeneid 2.351–352.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	euersum est. Nam daemones ad decipiendum semper uigilantissimi, quod potuerunt, fecerunt.	ising and foretelling such great good fortune to that same Sulla? Are they not recognized here too as flatterers of the fortunate rather than defenders of the unfortunate? So even then Ilium was not destroyed because they had deserted it. For the demons, ever most watchful for opportunities to deceive, did what they could.
	Euersis quippe et incensis omnibus cum oppido simulacris solum Mineruae sub tanta ruina templi illius, ut scribit Liuius, integrum stetisse perhibetur, non ut Di patrii, quorum semper sub numine Troia est, ad eorum laudem, sed ne diceretur: Excessere omnes adytis arisque relictis / Di, ad eorum defensionem. Illud enim posse permissi sunt, non unde probarentur potentes, sed unde praesentes conuincerentur.	For when all the images had been overthrown and burned along with the town, only the statue of Minerva, as Livy writes, is said to have stood intact amid the vast ruin of her temple. This was not so that it might be said in their praise, "Gods of our fathers, under whose divine power Troy ever stands," but so that it might not be said in their defense, "All the gods departed, leaving their shrines and altars." For they were permitted to do this much: not something by which they could be proved powerful, but something by which they could be convicted of having been present.[9]

WHETHER ROME SHOULD HAVE BEEN ENTRUSTED TO THE GODS OF TROY

Rome was foolish to entrust itself to the gods who failed Troy.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.8	‚Dis itaque Iliacis post Troiae ipsius documentum qua tandem prudentia Roma custodienda commissa est? Dixerit quispiam iam eos Romae habitare solitos, quando expugnante Fimbria cecidit Ilium. Unde ergo stetit Mineruae simulacrum? Deinde, si aput Romam erant, quando Fimbria deleuit ilium, fortasse aput Ilium erant, quando a Gallis ipsa Roma capta et incensa est; sed ut sunt auditu acutissimi motuque celerrimi, ad uocem anseris cito redierunt, ut saltem Capitolinum collem, qui remanserat, tuerentur; ceterum ad alia defendenda serius sunt redire commoniti.	After the proof given by Troy itself, then, with what wisdom, pray, was Rome entrusted to the gods of Ilium for safekeeping? Someone might say that they had already settled in Rome when Ilium fell to Fimbria's assault. Then how did Minerva's statue remain standing? Again, if they were at Rome when Fimbria destroyed Ilium, perhaps they were at Ilium when Rome itself was captured and burned by the Gauls. But since their hearing is very sharp and their movements very swift, they came back quickly at the cry of a goose, so as to protect at least the Capitoline hill, which had held out; as for defending the rest, they were warned too late to come back.[10]

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT THE GODS GRANTED THE PEACE OF NUMA'S REIGN

Numa's long peace was God's gift, not the reward of his new rites.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.9	Hi etiam Numam Pompilium successorem Romuli adiuuisse creduntur, ut toto regni sui tempore pacem	These same gods are also believed to have helped Numa Pompilius, Romulus's successor, to have 9 Livy's account is lost. The verses are Virgil, Aeneid 9.247 and 2.351–352.

10 The Gauls sacked Rome around 390 BC; according to legend, the sacred geese of Juno alerted the defenders of the Capitol to a night attack.

LATIN

haberet et Iani portas, quae bellis patere adsolent, clauderet, eo merito scilicet, quia Romanis multa sacra constituit. Illi uero homini pro tanto otio gratulandum fuit, si modo id rebus salubribus scisset inpendere et perniciosissima curiositate neglecta Deum uerum uera pietate perquirere. Nunc autem non ei di contulerunt illud otium, sed eum minus fortasse decepissent, si otiosum minime repperissent. Quanto enim minus eum occupatum inuenerunt, tanto magis ipsi occupauerunt. Nam quid ille molitus sit et quibus artibus deos tales sibi uel illi ciuitati consociare potuerit, Varro prodit, quod, si Domino placuerit, suo diligentius disseretur loco.

ENGLISH

peace for the whole of his reign and to close the gates of Janus, which are customarily open in time of war—as a reward, no doubt, for establishing many rites for the Romans. That man would indeed have deserved congratulation on so long a respite, if only he had known how to spend it on wholesome pursuits and, setting aside a most pernicious curiosity, to seek the true God with true piety. As it is, the gods did not grant him that leisure; but perhaps they would have deceived him less had they not found him at leisure. For the less occupied they found him, the more they occupied him themselves. What he contrived, and by what arts he was able to associate such gods with himself or with that city, Varro reveals; this will be discussed more carefully in its proper place, if the Lord pleases.[11]

Modo autem quia de beneficiis eorum quaestio est: magnum beneficium est pax, sed Dei ueri beneficium est, plerumque etiam sicut sol, sicut pluuia uitaeque alia subsidia super ingratos et nequam. Sed si hoc tam magnum bonum di illi Romae uel Pompilio contulerunt, quur imperio Romano per ipsa tempora laudabilia id numquam postea praestiterunt? An utiliora erant sacra, cum instituerentur, quam cum instituta celebrarentur? Atqui tunc nondum erant, sed ut essent addebantur; postea uero iam erant, quae ut prodessent custodiebantur.

For now, though, since the question concerns the gods' benefits: peace is a great benefit, but it is a benefit of the true God, and often, like the sun, like the rain and the other supports of life, it is bestowed even on the ungrateful and the worthless. But if those gods conferred so great a good on Rome or on Pompilius, why did they never grant it to the Roman Empire afterward, even in its most praiseworthy times? Were the rites more useful when they were being instituted than when, once instituted, they were being celebrated? Yet at that time they did not yet exist, but were being added so that they might exist; later they already existed, and were being maintained so that they might be of benefit.

Quid ergo est, quod illi quadraginta tres uel, ut alii uolunt, triginta et nouem anni in tam longa pace transacti sunt regnante Numa, et postea sacris institutis disque ipsis, qui eisdem sacris fuerant inuitati, iam praesidibus adque tutoribus uix post tam multos annos ab Urbe condita usque ad Augustum pro magno miraculo unus commemoratur annus post primum bellum Punicum, quo belli portas Romani claudere potuerunt?

Why is it, then, that those forty-three years—or, as others would have it, thirty-nine—passed in such long peace under Numa's reign, while afterward, once the rites had been instituted and the very gods invited by those rites had become the City's guardians and protectors, scarcely a single year is recorded, as a great marvel, in all the many years from the founding of the City down to Augustus—a year after the First Punic War—in which the Romans were able to close the gates of war?[12]

11 Numa Pompilius, legendary second king of Rome, was credited with founding its religious institutions. The gates of the temple of Janus were closed only when Rome was at peace.

12 The gates of Janus were closed in 235 BC, after the First Punic War (264–241 BC) against Carthage.

WHETHER IT WAS DESIRABLE FOR THE ROMAN EMPIRE TO BE ENLARGED BY SUCH FURY OF WARS, WHEN IT COULD HAVE BEEN QUIET AND SAFE THROUGH THE POLICY FOLLOWED UNDER NUMA

Rome's constant wars made it great but not happy; Numa's peace was better.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.10	An respondent, quod nisi adsiduis sibique continuo succedentibus bellis Romanum imperium tam longe lateque non posset augeri et tam grandi gloria diffamari? Idonea uero causa! Ut magnum esset imperium, quur esse deberet inquietum? Nonne in corporibus hominum satius est modicam staturam cum sanitate habere quam ad molem aliquam giganteam perpetuis adflictionibus peruenire, nec cum perueneris requiescere, sed quanto grandioribus membris, tanto maioribus agitari malis? Quid autem mali esset, ac non potius plurimum boni, si ea tempora perdurarent, quae perstrinxit Sallustius, ubi ait: Igitur initio reges (nam in terris nomen imperii id primum fuit) diuersi pars ingenium, alii corpus exercebant; etiamtum uita hominum sine cupiditate agitabatur, sua cuique satis placebant.	Or will they answer that the Roman Empire could not have grown so far and wide, or won such great renown, except through constant wars, one following continuously on another? A fine reason indeed! Why did the empire have to be restless in order to be great? In human bodies, is it not better to have a moderate stature with health than to attain some gigantic bulk through endless afflictions—and, once you have attained it, not to rest, but to be tormented by evils all the greater as your limbs are larger? And what harm would there have been—or rather, what great good—if those times had lasted which Sallust touches on when he says: "So in the beginning kings (for that was the first name of rule on earth) went different ways: some trained the mind, others the body. Even then human life was lived without craving; each was content with what was his own."[13]
	An ut tam multum augeretur imperium, debuit fieri quod Vergilius detestatur, dicens: Deterior donec paulatim et decolor aetas / Et belli rabies et amor successit habendi? Sed plane pro tantis bellis susceptis et gestis iusta defensio Romanorum est, quod inruentibus sibi inportune inimicis resistere cogebat non auiditas adipiscendae laudis humanae, sed necessitas tuendae salutis et libertatis. Ita sit plane. Nam postquam res eorum, sicut scribit ipse Sallustius, legibus moribus agris aucta satis prospera satisque pollens uidebatur, sicut pleraque mortalium habentur, inuidia ex opulentia orta est. Igitur reges populique finitimi bello tentare; pauci ex amicis auxilio esse, nam ceteri metu perculsi a periculis aberant. At Romani domi militiaeque intenti festinare parare, alius alium hortari, hostibus obuiam ire, libertatem patriam parentesque armis tegere.	Or, for the empire to grow so much, did there have to come about what Virgil deplores when he says: "until, little by little, a worse and tarnished age took its place, and the madness of war, and the love of gain"? But clearly the Romans have a just defense for undertaking and waging such great wars: what compelled them to resist enemies who fell upon them so aggressively was not greed for winning human praise, but the necessity of protecting their safety and freedom. Granted—let it be so. For, as Sallust himself writes, "after their state, enlarged by laws, customs and territory, seemed quite prosperous and quite powerful, envy arose from wealth, as usually happens with human affairs. So neighboring kings and peoples tested them in war; few of their friends came to their aid, for the rest, struck with fear, kept clear of the dangers. But the Romans, alert at home and in the field, made haste, made ready, urged one another on, went out to meet the enemy, and shielded liberty, country and parents with arms.[14]
	Post ubi pericula uirtute propulerant, sociis adque amicis auxilia portabant magisque dandis quam accipiendis	"Later, when they had driven off the dangers by their courage, they brought help to allies and

13 Sallust, The War with Catiline 2.1.
14 Virgil, Aeneid 8.326–327; Sallust, The War with Catiline 6.3–5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
beneficiis amicitias parabant. Decenter his artibus Roma creuit. Sed regnante Numa, ut tam longa pax esset, utrum inruebant inprobi belloque tentabant, an nihil eorum fiebat, ut posset pax illa persistere? Si enim bellis etiam tum Roma lacessebatur nec armis arma obuia ferebantur: quibus modis agebatur, ut nulla pugna superati, nullo Martio impetu territi sedarentur inimici, his modis semper ageretur et semper Roma clausis Iani portis pacata regnaret. Quod si in potestate non fuit, non ergo Roma pacem habuit, quamdiu di eorum, sed quamdiu homines finitimi circumquaque uoluerunt, qui eam nullo bello prouocauerunt; nisi forte di tales etiam id homini uendere audebunt, quod alius homo uoluit siue noluit.	friends, and won friendships more by giving favors than by receiving them." By these arts Rome grew honorably. But in Numa's reign, so that there could be such a long peace, were the wicked attacking and testing them in war, or was none of this happening, so that the peace could endure? For if even then Rome was being provoked by wars and yet arms were not met with arms, then whatever means were used to pacify the enemies without their being defeated in any battle or terrified by any martial assault—those same means should always have been used, and Rome should always have reigned in peace with the gates of Janus shut. And if this was not in their power, then Rome did not have peace for as long as their gods wished, but for as long as the neighboring peoples all around wished, who did not provoke it with any war—unless, perhaps, such gods will even dare to sell one man what another man has willed or not willed.
Interest quidem iam uitio proprio, malas mentes quatenus sinantur isti daemones uel terrere uel excitare; sed I si semper hoc possent nec aliud secretiore ac superiore potestate contra eorum conatum saepe aliter ageretur, semper in potestate haberent paces bellicasque uictorias, quae semper fere per humanorum animorum motus accidunt; quas tamen plerumque contra eorum fieri uoluntatem non solae fabulae multa mentientes et uix ueri aliquid uel indicantes uel significantes, sed etiam ipsa Romana confitetur historia.	It does indeed make a difference—owing to their own vice—how far these demons are permitted to frighten or to stir up wicked minds. But if they always had this power, and if something else were not often brought about against their efforts by a more hidden and higher power, they would always have in their control peace and victory in war, which nearly always come about through the movements of human minds. Yet that these often happen against the demons' will is admitted not only by the myths, which tell many lies and scarcely indicate or hint at anything true, but even by Roman history itself.

THE STATUE OF APOLLO AT CUMAE, WHOSE WEEPING WAS BELIEVED TO FORETELL THE DEFEAT OF THE GREEKS, WHOM HE COULD NOT HELP

Apollo's weeping statue at Cumae could not save the Greeks it mourned.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.11 Neque enim aliunde Apollo ille Cumanus, cum aduersus Achiuos regemque Aristonicum bellaretur, quatriduo fleuisse nuntiatus est; quo prodigio haruspices territi cum id simulacrum in mare putauissent esse proiciendum, Cumani senes intercesserunt adque rettulerunt tale prodigium et Antiochi et Persis bello in eodem apparuisse figmento, et quia Romanis feliciter prouenisset, ex senatus consulto eidem Apollini suo dona missa esse testati sunt. Tunc uelut peritiores acciti haruspices responderunt simulacri Apollinis fletum ideo	This is exactly why the famous Apollo of Cumae was reported to have wept for four days during the war against the Achaeans and King Aristonicus. The soothsayers were terrified by this portent and thought the statue should be thrown into the sea. But the old men of Cumae intervened. They reported that the same portent had appeared in that very image during the wars with Antiochus and with Perseus, and they testified that, because the outcome had been fortunate for the Romans, gifts

LATIN	ENGLISH
prosperum esse Romanis, quoniam Cumana colonia Graeca esset, suisque terris, unde accitus esset, id est ipsi Graeciae, luctum et cladem Apollinem significasse plorantem. Deinde mox regem Aristonicum uictum et captum esse nuntiatum est, quem uinci utique Apollo nolebat et dolebat et hoc sui lapidis etiam lacrimis indicabat.	had been sent to this same Apollo of theirs by decree of the senate. Then other soothsayers were summoned as more expert, and they answered that the weeping of Apollo's statue was favorable to the Romans precisely because Cumae was a Greek colony. By his weeping, they said, Apollo was signifying grief and disaster for his own lands, the place he had been brought from, that is, for Greece itself. Soon afterward it was announced that King Aristonicus had been defeated and captured. Apollo certainly did not want him defeated, and he grieved at it, and he showed this even by the tears of his stone.[15]
Unde non usquequaque incongrue quamuis fabulosis, tamen ueritati similibus mores daemonum describuntur carminibus poetarum. Nam Camillam Diana doluit aput Vergilium et Pallantem moriturum Hercules fleuit. Hinc fortassis et Numa Pompilius pace abundans, sed quo donante nesciens nec requirens, cum cogitaret otiosus, quibusnam dis tuendam Romanam salutem regnumque committeret, nec uerum illum adque omnipotentem summum Deum curare opinaretur ista terrena, adque recoleret Troianos deos, quos Aeneas aduexerat, neque Troianum neque Lauiniense ab ipso Aenea conditum regnum diu conseruare potuisse: alios prouidendos existimauit, quos illis prioribus, qui siue cum Romulo iam Romam transierant, siue quandoque Alba euersa fuerant transituri, uel tamquam fugitiuis custodes adhiberet uel tamquam inualidis adiutores.	So the songs of the poets, though mythical, are true to life, and it is not altogether inappropriate that they describe the ways of demons. For in Virgil, Diana grieved for Camilla, and Hercules wept for Pallas as he was about to die. Perhaps this is also why Numa Pompilius acted as he did. He had peace in abundance, but he did not know, and did not ask, whose gift it was. At his leisure he pondered to which gods he should entrust the safety and kingdom of Rome. He did not think that the true, almighty, supreme God cared about these earthly things. He also recalled that the Trojan gods whom Aeneas had brought had been unable to preserve for long either the kingdom of Troy or the kingdom of Lavinium, which Aeneas himself had founded. So he thought that other gods should be provided. These he would add to the earlier ones, who had either already crossed over to Rome with Romulus or were going to cross over at some point after Alba was destroyed. The new gods would serve either as guards for fugitives or as helpers for the weak.[16]

HOW MANY GODS THE ROMANS ADDED BEYOND NUMA'S ESTABLISHMENT, AND HOW THEIR NUMBER DID THEM NO GOOD

Rome kept adding gods, yet grew no happier for them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.12 Nec his sacris tamen Roma dignata est esse contenta, quae tam multa illic Pompilius constituerat. Nam ipsius summum templum nondum habebat Iouis; rex quippe Tarquinius ibi Capitolium fabricauit; Aesculapius autem	Yet Rome did not deign to be content with these rites, many as Pompilius had established there. For it did not yet have the supreme temple of Jupiter himself. It was King Tarquin who built the 15 Aristonicus claimed the kingdom of Pergamum and was defeated by Rome in 129 BC. Antiochus III of Syria and Perseus of Macedon were kings defeated by Rome in the early second century BC.

16 In Virgil's Aeneid, Camilla is a warrior maiden fighting against Aeneas (Book 11), and Pallas is the young son of Evander, Aeneas' ally (Book 10); both die in battle.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ab Epidauro ambiuit ad Romam, ut peritissimus medicus in urbe nobilissima artem gloriosius exerceret; Mater etiam deum nescio unde a Pessinunte. Indignum enim erat, ut, cum eius filius iam colli Capitolino praesideret, adhuc ipsa in loco ignobili latitaret. Quae tamen si omnium deorum mater est, non solum secuta est Romam quosdam filios suos, uerum et alios praecessit etiam secuturos. Miror sane, si ipsa peperit Cynocephalum, qui longe postea uenit ex Aegypto.	Capitol there. Aesculapius, moreover, made his way from Epidaurus to Rome, so that, as a most skilled physician, he might practice his art with greater glory in the most famous of cities. The Mother of the gods came too, from Pessinus, wherever that may be. For it was unfitting that, when her son was already presiding over the Capitoline hill, she herself should still lie hidden in some obscure place. Yet if she is the mother of all the gods, she not only followed some of her sons to Rome but also went ahead of others who were still to follow. I would certainly be surprised if she gave birth to the Cynocephalus, who came from Egypt long afterward.[17]
Utrum etiam dea Febris ex illa nata sit, uiderit Aesculapius pronepos eius; sed undecumque nata sit, non, opinor, audebunt eam dicere ignobilem di peregrini deam ciuem Romanam. Sub hoc tot deorum praesidio (quos numerare quis potest, indigenas et alienigenas, caelites terrestres infernos, marinos fontanos fluuiales, et, ut Varro dicit, certos adque incertos, in omnibusque generibus deorum, sicut in animalibus, mares et feminas?) — sub hoc ergo tot deorum praesidio constituta Roma non tam magnis et horrendis cladibus, quales ex multis paucas commemorabo, agitari adfligique debuit. Nimis enim multos deos grandi fumo suo tamquam signo dato ad tuitionem congregauerat, quibus templa altaria, sacrificia sacerdotes instituendo adque praebendo summum uerum Deum, cui uni haec rite gesta debentur, offenderet.	Whether the goddess Fever was also born of her, let Aesculapius, her great-grandson, decide. But wherever Fever was born, the foreign gods will not, I think, dare to call her low-born, a goddess who is a Roman citizen. Rome was placed under the protection of so many gods. Who can count them? There are native and foreign gods, gods of heaven, earth and the underworld, gods of the sea, of springs and of rivers. As Varro says, there are certain gods and uncertain ones, and in every kind of god, as among animals, there are males and females. Under the protection, then, of so many gods, Rome should not have been shaken and afflicted by such great and dreadful disasters as those I shall recount, a few out of many. For with its great smoke, as if a signal had been given, it had gathered far too many gods for its protection. By establishing and providing temples and altars, sacrifices and priests for them, it offended the supreme true God, to whom alone these things are rightly due.[18]
Et felicior quidem cum paucioribus uixit, sed quanto maior facta est, sicut nauis nautas, tanto plures adhibendos putauit; credo, desperans pauciores illos, sub quibus in conparationem peioris uitae melius uixerat, non sufficere ad opitulandum granditati suae.	And indeed Rome lived more happily with fewer gods. But the larger it grew, the more gods it thought it should employ, as a ship needs more sailors. I suppose it despaired that those fewer gods would be enough to help it in its greatness. Yet under them it had lived better, compared with its later and worse life.
Primo enim sub ipsis regibus, excepto Numa Pompilio, de quo iam supra locutus sum, quantum malum discordiosi certaminis fuit, quod fratrem Romuli coegit occidi!	First, under the kings themselves, apart from Numa Pompilius, of whom I have already spoken above, how great was the evil of that quarrelsome

17 Aesculapius, god of healing, was brought from Epidaurus in 293 BC, and the Mother of the gods (Cybele) from Pessinus in Phrygia in 204 BC.

18 Varro's Antiquities catalogued the Roman gods, including "certain" and "uncertain" ones.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	strife which drove Romulus to have his brother killed!

BY WHAT RIGHT AND WHAT TREATY THE ROMANS GOT THEIR FIRST WIVES

Rome won its first wives by fraud and then fought their fathers.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.13 Quo modo nec Iuno, quae cum Ioue suo iam fouebat Romanos rerum dominos gentemque togatam, nec Venus ipsa Aeneidas suos potuit adiuuare, ut bono et aequo more coniugia mererentur, cladesque tanta inruit huius inopiae, ut ea dolo raperent moxque conpellerentur pugnare cum soceris, ut miserae feminae nondum ex iniuria maritis conciliatae iam parentum sanguine dotarentur? At enim uicerunt in hac conflictione Romani uicinos suos. Quantis et quam multis utrimque uulneribus et funeribus tam propinquorum et confinium istae uictoriae constiterunt! Propter unum Caesarem socerum et unum generum eius Pompeium iam mortua Caesaris filia, uxore Pompei, quanto et quam iusto doloris instinctu Lucanus exclamat: Bella per Emathios plus quam ciuilia campos Iusque datum sceleri canimus.	How was it that neither Juno, who with her Jupiter was already cherishing "the Romans, lords of the world, the toga-wearing race," nor Venus herself could help her descendants of Aeneas to win wives in a good and fair way? Instead, the disaster of this shortage struck them so hard that they seized wives by deceit. Soon they were forced to fight their fathers-in-law, so that the wretched women, not yet reconciled to their husbands after the wrong done them, were already given a dowry of their parents' blood. "But the Romans defeated their neighbors in this conflict," you say. Yes, and how many wounds and how many deaths, on both sides, among people so closely related and so near, did those victories cost! Think of one Caesar, a father-in-law, and one Pompey, his son-in-law, and this when Caesar's daughter, Pompey's wife, was already dead. With what great and what just stirring of grief Lucan cries out on their account: "Wars worse than civil, across Emathia's plains, and crime made lawful, we sing."[19]
Vicerunt ergo Romani, ut strage socerorum manibus cruentis ab eorum filiabus amplexus miserabiles extorquerent, nec illae auderent flere patres occisos, ne offenderent uictores maritos, quae adhuc illis pugnantibus pro quibus facerent uota nesciebant. Talibus nuptiis populum Romanum non Venus, sed Bellona donauit; aut fortassis Allecto illa inferna furia iam eis fauente Iunone plus in illos habuit licentiae, quam cum eius precibus contra Aenean fuerat excitata. Andromacha felicius captiuata est, quam illa conubia Romana nupserunt. Licet seruiles, tamen post eius amplexus nullum Troianorum Pyrrhus occidit; Romani autem soceros interficiebant in proeliis, quorum iam filias amplexabantur in thalamis. Illa uictori subdita dolere tantum suorum mortem potuit, non timere; illae sociatae bellantibus parentum suorum mortes procedentibus uiris timebant, redeuntibus dolebant, nec timorem habentes liberum nec dolorem.	So the Romans won. They won so that, with hands bloody from slaughtering their fathers-in-law, they might wring pitiable embraces from those men's daughters. The women did not dare to weep for their slain fathers, for fear of offending their victorious husbands. While the battle was still going on, they had not known for whom to pray. Such marriages were the gift to the Roman people not of Venus but of Bellona. Or perhaps Allecto, that fury of the underworld, now that Juno favored the Romans, had more license against them than when Juno's prayers had roused her against Aeneas. Andromache was more fortunate in her captivity than those Roman brides were in their marriages. Though hers was a slave's union, Pyrrhus killed none of the Trojans after he had embraced her. The Romans, by contrast, were killing in battle the fathers-in-law whose daughters they were already embracing in the bridal chamber. Andromache, subject to the victor, could only grieve for the death of her people, not fear it. These women, joined to the combatants, feared their parents' deaths when their husbands went out to fight and grieved for them when their husbands came back. Neither their fear nor their grief was free.[20]

19 The first quotation is from Virgil, Aeneid 1.282. The second is the opening of Lucan's Civil War (Pharsalia) 1.1–2. Emathia means Thessaly, where Caesar defeated Pompey at Pharsalus in 48 BC.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Nam propter interitum ciuium propinquorum, fratrum parentum aut pie cruciabantur, aut crudeliter laetabantur uictoriis maritorum. Huc accedebat, quod, ut sunt alterna bellorum, aliquae parentum ferro amiserunt uiros, aliquae utrorumque ferro et parentes et uiros. Neque enim et aput Romanos parua fuerunt illa discrimina, si quidem ad obsidionem quoque peruentum est ciuitatis clausisque portis se tuebantur; quibus dolo apertis admissisque hostibus intra moenia in ipso foro scelerata et nimis atrox inter generos socerosque pugna commissa est, et raptores illi etiam superabantur et crebro fugientes inter domos suas grauius foedabant pristinas, quamuis et ipsas pudendas lugendasque uictorias.

Because of the deaths of their fellow citizens and kin, their brothers and parents, they were either tormented, as devotion required, or they rejoiced, cruelly, at their husbands' victories. There was more. As wars swing back and forth, some women lost their husbands to their parents' swords, and some lost both parents and husbands to the swords of both sides. For the Romans, too, faced no small dangers. It even came to a siege of the city, and they defended themselves behind closed gates. When the gates were opened by treachery and the enemy were let within the walls, a wicked and terribly savage battle was fought in the forum itself, between sons-in-law and fathers-in-law. The abductors were even being defeated. Fleeing again and again into their houses, they disgraced their earlier victories still more grievously, though those victories too were shameful and lamentable.

Hic tamen Romulus de suorum iam uirtute desperans Iouem orauit ut starent, adque ille hac occasione nomen Statoris inuenit; nec finis esset tanti mali, nisi raptae illae laceratis crinibus emicarent et prouolutae parentibus iram eorum iustissimam non armis uictricibus, sed supplici pietate sedarent. Deinde Tatium regem Sabinorum socium regni Romulus ferre conpulsus est, germani consortis inpatiens: sed quando et istum diu toleraret, qui fratrem geminumque non pertulit? Unde et ipso interfecto, ut maior deus esset, regnum solus obtinuit. Quae sunt ista iura nuptiarum, quae inritamenta bellorum, quae foedera germanitatis adfinitatis, societatis diuinitatis? quae postremo sub tot dis tutoribus uita ciuitatis? Vides quanta hinc dici et quam multa possent, nisi quae supersunt nostra curaret intentio et sermo in alia festinaret.

At this point, however, Romulus, now despairing of his own men's courage, prayed to Jupiter that they might stand firm, and on this occasion Jupiter acquired the name Stator. There would have been no end to so great an evil had not the abducted women rushed out with torn hair, thrown themselves at their parents' feet, and calmed their most just anger, not with victorious arms but with suppliant devotion. Then Romulus was compelled to accept Tatius, king of the Sabines, as partner in his kingdom, though he could not bear a brother as partner. But how long would he tolerate this man, when he had not endured his own brother, his twin? So after Tatius too was killed, he held the kingdom alone, so as to be the greater god. What are these rights of marriage, these incitements to war, these bonds of brotherhood and kinship, of alliance and divinity? What, finally, is this life of a city under so many guardian gods? You see how much could be said 20 Bellona was the Roman goddess of war. In Virgil's Aeneid 7, Juno rouses the fury Allecto against Aeneas; Andromache, Hector's widow, became the captive of Pyrrhus after the fall of Troy.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	on this subject, and how many things, were it not that my purpose is concerned with what remains and my discourse hastens on to other matters.[21]

THE IMPIETY OF THE WAR THE ROMANS WAGED ON THE ALBANS, AND THE VICTORY WON THROUGH THE LUST FOR DOMINATION

Rome destroyed Alba, its own mother city, in a war of ambition.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.14 Quid deinde post Numam sub aliis regibus? Quanto malo non solum suo, sed etiam Romanorum in bellum Albani prouocati sunt, quia uidelicet pax Numae tam longa uiluerat! Quam crebrae strages Romani Albanique exercitus fuerunt et utriusque comminutio ciuitatis! Alba namque illa, quam filius Aeneae creauit Ascanius, Romae mater proprior ipsa quam Troia, a Tullo Hostilio rege prouocata conflixit, confligens autem et adflicta est et adfiixit, donec multorum taederet pari defectione certaminum. Tunc euentum belli de tergeminis hinc adque inde fratribus placuit experiri; a Romanis tres Horatii, ab Albanis autem tres Curiatii processerunt; a Curiatiis tribus Horatii duo, ab uno autem Horatio tres Curiatii superati et extincti sunt. Ita Roma extitit uictrix ea clade etiam in certamine extremo, ut de sex unus rediret domum.	What then happened after Numa, under the other kings? With how great an evil, not only for themselves but for the Romans as well, were the Albans provoked to war! No doubt this was because Numa's long peace had grown cheap. How often the Roman and Alban armies were slaughtered, and how both cities were ground down! For Alba, founded by Aeneas' son Ascanius, was a nearer mother of Rome than Troy itself. Provoked by King Tullus Hostilius, it fought. In fighting it was struck down and struck others down in turn, until many grew weary of battles in which both sides were equally worn away. Then it was decided to settle the outcome of the war by means of triplet brothers, one set from each side. From the Romans came forward the three Horatii, from the Albans the three Curiatii. Two of the Horatii were overcome and killed by the three Curiatii, but the three Curiatii were overcome and killed by one Horatius. So Rome emerged victorious, but with such loss, even in that final contest, that out of six only one returned home.[22]
Cui damnum in utrisque, cui luctus, nisi Aeneae stirpi nisi Ascanii posteris, nisi proli Veneris nisi nepotibus Iouis? Nam et hoc plus quam ciuile bellum fuit, quando filia ciuitas cum ciuitate matre pugnauit. Accessit aliud huic tergeminorum pugnae ultimae atrox adque horrendum malum. Nam ut erant ambo populi prius amici (uicini quippe adque cognati), uni Curiatiorum desponsata fuerat Horatiorum soror; haec postea quam sponsi spolia in uictore fratre conspexit, ab eodem fratre, quoniam fleuit, occisa est. Humanior huius unius feminae quam uniuersi populi Romani mihi fuisse uidetur adfectus. Illa quem uirum iam fide media retinebat, aut forte etiam ipsum fratrem dolens, qui eum occiderat cui sororem promiserat, puto quod non culpabiliter fleuerit. Unde	Whose was the loss on both sides, whose the grief, if not that of Aeneas' stock, of Ascanius' descendants, of Venus' offspring, of Jupiter's grandsons? For this too was a war worse than civil, when the daughter city fought the mother city. And to this last battle of the triplets was added another evil, savage and dreadful. Both peoples had been friends before, since they were neighbors and kin, and the sister of the Horatii had been betrothed to one of the Curiatii. When she saw her betrothed's spoils on her victorious brother, she wept, and for this that same brother killed her. The feeling of this one woman seems to me more humane than that of the whole Roman people. She was grieving 21 Stator means "the one who makes men stand firm." Titus Tatius, king of the Sabines, shared rule with Romulus until he was murdered.

22 Tullus Hostilius was the third king of Rome. The legendary combat of the Horatii and Curiatii is told by Livy (1.24–26).

LATIN	ENGLISH
enim aput Vergilium pius Aeneas laudabiliter dolet hostem etiam sua peremtum manu?	for the man to whom she was already bound by the pledge of betrothal, or perhaps even for her brother himself, who had killed the man to whom he had promised his sister. I do not think she was to blame for weeping. For why else, in Virgil, does dutiful Aeneas grieve, to his credit, for an enemy slain by his own hand?[23]
Unde Marcellus Syracusanam ciuitatem recolens eius paulo ante culmen et gloriam sub manus suas subito concidisse communem cogitans condicionem flendo miseratus est? Quaeso ab humano inpetremus adfectu, ut femina sponsum suum a fratre suo peremtum sine crimine fleuerit, si uiri hostes a se uictos etiam cum laude fleuerunt. Ergo sponso a fratre inlatam mortem quando femina illa flebat, tunc se contra matrem ciuitatem tanta strage bellasse et tanta hinc et inde cognati cruoris effusione uicisse Roma gaudebat.	Why else did Marcellus weep in pity for Syracuse? He recalled how the city's height and glory, so recent, had suddenly fallen beneath his hands, and he reflected on the common lot of all. I beg that we obtain this much from human feeling: that a woman may weep without guilt for her betrothed killed by her brother, if men have wept, and been praised for it, even for enemies they themselves defeated. So, at the very time that woman was weeping for the death her brother had inflicted on her betrothed, Rome was rejoicing that it had waged war against its mother city with such slaughter and had won with such an outpouring of kindred blood on both sides.[24]

THE LUST FOR DOMINATION

Sallust names the lust for domination as the cause of wars of conquest.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quid mihi obtenditur nomen laudis nomenque uictoriae? Remotis obstaculis insanae opinionis facinora nuda cernantur, nuda pensentur, nuda iudicentur. Causa dicatur Albae, sicut Troiae adulterium dicebatur. Nulla talis, nulla similis inuenitur; tantum ut resides moueret Tullus in arma uiros et iam desueta triumphis / Agmina. Illo itaque uitio tantum scelus perpetratum est socialis belli adque cognati, quod uitium Sallustius magnum transeunter adtingit. Cum enim laudans breuiter antiquiora commemorasset tempora, quando uita hominum sine cupiditate agitabatur et sua cuique satis placebant: Postea uero, inquit, quam in Asia Cyrus, in Graecia Lacedaemonii et Athenienses coepere urbes adque nationes subigere, libidinem dominandi causam belli habere, maximam gloriam in maximo imperio putare, et cetera quae ipse instituerat dicere. Mihi huc usque satis sit eius uerba posuisse.	Why do they hold up before me the name of praise and the name of victory? Remove the obstacles of insane opinion, and let the crimes be seen naked, weighed naked, judged naked. Let a cause be stated for the war on Alba, as adultery was stated for the war on Troy. None such is found, nothing even like it. There was only this: that Tullus might "rouse to arms men grown idle, and ranks now unused to triumphs." It was through that vice, then, that so great a crime was committed, a war against allies and kin. Sallust touches on this vice in passing as a great one. Having briefly praised earlier times, when people lived their lives without craving and each was well content with his own, he says: "But after Cyrus in Asia, and the Lacedaemonians and Athenians in Greece, began to subdue cities and nations, to treat the lust for domination as a cause for war, and to think that the greatest glory lay in the greatest empire," and 23 In Aeneid 10.821–832, Aeneas pities the young Lausus after killing him.

24 Marcus Claudius Marcellus captured Syracuse in 212 BC and is said to have wept over the city.

LATIN

ENGLISH

so on, as he had set out to say. For my purpose it is enough to have quoted his words this far.[25]

Libido ista dominandi magnis malis agitat et conterit humanum genus. Hac libidine Roma tunc uicta Albam se uicisse triumphabat et sui sceleris laudem gloriam nominabat, quoniam laudatur, inquit scriptura nostra, peccator in desideriis animae suae et qui iniqua gerit benedicitur. Fallacia igitur tegmina et deceptoriae dealbationes auferantur a rebus, ut sincero inspiciantur examine. Nemo mihi dicat: magnus ille adque ille, quia cum illo pugnauit et uicit. Pugnant etiam gladiatores, uincunt etiam ipsi, habet praemia laudis et illa crudelitas; sed puto esse satius cuiuslibet inertiae poenas luere quam illorum armorum quaerere gloriam. Et tamen si in harenam procederent pugnaturi inter se gladiatores, quorum alter filius, alter esset pater, tale spectaculum quis ferret? quis non auferret?

This lust for domination harasses the human race with great evils and grinds it down. Conquered by this lust, Rome celebrated a triumph for having conquered Alba, and called the praise of its own crime glory. For, as our Scripture says, "the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and the one who does wicked things is blessed." So let the deceptive coverings and the misleading whitewash be stripped away from things, so that they may be examined honestly. Let no one say to me, "That man was great, and so was that one, because he fought this other man and won." Gladiators fight too, and they too win, and that cruelty too has its rewards of praise. But I think it better to pay the penalty for any kind of idleness than to seek the glory of such arms. And yet if gladiators came out into the arena to fight each other, one of them the son and the other the father, who would bear such a spectacle? Who would not bar it?[26]

Quo modo ergo gloriosum alterius matris, alterius filiae ciuitatis inter se armorum potuit esse certamen? An ideo diuersum fuit, quod harena illa non fuit, et latiores campi non duorum gladiatorum, sed in duobus populis multorum funeribus inplebantur, nec amphitheatro cingebantur illa certamina, sed uniuerso orbe et tunc uiuis et posteris, quo usque ista fama porrigitur, inpium spectaculum praebebatur?

How then could a contest of arms between a mother city and a daughter city be glorious? Or was it different because there was no arena there? Because broader fields were filled with the corpses not of two gladiators but of many, from two peoples? Because those contests were enclosed not by an amphitheater but by the whole world, and an impious spectacle was offered both to the living of that time and to posterity, as far as this story reaches?

Vim tamen patiebantur studii sui di illi praesides imperii Romani et talium certaminum tamquam theatrici spectatores, donec Horatiorum soror propter Curiatios tres peremtos etiam ipsa tertia ex altera parte fraterno ferro duobus fratribus adderetur, ne minus haberet mortium etiam Roma quae uicerat. Deinde ad fructum uictoriae Alba subuersa est, ubi post Ilium, quod Graeci euerterunt, et post Lauinium, ubi Aeneas regnum peregrinum adque fugitiuum constituerat, tertio loco habitauerant numina illa Troiana. Sed more suo etiam inde iam fortasse migrauerant, ideo deleta est. Discesserant uidelicet omnes adytis arisque relictis di, quibus imperium illud steterat. Discesserant sane ecce iam tertio, ut eis quarta Roma prouidentissime crederetur. Displicuerat enim et Alba, ubi Amulius

Yet those gods, the protectors of the Roman empire, were in the grip of their own enthusiasm, like spectators at a theater watching such contests. They were not satisfied until the sister of the Horatii, because of the three slain Curiatii, was herself added by her brother's sword to her two brothers, a third death on the other side, so that Rome, though it had won, should not have fewer deaths either. Then, as the fruit of victory, Alba was overthrown. After Ilium, which the Greeks destroyed, and after Lavinium, where Aeneas had founded a kingdom of foreigners and fugitives, Alba was the third place where those Trojan deities had dwelt. But perhaps, as was their habit, they had already moved away from there too, and that is why it was 25 The verse is Virgil, Aeneid 6.813–815; the quotation is Sallust, The War with Catiline 2.2.

26 Psalm 9:24 (10:3 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

expulso fratre, et Roma placuerat, ubi Romulus occiso fratre regnauerat.

Sed antequam Alba diruueretur, transfusus est, inquiunt, populus eius in Romam, ut ex utraque una ciuitas fieret. Esto, ita factum sit; urbs tamen illa Ascanii regnum et tertium domicilium Troianorum deorum, ab urbe filia mater euersa est; ut autem belli reliquiae ex duobus populis unum facerent, miserabile coagulum multus ante fusus utriusque sanguis fuit. Quid iam singillatim dicam sub ceteris regibus totiens eadem bella renouata, quae uictoriis finita uidebantur, et tantis stragibus iterum iterumque confecta, iterum iterumque post foedus et pacem inter soceros et generos et eorum stirpem posterosque repetita? Non paruum indicium calamitatis huius fuit, quod portas belli nullus clausit illorum. Nullus ergo illorum sub tot dis praesidibus in pace regnauit.

ENGLISH

destroyed. No doubt "all the gods by whom that empire had stood had departed, leaving their shrines and altars." Look, they had departed now for the third time, so that Rome, the fourth, might be entrusted to them with the utmost foresight! For Alba had displeased them, where Amulius reigned after driving out his brother, and Rome had pleased them, where Romulus reigned after killing his brother.[27]

"But before Alba was destroyed," they say, "its people were transferred to Rome, so that one city might be made of both." Granted, let it be so. Yet that city, the kingdom of Ascanius and the third home of the Trojan gods, was a mother overthrown by her daughter city. And in order that the remnants of war might make one people out of two, much blood of both was first shed as a pitiful cement. Why should I now go through, one by one, how under the remaining kings the same wars were renewed so often? They seemed to have been ended by victories, and they were finished again and again with great slaughter. Again and again, after treaty and peace, they were resumed between fathers-in-law and sons-in-law and their stock and descendants. It was no small sign of this calamity that none of those kings closed the gates of war. So none of them, under so many protecting gods, reigned in peace.

WHAT THE LIFE AND END OF THE ROMAN KINGS WERE LIKE

Most of Rome's kings died violently, and Romulus's deification was flattery.

LATIN

3.15 Ipsorum autem regum qui exitus fuerunt? De Romulo uiderit adulatio fabulosa, qua perhibetur receptus in caelum; uiderint quidam scriptores eorum, qui eum propter ferocitatem a senatu discerptum esse dixerunt subornatumque nescio quem Iulium Proculum, qui eum sibi apparuisse diceret eumque per se populo mandasse Romano, ut inter numina coleretur, eoque modo populum, qui contra senatum intumescere coeperat, repressum adque sedatum. Acciderat enim et solis defectio, quam certa ratione sui cursus effectam inperita nesciens multitudo meritis Romuli tribuebat. Quasi uero si luctus ille solis fuisset, non magis ideo credi deberet occisus ipsumque scelus auersione etiam diurni luminis

ENGLISH

And what ends did the kings themselves come to? As for Romulus, let the legend-making flattery that claims he was received into heaven look to that. Let certain of their writers look to it too, who said that because of his savagery he was torn to pieces by the senate. They say that a certain Julius Proculus was bribed to claim that Romulus had appeared to him and through him had commanded the Roman people to worship him among the deities. In this way, they say, the people, who had begun to swell with anger against the senate, were checked and calmed. For an eclipse of the sun had also occurred. The ignorant multitude did 27 The quotation adapts Virgil, Aeneid 2.351–352, on the gods abandoning Troy. Amulius seized the throne of Alba from his brother Numitor, grandfather of Romulus and Remus.

LATIN

indicatum; sicut re uera factum est, cum Dominus crucifixus est crudelitate adque inpietate Iudaeorum.

Quam solis obscurationem non ex canonico siderum cursu accidisse satis ostendit, quod tunc erat pascha Iudaeorum; nam plena luna sollemniter agitur, regularis autem solis defectio non nisi lunae fine contingit. Satis et Cicero illam inter deos Romuli receptionem putatam magis significat esse quam factam, quando et laudans eum in libris de re publica Scipionisque sermone: Tantum est, inquit, consecutus, ut, cum subito sole obscurato non conparuisset, deorum in numero conlocatus putaretur, quam opinionem nemo umquam mortalis assequi potuit sine eximia uirtutis gloria. (Quod autem dicit eum subito non conparuisse, profecto ibi intellegitur aut uiolentia tempestatis aut caedis facinorisque secretum; nam et alii scriptores eorum defectioni solis addunt etiam subitam tempestatem, quae profecto aut occasionem sceleri praebuit aut Romulum ipsa consumsit.)

De Tullo quippe etiam Hostilio, qui tertius a Romulo rex fuit, quia et ipse fulmine absumtus est, dicit in eisdem libris idem Cicero, propterea et istum non creditum in deos receptum tali morte, quia fortasse quod erat in Romulo probatum, id est persuasum, Romani uulgare noluerunt, id est uile facere, si hoc et alteri facile tribueretur. Dicit etiam aperte in inuectiuis: Illum, qui hanc urbem condidit, Romulum ad deos inmortales beniuolentia famaque sustulimus, ut non uere factum, sed propter merita uirtutis eius beniuole iactatum diffamatumque monstraret. In Hortensio uero dialogo cum de solis canonicis defectionibus loqueretur: Ut easdem, inquit, tenebras efficiat, quas effecit interitu Romuli, qui obscuratione solis est factus. Certe hic minime timuit hominis interitum dicere, quia disputator magis quam laudator fuit.

ENGLISH

not know that it was produced by the fixed law of the sun's course, and attributed it to Romulus' merits. As if, had that been the sun in mourning, people should not rather have believed for that very reason that he had been murdered, and that the crime itself had been revealed by the very light of day turning away! This is what truly happened when the Lord was crucified through the cruelty and impiety of the Jews.[28]

That this darkening of the sun did not occur through the regular course of the heavenly bodies is shown clearly enough by the fact that it was then the Jewish Passover. For the Passover is solemnly kept at full moon, while a regular eclipse of the sun occurs only at the end of the lunar month. Cicero, too, indicates clearly enough that Romulus' reception among the gods was imagined rather than real. He does so even while praising him in his books On the Commonwealth, in a speech by Scipio: "He achieved so much," he says, "that when he suddenly disappeared during an eclipse of the sun, he was thought to have been placed among the gods. No mortal has ever been able to attain such a reputation without extraordinary glory of virtue." (When he says that Romulus suddenly disappeared, what must surely be understood is either the violence of a storm or a murder and crime done in secret. For other writers of theirs add to the eclipse a sudden storm as well, which surely either gave occasion for the crime or carried Romulus off by itself.)[29]

Indeed, in the same books the same Cicero speaks of Tullus Hostilius, the third king counting from Romulus, who was likewise consumed by lightning. He says that Tullus too was not believed to have been received among the gods through such a death. Perhaps this was because the Romans did not want to make common, that is, to make cheap, what had been established, that is, believed, in the case of Romulus, by readily granting it to another as well. He also says openly in his invectives: "Romulus, who founded this city, we have raised to the immortal gods by our goodwill and by report." He thereby shows that it did not really happen, but was put about and spread abroad out of goodwill, because of the merits of Romulus' virtue. And 28 Julius Proculus, according to Roman legend, reported that the deified Romulus had appeared to him after vanishing.

29 Cicero, On the Commonwealth 2.17.

LATIN

ENGLISH

in the dialogue Hortensius, speaking of regular eclipses of the sun, he says: "so as to produce the same darkness it produced at the death of Romulus, which occurred during an eclipse of the sun." Here, certainly, he was not in the least afraid to speak of the man's death, because he was writing as a debater rather than as a eulogist.[30]

HOW THE KINGS DIED

Tullus burned, Tarquinius Priscus and Servius were murdered, and Tarquin the Proud thrived.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Ceteri autem reges populi Romani, excepto Numa Pompilio et Anco Marcio, qui morbo interierunt, quam horrendos exitus habuerunt! Tullus, ut dixi, Hostilius, uictor et euersor Albae, cum tota domo sua fulmine concrematus est. Priscus Tarquinius per sui decessoris filios interemtus est. Seruius Tullius generi sui Tarquinii Superbi, qui ei successit in regnum, nefario scelere occisus est. Nec discessere adytis arisque relictis di tanto in optimum illius populi regem parricidio perpetrato, quos dicunt, ut hoc miserae Troiae facerent eamque Graecis diruendam exurendamque relinquerent, adulterio Paridis fuisse commotos; sed insuper interfecto a se socero Tarquinius ipse successit.

As for the other kings of the Roman people, apart from Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius, who died of illness, what dreadful ends they had! Tullus Hostilius, as I said, the conqueror and destroyer of Alba, was burned up by lightning together with his whole household. Tarquinius Priscus was murdered by the sons of his predecessor. Servius Tullius was killed through the wicked crime of his son-in-law Tarquin the Proud, who succeeded him on the throne. Yet when so great a parricide had been committed against the best king of that people, the gods did not "depart, leaving their shrines and altars." These are the gods who, they say, were so moved by Paris' adultery that they did this to wretched Troy and left it to the Greeks to be destroyed and burned. On the contrary, Tarquin himself succeeded the father-in-law he had killed.

Hunc illi di nefarium parricidam soceri interfectione regnantem, insuper multis bellis uictoriisque gloriantem et de manubiis Capitolium fabricantem non abscedentes, sed praesentes manentesque uiderunt et regem suum louem in illo altissimo templo, hoc est in opere parricidae, sibi praesidere adque regnare perpessi sunt. Neque enim adhuc innocens Capitolium struxit et postea malis meritis Urbe pulsus est, sed ad ipsum regnum, in quo Capitolium fabricaret, inmanissimi sceleris perpetratione peruenit. Quod uero eum regno Romani postea depulerunt ac secluserunt moenibus ciuitatis, non ipsius de Lucretiae stupro, sed filii peccatum fuit illo non solum nesciente, sed etiam absente commissum.

Those gods watched this wicked parricide reigning after murdering his father-in-law. They watched him glorying, moreover, in many wars and victories and building the Capitol from the spoils. They did not withdraw; they stayed and were present. And they allowed their king Jupiter to preside and reign over them in that loftiest temple, that is, in the work of a parricide. For it was not that he built the Capitol while still innocent and was later driven from the City for his misdeeds. Rather, he gained the very throne from which he could build the Capitol by committing a most monstrous crime. As for the Romans later driving him from the throne and shutting him out of the city walls, the sin in question, the rape of Lucretia, was not his but his son's. It was committed not only without his knowledge but even in his absence.

30 The invective quoted is Cicero's third speech Against Catiline (3.2). The Hortensius is a lost dialogue of Cicero's urging the study of philosophy.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Ardeam ciuitatem tunc obpugnabat, pro populo Romano bellum gerebat: nescimus quid faceret, si ad eius notitiam flagitium filii deferretur; et tamen inexplorato iudicio eius et inexperto ei populus ademit imperium et recepto exercitu, a quo deseri iussus est, clausis deinde portis non siuit intrare redeuntem. At ille post bella grauissima, quibus eosdem Romanos concitatis finitimis adtriuit, postea quam desertus ab eis quorum fidebat auxilio regnum recipere non eualuit, in oppido Tusculo Romae uicino quattuordecim, ut fertur, annos priuatam uitam quietus habuit et cum uxore consenuit, optabiliore fortassis exitu quam socer eius, generi sui facinore nec ignorante filia, sicut perhibetur, extinctus. Nec tamen istum Tarquinium Romani crudelem aut sceleratum, sed superbum appellauerunt, fortasse regios eius fastus alia superbia non ferentes.

At that time he was besieging the city of Ardea; he was waging war on behalf of the Roman people. We do not know what he would have done if his son's outrage had been brought to his attention. And yet, without his judgment being sought or tested, the people took his command from him. They took back the army, which was ordered to desert him, then closed the gates and would not let him enter on his return. He, for his part, waged very heavy wars in which he wore down those same Romans by stirring up their neighbors. But when he was deserted by those on whose help he relied and could not recover his kingdom, he lived quietly as a private citizen for fourteen years, as it is said, in the town of Tusculum near Rome, and grew old with his wife. That was perhaps a more desirable end than his father-in-law's, who was killed by the crime of his son-in-law, and not, it is reported, without his own daughter's knowledge. Yet the Romans did not call this Tarquin cruel or wicked, but proud. Perhaps it was because, with a pride of another kind, they could not bear his royal arrogance.

Nam scelus occisi ab eo soceri optimi regis sui usque adeo contemserunt, ut eum regem suum facerent; ubi miror, si non scelere grauiore mercedem tantam tanto sceleri reddiderunt. Nec discessere adytis arisque relictis di. Nisi forte quispiam sic defendat istos deos, ut dicat eos ideo mansisse Romae, quo possint magis Romanos punire suppliciis quam beneficiis adiuuare, seducentes eos uanis uictoriis et bellis grauissimis conterentes.

For they made so light of his crime in killing his father-in-law, their excellent king, that they made him their king. I wonder whether, in this, they did not commit a crime graver still, by giving so great a reward for so great a crime. And yet the gods did not "depart, leaving their shrines and altars." Unless, perhaps, someone defends these gods by saying that they stayed in Rome in order to punish the Romans with penalties rather than help them with benefits, seducing them with empty victories and crushing them with very heavy wars.

Haec fuit Romanorum uita sub regibus laudabili tempore illius rei publicae usque ad expulsionem Tarquinii Superbi per ducentos ferme et quadraginta et tres annos, cum illae omnes uictoriae tam multo sanguine et tantis emtae calamitatibus uix illud imperium intra uiginti ab Urbe milia dilatauerint; quantum spatium absit ut saltem alicuius Getulae ciuitatis nunc territorio conparetur.

This was the life of the Romans under the kings, in that praiseworthy period of the commonwealth, up to the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, for some two hundred and forty-three years. In all that time, all those victories, bought with so much blood and such great calamities, scarcely extended that empire twenty miles from the City. That is an area that could not even be compared now with the territory of some town in Gaetulia.[31] 31 Gaetulia was a region on the desert fringe of Roman North Africa, Augustine's own part of the world.

THE FIRST CONSULS OF ROME, ONE OF WHOM DROVE THE OTHER FROM THE COUNTRY AND THEN, AFTER THE MOST ATROCIOUS MURDERS OF HIS OWN FAMILY, DIED WOUNDED BY A WOUNDED ENEMY

In the first consular year Brutus killed his sons and drove out his innocent colleague.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.16	Huic tempori adiciamus etiam tempus illud, quo usque dicit Sallustius aequo et modesto iure agitatum, dum metus a Tarquinio et bellum graue cum Etruria positum est. Quamdiu enim Etrusci Tarquinio in regnum redire conanti opitulati sunt, graui bello Roma concussa est. Ideo dicit aequo et modesto iure gestam rem publicam metu premente, non persuadente iustitia. In quo breuissimo tempore quam funestus ille annus fuit, quo primi consules creati sunt expulsa regia potestate! Annum quippe suum non conpleuerunt. Nam Iunius Brutus exhonoratum eiecit Urbe collegam Lucium Tarquinium Collatinum; deinde mox ipse in bello cecidit mutuis cum hoste uulneribus, occisis a se primitus filiis suis et uxoris suae fratribus, quod eos pro restituendo Tarquinio coniurasse cognouerat. Quod factum Vergilius postea quam laudabiliter commemorauit, continuo clementer exhorruit.	To this period let us also add the time during which, as Sallust says, affairs were conducted "with fair and moderate justice," "until the fear of Tarquin and the grievous war with Etruria were laid to rest." For as long as the Etruscans were helping Tarquin in his attempts to regain the throne, Rome was shaken by a grievous war. That is why he says the commonwealth was governed with fair and moderate justice: fear compelled it, not justice persuaded it. And within that very short period, how deadly was the year in which the first consuls were elected, after the royal power had been driven out! They did not even complete their year. For Junius Brutus stripped his colleague Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus of office and drove him out of the City. Then he himself soon fell in battle, he and the enemy wounding each other, after he had first put to death his own sons and his wife's brothers, because he had learned that they had conspired to restore Tarquin. Virgil, after recording this deed with praise, at once shuddered at it in compassion.[32]
	Cum enim dixisset: Natosque pater noua bella mouentes / Ad poenam pulchra pro libertate uocabit, mox deinde exclamauit et ait: Infelix, utcumque ferent ea facta minores. Quomodolibet, inquit, ea facta posteri ferant, id est praeferant et extollant, qui filios occidit, infelix est. Et tamquam ad consolandum infelicem subiungit: Vincit amor patriae laudumque inmensa cupido. Nonne in hoc Bruto, qui et filios occidit et a se percusso hosti filio Tarquinii mutuo percussus superuiuere non potuit eique potius ipse Tarquinius, superuixit, Collatini collegae uidetur innocentia uindicata, qui bonus ciuis hoc Tarquinio pulso passus est, quod tyrannus ipse Tarquinius? Nam et idem Brutus consanguineus Tarquinii fuisse perhibetur; sed Collatinum uidelicet similitudo nominis pressit, quia etiam Tarquinius uocabatur.	For after saying, "And the father will summon to punishment his sons who stir up new wars, for the sake of fair liberty," he immediately cries out: "Unhappy man, however later ages will take those deeds!" However posterity may take those deeds, he means—that is, however they may hold them up and extol them—the man who killed his sons is unhappy. And as if to console the unhappy man he adds: "Love of country and a boundless craving for praise prevail." In this Brutus, who both killed his sons and, struck in return by the enemy he struck, Tarquin's son, could not outlive him—while Tarquin himself outlived Brutus—does not the innocence of his colleague Collatinus seem to have been avenged? For Collatinus, a good citizen, suffered after Tarquin's expulsion the very thing that the tyrant Tarquin himself suffered. Indeed, this same Brutus is said to have been a blood relative of Tarquin too; but Collatinus, it seems, was 32 These quotations come from Sallust's lost Histories.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	weighed down by the likeness of his name, because he too was called Tarquinius.[33]
Mutare ergo nomen, non patriam cogeretur; postremo in eius nomine hoc uocabulum minus esset, L. Collatinus tantummodo uocaretur. Sed ideo non amisit quod sine ullo detrimento posset amittere, ut et honore primus consul et ciuitate bonus ciuis carere iuberetur. Etiamne ista est gloria, Iunii Bruti detestanda iniquitas et nihilo utilis rei publicae? Etiamne ad hanc perpetrandam uicit amor patriae laudumque inmensa cupido? Iam expulso utique Tarquinio tyranno consul cum Bruto creatus est maritus Lucretiae L. Tarquinius Collatinus. Quam iuste populus mores in ciue, non nomen adtendit! Quam inpie Brutus collegam primae ac nouae illius potestatis, quem posset, si hoc offendebatur, nomine tantum priuare, et patria priuauit et honore!	So he should have been forced to change his name, not his country; at the very least, this one word could have been dropped from his name, and he could have been called simply L. Collatinus. But he was not allowed to lose what he could have lost without any harm, precisely so that he—the first consul—would be ordered to give up his office, and —a good citizen—his citizenship. Is this too glory, this detestable injustice of Junius Brutus, of no use whatever to the commonwealth? Was it to commit this too that "love of country and a boundless craving for praise prevailed"? After Tarquin the tyrant had been expelled, Lucretia's husband, L. Tarquinius Collatinus, was certainly elected consul together with Brutus. How justly the people looked to a citizen's character, not to his name! How impiously Brutus deprived his colleague in that first and new office of both his country and his office, when, if this offended him, he could have deprived him merely of his name!
Haec mala facta sunt, haec aduersa acciderunt, quando in illa re publica aequo et modesto iure agitatum est. Lucretius quoque, qui in locum Bruti fuerat subrogatus, morbo, antequam idem annus terminaretur, absumtus est. Ita P. Valerius, qui successerat Collatino, et M. Horatius, qui pro defuncto Lucretio suffectus fuerat, annum illum funereum adque tartareum, qui consules quinque habuit, conpleuerunt, quo anno consulatus ipsius nouum honorem ac potestatem auspicata est Romana res publica.	These evils were done, these misfortunes happened, at the very time when that commonwealth was conducted with fair and moderate justice. Lucretius, too, who had been chosen to replace Brutus, was carried off by illness before that same year was over. So Publius Valerius, who had succeeded Collatinus, and Marcus Horatius, who had been appointed in place of the dead Lucretius, completed that funereal and hellish year, which had five consuls—the year in which the Roman commonwealth inaugurated the new honor and power of the consulship itself.[34]

THE EVILS THAT TROUBLED THE ROMAN COMMONWEALTH AFTER THE BEGINNING OF THE CONSULSHIP, WHILE THE GODS IT WORSHIPED GAVE NO HELP

After the kings, Rome suffered class conflict, famines, plagues and defeats.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.17 Tunc iam deminuto paululum metu, non quia bella conquieuerant, sed quia non tam graui pondere urgebant, finito scilicet tempore, quo aequo iure ac modesto agitatum est, secuta sunt quae idem Sallustius breuiter explicat: Dein seruili imperio patres plebem exercere, de uita adque tergo regio more consulere, agro	Then, when fear had diminished a little—not because the wars had ceased, but because they pressed less heavily—once, that is, the period in which affairs were conducted with fair and moderate justice had come to an end, there followed what the same Sallust briefly sets out: "Then the

33 Virgil, Aeneid 6.820–823.
34 Spurius Lucretius, Lucretia's father.

LATIN

pellere et ceteris expertibus soli in imperio agere. Quibus saeuitiis et maxime faenore obpressa plebes, cum adsiduis bellis tributum et militiam simul toleraret, armata montem sacrum adque Auentinum insedit, tumque tribunos plebis et alia iura sibi parauit. Discordiarum et certaminis utrimque finis fuit secundum bellum Punicum, Quid itaque ego tantas moras uel scribens patiar, uel lecturis adferam?

Quam misera fuerit illa res publica, tam longa aetate per tot annos usque ad secundum bellum Punicum bellis forinsecus inquietare non desistentibus et intus discordiis seditionibusque ciuilibus, a Sallustio breuiter intimatum est. Proinde uictoriae illae non solida beatorum gaudia fuerunt, sed inania solacia miserorum et ad alia adque alia sterilia mala subeunda inlecebrosa incitamenta minime quietorum. Nec nobis, quia hoc dicimus, boni Romani prudentesque suscenseant: quamquam de hac re nec petendi sint nec monendi, quando eos minime suscensuros esse certissimum est. Neque enim grauius uel grauiora dicimus auctoribus eorum et stilo et otio multum inpares; quibus tamen ediscendis et ipsi elaborauerunt et filios suos elaborare conpellunt. Qui autem suscensent, quando me ferrent, si ego dicerem, quod Sallustius ait?

Plurimae turbae, seditiones et ad postremum bella ciuilia orta sunt, dum pauci potentes, quorum in gratiam plerique concesserant, sub honesto patrum aut plebis nomine dominationes adfectabant; bonique et mali ciues appellati, non ob merita in rem publicam, omnibus pariter corruptis, sed uti quisque locupletissimus et iniuria ualidior, quia praesentia defendebat, pro bono ducebatur. Porro si illi scriptores historiae ad honestam libertatem pertinere arbitrati sunt mala ciuitatis propriae non tacere, quam multis locis magno praeconio laudare conpulsi sunt, cum aliam ueriorem, quo ciues aeterni legendi sunt, non haberent: quid nos facere conuenit, quorum spes quanto in Deo melior et certior, tanto maior debet esse libertas, cum mala praesentia Christo nostro inputant, ut infirmiores imperitioresque patricians drove the plebs as if under the rule of slaves, disposed of their lives and their backs in the manner of kings, drove them off their land, and held power alone, with everyone else shut out. Oppressed by these cruelties and above all by debt, since through constant wars it bore both taxes and military service at once, the plebs took up arms and occupied the Sacred Mount and the Aventine, and then secured for itself tribunes of the plebs and other rights. The end of the discord and of the struggle on both sides was the Second Punic War." Why, then, should I either put up with such delays in writing, or inflict them on those who will read?

ENGLISH

How wretched that commonwealth was over so long an age, through so many years up to the Second Punic War, with wars abroad never ceasing to disturb it and with discord and civil strife within, Sallust has briefly indicated. Accordingly, those victories were not the solid joys of the happy but the empty consolations of the wretched, seductive incitements for people anything but at peace to undertake one fruitless evil after another. And let good and sensible Romans not be angry with us for saying this—though on this matter they need neither be asked nor warned, since it is quite certain that they will not be angry at all. For we say nothing more harshly, nor anything harsher, than their own authors, whom we fall far short of in style and in leisure; and yet they themselves labored to learn those authors by heart, and they compel their sons to labor at it too. But those who are angry—how would they put up with me if I said what Sallust says?

"A great many disturbances, seditions and finally civil wars arose, while a powerful few, to whose favor most people had yielded, aimed at domination under the honorable name of senators or of people; and citizens were called good and bad not for their services to the commonwealth, since all were equally corrupt, but whoever was richest and strongest in doing wrong was regarded as good, because he defended the existing state of affairs." Now, if those writers of history thought it belonged to honest freedom of speech not to keep silent about the evils of their own city—a city they were compelled to praise in many places with great acclaim, since they had no other, truer city into which eternal citizens are to be chosen—what

LATIN	ENGLISH
mentes alienentur ab ea ciuitate, in qua sola iugiter feliciterque uiuendum est?	ought we to do? Our freedom must be all the greater as our hope in God is better and more certain, when they blame the present evils on our Christ, so that weaker and less instructed minds may be turned away from that city in which alone life is to be lived unceasingly and happily.
Nec in deos eorum horribiliora nos dicimus, quam eorum identidem auctores, quos legunt et praedicant, quando quidem et ex ipsis quae diceremus accepimus, et nullo modo dicere uel talia uel cuncta sufficimus.	Nor do we say more horrible things against their gods than their own authors say again and again—authors they read and extol. Indeed, we have taken what we say from those very authors, and we are in no way able to say either such things as they do or all of them.

WHERE WERE THE GODS?

Augustine lists plagues, famines and defeats and asks where the gods were.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ubi ergo erant illi di, qui propter exiguam fallacemque mundi huius felicitatem colendi existimantur, cum Romani, quibus se colendos mendacissima astutia uenditabant, tantis calamitatibus uexarentur? Ubi erant, quando Valerius consul ab exulibus et seruis inscensum Capitolium cum defensaret occisus est faciliusque ipse prodesse potuit aedi Iouis quam illi turba tot numinum cum suo maximo adque optimo rege, cuius templum liberauerat, subuenire? Ubi erant, quando densissimis fatigata ciuitas seditionum malis, cum legatos Athenas missos ad leges mutuandas paululum quieta opperiretur, graui fame pestilentiaque uastata est? Ubi erant, quando rursus populus, cum fame laboraret, praefectum annonae primum creauit, adque illa fame inualescente Spurius Maelius, quia esurienti multitudini frumenta largitus est, regni adfectati crimen incurrit et eiusdem praefecti instantia per dictatorem L.	Where, then, were those gods who are thought worth worshiping for the sake of the slight and deceptive happiness of this world, when the Romans, to whom they peddled themselves as worthy of worship with the most lying cunning, were harassed by such calamities? Where were they when the consul Valerius was killed defending the Capitol, which exiles and slaves had seized? He was more easily able to help the temple of Jupiter than that crowd of so many deities, with their Greatest and Best king, whose temple he had freed, was able to come to his aid. Where were they when the city, worn out by a dense succession of the evils of sedition, was waiting in a brief lull for the envoys sent to Athens to borrow laws, and was ravaged by severe famine and plague? Where were they when the people, again suffering from famine, created the first prefect of the grain supply; and when, as that famine grew worse, Spurius Maelius, because he had distributed grain to the starving multitude, incurred the charge of aiming at kingship, and, at the urging of that same prefect, was killed on the orders of the dictator L.
Quintium aetate decrepitum a Quinto Seruilio magistro equitum cum maximo et periculosissimo tumultu ciuitatis occisus est? Ubi erant, quando pestilentia maxima exorta dis inutilibus populus diu multumque fatigatus noua lectisternia, quod numquam antea fecerat, exhibenda arbitratus est? Lecti autem sternebantur in honorem deorum, unde hoc sacrum uel potius sacrilegium nomen accepit. Ubi erant, quando per decem continuos annos male pugnando crebras et magnas	Quinctius, a man decrepit with age, by Quintus Servilius, master of the horse, amid an enormous and most dangerous uproar in the city? Where were they when a very great plague broke out and the people, long and greatly worn out by useless gods, decided that new lectisternia must be offered, something they had never done before? Couches were spread in honor of the gods, and that is how this rite—or rather sacrilege—got its name. Where

LATIN	ENGLISH
clades aput Veios exercitus Romanus acceperat, nisi per Furium Camillum tandem subueniretur, quem postea ciuitas ingrata damnauit? Ubi erant, quando Galli Romam ceperunt spoliauerunt, incenderunt caedibus inpleuerunt? Ubi erant, cum illa insignis pestilentia tam ingentem stragem dedit, qua et ille Furius Camillus extinctus est, qui rem publicam ingratam et a Veientibus ante defendit et de Gallis postea uindicauit?	were they when, through ten consecutive years of fighting badly, the Roman army had suffered frequent and great defeats at Veii, and would have gone on suffering them had help not at last come through Furius Camillus, whom the ungrateful city later condemned? Where were they when the Gauls captured Rome, plundered it, burned it, filled it with slaughter? Where were they when that notorious plague wrought such enormous destruction, in which that same Furius Camillus also died, who had earlier defended the ungrateful commonwealth against the Veientines and later avenged it on the Gauls?[35]
In hac pestilentia scaenicos ludos aliam nouam pestem non corporibus Romanorum, sed, quod est multo perniciosius, moribus intulerunt. Ubi erant, quando alia pestilentia grauis de uenenis matronarum exorta credita est, quarum supra fidem multarum adque nobilium mores deprehensi sunt omni pestilentia grauiores? uel quando in Caudinas furculas a Samnitibus obsessi ambo cum exercitu consules foedus cum eis foedum facere coacti sunt, ita ut equitibus Romanis sescentis obsidibus datis ceteri amissis armis aliisque spoliati priuatique tegminibus sub iugum hostium in uestimentis singulis mitterentur? uel quando graui pestilentia ceteris laborantibus multi etiam in exercitu icti fulmine perierunt?	During this plague they brought in theatrical shows, another new plague—not for the bodies of the Romans but, what is far more destructive, for their morals. Where were they when another grave plague broke out that was believed to come from poisonings by matrons—women many and noble beyond belief, whose conduct was found to be worse than any plague? Or when both consuls with their army, trapped by the Samnites at the Caudine Forks, were forced to make a disgraceful treaty with them, so that six hundred Roman knights were handed over as hostages, and the rest, having lost their arms, stripped of everything else and deprived even of their coverings, were sent under the enemy's yoke in a single garment each? Or when, while everyone else was suffering from a severe plague, many in the army also died struck by lightning?
uel quando item alia intolerabili pestilentia Aesculapium ab Epidauro quasi medicum deum Roma aduocare adque adhibere conpulsa est, quoniam regem omnium Iouem, qui iam diu in Capitolio sedebat, multa stupra, quibus adulescens uacauerat, non permiserant fortasse discere medicinam uel cum conspirantibus uno tempore hostibus Lucanis, Bruttiis, Samnitibus, Etruscis et Senonibus Gallis primo ab eis legati peremti sunt, deinde cum praetore obpressus exercitus septem tribunis cum illo pereuntibus et militum tredecim milibus?	Or when, again, because of another unbearable plague, Rome was compelled to summon Aesculapius from Epidaurus as a physician god and put him to work—since Jupiter, the king of all, who had long been seated on the Capitol, had perhaps been kept from learning medicine by the many debaucheries to which he had devoted his youth? Or when, as the Lucanians, Bruttians, Samnites, Etruscans and Senonian Gauls conspired against them at one and the same time, first Roman envoys were killed by them, and then an army was crushed together with its praetor, seven tribunes perishing with him, along with thirteen thousand soldiers?[36]
uel quando post longas et graues Romae seditiones, quibus ad ultimum plebs in Ianiculum hostili diremtione	Or when, after long and serious seditions at Rome, in which the plebs had finally seceded to the Jan-

35 Marcus Furius Camillus captured Veii in 396 BC and was later exiled by the Romans.

LATIN

secesserat, huius mali tam dira calamitas erat, ut eius rei causa, quod in extremis periculis fieri solebat, dictator crearetur Hortensius, qui plebe reuocata in eodem magistratu exspirauit, quod nulli dictatori ante contigerat, et quod illis dis iam praesente Aesculapio grauius crimen fuit?

Tum uero tam multa bella ubique crebruerunt, ut inopia militum proletarii illi, qui eo, quod proli gignendae uacabant, ob egestatem militare non ualentes hoc nomen acceperant, militiae conscriberentur. Accitus etiam a Tarentinis Pyrrhus, rex Graeciae, tunc ingenti gloria celebratus, Romanorum hostis effectus est. Cui sane de rerum futuro euentu consulenti satis urbane Apollo sic ambiguum oraculum edidit, ut, e duobus quidquid accidisset, ipse diuinus haberetur (ait enim: Dico te, Pyrrhe, uincere posse Romanos) adque ita, siue Pyrrhus a Romanis siue Romani a Pyrrho uincerentur, securus fatidicus utrumlibet expectaret euentum. Quae tunc et quam horrenda utriusque exercitus clades! In qua tamen superior Pyrrhus extitit, ut iam posset Apollinem pro suo intellectu praedicare diuinum, nisi proxime alio proelio Romani abscederent superiores.

Adque in tanta strage bellorum etiam pestilentia grauis exorta est mulierum. Nam priusquam maturos partus ederent, grauidae moriebantur. Ubi se, credo, Aesculapius excusabat, quod archiatrum, non obstetricem profitebatur. Pecudes quoque similiter interibant, ita ut etiam defecturum genus animalium crederetur. Quid? hiems illa memorabilis tam incredibili inmanitate saeuiens, ut niuibus horrenda altitudine etiam in foro per dies quadraginta manentibus Tiberis quoque glacie, duraretur, si nostris temporibus accidisset, quae isti et quanta dixissent! Quid? illa itidem ingens pestilentia, quamdiu saeuiit, quam multos peremit! Quae cum in annum alium multo grauius tenderetur frustra praesente Aesculapio, aditum est ad libros Sibyllinos. In quo genere oraculorum, sicut Cicero iculum in a hostile breach, the calamity of this evil was so dire that because of it a dictator, Hortensius, was appointed—something usually done only in extreme dangers—and he, after bringing the plebs back, died while still in that office, which had happened to no dictator before? And this was a graver charge against those gods, since Aesculapius was by then present.

ENGLISH

Then indeed so many wars sprang up everywhere that, for lack of soldiers, the proletarii were enrolled in the army—men who had received this name because, too poor to serve as soldiers, they had leisure only for producing offspring. Pyrrhus, too, king of Greece, then celebrated with immense glory, was summoned by the Tarentines and became an enemy of the Romans. When he consulted about the future outcome of events, Apollo quite wittily gave him so ambiguous an oracle that, whichever of the two things happened, he himself would be thought divine. For he said: "I say that you, Pyrrhus, the Romans can conquer." And so, whether Pyrrhus was conquered by the Romans or the Romans by Pyrrhus, the soothsayer could safely await either outcome. What a slaughter of both armies there was then, and how horrifying! In it Pyrrhus nevertheless came out on top, so that he could now proclaim Apollo divine by his own interpretation—had not the Romans come away the victors soon afterward in another battle.[37]

And amid such great slaughter of wars a grave plague also broke out among women. For pregnant women were dying before they could bring their offspring to term. Here, I suppose, Aesculapius excused himself on the ground that he professed to be a chief physician, not a midwife. Livestock too were dying in the same way, so that it was even believed that animals as a kind would die out. And what of that memorable winter, raging with such incredible severity that snow lay at a horrifying depth for forty days even in the Forum, and the Tiber too was frozen solid with ice? If it had happened in our times, what things, and how many, would these people have said! And what of that equally enormous plague—how many 36 Aesculapius (Greek Asclepius), god of healing, whose cult was brought to Rome from Epidaurus in Greece in 293 BC.

37 Proles is Latin for "offspring." The oracle's Latin can mean either "you can conquer the Romans" or "the Romans can conquer you."

LATIN	ENGLISH
in libris de diuinatione commemorat, magis interpretibus ut possunt seu uolunt dubia coniectantibus credi solet.	it killed while it raged! When it stretched into another year, far more severe, with Aesculapius present to no purpose, recourse was had to the Sibylline Books. In that kind of oracle, as Cicero records in his books On Divination, people usually rely rather on the interpreters, who conjecture at uncertain meanings as they can or as they wish.[38]
Tunc ergo dictum est eam esse causam pestilentiae, quod plurimas aedes sacras multi occupatas priuatim tenerent: sic interim a magno inperitiae uel desidiae crimine Aesculapius liberatus est. Unde autem a multis aedes illae fuerant occupatae nemine prohibente, nisi quia tantae numinum turbae diu frustra fuerat supplicatum, adque ita paulatim loca deserebantur a cultoribus, ut tamquam uacua sine ullius offensione possent humanis saltem usibus uindicari? Namque tunc uelut ad sedandam pestilentiam diligenter repetita adque reparata nisi postea eodem modo neglecta adque usurpata latitarent, non utique magnae peritiae Varronis tribueretur, quod scribens de aedibus sacris tam multa ignorata commemorat. Sed tunc interim elegans non pestilentiae depulsio, sed deorum excusatio procurata est.	At that time, then, it was declared that the cause of the plague was that many people were occupying a great many sacred buildings and holding them as private property. In this way, for the time being, Aesculapius was cleared of the serious charge of incompetence or laziness. But why had those buildings been occupied by many people with no one preventing it, unless because prayers to so great a crowd of deities had long been offered in vain, and so the places were gradually deserted by their worshipers, so that, as if empty, they could be claimed without offending anyone, at least for human uses? For if the buildings, carefully reclaimed and restored at that time as if to quell the plague, had not later been neglected and appropriated in the same way and so lain forgotten, Varro would certainly not be credited with great learning for recording so many unknown things when he writes about sacred buildings. But what was secured for the moment was not the driving off of the plague, but an elegant excuse for the gods.

THE DISASTERS THAT WORE DOWN THE ROMANS IN THE PUNIC WARS, WHILE THE PROTECTION OF THE GODS WAS SOUGHT IN VAIN

The Punic Wars devastated many peoples, and Regulus was captured.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.18 Iam uero Punicis bellis, cum inter utrumque imperium uictoria diu anceps adque incerta penderet populique duo praeualidi impetus in alterutrum fortissimos et opulentissimos agerent, quot minutiora regna contrita sunt! quae urbes amplae nobilesque deletae, quot adflictae, quot perditae ciuitates! Quam longe lateque tot regiones terraeque uastatae sunt! Quotiens uicti hinc adque inde uictores! Quid hominum consumtum est uel pugnantium militum uel ab armis uacantium populorum! Quanta uis nauium marinis etiam proeliis obpressa et diuersarum tempestatum uarietate submersa est! Si enarrare uel commemorare conemur, nihil aliud quam scriptores etiam nos erimus historiae. Tunc magno metu	Then in the Punic Wars, when victory long hung doubtful and uncertain between the two empires, and two very powerful peoples were driving their strongest and richest assaults against each other, how many smaller kingdoms were crushed! What great and famous cities were destroyed, how many communities afflicted, how many ruined! How far and wide so many regions and lands were laid waste! How often the conquered, on this side and that, became conquerors! What numbers of human beings were consumed, both soldiers fighting and peoples taking no part in arms! What a mass of ships was overwhelmed in sea battles too, 38 The Sibylline Books, a collection of prophetic verses kept at Rome and consulted in times of crisis.

LATIN

perturbata Romana ciuitas ad remedia uana et ridenda currebat. Instaurati sunt ex auctoritate librorum Sibyllinorum ludi saeculares, quorum celebritas inter centum annos fuerat instituta felicioribusque temporibus memoria neglegente perierat.

Renouarunt etiam pontifices ludos sacros inferis et ipsos abolitos annis retrorsum melioribus. Nimirum ergo, quando renouati sunt, tanta copia morientium ditatos inferos etiam ludere delectabat, cum profecto miseri homines ipsa rabida bella et cruentas animositates funereasque hinc adque inde uictorias magnos agerent ludos daemonum et opimas epulas inferorum. Nihil sane miserabilius primo Punico bello accidit, quam quod ita Romani uicti sunt, ut etiam Regulus ille caperetur, cuius in primo et in altero libro fecimus mentionem, uir plane magnus et uictor antea domitorque Poenorum, qui etiam ipsum primum bellum Punicum confecisset, nisi auiditate nimia laudis et gloriae duriores condiciones, quam ferre possent, fessis Carthaginiensibus imperasset.

Illius uiri et captiuitas inopinatissima et seruitus indignissima, et iuratio fidelissima et mors crudelissima si deos illos non cogit erubescere, uerum est quod aerei sunt et non habent sanguinem.

Nec mala illo tempore grauissima intra moenia defuerunt. Nam exundante nimis ultra morem fluuio Tiberino paene omnia urbis plana subuersa sunt, aliis impetu quasi torrentis inpulsis, aliis uelut stagno diuturno madefactis adque sublapsis. Istam deinde pestem ignis perniciosior subsecutus est, qui correptis circa forum quibusque celsioribus etiam templo Vestae suo familiarissimo non pepercit, ubi ei ueluti uitam perpetuam diligentissima substitutione lignorum non tam honoratae quam damnatae uirgines donare consuerant. Tunc uero illic ignis non tantum uiuebat, sed and sunk by every variety of storm! If we tried to recount or even recall these things, we too would become nothing but writers of history. At that time the Roman city, thrown into turmoil by great fear, ran to remedies futile and ridiculous. On the authority of the Sibylline Books the Secular Games were revived, whose celebration had been instituted at intervals of a hundred years and had lapsed in happier times through neglectful memory.[39]

ENGLISH

The pontiffs also renewed the sacred games for the powers of the underworld, these too abolished in the better years before. No doubt, then, when they were renewed, the underworld, enriched by such an abundance of the dying, delighted even to play games—while in truth wretched human beings, by those very raging wars and bloody hostilities and deathly victories on this side and that, were putting on great games for the demons and rich banquets for the underworld. Nothing more wretched, indeed, happened in the First Punic War than that the Romans were so badly defeated that even the famous Regulus was captured, whom we mentioned in the first and second books—a truly great man, earlier the victor over and tamer of the Carthaginians, who would even have brought the First Punic War itself to an end had he not, out of excessive greed for praise and glory, imposed on the exhausted Carthaginians harsher terms than they could bear.

If that man's captivity, so utterly unexpected, his slavery, so utterly undeserved, his oath, so utterly faithful, and his death, so utterly cruel, do not force those gods to blush, then it is true that they are made of bronze and have no blood.[40]

Nor were very grave evils lacking within the walls at that time. For the Tiber overflowed far beyond its usual bounds, and almost all the low-lying parts of the City were wrecked, some buildings swept away by its force as if by a torrent, others soaked as if by a long-standing pool and so collapsing. Then a fire, more destructive still, followed this disaster: seizing all the taller buildings around the Forum, it did not spare even the temple of Vesta, its own most intimate home, where virgins—not so much honored as con-

39 The Secular Games marked the end of a saeculum, an age reckoned at about a century.
40 Aerei can mean both "of bronze," like their statues, and "of air," like the bodies of demons.

LATIN	ENGLISH
etiam saeuiebat. Cuius impetu exterritae uirgines sacra illa fatalia, quae iam tres, in quibus fuerant, presserant ciuitates, cum ab illo incendio liberare non possent, Metellus pontifex suae quodam modo salutis oblitus inruens ea semiustus abripuit.	demned—had been accustomed to give it, as it were, everlasting life by the most careful replacement of wood. But at that time the fire there was not only living but raging. Terrified by its onslaught, the virgins could not rescue from that blaze those fateful sacred objects, which had already brought down three cities in which they had been; and Metellus the pontiff, somehow forgetful of his own safety, rushed in and snatched them away, half burned himself.[41]
Neque enim uel ipsum ignis agnouit, aut uero erat ibi numen, quod non etiam, si fuisset, fugisset. Homo igitur potius sacris Vestae quam illa homini prodesse potuerunt. Si autem a se ipsis ignem non repellebant, ciuitatem, cuius salutem tueri putabantur, quid contra illas aquas flammasque poterant adiuuare? sicut etiam res ipsa nihil ea prorsus potuisse patefecit. Haec istis nequaquam obicerentur a nobis, si illa sacra dicerent non tuendis his bonis temporalibus instituta, sed significandis aeternis, et ideo, cum ea, quod corporalia uisibiliaque essent, perire contingeret, nihil his rebus minui, propter quas fuerant instituta, et posse ad eosdem usus denuo reparari. Nunc uero caecitate mirabili eis sacris, quae perire possent, fieri potuisse existimant, ut salus terrena et temporalis felicitas ciuitatis perire non posset.	For the fire did not recognize even him, nor indeed was there any divinity there that would not also have fled, even if there had been one. So a man was able to help Vesta's sacred objects, rather than they the man. And if they could not drive the fire away from themselves, what help could they give, against those floods and flames, to the city whose safety they were believed to protect? Indeed, the event itself made plain that they could do nothing at all. These things would never be thrown in their faces by us if they said that those rites were instituted not to protect these temporal goods but to signify eternal ones; and that therefore, when it happened that the rites perished because they were bodily and visible, nothing was diminished of the things for which they had been instituted, and they could be restored again for the same purposes. But as it is, with astonishing blindness, they think that through rites which could perish it could be brought about that the earthly safety and temporal happiness of the city could not perish.
Proinde cum illis etiam manentibus sacris uel salutis contritio uel infelicitas inruisse monstratur, mutare sententiam, quam defendere nequeunt, erubescunt.	Accordingly, since it is shown that even while those rites remained intact, ruin and misfortune broke in upon them all the same, they are ashamed to change an opinion they cannot defend.

THE AFFLICTION OF THE SECOND PUNIC WAR, IN WHICH THE STRENGTH OF BOTH SIDES WAS EXHAUSTED

Hannibal's invasion and Cannae nearly destroyed Rome.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.19 Secundo autem Punico bello nimis longum est commemorare clades duorum populorum tam longe secum lateque pugnantium, ita ut his quoque fatentibus,	As for the Second Punic War, it would take far too long to recount the disasters of two peoples fighting each other so long and over so wide an area—

41 The sacred objects, including the Palladium, were believed to have come from Troy by way of Lavinium and Alba Longa; the fire was in 241 BC.

LATIN

qui non tam narrare bella Romana quam Romanorum imperium laudare instituerunt, similior uicto fuerit ille qui uicit. Hannibale quippe ab Hispania surgente et Pyrenaeis montibus superatis, Gallia transcursa Alpibusque disruptis, tam longo circuitu auctis uiribus cuncta uastando aut subigendo torrentis modo Italiae faucibus inruente quam cruenta proelia gesta sunt, quotiens Romani superati! quam multa ad hostem oppida defecerunt, quam multa capta et obpressa! quam dirae pugnae et totiens Hannibali Romana clade gloriosae! De Canr.ensi autem mirabiliter horrendo malo quid dicam, ubi Hannibal, cum esset crudelissimus, tamen tanta inimicorum atrocissimorum clade satiatus parci iussisse perhibetur?

Unde tres modios anulorum aureorum Carthaginem misit, quo intellegerent tantam in illo proelio dignitatem cecidisse Romanam, ut facilius eam caperet mensura quam numerus, adque hinc strages turbae ceterae tanto utique numerosioris, quanto infimioris, quae sine anulis iacebat, conicienda potius quam nuntianda putaretur. Denique tanta militum inopia secuta est, ut Romani reos facinorum proposita inpunitate colligerent, seruitia libertate donarent adque illis pudendus non tam subpleretur quam instiueretur exercitus. Seruis itaque, immo, ne faciamus iniuriam, iam libertis, pro Romana re publica pugnaturis arma defuerunt. Detracta sunt templis, tamquam Romani dis suis dicerent: Ponite quae tam diu inaniter habuistis, ne forte aliquid utile inde facere possint nostra mancipia, unde nostra numina facere non potuistis.

Tunc etiam stipendiis sufficiendis cum defecisset aerarium, in usus publicos opes uenere priuatae, adeo unoquoque id quod habuit conferente, ut praeter singulos anulos singulasque bullas, miserabilia dignitatis insignia, nihil sibi auri senatus ipse, quanto magis ceteri ordines tribusque relinquerent. Quis ferret istos, si nostris temporibus ad hanc inopiam cogerentur, cum eos modo uix feramus, quando pro superflua uoluptate plura so much so that even those who set out not so much to narrate Rome's wars as to praise Rome's empire admit that the one who won looked more like the one defeated. When Hannibal rose up from Spain, crossed the Pyrenees, ran through Gaul, broke through the Alps, and, his strength growing over so long a circuit, laying waste or subduing everything, burst like a torrent into the narrows of Italy—what bloody battles were fought, how often were the Romans defeated! How many towns went over to the enemy, how many were captured and crushed! What dreadful battles, so often glorious for Hannibal through Roman disaster! And what am I to say of the astonishingly horrible disaster at Cannae, where Hannibal, though he was utterly cruel, is said to have been so sated by such a slaughter of his bitterest enemies that he ordered them to be spared?[42]

ENGLISH

From there he sent three modii of gold rings to Carthage, so that they would understand that so much Roman rank had fallen in that battle that it could more easily be grasped by measure than by number; and that from this the slaughter of the rest of the crowd—as much more numerous as it was lower in rank—lying there without rings, should be thought something to be guessed at rather than reported. Then there followed such a shortage of soldiers that the Romans gathered criminals by offering them immunity and granted freedom to slaves, and with these an army to be ashamed of was not so much reinforced as created. So the slaves—or rather, not to do them an injustice, the freedmen they now were—who were to fight for the Roman commonwealth lacked arms. Arms were taken down from the temples, as if the Romans were saying to their gods: "Put down what you have held so long to no purpose; perhaps our slaves can do something useful with what you, our deities, could not."[43]

Then too, when the treasury ran out of money to pay the troops, private wealth went to public use, each person contributing what he had to such an extent that, apart from a single ring and a single bulla each—pitiful badges of rank—the senate itself kept no gold for itself, and still less the other orders and tribes. Who could put up with these 42 At Cannae in southern Italy, in 216 BC, Hannibal destroyed a huge Roman army.

43 A modius was a Roman dry measure of about nine liters; gold rings were worn by men of senatorial and equestrian rank.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	donantur histrionibus, quam tunc legionibus pro extrema salute conlata sunt?	people if in our times they were reduced to such poverty, when we can hardly put up with them now, when more is lavished on actors for superfluous pleasure than was then contributed to the legions for their very survival?[44]

THE END OF THE SAGUNTINES, WHOM THE ROMAN GODS DID NOT HELP WHEN THEY PERISHED FOR THEIR FRIENDSHIP WITH ROME

Saguntum, Rome's faithful ally, perished while the gods looked on.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.20	Sed in his omnibus belli Punici secundi malis nihil miserabilius ac miserabili querella dignius quam exitium Saguntinorum fuit. Haec quippe Hispaniae ciuitas amicissima populi Romani, dum eidem populo fidem seruat, euersa est. Hinc enim Hannibal fracto foedere Romanorum causas quaesiuit, quibus eos inritaret ad bellum. Saguntum ferociter ergo obsidebat. Quod ubi Romae auditum est, missi legati ad Hannibalem, ut ab eius obsidione discederet. Contemti Carthaginem pergunt querimoniamque deponunt foederis rupti infectoque negotio Romam redeunt. Dum hae morae aguntur, misera illa ciuitas opulentissima, suae rei publicae Romanaeque carissima, octauo uel nono a Poenis mense deleta est. Cuius interitum legere, quanto magis scribere, horroris est. Breuiter tamen eum commemorabo; ad rem quippe quae agitur multum pertinet. Primo fame contabuit; nam etiam suorum cadaueribus a nonnullis pasta perhibetur.	But among all the evils of the Second Punic War, nothing was more pitiable, or more deserving of pitiful lament, than the destruction of the Saguntines. This city in Spain, the closest of friends to the Roman people, was overthrown while it kept faith with that same people. For it was here that Hannibal, having broken the treaty, looked for pretexts to provoke the Romans to war. So he was fiercely besieging Saguntum. When this was heard at Rome, envoys were sent to Hannibal to tell him to abandon the siege. Rebuffed, they went on to Carthage and lodged a complaint about the broken treaty, then returned to Rome with nothing accomplished. While these delays dragged on, that wretched city—very wealthy, and very dear both to its own commonwealth and to Rome's—was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the eighth or ninth month. To read of its end, let alone to write of it, is horrifying. Yet I will recall it briefly, for it bears closely on the matter at hand. First it wasted away from hunger; indeed, some are said to have fed even on the corpses of their own people.[45]
	Deinde omnium fessa rerum, ne saltem captiua in manus Hannibalis perueniret, ingentem rogum publice struxit, in quem ardentem ferro etiam trucidatos omnes se suosque miserunt. Hic aliquid agerent di helluones adque nebulones, sacrificiorum adipibus inhiantes et fallacium diuinationum caligine decipientes; hic aliquid agerent, ciuitati populi Romani amicissimae subuenirent, fidei conseruatione pereuntem perire non sinerent. Ipsi utique medii praefuerunt, cum Romanae rei publicae interiecto foedere copulata est. Custodiens itaque, quod ipsis praesidibus placito iunxerat, fide uinxerat, iuratione constrinxerat, a perfido obsessa obpressa consumta est.	Then, exhausted in every way, and so as at least not to fall into Hannibal's hands as captives, the city built a huge pyre at public expense, and into its flames they all threw themselves and their families, whom they had also struck down with the sword. Here those gluttonous, good-for-nothing gods should have done something—those gods who gape greedily at the fat of sacrifices and deceive people with the fog of their lying divinations. Here they should have done something: come to the aid of the city most friendly to the Ro-

44 The bulla was a protective amulet worn by freeborn Roman children.
45 Saguntum, a city on the east coast of Spain allied with Rome, was besieged and taken by Hannibal in 219 BC, which led to the Second Punic War.

LATIN

Si ipsi di tempestate adque fulminibus Hannibalem postea Romanis proximum moenibus terruerunt longeque miserunt: tunc primum tale aliquid facerent.

Audeo quippe dicere honestius illos pro amicis Romanorum ideo periclitantibus, ne Romanis frangerent fidem, et nullam opem tunc habentibus quam pro ipsis Romanis, qui pro se pugnabant adque aduersus Hannibalem opulenti erant, potuisse tempestate saeuire. Si ergo tutores essent Romanae felicitatis et gloriae, tam graue ab ea crimen Saguntinae calamitatis auerterent; nunc uero quam stulte creditur, dis illis defensoribus Romam uictore Hannibale non perisse, qui Saguntinae urbi non potuerunt, ne pro eius periret amicitia, subuenire! Si Saguntinorum Christianus populus esset et huius modi aliquid pro fide euangelica pateretur, quamquam se ipse nec ferro nec ignibus corrupisset, sed tamen si pro fide euangelica excidium pateretur: ea spe pateretur, qua in Christum crediderat, non mercede breuissimi temporis, sed aeternitatis interminae.

Pro istis autem dis, qui propterea coli perhibentur, propterea colendi requiruntur, ut harum labentium adque transeuntium rerum felicitas tuta sit, quid nobis defensores et excusatores eorum de Saguntinis pereuntibus respondebunt, nisi quod de illo Regulo extincto? Hoc quippe interest, quod ille unus homo, haec tota ciuitas; utriusque tamen interitus causa conseruatio fidei fuit. Propter hanc enim ad hostes et redire ille uoluit, et noluit ista transire. Conseruata ergo prouocat deorum iram fides? an possunt et dis propitiis perire non solum quique homines, uerum etiam integrae ciuitates? Utrum uolunt, eligant. Si enim fidei seruatae irascuntur man people, and not let it perish when it was perishing for keeping faith. They themselves, surely, had presided as intermediaries when it was bound to the Roman commonwealth by the treaty made between them. So, while guarding what it had joined by agreement, bound by its word, and tied fast by oath, with those very gods as overseers, it was besieged, crushed and consumed by a faithless enemy. If those same gods later frightened Hannibal with storm and lightning when he was right at the walls of Rome and drove him far away, that was the time when they should first have done something of the kind.

ENGLISH

For I dare to say that they could more honorably have raged with a storm on behalf of the friends of the Romans—who were in peril precisely because they would not break faith with the Romans, and who then had no help at all—than on behalf of the Romans themselves, who were fighting for their own sake and were well supplied against Hannibal. If, then, these gods were guardians of Roman happiness and glory, they would have averted from it so grave a reproach as the disaster of Saguntum. As it is, how foolish it is to believe that it was thanks to these gods as defenders that Rome did not perish when Hannibal was victorious—gods who could not help the city of Saguntum, so that it would not perish for its friendship with Rome! If the people of Saguntum had been Christian and had suffered something of this kind for the faith of the gospel—though they would not have destroyed themselves either by sword or by fire—yet if they had suffered destruction for the gospel faith, they would have suffered it in the hope with which they had believed in Christ: a hope not of a reward for the briefest time, but of an eternity without end.

But as for these gods, who are said to be worshiped—and whose worship is demanded—precisely so that happiness in these slipping and passing things may be secure, what will their defenders and apologists answer us about the destruction of the Saguntines, except what they answer about the death of Regulus? The only difference is that he was one man, while this was a whole city; but in both cases the cause of death was keeping faith. For it was because of this that he chose to return to the enemy, and that the city refused to go over to the enemy. Does keeping faith, then, provoke illi di, quaerant perfidos, a quibus colantur; si autem etiam illis propitiis multis grauibusque cruciatibus adflicti interire homines ciuitatesque possunt, nullo fructu felicitatis huius coluntur.	the anger of the gods? Or can not only individual men but even whole cities perish while the gods are favorable? Let them choose which they prefer. If those gods are angry at faith kept, let them look for faithless people to worship them. But if, even when the gods are favorable, men and cities can be afflicted with many heavy torments and perish, then they are worshiped to no profit as far as this happiness is concerned.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Desinant igitur suscensere, qui sacris deorum suorum perditis se infelices esse factos putant. Possent enim illis non solum manentibus, uerum etiam fauentibus non sicut modo de miseria murmurare, sed sicut tunc Regulus et Saguntini excruciati horribiliter etiam penitus interire.	So let those who think they have been made unhappy by the loss of their gods' rites stop being indignant. For even if those gods had not only remained with them but also shown them favor, they could have—not, as now, grumbled about their misery—but, as Regulus and the Saguntines did then, been horribly tortured and utterly destroyed.

HOW UNGRATEFUL THE CITY OF ROME WAS TO SCIPIO, ITS DELIVERER, AND WHAT ITS MORALS WERE AT THE TIME SALLUST DESCRIBES AS ITS BEST

Rome exiled Scipio, its savior, and Asian luxury began to corrupt it.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.21 Porro inter secundum et postremum bellum Carthaginiense, quando Sallustius optimis moribus et maxima concordia dixit egisse Romanos (multa enim praetereo suscepti operis modum cogitans), eodem ipso ergo tempore morum optimorum maximaeque concordiae Scipio ille Romae Italiaeque liberator eiusdemque belli Punici secundi tam horrendi, tam exitiosi, tam periculosi praeclarus mirabilisque confector, uictor Hannibalis domitorque Carthaginis, cuius ab adulescentia uita describitur dis dedita templisque nutrita, inimicorum accusationibus cessit carensque patria, quam sua uirtute saluam et liberam reddidit, in oppido Linternensi egit reliquam conpleuitque uitam, post insignem suum triumphum nullo illius urbis captus desiderio, ita ut iussisse perhibeatur, ne saltem mortuo in ingrata patria funus fieret. Deinde tunc primum per Gn. Manlium proconsulem de Gallograecis triumphantem Asiatica luxuria Romam omni hoste peior inrepsit.	Next, between the second and the last Carthaginian war—the period when, according to Sallust, the Romans lived with the best morals and the greatest concord (for I pass over much, mindful of the limits of the work I have undertaken)—in that very period, then, of the best morals and the greatest concord, the great Scipio gave way to the accusations of his enemies. He was the liberator of Rome and Italy; the illustrious and wonderful finisher of that Second Punic War, so horrifying, so ruinous, so dangerous; the conqueror of Hannibal and tamer of Carthage; a man whose life from his youth is described as devoted to the gods and nurtured in their temples. Deprived of the fatherland that his own courage had made safe and free, he spent and ended the rest of his life in the town of Liternum. After his famous triumph he felt no longing for that city—so much so that he is said to have ordered that not even his funeral be held, once he was dead, in his ungrateful fatherland. It was then, too, that for the first time Asiatic luxury, worse than any enemy, crept into Rome, through the proconsul Gnaeus Manlius, who celebrated a triumph over the Galatians.[46]

LATIN

Tunc enim primum lecti aerati et pretiosa stragula uisa perhibentur; tunc inductae in conuiuia psaltriae et alia licentiosa nequitia. Sed nunc de his malis, quae intolerabiliter homines patiuntur, lion de his, quae libenter faciunt, dicere institui. Unde illud magis, quod de Scipione commemoraui, quod cedens inimicis extra patriam, quam liberauit, mortuus est, ad praesentem pertinet disputationem, quod ei Romana numina, a quorum templis auertit Hannibalem, non reddiderunt uicem, quae propter istam tantummodo coluntur felicitatem. Sed quia Sallustius eo tempore ibi dixit mores optimos fuisse, propterea hoc de Asiana luxuria commemorandum putaui, ut intellegatur etiam illud a Sallustio in conparationem aliorum temporum dictum, quibus temporibus peiores utique in grauissimis discordiis mores fuerunt.

Nam tunc, id est inter secundum et postremum bellum Carthaginiense, lata est etiam lex illa Voconia, ne quis heredem feminam faceret, nec unicam filiam. Qua lege quid iniquius dici aut cogitari possit, ignoro. Verum tamen toto illo interuallo duorum bellorum Punicorum tolerabilior infelicitas fuit. Bellis tantummodo foris conterebatur exercitus, sed uictoriis consolabatur; domi autem nullae, sicut alias, discordiae saeuiebant. Sed ultimo bello Punico uno impetu alterius Scipionis, qui ob hoc etiam ipse Africani cognomen inuenit, aemula imperii Romani ab stirpe deleta est, ac deinde tantis malorum aggeribus obpressa Romana res publica, ut prosperitate ac securitate rerum, unde nimium corruptis moribus mala illa congesta sunt, plus nocuisse monstretur tam cito euersa, quam prius nocuerat tam diu aduersa Carthago.

Hoc toto tempore usque ad Caesarem Augustum, qui uidetur non adhuc uel ipsorum opinione gloriosam, sed contentiosam et exitiosam et plane iam eneruem ac languidam libertatem omni modo extorsisse Romanis et

ENGLISH

For it was then, it is said, that bronze-fitted couches and costly coverlets were first seen; then that female harp-players and other licentious vices were brought into banquets. But my purpose now is to speak of the evils that people suffer against their will, not of those they commit willingly. So what I recalled about Scipio—that, yielding to his enemies, he died outside the fatherland he had liberated—bears more on the present discussion: the Roman divinities, whose temples he had kept Hannibal away from, did not repay him in kind, though they are worshiped only for the sake of this kind of happiness. But because Sallust said that morals at that time were at their best, I thought I should mention this point about Asiatic luxury, so that it may be understood that Sallust too said this by comparison with other times—times in which morals were certainly worse, amid the most grievous discords.

For it was then—that is, between the second and the last Carthaginian war—that the Voconian law too was passed, forbidding anyone to make a woman his heir, not even an only daughter. What could be said or thought more unjust than this law, I do not know. Still, throughout that whole interval between the two Punic wars, unhappiness was more bearable. The army was worn down only by wars abroad, but it was consoled by victories; and at home no discords raged, as they did at other times. But in the last Punic War, in a single onslaught by the other Scipio—who for this reason likewise acquired the surname Africanus—Rome's rival for empire was destroyed root and branch. After that, the Roman commonwealth was overwhelmed by such mountains of evils that Carthage, by being destroyed so quickly, can be shown to have done more harm than it had earlier done by being an enemy for so long. For from the prosperity and security that followed, morals were thoroughly corrupted, and those evils were heaped up.[47]

Throughout this whole period up to Caesar Augustus—who seems to have wrested from the Romans, by every means, a liberty that was no longer glorious even in their own opinion, but 46 Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus defeated Hannibal at Zama in 202 BC; he withdrew to Liternum in Campania and died there around 183 BC. Gnaeus Manlius Vulso celebrated his triumph over the Galatians of Asia Minor in 187 BC.

47 The Voconian law dates from 169 BC. The "other Scipio" is Scipio Aemilianus, who destroyed Carthage in 146 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ad regale arbitrium cuncta reuocasse et quasi morbida uetustate conlapsam ueluti instaurasse ac renouasse rem publicam; toto ergo isto tempore omitto ex aliis adque aliis causis etiam adque etiam bellicas clades et Numantinum foedus horrenda ignominia maculosum; uolauerant enim pulli de cauea et Mancino consuli, ut aiunt, augurium malum fecerant; quasi per tot annos, quibus illa exigua ciuitas Romanum circumsessa exercitum adflixerat ipsique Romanae rei publicae terrori esse iam coeperat, alii contra eam alio augurio processerunt.	quarrelsome, ruinous, and by now plainly enervated and feeble; to have brought everything back under a king's discretion; and, so to speak, to have restored and renewed a commonwealth that had collapsed from diseased old age—throughout that whole period, then, I pass over the military disasters that came again and again from one cause or another. I pass over the treaty of Numantia, stained with horrifying disgrace. The chickens, you see, had flown out of their cage and, as they say, had given the consul Mancinus a bad omen—as if, during all the years in which that small city, though besieged, had battered the Roman army and had already begun to be a terror to the Roman commonwealth itself, the other commanders had marched against it under a different omen.[48]

THE EDICT OF MITHRIDATES ORDERING THE DEATH OF ALL ROMAN CITIZENS FOUND IN ASIA

Mithridates had all Romans in Asia murdered on one day.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.22 Sed haec, inquam, omitto, quamuis illud nequaquam tacuerim, quod Mithridates rex Asiae ubique in Asia peregrinantes ciues Romanos adque innumerabili copia suis negotiis intentos uno die occidi iussit; et factum est. Quam illa miserabilis rerum facies erat, subito quemque, ubicumque fuisset inuentus, in agro in uia in oppido, in domo in uico in foro, in templo in lecto in conuiuio inopinate adque inpie fuisse trucidatum! Quis gemitus morientium, quae lacrimae spectantium, fortasse etiam ferientium fuerunt! Quam dura necessitas hospitum non solum uidendi nefarias illas caedes domi suae, uerum etiam perpetrandi, ab illa blanda comitate humanitatis repente mutatis uultibus ad hostile negotium in pace peragendum, mutuis dicam omnino uulneribus, cum percussus in corpore et percussor in animo feriretur! Num et isti omnes auguria contemserant?	But these things, I say, I pass over—though I would by no means keep silent about this: that Mithridates, king of Asia, ordered all the Roman citizens living abroad anywhere in Asia, who were there in countless numbers attending to their business, to be killed on a single day; and it was done. How pitiful a sight that was: everyone suddenly, wherever he happened to be found—in the field, on the road, in town, at home, in the street, in the forum, in a temple, in bed, at a banquet—unexpectedly and impiously slaughtered! What groans of the dying there were, what tears of those looking on—perhaps even of those striking the blows! How harsh the compulsion on the hosts, not only to see those abominable murders in their own houses but even to commit them, their faces suddenly changing from the gracious kindliness of hospitality to carry out an enemy's work in time of peace—with wounds, I should say, entirely mutual, since the one struck was wounded in body and the striker in mind! Had all these men, too, despised the auguries?[49]
Num deos et domesticos et publicos, cum de sedibus suis ad illam inremeabilem peregrinationem profecti sunt,	Did they have no gods, household or public, to consult when they set out from their homes on 48 In 137 BC the consul Gaius Hostilius Mancinus, defeated before Numantia in Spain, concluded a humiliating treaty that the senate repudiated. Romans took omens from the feeding of sacred chickens.

49 Mithridates VI, king of Pontus, ordered the massacre of Romans and Italians in the province of Asia in 88 BC.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	quos consulerent, non habebant? Hoc si ita est, non habent quur isti in hac causa de nostris temporibus conquerantur; olim Romani haec uana contemnunt. Si autem consuluerunt, respondeatur, quid ista profuerunt, quando per humanas dumtaxat leges nemine prohibente licuerunt.	that journey from which there was no return? If so, these people have no reason to complain about our times on this score: the Romans long ago despised these vain things. But if they did consult them, let them answer what good these things did, at a time when they were lawful—at least as far as human laws went—and no one forbade them.

THE INTERNAL EVILS THAT TROUBLED THE ROMAN COMMONWEALTH, PRECEDED BY A PORTENT: THE MADNESS OF ALL THE ANIMALS THAT SERVE HUMAN BEINGS

A portent of maddened animals preceded the Social War.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.23	Sed iam illa mala breuiter, quantum possumus, commemoremus, quae quanto interiora, tanto miseriora exstiterunt: discordiae ciuiles uel potius inciuiles, nec iam seditiones, sed etiam ipsa bella urbana, ubi tantus sanguis effusus est, ubi partium studia non contionum dissensionibus uariisque uocibus in alterutrum, sed plane iam ferro armisque saeuiebant; bella socialia, bella seruilia, bella ciuilia quantum Romanum cruorem fuderunt, quantam Italiae uastationem desertionemque fecerunt! Namque antequam se aduersus Romam sociale Latium commoueret, cuncta animalia humanis usibus subdita, canes equi, asini boues, et quaeque alia pecora sub hominum dominio fuerunt, subito efferata et domesticae lenitatis oblita relictis tectis libera uagabantur et omnem non solum aliorum, uerum etiam dominorum auersabantur accessum, non sine exitio uel periculo audentis, si quis de proximo urgeret.	But now let us briefly recall, as far as we can, those evils which were the more wretched the more internal they were: civil discords—or rather uncivil ones—no longer mere riots but actual wars within the City, where so much blood was shed, where party passions raged no longer through disputes in the assemblies and shouts hurled back and forth, but now openly with sword and weapons. The Social Wars, the Slave Wars, the civil wars—how much Roman blood they shed, how much devastation and depopulation of Italy they caused! For before the allies in Latium rose against Rome, all the animals subject to human use—dogs, horses, donkeys, oxen, and whatever other livestock were under human control—suddenly turned wild and, forgetting their domestic gentleness, left their shelters and roamed free. They shunned every approach, not only of strangers but even of their own masters, and anyone who dared to press on them at close quarters met death or danger.[50]
	Quanti mali signum fuit, si hoc signum fuit, quod tantum malum fuit, si etiam signum non fuit! Hoc si nostris temporibus accidisset, rabidiores istos quam sua illi animalia pateremur.	Of what great evil was this a sign, if it was a sign—and how great an evil it was in itself, even if it was no sign! Had this happened in our times, we would have to endure these people raging more madly than those Romans endured their animals.

THE CIVIL STRIFE STIRRED UP BY THE GRACCHAN REVOLTS

The Gracchi's land reforms began the civil bloodshed.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.24	Initium autem ciuilium malorum fuit seditiones Gracchorum agrariis legibus excitatae. Volebant enim agros populo diuidere, quos nobilitas perperam	The beginning of the civil evils was the riots of the Gracchi, stirred up by their agrarian laws. For they wanted to divide among the people the lands

50 The Social War (91–88 BC) was fought between Rome and its Italian allies (socii), who demanded Roman citizenship.

LATIN

possidebat. Sed iam uetustam iniquitatem audere conuellere periculosissimum, immo uero, ut res ipsa docuit, perniciosissimum fuit. Quae funera facta sunt, cum prior Gracchus occisus est! quae etiam, cum alius frater eius non longo interposito tempore! Neque enim legibus et ordine potestatum, sed turbis armorumque conflictibus nobiles ignobilesque necabantur. Post Gracchi alterius interfectionem L. Opimius consul, qui aduersus eum intra Urbem arma commouerat eoque cum sociis obpresso et extincto ingentem ciuium stragem fecerat, cum quaestionem haberet iam iudiciaria inquisitione ceteros persequens, tria milia hominum occidisse perhibetur. Ex quo intellegi potest, quantam multitudinem mortium habere potuerit turbidus conflictus armorum, quando tantam habuit iudiciorum uelut examinata cognitio.

ENGLISH

that the nobility held wrongfully. But to dare to uproot an injustice already long established was most dangerous—indeed, as events themselves showed, most ruinous. What deaths there were when the elder Gracchus was killed! And again when his brother was killed, not long afterward! For nobles and commoners alike were put to death not by laws and the proper order of authority, but by mobs and armed clashes. After the killing of the second Gracchus, the consul Lucius Opimius—who had taken up arms against him within the City and, having crushed and killed him together with his associates, had made a great slaughter of citizens—is said, when he held an inquiry and pursued the rest by judicial investigation, to have put three thousand men to death. From this one can understand how great a multitude of deaths the turbulent clash of arms could have produced, when the supposedly careful examination of the courts produced so many.[51]

Percussor Gracchi ipsius caput, quantum graue erat, tanto auri pondere consuli uendidit; haec enim pactio caedem praecesserat. In qua etiam occisus est cum liberis M. Fuluius consularis.

Gracchus' killer sold his head to the consul for its weight in gold; for that bargain had been struck before the murder. In this slaughter the former consul Marcus Fulvius was also killed, together with his children.[52]

THE TEMPLE OF CONCORD, BUILT BY DECREE OF THE SENATE ON THE SCENE OF RIOTS AND KILLINGS

The senate built a temple of Concord on the site of a massacre.

LATIN

3.25 Eleganti sane senatus consulto eo ipso loco, ubi funereus tumultus ille commissus est, ubi tot ciues ordinis cuiusque ceciderunt, aedes Concordiae facta est, ut Gracchorum poenae testis contionantium oculos feriret memoriamque conpungeret. Sed hoc quid aliud fuit quam inrisio deorum, illi deae templum construere, quae si esset in ciuitate, non tantis dissensionibus dilacerata conrueret? Nisi forte sceleris huius rea Concordia, quia deseruerat animos ciuium, meruit in illa aede tamquam in carcere includi. Quur enim, si rebus gestis congruere uoluerunt, non ibi potius aedem Discordiae fabricarunt? An ulla ratio redditur, quur Concordia dea sit, et Discordia dea non sit, ut secundum Labeonis distinctionem bona sit ista, illa uero mala? Nec ipse aliud secutus uidetur quam quod aduertit Romae etiam Febri, sicut Saluti, templum constitutum.

ENGLISH

A fine decree of the senate indeed: on the very spot where that deadly riot took place, where so many citizens of every rank fell, a temple of Concord was built, so that, as a witness to the punishment of the Gracchi, it might strike the eyes of those who addressed the people and prick their memory. But what was this but a mockery of the gods—to build a temple to that goddess who, if she had been present in the city, would not have let it collapse, torn apart by such dissensions? Unless perhaps Concord, guilty of this crime for having deserted the citizens' hearts, deserved to be shut up in that temple as in a prison. For if they wanted to fit the facts, why did they not build a temple of Discord there instead? Or is any reason given why 51 Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, tribune in 133 BC, and his brother Gaius, killed in 121 BC, proposed laws redistributing public land.

52 Marcus Fulvius Flaccus, consul in 125 BC, was Gaius Gracchus' chief ally.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	Concord should be a goddess and Discord not, so that, according to Labeo's distinction, the one is good and the other bad? He himself seems to have followed nothing but his observation that at Rome a temple had been set up to Fever as well as to Health.
Eo modo igitur non solum Concordiae, uerum etiam Discordiae constitui debuit. Periculose itaque Romani tam mala dea irata uiuere uoluerunt nec Troianum excidium recoluerunt originem ab eius offensione sumsisse. Ipsa quippe quia inter deos non fuerat inuitata, trium dearum litem aurei mali subpositione commenta est; unde rixa numinum et Venus uictrix, et rapta Helena et Troia deleta. Quapropter, si forte indignata, quod inter deos in Urbe nullum templum habere meruit, ideo iam turbabat tantis tumultibus ciuitatem, quanto atrocius potuit inritari, cum in loco illius caedis, hoc est in loco sui operis, aduersariae suae constitutam aedem uideret!	In the same way, then, a temple ought to have been set up not only to Concord but also to Discord. So the Romans chose to live dangerously with so evil a goddess angry at them, and did not recall that the destruction of Troy had its origin in offending her. For because she had not been invited among the gods, she contrived a quarrel among three goddesses by slipping in a golden apple. Hence the strife of divinities, Venus victorious, Helen carried off, and Troy destroyed. So if perhaps, indignant that she had not been deemed worthy of any temple among the gods in the City, she was already troubling the city with such great riots, how much more fiercely could she be provoked when she saw a temple to her adversary built on the site of that slaughter—that is, on the site of her own handiwork![53]
Haec uana ridentibus nobis illi docti sapientesque stomachantur, et tamen numinum bonorum malorumque cultores de hac quaestione Concordiae Discordiaeque non exeunt, siue praetermiserint harum dearum cultum eisque Febrem Bellonamque praetulerint, quibus antiqua fana fecerunt, siue et istas coluerint, cum sic eos discedente Concordia Discordia saeuiens usque ad ciuilia bella perduxerit.	When we laugh at these vanities, those learned and wise men are indignant; and yet the worshipers of good and bad divinities cannot get out of this question of Concord and Discord. Either they neglected the worship of these goddesses and preferred Fever and Bellona, to whom they built ancient shrines; or they worshiped these as well—since, as Concord departed, Discord raged and led them all the way to civil wars.

THE VARIOUS KINDS OF WAR THAT FOLLOWED THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE OF CONCORD

Seditions, the Social War, slave revolts and piracy followed the temple of Concord.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.26 Praeclarum uero seditionis obstaculum aedem Concordiae, testem caedis suppliciique Gracchorum, contionantibus obponendam putarunt. Quantum ex hoc profecerint, indicant secuta peiora. Laborarunt enim deinceps contionatores non exemplum deuitare Gracchorum, sed superare propositum, L. Saturninus tribunus plebis et G. Seruilius praetor et multo post M. Drusus, quorum omnium seditionibus caedes primo iam tunc grauissimae, deinde socialia bella exarserunt,	A splendid obstacle to sedition, they thought, to set a temple of Concord, witness to the slaughter and punishment of the Gracchi, before the eyes of those who addressed the people! How much they gained by it is shown by the worse things that followed. For from then on the popular speakers strove not to avoid the example of the Gracchi but to outdo their program: Lucius Saturninus, tribune of the plebs, Gaius Servilius, praetor, and 53 In the myth, Discord (Eris), not invited to the wedding of Peleus and Thetis, threw down a golden apple "for the fairest"; Paris awarded it to Venus, who gave him Helen.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	quibus Italia uehementer adflicta et ad uastitatem mirabilem desertionemque perducta est. Bellum deinde seruile successit et bella ciuilia. Quae proelia commissa sunt, quid sanguinis fusum, ut omnes fere Italae gentes, quibus Romanum maxime praepollebat imperium, tamquam saeua barbaries domarentur!	much later Marcus Drusus. Through the seditions of all these men, first very grievous slaughters broke out even then, and afterward the Social Wars flared up, by which Italy was severely afflicted and reduced to astonishing devastation and depopulation. Then came the Slave War, and the civil wars. What battles were fought, what blood was shed, so that nearly all the peoples of Italy, on whom the power of the Roman empire chiefly rested, were subdued as if they were some savage foreign race![54]
	Iam ex paucissimis, hoc est minus quam septuaginta, gladiatoribus quem ad modum bellum seruile contractum sit, ad quantum numerum et quam acrem ferocemque peruenerit, quos ille numerus imperatores populi Romani superauerit, quas et quo modo ciuitates regionesque uastauerit, uix qui historiam conscripserunt satis explicare potuerunt. Neque id solum fuit seruile bellum, sed et Macedoniam prouinciam prius seruitia depopulata sunt et deinde Siciliam oramque maritimam. Quanta etiam et quam horrenda commiserint primo latrocinia, deinde ualida bella piratarum, quis pro magnitudine rerum ualeat eloqui?	Now, how the Slave War was started by a very few gladiators—that is, fewer than seventy—what numbers it reached, how fierce and savage it became, which generals of the Roman people that host defeated, which cities and regions it laid waste and how: even those who wrote its history have scarcely been able to set it out adequately. Nor was that the only slave war: bands of slaves had earlier ravaged the province of Macedonia, and then Sicily and the seacoast. And who could describe, as their magnitude deserves, how many and how horrifying were the deeds committed first in the raids and then in the full-scale wars of the pirates?[55]

THE CIVIL WAR OF MARIUS AND SULLA

Marius and Sulla filled Rome with slaughter in turn.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.27	Cum uero Marius ciuili sanguine iam cruentus multis aduersarum sibi partium peremtis uictus Urbe profugisset, uix paululum respirante ciuitate, ut uerbis Tullianis utar, superauit postea Cinna cum Mario. Tum uero clarissimis uiris interfectis lumina ciuitatis extincta sunt. Ultus est huius uictoriae crudelitatem postea Sylla, ne dici quidem opus est quanta deminutione ciuium et quanta calamitate rei publicae. De hac enim uindicta, quae perniciosior fuit, quam si scelera quae puniebantur inpunita relinquerentur, ait et Lucanus: Excessit medicina modum nimiumque secuta est, Qua morbi duxere manum. Periere nocentes; Sed cum iam soli possent superesse nocentes.	When Marius, already bloodied with the blood of citizens after killing many of the opposing party, had been defeated and fled the City, then—to use Cicero's words—"the city had scarcely begun to breathe again a little when afterward Cinna, with Marius, prevailed. Then indeed, with the most illustrious men killed, the lights of the city were put out." Afterward Sulla avenged the cruelty of this victory—with what loss of citizens and what disaster to the commonwealth, there is no need even to say. For about this vengeance, which was more ruinous than if the crimes being punished had been left unpunished, Lucan too says: "The cure went beyond all measure and followed too far where the disease led the hand. The guilty per-

54 Lucius Appuleius Saturninus and Gaius Servilius Glaucia were killed in 100 BC; the tribune Marcus Livius Drusus was murdered in 91 BC, setting off the Social War.
55 The revolt led by the gladiator Spartacus lasted from 73 to 71 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	ished—but only when none but the guilty could be left alive."[56]
Illo bello Mariano adque Syllano exceptis his, qui foris in acie ceciderunt, in ipsa quoque Urbe cadaueribus uici plateae fora, theatra templa conpleta sunt, ut difficile iudicaretur, quando uictores plus funerum ediderint, utrum prius ut uincerent, an postea quia uicissent; cum primum uictoria Mariana, quando de exilio se ipse restituit, exceptis passim quaqua uersum caedibus factis caput Octauii consulis poneretur in rostris, Caesares a Fimbria domibus trucidarentur suis, duo Crassi pater et filius in conspectu mutuo mactarentur, Baebius et Numitorius unco tracti sparsis uisceribus interirent, Catulus hausto ueneno se manibus inimicorum subtraheret, Merula flamen Dialis praecisis uenis Ioui etiam suo sanguine litaret. In ipsius autem Marii oculis continuo feriebantur, quibus salutantibus dexteram porrigere noluisset.	In that war of Marius and Sulla, apart from those who fell in battle outside, in the City itself the streets, squares, forums, theaters and temples were filled with corpses, so that it was hard to judge when the victors caused more deaths—before, in order to win, or afterward, because they had won. First, at Marius' victory, when he restored himself from exile, besides the killings carried out everywhere in every direction, the head of the consul Octavius was displayed on the Rostra; the Caesars were butchered by Fimbria in their own homes; the two Crassi, father and son, were slaughtered in each other's sight; Baebius and Numitorius were dragged with a hook and died with their entrails strewn about; Catulus drank poison to escape his enemies' hands; and Merula, the flamen of Jupiter, opened his veins and offered even his own blood in sacrifice to Jupiter. And right before Marius' own eyes men were cut down on the spot if, when they greeted him, he had refused to hold out his right hand to them.[57]

WHAT SULLA'S VICTORY WAS LIKE, AS AVENGER OF MARIUS' CRUELTY

Sulla's victory brought proscriptions and massacres in peacetime.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.28 Syllana uero uictoria secuta, huius uidelicet uindex crudelitatis, post tantum sanguinem ciuium, quo fuso fuerat conparata, finito iam bello inimicitiis uiuentibus crudelius in pace grassata est. Iam etiam post Marii maioris pristinas ac recentissimas caedes additae fuerant aliae grauiores a Mario iuuene adque Carbone earundem partium Marianarum, qui Sylla inminente non solum uictoriam, uerum etiam ipsam desperantes salutem cuncta suis aliis caedibus inpleuerunt. Nam praeter stragem late per diuersa diffusam obsesso etiam senatu de ipsa curia, tamquam de carcere, producebantur ad gladium. Mucius Scaeuola pontifex, quoniam nihil aput Romanos templo Vestae sanctius habebatur, aram ipsam amplexus occisus est, ignemque illum, qui perpetua uirginum cura semper ardebat, suo paene sanguine extinxit.	Then followed Sulla's victory—the avenger, to be sure, of this cruelty. After so much citizens' blood, by the shedding of which it had been won, with the war now over but the enmities still alive, it ran riot even more cruelly in peace. Already, after the earlier and the most recent slaughters of the elder Marius, others more grievous had been added by the younger Marius and by Carbo, of the same Marian party. With Sulla approaching, despairing not only of victory but even of their own survival, they filled everything with fresh slaughters of their own. For besides the carnage spread far and wide in various places, they even besieged the senate, and men were led out of the senate house itself, as if out of a prison, to the sword. Mucius Scaevola, the pontiff, was killed clinging to the very altar of Vesta—since nothing was held more

56 Cicero, Against Catiline 3.24; Lucan, Civil War 2.142–144.
57 The Rostra was the speakers' platform in the Forum.

LATIN

ENGLISH

sacred among the Romans than her temple—and with his own blood he nearly put out the fire that was always kept burning by the perpetual care of the virgins.[58]

Urbem deinde Sylla uictor intrauit, qui in uilla publica non iam bello, sed ipsa pace saeuiente septem milia deditorum (unde utique inermia) non pugnando, sed iubendo prostrauerat. In Urbe autem tota quem uellet Syllanus quisque feriebat, unde tot funera numerari omnino non poterant, donec Syllae suggereretur sinendos esse aliquos uiuere, ut essent quibus possent imperare qui uicerant. Tunc iam cohibita quae hac adque illac passim furibunda ferebatur licentia iugulandi, tabula illa cum magna gratulatione proposita est, quae hominum ex utroque ordine splendido, equestri scilicet adque senatorio, occidendorum ac proscribendorum duo milia continebat. Contristabat numerus, sed consolabatur modus; nec quia tot cadebant tantum erat maeroris, quantum laetitiae quia ceteri non timebant.

Then Sulla entered the City as victor—the man who, in the Villa Publica, with not war but peace itself now raging, had cut down seven thousand men who had surrendered (and who were therefore certainly unarmed), not by fighting but by giving an order. Throughout the City every Sullan struck down whomever he pleased, so that the deaths could not be counted at all, until it was suggested to Sulla that some should be allowed to live, so that the victors would have people to rule. Then that license to cut throats, which had been rushing madly this way and that in every direction, was checked, and the famous list was posted amid great rejoicing: it contained two thousand men of the two distinguished orders—the equestrian and the senatorial—to be killed and proscribed. The number saddened people, but the limit consoled them; and there was not so much grief because so many were falling as there was joy because the rest no longer had to fear.[59]

Sed in quibusdam eorum, qui mori iussi erant, etiam ipsa licet crudelis ceterorum securitas genera mortium exquisita congemuit. Quendam enim sine ferro laniantium manus diripuerunt, inmanius homines hominem uiuum, quam bestiae solent discerpere cadauer abiectum. Alius oculis effossis et particulatim membris amputatis in tantis cruciatibus diu uiuere uel potius diu mori coactus est. Subhastatae sunt etiam, tamquam uillae, quaedam nobiles ciuitates; una uero, uelut unus reus duci iuberetur, sic tota iussa est trucidari. Haec facta sunt in pace post bellum, non ut acceleraretur obtinenda uictoria, sed ne contemneretur obtenta. Pax cum bello de crudelitate certauit et uicit. Illud enim prostrauit armatos, ista nudatos. Bellum erat, ut qui feriebatur, si posset, feriret; pax autem, non ut qui euaserat uiueret, sed ut moriens non repugnaret.

But in the case of some of those who were ordered to die, even the security of the rest, cruel as it was, groaned at the refined kinds of death. One man was torn apart without any blade by the hands of those mangling him—human beings tearing a living human being more savagely than wild beasts tear a discarded corpse. Another had his eyes gouged out and his limbs cut off piece by piece, and was forced to live a long time in such torments—or rather to die a long time. Some noble cities too were put up for auction like country estates; and one, as if a single defendant were being sent to execution, was ordered to be slaughtered whole. These things were done in peace after the war, not to hasten the winning of victory, but so that the victory won should not be despised. Peace competed with war in cruelty, and won. For war struck down the armed; peace, the defenseless. War meant that whoever was struck might strike back if he could; peace meant not that whoever 58 Quintus Mucius Scaevola, chief pontiff, was killed in 82 BC on the orders of the younger Marius; the sacred fire of Vesta was tended by the Vestal Virgins.

59 The Villa Publica was a public building on the Campus Martius outside the city walls.

LATIN

ENGLISH

had escaped might live, but that he would die without resisting.[60]

A COMPARISON OF THE GOTHIC INVASION WITH THE DISASTERS THE ROMANS SUFFERED FROM THE GAULS OR FROM THE AUTHORS OF THE CIVIL WARS

Rome's civil wars were crueler than the Gallic or the Gothic sack.

LATIN

ENGLISH

3.29 Quae rabies exterarum gentium, quae saeuitia barbarorum huic de ciuibus uictoriae ciuium conparari potest? Quid Roma funestius taetrius amariusque uidit, utrum olim Gallorum et paulo ante Gothorum inruptionem, an Marii et Syllae aliorumque in eorum partibus uirorum clarissimorum tamquam suorum luminum in sua membra ferocitatem? Galli quidem trucidauerunt senatum, quidquid eius in Urbe tota praeter arcem Capitolinam, quae sola utcumque defensa est, reperire potuerunt; sed in illo colle constitutis auro uitam saltem uendiderunt, quam etsi ferro rapere non possent, possent tamen obsidione consumere: Gothi uero tam multis senatoribus pepercerunt, ut magis mirum sit quod aliquos peremerunt.

What frenzy of foreign nations, what savagery of invading peoples can be compared with this victory of citizens over citizens? What did Rome see that was more deadly, more hideous, more bitter: the irruption of the Gauls long ago and of the Goths a little while ago, or the ferocity of Marius and Sulla and of other most eminent men in their factions—her own lights, as it were—against her own limbs? The Gauls, it is true, slaughtered the senate, or whatever of it they could find anywhere in the City apart from the Capitoline citadel, which alone was defended after a fashion. But to those stationed on that hill they at least sold their lives for gold—lives which, even if they could not seize them with the sword, they could still have worn away by siege. The Goths, on the other hand, spared so many senators that it is more surprising that they killed any at all.[61]

At uero Sylla uiuo adhuc Mario ipsum Capitolium, quod a Gallis tutum fuit, ad decernendas caedes uictor insedit, et cum fuga Marius elapsus esset ferocior cruentiorque rediturus, iste in Capitolio per senatus etiam consultum multos uita rebusque priuauit: Marianis autem partibus Sylla absente quid sanctum cui parcerent fuit, quando Mucio ciui senatori pontifici aram ipsam, ubi erant ut aiunt fata Romana, miseris ambienti amplexibus non pepercerunt? Syllana porro tabula illa postrema, ut omittamus alias innumerabiles mortes, plures iugulauit senatores, quam Gothi uel spoliare potuerunt.

But Sulla, while Marius was still alive, occupied as victor the very Capitol that had been safe from the Gauls, in order to decree killings. And when Marius had slipped away in flight, to return fiercer and bloodier, Sulla on the Capitol, even by a decree of the senate, deprived many of their lives and property. As for the Marian faction, in Sulla's absence what was sacred to them, what would they spare, when they did not spare Mucius—a citizen, a senator, a pontiff—as he clasped in a pitiful embrace the very altar where, as they say, the destinies of Rome resided? Moreover, Sulla's last proscription list, to say nothing of countless other deaths, cut the throats of more senators than the Goths were able even to rob.

60 The city slaughtered whole was probably Praeneste, whose male inhabitants Sulla massacred in 82 BC.
61 The Gauls sacked Rome in about 390 BC (traditional date); the Goths under Alaric took the city in AD 410.

THE CHAIN OF VERY MANY AND VERY GRIEVOUS WARS THAT CAME BEFORE THE COMING OF CHRIST

Civil wars ran from Marius and Sulla to Augustus, in whose reign Christ was born.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
3.30	Qua igitur fronte quo corde, qua inpudentia qua insipientia uel potius amentia illa dis suis non inputant, et haec nostro inputant Christo? Crudelia bella ciuilia, omnibus bellis hostilibus, auctoribus etiam eorum fatentibus, amariora, quibus illa res publica nec adflicta, sed omnino perdita iudicata est, longe ante aduentum Christi exorta sunt, et sceleratarum concatenatione causarum a bello Mariano adque Syllano ad bella Sertorii et Catilinae (quorum a Sylla fuerat ille proscriptus, ille nutritus), inde ad Lepidi et Catuli bellum (quorum alter gesta Syllana rescindere, alter defendere cupiebat), inde ad Pompei et Caesaris (quorum Pompeius sectator Syllae fuerat eiusque potentiam uel aequauerat uel iam etiam superauerat; Caesar autem Pompei potentiam non ferebat, sed quia non habebat, quam tamen illo uicto interfectoque transcendit), hinc ad alium Caesarem, qui post Augustus appellatus est, peruenerunt, quo imperante natus est Christus.	With what face, then, with what heart, with what shamelessness, what folly—or rather what madness—do they refuse to blame those evils on their gods, and yet blame these on our Christ? The cruel civil wars—more bitter, as even their own writers admit, than all wars against foreign enemies, wars by which that commonwealth was judged not merely afflicted but utterly ruined—arose long before the coming of Christ. Through a chain of wicked causes they passed from the war of Marius and Sulla to the wars of Sertorius and Catiline (the one had been proscribed by Sulla, the other nurtured by him); from there to the war of Lepidus and Catulus (one wanted to undo Sulla's acts, the other to defend them); from there to the war of Pompey and Caesar. Pompey had been a follower of Sulla and had equaled or even surpassed his power; Caesar could not bear Pompey's power—but only because he did not have it himself—and yet, once Pompey was defeated and killed, he went beyond it. From there they came down to the other Caesar, who was later called Augustus, in whose reign Christ was born.[62]
	Nam et ipse Augustus cum multis gessit bella ciuilia, et in eis etiam multi clarissimi uiri perierunt, inter quos et Cicero, ille disertus artifex rei publicae regendae. Pompei quippe uictorem Gaium Caesarem, qui uictoriam ciuilem clementer exercuit suisque aduersariis uitam dignitatemque donauit, tamquam regni adpetitorem quorundam nobilium coniuratio senatorum uelut pro rei publicae libertate in ipsa curia trucidauit. Huius deinde potentiam multum moribus dispar uitiisque omnibus inquinatus adque corruptus adfectare uidebatur Antonius, cui uehementer pro eadem illa uelut patriae libertate Cicero resistebat. Tunc emerserat mirabilis indolis adulescens ille alius Caesar, illius Gai Caesaris filius adoptiuus, qui, ut dixi, postea est appellatus Augustus.	For Augustus himself also waged civil wars against many, and in them many very distinguished men perished, among them Cicero, that eloquent master of the art of governing the commonwealth. Gaius Caesar, the conqueror of Pompey, who used his victory in the civil war with clemency and granted his opponents their lives and their rank, was cut down in the very senate house, as one who aspired to kingship, by a conspiracy of certain noble senators, supposedly for the liberty of the commonwealth. After that Antony, a man very different in character, defiled and corrupted by every vice, seemed to be reaching for Caesar's power; and Cicero resisted him vehemently, again for that so-called liberty of the fatherland. Then that other Caesar had come forward, a young man of remarkable gifts, the adopted son of Gaius Caesar, who, as I said, was later called Augustus.
	Huic adulescenti Caesari, ut eius potentia contra Antonium nutriretur, Cicero fauebat, sperans eum	Cicero favored this young Caesar, so that his power might be built up against Antony, hoping that once Antony's domination had been driven

LATIN	ENGLISH
depulsa et obpressa Antonii dominatione instauraturum rei publicae libertatem, usque adeo caecus adque inprouidus futurorum, ut ille ipse iuuenis, cuius dignitatem ac potestatem fouebat, et eundem Ciceronem occidendum Antonio quadam quasi concordiae pactione permitteret et ipsam libertatem rei publicae, pro qua multum ille clamauerat, dicioni propriae subiugaret.	off and crushed, he would restore the liberty of the commonwealth. So blind was Cicero, so unable to foresee the future, that the very young man whose rank and power he was fostering both allowed Antony to kill that same Cicero, as part of a kind of pact of concord, and subjected to his own rule the very liberty of the commonwealth on whose behalf Cicero had cried out so loudly.[63]

HOW SHAMELESSLY THOSE WHO ARE NOT ALLOWED TO WORSHIP THE GODS BLAME CHRIST FOR PRESENT TROUBLES, WHEN SUCH GREAT DISASTERS HAPPENED WHILE THE GODS WERE WORSHIPED

Pagans blame Christ for today's troubles but not their gods for far worse ones.

LATIN	ENGLISH
3.31 Deos suos accusent de tantis malis, qui Christo nostro ingrati sunt de tantis bonis. Certe quando illa mala fiebant, calebant arae numinum Sabaeo thure sertisque recentibus halabant, clarebant sacerdotia, fana renidebant, sacrificabatur ludebatur furebatur in templis, quando passim tantus ciuium sanguis a ciuibus non modo in ceteris locis, uerum etiam inter ipsa deorum altaria fundebatur. Non elegit templum, quo confugeret Tullius, quia frustra elegerat Mucius. Hi uero qui multo indignius insultant temporibus Christianis, aut ad loca Christo dicatissima confugerunt, aut illuc eos ut uiuerent etiam ipsi barbari deduxerunt.	Let those who are ungrateful to our Christ for such great blessings accuse their own gods of such great evils. Certainly, when those evils were happening, the altars of the deities were warm, "and breathed with Sabaean incense and fresh garlands"; the priesthoods were held in honor, the shrines gleamed; people sacrificed, held games and worked themselves into frenzies in the temples—at the very time when so much citizen blood was being shed by citizens everywhere, not only in other places but even among the very altars of the gods. Cicero did not choose a temple to flee to, because Mucius had chosen one in vain. But those who with far less justification insult Christian times either fled to the places most dedicated to Christ, or were led there by the invaders themselves so that they might live.[64]
Illud scio et hoc mecum, quisquis sine studio partium iudicat; facillime agnoscit ut omittam cetera quae multa commemoraui et alia multo plura quae commemorare longum putaui;: si humanum genus ante bella Punica Christianam reciperet disciplinam et consequeretur rerum tanta uastatio, quanta illis bellis Europam Africamque contriuit, nullus talium, quales nunc patimur, nisi Christianae religioni mala illa tribuisset. Multo autem minus eorum uoces tolerarentur, quantum adtinet ad Romanos, si Christianae religionis receptionem et diffamationem uel inruptio Gallorum uel Tiberini fluminis igniumque illa depopulatio uel, quod cuncta mala praecedit, bella illa ciuilia sequerentur. Mala etiam alia, quae usque adeo incredibiliter acciderunt, ut	This I know, and anyone who judges without partisanship readily recognizes it with me—to pass over the many things I have already mentioned and the many more that I thought it too long to mention: if the human race had received Christian teaching before the Punic Wars, and such devastation had followed as wore down Europe and Africa in those wars, not one of the sort of people we now have to endure would have attributed those evils to anything but the Christian religion. Still less would their voices be tolerated, as far as the Romans are concerned, if the reception and spread of the Christian religion had been followed by the invasion of the Gauls, or by that devastation by 62 Sertorius, a Marian general, held out in Spain until 72 BC; Catiline led the conspiracy of 63 BC; Lepidus and Catulus, consuls in 78 BC, fought each other the following year.

63 Octavian, Antony and Lepidus formed the Second Triumvirate in 43 BC; Cicero was proscribed and killed that year.
64 The quoted words echo Virgil, Aeneid 1.416–417, on the altars of Venus at Paphos.

LATIN

inter prodigia numerarentur, si Christianis temporibus accidissent, quibus ea nisi Christianis hominibus tamquam crimina obicerent?

Omitto quippe illa, quae magis fuerunt mira quam noxia, boues locutos, infantes nondum natos de uteris matrum uerba quaedam clamasse, uolasse serpentes, feminas et gallinas in masculinum sexum fuisse conuersas et cetera huius modi, quae in eorum libris non fabulosis, sed historicis, seu uera seu falsa sint, non inferunt hominibus perniciem, sed stuporem. Sed cum pluit terra, cum pluit creta, cum pluit lapidibus (non ut grando appellari solet hoc nomine, sed omnino lapidibus), haec profecto etiam grauiter laedere potuerunt. Legimus aput eos Aetnaeis ignibus ab ipso montis uertice usque ad litus proximum decurrentibus ita mare ferbuisse, ut rupes urerentur, ut pices nauium soluerentur. Hoc utique non leuiter noxium fuit, quamuis incredibiliter mirum.

Eodem rursus aestu ignium tanta ui fauillae scripserunt obpletam esse Siciliam, ut Catinensis urbis tecta obruta et pressa dirueret; qua calamitate permoti misericorditer eiusdem anni tributum ei relaxauere Romani. Lucustarum etiam in Africa multitudinem prodigii similem fuisse, cum iam esset populi Romani prouincia, litteris mandauerunt; consumtis enim fructibus foliisque lignorum ingenti adque inaestimabili nube in mare dicunt esse deiectam; qua mortua redditaque litoribus adque hinc aere corrupto tantam ortam pestilentiam, ut in solo regno Masinissae octingenta hominum milia perisse referantur et multo amplius in terris litoribus proximis. Tunc Uticae ex triginta milibus iuniorum, quae ibi erant, decem milia remansisse confirmant. Talis itaque uanitas, qualem ferimus eique respondere conpellimur, quid horum non Christianae religioni tribueret, si temporibus Christianis uideret?

ENGLISH

the flooding of the Tiber and by fire, or—what surpasses all evils—by those civil wars. Other evils, too, happened so incredibly that they were counted among prodigies. If these had happened in Christian times, to whom would they impute them as crimes, if not to Christians?

I pass over the things that were more astonishing than harmful: oxen speaking, unborn infants crying out certain words from their mothers' wombs, serpents flying, women and hens turned into the male sex, and other things of this kind. These, found in their books—books not of fables but of history—whether they are true or false, bring people not destruction but amazement. But when it rained earth, when it rained chalk, when it rained stones (not in the sense that hail is commonly called by that name, but actual stones), these things could certainly do serious harm. We read in their writers that when the fires of Etna ran down from the very summit of the mountain to the nearest shore, the sea boiled so that the rocks were scorched and the pitch of the ships melted. This was surely no slight harm, however incredibly astonishing it was.[65]

Again, from the same blaze of fire, they wrote that Sicily was filled with so great a mass of ash that it buried, crushed and brought down the houses of the city of Catania; moved by this calamity, the Romans mercifully remitted its tribute for that year. They also recorded that in Africa, when it was already a province of the Roman people, there was a multitude of locusts that was like a prodigy. After consuming the fruits and the leaves of the trees, they say, it was cast into the sea in a huge and immeasurable cloud. When it died and was washed back onto the shores, and the air was corrupted as a result, so great a plague arose that in the kingdom of Masinissa alone eight hundred thousand people are reported to have perished, and many more in the lands nearest the coast. At Utica, they affirm, out of the thirty thousand young men who were there, ten thousand were left. Such folly as we have to endure and are compelled to answer—which of these things would it not attribute to the Christian religion, if it saw them in Christian times?[66]

65 Etna: the volcano in eastern Sicily.

66 Masinissa was king of Numidia and Rome's ally (died 148 BC); Utica was a city near Carthage. The plague is dated to 125 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Et tamen dis suis ista non tribuunt, quorum cultum ideo requirunt, ne ista uel minora patiantur, cum ea maiora pertulerint a quibus antea colebantur.	And yet they do not attribute these things to their gods, whose worship they demand back precisely so that they may not suffer these things or even lesser ones—when those who worshiped them before endured greater ones.

Book IV

Why Rome grew great
Not the swarm of pagan gods, but the one true God gives and takes away earthly kingdoms.

WHAT WAS DISCUSSED IN THE FIRST BOOK

Augustine recalls his answer to those who blame Christianity for their troubles and expose their gods as demons.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.1	De ciuitate Dei dicere exorsus prius respondendum putaui eius inimicis, qui terrena gaudia consectantes rebusque fugacibus inhiantes, quidquid in eis triste misericordia potius admonentis Dei quam punientis seueritate patiuntur, religioni increpitant Christianae, quae una est salubris et uera religio.	Having begun to speak about the city of God, I thought I should first answer its enemies. They chase after earthly joys and gape after fleeting things. Whatever grief they suffer in those things, which comes from the mercy of a God who warns rather than the severity of a God who punishes, they lay at the door of the Christian religion, which is the one saving and true religion.
	Et quoniam, cum sit in eis etiam uulgus indoctum, uelut doctorum auctoritate in odium nostrum grauius inritantur, existimantibus inperitis ea, quae suis temporibus insolite acciderint, per alia retro tempora accidere non solere, eorumque opinionem etiam his, qui eam falsam esse nouerunt, ut aduersum nos iusta murmura habere uideantur, suae scientiae dissimulatione firmantibus: de libris, quos auctores eorum ad cognoscendam praeteritorum temporum historiam memoriae mandauerunt, longe aliter esse quam putant demonstrandum fuit et simul docendum deos falsos, quos uel palam colebant uel occulte adhuc colunt, eos esse inmundissimos spiritus et malignissimos ac fallacissimos daemones, usque adeo, ut aut ueris aut fictis etiam, suis tamen criminibus delectentur, quae sibi celebrari per sua festa uoluerunt, ut a perpetrandis damnabilibus factis humana reuocari non possit infirmitas, dum ad haec imitanda uelut diuina praebetur auctoritas.	Among them is also an uneducated crowd, and it is stirred to hate us more fiercely by what passes for the authority of the learned. The unlearned suppose that the unusual things that have happened in their own times did not usually happen in times past. Their opinion is reinforced even by people who know it to be false, who hide what they know so that they may seem to have just grounds for grumbling against us. Therefore it was necessary to show, from the books their own authors committed to memory so that the history of past times might be known, that the case is far otherwise than they think. At the same time it was necessary to teach that the false gods they used to worship openly, or still worship in secret, are the most unclean spirits and the most malignant and deceitful demons. They are so wicked that they delight in their own crimes, whether real or even invented, but still their own, and they wanted these celebrated in their honor at their festivals. As a result, human weakness cannot be held back from committing damnable deeds, since what seems a divine authority is offered for imitating them.
	Haec non ex nostra coniectura probauimus, sed partim ex recenti memoria, quia et ipsi uidimus talia ac talibus numinibus exhiberi, partim ex litteris eorum, qui non tamquam in contumeliam, sed tamquam in honorem deorum suorum ista conscripta posteris reliquerunt, ita ut uir doctissimus aput eos Varro et grauissimae	We have proved these things not from our own conjecture. Partly we drew on recent memory, because we ourselves have seen such things performed, and performed for such deities. Partly we drew on the writings of those who left them on record for posterity, not as if to insult their gods but

LATIN	ENGLISH
auctoritatis, cum rerum humanarum adque diuinarum dispertitos faceret libros, alios humanis, alios diuinis pro sua cuiusque rei dignitate distribuens non saltem in rebus humanis, sed in rebus diuinis ludos scaenicos poneret, cum utique, si tantummodo boni et honesti homines in ciuitate essent, nec in rebus humanis ludi scaenici esse debuissent Quod profecto non auctoritate sua fecit, sed quoniam eos Romae natus et educatus in diuinis rebus inuenit.	as if to honor them. So it was that Varro, a man among them of the greatest learning and the weightiest authority, wrote separate books on human and on divine matters, assigning some books to human affairs and others to divine according to the dignity of each subject. He placed the theatrical shows not even among human matters but among divine ones. Yet surely, if there were only good and honorable people in the city, theatrical shows ought not to have had a place even among human matters. He certainly did not do this on his own authority. Born and raised at Rome, he found them already among the divine matters.[1]
Et quoniam in fine primi libri, quae deinceps dicenda essent, breuiter posuimus et ex his quaedam in duobus consequentibus diximus, expectationi legentium quae restant reddenda cognoscimus.	At the end of the first book we briefly set out what was to be said next, and in the two following books we have said some of it. We recognize, then, that we owe our readers what remains, since they are expecting it.

WHAT THE SECOND AND THIRD BOOKS CONTAIN

Books 2 and 3 covered Rome's moral and material disasters; now Augustine turns to why its empire grew.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.2 Promiseramus ergo quaedam nos esse dicturos aduersus eos, qui Romanae rei publicae clades in religionem nostram referunt, et commemoraturos quaecumque et quantacumque occurrere potuissent uel satis esse uiderentur mala, quae illa ciuitas pertulit uel ad eius imperium prouinciae pertinentes, antequam eorum sacrificia prohibita fuissent; quae omnia procul dubio nobis tribuerent, si iam uel illis clareret nostra religio uel ita eos a sacris sacrilegis prohiberet. Haec in secundo et tertio libro satis, quantum existimo, absoluimus, in secundo agentes de malis morum, quae mala uel sola uel maxima deputanda sunt, in tertio autem de his malis, quae stulti sola perpeti exhorrent, corporis uidelicet externarumque rerum, quae plerumque patiuntur et boni; illa uero mala non dico patienter, sed libenter habent, quibus ipsi fiunt mali.	We had promised, then, to say certain things against those who blame our religion for the disasters of the Roman commonwealth. We also promised to recount whatever evils, and however great, might come to mind or seem enough, that the city or the provinces belonging to its empire suffered before their sacrifices were prohibited. They would undoubtedly attribute all of these to us if our religion had already shone upon them, or had in this way barred them from their sacrilegious rites. I think we have dealt with these matters sufficiently in the second and third books. In the second we treated the evils of morals, which are to be counted the only evils, or the greatest. In the third we treated the evils that fools dread to suffer as if they were the only ones, namely evils of the body and of external things, which the good also often suffer. But the evils by which they themselves become evil, they bear, I will not say patiently, but gladly.
Et quam pauca dixi de sola ipsa ciuitate adque eius imperio! nec inde omnia usque ad Caesarem Augustum. Quid, si commemorare uoluissem et exaggerare illa mala,	And how little I have said about that city alone and its empire! I have not said everything even of that, up to Caesar Augustus. What if I had chosen

1 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), Roman scholar whose Antiquities of Human and Divine Things is Augustine's chief source on Roman religion.

LATIN

quae non sibi inuicem homines faciunt, sicut sunt uastationes euersionesque bellantum, sed ex ipsius mundi elementis terrenis accidunt rebus, quae uno loco Apuleius breuiter stringit in eo libello quem de mundo scripsit, terrena omnia dicens mutationes, conuersiones et interitus habere?

Namque inmodicis tremoribus terrarum, ut uerbis eius utar, dissiluisse humum et interceptas urbes cum populis dicit; abruptis etiam imbribus prolutas totas esse regiones; illas etiam, quae prius fuerant continentes, hospitibus adque aduenis fluctibus insulatas aliasque desidia maris pedestri accessu peruias factas; uentis ac procellis euersas esse ciuitates; incendia de nubibus emicasse, quibus Orientis regiones conflagratae perierunt, et in Occidentis plagis scaturrigines quasdam ac proluuiones easdem strages dedisse; sic ex Aetnae uerticibus quondam effusis crateribus diuino incendio per decliuia torrentis uice flammarum flumina cucurrisse. Si haec adque huius modi, quae habet historia, unde possem, colligere uoluissem, quando finissem, quae illis temporibus euenerunt, antequam Christi nomen ulla istorum uana et uerae saluti perniciosa conprimeret.

Promiseram etiam me demonstraturum, quos eorum mores et quam ob causam Deus uerus ad augendum imperium adiuuare dignatus est, in cuius potestate sunt regna omnia, quamque nihil eos adiuuerint hi, quos deos putant, et potius quantum decipiendo et fallendo nocuerint: unde nunc uideo mihi esse dicendum, et magis de incrementis imperii Romani. Nam de noxia fallacia daemonum, quos uelut deos colebant, quantum malorum inuexerit moribus eorum, in secundo maxime libro non pauca iam dicta sunt. Per omnes autem absolutos tres libros, ubi opportunum uisum est, commendauimus, etiam in ipsis bellicis malis quantum solaciorum Deus per Christi nomen, cui tantum honoris barbari detulerunt praeter bellorum morem, bonis malisque contulerit, quo modo qui facit solem suum oriri super bonos et malos et pluit super iustos et iniustos.

ENGLISH

to recount and dwell on the evils that human beings do not inflict on one another, such as the devastation and destruction caused by warring armies, but that befall earthly things from the elements of the world itself? Apuleius touches on these briefly in one passage of the little book he wrote, On the World, where he says that all earthly things undergo change, upheaval and destruction.[2]

To use his own words, he says that in immense earthquakes the ground has split open and cities have been swallowed up with their peoples. Whole regions have been washed away by sudden downpours. Lands that were once part of the mainland have been made into islands by waves that came as strangers and newcomers, while others, as the sea grew sluggish and withdrew, have become passable on foot. Cities have been overthrown by winds and storms. Fires have flashed from the clouds, and regions of the East were consumed by them and perished, while in western parts gushing springs and floods have wrought the same havoc. And once, when the craters on Etna's summit burst open, rivers of flame ran down its slopes like a torrent of heaven-sent fire. Suppose I had wished to gather these and similar events recorded in history, from wherever I could. These are things that happened in those times, before the name of Christ curbed any of these people's empty practices, which are so ruinous to true salvation. When would I have finished?

I had also promised to show which of their moral qualities the true God, in whose power all kingdoms lie, saw fit to assist in enlarging their empire, and for what reason. I also promised to show how little those they consider gods helped them, and indeed how much harm those gods did them by deceiving and misleading them. This, I see, is what I must now discuss, and especially the growth of the Roman Empire. As for the harmful deceit of the demons they worshiped as gods, and how much evil it brought upon their morals, a good deal has already been said, above all in the second book. Throughout all three completed books, moreover, wherever it seemed appropriate, we have pointed out how much consolation God has granted to good and bad alike, even amid the evils of war, through the name of Christ. The invaders paid that name such honor, contrary to the custom of war. God acted here as the one who "makes his sun rise on the good and the bad, and sends rain on the just and the unjust."[3]

2 Apuleius (2nd century AD), North African Platonist and author of The Golden Ass; On the World is his Latin version of a Greek treatise attributed to Aristotle.

LATIN

ENGLISH

WHETHER THE BREADTH OF AN EMPIRE, WHICH IS WON ONLY BY WARS, SHOULD BE COUNTED AMONG THE GOODS OF THE WISE OR OF THE HAPPY

A vast empire won by war brings no more happiness than great wealth brings an anxious rich man.

LATIN

ENGLISH

4.3 Iam itaque uideamus, quale sit quod tantam latitudinem ac diuturnitatem imperii Romani illis dis audent tribuere, quos etiam per turpium ludorum obsequia et per turpium hominum ministeria se honeste coluisse contendunt. Quamquam uellem prius paululum inquirere, quae sit ratio, quae prudentia, cum hominum felicitatem non possis ostendere, semper in bellicis cladibus et in sanguine ciuili uel hostili, tamen humano cum tenebroso timore et cruenta cupiditate uersantium, ut uitrea laetitia conparetur fragiliter splendida, cui timeatur horribilius ne repente frangatur, de imperii latitudine ac magnitudine uelle gloriari.

Now, then, let us see what grounds they have for daring to attribute the vast extent and long duration of the Roman Empire to those gods. They claim to have worshiped these gods honorably, even through the homage of indecent shows and the services of indecent men. Yet I would first like to ask briefly what reason or what prudence there is in wanting to boast of an empire's breadth and greatness. You cannot show that people are happy when they live constantly amid the disasters of war and in bloodshed. The blood may be that of fellow citizens or of enemies, but it is still human blood, and they live with dark fear and bloodthirsty craving. The joy they acquire is like glass, brittle in its brilliance, and they dread all the more terribly that it may suddenly shatter.

Hoc ut facilius diiudicetur, non uanescamus inani uentositate iactati adque obtundamus intentionis aciem altisonis uocabulis rerum, cum audimus populos regna prouincias; sed duos constituamus homines (nam singulus quisque homo, ut in sermone una littera, ita quasi elementum est ciuitatis et regni, quantalibet terrarum occupatione latissimi), quorum duorum hominum unum pauperem uel potius mediocrem, alium praediuitem cogitemus; sed diuitem timoribus anxium, maeroribus tabescentem, cupiditate flagrantem, numquam securum, semper inquietum, perpetuis inimicitiarum contentionibus anhelantem, augentem sane his miseriis patrimonium suum in inmensum modum adque illis augmentis curas quoque amarissimas aggerantem; mediocrem uero illum re familiari parua adque succincta sibi sufficientem, carissimum suis, cum cognatis uicinis amicis dulcissima pace gaudentem, pietate religiosum, benignum mente, sanum corpore, uita parcum, moribus castum, conscientia securum.

To make this easier to judge, let us not be tossed about by empty bluster and vanish into thin air. Nor should we blunt the edge of our attention with high-sounding words when we hear of "peoples," "kingdoms" and "provinces." Instead, let us take two individuals. Each single person, like a single letter in speech, is in effect an element of a city and of a kingdom, however vast its territory. Let us imagine one of these two as poor, or rather of modest means, and the other as very rich. The rich man is anxious with fears and wasting away with sorrows. He burns with greed, is never secure and always restless, and pants from the endless struggles of his feuds. By these miseries he does increase his estate to an immense degree, but with those increases he also piles up the bitterest cares. The man of modest means, on the other hand, is content with his small and compact household estate. He is dearly loved by his family and enjoys the sweetest peace with relatives, neighbors and friends. He is devout in piety, kindly in mind, sound in body, frugal in life, chaste in conduct and secure in conscience.

3 Matthew 5:45.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Nescio utrum quisquam ita desipiat, ut audeat dubitare quem praeferat. Ut ergo in his duobus hominibus, ita in duabus familiis, ita in duobus populis, ita in duobus regnis regula sequitur aequitatis, qua uigilanter adhibita si nostra intentio corrigatur, facillime uidebimus ubi habitet uanitas et ubi felicitas. Quapropter si uerus Deus colatur eique sacris ueracibus et bonis moribus seruiatur, utile est ut boni longe lateque diu regnent; neque hoc tam ipsis quam illis utile est, quibus regnant. Nam quantum ad ipsos pertinet, pietas et probitas eorum, quae magna Dei dona sunt, sufficit eis ad ueram felicitatem, qua et ista uita bene agatur et postea percipiatur aeterna.

I doubt anyone is so foolish as to dare to hesitate over which of them to prefer. The same rule of fairness that holds for these two individuals holds for two families, for two peoples and for two kingdoms. If our attention is corrected by applying that rule carefully, we shall very easily see where emptiness dwells and where happiness does. Therefore, if the true God is worshiped and served with true rites and good morals, it is beneficial for good men to reign far and wide and for a long time. This benefits not so much the rulers themselves as those over whom they reign. For as far as the rulers are concerned, their piety and integrity, which are great gifts of God, are enough for true happiness, by which this life is lived well and eternal life is received afterward.

In hac ergo terra regnum bonorum non tam illis praestatur quam rebus humanis; malorum uero regnum magis regnantibus nocet, qui suos animos uastant scelerum maiore licentia; his autem, qui eis seruiendo subduntur, non nocet nisi propria iniquitas. Nam iustis quidquid malorum ab iniquis dominis inrogatur, non est poena criminis, sed uirtutis examen. Proinde bonus etiamsi seruiat, liber est; malus autem etiamsi regnet, seruus est, nec unius hominis, sed, quod est grauius, tot dominorum quot uitiorum. De quibus uitiis cum ageret scriptura diuina: A quo enim quis, inquit, deuictus est, huic et seruus addictus est.

On this earth, then, the reign of the good is a benefit not so much to the good themselves as to human affairs. The reign of the wicked, however, does more harm to those who reign, since they lay waste their own souls through their greater freedom to commit crimes. Those who are made subject to them as servants are harmed only by their own wickedness. For whatever evils unjust masters inflict on the just are not the punishment of guilt but the testing of virtue. So the good man is free even if he is a slave, while the wicked man is a slave even if he reigns. And he is the slave not of one man but, what is worse, of as many masters as he has vices. Speaking of these vices, divine Scripture says: "For whatever overcomes a person, to that he is also bound as a slave."[4]

HOW LIKE ROBBERIES KINGDOMS ARE WITHOUT JUSTICE

Without justice, kingdoms are great robberies, as a captured pirate told Alexander the Great.

LATIN

ENGLISH

4.4 Remota itaque iustitia quid sunt regna nisi magna latrocinia? quia et latrocinia quid sunt nisi parua regna? Manus et ipsa hominum est, imperio principis regitur, pacto societatis adstringitur, placiti lege praeda diuiditur. Hoc malum si in tantum perditorum hominum accessibus crescit, ut et loca teneat sedes constituat, ciuitates

Remove justice, and what are kingdoms but great robberies? For what are robberies themselves but little kingdoms? A gang, too, is a band of human beings. It is ruled by a leader's command, held together by a pact of association, and divides its plunder by an agreed law. Suppose this evil grows

4 2 Peter 2:19.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	occupet populos subiuget, euidentius regni nomen adsumit, quod ei iam in manifesto confert non demta cupiditas, sed addita inpunitas. Eleganter enim et ueraciter Alexandro illi Magno quidam conprehensus pirata respondit. Nam cum idem rex hominem interrogaret, quid ei uideretur, ut mare haberet infestum, ille libera contumacia: Quod tibi, inquit, ut orbem terrarum; sed quia id ego exiguo nauigio facio, latro uocor; quia tu magna classe, imperator.	through an influx of desperate men until it holds territory, sets up a base, seizes cities and subjugates peoples. Then it more openly takes on the name of kingdom. That name is now publicly conferred on it not because its greed has been removed but because impunity has been added. A captured pirate gave a witty and truthful answer to the famous Alexander the Great. The king asked the man what he meant by infesting the sea. With defiant frankness he replied: "The same as you mean by infesting the whole world. But because I do it with a small boat, I am called a robber; because you do it with a great fleet, you are called an emperor."[5]

THE RUNAWAY GLADIATORS, WHOSE POWER WAS LIKE ROYAL DIGNITY

A band of runaway gladiators under Spartacus briefly held power like a kingdom.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.5	Proinde omitto quaerere quales Romulus congregauerit, quoniam multum eis consultum est, ut ex illa uita dato sibi consortio ciuitatis poenas debitas cogitare desisterent, quarum metus eos in maiora facinora propellebat, ut deinceps pacatiores essent rebus humanis. Hoc dico, quod ipsum Romanum imperium iam magnum multis gentibus subiugatis ceterisque terribile acerbe sensit, grauiter timuit, non paruo negotio deuitandae ingentis cladis obpressit, quando paucissimi gladiatores in Campania de ludo fugientes magnum exercitum conpararunt, tres duces habuerunt, Italiam latissime et crudelissime uastauerunt. Dicant, quis istos deus adiuuerit, ut ex paruo et contemtibili latrocinio peruenirent ad regnum tantis iam Romanis uiribus arcibusque metuendum. An quia non diu fuerunt, ideo diuinitus negabuntur adiuti? Quasi uero ipsa cuiuslibet hominis uita diuturna est.	So I will not ask what sort of men Romulus gathered together. It was greatly to their advantage that, once they were given a share in a city, they stopped thinking about the punishments they owed for their former life. Fear of those punishments had been driving them on to greater crimes, and now they could be more peaceable toward human society. What I do say is this. The Roman Empire itself was already great, had subjugated many nations and was a terror to the rest. Yet it suffered bitterly, feared gravely, and only with no small effort crushed the threat and avoided a huge disaster when a handful of gladiators escaped from a training school in Campania. They raised a great army, had three generals, and laid waste to Italy far and wide and most cruelly. Let them tell us which god helped these men rise from a small and contemptible band of robbers to a kingdom feared even by Roman forces and strongholds as great as those were. Or will they deny that the gladiators had divine help because they did not last long? As if any human being's life were long![6]
	Isto ergo pacto neminem di adiuuant ad regnandum, quoniam singuli quique cito moriuntur, nec beneficium deputandum est, quod exiguo tempore in unoquoque homine ac per hoc singillatim utique in omnibus uice	On that reckoning, then, the gods help no one to reign, since every individual dies quickly. Nor should something be counted as a benefit if it vanishes like vapor within a short time in each per-

5 The anecdote comes from Cicero's On the Commonwealth, Book 3.

6 The revolt of Spartacus (73–71 BC), led by Spartacus with Crixus and Oenomaus.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uaporis euanescit. Quid enim interest eorum, qui sub Romulo deos coluerunt et olim sunt mortui, quod post eorum mortem Romanum tantum creuit imperium, cum illi aput inferos causas suas agant? utrum bonas an malas, ad rem praesentem non pertinet. Hoc autem de omnibus intellegendum est, qui per ipsum imperium (quamuis decedentibus succedentibusque mortalibus in longa spatia protendatur) paucis diebus uitae suae cursim raptimque transierunt, actuum suorum sarcinas baiulantes.	son, and so, one by one, in all of them. For what does it matter to those who worshiped the gods under Romulus and died long ago that the Roman Empire grew so great after their death? They are pleading their cases in the underworld. Whether those cases are good or bad is not relevant to the present question. And the same must be understood of everyone who has passed hastily and hurriedly through that empire in the few days of their lives, carrying the burden of their deeds. This is true even though the empire stretches over long ages, as some mortals die and others take their place.
Sin uero etiam ipsa breuissimi temporis beneficia deorum adiutorio tribuenda sunt, non parum adiuti sunt illi gladiatores: seruilis condicionis uincla ruperunt, fugerunt, euaserunt, exercitum magnum et fortissimum collegerunt, oboedientes regum suorum consiliis et iussis multum Romanae celsitudini metuendi et aliquot Romanis imperatoribus insuperabiles multa ceperunt, potiti sunt uictoriis plurimis, usi uoluptatibus quibus uoluerunt, quod suggessit libido fecerunt, postremo donec uincerentur, quod difficillime factum est, sublimes regnantesque uixerunt. Sed ad maiora ueniamus.	But if even benefits that last only the briefest time are to be credited to the gods' help, those gladiators were helped not a little. They broke the chains of slavery, fled and escaped. They gathered a great and very strong army. Obeying the plans and orders of their kings, they were greatly feared by the mighty Romans and could not be beaten by several Roman generals. They seized a great deal, won very many victories, enjoyed whatever pleasures they wanted and did whatever lust suggested. In the end, until they were defeated, which was achieved only with the greatest difficulty, they lived on the heights as rulers. But let us come to greater things.

THE GREED OF KING NINUS, WHO WAS THE FIRST TO MAKE WAR ON HIS NEIGHBORS IN ORDER TO RULE MORE WIDELY

Ninus of Assyria began wars of conquest, and his long-lasting empire was simply a great robbery.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.6 Iustinus, qui Graecam uel potius peregrinam Trogum Pompeium secutus non Latine tantum, sicut ille, uerum etiam breuiter scripsit historiam, opus librorum suorum sic incipit: Principio rerum gentium nationumque imperium penes reges erat, quos ad fastigium huius maiestatis non ambitio popularis, sed spectata inter bonos moderatio prouehebat. Populi nullis legibus tenebantur; fines imperii tueri magis quam proferre mos erat; intra suam cuique patriam regna finiebantur. Primus omnium Ninus rex Assyriorum ueterem et quasi auitum gentibus morem noua imperii cupiditate mutauit. Hic primus intulit bella finitimis et rudes adhuc ad resistendum populos ad terminos usque Libyae perdomuit. Et paulo post: Ninus, inquit, magnitudinem quaesitae dominationis continua possessione firmauit.	Justin followed Pompeius Trogus in writing a history of the Greek world, or rather of foreign peoples. Like Trogus, he wrote in Latin, but he also wrote in abridged form. He begins his work as follows: "At the beginning of history, rule over peoples and nations lay in the hands of kings. They were raised to the height of this majesty not by courting the populace but by a moderation proven among good men. The peoples were bound by no laws. It was the custom to defend the borders of one's rule rather than to extend them, and each kingdom was confined within its own homeland. The first of all to change the ancient, almost ancestral custom of the nations was Ninus, king of the Assyrians, through a new craving for empire. He was the first to wage war on his neighbors, and he completely subdued peoples still unskilled at resisting, as far as the borders of Libya." And a little later he says: "Ninus made the greatness of the dominion he had won secure by holding it without interruption.[7]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Domitis igitur proximis cum accessione uirium fortior ad alios transiret et proxima quaeque uictoria instrumentum sequentis esset, totius Orientis populos subegit. Qualibet autem fide rerum uel iste uel Trogus scripserit (nam quaedam illos fuisse mentitos aliae fideliores litterae ostendunt), constat tamen et inter alios scriptores regnum Assyriorum a Nino rege fuisse longe lateque porrectum. Tam diu autem perseuerauit, ut Romanum nondum sit eius aetatis. Nam sicut scribunt, qui chronicam historiam persecuti sunt, mille ducentos et quadraginta annos ab anno primo, quo Ninus regnare coepit, permansit hoc regnum, donec transferretur ad Medos. Inferre autem bella finitimis et in cetera inde procedere ac populos sibi non molestos sola regni cupiditate conterere et subdere, quid aliud quam grande latrocinium nominandum est?	"Having subdued his nearest neighbors, he moved on to others, stronger now through the forces he had added. Each victory became the instrument of the next, and so he subjugated the peoples of the whole East." Whatever the reliability of what Justin or Trogus wrote—and other, more trustworthy writings show that they told some falsehoods—other writers agree too that King Ninus extended the Assyrian kingdom far and wide. The Assyrian kingdom lasted so long that the Roman Empire has not yet reached its age. As those who have written chronological history report, it endured for twelve hundred and forty years from the first year of Ninus's reign, until it passed to the Medes. But consider making war on one's neighbors, advancing from there against others, and crushing and subduing peoples who have done one no harm, out of sheer craving for dominion. What else is this to be called but a great robbery?

WHETHER EARTHLY KINGDOMS ARE HELPED OR ABANDONED BY THE AID OF THE GODS IN THEIR RISE AND FALL

Assyria and Persia grew great without Rome's gods, so those gods deserve no credit for Rome.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.7 Si nullo deorum adiutorio tam magnum hoc regnum et prolixum fuit, quare dis Romanis tribuitur Romanum regnum locis amplum temporibusque diuturnum? Quaecumque enim causa est illa, eadem est etiam ista. Si autem et illud deorum adiutorio tribuendum esse contendunt, quaero quorum. Non enim aliae gentes, quas Ninus domuit et subegit, alios tunc colebant deos. Aut si proprios habuerunt Assyrii, quasi peritiores fabros imperii construendi adque seruandi, numquidnam mortui sunt, quando et ipsi imperium perdiderunt, aut mercede non sibi reddita uel alia maiore promissa ad Medos transire maluerunt, adque inde rursus ad Persas Cyro inuitante et aliquid commodius pollicente? Quae gens non angustis Orientis finibus post Alexandri Macedonis regnum magnum locis, sed breuissimum tempore in suo regno adhuc usque perdurat.	If this kingdom was so great and so long-lasting without any help from the gods, why is the Roman kingdom, so broad in space and so long in time, attributed to the Roman gods? Whatever the cause of the one, it is also the cause of the other. But if they contend that the Assyrian kingdom must also be attributed to the gods' help, I ask: which gods? The other nations that Ninus conquered and subjugated did not worship different gods at that time. Perhaps the Assyrians had gods of their own, more skilled craftsmen, so to speak, at building and preserving an empire. Did those gods die when the Assyrians themselves lost their empire? Or were they not paid their wages, or promised greater wages elsewhere, so that they preferred to go over to the Medes? And from there did they go

7 Justin (probably 2nd–3rd century AD) abridged the Philippic Histories of Pompeius Trogus, a historian of Augustus's time. Ninus was the legendary founder of the Assyrian empire.

LATIN

ENGLISH

over again to the Persians, when Cyrus invited them and promised something more advantageous? After the reign of Alexander of Macedon, which was great in extent but very brief in duration, that nation still endures to this day in its own kingdom, within no narrow bounds in the East.[8]

Hoc si ita est, aut infideles di sunt, qui suos deserunt et ad hostes transeunt (quod nec homo fecit Camillus, quando uictor et expugnator aduersissimae ciuitatis Romam, cui uicerat, sensit ingratam, quam tamen postea oblitus iniuriae, memor patriae, a Gallis iterum liberauit), aut non ita fortes sunt, ut deos esse fortes decet, qui possunt humanis uel consiliis uel uiribus uinci; aut si, cum inter se belligerant, non di ab hominibus, sed di ab aliis dis forte uincuntur, qui sunt quarumque proprii ciuitatum: habent ergo et ipsi inter se inimicitias, quas pro sua quisque parte suscipiunt. Non itaque deos suos debuit colere ciuitas magis quam alios, a quibus adiuuarentur sui.

If that is so, the gods are faithless, deserting their own people and going over to the enemy. Not even Camillus, a mere man, did that. He conquered and captured a bitterly hostile city, and then found Rome, for whom he had conquered it, ungrateful. Yet afterward, forgetting the injury and remembering his country, he set it free once more, this time from the Gauls. Otherwise, the gods are not as strong as gods ought to be, since human counsel or force can overcome them. Or perhaps, when they wage war among themselves, gods are overcome not by human beings but by other gods, the particular gods of each city. In that case the gods too have feuds among themselves, and each takes up the cause of his own side. So a city should not have worshiped its own gods rather than other gods who could help its own.[9]

Postremo quoquo modo se habeat deorum iste uel transitus uel fuga, uel migratio uel in pugna defectio, nondum illis temporibus adque in illis terrarum partibus Christi nomen fuerat praedicatum, quando illa regna per ingentes clades bellicas amissa adque translata sunt. Nam post mille ducentos et quod excurrit annos, quando regnum Assyriis ablatum est, si iam ibi Christiana religio aliud regnum praedicaret aeternum et deorum falsorum cultus sacrilegos inhiberet: quid aliud illius gentis uani homines dicerent, nisi regnum, quod tam diu conseruatum est, nulla alia causa nisi suis religionibus desertis et illa recepta perire potuisse? In qua uoce uanitatis, quae poterat esse, isti adtendant speculum suum, et similia conqueri, si ullus in eis pudor est, erubescant.

Finally, however we explain this passing over or flight of the gods, this migration or desertion in battle, the name of Christ had not yet been preached in those times and in those parts of the world when those kingdoms were lost and transferred through enormous disasters of war. After twelve hundred years and more, the kingdom was taken from the Assyrians. Suppose the Christian religion had already been there at that time, preaching another, eternal kingdom and forbidding the sacrilegious worship of false gods. What else would the empty-headed people of that nation have said, except that a kingdom preserved for so long could have perished for no other reason than the abandonment of their own religion and the acceptance of this one? In that empty talk, which could well have been heard, let these people look at themselves as in a mirror. And if they have any shame at all, let them blush to make similar complaints.

Quamquam Romanum imperium adflictum est potius quam mutatum, quod et aliis ante Christi nomen

And yet the Roman Empire has been afflicted rather than changed. This also happened to it at 8 Cyrus the Great founded the Persian empire by overthrowing the Medes in the 6th century BC; the Persia of Augustine's day was the Sassanid empire.

9 Marcus Furius Camillus captured Veii (c. 396 BC), was later exiled, and returned to rescue Rome from the Gauls (c. 390 BC).

LATIN	ENGLISH
temporibus ei contigit et ab illa est adflictione recreatum, quod nec istis temporibus desperandum est. Quis enim de hac re nouit uoluntatem Dei?	other times, before the name of Christ, and it recovered from that affliction. Such a recovery should not be despaired of in these times either. For who knows the will of God in this matter?

WHICH GODS THE ROMANS THINK ENLARGED AND PRESERVED THEIR EMPIRE, WHEN THEY BELIEVED THAT EACH GOD COULD HARDLY BE ENTRUSTED WITH THE CARE OF EVEN A SINGLE THING

Rome's swarm of tiny gods, each with one petty task, could not have built an empire.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.8 Deinde quaeramus, si placet, ex tanta deorum turba, quam Romani colebant, quem potissimum uel quos deos credant illud imperium dilatasse adque seruasse. Neque enim in hoc tam praeclaro opere et tantae plenissimo dignitatis audent aliquas partes deae Cluacinae tribuere aut Volupiae, quae a uoluptate appellata est, aut Lubentinae, cui nomen est a libidine, aut Vaticano, qui infantum uagitibus praesidet, aut Cuninae, quae cunas eorum administrat. Quando autem possunt uno loco libri huius commemorari omnia nomina deorum et dearum, quae illi grandibus uoluminibus uix conprehendere potuerunt singulis rebus propria dispertientes officia numinum? Nec agrorum munus uni alicui deo committendum arbitrati sunt, sed rura deae Rusinae, iuga montium deo Iugatino; collibus deam Collatinam, uallibus Valloniam praefecerunt.	Next, if you please, let us ask which god in particular, or which gods, out of the vast crowd the Romans worshiped, they believe enlarged and preserved that empire. In so glorious a work, so full of dignity, they surely dare not assign any part to the goddess Cloacina. Nor would they assign any part to Volupia, who is named from pleasure (voluptas), or to Lubentina, whose name comes from lust (libido). The same goes for Vaticanus, who presides over the wailing (vagitus) of infants, and for Cunina, who looks after their cradles (cunae). And how could all the names of the gods and goddesses be listed in a single passage of this book? The Romans could scarcely fit them into great volumes, since they assigned each deity its own function for each individual thing. They did not think the care of the fields should be entrusted to any single god. Instead they put the countryside (rura) in the charge of the goddess Rusina and the mountain ridges (iuga) in the charge of the god Jugatinus. Over the hills (colles) they set the goddess Collatina, and over the valleys (valles) Vallonia.[10]
Nec saltem potuerunt unam Segetiam talem inuenire, cui semel segetes commendarent, sed sata frumenta, quamdiu sub terra essent, praepositam uoluerunt habere deam Seiam; cum uero iam essent super terram et segetem facerent, deam Segetiam; frumentis uero collectis adque reconditis, ut tuto seruarentur, deam Tutilinam praeposuerunt. Cui non sufficere uideretur illa Segetia, quamdiu seges ab initiis herbidis usque ad aristas aridas perueniret? Non tamen satis fuit hominibus deorum multitudinem amantibus, ut anima misera daemoniorum turbae prostitueretur, unius Dei ueri castum dedignata conplexum.	They could not even find a single Segetia to whom they might entrust the crops (segetes) once and for all. Instead, they wanted the goddess Seia in charge of sown grain for as long as it was under the ground. When it was above ground and forming the standing crop, they wanted the goddess Segetia. And when the grain was harvested and stored, they put the goddess Tutilina in charge, so that it might be kept safe (tuto). Who would not think Segetia was enough, for the whole time the crop advanced from its first green shoots to its dry ears? Yet one was not enough for people who loved a multitude of gods; and so the wretched soul prostituted itself to a crowd of demons, scorning the chaste embrace of the one true God.

10 Cloacina was the goddess of Rome's great sewer, the Cloaca Maxima.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Praefecerunt ergo Proserpinam frumentis germinantibus, geniculis nodisque culmorum deum Nodutum, inuolumentis folliculorum deam Volutinam; cum folliculi patescunt, ut spica exeat, deam Patelanam, cum segetes nouis aristis aequantur, quia ueteres aequare hostire dixerunt, deam Hostilinam; florentibus frumentis deam Floram, lactescentibus deum Lacturnum, maturescentibus deam Matutam; cum runcantur, id est a terra auferuntur, deam Runcinam. Nec omnia commemoro, quia me piget quod illos non pudet. Haec autem paucissima ideo dixi, ut intellegeretur nullo modo eos dicere audere ista numina imperium constituisse auxisse conseruasse Romanum, quae ita suis quaeque adhibebantur officiis, ut nihil uniuersum uni alicui crederetur. Quando ergo Segetia curaret imperium, cui curam gerere simul et segetibus et arboribus non licebat? Quando de armis Cunina cogitaret, cuius praepositura paruulorum cunas non permittebatur excedere?	So they put Proserpina in charge of the sprouting grain. The god Nodutus was over the joints and knots (nodi) of the stalks, and the goddess Volutina over the wrappings (involumenta) of the husks. When the husks open (patescunt) for the ear to come out, the goddess Patelana takes charge. When the crops are leveled off with new ears, the goddess Hostilina takes charge, because the ancients used hostire for "to level." Over the flowering grain was the goddess Flora, over the grain turning milky (lactescentibus) the god Lacturnus, and over the ripening (maturescentibus) grain the goddess Matuta. When the crops are weeded (runcantur), that is, removed from the earth, the goddess Runcina presides. I do not list them all, because I am sickened by what does not shame them. I have mentioned these very few only to make it clear that they would never dare to say these deities established, enlarged and preserved the Roman Empire. Each was assigned to its own functions in such a way that nothing as a whole was entrusted to any single one. When, then, would Segetia look after the empire, when she was not allowed to care for crops and trees at the same time? When would Cunina think about arms, when her jurisdiction was not permitted to extend beyond the cradles of little children?
Quando Nodutus adiuuaret in bello, qui nec ad folliculum spicae, sed tantum ad nodum geniculi pertinebat? Unum quisque domui suae ponit ostiarium, et quia homo est, omnino sufficit: tres deos isti posuerunt, Forculum foribus, Cardeam cardini, Limentinum limini. Ita non poterat Forculus simul et cardinem limenque seruare.	When would Nodutus help in war, when he was concerned not even with the husk of the ear but only with the knot of the joint? Each person sets one doorkeeper at his house, and since the doorkeeper is a human being, he is quite enough. These people set three gods there: Forculus for the doors (fores), Cardea for the hinge (cardo) and Limentinus for the threshold (limen). Evidently Forculus could not guard the hinge and the threshold at the same time.

WHETHER THE SIZE AND DURATION OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE SHOULD BE CREDITED TO JUPITER, WHOM HIS WORSHIPERS THINK THE SUPREME GOD

If Jupiter, king of the gods, built Rome's empire, why did the Romans make images of him?

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.9 Omissa igitur ista turba minutorum deorum uel aliquantum intermissa officium maiorum deorum debemus inquirere, quo Roma tam magna facta est, ut tam diu tot gentibus imperaret. Nimirum ergo Iouis hoc opus est. Ipsum enim deorum omnium dearumque regem uolunt: hoc eius indicat sceptrum, hoc in alto colle	So let us leave aside this crowd of petty gods, or at least set them aside for a while, and inquire into the role of the greater gods by which Rome was made so great that it ruled so many nations for so long. No doubt, then, this is the work of Jupiter. For they want him to be the king of all the gods

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Capitolium. De isto deo quamuis a poeta dictum conuenientissime praedicant: Ionis omnia plena. Hunc Varro credit etiam ab his coli, qui unum Deum solum sine simulacro colunt, sed alio nomine nuncupari. Quod si ita est, quur tam male tractatus est Romae, sicut quidem et in ceteris gentibus, ut ei fieret simulacrum?	and goddesses: his scepter shows this, and so does the Capitol on its high hill. Of this god they proclaim, as most fitting, a saying that was in fact a poet's: "All things are full of Jupiter." Varro believes that he is worshiped even by those who worship one God alone without an image, but that he is called by another name. If that is so, why was he treated so badly at Rome—as indeed among the other nations too—as to have an image made of him?[11]
	Quod ipsi etiam Varroni ita displicet, ut, cum tantae ciuitatis peruersa consuetudine premeretur, nequaquam tamen dicere et scribere dubitaret, quod hi, qui populis instituerunt simulacra, et metum demserunt et errorem addiderunt.	This so displeases Varro himself that, although he was weighed down by the perverse custom of so great a city, he did not hesitate in the least to say and to write that those who set up images for the peoples both took away fear and added error.

WHAT OPINIONS WERE FOLLOWED BY THOSE WHO SET DIFFERENT GODS OVER DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE WORLD

Assigning Juno, Neptune, Pluto and others to parts of the world contradicts the claim that Jupiter fills all things.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.10	Quur illi etiam Iuno uxor adiungitur, quae dicatur soror et coniux? Quia Iouem, inquiunt, in aethere accipimus, in aere Iunonem, et haec duo elementa coniuncta sunt, alterum superius, alterum inferius. Non est ergo ille, de quo dictum est louis omnia plena, si aliquam partem inplet et Iuno. An uterque utrumque inplet, et ambo isti coniuges et in duobus istis elementis et in singulis simul sunt? Quur ergo aether datur Ioui, aer Iunoni? Postremo ipsi duo satis essent: quid est quod mare Neptuno tribuitur, terra Plutoni? Et ne ipsi quoque sine coniugibus remanerent, additur Neptuno Salacia, Plutoni Proserpina. Nam sicut inferiorem caeli partem, id est aerem, inquiunt, Iuno tenet, ita inferiorem maris Salacia et terrae inferiorem Proserpina. Quaerunt quem ad modum sarciant fabulas, nec inueniunt.	Why, too, is Juno joined to him as his wife, she who is called "sister and spouse"? Because, they say, we take Jupiter to be the ether and Juno the air, and these two elements are joined, one above, the other below. Then he is not the one of whom it was said, "All things are full of Jupiter," if Juno too fills some part. Or does each fill both, so that these two spouses are in both of these elements, and in each of them, at once? Then why is the ether given to Jupiter and the air to Juno? Finally, these two would be enough: why is the sea assigned to Neptune and the earth to Pluto? And so that these two would not be left without wives either, Salacia is added to Neptune and Proserpina to Pluto. For just as Juno, they say, holds the lower part of the sky, that is, the air, so Salacia holds the lower part of the sea and Proserpina the lower part of the earth. They look for a way to patch up their fables, and find none.[12]
	Si enim haec ita essent, tria potius elementa mundi esse, non quattuor, eorum ueteres proderent, ut singula deorum coniugia diuiderentur singulis elementis. Nunc uero omni modo adfirmauerunt aliud esse aetherem, aliud aerem. Aqua uero siue superior siue inferior utique aqua est; puta quia dissimilis: numquid in tantum ut aqua	For if these things were so, their ancients would have taught that the world has three elements rather than four, so that each pair of divine spouses could be assigned to one element. But in fact they have affirmed in every way that ether is one thing and air another. Water, on the other 11 The quotation is Virgil, Eclogues 3.60. Those who worship one God without images are the Jews.

12 "Sister and spouse" echoes Virgil, Aeneid 1.47. Salacia was a Roman goddess of salt water.

LATIN

non sit? Et inferior terra quid aliud potest esso quam terra quantalibet diuersitate distincta? Deinde ecce iam totus in his quattuor uel tribus elementis corporeus conpletus est mundus: Minerua ubi erit? quid tenebit? quid inplebit? Simul enim cum his in Capitolio constituta est, cum ista filia non sit amborum.

Aut si aetheris partem superiorem Mineruam tenere dicunt et hac occasione fingere poetas quod de Iouis capite nata sit: quur non ergo ipsa potius deorum regina deputatur, quod sit Ioue superior? An quia indignum erat praeponere patri filiam? Quur non de Ioue ipso erga Saturnum iustitia ista seruata est? An quia uictus est? Ergo pugnarunt? Absit, inquiunt; fabularum est ista garrulitas. Ecce fabulis non credatur et de dis meliora sentiantur: quur ergo non data est patri Iouis, etsi non sublimior, aequalis certe sedes honoris? Quia Saturnus, inquiunt, temporis longitudo est. Tempus ergo colunt, qui Saturnum colunt, et rex deorum Iuppiter insinuatur natus ex tempore.

Quid enim indignum dicitur, cum Iuppiter et Iuno nati dicuntur ex tempore, si caelum est ille et illa terra, cum facta sint utique caelum et terra? nam hoc quoque in libris suis habent eorum docti adque sapientes. Neque de figmentis poeticis, sed de philosophorum libris a Vergilio dictum est: Tum pater omnipotens fecundis imbribus aether / Coniugis in gremium laetae descendit, id est in gremium telluris aut terrae; quia et hic aliquas differentias uolunt esse adque in ipsa terra aliud Terram, aliud Tellurem, aliud Tellumonem putant, et hos omnes deos habent suis nominibus appellatos, suis officiis distinctos, suis aris sacrisque ueneratos.

Eandem terram etiam matrem deum uocant, ut iam poetae tolerabiliora confingant, si secundum istorum non poeticos, sed sacrorum libros non solum Iuno, soror et hand, whether upper or lower, is certainly water. Suppose it is different—is it so different that it is not water? And what can the lower earth be but earth, however great the difference that distinguishes it? Then again, look: the whole bodily world is now complete in these four or three elements. Where will Minerva be? What will she hold? What will she fill? For she was installed on the Capitol together with them, although she is not the daughter of both.[13]

ENGLISH

Or if they say that Minerva holds the upper part of the ether, and that this gave the poets occasion to invent the story that she was born from Jupiter's head, why then is she not rather reckoned queen of the gods, since she is higher than Jupiter? Is it because it was unfitting to put the daughter above the father? Then why was this same justice not observed in the case of Jupiter himself toward Saturn? Is it because Saturn was defeated? So they fought? Heaven forbid, they say; that is the chatter of fables. Very well: let the fables not be believed, and let better things be thought of the gods. Why then was Jupiter's father not given a seat of honor that was, if not higher, at least equal? Because, they say, Saturn is the length of time. So those who worship Saturn worship time, and Jupiter, king of the gods, is implied to have been born of time.

For what is unworthy in saying that Jupiter and Juno were born of time, if he is the sky and she the earth, since sky and earth were certainly made? Their learned and wise men have this too in their books. And it was not from poetic fictions but from the books of the philosophers that Virgil said: "Then the almighty father, Ether, came down with fertile showers into the lap of his glad wife"—that is, into the lap of Tellus, or Earth. For here too they want there to be certain distinctions: in the earth itself they think Terra is one thing, Tellus another, Tellumo another, and they hold all these as gods, called by their own names, distinguished by their own functions, venerated with their own altars and rites.[14]

They also call this same earth the mother of the gods, so that the poets' fictions now become more tolerable, if, according to their books—not of po-

13 Jupiter, Juno and Minerva were worshiped together in the great temple on the Capitol; in myth Minerva was the daughter of Jupiter alone.
14 Virgil, Georgics 2.325–326.

LATIN	ENGLISH
coniux, sed etiam mater est Iouis. Eandem terram Cererem, eandem etiam Vestam uolunt, cum tamen saepius Vestam non nisi ignem esse perhibeant pertinentem ad focos, sine quibus ciuitas esse non potest, et ideo illi uirgines solere seruire, quod sicut ex uirgine, ita nihil ex igne nascatur. Quam totam uanitatem aboleri et extingui utique ab illo oportuit, qui est natus ex uirgine. Quis enim ferat, quod, cum tantum honoris et quasi castitatis igni tribuerint, aliquando Vestam non erubescunt etiam Venerem dicere, ut uanescat in ancillis eius honorata uirginitas?	etry but of rites—Juno is not only Jupiter's sister and wife but also his mother. They want this same earth to be Ceres, and Vesta too, although more often they declare that Vesta is nothing but fire, the fire of hearths, without which a city cannot exist; and that virgins customarily serve her for this reason, that just as nothing is born from a virgin, so nothing is born from fire. All this vanity surely had to be abolished and extinguished by him who was born of a virgin. For who could bear it that, although they attributed so much honor and, as it were, chastity to fire, they sometimes do not blush to call Vesta Venus as well, so that the virginity honored in her handmaids vanishes?
Si enim Vesta Venus est, quo modo ei rite uirgines a Veneriis operibus abstinendo seruierunt? An Veneres duae sunt, una uirgo, altera mulier? An potius tres, una uirginum, quae etiam Vesta est, alia coniugatarum, alia meretricum? Cui etiam Phoenices donum dabant de prostitutione filiarum, antequam eas iungerent uiris. Quae illarum est matrona Vulcani? Non utique uirgo, quoniam habet maritum. Absit autem ut meretrix, ne filio Iunonis et cooperario Mineruae facere uideamur iniuriam. Ergo haec ad coniugatas intellegitur pertinere: sed eam nolumus imitentur in eo quod fecit illa cum Marte. Rursus, inquiunt, ad fabulas redis. Quae ista iustitia est, nobis suscensere, quod talia dicimus de dis eorum, et sibi non suscensere, qui haec in theatris libentissime spectant crimina deorum suorum?	For if Vesta is Venus, how could virgins duly serve her by abstaining from the works of Venus? Or are there two Venuses, one a virgin, the other a married woman? Or rather three: one of virgins, who is also Vesta, another of wives, another of prostitutes? It was to this last that the Phoenicians even made a gift from the prostitution of their daughters before they gave them to husbands. Which of them is Vulcan's wife? Certainly not the virgin, since she has a husband. And heaven forbid it should be the prostitute, lest we seem to wrong the son of Juno and fellow worker of Minerva. So she is understood to belong to the married women—but we would not want them to imitate her in what she did with Mars. "There you go again," they say, "back to fables." What justice is this, to be angry with us for saying such things about their gods, and not to be angry with themselves, who most gladly watch these crimes of their gods in the theaters?[15]
Et (quod esset incredibile, nisi contestatissime probaretur) haec ipsa theatrica crimina deorum in honorem instituta sunt eorundem deorum.	And—what would be unbelievable if it were not proved by the fullest testimony—these very theatrical crimes of the gods were instituted in honor of those same gods.

THE MANY GODS WHOM THE MORE LEARNED PAGANS MAINTAIN ARE ONE AND THE SAME JUPITER

If all the gods are really Jupiter under different names, the Romans should simply have worshiped one god.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.11	Quotlibet igitur physicis rationibus et disputationibus adserant: modo sit Iuppiter corporei huius mundi animus, qui uniuersam istam molem ex quattuor uel quot	Let them assert it, then, with as many arguments and disputations of natural philosophy as they like. Now let Jupiter be the soul of this bodily

15 Vulcan, the smith god, son of Juno and partner of Minerva in the crafts, was the husband of Venus; her adultery with Mars is a famous myth.

LATIN

eis placet elementis constructam adque conpactam inplet et mouet, modo inde suas partes sorori et fratribus cedat; modo sit aether, ut aerem Iunonem subterfusam desuper amplectatur; modo totum simul cum aere sit ipse caelum, terram uero tamquam coniugem eandemque matrem (quia hoc in diuinis turpe non est) fecundis imbribus et seminibus fetet; modo autem (ne sit necesse per cuncta discurrere) deus unus, de quo multi a poeta nobilissimo dictum putant: deum namque ire per omnes / Terrasque tractusque maris caelumque profundum; ipse in aethere sit Iuppiter, ipse in aere Iuno, ipse in mari Neptunus, in inferioribus etiam maris ipse Salacia, in terra Pluto, in terra inferiore Proserpina, in focis domesticis Vesta, in fabrorum fornace Vulcanus, in sideribus sol et luna et stellae, in diuinantibus Apollo, in merce Mercurius, in Iano initiator, in Termino terminator, Saturnus in tempore, Mars et Bellona in bellis, Liber in uineis, Ceres in frumentis, Diana in siluis, Minerua in ingeniis; ipse sit postremo etiam in illa turba quasi plebeiorum deorum; ipse praesit nomine Liberi uirorum seminibus et nomine Liberae feminarum, ipse sit Diespater, qui partum perducat ad diem; ipse sit dea Mena, quam praefecerunt menstruis feminarum, ipse Lucina, quae a parturientibus inuocetur; ipse opem ferat nascentibus excipiendo eos sinu terrae et uocetur Opis, ipse in uagitu os aperiat et uocetur deus Vaticanus; world, who fills and moves this whole mass built and compacted from four elements, or however many they please; now let him yield his shares of it to his sister and brothers; now let him be the ether, so as to embrace from above Juno, the air spread out beneath; now let him, together with the air, be the whole sky, and make the earth fruitful with fertile showers and seeds, as his wife and at the same time his mother (for this is not shameful among divine beings); now—so that we need not run through everything—let him be the one god of whom, many think, the most famous of poets said: "For god pervades all lands, and the tracts of sea, and the depths of the sky." Let him be Jupiter in the ether, Juno in the air, Neptune in the sea, Salacia too in the lower parts of the sea, Pluto in the earth, Proserpina in the lower earth, Vesta in household hearths, Vulcan in the smiths' furnace, sun and moon and stars in the heavens, Apollo in those who prophesy, Mercury in trade, the god of beginnings in Janus, the god of boundaries in Terminus, Saturn in time, Mars and Bellona in wars, Liber in vineyards, Ceres in grain, Diana in forests, Minerva in minds. Finally, let him be in that crowd of what we might call plebeian gods as well: let him preside, under the name of Liber, over the seed of men, and under the name of Libera over that of women; let him be Diespater, who brings the birth through to the light of day (diem); let him be the goddess Mena, whom they put in charge of women's menstruation; let him be Lucina, who is invoked by women in labor; let him bring help (opem) to the newborn by receiving them into the lap of the earth, and be called Opis; let him open their mouths in crying (vagitus) and be called the god Vaticanus;[16]

ENGLISH

ipse leuet de terra et uocetur dea Leuana, ipse cunas tueatur et uocetur Cunina; non sit alius, sed ipse in illis deabus, quae fata nascentibus canunt et uocantur Carmentes; praesit fortuitis uoceturque Fortuna; in diua Rumina mammam paruulo inmulgeat, quia rumam dixerunt ueteres mammam; in diua Potina potionem ministret, in diua Educa escam praebeat; de pauore infantum Pauentia nuncupetur, de spe, quae uenit, Venilia, de uoluptate Volupia, de actu Agenoria; de stimulis, quibus ad nimium actum homo inpellitur, dea Stimula nominetur; Strenia dea sit strenuum faciendo, Numeria, quae numerare doceat, Camena, quae canere;

let him lift (levare) the child from the ground and be called the goddess Levana; let him guard the cradle (cunae) and be called Cunina; let it be no one else but he in those goddesses who sing the fates to the newborn and are called the Carmentes; let him preside over chance events and be called Fortuna; as the goddess Rumina let him put the breast to the infant's lips, for the ancients called the breast ruma; as the goddess Potina let him give drink (potio); as the goddess Educa let him supply food (esca); let him be named Paventia

16 Virgil, Georgics 4.221–222.

LATIN

ipse sit et deus Consus praebendo consilia et dea Sentia sententias inspirando; ipse dea Iuuentas, quae post praetextam excipiat iuuenalis aetatis exordia; ipse sit et Fortuna barbata, quae adultos barba induat quos honorare noluerunt, ut hoc qualecumque numen saltem masculum deum uel a barba Barbatum, sicut a nodis Nodutum, uel certe non Fortunam, sed quia barbas habet Fortunium nominarent; ipse in Iugatino deo coniuges iungat, et cum uirgini uxori zona soluitur, ipse inuocetur et dea Virginensis uocetur; ipse sit Mutunus uel Tutunus, qui est aput Graecos Priapus: si non pudet, haec omnia quae dixi et quaecumque non dixi (non enim omnia dicenda arbitratus sum), hi omnes di deaeque sit unus Iuppiter, siue sint, ut quidam uolunt, omnia ista partes eius siue uirtutes eius, sicut eis uidetur, quibus eum placet esse mundi animum, quae sententia uelut magnorum multumque doctorum est.

Haec si ita sunt (quod quale sit, nondum interim quaero), quid perderent, si unum Deum colerent prudentiore conpendio? Quid enim eius contemneretur, cum ipse coleretur? Si autem metuendum fuit, ne praetermissae siue neglectae partes eius irascerentur: non ergo, ut uolunt, uelut unius animantis haec tota uita est, quae omnes continet deos, quasi suas uirtutes uel membra uel partes; sed suam quaeque pars habet uitam a ceteris separatam, si praeter alteram irasci altera potest, et alia placari, alia concitari. Si autem dicitur omnes simul, id est totum ipsum Iouem, potuisse offendi, si partes eius non etiam singillatim minutatimque colerentur, stulte dicitur. Nulla quippe illarum praetermitteretur, cum ipse unus, qui haberet omnia, coleretur.

ENGLISH

from the fright (pavor) of infants, Venilia from hope that comes (venit), Volupia from pleasure (voluptas), Agenoria from action (actus); let him be named the goddess Stimula from the goads (stimuli) by which a person is driven to excessive action; let him be the goddess Strenia by making people strenuous, Numeria who teaches them to count (numerare), Camena who teaches them to sing (canere); let him be both the god Consus by giving counsel (consilia) and the goddess Sentia by inspiring opinions (sententiae); let him be the goddess Juventas, who receives the beginnings of youth once the boy's toga is laid aside; let him also be Bearded Fortune, who clothes grown men with a beard—though they did not care to honor those men enough to give this divinity, whatever it is, at least a male name: either Barbatus, from barba [beard], as Nodutus comes from nodi [knots], or at any rate not Fortuna but, since it has beards, Fortunius. As the god Jugatinus let him join (iungere) spouses; and when the girdle of a virgin bride is loosed, let him be invoked and be called the goddess Virginensis; let him be Mutunus or Tutunus, who among the Greeks is Priapus. If they are not ashamed, let all these I have named, and whatever I have not named (for I did not think everything should be said)—let all these gods and goddesses be the one Jupiter, whether all of them are, as some would have it, his parts, or his powers, as it seems to those who like to think he is the soul of the world, a view held, supposedly, by great and very learned men.[17]

If these things are so (what that amounts to I do not yet ask for the moment), what would they lose by the wiser shortcut of worshiping the one god? For what of him would be slighted, if he himself were worshiped? But if there was reason to fear that his parts, if passed over or neglected, would be angry, then it is not true, as they claim, that this whole life, which contains all the gods as its powers or members or parts, is the life of a single living being; rather, each part has its own life, separate from the rest, if one can be angry apart from another, and one can be appeased while another is provoked. But if it is said that all of them together —that is, Jupiter himself as a whole—could have been offended if his parts were not also worshiped 17 Priapus was a fertility god whose statues displayed an enormous erect phallus.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	one by one and in detail, that is a foolish thing to say. For none of them would be passed over, since he himself, the one who contained them all, would be worshiped.
Nam ut alia omittam, quae sunt innumerabilia, cum dicunt omnia sidera partes Iouis esse et omnia uiuere adque rationales animas habere, et ideo sine controuersia deos esse, non uident quam multos non colant, quam multis aedes non construant, aras non statuant, quas tamen paucissimis siderum statuendas esse putauerunt et singillatim sacrificandum. Si igitur irascuntur, qui non singillatim coluntur, non metuunt paucis placatis toto caelo irato uiuere? Si autem stellas omnes ideo colunt, quia in Ioue sunt quem colunt, isto conpendio possent in illo uno omnibus supplicare (sic enim nemo irasceretur, cum in illo uno nemo contemneretur) potius quam cultis quibusdam iusta irascendi causa illis, qui praetermissi essent, multo numerosioribus praeberetur, praesertim cum eis de superna sede fulgentibus turpi nuditate distentus praeponeretur Priapus.-	For, to pass over other points, which are innumerable: when they say that all the stars are parts of Jupiter, that they all live and have rational souls and are therefore beyond dispute gods, they do not see how many of them they fail to worship, how many they build no temples for and set up no altars to—though they did think altars should be set up to a very few of the stars and sacrifice offered to them individually. If, then, those not worshiped individually are angry, are they not afraid to live under a whole sky of anger, having appeased only a few? But if they worship all the stars because they are in Jupiter, whom they worship, they could by that shortcut supplicate all of them in him alone—for then no one would be angry, since in him alone no one would be slighted—rather than worship some and so give a just cause for anger to those passed over, who are far more numerous; especially when Priapus, distended in shameful nakedness, was preferred to them as they shine from their seat on high.

THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO THOUGHT GOD THE SOUL OF THE WORLD AND THE WORLD THE BODY OF GOD

If God is the world's soul, every creature trampled or killed would be a part of God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.12 Quid: illud nonne debet mouere acutos homines uel qualescumque homines (non enim ad hoc ingenii opus est excellentia), ut deposito studio contentionis adtendant, si mundi animus Deus est eique animo mundus ut corpus est, ut sit unum animal constans ex animo et corpore, adque iste Deus est sinu quodam naturae in se ipso continens omnia, ut ex ipsius anima, qua uiuificatur tota ista moles, uitae adque animae cunctorum uiuentium pro cuiusque nascendi sorte sumantur, nihil omnino remanere, quod non sit pars Dei. Quod si ita est, quis non uideat quanta inpietas et inreligiositas consequatur, ut, quod calcauerit quisque, partem Dei calcet, et in omni animante occidendo pars Dei trucidetur? Nolo omnia dicere, quae possunt occurrere cogitantibus, dici autem sine uerecundia non possunt.	What about this? Should it not move sharp-witted people—or people of any kind at all, since no outstanding intelligence is needed for this—to set aside their zeal for argument and pay attention? If God is the soul of the world, and the world is to that soul as a body, so that there is one living being consisting of soul and body; and if this God holds all things within himself in a kind of lap of nature, so that from his soul, by which this whole mass is given life, the lives and souls of all living things are drawn, each according to its lot at birth —then nothing at all remains that is not a part of God. If that is so, who does not see what impiety and irreverence follow? Whatever anyone treads on, he treads on a part of God, and in the killing of any living creature a part of God is slaughtered. I do not want to say everything that may occur to those who think about this, but which cannot be said without shame.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

THOSE WHO CLAIM THAT ONLY RATIONAL LIVING BEINGS ARE PARTS OF THE ONE GOD

Making rational beings parts of God leads to absurdities, such as part of God being beaten.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.13	Si autem sola animalia rationalia, sicut sunt homines, partes Dei esse contendunt: non uideo quidem, si totus mundus Deus est, quo modo bestias ab eius partibus separent; sed obluctari quid opus est? De ipso rationali animante, id est homine, quid infelicius credi potest, quam Dei partem uapulare, cum puer uapulat? Iam uero partes Dei fieri lasciuas, iniquas, inpias adque omnino damnabiles quis ferre possit, nisi qui prorsus insanit? Postremo quid irascitur eis, a quibus non colitur, cum a suis partibus non colatur? Restat ergo ut dicant omnes deos suas habere uitas, sibi quemque uiuere, nullum eorum esse partem cuiusquam, sed omnes colendos qui cognosci et coli possunt, quia tam multi sunt, ut omnes non possint.	But if they contend that only rational animals, such as human beings, are parts of God, then I do not see, if the whole world is God, how they can separate the beasts from his parts. But what need is there to wrestle over this? As for the rational animal itself, that is, man, what more wretched belief could there be than that a part of God is beaten when a boy is beaten? And then, that parts of God should become wanton, unjust, impious and altogether damnable—who could bear that, unless he were completely insane? Finally, why is he angry with those who do not worship him, when it is his own parts that do not worship him? It remains, then, for them to say that all the gods have their own lives, that each lives for himself, that none of them is a part of any other, but that all should be worshiped who can be known and worshiped, since they are so many that not all can be.
	Quorum Iuppiter quia rex praesidet, ipsum credo ab eis putari regnum constituisse uel auxisse Romanum. Nam si hoc ipse non fecit, quem alium deum opus tam magnum potuisse adgredi credant, cum omnes occupati sint officiis et operibus propriis, nec alter inruat in alterius? A rege igitur deorum regnum hominum potuit propagari et augeri.	And since Jupiter presides over them as king, it is he, I suppose, whom they think established or enlarged the Roman kingdom. For if he did not do it himself, what other god do they believe could have undertaken so great a work, when all are busy with their own functions and works, and none intrudes on another's? So it was by the king of the gods that the kingdom of men could be extended and increased.

THAT THE GROWTH OF KINGDOMS IS WRONGLY CREDITED TO JUPITER, SINCE IF VICTORY IS A GODDESS, AS THEY CLAIM, SHE ALONE WOULD BE ENOUGH FOR THIS BUSINESS

If Victory is a goddess, she alone would suffice to enlarge kingdoms, and Jupiter is unnecessary.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.14	Hic primum quaero, quur non etiam ipsum regnum aliquis deus est? Quur enim non ita sit, si Victoria dea est? Aut quid ipso Ioue in hac causa opus est, si Victoria faueat sitque propitia et semper eat ad illos, quos uult esse uictores? Hac dea fauente et propitia, etiam Ioue uacante uel aliud agente, quae gentes non subditae remanerent? quae regna non cederent? An forte displicet bonis iniquissima inprobitate pugnare et finitimos quietos nullamque iniuriam facientes ad dilatandum	Here my first question is this: why is Kingdom itself not also some god? Why should it not be, if Victory is a goddess? Or what need is there of Jupiter himself in this matter, if Victory favors and is propitious and always goes to those she wants to be victors? With this goddess favorable and propitious, even if Jupiter were idle or busy with something else, what nations would remain unsubdued? What kingdoms would not yield? Or do good

LATIN	ENGLISH
regnum bello spontaneo prouocare? Plane si ita sentiunt adprobo et laudo.	men perhaps dislike fighting with the most unjust wickedness, and provoking peaceful neighbors who do them no wrong with an unprovoked war, in order to enlarge their kingdom? Clearly, if that is how they feel, I approve and praise them.

WHETHER IT BEFITS GOOD MEN TO WANT TO RULE MORE WIDELY

Good men should prefer small kingdoms living in harmony to empires grown through others' wickedness.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.15 Videant ergo ne forte non pertineat ad uiros bonos gaudere de regni latitudine. Iniquitas enim eorum, cum quibus iusta bella gesta sunt, regnum adiuuit ut cresceret, quod utique paruum esset, si quies et iustitia finitimorum contra se bellum geri nulla prouocaret iniuria ac sic felicioribus rebus humanis omnia regna parua essent concordi uicinitate laetantia et ita essent in mundo regna plurima gentium, ut sunt in urbe domus plurimae ciuium. Proinde belligerare et perdomitis gentibus dilatare regnum malis uidetur felicitas, bonis necessitas. Sed quia peius esset, ut iniuriosi iustioribus dominarentur, ideo non incongrue dicitur etiam ista felicitas. Sed procul dubio felicitas maior est uicinum bonum habere concordem quam uicinum malum subiugare bellantem.	Let them consider, then, whether it may not, perhaps, be unbecoming for good men to rejoice in the vastness of their kingdom. For it was the wickedness of those against whom just wars were waged that helped the kingdom to grow; and it would surely have been small if its neighbors, being peaceable and just, had provoked no war against themselves by any wrong. In that case, human affairs being happier, all kingdoms would be small, rejoicing in harmonious neighborliness, and there would be very many kingdoms of nations in the world, as there are very many houses of citizens in a city. Therefore, to wage war and to enlarge a kingdom by subduing nations seems happiness to the wicked, necessity to the good. But since it would be worse for wrongdoers to rule over the more just, it is not inappropriately called happiness as well. Yet beyond doubt it is a greater happiness to have a good neighbor living in harmony than to subjugate a bad neighbor waging war.
Mala uota sunt optare habere quem oderis uel quem timeas, ut possit esse quem uincas. Si ergo iusta gerendo bella, non inpia, non iniqua, Romani imperium tam magnum adquirere potuerunt, numquid tamquam aliqua dea colenda est eis etiam iniquitas aliena? Multum enim ad istam latitudinem imperii eam cooperatam uidemus, quae faciebat iniuriosos, ut essent cum quibus iusta bella gererentur et augeretur imperium. Quur autem et iniquitas dea non sit uel externarum gentium, si Pauor et Pallor et Febris di Romani esse meruerunt? His igitur duabus, id est aliena iniquitate et dea Victoria, dum bellorum causas iniquitas excitat, Victoria eadem bella feliciter terminat, etiam feriato Ioue creuit imperium.	It is a wicked wish to want to have someone to hate or to fear, so that there may be someone to conquer. If, then, by waging wars that were just—not impious, not unjust—the Romans were able to acquire so great an empire, must they also worship the wickedness of others as some kind of goddess? For we see that it contributed greatly to this vastness of empire, by making others into wrongdoers, so that there would be people against whom just wars could be waged and the empire increased. And why should Wickedness—at least that of foreign nations—not be a goddess too, if Fear and Pallor and Fever have earned the right to be Roman gods? By these two, then—that is, the wickedness of others and the goddess Victory—with wickedness stirring up the causes of wars and Victory bringing those same wars to a happy

LATIN	ENGLISH
	end, the empire grew even while Jupiter was on holiday.[18]
Quas enim hic partes Iuppiter haberet, cum ea, quae possent beneficia eius putari, di habentur, di uocantur, di coluntur, ipsi pro suis partibus inuocantur? Haberet hic autem etiam ille aliquam partem, si Regnum etiam ipse appellaretur, sicut appellatur illa Victoria. Aut si regnum munus est Iouis, quur non et uictoria munus eius habeatur? Quod profecto haberetur, si non lapis in Capitolio, sed uerus rex regum et dominus dominantium cognosceretur adque coleretur.	For what role would Jupiter have here, when the things that might be thought his benefits are held to be gods, called gods, worshiped as gods, and are themselves invoked for their own roles? He too would have some role here, if he himself were called Kingdom, as she is called Victory. Or if kingdom is Jupiter's gift, why should victory not also be held to be his gift? And it certainly would be, if not a stone on the Capitol but the true King of kings and Lord of lords were known and worshiped.[19]

WHY THE ROMANS, WHO ASSIGNED A SEPARATE GOD TO EVERY THING AND EVERY MOVEMENT, CHOSE TO HAVE THE TEMPLE OF QUIET OUTSIDE THE GATES

The Romans had gods for every action but kept Quiet, or Rest, outside the city gates.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.16 Miror autem plurimum, quod, cum deos singulos singulis rebus et paene singulis motibus adtribuerent, uocauerunt deam Agenoriam, quae ad agendum excitaret, deam Stimulam, quae ad agendum ultra modum stimularet, deam Murciam, quae praeter modum non moueret ac faceret hominem, ut ait Pomponius, murcidum, id est nimis desidiosum et inactuosum, deam Streniam, quae faceret strenuum, his omnibus dis et deabus publica sacra facere susceperunt, Quietem uero appellantes, quae faceret quietum, cum aedem haberet extra portam Collinam, publice illam suscipere noluerunt. Utrum indicium fuit animi inquieti, an potius ita significatum est, qui illam turbam colere perseueraret non plane deorum, sed daemoniorum, eum quietem habere non posse? ad quam uocat uerus medicus dicens: Discite a me, quoniam mitis sum et humilis corde, et inuenietis requiem animabus uestris.	What astonishes me most is this. They assigned individual gods to individual things and almost to individual movements: they named the goddess Agenoria, to rouse people to action; the goddess Stimula, to goad them to action beyond measure; the goddess Murcia, who would not move a person beyond measure but make him, as Pomponius says, murcidus, that is, excessively lazy and inactive; the goddess Strenia, to make him strenuous; and they undertook to perform public rites to all these gods and goddesses. Yet Quies [Rest], whom they named as the one who makes people quiet, they refused to adopt publicly, although she had a temple outside the Colline Gate. Was this a sign of a restless mind? Or was it rather a signal that whoever persisted in worshiping that crowd—not of gods at all, but of demons—could not have rest? To that rest the true physician calls us, saying: "Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls."[20]

18 Pavor (Fear) and Pallor were vowed shrines by King Tullus Hostilius during a battle; Febris (Fever) had temples at Rome.
19 "King of kings and Lord of lords" echoes Revelation 19:16 and 1 Timothy 6:15.
20 Matthew 11:29. Lucius Pomponius wrote Atellan farces in the early 1st century BC; the Colline Gate was in Rome's northeastern wall.

WHETHER, IF JUPITER HAS SUPREME POWER, VICTORY TOO OUGHT TO BE THOUGHT A GODDESS

If Jupiter sends Victory, the true King of the ages, not a false goddess, grants victory.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.17	An forte dicunt, quod deam Victoriam Iuppiter mittat adque illa tamquam regi deorum obtemperans ad quos iusserit ueniat et in eorum parte considat? Hoc uere dicitur non de illo Ioue, quem deorum regem pro sua opinione confingunt, sed de illo uero rege saeculorum, quod mittat non Victoriam, quae nulla substantia est, sed angelum suum et faciat uincere quem uoluerit; cuius consilium occultum esse potest, iniquum non potest. Nam si uictoria dea est, quur non deus est et triumphus, et uictoriae iungitur uel maritus uel frater uel filius?	Or perhaps they say that Jupiter sends the goddess Victory, and that she, obeying him as king of the gods, goes to whomever he commands and takes her seat on their side? This is truly said—not of that Jupiter whom they invent, according to their own notion, as king of the gods, but of the true King of the ages. He sends not Victory, who has no substance at all, but his angel, and makes whomever he wills victorious. His counsel may be hidden; it cannot be unjust. For if Victory is a goddess, why is Triumph not a god as well, joined to Victory as husband, or brother, or son?
	Talia quippe isti de dis opinati sunt, qualia si poetae fingerent adque a nobis exagitarentur, responderent isti ridenda esse figmenta poetarum, non ueris adtribuenda numinibus; et tamen se ipsi non ridebant, cum talia deliramenta non aput poetas legebant, sed in templis colebant. Iouem igitur de omnibus rogarent, ei uni tantummodo supplicarent. Non enim, quo misisset Victoriam, si dea est et sub illo rege est, posset ei audere resistere et suam potius facere uoluntatem.	Indeed, these people have held such opinions about the gods that, if the poets had invented them and we attacked them, they would answer that these were poets' fictions, to be laughed at, not to be attributed to true divinities. And yet they did not laugh at themselves when they did not read such ravings in the poets but worshiped them in the temples. They should therefore have asked Jupiter for everything and prayed to him alone. For wherever he sent Victory—if she is a goddess and subject to that king—she could not dare to resist him and do her own will instead.

HOW THOSE WHO THINK FELICITY AND FORTUNE GODDESSES TELL THEM APART

The Romans worshiped both Felicity and Fortune, though fortune strikes the good and bad alike.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.18	Quid, quod et Felicitas dea est? Aedem accepit, aram meruit, sacra congrua persoluta sunt. Ipsa ergo sola coleretur. Ubi enim ipsa esset, quid boni non esset? Sed quid sibi uult, quod et Fortuna dea putatur et colitur? An aliud est felicitas, aliud fortuna? Quia fortuna potest esse et mala; felicitas autem si mala fuerit, felicitas non erit. Certe omnes deos utriusque sexus (si et sexum habent) non nisi bonos existimare debemus. Hoc Plato dicit, hoc alii philosophi, hoc excellentes rei publicae populorumque rectores. Quo modo ergo dea Fortuna aliquando bona est, aliquando mala? An forte quando mala est, dea non est, sed in malignum daemonem repente conuertitur? Quot sunt ergo deae istae? Profecto quotquot homines fortunati, hoc est bonae fortunae.	And what of the fact that Felicity, too, is a goddess? She received a temple, earned an altar, and fitting rites were paid to her. Then she alone should have been worshiped. For where she was present, what good would be absent? But what does it mean that Fortune too is held to be a goddess and is worshiped? Is happiness one thing and fortune another? Yes, because fortune can also be bad, whereas happiness, if it were bad, would not be happiness. Certainly we ought to think that all the gods of both sexes (if they even have a sex) are nothing but good. Plato says this; other philosophers say it; so do the outstanding rulers of the commonwealth and of peoples. How then is the goddess Fortune sometimes good, sometimes bad? Or perhaps when she is bad she is not a goddess but is suddenly turned into an evil demon? How many of these goddesses are there, then? Surely as many as there are fortunate people—that is, people of good fortune.[21]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam cum sint et alii plurimi simul, hoc est uno tempore, malae fortunae, numquid, si ipsa esset, simul et bona esset et mala; his aliud, illis aliud? An illa, quae dea est, semper est bona? Ipsa est ergo Felicitas: quur adhibentur diuersa nomina? Sed hoc ferendum est; solet enim et una res duobus nominibus appellari. Quid diuersae aedes, diuersae arae, diuersa sacra? Est causa, inquiunt, quia felicitas illa est, quam boni habent praecedentibus meritis; fortuna uero, quae dicitur bona, sine ullo examine meritorum fortuito accidit hominibus et bonis et malis, unde etiam Fortuna nominatur. Quo modo ergo bona est, quae sine ullo iudicio uenit et ad bonos et ad malos?	For since there are also very many others at the same time—that is, at one and the same moment—who have bad fortune, would she, if she were one and the same, be both good and bad at once: one thing to these, another to those? Or is the one who is a goddess always good? Then she is Felicity herself: why are different names used? But this can be tolerated, for one thing is often called by two names. But why different temples, different altars, different rites? There is a reason, they say: happiness is what good people have as a result of prior merits, whereas fortune—the kind called good—befalls people, good and bad alike, fortuitously, without any weighing of merits; hence her very name, Fortune. How then is she good, when she comes without any judgment to good and bad alike?
Ut quid autem colitur, quae ita caeca est passim in quoslibet incurrens, ut suos cultores plerumque praetereat et suis contemtoribus haereat? Aut si aliquid proficiunt cultores eius, ut ab illa uideantur et amentur, iam merita sequitur, non fortuito uenit. Ubi est definitio illa Fortunae? Ubi est quod a fortuitis etiam nomen accepit? Nihil enim prodest eam colere, si fortuna est. Si autem suos cultores discernit, ut prosit, fortuna non est. An et ipsam, quo uoluerit, Iuppiter mittit? Colatur ergo ipse solus; non enim potest ei iubenti et eam quo uoluerit mittenti Fortuna resistere. Aut certe istam mali colant, qui nolunt habere merita, quibus dea possit Felicitas inuitari.	And why is she worshiped at all, when she is so blind, running into anyone at random, that she often passes by her worshipers and clings to those who despise her? Or if her worshipers do gain something, so that she sees and loves them, then she follows merits and does not come by chance. Where, then, is that definition of Fortune? What becomes of her taking her very name from what is fortuitous? For it is no use worshiping her if she is fortune. But if she distinguishes her worshipers so as to benefit them, she is not fortune. Or does Jupiter send her too wherever he wishes? Then let him alone be worshiped, for Fortune cannot resist him when he commands her and sends her wherever he wishes. Or at any rate let the wicked worship her—those who do not want to have the merits by which the goddess Felicity might be invited.

WOMEN'S FORTUNE

A statue of Women's Fortune was said to have spoken, a trick of demons.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.19 Tantum sane huic uelut numini tribuunt, quam Fortunam uocant, ut simulacrum eius, quod a matronis dedicatum est et appellata est Fortuna muliebris, etiam locutum esse	They attribute so much to this so-called divinity they call Fortune that they have put on record that her image—which was dedicated by married wo-

21 Augustine plays on felicitas, which is both the ordinary word for happiness and the name of the goddess Felicity.

LATIN	ENGLISH
memoriae commendauerint adque dixisse non semel, sed iterum, quod eam rite matronae dedicauerint. Quod quidem si uerum, sit, mirari nos non oportet. Non enim malignis daemonibus etiam sic difficile est fallere, quorum artes adque uersutias hinc potius isti aduertere debuerunt, quod illa dea locuta est, quae fortuito accidit, non quae meritis uenit. Fuit enim Fortuna loquax et muta Felicitas, ut quid aliud, nisi ut homines recte uiuere non curarent conciliata sibi Fortuna, quae illos sine ullis bonis meritis faceret fortunatos?	men and called Women's Fortune—actually spoke, and said not once but twice that the matrons had dedicated her duly. If this is in fact true, we should not be surprised. For it is not difficult for evil demons to deceive even in this way. These people ought rather to have recognized their arts and tricks from the very fact that the goddess who spoke was the one who befalls by chance, not the one who comes for merits. For Fortune was talkative and Felicity mute—and for what purpose, except that people, having won Fortune's favor, should not care about living rightly, since she would make them fortunate without any good merits?[22]
Et certe si Fortuna loquitur, non saltem muliebris, sed uirilis potius loqueretur, ut non ipsae, quae simulacrum dedicauerunt, putarentur tantum miraculum muliebri loquacitate finxisse.	And surely, if Fortune speaks, it should at least have been not Women's Fortune but rather Men's Fortune that spoke, so that the very women who dedicated the image would not be thought to have invented so great a miracle out of female talkativeness.[23]

VIRTUE AND FAITH, WHICH THE PAGANS HONORED WITH TEMPLES AND RITES, PASSING OVER OTHER GOODS THAT SHOULD HAVE BEEN WORSHIPED LIKEWISE IF DIVINITY WAS RIGHTLY GIVEN TO THESE

Virtue and Faith received temples, though they are God's gifts and other virtues were ignored.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.20 Virtutem quoque deam fecerunt; quae quidem si dea esset, multis fuerat praeferenda. Et nunc quia dea non est, sed donum Dei est, ipsa ab illo inpetretur, a quo solo dari potest, et omnis falsorum deorum turba uanescet. Sed quur et Fides dea credita est et accepit etiam ipsa templum et altare? Quam quisquis prudenter agnoscit, habitaculum illi se ipsum facit. Unde autem sciunt illi quid sit fides, cuius primum et maximum officium est, ut in uerum credatur Deum? Sed quur non suffecerat et Virtus? Nonne ibi est et Fides?	They also made Virtue a goddess. If she really were a goddess, she would have deserved to be preferred to many. And now, since she is not a goddess but a gift of God, let her be sought from him who alone can give her, and the whole crowd of false gods will vanish. But why was Faith also believed to be a goddess, and why did she too receive a temple and an altar? Whoever wisely recognizes her makes himself a dwelling place for her. But how do they know what faith is, whose first and greatest duty is that one should believe in the true God? And why was Virtue not enough? Is not Faith included there as well?[24]
Quando quidem uirtutem in quattuor species distribuendam esse uiderunt, prudentiam, iustitiam, fortitudinem, temperantiam; et quoniam et istae singulae species suas habent, in partibus iustitiae fides est maximumque locum aput nos habet, quicumque scimus	For they saw that virtue was to be divided into four kinds: prudence, justice, courage, and temperance. And since each of these has its own subdivisions, faith is among the parts of justice, and it holds the highest place among us who know what 22 The temple of Fortuna Muliebris ("Women's Fortune") outside Rome was said to commemorate the women who turned Coriolanus back from attacking the city in the early fifth century BC.

23 Fortuna Virilis ("Men's Fortune") was another Roman cult of Fortune.
24 Fides, the Roman goddess of good faith and trustworthiness, had a temple on the Capitol; Augustine plays on fides as religious faith.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quid sit, quod iustus ex fide uiuit. Sed illos miror adpetitores multitudinis deorum, si fides dea est, quare aliis tam multis deabus iniuriam fecerint praetermittendo eas, quibus similiter aedes et aras dedicare potuerunt? Quur temperantia dea esse non meruit, cum eius nomine nonnulli Romani principes non paruam gloriam conpararint? Quur denique fortitudo dea non est, quae adfuit Mucio, cum dexteram porrexit in flammas; quae adfuit Curtio, cum se pro patria in abruptam terram praecipitem dedit; quae adfuit Decio patri et Decio filio, cum pro exercitu se uouerunt?	is meant by "The just shall live by faith." But I am amazed at these lovers of a multitude of gods: if faith is a goddess, why did they wrong so many other goddesses by passing them over, when they could have dedicated temples and altars to them in the same way? Why did temperance not deserve to be a goddess, when several Roman leaders won no small glory in her name? Why, finally, is courage not a goddess—she who stood by Mucius when he stretched his right hand into the flames; who stood by Curtius when he threw himself headlong into the chasm in the earth for his country; who stood by Decius the father and Decius the son when they vowed themselves to death for the army?[25]
si tamen his omnibus uera inerat fortitudo, unde modo non agitur. Quare prudentia, quare sapientia nulla numinum loca meruerunt? An quia in nomine generali ipsius uirtutis omnes coluntur? Sic ergo posset et unus Deus coli, cuius partes ceteri di putantur. Sed in illa una uirtute et fides est et pudicitia, quae tamen extra, in aedibus propriis altaria meruerunt.	That is, if true courage was present in all of them—which is not the question now. Why did prudence, why did wisdom earn no place among the divinities? Or is it because they are all worshiped under the general name of virtue itself? In that case the one God too could be worshiped, of whom the other gods are thought to be parts. But in that one virtue are both faith and chastity, which nevertheless earned altars outside it, in temples of their own.

THAT THOSE WHO DID NOT UNDERSTAND THE ONE GOD SHOULD AT LEAST HAVE BEEN CONTENT WITH VIRTUE AND FELICITY

Virtue and Felicity together would supply everything, making the crowd of other gods superfluous.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.21 Has deas non ueritas, sed uanitas facit; haec enim ueri Dei munera sunt, non ipsae sunt deae. Verum tamen ubi est uirtus et felicitas, quid aliud quaeritur? Quid ei sufficit, cui uirtus felicitasque non sufficit? Omnia quippe agenda conplectitur uirtus, omnia optanda felicitas. Si Iuppiter, ut haec daret, ideo colebatur, quia, si bonum aliquid est latitudo regni adque diuturnitas, ad eandem pertinet felicitatem: quur non intellectum est dona Dei esse, non deas? Si autem putatae sunt deae, saltem alia tanta deorum turba non quaereretur. Consideratis enim officiis deorum dearumque omnium, quae sicut uoluerunt pro sua opinatione finxerunt, inueniant si possunt aliquid, quod praestari ab aliquo deo possit homini habenti uirtutem, habenti felicitatem.	It is not truth but vanity that makes these goddesses; for these are gifts of the true God, not goddesses themselves. Yet where there are virtue and happiness, what else is sought? What will satisfy someone for whom virtue and happiness are not enough? For virtue embraces everything that ought to be done, happiness everything that ought to be desired. If Jupiter was worshiped so that he might give these—since the breadth and duration of a kingdom, if it is any good at all, belongs to that same happiness—why was it not understood that they are gifts of God, not goddesses? And if they were thought to be goddesses, at least that huge crowd of other gods should not have been sought. For let them consider the functions of all the gods and goddesses, which they invented as 25 Habakkuk 2:4, quoted in Romans 1:17. Mucius Scaevola burned his hand before the Etruscan king Porsenna, Curtius leapt into a chasm that opened in the Forum, and the two Decii gave their lives in battle (340 and 295 BC).

LATIN

ENGLISH

they pleased according to their own notions, and let them find, if they can, anything that any god could supply to a person who has virtue and has happiness.

Quid doctrinae uel a Mercurio uel a Minerua petendum esset, cum uirtus omnia secum haberet? Ars quippe ipsa bene recteque uiuendi uirtus a ueteribus definita est. Unde ab eo, quod Graece ἀρετὴ dicitur uirtus, nomen artis Latinos traduxisse putauerunt. Sed si uirtus non nisi ad ingeniosum posset uenire, quid opus erat deo Catio patre, qui catos, id est acutos faceret, cum hoc posset conferre felicitas? Ingeniosum quippe nasci felicitatis est, unde, etiamsi non potuit a nondum nato coli dea Felicitas, ut hoc ei conciliata donaret, conferret hoc parentibus eius cultoribus suis, ut eis ingeniosi filii nascerentur. Quid opus erat parturientibus inuocare Lucinam, cum, si adesset Felicitas, non solum bene parerent, sed etiam bonos?

What learning would need to be sought from Mercury or from Minerva, when virtue would bring everything with it? For the ancients defined virtue as the very art of living well and rightly. Hence they thought that the Latins took their word for art, ars, from the Greek word for virtue, ἀρετὴ [aretē]. But if virtue could come only to the talented, what need was there of the god Catius Pater, who made people cati, that is, sharp, when happiness could confer this? For to be born talented is a matter of happiness. So even if the goddess Felicity could not be worshiped by someone not yet born, so that, won over, she might grant him this, she would grant it to his parents, her worshipers, so that talented children would be born to them. What need was there for women in labor to call on Lucina, when, if Felicity were present, they would not only give birth well but give birth to good children?[26]

Quid necesse erat Opi deae commendare nascentes, deo Vaticano uagientes, deae Cuninae iacentes, deae Ruminae sugentes, deo Statilino stantes, deae Adeonae adeuntes, Abeonae abeuntes; deae Menti, ut bonam haberent mentem, deo Volumno et deae Volumnae, ut bona uellent; dis nuptialibus, ut bene coniugarentur, dis agrestibus, ut fructus uberrimos caperent, et maxime ipsi diuae Fructeseae; Marti et Bellonae, ut bene belligerarent, deae Victoriae, ut uincerent; deo Honori, ut honorarentur, deae Pecuniae, ut pecuniosi essent, deo Aesculano et filio eius Argentino, ut haberent aeream argenteamque pecuniam? Nam ideo patrem Argentini Aesculanum posuerunt, quia prius aerea pecunia in usu coepit esse, post argentea. Miror autem, quod Argentinus non genuit Aurinum, quia et aurea subsecuta est.

What need was there to commend newborns to the goddess Ops, wailing infants to the god Vaticanus, infants lying in the cradle to the goddess Cunina, nursing infants to the goddess Rumina, children standing up to the god Statilinus, children coming toward someone to the goddess Adeona and going away to Abeona; to commend them to the goddess Mens, that they might have a good mind; to the god Volumnus and the goddess Volumna, that they might will good things; to the wedding gods, that they might marry well; to the country gods, that they might reap the richest harvests, and above all to the divine Fructesea herself; to Mars and Bellona, that they might wage war well; to the goddess Victory, that they might win; to the god Honor, that they might be honored; to the goddess Pecunia, that they might be moneyed; to the god Aesculanus and his son Argentinus, that they might have copper and silver money? For they made Aesculanus the father of Argentinus because copper money came into use first and silver later. I am surprised, though, that Argentinus did not beget Aurinus, since gold money followed too.[27]

26 Lucina, a title of Juno, was the goddess who presided over childbirth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quem deum isti si haberent, sicut Saturno Iouem, ita et patri Argentino et auo Aesculano Aurinum praeponerent. Quid ergo erat necesse propter haec bona uel animi uel corporis uel externa tantam deorum turbam colere et inuocare (quos neque omnes commemoraui, nec ipsi potuerunt omnibus bonis humanis minutatim singillatimque digestis deos minutos et singulos prouidere), cum posset magno facilique conpendio una dea Felicitas cuncta conferre, nec solum ad bona capienda quisquam alius, sed neque ad depellenda mala quaereretur? Quur enim esset inuocanda propter fessos diua Fessona, propter hostes depellendos diua Pellonia, propter aegros medicus uel Apollo uel Aesculapius uel ambo simul, quando esset grande periculum?	If they had that god, they would rank Aurinus above his father Argentinus and his grandfather Aesculanus, just as they ranked Jupiter above Saturn. What need was there, then, to worship and invoke such a crowd of gods for these goods of mind, body, or external circumstance (and I have not mentioned them all, nor could they themselves provide minute individual gods for all human goods, divided up minutely and one by one), when the one goddess Felicity could confer everything by a great and easy shortcut, and no other would be sought, not only for obtaining goods but even for driving away evils? For why should the divine Fessona be invoked for the weary, the divine Pellonia for driving off enemies, and for the sick a physician—Apollo or Aesculapius, or both at once when the danger was great?
Nec deus Spiniensis, ut spinas ex agris eradicaret; nec dea Rubigo, ut non accederet, rogaretur: una Felicitate praesente et tuente uel nulla mala exorerentur, uel facillime pellerentur. Postremo quoniam de duabus istis deabus Virtute et Felicitate tractamus: si felicitas uirtutis est praemium, non dea, sed Dei donum est; si autem dea est, quur non dicatur et uirtutem ipsa conferre, quando quidem etiam uirtutem consequi felicitas magna est?	Nor would the god Spiniensis need to be asked to root the thorns out of the fields, nor the goddess Rubigo to stay away: with Felicity alone present and protecting, either no evils would arise or they would be driven off with the greatest ease. Finally, since we are dealing with these two goddesses, Virtue and Felicity: if happiness is the reward of virtue, it is not a goddess but a gift of God; but if she is a goddess, why should she not be said to confer virtue as well, since even to attain virtue is a great happiness?[28]

THE KNOWLEDGE OF HOW TO WORSHIP THE GODS, WHICH VARRO BOASTS HE GAVE THE ROMANS

Varro boasts of teaching which god to ask for what, as one must know a doctor's trade.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.22 Quid est ergo, quod pro ingenti beneficio Varro iactat praestare se ciuibus suis, quia non solum commemorat deos, quos coli oporteat a Romanis, uerum etiam dicit quid ad quemque pertineat? Quoniam nihil prodest, inquit, hominis alicuius medici nomen formamque nosse, et quod sit medicus ignorare: ita dicit nihil prodesse scire deum esse Aesculapium, si nescias eum ualetudini opitulari, adque ita ignores quur ei debeas supplicare.	What, then, of Varro's boast that he is doing his fellow citizens an immense service, because he not only lists the gods whom the Romans ought to worship but also says what belongs to each? "Just as it is no use," he says, "to know the name and appearance of some man who is a physician and not know that he is a physician," so, he says, it is no use to know that Aesculapius is a god if you do not know that he helps health, and so do not know why you ought to pray to him.
Hoc etiam alia similitudine adfirmat dicens, non modo bene uiuere, sed uiuere omnino neminem posse, si	He confirms this with another comparison too, saying that no one can live well—or indeed live at 27 The names are etymological: Statilinus from stare ("stand"), Adeona and Abeona from adire and abire ("approach," "depart"), Mens means "mind," Fructesea comes from fructus ("crops"), Bellona from bellum ("war"), and Pecunia means "money." Aesculanus comes from aes ("copper"), Argentinus from argentum ("silver"), and Aurinus would come from aurum ("gold").

LATIN	ENGLISH
ignoret quisnam sit faber, quis pistor, quis tector, a quo quid utensile petere possit, quem adiutorem adsumere, quem ducem, quem doctorem; eo modo nulli dubium esse adserens ita esse utilem cognitionem deorum, si sciatur quam quisque deus uim et facultatem ac potestatem cuiusque rei habeat. Ex eo enim poterimus, inquit, scire quem cuiusque causa deum aduocare adque inuocare debeamus, ne faciamus, ut mimi solent, et optemus a Libero aquam, a Lymphis uinum. Magna sane utilitas. Quis non huic gratias ageret, si uera monstraret, et si unum uerum Deum, a quo essent omnia bona, hominibus colendum doceret?	all—if he does not know who is a smith, who a baker, who a plasterer, from whom he can ask for any useful thing, whom he can take on as a helper, whom as a guide, whom as a teacher. In the same way, he asserts, no one can doubt that knowledge of the gods is useful on this condition: that one knows what force, capacity, and power each god has over each thing. "For from this," he says, "we shall be able to know which god we ought to call upon and invoke for each purpose, so that we do not do what the mimes do, and ask Liber for water and the Lymphs for wine." A great benefit indeed! Who would not thank him, if he were showing the truth, and if he taught people to worship the one true God, from whom all good things come?[29]

FELICITY, WHOM THE ROMANS, WORSHIPERS OF MANY GODS, LONG DID NOT WORSHIP WITH DIVINE HONOR, THOUGH SHE ALONE WOULD HAVE SUFFICED IN PLACE OF ALL

Felicity, who alone could give everything, was neglected for centuries and never given the highest place.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.23 Sed (unde nunc agitur) si libri et sacra eorum uera sunt et Felicitas dea est, quur non ipsa una quae coleretur constituta est, quae posset uniuersa conferre et conpendio facere felicem? Quis enim optat aliquid propter aliud quam ut felix fiat? Quur denique tam sero huic tantae deae post tot Romanos principes Lucullus aedem constituit? Quur ipse Romulus felicem cupiens condere ciuitatem non huic templum potissimum struxit nec propter aliquid dis ceteris supplicauit, quando nihil deesset, si haec adesset? Nam et ipse nec prius rex, nec ut putant postea deus fieret, si hanc deam propitiam non haberet. Ut quid ergo constituit Romanis deos Ianum, Iouem, Martem, Picum, Faunum, Tiberinum, Herculem et si quos alios?	But—and this is what we are now discussing—if their books and rites are true and Felicity is a goddess, why was she alone not established as the one to be worshiped, since she could confer everything and make a person happy by a shortcut? For who wishes for anything except in order to become happy? Why, finally, did Lucullus build a temple to so great a goddess so late, after so many Roman leaders? Why did Romulus himself, wishing to found a happy city, not build a temple to her above all, and not pray to the other gods for anything, since nothing would be lacking if she were present? For he himself would not have become king first, nor afterward, as they suppose, a god, if he had not had this goddess favorable to him. Why, then, did he establish for the Romans the gods Janus, Jupiter, Mars, Picus, Faunus, Tiberinus, Hercules, and any others there may be?[30]
Ut quid Titus Tatius addidit Saturnum, Opem, Solem, Lunam, Vulcanum, Lucem et quoscumque alios addidit, inter quos etiam deam Cloacinam, Felicitate neglecta? Ut quid Numa tot deos et tot deas sine ista? An eam forte in tanta turba uidere non potuit? Hostilius certe rex deos et ipse nouos Pauorem adque Pallorem propitiandos non introduceret, si deam istam nosset aut coleret. Praesente	Why did Titus Tatius add Saturn, Ops, Sun, Moon, Vulcan, Light, and whatever others he added—among them even the goddess Cloacina—while neglecting Felicity? Why did Numa add so many gods and so many goddesses without her? Or perhaps he could not see her in so great a crowd?

28 Spiniensis comes from spina ("thorn"); rubigo is rust, the blight that attacks grain.
29 Liber was the Roman god of wine; the Lymphs were water nymphs.
30 Lucius Licinius Lucullus, consul in 151 BC, built a temple to Felicitas from the spoils of his campaign in Spain.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quippe Felicitate omnis pauor et pallor non propitiatus abscederet, sed pulsus aufugeret.	King Hostilius, certainly, would not have introduced new gods of his own, Fear and Pallor, to be appeased, if he had known or worshiped this goddess. For with Felicity present, all fear and pallor would not withdraw appeased; they would be driven out and flee.[31]
Deinde quid est hoc, quod iam Romanum imperium longe lateque crescebat, et adhuc nemo Felicitatem colebat? An ideo grandius imperium quam felicius fuit? Nam quo modo ibi esset uera felicitas, ubi uera non erat pietas? Pietas est enim uerax ueri Dei cultus, non cultus falsorum tot deorum, quot daemoniorum. Sed et postea iam in deorum numerum Felicitate suscepta magna bellorum ciuilium infelicitas subsecuta est. An forte iuste est indignata Felicitas, quod et tam sero et non ad honorem, sed ad contumeliam potius inuitata est, ut cum ea coleretur Priapus et Cloacina et Pauor et Pallor et Febris et cetera non numina colendorum, sed crimina colentium?	Next, what does it mean that the Roman Empire was already growing far and wide, and still no one worshiped Felicity? Was that why the empire was greater rather than happier? For how could there be true happiness where there was no true piety? For piety is the truthful worship of the true God, not the worship of all those false gods, who are so many demons. But even later, after Felicity had been received into the number of the gods, the great unhappiness of the civil wars followed. Or perhaps Felicity was justly indignant that she was invited so late, and not to be honored but rather to be insulted, being worshiped alongside Priapus and Cloacina and Fear and Pallor and Fever and the rest—not divinities to be worshiped but the crimes of their worshipers?
Ad extremum si cum turba indignissima tanta dea colenda uisa est, quur non uel inlustrius ceteris colebatur? Quis enim ferat, quod neque inter deos Consentes, quos dicunt in consilium Iouis adhiberi, nec inter deos, quos selectos uocant, Felicitas constituta est? Templum aliquod ei fieret, quod et loci sublimitate et operis dignitate praemineret. Quur enim non aliquid melius quam ipsi Ioui? Nam quae etiam Ioui regnum nisi Felicitas dedit? si tamen cum regnaret felix fuit. Et potior est felicitas regno. Nemo enim dubitat facile inueniri hominem, qui se timeat fieri regem; nullus autem inuenitur, qui se nolit esse felicem.	Finally, if so great a goddess was thought fit to be worshiped along with that most unworthy crowd, why was she not at least worshiped more splendidly than the rest? For who could tolerate that Felicity was placed neither among the Consentes gods, who they say are called into Jupiter's council, nor among the gods they call the select gods? A temple should have been made for her that stood out both for the height of its site and for the dignity of its workmanship. Indeed, why not something better than for Jupiter himself? For who but Felicity gave even Jupiter his kingdom?—if, that is, he was happy while he reigned. And happiness is preferable to a kingdom. For no one doubts that one can easily find a man who is afraid to become king; but no one is found who does not want to be happy.[32]
Ipsi ergo di si per auguria uel quolibet modo eos posse consuli putant, de hac re consulerentur, utrum uellent Felicitati loco cedere, si forte aliorum aedibus uel altaribus iam fuisset locus occupatus, ubi aedes maior adque sublimior Felicitati construeretur; etiam ipse Iuppiter cederet, ut ipsum uerticem collis Capitolini	So if they think the gods themselves can be consulted through augury or in any other way, they should have been consulted on this question: whether they were willing to give up their place to Felicity, if perhaps the site where a larger and 31 Titus Tatius, a Sabine king, shared rule with Romulus; Numa and Tullus Hostilius were Rome's second and third kings.

32 The Di Consentes were the twelve chief gods of Rome; the "select gods" were the twenty principal deities Varro treated in the last book of his Antiquities.

LATIN

Felicitas potius obtineret. Non enim quispiam resisteret Felicitati, nisi, quod fieri non potest, qui esse uellet infelix. Nullo modo omnino, si consuleretur, faceret Iuppiter, quod ei fecerunt tres di, Mars, Terminus et Iuuentas, qui maiori et regi suo nullo modo cedere loco uoluerunt.

Nam sicut habent eorum litterae, cum rex Tarquinius Capitolium fabricari uellet eumque locum, qui ei dignior aptiorque uidebatur, ab dis aliis cerneret praeoccupatum, non audens aliquid contra eorum facere arbitrium et credens eos tanto numini suoque principi uoluntate cessuros, quia multi erant illic, ubi Capitolium constitutum est, per augurium quaesiuit, utrum concedere locum uellent Ioui; adque ipsi inde cedere omnes uoluerunt praeter illos quos commemoraui, Martem, Terminum, Iuuentatem; adque ideo Capitolium ita constructum est, ut etiam isti tres intus essent tam obscuris signis, ut hoc uix homines doctissimi scirent. Nullo modo igitur Felicitatem Iuppiter ipse contemneret, sicut a Termino, Marte, Iuuentate contemtus est. Sed ipsi etiam, qui non cesserant Ioui, profecto cederent Felicitati, quae illis regem fecerat Iouem.

Aut si non cederent, non id contemtu eius facerent, sed quod in domo Felicitatis obscuri esse mallent quam sine illa in locis propriis eminere.

Ita dea Felicitate in loco amplissimo et celsissimo constituta discerent ciues, unde omnis boni uoti petendum esset auxilium, ac sic ipsa suadente natura aliorum deorum superflua multitudine derelicta coleretur una Felicitas, uni supplicaretur, unius templum frequentaretur a ciuibus qui felices esse uellent, quorum esset nemo qui nollet, adque ita ipsa a se ipsa peteretur, quae ab omnibus petebatur. Quis enim aliquid ab aliquo deo nisi felicitatem uelit accipere uel quod ad felicitatem existimat pertinere? Proinde si felicitas habet in potestate cum quo homine sit (habet autem, si dea est): quae tandem stultitia est ab aliquo eam deo petere, quam loftier temple was to be built for Felicity was already occupied by the temples or altars of others. Even Jupiter himself would give way, so that Felicity might rather hold the very summit of the Capitoline Hill. For no one would resist Felicity except someone who wanted to be unhappy—which is impossible. Jupiter, if consulted, would by no means at all do what three gods—Mars, Terminus, and Juventas—did to him, when they absolutely refused to yield their place to their superior and king.[33]

ENGLISH

For, as their writings record, when King Tarquin wanted to build the Capitol and saw that the site that seemed to him the worthiest and most suitable was already occupied by other gods, he did not dare to do anything against their will. Believing that they would willingly give way to so great a divinity, their own sovereign—for there were many of them on the spot where the Capitol was built—he asked by augury whether they were willing to yield the place to Jupiter. And all of them were willing to move from there, except those I have mentioned: Mars, Terminus, and Juventas. So the Capitol was built in such a way that these three were also inside it, but with images so obscure that even the most learned people scarcely knew it. Jupiter himself, then, would by no means have scorned Felicity, as he was scorned by Terminus, Mars, and Juventas. But even those who had not given way to Jupiter would surely give way to Felicity, who had made Jupiter their king.

Or if they did not give way, they would not do so out of contempt for her, but because they would rather be obscure in the house of Felicity than stand out in their own places without her.

Thus, with the goddess Felicity established in the most spacious and loftiest place, the citizens would learn where help was to be sought for every good wish. And so, at nature's own prompting, the superfluous multitude of other gods would be abandoned: Felicity alone would be worshiped, she alone prayed to, her temple alone thronged by citizens who wanted to be happy—and there would be none of them who did not want this. And so she who was sought by everyone would be sought from herself. For who would want to receive any-33 Terminus was the god of boundary stones and Juventas the goddess of youth; Livy (1.55) tells the story of their refusal.

LATIN	ENGLISH
possis a se ipsa inpetrare? Hanc ergo deam super deos ceteros honorare etiam loci dignitate debuerunt.	thing from any god except happiness, or what he thinks contributes to happiness? Accordingly, if happiness has it in her power to decide with which person she will be (and she has, if she is a goddess), what folly is it, really, to seek her from some god when you could obtain her from herself? So they ought to have honored this goddess above the other gods, by the dignity of her site as well.
Sicut enim aput ipsos legitur, Romani ueteres nescio quem Summanum, cui nocturna fulmina tribuebant, coluerunt magis quam Iouem, ad quem diurna fulmina pertinerent. Sed postquam Ioui templum insigne ac sublime constructum est, propter aedis dignitatem sic ad eum multitudo confluxit, ut uix inueniatur qui Summani nomen, quod audire iam non potest, se saltem legisse meminerit. Si autem felicitas dea non est, quoniam, quod uerum est, munus est Dei: ille Deus quaeratur, qui eam dare possit, et falsorum deorum multitudo noxia relinquatur, quam stultorum hominum multitudo uana sectatur, Dei dona deos sibi faciens et ipsum, cuius ea dona sunt, obstinatione superbae uoluntatis offendens.	For, as we read in their own writers, the early Romans worshiped some Summanus or other, to whom they attributed lightning by night, more than Jupiter, to whom lightning by day belonged. But after a splendid and lofty temple was built for Jupiter, the crowd flocked to him because of the temple's grandeur—so much so that one can hardly find anyone who remembers even having read the name of Summanus, since it can no longer be heard. But if happiness is not a goddess, because—as is the truth—it is a gift of God, then let that God be sought who can give it, and let the harmful multitude of false gods be abandoned, which the empty multitude of foolish people follows, making gods for themselves out of God's gifts and offending him whose gifts they are by the obstinacy of a proud will.
Sic enim carere non potest infelicitate, qui tamquam deam felicitatem colit et Deum datorem felicitatis relinquit, sicut carere non potest fame, qui panem pictum lingit et ab homine, qui uerum habet, non petit.	For whoever worships happiness as a goddess and abandons God, the giver of happiness, can no more escape unhappiness than someone who licks painted bread, and does not ask the man who has real bread for it, can escape hunger.

HOW THE PAGANS DEFEND THEIR WORSHIPING DIVINE GIFTS THEMSELVES AMONG THE GODS

Pagans reply that their ancestors named unknown gods after the gifts they gave.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.24 Libet autem eorum considerare rationes. Usque adeone, inquiunt, maiores nostros insipientes fuisse credendum est, ut haec nescirent munera diuina esse, non deos? Sed quoniam sciebant nemini talia nisi aliquo deo largiente concedi, quorum deorum nomina non inueniebant, earum rerum nominibus appellabant deos, quas ab eis sentiebant dari, aliqua uocabula inde flectentes, sicut a bello Bellonam nuncupauerunt, non Bellum; sicut a cunis Cuninam, non Cunam; sicut a segetibus Segetiam, non Segetem, a pomis Pomonam, non Pomum: sicut a bubus Bubonam, non Bouem: aut certe nulla uocabuli declinatione sicut res ipsae nominantur, ut Pecunia dicta est dea, quae dat pecuniam, non omnino pecunia dea ipsa	But I should like to examine their reasoning. "Are we really to believe," they say, "that our ancestors were so foolish as not to know that these things are divine gifts, not gods? On the contrary, they knew that such things are granted to no one except by the bounty of some god. Since they could not find the names of those gods, they called the gods by the names of the things they perceived to be given by them, sometimes altering the words a little. So from bellum [war] they named Bellona, not Bellum; from cunae [cradles], Cunina, not Cuna; from segetes [crops], Segetia, not Seges; from poma [fruits], Pomona, not Pomum; from boves

LATIN	ENGLISH
putata est; ita Virtus, quae dat uirtutem, Honor, qui honorem, Concordia, quae concordiam, Victoria, quae dat uictoriam.	[oxen], Bubona, not Bos. Or else they changed the word not at all, but named the gods just as the things themselves are named. So the goddess who gives money was called Pecunia [Money], without the money itself ever being thought a goddess. In the same way there is Virtus [Virtue], who gives virtue; Honor, who gives honor; Concordia [Concord], who gives concord; Victoria [Victory], who gives victory."
Ita, inquiunt, cum Felicitas dea dicitur, non ipsa quae datur, sed numen illud adtenditur a quo felicitas datur.	"So," they say, "when Felicity is called a goddess, what is meant is not the thing itself that is given, but the divinity by whom happiness is given."

THE ONE GOD ALONE WHO IS TO BE WORSHIPED: THOUGH HIS NAME IS UNKNOWN, HE IS FELT TO BE THE GIVER OF HAPPINESS

If happiness comes from an unknown god, that one God, not Jupiter, should be worshiped.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.25 Ista nobis reddita ratione multo facilius eis, quorum cor non nimis obduruit, persuadebimus fortasse quod uolumus. Si enim iam humana infirmitas sensit non nisi ab aliquo deo dari posse felicitatem, et hoc senserunt homines, qui tam multos colebant deos, in quibus et ipsum eorum regem Iouem: quia nomen eius, a quo daretur felicitas, ignorabant, ideo ipsius rei nomine, quam credebant ab illo dari, eum appellare uoluerunt, satis ergo indicarunt nec ab ipso Ioue dari posse felicitatem, quem iam colebant, sed utique ab illo, quem nomine ipsius felicitatis colendum esse censebant. Confirmo prorsus a quodam deo, quem nesciebant, eos credidisse dari felicitatem: ipse ergo quaeratur, ipse colatur, et sufficit. Repudietur strepitus innumerabilium daemoniorum; illi non sufficiat hic deus, cui non sufficit munus eius.	Now that this reasoning has been offered to us, we shall perhaps find it much easier to persuade those whose hearts are not too hardened of what we want. Human weakness has already perceived that happiness can be given only by some god. This was perceived by people who worshiped a great many gods, among them Jupiter himself, their king. Because they did not know the name of the one by whom happiness was given, they chose to call him by the name of the very thing they believed he gave. In doing so, they showed clearly enough that happiness could not be given even by Jupiter, whom they already worshiped, but only by the one whom they thought should be worshiped under the name of happiness itself. I fully affirm that they believed happiness to be given by some god whom they did not know. Let him, then, be sought; let him be worshiped; and that is enough. Let the din of countless demons be cast aside. Let this god not be enough for anyone for whom his gift is not enough.
Illi, inquam, non sufficiat ad colendum Deus dator felicitatis, cui non sufficit ad accipiendum ipsa felicitas. Cui autem sufficit (non enim habet homo quid amplius optare debeat), seruiat uni Deo datori felicitatis. Non est ipse, quem nominant Iouem. Nam si eum datorem felicitatis agnoscerent, non utique alium uel aliam, a qua daretur felicitas, nomine ipsius felicitatis inquirerent, neque ipsum Iouem cum tantis iniuriis colendum putarent. Iste alienarum dicitur adulter uxorum, iste pueri pulchri inpudicus amator et raptor.	Let the God who gives happiness, I say, not be enough to worship for anyone for whom happiness itself is not enough to receive. But let anyone for whom it is enough (and a human being has nothing more he ought to wish for) serve the one God who gives happiness. This is not the one they call Jupiter. For if they acknowledged him as the giver of happiness, they would certainly not look for another god or goddess, by whom happiness might be given, under the name of happiness itself. Nor would they think that Jupiter himself should be worshiped amid such insults. He is said to be an adulterer with other men's wives. He is said to be the shameless lover and abductor of a beautiful boy.[34]

LATIN	ENGLISH

THE THEATRICAL SHOWS THAT THE GODS DEMANDED THEIR WORSHIPERS CELEBRATE FOR THEM

Cicero blames Homer for the gods' crimes, yet the gods themselves demanded shows acting them out.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.26 Sed fingebat haec Homerus, ait Tullius, et humana ad deos transferebat: diuina mallem ad nos. Merito displicuit uiro graui diuinorum criminum poeta confictor. Quur ergo ludi scaenici, ubi haec dictitantur cantitantur actitantur, deorum honoribus exhibentur, inter res diuinas a doctissimis conscribuntur? Hic exclamet Cicero non contra figmenta poetarum, sed contra instituta maiorum; an exclamarent et illi: Quid nos fecimus! Ipsi di ista suis honoribus exhibenda flagitauerunt, atrociter imperarunt, cladem nisi fieret praenuntiarunt, quia neglectum est aliquid, seuerissime uindicarunt, quia id quod neglectum fuerat factum est, placatos se esse monstrarunt. Inter eorum commemoratur uirtutes et miranda facta quod dicam.	"But Homer invented these things," says Cicero, "and transferred human qualities to the gods; I would rather he had transferred divine ones to us." That serious man was rightly displeased with the poet who fabricated crimes for the gods. Why, then, are theatrical shows presented in honor of the gods, when these very things are constantly recited, sung and acted in them? Why do the most learned men list them among divine rites? Here let Cicero cry out, not against the inventions of the poets, but against the institutions of the ancestors. Or would the ancestors not cry out in turn: "What have we done? The gods themselves demanded that these things be presented in their honor. They commanded it fiercely and foretold disaster unless it was done. When something was neglected, they punished it most severely. When what had been neglected was done, they showed that they were appeased." Among their mighty works and wondrous deeds is recorded the story I am about to tell.[35]
Tito Latinio rustico Romano patri familias dictum est in somnis, in senatum nuntiaret, ut ludi Romani instaurarentur, quod primo eorum die in quodam scelerato, qui populo spectante ad supplicium duci iussus est, numinibus uidelicet ex ludis hilaritatem quaerentibus triste displicuisset imperium. Cum ergo ille qui somnio commonitus erat postero die iussa facere non ausus esset, secunda nocte hoc idem rursus seuerius imperatum est: amisit filium, quia non fecit. Tertia nocte dictum est homini, quod maior ei poena, si non faceret, inmineret. Cum etiam sic non auderet, in morbum incidit acrem et horribilem. Tum uero ex amicorum sententia ad magistratus rem detulit adque in lectica adlatus est in senatum expositoque somnio recepta continuo ualetudine pedibus suis sanus abscessit.	Titus Latinius, a Roman countryman and head of a household, was told in a dream to report to the senate that the Roman Games should be held over again. The reason was that on their first day a grim order had displeased the divinities, who were evidently looking for merriment from the games: a certain criminal had been ordered to be led to execution while the people looked on. The man warned by the dream did not dare to carry out the command the next day. On the second night the same order was given again, more sternly, and he lost his son because he did not obey. On the third night he was told that a greater punishment threatened him if he did not obey. When even then he did not dare, he fell into an acute and dreadful

34 The boy is Ganymede, whom Jupiter carried off to be his cupbearer.
35 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.65.

LATIN

ENGLISH

illness. Then at last, on the advice of his friends, he brought the matter before the magistrates and was carried into the senate on a litter. When he had related the dream, his health was immediately restored, and he walked away well, on his own feet.[36]

Tanto stupefactus miraculo senatus quadruplicata pecunia ludos censuit instaurari. Quis non uideat, qui sanum sapit, subditos homines malignis daemonibus, a quorum dominatione non liberat nisi gratia Dei per Iesum Christum dominum nostrum, ui conpulsos esse exhibere talibus dis, quae recto consilio poterant turpia iudicari? In illis certe ludis poetica numinum crimina frequentantur, qui ludi cogentibus numinibus iussu senatus instaurabantur. In illis ludis corruptorem pudicitiae Iouem turpissimi histriones cantabant agebant placebant. Si illud fingebatur, ille irasceretur; si autem suis criminibus etiam fictis delectabatur, quando coleretur, nisi diabolo seruiretur? Itane iste Romanum conderet dilataret conseruaret imperium, quouis Romano, cui talia displicebant, homine abiectior? Iste daret felicitatem, qui tam infeliciter colebatur, et nisi ita coleretur, infelicius irascebatur?

Astounded by so great a miracle, the senate decreed that the games be held again at four times the expense. Who with a sound mind does not see what was happening? People subject to malignant demons, from whose domination nothing frees us but the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, were compelled by force to present to such gods things that sound judgment could have recognized as shameful. Certainly the poets' tales of the divinities' crimes are constantly performed in those games, and it was those very games that were held again by order of the senate, under compulsion from the divinities. In those games the vilest actors sang of Jupiter, the corrupter of chastity, acted him and won applause. If this was fiction, he should have been angry. But if he delighted in his crimes, even fictional ones, then when he was worshiped, who was being served but the devil? Was this the one to found, extend and preserve the Roman Empire—a god more contemptible than any Roman who disliked such things? Was this the one to give happiness—a god who was worshiped so unhappily, and who, if not worshiped in this way, grew angry more unhappily still?

THE THREE KINDS OF GODS DISCUSSED BY THE PONTIFF SCAEVOLA

Scaevola held that the poets' gods are false but that the people should be deceived about religion.

LATIN

ENGLISH

4.27 Relatum est in litteras doctissimum pontificem Scaeuolam disputasse tria genera tradita deorum: unum a poetis, alterum a philosophis, tertium a principibus ciuitatis. Primum genus nugatorium dicit esse, quod multa de dis fingantur indigna; secundum non congruere ciuitatibus, quod habeat aliqua superuacua, aliqua etiam quae obsit populis nosse. De superuacuis non magna causa est; solet enim et a iuris peritis dici: Superflua non nocent. Quae sunt autem illa, quae prolata in multitudinem nocent? Haec, inquit, non esse deos

It is recorded that the most learned pontiff Scaevola argued that three kinds of gods have been handed down: one by the poets, a second by the philosophers, a third by the leaders of the state. The first kind, he says, is trifling, because many unworthy things are invented about the gods. The second does not suit states, because it contains some things that are superfluous, and some that it would actually harm the people to know. About the superfluous there is no great issue, for the leg-

36 The story is told by Livy (2.36) and Cicero (On Divination 1.55); the Roman Games were Rome's chief annual festival in honor of Jupiter.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Herculem, Aesculapium, Castorem, Pollucem; proditur enim a doctis, quod homines fuerint et humana condicione defecerint. Quid aliud? Quod eorum qui sint di non habeant ciuitates uera simulacra, quod uerus Deus nec sexum habeat nec aetatem nec definita corporis membra.	al experts too have a saying: "What is superfluous does no harm." But what are the things that do harm if they are brought out before the multitude? "These," he says: "that Hercules, Aesculapius, Castor and Pollux are not gods. For learned men teach that they were human beings and died in accordance with the human condition." What else? "That states do not have true images of those who really are gods, since the true God has neither sex nor age nor defined bodily limbs."[37]
Haec pontifex nosse populos non uult; nam falsa esse non putat. Expedire igitur existimat falli in religione ciuitates. Quod dicere etiam in libris rerum diuinarum Varro ipse non dubitat. Praeclara religio, quo confugiat liberandus infirmus, et cum ueritatem qua liberetur inquirat, credatur ei expedire quod fallitur.	The pontiff does not want the people to know these things, for he does not think they are false. He therefore considers it expedient for states to be deceived in religion. Varro himself does not hesitate to say the same, even in his books on divine matters. A splendid religion for the weak to flee to for liberation! When he seeks the truth that would set him free, it is thought expedient for him to be deceived.
Poeticum sane deorum genus quur Scaeuola respuat, eisdem litteris non tacetur: quia sic uidelicet deos deformant, ut nec bonis hominibus conparentur, cum alium faciant furari, alium adulterare, sic item aliquid aliter turpiter adque inepte dicere ac facere; tres inter se deas certasse de praemio pulchritudinis, uictas duas a Venere Troiam euertisse; Iouem ipsum conuerti in bouem aut cygnum, ut cum aliqua concumbat; deam homini nubere; Saturnum liberos deuorare: nihil denique posse confingi miraculorum adque uitiorum, quod non ibi reperiatur adque ab deorum natura longe absit, o Scaeuola pontifex maxime, ludos tolle, si potes; praecipe populis, ne tales honores dis inmortalibus deferant, ubi crimina deorum libeat mirari et quae fieri possunt placeat imitari.	Why Scaevola rejects the poetic kind of gods is not passed over in silence in the same writings. It is, of course, because the poets so disfigure the gods that they cannot even be compared with good men. They make one god steal and another commit adultery, and likewise have them say or do other base and absurd things of one sort or another. They tell how three goddesses competed with one another for the prize of beauty, and how the two who were defeated by Venus destroyed Troy. They tell how Jupiter himself turned into a bull or a swan to sleep with some woman, how a goddess married a man, how Saturn devoured his children. In short, nothing marvelous or vicious can be imagined that is not found there, however utterly foreign to the nature of the gods. O Scaevola, chief pontiff, abolish the games, if you can! Command the people not to pay such honors to the immortal gods, where they enjoy admiring the crimes of the gods and like to imitate those that can be done.[38]
Si autem tibi responderit populus: Vos nobis inportastis ista pontifices: deos ipsos roga, quibus instigantibus ista iussistis, ne talia sibi iubeant exhiberi. Quae si mala sunt et propterea nullo modo de deorum maiestate credenda, maior est deorum iniuria, de quibus inpune finguntur.	But suppose the people answer you: "You pontiffs brought these things in on us." Then ask the gods themselves, at whose instigation you ordered these things, not to order such things to be presented to them. If these things are evil, and therefore 37 Quintus Mucius Scaevola (died 82 BC), jurist and pontifex maximus, Rome's chief priest.

38 The beauty contest is the judgment of Paris, after which Juno and Minerva turned against Troy; the goddess who married a mortal is Thetis, bride of Peleus.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sed non te audiunt, daemones sunt, praua docent, turpibus gaudent: non solum non deputant iniuriam, si de illis ista fingantur, sed eam potius iniuriam ferre non possunt, si per eorum sollemnia non agantur. Iam uero si aduersus eos Iouem iuterpelles, maxime ob eam causam, quia eius plura crimina ludis scaenicis actitantur: nonne etiamsi Deum Iouem nuncupatis, a quo regitur totus adque administratur hic mundus, eo illi fit a uobis maxima iniuria, quod eum cum istis colendum putatis eorumque regem esse perhibetis?	in no way to be believed of the majesty of the gods, the greater is the wrong done to the gods about whom they are invented with impunity. But the gods do not listen to you. They are demons; they teach depravity; they delight in what is shameful. Not only do they not count it a wrong if such things are invented about them. On the contrary, the wrong they cannot bear is for these things not to be performed at their festivals. Now suppose you were to appeal to Jupiter against them, especially since more of his crimes are acted in the theatrical shows than anyone else's. You call Jupiter the God by whom this whole world is ruled and governed. Even so, are you not doing him the greatest wrong precisely by thinking that he should be worshiped together with these others, and by declaring him their king?

WHETHER THE WORSHIP OF THE GODS HELPED THE ROMANS GAIN AND ENLARGE THEIR EMPIRE

Gods appeased by shameful shows could not have enlarged or preserved the Roman Empire.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.28 Nullo igitur modo di tales, qui talibus placantur uel potius accusantur honoribus, ut maius sit crimen quod eis falsis oblectantur, quam si de illis uera dicerentur, Romanum imperium augere et conseruare potuissent. Hoc enim si possent, Graecis potius donum tam grande conferrent, qui eos in huiusce modi rebus diuinis, hoc est ludis scaenicis, honorabilius digniusque coluerunt, quando et a morsibus poetarum, quibus deos dilacerari uidebant, se non subtraxerunt, dando eis licentiam male tractandi homines quos liberet, et ipsos scaenicos non turpes iudicauerunt, sed dignos etiam praeclaris honoribus habuerunt. Sicut autem potuerunt auream pecuniam habere Romani, quamuis deum Aurinum non colerent: sic et argenteam habere potuerunt et aeream, si nec Argentinum nec eius patrem colerent Aesculanum, et sic omnia quae retexere piget.	Gods like these, then, could in no way have increased and preserved the Roman Empire. They are appeased, or rather accused, by such honors. Indeed, it is a greater crime that they take delight in falsehoods about themselves than if true things were told of them. If they had been able to do this, they would rather have bestowed so great a gift on the Greeks. The Greeks worshiped them more honorably and worthily in divine rites of this kind, that is, in theatrical shows. They did not exempt themselves from the bites of the poets, by which they saw the gods torn to pieces, and gave the poets license to abuse any man they pleased. They did not judge the actors themselves disgraceful, but even held them worthy of distinguished honors. Moreover, just as the Romans could have gold money even though they did not worship the god Aurinus, so they could also have had silver and copper money even if they worshiped neither Argentinus nor his father Aesculanus. And so on with everything else, which I am tired of going over again.[39]
Sic ergo et regnum inuito quidem Deo uero nullo modo habere possent; dis uero istis falsis et multis ignoratis siue contemtis adque illo uno cognito et fide sincera ac	So too, then, they could in no way have had a kingdom against the will of the true God. But if these many false gods had been ignored or despised,

39 Augustine mocked these gods of gold (aurum), silver (argentum) and copper (aes) money in chapter 21.

LATIN	ENGLISH
moribus culto et melius hic regnum haberent, quantumcumque haberent, et post haec acciperent sempiternum, siue hic haberent siue non haberent.	and that one God had been known and worshiped with sincere faith and good conduct, they would have had a better kingdom here, whatever its size. And afterward they would have received an everlasting one, whether they had a kingdom here or not.

THE FALSITY OF THE OMEN THOUGHT TO SHOW THE STRENGTH AND STABILITY OF THE ROMAN KINGDOM

The omen that Terminus would not yield to Jupiter proved false when Rome's borders shrank.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.29 Nam illud quale est quod pulcherrimum auspicium fuisse dixerunt, quod paulo ante commemoraui, Martem et Terminum et Iuuentatem nec Ioui regi deorum loco cedere uoluisse? Sic enim, inquiunt, significatum est, Martiam gentem, id est Romanam, nemini locum quem teneret daturam, Romanos quoque terminos propter deum Terminum neminem commoturum, iuuentutem etiam Romanam propter deam Iuuentatem nemini esse cessuram. Videant ergo quo modo habeant istum regem deorum suorum et datorem regni sui, ut eum auspicia ista pro aduersario ponerent, cui non cedere pulchrum esset. Quamquam haec si uera sunt, non habent omnino quid timeant Non enim confessuri sunt, quod di cesserint Christo, qui Ioui cedere noluerunt; saluis quippe imperii finibus Christo cedere potuerunt et de sedibus locorum et maxime de corde credentium.	What, then, are we to make of what they called a most splendid omen, which I mentioned a little earlier: that Mars, Terminus and Juventas refused to give up their place even to Jupiter, king of the gods? This signified, they say, that the people of Mars, that is, the Roman people, would yield to no one the place it held; that no one would move the Roman boundaries, because of the god Terminus; and that Roman youth would give way to no one, because of the goddess Juventas. Let them consider, then, what sort of king of their gods and giver of their kingdom they take him to be, if these omens cast him as an adversary to whom it was splendid not to yield. And yet, if these things are true, they have nothing at all to fear. For they will not admit that the gods who would not yield to Jupiter have yielded to Christ. Yet with the boundaries of the empire intact, they could indeed yield to Christ, both from their dwelling places and above all from the hearts of believers.
Sed antequam Christus uenisset in carne, antequam denique ista scriberentur, quae de libris eorum proferimus, sed tamen postea quam factum est sub rege Tarquinio illud auspicium, aliquotiens Romanus exercitus fusus est, hoc est uersus in fugam, falsumque ostendit auspicium, quo Iuuentas illa non cesserat Ioui, et gens Martia superantibus adque inrumpentibus Gallis in ipsa Urbe contrita est, et termini imperii deficientibus multis ad Hannibalem ciuitatibus in angustum fuerant coartati. Ita euacuata est pulchritudo auspiciorum, remansit contra Iouem contumacia, non deorum, sed daemoniorum. Aliud est enim non cessisse, aliud unde cesseras redisse. Quamquam et postea in orientalibus partibus Hadriani uoluntate mutati sunt termini imperii Romani.	But before Christ came in the flesh, and indeed before the things we are quoting from their books were written—though still after that omen occurred under King Tarquin—the Roman army was several times routed, that is, put to flight. This proved false the omen by which Juventas had not yielded to Jupiter. The people of Mars was crushed in the City itself when the Gauls overwhelmed it and broke in. And when many cities defected to Hannibal, the boundaries of the empire were squeezed into a narrow space. So the splendor of the omens was emptied out, and what remained was defiance against Jupiter—the defiance not of gods but of demons. For it is one thing not to have yielded, another to have returned to the place from which you had yielded. And later, too, the boundaries of the Roman Empire in the eastern regions were changed by the will of Hadrian.[40]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Ille namque tres prouincias nobiles, Armeniam, Mesopotamiam, Assyriam, Persarum concessit imperio, ut deus ille Terminus, qui Romanos terminos secundum istos tuebatur et per illud pulcherrimum auspicium loco non cesserat Ioui, plus Hadrianum regem hominum quam regem deorum timuisse uideatur. Receptis quoque alio tempore prouinciis memoratis nostra paene memoria retrorsus Terminus cessit, quando Iulianus deorum illorum oraculis deditus inmoderato ausu naues iussit incendi, quibus alimonia portabatur; qua exercitus destitutus mox etiam ipso hostili uulnere extincto in tantam est redactus inopiam, ut inde nullus euaderet undique hostibus incursantibus militem imperatoris morte turbatum, nisi placito pacis illic imperii fines constituerentur, ubi hodieque persistunt, non quidem tanto detrimento, quantum concesserat Hadrianus, sed media tamen conpositione defixi.

For he ceded three noble provinces, Armenia, Mesopotamia and Assyria, to the rule of the Persians. So that god Terminus, who according to them protected the Roman boundaries and by that most splendid omen had not yielded his place to Jupiter, seems to have feared Hadrian, a king of men, more than the king of the gods. The provinces I mentioned were recovered at another time, but almost within our own memory Terminus retreated again. This was when Julian, devoted to the oracles of those gods, with reckless daring ordered the ships carrying the army's food supply to be burned. The army, deprived of its supplies, and soon after bereft of the emperor himself, who was killed by an enemy wound, was reduced to such want that not one man would have escaped. For the enemy attacked from all sides the soldiers who had been thrown into confusion by the emperor's death. They were saved only because a peace agreement fixed the empire's frontiers there, where they remain to this day. The loss was not, indeed, as great as the territory Hadrian had conceded, but the frontiers were still fixed by a compromise halfway between.[41]

Uano igitur augurio deus Terminus non cessit Ioui, qui cessit Hadriani uoluntati, cessit etiam Iuliani temeritati et Iouiani necessitati. Uiderunt haec intellegentiores grauioresque Romani; sed contra consuetudinem ciuitatis, quae daemonicis ritibus fuerat obligata, parum ualebant, quia et ipsi, etiamsi illa uana esse sentiebant, naturae tamen rerum sub unius ueri Dei regimine adque imperio constitutae religiosum cultum, qui Deo debetur, exhibendum putabant, seruientes, ut ait apostolus, creaturae potius quam creatori, qui est benedictus in saecula. Huius Dei ueri erat auxilium necessarium, a quo mitterentur sancti uiri et ueraciter pii, qui pro uera religione morerentur, ut falsae a uiuentibus tollerentur.

It was therefore an empty augury by which the god Terminus did not yield to Jupiter—the same god who yielded to Hadrian's will, and yielded also to Julian's rashness and to Jovian's necessity. The more intelligent and serious Romans saw this, but they had little power against the custom of the city, which had been bound to demonic rites. For even they, though they felt these things were empty, nevertheless thought that the religious worship owed to God should be offered to the nature of things, which is established under the rule and command of the one true God. They were, as the apostle says, "serving the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever." The help of this true God was needed, so that holy and truly devout men might be sent who would die for the true religion, and so that false religions might be removed from among the living.[42]

40 The Gauls sacked Rome around 390 BC; Hannibal invaded Italy in the Second Punic War (218–201 BC). Hadrian, emperor AD 117–138, gave up Trajan's eastern conquests.

41 Julian, the last pagan emperor (AD 361–363), died on campaign against Persia; his successor Jovian made peace by ceding territory.

42 Romans 1:25.

WHAT EVEN THEIR WORSHIPERS ADMIT THEY THINK ABOUT THE GODS OF THE NATIONS

Cicero and Balbus condemn superstition yet cannot free the ancestral religion from the same charge.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.30	Cicero augur inridet auguria et inridet homines corui et corniculae uocibus uitae consilia moderantes. Sed iste Academicus, qui omnia esse contendit incerta, indignus est qui habeat ullam in his rebus auctoritatem. Disputat aput eum Quintus Lucilius Balbus in secundo de deorum natura libro, et cum ipse superstitiones ex natura rerum uelut physicas et philosophicas inserat, indignatur tamen institutioni simulacrorum et opinionibus fabulosis ita loquens: Videtisne igitur, ut a physicis rebus bene adque utiliter inuentis ratio sit tracta ad commenticios et fictos deos? Quae res genuit falsas opiniones erroresque turbulentos et superstitiones paene aniles. Et formae enim nobis deorum et aetates et uestitus ornatusque noti sunt, genera praeterea, coniugia, cognationes, omniaque traducta ad similitudinem inbecillitatis humanae.	Cicero, though an augur himself, mocks auguries. He mocks people who steer the decisions of their lives by the cries of a raven or a crow. But this Academic, who insists that everything is uncertain, does not deserve to carry any authority in these matters. In Cicero's second book On the Nature of the Gods, Quintus Lucilius Balbus presents an argument. Balbus himself brings in superstitions drawn from the nature of things, as though they were matters of natural science and philosophy. Yet he is indignant at the setting up of images and at mythical beliefs, and speaks as follows: "Do you see, then, how reasoning has been dragged away from natural phenomena, which were well and usefully discovered, toward invented and fictitious gods? This has given birth to false beliefs, confused errors and superstitions fit for old women. For the shapes of the gods are known to us, along with their ages, their clothing and their adornments. So are their lineages, marriages and kinships, and everything about them has been remodeled in the likeness of human weakness.[43]
	Nam et perturbatis animis inducuntur; accepimus enim deorum cupiditates aegritudines iracundias. Nec uero, ut fabulae ferunt, di bellis proeliisque caruerunt; nec solum, ut aput Homerum, cum duos exercitus contrarios alii di ex alia parte defenderent, sed etiam (ut cum Titanis aut cum Gigantibus) sua propria bella gesserunt. Haec et dicuntur et creduntur stultissime et plena sunt uanitatis summaeque leuitatis. Ecce interim quae confitentur qui defendunt deos gentium. Deinde cum haec ad superstitionem pertinere dicat, ad religionem uero, quae ipse secundum Stoicos uidetur docere: non enim philosophi solum, inquit, uerum etiam maiores nostri superstitionem a religione separauerunt; nam qui totos dies precabantur, inquit, et immolabant, ut sibi sui liberi superstites essent, superstitiosi sunt appellati.	They are even portrayed with troubled minds, for we have heard of the gods' lusts, sorrows and fits of anger. Nor, as the stories tell it, have the gods been without wars and battles. And this is not only as in Homer, where different gods defended two opposing armies from opposite sides. They have also waged wars of their own, as against the Titans or the Giants. All this is said and believed most foolishly, and it is full of emptiness and utter frivolity." Look, meanwhile, at what those who defend the gods of the nations admit! Next he says that these things belong to superstition, while what he himself appears to teach along Stoic lines belongs to religion. "For not only the philosophers," he says, "but our ancestors too separated superstition from religion. Those who prayed and sacrificed all day long that their children might outlive them were called superstitious."[44]
	Quis non intellegat eum conari, dum consuetudinem ciuitatis timet, religionem laudare maiorum eamque a	Who can fail to see what he is doing? Because he fears the custom of the city, he is trying to praise

43 Quintus Lucilius Balbus is the Stoic spokesman in Book 2 of Cicero's dialogue On the Nature of the Gods; Cicero himself held the priestly office of augur, an interpreter of omens from birds.

LATIN	ENGLISH
superstitione uelle seiungere, sed quo modo id possit non inuenire? Si enim a maioribus illi sunt appellati superstitiosi, qui totos dies precabantur et immolabant, numquid et illi, qui instituerunt (quod iste reprehendit) deorum simulacra diuersa aetate et ueste distincta, deorum genera coniugia cognationes? Haec utique cum tamquam superstitiosa culpantur, inplicat ista culpa maiores talium simulacrorum institutores adque cultores; inplicat et ipsum, qui, quantolibet eloquio se in libertatem nitatur euoluere, necesse habebat ista uenerari; nec quod in hac disputatione disertus insonat, muttire auderet in populi contione.	the religion of the ancestors and wants to separate it from superstition. But he cannot find a way to do it. For if the ancestors called those who prayed and sacrificed all day long superstitious, what of those who established the very things he criticizes? These people set up images of the gods distinguished by different ages and dress, and gave the gods lineages, marriages and kinships. When these things are condemned as superstitious, the blame certainly falls on the ancestors who set up and worshiped such images. It falls on him as well. However much eloquence he strains to wriggle his way into freedom, he was obliged to venerate these things. Nor would he have dared to mutter in a public assembly what he proclaims so eloquently in this debate.
Agamus itaque Christiani Domino Deo nostro gratias, non caelo et terrae, sicut iste disputat, sed ei qui fecit caelum et terram, qui has superstitiones, quas iste Balbus uelut balbutiens uix reprehendit, per altissimam Christi humilitatem, per apostolorum praedicationem, per fidem martyrum pro ueritate morientium et cum ueritate uiuentium non solum in cordibus religiosis, uerum etiam in aedibus superstitiosis libera suorum seruitute subuertit.	Let us Christians, then, give thanks to the Lord our God—not to heaven and earth, as this man argues, but to him who made heaven and earth. It is he who has overthrown these superstitions, which this Balbus, stammering as his name suggests, barely manages to criticize. He overthrew them through the most exalted humility of Christ and through the preaching of the apostles. He overthrew them through the faith of the martyrs, who died for the truth and live with the truth. He did this not only in religious hearts but even in superstitious temples, by the free servitude of his own people.[45]

THE OPINIONS OF VARRO, WHO REJECTED POPULAR BELIEF AND, THOUGH HE DID NOT REACH KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRUE GOD, STILL HELD THAT ONE GOD SHOULD BE WORSHIPED

Varro admits he would have founded religion differently and thought worship without images purer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
4.31 Quid ipse Varro, quem dolemus in rebus diuinis ludos scaenicos, quamuis non indicio proprio, posuisse, cum ad deos colendos multis locis uelut religiosus hortetur, nonne ita confitetur non se illa iudicio suo sequi, quae ciuitatem Romanam instituisse commemorat, ut, si eam ciuitatem nouam constitueret, ex naturae potius formula deos nominaque eorum se fuisse dedicaturum non dubitet confiteri? Sed iam quoniam in uetere populo esset, acceptam ab antiquis nominum et cognominum historiam tenere, ut tradita est, debere se dicit, et ad eum finem illa scribere ac perscrutari, ut potius eos magis colere quam despicere uulgus uelit. Quibus uerbis homo	What of Varro himself? We regret that he placed theatrical shows among divine matters, even though he did not do so by his own judgment. In many places he urges the worship of the gods like a religious man. Yet does he not admit that the things he records the Roman city as having established are not what he follows by his own judgment? He even does not hesitate to confess that, if he were founding that city anew, he would have dedicated the gods and their names according to the pattern of nature instead. But since he now

44 The pun is untranslatable: superstites, "survivors," is taken as the root of superstitiosi, "superstitious."
45 Latin balbus means "stammerer"; Augustine puns on the name with balbutiens, "stammering."

LATIN	ENGLISH
acutissimus satis indicat non se aperire omnia, quae non sibi tantum contemtui essent, sed etiam ipsi uulgo despicienda uiderentur, nisi tacerentur.	lives among an ancient people, he says that he must keep the history of names and surnames received from the ancients just as it was handed down. He says he writes and investigates these matters so that the common people may be more willing to worship the gods than to despise them. With these words this most acute man shows clearly enough that he is not disclosing everything. Some things were objects of contempt not only to himself. Even the common people would have found them contemptible if they had not been kept quiet.
Ego ista conicere putari debui, x nisi euidenter alio loco ipse diceret de religionibus loquens multa esse uera, quae non modo uulgo scire non sit utile, sed etiam, tametsi falsa sunt, aliter existimare populum expediat, et ideo Graecos teletas ac mysteria taciturnitate parietibusque clausisse. Hic certe totum consilium prodidit uelut sapientium, per quos ciuitates et populi regerentur. Hac tamen fallacia miris modis maligni daemones delectantur, qui et deceptores et deceptos pariter possident, a quorum dominatione non liberat nisi gratia Dei per Iesum Christum dominum nostrum.	I might have been thought to be guessing at this, if he did not say it plainly himself in another place. There, speaking about religious practices, he says that there are many true things which it is not useful for the common people to know. He adds that there are things which, though false, it is expedient for the people to believe otherwise. That, he says, is why the Greeks shut away their teletae [initiation rites] and mysteries behind silence and walls. Here he has certainly given away the whole policy of the so-called wise men by whom cities and peoples were to be ruled. Yet the evil demons take marvelous delight in this deceit, for they possess deceivers and deceived alike. From their domination nothing sets us free but the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.
Dicit etiam idem auctor acutissimus adque doctissimus, quod hi soli ei uideantur animum aduertisse quid esset Deus, qui crediderunt eum esse animam motu ac ratione mundum gubernantem, ac per hoc, etsi nondum tenebat quod ueritas habet (Deus enim uerus non anima, sed animae quoque est effector et conditor), tamen si contra praeiudicia consuetudinis liber esse posset, unum Deum colendum fateretur adque suaderet, motu ac ratione mundum gubernantem, ut ea cum illo de hac re quaestio remaneret, quod eum diceret esse animam, non potius et animae creatorem. Dicit etiam antiquos Romanos plus annos centum et septuaginta deos sine simulacro coluisse. Quod si adhuc, inquit, mansisset, castius di obseruarentur.	This same most acute and learned author also says that the only people who seem to him to have grasped what God is are those who believed him to be the soul that governs the world by motion and reason. So he did not yet hold what the truth holds, for the true God is not a soul but the maker and founder of the soul as well. Still, if he could have stood free of the prejudices of custom, he would have acknowledged and urged that one God should be worshiped, who governs the world by motion and reason. The only question left between him and us on this matter would then be that he called God a soul, rather than the creator of the soul too. He also says that the ancient Romans worshiped the gods without images for more than a hundred and seventy years. “If this had continued to this day,” he says, “the gods would be worshiped more purely.”
Cui sententiae suae testem adhibet inter cetera etiam gentem Iudaeam; nec dubitat eum locum ita concludere,	Among others, he calls the Jewish nation as a witness to this opinion of his. He does not hesitate to ut dicat, qui primi simulacra deorum populis posuerunt, eos ciuitatibus suis et metum demsisse et errorem addidisse, prudenter existimans deos facile posse in simulacrorum stoliditate contemni. Quod uero non ait errorem tradiderunt, sed addiderunt, iam utique fuisse etiam sine simulacris uult intellegi errorem. Quapropter cum solos dicit animaduertisse quid esset Deus, qui eum crederent animam mundum gubernantem, castiusque existimat sine simulacris obseruari religionem, quis non uideat quantum propinquauerit ueritati?

LATIN

ENGLISH

close the passage by saying that those who first set up images of the gods for the peoples both took away fear from their cities and added error. He wisely judged that the gods could easily be despised in the senselessness of images. He does not say that they "handed down" error, but that they "added" it. By this he certainly means us to understand that there was error already, even without images. So he says that only those grasped what God is who believed him to be the soul governing the world, and he judges that religion is practiced more purely without images. Who, then, does not see how close he came to the truth?

Si enim aliquid contra uetustatem tanti posset erroris, profecto et unum Deum, a quo mundum crederet gubernari, et sine simulacro colendum esse censeret; adque in tam proximo inuentus facile fortasse de animae mutabilitate commoneretur, ut naturam potius incommutabilem, quae ipsam quoque animam condidisset, Deum uerum esse sentiret. Haec cum ita sint, quaecumque tales uiri in suis litteris multorum deorum ludibria posuerunt, confiteri ea potius occulta Dei uoluntate conpulsi sunt quam persuadere conati. Si qua igitur a nobis inde testimonia proferuntur, ad eos redarguendos proferuntur, qui nolunt aduertere de quanta et quam maligna daemonum potestate nos liberet singulare sacrificium tam sancti sanguinis fusi et donum spiritus inpertiti.

For if he had had any strength to resist the long antiquity of so great an error, he would surely have judged that the one God, by whom he believed the world to be governed, should be worshiped, and worshiped without an image. Having come so close to the truth, he might perhaps easily have been reminded of the changeableness of the soul. He would then have perceived that the true God is rather the unchangeable nature which created the soul itself as well. This being so, whatever mockeries of the many gods such men put into their writings, they were driven by the hidden will of God to confess them rather than trying to win belief for them. So when we bring forward any testimony from these sources, we do so to refute those who refuse to notice how great and how malignant a power of demons we are freed from. We are freed by the unique sacrifice of such holy blood poured out, and by the gift of the Spirit bestowed.

FOR WHAT SHOW OF ADVANTAGE THE RULERS OF THE NATIONS WANTED FALSE RELIGIONS TO CONTINUE AMONG THE PEOPLES SUBJECT TO THEM

Rulers taught the people false beliefs about the gods to bind them more closely, like the demons.

LATIN

ENGLISH

4.32 Dicit etiam de generationibus deorum magis ad poetas quam ad physicos fuisse populos inclinatos, et ideo et sexum et generationes deorum maiores suos, id est ueteres credidisse Romanos et eorum constituisse coniugia. Quod utique non aliam ob causam factum uidetur, nisi quia hominum uelut prudentium et sapientium negotium fuit populum in religionibus fallere, et in eo ipso non solum colere sed imitari etiam daemones, quibus maxima est fallendi cupiditas. Sicut enim daemones nisi eos, quos fallendo deceperint,

He also says, on the subject of the generations of the gods, that peoples have leaned more toward the poets than toward the natural philosophers. That, he says, is why his ancestors, the ancient Romans, believed in the sex and the generations of the gods and arranged their marriages. This seems to have happened for one reason only. It was the business of supposedly prudent and wise men to deceive the people in matters of religion. In doing so, they not only worshiped the demons but even possidere non possunt, sic et homines principes, non sane iusti, sed daemonum similes, ea, quae uana esse nouerant, religionis nomine populis tamquam uera suadebant, hoc modo eos ciuili societati uelut aptius adligantes, quo similiter subditos possiderent.	imitated them, for the demons' greatest craving is to deceive. The demons can possess no one except those they have tricked and deceived. In the same way, men in power used the name of religion to persuade the peoples that things they knew to be empty were true. These men were certainly not just; they were like the demons. In this way they bound the peoples more tightly, as they supposed, to civil society, so that they might likewise possess them as subjects.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Quis autem infirmus et indoctus euaderet simul fallaces et principes ciuitatis et daemones?	But what weak and unlearned person could escape both deceivers at once, the rulers of the city and the demons?

THAT THE TIMES OF ALL KINGS AND KINGDOMS ARE ORDERED BY THE JUDGMENT AND POWER OF THE TRUE GOD

The true God, who alone gives happiness, gives earthly kingdoms to good and bad according to a hidden order.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.33	Deus igitur ille felicitatis auctor et dator, quia solus est uerus Deus, ipse dat regna terrena et bonis et malis, neque hoc temere et quasi fortuito, quia Deus est, non fortuna, sed pro rerum ordine ac temporum occulto nobis, notissimo sibi; cui tamen ordini temporum non subditus seruit, sed eum ipse tamquam dominus regit moderatorque disponit; felicitatem uero non dat nisi bonis. Hanc enim possunt et non habere et habere seruientes, possunt et non habere et habere regnantes; quae tamen plena in ea uita erit, ubi nemo iam seruiet. Et ideo regna terrena et bonis ab illo dantur et malis, ne eius cultores adhuc in prouectu animi paruuli haec ab eo munera quasi magnum aliquid concupiscant.	That God, then, the author and giver of happiness, gives earthly kingdoms to both the good and the bad, because he alone is the true God. He does not do this rashly or as if by chance, for he is God, not fortune. He does it according to an order of things and times that is hidden from us but perfectly known to him. Yet he does not serve this order of times as one subject to it. Rather, he rules it as its master and arranges it as its governor. Happiness, however, he gives only to the good. Those who serve may have it or lack it, and those who reign may have it or lack it. But it will be complete in that life where no one will serve any longer. And so earthly kingdoms are given by him to the good and to the bad alike. He does this so that his worshipers, who are still little children in the progress of the soul, may not crave these gifts from him as though they were something great.
	Et hoc est sacramentum ueteris testamenti, ubi occultum erat nouum, quod illic promissa et dona terrena sunt, intellegentibus et tunc spiritalibus, quamuis nondum in manifestatione praedicantibus, et quae illis temporalibus rebus significaretur aeternitas, et in quibus Dei donis esset uera felicitas.	And this is the mystery of the Old Testament, in which the New lay hidden: there the promises and gifts are earthly. Yet even then spiritual people understood, though they did not yet proclaim it openly, what eternity was signified by those temporal things. They also understood in which gifts of God true happiness lay.

THE KINGDOM OF THE JEWS, FOUNDED AND PRESERVED BY THE ONE TRUE GOD AS LONG AS THEY REMAINED IN THE TRUE RELIGION

God gave the Hebrews every earthly good without the Roman gods, while they remained faithful.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
4.34	Itaque ut cognosceretur etiam illa terrena bona, quibus solis inhiant qui meliora cogitare non possunt, in ipsius unius Dei esse posita potestate, non in multorum falsorum, quos colendos Romani antea crediderunt, populum suum in Aegypto de paucissimis multiplicauit et inde signis mirabilibus liberauit. Nec Lucinam mulieres illae inuocauerunt, quando earum partus, ut miris modis multiplicarentur et gens illa incredibiliter cresceret, ab Aegyptiorum persequentium et infantes omnes necare uolentium manibus ipse seruauit. Sine dea Rumina suxerunt, sine Cunina in cunis fuerunt, sine Educa et Potina escam potumque sumserunt, sine tot dis puerilibus educati sunt, sine dis coniugalibus coniugati, sine cultu Priapi coniugibus mixti; sine inuocatione Neptuni mare transeuntibus diuisum patuit et sequentes eorum inimicos fluctibus in se redeuntibus obruit.	He wished it to be known that even those earthly goods lie in the power of the one God himself. These are the only goods craved by those who cannot think of anything better. They do not lie in the power of the many false gods whom the Romans had believed they must worship. For this reason he multiplied his people in Egypt from a very few, and then freed them from there with wonderful signs. Those women did not call on Lucina when he himself preserved their offspring from the hands of the Egyptians. The Egyptians were persecuting them and wanted to kill all the infants, yet the children multiplied in marvelous ways and the nation grew beyond belief. Without the goddess Rumina they sucked at the breast, and without Cunina they lay in their cradles. Without Educa and Potina they took food and drink. Without all those gods of childhood they were brought up, and without the gods of marriage they were married. Without the worship of Priapus they lay with their wives. Without any invocation of Neptune the sea parted and opened a way for them as they crossed. Then, as the waves returned upon themselves, it overwhelmed the enemies who were pursuing them.
	Nec consecrauerunt aliquam deam Manniam, quando de caelo manna sumserunt; nec quando sitientibus aquam percussa petra profudit, Nymphas Lymphasque coluerunt. Sine insanis sacris Martis et Bellonae bella gesserunt, et sine uictoria quidem non uicerunt, non eam tamen deam, sed Dei sui munus habuerunt. Sine Segetia segetes sine Bubona boues, mella sine Mellona poma sine Pomona, et prorsus omnia, pro quibus tantae falsorum deorum turbae Romani supplicandum putarunt, ab uno uero Deo multo felicius acceperunt. Et si non in eum peccassent, inpia curiositate tamquam magicis artibus seducti ad alienos deos et ad idola defluendo, et postremo Christum occidendo: in eodem regno etsi non spatiosiore, tamen feliciore mansissent.	Nor did they consecrate some goddess Mannia when they received manna from heaven. When the rock was struck and poured out water for them in their thirst, they did not worship Nymphs and Lymphs. They waged wars without the frenzied rites of Mars and Bellona. They did not, of course, conquer without victory. Yet they regarded victory not as a goddess but as the gift of their God. Without Segetia they had crops, and without Bubona cattle. They had honey without Mellona and fruit without Pomona. In short, everything for which the Romans thought they had to pray to such great crowds of false gods, these people received far more happily from the one true God. But they sinned against him. They were led astray by impious curiosity, as if by magic arts, and drifted away to foreign gods and idols. Finally, they killed Christ. Had they not done these things, they would have remained in the same kingdom—not a larger one, perhaps, but a happier one.[46]

LATIN

Et nunc quod per omnes fere terras gentesque dispersi sunt, illius unius ueri Dei prouidentia est, ut, quod deorum falsorum usquequaque simulacra arae, luci templa euertuntur et sacrificia prohibentur, de codicibus eorum probetur, quem ad modum hoc fuerit tanto ante prophetatum; ne forte, cum legeretur in nostris, a nobis putaretur esse confictum. Iam quod sequitur in uolumine sequenti uidendum est, et hic dandus huius prolixitatis modus.

ENGLISH

And now they are scattered through almost all lands and nations, and this is the providence of that one true God. Everywhere the images, altars, groves and temples of the false gods are being overthrown and sacrifices forbidden. God's purpose is that their own books may prove how this was prophesied so long before. Otherwise, if it were read only in ours, people might think we had invented it. What follows must now be considered in the next book, and here an end must be put to this lengthy one.

46 Augustine coins "Mannia" from manna; Mellona was the goddess of honey (mella).

Book V

Fate, providence and Roman virtue
Against astrology; God's foreknowledge and free will; why God rewarded Roman love of glory.

PREFACE

Augustine asks why the true God willed the Roman Empire to be so great and lasting.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.pr	Quoniam constat omnium rerum optandarum plenitudinem esse felicitatem, quae non est dea, sed donum Dei, et ideo nullum deum colendum esse ab hominibus, nisi qui potest eos facere felices (unde si illa dea esset, sola colenda merito diceretur): iam consequenter uideamus, qua causa Deus, qui potest et illa bona dare, quae habere possunt etiam non boni ac per hoc etiam non felices, Romanum imperium tam magnum tamque diuturnum esse uoluerit. Quia enim hoc deorum falsorum illa quam colebant multitudo non fecit, et multa iam diximus, et ubi uisum fuerit opportunum esse dicemus.	It is established that happiness is the fullness of all things worth desiring. It is not a goddess but a gift of God. Therefore no god is to be worshiped by human beings except one who can make them happy; if happiness were a goddess, she alone would rightly be said to deserve worship. So let us now go on to consider why God, who can also give those goods that even people who are not good, and therefore not happy, can possess, willed the Roman Empire to be so great and so long-lasting. For we have already said a great deal to show that it was not the multitude of false gods they worshiped that did this, and we will say more wherever it seems appropriate.

THAT THE CAUSE OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE AND OF ALL KINGDOMS IS NEITHER CHANCE NOR THE POSITION OF THE STARS

Kingdoms come from divine providence, not chance or the stars; astrology cannot explain twins.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.1	Causa ergo magnitudinis imperii Romani nec fortuita est nec fatalis secundum eorum sententiam siue opinionem, qui ea dicunt esse fortuita, quae uel nullas causas habent uel non ex aliquo rationabili ordine uenientes, et ea fatalia, quae praeter Dei et hominum uoluntatem cuiusdam ordinis necessitate contingunt. Prorsus diuina prouidentia regna constituuntur humana. Quae si propterea quisquam fato tribuit, quia ipsam Dei uoluntatem uel potestatem fati nomine appellat, sententiam teneat, linguam corrigat. Quur enim non hoc primum dicit, quod postea dicturus est, cum ab illo quisquam quaesierit quid dixerit fatum? Nam id homines quando audiunt, usitata loquendi consuetudine non intellegunt nisi uim positionis siderum, qualis est quando quis nascitur siue concipitur; quod aliqui alienant a Dei uoluntate, aliqui ex illa etiam hoc pendere confirmant.	The cause of the greatness of the Roman Empire, then, is neither chance nor fate, in the sense understood by those who call “chance” whatever has no causes, or has causes that do not come from any rational order, and call “fate” whatever happens by the necessity of some order, apart from the will of God and of human beings. Human kingdoms are established, quite simply, by divine providence. If anyone attributes them to fate because he calls the very will or power of God by the name of fate, let him keep his opinion but correct his language. For why does he not say first what he will say later, when someone asks him what he meant by “fate”? When people hear that word, the ordinary usage of speech makes them understand nothing but the force of the position of the stars at the moment when someone is born or conceived.

LATIN

Sed illi, qui sine Dei uoluntate decernere opinantur sidera quid agamus uel quid bonorum habeamus malorumue patiamur, ab auribus omnium repellendi sunt, non solum eorum qui ueram religionem tenent sed qui deorum qualiumcumque, licet falsorum, uolunt esse cultores. Haec enim opinio quid agit aliud, nisi ut nullus omnino colatur aut rogetur Deus? Contra quos modo nobis disputatio non est instituta, sed contra hos qui pro defensione eorum, quos deos putant, Christianae religioni aduersantur.

Illi uero, qui positionem stellarum quodam modo decernentium qualis quisque sit et quid ei proueniat boni quidue mali accidat ex Dei uoluntate suspendunt, si easdem stellas putant habere hanc potestatem traditam sibi a summa illius potestate, ut uolentes ista decernant: magnam caelo faciunt iniuriam, in cuius uelut clarissimo senatu ac splendidissima curia opinantur scelera facienda decerni, qualia si aliqua terrena ciuitas decreuisset, genere humano decernente fuerat euertenda. Quale deinde iudicium de hominum factis Deo relinquitur, quibus caelestis necessitas adhibetur, cum dominus ille sit et siderum et hominum? Aut si non dicunt stellas, accepta quidem potestate a summo Deo, arbitrio suo ista decernere, sed in talibus necessitatibus ingerendis illius omnino iussa conplere: itane de ipso Deo sentiendum est, quod indignissimum uisum est de stellarum uoluntate sentire?

Quod si dicuntur stellae significare potius ista quam facere, ut quasi locutio quaedam sit illa positio praedicens futura, non agens (non enim mediocriter doctorum hominum fuit ista sententia): non quidem ita solent loqui mathematici, ut uerbi gratia dicant: Mars ita positus homicidam significat, sed: homicidam facit; uerumtamen ut concedamus non eos ut debent loqui et a philosophis accipere oportere sermonis regulam ad ea praenuntianda, quae in siderum positione reperire se putant: quid fit, quod nihil umquam dicere potuerunt, quur in uita geminorum, in actionibus, in euentis, in

ENGLISH

Some detach this from the will of God; others affirm that this too depends on it.

Those who think that the stars, without God's will, decide what we do, or what goods we have and what evils we suffer, must be denied a hearing by everyone. This applies not only to those who hold the true religion but also to those who want to be worshipers of any gods whatever, even false ones. For what does this opinion accomplish except that no god at all is worshiped or prayed to? But our argument is not directed against these people now. It is directed against those who oppose the Christian religion in defense of the beings they think are gods.

Then there are those who make the position of the stars depend on the will of God, while holding that the stars in some way decide what each person is like and what good or evil befalls him. Suppose they think these same stars have this power handed over to them by his supreme power, so that they decide these things by their own will. In that case they do great injury to heaven. They suppose that in heaven's most illustrious senate, so to speak, and its most splendid senate house, crimes are decreed to be committed. If any earthly city had decreed such crimes, the verdict of the human race would have required it to be overthrown. And then what judgment over human actions is left to God, if a heavenly necessity is imposed on those actions, when he is the Lord of both stars and human beings? Or suppose they do not say that the stars, though they have received their power from the supreme God, decide these things by their own choice, but that in imposing such necessities they are simply carrying out his commands. Are we then to think of God himself what seemed utterly unworthy to think of the stars' will?

But suppose it is said that the stars signify these things rather than cause them. Their position would then be a kind of speech that foretells the future without bringing it about, and this was the view of men of no small learning. It is true that astrologers do not usually speak this way. They do not say, for example, "Mars in this position signifies a murderer," but "makes a murderer." Still, let us grant that they do not speak as they should, and that they ought to take from the philosophers the rule of speech for announcing what they think professionibus, artibus, honoribus ceterisque rebus ad humanam uitam pertinentibus adque in ipsa morte sit plerumque tanta diuersitas, ut similiores eis sint, quantum ad haec adtinet, multi extranei quam ipsi inter se gemini perexiguo temporis interuallo in nascendo separati, in conceptu autem per unum concubitum uno etiam momento seminati?	they find in the position of the stars. How is it, then, that they have never been able to explain the differences between twins? These differences are often very great: in their lives, their actions, what happens to them, their professions, skills, honors and the other things that belong to human life, and even in their death. As far as these things go, many strangers are more like them than the twins are like each other. Yet twins are separated at birth by a very small interval of time, and at conception they were sown in a single act of intercourse, at a single moment.

LATIN	ENGLISH

THE LIKE AND UNLIKE HEALTH OF TWINS

Twins who fell ill together are better explained by medicine than by the stars.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.2 Cicero dicit Hippocratem, nobilissimum medicum, scriptum reliquisse, quosdam fratres, cum simul aegrotare coepissent et eorum morbus eodem tempore ingrauesceret, eodem leuaretur, geminos suspicatum; quos Posidonius Stoicus, multum astrologiae deditus, eadem constitutione astrorum natos eademque conceptos solebat adserere. Ita quod medicus pertinere credebat ad simillimam temperiem ualetudinis, hoc philosophus astrologus ad uim constitutionemque siderum, quae fuerat quo tempore concepti natique sunt.	Cicero says that Hippocrates, the most renowned of physicians, left it in writing that he suspected certain brothers of being twins, because they had begun to fall ill at the same time, and their illness grew worse at the same time and eased at the same time. Posidonius the Stoic, who was much devoted to astrology, used to maintain that they had been born and conceived under the same configuration of the stars. So what the physician believed was due to a very similar bodily constitution, the philosopher-astrologer attributed to the force and configuration of the stars at the time when they were conceived and born.[1]
In hac causa multo est acceptabilior et de proximo credibilior coniectura medicinalis, quoniam parentes ut erant corpore adfecti, dum concumberent, ita primordia conceptorum adfici potuerunt, ut consecutis ex materno corpore prioribus incrementis paris ualetudinis nascerentur; deinde in una domo eisdem alimentis nutriti, ubi aerem et loci positionem et uim aquarum plurimum ualere ad corpus uel bene uel male accipiendum medicina testatur, eisdem etiam exercitationibus adsuefacti tam similia corpora gererent, ut etiam ad aegrotandum uno tempore eisdemque causis similiter mouerentur. Constitutionem uero caeli ac siderum, quae fuit quando concepti siue nati sunt, uelle trahere ad istam aegrotandi parilitatem, cum tam multa diuersissimi generis diuersissimorum effectuum et euentorum eodem tempore in unius regionis terra eidem	In this case the physician's conjecture is far more acceptable, and more credible because it is closer to hand. The parents, as they were affected in body when they had intercourse, could have affected the first beginnings of the children conceived, so that, having received their earliest growth from the mother's body, they were born with similar health. Then they were raised in one house on the same food. Medicine testifies that the air, the situation of the place and the quality of the water have great power to dispose a body well or badly. They were also accustomed to the same exercises. So they would have had bodies so similar that they were moved to fall ill in the same way, at one time and from the same causes. But some people want to drag in the configuration of the sky

1 Cicero reported this in his treatise On Fate, in a passage now lost. Hippocrates of Cos (5th century BC) was the founder of Greek medicine; Posidonius of Apamea (c. 135–51 BC) was a Stoic philosopher and polymath.

LATIN	ENGLISH
caelo subdita potuerint concipi et nasci, nescio cuius sit insolentiae.	and the stars at the time when the twins were conceived or born to explain this sameness in falling ill. Yet so many things of the most different kinds, with the most different effects and outcomes, could be conceived and born at the same time in the land of one region under the same sky. I do not know what effrontery it takes to argue like that.
Nos autem nouimus geminos non solum actus et peregrinationes habere diuersas, uerum etiam dispares aegritudines perpeti. De qua re facillimam, quantum mihi uidetur, rationem redderet Hippocrates, diuersis alimentis et exercitationibus, quae non de corporis temperatione, sed de animi uoluntate ueniunt, dissimiles eis accidere potuisse ualetudines. Porro autem Posidonius uel quilibet fatalium siderum adsertor mirum si potest hic inuenire quid dicat, si nolit inperitorum mentibus in eis quas nesciunt rebus inludere.	We, on the other hand, know of twins who not only have different occupations and travels but also suffer different illnesses. Hippocrates, it seems to me, would give a very easy explanation of this. Different food and exercise, which come not from the body's constitution but from the will of the mind, could have caused them to have different health. But Posidonius, or any champion of fate-dealing stars, would be hard put to find anything to say here, unless he wants to make fools of untrained minds in matters they know nothing about.
Quod enim conantur efficere de interuallo exiguo temporis, quod inter se gemini dum nascerentur habuerunt, propter caeli particulam, ubi ponitur horae notatio, quem horoscopum uocant: aut non tantum ualet, quanta inuenitur in geminorum uoluntatibus actibus moribus casibusque diuersitas, aut plus etiam ualet, quam est geminorum uel humilitas generis eadem uel nobilitas, cuius maximam diuersitatem non nisi in hora, qua quisque nascitur, ponunt. Ac per hoc si tam celeriter alter post alterum nascitur, ut eadem pars horoscopi maneat, paria cuncta quaero, quae in nullis possunt geminis inueniri; si autem sequentis tarditas horoscopum mutat, parentes diuersos quaero, quos gemini habere non possunt.	Consider what they try to make of the tiny interval of time between twins at birth, on account of the small portion of the sky where the mark of the hour is placed, which they call the horoscope. Either this interval does not have as much force as the difference found in the twins' wills, actions, characters and fortunes, or it has even more force than the twins' birth, whether low or noble, which is the same for both. Yet the astrologers attribute the greatest differences of rank to nothing but the hour at which each is born. So if one twin is born so quickly after the other that the same part of the horoscope remains, I look for everything to be equal, and that cannot be found in any twins. But if the delay of the second changes the horoscope, I look for different parents, and twins cannot have those.[2]

THE ARGUMENT THE ASTROLOGER NIGIDIUS TOOK FROM THE POTTER'S WHEEL ON THE QUESTION OF TWINS

Nigidius's potter's wheel cannot explain the great differences between twins born moments apart.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.3 Frustra itaque adfertur nobile illud commentum de figuli rota, quod respondisse ferunt Nigidium hac quaestione turbatum, unde et Figulus appellatus est. Dum enim rotam figuli ui quanta potuit intorsisset, currente illa bis	So it is useless to bring forward that famous invention about the potter's wheel. They say Nigidius gave this answer when he was troubled by the question, and that this is why he was called Figu-

2 The horoscope is the point of the zodiac rising on the eastern horizon at the moment of birth, which astrologers held to be decisive.

LATIN	ENGLISH
numero de atramento tamquam uno eius loco summa celeritate percussit; deinde inuenta sunt signa, quae fixerat, desistente motu, non paruo interuallo in rotae illius extremitate distantia. Sic, inquit, in tanta rapacitate caeli, etiamsi alter post alterum tanta celeritate nascatur, quanta rotam bis ipse percussi, in caeli spatio plurimum est: hinc sunt, inquit, quaecumque dissimillima perhibentur in moribus casibusque geminorum. Hoc figmentum fragilius est quam uasa, quae illa rotatione finguntur.	lus, "the Potter." He spun a potter's wheel with all the force he could. While it was turning, he struck it twice with ink, as quickly as possible, as if in a single spot. When the motion stopped, the marks he had made were found on the rim of the wheel at no small distance apart. "So," he said, "given the enormous speed of the heavens, even if one twin is born after the other as quickly as I struck the wheel twice, the gap amounts to a very great distance in the expanse of the sky. This," he said, "is the source of whatever great differences are reported in the characters and fortunes of twins." This fiction is more fragile than the pots fashioned by that spinning.[3]
Nam si tam multum in caelo interest, quod constellationibus conprehendi non potest, ut alteri geminorum hereditas obueniat, alteri non obueniat: quur audent ceteris, qui gemini non sunt, cum inspexerint eorum constellationes, talia pronuntiare, quae ad illud secretum pertinent, quod nemo potest conprehendere et momentis adnotare nascentium? Si autem propterea talia dicunt in aliorum genituris, quia haec ad productiora spatia temporum pertinent; momenta uero illa partium minutarum, quae inter se gemini possunt habere nascentes, rebus minimis tribuuntur, de qualibus mathematici non solent consuli (quis enim consulat quando sedeat, quando deambulet, quando uel quid prandeat?): numquid ista dicimus, quando in moribus operibus casibusque geminorum plurima plurimumque diuersa monstramus?	For suppose there is so great a difference in the sky, one that cannot be captured in birth charts, that one twin receives an inheritance and the other does not. Then how do they dare, after examining the birth charts of other people who are not twins, to pronounce on matters of this kind? Those matters belong to that hidden region which no one can grasp and mark down at the moments of birth. But suppose they say such things in the nativities of others because these things belong to longer stretches of time. The moments of tiny fractions that twins may have between them at birth would then be assigned to the smallest matters, about which astrologers are not usually consulted. After all, who would consult them about when to sit down, when to take a walk, or when or what to eat for lunch? But are these the things we are talking about, when we point out so many differences, and such great ones, in the characters, deeds and fortunes of twins?

ESAU AND JACOB, TWINS VERY UNLIKE EACH OTHER IN CHARACTER AND CONDUCT

The twins Esau and Jacob, born one holding the other's heel, led utterly different lives.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.4 Nati sunt duo gemini antiqua patrum memoria ut de insignibus loquar sic alter post alterum, ut posterior plantam prioris teneret. Tanta in eorum uita fuerunt moribusque diuersa, tanta in actibus disparilitas, tanta in parentum amore dissimilitudo, ut etiam inimicos eos inter se faceret ipsa distantia. Numquid hoc dicitur, quia uno ambulante alius sedebat, et alio dormiente alius uigilabat, et alio loquente tacebat alius; quae pertinent ad	In the ancient memory of our fathers, to speak of famous cases, two twins were born one after the other in such a way that the second was holding the foot of the first. So many were the differences in their lives and characters, so great the disparity in their actions, so great the dissimilarity in their parents' love, that the very distance between them made them enemies of each other. Are we saying

3 Publius Nigidius Figulus (d. 45 BC) was a Roman scholar and astrologer and a friend of Cicero. Figulus means "potter."

LATIN	ENGLISH
illas minutias, quae non possunt ab eis conprehendi, qui constitutionem siderum, qua quisque nascitur, scribunt, unde mathematici consulantur? Unus duxit mercennariam seruitutem, alius non seruiuit; unus a matre diligebatur, alius non diligebatur; unus honorem, qui magnus aput eos habebatur, amisit, indeptus est alter. Quid de uxoribus, quid de filiis, quid de rebus, quanta diuersitas!	this because when one was walking the other was sitting, when one was asleep the other was awake, and when one was speaking the other was silent? Such things belong to those minutiae that cannot be grasped by those who write down the configuration of the stars at a person's birth for astrologers to consult. One served as a hired laborer; the other was never a servant. One was loved by his mother; the other was not. One lost an honor that was held to be great among them; the other obtained it. And what about their wives, their children, their possessions—what a difference![4]
Si ergo haec ad illas pertinent minutias temporum, quae inter se habent gemini, et constellationibus non adscribuntur: quare aliorum constellationibus inspectis ista dicuntur? Si autem ideo dicuntur, quia non ad minuta inconprehensibilia, sed ad temporum spatia pertinent, quae obseruari notarique possunt: quid hic agit rota illa figuli, nisi ut homines luteum cor habentes in gyrum mittantur, ne mathematicorum uaniloquia conuincantur?	If, then, these things belong to those tiny fractions of time that twins have between them, and are not ascribed to the birth charts, why are they stated when the birth charts of other people are examined? But if they are stated because they belong not to imperceptible fractions but to stretches of time that can be observed and recorded, what is that potter's wheel doing here? Its only use is to send people with hearts of clay spinning in circles, so that the empty chatter of the astrologers may not be exposed.

HOW THE ASTROLOGERS ARE SHOWN TO PROFESS AN EMPTY SCIENCE

Twins conceived together but born apart expose the contradictions of astrology.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.5 Quid idem ipsi, quorum morbum, quod eodem tempore grauior leuiorque apparebat amborum, medicinaliter inspiciens Hippocrates geminos suspicatus est, nonne satis istos redarguunt, qui uolunt sideribus dare, quod de corporum simili temperatione ueniebat? Quur enim similiter eodemque tempore, non alter prior, alter posterior aegrotabant, sicut nati fuerant, quia utique simul nasci ambo non poterant? Aut si nihil momenti adtulit, ut diuersis temporibus aegrotarent, quod diuersis temporibus nati sunt: quare tempus in nascendo diuersum ad aliarum rerum diuersitates ualere contendunt? Quur potuerunt diuersis temporibus peregrinari, diuersis temporibus ducere uxores, diuersis temporibus filios procreare et multa alia, propterea quia diuersis temporibus nati sunt, et non potuerunt eadem causa diuersis etiam temporibus aegrotare?	What about those very men whom Hippocrates, examining them as a physician, suspected of being twins, because their illness appeared worse and milder in both at the same time? Do they not sufficiently refute those who want to assign to the stars what came from a similar bodily constitution? For why were they ill in the same way and at the same time, and not one earlier and the other later, in the order in which they had been born? After all, they could not both be born at once. Or if being born at different times made no difference to their falling ill at different times, why do the astrologers insist that a difference in the time of birth has force to produce differences in other things? Why could the twins travel at different times, marry at different times, beget children at different times, and do much else, because they were born at different times, and yet could not, for the same reason, also fall ill at different times?

4 Jacob and Esau; see Genesis 25–33.

LATIN

Si enim dispar nascendi mora mutauit horoscopum et disparilitatem intulit ceteris rebus: quur illud in aegritudinibus mansit, quod habebat in temporis aequalitate conceptus? Aut si fata ualetudinis in conceptu sunt, aliarum uero rerum in ortu esse dicuntur, non deberent inspectis natalium constellationibus de ualetudine aliquid dicere, quando eis inspicienda conceptionalis hora non datur. Si autem ideo praenuntiant aegritudines non inspecto conceptionis horoscopo, quia indicant eas momenta nascentium: quo modo dicerent cuilibet eorum geminorum ex natiuitatis hora, quando aegrotaturus esset, cum et alter, qui non habebat eandem horam natiuitatis, necesse haberet pariter aegrotare?

Deinde quaero: si tanta distantia est temporis in natiuitate geminorum, ut per hanc oporteat eis constellationes fieri diuersas propter diuersum horoscopum et ob hoc diuersos omnes cardines, ubi tanta uis ponitur, ut hinc etiam diuersa sint fata: unde hoc accidere potuit, cum eorum conceptus diuersum tempus habere non possit? Aut si duorum uno momento temporis conceptorum potuerunt esse ad nascendum fata disparia, quur non et duorum uno momento temporis natorum possint esse ad uiuendum adque moriendum fata disparia? Nam si unum momentum, quo ambo concepti sunt, non inpediuit, ut alter prior, alter posterior nasceretur: quur, uno momento si duo nascantur, inpedit aliquid, ut alter prior, alter posterior moriatur?

Si conceptio momenti unius diuersos casus in utero geminos habere permittit, quur natiuitas momenti unius non etiam quoslibet duos in terra diuersos casus habere permittat, ac sic omnis huius artis uel potius uanitatis commenta tollantur? Quid est hoc, quur uno tempore, momento uno, sub una eademque caeli positione concepti diuersa habent fata, quae illos perducant ad diuersarum horarum natiuitatem, et uno momento temporis sub una eademque caeli positione de duabus matribus duo pariter nati diuersa fata habere non possint, quae illos perducant ad diuersam uiuendi uel moriendi necessitatem? An concepti nondum habent fata, quae nisi nascantur habere non poterunt? Quid est ergo quod dicunt, si hora conceptionalis inueniatur, multa ab istis dici posse diuinius?

ENGLISH

For if the unequal delay in being born changed the horoscope and brought inequality into everything else, why did their illnesses keep what they had from being conceived at the same time? Or suppose the fates of health are said to lie in conception, while those of other things lie in birth. Then the astrologers ought not to say anything about health after examining birth charts, since they are not given the hour of conception to examine. But suppose they predict illnesses without examining the horoscope of conception because the moments of birth indicate them. How then could they tell either of those twins, from the hour of his birth, when he would fall ill, when the other twin, who did not have the same hour of birth, had to fall ill at the same time?

Next I ask this. Suppose the interval of time at the birth of twins is so great that their birth charts must turn out different because of the different horoscope, and therefore all the cardinal points differ, and the astrologers place so much power in these that the fates too differ because of them. How could this happen, when their conception cannot have taken place at different times? Or if two children conceived at one moment of time could have unequal fates regarding birth, why could not two born at one moment of time have unequal fates regarding life and death? For if the single moment at which both were conceived did not prevent one from being born first and the other later, why, if two are born at one moment, should anything prevent one from dying first and the other later?

If conception at a single moment allows twins to have different fortunes in the womb, why should not birth at a single moment also allow any two people to have different fortunes on earth? In that way all the inventions of this art, or rather this vanity, would be swept away. What does it mean that those conceived at one time, at one moment, under one and the same position of the sky, have different fates that lead them to birth at different hours, while two children born of two mothers at the same moment of time, under one and the same position of the sky, cannot have different fates that lead them to a different necessity of living or dying? Or do those who are conceived not yet have fates, which they cannot have unless they are born? Then what do they mean when they say that if the hour of conception could be found, the astrologers could foretell many things more divinely?

LATIN	ENGLISH
Unde etiam illud a nonnullis praedicatur, quod quidam sapiens horam elegit, qua cum uxore concumberet, unde filium mirabilem gigneret. Unde postremo et hoc est, quod de illis pariter aegrotantibus geminis Posidonius, magnus astrologus idemque philosophus, respondebat, ideo fieri, quod eodem tempore fuissent nati eodemque concepti. Nam utique propter hoc addebat conceptionem, ne diceretur ei non ad liquidum eodem tempore potuisse nasci, quos constabat omnino eodem tempore fuisse conceptos, ut hoc, quod similiter simulque aegrotabant, non daret de proximo pari corporis temperamento, sed eandem quoque ualetudinis parilitatem sidereis nexibus adligaret. Si igitur in conceptu tanta uis est ad aequalitatem fatorum, non debuerunt nascendo eadem fata mutari.	This is also why some people spread the story that a certain wise man chose the hour at which to have intercourse with his wife, so as to beget a wonderful son. This, finally, is the source of the reply that Posidonius, a great astrologer and also a philosopher, used to give about those twins who fell ill together. He said it happened because they had been born at the same time and conceived at the same time. He added conception precisely so that no one could object that they could not have been born at exactly the same time, since they were agreed to have been conceived at exactly the same time. His aim was not to attribute their falling ill in the same way and together to the explanation close at hand, a similar bodily constitution, but to bind that very sameness of health with starry bonds as well. If, then, conception has so much power to make fates equal, the same fates ought not to have been changed by birth.
Aut si propterea mutantur fata geminorum, quia temporibus diuersis nascuntur, quur non potius intellegamus iam fuisse mutata, ut diuersis temporibus nascerentur? Itane non mutat fata natiuitatis uoluntas uiuentium, cum mutet fata conceptionis ordo nascentium?	Or if the fates of twins are changed because they are born at different times, why should we not rather understand that their fates had already been changed, so that they would be born at different times? Does the will of the living, then, not change the fates of birth, when the order of birth changes the fates of conception?

TWINS OF DIFFERENT SEX

Twins of different sex, conceived at one moment, refute the power of the stars.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.6 Quamquam et in ipsis geminorum conceptibus, ubi certe amborum eadem momenta sunt temporum, unde fit ut sub eadem constellatione fatali alter concipiatur masculus, altera femina? Nouimus geminos diuersi sexus, ambo adhuc uiuunt, ambo aetate adhuc uigent; quorum cum sint inter se similes corporum species, quantum in diuerso sexu potest, instituto tamen et proposito uitae ita sunt dispares, ut praeter actus, quos necesse est a uirilibus distare femineos (quod ille in officio comitis militat et a sua domo paene semper peregrinatur, illa de solo patrio et de rure proprio non recedit), insuper (quod est incredibilius, si astralia fata credantur; non autem mirum, si uoluntates hominum et Dei munera cogitentur) ille coniugatus, illa uirgo sacra est; ille numerosam prolem genuit, illa nec nupsit.	And yet, even in the conception of twins, where the moments of time are certainly the same for both, how does it happen that under the same fateful constellation one is conceived male and the other female? We know twins of different sex. Both are still living, and both are still in the prime of life. Their bodily appearance is alike, as far as it can be between the sexes, yet in their way and aim of life they are very different. There are the activities in which a woman's must necessarily differ from a man's: he serves in the office of a count and is almost always away from home, while she never leaves her native soil and her own country estate. But beyond these, there is something even harder to believe if one believes in fates ruled by the stars, though not surprising if one considers the wills of human beings and the gifts of God. He is married, and she is a consecrated virgin. He has fathered many children, and she has never even married.[5]

LATIN

ENGLISH

At enim plurimum uis horoscopi ualet. Hoc quam nihil sit, iam satis disserui. Sed qualecumque sit, in ortu ualere dicunt; numquid et in conceptu? ubi et unum concubitum esse manifestum est, et tanta naturae uis est, ut, cum conceperit femina, deinde alterum concipere omnino non possit; unde necesse est eadem esse in geminis momenta conceptus. An forte quia diuerso horoscopo nati sunt, aut ille in masculum, dum nascerentur, aut illa in feminam commutata est?

But, it is objected, the force of the horoscope counts for a great deal. I have already discussed enough how it counts for nothing. But whatever its force, they say it operates at birth. Does it also operate at conception? There it is obvious that there was a single act of intercourse. And so great is the power of nature that once a woman has conceived, she cannot conceive another child at all. Hence the moments of conception must be the same for twins. Or perhaps, because they were born under different horoscopes, either he was changed into a male or she into a female while they were being born?

Cum igitur non usquequaque absurde dici posset ad solas corporum differentias adflatus quosdam ualere sidereos, sicut in solaribus accessibus et decessibus uidemus etiam ipsius anni tempora uariari et lunaribus incrementis adque detrimentis augeri et minui quaedam genera rerum, sicut echinos et conchas et mirabiles aestus oceani; non autem et animi uoluntates positionibus siderum subdi: nunc isti, cum etiam nostros actus inde religare conantur, admonent ut quaeramus, unde ne in ipsis quidem corporibus eis possit ratio ista constare. Quid enim tam ad corpus pertinens quam corporis sexus? et tamen sub eadem positione siderum diuersi sexus gemini concipi potuerunt.

It might not be entirely absurd to say that certain influences from the stars have force over the differences of bodies alone. We see the very seasons of the year vary with the sun's approach and withdrawal. We see certain kinds of things grow and shrink with the waxing and waning of the moon, such as sea urchins and shellfish and the wonderful tides of the ocean. But it would be absurd to say that the choices of the will are subject to the positions of the stars. Yet these people, by trying to bind even our actions to that source, prompt us to ask why their theory cannot hold good even for bodies themselves. For what belongs so much to the body as the body's sex? And yet twins of different sex could be conceived under the same position of the stars.

Unde quid insipientius dici aut credi potest, quam siderum positionem, quae ad horam conceptionis eadem ambobus fuit, facere non potuisse, ut, cum quo habebat eandem constellationem, sexum diuersum a fratre non haberet; et positionem siderum, quae fuit ad horam nascentium, facere potuisse, ut ab eo tam multum uirginali sanctitate distaret?

What, then, could be said or believed that is more foolish than this? The position of the stars, which was the same for both at the hour of conception, could not keep her from having a different sex from the brother with whom she shared a constellation. Yet the position of the stars at the hour of their birth could make her differ from him so greatly in the holiness of virginity.

5 A count (comes) was a high-ranking officer in the late Roman imperial service.

THE CHOICE OF A DAY FOR TAKING A WIFE, OR FOR PLANTING OR SOWING IN A FIELD

Choosing lucky days for marriage or planting contradicts the astrologers' own theory of fate.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.7	Iam illud quis ferat, quod in eligendis diebus noua quaedam suis actibus fata moliuntur? Non erat uidelicet ille ita natus, ut haberet admirabilem filium, sed ita potius, ut contemtibilem gigneret, et ideo uir doctus elegit horam qua misceretur uxori. Fecit ergo fatum, quod non habebat, et ex ipsius facto coepit esse fatale, quod in eius natiuitate non fuerat, o stultitiam singularem! Eligitur dies ut ducatur uxor; credo propterea, quia potest in diem non bonum, nisi eligatur, incurri et infeliciter duci. Ubi est ergo quod nascenti iam sidera decreuerunt? An potest homo, quod ei iam constitutum est, diei electione mutare, et quod ipse in eligendo die constituerit, non poterit ab alia potestate mutari?	And who can bear the fact that, by choosing days, they contrive new fates for their own actions? Evidently that man was not born to have a remarkable son, but rather to father a contemptible one, and so, being a learned man, he chose the hour at which to sleep with his wife. He therefore made a fate that he did not have, and by his own act something began to be fated that had not been fated at his birth. What extraordinary folly! A day is chosen for taking a wife. This is done, I suppose, because unless a day is chosen one might stumble on a bad day and marry unhappily. Then where is what the stars already decreed for him at his birth? Can a man change, by choosing a day, what has already been fixed for him, while what he himself has fixed by choosing a day cannot be changed by some other power?
	Deinde si soli homines, non autem omnia quae sub caelo sunt, constellationibus subiacent, quur aliter eligunt dies adcommodatos ponendis uitibus uel arboribus uel segetibus, alios dies pecoribus uel domandis uel admittendis maribus, quibus equarum uel boum fetentur armenta, et cetera huius modi? Si autem propterea ualent ad has res dies electi, quia terrenis omnibus corporibus siue animantibus secundum diuersitates temporalium momentorum siderum positio dominatur; considerent quam innumerabilia sub uno temporis puncto uel nascantur uel oriantur uel inchoentur, et tam diuersos exitus habeant, ut istas obseruationes cuiuis puero ridendas esse persuadeant Quis enim est tam excors, ut audeat dicere omnes arbores, omnes herbas, omnes bestias serpentes aues pisces uermiculos momenta nascendi singillatim habere diuersa?	Next, if only human beings are subject to constellations, and not everything under heaven, why do they choose some days as suitable for planting vines or trees or crops, and other days for taming livestock or for putting males to the herds of mares or cows so they will breed, and so on? But if chosen days have power in these matters because the position of the stars governs all earthly bodies, living or not, according to the differences between moments of time, then let them consider how countless are the things that are born, or arise, or begin at a single point of time. These have such different outcomes that they would convince any child that these observations deserve ridicule. For who is so senseless as to dare to say that all trees, all plants, all beasts, snakes, birds, fish and worms each have a different moment of birth?
	Solent tamen homines ad tentandam peritiam mathematicorum adferre ad eos constellationes mutorum animalium, quorum ortus propter hanc explorationem domi suae diligenter obseruant, eosque mathematicos praeferunt ceteris, qui constellationibus inspectis dicunt non esse hominem natum, sed pecus. Audent etiam dicere quale pecus, utrum aptum lanitio, an uectationi, an aratro, an custodiae domus. Nam et ad canina fata tentantur et cum magnis admirantium clamoribus ista respondent. Sic desipiunt homines, ut existiment, cum homo nascitur, ceteros rerum ortus ita	Yet people often test the skill of astrologers by bringing them the constellations of dumb animals, whose births they carefully observe at home for this very trial. And they prefer to all others those astrologers who examine the constellations and say that it was not a human being who was born but an animal. They even dare to say what kind of animal: whether suited for wool, or for carrying loads, or for the plow, or for guarding the house. They are tested even on the fates of dogs, and they give these answers to loud cries of admir-

LATIN	ENGLISH
inhiberi, ut cum illo sub eadem caeli plaga nec musca nascatur. Nam si hanc admiserint, procedit ratiocinatio, quae gradatim accessibus modicis eos a muscis ad camelos elephantosque perducat.	ation. People are so foolish as to think that when a human being is born, all other births are held back, so that not even a fly is born under the same region of the sky at the same moment. For if they admit the fly, the reasoning proceeds and leads them step by small step from flies to camels and elephants.
Nec illud uolunt aduertere, quod electo ad seminandum agrum die tam multa grana in terram simul ueniunt, simul germinant, exorta segete simul herbescunt pubescunt flauescunt, et tamen inde spicas ceteris coaeuas adque, ut ita dixerim, congerminales alias robigo interimit, alias aues depopulantur, alias homines auellunt. Quo modo istis alias constellationes fuisse dicturi sunt, quas tam diuersos exitus habere conspiciunt? An eos paenitebit his rebus dies eligere easque ad caeleste negabunt pertinere decretum, et solos sideribus subdent homines, quibus solis in terra Deus dedit liberas uoluntates?	Nor do they want to notice that when a day has been chosen for sowing a field, a great many grains go into the ground together and sprout together, and when the crop comes up they grow green, mature and turn golden together. And yet, of the ears that are the same age as the rest and, if I may put it so, sprouted together with them, some are destroyed by blight, some are ravaged by birds, and some are plucked by people. How will they say that these had different constellations, when they see them meet such different ends? Or will they repent of choosing days for these things and deny that they come under the decree of heaven, and subject only human beings to the stars—the only beings on earth to whom God has given free wills?
His omnibus consideratis non inmerito creditur, cum astrologi mirabiliter multa uera respondent, occulto instinctu fieri spirituum non bonorum, quorum cura est has falsas et noxias opiniones de astralibus fatis inserere humanis mentibus adque firmare, non horoscopi notati et inspecti aliqua arte, quae nulla est.	When all this is considered, it is not unreasonable to believe that when astrologers give many answers that are astonishingly true, this happens by the hidden prompting of spirits that are not good. Their concern is to plant these false and harmful opinions about astral fate in human minds and to strengthen them. It does not happen by noting and examining a horoscope by some art, for there is no such art.

THOSE WHO CALL BY THE NAME OF FATE NOT THE POSITION OF THE STARS BUT THE CHAIN OF CAUSES DEPENDING ON GOD'S WILL

Those who call the chain of causes under God's will "fate" differ from us only in a word.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.8 Qui uero non astrorum constitutionem, sicuti est cum quidque concipitur uel nascitur uel inchoatur, sed omnium conexionem seriemque causarum, qua fit omne quod fit, fati nomine appellant: non multum cum eis de uerbi controuersia laborandum adque certandum est, quando quidem ipsum causarum ordinem et quandam conexionem Dei summi tribuunt uoluntati et potestati, qui optime et ueracissime creditur et cuncta scire antequam fiant, et nihil inordinatum relinquere; a quo sunt omnes potestates, quamuis ab illo non sint omnium uoluntates. Ipsam itaque praecipue Dei summi	There are those, however, who use the name "fate" not for the arrangement of the stars as it is when anything is conceived, born or begun, but for the whole connection and chain of causes by which everything that happens happens. We need not labor and fight with them very much over a dispute about a word, since they attribute this very order of causes, this kind of connection, to the will and power of the supreme God. He is most rightly and most truly believed both to know all things before they happen and to leave nothing un-

LATIN	ENGLISH
uoluntatem, cuius potestas insuperabiliter per cuncta porrigitur, eos appellare fatum sic probatur. Annaei Senecae sunt, nisi fallor, hi uersus: Duc, summe pater altique dominator poli, / Quocumque placuit, nulla parendi mora est.	ordered. From him come all powers, though the wills of all do not come from him. That it is above all the will of the supreme God, whose power extends invincibly through all things, that they call fate is proved as follows. These verses, unless I am mistaken, are by Annaeus Seneca: "Lead me, supreme father and ruler of the high heavens, wherever you please; I do not delay to obey.[6]
/ Adsum inpiger: fac nolle, comitabor gemens Malusque patiar, facere quod licuit bono. Ducunt uolentem fata, nolentem trahunt. Nempe euidentissime hoc ultimo uersu ea fata appellauit, quam supra dixerat summi patris uoluntatem; cui paratum se oboedire dicit, ut uolens ducatur, ne nolens trahatur; quoniam scilicet Ducunt uolentem fata, nolentem trahunt. Illi quoque uersus Homerici huic sententiae suffragantur, quos Cicero in Latinum uertit: Tales sunt hominum mentes, quali pater ipse Iuppiter lustrauit lumine terras.	"Here I am, eager. Suppose I am unwilling: I shall follow groaning, and suffer as a bad man what I could have done as a good one. The fates lead the willing and drag the unwilling." Plainly, in this last line he has given the name "fates" to what he had called above the will of the supreme father. He says he is ready to obey that will, so as to be led willingly and not dragged unwillingly—since, of course, "the fates lead the willing and drag the unwilling." The lines of Homer that Cicero translated into Latin also support this view: "The minds of men are like the light with which father Jupiter himself has lit up the earth."[7]
Nec in hac quaestione auctoritatem haberet poetica sententia: sed quoniam Stoicos dicit uim fati adserentes istos ex Homero uersus solere usurpare, non de illius poetae, sed de istorum philosophorum opinione tractatur, cum per istos uersus, quos disputationi adhibent quam de fato habent, quid sentiant esse fatum apertissime declaratur, quoniam Iouem appellant, quem summum deum putant, a quo conexionem dicunt pendere fatorum.	A poet's opinion would carry no authority on this question. But Cicero says that the Stoics, when asserting the power of fate, were in the habit of using these lines of Homer. So the question concerns not the opinion of that poet but the opinion of those philosophers. Through these lines, which they bring into their discussion of fate, it is made perfectly plain what they think fate is, since they name Jupiter, whom they hold to be the supreme god, and say that the connection of the fates depends on him.

GOD'S FOREKNOWLEDGE AND HUMAN FREE WILL, AGAINST CICERO'S DEFINITION

Against Cicero, Augustine holds that God's foreknowledge and human free will are compatible.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.9 Hos Cicero ita redarguere nititur, ut non existimet aliquid se aduersus eos ualere, nisi auferat diuinationem. Quam sic conatur auferre, ut neget esse scientiam futurorum, eamque omnibus uiribus nullam esse omnino contendat, uel in homine uel in deo, nullamque rerum praedictionem. Ita et Dei praescientiam negat et omnem prophetiam luce clariorem conatur euertere uanis argumentationibus et obponendo sibi quaedam oracula,	Cicero tries to refute these men, but he does not think he can prevail against them unless he does away with divination. He tries to do away with it by denying that there is any knowledge of the future; he argues with all his strength that there is no such knowledge at all, whether in man or in god, and no prediction of events. In this way he both denies the foreknowledge of God and tries to

6 Lucius Annaeus Seneca (d. AD 65), Stoic philosopher; the lines (Letters 107.11) are his Latin version of a prayer by the Greek Stoic Cleanthes.
7 Homer, Odyssey 18.136–137.

LATIN

quae facile possunt refelli; quae tamen nec ipsa conuincit. In his autem mathematicorum coniecturis refutandis eius regnat oratio, quia uere tales sunt, ut se ipsae destruant et refellant. Multo sunt autem tolerabiliores, qui uel siderea fata constituunt, quam iste qui tollit praescientiam futurorum. Nam et confiteri esse Deum et negare praescium futurorum apertissima insania est.

ENGLISH

overthrow all prophecy, though it is clearer than daylight, by empty arguments and by setting up against himself certain oracles that can easily be refuted—and even these he does not refute. In refuting the conjectures of the astrologers, however, his eloquence reigns supreme, because they really are such that they destroy and refute themselves. Yet those who make fate depend on the stars are far more tolerable than this man who abolishes foreknowledge of the future. For to admit that God exists and to deny that he foreknows the future is the most obvious madness.[8]

Quod et ipse cum uideret, etiam illud tentauit quod scriptum est: Dixit insipiens in corde suo: Non est Deus; sed non ex sua persona. Vidit enim quam esset inuidiosum et molestum, ideoque Cottam fecit disputantem de hac re aduersus Stoicos in libris de deorum natura et pro Lucilio Balbo, cui Stoicorum partes defendendas dedit, maluit ferre sententiam quam pro Cotta, qui nullam diuinam naturam esse contendit. In libris uero de diuinatione ex se ipso apertissime obpugnat praescientiam futurorum. Hoc autem totum facere uidetur, ne fatum esse consentiat et perdat liberam uoluntatem. Putat enim concessa scientia futurorum ita esse consequens fatum, ut negari omnino non possit.

He saw this himself, and so he even attempted what is written: "The fool has said in his heart, 'There is no God'"—but not in his own person. For he saw how odious and offensive it would be. So in his books On the Nature of the Gods he made Cotta argue on this subject against the Stoics, and he preferred to cast his vote for Lucilius Balbus, to whom he gave the task of defending the Stoic position, rather than for Cotta, who argues that there is no divine nature. In his books On Divination, on the other hand, he attacks foreknowledge of the future quite openly and in his own person. He seems to do all this to avoid admitting fate and losing free will. For he thinks that once knowledge of the future is granted, fate follows so inevitably that it cannot be denied at all.[9]

Sed quoquo modo se habeant tortuosissimae concertationes et disputationes philosophorum, nos ut confitemur summum et uerum Deum, ita uoluntatem summamque potestatem ac praescientiam eius confitemur; nec timemus ne ideo non uoluntate faciamus, quod uoluntate facimus, quia id nos facturos ille praesciuit, cuius praescientia falli non potest; quod Cicero timuit, ut obpugnaret praescientiam, et Stoici, ut non omnia necessitate fieri dicerent, quamuis omnia fato fieri contenderent. Quid est ergo, quod Cicero timuit in praescientia futurorum, ut eam labefactare disputatione detestabili niteretur?

But however matters stand with the tangled debates and disputes of the philosophers, we, just as we confess the supreme and true God, so also confess his will, his supreme power and his foreknowledge. Nor are we afraid that what we do by our will we do not do by our will, because he whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived foreknew that we would do it. This is what Cicero feared, so that he attacked foreknowledge; and what the Stoics feared, so that they said not everything happens by necessity, although they maintained that everything happens by fate. What, then, did Cicero fear in foreknowledge of the future, that he strove to undermine it with so detestable an argument?

Videlicet quia, si praescita sunt omnia futura, hoc ordine uenient, quo uentura esse praescita sunt; et si hoc ordine

Clearly this: if all future things are foreknown, they will come about in the order in which they 8 Cicero argues this in his dialogue On Divination (44 BC), Book 2.

9 Psalm 13:1 (14:1 in most English Bibles). Gaius Aurelius Cotta and Quintus Lucilius Balbus are speakers in Cicero's dialogue, representing the Academic and Stoic positions.

LATIN

uenient, certus est ordo rerum praescienti Deo; et si certus est ordo rerum, certus est ordo causarum; non enim fieri aliquid potest, quod non aliqua efficiens causa praecesserit; si autem certus est ordo causarum, quo fit omne quod fit, fato, inquit, fiunt omnia quae fiunt. Quod si ita est, nihil est in nostra potestate nullumque est arbitrium uoluntatis; quod si concedimus, inquit, omnis humana uita subuertitur, frustra leges dantur, frustra obiurgationes laudes, uituperationes exhortationes adhibentur, neque ulla iustitia bonis praemia et malis supplicia constituta sunt.

Haec ergo ne consequantur indigna et absurda et perniciosa rebus humanis, non uult esse praescientiam futurorum; adque in has angustias coartat animum religiosum, ut unum eligat e duobus, aut esse aliquid in nostra uoluntate, aut esse praescientiam futurorum, quoniam utrumque arbitratur esse non posse, sed si alterum confirmabitur, alterum tolli; si elegerimus praescientiam futurorum, tolli uoluntatis arbitrium; si elegerimus uoluntatis arbitrium, tolli praescientiam futurorum. Ipse itaque, ut uir magnus et doctus et uitae humanae plurimum ac peritissime consulens, ex his duobus elegit liberum uoluntatis arbitrium; quod ut confirmaretur, negauit praescientiam futurorum adque ita, dum uult facere liberos, fecit sacrilegos. Religiosus autem animus utrumque eligit, utrumque confitetur et fide pietatis utrumque confirmat. Quo modo?

inquit; nam si est praescientia futurorum, sequentur illa omnia, quae conexa sunt, donec eo perueniatur, ut nihil sit in nostra uoluntate. Porro si est aliquid in nostra uoluntate, eisdem recursis gradibus eo peruenitur, ut non sit praescientia futurorum. Nam per illa omnia sic recurritur: si est uoluntatis arbitrium, non omnia fato fiunt; si non omnia fato fiunt, non est omnium certus ordo causarum; si certus ordo causarum non est, nec rerum certus est ordo praescienti Deo, quae fieri non possunt, nisi praecedentibus et efficientibus causis; si rerum ordo praescienti Deo certus non est, non omnia sic ueniunt, ut ea uentura praesciuit; porro si non omnia sic ueniunt, ut ab illo uentura praescita sunt, non est, inquit, in Deo praescientia omnium futurorum.

ENGLISH

were foreknown to come about. If they come about in that order, the order of events is fixed for God who foreknows it. If the order of events is fixed, the order of causes is fixed, for nothing can happen without being preceded by some efficient cause. But if the order of causes by which everything that happens happens is fixed, then, he says, everything that happens happens by fate. If that is so, nothing is in our power and there is no choice of the will. And if we grant that, he says, all human life is overturned: laws are made in vain, rebukes and praises, blame and encouragement are used in vain, and there is no justice at all in the rewards appointed for the good and the punishments for the wicked.

So, to keep these unworthy and absurd consequences, so ruinous to human affairs, from following, he will not have foreknowledge of the future. And he forces the religious mind into this tight corner, so that it must choose one of two things: either that something is in our will, or that there is foreknowledge of the future. For he thinks both cannot be true, but that if one is affirmed the other is abolished. If we choose foreknowledge of the future, the choice of the will is abolished; if we choose the choice of the will, foreknowledge of the future is abolished. And so he, as a great and learned man who took the greatest and most expert thought for human life, chose of these two the free choice of the will. To establish it, he denied foreknowledge of the future, and so, in his wish to make men free, he made them sacrilegious. The religious mind, however, chooses both, confesses both, and affirms both by the faith of piety. "How can that be?"

he asks. For if there is foreknowledge of the future, all those linked consequences will follow, until we arrive at the point where nothing is in our will. Again, if anything is in our will, we arrive by retracing the same steps at the point where there is no foreknowledge of the future. For we go back through them all like this: if there is choice of the will, not everything happens by fate; if not everything happens by fate, there is no fixed order of all causes; if there is no fixed order of causes, neither is there a fixed order of events for God who foreknows them, since events cannot happen unless causes precede and produce them; if the order of events is not fixed for God who foreknows them, not everything comes about as he foreknew it would come about; and further, if not everything comes about as he foreknew it would, then, he says, there is not in God foreknowledge of all future things.

LATIN

ENGLISH

GOD'S FOREKNOWLEDGE AND OUR WILLS

Augustine answers Cicero: our wills are themselves among the causes God foreknows.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Nos aduersus istos sacrilegos ausus adque inpios et Deum dicimus omnia scire antequam fiant, et uoluntate nos facere, quidquid a nobis non nisi uolentibus fieri sentimus et nouimus. Omnia uero fieri fato non dicimus, immo nulla fieri fato dicimus; quoniam fati nomen ubi solet a loquentibus poni, id est in constitutione siderum cum quisque conceptus aut natus est, quoniam res ipsa inaniter adseritur, nihil ualere monstramus. Ordinem autem causarum, ubi uoluntas Dei plurimum potest, neque negamus, neque fati uocabulo nuncupamus, nisi forte ut fatum a fando dictum intellegamus, id est a loquendo; non enim abnuere possumus esse scriptum in litteris sanctis: Semel locutus est Deus, duo haec audiui, quoniam potestas Dei est, et tibi, Domine, misericordia, qui reddis unicuique secundum opera eius.

Against these sacrilegious and impious ventures, we say both that God knows all things before they happen and that we do by our will whatever we feel and know is done by us only because we will it. We do not say that everything happens by fate; indeed we say that nothing happens by fate. For we show that the name "fate," as people usually apply it—that is, to the arrangement of the stars at the time someone is conceived or born—means nothing, since the thing itself is asserted to no purpose. The order of causes, on the other hand, in which the will of God is supremely powerful, we neither deny nor call by the word "fate"—unless perhaps we understand fatum as derived from fari, that is, from speaking. For we cannot deny that it is written in the holy Scriptures: "God has spoken once; these two things I have heard: that power belongs to God, and to you, Lord, belongs mercy, for you repay each one according to his works."[10]

Quod enim dictum est: Semel locutus est, intellegitur inmobiliter, hoc est incommutabiliter, est locutus, sicut nouit incommutabiliter omnia quae futura sunt et quae ipse facturus est. Hac itaque ratione possemus a fando fatum appellare, nisi hoc nomen iam in alia re soleret intellegi, quo corda hominum nolumus inclinari. Non est autem consequens, ut, si Deo certus est omnium ordo causarum, ideo nihil sit in nostrae uoluntatis arbitrio. Et ipsae quippe nostrae uoluntates in causarum ordine sunt, qui certus est Deo eiusque praescientia continetur, quoniam et humanae uoluntates humanorum operum causae sunt. Adque ita, qui omnes rerum causas praesciuit, profecto in eis causis etiam nostras uoluntates ignorare non potuit, quas nostrorum operum causas esse praesciuit.

When it says "he has spoken once," this is understood to mean that he spoke immovably, that is, unchangeably, just as he knows unchangeably all things that will happen and that he himself will do. On this reasoning, then, we could call it fate from "speaking," were it not that this name is already customarily understood of something else, toward which we do not want people's hearts to be inclined. But it does not follow that, if the order of all causes is fixed for God, nothing is therefore in the choice of our will. For our wills themselves are in the order of causes, which is fixed for God and contained in his foreknowledge, since human wills too are the causes of human actions. And so he who foreknew all the causes of things certainly could not, among those causes, have 10 Psalm 61:11–12 (62:11–12 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

Nam et illud, quod idem Cicero concedit, nihil fieri si causa efficiens non praecedat, satis est ad eum in hac quaestione redarguendum. Quid enim eum adiuuat, quod dicit nihil quidem fieri sine causa, sed non omnem causam esse fatalem, quia est causa fortuita, est naturalis, est uoluntaria? Sufficit, quia omne, quod fit, non nisi causa praecedente fieri confitetur. Nos enim eas causas, quae dicuntur fortuitae, unde etiam fortuna nomen accepit, non esse dicimus nullas, sed latentes, easque tribuimus uel Dei ueri uel quorumlibet spirituum uoluntati, ipsasque naturales nequaquam ab illius uoluntate seiungimus, qui est auctor omnis conditorque naturae.

Iam uero causae uoluntariae aut Dei sunt aut angelorum aut hominum aut quorumque animalium, si tamen uoluntates appellandae sunt animarum rationis expertium motus illi, quibus aliqua faciunt secundum naturam suam, cum quid uel adpetunt uel euitant. Angelorum autem uoluntates dico seu bonorum, quos angelos Dei dicimus, seu malorum, quos angelos diaboli uel etiam daemones appellamus: sic et hominum, et bonorum scilicet et malorum. Ac per hoc colligitur non esse causas efficientes omnium quae fiunt nisi uoluntarias, illius naturae scilicet, quae spiritus uitae est. Nam et aer iste seu uentus dicitur spiritus; sed quoniam corpus est, non est spiritus uitae. Spiritus ergo uitae, qui uiuificat omnia creatorque est omnis corporis et omnis creati spiritus, ipse est Deus, spiritus utique non creatus.

In eius uoluntate summa potestas est, quae creatorum spirituum bonas uoluntates adiuuat, malas iudicat, omnes ordinat et quibusdam tribuit potestates, quibus dam non tribuit. Sicut enim omnium naturarum creator est, ita omnium potestatum dator, non uoluntatum. Malae quippe uoluntates ab illo non sunt, quoniam contra naturam sunt, quae ab illo est. Corpora igitur magis subiacent uoluntatibus, quaedam nostris, id est omnium animantium mortalium et magis hominum quam bestiarum; quaedam uero angelorum; sed omnia maxime Dei uoluntati subdita sunt, cui etiam uoluntates omnes subiciuntur, quia non habent potestatem nisi been ignorant of our wills, which he foreknew to be the causes of our actions.

ENGLISH

Indeed, what Cicero himself concedes—that nothing happens unless an efficient cause precedes it—is enough to refute him on this question. What good does it do him to say that nothing happens without a cause, but that not every cause is a cause of fate (fatalis), since there is chance cause, natural cause and voluntary cause? It is enough that he admits that everything that happens happens only when a cause precedes it. For we say that the causes called chance causes (from which fortune too takes its name) are not nonexistent but hidden, and we attribute them to the will either of the true God or of spirits of whatever kind. And natural causes we by no means separate from the will of him who is the author and founder of all nature.

Voluntary causes, moreover, belong either to God, or to angels, or to human beings, or to animals of whatever kind—if indeed we should call "wills" those movements of souls lacking reason by which they do things according to their nature when they seek or avoid something. By the wills of angels I mean those of good angels, whom we call angels of God, and of evil angels, whom we call angels of the devil or even demons; and likewise of human beings, both good and wicked. From this it follows that there are no efficient causes of all that happens except voluntary causes, that is, causes belonging to that nature which is the spirit of life. For this air, or wind, is also called spiritus [breath, spirit]; but since it is a body, it is not the spirit of life. The spirit of life, then, which gives life to all things and is the creator of every body and of every created spirit, is God himself, a spirit who is certainly uncreated.

In his will is supreme power, which helps the good wills of created spirits, judges the evil ones, orders them all, and grants powers to some and not to others. For just as he is the creator of all natures, so he is the giver of all powers—but not of wills. Evil wills do not come from him, since they are contrary to nature, which does come from him. Bodies, then, are rather subject to wills: some to ours, that is, to those of all mortal living things, and more to those of human beings than of beasts; others to the wills of angels. But all are subject quam ille concedit. Causa itaque rerum, quae facit nec fit, Deus est; aliae uero causae et faciunt et fiunt, sicut sunt omnes creati spiritus, maxime rationales.

LATIN

Corporales autem causae, quae magis fiunt quam faciunt, non sunt inter causas efficientes adnumerandae, quoniam hoc possunt, quod ex ipsis faciunt spirituum uoluntates. Quo modo igitur ordo causarum, qui praescienti certus est Deo, id efficit, ut nihil sit in nostra uoluntate, cum in ipso causarum ordine magnum habeant locum nostrae uoluntates? Contendat ergo Cicero cum eis, qui hunc causarum ordinem dicunt esse fatalem uel potius ipsum fati nomine appellant, quod nos abhorremus praecipue propter uocabulum, quod non in re uera consueuit intellegi. Quod uero negat ordinem omnium causarum esse certissimum et Dei praescientiae notissimum, plus eum quam Stoici detestamur.

Aut enim esse Deum negat, quod quidem inducta alterius persona in libris de deorum natura facere molitus est; aut si esse confitetur Deum, quem negat praescium futurorum, etiam sic nihil dicit aliud, quam quod ille dixit insipiens in corde suo: Non est Deus. Qui enim non est praescius omnium futurorum, non est utique Deus. Quapropter et uoluntates nostrae tantum ualent, quantum Deus eas ualere uoluit adque praesciuit; et ideo quidquid ualent, certissime ualent, et quod facturae sunt, ipsae omnino facturae sunt, quia ualituras adque facturas ille praesciuit, cuius praescientia falli non potest.

Quapropter si mihi fati nomen alicui rei adhibendum placeret, magis dicerem fatum esse infirmioris potentioris uoluntatem, qui eum usitato in potestate, quam illo causarum ordine, quem non usitato sed suo more Stoici fatum appellant, arbitrium nostrae uoluntatis auferri.

ENGLISH

above all to the will of God, to whom all wills too are subject, since they have no power except what he grants. God, then, is the cause of things that makes and is not made. Other causes both make and are made, as all created spirits are, especially rational ones.

Bodily causes, however, which are made rather than make, are not to be counted among efficient causes, since they can do only what the wills of spirits do through them. How, then, does the order of causes, which is fixed for God who foreknows it, bring it about that nothing is in our will, when our wills have a large place in that very order of causes? Let Cicero contend, then, with those who say that this order of causes is fated, or rather call it by the name of fate. We shrink from that name, chiefly because of the word itself, which is customarily understood of something unreal. But in denying that the order of all causes is utterly fixed and fully known to God's foreknowledge, we detest him more than we do the Stoics.

For either he denies that God exists—which he tried to do, speaking through another character, in his books On the Nature of the Gods—or, if he admits that God exists while denying that he foreknows the future, even so he is saying nothing other than what that fool said in his heart: "There is no God." For one who does not foreknow all future things is certainly not God. Therefore our wills too have just as much power as God willed and foreknew that they would have. And so whatever power they have, they have it with complete certainty, and what they are going to do, they themselves are entirely going to do, because he whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived foreknew that they would have that power and would do it.

So if I chose to apply the name "fate" to anything, I would rather say that the fate of the weaker is the will of the stronger, who has the weaker in his power, than that the choice of our will is taken away by that order of causes which the Stoics call fate—not in the ordinary sense, but in their own peculiar way.

WHETHER ANY NECESSITY RULES HUMAN WILLS

The necessity of God's foreknowledge does not take away the freedom of our will.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.10	Unde nec illa necessitas formidanda est, quam formidando Stoici laborauerunt causas rerum distinguere ita, ut quasdam subtraherent necessitati, quasdam subderent, adque in his, quas esse sub necessitate uoluerunt, posuerunt etiam nostras uoluntates, ne uidelicet non essent liberae, si subderentur necessitati. Si enim necessitas nostra illa dicenda est, quae non est in nostra potestate, sed etiam si nolimus efficit quod potest, sicut est necessitas mortis: manifestum est uoluntates nostras, quibus recte uel perperam uiuitur, sub tali necessitate non esse. Multa enim facimus, quae si nollemus, non utique faceremus. Quo primitus pertinet ipsum uelle; nam si uolumus, est, si nolumus, non est; non enim uellemus, si nollemus.	So we need not fear that necessity either. Out of fear of it the Stoics labored to distinguish the causes of things, exempting some from necessity and subjecting others to it. Among those they did not want to be under necessity they placed our wills as well, so that our wills would not lose their freedom by being subjected to necessity. Now if we are to call "our" necessity that which is not in our power but accomplishes what it can even against our will, as the necessity of death does, then it is clear that our wills, by which we live rightly or wrongly, are not under any such necessity. For we do many things that we certainly would not do if we did not want to. To this belongs, first of all, willing itself. If we will, it exists; if we do not will, it does not. For we would not will if we did not want to.[11]
	Si autem illa definitur esse necessitas, secundum quam dicimus necesse esse ut ita sit aliquid uel ita fiat, nescio quur eam timeamus, ne nobis libertatem auferat uoluntatis. Neque enim et uitam Dei et praescientiam Dei sub necessitate ponimus, si dicamus necesse esse Deum semper uiuere et cuncta praescire; sicut nec potestas eius minuitur, cum dicitur mori fallique non posse. Sic enim hoc non potest, ut potius, si posset, minoris esset utique potestatis. Recte quippe omnipotens dicitur, qui tamen mori et falli non potest. Dicitur enim omnipotens faciendo quod uult, non patiendo quod non uult; quod ei si accideret, nequaquam esset omnipotens. Unde propterea quaedam non potest, quia omnipotens est.	But suppose necessity is defined as that by which we say it is necessary that something be so or happen so. Then I do not see why we should fear that it will take away the freedom of our will. For we do not place God's life or God's foreknowledge under necessity when we say it is necessary that God always live and foreknow all things. Nor is his power diminished when it is said that he cannot die or be deceived. His inability here is of such a kind that, if he could do these things, he would surely have less power. He is rightly called almighty, even though he cannot die or be deceived. For he is called almighty because he does what he wills, not because he suffers what he does not will. If that happened to him, he would by no means be almighty. So there are some things he cannot do precisely because he is almighty.
	Sic etiam cum dicimus necesse esse, ut, cum uolumus, libero uelimus arbitrio: et uerum procul dubio dicimus, et non ideo ipsum liberum arbitrium necessitati subicimus, quae adimit libertatem. Sunt igitur nostrae uoluntates et ipsae faciunt, quidquid uolendo facimus, quod non fieret, si nollemus. Quidquid autem aliorum hominum uoluntate nolens quisque patitur, etiam sic uoluntas ualet, etsi non illius, tamen hominis uoluntas; sed potestas Dei. Nam si	So too, when we say it is necessary that, when we will, we will by free choice, we undoubtedly speak the truth. Yet we do not thereby subject free choice itself to the necessity that takes away freedom. Our wills, then, are our own. They themselves do whatever we do by willing, and it would not be done if we did not want it. And whatever anyone suffers against his will through the will of 11 The Latin printed here reads uoluerunt ("they wanted"), but the sense requires noluerunt ("they did not want"), and the translation follows that sense.

LATIN

uoluntas tantum esset nec posset quod uellet, potentiore uoluntate inpediretur; nec sic tamen uoluntas nisi uoluntas esset, nec alterius, sed eius esset qui uellet, etsi non posset inplere quod uellet. Unde quidquid praeter suam uoluntatem patitur homo, non debet tribuere humanis uel angelicis uel cuiusquam creati spiritus uoluntatibus, sed eius potius, qui dat potestatem uolentibus.

Non ergo propterea nihil est in nostra uoluntate, quia Deus praesciuit quid futurum esset in nostra uoluntate. Non enim, qui hoc praesciuit, nihil praesciuit. Porro si ille, qui praesciuit quid futurum esset in nostra uoluntate, non utique nihil, sed aliquid praesciuit: profecto et illo praesciente est aliquid in nostra uoluntate. Quocirca nullo modo cogimur aut retenta praescientia Dei tollere uoluntatis arbitrium aut retento uoluntatis arbitrio Deum (quod nefas est) negare praescium futurorum; sed utrumque amplectimur, utrumque fideliter et ueraciter confitemur; illud, ut bene credamus; hoc, ut bene uiuamus. Male autem uiuitur, si de Deo non bene creditur. Unde absit a nobis eius negare praescientiam, ut libere uelimus, quo adiuuante sumus liberi uel erimus.

Proinde non frustra sunt leges obiurgationes exhortationes laudes et uituperationes, quia et ipsas futuras esse praesciuit, et ualent plurimum, quantum eas ualituras esse praesciuit, et preces ualent ad ea inpetranda, quae se precantibus concessurum esse praesciuit, et iuste praemia bonis factis et peccatis supplicia constituta sunt. Neque enim ideo peccat homo, quia Deus illum peccaturum esse praesciuit; immo ideo non dubitatur ipsum peccare cum peccat, quia ille, cuius praescientia falli non potest, non fatum, non fortunam, non aliquid aliud, sed ipsum peccaturum esse praesciuit. Qui si nolit, utique non peccat; sed si peccare noluerit, etiam hoc ille praesciuit.

ENGLISH

other people, even then it is will that prevails. It may not be his will, but it is still a human will. The power, however, is God's. For if there were only a will that could not do what it willed, it would be thwarted by a more powerful will. Even so, the will would be nothing other than a will. It would belong not to someone else but to the one who willed, even if he could not carry out what he willed. Hence whatever a person suffers against his will, he should not attribute to the wills of human beings, or of angels, or of any created spirit. He should attribute it rather to the will of him who gives power to those who will.

It does not follow, then, that nothing is in our will because God foreknew what would be in our will. For he who foreknew this did not foreknow nothing. And if he who foreknew what would be in our will foreknew not nothing but something, then surely, even though he foreknows it, there is something in our will. We are therefore in no way forced either to keep God's foreknowledge and abolish the will's free choice, or to keep the will's free choice and deny (an impious thing) that God foreknows the future. Rather, we embrace both. We confess both faithfully and truly: the one so that we may believe rightly, the other so that we may live rightly. And a person lives badly who does not believe rightly about God. So far be it from us to deny his foreknowledge in order to will freely, since it is with his help that we are free, or will be.

Laws, then, are not in vain, nor are reproofs, exhortations, praise and blame. For he foreknew that these too would exist, and they have great power, as much power as he foreknew they would have. Prayers too are effective in obtaining what he foreknew he would grant to those who pray. And rewards have justly been appointed for good deeds, and punishments for sins. For a person does not sin because God foreknew that he would sin. On the contrary, there is no doubt that it is he himself who sins when he sins. This is precisely because he whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived foreknew that the one who would sin was not fate, not fortune, not anything else, but the man himself. If he does not want to sin, he certainly does not sin. But if he chooses not to sin, God foreknew that too.

GOD'S UNIVERSAL PROVIDENCE, BY WHOSE LAWS ALL THINGS ARE HELD TOGETHER

God's providence orders everything from angels to a bird's feather, so it also orders kingdoms.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.11	Deus itaque summus et uerus cum Uerbo suo et Spiritu sancto, quae tria unum sunt, Deus unus omnipotens, creator et factor omnis animae adque omnis corporis, cuius sunt participatione felices, quicumque sunt ueritate, non uanitate felices, qui fecit hominem rationale animal ex anima et corpore, qui eum peccantem nec inpunitum esse permisit nec sine misericordia dereliquit; qui bonis et malis essentiam etiam cum lapidibus, uitam seminalem etiam cum arboribus, uitam sensualem etiam cum pecoribus, uitam intellectualem cum solis angelis dedit; a quo est omnis modus omnis species omnis ordo; a quo est mensura numerus pondus; a quo est quidquid naturaliter est, cuiuscumque generis est, cuiuslibet aestimationis est;	Therefore the supreme and true God, with his Word and the Holy Spirit, which three are one, is one God almighty. He is the creator and maker of every soul and every body. By sharing in him, all are happy who are happy in truth and not in vanity. He made man a rational animal, composed of soul and body. When man sinned, he neither let him go unpunished nor abandoned him without mercy. To good and bad alike he gave existence, which they share with stones; seminal life, which they share with trees; sensory life, which they share with animals; and intellectual life, which they share with the angels alone. From him comes every limit, every form, every order. From him come measure, number and weight. From him comes whatever exists by nature, of whatever kind and whatever worth;[12]
	a quo sunt semina formarum formae seminum motus seminum adque formarum; qui dedit et carni originem pulchritudinem ualetudinem, propagationis fecunditatem membrorum dispositionem salutem concordiae; qui et animae inrationali dedit memoriam sensum adpetitum, rationali autem insuper mentem intellegentiam uoluntatem; qui non solum caelum et terram, nec solum angelum et hominem, sed nec exigui et contemtibilis animantis uiscera nec auis pinnulam, nec herbae flosculum nec arboris folium sine suarum partium conuenientia et quadam ueluti pace dereliquit: nullo modo est credendus regna hominum eorumque dominationes et seruitutes a suae prouidentiae legibus alienas esse uoluisse.	from him come the seeds of forms, the forms of seeds, and the motions of seeds and forms. He gave the flesh its origin, beauty and health, its fruitfulness in reproduction, the arrangement of its limbs, and the well-being that comes from their harmony. To the irrational soul he gave memory, sense and appetite, and to the rational soul, in addition, mind, intelligence and will. He has left nothing without a harmony of its parts and a kind of peace: not heaven and earth, not angel and man, and not even the inner organs of a tiny and insignificant creature, a bird's little feather, a plant's little flower or a tree's leaf. It is in no way to be believed that this God willed the kingdoms of men, with their dominions and their subjections, to lie outside the laws of his providence.

BY WHAT MORALS THE ANCIENT ROMANS DESERVED TO HAVE THE TRUE GOD ENLARGE THEIR EMPIRE, THOUGH THEY DID NOT WORSHIP HIM

The early Romans' love of praise and glory curbed their other vices and drove them to great deeds.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.12	Proinde uideamus, quos Romanorum mores et quam ob causam Deus uerus ad augendum imperium adiuuare dignatus est, in cuius potestate sunt etiam regna terrena.	Let us see, then, which qualities of the Romans the true God, in whose power even earthly kingdoms lie, deigned to help in enlarging their empire, and

12 "Measure, number and weight" echoes Wisdom 11:20 (11:21 in some numberings): "You have ordered all things in measure, number and weight."

LATIN

Quod autem ut absolutius disserere possemus, ad hoc pertinentem etiam superiorem librum conscripsimus, quod in hac re potestas nulla sit eorum deorum, quos etiam rebus nugatoriis colendos putarunt, et praesentis uoluminis partes superiores, quas huc usque perduximus, de fati quaestione tollenda, ne quisquam, cui iam persuasam esset non illorum deorum cultu Romanum imperium propagatum adque seruatum, nescio cui fato potius id tribueret quam Dei summi potentissimae uoluntati.

Ueteres igitur primique Romani, quantum eorum docet et commendat historia, quamuis ut aliae gentes excepta una populi Hebraeorum deos falsos colerent et non Deo uictimas, sed daemoniis immolarent, tamen laudis auidi, pecuniae liberales erant, gloriam ingentem, diuitias honestas uolebant; hanc ardentissime dilexerunt, propter hanc uiuere uoluerunt, pro hac emori non dubitauerunt; ceteras cupiditates huius unius ingenti cupiditate presserunt. Ipsam denique patriam suam, quoniam seruire uidebatur inglorium, dominari uero adque imperare gloriosum, prius omni studio liberam, deinde dominam esse concupiuerunt.

Hinc est quod regalem dominationem non ferentes (annua imperia binosque imperatores sibi fecerunt, qui consules appellati sunt a consulendo, non reges aut domini a regnando adque dominando; cum et reges utique a regendo dicti melius uideantur, ut regnum a regibus, reges autem, ut dictum est, a regendo; sed fastus regius non disciplina putata est regentis uel beneuolentia consulentis, sed superbia dominantis. Expulso itaque rege Tarquinio et consulibus institutis secutum est, quod idem auctor in Romanorum laudibus posuit, quod ciuitas incredibile memoratu est adepta libertate quantum breui creuerit; tanta cupido gloriae incesserat.) Ista ergo laudis auiditas et cupido gloriae multa illa miranda fecit, laudabilia scilicet adque gloriosa secundum hominum existimationem.

ENGLISH

for what reason. To be able to discuss this more fully, I wrote the previous book, which bears on this point and shows that in this matter there is no power in those gods whom they thought should be worshiped even for trivial matters. I also wrote the earlier parts of the present volume, which I have carried up to this point, to dispose of the question of fate. My purpose was that no one already persuaded that the Roman Empire was not spread and preserved by the worship of those gods should attribute it to some fate or other rather than to the most powerful will of the supreme God.

The ancient and earliest Romans, then, so far as their history teaches and commends them, worshiped false gods like other nations, with the sole exception of the Hebrew people, and sacrificed victims not to God but to demons. Nevertheless, they were "greedy for praise and generous with money; they wanted immense glory and honest wealth." This glory they loved most ardently. For it they wanted to live, and for it they did not hesitate to die. All their other cravings they suppressed by their immense craving for this one thing. Finally, since it seemed inglorious for their country to serve and glorious for it to rule and command, they desired with all their zeal that it should first be free, and then be mistress.[13]

Hence it was that, unable to bear royal domination, "they made for themselves annual commands and two commanders." These were called consuls, from consulere, "to take counsel," not kings or lords, from regnare and dominari, "to reign" and "to dominate." Kings (reges), to be sure, seem to take their name better from regere, "to rule," just as kingdom (regnum) comes from kings, and kings, as I said, from ruling. But royal arrogance was regarded not as the discipline of one who rules or the goodwill of one who takes counsel, but as the pride of one who dominates. So once King Tarquin had been expelled and consuls instituted, there followed what the same author set down in praise of the Romans: "Once it had gained its liberty, it is incredible to recall how much the city grew in a short time, so great a desire for glory had come over it." It was this eagerness for praise and this desire for glory, then, that accomplished 13 Sallust (86–c. 35 BC), Roman historian, The War with Catiline 7.6; Augustine quotes him repeatedly in what follows.

LATIN

ENGLISH

those many marvelous deeds, deeds praiseworthy and glorious, that is, by human estimation.[14]

Laudat idem Sallustius temporibus suis magnos et praeclaros uiros, Marcum Catonem et Gaium Caesarem, dicens quod diu illa res publica non habuit quemquam uirtute magnum, sed sua memoria fuisse illos duos ingenti uirtute, diuersis moribus. In laudibus autem Caesaris posuit, quod sibi magnum imperium, exercitum, bellum nouum exoptabat, ubi uirtus enitescere posset. Ita fiebat in uotis uirorum uirtute magnorum, ut excitaret in bellum miseras gentes et flagello agitaret Bellona sanguineo, ut esset ubi uirtus eorum enitesceret. Hoc illa profecto laudis auiditas et gloriae cupido faciebat. Amore itaque primitus libertatis, post etiam dominationis et cupiditate laudis et gloriae multa magna fecerunt.

The same Sallust praises the great and distinguished men of his own time, Marcus Cato and Gaius Caesar. He says that for a long time the commonwealth had had no one great in virtue, but that within his own memory there had been these two, men of immense virtue though of different character. Among Caesar's praises he records that "he longed for a great command, an army, a new war, where his virtue could shine forth." So it was among the wishes of men great in virtue that Bellona should rouse wretched nations to war and drive them with her bloody scourge, so that there might be a place for their virtue to shine. This, surely, was the work of that eagerness for praise and desire for glory. So it was first out of love of liberty, later also of domination, and out of desire for praise and glory, that they did many great things.[15]

Reddit eis utriusque rei testimonium etiam poeta insignis illorum; inde quippe ait: Nec non Tarquinium eiectum Porsenna iubebat Accipere ingentique urbem obsidione premebat;
Aeneadae in ferrum pro libertate ruebant. Tunc itaque magnum illis fuit aut fortiter mori aut liberos uiuere. Sed cum esset adepta libertas, tanta cupido gloriae incesserat, ut parum esset sola libertas, nisi et dominatio quaereretur, dum pro magno habetur, quod uelut loquente Ioue idem poeta dicit: Quin aspera Iuno,
Quae mare nunc terrasque metu caelumque fatigat,
Consilia in melius referet mecumque fouebit
Romanos rerum dominos gentemque togatam.
Sic placitum. Ueniet lustris labentibus aetas,
Cum domus Assaraci Phthiam clarasque Mycenas
Seruitio premet ac uictis dominabitur Argis.

Their famous poet also bears witness to both these things. On the first he says: "Porsenna too was ordering them to take back the banished Tarquin, and was pressing the city with a mighty siege; the sons of Aeneas were rushing upon the sword for liberty." At that time, then, it was a great thing to them either to die bravely or to live free. But once liberty was gained, so great a desire for glory had come over them that liberty alone was too little unless domination too was sought. For they set great store by what the same poet says, putting the words in Jupiter's mouth: "Indeed, harsh Juno, who now wearies sea and lands and sky with fear, will change her counsels for the better and with me will cherish the Romans, lords of the world, the toga-clad race. So it is decreed. An age will come, as the five-year cycles glide by, when the house of Assaracus will crush Phthia and famed Mycenae in slavery and lord it over conquered Argos."[16]

Quae quidem Vergilius Iouem inducens tamquam futura praedicentem ipse iam facta recolebat cernebatque praesentia; uerum propterea commemorare illa uolui, ut

Virgil, in presenting Jupiter as if foretelling these things as future, was himself recalling things already done and looking at things present. But I 14 Sallust, Catiline 6.7 and 7.3. Tarquin the Proud was Rome's last king, traditionally expelled in 509 BC.

15 Sallust, Catiline 53.6 and 54.4, on Cato the Younger (95–46 BC) and Julius Caesar (100–44 BC). Bellona was the Roman goddess of war.
16 Virgil, Aeneid 8.646–648 and 1.279–285. Porsenna was an Etruscan king. Assaracus was an ancestor of the Trojans, from whom the Romans claimed descent, while Phthia, Mycenae and Argos were the Greek homes of Troy's conquerors.

LATIN

ostenderem dominationem post libertatem sic habuisse Romanos, ut in eorum magnis laudibus poneretur. Hinc est et illud eiusdem poetae, quod, cum artibus aliarum gentium eas ipsas proprias Romanorum artes regnandi adque imperandi et subigendi ac debellandi populos anteponeret, ait: Excudent alii spirantia mollius aera, Cedo equidem, uiuos ducent de marmore uultus, Orabunt causas melius caelique meatus Describent radio et surgentia sidera dicent: Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento (Hae tibi erunt artes) pacique inponere mores, Parcere subiectis et debellare superbos.

Has artes illi tanto peritius exercebant, quanto minus se uoluptatibus dabant et eneruationi animi et corporis in concupiscendis et augendis diuitiis et per illas moribus corrumpendis, rapiendo miseris ciuibus, largiendo scaenicis turpibus. Qui tales iam morum labe superabant adque abundabant, quando scribebat ista Sallustius canebatque Vergilius, non illis artibus ad honores et gloriam, sed dolis adque fallaciis ambiebant. Unde idem dicit: Sed primo magis ambitio quam auaritia animos hominum exercebat, quod tamen uitium propius uirtutem erat. Nam gloriam honorem imperium bonus et ignauus aeque sibi exoptant; sed ille, inquit, uera uia nititur, huic quia bonae artes desunt, dolis adque fallaciis contendit.

Hae sunt illae bonae artes, per uirtutem scilicet, non per fallacem ambitionem ad honorem et gloriam et imperium peruenire; quae tamen bonus et ignauus aeque sibi exoptant; sed ille, id est bonus, uera uia nititur. Via uirtus est, qua nititur tamquam ad possessionis finem, id est ad gloriam honorem imperium. Hoc insitum habuisse Romanos etiam deorum aput illos aedes indicant, quas coniunctissimas constituerunt, Virtutis et Honoris, pro dis habentes quae dantur a Deo. Unde intellegi potest quem finem uolebant esse uirtutis et quo eam referebant qui boni erant, ad honorem scilicet; nam mali nec habebant eam, quamuis honorem habere cuperent, quem malis artibus conabantur adipisci, id est dolis adque fallaciis.

ENGLISH

wanted to mention them to show that, after liberty, the Romans prized domination so highly that it was counted among their great glories. Hence also that passage of the same poet in which he sets above the arts of other nations those arts proper to the Romans: ruling, commanding, subjugating and subduing peoples. He says: "Others will hammer out breathing bronze more softly, I grant it, and draw living faces from marble. They will plead cases better, trace the movements of the heavens with the rod and tell of the rising stars. You, Roman, remember to rule the peoples with your command (these will be your arts), to impose the ways of peace, to spare the subjected and to subdue the proud in war."[17]

They practiced these arts the more skillfully, the less they gave themselves over to pleasures. They did not yet enfeeble mind and body by craving and piling up riches, corrupt their morals through those riches, rob wretched citizens or lavish gifts on shameless stage performers. By the time Sallust was writing and Virgil was singing these things, men of that kind already surpassed others in moral decay and abounded in it. They sought honors and glory not by those arts but by tricks and deceits. Hence the same author says: "But at first it was ambition rather than avarice that drove men's minds, a vice that was nevertheless closer to virtue. For the good man and the worthless man alike desire glory, honor and command for themselves; but the former," he says, "strives by the true way, while the latter, because he lacks good arts, contends by tricks and deceits."[18]

These are the good arts: to arrive at honor, glory and command through virtue, that is, not through deceitful ambition. Yet these are things that the good man and the worthless man alike desire for themselves; but the former, that is, the good man, strives by the true way. The way is virtue, by which he strives as toward the goal he means to possess, namely glory, honor and command. That the Romans had this ingrained in them is shown also by the temples of their gods, those of Virtue and Honor, which they built closely joined together, treating as gods things that are given by God. From this we can understand what end they 17 Aeneid 6.847–853.

18 Sallust, Catiline 11.1–2.

LATIN

ENGLISH

wanted virtue to serve and to what those who were good referred it, namely, to honor. For the wicked did not even have virtue, though they longed to have honor and tried to obtain it by bad arts, that is, by tricks and deceits.[19]

Melius laudatus est Cato. De illo quippe ait: Quo minus petebat gloriam, eo illum magis sequebatur. Quando quidem gloria est, cuius illi cupiditate flagrabant, iudicium hominum bene de hominibus opinantium; et ideo melior est uirtus, quae humano testimonio contenta non est nisi conscientiae suae. Unde dicit apostolus: Nam gloria nostra haec est: testimonium conscientiae nostrae; et alio loco: Opus autem suum probet unusquisque, et tunc in semet ipso tantum gloriam habebit et non in altero. Gloriam ergo et honorem et imperium, quae sibi exoptabant et quo bonis artibus peruenire nitebantur boni, non debet sequi uirtus, sed ipsa uirtutem. Neque enim est uera uirtus, nisi quae ad eum finem tendit, ubi est bonum hominis, quo melius non est.

Cato was given better praise. For of him Sallust says: "The less he sought glory, the more it followed him." Indeed, glory, which they burned to possess, is the judgment of people who think well of other people. And so that virtue is better which is content not with human testimony but only with that of its own conscience. Hence the apostle says: "For this is our glory: the testimony of our conscience." And in another place: "Let each one test his own work, and then he will have glory in himself alone and not in another." Virtue, then, ought not to follow glory, honor and command, which they desired for themselves and which the good strove to reach by good arts. Rather, these ought to follow virtue. For there is no true virtue except that which tends toward the end where man's good lies, than which there is nothing better.[20]

CATO'S SPEECH

Sallust's Cato says early Rome grew great through industry and justice, not arms.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Unde et honores, quos petiuit Cato, petere non debuit, sed eos ciuitas ob eius uirtutem non petenti dare. Sed cum illa memoria duo Romani essent uirtute magni, Caesar et Cato, longe uirtus Catonis ueritati uidetur propinquior fuisse quam Caesaris. Proinde qualis esset illo tempore ciuitas et antea qualis fuisset, uideamus in ipsa sententia Catonis: Nolite, inquit, existimare maiores nostros armis rem publicam ex parua magnam fecisse. Si ita esset, multo pulcherrimam eam nos haberemus. Quippe sociorum adque ciuium, praeterea armorum et equorum maior copia nobis quam illis est. Sed alia fuere quae illos magnos fecerunt, quae nobis nulla sunt: domi industria, foris iustum imperium, animus in consulendo liber, neque delicto neque libidini obnoxius.

So the honors Cato sought, he ought not to have sought. Rather, the city should have given them to him for his virtue without his asking. But since, within that memory, there were two Romans great in virtue, Caesar and Cato, the virtue of Cato seems to have been far closer to the truth than Caesar's. So let us see what the city was like at that time, and what it had been before, from Cato's own speech: "Do not think," he says, "that our ancestors made the commonwealth great from small by arms. If that were so, we would have it far more splendid. For we have a greater supply of allies and citizens, and of arms and horses besides, than they did. But there were other things that made them great, and we have none of them: industry at home, just rule abroad, and a mind free in deliberation, enslaved neither to wrongdoing nor to passion."[21]

19 The joint temple of Honor and Virtue stood near the Capene Gate in Rome.
20 Sallust, Catiline 54.6; 2 Corinthians 1:12; Galatians 6:4.

LATIN

Pro his nos habemus luxuriam adque auaritiam, publice egestatem, priuatim opulentiam; laudamus diuitias, sequimur inertiam; inter bonos et malos discrimen nullum; omnia uirtutis praemia ambitio possidet. Neque mirum: ubi uos separatim sibi quisque consilium capitis, ubi domi uoluptatibus, hic pecuniae aut gratiae seruitis, eo fit ut impetus fiat in uacuam rem publicam.

Qui audit haec Catonis uerba siue Sallustii, putat, quales laudantur Romani ueteres, omnes eos tales tunc fuisse uel plures. Non ita est; alioquin uera non essent, quae ipse item scribit, ea quae commemoraui in secundo libro huius operis, ubi dicit, iniurias ualidiorum et ob eas discessionem plebis a patribus aliasque dissensiones domi fuisse iam inde a principio, neque amplius aequo et modesto iure actum quam expulsis regibus quamdiu metus a Tarquinio fuit, donec bellum graue, quod propter ipsum cum Etruria susceptum fuerat, finiretur; postea uero seruili imperio patres exercuisse plebem, regio more uerberasse, agro pepulisse et ceteris expertibus solos egisse in imperio; quarum discordiarum, dum illi dominari uellent, illi seruire nollent, finem fuisse bello Punico secundo, quia rursus grauis metus coepit urguere adque ab illis perturbationibus alia maiore cura cohibere animos inquietos et ad concordiam reuocare ciuilem.

Sed per quosdam paucos, qui pro suo modo boni erant, magna administrabantur adque illis toleratis ac temperatis malis paucorum bonorum prouidentia res illa crescebat; sicut idem historicus dicit multa sibi legenti et audienti, quae populus Romanus domi militiaeque, mari adque terra praeclara facinora fecerit, libuisse adtendere quae res maxime tanta negotia sustinuisset; quoniam sciebat saepenumero parua manu cum magnis legionibus hostium contendisse Romanos, cognouerat paruis copiis bella gesta cum opulentis regibus; sibique multa agitanti constare dixit, paucorum ciuium egregiam uirtutem cuncta patrauisse, eoque factum ut diuitias paupertas, multitudinem paucitas superaret. Sed postquam luxu

ENGLISH

"In their place we have luxury and greed, public poverty and private wealth. We praise riches and pursue idleness. Between good and bad there is no distinction; ambition possesses all the rewards of virtue. And no wonder: when each of you makes his plans separately for himself, when at home you are slaves to pleasures and here to money or influence, the result is that an attack is made on a commonwealth left defenseless."

Anyone who hears these words of Cato, or of Sallust, supposes that all the Romans of old, or most of them, were the kind of men they are praised as being. It is not so. Otherwise what Sallust himself also writes would not be true, the passage I mentioned in the second book of this work. There he says that the injuries done by the stronger, the resulting secession of the plebs from the patricians and other dissensions at home existed right from the beginning. He also says that affairs were conducted with fair and moderate justice after the kings were expelled only as long as fear of Tarquin lasted, until the grievous war undertaken with Etruria on his account was finished. Afterward, he says, the patricians treated the plebs like slaves, flogged them in the manner of kings, drove them from their land, and held power alone, excluding everyone else. One side wanted to dominate and the other refused to be enslaved, and these discords came to an end only with the Second Punic War. For then a heavy fear once again began to press on them. With another, greater concern, it held their restless minds back from those disturbances and called them back to civic concord.[22]

Yet great things were accomplished through a few men who were good after their own fashion. Once those evils were tolerated and tempered, the state grew through the foresight of a few good men. The same historian says as much. As he read and heard of the many glorious deeds the Roman people had done at home and in war, by sea and by land, he was moved to consider what above all had sustained such great undertakings. For he knew that the Romans had often fought with a small band against great legions of enemies, and he had learned that they had waged wars with slender forces against wealthy kings. After much 21 Cato's speech in Sallust, Catiline 52.19–23.

22 From Sallust's Histories, quoted in 2.18. The Second Punic War (218–201 BC) was Rome's war against Hannibal of Carthage.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	adque desidia, inquit, ciuitas corrupta est, rursus res publica magnitudine sui imperatorum adque magistratuum uitia sustentabat.	reflection, he says, it became clear to him that the outstanding virtue of a few citizens had accomplished everything. This was how poverty overcame riches and the few overcame the many. "But after the city was corrupted by luxury and sloth," he says, "the commonwealth in its turn, by its own greatness, sustained the vices of its generals and magistrates."[23]
	Paucorum igitur uirtus ad gloriam honorem imperium uera uia, id est ipsa uirtute, nitentium etiam a Catone laudata est. Hinc erat domi industria, quam commemorauit Cato, ut aerarium esset opulentum, tenues res priuatae. Unde corruptis moribus uitium e contrario posuit, publice egestatem, priuatim opulentiam.	So it was the virtue of the few, who strove for glory, honor and command by the true way, that is, by virtue itself, that Cato too praised. This was the source of the industry at home that Cato mentioned, so that the treasury was rich while private means were slender. Hence, when morals were corrupted, he set down the opposite vice: public poverty, private wealth.

THE LOVE OF PRAISE, WHICH, THOUGH A VICE, IS THOUGHT A VIRTUE BECAUSE GREATER VICES ARE HELD IN CHECK BY IT

Love of praise is a vice, but it restrained worse vices in the Romans.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.13	Quam ob rem quam diu fuissent regna Orientis inlustria, uoluit Deus et Occidentale fieri, quod tempore esset posterius, sed imperii latitudine et magnitudine inlustrius, idque talibus potissimum concessit hominibus ad domanda grauia mala multarum gentium, qui causa honoris laudis et gloriae consuluerunt patriae, in qua ipsam gloriam requirebant, salutemque eius saluti suae praeponere non dubitauerunt, pro isto uno uitio, id est amore laudis, pecuniae cupiditatem et multa alia uitia conprimentes. Nam sanius uidet, qui et amorem laudis uitium esse cognoscit, quod nec poetam fugit Horatium, qui ait: Laudis amore tumes: sunt certa piacula, quae te / Ter pure lecto poterunt recreare libello.	So, after the kingdoms of the East had been illustrious for a long time, God willed that a Western empire should also arise. It came later in time, but it was more illustrious in the breadth and greatness of its rule. He granted this above all to men of a particular kind, so that they might subdue the grievous evils of many nations. These were men who, for the sake of honor, praise and glory, devoted themselves to their country, in which they sought that very glory, and who did not hesitate to put its safety before their own. For the sake of this one vice, the love of praise, they held down the craving for money and many other vices. For he sees more soundly who recognizes that even the love of praise is a vice. This did not escape the poet Horace either, who says: "Are you swelling with love of praise? There are sure rites of atonement that can restore you, once you have read the little book three times with a pure heart."[24]
	Idemque in carmine lyrico ad reprimendam dominandi libidinem ita cecinit: Latius regnes auidum domando Spiritum, quam si Libyam remotis Gadibus iungas et uterque Poenus Seruiat uni. Uerum tamen qui libidines turpiores fide	And in a lyric poem, to curb the lust for domination, the same poet sang: "You would rule a wider realm by taming a greedy spirit than if you joined Libya to distant Gades, and the Carthaginians of both shores served you alone." Yet some people do

23 Sallust, Catiline 53.2–5.
24 Horace, Epistles 1.1.36–37.

LATIN	ENGLISH
pietatis inpetrato Spiritu sancto et amore intellegibilis pulchritudinis non refrenant, melius saltem cupiditate humanae laudis et gloriae non quidem iam sancti, sed minus turpes sunt. Etiam Tullius hinc dissimulare non potuit in eisdem libris quos de re publica scripsit, ubi loquitur de instituendo principe ciuitatis, quem dicit alendum esse gloria, et consequenter commemorat maiores suos multa mira adque praeclara gloriae cupiditate fecisse. Huic igitur uitio non solum non resistebant, uerum etiam id excitandum et accendendum esse censebant, putantes hoc utile esse rei publicae.	not restrain their baser lusts by the faith of godliness, having received the Holy Spirit, and by love of intelligible beauty. For them it is at least better to be restrained by the craving for human praise and glory. They are not holy as a result, but they are less base. Even Cicero could not conceal this in those same books he wrote On the Commonwealth. There he speaks of educating the leading man of the state, who, he says, must be nourished on glory, and he goes on to recall that his ancestors did many wonderful and splendid things out of a craving for glory. So far from resisting this vice, then, they actually thought it should be roused and kindled, believing it useful to the commonwealth.[25]
Quamquam nec in ipsis philosophiae libris Tullius ab hac peste dissimulet, ubi eam luce clarius confitetur. Cum enim de studiis talibus loqueretur, quae utique sectanda sunt fine ueri boni, non uentositate laudis humanae, hanc intulit uniuersalem generalemque sententiam: Honos alit artes, omnesque accenduntur ad studia gloria iacentque ea semper, quae aput quosque inprobantur.	Indeed, even in his philosophical books Cicero does not disguise this plague; there he admits it, clearer than daylight. When he was speaking of studies that should certainly be pursued for the sake of the end of true good, not out of the vanity of human praise, he brought in this universal, general maxim: "Honor nourishes the arts; all are fired to study by glory; and those pursuits always lie neglected which are frowned upon by people."[26]

CUTTING BACK THE LOVE OF HUMAN PRAISE, SINCE ALL THE GLORY OF THE JUST IS IN GOD

Christians must resist the love of human praise, as the apostles and martyrs did.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.14 Huic igitur cupiditati melius resistitur sine dubitatione quam ceditur. Tanto enim quisque est Deo similior, quanto et ab hac inmunditia mundior. Quae in hac uita etsi non funditus eradicatur ex corde, quia etiam bene proficientes animos tentare non cessat, saltem cupiditas gloriae superetur dilectione iustitiae: ut, si alicubi iacent quae aput quosque inprobantur, si bona, si recta sunt, etiam ipse amor humanae laudis erubescat et cedat amori ueritatis. Tam enim est hoc uitium inimicum piae fidei, si maior in corde sit cupiditas gloriae quam Dei timor uel amor, ut Dominus diceret: Quo modo potestis credere gloriam ab inuicem expectantes et gloriam quae a solo Deo est non quaerentes?	Beyond doubt, then, it is better to resist this craving than to give in to it. For the cleaner anyone is of this uncleanness, the more like God he is. In this life it is not torn out of the heart by the roots, since it does not cease to tempt even souls that are making good progress. But at least let the craving for glory be overcome by love of justice. Then, if somewhere "those pursuits lie neglected which are frowned upon by people," and if they are good and right, the very love of human praise will blush and give way to the love of truth. For this vice is so hostile to devout faith, when the craving for glory is greater in the heart than the fear or love of God, that the Lord said: "How can you believe, when you expect glory from one another and do not seek the glory that comes from God alone?"[27]

25 Horace, Odes 2.2.9–12; Gades is modern Cádiz in Spain.
26 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.2.4.

LATIN

Item de quibusdam, qui in eum crediderant et uerebantur palam confiteri, ait euangelista: Dilexerunt gloriam hominum magis quam Dei. Quod sancti apostoli non fecerunt; qui cum in his locis praedicarent Christi nomen, ubi non solum inprobabatur (sicut ille ait: iacentque ea semper, quae aput quosque inprobantur), uerum etiam summae detestationis habebatur, tenentes quod audierant a bono magistro eodemque medico mentium: Si quis me negauerit coram hominibus, negabo eum coram patre meo, qui in caelis est, uel coram angelis Dei, inter maledicta et obprobria, inter grauissimas persecutiones crudelesque poenas non sunt deterriti a praedicatione salutis humanae tanto fremitu offensionis humanae.

Et quod eos diuina facientes adque dicentes diuineque uiuentes debellatis quodam modo cordibus duris adque introducta pace iustitiae ingens in ecclesia Christi gloria consecuta est: non in ea tamquam in suae uirtutis fine quieuerunt, sed eam quoque ipsam ad Dei gloriam referentes, cuius gratia tales erant, isto quoque fomite eos, quibus consulebant, ad amorem illius, a quo et ipsi tales fierent, accendebant. Namque ne propter humanam gloriam boni essent, docuerat eos magister illorum dicens: Cauete facere iustitiam uestram coram hominibus, ut uideamini ab eis; alioquin mercedem non habebitis aput patrem uestrum, qui in caelis est.

Sed rursus ne hoc peruerse intellegentes hominibus placere metuerent minusque prodessent latendo, quod boni sunt, demonstrans quo fine innotescere deberent: Luceant, inquit, opera uestra coram hominibus, ut uideant bona facta uestra et glorificent patrem uestrum, qui in caelis est. Non ergo ut uideamini ab eis, id est hac intentione, ut eos ad uos conuerti uelitis, quia non per uos aliquid estis; sed ut glorificent patrem uestrum, qui in caelis est, ad quem conuersi fiant quod estis. Hos secuti sunt martyres, qui Scaeuolas et Curtios et Decios non sibi inferendo poenas, sed inlatas ferendo et uirtute uera, quoniam uera pietate, et innumerabili multitudine superarunt.

ENGLISH

Likewise, of certain people who had believed in him but were afraid to confess it openly, the evangelist says: "They loved human glory more than the glory of God." This the holy apostles did not do. They preached the name of Christ in places where it was not only frowned upon (as that writer says, "those pursuits always lie neglected which are frowned upon by people") but actually regarded with the utmost loathing. They held fast to what they had heard from their good master, who was also the physician of minds: "Whoever denies me before people, I will deny him before my Father who is in heaven," or "before the angels of God." And so, amid curses and reproaches, amid the most severe persecutions and cruel punishments, they were not deterred from preaching human salvation, though human offense raged against it so loudly.[28]

As they did and spoke divine things and lived divine lives, hard hearts were in a way conquered and the peace of justice was brought in, and great glory followed them in the Church of Christ. Yet they did not rest in that glory as though it were the goal of their virtue. Instead, they referred this glory too to the glory of God, by whose grace they were what they were; and with this kindling as well they fired those they cared for with love of him by whom they too might become such. For their master had taught them not to be good for the sake of human glory, saying: "Beware of practicing your righteousness before people in order to be seen by them; otherwise you will have no reward from your Father who is in heaven."[29]

But again, so that they would not misunderstand this, become afraid of pleasing people, and do less good by hiding the fact that they were good, he showed them for what purpose they should make themselves known: "Let your works shine before people," he said, "so that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven." Not, then, "in order to be seen by them"—that is, with the intention of wanting them to turn to you, since you are nothing of yourselves—but "so that they may glorify your Father who is in heaven," so that, turning to him, they may become what you

27 John 5:44.
28 John 12:43; Matthew 10:33 and Luke 12:9.
29 Matthew 6:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	are. The martyrs followed the apostles, and they surpassed the Scaevolas, the Curtiuses and the Deciuses—not by inflicting suffering on themselves but by bearing the suffering inflicted on them—both by true virtue, because by true godliness, and by their countless numbers.[30]
Sed cum illi essent in ciuitate terrena, quibus propositus erat omnium pro illa officiorum finis incolumitas eius et regnum non in caelo, sed in terra; non in uita aeterna, sed in decessione morientium et successione morturorum: quid aliud amarent quam gloriam, qua uolebant etiam post mortem tamquam uiuere in ore laudantium?	But those Romans belonged to the earthly city. The end set before them in all their duties toward it was its safety, and a kingdom not in heaven but on earth—not in eternal life, but in the passing away of the dying and the succession of those who would die in their turn. What else were they to love, then, but glory, by which they wished to live on, as it were, even after death, on the lips of those who praised them?

THE TEMPORAL REWARD GOD GAVE TO THE GOOD MORALS OF THE ROMANS

Earthly glory was the Romans' reward for their virtues, since they would not have eternal life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.15 Quibus ergo non erat daturus Deus uitam aeternam cum sanctis angelis suis in sua ciuitate caelesti, ad cuius societatem pietas uera perducit, quae non exhibet seruitutem religionis, quam λατρείαν Graeci uocant, nisi uni uero Deo, si neque hanc eis terrenam gloriam excellentissimi imperii concederet: non redderetur merces bonis artibus eorum, id est uirtutibus, quibus ad tantam gloriam peruenire nitebantur. De talibus enim, qui propter hoc boni aliquid facere uidentur, ut glorificentur ab hominibus, etiam Dominus ait: Amen dico uobis, perceperunt mercedem suam.	God was not going to give these men eternal life with his holy angels in his heavenly city. True godliness leads to the fellowship of that city, and it offers the service of religion, which the Greeks call λατρεία [latreia: service due to God alone], to none but the one true God. If, then, he had not granted them even this earthly glory of a most excellent empire, no reward would have been paid to their good arts—that is, to the virtues by which they strove to attain such glory. For of such people, who seem to do something good in order to be glorified by others, the Lord too says: "Truly I tell you, they have received their reward."[31]
Sic et isti priuatas res suas pro re communi, hoc est re publica, et pro eius aerario contemserunt, auaritiae restiterunt, consuluerunt patriae consilio libero, neque delicto secundum suas leges neque libidini obnoxii; his omnibus artibus tamquam uera uia nisi sunt ad honores imperium gloriam; honorati sunt in omnibus fere gentibus, imperii sui leges inposuerunt multis gentibus, hodieque litteris et historia gloriosi sunt paene in omnibus gentibus: non est quod de summi et ueri Dei iustititia conquerantur; perceperunt mercedem suam.	So these men too disregarded their private wealth for the sake of the common wealth—that is, the commonwealth—and its treasury. They resisted greed. They took counsel for their country with free deliberation, enslaved neither to wrongdoing, by their own laws, nor to passion. By all these arts, as by the true way, they strove for honors, power and glory. They were honored among almost all nations; they imposed the laws of their rule on many nations; and to this day they are celebrated in literature and history among nearly all nations. They have no grounds to complain of the justice of 30 Matthew 5:16. Mucius Scaevola, Curtius and the Decii were Roman heroes who maimed or sacrificed themselves for Rome; their stories are told in chapter 18.

31 Matthew 6:2.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		the supreme and true God: "they have received their reward."[32]

THE REWARD OF THE HOLY CITIZENS OF THE ETERNAL CITY, TO WHOM THE ROMANS' EXAMPLES OF VIRTUE ARE USEFUL

The saints' reward is the eternal city, and Rome's example teaches them how to love it.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.16	Merces autem sanctorum longe alia est etiam hic obprobria sustinentium pro ueritate Dei, quae mundi huius dilectoribus odiosa est. Illa ciuitas sempiterna est; ibi nullus oritur, quia nullus moritur; ibi est uera et plena felicitas, non dea, sed donum Dei; inde fidei pignus accepimus, quamdiu peregrinantes eius pulchritudini suspiramus; ibi non oritur sol super bonos et malos, sed sol iustitiae solos protegit bonos; ibi non erit magna industria ditare publicum aerarium priuatis rebus angustis, ubi thensaurus communis est ueritatis.	But the reward of the saints is far different—of those who even here endure reproaches for the sake of God's truth, which is hateful to those who love this world. That city is everlasting. There no one is born, because no one dies. There is true and full happiness—not a goddess, but a gift of God. From there we have received the pledge of faith, for as long as, wandering as pilgrims, we sigh for its beauty. There the sun does not rise on the good and the evil alike; the sun of justice shelters the good alone. There it will take no great effort to enrich the public treasury while private means are slender, for there the treasury of truth is held in common.[33]
	Proinde non solum ut talis merces talibus hominibus redderetur Romanum imperium ad humanam gloriam dilatatum est; uerum etiam ut ciues aeternae illius ciuitatis, quamdiu hic peregrinantur, diligenter et sobrie illa intueantur exempla et uideant quanta dilectio debeatur supernae patriae propter uitam aeternam, si tantum a suis ciuibus terrena dilecta est propter hominum gloriam..	Accordingly, the Roman Empire was expanded to human glory not only so that such men might receive such a reward, but also so that the citizens of that eternal city, as long as they are pilgrims here, might look carefully and soberly at those examples. Then they will see how much love is owed to the heavenly homeland for the sake of eternal life, if the earthly homeland was so loved by its citizens for the sake of human glory.

WHAT THE ROMANS GAINED BY THEIR WARS, AND HOW MUCH THEY GAVE THOSE THEY CONQUERED

Under whose rule a mortal lives matters little; conquest brought the Romans only empty glory.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.17	Quantum enim pertinet ad hanc uitam mortalium, quae paucis diebus ducitur et finitur, quid interest sub cuius imperio uiuat homo moriturus, si illi qui imperant ad inpia et iniqua non cogant? Aut uero aliquid nocuerunt Romani gentibus, quibus subiugatis inposuerunt leges suas, nisi quia id factum est ingenti strage bellorum? Quod si concorditer fieret, id ipsum fieret meliore successu; sed nulla esset gloria triumphantium. Neque enim et Romani non uiuebant sub legibus suis, quas	For as far as this mortal life is concerned, which is lived out and ended in a few days, what does it matter under whose rule a man who is going to die lives, provided those who rule do not force him into impious and unjust acts? Or did the Romans do any harm to the nations they subjugated and on whom they imposed their laws—except that it was done with enormous slaughter in war? Had it been done by agreement, the same result would

32 Augustine echoes Sallust: Cato's speech in The War with Catiline 52.21 and the "true way" of 11.2.
33 Felicity (Felicitas) was worshiped at Rome as a goddess (see Book 4). The sun rising "on the good and the evil" echoes Matthew 5:45; "the sun of justice" recalls Malachi 4:2.

LATIN

ceteris inponebant. Hoc si fieret sine Marte et Bellona, ut nec Victoria locum haberet, nemine uincente ubi nemo pugnauerat: nonne Romanis et ceteris gentibus una esset eademque condicio?

praesertim si mox fieret, quod postea gratissime adque humanissime factum est, ut omnes ad Romanum imperium pertinentes societatem acciperent ciuitatis et Romani ciues essent, ac sic esset omnium, quod erat ante paucorum; tantum quod plebs illa, quae suos agros non haberet, de publico uiueret; qui pastus eius per bonos administratores rei publicae gratius a concordibus praestaretur quam uictis extorqueretur.

Nam quid intersit ad incolumitatem bonosque mores, ipsas certe hominum dignitates, quod alii uicerunt, alii uicti sunt, omnino non uideo, praeter illum gloriae humanae inanissimum fastum, in quo perceperunt mercedem suam, qui eius ingenti cupidine arserunt et ardentia bella gesserunt. Numquid enim illorum agri tributa non soluunt? Numquid eis licet discere, quod aliis non licet? Numquid non multi senatores sunt in aliis terris, qui Romam ne facie quidem norunt? Tolle iactantiam, et omnes homines quid sunt nisi homines? Quod si peruersitas saeculi admitteret, ut honoratiores essent quique meliores: nec sic pro magno haberi debuit honor humanus, quia nullius est ponderis fumus.

Sed utamur etiam in his rebus beneficio Domini Dei nostri; consideremus quanta contemserint, quae pertulerint, quas cupiditates subegerint pro humana gloria, qui eam tamquam mercedem talium uirtutum accipere meruerunt, et ualeat nobis etiam hoc ad obprimendam superbiam, ut, cum illa ciuitas, in qua nobis regnare promissum est, tantum ab hac distet, quantum distat caelum a terra, a temporali laetitia uita aeterna, ab inanibus laudibus solida gloria, a societate have been achieved with better success—but there would have been no glory for those who celebrated triumphs. For the Romans too lived under the laws they imposed on others. If this had been done without Mars and Bellona, so that Victory too had no place, since no one conquers where no one has fought, would not the Romans and the other nations have been in one and the same condition?[34]

ENGLISH

All the more so if what was later done, most graciously and humanely, had been done at once: that all who belonged to the Roman Empire received the fellowship of citizenship and became Roman citizens, so that what had once belonged to a few belonged to all. The only difference would have been that the common people who had no land of their own would live at public expense; and this provision for them would have been supplied more pleasantly by good administrators of the commonwealth from people living in harmony than if it were extorted from the conquered.[35]

For I do not see at all what difference it makes to safety and good morals—or, certainly, to people's actual standing—that some conquered and others were conquered. The only difference is that utterly empty pride of human glory, in which those who burned with an enormous craving for it and waged burning wars "have received their reward." Do their lands not pay taxes? Are they allowed to learn what others are not? Are there not many senators in other lands who do not even know Rome by sight? Take away boasting, and what are all human beings but human beings? Even if the perversity of this age allowed the better people always to be the more honored, not even then should human honor have been held to be anything great, for smoke has no weight.

But let us make use of the kindness of the Lord our God even in these things. Let us consider how much they despised, what they endured, what desires they subdued for the sake of human glory—these men who earned that glory as the reward of such virtues. And let this too serve us to crush our pride. That city in which we are promised to reign is as far from this one as heaven is from earth, eternal life from temporal joy, solid glory from 34 Bellona was the Roman goddess of war; Victory too was worshiped as a goddess.

35 Roman citizenship was extended to nearly all free inhabitants of the empire by the emperor Caracalla in AD 212.

LATIN	ENGLISH
mortalium societas angelorum, a lumine solis et lunae lumen eius qui solem fecit et lunam, nihil sibi magnum fecisse uideantur tantae patriae ciues, si pro illa adipiscenda fecerint boni operis aliquid uel mala, aliqua sustinuerint, cum illi pro hac terrena iam adepta tanta fecerint, tanta perpessi sint, praesertim quia remissio peccatorum, quae ciues ad aeternam colligit patriam, habet aliquid, cui per umbram quandam simile fuit asylum illud Romuleum, quo multitudinem, qua illa ciuitas conderetur, quorumlibet delictorum congregauit inpunitas.	empty praise, the fellowship of angels from the fellowship of mortals, the light of him who made the sun and moon from the light of the sun and moon. So the citizens of so great a homeland should not think they have done anything great if, to obtain it, they have done some good work or endured some evils, when those men did so much and suffered so much for this earthly homeland, which they already possessed. This is all the more true because the forgiveness of sins, which gathers citizens into the eternal homeland, has something to which that asylum of Romulus bore a kind of shadowy likeness: there impunity for crimes of every kind gathered the multitude by which that city was to be founded.[36]

HOW FAR FROM BOASTING CHRISTIANS SHOULD BE IF THEY DO SOMETHING FOR LOVE OF THE ETERNAL COUNTRY, WHEN THE ROMANS DID SO MUCH FOR HUMAN GLORY AND AN EARTHLY CITY

Roman heroes sacrificed everything for earthly glory, so Christians have no cause to boast of their sacrifices.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.18 Quid ergo magnum est pro illa aeterna caelestique patria cuncta saeculi huius quamlibet iucunda blandimenta contemnere, si pro hac temporali adque terrena filios Brutus potuit et occidere, quod illa facere neminem cogit? Sed certe difficilius est filios interimere, quam quod pro ista faciendum est, ea, quae filiis congreganda uidebantur adque seruanda, uel donare pauperibus uel, si existat tentatio, quae id pro fide adque iustitia fieri conpellat, amittere. Felices enim uel nos uel filios nostros non diuitiae terrenae faciunt aut nobis uiuentibus amittendae aut nobis mortuis a quibus nescimus uel forte a quibus nolumus possidendae; sed Deus felices facit, qui est mentium uera opulentia. Bruto autem, quia filios occidit, infelicitatis perhibet testimonium etiam poeta laudator.	What great thing is it, then, to despise all the allurements of this world, however pleasant, for the sake of that eternal and heavenly homeland, if for the sake of this temporal and earthly one Brutus could even kill his sons—something the heavenly homeland compels no one to do? But surely it is harder to put one's sons to death than to do what must be done for the heavenly homeland: either to give to the poor the things that seemed to need gathering and saving for one's sons, or to lose them, if a trial arises that forces this for the sake of faith and justice. For it is not earthly riches that make us or our sons happy—riches that we must either lose while we live or that, when we are dead, will be possessed by we know not whom, or perhaps by people we would not want. It is God who makes us happy, for he is the true wealth of minds. As for Brutus, because he killed his sons, even the poet who praises him bears witness to his unhappiness.[37]
Ait enim: Natosqne pater nona bella monentes Ad poenam pulchra pro libertate uocabit Infelix, utcumque ferent ea facta minores. Sed uersu sequenti consolatus est infelicem: Uincit amor patriae	For he says: "The father, for the sake of fair liberty, will summon to punishment his sons who stir up new wars—unhappy man, however later generations judge those deeds." But in the next line he 36 Romulus was said to have opened a sanctuary on the Capitoline Hill where fugitives of every sort could find refuge and become citizens of his new city (Livy 1.8).

37 Lucius Junius Brutus, who expelled the kings and became one of the first consuls (509 BC), had his sons executed for plotting to restore the Tarquins.

LATIN	ENGLISH
laudumque inmensa cupido. Haec sunt duo illa, libertas et cupiditas laudis humanae, quae ad facta conpulit miranda Romanos. Si ergo pro libertate moriturorum et cupiditate laudum, quae a mortalibus expetuntur, occidi filii a patre potuerunt: quid magnum est, si pro uera libertate, quae nos, ab iniquitatis et mortis et diaboli dominatu liberos facit, nec cupiditate humanarum laudum, sed caritate liberandorum hominum, non a Tarquinio rege, sed a daemonibus et daemonum principe, non filii occiduntur, sed Christi pauperes inter filios conputantur?	consoled the unhappy man: "Love of country prevails, and the boundless craving for praise." These are the two things—liberty and the craving for human praise—that drove the Romans to wondrous deeds. If, then, for the liberty of people who were going to die, and out of a craving for praise sought from mortals, a father could kill his sons, what great thing is it if we act for the true liberty that makes us free from the domination of iniquity, death and the devil? We act not out of a craving for human praise but out of love for setting people free—not from King Tarquin, but from demons and the prince of demons. And sons are not killed; rather, Christ's poor are counted among one's sons.[38]
Si alius etiam Romanus princeps, cognomine Torquatus, filium, non quia contra patriam, sed etiam pro patria, tamen quia contra imperium suum, id est contra quod imperauerat pater imperator, ab hoste prouocatus iuuenali ardore pugnauerat, licet uicisset, occidit, ne plus mali esset in exemplo imperii contemti quam boni in gloria hostis occisi: ut quid, se iactent, qui pro inmortalis patriae legibus omnia, quae multo minus quam filii diliguntur, bona terrena contemnunt?	Another Roman leader, surnamed Torquatus, killed his son—not because the son had fought against his country; indeed, he had fought for it. But, challenged by an enemy, he had fought with youthful ardor against his father's command, that is, against what his father, the commander, had commanded. Though he had won, his father killed him, lest there be more harm in the example of a command disregarded than good in the glory of an enemy slain. If so, why should those boast who, for the laws of an immortal homeland, despise all earthly goods, which are loved far less than sons?[39]
Si Furius Camillus etiam ingratam patriam, a cuius ceruicibus acerrimorum hostium Veientium iugum depulerat damnatusque ab aemulis fuerat, a Gallis iterum liberauit, quia non habebat potiorem, ubi posset uiuere gloriosius: quur extollatur, uelut grande aliquid fecerit, qui forte in ecclesia ab inimicis carnalibus grauissimam exhonorationis passus iniuriam non se ad eius hostes haereticos transtulit aut aliquam contra illam ipse haeresem condidit, sed eam potius quantum ualuit ab haereticorum perniciosissima prauitate defendit, cum alia non sit, non ubi uiuatur in hominum gloria, sed ubi uita ad aeterna aeterna?	Furius Camillus had thrown off from his country's neck the yoke of its fiercest enemies, the people of Veii, and had then been condemned by his rivals; yet he freed that ungrateful country a second time, from the Gauls, because he had no better one where he could live more gloriously. If so, why should anyone be extolled as if he had done something great who, having perhaps suffered in the Church the grievous injury of disgrace at the hands of carnal enemies, did not go over to her enemies the heretics or found some heresy against her himself, but rather defended her as best he could from the ruinous perversity of the heretics? For there is no other Church—not one in which to live in human glory, but one in which to gain eternal life.[40]
Si Mucius, ut cum Porsenna rege pax fieret, qui grauissimo bello Romanos premebat, quia Porsennam	King Porsenna was pressing the Romans hard in a very grievous war. Mucius, in order to bring about

38 Virgil, Aeneid 6.820–823.
39 Titus Manlius Torquatus, consul in 340 BC, executed his son for engaging in single combat against orders (Livy 8.7).

LATIN	ENGLISH
ipsum occidere non potuit et pro eo alterum deceptus occidit, in ardentem aram ante eius oculos dexteram extendit, dicens multos tales, qualem illum uideret, in eius exitium coniurasse cuius ille fortitudinem et coniurationem talium perhorrescens sine ulla dubitatione se ab illo bello facta pace conpescuit: quis regno caelorum inputaturus est merita sua, si pro illo non unam manum neque hoc sibi ultro faciens, sed persequente aliquo patiens totum flammis corpus inpenderit?	peace with him, had tried to kill Porsenna himself but failed, and by mistake killed another man in his place. He then stretched out his right hand into a burning altar before the king's eyes, telling him that many men like the one he saw had sworn together to destroy him. Porsenna, shuddering at his courage and at a conspiracy of such men, without any hesitation made peace and withdrew from that war. If so, who will present his merits as a claim on the kingdom of heaven if, for its sake, he gives up not one hand, and does not do it to himself of his own accord, but, under persecution, suffers his whole body to be given over to the flames?[41]
Si Curtius armatus equo concito in abruptum hiatum terrae se praecipitem dedit, deorum suorum oraculis seruiens, quoniam iusserant, ut illuc id quod Romani haberent optimum mitteretur, nec aliud intellegere potuerunt, quam uiris armisque se excellere, unde uidelicet oportebat, ut deorum iussis in illum interitum uir praecipitaretur armatus: quid se magnum pro aeterna patria fecisse dicturus est, qui aliquem fidei suae passus inimicum non se ultro in talem mortem mittens, sed ab illo missus obierit; quando quidem a Domino suo eodemque rege patriae suae certius oraculum accepit: Nolite timere eos, qui corpus occidunt, animam autem non possunt occidere?	Curtius, in full armor, spurred his horse and flung himself headlong into a sheer chasm in the earth, obeying the oracles of his gods. They had ordered that the best thing the Romans had should be thrown in there, and the Romans could understand this only to mean that they excelled in men and arms. Hence, evidently, an armed man had to be hurled into that death at the gods' command. If so, what great thing will anyone say he has done for the eternal homeland who has suffered some enemy of his faith and died—not by throwing himself into such a death of his own accord, but by being sent to it by that enemy? After all, he has received from his Lord, who is also the king of his homeland, a surer oracle: "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul."[42]
Si se occidendos certis uerbis quodam modo consecrantes Decii deuouerunt, ut illis cadentibus et iram deorum sanguine suo placantibus Romanus liberaretur exercitus: nullo modo superbient sancti martyres, tamquam dignum aliquid pro illius patriae participatione fecerint, ubi aeterna est et uera felicitas, si usque ad sui sanguinis effusionem non solum suos fratres, pro quibus fundebatur, uerum et ipsos inimicos, a quibus fundebatur, sicut eis praeceptum est, diligentes caritatis fide et fidei caritate certarunt?	The Decii devoted themselves to death, consecrating themselves, as it were, with set words, so that by their falling and appeasing the wrath of the gods with their blood the Roman army might be saved. If so, the holy martyrs will by no means grow proud, as though they had done something worthy of a share in that homeland where happiness is eternal and true. For they contended even to the shedding of their own blood, loving—as they were commanded—not only their brothers, for whom it was shed, but also their very enemies, by whom it was shed, with the faith of love and the love of faith.[43]
Si Marcus Puluillus dedicans aedem Iouis Iunonis Mineruae falso sibi ab inuidis morte filii nuntiata, ut illo	When Marcus Pulvillus was dedicating the temple of Jupiter, Juno and Minerva, jealous rivals falsely 40 Camillus captured Veii in 396 BC, was later exiled, and was recalled to save Rome from the Gauls around 390 BC.

41 Gaius Mucius, afterward called Scaevola ("Lefty"), c. 508 BC (Livy 2.12–13).
42 Matthew 10:28. Marcus Curtius was said to have ridden into a chasm in the Forum in 362 BC (Livy 7.6).

LATIN

nuntio perturbatus abscederet adque ita dedicationis gloriam collega eius consequeretur, ita contemsit, ut eum etiam proici insepultum iuberet (sic in eius corde orbitatis dolorem gloriae cupiditas uicerat): quid magnum se pro euangelii sancti praedicatione, qua ciues supernae patriae de diuersis liberantur et colliguntur erroribus, fecisse dicturus est, cui Dominus de sepultura patris sui sollicito ait: Sequere me et sine mortuos sepelire mortuos suos?

ENGLISH

reported to him that his son had died, so that he would be upset by the news and withdraw, and his colleague would win the glory of the dedication. But he so disregarded it that he even ordered the body to be thrown out unburied—so completely had the craving for glory overcome in his heart the grief of losing a child. If so, what great thing will anyone claim to have done for the preaching of the holy gospel, by which the citizens of the heavenly homeland are set free from their various errors and gathered together? For the Lord said to one who was anxious about his father's burial: "Follow me, and let the dead bury their dead."[44]

Si Marcus Regulus, ne crudelissimos hostes iurando falleret, ad eos ab ipsa Roma reuersus est, quoniam, sicut Romanis eum tenere uolentibus respondisse fertur, postea quam Afris seruierat, dignitatem illic honesti ciuis habere non posset, eumque Carthaginienses, quoniam contra eos in Romano senatu egerat, grauissimis suppliciis necauerunt: qui cruciatus non sunt pro fide illius patriae contemnendi, ad cuius beatitudinem fides ipsa perducit? aut quid retribuetur Domino pro omnibus quae retribuit, si pro fide quae illi debetur talia fuerit homo passus, qualia pro fide quam perniciosissimis inimicis debebat passus est Regulus?

Marcus Regulus, so as not to break the oath he had sworn to his most cruel enemies, returned to them from Rome itself. As he is said to have answered the Romans who wanted to keep him, after being a slave of the Africans he could not hold the standing of an honorable citizen there. And the Carthaginians, because he had argued against them in the Roman senate, put him to death with the most severe tortures. If so, what tortures are not to be despised for faith toward that homeland to whose happiness faith itself leads? Or what "shall be repaid to the Lord for all that he has repaid," if a man suffers for the faith he owes to him such things as Regulus suffered for the faith he owed to his deadliest enemies?[45]

ROMAN POVERTY

Valerius, Cincinnatus and Fabricius stayed poor while enriching Rome, shaming Christian boasting.

LATIN

Quo modo se audebit extollere de uoluntaria paupertate Christianus, ut in huius uitae peregrinatione expeditior ambulet uiam, quae perducit ad patriam, ubi uerae diuitiae Deus ipse est, cum audiat uel legat Lucium Valerium, qui in suo defunctus est consulatu, usque adeo fuisse pauperem, ut nummis a populo conlatis eius sepultura curaretur? audiat uel legat Quintium Cincinnatum, cum quattuor iugera possideret et ea suis manibus coleret, ab aratro esse adductum, ut dictator fieret, maior utique honore quam consul, uictisque hostibus ingentem gloriam consecutum in eadem paupertate mansisse?

ENGLISH

How will a Christian dare to pride himself on voluntary poverty, embraced so that on the pilgrimage of this life he may walk more unencumbered on the way that leads to the homeland where God himself is the true wealth? He hears or reads that Lucius Valerius, who died during his consulship, was so poor that his funeral was paid for with money collected by the people. He hears or reads that Quintius Cincinnatus, who owned four iugera of land and farmed them with his own hands, was brought from the plow to be made dictator—an office surely greater in honor than consul—and that 43 Publius Decius Mus and his son of the same name ritually "devoted" themselves to death in battle, in 340 and 295 BC.

44 Matthew 8:22. Marcus Horatius Pulvillus, consul in 509 BC, dedicated the temple on the Capitol (Livy 2.8).
45 Marcus Atilius Regulus, a consul captured by Carthage in the First Punic War (255 BC); see 1.15. The quotation is Psalm 115:12 (116:12 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

after defeating the enemy and winning immense glory he remained in the same poverty.[46]

Aut quid se magnum fecisse praedicabit, qui nullo praemio mundi huius fuerit ab aeternae illius patriae societate seductus, cum Fabricium didicerit tantis muneribus Pyrrhi, regis Epirotarum, promissa etiam quarta parte regni, a Romana ciuitate non potuisse deuelli ibique in sua paupertate priuatum manere maluisse?

Or what great thing will anyone boast of having done if no reward of this world has lured him away from the fellowship of that eternal homeland? He has learned that Fabricius could not be torn away from the Roman state by all the great gifts of Pyrrhus, king of the Epirotes—even with the promise of a quarter of his kingdom—and that he preferred to remain there in his poverty as a private citizen.[47]

Nam illud quod rem publicam, id est rem populi, rem patriae, rem communem, cum haberent opulentissimam adque ditissimam, sic ipsi in suis domibus pauperes erant, ut quidam eorum, qui iam bis consul fuisset, ex illo senatu hominum pauperum pelleretur notatione censoria, quod decem pondo argenti in uasis habere conpertus est; ita idem ipsi pauperes erant, quorum triumphis publicum ditabatur aerarium: nonne omnes Christiani, qui excellentiore proposito diuitias suas communes faciunt secundum id quod scriptum est in actibus apostolorum, ut distribuatur unicuique sicut cuique opus est, et nemo dicat aliquid proprium, sed sint illis omnia communia, intellegunt se nulla ob hoc uentilari oportere iactantia, id faciendo pro obtinenda societate angelorum, cum paene tale aliquid illi fecerint pro conseruanda gloria Romanorum?

Then there is this. They possessed a commonwealth—that is, the people's wealth, the country's wealth, the common wealth—that was most opulent and rich, yet they themselves were so poor in their own homes that one of them, who had already been consul twice, was expelled from that senate of poor men by the censor's mark because he was found to own ten pounds of silver plate. So poor were the very men whose triumphs enriched the public treasury. Christians, with a more excellent purpose, make their wealth common property, in keeping with what is written in the Acts of the Apostles: that distribution was made to each as each had need, and no one called anything his own, but they had everything in common. Do they not all understand, then, that they ought not to be puffed up with any boasting on this account, since they do this to gain the fellowship of angels, when those men did almost the same thing to preserve the glory of the Romans?[48]

Haec et alia, si qua huius modi reperiuntur in litteris eorum, quando sic innotescerent, quando tanta fama praedicarentur, nisi Romanum imperium longe lateque porrectum magnificis successibus augeretur? Proinde per illud imperium tam latum tamque diuturnum uirorumque tantorum uirtutibus praeclarum adque gloriosum et illorum intentioni merces quam quaerebant est reddita, et nobis proposita necessariae commonitionis exempla, ut, si uirtutes, quarum istae utcumque sunt similes, quas isti pro ciuitatis terrenae gloriae tenuerunt, pro Dei gloriosissima ciuitate non tenuerimus, pudore pungamur; si tenuerimus, superbia non extollamur; quoniam, sicut dicit apostolus, indignae sunt passiones

When would these deeds, and any others of this kind found in their literature, have become so well known, when would they have been proclaimed with such fame, if the Roman Empire had not been extended far and wide and enlarged by magnificent successes? Accordingly, through that empire —so wide and so lasting, so illustrious and glorious through the virtues of such great men—their aims received the reward they sought. And examples were set before us as a necessary warning. The virtues they held for the glory of the earthly city bear some sort of likeness to true virtues. If we do not hold those true virtues for the most 46 Valerius is probably Publius Valerius Publicola, who died in 503 BC; Cincinnatus was called from his farm of about two and a half acres to be dictator in 458 BC.

47 Gaius Fabricius Luscinus negotiated with Pyrrhus of Epirus, who invaded Italy in 280 BC.

48 The expelled senator was Publius Cornelius Rufinus, removed by the censors in 275 BC. The scriptural reference is Acts 4:32–35.

LATIN	ENGLISH
huius temporis ad futuram gloriam, quae reuelabitur in nobis. Ad humanam uero gloriam praesentisque temporis satis digna uita aestimabatur illorum.	glorious city of God, we should be stung with shame; if we do hold them, we should not be lifted up with pride. For, as the apostle says, "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy of the glory to come that will be revealed in us." But for human glory, the glory of this present time, their life was judged quite worthy.[49]
Unde etiam Iudaei, qui Christum occiderunt, reuelante testamento nouo quod in uetere uelatum fuit, ut non pro terrenis et temporalibus beneficiis, quae diuina prouidentia permixte bonis malisque concedit, sed pro aeterna uita muneribusque perpetuis et ipsius supernae ciuitatis societate colatur Deus unus et uerus, rectissime istorum gloriae donati sunt, ut hi, qui qualibuscumque uirtutibus terrenam gloriam quaesiuerunt et adquisiuerunt, uincerent eos, qui magnis uitiis datorem uerae gloriae et ciuitatis aeternae occiderunt adque respuerunt.	Hence the Jews too, who killed Christ, were most justly given over to the glory of these Romans. For the New Testament revealed what had been veiled in the Old: that the one true God is to be worshiped not for earthly and temporal benefits, which divine providence grants to good and bad alike, but for eternal life, for everlasting gifts, and for fellowship in the heavenly city itself. So it was right that those who sought and gained earthly glory by virtues of whatever kind should conquer those who, with great vices, killed and rejected the giver of true glory and of the eternal city.

HOW THE DESIRE FOR GLORY DIFFERS FROM THE DESIRE FOR DOMINATION

The craving for glory differs from the craving for domination, which stops at no crime.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.19 Interest sane inter cupiditatem humanae gloriae et cupiditatem dominationis. Nam licet procliue sit, ut, qui humana gloria nimium delectatur, etiam dominari ardenter adfectet, tamen qui ueram licet humanarum laudum gloriam concupiscunt, dant operam bene iudicantibus non displicere. Sunt enim multa in moribus bona, de quibus multi bene iudicant, quamuis ea multi non habeant; per ea bona morum nituntur ad gloriam et imperium uel dominationem, de quibus ait Sallustius: Sed ille uera uia nititur. Quisquis autem sine cupiditate gloriae, qua ueretur homo bene iudicantibus displicere, dominari adque imperare desiderat, etiam per apertissima scelera quaerit plerumque obtinere quod diligit. Proinde qui gloriam concupiscit, aut uera uia nititur aut certe dolis adque fallaciis contendit, uolens bonus uideri esse, quod non est.	There is certainly a difference between the craving for human glory and the craving for domination. It is an easy slide for someone who delights too much in human glory to aspire ardently to domination as well. Still, those who crave true glory, even if it is only the glory of human praise, take pains not to displease those who judge well. For there are many good qualities of character that many people judge rightly, even though many do not possess them. It is by these good qualities of character that men strive toward glory, empire or domination, the men of whom Sallust says: "But he strives by the true way." But whoever desires to dominate and command without the craving for glory, which makes a man afraid to displease those who judge well, usually seeks to get what he loves even by the most open crimes. So the one who craves glory either strives by the true way or at least contends "by tricks and deceits," wanting to seem good when he is not.[50]
Et ideo uirtutes habenti magna uirtus est contemnere gloriam, quia contemtus eius in conspectu Dei est, iudicio	And so, for one who has the virtues, it is a great virtue to despise glory, because his contempt for it

49 Romans 8:18.
50 Sallust, Catiline 11.2.

LATIN

autem non aperitur humano. Quidquid enim fecerit ad oculos hominum, quo gloriae contemtor appareat, ad maiorem laudem, hoc est ad maiorem gloriam, facere si credatur, non est unde se suspicantium sensibus aliter esse, quam suspicantur, ostendat.

Sed qui contemnit iudicia laudantium, contemnit etiam suspicantium temeritatem, quorum tamen, si uere bonus est, non contemnit salutem, quoniam tantae iustitiae est qui de spiritu Dei uirtutes habet, ut etiam ipsos diligat inimicos, et ita diligat, ut suos osores uel detractores uelit correctos habere consortes non in terrena patria, sed superna; in laudatoribus autem suis, quamuis paruipendat quod eum laudant, non tamen paruipendit quod amant, nec eos uult fallere laudantes, ne decipiat diligentes; ideoque instat ardenter, ut potius ille laudetur, a quo habet homo quidquid in eo iure laudatur. Qui autem gloriae contemtor dominationis est auidus, bestias superat siue crudelitatis uitiis siue luxuriae. Tales quidam Romani fuerunt. Non enim cura existimationis amissa dominationis cupiditate caruerunt.

Multos tales fuisse prodit historia; sed huius uitii summitatem et quasi arcem quandam Nero Caesar primus obtinuit, cuius fuit tanta luxuries, ut nihil ab eo putaretur uirile metuendum; tanta crudelitas, ut nihil molle habere crederetur, si nesciretur. Etiam talibus tamen dominandi potestas non datur nisi summi Dei prouidentia, quando res humanas iudicat talibus dominis dignas. Aperta de hac re uox diuina est loquente Dei sapientia: Per me reges regnant et tyranni per me tenent terram. Sed ne tyranni non pessimi adque inprobi reges, sed uetere nomine fortes dicti existimentur (unde ait Vergilius: Pars mihi pacis erit dextram tetigisse tyranni): apertissime alio loco de Deo dictum est: Quia regnare facit hominem hypocritam propter peruersitatem populi.

ENGLISH

is seen by God but is not laid open to human judgment. Whatever he does before people's eyes to show that he despises glory, if he is believed to be doing it for greater praise, that is, for greater glory, he has no way of proving to the minds of those who suspect him that he is other than they suspect.

But one who despises the judgments of those who praise him also despises the rashness of those who suspect him. Yet if he is truly good, he does not despise their salvation. For one who has his virtues from the Spirit of God is so just that he loves even his enemies. He loves them in such a way that he wants those who hate or disparage him to be corrected and to become his companions, not in the earthly homeland but in the one above. As for those who praise him, he sets little value on their praising him, but he does not set little value on their loving him. Nor does he want to mislead them when they praise him, lest he deceive those who love him. And so he presses ardently for the praise to go instead to the one from whom a man has whatever is rightly praised in him. But one who despises glory yet is greedy for domination outdoes the beasts in the vices of cruelty or of self-indulgence. Some Romans were like this. They had lost all concern for their reputation, but they were not without the craving for domination.

History records that there were many such men. But the summit, the citadel as it were, of this vice was first held by the emperor Nero. His self-indulgence was so great that no one would have thought there was anything manly in him to fear. His cruelty was so great that, had his self-indulgence not been known, he would have been thought to have nothing soft in him at all. Yet even to such men the power to rule is given only by the providence of the supreme God, when he judges that human affairs deserve such masters. The divine voice is clear on this point, where the Wisdom of God says: "By me kings reign, and through me tyrants hold the land." Someone might think that "tyrants" here means not the worst and most wicked kings but, in the old sense of the word, strong men. Hence Virgil says: "It will be part of the peace for me to have touched the tyrant's right hand." But lest anyone think so, another passage says of God quite plainly: "For he makes a hypocrite reign because of the perversity of the people."[51]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quam ob rem, quamuis ut potui satis exposuerim qua causa Deus unus uerus et iustus Romanos secundum quandam formam terrenae ciuitatis bonos adiuuerit ad tanti imperii gloriam consequendam: potest tamen et alia causa esse latentior propter diuersa merita generis humani, Deo magis nota quam nobis, dum illud constet inter omnes ueraciter pios, neminem sine uera pietate, id est ueri Dei uero cultu, ueram posse habere uirtutem, nec eam ueram esse, quando gloriae seruit humanae; eos tamen, qui ciues non sint ciuitatis aeternae, quae in sacris litteris nostris dicitur ciuitas Dei, utiliores esse terrenae ciuitati, quando habent uirtutem uel ipsam, quam si nec ipsam.	Therefore I have explained, as well as I could, why the one true and just God helped the Romans, who were good by a certain standard of the earthly city, to attain the glory of so great an empire. Yet there may also be another, more hidden reason, owing to the varied merits of the human race, better known to God than to us. Only let this be agreed among all who are truly devout: that no one can have true virtue without true piety, that is, without the true worship of the true God; and that virtue is not true when it serves human glory. Even so, those who are not citizens of the eternal city, which our sacred Scriptures call the city of God, are more useful to the earthly city when they have at least that sort of virtue than if they had not even that.
Illi autem, qui uera pietate praediti bene uiuunt, si habent scientiam regendi populos, nihil est felicius rebus humanis, quam si Deo miserante habeant potestatem. Tales autem homines uirtutes suas, quantascumque in hac uita possunt habere, non tribuunt nisi gratiae Dei, quod eas uolentibus credentibus petentibus dederit, simulque intellegunt, quantum sibi desit ad perfectionem iustitiae, qualis est in illorum sanctorum angelorum societate, cui se nituntur aptare. Quantumlibet autem laudetur adque praedicetur uirtus, quae sine uera pietate seruit hominum gloriae, nequaquam sanctorum exiguis initiis conparanda est, quorum spes posita est in gratia et in misericordia ueri Dei.	But if those who live good lives, endowed with true piety, have the skill of governing peoples, nothing is happier for human affairs than that they should hold power by God's mercy. Such men attribute their virtues, however great these can be in this life, to nothing but the grace of God, because he gave them these virtues when they willed, believed and asked. At the same time they understand how far they fall short of the perfection of righteousness found in the fellowship of the holy angels, for which they strive to make themselves fit. However much the virtue that serves human glory without true piety may be praised and proclaimed, it can in no way be compared with even the slight beginnings of the saints, whose hope is placed in the grace and mercy of the true God.

THAT IT IS AS SHAMEFUL FOR THE VIRTUES TO SERVE HUMAN GLORY AS TO SERVE BODILY PLEASURE

Virtues serving human glory are as degraded as virtues serving pleasure.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.20 Solent philosophi, qui finem boni humani in ipsa uirtute constituunt, ad ingerendum pudorem quibusdam philosophis, qui uirtutes quidem probant, sed eas uoluptatis corporalis fine metiuntur et illam per se ipsam putant adpetendam, istas propter ipsam, tabulam quandam uerbis pingere, ubi uoluptas in sella regali quasi delicata quaedam regina considat, eique uirtutes famulae	Some philosophers place the end of human good in virtue itself. Other philosophers approve of the virtues but measure them by the end of bodily pleasure: they think pleasure is to be sought for its own sake, and the virtues for the sake of pleasure. To shame these, the first group often paint a kind of picture in words. In it Pleasure sits on a royal

51 Proverbs 8:15; Job 34:30. The Virgil line is Aeneid 7.266, where King Latinus speaks of Aeneas.

LATIN

subiciantur, obseruantes eius nutum, ut faciant quod illa imperauerit, quae prudentiae iubeat, ut uigilanter inquirat, quo modo uoluptas regnet et salua sit; iustitiae iubeat, ut praestet beneficia quae potest ad conparandas amicitias corporalibus commodis necessarias, nulli faciat iniuriam, ne offensis legibus uoluptas uiuere secura non possit; fortitudini iubeat, ut, si dolor corpori accesserit, qui non conpellat in mortem, teneat dominam suam, id est uoluptatem, fortiter in animi cogitatione, ut per pristinarum deliciarum suarum recordationem mitiget praesentis doloris aculeos; temperantiae iubeat, ut tantum capiat alimentorum etsi qua delectant, ne per inmoderationem noxium aliquid ualetudinem turbet et uoluptas, quam etiam in corporis sanitate Epicurei maximam ponunt, grauiter offendatur.

ENGLISH

throne like some pampered queen, and the virtues are set beneath her as her maidservants, watching for her nod so as to do whatever she commands. She orders Prudence to inquire vigilantly how Pleasure may reign and be kept safe. She orders Justice to grant what favors she can to win the friendships needed for bodily comforts, and to wrong no one, lest the laws be offended and Pleasure be unable to live securely. She orders Courage, if pain should come upon the body without driving it to death, to hold her mistress, that is, Pleasure, firmly in the mind's thoughts, so that by recalling her former delights she may soften the stings of present pain. She orders Temperance to take only so much food, even of what is delightful, that nothing harmful may upset the health through excess, and that Pleasure, which the Epicureans also locate chiefly in the health of the body, may not be gravely offended.[52]

Ita uirtutes cum tota suae gloria dignitatis tamquam imperiosae cuidam et inhonestae mulierculae seruient uoluptati. Nihil hac pictura dicunt esse ignominiosius et deformius et quod minus ferre bonorum possit aspectus; et uerum dicunt. Sed non existimo satis debiti decoris esse picturam, si etiam talis fingatur, ubi uirtutes humanae gloriae seruiunt. Licet enim ipsa gloria delicata mulier non sit, inflata est et multum inanitatis habet. Unde non ei digne seruit soliditas quaedam firmitasque uirtutum, ut nihil prouideat prouidentia, nihil distribuat iustitia, nihil toleret fortitudo, nihil temperantia moderetur, nisi unde placeatur hominibus et uentosae gloriae seruiatur. Nec illi se ab ista foeditate defenderint, qui, cum aliena spernant iudicia uelut gloriae contemtores, sibi sapientes uidentur et sibi placent.

So the virtues, with all the glory of their dignity, will be slaves to Pleasure, as if she were some imperious and disreputable little woman. They say that nothing is more disgraceful and ugly than this picture, nothing the eyes of good men could less bear; and they speak the truth. But I do not think the picture would be decent enough either if another were drawn in which the virtues serve human glory. For although Glory herself is not a pampered woman, she is puffed up and full of emptiness. So it is not fitting for the solidity and firmness of the virtues to serve her, with Prudence providing for nothing, Justice distributing nothing, Courage enduring nothing, Temperance moderating nothing, except what will please people and serve windy glory. Nor can they clear themselves of this ugliness who scorn others' judgments as though they despised glory, but seem wise to themselves and are pleased with themselves.

Nam eorum uirtus, si tamen ulla est, alio modo quodam humanae subditur laudi; neque enim ipse, qui sibi placet, homo non est. Qui autem uera pietate in Deum, quem diligit, credit et sperat, plus intendit in ea, quibus sibi displicet, quam in ea, si qua in illo sunt, quae non tam ipsi quam ueritati placent; neque id tribuit, unde iam potest placere, nisi eius misericordiae, cui metuit

For their virtue, if it is virtue at all, is subjected to human praise in another way, since the man who pleases himself is still a human being. But one who believes and hopes in God, whom he loves, with true piety, pays more attention to the things in himself that displease him than to those, if there are any, that please not so much himself as 52 The image goes back to the Stoic Cleanthes, as reported by Cicero, On Ends 2.69. The Epicureans followed Epicurus (341–270 BC), who made pleasure the goal of life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
displicere; de his sanatis gratias agens, de illis sanandis preces fundens.	the truth. And whatever now enables him to please, he attributes only to the mercy of the one he fears to displease, giving thanks for what has been healed and pouring out prayers for what is yet to be healed.

THAT THE ROMAN KINGDOM WAS ORDERED BY THE TRUE GOD, FROM WHOM IS ALL POWER AND BY WHOSE PROVIDENCE ALL THINGS ARE RULED

The one true God gives kingdoms to good and bad rulers alike, as he wills.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.21 Quae cum ita sint, non tribuamus dandi regni adque imperii potestatem nisi Deo uero, qui dat felicitatem in regno caelorum solis piis; regnum uero terrenum et piis et inpiis, sicut ei placet, cui nihil iniuste placet. Quamuis enim aliquid dixerimus, quod apertum nobis esse uoluit: tamen multum est ad nos et ualde superat uires nostras hominum occulta discutere et liquido examine merita diiudicare regnorum.	Since this is so, let us attribute the power of granting kingdom and empire only to the true God. He gives happiness in the kingdom of heaven to the godly alone, but earthly kingdom to the godly and the ungodly alike, as it pleases him, and nothing pleases him unjustly. We have said something of what he willed to make plain to us. Still, it is too much for us, far beyond our powers, to examine the hidden things of human beings and to decide with clear scrutiny what kingdoms deserve.
Ille igitur unus uerus Deus, qui nec iudicio nec adiutorio deserit genus humanum, quando uoluit et quantum uoluit Romanis regnum dedit; qui dedit Assyriis, uel etiam Persis, a quibus solos duos deos coli, unum bonum, alterum malum, continent litterae istorum; ut taceam de populo Hebraeo, de quo iam dixi quantum satis uisum est, qui praeter unum Deum non coluit et quando regnauit. Qui ergo Persis dedit segetes sine cultu deae Segetiae, qui alia dona terrarum sine cultu tot deorum, quos isti rebus singulis singulos, uel etiam rebus singulis plures praeposuerunt: ipse etiam regnum dedit sine cultu eorum, per quorum cultum se isti regnasse crediderunt.	So that one true God, who never abandons the human race either in judgment or in help, gave kingdom to the Romans when he willed and as far as he willed. He gave it to the Assyrians, and to the Persians too, who, as our opponents' own writings record, worship only two gods, one good and the other evil. I say nothing of the Hebrew people, of whom I have already said as much as seemed enough, who worshiped none but the one God even when they had a kingdom. He gave the Persians crops without the worship of the goddess Segetia. He gave them the other gifts of the earth without the worship of all those gods whom these people set, one each over individual things, or even several over each. So he too, and no other, gave them kingdom without the worship of those gods through whose worship these people believed they had reigned.[53]
Sic etiam hominibus: qui Mario, ipse Gaio Caesari; qui Augusto, ipse et Neroni; qui Vespasianis, uel patri uel filio, suauissimis imperatoribus, ipse et Domitiano crudelissimo; et ne per singulos ire necesse sit, qui Constantino Christiano, ipse apostatae Iuliano, cuius egregiam indolem decepit amore dominandi sacrilega et detestanda curiositas, cuius uanis deditus oraculis erat, quando fretus securitate uictoriae naues, quibus uictus	It is the same with individual men. He who gave power to Marius gave it to Gaius Caesar. He who gave it to Augustus gave it also to Nero. He who gave it to the Vespasians, father and son, most agreeable emperors, gave it also to the most cruel Domitian. And not to go through them one by one: he who gave it to Constantine the Christian gave it also to Julian the Apostate. Julian's fine natural 53 Segetia was the Roman goddess of standing crops, among the many minor deities mocked in Book 4.

LATIN	ENGLISH
necessarius portabatur, incendit; deinde feruide instans inmodicis ausibus et mox merito temeritatis occisus in locis hostilibus egenum reliquit exercitum, ut aliter inde non posset euadi, nisi contra illud auspicium dei Termini, de quo superiore libro diximus, Romani imperii termini mouerentur. Cessit enim Terminus deus necessitati, qui non cesserat Ioui.	gifts were led astray, through his love of domination, by a sacrilegious and detestable curiosity. He was devoted to its empty oracles when, confident of victory, he burned the ships that carried the provisions his army needed. Then, pressing on hotly in reckless ventures, he was soon killed in enemy territory, as his rashness deserved, and left his army destitute. It could not escape from there except by moving the boundaries of the Roman Empire, contrary to that omen of the god Terminus of which we spoke in the previous book. For the god Terminus yielded to necessity, though he had not yielded to Jupiter.[54]
Haec plane Deus unus et uerus regit et gubernat, ut placet; et si occultis causis, numquid iniustis?	Plainly the one true God rules and governs these things as he pleases. And if his reasons are hidden, does that make them unjust?

THAT THE LENGTH AND OUTCOME OF WARS DEPEND ON GOD'S JUDGMENT

God decides how long wars last; Rome's pre-Christian wars were often very long.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.22 Sic etiam tempora ipsa bellorum, sicut in eius arbitrio est iustoque iudicio et misericordia uel adterere uel consolari genus humanum, ut alia citius, alia tardius finiantur. Bellum piratarum a Pompeio, bellum Punicum tertium ab Scipione incredibili celeritate et temporis breuitate confecta sunt. Bellum quoque fugitiuorum gladiatorum, quamuis multis Romanis ducibus et duobus consulibus uictis Italiaque horribiliter contrita adque uastata, tertio tamen anno post multa consumta consumtum est.	So too with the very length of wars. It lies in his choice, by his just judgment and mercy, to wear down the human race or to console it, so that some wars end sooner and others later. The war against the pirates was finished by Pompey, and the Third Punic War by Scipio, with incredible speed and in a short time. The war of the runaway gladiators, too, defeated many Roman commanders and two consuls and ground down and devastated Italy dreadfully. Yet in its third year, after consuming much, it was itself consumed.[55]
Picentes, Marsi et Peligni, gentes non exterae, sed Italicae, post diuturnam et deuotissimam sub Romano iugo seruitutem in libertatem caput erigere tentauerunt, iam multis nationibus Romano imperio subiugatis deletaque Carthagine; in quo bello Italico Romanis saepissime uictis ubi et duo consules perierunt et alii nobilissimi senatores, non diuturno tamen tempore tractum est hoc malum; nam quintus annus ei finem dedit. Sed bellum Punicum secundum cum maximis detrimentis et calamitate rei publicae per annos decem et octo Romanas uires extenuauit et paene consumsit; duobus proeliis ferme septuaginta Romanorum milia	The Picentes, Marsi and Paeligni, peoples not foreign but Italian, after long and most devoted servitude under the Roman yoke, tried to raise their heads toward freedom. By then many nations had already been subjected to Roman rule, and Carthage had been destroyed. In this Italian war the Romans were very often defeated, and two consuls and other senators of the highest nobility perished. Yet this evil was not drawn out for long, for the fifth year ended it. But the Second Punic War, with very great losses and calamity for the commonwealth, wore down Roman strength for 54 Gaius Caesar is Julius Caesar. Julian (emperor AD 361–363) died in Persia, and his successor ceded Roman territory to save the army; Terminus, god of boundaries, had refused to make way even for Jupiter on the Capitol (4.23, 4.29).

55 Pompey cleared the Mediterranean of pirates in 67 BC; Scipio Aemilianus destroyed Carthage in 146 BC; the gladiators' revolt led by Spartacus lasted from 73 to 71 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ceciderunt. Bellum Punicum primum per uiginti et tres annos peractum est; bellum Mithridaticum quadraginta.	eighteen years and almost used it up; in two battles nearly seventy thousand Romans fell. The First Punic War was waged for twenty-three years, the Mithridatic war for forty.[56]
Ac ne quisquam arbitretur rudimenta Romanorum fuisse fortiora ad bella citius peragenda, superioribus temporibus multum in omni uirtute laudatis bellum Samniticum annis tractum est ferme quinquaginta; in quo bello ita Romani uicti sunt, ut sub iugum etiam mitterentur. Sed quia non diligebant gloriam propter iustitiam, sed iustitiam propter gloriam diligere uidebantur, pacem factam foedusque ruperunt. Haec ideo commemoro, quoniam multi praeteritarum rerum ignari, quidam etiam dissimulatores suae scientiae, si temporibus Christianis aliquod bellum paulo diutius trahi uident, ilico in nostram religionem proteruissime insiliunt, exclamantes, quod, si ipsa non esset et uetere ritu numina colerentur, iam Romana illa uirtute, quae adiuuante Marte et Bellona tanta celeriter bella confecit, id quoque celerrime finiretur.	And lest anyone think that the Romans in their early days, those earlier times so highly praised for every virtue, were more vigorous in finishing wars quickly: the Samnite war dragged on for nearly fifty years. In that war the Romans were so badly beaten that they were even sent under the yoke. But because they did not love glory for the sake of justice, but seemed to love justice for the sake of glory, they broke the peace and the treaty that had been made. I mention these things because many people who are ignorant of the past, and some who also conceal what they know, see some war in Christian times dragged out a little longer and at once leap most insolently upon our religion. They cry out that if it did not exist, and the deities were worshiped in the old way, then by that Roman courage which, with the help of Mars and Bellona, finished such great wars so quickly, this war too would be ended very quickly.[57]
Recolant igitur qui legerunt, quam diuturna bella, quam uariis euentis, quam luctuosis cladibus a ueteribus sint gesta Romanis, sicut solet orbis terrarum uelut procellosissimum pelagus uaria talium malorum tempestate iactari, et quod nolunt aliquando fateantur, nec insanis aduersus Deum linguis se interimant et decipiant inperitos.	Let those who have read history recall, then, how long the wars waged by the Romans of old were, how varied in outcome, how grievous in their disasters. For the world, like a most storm-tossed sea, is regularly buffeted by a shifting tempest of such evils. Let them at last admit what they do not want to admit, and stop destroying themselves with tongues raving against God and deceiving the unlearned.

THE WAR IN WHICH RADAGAISUS, KING OF THE GOTHS AND A WORSHIPER OF DEMONS, WAS DEFEATED IN ONE DAY WITH HIS HUGE FORCES

God crushed the pagan Radagaisus without a Roman casualty, then let Christian Goths take Rome mercifully.

LATIN	ENGLISH
5.23 Quod tamen nostra memoria recentissimo tempore Deus mirabiliter et misericorditer fecit, non cum gratiarum actione commemorant, sed, quantum in ipsis est, omnium si fieri potest hominum obliuione sepelire conantur; quod a nobis si tacebitur, similiter erimus ingrati. Cum Radagaisus, rex Gothorum, agmine ingenti et inmani iam in Urbis uicinia constitutus Romanis	Yet there is something God did, wonderfully and mercifully, within our own memory and very recently. They do not recall it with thanksgiving; rather, as far as lies in them, they try to bury it, if possible, in the forgetfulness of all mankind. If we keep silent about it, we shall be just as ungrateful.

56 The "Italian war" is the Social War of 91–88 BC. The two battles of the Second Punic War are Lake Trasimene (217 BC) and Cannae (216 BC); the wars with Mithridates VI of Pontus ran from 89 to 63 BC.
57 At the Caudine Forks (321 BC) a trapped Roman army was made to pass under a yoke of spears in token of surrender. Bellona was the Roman goddess of war.

LATIN

ceruicibus inmineret, uno die tanta celeritate sic uictus est, ut ne uno quidem non dicam extincto, sed uulnerato Romanorum multo amplius quam centum milium prosterneretur eius exercitus adque ipse mox captus poena debita necaretur. Nam si ille tam inpius cum tantis et tam inpiis copiis Romam fuisset ingressus, cui pepercisset? quibus locis martyrum honorem detulisset? in qua persona Deum timeret? cuius non sanguinem fusum, cuius pudicitiam uellet intactam?

ENGLISH

Radagaisus, king of the Goths, was already encamped near the City with a huge and savage host and hung over the necks of the Romans. Yet he was defeated in a single day, and so swiftly that, without a single Roman being—I will not say killed, but even wounded—his army of far more than a hundred thousand was laid low, and he himself was soon captured and put to death with the punishment he deserved. For if a man so ungodly had entered Rome with forces so great and so ungodly, whom would he have spared? What shrines of the martyrs would he have honored? In whose person would he have feared God? Whose blood would he have wished unshed, whose chastity untouched?[58]

Quas autem isti pro dis suis uoces haberent, quanta insultatione iactarent, quod ille ideo uicisset, ideo tanta potuisset, quia cottidianis sacrificiis placabat adque inuitabat deos, quod Romanos facere Christiana religio non sinebat? Nam propinquante iam illo his locis, ubi nutu summae maiestatis obpressus est, cum eius fama ubique crebresceret, nobis aput Carthaginem dicebatur, hoc credere spargere iactare paganos, quod ille dis amicis protegentibus et opitulantibus, quibus immolare cottidie ferebatur, uinci omnino non posset ab eis, qui talia dis Bomanis sacra non facerent nec fieri a quoquam permitterent.

And what cries these people would have raised for their gods! How insultingly they would have boasted that he had conquered and been so powerful because he appeased and invited the gods with daily sacrifices, which the Christian religion would not let the Romans do! For when he was already approaching the region where he was crushed at the nod of the supreme Majesty, and reports of him were spreading everywhere, we were told at Carthage that the pagans believed, spread and boasted that, with the gods as his friends protecting and helping him (for he was said to sacrifice to them every day), he could not possibly be defeated by those who performed no such rites to the Roman gods and allowed no one else to perform them.

Et non agunt miseri gratias tantae misericordiae Dei, qui cum statuisset inruptione barbarica grauiora pati dignos mores hominum castigare, indignationem suam tanta mansuetudine temperauit, ut illum primo faceret mirabiliter uinci, ne ad infirmorum animos euertendos gloria daretur daemonibus, quibus eum supplicare constabat; deinde ab his barbaris Roma caperetur, qui contra omnem consuetudinem gestorum ante bellorum ad loca sancta confugientes Christianae religionis reuerentia tuerentur ipsisque daemonibus adque inpiorum sacrificiorum ritibus, de quibus ille praesumserat, sic aduersarentur nomine Christiano, ut longe atrocius bellum cum eis quam cum hominibus gerere uiderentur; ita uerus dominus gubernatorque rerum et Romanos cum misericordia flagellauit, et tam incredibiliter uictis supplicatoribus daemonum nec saluti rerum praesentium necessaria esse sacrificia illa

And the wretches do not give thanks for such great mercy from God. He had resolved to chastise, by a foreign invasion, the morals of men who deserved to suffer worse. Yet he tempered his indignation with such gentleness that first he caused that king to be wonderfully defeated, lest glory be given to the demons he was known to pray to, and the minds of the weak be overthrown. Then he caused Rome to be taken by these invaders, who, contrary to every custom of earlier wars, protected out of reverence for the Christian religion those who fled to the holy places. As Christians they so opposed the demons themselves and the rites of ungodly sacrifice on which that other king had relied, that they seemed to be waging a far fiercer war on them than on men. Thus the true Lord and Gov-

58 Radagaisus, a Gothic leader, invaded Italy and was defeated near Florence in AD 406.

LATIN

monstrauit, ut ab his qui non peruicaciter contendunt, sed prudenter adtendunt, nec propter praesentes necessitates uera religio deseratur, et magis aeternae uitae fidelissima expectatione teneatur.

ENGLISH

ernor of all things both scourged the Romans with mercy and, by the incredible defeat of those who prayed to demons, showed that those sacrifices were not necessary even for safety in present things. So those who do not stubbornly contend but wisely attend may not abandon true religion because of present needs, but may hold to it all the more in most faithful expectation of eternal life.[59]

WHAT THE HAPPINESS OF CHRISTIAN EMPERORS IS, AND HOW TRUE IT IS

Christian emperors are happy not for success but if they rule justly, humbly and for eternal life.

LATIN

5.24 Neque enim nos Christianos quosdam imperatores ideo felices dicimus, quia uel diutius imperarunt uel imperantes filios morte placida reliquerunt, uel hostes rei publicae domuerunt uel inimicos ciues aduersus se insurgentes et cauere obprimere potuerunt. Haec et alia uitae huius aerumnosae uel munera uel solacia quidam etiam cultores daemonum accipere meruerunt, qui non pertinent ad regnum Dei, quo pertinent isti; et hoc ipsius misericordia factum est, ne ab illo ista qui in eum crederent uelut summa bona desiderarent.

Sed felices eos dicimus, si iuste imperant, si inter linguas sublimiter honorantium et obsequia nimis humiliter salutantium non extolluntur, et se homines esse meminerunt; si suam potestatem ad Dei cultum maxime dilatandum maiestati eius famulam faciunt; si Deum timent diligunt colunt; si plus amant illud regnum, ubi non timent habere consortes; si tardius uindicant, facile ignoscunt; si eandem uindictam pro necessitate regendae tuendaeque rei publicae, non pro saturandis inimicitiarum odiis exerunt; si eandem ueniam non ad inpunitatem iniquitatis, sed ad spem correctionis indulgent; si, quod aspere coguntur plerumque decernere, misericordiae lenitate et beneficiorum largitate conpensant; si luxuria tanto eis est castigatior, quanto posset esse liberior; si malunt cupiditatibus prauis quam quibuslibet gentibus imperare et si haec omnia faciunt non propter ardorem inanis gloriae, sed propter caritatem felicitatis aeternae; si pro suis peccatis humilitatis et miserationis et orationis sacrificium Deo suo uero immolare non neglegunt.

ENGLISH

For we do not call certain Christian emperors happy because they reigned longer, or died a peaceful death leaving sons to reign after them, or subdued the enemies of the commonwealth, or were able both to guard against and to crush hostile citizens who rose against them. These and other gifts or consolations of this troubled life even some worshipers of demons have deserved to receive, though they do not belong to the kingdom of God, to which these emperors belong. And this was done by his mercy, so that those who believe in him should not desire such things from him as though they were the supreme goods.

But we call them happy if they rule justly; if, amid the tongues of those who honor them loftily and the fawning of those who greet them too humbly, they are not puffed up but remember that they are men; if they make their power the handmaid of his majesty, to spread his worship as widely as possible; if they fear, love and worship God; if they love more that kingdom where they are not afraid to have partners; if they are slow to punish and quick to pardon; if they use punishment out of the need to govern and defend the commonwealth, not to glut the hatred of their enmities; if they grant pardon not so that wrongdoing may go unpunished but in the hope of correction; if, when they are often compelled to decree something harsh, they offset it with the gentleness of mercy and the generosity of benefits; if their self-indulgence is the more restrained the freer it could be; if they would rather rule their evil desires than any nations whatever; and if they do all these things not out of ardor for empty glory but out of 59 The invaders who took Rome were the Goths under Alaric, in AD 410.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		love of eternal happiness; if they do not neglect to offer to their true God, for their sins, the sacrifice of humility, compassion and prayer.
	Tales Christianos imperatores dicimus esse felices interim spe, postea re ipsa futuros, cum id quod expectamus aduenerit.	Such Christian emperors we call happy—for now in hope, and afterward in reality, when what we are waiting for has come.

THE PROSPERITY GOD GRANTED TO CONSTANTINE, THE CHRISTIAN EMPEROR

God gave Constantine, who did not pray to demons, a long, victorious reign.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.25	Nam bonus Deus, ne homines, qui eum crederent propter aeternam uitam colendum, has sublimitates et regna terrena existimarent posse neminem consequi, nisi daemonibus supplicet, quod hi spiritus in talibus multum ualerent, Constantinum imperatorem non supplicantem daemonibus, sed ipsum uerum Deum colentem tantis terrenis inpleuit muneribus, quanta optare nullus auderet; cui etiam condere ciuitatem Romano imperio sociam, uelut ipsius Romae filiam, sed sine aliquo daemonum templo simulacroque concessit. Diu imperauit, uniuersum orbem Romanum unus Augustus tenuit et defendit; in administrandis et gerendis bellis uictoriosissimus fuit, in tyrannis obprimendis per omnia prosperatus est; grandaeuus aegritudine et senectute defunctus est, filios imperantes reliquit.	For the good God did not want people who believed that he should be worshiped for the sake of eternal life to suppose that no one could attain these high positions and earthly kingdoms without praying to demons, as if these spirits had great power in such matters. So he filled the emperor Constantine, who did not pray to demons but worshiped the true God himself, with earthly gifts so great that no one would dare to wish for them. He even granted him the founding of a city allied with the Roman Empire, a daughter, as it were, of Rome herself, but without a single temple or image of the demons. Constantine reigned a long time. As sole Augustus he held and defended the whole Roman world. In directing and waging wars he was supremely victorious, and in putting down usurpers he prospered at every turn. He died of illness and old age at a great age, and left his sons as emperors.[60]
	Sed rursus ne imperator quisquam ideo Christianus esset, ut felicitatem Constantini mereretur, cum propter uitam aeternam quisque debeat esse Christianus: Iouianum multo citius quam Iulianum abstulit; Gratianum ferro tyrannico permisit interimi, longe quidem mitius quam magnum Pompeium colentem uelut Romanos deos. Nam ille uindicari a Catone non potuit, quem ciuilis belli quodam modo heredem reliquerat; iste autem, quamuis piae animae solacia talia non requirant, a Theodosio uindicatus est; quem regni participem fecerat, cum paruulum haberet et fratrem, auidior fidae societatis quam nimiae potestatis.	But again, God did not want any emperor to become a Christian in order to earn the happiness of Constantine, since everyone ought to be a Christian for the sake of eternal life. So he took Jovian away much sooner than Julian. He allowed Gratian to be cut down by a usurper's sword, though far more gently than the great Pompey, who worshiped what passed for the Roman gods. For Pompey could not be avenged by Cato, whom he had left as a kind of heir to the civil war. Gratian, though pious souls do not seek such consolations, was avenged by Theodosius. Gratian had made Theodosius a partner in his rule even though he had a little brother of his own, for he was more eager for a faithful partnership than for excessive power.[61]

60 Constantine the Great (reigned AD 306–337), the first Christian emperor. The city is Constantinople, dedicated in AD 330.

THE FAITH AND PIETY OF THE EMPEROR THEODOSIUS

Theodosius's faith, mercy and penance made him a model Christian emperor.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
5.26	Unde et ille non solum uiuo seruauit quam debebat fidem, uerum etiam post eius mortem pulsum ab eius interfectore Maximo Valentinianum eius paruulum fratrem in sui partes imperii tamquam Christianus excepit pupillum, paterno custodiuit adfectu, quem destitutum omnibus opibus nullo negotio posset auferre, si latius regnandi cupiditate magis quam benefaciendi caritate flagraret; unde potius eum seruata eius imperatoria dignitate susceptum ipsa humanitate et gratia consolatus est. Deinde cum Maximum terribilem faceret ille successus, hic in angustiis curarum suarum non est lapsus ad curiositates sacrilegas adque inlicitas, sed ad Iohannem in Aegypti eremo constitutum, quem Dei seruum prophetandi spiritu praeditum fama crebrescente didicerat, misit adque ab eo nuntium uictoriae certissimum accepit.	Theodosius, then, not only kept the faith he owed Gratian while he lived. After Gratian's death, when his little brother Valentinian had been driven out by Maximus, Gratian's murderer, Theodosius took the boy into his own part of the empire as his ward, as a Christian would, and guarded him with a father's affection. He could have done away with him without any trouble, stripped as the boy was of all resources, had he burned more with the desire to rule more widely than with the love of doing good. Instead, he took him in, preserved his imperial rank, and comforted him by that very kindness and favor. Then, when this success had made Maximus formidable, Theodosius, in the straits of his anxiety, did not slip into sacrilegious and unlawful occult inquiries. Instead, he sent to John, who lived in the desert of Egypt and who, as his fame spread, Theodosius had learned was a servant of God endowed with the spirit of prophecy. From him he received a most certain message of victory.[62]
	Mox tyranni Maximi extinctor Valentinianum puerum imperii sui partibus, unde fugatus fuerat, cum misericordissima ueneratione restituit, eoque siue per insidias siue quo alio pacto uel casu proxime extincto alium tyrannum Eugenium, qui in illius imperatoris locum non legitime fuerat subrogatus, accepto rursus prophetico responso fide certus obpressit, contra cuius robustissimum exercitum magis orando quam feriendo pugnauit. Milites nobis qui aderant rettulerunt extorta sibi esse de manibus quaecumque iaculabantur, cum a Theodosii partibus in aduersarios uehemens uentus iret et non solum quaecumque in eos iaciebantur concitatissime raperet, uerum etiam ipsorum tela in eorum corpora retorqueret. Unde et poeta Claudianus, quamuis a Christi nomine alienus, in eius tamen laudibus dixit: O nimium dilecte Deo, cui — militat aether, Et coniurati ueniunt ad classica uenti!	Soon, having destroyed the usurper Maximus, he restored the boy Valentinian, with the most compassionate respect, to the parts of the empire from which he had been driven. Shortly afterward Valentinian died, whether through treachery or by some other means or accident. Theodosius then received another prophetic answer and, sure in his faith, crushed a second usurper, Eugenius, who had been set up illegitimately in that emperor's place. Against Eugenius' very powerful army he fought more by praying than by striking. Soldiers who were there have told us that whatever they hurled was wrenched from their hands. A violent wind was blowing from Theodosius' side against the enemy. It not only snatched away with tremendous force everything thrown at them, but even turned the enemy's own missiles back against their bodies. That is why even the poet Claudian, though a stranger to the name of Christ, said in praise of Theodosius: "O you whom God

61 Jovian, a Christian, reigned only months (AD 363–364), less than the pagan Julian (361–363). Gratian was killed in AD 383 by agents of the usurper Maximus. Pompey was murdered in Egypt in 48 BC, and Cato the Younger carried on the war against Caesar. Theodosius I became Gratian's co-emperor in AD 379.

62 Valentinian II, driven from Italy by Maximus in AD 387. John of Lycopolis was a celebrated Egyptian hermit (died c. AD 394).

LATIN

ENGLISH

loves exceedingly, for whom the sky goes to war, and the winds, sworn allies, come at the trumpet's call!"[63]

Victor autem, sicut crediderat et praedixerat, Iouis simulacra, quae aduersus eum fuerant nescio quibus ritibus uelut consecrata et in Alpibus constituta, deposuit, eorumque fulmina, quod aurea fuissent, iocantibus (quod illa laetitia permittebat) cursoribus et se ab eis fulminari uelle dicentibus hilariter benigneque donauit. Inimicorum suorum filios, quos, non ipsius iussu, belli abstulerat impetus, etiam nondum Christianos ad ecclesiam confugientes, Christianos hac occasione fieri uoluit et Christiana caritate dilexit, nec priuauit rebus et auxit honoribus. In neminem post uictoriam priuatas inimicitias ualere permisit. Bella ciuilia non sicut Cinna et Marius et Sylla et alii tales nec finita finire uoluerunt, sed magis doluit exorta quam cuiquam nocere uoluit terminata.

As victor, just as he had believed and foretold, he threw down the statues of Jupiter that had been set up against him in the Alps, consecrated by who knows what rites. Their thunderbolts were made of gold, so he gave them away cheerfully and kindly to his couriers. They joked, as the joy of the moment allowed, that they would gladly be struck by such thunderbolts. His enemies had been swept away by the onrush of battle, not by his own command, and their sons, though not yet Christians, fled to the church. He wanted them to become Christians on this occasion, and he loved them with Christian love. He did not strip them of their property, and he even advanced them in honors. After the victory he allowed no private grudge to prevail against anyone. Cinna, Marius, Sulla and others like them would not end civil wars even when the wars were over. Theodosius was different: he grieved more that civil wars had broken out than he wished to harm anyone once they had ended.[64]

Inter haec omnia ex ipso initio imperii sui non quieuit iustissimis et misericordissimis legibus aduersus inpios laboranti ecclesiae subuenire, quam Valens haereticus fauens Arianis uehementer adflixerat; cuius ecclesiae se membrum esse magis quam in terris regnare gaudebat. Simulacra gentilium ubique euertenda praecepit, satis intellegens nec terrena munera in daemoniorum, sed in Dei ueri esse posita potestate. Quid autem fuit eius religiosa humilitate mirabilius, quando in Thessalonicensium grauissimum scelus, cui iam episcopis intercedentibus promiserat indulgentiam, tumultu quorundam, qui ei cohaerebant, uindicare conpulsus est et ecclesiastica cohercitus disciplina sic egit paenitentiam, ut imperatoriam celsitudinem pro illo populus orans magis fleret uidendo prostratam, quam peccando timeret iratam?

Amid all this, from the very beginning of his reign he never ceased to help the Church in its struggle against the impious, through laws that were both just and merciful. Valens, a heretic who favored the Arians, had afflicted the Church severely. Theodosius rejoiced more to be a member of this Church than to reign on earth. He ordered the images of the pagans to be overthrown everywhere, for he understood well that even earthly gifts lie in the power not of demons but of the true God. And what was more wonderful than his religious humility? The people of Thessalonica had committed a very grave crime, and at the bishops' intercession he had already promised them pardon. Yet he was driven by the clamor of some of his close associates to punish it. Then, constrained by the discipline of the Church, he did penance in such a way that the people praying for him wept more at the sight of the imperial majesty laid low than they had feared its anger when they sinned.[65]

63 This was the battle of the Frigidus River (AD 394). Claudian (died c. AD 404) was a pagan court poet; the lines come from his Panegyric on the Third Consulship of Honorius (96–98), quoted with a gap.

64 Cinna, Marius and Sulla led the factions in Rome's civil wars of the 80s BC. They were notorious for massacres and reprisals after their victories.

LATIN

Haec ille secum et si qua similia, quae commemorare longum est, bona opera tulit ex isto temporali uapore cuiuslibet culminis et sublimitatis humanae; quorum operum merces est aeterna felicitas, cuius dator est Deus solis ueraciter piis. Cetera uero uitae huius uel fastigia uel subsidia, sicut ipsum mundum lucem auras, terras aquas fructus ipsiusque hominis animam corpus, sensus mentem uitam, bonis malisque largitur; in quibus est etiam quaelibet imperii magnitudo, quam pro temporum gubernatione dispensat.

Proinde iam etiam illis respondendum esse uideo, qui manifestissimis documentis, quibus ostenditur, quod ad ista temporalia, quae sola stulti habere concupiscunt, nihil deorum falsorum numerositas prosit, confutati adque conuicti conantur adserere non propter uitae praesentis utilitatem, sed propter eam, quae post mortem futura est, colendos deos. Nam istis, qui propter amicitias mundi huius uolunt uana colere et non se permitti puerilibus sensibus conqueruntur, his quinque libris satis arbitror esse responsum. Quorum tres priores cum edidissem et in multorum manibus esse coepissent, audiui quosdam nescio quam aduersus eos responsionem scribendo praeparare. Deinde ad me perlatum est, quod iam scripserint, sed tempus quaerant, quo sine periculo possint edere. Quos admoneo, non optent quod eis non expedit. Facile est enim cuiquam uideri respondisse, qui tacere noluerit.

Aut quid est loquacius uanitate? quae non ideo potest quod ueritas, quia, si uoluerit, etiam plus potest clamare quam ueritas. Sed considerent omnia diligenter, et si forte sine studio partium iudicantes talia esse perspexerint, quae potius exagitari quam conuelli possint garrulitate inpudentissima et quasi satyrica uel mimica leuitate, cohibeant suas nugas et potius a prudentibus emendari quam laudari ab inpudentibus eligant. Nam si non ad libertatem uera dicendi, sed ad licentiam maledicendi tempus expectant, absit ut eis eueniat quod

ENGLISH

These good works, and others like them that would take too long to recount, he took with him out of that passing vapor of human power and eminence, however lofty. The reward of such works is eternal happiness, and God gives it only to the truly pious. But the other things of this life, whether its heights or its supports, he bestows on good and bad alike. These include the world itself, light and air, lands, waters and crops, and a human being's own soul and body, senses, mind and life. Among them too is any greatness of empire, which he dispenses according to his governance of the ages.[66]

I see, then, that I must now also reply to those who have been refuted and convicted by the clearest proofs. These proofs show that the multitude of false gods is of no use for these temporal things, which alone fools crave to possess. Yet they try to maintain that the gods should be worshiped not for the benefit of this present life but for the sake of the life that is to come after death. To those who want to worship empty things for the sake of friendship with this world, and who complain that they are not allowed to indulge their childish notions, I think these five books have given answer enough. When I had published the first three and they had begun to pass through many hands, I heard that certain people were preparing some sort of written reply to them. Later word was brought to me that they had already written it but were waiting for a time when they could publish it without danger. I advise them not to wish for what is not to their advantage. For it is easy for anyone who refuses to keep quiet to seem to have replied.

Or what is more talkative than empty folly? Yet it cannot do what truth can just because, if it wants, it can shout even louder than truth. But let them consider everything carefully. If, judging without partisanship, they happen to see that these arguments can be jeered at but not overthrown by the most shameless chatter and the flippancy of satire or farce, let them restrain their trifling and choose to be corrected by the wise rather than praised by the shameless. For if they are waiting for an opportunity not for freedom to speak the truth but 65 Valens (reigned AD 364–378) supported the Arians, who denied that the Son is equal to the Father. After the massacre at Thessalonica in AD 390, Ambrose, bishop of Milan, required Theodosius to do public penance.

66 The "vapor" echoes James 4:14: "What is your life? You are a vapor that appears for a little while."

LATIN	ENGLISH
ait Tullius de quodam, qui peccandi licentia felix appellabatur: o miserum, cui peccare licebat!	for license to speak abuse, God forbid that what Cicero said of a certain man should happen to them. That man was called happy because he had license to sin, and Cicero said: “O wretched man, who was permitted to sin!”
Unde quisquis est, qui maledicendi licentia felicem se putat, multo erit felicior, si hoc illi omnino non liceat, cum possit deposita inanitate iactantiae etiam isto tempore tamquam studio consulendi quidquid uoluerit contradicere et, quantum possunt, ab eis quos consulit amica disputatione honeste grauiter libere quod oportet audire.	So whoever thinks himself happy because he has license to speak abuse will be much happier if he is not permitted it at all. For he could lay aside his empty boasting and, even in these times, raise whatever objection he likes, as if seeking advice. Then, in friendly discussion, he would hear from those he consults, as far as they are able to give it, what he ought to hear—honorably, seriously and freely.

Book VI

Varro's three theologies
The gods of mythical and civil theology cannot give eternal life.

PREFACE

Five books have answered those who worship many gods for this life's sake.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
6.pr	Quinque superioribus libris satis mihi aduersus eos uideor disputasse, qui multos deos et falsos, quos esse inutilia, simulacra uel inmundos spiritus et perniciosa daemonia uel certe creaturas, non creatorem ueritas Christiana conuincit, propter uitae huius mortalis rerumque terrenarum utilitatem eo ritu ac seruitute, quae Graece λατρεία dicitur et uni uero Deo debetur, uenerandos et colendos putant. Et nimiae quidem stultitiae uel pertinaciae nec istos quinque nec ullos alios quanticumque numeri libros satis esse posse quis nesciat? quando ea putatur gloria uanitatis, nullis cedere uiribus ueritatis, in perniciem utique eius, cui uitium tam inmane dominatur. Nam et contra omnem curantis industriam non malo medici, sed aegroti insanabilis morbus inuictus est.	In the five preceding books I think I have argued enough against those who hold that many false gods should be venerated and worshiped for the benefit of this mortal life and of earthly things. They would honor them with the rite and service called in Greek λατρεία [latreia: service due to God alone], which is owed to the one true God. Yet Christian truth proves these gods to be useless images, or unclean spirits and harmful demons, or at any rate creatures and not the Creator. But who does not know that neither these five books nor any others, however many, could ever be enough for excessive folly or stubbornness? For vanity counts it glory to yield to no strength of truth, and this certainly ruins the one over whom so monstrous a vice holds sway. Against all the efforts of the one treating it, the disease remains unconquered. The fault lies not with the doctor but with the patient, who is incurable.
	Hi uero, qui ea quae legunt uel sine ulla uel non cum magna ac nimia ueteris erroris obstinatione intellecta et considerata perpendunt, facilius nos isto numero terminatorum quinque uoluminum plus, quam quaestionis ipsius necessitas postulabat, quam minus disseruisse iudicabunt, totamque inuidiam, quam Christianae religioni de huius uitae cladibus terrenarumque contritione ac mutatione rerum inperiti facere conantur, non solum dissimulantibus, sed contra suam conscientiam etiam fauentibus doctis, quos inpietas uesana possedit, omnino esse inanem rectae cogitationis adque rationis plenamque leuissimae temeritatis et perniciosissimae animositatis dubitare non poterunt.	But some readers weigh what they read after understanding and considering it, and cling to their old error either not at all or not with great and excessive obstinacy. These will more readily judge that in these five finished volumes we have discussed more than the question itself required, rather than less. Nor will they be able to doubt that the whole odium the ignorant try to stir up against the Christian religion over the disasters of this life and the ruin and upheaval of earthly things is utterly empty of right thinking and reason. It is full of the most frivolous rashness and the most destructive animosity. And the learned, possessed by a mad impiety, not only pretend not to notice it but even encourage it, against their own conscience.

THOSE WHO SAY THEY WORSHIP THE GODS NOT FOR THE SAKE OF THIS PRESENT LIFE BUT FOR THE SAKE OF ETERNAL LIFE

Augustine now turns to those who worship the gods for the sake of eternal life.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
6.1	Nunc ergo quoniam deinceps, ut promissus ordo expetit, etiam hi refellendi et docendi sunt, qui non propter istam uitam, sed propter illam, quae post mortem futura est, deos gentium, quos Christiana religio destruit, colendos esse contendunt: placet a ueridico oraculo sancti psalmi sumere exordium disputationis meae: Beatus, cuius est Dominus Deus spes ipsius et non respexit in uanitates et insanias mendaces. Verum tamen in omnibus uanitatibus insaniisque mendacibus longe tolerabilius philosophi audiendi sunt, quibus displicuerunt istae opiniones erroresque populorum, qui populi constituerunt simulacra numinibus multaque de his, quos deos inmortales uocant, falsa adque indigna siue finxerunt siue ficta crediderunt, et credita eorum cultui sacrorumque ritibus miscuerunt.	Now, then, as the promised order requires, we must next refute and instruct those who maintain that the gods of the nations, which the Christian religion destroys, are to be worshiped not for the sake of this life but for the sake of the life that is to come after death. I would like to take the opening of my argument from the truthful oracle of the holy psalm: "Happy is the one whose hope is the Lord God, and who has not looked to vanities and lying follies." Still, among all these vanities and lying follies, the philosophers are by far the more tolerable to listen to. They disliked these opinions and errors of the peoples. For the peoples set up images of their deities, and about those they call immortal gods they either invented many false and unworthy things or believed them once invented, and having believed them, they mixed them into their worship and the rituals of their rites.[1]
	Cum his hominibus, qui, etsi non libere praedicando, saltem utcumque in disputationibus mussitando, talia se inprobare testati sunt, non usque adeo inconuenienter quaestio ista tractatur: utrum non unum Deum, qui fecit omnem spiritalem corporalemque creaturam, propter uitam, quae post mortem futura est, coli oporteat, sed multos deos, quos ab illo uno factos et sublimiter conlocatos quidam eorundem philosophorum ceteris excellentiores nobilioresque senserunt.	These men have testified that they disapprove of such things. They did so not by proclaiming it freely, but at least by muttering it somehow in their discussions. With them it is not so very unfitting to take up this question: for the sake of the life that is to come after death, ought we to worship not the one God who made every creature, spiritual and bodily, but many gods? Some of these same philosophers, more excellent and noble than the rest, held that these gods were made by that one God and placed on high.
	Ceterum quis ferat dici adque contendi deos illos, quorum in quarto libro quosdam commemoraui, quibus singulis singula rerum exiguarum distribuuntur officia, uitam aeternam cuique praestare? An uero peritissimi illi et acutissimi uiri, qui se pro magno beneficio conscripta docuisse gloriantur, ut sciretur quare cuique deo supplicandum esset, quid a quoque esset petendum, ne absurditate turpissima, qualis ioculariter in mimo fieri solet, peteretur a Libero aqua, a Lymphis uinum, auctores erunt cuipiam hominum dis inmortalibus supplicanti, ut, cum a Lymphis petierit uinum eique responderint: Nos aquam habemus, hoc a Libero, pete, possit recte dicere: Si	But who could bear to hear it said and argued that those gods grant eternal life to anyone? I mentioned some of them in the fourth book, gods to whom one small task each is assigned. Then there are those most expert and most acute men who boast that they did a great service by writing down and teaching why each god should be supplicated and what should be asked of each. Their aim was that no one, out of the most disgraceful absurdity of the kind usually played for laughs in a mime, would ask water of Liber and wine of the Lymphs. Will they advise someone praying to the immortal gods on what to do when he has asked

1 Psalm 39:5 (40:4 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
uinum non habetis, saltem date mihi uitam aeternam? Quid hac absurditate monstruosius?	the Lymphs for wine and they answer, "We have water; ask Liber for that"? Will they say he may properly reply, "If you have no wine, at least give me eternal life"? What could be more monstrous than this absurdity?[2]
Nonne illae cachinnantes (solent enim esse ad risum faciles), si non adfectent fallere ut daemones, supplici respondebunt: o homo, putasne in potestate nos habere uitam, quas audis non habere uel uitem? Inpudentissimae igitur stultitiae est uitam aeternam a talibus dis petere uel sperare, qui uitae huius aerumnosissimae adque breuissimae et si qua ad eam pertinent adminiculandam adque fulciendam ita singulas particulas tueri adseruntur, ut, si id, quod sub alterius tutela ac potestate est, petatur ab altero, tam sit inconueniens et absurdum, ut mimicae scurrilitati uideatur esse simillimum. Quod cum fit a scientibus mimis, digne ridentur in theatro; cum uero a nescientibus stultis, dignius inridentur in mundo.	Unless they were trying to deceive like demons, would those goddesses not burst out laughing (for they are usually quick to laugh) and answer the suppliant: "Man, do you think we have life in our power, when you hear that we do not even have the vine?" It is therefore the most shameless folly to ask or hope for eternal life from such gods. They are said to protect the individual little parts of this most wretched and most brief life, and whatever serves to support and prop it up. Yet they do so in such a way that if what lies under the guardianship and power of one is asked of another, it is so incongruous and absurd that it looks very like the buffoonery of a mime. When mimes do this knowing what they are doing, they are deservedly laughed at in the theater; but when fools do it without knowing, they are more deservedly laughed to scorn in the world.[3]
Cui ergo deo uel deae propter quid supplicaretur, quantum ad illos deos adtinet quos instituerunt ciuitates, a doctis sollerter inuentum memoriaeque mandatum est: quid a Libero, uerbi gratia, quid a Lymphis, quid a Vulcano ac sic a ceteris, quos partim commemoraui in quarto libro, partim praetereundos putaui. Porro si a Cerere uinum, a Libero panem, a Vulcano aquam, a Lymphis ignem petere erroris est: quanto maioris deliramenti esse intellegi debet, si cuiquam istorum pro uita supplicetur aeterna!	So, as far as concerns the gods whom the cities established, the learned have ingeniously worked out and recorded which god or goddess should be supplicated for what. They set down what should be asked of Liber, for example, what of the Lymphs, what of Vulcan, and so on with the rest. Some of these I mentioned in the fourth book; others I thought should be passed over. Further, if it is an error to ask wine of Ceres, bread of Liber, water of Vulcan, or fire of the Lymphs, how much greater a madness must it be thought to supplicate any of them for eternal life!
Quam ob rem si, cum de regno terreno quaereremus, quosnam illud deos uel deas hominibus credendum esset posse conferre, discussis omnibus longe alienum a ueritate monstratum est a quoquam istorum multorum numinum adque falsorum saltem regna terrena existimare constitui: nonne insanissimae inpietatis est, si aeterna uita, quae terrenis omnibus regnis sine ulla dubitatione uel conparatione praeferenda est, ab istorum quoquam dari cuiquam posse credatur? Neque enim propterea di tales uel terrenum regnum dare non posse uisi sunt, quia illi magni et excelsi sunt, hoc quiddam	When we were inquiring about earthly rule, we asked which gods or goddesses one should believe could confer it on human beings. After examining them all, we showed that it is far from the truth to think that any of these many false deities establishes even earthly kingdoms. Is it not, then, the most insane impiety to believe that any of them can give anyone eternal life, which without any doubt or comparison must be preferred to all earthly kingdoms? For such gods were not judged unable to give even an earthly kingdom on the

2 Liber was the Italian god of wine; the Lymphs were goddesses of water.
3 A pun in the Latin: vitam (life) and vitem (vine).

LATIN

paruum et abiectum, quod non dignarentur in tanta sublimitate curare; sed quantumlibet consideratione fragilitatis humanae caducos apices terreni regni merito quisque contemnat, illi di tales apparuerunt, ut indignissimi uiderentur, quibus danda adque seruanda deberent uel ista committi.

Ac per hoc, si (ut superiora proximis duobus libris pertractata docuerunt) nullus deus ex illa turba uel quasi plebeiorum uel quasi procerum deorum idoneus est regna mortalia mortalibus dare, quanto minus potest inmortales ex mortalibus facere!

Huc accedit, quia, si iam cum illis agimus, qui non propter istam, sed propter uitam quae post mortem futura est existimant colendos deos, iam nec propter illa saltem, quae deorum talium potestati tamquam dispertita et propria non ratione ueritatis, sed uanitatis opinione tribuuntur, omnino colendi sunt, sicut credunt hi, qui cultum eorum uitae huius mortalis utilitatibus necessarium esse contendunt; contra quos iam quinque praecedentibus uoluminibus satis, quantum potui, disputaui.

Quae cum ita sint, si eorum, qui colerent deam Iuuentatem, aetas ipsa floreret insignius, contemtores autem eius uel intra annos occumberent iuuentutis, uel in ea tamquam senili torpore frigescerent; si malas cultorum suorum speciosius et festiuius Fortuna barbata uestiret, a quibus autem sperneretur, glabros aut male barbatos uideremus: etiam sic rectissime diceremus huc usque istas deas singulas posse, suis officiis quodam modo limitatas, ac per hoc nec a Iuuentate oportere peti uitam aeternam, quae non daret barbam, nec a Fortuna barbata boni aliquid post hanc uitam esse sperandum, cuius in hac uita potestas nulla esset, ut eandem saltem aetatem, quae barba induitur, ipsa praestaret.

Nunc uero cum earum cultus nec propter ista ipsa, quae putant eis subdita, sit necessarius, quia et multi colentes grounds that they are great and exalted, while this is something small and lowly that they would not deign to care for from such a height. Anyone who considers human frailty may justly despise the perishable summits of earthly rule. Even so, those gods have shown themselves to be so utterly unworthy that they seemed unfit to be entrusted with giving and preserving even these.

ENGLISH

And so, as the matters treated in the two preceding books have taught, no god from that crowd, whether from the commoners among the gods, so to speak, or from their nobility, is fit to give mortal kingdoms to mortals. How much less can any of them make immortals out of mortals!

Add to this a further point. We are now dealing with those who think the gods should be worshiped not for the sake of this life but for the life that is to come after death. Yet these gods are not to be worshiped at all, not even for the things assigned to their power as their own parceled-out share—an assignment that rests not on the reckoning of truth but on the opinion of vanity. Only those who maintain that worshiping these gods is necessary for the benefits of this mortal life believe they should be worshiped for such things. Against them I have already argued enough, as far as I could, in the five preceding volumes.

This being so, suppose that those who worshiped the goddess Juventas flourished more remarkably in their youth, while those who scorned her either died within the years of youth or grew cold in it, as if numbed by old age. Suppose that Bearded Fortune clothed the cheeks of her worshipers more handsomely and gracefully, while we saw those who spurned her beardless or poorly bearded. Even then we would be quite right to say that each of these goddesses has power only this far, limited as it were to her own function. We would conclude that eternal life ought not to be asked of Juventas, who could not give a beard. Nor should anything good after this life be hoped for from Bearded Fortune, who in this life would have no power to grant even the age at which the beard appears.[4]

But in fact their worship is not necessary even for the very things thought to be subject to them. Many who worshiped the goddess Juventas did not

LATIN	ENGLISH
Iuuentatem deam minime in illa aetate uiguerunt, et multi non eam colentes gaudent robore iuuentutis, itemque multi Fortunae barbatae supplices ad nullam uel deformem barbam peruenire potuerunt, et si qui eam pro barba inpetranda uenerantur, a barbatis eius contemtoribus inridentur: itane desipit cor humanum, ut, quorum deorum cultum propter ista ipsa temporalia et cito praetereuntia munera, quibus singulis singuli praeesse perhibentur, inanem ludibriosumque cognoscit, propter uitam aeternam credat esse fructuosum? Hanc dare illos posse nec hi dicere ausi sunt, qui eis, ut ab insipientibus populis colerentur, ista opera temporalia, quoniam nimis multos putarunt, ne quisquam eorum sederet otiosus, minutatim diuisa tribuerunt.	thrive at all at that age, and many who do not worship her rejoice in the vigor of youth. Likewise, many who prayed to Bearded Fortune managed to grow no beard at all, or an ugly one, and anyone who venerates her to obtain a beard is laughed at by bearded men who scorn her. Is the human heart so foolish, then? It recognizes that the worship of these gods is empty and ridiculous for the very temporal and quickly passing gifts over which each is said to preside. Will it still believe that this worship bears fruit for eternal life? Not even those who assigned the gods these temporal tasks dared to say they could give eternal life. They wanted the gods to be worshiped by unwise peoples, and because they thought the gods were very many, they divided these tasks into tiny pieces so that none of them would sit idle.

WHAT WE SHOULD BELIEVE VARRO THOUGHT OF THE GODS OF THE NATIONS, WHOSE KINDS AND RITES HE EXPOSED IN SUCH A WAY THAT HE WOULD HAVE TREATED THEM MORE RESPECTFULLY BY SAYING NOTHING ABOUT THEM AT ALL

Varro, the most learned Roman, recorded the gods in a way that exposes them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.2 Quis Marco Varrone curiosius ista quaesiuit? quis inuenit doctius? quis considerauit adtentius? quis distinxit acutius? quis diligentius pleniusque conscripsit? Qui tametsi minus est suauis eloquio, doctrina tamen adque sententiis ita refertus est, ut in omni eruditione, quam nos saecularem, illi autem liberalem uocant, studiosum rerum tantum iste doceat, quantum studiosum uerborum Cicero delectat. Denique et ipse huic tale testimonium perhibet, ut in libris Academicis dicat eam, quae ibi uersatur, disputationem se habuisse cum Marco Varrone, (homine, inquit, omnium facile acutissimo et sine ulla dubitatione doctissimo). Non ait eloquentissimo uel (facundissimo), quoniam re uera in hac facultate multum inpar est; sed omnium, inquit, facile acutissimo, et in eis libris, id est Academicis, ubi cuncta dubitanda esse contendit, addidit sine ulla dubitatione doctissimo.	Who has investigated these things more carefully than Marcus Varro? Who has discovered them more learnedly? Who has considered them more attentively? Who has distinguished them more acutely? Who has written about them more diligently and more fully? He is less pleasing in style. Yet he is so full of learning and ideas that in every branch of learning, which we call secular and they call liberal, he teaches the student of things as much as Cicero delights the student of words. Indeed, Cicero himself bears him such witness in his Academics that he says the discussion recorded there was held with Marcus Varro, "a man," he says, "easily the most acute of all and without any doubt the most learned." He does not say "most eloquent" or "most fluent," since in truth Varro is far from his equal in this faculty. Rather, he says, "easily the most acute of all." And in those very books, the Academics, where he argues that everything should be doubted, he added "without any doubt the most learned."[5]

4 Juventas was the Roman goddess of youth; Fortuna Barbata ("Bearded Fortune") was invoked when young men grew their first beard.

5 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC) was the most learned Roman scholar of his age. Cicero's Academics (45 BC) set out the skeptical philosophy of the Academy.

LATIN

Profecto de hac re sic erat certus, ut auferret dubitationem, quam solet in omnibus adhibere, tamquam de hoc uno etiam pro Academicorum dubitatione disputaturus se Academicum fuisset oblitus. In primo autem libro cum eiusdem Varronis litteraria opera praedicaret: Nos, inquit, in nostra urbe peregrinantes errantesque tamquam hospites tui libri quasi domum reduxerunt, ut possemus aliquando qui et ubi essemus agnoscere. Tu aetatem patriae, tu descriptiones temporum, tu sacrorum iura, tu sacerdotum, tu domesticam, tu publicam disciplinam, tu sedem regionum locorum, tu omnium diuinarum humanarumque rerum nomina genera, officia causas aperuisti.

Iste igitur uir tam insignis excellentisque peritiae et, quod de illo etiam Terentianus elegantissimo uersiculo breuiter ait: Vir doctissimus undecumque Varro, qui tam multa legit, ut aliquid ei scribere uacuisse miremur; tam multa scripsit, quam multa uix quemquam legere potuisse credamus: iste, inquam, uir tantus ingenio tantusque doctrina, si rerum uelut diuinarum, de quibus scribit, obpugnator esset adque destructor easque non ad religionem, sed ad superstitionem diceret pertinere, nescio utrum tam multa in eis ridenda contemnenda detestanda conscriberet.

Cum uero deos eosdem ita coluerit colendosque censuerit, ut in eo ipso opere litterarum suarum dicat se timere ne pereant, non incursu hostili, sed ciuium neglegentia, de qua illos uelut ruina liberari a se dicit et in memoria bonorum per eius modi libros recondi adque seruari utiliore cura, quam qua Metellus de incendio sacra Vestalia et Aeneas de Troiano excidio penates liberasse praedicatur; et tamen ea legenda saeculis prodit, quae a sapientibus et insipientibus merito abicienda et ueritati religionis inimicissima iudicentur: quid existimare debemus nisi hominem acerrimum ac peritissimum, non tamen sancto Spiritu liberum, obpressum fuisse suae ciuitatis consuetudine ac legibus, et tamen ea quibus mouebatur sub specie commendandae religionis tacere noluisse.

ENGLISH

Clearly he was so certain on this point that he dropped the doubt he habitually applies to everything. It was as if, on this one matter, though about to argue for the doubt of the Academics, he had forgotten that he was an Academic. In the first book, praising the literary works of this same Varro, he says: "We were wandering and straying in our own city like strangers, and your books brought us home, as it were, so that at last we could recognize who and where we were. You have revealed the age of our country and the divisions of its chronology. You have revealed the laws of its rites and of its priests, its domestic and public institutions, and the location of its regions and places. You have revealed the names, kinds, functions, and causes of all things divine and human."

Terentianus, in a most elegant little verse, sums up this man of such distinguished and outstanding expertise: "Varro, a man most learned in every field." He read so much that we wonder he had time to write anything. He wrote so much that we can hardly believe anyone could have read it all. Suppose this man, I say, so great in talent and so great in learning, had been an opponent and destroyer of the so-called divine things he writes about. Suppose he had said they belonged not to religion but to superstition. Even then, I do not know whether he would have recorded so many things in them that deserve to be laughed at, despised, and detested.[6]

But in fact he so worshiped these same gods, and held that they should be worshiped, that in this very work he says he fears they may perish, not from enemy attack but from the neglect of the citizens. He says he is rescuing them from this neglect as if from a collapse. Through books of this kind he is storing them away and preserving them in the memory of good men. He claims that his care is more useful than that of Metellus, who is celebrated for rescuing the sacred objects of Vesta from the fire, or of Aeneas, who rescued the household gods from the destruction of Troy. And yet he hands down for the ages to read things that the wise and the unwise alike would rightly judge must be rejected as most hostile to the truth of religion. What should we think, then? This most acute and learned man was not set free by the 6 Terentianus Maurus was a Latin grammarian and poet who wrote a verse treatise on meter (late 2nd or 3rd century AD).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	Holy Spirit, and so he was oppressed by the custom and laws of his city. Yet, under the pretext of commending religion, he was unwilling to keep silent about the things that troubled him.[7]

HOW VARRO DIVIDED HIS BOOKS ON THE ANTIQUITIES OF HUMAN AND DIVINE THINGS

Varro's Antiquities treated human matters before divine ones, in forty-one books.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.3 Quadraginta et unum libros scripsit antiquitatum; hos in res humanas diuinasque diuisit, rebus humanis uiginti quinque, diuinis sedecim tribuit, istam secutus in ea partitione rationem, ut rerum humanarum libros senos quattuor partibus daret. Intendit enim qui agant, ubi agant, quando agant, quid agant. In sex itaque primis de hominibus scripsit, in secundis sex de locis, sex tertios de temporibus, sex quartos eosdemque postremos de rebus absoluit. Quater autem seni uiginti et quattuor fiunt. Sed unum singularem, qui communiter prius de omnibus loqueretur, in capite posuit. In diuinis identidem rebus eadem ab illo diuisionis forma seruata est, quantum adtinet ad ea, quae dis exhibenda sunt. Exhibentur enim ab hominibus in locis et temporibus sacra.	He wrote forty-one books of Antiquities. He divided them into human and divine matters, assigning twenty-five books to human matters and sixteen to divine. In this division he followed a plan: he gave six books to each of four parts of human matters, because he attends to who acts, where they act, when they act, and what they do. So he wrote about people in the first six books and about places in the second six. He devoted the third six to times and the fourth and last six to things. Four times six makes twenty-four. But at the head he placed a single separate book, which would first speak about all of them in general. In the divine matters he kept the same form of division, as far as it concerns what is to be offered to the gods. For rites are offered by human beings, in places and at times.[8]
Haec quattuor, quae dixi, libris conplexus est ternis: nam tres priores de hominibus scripsit, sequentes de locis, tertios de temporibus, quartos de sacris, etiam hic, qui exhibeant, ubi exhibeant, quando exhibeant, quid exhibeant, subtilissima distinctione commendans. Sed quia oportebat dicere et maxime id expectabatur, quibus exhibeant, de ipsis quoque dis tres conscripsit extremos, ut quinquies terni quindecim fierent. Sunt autem omnes, ut diximus, sedecim, quia et istorum exordio unum singularem, qui prius de omnibus loqueretur, adposuit.	He covered these four things I have mentioned in three books each. He wrote the first three about people, the next three about places, the third set about times, and the fourth about rites. Here too, with the most subtle distinction, he set out who offers, where they offer, when they offer, and what they offer. But he also had to say, and this was most expected, to whom they offer. So he wrote the last three about the gods themselves, which made five times three, or fifteen. Yet there are sixteen in all, as we said, because at the start of these too he placed a single separate book that would first speak about all of them.
Quo absoluto consequenter ex illa quinquepertita distributione tres praecedentes, qui ad homines pertinent, ita subdiuisit, ut primus sit de pontificibus, secundus de auguribus, tertius de quindecimuiris sacrorum; secundos tres ad loca pertinentes, ita ut in uno eorum de sacellis, altero de sacris aedibus diceret, tertio	Having finished this, he went on to subdivide that fivefold arrangement. The first three books, which concern people, he divided so that the first is on the pontiffs, the second on the augurs, and the third on the Board of Fifteen for sacred rites. The second three, which concern places, he arranged

7 Lucius Caecilius Metellus, chief priest, saved the sacred objects from the burning temple of Vesta in 241 BC. Aeneas, in legend, carried Troy's household gods (the Penates) to Italy.

8 Varro's Antiquities of Human and Divine Things, now lost, survives largely through Augustine's quotations.

LATIN	ENGLISH
de locis religiosis; tres porro, qui istos sequuntur et ad tempora pertinent, id est ad dies festos, ita ut unum eorum faceret de feriis, alterum de ludis circensibus, de scaenicis tertium; quartorum trium ad sacra pertinentium uni dedit consecrationes, alteri sacra priuata, ultimo publica. Hanc uelut pompam obsequiorum in tribus, qui restant, di ipsi sequuntur extremi, quibus iste uniuersus cultus inpensus est: in primo di certi, in secundo incerti, in tertio cunctorum nouissimo di praecipui adque selecti.	so that one deals with shrines, another with sacred temples, and the third with religious places. The three that follow concern times, that is, feast days. Of these he made one on holidays, another on the circus games, and the third on theatrical shows. Of the fourth three, which concern rites, he gave one to consecrations, another to private rites, and the last to public ones. In the three that remain, the gods themselves come last, following this procession of observances, as it were, for all this worship was offered to them. The first deals with the certain gods, the second with the uncertain gods, and the third and last of all with the principal and select gods.[9]

THAT FROM VARRO'S ACCOUNT, AMONG THE WORSHIPERS OF THE GODS, HUMAN THINGS ARE FOUND TO BE OLDER THAN DIVINE THINGS

Varro put human things first because the divine things he described were human inventions.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.4 In hac tota serie pulcherrimae ac subtilissimae distributionis et distinctionis uitam aeternam frustra quaeri et sperari inpudentissime uel optari, ex his, quae iam diximus et quae deinceps dicenda sunt, cuiuis hominum, qui corde obstinato sibi non fuerit inimicus, facillime apparet. Vel hominum enim sunt ista instituta uel daemonum, non quales uocant illi daemones bonos, sed, ut loquar apertius, inmundorum spirituum et sine controuersia malignorum, qui noxias opiniones, quibus anima humana magis magisque uanescat et incommutabili aeternaeque ueritati coaptari adque inhaerere non possit, inuidentia mirabili et occulte inserunt cogitationibus inpiorum et aperte aliquando ingerunt sensibus et qua possunt fallaci adtestatione confirmant. Iste ipse Varro propterea se prius de rebus humanis, de diuinis autem postea scripsisse testatur, quod prius extiterint ciuitates, deinde ab eis haec instituta sint.	Anyone who has not become his own enemy through an obstinate heart can easily see what follows from what we have already said and what is still to be said. In this entire series, with its most beautiful and subtle arrangement and distinction, eternal life is sought in vain, and only the most shameless would hope for it or even desire it. For these are the institutions either of human beings or of demons. By demons I do not mean the kind they call good. To speak more plainly, I mean unclean spirits that are beyond dispute evil. With astonishing envy these spirits secretly plant harmful opinions in the thoughts of the impious, and sometimes openly thrust them upon their senses. Through these opinions the human soul grows more and more empty and cannot be fitted to the unchangeable and eternal truth or cling to it. The spirits confirm such opinions with deceptive testimony wherever they can. This same Varro testifies that he wrote first about human matters and afterward about divine ones because cities came into being first, and then these things were instituted by them.
Vera autem religio non a terrena aliqua ciuitate instituta est, sed plane caelestem ipsa instituit ciuitatem. Eam	But the true religion was not instituted by some earthly city. On the contrary, it is the true religion that instituted the heavenly city. And it is the true 9 The Board of Fifteen (quindecimviri) kept and consulted the Sibylline Books. Varro's "certain" gods were those whose nature and functions were known; the "uncertain" were those he was unsure about.

LATIN

uero inspirat et docet uerus Deus, dator uitae aeternae, ueris cultoribus suis.

Varronis igitur confitentis ideo se prius de rebus humanis scripsisse, postea de diuinis, quia diuinae istae ab hominibus institutae sunt, haec ratio est: Sicut prior est, inquit, pictor quam tabula picta, prior faber quam aedificium: ita priores sunt ciuitates quam ea, quae a ciuitatibus instituta sunt. Dicit autem prius se scripturum fuisse de dis, postea de hominibus, si de omni natura deorum scriberet, quasi hic de aliqua scribat et non de omni, aut uero etiam aliqua, licet non omnis, deorum natura non prior debeat esse quam hominum. Quid, quod in illis tribus nouissimis libris deos certos et incertos et selectos diligenter explicans nullam deorum naturam praetermittere uidetur?

Quid est ergo, quod ait: Si de omni natura deorum et hominum scriberemus, prius diuina absoluissemus, quam humana adtigissemus? Aut enim de omni natura deorum scribit, aut de aliqua, aut omnino de nulla. Si de omni, praeponenda utique est rebus humanis; si de aliqua, quur non etiam ipsa res praecedat humanas? An indigna est praeferri etiam uniuersae naturae hominum pars aliqua deorum? Quod si multum est, ut aliqua pars diuina praeponatur uniuersis rebus humanis, saltem digna est uel Romanis.

Rerum quippe humanarum libros, non quantum ad orbem terrarum, sed quantum ad solam Romam pertinet, scripsit, quos tamen rerum diuinarum libris se dixit scribendi ordine merito praetulisse, sicut pictorem tabulae pictae, sicut fabrum aedificio, apertissime confitens, quod etiam istae res diuinae, sicut pictura, sicut structura, ab hominibus institutae sint. Restat ut de nulla deorum natura scripsisse intellegatur, neque hoc aperte dicere uoluisse, sed intellegentibus reliquisse. Ubi enim dicitur non omnis, usitate quidem intellegitur aliqua; sed potest intellegi et nulla, quoniam quae nulla est nec omnis nec aliqua est.

ENGLISH

God, the giver of eternal life, who inspires it in his true worshipers and teaches it to them.

Varro, then, admits that he wrote first about human matters and later about divine ones because these divine matters were instituted by human beings. This is his reasoning: "Just as the painter comes before the painted panel," he says, "and the builder before the building, so cities come before the things instituted by cities." He also says that he would have written first about the gods and afterward about human beings if he were writing about the whole nature of the gods. This implies that here he is writing about some of it and not the whole. Or it implies that even some part of the nature of the gods, though not the whole, ought not to come before that of human beings. And what about the fact that in those last three books, carefully explaining the certain, uncertain, and select gods, he seems to leave out no nature of the gods at all?

What, then, does he mean when he says: "If we were writing about the whole nature of gods and men, we would have finished with the divine before touching on the human"? He writes about the whole nature of the gods, or about some of it, or about none at all. If he writes about the whole, it must certainly be placed before human matters. If about some, why should that part not also precede human matters? Or is some part of the gods unworthy to be preferred even to the entire nature of human beings? And if it is too much for some divine part to be placed before all human matters, at least it is worthy to be placed before Roman ones.

For he wrote his books on human matters as they concern Rome alone, not the whole world. Yet he said he had rightly placed them before the books on divine matters in the order of writing, as the painter comes before the painted panel and the builder before the building. In this he most openly admits that these divine matters too were instituted by human beings, like a painting or a structure. It remains, then, to conclude that he wrote about no nature of the gods at all. He did not wish to say this openly but left it for those who understand. For "not the whole" is usually understood to mean "some," but it can also mean "none." After all, what is none is neither the whole nor some.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nam, ut ipse dicit, si omnis esset natura deorum, de qua scriberet, scribendi ordine rebus humanis praeponenda esset; ut autem et ipso tacente ueritas clamat, praeponenda esset certe rebus Romanis, etiamsi non omnis, sed saltem aliqua esset: recte autem postponitur; ergo nulla est. Non itaque rebus diuinis anteferre uoluit res humanas, sed rebus ueris noluit anteferre res falsas. In his enim, quae scripsit de rebus humanis, secutus est historiam rerum gestarum; quae autem de his, quas diuinas uocat, quid nisi opiniones rerum uanarum? Hoc est nimirum, quod uoluit subtili significatione monstrare, non solum scribens de his posterius quam de illis, sed etiam rationem reddens quur id fecerit. Quam si tacuisset, aliter hoc factum eius ab aliis fortasse defenderetur.	As he himself says, if it were the whole nature of the gods he was writing about, it would have to come before human matters in the order of writing. And as truth cries out even though he is silent, it would certainly have to come before Roman matters even if it were not the whole but at least some of it. But it is rightly placed after them; therefore it is none. So he did not wish to put human things before divine things; rather, he refused to put false things before true ones. In what he wrote about human matters he followed the history of actual events. But in what he wrote about the matters he calls divine, what did he follow but opinions about empty things? This, no doubt, is what he wished to show by a subtle hint. He not only wrote about the one after the other but also gave the reason why he did so. Had he kept silent about that reason, others might perhaps have defended what he did in some other way.
In ea uero ipsa ratione, quam reddidit, nec aliis quidquam reliquit pro arbitrio suspicari et satis probauit homines se praeposuisse institutis hominum, non naturam hominum naturae deorum. Ita se libros rerum diuinarum non de ueritate quae pertinet ad naturam, sed de falsitate quae pertinet ad errorem scripsisse confessus est. Quod apertius alibi posuit, sicut in quarto libro commemoraui, ex naturae formula se scripturum fuisse, si nouam ipse conderet ciuitatem; quia uero iam ueterem inuenerat, non se potuisse nisi eius consuetudinem sequi.	But in the very reason he gave, he left others nothing to conjecture as they pleased. He showed clearly enough that what he placed first was human beings ahead of human institutions, not human nature ahead of the nature of the gods. He thus admitted that he wrote his books on divine matters about the falsehood that belongs to error, not about the truth that belongs to nature. He said this more openly elsewhere, as I mentioned in the fourth book. There he said he would have written according to the pattern of nature if he were founding a new city himself. But since he had found an old one already in place, he could only follow its custom.

THE THREE KINDS OF THEOLOGY ACCORDING TO VARRO: THE MYTHICAL, THE NATURAL, AND THE CIVIL

Varro distinguishes mythical, natural and civil theology, faulting only the mythical.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.5 Deinde illud quale est, quod tria genera theologiae dicit esse, id est rationis quae de dis explicatur, eorumque unum mythicon, alterum physicon, tertium ciuile? Latine si usus admitteret, genus, quod primum posuit, fabulare appellaremus; sed fabulosum dicamus; a fabulis enim mythicon dictum est, quoniam μῦθος Graece fabula dicitur. Secundum autem ut naturale dicatur, iam et consuetudo locutionis admittit. Tertium etiam ipse Latine enuntiauit, quod ciuile appellatur. Deinde ait: Mythicon	Next, what are we to make of his claim that there are three kinds of theology, that is, of the account given of the gods? One of them, he says, is called mythicon, the second physicon, the third civil. If Latin usage allowed it, we would call the kind he put first fabularis [fabular]; but let us say fabulosum [mythical]. For mythicon takes its name from fables, since μῦθος [mythos] is the Greek for a fable. That the second should be called "natural" is appellant, quo maxime utuntur poetae; physicon, quo philosophi; ciuile, quo populi. Primum, inquit, quod dixi, in eo sunt multa contra dignitatem et naturam inmortalium ficta.

LATIN

ENGLISH

something ordinary speech already allows. The third, called civil, he himself expressed in Latin. Then he says: "They call 'mythical' the kind that the poets chiefly use, 'physical' the kind the philosophers use, 'civil' the kind the peoples use. In the first kind I mentioned," he says, "there are many fictions contrary to the dignity and nature of the immortals.

In hoc enim est, ut deus alius ex capite, alius ex femore sit, alius ex guttis sanguinis natus: in hoc, ut di furati sint, ut adulterarint, ut seruierint homini; denique in hoc omnia dis adtribuuntur, quae non modo in hominem, sed etiam quae in contemtissimum hominem cadere possunt. Hic certe ubi potuit, ubi ausus est, ubi inpunitum putauit, quanta mendacissimis fabulis naturae deorum fieret iniuria, sine caligine ullius ambiguitatis expressit. Loquebatur enim non de naturali theologia, non de ciuili, sed de fabulosa, quam libere a se putauit esse culpandam.

For in it we find that one god was born from a head, another from a thigh, another from drops of blood. In it we find that gods stole, committed adultery and were slaves to a human being. In short, in it everything is attributed to the gods that can happen not only to a human being but even to the most despised human being." Here at least, where he could, where he dared, where he thought he could do it with impunity, he stated without the fog of any ambiguity how great a wrong was done to the nature of the gods by utterly lying fables. For he was speaking not of natural theology, nor of civil theology, but of mythical theology, which he thought he was free to criticize.[10]

Videamus quid de altera dicat. Secundum genus est, inquit, quod demonstraui, de quo multos libros philosophi reliquerunt; in quibus est, di qui sint, ubi, quod genus, quale; a quodam tempore an a sempiterno fuerint di; ex igni sint, ut credit Heraclitus, an ex numeris, ut Pythagoras, an ex atomis, ut ait Epicurus. Sic alia, quae facilius intra parietes in schola quam extra in foro ferre possunt aures. Nihil in hoc genere culpauit, quod physicon uocant et ad philosophos pertinet, tantum quod eorum inter se controuersias commemorauit, per quos facta est dissidentium multitudo sectarum. Remouit tamen hoc genus a foro, id est a populis; scholis uero et parietibus clausit.

Let us see what he says about the second kind. "The second kind I have pointed out," he says, "is the one on which the philosophers have left many books. In them is discussed who the gods are, where they are, of what kind and of what character they are. Have the gods existed from a certain time or from eternity? Are they made of fire, as Heraclitus believes, or of numbers, as Pythagoras does, or of atoms, as Epicurus says? And so with other questions, which ears can bear more easily inside the walls of a school than outside in the forum." He found no fault with this kind, which they call physical and which belongs to the philosophers. He only mentioned their controversies with one another, which have produced a multitude of dissenting sects. Yet he removed this kind from the forum, that is, from the peoples, and shut it up within schools and their walls.[11]

Illud autem primum mendacissimum adque turpissimum a ciuitatibus non remouit, o religiosas aures populares adque in his etiam Romanas! Quod de dis inmortalibus philosophi disputant, ferre non possunt; quod uero

But that first kind, utterly lying and utterly shameful, he did not remove from the cities. Oh, the religious ears of the populace—the Roman ones among them! What the philosophers argue about 10 Minerva sprang from Jupiter's head and Bacchus from his thigh; in Greek myth the Furies and the Giants were born from drops of the blood of the castrated Uranus.

11 Heraclitus, Pythagoras and Epicurus were Greek philosophers of the sixth to third centuries BC.

LATIN

poetae canunt et histriones agunt, quia contra dignitatem ac naturam inmortalium ficta sunt, quia non modo in hominem, sed etiam in contemtissimum hominem cadere possunt, non solum ferunt, sed etiam libenter audiunt. Neque id tantum, sed dis quoque ipsis haec placere et per haec eos placandos esse decernunt.

Dixerit aliquis: Haec duo genera mythicon et physicon, id est fabulosum adque naturale, discernamus ab hoc ciuili, de quo nunc agitur, unde illa et ipse discreuit, iamque ipsum ciuile uideamus qualiter explicet. Video quidem, quur debeat discerni fabulosum: quia falsum, quia turpe, quia indignum est. Naturale autem a ciuili uelle discernere quid est aliud quam etiam ipsum ciuile fateri esse mendosum? Si enim illud naturale est, quid habet reprehensionis, ut excludatur? Si autem hoc quod ciuile dicitur naturale non est, quid habet meriti, ut admittatur? Haec nempe illa causa est, quare prius scripserit de rebus humanis, posterius de diuinis, quoniam in diuinis rebus non naturam, sed hominum instituta secutus est. Intueamur sane et ciuilem theologian.

Tertium genus est, inquit, quod in urbibus ciues, maxime sacerdotes, nosse adque administrare debent. In quo est, quos deos publice, quae sacra ac sacrificia colere et facere quemque par sit Adhuc quod sequitur adtendamus. Trima, inquit, theologia maxime adcommodata est ad theatrum, secunda ad mundum, tertia ad urbem. Quis non uideat, cui palmam dederit? Utique secundae, quam supra dixit esse philosophorum. Hanc enim pertinere testatur ad mundum, quo isti nihil esse excellentius opinantur in rebus. Duas uero illas theologias, primam et tertiam, theatri scilicet adque urbis, distinxit an iunxit?

Videmus enim non continuo, quod est urbis, pertinere posse et ad mundum, quamuis urbes esse uideamus in mundo; fieri enim potest, ut in urbe secundum falsas opiniones ea colantur et ea credantur, quorum in mundo uel extra mundum natura sit nusquam: theatrum uero the immortal gods they cannot bear. But what the poets sing and the actors perform—things that are fictions contrary to the dignity and nature of the immortals, things that can happen not only to a human being but even to the most despised human being—these they not only bear but even listen to gladly. And not only that: they also decree that these things please the gods themselves, and that it is by these things that the gods must be appeased.

ENGLISH

Someone may say: "Let us separate these two kinds, the mythicon and the physicon, that is, the mythical and the natural, from this civil kind that is now our subject, just as he himself separated them; and now let us see how he explains the civil kind itself." I do see why the mythical kind should be separated: because it is false, because it is shameful, because it is unworthy. But to want to separate the natural from the civil—what is that but to admit that the civil itself is faulty? For if the former is natural, what is there to blame in it, that it should be excluded? And if this one, called civil, is not natural, what merit does it have, that it should be admitted? This, of course, is the very reason why he wrote first about human things and afterward about divine things: in divine things he followed not nature but the institutions of human beings. Still, let us take a look at civil theology too.

"The third kind," he says, "is the one that citizens in cities, and above all priests, ought to know and administer. It covers which gods are to be worshiped publicly, and which rites and sacrifices it is proper for each person to perform." Let us also attend to what follows. "The first theology," he says, "is especially suited to the theater, the second to the world, the third to the city." Who does not see to which he has given the palm? To the second, of course, which he said above belongs to the philosophers. For he testifies that it pertains to the world, and these people think that nothing in existence is more excellent than the world. But those two theologies, the first and the third—that is, of the theater and of the city—did he distinguish them or join them?

For we see that what belongs to the city cannot automatically pertain to the world as well, even though we see that cities are in the world. It can happen, after all, that in a city, following false

LATIN	ENGLISH
ubi est nisi in urbe? Quis theatrum instituit nisi ciuitas? Propter quid instituit nisi propter ludos scaenicos? Ubi sunt ludi scaenici nisi in rebus diuinis, de quibus hi libri tanta sollertia conscribuntur?	opinions, things are worshiped and believed whose nature exists nowhere, either in the world or outside it. But where is the theater, if not in the city? Who established the theater, if not the city? For what purpose did it establish it, if not for theatrical shows? And where do theatrical shows belong, if not among the divine things about which these books are written with such great skill?

MYTHICAL (THAT IS, FABULOUS) THEOLOGY, AND CIVIL THEOLOGY, AGAINST VARRO

Mythical and civil theology are equally shameful, and neither can give eternal life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.6 Marce Varro, cum sis homo omnium acutissimus et sine ulla dubitatione doctissimus, sed tamen homo, non Deus, nec spiritu Dei ad uidenda et adnuntianda diuina in ueritatem libertatemque subuectus, cernis quidem quam sint res diuinae ab humanis nugis adque mendaciis dirimendae; sed uitiosissimas populorum opiniones et consuetudines in superstitionibus publicis uereris offendere, quas ab deorum natura abhorrere uel talium, quales in huius mundi elementis humani animi suspicatur infirmitas, et sentis ipse, cum eas usquequaque consideras, et omnis uestra litteratura circumsonat. Quid hic agit humanum quamuis excellentissimum ingenium? Quid tibi humana licet multiplex ingensque doctrina in his angustiis suffragatur? Naturales deos colere cupis, ciuiles cogeris. Inuenisti alios fabulosos, in quos liberius quod sentis euomas, unde et istos ciuiles uelis nolisue perfundas.	Marcus Varro, you are the sharpest of all men and, beyond any doubt, the most learned. Yet you are a man, not God, and you have not been lifted up by the Spirit of God into truth and freedom to see and proclaim divine things. You do see how necessary it is to separate divine things from human trifles and lies. But you are afraid to offend the thoroughly corrupt opinions and customs of the peoples in their public superstitions. You yourself feel, whenever you examine them from every side, that they are utterly at odds with the nature of the gods—even of such gods as the weakness of the human mind imagines to be in the elements of this world—and all your literature resounds with it. What can human genius, however outstanding, do here? What help is your human learning, however varied and vast, to you in these straits? You long to worship the natural gods; you are forced to worship the civil ones. You have found other gods, the mythical ones, at whom you can more freely spew out what you think—and with it, willing or not, you drench these civil gods too.
Dicis quippe fabulosos adcommodatos esse ad theatrum, naturales ad mundum, ciuiles ad urbem, cum mundus opus sit diuinum, urbes uero et theatra opera sint hominum, nec alii derideantur in theatris, quam qui adorantur in templis, nec aliis ludos exhibeatis, quam quibus uictimas immolatis. Quanto liberius subtiliusque ista diuideres, dicens alios esse deos naturales, alios ab hominibus institutos, sed de institutis aliud habere litteras poetarum, aliud sacerdotum, utrasque tamen ita esse inter se amicas consortio falsitatis, ut gratae sint utraeque daemonibus, quibus doctrina inimica est ueritatis! Sequestrata igitur paululum theologia, quam naturalem uocant, de qua postea disserendum est, placetne tandem uitam aeternam peti aut sperari ab dis	For you say that the mythical gods are suited to the theater, the natural to the world, the civil to the city. Yet the world is a divine work, while cities and theaters are human works. And the gods laughed at in the theaters are no other than those adored in the temples, and you put on games for no other gods than those to whom you sacrifice victims. How much more freely and more subtly you would have divided these things if you had said that some gods are natural and others established by human beings! You could have added that, concerning the established gods, the writings of the poets say one thing and those of the priests another, yet both are so friendly with each other poeticis theatricis, ludicris scaenicis? Absit; immo auertat Deus uerus tam inmanem sacrilegamque dementiam. Quid?

LATIN

ab eis dis, quibus haec placent et quos haec placant, cum eorum illic crimina frequententur, uita aeterna poscenda est? Nemo, ut arbitror, usque ad tantum praecipitium furiosissimae inpietatis insanit. Nec fabulosa igitur nec ciuili theologia sempiternam quisquam adipiscitur uitam. Illa enim de dis turpia fingendo seminat, haec fauendo metit; illa mendacia spargit, haec colligit; illa res diuinas falsis criminibus insectatur, haec eorum criminum ludos in diuinis rebus amplectitur; illa de dis nefanda figmenta hominum carminibus personat, haec ea deorum ipsorum festiuitatibus consecrat; facinora et flagitia numinum illa cantat, haec amat; illa prodit aut fingit, haec autem aut adtestatur ueris aut oblectatur et falsis. Ambae turpes ambaeque damnabiles; sed illa, quae theatrica est, publicam turpitudinem profitetur; ista, quae urbana est, illius turpitudine ornatur.

Hincine uita aeterna sperabitur, unde ista breuis temporalisque polluitur? An uero uitam polluit consortium nefariorum hominum, si se inserant adfectionibus et adsensionibus nostris, et uitam non polluit societas daemonum, qui coluntur criminibus suis? Si ueris, quam mali! si falsis, quam male!

Haec cum dicimus, uideri fortasse cuipiam nimis harum rerum ignaro potest ea sola de dis talibus maiestati indigna diuinae et ridicula detestabilia, celebrari, quae poeticis cantantur carminibus et ludis scaenicis actitantur; sacra uero illa, quae non histriones, sed sacerdotes agunt, ab omni esse dedecore purgata et aliena. Hoc si ita esset, numquam theatricas turpitudines in eorum honorem quisquam celebrandas esse censeret, numquam eas ipsi di praeciperent sibimet exhiberi. Sed in their partnership in falsehood that both are pleasing to the demons, to whom the teaching of truth is hostile. Setting aside for a little, then, the theology they call natural, which must be discussed later, do we really accept that eternal life is to be sought or hoped for from the gods of poetry and theater, of games and the stage? Far from it! Rather, may the true God avert such monstrous and sacrilegious madness. What?

ENGLISH

Is eternal life to be asked of those gods whom these things please and whom these things appease, when their crimes are rehearsed there again and again? No one, I think, is so insane as to plunge to such a precipice of raving impiety. So neither by mythical nor by civil theology does anyone attain everlasting life. For the one sows by inventing shameful things about the gods; the other reaps by approving them. The one scatters lies; the other gathers them up. The one assails divine things with false crimes; the other embraces the shows of those crimes among its divine things. The one makes human songs ring with wicked fictions about the gods; the other consecrates those fictions in the festivals of the gods themselves. The one sings the crimes and outrages of the deities; the other loves them. The one reveals or invents them; the other either bears witness to them if true or takes delight in them even if false. Both are shameful and both are damnable. But the theatrical one openly professes public shamefulness, while the urban one decks itself out with the other's shamefulness.

Is eternal life to be hoped for from the very source that pollutes this brief and temporal life? Or does association with wicked men pollute our life if they worm their way into our affections and our assent, while fellowship with demons, who are worshiped with their own crimes, does not pollute it? If the crimes are real, how bad the demons! If invented, how badly they are worshiped!

When we say this, it may perhaps seem to someone quite ignorant of these matters that the only things celebrated about such gods that are unworthy of divine majesty, ridiculous and detestable, are those sung in the poets' songs and acted out in theatrical shows, while the rites performed not by actors but by priests are purified of and free from all disgrace. If that were so, no one

LATIN	ENGLISH
ideo nihil pudet ad obsequium deorum talia gerere in theatris, quia similia geruntur in templis. Denique cum memoratus auctor ciuilem theologian a fabulosa et naturali tertiam quandam sui generis distinguere conaretur, magis eam ex utraque temperatam quam ab utraque separatam intellegi uoluit.	would ever have decided that theatrical obscenities should be celebrated in their honor, and the gods themselves would never have commanded that these be put on for them. But people feel no shame at doing such things in the theaters in deference to the gods precisely because similar things are done in the temples. In short, when the author I have mentioned tried to distinguish civil theology as a third kind of its own, apart from the mythical and the natural, he wanted it to be understood as a blend of both rather than as separate from both.
Ait enim ea, quae scribunt poetae, minus esse quam ut populi sequi debeant; quae autem philosophi, plus quam ut ea uulgum scrutari expediat. Quae sic abhorrent, inquit, ut tamen ex utroque genere ad ciuiles rationes adsumta sint non pauca. Quare quae erunt communia, una cum propriis ciuilibus scribemus; e quibus maior societas debet esse nobis cum philosophis quam cum poetis. Non ergo ulla cum poetis. Et tamen alio loco dicit de generationibus deorum magis ad poetas quam ad physicos fuisse populos inclinatos. Hic enim dixit quid fieri debeat, ibi quid fiat. Physicos dixit utilitatis causa scripsisse, poetas delectationis. Ac per hoc ea, quae a poetis conscripta populi sequi non debent, crimina sunt deorum, quae tamen delectant et populos et deos.	For he says that what the poets write is less than the peoples ought to follow, while what the philosophers write is more than it is expedient for the common people to investigate. "These are so much at odds," he says, "that nevertheless not a few things have been taken from both kinds into civil doctrine. Therefore we shall write about what they have in common together with what is properly civil; and in this our fellowship ought to be greater with the philosophers than with the poets." So there is to be none with the poets. And yet elsewhere he says that, as regards the generations of the gods, the peoples have been more inclined toward the poets than toward the natural philosophers. Here he said what ought to happen; there, what does happen. He said that the natural philosophers wrote for the sake of usefulness, the poets for the sake of delight. Consequently, what the poets have written and the peoples ought not to follow are the crimes of the gods—which nevertheless delight both the peoples and the gods.
Delectationis enim causa, sicut dicit, scribunt poetae, non utilitatis; ea tamen scribunt, quae di expetant, populi exhibeant.	For the poets write, as he says, for the sake of delight, not of usefulness; yet what they write is what the gods demand and the peoples put on.

THE LIKENESS AND AGREEMENT OF MYTHICAL AND CIVIL THEOLOGY

The mythical theology of the theater is part of Rome's civil theology.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.7 Reuocatur igitur ad theologian ciuilem theologia fabulosa theatrica scaenica, indignitatis et turpitudinis plena, et haec tota, quae merito culpanda et respuenda iudicatur, pars huius est, quae colenda et obseruanda censetur; non sane pars incongrua, sicut ostendere institui, et quae ab uniuerso corpore aliena inportune illi conexa adque suspensa sit, sed omnino consona et tamquam eiusdem corporis membrum conuenientissime copulata. Quid	So mythical theology—theatrical, made for the stage, full of indignity and shamefulness—is brought back into civil theology. And this whole theology, which is rightly judged to deserve censure and rejection, is part of the one that is deemed worthy of worship and observance. Nor is it, as I have set out to show, an incongruous part, alien to the whole body and awkwardly attached

LATIN	ENGLISH
enim aliud ostendunt illa simulacra formae aetates sexus habitus deorum? Numquid barbatum Iouem, inberbem Mercurium poetae habent, pontifices non habent? Numquid Priapo mimi, non etiam sacerdotes enormia pudenda fecerunt? An aliter stat adorandus in locis sacris, quam procedit ridendus in theatris? Num Saturnus senex, Apollo ephebus ita personae sunt histrionum, ut non sint statuae delubrorum?	and hung onto it. Rather, it is entirely in harmony with it and joined to it most fittingly, like a limb of the same body. For what else do those images show, with the forms, ages, sexes and dress of the gods? Do the poets have a bearded Jupiter and a beardless Mercury, and the pontiffs not? Was it the mimes who gave Priapus enormous genitals, and not the priests as well? Does he stand to be worshiped in holy places any differently from how he comes on to be laughed at in the theaters? Are old Saturn and the youthful Apollo characters played by actors in such a way that they are not also statues in the shrines?
Quur Forculus, qui foribus praeest, et Limentinus, qui limini, di sunt masculi, adque inter hos Cardea femina est, quae cardinem seruat? Nonne ista in rerum diuinarum libris reperiuntur, quae graues poetae suis carminibus indigna duxerunt? Numquid Diana theatrica portat arma et urbana simpliciter uirgo est? Numquid scaenicus Apollo citharista est et ab hac arte Delphicus uacat? Sed haec honestiora sunt in conparatione turpiorum. Quid de ipso Ioue senserunt, qui eius nutricem in Capitolio posuerunt? Nonne adtestati sunt Euemero, qui omnes tales deos non fabulosa garrulitate, sed historica diligentia homines fuisse mortalesque conscripsit? Epulones etiam deos, parasitos Iouis, ad eius mensam qui constituerunt, quid aliud quam mimica sacra esse uoluerunt? Nam parasitos Iouis ad conuiuium eius adhibitos si mimus dixisset, utique risum quaesisse uideretur. Varro dixit!	Why are Forculus, who presides over doors (fores), and Limentinus, who presides over the threshold (limen), male gods, while between them Cardea, who guards the hinge (cardo), is female? Are not these things, which serious poets judged unworthy of their verses, found in the books on divine things? Does the Diana of the theater carry weapons, while the Diana of the city is simply a virgin? Is the Apollo of the stage a lyre player, while the Apollo of Delphi has nothing to do with that art? But these things are respectable compared with the more shameful ones. What did they think of Jupiter himself, those who set up his nurse on the Capitol? Did they not bear witness in favor of Euhemerus, who wrote, not with the chatter of fable but with the diligence of history, that all such gods had been human beings and mortals? And those who placed gods at Jupiter's table as banqueters (epulones), his hangers-on (parasiti) —what else did they intend than that the rites be a farce? For if a mime had said that Jupiter's hangers-on were invited to his banquet, he would certainly seem to have been angling for a laugh. Varro said it![12]
non cum inrideret deos, sed cum commendaret hoc dixit; diuinarum, non humanarum rerum libri hoc eum scripsisse testantur, nec ubi ludos scaenicos exponebat, sed ubi Capitolina iura pandebat. Denique talibus uincitur et fatetur, sicut forma humana deos fecerunt, ita eos delectari humanis uoluptatibus credidisse.	And he said it not when mocking the gods but when commending them. The books on divine, not human, things testify that he wrote this, and not where he was describing theatrical shows, but where he was setting out the laws of the Capitol. In short, he is overcome by such facts and admits that, just as they made the gods in human form, so they believed that the gods took delight in human pleasures.

12 Euhemerus (c. 300 BC) was a Greek writer who held that the gods were deified human beings. The Epulones were the Roman priestly board that prepared Jupiter's sacred banquet; the "parasite," or hanger-on, was a stock comic character.

LATIN

Non enim et maligni spiritus suo negotio defuerunt, ut has noxias opiniones humanarum mentium ludificatione firmarent. Unde etiam illud est, quod Herculis aedituus otiosus adque feriatus lusit tesseris secum utraque manu alternante, in una constituens Herculem, in altera se ipsum, sub ea condicione, ut, si ipse uicisset, de stipe templi sibi cenam pararet amicamque conduceret; si autem uictoria Herculis fieret, hoc idem de pecunia sua uoluptati Herculis exhiberet; deinde cum a se ipso tamquam ab Hercule uictus esset, debitam cenam et nobilissimam meretricem Larentinam deo Herculi dedit. At illa cum dormisset in templo, uidit in somnis Herculem sibi esse commixtum sibique dixisse, quod inde discedens, cui primum iuueni obuia fieret, aput illum esset inuentura mercedem, quam sibi credere deberet ab Hercule persolutam.

ENGLISH

For the evil spirits, too, did not fail to do their part, confirming these harmful opinions by making sport of human minds. Hence comes that story about the temple keeper of Hercules. Idle and on holiday, he played dice by himself, alternating hands, assigning Hercules to one hand and himself to the other. The condition was that if he won, he would buy himself a dinner from the temple funds and hire a mistress; but if the victory went to Hercules, he would provide the same, out of his own money, for Hercules' pleasure. Then, when he had been beaten by himself as if by Hercules, he gave the god Hercules the dinner he owed and the most celebrated courtesan, Larentina. She slept in the temple and saw in a dream that Hercules had had intercourse with her. He told her that when she left, she would find her payment with the first young man she met, and that she should believe it had been paid to her by Hercules.[13]

Ac sic abeunti cum primus iuuenis ditissimus Tarutius occurrisset eamque dilectam secum diutius habuisset, illa herede defunctus est. Quae amplissimam adepta pecuniam ne diuinae mercedi uideretur ingrata, quod acceptissimum putauit esse numinibus, populum Romanum etiam ipsa scripsit heredem, adque illa non conparente inuentum est testamentum; quibus meritis eam ferunt etiam honores meruisse diuinos.

So as she was leaving, the first to meet her was a very rich young man, Tarutius. He fell in love with her and kept her with him for a long time, and when he died he left her as his heir. Having come into a very large fortune, she did not want to seem ungrateful for the divine payment. So she did what she thought would be most acceptable to the deities: she in turn made the Roman people her heir. When she disappeared, the will was found. For these services, they say, she even earned divine honors.

Haec si poetae fingerent, si mimi agerent, ad fabulosam theologian dicerentur procul dubio pertinere et a ciuilis theologiae dignitate separanda iudicarentur. Cum uero haec dedecora non poetarum, sed populorum; non mimorum, sed sacrorum; non theatrorum, sed templorum; id est non fabulosae, sed ciuilis theologiae, a tanto auctore produntur: non frustra histriones ludicris artibus fingunt deorum quae tanta est turpitudinem, sed plane frustra sacerdotes uelut sacris ritibus conantur fingere deorum quae nulla est honestatem.

If the poets invented these things, if the mimes acted them, they would undoubtedly be said to belong to mythical theology and would be judged fit to be kept apart from the dignity of civil theology. But these disgraceful things are reported by so great an author as belonging not to the poets but to the peoples, not to the mimes but to the rites, not to the theaters but to the temples—that is, not to mythical but to civil theology. So it is not in vain that the actors, with their playful arts, portray the shamefulness of the gods, which is so great; but it is plainly in vain that the priests, with supposedly sacred rites, try to portray a respectability in the gods that does not exist.

Sacra sunt Iunonis, et haec in eius dilecta insula Samo celebrabantur, ubi nuptum data est Ioui; sacra sunt

There are the rites of Juno, and these used to be celebrated on her beloved island of Samos, where 13 Larentina is Acca Larentia, a figure of early Roman legend honored with a festival, the Larentalia.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Cereris, ubi a Plutone rapta Proserpina quaeritur; sacra sunt Veneris, ubi amatus eius Adon aprino dente extinctus iuuenis formosissimus plangitur; sacra sunt Matris deum, ubi Attis pulcher adulescens ab ea dilectus et muliebri zelo abscisus etiam hominum abscisorum, quos Gallos uocant, infelicitate deploratur. Haec cum deformiora sint omni scaenica foeditate, quid est quod fabulosa de dis figmenta poetarum ad theatrum uidelicet pertinentia uelut secernere nituntur a ciuili theologia, quam pertinere ad urbem uolunt, quasi ab honestis et dignis indigna et turpia? Itaque potius est unde gratiae debeantur histrionibus, qui oculis hominum pepercerunt nec omnia spectaculis nudauerunt, quae sacrarum aedium parietibus occuluntur.	she was given in marriage to Jupiter. There are the rites of Ceres, in which Proserpina, carried off by Pluto, is searched for. There are the rites of Venus, in which her lover Adonis, a most beautiful young man killed by a boar's tusk, is mourned. There are the rites of the Mother of the gods, in which Attis, a handsome youth whom she loved and castrated out of a woman's jealousy, is lamented—even through the misery of castrated men, whom they call Galli. Since these things are more hideous than any foulness of the stage, why do they strive to separate the poets' fictions about the gods, which supposedly belong to the theater, from civil theology, which they would have belong to the city—as though separating the unworthy and shameful from the honorable and worthy? There is rather reason to be grateful to the actors, who have spared people's eyes and have not laid bare in their shows everything that is hidden within the walls of the sacred buildings.[14]
Quid de sacris eorum boni sentiendum est, quae tenebris operiuntur, cum tam sint detestabilia, quae proferuntur in lucem? Et certe quid in occulto agant per abscisos et molles, ipsi uiderint; eosdem tamen homines infeliciter ac turpiter eneruatos adque corruptos occultare minime potuerunt. Persuadeant cui possunt se aliquid sanctum per tales agere homines, quos inter sua sancta numerari adque uersari negare non possunt. Nescimus quid agant, sed scimus per quales agant. Nouimus enim quae agantur in scaena, quo numquam uel in choro meretricum abscisus aut mollis intrauit; et tamen etiam ipsa turpes et infames agunt; neque enim ab honestis agi debuerunt. Quae sunt ergo illa sacra, quibus agendis tales elegit sanctitas, quales nec thymelica in se admisit obscenitas?	What good is to be thought of their rites that are covered in darkness, when those brought out into the light are so detestable? Certainly, what they do in secret through the castrated priests is their own affair. But these same men, wretchedly and shamefully unmanned and corrupted, they have been quite unable to hide. Let them persuade whom they can that they do something holy through such men, who, as they cannot deny, are counted among their holy things and move among them. We do not know what they do, but we know through whom they do it. For we know what is done on the stage, where no castrated priest has ever entered, not even in a chorus of prostitutes. And yet even those things are performed by shameful and disreputable people—for they ought not to be performed by respectable ones. What, then, are those rites, for whose performance holiness has chosen men such as not even the obscenity of the stage has admitted?

THE INTERPRETATIONS FROM NATURAL SCIENCE THAT PAGAN TEACHERS TRY TO OFFER ON BEHALF OF THEIR GODS

Allegorical explanations from nature cannot excuse the obscene rites of the Great Mother.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.8 At enim habent ista physiologicas quasdam, sicut aiunt, id est naturalium rationum interpretationes. Quasi uero	But, they say, these things have certain "physiological" interpretations, that is, explanations in nos in hac disputatione physiologian quaerimus et non theologian, id est rationem non naturae, sed Dei. Quamuis enim qui uerus Deus est non opinione, sed natura Deus sit: non tamen omnis natura deus est, quia et hominis et pecoris, et arboris et lapidis utique natura est, quorum nihil est deus. Si autem interpretationis huius, quando agitur de sacris Matris deum, caput est certe quod Mater deum terra est, quid ultra quaerimus, quid cetera perscrutamur? Quid euidentius suffragatur eis, qui dicunt omnes istos deos homines fuisse? Sic enim sunt terrigenae, sic eis mater est terra. In uera autem theologia opus Dei est terra, non mater.

LATIN

ENGLISH

terms of nature. As if in this discussion we were looking for physiologia [the science of nature] and not theologia, that is, an account not of nature but of God! For although the one who is the true God is God not by opinion but by nature, still not every nature is a god. A human being, an animal, a tree and a stone certainly each have a nature, and none of them is a god. But if, when the rites of the Mother of the gods are in question, the chief point of this interpretation is that the Mother of the gods is the earth, what more are we looking for? Why investigate the rest? What lends stronger support to those who say that all these gods were human beings? For in this way they are earth-born; in this way the earth is their mother. But in true theology the earth is the work of God, not a mother.

Verum tamen quoquo modo sacra eius interpretentur et referant ad rerum naturam: uiros muliebria pati non est secundum naturam, sed contra naturam. Hic morbus, hoc crimen, hoc dedecus habet inter illa sacra professionem, quod in uitiosis hominum moribus uix habet inter tormenta confessionem. Deinde si ista sacra, quae scaenicis turpitudinibus conuincuntur esse foediora, hinc excusantur adque purgantur, quod habent interpretationes suas, quibus ostendantur rerum significare naturam: quur non etiam poetica similiter excusentur adque purgentur?

Yet however they may interpret her rites and refer them to the nature of things, for men to be used sexually as women is not according to nature but against nature. This disease, this crime, this disgrace is openly professed among those rites, whereas among the vicious morals of mankind it is scarcely confessed even under torture. Again, these rites are proved to be fouler than the shameful things of the stage. If they are excused and purified on the ground that they have their own interpretations, which show that they signify the nature of things, why should not the poets' works likewise be excused and purified?

Multi enim et ipsa ad eundem modum interpretati sunt, usque adeo ut, quod ab eis inmanissimum et infandissimum dicitur, Saturnum suos filios deuorasse, ita nonnulli interpretentur, quod longinquitas temporis, quae Saturni nomine significatur, quidquid gignit ipsa consumat, uel, sicut idem opinatur Varro, quod pertineat Saturnus ad semina, quae in terram, de qua oriuntur, iterum recidunt. Itemque alii alio modo et similiter cetera.

For many have interpreted these too in the same way. They go so far that what is called the most monstrous and unspeakable thing in the poets—that Saturn devoured his own children—some interpret to mean that the length of time, which is signified by the name of Saturn, consumes whatever it itself begets; or, as the same Varro thinks, that Saturn pertains to seeds, which fall back again into the earth from which they spring. Others interpret it in other ways, and so likewise with the rest.

Et tamen theologia fabulosa dicitur et cum omnibus huiusce modi interpretationibus suis reprehenditur abicitur inprobatur, nec solum a naturali, quae philosophorum est, uerum etiam ab ista ciuili, de qua agimus, quae ad urbes populosque adseritur pertinere, eo quod de dis indigna confinxerit, merito repudianda discernitur, eo nimirum consilio, ut, quoniam acutissimi

And yet it is called mythical theology, and with all its interpretations of this kind it is censured, cast off and condemned. Not only by natural theology, which belongs to the philosophers, but also by this civil theology we are discussing, which is claimed to pertain to cities and peoples, it is set 14 The Mother of the gods is Cybele, the Great Mother, whose priests, the Galli, castrated themselves in imitation of Attis.

LATIN

homines adque doctissimi, a quibus ista conscripta sunt, ambas inprobandas intellegebant, et illam scilicet fabulosam et istam ciuilem, illam uero audebant inprobare, hanc non audebant; illam culpandam proposuerunt, hanc eius similem conparandam exposuerunt, — non ut haec prae illa tenenda eligeretur, sed ut cum illa respuenda intellegeretur, adque ita sine periculo eorum, qui ciuilem theologian reprehendere metuebant, utraque contemta ea, quam naturalem uocant, aput meliores animos inueniret locum.

ENGLISH

apart as deserving rejection, on the ground that it has made up things unworthy of the gods. The purpose, no doubt, was this. The very acute and very learned men who wrote these things understood that both were to be condemned, both the mythical one and the civil one; but while they dared to condemn the former, they did not dare to condemn the latter. So they put forward the former to be censured, and set out the latter, which is like it, to be compared with it—not so that this one should be chosen and held in preference to that one, but so that it should be understood to deserve rejection along with it. And thus, without danger to those who were afraid to censure civil theology, both would be despised, and the one they call natural would find a place among better minds.

Nam et ciuilis et fabulosa ambae fabulosae sunt ambaeque ciuiles; ambas inueniet fabulosas, qui uanitates et obscenitates ambarum prudenter inspexerit; ambas ciuiles, qui scaenicos ludos pertinentes ad fabulosam in deorum ciuilium festiuitatibus et in urbium diuinis rebus aduerterit. Quo modo igitur uitae aeternae dandae potestas cuiquam deorum istorum tribuitur, quos sua simulacra et sacra conuincunt dis fabulosis apertissime reprobatis esse simillimos formis aetatibus, sexu habitu, coniugiis generationibus ritibus, in quibus omnibus aut homines fuisse intelleguntur et pro uniuscuiusque uita uel morte sacra eis et sollemnia constituta, hunc errorem insinuantibus firmantibusque daemonibus, aut certe ex qualibet occasione inmundissimi spiritus fallendis humanis mentibus inrepsisse?

For the civil and the mythical are both mythical and both civil. Anyone who wisely examines the vanities and obscenities of both will find both mythical. Anyone who notices that the theatrical shows belonging to the mythical kind are part of the festivals of the civil gods and of the divine things of the cities will find both civil. How, then, can the power to give eternal life be attributed to any of these gods, when their own images and rites prove them most like the mythical gods, who are so openly rejected—in forms, ages, sex and dress, in marriages, generations and rituals? In all of these it is evident either that they were human beings, and that rites and solemnities were established for them according to each one's life or death, with demons insinuating and confirming this error; or at any rate that the most unclean spirits crept in, seizing on any opportunity, to deceive human minds.

THE DUTIES OF THE INDIVIDUAL GODS

The gods' petty and indecent duties, from childbirth to the wedding night, are fit only for farce.

LATIN

6.9 Quid? ipsa numinum officia tam uiliter minutatimque concisa, propter quod eis dicunt pro uniuscuiusque proprio munere supplicari oportere, unde non quidem omnia, sed multa iam diximus, nonne scurrilitati mimicae quam diuinae consonant dignitati? Si duas quisquam nutrices adhiberet infanti, quarum una nihil nisi escam, altera nihil nisi potum daret, sicut isti ad hoc duas adhibuerunt deas, Educam et Potinam, nempe

ENGLISH

What, then? Take the very functions of the deities, chopped up so cheaply and into such tiny pieces that, they say, each must be supplicated according to its own particular office. We have already said much about this, though not everything. Do these things not suit the buffoonery of a mime better than divine dignity? Suppose someone hired two nurses for an infant, one to give it nothing but desipere et aliquid mimo simile in sua domo agere uideretur. Liberum a liberamento appellatum uolunt, quod mares in coeundo per eius beneficium emissis seminibus liberentur; hoc idem in feminis agere Liberam, quam etiam Venerem putant, quod et ipsam perhibeant semina emittere; et ob haec Libero eandem uirilem corporis partem in templo poni, femineam Liberae. Ad haec addunt mulieres adtributas Libero et uinum propter libidinem concitandam.

LATIN

Sic Bacchanalia summa celebrabantur insania; ubi Varro ipse confitetur a Bacchantibus talia fieri non potuisse nisi mente commota. Haec tamen postea displicuerunt senatui saniori, et ea iussit auferri. Saltem hic tandem forsitan senserunt quid inmundi spiritus, dum pro dis habentur, in hominum mentibus possint. Haec certe non fierent in theatris; ludunt quippe ibi, non fuiiunt; quamuis deos habere, qui etiam ludis talibus delectentur, simile sit furoris.

Quale autem illud est, quod, cum religiosum a superstitioso ea distinctione discernat, uta superstitioso dicat timeri deos, a religioso autem tantum uereri ut parentes, non ut hostes timeri, adque omnes ita bonos dicat, ut facilius sit eos nocentibus parcere quam laedere quemquam innocentem, tamen mulieri fetae post partum tres deos custodes commemorat adhiberi, ne Siluanus deus per noctem ingrediatur et uexet, eorumque custodum significandorum causa tres homines noctu: circuire limina domus et primo limen securi ferire, postea pilo, tertio deuerrere scopis, ut his datis culturae signis deus Siluanus prohibeatur intrare, quod neque arbores caeduntur ac putantur sine ferro, neque far conficitur sine pilo, neque fruges coaceruantur sine scopis; ab his autem tribus rebus tres nuncupatos deos, Intercidonam a securis intercisione, Pilumnum a pilo, Deuerram a scopis, quibus dis custodibus contra uim dei Siluani feta conseruaretur.

ENGLISH

food and the other nothing but drink, just as these people have brought in two goddesses for the purpose, Educa and Potina. He would surely seem to be out of his mind and to be staging something like a mime in his own house. They will have it that Liber is named from "liberation," because through his kindness males are "liberated" in intercourse by the release of their seed. Libera, whom they also take to be Venus, does the same in women, because they claim that she too emits seed. For this reason, they say, the male part of the body is placed in Liber's temple, and the female part in Libera's. To this they add that women and wine were assigned to Liber for arousing lust.[15]

That is how the Bacchanalia used to be celebrated, with the utmost madness. Varro himself admits that the Bacchants could not have done such things unless their minds were deranged. Later, however, these rites displeased a saner Senate, and it ordered them abolished. Here at least, perhaps, they finally perceived what unclean spirits can do in human minds while they are taken for gods. Such things certainly would not happen in the theaters. There, after all, people play; they do not rave. Yet to have gods who are delighted even by such plays is itself something like madness.[16]

And what are we to make of this? He distinguishes the religious person from the superstitious one by saying that the superstitious man fears the gods, while the religious man only reveres them as parents and does not fear them as enemies. He also says that they are all so good that it is easier for them to spare the guilty than to harm anyone innocent. Yet he records that after childbirth three gods are brought in as guardians for the new mother, to prevent the god Silvanus from coming in at night and molesting her. To signify these guardians, three men go round the threshold of the house at night. First they strike the threshold with an ax, then with a pestle, and third they sweep it with brooms. By these signs of cultivation the god Silvanus is kept from entering, because trees are not cut down or pruned without iron, grain is not prepared without a pestle, and crops are not heaped up without brooms. From these 15 Educa and Potina were Roman goddesses of a child's eating and drinking. Liber and Libera were Italian fertility deities, Liber being identified with Bacchus.

16 The Roman Senate suppressed the Bacchanalia, the rites of Bacchus, in 186 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	three things, he says, three gods were named: Intercidona from the cutting of the ax, Pilumnus from the pestle, and Deverra from the brooms. By these guardian gods the new mother was protected against the violence of the god Silvanus.[17]
Ita contra dei nocentis saeuitiam non ualeret custodia bonorum, nisi plures essent aduersus unum eique aspero horrendo inculto, utpote siluestri, signis culturae tamquam contrariis repugnarent. Itane ista est innocentia deorum, ista concordia? Haeccine sunt numina salubria urbium, magis ridenda quam ludibria theatrorum?	So the guardianship of the good gods would not prevail against the savagery of a harmful god unless they were many against one. They had to resist him, rough, frightful and uncultivated as a woodland god is, with signs of cultivation, which are his opposites. Is this, then, the innocence of the gods? Is this their harmony? Are these the health-giving deities of cities, more laughable than the farces of the theaters?

THE WEDDING-NIGHT GODS

A crowd of gods supposedly attends the bridal chamber, which Augustine finds indecent and absurd.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Cum mas et femina coniunguntur, adhibetur deus Iugatinus; sit hoc ferendum. Sed domum est ducenda quae nubit; adhibetur et deus Domiducus; ut in domo sit, adhibetur deus Domitius; ut maneat cum uiro, additur dea Manturna. Quid ultra quaeritur? Parcatur humanae uerecundiae; peragat cetera concupiscentia carnis et sanguinis procurato secreto pudoris. Quid inpletur cubiculum turba numinum, quando et paranymphi inde discedunt? Et ad hoc inpletur, non ut eorum praesentia cogitata maior sit cura pudicitiae, sed ut feminae sexu infirmae, nouitate pauidae illis cooperantibus sine ulla difficultate uirginitas auferatur. Adest enim dea Virginiensis et deus pater Subigus, et dea mater Prema et dea Pertunda, et Venus et Priapus. Quid est hoc?	When male and female are joined, the god Jugatinus is brought in. Let that be tolerated. But the bride must be led home, so the god Domiducus is brought in too. To keep her in the home, the god Domitius is brought in. To make her stay with her husband, the goddess Manturna is added. What more is wanted? Let human modesty be spared. Let the desire of flesh and blood finish the rest, once the privacy that decency requires has been secured. Why is the bedroom filled with a crowd of deities, when even the bridal attendants leave it? And it is filled not so that the thought of their presence may increase the concern for chastity. It is filled so that, with their help, the woman, weak in her sex and frightened by the novelty, may be deprived of her virginity without any difficulty. For present are the goddess Virginensis, the god Father Subigus, the goddess Mother Prema, the goddess Pertunda, and Venus, and Priapus. What is this?[18]
Si omnino laborantem in illo opere uirum ab dis adiuuari oportebat, non sufficeret aliquis unus aut aliqua una? Numquid Venus sola parum esset, quae ad hoc etiam dicitur nuncupata, quod sine ui femina uirgo esse non desinat? Si est ulla frons in hominibus, quae non est in	If the husband laboring at that task really had to be helped by the gods, would not some one god or one goddess be enough? Would Venus alone be too little? She is even said to be named for this very thing, that without force a woman does not cease

17 Silvanus was the Roman god of woods and untilled land. The guardians' names come from Latin intercidere (to cut), pilum (pestle) and deverrere (to sweep away).

18 The names are formed from Latin words: iugare (to join), domum ducere (to lead home), manere (to stay), virgo (virgin), subigere (to subdue), premere (to press down), pertundere (to pierce); Priapus was a phallic fertility god.

LATIN

numinibus, nonne, cum credunt coniugati tot deos utriusque sexus esse praesentes et huic operi instantes, ita pudore adficiuntur, ut et ille minus moueatur et illa plus reluctetur? Et certe si adest Virginiensis dea, ut uirgini zona soluatur; si adest deus Subigus, ut uiro subigatur; si adest dea Prema, ut subacta, ne se commoueat, conprimatur: dea Pertunda ibi quid facit? Erubescat, eat foras; agat aliquid et maritus. Valde inhonestum est, ut, quod uocatur illa, quisquam inpleat nisi ille.

ENGLISH

to be a virgin. Human beings have some sense of shame, even if the deities have none. So when a married couple believe that so many gods of both sexes are present and intent on this task, are they not so overcome with shame that he is less aroused and she resists more? And certainly the goddess Virginensis is there to untie the virgin's girdle. The god Subigus is there so that she may be subdued to her husband. The goddess Prema is there so that, once subdued, she may be held down and not move. What, then, is the goddess Pertunda doing there? Let her blush and go outside. Let the husband do something too. It is utterly indecent for anyone but him to accomplish what her name means.[19]

Sed forte ideo toleratur, quia dea dicitur esse, non deus. Nam si masculus crederetur et Pertundus uocaretur, maius contra eum pro uxoris pudicitia posceret maritus auxilium quam feta contra Siluanum. Sed quid hoc dicam, cum ibi sit et Priapus nimius masculus, super cuius inmanissimum et turpissimum fascinum sedere noua nupta iubebatur, more honestissimo et religiosissimo matronarum?

But perhaps she is tolerated because she is said to be a goddess and not a god. For if she were believed to be male and called Pertundus, the husband would demand more help against him, for the sake of his wife's chastity, than the new mother needs against Silvanus. But why do I say this, when Priapus too is there, all too male? The new bride was required to sit on his monstrous and most obscene phallus, according to the most decent and most religious custom of matrons!

Eant adhuc et theologian ciuilem a theologia fabulosa, urbes a theatris, templa ab scaenis, sacra pontificum a carminibus poetarum, uelut res honestas a turpibus, ueraces a fallacibus, graues a leuibus, serias a ludicris, adpetendas a respuendis, qua possunt quasi conentur subtilitate discernere. Intellegimus quid agant; illam theatricam et fabulosam theologian ab ista ciuili pendere nouerunt et ei de carminibus poetarum tamquam de speculo resultare, et ideo ista exposita, quam damnare non audent, illam eius imaginem liberius arguunt et reprehendunt, ut, qui agnoscunt quid uelint, et hanc ipsam faciem, cuius illa imago est, detestentur; quam tamen di ipsi tamquam in eodem speculo se intuentes ita diligunt, ut qui qualesque sint in utraque melius uideantur.

Let them go on, then, and try with whatever subtlety they can muster to distinguish civil theology from mythical theology. Let them distinguish cities from theaters, temples from stages, and the rites of the pontiffs from the songs of the poets, as if they were separating honorable things from shameful, truthful from deceitful, serious from frivolous, earnest from playful, things to be sought from things to be rejected. We understand what they are doing. They know that this theatrical and mythical theology depends on the civil kind and reflects it, as in a mirror, through the songs of the poets. And so, having set out the civil theology, which they dare not condemn, they attack and censure its image more freely. They do this so that those who recognize what they mean may also detest the very face of which that is the image. Yet the gods themselves, gazing at themselves as if in that same mirror, love it so much that who and what they are can be seen better in both together.

Unde etiam cultores suos terribilibus imperiis conpulerunt, ut inmunditiam theologiae fabulosae sibi

That is why they have even compelled their worshipers by terrifying commands to dedicate the dicarent, in suis sollemnitatibus ponerent, in rebus diuinis haberent, adque ita et se ipsos inmundissimos spiritus manifestius esse docuerunt, et huius urbanae theologiae uelut electae et probatae illam theatricam abiectam adque reprobatam membrum partemque fecerunt, ut, cum sit uniuersa turpis et fallax adque in se contineat commenticios deos, una pars eius sit in litteris sacerdotum, altera in carminibus poetarum. Utrum habeat et alias partes, alia quaestio est: nunc propter diuisionem Varronis et urbanam et theatricam theologian ad unam ciuilem pertinere satis, ut opinor, ostendi. Unde, quia sunt ambae similis turpitudinis absurditatis, indignitatis falsitatis, absit a ueris religiosis, ut siue ab hac siue ab illa uita speretur aeterna.

LATIN

ENGLISH

filth of mythical theology to them, to put it into their festivals, and to count it among divine matters. In this way they have shown more plainly that they themselves are utterly unclean spirits. And they have made that theatrical theology, cast off and rejected as it is, a member and part of this urban theology, chosen and approved as that supposedly is. So, though the whole is shameful and false and contains fictitious gods, one part of it is in the books of the priests and the other in the songs of the poets. Whether it has other parts as well is another question. For now, following Varro's division, I have shown sufficiently, I think, that both the urban and the theatrical theology belong to a single civil theology. Both, then, are alike in shamefulness and absurdity, in indignity and falsehood. Far be it from the truly religious, therefore, to hope for eternal life from either the one or the other.

Denique et ipse Varro commemorare et enumerare deos coepit a conceptione hominis, quorum numerum est exorsus a Iano, eamque seriem perduxit usque ad decrepiti hominis mortem, et deos ad ipsum hominem pertinentes clausit ad Neniam deam, quae in funeribus senum cantatur; deinde coepit deos alios ostendere, qui pertinerent non ad ipsum hominem, sed ad ea, quae sunt hominis, sicuti est uictus adque uestitus et quaecumque alia huic uitae sunt necessaria, ostendens in omnibus, quod sit cuiusque munus et propter quid cuique debeat supplicari; in qua uniuersa diligentia nullos demonstrauit uel nominauit deos, a quibus uita aeterna poscenda sit, propter quam unam proprie nos Christiani sumus.

Finally, Varro himself began recording and listing the gods from the moment of a human being's conception. He began their number with Janus and carried the series down to the death of a man in extreme old age. He closed the list of gods that concern the human being himself with the goddess Nenia, who is sung at the funerals of the old. Then he began to set out other gods, who concerned not the human being himself but the things that belong to him, such as food and clothing and whatever else is necessary for this life. In every case he showed what each one's function is and what each must be supplicated for. Yet in all this thoroughness he pointed out or named no gods from whom eternal life is to be sought. And that is the one thing for whose sake, properly speaking, we are Christians.[20]

Quis ergo usque adeo tardus sit, ut non intellegat istum hominem ciuilem theologian tam diligenter exponendo et aperiendo eamque illi fabulosae, indignae adque probrosae, similem demonstrando adque ipsam fabulosam partem esse huius satis euidenter docendo non nisi illi naturali, quam dicit ad philosophos pertinere, in animis hominum moliri locum, ea subtilitate, ut fabulosam reprehendat, ciuilem uero reprehendere quidem non audeat, sed prodendo reprehensibilem ostendat, adque ita utraque iudicio recte

Who, then, could be so slow as not to understand what this man is doing? He sets out and lays bare civil theology so carefully. He shows that it is like that unworthy and disgraceful mythical theology. And he teaches quite plainly that the mythical is itself a part of it. All this is meant to make room in people's minds only for the natural theology, which he says belongs to the philosophers. He goes about it with such subtlety that he censures the mythical but does not dare to censure the civil,

19 Augustine plays on Venus and vi, "by force."
20 Janus was the Roman god of beginnings and doorways; Nenia was the goddess of the funeral dirge (nenia).

LATIN	ENGLISH
intellegentium reprobata sola naturalis remaneat eligenda? De qua suo loco in adiutorio Dei ueri diligentius disserendum est.	though by exposing it he shows it to be censurable. In this way both are rejected by the judgment of those who understand rightly, and the natural alone remains to be chosen. That must be discussed more carefully in its proper place, with the help of the true God.

THE FRANKNESS OF SENECA, WHO ATTACKED CIVIL THEOLOGY MORE VEHEMENTLY THAN VARRO ATTACKED THE MYTHICAL

Seneca attacked civil theology more boldly than Varro, though he still practiced it.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.10 Libertas sane, quae huic defuit, ne istam urbanam theologian theatricae simillimam aperte sicut illam reprehendere auderet, Annaeo Senecae, quem nonnullis indiciis inuenimus apostolorum nostrorum claruisse temporibus, non quidem ex toto, uerum ex aliqua parte non defuit. Adfuit enim scribenti, uiuenti defuit. Nam in eo libro, quem contra superstitiones condidit, multo copiosius adque uehementius reprehendit ipse ciuilem istam et urbanam theologian quam Varro theatricam adque fabulosam. Cum enim de simulacris ageret: Sacros, inquit, inmortales, inuiolabiles in materia uilissima adque inmobili dedicant, habitus illis hominum ferarumque et piscium, quidam uero mixto sexu, diuersis corporibus induunt; numina uocant, quae si spiritu accepto subito occurrerent, monstra haberentur.	Varro lacked the freedom to censure this urban theology openly, as he did the other, even though it so closely resembles the theatrical. That freedom was not lacking to Annaeus Seneca, though he had it only in part, not wholly. As some indications show, Seneca flourished in the time of our apostles. He had that freedom when he wrote; he lacked it in how he lived. For in the book he composed against superstitions, he censures this civil and urban theology far more fully and vehemently than Varro censures the theatrical and mythical. When dealing with images, he says: "They dedicate the sacred, immortal, inviolable gods in the cheapest and most lifeless matter. They clothe them in the shapes of human beings, wild beasts and fish, and some with mixed sex and bodies of different kinds. They call them deities. But if these things suddenly received breath and came to meet us, they would be taken for monsters."[21]
Deinde aliquanto post, cum theologian naturalem praedicans quorundam philosophorum sententias digessisset, obposuit sibi quaestionem et ait: Hoc loco dicit aliquis: Credam ego caelum et terram deos esse et supra lunam alios, infra alios? Ego feram aut Platonem aut Peripateticum Stratonem, quorum alter fecit deum sine corpore, alter sine animo? Et ad hoc respondens: Quid ergo tandem, inquit, ueriora tibi uidentur Titi Tatii aut Romuli aut Tulli Hostilii somnia? Cloacinam Tatius dedicauit deam, Picum Tiberinumque Romulus, Hostilius Pauorem adque Pallorem, taeterrimos omnium adfectus, quorum alter mentis territae motus est, alter corporis ne morbus quidem, sed color. Haec numina potius credes et caelo recipies? De ipsis uero ritibus crudeliter turpibus	Then, a little later, after setting out the opinions of certain philosophers in commending natural theology, he raises an objection against himself and says: "At this point someone says: 'Am I to believe that the sky and the earth are gods, and that some are above the moon and others below it? Am I to put up with either Plato or the Peripatetic Strato, one of whom made God without a body, the other without a mind?'" And replying to this he says: "Well then, do the dreams of Titus Tatius or Romulus or Tullus Hostilius seem truer to you? Tatius dedicated the goddess Cloacina. Romulus dedicated Picus and Tiberinus. Hostilius dedicated Fear and Pallor, the most hideous of human feel-

21 Lucius Annaeus Seneca (c. 4 BC–AD 65) was a Stoic philosopher and statesman. His treatise On Superstition is lost and known chiefly from Augustine.

LATIN

quam libere scripsit! Ille, inquit, uiriles sibi partes amputat, ille lacertos secat.

Ubi iratos deos timent, qui sic propitios merentur? Di autem nullo debent coli genere, si hoc uolunt. Tantus est perturbatae mentis et sedibus suis pulsae furor, ut sic di placentur, quem ad modum ne quidem homines saeuiunt taeterrimi et in fabulas traditae crudelitatis. Tyranni lacerauerunt aliquorum membra, neminem sua lacerare iusserunt. In regiae libidinis uoluptatem castrati sunt quidam; sed nemo sibi, ne uir esset, iubente domino manus intulit. Se ipsi in templis contrucidant, uulneribus suis ac sanguine supplicant. Si cui intueri uacet, quae faciunt quaeque patiuntur, inueniet tam indecora honestis, tam indigna liberis, tam dissimilia sanis, ut nemo fuerit dubitaturus furere eos, si cum paucioribus furerent; nunc sanitatis patrocinium est insanientium turba.

Iam illa, quae in ipso Capitolio fieri solere commemorat et intrepide omnino coarguit, quis credat nisi ab inridentibus aut furentibus fieri? Nam cum in sacris Aegyptiis Osirim lugeri perditum, mox autem inuentum magno esse gaudio derisisset, cum perditio eius inuentioque fingatur, dolor tamen ille adque laetitia ab eis, qui nihil perdiderunt nihilque inuenerunt, ueraciter exprimatur: Huic tamen, inquit, furori certum tempus est. Tolerabile est semel anno insanire. In Capitolium perueni: pudebit publicatae dementiae, quod sibi uanus furor adtribuit officii. Alius nomina deo subicit, alius horas Ioui nuntiat, alius lector est, alius unctor, qui uano motu bracchiorum imitatur unguentem.

ENGLISH

ings. One of these is an agitation of a frightened mind; the other is not even a disease of the body, but a color. Will you rather believe in these deities and receive them into heaven?" And how freely he wrote about the rites themselves, cruel and shameful as they are! "One man," he says, "cuts off his male parts; another slashes his arms.[22]

"What do they fear from the gods when they are angry, if this is how they win their favor? Gods ought not to be worshiped in any way at all if this is what they want. So great is the frenzy of a mind disturbed and driven from its seat that gods are appeased in a way in which not even the most hideous men rage, men whose cruelty has passed into legend. Tyrants have torn the limbs of some people; they have ordered no one to tear his own. Some have been castrated for the pleasure of a king's lust. But no one, at a master's command, has laid hands on himself to stop being a man. These people butcher themselves in temples; they make their supplications with their own wounds and blood. If anyone has leisure to look at what they do and what they suffer, he will find things so unseemly for honorable people, so unworthy of the free, so unlike the sane, that no one would have doubted they were mad if they were mad in smaller numbers. As it is, the crowd of the insane is the defense of their sanity."

Then there are the things he records as customary on the Capitol itself, and fearlessly exposes. Who would believe they were done by anyone but people mocking or raving? He had ridiculed the Egyptian rites, in which Osiris is mourned as lost and soon afterward found with great joy. His loss and his finding are a fiction, yet the grief and the joy are genuinely expressed by people who have lost nothing and found nothing. Then he says: "Yet this frenzy has a fixed time. It is tolerable to go mad once a year. Go up to the Capitol: you will be ashamed of the madness on public display, of the duties an empty frenzy has assigned itself. One man prompts the god with names; another announces the hours to Jupiter. One is his reader, another his anointer, who imitates someone applying ointment with empty movements of the arms.[23]

22 Titus Tatius, Romulus and Tullus Hostilius were legendary early kings of Rome. Cloacina was the goddess of Rome's Great Sewer, the Cloaca Maxima.

LATIN

Sunt quae Iunoni ac Mineruae capillos disponant (longe a templo, non tantum a simulacro stantes digitos mouent ornantium modo), sunt quae speculum teneant; sunt qui ad uadimonia sua deos aduocent, sunt qui libellos offerant et illos causam suam doceant. Doctus archimimus, senex iam decrepitus, cottidie in Capitolio mimum agebat, quasi di libenter spectarent, quem illi homines desierant. Omne illic artificum genus operatum dis inmortalibus desidet. Et paulo post: Hi tamen, inquit, etiamsi superuacuum usum, non turpem nec infamem deo promittunt. Sedent quaedam in Capitolio, quae se a Ioue amari putant: ne Iunonis quidem, si credere poetis uelis, iracundissimae respectu terrentur.

ENGLISH

"There are women who arrange the hair of Juno and Minerva: standing far from the temple, let alone the statue, they move their fingers like hairdressers. There are women who hold a mirror. There are men who summon the gods to stand by them at their court appearances, and men who present them with petitions and instruct them in their case. A learned leading mime, by now a decrepit old man, used to perform a mime on the Capitol every day, as if the gods enjoyed watching someone whom men had stopped watching. Every kind of craftsman sits there idle, working for the immortal gods." And a little later: "Yet these people," he says, "though they offer the god a superfluous service, do not offer a shameful or disgraceful one. There are women who sit on the Capitol and think they are loved by Jupiter. They are not even frightened by the thought of Juno, who, if you choose to believe the poets, is very quick to anger."

Hanc libertatem Varro non habuit; tantum modo poeticam theologian reprehendere ausus est, ciuilem non ausus est, quam iste concidit. Sed si uerum adtendamus, deteriora sunt templa ubi haec aguntur, quam theatra ubi finguntur. Unde in his sacris ciuilis theologiae has partes potius elegit Seneca sapienti, ut eas in animi religione non habeat, sed in actibus fingat. Ait enim: Quae omnia sapiens seruabit tamquam legibus iussa, non tamquam dis grata. Et paulo post: Quid quod et matrimonia, inquit, deorum iungimus, et ne pie quidem, fratrum ac sororum! Bellonam Marti conlocamus, Vulcano Venerem, Neptuno Salaciam. Quosdam tamen caelibes relinquimus, quasi condicio defecerit, praesertim cum quaedam uiduae sint, ut Populonia uel Fulgora et diua Rumina; quibus non miror petitorem defuisse.

Varro did not have this freedom. He dared to censure only poetic theology, not the civil, which Seneca cut to pieces. But if we look at the truth, the temples where these things are done are worse than the theaters where they are only feigned. Hence, regarding these rites of civil theology, Seneca chose this role for the wise man: not to hold them in the religion of his mind, but to feign them in his actions. For he says: "All these things the wise man will observe as commanded by the laws, not as pleasing to the gods." And a little later he says: "What of the fact that we even join the gods in marriage, and not even piously, brothers with sisters! We give Bellona to Mars, Venus to Vulcan, Salacia to Neptune. Some, however, we leave unmarried, as if no match could be found. This is all the stranger since certain goddesses are widows, such as Populonia or Fulgora and the divine Rumina. I am not surprised that these have lacked a suitor.

Omnem istam ignobilem deorum turbam, quam longo aeuo longa superstitio congessit, sic, inquit, adorabimus, ut meminerimus cultum eius magis ad morem quam ad rem pertinere. Nec leges ergo illae nec mos in ciuili theologia id instituerunt, quod dis gratum esset uel ad rem pertineret. Sed iste, quem philosophi quasi liberum

"All this ignoble crowd of gods, which a long superstition has piled up over long ages, we shall worship," he says, "in such a way as to remember that their worship has more to do with custom than with reality." So neither those laws nor custom established anything in civil theology that 23 Osiris was an Egyptian god whose death and rediscovery were mourned and celebrated each year. The Capitol was the temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill in Rome.

LATIN

fecerunt, tamen, quia inlustris populi Romani senator erat, colebat quod reprehendebat, agebat quod arguebat, quod culpabat adorabat; quia uidelicet magnum aliquid eum philosophia docuerat, ne superstitiosus esset in mundo, sed propter leges ciuium moresque hominum non quidem ageret fingentem scaenicum in theatro, sed imitaretur in templo; eo damnabilius, quo illa, quae mendaciter agebat, sic ageret, ut eum populus ueraciter agere existimaret; scaenicus autem ludendo potius delectaret, quam fallendo deciperet.

ENGLISH

pleased the gods or had to do with reality. Yet this man, whom philosophers had made free, so to speak, was an illustrious senator of the Roman people. Because of this he worshiped what he censured, did what he condemned, and adored what he blamed. Philosophy, evidently, had taught him something great: not to be superstitious in the world, but, for the sake of the citizens' laws and human customs, to play the actor. He was not to play a feigning actor in the theater; he was to imitate one in a temple. This was all the more damnable because the things he did falsely he did in such a way that the people thought he was doing them genuinely. The actor, by contrast, gives delight by playing rather than deceiving by trickery.

WHAT SENECA THOUGHT OF THE JEWS

Seneca mocked the Sabbath and called the Jews a nation that gave laws to its conquerors.

LATIN

6.11 Hic inter alias ciuilis theologiae superstitiones reprehendit etiam sacramenta Iudaeorum et maxime sabbata, inutiliter eos facere adfirmans, quod per illos singulos septem interpositos dies septimam fere partem aetatis suae perdant uacando et multa in tempore urgentia non agendo laedantur. Christianos tamen iam tunc Iudaeis inimicissimos in neutram partem commemorare ausus est, ne uel laudaret contra suae patriae ueterem consuetudinem, uel reprehenderet contra propriam forsitan uoluntatem. De illis sane Iudaeis cum loqueretur, ait: Cum interim usque eo sceleratissimae gentis consuetudo conualuit, ut per omnes iam terras recepta sit: uicti uictoribus leges dederunt. Mirabatur haec dicens et quid diuinitus ageretur ignorans subiecit plane sententiam, qua significaret quid de illorum sacramentorum ratione sentiret.

Ait enim: Illi tamen causas ritus sui nouerunt; maior pars populi facit, quod quur faciat ignorat. Sed de sacramentis Iudaeorum, uel quur uel quatenus instituta sint auctoritate diuina, ac post modum a populo Dei, cui uitae aeternae mysterium reuelatum est, tempore quo oportuit eadem auctoritate sublata sint, et alias diximus, maxime cum aduersus Manichaeos ageremus, et in hoc opere loco opportuniore dicendam est.

ENGLISH

Among other superstitions of civil theology, Seneca also censures the sacred rites of the Jews, and especially the Sabbaths. He claims that they keep them to no purpose. By setting aside one day in every seven, they lose almost a seventh part of their lives in idleness, and by not acting they suffer harm in many urgent matters. The Christians, however, already then bitterly opposed to the Jews, he did not dare to mention one way or the other. He would not praise them against the ancient custom of his country, nor censure them, perhaps, against his own wish. Speaking of the Jews, he says: "Meanwhile the custom of this most wicked nation has gained such strength that it has now been received throughout all lands: the conquered have given laws to their conquerors." He marveled as he said this. And, not knowing what was being done by God, he added a statement that plainly showed what he thought of the rationale behind their rites.

For he says: "They, at least, know the reasons for their rite; but the greater part of the people do what they do without knowing why." As for the Jewish rites, there are several questions: why they were instituted by divine authority, and to what extent, and how afterward, at the appropriate time, the same authority removed them from the people of God, to whom the mystery of eternal life has been revealed. We have spoken of this elsewhere, especially when arguing against the Manichaeans, and it will be discussed in a more suitable place in this work.[24]

LATIN	ENGLISH

THAT ONCE THE EMPTINESS OF THE GODS OF THE NATIONS IS EXPOSED, THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT THAT THEY CANNOT GIVE ANYONE ETERNAL LIFE, SINCE THEY CANNOT EVEN HELP TEMPORAL LIFE

Since these gods cannot help even this life, they cannot give eternal life.

LATIN	ENGLISH
6.12 Nunc propter tres theologias, quas Graeci dicunt mythicen physicen politicen, Latine autem dici possunt fabulosa naturalis ciuilis, quod neque de fabulosa, quam et ipsi deorum multorum falsorumque cultores liberrime reprehenderunt, neque de ciuili, cuius illa pars esse conuincitur eiusque et ista simillima uel etiam deterior inuenitur, speranda est aeterna uita, si cui satis non sunt quae in hoc uolumine dicta sunt, adiungat etiam illa, quae in superioribus libris et maxime quarto de felicitatis datore Deo plurima disputata sunt. Nam cui nisi uni felicitati propter aeternam uitam consecrandi homines essent, si dea felicitas esset? Quia uero non dea, sed munus est dei: cui deo nisi datori felicitatis consecrandi sumus, qui aeternam uitam, ubi uera est et plena felicitas, pia caritate diligimus?	Now consider the three theologies which the Greeks call mythikē, physikē and politikē, and which in Latin can be called fabulosa, naturalis and civilis —mythical, natural and civil. Eternal life is not to be hoped for from the mythical theology, which even the worshipers of many false gods have themselves censured most freely. Nor is it to be hoped for from the civil theology, of which the mythical is proven to be a part, and which is found to be very like it or even worse. If what has been said in this volume is not enough for anyone, let him add the many arguments in the earlier books, especially the fourth, about God as the giver of happiness. For if happiness were a goddess, to whom but Happiness alone would people have to be consecrated for the sake of eternal life? But happiness is not a goddess; it is a gift of God. To what God, then, should we be consecrated but to the giver of happiness? For we love with devoted love the eternal life in which true and full happiness is found.
Non autem esse datorem felicitatis quemquam istorum deorum, qui tanta turpitudine coluntur et nisi ita colantur, multo turpius irascuntur adque ob hoc se spiritus inmundissimos confitentur, puto ex his, quae dicta sunt, neminem dubitare oportere. Porro qui non dat felicitatem, uitam quo modo dare posset aeternam? Eam quippe uitam aeternam dicimus, ubi est sine fine felicitas. Nam si anima in poenis uiuit aeternis, quibus et ipsi spiritus cruciabuntur inmundi, mors est illa potius aeterna quam uita. Nulla quippe maior et peior est mors, quam ubi non moritur mors. Sed quod animae natura, per id quod inmortalis creata est, sine qualicumque uita esse non potest, summa mors eius est alienatio a uita Dei in aeternitate supplicii.	These gods are worshiped with such shamefulness, and unless they are worshiped so, they grow angry still more shamefully. By this they confess themselves to be utterly unclean spirits. From what has been said, I think, no one ought to doubt that none of them is the giver of happiness. Further, how could one who does not give happiness give eternal life? For we call that life eternal in which there is happiness without end. If the soul lives in eternal punishments, with which the unclean spirits themselves will also be tormented, that is eternal death rather than life. Indeed, there is no greater or worse death than where death does not die. But the nature of the soul, being created immortal, cannot exist without some kind of 24 The Manichaeans were a dualist sect to which Augustine belonged before his conversion. He later wrote extensively against them.

LATIN

Vitam igitur aeternam, id est sine ullo fine felicem, solus ille dat, qui dat ueram felicitatem. Quam quoniam illi, quos colit theologia ista ciuilis, dare non posse conuicti sunt: non solum propter ista temporalia adque terrena, quod superioribus quinque libris ostendimus, sed multo magis propter uitam aeternam, quae post mortem futura est, quod isto uno etiam illis cooperantibus egimus, colendi non sunt. Sed quoniam ueternosae consuetudinis uis nimis in alto radices habet, si cui de ista ciuili theologia respuenda adque uitanda parum uideor disputasse, in aliud uolumen, quod huic opitulante Deo coniungendum est, animum intendat.

ENGLISH

life. Its ultimate death, therefore, is alienation from the life of God in an eternity of punishment.

Eternal life, then—that is, life happy without any end—is given only by the one who gives true happiness. Those whom this civil theology worships have been proven unable to give it. Therefore they are not to be worshiped. That holds not only for the sake of these temporal and earthly things, as we showed in the five preceding books. It holds much more for the sake of eternal life, which will come after death, and this is what we have argued in this single book, with the earlier books contributing as well. But the force of inveterate habit has its roots very deep. So if anyone thinks I have argued too little for rejecting and avoiding this civil theology, let him turn his attention to another volume, which, with God's help, is to be joined to this one.

Book VII

The select gods
Even Rome's chief gods and the philosophers' natural explanations of them cannot give eternal life.

PREFACE

Augustine asks patient readers to bear with him as he uproots old errors about the gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.pr	Diligentius me prauas et ueteres opiniones ueritati pietatis inimicas, quas tenebrosis animis altius et tenacius diuturnus humani generis error infixit, euellere adque exstirpare conantem et illius gratiae, qui hoc ut uerus Deus potest, pro meo modulo in eius adiutorio cooperantem ingenia celeriora adque meliora, quibus ad hanc rem superiores libri satis superque sufficiunt, patienter et aequanimiter ferre debebunt et propter alios non putare superfluum, quod iam sibi sentiunt non necessarium. Multum magna res agitur, cum uera et uere sancta diuinitas, quamuis ab ea nobis etiam huic, quam nunc gerimus, fragilitati necessaria subsidia praebeantur, non tamen propter mortalis uitae transitorium uaporem, sed propter uitam beatam, quae non nisi aeterna est, quaerenda et colenda praedicatur.	I am trying with some care to pluck out and uproot perverse and ancient opinions that are hostile to the truth of true religion, opinions which the long-standing error of the human race has driven deep and fast into darkened minds. In my small measure I am also working together with the grace of him who, as the true God, is able to do this, and I rely on his help. Quicker and better minds, for whom the earlier books are more than enough for this purpose, will have to bear with me patiently and calmly. For the sake of others, they should not think superfluous what they feel is no longer necessary for themselves. A very great matter is at stake when the true and truly holy divinity is proclaimed as the one to be sought and worshiped. It is true that this divinity also supplies the help we need for the frailty we now carry. Yet it is to be sought and worshiped not for the sake of the passing vapor of mortal life, but for the sake of the happy life, which can only be eternal.

WHETHER, SINCE IT IS CLEAR THAT DIVINITY IS NOT FOUND IN CIVIL THEOLOGY, WE SHOULD BELIEVE IT CAN BE FOUND IN THE SELECT GODS

Having refuted civil theology, Augustine turns to Varro's select gods, the chief deities of Rome.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.1	Hanc diuinitatem uel, ut sic dixerim, deitatem (nam et hoc uerbo uti iam nostros non piget, ut de Graeco expressius transferant quod illi θεότητα appellant) — hanc ergo diuinitatem siue deitatem non esse in ea theologia, quam ciuilem uocant, quae a Marco Varrone sedecim uoluminibus explicata est, id est non peruenire ad aeternae uitae felicitatem talium deorum cultu, quales a ciuitatibus qualiterque colendi instituti sunt, cui nondum persuasit sextus liber, quem proxime absoluimus, cum istum forsitan legerit, quid de hac quaestione expedienda ulterius desideret, non habebit.	This divinity, or deity, if I may put it so, is what we are concerned with. Our writers no longer hesitate to use this word too, so as to render more exactly what the Greeks call θεότητα [theotēta, godhead]. This divinity or deity, then, is not to be found in the theology they call civil, which Marcus Varro set out in sixteen books. That is, the happiness of eternal life is not reached by worshiping such gods as cities established for worship, in the way they established it. Someone may not yet have been persuaded of this by the sixth book, which I

LATIN	ENGLISH
Fieri enim potest, ut saltem deos selectos adque praecipuos, quos Varro uolumine conplexus est ultimo, de quibus parum diximus, quisquam colendos propter uitam beatam, quae non nisi aeterna est, opinetur.	have just finished. Once he has read this one, perhaps he will have nothing further to ask for in settling the question. For it is possible that someone may think that at least the select and principal gods ought to be worshiped for the sake of the happy life, which can only be eternal. Varro covered these gods in his last book, and so far we have said little about them.[1]
Qua in re non dico quod facetius ait Tertullianus fortasse quam uerius: Si di eliguntur ut bulbi, utique ceteri reprobi iudicantur. Non hoc dico: uideo enim etiam ex selectis selegi aliquos ad aliquid maius adque praestantius, sicut in militia, cum tirones electi fuerint, ex his quoque eliguntur ad opus aliquod maius armorum; et cum eliguntur in ecclesia, qui fiant praepositi, non utique ceteri reprobantur, cum omnes boni fideles electi merito nuncupentur. Eliguntur in aedificio lapides angulares, non reprobatis ceteris, qui structurae partibus aliis deputantur. Eliguntur uuae ad uescendum, nec reprobantur aliae, quas relinquimus ad bibendum. Non opus est multa percurrere, cum res in aperto sit.	On this point I do not repeat what Tertullian said, perhaps more wittily than truly: "If gods are selected like onions, then surely the rest are judged rejects." I do not say this, because I see that even from among the select, some are selected for something greater and more excellent. So in the army, when recruits have been chosen, some of them are chosen again for some greater feat of arms. And when men are chosen in the Church to become its leaders, the rest are certainly not rejected, since all good believers are rightly called the elect. In a building, cornerstones are chosen, but the other stones, which are assigned to other parts of the structure, are not rejected. Grapes are chosen for eating, and the others, which we leave for drinking, are not rejected. There is no need to run through many examples, since the point is plain.[2]
Quam ob rem non ex hoc, quod di ex multis quidam selecti sunt, uel is qui scripsit uel eorum cultores uel di ipsi uituperandi sunt, sed aduertendum potius quinam isti sint et ad quam rem selecti uideantur.	So the mere fact that certain gods were selected from among many is no reason to fault the man who wrote about them, or their worshipers, or the gods themselves. We should rather notice who these gods are, and for what purpose they appear to have been selected.

WHO THE SELECT GODS ARE, AND WHETHER THEY ARE EXEMPT FROM THE DUTIES OF THE LESSER GODS

Varro's twenty select gods turn out to share the petty tasks of conception and birth.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.2 Hos certe deos selectos Varro unius libri contextione commendat: Ianum, Iouem, Saturnum, Genium, Mercurium, Apollinem, Martem, Vulcanum, Neptunum, Solem, Orcum, Liberum patrem, Tellurem, Cererem, Iunonem, Lunam, Dianam, Mineruam, Venerem, Vestam; in quibus omnibus ferme uiginti duodecim mares, octo sunt feminae. Haec numina utrum propter maiores in	These, at any rate, are the select gods whom Varro presents in a single book: Janus, Jupiter, Saturn, Genius, Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Vulcan, Neptune, the Sun, Orcus, Father Liber, Tellus, Ceres, Juno, the Moon, Diana, Minerva, Venus and Vesta. Of all these, twenty in all, twelve are male and eight female. Are these deities said to have been selected

1 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), the most learned Roman scholar of antiquities. The last sixteen books of his Antiquities of Human and Divine Things dealt with the gods and are Augustine's main source here.
2 Tertullian (c. AD 160–225), Christian writer of Carthage; the quip is from his To the Nations 2.9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
mundo administrationes selecta dicuntur, an quod populis magis innotuerunt maiorque est eis cultus exhibitus? Si propterea, quia opera maiora ab his administrantur in mundo, non eos inuenire debuimus inter illam quasi plebeiam numinum multitudinem minutis opusculis deputatam. Nam ipse primum Ianus, cum puerperium concipitur, unde illa cuncta opera sumunt exordium minutatim minutis distributa numinibus, aditum aperit recipiendo semini.	because they have greater roles in governing the world, or because they became better known to the peoples and received greater worship? If it is because greater works in the world are managed by them, we ought not to have found them among that plebeian crowd of deities, so to speak, which is assigned to petty little tasks. Yet Janus himself comes first, when a child is conceived. This is the starting point of all those tasks parceled out bit by bit among the petty deities, and Janus opens the way to receive the seed.[3]
Ibi est et Saturnus propter ipsum semen; ibi Liber, qui marem effuso semine liberat; ibi Libera, quam et Venerem uolunt, quae hoc idem beneficium conferat feminae, ut etiam ipsa emisso semine liberetur. Omnes hi ex illis sunt, qui selecti appellantur. Sed ibi est et dea Mena, quae menstruis fluoribus praeest, quamuis Iouis filia, tamen ignobilis. Et hanc prouinciam fluorum menstruorum in libro selectorum deorum ipsi Iunoni idem auctor adsignat, quae in dis selectis etiam regina est et hic tamquam Iuno Lucina cum eadem Mena priuigna sua eidem cruori praesidet. Ibi sunt et duo nescio qui obscurissimi, Vitumnus et Sentinus, quorum alter uitam, alter sensus puerperio largiuntur. Et nimirum multo plus praestant, cum sint ignobilissimi, quam illi tot proceres et selecti.	Saturn is there too, because of the seed itself. Liber is there, who "liberates" the male by the release of seed. Libera is there, whom they also identify with Venus, and who confers the same benefit on the female, so that she too is freed by the emission of seed. All of these are among those called select. But the goddess Mena is there too, who presides over menstrual flow. She is a daughter of Jupiter, yet she is of no account. And in his book on the select gods, the same author assigns this province of menstrual flow to Juno herself, who is queen even among the select gods. Here, as Juno Lucina, she presides over that same blood together with Mena, her stepdaughter. Two very obscure gods are there too, whoever they may be, Vitumnus and Sentinus. One of them bestows life on the unborn child, the other the senses. And surely these two, the lowliest of all, provide far more than all those grandees, the select.[4]
Nam profecto sine uita et sensu, quid est illud totum, quod muliebri utero geritur, nisi nescio quid abiectissimum limo ac pulueri conparandum?	For without life and sensation, what is all that is carried in a woman's womb but some utterly worthless thing, comparable to mud and dust?

THAT NO REASON CAN BE GIVEN FOR THE SELECTION OF CERTAIN GODS, SINCE A MORE IMPORTANT FUNCTION IS ASSIGNED TO MANY LOWER ONES

Obscure gods like Vitumnus and Sentinus give more than the select ones; selection must be mere fame or fortune.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.3 Quae igitur causa tot selectos deos ad haec opera minima conpulit, ubi a Vitumno et Sentino, quos fama obscura recondit, in huius munificentiae partitione superentur? Confert enim selectus Ianus aditum et quasi ianuam semini; confert selectus Saturnus semen ipsum; confert selectus Liber eiusdem seminis emissionem uiris; confert hoc idem Libera, quae Ceres seu Venus est, feminis;	What reason, then, drove so many select gods to these tiniest of tasks? In the sharing out of this bounty they are outdone by Vitumnus and Sentinus, whom obscurity keeps hidden. The select Janus provides the entrance, the "door," as it were, for the seed. The select Saturn provides the seed itself. The select Liber provides men with the 3 Orcus was the god of the underworld; Tellus was the goddess of the earth.

4 Lucina, "she who brings to light," was Juno's title as goddess of childbirth.

LATIN

confert selecta Iuno, et hoc non sola, sed cum Mena, filia Iouis, fluores menstruos ad eius, quod conceptum est, incrementum: et confert Vitumnus obscurus et ignobilis uitam; confert Sentinus obscurus et ignobilis sensum; quae duo tanto illis rebus praestantiora sunt, quanto et ipsa intellectu ac ratione uincuntur.

Sicut enim, quae ratiocinantur et intellegunt, profecto potiora sunt his, quae sine intellectu adque ratione ut pecora uiuunt et sentiunt: ita et illa, quae uita sensuque sunt praedita, his, quae nec uiuunt nec sentiunt, merito praeferuntur. Inter selectos itaque deos Vitumnus uiuificator et Sentinus sensificator magis haberi debuerunt quam Ianus seminis admissor et Saturnus seminis dator uel sator et Liber et Libera seminum commotores uel emissores; quae semina cogitare indignum est, nisi ad uitam sensumque peruenerint, quae munera selecta non dantur a dis selectis, sed a quibusdam incognitis et prae istorum dignitate neglectis.

Quod si respondetur omnium initiorum potestatem habere Ianum et ideo illi etiam quod aperitur conceptui non inmerito adtribui, et omnium seminum Saturnum et ideo seminationem quoque hominis non posse ab eius operatione seiungi, omnium seminum emittendorum Liberum et Liberam et ideo his etiam praeesse, quae ad substituendos homines pertinent, omnium purgandorum et pariendorum Iunonem et ideo eam non deesse purgationibus feminarum et partubus hominum: quaerant quid respondeant de Vitumno et Sentino, utrum et ipsos uelint habere omnium quae uiuunt et sentiunt potestatem. Quod si concedunt, adtendant quam eos sublimius locaturi sint. Nam seminibus nasci in terra et ex terra est; uiuere autem adque sentire etiam deos sidereos opinantur.

Si autem dicunt Vitumno adque Sentino haec sola adtributa, quae in carne uiuescunt et sensibus adminiculantur, quur non deus ille, qui facit omnia uiuere adque sentire, etiam carni uitam praebet et sensum, uniuersali opere hoc munus etiam partubus emission of that seed. Libera, who is Ceres or Venus, provides the same for women. The select Juno provides menstrual flow for the growth of what has been conceived, and she does not do it alone, but with Mena, the daughter of Jupiter. Vitumnus, obscure and of no account, provides life. Sentinus, obscure and of no account, provides sensation. These two gifts surpass those other things by as much as they themselves are surpassed by intellect and reason.

ENGLISH

Beings that reason and understand are certainly superior to those that live and feel without intellect and reason, as cattle do. In the same way, things endowed with life and sensation are rightly ranked above things that neither live nor feel. So Vitumnus the life-giver and Sentinus the sense-giver ought to have been counted among the select gods. They have a better claim than Janus the admitter of seed, Saturn the giver or sower of seed, and Liber and Libera the movers or emitters of seed. Those seeds are not even worth thinking about unless they come to life and sensation. Yet these select gifts are given not by the select gods, but by certain unknown gods who are neglected in comparison with the dignity of the others.

Suppose the answer is this. Janus has power over all beginnings, and so the opening for conception is fittingly attributed to him. Saturn has power over all seeds, and so the sowing of a human being cannot be separated from his work either. Liber and Libera have power over the emission of all seeds, and so they also preside over what concerns the replacement of one human generation by the next. Juno has power over all purifications and all births, and so she is present at women's purgations and at the births of human beings. Then let them find an answer about Vitumnus and Sentinus. Do they want these two also to have power over all things that live and feel? If they grant this, let them notice how much higher they will be placing them. For to be born from seeds happens on the earth and from the earth, while to live and to feel, they believe, belongs even to the gods of the stars.

But suppose they say that only the things which come alive in the flesh and are sustained by the senses are attributed to Vitumnus and Sentinus. Then why does the god who makes all things live and feel not also give life and sensation to the tribuens? et quid opus est Vitumno adque Sentino? Quod si ab illo, qui uitae ac sensibus uniuersaliter praesidet, his quasi famulis ista carnalia uelut extrema et ima commissa sunt: itane sunt illi selecti destituti familia, ut non inuenirent quibus etiam ipsi ista committerent, sed cum tota sua nobilitate, qua uisi sunt seligendi, opus facere cum ignobilibus cogerentur? Iuno selecta et regina Iouisque et soror et coniunx; haec tamen Iterduca est pueris et opus facit cum deabus ignobilissimis Abeona et Adeona.

LATIN

ENGLISH

flesh, bestowing this gift on unborn children too by his universal operation? And what need is there of Vitumnus and Sentinus? Perhaps these fleshly matters, as the farthest and lowest, were entrusted to them as household servants by the one who presides over life and sensation universally. In that case, are those select gods so short of servants that they could not find anyone to whom they too might entrust these tasks? For all the nobility that seemed to qualify them for selection, were they forced to work alongside the lowly? Juno is select, she is queen, and she is both sister and wife of Jupiter. Yet she is Iterduca, the guide of children on their way, and she works alongside the lowliest goddesses, Abeona and Adeona.[5]

Ibi posuerunt et Mentem deam, quae faciat pueris bonam mentem, et inter selectos ista non ponitur, quasi quidquam maius praestari homini potest; ponitur autem Iuno, quia Iterduca est et Domiduca, quasi quidquam prosit iter carpere et domum duci, si mens non est bona, cuius muneris deam selectores isti inter selecta numina minime posuerunt. Quae profecto et Mineruae fuerat praeferenda, cui per ista minuta opera puerorum memoriam tribuerunt. Quis enim dubitet multo esse melius habere bonam mentem quam memoriam quantumlibet ingentem? Nemo enim malus est, qui bonam habet mentem; quidam uero pessimi memoria sunt mirabili, tanto peiores quanto minus possunt quod male cogitant obliuisci. Et tamen Minerua est inter selectos deos; Mentem autem deam turba uilis operuit. Quid de Virtute dicam? quid de Felicitate?

There they also placed the goddess Mind, who gives children a good mind. She is not placed among the select, as though anything greater could be given to a human being. But Juno is placed there, because she is Iterduca and Domiduca, the one who guides on the way and the one who leads home. As if there were any use in making a journey and being led home when the mind is not good! These selectors by no means placed the goddess of that gift among the select deities. She surely ought to have been ranked above Minerva too, to whom, among these petty tasks, they assigned children's memory. Who would doubt that it is far better to have a good mind than any memory, however vast? No one who has a good mind is wicked. But some of the very worst people have an amazing memory, and they are all the worse because they are less able to forget the evil they plan. And yet Minerva is among the select gods, while the goddess Mind lies buried in the worthless crowd. What shall I say of Virtue? What of Felicity?

de quibus in quarto libro plura iam diximus; quas cum deas haberent, nullum eis locum inter selectos deos dare uoluerunt, ubi dederunt Marti et Orco, uni effectori mortium alteri receptori.

I have already said a good deal about them in the fourth book. Though they held these two to be goddesses, they chose to give them no place among the select gods. Yet they gave a place there to Mars and Orcus, the one the maker of deaths, the other their receiver.

Cum igitur in his minutis operibus, quae minutatim dis pluribus distributa sunt, etiam ipsos selectos uideamus tamquam senatum cum plebe pariter operari, et inueniamus a quibusdam dis, qui nequaquam seligendi

In these petty tasks, parceled out bit by bit among many gods, we see even the select gods working side by side with the rest, like a senate with the 5 Abeona and Adeona were minor goddesses of a child's going away and coming back.

LATIN

putati sunt, multa maiora adque meliora administrari quam ab illis, qui selecti uocantur: restat arbitrari non propter praestantiores in mundo administrationes, sed quia prouenit eis, ut magis populis innotescerent, selectos eos et praecipuos nuncupatos. Unde dicit etiam ipse Varro, quod dis quibusdam patribus et deabus matribus, sicut hominibus, ignobilitas accidisset. Si ergo Felicitas ideo fortasse inter selectos deos esse non debuit, quod ad istam nobilitatem non merito, sed fortuito peruenerunt: saltem inter illos uel potius prae illis Fortuna poneretur, quam dicunt deam non rationabili dispositione, sed ut temere acciderit, sua cuique dona conferre.

Haec in dis selectis tenere apicem debuit, in quibus maxime quid posset ostendit; quando eos uidemus non praecipua uirtute, non rationabili felicitate, sed temeraria, sicut eorum cultores de illa sentiunt, Fortunae potestate selectos. Nam et uir disertissimus Sallustius etiam ipsos deos fortassis adtendit, cum diceret: Sed profecto fortuna in omni re dominatur; ea res cunctas ex libidine magis quam ex uero celebrat obscuratque. Non enim possunt inuenire causam, quur celebrata sit Venus et obscurata sit Virtus, cum ambarum ab istis consecrata sint numina nec conparanda sint merita. Aut si hoc nobilitari meruit, quod plures adpetunt, plures enim Venerem quam Virtutem: quur celebrata est dea Minerua et obscurata est dea Pecunia?

cum in genere humano plures adliciat auaritia quam peritia, et in eis ipsis, qui sunt artificiosi, raro inuenias hominem, qui non habeat artem suam pecuniaria mercede uenalem, plurisque pendatur semper propter quod aliquid fit, quam id quod propter aliud fit. Si ergo insipientis iudicio multitudinis facta est deorum ista selectio, quur dea Pecunia Mineruae praelata non est, cum propter pecuniam sint artifices multi? Si autem paucorum sapientium est ista distinctio, quur non praelata est Veneri Virtus, cum eam longe praeferat ratio?

ENGLISH

common people. We also find that certain gods who were never thought worth selecting manage many greater and better things than those called select. It remains to conclude that the select gods were called select and principal not because of more excellent roles in the world, but because they happened to become better known to the peoples. Hence Varro himself says that obscurity had befallen some father gods and mother goddesses, just as it befalls human beings. Perhaps, then, Felicity ought not to be among the select gods, since they reached that eminence not by merit but by chance. In that case Fortune at least should have been placed among them, or rather ahead of them. For they say that this goddess bestows her gifts on each person not by any rational plan, but as it happens, at random.

She should have held the top place among the select gods, for it is in them above all that she showed what she could do. We see that they were selected not for outstanding virtue, nor by a happiness grounded in reason, but by the random power of Fortune, as her worshipers think of her. That most eloquent man Sallust perhaps had the gods themselves in view when he said: "But surely fortune rules in everything; it makes all things famous or obscure according to whim rather than truth." For they cannot find a reason why Venus was made famous and Virtue left obscure, since they consecrated both as deities and their merits do not bear comparison. Or suppose fame was earned by whatever more people seek, and more people seek Venus than Virtue. Then why was the goddess Minerva made famous and the goddess Money left obscure?[6]

After all, greed attracts more of humankind than skill does. Even among the skilled, you will rarely find anyone who does not offer his art for sale at a price in money. And the thing for which something is done is always valued more highly than what is done for the sake of something else. So if this selection of gods was made by the judgment of the foolish multitude, why was the goddess Money not ranked above Minerva, since many people are craftsmen for the sake of money? But if this distinction was made by the wise few, why was Virtue not ranked above Venus, when reason ranks her far above?

6 Sallust (86–c. 35 BC), Roman historian; the quotation is from The War with Catiline 8.1.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Saltem certe, ut dixi, ipsa Fortuna, quae, sicut putant qui ei plurimum tribuunt, in omni re dominatur et res cunctas ex libidine magis quam ex uero celebrat obscuratque, si tantum et in deos ualuit, ut temerario iudicio suo quos uellet celebraret obscuraretque quos uellet, praecipuum locum haberet in selectis, quae in ipsos quoque deos tam praecipuae est potestatis. An ut illic esse non posset, nihil aliud etiam ipsa Fortuna nisi aduersam putanda est habuisse fortunam? Sibi ergo aduersata est, quae alios nobiles faciens nobilitata non est.

At the very least, as I said, Fortune herself should have had the chief place among the select. Those who credit her most believe that she "rules in everything" and "makes all things famous or obscure according to whim rather than truth." If she had so much power even over the gods that by her random judgment she made famous whom she pleased and obscure whom she pleased, she should have held that chief place, since she has such supreme power over the gods themselves. Or are we to suppose that she could not be there for no other reason than that Fortune herself had bad fortune? Then she was her own adversary, for she made others eminent and did not become eminent herself.

THAT THE LESSER GODS, WHO ARE NOT DISGRACED BY ANY SCANDALS, FARED BETTER THAN THE SELECT GODS, WHOSE GREAT OBSCENITIES ARE CELEBRATED

The lesser gods are free of scandal, while the select gods are famous for their crimes.

LATIN

ENGLISH

7.4 Gratularetur autem dis istis selectis quisquam nobilitatis et claritudinis adpetitor et eos diceret fortunatos, si non eos magis ad iniurias quam ad honores selectos uideret. Nam illam infimam turbam ipsa ignobilitas texit, ne obrueretur obprobriis. Ridemus quidem, cum eos uidemus figmentis humanarum opinionum partitis inter se operibus distributos, tamquam minuscularios uectigalium conductores uel tamquam opifices in uico argentario, ubi unum uasculum, ut perfectum exeat, per multos artifices transit, cum ab uno perfecto perfici posset. Sed aliter non putatum est operantium multitudini consulendum, nisi ut singulas artis partes cito ac facile discerent singuli, ne omnes in arte una tarde ac difficile cogerentur esse perfecti.

Someone hungry for rank and renown might congratulate these select gods and call them fortunate, if he did not see that they were selected more for insults than for honors. For that lowest crowd was shielded by its very obscurity from being buried under disgrace. We laugh, indeed, when we see the gods divided up by the fictions of human opinion, with the tasks shared out among them. They are like petty tax-farmers, or like the workmen in the silversmiths' street, where a single little vessel passes through many craftsmen before it comes out complete, though one complete craftsman could complete it. But the only way thought to serve the interests of the mass of workers was for each to learn a single part of the craft quickly and easily. That way they would not all be forced to master a whole craft slowly and with difficulty.

Verum tamen uix quisquam reperitur deorum non selectorum, qui aliquo crimine famam traxit infamem; uix autem selectorum quispiam, qui non in se notam contumeliae insignis acceperit. Illi ad istorum humilia opera descenderunt, isti in illorum sublimia crimina non uenerunt. De Iano quidem non mihi facile quidquam occurrit, quod ad probrum pertineat. Et fortasse talis fuerit, innocentius uixerit et a facinoribus flagitiisque remotius. Saturnum fugientem benignus excepit; cum

Yet hardly one of the unselected gods is found who has brought infamy on his name by some crime. On the other hand, hardly one of the select has not been branded with some notable disgrace. The select came down to the humble tasks of the lowly, but the lowly did not rise to the lofty crimes of the select. About Janus, indeed, nothing that amounts to a scandal readily comes to my mind. Perhaps he really was like that, and lived more innocently and

LATIN	ENGLISH
hospite partitus est regnum, ut etiam ciuitates singulas conderent, iste laniculum, ille Saturniam. Sed isti in cultu deorum omnis dedecoris adpetitores, cuius uitam minus turpem inuenerunt, eum simulacri monstrosa deformitate turparunt, nunc eum bifrontem, nunc etiam quadrifrontem, tamquam geminum, facientes.	further removed from crimes and vices. He kindly received Saturn when Saturn was in flight, and he shared his kingdom with his guest, so that each even founded his own city: Janus the Janiculum, Saturn Saturnia. But in worshiping the gods these people hungered for every kind of disgrace. So, finding his life less shameful than the others', they disfigured him with the monstrous ugliness of his statue. They made him now two-faced, now even four-faced, as though he were a double.[7]
An forte uoluerunt, ut, quoniam plurimi di selecti erubescenda perpetrando amiserant frontem, quanto iste innocentior esset, tanto frontosior appareret?	Or perhaps they wanted this: since most of the select gods had lost face by committing shameful deeds, the more innocent Janus was, the more faces he should show?[8]

THE MORE SECRET DOCTRINE OF THE PAGANS AND THEIR EXPLANATIONS FROM NATURAL SCIENCE

Varro claims images of the gods are symbols of the world soul and its parts.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.5 Sed ipsorum potius interpretationes physicas audiamus, quibus turpitudinem miserrimi erroris uelut altioris doctrinae specie colorare conantur. Primum eas interpretationes sic Varro commendat, ut dicat antiquos simulacra deorum et insignia ornatusque finxisse, quae cum oculis animaduertissent hi, qui adissent doctrinae mysteria, possent animam mundi ac partes eius, id est deos ueros, animo uidere; quorum qui simulacra specie hominis fecerunt, hoc uideri secutos, quod mortalium animus, qui est in corpore humano, simillimus est inmortalis animi; tamquam si uasa ponerentur causa notandorum deorum et in Liberi aede oenophorum sisteretur, quod significaret uinum, per id quod continet id quod continetur; ita per simulacrum, quod formam haberet humanam, significari animam rationalem, quod eo uelut uase natura ista soleat contineri, cuius naturae deum uolunt esse uel deos.	But let us rather hear their own natural interpretations, by which they try to color the ugliness of their most wretched error with an appearance of deeper learning. First, Varro recommends these interpretations by saying that the ancients fashioned images of the gods, with their emblems and adornments, for a purpose. Those who had approached the mysteries of the doctrine would see these things with their eyes, and so be able to see with their minds the soul of the world and its parts, that is, the true gods. Those who made the images in human form, he says, seem to have followed this idea: the mind of mortals, which is in the human body, is very like the immortal mind. It is as if vessels were set up to signify gods, and a wine jar were placed in the temple of Liber to signify wine, so that the container stands for what it contains. In the same way, he says, an image in human form signifies the rational soul, because that nature is usually contained in the human form as in a vessel. And it is of that nature that they hold a god, or the gods, to consist.
Haec sunt mysteria doctrinae, quae iste uir doctissimus penetrauerat, unde in lucem ista proferret. Sed, o homo acutissime, num in istis doctrinae mysteriis illam prudentiam perdidisti, qua tibi sobrie uisum est, quod hi, qui primi populis simulacra constituerunt, et metum	These are the mysteries of doctrine which this most learned man had penetrated, so that he could bring these things out into the light. But, you most acute of men, did you lose in these mysteries of doctrine that good sense by which you

7 The Janiculum is a hill across the Tiber from Rome; Saturnia was said to be an ancient settlement on the Capitol.
8 Augustine puns on frons, "forehead, face," which also stood for a sense of shame.

LATIN

demserunt ciuibus suis et errorem addiderunt, castiusque deos sine simulacris ueteres obseruasse Romanos? Hi enim tibi fuerunt auctores, ut haec contra posteriores Romanos dicere auderes. Nam si et illi antiquissimi simulacra coluissent, fortassis totum istum sensum de simulacris non constituendis, interim uerum, timoris silentio premeres et in huiusce modi perniciosis uanisque figmentis mysteria ista doctrinae loquacius et elatius praedicares.

Anima tua tamen tam docta et ingeniosa (ubi te multum dolemus) per haec mysteria doctrinae ad Deum suum, id est a quo facta est, non cum quo facta est; nec cuius portio, sed cuius conditio est; nec qui est omnium anima, sed qui fecit omnem animam, quo solo inlustrante anima fit beata, si eius gratiae non sit ingrata, nullo modo potuit peruenire. Verum ista mysteria doctrinae qualia sint quantique pendenda, quae sequuntur ostendent. Fatetur interim uir iste doctissimus animam mundi ac partes eius esse ueros deos; unde intellegitur totam eius theologian, eam ipsam scilicet naturalem, cui plurimum tribuit, usque ad animae rationalis naturam se extendere potuisse.

De naturali enim paucissima praeloquitur in hoc libro, quem de dis selectis ultimum scripsit; in quo uidebimus utrum per interpretationes physiologicas possit ad hanc naturalem referre ciuilem. Quod si potuerit, tota naturalis erit: et quid opus erat ab ea ciuilem tanta cura distinctionis abiungere? Si autem recto discrimine separata est: quando nec ista uera est quae illi naturalis placet (peruenit enim usque ad animam, non usque ad uerum Deum qui fecit et animam), quanto est abiectior et falsior ista ciuilis, quae maxime circa corporum est occupata naturam, sicut ipsae interpretationes eius, ex quibus quaedam necessaria commemorare me oportet, tanta ab ipsis exquisitae et enucleatae diligentia demonstrabunt.

ENGLISH

soberly judged two things? You judged that those who first set up images for the peoples both took away fear from their fellow citizens and added error. You also judged that the ancient Romans worshiped the gods more purely without images. It was those ancient Romans who gave you the authority to dare to say this against the later Romans. For if those most ancient Romans had also worshiped images, perhaps you would have suppressed in fearful silence that whole view about not setting up images, true as it was. And you would have proclaimed these mysteries of doctrine, embodied in such pernicious and empty fictions, all the more loquaciously and loftily.[9]

Yet your soul, so learned and so gifted, could by no means reach its God through these mysteries of doctrine, and for this we grieve for you greatly. That God is the one by whom your soul was made, not with whom it was made. Your soul is not a portion of him, but his creation. He is not the soul of all things, but the one who made every soul. By his illumination alone the soul becomes happy, if it is not ungrateful for his grace. What kind of mysteries of doctrine these are, and how highly they should be valued, what follows will show. Meanwhile, this most learned man admits that the soul of the world and its parts are the true gods. From this we understand that his whole theology could extend only as far as the nature of the rational soul. This includes the natural theology itself, to which he attributes the most.

For he says very little about natural theology, by way of preface, in this last book, the one he wrote on the select gods. In it we shall see whether, through interpretations drawn from natural philosophy, he can trace civil theology back to this natural theology. If he can, it will be wholly natural, and then what need was there to separate civil theology from it with such careful distinction? But suppose it was rightly kept separate. Even this natural theology that he favors is not true, for it reaches as far as the soul, not as far as the true God who made the soul too. How much more abject and false, then, is this civil theology, which is mostly occupied with the nature of bodies! Its own interpretations will show this, though they have sought them out and explained them with such 9 Varro's remark about images was quoted by Augustine earlier, at 4.31.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		great diligence. I must mention some of these interpretations, as is necessary.

VARRO'S OPINION THAT GOD IS THE SOUL OF THE WORLD, WHICH NEVERTHELESS HAS IN ITS PARTS MANY SOULS WHOSE NATURE IS DIVINE

Varro calls god the soul of the world and fills its four regions with divine souls.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.6	Dicit ergo idem Varro adhuc de naturali theologia praeloquens deum se arbitrari esse animam mundi, quem Graeci uocant κόσμον, et hunc ipsum mundum esse deum; sed sicut hominem sapientem, cum sit ex corpore et animo, tamen ab animo dici sapientem, ita mundum deum dici ab animo, cum sit ex animo et corpore. Hic uidetur quoquo modo unum confiteri Deum; sed ut plures etiam introducat, adiungit mundum diuidi in duas partes, caelum et terram; et caelum bifariam, in aethera et aera; terram uero in aquam et humum; e quibus summum esse aethera, secundum aera, tertiam aquam, infimam terram; quas omnes partes quattuor animarum esse plenas, in aethere et aere inmortalium, in aqua et terra mortalium.	So Varro, still speaking of natural theology in his preface, says that he thinks god is the soul of the world, which the Greeks call κόσμον [kosmos, world], and that this world itself is god. Just as a wise man, though he consists of body and mind, is nevertheless called wise because of his mind, so the world is called god because of its mind, though it consists of mind and body. Here he seems in some fashion to acknowledge one God. But in order to bring in more gods as well, he adds that the world is divided into two parts, heaven and earth. Heaven is divided in two, into ether and air, and earth into water and land. Of these the highest is ether, the second air, the third water, and the lowest earth. All four parts, he says, are full of souls: immortal ones in the ether and the air, mortal ones in the water and the earth.
	Ab summo autem circuitu caeli ad circulum lunae aetherias animas esse astra ac stellas; eos caelestes deos non modo intellegi esse, sed etiam uideri; inter lunae uero gyrum et nimborum ac uentorum cacumina aerias esse animas, sed eas animo, non oculis uideri et uocari heroas et lares et genios. Haec est uidelicet breuiter in ista praelocutione proposita theologia naturalis, quae non huic tantum, sed multis philosophis placuit; de qua tunc diligentius disserendum est, cum de ciuili, quantum ad deos selectos adtinet, opitulante Deo uero quod restat inpleuero.	From the highest circuit of the heaven down to the circle of the moon, the souls of the ether are the constellations and the stars. These heavenly gods are not only understood to exist but can actually be seen. Between the moon's orbit and the tops of the clouds and winds are the souls of the air. These are seen with the mind, not with the eyes, and they are called heroes, Lares and Genii. This, then, is the natural theology briefly set out in that preface. It pleased not only Varro but many philosophers. It will have to be discussed more thoroughly once I have finished, with the help of the true God, what remains to be said about civil theology as it concerns the select gods.[10]

WHETHER IT WAS REASONABLE TO MAKE JANUS AND TERMINUS TWO SEPARATE GODS

Why should beginnings belong to Janus and ends to Terminus, if Janus is the world?

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.7	Ianus igitur, a quo sumsit exordium, quaero quisnam sit. Respondetur: Mundus est. Breuis haec plane est adque	Janus, then, with whom Varro began: who is he, I ask? The answer comes back: "He is the world."

10 The Lares were Roman guardian spirits of the household and the crossroads; a Genius was the guardian spirit of a person or a place.

LATIN

aperta responsio. Quur ergo ad eum dicuntur rerum initia pertinere, fines uero ad alterum, quem Terminum uocant? Nam propter initia et fines duobus istis dis duos menses perhibent dedicatos praeter illos decem, quibus usque ad Decembrem caput est Martius, Ianuarium lano, Februarium Termino. Ideo Terminalia eodem mense Februario celebrari dicunt, cum fit sacrum purgatorium, quod uocant Februm, unde mensis nomen accepit. Numquid ergo ad mundum, qui lanus est, initia rerum pertinent et fines non pertinent, ut alter illis deus praeficeretur? Nonne omnia, quae in hoc mundo fieri dicunt, in hoc etiam mundo terminari fatentur? Quae est ista uanitas, in opere illi dare potestatem dimidiam, in simulacro faciem duplam?

ENGLISH

That is certainly a short and plain answer. Why, then, are the beginnings of things said to belong to him, but their ends to another god, whom they call Terminus? For they say that, because of beginnings and ends, two months were dedicated to these two gods, besides the ten months running from March, their head, to December: January to Janus and February to Terminus. That, they say, is why the Terminalia is celebrated in this same month of February, when the purification rite called the Februum is performed, from which the month took its name. So do the beginnings of things belong to the world, which is Janus, while their ends do not, so that another god had to be put in charge of them? Do they not admit that everything they say comes about in this world also comes to its end in this world? What folly is this, to give him half the power in his work and a double face in his image?[11]

Nonne istum bifrontem multo elegantius interpretarentur, si eundem et Ianum et Terminum dicerent adque initiis unam faciem, finibus alteram darent? quoniam qui operatur utrumque debet intendere; in omni enim motu actionis suae qui non respicit initium non prospicit finem. Unde necesse est a memoria respiciente prospiciens conectatur intentio; nam cui exciderit quod coeperit, quo modo finiat non inueniet. Quod si uitam beatam in hoc mundo inchoari putarent, extra mundum perfici, et ideo Iano, id est mundo, solam initiorum tribuerent potestatem: profecto ei praeponerent Terminum eumque ab dis selectis non alienarent. Quamquam etiam nunc cum in istis duobus dis initia rerum temporalium finesque tractantur, Termino dari debuit plus honoris.

Would they not interpret this two-faced god far more elegantly if they said he was both Janus and Terminus, and gave one face to beginnings and the other to ends? For whoever is at work must keep both in view. In every movement of his activity, the one who does not look back to the beginning does not look ahead to the end. So the intention that looks forward must be linked to the memory that looks back, for someone who has forgotten what he began will not find a way to finish it. Now if they thought that the happy life begins in this world and is completed beyond it, and for that reason assigned to Janus, that is, to the world, only the power over beginnings, then surely they would rank Terminus above him and would not shut him out of the select gods. And yet even as things are, with the beginnings and ends of temporal things handled by these two gods, more honor ought to have been given to Terminus.

Maior enim laetitia est, cum res quaeque perficitur; sollicitudinis autem plena sunt coepta, donec perducantur ad finem, quem qui aliquid incipit maxime adpetit intendit, expectat exoptat, nec de re inchoata, nisi terminetur, exultat.

For there is greater joy when anything is completed, whereas undertakings are full of anxiety until they are brought to their end. That end is what anyone who begins something most seeks and aims at, awaits and longs for, and he does not rejoice over something begun unless it is finished.

11 Terminus was the Roman god of boundary stones; his festival, the Terminalia, fell on February 23.

WHY THE WORSHIPERS OF JANUS MADE HIS IMAGE WITH TWO FACES, THOUGH THEY ALSO WANT IT SEEN WITH FOUR

Janus's two faces are explained by the human mouth; his four faces by the world's quarters.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.8	Sed iam bifrontis simulacri interpretatio proferatur. Duas eum facies ante et retro habere dicunt, quod hiatus noster, cum os aperimus, mundo similis uideatur; unde et palatum Graeci οὐρανὸν appellant, et nonnulli, inquit, poetae Latini caelum uocauerunt palatum, a quo hiatu oris et foras esse aditum ad dentes uersus et introrsus ad fauces. Ecce quo perductus est mundus propter palati nostri uocabulum uel Graecum uel poeticum. Quid autem hoc ad animam, quid ad uitam aeternam? Propter solas saliuas colatur hic deus, quibus partim glutiendis partim spuendis sub caelo palati utraque panditur ianua.	But now let us bring out the interpretation of the two-faced image. They say he has two faces, one in front and one behind, because the opening of our mouth, when we open it, looks like the world. That is why the Greeks call the palate οὐρανόν [ouranos, sky], and why some Latin poets, Varro says, have called the sky the palate. From this opening of the mouth there is a way out toward the teeth and a way in toward the throat. See what the world has been brought down to, all because of a word for our palate, whether Greek or poetic! But what has this to do with the soul, or with eternal life? Let this god be worshiped for the sake of saliva alone, since it is for saliva, partly to be swallowed and partly to be spat out, that both doors open beneath the sky of the palate.[12]
	Quid est porro absurdius, quam in ipso mundo non inuenire duas ianuas ex aduerso sitas, per quas uel admittat ad se aliquid intro uel emittat a se foras, et de nostro ore et gutture, quorum similitudinem mundus non habet, uelle mundi simulacrum conponere in Iano propter solum I palatum, cuius similitudinem Ianus non habet? Cum uero eum faciunt quadrifrontem et Ianum geminum appellant, ad quattuor mundi partes hoc interpretantur, quasi aliquid spectet mundus foras sicut per omnes facies Ianus.	Besides, what could be more absurd than this? In the world itself they find no two doors set opposite each other through which it might let anything in or send anything out. Yet from our mouth and throat, which the world does not resemble, they want to make up an image of the world in Janus, and all for the sake of the palate alone, which Janus does not resemble either. And when they make him four-faced and call him Janus Geminus, "Twin Janus," they interpret this as referring to the four quarters of the world, as if the world looked out at something the way Janus does with all his faces.[13]
	Deinde si Ianus est mundus et mundus quattuor partibus constat, falsum est simulacrum Iani bifrontis; aut si propterea uerum est, quia etiam nomine Orientis et Occidentis totus solet mundus intellegi, numquid, cum duas partes alias nominamus Septentrionis et Austri, sicut illum quadrifrontem dicunt geminum Ianum, ita quisquam geminum dicturus est mundum? Non habent omnino unde quattuor ianuas, quae intrantibus et exeuntibus pateant, interpretentur ad mundi similitudinem, sicut de bifronti quod dicerent saltem in ore hominis inuenerunt, nisi Neptunus forte subueniat et porrigat piscem, cui praeter hiatum oris et gutturis etiam dextra et sinistra fauces patent. Et tamen hanc uanitatem	Then again, if Janus is the world and the world consists of four parts, the image of two-faced Janus is false. Or if it is true because the whole world is commonly meant by the names East and West, then when we name the other two parts, North and South, will anyone call the world "twin," as they call the four-faced Janus "Twin"? They have nothing at all by which to interpret four doors, open to those going in and out, as a likeness of the world, in the way that for the two-faced image they found at least something to say in the human mouth. Unless perhaps Neptune comes to the 12 Latin ianua, "door," was connected with the name of Janus, the god of doorways and gates.

13 Janus Geminus was the name of Janus's shrine in the Roman Forum, whose doors were closed in time of peace.

LATIN	ENGLISH
per tot ianuas nulla effugit anima, nisi quae audit ueritatem dicentem: Ego sum ianua.	rescue and offers them a fish, which besides the opening of mouth and throat also has gills opening on the right and the left! And yet from this folly, with all its doors, no soul escapes except the one that hears the Truth saying, "I am the door."[14]

THE POWER OF JUPITER, AND A COMPARISON OF HIM WITH JANUS

Jupiter is said to hold the causes of things, yet Janus is ranked before him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.9 Iouem autem, qui etiam Iuppiter dicitur, quem uelint in-; tellegi, exponant. Deus est, inquiunt, habens potestatem causarum, quibus aliquid fit in mundo. Hoc quam magnum sit, nobilissimus Vergilii uersus ille testatur: Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas. Sed quur ei praeponitur Ianus? hoc nobis uir ille acutissimus doctissimusque respondeat. Quoniam penes Ianum, inquit, sunt prima, penes louem summa. Merito ergo rex omnium Iuppiter habetur. Prima enim uincuntur a summis, quia, licet prima praecedant tempore, summa superant dignitate. Sed recte hoc diceretur, si factorum prima discernerentur et summa; sicut initium facti est proficisci, summum peruenire; initium facti inceptio discendi, summum perceptio doctrinae; ac sic in omnibus prima sunt initia summique sunt fines. Sed iam hoc negotium inter Ianum Terminumque discussum est.	Next, let them explain whom they want us to understand by Jove, who is also called Jupiter. "He is the god," they say, "who has power over the causes by which anything comes about in the world." How great a thing this is, that most famous line of Virgil bears witness: "Happy the one who could learn the causes of things." But why is Janus placed before him? Let that most acute and learned man answer us. "Because," he says, "first things are in the power of Janus, highest things in the power of Jupiter. So Jupiter is rightly held to be the king of all. For first things are surpassed by highest things, since, although first things come before in time, highest things excel in dignity." That would be rightly said if what is first and what is highest were being distinguished in things done. For example, the beginning of an act is setting out, its highest point arriving; the beginning is starting to learn, the highest point acquiring knowledge. And so in all things the first things are beginnings and the highest things are ends. But this question has already been settled between Janus and Terminus.[15]
Causae autem, quae dantur Ioui, efficientia sunt, non effecta; neque ullo modo fieri potest, ut uel tempore praeueniantur a factis initiisue factorum. Semper enim prior est res quae facit, quam illa quae fit. Quapropter si ad Ianum pertinent initia factorum, non ideo priora sunt efficientibus causis, quas Ioui tribuunt. Sicut enim nihil fit, ita nihil inchoatur ut fiat, quod non faciens causa praecesserit. Hunc sane deum, penes quem sunt omnes causae factarum omnium naturarum naturaliumque rerum, si Iouem populi appellant et tantis contumeliis tamque scelestis criminationibus colunt; taetriore sacrilegio sese obstringunt, quam si prorsus nullum putarent deum.	But the causes assigned to Jupiter are causes that produce, not things produced, and there is no way they can be preceded in time by the things made or by the beginnings of the things made. For the thing that makes is always prior to the thing that is made. So if the beginnings of things made belong to Janus, they are not for that reason prior to the efficient causes they attribute to Jupiter. For just as nothing is made, so nothing is even begun in order to be made, unless an efficient cause has gone before it. Now this god holds in his power all the causes of all natures that have been made and of all natural things. If the peoples call him Jupiter

14 John 10:9.
15 Virgil, Georgics 2.490.

LATIN

ENGLISH

and worship him with such insults and such wicked accusations, they bind themselves with a fouler sacrilege than if they thought there was no god at all.

Unde satius esset eis alium aliquem Iouis nomine nuncupare, dignum turpibus et flagitiosis honoribus, subposito uano figmento quod potius blasphemarent (sicut Saturno dicitur subpositus lapis, quem pro filio deuoraret), quam istum deum dicere et tonantem et adulterantem, et totum mundum regentem et per tot stupra diffluentem, et naturarum omnium naturalium rerum causas summas habentem et suas causas bonas non habentem.

It would therefore be better for them to give the name of Jupiter to some other being, one worthy of shameful and disgraceful honors. They could substitute an empty fiction for them to blaspheme instead, just as a stone is said to have been substituted for Saturn to swallow in place of his son. That would be better than calling this god both the Thunderer and an adulterer, both the ruler of the whole world and one dissipated in so many debaucheries, both the holder of the supreme causes of all natures and natural things and one who has no good cause of his own.[16]

Deinde quaero, quem iam locum inter deos huic Ioui tribuant, si Ianus est mundus. Deos enim ueros animam mundi ac partes eius iste definiuit; ac per hoc, quidquid hoc non est, non est utique secundum istos uerus deus. Num igitur ita dicturi sunt Iouem animam mundi, ut Ianus sit corpus eius, id est iste uisibilis mundus? Hoc si dicunt, non erit quem ad modum Ianum deum dicant, quoniam mundi corpus non est deus uel secundum ipsos, sed anima mundi ac partes eius. Unde apertissime idem dicit deum se arbitrari esse animam mundi et hunc ipsum mundum esse deum; sed sicut hominem sapientem, cum sit ex animo et corpore, tamen ei animo dici sapientem, ita mundum deum dici ab animo, cum sit ex animo et corpore.

Next I ask what place they now give this Jupiter among the gods, if Janus is the world. For Varro defined the true gods as the soul of the world and its parts, and so whatever is not that is certainly not a true god by their account. Will they then say that Jupiter is the soul of the world, so that Janus is its body, that is, this visible world? If they say this, they will have no way of calling Janus a god, since even on their own account the body of the world is not a god; only the soul of the world and its parts are. That is why Varro says quite plainly that he thinks god is the soul of the world and that this world itself is god. Just as a wise man, though he consists of mind and body, is nevertheless called wise because of his mind, so the world is called god because of its mind, though it consists of mind and body.

Solum itaque mundi corpus non est deus, sed aut sola anima eius aut simul corpus et animus, ita tamen ut non sit a corpore, sed ab animo deus. Si ergo Ianus est mundus et deus est Ianus, numquid Iouem, ut deus esse possit, aliquam partem Iani esse dicturi sunt? Magis enim Ioui uniuersum solent tribuere; unde est: Iouis omnia plena. Ergo et Iouem, ut deus sit et maxime rex deorum, non alium possunt existimare quam mundum, ut dis ceteris secundum istos suis partibus regnet. In hanc sententiam etiam quosdam uersus Valerii Sorani exponit idem Varro in eo libro, quem seorsum ab istis de cultu deorum scripsit; qui uersus hi sunt: Iuppiter omnipotens

So the body of the world alone is not god. Either its soul alone is god, or body and mind together, but in such a way that it is god because of the mind, not the body. If, then, Janus is the world and Janus is a god, will they say that Jupiter, in order to be a god at all, is some part of Janus? On the contrary, they usually attribute the whole universe to Jupiter, which is where the saying comes from, "All things are full of Jove." So if Jupiter is to be a god, and above all the king of the gods, they can think of him as nothing other than the world, so that, on their view, he reigns over the other gods as his own parts. In support of this view the same 16 In the myth, Saturn swallowed his children at birth; to save Jupiter, his mother Rhea gave Saturn a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes instead.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	regum rerumque deumque / Progenitor genetrixque deum, deus unus et omnes.	Varro also explains some lines of Valerius Soranus, in a book he wrote on the worship of the gods, separate from these. The lines are these: "Almighty Jupiter, of kings and things and gods the begetter, and the mother of the gods, god one and all."[17]
	Exponuntur autem in eodem libro ita: cum marem existimarent qui semen emitteret, feminam quae acciperet, Iouemque esse mundum et eum omnia semina ex se emittere et in se recipere, cum causa, inquit, scripsit Soranus: Iuppiter progenitor genetrixque; nec minus cum causa unum et omnia idem esse; mundus enim unus, et in eo uno omnia sunt.	In the same book they are explained as follows. They held that the male is the one who emits seed and the female the one who receives it, and that Jupiter is the world, emitting all seeds from himself and receiving them back into himself. So, Varro says, Soranus had good reason to write "Jupiter begetter and mother," and no less reason to say that one and all are the same, for the world is one, and in that one are all things.

WHETHER THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN JANUS AND JUPITER IS SOUND

If Janus and Jupiter are both the world, why are they two gods with separate temples?

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.10	Cum ergo et Ianus mundus sit et Iuppiter mundus sit unusque sit mundus, quare duo di sunt Ianus et Iuppiter? Quare seorsus habent templa seorsus aras, diuersa sacra dissimilia simulacra? Si propterea, quod alia uis est primordiorum, alia causarum, et illa Iani, illa Iouis nomen accepit: numquid si unus homo in diuersis rebus duas habeat potestates aut duas artes, quia singularum diuersa uis est, ideo duo iudices aut duo dicuntur artifices? Sic ergo et unus Deus cum ipse habeat potestatem primordiorum, ipse causarum, num propterea illum duos deos esse necesse est putari, quia primordia causaeque res duae sunt?	So, since Janus is the world and Jupiter is the world, and there is only one world, why are Janus and Jupiter two gods? Why do they have separate temples and separate altars, different rites and dissimilar images? Suppose it is because the power of first beginnings is one thing and the power of causes another, and the one has received the name of Janus, the other the name of Jupiter. If one man has two powers or two skills in different matters, is he then called two judges or two craftsmen because each power has a different force? So too with the one God: if he himself has power over first beginnings and he himself over causes, must he therefore be thought of as two gods, just because beginnings and causes are two things?
	Quod si hoc iustum putant, etiam ipsum Iouem tot deos esse dicant, quotquot ei cognomina propter multas potestates dederunt, quoniam res omnes, ex quibus illa cognomina sunt adhibita, multae adque diuersae sunt, ex quibus pauca commemoro.	If they think this is right, let them also say that Jupiter himself is as many gods as the surnames they have given him for his many powers. For all the things from which those surnames were drawn are many and diverse. I mention a few of them.

THE SURNAMES OF JUPITER, WHICH REFER NOT TO MANY GODS BUT TO ONE AND THE SAME

Jupiter's many surnames show that many powers need not mean many gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.11	Dixerunt eum Victorem, Inuictum, Opitulum, Inpulsorem, Statorem, Centumpedam, Supinalem.	They have called him Victor, Invictus [Unconquered], Opitulus [Helper], Impulsor [Driver],

LATIN

Tigillum, Almum, Ruminum et alia quae persequi longum est. Haec autem cognomina inposuerunt uni deo propter causas potestatesque diuersas, non tamen propter tot res etiam tot deos eum esse coegerunt.: quod omnia uinceret, quod a nemine uinceretur, quod opem indigentibus ferret, quod haberet inpellendi, statuendi, stabiliendi, resupinandi potestatem, quod tamquam tigillus mundum contineret ac sustineret, quod aleret omnia, quod ruma, id est mamma, aleret animalia. In his, ut aduertimus, quaedam magna sunt, quaedam exigua; et tamen unus utraque facere perhibetur.

Puto inter se propinquiora esse causas rerum adque primordia, propter quas res unum mundum duos deos esse uoluerunt, Iouem adque Ianum, quam continere mundum et mammam dare animalibus; nec tamen propter haec opera duo tam longe inter se ui et dignitate diuersa duo di esse conpulsi sunt; sed unus Iuppiter propter illud Tigillus, propter illud Ruminus appellatus est. Nolo dicere, quod animalibus mammam praebere sugentibus magis Iunonem potuit decere quam Iouem, praesertim cum esset etiam diua Rumina, quae in hoc opus adiutorium illi famulatumue praeberet. Cogito enim posse responderi, et ipsam Iunonem nihil aliud esse quam Iouem, secundum illos Valerii Sorani uersus, ubi dictum est: Iuppiter omnipotens regum rerumque deumque / Progenitor genetrixque deum.

Quare ergo dictus est et Ruminus, cum diligentius fortasse quaerentibus ipse inueniatur esse etiam illa diua Rumina? Si enim maiestate deorum recte uidebatur indignum, ut in una spica alter ad curam geniculi, altera ad folliculi pertineret: quanto est indignius unam rem infimam, id est ut mammis alantur animalia, duorum deorum potestate curari, quorum sit unus Iuppiter, rex ipse cunctorum, et hoc agat non saltem cum coniuge sua, sed cum ignobili nescio qua Rumina, nisi quia ipse est etiam ipsa Rumina; Ruminus fortasse pro sugentibus maribus, Rumina pro feminis. Dicerem quippe noluisse illos Ioui femininum nomen inponere, nisi et in illis uersibus progenitor genetrixque diceretur, et inter eius

ENGLISH

Stator [Stayer], Centumpeda [Hundred-Foot], Supinalis [Overturner], Tigillus [Beam], Almus [Nourisher], Ruminus [Suckler], and other names that would take too long to go through. They gave these surnames to one god for different causes and powers, yet they did not force him to be as many gods as there are things. The names were given because he conquered all things; because he was conquered by no one; because he brought help to the needy; because he had the power of driving, of stopping, of making steady, and of laying flat on the back; because like a beam he held the world together and held it up; because he nourished all things; because by the ruma, that is, the breast, he nourished living creatures. Among these, as we notice, some are great and some trivial, and yet one being is said to do both.

I think the causes of things and their first beginnings, for whose sake they wanted the one world to be two gods, Jupiter and Janus, are closer to each other than holding the world together and giving the breast to animals. Yet they did not feel compelled to have two gods for these two works, so far apart in power and dignity. Instead the one Jupiter was called Tigillus for the first and Ruminus for the second. I will not say that offering the breast to suckling animals might have suited Juno better than Jupiter, especially since there was also a goddess Rumina to lend him her help or service in this work. For I suspect the reply could be that Juno herself is nothing other than Jupiter, according to those lines of Valerius Soranus where it is said: "Almighty Jupiter, of kings and things and gods the begetter, and the mother of the gods."

Why, then, was he also called Ruminus, when perhaps, for those who look into it more carefully, he will turn out to be that goddess Rumina as well? For if it rightly seemed unworthy of the majesty of the gods that, in a single ear of grain, one god should look after the joint of the stalk and a goddess after the husk, how much more unworthy is it that one very lowly matter, the feeding of animals at the breast, should be looked after by the power of two gods! One of them is Jupiter, the king of all himself, and he does this not even with his own wife but with some obscure Rumina or other, un-

17 "All things are full of Jove" is from Virgil, Eclogues 3.60. Quintus Valerius Soranus was a Roman scholar and poet of the early first century BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
alia cognomina legerem, quod etiam Pecunia uocaretur, quam deam inter illos minuscularios inuenimus et in quarto libro commemorauimus.	less he himself is also Rumina herself: Ruminus, perhaps, for suckling males and Rumina for females! I would indeed say that they did not want to give Jupiter a feminine name, were he not called "begetter and mother" in those lines, and did I not read that among his other surnames he was also called Pecunia [Money], a goddess we found among those petty deities and mentioned in the fourth book.[18]
Sed cum et mares et feminae habeant pecuniam, quur non et Pecunia et Pecunius appellatus sit, sicut Rumina et Ruminus, ipsi uiderint.	But since both men and women have money, why he was not called both Pecunia and Pecunius, like Rumina and Ruminus, is their business.

THAT JUPITER IS ALSO CALLED PECUNIA

Calling the king of the gods Money is an insult; Wisdom would have been a better name.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.12 Quam uero eleganter rationem huius nominis reddiderunt! uocatur Pecunia, inquiunt, uocatur, quod eius sunt omnia, o magnam rationem diuini nominis! Immo uero ille, cuius sunt omnia, uilissime et contumeliosissime Pecunia nuncupatur. Ad omnia enim, quae caelo et terra continentur, quid est pecunia in omnibus omnino rebus, quae ab hominibus nomine pecuniae possidentur? Sed nimirum hoc auaritia Ioui nomen inposuit, ut, quisquis amat pecuniam, non quemlibet deum, sed ipsum regem omnium sibi amare uideatur. Longe autem aliud esset, si diuitiae uocaretur. Aliud namque sunt diuitiae, aliud pecunia.	And how elegantly they have explained the reason for this name! He is called Pecunia, they say, he is called that because all things are his. What a grand reason for a divine name! On the contrary, the one to whom all things belong is given a most cheap and insulting name when he is called Pecunia. For compared with all the things contained in heaven and earth, what is money, taking all the things whatsoever that people possess under the name of money? But no doubt it was avarice that gave Jupiter this name, so that whoever loves money might seem to himself to love not just any god, but the king of all himself. It would be quite another thing if he were called Riches. For riches are one thing and money another.[19]
Nam dicimus diuites sapientes, iustos, bonos, quibus pecunia uel nulla uel parua est; magis enim sunt uirtutibus diuites, per quas eis etiam in ipsis corporalium rerum necessitatibus sat est quod adest: pauperes uero auaros, semper inhiantes et egentes; quamlibet enim magnas pecunias habere possunt, sed in earum quantacumque abundantia non egere non possunt. Et Deum ipsum uerum recte dicimus diuitem, non tamen pecunia, sed omnipotentia. Dicuntur itaque et diuites pecuniosi; sed interius egeni, si cupidi: item dicuntur pauperes pecunia carentes; sed interius diuites, si sapientes. Qualis ergo ista theologia debet esse sapienti, ubi rex deorum eius rei nomen accepit, quam nemo sapiens concupiuit?	For we call the wise, the just and the good rich, even when they have no money or very little, since they are richer in virtues, and through these, even in the necessities of the body, what they have is enough for them. The greedy, on the other hand, we call poor, always gaping after more and always in need. They can possess sums of money however great, but in any abundance of it, however large, they cannot help being in need. And we rightly call the true God himself rich, not in money, however, but in omnipotence. So those with money are called rich, but they are inwardly needy if they are greedy; likewise those without money are called poor, but they are inwardly rich if they are wise.

18 See Book 4.8 and 4.21, where Augustine mocks the multitude of minor Roman gods, each in charge of a tiny task.
19 Latin pecunia means money, but in older usage it could mean property of any kind.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	What, then, should a wise man think of this theology, in which the king of the gods has taken the name of a thing that no wise man has ever craved?
Quanto enim facilius, si aliquid hac doctrina quod ad uitam pertineret aeternam salubriter disceretur, deus mundi rector non ab eis Pecunia, sed Sapientia uocaretur, cuius amor purgat a sordibus auaritiae, hoc est ab amore pecuniae!	If anything that pertained to eternal life were being learned to good effect from this teaching, how much more readily would they have called the god who rules the world not Money but Wisdom, the love of which cleanses us from the filth of avarice, that is, from the love of money!

THAT IN EXPLAINING WHAT SATURN IS AND WHAT GENIUS IS, BOTH ARE SHOWN TO BE THE ONE JUPITER

Saturn and Genius both turn out, on Varro's explanations, to be Jupiter himself.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.13 Sed quid de hoc Ioue plura, ad quem fortasse ceteri referendi sunt, ut inanis remaneat deorum opinio plurimorum, cum hic ipse sint omnes, siue quando partes eius uel potestates existimantur, siue cum uis animae, quam putant per cuncta diffusam, ex partibus molis huius, in quas uisibilis mundus iste consurgit, et multiplici administratione naturae quasi plurium deorum nomina accepit? Quid est enim et Saturnus? Unus, inquit, de principibus deus, penes quem sationum omnium dominatus est. Nonne expositio uersuum illorum Valerii Sorani sic se habet, Iouem esse mundum et eum omnia semina ex se emittere et in se recipere? Ipse est igitur penes quem sationum omnium dominatus est. Quid est Genius? Deus, inquit, qui praepositus est ac uim habet omnium rerum gignendarum.	But why say more about this Jupiter? Perhaps all the others should be referred to him, so that the belief in many gods is left empty, since he himself is all of them. This holds whether they are thought to be his parts or powers, or whether the force of the soul, which they think is spread through all things, has taken the names of many gods, as it were, from the parts of this mass out of which this visible world rises, and from the manifold workings of nature. For what is Saturn, too? "One of the chief gods," he says, "who holds dominion over all sowing." But does not the explanation of those lines of Valerius Soranus run like this: that Jupiter is the world, and that he sends out all seeds from himself and takes them back into himself? So he is the one who holds dominion over all sowing. What is Genius? "The god," he says, "who is in charge of, and has power over, the begetting of all things."
Quem alium hanc uim habere credunt quam mundum, cui dictum est: luppiter progenitor genetrixque? Et cum alio loco genium dicit esse uniuscuiusque animum rationalem et ideo esse singulos singulorum, talem autem mundi animum Deum esse: ad hoc idem utique reuocat, ut tamquam uniuersalis genius ipse mundi animus esse credatur. Hic est igitur quem appellant Iouem. Nam si omnis genius deus et omnis uiri animus genius, sequitur ut sit omnis uiri animus deus; quod si et ipsos abhorrere absurditas ipsa conpellit, restat ut eum singulariter et excellenter dicant deum Genium, quem dicunt mundi animum ac per hoc Iouem.	Whom else do they believe has this power but the world, to which it was said: "Jupiter, begetter and mother"? And in another passage he says that a genius is each person's rational soul, and that therefore each individual has his own, but that such a soul of the world is god. In saying this he certainly brings us back to the same point: that the soul of the world itself is to be believed to be the universal genius, so to speak. This, then, is the one they call Jupiter. For if every genius is a god, and every man's soul is a genius, it follows that every man's soul is a god. And if sheer absurdity forces even them to recoil from this, it remains that they call him uniquely and preeminently the god Genius whom they call the soul of the world, and therefore Jupiter.

LATIN

ENGLISH

THE FUNCTIONS OF MERCURY AND MARS

Mercury is speech and Mars is war, so neither is a part of the world or a god.

LATIN

ENGLISH

7.14 Mercurium uero et Martem quo modo referrent ad aliquas partes mundi et opera Dei, quae sunt in elementis, non inuenerunt, et ideo eos saltem operibus hominum praeposuerunt, sermocinandi et belligerandi administros. Quorum Mercurius si sermonis etiam deorum potestatem gerit, ipsi quoque regi deorum dominatur, si secundum eius arbitrium Iuppiter loquitur aut loquendi ab illo accepit facultatem; quod utique absurdum est. Si autem illi humani tantum sermonis potestas tributa perhibetur, non est credibile ad lactandos mamma non solum pueros, sed etiam pecora, unde Ruminus cognominatus est, Iouem descendere uoluisse, et curam nostri sermonis, quo pecoribus antecellimus, ad se pertinere noluisse; ac per hoc idem ipse est Iouis adque Mercurius.

As for Mercury and Mars, they could find no way to refer them to any parts of the world or to the works of God that are in the elements. So they put them in charge at least of human works, as ministers of speech and of warfare. Now if Mercury also holds power over the speech of the gods, he rules even the king of the gods himself—if Jupiter speaks as Mercury wills, or has received the faculty of speech from him—which is certainly absurd. But if the power attributed to him is said to be only over human speech, it is not credible that Jupiter was willing to stoop to suckling at the breast not only children but even livestock—which is why he was surnamed Ruminus—and yet unwilling to have the care of our speech, by which we excel the livestock, belong to him. And therefore Jupiter and Mercury are one and the same.

Quod si sermo ipse dicitur esse Mercurius, sicut ea, quae de illo interpretantur, ostendunt (nam ideo Mercurius quasi medius currens dicitur appellatus, quod sermo currat inter homines medius; ideo Ἑρμῆς Graece, quod sermo uel interpretatio, quae ad sermonem utique pertinet, ἑρμηνεία dicitur; ideo et mercibus praeesse, quia inter uendentes et ementes sermo fit medius; alas eius in capite et pedibus significare uolucrem ferri per aera sermonem; nuntium dictum, quoniam per sermonem omnia cogitata enuntiantur) — si ergo Mercurius ipse sermo est, etiam ipsis confitentibus deus non est. Sed cum sibi deos faciunt eos, qui nec daemones sunt, inmundis supplicando spiritibus possidentur ab eis, qui non di, sed daemones sunt.

Suppose speech itself is said to be Mercury, as their interpretations of him show. For they say that he is called Mercury as if medius currens [running in the middle], because speech runs between people as a go-between; that he is called Ἑρμῆς [Hermes] in Greek because speech, or interpretation, which certainly belongs to speech, is called ἑρμηνεία [interpretation]; that he also presides over goods (merces) because speech becomes the go-between for sellers and buyers; that his wings on his head and feet signify that speech is borne through the air like a bird; that he is called the messenger (nuntius) because through speech all our thoughts are announced (enuntiantur). If, then, Mercury is speech itself, he is not a god, even by their own admission. But when they make into gods for themselves beings who are not even demons, then by praying to unclean spirits they are possessed by those who are not gods but demons.

Item quia nec Marti aliquod elementum uel partem mundi inuenire potuerunt, ubi ageret opera qualiacumque naturae, deum belli esse dixerunt, quod opus est hominum et optabilius non est. Si ergo pacem perpetuam Felicitas daret, Mars quid ageret non haberet.

Likewise, since they could not find for Mars either any element or part of the world where he might perform works of nature of any kind, they said he was the god of war—which is a work of human beings, and not a desirable one. So if Felicity granted

LATIN	ENGLISH
Si autem ipsum bellum est Mars, sicut sermo Mercurius: utinam quam manifestum est, quod non sit deus, tam non sit et bellum, quod uel falso uocetur deus.	perpetual peace, Mars would have nothing to do. But if Mars is war itself, as Mercury is speech, then I wish that, just as it is plain that he is not a god, so there were no war either, to be called a god even falsely.

CERTAIN STARS THAT THE PAGANS NAMED AFTER THEIR GODS

The planets named after the gods expose contradictions in their ranking.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.15 Nisi forte illae stellae sunt hi di, quas eorum appellauere nominibus. Nam stellam quandam uocant Mercurium, quandam itidem Martem. Sed ibi est et illa quam uocant Iouem, et tamen eis mundus est Iouis; ibi quam uocant Saturnum, et tamen ei praeterea dant non paruam substantiam, omnium uidelicet seminum; ibi est et illa omnium clarissima, quae ab eis appellatur Venus, et tamen eandem Venerem esse etiam Lunam uolunt; quamuis de illo fulgentissimo sidere aput eos tamquam de malo aureo Iuno Venusque contendant. Luciferum enim quidam Veneris, quidam dicunt esse Iunonis; sed, ut solet, Venus uincit. Nam multo plures eam stellam Veneri tribuunt, ita ut uix eorum quisquam reperiatur, qui aliud opinetur.	Unless perhaps these gods are the stars which they have called by their names. For they call one star Mercury, and another likewise Mars. But up there too is the one they call Jupiter, and yet for them the world is Jupiter. There is the one they call Saturn, and yet they give him besides no small substance—namely, that of all seeds. There too is the brightest of them all, which they call Venus, and yet they want this same Venus to be the Moon as well—although among them Juno and Venus contend over that most brilliant star as if over the golden apple. For some say Lucifer, the morning star, belongs to Venus, some to Juno; but, as usual, Venus wins. Far more people assign that star to Venus, so that hardly any of them can be found who thinks otherwise.[20]
Quis autem non rideat, cum regem omnium Iouem dicant, quod stella eius ab stella Veneris tanta uincitur claritate? Tanto enim esse debuit ceteris illa fulgentior, quanto est ipse potentior. Respondent ideo sic uideri, quia illa, quae putatur obscurior, superior est adque a terris longe remotior. Si ergo superiorem locum maior dignitas meruit, quare Saturnus ibi est Ioue superior? An uanitas fabulae, quae regem Iouem facit, non potuit usque ad sidera peruenire, et quod non ualuit Saturnus in regno suo neque in Capitolio, saltem obtinere est permissus in caelo? Quare autem Ianus non accepit aliquam stellam? Si, quia mundus est et omnes in illo sunt: et Iouis mundus est et habet tamen.	And who would not laugh when they call Jupiter the king of all, since his star is so far outshone by the star of Venus? It ought to have been as much brighter than the others as he himself is more powerful. They reply that it only seems so because the one thought dimmer is higher and much farther removed from the earth. If, then, greater dignity has earned the higher place, why is Saturn higher than Jupiter up there? Or could the emptiness of the myth that makes Jupiter king not reach as far as the stars? Was Saturn allowed to hold at least in heaven what he could not hold in his own kingdom or on the Capitol? And why did Janus not receive any star? If it is because he is the world and all things are in him—Jupiter too is the world, and yet he has one.
An iste causam suam conposuit ut potuit et pro una stella, quam non habet inter sidera, tot facies accepit in terra? Deinde si propter solas stellas Mercurium et Martem partes mundi putant, ut eos deos habere possint, quia utique sermo et bellum non sunt partes mundi, sed	Or did Janus settle his case as best he could, and in return for the one star he lacks among the heavenly bodies, receive so many faces on earth? Next, they consider Mercury and Mars parts of the world only because of their stars, so that they can 20 The golden apple marked "for the fairest," which Paris awarded to Venus over Juno and Minerva.

LATIN	ENGLISH
actus hominum: quur Arieti et Tauro et Cancro et Scorpioni ceterisque huius modi, quae caelestia signa numerant et stellis non singulis, sed singula pluribus constant superiusque istis in summo caelo perhibent conlocata, ubi constantior motus inerrabilem meatum sideribus praebet, nullas aras, nulla sacra, nulla templa fecerunt, nec deos, non dico inter hos selectos, sed ne inter illos quidem quasi plebeios habuerunt?	have them as gods, since speech and war are certainly not parts of the world but human activities. If so, why have they made no altars, no rites, no temples for the Ram, the Bull, the Crab, the Scorpion and the rest of this kind, which they count as heavenly signs? These consist not of single stars, but each of many, and they say they are set higher than those others, in the highest heaven, where a steadier motion gives the stars an unwandering course. Why have they not held them to be gods—I do not say among these select gods, but not even among those plebeian ones, so to speak?

APOLLO, DIANA, AND THE OTHER SELECT GODS WHOM THEY HELD TO BE PARTS OF THE WORLD

Apollo, Diana, Vulcan, Neptune and others are made into parts of the world, often overlapping.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.16 Apollinem quamuis diuinatorem et medicum uelint, tamen ut in aliqua parte mundi statuerent, ipsum etiam solem esse dixerunt, Dianamque germanam eius similiter lunam et uiarum praesidem unde et uirginem uolunt, quod uia nihil pariat!, et ideo ambos sagittas habere, quod ipsa duo sidera de caelo radios terras usque pertendant. Vulcanum uolunt ignem mundi, Neptunum aquas mundi, Ditem patrem, hoc est Orcum, terrenam et infimam partem mundi. Liberum et Cererem praeponunt seminibus, uel illum masculinis, illam femininis; uel illum liquori, illam uero ariditati seminum. Et hoc utique totum refertur ad mundum, id est ad Iouem, qui propterea dictus est progenitor genetrixque, quod omnia semina ex se emitteret et in se reciperet.	Although they would have Apollo be a diviner and a physician, still, in order to place him in some part of the world, they said that he is also the sun. Likewise they said that Diana, his sister, is the moon and the guardian of roads—which is also why they want her to be a virgin, because a road gives birth to nothing!—and that both carry arrows because these two heavenly bodies send their rays from the sky all the way to the earth. Vulcan they want to be the fire of the world, Neptune the waters of the world, Father Dis, that is, Orcus, the earthy and lowest part of the world. Liber and Ceres they set over seeds—either him over male seeds and her over female, or him over the moisture of seeds and her over their dryness. And all this, of course, is referred to the world, that is, to Jupiter, who was called "begetter and mother" for the reason that he sends out all seeds from himself and takes them back into himself.
Quando quidem etiam Matrem Magnam eandem Cererem uolunt, quam nihil aliud dicunt esse quam terram, eamque perhibent et lunonem, et ideo ei secundas causas rerum tribuunt, cum tamen Ioui sit dictum progenitor genetrixque deum, quia secundum eos totus ipse mundus est Iouis. Mineruam etiam, quia eam humanis artibus praeposuerunt nec inuenerunt uel stellam, ubi eam ponerent, eandem uel summum aethera uel etiam lunam esse dixerunt. Vestam quoque ipsam propterea dearum maximam putauerunt, quod ipsa sit terra, quamuis ignem mundi leuiorem, qui pertinet ad usus hominum faciles, non uiolentiorem, qualis Vulcani est, ei deputandum esse crediderunt.	Indeed, they also want the Great Mother to be the same as Ceres, whom they say is nothing other than the earth, and they declare that she is Juno too; and so they assign to her the secondary causes of things—although it was to Jupiter that "begetter and mother of the gods" was said, since according to them the whole world itself is Jupiter. Minerva, too, they set over human arts, and because they could not find even a star in which to place her, they said that she was either the highest ether or else the moon. Vesta herself they thought the greatest of the goddesses for the reason that she is the earth, although they believed that the gentler fire of the world, which serves the easy uses of human life, should be assigned to her—not the more violent kind, such as belongs to Vulcan.[21]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ac per hoc omnes istos selectos deos hunc esse mundum uolunt, in quibusdam uniuersum, in quibusdam partes eius; uniuersum sicut Iouem, partes eius, ut Genium, ut Matrem Magnam, ut Solem, ut Lunam, uel potius Apollinem et Dianam. Et aliquando unum deum res plures, aliquando unam rem deos plures faciunt. Nam unus deus res plures sunt, sicut ipse Iuppiter; et mundus enim totus Iuppiter, et solum caelum Iuppiter, et sola stella Iuppiter habetur et dicitur; itemque Iuno secundarum causarum domina et Iuno aer et Iuno terra et, si Venerem uinceret, Iuno stella.	And so they want all these select gods to be this world—some of them the whole, some its parts: the whole, as Jupiter; its parts, as Genius, as the Great Mother, as the Sun, as the Moon, or rather Apollo and Diana. Sometimes they make one god many things, sometimes one thing many gods. For one god is many things, as Jupiter himself is: the whole world is held and called Jupiter, and the sky alone is Jupiter, and a single star is Jupiter. Likewise Juno is mistress of secondary causes, and Juno is the air, and Juno is the earth, and, if she could beat Venus, Juno would be a star.
Similiter Minerua summus aether et Minerua itidem luna, quam esse in aetheris infimo limite existimant Unam uero rem deos plures ita faciunt: Et Ianus est mundus et Iuppiter; sic et Iuno est terra et Mater Magna et Ceres.	Similarly Minerva is the highest ether, and Minerva again is the moon, which they think lies at the lowest boundary of the ether. And they make one thing many gods in this way: Janus is the world, and so is Jupiter; Juno, too, is the earth, and so are the Great Mother and Ceres.

THAT EVEN VARRO HIMSELF DECLARED HIS OPINIONS ABOUT THE GODS UNCERTAIN

Varro admits that he writes only opinions about the gods, not certain knowledge.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.17 Et sicut haec, quae exempli gratia commemoraui, ita cetera non explicant, sed potius inplicant; sicut impetus errabundae opinionis inpulerit, ita huc adque illuc, hinc adque illinc insiliunt et resiliunt, ut ipse Varro de omnibus dubitare quam aliquid adfirmare maluerit. Nam trium extremorum primum de dis certis cum absoluisset librum, in altero de dis incertis dicere ingressus ait: Cum in hoc libello dubias de dis opiniones posuero, reprehendi non debeo. Qui enim putabit iudicari oportere et posse, cum audierit, faciet ipse. Ego citius perduci possum, ut in primo libro quae dixi in dubitationem reuocem, quam in hoc quae perscribam omnia ut ad aliquam dirigam summam. Ita non solum istum de dis incertis, sed etiam illum de certis fecit incertum.	And as with these things, which I have mentioned by way of example, so with the rest: they do not unravel them but tangle them up. Wherever the impulse of their wandering opinion drives them, there they leap, this way and that, here and there, jumping forward and jumping back—so much so that Varro himself preferred to doubt everything rather than affirm anything. For when he had finished the first of the last three books, on the certain gods, and was beginning to speak in the second about the uncertain gods, he says: "I ought not to be blamed if in this little book I set out doubtful opinions about the gods. For whoever thinks that judgment should and can be made will make it himself when he has heard them. As for me, I could sooner be brought to call into doubt what I said in the first book than to bring everything I shall write in this one to any definite conclusion." Thus he made not only this book on the uncertain gods uncertain, but also the one on the certain gods.

21 The Great Mother is Cybele, the Phrygian mother goddess whose cult was brought to Rome in 204 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
In tertio porro isto de dis selectis, postea quam praelocutus est quod ex naturali theologia praeloquendum putauit, ingressurus huius ciuilis theologiae uanitates et insanias mendaces, ubi eum non solum non ducebat rerum ueritas, sed etiam maiorum premebat auctoritas: De dis, inquit, populi Romani publicis, quibus aedes dedicauerunt eosque pluribus signis ornatos notauerunt, in hoc libro scribam, sed ut Xenophanes Colophonius scribit, quid putem, non quid contendam, ponam. Hominis est enim haec opinari, dei scire. Rerum igitur non conprehensarum nec firmissime creditarum, sed opinatarum et dubitandarum sermonem trepidus pollicetur dicturus ea, quae ab hominibus instituta sunt.	Then in the third of these, on the select gods, he first set out by way of preface what he thought needed to be said beforehand from natural theology. He was about to enter on the follies and lying madness of this civil theology, where not only did the truth of things fail to guide him, but the authority of the ancestors also weighed upon him. There he says: "In this book I shall write about the public gods of the Roman people, to whom they have dedicated temples and whom they have marked out with many images; but, as Xenophanes of Colophon writes, I shall set down what I think, not what I would maintain. For it belongs to man to have opinions about these things, to god to know." So, as he is about to speak of what was instituted by human beings, he nervously promises an account of things not grasped and not firmly believed, but matters of opinion and doubt.[22]
Neque enim, sicut sciebat esse mundum, esse caelum et terram, caelum sideribus fulgidum, terram seminibus fertilem, adque huius modi cetera, sicut hanc totam molem adque naturam ui quadam inuisibili ac praepotenti regi adque administrari certa animi stabilitate credebat: ita poterat adfirmare de Iano, quod mundus ipse esset, aut de Saturno inuenire, quo modo et Iouis pater esset et Ioui regnanti subditus factus esset et cetera talia.	For he knew that the world exists, that heaven and earth exist, heaven shining with stars and earth fertile with seeds, and other things of this kind; and he believed with steady conviction of mind that this whole mass and nature is ruled and governed by some invisible and all-powerful force. But he could not in the same way affirm of Janus that he was the world itself, or discover about Saturn how he could be both Jupiter's father and made subject to Jupiter's reign, and other things of that sort.

WHAT THE MORE CREDIBLE CAUSE IS BY WHICH PAGAN ERROR GREW UP

The gods were more probably men, honored by flatterers and later exploited by demons.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.18 De quibus credibilior redditur ratio, cum perhibentur homines fuisse et unicuique eorum ab his, qui eos adulando deos esse uoluerunt, ex eius ingenio moribus, actibus casibus sacra et sollemnia constituta adque haec paulatim per animas hominum daemonibus similes et ludicrarum rerum auidas inrependo longe lateque uulgata, ornantibus ea mendaciis poetarum et ad ea fallacibus spiritibus seducentibus. Facilius enim fieri potuit, ut iuuenis inpius uel ab inpio patre interfici metuens et auidus regni patrem pelleret regno, quam id, quod iste interpretatur, ideo Saturnum patrem a Ioue filio superatum, quod ante est causa quae pertinet ad	About these gods a more credible account is given when they are said to have been men. On this account, rites and solemn festivals were established for each of them by those who, in flattery, wanted them to be gods, according to each one's talents, character, deeds and fortunes. Then, creeping little by little into human souls that are like demons and eager for frivolous amusements, these rites spread far and wide, while the lies of the poets embellished them and deceitful spirits lured people toward them. For it could more easily have happened that an impious young man, or 22 Xenophanes of Colophon (c. 570–475 BC) was a Greek poet and philosopher who criticized human-shaped gods and stressed the limits of human knowledge.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Iouem, quam semen quod pertinet ad Saturnum. Si enim hoc ita esset, numquam Saturnus prior fuisset nec pater Iouis esset. Semper enim semen causa praecedit nec umquam generatur ex semine.	one afraid of being killed by an impious father, and eager for the throne, drove his father from it, than what this man's interpretation says: that father Saturn was overcome by his son Jupiter because the cause, which belongs to Jupiter, comes before the seed, which belongs to Saturn. For if this were so, Saturn would never have come first, nor would he be Jupiter's father. For the cause always precedes the seed and is never generated from the seed.
	Sed cum conantur uanissimas fabulas siue hominum res gestas uelut naturalibus interpretationibus honorare, etiam homines acutissimi tantas patiuntur angustias, ut eorum quoque uanitatem dolere cogamur.	But when they try to honor utterly empty myths or the deeds of men with what pass for interpretations drawn from nature, even the sharpest men get into such straits that we cannot help grieving over their emptiness too.

THE INTERPRETATIONS BY WHICH THE REASON FOR WORSHIPING SATURN IS PIECED TOGETHER

Varro's explanations of Saturn devouring his children and holding a sickle contradict themselves.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.19	nata, inquit, dixerunt, quae nata ex eo essent, solitum deuorare, quod eo semina, unde nascerentur, redirent. Et quod illi pro Ioue gleba obiecta est deuoranda, significat, inquit, manibus humanis obrui coeptas serendo fruges, antequam utilitas arandi esset inuenta. Saturnus ergo dici debuit ipsa terra, non semina; ipsa enim quodam modo deuorat quae genuerit, cum ex ea nata semina in eam rursus recipienda redierint. Et quod pro Ioue accepisse dicitur glebam, quid hoc ad id ualet, quod manibus hominum semen gleba coopertum est? Numquid ideo non est, ut cetera, deuoratum, quod gleba coopertum est? Ita enim hoc dictum est, quasi qui glebam obposuit semen abstulerit, sicut Saturno perhibent oblata gleba ablatum Iouem, ac non potius gleba semen operiendo fecerit illud diligentius deuorari.	"They said," he says, "that Saturn used to devour whatever was born of him, because seeds return to the place from which they were born. And the fact that a clod was thrown to him to devour in place of Jupiter," he says, "signifies that, before the usefulness of plowing was discovered, crops began to be covered over by human hands in sowing." So Saturn ought to have been called the earth itself, not seeds; for it is the earth that in a sense devours what it has brought forth, when the seeds born from it return to it to be received again. And as for his being said to have received a clod in place of Jupiter, what has that to do with the seed being covered with a clod by human hands? Is the seed not devoured, like the rest, just because it is covered with a clod? For this is said as if the one who put the clod there had taken the seed away—just as they claim Jupiter was taken away from Saturn when the clod was offered—and not rather that the clod, by covering the seed, made it be devoured all the more thoroughly.
	Deinde isto modo semen est Iuppiter, non seminis causa, quod paulo ante dicebatur. Sed quid faciant homines, qui, cum res stultas interpretantur, non inueniunt quid sapienter dicatur? Saturnum habet, inquit, propter agriculturam. Certe illo regnante nondum erat agricultura, et ideo priora eius tempora perhibentur, sicut idem ipse fabellas interpretatur, quia primi homines ex his uiuebant seminibus, quae terra sponte gignebat.	Then, on this view Jupiter is the seed, not the cause of the seed, as was said a little earlier. But what are people to do who, when they interpret foolish things, cannot find anything wise to say? "He has a sickle," he says, "because of agriculture." Surely there was no agriculture yet while he reigned, and that is why his times are called the earlier ones—as the same man interprets the little

LATIN	ENGLISH
An falcem sceptro perdito accepit, ut, qui primis temporibus rex fuerat otiosus, filio regnante fieret operarius laboriosus? Deinde ideo dicit a quibusdam pueros ei solitos immolari, sicut a Poenis, et a quibusdam etiam maiores, sicut a Gallis, quia omnium seminum optimum est genua humanum. De hac crudelissima uanitate quid opus est plura dicere?	myths—because the first humans lived on the seeds the earth produced of its own accord. Or did he take up the sickle when he lost his scepter, so that he who in the earliest times had been a king at leisure became a toiling laborer under his son's reign? Next he says that some peoples used to sacrifice children to him, as the Carthaginians did, and some even adults, as the Gauls did, because of all seeds the best is the human race. What need is there to say more about this most cruel folly?
Hoc potius aduertamus adque teneamus, has interpretationes non referri ad Deum uerum, uiuam, incorpoream incommutabilemque naturam, a quo uita in aeternum beata poscenda est; sed earum esse fines in rebus corporalibus, temporalibus, mutabilibus adque mortalibus. Quod Caelum, inquit, patrem Saturnus castrasse in fabulis dicitur, hoc significat penes Saturnum, non penes Caelum semen esse diuinum. Hoc propterea, quantum intellegi datur, quia nihil in caelo de seminibus nascitur. Sed ecce, Saturnus si Caeli est filius, Iouis est filius. Caelum enim esse Iouem innumerabiliter et diligenter adfirmant. Ita ista, quae a ueritate non ueniunt, plerumque et nullo inpellente se ipsa subuertunt. Chronon appellatum dicit, quod Graeco uocabulo significat temporis spatium, sine quo semen, inquit, non potest esse fecundum.	Let us rather notice and hold on to this: these interpretations do not refer to the true God—a living, incorporeal and unchangeable nature—from whom the life that is happy forever is to be sought; rather, their ends lie in things bodily, temporal, changeable and mortal. "The fact that Saturn is said in the myths to have castrated his father Heaven," he says, "means that the divine seed is in Saturn's keeping, not Heaven's." This is so, as far as one can understand, because nothing in heaven is born from seeds. But look: if Saturn is the son of Heaven, he is the son of Jupiter. For they affirm countless times and insistently that Heaven is Jupiter. So these things, which do not come from the truth, generally overturn themselves even with no one pushing them. He says Saturn is called Chronos, a Greek word meaning a span of time, without which, he says, seed cannot be fruitful.[23]
Haec et alia de Saturno multa dicuntur, et ad semen omnia referuntur. Sed saltem Saturnus seminibus cum tanta ista potestate sufficeret; quid ad haec di alii requiruntur, maxime Liber et Libera, id est Ceres? De quibus rursus, quod ad semen adtinet, tanta dicit, quasi de Saturno nihil dixerit.	These and many other things are said about Saturn, and all of them are referred to seed. But surely Saturn, with such great power, would at least be enough for seeds. Why are other gods required for this—especially Liber and Libera, that is, Ceres? About them, in turn, he says so much concerning seed that you would think he had said nothing about Saturn.

THE RITES OF CERES AT ELEUSIS

Varro explains the Eleusinian mysteries of Ceres and Proserpina only in terms of grain.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.20 In Cereris autem sacris praedicantur illa Eleusinia, quae aput Athenienses nobilissima fuerunt. De quibus iste nihil interpretatur, nisi quod adtinet ad frumentum, quod Ceres inuenit, et ad Proserpinam, quam rapiente	Among the rites of Ceres, the Eleusinian mysteries are especially celebrated, and among the Athenians they were the most renowned of all. Of these he offers no interpretation except what concerns

23 Heaven (Caelus) is the Latin counterpart of the Greek Uranus, the sky-god castrated by his son Kronos, whom the Romans identified with Saturn.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Orco perdidit; et hanc ipsam dicit significare fecunditatem seminum; quae cum defuisset quodam tempore eademque sterilitate terra maereret, exortam esse opinionem, quod filiam Cereris, id est ipsam fecunditatem, quae a proserpendo Proserpina dicta esset, Orcus abstulerat et aput inferos detinuerat; quae res cum fuisset luctu publico celebrata, quia rursus eadem fecunditas rediit, Proserpina reddita exortam esse laetitiam et ex hoc sollemnia constituta. Dicit deinde multa in mysteriis eius tradi, quae nisi ad frugum inuentionem non pertineant.	grain, which Ceres discovered, and Proserpina, whom she lost when Orcus carried her off. This Proserpina, he says, stands for the fertility of seeds. At a certain time this fertility failed, and the earth mourned in its barrenness. From this arose the belief that Orcus had carried off Ceres' daughter—that is, fertility itself, called Proserpina from its "creeping forth" (proserpere)—and kept her in the underworld. The event was marked by public mourning. Then, because fertility returned, joy arose at Proserpina's return, and the solemn festivals were established. He then says that many things are taught in her mysteries which relate only to the discovery of crops.[24]

THE OBSCENITY OF THE RITES CELEBRATED FOR LIBER

The phallic rites of Liber at Italian crossroads and at Lavinium are described.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.21 Iam uero Liberi sacra, quem liquidis seminibus ac per hoc non solum liquoribus fructuum, quorum quodam modo primatum uinum tenet, uerum etiam seminibus animalium praefecerunt, ad quantam turpitudinem peruenerint, piget quidem dicere propter sermonis longitudinem; sed propter istorum superbam hebetudinem non piget. Inter cetera, quae praetermittere, quoniam multa sunt, cogor, in Italiae compitis quaedam dicit sacra Liberi celebrata cum tanta licentia turpitudinis, ut in eius honorem pudenda uirilia colerentur, non saltem aliquantum uerecundiore secreto, sed in propatulo exultante nequitia. Nam hoc turpe membrum per Liberi dies festos cum honore magno plostellis inpositum prius rure in compitis et usque in urbem postea uectabatur.	Now as for the rites of Liber, whom they put in charge of liquid seeds—and so not only of the juices of fruits, among which wine holds a kind of primacy, but also of the seeds of animals—I am loath to say what depths of obscenity they reached, because it would take too long; but because of these people's proud dullness, I am not loath. Among other things I am forced to pass over, since there are so many, he says that at the crossroads of Italy certain rites of Liber were celebrated with such unbridled obscenity that the male genitals were worshiped in his honor—not even in some slightly more modest privacy, but in the open, with wickedness exulting. During Liber's festival this obscene member was placed with great honor on little carts and paraded, first at the crossroads in the countryside and afterward all the way into the city.
In oppido autem Lauinio unus Libero totus mensis tribuebatur, cuius diebus omnes uerbis flagitiosissimis uterentur, donec illud membrum per forum transuectum esset adque in loco suo quiesceret. Cui membro inhonesto matrem familias honestissimam palam coronam necesse erat inponere. Sic uidelicet Liber deus placandus fuerat pro euentibus seminum, sic ab agris fascinatio repellenda, ut matrona facere cogeretur in publico, quod nec meretrix, si matronae spectarent, permitti debuit in theatro. Propter haec Saturnus solus creditus non est	In the town of Lavinium a whole month was given to Liber alone, and during its days everyone used the most shameful language, until that member had been carried across the forum and come to rest in its place. On this disreputable member a most reputable matron was required to place a garland in public. So, it seems, the god Liber had to be appeased for the success of the seeds; so the evil eye had to be driven from the fields—by forcing a married woman to do in public what not 24 The Eleusinian mysteries, held at Eleusis near Athens, honored Demeter (Ceres) and her daughter Persephone (Proserpina).

LATIN	ENGLISH
sufficere posse seminibus, ut occasiones multiplicandorum deorum inmunda anima reperiret, et ab uno uero Deo merito inmunditiae destituta ac per multos falsos auiditate maioris inmunditiae prostituta ista sacrilegia sacra nominaret seseque spurcorum daemonum turbis conuiolandam polluendamque praeberet.	even a prostitute should have been allowed to do in a theater if married women were watching. This is why Saturn alone was not believed to be enough for the seeds: so that the unclean soul might find occasions for multiplying gods. Deservedly abandoned by the one true God for its uncleanness, and prostituted to many false gods by its greed for greater uncleanness, it called these sacrileges sacred rites, and offered itself to be violated and polluted by crowds of filthy demons.[25]

NEPTUNE, SALACIA, AND VENILIA

Two goddesses for the incoming and outgoing wave multiply demons, not meaning.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.22 Iam utique habebat Salaciam Neptunus uxorem, quam inferiorem aquam maris esse dixerunt: ut quid illi adiuncta est et Venilia, nisi ut sine ulla causa necessariorum sacrorum sola libidine animae prostitutae multiplicaretur inuitatio daemoniorum? Sed proferatur interpretatio praeclarae theologiae, quae nos ab ista reprehensione reddita ratione conpescat. Venilia, inquit, unda est, quae ad litus uenit; Salacia, quae in salum redit. Quur ergo deae fiunt duae, cum sit una unda quae uenit et redit? Nempe ipsa est exaestuans in multa numina libido uesana. Quamuis enim aqua non geminetur quae it et redit, huius tamen occasione uanitatis duobus daemoniis inuitatis amplius commaculatur anima, quae it et non redit.	Neptune, of course, already had a wife, Salacia, who they said was the lower water of the sea. Why, then, was Venilia also joined to him? Was it not so that, with no reason of necessary rites, simply through the lust of a prostituted soul, the invitation to demons might be multiplied? But let us hear the interpretation of this splendid theology, which may give its reason and so silence our criticism. "Venilia," he says, "is the wave that comes (uenit) to the shore; Salacia, the one that returns to the open sea (salum)." Why then do they become two goddesses, when it is one wave that comes and returns? Plainly it is that insane lust itself, boiling over into many deities. For although the water that goes and returns is not doubled, yet on the occasion of this folly two demons are invited, and the soul is further defiled—the soul that goes and does not return.
Quaeso te, Varro, uel uos, qui tam doctorum hominum talia scripta legistis et aliquid magnum uos didicisse iactatis, interpretamini hoc, nolo dicere secundum illam aeternam incommutabilemque naturam, qui solus est Deus, sed saltem secundum animam mundi et partes eius, quos deos esse ueros existimatis. Partem animae mundi, quae mare permeat, deum uobis fecisse Neptunum utcumque tolerabilioris erroris est. Itane unda ad litus ueniens et in salum rediens duae sunt partes mundi aut duae partes animae mundi? Quis uestrum ita desipiat, ut hoc sapiat? Quur ergo uobis duas deas fecerunt, nisi quia prouisum est a sapientibus maioribus uestris, non ut di plures uos regerent, sed ut ea, quae istis uanitatibus et falsitatibus gaudent, plura uos daemonia possiderent?	I beg you, Varro—or you who have read such writings of such learned men and boast that you have learned something great—interpret this. I will not say, in terms of that eternal and unchangeable nature which alone is God, but at least in terms of the world soul and its parts, which you consider to be true gods. That you have made Neptune a god for yourselves out of the part of the world soul that pervades the sea is, after a fashion, a more tolerable error. But are the wave coming to the shore and the wave returning to the open sea two parts of the world, or two parts of the world soul? Who among you is so foolish as to find wisdom in that? Why then did they make two goddesses for you?

25 Lavinium was an ancient town in Latium, south of Rome, linked in legend with Aeneas.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	Was it not because your wise ancestors provided, not that more gods should rule you, but that more demons—the kind that delight in such follies and falsehoods—should possess you?
Quur autem illa Salacia per hanc interpretationem inferiorem maris partem, qua uiro erat subdita, perdidit? Namque illam modo, cum refluentem fluctum esse perhibetis, in superficie posuistis. An quia Veniliam pellicem accepit, irata suum maritum de supernis maris exclusit?	And why, by this interpretation, has Salacia lost the lower part of the sea, where she lay beneath her husband? For just now, by declaring her to be the ebbing wave, you have put her on the surface. Or was she angry because he took Venilia as a mistress, and so shut her husband out of the upper sea?

EARTH, WHOM VARRO AFFIRMS TO BE A GODDESS BECAUSE THE SOUL OF THE WORLD, WHICH HE THINKS IS GOD, ALSO PASSES THROUGH THIS LOWEST PART OF ITS BODY AND IMPARTS DIVINE POWER TO IT

Varro's three grades of soul and his splitting of the earth into several gods are examined.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.23 Nempe una est terra, quam plenam quidem uidemus animalibus suis; uerum tamen ipsam magnum corpus in elementis mundique infimam partem, quur eam uolunt deam? An quia fecunda est? Quur ergo non magis homines di sunt, qui eam fecundiorem faciunt excolendo; sed cum arant, non cum adorant? Sed pars animae mundi, inquiunt, quae per illam permeat, deam facit. Quasi non euidentior sit in hominibus anima, quae utrum sit nulla fit quaestio; et tamen homines di non habentur et, quod est grauiter dolendum, his, qui di non sunt et quibus ipsi meliores sunt, colendis et adorandis mirabili et miserabili errore subduntur.	The earth, surely, is one, and we see it full of its own living creatures. Yet it is a great body among the elements and the lowest part of the world—so why do they want it to be a goddess? Because it is fertile? Why then are human beings not gods instead, since they make it more fertile by cultivating it—though when they plow it, not when they bow down to it? "But," they say, "the part of the world soul that pervades it makes it a goddess." As if the soul were not more evident in human beings, where no one even questions whether it exists! And yet human beings are not considered gods, and—what is deeply to be lamented—by an error as wondrous as it is woeful they subject themselves to worshiping and adoring beings that are not gods and are inferior to themselves.
Et certe idem Varro in eodem de dis selectis libro tres esse adfirmat animae gradus in omni uniuersaque natura: unum, qui omnes partes corporis, quae uiuunt, transit et non habet sensum, sed tantum ad uiuendum ualetudinem; hanc uim in nostro corpore permanare dicit in ossa, ungues, capillos; sicut in mundo arbores sine sensu aluntur et crescunt et modo quodam suo uiuunt: secundum gradum animae, in quo sensus est; hanc uim peruenire in oculos, aures, nares, os, tactum: tertium gradum esse animae summum, quod uocatur animus, in quo intellegentia praeminet; hoc praeter hominem omnes carere mortales. Hanc partem animae mundi dicit Deum, in nobis autem genium uocari.	And certainly this same Varro, in the same book on the select gods, asserts that there are three grades of soul in all nature as a whole. The first passes through all the living parts of the body and has no sensation, only the strength to live. In our body, he says, this power flows into the bones, nails and hair—just as in the world trees are nourished and grow without sensation and live in a manner of their own. The second grade of soul is the one in which there is sensation; this power reaches the eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth and touch. The third grade of soul is the highest, called mind (animus), in which intelligence predominates; all mortal beings except man lack it. This part of the world soul, he says, is called god, while in us it is called the genius.[26]

LATIN

ENGLISH

Esse autem in mundo lapides ac terram, quam uidemus, quo non permanat sensus, ut ossa, ut ungues Dei; solem uero, lunam, stellas, quae sentimus quibusque ipse sentit, sensus esse eius; aethera porro animum eius; cuius uim, quae peruenit in astra, ea quoque facere deos, et per ea quod in terram permanat, deam Tellurem; quod autem inde permanat in mare adque oceanum, deum esse Neptunum.

In the world, he says, there are stones and the earth that we see, into which sensation does not flow; these are, as it were, god's bones and nails. The sun, moon and stars, which we perceive and through which he himself perceives, are his senses; and the ether is his mind. Its power, reaching the stars, also makes them gods; what flows through them into the earth is the goddess Tellus; and what flows from there into the sea and the ocean is the god Neptune.

Redeat ergo ab hac, quam theologian naturalem putat, quo uelut requiescendi causa ab his ambagibus adque anfractibus fatigatus egressus est; redeat, inquam, redeat ad ciuilem; hic eum adhuc teneo, tantisper de hac ago. Nondum dico, si terra et lapides nostris sunt ossibus et unguibus similes, similiter eos intellegentiam non habere, sicut sensu carent; aut si idcirco habere dicuntur ossa et ungues nostri intellegentiam, quia in homine sunt qui habet intellegentiam, tam stultum esse qui hos in mundo deos dicit, quam stultus est qui in nobis ossa et ungues homines dicit. Sed haec cum philosophis fortassis agenda sunt; nunc autem istum adhuc politicum uolo.

So let him come back from this, which he takes to be natural theology—where he went out, wearied by all those windings and twists, as if to rest. Let him come back, I say, come back to civil theology. This is where I am still holding him, and for the moment I am dealing with this. I do not yet say that if earth and stones are like our bones and nails, they likewise lack intelligence, just as they lack sensation. Nor do I yet say that if our bones and nails are said to have intelligence because they belong to a man who has intelligence, then whoever calls these things gods in the world is as foolish as whoever calls our bones and nails men. But perhaps these matters should be taken up with the philosophers; for now I still want him as a civil theologian.

Fieri enim potest, ut, licet in illam naturalis theologiae ueluti libertatem caput erigere paululum uoluisse uideatur, adhuc tamen hunc librum uersans et se in illo uersari cogitans, eum etiam inde respexerit et hoc propterea dixerit, ne maiores eius siue aliae ciuitates Tellurem adque Neptunum inaniter coluisse credantur. Sed hoc dico: pars animi mundani, quae per terram permeat, sicut una est terra, quur non etiam unam fecit deam, quam dicit esse Tellurem? Quod si ita fecit, ubi erit Orcus, frater Iouis adque Neptuni, quem Ditem patrem uocant? ubi eius coniunx Proserpina, quae secundum aliam in eisdem libris positam opinionem non terrae fecunditas, sed pars inferior perhibetur?

For it may be that, although he seems to have wanted to raise his head a little into what one might call the freedom of natural theology, he was still turning over this book and thinking himself engaged in it, and so looked back at it even from there. He may have said this so that his ancestors, or other cities, should not be thought to have worshiped Tellus and Neptune in vain. But this is what I say: since the earth is one, why did the part of the world mind that pervades the earth not also make one goddess, the one he says is Tellus? And if it did, where will Orcus be, the brother of Jupiter and Neptune, whom they call Father Dis? Where will his wife Proserpina be, who, according to another opinion set down in the same books, is said to be not the fertility of the earth but its lower part?[27]

26 In Roman belief the genius was a person's guardian spirit or divine double.
27 Father Dis (Dis Pater), also called Orcus, was the Roman god of the underworld, equated with the Greek Pluto.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quod si dicunt animi mundani partem, cum permeat terrae partem superiorem, Ditem patrem facere deum; cum uero inferiorem, Proserpinam deam: Tellus illa quid erit? Ita enim totum, quod ipsa erat, in duas istas partes deosque diuisum est, ut ipsa tertia quae sit aut ubi sit inuenire non possit; nisi quis dicat simul istos deos Orcum adque Proserpinam unam deam esse Tellurem et non esse iam tres, sed aut unam aut duos; et tamen tres dicuntur, tres habentur, tres coluntur aris suis, delubris suis, sacris, simulacris, sacerdotibus suis, et per haec etiam fallacibus prostitutam animam constuprantibus daemonibus suis. Adhuc respondeatur, quam partem terrae permeet pars mundani animi, ut deum faciat Tellumonem?	But if they say that the part of the world mind, when it pervades the upper part of the earth, makes the god Father Dis, and when it pervades the lower part, the goddess Proserpina, what will Tellus be? For the whole of what she was has been so divided into these two parts and gods that she herself, the third, cannot be found—neither what she is nor where she is. Unless, that is, someone says that these gods, Orcus and Proserpina, together are the one goddess Tellus, and that they are no longer three, but either one or two. And yet they are called three, considered three, worshiped as three, with their own altars, their own shrines, rites, images and priests—and through these also with their own deceitful demons, who violate the prostituted soul. Let them answer this as well: what part of the earth does the part of the world mind pervade so as to make the god Tellumo?[28]
Non, inquit, sed una eademque terra habet geminam uim, et masculinam, quod semina producat, et femininam, quod recipiat adque nutriat; inde a ui feminae dictam esse Tellurem, a masculi Tellumonem. Quur ergo pontifices, ut ipse indicat, additis quoque aliis duobus quattuor dis faciunt rem diuinam, Telluri, Tellumoni, Altori, Rusori? De Tellure et Tellumone iam dictum est. Altori quare? Quod ex terra, inquit, aluntur omnia quae nata sunt. Rusori quare? Quod rursus, inquit, cuncta eodem reuoluuntur.	"No," he says, "but one and the same earth has a twofold power: masculine, in that it produces seeds, and feminine, in that it receives and nourishes them. Hence from the feminine power it is called Tellus, from the masculine Tellumo." Why then do the pontiffs, as he himself points out, add two others and offer sacrifice to four gods—Tellus, Tellumo, Altor and Rusor? About Tellus and Tellumo enough has been said. Why to Altor? "Because," he says, "all things that are born are nourished (aluntur) from the earth." Why to Rusor? "Because," he says, "all things return back (rursus) to the same place."[29]

THE SURNAMES OF TELLUS AND THEIR MEANINGS, WHICH, EVEN IF THEY INDICATED MANY THINGS, SHOULD NOT HAVE ESTABLISHED BELIEF IN MANY GODS

Tellus is identified with the Great Mother; the self-castrating Galli serve her.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.24 Debuit ergo una terra propter istam quatergeminam uim quattuor habere cognomina, non quattuor facere deos; sicut tot cognominibus unus Iuppiter et tot cognominibus una Iuno, in quibus omnibus uis multiplex esse dicitur ad unum deum uel unam deam pertinens, non multitudo cognominum deorum etiam multitudinem faciens. Sed profecto sicut aliquando etiam ipsas uilissimas feminas earum, quas libidine quaesierunt, taedet paenitetque turbarum: sic animam uilem factam	So the one earth, on account of this fourfold power, ought to have had four surnames, not to have made four gods—just as there is one Jupiter with so many surnames, and one Juno with so many surnames. In all these, a manifold power is said to belong to one god or one goddess, without the multitude of surnames also producing a multitude of gods. But surely, just as even the most degraded women sometimes grow weary of the 28 Tellumo was a male earth deity, counterpart of Tellus.

29 The pontiffs were Rome's chief college of priests, in charge of the state cult.

LATIN

et inmundis spiritibus prostitutam deos sibi multiplicare, quibus contaminanda prosterneretur, sicut plurimum libuit, sic aliquando et piguit. Nam et ipse Varro quasi de ipsa turba uerecundatus unam deam uult esse Tellurem. Eandem, inquit, dicunt Matrem Magnam; quod tympanum habeat, significari esse orbem terrae; quod turres in capite, oppida; quod sedens fingatur, circa eam cum omnia moueantur, ipsam non moueri.

Quod Gallos huic deae ut seruirent fecerunt, significat, qui semine indigeant, terram sequi oportere; in ea quippe omnia reperiri. Quod se aput eam iactant, praecipitur, inquit, qui terram colunt, ne sedeant; semper enim esse quod agant. Cymbalorum sonitus ferramentorum iactandorum ac manuum et eius rei crepitum in colendo agro qui fit significant; ideo aere, quod eam antiqui colebant aere, antequam ferrum esset inuentum. Leonem, inquit, adiungunt solutum ac mansuetum, ut ostendant nullum genus esse terrae tam remotum ac uehementer ferum, quod non subigi colique conueniat. Deinde adiungit et dicit, Tellurem matrem et nominibus pluribus et cognominibus quod nominarunt, deos existimatos esse conplures.

Tellurem, inquit, putant esse Opem, quod opere fiat melior; Matrem, quod plurima pariat; Magnam, quod cibum pariat; Proserpinam, quod ex ea proserpant fruges; Vestam, quod uestiatur herbis. Sic alias deas, inquit, non absurde ad hanc reuocant. Si ergo una dea est, quae quidem consulta ueritate nec ipsa est, interim quid itur in multas? Unius sint ista multa nomina, non tam deae multae quam nomina. Sed errantium maiorum auctoritas deprimit et eundem Varronem post hanc sententiam trepidare conpellit. Adiungit enim et dicit: Cum quibus opinio maiorum de his deabus, quod plures eas putarunt esse, non pugnat. Quo modo non pugnat, cum ualde aliud sit unam deam nomina habere multa, aliud esse deas multas?

ENGLISH

crowds they sought out in lust and regret them, so the soul, degraded and prostituted to unclean spirits, which once took great pleasure in multiplying gods for itself before whom it might lie down to be defiled, has at times also felt disgust. For Varro himself, as if ashamed of that very crowd, wants Tellus to be one goddess. They say, he tells us, that she is also the Great Mother; that her holding a drum signifies that she is the globe of the earth; her towers on her head, the towns; and her being represented seated, that while everything moves around her, she herself does not move.

That they made the Galli serve this goddess signifies that those who lack seed should follow the earth, since everything is to be found in it. That they fling themselves about before her teaches, he says, that those who cultivate the earth should not sit still, for there is always something for them to do. The sound of the cymbals signifies the clatter of iron tools being wielded, and of hands, and of all that noise made in tilling a field; they are of bronze because the ancients tilled the earth with bronze before iron was discovered. A lion, he says, is added, unbound and tame, to show that there is no kind of land so remote and so fiercely wild that it should not be subdued and cultivated. Then he goes on to say that because they named Mother Tellus with several names and surnames, she was thought to be a number of gods.[30]

They think, he says, that Tellus is Ops, because she is made better by work (opus); Mother, because she bears very many things; Great, because she bears food; Proserpina, because crops creep forth (proserpere) from her; Vesta, because she is clothed (uestiri) with grass. In this way, he says, they not unreasonably refer other goddesses back to her. If, then, she is one goddess—though, if truth is consulted, she is not even that—why meanwhile go off into many? Let these be many names of one goddess: not so much many goddesses as many names. But the authority of his erring ancestors weighs him down and forces this same Varro to waver after this statement. For he goes on to say: "With which the opinion of our ancestors about these goddesses, who thought them to be several, does not conflict." How does it not conflict, when it is one thing for one goddess to have many 30 The Galli were the eunuch priests of Cybele, who castrated themselves in her service.

LATIN

Sed potest, inquit, fieri ut eadem res et una sit, et in ea quaedam res sint plures. Concedo in uno homine esse res plures, numquid ideo et homines plures? Sic in una dea esse res plures, numquid ideo et deas plures? Verum sicut uolunt, diuidant conflent, multiplicent replicent inplicent.

Haec sunt Telluris et Matris Magnae praeclara mysteria, unde omnia referuntur ad mortalia semina et exercendam agriculturam. Itane ad haec relata et hunc finem habentia tympanum, turres, Galli, iactatio insana membrorum, crepitus cymbalorum, confictio leonum uitam cuiquam pollicentur aeternam? Itane propterea Galli abscisi huic Magnae deae seruiunt, ut significent, qui semine indigeant, terram sequi oportere; quasi non eos ipsa potius seruitus semine faciat indigere? Utrum enim sequendo hanc deam, cum indigeant, semen adquirunt, an potius sequendo hanc deam, cum habeant, semen amittunt? Hoc interpretari est an detestari? Nec adtenditur, quantum maligni daemones praeualuerint, qui nec aliqua magna his sacris polliceri ausi sunt, et tam crudelia exigere potuerunt.

Si dea terra non esset, manus ei homines operando inferrent, ut semina consequerentur per illam, non et sibi saeuiendo, ut semina perderent propter illam; si dea non esset, ita fecunda fieret manibus alienis, ut non cogeret hominem sterilem fieri manibus suis. Iam quod in Liberi sacris honesta matrona pudenda uirilia coronabat spectante multitudine, ubi rubens et sudans, si est ulla frons in hominibus, adstabat forsitan et maritus; et quod in celebratione nuptiarum super Priapi scapum noua nupta sedere iubebatur: longe contemtibiliora adque leuiora sunt prae ista turpitudine crudelissima uel crudelitate turpissima, ubi daemonicis ritibus sic uterque sexus inluditur, ut neuter suo uulnere perimatur. Ibi fascinatio timetur agrorum, hic membrorum amputatio non timetur.

ENGLISH

names and quite another for there to be many goddesses?

"But it can happen," he says, "that the same thing is one, and yet that there are several things in it." I grant that there are several things in one man; does that make him several men as well? So there are several things in one goddess; does that make her several goddesses as well? But let them do as they please: divide and fuse, multiply, fold back and tangle up.

These are the splendid mysteries of Tellus and the Great Mother, in which everything is referred to mortal seeds and the practice of agriculture. Is it really true that the drum, the towers, the Galli, the frenzied tossing of limbs, the clashing of cymbals, the fiction of the lions—referred to these things and having this as their goal—promise anyone eternal life? Is it really for this reason that the castrated Galli serve this Great Goddess—to signify that those who lack seed should follow the earth? As if that very service did not rather make them lack seed! For do they acquire seed by following this goddess when they lack it, or rather lose seed by following this goddess when they have it? Is this interpreting, or execrating? Nor do people notice how far the evil demons have prevailed, who did not dare to promise anything great through these rites, and yet were able to demand things so cruel.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	If the earth were not a goddess, men would lay hands on it in labor, to obtain seeds through it, and would not lay savage hands on themselves, to lose their seed for its sake. If she were not a goddess, she would become fertile through the hands of others, and would not force a man to become sterile by his own hands. As for the rites of Liber, in which a respectable matron garlanded the male genitals while a crowd looked on—where perhaps her husband too stood by, blushing and sweating, if there is any shame left in human faces—and the custom at weddings by which the new bride was ordered to sit on the shaft of Priapus: these are far more contemptible and trivial compared with this most cruel obscenity, or most obscene cruelty, in which by demonic rites both sexes are so mocked that neither perishes by its own wound. There the bewitchment of the fields is feared; here the cutting off of members is not feared.[31]
Ibi sic dehonestatur nouae nuptae uerecundia, ut non solum fecunditas, sed nec uirginitas adimatur; hic ita amputatur uirilitas, ut nec conuertatur in feminam nec uir relinquatur.	There the new bride's modesty is dishonored in such a way that neither her fertility nor even her virginity is taken away; here manhood is cut off in such a way that the man is neither turned into a woman nor left a man.

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE CASTRATION OF ATTIS THAT THE LEARNING OF THE GREEK SAGES CAME UP WITH

Porphyry's reading of Attis as flowers explains nothing about his castration.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.25 Et Attis ille non est commemoratus nec eius ab isto interpretatio requisita est, in cuius dilectionis memoriam Gallus absciditur. Sed docti Graeci adque sapientes nequaquam rationem tam sanctam praeclaramque tacuerunt. Propter uernalem quippe faciem terrae, quae ceteris est temporibus pulchrior, Porphyrius, philosophus nobilis, Attin flores significare perhibuit, et ideo abscisum, quia flos decidit ante fructum. Non ergo ipsum hominem uel quasi hominem, qui est uocatus Attis, sed uirilia eius flori conparauerunt. Ipsa quippe illo uiuente deciderunt; immo uero non deciderunt neque decerpta, sed plane discerpta sunt; nec illo flore amisso quisquam postea fructus, sed potius sterilitas consecuta est. Quid ergo ipse reliquus, et quidquid remansit absciso? quid eo significari dicitur? quo refertur? quae interpretatio inde profertur?	Nor has he mentioned that Attis, or looked for an interpretation of him—the Attis in memory of whose love the Gallus is castrated. But the learned and wise Greeks have by no means kept silent about so holy and splendid an explanation. Because of the face of the earth in spring, which is more beautiful than in other seasons, Porphyry, the famous philosopher, declared that Attis signifies flowers, and that he was castrated because the flower falls before the fruit. So it is not the man himself, or the semblance of a man, called Attis, but his genitals that they compared to a flower. And these indeed fell while he was still alive—or rather, they did not fall, nor were they plucked, but were plainly torn away. Nor, once that flower was lost, did any fruit follow, but rather sterility. What, then, of the rest of him, whatever remained 31 Priapus was a fertility god represented with an enormous phallus.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	after he was castrated? What is it said to signify? To what is it referred? What interpretation is brought forward from it?[32]
An haec frustra moliendo nihilque inueniendo persuadent illud potius esse credendum, quod de homine castrato fama iactauit litterisque mandatum est? Merito hinc auersatus est Varro noster, neque hoc dicere uoluit; non enim hominem doctissimum latuit.	Or, by laboring at these things in vain and finding nothing, do they persuade us that we should rather believe what rumor spread about a castrated man and what was committed to writing? Our Varro rightly turned away from this and did not want to speak of it; for it did not escape so learned a man.

THE OBSCENITY OF THE RITES OF THE GREAT MOTHER

The Great Mother's eunuch priests and their rites outdo even Jupiter's disgraces.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.26 Itemque de mollibus eidem Matri Magnae contra omnem uirorum mulierumque uerecundiam consecratis, qui usque in hesternum diem madidis capillis facie dealbata, fluentibus membris incessu femineo per plateas uicosque Carthaginis etiam a propolis unde turpiter uiuerent exigebant, nihil Varro dicere uoluit nec uspiam me legisse commemini. Defecit interpretatio, erubuit ratio, conticuit oratio. Vicit Matris Magnae omnes deos filios non numinis magnitudo, sed criminis. Huic monstro nec Iani monstrositas conparatur. Ille in simulacris habebat solam deformitatem, ista in sacris deformem crudelitatem; ille membra in lapidibus addita, haec in hominibus perdita. Hoc dedecus tot Iouis ipsius et tanta stupra non uincunt. Ille inter femineas corruptelas uno Ganymede caelum infamauit; ista tot mollibus professis et publicis et inquinauit terram et caelo fecit iniuriam.	Likewise, Varro chose to say nothing about the eunuch priests consecrated to that same Great Mother in defiance of all decency of men and women, nor do I remember reading anything about them anywhere. Until only yesterday these men went through the streets and squares of Carthage with their hair drenched in perfume, their faces whitened, their limbs loose and their gait like a woman's, demanding even from shopkeepers the means to keep up their shameful way of life. Here explanation failed, reason blushed, speech fell silent. The Great Mother outdid all the gods, her sons, not by the greatness of her divinity but by the greatness of her crime. Not even the monstrosity of Janus compares with this monster. He had only ugliness in his images; she has ugly cruelty in her rites. He had limbs added in stone; she has limbs destroyed in human beings. Not even the many great sexual crimes of Jupiter himself surpass this disgrace. Among all his seductions of women, he disgraced heaven with only one Ganymede; she, with so many avowed and public eunuch priests, has both defiled the earth and done injury to heaven.[33]
Saturnum fortasse possemus huic in isto genere turpissimae crudelitatis siue conferre siue praeferre, qui patrem castrasse perhibetur; sed in Saturni sacris homines alienis manibus potius occidi quam suis abscidi potuerunt. Deuorauit ille filios, ut poetae ferunt, et physici ex hoc interpretantur quod uolunt; ut autem	Perhaps in this kind of utterly shameful cruelty we could compare Saturn with her, or even rank him above her, since he is said to have castrated his father. But in Saturn's rites men could be killed by the hands of others; they were not mutilated by their own. He devoured his sons, as the poets say, 32 Attis was a Phrygian youth beloved by Cybele who castrated himself; his myth underlay the rites of her priests. Porphyry (c. AD 234–305) was a Neoplatonist philosopher, pupil of Plotinus.

33 Ganymede was the Trojan youth whom Jupiter carried off to heaven to be his cupbearer and lover.

LATIN

historia prodit, necauit; sed quod ei Poeni suos filios sacrificati sunt, non recepere Romani. At uero ista Magna deorum Mater etiam Romanis templis castratos intulit adque istam saeuitiam moremque seruauit, credita uires adiuuare Romanorum exsecando uirilia uirorum. Quid sunt ad hoc malum furta Mercurii, Veneris lasciuia, stupra ac turpitudines ceterorum, quae proferremus de libris, nisi cottidie cantarentur et saltarentur in theatris? Sed haec quid sunt ad tantum malum, cuius magnitudo Magnae Matri tantummodo conpetebat?

Praesertim quod illa dicuntur a poetis esse conficta, quasi poetae id etiam finxerint, quod ea sint dis grata et accepta. Ut ergo canerentur uel scriberentur, sit audacia uel petulantia poetarum; ut uero diuinis rebus et honoribus eisdem imperantibus et extorquentibus numinibus adderentur, quid est nisi crimen deorum, immo uero confessio daemoniorum et deceptio miserorum? Verum illud, quod de abscisorum consecratione Mater deum coli meruit, non poetae confinxerunt, sed horrere magis quam canere maluerunt. Hisne dis selectis quisquam consecrandus est, ut post mortem uiuat beate, quibus consecratus ante mortem honeste non potest uiuere, tam foedis superstitionibus subditus et inmundis daemonibus obligatus? Sed haec omnia, inquit, referuntur ad mundum. Videat ne potius ad inmundum. Quid autem non potest referri ad mundum, quod esse demonstratur in mundo?

Nos autem animum quaerimus, qui uera religione confisus non tamquam deum suum adoret mundum, sed tamquam opus Dei propter Deum laudet mundum, et mundanis sordibus expiatus mundus perueniat ad Deum, qui condidit mundum.

ENGLISH

and the natural philosophers interpret this however they please; but as history reports, he killed them. Yet the Romans did not adopt the Carthaginian practice of sacrificing their sons to him. This Great Mother of the gods, however, brought eunuchs even into Roman temples and kept up this savage custom, believed to strengthen the manly might of the Romans by cutting away the manhood of men. Compared with this evil, what are the thefts of Mercury, the wantonness of Venus, the sexual crimes and obscenities of the rest? We would cite them from books if they were not sung and danced every day in the theaters. But what are these beside so great an evil, whose greatness befitted only the Great Mother?

This is all the more so because those other stories are said to have been invented by the poets—as if the poets had also invented the fact that such things are pleasing and acceptable to the gods. Granted, then, that their being sung or written down is due to the boldness or impudence of the poets. But their being added to sacred rites and honors at the command and insistence of those very deities—what is that but a crime of the gods, or rather a confession of demons and a deception of the wretched? This, however—that the Mother of the gods earned her worship by the consecration of castrated men—was not invented by the poets; they preferred to shudder at it rather than sing of it. Is anyone to be consecrated to these select gods in order to live happily after death, when, once consecrated to them, he cannot live decently before death, subjected to such foul superstitions and bound over to unclean demons? "But all these things," he says, "refer to the world." Let him see whether they do not rather refer to the unclean. And what cannot be referred to the world, when it is shown to exist in the world?[34]

We, however, are looking for a mind that, trusting in true religion, does not worship the world as its god, but praises the world as the work of God, for God's sake, and, cleansed of the world's filth, comes clean to God, who founded the world.

34 A pun: Latin mundus means both "world" and "clean," and inmundus means "unclean."

THE FICTIONS OF THE NATURAL PHILOSOPHERS, WHO NEITHER WORSHIP THE TRUE DIVINITY NOR WORSHIP IT WITH THE WORSHIP DUE TO THE TRUE DIVINITY

Natural explanations reduce the gods to changeable bodies, and the rites themselves are shameful.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.27	Istos uero deos selectos uidemus quidem clarius innotuisse quam ceteros, non tamen ut eorum inlustrarentur merita, sed ne occultarentur obprobria; unde magis eos homines fuisse credibile est, sicut non solum poeticae litterae, uerum etiam historicae tradiderunt. Nam quod Vergilius ait: Primus ab aetherio uenit Saturnus Olympo, / Arma Iouis fugiens et regnis exul ademtis, et quae ad hanc rem pertinentia consequuntur, totam de hoc Euhemerus pandit historiam, quam Ennius in Latinum uertit eloquium; unde quia plurima posuerunt, qui contra huius modi errores ante nos uel Graeco sermone uel Latino scripserunt, non in eo mihi placuit inmorari.	As for these select gods, we see that they have indeed become better known than the others—yet not so that their merits might be brought to light, but so that their disgraces might not stay hidden. This makes it all the more credible that they were human beings, as not only poetic but also historical writings have handed down. Take what Virgil says: "First came Saturn from heavenly Olympus, fleeing the arms of Jupiter, an exile stripped of his kingdom," and what follows on this subject. Euhemerus sets out the whole of it as history, and Ennius translated his account into Latin. Since those who wrote against errors of this kind before us, in Greek or in Latin, have said a great deal about it, I have decided not to dwell on it.[35]
	Ipsas physiologias cum considero, quibus docti et acuti homines has res humanas conantur uertere in res diuinas, nihil uideo nisi ad temporalia terrenaque opera naturamque corpoream uel etiamsi inuisibilem, tamen mutabilem potuisse reuocari; quod nullo modo est uerus Deus. Hoc autem si saltem religiositati congruis significationibus ageretur, esset quidem dolendum non his uerum Deum adnuntiari adque praedicari, tamen aliquo modo ferendum tam foeda et turpia non fieri nec iuberi; at nunc cum pro Deo uero, quo solo anima se inhabitante fit felix, nefas sit colere aut corpus aut animam, quanto magis nefarium est ista sic colere, ut nec salutem nec decus humanum corpus aut anima colentis obtineat!	When I consider the natural explanations themselves, by which learned and clever men try to turn these human matters into divine ones, I see that nothing could be traced back to anything except temporal and earthly operations and bodily nature—or a nature that, even if invisible, is still changeable. And that is in no way the true God. If this were at least done through symbols befitting religious devotion, it would still be a matter for grief that the true God was not proclaimed and preached through them; yet it would be bearable, in a way, if such foul and shameful things were not done or commanded. But as it is, since it is wicked to worship either a body or a soul in place of the true God, by whose indwelling alone the soul becomes happy, how much more wicked it is to worship them in such a way that neither the body nor the soul of the worshiper keeps its well-being or its human dignity!
	Quam ob rem si templo sacerdote sacrificio, quod uero Deo debetur, colatur aliquod elementum mundi uel creatus aliquis spiritus, etiamsi non inmundus et malus: non ideo malum est, quia illa mala sunt, quibus colitur, sed quia illa talia sunt, quibus ille solus colendus sit, cui talis cultus seruitusque debetur. Si autem stoliditate uel monstrositate simulacrorum, sacrificiis homicidiorum,	So if some element of the world, or some created spirit—even one that is not unclean and evil—is worshiped with temple, priest and sacrifice, which are owed to the true God, this is wrong not because the means by which it is worshiped are evil, but because they are the kind of means by which he alone should be worshiped to whom such wor-

35 Euhemerus (around 300 BC) was a Greek writer who argued that the gods were deified human beings; Ennius (239–169 BC) was an early Roman poet who translated his work.

LATIN

coronatione uirilium pudendorum, mercede stuprorum, sectione membrorum, abscisione genitalium, consecratione mollium, festis inpurorum obscenorumque ludorum unum uerum Deum, id est omnis animae corporisque creatorem, colere se quisque contendat: non ideo peccat, quia non est colendus quem colit, sed quia colendum non ut colendus est colit.

Qui uero et rebus talibus, id est turpibus et scelestis, et non Deum uerum, id est animae corporisque factorem, sed creaturam quamuis non uitiosam colit, siue illa sit anima siue corpus siue anima simul et corpus, bis peccat in Deum, quod et pro ipso colit, quod non est ipse, et talibus rebus colit, qualibus nec ipse colendus est nec non ipse. Sed hi quonam modo, id est quam turpiter nefarieque coluerint, in promtu est; quid autem uel quos coluerint, esset obscurum, nisi eorum testaretur historia ea ipsa, quae foeda et turpia confitentur, numinibus terribiliter exigentibus reddita; unde remotis constat ambagibus nefarios daemones adque inmundissimos spiritus hac omni ciuili theologia inuisendis stolidis imaginibus et per eas possidendis etiam stultis cordibus inuitatos.

ENGLISH

ship and service are due. If, on the other hand, anyone claims to worship the one true God, the creator of every soul and body, with stupid or monstrous images, with sacrifices that are murders, with the crowning of male private parts, with the wages of prostitution, with the cutting of limbs, the severing of genitals, the consecration of eunuch priests, and festivals of impure and obscene shows, he sins not because the one he worships ought not to be worshiped, but because he worships the one who ought to be worshiped in a way he ought not to be worshiped.

But whoever worships with such things—shameful and criminal things—and worships not the true God, the maker of soul and body, but a creature, even one that is not corrupt, whether it be a soul or a body or a soul and body together, sins twice against God. He worships in God's place what is not God, and he worships with things by which neither God nor anything that is not God should be worshiped. Now how these people worshiped—that is, how shamefully and wickedly—is plain to see. But what or whom they worshiped would be obscure, were it not that their history testifies that the very things they admit to be foul and shameful were rendered at the terrifying demand of the deities. From this it is clear, all evasions set aside, that wicked demons and utterly unclean spirits were invited by this whole civil theology to haunt senseless images and, through them, to take possession of foolish hearts as well.

THAT VARRO'S TEACHING ON THEOLOGY IS CONSISTENT IN NO PART

Varro's scheme of male gods for heaven and goddesses for earth falls apart.

LATIN

7.28 Quid igitur ualet, quod uir doctissimus et acutissimus Varro uelut subtili disputatione hos omnes deos in caelum et in terram redigere ac referre conatur? Non potest; fluunt de manibus, resiliunt, labuntur et decidunt. Dicturus enim de feminis, hoc est deabus: Quoniam, inquit, ut primo libro dixi de locis, duo sunt principia deorum animaduersa de caelo et terra, a quo di partim dicuntur caelestes, partim terrestres: ut in superioribus initium fecimus a caelo, cum diximus de Iano, quem alii caelum, alii dixerunt esse mundum, sic de feminis scribendi facimus initium a Tellure. Sentio quantam molestiam tale ac tantum patiatur ingenium.

ENGLISH

What good is it, then, that Varro, a most learned and acute man, tries by what looks like subtle argument to reduce all these gods to heaven and earth and to refer them to these? He cannot do it. They slip through his fingers, spring back, slide away and fall. When he is about to speak of the female deities, that is, the goddesses, he says: "Since, as I said in the first book, on places, two origins of the gods have been observed, from heaven and from earth—which is why some gods are called heavenly and others earthly—just as in the earlier books we began with heaven, when we spoke of Janus, whom some have said is heaven

LATIN

Ducitur enim quadam ratione uerisimili, caelum esse quod faciat, terram quae patiatur, et ideo illi masculinam uim tribuit, huic femininam, et non adtendit eum potius esse qui haec facit, qui utrumque fecit. Hinc etiam Samothracum nobilia mysteria in superiore libro sic interpretatur eaque se, quae nec suis nota sunt, scribendo expositurum eisque missurum quasi religiosissime pollicetur. Dicit enim se ibi multis indiciis collegisse in simulacris aliud significare caelum, aliud terram, aliud exempla rerum, quas Plato appellat ideas; caelum Iouem, terram Iunonem, ideas Mineruam uult intellegi; caelum a quo fiat aliquid, terram de qua fiat, exemplum secundum quod fiat. Qua in re omitto dicere, quod Plato illas ideas tantam uim habere dicit, ut secundum eas non caelum aliquid fecerit, sed etiam caelum factum sit.

Hoc dico, istum in hoc libro selectorum deorum rationem illam trium deorum, quibus quasi cuncta conplexus est, perdidisse. Caelo enim tribuit masculos deos, feminas terrae; inter quas posuit Mineruam, quam supra ipsum caelum ante posuerat. Deinde masculus deus Neptunus in mari est, quod ad terram potius quam ad caelum pertinet. Dis pater postremo, qui Graece Πλούτων dicitur, etiam ipse masculus frater amborum terrenus deus esse perhibetur, superiorem terram tenens, in inferiore habens Proserpinam coniugem. Quo modo ergo deos ad caelum, deas ad terram referre conantur? Quid solidum quid constans, quid sobrium quid definitum habet haec disputatio? Illa est autem Tellus initium dearum, Mater scilicet Magna, aput quam mollium et abscisorum seseque secantium adque iactantium insana perstrepit turpitudo.

Quid est ergo quod dicitur caput deorum Ianus, caput dearum Tellus? Nec ibi facit unum caput error, nec hic and others the world, so in writing about the female deities we begin with Tellus." I can feel how much trouble so fine and so great an intellect is going through.

ENGLISH

For he is led by a plausible line of reasoning: that heaven is what acts and earth what is acted upon. So he attributes masculine power to the one and feminine power to the other, and he does not notice that the one who does these things is rather he who made both. On this basis he also interprets, in an earlier book, the famous mysteries of Samothrace, and promises, as if with the utmost religious devotion, that he will set out in writing and send to the Samothracians things not known even to them. He says that he gathered there from many indications that among the images one signifies heaven, another earth, and another the patterns of things, which Plato calls Ideas. He wants Jupiter to be understood as heaven, Juno as earth, Minerva as the Ideas: heaven as that by which something is made, earth as that from which it is made, the pattern as that according to which it is made. Here I pass over the fact that Plato says these Ideas have such power that it was not heaven that made anything according to them; rather, heaven itself was made according to them.[36]

What I do say is this: in this book on the select gods he has lost track of that scheme of three gods in which he had, so to speak, embraced everything. For he assigns the male gods to heaven and the female to earth, and among the latter he has placed Minerva, whom he had earlier placed above heaven itself. Then Neptune, a male god, is in the sea, which belongs to earth rather than to heaven. Finally, Father Dis, called Πλούτων [Ploutōn, Pluto] in Greek, himself male and brother of both, is said to be an earthly god, holding the upper earth, while his wife Proserpina holds the lower. How, then, do they try to refer the gods to heaven and the goddesses to earth? What is there in this argument that is solid or consistent, sober or precise? And this Tellus, the beginning of the goddesses, is of course the Great Mother, around whom resounds the frenzied disgrace of eunuch priests, of castrated men, of men who cut themselves and fling themselves about.

What does it mean, then, to say that Janus is the head of the gods and Tellus the head of the god-

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	sanum furor. Quur haec frustra referre nituntur ad mundum? Quod etsi possent, pro Deo uero mundum nemo pius colit; et tamen eos nec hoc posse ueritas aperta conuincit. Referant haec potius ad homines mortuos et ad daemones pessimos, et nulla quaestio remanebit.	desses? There error does not make a single head, nor here does madness make a sane one. Why do they struggle in vain to refer these things to the world? Even if they could, no devout person worships the world in place of the true God; and yet plain truth proves that they cannot even do this. Let them refer these things rather to dead human beings and to the worst of demons, and no question will remain.

THAT EVERYTHING THE NATURAL PHILOSOPHERS REFERRED TO THE WORLD AND ITS PARTS THEY SHOULD HAVE REFERRED TO THE ONE TRUE GOD

Everything Varro ascribes to the gods belongs rightly to the one true God.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.29	Namque omnia, quae ab eis ex istorum deorum theologia uelut physicis rationibus referuntur ad mundum, quam sine ullo scrupulo sacrilegae opinionis Deo potius uero, qui fecit mundum, omnis animae et omnis corporis conditori, tribuantur, aduertamus hoc modo: Nos Deum colimus, non caelum et terram, quibus duabus partibus mundus hic constat; nec animam uel animas per uiuentia quaecumque diffusas, sed Deum, qui fecit caelum et terram et omnia, quae in eis sunt; qui fecit omnem animam, siue quocumque modo uiuentem et sensus ac rationis expertem, siue etiam sentientem, siue etiam intellegentem.	For all the things that they refer to the world from the theology of these gods, by supposedly natural explanations, can be attributed instead—without any qualm of sacrilegious opinion—to the true God, who made the world, the founder of every soul and every body. Let us observe how, in this way: We worship God—not heaven and earth, the two parts of which this world consists, nor a soul or souls diffused through all living things, but God, who made heaven and earth and all that is in them; who made every soul, whether it merely lives in some way and lacks sensation and reason, or also has sensation, or also has understanding.

WITH WHAT PIETY THE CREATOR IS DISTINGUISHED FROM HIS CREATURES, SO THAT NOT AS MANY GODS ARE WORSHIPED IN PLACE OF THE ONE AS THERE ARE WORKS OF THE ONE MAKER

Augustine lists the works of the one God that pagans parceled out among many gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.30	Et ut iam incipiam illa unius et ueri Dei opera percurrere, propter quae isti sibi, dum quasi honeste conantur sacramenta turpissima et scelestissima interpretari, deos multos falsosque fecerunt: illum Deum colimus, qui naturis a se creatis et subsistendi et mouendi initia finesque constituit; qui rerum causas habet, nouit adque disponit; qui uim seminum condidit; qui rationalem animam, quod dicitur animus, quibus uoluit uiuentibus indidit; qui sermonis facultatem usumque donauit; qui munus futura dicendi quibus placuit spiritibus inpertiuit et per quos placet ipse futura praedicit et per quos placet malas ualetudines pellit; qui bellorum quoque ipsorum, cum sic emendandum et castigandum est genus	And now let me begin to run through those works of the one true God on account of which these people, while trying to give a respectable-seeming interpretation of the most shameful and criminal sacred rites, have made for themselves many false gods. We worship that God who has established for the natures he created both the beginnings and the ends of their existing and moving; who holds, knows and arranges the causes of things; who founded the power of seeds; who placed a rational soul, which is called mind, in the living beings he chose; who gave the faculty and use of speech; who granted the gift of foretelling the future to the

36 Samothrace is an island in the northern Aegean, home of a famous mystery cult of the "Great Gods."

LATIN

humanum, exordiis progressibus finibusque moderatur; qui mundi huius ignem uehementissimum et uiolentissimum pro inmensae naturae temperamento et creauit et regit;

qui uniuersarum aquarum creator et gubernator est; qui solem fecit corporalium clarissimum luminum eique uim congruam et motum dedit; qui ipsis etiam inferis dominationem suam potestatemque non subtrahit; qui semina et alimenta mortalium, siue arida siue liquida, naturis conpetentibus adtributa substituit; qui terram fundat adque fecundat; qui fructus eius animalibus hominibusque largitur; qui causas non solum principales, sed etiam subsequentes nouit adque ordinat; qui lunae statuit modum suum; qui uias caelestes adque terrestres locorum mutationibus praebet; qui humanis ingeniis, quae creauit, etiam scientias artium uariarum ad adiuuandam uitam naturamque concessit; qui coniunctionem maris et feminae ad adiutorium propagandae prolis instituit; qui hominum coetibus, quem focis et luminibus adhiberent, ad facillimos usus munus terreni ignis indulsit.

Ista sunt certe, quae dis selectis per nescio quas physicas interpretationes uir acutissimus adque doctissimus Varro, siue quae aliunde accepit, siue quae ipse coniecit, distribuere laborauit. Haec autem facit adque agit unus uerus Deus, sed sicut Deus, id est ubique totus, nullis inclusus locis, nullis uinculis adligatus, in nullas partes sectilis, ex nulla parte mutabilis, inplens caelum et terram praesente potentia, non indigente natura. Sic itaque administrat omnia, quae creauit, ut etiam ipsa proprios exerere et agere motus sinat. Quamuis enim nihil esse possint sine ipso, non sunt quod ipse. Agit autem multa etiam per angelos; sed non nisi ex se ipso beatificat angelos. Ita quamuis propter aliquas causas hominibus angelos mittat, non tamen ex angelis homines, sed ex se ipso, sicut angelos, beatificat.

Ab hoc uno et uero Deo uitam speramus aeternam.

ENGLISH

spirits he pleased, and through whomever he pleases himself foretells the future, and through whomever he pleases drives away illnesses; who governs even wars—their beginnings, their courses and their ends—when the human race must be corrected and chastised in this way; who both created and rules the fire of this world, most vehement and violent, to keep the vastness of nature in balance;

who is creator and governor of all the waters; who made the sun, the brightest of bodily lights, and gave it suitable power and motion; who does not withdraw his dominion and power even from the underworld; who has provided for mortals seeds and foods, both dry and liquid, assigned to the natures fitted for them; who grounds the earth and makes it fruitful; who lavishes its fruits on animals and human beings; who knows and orders not only first causes but also those that follow from them; who set for the moon its measure; who provides paths in heaven and on earth for movement from place to place; who also granted to the human minds he created knowledge of the various arts, to aid life and nature; who instituted the union of male and female as an aid to the propagation of offspring; who granted to human communities the gift of earthly fire, to use on their hearths and in their lamps for the most convenient purposes.

These, surely, are the things that Varro, a most acute and learned man, labored to distribute among the select gods through some sort of natural interpretations, whether he took them from elsewhere or guessed at them himself. But it is the one true God who makes and does these things—and he does them as God: wholly present everywhere, enclosed by no places, bound by no chains, divisible into no parts, changeable in no part, filling heaven and earth with his present power, not with a nature in need of anything. He governs all that he has created in such a way that he also lets them put forth and carry out their own movements. For although they can be nothing without him, they are not what he is. He also does many things through angels; but he makes the angels happy only from himself. So, although for certain reasons he sends angels to human beings, he makes human beings happy not from angels but from himself, just as he does the angels.

From this one true God we hope for eternal life.

THE PARTICULAR BENEFITS OF GOD, BEYOND HIS GENERAL BOUNTY, THAT THE FOLLOWERS OF TRUTH ENJOY

Beyond the gifts of nature, God sent his Son to cleanse humanity from sin.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.31	Habemus enim ab illo praeter huiusce modi beneficia, quae ex hac, de qua nonnulla diximus, administratione naturae bonis malisque largitur, magnum et bonorum proprium magnae dilectionis indicium. Quamquam enim, quod sumus, quod uiuimus, quod caelum terramque conspicimus, quod habemus mentem adque rationem, qua eum ipsum, qui haec omnia condidit, inquiramus, nequaquam ualeamus actioni sufficere gratiarum: tamen quod nos oneratos obrutosque peccatis et a contemplatione suae lucis auersos ac tenebrarum, id est iniquitatis, dilectione caecatos non omnino deseruit misitque nobis Verbum suum, qui est eius unicus filius, quo pro nobis adsumta carne nato adque passo, quanti Deus hominem penderet, nosceremus adque illo sacrificio singulari a peccatis omnibus mundaremur eiusque spiritu in cordibus nostris dilectione diffusa omnibus difficultatibus superatis in aeternam requiem et contemplationis eius ineffabilem dulcedinem ueniremus, quae corda, quot linguae ad agendas ei gratias satis esse contenderint?	For besides benefits of this kind, which he bestows on good and bad alike through this governance of nature (of which we have said something), we have from him a great sign of great love, one that belongs to the good alone. We can in no way give adequate thanks that we exist, that we live, that we behold heaven and earth, that we have a mind and reason with which to seek him who founded all these things. Yet consider this: when we were weighed down and buried under sins, turned away from the contemplation of his light and blinded by love of darkness, that is, of wickedness, he did not abandon us altogether. He sent us his Word, who is his only Son, so that, when the Word had taken on flesh, been born and suffered for us, we might learn how highly God valued humanity; that we might be cleansed of all our sins by that unique sacrifice; and that, with love poured into our hearts by his Spirit, we might overcome every difficulty and come to eternal rest and the indescribable sweetness of contemplating him. For this, what hearts, how many tongues, would claim to be enough to give him thanks?

THAT THE MYSTERY OF CHRIST'S REDEMPTION WAS LACKING IN NO PAST AGE AND WAS ALWAYS PROCLAIMED BY VARIOUS SIGNS

The mystery of eternal life was foretold from the beginning, above all through the Hebrew people.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
7.32	Hoc mysterium uitae aeternae iam inde ab exordio generis humani per quaedam signa et sacramenta temporibus congrua, quibus oportuit, per angelos praedicatum est. Deinde populus Hebraeus in unam quandam rem publicam, quae hoc sacramentum ageret, congregatus est, ubi per quosdam scientes, per quosdam nescientes id, quod ex aduentu Christi usque nunc et deinceps agitur, praenuntiaretur esse uenturum; sparsa etiam postea eadem gente per gentes propter testimonium scripturarum, quibus aeterna salus in Christo futura praedicta est.	This mystery of eternal life was proclaimed through angels from the very beginning of the human race, to those to whom it was fitting, by means of certain signs and sacred symbols suited to the times. Then the Hebrew people was gathered into a single commonwealth, as it were, to enact this sacred sign. There, through some who understood and some who did not, it was foretold as something to come: what has been taking place from the coming of Christ until now and will go on taking place. Later that same nation was also scattered among the nations, to bear witness to the Scriptures in which eternal salvation in Christ was foretold.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Omnes enim non solum prophetiae, quae in uerbis sunt, nec tantum praecepta uitae, quae mores pietatemque conformant adque illis litteris continentur, uerum etiam sacra, sacerdotia, tabernaculum siue templum, altaria, sacrificia, ceremoniae, dies festi et quidquid aliud ad eam seruitutem pertinet, quae Deo debetur et Graece proprie λατρεία dicitur, ea significata et praenuntiata sunt, quae propter aeternam uitam fidelium in Christo et inpleta credimus et inpleri cernimus et inplenda confidimus.	For it was not only all the prophecies expressed in words, and not only the rules of life that shape conduct and devotion and are contained in those writings, but also the rites, the priesthoods, the tabernacle or temple, the altars, the sacrifices, the ceremonies, the feast days and whatever else belongs to the service that is due to God—properly called in Greek latreia [service due to God alone]—that signified and foretold the things which, for the sake of the eternal life of the faithful in Christ, we believe have been fulfilled, see being fulfilled, and trust will be fulfilled.

THAT ONLY THROUGH THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION COULD THE DECEIT OF EVIL SPIRITS, WHO DELIGHT IN HUMAN ERROR, BE EXPOSED

True religion exposes the pagan gods as demons; Varro's natural explanations fail.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.33 Per hanc ergo religionem unam et ueram potuit aperiri deos gentium esse inmundissimos daemones, sub defunctarum occasionibus animarum uel creaturarum specie mundanarum deos se putari cupientes et quasi diuinis honoribus eisdemque scelestis ac turpibus rebus superba inpuritate laetantes adque ad uerum Deum conuersionem humanis animis inuidentes. Ex quorum inmanissimo et inpiissimo dominatu homo liberatur, cum credit in eum, qui praebuit ad exsurgendum tantae humilitatis exemplum, quanta illi superbia ceciderunt. Hinc sunt non solum illi, de quibus multa iam diximus, et alii adque alii similes ceterarum gentium adque terrarum, sed etiam hi, de quibus nunc agimus, tamquam in senatum deorum selecti; sed plane selecti nobilitate criminum, non dignitate uirtutum.	Through this one true religion, then, it could be revealed that the gods of the nations are the most unclean demons. Using the souls of the dead as their pretext, or taking on the appearance of creatures of this world, they long to be thought gods; with proud impurity they delight in so-called divine honors, which are at the same time criminal and shameful; and they begrudge human souls their conversion to the true God. From their most savage and most impious domination a person is set free when he believes in him who, to help us rise, gave an example of humility as great as the pride by which they fell. Of this kind are not only those of whom we have already said much, and many others like them among the other nations and lands, but also these whom we are now dealing with, selected, as it were, into a senate of gods—selected indeed, but for the nobility of their crimes, not the dignity of their virtues.
Quorum sacra Varro dum quasi ad naturales rationes referre conatur, quaerens honestare res turpes, quo modo his quadret et consonet non potest inuenire, quoniam non sunt ipsae illorum sacrorum causae, quas putat uel potius uult putari. Nam si non solum ipsae, uerum etiam quaelibet aliae huius generis essent, quamuis nihil ad Deum uerum uitamque aeternam, quae in religione quaerenda est, pertinerent, tamen qualicumque de rerum natura reddita ratione aliquantulum mitigarent offensionem, quam non intellecta in sacris aliqua uelut turpitudo aut absurditas fecerat; sicut in quibusdam theatrorum fabulis uel	When Varro tries to refer their rites to natural explanations, seeking to make shameful things respectable, he cannot find a way to make the explanations fit and agree with the rites, because these are not the real causes of those rites, which he thinks they are—or rather wants them to be thought. For if these were the causes, or any others of this kind, then, although they would have nothing to do with the true God and eternal life, which is what religion must seek, they would still somewhat soften, by giving some sort of account drawn from the nature of things, the offense

LATIN	ENGLISH
delubrorum mysteriis facere conatus est, ubi non theatra delubrorum similitudine absoluit, sed theatrorum potius similitudine delubra damnauit; tamen utcumque conatus est, ut sensum horribilibus rebus offensum uelut naturalium causarum ratio reddita deleniret.	caused by some apparent shamefulness or absurdity in the rites that was not understood. That is what he tried to do with certain theatrical stories and temple mysteries. There he did not acquit the theaters by their likeness to the temples; rather, he condemned the temples by their likeness to the theaters. Still, he tried in whatever way he could to soothe the sensibilities offended by horrible things by giving an account of supposed natural causes.

THE BOOKS OF NUMA POMPILIUS, WHICH THE SENATE ORDERED BURNED SO THAT THE REASONS FOR THE RITES CONTAINED IN THEM WOULD NOT BECOME KNOWN

A plow turned up Numa's books on the causes of the rites, and the senate burned them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.34 Sed contra inuenimus, sicut ipse uir doctissimus prodidit, de Numae Pompilii libris redditas sacrorum causas nullo modo potuisse tolerari nec dignas habitas, quae non solum lectae innotescerent religiosis, sed saltem scriptae reconderentur in tenebris. Iam enim dicam, quod in tertio huius operis libro me suo loco dicturum esse promiseram. Nam, sicut aput eundem Varronem legitur in libro de cultu deorum, Terentius quidam cum haberet ad Ianiculum fundum et bubulcus eius iuxta sepulcrum Numae Pompilii traiciens aratrum eruisset ex terra libros eius, ubi sacrorum institutorum scriptae erant causae, in Urbem pertulit ad praetorem. At ille cum inspexisset principia, rem tantam detulit ad senatum.	But on the contrary we find, as that most learned man himself reported, that the causes of the rites set out in the books of Numa Pompilius could not be tolerated at all. They were judged unworthy not only of becoming known to the devout by being read, but even of being kept in writing, hidden away in darkness. I will now tell what I promised in the third book of this work to tell in its proper place. As we read in the same Varro, in his book On the Worship of the Gods, a certain Terentius had a farm near the Janiculum. His ox-driver, drawing the plow near the tomb of Numa Pompilius, turned up out of the ground Numa's books, in which the causes of the rites he had instituted were written down, and Terentius took them into the City to the praetor. When the praetor had looked at the opening pages, he referred so serious a matter to the senate.[37]
Ubi cum primores quasdam causas legissent, quur quidque in sacris fuerit institutum, Numae mortuo senatus adsensus est, eosque libros tamquam religiosi patres conscripti, praetor ut combureret, censuerunt. Credat quisque quod putat; immo uero dicat, quod dicendum suggesserit uesana contentio, quilibet tantae inpietatis defensor egregius. Me admonere sufficiat sacrorum causas a rege Pompilio Romanorum sacrorum institutore conscriptas nec populo nec senatui nec saltem ipsis sacerdotibus innotescere debuisse ipsumque Numam Pompilium curiositate inlicita ad ea daemonum peruenisse secreta, quae ipse quidem scriberet, ut haberet unde legendo commoneretur; sed ea tamen, cum	There, when the leading senators had read some of the causes explaining why each thing in the rites had been instituted, the senate sided with the dead Numa, and the senators, religious men that they were, decreed that the praetor should burn the books. Let everyone believe what he thinks; or rather, let any distinguished defender of such great impiety say whatever his mad contentiousness suggests to him. It is enough for me to point out that the causes of the rites, written down by King Pompilius, the founder of the Roman rites, were not supposed to become known to the people, or to the senate, or even to the priests

37 Numa Pompilius was the legendary second king of Rome, credited with founding its religious institutions.

LATIN	ENGLISH
rex esset, qui minime quemquam metueret, nec docere aliquem nec delendo uel quoquo modo consumendo perdere auderet.	themselves. Numa Pompilius himself, through unlawful curiosity, came upon those secrets of the demons, and he did write them down so as to have something to read as a reminder. Yet although he was a king who had no reason to fear anyone, he dared neither to teach them to anyone nor to destroy them by erasing them or doing away with them in any other way.
Ita quod scire neminem uoluit, ne homines nefaria doceret, uiolare autem timuit, ne daemones iratos haberet, obruit, ubi tutum putauit, sepulcro suo propinquare aratrum posse non credens. Senatus autem cum religiones formidaret damnare maiorum et ideo Numae adsentiri cogeretur, illos tamen libros tam perniciosos esse iudicauit, ut nec obrui rursus iuberet, ne humana curiositas multo uehementius rem iam proditam quaereret, sed flammis aboleri nefanda monumenta, ut, quia iam necesse esse existimabant sacra illa facere, tolerabilius erraretur causis eorum ignoratis, quam cognitis ciuitas turbaretur.	So what he wanted no one to know, lest he teach people wicked things, but was afraid to destroy, lest he anger the demons, he buried where he thought it would be safe, not believing that a plow could come near his tomb. The senate, for its part, was afraid to condemn the religious practices of their ancestors and so was forced to agree with Numa. Yet it judged those books so harmful that it did not order them to be buried again, lest human curiosity seek out all the more eagerly a matter already brought to light; instead it ordered those abominable records to be destroyed by fire. Since they thought it was by now necessary to perform those rites, it would be more bearable to err in ignorance of their causes than for the city to be thrown into turmoil by knowing them.

HYDROMANCY, BY WHICH NUMA WAS DECEIVED THROUGH CERTAIN IMAGES OF DEMONS THAT HE SAW

Numa learned the rites through hydromancy from demons and hid their causes.

LATIN	ENGLISH
7.35 Nam et ipse Numa, ad quem nullus Dei propheta, nullus sanctus angelus mittebatur, hydromantian facere conpulsus est, ut in aqua uideret imagines deorum uel potius ludificationes daemonum, a quibus audiret, quid in sacris constituere adque obseruare deberet. Quod genus diuinationis idem Varro a Persis dicit adlatum, quo et ipsum Numam et postea Pythagoram philosophum usum fuisse commemorat; ubi adhibito sanguine etiam inferos perhibet sciscitari et νεκυιομαντείαν Graece dicit uocari, quae siue necromantia dicatur, id ipsum est, ubi uidentur mortui diuinare. Quibus haec artibus fiant, ipsi uiderint. Nolo enim dicere has artes etiam ante nostri Saluatoris aduentum in ipsis ciuitatibus gentium legibus solere prohiberi et poena seuerissima uindicari. Nolo, inquam, hoc dicere; fortassis enim talia tunc licebant.	For Numa himself, to whom no prophet of God, no holy angel was sent, was driven to practice hydromancy [divination by water], so that he might see in water images of the gods—or rather the mockeries of demons—and hear from them what he ought to establish and observe in the rites. Varro says that this kind of divination was brought from the Persians, and he mentions that both Numa himself and later the philosopher Pythagoras used it. He says that in it, when blood is used, the dead in the underworld are also consulted, and that this is called in Greek nekyomanteia [divination through the dead]. Whether it is called that or necromancy, it is the same thing: a practice in which the dead seem to divine. By what arts these things are done is their concern. For I do not wish to say that even before the coming of our Savior these arts were commonly forbidden by law in the very cities of the pagans and punished with the severest pen-

LATIN

His tamen artibus didicit sacra illa Pompilius, quorum sacrorum facta prodidit, causas obruit (ita timuit et ipse quod didicit), quarum causarum proditos libros senatus incendit. Quid mihi ergo Varro illorum sacrorum alias nescio quas causas uelut physicas interpretatur? quales si libri illi habuissent, non utique arsissent, aut et istos Varronis ad Caesarem pontificem scriptos adque editos patres conscripti similiter incendissent. Quod ergo aquam egesserit, id est exportauerit, Numa Pompilius, unde hydromantian faceret, ideo nympham Egeriam coniugem dicitur habuisse, quem ad modum in supradicto libro Varronis exponitur. Ita enim solent res gestae aspersione mendaciorum in fabulas uerti. In illa igitur hydromantia curiosissimus rex ille Romanus et sacra didicit, quae in libris suis pontifices haberent, et eorum causas, quas praeter se neminem scire uoluit.

Itaque eas seorsum scriptas secum quodam modo mori fecit, quando ita subtrahendas hominum notitiae sepeliendasque curauit. Aut ergo daemonum illic tam sordidae et noxiae cupiditates erant conscriptae, ut ex his tota illa theologia ciuilis etiam aput tales homines execrabilis appareret, qui tam multa in ipsis sacris erubescenda susceperant; aut illi omnes nihil aliud quam homines mortui prodebantur, quos tam prolixa temporis uetustate fere omnes populi gentium deos inmortales esse crediderant, cum et talibus sacris idem illi daemones oblectarentur, qui se colendos pro ipsis mortuis, quos deos putari fecerant, quibusdam fallacium miraculorum adtestationibus subponebant.

Sed occulta Dei ueri prouidentia factum est, ut et Pompilio amico suo illis conciliati artibus, quibus hydromantia fieri potuit, cuncta illa confiteri permitterentur, et tamen, ut moriturus incenderet ea potius quam obrueret, admonere non permitterentur; qui ne innotescerent nec aratro, quo sunt eruta, obsistere alty. I do not wish, I say, to say this—for perhaps such things were permitted then.

ENGLISH

It was by these arts, at any rate, that Pompilius learned those rites. He made public what was done in them but buried their causes (so afraid was he himself of what he had learned), and when the books containing those causes came to light, the senate burned them. Why, then, does Varro offer me some other supposedly natural causes for those rites? If those books had contained causes of that sort, they would certainly not have been burned—or else the senators would likewise have burned these books of Varro's, written and published for Caesar as pontiff. It is because Numa Pompilius "carried out" water (egesserit), that is, brought it out, to perform hydromancy, that he is said to have had the nymph Egeria as his wife, as is explained in the book of Varro mentioned above. This is how actual events are commonly turned into myths by a sprinkling of lies. So it was in that hydromancy that this most curious Roman king learned both the rites, which the pontiffs were to keep in their books, and their causes, which he wanted no one but himself to know.[38]

And so he wrote them down separately and made them die with him, in a sense, when he saw to it that they were withdrawn from human knowledge and buried in this way. Either, then, the cravings of the demons recorded there were so filthy and harmful that they would have made that whole civil theology appear detestable even to men like these, who had accepted so many shameful things in the rites themselves; or else all those gods were exposed as nothing but dead men, whom almost all the peoples of the nations had come to believe, over so long a stretch of time, were immortal gods. Meanwhile those same demons took delight in such rites, slipping themselves in as objects of worship in place of the dead whom they had caused to be thought gods, backed by the testimony of certain deceptive miracles.

But by the hidden providence of the true God it came about that the demons, won over by the arts through which hydromancy could be performed, were allowed to confess all these things to Pompilius, their friend, and yet were not allowed to warn him to burn them rather than bury them bepotuerunt, nec stilo Varronis, quo ea, quae de hac re gesta sunt, in nostram memoriam peruenerunt. Non enim possunt quod non sinuntur efficere; sinuntur autem alto Dei summi iustoque iudicio pro meritis eorum, quos ab eis uel adfligi tantum, uel etiam subici ac decipi iustum est. Quam uero perniciosae uel a cultu uerae diuinitatis alienae illae litterae iudicatae sint, hinc intellegi potest, quod eas maluit senatus incendere, quas Pompilius occultauit, quam timere quod timuit, qui hoc audere non potuit.

38 Varro dedicated his Antiquities to Julius Caesar as chief pontiff; the name Egeria is here derived from egerere, "to carry out."

LATIN

Qui ergo uitam nec modo habere uult piam, talibus sacris quaerat aeternam; qui autem cum malignis daemonibus non uult habere societatem, non superstitionem, qua coluntur, noxiam pertimescat, sed ueram religionem, qua produntur et uincuntur, agnoscat.

ENGLISH

fore he died. Nor could they keep them from becoming known by standing in the way of the plow that turned them up, or of the pen of Varro, through which the events surrounding this matter have come down to our memory. For they cannot accomplish what they are not permitted to; and they are permitted by the deep and just judgment of the supreme God, according to the deserts of those whom it is just for them merely to afflict, or even to subjugate and deceive. How harmful those writings were judged to be, and how foreign to the worship of the true divinity, can be understood from this: the senate preferred to burn what Pompilius had hidden rather than fear what he feared, he who could not bring himself to dare this.

Let anyone, then, who does not want to lead a devout life even now, seek eternal life through such rites. But let anyone who does not want fellowship with evil demons not be terrified of the harmful superstition by which they are worshiped, but acknowledge the true religion by which they are exposed and conquered.

Book VIII

The Platonists
The Platonists come closest to the truth, but err in worshiping demons as go-betweens.

THAT THE QUESTION OF NATURAL THEOLOGY MUST BE DISCUSSED WITH PHILOSOPHERS OF SUPERIOR LEARNING

Natural theology must be debated with the philosophers, the lovers of wisdom.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.1	Nunc intentiore nobis opus est animo multo quam erat in superiorum solutione quaestionum et explicatione librorum. De theologia quippe, quam naturalem uocant, non cum quibuslibet hominibus (non enim fabulosa est uel ciuilis, hoc est uel theatrica uel urbana; quarum altera iactitat deorum crimina, altera indicat deorum desideria criminosiora ac per hoc malignorum potius daemonum quam deorum), sed cum philosophis est habenda conlatio; quorum ipsum nomen si Latine interpretemur, amorem sapientiae profitetur. Porro si sapientia Deus est, per quem facta sunt omnia, sicut diuina auctoritas ueritasque monstrauit, uerus philosophus est amator Dei.	We now need much closer attention than was needed in solving the earlier questions and setting out the earlier books. The theology they call natural is not to be discussed with just anyone. It is not mythical or civil theology, that is, the theology of the theater or of the city: the first parades the crimes of the gods, the second reveals the gods' still more criminal desires, and so shows them to be evil demons rather than gods. This discussion must be held with the philosophers. Their very name, if we render it in Latin, professes love of wisdom. Now if wisdom is God, through whom all things were made, as divine authority and truth have shown, then the true philosopher is a lover of God.[1]
	Sed quia res ipsa, cuius hoc nomen est, non est in omnibus, qui hoc nomine gloriantur (neque enim continuo uerae sapientiae sunt amatores quicumque appellantur philosophi): profecto ex omnibus, quorum sententias ex litteris nosse potuimus, eligendi sunt cum quibus non indigne quaestio ista tractetur. Neque enim hoc opere omnes omnium philosophorum uanas opiniones refutare suscepi, sed eas tantum, quae ad theologian pertinent, quo uerbo Graeco significari intellegimus de diuinitate rationem siue sermonem; nec eas omnium, sed eorum tantum, qui cum et esse diuinitatem et humana curare consentiant, non tamen sufficere unius incommutabilis Dei cultum ad uitam adipiscendam etiam post mortem beatam, sed multos ab illo sane uno conditos adque institutos ob eam causam colendos putant.	But the reality that this name stands for is not found in everyone who glories in the name, for not everyone called a philosopher is thereby a lover of true wisdom. So from all those whose views we have been able to learn from their writings, we must choose those with whom this question can be discussed in a way worthy of it. In this work I have not undertaken to refute all the empty opinions of all the philosophers. I take on only those that concern theology, a Greek word which we understand to mean reasoning or discourse about the divine. Nor do I take on the opinions of all of them on this, but only of those who agree that divinity exists and cares for human affairs. Even so, they think that the worship of the one unchangeable God is not enough to attain a life that is happy even after death. In their view many gods, created and appointed by that one God, must be worshiped for that purpose.

1 "Through whom all things were made" echoes John 1:3; Augustine identifies God's Wisdom with the Word.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Hi iam etiam Varronis opinionem ueritatis propinquitate transcendunt; si quidem ille totam theologian naturalem usque ad mundum istum uel animam eius extendere potuit, isti uero supra omnem animae naturam confitentur Deum, qui non solum mundum istum uisibilem, qui saepe caeli et terrae nomine nuncupatur, sed etiam omnem omnino animam fecerit, et qui rationalem et intellectualem, cuius generis anima humana est, participatione sui luminis incommutabilis et incorporei beatam facit. Hos philosophos Platonicos appellatos a Platone doctore uocabulo deriuato nullus, qui haec uel tenuiter audiuit, ignorat. De hoc igitur Platone, quae necessaria praesenti quaestioni existimo, breuiter adtingam, prius illos commemorans, qui eum in eodem genere litterarum tempore praecesserunt.	These philosophers already surpass even Varro's view by coming closer to the truth. He could extend natural theology as a whole only as far as this world or its soul. They, however, acknowledge a God above every kind of soul. This God made not only this visible world, often called by the name "heaven and earth," but absolutely every soul as well. He also makes the rational and intellectual soul, the kind of soul the human soul is, happy by participation in his own unchangeable and incorporeal light. No one who has heard even a little about these things is unaware that these philosophers are called Platonists, a name derived from their teacher Plato. I shall therefore touch briefly on what I judge necessary about Plato for the present question. First I shall recall those who came before him in time in the same field of writing.[2]

THE TWO SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHERS, THE ITALIAN AND THE IONIAN, AND THEIR FOUNDERS

Augustine surveys the Italian and Ionian schools from Pythagoras and Thales to Socrates.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.2 Quantum enim adtinet ad litteras Graecas, quae lingua inter ceteras gentium clarior habetur, duo philosophorum genera traduntur: unum Italicum ex ea parte Italiae, quae quondam magna Graecia nuncupata est; alterum Ionicum in eis terris, ubi et nunc Graecia nominatur. Italicum genus auctorem habuit Pythagoram Samium, a quo etiam ferunt ipsum philosophiae nomen exortum. Nam cum antea sapientes appellarentur, qui modo quodam laudabilis uitae aliis praestare uidebantur, iste interrogatus, quid profiteretur, philosophum se esse respondit, id est studiosum uel amatorem sapientiae; quoniam sapientem profiteri adrogantissimum uidebatur. Ionici uero generis princeps fuit Thales Milesius, unus illorum septem, qui sunt appellati sapientes.	As far as Greek literature is concerned, Greek being reckoned the most distinguished of the languages of the nations, tradition speaks of two schools of philosophers. One is the Italian school, from the part of Italy once called Magna Graecia, "Great Greece." The other is the Ionian school, in the lands that are still called Greece. The Italian school had as its founder Pythagoras of Samos, from whom, they say, the very name "philosophy" arose. Before him, those who seemed to excel others by a praiseworthy way of life were called "wise men." But when he was asked what he professed, he answered that he was a philosopher, that is, a student or lover of wisdom, since to profess to be wise seemed the height of arrogance. The founder of the Ionian school was Thales of Miletus, one of the seven who were called the Wise Men.[3]
Sed illi sex uitae genere distinguebantur et quibusdam praeceptis ad bene uiuendum adcommodatis; iste autem Thales, ut successores etiam propagaret, rerum naturam scrutatus suasque disputationes litteris mandans eminuit maximeque admirabilis extitit, quod astrologiae numeris	But the other six were distinguished by their way of life and by certain precepts suited to living well. This Thales, however, wanted to leave successors as well. So he investigated the nature of things and committed his arguments to writing,

2 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), the Roman scholar whose account of the gods Augustine attacked in Books 6–7.
3 Magna Graecia was the region of Greek colonies in southern Italy. Pythagoras and Thales both lived in the 6th century BC; Thales was counted among the Seven Sages of Greece.

LATIN

conprehensis defectus solis et lunae etiam praedicere potuit. Aquam tamen putauit rerum esse principium et hinc omnia elementa mundi ipsumque mundum et quae in eo gignuntur existere. Nihil autem huic operi, quod mundo considerato tam mirabile aspicimus, ex diuina mente praeposuit. Huic successit Anaximander, eius auditor, mutauitque de rerum natura opinionem. Non enim ex una re, sicut Thales ex umore, sed ex suis propriis principiis quasque res nasci putauit.

Quae rerum principia singularum esse credidit infinita, et innumerabiles mundos gignere et quaecumque in eis oriuntur; eosque mundos modo dissolui, modo iterum gigni existimauit, quanta quisque aetate sua manere potuerit; nec ipse aliquid diuinae menti in his rerum operibus tribuens. Iste Anaximenen discipulum et successorem reliquit, qui omnes rerum causas aeri infinito dedit, nec deos negauit aut tacuit; non tamen ab ipsis aerem factum, sed ipsos ex aere ortos credidit. Anaxagoras uero êius auditor harum rerum omnium, quas uidemus, effectorem diuinum animum sensit et dixit ex infinita materia, quae constaret dissimilibus inter se particulis rerum omnium, similibus quibusque suis et propriis singula fieri, sed animo faciente diuino.

Diogenes quoque Anaximenis alter auditor, aerem quidem dixit rerum esse materiam, de qua omnia fierent; sed eum esse compotem diuinae rationis, sine qua nihil ex eo fieri posset. Anaxagorae successit auditor eius Archelaus. Etiam ipse de particulis inter se similibus, quibus singula quaeque fierent, ita putauit constare omnia, ut inesse etiam mentem diceret, quae corpora aeterna, id est illas particulas, coniungendo et dissipando ageret omnia. Socrates huius discipulus fuisse perhibetur, magister Platonis, propter quem breuiter cuncta ista recolui.

ENGLISH

and in this way he stood out. He was especially admired because he had mastered the calculations of astronomy and could even predict eclipses of the sun and moon. Yet he held that water is the first principle of things. From it, he thought, come all the elements of the world, the world itself and whatever is produced in it. Over this work, which we behold with such wonder when we consider the world, he set nothing from a divine mind. He was succeeded by Anaximander, his pupil, who changed the view about the nature of things. Anaximander did not think that all things are born from one thing, as Thales thought they came from moisture. He thought instead that each thing is born from its own particular principles.[4]

He believed that these principles of individual things are infinite in number, and that they generate innumerable worlds and whatever arises in them. He thought that these worlds are now dissolved, now generated again, each lasting as long as its own lifespan allows. He too attributed nothing in these works of nature to a divine mind. He left as his pupil and successor Anaximenes, who assigned all the causes of things to infinite air. Anaximenes did not deny the gods or pass over them in silence. But he believed that the gods did not make the air; rather, they themselves arose from air. Anaxagoras, his pupil, held that the maker of all the things we see is a divine mind. He said that there is an infinite matter, made up of particles of all things, unlike one another. From this matter each thing is made out of the particles similar and proper to it, but it is a divine mind that does the making.[5]

Diogenes too, another pupil of Anaximenes, said that air is the matter from which all things are made. But he said it possesses divine reason, without which nothing could be made from it. Anaxagoras was succeeded by his pupil Archelaus. He too thought that all things consist of particles similar to one another, from which each individual thing is made. But he also said that a mind is present in them, which accomplishes everything by joining and separating the eternal bodies, that is, those particles. Socrates is said to have been his disciple. Socrates was the teacher of Plato, and it is 4 Anaximander of Miletus (6th century BC), Ionian philosopher and pupil of Thales.

5 Anaximenes of Miletus (6th century BC) and Anaxagoras of Clazomenae (5th century BC), who taught at Athens.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		for Plato's sake that I have briefly gone over all this.[6]

THE TEACHING OF SOCRATES

Socrates turned philosophy to ethics; after his death his followers disagreed about the supreme good.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.3	Socrates ergo primus uniuersam philosophiam ad corrigendos componendosque mores flexisse memoratur, cum ante illum omnes magis physicis, id est naturalibus, rebus perscrutandis operam maximam inpenderent. Non mihi autem uidetur posse ad liquidum colligi, utrum Socrates, ut hoc faceret, taedio rerum obscurarum et incertarum ad aliquid apertum et certum reperiendum animum intenderit, quod esset beatae uitae necessarium, propter quam unam omnium philosophorum inuigilasse ac laborasse uidetur industria, an uero, sicut de illo quidam beneuolentius suspicantur, nolebat inmundos terrenis cupiditatibus animos se extendere in diuina conari.	Socrates, then, is recorded as the first to turn the whole of philosophy toward correcting and ordering conduct. Before him, everyone had devoted their chief effort to investigating physical, that is, natural, matters. I do not think it can be clearly determined why Socrates did this. Perhaps he grew weary of obscure and uncertain matters and set his mind on finding something open and certain that would be necessary for the happy life. That one goal seems to be what all philosophers have worked and stayed awake for. Or perhaps, as some suspect of him more charitably, he did not want minds unclean with earthly cravings to try to stretch themselves toward divine things.
	Quando quidem ab eis causas rerum uidebat inquiri, quas primas adque summas non nisi in unius ac summi Dei uoluntate esse credebat; unde non eas putabat nisi mundata mente posse conprehendi; et ideo purgandae bonis moribus uitae censebat instandum, ut deprimentibus libidinibus exoneratus animus naturali uigore in aeterna se adtolleret naturamque incorporei et incommutabilis luminis, ubi causae omnium factarum naturarum stabiliter uiuunt, intellegentiae puritate conspiceret. Constat eum tamen inperitorum stultitiam scire se aliquid opinantium etiam in ipsis moralibus quaestionibus, quo totum animum intendisse uidebatur, uel confessa ignorantia sua uel dissimulata scientia lepore mirabili disserendi et acutissima urbanitate agitasse adque uersasse. Unde et concitatis inimicitiis calumniosa criminatione damnatus morte multatus est.	For he saw that they were inquiring into the causes of things, and he believed that the first and highest causes lay only in the will of the one supreme God. So he thought these causes could be grasped only by a cleansed mind. Therefore he held that one must press on with purifying one's life by good conduct. Then the mind, freed from the lusts that weigh it down, might raise itself by its natural vigor to eternal things. With the purity of understanding it might behold the nature of the incorporeal and unchangeable light, where the causes of all created natures live in unchanging stability. It is agreed, however, that even in the moral questions to which he seemed to devote his whole mind, he harassed the folly of ignorant people who thought they knew something, and turned it this way and that. He did this either by confessing his own ignorance or by concealing his knowledge, with wonderful charm in argument and the keenest wit. As a result enmities were stirred up against him, and he was condemned on a slanderous charge and punished with death.
	Sed eum postea illa ipsa, quae publice damnauerat, Atheniensium ciuitas publice luxit, in duos accusatores eius usque adeo populi indignatione conuersa, ut unus eorum obpressus ui multitudinis interiret, exilio autem	But afterward the very city of Athens that had publicly condemned him publicly mourned him. The people's anger turned so fiercely against his two accusers that one of them was overwhelmed

6 Diogenes of Apollonia (5th century BC), not the Cynic. Archelaus of Athens (5th century BC) was traditionally Socrates' teacher.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uoluntario adque perpetuo poenam similem alter euaderet. Tam praeclara igitur uitae mortisque fama Socrates reliquit plurimos suae philosophiae sectatores, quorum certatim studium fuit in quaestionum moralium disceptatione uersari, ubi agitur de summo bono, quo fieri homo beatus potest. Quod in Socratis disputationibus, dum omnia mouet adserit destruit, quoniam non euidenter apparuit, quod cuique placuit inde sumserunt et ubi cuique uisum est constituerunt finem boni. Finis autem boni appellatur, quo quisque cum peruenerit beatus est.	by the violence of the crowd and died. The other escaped a similar penalty only by going into voluntary and permanent exile. With so glorious a reputation in life and death, Socrates left behind a great many followers of his philosophy. They competed with one another in devoting themselves to the debate of moral questions, where the issue is the supreme good, by which a human being can become happy. This did not clearly appear in Socrates' discussions, since he raised, asserted and demolished everything. So each of them took from those discussions what pleased him, and each set the end of good where he saw fit. Now "the end of good" is the name for that which makes a person happy once he has reached it.[7]
Sic autem diuersas inter se Socratici de isto fine sententias habuerunt, ut (quod uix credibile est unius magistri potuisse facere sectatores) quidam summum bonum esse dicerent uoluptatem, sicut Aristippus; quidam uirtutem, sicut Antisthenes. Sic alii adque alii aliud adque aliud opinati sunt, quos commemorare longum est.	The Socratics held such different views about this end that it is scarcely believable that followers of a single master could have done so. Some said the supreme good is pleasure, as Aristippus did; others said it is virtue, as Antisthenes did. In this way one held one opinion and another held another, and it would take too long to list them all.[8]

PLATO, THE FOREMOST OF SOCRATES' DISCIPLES, WHO DIVIDED ALL PHILOSOPHY INTO THREE PARTS

Plato combined action and contemplation and divided philosophy into natural, rational and moral parts.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.4 Sed inter discipulos Socratis, non quidem inmerito, excellentissima gloria claruit, qua omnino ceteros obscuraret, Plato. Qui cum esset Atheniensis honesto aput suos loco natus et ingenio mirabili longe suos condiscipulos anteiret, parum tamen putans perficiendae philosophiae sufficere se ipsum ac Socraticam disciplinam, quam longe ac late potuit peregrinatus est, quaquauersum eum alicuius nobilitatae scientiae percipiendae fama rapiebat. Itaque et in Aegypto didicit quaecumque magna illic habebantur adque docebantur, et inde in eas Italiae partes ueniens, ubi Pythagoreorum fama celebrabatur, quidquid Italicae philosophiae tunc florebat, auditis eminentioribus in ea doctoribus facillime conprehendit. Et quia magistrum Socratem singulariter diligebat, eum loquentem faciens fere in omnibus sermonibus suis etiam illa, quae uel ab aliis didicerat, uel ipse quanta potuerat intellegentia uiderat, cum illius lepore et moralibus disputationibus temperauit.	But among the disciples of Socrates, one shone with the most outstanding glory, and not undeservedly, so that he entirely eclipsed the rest: Plato. He was an Athenian, born into a respectable family, and he far surpassed his fellow pupils in remarkable genius. Yet he thought that he himself and the teaching of Socrates were not enough to bring philosophy to completion. So he traveled as far and wide as he could, wherever the fame of some celebrated branch of knowledge drew him. In Egypt he learned whatever was considered great and was taught there. From there he came to those parts of Italy where the Pythagoreans were renowned, and by listening to its more eminent teachers he very readily mastered whatever Italian philosophy then flourished. And because he had a singular love for his teacher Socrates, he made Socrates the speaker in nearly all his dia-

7 Socrates was tried and executed at Athens in 399 BC.
8 Aristippus of Cyrene founded the pleasure-centered Cyrenaic school; Antisthenes of Athens was regarded as the forerunner of the Cynics.

LATIN

ENGLISH

logues. Into Socrates' charm and moral discussions he blended what he had learned from others, as well as what he himself had seen with all the understanding he could muster.[9]

Itaque cum studium sapientiae in actione et contemplatione uersetur, unde una pars eius actiua, altera contemplatiua dici potest (quarum actiua ad agendam uitam, id est ad mores instituendos pertinet, contemplatiua autem ad conspiciendas naturae causas et sincerissimam ueritatem): Socrates in actiua excelluisse memoratur; Pythagoras uero magis contemplatiuae, quibus potuit intellegentiae uiribus, institisse. Proinde Plato utrumque iungendo philosophiam perfecisse laudatur, quam in tres partes distribuit: unam moralem, quae maxime in actione uersatur; alteram naturalem, quae contemplationi deputata est; tertiam rationalem, qua uerum disterminatur a falso. Quae licet utrique, id est actioni et contemplationi, sit necessaria, maxime tamen contemplatio perspectionem sibi uindicat ueritatis. Ideo haec tripertitio non est contraria illi distinctioni, qua intellegitur omne studium sapientiae in actione et contemplatione consistere.

The pursuit of wisdom is concerned with action and contemplation, and so one part of it can be called active and the other contemplative. The active part concerns the conduct of life, that is, the forming of character. The contemplative part concerns the study of the causes of nature and of the purest truth. Socrates is recorded as having excelled in the active part. Pythagoras, on the other hand, applied himself more to the contemplative, with all the powers of understanding he had. Plato is therefore praised for having perfected philosophy by joining the two. He divided it into three parts. The first is moral, which is concerned chiefly with action. The second is natural, which is assigned to contemplation. The third is rational, by which the true is distinguished from the false. This third part is necessary to both action and contemplation, yet it is above all contemplation that claims insight into the truth for itself. So this threefold division does not contradict the distinction by which all pursuit of wisdom is understood to consist in action and contemplation.[10]

Quid autem in his uel de his singulis partibus Plato senserit, id est, ubi finem omnium actionum, ubi causam omnium naturarum, ubi lumen omnium rationum esse cognouerit uel crediderit, disserendo explicare et longum esse arbitror et temere adfirmandum esse non arbitror. Cum enim magistri sui Socratis, quem facit in suis uoluminibus disputantem, notissimum morem dissimulandae scientiae uel opinionis suae seruare adfectat, quia et illi iste mos placuit, factum est ut etiam ipsius Platonis de rebus magnis sententiae non facile perspici possint.

But what did Plato think in or about each of these parts? Where did he know or believe the end of all actions, the cause of all natures and the light of all reasonings to be? I think it would take a long time to set this out in full, and I do not think it should be asserted rashly. Plato aims to keep the well-known habit of his teacher Socrates, whom he makes the speaker in his books, of concealing his own knowledge or opinion. He keeps it because that habit pleased him too. As a result, even Plato's own views on great matters cannot easily be discerned.

Ex his tamen, quae aput eum leguntur, siue quae dixit, siue quae ab aliis dicta esse narrauit adque conscripsit, quae sibi placita uiderentur, quaedam commemorari et operi huic inseri oportet a nobis, uel ubi suffragatur religioni uerae, quam fides nostra suscipit ac defendit, uel ubi ei uidetur esse contrarius, quantum ad istam de uno Deo et pluribus pertinet quaestionem, propter uitam, quae post mortem futura est, ueraciter beatam. Fortassis

Still, we should recall some of what we read in him and include it in this work. This includes both what he said himself and what he reported and wrote down as said by others, when it seemed to meet with his approval. We should do so where he supports the true religion, which our faith embraces and defends, and also where he seems opposed to it. We confine ourselves to the question of 9 Plato (c. 428–348 BC), Athenian philosopher whose works are written mostly as dialogues.

10 The "rational" part corresponds to what was later called logic or dialectic.

LATIN	ENGLISH
enim qui Platonem ceteris philosophis gentium longe recteque praelatum acutius adque ueracius intellexisse ac secuti esse fama celebriore laudantur, aliquid tale de Deo sentiunt, ut in illo inueniatur et causa subsistendi et ratio intellegendi et ordo uiuendi; quorum trium unum ad naturalem, alterum ad rationalem, tertium ad moralem partem intellegitur pertinere.	the one God and many gods, as it bears on the life after death that will be truly happy. Plato has been ranked far above the other philosophers of the nations, and rightly so. Perhaps those who are praised more widely for having understood and followed him more acutely and more truly hold some such view of God as this: that in him are found the cause of existing, the reason of understanding and the order of living. Of these three, the first is understood to belong to the natural part, the second to the rational part and the third to the moral part.
Si enim homo ita creatus est, ut per id, quod in eo praecellit, adtingat illud, quod cuncta praecellit, id est unum uerum optimum Deum, sine quo nulla natura subsistit, nulla doctrina instruit, nullus usus expedit: ipse quaeratur, ubi nobis seria sunt omnia; ipse cernatur, ubi nobis certa sunt omnia; ipse diligatur, ubi nobis recta sunt omnia.	Suppose man was created so that, through what is most excellent in him, he might attain to what excels all things. That is the one, true, supremely good God, without whom no nature subsists, no teaching instructs and no practice profits. If so, then let him be sought, in whom all things have weight for us. Let him be discerned, in whom all things are certain for us. Let him be loved, in whom all things are right for us.

THAT THEOLOGY IS BEST DEBATED WITH THE PLATONISTS, WHOSE OPINION SHOULD BE RANKED ABOVE THE DOCTRINES OF ALL OTHER PHILOSOPHERS

Mythical and civil theology and all materialist philosophers must give way to the Platonists.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.5 Si ergo Plato Dei huius imitatorem cognitorem amatorem dixit esse sapientem, cuius participatione sit beatus, quid opus est excutere ceteros? Nulli nobis quam isti propius accesserunt. Cedat eis igitur non solum theologia illa fabulosa deorum criminibus oblectans animos inpiorum, nec solum etiam illa ciuilis, ubi inpuri daemones terrestribus gaudiis deditos populos deorum nomine seducentes humanos errores tamquam suos diuinos honores habere uoluerunt, ad spectandos suorum criminum ludos cultores suos tamquam ad suum cultum studiis inmundissimis excitantes et sibi delectabiliores ludos de ipsis spectatoribus exhibentes (ubi si qua uelut honesta geruntur in templis, coniuncta sibi theatrorum obscenitate turpantur, et quaecumque turpia geruntur in theatris, comparata sibi templorum foeditate laudantur), et ea, quae Varro ex his sacris quasi ad caelum et terram rerumque mortalium semina et actus interpretatus est (quia nec ipsa illis ritibus significantur, quae ipse insinuare conatur, et ideo ueritas conantem non sequitur;	If, then, Plato said that the wise man is one who imitates, knows and loves this God, by participation in whom he is happy, what need is there to examine the rest? No one has come closer to us than these philosophers. So let these things give way to them. First, the mythical theology, which delights the minds of the impious with the crimes of the gods. Second, the civil theology too. In it, unclean demons seduced peoples given over to earthly pleasures under the name of gods, and wanted human errors to be held as divine honors paid to themselves. They stirred up their worshipers with the filthiest enthusiasm to watch shows of the demons' own crimes, as though these were acts of worship to them. They also put on for themselves an even more delightful show out of the spectators themselves. In this civil theology, if anything seemingly decent is done in the temples, it is defiled by the obscenity of the theaters joined to it; and whatever shameful things are done in the theaters are praised by comparison with the foulness of the temples. And third, the meanings that

LATIN

ENGLISH

Varro drew from these rites, as though they referred to heaven and earth and to the seeds and workings of mortal things. (Those rites do not signify what he tries to suggest, and so the truth does not follow his attempt; et si ipsa essent, tamen animae rationali ea, quae infra illam naturali ordine constituta sunt, pro deo suo colenda non essent, nec sibi debuit praeferre tamquam deos eas res, quibus ipsam praetulit uerus Deus), et ea, quae Numa Pompilius re uera ad sacra eius modi pertinentia secum sepeliendo curauit abscondi et aratro eruta senatus iussit incendi.

and even if they did signify those things, the rational soul still ought not to worship as its god things placed beneath it in the order of nature. Nor should it have ranked above itself, as gods, things that the true God ranked below it.) Let this also give way: the writings that Numa Pompilius had buried with him to keep them hidden, which really did concern rites of this kind, and which the senate ordered to be burned when the plow turned them up.[11]

(In eo genere sunt etiam illa, ut aliquid de Numa mitius suspicemur, quae Alexander Macedo scribit ad matrem sibi a magno antistite sacrorum Aegyptiorum quodam Leone patefacta, ubi non Picus et Faunus et Aeneas et Romulus uel etiam Hercules et Aesculapius et Liber Semela natus et Tyndaridae fratres et si quos alios ex mortalibus pro dis habent, sed ipsi etiam maiorum gentium di, quos Cicero in Tusculanis tacitis nominibus uidetur adtingere, Iuppiter, Iuno, Saturnus, Vulcanus, Vesta et alii plurimi, quos Varro conatur ad mundi partes siue elementa transferre, homines fuisse produntur. Timens enim et ille quasi reuelata mysteria petens admonet Alexandrum, ut, cum ea matri conscripta insinuauerit, flammis iubeat concremari.)

(To take a more lenient view of Numa, the same sort of thing is found in what Alexander of Macedon writes to his mother, which he says was revealed to him by a certain Leo, a great high priest of the Egyptian rites. That letter discloses that certain gods were human beings. These include Picus, Faunus, Aeneas and Romulus, and even Hercules, Aesculapius, Liber son of Semele, the twin sons of Tyndareus and any other mortals they regard as gods. But they also include the gods of the greater clans themselves, whom Cicero seems to touch on in the Tusculan Disputations without naming them. These are Jupiter, Juno, Saturn, Vulcan, Vesta and very many others, whom Varro tries to transfer to the parts or elements of the world. Leo too was afraid, as though the mysteries had been betrayed. So he urged Alexander, once he had made these things known to his mother in writing, to order the letter burned.)[12]

Non solum ergo ista, quae duae theologiae, fabulosa continet et ciuilis, Platonicis philosophis cedant, qui uerum Deum et rerum auctorem et ueritatis inlustratorem et beatitudinis largitorem esse dixerunt; sed alii quoque philosophi, qui corporalia naturae principia corpori deditis mentibus opinati sunt, cedant his tantis et tanti Dei cognitoribus uiris, ut Thales in umore, Anaximenes in aere, Stoici in igne, Epicurus in atomis, hoc est minutissimis corpusculis, quae nec diuidi nec sentiri queunt, et quicumque alii, quorum enumeratione inmorari non est necesse, siue simplicia

So let not only the contents of the two theologies, mythical and civil, give way to the Platonist philosophers, who have said that the true God is the author of things, the illuminator of truth and the giver of happiness. Let the other philosophers also give way to these great men, who knew so great a God. These others, with minds given over to the body, supposed that the first principles of nature are bodily. Thales placed that principle in moisture, Anaximenes in air, the Stoics in fire, and Epi-

11 Numa Pompilius, legendary second king of Rome, credited with founding Roman religious institutions; the story of his buried books is told in 7.34.

12 Alexander the Great's supposed letter to his mother Olympias. The sons of Tyndareus are Castor and Pollux. "Gods of the greater clans" borrows the name of Rome's oldest noble families; Cicero alludes to them in Tusculan Disputations 1.29.

LATIN

siue coniuncta corpora, siue uita carentia siue uiuentia, sed tamen corpora, causam principiumque rerum esse dixerunt.

Nam quidam eorum a rebus non uiuis res uiuas fieri posse crediderunt, sicut Epicurei; quidam uero a uiuente quidem et uiuentia et non uiuentia, sed tamen a corpore corpora. Nam Stoici ignem, id est corpus unum ex his quattuor elementis, quibus uisibilis mundus hic constat, et uiuentem et sapientem et ipsius mundi fabricatorem adque omnium, quae in eo sunt, eumque omnino ignem deum esse putauerunt. Hi et ceteri similes eorum id solum cogitare potuerunt, quod cum eis corda eorum obstricta carnis sensibus fabulata sunt. In se quippe habebant quod non uidebant, et aput se imaginabantur quod foris uiderant, etiam quando non uidebant, sed tantummodo cogitabant.

Hoc autem in conspectu talis cogitationis iam non est corpus, sed similitudo corporis; illud autem, unde uidetur in animo haec similitudo corporis, nec corpus est nec similitudo corporis; et unde uidetur adque utrum pulchra an deformis sit iudicatur, profecto est melius quam ipsa quae iudicatur. Haec mens hominis et rationalis animae natura est, quae utique corpus non est, si iam illa corporis similitudo, cum in animo cogitantis aspicitur adque iudicatur, nec ipsa corpus est. Non est ergo nec terra nec aqua, nec aer nec ignis, quibus quattuor corporibus, quae dicuntur quattuor elementa, mundum corporeum uidemus esse conpactum. Porro si noster animus corpus non est, quo modo Deus creator animi corpus est?

Cedant ergo et isti, ut dictum est, Platonicis; cedant et illi, quos quidem puduit dicere Deum corpus esse, uerum tamen eiusdem naturae, cuius ille est, animos nostros esse putauerunt; ita non eos mouit tanta mutabilitas animae, quam Dei naturae tribuere nefas est. Sed dicunt: Corpore mutatur animae natura, nam per se ipsa incommutabilis est. Poterant isti dicere: corpore aliquo uulneratur caro, nam per se ipsa inuulnerabilis est. Prorsus quod mutari non potest, nulla re potest, ac per curus in atoms, that is, extremely tiny particles that can neither be divided nor perceived. Any others there may be, whom there is no need to list at length, likewise said that bodies are the cause and first principle of things, whether those bodies are simple or compound, lifeless or living, but bodies all the same.[13]

ENGLISH

Some of them believed that living things could come from non-living things, as the Epicureans did. Others believed that both living and non-living things come from something living, but still bodies from a body. The Stoics, for instance, thought that fire is both living and wise, and that it is the maker of the world itself and of everything in it. This fire is one body, one of the four elements of which this visible world consists, and they held that this fire was in fact god. These philosophers, and others like them, could think only what their hearts, bound fast to the senses of the flesh, made up as stories for them. For they had within themselves something they did not see. They pictured inwardly what they had seen outside, even when they were not seeing it but only thinking of it.

But what appears before such thought is no longer a body; it is the likeness of a body. That by which this likeness of a body is seen in the mind is neither a body nor the likeness of a body. And that by which it is seen and judged to be beautiful or ugly is surely better than the thing it judges. This is the human mind, the nature of the rational soul. It is certainly not a body, since even the likeness of a body is not itself a body when it is seen and judged in the mind of the one who thinks. So it is not earth or water, air or fire. These are the four bodies, called the four elements, of which we see the bodily world composed. Furthermore, if our mind is not a body, how can God, the creator of the mind, be a body?

So, as has been said, let these too give way to the Platonists. Let those also give way who were indeed ashamed to say that God is a body, yet thought that our souls are of the same nature as he is. They were not troubled by the great changeability of the soul, though it is an impiety to attribute changeability to the nature of God. But they say: "The nature of the soul is changed by the body; in itself it is unchangeable." They might as well say:

13 Epicurus (341–270 BC), Athenian philosopher who taught that the world is made of atoms moving in the void.

LATIN	ENGLISH
hoc quod corpore mutari potest, aliqua re potest et ideo incommutabile recte dici non potest.	"Flesh is wounded by some body; in itself it cannot be wounded." Quite simply, what cannot be changed cannot be changed by anything. So what can be changed by a body can be changed by something, and therefore it cannot rightly be called unchangeable.

THE VIEW OF THE PLATONISTS IN THE PART OF PHILOSOPHY CALLED PHYSICS

The Platonists saw that God is neither body nor changeable soul but the source of all form.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.6 Viderunt ergo isti philosophi, quos ceteris non inmerito fama adque gloria praelatos uidemus, nullum corpus esse Deum, et ideo cuncta corpora transcenderunt quaerentes Deum. Viderunt, quidquid mutabile est, non esse summum Deum, et ideo animam omnem mutabilesque omnes spiritus transcenderunt quaerentes summum Deum. Deinde uiderunt omnem speciem in re quacumque mutabili, qua est, quidquid illud est, quoquo modo et qualiscumque natura est, non esse posse nisi ab illo, qui uere est, quia incommutabiliter est.	These philosophers, then, whom we see deservedly ranked above the rest in fame and glory, saw that no body is God, and so in seeking God they went beyond all bodies. They saw that whatever is changeable is not the supreme God, and so in seeking the supreme God they went beyond every soul and all changeable spirits. Next they saw that in any changeable thing whatever, the form by which it is what it is, in whatever way it exists and whatever its nature, can exist only from him who truly is, because he is unchangeably.
Ac per hoc siue uniuersi mundi corpus figuras qualitates ordinatumque motum et elementa disposita a caelo usque ad terram et quaecumque corpora in eis sunt, siue omnem uitam, uel quae nutrit et continet, qualis est in arboribus, uel quae et hoc habet et sentit, qualis est in pecoribus, uel quae et haec habet et intellegit, qualis est in hominibus, uel quae nutritorio subsidio non indiget, sed tantum continet sentit intellegit, qualis est in angelis, nisi ab illo esse non posse, qui simpliciter est; quia non aliud illi est esse, aliud uiuere, quasi possit esse non uiuens; nec aliud illi est uiuere, aliud intellegere, quasi possit uiuere non intellegens; nec aliud illi est intellegere, aliud beatum esse, quasi possit intellegere non beatus; sed quod illi est uiuere, intellegere, beatum esse, hoc est illi esse.	And so they saw that two things could exist only from him who simply is. The first is the body of the whole world, with its shapes, its qualities, its ordered motion, the elements arranged from heaven down to earth, and whatever bodies are in them. The second is every kind of life: the life that nourishes and holds together, as in trees; the life that has this and also senses, as in animals; the life that has these and also understands, as in human beings; and the life that needs no help from nourishment but only holds together, senses and understands, as in angels. For in him, to be is not one thing and to live another, as though he could be without living. Nor is to live one thing and to understand another, as though he could live without understanding. Nor is to understand one thing and to be happy another, as though he could understand without being happy. Rather, for him, to live, to understand and to be happy is simply to be.
Propter hanc incommutabilitatem et simplicitatem intellexerunt eum et omnia ista fecisse, et ipsum a nullo fieri potuisse. Considerauerunt enim, quidquid est, uel corpus esse uel uitam, meliusque aliquid uitam esse quam corpus, speciemque corporis esse sensibilem, intellegibilem uitae. Proinde intellegibilem speciem	Because of this unchangeableness and simplicity, they understood that he made all these things and that he himself could not have been made by anyone. For they considered that whatever exists is either body or life. They saw that life is something better than body, and that the form of body is persensibili praetulerunt. Sensibilia dicimus, quae uisu tactuque corporis sentiri queunt; intellegibilia, quae conspectu mentis intellegi. Nulla est enim pulchritudo corporalis siue in statu corporis, sicut est figura, siue in motu, sicut est cantilena, de qua non animus iudicet. Quod profecto non posset, nisi melior in illo esset haec species, sine tumore molis, sine strepitu uocis, sine spatio uel loci uel temporis.

LATIN

Sed ibi quoque nisi mutabilis esset, non alius alio melius de specie sensibili iudicaret; melius ingeniosior quam tardior, melius peritior quam inperitior, melius exercitatior quam minus exercitatus, et idem ipse unus, cum proficit, melius utique postea quam prius. Quod autem recipit magis et minus, sine dubitatione mutabile est. Unde ingeniosi et docti et in his exercitati homines facile collegerunt non esse in eis rebus primam speciem, ubi mutabilis esse conuincitur. Cum igitur in eorum conspectu et corpus et animus magis minusque speciosa essent, si autem omni specie carere possent, omnino nulla essent: uiderunt esse aliquid ubi prima esset incommutabilis et ideo nec conparabilis; adque ibi esse rerum principium rectissime crediderunt, quod factum non esset et ex quo facta cuncta essent.

Ita quod notum est Dei, manifestauit eis ipse, cum ab eis inuisibilia eius per ea, quae facta sunt, intellecta conspecta sunt: sempiterna quoque uirtus eius et diuinitas; a quo etiam uisibilia et temporalia cuncta creata sunt. Haec de illa parte, quam physicam, id est naturalem, nuncupant, dicta sint.

ENGLISH

ceptible to the senses, while the form of life is intelligible. Accordingly they ranked intelligible form above sensible form. We call sensible the things that can be perceived by the body's sight and touch, and intelligible the things that can be understood by the gaze of the mind. For there is no bodily beauty on which the mind does not pass judgment, whether it lies in a body at rest, such as a shape, or in motion, such as a melody. And the mind certainly could not do this unless this form existed in it in a better way: without the swelling of bulk, without the noise of sound, without extension in either space or time.

But even there, if this form were not changeable, one person would not judge sensible form better than another. Yet the more gifted judge it better than the slower, the more skilled better than the less skilled, the more practiced better than the less practiced, and one and the same person, as he makes progress, certainly judges it better later than before. Now whatever admits of more and less is without doubt changeable. Hence gifted and learned men, practiced in these matters, easily concluded that the primary form is not in those things where it is shown to be changeable. In their view, then, both body and mind possessed form to a greater or lesser degree, and if they could lack all form, they would be nothing at all. So they saw that there is something in which the primary form exists unchangeably, and therefore beyond comparison. And there, most rightly, they believed the first principle of things to be: something that was not made, and from which all things were made.

Thus what can be known of God he himself made plain to them, when they understood and perceived his invisible attributes through the things that have been made, and also his eternal power and divinity. By him, too, all things visible and temporal were created. Let this suffice concerning the part they call physica, that is, natural philosophy.[14]

14 Augustine is echoing Romans 1:19–20.

HOW FAR THE PLATONISTS SHOULD BE THOUGHT TO EXCEL THE REST IN LOGIC, THAT IS, RATIONAL PHILOSOPHY

Unlike the Epicureans and Stoics, the Platonists made God the light of minds.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.7	Quod autem adtinet ad doctrinam, ubi uersatur pars altera, quae ab eis logica, id est rationalis, uocatur: absit ut his conparandi uideantur qui posuerunt iudicium ueritatis in sensibus corporis eorumque infidis et fallacibus regulis omnia, quae discuntur, metienda esse censuerunt, ut Epicurei et quicumque alii tales, ut etiam ipsi Stoici, qui cum uehementer amauerint sollertiam disputandi, quam dialecticam nominant, a corporis sensibus eam ducendam putarunt, hinc adseuerantes animum concipere notiones, quas appellant ἐννοίας, earum rerum scilicet quas definiendo explicant; hinc propagari adque conecti totam discendi docendique rationem. Ubi ego multum mirari soleo, cum pulchros dicant non esse nisi sapientes, quibus sensibus corporis istam pulchritudinem uiderint, qualibus oculis carnis formam sapientiae decusque conspexerint.	Next comes teaching, the concern of the second part, which they call logica, that is, rational philosophy. Far be it from us to think that anyone should be compared with these philosophers who placed the criterion of truth in the senses of the body and held that everything learned must be measured by the senses' unreliable and deceptive rules. Such were the Epicureans and any others of that kind, and even the Stoics themselves. The Stoics were passionately fond of skill in argument, which they call dialectic, yet they thought it must be derived from the bodily senses. From the senses, they asserted, the mind forms the notions they call ἐννοίας [concepts], that is, notions of the things they explain by definition. From there, they said, the whole method of learning and teaching is propagated and linked together. Here I am always greatly amazed. They say that no one is beautiful except the wise. Then by which bodily senses did they see that beauty? With what eyes of flesh did they behold the form and grace of wisdom?
	Hi uero, quos merito ceteris anteponimus, discreuerunt ea, quae mente conspiciuntur, ab his, quae sensibus adtinguntur, nec sensibus adimentes quod possunt, nec eis dantes ultra quam possunt. Lumen autem mentium esse dixerunt ad discenda omnia eundem ipsum Deum, a quo facta sunt omnia.	But those whom we rightly rank above the rest distinguished what is perceived by the mind from what is reached by the senses. They neither took from the senses what the senses can do, nor granted them more than they can do. And they said that the light of minds, by which all things are learned, is that very same God by whom all things were made.

THAT THE PLATONISTS HOLD FIRST PLACE IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY AS WELL

For the Platonists the supreme good is to enjoy God; the philosopher is a lover of God.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.8	Reliqua est pars moralis, quam Graeco uocabulo dicunt ethicam, ubi quaeritur de summo bono, quo referentes omnia quae agimus, et quod non propter aliud, sed propter se ipsum adpetentes idque adipiscentes nihil, quo beati simus, ulterius requiramus. Ideo quippe et finis est dictus, quia propter hunc cetera uolumus, ipsum autem non nisi propter ipsum. Hoc ergo beatificum bonum alii a corpore, alii ab animo, alii ab utroque homini esse dixerunt. Videbant quippe ipsum hominem constare ex animo et corpore et ideo ab alterutro istorum	There remains the moral part, which they call by the Greek word ethica. Here the question concerns the supreme good. It is that to which we refer all that we do, and which we seek not for the sake of something else but for its own sake. Once we attain it, we look for nothing further to make us happy. That is precisely why it is called the end: we want other things for its sake, but we want it only for its own sake. Some said that this good, which makes people happy, comes to a human beduorum aut ab utroque bene sibi esse posse credebant, finali quodam bono, beati essent, quo cuncta quae agebant referrent adque id quo referendum esset non ultra quaererent.

LATIN

Unde illi, qui dicuntur addidisse tertium genus bonorum, quod appellatur extrinsecus, sicuti est honor gloria pecunia et si quid huius modi, non sic addiderunt, ut finale esset, id est propter se ipsum adpetendum, sed propter aliud; bonumque esse hoc genus bonis, malum autem malis. Ita bonum hominis qui uel ab animo uel a corpore uel ab utroque expetiuerunt, nihil aliud quam ab homine expetendum esse putauerunt; sed qui id adpetiuerunt a corpore, a parte hominis deteriore; qui uero ab animo, a parte meliore; qui autem ab utroque, a toto homine. Siue ergo a parte qualibet siue a toto, non nisi ab homine.

Nec istae differentiae, quoniam tres sunt, ideo tres, sed multas dissensiones philosophorum sectasque fecerunt, quia et de bono corporis et de bono animi et de bono utriusque diuersi diuersa opinati sunt. Cedant igitur omnes illis philosophis, qui non dixerunt beatum esse hominem fruentem corpore uel fruentem animo, sed fruentem Deo: non sicut corpore uel se ipso animus aut sicut amico amicus, sed sicut luce oculus, si aliquid ab his ad illa similitudinis adferendum est, quod quale sit, si Deus ipse adiuuerit, alio loco, quantum per nos fieri poterit, apparebit.

Nunc satis sit commemorare Platonem determinasse finem boni esse secundum uirtutem uiuere et ei soli euenire posse, qui notitiam Dei habeat et imitationem nec esse aliam ob causam beatum; ideoque non dubitat hoc esse philosophari, amare Deum, cuius natura sit incorporalis. Unde utique colligitur tunc fore beatum studiosum sapientiae (id enim est philosophus), cum frui Deo coeperit. Quamuis enim non continuo beatus sit, qui eo fruitur quod amat (multi enim amando ea, quae ing from the body, others from the soul, others from both. For they saw that a human being consists of soul and body. So they believed that their well-being could come from one or the other of these two, or from both. This would be a kind of final good by which they would be happy. To it they would refer all that they did, and beyond it they would look for nothing further to which it should be referred.

ENGLISH

Hence some are said to have added a third kind of goods, called external, such as honor, glory, wealth and anything of the sort. But they did not add it as something final, that is, to be sought for its own sake, but as something sought for the sake of something else. They held that this kind of good is good for the good and bad for the bad. Thus those who sought the human good from the soul, or from the body, or from both, thought it was to be sought from nothing other than the human being. Those who sought it from the body sought it from the inferior part of a human being; those who sought it from the soul, from the better part; and those who sought it from both, from the whole human being. Whether from some part, then, or from the whole, they sought it only from the human being.

These distinctions are three in number, yet they produced not just three but many disagreements and schools among philosophers. Different people held different opinions about the good of the body, the good of the soul and the good of both. Let all of them, then, yield to those philosophers who said that a human being is happy not in enjoying the body, nor in enjoying the soul, but in enjoying God. And this is not the way the soul enjoys the body or itself, or a friend enjoys a friend, but the way the eye enjoys light, if some likeness may be drawn from these things to those. What sort of likeness that is will become clear elsewhere, as far as I am able, if God himself helps me.

For now it is enough to recall what Plato determined. The end of good, he said, is to live according to virtue, and this can happen only to one who has knowledge of God and imitates him; there is no other reason for being happy. And so he does not hesitate to say that to philosophize is to love God, whose nature is incorporeal. From this it surely follows that the lover of wisdom (for that is what a philosopher is) will be happy when he has begun

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	amanda non sunt, miseri sunt et miseriores cum fruuntur): nemo tamen beatus est, qui eo quod amat non fruitur. Nam et ipsi, qui res non amandas amant, non se beatos putant amando, sed fruendo. Quisquis ergo fruitur eo, quod amat, uerumque et summum bonum amat, quis eum beatum nisi miserrimus negat?	to enjoy God. A person who enjoys what he loves is not automatically happy, for many are miserable because they love what ought not to be loved, and more miserable when they enjoy it. Still, no one is happy who does not enjoy what he loves. Even those who love things that ought not to be loved think themselves happy not in loving them but in enjoying them. Suppose, then, that someone enjoys what he loves, and loves the true and supreme good. Who but the most miserable of men would deny that he is happy?
	Ipsum autem uerum ac summum bonum Plato dicit Deum, unde uult esse philosophum amatorem Dei, ut, quoniam philosophia ad beatam uitam tendit, fruens Deo sit beatus qui Deum amauerit.	Now Plato says that this true and supreme good is God. That is why he wants the philosopher to be a lover of God. Since philosophy aims at the happy life, the one who has loved God will be happy in enjoying God.

THE PHILOSOPHY THAT HAS COME CLOSEST TO THE TRUTH OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH

Any philosophers, of any nation, who hold such views about God are ranked above the rest.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.9	Quicumque igitur philosophi de Deo summo et uero ista senserunt, quod et rerum creatarum sit effector et lumen cognoscendarum et bonum agendarum, quod ab illo nobis sit et principium naturae et ueritas doctrinae et felicitas uitae, siue Platonici adcommodatius nuncupentur, siue quodlibet aliud sectae suae nomen inponant; siue tantummodo Ionici generis, qui in eis praecipui fuerunt, ista senserint, sicut idem Plato et qui eum bene intellexerunt; siue etiam Italici, propter Pythagoram et Pythagoreos et si qui forte alii eiusdem sententiae indidem fuerunt; siue aliarum quoque gentium qui sapientes uel philosophi habiti sunt, Atlantici Libyes, Aegyptii, Indi, Persae, Chaldaei, Scythae, Galli, Hispani aliqui reperiuntur, qui hoc uiderint ac docuerint: eos omnes ceteris anteponimus eosque nobis propinquiores fatemur.	Some philosophers, then, have held these views about the supreme and true God. They hold that he is the maker of created things, the light by which things are known and the good for which things are done. They hold that from him we have the origin of our nature, the truth of our teaching and the happiness of our life. They may be more suitably called Platonists, or they may give their school some other name. Perhaps only the leading members of the Ionian school held these views, such as Plato himself and those who understood him well. Perhaps the Italian school held them too, on account of Pythagoras and the Pythagoreans and any others of the same opinion from that region. Or perhaps some who saw and taught this are found among other nations too, people reckoned wise men or philosophers: Atlantic Libyans, Egyptians, Indians, Persians, Chaldeans, Scythians, Gauls, Spaniards. Whoever they are, we rank them all above the rest and acknowledge them to be closer to us.

THE EXCELLENCE OF THE RELIGIOUS CHRISTIAN AMONG THE PHILOSOPHICAL DISCIPLINES

Paul warns against worldly philosophy yet says some philosophers knew God through creation.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.10	Quamuis enim homo Christianus litteris tantum ecclesiasticis eruditus Platonicorum forte nomen ignoret, nec utrum duo genera philosophorum extiterint in Graeca lingua, Ionicorum et Italicorum, sciat: non tamen ita surdus est in rebus humanis, ut nesciat philosophos uel studium sapientiae uel ipsam sapientiam profiteri. Cauet eos tamen, qui secundum elementa huius mundi philosophantur, non secundum Deum, a quo ipse factus est mundus. Admonetur enim praecepto apostolico fideliterque audit quod dictum est: Cauete ne quis uos decipiat per philosophiam et inanem seductionem secundum elementa mundi. Deinde ne omnes tales esse arbitretur, audit ab eodem apostolo dici de quibusdam: Quia quod notum est Dei, manifestum est in illis; Deus enim illis manifestauit.

LATIN

Inuisibilia enim eius a constitutione mundi per ea, quae facta sunt, intellecta conspiciuntur, sempiterna quoque uirtus eius et diuinitas, et ubi Atheniensibus loquens, cum rem magnam de Deo dixisset et quae a paucis possit intellegi, quod in illo uiuimus et mouemur et sumus, adiecit et ait: Sicut et uestri quidam dixerunt. Nouit sane etiam ipsos, in quibus errant, cauere; ubi enim dictum est, quod per ea, quae facta sunt, Deus illis manifestauit intellectu conspicienda inuisibilia sua: ibi etiam dictum est non illos ipsum Deum recte coluisse, quia et aliis rebus, quibus non oportebat, diuinos honores illi uni tantum debitos detulerunt: Quoniam cognoscentes Deum non sicut Deum glorificauerunt aut gratias egerunt, sed euanuerunt in cogitationibus suis et obscuratum est cor insipiens eorum.

Dicentes enim se esse sapientes stulti facti sunt et inmutauerunt gloriam incorruptibilis Dei in similitudinem imaginis corruptibilis hominis et uolucrum et quadrupedum et serpentium; ubi et Romanos et Graecos et Aegyptios, qui de sapientiae nomine gloriati sunt, fecit intellegi. Sed de hoc cum istis

ENGLISH

A Christian educated only in the Church's writings may perhaps not know the name of the Platonists. He may not know whether there were two kinds of philosophers in the Greek language, the Ionian and the Italian. Yet he is not so deaf to human affairs as not to know that philosophers profess either the pursuit of wisdom or wisdom itself. He is wary, though, of those who philosophize according to the elements of this world, and not according to God, by whom the world itself was made. For he is warned by the apostle's precept and faithfully listens to what was said: "Take care that no one deceives you through philosophy and empty seduction, according to the elements of the world." Then, so that he may not suppose that all philosophers are like this, he hears the same apostle say of certain people: "For what can be known of God is plain to them; for God has made it plain to them.[15]

For his invisible attributes, from the creation of the world, are understood and seen through the things that have been made—his eternal power also and divinity." The Christian hears him also when he speaks to the Athenians. There the apostle said something great about God, something few can understand: that "in him we live and move and have our being." And then he added, "as some of your own have also said." Yet the Christian knows well to be wary of these philosophers too, in the points where they go wrong. For the passage that says God made his invisible attributes plain to them, to be seen by the understanding through the things that have been made, also says that they did not worship God himself rightly. They paid the divine honors due to him alone to other things as well, to which they should not have been paid: "For although they knew God, they did not glorify him as God or give thanks, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened.[16]

For claiming to be wise, they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of an image of corruptible man, and of birds and four-footed animals and serpents." Here the apostle gives us to understand that he means the Romans, the Greeks and the Egyptians, 15 Colossians 2:8; Romans 1:19–20.

16 Acts 17:28; Romans 1:21–23.

LATIN	ENGLISH
post modum disputabimus. In quo autem nobis consentiunt de uno Deo huius uniuersitatis auctore, qui non solum super omnia corpora est incorporeus, uerum etiam super omnes animas incorruptibilis, principium nostrum, lumen nostrum, bonum nostrum, in hoc eos ceteris anteponimus.	who prided themselves on the name of wisdom. But we will argue with them about this later. They agree with us, however, about the one God, the author of this universe, who is not only incorporeal and above all bodies, but also incorruptible and above all souls—our origin, our light, our good. In this respect we rank them above the rest.
Nec, si litteras eorum Christianus ignorans uerbis, quae non didicit, in disputatione non utitur, ut uel naturalem Latine uel physicam Graece appellet eam partem, in qua de naturae inquisitione tractatur, et rationalem siue logicam, in qua quaeritur quonam modo ueritas percipi possit, et moralem uel ethicam, in qua de moribus agitur bonorumque finibus adpetendis malorumque uitandis, ideo nescit ab uno uero Deo adque optimo et naturam nobis esse, qua facti ad eius imaginem sumus, et doctrinam, qua eum nosque nouerimus, et gratiam, qua illi cohaerendo beati simus.	A Christian who does not know their writings may not use in debate words he has not learned. He may not call "natural" in Latin, or "physical" in Greek, the part that deals with the investigation of nature. He may not call "rational" or "logical" the part that asks how truth can be grasped. And he may not call "moral" or "ethical" the part that deals with conduct and with the ends of good to be pursued and of evil to be avoided. But it does not follow that he does not know that we have all three from the one true and supremely good God: the nature by which we were made in his image, the teaching by which we know him and ourselves, and the grace by which we are happy in clinging to him.
Haec itaque causa est quur istos ceteris praeferamus, quia, cum alii philosophi ingenia sua studiaque contriuerint in requirendis rerum causis, et quinam esset modus discendi adque uiuendi, isti Deo cognito reppererunt ubi esset et causa constitutae uniuersitatis et lux percipiendae ueritatis et fons bibendae felicitatis. Siue ergo isti Platonici siue quicumque alii quarumlibet gentium philosophi de Deo ista sentiunt, nobiscum sentiunt. Sed ideo cum Platonicis magis agere placuit hanc causam, quia eorum sunt litterae notiores. Nam et Graeci, quorum lingua in gentibus praeminet, eas magna praedicatione celebrarunt, et Latini permoti earum uel excellentia uel gloria, ipsas libentius didicerunt adque in nostrum eloquium transferendo nobiliores clarioresque fecerunt.	This, then, is the reason we prefer these philosophers to the rest. Other philosophers have worn out their minds and their efforts in searching for the causes of things and for the right way of learning and living. These philosophers, by knowing God, found where lies the cause of the universe's constitution, the light by which truth is perceived and the fountain from which happiness is drunk. So whether these Platonists or any other philosophers of any nation hold these views about God, they agree with us. But I have chosen to argue this case chiefly with the Platonists because their writings are better known. For the Greeks, whose language is preeminent among the nations, have celebrated these writings with great acclaim. And the Latins, moved by either their excellence or their fame, have studied them more readily than others, and by translating them into our language have made them more renowned and more illustrious.

WHERE PLATO COULD HAVE ACQUIRED THE UNDERSTANDING BY WHICH HE CAME CLOSE TO CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE

Plato could not have met Jeremiah, though his views echo Genesis and God's name, I am who I am.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.11 Mirantur autem quidam nobis in Christi gratia sociati, cum audiunt uel legunt Platonem de Deo ista sensisse,	Some who are joined with us in the grace of Christ are amazed when they hear or read that Plato held quae multum congruere ueritati nostrae religionis agnoscunt. Unde nonnulli putauerunt eum, quando perrexit in Aegyptum, Hieremiam audisse prophetam uel scripturas propheticas in eadem peregrinatione legisse; quorum quidem opinionem in quibusdam libris meis posui. Sed diligenter subputata temporum ratio, quae chronica historia continetur, Platonem indicat a tempore, quo prophetauit Hieremias, centum ferme annos postea natum fuisse; qui cum octoginta et unum uixisset, ab anno mortis eius usque ad id tempus, quo Ptolomaeus rex Aegypti scripturas propheticas gentis Hebraeorum de Iudaea poposcit et per septuaginta uiros Hebraeos, qui etiam Graecam linguam nouerant, interpretandas habendasque curauit, anni reperiuntur ferme sexaginta.

LATIN

ENGLISH

these views about God, for they recognize that these views agree closely with the truth of our religion. That is why some have thought that when Plato went to Egypt he heard the prophet Jeremiah, or read the prophetic Scriptures on that same journey. I have in fact recorded their opinion in some of my books. But a careful reckoning of dates, as contained in chronological history, shows that Plato was born about a hundred years after the time when Jeremiah prophesied. Plato lived eighty-one years. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, later requested the prophetic Scriptures of the Hebrew people from Judea, and he had them translated and kept by seventy Hebrew men who also knew Greek. From the year of Plato's death to that time, about sixty years are found to have passed.[17]

Quapropter in illa peregrinatione sua Plato nec Hieremiam uidere potuit tanto ante defunctum, nec easdem scripturas legere, quae nondum fuerant in Graecam linguam translatae, qua ille pollebat; nisi forte, quia fuit acerrimi studii, sicut Aegyptias, ita et istas per interpretem didicit, non ut scribendo transferret quod Ptolomaeus pro ingenti beneficio, qui a regia potestate etiam timeri poterat, meruisse perhibetur, sed ut conloquendo quid continerent, quantum capere posset, addisceret. Hoc ut existimetur, illa suadere uidentur indicia, quod liber geneseos sic incipit: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram. Terra autem erat inuisibilis et inconposita, et tenebrae super abyssum, et spiritus Dei superferebatur super aquam; in Timaeo autem Plato, quem librum de mundi constitutione conscripsit, Deum dicit in illo opere terram primo ignemque iunxisse.

So on that journey Plato could not have seen Jeremiah, who had died so long before. Nor could he have read those Scriptures, which had not yet been translated into Greek, the language in which he excelled. Unless perhaps, since he was a man of the keenest curiosity, he learned them through an interpreter, as he did the Egyptian writings. He would not have done so in order to translate them in writing. Ptolemy is said to have obtained that as an immense favor, though as king he could even have made himself feared. Plato would have done so to learn in conversation what they contained, as far as he could grasp it. Certain indications seem to support this view. The book of Genesis begins thus: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth. But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was over the abyss, and the Spirit of God was borne above the water." And in the Timaeus, the book he wrote on the formation of the world, Plato says that in that work God first joined earth and fire.[18]

Manifestum est autem, quod igni tribuat caeli locum: habet ergo haec sententia quandam illius similitudinem, qua dictum est: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram. Deinde illa duo media, quibus interpositis sibimet haec extrema copularentur, aquam dicit et aerem; unde putatur sic intellexisse quod scriptum est: spiritus Dei superferebatur super aquam.

Now it is clear that he assigns to fire the place of heaven. So this statement bears some resemblance to the words, "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." Next he says that the two middle elements, placed between these extremes so that they might be joined to each other, are water and air. Hence he is thought to have understood in this 17 Augustine had floated this idea in On Christian Teaching 2.28.43. The king is Ptolemy II Philadelphus (reigned 285–246 BC), traditionally credited with commissioning the Greek translation of Scripture known as the Septuagint.

18 Genesis 1:1–2. The Timaeus is Plato's dialogue on the origin and structure of the universe.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	way what is written: "the Spirit of God was borne above the water."
Parum quippe adtendens quo more soleat illa scriptura appellare spiritum Dei, quoniam et aer spiritus dicitur, quattuor opinatus elementa loco illo commemorata uideri potest Deinde quod Plato dicit amatorem Dei esse philosophum, nihil sic illis sacris litteris flagrat; et maxime illud (quod et me plurimum adducit, ut paene adsentiar Platonem illorum librorum expertem non fuisse), quod, cum ad sanctum Moysen ita uerba Dei per angelum perferantur, ut quaerenti quod sit nomen eius, qui eum pergere praecipiebat ad populum Hebraeum ex Aegypto liberandum, respondeatur: Ego sum qui sum, et dices filiis Israel: Qui est, misit me ad uos, tamquam in eius conparatione, qui uere est quia incommutabilis est, ea quae mutabilia facta sunt non sint, uehementer hoc Plato tenuit et diligentissime commendauit.	For he paid little attention to how that Scripture usually uses the term "spirit of God," and since air too is called spirit, he may seem to have supposed that the four elements are mentioned in that passage. Then there is Plato's statement that the philosopher is a lover of God, and nothing glows so brightly in those sacred writings. Above all there is the following, which more than anything leads me almost to agree that Plato was not unacquainted with those books. The words of God were conveyed to holy Moses through an angel. Moses asked the name of the one who was commanding him to go and set the Hebrew people free from Egypt. And the answer was: "I am who I am; and you shall say to the children of Israel, 'He who is has sent me to you.'" It is as though, in comparison with him who truly is because he is unchangeable, the things that were made changeable do not exist. Plato held this firmly and commended it most diligently.[19]
Et nescio utrum hoc uspiam reperiatur in libris eorum, qui ante Platonem fuerunt, nisi ubi dictum est: Ego sum qui sum, et dices eis: Qui est, misit me ad uos.	And I do not know whether this is found anywhere in the books of those who lived before Plato, except where it was said: "I am who I am; and you shall say to them, 'He who is has sent me to you.'"

THAT EVEN THE PLATONISTS, THOUGH THEY THOUGHT RIGHTLY ABOUT THE ONE TRUE GOD, HELD THAT SACRIFICE SHOULD BE OFFERED TO MANY GODS

The Platonists are the right opponents, but all of them worshiped many gods.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.12 Sed undecumque ille ista didicerit, siue praecedentibus eum ueterum libris siue potius, quo modo dicit apostolus, quia quod notum est Dei manifestum est in illis; Deus enim illis manifestauit; inuisibilia enim eius a constitutione mundi per ea, quae facta sunt, intellecta conspiciuntur, sempiterna quoque uirtus eius et diuinitas: nunc non inmerito me Platonicos philosophos elegisse cum quibus agam, quod in ista quaestione, quam modo suscepimus, agitur de naturali theologia, utrum propter felicitatem, quae post mortem futura est, uni Deo an pluribus sacra facere oporteat, satis, ut existimo, exposui.	But wherever he learned these things, whether from the books of the ancients who came before him or, more likely, in the way the apostle describes: "For what can be known of God is plain to them; for God has made it plain to them. For his invisible attributes, from the creation of the world, are understood and seen through the things that have been made—his eternal power also and divinity." However that may be, I think I have now shown well enough that I was right to choose the Platonist philosophers as the ones to argue with. The question we have just taken up concerns natural theology: whether, for the sake of the happiness that is to come after death, sacred

19 Exodus 3:14.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	rites should be performed for one God or for many.
Ideo quippe hos potissimum elegi, quoniam de uno Deo qui fecit caelum et terram, quanto melius senserunt, tanto ceteris gloriosiores et inlustriores habentur, in tantum aliis praelati iudicio posterorum, ut, cum Aristoteles, Platonis discipulus, uir excellentis ingenii et eloquio Platoni quidem inpar, sed multos facile superans, cum sectam Peripateticam condidisset, quod deambulans disputare consueuerat, plurimosque discipulos praeclara fama excellens uiuo adhuc praeceptore in suam haeresim congregasset, post mortem uero Platonis Speusippus, sororis eius filius, et Xenocrates, dilectus eius discipulus, in scholam eius, quae Academia uocabatur, eidem successissent adque ob hoc et ipsi et eorum successores Academici appellarentur, recentiores tamen philosophi nobilissimi, quibus Plato sectandus placuit, noluerint se dici Peripateticos aut Academicos, sed Platonicos.	I chose these above all because the better their understanding of the one God who made heaven and earth, the more glorious and illustrious they are held to be than the rest. Later generations have ranked them so far above the others that the most distinguished recent philosophers who chose to follow Plato did not want to be called Peripatetics or Academics, but Platonists. They chose this even though Aristotle, Plato's disciple, a man of outstanding intellect, Plato's inferior in eloquence but easily the superior of many, had founded the Peripatetic school, so called because he was in the habit of debating while walking about. His brilliant reputation had also gathered a great many disciples into his own sect while his teacher was still alive. And after Plato's death, Speusippus, his sister's son, and Xenocrates, his beloved disciple, had succeeded him in his school, which was called the Academy, so that both they and their successors were called Academics.[20]
Ex quibus sunt ualde nobilitati Graeci Plotinus, Iamblichus, Porphyrius; in utraque autem lingua, id est et Graeca et Latina, Apuleius Afer extitit Platonicus nobilis. Sed hi omnes et ceteri eius modi et ipse Plato dis plurimis esse sacra facienda putauerunt.	Among these, the Greeks Plotinus, Iamblichus and Porphyry are especially renowned, and in both languages, Greek and Latin, Apuleius the African stood out as a renowned Platonist. But all of these, and others of the same kind, and Plato himself, thought that sacred rites should be performed for many gods.[21]

PLATO'S VIEW THAT GODS ARE ONLY GOOD AND FRIENDS OF VIRTUE

Plato held all gods good and banished poets, yet the gods demanded shameful shows.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.13 Quamquam ergo a nobis et in aliis multis rebus magnisque dissentiant, in hoc tamen, quod modo posui, quia neque parua res est et inde nunc quaestio est, primum ab eis quaero, quibus dis istum cultum exhibendum arbitrentur, utrum bonis an malis an et bonis et malis. Sed habemus Platonis sententiam dicentis omnes deos bonos esse nec esse omnino ullum deorum malum. Consequens est igitur, ut bonis haec exhibenda intellegantur; tunc enim dis exhibentur, quoniam nec di erunt, si boni non erunt. Hoc si ita est, (nam de dis quid aliud decet credere?) illa profecto uacuatur opinio, qua	So although they disagree with us on many other matters, and important ones, there is the point I have just raised. It is no small matter, and it is the question now before us. On it I ask them first: to which gods do they think this worship should be offered? To good gods, to bad ones, or to both good and bad? But we have Plato's view: he says that all the gods are good and that there is no bad god at all. It follows, then, that these rites must be understood as offered to good gods. Only then are they 20 Aristotle (384–322 BC) founded the Lyceum in Athens; Speusippus and Xenocrates headed Plato's Academy in turn after his death in 347 BC.

21 Plotinus (c. AD 205–270), Iamblichus (c. AD 245–325) and Porphyry (c. AD 234–305) were leading Neoplatonists; Apuleius of Madauros (2nd century AD) was a North African writer and philosopher.

LATIN

nonnulli putant deos malos sacris placandos esse, ne laedant, bonos autem, ut adiuuent, inuocandos. Mali enim nulli sunt di; bonis porro debitus, ut dicunt, honor sacrorum est deferendus.

Qui sunt ergo illi, qui ludos scaenicos amant eosque diuinis rebus adiungi et suis honoribus flagitant exhiberi? quorum uis non eos indicat nullos, sed iste adfectus nimirum indicat malos. Quid enim de ludis scaenicis Plato senserit, notum est, cum poetas ipsos, quod tam indigna deorum maiestate adque bonitate carmina conposuerint, censet ciuitate pellendos. Qui sunt igitur isti di, qui de scaenicis ludis cum ipso Platone contendunt? Ille quippe non patitur deos falsis criminibus infamari; isti eisdem criminibus suos honores celebrari iubent.

Denique isti cum eosdem ludos instaurari praeciperent, poscentes turpia etiam maligna gesserunt, Tito Latinio auferentes filium et inmittentes morbum, quod eorum abnuisset imperium, eumque morbum retrahentes, cum iussa conplesset; iste autem illos nec tam malos, timendos putat, sed suae sententiae robur constantissime retinens omnes poetarum sacrilegas nugas, quibus illi inmunditiae societate oblectantur, a populo bene instituto remouere non dubitat. Hunc autem Platonem, quod iam in secundo libro commemoraui, inter semideos Labeo ponit. Qui Labeo numina mala uictimis cruentis adque huius modi supplicationibus placari existimat, bona uero ludis et talibus quasi ad laetitiam pertinentibus rebus. Quid est ergo quod semideus Plato non semideis, sed deis, et hoc bonis, illa oblectamenta, quia iudicat turpia, tam constanter audet auferre?

Qui sane di refellunt sententiam Labeonis; nam, se in Latinio non lasciuos tantum adque ludibundos, sed etiam offered to gods at all, since they will not be gods if they are not good. If this is so (and what else is it fitting to believe about gods?), then the opinion held by some is surely emptied of force: that bad gods must be appeased with rites so that they do no harm, while good gods are to be invoked so that they help. For there are no bad gods. And it is to the good gods, as they say, that the honor of rites they are due must be paid.

ENGLISH

Who, then, are those who love theatrical shows and demand that they be joined to divine worship and performed in their honor? Their power shows that they are not nonexistent, but this taste of theirs surely shows that they are bad. What Plato thought about theatrical shows is well known: he holds that the poets themselves should be banished from the city for composing poems so unworthy of the majesty and goodness of the gods. Who, then, are these gods who contend with Plato himself over theatrical shows? He will not allow the gods to be defamed with false accusations; they command that their honors be celebrated with those very accusations.

In the end, when they ordered these same shows to be restored, they not only demanded what was shameful but also did what was malicious. They took away Titus Latinius's son and struck him with a disease because he had refused their command, and then withdrew the disease once he had carried out their orders. Plato, however, did not think them worth fearing, bad as they were. Holding to his judgment with unwavering firmness, he does not hesitate to remove from a well-ordered people all the sacrilegious trifles of the poets, in which those gods delight because they share in their filth. Yet this same Plato, as I mentioned in the second book, is placed by Labeo among the demigods. And this Labeo thinks that evil deities are appeased by bloody victims and supplications of that kind, but good ones by shows and similar things that belong, so to speak, to merriment. Why is it, then, that the demigod Plato so steadfastly dares to take away those amusements, because he judges them shameful, not from demigods but from gods, and good gods at that?[22]

These gods, in fact, refute Labeo's opinion, for in the case of Latinius they showed themselves not only wanton and playful but also cruel and terrify-

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	saeuos terribilesque monstrarunt. Exponant ergo nobis ista Platonici, qui omnes deos secundum auctoris sui sententiam bonos et honestos et uirtutibus sapientium socios esse arbitrantur aliterque de ullo deorum sentiri nefas habent. Exponimus, inquiunt. Adtente igitur audiamus.	ing. So let the Platonists explain this to us, since, following the view of their founder, they hold that all the gods are good and honorable and partners with the wise in virtue, and consider it impious to think otherwise of any of the gods. "We will explain it," they say. Then let us listen attentively.

THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO SAID THERE ARE THREE KINDS OF RATIONAL SOULS: IN THE GODS OF HEAVEN, IN THE DEMONS OF THE AIR, AND IN HUMAN BEINGS ON EARTH

The Platonists divide rational beings into gods, demons and humans; Apuleius praises the demons.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.14	Omnium, inquiunt, animalium, in quibus est anima rationalis, tripertita diuisio est, in deos, homines, daemones. Di excelsissimum locum tenent, homines infimum, daemones medium. Nam deorum sedes in caelo est, hominum in terra, in aere daemonum. Sicut eis diuersa dignitas est locorum, ita etiam naturarum. Proinde di sunt hominibus daemonibusque potiores; homines uero infra deos et daemones constituti sunt, ut elementorum ordine, sic differentia meritorum. Daemones igitur medii, quem ad modum dis, quibus inferius habitant, postponendi, ita hominibus, quibus superius, praeferendi sunt. Habent enim cum dis communem inmortalitatem corporum, animorum autem cum hominibus passiones. Quapropter non est mirum, inquiunt, si etiam ludorum obscenitatibus et poetarum figmentis delectantur, quando quidem humanis capiuntur adfectibus, a quibus di longe absunt et modis omnibus alieni sunt.	"All living beings that have a rational soul," they say, "are divided into three kinds: gods, humans and demons. The gods hold the highest place, humans the lowest, demons the middle. The gods dwell in heaven, humans on earth, demons in the air. Just as their places differ in rank, so do their natures. Accordingly, the gods are superior to humans and demons, while humans are set below gods and demons, differing in merit just as they do in the order of the elements. The demons, then, being in the middle, must be ranked below the gods, beneath whom they dwell, and above humans, above whom they dwell. For they share with the gods the immortality of their bodies, but with humans the passions of their souls. So it is no wonder," they say, "if they also delight in the obscenities of the shows and the fictions of the poets, since they are captivated by human emotions, from which the gods are far removed and to which they are wholly foreign."
	Ex quo colligitur, Platonem poetica detestando et prohibendo figmenta non deos, qui omnes boni et excelsi sunt, priuasse ludorum scaenicorum uoluptate, sed daemones.	From this it follows that when Plato detested and prohibited the poets' fictions, it was not the gods, who are all good and exalted, but the demons whom he deprived of the pleasure of theatrical shows.
	Haec si ita sunt (quae licet aput alios quoque reperiantur, Apuleius tamen Platonicus Madaurensis de hac re sola unum scripsit librum, cuius esse titulum uoluit de deo Socratis, ubi disserit et exponit, ex quo genere numinum Socrates habebat adiunctum et amicitia quadam conciliatum, a quo perhibetur solitus admoneri, ut desisteret ab agendo, quando id quod agere uolebat, non prospere fuerat euenturum; dicit enim apertissime et copiosissime adserit non illum deum fuisse, sed	If this is so (these ideas are found in other writers too, but the Platonist Apuleius of Madauros wrote a whole book on this one subject, which he chose to title On the God of Socrates. In it he discusses and explains to what class of divine beings belonged the one Socrates had attached to himself and bound by a kind of friendship, and by whom he is said to have been regularly warned to stop whenever what he wanted to do was not going to 22 Titus Latinius was a Roman commoner who, Livy reports, was punished for failing to report a dream ordering games to be repeated; Augustine tells the story in 4.26. Cornelius Labeo was a Roman writer on religion, probably of the third century AD.

LATIN

daemonem, diligenti disputatione pertractans istam Platonis de deorum sublimitate et hominum humilitate et daemonum medietate sententiam) — haec ergo si ita sunt, quonam modo ausus est Plato, etiamsi non dis, quos ab omni humana contagione semouit, certe ipsis daemonibus poetas urbe pellendo auferre theatricas uoluptates, nisi quia hoc pacto admonuit animum humanum, quamuis adhuc in his moribundis membris positum, pro splendore honestatis inpura daemonum iussa contemnere eorumque inmunditiam detestari?

Nam si Plato haec honestissime arguit et prohibuit, profecto daemones turpissime poposcerunt adque iusserunt. Aut ergo fallitur Apuleius et non ex isto genere numinum habuit amicum Socrates aut contraria inter se sentit Plato modo daemones honorando, modo eorum delicias a ciuitate bene morata remouendo, aut non est Socrati amicitia daemonis gratulanda, de qua usque adeo et ipse Apuleius erubuit, ut de deo Socratis praenotaret librum, quem secundum suam disputationem, qua deos a daemonibus tam diligenter copioseque discernit, non appellare de deo, sed de daemone Socratis debuit. Maluit autem hoc in ipsa disputatione quam in titulo libri ponere.

Ita enim per sanam doctrinam, quae humanis rebus inluxit, omnes uel paene omnes daemonum nomen exhorrent, ut, quisquis ante disputationem Apulei, qua daemonum dignitas commendatur, titulum libri de daemone Socratis legeret, nequaquam illum hominem sanum fuisse sentiret. Quid autem etiam ipse Apuleius quod in daemonibus laudaret inuenit praeter subtilitatem et firmitatem corporum et habitationis altiorem locum? Nam de moribus eorum, cum de omnibus generaliter loqueretur, non solum nihil boni dixit, sed etiam plurimum mali. Denique lecto illo libro prorsus nemo miratur eos etiam scaenicam turpitudinem in rebus diuinis habere uoluisse, et cum deos se putari uelint, deorum criminibus oblectari potuisse, et quidquid in eorum sacris obscena sollemnitate seu turpi crudelitate uel ridetur uel horretur, eorum adfectibus conuenire.

ENGLISH

turn out well. He says quite plainly, and argues at great length, that it was not a god but a demon, carefully working through Plato's view of the loftiness of the gods, the lowliness of humans and the middle position of demons)—if this, then, is so, how did Plato dare, by banishing the poets from the city, to take away theatrical pleasures from the demons themselves, even if not from the gods, whom he set apart from all human contamination? Unless it was that in this way he was warning the human mind, though still housed in these dying limbs, to despise the impure commands of demons for the sake of shining integrity, and to detest their filth.[23]

For if Plato acted most honorably in censuring and prohibiting these things, the demons certainly acted most shamefully in demanding and commanding them. So either Apuleius is mistaken, and Socrates' friend did not belong to this class of divine beings; or Plato contradicts himself, now honoring demons, now removing their delights from a well-governed city; or Socrates is not to be congratulated on the friendship of a demon. Apuleius himself was so ashamed of that friendship that he titled his book On the God of Socrates. Yet by his own argument, in which he distinguishes gods from demons so carefully and at such length, he ought to have called it not On the God but On the Demon of Socrates. But he preferred to put this in the argument itself rather than in the title of the book.

For thanks to the sound teaching that has shone upon human affairs, all people, or nearly all, so shudder at the name of demons that anyone who read the title On the Demon of Socrates before reading Apuleius's argument commending the dignity of demons would think that man was not in his right mind at all. And what did even Apuleius himself find to praise in demons, apart from the fineness and durability of their bodies and the higher place where they dwell? For about their character, when he spoke of them all in general, he said not only nothing good but a great deal that was bad. In short, after reading that book, no one at all is surprised that they wanted even the shamefulness of the stage to be part of divine worship; that, though they wish to be thought gods, they could take de-23 Apuleius's On the God of Socrates discusses demons as beings between gods and humans, taking as its starting point the inner "divine sign" that Socrates claimed warned him.

LATIN

ENGLISH

light in the crimes of the gods; and that whatever in their rites provokes laughter or horror, through obscene ceremony or shameful cruelty, suits their passions.

THAT DEMONS ARE NOT SUPERIOR TO HUMAN BEINGS EITHER BECAUSE OF THEIR AIRY BODIES OR BECAUSE OF THEIR HIGHER DWELLING PLACES

Better bodies and a higher dwelling do not make demons better than human beings.

LATIN

ENGLISH

8.15 Quam ob rem absit ut ista considerans animus ueraciter religiosus et uero Deo subditus ideo arbitretur daemones se ipso esse meliores, quod habeant corpora meliora. Alioquin multas sibi et bestias praelaturus est, quae nos et acrimonia sensuum et motu facillimo adque celerrimo et ualentia uirium et annosissima firmitate corporum uincunt. Quis hominum uidendo aequabitur aquilis et uulturibus? quis odorando canibus? quis uelocitate leporibus, ceruis, omnibus auibus? quis multum ualendo leonibus et elephantis? quis diu uiuendo serpentibus, qui etiam deposita tunica senectutem deponere adque in iuuentam redire perhibentur? Sed sicut his omnibus ratiocinando et intellegendo meliores sumus, ita etiam daemonibus bene adque honeste uiuendo meliores esse debemus.

Therefore, when a truly religious mind, subject to the true God, considers these things, God forbid that it should think demons better than itself because they have better bodies. Otherwise it will have to rank many beasts above itself as well, for they surpass us in keenness of senses, in ease and speed of movement, in strength, and in the long-lasting vigor of their bodies. What human being will equal eagles and vultures in sight? Or dogs in smell? Or hares, stags and all birds in speed? Or lions and elephants in strength? Or serpents in length of life—serpents that are even said to shed old age along with their skin and return to youth? But just as we are better than all these by reasoning and understanding, so too we ought to be better than demons by living good and honorable lives.

Ob hoc enim et prouidentia diuina eis, quibus nos constat esse potiores, data sunt quaedam potiora corporum munera, ut illud, quo eis praeponimur, etiam isto modo nobis commendaretur multo maiore cura excolendum esse quam corpus, ipsamque excellentiam corporalem, quam daemones habere nossemus, prae bonitate uitae, qua illis anteponimur, contemnere disceremus, habituri et nos inmortalitatem corporum, non quam suppliciorum aeternitas torqueat, sed quam puritas praecedat animorum.

This is why divine providence also gave certain superior bodily gifts to those beings we are known to surpass: so that this too might teach us that the faculty by which we are set above them must be cultivated with much greater care than the body, and so that we might learn to despise the bodily excellence we know demons possess, compared with the goodness of life by which we are ranked above them. For we too shall have immortal bodies—not an immortality racked by eternal punishment, but one preceded by purity of soul.

Iam uero de loci altitudine, quod daemones in aere, nos autem habitamus in terra, ita permoueri, ut hinc eos nobis esse praeponendos existimemus, omnino ridiculum est. Hoc enim pacto nobis et omnia uolatilia praeponimus. At enim uolatilia cum uolando fatigantur uel reficiendum alimentis corpus habent, terram repetunt uel ad requiem uel ad pastum, quod daemones, inquiunt, non faciunt. Numquid ergo placet eis, ut uolatilia nobis, daemones autem etiam uolatilibus antecellant? Quod si dementissimum est opinari, nihil est quod de habitatione superioris elementi dignos esse

As for the height of their dwelling place—that demons live in the air while we live on the earth—to be so impressed by this as to think they should be ranked above us is utterly ridiculous. On that reasoning we would also rank all flying creatures above us. "But," they say, "when flying creatures grow tired from flying or need to refresh their bodies with food, they come back to earth to rest or to feed, and demons do not do this." Do they want, then, flying creatures to excel us, and daemones existimemus, quibus nos religionis adfectu subdere debeamus.	demons to excel even flying creatures? If that is an utterly insane idea, there is no reason for us to think that, because they dwell in a higher element, demons deserve to have us submit to them in religious devotion.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sicut enim fieri potuit, ut aeriae uolucres terrestribus nobis non solum non praeferantur, uerum etiam subiciantur propter rationalis animae, quae in nobis est, dignitatem: ita fieri potuit, ut daemones, quamuis magis aerii sint, terrestribus nobis non ideo meliores sint, quia est aer quam terra superior; sed ideo eis homines praeferendi sint, quoniam spei piorum hominum nequaquam illorum desperatio conparanda est. Nam et illa ratio Platonis, qua elementa quattuor proportione contexit adque ordinat, ita duobus extremis, igni mobilissimo et terrae inmobili, media duo, aerem et aquam, interserens, ut, quanto est aer aquis et aere ignis, tanto et aquae superiores sint terris, satis nos admonet animalium merita non pro elementorum gradibus aestimare.	Birds of the air are not only not ranked above us earth-dwellers, but are even subject to us, because of the dignity of the rational soul within us. In the same way, demons, though more airy than we are, are not better than us earth-dwellers just because air is higher than earth. Rather, humans must be ranked above them, since their despair is in no way to be compared with the hope of godly people. Indeed, Plato's theory itself sufficiently warns us not to judge the merits of living beings by the ranks of the elements. By that theory he links and orders the four elements in proportion, inserting the two middle ones, air and water, between the two extremes, fire, the most mobile, and earth, the immobile, so that, as air is higher than water and fire than air, so water is higher than earth.
Et ipse quippe Apuleius cum ceteris terrestre animal hominem dicit, qui tamen longe praeponitur animalibus aquatilibus, cum ipsas aquas terris praeponat Plato: ut intellegant, non eundem ordinem tenendum, cum agitur de meritis animarum, qui uidetur esse ordo in gradibus corporum; sed fieri posse, ut inferius corpus anima melior inhabitet deteriorque superius.	And indeed Apuleius himself, with the rest, calls the human being a land animal, and yet humans are ranked far above water creatures, even though Plato ranks water itself above earth. Let them understand from this that the order to be kept when it is a question of the merits of souls is not the same as the order that appears to hold among the ranks of bodies. It is possible for a better soul to inhabit a lower body, and a worse soul a higher one.

WHAT THE PLATONIST APULEIUS THOUGHT ABOUT THE CHARACTER AND CONDUCT OF THE DEMONS

Apuleius defines demons as rational, passionate, airy and eternal; none of this deserves worship.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.16 De moribus ergo daemonum cum idem Platonicus loqueretur, dixit eos eisdem quibus homines animi perturbationibus agitari, inritari iniuriis, obsequiis donisque placari, gaudere honoribus, diuersis sacrorum ritibus oblectari et in eis si quid neglectum fuerit commoueri. Inter cetera etiam dicit ad eos pertinere diuinationes augurum, aruspicum, uatum adque somniorum; ab his quoque esse miracula magorum. Breuiter autem eos definiens ait daemones esse genere animalia, animo passiua, mente rationalia, corpore aeria, tempore aeterna; horum uero quinque tria priora illis esse quae nobis, quartum proprium, quintum eos cum dis	When this same Platonist spoke of the character of demons, then, he said that they are stirred by the same disturbances of mind as humans: provoked by injuries, appeased by services and gifts, pleased by honors, delighted by various sacred rites, and upset if anything in those rites is neglected. Among other things, he also says that the divinations of augurs, entrail-readers and prophets, and of dreams, belong to them, and that the wonders worked by magicians come from them as well. Defining them briefly, he says that demons are by kind living beings, in soul subject to pas-habere commune. Sed uideo trium superiorum, quae nobiscum habent, duo etiam cum dis habere.

LATIN

Animalia quippe esse dicit et deos, suaque cuique elementa distribuens in terrestribus animalibus nos posuit cum ceteris quae in terra uiuunt et sentiunt, in aquatilibus pisces et alia natatilia, in aeriis daemones, in aetheriis deos. Ac per hoc quod daemones genere sunt animalia, non solum eis cum hominibus, uerum etiam cum dis pecoribusque commune est; quod mente rationalia, cum dis et hominibus; quod tempore aeterna, cum dis solis; quod animo passiua, cum hominibus solis; quod corpore aeria, ipsi sunt soli. Proinde quod genere sunt animalia, non est magnum, quia hoc sunt et pecora; quod mente rationalia, non est supra nos, quia sumus et nos; quod tempore aeterna, quid boni est, si non beata? Melior est enim temporalis felicitas quam misera aeternitas.

Quod animo passiua, quo modo supra nos est, quando et nos hoc sumus, nec ita esset, nisi miseri essemus? Quod corpore aeria, quanti aestimandum est, cum omni corpori praeferatur animae qualiscumque natura, et ideo religionis cultus, qui debetur ex animo, nequaquam debeatur ei rei, quae inferior est animo? Porro si inter illa, quae daemonum esse dicit, adnumeraret uirtutem, sapientiam, felicitatem et haec eos diceret habere cum dis aeterna adque communia, profecto aliquid diceret exoptandum magnique pendendum; nec sic eos tamen propter haec tamquam Deum colere deberemus, sed potius ipsum, a quo haec illos accepisse nossemus. Quanto minus nunc honore diuino aeria digna sunt animalia, ad hoc rationalia ut misera esse possint, ad hoc passiua ut misera sint, ad hoc aeterna ut miseriam finire non possint!

ENGLISH

sion, in mind rational, in body made of air, in duration eternal. Of these five, the first three they have in common with us, the fourth is their own, and the fifth they share with the gods. But I see that of the first three, which they share with us, they also share two with the gods.

For he says that the gods too are living beings. Assigning to each kind its own element, he placed us among the land animals, along with the other creatures that live and feel on earth; among the water animals, fish and other swimming creatures; among the creatures of the air, demons; among those of the ether, the gods. So being living beings by kind is something demons share not only with humans but also with the gods and the beasts; being rational in mind, with gods and humans; being eternal in duration, with the gods alone; being subject to passion in soul, with humans alone; being made of air in body is theirs alone. Accordingly, being living beings by kind is no great thing, since beasts are that too. Being rational in mind does not raise them above us, since we are that too. Being eternal in duration—what good is that, if they are not happy? For temporal happiness is better than eternal misery.

Being subject to passion in soul—how does that raise them above us, when we are that too, and would not be if we were not miserable? Being made of air in body—how highly should that be valued, when the nature of any soul whatever is ranked above every body, and therefore the worship of religion, which is owed from the soul, is by no means owed to anything inferior to the soul? Moreover, if among the attributes he says belong to demons he had counted virtue, wisdom and happiness, and said that they have these eternally and in common with the gods, he would surely be saying something to be desired and highly valued. Even then we ought not to worship them as God on that account, but rather him from whom we knew they had received these things. How much less, as things are, do these living beings of the air deserve divine honor—rational so that they can be miserable, subject to passion so that they are miserable, eternal so that they cannot end their misery!

WHETHER IT IS RIGHT FOR HUMAN BEINGS TO WORSHIP SPIRITS FROM WHOSE VICES THEY OUGHT TO BE FREED

Demons are tossed by passions that true religion commands us to overcome.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.17	Quapropter, ut omittam cetera et hoc solum pertractem, quod nobiscum daemones dixit habere commune, id est animi passiones, si omnia quattuor elementa suis animalibus plena sunt, inmortalibus ignis et aer, mortalibus aqua et terra, quaero quur animi daemonum passionum turbelis et tempestatibus agitentur. Perturbatio est enim, quae Graece πάθος dicitur; unde illa uoluit uocare animo passiua, quia uerbum de uerbo πάθος passio diceretur motus animi contra rationem. Quur ergo sunt ista in animis daemonum, quae in pecoribus non sunt? Quoniam si quid in pecore simile apparet, non est perturbatio, quia non est contra rationem, qua pecora carent.	Therefore, to pass over the rest and deal only with what he said demons have in common with us—that is, passions of the soul—if all four elements are full of their own living beings, fire and air of immortal ones, water and earth of mortal ones, I ask why the souls of demons are tossed by the squalls and storms of passions. For a disturbance is what in Greek is called πάθος [pathos, passion]. That is why he chose to call them "subject to passion in soul," since the word passio, a word-for-word rendering of πάθος, would mean a motion of the mind contrary to reason. Why, then, are these things found in the souls of demons, when they are not found in beasts? For if anything similar appears in a beast, it is not a disturbance, because it is not contrary to reason, which beasts lack.
	In hominibus autem ut sint istae perturbationes, facit hoc stultitia uel miseria; nondum enim sumus in illa perfectione sapientiae beati, quae nobis ab hac mortalitate liberatis in fine promittitur. Deos uero ideo dicunt istas perturbationes non perpeti, quia non solum aeterni, uerum etiam beati sunt. Easdem quippe animas rationales etiam ipsos habere perhibent, sed ab omni labe ac peste purissimas. Quam ob rem si propterea di non perturbantur, quod animalia sunt beata, non misera, et propterea pecora non perturbantur, quod animalia sunt, quae nec beata possunt esse nec misera: restat ut daemones sicut homines ideo perturbentur, quod animalia sunt non beata, sed misera.	In humans, however, it is folly or misery that brings about these disturbances, for we are not yet happy in that perfection of wisdom which is promised to us at the end, when we have been freed from this mortality. The gods, they say, do not suffer these disturbances because they are not only eternal but also happy. For they claim that the gods too have the same rational souls, but utterly pure of every stain and plague. So if the gods are not disturbed because they are living beings that are happy, not miserable, and beasts are not disturbed because they are living beings that can be neither happy nor miserable, it remains that demons, like humans, are disturbed because they are living beings that are not happy but miserable.
	Qua igitur insipientia uel potius amentia per aliquam religionem daemonibus subdimur, cum per ueram religionem ab ea uitiositate, in qua illis sumus similes, liberemur? Cum enim daemones, quod et iste Apuleius, quamuis eis plurimum parcat et diuinis honoribus dignos censeat, tamen cogitur confiteri, ira instigentur, nobis uera religio praecipit, ne ira instigemur, sed ei potius resistamus. Cum daemones donis inuitentur, nobis uera religio praecipit, ne cuiquam donorum acceptione faueamus. Cum daemones honoribus mulceantur, nobis uera religio praecipit, ut talibus nullo modo moueamur. Cum daemones quorundam hominum osores, quorundam amatores sint, non prudenti tranquilloque iudicio, sed	By what folly, then, or rather madness, do we subject ourselves to demons through some religion, when through the true religion we are freed from the very corruption in which we resemble them? Demons are spurred on by anger—as even this Apuleius, though he spares them a great deal and judges them worthy of divine honors, is forced to admit—but true religion commands us not to be spurred on by anger, but rather to resist it. Demons are won over by gifts, but true religion commands us not to favor anyone because we have accepted gifts. Demons are soothed by hon-

LATIN	ENGLISH
animo ut appellat ipse passiuo, nobis uera religio praecipit, ut nostros etiam diligamus inimicos.	ors, but true religion commands us not to be moved by such things in any way. Demons hate some people and love others, not by prudent and calm judgment but by a soul that is, as he himself calls it, subject to passion; but true religion commands us to love even our enemies.[24]
Postremo omnem motum cordis et salum mentis omnesque turbelas et tempestates animi, quibus daemones aestuare adque fluctuare adserit, nos uera religio deponere iubet. Quae igitur causa est nisi stultitia errorque mirabilis, ut ei te facias uenerando humilem, cui te cupias uiuendo dissimilem; et religione colas, quem imitari nolis, cum religionis summa sit imitari quem colis?	Finally, every agitation of the heart, every tossing of the mind, all the squalls and storms of the soul, in which he says demons seethe and surge, true religion bids us put away. What reason can there be, then, other than folly and astonishing error, for you to humble yourself in veneration before one you would wish to be unlike in the way you live, and to worship in religion one you would not want to imitate, when the sum of religion is to imitate the one you worship?

WHAT KIND OF RELIGION IT IS THAT TEACHES THAT HUMAN BEINGS MUST USE DEMONS AS ADVOCATES TO COMMEND THEMSELVES TO THE GOOD GODS

Making demons go-betweens forces the chaste to rely on lovers of obscenity and magic.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.18 Frustra igitur eis Apuleius, et quicumque ita sentiunt, hunc detulit honorem, sic eos in aere medios inter aetherium caelum terramque constituens, ut, quoniam nullus deus miscetur homini, quod Platonem dixisse perhibent, isti ad deos perferant preces hominum et inde ad homines inpetrata quae poscunt. Indignum enim putauerunt qui ista crediderunt misceri homines dis et deos hominibus; dignum autem misceri daemones et dis et hominibus, hinc petita qui adlegent, inde concessa qui adportent; ut uidelicet homo castus et ab artium magicarum sceleribus alienus eos patronos adhibeat, per quos illum di exaudiant, qui haec amant, quae ille non amando fit dignior, quem facilius et libentius exaudire debeant. Amant quippe illi scaenicas turpitudines, quas non amat pudicitia; amant in maleficiis magorum mille nocendi artes, quas non amat innocentia.	In vain, then, did Apuleius, and anyone else who thinks this way, confer this honor on them. He placed them in the air, midway between the ethereal heaven and the earth, so that, since "no god mingles with a human being," as Plato is reported to have said, they might carry the prayers of human beings to the gods and bring back from there to human beings what they have asked for and obtained. For those who believed these things thought it unworthy for human beings to mingle with gods and gods with human beings, but worthy for demons to mingle with both gods and human beings, presenting petitions from here and bringing back grants from there. So, evidently, a chaste man, a stranger to the crimes of the magic arts, must employ as his patrons the very beings through whom the gods are to hear him. Yet these beings love the things whose rejection makes him more worthy to be heard by the gods more readily and more willingly. For they love the obscenities of the stage, which chastity does not love. They love the thousand arts of doing harm in the evil practices of magicians, which innocence does not love.[25]

24 Compare Matthew 5:44.
25 The saying is from Plato, Symposium 203a.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Ergo et pudicitia et innocentia si quid ab dis inpetrare uoluerit, non poterit suis meritis nisi suis interuenientibus inimicis. Non est quod iste poetica figmenta et theatrica ludibria iustificare conetur. Habemus contra ista magistrum eorum et tantae aput eos auctoritatis Platonem, si pudor humanus ita de se male meretur, ut non solum diligat turpia, uerum etiam diuinitati existimet grata.	So if chastity and innocence wish to obtain anything from the gods, they cannot do so by their own merits, but only through the intervention of their own enemies. There is no reason for this man to try to justify the fictions of the poets and the mockeries of the theater. Against these things we have their own master, Plato, whose authority among them is so great. We need him if human modesty does itself such a disservice that it not only loves what is shameful but even thinks it pleasing to the divine.

THE IMPIETY OF THE MAGIC ARTS, WHICH RELY ON THE PATRONAGE OF EVIL SPIRITS

Roman law and Apuleius's own defense show that magic is condemned as harmful.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.19	Porro aduersus magicas artes, de quibus quosdam nimis infelices et nimis inpios etiam gloriari libet, nonne ipsam publicam lucem testem citabo? Quur enim tam grauiter ista plectuntur seueritate legum, si opera sunt numinum colendorum? An forte istas leges Christiani instituerunt, quibus artes magicae puniuntur? Secundum quem alium sensum, nisi quod haec maleficia generi humano perniciosa esse non dubium est, ait poeta clarissimus: Testor, cara, deos et te, germana, tuumque / Dulce caput, magicas inuitam accingier artes? Illud etiam, quod alio loco de his artibus dicit: Adque satas alio uidi traducere messes, eo quod hac pestifera sceleratque doctrina fructus alieni in alias terras transferri perhibentur, nonne in duodecim tabulis, id est Romanorum antiquissimis legibus, Cicero commemorat esse conscriptum et ei, qui hoc fecerit, supplicium constitutum?	Further, against the magic arts, in which some people, far too unhappy and far too impious, even like to glory, shall I not call the full light of public life itself as my witness? For why are these things punished so heavily by the severity of the laws, if they are the works of divinities who deserve worship? Or did the Christians, perhaps, establish these laws by which the magic arts are punished? The most celebrated of poets says: "I call the gods to witness, dear sister, and you, and your dear life, that I arm myself with the magic arts against my will." In what other sense does he say this, except that these evil practices are undoubtedly harmful to the human race? Elsewhere he says of these arts: "And I have seen him lead sown crops away to another field." He says this because by this pestilent and wicked teaching the crops of others are said to be transferred to other lands. Does not Cicero record that this was written in the Twelve Tables, the most ancient laws of the Romans, and that a punishment was laid down for anyone who did it?[26]
	Postremo Apuleius ipse numquid aput Christianos iudices de magicis artibus accusatus est? Quas utique sibi obiectas si diuinas et pias esse nouerat et diuinarum potestatum operibus congruas, non solum eas confiteri debuit, sed etiam profiteri, leges culpans potius, quibus haec prohiberentur et damnanda putarentur, quae haberi miranda et ueneranda oporteret.	Finally, was Apuleius himself accused of practicing the magic arts before Christian judges? If he knew that the arts with which he was charged were divine and holy, and in keeping with the works of divine powers, he ought not only to have admitted them but even to have professed them openly. He should have blamed instead the laws by which such things were forbidden and judged 26 Virgil, Aeneid 4.492–493 (Dido to her sister Anna), and Eclogues 8.99. The Twelve Tables (c. 450 BC) were Rome's earliest written law code.

LATIN

ENGLISH

worthy of condemnation, when they ought to be held worthy of wonder and veneration.

Ita enim uel sententiam suam persuaderet iudicibus, uel, si illi secundum iniquas leges saperent eumque talia praedicantem adque laudantem morte multarent, digna animae illius daemones dona rependerent, pro quorum diuinis operibus praedicandis humanam uitam sibi adimi non timeret; sicut martyres nostri, cum eis pro crimine obiceretur Christiana religio, qua nouerant se fieri saluos et gloriosissimos inaeternum, non eam negando temporales poenas euadere delegerunt, sed potius confitendo profitendo praedicando et pro hac omnia fideliter fortiterque tolerando et cum pia securitate moriendo leges, quibus prohibebatur, erubescere conpulerunt mutarique fecerunt. Huius autem philosophi Platonici copiosissima et disertissima extat oratio, qua crimen artium magicarum a se alienum esse defendit seque aliter non uult innocentem uideri nisi ea negando, quae non possunt ab innocente committi.

For in that way he would either have won the judges over to his opinion, or else, if they followed the unjust laws and punished him with death for proclaiming and praising such things, the demons would have repaid his soul with gifts worthy of it, since he would not have feared to lose his human life for proclaiming their divine works. Our martyrs did exactly that. When the Christian religion was charged against them as a crime, the religion by which they knew they would be saved and made most glorious forever, they did not choose to escape temporal punishment by denying it. Instead they confessed it, professed it and proclaimed it. They endured everything for its sake faithfully and bravely, and they died with holy confidence. In this way they compelled the laws that forbade it to blush with shame, and caused them to be changed. Yet there survives a very full and very eloquent speech by this Platonist philosopher, in which he defends himself against the charge of practicing the magic arts. He does not wish to appear innocent in any other way than by denying the very things that an innocent man cannot commit.[27]

At omnia miracula magorum, quos recte sentit esse damnandos, doctrinis fiunt et operibus daemonum, quos uiderit quur censeat honorandos, eos necessarios adserens perferendis ad deos precibus nostris, quorum debemus opera deuitare, si ad Deum uerum preces nostras uolumus peruenire. Deinde quaero, quales preces hominum dis bonis per daemones adlegari putat, magicas an licitas? Si magicas, nolunt tales; si licitas, nolunt per tales. Si autem peccator paenitens preces fundit, maxime si aliquid magicum admisit, itane tandem illis intercedentibus accipit ueniam, quibus inpellentibus aut fauentibus se cecidisse plangit in culpam? an et ipsi daemones, ut possint paenitentibus mereri indulgentiam, priores agunt, quod eos deceperint, paenitentiam?

Yet all the wonders of the magicians, whom he rightly thinks should be condemned, are performed through the teachings and works of demons. Why he thinks these demons should be honored is his own affair. He claims they are necessary for carrying our prayers to the gods, when in fact we ought to avoid their works if we want our prayers to reach the true God. Next I ask: what kind of human prayers does he think are presented to the good gods through demons, magical or lawful? If magical, the gods do not want such prayers; if lawful, they do not want them through such agents. And if a repentant sinner pours out prayers, especially if he has committed some act of magic, does he really receive pardon through the intercession of the very beings at whose urging or with whose encouragement, as he laments, he fell into sin? Or do the demons themselves first do penance for having deceived the penitents, so that they can obtain forgiveness for them?

Hoc nemo umquam de daemonibus dixit, quia, si ita esset, nequaquam sibi auderent diuinos honores

No one has ever said this of demons. If it were so, beings who longed to attain the grace of pardon by expetere, qui paenitendo desiderarent ad gratiam ueniae peruenire. Ibi enim est detestanda superbia, hic humilitas miseranda.	repenting would never dare to claim divine honors for themselves. In the one case there is a pride to be detested; in the other, a humility deserving of mercy.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT THE GOOD GODS WOULD RATHER MIX WITH DEMONS THAN WITH HUMAN BEINGS

The Platonist maxim that no god mingles with humans makes the gods consort with demons instead.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.20	At enim urgens causa et artissima cogit daemones medios inter deos et homines agere, ut ab hominibus adferant desiderata, et a dis referant inpetrata. Quaenam tandem ista causa est et quanta necessitas? Quia nullus, inquiunt, Deus miscetur homini.	"But," they say, "a pressing and most compelling reason forces the demons to act as intermediaries between gods and human beings, bringing from human beings what they desire and bringing back from the gods what has been granted." What, pray, is this reason, and how great is this necessity? "Because," they say, "no god mingles with a human being."
	Praeclara igitur sanctitas Dei, qui non miscetur homini supplicanti, et miscetur daemoni adroganti; non miscetur homini paenitenti, et miscetur daemoni decipienti; non miscetur homini confugienti ad diuinitatem, et miscetur daemoni fingenti diuinitatem; non miscetur homini petenti indulgentiam, et miscetur daemoni suadenti nequitiam; non miscetur homini per philosophicos libros poetas de bene instituta ciuitate pellenti, et miscetur daemoni a principibus et pontificibus ciuitatis per scaenicos ludos poetarum ludibria requirenti; non miscetur homini deorum crimina fingere prohibenti, et miscetur daemoni se falsis deorum criminibus oblectanti; non miscetur homini magorum scelera iustis legibus punienti, et miscetur daemoni magicas artes docenti et inplenti; non miscetur homini imitationem daemonis fugienti, et miscetur daemoni deceptionem hominis aucupanti.	What a splendid holiness, then, in a god! He does not mingle with a human being who prays to him, yet he mingles with an arrogant demon. He does not mingle with a human being who repents, yet he mingles with a demon who deceives. He does not mingle with a human being who takes refuge in the divine, yet he mingles with a demon who feigns divinity. He does not mingle with a human being who asks for pardon, yet he mingles with a demon who urges wickedness. He does not mingle with a human being who, in books of philosophy, banishes the poets from a well-ordered city, yet he mingles with a demon who demands the mockeries of the poets from the city's leaders and pontiffs through theatrical shows. He does not mingle with a human being who forbids the invention of crimes of the gods, yet he mingles with a demon who delights in false crimes of the gods. He does not mingle with a human being who punishes the crimes of magicians by just laws, yet he mingles with a demon who teaches and practices the magic arts. He does not mingle with a human being who shuns imitating a demon, yet he mingles with a demon who lies in wait to deceive a human being.[28]

27 Apuleius' Apology (Defense on a Charge of Magic), delivered in North Africa around AD 158–159 before the Roman proconsul.
28 The human being who banishes the poets is Plato, in his Republic.

WHETHER THE GODS USE DEMONS AS MESSENGERS AND INTERPRETERS, AND WHETHER THEY DO NOT KNOW OR DO NOT MIND THAT THEY ARE DECEIVED BY THEM

Augustine shows that every account of demons as messengers to the gods dishonors the gods.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.21	Sed nimirum tantae huius absurditatis et indignitatis est magna necessitas, quod scilicet deos aetherios humana curantes quid terrestres homines agerent utique lateret, nisi daemones aerii nuntiarent; quoniam aether longe a terra est alteque suspensus, aer uero aetheri terraeque contiguus, o mirabilem sapientiam! Quid aliud de dis isti sentiunt, quos omnes optimos uolunt, nisi eos et humana curare, ne cultu uideantur indigni, et propter elementorum distantiam humana nescire, ut credantur daemones necessarii et ob hoc etiam ipsi putentur colendi, per quos di possint et quid in rebus humanis agatur addiscere et ubi oportet hominibus subuenire?	But no doubt there is a great necessity behind such absurdity and indignity. It is this: the ethereal gods, who care for human affairs, would surely not know what earthly human beings were doing unless the airy demons reported it, since the ether is far from the earth and hangs high above it, while the air touches both ether and earth. What marvelous wisdom! What else do these people think about the gods, whom they want to be all supremely good? They want them to care for human affairs, so that they may not seem unworthy of worship. And they want them, because of the distance between the elements, not to know human affairs, so that demons may be believed necessary and on that account may themselves be thought worthy of worship, since through them the gods can learn what is happening in human affairs and where they ought to come to the aid of human beings.
	Hoc si ita est, dis istis bonis magis notus est daemon per corpus uicinum quam homo per animum bonum, o multum dolenda necessitas, an potius inridenda uel detestanda uanitas, ne sit uana diuinitas! Si enim animo ab obstaculo corporis libero animum nostrum uidere di possunt, non ad hoc indigent daemonibus nuntiis; si autem animorum indicia corporalia, qualia sunt locutio uultus motus, per corpus suum aetherii di sentiunt et inde colligunt quid etiam daemones nuntient, possunt et mendaciis daemonum decipi. Porro si deorum diuinitas a daemonibus non potest falli, eadem diuinitate quod agimus non potest ignorari.	If this is so, a demon is better known to these good gods through the nearness of its body than a human being is through the goodness of his mind. What a lamentable necessity! Or rather, what a ridiculous or detestable vanity, devised so that divinity should not be in vain! For if the gods, with a mind free from the obstacle of the body, can see our mind, they do not need demons as messengers for this. But suppose the ethereal gods perceive the bodily signs of minds, such as speech, facial expression and movement, through their own bodies, and from these gather what the demons too report. Then they can also be deceived by the demons' lies. Again, if the divinity of the gods cannot be deceived by demons, then neither can what we do remain unknown to that same divinity.
	Vellem autem mihi isti dicerent, utrum dis daemones nuntiauerint de criminibus deorum poetica Platoni displicere figmenta et sibi ea placere celauerint, an utrumque occultauerint deosque esse maluerint totius rei huius ignaros, an utrumque indicauerint, et religiosam erga deos Platonis prudentiam et in deos iniuriosam libidinem suam, an sententiam quidem Platonis, qua noluit deos per inpiam licentiam poetarum falsis criminibus infamari, ignotam dis esse uoluerint,	But I should like these people to tell me which of the following happened. Did the demons report to the gods that the poets' fictions about the gods' crimes displeased Plato, while concealing that they themselves enjoyed them? Or did they hide both, preferring the gods to be ignorant of this whole affair? Or did they disclose both, Plato's reverent prudence toward the gods and their own lust suam uero nequitiam, qua ludos scaenicos amant, quibus illa deorum dedecora celebrantur, prodere non erubuerint uel timuerint. Horum quattuor, quae interrogando proposui, quodlibet eligant et in quolibet eorum quantum mali de dis bonis opinentur adtendant.

LATIN

Si enim primum elegerint, confessuri sunt non licuisse dis bonis habitare cum bono Platone, quando eorum iniurias prohibebat, et habitasse cum daemonibus malis, quando eorum iniuriis exultabant, cum di boni hominem bonum longe a se positum non nisi per malos daemones nossent, quos uicinos nosse non possent. Si autem secundum elegerint et utrumque occultatum a daemonibus dixerint, ut di omnino nescirent et Platonis religiosissimam legem et daemonum sacrilegam delectationem: quid in rebus humanis per internuntios daemones di nosse utiliter possunt, quando illa nesciunt, quae in honorem bonorum deorum religione bonorum hominum contra libidinem malorum daemonum decernuntur?

Si uero tertium elegerint et non solum sententiam Platonis deorum iniurias prohibentem, sed etiam daemonum nequitiam deorum iniuriis exultantem per eosdem daemones nuntios dis innotuisse responderint: hoc nuntiare est an insultare? et di utrumque sic audiunt, sic utrumque cognoscunt, ut non solum malignos daemones deorum dignitati et Platonis religioni contraria cupientes adque facientes a suo accessu non arceant, uerum etiam per illos malos propinquos Platoni bono longinquo dona transmittant? sic enim eos elementorum quasi catenata series conligauit, ut illis, a quibus criminantur, coniungi possint, huic, a quo defenduntur, non possint, utrumque scientes, sed aeris et terrae transmutare pondera non ualentes. Iam, quod reliquum est, si quartum elegerint, peius est ceteris.

ENGLISH

that does the gods injury? Or did they want Plato's opinion to remain unknown to the gods, the opinion by which he refused to let the gods be defamed with false crimes through the impious license of the poets, while they were neither ashamed nor afraid to reveal their own wickedness, by which they love the theatrical shows that celebrate those disgraces of the gods? Of these four options, which I have put forward as questions, let them choose whichever they like. And whichever it is, let them notice how much evil they are thinking of the good gods.

For if they choose the first, they will have to confess that the good gods were not permitted to dwell with the good Plato, when he was forbidding the injuries done to them, but did dwell with the evil demons, when these were exulting in those injuries. For the good gods knew the good man, placed far from them, only through the evil demons, while they could not know the demons themselves, near as they were. But if they choose the second, and say that both things were concealed by the demons, so that the gods knew nothing at all either of Plato's most reverent law or of the demons' sacrilegious delight, what can the gods usefully know of human affairs through demons as go-betweens? They do not know even the measures decreed by the religion of good men in honor of the good gods against the lust of evil demons.

If, however, they choose the third, they will reply that through these same demons as messengers the gods were informed both of Plato's opinion forbidding injuries to the gods and of the demons' wickedness exulting in those injuries. But is this reporting, or insulting? And do the gods hear both and know both in such a way that they not only fail to keep these malignant demons from their presence, who desire and do things contrary to the gods' dignity and to Plato's reverence, but even send gifts to the good Plato, far away, through those wicked neighbors? For a kind of chain of the elements has bound them in such a way that they can be joined to those who slander them, but not to the one who defends them. They know both, yet they cannot shift the weight of air and earth. Now, as for what remains: if they choose the fourth, it is worse than the others.

LATIN

Quis enim ferat, si poetarum de dis inmortalibus criminosa figmenta et theatrorum indigna ludibria suamque in his omnibus ardentissimam cupiditatem et suauissimam uoluptatem dis daemones nuntiauerunt, et quod Plato philosophica grauitate de optima re publica haec omnia censuit remouenda tacuerunt; ut iam di boni per tales nuntios nosse cogantur mala pessimorum, nec aliena, sed eorundem nuntiorum, adque his contraria non sinantur nosse bona philosophorum, cum illa sint in iniuriam, ista in honorem ipsorum deorum?

ENGLISH

For who could bear the following? The demons reported to the gods the poets' slanderous fictions about the immortal gods, the shameful mockeries of the theaters, and their own most ardent craving and sweetest pleasure in all these things. But they kept silent about the fact that Plato, with philosophical seriousness, judged that all these things should be removed from the best commonwealth. So the good gods are compelled to learn, through such messengers, the evils of the very worst beings, and these are not someone else's evils but those of the messengers themselves. Yet they are not allowed to learn the opposite goods of the philosophers, though the former are an injury, and the latter an honor, to the gods themselves.

REJECTING THE WORSHIP OF DEMONS, AGAINST APULEIUS

Demons are not mediators but proud, envious spirits cast down into the air.

LATIN

8.22 Quia igitur nihil istorum quattuor eligendum est, ne in quolibet eorum de dis tam male sentiatur, restat, ut nullo modo credendum sit, quod Apuleius persuadere nititur et quicumque alii sunt eiusdem sententiae philosophi, ita esse medios daemones inter deos et homines tamquam internuntios et interpretes, qui hinc ferant petitiones nostras, inde referant deorum subpetias; sed esse spiritus nocendi cupidissimos, a iustitia penitus alienos, superbia tumidos, inuidentia liuidos, fallacia callidos, qui in hoc quidem aere habitant, quia de caeli superioris sublimitate deiecti merito inregressibilis transgressionis in hoc sibi congruo uelut carcere praedamnati sunt; nec tamen, quia supra terras et aquas aeri locus est, ideo et ipsi sunt meritis superiores hominibus, qui eos non terreno corpore, sed electo in auxilium Deo uero pia mente facillime superant.

Sed multis plane participatione uerae religionis indignis tamquam captis subditisque dominantur, quorum maximae parti mirabilibus et fallacibus signis siue factorum siue praedictorum deos se esse persuaserunt. Quibusdam uero uitia eorum aliquanto adtentius et diligentius intuentibus non potuerunt persuadere quod di sint, adque inter deos et homines internuntios ac

ENGLISH

Since, then, none of these four should be chosen, for each would lead to so bad an opinion of the gods, it remains that we must in no way believe what Apuleius, and any other philosophers of the same view, strive to persuade us. They claim that demons stand between gods and human beings as go-betweens and interpreters, carrying our petitions from here and bringing back the gods' help from there. On the contrary, they are spirits most eager to do harm, utterly alien to justice, swollen with pride, livid with envy, cunning in deceit. They do indeed dwell in this air, because they were cast down from the heights of the higher heaven. As they deserved for a transgression from which there is no return, they have been condemned in advance to this region as to a prison suited to them. Yet the air lies above land and water, and it does not follow from this that they are superior in merit to human beings. For human beings overcome them with the greatest ease, not by an earthly body, but by a devout mind, once they have chosen the true God as their helper.

But they plainly rule, as over captives and subjects, many who are unworthy of sharing in the true religion. The greater part of these they have persuaded that they are gods, by wondrous and deceptive signs, whether deeds or predictions. Some people, however, examined their vices somewhat more attentively and carefully, and beneficiorum inpetratores se esse finxerunt; si tamen non istum saltem honorem homines eis deferendum putarunt, qui illos nec deos esse credebant, quia malos uidebant, deos autem omnes bonos uolebant, nec audebant tamen omnino indignos dicere honore diuino, maxime ne offenderent populos, a quibus eis cernebant inueterata superstitione per tot sacra et templa seruiri.	these the demons could not persuade that they are gods. So they pretended to be go-betweens between gods and human beings, and obtainers of benefits. Unless, indeed, it was these people themselves who thought that this honor, at least, should be paid to them. They did not believe the demons to be gods, because they saw that they were evil, and they wanted all gods to be good. Yet they did not dare to call them altogether unworthy of divine honor, chiefly so as not to offend the peoples, who, as they saw, served the demons with so many rites and temples out of long-ingrained superstition.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

WHAT HERMES TRISMEGISTUS THOUGHT ABOUT IDOLATRY, AND HOW HE COULD HAVE KNOWN THAT THE SUPERSTITIONS OF EGYPT WOULD BE ABOLISHED

Hermes Trismegistus says humans make gods by binding spirits to statues, and laments their coming end.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.23	Nam diuersa de illis Hermes Aegyptius, quem Trismegistum uocant, sensit et scripsit. Apuleius enim deos quidem illos negat; sed cum dicit ita inter deos et homines quadam medietate uersari, ut hominibus aput ipsos deos necessarii uideantur, cultum eorum a supernorum deorum religione non separat. Ille autem Aegyptius alios deos esse dicit a summo Deo factos, alios ab hominibus. Hoc qui audit, sicut a me positum est, putat dici de simulacris, quia opera sunt manuum hominum; at ille uisibilia et contrectabilia simulacra uelut corpora deorum esse adserit; inesse autem his quosdam spiritus inuitatos, qui ualeant aliquid siue ad nocendum siue ad desideria nonnulla conplenda eorum, a quibus eis diuini honores et cultus obsequia deferuntur.	For Hermes the Egyptian, whom they call Trismegistus, thought and wrote differently about them. Apuleius, to be sure, denies that they are gods. But when he says that they occupy a kind of middle position between gods and human beings, so that human beings seem to need them before the gods themselves, he does not separate their worship from the religion of the gods above. That Egyptian, however, says that some gods were made by the supreme God and others by human beings. Anyone who hears this, as I have stated it, supposes it is said of images, because they are the works of human hands. But he asserts that visible and tangible images are, as it were, the bodies of gods. Within them, he says, dwell certain spirits who have been invited in. These spirits have some power, either to do harm or to fulfill some of the desires of those who pay them divine honors and the services of worship.[29]
	Hos ergo spiritus inuisibiles per artem quandam uisibilibus rebus corporalis materiae copulare, ut sint quasi animata corpora illis spiritibus dicata et subdita simulacra, hoc esse dicit deos facere eamque magnam et mirabilem deos faciendi accepisse homines potestatem. Huius Aegyptii uerba, sicut in nostram linguam interpretata sunt, ponam. Et quoniam de cognatione, inquit, et consortio hominum deorumque nobis indicitur sermo, potestatem hominis, o Asclepi, uimque cognosce.	So, by a certain art, human beings join these invisible spirits to visible things of bodily matter, so that the images dedicated and subjected to these spirits become, as it were, animated bodies. This, he says, is making gods, and human beings have received this great and wonderful power of making gods. I will set down this Egyptian's words as they have been translated into our language. "And 29 Hermes Trismegistus ("thrice-greatest") was a legendary Egyptian sage. Augustine quotes the Asclepius, a Latin dialogue attributed to him.

LATIN

Dominus, inquit, et Pater uel quod est summum Deus ut effector est deorum caelestium, ita homo fictor est deorum, qui in templis sunt humana proximitate contenti.

Et paulo post: Ita humanitas, inquit, semper memor naturae et originis suae in illa diuinitatis imitatione perseuerat, ut, sicuti Pater ac Dominus, ut sui similes essent, deos fecit aeternos, ita humanitas deos suos ex sui uultus similitudine figuraret. Hic cum Asclepius, ad quem maxime loquebatur, ei respondisset adque dixisset: Statuas dicis, o Trismegiste? tum ille: Statuas, inquit, o Asclepi, uides quatenus tu ipse diffidas; statuas animatas sensu et spiritu plenas tantaque facientes et talia, statuas futurorum praescias eaque sorte uate somniis multisque aliis rebus praedicentes, inbecillitates hominibus facientes easque curantes, tristitiam laetitiamque pro meritis. An ignoras, o Asclepi, quod Aegyptus imago sit caeli, aut, quod est uerius, translatio aut descensio omnium quae gubernantur adque exercentur in caelo.

Ac si dicendum est uerius, terra nostra mundi totius est templum. Et tamen quoniam praescire cuncta prudentem decet, istud uos ignorare fas non est: Futurum tempus est, quo appareat Aegyptios incassum pia mente diuinitatem sedula religione seruasse.

Deinde multis uerbis Hermes hunc locum exequitur, in quo uidetur hoc tempus praedicere, quo Christiana religio, quanto est ueracior adque sanctior, tanto uehementius et liberius cuncta fallacia figmenta subuertit, ut gratia uerissimi Saluatoris liberet hominem ab eis dis, quos facit homo, et ei Deo subdat, a quo factus est homo. Sed Hermes cum ista praedicit, uelut amicus eisdem ludificationibus daemonum loquitur, nec Christianum nomen euidenter exprimit, sed tamquam ea tollerentur adque delerentur, quorum obseruatione caelestis similitudo custodiretur in Aegypto, ita haec futura deplorans luctuosa quodam modo praedicatione testatur.

ENGLISH

since," he says, "we are called upon to speak of the kinship and fellowship of human beings and gods, learn, Asclepius, the power and strength of man. Just as the Lord and Father," he says, "or God, the highest, is the maker of the heavenly gods, so man is the fashioner of the gods who dwell in temples, content to be near to human beings."[30]

And a little later: "So humanity," he says, "ever mindful of its nature and origin, persists in that imitation of divinity. Just as the Father and Lord made the gods eternal, so that they might be like him, so humanity fashioned its own gods in the likeness of its own features." Here Asclepius, to whom he was chiefly speaking, answered him and said, "Do you mean statues, Trismegistus?" Then Hermes said: "Statues, Asclepius? See how far even you lack faith! I mean statues alive with sense and full of spirit, which do such great and such marvelous things. I mean statues that foreknow the future and predict it by lot, by a seer, by dreams and by many other means. They cause illnesses in human beings and cure them, and they bring sorrow and joy according to what people deserve. Do you not know, Asclepius, that Egypt is an image of heaven? Or, to speak more truly, it is a transfer or descent of everything that is governed and carried out in heaven.

And if it must be said more truly still, our land is the temple of the whole world. And yet, since a wise man ought to know all things in advance, it is not right for you to be ignorant of this: a time is coming when it will be seen that the Egyptians kept up the worship of the divine with devout minds and diligent religion, and all in vain."

Hermes then pursues this passage at great length. In it he seems to foretell this present time, when the Christian religion, the truer and holier it is, the more forcefully and freely it overturns all deceitful fictions. So, by the grace of the truest Savior, it frees man from the gods that man makes and subjects him to the God who made man. But when Hermes foretells these things, he speaks as a friend of those same mockeries of the demons, and he does not plainly mention the Christian name. Instead, he laments these future events as though the things whose observance preserved 30 Asclepius 23. Asclepius is Hermes' disciple and partner in the dialogue.

LATIN

Erat enim de his, de quibus dicit apostolus, quod cognoscentes Deum non sicut Deum glorificauerunt aut gratias egerunt, sed euanuerunt in cogitationibus suis, et obscuratum est insipiens cor eorum; dicentes enim se esse sapientes stulti facti sunt et inmutauerunt gloriam incorrupti Dei in similitudinem imaginis corruptibilis hominis et cetera, quae commemorare longum est.

Multa quippe talia dicit de uno uero Deo fabricatore mundi, qualia ueritas habet; et nescio quo modo illa obscuratione cordis ad ista delabitur, ut dis, quos confitetur ab hominibus fieri, semper uelit homines subdi et haec futuro tempore plangat auferri quasi quicquam sit infelicius homine, cui sua figmenta dominantur; cum sit facilius, ut tamquam deos colendo, quos fecit, nec ipse sit homo, quam ut per eius cultum di possint esse, quos fecit homo. Citius enim fit, ut homo in honore positus pecoribus non intellegens conparetur, quam ut operi Dei ad eius imaginem facto, id est ipsi homini, opus hominis praeferatur. Quapropter merito homo deficit ab illo qui eum fecit, cum sibi praeficit ipse quod fecit.

Haec uana deceptoria, perniciosa sacrilega Hermes Aegyptius, quia tempus, quo auferrentur, uenturum sciebat, dolebat; sed tam inpudenter dolebat, quam inprudenter sciebat. Non enim haec ei reuelauerat sanctus Spiritus, sicut prophetis sanctis, qui haec praeuidentes cum exultatione dicebant: Si faciet homo deos, et ecce ipsi non sunt di; et alio loco: Erit in illo die, dicit Dominus, exterminabo nomina simulacrorum a terra, et non iam erit eorum memoria; proprie uero de Aegypto, quod ad hanc rem adtinet, ita sanctus Esaias prophetat: Et mouebuntur manufacta Aegypti a facie eius, et cor eorum uincetur in eis, et cetera huius modi.

ENGLISH

the likeness of heaven in Egypt were being taken away and destroyed. So he bears witness to them in a kind of mournful prophecy.

For he was one of those of whom the apostle says that, "although they knew God, they did not glorify him as God or give thanks, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened. For claiming to be wise, they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of an image of corruptible man," and the rest, which would take too long to recount.

For he says many things about the one true God, maker of the world, which agree with the truth. Yet somehow, through that darkening of the heart, he slides into these errors. He wants human beings always to be subject to gods that he admits are made by human beings, and he laments that these will be taken away at a future time. It is as if anything could be more unhappy than a human being ruled by his own fictions. In fact, it is easier for a man who worships as gods the things he has made to cease to be a man himself than for the things man has made to become gods through his worship. For it happens more quickly that "man, placed in honor, without understanding, is compared to the beasts" than that the work of man should be preferred to the work of God made in his image, that is, to man himself. So man rightly falls away from the one who made him when he places over himself what he himself has made.[31]

These empty, deceptive, pernicious, sacrilegious things Hermes the Egyptian lamented, because he knew that a time was coming when they would be taken away. But his lament was as shameless as his knowledge was unwise. For the Holy Spirit had not revealed these things to him as he had to the holy prophets. They foresaw them and spoke of them with exultation: "If a man makes gods, behold, they are not gods." And in another place: "It shall be in that day, says the Lord, I will wipe out the names of the idols from the earth, and there shall be no more memory of them." And on Egypt in particular, as concerns this matter, the holy Isaiah prophesies thus: "And the things made by hand in Egypt shall be shaken at his presence, and their

31 Psalm 48:13 (49:12 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	heart shall be overcome within them," and other things of this kind.[32]
Ex quo genere et illi erant, qui uenturum quod sciebant uenisse gaudebant; qualis Symeon, qualis Anna, qui mox natum Iesum, qualis Elisabeth, quae etiam conceptum in Spiritu agnouit; qualis Petrus reuelante Patre dicens: Tu es Christus, filius Dei uiui. Huic autem Aegyptio illi spiritus indicauerant futura tempora perditionis suae, qui etiam praesenti in carne Domino trementes dixerunt: Quid uenisti ante tempus perdere nos?	Of this kind too were those who rejoiced that what they knew was coming had come. Simeon and Anna were such people, for they recognized Jesus as soon as he was born. So was Elizabeth, who recognized him in the Spirit when he had only been conceived. So was Peter, who said, by the Father's revelation, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." But to this Egyptian the times of their destruction had been revealed by those spirits who trembled before the Lord when he was present in the flesh and said: "Why have you come before the time to destroy us?"[33]
siue quia subitum illis fuit, quod futurum quidem, sed tardius opinabantur, siue quia perditionem suam hanc ipsam dicebant, qua fiebat ut cogniti spernerentur, et hoc erat ante tempus, id est ante tempus iudicii, quo aeterna damnatione puniendi sunt cum omnibus etiam hominibus, qui eorum societate detinentur, sicut religio loquitur, quae nec fallit nec fallitur, non sicut iste quasi omni uento doctrinae hinc adque inde perflatus et falsis uera permiscens dolet quasi perituram religionem, quem postea confitetur errorem.	They said this either because it came on them suddenly, since they thought it would indeed happen, but later, or because they called this very thing their destruction: that once they were recognized, they would be despised. And this was "before the time," that is, before the time of judgment, when they are to be punished with eternal damnation together with all the human beings who are held fast in their fellowship. So speaks religion, which neither deceives nor is deceived. This man does not speak so. Blown about this way and that by every wind of doctrine, and mixing the true with the false, he laments as a religion about to perish what he later confesses to be error.[34]

HOW HERMES OPENLY ADMITTED THE ERROR OF HIS FOREFATHERS, YET LAMENTED THAT IT WOULD BE DESTROYED

Hermes admits that gods were made through his ancestors' great error and unbelief.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.24 Post multa enim ad hoc ipsum redit, ut iterum dicat de dis, quos homines fecerunt, ita loquens: Sed iam de talibus sint satis dicta talia. Iterum, inquit, ad hominem rationemque redeamus, ex quo diuino dono animal dictum est rationale. Minus enim miranda etsi miranda sunt, quae de homine dicta sunt. Omnium enim mirabilium uicit admirationem, quod homo diuinam potuit inuenire naturam eamque efficere. Quoniam ergo proaui nostri multum errabant circa deorum rationem increduli et non animaduertentes ad cultum religionemque diuinam, inuenerunt artem, qua efficerent deos.	After much else, he comes back to this very point and speaks again of the gods whom human beings have made. He puts it this way: "But enough has now been said about such matters. Let us return," he says, "to man and to reason, the divine gift on account of which man has been called a rational animal. The things that have been said about man are less wonderful, though they are wonderful. What surpasses the wonder of all marvels is that man has been able to discover the divine nature and to produce it. Our forefathers were greatly in 32 Jeremiah 16:20; Zechariah 13:2; Isaiah 19:1.

33 Luke 2:25–38 (Simeon and Anna); Luke 1:41–45 (Elizabeth); Matthew 16:16–17 (Peter); Matthew 8:29 (the demons).
34 "Every wind of doctrine" echoes Ephesians 4:14.

LATIN

ENGLISH

error about the nature of the gods. They were unbelieving and paid no attention to worship and divine religion. Therefore they discovered an art by which to make gods."

Cui inuentae adiunxerunt uirtutem de mundi natura conuenientem, eamque miscentes, quoniam animas facere non poterant, euocantes animas daemonum uel angelorum eas indiderunt imaginibus sanctis diuinisque mysteriis, per quas idola et bene faciendi et male uires habere potuissent., Nescio utrum sic confiterentur ipsi daemones adiurati, quo modo iste confessus est. Quoniam, inquit, proaui nostri multum errrabant circa deorum rationem increduli et non animaduertentes ad cultum religionemque diuinam, inuenerunt artem qua efficerent deos. Numquidnam saltem mediocriter eos dixit errasse, ut hanc artem inuenirent faciendi deos, aut contentus fuit dicere: Errabant, nisi adderet et diceret: Multum errabant? Iste ergo multus error et incredulitas non animaduertentium ad cultum religionemque diuinam inuenit artem, qua efficeret deos.

"To this discovery they joined a power drawn from the nature of the world and suited to it. Mixing this in, since they could not make souls, they called up the souls of demons or of angels and placed them in sacred images and divine mysteries, so that through these souls the idols might have the power both to do good and to do harm." I do not know whether the demons themselves, if they were adjured, would confess as much as he has confessed. "Since," he says, "our forefathers were greatly in error about the nature of the gods, unbelieving and paying no attention to worship and divine religion, they discovered an art by which to make gods." Did he say that they erred only moderately when they discovered this art of making gods? Or was he content to say "They were in error," without adding "They were greatly in error"? So it was this great error, and the unbelief of people paying no attention to worship and divine religion, that discovered the art by which to make gods.

Et tamen quod multus error et incredulitas et a cultu ac religione diuina auersio animi inuenit, ut homo arte faceret deos, hoc dolet uir sapiens tamquam religionem diuinam uenturo certo tempore auferri. Vide si non et ui diuina maiorum suorum errorem praeteritum prodere, et ui diabolica poenam daemonum futuram dolere conpellitur. Si enim proaui eorum multum errando circa deorum rationem incredulitate et auersione animi a cultu ac religione diuina inuenerunt artem, qua efficerent deos: quid mirum, si, haec ars detestanda quidquid fecit auersa a religione diuina, aufertur religione diuina, cum ueritas emendat errorem, fides redarguit incredulitatem, conuersio corrigit auersionem?

And yet this was discovered by great error and unbelief and the mind's turning away from worship and divine religion: that man should make gods by art. This is what the wise man laments, as though divine religion were going to be taken away at a fixed time to come. See whether he is not compelled by divine power to reveal the past error of his ancestors, and by diabolical power to lament the future punishment of the demons. Suppose their forefathers, by erring greatly about the nature of the gods, through unbelief and the mind's turning away from worship and divine religion, discovered an art by which to make gods. Then what wonder is it if whatever this detestable art produced, in its turning away from divine religion, is taken away by divine religion? For truth corrects error, faith refutes unbelief, and turning back sets right the turning away.

Si enim tacitis causis dixisset proauos suos inuenisse artem, qua facerent deos: nostrum fuit utique, si quid rectum piumque saperemus, adtendere et uidere nequaquam illos ad hanc artem peruenturos fuisse, qua homo deos facit, si a ueritate non aberrarent, si ea, quae Deo digna sunt, crederent, si animum aduerterent ad

Suppose he had said that his forefathers discovered an art by which to make gods, and had kept silent about the causes. Then it would surely have been our task, if we had any sense of what is right and godly, to take note and see the following.

LATIN

cultum religionemque diuinam; et tamen si causas artis huius nos diceremus multum errorem hominum et incredulitatem et animi errantis adque infidelis a diuina religione auersionem, utcumque ferenda esset inpudentia resistentium ueritati.

ENGLISH

They would never have arrived at this art by which man makes gods if they had not strayed from the truth, if they had believed what is worthy of God, if they had paid attention to worship and divine religion. And yet if it were we who named the causes of this art as the great error of human beings, and unbelief, and the turning away of an erring and faithless mind from divine religion, the impudence of those who resist the truth would have to be endured somehow.

Cum uero idem ipse, qui potestatem huius artis super omnia cetera miratur in homine, qua illi deos facere concessum est, et dolet uenturum esse tempus, quo haec omnia deorum figmenta ab hominibus instituta etiam legibus iubeantur auferri, confitetur tamen adque exprimit causas, quare ad ista peruentum sit, dicens proauos suos multo errore et incredulitate et animum non aduertendo ad cultum religionemque diuinam inuenisse hanc artem, qua facerent deos: nos quid oportet dicere, uel potius quid agere nisi quantas possumus gratias Domino Deo nostro, qui haec contrariis causis, quam instituta sunt, abstulit?

But the facts are these. This same man admires the power of this art in man above all else, the power by which man has been granted to make gods. He laments that a time will come when all these fictitious gods set up by human beings will even be ordered by law to be removed. Yet he confesses and states plainly the causes that led to all this. He says that his forefathers discovered this art of making gods through great error and unbelief, and by paying no attention to worship and divine religion. What, then, ought we to say? Or rather, what ought we to do, except give all the thanks we can to the Lord our God, who has removed these things by causes contrary to those by which they were established?

Nam quod instituit multitudo erroris, abstulit uia ueritatis; quod instituit incredulitas, abstulit fides; quod instituit a cultu diuinae religionis auersio, abstulit ad unum uerum Deum sanctumque conuersio; nec in sola Aegypto, quam solam in isto plangit daemonum spiritus, sed in omni terra, quae cantat Domino canticum nouum, sicut uere sacrae et uere propheticae litterae praenuntiarunt, ubi scriptum est: Cantate Domino canticum nouum, cantate Domino omnis terra. Titulus quippe psalmi huius est: Quando domus aedificabatur post captiuitatem. Aedificatur enim domus Domino ciuitas Dei, quae est sancta ecclesia, in omni terra post eam captiuitatem, qua illos homines, de quibus credentibus in Deum tamquam lapidibus uiuis domus aedificatur, captos daemonia possidebant.

What the abundance of error established, the way of truth removed. What unbelief established, faith removed. What the turning away from the worship of divine religion established, the turning toward the one true and holy God removed. And this happened not only in Egypt, the only land that the spirit of demons laments through him, but in all the earth, which sings to the Lord a new song. So the truly sacred and truly prophetic writings foretold, where it is written: "Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth." Indeed the title of this psalm is: "When the house was being built after the captivity." For a house is being built for the Lord in all the earth: the city of God, which is the holy Church. It is built after that captivity in which demons held captive and possessed the very people of whom, as they believe in God, the house is built as of living stones.[35] 35 Psalm 95:1 (96:1 in most English Bibles). The title appears in the Greek and Latin versions. "Living stones" echoes 1 Peter 2:5.

IDOLS AND THE DEMONS IN THEM

Worshipers of man-made gods fell captive to demons, from whom the Church is now set free.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Neque enim, quia deos homo faciebat, ideo non ab eis possidebatur ipse qui fecerat, quando in eorum societatem colendo traducebatur; societatem dico, non idolorum stolidorum, sed uersutorum daemoniorum. Nam quid sunt idola, nisi quod eadem scriptura dicit: Oculos habent, et non uidebunt, et quidquid tale de materiis licet adfabre effigiatis, tamen uita sensuque carentibus dicendum fuit. Sed inmundi spiritus eisdem simulacris arte illa nefaria conligati cultorum suorum animas in suam societatem redigendo miserabiliter captiuauerant. Unde dicit apostolus: Scimus quia nihil est idolum; sed quae immolant gentes, daemoniis immolant, et non Deo; nolo uos socios fieri daemoniorum.	For it was not the case that the man who made the gods was not himself possessed by them, simply because he had made them. By worshiping them he was drawn into fellowship with them: fellowship, I mean, not with stupid idols but with cunning demons. For what are idols but what the same Scripture says: "They have eyes, and they will not see"? Whatever else of that kind had to be said of materials which, however skillfully shaped, still lack life and sensation. But the unclean spirits, bound to those same images by that wicked art, had wretchedly taken captive the souls of their worshipers by drawing them into fellowship with themselves. Hence the apostle says: "We know that an idol is nothing; but what the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God. I do not want you to become partners with demons."[36]
Post hanc ergo captiuitatem, qua homines a malignis daemonibus tenebantur, Dei domus aedificatur in omni terra; unde titulum ille psalmus accepit, ubi dicitur: Cantate Domino canticum nouum, cantate Domino omnis terra. Cantate Domino, benedicite nomen eius, bene nuntiate diem ex die salutare eius. Adnuntiate in gentibus gloriam eius, in omnibus populis mirabilia eius; quoniam magnus Dominus et laudabilis nimis, terribilis est super omnes deos. Quia omnes di gentium daemonia, dominus autem caelos fecit.	So it is after this captivity, in which human beings were held by evil demons, that the house of God is being built in all the earth. That is where the psalm got its title, the psalm in which it is said: "Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth. Sing to the Lord, bless his name; proclaim the good news of his salvation day after day. Announce his glory among the nations, his wonders among all peoples. For the Lord is great and exceedingly to be praised; he is to be feared above all gods. For all the gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens."
Qui ergo doluit uenturum fuisse tempus, quo auferretur cultus idolorum et in eos, qui colerent, dominatio daemoniorum, malo spiritu instigatus semper uolebat istam captiuitatem manere, qua transacta psalmus canit aedificari domum in omni terra. Praenuntiabat illa Hermes dolendo; praenuntiabat haec propheta gaudendo. Et quia Spiritus uictor est, qui haec per sanctos prophetas canebat, etiam Hermes ipse ea, quae nolebat et dolebat auferri, non a prudentibus et fidelibus et religiosis, sed ab errantibus et incredulis et a cultu diuinae religionis auersis esse instituta miris modis coactus est confiteri.	The man who lamented that a time was going to come when the worship of idols would be taken away, together with the demons' domination over their worshipers, was prompted by an evil spirit. He wanted this captivity to last forever, the captivity at whose end, as the psalm sings, the house is built in all the earth. Hermes foretold the one with lamentation; the prophet foretold the other with rejoicing. And the Spirit who sang these things through the holy prophets is the victor. So even Hermes himself was compelled, in wonderful ways, to confess something about the things he did not want taken away and lamented to see removed. They had been established, he admitted, not by the prudent, the faithful and the religious, but by people who were in error, unbelieving and turned away from the worship of divine religion.

36 Psalm 113 (115:5 in most English Bibles); 1 Corinthians 8:4 and 10:19–20.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Qui quamuis eos appellet deos, tamen cum dicit a talibus hominibus factos, quales esse utique non debemus, uelit nolit, ostendit colendos non esse ab eis, qui tales non sunt, quales fuerunt a quibus facti sunt, hoc est a prudentibus, fidelibus, religiosis; simul etiam demonstrans ipsos homines, qui eos fecerunt, sibimet inportasse, ut eos haberent deos, qui non erant di. Verum est quippe illud propheticum: Si faciet homo deos, et ecce ipsi non sunt di.

He calls them gods. Yet he says they were made by the kind of people we certainly ought not to be. In saying so he shows, whether he likes it or not, that they are not to be worshiped by those who are unlike the people who made them, that is, by the prudent, the faithful and the religious. At the same time he also shows that the very people who made them brought it on themselves to have as gods beings that were not gods. For that prophetic saying is true: "If man makes gods, look, they are not gods."[37]

Deos ergo tales, talium deos, arte factos a talibus, cum appellasset Hermes, id est idolis daemones per artem nescio quam cupiditatum suarum uinculis inligatos cum appellaret factos ab hominibus deos, non tamen eis dedit, quod Platonicus Apuleius (unde iam satis diximus et quam sit inconueniens absurdumque monstrauimus), ut ipsi essent interpretes et intercessores inter deos, quos fecit Deus, et homines, quos idem fecit Deus; hinc adferentes uota, inde munera referentes. Nimis enim stultum est credere deos, quos fecerunt homines, plus ualere aput deos, quos fecit Deus, quam ualent ipsi homines, quos idem ipse fecit Deus. Daemon quippe simulacro arte inpia conligatus ab homine factus est deus, sed tali homini, non omni homini.

So Hermes called such gods, the gods of such people, made by art by such people, gods made by human beings. That is, he gave that name to demons bound to idols, by some art or other, with the chains of their own cravings. Yet he did not grant them what the Platonist Apuleius granted. We have already said enough about him and shown how unfitting and absurd his view is. Apuleius made them interpreters and intercessors between the gods whom God made and the human beings whom the same God made, carrying prayers from one side and bringing back gifts from the other. It is utterly foolish to believe that gods whom human beings made have more influence with the gods whom God made than human beings themselves have, whom the same God made. A demon bound to an image by an impious art has indeed been made a god by a man, but a god for such a man, not for every man.

Qualis est ergo iste deus, quem non faceret homo nisi errans et incredulus et auersus a uero Deo? Porro si daemones, qui coluntur in templis, per artem nescio quam imaginibus inditi, hoc est uisibilibus simulacris, ab eis hominibus, qui hac arte fecerunt deos, cum aberrarent auersique essent a cultu et religione diuina, non sunt internuntii nec interpretes inter homines et deos et propter suos pessimos ac turpissimos moros, et quod homines, quamuis errantes et increduli et auersi a cultu ac religione diuina, tamen eis sine dubio meliores sunt, quos deos ipsi arte fecerunt; restat, ut, quod possunt, tamquam daemones possint, uel quasi beneficia

What sort of god, then, is this, whom no man would make unless he were in error, unbelieving and turned away from the true God? Consider the demons worshiped in temples. By some art or other they were placed in images, that is, in visible statues, by the people who made gods by this art when they had strayed and turned away from worship and divine religion. Suppose these demons are not messengers or interpreters between human beings and gods. There are two reasons for this. One is their wicked and utterly shameful character. The other is that human beings, even in 37 Jeremiah 16:20.

LATIN	ENGLISH
praestando magis nocentes, quia magis decipientes, uel aperte malefaciendo (nec tamen quodlibet horum, nisi quando permittuntur alta et secreta Dei prouidentia), non autem tamquam medii inter homines et deos per amicitiam deorum multum aput homines ualeant.	error, unbelieving and turned away from worship and divine religion, are without doubt better than those whom they themselves made gods by art. Then it remains that whatever power they have, they have as demons. They may do more harm by seeming to bestow benefits, because they deceive more. Or they may do harm openly. Yet they can do neither of these except when permitted by the deep and secret providence of God. But they do not have great influence with human beings as intermediaries between human beings and gods through friendship with the gods.
Hi enim dis bonis, quos sanctos angelos nos uocamus rationalesque creaturas sanctae caelestis habitationis siue sedes siue dominationes siue principatus siue potestates, amici esse omnino non possunt, a quibus tam longe absunt animi affectione, quam longe absunt a uirtutibus uitia et a bonitate malitia.	For they cannot possibly be friends of the good gods. These we call holy angels, rational creatures of the holy heavenly dwelling, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers. The demons are as far from them in the disposition of their minds as vices are from virtues and malice from goodness.[38]

WHAT THE HOLY ANGELS AND GOOD HUMAN BEINGS CAN HAVE IN COMMON

We draw near the good angels by likeness of will, not through demons.

LATIN	ENGLISH
8.25 Nullo modo igitur per daemonum quasi medietatem ambiendum est ad beneuolentiam seu beneficentiam deorum uel potius angelorum bonorum, sed per bonae uoluntatis similitudinem, qua cum illis sumus et cum illis uiuimus et cum illis Deum quem colunt colimus, etsi eos carnalibus oculis uidere non possumus; in quantum autem dissimilitudine uoluntatis et fragilitate infirmitatis miseri sumus, in tantum ab eis longe sumus uitae merito, non corporis loco. Non enim quia in terra condicione carnis habitamus, sed si inmunditia cordis terrena sapimus, non eis iungimur. Cum uero sanamur, ut quales ipsi sunt simus; fide illis interim propinquamus, si ab illo nos fieri beatos, a quo et ipsi facti sunt, etiam ipsis fauentibus credimus.	In no way, therefore, should we seek the goodwill or kindness of the gods, or rather of the good angels, through the supposed mediation of demons. We should seek it through likeness of good will. By this we are with them, we live with them, and with them we worship the God whom they worship, even though we cannot see them with the eyes of the flesh. But insofar as we are wretched through unlikeness of will and the frailty of our weakness, to that extent we are far from them. The distance lies in the merit of our life, not the location of our body. It is not because we dwell on earth by the condition of the flesh that we are not joined to them. It is because, through impurity of heart, we set our minds on earthly things. But when we are being healed so as to become what they are, we draw near to them meanwhile by faith. We do so if we believe, with their own approval, that we are made happy by the one by whom they too were made happy.

38 The list of angelic ranks echoes Colossians 1:16.

THAT THE WHOLE RELIGION OF THE PAGANS WAS BOUND UP WITH DEAD HUMAN BEINGS

Hermes's lament about tombs reveals that Egypt's gods were dead human beings.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
8.26	Sane aduertendum est, quo modo iste Aegyptius, cum doleret tempus esse uenturum, quo illa auferrentur ex Aegypto, quae fatetur a multum errantibus et incredulis et a cultu diuinae religionis auersis esse instituta, ait inter cetera: Tunc terra ista, sanctissima sedes delubrorum adque templorum, sepulcrorum erit mortuorumque plenissima; quasi uero, si illa non auferrentur, non essent homines morituri, aut alibi essent mortui ponendi quam in terra; et utique, quanto plus uolueretur temporis et dierum, tanto maior esset numerus sepulcrorum propter maiorem numerum mortuorum. Sed hoc uidetur dolere, quod memoriae martyrum nostrorum templis eorum delubrisque succederent, ut uidelicet, qui haec legunt animo a nobis auerso adque peruerso, putent a paganis cultos fuisse deos in templis, a nobis autem coli mortuos in sepulcris.	We should certainly notice what this Egyptian says. He laments that a time would come when certain things would be taken away from Egypt, things which he admits were established by people greatly in error, unbelieving and turned away from the worship of divine religion. Among other things he says: "Then this land, the most holy seat of shrines and temples, will be completely full of tombs and of the dead." As if, had those things not been taken away, people would not have died, or the dead would have to be laid somewhere other than in the earth! And surely, the more time and days rolled on, the greater the number of tombs would be, because of the greater number of the dead. But what he seems to lament is that the memorial shrines of our martyrs would take the place of their temples and sanctuaries. Those who read this with minds turned away from us and perverse would then, of course, think that the pagans worshiped gods in temples, whereas we worship the dead in tombs.[39]
	Tanta enim homines inpii caecitate in montes quodam modo offendunt resque oculos suos ferientes nolunt uidere, ut non adtendant in omnibus litteris paganorum aut non inueniri aut uix inueniri deos, qui non homines fuerint mortuisque diuini honores delati sint. Omitto, quod Varro dicit omnes ab eis mortuos existimari manes deos et probat per ea sacra, quae omnibus fere mortuis exhibentur, ubi et ludos commemorat funebres, tamquam hoc sit maximum diuinitatis indicium, quod non soleant ludi nisi numinibus celebrari.	For impious people are so blind that they stumble, as it were, over mountains, and refuse to see things that strike their very eyes. They do not notice that in all the literature of the pagans there are either no gods, or hardly any, who were not once human beings and were given divine honors after death. I pass over Varro's statement that they regard all the dead as gods, the Manes. He proves it from the rites performed for nearly all the dead. There he also mentions funeral games, as though this were the strongest proof of divinity, since games are usually celebrated only for deities.[40]
	Hermes ipse, de quo nunc agitur, in eodem ipso libro, ubi quasi futura praenuntiando deplorans ait: Tunc terra ista, sanctissima sedes delubrorum adque templorum, sepulcrorum erit mortuorumque plenissima, deos Aegypti homines mortuos esse testatur. Cum enim dixisset proauos suos multum errantes circa deorum rationem, incredulos et non animaduertentes ad cultum religionemque diuinam, inuenisse artem, qua efficerent deos: Cui inuentae, inquit, adiunxerunt uirtutem de	Hermes himself, whom we are now discussing, testifies that the gods of Egypt are dead human beings. He does so in the very same book in which, lamenting as though foretelling the future, he says: "Then this land, the most holy seat of shrines and temples, will be completely full of tombs and of the dead." He had said that his forefathers, greatly in error about the nature of the gods, unbelieving and paying no attention to worship and di-

39 Memorial shrines (memoriae) were chapels built over the relics of martyrs.
40 The Manes were the spirits of the dead.

LATIN	ENGLISH
mundi natura conuenientem eamque miscentes, quoniam animas facere non poterant, euocantes animas daemonum uel angelorum eas indiderunt imaginibus sanctis diuinisque mysteriis, per quas idola et bene faciendi et male uires habere potuissent.	vine religion, discovered an art by which to make gods. Then he says: "To this discovery they joined a power drawn from the nature of the world and suited to it. Mixing this in, since they could not make souls, they called up the souls of demons or of angels and placed them in sacred images and divine mysteries, so that through these souls the idols might have the power both to do good and to do harm."
Deinde sequitur tamquam hoc exemplis probaturus et dicit: Auus enim tuus, o Asclepi, medicinae primus inuentor, cui templum consecratum est in monte Libyae circa litus crocodilorum, in quo eius iacet mundanus homo, id est corpus; reliquus enim, uel potius totus, si est homo totus in sensu uitae, melior remeauit in caelum, omnia etiam nunc hominibus adiumenta praestans infirmis numine nunc suo, quae solent medicinae arte praeberi. Ecce dixit mortuum coli pro deo in eo loco, ubi habebat sepulcrum, falsus ac fallens, quod remeauit in caelum. Adiungens deinde aliud Hermes, inquit, cuius auitum mihi ncmen est, nonne in sibi cognomine patria consistens omnes mortales undique uenientes adiuuat adque conseruat?	Then he goes on, as though he meant to prove this with examples, and says: "For your grandfather, Asclepius, the first discoverer of medicine, has a temple consecrated to him on a mountain of Libya near the shore of the crocodiles. In it lies his worldly man, that is, his body. The rest of him, or rather the whole of him, if the whole man consists in the consciousness of life, has returned to heaven in a better state. Even now, by his own divine power, he gives sick people all the help that the art of medicine usually provides." See, he has said that a dead man is worshiped as a god in the place where he had his tomb. In saying that he returned to heaven, he is deceived and deceiving. Then he adds another: "Hermes," he says, "whose name I bear from my grandfather, dwells in the native city that bears his name. Does he not help and preserve all mortals who come to him from every side?"[41]
Hic enim Hermes maior, id est Mercurius, quem dicit auum suum fuisse, in Hermopoli, hoc est in sui nominis ciuitate, esse perhibetur. Ecce duos deos dicit homines fuisse, Aesculapium et Mercurium. Sed de Aesculapio et Graeci et Latini hoc idem sentiunt; Mercurium autem multi non putant fuisse mortalem, quem tamen iste auum suum fuisse testatur. At enim alius est ille, alius iste, quamuis eodem nomine nuncupentur. Non multum pugno, alius ille sit, alius iste; uerum et iste; sicut Aesculapius, ex homine deus secundum testimonium tanti aput suos uiri, huius Trismegisti, nepotis sui.	This elder Hermes, that is, Mercury, whom he says was his grandfather, is said to reside at Hermopolis, that is, in the city named after him. See, he says that two gods were human beings: Aesculapius and Mercury. About Aesculapius, the Greeks and the Latins think the same. But many do not believe that Mercury was a mortal, and yet this man testifies that Mercury was his grandfather. "But that one is one person and this is another," they say, "though they are called by the same name." I will not argue much. Let that one be one person and this another. Still, this one too, like Aesculapius, became a god from a man. So testifies a man of great standing among his own people: this Trismegistus, his grandson.[42]
Adhuc addit et dicit: Isin uero Osiris quam multa bona praestare propitiam, quantis obesse scimus iratam! Deinde ut ostenderet ex hoc genere esse deos, quos illa	He adds further and says: "As for Isis, wife of Osiris, we know how many good things she bestows when she is well disposed, and how many 41 Asclepius, Hermes' partner in the dialogue, is presented as the grandson of the healing god Asclepius (Latin Aesculapius).

42 Hermopolis was a city in Middle Egypt sacred to Thoth, whom the Greeks identified with Hermes.

LATIN

arte homines faciunt (unde dat intellegi daemones se opinari ex hominum mortuorum animis extitisse, quos per artem, quam inuenerunt homines multum errantes, increduli et inreligiosi, ait inditos simulacris, quia hi, qui tales deos faciebant, animas facere non utique poterant), cum de Iside dixisset, quod commemoraui, quantis obesse scimus iratam, secutus adiunxit: (Terrenis etenim dis adque mundanis facile est irasci, utpote qui sint ab hominibus ex utraque natura facti adque conpositi. Ex utraque natura dicit ex anima et corpore, ut pro anima sit daemon, pro corpore simulacrum.

ENGLISH

people she harms when she is angry!" He wanted to show that the gods whom human beings make by that art are of this kind. From this he lets it be understood that he thinks demons arose from the souls of dead human beings. These demons, he says, were placed in images through the art discovered by people greatly in error, unbelieving and irreligious, since those who made such gods could certainly not make souls. So, after saying of Isis what I have quoted, "how many she harms when she is angry," he went on to add: ("For earthly and worldly gods are easily angered, since they have been made and composed by human beings out of both natures." By "both natures" he means soul and body, so that the demon stands in place of the soul and the image in place of the body.

Unde contigit, inquit, ab Aegyptiis haec sancta animalia nuncupari colique per singulas ciuitates eorum animas, quorum sunt consecratae uiuentes, ita ut eorum legibus incolantur et eorum nominibus nuncupentur.) Ubi est illa uelut querela luctuosa, quod terra Aegypti, sanctissima sedes delubrorum adque templorum, sepulcrorum futura esset mortuorumque plenissima? Nempe spiritus fallax, cuius instinctu Hermes ista dicebat, per eum ipsum coactus est confiteri iam tunc illam terram sepulcrorum et mortuorum, quos pro dis colebant, fuisse plenissimam. Sed dolor daemonum per eum loquebatur, qui suas futuras poenas aput sanctorum martyrum memorias inminere maerebant. In multis enim talibus locis torquentur et confitentur et de possessis hominum corporibus eiciuntur.

"Hence it came about," he says, "that these were called sacred animals by the Egyptians. Throughout their various cities the souls of those men are worshiped to whom these animals were consecrated while they were alive. So the cities live under their laws and are called by their names.") Where now is that mournful complaint, as it were, that the land of Egypt, the most holy seat of shrines and temples, would be completely full of tombs and of the dead? Clearly the deceitful spirit, at whose prompting Hermes said these things, was forced through Hermes himself to confess something. Even then that land was completely full of tombs and of the dead whom they worshiped as gods. But it was the grief of the demons that spoke through him. They mourned the punishments awaiting them at the memorial shrines of the holy martyrs. For in many such places they are tortured and confess and are cast out of the human bodies they have possessed.

THE KIND OF HONOR THAT CHRISTIANS PAY TO THE MARTYRS

Christians honor martyrs' memorials but offer sacrifice only to God, never to the martyrs.

LATIN

8.27 Nec tamen nos eisdem martyribus templa, sacerdotia, sacra et sacrificia constituimus, quoniam non ipsi, sed Deus eorum nobis est Deus. Honoramus sane memorias eorum tamquam sanctorum hominum Dei, qui usque ad mortem corporum suorum pro ueritate certarunt, ut innotesceret uera religio falsis fictisque conuictis; quod etiam si qui antea sentiebant, timendo reprimebant.

ENGLISH

And yet we do not establish temples, priesthoods, rites and sacrifices for these martyrs, because it is not they but their God who is our God. We do indeed honor their memorials as those of holy people of God. They fought for the truth even to the death of their bodies, so that true religion might become known and false and invented religions be exposed. Even if some people had held this view before, they kept it down out of fear.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quis autem audiuit aliquando fidelium stantem sacerdotem ad altare, etiam super sanctum corpus martyris ad Dei honorem cultumque constructum, dicere in precibus: Offero tibi sacrificium Petre uel Paule uel Cypriane, cum aput eorum memorias offeratur Deo, qui eos et homines et martyres fecit et sanctis suis angelis caelesti honore sociauit, ut ea celebritate et Deo uero de illorum uictoriis gratias agamus et nos ad imitationem talium coronarum adque palmarum eodem inuocato in auxilium ex illorum memoriae renouatione adhortemur? Quaecumque igitur adhibentur religiosorum obsequia in martyrum locis, ornamenta sunt memoriarum, non sacra uel sacrificia mortuorum tamquam deorum.

Who among the faithful has ever heard a priest standing at the altar say in his prayers, "I offer you sacrifice, Peter, or Paul, or Cyprian"? This holds even for an altar built over the holy body of a martyr for the honor and worship of God. At their memorials sacrifice is offered to God, who made them both human beings and martyrs and joined them in heavenly honor with his holy angels. By that celebration we give thanks to the true God for their victories. And by renewing their memory, calling on that same God for help, we urge ourselves on to imitate such crowns and palms. So whatever acts of devotion religious people perform at the martyrs' places are adornments of their memorials. They are not rites or sacrifices offered to the dead as to gods.[43]

Quicumque etiam epulas suas eo deferunt (quod quidem a Christianis melioribus non fit, et in plerisque terrarum nulla talis est consuetudo) — tamen quicumque id faciunt, quas cum adposuerint, orant et auferunt, ut uescantur uel ex eis etiam indigentibus largiantur, sanctificari sibi eas uolunt per merita martyrum in nomine domini martyrum. Non autem esse ista sacrificia martyrum nouit, qui nouit unum, quod etiam illic offertur, sacrificium Christianorum.

There are also those who bring their own meals there. The better Christians do not do this, and in most parts of the world there is no such custom. Yet whoever do so set the food down, pray, and then take it away, either to eat it or to give some of it to the needy as well. They want it sanctified for them through the merits of the martyrs, in the name of the Lord of the martyrs. But these are not sacrifices to the martyrs, as anyone knows who knows the one sacrifice of Christians, which is offered there too.

Nos itaque martyres nostros nec diuinis honoribus nec humanis criminibus colimus, sicut colunt illi deos suos, nec sacrificia illis offerimus, nec eorum probra in eorum sacra conuertimus. Nam de Iside, uxore Osiris, Aegyptia dea, et de parentibus eorum, qui omnes reges fuisse scribuntur (quibus parentibus suis illa cum sacrificaret, inuenit hordei segetem adque inde spicas marito regi et eius consiliario Mercurio demonstrauit, unde eandem et Cererem uolunt), quae et quanta mala non a poetis, sed mysticis eorum litteris memoriae mandata sint, sicut Leone sacerdote prodente ad Olympiadem matrem scribit Alexander, legant qui uolunt uel possunt, et recolant qui legerunt, et uideant quibus hominibus mortuis uel de quibus eorum factis tamquam dis sacra fuerint instituta.

So we do not honor our martyrs with divine honors or with human crimes, as they honor their gods. We neither offer sacrifices to them nor turn their disgraces into their rites. Take Isis, the wife of Osiris, an Egyptian goddess, and their parents, all of whom are recorded to have been kings. While she was sacrificing to these parents of hers, she found a crop of barley and showed some of its ears to her husband the king and to his counselor Mercury, which is why they also want to identify her with Ceres. What evils, and how great, were committed to memory about them, not by the poets but by their own mystical writings? Alexander writes of this to his mother Olympias, as disclosed to him by the priest Leo. Let those who wish to, or are able to, read it. Let those who have read it recall it. And let them see for what dead human beings, or on account of what deeds of theirs, rites were established as though for gods.[44]

43 Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was martyred in AD 258.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Absit ut eos, quamuis deos habeant, sanctis martyribus nostris, quos tamen deos non habemus, ulla ex parte audeant conparare. Sic enim non constituimus sacerdotes nec offerimus sacrificia martyribus nostris, quia incongruum indebitum inlicitum est adque uni Deo tantummodo debitum, ut nec criminibus suis nec ludis eos turpissimis oblectemus, ubi uel flagitia isti celebrant deorum suorum, si, cum homines essent, talia commiserunt, uel conficta delectamenta daemonum noxiorum, si homines non fuerunt. Ex isto genere daemonum Socrates non haberet deum, si haberet deum; sed fortasse homini ab illa arte faciendi deos alieno et innocenti illi inportauerint talem deum, qui eadem arte excellere uoluerunt. Quid ergo plura? Non esse spiritus istos colendos propter uitam beatam, quae post mortem futura est, nullus uel mediocriter prudens ambigit.

Far be it from them to dare to compare these, though they hold them to be gods, in any respect with our holy martyrs, whom nevertheless we do not hold to be gods. We do not appoint priests or offer sacrifices to our martyrs, because that is unfitting, undue and unlawful, and is owed to the one God alone. In the same way we do not entertain them with their own crimes or with the most shameful games. In these games such people celebrate either the misdeeds of their gods, if they committed such things when they were human, or the made-up delights of harmful demons, if they were never human. Socrates would not have had a god from this kind of demon, if he had a god at all. But perhaps those who wished to excel in that same art imposed such a god on a man who had nothing to do with the art of making gods and was innocent of it. Why say more? No one even moderately sensible doubts that these spirits are not to be worshiped for the sake of the happy life that is to come after death.

Sed fortasse dicturi sunt deos quidem esse omnes bonos, daemones autem alios malos, alios bonos, et eos, per quos ad uitam in aeternum beatam perueniamus, colendos esse censebunt, quos bonos opinantur. Quod quale sit iam in uolumine sequenti uidendum est.

But perhaps they will say that the gods are all good, while among the demons some are bad and some good. They will then hold that the demons through whom we may reach the life that is happy forever should be worshiped, namely those they consider good. What that amounts to must be examined in the next book.

44 A letter of Alexander the Great to his mother Olympias, circulated in antiquity, reported the Egyptian priest Leo's claim that the gods had once been human beings.

Book IX

Demons and the true mediator
Demons cannot mediate between God and humanity; only Christ can.

WHAT POINT THE DISCUSSION HAS REACHED, AND WHAT REMAINS OF THE QUESTION TO BE DISCUSSED

Augustine recalls his argument so far and turns to whether some demons are good.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.1	Et bonos et malos deos esse quidam opinati sunt; quidam uero de dis meliora sentientes tantum eis honoris laudisque tribuerunt, ut nullum deorum malum credere auderent. Sed illi, qui deos quosdam bonos, quosdam malos esse dixerunt, daemones quoque appellauerunt nomine deorum, quamquam et deos, sed rarius, nomine daemonum, ita ut ipsum Iouem, quem uolunt esse regem ac principem ceterorum, ab Homero fateantur daemonem nuncupatum.	Some have held that there are both good and evil gods. Others, thinking better of the gods, have given them so much honor and praise that they did not dare to believe that any god was evil. But those who said that some gods are good and some evil also called demons by the name of gods. They also called gods by the name of demons, though more rarely, so that they admit that Jupiter himself, whom they hold to be king and chief of all the rest, was called a demon by Homer.[1]
	Hi autem, qui omnes deos non nisi bonos esse adserunt et longe praestantiores eis hominibus, qui perhibentur boni, merito mouentur daemonum factis, quae negare non possunt; eaque nullo modo a dis, quos omnes bonos uolunt, committi posse existimantes differentiam inter deos et daemones adhibere coguntur, ut, quidquid eis merito displicet in operibus uel affectibus prauis, quibus uim suam manifestant occulti spiritus, id credant esse daemonum, non deorum.	Those, however, who assert that all the gods are good, and far superior to the human beings who are reckoned good, are rightly troubled by the deeds of demons, which they cannot deny. Since they judge that such deeds could in no way be committed by the gods, all of whom they hold to be good, they are forced to draw a distinction between gods and demons. Whatever rightly displeases them in the depraved works or emotions by which hidden spirits display their power, they believe belongs to the demons, not to the gods.
	Sed quia eosdem daemones inter homines et deos ita medios constitutos putant, tamquam nullus deus homini misceatur, ut hinc perferant desiderata, inde referant inpetrata, adque hoc Platonici, praecipui philosophorum ac nobilissimi, sentiunt, cum quibus uelut cum excellentioribus placuit istam examinare quaestionem, utrum cultus plurimorum deorum prosit ad consequendam uitam beatam quae post mortem futura est: libro superiore quaesiuimus, quo pacto daemones, qui talibus gaudent, qualia boni et prudentes homines auersantur et damnant, id est sacrilega flagitiosa facinerosa non de quolibet homine, sed de ipsis dis figmenta poetarum et magicarum artium sceleratam	But they think that these same demons are placed midway between humans and gods, as though no god had dealings with a human being. On this view the demons carry up our requests from one side and bring back from the other what has been granted. This is the view of the Platonists, the foremost and most distinguished of the philosophers. Because they are the most excellent, I chose to examine with them the question whether the worship of many gods helps us attain the happy life that is to come after death. So in the previous book I asked how the demons could win the friendship of the good gods for good people, as though they

1 Homer sometimes uses the Greek word daimōn of the gods, including Zeus (Jupiter).

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	puniendamque uiolentiam, possint quasi propinquiores et amiciores dis bonis conciliare homines bonos, et hoc nulla ratione posse conpertum est.	were nearer to the gods and on friendlier terms with them. These demons delight in what good and wise people turn away from and condemn. They delight in the sacrilegious, shameful and criminal fictions of the poets, told not about just any human being but about the gods themselves, and in the wicked and punishable violence of the magic arts. We found that the demons can in no way do this.

WHETHER AMONG THE DEMONS, TO WHOM THE GODS ARE SUPERIOR, THERE IS ANY GOOD KIND BY WHOSE PROTECTION THE HUMAN SOUL COULD REACH TRUE HAPPINESS

Book 9 will examine the difference between good and evil demons.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.2	Proinde hic liber, sicut in illius fine promisimus, disputationem continere debebit de differentia (si quam uolunt esse) non deorum inter se, quos omnes bonos dicunt, nec de differentia deorum et daemonum, quorum illos ab hominibus longe alteque seiungunt, istos inter deos et homines conlocant; sed de differentia ipsorum daemonum, quod ad praesentem pertinet quaestionem.	Accordingly, as I promised at the end of that book, this one must contain a discussion of a difference. It is not the difference among the gods themselves, if they want there to be any, since they call all the gods good. Nor is it the difference between gods and demons, though they set the gods far and high apart from humans and place the demons between gods and humans. It is the difference among the demons themselves, which is what bears on the present question.
	Aput plerosque enim usitatum est dici, alios bonos alios malos daemones; quae siue sit etiam Platonicorum, siue quorumlibet sententia, nequaquam eius est neglegenda discussio, ne quisquam uelut daemones bonos sequendos sibi esse arbitretur, per quos tamquam medios dis, quos omnes bonos credit, dum conciliari adfectat et studet, ut quasi cum eis possit esse post mortem, inretitus malignorum spirituum deceptusque fallacia longe aberret a uero Deo, cum quo solo et in quo solo et de quo solo anima humana, id est rationalis et intellectualis, beata est.	For many people commonly speak of some demons as good and others as evil. Whether this is also the opinion of the Platonists or of anyone else, it must by no means go unexamined. Otherwise someone might think he ought to follow supposedly good demons. Through them, as intermediaries, he aims and strives to be reconciled to the gods, all of whom he believes to be good, so that he may be with them, as it were, after death. Meanwhile he may be ensnared and deceived by the trickery of evil spirits and stray far from the true God. It is with him alone, in him alone and from him alone that the human soul, that is, the rational and intellectual soul, is happy.

WHAT APULEIUS ATTRIBUTES TO THE DEMONS, TO WHOM HE ASSIGNS NO VIRTUE THOUGH HE DOES NOT DENY THEM REASON

Apuleius grants the demons reason but no virtue; their minds are tossed by passions.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.3	Quae igitur est differentia daemonum bonorum et malorum? Quando quidem Platonicus Apuleius de his uniuersaliter disserens et tam multa loquens de aeriis eorum corporibus de uirtutibus tacuit animorum, quibus	What, then, is the difference between good and evil demons? The Platonist Apuleius, discussing them in general, says a great deal about their airy bodies. Yet he says nothing about the virtues of essent praediti, si essent boni. Tacuit ergo beatitudinis causam, indicium uero miseriae tacere non potuit, confitens eorum mentem, qua rationales esse perhibuit, non saltem inbutam munitamque uirtute passionibus animi inrationabilibus nequaquam cedere, sed ipsam quoque, sicut stultarum mentium mos est, procellosis quodam modo perturbationibus agitari.

LATIN

Verba namque eius de hac re ista sunt: Ex hoc ferme daemonum numero, inquit, poetae solent haudquaquam procul a ueritate osores et amatores quorundam hominum deos fingere; hos prosperare et euehere, illos contra aduersari et adfligere; igitur et misereri et indignari, et angi et laetari omnemque humani animi faciem pati, simili motu cordis et salo mentis per omnes cogitationum aestus fluctuare. Quae omnes turbelae tempestatesque procul a deorum caelestium tranquillitate exulant. Num est in his uerbis ulla dubitatio, quod non animorum aliquas inferiores partes, sed ipsas daemonum mentes, quibus rationalia sunt animalia, uelut procellosum salum dixit passionum tempestate turbari?

ut ne hominibus quidem sapientibus conparandi sint, qui huius modi perturbationibus animorum, a quibus humana non est inmunis infirmitas, etiam cum eas huius uitae condicione patiuntur, mente inperturbata, resistunt, non eis cedentes ad aliquid adprobandum uel perpetrandum, quod exorbitet ab itinere sapientiae et lege iustitiae; sed stultis mortalibus et iniustis non corporibus, sed moribus similes (ut non dicam deteriores, eo quo uetustiores et debita poena insanabiles) ipsius quoque mentis, ut iste appellauit, salo fluctuant, nec in ueritate adque uirtute, qua turbulentis et prauis affectionibus repugnatur, ex ulla animi parte consistunt.

ENGLISH

soul they would possess if they were good. So he was silent about the cause of happiness, but he could not be silent about the sign of misery. He admits that their mind, by which he declared them rational, is not even steeped in virtue and fortified by it enough to resist the irrational passions of the soul. Instead their mind itself, as is the way with foolish minds, is tossed about by what one might call stormy disturbances.[2]

His words on this subject are these: "It is from roughly this class of demons," he says, "that the poets, not at all far from the truth, are accustomed to invent gods who hate and love certain people. These they prosper and advance; those, on the contrary, they oppose and afflict. So they feel pity and indignation, anguish and joy, and undergo every aspect of the human mind. With a like agitation of heart and a swell of mind they are tossed upon all the surging tides of thought. All these turmoils and storms are banished far from the tranquillity of the heavenly gods." Can there be any doubt in these words? He said that it is not some lower parts of their souls but the very minds of the demons, by which they are rational beings, that are churned by a storm of passions like a stormy sea.

So they are not even to be compared with wise human beings. Human weakness is not immune from disturbances of the soul of this kind. Yet even when the wise suffer them under the conditions of this life, they resist them with an undisturbed mind. They do not yield to them so as to approve or do anything that strays from the path of wisdom and the law of justice. The demons are like foolish and unjust mortals, not in body but in character. I will not say they are worse, inasmuch as they are older and made incurable by deserved punishment. They too are tossed on the swell of the mind itself, as Apuleius called it. In no part of their soul do they stand firm in the truth and virtue by which turbulent and depraved emotions are resisted.

2 Apuleius of Madauros (2nd century AD), Platonist philosopher and novelist. Augustine is drawing on his treatise On the God of Socrates.

THE OPINION OF THE PERIPATETICS AND THE STOICS ABOUT THE PASSIONS THAT BEFALL THE MIND

Augustine argues the Stoics and Peripatetics differ only in words about passions, citing Gellius's shipwreck story.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.4	Duae sunt sententiae philosophorum de his animi motibus, quae Graeci πάθη, nostri autem quidam, sicut Cicero, perturbationes, quidam affectiones uel affectus, quidam uero, sicut iste de Graeco expressius, passiones uocant. Has ergo perturbationes siue affectiones siue passiones quidam philosophi dicunt etiam in sapientem cadere, sed moderatas rationique subiectas, ut eis leges quodam modo, quibus ad necessarium redigantur modum, dominatio mentis inponat. Hoc qui sentiunt, Platonici sunt siue Aristotelici, cum Aristoteles discipulus Platonis fuerit, qui sectam Peripateticam condidit. Aliis autem, sicut Stoicis, cadere ullas omnino huiusce modi passiones in sapientem non placet.	There are two views among philosophers about these motions of the soul. The Greeks call them πάθη [pathē, passions]. Some of our own writers, such as Cicero, call them disturbances; others call them affections or feelings; others again, such as Apuleius, more literally from the Greek, call them passions. Some philosophers say that these disturbances, affections or passions befall even the wise man. In him, however, they are moderated and subject to reason, so that the rule of the mind imposes laws on them, as it were, by which they are brought back within due measure. Those who think this are the Platonists or Aristotelians, for Aristotle, who founded the Peripatetic school, was a disciple of Plato. Others, however, such as the Stoics, do not accept that any passions of this kind befall the wise man at all.
	Hos autem, id est Stoicos, Cicero in libris de finibus bonorum et malorum uerbis magis quam rebus aduersus Platonicos seu Peripateticos certare conuincit; quando quidem Stoici nolunt bona appellare, sed commoda corporis et externa, eo quod nullum bonum uolunt esse hominis praeter uirtutem, tamquam artem bene uiuendi, quae non nisi in animo est. Haec autem isti simpliciter et ex communi loquendi consuetudine appellant bona; sed in conparatione uirtutis, qua recte uiuitur, parua et exigua. Ex quo fit, ut ab utrisque quodlibet uocentur, seu bona seu commoda, pari tamen aestimatione pensentur, nec in hac quaestione Stoici delectentur nisi nouitate uerborum.	Cicero, in his books On the Ends of Good and Evil, proves that the Stoics contend against the Platonists or Peripatetics in words rather than in substance. The Stoics refuse to call bodily and external things goods; they call them advantages. This is because they hold that there is no good for a human being except virtue, as the art of living well, which exists only in the soul. The others call these things goods, simply and in keeping with ordinary usage, but small and slight in comparison with virtue, by which one lives rightly. The result is that, whatever each side calls them, goods or advantages, both weigh them at equal value. In this question the Stoics take pleasure in nothing but novel terminology.[3]
	Videtur ergo mihi etiam in hoc, ubi quaeritur utrum accidant sapienti passiones animi, an ab eis sit prorsus alienus, de uerbis eos potius quam de rebus facere controuersiam. Nam et ipsos nihil hinc aliud quam Platonicos et Peripateticos sentire existimo, quantum ad uim rerum adtinet, non ad uocabulorum sonum.	It seems to me, then, that in this question too their dispute is about words rather than things. The question is whether passions of the soul befall the wise man, or whether he is wholly free of them. I judge that on this point the Stoics think nothing different from the Platonists and Peripatetics, as far as the substance of things is concerned and not the sound of the terms.
	Ut enim alia omittam, quibus id ostendam, ne longum faciam, aliquid unum quod sit euidentissimum dicam. In	There are other things by which I might show this, but I will pass over them so as not to be long, and I

3 Cicero's De finibus bonorum et malorum (45 BC), a dialogue examining the ethical theories of the Epicureans, Stoics and Academics.

LATIN

libris, quibus titulus est Noctium Atticarum, scribit A. Gellius, uir elegantissimi eloquii et multae undecumque scientiae, se nauigasse aliquando cum quodam philosopho nobili Stoico. Is philosophus, sicut latius et uberius, quod ego breuiter adtingam, narrat A. Gellius, cum illud nauigium horribili caelo et mari periculosissime iactaretur, ui timoris expalluit. Id animaduersum est ab eis, qui aderant, quamuis in mortis uicinia curiosissime adtentis, utrumne philosophus animo turbaretur. Deinde tempestate transacta mox ut securitas praebuit conloquendi uel etiam garriendi locum, quidam ex his, quos nauis illa portabat, dies luxuriosus Asiaticus philosophum conpellat inludens, quod extimuisset adque palluisset, cum ipse mansisset intrepidus in eo quod inpendebat exitio.

At ille Aristippi Socratici responsum rettulit, qui cum in re simili eadem uerba ab homine simili audisset, respondit illum pro anima nequissimi nebulonis merito non fuisse sollicitum, se autem pro Aristippi anima timere debuisse. Hac illo diuite responsione depulso postea quaesiuit A. Gellius a philosopho non exagitandi animo, sed discendi, quaenam illa ratio esset pauoris sui. Qui ut doceret hominem sciendi studio nauiter accensum, protulit statim de sarcinula sua Stoici Epicteti librum, in quo ea scripta essent, quae congruerent decretis Zenonis et Chrysippi, quos fuisse Stoicorum principes nouimus. In eo libro se legisse dicit A.

Gellius hoc Stoicis placuisse, quod animi uisa, quas appellant phantasias, nec in potestate est utrum et quando incidant animo, cum ueniunt ex terribilibus et formidabilibus rebus, necesse est etiam sapientis animum moueant, ita ut paulisper uel pauescat metu, uel tristitia contrahatur, tamquam his passionibus praeuenientibus mentis et rationis officium; nec ideo tamen in mente fieri opinionem mali, nec adprobari ista eisque consentiri. Hoc enim esse uolunt in potestate idque interesse censent inter animum sapientis et stulti, quod stulti animus will mention one point that is perfectly evident. In the books entitled Attic Nights, Aulus Gellius, a man of most elegant style and wide learning gathered from every quarter, writes that he once sailed with a distinguished Stoic philosopher. Aulus Gellius tells the story more fully and at greater length; I will touch on it briefly. Under a terrible sky and sea the ship was tossed about in great danger, and the philosopher turned pale from the force of fear. Those present noticed this. Even though death was near, they were watching very curiously to see whether the philosopher was disturbed in mind. Then the storm passed, and as soon as safety gave room for conversation or even chatter, one of the passengers spoke up. He was a rich, pleasure-loving man from Asia, and he mocked the philosopher for having been afraid and turning pale, while he himself had remained fearless in the face of the destruction that threatened them.[4]

ENGLISH

The philosopher answered with the reply of Aristippus the Socratic. In a similar situation Aristippus had heard the same words from a similar man. He replied that the other had rightly not been anxious for the soul of a worthless good-for-nothing, but that he himself had good reason to fear for the soul of Aristippus. When the rich man had been rebuffed by this reply, Aulus Gellius afterward asked the philosopher what the reason for his fear had been. He asked not to provoke him but to learn. To instruct a man so keenly fired with the desire to know, the philosopher at once brought out of his little bag a book by the Stoic Epictetus. It contained writings in agreement with the doctrines of Zeno and Chrysippus, who, as we know, were the leading Stoics. In that book, Aulus[5]

Gellius says he read that the Stoics held the following view. The mind's impressions, which they call phantasiai, strike the mind, and it is not in our power whether or when they do so. When they arise from terrible and fearsome things, they necessarily move even the wise man's mind. For a little while it trembles with fear or is contracted by sorrow, as though these passions got ahead of the work of mind and reason. Yet this does not

4 Aulus Gellius (2nd century AD), Roman author of the miscellany Attic Nights, which tells this story in Book 19, chapter 1.
5 Aristippus of Cyrene, a pupil of Socrates, founded the pleasure-centered Cyrenaic school. Epictetus (c. AD 50–135) was a Stoic teacher; Zeno of Citium founded Stoicism and Chrysippus systematized it.

LATIN

eisdem passionibus cedit adque adcommodat mentis adsensum; sapientes autem, quamuis eas necessitate patiantur, retinent tamen de his, quae adpetere uel fugere rationabiliter debent, ueram et stabilem inconcussa mente sententiam. Haec ut potui non quidem commodius A.

Gellio, sed certe breuius et, ut puto, planius exposui, quae ille se in Epicteti libro legisse commemorat eum ex decretis Stoicorum dixisse adque sensisse.

Quae si ita sunt, aut nihil aut paene nihil distat inter Stoicorum aliorumque philosophorum opinionem de passionibus et perturbationibus animorum; utrique enim mentem rationemque sapientis ab earum dominatione defendunt. Et ideo fortasse dicunt eas in sapientem non cadere Stoici, quia nequaquam eius sapientiam, qua utique sapiens est, ullo errore obnubilant aut labe subuertunt. Accidunt autem animo sapientis salua serenitate sapientiae propter illa, quae commoda uel incommoda appellant, quamuis ea nolint dicere bona uel mala. Nam profecto si nihili penderet eas res ille philosophus, quas amissurum se naufragio sentiebat, sicuti est uita ista salusque corporis, non ita illud periculum perhorresceret, ut palloris etiam testimonio proderetur.

Verum tamen et illam poterat permotionem pati, et fixam tenere mente sententiam, uitam illam salutemque corporis, quorum amissionem minabatur tempestatis inmanitas, non esse bona, quae illos quibus inessent facerent bonos, sicut facit iustitia. Quod autem aiunt ea nec bona appellanda esse, sed commoda: uerborum certamini, non rerum examini deputandum est. Quid enim interest, utrum aptius bona uocentur an commoda, dum tamen ne his priuetur non minus Stoicus quam Peripateticus pauescat et palleat, ea non aequaliter appellando, sed aequaliter aestimando? Ambo sane, si bonorum istorum seu commodorum periculis ad flagitium uel facinus urgeantur, ut aliter ea retinere non possint, malle se dicunt haec amittere, quibus natura mean that an opinion of evil forms in the mind, or that these impressions are approved or consented to. This, they hold, is in our power. They judge that this is the difference between the mind of the wise man and that of the fool. The fool's mind yields to these passions and adapts the mind's assent to them. The wise undergo them of necessity, but with an unshaken mind they still keep a true and steady judgment about what they ought rationally to seek or to shun. I have set this out as best I could, not indeed more elegantly than Aulus Gellius, but certainly more briefly and, I think, more plainly. This is what he records reading in Epictetus's book, as what Epictetus said and held on the basis of the doctrines of the Stoics.

ENGLISH

If this is so, there is no difference, or almost none, between the opinion of the Stoics and that of the other philosophers about the passions and disturbances of souls. Both defend the mind and reason of the wise man from their domination. And perhaps the Stoics say that the passions do not befall the wise man because they in no way cloud his wisdom, by which he is wise, with any error, or overthrow it with any fall. Yet they do befall the soul of the wise man, while the calm of his wisdom remains unimpaired. They arise on account of the things the Stoics call advantages or disadvantages, though they refuse to call them goods or evils. For surely, if that philosopher had considered worthless the things he felt he was about to lose in a shipwreck, such as this life and the safety of his body, he would not have dreaded that danger so much that even his pallor gave him away.

Yet he could both suffer that agitation and keep a judgment fixed in his mind. He could hold that life and bodily safety, whose loss the savage storm threatened, are not goods that make those who possess them good, as justice does. As for their saying that these things should not even be called goods but advantages, that must be put down to a contest over words, not an examination of things. What does it matter whether they are more aptly called goods or advantages, so long as the Stoic trembles and turns pale at the prospect of losing them no less than the Peripatetic? They do not call them by the same name, but they value them equally. Suppose both were pressed toward some corporis salua et incolumis habetur, quam illa committere, quibus iustitia uiolatur.	shameful act or crime by threats to these goods or advantages, so that they could not keep them otherwise. Both, certainly, say that they would rather lose the things by which the body's nature is kept safe and sound than commit the deeds by which justice is violated.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ita mens, ubi fixa est ista sententia, nullas perturbationes, etiamsi accidunt inferioribus animi partibus, in se contra rationem praeualere permittit; quin immo eis ipsa dominatur eisque non consentiendo et potius resistendo regnum uirtutis exercet. Talem describit etiam Vergilius Aenean, ubi ait: Mens inmota manet, lacrimae uoluuntur inanes.	Thus a mind in which this judgment is fixed allows no disturbances to prevail within it against reason, even if they occur in the lower parts of the soul. On the contrary, the mind itself rules over them. By not consenting to them and rather resisting them, it exercises the reign of virtue. Virgil too describes Aeneas in this way when he says: "His mind stays unmoved; the tears roll down in vain."[6]

THAT THE PASSIONS THAT AFFECT CHRISTIAN SOULS DO NOT DRAW THEM INTO VICE BUT EXERCISE VIRTUE

Scripture asks not whether we feel anger, sorrow or fear, but why.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.5 Non est nunc necesse copiose ac diligenter ostendere, quid de istis passionibus doceat scriptura diuina, qua Christiana eruditio continetur. Deo quippe ipsam mentem subicit regendam et iuuandam mentique passiones ita moderandas adque frenandas, ut in usum iustitiae conuertantur. Denique in disciplina nostra non tam quaeritur utrum pius animus irascatur, sed quare irascatur; nec utrum sit tristis, sed unde sit tristis; nec utrum timeat, sed quid timeat. Irasci enim peccanti ut corrigatur, contristari pro adflicto ut liberetur, timere periclitanti ne pereat, nescio utrum quisquam sana consideratione reprehendat. Nam et misericordiam Stoicorum est solere culpare; sed quanto honestius ille Stoicus misericordia perturbaretur hominis liberandi quam timore naufragii.	There is no need now to show at length and in detail what divine Scripture, which contains Christian learning, teaches about these passions. Scripture subjects the mind itself to God, to be ruled and helped by him. It subjects the passions to the mind, to be moderated and bridled so that they are turned to the service of justice. In short, in our teaching the question is not so much whether a devout soul is angry, but why it is angry. It is not whether it is sad, but what makes it sad; not whether it is afraid, but what it fears. We may be angry with a sinner so that he may be corrected, grieve for someone afflicted so that he may be set free, or fear for someone in danger lest he perish. I doubt that anyone who considers the matter soundly would find fault with these feelings. The Stoics, it is true, are in the habit of censuring even mercy. But how much more honorable it would have been for that Stoic to be disturbed by mercy for a man who needed rescuing than by fear of shipwreck!
Longe melius et humanius et piorum sensibus adcommodatius Cicero in Caesaris laude locutus est, ubi ait: Nulla de uirtutibus tuis nec admirabilior nec gratior misericordia est. Quid est autem misericordia nisi alienae miseriae quaedam in nostro corde conpassio, qua utique si possumus subuenire conpellimur? Seruit autem motus	Cicero spoke far better, more humanely and more in keeping with the feelings of the devout in his praise of Caesar, when he said: "Of all your virtues none is more admirable or more pleasing than your mercy." What is mercy but a kind of fellow-feeling in our heart for another's misery, which 6 Virgil, Aeneid 4.449, where Aeneas resists Dido's pleas that he stay in Carthage.

LATIN	ENGLISH
iste rationi, quando ita praebetur misericordia, ut iustitia conseruetur, siue cum indigenti tribuitur, siue cum ignoscitur paenitenti. Hanc Cicero locutor egregius non dubitauit appellare uirtutem, quam Stoicos inter uitia numerare non pudet, qui tamen, ut docuit liber Epicteti, nobilissimi Stoici, ex decretis Zenonis et Chrysippi, qui huius sectae primas habuerunt, huiusce modi passiones in animum sapientis admittunt, quem uitiis omnibus liberum uolunt.	compels us to help if we can? This emotion serves reason when mercy is shown in such a way that justice is preserved, whether something is given to the needy or the penitent is pardoned. Cicero, that outstanding speaker, did not hesitate to call mercy a virtue. The Stoics are not ashamed to count it among the vices. Yet the Stoics, as the book of Epictetus, a most distinguished Stoic, has shown on the basis of the doctrines of Zeno and Chrysippus, the leaders of this school, admit passions of this kind into the soul of the wise man. And they hold that the wise man is free of all vices.[7]
Unde fit consequens, ut haec ipsa non putent uitia, quando sapienti sic accidunt, ut contra uirtutem mentis rationemque nihil possint, et una sit eademque sententia Peripateticorum uel etiam Platonicorum et ipsorum Stoicorum, sed, ut ait Tullius, uerbi controuersia iam diu torqueat homines Graeculos contentionis cupidiores quam ueritatis. Sed adhuc merito quaeri potest, utrum ad uitae praesentis pertineat infirmitatem etiam in quibusque bonis officiis huiusce modi perpeti affectus, sancti uero angeli et sine ira puniant, quos accipiunt aeterna Dei lege puniendos, et miseris sine miseriae conpassione subueniant, et periclitantibus eis, quos diligunt, sine timore opitulentur; et tamen istarum nomina passionum consuetudine locutionis humanae etiam in eos usurpentur propter quandam operum similitudinem, non propter affectionum infirmitatem, sicut ipse Deus secundum scripturas irascitur, nec tamen ulla passione turbatur.	It follows that they do not regard these passions as vices when they befall the wise man in such a way that they have no power against the virtue and reason of his mind. It follows too that the opinion of the Peripatetics, or even of the Platonists, and that of the Stoics themselves is one and the same. But, as Cicero says, a dispute over a word has long tormented these Greeks, who are keener on contention than on truth. Still, it may rightly be asked whether undergoing emotions of this kind, even in the performance of good duties, belongs to the weakness of the present life. Perhaps the holy angels punish without anger those whom the eternal law of God hands over to them for punishment. Perhaps they help the miserable without sharing their misery, and come to the aid of those they love in danger without fear. The names of these passions would still be applied to them by the custom of human speech, because of a certain likeness in their works, not because of any weakness in their feelings. In the same way God himself, according to the Scriptures, is angry, and yet is not disturbed by any passion.
Hoc enim uerbum uindictae usurpauit effectus, non illius turbulentus affectus.	For the word is used of the effect of his vengeance, not of any turbulent feeling in him.

THE PASSIONS BY WHICH, AS APULEIUS ADMITS, THE DEMONS ARE TROUBLED, THOUGH HE CLAIMS THEY HELP HUMAN BEINGS WITH THE GODS

By Apuleius's own account, the demons' very minds are ruled by passion.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.6 Qua interim de sanctis angelis quaestione dilata uideamus quem ad modum dicant Platonici medios daemones inter deos et homines constitutos istis	Let us postpone this question about the holy angels for the present. Let us see how the Platonists say that the demons placed midway between gods

7 Cicero, For Ligarius 37, a speech delivered before Julius Caesar in 46 BC.

LATIN	ENGLISH
passionum aestibus fluctuare. Si enim mente ab his libera eisque dominante motus huiusce modi paterentur, non eos diceret Apuleius simili motu cordis et salo mentis per omnes cogitationum aestus fluctuare. Ipsa igitur mens eorum, id est pars animi superior, qua rationales sunt, in qua uirtus et sapientia, si ulla eis esset, passionibus turbulentis inferiorum animi partium regendis moderandisque dominaretur, — ipsa, inquam, mens eorum, sicut iste Platonicus confitetur, salo perturbationum fluctuat. Subiecta est ergo mens daemonum passionibus libidinum formidinum irarum adque huiusce modi ceteris.	and humans are tossed on these surging tides of passion. If the demons underwent such emotions with a mind that was free of them and ruled over them, Apuleius would not say that they are tossed "with a like agitation of heart and a swell of mind upon all the surging tides of thought." Their mind is the higher part of the soul, by which they are rational. In it virtue and wisdom, if they had any, would rule over the turbulent passions of the lower parts of the soul, governing and moderating them. Yet that very mind of theirs—their mind itself, I say—is tossed on a swell of disturbances, as this Platonist admits. The mind of the demons, then, is subject to the passions of lust, fear, anger and the like.
Quae igitur pars in eis libera est composque sapientiae, qua placeant dis et ad bonorum morum similitudinem hominibus consulant, cum eorum mens passionum uitiis subiugata et obpressa, quidquid rationis naturaliter habet, ad fallendum et decipiendum tanto acrius intendat, quanto eam magis possidet nocendi cupiditas?	What part of them, then, is free and in possession of wisdom, so that they might please the gods and counsel human beings toward good conduct like their own? Their mind is subjugated and oppressed by the vices of passion. Whatever reason it naturally has, it bends all the more keenly to deceiving and misleading, the more it is possessed by the craving to do harm.

THAT THE PLATONISTS CLAIM THE GODS ARE SLANDERED BY THE POETS' FICTIONS ABOUT THEIR CONTENDING FACTIONS, WHEN THESE FACTIONS BELONG TO DEMONS, NOT GODS

Apuleius blames demons, not gods, for the partisan quarrels the poets describe.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.7 Quod si quisquam dicit, non ex omnium, sed ex malorum daemonum numero esse, quos poetae quorundam hominum osores et amatores deos non procul a ueritate confingunt (hos enim dixit Apuleius salo mentis per omnes cogitationum aestus fluctuare): quo modo istud intellegere poterimus, quando, cum hoc diceret, non quorundam, id est malorum, sed omnium daemonum medietatem propter aeria corpora inter deos et homines describebat? Hoc enim ait fingere poetas, quod ex istorum daemonum numero deos faciunt et eis deorum nomina inponunt et quibus uoluerint hominibus ex his amicos inimicosque distribuunt ficti carminis inpunita licentia, cum deos ab his daemonum moribus et caelesti loco et beatitudinis opulentia remotos esse perhibeat.	Suppose someone says that the poets, not far from the truth, invent gods who hate and love certain people not from the whole number of demons but from the evil ones only. For these are the ones Apuleius said are tossed "by a swell of mind upon all the surging tides of thought." How can we understand him this way? When he said this, he was describing the intermediate position between gods and humans that belongs, because of their airy bodies, not to some demons, the evil ones, but to all of them. What he says the poets invent is this. They make gods out of the number of these demons and give them the names of gods. Then, with the unchecked license of fictional verse, they assign them as friends and enemies to whatever human beings they please. Yet Apuleius declares that the gods are far removed from such demonic conduct, both by their heavenly abode and by the wealth of their happiness.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Haec est ergo fictio poetarum deos dicere, qui di non sunt, eosque sub deorum nominibus inter se decertare propter homines, quos pro studio partium diligunt uel oderunt. Non procul autem a ueritate dicit hanc esse fictionem, quoniam deorum appellati uocabulis, qui di non sunt, tales tamen describuntur daemones, quales sunt. Denique hinc esse dicit Homericam illam Mineruam, quae mediis coetibus Graium cohibendo Achilli interuenit.	This, then, is the fiction of the poets: they call gods those who are not gods, and show them, under the names of gods, fighting among themselves over human beings whom they love or hate out of partisan zeal. But he says this fiction is not far from the truth. The demons are called by the names of gods when they are not gods, but they are nonetheless described just as they are. Finally, he says that this is the origin of Homer's Minerva, who intervened in the midst of the assembled Greeks to restrain Achilles.[8]
Quod ergo Minerua illa fuerit, poeticum uult esse figmentum, eo quod Mineruam deam putat eamque inter deos, quos omnes bonos beatosque credit, in alta aetheria sede conlocat, procul a conuersatione mortalium; quod autem aliquis daemon fuerit Graecis fauens Troianisque contrarius, sicut alius aduersus Graecos Troianorum opitulator, quem Veneris seu Martis nomine idem poeta commemorat, quos deos iste talia non agentes in habitationibus caelestibus ponit, et hi daemones pro eis, quos amabant, contra eos, quos oderant, inter se decertauerint, hoc non procul a ueritate poetas dixisse confessus est.	So he wants it to be a poetic invention that this was Minerva, because he thinks Minerva a goddess. He places her among the gods, all of whom he believes to be good and happy, in a lofty ethereal abode, far from contact with mortals. But he admitted that the poets spoke not far from the truth in another respect. There was some demon who favored the Greeks and opposed the Trojans, just as there was another who helped the Trojans against the Greeks, whom the same poet mentions by the name of Venus or Mars. Apuleius places these gods in the heavenly dwellings, where they do no such things. And these demons fought among themselves for those they loved against those they hated.
De his quippe ista dixerunt, quos hominibus simili motu cordis et salo mentis per omnes cogitationum aestus fluctuare testatur, ut possint amores et odia non pro iustitia, sed sicut populus similis eorum in uenatoribus et aurigis secundum suarum studia partium pro aliis aduersus alios exercere. Id enim uidetur philosophus curasse Platonicus, ne, cum haec a poetis canerentur, non a daemonibus mediis, sed ab ipsis dis, quorum nomina poetae fingendo ponunt, fieri crederentur.	For the poets said these things about beings who, as he testifies, are tossed like humans "with a like agitation of heart and a swell of mind upon all the surging tides of thought." So they can exercise their loves and hatreds, not for the sake of justice, but for some against others according to their partisan enthusiasms. In this they are like the populace, which resembles them in its devotion to the hunters of the arena and the charioteers. The Platonist philosopher seems to have taken care that, when the poets sang of these things, people should not believe they were done by the gods themselves, whose names the poets assign in their fictions, rather than by the intermediate demons.

APULEIUS THE PLATONIST'S DEFINITION OF THE GODS OF HEAVEN, THE DEMONS OF THE AIR, AND HUMAN BEINGS ON EARTH

Apuleius's definition of demons includes nothing that marks any of them as good.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.8

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quid? illa ipsa definitio daemonum parumne intuenda est (ubi certe omnes determinando conplexus est), quod ait daemones esse genere animalia, animo passiua, mente rationalia, corpore aeria, tempore aeterna? In quibus quinque commemoratis nihil dixit omnino, quod daemones cum bonis saltem hominibus id uiderentur habere commune, quod non esset in malis.	What then? Is his very definition of demons not worth a closer look? In it, of course, he took in all of them by defining them. He says that demons are living beings in kind, subject to passions in soul, rational in mind, airy in body, and eternal in duration. Among these five features he said nothing at all that would make demons appear to share with good people, at least, anything that is not also found in bad people.
Nam ipsos homines cum aliquanto latius describendo conplecteretur, suo loco de illis dicens tamquam de infimis adque terrenis, cum prius dixisset de caelestibus dis, ut commendatis duabus partibus ex summo et infimo ultimis tertio loco de mediis daemonibus loqueretur: Igitur homines, inquit, ratione cluentes, oratione pollentes, inmortalibus animis, moribundis membris, leuibus et anxiis mentibus, brutis et obnoxiis corporibus, dissimilibus moribus, similibus erroribus, peruicaci audacia, pertinaci spe, casso labore, fortuna caduca, singillatim mortales, cuncti tamen uniuerso genere perpetui, uicissim sufficienda prole mutabiles, uolucri tempore, tarda sapientia, cita morte, querula uita terras incolunt. Cum hic tam multa diceret, quae ad plurimos homines pertinent, numquid etiam illud tacuit, quod nouerat esse paucorum, ubi ait tarda sapientia?	He gave a somewhat fuller description that took in human beings themselves. He spoke of them in their proper place as the lowest and earthly beings, after first speaking of the heavenly gods, so that, having set out the two extreme parts, the highest and the lowest, he could speak in third place of the demons in between. "Humans, then," he says, "distinguished by reason, powerful in speech, with immortal souls and dying limbs, fickle and anxious minds, dull and vulnerable bodies; unlike in character, alike in error; stubborn in daring, persistent in hope, futile in toil, frail in fortune; mortal one by one, yet everlasting all together as a race, changing in turn as offspring take their place; their time fleeting, their wisdom slow, their death swift, their life a lament—humans inhabit the earth." He said so many things here that apply to most people. Did he keep silent even about what he knew belonged to few, when he says "their wisdom slow"?
Quod si praetermisisset, nullo modo recte genus humanum descriptionis huius tam intenta diligentia terminasset. Cum uero deorum excellentiam commendaret, ipsam beatitudinem, quo uolunt homines per sapientiam peruenire, in eis adfirmauit excellere. Proinde si aliquos daemones bonos uellet intellegi, aliquid etiam in ipsorum descriptione poneret, unde uel cum dis aliquam beatitudinis partem, uel cum hominibus qualemcumque sapientiam putarentur habere communem. Nunc uero nullum bonum eorum commemorauit, quo boni discernuntur a malis.	Had he left that out, he would by no means have defined the human race correctly with the careful precision of this description. When he extolled the excellence of the gods, he declared that happiness itself, which humans want to reach through wisdom, is preeminent in them. Accordingly, if he had wanted some demons to be understood as good, he would also have put something into their description from which they might be thought to share either some part of happiness with the gods or some kind of wisdom with humans. As it is, he mentioned no good of theirs by which the good are distinguished from the bad.
Quamuis et eorum malitiae liberius exprimendae pepercerit, non tam ne ipsos, quam ne cultores eorum, aput quos loquebatur, offenderet: significauit tamen prudentibus, quid de illis sentire deberent, quando quidem deos, quos omnes bonos beatosque credi uoluit,	He refrained from expressing their wickedness more freely. He did so not so much to avoid offending the demons themselves as to avoid offending their worshipers, to whom he was speaking. Even so, he showed the discerning what they ought to 8 In Iliad 1, Athena (the Roman Minerva) stops Achilles from drawing his sword against Agamemnon.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	ab eonim passionibus adque, ut ait ipse, turbelis omni modo separauit, sola illos corporum aeternitate coniungens, animo autem non dis, sed hominibus similes daemones apertissime inculcans; et hoc non sapientiae bono, cuius et homines possunt esse participes, sed perturbatione passionum, quae stultis malisque dominatur, a sapientibus uero et bonis ita regitur, ut malint eam non habere quam uincere.	think of them. He completely separated the gods, whom he wanted everyone to believe good and happy, from the passions and, as he himself puts it, the "turmoils" of the demons. He linked the two only by the eternity of their bodies, while making it perfectly plain that in soul demons are like not the gods but humans. And that likeness lay not in the good of wisdom, in which humans too can share, but in the disturbance of the passions. That disturbance dominates the foolish and the wicked. The wise and the good govern it in such a way that they would rather not have it than have to overcome it.
	Nam si non corporum, sed animorum aeternitatem cum dis habere daemones uellet intellegi, non utique homines ab huius rei consortio separaret, quia et hominibus aeternos esse animos procul dubio sicut Platonicus sentit. Ideo cum hoc genus animantum describeret, inmortalibus animis, moribundis membris dixit esse homines. Ac per hoc si propterea communem cum dis aeternitatem non habent homines, quia corpore sunt mortales: propterea ergo daemones habent, quia corpore sunt inmortales.	For if he had wanted us to understand that demons share with the gods the eternity not of bodies but of souls, he would certainly not have excluded humans from a share in this, since, as a Platonist, he undoubtedly holds that humans too have eternal souls. That is why, when he described this kind of living being, he said that humans have "immortal souls and dying limbs." And so, if humans do not share eternity with the gods because they are mortal in body, then demons do share it because they are immortal in body.

WHETHER THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE GODS OF HEAVEN CAN BE SECURED FOR HUMAN BEINGS THROUGH THE INTERCESSION OF DEMONS

Demons share the better body with gods and the worse soul with humans.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.9	Quales igitur mediatores sunt inter homines et deos, per quos ad deorum amicitias homines ambiant, qui hoc cum hominibus habent deterius, quod est in animante melius, id est animum; hoc autem habent cum dis melius, quod est in animante deterius, id est corpus?	What sort of mediators between humans and gods are these, then, through whom humans are to court the friendship of the gods? They share with humans, in its worse condition, what is the better part of a living being, namely the soul. And they share with the gods, in its better condition, what is the worse part of a living being, namely the body.
	Cum enim animans, id est animal, ex anima constet et corpore, quorum duorum anima est utique corpore melior, etsi uitiosa et infirma, melior certe corpore etiam sanissimo adque firmissimo, quoniam natura eius excellentior nec labe uitiorum postponitur corpori, sicut aurum etiam sordidum argento seu plumbo, licet purissimo, carius aestimatur: ista mediatores deorum et hominum, per quos interpositos diuinis humana iunguntur, cum dis habent corpus aeternum, uitiosum autem cum hominibus animum: quasi religio, qua uolunt dis homines per daemones iungi, in corpore sit, non in animo constituta.	A living being, that is, an animal, consists of soul and body. Of these two the soul is certainly the better. Even when it is vicious and weak, it is surely better than even the healthiest and strongest body, because its nature is more excellent and is not ranked below the body even by the stain of vices. In the same way, gold, even when tarnished, is valued more highly than silver or lead, however pure. Yet these mediators between gods and humans, whose intervention is supposed to join human things to divine, have an eternal body in common with the gods and a vicious soul in common with humans. It is as if the religion by which they want humans to be joined to the gods through demons were located in the body, not in the soul.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quaenam tandem istos mediatores falsos adque fallaces quasi capite deorsum nequitia uel poena suspendit, ut inferiorem animalis partem, id est corpus, cum superioribus, superiorem uero, id est animum, cum inferioribus habeant, et cum dis caelestibus in parte seruiente coniuncti, cum hominibus autem terrestribus in parte dominante sint miseri? Corpus quippe seruum est, sicut etiam Sallustius ait: Animi imperio, corporis seruitio magis utimur. Adiunxit autem ille: Alterum nobis cum dis, alterum cum beluis commune est, quoniam de hominibus loquebatur, quibus sicut beluis mortale corpus est.	What wickedness, then, or what punishment has hung these false and deceitful mediators upside down, as it were? They have the lower part of a living being, the body, in common with the higher beings, and the higher part, the soul, in common with the lower. They are joined to the heavenly gods in the part that serves, yet share the misery of earthly humans in the part that rules. For the body is a slave, as Sallust too says: "We use the soul more to command, the body to serve." And he added: "The one we share with the gods, the other with the beasts," since he was speaking of humans, who, like beasts, have a mortal body.[9]
Isti autem, quos inter nos et deos mediatores nobis philosophi prouiderunt, possunt quidem dicere de animo et corpore: alterum nobis cum dis, alterum cum hominibus commune est; sed, sicut dixi, tamquam in peruersum ligati adque suspensi, seruum corpus cum dis beatis, dominum animum cum hominibus miseris habentes, parte inferiore exaltati, superiore deiecti. Unde etiamsi quisquam propter hoc eos putauerit aeternitatem habere cum dis, quia nulla morte, sicut animalium terrestrium, animi eorum soluuntur a corpore: nec sic existimandum est eorum corpus tamquam honoratorum aeternum uehiculum, sed aeternum uinculum damnatorum.	But these beings, whom the philosophers have provided for us as mediators between us and the gods, can indeed say of soul and body: "The one we share with the gods, the other with humans." Yet, as I said, they are bound and hung the wrong way up. They have a slave body in common with the happy gods and a master soul in common with miserable humans, so that they are exalted in their lower part and cast down in their higher. So someone may think that they share eternity with the gods because no death releases their souls from the body, as happens with earthly animals. Even so, their body must not be regarded as the eternal vehicle of the honored but as the eternal chain of the condemned.

THAT, ACCORDING TO PLOTINUS, HUMAN BEINGS ARE LESS WRETCHED IN A MORTAL BODY THAN DEMONS IN AN ETERNAL ONE

Plotinus calls mortal bodies a mercy; demons are denied it and bound to eternal bodies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.10 Plotinus certe nostrae memoriae uicinis temporibus Platonem ceteris excellentius intellexisse laudatur. Is cum de humanis animis ageret: Tater, inquit, misericors mortalia illis uincla faciebat. Ita hoc ipsum, quod mortales sunt homines corpore, ad misericordiam Dei patris pertinere arbitratus est, ne semper huius uitae miseria tenerentur. Hac misericordia indigna iudicata est iniquitas daemonum, quae in animi passiui miseria non mortale sicut homines, sed aeternum corpus accepit.	Plotinus, certainly, who lived in times close to our own memory, is praised for having understood Plato better than anyone else. Discussing human souls, he says: "The merciful Father made mortal bonds for them." He therefore held that the very fact that humans are mortal in body belongs to the mercy of God the Father, so that they would not be held forever in the misery of this life. The wickedness of the demons was judged unworthy of this 9 Sallust (86–35 BC), Roman historian; the quotation is from The War with Catiline 1.2.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Essent quippe feliciores hominibus, si mortale cum eis haberent corpus et cum dis animum beatum. Essent autem pares hominibus, si cum animo misero corpus saltem mortale cum eis habere meruissent; si tamen adquirerent aliquid pietatis, ut ab aerumnis uel in morte requiescerent. Nunc uero non solum feliciores hominibus non sunt animo misero, sed etiam miseriores sunt perpetuo corporis uinculo.	mercy. In the misery of a soul subject to passions, it received not a mortal body, as humans did, but an eternal one. They would indeed be happier than humans if they had a mortal body in common with humans and a happy soul in common with the gods. And they would be equal to humans if, along with a miserable soul, they had at least deserved to have a mortal body like theirs. That holds only if they also acquired some piety, so that they might at least find rest from their troubles in death. As it is, they are not only no happier than humans, given their miserable soul, but even more miserable, because of the perpetual chain of the body.[10]
	Non enim aliqua pietatis et sapientiae disciplina proficientes intellegi uoluit ex daemonibus fieri deos, cum apertissime dixerit daemones aeternos.	He did not mean us to understand that demons become gods by making progress in some discipline of piety and wisdom, since he said quite plainly that demons are eternal.

THE OPINION OF THE PLATONISTS THAT HUMAN SOULS BECOME DEMONS AFTER LEAVING THEIR BODIES

Apuleius says human souls become lares, lemures or manes after death.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.11	Dicit quidem et animas hominum daemones esse et ex hominibus fieri lares, si boni meriti sunt; lemures, si mali, seu laruas; manes autem deos dici, si incertum est bonorum eos seu malorum esse meritorum. In qua opinione quantam uoraginem aperiant sectandis perditis moribus, quis non uideat, si uel paululum adtendat? Quando quidem quamlibet nequam homines fuerint, uel laruas se fieri dum opinantur, uel dum manes deos, tanto peiores fiunt, quanto sunt nocendi cupidiores, ut etiam quibusdam sacrificiis tamquam diuinis honoribus post mortem se inuitari opinentur, ut noceant. Laruas quippe dicit esse noxios daemones ex hominibus factos. Sed hinc alia quaestio est. Inde autem perhibet appellari Graece beatos εὐδαίμονας, quod boni sint animi, hoc est boni daemones, animos quoque hominum daemones esse confirmans.	He does say, it is true, that human souls too are demons. Humans become lares if their merits are good, and lemures, or larvae, if they are bad. They are called manes gods if it is uncertain whether their merits are good or bad. Who would not see, if he paid even slight attention, what an abyss this opinion opens for the pursuit of depraved conduct? However wicked people may have been, while they suppose that they will become larvae, or manes gods, they become all the worse the more eager they are to do harm. They even suppose that after death they will be invited by certain sacrifices, as if by divine honors, to do harm. For he says that larvae are harmful demons who come from humans. But that is another question. He further states that this is why the happy are called in Greek εὐδαίμονας [eudaimonas, "having a good spirit"]: because they are good souls, that is, good demons. In this way he confirms that human souls too are demons.[11]

10 Plotinus (AD 205–270), founder of Neoplatonism; the quotation is from his Enneads (4.3.12).
11 Lares were household guardian spirits, lemures and larvae malevolent ghosts, and the manes the spirits of the dead in Roman religion. Augustine is drawing on Apuleius, On the God of Socrates 15.

THE THREE CONTRARIES BY WHICH, ACCORDING TO THE PLATONISTS, THE NATURE OF DEMONS IS DISTINGUISHED FROM THAT OF HUMAN BEINGS

Apuleius contrasts gods and humans in place, length of life and happiness.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.12	Sed nunc de his agimus, quos in natura propria descripsit inter deos et homines genere animalia, mente rationalia, animo passiua, corpore aeria, tempore aeterna. Nempe cum prius deos in sublimi caelo, homines autem in terra infima disiunctos locis et naturae dignitate secerneret, ita conclusit: Habetis, inquit, interim bina animalia: deos ab hominibus plurimum differentes loci sublimitate, uitae perpetuitate, naturae perfectione, nullo inter se propinquo communicatu, cum et habitacula summa ab infimis tanta intercapedo fastigii dispescat, et uiuacitas illic aeterna et indefecta sit, hic caduca et subsiciua, et ingenia illa ad beatitudinem sublimata, haec ad miserias infimata.. Hic terna uideo commemorata contraria de duabus naturae partibus ultimis, id est summis adque infimis.	But now we are dealing with the beings he described, in their own nature, as standing between gods and humans: living beings in kind, rational in mind, subject to passions in soul, airy in body, eternal in duration. First he set the gods apart in the lofty heaven and humans on the lowest earth, separated by place and by the dignity of their nature. Then he concluded: "You have, then, for the moment, two kinds of living beings. The gods differ greatly from humans in loftiness of place, perpetuity of life, and perfection of nature, with no close communication between them. So great a gap in height divides the highest dwellings from the lowest. Life there is eternal and unfailing, here perishable and precarious. Those minds are raised up to happiness, these brought low to miseries." Here I see three contrasts named between the two extreme parts of nature, the highest and the lowest.
	Nam tria quae proposuit de dis laudabilia, eadem repetiuit, aliis quidem uerbis, ut eis aduersa alia tria ex hominibus redderet. Tria deorum haec sunt: loci sublimitas, uitae perpetuitas, perfectio naturae. Haec aliis uerbis ita repetiuit, ut eis tria contraria hnmanae condicionis obponeret. Cum et habitacula, inquit, summa ab infimis tanta intercapedo fastigii dispescat, quia dixerat loci sublimitatem; et uiuacitas, inquit, illic aeterna et indefecta sit, hic caduca et subsiciua, quia dixerat uitae perpetuitatem; et ingenia illa, inquit, ad beatitudinem sublimata, haec ad miserias infimata, quia dixerat naturae perfectionem. Tria igitur ab eo posita sunt deorum, id est locus sublimis, aeternitas, beatitudo; et his contraria tria hominum, id est locus infimus, mortalitas, miseria.	He took the three praiseworthy things he had first stated about the gods and repeated them in other words, so as to set against them three opposites drawn from humans. The three that belong to the gods are these: loftiness of place, perpetuity of life, perfection of nature. These he repeated in other words, so as to oppose to them three contrary features of the human condition. "So great a gap in height," he says, "divides the highest dwellings from the lowest"—because he had said loftiness of place. "Life there," he says, "is eternal and unfailing, here perishable and precarious"—because he had said perpetuity of life. "Those minds," he says, "are raised up to happiness, these brought low to miseries"—because he had said perfection of nature. So he assigned three things to the gods: a lofty place, eternity, and happiness. And he assigned their three opposites to humans: the lowest place, mortality, and misery.

HOW DEMONS, IF THEY ARE NEITHER HAPPY WITH THE GODS NOR WRETCHED WITH HUMAN BEINGS, CAN BE IN THE MIDDLE BETWEEN THE TWO WITHOUT SHARING IN EITHER

Demons in the middle must have eternity from the gods and misery from humans.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.13	Inter haec terna deorum et hominum quoniam daemones medios posuit, de loco nulla est controuersia; inter sublimem quippe et infimum medius locus aptissime habetur et dicitur. Cetera bina restant, quibus cura adtentior adhibenda est, quem ad modum uel aliena esse a daemonibus ostendantur, uel si eis distribuantur, ut medietas uidetur exposcere. Sed ab eis aliena esse non possunt. Non enim sicut dicimus locum medium nec summum esse nec infimum, ita daemones, cum sint animalia rationalia, nec beatos esse nec miseros, sicuti sunt arbusta uel pecora, quae sunt sensus uel rationis expertia, recte possumus dicere. Quorum ergo ratio mentibus inest, aut miseros esse aut beatos necesse est. Item non possumus recte dicere nec mortales esse daemones nec aeternos.	He placed the demons in the middle between these three attributes of the gods and the three of humans. About place there is no dispute, since a place between the lofty and the lowest is very fittingly regarded and described as the middle. The other two pairs remain, and they call for closer attention. Either it must be shown that they do not belong to demons at all, or, if they do, how they are distributed to them, as their middle position seems to demand. But they cannot fail to belong to them. We may say that a middle place is neither highest nor lowest. But we cannot in the same way rightly say that demons, being rational living beings, are neither happy nor miserable, as trees or cattle are, which lack sensation or reason. Beings whose minds possess reason must be either miserable or happy. Likewise, we cannot rightly say that demons are neither mortal nor eternal.
	Omnia namque uiuentia aut in aeternum uiuunt, aut finiunt morte quod uiuunt. Iam uero iste tempore aeternos daemones dixit. Quid igitur restat, nisi ut hi medii de duobus summis unum habeant et de duobus infimis alterum? Nam si utraque de imis habebunt aut utraque de summis, medii non erunt, sed in alterutram partem uel resiliunt uel recumbunt. Quia ergo his binis, sicut demonstratum est, carere utrisque non possunt, acceptis ex utraque parte singulis mediabuntur. Ac per hoc quia de infimis habere non possunt aeternitatem, quae ibi non est, unum hoc de summis habent; et ideo non est alterum ad conplendam medietatem suam, quod de infimis habeant, nisi miseriam.	For all living things either live forever or end their life in death. Now, he has said that demons are eternal in duration. What remains, then, but that these middle beings have one of the two attributes of the highest and the other of the two of the lowest? If they have both from the lowest, or both from the highest, they will not be in the middle, but will either spring up or sink down to one side or the other. As has been shown, they cannot lack both members of either pair. They will therefore be in the middle by taking one attribute from each side. And so, since they cannot have eternity from the lowest, where it is not found, this one they have from the highest. To complete their middle position, then, there is nothing left for them to have from the lowest except misery.
	Est itaque secundum Platonicos sublimium deorum uel beata aeternitas uel aeterna beatitudo; hominum uero infimorum uel miseria mortalis uel mortalitas misera; daemonum autem mediorum uel misera aeternitas uel aeterna miseria. Nam et quinque illis, quae in definitione daemonum posuit, non eos medios, sicut promittebat, ostendit;. quoniam tria dixit eos habere nobiscum, quod genere animalia, quod mente rationalia, quod animo passiua sunt; cum dis autem unum, quod tempore aeterna; et unum proprium, quod corpore aeria. Quo	According to the Platonists, then, the lofty gods have either a happy eternity or an eternal happiness. Humans, the lowest, have either a mortal misery or a miserable mortality. And the demons in the middle have either a miserable eternity or an eternal misery. Indeed, even with the five features he put into his definition of demons, he did not show that they are in the middle, as he promised. He said they have three things in common modo ergo medii, quando unum habent cum summis, tria cum infimis? Quis non uideat relicta medietate quantum inclinentur et deprimantur ad infima?

LATIN

Sed plane etiam ibi medii possunt ita inueniri, ut unum habeant proprium, quod est corpus aerium, sicut et illi de summis adque infimis singula propria, di corpus aetherium hominesque terrenum; duo uero communia sint omnibus, quod genere sunt animalia et mente rationalia. Nam et ipse cum de dis et hominibus loqueretur: Habetis, inquit, bina animalia, et non solent isti deos nisi rationales mente perhibere. Duo sunt residua, quod sunt animo passiua et tempore aeterna; quorum habent unum cum infimis, cum summis alterum, ut proportionali ratione librata medietas neque sustollatur in summa, neque in infima deprimatur. Ipsa est autem illa daemonum misera aeternitas uel aeterna miseria. Qui enim ait animo passiua, etiam misera dixisset, nisi eorum cultoribus erubuisset.

Porro quia prouidentia summi Dei, sicut etiam ipsi fatentur, non fortuita temeritate regitur mundus, numquam esset istorum aeterna miseria, nisi esset magna malitia.

Si igitur beati recte dicuntur eudaemones, non sunt eudaemones daemones, quos inter homines et deos isti in medio locauerunt. Quis ergo est locus bonorum daemonum, qui supra homines, infra deos istis praebeant adiutorium, illis ministerium? Si enim boni aeternique sunt, profecto et beati sunt. Aeterna autem beatitudo medios eos esse non sinit, quia multum cum dis conparat multumque ab hominibus separat. Unde frustra isti conabuntur ostendere, quo modo daemones boni, si et inmortales sunt et beati, recte medii constituantur inter deos inmortales ac beatos et homines mortales ac miseros. Cum enim utrumque habeant cum dis, et beatitudinem scilicet et inmortalitatem, nihil autem horum cum hominibus et miseris et mortalibus: quo with us: they are living beings in kind, rational in mind, and subject to passions in soul. They have one in common with the gods: they are eternal in duration. And they have one of their own: they are airy in body. How, then, are they in the middle, when they have one thing in common with the highest and three with the lowest? Who does not see how far they abandon the middle and lean and are pressed down toward the lowest?

ENGLISH

But clearly they can be found to be in the middle even there, in the following way. They have one attribute of their own, the airy body, just as the highest and the lowest each have one of their own: the gods an ethereal body and humans an earthly one. Two attributes, however, are common to all: being living beings in kind and rational in mind. For he himself, speaking of gods and humans, said: "You have two kinds of living beings," and these people do not usually describe the gods as anything but rational in mind. Two remain: being subject to passions in soul and eternal in duration. Of these, demons have one in common with the lowest and the other with the highest, so that their middle position, balanced in due proportion, is neither raised to the highest nor pressed down to the lowest. And this is precisely that miserable eternity, or eternal misery, of the demons. For the man who said "subject to passions in soul" would also have said "miserable," had he not been ashamed before their worshipers.

Moreover, since the world is governed by the providence of the supreme God, as they themselves admit, and not by random chance, the misery of these beings would never be eternal unless their wickedness were great.

If, then, the happy are rightly called eudaemones, the demons whom these people have placed in the middle between humans and gods are not eudaemones. What place is there, then, for good demons, who, being above humans and below gods, are supposed to give help to the former and service to the latter? If they are good and eternal, they are certainly also happy. But eternal happiness does not allow them to be in the middle, since it puts them very close to the gods and separates them far from humans. These people will therefore try in vain to show how good demons, if they are both immortal and happy, can rightly be placed in the modo non potius remoti sunt ab hominibus disque coniuncti, quam inter utrosque medii constituti?	middle between immortal, happy gods and mortal, miserable humans. They have both things in common with the gods, namely happiness and immortality, and neither in common with humans, who are miserable and mortal. How, then, are they not removed from humans and joined to the gods, rather than set in the middle between the two?

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Tunc enim medii essent, si haberent et ipsi duo quaedam sua, non cum binis alterutrorum, sed cum singulis utrorumque communia; sicut homo medium quiddam est, sed inter pecora et angelos, ut, quia pecus est animal inrationale adque mortale, angelus autem rationale et inmortale, medius homo est, sed inferior angelis, superior pecoribus, habens cum pecoribus mortalitatem, rationem cum angelis, animal rationale mortale. Ita ergo cum quaerimus medium inter beatos inmortales miserosque mortales, hoc inuenire debemus, quod aut mortale sit beatum, aut inmortale sit miserum.	They would be in the middle only if they too had two attributes of their own, shared not with both attributes of one side or the other, but with one attribute of each side. A human being, for instance, is something in the middle, but between beasts and angels. A beast is a living being that is irrational and mortal, and an angel one that is rational and immortal. So a human being is in the middle, lower than the angels and higher than the beasts, having mortality in common with the beasts and reason in common with the angels: a rational, mortal living being. So when we look for a mean between the happy immortals and the miserable mortals, what we must find is something that is either mortal and happy or immortal and miserable.

WHETHER HUMAN BEINGS, BEING MORTAL, CAN BE HAPPY WITH TRUE HAPPINESS

Whether a human being can be both mortal and happy is an open question.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.14	Utrum et beatus et mortalis homo esse possit, magna est inter homines quaestio. Quidam enim condicionem suam humilius inspexerunt negaueruntque hominem capacem esse posse beatitudinis, quamdiu mortaliter uiuit. Quidam uero extulerunt se et ausi sunt dicere sapientiae compotes beatos esse posse mortales. Quod si ita est, quur non ipsi potius medii constituuntur inter mortales miseros et inmortales beatos, beatitudinem habentes cum inmortalibus beatis; mortalitatem cum mortalibus miseris? Profecto enim, si beati sunt, inuident nemini (nam quid miserius inuidentia?) et ideo mortalibus miseris, quantum possunt, ad consequendam beatitudinem consulunt, ut etiam inmortales ualeant esse post mortem et angelis inmortalibus beatisque coniungi.	Whether a human being can be both happy and mortal is a great question among humans. Some have viewed their condition more humbly and denied that a human being can be capable of happiness as long as he lives a mortal life. Others have exalted themselves and dared to say that mortals who possess wisdom can be happy. If that is so, why are these people not set as mediators between miserable mortals and happy immortals instead, since they have happiness in common with the happy immortals and mortality in common with the miserable mortals? Surely, if they are happy, they envy no one (for what is more miserable than envy?). So they help miserable mortals as much as they can to attain happiness, so that after death they too may be immortal and be joined to the immortal and happy angels.

THE MEDIATOR BETWEEN GOD AND HUMAN BEINGS, THE MAN CHRIST JESUS

Christ, mortal for a time and happy forever, is the one true mediator.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.15	Si autem, quod multo credibilius et probabilius disputatur, omnes homines, quamdiu mortales sunt, etiam miseri sint necesse est, quaerendus est medius, qui non solum homo, uerum etiam deus sit, ut homines ex mortali miseria ad beatam inmortalitatem huius medii beata mortalitas interueniendo perducat; quem neque non fieri mortalem oportebat, neque permanere mortalem. Mortalis quippe factus est non infirmata Verbi diuinitate, sed carnis infirmitate suscepta; non autem permansit in ipsa carne mortalis, quam resuscitauit a mortuis; quoniam ipse est fructus mediationis eius, ut nec ipsi, propter quos liberandos mediator effectus est, in perpetua uel carnis morte remanerent. Proinde mediatorem inter nos et Deum et mortalitatem habere oportuit transeuntem et beatitudinem permanentem, ut per id, quod transit, congrueret morituris, et ad id, quod permanet, transferret ex mortuis.	But it is argued, much more credibly and plausibly, that all humans must also be miserable as long as they are mortal. If so, we must look for a mediator who is not only human but also God. The happy mortality of this mediator, by its intervention, could then lead humans from mortal misery to happy immortality. It was not fitting that he should fail to become mortal, nor that he should remain mortal. He became mortal, not by any weakening of the divinity of the Word, but by taking on the weakness of the flesh. But he did not remain mortal in that flesh, which he raised from the dead. For this is the very fruit of his mediation: that those for whose liberation he became mediator should not remain in perpetual death, not even the death of the flesh. The mediator between us and God therefore had to have both a passing mortality and an abiding happiness. Through what passes he could be like those who were to die, and from the dead he could bring them over to what abides.[12]
	Boni igitur angeli inter miseros mortales et beatos inmortales medii esse non possunt, quia ipsi quoque et beati et inmortales sunt; possunt autem medii esse angeli mali, quia inmortales sunt cum illis, miseri cum istis. His contrarius est mediator bonus, qui aduersus eorum inmortalitatem et miseriam et mortalis esse ad tempus uoluit, et beatus in aeternitate persistere potuit; ac sic eos et inmortales superbos et miseros noxios, ne inmortalitatis iactantia seducerent ad miseriam, et suae mortis humilitate et suae beatitudinis benignitate destruxit in eis, quorum corda per suam fidem mundans ab illorum inmundissima dominatione liberauit.	The good angels, then, cannot be in the middle between miserable mortals and happy immortals, since they too are both happy and immortal. The evil angels, however, can be in the middle, since they are immortal like the one and miserable like the other. Opposed to them is the good mediator. Against their immortality and misery, he chose to be mortal for a time and was able to remain happy in eternity. The demons are proud immortals and harmful wretches, and he did not let them use their boast of immortality to lead people into misery. By the humility of his death and the kindness of his happiness he overthrew them in those whose hearts he cleansed through faith in him and freed from the demons' most unclean domination.
	Homo itaque mortalis et miser longe seiunctus ab inmortalibus et beatis quid eligat medium, per quod inmortalitati et beatitudini copuletur? Quod possit delectare in daemonum inmortalitate, miserum est; quod posset offendere in Christi mortalitate, iam non est. Ibi ergo cauenda est miseria sempiterna; hic mors timenda non est, quae non esse potuit sempiterna, et beatitudo	A human being, then, mortal and miserable and far removed from the immortal and happy, must choose a mediator through whom to be united to immortality and happiness. Which should he choose? Whatever might attract us in the demons' immortality is miserable. Whatever might have of-

12 Augustine echoes 1 Timothy 2:5: "one mediator between God and humanity, the man Christ Jesus."

LATIN

amanda est sempiterna. Ad hoc se quippe interponit medius inmortalis et miser, ut ad inmortalitatem beatam transire non sinat, quoniam persistit quod inpedit, id est ipsa miseria; ad hoc se autem interposuit mortalis et beatus, ut mortalitate transacta et ex mortuis faceret inmortales, quod in se resurgendo monstrauit, et ex miseris beatos, unde numquam ipse discessit. Alius est ergo medius malus, qui separat amicos; alius bonus, qui reconciliat inimicos.

Et ideo multi sunt medii separatores, quia multitudo, quae beata est, unius Dei participatione fit beata; cuius participationis priuatione misera multitudo malorum angelorum, quae se obponit potius ad inpedimentum, quam interponit ad beatitudinis adiutorium, etiam ipsa multitudine obstrepit quodam modo, ne possit ad illud unum beatificum perueniri, ad quod ut perduceremur, non multis, sed uno mediatore opus erat, et hoc eo ipso, cuius participatione simus beati, hoc est Verbo Dei non facto, per quod facta sunt omnia.

Nec tamen ob hoc mediator est, quia Verbum; maxime quippe inmortale et maxime beatum Verbum longe est a mortalibus miseris; sed mediator, per quod homo, eo ipso utique ostendens ad illud non solum beatum, uerum etiam beatificum bonum non oportere quaeri alios mediatores, per quos arbitremur nobis peruentionis gradus esse moliendos, quia beatus et beatificus Deus factus particeps humanitatis nostrae conpendium praebuit participandae diuinitatis suae. Neque enim nos a mortalitate et miseria liberans ad angelos inmortales beatosque ita perducit, ut eorum participatione etiam nos inmortales et beati simus; sed ad illam Trinitatem, cuius et angeli participatione beati sunt. Ideo quando in forma serui, ut mediator esset, infra angelos esse uoluit, in forma Dei supra angelos mansit; idem in inferioribus uia uitae, qui in superioribus uita.

ENGLISH

fended us in Christ's mortality no longer exists. There, then, we must beware of everlasting misery. Here we need not fear death, which could not be everlasting, and we must love an everlasting happiness. The immortal and miserable mediator puts himself in between in order to keep us from passing over to happy immortality, since the obstacle, misery itself, persists. But the mortal and happy one put himself in between so that, once his mortality had been passed through, he might make the dead immortal, as he showed in himself by rising again, and the miserable happy, a state he himself never left. So there is an evil mediator, who separates friends, and a good one, who reconciles enemies.

And that is why the separating mediators are many. The multitude of the happy is made happy by participation in the one God. The multitude of evil angels is miserable because it is deprived of that participation. It sets itself in the way to obstruct us rather than setting itself between to help us toward happiness. By its very numbers it raises a kind of clamor to keep us from reaching that one good that makes us happy. To be led to that good we needed not many mediators but one, and that one the very one by participation in whom we are happy: the Word of God, not made, through whom all things were made.[13]

Yet he is not mediator because he is the Word. The Word, supremely immortal and supremely happy, is far from miserable mortals. He is mediator because he is human. By this very fact he shows that, to reach that good which is not only happy but also makes us happy, we need not seek other mediators through whom we might think we must build steps of ascent. For the happy God, who makes us happy, by becoming a partaker of our humanity, has given us a shortcut to partaking of his divinity. In freeing us from mortality and misery, he does not lead us to the immortal and happy angels, so that by participation in them we too might be immortal and happy. He leads us to that Trinity by participation in which the angels too are happy. So when, in the form of a servant, he chose to be lower than the angels in order to be mediator, in the form of God he remained above

13 Allusion to John 1:3: "All things were made through him."

LATIN	ENGLISH
	the angels. He is the way of life among the lower, the same one who is life itself among the higher.[14]

WHETHER THE PLATONISTS WERE REASONABLE IN HOLDING THAT THE GODS OF HEAVEN AVOID EARTHLY CONTAMINATION AND DO NOT MIX WITH HUMAN BEINGS, WHOM THE DEMONS HELP TOWARD THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE GODS

The idea that gods avoid human contact to stay undefiled leads to absurdities.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.16 Non enim uerum est, quod idem Platonicus ait Platonem dixisse: Nullus Deus miscetur homini; et hoc praecipuum eorum sublimitatis ait esse specimen, quod nulla adtrectatione hominum contaminantur. Ergo daemones contaminari fatetur, et ideo eos, a quibus contaminantur, mundare non possunt omnesque inmundi pariter fiunt, et daemones contrectatione hominum et homines cultu daemonum. Aut si et contrectari miscerique hominibus, nec tamen contaminari daemones possunt, dis profecto meliores sunt, quia illi, si miscerentur, contaminarentur. Nam hoc deorum dicitur esse praecipuum, ut eos sublimiter separatos humana contrectatio contaminare non possit.	For it is not true, as that same Platonist says Plato said, that "no god mingles with a human being." He even says that the chief proof of their sublimity is that they are not defiled by any contact with human beings. So he admits that demons are defiled. Then they cannot cleanse those who defile them, and all alike become unclean: the demons by contact with human beings, and human beings by the worship of demons. Or else demons can be touched by human beings and mingle with them without being defiled. In that case they are certainly better than the gods, since the gods would be defiled if they mingled. For this is said to be the special distinction of the gods: that, set apart on high, they cannot be defiled by human contact.[15]
Deum quidem summum omnium creatorem, quem nos uerum Deum dicimus, sic a Platone praedicari adseuerat, quod ipse sit solus qui non possit penuria sermonis humani quauis oratione uel modice conprehendi; uix autem sapientibus uiris, cum se uigore animi quantum licuit a corpore remouerunt, intellectum huius Dei, id quoque interdum uelut in altissimis tenebris rapidissimo coruscamine lumen candidum intermicare. Si ergo supra omnia uere summus Deus intellegibili et ineffabili quadam praesentia, etsi interdum, etsi tamquam rapidissimo coruscamine lumen candidum intermicans, adest tamen sapientium mentibus, cum se quantum licuit a corpore remouerunt, nec ab eis contaminari potest: quid est quod isti di propterea constituuntur longe in sublimi loco, ne contrectatione contaminentur humana? Quasi uero aliud corpora illa aetheria quam uidere sufficiat, quorum luce terra, quantum sufficit, inlustratur.	He asserts that Plato proclaims the supreme God, the creator of all things, whom we call the true God, to be the only one who cannot be grasped even moderately by any discourse, because human speech is so poor. Even wise men, he says, when by the vigor of the mind they have withdrawn from the body as far as they can, barely attain an understanding of this God. Even that comes only at times, like a bright light flashing with a swift gleam through the deepest darkness. So the truly supreme God, above all things, is present to the minds of the wise by an intelligible and ineffable presence when they have withdrawn from the body as far as they can. That presence comes only at times, like a bright light flashing with a swift gleam, but it comes, and he cannot be defiled by them. Why, then, are these gods placed far off in a lofty region so that they will not be defiled by human contact? As if anything more were needed than simply to see those ethereal bodies, whose light illuminates the earth as much as it needs!

14 The "form of a servant" and "form of God" come from Philippians 2:6–7; "way" and "life" echo John 14:6.
15 The saying comes from Plato's Symposium 203a.

LATIN

Porro si non contaminantur sidera, cum uidentur, quos deos omnes uisibiles dicit: nec daemones hominum contaminantur aspectu, quamuis de proximo uideantur. An forte uocibus humanis contaminarentur, qui acie non contaminantur oculorum, et ideo daemones medios habent, per quos eis uoces hominum nuntientur, a quibus longe absunt, ut incontaminatissimi perseuerent? Quid iam de ceteris sensibus dicam? Non enim olfaciendo contaminari uel di possent, si adessent, uel cum adsunt daemones possunt uiuorum corporum uaporibus humanorum, si tantis sacrificiorum cadauerinis non contaminantur nidoribus. In gustandi autem sensu nulla necessitate reficiendae mortalitatis urgentur, ut fame adacti cibos ab hominibus quaerant. Tactus uero in potestate est. Nam licet ab eo potissimum sensu contrectatio dicta uideatur, hactenus tamen, si uellent, miscerentur hominibus, ut uiderent et uiderentur, audirent et audirentur.

Tangendi autem quae necessitas? Nam neque homines id concupiscere auderent, cum deorum uel daemonum bonorum conspectu uel conloquio fruerentur; et si in tantum curiositas progrederetur, ut uellet: quonam pacto quispiam posset inuitum tangere deum uel daemonem, qui nisi captum non potest passerem?

Videndo igitur uisibusque se praebendo et loquendo et audiendo di corporaliter misceri hominibus possent. Hoc autem modo daemones si miscentur, ut dixi, et non contaminantur, di autem contaminarentur, si miscerentur: incontaminabiles dicunt daemones et contaminabiles deos. Si autem contaminantur et daemones, quid conferunt hominibus ad uitam post mortem beatam, quos contaminati mundare non possunt, ut eos mundos dis incontaminatis possint adiungere, inter quos et illos medii constituti sunt? Aut si hoc eis beneficii non conferunt, quid prodest hominibus daemonum amica mediatio? An ut post mortem non ad deos homines per daemones transeant, sed simul uiuant utrique contaminati ac per hoc neutri beati?

ENGLISH

Further, he calls the stars all visible gods. If they are not defiled when they are seen, then neither are demons defiled by being seen by human beings, even though they are seen at close range. Or would the gods perhaps be defiled by human voices, though not by the gaze of human eyes? Is that why they have demons as intermediaries to report to them the voices of human beings, from whom they keep far away, so that they may remain utterly undefiled? What shall I say now of the other senses? Smell could not defile the gods if they were present. Nor, when the demons are present, can the vapors of living human bodies defile them, if they are not defiled by the great reek of carcasses from the sacrifices. As for taste, they are under no necessity of sustaining a mortal frame, so hunger does not drive them to seek food from human beings. Touch, finally, is within their control. For although contrectatio, "contact," seems to take its name chiefly from that sense, they could still, if they wished, mingle with human beings to the extent of seeing and being seen, hearing and being heard.

But what need is there to touch? Human beings would not dare to desire it while they enjoyed the sight or the conversation of gods or good demons. And even if curiosity went so far as to want it, how could anyone touch a god or a demon against his will, when he cannot touch even a sparrow unless he has caught it?

By seeing and letting themselves be seen, then, and by speaking and hearing, the gods could mingle bodily with human beings. Now suppose, as I said, that demons mingle in this way and are not defiled, while the gods would be defiled if they mingled. Then they are calling the demons undefilable and the gods defilable. But if the demons too are defiled, what do they contribute to human beings toward a happy life after death? Being defiled, they cannot cleanse them, and so cannot join them, once cleansed, to the undefiled gods, between whom and human beings they have been placed as intermediaries. And if they do not confer this benefit, what good is the friendly mediation of demons to human beings? Is it so that after death human beings will not pass to the gods through the demons, but both will live together, defiled, and therefore neither will be happy?

LATIN	ENGLISH
Nisi forte quis dicat more spongiarum uel huiusce modi rerum mundare daemones amicos suos, ut tanto ipsi sordidiores fiant, quanto fiunt homines eis uelut tergentibus mundiores. Quod si ita est, contaminatioribus di miscentur daemonibus, qui, ne contaminarentur, hominum propinquitatem contrectationemque uitarunt. An forte di possunt ab hominibus contaminatos mundare daemones, nec ab eis contaminari, et eo modo non possent et homines? Quis talia sentiat, nisi quem fallacissimi daemones deceperunt? Quid quod, si uideri et uidere contaminat, uidentur ab hominibus di, quos uisibiles dicit, clarissima mundi lumina et cetera sidera, tutioresque sunt daemones ab ista hominum contaminatione, qui non possunt uideri, nisi uelint?	Unless perhaps someone says that the demons cleanse their friends the way sponges and such things do, so that they themselves become dirtier in proportion as human beings become cleaner by their wiping, as it were. If that is so, then the gods mingle with demons who are more defiled than human beings, though the gods avoided nearness to human beings and contact with them precisely so as not to be defiled. Or perhaps the gods can cleanse demons defiled by human beings without being defiled by them, yet could not do the same for human beings? Who could believe such things, except someone deceived by those most deceitful demons? And there is more. If seeing and being seen defile, then the gods he calls visible, the brightest lights of the world and the other stars, are seen by human beings. The demons, meanwhile, who cannot be seen unless they wish to be, are safer from this human defilement.
Aut si non uideri, sed uidere contaminat, negent ab istis clarissimis mundi luminibus, quos deos opinantur, uideri homines, cum radios suos terras usque pertendant. Qui tamen eorum radii per quaeque inmunda diffusi non contaminantur, et di contaminarentur, si hominibus miscerentur, etiamsi esset necessarius in subueniendo contactus? Nam radiis solis et lunae terra contingitur, nec istam contaminat lucem.	Or if it is not being seen but seeing that defiles, then let them deny that human beings are seen by those brightest lights of the world, which they suppose to be gods, although these stretch their rays all the way to the earth. Their rays spread over all sorts of unclean things without being defiled. Would the gods, then, be defiled if they mingled with human beings, even if contact were needed to help them? For the rays of the sun and moon touch the earth, and the earth does not defile that light.

THAT TO ATTAIN THE HAPPY LIFE, WHICH CONSISTS IN SHARING THE SUPREME GOOD, A HUMAN BEING NEEDS NOT SUCH A MEDIATOR AS A DEMON IS, BUT SUCH AS CHRIST ALONE IS

We need a mediator like Christ, who shares our mortality but not our sin.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.17 Miror autem plurimum tam doctos homines, qui cuncta corporalia et sensibilia prae incorporalibus et intellegibilibus postponenda iudicauerunt, cum agitur de beata uita, corporalium contrectationum facere mentionem. Ubi est illud Plotini, ubi ait: Fugiendum est igitur ad carissimam patriam, et ibi pater, et ibi omnia. Quae igitur, inquit, classis aut fuga? Similem Deo fieri. Si ergo deo quanto similior, tanto fit quisque propinquior, nulla est ab illo alia longinquitas quam eius dissimilitudo. Incorporali uero illi aeterno et incommutabili tanto est anima hominis dissimilior, quanto rerum temporalium mutabiliumque cupidior.	I am utterly amazed that such learned men should mention bodily contact when the question is the happy life. These are men who judged that all bodily and sensible things must be ranked below incorporeal and intelligible ones. What has become of that saying of Plotinus: "We must flee, then, to our most beloved fatherland. There is the Father, and there is everything. What fleet, then, or what flight? To become like God." If, then, the more like God one becomes, the nearer one comes to him, there is no other distance from him than unlikeness to him. And the human soul is unlike that incorporeal, eternal and unchangeable being in proportion as it craves temporal and changeable things.[16]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Hoc ut sanetur, quoniam inmortali puritati, quae in summo est, ea quae in imo sunt mortalia et inmunda conuenire non possunt, opus est quidem mediatore; non tamen tali, qui corpus quidem habeat inmortale propinquum summis, animum autem morbidum similem infimis (quo morbo nobis inuideat potius ne sanemur, quam adiuuet ut sanemur); sed tali, qui nobis infimis ex corporis mortalitate coaptatus inmortali spiritus iustitia, per quam non locorum distantia, sed similitudinis excellentia mansit in summis, mundandis liberandisque nobis uere diuinum praebeat adiutorium. Qui profecto incontaminabilis Deus absit ut contaminationem timeret ex homine quo indutus est, aut ex hominibus inter quos in homine conuersatus est.	Mortal and unclean things at the bottom cannot be united with the immortal purity at the top, so a mediator is indeed needed to heal this unlikeness. But not a mediator who has an immortal body close to the highest beings and a diseased mind like the lowest, for that disease would make him begrudge our healing rather than help us to be healed. We need one who is fitted to us in our lowliness by the mortality of his body. Yet he must remain among the highest by the immortal righteousness of his spirit, through excellence of likeness rather than distance of place. Such a mediator can give us truly divine help in cleansing and freeing us. And since he is God and cannot be defiled, far be it from him to fear defilement from the man he put on, or from the human beings among whom he lived as a man.
Non enim parua sunt haec interim duo, quae salubriter sua incarnatione monstrauit, nec carne posse contaminari ueram diuinitatem, nec ideo putandos daemones nobis esse meliores, quia non habent carnem. Hic est, sicut eum sancta scriptura praedicat, mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus, de cuius et diuinitate, qua patri est semper aequalis, et humanitate, qua nobis factus est similis, non hic locus est ut conpetenter pro nostra facultate dicamus.	Meanwhile, two things that he showed for our salvation by his incarnation are no small matter. True divinity cannot be defiled by flesh, and demons must not be thought better than we are because they have no flesh. This is he who, as holy Scripture proclaims, is "the mediator between God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus." This is not the place to speak as adequately as our ability allows about his divinity, by which he is always equal to the Father, and his humanity, by which he became like us.[17]

THAT THE DECEIT OF THE DEMONS, WHILE PROMISING A WAY TO GOD BY THEIR INTERCESSION, AIMS TO TURN HUMAN BEINGS AWAY FROM THE WAY OF TRUTH

The demons' bodily ladder of elements is a false way that blocks the way to God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.18 Falsi autem illi fallacesque mediatores daemones, qui, cum per spiritus inmunditiam miseri ac maligni multis effectibus r clareant, per corporalium tamen locorum interualla et per aeriorum corporum leuitatem a prouectu animorum nos auocare adque auertere moliuntur, non uiam praebent ad Deum, sed ne uia teneatur, inpediunt. Quando quidem et in ipsa uia corporali (quae falsissima est et plenissima erroris, qua non iter agit iustitia; quoniam non per corporalem altitudinem, sed per spiritalem, hoc est incorporalem,	But the demons are false and deceitful mediators. They are wretched and malicious through uncleanness of spirit, though many striking effects make them conspicuous. By the distances of bodily places and the lightness of their airy bodies they try to call us away and turn us aside from the progress of the soul. They do not offer a way to God; they prevent us from keeping to the way. Their way is a bodily one, utterly false and full of error, and righteousness does not travel along it.

16 The quotation combines passages from Plotinus's Enneads (1.6.8 and 1.2.3).
17 1 Timothy 2:5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
similitudinem ad Deum debemus ascendere) — in ipsa tamen uia corporali, quam daemonum amici per elementorum gradus ordinant inter aetherios deos et terrenos homines aeriis daemonibus mediis constitutis, hoc deos opinantur habere praecipuum, ut propter hoc interuallum locorum contrectatione non contaminentur humana.	For we must ascend to God not by bodily height but by spiritual, that is, incorporeal, likeness. On this bodily way the friends of the demons arrange the ranks of the elements, with ethereal gods above, earthly human beings below, and airy demons set in the middle. Yet even there they suppose that the gods' chief distinction is that this distance of place keeps them from being defiled by human contact.
Ita daemones contaminari potius ab hominibus, quam homines mundari a daemonibus credunt, et deos ipsos contaminari potuisse, nisi loci altitudine munirentur. Quis tam infelix est, ut ista uia mundari se existimet, ubi homines contaminantes, daemones contaminati, di contaminabiles praedicantur, et non potius eligat uiam, ubi contaminantes magis daemones euitentur et ab incontaminabili Deo ad ineundam societatem incontaminatorum angelorum homines a contaminatione mundentur?	So they believe that demons are defiled by human beings rather than that human beings are cleansed by demons, and that the gods themselves could have been defiled had the height of their place not protected them. On this way human beings are proclaimed defiling, demons defiled and gods defilable. Who is so unhappy as to think that he will be cleansed on such a way? Who would not choose instead the way on which the demons, the real defilers, are avoided? On that way the undefilable God cleanses human beings of defilement so that they may enter the fellowship of the undefiled angels.

THAT EVEN AMONG THEIR WORSHIPERS THE NAME "DEMON" IS NO LONGER USED TO MEAN ANYTHING GOOD

Scripture never speaks of good demons, so the good spirits should be called angels.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.19 Sed ne de uerbis etiam nos certare uideamur, quoniam nonnulli istorum, ut ita dixerim, daemonicolarum, in quibus et Labeo est, eosdem perhibent ab aliis angelos dici, quos ipsi daemones nuncupant, iam mihi de bonis angelis aliquid uideo disserendum, quos isti esse non negant, sed eos bonos daemones uocare quam angelos malunt. Nos autem, sicut scriptura loquitur, secundum quam Christiani sumus, angelos quidem partim bonos, partim malos, numquam uero bonos daemones legimus; sed ubicumque illarum litterarum hoc nomen positum reperitur, siue daemones, siue daemonia dicantur, non nisi maligni significantur spiritus.	But we too must not seem to be quarreling over words. Some of these demon-worshipers, if I may call them that, Labeo among them, assert that the beings they themselves call demons are called angels by others. So I see that I must now say something about the good angels. These people do not deny that they exist, but they prefer to call them good demons rather than angels. We, however, follow the usage of the Scripture by which we are Christians. There we read of angels, some good and some bad, but never of good demons. Wherever this name is found in those writings, whether as daemones or as daemonia, it means nothing but evil spirits.[18]
Et hanc loquendi consuetudinem in tantum populi usquequaque secuti sunt, ut eorum etiam, qui pagani appellantur et deos multos ac daemones colendos esse contendunt, nullus fere sit tam litteratus et doctus, qui audeat in laude uel seruo suo dicere: Daemonem habes;	People everywhere have followed this way of speaking so widely that even among those called pagans, who contend that many gods and demons should be worshiped, there is scarcely anyone so well read and learned that he would dare to say, by 18 Cornelius Labeo was a pagan writer on Roman religion, probably of the 3rd century AD.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	sed quilibet hoc dicere uoluerit, non se aliter accipi, quam maledicere uoluisse, dubitare non possit. Quae igitur nos causa conpellit, ut post offensionem aurium tam multarum, ut iam paene sint omnium, quae hoc uerbum non nisi in malam partem audire consuerunt, quod diximus cogamur exponere, cum possimus angelorum nomine adhibito eandem offensionem, quae nomine daemonum fieri poterat, euitare?	way of praise, even to his own slave, "You have a demon." Anyone who chose to say it could not doubt that he would be understood as meaning an insult. So many ears, almost all ears by now, are used to hearing this word only in a bad sense. Why, then, should we offend them and then be forced to explain what we meant, when by using the name "angels" we can avoid the offense that the name "demons" could cause?

THE KIND OF KNOWLEDGE THAT MAKES THE DEMONS PROUD

The name demon comes from knowledge, and the demons' knowledge without love makes them proud.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.20	Quamquam etiam ipsa origo huius nominis, si diuinos intueamur libros, aliquid adfert cognitione dignissimum. Daemones enim dicuntur (quoniam uocabulum Graecum est) ob scientiam nominati. Apostolus autem spiritu sancto locutus ait: Scientia inflat, caritas uero aedificat; quod recte aliter non intellegitur, nisi scientiam tunc prodesse, cum caritas inest; sine hac autem inflare, id est in superbiam inanissimae quasi uentositatis extollere. Est ergo in daemonibus scientia sine caritate, et ideo tam inflati, hoc est tam superbi sunt, ut honores diuinos et religionis seruitutem, quam uero Deo deberi sciunt, sibi satis egerint exhiberi, et quantum possunt aput quos possunt adhuc agant.	And yet even the origin of this name, if we look at the divine books, offers something well worth knowing. Demons are so called (the word is Greek) because of their knowledge. Now the Apostle, speaking by the Holy Spirit, says: "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up." The only right way to understand this is that knowledge is beneficial when love is present, but without love it puffs up, that is, it inflates a person with the pride of a most empty windiness. In demons, then, there is knowledge without love. That is why they are so puffed up, that is, so proud. They have striven hard to have divine honors and religious service paid to themselves, though they know these are owed to the true God, and they still strive for this wherever they can, among whomever they can.[19]
	Contra superbiam porro daemonum, qua pro meritis possidebatur genus humanum, Dei humilitas, quae in Christo apparuit, quantam uirtutem habeat, animae hominum nesciunt inmunditia elationis inflatae, daemonibus similes, non scientia sed superbia.	Against this pride of the demons, which held the human race in its possession as it deserved, stands the humility of God that appeared in Christ. The souls of human beings do not know how great its power is, for they are puffed up with the uncleanness of conceit and are like the demons, not in knowledge, but in pride.

TO WHAT EXTENT THE LORD WAS WILLING TO MAKE HIMSELF KNOWN TO THE DEMONS

Christ made himself known to the demons through his power, enough to terrify them.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
9.21	Ipsi autem daemones etiam hoc ita sciunt, ut eidem Domino infirmitate carnis induto dixerint: Quid nobis et tibi, Iesu Nazarene? Venisti perdere nos? Clarum est in his uerbis, quod in eis et tanta scientia erat, et caritas non erat. Poenam suam quippe formidabant ab illo, non	The demons themselves know even this, so much so that they said to this same Lord, clothed in the weakness of the flesh: "What have we to do with you, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us?" These words make it clear that there was 19 Augustine follows the ancient derivation of daimōn from daēmōn, "knowing." The quotation is 1 Corinthians 8:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
in illo iustitiam diligebant. Tantum uero eis innotuit, quantum uoluit; tantum autem uoluit, quantum oportuit. Sed innotuit non sicut angelis sanctis, qui eius, secundum id quod Dei Verbum est, participata aeternitate perfruuntur, sed sicut eis terrendis innotescendum fuit, ex quorum tyrannica quodam modo potestate fuerat liberaturus praedestinatos in suum regnum et gloriam semper ueracem et ueraciter sempiternam.	great knowledge in them, and no love. They dreaded the punishment he would bring them; they did not love the righteousness in him. He made himself known to them as far as he willed, and he willed as far as was fitting. But he did not make himself known to them as he does to the holy angels, who share in his eternity as the Word of God and enjoy it fully. He made himself known as he had to be known to those he meant to terrify. For he was going to free from their tyrannical power, so to speak, those predestined for his kingdom and his glory, ever true and truly everlasting.[20]
Innotuit ergo daemonibus non per id, quod est uita aeterna et lumen incommutabile, quod inluminat pios, cui uidendo per fidem, quae in illo est, corda mundantur, sed per quaedam temporalia suae uirtutis effecta et occultissimae signa praesentiae, quae angelicis sensibus etiam malignorum spirituum potius quam infirmitati hominum possint esse conspicua. Denique quando ea paululum subprimenda iudicauit et aliquanto altius latuit, dubitauit de illo daemonum princeps eumque tentauit, an Christus esset explorans, quantum se tentari ipse permisit, ut hominem, quem gerebat, ad nostrae imitationis temperaret exemplum.	So he made himself known to the demons not as what he is, eternal life and the unchangeable light that illuminates the pious, which hearts are cleansed to see through faith in him. He made himself known through certain temporal effects of his power and signs of his most hidden presence, which could be more evident to the angelic senses, even of evil spirits, than to human weakness. Indeed, when he judged that these should be held back a little and he hid himself somewhat more deeply, the prince of demons was in doubt about him. He tempted him to find out whether he was the Christ, but only as far as Christ allowed himself to be tempted, in order to shape the man he bore into an example for us to imitate.
Post illam uero tentationem, cum angeli, sicut scriptum est, ministrarent ei, boni utique et sancti ac per hoc spiritibus inmundis metuendi et tremendi, magis magisque innotescebat daemonibus quantus esset, ut ei iubenti, quamuis in illo contemtibilis uideretur carnis infirmitas, resistere nullus auderet.	But after that temptation, "angels," as it is written, "ministered to him." These were good and holy angels, and therefore beings that unclean spirits must fear and tremble before. After that it became more and more known to the demons how great he was. None of them dared to resist his commands, though the weakness of his flesh seemed contemptible.[21]

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE HOLY ANGELS AND THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE DEMONS

Holy angels know temporal things in the Word of God; demons only guess from signs.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.22 His igitur angelis bonis omnis corporalium temporaliumque rerum scientia, qua inflantur daemones, uilis est: non quod earum ignari sint, sed quod illis Dei, qua sanctificantur, caritas cara est, prae cuius non	To these good angels, then, all knowledge of bodily and temporal things, the knowledge that puffs up the demons, is cheap. This is not because they are ignorant of such things. It is because the love

20 Mark 1:24.
21 Matthew 4:11.

LATIN	ENGLISH
tantum incorporali, uerum etiam incommutabili et ineffabili pulchritudine, cuius sancto amore inardescunt, omnia, quae infra sunt et, quod illud est, non sunt seque ipsos inter illa contemnunt, ut ex toto, quod boni sunt, eo bono, ex quo boni sunt, perfruantur. Et ideo certius etiam temporalia et mutabilia ista nouerunt, quia eorum principales causas in Verbo Dei conspiciunt, per quod factus est mundus; quibus causis quaedam probantur, quaedam reprobantur, cuncta ordinantur.	of God, by which they are made holy, is dear to them. They burn with a holy love for God's beauty, which is not only incorporeal but also unchangeable and ineffable. Compared with it they despise everything that is beneath it and is not what it is, and themselves among those things, so that with all the good that they are they may enjoy the Good from which they have their goodness. That is why they know even these temporal and changeable things more surely than the demons do. They behold the principal causes of these things in the Word of God, through whom the world was made, and by these causes some things are approved, some rejected, and all are set in order.
Daemones autem non aeternas temporum causas et quodam modo cardinales in Dei sapientia contemplantur, sed quorundam signorum nobis occultorum maiore experientia multo plura quam homines futura prospiciunt; dispositiones quoque suas aliquando praenuntiant. Denique saepe isti, numquam illi omnino falluntur. Aliud est enim temporalibus temporalia et mutabilibus mutabilia coniectare eisque temporalem et mutabilem modum suae uoluntatis et facultatis inserere, quod daemonibus certa ratione permissum est; aliud autem in aeternis adque incommutabilibus Dei legibus, quae in eius sapientia uiuunt, mutationes temporum praeuidere Deique uoluntatem, quae tam certissima quam potentissima est omnium, spiritus eius participatione cognoscere; quod sanctis angelis recta discretione donatum est. Itaque non solum aeterni, uerum etiam beati sunt. Bonum autem, quo beati sunt, Deus illis est, a quo creati sunt.	The demons, by contrast, do not contemplate in the wisdom of God the eternal and, so to speak, cardinal causes of the times. But they have greater experience of certain signs hidden from us, and so they foresee many more future events than human beings do. Sometimes, too, they announce their own plans in advance. In short, the demons are often mistaken; the angels never are. It is one thing to conjecture temporal things from temporal things and changeable things from changeable things, and to insert into them the temporal and changeable measure of one's own will and power. This is permitted to the demons, for a definite reason. It is another thing to foresee the changes of the times in the eternal and unchangeable laws of God, which live in his wisdom, and to know God's will, the most certain and most powerful of all wills, by sharing in his Spirit. By a just distinction this has been granted to the holy angels. So they are not only eternal but also happy. And the Good that makes them happy is God, by whom they were created.
Illius quippe indeclinabiliter participatione et contemplatione perfruuntur.	For they enjoy him, without ever swerving, by sharing in him and contemplating him.

THAT THE NAME "GODS" IS FALSELY GIVEN TO THE GODS OF THE NATIONS, THOUGH ON THE AUTHORITY OF SCRIPTURE IT IS SHARED BY THE HOLY ANGELS AND BY RIGHTEOUS HUMAN BEINGS

Scripture calls angels and even humans gods, but only the one God is to be worshiped.

LATIN	ENGLISH
9.23 Hos si Platonici malunt deos quam daemones dicere eisque adnumerare, quos a summo Deo conditos deos scribit eorum auctor et magister Plato: dicant quod uolunt; non enim cum eis de uerborum controuersia laborandum est. Si enim sic inmortales, ut tamen a	If the Platonists prefer to call these beings gods rather than demons, and to count them among the gods that their founder and teacher Plato writes were created by the supreme God, let them say what they like. We need not labor with them over summo Deo factos, et si non per se ipsos, sed ei, a quo facti sunt, adhaerendo beatos esse dicunt: hoc dicunt quod dicimus, quolibet eos nomine appellent. Hanc autem Platonicorum esse sententiam, siue omnium siue meliorum, in eorum litteris inueniri potest.

LATIN

Nam et de ipso nomine, quod huius modi inmortalem beatamque creaturam deos appellant, ideo inter nos et ipsos paene nulla dissensio est, quia et in nostris sacris litteris legitur: Deus deorum dominus locutus est, et alibi: Confitemini deo deorum, et alibi: Rex magnus super omnes deos. Illud autem ubi scriptum est: Terribilis est super omnes deos, quur dictum sit, deinceps ostenditur. Sequitur enim: Quoniam omnes di gentium daemonia, Dominus autem caelos fecit. Super omnes ergo deos dixit, sed gentium, id est quos gentes pro dis habent, quae sunt daemonia; ideo terribilis, sub quo terrore Domino dicebant: Venisti perdere nos? Illud uero, ubi dicitur: Deus deorum, non potest intellegi deus daemoniorum; et rex magnus super omnes deos absit ut dicatur rex magnus super omnia daemonia.

Sed homines quoque in populo Dei eadem scriptura deos appellat. Ego, inquit, dixi, di estis et filii Excelsi omnes. Potest itaque intellegi horum deorum deus, qui dictus est deus deorum, et super hos deos rex magnus, qui dictus est rex magnus super omnes deos.

Verum tamen cum a nobis quaeritur: si homines dicti sunt di, quod in populo Dei sunt, quem per angelos uel per homines adloquitur Deus, quanto magis inmortales eo nomine digni sunt, qui ea fruuntur beatitudine, ad quam Deum colendo cupiunt homines peruenire: quid respondebimus nisi non frustra in scripturis sanctis expressius homines nuncupatos deos, quam illos inmortales et beatos, quibus nos aequales futuros in resurrectione promittitur, ne scilicet propter illorum excellentiam aliquem eorum nobis constituere deum a dispute about words. If they say that these beings are immortal yet made by the supreme God, and happy not through themselves but by clinging to the one who made them, then they are saying what we say, whatever name they give them. That this is the view of the Platonists, either of all of them or of the better ones, can be found in their writings.[22]

ENGLISH

As for the name itself, their calling such an immortal and happy creature a god, there is hardly any disagreement between us and them. In our sacred writings too we read: "The God of gods, the Lord, has spoken." Elsewhere we read: "Give thanks to the God of gods." And elsewhere: "A great king above all gods." But where it is written, "He is fearsome above all gods," the reason is shown at once, for the text continues: "For all the gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens." So it says "above all gods," but the gods of the nations, that is, the beings the nations take for gods, which are demons. That is why he is "fearsome": it was in this fear that they said to the Lord, "Have you come to destroy us?" But "the God of gods" cannot be understood as the god of demons. And far be it from us to take "a great king above all gods" to mean a great king above all demons.[23]

But the same Scripture also calls human beings among the people of God gods: "I said," it says, "you are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High." So the one called the God of gods can be understood as the God of these gods, and the one called a great king above all gods as a great king above these gods.[24]

Yet someone may ask us: human beings have been called gods because they belong to the people of God, whom God addresses through angels or through human beings; how much more, then, are those immortals worthy of that name who already enjoy the happiness that human beings long to reach by worshiping God? What shall we answer? Only this: it is not without reason that holy Scripture calls human beings gods more explicitly than it does those immortal and happy beings, to whom we are promised to be equal in the resurrection. It

22 In Plato's Timaeus (40–41), the maker of the world creates the lesser gods.
23 Psalms 49:1 (50:1 in most English Bibles), 135:2 (136:2), 94:3 (95:3) and 95:4–5 (96:4–5).
24 Psalm 81:6 (82:6 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

infidelis auderet infirmitas? Quod in homine facile est euitare.

Et euidentius dici debuerunt homines di in populo Dei, ut certi ac fidentes fierent eum esse Deum suum, qui dictus est deus deorum; quia etsi appellentur di inmortales illi et beati, qui in caelis sunt, non tamen dicti sunt di deorum, id est di hominum in populo Dei constitutorum, quibus dictum est: Ego dixi, di estis et filii Excelsi omnes. Hinc est quod ait apostolus: Etsi sunt qui dicuntur di, siue in caelo siue in terra, sicuti sunt di multi et domini multi: nobis tamen unus Deus Pater, ex quo omnia et nos in ipso, et unus Dominus Iesus Christus, per quem omnia et nos per ipsum.

Non multum ergo de nomine disceptandum est, cum res ipsa ita clareat, ut ab scrupulo dubitationis aliena sit. Illud uero, quod nos ex eorum inmortalium beatorum numero missos esse angelos dicimus, qui Dei uoluntatem hominibus adnuntiarent, illis autem non placet, quia hoc ministerium non per illos, quos deos appellant, id est inmortales et beatos, sed per daemones fieri credunt, quos inmortales tantum, non etiam beatos audent dicere, aut certe ita inmortales et beatos, ut tamen daemones bonos, non deos sublimiter conlocatos et ab humana contrectatione semotos, quamuis nominis controuersia uideatur, tamen ita detestabile est nomen daemonum, ut hoc modis omnibus a sanctis angelis nos remouere debeamus.

Nunc ergo ita liber iste claudatur, ut sciamus inmortales et beatos, quodlibet uocentur, qui tamen facti et creati sunt, medios non esse ad inmortalem beatitudinem perducendis mortalibus miseris, a quibus utraque differentia separantur. Qui autem medii sunt communem habendo inmortalitatem cum superioribus, miseriam cum inferioribus, quoniam merito malitiae miseri sunt, beatitudinem, quam non habent, inuidere nobis possunt potius quam praebere. Unde nihil habent amici daemonum quod nobis dignum adferant, quur eos tamquam adiutores colere debeamus, quos potius ut deceptores uitare debemus.

ENGLISH

does so to keep faithless weakness from daring, because of their excellence, to set up one of them as a god for us. In the case of a human being, this danger is easy to avoid.

Human beings among the people of God had to be called gods more plainly, so that they might be sure and confident that their God is the one called the God of gods. For although those immortal and happy beings in heaven may be called gods, they have not been called gods of gods, that is, gods of the human beings established among the people of God, to whom it was said: "I said, you are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High." Hence the Apostle says: "Even if there are beings called gods, whether in heaven or on earth, as indeed there are many gods and many lords, yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him."[25]

So there is no need to argue much about the name, since the matter itself is so clear that it leaves no trace of doubt. But they do not accept what we say about the angels sent to announce God's will to human beings, namely, that these come from the number of those immortal and happy beings. They believe that this ministry is carried out not by the beings they call gods, that is, the immortal and happy ones, but by demons. These demons they dare to call only immortal, not happy as well, or at any rate immortal and happy only as good demons, not as gods set on high and removed from human contact. This may look like a dispute about a name. Even so, the name "demons" is so detestable that we must by all means keep it away from the holy angels.

Let this book close, then, on this understanding. Immortal and happy beings, whatever they are called, were still made and created. They are not intermediaries for bringing wretched mortals to immortal happiness, since they are separated from those mortals by both differences. Those who really are intermediaries share immortality with the beings above them and wretchedness with the beings below. They are wretched because their wickedness deserves it, and so they are more likely to begrudge us the happiness they lack than 25 1 Corinthians 8:5–6.

LATIN

Quos autem bonos et ideo non solum inmortales, uerum etiam beatos deorum nomine sacris et sacrificiis propter uitam beatam post mortem adipiscendam colendos putant, qualescumque illi sint et quolibet uocabulo digni sint, non eos uelle per tale religionis obsequium nisi unum Deum coli, a quo creati et cuius participatione beati sunt, adiuuante ipso in sequenti libro diligentius disseremus.

ENGLISH

to provide it. Hence the friends of the demons can offer us no worthy reason to worship as helpers those whom we ought rather to avoid as deceivers.

There remain the beings they consider good, and therefore not only immortal but also happy. They think these should be worshiped under the name of gods with rites and sacrifices, in order to attain a happy life after death. Whatever these beings may be, and whatever name they deserve, we shall argue more carefully in the next book, with God's help, that they wish no one to be worshiped with such religious service except the one God, who created them and by sharing in whom they are happy.

Book X

True worship and sacrifice
Worship belongs to God alone; Porphyry sought a way of salvation and missed it in Christ.

THAT EVEN THE PLATONISTS DEFINED TRUE HAPPINESS, WHETHER OF ANGELS OR OF HUMAN BEINGS, AS GIVEN BY THE ONE GOD; BUT IT MUST BE ASKED WHETHER THOSE THEY THINK SHOULD BE WORSHIPED FOR THIS REASON WANT SACRIFICE OFFERED ONLY TO THE ONE GOD OR ALSO TO THEMSELVES

Everyone wants to be happy; the Platonists, chosen in Book 8, agree that happiness comes from the one God.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.1	Omnium certa sententia est, qui ratione quoquo modo uti possunt, beatos esse omnes homines uelle. Qui autem sint uel unde fiant dum mortalium quaerit infirmitas, multae magnaeque controuersiae concitatae sunt, in quibus philosophi sua studia et otia contriuerunt, quas in medium adducere adque discutere et longum est et non necessarium. Si enim recolit qui haec legit, quid in libro egerimus octauo in eligendis philosophis, cum quibus haec de beata uita, quae post mortem futura est, quaestio tractaretur, utrum ad eam uni Deo uero, qui etiam effector est deorum, an plurimis dis religione sacrisque seruiendo peruenire possimus: non etiam hic eadem repeti expectat, praesertim cum possit relegendo, si forte oblitus est, adminiculari memoriam.	Everyone who can use reason in any way at all holds firmly that all human beings want to be happy. But when the weakness of mortals asks who the happy are, or how they become so, many great controversies arise. On these the philosophers have spent their studies and their leisure, and to bring them forward and discuss them would take long and is not necessary. For the reader may recall what we did in the eighth book in choosing the philosophers with whom to discuss this question about the happy life that is to come after death. The question was whether we can reach that life by serving, with religion and rites, the one true God, who is also the maker of the gods, or by serving many gods. If the reader recalls this, he will not expect the same things to be repeated here as well, especially since, if he has perhaps forgotten, he can prop up his memory by rereading.
	Elegimus enim Platonicos omnium philosophorum merito nobilissimos, propterea quia sapere potuerunt licet inmortalem ac rationalem uel intellectualem hominis animam nisi participato lumine illius Dei, a quo et ipsa et mundus factus est, beatam esse non posse; ita illud, quod omnes homines adpetunt, id est uitam beatam, quemquam isti adsecuturum negant, qui non illi uni optimo, quod est incommutabilis Deus, puritate casti amoris adhaeserit.	We chose the Platonists, deservedly the most renowned of all philosophers, because they were able to see that the human soul, though immortal and rational or intellectual, cannot be happy except by participating in the light of that God by whom both it and the world were made. So they deny that anyone will attain what all human beings seek—the happy life—unless he has clung with the purity of chaste love to that one supreme good, which is the unchangeable God.
	Sed quia ipsi quoque siue cedentes uanitati errorique populorum siue, ut ait apostolus, euanescentes in cogitationibus suis multos deos colendos ita putauerunt uel putari uoluerunt, ut quidam eorum etiam daemonibus diuinos honores sacrorum et sacrificiorum	But they too gave way, whether to the folly and error of the peoples or, as the apostle says, by "becoming futile in their thinking." They thought, or wanted it to be thought, that many gods should be worshiped, so much so that some of them even deferendos esse censerent, quibus iam non parua ex parte respondimus: nunc uidendum ac disserendum est, quantum Deus donat, inmortales ac beati in caelestibus sedibus dominationibus, principatibus potestatibus constituti, quos isti deos et ex quibus quosdam uel bonos daemones uel nobiscum angelos nominant, quo modo credendi sint uelle a nobis religionem pietatemque seruari; hoc est, ut apertius dicam, utrum etiam sibi an tantum Deo suo, qui etiam noster est, placeat eis ut sacra faciamus et sacrificemus, uel aliqua nostra seu nos ipsos religionis ritibus consecremus.

LATIN

Hic est enim diuinitati uel, si expressius dicendum est, deitati debitus cultus, propter quem uno uerbo significandum, quoniam mihi satis idoneum non occurrit Latinum, Graeco ubi necesse est insinuo quid uelim dicere. Λατρείαν quippe nostri, ubicumque sanctarum scripturarum positum est, interpretati sunt seruitutem. Sed ea seruitus, quae debetur hominibus, secundum quam praecipit apostolus seruos dominis suis subditos esse debere, alio nomine Graece nuncupari solet; λατρεία uero secundum consuetudinem, qua locuti sunt qui nobis diuina eloquia condiderunt, aut semper aut tam frequenter ut paene semper ea dicitur seruitus, quae pertinet ad colendum Deum. Proinde si tantummodo cultus ipse dicatur, non soli Deo deberi uidetur. Dicimur enim colere etiam homines, quos honorifica uel recordatione uel praesentia frequentamus.

Nec solum ea, quibus nos religiosa humilitate subicimus, sed quaedam etiam, quae subiecta sunt nobis, perhibentur coli. Nam ex hoc uerbo et agricolae et coloni et incolae uocantur, et ipsos deos non ob aliud appellant caelicolas, nisi quod caelum colant, non utique uenerando, sed inhabitando, tamquam caeli quosdam colonos; non sicut appellantur coloni, qui condicionem debent genitali solo, propter agriculturam sub dominio possessorum, sed, sicut ait quidam Latini eloquii magnus auctor: Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrii tenuere coloni. Ab incolendo enim colonos uocauit, non ab agricultura. Hinc et ciuitates a maioribus ciuitatibus uelut populorum examinibus conditae coloniae nuncupantur.

ENGLISH

held that divine honors of rites and sacrifices should be paid to demons; to these we have already given no small part of our answer. Now, then, we must consider and discuss, so far as God grants, a further question. Take the immortal and happy beings set in the heavenly seats—dominions, principalities, powers—whom these philosophers call gods, and some of whom they call either good demons or, as we do, angels. In what way should we believe that they want us to practice religion and piety? To put it more plainly: do they want us to perform rites and offer sacrifice, or to consecrate some of our possessions or ourselves by religious ceremonies, to themselves as well, or only to their God, who is also ours?[1]

For this is the worship due to divinity—or, to speak more precisely, to deity. I want to signify it by a single word, but no sufficiently suitable Latin word occurs to me, so where necessary I indicate what I mean by a Greek one. Our translators, wherever latreia [service due to God alone] occurs in the holy Scriptures, have rendered it "service." But the service owed to human beings, the kind the apostle means when he commands slaves to be subject to their masters, is usually called by another name in Greek. Latreia, on the other hand, in the usage of those who set down the divine oracles for us, always—or so often as to be almost always—means the service that belongs to the worship of God. So if we say simply "worship" (cultus), it does not seem to be owed to God alone. For we are also said to "cultivate" (colere) human beings whom we attend with honor, whether by remembering them or by being in their company.

Nor is the word used only of those to whom we submit ourselves in religious humility. Some things that are subject to us are also said to be "cultivated" (coli). For from this verb come the names agricolae [farmers], coloni [tenants, settlers] and incolae [inhabitants]. The gods themselves are called caelicolae [heaven-dwellers] for no other reason than that they colunt heaven—not, of course, by worshiping it but by inhabiting it, as a kind of settlers of heaven. This is not the sense in which those are called coloni who owe their status to their native soil and are bound to farm it under the ownership of landholders. It is the sense used by a great master of Latin eloquence: "There was an ancient city, held by settlers from Tyre." He called them coloni from inhabiting, not from farming. Hence also cities founded by greater cities, like swarms of peoples sent out from a hive, are called colonies.[2]

1 Romans 1:21; the ranks of heavenly powers echo Colossians 1:16.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Ac per hoc cultum quidem non deberi nisi Deo propria quadam notione uerbi huius omnino uerissimum est; sed quia et aliarum rerum dicitur cultus, ideo Latine uno uerbo significari cultus Deo debitus non potest.

And so it is entirely true that, in a certain proper sense of the word, cultus is owed to God alone. But because cultus is also used of other things, the worship owed to God cannot be expressed in Latin by a single word.

Nam et ipsa religio quamuis distinctius non quemlibet, sed Dei cultum significare uideatur (unde isto nomine interpretati sunt nostri eam, quae Graece θρησκεία dicitur): tamen quia Latina loquendi consuetudine, non inperitorum, uerum etiam doctissimorum, et cognationibus humanis adque adfinitatibus et quibusque necessitudinibus dicitur exhibenda religio, non eo uocabulo uitatur ambiguum, cum de cultu deitatis uertitur quaestio, ut fidenter dicere ualeamus religionem non esse nisi cultum Dei, quoniam uidetur hoc uerbum a significanda obseruantia propinquitatis humanae insolenter auferri. Pietas quoque proprie Dei cultus intellegi solet, quam Graeci εὐσέβειαν uocant. Haec tamen et erga parentes officiose haberi dicitur.

Even "religion" (religio) seems to signify more distinctly not just any worship but the worship of God, which is why our translators used this word to render what in Greek is called thrēskeia [religious worship]. In Latin usage, however, not only of the uneducated but of the most learned as well, religio is said to be owed to human kinship, to relations by marriage and to every kind of close tie. So when the question concerns the worship of deity, this word does not avoid ambiguity. We cannot confidently say that religion is nothing but the worship of God, since it would be contrary to usage to strip the word of its sense of dutiful regard for human relations. "Piety" (pietas), which the Greeks call eusebeia [reverence], is also usually understood in its proper sense as the worship of God. Yet it is also said to be dutifully shown toward parents.

More autem uulgi hoc nomen etiam in operibus misericordiae frequentatur; quod ideo arbitror euenisse, quia haec fieri praecipue mandat Deus eaque sibi uel pro sacrificiis uel prae sacrificiis placere testatur. Ex qua loquendi consuetudine factum est, ut et Deus ipse dicatur pius; quem sane Graeci nullo suo sermonis usu εὐσεβῆν uocant, quamuis εὐσέβειαν pro misericordia illorum etiam uulgus usurpet. Unde in quibusdam scripturarum locis, ut distinctio certior appareret, non εὐσέβειαν, quod ex bono cultu, sed θεοσέβειαν, quod ei Dei cultu conpositum resonat, dicere maluerunt. Utrumlibet autem horum nos uno uerbo enuntiare non possumus.

In popular usage, moreover, the word is often applied to works of mercy. I think this has come about because God especially commands that these be done, and declares that they please him in place of sacrifices, or more than sacrifices. From this way of speaking it has come about that God himself is called pius. The Greeks, however, in no usage of their language call him eusebēs, although among them too ordinary people use eusebeia for mercy. Hence in certain passages of Scripture, to make the distinction clearer, they preferred to say not eusebeia, which is compounded from "good" and "worship," but theosebeia [reverence for God], which plainly sounds compounded from "God" and "worship." We, however, cannot express either of these in a single word.

Quae itaque λατρεία Graece nuncupatur et Latine interpretatur seruitus, sed ea qua colimus Deum; uel

So then: what is called latreia in Greek and rendered "service" in Latin—but the service by

LATIN	ENGLISH
quae θρησκεία Graece, Latine autem religio dicitur, sed ea quae nobis est erga Deum; uel quam illi εὐσέβειαν, nos uero non uno uerbo exprimere, sed Dei cultum possumus appellare: hanc ei tantum Deo deberi dicimus, qui uerus est Deus facitque suos cultores deos. Quicumque igitur sunt in caelestibus habitationibus inmortales et beati, si nos non amant nec beatos esse nos uolunt, colendi utique non sunt. Si autem amant et beatos uolunt, profecto inde uolunt, unde et ipsi sunt; an aliunde ipsi beati, aliunde nos?	which we worship God; or what is called thrēskeia in Greek and "religion" in Latin—but the religion we have toward God; or what they call eusebeia and we cannot express in one word but can call "the worship of God"—this, we say, is owed only to the God who is the true God and who makes his worshipers gods. Therefore, whoever the immortal and happy beings in the heavenly dwellings may be, if they do not love us and do not want us to be happy, they certainly should not be worshiped. But if they love us and want us to be happy, then surely they want us to be happy from the same source from which they themselves are happy. Or are they happy from one source, and we from another?

WHAT PLOTINUS THE PLATONIST THOUGHT ABOUT ILLUMINATION FROM ABOVE

Plotinus holds that the soul of the universe, like ours, is happy only by a light that is God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.2 Sed non est nobis ullus cum his excellentioribus philosophis in hac quaestione conflictus. Viderunt enim suisque litteris multis modis copiosissime mandauerunt hinc illos, unde et nos, fieri beatos, obiecto quodam lumine intellegibili, quod Deus est illis et aliud est quam illi, a quo inlustrantur, ut clareant adque eius participatione perfecti beatique subsistant. Saepe multumque Plotinus adserit sensum Platonis explanans, ne illam quidem, quam credunt esse uniuersitatis animam, aliunde beatam esse quam nostram, idque esse lumen quod ipsa non est, sed a quo creata est et quo intellegibiliter inluminante intellegibiliter lucet. Dat etiam similitudinem ad illa incorporea de his caelestibus conspicuis amplisque corporibus, tamquam ille sit sol et ipsa sit luna. Lunam quippe solis obiectu inluminari putant.	But on this question we have no quarrel with these more eminent philosophers. For they saw, and set down in their writings in many ways and at great length, that those beings become happy from the same source as we do. A certain intelligible light shines upon them; this light is God to them and is something other than they are. By it they are illuminated so that they shine, and by participation in it they exist perfect and happy. Plotinus, explaining Plato's meaning, asserts often and emphatically that not even the soul they believe to be the soul of the universe is happy from any source other than ours. That source, he says, is a light which the soul is not itself, but by which it was created, and by whose intelligible illumination it shines intelligibly. He also offers a comparison for those incorporeal realities drawn from the great, visible bodies of the heavens: as if that light were the sun and the soul the moon. For they hold that the moon is lit by the sun shining upon it.[3]
Dicit ergo ille magnus Platonicus animam rationalem, siue potius intellectualis dicenda sit, ex quo genere etiam inmortalium beatorumque animas esse intellegit, quos in caelestibus sedibus habitare non dubitat, non habere supra se naturam nisi Dei, qui fabricatus est mundum, a quo et ipsa facta est; nec aliunde illis supernis praeberi	So that great Platonist speaks of the rational soul—or rather, it should be called intellectual. To this class he understands the souls of the immortal and happy beings to belong, whom he has no doubt dwell in the heavenly seats. He says that this soul has no nature above it except that of God,

2 Virgil, Aeneid 1.12, describing Carthage.
3 Plotinus (AD 205–270), the founder of Neoplatonism, whose teachings were edited by his pupil Porphyry.

LATIN	ENGLISH
uitam beatam et lumen intellegentiae ueritatis, quam unde praebetur et nobis, consonans euangelio, ubi legitur: Fuit homo missus a Deo, cui nomen erat Iohannes; hic uenit in testimonium, ut testimonium perhiberet de lumine, ut omnes crederent per eum. Non erat ille lumen, sed ut testimonium perhiberet de lumine. Erat lumen uerum, quod inluminat omnem hominem uenientem in hunc mundum.	who fashioned the world and by whom the soul itself was made. He also says that those beings on high receive the happy life and the light of understanding the truth from no other source than the one from which they are given to us. In this he agrees with the Gospel, where we read: "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. He came as a witness, to bear witness to the light, so that all might believe through him. He was not the light, but came to bear witness to the light. That was the true light, which enlightens every person coming into this world."[4]
In qua differentia satis ostenditur animam rationalem uel intellectualem, qualis erat in Iohanne, sibi lumen esse non posse, sed alterius ueri luminis participatione lucere. Hoc et ipse Iohannes fatetur, ubi ei perhibens testimonium dicit: Nos omnes de plenitudine eius accepimus.	This distinction shows clearly enough that a rational or intellectual soul, such as was in John, cannot be its own light, but shines by participating in another, true light. John himself acknowledges this when, bearing witness to him, he says: "We have all received from his fullness."[5]

THE TRUE WORSHIP OF GOD, FROM WHICH THE PLATONISTS, THOUGH THEY UNDERSTOOD THE CREATOR OF THE UNIVERSE, STRAYED BY WORSHIPING ANGELS, GOOD OR EVIL, WITH DIVINE HONOR

Worship belongs to God alone: we are his temple, our hearts his altar, and our love the sacrifice.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.3 Quae cum ita sint, si Platonici uel quicumque alii ista senserunt cognoscentes Deum sicut Deum glorificarent et gratias agerent nec euanescerent in cogitationibus suis nec populorum erroribus partim auctores fierent, partim resistere non auderent: profecto confiterentur et illis inmortalibus ac beatis et nobis mortalibus ac miseris, ut inmortales ac beati esse possimus, unum Deum deorum colendum, qui et noster est et illorum.	Since this is so, suppose the Platonists, or any others who held these views, had known God and glorified him as God and given thanks. Suppose they had not become futile in their thinking, and had not partly become authors of the peoples' errors and partly not dared to resist them. Then they would surely acknowledge that the one God of gods, who is both our God and theirs, must be worshiped both by those immortal and happy beings and by us mortal and wretched ones, so that we may become immortal and happy.
Huic nos seruitutem, quae λατρεία Graece dicitur, siue in quibusque sacramentis siue in nobis ipsis debemus. Huius enim templum simul omnes et singuli templa sumus, quia et omnium concordiam et singulos inhabitare dignatur; non in omnibus quam in singulis maior, quoniam nec mole distenditur nec partitione minuitur. Cum ad illum sursum est, eius est altare cor nostrum; eum Unigenito eius sacerdote placamus; ei cruentas uictimas caedimus, quando usque ad sanguinem pro eius ueritate certamus: eum suauissimo adolemus incenso, cum in eius conspectum pio sanctoque amore flagramus:	To him we owe the service that in Greek is called latreia, whether in sacraments of every kind or in ourselves. For all of us together are his temple, and each of us individually is his temple, since he deigns to dwell both in the harmony of all and in each one. He is not greater in all than in each, since he is neither stretched out by bulk nor diminished by division. When our heart is lifted up to him, it is his altar. We propitiate him with his Only-begotten as our priest. We slay bloody victims to him when we fight for his truth even to the 4 John 1:6–9.

5 John 1:16.

LATIN

ei dona eius in nobis quoque ipsos uouemus et reddimus; ei beneficiorum eius sollemnitatibus festis et diebus statutis dicamus sacramusque memoriam, ne uolumine temporum ingrata subrepat obliuio; ei sacrificamus hostiam humilitatis et laudis in ara cordis igne feruidam caritatis.

Ad hunc uidendum, sicut uideri poterit, eique cohaerendum ab omni peccatorum et cupiditatum malarum labe mundamur et eius nomine consecramur. Ipse enim fons nostrae beatitudinis, ipse omnis adpetitionis est finis. Hunc eligentes uel potius religentes (amiseramus enim neglegentes) — hunc ergo religentes, unde et religio dicta perhibetur, ad eum dilectione tendimus, ut perueniendo quiescamus, ideo beati, quia illo fine perfecti. Bonum enim nostrum, de cuius fine inter philosophos magna contentio est, nullum est aliud quam illi cohaerere, cuius unius anima intellectualis incorporeo, si dici potest, amplexu ueris inpletur fecundaturque uirtutibus. Hoc bonum diligere in toto corde, in tota anima et in tota uirtute praecipimur; ad hoc bonum debemus et a quibus diligimur duci, et quos diligimus ducere.

Sic conplentur duo illa praecepta, in quibus tota lex pendet et prophetae: Diliges Dominum Deum tuum in toto corde tuo et in tota anima tua et in tota mente tua, et: Diliges proximum tuum tamquam te ipsum. Ut enim homo se diligere nosset, constitutus est ei finis, quo referret omnia quae ageret, ut beatus esset; non enim qui se diligit aliud uult esse quam beatus. Hic autem finis est adhaerere Deo. Iam igitur scienti diligere se ipsum, cum mandatur de proximo diligendo sicut se ipsum, quid aliud mandatur, nisi ut ei, quantum potest, commendet diligendum Deum? Hic est Dei cultus, haec uera religio, haec recta pietas, haec tantum Deo debita seruitus.

ENGLISH

shedding of blood. We burn the sweetest incense to him when we are aflame with holy and devout love in his sight. We vow and render to him his own gifts in us, and ourselves as well. To him we dedicate and consecrate the memory of his benefits in solemn feasts and on appointed days, so that ungrateful forgetfulness may not creep in with the rolling of time. To him we sacrifice, on the altar of the heart, the offering of humility and praise, glowing with the fire of love.

That we may see him as he can be seen, and cling to him, we are cleansed of every stain of sins and evil desires, and are consecrated in his name. For he is the source of our happiness; he is the goal of all our longing. We choose him (eligentes)—or rather we choose him again (religentes), for we had lost him through neglect (neglegentes). Choosing him again, then—and from this, it is said, the word "religion" (religio) is derived—we strive toward him in love, so that by reaching him we may rest, happy because made perfect by that goal. For our good, about whose end there is great dispute among the philosophers, is nothing other than to cling to him. His embrace alone—an incorporeal embrace, if one may say so—fills the intellectual soul and makes it fruitful with true virtues. We are commanded to love this good with all our heart, with all our soul and with all our strength. To this good we ought to be led by those who love us, and we ought to lead those we love.[6]

So those two commandments are fulfilled on which the whole law and the prophets depend: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind," and "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." For in order that a human being might know how to love himself, an end was set for him to which he should refer everything he did, so that he might be happy; for one who loves himself wants nothing other than to be happy. And this end is to cling to God. So when one who already knows how to love himself is commanded to love his neighbor as himself, what else is he commanded but to commend to that neighbor, as far as he can, the love of God? This is the worship of 6 Augustine plays on eligere (choose), religere (choose again) and neglegere (neglect); the derivation of religio was already debated in antiquity.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	God; this is true religion; this is right piety; this is the service owed to God alone.[7]
Quaecumque igitur inmortalis potestas quantalibet uirtute praedita si nos diligit sicut se ipsam, ei uult esse subditos, ut beati simus, cui et ipsa subdita beata est. Si ergo non colit Deum, misera est, quia priuatur Deo; si autem colit Deum, non uult se coli pro Deo. Illi enim potius diuinae sententiae suffragatur et dilectionis uiribus fauet, qua scriptum est: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur, nisi Domino soli.	Therefore any immortal power, however great its might, if it loves us as itself, wants us to be subject—so that we may be happy—to the one to whom it too is subject and in whom it is happy. If, then, it does not worship God, it is wretched, because it is deprived of God. But if it does worship God, it does not want to be worshiped in place of God. Rather, it supports that divine sentence and favors it with all the strength of its love, the sentence in which it is written: "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be rooted out, except to the Lord alone."[8]

THAT SACRIFICE IS OWED TO THE ONE TRUE GOD ALONE

Everyone grants that sacrifice is owed only to a god, as the offerings of Cain and Abel show.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.4 Nam, ut alia nunc taceam, quae pertinent ad religionis obsequium, quo colitur Deus, sacrificium certe nullus hominum est qui audeat dicere deberi nisi deo. Multa denique de cultu diuino usurpata sunt, quae honoribus deferrentur humanis, siue humilitate nimia siue adulatione pestifera; ita tamen, ut, quibus ea deferrentur, homines haberentur, qui dicuntur colendi et uenerandi, si autem multum eis additur, et adorandi: quis uero sacrificandum censuit nisi ei, quem deum aut sciuit aut putauit aut finxit? Quam porro antiquus sit in sacrificando Dei cultus, duo illi fratres Cain et Abel satis indicant, quorum maioris Deus reprobauit sacrificium, minoris aspexit.	For—to say nothing now of other things that belong to the religious service by which God is worshiped—there is certainly no one who would dare to say that sacrifice is owed to anyone but a god. Many things, it is true, have been borrowed from divine worship and bestowed as honors on human beings, whether out of excessive humility or pernicious flattery. Yet those who received them were still regarded as human beings. They are said to deserve honor and veneration and, if a great deal more is heaped on them, even adoration. But who ever thought that sacrifice should be offered except to one whom he knew, or supposed, or pretended to be a god? And how ancient the worship of God by sacrifice is, those two brothers Cain and Abel show clearly enough: God rejected the elder's sacrifice and looked with favor on the younger's.

THE SACRIFICES THAT GOD DOES NOT REQUIRE, BUT WISHED TO BE OFFERED AS SIGNS OF THE THINGS HE DOES REQUIRE

God needs no offerings; animal sacrifices were signs of the sacrifice he wants, a contrite heart and mercy.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.5 Quis autem ita desipiat, ut existimet aliquibus usibus Dei esse necessaria, quae in sacrificiis offeruntur? Quod cum multis locis diuina scriptura testetur, ne longum faciamus, breue illud de psalmo commemorare suffecerit: Dixi Domino, Deus meus es tu, quoniam bonorum	But who would be so foolish as to think that the things offered in sacrifice are needed by God for some use of his? Divine Scripture testifies to this in many places, but, not to be long, it will be enough to recall this brief verse from a psalm: "I said to

7 Matthew 22:37–40.
8 Exodus 22:20.

LATIN

meorum non eges. Non solum igitur pecore uel qualibet alia re corruptibili adque terrena, sed ne ipsa quidem iustitia hominis Deus egere credendus est, totumque quod recte colitur Deus homini prodesse, non Deo. Neque enim fonti se quisquam dixerit consuluisse, si biberit; aut luci, si uiderit.

Nec quod ab antiquis patribus alia sacrificia facta sunt in uictimis pecorum, quae nunc Dei populus legit, non facit, aliud intellegendum est, nisi rebus illis eas res fuisse significatas, quae aguntur in nobis, ad hoc ut inhaereamus Deo et ad eundem finem proximo consulamus. Sacrificium ergo uisibile inuisibilis sacrificii sacramentum, id est sacrum signum est. Unde ille paenitens aput prophetam uel ipse propheta quaerens Deum peccatis suis habere propitium: Si uoluisses, inquit, sacrificium, dedissem utique; holocaustis non delectaberis. Sacrificium Deo spiritus contribulatus: cor contritum et humiliatum Deus non spernet. Intueamur quem ad modum, ubi Deum dixit nolle sacrificium, ibi Deum ostendit uelle sacrificium. Non uult ergo sacrificium trucidati pecoris, sed uult sacrificium contriti cordis.

Illo igitur quod eum nolle dixit, hoc significatur, quod eum uelle subiecit. Sic itaque illa Deum nolle dixit, quo modo ab stultis ea uelle creditur, uelut suae gratia uoluptatis. Nam si ea sacrificia quae uult (quorum hoc unum est: cor contritum et humiliatum dolore paenitendi) nollet eis sacrificiis significari, quae uelut sibi delectabilia desiderare putatus est: non utique de his offerendis in lege uetere praecepisset. Et ideo mutanda erant opportuno certoque iam tempore, ne ipsi Deo desiderabilia uel certe in nobis acceptabilia, ac non potius quae his significata sunt crederentur. Hinc et alio loco psalmi alterius: Si esuriero, inquit, non dicam tibi; meus est enim orbis terrae et plenitudo eius. Numquid manducabo carnes taurorum aut sanguinem hircorum potabo?

ENGLISH

the Lord, 'You are my God, for you have no need of my goods.'" We must believe, then, that God has no need not only of cattle or any other corruptible and earthly thing, but not even of a human being's righteousness. All the right worship of God benefits the human being, not God. For no one would say that he has done a favor to a spring by drinking from it, or to the light by seeing.[9]

The ancient fathers offered other sacrifices, with animal victims, which God's people now read about but do not perform. This is to be understood in no other way than that those things signified the things that are done in us so that we may cling to God and help our neighbor toward the same end. A visible sacrifice, then, is the sacrament—that is, the sacred sign—of an invisible sacrifice. Hence that penitent in the prophet, or the prophet himself, seeking to have God merciful to his sins, says: "If you had wanted sacrifice, I would certainly have given it; you will not delight in burnt offerings. The sacrifice to God is a troubled spirit; a contrite and humbled heart God will not despise." Let us observe how, in the very place where he said that God does not want sacrifice, he showed that God does want sacrifice. God does not want the sacrifice of a slaughtered animal, but he does want the sacrifice of a contrite heart.[10]

So what he said God does not want signifies what he went on to say God does want. He said that God does not want those things in the sense in which fools believe he wants them—as if for the sake of his own pleasure. Suppose God had not wanted the sacrifices he does want to be signified by the sacrifices he was thought to desire as delightful to himself; one of the sacrifices he wants is this: a heart contrite and humbled by the pain of repentance. In that case he would certainly not have given commands in the old law about offering them. And that is why they had to be changed at a fitting and fixed time. Otherwise they might be believed to be desirable to God himself, or at least acceptable in us, instead of the things they signified. Hence also, in a passage of another psalm, he says: "If I am hungry, I will not tell you, for the world is mine and all that fills it. Shall I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats?"[11]

9 Psalm 15:2 (16:2 in most English Bibles).
10 Psalm 50:18–19 (51:16–17 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
Tamquam diceret: Utique si mihi essent necessaria, non a te peterem, quae habeo in potestate. Deinde subiungens quid illa significent: Immola, inquit, Deo sacrificium laudis et redde Altissimo uota tua et inuoca me in die tribulationis, et eripiam te et magnificabis me. Item aput alium prophetam: In quo, inquit, adprehendam Dominum, adsumam Deum meum excelsum? Si adprehendam illum in holocaustis, in uitulis anniculis? Si acceptauerit Dominus in milibus arietum aut in denis milibus hircorum pinguium? Si dedero primogenita mea inpietatis, fructum uentris mei pro peccato animae meae? Si adnuntiatum est tibi, homo, bonum? Aut quid Dominus exquirat a te nisi facere iudicium et diligere misericordiam et paratum esse ire cum Domino Deo tuo?	It is as if he said: "Surely, if I needed them, I would not ask you for what I have in my own power." Then he adds what they signify: "Offer to God the sacrifice of praise, and pay your vows to the Most High; and call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver you, and you will glorify me." Again, in another prophet: "With what shall I lay hold of the Lord, and take hold of my God on high? Shall I lay hold of him with burnt offerings, with year-old calves? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with tens of thousands of fat goats? Shall I give my firstborn for my wickedness, the fruit of my womb for the sin of my soul? Has what is good been made known to you, mortal? Or what does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love mercy, and to be ready to walk with the Lord your God?"[12]
Et in huius prophetae uerbis utrumque distinctum est satisque declaratum illa sacrificia per se ipsa non requirere Deum, quibus significantur haec sacrificia, quae requirit Deus. In epistula, quae inscribitur ad Hebraeos: Bene facere, inquit, et communicatores esse nolite obliuisci; talibus enim sacrificiis placetur Deo. Ac per hoc ubi scriptum est: Misericordiam uolo quam sacrificium nihil aliud quam sacrificium sacrificio praelatum oportet intellegi; quoniam illud, quod ab omnibus appellatur sacrificium, signum est ueri sacrificii. Porro autem misericordia uerum sacrificium est; unde dictum est, quod paulo ante commemoraui: Talibus enim sacrificiis placetur Deo. Quaecumque igitur in ministerio tabernaculi siue templi multis modis de sacrificiis leguntur diuinitus esse praecepta, ad dilectionem Dei et proximi significando referuntur.	In this prophet's words, too, the two kinds of sacrifice are distinguished. It is made clear enough that God does not require, for their own sake, those sacrifices which signify the sacrifices that God does require. In the letter entitled "To the Hebrews" it says: "Do not forget to do good and to share what you have, for with such sacrifices God is pleased." And so where it is written, "I desire mercy rather than sacrifice," we must understand nothing other than that one sacrifice is preferred to another sacrifice. For what everyone calls sacrifice is a sign of the true sacrifice. Mercy, moreover, is true sacrifice; hence the words I quoted a little earlier: "for with such sacrifices God is pleased." We read of many kinds of commands about sacrifices given by God for the service of the tabernacle or the temple. Whatever they may be, they all refer, by way of signification, to the love of God and of neighbor.[13]
In his enim duobus praeceptis, ut scriptum est, tota lex pendet et prophetae.	For on these two commandments, as it is written, depend the whole law and the prophets.

THE TRUE AND PERFECT SACRIFICE

Every work done to cling to God is a sacrifice; the whole redeemed city is offered through Christ.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.6 Proinde uerum sacrificium est omne opus, quod agitur ut sancta societate inhaereamus Deo, relatum scilicet ad	So a true sacrifice is every work done so that we may cling to God in holy fellowship, that is, every

11 Psalm 49:12–13 (50:12–13 in most English Bibles).
12 Micah 6:6–8.
13 Hebrews 13:16; Hosea 6:6.

LATIN

illum finem boni, quo ueraciter beati esse possimus. Unde et ipsa misericordia, qua homini subuenitur, si non propter Deum fit, non est sacrificium. Etsi enim ab homine fit uel offertur, tamen sacrificium res diuina est, ita ut hoc quoque uocabulo id Latini ueteres appellauerint. Unde ipse homo Dei nomine consecratus et Deo deuotus, in quantum mundo moritur ut Deo uiuat, sacrificium est. Nam et hoc ad misericordiam pertinet, quam quisque in se ipsum facit. Propterea scriptum est: Miserere animae tuae placens Deo.

Corpus etiam nostrum cum temperantia castigamus, si hoc, quem ad modum debemus, propter Deum facimus, ut non exhibeamus membra nostra arma iniquitatis peccato, sed arma iustitiae Deo, sacrificium est. Ad quod exhortans apostolus ait: Obsecro itaque uos, fratres, per misericordiam Dei, ut exhibeatis corpora uestra hostiam uiuam, sanctam, Deo placentem, rationabile obsequium uestrum. Si ergo corpus, quo inferiore tamquam famulo uel tamquam instrumento utitur anima, cum eius bonus et rectus usus ad Deum refertur, sacrificium est: quanto magis anima ipsa cum se refert ad Deum, ut igne amoris eius accensa formam concupiscentiae saecularis amittat eique tamquam incommutabili formae subdita reformetur, hinc ei placens, quod ex eius pulchritudine acceperit, fit sacrificium!

Quod idem apostolus consequenter adiungens: Et nolite, inquit, conformari huic saeculo; sed reformamini in nouitate mentis uestrae ad probandum uos quae sit uoluntas Dei, quod bonum et bene placitum et perfectum. Cum igitur uera sacrificia opera sint misericordiae siue in nos ipsos siue in proximos, quae referuntur ad Deum, opera uero misericordiae non ob aliud fiant, nisi ut a miseria liberemur ac per hoc ut beati simus (quod non fit nisi bono illo, de quo dictum est: Mihi autem adhaerere Deo bonum est): profecto efficitur, ut tota ipsa redemta ciuitas, hoc est congregatio societasque sanctorum, uniuersale sacrificium offeratur Deo per sacerdotem magnum, qui etiam se ipsum obtulit in passione pro nobis, ut tanti capitis corpus essemus, secundum formam serui.

ENGLISH

work directed to that end of good in which we can be truly happy. That is why even the mercy by which a human being is helped is not a sacrifice if it is not done for God's sake. For although a sacrifice is made or offered by a human being, a sacrifice is still a divine thing, so much so that the ancient Latins called it by this very name. Hence a human being himself, consecrated in God's name and vowed to God, is a sacrifice insofar as he dies to the world in order to live to God. For this too belongs to mercy, the mercy each person shows to himself. That is why it is written: "Have mercy on your own soul by pleasing God."[14]

Again, when we discipline our body by self-control, it is a sacrifice, provided we do this for God's sake, as we ought, so as not to present our members to sin as weapons of wickedness but to God as weapons of righteousness. The apostle urges us to this when he says: "I appeal to you, therefore, brothers, by the mercy of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing to God, your reasonable service." The soul uses the body as something inferior to itself, like a servant or an instrument. If, then, the body is a sacrifice when its good and right use is directed to God, how much more does the soul itself become a sacrifice when it directs itself to God! Set on fire by the flame of his love, it loses the form of worldly desire, and, made subject to him as to the unchangeable form, it is re-formed, pleasing him by what it has received from his beauty.[15]

The same apostle adds this next: "And do not be conformed to this world, but be re-formed in the newness of your mind, so that you may prove what the will of God is, what is good and well-pleasing and perfect." True sacrifices, then, are works of mercy, whether toward ourselves or toward our neighbors, that are directed to God. And works of mercy are done for no other reason than to free us from misery, and so to make us happy. This comes about only through that good of which it is said: "But for me it is good to cling to God." It follows, surely, that the whole redeemed city itself, that is, the congregation and fellowship of the saints, is offered to God as a universal sacrifice

14 Sacrificium comes from sacrum facere, "to make something sacred." The quotation is Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 30:24 in the Latin Bible.
15 Romans 6:13; 12:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	through the great priest, who in his passion also offered himself for us in the form of a servant, so that we might be the body of so great a head.[16]
Hanc enim obtulit, in hac oblatus est, quia secundum hanc mediator est, in hac sacerdos, in hac sacrificium est. Cum itaque nos hortatus esset apostolus, ut exhibeamus corpora nostra hostiam uiuam, sanctam, Deo placentem, rationabile obsequium nostrum, et non conformemur huic saeculo, sed reformemur in nouitate mentis nostrae: ad probandum quae sit uoluntas Dei, quod bonum et bene placitum et perfectum, quod totum sacrificium nos ipsi sumus: Dico enim, inquit, per gratiam Dei, quae data est mihi, omnibus, qui sunt in uobis, non plus sapere, quam oportet sapere, sed sapere ad temperantiam; sicut unicuique Deus partitus est mensuram fidei.	For it was this form that he offered, and in this form that he was offered, because it is in this form that he is mediator, in this that he is priest, in this that he is sacrifice. The apostle, then, had urged us to present our bodies as a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing to God, our reasonable service, and not to be conformed to this world but to be re-formed in the newness of our mind, so as to prove what the will of God is, what is good and well-pleasing and perfect; and that whole sacrifice is we ourselves. Then he says: "For by the grace of God given to me I say to everyone among you not to be wiser than one ought to be wise, but to be wise with moderation, as God has assigned to each the measure of faith.[17]
Sicut enim in uno corpore multa membra habemus, omnia autem membra non eosdem actus habent: ita multi unum corpus sumus in Christo; singuli autem alter alterius membra, habentes dona diuersa secundum gratiam, quae data est nobis. Hoc est sacrificium Christianorum: multi unum corpus in Christo. Quod etiam sacramento altaris fidelibus noto frequentat ecclesia, ubi ei demonstratur, quod in ea re, quam offert, ipsa offeratur.	For as in one body we have many members, and not all the members have the same function, so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another, having different gifts according to the grace given to us." This is the sacrifice of Christians: "many, one body in Christ." And this is what the Church continually celebrates in the sacrament of the altar, familiar to the faithful, where it is shown to her that in the offering she makes, she herself is offered.[18]

THAT THE LOVE OF THE HOLY ANGELS FOR US IS SUCH THAT THEY WANT US TO WORSHIP NOT THEMSELVES BUT THE ONE TRUE GOD

The holy angels love us and want our sacrifice offered not to themselves but to God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.7 Merito illi in caelestibus sedibus constituti inmortales et beati, qui creatoris sui participatione congaudent, cuius aeternitate firmi, cuius ueritate certi, cuius munere sancti sunt, quoniam nos mortales et miseros, ut inmortales beatique simus, misericorditer diligunt, nolunt nos sibi sacrificari, sed ei, cuius et ipsi nobiscum sacrificium se esse nouerunt. Cum ipsis enim sumus una ciuitas Dei, cui dicitur in psalmo: Gloriosissima dicta sunt de te, ciuitas Dei; cuius pars in nobis peregrinatur, pars in illis opitulatur. De, illa quippe superna ciuitate, ubi Dei uoluntas intellegibilis adque incommutabilis lex est, de illa superna quodam modo curia (geritur namque ibi cura	Rightly, then, do those immortal and happy beings established in the heavenly dwellings refuse to have us offered as a sacrifice to themselves. They rejoice in sharing in their Creator; through his eternity they are steadfast, through his truth certain, through his gift holy. And because they love us with mercy, mortal and wretched as we are, so that we may become immortal and happy, they want us offered not to themselves but to him whose sacrifice they know that they themselves, together with us, are. For with them we are one

16 Romans 12:2; Psalm 72:28 (73:28 in most English Bibles); "the form of a servant" is from Philippians 2:7.
17 Romans 12:3.
18 Romans 12:4–6.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	de nobis) ad nos ministrata per angelos sancta illa scriptura descendit, ubi legitur: Sacrificans dis eradicabitur, nisi Domino soli.	city of God, to which it is said in the psalm: "Most glorious things have been spoken of you, city of God." Part of this city is on pilgrimage in us; part gives help in them. For from that city above, where God's will is intelligible and unchangeable law, from that heavenly council, so to speak (for there care is taken for us), that holy Scripture came down to us, ministered by angels, in which we read: "Whoever sacrifices to gods shall be rooted out, except to the Lord alone."[19]
	Huic scripturae, huic legi, praeceptis talibus tanta sunt adtestata miracula, ut satis appareat, cui nos sacrificari uelint inmortales ac beati, qui hoc nobis uolunt esse quod sibi.	To this Scripture, this law, these commands, miracles so great have borne witness that it is clear enough to whom the immortal and happy ones want us to be offered in sacrifice—they who wish for us the same thing they have themselves.

THE MIRACLES THAT GOD HAS DEIGNED TO ADD TO HIS PROMISES, EVEN THROUGH THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS, TO STRENGTHEN THE FAITH OF THE DEVOUT

Miracles for Abraham, Moses and Israel in the desert confirmed the worship of the one God.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.8	Nam nimis uetera si commemorem, longius quam satis est reuoluere uidebor, quae miracula facta sint adtestantia promissis Dei, quibus ante annorum milia praedicit Abrahae, quod in semine eius omnes gentes benedictionem fuerant habiturae. Quis enim non miretur eidem Abrahae filium peperisse coniugem sterilem eo tempore senectutis, quo parere nec fecunda iam posset, adque in eiusdem Abrahae sacrificio flammam caelitus factam inter diuisas uictimas cucurrisse, eidemque Abrahae praedictum ab angelis caeleste incendium Sodomorum, quos angelos hominibus similes hospitio susceperat et per eos de prole uentura Dei promissa tenuerat, ipsoque inminente iam incendio miram de Sodomis per eosdem angelos liberationem Loth filii fratris eius, cuius uxor in uia retro respiciens adque in salem repente conuersa magno admonuit sacramento neminem in uia liberationis suae praeterita desiderare debere?	Now if I were to recall events very far back—what miracles were performed in witness to the promises of God by which, thousands of years beforehand, he foretold to Abraham that in his seed all nations would receive a blessing—I would seem to be going back further than is necessary. For who would not marvel at these things? A barren wife bore a son to that same Abraham at an age when even a fertile woman could no longer give birth. At a sacrifice offered by Abraham, a flame from heaven ran between the divided victims. The fire from heaven that destroyed Sodom was foretold to Abraham by angels whom he had welcomed as guests in human likeness, and through whom he had received God's promise about the offspring to come. And when that fire was already about to fall, Lot, his brother's son, was wonderfully rescued from Sodom by those same angels. Lot's wife looked back along the way and was suddenly turned into salt, and so by a great symbolic sign she warned that no one on the road of his own deliverance should long for what lies behind.
	Illa uero quae et quanta sunt, quae iam per Moysen pro populo Dei de iugo seruitutis eruendo in Aegypto mirabiliter gesta sunt, ubi magi Pharaonis, hoc est regis Aegypti, qui populum illum dominatione deprimebat, ad	And what miracles they were, how many and how great, that were wonderfully performed through Moses to rescue the people of God from the yoke of slavery in Egypt! There the magicians of Pharaoh 19 Psalm 86:3 (87:3 in most English Bibles). Augustine plays on curia (council, senate-house) and cura (care).

LATIN

hoc facere quaedam mira permissi sunt, ut mirabilius uincerentur! Illi enim faciebant ueneficiis et incantationibus magicis, quibus sunt mali angeli, hoc est daemones, dediti; Moyses autem tanto potentius, quanto iustius, nomine Dei, qui fecit caelum et terram, seruientibus angelis eos facile superauit. Denique in tertia plaga deficientibus magis decem plagae per Moysen magna mysteriorum dispositione conpletae sunt, quibus ad Dei populum dimittendum Pharaonis et Aegyptiorum dura corda cesserunt.

Moxque paenituit, et cum abscedentes Hebraeos consequi conarentur, illis diuiso mari per siccum transeuntibus unda hinc adque hinc in sese redeunte cooperti et obpressi sunt. Quid de illis miraculis dicam, quae, cum in deserto idem populus ductaretur, stupenda diuinitate crebuerunt: aquas, quae bibi non poterant, misso in eas, sicut Deus praeceperat, ligno amaritudine caruisse sitientesque satiasse; manna esurientibus uenisse de caelo et, cum esset colligentibus constituta mensura, quidquid amplius quisque collegerat, exortis uermibus putruisse, ante diem uero sabbati duplum collectum, quia sabbato colligere non licebat, nulla putredine uiolatum; desiderantibus carne uesci, quae tanto populo nulla sufficere posse uidebatur, uolatilibus castra conpleta et cupiditatis ardorem fastidio satietatis extinctum; obuios hostes transitumque prohibentes adque proeliantes orante Moyse manibusque eius in figuram crucis extentis nullo Hebraeorum cadente prostratos; seditiosos in populo Dei ac sese ab ordinata diuinitus societate diuidentes ad exemplum uisibile inuisibilis poenae uiuos terra dehiscente submersos; uirga percussam petram tantae multitudini abundantia fluenta, fudisse; serpentum morsus mortiferos, poenam iustissimam peccatorum, in ligno exaltato adque prospecto aeneo serpente sanatos, ut et populo subueniretur adflicto, et mors morte destructa uelut crucifixae mortis similitudine signaretur?

ENGLISH

—that is, of the king of Egypt, who was oppressing that people under his rule—were allowed to perform certain wonders only so that they might be defeated more wonderfully. For they worked by sorcery and magic spells, to which the evil angels, that is, the demons, are devoted. But Moses—the more powerfully because the more justly—defeated them easily in the name of God, who made heaven and earth, with the angels serving him. Finally, when the magicians failed at the third plague, the ten plagues were completed through Moses in a great ordering of mysteries, and before them the hard hearts of Pharaoh and the Egyptians gave way and let God's people go.

They soon regretted it, and tried to pursue the departing Hebrews; but the sea was divided and the Hebrews crossed on dry land, while the Egyptians were covered and overwhelmed as the waters on either side flowed back together. What shall I say of the miracles that came thick and fast, with astonishing divine power, while that same people was being led through the desert? Waters that could not be drunk lost their bitterness when, as God had commanded, a piece of wood was thrown into them, and they satisfied the thirsty. Manna came from heaven to the hungry; and though a fixed measure had been set for those gathering it, whatever anyone gathered beyond it bred worms and rotted, yet the double amount gathered on the day before the Sabbath, because gathering was not allowed on the Sabbath, was spoiled by no rot.

When they craved meat, of which it seemed no amount could suffice for so large a people, the camp was filled with birds, and the heat of their craving was quenched by the disgust of surfeit. Enemies who confronted them, barred their way and gave battle were laid low while Moses prayed with his hands stretched out in the figure of a cross, and not one of the Hebrews fell. Those who rebelled among the people of God and split themselves off from the fellowship ordained by God were swallowed alive when the earth opened, a visible example of an invisible punishment. A rock struck with a rod poured out abundant streams for so vast a multitude. The deadly bites of serpents, a most just punishment for sins, were healed when people looked at a bronze serpent lifted up on a wooden pole. Thus help was given to the afflicted people, and at the same time death destroyed by death was signified by the likeness, as it were, of death crucified.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quem sane serpentem propter facti memoriam reseruatum cum postea populus errans tamquam idolum colere coepisset, Ezechias rex religiosa potestate Deo seruiens cum magna pietatis laude contriuit.	This serpent was preserved in memory of the event; but when the people later went astray and began to worship it as an idol, King Hezekiah, serving God with a devout ruler's power, broke it to pieces, and was greatly praised for his piety.[20]

THE UNLAWFUL ARTS CONNECTED WITH THE WORSHIP OF DEMONS, IN WHICH THE PLATONIST PORPHYRY WAVERS, APPROVING SOME AND SEEMING TO DISAPPROVE OTHERS

Porphyry wavers, half praising theurgy as a purification of the soul and half warning against it.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.9 Haec et alia multa huiusce modi, quae omnia commemorare nimis longum est, fiebant ad commendandum unius Dei ueri cultum et multorum falsorumque prohibendum. Fiebant autem simplici fide adque fiducia pietatis, non incantationibus et carminibus nefariae curiositatis arte conpositis, quam uel magian uel detestabiliori nomine goetian uel honorabiliori theurgian uocant, qui quasi conantur ista discernere et inlicitis artibus deditos alios damnabiles, quos et maleficos uulgus appellat (hos enim ad goetian pertinere dicunt), alios autem laudabiles uideri uolunt, quibus theurgian deputant; cum sint utrique ritibus fallacibus daemonum obstricti sub nominibus angelorum.	These things and many others of the kind, which it would take too long to recount in full, were done to commend the worship of the one true God and to forbid the worship of many false ones. And they were done by simple faith and the confidence of piety, not by incantations and spells composed by the art of an impious curiosity. That art they call mageia [magic], or by a more detestable name goeteia [sorcery], or by a more honorable one theurgia [theurgy]. Those who use these names try, as it were, to make a distinction among people devoted to illicit arts. Some they want to be regarded as damnable—those whom ordinary people call sorcerers, and who, they say, belong to goeteia—and others as praiseworthy, those to whom they assign theurgy. Yet both are bound by the deceitful rites of demons under the names of angels.
Nam et Porphyrius quandam quasi purgationem animae per theurgian, cunctanter tamen et pudibunda quodam modo disputatione promittit; reuersionem uero ad Deum hanc artem praestare cuiquam negat; ut uideas eum inter uitium sacrilegae curiositatis et philosophiae professionem sententiis alternantibus fluctuare. Nunc enim hanc artem tamquam fallacem et in ipsa actione periculosam et legibus prohibitam cauendam monet; nunc autem uelut eius laudatoribus cedens utilem dicit esse mundandae parti animae, non quidem intellectuali, qua rerum intellegibilium percipitur ueritas, nullas habentium similitudines corporum; sed spiritali, qua corporalium rerum capiuntur imagines. Hanc enim dicit per quasdam consecrationes theurgicas, quas teletas uocant, idoneam fieri adque aptam susceptioni spirituum et angelorum et ad uidendos deos.	Even Porphyry promises a kind of purification of the soul through theurgy, though hesitantly and in an argument that is somehow ashamed of itself; but he denies that this art grants anyone a return to God. So you can see him wavering, with his opinions swinging back and forth, between the vice of sacrilegious curiosity and the profession of philosophy. At one moment he warns that this art must be avoided as deceptive, dangerous in its very practice and forbidden by law. At another, as if yielding to those who praise it, he says it is useful for purifying one part of the soul—not the intellectual part, by which we perceive the truth of intelligible things, which bear no likeness to bodies, but the spiritual part, by which the images of bodily things are grasped. This part, he says, through 20 2 Kings 18:4.

LATIN

ENGLISH

certain theurgic consecrations called teletai [rites of initiation], is made fit and ready to receive spirits and angels and to see gods.[21]

Ex quibus tamen theurgicis teletis fateretur intellectuali animae nihil purgationis accedere, quod eam faciat idoneam ad uidendum Deum suum et perspicienda ea, quae uere sunt. Ex quo intellegi potest, qualium deorum uel qualem uisionem fieri dicat theurgicis consecrationibus, in qua non ea uidentur, quae uere sunt. Denique animam rationalem siue, quod magis amat dicere, intellectualem, in sua posse dicit euadere, etiamsi quod eius spiritale est nulla theurgica fuerit arte purgatum; porro autem a theurgo spiritalem purgari hactenus, ut non ex hoc ad inmortalitatem aeternitatemque perueniat.

Yet he admits that these theurgic rites bring the intellectual soul no purification that would make it fit to see its God and to behold the things that truly are. From this one can understand what kind of gods, and what kind of vision, he says theurgic consecrations produce: a vision in which the things that truly are are not seen. In fact he says that the rational soul—or, as he prefers to say, the intellectual soul—can escape into its own realm even if what is spiritual in it has not been purified by any theurgic art; and further, that the spiritual soul is purified by the theurgist only so far, and not so far that it thereby attains immortality and eternity.

Quamquam itaque discernat a daemonibus angelos, aeria loca esse daemonum, aetheria uel empyrea disserens angelorum, et admoneat utendum alicuius daemonis amicitia, quo subuectante uel paululum a terra possit eleuari quisque post mortem, aliam uero uiam esse perhibeat ad angelorum superna consortia: cauendam tamen daemonum societatem expressa quodam modo confessione testatur, ubi dicit animam post mortem luendo poenas cultum daemonum a quibus circumueniebatur horrescere: ipsamque theurgian, quam uelut conciliatricem angelorum deorumque commendat, aput tales agere potestates negare non potuit, quae uel ipsae inuideant purgationi animae, uel artibus seruiant inuidorum, querelam de hac re Chaldaei nescio cuius expromens: Conqueritur, inquit, uir in Chaldaea bonus, purgandae animae magno in molimine frustratos sibi esse successus, cum uir ad eadem potens tactus inuidia adiuratas sacris precibus potentias adligasset, ne postulata concederent.

He does distinguish angels from demons, explaining that the regions of the demons are in the air and those of the angels in the ether or the empyrean. He advises us to make use of the friendship of some demon, with whose support a person may be raised at least a little above the earth after death, while declaring that there is another way to the fellowship of the angels on high. Yet in what amounts to an explicit admission he testifies that the company of demons must be avoided, when he says that the soul, paying its penalties after death, shudders at the worship of the demons by whom it was being ensnared. And theurgy itself, which he commends as a means of winning the favor of angels and gods, he could not deny works among powers of such a kind that they either themselves begrudge the soul its purification or serve the arts of the envious. He brings forward a complaint on this subject from some Chaldean or other: "A good man in Chaldea complains," he says, "that his success in a great effort to purify a soul was thwarted, because another man, powerful in the same arts and touched by envy, had bound the powers conjured by sacred prayers, so that they would not grant what was asked.

Ergo et ligauit ille, inquit, et iste non soluit. Quo indicio dixit apparere theurgian esse tam boni conficiendi quam mali et aput deos et aput homines disciplinam; pati etiam deos et ad illas perturbationes passionesque deduci, quas communiter daemonibus et hominibus Apuleius

So," he says, "the one bound them, and the other did not release them." By this sign, he said, it is evident that theurgy is a discipline that brings about evil as well as good, both among gods and among humans; that the gods too suffer, and are 21 Porphyry (c. AD 234–305), Neoplatonist philosopher, pupil and editor of Plotinus, and a critic of Christianity.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	adtribuit; deos tamen ab eis aetheriae sedis altitudine separans et Platonis adserens in illa discretione sententiam.	brought down to those disturbances and passions which Apuleius attributes to demons and humans alike—though Apuleius separates the gods from them by the height of their ethereal dwelling and claims Plato's authority for that distinction.[22]

THEURGY, WHICH PROMISES A FALSE PURIFICATION OF SOULS BY INVOKING DEMONS

Gods that can be bound and frightened by spells are plainly deceiving demons, not good powers.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.10	Ecce nunc alius Platonicus, quem doctiorem ferunt, Porphyrius, per nescio quam theurgicam disciplinam etiam ipsos deos obstrictos passionibus et perturbationibus dicit, quoniam sacris precibus adiurari terrerique potuerunt, ne praestarent animae purgationem, et ita terreri ab eo, qui imperabat malum, ut ab alio, qui poscebat bonum, per eandem artem theurgicam solui illo timore non possent et ad dandum beneficium liberari. Quis non uideat haec omnia fallacium daemonum esse commenta, nisi eorum miserrimus seruus et a gratia ueri liberatoris alienus? Nam si haec aput deos agerentur bonos, plus ibi utique ualeret beneficus purgator animae quam maleuolus inpeditor.	Here now is another Platonist, said to be more learned—Porphyry—who says that through some theurgic discipline or other even the gods themselves are bound by passions and disturbances. For they could be conjured and terrified by sacred prayers into not granting a soul purification; and they were so terrified by the man who commanded evil that the other, who asked for good through the same theurgic art, could not release them from that fear and set them free to grant the favor. Who does not see that all this is the invention of deceitful demons—unless he is their most wretched slave and a stranger to the grace of the true Liberator? For if these things were going on among good gods, surely the beneficent purifier of the soul would have had more power there than the malevolent obstructer.
	Aut si dis iustis homo, pro quo agebatur, purgatione uidebatur indignus, non utique ab inuido territi nec, sicut ipse dicit, per metum ualentioris numinis inpediti, sed iudicio libero id negare debuerunt. Mirum est autem, quod benignus ille Chaldaeus, qui theurgicis sacris animam purgare cupiebat, non inuenit aliquem superiorem deum, qui uel plus terreret adque ad bene faciendum cogeret territos deos, uel ab eis terrentem conpesceret, ut libere bene facerent; si tamen theurgo bono sacra defuerunt, quibus ipsos deos, quos inuocabat animae purgatores, prius ab illa timoris peste purgaret. Quid enim causae est, quur deus potentior adhiberi possit a quo terreantur, nec possit a quo purgentur?	Or if the gods were just and judged the man on whose behalf this was being done unworthy of purification, then surely they ought to have refused it by free judgment—not terrified by an envious man, nor, as Porphyry himself says, hindered by fear of a stronger divinity. And it is strange that the kindly Chaldean, who wanted to purify a soul by theurgic rites, did not find some higher god, who would either terrify the terrified gods still more and compel them to do good, or restrain the one terrifying them, so that they could do good freely—unless, of course, the good theurgist lacked rites by which he might first purify the very gods he was invoking as purifiers of the soul from that plague of fear. For what reason is there why a more powerful god can be brought in to terrify them, but not one to purify them?
	An inuenitur deus qui exaudiat inuidum et timorem dis incutiat ne bene faciant; nec inuenitur deus qui exaudiat beneuolum et timorem dis auferat ut bene faciant? o	Or is a god found who listens to the envious and strikes fear into the gods so that they will not do good, and no god found who listens to the bene-

22 Apuleius (2nd century AD), Platonist writer whose On the God of Socrates Augustine discusses in Books 8–9.

LATIN	ENGLISH
theurgia praeclara, o animae praedicanda purgatio, ubi plus imperat inmunda inuidentia, quam inpetrat pura beneficentia! Immo uero malignorum spirituum cauenda et detestanda fallacia, et salutaris audienda doctrina. Quod enim qui has sordidas purgationes sacrilegis ritibus operantur quasdam mirabiliter pulchras, sicut iste commemorat, uel angelorum imagines uel deorum tamquam purgato spiritu uident (si tamen uel tale aliquid uident), illud est, quod apostolus dicit: Quoniam satanas transfigurat se uelut angelum lucis.	volent and takes away the gods' fear so that they will do good? O glorious theurgy! O purification of the soul worthy of all praise, where unclean envy commands more than pure kindness obtains! No—rather, the deceit of evil spirits must be avoided and detested, and saving teaching heeded. For when those who perform these sordid purifications with sacrilegious rites see, as if with a purified spirit, certain wonderfully beautiful images of angels or of gods, as Porphyry relates (if indeed they see anything of the kind), this is what the apostle speaks of: "For Satan disguises himself as an angel of light."[23]
Eius enim sunt illa phantasmata, qui miseras animas multorum falsorumque deorum fallacibus sacris cupiens inretire et a uero ueri Dei cultu, quo solo mundantur et sanantur, auertere, sicut de Proteo dictum est, formas se uertit in omnes, hostiliter insequens, fallaciter subueniens, utrobique nocens.	For those phantasms belong to him who longs to entangle wretched souls in the deceitful rites of many false gods and to turn them away from the true worship of the true God, by which alone they are cleansed and healed. As was said of Proteus, he "turns himself into every shape," pursuing as an enemy, helping as a deceiver, harmful either way.[24]

PORPHYRY'S LETTER TO ANEBO THE EGYPTIAN, IN WHICH HE ASKS TO BE TAUGHT ABOUT THE DIFFERENT KINDS OF DEMONS

In his letter to Anebo, Porphyry raises questions that expose magic and divination as the work of demons.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.11 Melius sapuit iste Porphyrius, cum ad Anebontem scribit Aegyptium, ubi consulenti similis et quaerenti et prodit artes sacrilegas et euertit. Et ibi quidem omnes daemones reprobat, quos dicit ob inprudentiam trahere humidum uaporem et ideo non in aethere, sed in aere esse sub luna adque in ipso lunae globo; uerum tamen non audet omnes fallacias et malitias et ineptias, quibus merito mouetur, omnibus daemonibus dare. Quosdam namque benignos daemones more appellat aliorum, cum omnes generaliter inprudentes esse fateatur.	This Porphyry showed better sense when he wrote to Anebo the Egyptian. There, in the guise of someone consulting and inquiring, he both exposes and overturns these sacrilegious arts. In that letter he rejects all demons, saying that through lack of wisdom they draw in moist vapor, and so dwell not in the ether but in the air below the moon and in the very sphere of the moon. Yet he does not dare to attribute to all demons all the deceptions, malice and foolishness that rightly trouble him. For he follows the custom of others in calling some demons benevolent, although he admits that all of them, generally speaking, are unwise.[25]
Miratur autem quod non solum di adliciantur uictimis, sed etiam conpellantur adque cogantur facere quod homines uolunt; et si corpore et incorporalitate di a daemonibus distinguuntur, quo modo deos esse	He wonders, moreover, that the gods are not only enticed by sacrificial victims but also compelled and forced to do what humans want. He asks: if gods are distinguished from demons as the incor-

23 2 Corinthians 11:14.
24 Proteus was the shape-shifting sea god of myth; the phrase echoes Virgil, Georgics 4.411.
25 Porphyry's Letter to Anebo, addressed to an Egyptian priest, raised questions about theurgy and divination.

LATIN

existimandum sit solem et lunam et uisibilia cetera in caelo, quae corpora esse non dubitat; et si di sunt, quo modo alii benefici, alii malefici esse dicantur; et quo modo incorporalibus, cum sint corporei, coniungantur. Quaerit etiam ueluti dubitans, utrum in diuinantibus et quaedam mira facientibus animae sint passiones an aliqui spiritus extrinsecus ueniant, per quos haec ualeant; et potius uenire extrinsecus conicit, eo quod lapidibus et herbis adhibitis et adligent quosdam, et aperiant clausa ostia, uel aliquid eius modi mirabiliter operentur.

Unde dicit alios opinari esse quoddam genus, cui exaudire sit proprium, natura fallax, omniforme, multimodum, simulans deos et daemones et animas defunctorum, et hoc esse quod efficiat haec omnia quae uidentur bona esse uel praua; ceterum circa ea, quae uere bona sunt, nihil opitulari, immo uero ista nec nosse, sed et male conciliare et insimulare adque inpedire nonnumquam uirtutis sedulos sectatores, et plenum esse temeritatis et fastus, gaudere nidoribus, adulationibus capi, et cetera, quae de hoc genere fallacium malignorumque spirituum, qui extrinsecus in animam ueniunt humanosque sensus sopitos uigilantesue deludunt, non tamquam sibi persuasa confirmat, sed tam tenuiter suspicatur aut dubitat, ut haec alios adserat opinari.

Difficile quippe fuit tanto philosopho cunctam diabolicam societatem uel nosse uel fidenter arguere, quam quaelibet anicula Christiana nec cunctatur esse, et liberrime detestatur. Nisi forte iste et ipsum, ad quem scribit, Anebontem tamquam talium sacrorum praeclarissimum antistitem et alios talium operum tamquam diuinorum et ad deos colendos pertinentium admiratores uerecundatur offendere.

Sequitur tamen et ea uelut inquirendo commemorat, quae sobrie considerata tribui non possunt nisi malignis et fallacibus potestatibus. Quaerit enim quur tamquam melioribus inuocatis quasi peioribus imperetur, ut iniusta praecepta hominis exsequantur; quur adtrectatum re poreal from the bodily, how are we to think that the sun and moon and the other visible things in heaven are gods, when he has no doubt that they are bodies? And if they are gods, how can some be called beneficent and others maleficent? And how, being bodily, are they joined to incorporeal beings? He also asks, as though in doubt, whether in those who foretell the future and perform certain wonders it is the passions of the soul that are at work, or whether some spirits come from outside through whom they have these powers. He conjectures rather that they come from outside, because by using stones and herbs such people bind certain persons, open closed doors, or perform some such wonder.

ENGLISH

So he says that others hold there is a certain kind of being whose peculiar trait is to hear prayers: deceitful by nature, taking every form, appearing in many guises, impersonating gods and demons and the souls of the dead. This, they say, is what produces all these things that seem good or bad; but it gives no help in what is truly good, indeed does not even know such things. Instead it forms wicked alliances, brings false accusations against the earnest followers of virtue, and sometimes hinders them. It is full of rashness and arrogance, delights in the fumes of sacrifice, is captured by flattery, and so on. These things about this kind of deceitful and malignant spirits, which come into the soul from outside and delude human senses whether asleep or awake, he does not affirm as his own conviction; he suspects or doubts them so faintly that he assigns them to the opinion of others.

No doubt it was difficult for so great a philosopher either to recognize or confidently to denounce the whole diabolical fellowship, whose existence any little old Christian woman does not hesitate to affirm, and which she detests with complete freedom. Unless, perhaps, he is shy of offending both Anebo himself, to whom he is writing, as a most distinguished priest of such rites, and others who admire such works as divine and as belonging to the worship of the gods.

Still, he goes on, and as though by way of inquiry he mentions things that, soberly considered, can be attributed only to malignant and deceitful powers. For he asks why beings who are invoked

LATIN

Veneria non exaudiant inprecantem, cum ipsi ad incestos quosque concubitus quoslibet ducere non morentur; quur animantibus suos antistites oportere abstinere denuntient, ne uaporibus profecto corporeis polluantur, ipsi uero et aliis uaporibus inliciantur et nidoribus hostiarum, cumque a cadaueris contactu prohibeatur inspector, plerumque illa cadaueribus celebrentur; quid sit, quod non daemoni uel alicui animae defuncti, sed ipsi soli et lunae aut cuicumque caelestium homo uitio cuilibet obnoxius intendit minas eosque territat falso, ut eis extorqueat ueritatem.

Nam et caelum se conlidere comminatur et cetera similia homini inpossibilia, ut illi di tamquam insipientissimi pueri falsis et ridiculis comminationibus territi quod imperatur efficiant. Dicit etiam scripsisse Chaeremonem quendam, talium sacrorum uel potius sacrilegiorum peritum, ea, quae aput Aegyptios sunt celebrata rumoribus uel de Iside uel de Osiri marito eius, maximam uim habere cogendi deos, ut faciant imperata, quando ille, qui carminibus cogit, ea se prodere uel euertere comminatur, ubi se etiam Osiridis membra dissipaturum terribiliter dicit, si facere iussa neglexerint.

Haec adque huius modi uana et insana hominem dis minari, nec quibuslibet, sed ipsis caelestibus et siderea luce fulgentibus, nec sine effectu, sed uiolenta potestate cogentem adque his terroribus ad facienda quae uoluerit perducentem, merito Porphyrius admiratur; immo uero sub specie mirantis et causas rerum talium requirentis dat intellegi illos haec agere spiritus, quorum genus superius sub aliorum opinatione descripsit, non, ut ipse posuit, natura, sed uitio fallaces, qui simulant deos et animas defunctorum, daemones autem non, ut ait ipse, simulant, sed plane sunt.

ENGLISH

as the better sort are commanded as though they were the worse sort, to carry out a human being's unjust orders. Why do they not hear the prayers of someone defiled by sexual intercourse, though they themselves do not hesitate to lead anyone at all into every kind of unchaste union? Why do they declare that their priests must abstain from animal food, so as not, of course, to be polluted by bodily vapors, while they themselves are enticed by other vapors and by the fumes of sacrificial victims? And why, though the seer is forbidden to touch a corpse, are their rites often celebrated with corpses? What does it mean that a man subject to any vice whatever directs threats not at a demon or at the soul of some dead person, but at the sun and moon themselves, or any of the heavenly beings, and terrifies them with false threats in order to wring the truth from them?

For he even threatens to smash the sky, and other such things impossible for a human being, so that those gods, terrified like the silliest children by false and ridiculous threats, will do what they are ordered. Porphyry says, too, that a certain Chaeremon, an expert in such rites—or rather sacrileges—wrote that the things celebrated in Egyptian lore concerning Isis or her husband Osiris have the greatest power to compel the gods to carry out orders, when the one who compels them by spells threatens to divulge or to overturn those things. He even declares, in terrible tones, that he will scatter the limbs of Osiris if they neglect to do as they are told.[26]

That a human being should utter such vain and insane threats against gods—and not just any gods, but the heavenly ones themselves, shining with starry light—and not without effect, but compelling them with violent power and driving them by these terrors to do whatever he wishes: Porphyry is right to wonder at this. Or rather, under the guise of one who wonders and asks the causes of such things, he gives us to understand that the spirits doing these things are of the kind he described above in reporting the opinion of others. They are deceivers not, as he put it, by nature, but by vice. They impersonate gods and the souls of 26 Chaeremon (1st century AD), an Egyptian priest and Stoic writer at Alexandria. In Egyptian myth Osiris was murdered and dismembered, and his limbs were gathered by Isis.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	the dead; but demons they do not, as he says, impersonate—they plainly are demons.
Et quod ei uidetur herbis et lapidibus et animantibus et sonis certis quibusdam ac uocibus et figurationibus adque figmentis, quibusdam etiam obseruatis in caeli conuersione motibus siderum fabricari in terra ab hominibus potestates idoneas uariis effectibus exsequendis, totum hoc ad eosdem ipsos daemones pertinet ludificatores animarum sibimet subditarum et uoluptaria sibi ludibria de hominum erroribus exhibentes.	And as for his view that by means of herbs and stones and animals, certain particular sounds and words, shapes and figurines, and also certain movements of the stars observed in the revolution of the heavens, humans can fashion on earth powers fit to bring about various effects—all this belongs to those same demons, who make fools of the souls subject to them and make a pleasant game for themselves out of human errors.
Aut ergo re uera dubitans et inquirens ista Porphyrius ea tamen commemorat, quibus conuincantur et redarguantur, nec ad eas potestates, quae nobis ad beatam uitam capessendam fauent, sed ad deceptores daemones pertinere monstrentur; aut, ut meliora de philosopho suspicemur, eo modo uoluit hominem Aegyptium talibus erroribus deditum et aliqua magna se scire opinantem non superba quasi auctoritate doctoris offendere, nec aperte aduersantis altercatione turbare, sed quasi quaerentis et discere cupientis humilitate ad ea cogitanda conuertere et quam sint contemnenda uel etiam deuitanda monstrare. Denique prope ad epistulae finem petit se ab eo doceri, quae sit ad beatitudinem uia ex Aegyptia sapientia.	So either Porphyry is genuinely doubting and inquiring about these things, and yet he mentions facts by which they may be refuted and exposed, and shown to belong not to the powers that help us attain the happy life but to the deceiving demons; or—to think better of the philosopher—he chose this way of dealing with an Egyptian devoted to such errors, who imagined he knew great things. He did not want to offend him with the proud authority, so to speak, of a teacher, nor to upset him with the open quarreling of an opponent, but, with the humility of someone asking questions and eager to learn, to turn him toward thinking these things over and to show how contemptible they are, and even how much to be shunned. In fact, near the end of the letter he asks Anebo to teach him what the way to happiness is according to Egyptian wisdom.
Ceterum illos, quibus conuersatio cum dis ad hoc esset, ut ob inueniendum fugitiuum uel praedium conparandum, aut propter nuptias uel mercaturam uel quid huius modi mentem diuinam inquietarent, frustra eos uideri dicit coluisse sapientiam; illa etiam ipsa numina, cum quibus conuersarentur, etsi de ceteris rebus uera praedicerent, tamen quoniam de beatitudine nihil cautum nec satis idoneum monerent, nec deos illos esse nec benignos daemones, sed aut illorum quod dicitur fallax, aut humanum omne commentum.	But as for those whose dealings with the gods came down to troubling the divine mind to find a runaway slave or acquire an estate, or about a marriage or a business deal or something of the kind, he says they seem to have cultivated wisdom in vain. And the very divinities with whom they had these dealings, even if they foretold the truth about other matters, nonetheless gave no prudent or adequate guidance about happiness; therefore, he says, they were neither gods nor benevolent demons, but either belonged to that kind called "the deceiver," or were wholly a human invention.

THE MIRACLES THAT THE TRUE GOD WORKS THROUGH THE MINISTRY OF THE HOLY ANGELS

Wonders serving the worship of the one God are God's work through angels; humans are greater wonders.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.12 Verum quia tanta et talia geruntur his artibus, ut uniuersum modum humanae facultatis excedant: quid	But such great and remarkable things are done by these arts that they go beyond every limit of hu-restat, nisi ut ea, quae mirifice tamquam diuinitus praedici uel fieri uidentur nec tamen ad unius Dei cultum referuntur, cui simpliciter inhaerere fatentibus quoque Platonicis et per multa testantibus solum beatificum bonum est, malignorum daemonum ludibria et seductoria inpedimenta, quae uera pietate cauenda sunt, prudenter intellegantur? Porro autem quaecumque miracula siue per angelos siue quocumque modo ita diuinitus fiunt, ut Dei unius, in quo solo beata uita est, cultum religionemque commendent, ea uere ab eis uel per eos, qui nos secundum ueritatem pietatemque diligunt, fieri ipso Deo in illis operante credendum est.

LATIN

ENGLISH

man capacity. What remains, then, but to recognize with good sense what such things are? Whatever seems to be foretold or done wondrously, as if by divine power, and yet is not directed to the worship of the one God, is the mockery of evil demons and their seductive obstacles, which true piety must guard against. And to cling simply to this God is the only good that makes us happy, as even the Platonists admit and attest in many ways. On the other hand, whatever miracles are done by divine power, whether through angels or in any other way, in such a manner that they commend the worship and religion of the one God, in whom alone is the happy life, we must believe that these are truly done by or through those who love us in accordance with truth and piety, God himself working in them.

Neque enim audiendi sunt, qui Deum inuisibilem uisibilia miracula operari negant, cum ipse etiam secundum ipsos fecerit mundum, quem certe uisibilem negare non possunt. Quidquid igitur mirabile fit in hoc mundo, profecto minus est quam totus hic mundus, id est caelum et terra et omnia quae in eis sunt, quae certe Deus fecit. Sicut autem ipse qui fecit, ita modus quo fecit occultus est et inconprehensibilis homini. Quamuis itaque miracula uisibilium naturarum uidendi adsiduitate uiluerint, tamen, cum ea sapienter intuemur, inusitatissimis rarissimisque maiora sunt. Nam et omni miraculo, quod fit per hominem, maius miraculum est homo.

For we should not listen to those who deny that the invisible God works visible miracles. Even by their own account he made the world, and they certainly cannot deny that the world is visible. Whatever wonderful thing happens in this world, then, is surely less than this whole world, that is, heaven and earth and all that is in them, which God certainly made. And just as he who made it is hidden and beyond human comprehension, so too is the way in which he made it. So although the miracles of visible nature have grown cheap to us because we see them constantly, yet when we look at them wisely, they are greater than the most unusual and rarest wonders. For a human being is a greater miracle than any miracle done through a human being.

Quapropter Deus, qui fecit uisibilia caelum et terram, non dedignatur facere uisibilia miracula in caelo uel terra, quibus ad se inuisibilem colendum excitet animam adhuc uisibilibus deditam; ubi uero et quando faciat, incommutabile consilium penes ipsum est, in cuius dispositione iam tempora facta sunt quaecumque futura sunt. Nam temporalia mouens temporaliter non mouetur, nec aliter nouit facienda quam facta, nec aliter inuocantes exaudit quam inuocaturos uidet. Nam et cum exaudiunt angeli eius, ipse in eis exaudit, tamquam in uero nec manu facto templo suo, sicut in hominibus sanctis suis, eiusque temporaliter fiunt iussa aeterna eius lege conspecta.

Therefore God, who made the visible heaven and earth, does not disdain to work visible miracles in heaven or on earth. By them he rouses the soul, still given over to visible things, to worship him, the invisible one. But where and when he does them rests in his unchangeable counsel, in whose plan all the times that are still to come have already been made. For while he moves temporal things, he is not moved in time. He does not know what is to be done in any other way than what has been done, and he does not hear those who call on him in any other way than he sees those who will call on him. For even when his angels hear, he hears in them, as in his true temple not made with hands, just as he does in his holy people. And his commands are carried out in time, having been seen in his eternal law.

	LATIN	ENGLISH

THE INVISIBLE GOD, WHO HAS OFTEN MADE HIMSELF VISIBLE, NOT AS HE IS, BUT AS THOSE WHO SAW HIM COULD BEAR

God appeared to the fathers in bodily forms not his own, as a thought is heard in sound.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.13	Nec mouere debet, quod, cum sit inuisibilis, saepe uisibiliter patribus apparuisse memoratur. Sicut enim sonus, quo auditur sententia in silentio intellegentiae constituta, non est boc quod ipsa: ita et species, qua uisus est Deus in natura inuisibili constitutus, non erat quod ipse. Verum tamen ipse in eadem specie corporali uidebatur, sicut illa sententia ipsa in sono uocis auditur; nec illi ignorabant inuisibilem Deum in specie corporali, quod ipse non erat, se uidere. Nam et loquebatur cum loquente Moyses et ei tamen dicebat: Si inueni gratiam ante te, ostende mihi temet ipsum, scienter ut uideam te.	Nor should it trouble anyone that, though he is invisible, he is often recorded to have appeared visibly to the fathers. Take a thought formed in the silence of the mind: the sound by which it is heard is not the thought itself. In the same way, the form in which God, whose nature is invisible, was seen was not what he himself is. Yet he himself was seen in that bodily form, just as the thought itself is heard in the sound of the voice. And they were not unaware that they were seeing the invisible God in a bodily form, which he himself was not. For Moses spoke with him as he spoke, and yet said to him: "If I have found grace before you, show me your very self, so that I may see you and know you."[27]
	Cum igitur oporteret Dei legem in edictis angelorum terribiliter dari, non uni homini paucisue sapientibus, sed uniuersae genti et populo ingenti: coram eodem populo magna facta sunt in monte, ubi lex per unum dabatur, conspiciente multitudine metuenda et tremenda quae fiebant. Non enim populus Israel sic Moysi credidit, quem ad modum suo Lycurgo Lacedaemonii, quod a Ioue seu Apolline leges, quas condidit, accepisset. Cum enim lex dabatur populo, qua coli unus iubebatur Deus, in conspectu ipsius populi, quantum sufficere diuina prouidentia iudicabat, mirabilibus rerum signis et motibus apparebat ad eandem legem dandam creatori seruire creaturam..	The law of God, then, had to be given with awe-inspiring terror, through the decrees of angels. It was given not to one man or to a few wise men, but to a whole nation, a vast people. So great things were done before that same people on the mountain where the law was being given through one man, while the multitude watched the fearful and terrifying things that were happening. For the people of Israel did not believe Moses in the way the Spartans believed their Lycurgus, that he had received the laws he established from Jupiter or Apollo. When the law was given to the people, commanding them to worship one God, it was made plain before the eyes of that very people, by wondrous signs and upheavals in nature, as far as divine providence judged sufficient, that creation was serving its creator in the giving of that law.[28]

27 Exodus 33:13 (cf. 33:18).
28 Lycurgus was the legendary lawgiver of Sparta, said to have received his laws from Apollo's oracle at Delphi.

THAT THE ONE GOD IS TO BE WORSHIPED NOT ONLY FOR ETERNAL BUT ALSO FOR TEMPORAL BENEFITS, SINCE ALL THINGS ARE IN THE POWER OF HIS PROVIDENCE

Even when he promised earthly rewards, God taught people to seek them from him alone.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.14	Sicut autem unius hominis, ita humani generis, quod ad Dei populum pertinet, recta eruditio per quosdam articulos temporum tamquam aetatum profecit accessibus, ut a temporalibus ad aeterna capienda et a uisibilibus ad inuisibilia surgeretur; ita sane ut etiam illo tempore, quo uisibilia promittebantur diuinitus praemia, unus tamen colendus commendaretur Deus, ne mens humana uel pro ipsis terrenis uitae transitoriae beneficiis cuiquam nisi uero animae creatori et domino subderetur. Omnia quippe, quae praestare hominibus uel angeli uel homines possunt, in unius esse Omnipotentis potestate quisquis diffitetur, insanit.	As with a single human being, so with the human race, insofar as it belongs to God's people. Its right education has advanced through certain stages of time, like successive steps of age, so that it might rise from temporal things to grasp eternal ones, and from visible things to invisible ones. Yet this was done in such a way that even in the time when God promised visible rewards, the worship of the one God alone was still enjoined. The human mind was not to submit to anyone but the soul's true creator and lord, not even for the earthly benefits of this passing life. For whoever denies that everything angels or humans can provide to humans lies in the power of the one Almighty is mad.
	De prouidentia certe Plotinus Platonicus disputat eamque a summo Deo, cuius est intellegibilis adque ineffabilis pulchritudo, usque ad haec terrena et ima pertingere flosculorum adque foliorum pulchritudine conprobat; quae omnia quasi abiecta et uelocissime pereuntia decentissimos formarum suarum numeros habere non posse confirmat, nisi inde formentur, ubi forma intellegibilis et incommutabilis simul habens omnia perseuerat. Hoc Dominus Iesus ibi ostendit, ubi ait: Considerate lilia agri, non laborant neque nent. Dico autem uobis, quia nec Salomon in tota gloria sua sic amictus est, sicut unum ex eis. Quod si faenum agri, quod hodie est et cras in clibanum mittitur, Deus sic uestit: quanto magis uos, modicae fidei?	Plotinus the Platonist certainly discusses providence. He proves from the beauty of little flowers and leaves that it reaches from the supreme God, whose beauty is intelligible and beyond words, all the way down to these lowly earthly things. All these things, he affirms, though they are as if cast aside and perish so very swiftly, could not have the perfectly fitting proportions of their forms unless they were formed from that source where the intelligible and unchangeable form, holding all things together at once, abides. The Lord Jesus shows this where he says: "Consider the lilies of the field: they do not labor or spin. And I tell you that not even Solomon in all his glory was clothed like one of them. But if God so clothes the grass of the field, which is here today and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, you of little faith?"[29]
	Optime igitur anima humana adhuc terrenis desideriis infirma ea ipsa, quae temporaliter exoptat bona infima adque terrena uitae huic transitoriae necessaria et prae illius uitae sempiternis beneficiis contemnenda, non tamen nisi ab uno Deo expectare consuescit, ut ab illius cultu etiam in istorum desiderio non recedat, ad quem contemtu eorum et ab eis auersione perueniat.	It is very good, then, that the human soul, still weak with earthly desires, grows accustomed to expecting from the one God alone even the things it longs for in time. These are the lowest and earthly goods, necessary for this passing life and to be despised in comparison with the eternal benefits of the life to come. In this way, even while it desires them, it does not turn away from the wor-

29 The argument is from Plotinus, Enneads 3.2. The quotation is Matthew 6:28–30.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		ship of him to whom it comes by despising them and turning away from them.

THE MINISTRY OF THE HOLY ANGELS, BY WHICH THEY SERVE THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD

The law was given through angels, who hear God's eternal word and carry it out in time.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.15	Sic itaque diuinae prouidentiae placuit ordinare temporum cursum, ut, quem ad modum dixi et in actibus apostolorum legitur, lex in edictis angelorum daretur de unius ueri Dei, cultu, in quibus et persona ipsius Dei, non quidem per suam substantiam, quae semper corruptibilibus oculis inuisibilis permanet, sed certis indiciis per subiectam creatori creaturam uisibiliter appareret et syllabatim per transitorias temporum morulas humanae linguae uocibus loqueretur, qui in sua natura non corporaliter, sed spiritaliter, non sensibiliter, sed intellegibiliter, non temporaliter, sed, ut ita dicam, aeternaliter nec incipit loqui nec desinit; quod aput illum sincerius audiunt, non corporis aure sed mentis, ministri eius et nuntii, qui eius ueritate incommutabili perfruuntur inmortaliter beati: et quod faciendum modis ineffabilibus audiunt et usque in ista uisibilia adque sensibilia perducendum, incunctanter adque indifficulter efficiunt.	So it pleased divine providence to order the course of time in such a way that, as I have said and as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, the law concerning the worship of the one true God was given through the decrees of angels. In them the person of God himself appeared visibly. This was not in his own substance, which always remains invisible to corruptible eyes, but through definite signs, by means of creation subject to its creator. And he spoke syllable by syllable, in the brief passing moments of time, with the sounds of human language. Yet in his own nature he neither begins nor ceases to speak: not bodily but spiritually, not to the senses but to the intellect, not in time but, so to speak, eternally. What he says is heard more purely in his presence, not with the ear of the body but with the ear of the mind, by his ministers and messengers, who enjoy his unchangeable truth in immortal happiness. And what they hear, in ways beyond words, must be done and carried down into this visible and sensible world, they carry out without hesitation or difficulty.[30]
	Haec autem lex distributione temporum data est, quae prius haberet, ut dictum est, promissa terrena, quibus tamen significarentur aeterna, quae uisibilibus sacramentis celebrarent multi, intellegerent pauci. Unius tamen Dei cultus apertissima illic et uocum et rerum omnium contestatione praecipitur, non unius de turba, sed qui fecit caelum et terram et omnem animam et omnem spiritum, qui non est quod ipse. Ille enim fecit, haec facta sunt, adque ut sint et bene se habeant, eius indigent, a quo facta sunt.	This law was given in accordance with a distribution of the ages, so that at first, as has been said, it contained earthly promises. Yet by these, eternal things were signified; many celebrated them in visible sacraments, but few understood them. Even so, the worship of the one God is commanded there with the clearest testimony of all its words and all its events. He is not one god out of a crowd. He is the one who made heaven and earth and every soul and every spirit that is not what he himself is. For he made them, and they were made; and in order to exist and to be well, they need him by whom they were made.

30 Acts 7:53, where the law is said to have been received "by the decrees of angels."

WHETHER, ABOUT GAINING THE HAPPY LIFE, WE SHOULD TRUST THE ANGELS WHO DEMAND TO BE WORSHIPED WITH DIVINE HONOR, OR THOSE WHO COMMAND THAT HOLY WORSHIP BE GIVEN NOT TO THEMSELVES BUT TO THE ONE GOD

Angels who demand sacrifice should be distrusted; those who direct worship to God alone should be believed.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.16	Quibus igitur angelis de beata et sempiterna uita credendum esse censemus? Utrum eis, qui se religionis ritibus coli uolunt sibi sacra et sacrificia flagitantes a mortalibus exhiberi, an eis, qui hunc omnem cultum uni Deo creatori omnium deberi dicunt eique reddendum uera pietate praecipiunt, cuius et ipsi contemplatione beati sunt et nos futuros esse promittunt? Illa namque uisio Dei tantae pulchritudinis uisio est et tanto amore dignissima, ut sine hac quibuslibet aliis bonis praeditum adque abundantem non dubitet Plotinus infelicissimum dicere.	Which angels, then, do we judge should be believed about the happy and eternal life? Those who want to be worshiped themselves with religious rites, demanding that mortals offer them rites and sacrifices? Or those who say that all this worship is owed to the one God, the creator of all, and teach that it must be rendered to him with true piety? It is by contemplating him that they themselves are happy, and they promise that we shall be happy too. For that vision of God is a vision of such great beauty, and so supremely worthy of so great a love, that Plotinus does not hesitate to say that anyone without it is utterly unhappy, however richly endowed with other goods.
	Cum ergo ad hunc unum quidam angeli, quidam uero ad se ipsos latria colendos signis mirabilibus excitent, et hoc ita, ut illi istos coli prohibeant, isti autem illum prohibere non audeant: quibus potius sit credendum, respondeant Platonici, respondeant quicumque philosophi, respondeant theurgi uel potius periurgi; hoc enim sunt omnes illae artes uocabulo digniores; postremo respondeant homines, si ullus naturae suae sensus, quod rationales creati sunt, ex aliqua parte uiuit in eis; respondeant, inquam, eisne sacrificandum sit dis uel angelis, qui sibi sacrificari iubent, an illi uni, cui iubent hi qui et sibi et istis prohibent?	Some angels, then, use wonderful signs to rouse us to worship this one God. Others rouse us to worship themselves with latria [the service due to God alone]. And they do so in such a way that the former forbid the latter to be worshiped, while the latter do not dare to forbid the former. Which should we rather believe? Let the Platonists answer, let any philosophers answer, let the theurgists answer—or rather the "periurgists," since all those arts better deserve that name. Finally, let human beings answer, if any sense of their own nature, that they were created rational, still lives in them in any degree. Let them answer, I say: should we sacrifice to the gods or angels who order sacrifice to themselves? Or should we sacrifice to the one God, as we are ordered by those who forbid it both to themselves and to the others?[31]
	Si nec isti nec illi ulla miracula facerent, sed tantum praeciperent, alii quidem ut sibi sacrificaretur, alii uero id uetarent, sed uni tantum iuberent Deo: satis deberet pietas ipsa discernere, quid horum de fastu superbiae, quid de uera religione descenderet. Plus etiam dicam: si tantum hi mirabilibus factis humanas animas permouerent, qui sacrificia sibi expetunt, illi autem, qui hoc prohibent et uni tantum Deo sacrificari iubent, nequaquam ista uisibilia miracula facere dignarentur:	Suppose neither group worked any miracles, but each simply gave commands. Some would order that sacrifice be offered to them; others would forbid this and order it to be offered only to the one God. Even then, piety itself ought to be enough to discern which of these came from arrogant pride and which from true religion. I will say more. Suppose only those who demand sacrifices for themselves stirred human souls by wondrous deeds. Suppose those who forbid this and command sac-

31 Augustine puns on "theurgists" (god-workers) with "periurgists," from Greek periergos [meddlesome], a word also used of magic.

LATIN

profecto non sensu corporis, sed ratione mentis praeponenda eorum esset auctoritas.

Cum uero Deus id egerit ad commendanda eloquia ueritatis suae, ut per istos inmortales nuntios non sui fastum, sed maiestatem illius praedicantes faceret maiora, certiora, clariora miracula, ne infirmis piis illi, qui sacrificia sibi expetunt, falsam religionem facilius persuaderent, eo quod sensibus eorum quaedam stupenda monstrarent: quem tandem ita desipere libeat, ut non uera eligat quae sectetur, ubi et ampliora inuenit quae miretur?

Illa quippe miracula deorum gentilium, quae commendat historia (non ea dico, quae interuallis temporum occultis ipsius mundi causis, uerum tamen sub diuina prouidentia constitutis et ordinatis monstrosa contingunt; quales sunt inusitati partus animalium et caelo terraque rerum insolita facies, siue tantum terrens siue etiam nocens, quae procurari adque mitigari daemonicis ritibus fallacissima eorum astutia perhibentur; sed ea dico, quae ui ac potestate eorum fieri satis euidenter apparet, ut est quod effigies deorum Penatium, quas de Troia Aeneas fugiens aduexit, de loco in locum migrasse referuntur; quod cotem Tarquinius nouacula secuit:

quod Epidaurius serpens Aesculapio nauiganti Romam comes adhaesit; quod nauem, qua simulacrum matris Phrygiae uehebatur, tantis hominum boumque conatibus inmobilem redditam una muliercula zona adligatam ad suae pudicitiae testimonium mouit et traxit; quod uirgo Vestalis, de cuius corruptione quaestio uertebatur, aqua inpleto cribro de Tiberi neque perfluente abstulit controuersiam) — haec ergo adque huius modi nequaquam illis, quae in populo Dei facta legimus, uirtute ac magnitudine conferenda sunt; quanto minus ea, quae illorum quoque populorum, qui tales deos coluerunt, legibus iudicata sunt prohibenda adque plectenda, magica scilicet uel theurgica!

ENGLISH

rifice only to the one God did not deign to perform such visible miracles at all. Even so, their authority should surely be preferred, not by the judgment of bodily sense but by the reasoning of the mind.

But in fact God, to commend the words of his truth, has caused these immortal messengers to work miracles that are greater, more certain and more glorious. They proclaim not their own pride but his majesty. He did this so that those who demand sacrifices for themselves might not more easily persuade the weak among the pious to adopt a false religion by displaying astonishing things to their senses. Who, then, could wish to be so foolish as not to choose the truth to follow, when he also finds there the greater things to marvel at?

Consider the miracles of the gods of the nations that history records. (I do not mean the portents that occur at intervals of time from hidden causes in the world itself, causes nonetheless established and ordered under divine providence. Such are unusual births of animals and strange appearances in the sky and on earth, whether merely frightening or actually harmful. Through the demons' most deceitful cunning, these are claimed to be averted and softened by demonic rites. I mean those that quite evidently appear to be done by the demons' own force and power. Such is the story that the images of the household gods, the Penates, which Aeneas brought from Troy as he fled, moved from place to place; or that Tarquinius cut a whetstone with a razor;[32] or that the serpent of Epidaurus attached itself as a companion to Aesculapius as he sailed to Rome; or that a ship carrying the image of the Phrygian Mother had been made immovable against all the efforts of men and oxen, and a single frail woman tied her girdle to it and moved it and drew it along, as proof of her chastity; or that a Vestal Virgin, whose virginity was under investigation, settled the dispute by filling a sieve with water from the Tiber without its leaking through.) These things, then, and others like them are in no way to be compared in power and greatness with those we read were done among the people of God. How 32 The Penates were the Roman household gods; those brought by Aeneas were said to have returned of their own accord from Alba to Lavinium. In Livy (1.36) it is the augur Attus Navius who cuts the whetstone, before King Tarquinius Priscus.

LATIN

ENGLISH

much less, then, can those things be compared that even the laws of the very peoples who worshiped such gods judged should be forbidden and punished—namely, magic or theurgy![33]

quorum pleraque specie tenus mortalium sensus imaginaria ludificatione decipiunt, quale est lunam deponere, donec subpositas, ut ait Lucanus, propior despumet in herbas; quaedam uero etsi nonnullis piorum factis uideantur opere coaequari, finis ipse, quo discernuntur, incomparabiliter haec nostra ostendit excellere. Illis enim multi tanto minus sacrificiis colendi sunt, quanto magis haec expetunt; his uero unus commendatur Deus, qui se nullis talibus indigere et scripturarum suarum testificatione et eorundem postea sacrificiorum remotione demonstrat. Si ergo angeli sibi expetunt sacrificium, praeponendi eis sunt, qui non sibi, sed Deo creatori omnium, cui seruiunt. Hinc enim ostendunt quam sincero amore nos diligant, quando per sacrificium non sibi, sed ei nos subdere uolunt, cuius et ipsi contemplatione beati sunt, et ad eum nos peruenire, a quo ipsi non recesserunt.

Most of these deceive mortal senses with illusory trickery that is mere appearance. Such is drawing down the moon "until, coming closer, it foams onto the herbs set beneath," as Lucan says. Some of them may seem to match certain deeds of the pious in their effect. But the very end that distinguishes them shows that ours are incomparably superior. For through those arts many gods are put forward for worship with sacrifices, and they deserve it the less, the more they demand it. Through ours, the one God is commended. He shows that he needs nothing of the kind, both by the testimony of his Scriptures and by later doing away with those same sacrifices. If, then, some angels demand sacrifice for themselves, others are to be preferred to them: those who demand it not for themselves but for God, the creator of all, whom they serve. For by this they show how sincere their love for us is. Through sacrifice they wish us to be subject not to themselves but to him by contemplating whom they themselves are happy. And they wish us to come to him from whom they themselves have never departed.[34]

Si autem angeli, qui non uni sed plurimis sacrificia fieri uolunt, non sibi, sed eis dis uolunt, quorum deorum angeli sunt: etiam sic eis praeponendi sunt illi, qui unius Dei deorum angeli sunt, cui sacrificari sic iubent, ut alicui alteri uetent, cum eorum nullus huic uetet, cui uni isti sacrificari iubent. Porro si, quod magis indicat eorum superba fallacia, nec boni nec bonorum deorum angeli sunt, sed daemones mali, qui non unum solum ac summum Deum, sed se ipsos sacrificiis coli uolunt: quod maius quam unius Dei contra eos eligendum est praesidium, cui seruiunt angeli boni, qui non sibi, sed illi iubent ut sacrificio seruiamus, cuius nos ipsi esse sacrificium debemus?

But suppose the angels who want sacrifices offered not to one but to many want them not for themselves but for the gods whose angels they are. Even so, the angels of the one God of gods are to be preferred to them. These command sacrifice to him in such a way as to forbid it to any other, while none of the others forbids it to this God, to whom alone these command sacrifice. Further, suppose—as their proud deceit more strongly suggests—that they are neither good angels nor angels of good gods, but evil demons. Then they want to be worshiped with sacrifices themselves, rather than the one supreme God alone. What greater protection against them can we choose than that of the one God? The good angels serve him, and they command us to serve with sacrifice not themselves but him, whose sacrifice we ourselves ought to be.

33 The serpent of Aesculapius was brought from Epidaurus in 293 BC. The woman who moved the ship of the Phrygian Mother (Cybele) in 204 BC was Claudia Quinta, and the Vestal with the sieve was Tuccia.
34 Lucan, Civil War (Pharsalia) 6.506, on the witches of Thessaly; Lucan was a Roman poet of the first century AD.

THE ARK OF THE COVENANT AND THE MIRACULOUS SIGNS DONE BY GOD TO COMMEND THE AUTHORITY OF THE LAW AND THE PROMISE

The ark of the testimony and its miracles at the Jordan, Jericho and among the Philistines confirmed the law.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.17	Proinde lex Dei, quae in edictis data est angelorum, in qua unus Deus deorum religione sacrorum iussus est coli, alii uero quilibet prohibiti, in arca erat posita, quae arca testimonii nuncupata est. Quo nomine satis significatur non Deum, qui per illa omnia colebatur, circumcludi solere uel contineri loco, cum responsa eius et quaedam humanis sensibus darentur signa ex illius arcae loco, sed uoluntatis eius hinc testimonia perhiberi; quod etiam ipsa lex erat in tabulis conscripta lapideis et in arca, ut dixi, posita, quam tempore peregrinationis in eremo cum tabernaculo, quod similiter appellatum est tabernaculum testimonii, cum debita sacerdotes ueneratione portabant; signumque erat, quod per diem nubes apparebat, quae sicut ignis nocte fulgebat; quae nubes cum moueretur, castra mouebantur, et ubi staret, castra ponebantur.	Accordingly, the law of God was given through the decrees of angels. In it the one God of gods was commanded to be worshiped with the sacred rites of religion, and all others were forbidden. This law was placed in the ark, which was called the ark of the testimony. This name makes it clear enough that God, who was worshiped through all those things, is not enclosed or contained in a place, even though his answers and certain signs perceptible to human senses were given from the place of that ark. Rather, testimonies of his will were given from there. Further, the law itself was written on tablets of stone and placed, as I said, in the ark. During the time of wandering in the desert, the priests carried the ark with due reverence, along with the tabernacle, which was likewise called the tabernacle of the testimony. And there was a sign: by day a cloud appeared, which shone like fire by night. When the cloud moved, the camp moved, and where it stood still, the camp was pitched.
	Reddita sunt autem illi legi magni miraculi testimonia praeter ista, quae dixi, et praeter uoces, quae ex illius arcae loco edebantur. Nam cum terram promissionis intrantibus eadem arca transiret. Iordanes fluuius ex parte superiore subsistens et ex inferiore decurrens et ipsi et populo siccum praebuit transeundi locum. Deinde ciuitatis, quae prima hostilis occurrit more gentium deos plurimos colens, septiens eadem arca circumacta muri repente ceciderunt, nulla manu oppugnati, nullo ariete percussi. Post haec etiam cum iam in terra promissionis essent et eadem arca propter eorum peccata fuisset ab hostibus capta, hi, qui ceperant, in templo eam dei sui, quem prae ceteris colebant, honorifice conlocarunt abeuntesque clauserunt, apertoque postridie simulacrum, cui supplicabant, inuenerunt conlapsum deformiterque confractum.	Besides the things I have mentioned, and besides the voices that came from the place of that ark, that law received the testimony of great miracles. For when they were entering the promised land and the ark was crossing, the river Jordan stopped on its upper side and ran off on its lower side. It gave dry ground for the ark itself and for the people to cross. Then they came to the first hostile city in their path, which worshiped many gods after the custom of the nations. When the ark had been carried around it seven times, its walls suddenly fell down, though no hand had attacked them and no battering ram had struck them. After this, when they were already in the promised land, the ark was captured by enemies because of the people's sins. Those who had captured it placed it with honor in the temple of their god, whom they worshiped above the rest, and shut the temple as they left. When it was opened the next day, they found the image to which they prayed fallen down and shamefully shattered.[35]

LATIN

Deinde ipsi prodigiis acti deformiusque puniti arcam diuini testimonii populo, unde ceperant, reddiderunt. Ipsa autem redditio qualis fuit! Inposuerunt eam plaustro eique iuuencas, a quibus uitulos sugentes abstraxerant, subiunxerunt et eas quo uellent ire siuerunt, etiam inde uim diuinam explorare cupientes. At illae sine duce homine adque rectore ad Hebraeos uiam pertinaciter gradientes nec reuocatae mugitibus esurientium filiorum magnum sacramentum suis cultoribus reportarunt. Haec adque huius modi Deo parua sunt, sed magna terrendis salubriter erudiendisque mortalibus.

ENGLISH

Then, driven by portents and punished still more shamefully, they returned the ark of the divine testimony to the people from whom they had taken it. And what a return it was! They put it on a cart and yoked to it heifers whose suckling calves they had taken away from them. Then they let the heifers go wherever they would, wanting to test the divine power by this too. But with no man to lead or guide them, the heifers kept steadily on the road toward the Hebrews. The lowing of their hungry young did not call them back, and they brought the great sacred sign back to those who worshiped it. To God these things and the like are small, but they are great for frightening mortals for their good and for instructing them.[36]

Si enim philosophi praecipueque Platonici rectius ceteris sapuisse laudantur, sicut paulo ante commemoraui, quod diuinam prouidentiam haec quoque rerum infima adque terrena administrare docuerunt numerosarum testimonio pulchritudinum, quae non solum in corporibus animalium, uenim in herbis etiam faenoque gignuntur: quanto euidentius haec adtestantur diuinitati, quae ad horam praedicationis eius fiunt, ubi ea religio commendatur, quae omnibus caelestibus, terrestribus, infernis sacrificari uetat, uni Deo tantum iubens, qui solus diligens et dilectus beatos facit eorumque sacrificiorum, tempora imperata praefiniens eaque per meliorem sacerdotem in melius mutanda praedicens non ista se adpetere, sed per haec alia potiora significare testatur, non ut ipse his honoribus sublimetur, sed ut nos ad eum colendum eique cohaerendum igne amoris eius accensi, quod nobis, non illi, bonum est, excitemur.

The philosophers, and especially the Platonists, are praised for having been wiser than the rest, as I mentioned a little earlier. This is because they taught that divine providence governs even these lowest, earthly things, on the evidence of the many proportioned beauties that arise not only in the bodies of animals but even in plants and grass. If so, how much more clearly do these events bear witness to the divine, since they happen at the very hour of its proclamation! There that religion is commended which forbids sacrifice to any beings of heaven, earth or the underworld, and commands it to the one God alone. He alone, loving and loved, makes us happy. He fixed in advance the times during which those sacrifices were commanded, and foretold that they would be changed for the better through a better priest. In this way he testifies that he does not desire these things, but signifies through them other, better ones. He does this not to be exalted by these honors, but so that we, set ablaze by the fire of his love, may be roused to worship him and cling to him, which is good for us, not for him.[37]

AGAINST THOSE WHO DENY THAT THE CHURCH'S BOOKS SHOULD BE BELIEVED ABOUT THE MIRACLES BY WHICH THE PEOPLE OF GOD WERE TAUGHT

Those who credit pagan wonders have no reason to reject the far better-attested miracles of Scripture.

LATIN

ENGLISH

10.18

35 See Joshua 3 (the Jordan) and Joshua 6 (Jericho); the capture of the ark and the fall of the Philistine god Dagon are told in 1 Samuel 5.
36 1 Samuel 6.
37 The "better priest" is Christ, as in the Letter to the Hebrews (chapters 7–8).

LATIN

An dicet aliquis ista falsa esse miracula nec fuisse facta, sed mendaciter scripta? Quisquis hoc dicit, si de his rebus negat omnino ullis litteris esse credendum, potest etiam dicere nec deos ullos curare mortalia. Non enim se aliter colendos esse persuaserunt nisi mirabilium operum effectibus, quorum et historia gentium testis est, quarum di se ostentare mirabiles potius quam utiles ostendere potuerunt.

Unde hoc opere nostro, cuius hunc iam decimum librum habemus in manibus, non eos suscepimus refellendos, qui uel ullam esse uim diuinam negant uel humana non curare contendunt, sed eos, qui nostro Deo conditori sanctae et gloriosissimae ciuitatis deos suos praeferunt, nescientes eum ipsum esse etiam mundi huius uisibilis et mutabilis inuisibilem et incommutabilem conditorem et uitae beatae non de his, quae condidit, sed de se ipso uerissimum largitorem. Eius enim propheta ueracissimus ait: Mihi autem adhaerere Deo bonum est. De fine boni namque inter philosophos quaeritur, ad quod adipiscendum omnia officia referenda sunt.

Nec dixit iste: Mihi autem diuitiis abundare bonum est, aut insigniri purpura et sceptro uel diademate excellere, aut, quod nonnulli etiam philosophorum dicere non erubuerunt: Mihi uoluptas corporis bonum est; aut quod melius uelut meliores dicere uisi sunt: Mihi uirtus animi mei bonum est; sed: Mihi, inquit, adhaerere Deo bonum est. Hoc eum docuerat, cui uni tantummodo sacrificandum sancti quoque angeli eius miraculorum etiam contestatione monuerunt. Unde et ipse sacrificium eius factus erat, cuius igne intellegibili correptus ardebat, et in eius ineffabilem incorporeumque conplexum sancto desiderio ferebatur.

Porro autem si multorum deorum cultores (qualescumque deos suos esse arbitrentur) ab eis facta esse miracula uel ciuilium rerum historiae uel libris magicis siue, quod honestius putant, theurgicis credunt:

ENGLISH

Or will someone say that these miracles are false, that they never happened and were only written up as lies? Whoever says this, if he denies that any writings at all can be trusted on these matters, might as well say that no gods care about mortal affairs. For the gods persuaded people that they should be worshiped only through the effects of wonderful works. The history of the nations bears witness to these works too, but the gods of those nations could put themselves on display as wonderful rather than show themselves to be useful.

That is why, in this work of ours, whose tenth book we now have in hand, we have not undertaken to refute those who deny that there is any divine power at all, or who contend that it does not care about human affairs. We are refuting those who prefer their own gods to our God, the founder of the holy and most glorious city. They do not know that he is also the invisible and unchangeable founder of this visible and changeable world, and the truest giver of the happy life, which he gives not from the things he has created but from himself. For his most truthful prophet says: "But for me it is good to cling to God." Among the philosophers, after all, the question is about the end of good, the goal to whose attainment all our duties must be directed.[38]

This man did not say, "For me it is good to abound in riches," or to be distinguished by the purple, or to stand out with scepter or diadem. Nor did he say what some even of the philosophers were not ashamed to say: "For me the pleasure of the body is good." Nor did he say what others, as if they were better men, appeared to say as something better: "For me the virtue of my mind is good." Instead he says: "For me it is good to cling to God." He had been taught this by the one to whom alone sacrifice must be offered, as God's holy angels also warned, confirming the warning with miracles. And so he himself had become God's sacrifice. He burned, seized by God's intelligible fire, and was carried by holy longing into God's ineffable and incorporeal embrace.

Furthermore, the worshipers of many gods, whatever kind of gods they suppose theirs to be, believe that these gods performed miracles. They rely on histories of civil affairs, or on books of ma-

38 Psalm 72:28 (73:28 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
quid causae est, quur illis litteris nolint credere ista facta esse, quibus tanto maior debetur fides, quanto super omnes est magnus, cui uni soli sacrificandum esse praecipiunt?	gic, or on books of theurgy, which they consider more respectable. If so, what reason is there for them to refuse to believe the writings that report these miracles? Those writings deserve all the more credence, the greater above all others is the one to whom alone they command that sacrifice be offered.

THE REASON FOR THE VISIBLE SACRIFICE THAT TRUE RELIGION TEACHES SHOULD BE OFFERED TO THE ONE TRUE AND INVISIBLE GOD

Visible sacrifices are signs of the invisible sacrifice, and belong only to the God we ourselves offer.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.19 Qui autem putant haec uisibilia sacrificia dis aliis congruere, illi uero tamquam inuisibili inuisibilia et maiori maiora meliorique meliora, qualia sunt purae mentis et bonae uoluntatis officia: profecto nesciunt haec ita signa esse illorum, sicut uerba sonantia signa sunt rerum. Quocirca sicut orantes adque laudantes ad eum dirigimus significantes uoces, cui res ipsas in corde quas significamus offerimus: ita sacrificantes non alteri uisibile sacrificium offerendum esse nouerimus quam illi, cuius in cordibus nostris inuisibile sacrificium nos ipsi esse debemus. Tunc nobis fauent nobisque congaudent adque ad hoc ipsum nos pro suis uiribus adiuuant angeli quique uirtutesque superiores et ipsa bonitate ac pietate potentiores. Si autem illis haec exhibere uoluerimus, non libenter accipiunt, et cum ad homines ita mittuntur, ut eorum praesentia sentiatur, apertissime uetant.	Some think that these visible sacrifices suit other gods, while invisible sacrifices suit him as the invisible one: greater ones for the greater, better ones for the better, such as the offerings of a pure mind and a good will. Such people surely do not know that the visible sacrifices are signs of the invisible ones, just as spoken words are signs of things. So when we pray and praise, we direct words that signify to the one to whom we offer in our hearts the very things those words signify. In the same way, when we sacrifice, we must recognize that visible sacrifice should be offered to no one but him whose invisible sacrifice we ourselves ought to be in our hearts. Then the angels, and all the higher powers who are mightier by their very goodness and devotion, favor us, rejoice with us, and help us toward this very end as far as they are able. But if we choose to offer these things to them, they are unwilling to accept them. And when they are sent to human beings in such a way that their presence is perceived, they forbid it in the plainest terms.
Sunt exempla in litteris sanctis. Putauerunt quidam deferendum angelis honorem uel adorando uel sacrificando, qui debetur Deo, et eorum sunt admonitione prohibiti iussique hoc ei deferre, cui uni fas esse nouerunt. Imitati sunt angelos sanctos etiam sancti homines Dei. Nam Paulus et Barnabas in Lycaonia facto quodam miraculo sanitatis putati sunt di, eisque Lycaonii uictimas immolare uoluerunt; quod a se humili pietate remouentes eis in quem crederent adnuntiauerunt Deum. Nec ob aliud fallaces illi superbe sibi hoc exigunt, nisi quia uero Deo deberi sciunt. Non enim re uera, ut ait Porphyrius et nonnulli putant, cadauerinis nidoribus, sed diuinis honoribus gaudent. Copiam uero nidorum	There are examples in the holy writings. Some people thought they ought to give angels the honor that is owed to God, whether by worshiping them or by sacrificing to them. The angels' own warning forbade them, and they were ordered to give this honor to the one to whom alone, as the angels knew, it may rightly be given. Holy men of God also followed the example of the holy angels. When Paul and Barnabas had performed a miracle of healing in Lycaonia, they were taken for gods, and the Lycaonians wanted to sacrifice victims to them. With humble devotion they refused this honor and proclaimed to the people the God in whom they should believe. Those deceivers, the magnam habent undique, et si amplius uellent, ipsi sibi poterant exhibere.	demons, proudly demand this honor for themselves for no other reason than that they know it is owed to the true God. They do not really delight, as Porphyry says and some believe, in the reek of carcasses, but in divine honors. They have a great abundance of such fumes everywhere, and if they wanted more, they could supply it for themselves.[39]

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	Qui ergo diuinitatem sibi adrogant spiritus, non cuiuslibet corporis fumo, sed supplicantis animo delectantur, cui decepto subiectoque dominentur, intercludentes iter ad Deum uerum, ne sit homo illius sacrificium, dum sacrificatur cuipiam praeter illum.	So the spirits that claim divinity for themselves take delight not in the smoke of any body but in the soul of the suppliant. They want to deceive that soul, subject it and lord it over it. They block the road to the true God, so that a human being may not become God's sacrifice while sacrifice is being offered to anyone other than him.

THE SUPREME AND TRUE SACRIFICE, WHICH THE MEDIATOR BETWEEN GOD AND HUMAN BEINGS HIMSELF BECAME

Christ, receiving sacrifice as God, chose to become the sacrifice as man; the Church offers itself through him.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.20	Unde uerus ille mediator, in quantum formam serui accipiens mediator effectus est Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus, cum in forma Dei sacrificium cum Patre sumat, cum quo et unus Deus est, tamen in forma serui sacrificium maluit esse quam sumere, ne uel hac occasione quisquam existimaret cuilibet sacrificandum esse creaturae. Per hoc et sacerdos est, ipse offerens, ipse et oblatio. Cuius rei sacramentum cottidianum esse uoluit ecclesiae sacrificium, quae cum ipsius capitis corpus sit, se ipsam per ipsum discit offerre. Huius ueri sacrificii multiplicia uariaque signa erant sacrificia prisca sanctorum, cum hoc unum per multa figuraretur, tamquam uerbis multis res una diceretur, ut sine fastidio multum commendaretur. Huic summo ueroque sacrificio cuncta sacrificia falsa cesserunt.	That is why the true mediator, "the man Christ Jesus," acted as he did. Insofar as he took "the form of a servant," he was made "the mediator between God and humankind." In the form of God he receives sacrifice together with the Father, with whom he is also one God. Yet in the form of a servant he chose to be a sacrifice rather than to receive one, so that no one could take even this as an occasion to think that sacrifice should be offered to any creature whatever. In this way he is also the priest, himself the one who offers and himself the offering. He willed the daily sacrifice of the Church to be the sacrament of this reality. Since the Church is the body of which he is the head, she learns through him to offer herself. The ancient sacrifices of the saints were many and varied signs of this true sacrifice. This one sacrifice was prefigured by many, as one thing might be expressed in many words, so that it could be commended at length without tedium. To this supreme and true sacrifice all false sacrifices have given way.[40]

39 Acts 14:8–18.
40 1 Timothy 2:5; Philippians 2:6–7.

THE MEASURE OF POWER GIVEN TO THE DEMONS FOR THE GLORIFYING OF THE SAINTS THROUGH ENDURING SUFFERING, WHO OVERCAME THE SPIRITS OF THE AIR NOT BY APPEASING THEM BUT BY REMAINING IN GOD

Persecution by demons fills up the number of the martyrs, who conquer the powers of the air.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.21	Moderatis autem praefinitisque temporibus etiam potestas permissa daemonibus, ut hominibus quos possident excitatis inimicitias aduersus Dei ciuitatem tyrannice exerceant sibique sacrificia non solum ab offerentibus sumant et a uolentibus expetant, uerum etiam ab inuitis persequendo uiolenter extorqueant, non solum perniciosa non est, sed etiam utilis inuenitur ecclesiae, ut martyrum numerus inpleatur; quos ciuitas Dei tanto clariores et honoratiores ciues habet, quanto fortius aduersus inpietatis peccatum et usque ad sanguinem certant. Hos multo elegantius, si ecclesiastica loquendi consuetudo pateretur, nostros heroas uocaremus.	Moreover, for limited and predetermined periods, power is also granted to demons. They may stir up the people they possess and through them exercise a tyrannical hostility against the city of God. They may not only receive sacrifices from those who offer them and seek them from the willing, but even wring them by force from the unwilling through persecution. This power is not only not harmful but is actually found to be useful to the Church, because it fills up the number of the martyrs. The city of God holds the martyrs as citizens all the more illustrious and honored, the more bravely they fight against the sin of impiety, even to the shedding of their blood. If the Church's usage of speech allowed it, we would much more elegantly call them our heroes.
	Hoc enim nomen a Iunone dicitur tractum, quod Graece Iuno Ἥρα appellatur, et ideo nescio quis filius eius secundum Graecorum fabulas Heros fuerit nuncupatus, hoc uidelicet ueluti mysticum significante fabula, quod aer Iunoni deputetur, ubi uolunt cum daemonibus heroas habitare, quo nomine appellant alicuius meriti animas defunctorum. Sed a contrario martyres nostri heroes nuncuparentur, si, ut dixi, usus ecclesiastici sermonis admitteret, non quo eis esset cum daemonibus in aere societas, sed quod eosdem daemones, id est aerias uincerent potestates et in eis ipsam, quidquid putatur significare, Iunonem, quae non usquequaque inconuenienter a poetis inducitur inimica uirtutibus et caelum petentibus uiris fortibus inuida.	This name is said to derive from Juno, because in Greek Juno is called Ἥρα [Hera]. That is supposedly why, according to the myths of the Greeks, one of her sons was named Heros. The myth, of course, carries a sort of mystical meaning: the air is assigned to Juno, and that is where they hold that the heroes dwell with the demons. "Heroes" is the name they give to the souls of the dead who have some merit. But our martyrs would be called heroes in the opposite sense, if, as I said, the usage of the Church's language admitted it. They would be called heroes not because they share the air with the demons, but because they conquer those same demons, that is, the powers of the air. Among those powers they conquer Juno herself, whatever she is thought to signify. Not altogether inappropriately, the poets present her as hostile to virtues and envious of brave men who strive for heaven.
	Sed, rursus ei succumbit infeliciter ceditque Vergilius, ut, cum aput eum illa dicat: Vincor ab Aenea, ipsum Aenean admoneat Helenus quasi consilio religioso et dicat: Iunoni cane nota libens, dominamque potentem / Supplicibus supera donis. Ex qua opinione Porphyrius, quamuis non ex sua sententia, sed ex aliorum, dicit bonum deum uel genium non uenire in hominem, nisi malus fuerit ante placatus; tamquam fortiora sint aput	Virgil, however, unhappily gives way and yields to her again. In his poem she says, "I am conquered by Aeneas," and yet Helenus advises Aeneas himself, as if offering religious counsel: "Gladly sing your vows to Juno, and win over the powerful mistress with suppliant gifts." Following this opinion, Porphyry says, though he reports it as the view of others rather than his own, that a good god or

LATIN	ENGLISH
eos numina mala quam bona, quando quidem mala inpediunt adiutoria bonorum, nisi eis placata dent locum, malisque nolentibus bona prodesse non possunt; nocere autem mala possunt, non sibi ualentibus resistere bonis. Non est ista uerae ueraciterque sanctae religionis uia; non sic Iunonem, hoc est aerias potestates piorum uirtutibus inuidentes, nostri martyres uincunt.	guardian spirit does not come to a human being unless the evil one has first been appeased. This implies that, in their view, evil divinities are stronger than good ones. The evil ones block the help of the good unless they are appeased and make way for them, and the good cannot do any good if the evil are unwilling. The evil, by contrast, can do harm, because the good are unable to resist them. This is not the way of the true and truly holy religion. This is not how our martyrs conquer Juno, that is, the powers of the air that envy the virtues of the godly.[41]
Non omnino, si dici usitate posset, heroes nostri supplicibus donis, sed uirtutibus diuinis Heran superant. Commodius quippe Scipio Africanus est cognominatus, quod uirtute Africam uicerit, quam si hostes donis placasset, ut parcerent.	Our heroes, if the term could be used in ordinary speech, overcome Hera not at all by suppliant gifts but by divine virtues. Scipio, after all, was more fittingly given the surname Africanus because he conquered Africa by courage than he would have been if he had appeased the enemy with gifts so that they would spare him.[42]

WHERE THE SAINTS' POWER AGAINST DEMONS COMES FROM, AND WHERE TRUE PURIFICATION OF THE HEART COMES FROM

Saints cast out demons by prayer to God, and are cleansed of sin only through Christ the mediator.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.22 Vera pietate homines Dei aeriam potestatem inimicam contrariamque pietati exorcizando eiciunt, non placando, omnesque tentationes aduersitatis eius uincunt orando non ipsam, sed Deum suum aduersus ipsam. Non enim aliquem uincit aut subiugat nisi societate peccati. In eius ergo nomine uincitur, qui hominem adsumsit egitque sine peccato, ut in ipso sacerdote ac sacrificio fieret remissio peccatorum, id est per mediatorem Dei et hominum, hominem Christum Iesum, per quem facta peccatorum purgatione reconciliamur Deo. Non enim nisi peccatis homines separantur a Deo, quorum in hac uita non fit nostra uirtute, sed diuina miseratione purgatio, per indulgentiam illius, non per nostram potentiam; quia et ipsa quantulacumque uirtus, quae dicitur nostra, illius est nobis bonitate concessa.	With true devotion, the men of God cast out the power of the air, which is hostile and opposed to devotion, by exorcising it, not by appeasing it. They overcome all the temptations of its hostility by praying, not to it, but to their God against it. For it conquers or subjugates no one except through partnership in sin. It is conquered, therefore, in the name of him who took humanity upon himself and lived without sin, so that in him, as priest and sacrifice, the forgiveness of sins might come about. That is, it is conquered through "the mediator between God and humankind, the man Christ Jesus," through whom we are reconciled to God once purification from sins has been made. Nothing but sins separates human beings from God. In this life we are cleansed of them not by our own virtue but by divine mercy, through his forgiveness and not through our own power. For even that virtue we call ours, however small it may be, has been granted to us by his goodness.
Multum autem nobis in hac carne tribueremus, nisi usque ad eius depositionem sub uenia uiueremus.	We would credit ourselves with a great deal while in this flesh if we did not live under pardon until 41 Virgil, Aeneid 7.310 and 3.438–439; Helenus is the Trojan seer who prophesies to Aeneas.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Propterea ergo nobis per Mediatorem praestita est gratia, ut polluti carne peccati carnis peccati similitudine mundaremur. Hac Dei gratia, qua in nos ostendit magnam misericordiam suam, et in hac uita per fidem regimur, et post hanc uitam per ipsam speciem incommutabilis ueritatis ad perfectionem plenissimam perducemur.	we lay it aside. That is why grace has been given to us through the Mediator: so that we, defiled by the flesh of sin, might be cleansed by the likeness of the flesh of sin. By this grace of God, in which he has shown his great mercy toward us, we are guided by faith in this life. After this life, by the very sight of unchangeable truth, we shall be led to the fullest perfection.

THE PRINCIPLES IN WHICH THE PLATONISTS SAY THE PURIFICATION OF THE SOUL CONSISTS

Porphyry's oracle says only the "principles"—the Father, the Son and one between them—can purify.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.23 Dicit etiam Porphyrius diuinis oraculis fuisse responsum nos non purgari lunae teletis adque solis, ut hinc ostenderetur nullorum deorum teletis hominem posse purgari. Cuius enim teletae purgant, si lunae solisque non purgant, quos inter caelestes deos praecipuos habent? Denique eodem dicit oraculo expressum principia posse purgare, ne forte, cum dictum esset non purgare teletas solis et lunae, alicuius alterius dei de turba ualere ad purgandum teletae crederentur. Quae autem dicat esse principia tamquam Platonicus, nouimus. Dicit enim Deum Patrem et Deum Filium, quem Graece appellat paternum intellectum uel paternam mentem; de Spiritu autem sancto aut nihil aut non aperte aliquid dicit; quamuis quem alium dicat horum medium, non intellego.	Porphyry also says that divine oracles gave the reply that we are not purified by the teletae [initiation rites] of the moon and the sun. This was meant to show that a human being cannot be purified by the rites of any gods. Whose rites could purify, if those of the moon and the sun do not, when these are the ones they hold to be chief among the heavenly gods? He then says that the same oracle declared that the "principles" can purify. This was added so that, once it had been said that the rites of the sun and moon do not purify, no one would believe that the rites of some other god from the crowd had the power to purify. We know what he, as a Platonist, means by the principles. He speaks of God the Father and God the Son, whom he calls in Greek the paternal intellect or paternal mind. About the Holy Spirit he says either nothing or nothing clearly, though I do not understand whom else he means by the one "in between these."
Si enim tertiam, sicut Plotinus, ubi de tribus principalibus substantiis disputat, animae naturam etiam iste uellet intellegi, non utique diceret horum medium, id est Patris et Filii medium. Postponit quippe Plotinus animae naturam paterno intellectui; iste autem cum dicit medium, non postponit, sed interponit. Et nimirum hoc dixit, ut potuit siue ut uoluit, quod nos sanctum Spiritum, nec Patris tantum nec Filii tantum, sed utriusque Spiritum dicimus. Liberis enim uerbis loquuntur philosophi, nec in rebus ad intellegendum difficillimis offensionem religiosarum aurium pertimescunt. Nobis autem ad certam regulam loqui fas est, ne uerborum licentia etiam de rebus, quae his significantur, inpiam gignat opinionem.	If he too had wanted the third to be understood as the nature of the soul, as Plotinus does where he discusses the three principal substances, he would surely not call it "in between these," that is, between the Father and the Son. Plotinus, after all, places the nature of the soul after the paternal intellect. Porphyry, by contrast, in saying "in between," does not place it after but between. No doubt he was expressing, as best he could or as he wished, what we call the Holy Spirit, the Spirit not of the Father alone nor of the Son alone, but of both. Philosophers speak with free words, and in matters very hard to understand they have no fear of offending religious ears. But we must speak ac-

42 Scipio Africanus, the Roman general who defeated Hannibal at Zama in 202 BC.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
		cording to a fixed rule, so that license in words does not give rise to an impious opinion about the very things the words signify.[43]

THE ONE TRUE PRINCIPLE, WHICH ALONE PURIFIES AND RENEWS HUMAN NATURE

There is one Principle, not three; Porphyry refused to see that Christ in the flesh is that cleansing Principle.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.24	Nos itaque ita non dicimus duo uel tria principia, cum de Deo loquimur, sicut nec duos deos uel tres nobis licitum est dicere quamuis de unoquoque loquentes, uel de Patre uel de Filio uel de Spiritu sancto, etiam singulum quemque Deum esse fateamur, nec dicamus tamen quod haeretici Sabelliani, eundem esse Patrem, qui est et Filius, et eundem Spiritum sanctum, qui est et Pater et Filius, sed Patrem esse Filii Patrem, et Filium Patris Filium, et Patris et Filii Spiritum sanctum nec Patrem esse nec Filium. Verum itaque dictum est non purgari hominem nisi principio, quamuis pluraliter aput eos sint dicta principia.	So when we speak of God, we do not speak of two or three principles, just as we are not permitted to speak of two or three gods. Even so, when we speak of each one, the Father, the Son or the Holy Spirit, we acknowledge that each individually is God. Yet we do not say, as the Sabellian heretics do, that the Father is the same as the Son, and that the Holy Spirit is the same as the Father and the Son. We say that the Father is the Father of the Son, that the Son is the Son of the Father, and that the Holy Spirit, who is of the Father and the Son, is neither Father nor Son. It was therefore truly said that a human being is purified only by a Principle, even though among them "principles" were spoken of in the plural.[44]
	Sed subditus Porphyrius inuidis potestatibus, de quibus et erubescebat, et eas libere redarguere formidabat, noluit intellegere Dominum Christum esse principium, cuius incarnatione purgamur. Eum quippe in ipsa carne contemsit, quam propter sacrificium nostrae purgationis adsumsit, magnum scilicet sacramentum ea superbia non intellegens, quam sua ille humilitate deiecit uerus benignusque Mediator, in ea se ostendens mortalitate mortalibus, quam maligni fallacesque mediatores non habendo se superbius extulerunt miserisque hominibus adiutorium deceptorium uelut inmortales mortalibus promiserunt.	But Porphyry was subject to envious powers. He was ashamed of them, yet afraid to refute them openly, and so he refused to understand that the Lord Christ is the Principle by whose incarnation we are purified. He despised Christ in the very flesh that Christ took on for the sacrifice of our purification. Because of his pride, of course, he failed to understand a great mystery, the very pride that the true and kindly Mediator cast down by his humility. Christ showed himself to mortals in that mortality which the malign and deceitful mediators lack. Because they lack it, they have exalted themselves all the more proudly, and, posing as immortals before mortals, they have promised wretched human beings a deceptive help.
	Bonus itaque uerusque Mediator ostendit peccatum esse malum, non carnis substantiam uel naturam, quae cum anima hominis et suscipi sine peccato potuit et haberi, et morte deponi et in melius resurrectione mutari; nec ipsam mortem, quamuis esset poena peccati, quam tamen pro nobis sine peccato ipse persoluit, peccando esse uitandam, sed potius, si facultas datur, pro iustitia	So the good and true Mediator showed that it is sin that is evil, not the substance or nature of the flesh. Together with a human soul, that flesh could be taken on and kept without sin, laid aside in death, and changed for the better by resurrection. He also showed that death itself is not to be avoided by sinning, though death is the penalty of 43 Plotinus taught three principal realities: the One, Intellect and Soul.

44 The Sabellians, followers of Sabellius (3rd century AD), held that Father, Son and Spirit are merely modes of a single divine person.

LATIN	ENGLISH
perferendam. Ideo enim soluere potuit moriendo peccata, quia et mortuus est, et non pro peccato. Hunc ille Platonicus non cognouit esse principium; nam cognosceret purgatorium. Neque enim caro principium est aut anima humana, sed Verbum per quod facta sunt omnia. Non ergo caro per se ipsam mundat, sed per Verbum a quo suscepta est, cum Verbum caro factum est et habitauit in nobis.	sin, a penalty he himself paid for us without sin. Rather, if the occasion arises, death is to be endured for the sake of justice. He was able to undo sins by dying precisely because he died, and did not die for any sin of his own. That Platonist did not recognize him as the Principle; if he had, he would have recognized him as the one who purifies. For neither the flesh nor the human soul is the Principle, but the Word, "through whom all things were made." So the flesh does not cleanse by itself, but through the Word by whom it was taken on, when "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us."[45]
Nam de carne sua manducanda mystice loquens, cum hi qui non intellexerunt offensi recederent dicentes: Durus est hic sermo, quis eum potest audire? respondit manentibus ceteris: Spiritus est qui uiuificat, caro autem non prodest quidquam. Principium ergo suscepta anima et carne et animam credentium mundat et carnem. Ideo quaerentibus Iudaeis quis esset respondit se esse principium. Quod utique carnales, infirmi, peccatis obnoxii et ignorantiae tenebris obuoluti nequaquam percipere possemus, nisi ab eo mundaremur adque sanaremur per hoc quod eramus et non eramus. Eramus enim homines, sed iusti non eramus; in illius autem incarnatione natura humana erat, sed iusta, non peccatrix erat.	When he was speaking in a mystical sense about eating his flesh, those who did not understand took offense and went away, saying: "This is a hard saying; who can listen to it?" He answered those who remained: "It is the spirit that gives life; the flesh profits nothing." So the Principle, having taken on a soul and flesh, cleanses both the soul and the flesh of believers. That is why, when the Jews asked him who he was, he answered that he was the Principle. We were carnal, weak, liable to sin and wrapped in the darkness of ignorance. We could never have grasped this unless he had cleansed and healed us through what we were and what we were not. For we were human, but we were not righteous. In his incarnation, however, there was human nature, but it was righteous, not sinful.[46]
Haec est mediatio, qua manus lapsis iacentibusque porrecta est; hoc est semen dispositum per angelos, in quorum edictis et lex dabatur, qua et unus Deus coli iubebatur et hic Mediator uenturus promittebatur.	This is the mediation by which a hand was stretched out to those who had fallen and lay prostrate. This is "the seed ordained through angels," and through their proclamations the law was also given. In that law the one God was commanded to be worshiped, and this Mediator was promised as the one who would come.[47]

THAT ALL THE SAINTS, BOTH UNDER THE LAW AND IN EARLIER AGES, WERE JUSTIFIED IN THE MYSTERY AND THE FAITH OF CHRIST

The righteous of old were saved by faith in Christ; a psalm traces the turn from earthly hopes.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.25 Huius sacramenti fide etiam iusti antiqui mundari pie uiuendo potuerunt, non solum antequam lex populo	By faith in this mystery even the righteous of old could be cleansed by living devout lives. This was 45 John 1:3 and 1:14.

46 John 6:60, 63 (6:61, 64 in the Vulgate); John 8:25, where Augustine's Latin reads principium, "the Beginning" or "the Principle."
47 Galatians 3:19.

LATIN

Hebraeo daretur (neque enim eis praedicator Deus uel angeli defuerunt), sed ipsius quoque legis temporibus, quamuis in figuris rerum spiritalium habere uideretur promissa carnalia, propter quod uetus dicitur testamentum. Nam et prophetae tunc erant, per quos, sicut per angelos, eadem promissio praedicata est, et ex illorum numero erat, cuius tam magnam diuinamque sententiam de boni humani fine paulo ante commemoraui: Mihi autem adhaerere Deo bonum est. In quo plane psalmo duorum testamentorum, quae dicuntur uetus et nouum, satis est declarata distinctio.

Propter carnales enim terrenasque promissiones, cum eas inpiis abundare perspiceret, dicit pedes suos paene fuisse commotos et effusos in lapsum propemodum gressus suos, tamquam frustra Deo ipse seruisset, cum ea felicitate, quam de illo expectabat, contemtores eius florere perspiceret; seque in rei huius inquisitione laborasse, uolentem quur ita esset adprehendere, donec intraret in sanctuarium Dei et intellegeret in nouissima eorum, qui felices uidebantur erranti. Tunc eos intellexit in eo, quod se extulerunt, sicut dicit, fuisse deiectos et defecisse ac perisse propter iniquitates suas; totumque illud culmen temporalis felicitatis ita eis factum tamquam somnium euigilantis, qui se repente inuenit suis quae somniabat fallacibus gaudiis destitutum.

Et quoniam in hac terra uel in ciuitate terrena magni sibi uidebantur: Domine, inquit, imaginem illorum in ciuitate tua ad nihilum rediges. Quod huic tamen utile fuerit etiam ipsa terrena non nisi ab uno uero Deo quaerere, in cuius potestate sunt omnia, satis ostendit ubi ait: Velut pecus factus sum aput te, et ego semper tecum. Velut pecus dixit utique non intellegens. Ea quippe a te desiderare debui, quae mihi cum inpiis non possunt esse communia, quibus eos cum abundare cernerem, putaui me incassum tibi seruisse, quando et illi haec haberent, qui tibi seruire noluissent. Tamen ego semper tecum, qui etiam in talium rerum desiderio deos alios non quaesiui.

Ac per hoc sequitur: Tenuisti manum dexterae meae, et in uoluntate tua deduxisti me, et cum gloria adsumsisti true not only before the law was given to the Hebrew people, for they did not lack God or angels to proclaim it to them, but also in the times of the law itself. The law did seem to hold carnal promises as figures of spiritual realities, which is why it is called the Old Testament. Yet there were prophets then too, through whom, as through angels, the same promise was proclaimed. Among them was the one whose great and divine saying about the end of human good I quoted a little earlier: "But for me it is good to cling to God." In this very psalm the distinction between the two testaments, called the old and the new, is made quite clear.

ENGLISH

For he saw the wicked abounding in carnal and earthly promises. Because of this, he says, his feet had almost been shaken and his steps had nearly slipped into a fall. It seemed as if he had served God in vain, since he saw those who despised God flourishing in the very happiness he had expected from God. He says he had labored over this question, wanting to grasp why it was so, until he entered the sanctuary of God and understood the final end of those who, while he was going astray, had seemed happy to him. Then he understood that in exalting themselves, as he says, they had been cast down, and had failed and perished because of their iniquities. He saw that the whole summit of their temporal happiness had become for them like the dream of someone waking up, who suddenly finds himself robbed of the deceptive joys he had been dreaming of.

And since they seemed great in their own eyes in this land, that is, in the earthly city, he says: "Lord, in your city you will bring their image to nothing." Yet he shows clearly enough that it was beneficial for him to seek even earthly things from the one true God alone, in whose power all things are. He shows it where he says: "I became like a beast before you, and I am always with you." "Like a beast," he said, meaning, of course, without understanding. "For I ought to have desired from you the things I cannot share with the wicked. When I saw them abounding in these other things, I thought I had served you in vain, since even those who had refused to serve you had them. Yet I am always with you, for even in desiring such things I did not seek other gods."

And so it follows: "You have held my right hand, and in your will you have guided me, and with me; tamquam ad sinistram cuncta illa pertineant, quae abundare aput inpios cum uidisset paene conlapsus est. Quid enim mihi est, inquit, in caelo, et a te quid uolui super terram? Reprehendit se ipsum iusteque sibi displicuit, quia, cum tam magnum bonum haberet in caelo (quod post intellexit), rem transitoriam, fragilem et quodam modo luteam felicitatem a suo Deo quaesiuit in terra. Defecit, inquit, cor meum et caro mea, Deus cordis mei, defectu utique bono ab inferioribus ad superna; unde in alio psalmo dicitur: Desiderat et deficit anima mea in atria Domini; item in alio: Defecit in salutare tuum anima mea.

LATIN

Tamen cum de utroque dixisset, id est de corde et carne deficiente, non subiecit: Deus cordis et carnis meae, sed Deus cordis mei. Per cor quippe caro mundatur. Unde dicit Dominus: Mundate, quae intus sunt, et quae foris sunt munda erunt. Partem deinde suam dicit ipsum Deum, non aliquid ab eo, sed ipsum. Deus, inquit, cordis mei, et pars mea Deus in saecula; quod inter multa, quae ab hominibus eliguntur, ipse illi placuerit eligendus. Quia ecce, inquit, qui longe se faciunt a te, peribunt; perdidisti omnem, qui fornicatur abs te, hoc est, qui multorum deorum uult esse prostibulum. Unde sequitur illud, propter quod et cetera de eodem psalmo dicenda uisa sunt: Mihi autem adhaerere Deo bonum est, non longe ire, non per plurima fornicari.

Adhaerere autem Deo tunc perfectum erit, cum totum, quod liberandum est, fuerit liberatum. Nunc uero fit illud, quod sequitur: Ponere in Deo spem meam. Spes enim quae uidetur, non est spes; quod enim uidet quis, quid sperat? ait apostolus. Si autem quod non uidemus speramus, per patientiam expectamus, In hac autem spe nunc constituti agamus quod sequitur, et simus nos quoque pro modulo nostro angeli Dei, id est nuntii eius, adnuntiantes eius uoluntatem et gloriam gratiamque laudantes. Unde cum dixisset: Ponere in Deo spem meam, glory you have taken me up." It is as if all those things belong to the left hand, the things he had seen abounding among the wicked when he nearly collapsed. "For what is there for me in heaven," he says, "and what have I wanted from you on earth?" He rebukes himself and was rightly displeased with himself. He had so great a good in heaven, as he understood afterward, and yet he had sought from his God on earth a transitory, fragile and, in a way, muddy happiness. "My heart and my flesh have failed," he says, "God of my heart." This is a good failing, of course, a failing away from lower things toward the things above. Hence another psalm says: "My soul longs and fails for the courts of the Lord." And yet another says: "My soul has failed for your salvation."[48]

ENGLISH

Yet although he had spoken of both, of the heart and of the flesh failing, he did not go on to say "God of my heart and my flesh," but "God of my heart." For it is through the heart that the flesh is cleansed. Hence the Lord says: "Cleanse what is inside, and what is outside will be clean." He then says that his portion is God himself, not something from God, but God himself. "God of my heart," he says, "and my portion is God forever." Among the many things that human beings choose, it pleased him to choose God himself. "For behold," he says, "those who put themselves far from you will perish; you have destroyed everyone who commits fornication away from you." That means whoever is willing to be the prostitute of many gods. Then follows the line for whose sake the rest of the psalm seemed worth discussing: "But for me it is good to cling to God." That is, not to go far away, not to commit fornication with a multitude.[49]

Clinging to God will be perfect only when all that is to be set free has been set free. For now, what follows is what takes place: "to put my hope in God." For "hope that is seen is not hope," says the apostle; "for why would anyone hope for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience." Since we are now set in this hope, let us do what follows. Let us too, in our small measure, be angels of God, that is, his messengers, announcing his will and praising his 48 Psalm 83:3 (84:2 in most English Bibles) and Psalm 118:81 (119:81 in most English Bibles).

49 Compare Matthew 23:26.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ut adnuntiem, inquit, omnes laudes tuas in portis filiae Sion.	glory and grace. And so, after saying, "to put my hope in God," he goes on: "that I may proclaim all your praises in the gates of the daughter of Zion."[50]
Haec est gloriosissima ciuitas Dei: haec unum Deum nouit et colit; hanc angeli sancti adnuntiauerunt, qui nos ad eius societatem inuitauerunt ciuesque suos in illa esse uoluerunt; quibus non placet ut eos colamus tamquam nostros deos, sed cum eis et illorum et nostrum Deum; nec eis sacrificemus, sed cum ipsis sacrificium simus Deo. Nullo itaque dubitante, qui haec deposita maligna obstinatione considerat, omnes inmortales beati, qui nobis non inuident (neque enim si inuiderent, essent beati), sed potius nos diligunt, ut et nos cum ipsis beati simus, plus nobis fauent, plus adiuuant, quando unum Deum cum illis colimus. Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum, quam si eos ipsos per sacrificia coleremus.	This is the most glorious city of God. This city knows and worships the one God. The holy angels have proclaimed it; they have invited us into its fellowship and wished us to be their fellow citizens in it. It does not please them that we should worship them as our gods, but that we should worship, together with them, their God and ours. Nor does it please them that we should sacrifice to them, but that together with them we should be a sacrifice to God. No one who considers these things and lays aside malign obstinacy can doubt it. All the happy immortals who do not envy us (for if they envied us, they would not be happy), but rather love us, so that we too may be happy with them, favor us more and help us more when we worship with them the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, than if we worshiped them with sacrifices.

THE INCONSISTENCY OF PORPHYRY, WAVERING BETWEEN CONFESSING THE TRUE GOD AND WORSHIPING DEMONS

Porphyry distinguishes angels from demons, yet still will not openly reject the demons the theurgists serve.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.26 Nescio quo modo (quantum mihi uidetur) amicis suis theurgis erubescebat Porphyrius. Nam ista utcumque sapiebat, sed contra multorum deorum cultum non libere defendebat. Et angelos quippe alios esse dixit, qui deorsum descendentes hominibus theurgicis diuina pronuntient; alios autem, qui in terris ea, quae Patris sunt, et altitudinem eius profunditatemque declarent. Num igitur hos angelos, quorum ministerium est declarare uoluntatem Patris, credendum est uelle nos subdi nisi ei, cuius nobis adnuntiant uoluntatem? Unde optime admonet etiam ipse Platonicus imitandos eos potius quam inuocandos. Non itaque debemus metuere, ne inmortales et beatos uni Deo subditos non eis sacrificando offendamus.	Somehow, as far as I can see, Porphyry was embarrassed before his friends the theurgists. He had some sort of grasp of these truths, but he would not speak out freely against the worship of many gods. He said, in fact, that there are some angels who come down from above and proclaim divine things to theurgists, and others who on earth make known the things that are the Father's, his height and his depth. Are we then to believe that these angels, whose ministry is to make known the Father's will, want us to be subject to anyone except him whose will they announce to us? That is why even this Platonist himself gives the excellent advice that we should imitate them rather than invoke them. So we need not fear that, by not sacrificing to them, we will offend the immortal and happy beings who are subject to the one God.
Quod enim non nisi uni uero Deo deberi sciunt, cui et ipsi adhaerendo beati sunt, procul dubio neque per ullam significantem figuram, neque per ipsam rem, quae	For they know that worship is owed to the one true God alone, the God by clinging to whom they too are happy. They certainly do not want it

50 Romans 8:24–25.

LATIN

sacramentis significatur, sibi exhiberi uolunt. Daemonum est haec adrogantia superborum adque miserorum, a quibus longe diuersa est pietas subditorum Deo nec aliunde quam illi cohaerendo beatorum. Ad quod bonum percipiendum etiam nobis sincera benignitate oportet ut faueant, neque sibi adrogent quo eis subiciamur, sed eum adnuntient sub quo eis in pace sociemur. Quid adhuc trepidas, o philosophe, aduersus potestates et ueris uirtutibus et ueri Dei muneribus inuidas habere liberam uocem? Iam distinxisti angelos, qui Patris adnuntiant uoluntatem, ab eis angelis, qui ad theurgos homines nescio qua deducti arte descendunt. Quid adhuc eos honoras, ut dicas pronuntiare diuina?

ENGLISH

offered to themselves, either through any figure that signifies it or through the very reality that the sacraments signify. This arrogance belongs to demons, proud and wretched as they are. Far different is the piety of those who are subject to God and happy from no other source than by clinging to him. They must also favor us with sincere kindness so that we may attain that good. They must not claim for themselves that we should be subject to them, but must announce him under whom we may be joined with them in peace. Why are you still afraid, philosopher, to speak freely against powers that envy true virtues and the gifts of the true God? You have already distinguished the angels who announce the Father's will from those angels who come down to theurgists, drawn by who knows what art. Why do you still honor them so far as to say that they proclaim divine things?

Quae tandem diuina pronuntiant, qui non uoluntatem Patris adnuntiant? Nempe illi sunt, quos sacris precibus inuidus adligauit, ne praestarent animae purgationem, nec a bono, ut dicis, purgare cupiente ab illis uinculis solui et suae potestati reddi potuerunt. Adhuc dubitas haec maligna esse daemonia, uel te fingis fortasse nescire, dum non uis theurgos offendere, a quibus curiositate deceptus ista perniciosa et insana pro magno beneficio didicisti? Audes istam inuidam non potentiam, sed pestilentiam, et non dicam dominam, sed, quod tu fateris, ancillam potius inuidorum isto aere transcenso leuare in caelum et inter deos uestros etiam sidereos conlocare, uel ipsa quoque sidera his obprobriis infamare?

What divine things, after all, do they proclaim if they do not announce the Father's will? These are surely the ones whom an envious man bound with sacred prayers so that they would not grant purification to a soul. A good man who wished to purify that soul, as you tell it, could not release them from those bonds and restore them to their own power. Do you still doubt that these are malign demons? Or do you perhaps pretend not to know, because you do not want to offend the theurgists? It was from them that you, deceived by curiosity, learned these pernicious and insane things as if they were a great benefit. Do you dare to lift this envious thing above the air into heaven? It is not a potency but a pestilence. I will not call it a mistress, but rather, as you yourself admit, the handmaid of the envious. Do you dare to place it among your gods, even the starry ones, or else to disgrace the stars themselves with these infamies?[51]

THE IMPIETY OF PORPHYRY, BY WHICH HE GOES BEYOND EVEN THE ERROR OF APULEIUS

Apuleius kept the higher gods free of passions; Porphyry lifts human vices into heaven and sends people to theurgists.

LATIN

10.27 Quanto humanius et tolerabilius consectaneus tuus Platonicus Apuleius errauit, qui tantummodo daemones a luna et infra ordinatos agitari morbis passionum mentisque turbelis honorans eos quidem, sed uolens

ENGLISH

How much more humanely and tolerably your fellow Platonist Apuleius erred! He held that only the demons, ranked from the moon downward, are agitated by diseased passions and turmoil of 51 Augustine refers to Porphyry's story, cited in 10.9, of a man whose attempt to purify a soul was blocked by an envious rival who bound the powers with spells.

LATIN

nolensque confessus est: deos tamen caeli superiores ad aetheria spatia pertinentes, siue uisibiles, quos conspicuos lucere cernebat, solem ac lunam et cetera ibidem lumina, siue inuisibiles, quos putabat, ab omni labe istarum perturbationum quanta potuit disputatione secreuit!

Tu autem hoc didicisti non a Platone, sed a Chaldaeis magistris tuis, ut in aetherias uel empyreas mundi sublimitates et firmamenta caelestia extolleres uitia humana, ut possent di uestri theurgis pronuntiare diuina; quibus diuinis te tamen per intellectualem uitam facis altiorem, ut tibi uidelicet tamquam philosopho theurgicae artis purgationes nequaquam necessariae uideantur; sed aliis eas tamen inportas, ut hanc ueluti mercedem reddas magistris tuis, quod eos, qui philosophari non possunt, ad ista seducis, quae tibi tamquam superiorum capaci esse inutilia confiteris; ut uidelicet quicumque a philosophiae uirtute remoti sunt, quae ardua nimis adque paucorum est, te auctore theurgos homines, a quibus non quidem in anima intellectuali, uerum saltem in anima spiritali purgentur, inquirant, et quoniam istorum, quos philosophari piget, incomparabiliter maior est multitudo, plures ad secretos et inlicitos magistros tuos, quam ad scholas Platonicas uenire cogantur.

Hoc enim tibi inmundissimi daemones, deos aetherios se esse fingentes, quorum praedicator et angelus factus es, promiserunt, quod in anima spiritali theurgica arte purgati ad Patrem quidem non redeunt, sed super aerias plagas inter deos aetherios habitabunt. Non audit ista hominum multitudo, propter quos a daemonum dominatu liberandos Christus aduenit. In illo enim habent misericordissimam purgationem et mentis et spiritus et corporis sui. Propterea quippe totum hominem sine peccato ille suscepit, ut totum, quo constat homo, a peccatorum peste sanaret. Quem tu quoque utinam cognouisses eique te potius quam uel tuae uirtuti, quae humana, fragilis et infirma est, uel perniciosissimae curiositati sanandum tutius commisisses.

ENGLISH

mind. He honored them, it is true, but willingly or unwillingly he admitted this. The higher gods of heaven, however, who belong to the ethereal regions, he set apart from every stain of these disturbances with all the argument he could muster. That held whether they were visible gods, which he saw shining plainly, such as the sun and moon and the other lights there, or invisible ones, which he supposed to exist.

But you learned this not from Plato but from your Chaldean teachers: to raise human vices into the ethereal or empyrean heights of the world and the heavenly firmament, so that your gods could proclaim divine things to theurgists. Yet you make yourself higher than these divine things through the intellectual life. So to you, as a philosopher, the purifications of the theurgic art evidently seem by no means necessary. Still, you press them on others, and so pay your teachers a kind of fee. You lure those who cannot do philosophy into these things, which you admit are useless to you as one capable of higher ones. The result, evidently, is this. All who are far removed from the virtue of philosophy, which is very arduous and belongs to few, seek out theurgists on your authority, to be purified by them. They are not purified in the intellectual soul, indeed, but at least in the spiritual soul. And since those who find philosophizing tedious are incomparably more numerous, more people are driven to your secret and illicit teachers than to the Platonic schools.[52]

The most unclean demons pretend to be ethereal gods, and you have become their herald and angel. This is what they have promised you: those purified in the spiritual soul by the theurgic art do not, it is true, return to the Father, but they will dwell above the regions of the air among the ethereal gods. The multitude of human beings whom Christ came to free from the domination of demons does not listen to such things. For in him they have the most merciful purification of their mind, spirit and body alike. It was for this very reason that he took on the whole human being, without sin: to heal from the plague of sins the whole of what a human being consists of. If only you too had known him, and had entrusted your-

52 The Chaldean Oracles, a 2nd-century AD collection of verse oracles, were the founding text of theurgy and were treated by later Platonists as revelation.

LATIN

ENGLISH

self to him for healing! That would have been safer than trusting either your own virtue, which is human, frail and weak, or your most pernicious curiosity.

Non enim te decepisset, quem uestra, ut tu ipse scribis, oracula sanctum inmortalemque confessa sunt; de quo etiam poeta nobilissimus poetice quidem, quia in alterius adumbrata persona, ueraciter tamen, si ad ipsum referas, dixit: Te duce, si qua manent sceleris uestigia nostri, / Inrita perpetua soluent formidine terras. Ea quippe dixit, quae etiam multum proficientium in uirtute iustitiae possunt propter huius uitae infirmitatem, etsi non scelera, scelerum tamen manere uestigia, quae non nisi ab illo saluatore sanantur, de quo iste uersus expressus est. Nam utique non hoc a se ipso se dixisse Vergilius in eclogae ipsius quarto ferme uersu indicat, ubi ait: Ultima Cumaei uenit iam carminis aetas; unde hoc a Cumaea Sibylla dictum esse incunctanter apparet.

He would not have deceived you. Your own oracles, as you yourself write, acknowledged him as holy and immortal. The most renowned of poets also spoke of him. He spoke poetically, to be sure, since he sketched it in the person of another, yet truly, if you apply it to Christ: "Under your leadership, whatever traces of our crime remain will be made void and will free the lands from perpetual fear." He said what can remain, because of the weakness of this life, even in those who are making great progress in the virtue of righteousness. If not crimes, then still the traces of crimes may remain, and these are healed only by the Savior of whom this verse was composed. Virgil indicates that he did not say this on his own account, in about the fourth line of that eclogue, where he says: "Now has come the last age of the Cumaean song." From this it is plain beyond doubt that the Cumaean Sibyl said it.[53]

Theurgi uero illi uel potius daemones deorum species figurasque fingentes inquinant potius quam purgant humanum spiritum falsitate phantasmatum et deceptoria uanarum ludificatione formarum. Quo modo enim purgent hominis spiritum, qui inmundum habent proprium? Alioquin nullo modo carminibus inuidi hominis ligarentur ipsumque inane beneficium, quod praestaturi uidebantur, aut metu premerent aut simili inuidentia denegarent. Sufficit quod purgatione theurgica neque intellectualem animam, hoc est mentem nostram, dicis posse purgari, et ipsam spiritalem, id est nostrae animae partem mente inferiorem, quam tali arte purgari posse adseris, inmortalem tamen aeternamque non posse hac arte fieri confiteris. Christus autem uitam promittit aeternam; unde ad eum mundus uobis quidem stomachantibus, mirantibus tamen stupentibusque concurrit.

But those theurgists, or rather the demons who counterfeit the appearances and shapes of gods, defile the human spirit rather than purify it. They do so with the falsehood of phantasms and the deceptive mockery of empty forms. How could they purify a human being's spirit when their own is unclean? Otherwise they would never be bound by the spells of an envious man. Nor would they either withhold out of fear the empty benefit they seemed about to grant, or refuse it out of a like envy. It is enough that you say the intellectual soul, that is, our mind, cannot be purified by theurgic purification. You assert that the spiritual soul, the part of our soul lower than the mind, can be purified by such an art. Yet you admit that this art cannot make it immortal and eternal. Christ, however, promises eternal life. That is why the world flocks to him, while you people fume, yet also marvel and stand amazed.

Quid prodest quia negare non potuisti errare homines theurgica disciplina et quam plurimos fallere per caecam insipientemque sententiam adque esse certissimum errorem agendo et supplicando ad principes angelosque

You could not deny that people go astray through the discipline of theurgy, and that very many are deceived by blind and foolish opinion. You admitted that it is a most certain error to run to princip-

53 Virgil, Eclogues 4.13–14 and 4.4. The poem, written in 40 BC, foretells a child who will bring a golden age, and Christians read it as a prophecy of Christ. The Sibyl of Cumae, near Naples, was a famous prophetess.

LATIN	ENGLISH
decurrere, et rursum, quasi ne operam perdidisse uidearis ista discendo, mittis homines ad theurgos, ut per eos anima spiritalis purgetur illorum, qui non secundum intellectualem animam uiuunt?	alities and angels with rites and supplications. What good is it, then, that you go on to send people back to the theurgists, as if not to seem to have wasted your effort in learning these things? You send them so that, through the theurgists, the spiritual soul of those who do not live according to the intellectual soul may be purified.

THE ARGUMENTS THAT BLINDED PORPHYRY SO THAT HE COULD NOT RECOGNIZE THE TRUE WISDOM, WHICH IS CHRIST

Porphyry admits theurgy is useless for the mind, yet despises Christ, the wisdom of God, for his cross.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.28 Mittis ergo homines in errorem certissimum, neque hoc tantum malum te pudet, cum uirtutis et sapientiae profitearis amatorem; quam si uere ac fideliter amasses, Christum Dei uirtutem et Dei sapientiam cognouisses nec ab eius saluberrima humilitate tumore inflatus uanae scientiae resiluisses. Confiteris tamen etiam spiritalem animam sine theurgicis artibus et sine teletis, quibus frustra discendis elaborasti, posse continentiae uirtute purgari. Aliquando etiam dicis, quod teletae non post mortem eleuant animam, ut iam nec eidem ipsi, quam spiritalem uocas, aliquid post huius uitae finem prodesse uideantur; et tamen uersas haec multis modis et repetis, ad nihil aliud, quantum existimo, nisi ut talium quoque rerum quasi peritus appareas et placeas inlicitarum artium curiosis, uel ad eas facias ipse curiosos.	So you send people into a most certain error. You are not ashamed of so great an evil, even though you profess to be a lover of virtue and wisdom. Had you loved them truly and faithfully, you would have recognized Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God. You would not have recoiled from his most wholesome humility, puffed up with the swelling of empty knowledge. Yet you admit that even the spiritual soul can be purified by the virtue of self-restraint, without theurgic arts and without the teletae [initiation rites] that you labored in vain to learn. At times you even say that the teletae do not lift the soul up after death. So they seem to be of no use after the end of this life, even to that very soul you call spiritual. And yet you turn these matters over in many ways and keep repeating them. As far as I can judge, your only purpose is to appear expert in such things as well, and to please those who are curious about illicit arts, or to make people curious about them yourself.
Sed bene, quod metuendam dicis hanc artem uel legum periculis uel ipsius actionis. Adque utinam hoc saltem abs te miseri audiant et inde, ne illic absorbeantur, abscedant aut eo penitus non accedant. Ignorantiam certe et propter eam multa uitia per nullas teletas purgari dicis, sed per solum πατρικὸν νοῦν, id est paternam mentem siue intellectum, qui paternae est conscius uoluntatis. Hunc autem Christum esse non credis; contemnis enim eum propter corpus ex femina acceptum et propter crucis obprobrium, excelsam uidelicet sapientiam spretis adque abiectis infimis idoneus de superioribus carpere. At ille inplet, quod prophetae sancti de illo ueraciter praedixerunt: Perdam sapientiam sapientium et prudentiam prudentium reprobabo. Non enim suam in	But it is good that you say this art is to be feared, both for the dangers of the law and for the dangers of the practice itself. If only the wretched would at least hear this from you! Then they might withdraw from it before they are swallowed up there, or never approach it at all. You certainly say that no teletae purge ignorance and the many vices it causes. Only the πατρικὸν νοῦν can do so, that is, the Father's mind or intellect, which is conscious of the Father's will. But you do not believe that this is Christ. You despise him because of the body he received from a woman and because of the shame of the cross. No doubt you think yourself fit to pluck lofty wisdom from on high, having spurned and cast away the lowliest things. But he

LATIN	ENGLISH
eis perdit et reprobat, quam ipse donauit, sed quam sibi adrogant, qui non habent ipsius.	fulfills what the holy prophets truly foretold of him: "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and the prudence of the prudent I will reject." He does not destroy and reject in them his own wisdom, which he himself gave. He destroys the wisdom that those who do not have his claim for themselves.[54]
Unde commemorato isto prophetico testimonio sequitur et dicit apostolus: Ubi sapiens? ubi scriba? ubi conquisitor huius saeculi? Nonne stultam fecit Deus sapientiam huius mundi? Nam quoniam in Dei sapientia non cognouit mundus per sapientiam Deum, placuit Deo per stultitiam praedicationis saluos facere credentes. Quoniam quidem Iudaei signa petunt et Graeci sapientiam quaerunt; nos autem, inquit, praedicamus Christum crucifixum, Iudaeis quidem scandalum, gentibus autem stultitiam, ipsis uero uocatis Iudaeis et Graecis Christum Dei uirtutem et Dei sapientiam; quoniam stultum Dei sapientius est hominibus, et infirmum Dei fortius est hominibus. Hoc quasi stultum et infirmum tamquam sua uirtute sapientes fortesque contemnunt. Sed haec est gratia, quae sanat infirmos, non superbe iactantes falsam beatitudinem suam, sed humiliter potius ueram miseriam confitentes.	So after citing this prophetic testimony the apostle goes on to say: "Where is the wise man? Where is the scribe? Where is the debater of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For since, in the wisdom of God, the world did not know God through wisdom, it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save those who believe. For Jews ask for signs and Greeks seek wisdom; but we," he says, "preach Christ crucified, a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to the Gentiles, but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God; for the foolishness of God is wiser than human beings, and the weakness of God is stronger than human beings." Those who are wise and strong, supposedly by their own power, despise this as foolish and weak. But this is the grace that heals the weak. It does not heal those who proudly boast of their false happiness, but rather those who humbly confess their true misery.[55]

THE INCARNATION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, WHICH THE IMPIETY OF THE PLATONISTS IS ASHAMED TO CONFESS

The Platonists glimpse the homeland but refuse the way, the humble incarnation of the Son of God.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.29 Praedicas Patrem et eius Filium, quem uocas paternum intellectum seu mentem, et horum medium, quem putamus te dicere Spiritum sanctum, et more uestro appellas tres deos. Ubi, etsi uerbis indisciplinatis utimini, uidetis tamen qualitercumque et quasi per quaedam tenuis imaginationis umbracula, quo nitendum sit; sed incarnationem incommutabilis Filii Dei, qua saluamur, ut ad illa, quae credimus uel ex quantulacumque parte intellegimus, uenire possimus, non uultis agnoscere. Itaque uidetis utcumque, etsi de longinquo, etsi acie caligante, patriam in qua manendum est, sed uiam qua eundum est non tenetis. Confiteris tamen gratiam, quando quidem ad Deum per uirtutem intellegentiae peruenire paucis dicis esse concessum. Non enim dicis:	You proclaim the Father and his Son, whom you call the Father's intellect or mind. You also proclaim a middle term between them, by whom we suppose you mean the Holy Spirit. In your fashion you call them three gods. Here, although you people use undisciplined language, you still see in some fashion where one must strive to go, as through certain shadowy outlines of a faint imagination. But you refuse to acknowledge the incarnation of the unchangeable Son of God. By it we are saved, so that we can come to the things we believe or understand, in however small a part. So you see, after a fashion, the homeland in which we 54 Isaiah 29:14, quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 1:19.

55 1 Corinthians 1:20–25.

LATIN

Paucis placuit, uel: Pauci uoluerunt; sed cum dicis esse concessum, procul dubio Dei gratiam, non hominis sufficientiam confiteris.

Uteris etiam hoc uerbo apertius, ubi Platonis sententiam sequens nec ipse dubitas in hac uita hominem nullo modo ad perfectionem sapientiae peruenire, secundum intellectum tamen uiuentibus omne quod deest prouidentia Dei et gratia post hanc uitam posse conpleri, o si cognouisses Dei gratiam per Iesum Christum dominum nostrum ipsamque eius incarnationem, qua hominis animam corpusque suscepit, summum esse exemplum gratiae uidere potuisses. Sed quid faciam? Scio me frustra loqui mortuo, sed quantum ad te adtinet: quantum autem ad eos, qui te magnipendunt et te uel qualicumque amore sapientiae uel curiositate artium, quas non debuisti discere, diligunt, quos potius in tua conpellatione adloquor, fortasse non frustra.

Gratia Dei non potuit gratius commendari, quam ut ipse unicus Dei Filius in se incommutabiliter manens indueretur hominem et spem dilectionis suae daret hominibus homine medio, qua ad illum ab hominibus ueniretur, qui tam longe erat inmortalis a mortalibus, incommutabilis a commutabilibus, iustus ab inpiis, beatus a miseris. Et quia naturaliter indidit nobis, ut beati inmortalesque esse cupiamus, manens beatus suscipiensque mortalem, ut nobis tribueret quod amamus, perpetiendo docuit contemnere quod timemus.

Sed huic ueritati ut possetis adquiescere, humilitate opus erat, quae ceruici uestrae difficillime persuaderi potest. Quid enim incredibile dicitur, praesertim uobis qui talia sapitis, quibus ad hoc credendum uos ipsos admonere debeatis; quid, inquam, uobis incredibile dicitur, cum dicitur Deus adsumsisse humanam animam et corpus? Vos certe tantum tribuitis animae intellectuali, quae anima utique humana est, ut eam consubstantialem must abide, though from afar and with clouded sight, but you do not hold to the way by which we must go. Yet you acknowledge grace, since you say that it has been granted to few to reach God by the virtue of the intellect. You do not say "It pleased few" or "Few wished." When you say "it has been granted," you are surely acknowledging the grace of God, not human sufficiency.

ENGLISH

You use this word even more openly where you follow Plato's view. You yourself do not doubt that in this life a human being can in no way attain the perfection of wisdom. Yet you hold that for those who live according to the intellect, whatever is lacking can be completed after this life by the providence and grace of God. Oh, if you had known the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, you could have seen that his very incarnation, in which he took on a human soul and body, is the supreme example of grace! But what am I to do? I know that I speak in vain to a dead man, as far as you are concerned. But some think highly of you and love you, whether from some kind of love of wisdom or from curiosity about the arts that you ought not to have learned. It is really they whom I address in addressing you, and as far as they are concerned, perhaps I do not speak in vain.

The grace of God could not have been commended more graciously than by this. The only Son of God himself, remaining unchangeably in himself, clothed himself with humanity. Through a human mediator he gave human beings the hope of his love, by which they might come to him. He was so far off from them: the immortal from mortals, the unchangeable from the changeable, the just from the ungodly, the happy from the wretched. He has implanted in us by nature the desire to be happy and immortal. And so, remaining happy while taking on what is mortal, he gave us what we love, and by suffering he taught us to despise what we fear.

But for you to accept this truth, humility was needed, and that is extremely hard to press upon your stiff necks. For what incredible thing is being said, especially to you? Your own views ought to remind you to believe this. What incredible thing, I say, is being said to you when it is said that God took on a human soul and body? You certainly at-paternae illi menti, quem Dei Filium confitemini, fieri posse dicatis. Quid ergo incredibile est, si aliqua una intellectualis anima modo quodam ineffabili et singulari pro multorum salute suscepta est? Corpus uero animae cohaerere, ut homo totus et plenus sit, natura ipsa nostra teste cognoscimus.

LATIN

Quod nisi usitatissimum esset, hoc profecto esset incredibilius; facilius quippe in fidem recipiendum est, etsi humanum diuino, etsi mutabilem incommutabili, tamen spiritum spiritui, aut ut uerbis utar quae in usu habetis, incorporeum incorporeo, quam corpus incorporeo cohaerere. An forte uos offendit inusitatus corporis partus ex uirgine? Neque hoc debet offendere, immo potius ad pietatem suscipiendam debet adducere, quod mirabilis mirabiliter natus est. An uero quod ipsum corpus morte depositum et in melius resurrectione mutatum iam incorruptibile neque mortale in superna subuexit, hoc fortasse credere recusatis intuentes Porphyrium in his ipsis libris, ex quibus multa posui, quos de regressu animae scripsit, tam crebro praecipere omne corpus esse fugiendum, ut anima possit beata permanere cum Deo?

Sed ipse potius ista sentiens corrigendus fuit, praesertim cum de anima mundi huius uisibilis et tam ingentis corporeae molis cum illo tam incredibilia sapiatis. Platone quippe auctore animal esse dicitis mundum et animal beatissimum, quod uultis esse etiam sempiternum. Quo modo ergo nec umquam soluetur a corpore, nec umquam carebit beatitudine, si, ut beata sit anima, corpus sit omne fugiendum? Solem quoque istum et cetera sidera non solum in libris uestris corpora esse fatemini, quod uobiscum omnes homines et conspicere non cunctantur et dicere; uerum etiam altiore, ut putatis, peritia haec esse animalia beatissima perhibetis et cum his corporibus sempiterna. Quid ergo est, quod, cum uobis fides Christiana suadetur, tunc obliuiscimini, aut ignorare uos fingitis, quid disputare aut docere soleatis?

ENGLISH

tribute so much to the intellectual soul, which is surely a human soul, that you say it can become consubstantial with that paternal mind which you acknowledge to be the Son of God. What then is incredible if one particular intellectual soul was taken up, in an ineffable and unique way, for the salvation of many? And our own nature bears witness that a body is joined to a soul, so that a human being is whole and complete.

If this were not so very ordinary, it would surely be the more incredible thing. It is easier to accept in faith that spirit should be joined to spirit than that a body should be joined to the incorporeal. That holds even when the one spirit is human and the other divine, the one changeable and the other unchangeable. In the terms you are accustomed to use, the incorporeal is joined to the incorporeal. Or perhaps you are offended by the unusual birth of a body from a virgin? This ought not to offend you either. Rather, the fact that the wonderful one was wonderfully born ought to lead you to embrace piety. Or perhaps you refuse to believe that he laid aside that very body in death, changed it for the better by resurrection, and carried it, now incorruptible and no longer mortal, up to the heavens? Perhaps you look to Porphyry. In the very books On the Return of the Soul, from which I have quoted much, he teaches so often that every body must be fled if the soul is to remain happy with God.[56]

But it was rather Porphyry himself who needed correcting for holding such views. This is especially so since you, along with him, believe such incredible things about the soul of this visible world and its enormous bodily mass. On Plato's authority you say that the world is a living being, and a most happy living being, which you also want to be everlasting. How then will it never be released from its body and never lack happiness, if every body must be fled for a soul to be happy? You also acknowledge in your books that the sun and the other stars are bodies, and all people readily see and say this along with you. But you go further. By what you consider a higher expertise, you declare that they are most happy living beings, everlasting together with these bodies. Why is it, then, that when the Christian faith is urged upon 56 Porphyry's On the Return of the Soul survives only in fragments, many of them preserved in this book of Augustine.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	you, you forget or pretend not to know what you usually argue or teach?
Quid causae est, quur propter opiniones uestras, quas uos ipsi obpugnatis, Christiani esse nolitis, nisi quia Christus humiliter uenit et uos superbi estis? Qualia sanctorum corpora in resurrectione futura sint, potest aliquanto scrupulosius inter Christianarum scripturarum doctissimos disputari; futura tamen sempiterna minime dubitamus, et talia futura, quale sua resurrectione Christus demonstrauit exemplum. Sed qualiacumque sint, cum incorruptibilia prorsus et inmortalia nihiloque animae contemplationem, qua in Deo figitur, inpedientia praedicentur uosque etiam dicatis esse in caelestibus inmortalia corpora inmortaliter beatorum: quid est quod, ut beati simus, omne corpus fugiendum esse opinamini, ut fidem Christianam quasi rationabiliter fugere uideamini, nisi quia illud est, quod iterum dico: Christus est humilis, uos superbi? An forte corrigi pudet? Et hoc uitium non nisi, superborum est.	Because of opinions that you yourselves contradict, you refuse to be Christians. What reason is there for this, except that Christ came in humility and you are proud? What the bodies of the saints will be like in the resurrection can be debated somewhat more minutely among those most learned in the Christian Scriptures. But we have no doubt at all that they will be everlasting, and that they will be like the example Christ showed in his own resurrection. Whatever they may be like, they are proclaimed to be wholly incorruptible and immortal, and in no way to hinder the soul's contemplation, by which it is fixed on God. You yourselves also say that in the heavens there are immortal bodies belonging to beings who are immortally happy. Why then do you hold that every body must be fled for us to be happy, so that you may seem to flee the Christian faith on rational grounds? Is it not for the reason I give once again: Christ is humble, and you are proud? Or perhaps you are ashamed to be corrected? This too is a vice found only in the proud.
Pudet uidelicet doctos homines ex discipulis Platonis fieri discipulos Christi, qui piscatorem suo spiritu docuit sapere ac dicere: In principio erat Verbum, et Verbum erat aput Deum, et Deus erat Verbum. Hoc erat in principio aput Deum. Omnia per ipsum facta sunt, et sine ipso factum est nihil, quod factum est. In ipso uita erat, et uita erat lux hominum, et lux in tenebris lucet, et tenebrae eam non conprehenderunt. Quod initium sancti euangelii, cui nomen est secundum Iohannem, quidam Platonicus, sicut a sancto sene Simpliciano, qui postea Mediolanensi ecclesiae praesedit episcopus, solebamus audire, aureis litteris conscribendum et per omnes ecclesias in locis eminentissimis proponendum esse dicebat.	Of course, learned men are ashamed to pass from being disciples of Plato to being disciples of Christ. Yet by his Spirit Christ taught a fisherman to understand and to say: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of human beings; and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it." This is the beginning of the holy Gospel entitled "According to John." A certain Platonist used to say that it ought to be written in letters of gold and set up in the most prominent places in all the churches. We often heard this from the holy old man Simplicianus, who later presided over the church of Milan as bishop.[57]
Sed ideo uiluit superbis Deus ille magister, quia Verbum caro factum est et habitauit in nobis; ut parum sit miseris quod aegrotant, nisi se etiam in ipsa aegritudine extollant et de medicina, qua sanari poterant,	But that God, the teacher, became contemptible to the proud precisely because "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us." So it is not enough for these wretched people that they are sick. They 57 John 1:1–5. Simplicianus guided Augustine before his conversion (Confessions 8) and succeeded Ambrose as bishop of Milan in AD 397.

LATIN	ENGLISH
erubescant. Non enim hoc faciunt ut erigantur, sed ut cadendo grauius adfligantur.	must also exalt themselves in their very sickness and be ashamed of the medicine by which they could have been healed. They do not do this to be raised up, but only to be struck down more heavily by their fall.[58]

HOW MANY OF PLATO'S DOCTRINES PORPHYRY REFUTED AND CORRECTED BY DISAGREEING

Porphyry corrected Plato on souls returning as beasts and on endless cycles of return.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.30 Si post Platonem aliquid emendare existimatur indignum, quur ipse Porphyrius nonnulla et non parua emendauit? Nam Platonem animas hominum post mortem reuolui usque ad corpora bestiarum scripsisse certissimum est. Hanc sententiam Porphyrii doctor tenuit et Plotinus; Porphyrio tamen iure displicuit. In hominum sane non sua quae dimiserant, sed alia noua corpora redire humanas animas arbitratus est. Puduit scilicet illud credere, ne mater fortasse filium in mulam reuoluta uectaret; et non puduit hoc credere, ubi reuoluta mater in puellam filio forsitan nuberet.	If it is thought improper to correct anything after Plato, why did Porphyry himself correct several points, and no small ones? It is quite certain that Plato wrote that human souls return after death even into the bodies of beasts. Plotinus, Porphyry's teacher, also held this view, but Porphyry rightly rejected it. He did believe that human souls return into human bodies, though not the ones they had left behind but other, new bodies. Evidently he was ashamed to believe the first view, in case a mother, returned as a mule, might carry her own son on her back. Yet he was not ashamed to believe the second, in which a mother, returned as a girl, might perhaps marry her son.
Quanto creditur honestius, quod sancti et ueraces angeli docuerunt, quod prophetae Dei spiritu acti locuti sunt, quod ipse quem uenturum Saluatorem praemissi nuntii praedixerunt, quod missi apostoli qui orbem terrarum euangelio repleuerunt, — quanto, inquam, honestius creditur reuerti animas semel ad corpora propria quam reuerti totiens ad diuersa! Verum tamen, ut dixi, ex magna parte correctus est in hac opinione Porphyrius, ut saltem in solos homines humanas animas praecipitari posse sentiret, beluinos autem carceres euertere minime dubitaret. Dicit etiam ad hoc Deum animam mundo dedisse, ut materiae cognoscens mala ad Patrem recurreret nec aliquando iam talium polluta contagione teneretur.	How much more honorable it is to believe what the holy and truthful angels have taught, what the prophets moved by the Spirit of God have spoken, and what he himself taught, the Savior whose coming was foretold by messengers sent ahead of him. It is also what the apostles he sent taught, who filled the whole world with the gospel. How much more honorable, I say, to believe that souls return once to their own bodies than that they return so many times to different ones! Nevertheless, as I said, Porphyry was corrected on this opinion to a great extent. He held at least that human souls can be cast down only into human beings, and he had no hesitation in tearing down those prisons in the bodies of beasts. He also says that God gave the soul to the world so that, recognizing the evils of matter, it might hasten back to the Father and never again be held fast by the polluting contact of such things.
Ubi etsi aliquid inconuenienter sapit (magis enim data est corpori, ut bona faceret; non enim mala disceret, si non faceret), in eo tamen aliorum Platonicorum opinionem et non in re parua emendauit, quod mundatam ab omnibus	Here his thinking is somewhat off the mark: the soul was given to the body rather so that it might do good, since it would not learn evil if it did not do evil. Yet on this point he corrected the opinion

58 John 1:14.

LATIN

malis animam et cum Patre constitutam numquam iam mala mundi huius passuram esse confessus est. Qua sententia profecto abstulit, quod esse Platonicum maxime perhibetur, ut mortuos ex uiuis, ita uiuos ex mertuis semper fieri; falsumque esse ostendit, quod Platonice uidetur dixisse Vergilius, in campos Elysios purgatas animas missas (quo nomine tamquam per fabulam uidentur significari gaudia beatorum) ad fluuium Letheum euocari, hoc est ad obliuionem praeteritorum: Scilicet inmemores supera ut conuexa reuisant / Rursus et incipiant in corpora uelle reuerti.

Merito displicuit hoc Porphyrio, quoniam re uera credere stultum est ex illa uita, quae beatissima esse non poterit nisi de sua fuerit aeternitate certissima, desiderare animas corruptibilium corporum labem et inde ad ista remeare, tamquam hoc agat summa purgatio, ut inquinatio requiratur. Si enim quod perfecte mundantur hoc efficit, ut omnium obliuiscantur malorum, malorum autem obliuio facit corporum desiderium, ubi rursus inplicentur malis: profecto erit infelicitatis causa summa felicitas et stultitiae causa perfectio sapientiae et inmunditiae causa summa mundatio. Nec ueritate ibi beata erit anima, quamdiucumque erit, ubi oportet fallatur, ut beata sit. Non enim beata erit nisi secura; ut autem secura sit, falso putabit semper se beatam fore, quoniam aliquando erit et misera. Cui ergo gaudendi causa falsitas erit, quo modo de ueritate gaudebit?

Vidit hoc Porphyrius purgatamque animam ob hoc reuerti dixit ad Patrem, ne aliquando iam malorum polluta contagione teneatur. Falso igitur a quibusdam est Platonicis creditus quasi necessarius orbis ille ab eisdem abeundi et ad eadem reuertendi. Quod etiamsi uerum esset, quid hoc scire prodesset, nisi forte inde se nobis auderent praeferre Platonici, quia id nos in hac uita iam nesciremus, quod ipsi in alia meliore uita purgatissimi et sapientissimi fuerant nesciturі et falsum credendo beati of the other Platonists, and in no small matter. He acknowledged that a soul cleansed of all evils and established with the Father will never again suffer the evils of this world. By this view he certainly did away with what is said to be most characteristically Platonic: that just as the dead come from the living, so the living always come from the dead. He also showed to be false what Virgil seems to have said in Platonic fashion. According to Virgil, the purified souls sent into the Elysian Fields are summoned to the river Lethe, that is, to forgetfulness of the past. The Elysian Fields are a name by which, as in a fable, the joys of the blessed seem to be signified. The souls are summoned "so that, forgetting, they may see again the vault above and begin once more to wish to return into bodies."[59]

ENGLISH

Porphyry rightly rejected this. It is truly foolish to believe that souls in that life should long for the taint of corruptible bodies and return from there to the things of this world. That life could not be supremely happy unless it were utterly certain of its own eternity. It would be as if the highest purification had the effect of making defilement sought again. For suppose being perfectly cleansed makes them forget all evils, and forgetting evils produces a longing for bodies, in which they are entangled in evils once again. Then supreme happiness will be the cause of unhappiness, the perfection of wisdom the cause of folly, and the highest cleansing the cause of uncleanness. Nor will the soul be truly happy there, however long it stays, if it must be deceived in order to be happy. For it will not be happy unless it is secure. But to be secure, it will have to think falsely that it will always be happy, since at some point it will also be miserable. If falsehood, then, is to be its reason for rejoicing, how will it rejoice in the truth?

Porphyry saw this. He said that the purified soul returns to the Father so that it may never again be held fast by the polluting contact of evils. Some Platonists, then, were wrong to believe that this cycle of departing from the same things and returning to the same things is somehow necessary. Even if it were true, what good would it do to know it? Perhaps the Platonists would dare to rank themselves above us on that account. We, in this 59 Virgil, Aeneid 6.750–751, from Anchises' account of the souls in the underworld.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	futuri? Quod si absurdissimum et stultissimum est dicere, Porphyrii profecto est praeferenda sententia his, qui animarum circulo alternantem semper beatitudinem et miseriam suspicati sunt.	life, would already be ignorant of this cycle. They themselves, utterly purified and utterly wise, would be ignorant of it in another and better life, and would be happy by believing what is false. If it is utterly absurd and foolish to say this, then Porphyry's view is certainly to be preferred. It must win over those who have imagined a cycle of souls in which happiness and misery forever alternate.
	Quod si ita est, ecce Platonicus in melius a Platone dissentit; ecce uidit, quod ille non uidit, nec post talem ac tantum magistrum refugit correctionem, sed homini praeposuit ueritatem.	If this is so, here is a Platonist disagreeing with Plato for the better. Here is one who saw what Plato did not see. After so great and eminent a teacher, he did not shrink from correction, but put the truth before the man.

AGAINST THE ARGUMENT OF THE PLATONISTS BY WHICH THEY CLAIM THE HUMAN SOUL IS COETERNAL WITH GOD

Against the Platonists, the soul is not coeternal with God; a happiness can begin in time and never end.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
10.31	Quur ergo non potius diuinitati credimus de his rebus, quas humano ingenio peruestigare non possumus, quae animam quoque ipsam non Deo coaeternam, sed creatam dicit esse, quae non erat? Ut enim hoc Platonici nollent credere, hanc utique causam idoneam sibi uidebantur adferre, quia, nisi quod semper antea fuisset, sempiternum deinceps esse non posset; quamquam et de mundo et de his, quos in mundo deos a Deo factos scribit Plato, apertissime dicat eos esse coepisse et habere initium, finem tamen non habituros, sed per conditoris potentissimam uoluntatem in aeternum mansuros esse perhibeat. Verum id quo modo intellegant inuenerunt, non esse hoc uidelicet temporis, sed substitutionis initium.	Why then do we not rather believe the divine word on matters that we cannot investigate with human intelligence? That word says that the soul itself, too, is not coeternal with God but was created, when before it did not exist. The Platonists refused to believe this, and they thought they were offering a sufficient reason. Their reason was that nothing could be everlasting from now on unless it had always existed before. And yet Plato speaks of the world, and of the beings in it that he writes were made gods by God. He says quite plainly that they began to be and have a beginning, but that they will have no end. He maintains that they will remain forever through the most powerful will of their maker. But the Platonists have found a way to interpret this: namely, that this is a beginning not in time but of dependence on a cause.[60]
	Sicut enim, inquiunt, si pes ex aeternitate semper fuisset in puluere, semper ei subesset uestigium, quod tamen uestigium a calcante factum nemo dubitaret, nec alterum altero prius esset, quamuis alterum ab altero factum esset: sic, inquiunt, et mundus adque in illo di creati et semper fuerunt semper existente qui fecit, et tamen facti sunt. Numquid ergo, si anima semper fuit, etiam miseria eius semper fuisse dicenda est? Porro si aliquid in illa, quod ex aeterno non fuit, esse coepit ex tempore, quur non fieri potuerit, ut ipsa esset ex tempore quae antea	For, they say, suppose a foot had been in the dust from eternity. There would always be a footprint beneath it. Yet no one would doubt that the footprint was made by the one treading, nor would one be prior to the other, although one was made by the other. In the same way, they say, the world and the gods created in it have always existed, since their maker has always existed, and yet they were made. Must we then say that, if the soul has always existed, its misery too has always existed?

60 Plato, Timaeus 41a–b, where the maker tells the created gods that they are not immortal by nature but will never be dissolved, because of his will.

LATIN	ENGLISH
non fuisset? Deinde beatitudo quoque eius post experimentum malorum firmior et sine fine mansura, sicut iste confitetur, procul dubio coepit ex tempore, et tamen semper erit, cum antea non fuerit.	Further, something in the soul that did not exist from eternity began to exist in time. If so, why could it not be that the soul itself came to be in time, though it had not existed before? Then too, there is its happiness after the experience of evils, which is firmer and destined to last without end, as this man acknowledges. That happiness undoubtedly began in time, and yet it will always exist, though it did not exist before.
Illa igitur omnis argumentatio dissoluta est, qua putatur nihil esse posse sine fine temporis, nisi quod initium non habet temporis. Inuenta est enim animae beatitudo, quae cum initium temporis habuerit, finem temporis non habebit. Quapropter diuinae auctoritati humana, cedat infirmitas, eisque beatis et inmortalibus de uera religione credamus, qui sibi honorem non expetunt, quem Deo suo, qui etiam noster est, deberi sciunt, nec iubent, ut sacrificium faciamus, nisi ei tantum, cuius et nos cum illis, ut saepe dixi et saepe dicendum est, sacrificium esse debemus, per eum sacerdotem offerendi, qui in homine, quem suscepit, secundum quem et sacerdos esse uoluit, etiam usque ad mortem sacrificium pro nobis dignatus est fieri.	So that whole line of argument collapses. It held that nothing can be without an end in time except what has no beginning in time. For a happiness of the soul has been found which had a beginning in time but will have no end in time. Therefore let human weakness give way to divine authority. Concerning the true religion, let us believe those happy and immortal beings who do not seek for themselves the honor that they know is owed to their God, who is ours as well. They do not command us to offer sacrifice except to him alone. As I have often said and must often say, we, together with them, ought to be his sacrifice. We are offered through that priest who willed to be a priest in the humanity he took on. In that humanity he also deigned to become a sacrifice for us, even to the point of death.

THE UNIVERSAL WAY OF THE SOUL'S DELIVERANCE, WHICH PORPHYRY DID NOT FIND BECAUSE HE SOUGHT IT WRONGLY, AND WHICH THE GRACE OF CHRIST ALONE HAS OPENED

Porphyry admitted there must be a universal way of freeing the soul; it is the Christian religion.

LATIN	ENGLISH
10.32 Haec est religio, quae uniuersalem continet uiam animae liberandae, quoniam nulla nisi hac liberari potest. Haec est enim quodam modo regalis uia, quae una ducit ad regnum, non temporali fastigio nutabundum, sed aeternitatis firmitate securum. Cum autem dicit Porphyrius in primo iuxta finem de regressu animae libro nondum receptum in unam quandam sectam, quae uniuersalem contineat uiam animae liberandae, uel a philosophia uerissima aliqua uel ab Indorum moribus ac disciplina, aut inductione Chaldaeorum aut alia qualibet uia, nondumque in suam notitiam eandem uiam historiali cognitione perlatam: procul dubio confitetur esse aliquam, sed nondum in suam uenisse notitiam. Ita ei non sufficiebat quidquid de anima liberanda studiosissime didicerat sibique uel potius aliis nosse ac tenere uidebatur.	This is the religion that contains the universal way for the liberation of the soul, since by no other way can the soul be liberated. In a sense, this is the royal road, which alone leads to the kingdom. That kingdom does not totter on a temporal height but is secure in the firmness of eternity. Near the end of the first book of his On the Return of the Soul, Porphyry says that no single school has yet been received that contains the universal way for the liberation of the soul. He means no school from some most true philosophy, from the customs and discipline of the Indians, from the initiation of the Chaldeans, or by any other way. He adds that this way has not yet been brought to his knowledge through historical knowledge. When he says this, he undoubtedly acknowledges that such a way exists, but that it has not yet come to his knowledge.

LATIN

ENGLISH

So whatever he had most zealously learned about the liberation of the soul was not enough for him. He seemed to himself, or rather to others, to know and hold it, but it did not satisfy him.

Sentiebat enim adhuc sibi deesse aliquam praestantissimam auctoritatem, quam de re tanta sequi oporteret. Cum autem dicit uel a philosophia uerissima aliqua nondum in suam notitiam peruenisse sectam, quae uniuersalem contineat uiam animae liberandae: satis, quantum arbitror, ostendit uel eam philosophiam, in qua ipse philosophatus est, non esse uerissimam, uel ea non contineri talem uiam. Et quo modo iam potest esse uerissima, qua non continetur haec uia? Nam quae alia uia est uniuersalis animae liberandae, nisi qua uniuersae animae liberantur ac per hoc sine illa nulla anima liberatur?

For he felt that he still lacked some supremely excellent authority that ought to be followed on so great a matter. He says that no school containing the universal way for the liberation of the soul has yet come to his knowledge, even from some most true philosophy. In my judgment, this shows clearly enough one of two things. Either the philosophy in which he himself practiced philosophy is not the truest, or such a way is not contained in it. And how can it be the truest if this way is not contained in it? For what other way is universal for the liberation of the soul than the one by which all souls are liberated? Without that way, therefore, no soul is liberated.

Cum autem addit et dicit: uel ab Indorum moribus ac disciplina, uel ab inductione Chaldaeorum uel alia qualibet uia, manifestissima uoce testatur neque illis quae ab Indis neque illis quae a Chaldaeis didicerat hanc uniuersalem uiam liberandae animae contineri; et utique se a Chaldaeis oracula diuina sumsisse, quorum adsiduam commemorationem facit, tacere non potuit. Quam uult ergo intellegi animae liberandae uniuersalem uiam nondum receptam uel ex aliqua uerissima philosophia uel ex earum gentium doctrinis, quae magnae uelut in diuinis rebus habebantur, quia plus aput eas curiositas ualuit quorumque angelorum cognoscendorum et colendorum, nondumque in suam notitiam historiali cognitione perlatam? Quaenam ista est uniuersalis uia, nisi quae non suae cuique genti propria, sed uniuersis gentibus quae communis esset diuinitus inpertita est?

Then he adds: “or from the customs and discipline of the Indians, or from the initiation of the Chaldeans, or by any other way.” With this he testifies in the plainest words that this universal way of liberating the soul is not contained in what he had learned from the Indians. Nor is it contained in what he had learned from the Chaldeans. And he certainly could not keep silent about having taken from the Chaldeans the divine oracles which he mentions constantly. What, then, does he want us to understand by this universal way of liberating the soul? He says it has not yet been received from some most true philosophy, nor from the teachings of those nations which were reckoned great, as it were, in divine matters. They were so reckoned because curiosity had greater power among them to learn about and worship angels of every kind. He also says it has not yet been brought to his knowledge by historical knowledge. What is this universal way, if not one that is not the private possession of each nation? It must be one that has been imparted by God to be common to all nations.

Quam certe iste homo non mediocri ingenio praeditus esse non dubitat. Prouidentiam quippe diuinam sine ista uniuersali uia liberandae animae genus humanum relinquere potuisse non credit. Neque enim ait non esse, sed hoc tantum bonum tantumque adiutorium nondum receptum, nondum in suam notitiam esse perlatum; nec mirum. Tunc enim Porphyrius erat in rebus humanis, quando ista liberandae animae uniuersalis uia, quae non

And this man, endowed with no mean intellect, has no doubt that such a way exists. For he does not believe that divine providence could have left the human race without this universal way of liberating the soul. He does not say that it does not exist. He says only that this great good and this great help has not yet been received and has not yet been brought to his knowledge. That is no est alia quam religio Christiana, obpugnari permittebatur ab idolorum daemohumque cultoribus regibusque terrenis, propter adserendum et consecrandum martyrum numerum, hoc est testium ueritatis, per quos ostenderetur omnia corporalia mala pro fide pietatis et commendatione ueritatis esse toleranda.

LATIN

Videbat ergo ista Porphyrius et per huius modi persecutiones cito istam uiam perituram et propterea non esse ipsam liberandae animae uniuersalem putabat, non intellegens hoc, quod eum mouebat et quod in eius electione perpeti metuebat, ad eius confirmationem robustioremque commendationem potius pertinere.

Haec est igitur animae liberandae uniuersalis uia, id est uniuersis gentibus diuina miseratione concessa, cuius profecto notitia ad quoscumque iam uenit et ad quoscumque uentura est, nec debuit nec debebit ei dici: Quare modo? et: Quare sero? quoniam mittentis consilium non est humano ingenio penetrabile. Quod sensit etiam iste, cum dixit, nondum receptum hoc donum Dei et nondum in suam notitiam fuisse perlatum. Neque enim propterea uerum non esse iudicauit, quia nondum in fidem suam receptum fuerat uel in notitiam nondum peruenerat. Haec est, inquam, liberandorum credentium uniuersalis uia, de qua fidelis Abraham diuinum accepit oraculum: In semine tuo benedicentur omnes gentes.

Qui fuit quidem gente Chaldaeus, sed ut talia promissa perciperet et ex illo propagaretur semen dispositum per angelos in manu Mediatoris, in quo esset ista liberandae animae uniuersalis uia, hoc est omnibus gentibus data, iussus est discedere de terra sua et de cognatione sua et de domo patris sui. Tunc ipse primitus a Chaldaeorum superstitionibus liberatus unum uerum Deum sequendo coluit, cui haec promittenti fideliter credidit. Haec est uniuersalis uia, de qua in sancta prophetia dictum est: Deus misereatur nostri et benedicat nos; inluminet uultum suum super nos et misereatur nostri, ut cognoscamus in terra uiam tuam, in omnibus gentibus salutare tuum. Unde tanto post ex Abrahae semine carne wonder. Porphyry lived at the time when this universal way of liberating the soul, which is none other than the Christian religion, was permitted to be attacked. The worshipers of idols and demons and the earthly kings attacked it. This was allowed so that the number of the martyrs, that is, the witnesses to the truth, might be established and consecrated. Through them it would be shown that all bodily evils must be endured for the faith of true godliness and for commending the truth.

ENGLISH

Porphyry saw these things and thought that persecutions of this kind would soon destroy this way. He concluded that it was therefore not the universal way of liberating the soul. He did not understand that the very thing that troubled him actually served to confirm it and to commend it more strongly. He feared to suffer that persecution if he chose this way, but it worked in the way's favor.

This, then, is the universal way of liberating the soul, that is, the way granted to all nations by divine mercy. Knowledge of it has already come to some and will come to others. No one should ever have asked of it, nor should anyone ask, "Why now?" or "Why so late?" The plan of the one who sends it cannot be penetrated by human intelligence. Porphyry himself sensed as much when he said that this gift of God had not yet been received and had not yet been brought to his knowledge. He did not judge it untrue just because it had not yet been received into his belief or had not yet come to his knowledge. This, I say, is the universal way for the liberation of believers. Faithful Abraham received the divine oracle about it: "In your seed all nations shall be blessed."[61]

Abraham was indeed a Chaldean by race. But he was commanded to leave his land, his kindred and his father's house, so that he might receive such promises. Through him would be propagated the seed "ordained through angels by the hand of a mediator," in whom this universal way of liberating the soul would be found, that is, the way given to all nations. Then, first set free from the superstitions of the Chaldeans, he followed and worshiped the one true God, and he believed him faithfully when God made these promises. This is the universal way of which holy prophecy says:

61 Genesis 22:18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
suscepta de ipso ait ipse Saluator: Ego sum uia, ueritas et uita.	"May God have mercy on us and bless us. May he make his face shine upon us and have mercy on us, that we may know your way on earth, your salvation among all nations." Hence, so long afterward, the Savior took flesh from the seed of Abraham. He himself says of himself: "I am the way, the truth and the life."[62]
Haec est uniuersalis uia, de qua tanto ante praedictum est: Erit in nouissimis diebus manifestatus mons domus Domini, paratus super cacumina montium et extolletur super colles, et uenient ad eum uniuersae gentes et ingredientur nationes multae et dicent: Venite, ascendamus in montem Domini et in domum Dei Iacob; et adnuntiabit nobis uiam suam, et ingrediemur in eam. Ex Sion enim prodiet lex et uerbum Domini ab Hierusalem. Via ergo ista non est unius gentis, sed uniuersarum gentium; et lex uerbumque Domini non in Sion et Hierusalem remansit, sed inde processit, ut se per uniuersa diffunderet. Unde ipse Mediator post resurrectionem suam discipulis trepidantibus ait: Oportebat inpleri quae scripta sunt in lege et prophetis et psalmis de me.	This is the universal way of which it was foretold so long before: "In the last days the mountain of the house of the Lord will be made manifest, established on the tops of the mountains, and it will be raised above the hills. All nations will come to it, and many peoples will enter and say: 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and to the house of the God of Jacob. He will announce his way to us, and we will walk in it.' For out of Zion will go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." This way, then, does not belong to one nation but to all nations. The law and the word of the Lord did not remain in Zion and Jerusalem but went out from there to spread throughout the whole world. That is why the mediator himself, after his resurrection, said to his frightened disciples: "Everything written about me in the law and the prophets and the psalms had to be fulfilled."[63]
Tunc aperuit illis sensum, ut intellegerent scripturas, et dixit eis, quia oportebat Christum pati et resurgere a mortuis tertio die et praedicari in nomine eius paenitentiam et remissionem peccatorum per omnes gentes incipientibus ab Hierusalem. Haec est igitur uniuersalis animae liberandae uia, quam sancti angeli sanctique prophetae prius in paucis hominibus ubi potuerunt Dei gratiam reperientibus et maxime in Hebraea gente, cuius erat ipsa quodam modo sacrata res publica in prophetationem et praenuntiationem ciuitatis Dei ex omnibus gentibus congregandae, et tabernaculo et templo et sacerdotio et sacrificiis significauerunt et eloquiis quibusdam manifestis, plerisque mysticis praedixerunt: praesens autem in carne ipse Mediator et beati eius apostoli iam testamenti noui gratiam reuelantes apertius indicarunt, quae aliquanto occultius superioribus sunt significata temporibus, pro aetatum generis humani distributione, sicut eam Deo sapienti placuit ordinare, mirabilium operum diuinorum, quorum superius pauca iam posui, contestantibus signis.	Then he opened their minds to understand the scriptures. He told them that Christ had to suffer and rise from the dead on the third day. He also told them that repentance and the forgiveness of sins had to be preached in his name among all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. This, then, is the universal way of liberating the soul. The holy angels and the holy prophets first signified it among the few people who found the grace of God where they could. Above all, they did so in the Hebrew nation, whose commonwealth was in a sense consecrated to prophesying and foretelling the city of God, which was to be gathered from all nations. They signified this way by the tabernacle, the temple, the priesthood and the sacrifices. They also foretold it in certain utterances, some plain and most of them mystical. Then the mediator himself, present in the flesh, and his blessed apostles revealed the grace of the new covenant. They made known more openly what had been 62 Galatians 3:19; Genesis 12:1; Psalm 66:2–3 (67:1–2 in most English Bibles); John 14:6.

63 Isaiah 2:2–3; Luke 24:44.

LATIN

ENGLISH

signified somewhat more obscurely in earlier times. This followed the division of the ages of the human race, as it pleased the wise God to order it. And signs of wonderful divine works bore witness to it; I have already set out a few of them above.[64]

Non enim apparuerunt tantummodo uisiones angelicae et caelestium ministrorum sola uerba sonuerunt, uerum etiam hominibus Dei uerbo simplicis pietatis agentibus spiritus inmundi de hominum corporibus ac sensibus pulsi sunt, uitia corporis languoresque sanati, fera animalia terrarum et aquarum, uolatilia caeli, ligna, elementa, sidera diuina iussa fecerunt, inferna cesserunt, mortui reuixerunt; exceptis ipsius Saluatoris propriis singularibusque miraculis, maxime natiuitatis et resurrectionis, quorum in uno maternae uirginitatis tantummodo sacramentum, in altero autem etiam eorum, qui in fine resurrecturi sunt, demonstrauit exemplum. Haec uia totum hominem mundat et inmortalitati mortalem ex omnibus quibus constat partibus praeparat. Ut enim non alia purgatio ei parti quaereretur, quam uocat intellectualem Porphyrius, alia ei, quam uocat spiritalem, aliaque ipsi corpori: propterea totum suscepit ueracissimus potentissimusque mundator adque saluator.

For it was not only that angelic visions appeared and the words of heavenly ministers alone were heard. Men of God also acted by the word of God in simple godliness. Through them unclean spirits were driven out of human bodies and senses, and bodily defects and illnesses were healed. Wild animals of land and water, birds of the sky, trees, elements and stars carried out divine commands. The powers of the underworld gave way, and the dead came back to life. And this is not to mention the Savior's own unique miracles, above all those of his birth and his resurrection. In the one he revealed only the mystery of a mother's virginity. In the other he also gave an example for those who are to rise at the end. This way cleanses the whole human being and prepares the mortal for immortality in all the parts of which he consists. One purification need not be sought for the part that Porphyry calls intellectual, another for the part he calls spiritual, and another for the body itself. For that reason the most truthful and most powerful cleanser and Savior took on the whole human being.

Praeter hanc uiam, quae, partim cum haec futura praenuntiantur, partim cum facta nuntiantur, numquam generi humano defuit, nemo liberatus est, nemo liberatur, nemo liberabitur.

This way has never been lacking to the human race. At times it was there as these things were foretold as future, at times as they were announced as done. Apart from this way no one has been liberated, no one is being liberated, no one will be liberated.

THE HISTORY THAT FORETELLS

Scripture's history is the most trustworthy, since its many fulfilled prophecies guarantee the rest.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quod autem Porphyrius uniuersalem uiam animae liberandae nondum in suam notitiam historiali cognitione dicit esse perlatam: quid hac historia uel inlustrius inueniri potest, quae uniuersum orbem tanto apice auctoritatis obtinuit, uel fidelius, in qua ita narrantur praeterita, ut futura etiam praedicantur, quorum multa uidemus inpleta, ex quibus ea quae restant sine dubio speremus inplenda? Non enim potest

Porphyry says that the universal way of liberating the soul had not yet been brought to his knowledge by historical knowledge. But what history can be found more illustrious than this one, which has taken hold of the whole world with such supreme authority? And what history is more trustworthy? In it past events are narrated in such a way that future ones are also foretold. Many of 64 Luke 24:45–47.

LATIN

Porphyrius uel quicumque Platonici etiam in hac uia quasi terrenarum rerum et ad uitam istam mortalem pertinentium diuinationem praedictionemque contemnere, quod merito in aliis uaticinationibus et quorumlibet modorum uel artium diuinationibus faciunt. Negant enim haec uel magnorum hominum uel magni esse pendenda, et recte.

Nam uel inferiorum fiunt praesensione causarum, sicut arte medicinae quibusdam antecedentibus signis plurima euentura ualetudine praeuidentur; uel inmundi daemones sua disposita facta praenuntiant, quorum ius et in mentibus adque cupiditatibus iniquorum ad quaeque congruentia facta ducendis quodam modo sibi uindicant, et in materia infima fragilitatis humanae. Non talia sancti homines in ista uniuersali animarum liberandarum uia gradientes tamquam magna prophetare curarunt, quamuis et ista eos non fugerint et ab eis saepe praedicta sint ad eorum fidem faciendam, quae mortalium sensibus non poterant intimari nec ad experimentum celeri facilitate perduci. Sed alia erant uere magna adque diuina, quae quantum dabatur cognita Dei uoluntate futura nuntiabant.

Christus quippe in carne uenturus et quae in illo tam clara perfecta sunt adque in eius nomine inpleta, paenitentia hominum et ad Deum conuersio uoluntatum, remissio peccatorum, gratia iustitiae, fides piorum et per uniuersum orbem in ueram diuinitatem multitudo credentium, culturae simulacrorum daemonumque subuersio et a tentationibus exercitatio, proficientium purgatio et liberatio ab omni malo, iudicii dies, resurrectio mortuorum, societatis inpiorum aeterna damnatio regnumque aeternum gloriosissimae ciuitatis Dei conspectu eius inmortaliter perfruentis in huius uiae scripturis praedicta adque promissa sunt; quorum tam multa inpleta conspicimus, ut recta pietate futura esse cetera confidamus. Huius uiae rectitudinem usque ad Deum uidendum eique in aeternum cohaerendum in sanctarum scripturarum qua praedicatur adque adseritur ueritate quicumque non credunt et ob hoc nec intellegunt, obpugnare possunt, sed expugnare non possunt.

ENGLISH

those we see fulfilled, so that from them we may hope without doubt that the rest will be fulfilled. In this way too, neither Porphyry nor any Platonist whatever can despise its divination and prediction as if they concerned earthly things belonging to this mortal life. They rightly do so with other prophecies and with divinations of every method or art. They say that these things are neither the concern of great men nor of great importance, and rightly so.

Such predictions arise in one of two ways. Either they come from foresight of lower causes, as in the art of medicine much that will happen to someone's health is foreseen from certain preceding signs. Or else unclean demons announce beforehand what they themselves have arranged to do. In a sense, they claim for themselves a right over the minds and desires of the wicked, to lead them to deeds that suit them. They claim it also over the lowest matter of human frailty. Holy men walking on this universal way of liberating souls did not trouble to prophesy such things as if they were great. Such things did not escape them either, and they often foretold them to create belief in other things. Those other things could not be conveyed to mortal senses, nor brought quickly and easily to the test of experience. But there were other things, truly great and divine, which they announced as future, as far as it was granted them, once they knew the will of God.

For the scriptures of this way foretold and promised Christ, who was to come in the flesh. They foretold the glorious things accomplished in him and fulfilled in his name. These include the repentance of human beings and the turning of their wills to God, the forgiveness of sins, and the grace of righteousness. They include the faith of the godly and the multitude throughout the whole world believing in the true divinity. They include the overthrow of the worship of idols and demons, and testing by temptations. They include the purification of those who make progress and their deliverance from all evil. They include the day of judgment, the resurrection of the dead, and the eternal damnation of the company of the ungodly. Last, they include the eternal kingdom of the most glorious city of God, immortally enjoying the sight of him. So many of these things we see fulfilled that we trust, with right devotion, that the rest will come to pass. This way runs straight all the way to seeing God and cleaving to him forever. Its straightness is proclaimed and affirmed in the truth of the holy scriptures. Whoever does not believe that truth, and therefore does not understand it, can assail this way but cannot storm it.

LATIN

ENGLISH

Quapropter in decem istis libris, etsi minus quam nonnullorum de nobis expectabat intentio, tamen quorundam studio, quantum uerus Deus et Dominus adiuuare dignatus est, satisfecimus refutando contradictiones inpiorum, qui conditori sanctae ciuitatis, de qua disputare instituimus, deos suos praeferunt. Quorum decem librorum quinque superiores aduersus eos conscripti sunt, qui propter bona uitae huius deos colendos putant; quinque autem posteriores aduersus eos, qui cultum deorum propter uitam, quae post mortem futura est, seruandum existimant. Deinceps itaque, ut in primo libro polliciti sumus, de duarum ciuitatum, quas in hoc saeculo perplexas diximus inuicemque permixtas, exortu et procursu et debitis finibus quod dicendum arbitror, quantum diuinitus adiuuabor, expediam.

So in these ten books I have refuted the objections of the ungodly, who prefer their gods to the founder of the holy city that I set out to discuss. I have done this as far as the true God and Lord has deigned to help me. The books fall short of what some expected of me, but they have satisfied the eagerness of certain others. Of these ten books, the first five were written against those who think the gods should be worshiped for the sake of the goods of this life. The last five were written against those who hold that the worship of the gods should be kept up for the sake of the life to come after death. From here on, then, as I promised in the first book, I shall set out what I think must be said about the two cities. As I have said, they are entangled and intermingled with each other in this world. I shall treat their origin, their progress and their appointed ends, as far as I am helped by God.

Book XI

The beginnings of the two cities
Creation, time, the angels, and the fall of some angels as the origin of the two cities.

THE PART OF THE WORK IN WHICH THE ORIGINS AND ENDS OF THE TWO CITIES, THE HEAVENLY AND THE EARTHLY, BEGIN TO BE SHOWN

Scripture testifies to the city of God; Augustine turns to the two cities' origins among the angels.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.1	Ciuitatem Dei dicimus, cuius ea scriptura testis est, quae non fortuitis motibus animorum, sed plane summae dispositione prouidentiae super omnes omnium gentium litteras omnia sibi genera ingeniorum humanorum diuina excellens auctoritate subiecit. Ibi quippe scriptum est: Gloriosa dicta sunt de te, ciuitas Dei; et in alio psalmo legitur: Magnus Dominus et laudabilis nimis in ciuitate Dei nostri, in monte sancto eius, dilatans exultationes uniuersae terrae; et paulo post in eodem psalmo: Sicut audiuimus, ita et uidimus, in ciuitate domini uirtutum, in ciuitate Dei nostri; Deus fundauit eam in aeternum; item in alio: Fluminis inpetus laetificat ciuitatem Dei, sanctificauit tabernaculum suum Altissimus; Deus in medio eius non commouebitur.	We speak of the city of God, to which that Scripture bears witness which has brought every kind of human intellect under its sway. It surpasses the writings of all nations by its divine authority, and it does so not by chance impulses of human minds but plainly by the ordering of supreme providence. For there it is written: "Glorious things have been spoken of you, city of God." In another psalm we read: "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, on his holy mountain, spreading joy over the whole earth." A little later in the same psalm: "As we have heard, so we have seen, in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God; God has founded it forever." And again in another: "The rush of the river gladdens the city of God; the Most High has sanctified his tabernacle; God is in its midst, it will not be moved."[1]
	His adque huius modi testimoniis, quae omnia commemorare nimis longum est, didicimus esse quandam ciuitatem Dei, cuius ciues esse concupiscimus illo amore, quem nobis illius conditor inspirauit. Huic conditori sanctae ciuitatis ciues terrenae ciuitatis deos suos praeferunt ignorantes eum esse Deum deorum, non deorum falsorum, hoc est inpiorum et superborum, qui eius incommutabili omnibusque communi luce priuati et ob hoc ad quandam egenam potestatem redacti suas quodam modo priuatas potentias consectantur honoresque diuinos a deceptis subditis quaerunt; sed deorum piorum adque sanctorum, qui potius se ipsos uni subdere quam multos sibi, potiusque Deum colere quam pro Deo coli delectantur. Sed huius sanctae ciuitatis inimicis decem superioribus libris, quantum potuimus, domino et rege nostro adiuuante respondimus.	From these and similar testimonies, which it would take too long to list in full, we have learned that there is a certain city of God. We long to be its citizens with that love which its founder has breathed into us. The citizens of the earthly city prefer their own gods to this founder of the holy city. They do not know that he is the God of gods. He is not the God of false gods, that is, of impious and proud ones. These gods have been deprived of his unchangeable light, which is common to all, and have therefore been reduced to a kind of beggarly power. So they chase after what are, in a way, their own private powers, and seek divine honors from the subjects they have deceived. He is the God of pious and holy gods, who delight to subject themselves to one rather than many to them-

1 Psalms 86:3; 47:2–3 and 47:9; 45:5–6 (87:3; 48:1–2 and 48:8; 46:4–5 in most English Bibles).

LATIN	ENGLISH
	selves, and to worship God rather than to be worshiped in place of God. But we have already answered the enemies of this holy city in the ten preceding books, as far as we could, with the help of our Lord and King.
Nunc uero quid a me iam expectetur agnoscens meique non inmemor debiti de duarum ciuitatum, terrenae scilicet et caelestis, quas in hoc interim saeculo perplexas quodam modo diximus inuicemque permixtas, exortu et excursu et debitis finibus, quantum ualuero, disputare eius ipsius domini et regis nostri ubique opitulatione fretus adgrediar, primumque dicam, quem ad modum exordia duarum istarum ciuitatum in angelorum diuersitate praecesserint.	Now, however, I recognize what is expected of me, and I have not forgotten my debt. I shall therefore undertake to discuss, as well as I am able, the origin, progress and due ends of the two cities, the earthly and the heavenly. As I have said, in this present age they are in a certain way entangled and mixed with each other. I shall rely throughout on the help of that same Lord and King of ours. First I shall explain how the beginnings of these two cities came first, in the division among the angels.

KNOWING GOD, WHOM NO ONE COMES TO KNOW EXCEPT THROUGH THE MEDIATOR BETWEEN GOD AND HUMAN BEINGS, THE MAN CHRIST JESUS

God speaks to the mind by truth itself; Christ, God and man, is the only way to him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.2 Magnum est et admodum rarum uniuersam creaturam corpoream et incorpoream consideratam conpertamque mutabilem intentione mentis excedere adque ad incommutabilem Dei substantiam peruenire et illic discere ex ipso, quod cunctam naturam, quae non est quod ipse, non fecit nisi ipse. Sic enim Deus cum homine non per aliquam creaturam loquitur corporalem, corporalibus instrepens auribus, ut inter sonantem et audientem aeria spatia uerberentur, neque per eius modi spiritalem, quae corporum similitudinibus figuratur, sicut in somnis uel quo alio tali modo (nam et sic uelut corporis auribus loquitur, quia uelut per corpus loquitur et uelut interposito corporalium locorum interuallo; multum enim similia sunt talia uisa corporibus); sed loquitur ipsa ueritate, si quis sit idoneus ad audiendum mente, non corpore.	It is a great and very rare thing for someone to consider the whole of creation, bodily and non-bodily, and find it changeable. It is rarer still for that person to rise beyond it by the effort of the mind and arrive at the unchangeable substance of God, and there to learn from God himself that all nature which is not what he is was made by none other than himself. For in this way God does not speak with a human being through some bodily creature, sounding in bodily ears so that the spaces of air between speaker and hearer are struck. Nor does he speak through a spiritual creature of the kind that is shaped in the likenesses of bodies, as in dreams or in some other such way. Even then he speaks as if to the ears of the body, since he speaks as if through a body and as if across an interval of bodily space, for such visions are very like bodies. Rather, he speaks by truth itself, if anyone is fit to hear with the mind, not with the body.
Ad illud enim hominis ita loquitur, quod in homine ceteris, quibus homo constat, est melius, et quo ipse Deus solus est melior. Cum enim homo rectissime intellegatur uel, si hoc non potest, saltem credatur factus ad imaginem Dei: profecto ea sui parte est propinquior superiori Deo, qua superat inferiores suas, quas etiam cum pecoribus communes habet. Sed quia ipsa mens, cui	For he speaks in this way to that part of a human being which is better than all the other parts of which a human being consists, and than which God alone is better. A human being is most rightly understood to have been made in the image of God, or, if that is beyond someone, is at least believed to have been. Certainly, then, a person is ratio et intellegentia naturaliter inest, uitiis quibusdam tenebrosis et ueteribus inualida est, non solum ad inhaerendum fruendo, uerum etiam ad perferendum incommutabile lumen, donec de die in diem renouata adque sanata fiat tantae felicitatis capax, fide primum fuerat inbuenda adque purganda.	nearer to the God above by that part of himself by which he surpasses his lower parts, which he shares even with the beasts. But the mind itself, in which reason and understanding are naturally present, is weakened by certain dark and long-standing vices. It is too weak not only to cling to the unchangeable light in enjoyment, but even to endure it, until it is renewed and healed from day to day and becomes capable of such great happiness. It therefore had first to be steeped in faith and purified.

LATIN	ENGLISH
In qua ut fidentius ambularet ad ueritatem, ipsa ueritas, Deus Dei filius, homine adsumto, non Deo consumto, eandem constituit et fundauit fidem, ut ad hominis Deum iter esset homini per hominem Deum. Hic est enim mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus. Per hoc enim mediator, per quod homo, per hoc et uia. Quoniam si inter eum qui tendit et illud quo tendit uia media est, spes est perueniendi; si autem desit aut ignoretur qua eundum sit, quid prodest nosse quo eundum sit? Sola est autem aduersus omnes errores uia munitissima, ut idem ipse sit Deus et homo; quo itur Deus, qua itur homo.	So that the mind might walk toward truth with greater confidence in this faith, the Truth himself, God the Son of God, established and founded this same faith. He took up humanity without giving up his deity, so that there might be a way for man to man's God through the God who is man. For this is "the mediator between God and humankind, the man Christ Jesus." He is mediator by being man, and by being man he is also the way. If there is a way lying between the one who travels and the place to which he travels, there is hope of arriving. But if there is no way, or if one does not know which way to go, what use is it to know where one must go? The only way that is fully secure against all errors is for one and the same person to be both God and man: God where we are going, man by which we go.[2]

THE AUTHORITY OF THE CANONICAL SCRIPTURE, COMPOSED BY THE DIVINE SPIRIT

Things beyond our senses must be learned from trusted witnesses, above all canonical Scripture.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.3 Hic prius per prophetas, deinde per se ipsum, postea per apostolos, quantum satis esse iudicauit, locutus etiam scripturam condidit, quae canonica nominatur, eminentissimae auctoritatis, cui fidem habemus de his rebus, quas ignorare non expedit nec per nos ipsos nosse idonei sumus. Nam si ea sciri possunt testibus nobis, quae remota non sunt a sensibus nostris siue interioribus siue etiam exterioribus (unde et praesentia nuncupantur, quod ita ea dicimus esse prae sensibus, sicut prae oculis quae praesto sunt oculis): profecto ea, quae remota sunt a sensibus nostris, quoniam nostro testimonio scire non possumus, de his alios testes requirimus eisque credimus, a quorum sensibus remota esse uel fuisse non credimus.	He spoke first through the prophets, then in his own person, and later through the apostles, as much as he judged sufficient. He also established the Scripture that is called canonical, which has the highest authority. We place our faith in it concerning things that it is not good for us to be ignorant of and that we are not able to know by ourselves. Some things can be known on our own testimony, namely those that are not remote from our senses, whether inner or outer. That is why they are called "present": we say they are prae sensibus [before the senses], just as things are prae oculis [before the eyes] when they are at hand to the eyes. But we cannot know on our own testi-

2 1 Timothy 2:5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	mony the things that are remote from our senses. About these we look for other witnesses, and we believe those from whose senses we do not believe these things are or were remote.
Sicut ergo de uisibilibus, quae non uidimus, eis credimus, qui uiderunt, adque ita de ceteris, quae ad suum quemque sensum corporis pertinent: ita de his, quae animo ac mente sentiuntur (quia et ipse rectissime dicitur sensus, unde et sententia uocabulum accepit), hoc est de inuisibilibus quae a nostro sensu interiore remota sunt, his nos oportet credere, qui haec in illo incorporeo lumine disposita didicerunt uel manentia contuentur.	About visible things that we have not seen, then, we believe those who have seen them, and the same holds for the objects of each of the other bodily senses. In the same way, it is right for us to believe others about the things perceived by the soul and mind. This too is most rightly called a sense, which is how the word sententia [judgment] got its name. These are invisible things, remote from our inner sense. About them we ought to believe those who have learned them as they are set forth in that non-bodily light, or who behold them as they abide there.

THE CREATION OF THE WORLD, WHICH IS NEITHER TIMELESS NOR ORDAINED BY A NEW DECISION OF GOD, AS IF HE LATER WILLED WHAT HE HAD NOT WILLED BEFORE

The world proclaims it was made by God; the question is why at that time and not earlier.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.4 Visibilium omnium maximus mundus est, inuisibilium omnium maximus Deus est. Sed mundum esse conspicimus, Deum esse credimus. Quod autem Deus fecerit mundum, nulli tutius credimus quam ipsi Deo. Ubi eum audiuimus? Nusquam interim nos melius quam in scripturis sanctis, ubi dixit propheta eius: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram. Numquidnam ibi fuit iste propheta, quando fecit Deus caelum et terram? Non; sed ibi fuit sapientia Dei, per quam facta sunt omnia, quae in animas sanctas etiam se transferens amicos Dei et prophetas constituit eisque opera sua sine strepitu intus enarrat. Loquuntur eis quoque angeli Dei, qui semper uident faciem Patris uoluntatemque eius quibus oportet adnuntiant. Ex his unus erat iste propheta, qui dixit et scripsit: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram.	The greatest of all visible things is the world; the greatest of all invisible things is God. But we see that the world exists; we believe that God exists. And no one is safer to believe about God's making the world than God himself. Where have we heard him? For now, nowhere better than in the holy Scriptures, where his prophet said: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." Was this prophet there when God made heaven and earth? No. But the wisdom of God was there, through which all things were made. That wisdom also passes into holy souls and makes them friends of God and prophets, and it tells them of its works inwardly, without any noise. The angels of God also speak to them, who always see the face of the Father and announce his will to those who should hear it. One of these was this prophet, who said and wrote: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth."[3]
Qui tam idoneus testis est, per quem Deo credendum sit, ut eodem spiritu Dei, quo haec sibi reuelata cognouit, etiam ipsam fidem nostram futuram tanto ante praedixerit.	He is so fit a witness to bring us to believe God that he foretold, so long beforehand, this very faith of ours that was yet to come. He did so by the same Spirit of God by which he knew these things had been revealed to him.
Sed quid placuit aeterno Deo tunc facere caelum et terram, quae antea non fecisset? Qui hoc dicunt, si	But why did it please the eternal God to make heaven and earth at that particular time, when he mundum aeternum sine ullo initio et ideo nec a Deo factum uideri uolunt, nimis auersi sunt a ueritate et letali morbo inpietatis insaniunt. Exceptis enim propheticis uocibus mundus ipse ordinatissima sua mutabilitate et mobilitate et uisibilium omnium pulcherrima specie quodam modo tacitus et factum se esse et non nisi a Deo ineffabiliter adque inuisibiliter magno et ineffabiliter adque inuisibiliter pulchro fieri se potuisse proclamat.

LATIN

Qui autem a Deo quidem factum fatentur, non tamen eum temporis uolunt habere sed suae creationis initium, ut modo quodam uix intellegibili semper sit factus, dicunt quidem aliquid, unde sibi Deum uidentur uelut a fortuita temeritate defendere, ne subito illi uenisse credatur in mentem, quod numquam ante uenisset, facere mundum, et accidisse illi nouam uoluntatem, cum in nullo sit omnino mutabilis; sed non uideo quo modo eis possit in ceteris rebus ratio ista subsistere maximeque in anima, quam si Deo coaeternam esse contenderint, unde illi acciderit noua miseria, quae numquam antea per aeternum, nullo modo poterunt explicare.

Si enim alternasse semper eius miseriam et beatitudinem dixerint, necesse est dicant etiam semper alternaturam; unde illa eos sequetur absurditas, ut etiam cum beata dicitur in hoc utique non sit beata, si futuram suam miseriam et turpitudinem praeuidet; si autem non praeuidet nec se turpem ac miseram fore, sed beatam semper existimat, falsa opinione sit beata; quo dici stultius nihil potest. Si autem semper quidem per saecula retro infinita cum beatitudine alternasse animae miseriam putant, sed nunc iam de cetero, cum fuerit liberata, ad miseriam non esse redituram, nihilo minus conuincuntur numquam eam fuisse uere beatam, sed deinceps esse incipere noua quadam nec fallaci beatitudine; ac per hoc fatebuntur accidere illi aliquid noui, et hoc magnum adque praeclarum, quod numquam retro per aeternitatem accidisset.

ENGLISH

had not made them before? Some who ask this want the world to be thought eternal, without any beginning, and therefore not made by God. They have turned far away from the truth and rave with the deadly disease of impiety. For quite apart from the voices of the prophets, the world itself proclaims, silently in a way, that it was made. Through its perfectly ordered change and movement and through the supreme beauty of all visible things, it proclaims that it could have been made only by God, who is great beyond words and beyond sight, and beautiful beyond words and beyond sight.

Others admit that the world was made by God, yet want it to have a beginning not of time but only of its creation, so that in some scarcely intelligible way it has always been made. They do say something by which they think they defend God against a charge of random rashness. On their view no one should believe that the idea of making the world suddenly came into his mind, though it had never come there before, or that he acquired a new will, since he is in no respect changeable at all. But I do not see how this reasoning of theirs can hold up in other matters, and above all in the case of the soul. If they contend that the soul is coeternal with God, they will be utterly unable to explain where its new misery came from, a misery that had never befallen it before through all eternity.[4]

Suppose they say that its misery and happiness have always alternated. Then they must also say that they will always alternate. From this follows an absurdity. Even when the soul is called happy, it is surely not happy in this respect, if it foresees its future misery and disgrace. And if it does not foresee them, and supposes that it will never be disgraced and miserable but will always be happy, then its happiness rests on a false belief. Nothing more foolish than that can be said. Suppose instead they think that the soul's misery has indeed alternated with happiness through infinite ages past, but that from now on, once it has been set free, it will not return to misery. Then they are nonetheless proved to hold that it was never truly happy before, and that from now on it begins to 3 Genesis 1:1. The prophet is Moses, traditionally held to be the author of Genesis.

4 Augustine has in mind Platonist philosophers who read Plato's Timaeus as teaching that the world depends on God without having begun in time.

LATIN

ENGLISH

enjoy a new happiness, one that does not deceive. And so they will admit that something new happens to it, and something great and splendid, which had never happened to it through all eternity past.

Cuius nouitatis causam si Deum negabunt in aeterno habuisse consilio, simul eum negabunt beatitudinis eius auctorem, quod nefandae inpietatis est; si autem dicent etiam ipsum nouo consilio excogitasse, ut de cetero sit anima in aeternum beata, quo modo eum alienum ab ea, quae illis quoque displicet, mutabilitate monstrabunt? Porro si ex tempore creatam, sed nullo ulterius tempore perituram, tamquam numerum, habere initium, sed non habere finem fatentur, et ideo semel expertam miserias, si ab eis fuerit liberata, numquam miseram postea futuram: non utique dubitabunt hoc fieri manente incommutabilitate consilii Dei. Sic ergo credant et mundum ex tempore fieri potuisse, nec tamen ideo Deum in eo faciendo aeternum consilium uoluntatemque mutasse.

If they deny that God held the cause of this new thing in his eternal plan, they will at the same time deny that he is the author of the soul's happiness, which is an abominable impiety. But if they say that he too devised a new plan, that the soul should be happy forever from then on, how will they show that he is free from the changeability that they too reject? Further, they may admit that the soul was created in time but will never perish at any later time. Like number, it then has a beginning but no end, and so, having once experienced miseries, it will never be miserable again once it has been set free from them. In that case they will certainly not doubt that this happens while the unchangeableness of God's plan remains intact. Let them, then, likewise believe that the world too could have been made in time, and yet that God did not on that account change his eternal plan and will in making it.

THAT WE SHOULD NO MORE IMAGINE INFINITE STRETCHES OF TIME BEFORE THE WORLD THAN INFINITE STRETCHES OF SPACE OUTSIDE IT, SINCE JUST AS THERE ARE NO TIMES BEFORE IT, SO THERE ARE NO PLACES OUTSIDE IT

Asking why God made the world then and not earlier is like asking why it is here.

LATIN

ENGLISH

11.5 Deinde uidendum est, isti, qui Deum conditorem mundi esse consentiunt et tamen quaerunt de mundi tempore quid respondeamus, quid ipsi respondeant de mundi loco. Ita enim quaeritur, quur potius tunc et non antea factus sit, quem ad modum quaeri potest, quur hic potius ubi est et non alibi.

Next we must consider these people who agree that God is the founder of the world, and yet ask what answer we give about the time of the world. We must see what answer they give themselves about the place of the world. For to ask why it was made then rather than earlier is like asking why it is here, where it is, rather than somewhere else.

Nam si infinita spatia temporis ante mundum cogitant, in quibus eis non uidetur Deus ab opere cessare potuisse, similiter, cogitent extra mundum infinita spatia locorum, in quibus si quisquam dicat non potuisse uacare Omnipotentem, nonne consequens erit, ut innumerabiles mundos cum Epicuro somniare cogantur (ea tantum differentia, quod eos ille fortuitis motibus atomorum gigni adserit et resolui, isti autem opere Dei factos dicturi sunt), si eum per interminabilem inmensitatem locorum extra mundum circumquaque patentium uacare

They imagine infinite stretches of time before the world, in which they think God could not have been idle from work. Let them likewise imagine infinite stretches of space outside the world. Suppose someone says that the Almighty could not have been inactive there either. Will it not follow that they are forced to dream, with Epicurus, of innumerable worlds? The only difference would be that he asserts these are produced and dissolved by the chance movements of atoms, while they will say they are made by God's work. This follows noluerint, nec eosdem mundos, quod etiam de isto sentiunt, ulla causa posse dissolui?

LATIN

Cum his enim agimus, qui et Deum incorporeum et omnium naturarum, quae non sunt quod ipse, creatorem nobiscum sentiunt; alios autem nimis indignum est ad istam disputationem religionis admittere, maxime quod aput eos, qui multis dis sacrorum obsequium deferendum putant, isti philosophos ceteros nobilitate adque auctoritate uicerunt, non ob aliud, nisi quia longo quidem interuallo, uerum tamen reliquis propinquiores sunt ueritati. An forte substantiam Dei, quam nec includunt nec determinant nec distendunt loco, sed eam, sicut de Deo sentire dignum est, fatentur incorporea praesentia ubique totam, a tantis locorum extra mundum spatiis absentem esse dicturi sunt, et uno tantum adque in conparationem illius infinitatis tam exiguo loco, in quo mundus est, occupatam? Non opinor eos in haec uaniloquia progressuros.

Cum igitur unum mundum ingenti quidem mole corporea, finitum tamen et loco suo determinatum et operante Deo factum esse dicant: quod respondent de infinitis extra mundum locis, quur in eis ab opere Deus cesset, hoc sibi respondeant de infinitis ante mundum temporibus, quur in eis ab opere Deus cessauerit.

Et sicut non est consequens, ut fortuito potius quam ratione diuina Deus non alio, sed isto in quo est loco mundum constituerit, cum pariter infinitis ubique patentibus nullo excellentiore merito posset hic eligi, quamuis eandem diuinam rationem, qua id factum est, nulla possit humana conprehendere: ita non est consequens, ut Deo aliquid existimemus accidisse fortuitum, quod illo potius quam anteriore tempore condidit mundum, cum aequaliter anteriora tempora per infinitum retro spatium praeterissent nec fuisset aliqua differentia, unde tempus tempori eligendo praeponeretur. Quod si dicunt inanes esse hominum cogitationes, quibus infinita imaginantur loca, cum locus nullus sit praeter mundum, respondetur eis isto modo:

ENGLISH

if they will not allow God to be idle through the boundless immensity of space stretching out on every side beyond the world, and if they hold that those worlds, like this one as they believe, cannot be dissolved by any cause.[5]

For we are dealing with those who agree with us that God is non-bodily and the creator of all natures that are not what he is. It would be quite unworthy to admit others to this discussion of religion. This is especially so because, among those who think that the homage of rites should be paid to many gods, these philosophers have surpassed the rest in renown and authority. The only reason is that they are nearer to the truth than the others, though still at a great distance. Or will they perhaps say that the substance of God is absent from such vast spaces outside the world? They neither enclose it nor bound it nor stretch it out in space. Instead they confess, as it is fitting to think of God, that it is wholly present everywhere by a non-bodily presence. Will they say it is occupied with only one place, the one in which the world is, so tiny in comparison with that infinity? I do not think they will go so far as to talk such nonsense.[6]

They say, then, that there is one world, of vast bodily mass indeed, yet finite, bounded in its place, and made by the working of God. They have an answer to the question why God is idle from work in the infinite places outside the world. Let them give themselves the same answer to the question why God was idle from work in the infinite times before the world.

Consider the place first. It does not follow that God established the world in this place where it is and not in another by chance rather than by divine reason. Among infinite spaces lying open equally on every side, none had any better claim to be chosen than this one, though no human reason can grasp the divine reason by which the choice was made. In the same way, it does not follow that something happened to God by chance when he founded the world at that time rather than an earlier one. Earlier times had passed equally through an infinite span reaching backward, and there was no difference that would make one time

5 Epicurus (341–270 BC), Greek philosopher who taught that countless worlds arise and perish through the random collisions of atoms.

6 Augustine means the Platonists, whom he discussed at length in Book 8.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
	inaniter homines cogitare praeterita tempora uacationis Dei, cum tempus nullum sit ante mundum.	preferable to another in the choosing. They may say that people's thoughts are empty when they imagine infinite places, since there is no place outside the world. Then this is the answer to them: people are just as empty in imagining past times of God's idleness, since there is no time before the world.

THAT THE CREATION OF THE WORLD AND OF TIME HAD ONE BEGINNING, AND NEITHER CAME BEFORE THE OTHER

Since time is measured by change, the world was made not in time but with time.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.6	Si enim recte discernuntur aeternitas et tempus, quod tempus sine aliqua mobili mutabilitate non est, in aeternitate autem nulla mutatio est: quis non uideat, quod tempora non fuissent, nisi creatura fieret, quae aliquid aliqua motione mutaret, cuius motionis et mutationis cum aliud adque aliud, quae simul esse non possunt, cedit adque succedit, in breuioribus uel productioribus morarum interuallis tempus sequeretur? Cum igitur Deus, in cuius aeternitate nulla est omnino mutatio, creator sit temporum et ordinator: quo modo dicatur post temporum spatia mundum creasse non uideo, nisi dicatur ante mundum iam aliquam fuisse creaturam, cuius motibus tempora currerent.	Eternity and time are rightly distinguished in this way: there is no time without some movement and change, while in eternity there is no change at all. If that is so, who does not see that there would have been no times unless a creature had been made that would change something by some movement? One thing and then another give way and succeed each other in that movement and change, since they cannot exist simultaneously. Time would follow from this, in shorter or longer intervals of duration. God, in whose eternity there is no change whatever, is therefore the creator and orderer of times. So I do not see how he can be said to have created the world after spans of time, unless someone says that before the world there was already some creature by whose movements times ran their course.
	Porro si litterae sacrae maximeque ueraces ita dicunt, in principio fecisse Deum caelum et terram, ut nihil antea fecisse intellegatur, quia hoc potius in principio fecisse diceretur, si quid fecisset ante cetera cuncta quae fecit: procul dubio non est mundus factus in tempore, sed cum tempore. Quod enim fit in tempore, et post aliquod fit et ante aliquod tempus; post id quod praeteritum est, ante id quod futurum est; nullum autem posset esse praeteritum, quia nulla erat creatura, cuius mutabilibus motibus ageretur.	Further, the sacred and supremely truthful writings say that in the beginning God made heaven and earth. They say it in such a way that we understand he made nothing before. If he had made something before all the other things that he made, that would rather have been said to be made "in the beginning." If so, then without doubt the world was made not in time but with time. For what is made in time is made both after some time and before some time: after what is past, before what is to come. But there could have been no past, because there was no creature by whose changeable movements time could pass.
	Cum tempore autem factus est mundus, si in eius conditione factus est mutabilis motus, sicut uidetur se habere etiam ordo ille primorum sex uel septem dierum, in quibus et mane et uespera nominantur, donec omnia, quae his diebus Deus fecit, sexto perficiantur die septimoque in magno mysterio Dei uacatio	The world was made with time, then, if changeable movement was made at its creation. This seems to be the case also with that sequence of the first six or seven days, in which morning and evening are named. All that God made in these days is completed on the sixth day, and on the sev-

LATIN	ENGLISH
commendetur. Qui dies cuius modi sint, aut perdifficile nobis aut etiam inpossibile est cogitare, quanto magis dicere.	enth God's rest is set before us as a great mystery. What kind of days these are is extremely difficult or even impossible for us to imagine, let alone to describe.

THE NATURE OF THE FIRST DAYS, WHICH ARE SAID TO HAVE HAD EVENING AND MORNING EVEN BEFORE THE SUN WAS MADE

The first days, before the sun, may be the angels' knowledge of creation, passing from evening to morning.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.7 Videmus quippe istos dies notos non habere uesperam nisi de solis occasu nec mane nisi de solis exortu; illorum autem priores tres dies sine sole peracti sunt, qui die quarto factus refertur. Et primitus quidem lux uerbo Dei facta adque inter ipsam et tenebras Deus separasse narratur et eandem lucem uocasse diem, tenebras autem noctem; sed qualis illa sit lux et quo alternante motu qualemque uesperam et mane fecerit, remotum est a sensibus nostris, nec ita ut est intellegi a nobis potest, quod tamen sine ulla haesitatione credendum est.	For we see that the days we know have no evening except from the setting of the sun and no morning except from its rising. But the first three of those days passed without the sun, which, we are told, was made on the fourth day. First, indeed, light was made by the word of God, and God is said to have separated it from the darkness and to have called that light day and the darkness night. But what that light is, by what alternating movement it made evening and morning, and what kind of evening and morning these were, is remote from our senses. Nor can we understand it as it is, though we must still believe it without any hesitation.
Aut enim aliqua lux corporea est, siue in superioribus mundi partibus longe a conspectibus nostris siue unde sol postmodum accensus est; aut lucis nomine significata est sancta ciuitas in sanctis angelis et spiritibus beatis, de qua dicit apostolus: Quae sursum est Hierusalem, mater nostra aeterna in caelis; ait quippe et alio loco: Omnes enim uos filii lucis estis et filii diei; non sumus noctis neque tenebrarum; si tamen et uesperam diei huius et mane aliquatenus congruenter intellegere ualeamus. Quoniam scientia creaturae in conparationem scientiae Creatoris quodam modo uesperascit, itemque lucescit et mane fit, cum et ipsa refertur ad laudem dilectionemque Creatoris; nec in noctem uergitur, ubi non Creator creaturae dilectione relinquitur. Denique scriptura cum illos dies dinumeraret ex ordine, nusquam interposuit uocabulum noctis.	There are two possibilities. Either it is some bodily light, whether in the upper parts of the world far from our sight or the source from which the sun was later kindled. Or the word "light" means the holy city in the holy angels and blessed spirits, of which the apostle says: "The Jerusalem that is above, our eternal mother in heaven." For he also says in another place: "For you are all children of light and children of the day; we are not of the night or of darkness." This holds, at least, if we can understand the evening and morning of this day in some fitting way. Compared with the knowledge of the Creator, the knowledge of a creature grows dusky, so to speak, as at evening. Then it grows bright again and becomes morning when it too is referred to the praise and love of the Creator. And it does not sink into night, so long as the Creator is not abandoned for love of the creature. In fact, when Scripture listed those days in order, it nowhere inserted the word "night."[7]
Non enim ait alicubi: Facta est nox; sed: Facta est uespera et factum est mane dies unus. Ita dies secundus et ceteri. Cognitio quippe creaturae in se ipsa decoloratior est, ut	For it nowhere says, "There was night," but, "There was evening and there was morning, one day." The same is true of the second day and the 7 "The apostle" is Paul: Galatians 4:26 (Augustine's text adds "eternal in heaven") and 1 Thessalonians 5:5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
ita dicam, quam cum in Dei sapientia cognoscitur, uelut in arte qua facta est. Ideo uespera quam nox congruentius dici potest; quae tamen, ut dixi, cum ad laudandum et ad amandum refertur Creatorem, recurrit in mane.	rest. A creature known in itself is known, so to speak, in duller colors than when it is known in the wisdom of God, as in the art by which it was made. That is why this knowledge can more fittingly be called evening than night. Yet, as I said, when it is referred to praising and loving the Creator, it turns back into morning.[8]
Et hoc cum facit in cognitione sui ipsius, dies unus est; cum in cognitione firmamenti, quod inter aquas inferiores et superiores caelum appellatum est, dies secundus; cum in cognitione terrae ac maris omniumque gignentium, quae radicibus continuata sunt terrae, dies tertius; cum in cognitione luminarium maioris et minoris omniumque siderum, dies quartus; cum in cognitione omnium ex aquis animalium natatilium adque uolatilium, dies quintus; cum in cognitione omnium animalium terrenorum adque ipsius hominis, dies sextus.	When it does this in knowing itself, that is one day. When it does so in knowing the firmament, which was called heaven and set between the lower and the upper waters, that is the second day. When it does so in knowing the earth and the sea and all growing things, which are joined to the earth by their roots, that is the third day. When it does so in knowing the greater and lesser lights and all the stars, that is the fourth day. When it does so in knowing all the creatures from the waters that swim and fly, that is the fifth day. When it does so in knowing all the land animals and man himself, that is the sixth day.

WHAT GOD'S REST SHOULD BE UNDERSTOOD TO BE, AND OF WHAT KIND, WHEN HE RESTED ON THE SEVENTH DAY AFTER THE WORKS OF SIX DAYS

God's rest on the seventh day signifies the rest of those who rest in him.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.8 Cum uero in die septimo requiescit Deus ab omnibus operibus suis et sanctificat eum, nequaquam est accipiendum pueriliter, tamquam Deus laborauerit operando, qui dixit et facta sunt uerbo intellegibili et sempiterno, non sonabili et temporali. Sed requies Dei requiem significat eorum qui requiescunt in Deo, sicut laetitia domus laetitiam significat eorum, qui laetantur in domo, etiamsi non eos domus ipsa, sed alia res aliqua laetos facit.	But when God rests on the seventh day from all his works and sanctifies it, this must not be understood in a childish way, as though God had labored in working. He spoke, and things were made, by a Word that is intelligible and eternal, not one that sounds and passes in time. Rather, God's rest signifies the rest of those who rest in God. In the same way, the joy of a house signifies the joy of those who rejoice in the house, even if it is not the house itself but something else that makes them joyful.
Quanto magis, si eadem domus pulchritudine sua faciat laetos habitatores, ut non solum eo loquendi modo laeta dicatur, quo significamus per id quod continet id quod continetur (sicut theatra plaudunt, prata mugiunt, cum in illis homines plaudunt, in his boues mugiunt); sed etiam illo, quo significatur per efficientem id quod efficitur; sicut laeta epistula dicitur, significans eorum laetitiam, quos legentes efficit laetos.	How much more fitting is the expression if that same house makes its occupants joyful by its own beauty! Then it is called joyful not only by the figure of speech in which we indicate what is contained by what contains it (as when we say that the theaters applaud or the meadows low, because in the one people applaud and in the other cattle low). It is also called joyful by the figure in which an effect is indicated by what produces it, as a letter is called joyful, meaning the joy of those whom it makes joyful when they read it.

8 Genesis 1:5.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Conuenientissime itaque, cum Deum requieuisse prophetica narrat auctoritas, significatur requies eorum, qui in illo requiescunt et quos facit ipse requiescere; hoc etiam hominibus, quibus loquitur et propter quos utique conscripta est, promittente prophetia, quod etiam ipsi post bona opera, quae in eis et per eos operatur Deus, si ad illum prius in ista uita per fidem quodam modo accesserint, in illo habebunt requiem sempiternam. Hoc enim et sabbati uacatione ex praecepto legis in uetere Dei populo figuratum est, unde suo loco diligentius arbitror disserendum.	So when the authority of the prophetic writings tells us that God rested, it very fittingly signifies the rest of those who rest in him and whom he himself causes to rest. The prophecy also makes a promise to the human beings to whom it speaks, and for whose sake it was, of course, written down. It promises that they too will have eternal rest in him after the good works that God works in them and through them, if in this life they have first drawn near to him in some measure through faith. This was also prefigured among God's ancient people by the Sabbath rest commanded by the law, a subject I think should be discussed more carefully in its proper place.

WHAT WE SHOULD BELIEVE ABOUT THE CREATION OF THE ANGELS ACCORDING TO THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE

Scripture shows the angels are God's work; they are probably the light created on the first day.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.9 Nunc, quoniam de sanctae ciuitatis exortu dicere institui et prius quod ad sanctos angelos adtinet dicendum putaui, quae huius ciuitatis et magna pars est et eo beatior, quod numquam peregrinata, quae hinc diuina testimonia subpetant, quantum satis uidebitur, Deo largiente explicare curabo. Ubi de mundi constitutione sacrae litterae loquuntur, non euidenter dicitur, utrum uel quo ordine creati sint angeli; sed si praetermissi non sunt, uel caeli nomine, ubi dictum est: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram, uel potius lucis huius, de qua loquor, significati sunt.	Now, I have undertaken to speak about the origin of the holy city, and I have thought it right to speak first of what concerns the holy angels. They are a large part of this city, and all the happier because it has never been on pilgrimage. So, God granting, I will try to set out such divine testimonies on this subject as are available, as far as seems sufficient. Where the sacred writings speak of the founding of the world, they do not state plainly whether the angels were created, or in what order. But if they have not been passed over, they are signified either by the word "heaven," where it says, "In the beginning God made heaven and earth," or rather by the word "light," the light I am speaking about.[9]
Non autem esse praetermissos hinc existimo, quod scriptum est, requieuisse Deum in die septimo ab omnibus operibus suis quae fecit, cum liber ipse ita sit exorsus: In principio fecit Deus caelum, et terram, ut ante caelum et terram nihil aliud fecisse uideatur. Cum ergo a caelo et terra coeperit, adque ipsa terra, quam primitus fecit, sicut scriptura consequenter eloquitur, inuisibilis et incomposita nondumque luce facta utique tenebrae fuerint super abyssum, id est super quandam terrae et aquae indistinctam confusionem (ubi enim lux non est, tenebrae sint necesse est); deinde si omnia creando disposita sunt, quae per sex dies consummata narrantur:	That they have not been passed over I infer from this. It is written that God rested on the seventh day from all the works he had made. Yet the book itself begins this way: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth," so that he seems to have made nothing else before heaven and earth. He began, then, with heaven and earth. And the earth itself, which he made first, was, as Scripture goes on to say, invisible and unformed. Since light had not yet been made, there was certainly darkness over the abyss, that is, over a kind of undifferentiated confusion of earth and water (for where there is no light, there must be darkness). Then, if all the 9 Genesis 1:1.

LATIN	ENGLISH
quo modo angeli praetermitterentur, tamquam non essent in operibus Dei, a quibus in die septimo requieuit?	things that are said to have been completed in six days were set in order by creation, how could the angels have been passed over, as if they were not among the works of God from which he rested on the seventh day?
Opus autem Dei esse angelos hic quidem etsi non praetermissum, non tamen euidenter expressum est; sed alibi hoc sancta scriptura clarissima uoce testatur. Nam et in hymno trium in camino uirorum cum praedictum esset: Benedicite omnia opera Domini Dominum, in executione eorundem operum etiam angeli nominati sunt: et in psalmo canitur: Laudate Dominum de caelis, laudate eum in excelsis; laudate eum omnes angeli eius, laudate eum omnes uirtutes eius; laudate eum sol et luna, laudate eum omnes stellae et lumen; laudate eum caeli caelorum, et aquae, quae super caelos sunt, laudent nomen Domini; quoniam ipse dixit, et facta sunt; ipse mandauit, et creata sunt.	Here, then, the fact that the angels are God's work, though not omitted, is still not plainly stated. Elsewhere, however, holy Scripture testifies to it in the clearest terms. In the hymn of the three men in the furnace, after the opening words, "Bless the Lord, all you works of the Lord," the angels too are named when those works are listed one by one. And in the psalm we sing: "Praise the Lord from the heavens; praise him in the heights. Praise him, all his angels; praise him, all his powers. Praise him, sun and moon; praise him, all you stars and light. Praise him, heavens of heavens; and let the waters that are above the heavens praise the name of the Lord. For he spoke, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created."[10]
Etiam hic apertissime a Deo factos esse angelos diuinitus dictum est, cum eis inter cetera caelestia commemoratis infertur ad omnia: Ipse dixit, et facta sunt. Quis porro audebit opinari post omnia ista, quae sex diebus enumerata sunt, angelos factos? Sed etsi quisquam ita desipit, redarguit istam uanitatem illa scriptura paris auctoritatis, ubi Deus dicit: Quando facta sunt sidera, laudauerunt me uoce magna omnes angeli mei. Iam ergo erant angeli, quando facta sunt sidera. Facta sunt autem quarto die. Numquidnam ergo die tertio factos esse dicemus? Absit. In promtu est enim, quid illo die factum sit. Ab aquis utique terra discreta est et distinctas sui generis species duo ista elementa sumserunt et produxit terra quidquid ei radicitus inhaeret. Numquidnam secundo? Ne hoc quidem.	Here too it is said by divine inspiration, as plainly as possible, that the angels were made by God. After they have been mentioned among the other heavenly things, words are added that apply to them all: "He spoke, and they were made." Who, then, will dare to suppose that the angels were made after all the things listed in the six days? But if anyone is so foolish, a passage of Scripture of equal authority refutes this nonsense, where God says: "When the stars were made, all my angels praised me with a loud voice." So the angels already existed when the stars were made. But the stars were made on the fourth day. Shall we then say that the angels were made on the third day? Certainly not. For it is plain what was made on that day. The earth was separated from the waters, those two elements each took on their own distinct forms, and the earth brought forth everything that clings to it by roots. On the second day, then? Not that either.[11]
Tunc enim firmamentum factum est inter aquas superiores et inferiores caelumque appellatum est; in quo firmamento quarto die facta sunt sidera. Nimirum ergo si ad istorum dierum opera Dei pertinent angeli, ipsi sunt illa lux, quae diei nomen accepit, cuius unitas ut commendaretur, non est dictus dies primus, sed dies	For on that day the firmament was made between the upper and the lower waters, and it was called heaven; and in this firmament the stars were made on the fourth day. Clearly, then, if the angels belong to God's works of these days, they are that light which received the name "day." To emphasize

10 The Song of the Three Young Men in the furnace (Daniel 3:57 in the Greek and Latin Bible); Psalm 148:1–5.
11 Job 38:7.

LATIN	ENGLISH
unus. Nec alius est dies secundus aut tertius aut ceteri; sed idem ipse unus ad inplendum senarium uel septenarium numerum repetitus est propter senariam uel septenariam cognitionem; senariam scilicet operum, quae fecit Deus, et septenariam quietis Dei.	its unity, it is not called "the first day" but "one day." Nor is the second day, or the third, or any of the rest, a different day. Rather, the same single day was repeated to make up the number six or seven, on account of a sixfold or sevenfold knowledge: a sixfold knowledge of the works that God made, and a sevenfold knowledge of God's rest.
Cum enim dixit Deus: Fiat lux, et facta est lux, si recte in hac luce creatio intellegitur angelorum, profecto facti sunt participes lucis aeternae, quod est ipsa incommutabilis sapientia Dei, per quam facta sunt omnia, quem dicimus unigenitum Dei filium; ut ea luce inluminati, qua creati, fierent lux et uocarentur dies participatione incommutabilis lucis et diei, quod est uerbum Dei, per quod et ipsi et omnia facta sunt. Lumen quippe uerum, quod inluminat omnem hominem uenientem in hunc mundum, hoc inluminat et omnem angelum mundum, ut sit lux non in se ipso, sed in Deo; a quo si auertitur angelus, fit inmundus; sicut sunt omnes, qui uocantur inmundi spiritus, nec iam lux in Domino, sed in se ipsis tenebrae, priuati participatione lucis aeternae.	For when God said, "Let there be light," and there was light, if we are right to understand the creation of the angels in this light, then certainly they were made sharers in the eternal light. This light is the unchangeable wisdom of God itself, through which all things were made, the one we call the only-begotten Son of God. Thus, enlightened by the same light by which they were created, they would become light. They would be called "day" by sharing in the unchangeable light and day, which is the Word of God, through whom both they and all things were made. For "the true light, which enlightens every person coming into this world," also enlightens every clean angel, so that he is light not in himself but in God. If an angel turns away from God, he becomes unclean. Such are all those who are called unclean spirits: no longer light in the Lord, but darkness in themselves, deprived of their share in the eternal light.[12]
Mali enim nulla natura est; sed amissio boni mali nomen accepit.	For evil has no nature of its own; rather, it is the loss of good that has received the name "evil."

THE SIMPLE AND UNCHANGEABLE TRINITY OF GOD THE FATHER, GOD THE SON, AND GOD THE HOLY SPIRIT, ONE GOD, IN WHOM QUALITY AND SUBSTANCE ARE NOT DIFFERENT THINGS

God alone is simple: the Trinity is what it has, while creatures have qualities they can lose.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.10 Est itaque bonum solum simplex et ob hoc solum incommutabile, quod est Deus. Ab hoc bono creata sunt omnia bona, sed non simplicia et ob hoc mutabilia. Creata sane, inquam, id est facta, non genita. Quod enim de simplici bono genitum est, pariter simplex est et hoc est quod illud de quo genitum est; quae duo Patrem et Filium dicimus; et utrumque hoc cum spiritu suo unus Deus est; qui spiritus Patris et Filii Spiritus sanctus propria quadam notione huius nominis in sacris litteris nuncupatur. Alius est autem quam Pater et Filius, quia nec Pater est nec Filius; sed alius dixi, non aliud, quia et	There is, then, a good that alone is simple and therefore alone unchangeable, and that is God. By this good all goods were created, but they are not simple, and are therefore changeable. Created, I say, that is, made, not begotten. For what is begotten of the simple good is equally simple, and is the same as that of which it is begotten. These two we call the Father and the Son, and both of them, together with their Spirit, are one God. This Spirit of the Father and the Son is called the Holy Spirit in sacred Scripture, by a special and proper use of 12 Genesis 1:3; John 1:9. Augustine puns on mundus, which means both "world" and "clean": the light that comes into the "world" (mundum) enlightens every "clean" (mundum) angel, and the angel who turns away becomes "unclean" (inmundus).

LATIN

hoc pariter simplex pariterque incommutabile bonum est et coaeternum.

Et haec trinitas unus est Deus; nec ideo non simplex, quia trinitas. Neque enim propter hoc naturam istam boni simplicem dicimus, quia Pater in ea solus aut solus Filius aut solus Spiritus sanctus, aut uero sola est ista nominis trinitas sine subsistentia personarum, sicut Sabelliani haeretici putauerunt; sed ideo simplex dicitur, quoniam quod habet hoc est, excepto quod relatiue quaeque persona ad alteram dicitur. Nam utique Pater habet Filium, nec tamen ipse est Filius. In quo ergo ad semet ipsum dicitur, non ad alterum, hoc est quod habet; sicut ad se ipsum dicitur uiuus habendo utique uitam, et eadem uita ipse est.

Propter hoc utique natura dicitur simplex, cui non sit aliquid habere, quod uel possit amittere; uel aliud sit habens, aliud quod habet; sicut uas aliquem liquorem aut corpus colorem aut aer lucem siue feruorem aut anima sapientiam. Nihil enim horum est id quod habet; nam neque uas liquor est, nec corpus color, nec aer lux siue feruor, neque anima sapientia est. Hinc est quod etiam priuari possunt rebus quas habent, et in alios habitus uel qualitates uerti adque mutari, ut et uas euacuetur umore quo plenum est, et corpus decoloretur et aer tenebrescat siue frigescat et anima desipiat. Sed etsi sit corpus incorruptibile, quale sanctis in resurrectione promittitur, habet quidem ipsius incorruptionis inamissibilem qualitatem, sed manente substantia corporali non hoc est, quod ipsa incorruptio.

Nam illa etiam per singulas partes corporis tota est nec alibi maior, alibi minor; neque enim ulla pars est incorruptior quam altera; corpus uero ipsum maius est in toto quam in parte; et cum aliqua pars est in eo amplior, alia minor, non ea quae amplior est incorruptior quam ea quae minor. Aliud est itaque corpus, quod non ubique sui totum est, alia incorruptio, quae ubique eius tota est, quia omnis pars incorruptibilis corporis etiam ceteris inaequalis aequaliter incorrupta est. Neque enim uerbi gratia, quia digitus minor est quam tota manus, ideo incorruptibilior manus quam digitus. Ita cum sint this name. He is someone other than the Father and the Son, because he is neither the Father nor the Son. But I said "someone other," not "something other," because he too is equally a simple and equally unchangeable good, and coeternal.

ENGLISH

And this Trinity is one God. It is not the less simple for being a Trinity. For we do not call this nature of the good simple because the Father alone is in it, or the Son alone, or the Holy Spirit alone. Nor do we call it simple because it is merely a trinity of names without subsisting persons, as the Sabellian heretics thought. Rather, it is called simple because it is what it has, except for what is said of each person in relation to another. For the Father certainly has a Son, and yet he is not himself the Son. So in whatever is said of him with reference to himself, not to another, he is what he has. Thus he is called living with reference to himself, because he has life, and he himself is that same life.

This, then, is why a nature is called simple: it does not have anything that it could lose, and the one that has is not one thing and what it has another. By contrast, a vessel has some liquid, a body a color, the air light or heat, a soul wisdom. None of these is what it has: the vessel is not liquid, the body is not color, the air is not light or heat, and the soul is not wisdom. That is why they can also be deprived of the things they have, and turned and changed into other states or qualities. The vessel can be emptied of the liquid that fills it, the body can lose its color, the air can grow dark or cold, and the soul can become foolish. Even an incorruptible body, such as is promised to the saints at the resurrection, does indeed have the quality of incorruption itself, which cannot be lost. But since its bodily substance remains, it is not the same thing as incorruption itself.

For incorruption is present whole in each part of the body, not greater in one place and less in another, since no part is more incorruptible than another. But the body itself is greater as a whole than in a part. And when one part of it is larger and another smaller, the larger is not more incorruptible than the smaller. So the body, which is not whole everywhere in itself, is one thing. Incorruption, which is whole everywhere in it, is another. For every part of an incorruptible body, however un-inaequales manus et digitus, aequalis est tamen incorruptibilitas manus et digiti.

LATIN

Ac per hoc quamuis a corpore incorruptibili inseparabilis incorruptibilitas sit, aliud est tamen substantia, qua corpus dicitur, aliud qualitas eius, qua incorruptibile nuncupatur. Et ideo etiam sic non hoc est quod habet. Anima quoque ipsa, etiamsi semper sit sapiens, sicut erit cum liberabitur in aeternum, participatione tamen incommutabilis sapientiae sapiens erit, quae non est quod ipsa. Neque enim si aer infusa luce numquam deseratur, ideo non aliud est ipse, aliud lux qua inluminatur. Neque hoc ita dixerim, quasi aer sit anima, quod putauerunt quidam qui non potuerunt incorpoream cogitare naturam.

Sed habent haec ad illa etiam in magna disparilitate quandam similitudinem, ut non inconuenienter dicatur sic inluminari animam incorpoream luce incorporea simplicis sapientiae Dei, sicut inluminatur aeris corpus luce corporea; et sicut aer tenebrescit ista luce desertus (nam nihil sunt aliud quae dicuntur locorum quorumcumque corporalium tenebrae quam aer carens luce), ita tenebrescere animam sapientiae luce priuatam.

Secundum hoc ergo dicuntur illa simplicia, quae principaliter uereque diuina sunt, quod non aliud est in eis qualitas, aliud substantia, nec aliorum participatione uel diuina uel sapientia uel beata sunt. Ceterum dictus est in scripturis sanctis Spiritus sapientiae multiplex, eo quod multa in sese habeat; sed quae habet, haec et est, et ea omnia unus est. Neque enim multae, sed una sapientia est, in qua sunt infiniti quidam eique finiti thensauri rerum intellegibilium, in quibus sunt omnes inuisibiles adque incommutabiles rationes rerum etiam uisibilium et mutabilium, quae per ipsam factae sunt. Quoniam Deus non aliquid nesciens fecit, quod nec de quolibet homine artifice recte dici potest; porro si sciens fecit omnia, ea utique fecit quae nouerat.

ENGLISH

equal to the others, is equally incorrupt. For example, the hand is not more incorruptible than the finger just because the finger is smaller than the whole hand. So although the hand and the finger are unequal, the incorruptibility of the hand and of the finger is equal.

And so, although incorruptibility cannot be separated from an incorruptible body, the substance by which it is called a body is one thing, and the quality by which it is called incorruptible is another. So even in this case it is not what it has. The soul too, even if it is always wise, as it will be when it is set free for eternity, will be wise by sharing in the unchangeable wisdom, which is not what the soul itself is. For even if the air were never abandoned by the light poured into it, it would still be one thing, and the light by which it is illuminated another. I do not mean by this that the soul is air, as some have thought who were unable to conceive of an incorporeal nature.

But these things bear a certain likeness to those, even amid great dissimilarity. So it is not inappropriate to say that the incorporeal soul is illuminated by the incorporeal light of God's simple wisdom, just as the body of the air is illuminated by bodily light. And just as the air grows dark when this light leaves it (for what is called darkness in any bodily place is nothing but air lacking light), so the soul grows dark when deprived of the light of wisdom.

In this sense, then, the things that are primarily and truly divine are called simple: in them quality is not one thing and substance another, and they are not divine or wise or happy by sharing in something else. The holy Scriptures do, it is true, call the Spirit of wisdom "manifold," because it has many things in itself. But what it has, it also is, and it is all of them as one. For there are not many wisdoms but one wisdom. In it are certain treasures of intelligible things, infinite, yet finite to it. And in these treasures are all the invisible and unchangeable principles even of the visible and changeable things that were made through it. For God made nothing without knowing it, which cannot rightly be said even of any human craftsman; and if he made all things knowingly, he certainly made the things he already knew.[13]

LATIN	ENGLISH
Ex quo occurrit animo quiddam mirum, sed tamen uerum, quod iste mundus nobis notus esse non posset, nisi esset; Deo autem nisi notus esset, esse non posset..	From this a thought comes to mind that is astonishing, yet true: this world could not be known to us unless it existed, but it could not exist unless it were known to God.

WHETHER WE SHOULD BELIEVE THAT THE SPIRITS WHO DID NOT STAND FAST IN THE TRUTH SHARED IN THE HAPPINESS THE HOLY ANGELS HAVE ALWAYS HAD FROM THEIR BEGINNING

The fallen angels never shared the secure, eternal happiness of the holy angels.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.11 Quae cum ita sint, nullo modo quidem secundum spatium aliquod temporis prius erant spiritus illi tenebrae, quos angelos dicimus; sed simul ut facti sunt, lux facti sunt; non tamen tantum ita creati, ut quoquo modo essent et quoquo modo uiuerent; sed etiam inluminati, ut sapienter beateque uiuerent. Ab hac inluminatione auersi quidam angeli non obtinuerunt excellentiam sapientis beataeque uitae, quae procul dubio non nisi aeterna est aeternitatisque suae certa adque secura; sed rationalem uitam licet insipientem sic habent, ut eam non possint amittere, nec si uelint. Quatenus autem, antequam peccassent, illius sapientiae fuerint participes, definire quis potest? In eius tamen participatione aequales fuisse istos illis, qui propterea uere pleneque beati sunt, quoniam nequaquam de suae beatitudinis aeternitate falluntur, quo modo dicturi sumus?	Since this is so, those spirits we call angels were in no way darkness first, for some stretch of time. Rather, as soon as they were made, they were made light. Yet they were not simply created so as to exist in some way and live in some way. They were also enlightened so as to live wisely and happily. Some angels turned away from this illumination and did not attain the excellence of the wise and happy life, which beyond doubt can only be eternal, and certain and secure of its eternity. Still, they have a rational life, though a foolish one, and they have it in such a way that they cannot lose it, even if they want to. How far they shared in that wisdom before they sinned, who can determine? Yet how could we say that they shared in it equally with those who are truly and fully happy precisely because they are in no way deceived about the eternity of their happiness?
quando quidem si aequales in ea fuissent, etiam isti in eius aeternitate mansissent pariter beati, quia pariter certi. Neque enim sicut uita, quamdiucumque fuerit, ita aeterna uita ueraciter dici poterit, si finem habitura sit; si quidem uita tantummodo uiuendo, aeterna uero finem non habendo nominata est. Quapropter quamuis non, quidquid aeternum, continuo beatum sit (dicitur enim etiam poenalis ignis aeternus): tamen si uere perfecteque beata uita non nisi aeterna est, non erat talis istorum, quandoque desitura et propterea non aeterna, siue id scirent, siue nescientes aliud putarent; quia scientes timor, nescientes error beatos esse utique non sinebat.	For if they had shared in it equally, these too would have remained in its eternity, equally happy because equally certain. A life that is going to end, however long it lasts, can truly be called life, but it cannot truly be called eternal life. Life gets its name simply from living, but eternal life from having no end. So not everything eternal is thereby happy (for the fire of punishment too is called eternal). Yet if a truly and perfectly happy life can only be eternal, theirs was not such a life, since it was going to end at some point and so was not eternal. This holds whether they knew it or, not knowing it, thought otherwise. For if they knew, fear would certainly not let them be happy; if they did not know, error would not.
Si autem hoc ita nesciebant, ut falsis incertisue non fiderent, sed utrum sempiternum an quandoque finem habiturum esset bonum suum, in neutram partem firma adsensione ferrentur: ipsa de tanta felicitate cunctatio	But suppose their ignorance was of another kind. Suppose they did not trust in what was false or uncertain, but simply gave firm assent to neither side as to whether their good was everlasting or 13 Wisdom 7:22.

LATIN	ENGLISH
eam beatae uitae plenitudinem, quam in sanctis angelis esse credimus, non habebat. Neque enim beatae uitae uocabulum ita contrahimus ad quasdam significationis angustias, ut solum Deum dicamus beatum; qui tamen uere ita beatus est, ut maior beatitudo esse non possit, in cuius conparatione, quod angeli beati sunt summa quadam sua beatitudine, quanta esse in angelis potest, quid aut quantum est?	would one day come to an end. Even so, this very hesitation about so great a happiness lacked the fullness of the happy life which we believe exists in the holy angels. For we do not narrow the term "happy life" to so cramped a meaning as to say that God alone is happy. He is indeed so truly happy that no greater happiness can exist. Compared with him, the angels are happy with a supreme happiness of their own, as great as angels can have, but what is that, or how great is it?

A COMPARISON BETWEEN THE HAPPINESS OF THE RIGHTEOUS WHO HAVE NOT YET RECEIVED THE REWARD OF GOD'S PROMISE AND THAT OF THE FIRST HUMAN BEINGS IN PARADISE BEFORE SIN

Adam in paradise was happier in present joy, but the suffering righteous are happier in certain hope.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.12 Nec ipsos tantum, quod adtinet ad rationalem uel intellectualem creaturam, beatos nuncupandos putamus. Quis enim primos illos homines in paradiso negare audeat beatos fuisse ante peccatum, quamuis sua beatitudo quam diuturna uel utrum aeterna esset incertos (esset autem aeterna, nisi peccassent), cum hodie non inpudenter beatos uocemus, quos uidemus iuste ac pie cum spe futurae inmortalitatis hanc uitam ducere sine crimine uastante conscientiam, facile inpetrantes peccatis huius infirmitatis diuinam misericordiam. Qui licet de suae perseuerantiae praemio certi sint, de ipsa tamen perseuerantia sua reperiuntur incerti. Quis enim hominum se in actione prouectuque iustitiae perseueraturum usque in finem sciat, nisi aliqua reuelatione ab illo fiat certus, qui de hac re iusto latentique iudicio non omnes instruit, sed neminem fallit?	Nor do we think that, among rational or intellectual creatures, only the angels should be called happy. For who would dare to deny that those first human beings in paradise were happy before their sin? They were uncertain how long their happiness would last, or whether it would be eternal (and it would have been eternal, had they not sinned). Even today we are not being impudent when we call people happy whom we see living this life justly and devoutly in the hope of future immortality. They live without any crime laying waste their conscience, and they readily obtain God's mercy for the sins of this weakness. Though they are certain of the reward for their perseverance, they are found to be uncertain about their perseverance itself. For what human being can know that he will persevere to the end in doing justice and advancing in it, unless he is made certain by some revelation from him? By a just and hidden judgment, God does not inform everyone about this matter, but he deceives no one.
Quantum itaque pertinet ad delectationem praesentis boni, beatior erat primus homo in paradiso, quam quilibet iustus in hac infirmitate mortali; quantum autem ad spem futuri, beatior quilibet in quibuslibet cruciatibus corporis, cui non opinione, sed certa ueritate manifestum est, sine fine se habiturum omni molestia carentem societatem angelorum in participatione summi Dei, quam erat ille homo sui casus incertus in magna illa felicitate paradisi.	So as far as delight in present good is concerned, the first man in paradise was happier than any just person in this mortal weakness. But as far as hope for the future is concerned, any person in any bodily torments is happier than that man was in the great happiness of paradise, uncertain as he was about his own fall. For it is plain to such a person, not by opinion but by sure truth, that he will have the company of the angels without end, free of all trouble, sharing in the supreme God.

WHETHER ALL THE ANGELS WERE CREATED IN THE SAME HAPPINESS, SO THAT THOSE WHO FELL COULD NOT KNOW THEY WOULD FALL, AND THOSE WHO STOOD RECEIVED FOREKNOWLEDGE OF THEIR PERSEVERANCE AFTER THE OTHERS FELL

The holy angels are certain of their eternal happiness, a certainty the fallen never had.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.13	Quocirca cuiuis iam non difficulter occurrit utroque coniuncto effici beatitudinem, quam recto proposito intellectualis natura desiderat, hoc est, ut et bono incommutabili, quod Deus est, sine ulla molestia perfruatur et in eo se in aeternum esse mansurum nec ulla dubitatione cunctetur nec ullo errore fallatur. Hanc habere angelos lucis pia fide credimus; hanc nec antequam caderent habuisse angelos peccatores, qui sua prauitate illa luce priuati sunt, consequenti ratione colligimus; habuisse tamen aliquam, etsi non praesciam, beatitudinem, si uitam egerunt ante peccatum, profecto credendi sunt.	Hence anyone can now easily see that the happiness which an intellectual nature rightly aims at and desires comes from the two together. It must enjoy the unchangeable good, which is God, without any trouble. And it must neither hesitate in any doubt nor be deceived by any error about its remaining in him forever. That the angels of light have this happiness we believe with devout faith. That the sinning angels, who were deprived of that light by their own perversity, did not have it even before they fell, we infer by logical consequence. Yet if they lived any life before their sin, they must certainly be believed to have had some happiness, even if it was not a happiness with foreknowledge.
	Aut si durum uidetur, quando facti sunt angeli, alios credere ita factos ut non acciperent praescientiam uel perseuerantiae uel casus sui, alios autem ita ut ueritate certissima aeternitatem suae beatitudinis nossent, sed aequalis felicitatis omnes ab initio creati sunt, et ita fuerunt, donec isti, qui nunc mali sunt, ab illo bonitatis lumine sua uoluntate cecidissent: procul dubio multo est durius nunc putare angelos sanctos aeternae suae beatitudinis incertos, et ipsos de semet ipsis ignorare, quod nos de illis per scripturas sanctas nosse potuimus. Quis enim catholicus Christianus ignorat nullum nouum diabolum ex bonis angelis ulterius futurum, sicut nec istum in societatem bonorum angelorum ulterius rediturum? Veritas quippe in euangelio sanctis fidelibusque promittit, quod erunt aequales angelis Dei; quibus etiam promittitur, quod ibunt in uitam aeternam.	Or suppose it seems harsh to believe that, when the angels were made, some were made so as not to receive foreknowledge either of their perseverance or of their fall, while others were made so as to know with the surest truth that their happiness was eternal. Suppose instead that all were created from the beginning with equal happiness, and remained so until those who are now evil fell from that light of goodness by their own will. Even so, it is without doubt far harsher to think now that the holy angels are uncertain of their eternal happiness, and that they do not know about themselves what we have been able to know about them through the holy Scriptures. For what catholic Christian does not know that no new devil will ever again arise from among the good angels, just as this one will never return to the fellowship of the good angels? Indeed, the Truth promises in the gospel to the holy and faithful that they will be equal to the angels of God; and it is also promised to them that they will go into eternal life.[14]
	Porro autem si nos certi sumus numquam nos ex illa inmortali felicitate casuros, illi uero si certi non sunt, iam potiores, non aequales eis erimus. Sed quia nequaquam Veritas fallit et aequales eis erimus, profecto etiam ipsi certi sunt suae felicitatis aeternae. Cuius illi alii quia certi	Further, if we are certain that we will never fall from that immortal happiness, but they are not certain, then we shall be not their equals but their superiors. But since the Truth in no way deceives, and we shall be their equals, they too are surely 14 "The Truth" is Christ. See Matthew 22:30 and Luke 20:36 (equal to the angels), and Matthew 25:46 (eternal life).

LATIN

non fuerunt (non enim erat eorum aeterna felicitas cuius certi essent, quae finem fuerat habitura), restat, ut aut inpares fuerint, aut, si pares fuerunt, post istorum ruinam illis certa scientia suae sempiternae felicitatis accesserit.

Nisi forte quis dicat id, quod Dominus ait de diabolo in euangelio: Ille homicida erat ab initio et in ueritate non stetit, sic esse accipiendum, ut non solum homicida fuerit ab initio, id est initio humani generis, ex quo utique homo factus est, quem decipiendo posset occidere, uerum etiam ab initio suae conditionis in ueritate non steterit et ideo numquam beatus cum sanctis angelis fuerit, suo recusans esse subditus creatori et sua per superbiam uelut priuata potestate laetatus, ac per hoc falsus et fallax, quia nec quisquam potestatem Omnipotentis euadit, et qui per piam subiectionem noluit tenere quod uere est, adfectat per superbam elationem simulare quod non est, ut sic intellegatur etiam quod beatus Iohannes apostolus ait: Ab initio diabolus peccat, hoc est, ex quo creatus est, iustitiam recusauit, quam nisi pia Deoque subdita uoluntas habere non posset.

Huic sententiae quisquis adquiescit, non cum illis haereticis sapit, id est Manichaeis, et si quae aliae pestes ita sentiunt, quod suam quandam propriam tamquam ex aduerso quodam principio diabolus habeat naturam mali; qui tanta uanitate desipiunt, ut, cum uerba ista euangelica in auctoritate nobiscum habeant, non adtendant non dixisse Dominum: A ueritate alienus fuit; sed: In ueritate non stetit, ubi a ueritate lapsum intellegi uoluit, in qua utique si stetisset, eius particeps factus beatus cum sanctis angelis permaneret.

ENGLISH

certain of their eternal happiness. Those others were not certain of it, for their happiness, of which they might have been certain, was not eternal, since it was going to have an end. It follows, then, either that the two groups were unequal, or, if they were equal, that after the fall of the wicked ones certain knowledge of their own everlasting happiness came to the good.

Unless perhaps someone says that what the Lord said of the devil in the gospel, "He was a murderer from the beginning, and did not stand in the truth," is to be understood in this way. He was a murderer not only from the beginning, that is, from the beginning of the human race, from the time when a human being was made whom he could kill by deceiving. He also did not stand in the truth from the beginning of his own creation, and therefore was never happy with the holy angels. On this view, he refused to be subject to his Creator, and through pride rejoiced in his own power as if it were his private possession. And so he was false and deceiving, for no one escapes the power of the Almighty, and he who would not hold fast through devout submission to what truly is, aspires through proud self-exaltation to feign what is not. In this way we would also understand what the blessed apostle John says: "The devil sins from the beginning." That is, from the moment he was created he refused justice, which only a will devoutly subject to God could have.[15]

Whoever accepts this view does not think with those heretics, the Manichaeans, or with any other plagues that hold the same opinion: that the devil has a nature of evil all his own, as if derived from some opposing principle. These people are so foolish in their emptiness that, although they accept the authority of these words of the gospel as we do, they do not notice that the Lord did not say, "He was a stranger to the truth," but, "He did not stand in the truth." By this he meant us to understand a fall from the truth. For if he had stood in it, he would have become a partaker of it and would have remained happy with the holy angels.[16]

15 John 8:44; 1 John 3:8.

16 The Manichaeans followed the dualist religion of Mani (3rd century AD), which held that good and evil are two eternal principles; Augustine belonged to it for about nine years in his youth.

IN WHAT SENSE IT IS SAID OF THE DEVIL THAT HE DID NOT STAND FAST IN THE TRUTH, BECAUSE THE TRUTH IS NOT IN HIM

The devil does not have the truth in him because he did not stand in it, not the reverse.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.14	Subiecit autem indicium, quasi quaesissemus, unde ostendatur, quod in ueritate non steterit, adque ait: Quia non est ueritas in eo. Esset autem in eo, si in illa stetisset. Locutione autem dictum est minus usitata. Sic enim uidetur sonare: In ueritate non stetit, quia ueritas non est in eo, tamquam ea sit causa, ut in ueritate non steterit, quod in eo ueritas non sit; cum potius ea sit causa, ut in eo ueritas non sit, quod in ueritate non stetit. Ista locutio est et in psalmo: Ego clamaui, quoniam exaudisti me Deus; cum dicendum fuisse uideatur: Exaudisti me Deus, quoniam clamaui.	He then added a proof, as if we had asked how it can be shown that he did not stand in the truth, and said: "Because there is no truth in him." But there would be truth in him if he had stood in it. This is said in a less usual turn of phrase. For it seems to mean: "He did not stand in the truth, because the truth is not in him," as if the reason he did not stand in the truth were that the truth is not in him. In fact, rather, the reason the truth is not in him is that he did not stand in the truth. The same turn of phrase occurs in a psalm: "I have cried out, because you heard me, O God," when it seems it should have been said: "You heard me, O God, because I cried out."[17]
	Sed cum dixisset: Ego clamaui, tamquam ab eo quaereretur, unde se clamasse monstraret, ab effectu exauditionis Dei clamoris sui ostendit affectum; tamquam diceret: Hinc ostendo clamasse me, quoniam exaudisti me.	But having said, "I have cried out," as if he were being asked how he could show that he had cried out, he shows the feeling behind his cry from its effect, God's hearing of it, as if to say: "This is how I show that I cried out: you heard me."

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE SAYING, "THE DEVIL SINS FROM THE BEGINNING"

The devil was created good; he sins "from the beginning" of his sin, which began with his pride.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.15	Illud etiam, quod ait de diabolo Iohannes: Ab initio diabolus peccat, non intellegunt, si natura talis est, nullo modo esse peccatum. Sed quid respondetur propheticis testimoniis, siue quod ait Esaias sub figurata persona principis Babyloniae diabolum notans: Quo modo cecidit Lucifer, qui mane oriebatur; siue quod Hiezechiel: In deliciis paradisi Dei fuisti, omni lapide pretioso ornatus es? Ubi intellegitur fuisse aliquando sine peccato. Nam expressius ei paulo post dicitur: Ambulasti in diebus tuis sine uitio.	As for what John says of the devil, "The devil sins from the beginning," they do not understand that, if this is his nature, it is in no way sin. But what answer can be given to the testimonies of the prophets? Isaiah, referring to the devil under the figure of the prince of Babylon, says: "How has Lucifer fallen, who used to rise in the morning!" And Ezekiel says: "You were in the delights of the paradise of God; you were adorned with every precious stone." Here he is understood to have been at one time without sin. For a little later it is said to him more explicitly: "You walked in your days without fault."[18]
	Quae si aliter conuenientius intellegi nequeunt, oportet etiam illud, quod dictum est: In ueritate non stetit, sic accipiamus, quod in ueritate fuerit, sed non permanserit; et illud, quod ab initio diabolus peccat, non ab initio, ex	If these words cannot be understood otherwise more fittingly, then we must also take the words "He did not stand in the truth" to mean that he was in the truth but did not remain in it. And the state-

17 Psalm 16:6 (17:6 in most English Bibles).
18 Isaiah 14:12; Ezekiel 28:13 and 28:15. Lucifer ("light-bringer") is the Latin name of the morning star.

LATIN

quo creatus est, peccare putandus est, sed ab initio peccati, quod ab ipsius superbia coeperit esse peccatum. Nec illud, quod scriptum est in libro Iob, cum de diabolo sermo esset: Hoc est initium figmenti Domini, quod fecit ad inludendum ab angelis suis (cui consonare uidetur et psalmus, ubi legitur: Draco hic, quem finxisti ad inludendum ei), sic intellegendum est, ut existimemus talem ab initio creatum, cui ab angelis inluderetur, sed in hac poena post peccatum ordinatum.

Initium ergo eius figmentum est Domini; non enim est ulla natura etiam in extremis infimisque bestiolis, quam non ille constituit, a quo est omnis modus, omnis species, omnis ordo, sine quibus nihil rerum inueniri uel cogitari potest; quanto magis angelica creatura, quae omnia cetera, quae Deus condidit, naturae dignitate praecedit!

ENGLISH

ment that the devil sins from the beginning must be taken to mean not from the beginning when he was created, but from the beginning of sin, since sin first came into being through his pride. Then there is what is written in the book of Job, where the devil is spoken of: "This is the beginning of the Lord's handiwork, which he made to be mocked by his angels." The psalm also seems to agree with it, where we read: "This dragon, whom you formed to make sport of him." Nor is this to be understood as though he was created from the beginning as one to be mocked by the angels. Rather, he was assigned to this punishment after his sin.[19]

His beginning, then, is the Lord's handiwork. For there is no nature, even among the lowest and smallest creatures, that was not established by him from whom comes all measure, all form, all order, without which nothing at all can be found or even conceived. How much more is this true of the angelic creation, which surpasses all the other things God has made in the dignity of its nature!

THE RANKS AND DIFFERENCES OF CREATURES, WHICH PRACTICAL USE WEIGHS ONE WAY AND THE ORDER OF REASON ANOTHER

Nature ranks living over lifeless and rational over irrational; human valuation often ranks things by usefulness.

LATIN

11.16 In his enim, quae quoquo modo sunt et non sunt quod Deus est a quo facta sunt, praeponuntur uiuentia non uiuentibus, sicut ea, quae habent uim gignendi uel etiam adpetendi, his, quae isto motu carent; et in his, quae uiuunt, praeponuntur sentientia non sentientibus, sicut arboribus animalia; et in his, quae sentiunt, praeponuntur intellegentia non intellegentibus, sicut homines pecoribus; et in his, quae intellegunt, praeponuntur inmortalia mortalibus, sicut angeli hominibus. Sed ita praeponuntur naturae ordine; est autem alius adque alius pro suo cuiusque usu aestimationis modus, quo fit, ut quaedam sensu carentia quibusdam sentientibus praeponamus, in tantum, ut si potestas esset ea prorsus de natura rerum auferre uellemus, siue quem in ea locum habeant ignorantes, siue etiamsi sciamus nostris ea commodis postponentes.

ENGLISH

Among the things that exist in any way and are not what God is, by whom they were made, living things are ranked above non-living ones, just as things that have the power of reproducing, or even of desiring, are ranked above those that lack this movement. Among living things, those that have sensation are ranked above those that do not, as animals above trees. Among those that have sensation, those that have understanding are ranked above those that do not, as human beings above cattle. And among those that have understanding, the immortal are ranked above the mortal, as angels above human beings. But this is how they are ranked in the order of nature. There is also a quite different standard of valuation, according to the use each thing has for us. By it we rank certain things that lack sensation above certain things that have it, so much so that, if we had the power, we would want to remove the latter from the natural world altogether. We do so either because we 19 Job 40:14 (40:19 in most English Bibles); Psalm 103:26 (104:26 in most English Bibles).

LATIN

ENGLISH

do not know what place they hold in it, or because, even if we do know, we put them below our own convenience.

Quis enim non domi suae panem habere quam mures, nummos quam pulices malit? Sed quid mirum, cum in ipsorum etiam hominum aestimatione, quorum certe natura tantae est dignitatis, plerumque carius conparetur equus quam seruus, gemma quam famula? Ita libertate iudicandi plurimum distat ratio considerantis a necessitate indigentis seu uoluptate cupientis, cum ista quid per se ipsum in rerum gradibus pendat, necessitas autem quid propter quid expetat cogitat, et ista quid uerum luci mentis appareat, uoluptas uero quid iucundum corporis sensibus blandiatur expectat. Sed tantum ualet in naturis rationalibus quoddam ueluti pondus uoluntatis et amoris, ut, cum ordine naturae angeli hominibus, tamen lege iustitiae boni homines malis angelis praeferantur.

For who would not rather have bread in his house than mice, or money than fleas? But why wonder at this, when even in the valuation of human beings themselves, whose nature is certainly of such great dignity, a horse is often bought for a higher price than a slave, or a jewel than a female slave? Thus, in its freedom of judgment, the reasoning of one who reflects is far removed from the necessity of one in need or the pleasure of one who desires. Reason considers what each thing weighs in itself in the scale of being, while necessity considers what it needs for the sake of what. Reason looks to what appears true to the light of the mind, while pleasure looks for what is agreeable and flatters the bodily senses. But in rational natures a kind of weight, so to speak, of will and love has such power that, although in the order of nature angels rank above human beings, yet by the law of justice good human beings rank above evil angels.

THAT THE FAULT OF WICKEDNESS IS NOT NATURE BUT AGAINST NATURE, AND ITS CAUSE IN SINNING IS NOT THE CREATOR BUT THE WILL

A fault harms nature and so proves the nature good; God uses even the devil's evil will well.

LATIN

ENGLISH

11.17 Propter naturam igitur, non propter malitiam diaboli, dictum recte intellegimus: Hoc est initium figmenti Domini. Quia sine dubio, ubi esset uitium malitiae, natura non uitiata praecessit. Vitium autem ita contra naturam est, ut non possit nisi nocere naturae. Non itaque esset uitium recedere a Deo, nisi naturae, cuius id uitium est, potius conpeteret esse cum Deo. Quapropter etiam uoluntas mala grande testimonium est naturae bonae. Sed Deus sicut naturarum bonarum optimus creator est, ita malarum uoluntatum iustissimus ordinator, ut, cum illae male utuntur naturis bonis, ipse bene utatur etiam uoluntatibus malis. Itaque fecit, ut diabolus institutione illius bonus, uoluntate sua malus, in inferioribus ordinatus inludereturab angelis eius, id est, ut prosint tentationes eius sanctis, quibus eas obesse desiderat.

It is therefore with reference to the devil's nature, not his malice, that we rightly understand the words: "This is the beginning of the Lord's handiwork." For without doubt, wherever there is the fault of malice, an unflawed nature came first. And a fault is so contrary to nature that it can do nothing but harm nature. So departing from God would not be a fault, unless being with God were rather what befits the nature to which the fault belongs. Hence even an evil will is strong evidence of a good nature. But God, as he is the supremely good Creator of good natures, is also the most just orderer of evil wills: while they use good natures badly, he uses even evil wills well. Therefore he brought it about that the devil, good by God's making and evil by his own will, should be placed in a lower rank and mocked by God's angels. That is, his temptations should benefit the saints, whom he wants them to harm.

Et quoniam Deus, cum eum conderet, futurae malignitatis eius non erat utique ignarus et praeuidebat quae bona de

And since God, when he created him, was certainly not unaware of his future malice, and

LATIN	ENGLISH
malo eius esset ipse facturus: propterea psalmus ait: Draco hic, quem finxisti ad inludendum ei, ut in eo ipso quod eum finxit, licet per suam bonitatem bonum, iam per suam praescientiam praeparasse intellegatur quo modo illo uteretur et malo.	foresaw what good things he himself would bring out of his evil, the psalm says: "This dragon, whom you formed to make sport of him." We are thus to understand that in the very act of forming him, good as he was through God's goodness, God had already prepared through his foreknowledge how he would make use of him even when evil.

THE BEAUTY OF THE UNIVERSE, MADE MORE BRILLIANT BY GOD'S ORDERING EVEN THROUGH THE OPPOSITION OF CONTRARIES

God orders the ages like a poem adorned with antitheses, setting good against evil.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.18 Neque enim Deus ullum, non dico angelorum, sed uel hominum crearet, quem malum futurum esse praescisset, nisi pariter nosset quibus eos bonorum usibus commodaret adque ita ordinem saeculorum tamquam pulcherrimum carmen etiam ex quibusdam quasi antithetis honestaret. Antitheta enim quae appellantur in ornamentis elocutionis sunt decentissima, quae Latine uel appellentur obposita, uel, quod expressius dicitur, contraposita. Non est aput nos huius uocabuli; consuetudo, cum tamen eisdem ornamentis locutionis etiam sermo Latinus utatur, immo linguae omnium gentium.	For God would never create anyone, I do not say any angel, but even any human being, whom he foreknew would be evil, unless he equally knew to what good uses he would put them. In this way he would adorn the order of the ages, like a most beautiful poem, with what might be called antitheses. For what are called antitheses are among the most elegant ornaments of style. In Latin they might be called opposita [things set against each other], or, more expressively, contraposita [things set over against each other]. This term is not in common use among us, although Latin speech also uses these same ornaments of style, and indeed so do the languages of all nations.
His antithetis et Paulus apostolus in secunda ad Corinthios epistula illum locum suauiter explicat, ubi dicit: Per arma iustitiae dextra et sinistra: per gloriam et ignobilitatem, per infamiam et bonam famam; ut seductores et ueraces, ut qui ignoramur et cognoscimur; quasi morientes, et ecce uiuimus, ut coherciti et non mortificati; ut tristes, semper autem gaudentes; sicut egeni, multos autem ditantes; tamquam nihil habentes et omnia possidentes. Sicut ergo ista contraria contrariis obposita sermonis pulchritudinem reddunt: ita quadam non uerborum, sed rerum eloquentia contrariorum obpositione saeculi pulchritudo conponitur. Apertissime hoc positum est in libro ecclesiastico isto modo: Contra malum bonum est et contra mortem uita; sic contra pium peccator. Et sic intuere in omnia opera Altissimi, bina bina, unum contra unum.	By these antitheses the apostle Paul, too, in his second letter to the Corinthians, gracefully unfolds the passage where he says: "By the weapons of righteousness on the right hand and on the left: through glory and dishonor, through ill repute and good repute; as deceivers and yet truthful, as unknown and yet well known; as dying, and see, we live; as chastened and yet not put to death; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing everything." Just as these opposites, set against opposites, produce beauty of speech, so the beauty of the world is composed by the opposition of contraries, in a kind of eloquence not of words but of things. This is put most plainly in the book of Ecclesiasticus, in this way: "Good is set against evil, and life against death; so the sinner against the godly. And so look upon all the works of the Most High: two by two, one against the other."[20] 20 2 Corinthians 6:7–10; Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 33:14–15.

HOW WE SHOULD UNDERSTAND THE WORDS, "GOD DIVIDED THE LIGHT FROM THE DARKNESS"

"God divided the light from the darkness" can be read as the separation of holy from fallen angels.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.19	Quamuis itaque diuini sermonis obscuritas etiam ad hoc sit utilis, quod plures sententias ueritatis parit et in lucem notitiae producit, dum alius eum sic, alius sic intellegit (ita tamen ut, quod in obscuro loco intellegitur, uel adtestatione rerum manifestarum uel aliis locis minime dubiis adseratur: siue, cum multa tractantur, ad id quoque perueniatur, quod sensit ille qui scripsit, siue id lateat, sed ex occasione tractandae profundae obscuritatis alia quaedam uera dicantur): non mihi uidetur ab operibus Dei absurda sententia, si, cum lux prima illa facta est, angeli creati intelleguntur, inter sanctos angelos et inmundos fuisse discretum, ubi dictum est: Et diuisit Deus inter lucem et tenebras; et uocauit Deus lucem diem et tenebras uocauit noctem.	The obscurity of the divine word is indeed useful even in this respect: it gives birth to many true meanings and brings them into the light of knowledge, as one person understands it one way and another another. This holds provided that what is understood in an obscure passage is supported either by the testimony of plain facts or by other passages that are not in the least doubtful. Then either, as many views are discussed, we arrive at what the writer himself meant, or that remains hidden, but other true things are said on the occasion of treating a deep obscurity. That said, it does not seem to me an opinion out of keeping with the works of God if, taking the angels to have been created when that first light was made, we understand that a separation was made between the holy and the unclean angels where it is said: "And God divided the light from the darkness; and God called the light day, and the darkness he called night."[21]
	Solus quippe ille ista discernere potuit, qui potuit etiam priusquam caderent praescire casuros et priuatos lumine ueritatis in tenebrosa superbia remansuros. Nam inter istum nobis notissimum diem et noctem, id est inter hanc lucem et has tenebras, uulgatissima sensibus nostris luminaria caeli ut diuiderent imperauit: Fiant, inquit, luminaria in firmamento caeli, ut luceant super terram et diuidant inter diem et noctem; et paulo post: Et fecit, inquit, Deus duo luminaria magna, luminare maius in principia diei, et luminare minus in principia noctis, et stellas; et posuit illa Deus in firmamento caeli lucere super terram et praeesse diei et nocti et diuidere inter lucem et tenebras.	For only he could make this distinction who could also foreknow, even before they fell, that they would fall and, deprived of the light of truth, would remain in the darkness of pride. Now, between the day and night so familiar to us, that is, between this light and this darkness, he commanded the lights of the sky, so well known to our senses, to divide: "Let there be lights," he says, "in the firmament of the sky, to shine upon the earth and to divide between day and night." And a little later: "And God made," it says, "two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night, and the stars; and God set them in the firmament of the sky to shine upon the earth, and to govern day and night, and to divide between light and darkness."[22]
	Inter illam uero lucem, quae sancta societas angelorum est inlustratione ueritatis intellegibiliter fulgens, et ei contrarias tenebras, id est malorum angelorum auersorum a luce iustitiae taeterrimas mentes, ipse diuidere potuit, cui etiam futurum non naturae, sed uoluntatis malum occultum aut incertum esse non potuit.	But between that light, which is the holy fellowship of the angels shining with the intelligible illumination of truth, and the darkness opposed to it, that is, the foul minds of the evil angels turned away from the light of justice, he alone could divide. For to him even a future evil, an evil not of 21 Genesis 1:4–5.

22 Genesis 1:14 and 1:16–18.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	nature but of will, could be neither hidden nor uncertain.

THE WORDS SPOKEN AFTER THE SEPARATION OF LIGHT AND DARKNESS, "AND GOD SAW THE LIGHT, THAT IT WAS GOOD"

God called the light good but not that darkness, since the fallen angels' evil is their own fault.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.20 Denique nec illud est praetereundum silentio, quod, ubi dixit Deus: Fiat lux, et facta est lux, continuo subiunctum est: Et uidit Deus lucem quia bona est; non postea quam separauit inter lucem et tenebras et uocauit lucem diem et tenebras noctem, ne simul cum luce etiam talibus tenebris testimonium placiti sui perhibuisse uideretur. Nam ubi tenebrae inculpabiles sunt, inter quas et lucem istam his oculis conspicuam luminaria caeli diuidunt, non ante, sed post infertur: Et uidit Deus quia bonum est. Posuit illa, inquit, in firmamento caeli lucere super terram et praeesse diei et nocti et separare inter lucem et tenebras. Et uidit Deus quia bonum est. Utrumque placuit, quia utrumque sine peccato est. Ubi autem dixit Deus: Fiat lux, et facta est lux.	Finally, we must not pass over in silence the fact that, where God said, "Let there be light," and there was light, there was added at once: "And God saw the light, that it was good." This was not said after he separated the light from the darkness and called the light day and the darkness night, lest he should seem to have given the testimony of his approval to such darkness along with the light. For where the darkness is blameless, the darkness that the lights of the sky divide from this light visible to our eyes, the words "And God saw that it was good" are added not before but after: "He set them," it says, "in the firmament of the sky to shine upon the earth, and to govern day and night, and to separate light from darkness. And God saw that it was good." Both pleased him, because both are without sin. But where God said, "Let there be light," and there was light—[23]
Et uidit Deus lucem quia bona est; et postmodum infertur: Et separauit Deus inter lucem et tenebras; et uocauit Deus lucem diem et tenebras uocauit noctem: non hoc loco additum est: Et uidit Deus quia bonum est, ne utrumque appellaretur bonum, cum esset horum alterum malum, uitio proprio, non natura. Et ideo sola ibi lux placuit Conditori; tenebrae autem angelicae, etsi fuerant ordinandae, non tamen fuerant adprobandae.	"And God saw the light, that it was good"; and afterward it is added, "And God separated the light from the darkness; and God called the light day, and the darkness he called night"—at this point the words "And God saw that it was good" were not added, so that both should not be called good, when one of them was evil, through its own fault and not by nature. And so, there, the light alone pleased the Creator; the angelic darkness, though it was to be given its place in the order, was not to be approved.

GOD'S ETERNAL AND UNCHANGEABLE KNOWLEDGE AND WILL, BY WHICH EVERYTHING HE MADE PLEASED HIM AS SOMETHING TO BE MADE, JUST AS IT PLEASED HIM WHEN MADE

God did not learn his works were good once made; he sees all times in one eternal present.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.21 Quid est enim aliud intellegendum in eo, quod per omnia dicitur: Vidit Deus quia bonum est, nisi operis adprobatio secundum artem facti, quae sapientia Dei est? Deus autem usque adeo non, cum factum est, tunc didicit	For what else are we to understand by the phrase repeated throughout, "God saw that it was good," but approval of the work as made according to the art that is the wisdom of God? God was so far from bonum, ut nihil eorum fieret, si ei fuisset incognitum. Dum ergo uidet quia bonum est, quod, nisi uidisset antequam fieret, non utique fieret: docet bonum esse, non discit. Et Plato quidem plus ausus est dicere, elatum esse scilicet Deum gaudio mundi uniuersitate perfecta.

23 Genesis 1:3.

LATIN

Ubi et ipse non usque adeo desipiebat, ut putaret Deum sui operis nouitate factum beatiorem; sed sic ostendere uoluit artifici suo placuisse iam factum, quod placuerat in arte faciendum; non quod ullo modo Dei scientia uarietur, ut aliud in ea faciant quae nondum sunt, aliud quae iam sunt, aliud quae fuerunt; non enim more nostro ille uel quod futurum est prospicit, uel quod praesens est aspicit, uel quod praeteritum est respicit; sed alio modo quodam a nostrarum cogitationum consuetudine longe alteque diuerso.

Ille quippe non ex hoc in illud cogitatione mutata, sed omnino incommutabiliter uidet; ita ut illa quidem, quae temporaliter fiunt, et futura nondum sint et praesentia iam sint et praeterita iam non sint, ipse uero haec omnia stabili ac sempiterna praesentia conprehendat; nec aliter oculis, aliter mente; non enim ex animo constat et corpore; nec aliter nunc et aliter antea et aliter postea; quoniam non sicut nostra, ita eius quoque scientia trium temporum, praesentis uidelicet et praeteriti uel futuri, uarietate mutatur, aput quem non est inmutatio nec momenti obumbratio. Neque enim eius intentio de cogitatione in cogitationem transit, in cuius incorporeo contuitu simul adsunt cuncta quae nouit; quoniam tempora ita nouit nullis suis temporalibus notionibus, quem ad modum temporalia mouet nullis suis temporalibus motibus.

Ibi ergo uidit bonum esse quod fecit, ubi bonum esse uidit ut faceret; nec quia factum uidit scientiam duplicauit uel ex aliqua parte auxit, tamquam minoris scientiae fuerit priusquam faceret quod uideret, qui tam perfecte non operaretur, nisi tam perfecta scientia, cui nihil ex eius operibus adderetur. Quapropter, si tantummodo nobis insinuandum esset quis fecerit lucem, sufficeret dicere, learning that it was good only once it was made that none of these things would have been made if it had been unknown to him. So when he sees that it is good, a thing that would certainly not have been made had he not seen it before it was made, he is teaching that it is good, not learning it. Plato, indeed, ventured to say more: that God was carried away with joy when the universe was completed.[24]

ENGLISH

Even he was not so foolish as to think that God was made happier by the novelty of his work. He meant rather to show that what had pleased its Maker in his art as something to be made pleased him now that it was made. Not that God's knowledge varies in any way, so that things not yet in existence, things now existing, and things that have been produce different effects in it. For he does not, as we do, look ahead to what is future, look at what is present, or look back at what is past, but sees in another way, far and deeply different from the habits of our thinking.

For he sees, not by shifting his thought from this to that, but altogether unchangeably. Thus, while the things that come to be in time, if future, are not yet, if present, already are, and if past, are no longer, he himself comprehends all of them in a stable and eternal present. Nor does he see in one way with the eyes and in another with the mind, for he is not made up of soul and body; nor in one way now, another before, and another after. For his knowledge, unlike ours, does not change with the variety of the three times, present, past, and future, since with him "there is no change, nor shadow of a moment." Nor does his attention pass from thought to thought; in his incorporeal gaze all that he knows is present at once. For he knows times with no temporal notions of his own, just as he moves temporal things with no temporal movements of his own.[25]

So he saw that what he made was good in the same place where he saw that it was good to make it. Nor, because he saw it made, did he double his knowledge or increase it in any part, as though he had less knowledge before he made what he saw. He would not work so perfectly except with knowledge so perfect that nothing could be added to it 24 Plato, Timaeus 37c.

25 James 1:17.

LATIN	ENGLISH
fecit Deus lucem; si autem non solum quis fecerit, uerum etiam per quid fecerit, satis esset ita enuntiari: Et dixit Deus: Fiat lux, et facta est lux; ut non tantum Deum, sed etiam per Verbum lucem fecisse nossemus. Quia uero tria quaedam maxime scienda de creatura nobis oportuit intimari, quis eam fecerit, per quid fecerit, quare fecerit: Dixit Deus, inquit: Fiat lux, et facta est lux.	from his works. Therefore, if we only needed to be told who made the light, it would be enough to say, "God made the light." If we needed to know not only who made it but also through what he made it, it would be enough to state it thus: "And God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light," so that we would know not only that God made the light, but also that he made it through the Word. But since three things above all, which we most need to know about a creature, had to be made known to us—who made it, through what he made it, and why he made it—Scripture says: "God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light."
Et uidit Deus lucem quia bona est. Si ergo quaerimus, quis fecerit: Deus est; si per quid fecerit: Dixit: Fiat, et facta est; si quare fecerit: Quia bona est. Nec auctor est excellentior Deo, nec ars efficacior Dei uerbo, nec causa melior quam ut bonum crearetur a bono. Hanc etiam Plato causam condendi mundi iustissimam dicit, ut a bono Deo bona opera fierent; siue ista legerit, siue ab his qui legerant forte cognouerit; siue acerrimo ingenio inuisibilia Dei per ea, quae facta sunt, intellecta conspexerit, siue ab his qui ista conspexerant et ipse didicerit.	"And God saw the light, that it was good." If, then, we ask who made it: it is God. If through what he made it: he said, "Let it be," and it was. If why he made it: because it is good. There is no author more excellent than God, no art more effective than God's Word, no cause better than that something good should be created by one who is good. Plato, too, says that this is the most just cause of the world's creation: that good works should be made by a good God. Perhaps he read these words, or perhaps he learned them from those who had read them. Or perhaps, by his very keen intellect, he perceived "the invisible things of God, understood through the things that are made," or else learned them himself from those who had perceived them.[26]

THOSE WHO DISLIKE SOME THINGS IN A UNIVERSE OF THINGS WELL MADE BY A GOOD CREATOR, AND THINK SOME NATURE EVIL

Heretics who find fault with harmful creatures overlook their place in the beauty of the whole.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.22 Hanc tamen causam, id est ad bona creanda bonitatem Dei, hanc, inquam, causam tam iustam adque idoneam, quae diligenter considerata et pie cogitata omnes controuersias quaerentium mundi originem terminat, quidam haeretici non uiderunt, quia egenam carnis huius fragilemque mortalitatem iam de iusto supplicio uenientem, dum ei non conueniunt, plurima offendunt, sicut ignis aut frigus aut fera bestia aut quid eius modi; nec adtendunt, quam uel in suis locis naturisque uigeant pulchroque ordine disponantur, quantumque uniuersitati rerum pro sui portione decoris tamquam in communem rem publicam conferant uel nobis ipsis, si eis	Yet this cause, the goodness of God as the reason for creating good things, is so just and so fitting that, when carefully considered and devoutly pondered, it ends all the controversies of those who inquire into the origin of the world. And this cause, I say, certain heretics have failed to see. For a great many things harm the needy and fragile mortality of this flesh of ours, a mortality that already comes from just punishment, because they do not suit it: fire, for instance, or cold, or a wild beast, or something of that kind. These heretics do not notice how such things flourish in 26 Plato, Timaeus 29e; Romans 1:20.

LATIN

congruenter adque scienter utamur, commoditatis adtribuant, ita ut uenena ipsa, quae per inconuenientiam perniciosa sunt, conuenienter adhibita in salubria medicamenta uertantur; quamque a contrario etiam haec, quibus delectantur, sicut cibus et potus et ista lux, inmoderato et inopportuno usu noxia sentiantur.

Unde nos admonet diuina prouidentia non res insipienter uituperare, sed utilitatem rerum diligenter inquirere, et ubi nostrum ingenium uel infirmitas deficit, ita credere occultam, sicut erant quaedam, quae uix potuimus inuenire; quia et ipsa utilitatis occultatio aut humilitatis exercitatio est aut elationis adtritio; cum omnino natura nulla sit malum nomenque hoc non sit nisi priuationis boni.

Sed a terrenis usque ad caelestia et a uisibilibus usque ad inuisibilia sunt aliis alia bona meliora, ad hoc inaequalia, ut essent omnia; Deus autem ita est artifex magnus in magnis, ut minor non sit in paruis; quae parua non sua granditate (nam nulla est), sed artificis sapientia metienda sunt; sicut in specie uisibilis hominis, si unum radatur supercilium, quam propemodum nihil corpori, et quam multum detrahitur pulchritudini, quoniam non mole constat, sed parilitate ac dimensione membrorum!

Nec sane multum mirandum est, quod hi, qui nonnullam malam putant esse naturam suo quodam contrario exortam propagatamque principio, nolunt accipere istam causam creationis rerum, ut bonus Deus conderet bona, credentes eum potius ad haec mundana molimina rebellantis aduersum se mali repellendi extrema necessitate perductum suamque naturam bonam malo cohercendo superandoque miscuisse, quam turpissime pollutam et crudelissime captiuatam et obpressam labore magno uix mundet ac liberet; non tamen totam, sed quod eius non potuerit ab illa inquinatione purgari, tegmen ac uinculum futurum hostis uicti et inclusi.

ENGLISH

their own places and natures and are arranged in a beautiful order. They do not notice how much beauty each contributes, in its own measure, to the universe of things, as to a shared commonwealth, or how much benefit they bring to us ourselves, if we use them fittingly and knowledgeably. So true is this that poisons themselves, which are deadly when used unfittingly, are turned into wholesome medicines when properly applied. Nor do they notice how, on the other hand, even the things they delight in, such as food and drink and this light, are felt to be harmful when used immoderately and at the wrong time.

Divine providence therefore warns us not to find fault with things foolishly, but to search out their usefulness carefully. Where our intelligence or our weakness fails, we should believe that their usefulness is hidden, just as some things were hidden that we could barely discover. For even the hiding of a thing's usefulness either trains us in humility or wears down our pride. No nature at all is evil, and "evil" is nothing but a name for the privation of good.

But from earthly things to heavenly, and from visible to invisible, some goods are better than others, and they are unequal precisely so that all of them might exist. God, moreover, is so great a craftsman in great things that he is no lesser in small ones. These small things are to be measured not by their own size (for they have none) but by the wisdom of their craftsman. Take the appearance of a visible human being: if one eyebrow is shaved off, how next to nothing is taken from the body, and how much from its beauty! For beauty does not consist in bulk but in the balance and proportion of the members.

Nor indeed is it much to be wondered at that those who think some nature is evil, sprung from and propagated by some opposing principle of its own, refuse to accept this cause of the creation of things: that a good God created good things. They believe instead that he was driven to these vast works of the world by the extreme necessity of repelling an evil that was rebelling against him. They believe that he mixed his own good nature with evil in order to restrain and overcome it, and that he now cleanses and frees this nature, most shamefully polluted, most cruelly taken captive and oppressed, only with great labor and with difficulty. And not all of it, either: whatever part of it could not be purged of that defilement is to become the covering and the chain of the conquered and imprisoned enemy.

LATIN	ENGLISH
Sic autem Manichaei non desiperent uel potius insanirent, si Dei naturam, sicuti est, incommutabilem adque omnino incorruptibilem crederent, cui nocere nulla res possit; animam uero, quae uoluntate mutari in deterius et peccato corrumpi potuit adque ita incommutabilis ueritatis luce priuari, non Dei partem nec eius naturae, quae Dei est, sed ab illo conditam longe inparem Conditori Christiana sanitate sentirent.	Yet the Manichaeans would not be so foolish, or rather so insane, if they believed that God's nature is, as it truly is, unchangeable and wholly incorruptible, a nature that nothing can harm. They would not be so foolish if, with Christian soundness of mind, they held that the soul is not a part of God, nor of the nature that is God's, but was created by him and is far unequal to its Creator. For the soul could change for the worse by its will and be corrupted by sin, and so be deprived of the light of unchangeable truth.

THE ERROR FOR WHICH THE TEACHING OF ORIGEN IS BLAMED

Origen wrongly taught that the world was made to imprison sinful souls in bodies.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.23 Sed multo est mirandum amplius, quod etiam quidam, qui unum nobiscum credunt omnium rerum esse principium, ullamque naturam, quae non est quod Deus est, nisi ab illo conditore esse non posse, noluerunt tamen istam causam fabricandi mundi tam bonam ac simplicem bene ac simpliciter credere, ut Deus bonus conderet bona et essent post Deum quae non essent quod est Deus, bona tamen, quae non faceret nisi bonus Deus; sed animas dicunt, non quidem partes Dei, sed factas a Deo, peccasse a Conditore recedendo et diuersis progressibus pro diuersitate peccatorum a caelis usque ad terras diuersa corpora quasi uincula meruisse, et hunc esse mundum eamque causam mundi fuisse faciendi, non ut conderentur bona, sed ut mala cohiberentur. Hinc Origenes iure culpatur.	But it is far more to be wondered at that even some who believe with us that there is one principle of all things were nevertheless unwilling to believe this cause of the world's making. These people also hold that no nature which is not what God is can exist unless he created it. Yet this cause is so good and simple, and they would not believe it in a good and simple way: that a good God created good things, and that after God there should be things that are not what God is, yet are good, things that only a good God could make. Instead they say that souls, which are not parts of God but were made by God, sinned by withdrawing from their Creator. By various stages of descent from the heavens down to the earth, according to the variety of their sins, these souls earned various bodies as chains. And this, they say, is the world, and this was the cause of making the world: not that good things might be created, but that evil things might be restrained. For this Origen is rightly blamed.[27]
In libris enim, quos appellat περὶ ἀρχῶν, ἀρχῶν, id est de principiis, hoc sensit, hoc scripsit. Ubi plus quam dici potest miror hominem in ecclesiasticis litteris tam doctum et exercitatum non adtendisse, primum quam hoc esset contrarium scripturae huius tantae auctoritatis	For in the books he calls περὶ ἀρχῶν, that is, On First Principles, this is what he thought and what he wrote. Here I am more astonished than I can say that a man so learned and so practiced in the writings of the Church failed to notice, first of all, how 27 Origen of Alexandria (c. AD 185–c. 254), Christian theologian and biblical scholar whose speculations on the preexistence of souls were later condemned.

LATIN	ENGLISH
intentioni, quae per omnia opera Dei subiungens: Et uidit Deus, quia bonum est, conpletisque omnibus inferens: Et uidit Deus omnia, quae fecit, et ecce bona ualde, nullam aliam causam faciendi mundi intellegi uoluit, nisi ut bona fierent a bono Deo.	contrary this was to the intention of this Scripture of such great authority. After each of God's works it adds, "And God saw that it was good." When all were completed it concludes, "And God saw all that he had made, and behold, it was very good." And so Scripture meant us to understand no other cause for making the world than that good things should be made by a good God.[28]
Ubi si nemo peccasset, tantummodo naturis bonis esset mundus ornatus et plenus; et quia peccatum est, non ideo cuncta sunt inpleta peccatis, cum bonorum longe maior numerus in caelestibus suae naturae ordinem seruet; nec mala uoluntas, quia naturae ordinem seruare noluit, ideo iusti Dei leges omnia bene ordinantis effugit; quoniam sicut pictura cum colore nigro loco suo posito, ita uniuersitas rerum, si quis possit intueri, etiam cum peccatoribus pulchra est, quamuis per se ipsos consideratos sua deformitas turpet.	There, if no one had sinned, the world would have been adorned and filled with good natures alone. And even though sin has occurred, it does not follow that all things are filled with sins, since by far the greater number of good beings in the heavens keep the order of their nature. Nor has the evil will, because it refused to keep the order of its nature, therefore escaped the laws of a just God who orders all things well. For a painting is beautiful with black color in its proper place. In the same way the universe of things, if one could see it whole, is beautiful even with sinners in it, though the sinners themselves, considered on their own, are disfigured by their own ugliness.
Deinde uidere debuit Origenes et quicumque ita sapiunt, si haec opinio uera esset, mundum ideo factum, ut animae pro meritis peccatorum suorum tamquam ergastula, quibus poenaliter includerentur, corpora acciperent, superiora et leuiora quae minus, inferiora uero et grauiora quae amplius peccauerunt, daemones, quibus deterius nihil est, terrena corpora, quibus inferius et grauius nihil est, potius quam homines etiam bonos habere debuisse. Nunc uero, ut intellegeremus animarum merita non qualitatibus corporum esse pensanda, aerium pessimus daemon, homo autem, et nunc licet malus longe minoris mitiorisque malitiae, et certe ante peccatum, tamen luteum corpus accepit.	Next, Origen and all who think as he does ought to have seen what would follow if this opinion were true. On their view the world was made so that souls, according to the deserts of their sins, might receive bodies like prison-houses to be shut up in by way of punishment: higher and lighter bodies for those who sinned less, lower and heavier ones for those who sinned more. If that were so, the demons, than whom nothing is worse, ought to have had earthly bodies, than which nothing is lower or heavier, rather than human beings, even good ones. But as it is, God has made us understand that the merits of souls are not to be weighed by the qualities of their bodies. The worst demon received an airy body. Man received a body of clay, although even now, wicked as he is, his malice is far lesser and milder, and certainly it was so before sin.
Quid autem stultius dici potest, quam isto sole, ut in uno mundo unus esset, non decori pulchritudinis uel etiam saluti rerum corporalium consuluisse artificem Deum, sed hoc potius euenisse, quia una anima sic peccauerat, ut tali corpore mereretur includi? ac per hoc si contigisset, ut non una, sed duae; immo non duae, sed decem uel centum similiter aequaliterque peccassent,	And what could be said more foolishly than this? God the craftsman made this sun to be the one sun in the one world, and on their view he was not providing in this for the grace and beauty, or even for the well-being, of bodily things. Instead it came about because one soul had sinned in such a 28 Genesis 1:4–25 and 1:31.

LATIN

centum soles haberet hic mundus? Quod ut non fieret, non opificis prouisione mirabili ad rerum corporalium salutem decoremque consultum est, sed contigit potius tanta unius animae progressione peccantis, ut sola corpus tale mereretur. Non plane animarum, de quibus nesciunt quid loquantur, sed eorum ipsorum, qui talia sapiunt multum longe a ueritate, merito est cohercenda progressio.

ENGLISH

way as to deserve to be shut up in such a body. On this reasoning, suppose not one soul but two had sinned in the same way and to the same degree, or rather not two but ten or a hundred. Would this world then have a hundred suns? And the reason this did not happen, they would say, was not that the craftsman provided for the well-being and beauty of bodily things by his marvelous foresight. Rather it happened because a single soul made such progress in sinning that it alone deserved such a body. Plainly, it is not the progress of souls that ought rightly to be checked, for they do not know what they are saying about souls. It is the progress of those very people who think such things, a progress that has carried them far, very far, from the truth.

Haec ergo tria, quae superius commendaui, cum in unaquaque creatura requirantur, quis eam fecerit, per quid fecerit, quare fecerit, ut respondeatur Deus, per Verbum, quia bona est, utrum altitudine mystica nobis ipsa trinitas intimetur, hoc est Pater et Filius et Spiritus sanctus, an aliquid occurrat, quod hoc loco scripturarum id accipiendum esse prohibeat, multi sermonis est quaestio, nec omnia uno uolumine ut explicemus urgendum est.

These three things, then, which I emphasized above, are to be asked about every creature: who made it, by what means he made it, and why he made it. The answer is: God, through the Word, because it is good. Perhaps in this the Trinity itself, that is, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, is intimated to us with mystical depth. Or perhaps something forbids us to take it so in this passage of Scripture. That question requires a long discussion, and we should not be pressed to explain everything in a single book.

THE DIVINE TRINITY, WHICH HAS SCATTERED SIGNS OF ITSELF THROUGH ALL ITS WORKS

Who made each creature, through what, and why—God, through the Word, because it is good—points to the Trinity.

LATIN

11.24 Credimus et tenemus et fideliter praedicamus, quod Pater genuerit Verbum, hoc est sapientiam, per quam facta sunt omnia, unigenitum Filium, unus unum, aeternus coaeternum, summe bonus aequaliter bonum; et quod Spiritus sanctus simul et Patris et Filii sit Spiritus et ipse consubstantialis et coaeternus ambobus; adque hoc totum et trinitas sit propter proprietatem personarum et unus Deus propter inseparabilem diuinitatem, sicut unus Omnipotens propter inseparabilem omnipotentiam; ita tamen, ut etiam cum de singulis quaeritur unusquisque eorum et Deus et omnipotens esse respondeatur; cum uero de omnibus simul, non tres di uel tres omnipotentes, sed unus Deus omnipotens; tanta ibi est in tribus inseparabilis unitas, quae sic se uoluit praedicari.

ENGLISH

We believe, hold, and faithfully proclaim that the Father begot the Word, that is, Wisdom, through whom all things were made. The Word is his only-begotten Son: one begotten by one, coeternal with the eternal, equally good with the supremely good. We believe that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of both the Father and the Son together, and is himself consubstantial and coeternal with both. And we believe that this whole is a Trinity because of the distinct properties of the persons, and one God because of the inseparable divinity, just as it is one Almighty because of the inseparable omnipotence. Yet this holds in such a way that, when we ask about each one individually, the answer is that each of them is both God and almighty. When we ask about all together, the answer is not three gods or three almighties, but one God almighty. So

LATIN

Utrum autem boni Patris et boni Filii Spiritus sanctus, quia communis ambobus est, recte bonitas dici possit amborum, non audeo temerariam praecipitare sententiam; uerum tamen amborum eum dicere sanctitatem facilius ausus fuero, non amborum quasi qualitatem, sed ipsum quoque substantiam et tertiam in trinitate personam. Ad hoc enim me probabilius ducit, quod, cum sit et Pater spiritus et Filius spiritus, et Pater sanctus et Filius sanctus, proprie tamen ipse uocatur Spiritus sanctus tamquam sanctitas substantialis et consubstantialis amborum. Sed si nihil est aliud bonitas diuina quam sanctitas, profecto et intellegentia rationis est, non praesumtionis audacia, ut in operibus Dei secreto quodam loquendi modo, quo nostra exerceatur intentio, eadem nobis insinuata intellegatur trinitas, unamquamque creaturam quis fecerit, per quid fecerit, propter quid fecerit.

Pater quippe intellegitur Verbi, qui dixit ut fiat; quod autem illo dicente factum est, procul dubio per Verbum factum est; in eo uero quod dicitur: Vidit Deus, quia bonum est, satis significatur Deum nulla necessitate, nulla suae cuiusquam utilitatis indigentia, sed sola bonitate fecisse quod factum est, id est, quia bonum est; quod ideo postea quam factum est dicitur, ut res, quae facta est, congruere bonitati, propter quam facta est, indicetur. Quae bonitas si Spiritus sanctus recte intellegitur, uniuersa nobis trinitas in suis operibus intimatur. Inde est ciuitatis sanctae, quae in sanctis angelis sursum est, et origo et informatio et beatitudo.

Nam si quaeratur unde sit: Deus eam condidit; si unde sit sapiens: a Deo inluminatur; si unde sit felix: Deo fruitur; subsistens modificatur, contemplans inlustratur, inhaerens iucundatur; est, uidet, amat; in aeternitate Dei uiget, in ueritate Dei lucet, in bonitate Dei gaudet.

ENGLISH

great is the inseparable unity in the three, a unity that has willed to be proclaimed in this way.

Since the Holy Spirit of the good Father and the good Son is common to both, can he rightly be called the goodness of both? I do not dare to rush into a rash opinion on that. Yet I would more readily venture to call him the holiness of both. I mean not as if he were a quality of both, but as himself also a substance, the third person in the Trinity. What leads me to think this more probable is the following. The Father is spirit and the Son is spirit, and the Father is holy and the Son is holy. Yet it is he himself who is properly called the Holy Spirit, as the substantial and consubstantial holiness of both. But if the divine goodness is nothing other than holiness, then surely it is reasoned understanding and not presumptuous boldness to see the same Trinity intimated to us in God's works. Scripture does this through a certain hidden way of speaking meant to exercise our attention, when we ask about each creature who made it, by what means he made it, and for what reason he made it.

For the one who said "Let it be" is understood to be the Father of the Word. What was made at his speaking was without doubt made through the Word. And the words "God saw that it was good" signify clearly enough that God made what was made out of no necessity and out of no need for any advantage of his own, but out of goodness alone, that is, because it is good. This is said after the thing was made in order to show that it accords with the goodness for whose sake it was made. If this goodness is rightly understood to be the Holy Spirit, then the whole Trinity is intimated to us in its works. From this comes the origin, the formation, and the happiness of the holy city, which is above among the holy angels.

For if one asks where it comes from, God founded it. If one asks where its wisdom comes from, it is enlightened by God. If one asks where its happiness comes from, it enjoys God. Existing, it is given its measure; contemplating, it is illumined; cleaving to God, it is filled with joy. It is, it sees, it loves. In God's eternity it flourishes, in God's truth it shines, in God's goodness it rejoices.

THE THREEFOLD DIVISION OF ALL PHILOSOPHY

Philosophy's three parts—physics, logic and ethics—correspond to nature, knowledge and the good life.

	LATIN	ENGLISH
11.25	Quantum intellegi datur, hinc philosophi sapientiae disciplinam tripertitam esse uoluerunt, immo tripertitam esse animaduertere potuerunt (neque enim ipsi instituerunt ut ita esset, sed ita esse potius inuenerunt), cuius una pars appellaretur physica, altera logica, tertia ethica (quarum nomina Latina iam multorum litteris frequentata sunt, ut naturalis, rationalis moralisque uocarentur; quas etiam in octauo libro breuiter strinximus); non quo sit consequens, ut isti in his tribus aliquid secundum Deum de trinitate cogitauerint, quamuis Plato primus istam distributionem repperisse et commendasse dicatur, cui neque naturarum omnium auctor nisi Deus uisus est neque intellegentiae dator neque amoris, quo bene beateque uiuitur, inspirator.	As far as we are given to understand, this is why philosophers have held that the discipline of wisdom is threefold. Or rather, they were able to notice that it is threefold, for they did not decree that it should be so but discovered that it was so. One part was called physics, another logic, a third ethics. (The Latin names for these have by now become common in the writings of many: natural, rational, and moral philosophy; I also touched on them briefly in the eighth book.) It does not follow that these philosophers had any thought of the Trinity in these three, in a way that accords with God. This is so even though Plato is said to have been the first to discover and recommend this division. To him it seemed that God alone is the author of all natures, the giver of understanding, and the inspirer of the love by which one lives well and happily.
	Sed certe cum et de natura rerum et de ratione indagandae ueritatis et de boni fine, ad quem cuncta quae agimus referre debemus, diuersi diuersa sentiant: in his tamen tribus magnis et generalibus quaestionibus omnis eorum uersatur intentio. Ita cum in unaquaque earum quid quisque sectetur multiplex discrepantia sit opinionum, esse tamen aliquam naturae causam, scientiae formam, uitae summam nemo cunctatur. Tria etiam sunt, quae in unoquoque homine artifice spectantur, ut aliquid efficiat: natura, doctrina, usus; natura ingenio, doctrina scientia, usus fructu diiudicandus est.	Different people certainly hold different views about the nature of things, about the method of seeking truth, and about the end of good to which we must refer all we do. Even so, all their attention is occupied with these three great and general questions. In each of them the opinions about what one should pursue disagree in many ways. Still, no one hesitates to say that there is some cause of nature, some form of knowledge, some sum of life. There are also three things looked for in any human craftsman if he is to produce something: nature, training, and use. Nature is to be judged by talent, training by knowledge, use by its fruit.
	Nec ignoro, quod proprie fructus fruentis, usus utentis sit, adque hoc interesse uideatur, quod ea re frui dicimur, quae nos non ad aliud referenda per se ipsa delectat; uti uero ea re, quam propter aliud quaerimus (unde temporalibus magis utendum est, quam fruendum, ut frui mereamur aeternis; non sicut peruersi, qui frui uolunt nummo, uti autem Deo; quoniam, non nummum propter Deum inpendunt, sed Deum propter nummum colunt); uerum tamen eo loquendi modo, quem plus obtinuit consuetudo, et fructibus utimur et usibus fruimur; nam et fructus iam proprie dicuntur agrorum, quibus utique omnes temporaliter utimur. Hoc itaque more usum	I am well aware that, properly speaking, fruit belongs to the one who enjoys and use to the one who uses. The difference seems to be this. We are said to enjoy a thing that delights us in itself, without being referred to anything else. We use a thing that we seek for the sake of something else. (So temporal things are to be used rather than enjoyed, so that we may deserve to enjoy eternal things. We should not be like the perverse, who want to enjoy money but use God; for they do not spend money for God's sake but worship God for money's sake.) Yet in the way of speaking that custom has made more prevalent, we both use fruits

LATIN	ENGLISH
dixerim, in his tribus, quae in homine spectanda commonui, quae sunt natura, doctrina, usus.	and enjoy uses. For the produce of the fields is now properly called "fruits," and we all certainly use them in this temporal life. It is in this customary sense, then, that I have spoken of "use" among the three things that I pointed out are to be looked for in a human being: nature, training, and use.[29]
Ex his propter obtinendam beatam uitam tripertita, ut dixi, a philosophis inuenta est disciplina, naturalis propter naturam, rationalis propter doctrinam, moralis propter usum. Si ergo natura nostra esset a nobis, profecto et nostram nos genuissemus sapientiam, nec eam doctrina, id est aliunde discendo, percipere curaremus; et noster amor a nobis profectus et ad nos relatus et ad beate uiuendum sufficeret, nec bono alio quo frueremur ullo indigeret; nunc uero quia natura nostra, ut esset, Deum habet auctorem, procul dubio ut uera sapiamus ipsum debemus habere doctorem, ipsum etiam ut beati simus suauitatis intimae largitorem.	From these three, as I said, the philosophers devised a threefold discipline for attaining the happy life: natural philosophy for the sake of nature, rational for the sake of training, moral for the sake of use. If, then, our nature came from ourselves, we would surely also have begotten our own wisdom. We would not take care to acquire it by training, that is, by learning from elsewhere. And our love, setting out from ourselves and referred back to ourselves, would suffice for living happily and would need no other good to enjoy. But as it is, our nature has God as the author of its existence. So beyond doubt we must have him as our teacher if we are to be wise in what is true. We must also have him as the giver of inward sweetness if we are to be happy.

THE IMAGE OF THE SUPREME TRINITY, WHICH IN A CERTAIN WAY IS FOUND EVEN IN THE NATURE OF A HUMAN BEING NOT YET MADE BLESSED

We are, we know we are, and we love both; "If I am deceived, I am."

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.26 Et nos quidem in nobis, tametsi non aequalem, immo ualde longeque distantem, neque coaeternam et, quo breuius totum dicitur, non eiusdem substantiae, cuius Deus est, tamen qua Deo nihil sit in rebus ab eo factis natura propinquius, imaginem Dei, hoc est illius summae trinitatis, agnoscimus, adhuc reformatione perficiendam, ut sit etiam similitudine proxima. Nam et sumus et nos esse nouimus et id esse ac nosse diligimus. In his autem tribus, quae dixi, nulla nos falsitas ueri similis turbat.	And we do recognize in ourselves an image of God, that is, of that supreme Trinity. It is not equal to him; indeed it is very far removed from him. It is not coeternal, and, to put it all more briefly, it is not of the same substance as God. Yet nothing among the things he has made is closer to God by nature. It is an image still to be perfected by reformation, so that it may also be closest to him in likeness. For we are, and we know that we are, and we love our being and our knowing. And in these three things I have mentioned, no falsehood that resembles truth troubles us.
Non enim ea sicut illa, quae foris sunt, ullo sensu corporis tangimus, uelut colores uidendo, sonos audiendo, odores olfaciendo, sapores gustando, dura et mollia contrectando sentimus, quorum sensibilium etiam imagines eis simillimas nec iam corporeas cogitatione uersamus, memoria tenemus et per ipsas in istorum desideria concitamur; sed sine ulla phantasiarum uel	For we do not touch them with any bodily sense, as we do things outside us, as when we perceive colors by seeing, sounds by hearing, smells by smelling, tastes by tasting, and hard and soft things by touching. Of these sensible things we also turn over in thought images that are very like them, though no longer bodily. We hold these im-

29 Augustine's wordplay depends on the Latin: fructus (fruit) comes from frui (to enjoy), usus (use) from uti (to use).

LATIN	ENGLISH
phantasmatum imaginatione ludificatoria mihi esse me idque nosse et amare certissimum est. Nulla in his ueris Academicorum argumenta formido dicentium: Quid si falleris? Si enim fallor, sum. Nam qui non est, utique nec falli potest: ac per hoc sum, si fallor. Quia sum ergo si fallor, quo modo esse me fallor, quando certum est me esse, si fallor?	ages in memory, and by them we are stirred to desire the things themselves. But it is entirely certain to me that I am, and that I know and love this, without any deceptive play of imagination involving fancies or phantoms. Regarding these truths I have no fear of the arguments of the Academics, who say, "What if you are deceived?" For if I am deceived, I am. Whoever does not exist certainly cannot be deceived either; and so, if I am deceived, I am. Since, then, I am if I am deceived, how am I deceived in thinking that I am, when it is certain that I am if I am deceived?[30]
Quia igitur essem qui fallerer, etiamsi fallerer, procul dubio in eo, quod me noui esse, non fallor. Consequens est autem, ut etiam in eo, quod me noui nosse, non fallar. Sicut enim noui esse me, ita noui etiam hoc ipsum, nosse me. Eaque duo cum amo, eundem quoque amorem quiddam tertium nec inparis aestimationis eis quas noui rebus adiungo. Neque enim fallor amare me, cum in his quae amo non fallar; quamquam etsi illa falsa essent, falsa me amare uerum esset. Nam quo pacto recte reprehenderer et recte prohiberer ab amore falsorum, si me illa amare falsum esset? Cum uero et illa uera adque certa sint, quis dubitet quod eorum, cum amantur, et ipse amor uerus et certus est?	Therefore, even if I were deceived, I would be the one who was deceived. So beyond doubt I am not deceived in knowing that I am. It follows also that I am not deceived in knowing that I know. For as I know that I am, so I also know this very thing, that I know. And when I love these two, I add to the things I know this same love as a third thing, of no lesser worth. Nor am I mistaken in thinking that I love, since I am not mistaken about the things I love. Even if they were false, it would still be true that I loved false things. For how could I rightly be blamed and rightly be kept from loving false things, if it were false that I loved them? But since those things are true and certain, who can doubt that, when they are loved, the love itself is also true and certain?
Tam porro nemo est qui esse se nolit, quam nemo est qui non esse beatus uelit. Quo modo enim potest beatus esse, si nihil sit?	Further, just as there is no one who does not want to be, so there is no one who does not want to be happy. For how can anyone be happy if he is nothing?

BEING, KNOWLEDGE, AND THE LOVE OF BOTH

Even the wretched would rather exist than not; all nature seeks to be, and humans to know.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.27 Ita uero ui quadam naturali ipsum esse iucundum est, ut non ob aliud et hi qui miseri sunt nolint interire et, cum se miseros esse sentiant, non se ipsos de rebus, sed miseriam suam potius auferri uelint. Illis etiam, qui et sibi miserrimi apparent et plane sunt et non solum a sapientibus, quoniam stulti, uerum et ab his, qui se beatos putant, miseri iudicantur, quia pauperes adque mendici sunt, si quis inmortalitatem daret, qua nec ipsa miseria moreretur, proposito sibi quod, si in eadem miseria semper esse nollent, nulli et nusquam essent	Existence itself is so delightful, by a kind of natural force, that this is the only reason why even the wretched do not want to perish. When they feel their wretchedness, what they want removed from the world is not themselves but their wretchedness. Take those who seem most wretched to themselves, and plainly are, and are judged wretched not only by the wise, because they are fools, but also by those who think themselves happy, because they are poor and beggars. Sup-

30 The Academics were philosophers of Plato's Academy in its skeptical phase, who held that nothing can be known with certainty.

LATIN

futuri, sed omni modo perituri, profecto exultarent laetitia et sic semper eligerent esse quam omnino non esse. Huius rei testis est notissimus sensus illorum.

Unde enim mori metuunt et malunt in illa aerumna uiuere, quam eam morte finire, nisi quia satis apparet quam refugiat natura non esse? Adque ideo cum se nouerint esse morituros, pro magno beneficio sibi hanc inpendi misericordiam desiderant, ut aliquanto productius in eadem miseria uiuant tardiusque moriantur. Procul dubio ergo indicant, inmortalitatem, saltem talem quae non habeat finem mendicitatis, quanta gratulatione susciperent. Quid? animalia omnia etiam inrationalia, quibus datum non est ista cogitare, ab inmensis draconibus usque ad exiguos uermiculos nonne se esse uelle adque ob hoc interitum fugere omnibus quibus possunt motibus indicant? Quid?

arbusta omnesque frutices, quibus nullus est sensus ad uitandam manifesta motione perniciem, nonne ut in auras tutum cacuminis germen emittant, aliud terrae radicis adfigunt, quo alimentum trahant adque ita suum quodam modo esse conseruent? Ipsa postremo corpora, quibus non solum sensus, sed nec ulla saltem seminalis est uita, ita tamen uel exiliunt in superna uel in ima descendunt uel librantur in mediis, ut essentiam suam, ubi secundum naturam possunt esse, custodiant.

Iam uero nosse quantum ametur quamque falli nolit humana natura, uel hinc intellegi potest, quod lamentari quisque sana mente mauult quam laetari in amentia. Quae uis magna adque mirabilis mortalibus praeter homini animantibus nulla est, licet eorum quibusdam ad istam lucem contuendam multo quam nobis sit acrior sensus oculorum; sed lucem illam incorpoream contingere nequeunt, qua mens nostra quodam modo radiatur, ut de his omnibus recte iudicare possimus. Nam in quantum eam capimus, in tantum id possumus. Verum tamen inest in sensibus inrationalium animantium, etsi scientia nullo modo, at certe quaedam scientiae similitudo; cetera autem rerum corporalium, non quia sentiunt, sed quia sentiuntur, sensibilia nuncupata sunt.

ENGLISH

pose someone offered them immortality, in which their wretchedness would not die either, on the condition that if they refused to remain forever in that same wretchedness they would be nothing and nowhere and would perish altogether. They would surely leap for joy and choose to exist like that forever rather than not exist at all. Their own well-known feeling bears witness to this.

For why do they fear to die, and prefer to live in that misery rather than end it by death, unless it is plain enough how nature shrinks from not existing? And so, when they know they are going to die, they long to be granted this mercy as a great favor: to live a little longer in that same misery and to die later. Without doubt, then, they show how gladly they would welcome immortality, even one that would not put an end to their beggary. What about all animals, even irrational ones, which have not been given the power to think about such things? From huge serpents down to tiny worms, do they not show that they want to exist, and therefore flee destruction with every movement they can? And what about trees and all shrubs, which have no sense by which to avoid destruction through visible movement? So that they may send the shoot of their tops safely up into the air, do they not fix another part, the root, in the earth, to draw nourishment from it, and so in a way preserve their existence? Finally, even bodies themselves, which have not only no sense but not even any seminal life, still either leap up to the heights or sink down to the depths or hang balanced in between, so as to guard their being where by nature they are able to exist.

Again, how much knowing is loved, and how much human nature hates to be deceived, can be seen from this alone: everyone would rather grieve with a sound mind than rejoice in madness. This great and wonderful power belongs to no mortal living creature except human beings. Some animals, it is true, have far keener eyesight than we do for seeing this light of ours. But they cannot reach that incorporeal light by which our mind is in some way illuminated, so that we can judge rightly about all these things; for we can do so to the extent that we receive that light. Even so, there is in the senses of irrational animals, if certainly

LATIN	ENGLISH
Quorum in arbustis hoc simile est sensibus, quod aluntur et gignunt.	not knowledge, at least a certain likeness of knowledge. The rest of corporeal things, however, are called "sensible" not because they sense but because they are sensed. Among these, trees have something like the senses in that they are nourished and reproduce.
Verum tamen et haec et omnia corporalia latentes in natura causas habent; sed formas suas, quibus mundi huius uisibilis structura formosa est, sentiendas sensibus praebent, ut pro eo, quod nosse non possunt, quasi innotescere uelle uideantur. Sed nos ea sensu corporis ita capimus, ut de his non sensu corporis iudicemus. Habemus enim alium interioris hominis sensum isto longe praestantiorem, quo iusta et iniusta sentimus, iusta per intellegibilem speciem, iniusta per eius priuationem. Ad huius sensus officium non acies pupulae, non foramen auriculae, non spiramenta narium, non gustus faucium, non ullus corporeus tactus accedit. Ibi me et esse et hoc nosse certus sum, et haec amo adque amare me similiter certus sum.	Yet these and all corporeal things have causes hidden in nature. But they offer to the senses their forms, which give the structure of this visible world its beautiful form, so that, since they cannot know, they seem as it were to want to be known. We, however, take them in by bodily sense in such a way that we do not judge them by bodily sense. For we have another sense, belonging to the inner man, far superior to that one, by which we perceive what is just and what is unjust—the just by an intelligible form, the unjust by its absence. The work of this sense requires no sharpness of the pupil, no opening of the ear, no passages of the nostrils, no taste in the throat, no bodily touch of any kind. There I am certain both that I exist and that I know this; and I love these things, and I am equally certain that I love them.

WHETHER WE OUGHT ALSO TO LOVE THE VERY LOVE BY WHICH WE LOVE BEING AND KNOWING, IN ORDER TO COME CLOSER TO THE IMAGE OF THE DIVINE TRINITY

We also love our love, which, like a weight, carries the mind wherever it goes.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.28 Sed de duobus illis, essentia scilicet et notitia, quantum amentur in nobis, et quem ad modum etiam in ceteris rebus, quae infra sunt, eorum reperiatur, etsi differens, quaedam tamen similitudo, quantum suscepti huius operis ratio uisa est postulare, satis diximus; de amore autem, quo amantur, utrum et ipse amor ametur, non dictum est. Amatur autem; et hinc probamus, quod in hominibus, qui rectius amantur, ipse magis amatur. Neque enim uir bonus merito dicitur qui scit quod bonum est, sed qui diligit Quur ergo et in nobis ipsis non et ipsum amorem nos amare sentimus, quo amamus quidquid boni amamus? Est enim et amor, quo amatur et quod amandum non est, et istum amorem odit in se, qui illum diligit, quo id amatur quod amandum est.	As for those two, being and knowing, we have said enough, as far as the plan of this work seemed to require, about how much they are loved in us, and about how some likeness of them, though a different one, is also found in other things below us. But nothing has been said about the love by which they are loved—whether that love is itself loved. It is loved; and we prove it from this: in people who are more rightly loved, it is their love itself that is loved more. For a man is not rightly called good because he knows what is good, but because he loves it. Why then do we not perceive in ourselves, too, that we love the very love by which we love whatever good we love? For there is also a love by which even what ought not to be loved is loved; and whoever loves the love by which what ought to be loved is loved hates that other love in himself.
Possunt enim ambo esse in uno homine, et hoc bonum est homini, ut illo proficiente quo bene uiuimus, iste deficiat	For both can exist in one person. And this is good for a person: that as the love by which we live well quo male uiuimus, donec ad perfectum sanetur et in bonum commutetur omne quod uiuimus. Si enim pecora essemus, carnalem uitam et quod secundum sensum eius est amaremus idque esset sufficiens bonum nostrum et secundum hoc, cum esset nobis bene, nihil aliud quaereremus. Item si arbores essemus, nihil quidem sentiente motu amare possemus, uerum tamen id quasi adpetere uideremur, quo feracius essemus uberiusque fructuosae. Si essemus lapides aut fluctus aut uentus aut flamma uel quid huius modi, sine ullo quidem sensu adque uita, non tamen nobis deesset quasi quidam nostrorum locorum adque ordinis adpetitus.

LATIN

Nam uelut amores corporum momenta sunt ponderum, siue deorsum grauitate siue sursum leuitate nitantur. Ita enim corpus pondere, sicut animus amore fertur, quocumque fertur. Quoniam igitur homines sumus ad nostri creatoris imaginem creati, cuius est uera aeternitas, aeterna ueritas, aeterna et uera caritas, estque ipse aeterna et uera et cara trinitas neque confusa neque separata: in his quidem rebus, quae infra nos sunt, quoniam et ipsa nec aliquo modo essent nec aliqua specie continerentur nec aliquem ordinem uel adpeterent uel tenerent, nisi ab illo facta essent, qui summe est, qui summe sapiens est, qui summe bonus est, tamquam per omnia, quae fecit mirabili stabilitate, currentes quasi quaedam eius alibi magis, alibi minus inpressa uestigia colligamus; in nobis autem ipsis eius imaginem contuentes tamquam minor ille euangelicus filius ad nosmet ipsos reuersi surgamus et ad illum redeamus, a quo peccando recesseramus.

Ibi esse nostrum non habebit mortem, ibi nosse nostrum non habebit errorem, ibi amare nostrum non habebit offensionem. Nunc autem tria ista nostra quamuis certa teneamus nec aliis ea credamus testibus, sed nos ipsi praesentia sentiamus adque interiore ueracissimo cernamus aspectu, tamen, quamdiu futura uel utrum numquam defutura et quo si male, quo autem si bene agantur peruentura sint, quoniam per nos ipsos nosse non possumus, alios hinc testes uel quaerimus uel habemus: de quorum fide quur nulla debeat esse grows, the love by which we live badly should shrink, until our whole life is healed to perfection and changed into good. If we were cattle, we would love the life of the flesh and whatever suits its senses; that would be good enough for us, and when things went well for us in that respect we would seek nothing more. Likewise, if we were trees, we could not love anything with a sentient movement, yet we would seem in a way to strive after whatever would make us more fertile and more abundantly fruitful. If we were stones, or waves, or wind, or flame, or anything of that kind, without any sense or life at all, we would still not lack a kind of striving for our proper places and order.

ENGLISH

For the loves of bodies are, so to speak, the pull of their weights, whether they press downward by heaviness or upward by lightness. A body is carried by its weight, just as a mind is carried by its love, wherever it is carried. We are human beings, then, created in the image of our Creator, to whom belong true eternity, eternal truth, and eternal and true love, and who is himself the eternal, true and beloved Trinity, neither confused nor separated. In the things below us, too, we can see him: for they would not exist in any way, nor be held together by any form, nor seek or keep any order, unless they had been made by him who supremely is, who is supremely wise, who is supremely good. So let us run, as it were, through all the things he has made with such wonderful stability, and gather up what we might call his traces, imprinted more deeply in some places and less in others. But in ourselves let us behold his image, and, like the younger son in the Gospel, come back to ourselves, rise up, and return to him from whom we had departed by sinning.[31]

There our being will have no death, there our knowing will have no error, there our loving will have no stumbling. Now, it is true, we hold these three of ours as certain. We do not believe them on the testimony of others; we ourselves perceive them as present and discern them with a most truthful inner sight. Yet we cannot know by ourselves how long they will last, or whether they will never cease, or where they will end up if they are handled badly and where if well. So for this we 31 The parable of the prodigal son, Luke 15:11–32.

LATIN	ENGLISH
dubitatio, non est iste, sed posterior erit diligentius disserendi locus.	either seek other witnesses or have them already. Why there ought to be no doubt about their trustworthiness is a matter to be discussed more carefully, not here, but later.
In hoc autem libro de ciuitate Dei, quae non peregrinatur in huius uitae mortalitate, sed inmortalis semper in caelis est, id est de angelis sanctis Deo cohaerentibus, qui nec fuerunt umquam nec futuri sunt desertores, inter quos et illos, qui aeternam lucem deserentes tenebrae facti sunt, Deum primitus diuisisse iam diximus, illo adiuuante quod coepimus ut possumus explicemus.	In this book, however, we are dealing with the city of God that is not on pilgrimage in the mortality of this life but is always immortal in heaven—that is, with the holy angels who cleave to God, who never were and never will be deserters. Between them and those who abandoned the eternal light and became darkness, God, as we have already said, made a division at the beginning. With his help, then, let us go on to explain, as best we can, what we have begun.

THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE HOLY ANGELS, BY WHICH THEY KNOW THE TRINITY IN ITS VERY GODHEAD, AND SEE THE CAUSES OF WORKS FIRST IN THE ART OF THE MAKER RATHER THAN IN THE WORKS THEMSELVES

The holy angels know creatures first in God's Word, as in the art that made them.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.29 Illi quippe angeli sancti non per uerba sonantia Deum discunt, sed per ipsam praesentiam inmutabilis ueritatis, hoc est Verbum eius unigenitum, et ipsum Verbum et Patrem et eorum Spiritum sanctum, eamque esse inseparabilem trinitatem singulasque in ea personas esse substantiam, et tamen omnes non tres deos esse, sed unum Deum, ita nouerunt, ut eis magis ista, quam nos ipsi nobis cogniti simus. Ipsam quoque creaturam melius ibi, hoc est in sapientia Dei, tamquam in arte, qua facta est, quam in ea ipsa sciunt; ac per hoc et se ipsos ibi melius quam in se ipsis, uerum tamen et in se ipsis. Facti sunt enim et aliud sunt quam ille qui fecit.	Those holy angels, of course, do not learn about God through spoken words, but through the very presence of unchangeable truth, that is, his only-begotten Word. They know the Word himself, and the Father, and their Holy Spirit; they know that this is an inseparable Trinity, that each person in it is substance, and yet that all together are not three gods but one God. And they know this in such a way that these things are better known to them than we are to ourselves. They also know creation itself better there—that is, in the wisdom of God, as in the art by which it was made—than in creation itself. And so they know even themselves better there than in themselves, though they do know themselves in themselves as well. For they were made, and are something other than the one who made them.
Ibi ergo tamquam in diurna cognitione, in se ipsis autem tamquam in uespertina, sicut iam supra diximus. Multum enim differt, utrum in ea ratione cognoscatur aliquid, secundum quam factum est, an in se ipso; sicut aliter scitur rectitudo linearum seu ueritas figurarum, cum intellecta conspicitur, aliter cum in puluere scribitur; et aliter iustitia in ueritate incommutabili, aliter in anima iusti. Sic deinde cetera, sicut firmamentum inter aquas superiores et inferiores, quod caelum uocatum est; sicut deorsum aquarum congeries terraeque nudatio et herbarum institutio adque lignorum; sicut solis ac lunae	There, then, they know as if by daytime knowledge, and in themselves as if by evening knowledge, as we said above. For it makes a great difference whether something is known in the plan according to which it was made, or in itself. In the same way, the straightness of lines or the truth of figures is known one way when it is seen by the intellect, and another way when it is drawn in the dust; and justice is known one way in unchangeable truth, and another way in the soul of a just person. So too with everything else: the firma-

LATIN	ENGLISH
stellarumque conditio; sicut ex aquis animalium, uolucrum scilicet adque piscium beluarumque natantium; sicut quorumque in terra gradientium adque repentium et ipsius hominis, qui cunctis in terra rebus excelleret.	ment between the waters above and the waters below, which was called heaven; the gathering of the waters below, the laying bare of the land, and the establishing of plants and trees; the creation of the sun, the moon and the stars; the creation of the living creatures from the waters, namely birds and fish and the great swimming creatures of the sea; the creation of everything that walks and creeps on the earth, and of man himself, who was to surpass all things on earth.
Omnia haec aliter in Verbo Dei cognoscuntur ab angelis, ubi habent causas rationesque suas, id est secundum quas facta sunt, incommutabiliter permanentes, aliter in se ipsis; illa clariore, hac obscuriore cognitione, uelut artis adque operum; quae tamen opera cum ad ipsius Creatoris laudem uenerationemque referuntur, tamquam mane lucescit in mentibus contemplantium.	All these things are known by the angels in one way in the Word of God, where their causes and plans—that is, the plans according to which they were made—abide unchangeably, and in another way in themselves: the former by a clearer knowledge, the latter by a dimmer one, like the knowledge of an art and the knowledge of its works. Yet when these works are referred to the praise and veneration of the Creator himself, it is as if morning dawns in the minds of those who contemplate them.

THE PERFECTION OF THE NUMBER SIX, THE FIRST NUMBER MADE UP OF THE SUM OF ITS PARTS

Six is the first number equal to the sum of its parts, a sign of the completeness of creation.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.30 Haec autem propter senarii numeri perfectionem eodem die sexiens repetito sex diebus perfecta narrantur, non quia Deo fuerit necessaria mora temporum, quasi qui non potuerit creare omnia simul, quae deinceps congruis motibus peragerent tempora; sed quia per senarium numerum est operum significata perfectio. Numerus quippe senarius primus conpletur suis partibus, id est sexta sui parte et tertia et dimidia, quae sunt unum et duo et tria, quae in summam ducta sex fiunt. Partes autem in hac consideratione numerorum illae intellegendae sunt, quae quotae sint dici potest; sicut dimidia, tertia, quarta et deinceps ab aliquo numero denominatae.	These things are described as completed in six days—the same day repeated six times—because of the perfection of the number six. It was not that God needed any lapse of time, as if he could not create all things at once, which would then carry time forward by their fitting movements. It was because the perfection of his works was signified by the number six. For six is the first number that is completed by its parts, that is, by its sixth, its third and its half, which are one, two and three; and these, added together, make six. In this way of looking at numbers, "parts" must be understood as those of which one can say what fraction they are, such as a half, a third, a quarter and so on, each named after some number.
Neque enim exempli gratia quia in nouenario numero quattuor pars aliqua eius est, ideo dici potest quota eius sit; unum autem potest, nam nona eius est: et tria potest, nam tertia eius est. Coniunctae uero istae duae partes eius, nona scilicet adque tertia, id est unum et tria, longe sunt a tota summa eius, quod est nouem. Itemque in denario quaeternarius est aliqua pars eius; sed quota sit dici non potest; unum autem potest; nam decima pars	For example, in the number nine, four is a part of it in some sense, but one cannot say what fraction of it four is. One can say this of one, since it is its ninth, and of three, since it is its third. But these two parts joined together, the ninth and the third—that is, one and three—fall far short of its total, which is nine. Likewise, in ten, four is a part of it in some sense, but one cannot say what fraction it eius est. Habet et quintam, quod sunt duo; habet et dimidiam, quod sunt quinque. Sed hae tres partes eius, decima et quinta et dimidia, id est unum et duo et quinque, simul ductae non conplent decem; sunt enim octo.

LATIN

Duodenarii uero numeri partes in summam ductae transeunt eum; habet enim duodecimam, quod est unum; habet sextam, quae sunt duo; habet quartam, quae sunt tria; habet tertiam, quae sunt quattuor; habet et dimidiam, quae sunt sex; unum autem et duo et tria et quattuor et sex non duodecim, sed amplius, id est sedecim, fiunt. Hoc breuiter commemorandum putaui ad commendandam senarii numeri perfectionem, qui primus, ut dixi, partibus suis in summam redactis ipse perficitur; in quo perfecit Deus opera sua. Unde ratio numeri contemnenda non est, quae in multis sanctarum scripturarum locis quam magni aestimanda sit elucet diligenter intuentibus. Nec frustra in laudibus Dei dictum est: Omnia in mensura et numero et pondere deposuisti.

ENGLISH

is. One can say this of one, for it is its tenth part. Ten also has a fifth, which is two, and a half, which is five. But these three parts of it, the tenth, the fifth and the half—that is, one, two and five—added together do not make ten; they make eight.

The parts of twelve, on the other hand, when added up, exceed it. It has a twelfth, which is one; a sixth, which is two; a quarter, which is three; a third, which is four; and a half, which is six. But one, two, three, four and six make not twelve but more, namely sixteen. I thought I should mention this briefly to commend the perfection of the number six, which, as I said, is the first to be completed by its own parts added together; and it was in six that God completed his works. So the meaning of number should not be despised. How highly it ought to be valued shines out, for those who look carefully, in many passages of the holy Scriptures. Nor was it said in vain in the praise of God: "You have ordered all things in measure and number and weight."[32]

THE SEVENTH DAY, IN WHICH FULLNESS AND REST ARE COMMENDED

Seven signifies wholeness and God's rest; the angels already enjoy that rest.

LATIN

11.31 In septimo autem die, id est eodem die septiens repetito, qui numerus etiam ipse alia ratione perfectus est, Dei requies commendatur, in qua primum sanctificatio sonat. Ita Deus noluit istum diem in ullis suis operibus sanctificare, sed in requie sua, quae non habet uesperam; neque enim ulla creatura est, ut etiam ipse aliter in Dei Verbo, aliter in se cognita faciat aliam uelut diurnam, aliam uelut uespertinam notitiam. De septenarii porro numeri perfectione dici quidem plura possunt; sed et liber iste iam prolixus est, et uereor ne occasione conperta scientiolam nostram leuiter magis quam utiliter iactare uelle uideamur. Habenda est itaque ratio moderationis adque grauitatis, ne forte, cum de numero multum loquimur, mensuram et pondus neglegere iudicemur.

Hoc itaque satis sit admonere, quod totus inpar primus numerus ternarius est, totus par quaternarius; ex quibus duobus septenarius constat. Ideo pro uniuerso saepe ponitur, sicuti est: Septiens cadet iustus, et resurget; id

ENGLISH

On the seventh day, that is, the same day repeated seven times, God's rest is set before us, and seven is itself a perfect number for another reason. In this rest we first hear of sanctification. So God chose to sanctify this day not in any of his works but in his rest, which has no evening. For his rest is not a creature, which, being known one way in the Word of God and another way in itself, would produce one kind of knowledge like daytime and another like evening. Much more could be said about the perfection of the number seven. But this book is already long, and I am afraid that, having found an opening, I may seem to want to show off my bit of learning more frivolously than usefully. I must therefore keep to moderation and seriousness, or I may be judged to neglect measure and weight while talking so much about number.

Let it be enough, then, to point out that three is the first wholly odd number and four the first wholly even number, and seven is made up of these two. That is why it is often used for the 32 Wisdom of Solomon 11:20.

LATIN	ENGLISH
est: Quotienscumque ceciderit, non peribit; quod non de iniquitatibus, sed de tribulationibus ad humilitatem perducentibus intellegi uoluit: et: Septiens in die laudabo te; quod alibi alio modo dictum est: Semper laus eius in ore meo; et multa huius modi in diuinis auctoritatibus reperiuntur, in quibus septenarius numerus, ut dixi, pro cuiusque rei uniuersitate poni solet. Propter hoc eodem saepe numero significatur Spiritus sanctus, de quo Dominus ait: Docebit uos omnem ueritatem. Ibi requies Dei, qua requiescitur in Deo. In toto quippe, id est in plena perfectione, requies; in parte autem labor.	whole, as in: "Seven times the righteous man will fall, and rise again." That is: however often he falls, he will not perish. The text means this to be understood not of sins but of tribulations that lead to humility. Again: "Seven times a day I will praise you," which is said elsewhere in another way: "His praise is always in my mouth." Many passages of this kind are found in the divine authorities, in which, as I said, the number seven is regularly used for the entirety of a thing. For this reason the Holy Spirit is often signified by this same number, the Spirit of whom the Lord says: "He will teach you all truth." There is God's rest, the rest by which we rest in God. For in the whole, that is, in full perfection, there is rest; but in the part there is toil.[33]
Ideo laboramus, quamdiu ex parte scimus, sed cum uenerit quod perfectum est, quod ex parte est euacuabitur. Hinc est quod etiam scripturas istas cum labore rimamur. Sancti uero angeli quorum societati et congregationi in hac peregrinatione laboriosissima suspiramus, sicut habent permanendi aeternitatem, ita cognoscendi facilitatem et requiescendi felicitatem. Sine difficultate quippe nos adiuuant, quoniam spiritalibus motibus puris et liberis non laborant.	So we toil as long as we know in part, "but when the perfect comes, what is in part will be done away with." That is why we search even these Scriptures with toil. But the holy angels, for whose fellowship and company we sigh on this most toilsome pilgrimage, have ease in knowing and happiness in resting, just as they have eternity in abiding. They help us without difficulty, for in their spiritual movements, pure and free, they do not toil.[34]

THE OPINION OF THOSE WHO HOLD THAT THE ANGELS WERE CREATED BEFORE THE WORLD

Even if the angels were made before the world, Genesis still sets the Trinity at its opening.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.32 Ne quis autem contendat et dicat non sanctos angelos esse significatos in eo quod scriptum est: Fiat lux, et facta est lux, sed quamlibet lucem tunc primum factam esse corpoream ant opinetur aut doceat; angelos autem prius esse factos non tantum ante firmamentum, quod inter aquas et aquas factum appellatum est caelum, sed ante illud de quo dictum est: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram; adque illud, quod dictum est: In principio, non ita dictum tamquam primum hoc factum sit, cum ante fecerit angelos, sed quia omnia in sapientia fecit, quod est Verbum eius et ipsum scriptura principium nominauit (sicut ipse in euangelio Iudaeis quaerentibus quis esset respondit se esse principium): non e contrario referam contentionem, maxime quia hoc me delectat plurimum, quod etiam in summo exordio sancti libri geneseos trinitas commendatur.	Someone may argue that the holy angels are not meant by the words "Let there be light, and there was light." He may think or teach that some light or other, a bodily light, was made for the first time then. He may hold that the angels were made earlier, not only before the firmament that was made between the waters and the waters and called heaven, but even before what is meant in the words "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." And he may say that "In the beginning" does not mean that this was made first, since God had made the angels before it, but that he made all things in wisdom, which is his Word, and which Scripture itself has called the beginning (just as he himself, in the Gospel, answered the Jews who 33 Proverbs 24:16; Psalm 118:164 (119:164 in most English Bibles); Psalm 33:2 (34:1 in most English Bibles); John 16:13.

34 1 Corinthians 13:9–10.

LATIN	ENGLISH
	asked who he was that he was the beginning). I will not meet such a person with a counter-argument, especially because it delights me greatly that the Trinity is set before us at the very opening of the holy book of Genesis.[35]
Cum enim ita dicitur: In principio fecit Deus caelum et terram, ut Pater fecisse intellegatur in Filio, sicut adtestatur psalmus, ubi legitur: Quam magnificata sunt opera tua Domine! omnia in sapientia fecisti: conuenientissime paulo post commemoratur etiam Spiritus sanctus. Cum enim dictum esset, qualem terram Deus primitus fecerit, uel quam molem materiamue futurae constructionis mundi caeli et terrae nomine nuncupauerit subiciendo et addendo: Terra autem erat inuisibilis et inconposita et tenebrae erant super abyssum: mox ut trinitatis commemoratio conpleretur: Et spiritus, inquit, dei superferebatur super aquam.	For "In the beginning God made heaven and earth" is said in such a way that we understand the Father to have made them in the Son, as the psalm attests where we read: "How great are your works, O Lord! You have made all things in wisdom." And then, most fittingly, the Holy Spirit too is mentioned a little later. For Scripture first says what kind of earth God made at the start, or what mass or matter for the future building of the world he called by the name "heaven and earth," by adding: "But the earth was invisible and unformed, and darkness was over the abyss." Then at once, to complete the mention of the Trinity, it says: "And the spirit of God was borne over the water."[36]
Proinde ut uolet quisque accipiat, quod ita profundum est, ut ad exercitationem legentium a fidei regula non abhorrentes plures possit generare sententias, dum tamen angelos sanctos in sublimibus sedibus non quidem Deo coaeternos, sed tamen de sua sempiterna et uera felicitate securos et certos esse nemo ambigat. Ad quorum societatem pertinere paruulos suos Dominus docens non solum illud ait: Erunt aequales angelis Dei; uerum ipsi quoque angeli qua contemplatione fruantur ostendit, ubi ait: Videte, ne contemnatis unum ex pusillis istis; dico enim uobis, quia angeli eorum in caelis semper uident faciem Patris mei, qui in caelis est.	So let each person take this as he will. The passage is so deep that, to exercise its readers, it can give rise to several interpretations that do not conflict with the rule of faith. The one condition is that no one doubt that the holy angels in their lofty dwellings, though not coeternal with God, are nonetheless secure and certain of their everlasting and true happiness. The Lord taught that his little ones belong to their fellowship. He not only said, "They will be equal to the angels of God." He also showed what contemplation the angels themselves enjoy, when he said: "See that you do not despise one of these little ones; for I tell you that their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father who is in heaven."[37]

THE TWO DIFFERENT AND UNEQUAL COMMUNITIES OF ANGELS, WHICH ARE FITTINGLY UNDERSTOOD TO BE CALLED BY THE NAMES OF LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Light and darkness fittingly name the two angelic societies, one loving God, the other swollen with pride.

LATIN	ENGLISH
11.33 Peccasse autem quosdam angelos et in huius mundi ima detrusos, qui eis uelut carcer est, usque ad futuram in die iudicii ultimam damnationem apostolus Petrus apertissime ostendit dicens, quod Deus angelis peccantibus non pepercerit, sed carceribus caliginis	That some angels sinned and were thrust down into the lowest parts of this world, which is a kind of prison for them, until their final condemnation to come on the day of judgment, the apostle Peter shows very plainly. He says that God did not spare

35 Genesis 1:3 and 1:1; John 8:25, where Augustine's Latin has Jesus answer "the beginning."
36 Psalm 103:24 (104:24 in most English Bibles); Genesis 1:2.
37 Matthew 22:30 (compare Luke 20:36); Matthew 18:10.

LATIN

inferi retrudens tradiderit in iudicio puniendos reseruari. Inter hos ergo et illos Deum uel praescientia uel opere diuisisse quis dubitet? illosque lucem merito appellari quis contradicat? quando quidem nos adhuc in fide uiuentes eorum aequalitatem adhuc sperantes, utique nondum tenentes, iam lux dicti ab apostolo sumus: Fuistis enim, inquit, aliquando tenebrae, nunc autem lux in Domino. Istos uero desertores tenebras aptissime nuncupari profecto aduertunt, qui peiores esse hominibus infidelibus siue intellegunt siue credunt.

Quapropter, etsi alia lux in isto huius libri loco intellegenda est, ubi legimus: Dixit Deus: Fiat lux, et facta est lux, et aliae tenebrae significatae sunt in eo quod scriptum est: Diuisit Deus inter lucem et tenebras: nos tamen has duas angelicas societates, unam fruentem Deo, alteram tumentem typho; unam cui dicitur: Adorate eum omnes angeli eius, aliam cuius princeps dicit: Haec omnia tibi dabo, si prostratus adoraueris me: unam Dei sancto amore flagrantem, alteram propriae celsitudinis inmundo amore fumantem; et quoniam, sicut scriptum est, Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam, illam in caelis caelorum habita.item, istam inde deiectam in hoc infimo aerio caelo tumultuantem; illam luminosa pietate tranquillam, istam tenebrosis cupiditatibus turbulentam; illam Dei nutu clementer subuenientem, iuste ulciscentem, istam suo fastu subdendi et nocendi libidine exaestuantem;

illam, ut quantum uult consulat, Dei bonitati ministram, istam, ne quantum uult noceat, Dei potestate frenatam; illam huic inludentem ut nolens prosit persecutionibus suis, hanc illi inuidentem, cum peregrinos colligit suos, — nos ergo has duas societates angelicas inter se dispares adque contrarias, unam et natura bonam et uoluntate rectam, aliam uero natura bonam, sed uoluntate peruersam, aliis manifestioribus diuinarum scripturarum testimoniis declaratas, quod etiam in hoc libro, cui

ENGLISH

the angels who sinned, but thrust them into the prisons of the gloom of the underworld and handed them over to be kept for punishment at the judgment. Who, then, would doubt that God, whether by foreknowledge or by action, made a division between these and the others? And who would deny that the others are rightly called light? For even we, who still live by faith and still hope for equality with them and certainly do not yet possess it, have already been called light by the apostle: "For you were once darkness," he says, "but now you are light in the Lord." As for these deserters, anyone who understands or believes that they are worse than unbelieving human beings surely sees that they are most fittingly called darkness.[38]

