Claudere lustrum. Nature se deuoit contenter d'auoir rendu cet aage miserable, sans le rendre encore ridicule. Ie hay de le voir, pour vn pouce de chetiue vigueur, qui l'eschaufe trois fois la semaine, s'empresser et se gendarmer, de pareille aspreté, comme s'il auoit quelque grande et legitime iournee dans le ventre: vn vray feu d'estoupe.

Et admire sa cuisson, si viue et fretillante, en vn moment si lourdement congelee et esteinte. Cet appetit ne deuroit appartenir qu'à la fleur d'vne belle ieunesse. Fiez vous y, pour voir, à seconder cett' ardeur indefatigable, pleine, constante, et magnanime, qui est en vous: il vous la lairra vrayment en beau chemin.

ENGLISH

neither his parts nor his efforts answering to the hope she had conceived of them on seeing his stature, his beauty, his youth and his vigor, by which she had been taken in and deceived. They can plead too that the active part takes more effort than the passive: so that on their side, at least, the need is always provided for, whereas on ours it may turn out otherwise.[71]

For this reason Plato wisely provides in his Laws that before any marriage, to decide whether it is suitable, the judges should see the young men who seek it stark naked, and the girls naked only to the waist. When they try us out, they may find us unworthy of their choice: Having tried his loins, and found his groin just like a sodden strap, unable to stand even when urged by her tired hand, she deserts the unwarlike marriage bed. It is not enough for the will to go straight. Weakness and incapacity lawfully break a marriage: And she would have to look elsewhere for something more sinewy, able to untie a virgin's girdle. Why not, then, and in her own measure, a love affair more licentious and more active? if he cannot last out the sweet labor.

But is it not great impudence to bring our imperfections and weaknesses to a place where we wish to please, and to leave a good opinion and recommendation of ourselves behind? For the little I need nowadays, limp after a single bout, I would not want to trouble a person whom I must revere and fear. Have no suspicion of a man whose age has hurried on to close its eleventh lustrum. Nature should have been content to make this age miserable without making it ridiculous as well. I hate to see it, for an inch of puny vigor that heats it three times a week, bustle and swagger with as much eagerness as if it had some great and lawful battle in its belly: a real fire of straw.[72]

And I marvel at its heat, so lively and frisky, being in a moment so heavily frozen and snuffed out. This appetite ought to belong only to the flower of a fine youth. Just trust it, and see, to second that tireless, full, constant and magnanimous ardor 71 Joanna I of Naples; her husband Andrew of Hungary was murdered at Aversa in AD 1345.

72 Horace, Odes II.4; a lustrum is five years, so the speaker is fifty-five, about Montaigne's age at the time.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

that is in you: it will leave you stranded halfway, I promise you.

Renuoyez le hardiment plustost vers quelque enfance molle, estonnee, et ignorante, qui tremble encore soubs la verge, et en rougisse, Indum sanguineo veluti violauerit ostro
Si quis ebur, vel mista rubent vbi lilia multa
Alba rosa. Qui peut attendre le lendemain, sans mourir de honte, le desdain de ces beaux yeux, consens de sa lascheté et impertinence: Et taciti fecere tamen conuitia vultus, il n'a iamais senty le contentement et la fierté, de les leur auoir battus et ternis, par le vigoureux exercice d'vne nuict officieuse et actiue. Quand i'en ay veu quelqu'vne s'ennuyer de moy, ie n'en ay point incontinent accusé sa legereté: i'ay mis en doubte, si ie n'auois pas raison de m'en prendre à Nature plustost.

Rather send it off boldly to some soft, bewildered and ignorant girlhood that still trembles under the rod and blushes at it, As when someone stains Indian ivory with blood-red purple, or when white lilies blush, mixed with many roses. The man who can wait for the next day without dying of shame, for the disdain of those lovely eyes that witnessed his slackness and ineptitude, And yet her silent face reproached me, has never felt the satisfaction and pride of having left them heavy and dim from the vigorous exercise of an obliging and active night. When I have seen a woman grow tired of me, I have not straightaway blamed her fickleness; I have wondered whether I had not better reason to blame Nature instead.

Certes elle m'a traitté illegitimement et inciuilement, Si non longa satis, si non benè mentula crassa:
Nimirum sapiunt vidéntque paruam
Matronæ quoque mentulam illibenter: et d'vne lesion enormissime. Chacune de mes pieces est esgalement mienne, que toute autre. Et nulle autre ne me fait plus proprement homme que cette cy.

Certainly she has treated me unfairly and unkindly, If the penis is not long enough, not thick enough:
no doubt matrons too know what's what, and look on a small penis with displeasure: and with the grossest of losses. Each of my parts is as much mine as any other. And no other makes me more properly a man than this one.[73]

MY PORTRAIT, ALL OF IT

Montaigne defends his frankness and owns his conduct as a lover.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.5.57 Ie doy au publiq vniuersellement mon pourtrait. La sagesse de ma leçon est en verité, en liberté, en essence, toute. Dedeignant au rolle de ses vrays deuoirs, ces petites regles, feintes, vsuelles, prouinciales. Naturelle toute, constante, generale. De laquelle sont filles, mais bastardes, la ciuilité, la ceremonie. Nous aurons bien les vices de l'apparence, quand nous aurons eu ceux de l'essence. Quand nous aurons faict à ceux icy, nous courrons sus aux autres, si nous trouuons qu'il y faille courir. Car il y a danger, que nous fantasions des offices nouueaux, pour excuser nostre negligence enuers les naturels offices, et pour les confondre. Qu'il soit ainsin, il se void, qu'és lieux, où les fautes sont malefices, les malefices ne sont que fautes.

I owe the public my portrait, complete. The wisdom of my teaching lies wholly in truth, in freedom, in essence. It disdains to put on the list of its true duties these petty rules, feigned, customary, provincial. It is wholly natural, constant, universal. Civility and ceremony are its daughters, but spurious ones. We shall get the better of the vices of appearance once we have got the better of those of essence. When we have done with these, we will fall upon the others, if we find that we must. For there is a danger that we invent new duties to excuse our neglect of the natural ones, and to confuse them. That this is so can be seen from the fact 73 The Latin is from the Priapea, ancient poems about the god Priapus. "Lésion énorme" was a legal term for grossly unfair loss in a bargain, grounds for annulling it.

FRENCH

Qu'és nations, où les loix de la bienseance sont plus rares et lasches, les loix primitiues de la raison commune sont mieux obseruees: l'innumerable multitude de tant de deuoirs, suffoquant nostre soing, l'allanguissant et dissipant. L'application aux legeres choses nous retire des iustes. O que ces hommes superficiels, prennent vne routte facile et plausible, au prix de la nostre! Ce sont ombrages, dequoy nous nous plastrons et entrepayons. Mais nous n'en payons pas, ainçois en rechargeons nostre debte, enuers ce grand iuge, qui trousse nos panneaus et haillons, d'autour noz parties honteuses: et ne se feint point à nous veoir par tout, iusques à noz intimes et plus secrettes ordures: vtile decence de nostre virginale pudeur, si elle luy pouuoit interdire cette descouuerte.

En fin, qui desniaiseroit l'homme, d'vne si scrupuleuse superstition verbale, n'apporteroit pas grande perte au monde. Nostre vie est partie en folie, partie en prudence. Qui n'en escrit que reuerемment et regulierement, il en laisse en arriere plus de la moitié. Ie ne m'excuse pas enuers moy: et si ie le faisoy, ce seroit plustost de mes excuses, que ie m'excuseroy, que d'autre mienne faute. Ie m'excuse à certaines humeurs, que i'estime plus fortes en nombre que celles, qui sont de mon costé.

En leur consideration, ie diray encore cecy (car ie desire de contenter chacun; chose pourtant difficile, esse vnum hominem accommodatum ad tantam morum ac sermonum et voluntatum varietatem) qu'ils n'ont à se prendre à moy, de ce que ie fay dire aux auctoritez receuës et approuuees de plusieurs siecles: et que ce n'est pas raison, qu'à faute de rythme ils me refusent la dispense, que mesme des hommes ecclesiastiques, des nostres, iouyssent en ce siecle. En voicy deux, et des plus crestez: Rimula, dispeream, ni monogramma tua est. / Vn vit d'amy la contente et bien traitte. Quoy tant d'autres? I'ayme la modestie: et n'est par iugement, que i'ay choisi cette sorte de parler scandaleux: c'est Nature, qui l'a choisi pour moy.

Ie ne le louë, non plus que toutes formes contraires à l'vsage receu: mais ie l'excuse: par circonstances tant that in places where faults are crimes, crimes are only faults.

ENGLISH

And that in nations where the laws of propriety are fewer and looser, the primary laws of common reason are better observed, since the countless multitude of so many duties smothers our care, making it languid and scattering it. Attention to trivial things draws us away from the proper ones. Oh, what an easy and plausible road these superficial men take, compared with ours! These are shadows with which we plaster ourselves over and pay one another. But we do not pay with them; rather, we add to our debt toward that great Judge who lifts our flaps and rags from around our shameful parts, and does not hesitate to see us all over, down to our most intimate and secret filth. A useful decency, that maidenly modesty of ours, if it could forbid him this discovery.

In short, whoever cured man of so scrupulous a verbal superstition would do the world no great harm. Our life is partly folly, partly prudence. Whoever writes of it only reverently and by the rules leaves more than half of it out. I do not make excuses to myself; and if I did, it would be for my excuses that I would excuse myself, rather than for any other fault of mine. I make my excuses to certain temperaments, which I reckon to be more numerous than those on my side.

For their sake I will say this too (for I wish to satisfy everyone, a hard thing nonetheless, for one man to adapt himself to so great a variety of manners, speech and inclinations): that they have no cause to blame me for what I make authorities say that have been accepted and approved for many centuries; and that it is not reasonable, just because I do not write in rhyme, to refuse me the license that even churchmen, some of our own, enjoy in this age. Here are two, and from some of the proudest crests: May I perish if your little slit is more than a single line. / A friend's member pleases her and treats her well. And what of so many others? I love modesty; and it is not by judgment that I have chosen this scandalous way of speaking: it is Nature that chose it for me.[74]

I do not praise it, any more than any other ways contrary to accepted usage; but I excuse it, and by 74 The first Latin is from the Handbook on Electioneering ascribed to Quintus Cicero; the two lines are by the Calvinist theologian Théodore de Bèze and the court poet and royal almoner Mellin de Saint-Gelais.

FRENCH

generales que particulieres, en allege l'accusation. Suiuons.

3.5.58 Pareillement d'où peut venir cette vsurpation d'authorité souueraine, que vous prenez sur celles, qui vous fauorisent à leurs despens, Si furtiua dedit nigra munuscula nocte, que vous en inuestissez incontinent l'interest, la froideur, et vne auctorité maritale? C'est vne conuention libre, que ne vous y prenez vous, comme vous les y voulez tenir? Il n'y a point de prescription sur les choses volontaires.

C'est contre la forme, mais il est vray pourtant, que i'ay en mon temps conduict ce marché, selon que sa nature peut souffrir, aussi conscientieusement qu'autre marché, et auec quelque air de iustice: et que ie ne leur ay tesmoigné de mon affection, que ce que i'en sentois; et leur en ay representé naifuement, la decadence, la vigueur, et la naissance: les accez et les remises. On n'y va pas tousiours vn train. I'ay esté si espargnant à promettre, que ie pense auoir plus tenu que promis, ny deu. Elles y ont trouué de la fidelité, iusques au seruice de leur inconstance. Ie dis inconstance aduouee, et par fois multipliee.

Ie n'ay iamais rompu auec elles, tant que i'y tenois, ne fust que par le bout d'vn filet. Et quelques occasions qu'elles m'en ayent donné, n'ay iamais rompu, iusques au mespris et à la hayne. Car telles priuautez, lors mesme qu'on les acquiert par les plus honteuses conuentions, encores m'obligent elles à quelque bien-vueillance. De cholere et d'impatience vn peu indiscrette, sur le poinct de leurs ruses et desfuites, et de nos contestations, ie leur en ay faict voir par fois. Car ie suis de ma complexion, subiect à des emotions brusques, qui nuisent souuent à mes marchez, quoy qu'elles soyent legeres et courtes.

Si elles ont voulu essayer la liberté de mon iugement, ie ne me suis pas feint, à leur donner des aduis paternels et mordans, et à les pinser où il leur cuysoit. Si ie leur ay laissé à se plaindre de moy, c'est plustost d'y auoir trouué vn amour, au prix de l'vsage moderne, sottement consciencieux. I'ay obserué ma parolle, és choses dequoy on m'eust aysement dispensé. Elles se rendoient lors par fois auec reputation, et soubs des capitulations, qu'elles souffroient aysement estre faussees par le vaincueur. I'ay faict caler soubs l'interest de leur honneur, le plaisir, en son plus grand effort, plus d'vne fois.

ENGLISH

circumstances both general and particular I lighten the charge. Let us go on.

Likewise, where can it come from, this usurpation of sovereign authority that you assume over the women who favor you at their own expense, If she has given stolen little gifts in the dark of night, so that you at once take on the rights, the coolness and the authority of a husband? It is a free agreement: why do you not hold yourselves to it as you want to hold them? No rights can be acquired by prescription in things done voluntarily.

It is against the fashion, but it is true nonetheless, that in my time I conducted this bargain, as far as its nature allows, as conscientiously as any other bargain, and with some semblance of justice; that I showed them no more affection than I felt, and represented to them plainly its decline, its vigor and its birth, its fits and its lulls. One does not always go at the same pace. I was so sparing in my promises that I think I have kept more than I promised or owed. They found me faithful, even to the point of serving their inconstancy. I mean an inconstancy openly admitted, and sometimes multiplied.

I never broke with them as long as I was still attached, even if only by the end of a thread. And whatever cause they gave me, I never broke off to the point of contempt and hatred. For such intimacies, even when obtained by the most shameful agreements, still bind me to some goodwill. I have sometimes shown them anger and somewhat indiscreet impatience over their tricks and evasions, and over our quarrels. For by my constitution I am subject to sudden emotions that often harm my dealings, though they are light and brief.

If they wanted to test the freedom of my judgment, I did not hesitate to give them fatherly and biting advice, and to pinch them where it smarted. If I have left them any cause to complain of me, it is rather that they found in me a love that was, by modern standards, foolishly conscientious. I kept my word in matters where I would easily have been released from it. They sometimes surrendered then with their reputation intact, and on terms of capitulation that they readily allowed the victor to break. More than once I have made pleasure, at its very height, strike sail before the interest of their honor.

FRENCH

Et où la raison me pressoit, les ay armees contre moy: si qu'elles se conduisoient plus seurement et seuerement, par mes regles, quand elles s'y estoient franchement remises, qu'elles n'eussent faict par les leurs propres. I'ay autant que i'ay peu chargé sur moy seul, le hazard de nos assignations, pour les en descharger: et ay dressé nos parties tousiours par le plus aspre, et inopiné, pour estre moins en souspçon, et en outre par mon aduis, plus accessible. Ils sont ouuerts, principalement par les endroits qu'ils tiennent de soy couuerts. Les choses moins craintes sont moins defendues et obseruees. On peut oser plus aysement, ce que personne ne pense que vous oserez, qui deuient facile par sa difficulté.

Iamais homme n'eut ses approches plus impertinemment genitales. Cette voye d'aymer, est plus selon la discipline. Mais combien elle est ridicule à nos gens, et peu effectuelle, qui le sçait mieux que moy? Si ne m'en viendra point le repentir. Ie n'y ay plus que perdre, Me tabula sacer
Votiua paries indicat vuida,
Suspendisse potenti
Vestimenta maris Deo. Il est à cette heure temps d'en parler ouuertement.

Mais tout ainsi comme à vn autre, ie dirois à l'auanture, Mon amy tu resues, l'amour de ton temps a peu de commerce auec la foy et la preud'hommie; Hæc si tu postules
Ratione certa facere, nihilo plus agas,
Quàm si des operam, vt cum ratione insanias. Aussi au rebours, si c'estoit à moy de recommencer, ce seroit certes le mesme train et par mesme progrez, pour infructueux qu'il me peust estre. L'insuffisance et la sottise est loüable en vne action meslouable. Autant que ie m'eslongne de leur humeur en cela, ie m'approche de la mienne.

ENGLISH

And where reason pressed me, I armed them against me, so that they conducted themselves more safely and strictly by my rules, once they had freely put themselves in my hands, than they would have by their own. As far as I could, I took on myself alone the risk of our assignations, to relieve them of it; and I always arranged our meetings by the hardest and least expected way, to be less suspected and also, in my opinion, more accessible. People are open chiefly at the points they consider covered by themselves. Things less feared are less defended and watched. You can more easily dare what no one thinks you will dare, which becomes easy by its very difficulty.

Never did a man make his approaches more ineptly genital. This way of loving is more in keeping with the rules. But how ridiculous it is to our people, and how ineffective, who knows better than I? Yet I shall not come to repent of it. I have nothing more to lose there: The sacred wall, by its votive tablet, shows that I have hung up my dripping garments to the mighty god who rules the sea. Now is the time to speak of it openly.

But just as I might perhaps say to another: "My friend, you are dreaming; love in your day has little to do with good faith and integrity; If you expect to make these things certain by reason, you will achieve no more than if you tried to go mad by reason"—so, on the other hand, if it were up to me to begin again, it would certainly be the same way and by the same steps, however fruitless it might prove for me. Incompetence and foolishness are praiseworthy in a blameworthy action. The further I move from their temperament in this, the closer I come to my own.

LOVE IN OLD AGE

Moderate love would revive an aging man, but he has little left to offer in return.

FRENCH

3.5.59 Au demeurant, en ce marché, ie ne me laissois pas tout aller: ie m'y plaisois, mais ie ne m'y oubliois pas: ie reseruois en son entier, ce peu de sens et de discretion, que Nature m'a donné, pour leur seruice, et pour le mien: vn peu d'esmotion, mais point de resuerie. Ma conscience s'y engageoit aussi, iusques à la desbauche et dissolution,

ENGLISH

Besides, in this business I did not let myself go entirely. I enjoyed it, but I did not forget myself; I kept intact the little sense and discretion that Nature has given me, for their service and for mine: a little excitement, but no delirium. My conmais iusques à l'ingratitude, trahison, malignité, et cruauté, non. Ie n'achetois pas le plaisir de ce vice à tout prix: et me contentois de son propre et simple coust. Nullum intra se vitium est. Ie hay quasi à pareille mesure vne oysiueté croupie et endormie, comme vn embesongnement espineux et penible. L'vn me pince, l'autre m'assoupit.

FRENCH

I'ayme autant les blesseures, comme les meurtrisseures, et les coups trenchans, comme les coups orbes. I'ay trouué en ce marché, quand i'y estois plus propre, vne iuste moderation entre ces deux extremitez. L'amour est vne agitation esueillee, viue, et gaye. Ie n'en estois ny troublé, ny affligé, mais i'en estois eschauffé, et encores alteré: il s'en faut arrester là. Elle n'est nuisible qu'aux fols. Vn ieune homme demandoit au philosophe Panetius, s'il sieroit bien au sage d'estre amoureux: Laissons là le sage, respondit-il, mais toy et moy, qui ne le sommes pas, ne nous engageons en chose si esmeuë et violente, qui nous esclaue à autruy, et nous rende contemptibles à nous.

Il disoit vray: qu'il ne faut pas fier chose de soy si precipiteuse, à vne ame qui n'aye dequoy en soustenir les venues, et dequoy rabatre par effect la parole d'Agesilaus, que la prudence et l'amour ne peuuent ensemble. C'est vne vaine occupation, il est vray, messeante, honteuse, et illegitime. Mais à la conduire en cette façon, ie l'estime salubre, propre à desgourdir vn esprit, et vn corps poisant. Et comme medecin, l'ordonnerois à vn homme de ma forme et condition, autant volontiers qu'aucune autre recepte: pour l'esueiller et tenir en force bien auant dans les ans, et le dilaier des prises de la vieillesse.

Pendant que nous n'en sommes qu'aux fauxbourgs, que le pouls bat encores, Dum noua canities, dum prima et recta senectus,
Dum superest Lachesi quod torqueat, et pedibus me
Porto meis, nullo dextram subeunte bacillo, nous auons besoing d'estre sollicitez et chatouillez, par quelque agitation mordicante, comme est cette-cy. Voyez combien elle a rendu de ieunesse, vigueur et de gayeté, au sage Anacreon.

Et Socrates, plus vieil que ie ne suis, parlant d'vn obiect amoureux: M'estant, dit-il, appuyé contre son espaule, de la mienne, et approché ma teste à la sienne, ainsi que nous regardions ensemble dans vn liure, ie senty sans science was engaged in it too, as far as debauchery and dissoluteness, but as far as ingratitude, treachery, malice and cruelty, no. I did not buy the pleasure of this vice at any price, and was content with its own simple cost. No vice is confined to itself. I hate almost equally a stagnant, sleepy idleness and a thorny, painful busyness. The one pricks me, the other puts me to sleep.

ENGLISH

I like wounds as much as bruises, and cutting blows as much as blunt ones. In this business, when I was more fit for it, I found a just moderation between these two extremes. Love is a wakeful, lively and cheerful agitation. I was neither troubled nor afflicted by it, but I was warmed by it, and stirred as well: that is where one must stop. It is harmful only to fools. A young man asked the philosopher Panaetius whether it would become a wise man to be in love. "Let us leave the wise man aside," he answered, "but you and I, who are not wise, let us not get involved in something so agitated and violent, which enslaves us to another and makes us contemptible to ourselves."

He spoke truly: one should not entrust so headlong a thing to a soul that has not the means to withstand its assaults, and to refute in practice the saying of Agesilaus, that prudence and love cannot go together. It is a vain occupation, it is true: unseemly, shameful and illegitimate. But conducted in this way, I consider it healthy, fit to rouse a sluggish mind and body. And as a doctor I would prescribe it to a man of my build and condition as willingly as any other prescription, to wake him up and keep him vigorous well on into his years, and to put off the grip of old age.

While we are only in its outskirts, while the pulse still beats, While my white hair is new, while old age is fresh and upright, while Lachesis still has thread to spin, and I carry myself on my own feet, with no staff to prop my right hand, we need to be roused and tickled by some biting agitation like this one. See how much youth, vigor and gaiety it gave back to the wise Anacreon.[75]

And Socrates, who was older than I am, said of an object of his love: "As I leaned my shoulder against his, and brought my head close to his while we were looking at a book together, I felt, truly, a sud-

75 Anacreon wrote of love and wine into old age.

FRENCH

mentir, soudain vne piqueure dans l'espaule, comme de quelque morsure de beste; et fus plus de cinq iours depuis, qu'elle me fourmilloit: et m'escoula dans le cœur vne demangeaison continuelle. Vn attouchement, et fortuite, et par vne espaule, aller eschauffer, et alterer vne ame refroidie, et esneruee par l'aage, et la premiere de toutes les humaines, en reformation. Pourquoy non dea? Socrates estoit homme, et ne vouloit ny estre ny sembler autre chose.

La philosophie n'estriue point contre les voluptez naturelles, pourueu que la mesure y soit ioincte: et en presche la moderation, non la fuitte. L'effort de sa resistance s'emploie contre les estrangeres et bastardes. Elle dit que les appetits du corps ne doiuent pas estre augmentez par l'esprit. Et nous aduertit ingenieusement, de ne vouloir point esueiller nostre faim par la saturité: de ne vouloir farcir, au lieu de remplir le ventre: d'euiter toute iouyssance, qui nous met en disette: et toute viande et breuuage, qui nous altere, et affame.

Comme au seruice de l'amour elle nous ordonne, de prendre vn obiect qui satisface simplement au besoing du corps, qui n'esmeuue point l'ame: laquelle n'en doit pas faire son faict, ains suyure nüement et assister le corps. Mais ay-ie pas raison d'estimer, que ces preceptes, qui ont pourtant d'ailleurs, selon moy, vn peu de rigueur, regardent vn corps qui face son office: et qu'à vn corps abbattu, comme vn estomach prosterné, il est excusable de le rechauffer et soustenir par art: et par l'entremise de la fantasie, luy faire reuenir l'appetit et l'allegresse, puis que de soy il l'a perdue?

3.5.60 Pouuons nous pas dire, qu'il n'y a rien en nous, pendant cette prison terrestre, purement, ny corporel, ny spirituel: et qu'iniurieusement nous desmembrons vn homme tout vif: et qu'il semble y auoir raison, que nous nous portions enuers l'vsage du plaisir, aussi fauorablement aumoins, que nous faisons enuers la douleur? Elle estoit, pour exemple, vehemente, iusques à la perfection, en l'ame des saincts par la pœnitence. Le corps y auoit naturellement part, par le droict de leur colligance, et si pouuoit auoir peu de part à la cause: si ne se sont ils pas contentez qu'il suyuist nuement, et assistast l'ame affligee.

Ils l'ont affligé luymesme, de peines atroces et propres: affin qu'à l'enuy l'vn de l'autre, l'ame et le corps plongeassent l'homme dans la douleur, d'autant plus den sting in my shoulder, like the bite of some animal; and for more than five days afterward it tingled, and a continual itch flowed into my heart." A touch, and an accidental one, and by a shoulder, to heat and stir a soul cooled and enfeebled by age, and the foremost of all human souls in reforming itself! And why not, indeed? Socrates was a man, and wanted neither to be nor to seem anything else.[76]

ENGLISH

Philosophy does not struggle against natural pleasures, provided measure goes with them; it preaches moderation in them, not flight. The force of its resistance is used against foreign and spurious ones. It says that the appetites of the body must not be increased by the mind. And it warns us ingeniously not to try to wake our hunger by surfeit; not to stuff the belly instead of filling it; to avoid every enjoyment that leaves us in want, and every food and drink that makes us thirsty and hungry.

So in the service of love it bids us take an object that simply satisfies the body's need and does not stir the soul, which must not make this its business, but merely follow and assist the body. But am I not right to think that these precepts, which in my view are rather rigorous anyway, concern a body that does its job; and that for a body that is run down, like a prostrate stomach, it is excusable to warm it and prop it up by art, and by means of the imagination to bring back its appetite and liveliness, since of itself it has lost them?

May we not say that there is nothing in us, during this earthly prison, that is purely either bodily or spiritual, and that it is wrong to dismember a living man; and that it seems reasonable for us to treat the enjoyment of pleasure at least as favorably as we treat pain? Pain, for example, was vehement to the point of perfection in the souls of the saints through penitence. The body naturally had a share in it by right of their union, and yet could have had little share in the cause; still, they were not content that it should merely follow and assist the afflicted soul.

They afflicted the body itself with atrocious pains of its own, so that, vying with each other, soul and body might plunge the man into pain, all the more 76 The story comes from Xenophon's Symposium.

FRENCH

salutaire, que plus aspre. En pareil cas, aux plaisirs corporels, est-ce pas iniustice d'en refroidir l'ame, et dire, qu'il l'y faille entrainer, comme à quelque obligation et necessité contreinte et seruile? C'est à elle plustost de les couuer et fomenter: de s'y presenter et conuier: la charge de regir luy appartenant. Comme c'est aussi à mon aduis à elle, aux plaisirs, qui luy sont propres, d'en inspirer et infondre au corps tout le ressentiment que porte sa condition, et de s'estudier qu'ils luy soient doux et salutaires.

Car c'est bien raison, comme ils disent, que le corps ne suyue point ses appetits au dommage de l'esprit. Mais pourquoy n'est-ce pas aussi raison, que l'esprit ne suiue pas les siens, au dommage du corps?

3.5.61 Ie n'ay point autre passion qui me tienne en haleine. Ce que l'auarice, l'ambition, les querelles, les procés, font à l'endroit des autres, qui comme moy, n'ont point de vacation assignee, l'amour le feroit plus commodément.

Il me rendroit, la vigilance, la sobrieté, la grace, le soing de ma personne: r'asseureroit ma contenance, à ce que les grimaces de la vieillesse, ces grimaces difformes et pitoyables, ne vinssent à la corrompre: me remettroit aux estudes sains et sages, par où ie me peusse rendre plus estimé et plus aymé: ostant à mon esprit le desespoir de soy, et de son vsage, et le raccointant à soy: me diuertiroit de mille pensees ennuyeuses, de mille chagrins melancholiques que l'oysiueté nous charge en tel aage, et le mauuais estat de nostre santé: reschaufferoit aumoins en songe, ce sang que nature abandonne: soustiendroit le menton, et allongeroit vn peu les nerfs, et la vigueur et allegresse de la vie, à ce pauure homme, qui s'en va le grand train vers sa ruine.

Mais i'entens bien que c'est vne commodité fort malaisée à recouurer. Par foiblesse, et longue experience, nostre goust est deuenu plus tendre et plus exquis. Nous demandons plus, lors que nous apportons moins. Nous voulons le plus choisir, lors que nous meritons le moins d'estre acceptez. Nous cognoissans tels, nous sommes moins hardis, et plus defians: rien ne nous peut asseurer d'estre aymez, veu nostre condition, et la leur. I'ay honte de me trouuer parmy cette verte et bouillante ieunesse, Cuius in indomito constantior inguine neruus, / Quàm noua collibus arbor inhæret. Qu'irions nous presenter nostre misere parmy cette allégresse?

ENGLISH

salutary for being harsher. In the same case, with bodily pleasures, is it not unjust to chill the soul toward them and to say that it must be dragged to them as to some constrained and servile obligation and necessity? It is rather for the soul to brood over and foster them, to present itself and invite itself to them, since the charge of ruling belongs to it. Just as it is also, in my opinion, for the soul, in the pleasures proper to it, to inspire and infuse into the body all the feeling its nature can bear, and to strive to make them sweet and wholesome for it.

For it is quite right, as they say, that the body should not follow its appetites to the harm of the mind. But why is it not also right that the mind should not follow its own to the harm of the body?

I have no other passion to keep me on my toes. What avarice, ambition, quarrels and lawsuits do for others who, like me, have no assigned occupation, love would do more agreeably.

It would give me back watchfulness, sobriety, grace, care of my person. It would steady my bearing, so that the grimaces of old age, those deformed and pitiable grimaces, might not come to spoil it. It would bring me back to sound and wise studies, by which I might make myself more esteemed and more loved, freeing my mind from despair of itself and of its use, and reconciling it with itself. It would divert me from a thousand distressing thoughts, a thousand melancholy cares with which idleness and the poor state of our health burden us at such an age. It would warm again, at least in dreams, this blood that nature is abandoning. It would hold up the chin, and stretch a little the sinews, and the vigor and gaiety of life, for this poor man who is heading full tilt toward his ruin.

But I fully understand that it is a convenience very hard to come by. Through weakness and long experience, our taste has become more delicate and more refined. We ask more when we bring less. We want to choose most when we least deserve to be accepted. Knowing ourselves to be such, we are less bold and more distrustful: nothing can assure us that we are loved, given our condition and theirs. I am ashamed to find myself among this green and ebullient youth, whose sinew, in his untamed groin, stands firmer / than a young tree rooted

FRENCH

Possint vt iuuenes visere feruidi
Multo non sine risu,
Dilapsam in cineres facem. Ils ont la force et la raison pour eux: faisons leur place: nous n'auons plus que tenir. Et ce germe de beauté naissante, ne se laisse manier à mains si gourdes, et prattiquer à moyens purs materiels. Car, comme respondit ce philosophe ancien, à celuy qui se moquoit, dequoy il n'auoit sçeu gaigner la bonne grace d'vn tendron qu'il pourchassoit: Mon amy, le hameçon ne mord pas à du fromage si frais. Or c'est vn commerce qui a besoin de relation et de correspondance. Les autres plaisirs que nous receuons, se peuuent recognoistre par recompenses de nature diuerse: mais cettuy-cy ne se paye que de mesme espece de monnoye.

En verité en ce desduit, le plaisir que ie fay, chatouille plus doucement mon imagination, que celuy qu'on me fait. Or cil n'a rien de genereux, qui peut receuoir plaisir où il n'en donne point; c'est vne vile ame, qui veut tout deuoir, et qui se plaist de nourrir de la conference, auec les personnes ausquels il est en charge. Il n'y a beauté, ny grace, ny priuauté si exquise, qu'vn galant homme deust desirer à ce prix. Si elles ne nous peuuent faire du bien que par pitié: i'ayme bien plus cher ne viure point, que de viure d'aumosne.

Ie voudrois auoir droit de leur demander, au stile auquel i'ay veu quester en Italie: Fate bene per voi: ou à la guise que Cyrus exhortoit ses soldats, Qui m'aymera, si me suiue. R'alliez vous, me dira lon, à celles de vostre condition, que la compagnie de mesme fortune vous rendra plus aysees. O la sotte composition et insipide! Nolo / Barbam vellere mortuo leoni. Xenophon employe pour obiection et accusation, contre Menon, qu'en son amour il embesongna des obiects passants fleur. Ie trouue plus de volupté à seulement veoir le juste et doux meslange de deux ieunes beautés: ou à le seulement considerer par fantasie, qu'à faire moy mesme le second, d'vn meslange triste et informe.

Ie resigne cet appetit fantastique, à l'Empereur Galba, qui ne s'addonnoit qu'aux chairs dures et vieilles: et à ce on the hills. Why should we go and display our misery amid all this gaiety?

ENGLISH

So that the hot-blooded young men may see,
not without much laughter, the torch crumbled into ashes. They have strength and reason on their side; let us make way for them; we have nothing left to hold on to. And this bud of nascent beauty does not let itself be handled by such numb hands, or won by purely material means. For, as that ancient philosopher answered the man who mocked him for failing to win the favor of a young thing he was pursuing: "My friend, the hook won't bite into such fresh cheese." Now this is a commerce that requires relationship and reciprocity. The other pleasures we receive can be repaid with rewards of a different kind; but this one is paid only in coin of the same kind.[77]

Truly, in this sport, the pleasure I give tickles my imagination more sweetly than the pleasure I am given. Now there is nothing generous in a man who can receive pleasure where he gives none; it is a mean soul that wants to owe everything, and likes to keep up dealings with people to whom it is a burden. There is no beauty, no grace, no intimacy so exquisite that a gentleman should desire it at that price. If they can do us good only out of pity, I would much rather not live at all than live on alms.

I would like to have the right to ask it of them in the style I have seen beggars use in Italy: Do good for your own sake; or in the way Cyrus exhorted his soldiers: "Whoever loves me, follow me." "Take up with women of your own condition," someone will tell me, "whom the company of a common lot will make easier for you." Oh, what a stupid and insipid compromise! I do not want / to pluck the beard of a dead lion. Xenophon brings it as an objection and charge against Meno that in his love he took up with objects past their bloom. I find more pleasure in merely seeing the right and sweet blending of two young beauties, or merely contemplating it in imagination, than in making the second party myself in a sad and shapeless blending.[78]

I leave this fanciful appetite to the Emperor Galba, who went only for tough old flesh, and to this poor 77 Diogenes Laertius attributes this reply to the philosopher Bion of Borysthenes.

78 Meno of Thessaly was one of the Greek generals in Xenophon's Anabasis.

FRENCH

pauure miserable, O ego di faciant talem te cernere possim, Charáque mutatis oscula ferre comis,
Amplectique meis corpus non pingue lacertis! Et entre les premieres laideurs, ie compte les beautez artificielles et forcees. Emonez ieune gars de Chio, pensant par des beaux attours, acquerir la beauté que nature luy ostoit, se presenta au philosophe Arcesilaus: et luy demanda si vn sage se pourroit veoir amoureux: Ouy dea, respondit l'autre, pourueu que ce ne fust pas d'vne beauté paree et sophistiquee comme la tienne. La laideur d'vne vieillesse aduouee, est moins vieille, et moins laide à mon gré, qu'vne autre peinte et lissee.

Le diray-ie, pourueu qu'on ne m'en prenne à la gorge? L'amour ne me semble proprement et naturellement en sa saison, qu'en l'aage voisin de l'enfance: Quem si puellarum insereres choro,
Mille sagaces falleret hospites
Discrimen obscurum, solutis
Crinibus, ambiguóque vultu. Et la beauté non plus. Car ce qu'Homere l'estend iusqu'à ce que le menton commence à s'ombrager, Platon mesme l'a remarqué pour rare. Et est notoire la cause pour laquelle le sophiste Dion appelloit les poils folets de l'adolescence, Aristogitons et Harmodiens. En la virilité, ie le trouue desia aucunement hors de son siege, non qu'en la vieillesse.

Importunus enim transuolat aridas / Quercus. Et Marguerite Royne de Nauarre, alonge en femme, bien loing, l'auantage des femmes: ordonnant qu'il est saison à trente ans, qu'elles changent le titre de belles en bonnes. Plus courte possession nous luy donnons sur nostre vie, mieux nous en valons. Voyez son port. C'est vn menton puerile, qui ne sçait en son eschole, combien on procede au rebours de tout ordre. L'estude, l'exercitation, l'vsage, sont voyes à l'insuffisance: les nouices y regentent. Amor ordinem nescit. Certes sa conduicte a plus de galbe, quand elle est meslee d'inaduertance, et de trouble: les fautes, les succez contraires y donnent poincte et grace. Pourueu qu'elle soit aspre et affamee, il chaut peu, qu'elle soit prudente.

Voyez comme il va chancelant, chopant, et folastrant. On le met aux ceps, quand on le guide par art, et sagesse. Et wretch: O, may the gods grant that I might see you thus, and kiss your dear lips beneath your changed hair, and hold in my arms your body, no longer plump! And among the chief uglinesses I count artificial and forced beauties. Hemon, a young lad from Chios, thinking to acquire by fine adornments the beauty that nature denied him, came before the philosopher Arcesilaus and asked him whether a wise man could fall in love. "Yes indeed," the other replied, "provided it is not with a decked-out and adulterated beauty like yours." The ugliness of an avowed old age is less old and less ugly, to my taste, than another that is painted and smoothed over.[79]

ENGLISH

Shall I say it, provided no one grabs me by the throat for it? Love seems to me properly and naturally in season only in the age close to childhood:
If you set him in a chorus of girls, the subtle difference would deceive a thousand shrewd strangers, with his flowing hair and ambiguous face. And beauty likewise. For as to Homer extending it until the chin begins to be shadowed, Plato himself remarked on this as rare. And the reason is well known why the sophist Dion called the downy hairs of adolescence Aristogeitons and Harmodiuses. In manhood I find it already somewhat out of its proper place, let alone in old age.[80]

For he flies rudely past the withered / oaks. And Marguerite, queen of Navarre, like a woman, stretches the advantage of women a long way, decreeing that at thirty it is time for them to exchange the title of "beautiful" for "good." The shorter the hold we give love over our lives, the better off we are. Look at its bearing. It has a boy's chin. Who does not know how, in its school, everything proceeds against all order? Study, exercise and practice are roads to incompetence; novices are the masters there. Love knows no order. Certainly its conduct has more grace when mixed with heedlessness and confusion; mistakes and setbacks give it spice and charm. Provided it is keen and hungry, it matters little whether it is prudent.[81]

See how it goes staggering, stumbling and frolicking. You put it in the stocks when you guide it by 79 Galba was Roman emperor in AD 68–69.

80 The joke is that the first beard frees a youth from the tyranny of his lovers, as Harmodius and Aristogeiton freed Athens.

FRENCH

contraint on sa diuine liberté, quand on le submet à ces mains barbues et calleuses.

ENGLISH

skill and wisdom. And you constrain its divine freedom when you subject it to those bearded and calloused hands.

3.5.62 Au demeurant, ie leur oy souuent peindre cette intelligence toute spirituelle, et desdaigner de mettre en consideration l'interest que les sens y ont. Tout y sert. Mais ie puis dire auoir veu souuent, que nous auons excusé la foiblesse de leurs esprits, en faueur de leurs beautez corporelles, mais que ie n'ay point encore veu, qu'en faueur de l'esprit, tant rassis, et meur soit-il, elles vueillent prester la main à vn corps, qui tombe tant soit peu en decadence.

Que ne prend il enuie à quelqu'vne, de faire cette noble harde Socratique, du corps à l'esprit, achetant au prix de ses cuisses, vne intelligence et generation philosophique et spirituelle: le plus haut prix où elle les puisse monter: Platon ordonne en ses loix, que celuy qui aura faict quelque signalé et vtile exploit en la guerre, ne puisse estre refusé durant l'expedition d'icelle, sans respect de sa laideur ou de son aage, du baiser, ou autre faueur amoureuse, de qui il la vueille. Ce qu'il trouue si iuste en recommandation de la valeur militaire, ne le peut il pas estre aussi, en recommandation de quelque autre valeur?

Et que ne prend il enuie à vne de preoccuper sur ses compagnes la gloire de cet amour chaste? chaste dis-ie bien, Nam si quando ad prælia ventum est,
Vt quondam in stipulis magnus sine viribus ignis
Incassum furit. Les vices qui s'estouffent en la pensee, ne sont pas des pires.

Moreover, I often hear them describe this relationship as wholly spiritual, and disdain to take into account the part the senses play in it. Everything plays its part there. But I can say that I have often seen us excuse the weakness of their minds for the sake of their bodily beauty; whereas I have not yet seen them willing, for the sake of the mind, however settled and mature it may be, to lend a hand to a body that is falling even slightly into decline.

Why does it not occur to some woman to make that noble Socratic exchange of body for mind, buying at the price of her thighs a philosophical and spiritual understanding and offspring—the highest price she could get for them? Plato ordains in his Laws that whoever has performed some signal and useful exploit in war may not be refused, for the duration of that campaign, regardless of his ugliness or his age, a kiss or other amorous favor from whomever he wants it. What he finds so just as a reward for military valor, can it not be just also as a reward for some other kind of valor?

And why does it not occur to some woman to win, ahead of her companions, the glory of this chaste love? Chaste, I say advisedly: For if ever it comes to battle, his ardor rages in vain, like a great fire in stubble, without strength. The vices that are stifled in thought are not the worst.

THE SAME MOLD

Men and women are cast in the same mold; custom and education make the difference.

FRENCH

3.5.63 Pour finir ce notable commentaire, qui m'est eschappé d'vn flux de caquet: flux impetueux par fois et nuisible,
Vt missum sponsi furtiuo munere malum
Procurrit casto virginis è gremio:
Quod miseræ oblitæ molli sub veste locatum,
Dum aduentu matris prosilit, excutitur,
Atque illud prono præceps agitur decursu:
Huic manat tristi conscius ore rubor. Ie dis, que les masles et femelles, sont iettez en mesme moule, sauf l'institution et l'vsage, la difference n'y est pas grande. Platon appelle

ENGLISH

To finish this notable commentary, which has escaped me in a flood of chatter—a flood sometimes violent and harmful: As an apple, sent as a secret gift by her betrothed, rolls out of a maiden's chaste lap:
the poor girl had forgotten it, tucked under her soft gown, and when she jumps up at her mother's arrival it is shaken out, and goes rolling headlong down;

81 "Love knows no order" comes from a letter of Saint Jerome.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
indifferemment les vns et les autres, à la societé de tous estudes, exercices, charges et vacations guerrieres et paisibles, en sa republique. Et le philosophe Antisthenes, ostoit toute distinction entre leur vertu et la nostre.	a guilty blush spreads over her sad face. I say that males and females are cast in the same mold; except for education and custom, the difference is not great. Plato invites both alike to share in all studies, exercises, offices and occupations, in war and in peace, in his Republic. And the philosopher Antisthenes removed all distinction between their virtue and ours.
Il est bien plus aisé d'accuser l'vn sexe, que d'excuser l'autre. C'est ce qu'on dit, Le fourgon se moque de la paele.	It is much easier to accuse one sex than to excuse the other. It is as the saying goes: the poker mocks the shovel.

III.6 Of Coaches

Des Coches

From the pomp of royal coaches and spectacles, Montaigne turns to the Spanish conquest of the New World and condemns its cruelty.

FRENCH

3.6.1 IL est bien aisé à verifier, que les grands autheurs, escriuans des causes, ne se seruent pas seulement de celles qu'ils estiment estre vrayes, mais de celles encores qu'ils ne croient pas, pourueu qu'elles ayent quelque inuention et beauté. Ils disent assez veritablement et vtilement, s'ils disent ingenieusement. Nous ne pouuons nous asseurer de la maistresse cause, nous en entassons plusieurs, pour voir si par rencontre elle se trouuera en ce nombre, Namque vnam dicere causam / Non satis est, verum plures, vnde vna tamen sit.

3.6.2 Me demandez vous d'où vient cette coustume, de benir ceux qui esternuent? Nous produisons trois sortes de vent; celuy qui sort par embas est trop sale: celuy qui sort par la bouche, porte quelque reproche de gourmandise: le troisiesme est l'esternuement: et parce qu'il vient de la teste, et est sans blasme, nous luy faisons cet honneste recueil. Ne vous moquez pas de cette subtilité, elle est, dit-on, d'Aristote.

3.6.3 Il me semble auoir veu en Plutarque (qui est de tous les autheurs que ie cognoisse, celuy qui a mieux meslé l'art à la nature, et le iugement à la science) rendant la cause du sousleuement d'estomach, qui aduient à ceux qui voyagent en mer, que cela leur arriue de crainte, ayant trouué quelque raison, par laquelle il prouue, que la crainte peut produire vn tel effect. Moy qui y suis fort subiect, sçay bien, que cette cause ne me touche pas. Et le sçay, non par argument, mais par necessaire experience.

Sans alleguer ce qu'on m'a dict, qu'il en arriue de mesme souuent aux bestes, specialement aux pourceaux, hors de toute apprehension de danger: et ce qu'vn mien cognoissant, m'a tesmoigné de soy, qu'y estant fort subiect, l'enuie de vomir luy estoit passee, deux ou trois fois, se trouuant pressé de frayeur, en grande tourmente. Comme à cet ancien: Peius vexabar quàm vt periculum mihi succurreret. Ie n'euz iamais peur sur l'eau: comme ie n'ay

ENGLISH

It is very easy to verify that great authors, when writing about causes, use not only those they consider true but also those they do not believe, provided they have some inventiveness and beauty. They speak truly and usefully enough if they speak ingeniously. We cannot be sure of the master cause, so we pile up several, to see whether by chance it will be found among them: For it is not enough to state one cause, / but several, of which one, however, is the true one.[1]

Do you ask me where this custom comes from of blessing those who sneeze? We produce three kinds of wind. The one that goes out below is too dirty; the one that goes out through the mouth carries some reproach of gluttony; the third is the sneeze, and because it comes from the head and is blameless, we give it this courteous welcome. Do not laugh at this subtlety; it is, they say, Aristotle's.

I seem to remember seeing in Plutarch an explanation of the queasiness that comes over people traveling by sea. (Of all the authors I know, he is the one who has best blended art with nature, and judgment with learning.) He says it happens to them out of fear, having found some reason by which he proves that fear can produce such an effect. I am very prone to it, and I know well that this cause does not apply to me. And I know it not by argument but by unavoidable experience.

I will not cite what I have been told, that the same thing often happens to animals, especially pigs, without any apprehension of danger. Nor will I cite what an acquaintance of mine told me of himself: he was very prone to it, yet two or three times the urge to vomit left him when he found himself gripped by terror in a great storm. It was the same aussi ailleurs (et s'en est assez souuent offert de iustes, si la mort l'est) qui m'ait troublé ou esblouy. Elle naist par fois de faute de iugement, comme de faute de cœur. Tous les dangers que i'ay veu, ç'a esté les yeux ouuerts, la veuë libre, saine, et entiere.

1 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

FRENCH

Encore faut-il du courage à craindre. Il me seruit autrefois au prix d'autres, pour conduire et tenir en ordre ma fuite, qu'elle fust sinon sans crainte, toutesfois sans effroy, et sans estonnement. Elle estoit esmeue, mais non pas estourdie ny esperdue. Les grandes ames vont bien plus outre, et representent des fuites, non rassises seulement, et saines, mais fieres. Disons celle qu'Alcibiades recite de Socrates, son compagnon d'armes: Ie le trouuay, dit-il, apres la route de nostre armee, luy et Lachez, des derniers entre les fuyans: et le consideray tout à mon aise, et en seureté, car i'estois sur vn bon cheual, et luy à pied, et auions ainsi combatu.

Ie remarquay premierement, combien il montroit d'auisement et de resolution, au prix de Lachez: et puis la brauerie de son marcher, nullement different du sien ordinaire: sa veue ferme et reglee, considerant et iugeant ce qui se passoit autour de luy: regardant tantost les vns, tantost les autres, amis et ennemis, d'vne façon, qui encourageoit les vns, et signifioit aux autres, qu'il estoit pour vendre bien cher son sang et sa vie, à qui essayeroit de la luy oster, et se sauuerent ainsi: car volontiers on n'attaque pas ceux-cy, on court apres les effraiez.

Voylà le tesmoignage de ce grand capitaine: qui nous apprend ce que nous essaions tous les iours, qu'il n'est rien qui nous iette tant aux dangers, qu'vne faim inconsideree de nous en mettre hors. Quo timoris minus est, eo minus fermè periculi est. Nostre peuple a tort, de dire, celuy-là craint la mort, quand il veut exprimer, qu'il y songe, et qu'il la preuoit. La preuoyance conuient egallement à ce qui nous touche en bien, et en mal. Considerer et iuger le danger, est aucunement le rebours de s'en estonner. Ie ne me sens pas assez fort pour with that ancient: I was too badly shaken for the danger to cross my mind. I have never been afraid on the water. Nor have I had a fear elsewhere that troubled or dazzled me, though just causes for one have offered themselves often enough, if death is one. Fear sometimes springs from a lack of judgment, as well as from a lack of heart. All the dangers I have seen, I have seen with my eyes open and my sight free, sound and whole.[2]

ENGLISH

Even fearing takes courage. It once served me well, compared with others, in conducting my flight and keeping it in order, so that it was, if not without fear, at least without terror and without being stunned. It was stirred, but not dazed or distraught. Great souls go much further and display flights that are not only composed and sound, but proud. Let us cite the one Alcibiades tells of Socrates, his comrade in arms: "I found him," he says, "after our army was routed, him and Laches, among the last of the fugitives. I watched him at my ease and in safety, for I was on a good horse and he was on foot, and that is how we had fought.[3]

I noticed first how much more presence of mind and resolution he showed than Laches. Then I noticed the boldness of his gait, not at all different from his ordinary walk, and his gaze, steady and measured, considering and judging what was going on around him. He looked now at some, now at others, friends and enemies, in a way that encouraged the one side and signified to the other that he was ready to sell his blood and his life very dear to anyone who tried to take it from him. And so they got away; for people do not readily attack men like these; they run after the frightened."

That is the testimony of this great captain. It teaches us what we experience every day: that nothing throws us into danger so much as a thoughtless hunger to get ourselves out of it. The less fear there is, the less danger, as a rule. Our common people are wrong to say "that man fears death" when they mean that he thinks about it and foresees it. Foresight applies equally to what concerns us for good and for ill. To consider and judge danger is, in a way, the opposite of being stunned

2 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius 53.
3 Alcibiades' account of the retreat after the Athenian defeat at Delium (424 BC) is in Plato's Symposium; Laches was an Athenian general.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
soustenir le coup, et l'impetuosité, de cette passion de la peur, ny d'autre vehemente.	by it. I do not feel strong enough to withstand the blow and the violence of this passion of fear, or of any other vehement one.[4]
Si i'en estois vn coup vaincu, et atterré, ie ne m'en releuerois iamais bien entier. Qui auroit faict perdre pied à mon ame, ne la remettroit iamais droicte en sa place. Elle se retaste et recherche trop vifuement et profondement. Et pourtant, ne lairroit iamais ressoudre et consolider la playe qui l'auroit percee. Il m'a bien pris qu'aucune maladie ne me l'ayt encore desmise. A chasque charge qui me vient, ie me presente et oppose, en mon haut appareil. Ainsi la premiere qui m'emporteroit, me mettroit sans ressource. Ie n'en fais point à deux. Par quelque endroict que le rauage fauçast ma leuee, me voyla ouuert, et noyé sans remede. Epicurus dit, que le sage ne peut iamais passer à vn estat contraire.	If I were once overcome and floored by it, I would never get up again quite whole. Whatever had made my soul lose its footing would never set it back upright in its place. My soul probes and searches itself too keenly and too deeply, and so it would never let the wound that had pierced it close and heal. It has been lucky for me that no illness has yet put it out of joint. At every attack that comes at me, I stand up and oppose it in full array. So the first one that carried me away would leave me without recourse. I have no second line. Wherever the flood broke through my dike, there I would be, laid open and drowned beyond remedy. Epicurus says that the wise man can never pass into a contrary state.
I'ay quelque opinion de l'enuers de cette sentence; que qui aura esté vne fois bien fol, ne sera nulle autre fois bien sage. Dieu me donne le froid selon la robe, et me donne les passions selon le moyen que i'ay de les soustenir. Nature m'ayant descouuert d'vn costé, m'a couuert de l'autre: m'ayant desarmé de force, m'a armé d'insensibilité, et d'vne apprehension reglee, ou mousse.	I hold something like the reverse of this maxim: that whoever has once been thoroughly a fool will never at any other time be thoroughly wise. God sends me the cold according to my coat, and sends me passions according to the means I have to bear them. Nature, having left me uncovered on one side, has covered me on the other; having disarmed me of strength, she has armed me with insensibility and with a measured, or dull, apprehension.

COACHES AND SEASICKNESS

Montaigne cannot bear coaches or boats, and recalls coaches used in war and pageantry.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.4 Or ie ne puis souffrir long temps, et les souffrois plus difficilement en ieunesse, ny coche, ny littiere, ny bateau, et hay toute autre voiture que de cheual, en la ville, et aux champs. Mais ie puis souffrir la lictiere, moins qu'vn coche: et par mesme raison, plus aisement vne agitation rude sur l'eau, d'où se produict la peur, que le mouuement qui se sent en temps calme. Par cette legere secousse, que les auirons donnent, desrobant le vaisseau soubs nous, ie me sens brouiller, ie ne sçay comment, la teste et l'estomach: comme ie ne puis souffrir sous moy vn siege tremblant. Quand la voile, ou le cours de l'eau, nous emporte esgallement, ou qu'on nous touë, cette agitation vnie, ne me blesse aucunement.	Now, I cannot endure coach, litter or boat for long, and I endured them with more difficulty in my youth; I hate any conveyance but a horse, in town and in the country. But I can stand a litter less than a coach; and for the same reason I can stand a rough tossing on the water, which produces fear, more easily than the motion felt in calm weather. With that light jerk the oars give, stealing the vessel out from under us, I feel my head and stomach scrambled, I do not know how, just as I cannot bear a shaky seat under me. When the sail or the current carries us along evenly, or when we are towed, that smooth motion does not bother me at all.

4 Livy, History of Rome XXII.

FRENCH

C’est vn remuement interrompu, qui m’offence: et plus, quand il est languissant. Ie ne sçaurois autrement peindre sa forme. Les medecins m’ont ordonné de me presser et sangler d’vne seruiette le bas du ventre, pour remedier à cet accident: ce que ie n’ay point essayé, ayant accoustumé de lucter les deffauts qui sont en moy, et les dompter par moy-mesme.

3.6.5 Si i’en auoy la memoire suffisamment informee, ie ne pleindroy mon temps à dire icy l’infinie varieté, que les histoires nous presentent de l’vsage des coches, au seruice de la guerre: diuers selon les nations, selon les siecles: de grand effect, ce me semble, et necessité. Si que c’est merueille, que nous en ayons perdu toute cognoissance. I’en diray seulement cecy, que tout freschement, du temps de nos peres, les Hongres les mirent tres-vtilement en besongne contre les Turcs: en chacun y ayant vn rondelier et vn mousquetaire, et nombre de harquebuzes rengees, prestes et chargees: le tout couuert d’vne pauesade, à la mode d’vne galliotte.

Ils faisoient front à leur bataille de trois mille tels coches et apres que le canon auoit ioué, les faisoient tirer, et aualler aux ennemys cette salue, auant que de taster le reste: qui n’estoit pas vn leger auancement: ou descochoient lesdits coches dans leurs escadrons, pour les rompre et y faire iour: outre le secours qu’ils en pouuoient prendre, pour flanquer en lieu chatouilleux, les trouppes marchants en la campagne: ou à couurir vn logis à la haste, et le fortifier. De mon temps, vn Gentilhomme, en l’vne de nos frontieres, impost de sa personne, et ne trouuant cheual capable de son poids, ayant vne querelle, marchoit par païs en coche, de mesme cette peinture, et s’en trouuoit tres-bien. Mais laissons ces coches guerriers.

Comme si leur neantise n’estoit assez cognue à meilleures enseignes, les derniers Roys de nostre premiere race marchoient par païs en vn chariot mené de quatre bœufs. Marc Antoine fut le premier, qui se fit trainer à Rome, et vne garse menestriere quand et luy, par des lyons attelez à vn coche. Heliogabalus en fit depuis autant, se disant Cibelé la mere des Dieux: et aussi par des tigres, contrefaisant le Dieu Bacchus: il attela aussi par fois deux cerfs à son coche: et vne autre fois quatre chiens: et encore quatre garses nues, se faisant trainer par elles, en pompe, tout nud. L’empereur Firmus fit mener son coche,

ENGLISH

It is an interrupted movement that upsets me, and all the more when it is sluggish. I cannot describe its form any other way. The doctors have prescribed that I bind my lower belly and strap it tight with a cloth to remedy this trouble. I have not tried it, being accustomed to wrestle with the defects I have and to tame them by myself.

If my memory were sufficiently stocked on the subject, I would not begrudge the time to recount here the infinite variety the histories show us in the use of coaches in the service of war. It differed according to nations and to ages, and was of great effect, it seems to me, and of great necessity—so much so that it is a wonder we have lost all knowledge of it. I will say only this. Quite recently, in our fathers’ time, the Hungarians put them to very good use against the Turks. In each one there was a shield-bearer and a musketeer, and a number of harquebuses lined up, ready and loaded, the whole thing covered with a pavisade, in the manner of a galliot.[5]

They placed three thousand such coaches at the front of their battle line. After the cannon had played, they had the coaches fire and made the enemy swallow that volley before tasting the rest, which was no slight advantage. Or else they let fly these coaches into the enemy squadrons to break them and open a gap. They could also use them to flank troops marching across open country at a ticklish spot, or to cover a camp in haste and fortify it. In my time a gentleman on one of our frontiers, who was unwieldy in his person and could find no horse able to bear his weight, had a feud and used to travel about the country in a coach of this same design, and did very well with it. But let us leave these war coaches.

As if their sloth were not well enough known by better tokens, the last kings of our first dynasty traveled about the country in a cart drawn by four oxen. Mark Antony was the first who had himself drawn through Rome by lions harnessed to a coach, with a minstrel girl beside him. Heliogabalus later did the same, calling himself Cybele, mother of the gods; he also had himself drawn by tigers, impersonating the god Bacchus. Sometimes he harnessed two stags to his coach, another time

5 A pavisade was a screen of large shields; a galliot was a small galley.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
à des autruches de merueilleuse grandeur, de maniere qu'il sembloit plus voler que rouler.	four dogs, and again four naked girls, having himself drawn by them in pomp, stark naked himself. The emperor Firmus had his coach drawn by ostriches of marvelous size, so that he seemed to be flying rather than rolling.[6]

THE SPENDING OF PRprinces

Lavish display and liberality are weak virtues in a king, who gives what is not his own.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.6 L'estrangeté de ces inuentions, me met en teste cett' autre fantasie: Que c'est vne espece de pusillanimité, aux monarques, et vn tesmoignage de ne sentir point assez, ce qu'ils sont, de trauailler à se faire valloir et paroistre, par despenses excessiues. Ce seroit chose excusable en pays estranger: mais parmy ses subiects, où il peut tout, il tire de sa dignité, le plus extreme degré d'honneur, où il puisse arriuer. Comme à vn Gentil-homme, il me semble, qu'il est superflu de se vestir curieusement en son priué: sa maison, son train, sa cuysine respondent assez de luy.	The strangeness of these inventions puts another notion into my head: that it is a kind of faintheartedness in monarchs, and a sign that they do not sufficiently feel what they are, to labor to make themselves valued and conspicuous by excessive expenditure. It would be excusable in a foreign country; but among his own subjects, where he can do anything, a king draws from his dignity the very highest degree of honor he can attain. In the same way, for a gentleman, it seems to me superfluous to dress elaborately at home: his house, his household and his kitchen answer well enough for him.
Le conseil qu'Isocrates donne à son Roy, ne me semble sans raison: Qu'il soit splendide en meubles et vtensiles: d'autant que c'est vne despense de duree, qui passe iusques à ses successeurs: et qu'il fuye toutes magnificences, qui s'escoulent incontinent et de l'vsage et de la memoire. I'aymois à me parer quand i'estoy cadet, à faute d'autre parure: et me seoit bien. Il en est sur qui les belles robes pleurent. Nous auons des comtes merueilleux de la frugalité de nos Roys au tour de leurs personnes, et en leurs dons: grands Roys en credit, en valeur, et en fortune. Demosthenes combat à outrance, la loy de sa ville, qui assignoit les deniers publics aux pompes des ieux, et de leurs festes.	The advice Isocrates gives his king does not seem to me unreasonable: that he be splendid in furniture and utensils, since that is a lasting expense that passes on to his successors, and that he avoid all magnificence that slips away at once from both use and memory. I liked to dress up when I was a young man, for lack of other adornment, and it suited me. There are some on whom fine clothes weep. We have marvelous accounts of the frugality of our kings in their persons and in their gifts—kings great in reputation, in valor and in fortune. Demosthenes fights tooth and nail against the law of his city that assigned public funds to the pomp of the games and of their festivals.[7]
Il veut que leur grandeur se montre, en quantité de vaisseaux bien equippez, et bonnes armees bien fournies. Et a lon raison d'accuser Theophrastus, qui establit en son liure des richesses, vn aduis contraire: et maintient telle nature de despense, estre le vray fruit de l'opulence. Ce sont plaisirs, dit Aristote, qui ne touchent que la plus basse commune: qui s'euanouissent de la souuenance	He wants their greatness to show itself in a quantity of well-equipped ships and good, well-supplied armies. And people are right to blame Theophrastus, who in his book on wealth set forth a contrary opinion and maintained that this kind of expenditure is the true fruit of opulence. These are pleasures, says Aristotle, that touch only the lowest common sort, that vanish from memory as

6 The last Merovingian kings, the so-called "do-nothing kings," traveled in ox carts. Firmus was a third-century AD usurper in Egypt.

7 Isocrates' advice is in To Nicocles; Demosthenes attacked the Athenian festival fund in his Olynthiacs.

FRENCH

aussi tost qu'on en est rassasié: et desquels nul homme iudicieux et graue ne peut faire estime.

L'emploitte me sembleroit bien plus royale, comme plus vtile, iuste et durable, en ports, en haures, fortifications et murs: en bastiments somptueux, en eglises, hospitaux, colleges, reformation de ruës et chemins: en quoy le Pape Gregoire treziesme lairra sa memoire recommandable à long temps: et en quoy nostre Royne Catherine tesmoigneroit à longues annees sa liberalité naturelle et munificence, si ses moyens suffisoient à son affection. La Fortune m'a faict grand desplaisir d'interrompre la belle structure du Pont neuf, de nostre grand' ville, et m'oster l'espoir auant mourir d'en veoir en train le seruice.

3.6.7 Outre ce, il semble aux subiects spectateurs de ces triomphes, qu'on leur fait montre de leurs propres richesses, et qu'on les festoye à leurs despens. Car les peuples presument volontiers des Roys, comme nous faisons de nos valets: qu'ils doiuent prendre soing de nous apprester en abondance tout ce qu'il nous faut, mais qu'ils n'y doiuent aucunement toucher de leur part. Et pourtant l'Empereur Galba, ayant pris plaisir à vn musicien pendant son souper, se fit porter sa boëte, et luy donna en sa main vne poignee d'escus, qu'il y pescha, auec ces paroles: Ce n'est pas du public, c'est du mien.

Tant y a, qu'il aduient le plus souuent, que le peuple a raison: et qu'on repaist ses yeux, de ce dequoy il auoit à paistre son ventre.

3.6.8 La liberalité mesme n'est pas bien en son lustre en main souueraine: les priuez y ont plus de droict. Car à le prendre exactement, vn Roy n'a rien proprement sien; il se doibt soy-mesmes à autruy. La iurisdiction ne se donne point en faueur du iuridiciant: c'est en faueur du iuridicié. On fait vn superieur, non iamais pour son profit, ains pour le profit de l'inferieur: et vn medecin pour le malade, non pour soy. Toute magistrature, comme tout art, iette sa fin hors d'elle.

Nulla ars in se versatur. Parquoy les gouuerneurs de l'enfance des Princes, qui se piquent à leur imprimer soon as one has had one's fill of them, and that no judicious and serious man can hold in esteem.[8]

ENGLISH

Spending would seem to me much more royal, as being more useful, just and lasting, if it went to ports, harbors, fortifications and walls; to sumptuous buildings, churches, hospitals, colleges, and the improvement of streets and roads. In this Pope Gregory XIII will leave a memory to be commended for a long time; and in this our Queen Catherine would bear witness for many years to her natural liberality and munificence, if her means were equal to her desire. Fortune has done me a great disservice in interrupting the fine structure of the Pont Neuf in our great city and taking from me the hope of seeing it in use before I die.[9]

Besides, the subjects who watch these triumphs feel that they are being shown their own riches and feasted at their own expense. For peoples readily presume of kings what we presume of our servants: that they should take care to lay on for us in abundance everything we need, but should not touch any of it themselves. And so the Emperor Galba, having enjoyed a musician during his supper, had his money box brought to him and with his own hand gave the man a fistful of crowns that he fished out of it, with these words: "This is not from the public purse; it is from my own."[10]

Be that as it may, it most often happens that the people are right, and that their eyes are fed with what should have fed their bellies.

Liberality itself does not show to best advantage in a sovereign hand; private persons have more right to it. For, strictly speaking, a king has nothing that is properly his own; he owes his very self to others. Jurisdiction is not granted for the benefit of the judge but for the benefit of the judged. A superior is never made for his own profit, but for the profit of the inferior; and a doctor for the patient, not for himself. Every magistracy, like every art, has its end outside itself.

No art is concerned with itself. Therefore the tutors of princes in childhood who make it a point to im-

8 Montaigne follows Cicero, On Duties II, which reports Aristotle's criticism of Theophrastus.
9 Gregory XIII was pope 1572–1585; Catherine de' Medici was the queen mother. Work on the Pont Neuf in Paris, begun in 1578, was halted by the civil wars in 1588.
10 Galba was notorious for his stinginess (Suetonius).

FRENCH

cette vertu de largesse: et les preschent de ne sçauoir rien refuser, et n'estimer rien si bien employé, que ce qu'ils donront (instruction que i'ay veu en mon temps fort en credit) ou ils regardent plus à leur proufit, qu'à celuy de leur maistre: ou ils entendent mal à qui ils parlent. Il est trop aysé d'imprimer la liberalité, en celuy, qui a dequoy y fournir autant qu'il veut, aux despens d'autruy. Et son estimation se reglant, non à la mesure du present, mais à la mesure des moyens de celuy qui l'exerce, elle vient à estre vaine en mains si puissantes.

Ils se trouuent prodigues, auant qu'ils soient liberaux. Pourtant est elle de peu de recommandation, au prix d'autres vertus royalles. Et la seule, comme disoit le tyran Dionysius, qui se comporte bien auec la tyrannie mesme. Ie luy apprendroy plustost ce verset du laboureur ancien, Τη χειρι δει σπειρειν, αλλαμη όλω τω θυλακω Qu'il faut à qui en veut retirer fruict, semer de la main, non pas verser du sac: il faut espandre le grain, non pas le respandre: et qu'ayant à donner, ou pour mieux dire, à payer, et rendre à tant de gens, selon qu'ils ont deseruy, il en doibt estre loyal et auisé dispensateur. Si la liberalité d'vn Prince est sans discretion et sans mesure, ie l'ayme mieux auare.

3.6.9 La vertu Royalle semble consister le plus en la iustice. Et de toutes les parties de la iustice, celle là remerque mieux les Roys, qui accompagne la liberalité. Car ils l'ont particulierement reseruee à leur charge: là où toute autre iustice, ils l'exercent volontiers par l'entremise d'autruy. L'immoderee largesse, est vn moyen foible à leur acquerir bien-vueillance: car elle rebute plus de gens, qu'elle n'en practique: Quo in plures vsus sis, minus in multos vti possis. Quid autem est stultius, quàm, quod libenter facias, curare vt id diutius facere non possis? Et si elle est employee sans respect du merite, fait vergongne à qui la reçoit: et se reçoit sans grace.

Des tyrans ont esté sacrifiez à la hayne du peuple, par les mains de ceux mesme, qu'ils auoyent iniquement auancez: telle maniere d'hommes, estimants asseurer la possession des biens indeuement receuz, s'ils montrent print on them this virtue of largesse—who preach to them never to know how to refuse anything and to think nothing so well spent as what they give away (a teaching I have seen much in favor in my time)—either have their own profit more in view than their master's, or misunderstand whom they are talking to. It is too easy to imprint liberality on someone who has the means to supply it as freely as he likes at others' expense. And since its worth is reckoned not by the size of the gift but by the size of the means of the one who practices it, it comes to nothing in such powerful hands.[11]

ENGLISH

Princes turn out prodigal before they are liberal. So it earns little praise compared with the other royal virtues—and it is the only one, as the tyrant Dionysius used to say, that gets along well with tyranny itself. I would rather teach a prince this line of the ancient farmer, One must sow with the hand, not with the whole sack: that whoever wants to reap a harvest must sow by hand, not pour from the sack; the grain must be scattered, not spilled. And having to give, or rather, to pay and repay so many people according to what they have deserved, he must be a loyal and prudent dispenser. If a prince's liberality is without discretion and without measure, I would rather he were miserly.[12]

Royal virtue seems to consist most of all in justice. And of all the parts of justice, the one that best marks out kings is the one that goes with liberality; for they have reserved it especially to their own office, whereas all other justice they readily exercise through others. Immoderate largesse is a weak means of winning them goodwill, for it repels more people than it wins over: The more people you have used it on, the fewer you will be able to use it on. And what is more foolish than to see to it that what you like doing you can no longer do for long? And if it is bestowed without regard to merit, it shames the one who receives it, and is received without gratitude.[13]

Tyrants have been sacrificed to the people's hatred by the hands of the very men they had unjustly advanced. Men of that kind think they can secure possession of goods unduly received by showing

11 Cicero, On Ends V.
12 The Greek proverb is quoted by Plutarch, who attributes it to the poet Corinna.
13 Cicero, On Duties II.

FRENCH

auoir à mespris et hayne, celuy duquel ils les tenoyent, et se r'allient au iugement et opinion commune en cela.

3.6.10 Les subiects d'vn Prince excessif en dons, se rendent excessifs en demandes: ils se taillent, non à la raison, mais à l'exemple. Il y a certes souuent, dequoy rougir, de nostre impudence. Nous sommes surpayez selon iustice, quand la recompence esgalle nostre seruice: car n'en deuons nous rien à nos Princes d'obligation naturelle? S'il porte nostre despence, il fait trop: c'est assez qu'il l'ayde: le surplus s'appelle bien-faict, lequel ne se peut exiger: car le nom mesme de la liberalité sonne liberté. A nostre mode, ce n'est iamais faict: le reçeu ne se met plus en compte: on n'ayme la liberalité que future. Par quoy plus vn Prince s'espuise en donnant, plus il s'appaourit d'amys.

Comment assouuiroit il les enuies, qui croissent, à mesure qu'elles se remplissent? Qui a sa pensee à prendre, ne l'a plus à ce qu'il a prins. La conuoitise n'a rien si propre que d'estre ingrate.

3.6.11 L'exemple de Cyrus ne duira pas mal en ce lieu, pour seruir aux Roys de ce temps, de touche, à recognoistre leurs dons, bien ou mal employez: et leur faire veoir, combien cet Empereur les assenoit plus heureusement, qu'ils ne font. Par où ils sont reduits à faire leurs emprunts, apres sur les subiects incognus, et plustost sur ceux, à qui ils ont faict du mal, que sur ceux, à qui ils ont faict du bien: et n'en reçoiuent aydes, où il y aye rien de gratuit, que le nom. Crœsus luy reprochoit sa largesse: et calculoit à combien se monteroit son thresor, s'il eust eu les mains plus restreintes.

Il eut enuie de iustifier sa liberalité: et despeschant de toutes parts, vers les grands de son estat, qu'il auoit particulierement auancez: pria chacun de le secourir, d'autant d'argent qu'il pourroit, à vne sienne necessité: et le luy enuoyer par declaration. Quand touts ces bordereaux luy furent apportez, chacun de ses amys, n'estimant pas que ce fust assez faire, de luy en offrir seulement autant qu'il en auoit reçeu de sa munificence, y en meslant du sien propre beaucoup, il se trouua, que cette somme se montoit bien plus que ne disoit l'espargne de Crœsus. Sur quoy Cyrus: Ie ne suis pas contempt and hatred for the man they had them from, and by siding with common judgment and opinion in this.

ENGLISH

The subjects of a prince who is excessive in gifts become excessive in demands; they cut their cloth not by reason but by example. There is certainly often cause to blush at our impudence. In justice we are overpaid when the reward equals our service; for do we owe our princes nothing by natural obligation? If he bears our expenses, he does too much; it is enough that he helps with them. The surplus is called a benefaction, which cannot be demanded; for the very name of liberality sounds of liberty. In our fashion, it is never done; what has been received no longer counts; we love only liberality to come. So the more a prince exhausts himself in giving, the poorer he grows in friends.

How could he sate desires that grow as fast as they are filled? A man whose thoughts are on taking no longer thinks of what he has taken. Nothing is so characteristic of covetousness as ingratitude.

The example of Cyrus will not be out of place here. It can serve the kings of our time as a touchstone for telling whether their gifts are well or ill bestowed, and show them how much more happily that emperor placed his than they do. Because of their poor giving, they are reduced afterward to borrowing from subjects they do not know, and rather from those they have harmed than from those they have benefited; and they receive no aid from them in which there is anything free but the name. Croesus reproached Cyrus for his largesse, and calculated what his treasure would amount to if he had been more tight-fisted.[14]

Cyrus wanted to justify his liberality. He sent messengers in every direction to the great men of his realm whom he had particularly advanced, and asked each of them to help him with as much money as he could for a need of his, and to send him a written statement of it. When all these accounts were brought to him, each of his friends, thinking it not enough to offer him only as much as he had received from his munificence, had added a great deal of his own; and it turned out that the sum came to much more than Croesus's reckoning of his savings. Whereupon Cyrus said: "I am 14 The story is from Xenophon, The Education of Cyrus VIII.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	moins amoureux des richesses, que les autres Princes, et en suis plustost plus mesnager.	no less in love with riches than other princes, and am, if anything, a better manager of them.
	Vous voyez à combien peu de mise i'ay acquis le thresor inestimable de tant d'amis: et combien ils me sont plus fideles thresoriers, que ne seroient des hommes mercenaires, sans obligation, sans affection: et ma cheuance mieux logee qu'en des coffres, appellant sur moy la haine, l'enuie, et le mespris des autres Princes.	You see at how little outlay I have acquired the inestimable treasure of so many friends, and how much more faithful treasurers they are to me than hired men would be, without obligation and without affection. And my wealth is better lodged with them than in coffers, which would call down on me the hatred, envy and contempt of other princes."[15]
3.6.12	Les Empereurs tiroient excuse à la superfluité de leurs ieux et montres publiques, de ce que leur authorité dependoit aucunement, aumoins par apparence, de la volonté du peuple Romain: lequel auoit de tout temps accoustumé d'estre flaté par telle sorte de spectacles et d'excez. Mais c'estoyent particuliers qui auoyent nourry cette coustume, de gratifier leurs concitoyens et compagnons: principalement sur leur bourse, par telle profusion et magnificence. Elle eut tout autre goust, quand ce furent les maistres qui vindrent à l'imiter. Pecuniarum translatio à iustis dominis ad alienos non debet liberalis videri. Philippus de ce que son fils essayoit par presents, de gaigner la volonté des Macedoniens, l'en tança par vne lettre, en cette maniere. Quoy?	The emperors excused the superfluity of their games and public shows on the grounds that their authority depended to some extent, at least in appearance, on the will of the Roman people, who had always been accustomed to being flattered by that kind of spectacle and excess. But it was private individuals who had fostered this custom of gratifying their fellow citizens and companions, chiefly out of their own purse, with such profusion and magnificence. It had quite another taste when it was the masters who came to imitate it. The transfer of money from its rightful owners to strangers should not be regarded as liberality. Because his son was trying to win the goodwill of the Macedonians with presents, Philip rebuked him in a letter, in this manner: "What?[15]
	as tu enuie, que tes subiects te tiennent pour leur boursier, non pour leur Roy? Veux tu les prattiquer? Prattique les, des bien-faicts de ta vertu, non des bien-faicts de ton coffre.	do you want your subjects to take you for their purse-bearer, not their king? Do you want to win them over? Win them with the benefits of your virtue, not the benefits of your coffer."

ROMAN SPECTACLES

The marvels of the Roman arena show how inventive those ages were.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.13	C'etoit pourtant vne belle chose, d'aller faire apporter et planter en la place aux arenes, vne grande quantité de gros arbres, tous branchus et tous verts, representans vne grande forest ombrageuse, despartie en belle symmetrie: et le premier iour, ietter là dedans mille austruches, mille cerfs, mille sangliers, et mille dains, les abandonnant à piller au peuple: le lendemain faire assommer en sa presence, cent gros lyons, cent leopards, et trois cens ours: et pour le troisiesme iour, faire combatre à outrance, trois cens paires de gladiateurs, comme fit l'Empereur Probus.	It was a fine thing, though, to have a great number of big trees brought and planted in the arena, all branching and all green, representing a great shady forest laid out in fine symmetry; and on the first day to throw into it a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a thousand wild boars and a thousand fallow deer, abandoning them to the people to plunder; the next day to have a hundred big lions, a hundred leopards and three hundred bears slaughtered in his presence; and for the 15 Cicero, On Duties I. Philip II of Macedon's letter to his son Alexander is quoted by Cicero, On Duties II.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

third day to have three hundred pairs of gladiators fight to the death—as the Emperor Probus did.[16]

C'estoit aussi belle chose à voir, ces grands amphitheatres encroustez de marbre au dehors, labouré d'ouurages et statues, le dedans reluisant de rares enrichissemens, Baltheus en gemmis, en illita porticus auro. Tous les costez de ce grand vuide, remplis et enuironnez depuis le fons iusques au comble, de soixante ou quatre vingts rangs d'eschelons, aussi de marbre, couuers de carreaux, Exeat, inquit,
Si pudor est, et puluino surgat equestri,
Cuius res legi non sufficit, où se peussent renger cent mille hommes, assis à leur aise.

It was also a fine thing to see those great amphitheaters encrusted with marble on the outside, worked with carvings and statues, the inside gleaming with rare embellishments: Look, the belt studded with gems; look, the colonnade coated with gold. All the sides of that great hollow were filled and surrounded, from the bottom to the top, with sixty or eighty rows of steps, also of marble, covered with cushions—"Let him leave," he says, "if he has any shame, and get up from the knights' cushion, whose property falls short of what the law requires"—where a hundred thousand men could sit at their ease.[17]

Et la place du fons, où les ieux se iouoyent, la faire premierement par art, entr'ouurir et fendre en creuasses, representant des antres qui vomissoient les bestes destinees au spectacle: et puis secondement l'inonder d'vne mer profonde, qui charioit force monstres marins, chargee de vaisseaux armez à representer vne bataille naualle: et tiercement, l'applanir et assecher de nouueau, pour le combat des gladiateurs: et pour la quatriesme façon, la sabler de vermillon et de storax, au lieu d'arene, pour y dresser vn festin solemne, à tout ce nombre infiny de peuple: le dernier acte d'vn seul iour. Quoties nos descendentis arenæ
Vidimus in partes, ruptáque voragine terræ
Emersisse feras, et ijsdem sæpe latebris
Aurea cum croceo creuerunt arbuta libro!

And the floor at the bottom, where the games were played: first to have it artfully opened and split into crevasses representing caves that spewed out the beasts destined for the show; then, second, to flood it with a deep sea carrying many sea monsters and laden with armed ships to represent a naval battle; third, to level it and dry it again for the gladiators' combat; and for the fourth arrangement, to strew it with vermilion and storax instead of sand, to set up a solemn banquet for that whole countless multitude of people—the last act of a single day. How often have we seen part of the arena sink down, and from a chasm torn open in the earth wild beasts emerge, and often from those same lairs golden trees spring up with saffron bark!

/ Nec solùm nobis siluestria cernere monstra
Contigit, æquoreos ego cum certantibus vrsis
Spectaui vitulos, et equorum nomine dignum,
Sed deforme pecus. Quelquefois on y a faict naistre, vne haute montaigne pleine de fruitiers et arbres verdoyans, rendant par son feste, vn ruisseau d'eau, comme de la bouche d'vne viue fontaine. Quelquefois on y promena vn grand nauire, qui s'ouuroit et desprenoit de soy-mesmes, et apres auoir vomy de son ventre, quatre ou cinq cens bestes à combat, se resserroit et s'esuanouissoit, sans ayde. Autresfois, du bas de cette place, ils faisoient eslancer des surgeons et filets d'eau, qui reiallissoient

/ Nor was it only woodland monsters that we were given to see: I have watched sea calves with bears fighting them, and a beast that deserves the name of horse, but a misshapen one. Sometimes they made a high mountain rise up there, full of fruit trees and green trees, sending a stream of water from its summit as from the mouth of a living spring. Sometimes they paraded a great ship through it, which opened and came apart by itself, and after spewing four or five hundred fighting beasts from its belly, closed up again and vanished without 16 Probus, emperor AD 276–282; Montaigne follows the Historia Augusta.

17 Calpurnius Siculus, Eclogues VII; then Juvenal, Satires III, on the law reserving the front seats for knights of sufficient wealth.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
contremont, et à cette hauteur infinie, alloient arrousant et embaumant cette infinie multitude.	any help. At other times, from the floor of that place, they made jets and threads of water shoot up, which spurted upward and, at that infinite height, went sprinkling and perfuming that infinite multitude.[18]
Pour se couurir de l'iniure du temps, ils faisoient tendre cette immense capacité, tantost de voyles de pourpre labourez à l'éguille, tantost de soye, d'vne ou autre couleur, et les auançoyent et retiroyent en vn moment, comme il leur venoit en fantasie, Quamuis non modico caleant spectacula sole, Vela reducuntur, cùm venit Hermogenes. Les rets aussi qu'on mettoit au deuant du peuple, pour le defendre de la violence de ces bestes eslancees, estoient tyssus d'or, Auro quoque torta refulgent Retia.	To shelter themselves from the weather, they had that immense space covered, sometimes with purple awnings worked with the needle, sometimes with silk of one color or another, and they drew them forward and back in a moment, as the fancy took them: Though the spectators swelter in no small sun, the awnings are drawn back when Hermogenes comes. The nets, too, that were set in front of the people to protect them from the violence of the beasts let loose, were woven of gold: The nets too gleam, twisted with gold.[19]

OUR NARROW KNOWLEDGE

We see only a sliver of the world's past and present, and judge everything by it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.14 S'il y a quelque chose qui soit excusable en tels excez, c'est, où l'inuention et la nouueauté, fournit d'admiration, non pas la despence. En ces vanitez mesme, nous descouurons combien ces siecles estoyent fertiles d'autres esprits que ne sont les nostres. Il va de cette sorte de fertilité, comme il fait de toutes autres productions de la Nature. Ce n'est pas à dire qu'elle y ayt lors employé son dernier effort. Nous n'allons point, nous rodons plustost, et tourneuirons çà et là: nous nous promenons sur nos pas. Ie crains que nostre cognoissance soit foible en tous sens. Nous ne voyons ny gueres loing, ny guere arriere. Elle embrasse peu, et vit peu: courte et en estendue de temps, et en estendue de matiere.	If there is anything excusable in such excesses, it is where invention and novelty, not expense, supply the wonder. Even in these vanities we discover how fertile those ages were in minds of another kind than ours. It is with this sort of fertility as with all the other productions of Nature. That is not to say that she then made her utmost effort. We do not go forward; rather, we wander about and turn this way and that; we walk back over our own steps. I fear that our knowledge is weak in every direction. We see neither very far ahead nor very far behind. It embraces little and lives little: it is short both in extent of time and in extent of matter.
Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona Multi, sed omnes illacrymabiles Vrgentur, ignotique longa Nocte. Et supera bellum Troianum et funera Troiæ, Multi alias alij quoque res cecinere poetæ. Et la narration de Solon, sur ce qu'il auoit apprins des prestres d'Ægypte de la longue vie de leur estat, et maniere d'apprendre et conseruer les histoires estrangeres, ne me semble tesmoignage de refus en cette consideration.	Many brave men lived before Agamemnon, but all of them, unwept, unknown, are crushed by the long night. And beyond the Trojan War and the fall of Troy, many other poets have sung of other things. And Solon's account of what he had learned from the priests of Egypt about the long life of their state, and about their way of learning and preserving 18 Calpurnius Siculus again; the misshapen "horse" is the hippopotamus, the river horse.

19 Martial, Epigrams XII, where Hermogenes is a thief who makes off with any cloth in sight; then Calpurnius Siculus.

FRENCH

Si interminatam in omnes partes magnitudinem regionum videremus et temporum, in quam se iniiciens animus et intendens, ita latè longeque peregrinatur, vt nullam oram vltimi videat, in qua possit insistere: in hac immensitate infinita, vis innumerabilium appareret formarum. Quand tout ce qui est venu par rapport du passé, iusques à nous, seroit vray, et seroit sçeu par quelqu'vn, ce seroit moins que rien, au prix de ce qui est ignoré. Et de cette mesme image du monde, qui coule pendant que nous y sommes, combien chetiue et racourcie est la cognoissance des plus curieux?

Non seulement des euenemens particuliers, que Fortune rend souuent exemplaires et poisans: mais de l'estat des grandes polices et nations, il nous en eschappe cent fois plus, qu'il n'en vient a nostre science. Nous escrions, du miracle de l'inuention de nostre artillerie, de nostre impression: d'autres hommes, vn autre bout du monde à la Chine, en iouyssoit mille ans auparauant. Si nous voyions autant du monde, comme nous n'en voyons pas, nous apperceurions, comme il est à croire, vne perpetuelle multiplication et vicissitude de formes. Il n'y a rien de seul et de rare, eu esgard à Nature, ouy bien eu esgard à nostre cognoissance: qui est vn miserable fondement de nos regles, et qui nous represente volontiers vne tres-fauce image des choses.

Comme vainement nous concluons auiourd'huy, l'inclination et la decrepitude du monde, par les arguments que nous tirons de nostre propre foiblesse et decadence: Iámque adeo affecta est ætas, affectáque tellus. Ainsi vainement concluoit cettuy-la, sa naissance et ieunesse, par la vigueur qu'il voyoit aux esprits de son temps, abondans en nouuelletez et inuentions de diuers arts: Verum, vt opinor, habet nouitatem summa, recénsque
Natura est mundi, neque pridem exordia cœpit:
Quare etiam quædam nunc artes expoliuntur,
Nunc etiam augescunt, nunc addita nauigiis sunt Multa.

ENGLISH

the histories of other countries, does not seem to me testimony to be rejected on this point.[20]

If we could see the boundless extent of regions and of ages in every direction, into which the mind, plunging and straining, travels so far and wide that it sees no farthest shore on which it can stop, then in that infinite immensity there would appear a multitude of countless forms. Even if everything that has come down to us by report of the past were true and known by someone, it would be less than nothing compared with what is unknown. And of this very image of the world, which flows by while we are in it, how wretched and cramped is the knowledge of even the most curious![21]

Not only of particular events, which Fortune often makes exemplary and weighty, but of the state of great governments and nations, a hundred times more escapes us than comes to our knowledge. We cry out at the miracle of our invention of artillery and of printing; other men, at another end of the world, in China, enjoyed them a thousand years earlier. If we saw as much of the world as we do not see, we would perceive, it is likely, a perpetual multiplication and alternation of forms. There is nothing unique and rare with regard to Nature, only with regard to our knowledge—which is a wretched foundation for our rules, and readily presents us with a very false image of things.

Just as we vainly conclude today that the world is declining and decrepit, from arguments we draw from our own weakness and decay—So worn out already is our age, and so worn out the earth—so that other man vainly concluded that it was newborn and young, from the vigor he saw in the minds of his time, abounding in novelties and inventions in various arts: But, as I think, the whole is new, and fresh is the nature of the world, nor did it begin long ago:
that is why some arts are even now being refined, even now are growing; now there have been added to ships
many things.[22]

20 Horace, Odes IV.9; then Lucretius, On the Nature of Things V. Solon's conversation with the Egyptian priests is told in Plato's Timaeus.
21 Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods I.
22 Both quotations are from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things (II and V).

THE NEW WORLD

A child world, as able as ours, was conquered by trickery and ruined for pearls and pepper.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.15	Nostre monde vient d'en trouuer vn autre (et qui nous respond si c'est le dernier de ses freres, puis que les Dæmons, les Sybilles, et nous, auons ignoré cettuy-cy iusqu'à cette heure?) non moins grand, plain, et membru, que luy: toutesfois si nouueau et si enfant, qu'on luy apprend encore son a, b, c. Il n'y a pas cinquante ans, qu'il ne sçauoit, ny lettres, ny poix, ny mesure, ny vestements, ny bleds, ny vignes. Il estoit encore tout nud, au giron, et ne viuoit que des moyens de sa mere nourrice. Si nous concluons bien, de nostre fin, et ce poëte de la ieunesse de son siecle, cet autre monde ne fera qu'entrer en lumiere, quand le nostre en sortira.	Our world has just discovered another—and who can guarantee that it is the last of its brothers, since the Daemons, the Sibyls and we ourselves knew nothing of this one until now?—no less big, full and well-limbed than itself, yet so new and so childlike that it is still being taught its ABCs. Not fifty years ago it knew neither letters, nor weights, nor measures, nor clothes, nor wheat, nor vines. It was still quite naked, in its mother's lap, and lived only on what its nursing mother provided. If we are right to conclude that our end is near, and that poet right about the youth of his age, this other world will only be coming into the light when ours is leaving it.
	L'vniuers tombera en paralysie: l'vn membre sera perclus, l'autre en vigueur. Bien crains-ie, que nous aurons tres-fort hasté sa declinaison et sa ruyne, par nostre contagion: et que nous luy aurons bien cher vendu nos opinions et nos arts. C'estoit vn monde enfant: si ne l'auons nous pas fouëté et soubsmis à nostre discipline, par l'auantage de nostre valeur, et forces naturelles: ny ne l'auons practiqué par nostre iustice et bonté: ny subiugué par nostre magnanimité. La plus part de leurs responces, et des negotiations faictes auec eux, tesmoignent qu'ils ne nous deuoient rien en clarté d'esprit naturelle, et en pertinence.	The universe will fall into paralysis: one limb will be withered, the other in full vigor. I greatly fear that we will have greatly hastened its decline and ruin by our contagion, and that we will have sold it our opinions and our arts very dear. It was a child world; yet we have not whipped it and subjected it to our discipline by the advantage of our valor and natural strength, nor won it over by our justice and goodness, nor subjugated it by our magnanimity. Most of their replies, and of the negotiations conducted with them, show that they owed us nothing in natural clarity of mind and pertinence.
	L'espouuentable magnificence des villes de Cusco et de Mexico, et entre plusieurs choses pareilles, le iardin de ce Roy, où tous les arbres, les fruicts, et toutes les herbes, selon l'ordre et grandeur qu'ils ont en vn iardin, estoient excellemment formees en or: comme en son cabinet, tous les animaux, qui naissoient en son estat et en ses mers: et la beauté de leurs ouurages, en pierrerie, en plume, en cotton, en la peinture, montrent qu'ils ne nous cedoient non plus en l'industrie. Mais quant à la deuotion, obseruance des loix, bonté, liberalité, loyauté, franchise, il nous a bien seruy, de n'en auoir pas tant qu'eux. Ils se sont perdus par cet aduantage, et vendus, et trahis eux mesmes.	Consider the stupendous magnificence of the cities of Cusco and Mexico, and, among many such things, the garden of that king in which all the trees, the fruits and all the plants were excellently fashioned in gold, in the order and size they have in a garden; and likewise in his cabinet all the animals born in his state and in his seas; and the beauty of their works in jewelry, in featherwork, in cotton and in painting. All this shows that they did not yield to us in skill either. But as for devotion, observance of the laws, goodness, liberality, loyalty and frankness, it served us well to have less of them than they did. They were lost by that advantage; they sold and betrayed themselves.[23]
3.6.16	Quant à la hardiesse et courage, quant à la fermeté, constance, resolution contre les douleurs et la faim, et la	As for boldness and courage, as for firmness, constancy and resolution against pain, hunger and mort, ie ne craindrois pas d'opposer les exemples, que ie trouuerois parmy eux, aux plus fameux exemples anciens, que nous ayons aux memoires de nostre monde pardeçà.

FRENCH

Car pour ceux qui les ont subiuguez, qu'ils ostent les ruses et batelages, dequoy ils se sont seruis à les piper: et le iuste estonnement, qu'apportoit à ces nations là, de voir arriuer si inopinement des gens barbus, diuers en langage, religion, en forme, et en contenance: d'vn endroit du monde si esloigné, et où ils n'auoient iamais sçeu qu'il y eust habitation quelconque: montez sur des grands monstres incongneuz: contre ceux, qui n'auoient non seulement iamais veu de cheual, mais beste quelconque, duicte à porter et soustenir homme ny autre charge: garnis d'vne peau luysante et dure, et d'vne arme trenchante et resplendissante:

contre ceux, qui pour le miracle de la lueur d'vn miroir ou d'vn cousteau, alloyent eschangeant vne grande richesse en or et en perles, et qui n'auoient ny science ny matiere, par où tout à loysir, ils sçeussent percer nostre acier: adioustez y les foudres et tonnerres de nos pieces et harquebuses, capables de troubler Cæsar mesme, qui l'en eust surpris autant inexperimenté: et à cett'heure, contre des peuples nuds, si ce n'est où l'inuention estoit arriuee de quelque tyssu de cotton: sans autres armes pour le plus, que d'arcs, pierres, bastons et boucliers de bois: des peuples surpris soubs couleur d'amitié et de bonne foy, par la curiosité de veoir des choses estrangeres et incognues: ostez, dis-ie, aux conquerans cette disparité, vous leur ostez toute l'occasion de tant de victoires.

Quand ie regarde à cette ardeur indomtable, dequoy tant de milliers d'hommes, femmes, et enfans, se presentent et reiettent à tant de fois, aux dangers ineuitables, pour la deffence de leurs dieux, et de leur liberté: cette genereuse obstination de souffrir toutes extremitez et difficultez, et la mort, plus volontiers, que de se soubsmettre à la domination de ceux, de qui ils ont esté si honteusement abusez: et aucuns, choisissans plutost de se laisser defaillir par faim et par ieusne, estans pris, que d'accepter le viure des mains de leurs ennemis, si vilement victorieuses: ie preuois que à qui les eust attaquez pair à pair, et d'armes, et d'experience, et de nombre, il y eust faict aussi dangereux, et plus, qu'en autre guerre que nous voyons.

ENGLISH

death, I would not be afraid to set the examples I could find among them against the most famous examples of antiquity in the records of our world over here.

For as for those who subjugated them, take away the ruses and tricks they used to deceive them, and the justified astonishment those nations felt at seeing the unexpected arrival of bearded men, different in language, religion, shape and bearing, from a part of the world so remote that they had never known there was any habitation there at all; men mounted on great unknown monsters, against people who had never seen a horse, nor indeed any animal at all trained to carry a man or any other load; men equipped with a shiny, hard skin and a sharp, gleaming weapon; against people who, for the marvel of the gleam of a mirror or a knife, would trade great riches in gold and pearls, and who had neither the knowledge nor the material by which, even at leisure, they could pierce our steel. Add to this the lightning and thunder of our cannon and harquebuses, enough to disturb Caesar himself had he been surprised by them with as little experience; and then, against peoples who were naked, except where the invention of some cotton fabric had reached them, with no other weapons at most than bows, stones, sticks and wooden shields; peoples taken by surprise under color of friendship and good faith, through curiosity to see strange and unknown things—take away from the conquerors, I say, this disparity, and you take away from them the whole occasion of so many victories.

When I look at the indomitable ardor with which so many thousands of men, women and children came forward and threw themselves again and again into inevitable dangers in defense of their gods and their liberty; at that noble obstinacy in suffering all extremities and hardships, and death, more willingly than submit to the domination of those who had so shamefully deceived them; and at some who, when captured, chose rather to let themselves waste away from hunger and fasting than accept food from the hands of their enemies, so basely victorious—I foresee that anyone who had attacked them on equal terms of weapons, experience and numbers would have found it as dangerous as any other war we see, and more so.

23 Cusco was the capital of the Inca empire.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.6.17 Que n'est tombee soubs Alexandre, ou soubs ces anciens Grecs et Romains, vne si noble conqueste: et vne si grande mutation et alteration de tant d'empires et de peuples, soubs des mains, qui eussent doucement poly et defriché ce qu'il y auoit de sauuage: et eussent conforté et promeu les bonnes semences, que Nature y auoit produit: meslant non seulement à la culture des terres, et ornement des villes, les arts de deça, en tant qu'elles y eussent esté necessaires, mais aussi, meslant les vertus Grecques et Romaines, aux origineles du pays?

Why did not so noble a conquest fall to Alexander, or to those ancient Greeks and Romans? Why did not so great a transformation and alteration of so many empires and peoples fall into hands that would gently have polished and cleared whatever was wild there, and would have strengthened and promoted the good seeds that Nature had produced there, mixing not only the arts of our side of the world with the cultivation of the land and the adornment of cities, insofar as they were needed there, but also mixing the Greek and Roman virtues with those native to the country?

Quelle reparation eust-ce esté, et quel amendement à toute cette machine, que les premiers exemples et deportemens nostres, qui se sont presentez par delà, eussent appellé ces peuples, à l'admiration, et imitation de la vertu, et eussent dressé entre-eux et nous, vne fraternelle societé et intelligence? Combien il eust esté aisé, de faire son profit, d'ames si neuues, si affamees d'apprentissage, ayants pour la plus part, de si beaux commencemens naturels? Au rebours, nous nous sommes seruis de leur ignorance, et inexperience, à les plier plus facilement vers la trahison, luxure, auarice, et vers toute sorte d'inhumanité et de cruauté, à l'exemple et patron de nos mœurs. Qui mit iamais à tel prix, le seruice de la mercadence et de la trafique?

What a reparation it would have been, and what an improvement to that whole fabric, if the first examples and conduct of ours that appeared over there had called those peoples to the admiration and imitation of virtue, and had established between them and us a brotherly fellowship and understanding? How easy it would have been to make good use of souls so fresh, so hungry to learn, and having for the most part such fine natural beginnings? On the contrary, we took advantage of their ignorance and inexperience to bend them more easily toward treachery, lust, avarice and every kind of inhumanity and cruelty, after the example and pattern of our own ways. Who ever set such a price on the service of commerce and trade?

Tant de villes rasees, tant de nations exterminees, tant de millions de peuples, passez au fil de l'espee, et la plus riche et belle partie du monde bouleuersee, pour la negotiation des perles et du poiure. Mechaniques victoires. Iamais l'ambition, iamais les inimitiez publiques, ne pousserent les hommes, les vns contre les autres, à si horribles hostilitez, et calamitez si miserables.

So many cities razed, so many nations exterminated, so many millions of people put to the sword, and the richest and most beautiful part of the world turned upside down for the traffic in pearls and pepper. Base, tradesmen's victories. Never did ambition, never did public enmities drive men against one another into such horrible hostilities and such miserable calamities.

3.6.18 En costoyant la mer à la queste de leurs mines, aucuns Espagnols prindrent terre en vne contree fertile et plaisante, fort habitee: et firent à ce peuple leurs remonstrances accoustumees: Qu'ils estoient gens paisibles, venans de loingtains voyages, enuoyez de la part du Roy de Castille, le plus grand Prince de la terre habitable, auquel le Pape, representant Dieu en terre, auoit donné la principauté de toutes les Indes. Que s'ils vouloient luy estre tributaires, ils seroient tres-benignement traictez: leur demandoient des viures, pour

Some Spaniards, sailing along the coast in search of their mines, landed in a fertile, pleasant and well-populated region, and made their customary declarations to its people. They said that they were peaceful men, come from distant voyages, sent on behalf of the King of Castile, the greatest prince of the habitable earth, to whom the Pope, representing God on earth, had given sovereignty over all the Indies; and that if the people were willing to be his tributaries, they would be very kindly leur nourriture, et de l'or pour le besoing de quelque medecine. Leur remontroient au demeurant, la creance d'vn seul Dieu, et la verité de nostre religion, laquelle ils leur conseilloient d'accepter, y adioustans quelques menasses.

FRENCH

La responce fut telle: Que quand à estre paisibles, ils n'en portoient pas la mine, s'ils l'estoient. Quant à leur Roy, puis qu'il demandoit, il deuoit estre indigent, et necessiteux: et celuy qui luy auoit faict cette distribution, homme aymant dissension, d'aller donner à vn tiers, chose qui n'estoit pas sienne, pour le mettre en debat contre les anciens possesseurs. Quant aux viures, qu'ils leur en fourniroient: d'or, ils en auoient peu: et que c'estoit chose qu'ils mettoient en nulle estime, d'autant qu'elle estoit inutile au seruice de leur vie, là où tout leur soin regardoit seulement à la passer heureusement et plaisamment: pourtant ce qu'ils en pourroient trouuer, sauf ce qui estoit employé au seruice de leurs dieux, qu'ils le prinssent hardiment.

Quant à vn seul Dieu, le discours leur en auoit pleu: mais qu'ils ne vouloient changer leur religion, s'en estans si vtilement seruis si long temps: et qu'ils n'auoient accoustumé prendre conseil, que de leurs amis et cognoissans. Quant aux menasses, c'estoit signe de faute de iugement, d'aller menassant ceux, desquels la nature, et les moyens estoient incongnuz. Ainsi qu'ils se despeschassent promptement de vuyder leur terre, car ils n'estoient pas accoustumez de prendre en bonne part, les honnestetez et remonstrances de gens armez, et estrangers: autrement qu'on feroit d'eux, comme de ces autres, leur montrant les testes d'aucuns hommes iusticiez autour de leur ville. Voylà vn exemple de la balbucie de cette enfance.

Mais tant y a, que ny en ce lieu-là, ny en plusieurs autres, où les Espagnols ne trouuerent les marchandises qu'ils cherchoient, ils ne feirent arrest ny entreprinse: quelque autre commodité qu'il y eust: tesmoing mes Cannibales.

ENGLISH

treated. They asked them for provisions to feed themselves, and for gold for the needs of a certain medicine. They also expounded to them belief in one God and the truth of our religion, which they advised them to accept, adding some threats.[24]

The reply was this. As for being peaceful, they did not look it, if they were. As for their king, since he was asking, he must be poor and needy; and the man who had made him that allotment must be fond of strife, to go giving a third party something that was not his own, so as to set him at odds with its ancient possessors. As for provisions, they would supply them. Of gold they had little, and it was a thing they held in no esteem, since it was useless for the service of their life, whereas all their care was only to pass their life happily and pleasantly; however, whatever of it they could find, except what was used in the service of their gods, the Spaniards were welcome to take.

As for one God, the account of him had pleased them; but they did not want to change their religion, having made such good use of it for so long; and they were not accustomed to take advice from anyone but their friends and acquaintances. As for the threats, it was a sign of poor judgment to go threatening people whose nature and means were unknown. So the Spaniards should make haste to leave their land, for they were not accustomed to take in good part the civilities and admonitions of armed men and strangers; otherwise they would be dealt with like those others—and they showed them the heads of some executed men around their town. There is an example of the babbling of this infancy.

But the fact remains that neither in that place nor in several others where the Spaniards did not find the goods they were looking for did they stop or undertake anything, whatever other advantages there might be: witness my Cannibals.[25]

TWO KINGS

The Spaniards' treachery toward the kings of Peru and Mexico, who meet it with royal constancy.

FRENCH

3.6.19 Des deux les plus puissans Monarques de ce monde là, et à l'auanture de cettuy-cy, Roys de tant de Roys: les

ENGLISH

As for the two most powerful monarchs of that world, and perhaps of this one, kings over so 24 The formal summons the Spaniards read to native peoples rested on Pope Alexander VI's grants of 1493. Montaigne's source is López de Gómara's General History of the Indies.

FRENCH

derniers qu'ils en chasserent: celuy du Peru, ayant esté pris en vne bataille, et mis à vne rançon si excessiue, qu'elle surpasse toute creance, et celle là fidellement payee: et auoir donné par sa conuersation signe d'vn courage franc, liberal, et constant, et d'vn entendement net, et bien composé: il print enuie aux vainqueurs, apres en auoir tiré vn million trois cens vingt cinq mille cinq cens poisant d'or: outre l'argent, et autres choses, qui ne monterent pas moins (si que leurs cheuaux n'alloient plus ferrez, que d'or massif) de voir encores, au prix de quelque desloyauté que ce fust, quel pouuoit estre le reste des thresors de ce Roy, et iouyr librement de ce qu'il auoit reserré.

On luy apposta vne fauce accusation et preuue: Qu'il desseignoit de faire sousleuer ses prouinces, pour se remettre en liberté. Sur quoy par beau iugement, de ceux mesme qui luy auoient dressé cette trahison, on le condamna à estre pendu et estranglé publiquement: luy ayant faict racheter le tourment d'estre bruslé tout vif, par le baptesme qu'on luy donna au supplice mesme. Accident horrible et inouy: qu'il souffrit pourtant sans se desmentir, ny de contenance, ny de parole, d'vne forme et grauité vrayement royalle. Et puis, pour endormir les peuples estonnez et transis de chose si estrange, on contrefit vn grand deuil de sa mort, et luy ordonna on des somptueuses funerailles.

3.6.20 L'autre Roy de Mexico, ayant long temps defendu sa ville assiegee, et montré en ce siege tout ce que peut et la souffrance, et la perseuerance, si onques Prince et peuple le montra: et son malheur l'ayant rendu vif, entre les mains des ennemis, auec capitulation d'estre traité en Roy: aussi ne leur fit-il rien voir en la prison, indigne de ce tiltre: ne trouuant point apres cette victoire, tout l'or qu'ils s'estoient promis: quand ils eurent tout remué, et tout fouillé, ils se mirent à en chercher des nouuelles, par les plus aspres gehennes, dequoy ils se peurent aduiser, sur les prisonniers qu'ils tenoient.

Mais pour n'auoir rien profité, trouuant des courages plus forts que leurs tourments, ils en vindrent en fin à many kings, the last ones they drove from power: the king of Peru had been taken in a battle and held to a ransom so excessive that it surpasses all belief, and he had paid it faithfully; in his dealings he had given signs of a frank, liberal and steadfast courage and of a clear and well-ordered understanding. Yet the victors, after extracting from him one million three hundred twenty-five thousand five hundred weight of gold, besides silver and other things that amounted to no less (so that their horses went shod with nothing but solid gold), were seized with the desire to see as well, at the cost of whatever treachery, what the rest of this king's treasures might be, and to enjoy freely what he had stored away.[26]

ENGLISH

A false charge and false evidence were rigged up against him: that he was plotting to make his provinces rise so as to set himself free. Whereupon, by the fine judgment of the very men who had contrived this treachery against him, he was condemned to be publicly hanged and strangled, having been made to buy off the torment of being burned alive by the baptism they gave him at the very place of execution. A horrible and unheard-of event, which he nevertheless bore without belying himself either in countenance or in word, with a truly royal bearing and gravity. And then, to lull the peoples, stunned and paralyzed by so strange a thing, they feigned great mourning for his death and ordered sumptuous funeral rites for him.

The other, the king of Mexico, had long defended his besieged city and shown in that siege all that endurance and perseverance can do, if ever prince and people showed it. His misfortune delivered him alive into the hands of the enemy, under terms of surrender that he would be treated as a king; and in prison he showed them nothing unworthy of that title. After this victory the victors did not find all the gold they had promised themselves; so when they had turned everything over and searched everything, they set about seeking news of it by the harshest tortures they could devise, on the prisoners they held.[27]

But having gained nothing, finding courage stronger than their torments, they finally came to 25 See "Of Cannibals" (I.31).

26 Atahualpa, Inca ruler captured by Francisco Pizarro in 1532 and executed in 1533.

FRENCH

telle rage, que contre leur foy et contre tout droict des gens, ils condamnerent le Roy mesme, et l'vn des principaux seigneurs de sa cour à la gehenne, en presence l'vn de l'autre. Ce seigneur se trouuant forcé de la douleur, enuironné de braziers ardens, tourna sur la fin, piteusement sa veue vers son maistre, comme pour luy demander mercy, de ce qu'il n'en pouuoit plus.

Le Roy plantant fierement et rigoureusement les yeux sur luy, pour reproche de sa lascheté et pusillanimité, luy dit seulement ces mots, d'vne voix rude et ferme: Et moy, suis ie dans vn bain, suis-ie pas plus à mon aise que toy? Celuy-là soudain apres succomba aux douleurs, et mourut sur la place. Le Roy à demy rosty, fut emporté de là. Non tant par pitié (car quelle pitié toucha iamais des ames si barbares, qui pour la doubteuse information de quelque vase d'or à piller, fissent griller deuant leurs yeux vn homme: non qu'vn Roy, si grand, et en fortune, et en merite) mais ce fut que sa constance rendoit de plus en plus honteuse leur cruauté.

Ils le pendirent depuis, ayant courageusement entrepris de se deliurer par armes d'vne si longue captiuité et subiection: où il fit sa fin digne d'vn magnanime Prince.

3.6.21 A vne autre fois ils mirent brusler pour vn coup, en mesme feu, quatre cens soixante hommes tous vifs, les quatre cens du commun peuple, les soixante des principaux seigneurs d'vne prouince, prisonniers de guerre simplement. Nous tenons d'eux-mesmes ces narrations: car ilz ne les aduouent pas seulement, ils s'en ventent, et les preschent. Seroit-ce pour tesmoignage de leur iustice, ou zele enuers la religion? Certes ce sont voyes trop diuerses, et ennemies d'vne si saincte fin.

S'ils se fussent proposés d'estendre nostre foy, ils eussent consideré que ce n'est pas en possession de terres qu'elle s'amplifie, mais en possession d'hommes: et se fussent trop contentez des meurtres que la necessité de la guerre apporte, sans y mesler indifferemment vne boucherie, comme sur des bestes sauuages: vniuerselle, autant que le fer et le feu y ont peu attaindre: n'en ayant conserué par leur dessein, qu'autant qu'ils en ont voulu faire de miserables esclaues, pour l'ouurage et seruice de leurs minieres. Si que plusieurs des chefs ont esté punis à mort, sur les lieux de leur conqueste, par ordonnance des Roys such a frenzy that, against their word and against all law of nations, they condemned the king himself and one of the chief lords of his court to torture in each other's presence. This lord, overcome by the pain and surrounded by burning braziers, at last turned his eyes piteously toward his master, as if to ask his pardon because he could bear no more.

ENGLISH

The king, fixing his eyes proudly and sternly on him in reproach for his cowardice and faintheartedness, said only these words to him, in a harsh, firm voice: "And I—am I in a bath? Am I any more at ease than you?" The lord soon afterward succumbed to the pain and died on the spot. The king, half roasted, was carried away from there—not so much out of pity (for what pity ever touched souls so barbarous that, on dubious information about some golden vessel to plunder, they would have a man grilled before their eyes, let alone a king so great in fortune and in merit), but because his constancy made their cruelty more and more shameful.

They hanged him later, after he had bravely attempted to free himself by arms from so long a captivity and subjection; and there he made an end worthy of a great-souled prince.

Another time they burned alive, at one stroke and in the same fire, four hundred and sixty men: the four hundred from the common people, the sixty from among the chief lords of a province—simply prisoners of war. We have these accounts from the men themselves, for they do not merely admit these things; they boast of them and proclaim them. Could it be as a testimony to their justice, or to their zeal for religion? Certainly these are ways too contrary and too hostile to so holy an end.

If they had set out to spread our faith, they would have considered that it grows not by possession of lands but by possession of men. They would have been more than content with the killings that the necessity of war brings, without adding indiscriminately a butchery, as if on wild beasts—universal, as far as fire and sword could reach—deliberately sparing only as many as they wanted to make into wretched slaves for the work and service of their mines. So much so that several of the leaders have 27 Cuauhtémoc, last Aztec emperor, captured by Cortés in 1521 and hanged in 1525.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	de Castille, iustement offencez de l'horreur de leurs deportemens, et quasi tous desestimez et mal-voulus.	been put to death in the lands of their conquest by order of the kings of Castile, justly offended by the horror of their conduct, and almost all of them have been held in disrepute and ill will.
	Dieu a meritoirement permis, que ces grands pillages se soient absorbez par la mer en les transportant: ou par les guerres intestines, dequoy ils se sont mangez entre-eux: et la plus part s'enterrerent sur les lieux, sans aucun fruict de leur victoire.	God has deservedly allowed these great plunders to be swallowed up by the sea as they were being shipped, or by the civil wars in which they devoured one another; and most of them were buried on the spot, without any fruit from their victory.
3.6.22	Quant à ce que la recepte, et entre les mains d'vn Prince mesnager, et prudent, respond si peu à l'esperance, qu'on en donna à ses predecesseurs, et à cette premiere abondance de richesses, qu'on rencontra à l'abord de ces nouuelles terres (car encore qu'on en retire beaucoup, nous voyons que ce n'est rien, au prix de ce qui s'en deuoit attendre) c'est que l'vsage de la monnoye estoit entierement incognu, et que par consequent, leur or se trouua tout assemblé, n'estant en autre seruice, que de montre, et de parade, comme vn meuble reserué de pere en fils, par plusieurs puissants Roys, qui espuisoient tousiours leurs mines, pour faire ce grand monceau de vases et statues, à l'ornement de leurs palais, et de leurs temples: au lieu que nostre or est tout en emploite et en commerce.	Why does the revenue, even in the hands of a thrifty and prudent prince, fall so far short of the hopes held out to his predecessors, and of that first abundance of riches found on reaching these new lands? For although a great deal is drawn from them, we see that it is nothing compared with what was to be expected. The reason is that the use of money was entirely unknown there. Consequently their gold was found all gathered in one place, serving no purpose but show and display, like a piece of furniture handed down from father to son by several powerful kings. These kings kept draining their mines to make that great heap of vessels and statues to adorn their palaces and temples. Our gold, by contrast, is all in use and in trade.[28]
	Nous le menuisons et alterons en mille formes, l'espandons et dispersons. Imaginons que nos Roys amoncelassent ainsi tout l'or, qu'ils pourroient trouuer en plusieurs siecles, et le gardassent immobile.	We cut it up small and change it into a thousand forms; we spread it about and scatter it. Imagine our kings heaping up in the same way all the gold they could find over several centuries, and keeping it idle.

THE FIVE SUNS

The Mexicans' belief in five ages of the world, and the great road of the Incas.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.6.23	Ceux du royaume de Mexico estoient aucunement plus ciuilisez, et plus artistes, que n'estoient les autres nations de là. Aussi iugeoient-ils, ainsi que nous, que l'vniuers fust proche de sa fin: et en prindrent pour signe la desolation que nous y apportasmes. Ils croyoyent que l'estre du monde, se depart en cinq aages, et en la vie de cinq soleils consecutifs, desquels les quatre auoient desia fourny leurs temps, et que celuy qui leur esclairoit, estoit le cinquiesme. Le premier perit auec toutes les autres creatures, par vniuerselle inondation d'eaux.	The people of the kingdom of Mexico were somewhat more civilized and more skilled in the arts than the other nations over there. So they also judged, as we do, that the universe was near its end, and they took the desolation we brought upon them as a sign of it. They believed that the existence of the world is divided into five ages, the lives of five successive suns. Four of these suns had already run their course, and the one that gave them light was the fifth. The first perished, 28 The prince is Philip II of Spain (reigned 1556–1598).

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Le second, par la cheute du ciel sur nous, qui estouffa toute chose viuante: auquel aage ils assignent les geants, et en firent voir aux Espagnols des ossements; à la proportion desquels, la stature des hommes reuenoit à vingt paumes de hauteur. Le troisiesme, par feu, qui embrasa et consuma tout. Le quatriesme, par vne émotion d'air, et de vent, qui abbatit iusques à plusieurs montaignes: les hommes n'en moururent point, mais ils furent changez en magots (quelles impressions ne souffre la lascheté de l'humaine creance!) Apres la mort de ce quatriesme soleil, le monde fut vingt-cinq ans en perpetuelles tenebres. Au quinziesme desquels fut creé vn homme, et vne femme, qui refirent l'humaine race.

along with all other creatures, in a universal flood of waters.

The second perished when the sky fell upon us and smothered every living thing. To this age they assign the giants, and they showed the Spaniards some of their bones; by their proportions, those men must have stood twenty palms high. The third sun perished by fire, which set everything ablaze and consumed it. The fourth perished by a commotion of air and wind that beat down even several mountains. Men did not die of it, but they were changed into apes. (What impressions will the pliancy of human belief not take!) After the death of this fourth sun, the world lay twenty-five years in perpetual darkness. In the fifteenth of these years a man and a woman were created, and they remade the human race.

Dix ans apres, à certain de leurs iours, le soleil parut nouuellement creé: et commence depuis, le compte de leurs annees par ce iour là. Le troisiesme iour de sa creation, moururent les Dieux anciens: les nouueaux sont nays depuis du iour à la iournee. Ce qu'ils estiment de la maniere que ce dernier soleil perira, mon autheur n'en a rien appris. Mais leur nombre de ce quatriesme changement, rencontre à cette grande conionction des astres, qui produisit il y a huict cens tant d'ans, selon que les astrologiens estiment, plusieurs grandes alterations et nouuelletez au monde.

Ten years later, on a certain one of their days, the sun appeared, newly created, and they have counted their years from that day ever since. On the third day after its creation the old gods died; the new ones have been born since, from day to day. What they think about the way this last sun will perish, my author learned nothing. But their reckoning of this fourth change coincides with that great conjunction of the stars which, some eight hundred years ago by the astrologers' estimate, produced many great alterations and novelties in the world.[29]

3.6.24 Quant à la pompe et magnificence, par où ie suis entré en ce propos, ny Græce, ny Rome, ny Ægypte, ne peut, soit en vtilité, ou difficulté, ou noblesse, comparer aucun de ses ouurages, au chemin qui se voit au Peru, dressé par les Roys du païs, depuis la ville de Quito, iusques à celle de Cusco (il y a trois cens lieuës) droit, vny, large de vingt-cinq pas, paué, reuestu de costé et d'autre de belles et hautes murailles, et le long d'icelles par le dedans, deux ruisseaux perennes, bordez de beaux arbres, qu'ils nomment, Moly. Où ils ont trouué des montaignes et rochers, ils les ont taillez et applanis, et comblé les fondrieres de pierre et chaux.

As for pomp and magnificence, which is where I began this subject: neither Greece, nor Rome, nor Egypt can compare any of its works with the road to be seen in Peru, whether for usefulness, difficulty or nobility. The kings of that country built it from the city of Quito to the city of Cusco, a distance of three hundred leagues. It is straight, level, twenty-five paces wide and paved. On either side it is lined with fine, high walls, and along them, on the inside, run two ever-flowing streams bordered with beautiful trees that they call molly. Where they came upon mountains and rocks, they cut through them and leveled them, and they filled the hollows with stone and lime.[30]

Au chef de chasque iournee, il y a de beaux palais fournis de viures, de vestements, et d'armes, tant pour les voyageurs, que pour les armees qui ont à y passer. En

At the end of each day's journey there are fine palaces stocked with provisions, clothing and 29 Montaigne's author is Francisco López de Gómara, whose General History of the Indies (1552) he read in French translation.

30 The molly, or molle, is the Peruvian pepper tree.

FRENCH

l'estimation de cet ouurage, i'ay compté la difficulté, qui est particulierement considerable en ce lieu là. Ils ne bastissoient point de moindres pierres, que de dix pieds en carré: ils n'auoient autre moyen de charrier, qu'à force de bras en trainant leur charge: et pas seulement l'art d'eschaffauder: n'y sçachants autre finesse, que de hausser autant de terre, contre leur bastiment, comme il s'esleue, pour l'oster apres.

ENGLISH

arms, for travelers as well as for the armies that have to pass that way. In judging this work I have taken the difficulty into account, which is especially considerable in that place. They built with no stones smaller than ten feet square. They had no other means of carrying than the strength of their arms, dragging their loads, and they did not even have the skill of scaffolding. The only trick they knew was to pile earth up against the building as it rose, and to remove it afterward.

3.6.25 Retombons à nos coches. En leur place, et de toute autre voiture, ils se faisoient porter par les hommes, et sur les espaules. Ce dernier Roy du Peru, le iour qu'il fut pris, estoit ainsi porté sur des brancars d'or, et assis dans vne chaize d'or, au milieu de sa bataille. Autant qu'on tuoit de ces porteurs, pour le faire choir à bas, car on le vouloit prendre vif, autant d'autres, et à l'enuy, prenoient la place des morts: de façon qu'on ne le peut onques abbatre, quelque meurtre qu'on fist de ces gens là, iusques à ce qu'vn homme de cheual l'alla saisir au corps, et l'aualla par terre.

Let us fall back on our coaches. Instead of coaches, or any other conveyance, they had themselves carried by men, on their shoulders. That last king of Peru, on the day he was taken, was being carried in this way on golden poles, seated in a golden chair, in the midst of his army. As fast as the Spaniards killed his bearers to bring him down (for they wanted to take him alive), other bearers, vying with one another, took the places of the dead. So he could never be brought down, however many of those people were slaughtered, until a horseman went and seized him bodily and pulled him to the ground.

III.7 Of the Disadvantage of Greatness

De l'incommodité de la grandeur
Montaigne argues that greatness is easy to forgo and that rank isolates princes from honest judgment and real competition.

FRENCH

3.7.1 PVISQVE nous ne la pouuons aueindre, vengeons nous à en mesdire. Si n'est-ce pas entierement mesdire de quelque chose, d'y trouuer des deffauts: il s'en trouue en toutes choses, pour belles et desirables qu'elles soyent. En general, elle a cet euident auantage, qu'elle se raualle quand il luy plaist, et qu'à peu pres, elle a le choix, de l'vne et l'autre condition. Car on ne tombe pas de toute hauteur, il en est plus, desquelles on peut descendre, sans tomber. Bien me semble-il, que nous la faisons trop valoir: et trop valoir aussi la resolution de ceux que nous auons ou veu ou ouy dire, l'auoir mesprisee, ou s'en estre desmis, de leur propre dessein.

Son essence n'est pas si euidemment commode, qu'on ne la puisse refuser sans miracle. Ie trouue l'effort bien difficile à la souffrance des maux, mais au contentement d'vne mediocre mesure de fortune, et fuite de la grandeur, i'y trouue fort peu d'affaire. C'est vne vertu, ce me semble, où moy, qui ne suis qu'vn oyson, arriuerois sans beaucoup de contention. Que doiuent faire ceux, qui mettroient encores en consideration, la gloire qui accompagne ce refus, auquel il peut escheoir plus d'ambition, qu'au desir mesme et iouyssance de la grandeur? D'autant que l'ambition ne se conduit iamais mieux selon soy, que par vne voye esgaree et inusitee.

3.7.2 I'aiguise mon courage vers la patience, ie l'affoiblis vers le desir. Autant ay-ie à souhaitter qu'vn autre, et laisse à mes souhaits autant de liberté et d'indiscretion: mais pourtant, si ne m'est-il iamais aduenu, de souhaitter ny empire ny royauté, ny l'eminence de ces hautes fortunes et commanderesses. Ie ne vise pas de ce costé là: ie m'aime trop. Quand ie pense à croistre, c'est bassement: d'vne accroissance contrainte et coüarde: proprement pour moy: en resolution, en prudence, en santé, en

ENGLISH

Since we cannot attain it, let us take our revenge by speaking ill of it. And yet finding faults in something is not altogether speaking ill of it; faults are found in all things, however beautiful and desirable they may be. In general, greatness has this evident advantage: it can lower itself when it pleases, and it has more or less the choice of either condition. For one does not fall from every height; there are more heights from which one can come down without falling. It does seem to me that we rate it too highly. We also rate too highly the resolve of those whom we have seen, or heard tell of, despising it or giving it up of their own accord.[1]

Its nature is not so evidently advantageous that one cannot refuse it without a miracle. I find it a hard effort to endure ills; but to be content with a moderate measure of fortune, and to shun greatness, I find there is very little to it. It is a virtue, it seems to me, that even I, who am only a silly gosling, could attain without much strain. What, then, of those who would also take into account the glory that goes with this refusal? There may be more ambition in it than in the very desire for greatness and the enjoyment of it. For ambition never follows its own bent better than by an out-of-the-way and unusual path.

I sharpen my courage toward patience; I weaken it toward desire. I have as much to wish for as anyone else, and I leave my wishes as much freedom and recklessness. And yet it has never happened to me to wish for empire or royalty, or for the eminence of those lofty, commanding fortunes. I do not aim in that direction: I love myself too much. When I think of growing, it is in a lowly way, with a constrained and timid growth, suited strictly to 1 "It" is greatness, the subject named in the essay's title.

FRENCH

beauté, et en richesse encore. Mais ce credit, cette auctorité si puissante, foule mon imagination.

Et tout à l'opposite de l'autre, m'aymerois à l'auanture mieux, deuxiesme ou troisiesme à Perigueux, que premier à Paris: au moins sans mentir, mieux troisiesme à Paris, que premier en charge, Ie ne veux ny debattre auec vn huissier de porte, miserable incognu: ny faire fendre en adoration, les presses où ie passe. Ie suis duit à vn estage moyen, comme par mon sort, aussi par mon goust. Et ay montré en la conduitte de ma vie, et de mes entreprinses, que i'ay plustost fuy, qu'autrement, d'eniamber par dessus le degré de fortune, auquel Dieu logea ma naissance. Toute constitution naturelle, est pareillement iuste et aysee.

I'ay ainsi l'ame poltrone, que ie ne mesure pas la bonne fortune selon sa hauteur, ie la mesure selon sa facilité.

3.7.3 Mais si ie n'ay point le cœur gros assez, ie l'ay à l'equipollent ouuert, et qui m'ordonne de publier hardiment sa foiblesse. Qui me donneroit à conferer la vie de L. Thorius Balbus, gallant homme, beau, sçauant, sain, entendu et abondant en toute sorte de commoditez et plaisirs, conduisant vne vie tranquille, et toute sienne, l'ame bien preparee contre la mort, la superstition, les douleurs, et autres encombriers de l'humaine necessité, mourant en fin en bataille, les armes en la main, pour la defense de son païs, d'vne part: et d'autre part la vie de M.

Regulus, ainsi grande et hautaine, que chascun la cognoist, et sa fin admirable: l'vne sans nom, sans dignité: l'autre exemplaire et glorieuse à merueilles: i'en diroy certes ce qu'en dit Cicero, si ie sçauoy aussi bien dire que luy. Mais s'il me les falloit coucher sur la mienne, ie diroy aussi, que la premiere est autant selon ma portee, et selon mon desir, que ie conforme à ma portee, comme la seconde est loing au delà. Qu'à cette cy, ie ne puis aduenir que par veneration: i'aduiendroy volontiers à l'autre par vsage.

ENGLISH

me: in resolution, in prudence, in health, in good looks, and in wealth too. But that standing, that so powerful authority, crushes my imagination.

And quite the opposite of that other man, I would perhaps rather be second or third in Périgueux than first in Paris; at least, to tell no lie, rather third in Paris than first in office. I want neither to be a wretched nobody wrangling with a doorkeeper, nor to have crowds part in adoration wherever I pass. I am suited to a middle station, by my lot and by my taste alike. And I have shown, in the conduct of my life and my undertakings, that I have shunned rather than sought to step over the degree of fortune in which God placed my birth. Every natural constitution is equally just and easy.[2]

My soul is so cowardly that I do not measure good fortune by its height; I measure it by its ease.

But if my heart is not big enough, it is correspondingly open, and it bids me boldly publish its weakness. Suppose someone gave me two lives to compare. On the one hand, the life of L. Thorius Balbus: a fine man, handsome, learned, healthy, understanding, and abounding in every kind of comfort and pleasure; he led a tranquil life entirely his own, his soul well prepared against death, superstition, pain and the other encumbrances of human necessity; and he died at last in battle, weapon in hand, in defense of his country. On the other hand, the life of M.[3]

Regulus, as great and lofty as everyone knows it to be, and his admirable end. The one is without name or dignity; the other is exemplary and wonderfully glorious. I would certainly say of them what Cicero says, if I could speak as well as he. But if I had to measure them against my own life, I would also say this: the first is as much within my reach, and in line with my desire, which I fit to my reach, as the second is far beyond it. The latter I can approach only by veneration; the former I would gladly approach by practice.

2 Julius Caesar is said to have declared, passing a small Alpine village, that he would rather be first there than second in Rome.
3 Cicero contrasts the Epicurean Lucius Thorius Balbus with Regulus, tortured to death by the Carthaginians, in On Ends II.63–65.

THE BURDEN OF KINGS

Montaigne wants no mastery and pities kings, cut off from honest rivalry and true praise.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.7.4	Retournons à nostre grandeur temporelle, d'où nous sommes partis. Ie suis desgousté de maistrise, et actiue et passiue. Otanez l'vn des sept, qui auoient droit de pretendre au royaume de Perse, print vn party, que i'eusse prins volontiers: c'est qu'il quitta à ses compagnons son droit d'y pouuoir arriuer par election, ou par sort: pourueu que luy et les siens, vescussent en cet empire hors de toute subiection et maistrise, sauf celle des loix antiques: et y eussent toute liberté, qui ne porteroit preiudice à icelles: impatient de commander, comme d'estre commandé.	Let us return to our worldly greatness, from which we set out. I am disgusted with mastery, both active and passive. Otanes, one of the seven who had a right to claim the kingdom of Persia, took a course that I would gladly have taken. He gave up to his companions his right to attain the throne by election or by lot, on condition that he and his family should live in that empire free of all subjection and mastery, except that of the ancient laws, and should enjoy every liberty that did not prejudice those laws. He was as impatient of commanding as of being commanded.[4]
3.7.5	Le plus aspre et difficile mestier du monde, à mon gré, c'est, faire dignement le Roy. I'excuse plus de leurs fautes, qu'on ne fait communement, en consideration de l'horrible poix de leur charge, qui m'estonne. Il est difficile de garder mesure, à vne puissance si desmesuree. Si est-ce que c'est enuers ceux-mesmes qui sont de moins excellente nature, vne singuliere incitation à la vertu, d'estre logé en tel lieu, où vous ne faciez aucun bien, qui ne soit mis en registre et en compte: et où le moindre bien faire, porte sur tant de gens: et où vostre suffisance, comme celle des prescheurs, s'adresse principallement au peuple, iuge peu exacte, facile à piper, facile à contenter.	The harshest and most difficult trade in the world, in my opinion, is to play the king worthily. I excuse more of kings' faults than people commonly do, in consideration of the horrible weight of their office, which stuns me. It is hard to keep measure with a power so beyond measure. And yet, even for those of a less excellent nature, it is a singular spur to virtue to be placed where you can do no good that is not put on record and on account; where the least good deed bears on so many people; and where your ability, like a preacher's, is addressed chiefly to the people, a judge not very exacting, easy to fool, easy to satisfy.
	Il est peu de choses, ausquelles nous puissions donner le iugement syncere, par ce qu'il en est peu, ausquelles en quelque façon nous n'ayons particulier interest. La superiorité et inferiorité, la maistrise, et la subiection, sont obligees à vne naturelle enuie et contestation: il faut qu'elles s'entrepillent perpetuellement. Ie ne crois ny l'vne ny l'autre, des droicts de sa compagne: laissons en dire à la raison, qui est inflexible et impassible, quand nous en pourrons finer. Ie feuilletois il n'y a pas vn mois, deux liures Escossois, se combattans sur ce subiect. Le populaire rend le Roy de pire condition qu'vn charretier, le monarchique le loge quelques brasses au dessus de Dieu, en puissance et souueraineté.	There are few things on which we can give a sincere judgment, because there are few in which we do not have some private interest. Superiority and inferiority, mastery and subjection, are bound to natural envy and rivalry; they must perpetually plunder each other. I believe neither of them about the rights of its partner. Let reason speak on the matter, which is inflexible and dispassionate, when we can get hold of it. Not a month ago I was leafing through two Scottish books fighting over this subject. The one for the people makes the king worse off than a carter; the one for monarchy sets him some fathoms above God in power and sovereignty.[5]
3.7.6	Or l'incommodité de la grandeur, que i'ay pris icy à remerquer, par quelque occasion qui vient de m'en	Now the inconvenience of greatness that I have undertaken to note here, prompted by an occasion that has just reminded me of it, is this. There is

4 The story is told by Herodotus (Histories III.83).

FRENCH

aduertir, est cette-cy. Il n'est à l'auanture rien plus plaisant au commerce des hommes, que les essais que nous faisons les vns contre les autres, par ialousie d'honneur et de valeur, soit aux exercices du corps ou de l'esprit: ausquels la grandeur souueraine n'a aucune vraye part. A la verité il m'a semblé souuent, qu'à force de respect, on y traicte les Princes desdaigneusement et iniurieusement.

Car ce dequoy ie m'offençois infiniement en mon enfance, que ceux qui s'exerçoient auec moy, espargnassent de s'y employer à bon escient, pour me trouuer indigne contre qui ils s'efforçassent: c'est ce qu'on voit leur aduenir tous les iours, chacun se trouuant indigne de s'efforcer contre eux. Si on recognoist qu'ils ayent tant soit peu d'affection à la victoire, il n'est celuy, qui ne se trauaille à la leur prester: et qui n'ayme mieux trahir sa gloire, que d'offenser la leur. On n'y employe qu'autant d'effort qu'il en faut pour seruir à leur honneur. Quelle part ont ils à la meslee, en laquelle chacun est pour eux?

Il me semble voir ces paladins du temps passé, se presentans aux ioustes et aux combats, auec des corps, et des armes faëes. Brisson courant contre Alexandre, se feignit en la course: Alexandre l'en tança: mais il luy en deuoit faire donner le foüet. Pour cette consideration, Carneades disoit, que les enfans des Princes n'apprennent rien à droict qu'à manier des cheuaux: d'autant qu'en tout autre exercice, chacun fleschit soubs eux, et leur donne gaigné: mais vn cheual qui n'est ny flateur ny courtisan, verse le fils du Roy par terre, comme il feroit le fils d'vn crocheteur.

3.7.7 Homere a esté contrainct de consentir que Venus fut blessee au combat de Troye, vne si douce saincte et si delicate, pour luy donner du courage et de la hardiesse, qualitez qui ne tombent aucunement en ceux qui sont exempts de danger. On fait courroucer, craindre, fuyr les Dieux, s'enialouser, se douloir, et se passionner, pour les honorer des vertus qui se bastissent entre nous, de ces imperfections. Qui ne participe, au hazard et difficulté, ne peut pretendre interest à l'honneur et plaisir qui suit les actions hazardeuses. C'est pitié de pouuoir tant, qu'il aduienne que toutes choses vous cedent. Vostre fortune perhaps nothing more pleasant in human company than the trials we make against one another out of rivalry in honor and prowess, whether in exercises of body or of mind. In these, sovereign greatness has no true share. Indeed, it has often seemed to me that out of sheer respect, princes are treated in them disdainfully and insultingly.

ENGLISH

In my childhood I was infinitely offended when those who competed with me held back from trying in earnest, because they thought me unworthy of their effort. That is what we see happen to princes every day: everyone thinks himself unworthy to exert himself against them. If anyone notices that they have the least desire for victory, there is no one who does not strive to hand it to them, and who would not rather betray his own glory than offend theirs. People put in only as much effort as serves their honor. What part do they have in a fray in which everyone is on their side?

I seem to see those paladins of olden times presenting themselves at jousts and combats with enchanted bodies and arms. Brisson, running a race against Alexander, slackened his pace on purpose. Alexander scolded him for it, but he ought to have had him whipped. For this reason Carneades used to say that the sons of princes learn nothing properly except how to manage horses. In every other exercise everyone bends before them and lets them win; but a horse, which is neither a flatterer nor a courtier, throws the king's son to the ground just as it would the son of a porter.[6]

Homer was obliged to let Venus, so sweet and delicate a divinity, be wounded in the fighting at Troy, in order to give her courage and boldness, qualities that in no way belong to those who are exempt from danger. The gods are made to grow angry, to fear, to flee, to be jealous, to grieve and to be swept by passion, in order to honor them with the virtues that among us are built out of these imperfections. Whoever has no share in the risk and difficulty can claim no interest in the honor and pleasure that follow hazardous actions. It is a pity to be so powerful that everything gives way before

5 Probably George Buchanan's On the Right of Kingship among the Scots (1579) and Adam Blackwood's reply, Apology for Kings (1581).
6 Plutarch tells this story of the runner Crisso of Himera.

FRENCH

reiette trop loing de vous la societé et la compagnie, elle vous plante trop à l'escart.

Cette aysance et lasche facilité, de faire tout baisser soubs soy, est ennemye de toute sorte de plaisir. C'est glisser cela, ce n'est pas aller: c'est dormir, ce n'est pas viure! Conceuez l'homme accompagné d'omnipotence, vous l'abysmez: il faut qu'il vous demande par aumosne, de l'empeschement et de la resistance. Son estre et son bien est en indigence.

3.7.8 Leurs bonnes qualitez sont mortes et perdues: car elles ne se sentent que par comparaison, et on les en met hors: ils ont peu de cognoissance de la vraye loüange, estans batus d'vne si continuelle approbation et vniforme. Ont ils affaire au plus sot de leurs subiects? ils n'ont aucun moyen de prendre aduantage sur luy: en disant, C'est pour ce qu'il est mon Roy, il luy semble auoir assez dict, qu'il a presté la main à se laisser vaincre. Cette qualité estouffe et consomme les autres qualitez vrayes et essentielles: elles sont enfoncees dans la royauté: et ne leur laisse à eux faire valoir, que les actions qui la touchent directement, et qui luy seruent: les offices de leur charge.

C'est tant estre Roy, qu'il n'est que par là. Cette lueur estrangere qui l'enuironne, le cache, et nous le desrobe: nostre veuë s'y rompt et s'y dissipe, estant remplie et arrestee par cette forte lumiere. Le Senat ordonna le prix d'eloquence à Tybere: il le refusa, n'estimant pas d'vn iugement si peu libre, quand bien il eust esté veritable, il s'en peust ressentir.

3.7.9 Comme on leur cede tous auantages d'honneur, aussi conforte lon et auctorise les deffauts et vices qu'ils ont: non seulement par approbation, mais aussi par imitation. Chacun des suiuans d'Alexandre portoit comme luy, la teste à costé. Et les flateurs de Dionisius, s'entrehurtoient en sa presence, poussoyent et versoient ce qui se rencontroit à leurs pieds, pour dire qu'ils auoient la veuë aussi courte que luy. Les greueures ont aussi par fois seruy de recommandation et faueur. I'en ay veu la surdité en affectation. Et par ce que le maistre hayssoit sa femme, Plutarque a veu les courtisans repudier les leurs, qu'ils aymoient.

Qui plus est, la paillardise s'en est veuë en credit, et toute dissolution: comme aussi la desloyauté, les blasphemes, la cruauté: comme l'heresie, comme la superstition, you. Your fortune thrusts society and company too far from you; it plants you too far apart.

ENGLISH

This ease, this slack facility of making everything bow beneath you, is the enemy of every kind of pleasure. That is sliding, not walking; it is sleeping, not living! Imagine a man attended by omnipotence: you sink him in an abyss. He must beg you for hindrance and resistance as for alms. His being and his good are in want.

Their good qualities are dead and lost, for qualities are felt only by comparison, and kings are put out of reach of comparison. They know little of true praise, battered as they are by such continual and uniform approval. Do they have to deal with the stupidest of their subjects? They have no way of getting the better of him. He has only to say, "It is because he is my king," and he thinks he has made it plain enough that he lent a hand to his own defeat. This quality smothers and consumes their other true and essential qualities; these are sunk in royalty. It leaves them nothing to show off but the actions that touch it directly and serve it: the duties of their office.

This is being king to such a degree that he exists only through it. That borrowed glow surrounding him hides him and steals him from us; our sight is broken and scattered by it, being filled and stopped by that strong light. The Senate awarded the prize for eloquence to Tiberius. He refused it, thinking he could take no satisfaction from a judgment so little free, even had it been true.

Just as all the advantages of honor are yielded to them, so their defects and vices are encouraged and sanctioned, not only by approval but also by imitation. Each of Alexander's followers carried his head tilted to one side, as he did. And the flatterers of Dionysius bumped into one another in his presence, and knocked over and upset whatever lay at their feet, to show that they were as short-sighted as he. Ruptures, too, have at times served as a recommendation and a source of favor. I have seen deafness put on for affectation. And because the master hated his wife, Plutarch saw the courtiers repudiate their own wives, whom they loved.

What is more, lechery has been seen to come into fashion this way, and every kind of debauchery; and likewise disloyalty, blasphemy, cruelty; and l'irreligion, la mollesse, et pis si pis il y a. Par vn exemple encores plus dangereux, que celuy des flateurs de Mithridates, qui d'autant que leur maistre pretendoit à l'honneur de bon medecin, luy portoient à inciser et cauteriser leurs membres. Car ces autres souffrent cauteriser leur ame, partie plus delicate et plus noble.	heresy, superstition, irreligion, softness, and worse, if there is worse. This is an example even more dangerous than that of Mithridates' flatterers. Because their master aspired to the honor of being a good physician, they brought him their limbs to cut and cauterize. These others let their souls be cauterized, a more delicate and noble part.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.7.10	Mais pour acheuer par où i'ay commencé: Adrian l'Empereur debatant auec le philosophe Fauorinus de l'interpretation de quelque mot: Fauorinus luy en quitta bien tost la victoire: ses amys se plaignans à luy: Vous vous moquez, fit-il, voudriez vous qu'il ne fust pas plus sçauant que moy, luy qui commande à trente legions? Auguste escriuit des vers contre Asinius Pollio: Et moy, dit Pollio, ie me tais: ce n'est pas sagesse d'escrire à l'enuy de celuy, qui peut proscrire. Et auoient raison. Car Dionysius pour ne pouuoir esgaller Philoxenus en la poësie, et Platon en discours: en condamna l'vn aux carrieres, et enuoya vendre l'autre esclaue en l'isle d'Ægine.	But to end where I began: the Emperor Hadrian was debating with the philosopher Favorinus over the interpretation of some word, and Favorinus soon conceded him the victory. When his friends complained to him, he said, "You must be joking. Would you have him not be more learned than I, he who commands thirty legions?" Augustus wrote verses against Asinius Pollio. "And I," said Pollio, "keep silent: it is not wise to write in rivalry with a man who can proscribe." And they were right. For Dionysius, because he could not equal Philoxenus in poetry and Plato in reasoning, condemned the one to the quarries and sent the other to be sold as a slave on the island of Aegina.

III.8 Of the Art of Conversation

De l'art de conferer

Montaigne praises vigorous, frank debate as the best exercise for the mind and admits his own faults as a warning to others.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.8.1 C'EST vn vsage de nostre iustice, d'en condamner aucuns, pour l'aduertissement des autres. De les condamner, par ce qu'ils ont failly, ce seroit bestise, comme dit Platon. Car ce qui est faict, ne se peut deffaire: mais c'est afin qu'ils ne faillent plus de mesmes, ou qu'on fuye l'exemple de leur faute. On ne corrige pas celuy qu'on pend, on corrige les autres par luy. Ie fais de mesmes. Mes erreurs sont tantost naturelles et incorrigibles et irremediables. Mais ce que les honnestes hommes profitent au public en se faisant imiter, ie le profiteray à l'auanture à me faire euiter. Nónne vides Albi vt malè viuat filius, vtque / Barrus inops?

It is a practice of our justice to condemn some people as a warning to others. To condemn them because they have done wrong would be stupidity, as Plato says, for what is done cannot be undone. It is done so that they will not do wrong in the same way again, or so that others will shun the example of their fault. We do not correct the man we hang; we correct others through him. I do the same. My errors are by now natural, incorrigible and irremediable. But the good that decent men do the public by getting themselves imitated, I shall perhaps do by getting myself avoided. Do you not see how badly Albius' son lives, and how / Barrus is in want?[1] magnum documentum, ne patriam rem / Perdere quis velit. Publiant et accusant mes imperfections, quelqu'vn apprendra de les craindre. Les parties que i'estime le plus en moy, tirent plus d'honneur de m'accuser, que de me recommander. Voylà pourquoy i'y retombe, et m'y arreste plus souuent. Mais quand tout est compté, on ne parle iamais de soy, sans perte. Les propres condemnations sont tousiours accreuës, les louanges mescruës. Il en peut estre aucuns de ma complexion, qui m'instruis mieux par contrarieté que par similitude: et par fuite que par suite. A cette sorte de discipline regardoit le vieux Caton, quand il dict, que les sages ont plus à apprendre des fols, que les fols des sages.

A great lesson to anyone tempted to squander / his inheritance. By my publishing and accusing my imperfections, someone will learn to fear them. The qualities I most esteem in myself gain more honor from accusing me than from commending me. That is why I fall back on accusation and dwell on it more often. But when all is reckoned, one never speaks of oneself without loss. Self-condemnation is always believed, and then some; self-praise is disbelieved. There may be some people of my temperament who, like me, learn better by contrast than by likeness, by shunning than by following. This is the kind of discipline the elder Cato had in mind when he said that the wise have more to learn from fools than fools from the wise.

Et cet ancien ioueur de lyre, que Pausanias recite, auoir accoustumé contraindre ses disciples d'aller ouyr vn mauuais sonneur, qui logeoit vis à vis de luy: où ils apprinssent à hayr ses desaccords et fauces mesures. L'horreur de la cruauté me reiecte plus auant en la clemence, qu'aucun patron de clemence ne me sçauroit attirer. Vn bon escuyer ne redresse pas tant mon assiete, comme fait vn procureur, ou vn Venitien à cheual. Et vne

So too that ancient lyre player who, as Pausanias relates, used to make his pupils go and hear a bad player who lived opposite him, so that they would learn to hate his discords and false rhythms. The horror of cruelty throws me further into clemency than any model of clemency could draw me. A good riding master does not straighten my seat as 1 Montaigne's word conferer means to discuss or argue face to face. The verses are from Horace, Satires I.4.

FRENCH

mauuaise façon de langage, reforme mieux la mienne, que ne fait la bonne. Tous les iours la sotte contenance d'vn autre, m'aduertit et m'aduise. Ce qui poincte, touche et esueille mieux, que ce qui plaist.

Ce temps est propre à nous amender à reculons, par disconuenance plus que par conuenance; par difference, que par accord. Estant peu apprins par les bons exemples, ie me sers des mauuais: desquels la leçon est ordinaire. Ie me suis efforcé de me rendre autant aggreable comme i'en voyoy de fascheux: aussi ferme, que i'en voyoy de mols: aussi doux, que i'en voyoy d'aspres: aussi bon, que i'en voyoy de meschants. Mais ie me proposoy des mesures inuincibles.

ENGLISH

much as an attorney or a Venetian on horseback does. And a bad way of speaking reforms mine better than a good one. Every day someone else's foolish bearing warns and advises me. What stings touches and rouses us better than what pleases.

Our age is fit to mend us backward: by disagreement more than by agreement, by difference rather than by accord. Being little taught by good examples, I make use of bad ones, whose lesson is everywhere. I have striven to make myself as agreeable as I saw others disagreeable, as firm as I saw others weak, as gentle as I saw others harsh, as good as I saw others wicked. But I set myself unbeatable standards.

CONVERSATION, THE BEST EXERCISE

Montaigne prizes vigorous argument with strong minds above the study of books.

FRENCH

3.8.2 Le plus fructueux et naturel exercice de nostre esprit, c'est à mon gré la conference. I'en trouue l'vsage plus doux, que d'aucune autre action de nostre vie. Et c'est la raison pourquoy, si i'estois à cette heure forcé de choisir, ie consentirois plustost, ce crois-ie, de perdre la veuë, que l'ouyr ou le parler. Les Atheniens, et encore les Romains, conseruoient en grand honneur cet exercice en leurs Academies. De nostre temps, les Italiens en retiennent quelques vestiges, à leur grand profit: comme il se voit par la comparaison de nos entendemens aux leurs. L'estude des liures, c'est vn mouuement languissant et foible qui n'eschauffe point: là où la conference, apprend et exerce en vn coup.

Si ie confere auec vne ame forte, et vn roide iousteur, il me presse les flancs, me picque à gauche et à dextre: ses imaginations eslancent les miennes. La ialousie, la gloire, la contention, me poussent et rehaussent au dessus de moy-mesmes. Et l'vnisson, est qualité du tout ennuyeuse en la conference. Mais comme nostre esprit se fortifie par la communication des esprits vigoureux et reglez, il ne se peut dire, combien il perd, et s'abastardit, par le continuel commerce, et frequentation, que nous auons auec les esprits bas et maladifs. Il n'est contagion qui s'espande comme celle-là. Ie sçay par assez d'experience, combien en vaut l'aune. I'ayme à contester, et à discourir, mais c'est auec peu d'hommes, et pour moy.

ENGLISH

The most fruitful and natural exercise of our mind is, in my opinion, conversation. I find its practice sweeter than that of any other action of our life. That is why, if I were now forced to choose, I would sooner consent, I think, to lose my sight than my hearing or my speech. The Athenians, and the Romans too, held this exercise in great honor in their Academies. In our time the Italians retain some vestiges of it, to their great profit, as can be seen by comparing our minds with theirs. The study of books is a languid, feeble activity that gives off no heat; whereas conversation teaches and exercises us at one stroke.

If I converse with a strong mind and a tough jouster, he presses on my flanks and pricks me left and right; his ideas launch mine. Rivalry, glory and contention drive me on and lift me above myself. And unison is an altogether tiresome quality in conversation. But just as our mind is strengthened by contact with vigorous and well-ordered minds, it is impossible to say how much it loses and degenerates through continual dealings and association with low and sickly minds. No contagion spreads like that one. I know from enough experience exactly what it costs. I love to argue and discuss, but with few men, and for my own sake.

For to serve as a spectacle for the great, and to show off one's wit and one's chatter in competition

FRENCH

Car de seruir de spectacle aux grands, et faire à l'enuy parade de son esprit, et de son caquet, ie trouue que c'est vn mestier tres-messeant à vn homme d'honneur.

3.8.3 La sottise est vne mauuaise qualité, mais de ne la pouuoir supporter, et s'en despiter et ronger, comme il m'aduient, c'est vne autre sorte de maladie, qui ne doit guere à la sottise, en importunité. Et est ce qu'à present ie veux accuser du mien. I'entre en conference et en dispute, auec grande liberté et facilité: d'autant que l'opinion trouue en moy le terrein mal propre à y penetrer, et y pousser de hautes racines. Nulles propositions m'estonnent, nulle creance me blesse, quelque contrarieté qu'elle aye à la mienne. Il n'est si friuole et si extrauagante fantasie, qui ne me semble bien sortable à la production de l'esprit humain.

Nous autres, qui priuons nostre iugement du droict de faire des arrests, regardons mollement les opinions diuerses: et si nous n'y prestons le iugement, nous y prestons aysement l'oreille. Où l'vn plat est vuide du tout en la balance, ie laisse vaciller l'autre, sous les songes d'vne vieille. Et me semble estre excusable, si i'accepte plustost le nombre impair: le ieudy au prix du vendredy: si ie m'aime mieux douziesme ou quatorziesme, que treiziesme à table: si ie vois plus volontiers vn liéure costoyant, que trauersant mon chemin, quand ie voyage: et donne plustost le pied gauche, que le droict, à chausser. Toutes telles reuasseries, qui sont en credit autour de nous, meritent aumoins qu'on les escoute.

Pour moy, elles emportent seulement l'inanité, mais elles l'emportent. Encores sont en poids, les opinions vulgaires et casuelles, autre chose, que rien, en nature. Et qui ne s'y laisse aller iusques là, tombe à l'auanture au vice de l'opiniastreté, pour euiter celuy de la superstition.

3.8.4 Les contradictions donc des iugemens, ne m'offencent, ny m'alterent: elles m'esueillent seulement et m'exercent. Nous fuyons la correction, il s'y faudroit presenter et produire notamment quand elle vient par forme de conference, non de regence. A chasque opposition, on ne regarde pas si elle est iuste, mais, à tort, ou à droit, comme on s'en deffera. Au lieu d'y tendre les bras, nous y tendons les griffes. Ie souffrirois estre rudement heurté par mes amis: Tu és vn sot, tu resues. I'ayme entre les galans hommes, qu'on s'exprime courageusement: que les mots aillent où va la pensee. Il nous faut fortifier l'ouye, et la durcir, contre cette tendreur du son ceremonieux des parolles.

ENGLISH

with others, I find a most unbecoming trade for a man of honor.

Stupidity is a bad quality. But to be unable to bear it, to be vexed and eaten up by it, as happens to me, is another sort of disease, hardly less of a nuisance than stupidity. And that is what I now want to accuse in myself. I enter into conversation and dispute with great freedom and ease, inasmuch as opinion finds me poor soil to penetrate and put down deep roots in. No propositions stun me, no belief wounds me, however contrary it may be to mine. There is no notion so frivolous and so extravagant that it does not seem to me quite a fitting product of the human mind.

We who deny our judgment the right to hand down rulings look mildly on differing opinions; if we do not lend them our judgment, we readily lend them our ear. Where one pan of the scales is completely empty, I let the other waver under an old woman's dreams. And I think I may be excused if I prefer an odd number; Thursday over Friday; if I would rather be twelfth or fourteenth at table than thirteenth; if, when I travel, I would rather see a hare running alongside my path than crossing it; and if I offer my left foot to be shod before my right. All such fancies, which are in credit around us, deserve at least a hearing.

For me, they outweigh only emptiness; but they do outweigh it. Even so, common and chance opinions have some weight; in nature they are something other than nothing. And whoever will not let himself go that far may well fall into the vice of obstinacy while avoiding that of superstition.

Contradictory judgments, then, neither offend me nor upset me; they only rouse and exercise me. We flee correction; we ought to come forward and offer ourselves to it, especially when it comes in the form of conversation, not of schoolmastering. At each objection we do not consider whether it is just, but how, rightly or wrongly, we can get rid of it. Instead of opening our arms to it, we put out our claws. I would put up with being roughly jostled by my friends: "You are a fool, you are dreaming." Among gentlemen I like people to speak out boldly, and words to go where the thought goes. We must toughen our hearing and harden it against this tenderness for the ceremonious sound of words.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

I'ayme vne societé, et familiarité forte, et virile: vne amitié, qui se flatte en l'aspreté et vigueur de son commerce: comme l'amour, és morsures et esgratigneures sanglantes. Elle n'est pas assez vigoureuse et genereuse, si elle n'est querelleuse: si elle est ciuilisee et artiste: si elle craint le heurt, et a ses allures contreintes. Neque enim disputari sine reprehensione potest. Quand on me contrarie, on esueille mon attention, non pas ma cholere: ie m'auance vers celuy qui me contredit, qui m'instruit. La cause de la verité, deuroit estre la cause commune à l'vn et à l'autre. Que respondra-il? la passion du courroux luy a desia frappé le iugement: le trouble s'en est saisi, auant la raison.

I like a strong, manly fellowship and familiarity, a friendship that delights in the sharpness and vigor of its dealings, as love does in bites and bloody scratches. It is not vigorous and generous enough if it is not quarrelsome, if it is civilized and artful, if it fears clashes and moves with a constrained gait. For there can be no discussion without contradiction. When I am contradicted, it rouses my attention, not my anger. I go toward the man who contradicts me: he is instructing me. The cause of truth ought to be the common cause of both sides. What will he answer? The passion of anger has already struck down his judgment; turmoil has seized it before reason could.[2]

Il seroit vtile, qu'on passast par gageure, la decision de nos disputes: qu'il y eust vne marque materielle de nos pertes: affin que nous en tinssions estat, et que mon valet me peust dire: Il vous cousta l'annee passee cent escus, à vingt fois, d'auoir esté ignorant et opiniastre. Ie festoye et caresse la verité en quelque main que ie la trouue, et m'y rends alaigrement, et luy tends mes armes vaincues, de loing que ie la vois approcher. Et pourueu qu'on n'y procede d'vne troigne trop imperieusement magistrale, ie prens plaisir à estre reprins. Et m'accommode aux accusateurs, souuent plus, par raison de ciuilité, que par raison d'amendement: aymant à gratifier et à nourrir la liberté de m'aduertir, par la facilité de ceder.

It would be useful to settle our disputes by wager, so that there would be a material mark of our losses, and we would keep account of them, and my valet could tell me: "Last year, on twenty occasions, being ignorant and stubborn cost you a hundred crowns." I welcome and embrace truth in whatever hands I find it. I surrender to it cheerfully and hold out my vanquished arms to it as soon as I see it approaching in the distance. And provided it is not done with too imperiously schoolmasterly a face, I enjoy being reproved. I often accommodate myself to my accusers more for the sake of civility than for the sake of amendment, because I like to gratify and foster people's freedom to admonish me by yielding readily.

3.8.5 Toutesfois il est malaisé d'y attirer les hommes de mon temps. Ils n'ont pas le courage de corriger, par ce qu'ils n'ont pas le courage de souffrir à l'estre. Et parlent tousiours auec dissimulation, en presence les vns des autres. Ie prens si grand plaisir d'estre iugé et cogneu, qu'il m'est comme indifferent, en quelle des deux formes ie le soys. Mon imagination se contredit elle mesme si souuent, et condamne, que ce m'est tout vn, qu'vn autre le face: veu principalement que ie ne donne à sa reprehension, que l'authorité que ie veux.

Yet it is hard to draw the men of my time into this. They lack the courage to correct, because they lack the courage to endure being corrected. And they always speak with dissimulation in one another's presence. I take such great pleasure in being judged and known that it is almost indifferent to me in which of the two ways it is done. My own imagination so often contradicts and condemns itself that it is all one to me if someone else does so, especially since I give his reproof only the authority I choose.

Mais ie romps paille auec celuy, qui se tient si haut à la main: comme i'en cognoy quelqu'vn, qui plaint son aduertissement, s'il n'en est creu: et prend à iniure, si on estriue à le suiure. Ce que Socrates recueilloit tousiours

But I break off with a man who carries himself so high-handedly, like one I know who regrets having given his advice if it is not believed, and takes it as an insult if anyone balks at following it. As for So-

2 Cicero, On Ends I.8.

FRENCH

riant, les contradictions, qu'on opposoit à son discours, on pourroit dire, que sa force en estoit cause: et que l'auantage ayant à tomber certainement de son costé, il les acceptoit, comme matiere de nouuelle victoire. Toutesfois nous voyons au rebours, qu'il n'est rien, qui nous y rende le sentiment si delicat, que l'opinion de la préeminence, et desdaing de l'aduersaire. Et que par raison, c'est au foible plustost, d'accepter de bon gré les oppositions qui le redressent et rabillent.

Ie cherche à la verité plus la frequentation de ceux qui me gourment, que de ceux qui me craignent. C'est vn plaisir fade et nuisible, d'auoir affaire à gens qui nous admirent et facent place. Antisthenes commanda à ses enfans, de ne sçauoir iamais gré ny grace, à homme qui les louast. Ie me sens bien plus fier, de la victoire que ie gaigne sur moy, quand en l'ardeur mesme du combat, ie me faits plier soubs la force de la raison de mon aduersaire: que ie ne me sens gré, de la victoire que ie gaigne sur luy, par sa foiblesse.

En fin, ie reçois et aduoue toute sorte d'atteinctes qui sont de droict fil, pour foibles qu'elles soient: mais ie suis par trop impatient, de celles qui se donnent sans forme.

ENGLISH

crates, who always welcomed with a smile the objections raised against his arguments, one could say that his strength was the cause of it: since the advantage was sure to fall to his side, he accepted them as material for a fresh victory. Yet we see, on the contrary, that nothing makes us so touchy here as a belief in our own superiority and contempt for our opponent. And by rights it is rather for the weak to accept with good grace the objections that set him straight and mend him.

In truth I seek out the company of those who handle me roughly more than of those who fear me. It is an insipid and harmful pleasure to deal with people who admire us and make way for us. Antisthenes commanded his children never to be grateful or obliged to any man who praised them. I feel much prouder of the victory I win over myself when, in the very heat of combat, I make myself bow beneath the force of my opponent's reasoning, than I feel pleased with a victory I win over him through his weakness.

In short, I accept and acknowledge every kind of thrust that comes straight, however weak; but I am far too impatient of those delivered without form.

ORDER IN DEBATE

He cares less who wins than that a dispute keeps order; muddled wrangling makes him rude.

FRENCH

3.8.6 Il me chaut peu de la matiere, et me sont les opinions vnes, et la victoire du subiect à peu pres indifferente. Tout vn iour ie contesteray paisiblement, si la conduicte du debat se suit auec ordre. Ce n'est pas tant la force et la subtilité, que ie demande, comme l'ordre. L'ordre qui se voit tous les iours, aux altercations des bergers et des enfants de boutique: iamais entre nous. S'ils se detraquent, c'est en inciuilité: si faisons nous bien. Mais leur tumulte et impatience, ne les deuoye pas de leur theme. Leur propos suit son cours. S'ils preuiennent l'vn l'autre, s'ils ne s'attendent pas, aumoins ils s'entendent. On respond tousiours trop bien pour moy, si on respond à ce que ie dits.

Mais quand la dispute est trouble et des-reglee, ie quitte la chose, et m'attache à la forme, auec despit et indiscretion: et me iette à vne façon de debattre, testue, malicieuse, et imperieuse, dequoy i'ay à rougir apres. Il

ENGLISH

I care little about the subject matter. Opinions are all one to me, and which side wins on the point at issue is nearly indifferent. I will argue peaceably for a whole day if the debate is conducted in an orderly way. It is not so much force and subtlety that I ask for as order: the order seen every day in the squabbles of shepherds and shop boys, never among us. If they go off the rails, it is into rudeness; and so do we, indeed. But their tumult and impatience do not turn them away from their theme; their talk follows its course. If they jump in ahead of one another, if they do not wait for one another, at least they understand one another. Anyone answers me only too well if he answers what I say.

But when the dispute is muddled and disorderly, I abandon the matter and fasten on the form, with vexation and lack of restraint. I fall into a stub-est impossible de traitter de bonne foy auec vn sot. Mon iugement ne se corrompt pas seulement à la main d'vn maistre si impetueux: mais aussi ma conscience.

FRENCH

3.8.7 Noz disputes deuroient estre defendues et punies, comme d'autres crimes verbaux. Quel vice n'esueillent elles et n'amoncellent, tousiours regies et commandees par la cholere? Nous entrons en inimitié, premierement contre les raisons, et puis contre les hommes. Nous n'apprenons à disputer que pour contredire: et chascun contredisant et estant contredict, il en aduient que le fruit du disputer, c'est perdre et aneantir la verité. Ainsi Platon en sa republique, prohibe cet exercice aux esprits ineptes et mal nays. A quoy faire vous mettez vous en voye de quester ce qui est, auec celuy qui n'a ny pas, ny alleure qui vaille? On ne fait point tort au subiect, quand on le quicte, pour voir du moyen de le traicter.

Ie ne dis pas moyen scholastique et artiste, ie dis moyen naturel, d'vn sain entendement. Que sera-ce en fin? l'vn va en Orient, l'autre en Occident. Ils perdent le principal, et l'escartent dans la presse des incidens. Au bout d'vne heure de tempeste, ils ne sçauent ce qu'ils cherchent: l'vn est bas, l'autre haut, l'autre costier. Qui se prend à vn mot et vne similitude. Qui ne sent plus ce qu'on luy oppose, tant il est engagé en sa course, et pense à se suiure, non pas à vous.

Qui se trouuant foible de reins, craint tout, refuse tout, mesle dez l'entree, et confond le propos: ou sur l'effort du debat, se mutine à se taire tout plat: par vne ignorance despite, affectant vn orgueilleux mesprix: ou vne sottement modeste fuitte de contention. Pourueu que cettuy-cy frappe, il ne luy chaut combien il se descouure. L'autre compte ses mots, et les poise pour raisons. Celuy-là n'y employe que l'auantage de sa voix, et de ses poulmons. En voyla vn qui conclud contre soy-mesme: et cettuy-cy qui vous assourdit de prefaces et digressions inutiles. Cet autre s'arme de pures iniures, et cherche vne querelle d'Alemaigne, pour se deffaire de la societé et conference d'vn esprit, qui presse le sien.

ENGLISH

born, spiteful and imperious way of arguing that I have to blush for afterward. It is impossible to deal in good faith with a fool. At the hands of so impetuous a master, it is not only my judgment that is corrupted, but my conscience too.

Our disputes ought to be forbidden and punished like other verbal crimes. What vice do they not rouse and heap up, ruled and commanded as they always are by anger? We become hostile first to the reasons and then to the men. We learn to dispute only in order to contradict; and with everyone contradicting and being contradicted, the result is that the fruit of disputing is to lose and annihilate the truth. Thus Plato, in his Republic, forbids this exercise to inept and ill-endowed minds. Why set out in quest of what is with someone whose pace and gait are worth nothing? We do the subject no wrong when we leave it to see about the right means of treating it.

I do not mean a scholastic, artful means; I mean the natural means of a sound understanding. What will it come to in the end? One goes east, the other west. They lose the main point and scatter it in the throng of side issues. After an hour of storm they do not know what they are looking for: one is low, another high, another off to the side. One fastens on a word and a comparison. Another no longer even feels the objections made to him, so caught up is he in his own course; he is thinking of following himself, not you.

Another, finding himself weak in the loins, fears everything, refuses everything, muddles and confuses the issue from the start. Or else, at the height of the debate, he mutinies and falls flatly silent, out of spiteful ignorance, affecting a proud contempt, or out of a foolishly modest avoidance of contention. This one, provided he strikes, does not care how much he exposes himself. That one counts his words and weighs them as if they were reasons. Another relies only on the power of his voice and his lungs. Here is one who reaches a conclusion against himself, and here another who deafens you with useless prefaces and digressions. Yet another arms himself with sheer insults and picks a quarrel over nothing, to escape the company and conversation of a mind that presses his own too hard.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Ce dernier ne voit rien en la raison, mais il vous tient assiegé sur la closture dialectique de ses clauses, et sur les formules de son art.	This last one sees nothing in reason, but he keeps you besieged within the dialectical enclosure of his clauses and the formulas of his art.

LEARNING WITHOUT JUDGMENT

Logic and learning make no one wiser; in a weak soul knowledge is a fool's bauble.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.8.8 Or qui n'entre en deffiance des sciences, et n'est en doubte, s'il s'en peut tirer quelque solide fruict, au besoin de la vie: à considerer l'vsage que nous en auons? Nihil sanantibus litteris. Qui a pris de l'entendement en la logique? où sont ses belles promesses? Nec ad melius viuendum, nec ad commodius disserendum. Voit-on plus de barbouillage au caquet des harengeres, qu'aux disputes publiques des hommes de cette profession? I'aymeroy mieux, que mon fils apprint aux tauernes à parler, qu'aux escholes de la parlerie.	Now who does not grow distrustful of learning, and doubt whether any solid fruit can be drawn from it for the needs of life, considering the use we make of it? Letters that cure nothing. Who has gained understanding from logic? Where are its fine promises? Neither for living better nor for reasoning more aptly. Is there more muddle in the chatter of fishwives than in the public disputations of the men of this profession? I would rather my son learned to talk in taverns than in the schools of talkery.[3]
Ayez vn maistre és arts, conferez auec luy, que ne nous fait-il sentir cette excellence artificiele, et ne rauit les femmes, et les ignorans comme nous sommes, par l'admiration de la fermeté de ses raisons, de la beauté de son ordre? que ne nous domine-il et persuade comme il veut? Vn homme si auantageux en matiere, et en conduicte, pourquoy mesle-il à son escrime les iniures, l'indiscretion et la rage? Qu'il oste son chapperon, sa robbe, et son Latin, qu'il ne batte pas nos aureilles d'Aristote tout pur et tout creu, vous le prendrez pour l'vn d'entre nous, ou pis.	Take a master of arts and converse with him. Why does he not make us feel that artful excellence of his, and ravish women and ignorant people like us with admiration for the firmness of his reasons and the beauty of his order? Why does he not dominate us and persuade us as he wishes? A man with such an advantage in matter and method, why does he mix insults, indiscretion and rage into his fencing? Let him take off his hood, his gown and his Latin; let him stop battering our ears with Aristotle pure and raw: you will take him for one of us, or worse.
Il me semble de cette implication et entrelasseure du langage, par où ils nous pressent, qu'il en va comme des ioueurs de passe-passe: leur souplesse combat et force nos sens, mais elle n'esbranle aucunement nostre creance: hors ce bastelage, ils ne font rien qui ne soit commun et vil. Pour estre plus sçauans, ils n'en sont pas moins ineptes. I'ayme et honore le sçauoir, autant que ceux qui l'ont. Et en son vray vsage, c'est le plus noble et puissant acquest des hommes.	This intricacy and interlacing of language with which they press us seems to me like the work of conjurers: their sleight of hand fights and overpowers our senses, but it does not shake our belief in the least. Apart from this juggling, they do nothing that is not common and mean. Being more learned does not make them any less inept. I love and honor knowledge as much as those who have it. And in its true use it is the noblest and most powerful acquisition of mankind.
Mais en ceux-là, et il en est vn nombre infiny de ce genre, qui en establissent leur fondamentale suffisance et valeur: qui se rapportent de leur entendement à leur memoire, sub aliena vmbra latentes: et ne peuuent rien que par liure: ie le hay, si ie l'ose dire, vn peu plus que la	But there are those, and there are countless people of this kind, who base their fundamental ability and worth on it; who refer from their understanding to their memory, hiding in another's shadow, and can do nothing except out of a book. In them I

3 The first quotation is from Seneca, Letters 59; the second from Cicero, On Ends I.19.

FRENCH

bestise. En mon pays, et de mon temps, la doctrine amande assez les bourses, nullement les ames. Si elle les rencontre mousses, elle les aggraue et suffoque: masse crue et indigeste: si desliees, elle les purifie volontiers, clarifie et subtilise iusques à l'exinanition. C'est chose de qualité à peu pres indifferente: tres-vtile accessoire, à vne ame bien nee, pernicieux à vne autre ame et dommageable.

Ou plustost, chose de tres-precieux vsage, qui ne se laisse pas posseder à vil prix: en quelque main c'est vn sceptre, en quelque autre, vne marotte.

3.8.9 Mais suyuons. Quelle plus grande victoire attendez vous, que d'apprendre à vostre ennemy qu'il ne vous peut combattre? Quand vous gaignez l'auantage de vostre proposition, c'est la verité qui gaigne: quand vous gaignez l'auantage de l'ordre, et de la conduitte, c'est vous qui gaignez. Il m'est aduis qu'en Platon et Xenophon Socrates dispute plus, en faueur des disputants qu'en faueur de la dispute: et pour instruire Euthydemus et Protagoras de la cognoissance de leur impertinence, plus que de l'impertinence de leur art. Il empoigne la premiere matiere, comme celuy qui a vne fin plus vtile que de l'esclaircir, assauoir esclaircir les esprits, qu'il prend à manier et exercer.

L'agitation et la chasse est proprement de nostre gibier, nous ne sommes pas excusables de la conduire mal et impertinemment: de faillir à la prise, c'est autre chose. Car nous sommes nais à quester la verité, il appartient de la posseder à vne plus grande puissance. Elle n'est pas, comme disoit Democritus, cachee dans le fonds des abysmes: mais plustost esleuee en hauteur infinie en la cognoissance diuine. Le monde n'est qu'vne escole d'inquisition. Ce n'est pas à qui mettra dedans, mais à qui fera les plus belles courses. Autant peut faire le sot, celuy qui dit vray, que celuy qui dit faux: car nous sommes sur la maniere, non sur la matiere du dire.

Mon humeur est de regarder autant à la forme, qu'à la substance: autant à l'aduocat qu'à la cause, comme Alcibiades ordonnoit qu'on fist. Et tous les iours m'amuse à lire en des autheurs, sans soing de leur science: y cherchant leur façon, non leur subiect. Tout ainsi que ie poursuy la communication de quelque esprit fameux, non affin qu'il m'enseigne, mais affin que ie le cognoisse, hate it, if I dare say so, a little more than stupidity. In my country and in my time, learning improves purses well enough, but souls not at all. If it meets dull souls, it weighs them down and smothers them, a raw and undigested mass; if keen ones, it readily purifies, clarifies and refines them to the point of emptiness. It is a thing of nearly indifferent quality: a very useful accessory to a well-born soul, pernicious and harmful to another.[4]

ENGLISH

Or rather, it is a thing of very precious use, which does not let itself be possessed at a low price. In one hand it is a scepter; in another, a fool's bauble.

But let us go on. What greater victory can you expect than to teach your enemy that he cannot fight you? When you gain the advantage for your proposition, it is truth that wins; when you gain the advantage through order and method, it is you who win. It seems to me that in Plato and Xenophon, Socrates argues more for the sake of the arguers than for the sake of the argument, and more to teach Euthydemus and Protagoras their own ineptitude than the ineptitude of their art. He seizes on the first subject that comes along, like a man with a more useful aim than clarifying it: namely, to clarify the minds he takes in hand to work on and exercise.

Stirring up and chasing the game are properly our business. We are not excusable if we conduct the chase badly and ineptly; missing the catch is another matter. For we are born to seek the truth; to possess it belongs to a greater power. It is not, as Democritus said, hidden in the depths of the abyss, but rather raised to an infinite height in divine knowledge. The world is nothing but a school of inquiry. The question is not who will spear the ring, but who will run the finest courses. The man who speaks the truth can play the fool as well as the man who speaks falsely, for we are concerned with the manner of speaking, not the matter.

My temperament is to look at the form as much as at the substance, at the advocate as much as at the cause, as Alcibiades directed people to do. And every day I amuse myself reading authors without caring about their learning, looking for their manner, not their subject. In the same way I seek the company of some famous mind, not so that he et que le cognoissant, s'il le vaut, ie l'imite. Tout homme peut dire veritablement, mais dire ordonnement, prudemment, et suffisamment, peu d'hommes le peuuent. Par ainsi la fauceté qui vient d'ignorance, ne m'offence point: c'est l'ineptie. I'ay rompu plusieurs marchez qui m'estoient vtiles, par l'impertinence de la contestation de ceux, auec qui ie marchandois.

4 Seneca, Letters 33.

FRENCH

Ie ne m'esmeus pas vne fois l'an, des fautes de ceux sur lesquels i'ay puissance: mais sur le poinct de la bestise et opiniastreté de leurs allegations, excuses et defences, asnieres et brutales, nous sommes tous les iours à nous en prendre à la gorge. Ils n'entendent ny ce qui se dit, ny pourquoy, et respondent de mesme: c'est pour desesperer. Ie ne sens heurter rudement ma teste, que par vne autre teste. Et entre plustost en composition auec le vice de mes gens, qu'auec leur temerité, importunité et leur sottise. Qu'ils facent moins, pourueu qu'ils soient capables de faire. Vous viuez en esperance d'eschauffer leur volonté. Mais d'vne souche, il n'y a ny qu'esperer, ny que iouyr qui vaille.

ENGLISH

may teach me, but so that I may know him, and, knowing him, imitate him if he is worth it. Any man can speak truly; but to speak with order, prudence and competence, few men can. So falsehood that comes from ignorance does not offend me; ineptitude does. I have broken off several bargains that would have been useful to me because of the senseless wrangling of those I was bargaining with.

I am not upset once a year by the faults of those over whom I have authority. But over the stupidity and obstinacy of their assertions, excuses and defenses, asinine and brutish as they are, we are at each other's throats every day. They understand neither what is said nor why, and they answer accordingly: it is enough to drive one to despair. My head is never roughly jarred except by another head. And I come to terms with my people's vices sooner than with their rashness, their importunity and their stupidity. Let them do less, provided they are capable of doing. You live in hope of firing their will. But from a block of wood there is nothing worth hoping for or enjoying.

AGAINST MY OWN IMPATIENCE

Irritation at others' folly is itself folly, and our reproaches usually turn back on ourselves.

FRENCH

3.8.10 Or quoy, si ie prends les choses autrement qu'elles ne sont? Il peut estre. Et pourtant i'accuse mon impatience. Et tiens, premierement, qu'elle est esgallement vitieuse en celuy qui a droit, comme en celuy qui a tort. Car c'est tousiours vn'aigreur tyrannique, de ne pouuoir souffrir vne forme diuerse à la sienne. Et puis, qu'il n'est à la verité point de plus grande fadese, et plus constante, que de s'esmouuoir et piquer des fadeses du monde, ny plus heteroclite. Car elle nous formalise principallement contre nous: et ce philosophe du temps passé n'eust iamais eu faute d'occasion à ses pleurs, tant qu'il se fust consideré.

Mison l'vn des sept sages, d'vne humeur Timoniene et Democritiene interrogé, dequoy il rioit seul: De ce que ie ris seul: respondit-il. Combien de sottises dis-ie, et respons-ie tous les iours, selon moy: et volontiers donq combien plus frequentes, selon autruy? Si ie m'en mors les leures, qu'en doiuent faire les autres? Somme, il faut viure entre les viuants, et laisser la riuiere courre sous le

ENGLISH

But what if I take things otherwise than they are? That may be. And so I blame my impatience. First, I hold that it is just as faulty in the one who is right as in the one who is wrong. For it is always a tyrannical sourness to be unable to endure a way different from one's own. Second, there is truly no greater folly, nor any more persistent, than to be stirred and stung by the follies of the world, nor any more bizarre. For it sets us chiefly against ourselves; and that philosopher of old would never have lacked occasion for his tears so long as he considered himself.[5]

Myson, one of the Seven Sages, whose temperament was like Timon's and Democritus's, was asked what he was laughing at all alone. "At the fact that I am laughing alone," he answered. How many foolish things do I say and answer every day, by my own reckoning; and so, very likely, how many more by other people's? If I bite my lips

5 The philosopher is Heraclitus, traditionally said to weep at human folly.

FRENCH

pont, sans nostre soing: ou à tout le moins, sans nostre alteration. De vray, pourquoy sans nous esmouuoir, rencontrons nous quelqu'vn qui ayt le corps tortu et mal basty, et ne pouuons souffrir le rencontre d'vn esprit mal rengé, sans nous mettre en cholere? Cette vitieuse aspreté tient plus au iuge, qu'à la faute.

Ayons tousiours en la bouche ce mot de Platon: Ce que ie treuue mal sain, n'est-ce pas pour estre moy-mesmes mal sain? Ne suis-ie pas moy-mesmes en coulpe? mon aduertissement se peut-il pas renuerser contre moy? Sage et diuin refrein, qui fouete la plus vniuerselle, et commune erreur des hommes. Non seulement les reproches, que nous faisons les vns aux autres, mais noz raisons aussi, et noz arguments et matieres controuerses, sont ordinairement retorquables à nous: et nous enferrons de noz armes. Dequoy l'ancienneté m'a laissé assez de graues exemples. Ce fut ingenieusement dit et bien à propos, par celuy qui l'inuenta: Stercus cuique suum bene olet. Noz yeux ne voyent rien en derriere.

Cent fois le iour, nous nous moquons de nous sur le subiect de nostre voysin, et detestons en d'autres, les defauts qui sont en nous plus clairement: et les admirons d'vne merueilleuse impudence et inaduertence. Encores hier ie fus à mesmes, de veoir vn homme d'entendement se moquant autant plaisamment que iustement, de l'inepte façon d'vn autre, qui rompt la teste à tout le monde du registre de ses genealogies et alliances, plus de moitié fauces (ceux-là se iettent plus volontiers sur tels sots propos, qui ont leurs qualitez plus doubteuses et moins seures) et luy s'il eust reculé sur soy, se fust trouué non guere moins intemperant et ennuyeux à semer et faire valoir la prerogatiue de la race de sa femme.

O importune presomption, de laquelle la femme se voit armee par les mains de son mary mesme? S'il entendoit du Latin, il luy faudroit dire, Age! si hæc non insanit satis sua sponte, instiga. Ie ne dis pas, que nul n'accuse, qui ne soit net: car nul n'accuseroit: voire ny net, en mesme sorte de tache. Mais i'entens, que nostre iugement chargeant sur vn autre, duquel pour lors il est question, ne nous espargne pas, d'vne interne et seuere over them, what must others do? In short, we must live among the living and let the river flow under the bridge without our concern, or at least without our getting upset. Indeed, why is it that we meet someone with a crooked, ill-made body without being disturbed, yet cannot bear to meet a disordered mind without flying into a rage? This faulty harshness has more to do with the judge than with the fault.[6]

ENGLISH

Let us always have on our lips this saying of Plato: "If I find something unsound, is it not because I myself am unsound? Am I not myself at fault? Can my rebuke not be turned back against me?" A wise and divine refrain, which lashes the most universal and common error of mankind. Not only the reproaches we make to one another, but also our reasons, our arguments and the matters we dispute can usually be turned back against us; and we run ourselves through with our own weapons. Antiquity has left me plenty of weighty examples of this. It was cleverly and aptly said by whoever invented it: Everyone's own dung smells sweet. Our eyes see nothing behind us.[7]

A hundred times a day we mock ourselves in mocking our neighbor, and detest in others the defects that are more plainly in ourselves, and marvel at them with astonishing impudence and heedlessness. Only yesterday I happened to see a man of understanding mocking, as amusingly as justly, the foolish manner of another who bores everyone to death with the register of his genealogies and family alliances, more than half of them false (those whose titles are the most dubious and least secure are the readiest to launch into such silly talk); and yet he, had he looked back at himself, would have found himself hardly less immoderate and tiresome in spreading abroad and vaunting the distinction of his wife's family.

What troublesome presumption, with which the wife finds herself armed by her husband's own hands! If he understood Latin, one would have to tell him: Go on! If she is not mad enough of her own accord, egg her on. I do not say that no one should accuse unless he is clean, for then no one would accuse; nor even unless he is clean of the same kind of stain. But I mean that our judgment, when 6 Democritus was known as the laughing philosopher.

7 A Latin proverb, collected by Erasmus in his Adages.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
iurisdiction. C'est office de charité, que, qui ne peut oster vn vice en soy, cherche ce neantmoins à l'oster en autruy: où il peut auoir moins maligne et reuesche semence.	it bears down on another who is then in question, should not spare us from an inner and severe jurisdiction. It is a duty of charity that one who cannot remove a vice in himself should nonetheless try to remove it in another, where it may have a less malignant and stubborn seed.[8]
Ny ne me semble responce à propos, à celuy, qui m'aduertit de ma faute, dire qu'elle est aussi en luy. Quoy pour cela? Tousiours l'aduertissement est vray et vtile. Si nous auions bon nez, nostre ordure nous deuroit plus puïr, d'autant qu'elle est nostre. Et Socrates est d'aduis, que qui se trouueroit coulpable, et son fils, et vn estranger, de quelque violence et iniure, deuroit commencer par soy, à se presenter à la condamnation de la iustice, et implorer, pour se purger, le secours de la main du bourreau: secondement pour son fils: et dernierement pour l'estranger. Si ce precepte prend le ton vn peu trop haut: au moins se doibt il presenter le premier, à la punition de sa propre conscience.	Nor does it seem to me a fitting reply, to someone who points out my fault, to say that he has it too. What of it? The warning is still true and useful. If we had a good nose, our own filth ought to stink more to us, since it is ours. And Socrates holds that anyone who found himself, his son and a stranger guilty of some violence and wrong should begin with himself, presenting himself for the sentence of justice and imploring the help of the executioner's hand to purge himself; next he should do so for his son; and last for the stranger. If this precept pitches its tone a little too high, at least he ought to present himself first for the punishment of his own conscience.[9]

THE CREDIT OF RANK

Gowns, fortune and silence lend weight to foolish men, and offices go by luck more than merit.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.8.11 Les sens sont nos propres et premiers iuges, qui n'apperçoiuent les choses que par les accidens externes: et n'est merueille, si en toutes les pieces du seruice de nostre societé, il y a vn si perpetuel, et vniuersel meslange de ceremonies et apparences superficielles: si que la meilleure et plus effectuelle part des polices, consiste en cela. C'est tousiours à l'homme que nous auons affaire, duquel la condition est merueilleusement corporelle. Que ceux qui nous ont voulu bastir ces annees passees, vn exercice de religion, si contemplatif et immateriel, ne s'estonnent point, s'il en trouue, qui pensent, qu'elle fust eschappée et fondue entre leurs doigts, si elle ne tenoit parmy nous, comme marque, tiltre, et instrument de diuision et de part, plus que par soy-mesmes.	The senses are our own and first judges, and they perceive things only through their external accidents. So it is no wonder if, in every part of the workings of our society, there is so perpetual and universal a mixture of ceremonies and superficial appearances, to the point that the best and most effective part of government consists in them. It is always with man that we have to deal, and his condition is wonderfully corporeal. Let those who in recent years have tried to build us a form of worship so contemplative and immaterial not be astonished if some people think it would have slipped away and melted between their fingers, had it not held its ground among us as a mark, a title and an instrument of division and faction, more than by itself.[10]
Comme en la conference. La grauité, la robbe, et la fortune de celuy qui parle, donne souuent credit à des propos vains et ineptes. Il n'est pas à presumer, qu'vn monsieur, si suiuy, si redouté, n'aye au dedans quelque	So it is in conversation. The gravity, the gown and the fortune of the speaker often lend credit to empty and foolish remarks. No one would suppose that a great gentleman, so attended, so feared, has

8 Terence, The Woman of Andros.
9 Plato, Gorgias.
10 An allusion to the Protestant Reformed churches of France.

FRENCH

suffisance autre que populaire: et qu'vn homme à qui on donne tant de commissions, et de charges, si desdaigneux et si morguant, ne soit plus habile, que cet autre, qui le salue de si loing, et que personne n'employe. Non seulement les mots, mais aussi les grimaces de ces gens là, se considerent et mettent en compte: chacun s'appliquant à y donner quelque belle et solide interpretation.

S'ils se rabaissent à la conference commune, et qu'on leur presente autre chose qu'approbation et reuerence, ils vous assomment de l'authorité de leur experience: ils ont ouy, ils ont veu, ils ont faict, vous estes accablé d'exemples. Ie leur dirois volontiers, que le fruict de l'experience d'vn chirurgien, n'est pas l'histoire de ses practiques, et se souuenir qu'il a guary quatre empestez et trois gouteux, s'il ne sçait de cet vsage, tirer dequoy former son iugement, et ne nous sçait faire sentir, qu'il en soit deuenu plus sage à l'vsage de son art. Comme en vn concert d'instruments, on n'oit pas vn leut, vne espinete, et la flutte: on oyt vne harmonie en globe: l'assemblage et le fruict de tout cet amas.

Si les voyages et les charges les ont amendez, c'est à la production de leur entendement de le faire paroistre. Ce n'est pas assez de compter les experiences, il les faut poiser et assortir: et les faut auoir digerees et alambiquees, pour en tirer les raisons et conclusions qu'elles portent. Il ne fut iamais tant d'historiens. Bon est-il tousiours et vtile de les ouyr, car ils nous fournissent tout plein de belles instructions et louables du magasin de leur memoire. Grande partie certes, au secours de la vie. Mais nous ne cherchons pas cela pour cette heure, nous cherchons si ces recitateurs et recueilleurs sont louables eux-mesmes.

3.8.12 Ie hay toute sorte de tyrannie, et la parliere, et l'effectuelle. Ie me bande volontiers contre ces vaines circonstances, qui pipent nostre iugement par les sens: et me tenant au guet de ces grandeurs extraordinaires, ay trouué que ce sont pour le plus, des hommes comme les autres: Rarus enim fermè sensus communis in illa / Fortuna. A l'auanture les estime lon, et apperçoit moindres qu'ils ne sont, d'autant qu'ils entreprennent plus, et se montrent plus, ils ne respondent point au faix qu'ils ont pris. Il faut qu'il y ayt plus de vigueur, et de pouuoir au porteur, qu'en la charge.

ENGLISH

no ability within him beyond the ordinary; or that a man given so many commissions and offices, so disdainful and so haughty, is not more capable than that other man who bows to him from so far off and whom nobody employs. Not only the words but even the grimaces of such people are weighed and taken into account, everyone setting himself to give them some fine and solid interpretation.

If they stoop to ordinary conversation and are offered anything other than approval and reverence, they club you with the authority of their experience: they have heard, they have seen, they have done; you are buried under examples. I would gladly tell them that the fruit of a surgeon's experience is not the history of his cases, nor remembering that he has cured four plague victims and three gout sufferers, if he cannot draw from that practice the means to form his judgment, and cannot make us feel that he has grown wiser in the practice of his skill. Just as in a concert of instruments we do not hear a lute, a spinet and the flute: we hear a harmony as a whole, the union and fruit of the whole ensemble.

If travels and offices have improved them, it is for the products of their understanding to show it. It is not enough to count up experiences; they must be weighed and sorted, and they must have been digested and distilled, to draw from them the reasons and conclusions they contain. There were never so many historians. It is always good and useful to listen to them, for they supply us with plenty of fine and commendable lessons from the storehouse of their memory—certainly a great asset for the help of life. But that is not what we are looking for at present; we are asking whether these narrators and collectors are themselves praiseworthy.

I hate every kind of tyranny, both of words and of deeds. I readily brace myself against those empty trappings that cheat our judgment through the senses; and keeping watch on these extraordinary eminences, I have found that for the most part they are men like any others: For common sense is generally rare in that high / Station. Perhaps we judge them and see them as less than they are because they undertake more and show themselves more: they do not measure up to the burden they have taken on. There must be more vigor and strength in the bearer than in the load.[11]

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Celuy qui n'a pas remply sa force, il vous laisse deuiner, s'il a encore de la force au delà, et s'il a esté essayé iusques à son dernier poinct. Celuy qui succombe à sa charge, il descouure sa mesure, et la foiblesse de ses espaules. C'est pourquoy on voit tant d'ineptes ames entre les sçauantes, et plus que d'autres. Il s'en fust faict des bons hommes de mesnage, bons marchans, bons artizans: leur vigueur naturelle estoit taillee à cette proportion. C'est chose de grand poix que la science, ils fondent dessoubs. Pour estaller et distribuer cette riche et puissante matiere, pour l'employer et s'en ayder: leur engin n'a, ny assez de vigueur, ny assez de maniement.

The man who has not used his full strength leaves you guessing whether he has more strength still beyond it, and whether he has been tested to his utmost. The man who sinks under his load reveals his measure and the weakness of his shoulders. That is why one sees so many inept souls among the learned, more than among others. They would have made good householders, good merchants, good craftsmen: their natural vigor was cut to that size. Learning is a thing of great weight; they collapse under it. To display and dispense this rich and powerful material, to use it and profit from it, their wits have neither enough vigor nor enough dexterity.

Elle ne peut qu'en vne forte nature: or elles sont bien rares. Et les foibles, dit Socrates, corrompent la dignité de la philosophie en la maniant. Elle paroist et inutile et vicieuse, quand elle est mal estuyee. Voyla comment ils se gastent et affollent. Humani qualis simulator simius oris,
Quem puer arridens, pretioso stamine serum
Velauit, nudásques nates ac terga reliquit,
Ludibrium mensis. A ceux pareillement, qui nous regissent et commandent, qui tiennent le monde en leur main, ce n'est pas assez d'auoir vn entendement commun: de pouuoir ce que nous pouuons. Ils sont bien loing au dessoubs de nous, s'ils ne sont bien loing au dessus. Comme ils promettent plus, ils doiuent aussi plus.

Learning has power only in a strong nature, and such natures are very rare. And the weak, says Socrates, corrupt the dignity of philosophy by handling it. It looks both useless and harmful when it is badly housed. That is how they spoil themselves and make themselves ridiculous. Like an ape, that mimic of the human face,
Whom a laughing boy has dressed in costly silk,
Leaving its buttocks and its back bare,
A joke for the dinner table. Likewise, for those who rule and command us, who hold the world in their hand, it is not enough to have an ordinary understanding, to be able to do what we can do. They are far below us if they are not far above. As they promise more, so they owe more.[12]

3.8.13 Et pourtant leur est le silence, non seulement contenance de respect et grauité, mais encore souuent de profit et de mesnage. Car Megabysus estant allé voir Apelles en son ouurouer, fut long temps sans mot dire: et puis commença à discourir de ses ouurages. Dont il reçeut cette reprimende: Tandis que tu as gardé silence, tu semblois quelque grande chose, à cause de tes cheines et de ta pompe: mais maintenant, qu'on t'a ouy parler, il n'est pas iusques aux garsons de ma boutique qui ne te mesprisent. Ces magnifiques atours, ce grand estat, ne luy permettoient point d'estre ignorant d'vne ignorance populaire: et de parler impertinemment de la peinture. Il deuoit maintenir muet, cette externe et presomptiue suffisance.

And so silence is for them not only a bearing that commands respect and gravity, but often also a source of profit and economy. For Megabyzus, having gone to see Apelles in his studio, stood a long time without saying a word, and then began to hold forth about his works. For this he received the following rebuke: "As long as you kept silent you seemed something great, because of your chains and your pomp; but now that you have been heard speaking, there is not even a boy in my workshop who does not despise you." Those magnificent ornaments, that great state, did not allow him to be ignorant with a common ignorance and to talk nonsense about painting. He should have

11 Juvenal, Satires.
12 Claudian, Against Eutropius.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

preserved that outward and presumed competence by keeping mute.[13]

A combien de sottes ames en mon temps, a seruy vne mine froide et taciturne, de tiltre de prudence et de capacité?

For how many foolish souls in my time has a cold and taciturn air served as a title to wisdom and ability?

3.8.14 Les dignitez, les charges, se donnent necessairement, plus par fortune que par merite: et a lon tort souuent de s'en prendre aux Roys. Au rebours c'est merueille qu'ils y ayent tant d'heur, y ayans si peu d'adresse: Principis est virtus maxima, nosse suos. Car la nature ne leur a pas donné la veuë, qui se puisse estendre à tant de peuple, pour en discerner la precellence: et perser nos poitrines, où loge la cognoissance de nostre volonté et de nostre meilleure valeur. Il faut qu'ils nous trient par coniecture, et à tastons: par la race, les richesses, la doctrine, la voix du peuple: tres-foibles argumens.

Honors and offices are necessarily handed out more by fortune than by merit, and people are often wrong to blame kings for it. On the contrary, it is a wonder that they have such luck at it, having so little skill: The greatest virtue of a prince is to know his own people. For nature has not given them sight that can extend over so many people to discern who excels, and to pierce our breasts, where the knowledge of our will and of our best worth is lodged. They have to sort us by guesswork and groping: by family, wealth, learning, popular report—very weak evidence.[14]

Qui pourroit trouuer moyen, qu'on en peust iuger par iustice, et choisir les hommes par raison, establiroit de ce seul trait, vne parfaite forme de police.

Whoever could find a way for us to be judged justly and for men to be chosen by reason would, by that single stroke, establish a perfect form of government.

FORTUNE AND OUTCOMES

Success is a poor witness of ability, since chance governs most human affairs.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.8.15 Ouy mais, il a mené à poinct ce grand affaire. C'est dire quelque chose; mais ce n'est pas assez dire. Car cette sentence est iustement receuë, Qu'il ne faut pas iuger les conseils par les euenemens. Les Carthaginois punissoient les mauuais aduis de leurs capitaines, encore qu'ils fussent corrigez par vne heureuse yssue. Et le peuple Romain a souuent refusé le triomphe à des grandes et tres-vtiles victoires, par ce que la conduitte du chef ne respondoit point à son bon heur. On s'apperçoit ordinairement aux actions du monde, que la fortune, pour nous apprendre, combien elle peut en toutes choses: et qui prent plaisir à rabatre nostre presomption: n'ayant peu faire les mal-habiles sages, elle les fait heureux, à l'enuy de la vertu.

"Yes, but he brought that great business to a successful end." That is saying something, but it is not saying enough. For this maxim is rightly accepted: that plans should not be judged by their outcomes. The Carthaginians punished the bad counsels of their generals even when they had been set right by a happy outcome. And the Roman people often refused a triumph for great and very useful victories because the commander's conduct did not match his good luck. We commonly observe in the world's affairs that Fortune—to teach us how much power she has in all things, and taking pleasure in humbling our presumption—having been unable to make the inept wise, makes them lucky, in rivalry with virtue.

Et se mesle volontiers à fauoriser les executions, où la trame est plus purement sienne. D'où il se voit tous les iours, que les plus simples d'entre nous, mettent à fin de tres-grandes besongnes et publiques et priuees. Et

And she readily takes a hand in favoring those enterprises whose web is most purely her own. Hence we see every day that the simplest among us carry through very great tasks, both public and 13 Megabyzus was a Persian noble; Apelles was the most celebrated Greek painter of the fourth century BC.

14 Martial, Epigrams.

FRENCH

comme Sirannez le Persien, respondit à ceux qui s'estonnoient comme ses affaires succedoient si mal, veu que ses propos estoient si sages: Qu'il estoit seul maistre de ses propos, mais du succez de ses affaires, c'estoit la fortune. Ceux-cy peuuent respondre de mesme: mais d'vn contraire biais. La plus part des choses du monde se font par elles mesmes. Fata viam inueniunt. L'issuë authorise souuent vne tresinepte conduite. Nostre entremise n'est quasi qu'vne routine: et plus communement consideration d'vsage, et d'exemple, que de raison.

Estonné de la grandeur de l'affaire, i'ay autrefois sçeu par ceuz qui l'auoient mené à fin, leurs motifs et leur addresse: ie n'y ay trouué que des aduis vulgaires: et les plus vulgaires et vsitez, sont aussi peut-estre, les plus seurs et plus commodes à la pratique, sinon à la montre. Quoy si les plus plattes raisons, sont les mieux assises: les plus basses et lasches, et les plus battues, se couchent mieux aux affaires? Pour conseruer l'authorité du conseil des Roys, il n'est pas besoing que les personnes profanes y participent, et y voyent plus auant que de la premiere barriere. Il se doibt reuerer à credit et en bloc, qui en veut nourrir la reputation.

Ma consultation esbauche vn peu la matiere, et la considere legerement par ses premiers visages: le fort et principal de la besongne, i'ay accoustumé de le resigner au ciel, Permitte diuis cætera.

3.8.16 L'heur et le mal'heur, sont à mon gré deux souueraines puissances. C'est imprudence, d'estimer que l'humaine prudence puisse remplir le rolle de la fortune. Et vaine est l'entreprise de celuy, qui presume d'embrasser et causes et consequences, et mener par la main, le progrez de son faict. Vaine sur tout aux deliberations guerrieres. Il ne fut iamais plus de circonspection et prudence militaire, qu'il s'en voit par fois entre nous. Seroit ce qu'on crainct de se perdre en chemin, se reseruant à la catastrophe de ce ieu? Ie dis plus, que nostre sagesse mesme et consultation, suit pour la plus part la conduicte du hazard.

Ma volonté et mon discours, se remue tantost d'vn air, tantost d'vn autre: et y a plusieurs de ces mouuemens, private. And as Siramnes the Persian replied to those who were amazed that his affairs turned out so badly when his words were so wise—that he alone was master of his words, but Fortune was master of the success of his affairs—these people can make the same reply, but from the opposite angle. Most things in the world happen by themselves. The Fates find a way. The outcome often lends authority to very inept conduct. Our intervention is hardly more than routine, and more commonly a matter of habit and example than of reason.[15]

ENGLISH

Struck by the greatness of some achievement, I once learned from those who had carried it through what their motives and methods had been; I found nothing in them but ordinary notions. And the most ordinary and familiar are perhaps also the surest and handiest in practice, if not for show. What if the flattest reasons are the best grounded, and the lowest, the loosest and the most hackneyed suit affairs best? To preserve the authority of kings' councils, there is no need for the uninitiated to take part in them and see further in than the first barrier. Whoever wants to sustain their reputation must revere them on trust and wholesale.

My deliberation roughs out the matter a little and considers it lightly by its first appearances; the main and hardest part of the work I am accustomed to resign to heaven: Leave the rest to the gods.[16]

Good luck and bad luck are, to my mind, two sovereign powers. It is imprudence to think that human prudence can play the part of Fortune. And vain is the undertaking of the man who presumes to embrace both causes and consequences and to lead the progress of his affair by the hand—vain above all in deliberations of war. There was never more military circumspection and caution than is sometimes seen among us. Could it be that people are afraid of getting lost along the way, and are saving themselves for the final act of this play? I say further that our very wisdom and deliberation for the most part follow the lead of chance.

My will and my reasoning move now one way, now another, and many of these movements gov-

15 Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

qui se gouuernent sans moy. Ma raison a des impulsions et agitations iournallieres, et casuelles: Vertuntur species animorum, et pectora motus
Nunc alios, alios dum nubila ventus agebat, Concipiunt. Qu'on regarde qui sont les plus puissans aux villes, et qui font mieux leurs besongnes: on trouuera ordinairement, que ce sont les moins habiles. Il est aduenu aux femmelettes, aux enfans, et aux insensez, de commander des grands estats, à l'esgal des plus suffisans Princes. Et y rencontrent, dit Thucydides, plus ordinairement les grossiers que les subtils. Nous attribuons les effects de leur bonne fortune à leur prudence.

Vt quisque Fortuna vtitur, / Ita præcellet: atque exinde sapere illum omnes dicimus. Parquoy ie dis bien, en toutes façons, que les euenemens, sont maigres tesmoings de nostre prix et capacité.

3.8.17 Or i'estois sur ce poinct, qu'il ne faut que voir vn homme esleué en dignité: quand nous l'aurions cogneu trois iours deuant, homme de peu: il coule insensiblement en nos opinions, vne image de grandeur, de suffisance, et nous persuadons que croissant de train et de credit, il est creu de merite. Nous iugeons de luy non selon sa valeur: mais à la mode des getons, selon la prerogatiue de son rang. Que la chanse tourne aussi, qu'il retombe et se mesle à la presse: chacun s'enquiert auec admiration de la cause qui l'auoit guindé si haut. Est-ce luy? faict on: n'y sçauoit il autre chose quand il y estoit? les Princes se contentent ils de si peu? nous estions vrayement en bonnes mains.

C'est chose que i'ay veu souuent de mon temps. Voyre et le masque des grandeurs, qu'on represente aux comedies, nous touche aucunement et nous pippe. Ce que i'adore moy-mesmes aux Roys, c'est la foule de leurs adorateurs. Toute inclination et soubmission leur est deuë, sauf celle de l'entendement. Ma raison n'est pas duite à se courber et fleschir, ce sont mes genoux. Melanthius interrogé ce qu'il luy sembloit de la tragedie de Dionysius: Ie ne l'ay, dit-il, point veuë, tant elle est offusquee de langage. Aussi la pluspart de ceux qui iugent les discours des grans, deburoient dire: Ie n'ay point entendu son propos, tant il estoit offusqué de grauité, de grandeur, et de majesté.

ENGLISH

ern themselves without me. My reason has daily and accidental impulses and stirrings: The moods of minds are changed, and breasts conceive
Now one impulse, now another, as the wind
Drives on the clouds. Look at who are the most powerful in the cities and who do best in their business: you will usually find that they are the least capable. Little women, children and madmen have happened to rule great states as well as the ablest princes. And, says Thucydides, the dull succeed at it more often than the subtle. We attribute the effects of their good fortune to their prudence.[17]

As each man makes use of Fortune, / So he excels; and so we all say he is wise. Therefore I say, in every way, that outcomes are poor witnesses of our worth and ability.[18]

Now I was on this point: that we need only see a man raised to high rank, and even if we had known him three days before as a man of little account, an image of greatness and ability steals imperceptibly into our opinions, and we persuade ourselves that, having grown in retinue and credit, he has grown in merit. We judge him not by his worth but, as with counters, by the privilege of his position. Let the luck turn, let him fall back and mingle with the crowd, and everyone asks in amazement what it was that had hoisted him so high. "Is that him?" they say. "Didn't he know anything more than that when he was up there? Are princes satisfied with so little? We were in good hands indeed!"[19]

It is something I have often seen in my time. Indeed, even the mask of greatness that is represented in plays touches us somewhat and deceives us. What I myself worship in kings is the crowd of their worshipers. All bowing and submission is due to them, except that of the understanding. My reason is not trained to bend and bow; my knees are. Melanthius, asked what he thought of Dionysius's tragedy, said: "I have not seen it, it is so obscured by language." So too most of those who judge the speeches of the great ought to say: "I did 16 Horace, Odes.

17 Virgil, Georgics.
18 Plautus, Pseudolus.
19 Counting tokens, whose value depended on the place where they were set on the counting board.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
	not understand what he said, it was so obscured by gravity, grandeur and majesty."[20]
Antisthenes suadoit vn iour aux Atheniens, qu'ils commandassent, que leurs asnes fussent aussi bien employez au labourage des terres, comme estoyent les cheuaux: sur quoy il luy fut respondu, que cet animal n'estoit pas nay à vn tel seruice: C'est tout vn, repliqua il; il n'y va que de vostre ordonnance: car les plus ignorans et incapables hommes, que vous employez aux commandemens de vos guerres, ne laissent pas d'en deuenir incontinent tres-dignes, par ce que vous les y employez. A quoy touche l'vsage de tant de peuples, qui canonizent le Roy, qu'ils ont faict d'entre eux, et ne se contentent point de l'honnorer, s'ils ne l'adorent.	Antisthenes one day urged the Athenians to order that their donkeys be used to plow the fields just as the horses were. He was told in reply that this animal was not born for such service. "It makes no difference," he answered; "it depends only on your order. For the most ignorant and incapable men you appoint to command in your wars nonetheless become at once most worthy of it, simply because you appoint them." This bears on the custom of so many peoples who canonize the king they have made from among themselves, and are not content to honor him unless they worship him.
Ceux de Mexico, dépuis que les ceremonies de son sacre sont paracheuees, n'osent plus le regarder au visage: ains comme s'ils l'auoient deifié par sa royauté, entre les serments qu'ils luy font iurer, de maintenir leur religion, leurs loix, leurs libertez, d'estre vaillant, iuste et debonnaire: il jure aussi, de faire marcher le soleil en sa lumiere accoustumee: d'esgouster les nuees en temps opportun: courir aux riuieres leurs cours: et faire porter à la terre toutes choses necessaires à son peuple.	The people of Mexico, once the ceremonies of his coronation are completed, no longer dare look him in the face. Rather, as if they had deified him by making him king, among the oaths they make him swear—to maintain their religion, their laws, their liberties, and to be valiant, just and kindly—he also swears to make the sun move in its accustomed light, to make the clouds drain their rain at the proper time, to make the rivers run their courses, and to make the earth bear all things needful for his people.
3.8.18 Ie suis diuers à cette façon commune: et me deffie plus de la suffisance, quand ie la vois accompagnée de grandeur de fortune, et de recommandation populaire. Il nous fault prendre garde, combien c'est, de parler à son heure, de choisir son poinct, de rompre le propos, ou le changer, d'vne authorité magistrale: de se deffendre des oppositions d'autruy, par vn mouuement de teste, vn sous-ris, ou vn silence, deuant vne assistance, qui tremble de reuerence et de respect. Vn homme de monstrueuse fortune, venant mesler son aduis à certain leger propos, qui se demenoit tout laschement, en sa table, commença iustement ainsi: Ce ne peut estre qu'vn menteur ou ignorant, qui dira autrement que, etc. Suyuez cette poincte philosophique, vn poignart à la main.	I differ from this common way: I distrust ability the more when I see it accompanied by great fortune and popular esteem. We must take note how much it counts to speak when one pleases, to pick one's moment, to break off the conversation or change it with magisterial authority; to fend off other people's objections with a nod of the head, a smile or a silence, before an audience trembling with reverence and respect. A man of prodigious fortune, adding his opinion to some light conversation that was idly going on at his table, began exactly like this: "Only a liar or an ignoramus would say otherwise than," etc. Pursue that philosophical point—with a dagger in your hand.

TESTING BORROWED WIT

A fine saying from a fool must be probed to see how far he understands it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.8.19 Voicy vn autre aduertissement, duquel ie tire grand vsage. C'est qu'aux disputes et conferences, tous les mots	Here is another piece of advice from which I get great use. It is that in disputes and conversations, qui nous semblent bons, ne doiuent pas incontinent estre acceptez. La plus part des hommes sont riches d'vne suffisance estrangere. Il peut bien aduenir à tel, de dire vn beau traict, vne bonne responce et sentence, et la mettre en auant, sans en cognoistre la force. Qu'on ne tient pas tout ce qu'on emprunte, à l'aduenture se pourra-il verifier par moy-mesme. Il n'y faut point tousiours ceder, quelque verité ou beauté qu'elle ayt. Ou il la faut combatre à escient, ou se tirer arriere, soubs couleur de ne l'entendre pas: pour taster de toutes parts, comment elle est logee en son autheur.

FRENCH

Il peut aduenir, que nous nous enferrons, et aydons au coup, outre sa portee. I'ay autrefois employé à la necessité et presse du combat, des reuirades, qui ont faict faucee outre mon dessein, et mon esperance. Ie ne les donnois qu'en nombre, on les reçeuoit en poix. Tout ainsi, comme, quand ie debats contre vn homme vigoureux; ie me plais d'anticiper ses conclusions: ie luy oste la peine de s'interpreter: i'essaye de preuenir son imagination imparfaicte encores et naissante: l'ordre et la pertinence de son entendement, m'aduertit et menace de loing: de ces autres ie fais tout le rebours, il ne faut rien entendre que par eux, ny rien presupposer.

3.8.20 S'ils iugent en parolles vniuerselles: Cecy est bon, cela ne l'est pas; et qu'ils rencontrent, voyez si c'est la fortune, qui rencontre pour eux. Qu'ils circonscriuent et restreignent vn peu leur sentence: Pourquoy c'est; par où c'est. Ces iugements vniuersels, que ie voy si ordinaires, ne disent rien. Ce sont gents, qui salüent tout vn peuple, en foulle et en troupe. Ceux qui en ont vraye cognoissance, le salüent et remarquent nommement et particulierement. Mais c'est vne hazardeuse entreprinse.

D'où i'ay veu plus souuent que tous les iours, aduenir que les esprits foiblement fondez, voulants faire les ingenieux à remarquer en la lecture de quelque ouurage, le point de la beauté: arrestent leur admiration, d'vn si mauuais choix, qu'au lieu de nous apprendre l'excellence de l'autheur, ils nous apprennent leur propre ignorance. Cette exclamation est seure: Voyla qui est beau: ayant oüy vne entiere page de Vergile. Par là se sauuent les fins. Mais d'entreprendre à le suiure par espaulettes, et de iugement expres et trié, vouloir remarquer par où vn bon autheur se surmonte: poisant les mots, les phrases, les not every remark that seems good to us should be accepted straightaway. Most men are rich with borrowed ability. A man may well happen to say a fine thing, a good reply or maxim, and put it forward without knowing its force. That we do not truly hold everything we borrow can perhaps be verified by me myself. We must not always yield to it, whatever truth or beauty it has. Either we must fight it in earnest, or draw back on the pretext of not understanding it, so as to probe from every side how it is lodged in its author.

ENGLISH

It may happen that we run onto the blade and help the blow beyond its reach. In the need and heat of combat, I have sometimes used counterthrusts that went through further than I intended or hoped. I delivered them only by count; they were received by weight. Just so, when I argue with a vigorous man, I like to anticipate his conclusions; I spare him the trouble of explaining himself; I try to forestall his idea while it is still incomplete and just being born; the order and pertinence of his understanding warn and threaten me from afar. With these others I do just the opposite: we must understand nothing except through them, and presuppose nothing.

If they judge in general terms—"This is good, that is not"—and they hit the mark, see whether it is Fortune that hits it for them. Let them circumscribe and narrow their verdict a little: why it is so, in what respect it is so. These sweeping judgments, which I see so commonly, say nothing. They come from people who greet a whole population in a mass and a crowd. Those who really know it greet each person and pick them out by name and individually. But that is a risky undertaking.

Hence I have seen it happen more often than every day that poorly grounded minds, trying to show their cleverness by pointing out, as they read some work, where its beauty lies, fix their admiration on so bad a choice that instead of teaching us the excellence of the author they teach us their own ignorance. This exclamation is safe: "That is beautiful!" after hearing a whole page of Virgil. That is how the shrewd get by. But to undertake to follow him bit by bit, and, with explicit and dis-

20 Dionysius the Elder wrote tragedies.

FRENCH

inuentions et ses diuerses vertus, l'vne apres l'autre: ostez vous de là.

Videndum est non modo quid quisque loquatur, sed etiam quid quisque sentiat, atque etiam qua de causa quisque sentiat.

3.8.21 I'oy journellement dire à des sots, des mots non sots. Ils disent vne bonne chose: sçachons iusques où ils la cognoissent, voyons par où ils la tiennent. Nous les aydons à employer ce beau mot, et cette belle raison, qu'ils ne possedent pas, ils ne l'ont qu'en garde: ils l'auront produicte à l'auanture, et à tastons, nous la leur mettons en credit et en prix. Vous leur prestez la main. A quoy faire? Ils ne vous en sçauent nul gré, et en deuiennent plus ineptes. Ne les secondez pas, laissez les aller: ils manieront cette matiere, comme gens qui ont peur de s'eschauder, ils n'osent luy changer d'assiette et de iour, ny l'enfoncer.

Croullez la tant soit peu; elle leur eschappe: ils vous la quittent, toute forte et belle qu'elle est. Ce sont belles armes: mais elles sont mal emmanchees. Combien de fois en ay-ie veu l'experience? Or si vous venez à les esclaircir et confirmer, ils vous saisissent et desrobent incontinent cet aduantage de vostre interpretation: C'estoit ce que ie voulois dire: voyla iustement ma conception: si ie ne l'ay ainsin exprimé, ce n'est que faute de langue. Souflez. Il faut employer la malice mesme, à corriger cette fiere bestise. Le dogme d'Hegesias, Qu'il ne faut ny haïr, ny accuser: ains instruire: a de la raison ailleurs.

Mais icy, c'est iniustice et inhumanité de secourir et redresser celuy, qui n'en a que faire, et qui en vaut moins. I'ayme à les laisser embourber et empestrer encore plus qu'ils ne sont: et si auant, s'il est possible, qu'en fin ils se recognoissent.

3.8.22 La sottise et desreglement de sens, n'est pas chose guerissable par vn traict d'aduertissement. Et pouuons proprement dire de cette reparation, ce que Cyrus respond à celuy, qui le presse d'enhorter son ost, sur le point d'vne bataille: Que les hommes ne se rendent pas courageux et belliqueux sur le champ, par vne bonne harangue: non plus qu'on ne deuient incontinent musicien, pour ouyr vne bonne chanson. Ce sont criminating judgment, try to point out where a good author surpasses himself, weighing the words, the phrases, the inventions and his various excellences one after another—stay clear of that!

ENGLISH

We must consider not only what each man says, but also what he thinks, and even why he thinks it.[21]

Every day I hear fools say things that are not foolish. They say a good thing: let us find out how far they understand it, let us see by what end they hold it. We help them make use of that fine phrase and that fine argument which they do not own—they only have it in safekeeping; they will have brought it out by chance and groping; we give it credit and value for them. You lend them a hand. What for? They are not in the least grateful to you, and they become sillier for it. Don't back them up; let them go on. They will handle that material like people afraid of scalding themselves; they dare not change its position or its light, nor go deeper into it.

Shake it ever so little and it slips from them; they surrender it to you, strong and beautiful as it is. They are fine weapons, but badly hafted. How often have I seen this proved? Now if you go on to clarify and support them, they at once seize and steal from you the advantage of your interpretation: "That was what I meant; that is exactly my idea; if I didn't express it that way, it was only for want of words." Puff away! We must use even malice to correct this proud stupidity. The doctrine of Hegesias, that we should neither hate nor accuse, but instruct, has reason in it elsewhere.

But here it is injustice and inhumanity to rescue and set right someone who has no use for it and is the worse for it. I like to let them get bogged down and entangled even more than they are, and so deeply, if possible, that in the end they recognize themselves.

Stupidity and a disordered mind are not curable by a stroke of admonition. And we may fitly say of this kind of repair what Cyrus answers to the man who urges him to exhort his army on the point of battle: that men are not made brave and warlike on the spot by a good speech, any more than one becomes a musician at once by hearing a good song. These are apprenticeships that have to be 21 Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

apprentissages, qui ont à estre faicts auant la main, par longue et constante institution. Nous deuons ce soing aux nostres, et cette assiduité de correction et d'instruction: mais d'aller prescher le premier passant, et regenter l'ignorance ou ineptie du premier rencontré, c'est vn vsage auquel ie veux grand mal.

Rarement le fais-ie, aux propos mesme qui se passent auec moy, et quitte plustost tout, que de venir à ces instructions reculees et magistrales. Mon humeur n'est propre, non plus à parler qu'à escrire, pour les principians. Mais aux choses qui se disent en commun, ou entre autres, pour fauces et absurdes que ie les iuge, ie ne me iette iamais à la trauerse, ny de parole ny de signe.

3.8.23 Au demeurant rien ne me despite tant en la sottise, que, dequoy elle se plaist plus, que aucune raison ne se peut raisonnablement plaire. C'est mal'heur, que la prudence vous deffend de vous satisfaire et fier de vous, et vous en enuoye tousiours mal content et craintif: là où l'opiniastreté et la temerité, remplissent leurs hostes d'esiouïssance et d'asseurance. C'est aux plus mal habiles de regarder les autres hommes par dessus l'espaule, s'en retournans tousiours du combat, pleins de gloire et d'allegresse. Et le plus souuent encore cette outrecuidance de langage et gayeté de visage, leur donne gaigné, à l'endroit de l'assistance, qui est communément foible et incapable de bien iuger, et discerner les vrays aduantages.

ENGLISH

served beforehand, through long and steady education. We owe this care to our own people, and this diligence in correction and instruction; but to go preaching to the first passerby and lecturing the ignorance or foolishness of the first person we meet is a practice I strongly dislike.[22]

I rarely do it, even in conversations held with me, and I would rather give up altogether than resort to these magisterial lessons that go back to first principles. My temperament is not suited to speaking, any more than to writing, for beginners. But as for things said in company or among others, however false and absurd I judge them, I never throw myself in the way, by word or by sign.

For the rest, nothing vexes me so much about stupidity as that it is more pleased with itself than any reason can reasonably be. It is a misfortune that prudence forbids you to be satisfied with yourself and to trust yourself, and always sends you away discontented and fearful, whereas obstinacy and rashness fill their hosts with joy and assurance. It is the least capable who look down on other men over their shoulder, always coming back from the fight full of glory and gladness. And most often, too, this arrogance of speech and cheerfulness of face wins them the day with the audience, which is commonly weak and incapable of judging well and discerning the real advantages.

BANTER AMONG FRIENDS

Sharp, playful teasing is a useful kind of conversation; rough horseplay is not.

FRENCH

L'obstination et ardeur d'opinion, est la plus seure preuue de bestise. Est il rien certain, resolu, dedeigneux, contemplatif, serieux, graue, comme l'asne? Pouuons nous pas mesler au tiltre de la conference et communication, les deuis poinctus et coupez que l'alegresse et la priuauté introduit entre les amis, gaussans et gaudissans plaisamment et vifuement les vns les autres? Exercice auquel ma gayeté naturelle me rend assez propre. Et s'il n'est aussi tendu et serieux que cet autre exercice que ie viens de dire, il n'est pas moins aigu et ingenieux, ny moins profitable, comme il sembloit à Lycurgus.

ENGLISH

Obstinacy and heat of opinion are the surest proof of stupidity. Is there anything as certain, resolute, disdainful, contemplative, serious and grave as the donkey? May we not include under the heading of conversation and exchange the sharp, clipped banter that high spirits and intimacy bring in among friends, teasing and joking with one another pleasantly and briskly? It is an exercise for which my natural gaiety makes me fairly well suited. And if it is not as taut and serious as that other exercise I have just spoken of, it is no less keen and clever, nor less profitable, as Lycurgus thought.[23]

22 Xenophon, The Education of Cyrus.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Pour mon regard i'y apporte plus de liberté que d'esprit, et y ay plus d'heur que d'inuention: mais ie suis parfaict en la souffrance: car i'endure la reuenche, non seulement aspre, mais indiscrete aussi, sans alteration. Et à la charge qu'on me fait, si ie n'ay dequoy repartir brusquement sur le champ, ie ne vay pas m'amusant à suiure cette poincte, d'vne contestation ennuyeuse et lasche, tirant à l'opiniastreté. Ie la laisse passer, et baissant ioyeusement les oreilles, remets d'en auoir ma raison à quelque heure meilleure. Il n'est pas marchant qui tousiours gaigne. La plus part changent de visage, et de voix, où la force leur faut: et par vne importune cholere, au lieu de se venger, accusent leur foiblesse, ensemble et leur impatience.

For my part, I bring to it more freedom than wit, and I have more luck at it than invention; but I am perfect at taking it, for I endure retaliation—not only sharp but even tactless—without getting upset. And when I am attacked, if I have nothing to retort smartly on the spot, I do not waste my time pursuing the point with a tedious, feeble wrangle that verges on obstinacy. I let it pass, and, cheerfully lowering my ears, I put off getting even until some better hour. No merchant always makes a profit. Most people change their face and their voice when their strength fails them, and by an unseasonable anger, instead of getting their revenge, they betray their weakness and their impatience together.

En cette gaillardise nous pinçons par fois des cordes secrettes de nos imperfections, lesquelles, rassis, nous ne pouuons toucher sans offence: et nous entraduertissons vtilement de nos deffauts.

In this playfulness we sometimes pluck the secret strings of our imperfections, which we cannot touch in a calmer mood without giving offense; and we usefully warn one another of our faults.

3.8.24 Il y a d'autres ieux de main, indiscrets et aspres, à la Françoise: que ie hay mortellement: i'ay la peau tendre et sensible: i'en ay veu en ma vie, enterrer deux Princes de nostre sang royal. Il fait laid se battre en s'esbatant.

There are other games of horseplay, tactless and rough, in the French manner, which I hate mortally: I have a tender, sensitive skin. In my lifetime I have seen two princes of our royal blood buried because of them. It is an ugly thing to come to blows in fun.[24]

JUDGING A MAN'S WORK

He asks writers what they think best in their work, and doubts his own judgment of the Essays.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.8.25 Au reste, quand ie veux iuger de quelqu'vn, ie luy demande combien il se contente de soy: iusques où son parler ou sa besongne luy plaist. Ie veux euiter ces belles excuses, Ie le fis en me ioüant: Ablatum mediis opus est incudibus istud: ie n'y fus pas vne heure: ie ne l'ay reueu depuis. Or dis-ie, laissons donc ces pieces, donnez m'en vne qui vous represente bien entier, par laquelle il vous plaise qu'on vous mesure. Et puis: que trouuez vous le plus beau en vostre ouurage? est-ce ou cette partie, ou cette cy? la grace, ou la matiere, ou l'inuention, ou le iugement, ou la science? Car ordinairement ie m'apperçoy, qu'on faut autant à iuger de sa propre besongne, que de celle d'autruy.

Moreover, when I want to judge someone, I ask him how far he is satisfied with himself, how much his speech or his work pleases him. I want to avoid those fine excuses: "I did it for fun"; This work was taken from the anvil half-finished; "I wasn't at it for an hour"; "I haven't looked at it since." Well then, I say, let us leave those pieces aside; give me one that represents you whole, one by which you would like to be measured. And then: what do you find finest in your work? Is it this part or that one? The grace, or the matter, or the invention, or the judgment, or the learning? For I usu-

23 Plutarch reports that Lycurgus encouraged banter among the Spartans.
24 One was probably François de Bourbon, Count of Enghien, killed in 1546 when a chest was thrown from a window during a mock snowball battle.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

ally notice that people err as much in judging their own work as in judging other people's.[25]

Non seulement pour l'affection qu'on y mesle: mais pour n'auoir la suffisance de la cognoistre et distinguer. L'ouurage de sa propre force, et fortune, peult seconder l'ouurier et le deuancer outre son inuention, et cognoissance. Pour moy, ie ne iuge la valeur d'autre besongne, plus obscurement que de la mienne: et loge les Essais tantost bas, tantost haut, fort inconstamment et doubteusement. Il y a plusieurs liures vtiles à raison de leurs subiects, desquels l'autheur ne tire aucune recommandation: et des bons liures, comme des bons ouurages, qui font honte à l'ouurier.

Not only because of the affection they mix into it, but because they lack the ability to know it and to distinguish its parts. A work, by its own force and fortune, can second the workman and outstrip him beyond his invention and knowledge. For my part, I judge the worth of no one else's work more obscurely than my own; and I place the Essays now low, now high, very inconstantly and doubtfully. There are many books that are useful by reason of their subjects, from which the author gains no credit; and there are good books, as there are good works, that put the workman to shame.

I'escriray la façon de nos conuiues, et de nos vestemens: et l'escriray de mauuaise grace: ie publieray les edicts de mon temps, et les lettres des Princes qui passent és mains publiques: ie feray vn abbregé sur vn bon liure (et tout abbregé sur vn bon liure est vn sot abbregé) lequel liure viendra à se perdre: et choses semblables. La posterité retirera vtilité singuliere de telles compositions: moy quel honneur, si ce n'est de ma bonne fortune? Bonne part des liures fameux, sont de cette condition.

I will write about the fashion of our banquets and of our clothes, and write about it gracelessly; I will publish the edicts of my time and the letters of princes that pass into public hands; I will make an abridgment of a good book (and every abridgment of a good book is a foolish abridgment), which book will then come to be lost; and things like that. Posterity will derive singular use from such compositions; but what honor will there be for me, except for my good luck? A good many famous books are of this kind.

3.8.26 Quand ie leuz Philippes de Comines, il y a plusieurs annees, tresbon autheur certes; i'y remarquay ce mot pour non vulgaire: Qu'il se faut bien garder de faire tant de seruice à son maistre, qu'on l'empesche d'en trouuer la iuste recompence. Ie deuois louer l'inuention, non pas luy. Ie la rencontray en Tacitus, il n'y a pas long temps: Beneficia eò vsque læta sunt, dum videntur exolui posse; vbi multum anteuenere, pro gratia odium redditur. Et Seneque vigoureusement: Nam qui putat esse turpe non reddere, non vult esse cui reddat. Q.

When I read Philippe de Commynes several years ago—a very good author, certainly—I noted in him this saying as uncommon: that one must take good care not to do one's master so much service that one prevents him from finding a fitting reward for it. I should have praised the idea, not him. I came across it in Tacitus not long ago: Benefits are welcome so long as they seem repayable; when they go far beyond that, hatred is returned instead of gratitude. And Seneca, vigorously: For he who thinks it shameful not to repay does not want there to be anyone to repay. Q.

Cicero d'vn biais plus lasche: Qui se non putat satisfacere modo amicus esse nullo, potest. Le subiect selon qu'il est, peut faire trouuer vn homme sçauant et memorieux: mais pour iuger en luy les parties plus siennes, et plus dignes, la force et beaute de son ame: il faut sçauoir ce qui est sien, et ce qui ne l'est point: et en ce qui n'est pas sien, combien on luy doibt en consideration du choix, disposition, ornement, et langage qu'il a fourny. Quoy, s'il y a emprunté la matiere, et empiré la forme? comme il aduient souuent.

Cicero, from a slacker angle: Whoever thinks he cannot repay you can in no way be your friend. The subject, depending on what it is, may make a man seem learned and gifted with a good memory; but to judge the qualities in him that are most his own and most worthy, the strength and beauty of his soul, we must know what is his and what is not; and, in what is not his, how much we owe him for the choice, arrangement, ornament and language

25 Ovid, Tristia.

FRENCH

Nous autres qui auons peu de practique auec les liures, sommes en cette peine: que quand nous voyons quelque belle inuention en vn poëte nouueau, quelque fort argument en vn prescheur, nous n'osons pourtant les en louer, que nous n'ayons prins instruction de quelque sçauant, si cette piece leur est propre, ou si elle est estrangere. Iusques lors ie me tiens tousiours sur mes gardes.

ENGLISH

he has supplied. What if he has borrowed the matter and spoiled the form, as often happens?[26]

Those of us who have little familiarity with books are in this difficulty: when we see some fine idea in a new poet, some strong argument in a preacher, we still dare not praise them for it until we have learned from some scholar whether this piece is their own or borrowed. Until then I always stay on my guard.

READING TACITUS

A verdict on Tacitus: his judgment, his style, his view of Pompey and his reports of prodigies.

FRENCH

3.8.27 Ie viens de courre d'vn fil, l'histoire de Tacitus (ce qui ne m'aduient guere, il y a vingt ans que ie ne mis en liure, vne heure de suite) et l'ay faict, à la suasion d'vn Gentilhomme que la France estime beaucoup: tant pour sa valeur propre, que pour vne constante forme de suffisance, et bonté, qui se voit en plusieurs freres qu'ils sont. Ie ne sçache point d'autheur, qui mesle à vn registre public, tant de consideration des mœurs, et inclinations particulieres.

Et me semble le rebours, de ce qu'il luy semble à luy: qu'ayant specialement à suiure les vies des Empereurs de son temps, si diuerses et extremes, en toute sorte de formes: tant de notables actions, que nommément leur cruauté produisit en leurs subiects: il auoit vne matiere plus forte et attirante, à discourir et à narrer, que s'il eust eu à dire des batailles et agitations vniuerselles. Si que souuent ie le trouue sterile, courant par dessus ces belles morts, comme s'il craignoit nous fascher de leur multitude et longueur. Cette forme d'histoire, est de beaucoup la plus vtile. Les mouuemens publics, dependent plus de la conduicte de la Fortune, les priuez de la nostre.

C'est plustost vn iugement, que deduction d'histoire: il y a plus de preceptes, que de contes: ce n'est pas vn liure à lire, c'est vn liure à estudier et apprendre: il est si plein de sentences, qu'il y en a à tort et à droict: c'est vne pepiniere de discours ethiques, et politiques, pour la prouision et ornement de ceux, qui tiennent quelque rang au maniement du monde. Il plaide tousiours par raisons solides et vigoureuses, d'vne façon poinctue, et subtile: suyuant le stile affecté du siecle. Ils aymoient

ENGLISH

I have just read straight through Tacitus's history (which hardly ever happens to me: it is twenty years since I spent a single hour at a stretch on a book), and I did so at the urging of a gentleman whom France holds in high esteem, both for his own worth and for a constant form of ability and goodness that is seen in the several brothers that they are. I know of no author who mixes into a public record so much consideration of private manners and inclinations.

And I think the opposite of what he thinks: that, having in particular to follow the lives of the emperors of his time, so strange and extreme in every sort of way, and so many notable actions that their cruelty above all produced in their subjects, he had stronger and more attractive material to discuss and narrate than if he had had to tell of battles and general upheavals. So much so that I often find him barren, running over those fine deaths as if he feared to weary us with their number and length. This form of history is by far the most useful. Public movements depend more on the guidance of Fortune, private ones on our own.

It is a judgment rather than a narration of history; there are more precepts than stories in it; it is not a book to read, it is a book to study and learn. It is so full of maxims that they are scattered everywhere, right and left: it is a nursery of ethical and political reflections, for the supply and adornment of those who hold some rank in the management of the world. He always pleads with solid and vigorous reasons, in a pointed and subtle manner, fol-

26 Quintus Cicero, brother of the orator, in his Handbook on Electioneering.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	tant à s'enfler, qu'où ils ne trouuoyent de la poincte et subtilité aux choses, ils l'empruntoyent des parolles. Il ne retire pas mal à l'escrire de Seneque. Il me semble plus charnu, Seneque plus aigu.	lowing the affected style of the age. They loved so much to puff themselves up that where they found no point or subtlety in things, they borrowed it from words. His writing is not unlike Seneca's. He seems to me meatier, Seneca sharper.
	Son seruice est plus propre à vn estat trouble et malade, comme est le nostre present: vous diriez souuent qu'il nous peinct et qu'il nous pinse.	His service is better suited to a troubled and sick state, such as ours is at present: you would often say he is painting us and pinching us.
3.8.28	Ceux qui doubtent de sa foy, s'accusent assez de luy vouloir mal d'ailleurs. Il a les opinions saines, et pend du bon party aux affaires Romaines. Ie me plains vn peu toutesfois, dequoy il a iugé de Pompeius plus aigrement, que ne porte l'aduis des gens de bien, qui ont vescu et traicté auec luy: de l'auoir estimé du tout pareil à Marius et à Sylla, sinon d'autant qu'il estoit plus couuert. On n'a pas exempté d'ambition, son intention au gouuernement des affaires, ny de vengeance: et ont crainct ses amis mesmes, que la victoire l'eust emporté outre les bornes de la raison: mais non pas iusques a vne mesure si effrenee.	Those who doubt his good faith give themselves away well enough as bearing him ill will for other reasons. His opinions are sound, and he leans to the right side in Roman affairs. I do complain a little, though, that he judged Pompey more harshly than the opinion of the good men who lived and dealt with him warrants, and thought him altogether like Marius and Sulla, except that he was more secretive. Pompey's intentions in the government of affairs have not been held free of ambition, nor of vengeance; and even his friends feared that victory would have carried him beyond the bounds of reason—but not to so unbridled a degree.[27]
	Il n'y a rien en sa vie, qui nous ayt menassé d'vne si expresse cruauté et tyrannie. Encores ne faut-il pas contrepoiser le souspçon à l'euidence: ainsi ie ne l'en crois pas. Que ses narrations soient naifues et droictes, il se pourroit à l'auanture argumenter de cecy mesme: Qu'elles ne s'appliquent pas tousiours exactement aux conclusions de ses iugements: lesquels il suit selon la pente qu'il y a prise, souuent outre la matiere qu'il nous montre: laquelle il n'a daigné incliner d'vn seul air. Il n'a pas besoing d'excuse, d'auoir approuué la religion de son temps, selon les loix qui luy commandoient, et ignoré la vraye. Cela, c'est son malheur, non pas son defaut.	There is nothing in his life that threatened us with such outright cruelty and tyranny. Besides, suspicion must not be weighed against evidence; so I do not believe Tacitus on this. That his narratives are artless and straightforward could perhaps be argued from this very fact: that they do not always fit exactly the conclusions of his judgments, which he follows according to the bent he has taken, often beyond the material he shows us, and that material he has not deigned to tilt in the slightest. He needs no excuse for having approved the religion of his time, according to the laws that commanded him, and for having been ignorant of the true one. That is his misfortune, not his defect.
3.8.29	I'ay principalement consideré son iugement, et n'en suis pas bien esclaircy par tout. Comme ces mots de la lettre que Tibere vieil et malade, enuoyoit au Senat: Que vous escriray-ie messieurs, ou comment vous escriray-ie, ou que ne vous escriray-ie point, en ce temps? Les dieux, et les deesses me perdent pirement, que ie ne me sens tous les iours perir, si ie le sçay. Ie n'apperçoy pas pourquoy il les applique si certainement, à vn poignant remors qui tourmente la conscience de Tibere. Aumoins lors que i'estois à mesme, ie ne le vis point.	I have chiefly considered his judgment, and I am not entirely clear about it throughout. Take these words from the letter that Tiberius, old and ill, sent to the Senate: "What shall I write to you, sirs, or how shall I write to you, or what shall I not write to you at this time? May the gods and goddesses destroy me worse than I feel myself perishing every day, if I know." I do not see why he applies them so confidently to a stinging remorse

27 Marius and Sulla, rival leaders of the first century BC, each carried out bloody purges in Rome.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

tormenting Tiberius's conscience. At least when I was reading it, I did not see it.

3.8.30 Cela m'a semblé aussi vn peu lasche, qu'ayant eu à dire, qu'il auoit exercé certain honnorable magistrat à Rome, il s'aille excusant que ce n'est point par ostentation, qu'il l'a dict. Ce traict me semble bas de poil, pour vne ame de sa sorte. Car le n'oser parler rondement de soy, accuse quelque faute de cœur. Vn iugement roide et hautain, et qui iuge sainement, et seurement: il vse à toutes mains, des propres exemples, ainsi que de chose estrangere: et tesmoigne franchement de luy, comme de chose tierce. Il faut passer par dessus ces regles populaires, de la ciuilité, en faueur de la verité, et de la liberté. I'ose non seulement parler de moy: mais parler seulement de moy.

It also seemed to me a little weak that, having had to mention that he had held a certain honorable magistracy in Rome, he goes on to excuse himself, saying that it was not out of ostentation that he said so. This trait seems to me shabby for a soul of his kind. For not daring to speak plainly of oneself betrays some lack of heart. A firm and lofty judgment, one that judges soundly and surely, uses its own examples on every occasion just as it would something foreign, and testifies frankly about itself as about a third party. We must pass over these common rules of civility in favor of truth and freedom. I dare not only to speak of myself, but to speak only of myself.

Ie fouruoye quand i'escry d'autre chose, et me desrobe à mon subiect. Ie ne m'ayme pas si indiscretement, et ne suis si attaché et meslé à moy, que ie ne me puisse distinguer et considerer à quartier: comme vn voysin, comme vn arbre. C'est pareillement faillir, de ne veoir pas iusques où on vaut, ou d'en dire plus qu'on n'en void. Nous deuons plus d'amour à Dieu, qu'à nous, et le cognoissons moins, et si en parlons tout nostre saoul.

I go astray when I write of anything else, and slip away from my subject. I do not love myself so indiscreetly, and am not so bound up and mingled with myself, that I cannot distinguish myself and consider myself apart, as a neighbor, as a tree. It is equally an error not to see how far one's worth extends, or to say more of it than one sees. We owe more love to God than to ourselves, and we know him less, and yet we talk of him to our heart's content.

3.8.31 Si ses escrits rapportent aucune chose de ses conditions: c'estoit vn grand personnage, droicturier, et courageux, non d'vne vertu superstitieuse, mais philosophique et genereuse. On le pourra trouuer hardy en ses tesmoignages. Comme où il tient, qu'vn soldat portant vn fais de bois, ses mains se roidirent de froid, et se collerent à sa charge, si qu'elles y demeurerent attachees et mortes, s'estants departies des bras. I'ay accoustumé en telles choses, de plier soubs l'authorité de si grands tesmoings.

If his writings reflect anything of his character, he was a great personage, upright and courageous, not with a superstitious virtue but with a philosophical and generous one. He may be found bold in his testimony. As where he maintains that a soldier carrying a load of wood had his hands stiffen with cold and stick to his burden, so that they stayed fastened there, dead, having come away from his arms. In such matters I am accustomed to bow to the authority of such great witnesses.

3.8.32 Ce qu'il dit aussi, que Vespasian, par la faueur du Dieu Serapis, guarit en Alexandrie vne femme aueugle, en luy oignant les yeux de sa saliue: et ie ne sçay quel autre miracle: il le fait par l'exemple et deuoir de tous bons historiens. Ils tiennent registres des euenements d'importance. Parmy les accidens publics, sont aussi les bruits et opinions populaires. C'est leur rolle, de reciter les communes creances, non pas de les regler. Cette part touche les theologiens, et les philosophes directeurs des consciences.

As for what he also says, that Vespasian, by the favor of the god Serapis, healed a blind woman in Alexandria by anointing her eyes with his spittle, and some other miracle or other: he does it following the example and the duty of all good historians. They keep records of important events, and among public occurrences are also popular rumors and opinions. It is their role to report common beliefs, not to regulate them. That part belongs to the theologians, and to the philosophers who direct consciences.

FRENCH

Pourtant tres-sagement, ce sien compagnon et grand homme comme luy: Equidem plura transcribo quàm credo: nam nec affirmare sustineo de quibus dubito, nec subducere quæ accepi: et l'autre: Hæc neque affirmare neque refellere operæ pretium est: famæ rerum standum est. Et escriuant en vn siecle, auquel la creance des prodiges commençoit à diminuer, il dit ne vouloir pourtant laisser d'inserer en ses annales, et donner pied à chose receuë de tant de gens de bien, et auec si grande reuerence de l'antiquité. C'est tresbien dict. Qu'ils nous rendent l'histoire, plus selon qu'ils reçoyuent, que selon qu'ils estiment. Moy qui suis Roy de la matiere que ie traicte, et qui n'en dois compte à personne, ne m'en crois pourtant pas du tout.

Ie hazarde souuent des boutades de mon esprit, desquelles ie me deffie: et certaines finesses verbales dequoy ie secoue les oreilles: mais ie les laisse courir à l'auanture, ie voys qu'on s'honore de pareilles choses: ce n'est pas à moy seul d'en iuger. Ie me presente debout; et couché; le deuant et le derriere; à droitte et à gauche; et en touts mes naturels plis. Les esprits, voire pareils en force, ne sont pas tousiours pareils en application et en goust. Voyla ce que la memoire m'en presente en gros, et assez incertainement. Tous iugemens en gros, sont lasches et imparfaicts.

ENGLISH

Therefore very wisely did that fellow historian of his, a great man like him, say: Indeed I transcribe more than I believe; for I can neither bring myself to affirm what I doubt, nor withhold what I have been told; and the other: These things are worth neither affirming nor refuting; we must abide by report. And writing in an age when belief in prodigies was beginning to decline, he says that he nevertheless does not want to fail to include in his annals, and to give a footing to, a thing accepted by so many good men and with such great reverence for antiquity. That is very well said. Let them give us history more as they receive it than as they judge it. I, who am king of the matter I treat and owe no one an account of it, nevertheless do not wholly believe myself about it.[28]

I often venture sallies of my mind that I distrust, and certain verbal subtleties at which I shake my ears; but I let them take their chance. I see that people take pride in such things; it is not for me alone to judge them. I present myself standing and lying down, front and back, right and left, and in all my natural folds. Minds, even when equal in strength, are not always equal in application and taste. That is what my memory presents to me about him, broadly and rather uncertainly. All broad judgments are loose and imperfect.

28 The first quotation is from Quintus Curtius, historian of Alexander the Great; the second, and the remark on prodigies, are from Livy.

III.9 Of Vanity

De la vanité

Montaigne ranges over writing, travel, household cares, and public duty, defending his love of wandering and his Roman citizenship.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.9.1 IL n'en est à l'auanture aucune plus expresse, que d'en escrire si vainement. Ce que la diuinité nous en a si diuinement exprimé, deburoit estre soigneusement et continuellement medité, par les gens d'entendement. Qui ne voit, que i'ay pris vne route, par laquelle sans cesse et sans trauail, i'iray autant, qu'il y aura d'ancre et de papier au monde? Ie ne puis tenir registre de ma vie, par mes actions: Fortune les met trop bas: ie le tiens par mes fantasies. Si ay-ie veu vn Gentil-homme, qui ne communiquoit sa vie, que par les operations de son ventre. Vous voyiez chez luy, en montre, vn ordre de bassins de sept ou huict iours. C'estoit son estude, ses discours. Tout autre propos luy puoit.

There is perhaps no more obvious vanity than to write about it so vainly. What the Divinity has so divinely expressed to us on this subject ought to be meditated carefully and continually by people of understanding. Who does not see that I have taken a road along which I shall go on, without stopping and without effort, as long as there is ink and paper in the world? I cannot keep a record of my life by my actions: Fortune sets them too low. I keep it by my notions. Yet I have seen a gentleman who communicated his life only through the workings of his belly. At his house you would see on display a row of chamber pots, seven or eight days' worth. That was his study, his conversation. Every other topic stank to him.[1]

Ce sont icy, vn peu plus ciuilement, des excremens d'vn vieil esprit: dur tantost, tantost lasche: et tousiours indigeste. Et quand seray-ie à bout de representer vne continuelle agitation et mutation de mes pensees, en quelque matiere qu'elles tombent, puisque Diomedes remplit six mille liures, du seul subiect de la grammaire? Que doit produire le babil, puisque le begaiement et desnouement de la langue, estouffa le monde d'vne si horrible charge de volumes? Tant de paroles, pour les paroles seules. O Pythagoras, que n'esconjuras-tu cette tempeste! On accusoit vn Galba du temps passé, de ce qu'il viuoit oyseusement. Il respondit, que chacun deuoit rendre raison de ses actions, non pas de son seiour.

Here, a little more politely, are the excrements of an old mind: hard at times, at times loose, and always undigested. And when shall I ever finish portraying the continual agitation and change of my thoughts, whatever subject they fall on, since Diomedes filled six thousand books with the subject of grammar alone? What must babbling produce, since the stammering and first loosening of the tongue smothered the world under so horrible a load of volumes? So many words, for the sake of words alone! O Pythagoras, why did you not conjure away this storm? A Galba of olden times was accused of living idly. He replied that each man must give an account of his actions, not of his leisure.[2]

Il se trompoit: car la iustice a cognoissance et animaduersion aussi, sur ceux qui chaument. Mais il y deuroit auoir quelque coërction des loix, contre les escriuains ineptes et inutiles, comme il y a contre les vagabons et faineants. On banniroit des mains de nostre

He was wrong: for justice also takes notice of those who sit idle, and punishes them. But there ought to be some legal restraint against inept and useless writers, as there is against vagabonds and idlers. Both I and a hundred others would be ban-

1 The "Divinity" alludes to Ecclesiastes: "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."
2 Montaigne probably means Didymus, the Alexandrian grammarian said by Seneca to have written four thousand books. Pythagoras imposed years of silence on his disciples.

FRENCH

peuple, et moy, et cent autres. Ce n'est pas moquerie. L'escriuaillerie semble estre quelque symptome d'vn siecle desbordé. Quand escriuismes nous tant, que depuis que nous sommes en trouble? quand les Romains tant, que lors de leur ruyne? Outre-ce que l'affinement des esprits, ce n'en est pas l'assagissement, en vne police: cet embesongnement oisif, naist de ce que chacun se prent laschement à l'office de sa vacation, et s'en desbauche.

La corruption du siecle se fait, par la contribution particuliere de chacun de nous. Les vns y conferent la trahison, les autres l'iniustice, l'irreligion, la tyrannie, l'auarice, la cruauté, selon qu'ils sont plus puissans: les plus foibles y apportent la sottise, la vanité, l'oisiueté: desquels ie suis. Il semble que ce soit la saison des choses vaines, quand les dommageables nous pressent. En vn temps, où le meschamment faire est si commun, de ne faire qu'inutilement, il est comme louable. Ie me console que ie seray des derniers, sur qui il faudra mettre la main. Ce pendant qu'on pouruoira aux plus pressans, i'auray loy de m'amender. Car il me semble que ce seroit contre raison, de poursuyure les menus inconuenients, quand les grands nous infestent.

Et le medecin Philotimus, à vn qui luy presentoit le doigt à penser, auquel il recognoissoit au visage, et à l'haleine, vn vlcere aux poulmons: Mon amy, fit-il, ce n'est pas à cette heure le temps de t'amuser à tes ongles.

3.9.2 Ie vis pourtant sur ce propos, il y a quelques annees, qu'vn personnage, de qui i'ay la memoire en recommandation singuliere, au milieu de nos grands maux, qu'il n'y auoit ny loy, ny iustice, ny magistrat, qui fist son office: non plus qu'à cette heure: alla publier ie ne sçay quelles chetiues reformations, sur les habillemens, la cuisine et la chicane. Ce sont amusoires dequoy on paist vn peuple mal-mené, pour dire qu'on ne l'a pas du tout mis en oubly. Ces autres font de mesme, qui s'arrestent à deffendre à toute instance, des formes de parler, les dances, et les ieux, à vn peuple abandonné à toute sorte de vices execrables.

Il n'est pas temps de se lauer et decrasser, quand on est atteint d'vne bonne fiéure. C'est à faire aux seuls Spartiates, de se mettre à se peigner et testonner, sur le poinct qu'ils se vont precipiter à quelque extreme hazard de leur vie. Quant à moy, i'ay cette autre pire coustume, ished from our people's hands. This is no joke. Scribbling seems to be a kind of symptom of an unruly age. When did we ever write so much as since our troubles began? When did the Romans, as at the time of their ruin? Besides the fact that sharpening minds does not make them wiser in a state, this idle busyness comes from each man applying himself slackly to the duty of his calling, and straying from it.

ENGLISH

The corruption of the age is made up of the particular contribution of each of us. Some contribute treachery, others injustice, irreligion, tyranny, avarice, cruelty, according to how powerful they are; the weaker bring folly, vanity, idleness—and I am one of these. It seems to be the season for vain things when harmful ones press upon us. In a time when doing wickedly is so common, to do only what is useless is almost praiseworthy. I console myself that I shall be among the last to be laid hold of. While the more pressing cases are being dealt with, I shall have time to mend my ways. For it seems to me that it would be against reason to prosecute petty nuisances when great ones are plaguing us.

As the physician Philotimus said to a man who held out his finger for him to dress, and in whom he recognized, by his face and his breath, an ulcer of the lungs: "My friend, this is no time to be fussing over your fingernails."[3]

Yet on this subject I saw, some years ago, a personage whose memory I hold in singular esteem go and publish, in the midst of our great ills, when there was neither law nor justice nor magistrate doing its duty—any more than there is now—I know not what paltry reforms concerning clothes, cooking and legal chicanery. These are toys with which a mistreated people is fed, to show that it has not been wholly forgotten. Those others do the same who insist with all urgency on forbidding certain ways of speaking, dances and games to a people abandoned to every sort of execrable vice.

It is no time to wash and scrub yourself when you are in the grip of a good fever. Only the Spartans would set about combing and dressing their hair at the very moment they were about to hurl themselves into some extreme peril of their lives. As for 3 Philotimus was a Greek physician; the anecdote comes from Plutarch.

FRENCH

que si i'ay vn escarpin de trauers, ie laisse encores de trauers, et ma chemise et ma cappe: ie desdaigne de m'amender à demy. Quand ie suis en mauuais estat, ie m'acharne au mal. Ie m'abandonne par desespoir, et me laisse aller vers la cheute, et iette, comme lon dit, le manche apres la coignee. Ie m'obstine à l'empirement: et ne m'estime plus digne de mon soing. Ou tout bien ou tout mal.

Ce m'est faueur, que la desolation de cet estat, se rencontre à la desolation de mon aage. Ie souffre plus volontiers, que mes maux en soient rechargez, que si mes biens en eussent esté troublez. Les paroles que i'exprime au mal-heur, sont paroles de despit. Mon courage se herisse au lieu de s'applatir. Et au rebours des autres, ie me trouue plus deuost, en la bonne, qu'en la mauuaise fortune: suyuant le precepte de Xenophon, sinon suyuant sa raison. Et fais plus volontiers les doux yeux au ciel, pour le remercier, que pour le requerir. I'ay plus de soing d'augmenter la santé, quand elle me rit, que ie n'ay de la remettre, quand ie l'ay escartee.

Les prosperitez me seruent de discipline et d'instruction, comme aux autres, les aduersitez et les verges. Comme si la bonne fortune estoit incompatible auec la bonne conscience: les hommes ne se rendent gents de bien, qu'en la mauuaise. Le bon heur m'est vn singulier aiguillon, à la moderation, et modestie. La priere me gaigne, la menace me rebute, la faueur me ploye, la crainte me roydit. Parmy les conditions humaines, cette-cy est assez commune, de nous plaire plus des choses estrangeres que des nostres, et d'aymer le remuement et le changement. Ipsa dies ideo nos grato perluit haustu, / Quód permutatis hora recurrit equis. I'en tiens ma part.

Ceux qui suyuent l'autre extremité, de s'aggreer en eux-mesmes: d'estimer ce qu'ils tiennent au dessus du reste: et de ne recognoistre aucune forme plus belle, que celle qu'ils voyent: s'ils ne sont plus aduisez que nous, ils sont à la verité plus heureux. Ie n'enuie point leur sagesse, mais ouy leur bonne fortune. Cette humeur auide des choses nouuelles et incognues, ayde bien à nourrir en moy, le desir de voyager: mais assez d'autres circonstances y conferent. Ie me destourne volontiers du gouuernement de ma maison. Il y a quelque commodité à commander, fust ce dans vne grange, et à estre obey des me, I have this other, worse habit: if one of my slippers is on crooked, I leave my shirt and my cloak crooked too; I disdain to mend myself by halves. When I am in a bad way, I throw myself into the ill. I abandon myself in despair and let myself slide toward the fall, and throw, as they say, the handle after the axe. I persist in getting worse, and no longer think myself worth my own care. Either all good or all bad.

ENGLISH

It is a favor to me that the desolation of this state coincides with the desolation of my age. I more readily accept that my ills should be added to by it than I would if my goods had been disturbed by it. The words I utter in misfortune are words of spite. My heart bristles instead of lying flat. And contrary to others, I find myself more devout in good fortune than in bad, following the precept of Xenophon, if not his reasoning. And I more readily make sweet eyes at heaven to thank it than to petition it. I take more care to increase my health when it smiles on me than to restore it when I have lost it.[4]

Prosperity serves me as discipline and instruction, as adversity and the rod serve others. As if good fortune were incompatible with a good conscience, men become good only in bad fortune. Good luck is a singular spur to me toward moderation and modesty. Entreaty wins me, threats repel me; favor bends me, fear stiffens me. Among human traits this one is fairly common: to be more pleased with other people's things than with our own, and to love movement and change. The daylight itself delights us with its welcome draught for this reason, / that the hour comes round with changed horses. I have my share of it.[5]

Those who follow the other extreme—being pleased with themselves, valuing what they possess above all else, and recognizing no form more beautiful than the one they see—if they are not wiser than we are, they are in truth happier. I do not envy their wisdom, but I do envy their good fortune. This temperament, greedy for new and unknown things, does much to feed in me the desire to travel; but plenty of other circumstances contribute to it. I readily turn away from managing my household. There is some satisfaction in 4 In the Cyropaedia Xenophon advises praying to the gods in prosperity so as to be heard by them in adversity.

5 Petronius.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
siens. Mais c'est vn plaisir trop vniforme et languissant. Et puis il est par necessité meslé de plusieurs pensements fascheux.	commanding, even if only in a barn, and in being obeyed by one's own people. But it is too monotonous and languid a pleasure. And then it is necessarily mixed with many vexing thoughts.
Tantost l'indigence et l'oppression de vostre peuple: tantost la querelle d'entre vos voysins: tantost l'vsurpation qu'ils font sur vous, vous afflige: Aut verberatæ grandine vineæ, Fundusque mendax, arbore nunc aquas Culpante, nunc torrentia agros Sydera, nunc hyemes iniquas. Et qu'à peine en six mois, enuoyera Dieu vne saison, dequoy vostre receueur se contente bien à plain: et que si elle sert aux vignes, elle ne nuyse aux prez. Aut nimiis torret feruoribus ætherius sol, Aut subiti perimunt imbres, gelidæque pruinæ, Flabràque ventorum violento turbine vexant. Ioinct le soulier neuf, et bien formé, de cet homme du temps passé, qui vous blesse le pied.	Now it is the poverty and oppression of your people, now a quarrel between your neighbors, now their encroachments on you, that afflict you: Or vines beaten down by hail, and the farm that betrays its promise, the trees blaming now the rains, now the stars that scorch the fields, now the cruel winters. And the fact that in six months God will scarcely send one season that fully satisfies your steward, or one that, if it is good for the vines, does not harm the meadows: Either the sun in the heavens scorches with excessive heat, or sudden rains and icy frosts destroy, and blasts of wind harry with violent whirlwinds. Add to this the new, well-made shoe of that man of olden times, which pinches your foot.[6]
Et que l'estranger n'entend pas, combien il vous couste, et combien vous prestez, à maintenir l'apparence de cet ordre, qu'on void en vostre famille: et qu'à l'auanture l'achetez vous trop cher.	And the fact that outsiders do not understand how much it costs you, and how much you contribute, to keep up the appearance of the order seen in your household; and that perhaps you pay too dear for it.

RUNNING A HOUSEHOLD

Montaigne dislikes managing his estate, whose small domestic thorns sting him more than great ills.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.3 Ie me suis pris tard au mesnage. Ceux que Nature auoit fait naistre auant moy, m'en ont deschargé long temps. I'auois des-ja pris vn autre ply, plus selon ma complexion. Toutesfois de ce que i'en ay veu, c'est vn' occupation plus empeschante, que difficile. Quiconque est capable d'autre chose, le sera bien aysément de celle là. Si ie cherchois à m'enrichir, cette voye me sembleroit trop longue. I'eusse seruy les Roys, trafique plus fertile que toute autre.	I took up household management late. Those whom Nature had caused to be born before me relieved me of it for a long time. I had already taken another bent, more in keeping with my constitution. Still, from what I have seen of it, it is an occupation more bothersome than difficult. Anyone capable of anything else will very easily be capable of that. If I were seeking to grow rich, this road would seem too long to me. I would have served kings, a more profitable trade than any other.
Puis que ie ne pretens acquerir que la reputation de n'auoir rien acquis, non plus que dissipé: conformément au reste de ma vie, impropre à faire bien et à faire mal qui vaille: et que ie ne cherche qu'à passer, ie le puis faire,	Since I aim to acquire only the reputation of having acquired nothing, nor squandered anything either—in keeping with the rest of my life, unfit for doing either good or ill of any account—and since I

6 The verses are from Horace, Odes, and Lucretius, On the Nature of Things. The shoe is that of the Roman in Plutarch who, divorcing his wife, said that no one but the wearer knows where a fine shoe pinches.

FRENCH

Dieu mercy, sans grande attention. Au pis aller, courez tousiours par retranchement de despence, deuant la pauureté. C'est à quoy ie m'attends, et de me reformer, auant qu'elle m'y force. I'ay estably au demeurant, en mon ame, assez de degrez, à me passer de moins, que ce que i'ay. Ie dis, passer auec contentement.

Non æstimatione census, verùm victu atque cultu, terminatur pecuniæ modus. Mon vray besoing n'occupe pas si iustement tout mon auoir, que sans venir au vif, Fortune n'ait où mordre sur moy. Ma presence, toute ignorante et desdaigneuse qu'elle est, preste grande espaule à mes affaires domestiques. Ie m'y employe, mais despiteusement. Ioinct que i'ay cela chez moy, que pour brusler à part, la chandelle par mon bout, l'autre bout ne s'espargne de rien.

3.9.4 Les voyages ne me blessent que par la despence, qui est grande, et outre mes forces: ayant accoustumé d'y estre auec equippage non necessaire seulement, mais aussi honneste. Il me les en faut faire d'autant plus courts et moins frequents: et n'y employe que l'escume, et ma reserue, temporisant et differant, selon qu'elle vient. Ie ne veux pas, que le plaisir de me promener, corrompe le plaisir de me retirer. Au rebours, i'entends qu'ils se nourrissent, et fauorisent l'vn l'autre. La Fortune m'a aydé en cecy: que puis que ma principale profession en cette vie, estoit de la viure mollement, et plustost laschement qu'affaireusement; elle m'a osté le besoing de multiplier en richesses, pour pouruoir à la multitude de mes heritiers.

Pour vn, s'il n'a assez de ce, dequoy i'ay eu si plantureusement assez, à son dam. Son imprudence ne meritera pas, que ie luy en desire d'auantage. Et chascun, selon l'exemple de Phocion, pouruoid suffisamment à ses enfants, qui leur pouruoid, en tant qu'ils ne luy sont dissemblables. Nullement seroy-ie d'aduis du faict de Crates. Il laissa son argent chez vn banquier, auec cette condition: si ses enfants estoient des sots, qu'il le leur donnast; s'ils estoient habiles, qu'il le distribuast aux plus sots du peuple. Comme si les sots, pour estre moins capables de s'en passer, estoient plus capables d'vser des richesses.

Tant y a, que le dommage qui vient de mon absence, ne me semble point meriter, pendant que i'auroy dequoy le seek only to get by, I can do it, thank God, without much attention. At worst, always run ahead of poverty by cutting expenses. That is what I am counting on: to reform myself before it forces me to. Besides, I have set up in my soul enough steps for doing with less than I have. I mean doing with it contentedly.

ENGLISH

It is not by the assessment of one's property but by one's way of living and keeping that the measure of wealth is fixed. My real need does not take up all my property so exactly that Fortune has nowhere to bite me without cutting to the quick. My presence, ignorant and disdainful as it is, lends great support to my domestic affairs. I apply myself to them, but grudgingly. Besides, in my house it is so arranged that, for all I burn the candle at my own end, the other end is not spared in the least.[7]

Travel hurts me only through the expense, which is great and beyond my means, since I am used to traveling with a retinue that is not only necessary but also respectable. So I must make my journeys all the shorter and less frequent, and I spend on them only the skimmings and my reserve, waiting and postponing according as it comes in. I do not want the pleasure of roaming to spoil the pleasure of retirement. On the contrary, I intend them to nourish and favor each other. Fortune has helped me in this: since my principal profession in this life was to live it softly, and lazily rather than busily, she has spared me the need to multiply my riches to provide for a multitude of heirs.

As for my one heir: if he does not have enough of what I have had so plentifully enough of, so much the worse for him. His imprudence will not deserve my wishing him more. And everyone, following the example of Phocion, provides sufficiently for his children who provides for them insofar as they are not unlike him. I would by no means approve of what Crates did. He left his money with a banker on this condition: if his children were fools, he was to give it to them; if they were capable, he was to distribute it among the biggest fools of the people. As if fools, being less able to do without riches, were more able to use them.

Be that as it may, the damage that comes from my absence does not seem to me to warrant, as long porter, que ie refuse d'accepter les occasions qui se presentent, de me distraire de cette assistance penible.

FRENCH

3.9.5 Il y a tousiours quelque piece qui va de trauers. Les negoces, tantost d'vne maison, tantost d'vne autre, vous tirassent. Vous esclairez toutes choses de trop pres. Votre perspicacité vous nuit icy, comme si fait elle assez ailleurs. Ie me desrobe aux occasions de me fascher: et me destourne de la cognoissance des choses, qui vont mal. Et si ne puis tant faire, qu'à toute heure ie ne heurte chez moy, en quelque rencontre, qui me desplaise. Et les fripponneries, qu'on me cache le plus, sont celles que ie sçay le mieux. Il en est que pour faire moins mal, il faut ayder soy mesme à cacher. Vaines pointures: vaines par fois, mais tousiours pointures. Les plus menus et graisles empeschemens, sont les plus persans.

Et comme les petites lettres lassent plus les yeux, aussi nous piquent plus les petits affaires: la tourbe des menus maux, offence plus, que la violence d'vn, pour grand qu'il soit. A mesure que ces espines domestiques sont drues et desliees, elles nous mordent plus aigu, et sans menace, nous surprenant facilement à l'impourueu. Ie ne suis pas philosophe. Les maux me foullent selon qu'ils poisent: et poisent selon la forme, comme selon la matiere: et souuent plus. I'y ay plus de perspicacité que le vulgaire, si i'y ay plus de patience. En fin s'ils ne me blessent, ils me poisent. C'est chose tendre que la vie, et aysee à troubler.

Depuis que i'ay le visage tourné vers le chagrin, nemo enim resistit sibi cùm cœperit impelli, pour sotte cause qui m'y ayt porté: i'irrite l'humeur de ce costé là: qui se nourrit apres, et s'exaspere, de son propre branle, attirant et ammoncellant vne matiere sur autre, dequoy se paistre. Stillicidi casus lapidem cauat. Ces ordinaires goutieres me mangent, et m'vlcerent. Les inconuenients ordinaires ne sont iamais legers. Ils sont continuels et irreparables, quand ils naissent des membres du mesnage, continuels et inseparables. Quand ie considere mes affaires de loing, et en gros; ie trouue, soit pour n'en auoir la memoire gueres exacte, qu'ils sont allez iusques à cette heure, en prosperant, outre mes contes et mes raisons.

ENGLISH

as I have the means to bear it, my refusing the opportunities that come up to get away from this tiresome attendance.

There is always some piece going awry. Business, now from one house, now from another, tugs at you. You see everything from too close. Your sharp-sightedness harms you here, as it does often enough elsewhere. I slip away from occasions for vexation, and turn away from knowing about things that are going badly. And yet I cannot manage it so well that at every hour I do not bump into something at home that displeases me. And the knaveries most hidden from me are the ones I know best. There are some that, to make things less bad, you must help to hide yourself. Vain stings—vain at times, but always stings. The smallest and slenderest hindrances are the most piercing.

And just as small print tires the eyes more, so small matters sting us more: a throng of petty ills offends more than the violence of one, however great. The thicker and finer these domestic thorns are, the more sharply they bite us, and without warning, easily catching us unawares. I am not a philosopher. Ills crush me according to their weight; and they weigh according to their form as well as their matter, and often more. I see into them more keenly than ordinary people do, and yet I also have more patience. In short, if they do not wound me, they weigh on me. Life is a tender thing, and easily disturbed.

Once my face is turned toward vexation—for no one resists himself once he has begun to be pushed—however silly the cause that brought me there, I provoke my temper in that direction, and afterward it feeds itself and grows exasperated by its own motion, drawing in and heaping up one material on another to feed on. The falling of drops hollows the stone. These ordinary drippings eat away at me and ulcerate me. Ordinary troubles are never light. They are continual and irreparable, especially when they arise from members of the household, who are continual and inseparable. When I consider my affairs from afar and as a whole, I find—perhaps because I do not remember them very exactly—that up to now they have gone on prospering beyond my reckonings and calculations.[8]

7 Cicero, Paradoxes of the Stoics.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

I'en retire ce me semble plus, qu'il n'y en a: leur bon heur me trahit. Mais suis-ie au dedans de la besongne, voy-ie marcher toutes ces parcelles? Tum verò in curas animum diducimur omnes: mille choses m'y donnent à desirer et craindre. De les abandonner du tout, il m'est tres-facile: de m'y prendre sans m'en peiner, tres-difficile. C'est pitié, d'estre en lieu où tout ce que vous voyez, vous embesongne, et vous concerne. Et me semble iouyr plus gayement les plaisirs d'vne maison estrangere, et y apporter le goust plus libre et pur. Diogenes respondit selon moy, à celuy qui luy demanda quelle sorte de vin il trouuoit le meilleur: L'estranger, feit il.

I get more out of them, it seems to me, than there is in them: their good luck deceives me. But when I am inside the work, and see all these little parts moving—Then indeed our mind is pulled apart into every care—a thousand things there make me wish and fear. To abandon them altogether is very easy for me; to take them on without fretting, very hard. It is a pitiful thing to be in a place where everything you see keeps you busy and concerns you. And I seem to enjoy the pleasures of another man's house more gaily, and to bring to them a freer and purer taste. Diogenes answered as I would to the man who asked him what kind of wine he found best: "Someone else's," he said.[9]

3.9.6 Mon pere aymoit à bastir Montaigne, où il estoit nay: et en toute cette police d'affaires domestiques, i'ayme à me seruir de son exemple, et de ses regles; et y attacheray mes successeurs autant que ie pourray. Si ie pouuois mieux pour luy, ie le feroys. Ie me glorifie que sa volonté s'exerce encores, et agisse par moy. Ia Dieu ne permette que ie laisse faillir entre mes mains, aucune image de vie, que ie puisse rendre à vn si bon pere. Ce que ie me suis meslé d'acheuer quelque vieux pan de mur, et de renger quelque piece de bastiment mal dolé, ç'a esté certes, regardant plus à son intention, qu'à mon contentement.

My father loved building at Montaigne, where he was born; and in all this administration of domestic affairs I like to follow his example and his rules, and I shall bind my successors to them as far as I can. If I could do better for him, I would. I take pride that his will still operates and acts through me. God forbid that I should let fail in my hands any image of life that I can give back to so good a father. Whatever I have taken it upon myself to do in finishing some old section of wall, or putting in order some badly hewn part of the building, has certainly been more out of regard for his intention than for my own satisfaction.[10]

Et accuse ma faineance, de n'auoir passé outre, à parfaire les commencements qu'il a laissez en sa maison: d'autant plus, que ie suis en grands termes d'en estre le dernier possesseur de ma race, et d'y porter la derniere main. Car quant à mon application particuliere, ny ce plaisir de bastir, qu'on dit estre si attrayant, ny la chasse, ny les iardins, ny ces autres plaisirs de la vie retiree, ne me peuuent beaucoup amuser. C'est chose dequoy ie me veux mal, comme de toutes autres opinions qui me sont incommodes. Ie ne me soucie pas tant de les auoir vigoureuses et doctes, comme ie me soucie de les auoir aisees et commodes à la vie.

And I blame my idleness for not having gone further and completed what he began in his house—all the more since I am very likely to be the last owner of it of my line, and to put the last hand to it. For as for my own inclination, neither this pleasure of building, which they say is so attractive, nor hunting, nor gardens, nor the other pleasures of the retired life can amuse me much. That is something I hold against myself, as I do all my other opinions that are inconvenient to me. I do not care so much to have them vigorous and learned as I care to have them easy and convenient for living.

Elles sont bien assez vrayes et saines, si elles sont vtiles et aggreables. Ceux qui m'oyans dire mon insuffisance aux occupations du mesnage, me viennent souffler aux

They are true and sound enough if they are useful and agreeable. Those who, hearing me speak of my incompetence in household matters, come

8 Seneca, Letters, and Lucretius.
9 Virgil, Aeneid.
10 Pierre Eyquem enlarged and rebuilt the family house.

FRENCH

oreilles que c'est desdaing, et que ie laisse de sçauoir les instrumens du labourage, ses saisons, son ordre, comment on fait mes vins, comme on ente, et de sçauoir le nom et la forme des herbes et des fruicts, et l'apprest des viandes, dequoy ie vis: le nom et prix des estoffes, de quoy ie m'abille, pour auoir à cœur quelque plus haute science, ils me font mourir. Cela, c'est sottise: et plustost bestise, que gloire. Ie m'aymerois mieux bon escuyer, que bon logicien.

Quin tu aliquid saltem potius quorum indiget vsus, / Viminibus mollique paras detexere iunco? Nous empeschons noz pensees du general, et des causes et conduittes vniuerselles: qui se conduisent tresbien sans nous: et laissons en arriere nostre faict: et Michel, qui nous touche encore de plus pres que l'homme.

3.9.7 Or i'arreste bien chez moy le plus ordinairement: mais ie voudrois m'y plaire plus qu'ailleurs. Sit meæ sedes vtinam senectæ,
Sit modus lasso maris, et viarum,
Militiæque! Ie ne sçay si i'en viendray à bout. Ie voudrois qu'au lieu de quelque autre piece de sa succession, mon pere m'eut resigné cette passionnee amour, qu'en ses vieux ans il portoit à son mesnage. Il estoit bien heureux, de ramener ses desirs, à sa fortune, et de se sçauoir plaire de ce qu'il auoit. La philosophie politique aura bel accuser la bassesse et sterilité de mon occupation, si i'en puis vne fois prendre le goust, comme luy.

Ie suis de cet auis, que la plus honorable vacation, est de seruir au publiq, et estre vtile à beaucoup. Fructus enim ingenij et virtutis, omnisque præstantiæ tum maximus accipitur, quum in proximum quemque confertur. Pour mon regard ie m'en despars: partie par conscience: (car par où ie vois le poix qui touche telles vacations, ie vois aussi le peu de moyen que i'ay d'y fournir: et Platon maistre ouurier en tout gouuernement politique, ne laissa de s'en abstenir) partie par poltronerie. Ie me contente de iouïr le monde, sans m'en empresser: de viure vne vie, seulement excusable: et qui seulement ne poise, ny à moy, ny à autruy.

3.9.8 Iamais homme ne se laissa aller plus plainement et plus laschement, au soing et gouuernement d'vn tiers, que ie whispering in my ear that it is disdain, and that I neglect to know the tools of farming, its seasons, its order, how my wines are made, how grafting is done, and to know the names and forms of the plants and fruits, and the preparation of the foods I live on, the names and prices of the cloth I dress in, because I have set my heart on some higher science—they are the death of me. That is foolishness, and stupidity rather than glory. I would rather be a good horseman than a good logician.

ENGLISH

Why not rather set about weaving at least something that need requires, / out of osiers and soft rushes? We encumber our thoughts with the general, and with universal causes and workings, which run perfectly well without us; and we leave behind our own business, and Michel, who touches us even more closely than man does.

Now I do stay at home most of the time, but I would like to take more pleasure in it than anywhere else. Would that it might be the home of my old age, the end for one weary of sea and roads and soldiering! I do not know whether I shall manage it. I wish that, instead of some other part of his estate, my father had handed down to me the passionate love he bore for his household in his old age. He was very happy to bring his desires down to the level of his fortune, and to know how to be pleased with what he had. Political philosophy may condemn the lowliness and barrenness of my occupation all it likes, if I can once acquire a taste for it, as he did.

I am of the opinion that the most honorable calling is to serve the public and be useful to many. For the fruits of talent, of virtue and of every excellence are most fully reaped when they are bestowed on those nearest us. For my part, I hold back from it: partly out of conscience (for just as I see the weight that bears on such callings, I also see how little means I have to meet it; and Plato, a master craftsman in all political government, nonetheless abstained from it), partly out of cowardice. I am content to enjoy the world without bustling about in it; to live a life that is merely excusable, and that merely does not burden either me or anyone else.

Never did a man let himself go more completely and more limply into the care and governance of ferois, si i'auois à qui. L'vn de mes souhaits pour cette heure, ce seroit de trouuer vn gendre, qui sçeust appaster commodément mes vieux ans, et les endormir: entre les mains de qui ie deposasse en toute souuerainеté, la conduite et vsage de mes biens: qu'il en fist ce que i'en fais, et gaignast sur moy ce que i'y gaigne: pourueu qu'il y apportast vn courage vrayement recognoissant, et amy. Mais quoy? nous viuons en vn monde, où la loyauté des propres enfans est incognue.	someone else than I would, if I had someone to do it. One of my wishes at present would be to find a son-in-law who could comfortably feed my old age and lull it to sleep; into whose hands I might deposit, in full sovereignty, the management and use of my property; let him do with it what I do, and gain from me what I gain from it, provided he brought to it a truly grateful and friendly heart. But what can you do? We live in a world where loyalty is unknown even in one's own children.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH

TRUSTING SERVANTS

He lets others keep his purse and prefers not knowing to suspicion and constant accounting.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.9	Qui a la garde de ma bourse en voyage, il l'a pure et sans contrerolle: aussi bien me tromperoit il en comptant. Et si ce n'est vn diable, ie l'oblige à bien faire, par vne si abandonnee confiance. Multi fallere docuerunt, dum timent falli, et aliis ius peccandi suspicando fecerunt. La plus commune seureté, que ie prens de mes gens, c'est la mescognoissance. Ie ne presume les vices qu'apres que ie les aye veuz: et m'en fie plus aux ieunes, que i'estime moins gastez par mauuais exemple. I'oy plus volontiers dire, au bout de deux mois, que i'ay despandu quatre cens escus, que d'auoir les oreilles battues tous les soirs, de trois, cinq, sept.	Whoever keeps my purse when I travel has it entirely and without audit; he could cheat me in his reckoning anyway. And unless he is a devil, I oblige him to behave well by so unreserved a trust. Many have taught others to deceive by fearing to be deceived, and by suspecting them have given them the right to do wrong. The commonest security I take with my people is not knowing. I do not presume vices until I have seen them, and I trust the young more, thinking them less spoiled by bad example. I would rather hear at the end of two months that I have spent four hundred crowns than have my ears battered every evening with three, five, seven.
	Si ay-ie esté desrobé aussi peu qu'vn autre de cette sorte de larrecin. Il est vray, que ie preste la main à l'ignorance. Ie nourris à escient, aucunement trouble et incertaine la science de mon argent. Iusques à certaine mesure, ie suis content, d'en pouuoir doubter. Il faut laisser vn peu de place à la desloyauté, ou imprudence de vostre valet. S'il nous en reste en gros, dequoy faire nostre effect, cet excez de la liberalité de la Fortune, laissons le vn peu plus courre à sa mercy. La portion du glanneur. Apres tout, ie ne prise pas tant la foy de mes gents, comme ie mesprise leur iniure. O le vilain et sot estude, d'estudier son argent, se plaire à le manier et recomter!	And yet I have been robbed in this way as little as anyone. It is true that I lend a hand to my own ignorance. I deliberately keep my knowledge of my money somewhat muddled and uncertain. Up to a certain point I am content to be able to doubt it. You must leave a little room for your servant's dishonesty or carelessness. If on the whole we have enough left to do what we need, let us leave this surplus of Fortune's liberality to run a little more at her mercy. The gleaner's share. After all, I do not prize my people's honesty as much as I make light of the wrongs they do me. Oh, what a vile and stupid study, to study one's money, to take pleasure in handling it and counting it over!
	c'est par là, que l'auarice faict ses approches.	it is by that path that avarice makes its approaches.
3.9.10	Dépuis dix huict ans, que ie gouuerne des biens, ie n'ay sçeu gaigner sur moy, de voir, ny tiltres, ny mes principaux affaires qui ont necessairement à passer par	In the eighteen years I have been managing property, I have never been able to bring myself to look at either the title deeds or my principal affairs, ma science, et par mon soing. Ce n'est pas vn mespris philosophique, des choses transitoires et mondaines: ie n'ay pas le goust si espuré, et les prise pour le moins ce qu'elles valent: mais certes c'est paresse et negligence inexcusable et puerile. Que ne feroy ie plustost que de lire vn contract? Et plustost, que d'aller secoüant ces paperasses poudreuses, serf de mes negoces? ou encore pis, de ceux d'autruy, comme font tant de gents à prix d'argent? Ie n'ay rien cher que le soucy et la peine: et ne cherche qu'à m'anonchalir et auachir.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

which must necessarily pass through my knowledge and my care. It is not a philosophical contempt for transitory and worldly things: my taste is not so refined, and I value them at least at what they are worth. No, it is certainly an inexcusable and childish laziness and negligence. What would I not do rather than read a contract? Rather than go shaking out those dusty papers, a slave to my own business? Or, worse still, to other people's, as so many do for money? Nothing costs me as dear as care and trouble, and I seek only to grow slack and idle.

I'estoy, ce croy-je, plus propre, à viure de la fortune d'autruy, s'il se pouuoit, sans obligation et sans seruitude. Et si ne sçay, à l'examiner de pres, si selon mon humeur et mon sort, ce que i'ay à souffrir des affaires, et des seruiteurs, et des domestiques, n'a point plus d'abiection, d'importunité, et d'aigreur, que n'auroit la suitte d'vn homme, nay plus grand que moy, qui me guidast vn peu à mon aise. Seruitus obedientia est fracti animi et abiecti, arbitrio carentis suo. Crates fit pis, qui se ietta en la franchise de la pauureté, pour se deffaire des indignitez et cures de la maison. Cela ne ferois-ie pas.

I was better suited, I believe, to live on someone else's fortune, if that could be done without obligation and without servitude. And yet, looking at it closely, I do not know whether, given my temperament and my lot, what I have to put up with from my affairs, my servants and my household does not involve more abjection, importunity and bitterness than following in the train of a man born greater than I, who would guide me a little at my ease. Servitude is the obedience of a broken and abject spirit that lacks a will of its own. Crates did worse: he threw himself into the freedom of poverty to rid himself of the indignities and cares of a household. That I would not do.

Ie hay la pauureté à pair de la douleur: mais ouy bien, changer cette sorte de vie, à vne autre moins braue, et moins affaireuse.

I hate poverty as much as pain. But I would indeed exchange this kind of life for another less grand and less busy.

3.9.11 Absent, ie me despouille de tous tels pensemens: et sentirois moins lors la ruyne d'vne tour, que ie ne fais present, la cheute d'vne ardoyse. Mon ame se démesle bien ayséement à part, mais en presence, elle souffre, comme celle d'vn vigneron. Vne rene de trauers à mon cheual, vn bout d'estriuiere qui batte ma iambe, me tiendront tout vn iour en eschec. I'esleue assez mon courage à l'encontre des inconueniens, les yeux, ie ne puis. Sensus! ô superi sensus!

When I am away, I strip myself of all such thoughts, and I would then feel the collapse of a tower less than I feel, when present, the fall of a slate. My mind disentangles itself easily when it is apart, but on the spot it suffers like a vinedresser's. A rein crooked on my horse, an end of stirrup leather flapping against my leg, will keep me out of sorts a whole day. I can raise my courage well enough against misfortunes; my eyes, I cannot. O senses! O gods above, the senses!

3.9.12 Ie suis chez moy, respondant de tout ce qui va mal. Peu de maistres, ie parle de ceux de moyenne condition, comme est la mienne: et s'il en est, ils sont plus heureux: se peuuent tant reposer, sur vn second, qu'il ne leur reste bonne part de la charge. Cela oste volontiers quelque chose de ma façon, au traittement des suruenants: et en ay peu arrester quelcun par aduenture plus par ma cuisine, que par ma grace: comme font les fascheux: et

At home I am answerable for everything that goes wrong. Few masters—I mean those of middling station like mine, and if there are any, they are luckier—can rely so much on a deputy that a good part of the burden does not remain on them. This tends to take something away from my manner in receiving visitors; and I may perhaps have kept someone there more by my cooking than by my graciousness, as tiresome people do; and it takes oste beaucoup du plaisir que ie deurois prendre chez moy, de la visitation et assemblees de mes amys.

FRENCH

La plus sotte contenance d'vn Gentil-homme en sa maison, c'est de le voir empesché du train de sa police: parler à l'oreille d'vn valet, en menacer vn autre des yeux. Elle doit couler insensiblement, et representer vn cours ordinaire. Et treuue laid, qu'on entretienne ses hostes, du traictement qu'on leur fait, autant à l'excuser qu'à le vanter. I'ayme l'ordre et la netteté, Et cantharus et lanx / Ostendunt mihi me, au prix de l'abondance: et regarde chez moy exactement à la necessité, peu à la parade. Si vn valet se bat chez autruy, si vn plat se verse, vous n'en faites que rire: vous dormez ce pendant que monsieur renge auec son maistre d'hostel, son faict, pour vostre traictement du lendemain. I'en parle selon moy.

Ne laissant pas en general d'estimer, combien c'est vn doux amusement à certaines natures, qu'vn mesnage paisible, prospere, conduict par vn ordre reglé. Et ne voulant attacher à la chose, mes propres erreurs et inconuenients. Ny desdire Platon, qui estime la plus heureuse occupation à chascun, faire ses particuliers affaires sans iniustice.

3.9.13 Quand ie voyage, ie n'ay à penser qu'à moy, et à l'emploicte de mon argent: cela se dispose d'vn seul precepte. Il est requis trop de parties à amasser: ie n'y entens rien. A despendre, ie m'y entens vn peu, et à donner iour à ma despence: qui est de vray son principal vsage. Mais ie m'y attens trop ambitieusement; qui la rend inegalle et difforme: et en outre immoderee en l'vn et l'autre visage. Si elle paroist, si elle sert, ie m'y laisse indiscretement aller: et me resserre autant indiscretement, si elle ne luyt, et si elle ne me rit.

Qui que ce soit, ou art, ou nature, qui nous imprime cette condition de viure, par la relation à autruy, nous fait beaucoup plus de mal que de bien. Nous nous defraudons de nos propres vtilitez, pour former les apparences à l'opinion commune. Il ne nous chaut pas tant, quel soit nostre estre, en nous, et en effect, comme quel il soit, en la cognoissance publique. Les biens mesmes de l'esprit, et la sagesse, nous semblent sans fruict, si elle n'est iouye que de nous: si elle ne se produict à la veuë et approbation estrangere. Il y en a, de qui l'or coulle à gros bouillons, par des lieux sousterreins, imperceptiblement: d'autres l'estendent tout en lames et en feuilles.

ENGLISH

away much of the pleasure I ought to have at home from the visits and gatherings of my friends.

The silliest figure a gentleman can cut in his own house is to be seen preoccupied with running his establishment, whispering in one servant's ear, threatening another with his eyes. It should all flow imperceptibly and look like the ordinary course of things. And I find it unseemly to entertain one's guests with talk of how they are being treated, whether to excuse it or to boast of it. I love order and cleanliness—and the tankard and the dish / show me myself—rather than abundance; and at home I look carefully to what is necessary, little to show. If a servant gets into a fight in someone else's house, if a dish is upset, you only laugh; you sleep while the master of the house goes over his arrangements with his steward for your entertainment the next day. I speak for myself.

Not that I fail, in general, to recognize what a sweet pastime a peaceful, prosperous household, run in an orderly way, is for certain natures. Nor do I want to pin my own failings and inconveniences on the thing itself. Nor to contradict Plato, who considers the happiest occupation for each person to be conducting his own affairs without injustice.

When I travel, I have only myself to think about, and the use of my money; that is settled by a single precept. Amassing requires too many qualities: I know nothing about it. Spending I understand a little, and letting my spending be seen—which is in truth its principal use. But I go about it too ambitiously, which makes it uneven and misshapen, and moreover immoderate in both directions. If it shows, if it serves, I let myself go indiscreetly; and I tighten up just as indiscreetly if it does not shine and does not smile on me.

Whatever it is, art or nature, that has stamped on us this condition of living by reference to others, it does us much more harm than good. We cheat ourselves of our own advantages to shape appearances to common opinion. We care less what our being is in ourselves and in reality than what it is in public knowledge. Even the goods of the mind, and wisdom, seem fruitless to us if they are enjoyed only by ourselves, if they are not displayed to the sight and approval of others. There are some whose gold flows in great streams through underground channels, imperceptibly; others beat it all out into plates and leaves.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Si qu'aux vns les liars valent escuz, aux autres le contraire: le monde estimant l'emploite et la valeur, selon la montre. Tout soing curieux autour des richesses sent à l'auarice. Leur dispensation mesme, et la liberalité trop ordonnee et artificielle: elles ne valent pas vne aduertance et sollicitude penible. Qui veut faire sa despense iuste, la fait estroitte et contrainte. La garde, ou l'emploitte, sont de soy choses indifferentes, et ne prennent couleur de bien ou de mal, que selon l'application de nostre volonté.

So that for some, farthings pass for crowns, and for others the reverse, since the world judges use and value by show. All overcareful attention to riches smacks of avarice. Even giving them out, and a liberality that is too regulated and contrived—riches are not worth painful heed and anxiety. Whoever wants to make his spending exactly right makes it narrow and constrained. Keeping and spending are in themselves indifferent, and take on the color of good or evil only according to how our will applies them.

LIVING AMONG CIVIL WARS

The corruption of the age is another reason to travel; yet societies hold together despite their vices.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.9.14 L'autre cause qui me conuie à ces promenades, c'est la disconuenance aux mœurs presentes de nostre estat: ie me consolerois aysement de cette corruption, pour le regard de l'interest public: Peioraque sæcula ferri Temporibus, quorum sceleri non inuenit ipsa Nomen, et à nullo posuit natura metallo: mais pour le mien, non. I'en suis en particulier trop pressé. Car en mon voisinage, nous sommes tantost par la longue licence de ces guerres ciuiles, enuieillis en vne forme d'estat si desbordee, Quippe vbi fas versum atque nefas: qu'à la verité, c'est merueille qu'elle se puisse maintenir.

The other cause that invites me on these outings is my disagreement with the present morals of our state. I would easily console myself for this corruption as far as the public interest is concerned—Ages worse than the times of iron, for whose wickedness nature herself has found no name, nor named it after any metal—but as far as my own is concerned, no. It presses too hard on me personally. For in my neighborhood we have by now, through the long license of these civil wars, grown old in so unruly a form of state—where right and wrong are turned upside down—that it is truly a wonder it can hold together.[11]

Armati terram exercent, sempérque recentes / Conuectare iuuat prædas, et viuere rapto. En fin ie vois par nostre exemple, que la societé des hommes se tient et se coust, à quelque prix que ce soit. En quelque assiette qu'on les couche, ils s'appilent, et se rengent, en se remuant et s'entassant: comme des corps mal vnis qu'on empoche sans ordre, trouuent d'eux mesmes la façon de se ioindre, et s'emplacer, les vns parmy les autres: souuent mieux, que l'art ne les eust sçeu disposer. Le Roy Philippus fit vn amas, des plus meschans hommes et incorrigibles qu'il peut trouuer, et les logea tous en vne ville, qu'il leur fit bastir, qui en portoit le nom.

They work the land in arms, and always delight / in carrying off fresh plunder and living on what they seize. In short, I see by our example that human society holds and is stitched together at whatever cost. In whatever position you lay men down, they pile up and sort themselves out by shifting and crowding together, as ill-matched objects stuffed into a bag without order find by themselves the way to fit together and settle in among one another, often better than art could have arranged them. King Philip gathered together the most wicked and incorrigible men he could find and lodged them all in a city he had built for them, which bore their name.[12]

I'estime qu'ils dresserent des vices mesme, vne contexture politique entre eux, et vne commode et iuste

I suppose that out of their very vices they built a political structure among themselves, and a consocieté. Ie vois, non vne action, ou trois, ou cent, mais des mœurs, en vsage commun et reçeu, si farouches, en inhumanité sur tout et desloyauté, qui est pour moy la pire espece des vices, que ie n'ay point le courage de les conceuoir sans horreur: et les admire, quasi autant que ie les deteste. L'exercice de ces meschancetez insignes, porte marque de vigueur et force d'ame, autant que d'erreur et desreglement. La necessité compose les hommes et les assemble. Cette couture fortuite se forme apres en loix.

FRENCH

Car il en a esté d'aussi sauuages qu'aucune opinion humaine puisse enfanter, qui toutesfois ont maintenu leurs corps, auec autant de santé et longueur de vie, que celles de Platon et Aristote sçauroient faire. Et certes toutes ces descriptions de police, feintes par art, se trouuent ridicules, et ineptes à mettre en practique.

3.9.15 Ces grandes et longues altercations, de la meilleure forme de societé: et des regles plus commodes à nous attacher, sont altercations propres seulement à l'exercice de nostre esprit. Comme il se trouue és arts, plusieurs subiects qui ont leur essence en l'agitation et en la dispute, et n'ont aucune vie hors de là. Telle peinture de police, seroit de mise, en vn nouueau monde: mais nous prenons vn monde desia faict et formé à certaines coustumes. Nous ne l'engendrons pas comme Pyrrha, ou comme Cadmus. Par quelque moyen que nous ayons loy de le redresser, et renger de nouueau, nous ne pouuons gueres le tordre de son accoustumé ply, que nous ne rompions tout.

On demandoit à Solon, s'il auoit estably les meilleures loyx qu'il auoit peu aux Atheniens: Ouy bien, respondit-il, de celles qu'ils eussent receuës. Varro s'excuse de pareil air: Que s'il auoit tout de nouueau à escrire de la religion, il diroit ce, qu'il en croid. Mais, estant desia receuë, il en dira selon l'vsage, plus que selon nature.

ENGLISH

venient and just society. I see, not one action, or three, or a hundred, but morals in common and accepted use, so ferocious—in inhumanity above all, and in treachery, which is for me the worst kind of vice—that I have not the heart to think of them without horror; and I marvel at them almost as much as I detest them. The practice of these signal wickednesses bears the mark of vigor and strength of soul as much as of error and disorder. Necessity puts men together and assembles them. This chance stitching later takes shape as laws.

For there have been laws as wild as any human opinion could give birth to, which nonetheless kept their bodies politic in as much health and length of life as those of Plato and Aristotle could have done. And certainly all those descriptions of government invented by art prove ridiculous and unfit to put into practice.

These great and long disputes about the best form of society, and about the most convenient rules to bind us, are disputes fit only for exercising our minds—just as in the arts there are many subjects whose essence lies in agitation and dispute, and which have no life outside them. Such a picture of government would be in place in a new world; but we take a world already made and shaped to certain customs. We do not engender it as Pyrrha or Cadmus did. By whatever means we may have the right to straighten it and reorder it, we can hardly twist it out of its accustomed bend without breaking everything.[13]

Solon was asked whether he had given the Athenians the best laws he could: "Yes indeed," he replied, "the best of those they would have accepted." Varro excuses himself in a similar vein: if he were writing about religion afresh, he would say what he believes about it; but since it is already accepted, he will speak of it according to usage rather than according to nature.[14]

12 Philip II of Macedon; according to Plutarch the city was called Poneropolis, "City of the Wicked."
11 Juvenal, Satires.
13 After the Flood, Pyrrha and Deucalion repopulated the earth by throwing stones that became people; Cadmus sowed dragon's teeth from which armed men sprang.
14 Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BC), Roman scholar, quoted by Augustine in The City of God.

AGAINST INNOVATION

The best government is the one a nation already has; overturning a state to cure it usually kills it.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.16	Non par opinion, mais en verité, l'excellente et meilleure police, est à chacune nation, celle soubs laquelle elle s'est maintenuë. Sa forme et commodité essentielle despend de l'vsage. Nous nous desplaisons volontiers de la condition presente. Mais ie tiens pourtant, que d'aller desirant le commandement de peu, en vn estat populaire: ou en la monarchie, vne autre espece de gouuernement, c'est vice et folie. Ayme l'estat tel que tu le vois estre: S'il est royal, ayme la royauté; S'il est de peu, ou bien communauté, Ayme l'aussi, car Dieu t'y a faict naistre. Ainsin en parloit le bon monsieur de Pibrac, que nous venons de perdre: vn esprit si gentil, les opinions si saines, les mœurs si douces.	Not in opinion but in truth, the excellent and best government for each nation is the one under which it has preserved itself. Its form and essential advantage depend on usage. We are readily displeased with our present condition. But I hold nonetheless that to go about wishing for rule by the few in a popular state, or for another kind of government in a monarchy, is vice and folly. Love the state such as you see it to be: if it is royal, love royalty; if it is rule by the few, or else a commonwealth, love it too, for God had you born there. So said the good Monsieur de Pibrac, whom we have just lost: so fine a mind, such sound opinions, such gentle manners.[15]
	Cette perte, et celle qu'en mesme temps nous auons faicte de monsieur de Foix, sont pertes importantes à nostre couronne. Ie ne sçay s'il reste à la France dequoy substituer vne autre coupple, pareille à ces deux Gascons, en syncerité, et en suffisance, pour le conseil de nos Roys. C'estoyent ames diuersement belles, et certes selon le siecle, rares et belles, chacune en sa forme. Mais qui les auoit logees en cet aage, si desconuenables et si disproportionnees à nostre corruption, et à nos tempestes?	This loss, and the one we suffered at the same time in Monsieur de Foix, are serious losses to our crown. I do not know whether France has anything left with which to replace them by another pair like these two Gascons, in sincerity and ability, for the councils of our kings. They were souls beautiful in different ways, and certainly, for this age, rare and beautiful, each in its own form. But who had lodged them in this age, so ill-suited and so out of proportion to our corruption and our storms?[16]
3.9.17	Rien ne presse vn estat que l'innouation: le changement donne seul forme à l'iniustice, et à la tyrannie. Quand quelque piece se démanche, on peut l'estayer: on peut s'opposer à ce que l'alteration et corruption naturelle à toutes choses, ne nous esloigne trop de nos commencemens et principes. Mais d'entreprendre à refondre vne si grande masse, et à changer les fondements d'vn si grand bastiment, c'est à faire à ceux qui pour descrasser effacent: qui veulent amender les deffauts particuliers, par vne confusion vniuerselle, et guarir les maladies par la mort: non tam commutandarum quàm euertendarum rerum cupidi. Le monde est inepte à se guarir. Il est si impatient de ce qui le presse, qu'il ne vise qu'à s'en deffaire, sans regarder à quel prix.	Nothing weighs on a state like innovation: change alone gives shape to injustice and tyranny. When some piece comes loose, it can be propped up; we can prevent the alteration and corruption natural to all things from carrying us too far from our beginnings and principles. But to undertake to recast so great a mass, and to change the foundations of so great a building, is for those who wipe out in order to clean; who want to amend particular defects by universal confusion, and cure diseases by death: eager not so much to change things as to overturn them. The world is incapable of curing itself. It is so impatient of whatever oppresses it that it aims only at getting rid of it, without considering at what cost.

15 Guy du Faur de Pibrac (1529–1584), magistrate and poet, author of moral Quatrains.
16 Paul de Foix (1528–1584), archbishop of Toulouse and diplomat.

FRENCH

Nous voyons par mille exemples, qu'il se guarit ordinairement à ses despens: la descharge du mal present, n'est pas guarison, s'il n'y a en general amendement de condition. La fin du chirurgien, n'est pas de faire mourir la mauuaise chair: ce n'est que l'acheminement de sa cure: il regarde au delà, d'y faire renaistre la naturelle, et rendre la partie à son deu estre. Quiconque propose seulement d'emporter ce qui le masche, il demeure court: car le bien ne succede pas necessairement au mal: vn autre mal luy peut succeder; et pire. Comme il aduint aux tueurs de Cesar, qui ietterent la chose publique à tel poinct, qu'ils eurent à se repentir de s'en estre meslez.

A plusieurs depuis, iusques à nos siecles, il est aduenu de mesmes. Les François mes contemporanees sçauent bien qu'en dire. Toutes grandes mutations esbranlent l'estat, et le desordonnent.

3.9.18 Qui viseroit droit à la guarison, et en consulteroit auant toute œuure, se refroidiroit volontiers d'y mettre la main. Pacuuius Calauius corrigea le vice de ce proceder, par vn exemple insigne. Ses concitoyens estoient mutinez contre leurs magistrats: luy personnage de grande authorité en la ville de Capouë, trouua vn iour moyen d'enfermer le Senat dans le Palais: et conuoquant le peuple en la place, leur dit: Que le iour estoit venu, auquel en pleine liberté ils pouuoient prendre vengeance des tyrans qui les auoyent si long temps oppressez, lesquels il tenoit à sa mercy seuls et desarmez.

Fut d'aduis, qu'au sort, on les tirast hors, l'vn apres l'autre: et de chacun on ordonnast particulierement: faisant sur le champ, executer ce qui en seroit decreté: pourueu aussi que tout d'vn train ils aduisassent d'establir quelque homme de bien, en la place du condamné, affin qu'elle ne demeurast vuide d'officier. Ils n'eurent pas plustost ouy le nom d'vn senateur, qu'il s'esleua vn cry de mescontentement vniuersel à l'encontre de luy: Ie voy bien, dit Pacuuius, il faut demettre cettuy-cy: c'est vn meschant: ayons en vn bon en change. Ce fut vn prompt silence: tout le monde se trouuant bien empesché au choix. Au premier plus effronté, qui dit le sien: voyla vn consentement de voix encore plus grand à refuser celuy là.

ENGLISH

We see by a thousand examples that it usually cures itself at its own expense: relief from the present ill is no cure unless there is a general improvement of condition. The surgeon's aim is not to kill the bad flesh; that is only the path toward his cure. He looks beyond, to making the natural flesh grow again and restoring the part to its proper state. Whoever proposes only to remove what is gnawing at him falls short, for good does not necessarily follow evil: another evil may follow it, and a worse one. So it happened to Caesar's killers, who threw the commonwealth into such a state that they had cause to repent of having meddled with it.

The same has happened to many since, down to our own times. We French of today know well what to say about it. All great changes shake the state and throw it into disorder.

Anyone who aimed straight at the cure, and deliberated about it before setting to work, would be inclined to lose his enthusiasm for putting his hand to it. Pacuvius Calavius corrected the flaw in this way of proceeding by a notable example. His fellow citizens had risen against their magistrates. He, a man of great authority in the city of Capua, found a way one day to shut the Senate up in the palace; and, summoning the people to the square, told them that the day had come when, in full liberty, they could take revenge on the tyrants who had oppressed them so long, and whom he held at his mercy, alone and unarmed.[17]

He advised that they be drawn out by lot, one after another, and that a decision be made on each one individually, whatever was decreed being carried out on the spot—provided also that at the same time they took care to install some good man in the place of the condemned one, so that the post would not be left without an officer. No sooner had they heard the name of one senator than a cry of universal discontent rose up against him. "I see," said Pacuvius, "this one must be removed: he is a wicked man. Let us have a good one in exchange." There was a sudden silence, everyone finding himself much at a loss in the choice. When the first and most brazen of them named his man, 17 Pacuvius Calavius, chief magistrate of Capua in 216 BC; the story is from Livy.

FRENCH

Cent imperfections, et iustes causes, de le rebuter. Ces humeurs contradictoires, s'estans eschauffees, il aduint encore pis du second Senateur, et du tiers. Autant de discorde à l'election, que de conuenance à la demission. S'estans inutilement lassez à ce trouble, ils commencent, qui deçà, qui delà, à se desrober peu à peu de l'assemblee: rapportant chacun cette resolution en son ame, que le plus vieil et mieux cogneu mal, est tousiours plus supportable, que le mal recent et inexperimenté.

3.9.19 Pour nous voir bien piteusement agitez: car que n'auons nous faict? Eheu! cicatricum et sceleris pudet,
Fratrúmque: quid nos dura refugimus
Ætas? quid intactum nefasti
Liquimus? vnde manus iuuentus
Metu Deorum continuit? quibus
Pepercit aris? ie ne vay pas soudain me resoluant, Ipsa si velit Salus, Seruare prorsus non potest hanc familiam. Nous ne sommes pas pourtant à l'auanture, à nostre dernier periode. La conseruation des estats, est chose qui vray-semblablement surpasse nostre intelligence. C'est, comme dit Platon, chose puissante, et de difficile dissolution, qu'vne ciuile police, elle dure souuent contre des maladies mortelles et intestines: contre l'iniure des loix iniustes, contre la tyrannie, contre le debordement et ignorance des magistrats, licence et sedition des peuples.

En toutes nos fortunes, nous nous comparons à ce qui est au dessus de nous, et regardons vers ceux qui sont mieux. Mesurons nous à ce qui est au dessous: il n'en est point de si miserable, qui ne trouue mille exemples où se consoler. C'est nostre vice, que nous voyons plus mal volontiers, ce qui est dessus nous, que volontiers, ce qui est dessoubs. Si disoit Solon, qui dresseroit vn tas de tous les maux ensemble, qu'il n'est aucun, qui ne choisist plustost de remporter auec soy les maux qu'il a, que de venir à diuision legitime, auec tous les autres hommes, de ce tas de maux, et en prendre sa quotte part. Nostre police se porte mal.

ENGLISH

there was an even greater consensus of voices to reject that one.

A hundred imperfections, and just reasons for turning him down. These contradictory humors having grown heated, it went even worse with the second senator, and the third. As much discord over the election as agreement over the removal. Having worn themselves out uselessly in this turmoil, they begin, some this way, some that, to slip away little by little from the assembly, each carrying away in his soul this resolution: that the older and better-known ill is always more bearable than the new and untried one.

Though we see ourselves pitiably tossed about—for what have we not done? Alas! we are ashamed of our scars and our crime and of our brothers. What have we, a hardened age, shrunk from? What wickedness have we left untouched? From what has our youth held back its hands for fear of the gods? What altars has it spared?—I do not hastily conclude that Even if Salvation herself wished it, she could not possibly save this household. Yet perhaps we have not reached our final period. The preservation of states is something that very probably surpasses our understanding. A civil polity, as Plato says, is a powerful thing and hard to dissolve; it often holds out against mortal internal diseases: against the harm of unjust laws, against tyranny, against the excesses and ignorance of magistrates, the license and sedition of the people.[18]

In all our fortunes we compare ourselves with what is above us, and look toward those who are better off. Let us measure ourselves against what is below: there is no one so wretched that he cannot find a thousand examples to console himself with. It is our failing that we look at what is above us with more displeasure than we look at what is below us with pleasure. Solon used to say that if someone made a heap of all ills together, there is no one who would not rather take back home the ills he has than come to a lawful division of that heap with all other men and take his share. Our government is in poor health.

Yet there have been sicker ones that did not die. The gods play ball with us and toss us about every

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Il en a esté pourtant de plus malades, sans mourir. Les dieux s'esbatent de nous à la pelote, et nous agitent à toutes mains, enimuero Dij nos homines quasi pilas habent.	which way: the gods indeed treat us men as their balls.[19]

ROME AND THE SURVIVAL OF STATES

Rome outlasted worse disorders, and a great state holds together by more than one nail.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.20	Les astres ont fatalement destiné l'estat de Rome, pour exemplaire de ce qu'ils peuuent en ce genre. Il comprend en soy toutes les formes et auantures, qui touchent vn estat: tout ce que l'ordre y peut, et le trouble, et l'heur, et le mal'heur. Qui se doit desesperer de sa condition, voyant les secousses et mouuemens dequoy celuy là fut agité, et qu'il supporta? Si l'estendue de la domination, est la santé d'vn estat, dequoy ie ne suis aucunement d'aduis (et me plaist Isocrates, qui instruit Nicocles, non d'enuier les Princes, qui ont des dominations larges, mais qui sçauent bien conseruer celles qui leur sont escheuës) celuy-là ne fut iamais si sain, que quand il fut le plus malade.	The stars have fatefully destined the Roman state to be the model of what they can do in this kind. It contains within it all the forms and adventures that can befall a state: all that order can do, and disorder, and good fortune and misfortune. Who should despair of his condition, seeing the shocks and upheavals by which that state was shaken, and which it withstood? If extent of dominion is the health of a state—which I do not at all believe (and I like Isocrates, who teaches Nicocles to envy not the princes who have wide dominions but those who know how to keep the ones that have fallen to them)—that state was never so healthy as when it was most sick.
	La pire de ses formes, luy fut la plus fortunee. A peine recognoist-on l'image d'aucune police, soubs les premiers Empereurs: c'est la plus horrible et la plus espesse confusion qu'on puisse conceuoir. Toutesfois il la supporta: et y dura, conseruant, non pas vne monarchie resserree en ses limites, mais tant de nations, si diuerses, si esloignees, si mal affectionnees, si desordonnement commandees, et iniustement conquises. Nec gentibus vllis Commodat in populum, terræ pelagique potentem, Inuidiam fortuna suam. Tout ce qui branle ne tombe pas. La contexture d'vn si grand corps tient à plus d'vn clou.	The worst of its forms was the most fortunate for it. One can scarcely recognize the image of any government under the first emperors: it is the most horrible and dense confusion one can conceive. Yet it bore it and endured in it, preserving not a monarchy confined within its borders but so many nations, so diverse, so distant, so ill-disposed, so disorderly governed and unjustly conquered. Nor to any nations does Fortune lend her enmity against the people mighty over land and sea. Not everything that totters falls. The fabric of so great a body holds by more than one nail.[20]
	Il tient mesme par son antiquité: comme les vieux bastimens, ausquels l'aage a desrobé le pied, sans crouste et sans cyment, qui pourtant viuent et soustiennent en leur propre poix, Nec iam validis radicibus hærens, / Pondere tuta suo est.	It holds even by its age, like old buildings whose footings time has worn away, without plaster and without cement, which nevertheless live and hold up by their own weight: No longer clinging by strong roots, / it is safe by its own weight.
3.9.21	D'auantage ce n'est pas bien procedé, de recognoistre seulement le flanc et le fossé: pour iuger de la seureté d'vne place, il faut voir, par où on y peut venir, en quel estat est l'assaillant. Peu de vaisseaux fondent de leur	Moreover, it is not a sound procedure to reconnoiter only the flank and the moat. To judge how secure a stronghold is, you must see by what way it can be approached and what condition the at-

18 Horace, Odes I.35; Terence, The Brothers; Salus was the Roman goddess of safety and welfare.
19 Plautus, The Captives.
20 Lucan, Pharsalia.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
propre poix, et sans violence estrangere. Or tournons les yeux par tout, tout croulle autour de nous.	tacker is in. Few ships founder under their own weight, without violence from outside. Now let us turn our eyes in every direction: everything is crumbling around us.
En tous les grands estats, soit de Chrestienté, soit d'ailleurs, que nous cognoissons, regardez y, vous y trouuerez vne euidente menasse de changement et de ruyne: Et sua sunt illis incommoda, párque per omnes / Tempestas. Les astrologues ont beau ieu, à nous aduertir, comme ils font, de grandes alterations, et mutations prochaines: leurs deuinations sont presentes et palpables, il ne faut pas aller au ciel pour cela. Nous n'auons pas seulement à tirer consolation, de cette societé vniuerselle de mal et de menasse: mais encores quelque esperance, pour la duree de nostre estat: d'autant que naturellement, rien ne tombe, là où tout tombe. La maladie vniuerselle est la santé particuliere. La conformité, est qualité ennemie à la dissolution.	In all the great states we know, whether in Christendom or elsewhere, take a look: you will find an evident threat of change and ruin. They too have their own troubles, and the same storm / hangs over all. The astrologers have an easy game warning us, as they do, of great alterations and changes close at hand. Their divinations are present and palpable; there is no need to go to the heavens for that. From this universal fellowship in ill and in menace we should draw not only consolation but also some hope for the survival of our state, since, naturally, nothing falls where everything falls. Universal sickness is individual health. Conformity is a quality hostile to dissolution.[21]
Pour moy, ie n'en entre point au desespoir, et me semble y voir des routes à nous sauuer! Deus hæc fortasse benigna / Reducet in sedem vice. Qui sçait, si Dieu voudra qu'il en aduienne, comme des corps qui se purgent, et remettent en meilleur estat, par longues et griefues maladies: lesquelles leur rendent vne santé plus entiere et plus nette, que celle qu'elles leur auoient osté? Ce qui me poise le plus, c'est qu'à conter les symptomes de nostre mal, i'en vois autant de naturels, et de ceux que le ciel nous enuoye, et proprement siens, que de ceux que nostre desreglement, et l'imprudence humaine y conferent. Il semble que les astres mesmes ordonnent, que nous auons assez duré, et outre les termes ordinaires.	For my part, I do not fall into despair over it, and I think I can see roads by which we may be saved. Perhaps God, by a kindly turn, / will restore these things to their place. Who knows whether God will have it turn out as with bodies that purge themselves and are restored to a better state by long and grievous illnesses, which give them back a health more complete and cleaner than the one they took away? What weighs on me most is that, when I count the symptoms of our sickness, I see as many that are natural, sent to us by heaven and properly its own, as those that our disorder and human imprudence contribute. It seems that the very stars decree that we have lasted long enough, and beyond the ordinary limits.[22]
Et cecy aussi me poise, que le plus voysin mal, qui nous menace, ce n'est pas alteration en la masse entiere et solide, mais sa dissipation et diuulsion: l'extreme de noz craintes.	And this too weighs on me: that the nearest ill threatening us is not an alteration in the whole, solid mass, but its dissipation and tearing apart—the extreme of our fears.

MEMORY AND PUBLIC SPEAKING

His failing memory makes him avoid prepared speeches and formal occasions.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.22 Encores en ces reuasseries icy crains-ie la trahison, de ma memoire, que par inaduertance, elle m'aye faict enregistrer vne chose deux fois. Ie hay à me recognoistre: et ne retaste iamais qu'enuis ce qui m'est vne fois	Even in these ramblings here I fear the treachery of my memory, that through inadvertence it may have made me record something twice. I hate going back over myself, and I never re-handle, ex-

21 Adapted from Virgil, Aeneid XI.
22 Horace, Epodes XIII.

FRENCH

eschappé. Or ie n'apporte icy rien de nouuel apprentissage. Ce sont imaginations communes: les ayant à l'auanture conceuës cent fois, i'ay peur de les auoir desia enrollees. La redicte est par tout ennuyeuse, fut ce dans Homere. Mais elle est ruyneuse, aux choses qui n'ont qu'vne montre superficielle et passagere. Ie me desplais de l'inculcation, voire aux choses vtiles, comme en Seneque.

Et l'vsage de son escole Stoïque me desplaist, de redire sur chasque matiere, tout au long et au large, les principes et presuppositions, qui seruent en general: et realleguer tousiours de nouueau les arguments et raisons communes et vniuerselles.

3.9.23 Ma memoire s'empire cruellement tous les iours: Pocula Lethæos vt si ducentia somnos, / Arente fauce traxerim. Il faudra doresnauant (car Dieu mercy iusques à cette heure, il n'en est pas aduenu de faute) qu'au lieu que les autres cherchent temps, et occasion de penser à ce qu'ils ont à dire, ie fuye à me preparer, de peur de m'attacher à quelque obligation, de laquelle i'aye à despendre. L'estre tenu et obligé, me fouruoye et le despendre d'vn si foible instrument qu'est ma memoire. Ie ne lis iamais cette histoire, que ie ne m'en offence, d'vn ressentiment propre et naturel.

Lyncestez accusé de coniuration, contre Alexandre, le iour qu'il fut mené en la presence de l'armée, suiuant la coustume, pour estre ouy en ses deffences, auoit en sa teste vne harangue estudiée, de laquelle tout hesitant et begayant il prononça quelques paroles. Comme il se troubloit de plus en plus, ce pendant qu'il lucte auec sa memoire, et qu'il la retaste, le voila chargé et tué à coups de pique, par les soldats, qui luy estoyent plus voisins: le tenans pour conuaincu. Son estonnement et son silence, leur seruit de confession. Ayant eu en prison tant de loysir de se preparer, ce n'est à leur aduis, plus la memoire qui luy manque: c'est la conscience qui luy bride la langue, et luy oste la force.

Vrayement c'est bien dit. Le lieu estonne, l'assistance, l'expectation, lors mesme qu'il n'y va que de l'ambition de bien dire. Que peut on faire, quand c'est vne harangue, qui porte la vie en consequence?

ENGLISH

cept reluctantly, what has once escaped me. Now, I bring nothing here that is newly learned. These are common notions; having perhaps conceived them a hundred times, I am afraid I have already entered them on the roll. Repetition is tedious everywhere, even in Homer. But it is ruinous in things that have only a superficial and passing show. I dislike having things hammered in, even useful things, as in Seneca.

And I dislike the habit of his Stoic school of repeating on every subject, at full length and breadth, the principles and presuppositions that apply in general, and of always bringing out anew the common and universal arguments and reasons.

My memory grows cruelly worse every day: As if, with parched throat, I had drained cups / that bring the sleep of Lethe. From now on (for, thank God, no failure has come of it so far), whereas others look for time and occasion to think about what they have to say, I shall have to avoid preparing myself, for fear of binding myself to some obligation on which I would have to depend. Being bound and obliged throws me off, and so does depending on so feeble an instrument as my memory. I never read this story without being stung by it, with a feeling that is personal and natural to me.[23]

Lyncestes, accused of conspiracy against Alexander, was brought before the army on the appointed day, according to custom, to be heard in his defense. He had a studied speech in his head, of which, hesitating and stammering, he delivered a few words. As he grew more and more confused, while he wrestled with his memory and groped through it, there he was, set upon and killed with pike thrusts by the soldiers nearest him, who took him as convicted. His bewilderment and his silence served them as a confession. Since he had had so much leisure in prison to prepare himself, it was no longer, in their opinion, his memory that failed him: it was his conscience that bridled his tongue and took away his strength.[24]

Truly, that is well said! The place stuns us, the audience, the expectation, even when nothing more is at stake than the ambition to speak well.

23 Horace, Epodes XIV. Lethe was the river of forgetfulness in the underworld.
24 Alexander of Lyncestis, executed for conspiracy in 330 BC; the story is told by Quintus Curtius.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

What can one do when the speech has one's life riding on it?

3.9.24 Pour moy, cela mesme, que ie sois lié à ce que i'ay à dire, sert à m'en desprendre. Quand ie me suis commis et assigné entierement à ma memoire, ie pends si fort sur elle, que ie l'accable: elle s'effraye de sa charge. Autant que ie m'en rapporte à elle, ie me mets hors de moy: iusques à essayer ma contenance. Et me suis veu quelque iour en peine, de celer la seruitude en laquelle i'estois entraué.

For my part, the very fact that I am bound to what I have to say serves to shake me loose from it. When I have committed and entrusted myself entirely to my memory, I lean on it so heavily that I overwhelm it: it takes fright at its burden. The more I rely on it, the more I am thrown out of myself, to the point of putting my composure to the test. And I have found myself at times hard put to hide the servitude in which I was shackled.

Là où mon dessein est, de representer en parlant, vne profonde nonchalance d'accent et de visage, et des mouuemens fortuites et impremeditez, comme naissans des occasions presentes: aymant aussi cher ne rien dire qui vaille, que de montrer estre venu preparé pour bien dire: chose messeante, sur tout à gens de ma profession: et chose de trop grande obligation, à qui ne peut beaucoup tenir. L'apprest donne plus à esperer, qu'il ne porte. On se met souuent sottement en pourpoinct, pour ne sauter pas mieux qu'en saye.

For my aim, when I speak, is to display a deep nonchalance of tone and expression, and movements that are casual and unpremeditated, as if born of the present occasion. I would just as soon say nothing worth hearing as show that I came prepared to speak well—a thing unbecoming, above all, in people of my profession, and too great a commitment for one who cannot retain much. Preparation raises more hopes than it delivers. People often foolishly strip down to their doublet only to jump no better than they would in their coat.[25]

Nihil est his, qui placere volunt, tam aduersarium, quàm expectatio. Ils ont laissé par escrit de l'orateur Curio, que quand il proposoit la distribution des pieces de son oraison, en trois, ou en quatre: ou le nombre de ses arguments et raisons, il luy aduenoit volontiers, ou d'en oublier quelqu'vn, ou d'y en adiouster vn ou deux de plus. I'ay tousiours bien euité, de tomber en cet inconuenient: ayant hay ces promesses et prescriptions: non seulement pour la deffiance de ma memoire: mais aussi pource que cette forme retire trop à l'artiste. Simpliciora militares decent. Baste, que ie me suis meshuy promis, de ne prendre plus la charge de parler en lieu de respect.

Nothing is so damaging to those who want to please as expectation. It has been recorded of the orator Curio that when he announced the division of his speech into three or four parts, or the number of his arguments and reasons, he would often either forget one of them or add one or two more. I have always taken care to avoid falling into that trouble, having hated such announcements and outlines, not only from distrust of my memory but also because that form smacks too much of the professional. Simpler things suit soldiers. Enough: I have now promised myself never again to take on the task of speaking on a formal occasion.[26]

Car quant à parler en lisant son escript: outre ce qu'il est tresinepte, il est de grand desauantage à ceux, qui par nature pouuoient quelque chose en l'action. Et de me ietter à la mercy de mon inuention presente, encore moins: ie l'ay lourde et trouble, qui ne sçauroit fournir aux soudaines necessitez, et importantes.

For as for speaking by reading out one's text, besides being most inept, it is a great disadvantage to those who by nature had some gift for delivery. And as for throwing myself on the mercy of my improvisation of the moment, even less: mine is heavy and muddled, unable to meet sudden and important demands.

25 Montaigne means the nobility, whose profession was arms.
26 The first quotation is from Cicero, Academica II; Gaius Scribonius Curio (1st century BC) is described in Cicero's Brutus; the second quotation is from Quintilian.

I ADD BUT DO NOT CORRECT

Montaigne explains why he adds to his book without revising what is already printed.

FRENCH

3.9.25 Laisse Lecteur courir encore ce coup d'essay, et ce troisiesme alongeail, du reste des pieces de ma peinture. I'adiouste, mais ie ne corrige pas. Premierement, par ce que celuy qui a hypothequé au monde son ouurage, ie trouue apparence, qu'il n'y ayt plus de droict. Qu'il die, s'il peut, mieux ailleurs, et ne corrompe la besongne qu'il a venduë. De telles gens, il ne faudroit rien acheter qu'apres leur mort. Qu'ils y pensent bien, auant que de se produire. Qui les haste? Mon liure est tousiours vn: sauf qu'à mesure, qu'on se met à le renouueller, afin que l'achetteur ne s'en aille les mains du tout vuides, ie me donne loy d'y attacher (comme ce n'est qu'vne marqueterie mal iointe) quelque embleme supernumeraire.

Ce ne sont que surpoids, qui ne condamnent point la premiere forme, mais donnent quelque prix particulier à chacune des suiuantes, par vne petite subtilité ambitieuse. De là toutesfois il aduiendra facilement, qu'il s'y mesle quelque transposition de chronologie: mes contes prenants place selon leur opportunité, non tousiours selon leur aage.

3.9.26 Secondement, à cause que pour mon regard, ie crains de perdre au change. Mon entendement ne va pas tousiours auant, il va à reculons aussi. Ie ne me deffie gueres moins de mes fantasies, pour estre secondes ou tierces, que premieres: ou presentes, que passees. Nous nous corrigeons aussi sottement souuent, comme nous corrigeons les autres. Ie suis enuieilly de nombre d'ans, depuis mes premieres publications, qui furent l'an mille cinq cens quatre vingts. Mais ie fais doute que ie sois assagi d'vn pouce. Moy à cette heure, et moy tantost, sommes bien deux. Quand meilleur, ie n'en puis rien dire. Il feroit bel estre vieil, si nous ne marchions, que vers l'amendement.

C'est vn mouuement d'yuroigne, titubant, vertigineux, informe: ou des ionchez, que l'air manie casuellement selon soy. Antiochus auoit vigoureusement escript en faueur de l'Academie: il print sur ses vieux ans vn autre party: lequel des deux ie suyuisse, seroit ce pas tousiours

ENGLISH

Reader, let this further essay run its course too, this third extension made of the remaining pieces of my portrait. I add, but I do not correct. First, because when a man has mortgaged his work to the world, it seems reasonable to me that he should have no more right in it. Let him say it better elsewhere, if he can, and not spoil the goods he has sold. From such people one should buy nothing until after their death. Let them think it over well before they bring themselves before the public. Who is hurrying them? My book is always one and the same. Except that, as people set about issuing it anew, so that the buyer may not go away entirely empty-handed, I allow myself to attach to it (since it is only a badly joined marquetry) some extra emblem.[27]

These are only makeweights, which do not condemn the original form but give some particular value to each of the later ones, by a little ambitious subtlety. From this, however, it will easily happen that some transposition of chronology gets mixed in, my stories taking their place according to their timeliness, not always according to their age.

Second, because for my own part I fear losing in the exchange. My understanding does not always go forward; it goes backward too. I distrust my notions hardly less for being second or third than first, or present than past. We often correct ourselves as foolishly as we correct others. I have grown older by a good number of years since my first publications, which were in the year 1580. But I doubt that I have grown an inch wiser. Myself now and myself a while ago are indeed two; but which is better, I cannot say. It would be a fine thing to be old if we were marching only toward improvement.

It is the movement of a drunkard, staggering, dizzy, shapeless; or of rushes that the wind tosses at random as it pleases. Antiochus had written vigorously in favor of the Academy; in his old age he took the other side. Whichever of the two I fol-

27 The third book was added in the edition of 1588.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

suiure Antiochus? Apres auoir estably le doubte, vouloir establir la certitude des opinions humaines, estoit ce pas establir le doubte, non la certitude? et promettre, qui luy eust donné encore vn aage à durer, qu'il estoit tousiours en termes de nouuelle agitation: non tant meilleure, qu'autre?

lowed, would I not always be following Antiochus? After establishing doubt, to want to establish the certainty of human opinions—was that not establishing doubt, not certainty? And was it not promising that, had he been given another lifetime, he would still be in a state of fresh agitation, not so much better as different?[28]

3.9.27 La faueur publique m'a donné vn peu plus de hardiesse que ie n'esperois: mais ce que ie crains le plus, c'est de saouler. I'aymerois mieux poindre que lasser. Comme a faict vn sçauant homme de mon temps. La louange est tousiours plaisante, de qui, et pourquoy elle vienne. Si faut-il pour s'en aggreer iustement, estre informé de sa cause. Les imperfections mesme ont leur moyen de se recommander. L'estimation vulgaire et commune, se voit peu heureuse en rencontre. Et de mon temps, ie suis trompé, si les pires escrits ne sont ceux qui ont gaigné le dessus du vent populaire. Certes ie rends graces à des honnestes hommes, qui daignent prendre en bonne part, mes foibles efforts.

Il n'est lieu où les fautes de la façon paroissent tant, qu'en vne matiere qui de soy n'a point de recommandation. Ne te prens point à moy, Lecteur, de celles qui se coulent icy, par la fantasie, ou inaduertance d'autruy: chasque main, chasque ouurier, y apporte les siennes. Ie ne me mesle, ny d'orthographe, et ordonne seulement qu'ils suiuent l'ancienne, ny de la punctuation: ie suis peu expert en l'vn et en l'autre. Où ils rompent du tout le sens, ie m'en donne peu de peine, car aumoins ils me deschargent. Mais où ils en substituent vn faux, comme ils font si souuent, et me destournent à leur conception, ils me ruynent.

Toutesfois quand la sentence n'est forte à ma mesure, vn honneste homme la doit refuser pour mienne. Qui cognoistra combien ie suis peu laborieux, combien ie suis faict à ma mode, croira facilement, que ie redicterois plus volontiers, encore autant d'Essais, que de m'assuiettir à resuiure ceux-cy, pour cette puerile correction.

Public favor has given me a little more boldness than I hoped. But what I fear most is to surfeit. I would rather prick than weary, as a learned man of my time has done. Praise is always pleasant, from whomever and for whatever reason it comes. Yet to be rightly pleased with it, one must know its cause. Even imperfections have their way of recommending themselves. Common, popular esteem is seldom happy in its choices; and in my time, unless I am mistaken, the worst writings are those that have caught the popular wind. Certainly I give thanks to the decent men who deign to take my feeble efforts in good part.

Nowhere do faults of workmanship show so much as in a subject that has nothing to recommend it in itself. Do not blame me, reader, for those that slip in here through the whims or carelessness of others: each hand, each workman, brings his own. I do not concern myself with spelling—I only order them to follow the old one—nor with punctuation; I am little expert in either. Where they break the sense altogether, I take little trouble over it, for at least they relieve me of responsibility. But where they substitute a false one, as they so often do, and twist me to their own conception, they ruin me.

However, when a sentence is not as strong as I would make it, a decent man ought to refuse it as mine. Anyone who knows how little industrious I am, how much I am made in my own fashion, will easily believe that I would sooner dictate as many Essays again than subject myself to going back over these for such childish correction.

SAFETY IN A LAWLESS COUNTRY

His open house has escaped pillage, but he hates owing his safety to others' favor.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.9.28 Ie disois donc tantost, qu'estant planté en la plus profonde miniere de ce nouueau metal, non seulement ie

I was saying, then, a little while ago, that being planted in the deepest mine of this new metal, I

28 Antiochus of Ascalon (1st century BC) abandoned the skepticism of the New Academy for a dogmatic philosophy.

FRENCH

suis priué de grande familiarité, auec gens d'autres mœurs que les miennes: et d'autres opinions, par lesquelles ils tiennent ensemble d'vn nœud, qui commande tout autre nœud. Mais encore ie ne suis pas sans hazard, parmy ceux, à qui tout est esgalement loisible: et desquels la plus part ne peut empirer meshuy son marché, vers nostre iustice. D'où naist l'extreme degré de licence. Comptant toutes les particulieres circonstances qui me regardent, ie ne trouue homme des nostres, à qui la deffence des loix, couste, et en gain cessant, et en dommage emergeant, disent les clercs, plus qu'à moy.

Et tels font bien les braues, de leur chaleur et aspreté, qui font beaucoup moins que moy, en iuste balance. Comme maison de tout temps libre, de grand abbord, et officieuse à chacun (car ie ne me suis iamais laissé induire, d'en faire vn outil de guerre: laquelle ie vois chercher plus volontiers, où elle est le plus esloingnee de mon voisinage) ma maison a merité assez d'affection populaire: et seroit bien mal-aisé de me gourmander sur mon fumier. Et i'estime à vn merueilleux chef d'œuure, et exemplaire, qu'elle soit encore vierge de sang, et de sac, soubs vn si long orage, tant de changemens et agitations voisines.

Car à dire vray, il estoit possible à vn homme de ma complexion, d'eschapper à vne forme constante, et continue, telle qu'elle fust. Mais les inuasions et incursions contraires, et alternations et vicissitudes de la fortune, au tour de moy, ont iusqu'à cette heure plus exasperé qu'amolly l'humeur du pays: et me rechargent de dangers, et difficultez inuincibles.

3.9.29 I'eschape. Mais il me desplaist que ce soit plus par fortune: voire, et par ma prudence, que par iustice: et me desplaist d'estre hors la protection des loix, et soubs autre sauuegarde que la leur. Comme les choses sont, ie vis plus qu'à demy, de la faueur d'autruy: qui est vne rude obligation. Ie ne veux debuoir ma seureté, ny à la bonté, et benignité des grands, qui s'aggreent de ma legalité et liberté: ny à la facilité des mœurs de mes predecesseurs, et miennes: car quoy si i'estois autre?

Si mes desportemens et la franchise de ma conuersation, obligent mes voisins, ou la parenté: c'est cruauté qu'ils s'en puissent acquitter, en me laissant viure, et qu'ils am not only deprived of close familiarity with people of ways other than mine, and of other opinions, by which they hold together with a knot that overrides every other knot. I am also not without danger among those to whom everything is equally permitted, and most of whom can no longer make their bargain with our justice any worse—whence arises the extreme degree of license. Counting all the particular circumstances that concern me, I find no man on our side whom the defense of the laws costs more than me, both in profits forgone and in losses incurred, as the lawyers say.

ENGLISH

And some make a great show of bravado with their zeal and harshness who, weighed in a fair balance, do much less than I. My house, having always been open, easy of access, and obliging to everyone (for I have never let myself be induced to make it an instrument of war, which I prefer to go and seek where it is farthest from my neighborhood), has earned a good deal of popular affection, and it would be very hard to bully me on my own dunghill. And I consider it a marvelous masterpiece, and an exemplary one, that it is still virgin of blood and pillage under so long a storm, with so many changes and upheavals close by.

For, to tell the truth, it was possible for a man of my temperament to escape from one constant and continuous state of affairs, whatever it might be. But the contrary invasions and incursions, and the alternations and vicissitudes of fortune around me, have so far exasperated rather than softened the temper of the region, and they heap upon me dangers and insurmountable difficulties.

I escape. But it displeases me that it is more by luck, and even by my own prudence, than by justice; and it displeases me to be outside the protection of the laws and under some safeguard other than theirs. As things stand, I live more than half by the favor of others, which is a hard obligation. I do not want to owe my safety either to the kindness and benevolence of the great, who approve of my respect for the law and my freedom, or to the easygoing ways of my predecessors and my own: for what if I were different?

If my conduct and the frankness of my dealings put my neighbors or my kin under obligation, it is cruel that they can discharge it by letting me live, puissent dire: Nous luy condonons la libre continuation du seruice diuin, en la chapelle de sa maison, toutes les eglises d'autour, estants par nous desertées: et luy condonons l'vsage de ses biens, et sa vie, comme il conserue nos femmes, et nos bœufs au besoing. De longue main chez moy, nous auons part à la louange de Lycurgus Athenien, qui estoit general depositaire et gardien des bourses de ses concitoyens. Or ie tiens, qu'il faut viure par droict, et par auctorité, non par recompense ny par grace.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

and that they can say: "We grant him the free continuation of divine service in the chapel of his house, when all the churches around have been laid waste by us; and we grant him the use of his goods and his life, since he shelters our wives and our cattle in time of need." For a long time now my house has had a share in the praise given to Lycurgus the Athenian, who was the general depositary and guardian of his fellow citizens' purses. Now I hold that one must live by right and by authority, not by reward or by favor.[29]

THE BURDEN OF OBLIGATION

He would rather pay money than owe gratitude, and avoids being bound to anyone.

FRENCH

Combien de galans hommes ont mieux aymé perdre la vie, que la deuoir? Ie fuis à me submettre à toute sorte d'obligation. Mais sur tout, à celle qui m'attache, par deuoir d'honneur. Ie ne trouue rien si cher, que ce qui m'est donné: et ce pourquoy, ma volonté demeure hypothequee par tiltre de gratitude. Et reçois plus volontiers les offices, qui sont à vendre. Ie croy bien. Pour ceux-cy, ie ne donne que de l'argent: pour les autres, ie me donne moy-mesme.

3.9.30 Le neud, qui me tient par la loy d'honnesteté, me semble bien plus pressant et plus poisant, que n'est celuy de la contraincte ciuile. On me garotte plus doucement par vn notaire, que par moy. N'est-ce pas raison, que ma conscience soit beaucoup plus engagee, à ce, en quoy on s'est simplement fié d'elle? Ailleurs, ma foy ne doit rien: car on ne luy a rien presté. Qu'on s'ayde de la fiance et asseurance, qu'on a prise hors de moy. I'aymeroy bien plus cher, rompre la prison d'vne muraille, et des loix, que de ma parole. Ie suis delicat à l'obseruation de mes promesses, iusques à la superstition: et les fay en tous subiects volontiers incertaines et conditionnelles.

A celles, qui sont de nul poids, ie donne poids de la ialousie de ma regle: elle me gehenne et charge de son propre interest. Ouy, és entreprinses toutes miennes et libres, si i'en dy le poinct, il me semble, que ie me les prescry: et que, le donner à la science d'autruy, c'est le preordonner à soy. Il me semble que ie le promets, quand ie le dy. Ainsi i'euente peu mes propositions. La condemnation que ie fais de moy, est plus vifue et roide,

ENGLISH

How many gallant men have preferred to lose their lives rather than owe them? I shun submitting myself to any kind of obligation, but above all to the kind that binds me by a duty of honor. I find nothing so costly as what is given to me, and for which my will remains mortgaged by right of gratitude. And I more willingly accept services that are for sale. No wonder: for these I give only money; for the others, I give myself.

The bond that holds me by the law of honor seems to me much tighter and heavier than that of civil constraint. A notary ties me up more gently than I tie myself. Is it not reasonable that my conscience should be far more engaged in what has simply been entrusted to it? Elsewhere my word owes nothing, for nothing has been lent to it. Let people make do with the trust and security they have taken from outside me. I would much rather break out of the prison of a wall and of the laws than out of my word. I am scrupulous to the point of superstition in keeping my promises, and in every matter I readily make them uncertain and conditional.

To those that have no weight I give weight by my jealous regard for my rule: it torments me and burdens me with its own interest. Yes, even in undertakings that are entirely my own and free, if I state my intention, it seems to me that I prescribe it to myself, and that to let another know of it is to preordain it for oneself. It seems to me that I

29 Lycurgus, Athenian orator and statesman of the 4th century BC, famed for his honest management of public funds.

FRENCH

que n'est celle des iuges, qui ne me prennent que par le visage de l'obligation commune: l'estreinte de ma conscience plus serree, et plus seuere. Ie suy laschement les debuoirs ausquels on m'entraineroit, si ie n'y allois.

Hoc ipsum ita iustum est quod rectè fit, si est voluntarium. Si l'action n'a quelque splendeur de liberté, elle n'a point de grace, ny d'honneur. Quod me ius cogit, vix voluntate impetrent. Où la necessité me tire, i'ayme à lacher la volonté. Quia quicquid imperio cogitur, exigenti magis, quàm præstanti acceptum refertur. I'en sçay qui suyuent cet air, iusques à l'iniustice: donnent plustost qu'ils ne rendent, prestent plustost qu'ilz ne payent: font plus escharsement bien à celuy, à qui ils en sont tenus. Ie ne vois pas là, mais ie touche contre.

3.9.31 I'ayme tant à me descharger et desobliger, que i'ay parfois compté à profit, les ingratitudes, offences, et indignitez, que i'auois reçeu de ceux, à qui ou par nature, ou par accident, i'auois quelque deuoir d'amitié: prenant cette occasion de leur faute, pour autant d'acquit, et descharge de ma debte. Encore que ie continue à leur payer les offices apparents, de la raison publique, ie trouue grande espargne pourtant à faire par iustice, ce que ie faysoy par affection, et à me soulager vn peu, de l'attention et sollicitude, de ma volonté au dedans. Est prudentis sustinere vt cursum, sic impetum beneuolentiæ. Laquelle i'ay trop vrgente et pressante, où ie m'addonne: aumoins pour vn homme, qui ne veut estre aucunement en presse.

Et me sert cette mesnagerie, de quelque consolation, aux imperfections de ceux qui me touchent. Ie suis bien desplaisant qu'ils en vaillent moins, mais tant y a, que i'en espargne aussi quelque chose de mon application et engagement enuers eux. I'approuue celuy qui ayme moins son enfant, d'autant qu'il est ou teigneux ou bossu. Et non seulement, quand il est malicieux; mais aussi quand il est malheureux, et mal nay (Dieu mesme en a rabbatu cela de son prix, et estimation naturelle) pourueu qu'il se porte en ce refroidissement, auec promise it when I say it. So I air my plans very little. The sentence I pass on myself is sharper and stiffer than that of the judges, who see me only in the light of common obligation; the grip of my conscience is tighter and more severe. I perform sluggishly the duties to which I would be dragged if I did not go of my own accord.

ENGLISH

Even what is rightly done is just only if it is voluntary. If an action does not have some luster of freedom, it has neither grace nor honor. What duty compels me to do, they will hardly get from my good will. Where necessity pulls me, I like to let my will go slack. For whatever is compelled by command is credited more to the one who exacts it than to the one who performs it. I know some who follow this bent to the point of injustice: they would rather give than repay, rather lend than pay, and they do good more stingily to the one to whom they are bound to do it. I do not go that far, but I come close.[30]

I so love to unburden myself and be released from obligation that I have sometimes counted as profit the ingratitude, offenses, and indignities I had received from those to whom, by nature or by accident, I owed some duty of friendship, taking the occasion of their fault as so much acquittance and discharge of my debt. Although I go on paying them the outward courtesies that public reason requires, I nevertheless find it a great saving to do out of justice what I used to do out of affection, and to relieve myself a little of the inner attention and solicitude of my will. A prudent man should rein in the onrush of goodwill as he would a race in full career. In me it is too urgent and pressing where I give myself to it—at least for a man who does not want to be under any pressure at all.[31]

And this economy gives me some consolation for the imperfections of those close to me. I am truly sorry that they are worth less for them; but the fact remains that I also save something of my application and commitment toward them. I approve of the man who loves his child less for being scabby or hunchbacked—and not only when he is ill-natured, but also when he is unfortunate and ill-formed from birth (God himself has docked that much from his value and natural esteem), provided he conducts himself in this cooling with 30 Cicero, On Duties; Terence, The Brothers; Valerius Maximus.

31 Cicero, On Friendship.

FRENCH

moderation, et iustice exacte. En moy, la proximité n'allege pas les deffauts, elle les aggraue plustost.

3.9.32 Apres tout, selon que ie m'entends en la science du bienfaict et de recognoissance, qui est vne subtile science et de grand vsage, ie ne vois personne, plus libre et moins endebté, que ie suis iusques à cette heure. Ce que ie doibs, ie le doibs simplement aux obligations communes et naturelles. Il n'en est point, qui soit plus nettement quitte d'ailleurs. Nec sunt mihi nota potentum / Munera. Les Princes me donnent prou, s'ils ne m'ostent rien: et me font assez de bien, quand ils ne me font point de mal: c'est tout ce que i'en demande.

O combien ie suis tenu à Dieu, de ce qu'il luy a pleu, que i'aye reçeu immediatement de sa grace, tout ce que i'ay: qu'il a retenu particulierement à soy toute ma debte! Combien ie supplie instamment sa saincte misericorde, que iamais ie ne doiue vn essentiel grammercy à personne! Bien heureuse franchise: qui m'a conduit si loing. Qu'elle acheue. I'essaye à n'auoir expres besoing de nul. In me omnis spes est mihi. C'est chose que chacun peut en soy: mais plus facilement ceux, que Dieu a mis à l'abry des necessitez naturelles et vrgentes. Il fait bien piteux, et hazardeux, despendre d'vn autre. Nous mesmes qui est la plus iuste adresse, et la plus seure, ne nous sommes pas assez asseurez.

Ie n'ay rien mien, que moy; et si en est la possession en partie manque et empruntee. Ie me cultiue et en courage, qui est le plus fort: et encores en fortune, pour y trouuer dequoy me satisfaire, quand ailleurs tout m'abandonneroit. Eleus Hippias ne se fournit pas seulement de science, pour au giron des muses se pouuoir ioyeusement esquarter de toute autre compagnie au besoing: ny seulement de la cognoissance de la philosophie, pour apprendre à son ame de se contenter d'elle, et se passer virilement des commoditez qui lui viennent du dehors, quand le sort l'ordonne.

Il fut si curieux, d'apprendre encore à faire sa cuisine, et son poil, ses robes, ses souliers, ses bragues, pour se fonder en soy, autant qu'il pourroit, et soustraire au secours estranger. On iouyt bien plus librement, et plus gayement, des biens empruntez: quand ce n'est pas vne iouyssance obligee et contrainte par le besoing: et qu'on a, et en sa volonté, et en sa fortune, la force et les moyens moderation and exact justice. In me, nearness does not lighten faults; rather, it aggravates them.

ENGLISH

After all, as far as I understand the science of benefit and gratitude, which is a subtle science and of great use, I see no one freer and less in debt than I am up to this hour. What I owe, I owe simply to the common and natural obligations. There is no one more cleanly quit of everything else. Nor do I know the gifts / of the powerful. Princes give me plenty if they take nothing from me, and do me enough good when they do me no harm: that is all I ask of them.[32]

Oh, how beholden I am to God that it has pleased him that I should receive all I have directly from his grace, and that he has kept all my debt particularly to himself! How earnestly I beg his holy mercy that I may never owe anyone a thank-you that really matters! Blessed freedom, which has brought me so far! May it see me to the end. I try to have no express need of anyone. All my hope is in myself. This is something everyone can do within himself, but more easily those whom God has sheltered from natural and pressing necessities. It is a very pitiful and hazardous thing to depend on another. We ourselves, who are the most rightful and the surest recourse, are not sure enough of ourselves.[33]

I have nothing of my own but myself; and even my possession of that is partly defective and borrowed. I cultivate myself both in courage, which is the strongest, and also in fortune, so as to find there enough to satisfy me should everything else abandon me. Hippias of Elis furnished himself not only with learning, so that in the lap of the Muses he could, if need be, cheerfully withdraw from all other company; nor only with knowledge of philosophy, to teach his soul to be content with itself and to do without, manfully, the comforts that come to it from outside, when fate so orders.

He was so eager as to learn also to do his own cooking and his own hair, and to make his robes, his shoes, his breeches, so as to rest on himself as far as he could and free himself from outside help. One enjoys borrowed goods much more freely and more cheerfully when the enjoyment is not bound 32 Virgil, Aeneid XII.

33 Terence, The Brothers.

FRENCH

de s'en passer. Ie me connoy bien. Mais il m'est malaisé d'imaginer nulle si pure liberalité de personne enuers moy, nulle hospitalité si franche et gratuite, qui ne me semblast disgratiée, tyrannique, et teinte de reproche, si la necessité m'y auoit encheuestré.

Comme le donner est qualité ambitieuse, et de prerogatiue, aussi est l'accepter qualité de summission. Tesmoin l'iniurieux, et querelleux refus, que Baiazet feit des presents, que Temir luy enuoyoit. Et ceux qu'on offrit de la part de l'Empereur Solyman, à l'Empereur de Calicut, le mirent en si grand despit, que non seulement il les refusa rudement: disant, que ny luy ny ses predecesseurs n'auoient accoustumé de prendre: et que c'estoit leur office de donner: mais en outre feit mettre en vn cul de fosse, les ambassadeurs enuoyez à cet effect.

Quand Thetis, dit Aristote, flatte Iuppiter: quand les Lacedemoniens flattent les Atheniens: ils ne vont pas leur rafreschissant la memoire des biens, qu'ils leur ont faits, qui est tousiours odieuse: mais la memoire des bien-faicts qu'ils ont receuz d'eux. Ceux que ie voy si familierement employer tout chacun et s'y engager: ne le feroient pas, s'ils sauouroient comme moy la douceur d'vne pure liberté: et s'ils poisoient autant que doit poiser à vn sage homme, l'engageure d'vne obligation. Elle se paye à l'aduenture quelquefois: mais elle ne se dissout iamais. Cruel garrotage, à qui ayme d'affranchir les coudees de sa liberté, en tout sens.

Mes cognoissants, et au dessus et au dessous de moy, sçauent, s'ils en ont iamais veu, de moins sollicitant, requerant, suppliant, ny moins chargeant sur autruy. Si ie le suis, au delà de tout exemple moderne, ce n'est pas grande merueille: tant de pieces de mes mœurs y contribuants. Vn peu de fierté naturelle: l'impatience du refus: contraction de mes desirs et desseins: inhabileté à toute sorte d'affaires. Et mes qualitez plus fauories, l'oysiueté, la franchise. Par tout cela, i'ay prins à haine mortelle, d'estre tenu ny à autre, ny par autre que moy. I'employe bien viuement, tout ce que ie puis, à m'en passer: auant que i'employe la beneficence d'vn autre, en quelque, ou legere ou poisante occasion ou besoing que ce soit.

ENGLISH

and constrained by need, and when one has, both in one's will and in one's fortune, the strength and the means to do without them. I know myself well. But it is hard for me to imagine any liberality toward me so pure, any hospitality so frank and free, that it would not seem to me graceless, tyrannical, and tinged with reproach if necessity had haltered me to it.

As giving is a quality of ambition and prerogative, so accepting is a quality of submission. Witness the insulting and quarrelsome refusal Bajazet made of the presents Temir sent him. And those that were offered on behalf of the Emperor Suleiman to the Emperor of Calicut put him in such a rage that he not only refused them rudely, saying that neither he nor his predecessors were in the habit of taking, and that it was their office to give, but also had the ambassadors sent for the purpose thrown into a dungeon.

When Thetis, says Aristotle, flatters Jupiter, when the Spartans flatter the Athenians, they do not go about refreshing their memory of the benefits they have done them, which is always odious, but of the benefits they have received from them. Those whom I see so freely making use of everyone and putting themselves in debt would not do so if they savored as I do the sweetness of pure freedom, and if they weighed the burden of an obligation as heavily as a wise man should. It may be paid off sometimes, but it is never dissolved. A cruel shackle for one who likes to give his freedom elbow room in every direction.[34]

Those who know me, both above and below me, know whether they have ever seen anyone less given to soliciting, requesting, entreating, or less of a burden on others. If I am so beyond any modern example, it is no great wonder, since so many parts of my character contribute to it: a little natural pride; impatience at refusal; the narrowness of my desires and plans; ineptitude for any kind of business; and my most favored qualities, idleness and independence. Through all this I have taken a mortal hatred to being beholden either to anyone else or through anyone but myself. I very vigorously use every means I can to do without, before I make use of another's beneficence, on any occasion or need whatever, light or weighty.

34 Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics IV.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Mes amis m'importunent estrangement, quand ils me requierent, de requerir vn tiers. Et ne me semble guere moins de coust, desengager celuy qui me doibt, vsant de luy: que m'engager enuers celuy, qui ne me doibt rien. Cette condition ostee, et cet' autre, qu'ils ne vueillent de moy chose negotieuse et soucieuse (car i'ay denoncé à tout soing guerre capitale) ie suis commodement facile et prest au besoing de chacun. Mais i'ay encore plus fuy à receuoir, que ie n'ay cherché à donner: aussi est il bien plus aysé selon Aristote. Ma fortune m'a peu permis de bien faire à autruy: et ce peu qu'elle m'en a permis, elle l'a assez maigrement logé.	My friends annoy me extraordinarily when they ask me to ask a third party. And it seems to me hardly less costly to release someone who owes me by making use of him than to put myself in debt to someone who owes me nothing. With that condition removed, and this other one, that they do not want from me anything that involves business and worry (for I have declared mortal war on all care), I am comfortably easy and ready to meet anyone's need. But I have shunned receiving even more than I have sought to give; and indeed that is much easier, according to Aristotle. My fortune has allowed me little opportunity to do good to others, and what little it has allowed, it has placed rather poorly.
Si elle m'eust faict naistre pour tenir quelque rang entre les hommes, i'eusse esté ambitieux de me faire aymer: non de me faire craindre ou admirer. L'exprimeray-ie plus insolamment? i'eusse autant regardé, au plaire, qu'au prouffiter. Cyrus tres-sagement, et par la bouche d'vn tres bon capitaine, et meilleur philosophe encores, estime sa bonté et ses biens faicts, loing au delà de sa vaillance, et belliqueuses conquestes. Et le premier Scipion, par tout où il se veut faire valoir, poise sa debonnaireté et humanité, au dessus de sa hardiesse et de ses victoires: et a tousiours en la bouche ce glorieux mot, Qu'il a laissé aux ennemys, autant à l'aymer, qu'aux amys.	If it had had me born to hold some rank among men, I would have been ambitious to make myself loved, not to make myself feared or admired. Shall I put it more insolently? I would have looked as much to pleasing as to being of use. Cyrus, very wisely, and through the mouth of a very good captain and a still better philosopher, values his kindness and his benefactions far above his valor and his warlike conquests. And the first Scipio, wherever he wants to show his worth, rates his gentleness and humanity above his boldness and his victories, and always has on his lips this glorious saying: that he had left his enemies as much reason to love him as his friends.[35]
Ie veux donc dire, que s'il faut ainsi debuoir quelque chose, ce doibt estre à plus legitime tiltre, que celuy dequoy ie parle, auquel la loy de cette miserable guerre m'engage: et non d'vn si gros debte, comme celuy de ma totale conseruation: il m'accable.	What I mean, then, is that if one must owe something in this way, it should be by a more legitimate title than the one I am speaking of, to which the law of this wretched war binds me; and not so great a debt as that of my entire preservation: it crushes me.

DANGER AT HOME

Expecting attack at night, he grows used to danger; he knows what he flees, not what he seeks.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.33 Ie me suis couché mille fois chez moy, imaginant qu'on me trahiroit et assommeroit cette nuict là: composant auec la Fortune, que ce fust sans effroy et sans langueur. Et me suis escrié apres mon patenostre, Impius hæc tam culta noualia miles habebit? Quel remede? c'est le lieu de ma naissance, et de la plus part de mes ancestres: ils y ont mis leur affection et leur nom. Nous nous durcissons à	A thousand times I have gone to bed in my own house imagining that I would be betrayed and murdered that very night, bargaining with Fortune that it should be without terror and without lingering. And after my Paternoster I have cried out: Shall some godless soldier possess these well-tilled

35 Cyrus speaks in Xenophon's Cyropaedia; the first Scipio is Scipio Africanus, victor over Hannibal.

FRENCH

tout ce que nous accoustumons. Et à vne miserable condition, comme est la nostre, ç'a esté vn tresfauorable present de Nature, que l'accoustumance, qui endort nostre sentiment à la souffrance de plusieurs maux.

Les guerres ciuiles ont cela de pire que les autres guerres, de nous mettre chacun en echauguette en sa propre maison. Quàm miserum, porta vitam muróque tueri, Vixque suæ tutum viribus esse domus! C'est grande extremité, d'estre pressé iusques dans son mesnage, et repos domestique. Le lieu où ie me tiens, est tousiours le premier et le dernier, à la batterie de nos troubles: et où la paix n'a iamais son visage entier, Tum quoque cùm pax est, trepidant formidine belli.
Quoties pacem fortuna lacessit,
Hàc iter est bellis: melius, fortuna, dedisses
Orbe sub Eoo sedem, gelidàque sub Arcto, Errantésque domos. Ie tire par fois, le moyen de me fermir contre ces considerations, de la nonchalance et lascheté.

Elles nous menent aussi aucunement à la resolution. Il m'aduient souuent, d'imaginer auec quelque plaisir, les dangers mortels, et les attendre. Ie me plonge la teste baissee, stupidement dans la mort, sans la considerer et recognoistre, comme dans vne profondeur muette et obscure, qui m'engloutit d'vn saut, et m'estouffe en vn instant, d'vn puissant sommeil, plein d'insipidité et indolence. Et en ces morts courtes et violentes, la consequence que i'en preuoy, me donne plus de consolation, que l'effait de crainte. Ils disent, comme la vie n'est pas la meilleure, pour estre longue, que la mort est la meilleure, pour n'estre pas longue. Ie ne m'estrange pas tant de l'estre mort, comme i'entre en confidence auec le mourir.

Ie m'enueloppe et me tapis en cet orage, qui me doit aueugler et rauir de furie, d'vne charge prompte et insensible. Encore s'il aduenoit, comme disent aucuns iardiniers, que les roses et violettes naissent plus odoriferantes pres des aulx et des oignons, d'autant qu'ils succent et tirent à eux, ce qu'il y a de mauuaise odeur en la terre: aussi que ces deprauées natures, humassent tout fields? What remedy is there? It is the place where I was born, and most of my ancestors; they have set their affection and their name on it. We harden ourselves to whatever we grow used to. And for a wretched condition such as ours, habit has been a most favorable gift of Nature, lulling our feelings into enduring many ills.[36]

ENGLISH

Civil wars are worse than other wars in this: they put each of us on sentry duty in his own house. How wretched to guard one's life with gate and wall, and to be scarcely safe in the strength of one's own house! It is a great extremity to be harried right into one's household and domestic rest. The place where I live is always the first and the last to be battered in our troubles, and where peace never shows its whole face. Even when there is peace, they tremble in fear of war.
Whenever Fortune breaks the peace, this is the road wars take. Better, Fortune, had you given us a home beneath the eastern sky, or under the frozen Bear, and wandering dwellings. I sometimes draw the means to steel myself against these thoughts from indifference and slackness.[37]

They also bring us, in some measure, to resolution. It often happens that I imagine mortal dangers with a certain pleasure, and await them. I plunge headlong, stupidly, into death, without considering or reconnoitering it, as into a silent, dark abyss that swallows me in one leap and smothers me in an instant in a powerful sleep, full of insipidity and painlessness. And in these short and violent deaths, the consequence I foresee gives me more consolation than the event gives me fear. They say that just as life is not the better for being long, death is the better for not being long. I do not keep my distance from being dead so much as I make friends with dying.

I wrap myself up and crouch down in this storm, which must blind me and carry me off in its fury with a swift, unfelt assault. Again, if it were true, as some gardeners say, that roses and violets grow more fragrant near garlic and onions because these suck up and draw into themselves whatever bad smell is in the soil—if likewise these depraved

36 Virgil, Eclogues I.
37 The first two quotations are from Ovid, Tristia; the last is from Lucan, Pharsalia I.

FRENCH

le venin de mon air et du climat, et m'en rendissent d'autant meilleur et plus pur, par leur voysinage: que ie ne perdisse pas tout.

Cela n'est pas: mais de cecy il en peut estre quelque chose, que la bonté est plus belle et plus attraiante quand elle est rare, et que la contrarieté et diuersité, roidit et resserre en soy le bien faire: et l'enflamme par la ialousie de l'opposition, et par la gloire. Les voleurs de leur grace, ne m'en veulent pas particulierement. Ne fay-ie pas moy à eux. Il m'en faudroit à trop de gents. Pareilles consciences logent sous diuerses sortes de robes. Pareille cruauté, desloyauté, volerie. Et d'autant pire, qu'elle est plus lasche, plus seure, et plus obscure, sous l'ombre des loix. Ie hay moins l'iniure professe que trahitresse; guerriere que pacifique et iuridique. Nostre fieure est suruenuë en vn corps, qu'elle n'a de guere empiré.

Le feu y estoit, la flamme s'y est prinse. Le bruit est plus grand: le mal, de peu. Ie respons ordinairement, à ceux qui me demandent raison de mes voyages: Que ie sçay bien ce que ie fuis, mais non pas ce que ie cherche. Si on me dit, que parmy les estrangers il y peut auoir aussi peu de santé, et que leurs mœurs ne sont pas mieux nettes que les nostres: ie respons premierement, qu'il est malaysé: Tam multæ scelerum facies! Secondement, c'est tousiours gain, de changer vn mauuais estat à vn estat incertain. Et que les maux d'autruy ne nous doiuent pas poindre comme les nostres.

ENGLISH

natures were to suck up all the venom of my air and climate, and make me that much better and purer by their proximity—then I would not lose everything.

That is not so; but there may be something in this: that goodness is more beautiful and more attractive when it is rare, and that contrariety and diversity stiffen and concentrate good conduct within itself, and inflame it by the jealousy of opposition and by glory. The robbers, thanks to their kindness, bear me no particular grudge. Nor do I them: I would have to bear one against too many people. Similar consciences lodge under different sorts of robes. Similar cruelty, disloyalty, robbery—and all the worse for being more cowardly, more secure, and more hidden, under the shadow of the laws. I hate injury less when it is open than when it is treacherous, less when warlike than when peaceful and judicial. Our fever has come upon a body that it has hardly made worse.

The fire was there; the flame has caught. The noise is greater; the harm, only a little. To those who ask me the reason for my travels, I usually answer that I know well what I am fleeing, but not what I am seeking. If I am told that among foreigners there may be just as little health, and that their ways are no cleaner than ours, I answer, first, that this is unlikely: So many are the faces of crime! Second, that it is always a gain to exchange a bad condition for an uncertain one. And that the ills of others should not sting us as our own do.[38]

PARIS AND THE WORLD

He loves Paris, his one bond to France, and counts all men his compatriots.

FRENCH

3.9.34 Ie ne veux pas oublier cecy, que ie ne me mutine iamais tant contre la France, que ie ne regarde Paris de bon œil. Elle a mon cœur des mon enfance. Et m'en est aduenu comme des choses excellentes: plus i'ay veu dépuis d'autres villes belles, plus la beauté de cette cy, peut, et gaigne sur mon affection. Ie l'ayme par elle mesme, et plus en son estre seul, que rechargee de pompe estrangere. Ie l'ayme tendrement, iusques à ses verrues et à ses taches.

ENGLISH

I do not want to forget this: that I am never so rebellious against France that I do not look on Paris with a kindly eye. She has had my heart since my childhood. And it has gone with me as with excellent things: the more other beautiful cities I have seen since, the more the beauty of this one gains power over my affection and wins it. I love her for herself, and more in her own being than loaded with foreign pomp. I love her tenderly, down to her warts and blemishes.

FRENCH

Ie ne suis François, que par cette grande cité: grande en peuples, grande en felicité de son assiette: mais sur tout grande, et incomparable en varieté, et diuersité de commoditez: la gloire de la France, et l'vn des plus nobles ornements du monde. Dieu en chasse loing nos diuisions: entiere et vnie, ie la trouue deffendue de toute autre violence. Ie l'aduise, que de tous les partis, le pire sera celuy qui la mettra en discorde. Et ne crains pour elle, qu'elle mesme. Et crains pour elle, autant certes, que pour autre piece de cet estat. Tant qu'elle durera, ie n'auray faute de retraicte, où rendre mes abboys: suffisante à me faire perdre le regret de tout' autre retraicte.

3.9.35 Non par ce que Socrates l'a dict, mais par ce qu'en verité c'est mon humeur, et à l'auanture non sans quelque excez, i'estime tous les hommes mes compatriotes: et embrasse vn Polonois comme vn François, postposant cette lyaison nationale, à l'vniuerselle et commune. Ie ne suis guere feru de la douceur d'vn air naturel. Les cognoissances toutes neufues, et toutes miennes, me semblent bien valoir ces autres communes et fortuites cognoissances du voisinage. Les amitiez pures de nostre acquest, emportent ordinairement, celles ausquelles la communication du climat, ou du sang, nous ioignent.

Nature nous a mis au monde libres et desliez, nous nous emprisonnons en certains destroits: comme les Roys de Perse qui s'obligeoient de ne boire iamais autre eau, que celle du fleuue de Choaspez, renonçoyent par sottise, à leur droict d'vsage en toutes les autres eaux: et assechoient pour leur regard, tout le reste du monde. Ce que Socrates feit sur sa fin, d'estimer vne sentence d'exil pire, qu'vne sentence de mort contre soy: ie ne seray, à mon aduis, iamais ny si cassé, ny si estroittement habitué en mon païs, que ie le feisse. Ces vies celestes, ont assez d'images, que i'embrasse par estimation plus que par affection.

Et en ont aussi, de si esleuees, et extraordinaires, que par estimation mesme ie ne les puis embrasser, d'autant que ie ne les puis conceuoir. Cette humeur fut bien tendre à vn homme, qui iugeoit le monde sa ville. Il est vray, qu'il dedaignoit les peregrinations, et n'auoit gueres mis le

ENGLISH

I am French only through this great city: great in population, great in the happiness of her situation, but above all great and incomparable in the variety and diversity of her amenities; the glory of France and one of the noblest ornaments of the world. May God drive our divisions far from her! Whole and united, I find her protected against any other violence. I warn her that of all the parties, the worst will be the one that sets her at odds with herself. And I fear for her only from herself. And I fear for her, truly, as much as for any other part of this state. As long as she lasts, I shall not lack a refuge where I can turn at bay, one sufficient to make me lose regret for any other refuge.

Not because Socrates said it, but because it is truly my temperament, and perhaps not without some excess, I consider all men my compatriots, and I embrace a Pole as I do a Frenchman, putting this national bond below the universal and common one. I am hardly smitten with the sweetness of my native air. Acquaintances entirely new and entirely my own seem to me well worth those other common, chance acquaintances of the neighborhood. Friendships that are purely of our own acquiring usually prevail over those to which a shared climate or blood joins us.[39]

Nature has put us into the world free and unbound; we imprison ourselves in certain narrow confines, like the kings of Persia, who bound themselves never to drink any water but that of the river Choaspes, foolishly renounced their right to use all other waters, and dried up, as far as they were concerned, the whole rest of the world. What Socrates did at the end of his life, judging a sentence of exile against himself worse than a sentence of death—I shall never, I think, be so broken down or so narrowly attached to my country as to do that. These heavenly lives offer enough images that I embrace by esteem more than by affection.[40]

And they also offer some so lofty and extraordinary that I cannot embrace them even by esteem, since I cannot conceive them. That was a very tender feeling in a man who held the world to be his city. It is true that he disdained travel and had 38 Virgil, Georgics I.

39 Plutarch reports Socrates calling himself a citizen not of Athens but of the world.
40 The Choaspes flowed past Susa, a Persian royal residence (Herodotus).

FRENCH	ENGLISH
pied hors le territoire d'Attique. Quoy, qu'il plaignoit l'argent de ses amis à desengager sa vie: et qu'il refusa de sortir de prison par l'entremise d'autruy, pour ne desobeïr aux loix en vn temps, qu'elles estoient d'ailleurs si fort corrompuës? Ces exemples sont de la premiere espece, pour moy. De la seconde, sont d'autres, que ie pourroy trouuer en ce mesme personnage.	scarcely ever set foot outside the territory of Attica. What of the fact that he begrudged his friends' money to buy back his life, and refused to leave prison through the intervention of others, so as not to disobey the laws at a time when they were otherwise so badly corrupted? These examples are of the first kind, for me. Of the second kind are others that I could find in this same person.
Plusieurs de ces rares exemples surpassent la force de mon action: mais aucuns surpassent encore la force de mon iugement.	Several of these rare examples are beyond the strength of my action; but some are beyond even the strength of my judgment.

THE PLEASURES OF TRAVEL

Travel exercises the mind with variety; he rides for hours and minds no weather.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.36 Outre ces raisons, le voyager me semble vn exercice profitable. L'ame y a vne continuelle exercitation, à remarquer des choses incogneuës et nouuelles. Et ie ne sçache point meilleure escole, comme i'ay dict souuent, à façonner la vie, que de luy proposer incessamment la diuersité de tant d'autres vies, fantasies, et vsances: et luy faire gouster vne si perpetuelle varieté de formes de nostre nature. Le corps n'y est ny oisif ny trauaillé: et cette moderee agitation le met en haleine. Ie me tien à cheual sans demonter, tout choliqueux que ie suis, et sans m'y ennuyer, huict et dix heures, Vires vltra sortémque senectæ. Nulle saison m'est ennemye, que le chaut aspre d'vn soleil poignant.	Besides these reasons, traveling seems to me a profitable exercise. The soul is continually exercised in noticing things unknown and new; and I know no better school, as I have often said, for shaping life than to set before it constantly the diversity of so many other lives, notions, and ways, and to give it a taste of so perpetual a variety of the forms of our nature. The body is neither idle nor overworked, and this moderate agitation keeps it in good wind. I stay on horseback without dismounting, subject to the colic though I am, and without wearying of it, for eight and ten hours, Beyond the strength and lot of old age. No season is my enemy except the harsh heat of a scorching sun.[41]
Car les ombrelles, dequoy dépuis les anciens Romains l'Italie se sert, chargent plus les bras, qu'ils ne deschargent la teste. Ie voudroy sçauoir quelle industrie c'estoit aux Perses, si anciennement, et en la naissance de la luxure, de se faire du vent frais, et des ombrages à leur poste, comme dict Xenophon. I'ayme les pluyes et les crotes comme les cannes. La mutation d'air et de climat ne me touche point. Tout ciel m'est vn. Ie ne suis battu que des alterations internes, que ie produicts en moy, et celles là m'arriuent moins en voyageant. Ie suis mal-aisé à esbranler: mais estant auoyé, ie vay tant qu'on veut.	For the parasols that Italy has used since the ancient Romans burden the arms more than they relieve the head. I would like to know what ingenuity the Persians had, so long ago and at the very birth of luxury, to make cool breezes and shade for themselves at will, as Xenophon says. I love rain and mud as ducks do. Change of air and climate does not affect me at all; every sky is the same to me. I am buffeted only by the internal alterations I produce in myself, and those come over me less when I travel. I am hard to get moving; but once on my way, I will go as far as you like.
I'estriue autant aux petites entreprises, qu'aux grandes: et à m'equiper pour faire vne iournée, et visiter vn voisin, que pour vn iuste voyage. I'ay apris à faire mes iournees à	I balk as much at small undertakings as at great ones, and at equipping myself for a day's ride to 41 Virgil, Aeneid VI.

FRENCH

l'Espagnole, d'vne traicte: grandes et raisonnables iournees. Et aux extremes chaleurs, les passe de nuict, du soleil couchant iusques au leuant. L'autre façon de repaistre en chemin, en tumulte et haste, pour la disnee, nommément aux cours iours, est incommode. Mes cheuaux en valent mieux. Iamais cheual ne m'a failly, qui a sceu faire auec moy la premiere iournee. Ie les abreuue par tout: et regarde seulement qu'ils ayent assez de chemin de reste, pour battre leur eau.

La paresse à me leuer, donne loisir à ceux qui me suyuent, de disner à leur aise, auant partir. Pour moy, ie ne mange iamais trop tard: l'appetit me vient en mangeant, et point autrement: ie n'ay point de faim qu'à table.

3.9.37 Aucuns se plaignent dequoy ie me suis agreé à continuer cet exercice, marié, et vieil. Ils ont tort. Il est mieux temps d'abandonner sa maison, quand on l'a mise en train de continuer sans nous: quand on y a laissé de l'ordre qui ne demente point sa forme passee. C'est bien plus d'imprudence, de s'esloingner, laissant en sa maison vne garde moins fidele, et qui ait moins de soing de pouruoir à vostre besoing.

3.9.38 La plus vtile et honnorable science et occupation à vne mere de famille, c'est la science du mesnage. I'en vois quelqu'vne auare; de mesnagere, fort peu. C'est sa maistresse qualité, et qu'on doibt chercher, auant toute autre: comme le seul douaire qui sert à ruyner ou sauuer nos maisons. Qu'on ne m'en parle pas; selon que l'experience m'en a apprins, ie requiers d'vne femme mariee, au dessus de toute autre vertu, la vertu œconomique. Ie l'en mets au propre, luy laissant par mon absence tout le gouuernement en main. Ie vois auec despit en plusieurs mesnages, monsieur reuenir maussade et tout marmiteux du tracas des affaires, enuiron midy, que madame est encore apres à se coiffer et attiffer, en son cabinet.

C'est à faire aux Roynes: encores ne sçay-ie. Il est ridicule et iniuste, que l'oysiueté de nos femmes, soit entretenuë de nostre sueur et trauail. Il n'aduiendra, que ie puisse, à personne, d'auoir l'vsage de ses biens plus liquide que moy, plus quiete et plus quitte. Si le mary fournit de visit a neighbor as for a real journey. I have learned to make my day's journeys in the Spanish manner, in one stretch: long but reasonable stages. And in extreme heat I ride them by night, from sunset to sunrise. The other way, stopping to eat on the road, in confusion and haste, for the midday meal, especially on the short days, is inconvenient. My horses are the better for it. No horse that could do the first day's stage with me has ever failed me. I water them everywhere, and only make sure they have enough road left to work off their water.

ENGLISH

My laziness about getting up gives those who follow me time to eat their dinner at their ease before setting out. As for me, I never eat too late: my appetite comes while I am eating, and not otherwise; I am never hungry except at table.

Some complain that I have chosen to keep up this exercise though married and old. They are wrong. The better time to leave one's house is when one has set it going so that it can carry on without us, when one has left in it an order that does not belie its former shape. It is far more imprudent to go far away leaving one's house in the care of a less faithful guardian, one less concerned to provide for your needs.

The most useful and honorable science and occupation for the mother of a family is the science of household management. I see some who are stingy; good managers, very few. This is her master quality, the one that should be sought before any other, as the only dowry that serves to ruin or save our houses. Let no one argue with me about it: as experience has taught me, I require of a married woman, above every other virtue, the virtue of economy. I give her full scope for it, leaving the whole government in her hands while I am away. I see with vexation, in many households, monsieur coming home around noon, morose and all out of sorts from the bustle of business, while madame is still busy doing her hair and dressing up in her private room.

That is for queens to do—and even then I am not sure. It is ridiculous and unjust that the idleness of our wives should be maintained by our sweat and toil. It shall not happen, if I can help it, that anyone has freer use of his goods than I do, more tranquil and more clear of debt. If the husband sup-matiere, Nature mesme veut qu'elles fournissent de forme.	plies the matter, Nature herself wills that the wives supply the form.

FRENCH	ENGLISH

MARRIAGE AND ABSENCE

Absence does not harm married love or friendship, since the imagination embraces what it lacks.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.39 Quant aux deuoirs de l'amitié maritale, qu'on pense estre interessez par cette absence: ie ne le crois pas. Au rebours, c'est vne intelligence, qui se refroidit volontiers par vne trop continuelle assistance, et que l'assiduité blesse. Toute femme estrangere nous semble honneste femme. Et chacun sent par experience, que la continuation de se voir, ne peut representer le plaisir que lon sent à se desprendre, et reprendre à secousses. Ces interruptions me remplissent d'vne amour recente enuers les miens, et me redonnent l'vsage de ma maison plus doux: la vicissitude eschaufe mon appetit, vers l'vn, puis vers l'autre party.	As for the duties of married love, which people think this absence harms: I do not believe it. On the contrary, it is a bond that readily cools with too constant attendance, and that unbroken presence wounds. Every woman who is not our own seems to us a decent woman. And everyone knows from experience that seeing each other all the time cannot match the pleasure we feel in parting and coming together again by fits and starts. These interruptions fill me with a fresh love for my family and give me back the enjoyment of my home more sweetly. The alternation sharpens my appetite, first for one side, then for the other.
Ie sçay que l'amitié a les bras assez longs, pour se tenir et se ioindre, d'vn coin de monde à l'autre: et specialement cette cy, où il y a vne continuelle communication d'offices, qui en reueillent l'obligation et la souuenance. Les Stoïciens disent bien, qu'il y a si grande colligance et relation entre les sages, que celuy qui disne en France, repaist son compagnon en Ægypte; et qui estend seulement son doigt, où que ce soit, tous les sages qui sont sur la terre habitable, en sentent ayde. La iouyssance, et la possession, appartiennent principalement à l'imagination. Elle embrasse plus chaudement et plus continuellement ce qu'elle va querir, que ce que nous touchons.	I know that friendship has arms long enough to hold on and reach from one corner of the world to the other. This is especially true of this kind, where there is a constant exchange of services that reawaken its obligation and its memory. The Stoics say, indeed, that there is so close a bond and connection among the wise that a man who dines in France feeds his companion in Egypt. If he merely stretches out his finger, wherever he may be, all the wise men on the habitable earth feel themselves helped by it. Enjoyment and possession belong chiefly to the imagination. It embraces what it goes in search of more warmly and more constantly than what we touch.
Comptez voz amusements iournaliers; vous trouuerez que vous estes lors plus absent de vostre amy, quand il vous est present. Son assistance relasche vostre attention, et donne liberté à vostre pensee, de s'absenter à toute heure, pour toute occasion. De Rome en hors, ie tiens et regente ma maison, et les commoditez que i'y ay laissé: ie voy croistre mes murailles, mes arbres, et mes rentes, et descroistre à deux doigts pres, comme quand i'y suis, Ante oculos errat domus, errat forma locorum. Si nous ne iouyssons que ce que nous touchons, adieu noz escus quand ils sont en noz coffres, et noz enfans s'ils sont à la chasse. Nous les voulons plus pres. Au iardin est-ce loing? A vne demy iournee?

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Count up your daily amusements: you will find that you are most absent from your friend when he is present. His presence slackens your attention and leaves your thought free to wander off at any hour and on any pretext. From Rome I keep and govern my house and the comforts I left there. I see my walls, my trees and my income grow, and shrink, to within two fingers' breadth, just as when I am there: Before my eyes my house hovers, and the look of the places. If we enjoy only what we touch, farewell to our money when it is in our coffers, and to our children when they are out hunting. We want them nearer. Is the garden far? Half a day's journey?[42]

Quoy, à dix lieuës est-ce loing, ou pres? Si c'est pres: quoy onze, douze, treze? et ainsi pas à pas. Vrayment celle qui sçaura prescripre à son mary, le quantiesme pas finit le pres, et le quantiesme pas donne commencement au loing, ie suis d'aduis qu'elle l'arreste entre-deux. Excludat iurgia finis.
Vtor permisso, caudæque pilos vt equinæ
Paulatim vello: et demo vnum, demo etiam vnum, Dum cadat elusus ratione ruentis acerui. Et qu'elles appellent hardiment la philosophie à leur secours.

What about ten leagues: is that far or near? If it is near, what about eleven, twelve, thirteen? And so on, step by step. Truly, if a wife can tell her husband at which step near ends and at which step far begins, I suggest she stop him halfway between. Let a fixed limit put an end to quarrels.
I take what is allowed, and like hairs from a horse's tail
I pluck them out little by little, taking away one, and then another, Until he falls, foiled by the reasoning of the dwindling heap. And let them boldly call philosophy to their aid.[43]

A qui quelqu'vn pourroit reprocher, puis qu'elle ne voit ny l'un ny l'autre bout de la iointure, entre le trop et le peu, le long et le court, le leger et le poisant, le pres et le loing: puis qu'elle n'en recognoist le commencement ny la fin, qu'elle iuge bien incertainement du milieu. Rerum natura nullam nobis dedit cognitionem finium. Sont-elles pas encore femmes et amies des trespassez; qui ne sont pas au bout de cettuy-cy, mais en l'autre monde? Nous embrassons et ceux qui ont esté, et ceux qui ne sont point encore, non que les absens.

Though someone might reproach philosophy that, since it sees neither end of the joint between too much and too little, long and short, light and heavy, near and far, and since it knows neither the beginning nor the end, it judges the middle very uncertainly. Nature has given us no knowledge of limits. Are they not still the wives and friends of the dead, who are not at the far end of this world but in the other? We embrace both those who have been and those who are not yet, not just the absent.[44]

Nous n'auons pas faict marché, en nous mariant, de nous tenir continuellement accouez, l'vn à l'autre, comme ie ne sçay quels petits animaux que nous voyons, ou comme les ensorcelez de Karenty, d'vne maniere chiennine. Et ne doibt vne femme auoir les yeux si gourmandement fichez sur le deuant de son mary, qu'elle n'en puisse veoir le derriere, où besoing est. Mais ce mot de ce peintre si excellent, de leurs humeurs, seroit-il point de mise en ce lieu, pour representer la cause de leurs plaintes?

When we married, we did not strike a bargain to stay forever coupled tail to tail, like certain little animals we see, or like the bewitched folk of Karenty, in doglike fashion. And a wife ought not to keep her eyes so greedily fixed on her husband's front that she cannot see his back when need be. But might not this saying of that excellent painter

42 Ovid, Tristia.
43 Horace, Epistles; the last lines allude to the ancient paradox of the heap (the sorites).
44 Cicero, Academica.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
		of their temperaments fit here, to show the cause of their complaints?[45]
	Vxor, si cesses, aut te amare cogitat, Aut tete amari, aut potare, aut animo obsequi, Et tibi bene esse soli, cùm sibi sit malè. Ou bien seroit-ce pas, que de soy l'opposition et contradiction les entretient et nourrit: et qu'elles s'accommodent assez, pourueu qu'elles vous incommodent?	If you are late, your wife thinks that you are making love or being loved, Or drinking, or following your fancy, And that all goes well with you alone while all goes badly with her. Or might it rather be that opposition and contradiction in themselves keep them going and feed them, and that they are comfortable enough provided they make you uncomfortable?[46]
3.9.40	En la vraye amitié, de laquelle ie suis expert, ie me donne à mon amy, plus que ie ne le tire à moy. Ie n'ayme pas seulement mieux, luy faire bien, que s'il m'en faisoit: mais encore qu'il s'en face, qu'à moy: il m'en faict lors le plus, quand il s'en faict. Et si l'absence luy est ou plaisante ou vtile, elle m'est bien plus douce que sa presence: et ce n'est pas proprement absence, quand il y a moyen de s'entr'aduertir. I'ay tiré autrefois vsage de nostre esloingnement et commodité.	In true friendship, in which I am an expert, I give myself to my friend more than I draw him to me. I do not merely prefer doing him good to having him do good to me. I would even rather he did good to himself than to me: he does me the most good when he does it to himself. And if absence is pleasant or useful to him, it is far sweeter to me than his presence. Nor is it really absence when there is a way of keeping each other informed. In the past I drew use and benefit from our being apart.[47]
	Nous remplissions mieux, et estandions, la possession de la vie, en nous separant: il viuoit, il iouyssoit, il voyoit pour moy, et moy pour luy, autant plainement que s'il y eust esté: l'vne partie demeuroit oisiue, quand nous estions ensemble: nous nous confondions. La separation du lieu rendoit la conionction de noz volontez plus riche. Cette faim insatiable de la presence corporelle, accuse vn peu la foiblesse en la iouissance des ames.	We filled out and stretched our possession of life the better by separating. He lived, he enjoyed, he saw for me, and I for him, as fully as if he had been there himself. When we were together, one part of us lay idle: we merged into one. Separation in place made the union of our wills richer. This insatiable hunger for bodily presence betrays a certain weakness in the enjoyment of souls.

TRAVELING IN OLD AGE

He travels for the journey itself and would rather die on horseback, far from weeping friends.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.41	Quant à la vieillesse, qu'on m'allegue; au rebours: c'est à la ieunesse à s'asseruir aux opinions communes, et se contraindre pour autruy. Elle peut fournir à tous les deux, au peuple et à soy: nous n'auons que trop à faire, à nous seuls. A mesure que les commoditez naturelles nous faillent, soustenons nous par les artificielles. C'est iniustice, d'excuser la ieunesse de suyure ses plaisirs, et deffendre à la vieillesse d'en chercher. Ieune, ie couurois mes passions eniouees, de prudence: vieil, ie demesle les	As for old age, which people bring up against me: it is the reverse. It is for youth to enslave itself to common opinion and to restrain itself for the sake of others. Youth can provide for both, for the public and for itself; we have only too much to do for ourselves alone. As natural comforts fail us, let us prop ourselves up with artificial ones. It is unjust to excuse youth for following its pleasures and forbid old age to look for any. When I was young, I

45 Karenty: Karenz, a town on the Baltic island of Rügen, where, according to old chronicles, couples were bewitched into sticking together like dogs.
46 Terence, The Brothers.
47 The friend is La Boétie.

FRENCH

tristes, de débauche. Si prohibent les loix Platoniques, de peregriner auant quarante ans, ou cinquante: pour rendre la peregrination plus vtile et instructiue. Ie consentiroy plus volontiers, à cet autre second article, des mesmes loix, qui l'interdit, apres soixante.

Mais en tel aage, vous ne reuiendrez iamais d'vn si long chemin. Que m'en chaut-il? ie ne l'entreprens, ny pour en reuenir, ny pour le parfaire. I'entreprens seulement de me branler, pendant que le branle me plaist, et me proumeine pour me proumener. Ceux qui courent vn benefice, ou vn lieure, ne courent pas. Ceux là courent, qui courent aux barres, et pour exercer leur course. Mon dessein est diuisible par tout, il n'est pas fondé en grandes esperances: chasque iournee en faict le bout. Et le voyage de ma vie se conduict de mesme. I'ay veu pourtant assez de lieux esloignez, où i'eusse desiré qu'on m'eust arresté.

Pourquoy non, si Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Diogenes, Zenon, Antipater, tant d'hommes sages, de la secte plus renfroingnée, abandonnerent bien leur pays, sans aucune occasion de s'en plaindre: et seulement pour la iouissance d'vn autre air? Certes le plus grand desplaisir de mes peregrinations, c'est que ie n'y puisse apporter cette resolution, d'establir ma demeure où ie me plairoy. Et qu'il me faille tousiours proposer de reuenir, pour m'accommoder aux humeurs communes.

3.9.42 Si ie craingnois de mourir en autre lieu, que celuy de ma naissance: si ie pensois mourir moins à mon aise, esloingné des miens: à peine sortiroy-ie hors de France, ie ne sortirois pas sans effroy hors de ma parroisse. Ie sens la mort qui me pince continuellement la gorge, ou les reins. Mais ie suis autrement faict: elle m'est vne par tout. Si toutesfois i'auois à choisir: ce seroit, ce croy-ie, plustost à cheual, que dans vn lict: hors de ma maison, et loing des miens. Il y a plus de creuecœur que de consolation, à prendre congé de ses amis. I'oublie volontiers ce deuoir de nostre entregent.

Car des offices de l'amitié, celuy-là est le seul desplaisant: et oublierois ainsi volontiers à dire ce grand et eternel adieu. S'il se tire quelque commodité de cette assistance, il s'en tire cent incommoditez. I'ay veu plusieurs mourans bien piteusement, assiegez de tout ce train:

ENGLISH

hid my playful passions under prudence; now that I am old, I dispel my gloomy ones with revelry. Plato's laws, it is true, forbid travel abroad before forty or fifty, to make travel more useful and instructive. I would more readily agree to the other, second article of the same laws, which forbids it after sixty.[48]

But at that age you will never come back from so long a road. What do I care? I undertake it neither to come back from it nor to complete it. I undertake only to keep myself moving while moving pleases me, and I walk for the sake of walking. Those who run after a benefice or a hare are not really running. The ones who run are those who play prisoner's base, running for the exercise of it. My plan can be broken off anywhere; it is not founded on great hopes; each day's journey is an end in itself. And the journey of my life goes the same way. Yet I have seen plenty of faraway places where I would have liked to be kept.

Why not, if Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Diogenes, Zeno, Antipater, so many wise men of the sternest sect, left their country without any cause to complain of it, merely to enjoy another air? Certainly the greatest displeasure of my travels is that I cannot bring to them the resolve to settle wherever I please, and that I must always plan to come back, to fit in with common temperaments.[49]

If I feared dying anywhere but where I was born, if I thought I would die less at ease far from my family, I would hardly leave France; I would not step outside my parish without dread. I feel death constantly pinching my throat or my kidneys. But I am made otherwise: it is all one to me everywhere. Yet if I had to choose, it would be, I think, on horseback rather than in a bed, away from my house and far from my family. There is more heartbreak than comfort in taking leave of one's friends. I willingly neglect this duty of our social manners.

For of all the offices of friendship, this is the only unpleasant one, and so I would gladly forget to say that great and eternal farewell. If any advantage comes from having people around you, a hundred disadvantages come with it. I have seen many men

48 Plato, Laws, Book XII.

49 Stoic philosophers; this Diogenes is Diogenes of Babylon, not the Cynic.

FRENCH

cette presse les estouffe. C'est contre le deuoir, et est tesmoignage de peu d'affection, et de peu de soing, de vous laisser mourir en repos. L'vn tourmente vos yeux, l'autre vos oreilles, l'autre la bouche: il n'y a sens, ny membre, qu'on ne vous fracasse. Le cœur vous serre de pitié, d'ouïr les plaintes des amis; et de despit à l'aduanture, d'ouïr d'autres plaintes, feintes et masquées. Qui a tousiours eu le goust tendre, affoibly, il l'a encore plus.

Il luy faut en vne si grande necessité, vne main douce, et accommodée à son sentiment pour le grater iustement où il luy cuit. Ou qu'on ne le grate point du tout. Si nous auons besoing de sage femme, à nous mettre au monde: nous auons bien besoing d'vn homme encore plus sage, à nous en sortir. Tel, et amy, le faudroit-il acheter bien cherement, pour le seruice d'vne telle occasion. Ie ne suis point arriué à cette vigueur desdaigneuse, qui se fortifie en soy-mesme, que rien n'aide, ny ne trouble; ie suis d'vn poinct plus bas. Ie cherche à coniller, et à me desrober de ce passage: non par crainte, mais par art.

Ce n'est pas mon aduis, de faire en cette action, preuue ou montre de ma constance. Pour qui? Lors cessera tout le droict et l'interest, que i'ay à la reputation. Ie me contente d'vne mort recueillie en soy, quiete, et solitaire, toute mienne, conuenable à ma vie retirée et priuée. Au rebours de la superstition Romaine, où on estimoit malheureux, celuy qui mouroit sans parler: et qui n'auoit ses plus proches à luy clorre les yeux. I'ay assez affaire à me consoler, sans auoir à consoler autruy; assez de pensées en la teste, sans que les circonstances m'en apportent de nouuelles: et assez de matiere à m'entretenir, sans l'emprunter. Cette partie n'est pas du rolle de la societé: c'est l'acte à vn seul personnage.

Viuons et rions entre les nostres, allons mourir et rechigner entre les inconnuz. On trouue en payant, qui vous tourne la teste, et qui vous frotte les pieds: qui ne vous presse qu'autant que vous voulez, vous presentant vn visage indifferent, vous laissant vous gouuerner, et plaindre à vostre mode.

3.9.43 Ie me deffais tous les iours par discours, de cette humeur puerile et inhumaine, qui faict que nous desirons d'esmouuoir par nos maux, la compassion et le dueil en nos amis. Nous faisons valoir nos inconueniens outre leur mesure, pour attirer leurs larmes. Et la fermeté que nous die very pitifully, besieged by all that train: the crowd smothers them. It is against duty, and a sign of little affection and little care, to let you die in peace. One torments your eyes, another your ears, another your mouth; there is no sense or limb they do not batter. Your heart is wrung with pity at hearing your friends' laments, and perhaps with vexation at hearing other laments, feigned and masked. A man who has always had delicate sensibilities has them still more when he is weakened.

ENGLISH

In so great a need, he wants a gentle hand, attuned to what he feels, to scratch him exactly where it itches—or else let no one scratch him at all. If we need a midwife, a "wise woman," to bring us into the world, we surely need an even wiser man to get us out of it. Such a man, and a friend besides, would be worth buying very dearly for service on such an occasion. I have not reached that disdainful vigor which fortifies itself within itself, which nothing helps or troubles; I am a notch lower. I try to go to ground and slip away from this passage, not out of fear, but by skill.

It is not my idea to make this act a proof or display of my constancy. For whom? At that point all my right and interest in reputation will cease. I am content with a death withdrawn into itself, quiet and solitary, entirely my own, befitting my retired and private life. This is the reverse of the Roman superstition, by which a man was thought unfortunate who died without speaking and without his nearest kin to close his eyes. I have enough to do consoling myself without having to console others; enough thoughts in my head without circumstances bringing me new ones; and enough matter to occupy me without borrowing any. This part does not belong to the role of society: it is a play with a single character.

Let us live and laugh among our own; let us go and die and scowl among strangers. For money you can find someone to turn your head and rub your feet, who will press you only as much as you wish, showing you an indifferent face, letting you manage yourself and complain in your own way.

Every day, by reasoning, I rid myself of that childish and inhuman temperament which makes us want our ills to stir compassion and grief in our friends. We inflate our troubles beyond their measure to draw their tears. And the firmness we louons en chacun, à soustenir sa mauuaise fortune, nous l'accusons et reprochons à nos proches, quand c'est en la nostre. Nous ne nous contentons pas qu'ils se ressentent de nos maux, si encores ils ne s'en affligent. Il faut estendre la ioye, mais retrancher autant qu'on peut la tristesse. Qui se faict plaindre sans raison, est homme pour n'estre pas plaint, quand la raison y sera.

FRENCH

C'est pour n'estre iamais plaint, que se plaindre tousiours, faisant si souuent le piteux, qu'on ne soit pitoyable à personne. Qui se faict mort viuant, est subiect d'estre tenu pour vif mourant. I'en ay veu prendre la cheure, de ce qu'on leur trouuoit le visage frais, et le pouls posé: contraindre leur ris, par ce qu'il trahissoit leur guairison: et haïr la santé, de ce qu'elle n'estoit pas regrettable. Qui bien plus est, ce n'estoyent pas femmes. Ie represente mes maladies, pour le plus, telles qu'elles sont, et euite les paroles de mauuais prognostique, et les exclamations composées. Sinon l'allegresse, aumoins la contenance rassise des assistans, est propre, pres d'vn sage malade.

Pour se voir en vn estat contraire, il n'entre point en querelle auec la santé. Il luy plaist de la contempler en autruy, forte et entiere; et en iouyr au moins par compagnie. Pour se sentir fondre contre-bas, il ne reiecte pas du tout les pensées de la vie, ny ne fuit les entretiens communs. Ie veux estudier la maladie quand ie suis sain: quand elle y est, elle faict son impression assez réele, sans que mon imagination l'aide. Nous nous preparons auant la main, aux voyages que nous entreprenons, et y sommes resolus: l'heure qu'il nous faut monter à cheual, nous la donnons à l'assistance, et en sa faueur, l'estendons.

ENGLISH

praise in everyone else in bearing ill fortune, we blame and reproach in our family when the ill fortune is ours. We are not content that they should feel our ills unless they are also distressed by them. We should spread joy, but cut back sadness as much as we can. Whoever has himself pitied without reason is a man who will not be pitied when there is reason.

Always complaining is the way never to be pitied: by playing the pitiable so often, one becomes pitiable to no one. Whoever plays dead while alive is liable to be taken for alive while dying. I have seen some take offense because people found their complexion fresh and their pulse steady, stifle their laughter because it betrayed their recovery, and hate their health because it was not to be pitied. What is more, these were not women. I describe my illnesses, at most, as they are, and avoid words of ill omen and studied exclamations. If not cheerfulness, at least a composed bearing in those present is fitting beside a wise invalid.

Because he sees himself in the contrary state, he does not quarrel with health. He likes to contemplate it, strong and whole, in others, and to enjoy it at least by keeping it company. Because he feels himself sinking, he does not wholly reject thoughts of life, nor shun ordinary conversation. I want to study illness while I am healthy; when it is here, it makes its impression real enough without my imagination helping it. We prepare ourselves beforehand for the journeys we undertake, and have made up our minds to them; the hour when we must mount our horse we give to those around us, and for their sake we stretch it out.

THE BOOK AS A RULE OF LIFE

Publishing his ways keeps him true to them, and he hoped it might bring him a friend.

FRENCH

3.9.44 Ie sens ce proffit inesperé de la publication de mes mœurs, qu'elle me sert aucunement de regle. Il me vient par fois quelque consideration de ne trahir l'histoire de ma vie. Cette publique declaration, m'oblige de me tenir en ma route; et à ne desmentir l'image de mes conditions: communément moins desfigurées et contredictes, que ne porte la malignité, et maladie des iugemens d'auiourd'huy. L'vniformité et simplesse de mes mœurs, produict bien vn visage d'aisée interpretation, mais parce

ENGLISH

I find this unexpected profit in publishing my ways: it serves me, in some measure, as a rule. Sometimes a certain concern comes over me not to betray the story of my life. This public declaration obliges me to keep to my road and not to belie the picture of my character—which is generally less disfigured and contradicted than the malice and sickness of present-day judgments would have it. The uniformity and simplicity of my ways do produce a face that is easy to read; but because que la façon en est vn peu nouuelle, et hors d'vsage, elle donne trop beau ieu à la mesdisance.

FRENCH

Si est-il vray, qu'à qui me veut loyallement iniurier, il me semble fournir bien suffisamment, où mordre, en mes imperfections aduoüées, et cogneuës: et dequoy s'y saouler, sans s'escarmoucher au vent. Si pour en preoccuper moy-mesme l'accusation, et la descouuerte, il luy semble que ie luy esdente sa morsure, c'est raison qu'il prenne son droict, vers l'amplification et extention. L'offence a ses droicts outre la iustice. Et que les vices dequoy ie luy montre des racines chez moy, il les grossisse en arbres. Qu'il y employe non seulement ceux qui me possedent, mais ceux aussi qui ne font que me menasser. Iniurieux vices, et en qualité, et en nombre. Qu'il me batte par là. I'embrasseroy volontiers l'exemple du philosophe Dion.

Antigonus le vouloit piquer sur le subiet de son origine. Il luy coupa broche: Ie suis, dit-il, fils d'vn serf, boucher, stigmatizé, et d'vne putain, que mon pere espousa par la bassesse de sa fortune. Tous deux furent punis pour quelque mesfaict. Vn orateur m'achetta enfant, me trouuant beau et aduenant: et m'a laissé mourant tous ses biens; lesquels ayant transporté en cette ville d'Athenes, ie me suis addonné à la philosophie. Que les historiens ne s'empeschent à chercher nouuelles de moy: ie leur en diray ce qui en est. La confession genereuse et libre, enerue le reproche, et desarme l'iniure. Tant y a que tout conté, il me semble qu'aussi souuent on me loüe, qu'on me desprise outre la raison.

Comme il me semble aussi que dés mon enfance, en rang et degré d'honneur, on m'a donné lieu, plustost au dessus, qu'au dessoubs de ce qui m'appartient. Ie me trouueroy mieux en païs, auquel ces ordres fussent ou reglez ou mesprisez. Entre les masles depuis que l'altercation de la prerogatiue au marcher ou à se seoir, passe trois repliques, elle est inciuile. Ie ne crain point de ceder ou proceder iniquement, pour fuir à vne si importune contestation. Et iamais homme n'a eu enuie de ma presseance, à qui ie ne l'aye quittée.

3.9.45 Outre ce profit, que ie tire d'escrire de moy, i'en ay esperé cet autre, que s'il aduenoit que mes humeurs pleussent, et accordassent à quelque honneste homme, auant mon its style is a little new and out of use, it gives slander too fine an opening.

ENGLISH

Yet it is true that anyone who wants to attack me fairly will, it seems to me, find quite enough to bite on in my avowed and known imperfections, and enough to gorge himself on, without skirmishing at the wind. If, because I forestall him in accusing and exposing myself, he thinks I am drawing the teeth of his bite, it is reasonable that he should take his due by way of exaggeration and extension. Offense has its rights beyond justice. Let him swell into trees the vices whose roots I show him in me. Let him bring in not only those that possess me but also those that merely threaten me —injurious vices, both in quality and in number. Let him beat me with those. I would gladly follow the example of the philosopher Dion.[50]

Antigonus wanted to taunt him about his origins. He cut him short. "I am," he said, "the son of a slave, a butcher, a branded man, and of a prostitute whom my father married because of the lowness of his fortune. Both were punished for some misdeed. An orator bought me as a child, finding me handsome and pleasing, and on his death left me all his goods. Having brought them to this city of Athens, I took up philosophy. Let historians not trouble themselves to look for news of me: I will tell them what there is." A generous and free confession takes the sting out of reproach and disarms insult. Be that as it may, all things considered, it seems to me that I am as often praised beyond reason as disparaged beyond reason.[51]

Just as it also seems to me that since childhood I have been given a place in rank and degree of honor above rather than below what is my due. I would be better off in a country where these orders were either regulated or disregarded. Among men, once a dispute over precedence in walking or sitting goes beyond three replies, it is uncivil. I am not afraid to yield or go ahead unfairly to escape so tiresome a contest. And no man has ever wanted precedence over me without my giving it up to him.

Besides this profit I draw from writing about myself, I have hoped for another: that if my tempera-

50 Montaigne means Bion, whose reply is reported by Diogenes Laertius.
51 Antigonus II Gonatas, king of Macedonia.

FRENCH

trespas, il rechercheroit de nous ioindre. Ie luy ay donné beaucoup de païs gaigné: car tout ce qu'vne longue cognoissance et familiarité, luy pourroit auoir acquis en plusieurs années, il l'a veu en trois iours dans ce registre, et plus seurement et exactement. Plaisante fantasie: plusieurs choses, que ie ne voudroy dire au particulier, ie les dis au public.

Et sur mes plus secretes sciences ou pensées, renuoye à vne boutique de libraire, mes amis plus feaux: Excutienda damus prœcordia. Si à si bonnes enseignes, i'eusse sceu quelqu'vn qui m'eust esté propre, certes ie l'eusse esté trouuer bien loing. Car la douceur d'vne sortable et aggreable compagnie, ne se peut assez acheter à mon gré. Eh qu'est-ce qu'vn amy! Combien est vraye cette ancienne sentence, que l'vsage en est plus necessaire, et plus doux, que des elemens de l'eau et du feu!

ENGLISH

ment happened to please and suit some decent man before my death, he would seek to meet me. I have given him a great deal of ground already won. For all that long acquaintance and familiarity could have gained him in many years, he has seen in three days in this register, and more surely and exactly. A comic notion: many things I would not want to say to any one person, I say to the public.

And for my most secret knowledge or thoughts I send my most faithful friends to a bookseller's shop: I give my inmost heart to be searched. Had I learned by such clear signs of someone who suited me, I would certainly have gone a very long way to find him. For to my mind the sweetness of fitting and agreeable company cannot be bought dearly enough. Oh, what a thing a friend is! How true is that ancient saying, that the use of one is more necessary and sweeter than that of the elements of water and fire![52]

DYING AWAY FROM HOME

A long decline should not be laid on one's family; he would die quietly among strangers.

FRENCH

3.9.46 Pour reuenir à mon conte. Il n'y a donc pas beaucoup de mal de mourir loing, et à part. Si estimons nous à deuoir de nous retirer pour des actions naturelles, moins disgratiées que cette-cy, et moins hideuses. Mais encore ceux qui en viennent là, de trainer languissans vn long espace de vie, ne deuroient à l'aduanture souhaiter, d'empescher de leur misere vne grande famille. Pourtant les Indois en certaine prouince, estimoient iuste de tuer celuy, qui seroit tombé en telle necessité. En vne autre de leurs prouinces, ils l'abandonnoient seul à se sauuer, comme il pourroit. A qui ne se rendent-ils en fin ennuyeux et insupportables? les offices communs n'en vont point iusques là.

Vous apprenez la cruauté par force, à vos meilleurs amis: durcissant et femme et enfans, par long vsage, à ne sentir et plaindre plus vos maux. Les souspirs de ma cholique, n'apportent plus d'esmoy à personne. Et quand nous tirerions quelque plaisir de leur conuersation (ce qui n'aduient pas tousiours, pour la disparité des conditions, qui produict aisément mespris ou enuie, enuers qui que ce soit) n'est-ce pas trop, d'en abuser tout vn aage? Plus

ENGLISH

To return to my subject. There is not much harm, then, in dying far away and apart. After all, we think it our duty to withdraw for natural acts less unsightly than this one, and less hideous. But further, those who have come to the point of dragging out a long stretch of life in languishing should perhaps not wish to encumber a large family with their misery. That is why the Indians in a certain province thought it just to kill anyone who had fallen into such a state. In another of their provinces they left him alone to save himself as best he could. To whom do such people not become burdensome and unbearable in the end? Ordinary duties do not stretch that far.

You perforce teach cruelty to your best friends, hardening wife and children by long habit until they no longer feel and pity your ills. The groans of my colic no longer upset anyone. And even if we did draw some pleasure from their company (which does not always happen, because of the difference in conditions, which easily breeds contempt or envy toward anyone at all), is it not too 52 Persius, Satires; the ancient saying is from Cicero, On Friendship.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

ie les verrois se contraindre de bon cœur pour moy, plus ie plaindrois leur peine. Nous auons loy de nous appuyer, non pas de nous coucher si lourdement sur autruy: et nous estayer en leur ruyne.

much to abuse it for a whole lifetime? The more I saw them willingly constrain themselves for me, the more I would pity their trouble. We are allowed to lean on others, not to lie so heavily on them and prop ourselves up by their ruin.

Comme celuy qui faisoit esgorger des petits enfans, pour se seruir de leur sang, à guarir vne sienne maladie. Ou cet autre, à qui on fournissoit des ieunes tendrons, à couuer la nuict ses vieux membres: et mesler la douceur de leur haleine, à la sienne aigre et poisante. La decrepitude est qualité solitaire. Ie suis sociable iusques à l'excez. Si me semble-il raisonnable, que meshuy ie soustraye de la veuë du monde, mon importunité, et la couue moy seul. Que ie m'appile et me recueille en ma coque, comme les tortuës: i'apprenne à veoir les hommes, sans m'y tenir. Ie leur ferois outrage en vn pas si pendant. Il est temps de tourner le dos à la compagnie.

Like the man who had little children's throats cut to use their blood to cure an illness of his. Or that other man who was supplied with tender young girls to warm his old limbs at night and mingle the sweetness of their breath with his own sour, heavy breath. Decrepitude is a solitary quality. I am sociable to excess. Yet it seems reasonable to me that from now on I should withdraw my tiresomeness from the sight of the world and brood over it alone; that I should huddle up and draw into my shell like the tortoises; that I should learn to see men without clinging to them. I would be doing them an injury on so steep a slope. It is time to turn my back on the company.[53]

3.9.47 Mais en ces voyages vous serez arresté miserablement en vn caignart, où tout vous manquera. La plus-part des choses necessaires, ie les porte quant et moy. Et puis, nous ne sçaurions euiter la Fortune, si elle entreprend de nous courre sus. Il ne me faut rien d'extraordinaire, quand ie suis malade. Ce que Nature ne peut en moy, ie ne veux pas qu'vn bolus le face. Tout au commencement de mes fiéures, et des maladies qui m'atterrent; entier encores, et voisin de la santé, ie me reconcilie à Dieu, par les derniers offices Chrestiens. Et m'en trouue plus libre, et deschargé; me semblant en auoir d'autant meilleure raison de la maladie. De notaire et de conseil, il m'en faut moins que de medecins.

But on these journeys you will be stuck miserably in some hovel where you will lack everything. Most necessary things I carry with me. And besides, we cannot escape Fortune if she sets out to attack us. I need nothing out of the ordinary when I am ill. What Nature cannot do in me, I do not want a pill to do. At the very beginning of my fevers and of the illnesses that lay me low, while I am still whole and close to health, I reconcile myself with God by the last Christian offices. And I feel freer and lighter for it, and it seems to me I have all the better of the illness. I need a notary and counsel less than physicians.

Ce que ie n'auray estably de mes affaires tout sain, qu'on ne s'attende point que ie le face malade. Ce que ie veux faire pour le seruice de la mort, est tousiours faict. Ie n'oserois le dislayer d'vn seul iour. Et s'il n'y a rien de faict, c'est à dire, ou que le doubte m'en aura retardé le choix: car par fois, c'est bien choisir de ne choisir pas: ou que tout à faict, ie n'auray rien voulu faire.

Whatever I have not settled in my affairs while in good health, let no one expect me to settle when ill. What I want to do in the service of death is always done. I would not dare to put it off a single day. And if nothing has been done, it means either that doubt has delayed my choice—for sometimes not choosing is choosing well—or that I wanted to do nothing at all.

3.9.48 I'escris mon liure à peu d'hommes, et à peu d'années. Si ç'eust esté vne matiere de durée, il l'eust fallu commettre à vn langage plus ferme. Selon la variation continuelle, qui a suiuy le nostre iusques à cette heure, qui peut esperer que sa forme presente soit en vsage, d'icy à cinquante ans? Il escoule touts les iours de nos mains: et

I write my book for few men and for few years. If it had been a subject meant to last, I would have had to entrust it to a firmer language. Given the continual change our language has undergone up to now, who can hope that its present form will still be in use fifty years from now? It slips through our 53 The second example recalls King David, given the young Abishag to warm him in his old age (1 Kings 1).

FRENCH

depuis que ie vis, s'est alteré de moitié. Nous disons, qu'il est à cette heure parfaict. Autant en dict du sien, chasque siecle. Ie n'ay garde de l'en tenir là tant qu'il fuira, et s'ira difformant comme il faict. C'est aux bons et vtiles escrits, de le clouer à eux, et ira son credit, selon la fortune de nostre estat.

Pourtant ne crains-ie point d'y inserer plusieurs articles priuez, qui consument leur vsage entre les hommes qui viuent auiourd'huy: et qui touchent la particuliere science d'aucuns, qui y verront plus auant, que de la commune intelligence. Ie ne veux pas, apres tout, comme ie vois souuent agiter la memoire des trespassez, qu'on aille debattant: Il iugeoit, il viuoit ainsin: il vouloit cecy: s'il eust parlé sur sa fin il eust dict, il eust donné; ie le cognoissois mieux que tout autre. Or autant que la bienseance me le permet, ie fais icy sentir mes inclinations et affections. Mais plus librement, et plus volontiers, le faisie de bouche, à quiconque desire en estre informé.

Tant y a, qu'en ces memoires, si on y regarde, on trouuera que i'ay tout dit, ou tout designé. Ce que ie ne puis exprimer, ie le montre au doigt. Verum animo satis hæc vestigia parua sagaci / Sunt, per quæ possis cognoscere cætera tute. Ie ne laisse rien à desirer, et deuiner de moy. Si on doit s'en entretenir, ie veux que ce soit veritablement et iustement. Ie reuiundrois volontiers de l'autre monde, pour démentir celuy, qui me formeroit autre que ie n'estois, fust-ce pour m'honorer. Des viuans mesme, ie sens qu'on parle tousiours autrement qu'ils ne sont. Et si à toute force, ie n'eusse maintenu vn amy que i'ay perdu, on me l'eust deschiré en mille contraires visages.

3.9.49 Pour acheuer de dire mes foibles humeurs: i'aduouë, qu'en voyageant, ie n'arriue guere en logis, où il ne me passe par la fantasie, si i'y pourray estre, et malade, et mourant à mon aise. Ie veux estre logé en lieu, qui me soit bien particulier, sans bruict, non maussade, ou fumeux, ou estouffé. Ie cherche à flatter la mort, par ces friuoles circonstances. Ou pour mieux dire, à me descharger de tout autre empeschement: afin que ie n'aye qu'à m'attendre à elle, qui me poisera volontiers assez, sans autre recharge. Ie veux qu'elle ait sa part à l'aisance et commodité de ma vie. C'en est vn grand fingers every day, and in my lifetime it has changed by half. We say it is now perfect. Every century says as much of its own. I am far from holding it to be so while it keeps slipping away and changing shape as it does. It is for good and useful writings to nail it fast to themselves, and its credit will follow the fortune of our state.

ENGLISH

That is why I am not afraid to put in many private matters whose use is confined to men living today, and which touch the particular knowledge of certain people, who will see further into them than common understanding can. After all, I do not want people to go around arguing, as I often see the memory of the dead stirred up: "He judged this way, he lived this way; he wanted this; if he had spoken at the end he would have said, he would have given; I knew him better than anyone." Now, as far as decency allows, I make my inclinations and affections felt here. But I do so more freely and more willingly by word of mouth to anyone who wishes to know them.

In any case, if you look closely at these memoirs, you will find that I have said everything, or pointed to everything. What I cannot express, I point at with my finger. But for a keen mind these small tracks are enough, / By which you can recognize the rest for yourself. I leave nothing about me to be wished for or guessed at. If people are to talk about me, I want it to be truly and justly. I would gladly come back from the other world to give the lie to anyone who made me out to be other than I was, even if it were to honor me. Even of the living, I find, people always speak otherwise than they are. And if I had not defended with all my strength a friend I have lost, they would have torn him apart into a thousand contrary faces.[54]

To finish telling my weaknesses: I confess that when traveling I hardly ever reach a lodging without wondering whether I could be ill there, and die there, at my ease. I want to be lodged in a place that is quite private to me, without noise, not dingy, smoky or stuffy. I try to flatter death with these trivial circumstances—or rather, to rid myself of every other encumbrance, so that I need attend to nothing but death, which will probably weigh on me enough without any further load. I 54 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things. The lost friend is La Boétie.

FRENCH

lopin, et d'importance, et espere meshuy qu'il ne dementira pas le passé.

La mort a des formes plus aisées les vnes que les autres, et prend diuerses qualitez selon la fantasie de chacun. Entre les naturelles, celle qui vient d'affoiblissement et appesantissement, me semble molle et douce. Entre les violentes, i'imagine plus mal-aisément vn precipice, qu'vne ruïne qui m'accable: et vn coup trenchant d'vne espée, qu'vne harquebusade: et eusse plustost beu le breuuage de Socrates, que de me fraper, comme Caton. Et quoy que ce soit vn, si sent mon imagination difference, comme de la mort à la vie, à me ietter dans vne fournaise ardente, ou dans le canal d'vne platte riuiere. Tant sottement nostre crainte regarde plus au moyen qu'à l'effect.

Ce n'est qu'vn instant; mais il est de tel poix, que ie donneroy volontiers plusieurs iours de ma vie, pour le passer à ma mode. Puisque la fantasie d'vn chacun trouue du plus et du moins, en son aigreur: puisque chacun a quelque choix entre les formes de mourir, essayons vn peu plus auant d'en trouuer quelqu'vne deschargée de tout desplaisir. Pourroit on pas la rendre encore voluptueuse, comme les commourans d'Antonius et de Cleopatra? Ie laisse à part les efforts que la philosophie, et la religion produisent, aspres et exemplaires. Mais entre les hommes de peu, il s'en est trouué, comme vn Petronius, et vn Tigillinus à Rome, engagez à se donner la mort, qui l'ont comme endormie par la mollesse de leurs apprests.

Ils l'ont faicte couler et glisser parmy la lascheté de leurs passetemps accoustumez. Entre des garses et bons compagnons; nul propos de consolation, nulle mention de testament, nulle affectation ambitieuse de constance, nul discours de leur condition future: parmy les ieux, les festins, facecies, entretiens communs et populaires, et la musique, et des vers amoureux. Ne sçaurions nous imiter cette resolution en plus honneste contenance? Puis qu'il y a des morts bonnes aux fols, bonnes aux sages: trouuons-en qui soient bonnes à ceux d'entre deux. Mon imagination m'en presente quelque visage facile, et, puis qu'il faut mourir, desirable. Les tyrans Romains pensoient donner la vie au criminel, à qui ils donnoient le choix de sa mort.

ENGLISH

want it to share in the ease and comfort of my life. It is a large piece of it, and an important one, and I hope from now on that it will not belie the past.

Some forms of death are easier than others, and death takes on different qualities according to each person's fancy. Among natural deaths, the one that comes from weakening and heaviness seems to me soft and gentle. Among violent ones, I find a fall from a cliff harder to imagine than a collapsing building that crushes me, and a cutting sword stroke harder than a arquebus shot. I would rather have drunk the potion of Socrates than stabbed myself like Cato. And though it is all one, my imagination feels as great a difference as between death and life between throwing myself into a blazing furnace and into the channel of a calm river. So foolishly does our fear look more to the means than to the outcome.[55]

It is only an instant; but it weighs so much that I would gladly give several days of my life to get through it in my own way. Since each man's fancy finds more or less bitterness in it, and since each has some choice among the ways of dying, let us try a little further to find one free of all unpleasantness. Could we not even make it pleasurable, like Antony and Cleopatra's companions in death? I leave aside the harsh and exemplary efforts produced by philosophy and religion. But among men of little account there have been some, like a Petronius and a Tigellinus in Rome, who, compelled to take their own lives, lulled death to sleep, as it were, by the softness of their preparations.[56]

They let it flow and glide by amid the idle ease of their usual pastimes. Among girls and boon companions: no talk of consolation, no mention of a will, no ambitious show of constancy, no reasoning about their future condition, but games, feasts, jokes, ordinary popular conversation, music and love poems. Could we not imitate this resolve with a more decent bearing? Since there are deaths good for fools and deaths good for the wise, let us find some good for those in between. My imagination shows me death with an easy face, and, since we must die, a desirable one. The Roman tyrants

55 Socrates drank hemlock in 399 BC; Cato the Younger stabbed himself at Utica in 46 BC.
56 Plutarch tells that Antony and Cleopatra formed a club of "those who will die together," given over to feasting. Petronius was forced to kill himself by Nero, Tigellinus by Otho.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

thought they were giving a criminal his life when they gave him the choice of his death.

Mais Theophraste philosophe si delicat, si modeste, si sage, a-il pas esté forcé par la raison, d'oser dire ce vers latinisé par Ciceron: Vitam regit fortuna, non sapientia. La fortune aide à la facilité du marché de ma vie: l'ayant logée en tel poinct, qu'elle ne faict meshuy ny besoing aux miens, ny empeschement. C'est vne condition que i'eusse acceptée en toutes les saisons de mon aage: mais en cette occasion, de trousser mes bribes, et de plier bagage, ie prens plus particulierement plaisir à ne leur apporter ny plaisir ny deplaisir, en mourant. Elle a, d'vne artiste compensation, faict, que ceux qui peuuent pretendre quelque materiel fruict de ma mort, en reçoiuent d'ailleurs, coniointement, vne materielle perte.

But was not Theophrastus, so refined, so modest, so wise a philosopher, forced by reason to dare to speak this line, which Cicero put into Latin? Fortune, not wisdom, rules our life. Fortune makes the bargain of my life easier, having placed it at such a point that it is now neither needed by my family nor a hindrance to them. That is a condition I would have accepted at any season of my life; but on this occasion, when I am packing up my odds and ends and folding my baggage, I take special pleasure in bringing them neither pleasure nor displeasure by my death. Fortune has, by an artful compensation, arranged that those who may expect some material gain from my death will at the same time suffer a material loss from another quarter.[57]

La mort s'appesantit souuent en nous, de ce qu'elle poise aux autres: et nous interesse de leur interest, quasi autant que du nostre: et plus et tout par fois.

Death often grows heavier for us because it weighs on others; it touches us with their interest almost as much as with our own, and sometimes more, and sometimes entirely.

3.9.50 En cette commodité de logis que ie cherche, ie n'y mesle pas la pompe et l'amplitude: ie la hay plustost: mais certaine proprieté simple, qui se rencontre plus souuent aux lieux où il y a moins d'art, et que Nature honore de quelque grace toute sienne. Non ampliter sed munditer conuiuium. Plus salis quàm sumptus. Et puis, c'est à faire à ceux que les affaires entrainent en plain hyuer, par les Grisons, d'estre surpris en chemin en cette extremité. Moy qui le plus souuent voyage pour mon plaisir, ne me guide pas si mal. S'il faict laid à droicte, ie prens à gauche: si ie me trouue mal propre à monter à cheual, ie m'arreste.

In the comfortable lodging I look for, I do not include pomp and size—I rather hate them—but a certain simple neatness, which is found more often in places where there is less art and which Nature honors with some grace all her own. A meal not lavish but neat. More wit than expense. And besides, it is for those whom business drags through the Grisons in the dead of winter to be caught on the road in such straits. I, who most often travel for pleasure, do not steer so badly. If the weather is foul on the right, I take the left; if I find myself unfit to ride, I stop.[58]

Et faisant ainsi, ie ne vois à la verité rien, qui ne soit aussi plaisant et commode que ma maison. Il est vray que ie trouue la superfluité tousiours superfluë: et remarque de l'empeschement en la delicatesse mesme et en l'abondance. Ay-ie laissé quelque chose à voir derriere moy, i'y retourne: c'est tousiours mon chemin. Ie ne trace aucune ligne certaine, ny droicte ny courbe. Ne trouue-ie point où ie vay, ce qu'on m'auoit dict? comme il aduient souuent que les iugemens d'autruy ne s'accordent pas aux miens, et les ay trouuez le plus souuent faux: ie ne

And doing this, I truly see nothing that is not as pleasant and comfortable as my own house. It is true that I always find superfluity superfluous, and I notice encumbrance even in refinement and abundance. Have I left something unseen behind me? I go back to it: it is always on my way. I trace no fixed line, straight or curved. Do I not find, where I go, what I had been told? Since others' judgments often do not agree with mine, and I have most often found them false, I do not regret

57 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.
58 The first phrase is quoted by the Latin grammarian Nonius, the second is from Cornelius Nepos, Life of Atticus. The Grisons: the Alpine region of eastern Switzerland.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	plains pas ma peine: i'ay apris que ce qu'on disoit n'y est point.	my trouble: I have learned that what people said was there is not.

FOREIGN WAYS

He welcomes foreign food and customs and mocks the French who cling to their own.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.51	I'ay la complexion du corps libre, et le goust commun, autant qu'homme du monde. La diuersité des façons d'vne nation à autre, ne me touche que par le plaisir de la varieté. Chaque vsage a sa raison. Soyent des assietes d'estain, de bois, de terre: bouilly ou rosty; beurre, ou huyle, de noix ou d'oliue, chaut ou froit, tout m'est vn. Et si vn, que vieillissant, i'accuse cette genereuse faculté: et auroy besoin que la delicatesse et le choix, arrestast l'indiscretion de mon appetit, et par fois soulageast mon estomach.	I have as free a constitution and as accommodating a palate as any man in the world. The difference in ways from one nation to another touches me only through the pleasure of variety. Each custom has its reason. Plates of pewter, wood or earthenware; boiled or roast; butter, or walnut or olive oil; hot or cold—it is all one to me. So much so that, as I grow old, I blame this generous capacity, and would need refinement and choice to check the indiscretion of my appetite and sometimes give my stomach some relief.
	Quand i'ay esté ailleurs qu'en France: et que, pour me faire courtoisie, on m'a demandé, si ie vouloy estre serui à la Françoise, ie m'en suis mocqué, et me suis tousiours ietté aux tables les plus espesses d'estrangers. I'ay honte de voir nos hommes, enyurez de cette sotte humeur, de s'effaroucher des formes contraires aux leurs. Il leur semble estre hors de leur element, quand ils sont hors de leur village. Où qu'ils aillent, ils se tiennent à leurs façons, et abominent les estrangeres. Retrouuent ils vn compatriote en Hongrie, ils festoient cette auanture: les voyla à se r'alier; et à se recoudre ensemble; à condamner tant de mœurs barbares qu'ils voyent. Pourquoy non barbares, puis qu'elles ne sont Françoises?	When I have been outside France and people, to be courteous, have asked me whether I wanted to be served in the French style, I have laughed at it and always thrown myself at the tables most crowded with foreigners. I am ashamed to see our countrymen drunk with that foolish temperament that makes them shy away from ways contrary to their own. They seem to be out of their element when they are out of their village. Wherever they go, they cling to their own ways and loathe foreign ones. If they come upon a compatriot in Hungary, they celebrate the event: there they are, rallying and huddling together, condemning all the barbarous customs they see. Why not barbarous, since they are not French?
	Encore sont ce les plus habilles, qui les ont recognuës, pour en mesdire. La pluspart ne prennent l'aller que pour le venir. Ils voyagent couuerts et resserrez, d'vne prudence taciturne et incommunicable, se defendans de la contagion d'vn air incogneu. Ce que ie dis de ceux là, me ramentoit en chose semblable, ce que i'ay par fois apperçeu en aucuns de noz ieunes courtisans. Ils ne tiennent qu'aux hommes de leur sorte: nous regardent comme gens de l'autre monde, auec desdain, ou pitié. Ostez leur les entretiens des mysteres de la cour, ils sont hors de leur gibier. Aussi neufs pour nous et malhabiles, comme nous sommes à eux. On dict bien vray, qu'vn honneste homme, c'est vn homme meslé.	And even these are the cleverest ones, who have at least noticed those customs, if only to speak ill of them. Most go only in order to come back. They travel muffled and closed up, with a silent, uncommunicative caution, guarding themselves against the contagion of an unknown air. What I say of them reminds me of something similar I have sometimes noticed in some of our young courtiers. They keep only to men of their own kind and look at us as people from another world, with disdain or pity. Take away their talk of the mysteries of the court, and they are off their hunting ground—as green and awkward in our eyes as we are in theirs. It is truly said that a decent man is a man of many parts.

FRENCH

Au rebours, ie peregrine tressaoul de nos façons: non pour chercher des Gascons en Sicile, i'en ay assez laissé au logis: ie cherche des Grecs plustost, et des Persans: i'accointe ceux-la, ie les considere: c'est là où ie me preste, et où ie m'employe. Et qui plus est, il me semble, que ie n'ay rencontré guere de manieres, qui ne vaillent les nostres. Ie couche de peu: car à peine ay-ie perdu mes giroüettes de veuë. Au demeurant, la plus-part des compaignies fortuites que vous rencontrez en chemin, ont plus d'incommodité que de plaisir: ie ne m'y attache point, moins asteure, que la vieillesse me particularise et sequestre aucunement, des formes communes. Vous souffrez pour autruy, ou autruy pour vous.

L'vn et l'autre inconuenient est poisant, mais le dernier me semble encore plus rude.

3.9.52 C'est vne rare fortune, mais de soulagement inestimable, d'auoir vn honneste homme, d'entendement ferme, et de mœurs conformes aux vostres, qui aime à vous suiure. I'en ay eu faute extreme, en tous mes voyages. Mais vne telle compaignie, il la faut auoir choisie et acquise dés le logis. Nul plaisir n'a saueur pour moy sans communication. Il ne me vient pas seulement vne gaillarde pensée en l'ame, qu'il ne me fasche de l'auoir produite seul, et n'ayant à qui l'offrir. Si cum hac exceptione detur sapientia, vt illam inclusam teneam, nec enuntiem, reijciam. L'autre l'auoit monté d'vn ton au dessus.

Si contigerit ea vita sapienti, vt omnium rerum affluentibus copijs, quamuis omnia, quæ cognitione digna sunt, summo otio secum ipse consideret, et contempletur, tamen si solitudo tanta sit, vt hominem videre non possit, excedat è vita. L'opinion d'Archytas m'agrée, qu'il feroit desplaisant au ciel mesme, et à se promener dans ces grands et diuins corps celestes, sans l'assistance d'vn compaignon. Mais il vaut mieux encore estre seul, qu'en compaignie ennuyeuse et inepte. Aristippus s'aymoit à viure estranger par tout, Me si fata meis paterentur ducere vitam
Auspicijs, ie choisirois à la passer le cul sur la selle: Visere gestiens,
Qua parte debacchentur ignes,
Qua nebulæ pluuijque rores.

ENGLISH

I, on the contrary, travel thoroughly sick of our ways. I do not go looking for Gascons in Sicily; I have left enough of them at home. I look rather for Greeks, and Persians. I get to know them, I observe them; that is where I lend myself and apply myself. And what is more, I seem to have met with hardly any manners that are not as good as ours. I am not staking much, for I have hardly lost sight of my weathervanes. For the rest, most of the chance company you meet on the road brings more trouble than pleasure. I do not attach myself to it, all the less now that old age sets me somewhat apart and cuts me off from common ways. Either you suffer for others, or others suffer for you.

Both drawbacks are heavy, but the second seems to me even harsher.

It is a rare stroke of fortune, but a relief beyond price, to have a decent man of firm understanding and ways that match your own, who likes to go along with you. I have sorely missed one on all my travels. But such company must have been chosen and won at home. No pleasure has any savor for me without someone to share it. Not even a lively thought comes into my mind without my being vexed at having produced it alone, with no one to offer it to. If wisdom were given me on condition that I keep it shut up and not speak it, I would refuse it. The other writer had raised this a tone higher.[59]

If the wise man were granted such a life that, with an abundance of all things, he could consider and contemplate at his leisure everything worth knowing, yet if his solitude were so great that he could never see a human being, he should depart from life. I like the opinion of Archytas, that it would be unpleasant even in heaven, and to wander among those great and divine celestial bodies, without a companion beside him. But it is still better to be alone than in tedious and foolish company. Aristippus liked to live as a stranger everywhere. If the fates allowed me to lead my life
As I wished, I would choose to spend it with my backside in the saddle: Eager to go and see Where the fires rage and revel,
Where the mists and the rainy dews hold sway.[60]

59 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius; the other writer is Cicero.
60 Cicero, On Duties. The verses are from Virgil, Aeneid, and Horace, Odes.

IS TRAVEL VANITY?

An imagined critic says he carries his trouble with him; Montaigne admits his love of variety.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.53	Auez-vous pas des passe-temps plus aisez? dequoy auez-vous faute? Vostre maison est-elle pas en bel air et sain, suffisamment fournie, et capable plus que suffisamment? La majesté Royalle y a peu plus d'vne fois en sa pompe. Vostre famille n'en laisse-elle pas en reglement, plus au dessoubs d'elle, qu'elle n'en a au dessus, en eminence? Y a il quelque pensée locale, qui vous vlcere, extraordinaire, indigestible? Quæ te nunc coquat et vexet sub pectore fixa? Où cuidez-vous pouuoir estre sans empeschement et sans destourbier? Nunquam simpliciter fortuna indulget. Voyez donc, qu'il n'y a que vous qui vous empeschez: et vous vous suiurez par tout, et vous plaindrez par tout. Car il n'y a satisfaction ça bas, que pour les ames ou brutales ou diuines.	Have you no easier pastimes? What do you lack? Is your house not in a fine, healthy setting, well enough furnished, and more than spacious enough? Royal majesty in all its pomp has been received there more than once. Does your family not leave more families below it in good order than it has above it in eminence? Is there some local worry that ulcerates you, out of the ordinary, impossible to digest? That now burns and torments you, lodged in your breast? Where do you think you can be free of hindrance and disturbance? Fortune never grants her favors unmixed. So you see that no one hinders you but yourself; you will follow yourself everywhere, and complain everywhere. For there is no satisfaction here below except for souls that are either brutish or divine.[61]
	Qui n'a du contentement à vne si iuste occasion, où pense-il le trouuer? A combien de milliers d'hommes, arreste vne telle condition que la vostre, le but de leurs souhaits? Reformez vous seulement: car en cela vous pouuez tout: là où vous n'aurez droict que de patience, enuers la fortune. Nulla placida quies est, nisi quam ratio composuit.	If a man finds no contentment with so good a reason for it, where does he think to find it? For how many thousands of men does a condition like yours mark the limit of their wishes? Just reform yourself: in that you can do everything, whereas with Fortune you have no right but patience. There is no calm repose but the one that reason has composed.[62]
3.9.54	Ie voy la raison de cet aduertissement, et la voy tresbien. Mais on auroit plustost faict, et plus pertinemment, de me dire en vn mot: Soyez sage. Cette resolution, est outre la sagesse: c'est son ouurage, et sa production. Ainsi fait le medecin, qui va criaillant apres vn pauure malade languissant, qu'il se resiouysse: il luy conseillerait vn peu moins ineptement, s'il luy disoit: Soyez sain. Pour moy, ie ne suis qu'homme de la commune sorte. C'est vn precepte salutaire, certain, et d'aisee intelligence: Contentez vous du vostre: c'est à dire, de la raison: l'execution pourtant, n'en est non plus aux plus sages, qu'en moy. C'est vne parole populaire, mais elle a vne terrible estendue. Que ne comprend elle?	I see the reason for this advice, and see it very well. But it would have been quicker, and more to the point, to tell me in one word: Be wise. This resolution lies beyond wisdom; it is wisdom's work and its product. That is what the physician does who goes shouting at some poor languishing patient to cheer up; his advice would be a little less foolish if he told him: Be well. As for me, I am only a man of the common sort. It is a wholesome precept, certain and easy to understand: Be content with what is yours—that is, with reason. Yet carrying it out is no more within the reach of the wisest than within mine. It is a common saying, but its scope is tremendous. What does it not include?
	Toutes choses tombent en discretion et modification. Ie sçay bien qu'à le prendre à la lettre, ce plaisir de voyager, porte tesmoignage d'inquietude et d'irresolution. Aussi	Everything comes down to discretion and qualification. I know very well that, taken literally, this pleasure in traveling is a sign of restlessness and 61 Henry of Navarre stayed at Montaigne in 1584 and 1587. The verse is from Ennius, quoted by Cicero; the maxim is from Quintus Curtius.

62 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

sont ce nos maistresses qualitez, et prædominantes. Ouy; ie le confesse: ie ne vois rien seulement en songe, et par souhait, où ie me puisse tenir. La seule varieté me paye, et la possession de la diuersité: au moins si quelque chose me paye. A voyager, cela mesme me nourrit, que ie me puis arrester sans interest: et que i'ay où m'en diuertir commodément. I'ayme la vie priuee, par ce que c'est par mon choix que ie l'ayme, non par disconuenance à la vie publique: qui est à l'auanture, autant selon ma complexion.

I'en sers plus gayement mon Prince, par ce que c'est par libre eslection de mon jugement, et de ma raison, sans obligation particuliere. Et que ie n'y suis pas reiecté, ny contrainct, pour estre irreceuable à tout autre party, et mal voulu. Ainsi du reste. Ie hay les morceaux que la necessité me taille. Toute commodité me tiendroit à la gorge, de laquelle seule i'aurois à despendre: Alter remus aquas, alter mihi radat arenas. Vne seule corde ne m'arreste iamais assez.

ENGLISH

irresolution. And indeed those are our master qualities, our ruling ones. Yes, I confess it: I see nothing, even in dreams and wishes, on which I could take a stand. Variety alone satisfies me, and the possession of diversity—if anything satisfies me at all. In traveling, what nourishes me is precisely that I can stop without loss and that I have places where I can comfortably turn aside. I love private life because I love it by my own choice, not from unfitness for public life, which perhaps suits my constitution just as well.

I serve my prince all the more gladly because I do it by the free choice of my judgment and my reason, without particular obligation, and because I am not cast out or forced into it by being unacceptable and unwelcome to every other party. And so with the rest. I hate the portions that necessity carves for me. Any advantage on which alone I had to depend would have me by the throat: Let one oar sweep the waters, the other the sands. A single rope never holds me fast enough.[63]

PRECEPTS BEYOND OUR REACH

Moral rules demand more than anyone performs, and laws would hang every man ten times.

FRENCH

3.9.55 Il y a de la vanité, dites vous, en cet amusement. Mais où non? Et ces beaux preceptes, sont vanité, et vanité toute la sagesse. Dominus nouit cogitationes sapientium, quoniam vanæ sunt. Ces exquises subtilitez, ne sont propres qu'au presche. Ce sont discours qui nous veulent enuoyer tous bastez en l'autre monde. La vie est vn mouuement materiel et corporel: action imparfaicte de sa propre essence, et desreglée. Ie m'employe à la seruir selon elle. Quisque suos patimur manes. Sic est faciendum, vt contra naturam vniuersam nihil contendamus: ea tamen conseruata, propriam sequamur. A quoy faire, ces poinctes esleuées de la philosophie, sur lesquelles, aucun estre humain ne se peut rasseoir: et ces regles qui excedent nostre vsage et nostre force?

3.9.56 Ie voy souuent qu'on nous propose des images de vie, lesquelles, ny le proposant, ny les auditeurs, n'ont aucune esperance de suiure, ny qui plus est, enuie. De ce mesme papier où il vient d'escrire l'arrest de

ENGLISH

There is vanity, you say, in this amusement. But where is there not? These fine precepts are vanity, and all wisdom is vanity. The Lord knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain. These exquisite subtleties are fit only for the pulpit. They are arguments that would send us all into the other world with our pack-saddles on. Life is a material and bodily movement, an action imperfect and unruly by its very essence. I make it my business to serve it on its own terms. Each of us suffers his own shade. We must act so as never to strive against universal nature; yet, while respecting it, let us follow our own. What use are these lofty peaks of philosophy, on which no human being can settle, and these rules that exceed our practice and our strength?[64]

I often see people hold up to us patterns of life which neither the speaker nor the listeners have any hope of following, nor, what is more, any wish 63 Propertius, Elegies.

64 Psalm 94, quoted by Saint Paul (1 Corinthians 3); then Virgil, Aeneid, and Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

condemnation contre vn adultere, le iuge en desrobe vn lopin, pour en faire vn poulet à la femme de son compagnon. Celle à qui vous viendrez de vous frotter illicitement, criera plus asprement, tantost, en vostre presence mesme, à l'encontre d'vne pareille faute de sa compaigne, que ne feroit Porcie. Et tel condamne les hommes à mourir, pour des crimes, qu'il n'estime point fautes.

I'ay veu en ma ieunesse, vn galant homme, presenter d'vne main au peuple des vers excellens et en beauté et en desbordement; et de l'autre main en mesme instant, la plus quereleuse reformation theologienne, dequoy le monde se soit desieuné il y a long temps. Les hommes vont ainsin. On laisse les loix, et preceptes suiure leur voye, nous en tenons vne autre. Non par desreglement de mœurs seulement, mais par opinion souuent, et par iugement contraire. Sentez lire vn discours de philosophie: l'inuention, l'eloquence, la pertinence, frappe incontinent vostre esprit, et vous esmeut. Il n'y a rien qui chatouille ou poigne vostre conscience: ce n'est pas à elle qu'on parle. Est-il pas vray?

Si disoit Ariston, que ny vne estuue ny vne leçon, n'est d'aucun fruict si elle ne nettoye et ne decrasse. On peut s'arrester à l'escorce: mais c'est apres qu'on en a retiré la mouelle. Comme apres auoir aualé le bon vin d'vne belle coupe, nous en considerons les graueures et l'ouurage. En toutes les chambrées de la philosophie ancienne, cecy se trouuera, qu'vn mesme ouurier, y publie des regles de temperance, et publie ensemble des escrits d'amour et desbauche. Et Xenophon, au giron de Clinias, escriuit contre la vertu Aristippique. Ce n'est pas qu'il y ait vne conuersion miraculeuse, qui les agite à ondées.

Mais c'est que Solon se represente tantost soy-mesme, tantost en forme de legislateur: tantost il parle pour la presse, tantost pour soy. Et prend pour soy les regles libres et naturelles, s'asseurant d'vne santé ferme et entiere. Curentur dubij medicis maioribus ægri. Antisthenes permet au sage d'aimer, et faire à sa mode ce, qu'il trouue estre opportun, sans s'attendre aux loix: d'autant qu'il a meilleur aduis qu'elles, et plus de cognoissance de la vertu. Son disciple Diogenes, disoit, opposer aux perturbations, la raison: à fortune, la confidence: aux loix, nature. Pour les estomachs tendres, il faut des to. From the very paper on which he has just written the sentence condemning an adulterer, the judge tears off a scrap to write a love note to his colleague's wife. The woman you have just been rubbing against unlawfully will presently, in your very presence, cry out against a like fault in her friend more harshly than Portia would. And many a man condemns others to death for crimes he does not think are faults at all.[65]

ENGLISH

In my youth I saw a fine gentleman offer the public with one hand verses excellent in both beauty and licentiousness, and with the other, at the same moment, the most quarrelsome theological reformation the world has breakfasted on in a long time. That is how men go. We let laws and precepts go their way; we take another. Not only out of loose morals, but often out of opinion and contrary judgment. Listen to a philosophical discourse being read: the invention, the eloquence, the aptness strike your mind at once and move you. Nothing tickles or stings your conscience; it is not your conscience that is being addressed. Is that not true?[66]

So Ariston said that neither a bath nor a lesson is of any use unless it cleans and scrubs. One may linger over the bark, but only after the pith has been drawn out—just as, after drinking the good wine from a fine cup, we look at its engravings and workmanship. In every chamber of ancient philosophy you will find the same workman publishing rules of temperance and at the same time publishing writings on love and debauchery. And Xenophon, in the lap of Clinias, wrote against Aristippean virtue. It is not that some miraculous conversion sweeps over them in gusts.[67]

It is rather that Solon presents himself now as himself, now in the guise of a lawgiver; now he speaks for the crowd, now for himself. For himself he takes free and natural rules, confident of firm and sound health. Let those who are dangerously ill be treated by the greatest physicians. Antisthenes allows the wise man to love and to do in his own way what he finds fitting, without regard to the laws, since he has better judgment than they and more knowledge of virtue. His disciple Diogenes

65 Portia, daughter of Cato and wife of Brutus, a model of Roman wifely virtue.
66 Probably Theodore Beza, whose youthful Latin love poems (1548) preceded his career as a leading Calvinist theologian.
67 Diogenes Laertius reports Xenophon's love for Clinias.

FRENCH

ordonnances contraintes et artificielles. Les bons estomachs se seruent simplement, des prescriptions de leur naturel appetit.

Ainsi font nos medecins, qui mangent le melon et boiuent le vin fraiz, ce pendant qu'ils tiennent leur patient obligé au sirop et à la panade. Ie ne sçay quels liures, disoit la courtisanne Lays, quelle sapience, quelle philosophie, mais ces gens-là, battent aussi souuent à ma porte, qu'aucuns autres. D'autant que nostre licence nous porte tousiours au delà de ce qui nous est loisible, et permis, on a estressy souuent outre la raison vniuerselle, les preceptes et loix de nostre vie. Nemo satis credit tantum delinquere, quantum / Permittas. Il seroit à desirer, qu'il y eust plus de proportion du commandement à l'obeïssance. Et semble la visée iniuste, à laquelle on ne peut atteindre.

Il n'est si homme de bien, qu'il mette à l'examen des loix toutes ses actions et pensées, qui ne soit pendable dix fois en sa vie. Voire tel, qu'il seroit tres-grand dommage, et tres-iniuste de punir et de perdre. Ole, quid ad te, / De cute quid faciat ille, vel illa sua? Et tel pourroit n'offencer point les loix, qui n'en meriteroit point la loüange d'homme de vertu: et que la philosophie feroit tres-iustement foiter. Tant cette relation est trouble et inegale. Nous n'auons garde d'estre gens de bien selon Dieu: nous ne le sçaurions estre selon nous. L'humaine sagesse, n'arriua iamais aux deuoirs qu'elle s'estoit elle mesme prescript.

Et si elle y estoit arriuee, elle s'en prescriroit d'autres au delà, où elle aspirast tousiours et pretendist. Tant nostre estat est ennemy de consistance. L'homme s'ordonne à soy mesme, d'estre necessairement en faute. Il n'est guere fin, de tailler son obligation, à la raison d'vn autre estre, que le sien. A qui prescript-il ce, qu'il s'attend que personne ne face? Luy est-il iniuste de ne faire point ce qu'il luy est impossible de faire? Les loix qui nous condamnent, à ne pouuoir pas, nous condamnent de ce que nous ne pouuons pas.

3.9.57 Au pis aller, cette difforme liberté, de se presenter à deux endroicts, et les actions d'vne façon, les discours de said to set reason against the passions, confidence against Fortune, nature against the laws. Delicate stomachs need strict and artificial regimens. Good stomachs simply follow what their natural appetite prescribes.[68]

ENGLISH

So do our physicians, who eat melon and drink cool wine while they keep their patient bound to syrup and bread soup. "I do not know about books," said the courtesan Lais, "or wisdom, or philosophy; but those people knock at my door as often as anyone else." Because our license always carries us beyond what is lawful and permitted, the precepts and laws of our life have often been narrowed beyond universal reason. Nobody thinks it enough to sin only as far / As you permit. It would be desirable for there to be more proportion between command and obedience. A target that cannot be reached seems unjust.[69]

There is no man so good that, if he submitted all his actions and thoughts to the scrutiny of the laws, he would not deserve hanging ten times in his life—even a man whom it would be a very great loss and very unjust to punish and destroy. Olus, what is it to you / What he or she does with their own skin? And another man might never offend the laws who would not deserve the praise of a virtuous man, and whom philosophy would very justly have whipped. So muddled and uneven is this relationship. We are far from being good men by God's standard; we cannot even be so by our own. Human wisdom has never yet reached the duties it had prescribed for itself.[70]

And if it had reached them, it would prescribe itself others beyond them, toward which it would always aspire and strive. So hostile is our condition to constancy. Man ordains for himself that he must necessarily be at fault. It is not very clever of him to cut his obligation to the measure of a being other than his own. To whom does he prescribe what he expects no one to do? Is it unjust of him not to do what it is impossible for him to do? The laws that condemn us to be unable condemn us for what we are unable to do.

At worst, let this misshapen freedom of presenting oneself in two places, actions one way and words 68 Juvenal, Satires. The disciple is Diogenes the Cynic.

69 Juvenal, Satires. Lais was a famous Greek courtesan of Corinth.
70 Martial, Epigrams.

FRENCH

l'autre; soit loisible à ceux, qui disent les choses. Mais elle ne le peut estre à ceux, qui se disent eux mesmes, comme ie fais, Il faut que i'aille de la plume comme des pieds. La vie commune, doibt auoir conference aux autres vies. La vertu de Caton estoit vigoureuse, outre la raison de son siecle: et à vn homme qui se mesloit de gouuerner les autres, destiné au seruice commun; il se pourroit dire, que c'estoit vne iustice, sinon iniuste, au moins vaine et hors de saison.

ENGLISH

another, be allowed to those who tell of things. But it cannot be allowed to those who tell of themselves, as I do: I must go with my pen as I go on my feet. Life in common must bear some relation to other people's lives. Cato's virtue was vigorous beyond the measure of his age. For a man who took it upon himself to govern others, and who was destined for public service, it might be said that his was a justice that was, if not unjust, at least vain and out of season.

UNFIT FOR PUBLIC LIFE

His plain virtue proved useless in public affairs, which demand bending and compromise.

FRENCH

Mes mœurs mesmes, qui ne desconuiennent de celles, qui courent, à peine de la largeur d'vn poulce, me rendent pourtant aucunement farouche à mon aage, et inassociable. Ie ne sçay pas, si ie me trouue desgouté sans raison, du monde, que ie hante; mais ie sçay bien, que ce seroit sans raison, si ie me plaignoy, qu'il fust desgouté de moy, puis que ie le suis de luy. La vertu assignee aux affaires du monde, est vne vertu à plusieurs plis, encoigneures, et couddes, pour s'appliquer et ioindre à l'humaine foiblesse: meslee et artificielle; non droitte, nette, constante, ny purement innocente. Les annales reprochent iusques à cette heure à quelqu'vn de nos Roys, de s'estre trop simplement laissé aller aux consciencieuses persuasions de son confesseur.

Les affaires d'estat ont des preceptes plus hardis. Exeat aula, / Qui vult esse pius.

3.9.58 I'ay autresfois essayé d'employer au seruice des maniemens publiques, les opinions et regles de viure, ainsi rudes, neufues, impolies ou impollues, comme ie les ay nées chez moy, ou rapportees de mon institution et desquelles ie me sers, sinon si commodeement au moins seurement en particulier: une vertu scholastique et nouice: ie les y ay trouuees ineptes et dangereuses. Celuy qui va en la presse, il faut qu'il gauchisse, qu'il serre ses couddes, qu'il recule, ou qu'il auance, voire qu'il quitte le droict chemin, selon ce qu'il rencontre. Qu'il viue non tant selon soy, que selon autruy: non selon ce qu'il se propose, mais selon ce qu'on luy propose: selon le temps, selon les hommes, selon les affaires.

ENGLISH

Even my own ways, which differ from those now current by scarcely the breadth of a thumb, nevertheless make me somewhat aloof from my age, and unsociable. I do not know whether I am disgusted without reason with the world I frequent. But I know well that it would be without reason if I complained that it was disgusted with me, since I am disgusted with it. The virtue assigned to the affairs of the world is a virtue with many folds, corners and elbows, so that it can fit and join itself to human weakness: mixed and artificial, not straight, clean, constant, or purely innocent. The annals still reproach one of our kings to this day for having too simply let himself be led by the conscientious persuasions of his confessor.

Affairs of state have bolder precepts. Let him leave the court / who wishes to be righteous.[71]

I once tried to employ in the service of public dealings the opinions and rules of living that I had, just as rough, new, unpolished, or unpolluted, as they were when they were born in me or brought back from my upbringing, and which I use in private, if not so conveniently, at least safely: a schoolroom, novice virtue. I found them inept and dangerous there. Whoever goes into a crowd must swerve, keep his elbows in, step back or forward, even leave the straight road, according to what he meets. He must live not so much according to himself as according to others; not according to what he proposes to himself but ac-

71 Lucan, Pharsalia.

FRENCH

Platon dit, que qui eschappe, brayes nettes, du maniement du monde, c'est par miracle, qu'il en eschappe. Et dit aussi, que quand il ordonne son philosophe chef d'vne police, il n'entend pas le dire d'vne police corrompue, comme celle d'Athenes: et encore bien moins, comme la nostre, enuers lesquelles la sagesse mesme perdroit son Latin. Et vne bonne herbe, transplantee, en solage fort diuers à sa condition, se conforme bien plustost à iceluy, qu'elle ne le reforme à soy. Ie sens que si i'auois à me dresser tout à fait à telles occupations, il m'y faudroit beaucoup de changement et de rabillage. Quand ie pourrois cela sur moy, et pourquoy ne le pourrois ie, auec le temps et le soing? ie ne le voudrois pas.

De ce peu que ie me suis essayé en cette vacation; ie m'en suis d'autant degousté. Ie me sens fumer en l'ame par fois, aucunes tentations vers l'ambition: mais ie me bande et obstine au contraire: At tu, Catulle, obstinatus obdura. On ne m'y appelle gueres, et ie m'y conuie aussi peu. La liberté et l'oysiueté, qui sont mes maistresses qualitez, sont qualitez, diametralement contraires à ce mestier là. Nous ne sçauons pas distinguer les facultez des hommes. Elles ont des diuisions, et bornes, mal-aysees à choisir et delicates. De conclurre par la suffisance d'vne vie particuliere, quelque suffisance à l'vsage public, c'est mal conclud.

Tel se conduict bien, qui ne conduict pas bien les autres: et faict des Essais, qui ne sçauroit faire des effects. Tel dresse bien vn siege, qui dresseroit mal vne bataille: et discourt bien en priué, qui haranguerоit mal ou vn peuple ou vn Prince. Voire à l'auanture, est-ce plustost tesmoignage à celuy qui peut l'vn, de ne pouuoir point l'autre, qu'autrement. Ie trouue que les esprits hauts, ne sont de guere moins aptes aux choses basses, que les bas esprits aux hautes. Estoit-il à croire, que Socrates eust appresté aux Atheniens matiere de rire à ses despens, pour n'auoir onques sçeu computer les suffrages de sa tribu, et en faire rapport au conseil?

Certes la veneration, en quoy i'ay les perfections de ce personnage, merite, que sa fortune fournisse à l'excuse de mes principales imperfections, vn si magnifique cording to what is proposed to him; according to the times, the men, the business at hand.

ENGLISH

Plato says that whoever escapes from managing the world with his breeches clean escapes by a miracle. He also says that when he appoints his philosopher head of a government, he does not mean a corrupt government like that of Athens, and still less one like ours, in the face of which wisdom itself would be at its wits' end. And a good plant transplanted into soil very different from its nature much sooner conforms itself to the soil than reforms the soil to itself. I feel that if I had to train myself entirely for such occupations, I would need a great deal of change and patching up. Even if I could do that to myself (and why could I not, with time and care?), I would not want to.

From the little I have tried myself in this occupation, I have been all the more disgusted with it. At times I feel some temptations toward ambition smoking up in my soul; but I brace myself and hold out against them: But you, Catullus, be stubborn and hold firm. I am hardly ever called to it, and I invite myself just as little. Freedom and idleness, which are my ruling qualities, are diametrically opposed to that trade. We do not know how to distinguish men's faculties. They have divisions and boundaries that are delicate and hard to pick out. To infer from ability in private life some ability for public use is to infer badly.[72]

One man conducts himself well who does not conduct others well, and produces Essays who could not produce results. One man lays a siege well who would draw up a battle badly, and reasons well in private who would make a bad speech to a people or a prince. Indeed, it is perhaps rather a sign, in a man who can do the one, that he cannot do the other, than the reverse. I find that lofty minds are hardly less unfit for low things than low minds are for lofty ones. Was it to be believed that Socrates gave the Athenians matter for laughter at his expense because he never managed to count the votes of his tribe and report them to the council?[73]

Certainly the veneration in which I hold that man's perfections deserves that his fortune should furnish so magnificent an example to excuse my 72 Catullus, Poems 8.

73 The story is told in Plato's Gorgias.

FRENCH

exemple. Nostre suffisance est detaillee à menues pieces. La mienne n'a point de latitude, et si est chetifue en nombre. Saturninus, à ceux qui luy auoient deferé tout commandement: Compaignons, fit-il, vous auez perdu vn bon capitaine, pour en faire vn mauvais general d'armee.

3.9.59 Qui se vante, en vn temps malade, comme cestuy-cy, d'employer au seruice du monde, vne vertu naifue et sincere: ou il ne la cognoist pas, les opinions se corrompans auec les mœurs (de vray, oyez la leur peindre, oyez la pluspart se glorifier de leurs deportemens, et former leurs regles; au lieu de peindre la vertu, ils peignent l'iniustice toute pure et le vice: et la presentent ainsi fauce à l'institution des Princes) ou s'il la cognoist, il se vante à tort: et quoy qu'il die, faict mille choses, dequoy sa conscience l'accuse. Ie croirois volontiers Seneca de l'experience qu'il en fit en pareille occasion, pourueu qu'il m'en voulust parler à cœur ouuert.

La plus honnorable marque de bonté, en vne telle necessité, c'est recognoistre librement sa faute, et celle d'autruy: appuyer et retarder de sa puissance, l'inclination vers le mal: suyure enuis cette pente, mieux esperer et mieux desirer. I'apperçois en ces desmembremens de la France, et diuisions, où nous sommes tombez, chacun se trauailler à deffendre sa cause: mais iusques aux meilleurs, auec desguisement et mensonge. Qui en escriroit rondement, en escriroit temerairement et vitieusement. Le plus iuste party, si est-ce encore le membre d'vn corps vermoulu et vereux. Mais d'vn tel corps, le membre moins malade s'appelle sain: et à bon droit, d'autant que nos qualitez n'ont tiltre qu'en la comparaison. L'innocence ciuile, se mesure selon les lieux et saisons.

I'aymerois bien à voir en Xenophon, vne telle loüange d'Agesilaus. Estant prié par vn Prince voisin, auec lequel il auoit autresfois esté en guerre, de le laisser passer en ses terres, il l'octroya: luy donnant passage à trauers le Peloponnese: et non seulement ne l'emprisonna ou empoisonna, le tenant à sa mercy: mais l'accueillit courtoisement, suyuant l'obligation de sa promesse, sans luy faire offence. A ces humeurs là, ce ne seroit rien dire. Ailleurs et en autre temps, il se fera conte de la franchise, own principal imperfections. Our ability is cut up into small pieces. Mine has no breadth, and it is paltry in number as well. Saturninus said to those who had conferred all command upon him: "Comrades, you have lost a good captain to make a bad general."[74]

ENGLISH

Whoever boasts, in a sick time like this one, of employing a natural and sincere virtue in the world's service, either does not know what it is, since opinions grow corrupt along with morals (indeed, listen to them describe it, listen to most of them glory in their conduct and lay down their rules: instead of portraying virtue, they portray sheer injustice and vice, and present it thus falsified for the education of princes); or, if he does know it, he boasts wrongly, and whatever he may say, he does a thousand things for which his conscience accuses him. I would gladly take Seneca's word for the experience he had of it in a similar situation, provided he were willing to speak to me about it with an open heart.[75]

The most honorable mark of goodness in such a necessity is to acknowledge freely one's own fault and other people's; to resist and hold back with all one's power the slide toward evil; to follow that slope reluctantly; to hope better and desire better. In these dismemberments of France and the divisions into which we have fallen, I see everyone laboring to defend his cause, but even the best of them with disguise and lies. Whoever wrote about it frankly would write rashly and wrongly. The most just party is still, even so, a member of a worm-eaten, maggoty body. But in such a body the least diseased member is called healthy, and rightly so, since our qualities have their title only by comparison. Civic innocence is measured according to places and times.

I would very much like to see in Xenophon such praise as this of Agesilaus. Being asked by a neighboring prince, with whom he had once been at war, to let him pass through his lands, he granted it, giving him passage across the Peloponnese; and not only did he not imprison or poison him when he had him at his mercy, but he received him courteously, in keeping with the obligation of his promise, without doing him any harm. To people 74 Saturninus, a Roman officer proclaimed emperor by his troops in the 3rd century AD, as told in the Augustan History.

75 Seneca was tutor and minister to the emperor Nero.

FRENCH

et magnanimité d'vne telle action. Ces babouyns capettes s'en fussent moquez. Si peu retire l'innocence Spartaine à la Françoise. Nous ne laissons pas d'auoir des hommes vertueux: mais c'est selon nous.

Qui a ses mœurs establies en reglement au dessus de son siecle: ou qu'il torde, et émousse ses regles: ou, ce que ie luy conseille plustost, qu'il se retire à quartier, et ne se mesle point de nous. Qu'y gaigneroit-il? Egregium sanctúmque virum si cerno, bimembri
Hoc monstrum puero, et miranti iam sub aratro
Piscibus inuentis, et fœtæ comparo mulæ. On peut regretter les meilleurs temps: mais non pas fuyr aux presens: on peut desirer autres magistrats, mais il faut ce nonobstant, obeyr à ceux icy. Et à l'aduanture y a il plus de recommendation d'obeyr aux mauuais, qu'aux bons. Autant que l'image des loix receuës, et anciennes de cette monarchie, reluyra en quelque coin, m'y voila planté.

Si elles viennent par malheur, à se contredire, et empescher entr'elles, et produire deux parts, de chois doubteux, et difficile: mon election sera volontiers, d'eschapper, et me desrober à cette tempeste. Nature m'y pourra prester ce pendant la main: ou les hazards de la guerre. Entre Cæsar et Pompeius, ie me fusse franchement declaré. Mais entre ces trois voleurs, qui vindrent depuis, ou il eust fallu se cacher, ou suyure le vent. Ce que i'estime loisible, quand la raison ne guide plus. Quo diuersus abis? Cette farcisseure, est vn peu hors de mon theme. Ie m'esgare: mais plustost par licence, que par mesgarde. Mes fantasies se suyuent: mais par fois c'est de loing: et se regardent, mais d'vne veuë oblique.

ENGLISH

of that temperament this would be saying nothing. Elsewhere and in another time, the frankness and magnanimity of such an action will be made much of. Those caped baboons would have laughed at it. So little does Spartan innocence resemble French. We do not lack virtuous men; but they are virtuous by our standards.[76]

Whoever has his ways settled by a rule above his age, let him either twist and blunt his rules, or (what I would rather advise him) withdraw to one side and not meddle with us. What would he gain by it? If I see a man outstanding and holy, I compare this prodigy to a two-bodied child, to fish turned up beneath the startled plow, and to a mule in foal. One may regret better times, but not flee the present ones; one may wish for other magistrates, but one must nonetheless obey these. And perhaps there is more merit in obeying the bad than the good. As long as the image of the received and ancient laws of this monarchy shines in some corner, there I stand planted.[77]

If by misfortune they come to contradict and obstruct one another, and to produce two sides with a doubtful and difficult choice between them, my choice will readily be to escape and steal away from that storm. Nature may lend me a hand in the meantime, or the hazards of war. Between Caesar and Pompey I would have declared myself openly. But among those three robbers who came after, one would have had either to hide or to follow the wind. Which I consider permissible when reason no longer guides. Where are you wandering off to? This stuffing is a little off my theme. I stray, but rather by license than by inadvertence. My notions follow one another, but sometimes from far off; and they look at each other, but with a sidelong glance.[78]

76 Xenophon wrote a eulogy of Agesilaus. "Capettes" were the poor students of the Collège de Montaigu in Paris, named for their short capes.
77 Juvenal, Satires XIII.
78 The three robbers are Octavian, Antony and Lepidus, the Second Triumvirate (43 BC). The Latin is from Virgil, Aeneid V.

ON MY WANDERING STYLE

Like Plato and Plutarch he lets his matter wander; the careless reader, not he, loses the thread.

FRENCH

I'ay passé les yeux sur tel dialogue de Platon: mi party d'vne fantastique bigarrure: le deuant à l'amour, tout le bas à la rhetorique. Ils ne craignent point ces muances: et ont vne merueilleuse grace à se laisser ainsi rouller au vent: ou à le sembler. Les noms de mes chapitres n'en embrassent pas tousiours la matiere: souuent ils la denotent seulement, par quelque marque: comme ces autres l'Andrie, l'Eunuche; ou ceux cy, Sylla, Cicero, Torquatus. I'ayme l'alleure poëtique, à sauts et à gambades. C'est vn art, comme dit Platon, leger, volage, demoniacle. Il est des ouurages en Plutarque, où il oublie son theme, où le propos de son argument ne se trouue que par incident, tout estouffé en matiere estrangere.

Voyez ses alleures au Dæmon de Socrates. O Dieu, que ces gaillardes escapades, que cette variation a de beauté: et plus lors, que plus elle retire au nonchalant et fortuit! C'est l'indiligent lecteur, qui perd mon subiect; non pas moy. Il s'en trouuera tousiours en vn coing quelque mot, qui ne laisse pas d'estre bastant, quoy qu'il soit serré. Ie vois au change, indiscrettement et tumultuairement: mon stile, et mon esprit, vont vagabondant de mesmes. Il faut auoir vn peu de folie, qui ne veut auoir plus de sottise: disent, et les preceptes de nos maistres, et encores plus leurs exemples.

Mille poëtes trainent et languissent à la prosaïque, mais la meilleure prose ancienne, et ie la seme ceans indifferemment pour vers, reluit par tout, de la vigueur et hardiesse poëtique, et represente quelque air de sa fureur. Il luy faut certes quitter la maistrise, et preeminence en la parlerie. Le poëte, dit Platon, assis sur le trepied des Muses, verse de furie, tout ce qui luy vient en la bouche: comme la gargouïlle d'vne fontaine, sans le ruminer et poiser: et luy eschappe des choses, de diuerse couleur, de contraire substance, et d'vn cours rompu. Et la vieille theologie est toute poësie, disent les sçauants, et la premiere philosophie. C'est l'originel langage des Dieux. I'entends que la matiere se distingue soy-mesmes.

ENGLISH

I have glanced through a certain dialogue of Plato's, split into a fantastic motley: the front part about love, the whole lower part about rhetoric. They are not afraid of these changes, and have a marvelous grace in letting themselves be rolled along by the wind like that, or in seeming to. The titles of my chapters do not always embrace their matter; often they only indicate it by some token, like those other titles, the Andria, the Eunuch, or these: Sulla, Cicero, Torquatus. I love the poetic gait, all leaps and gambols. It is an art, as Plato says, light, flighty, daemonic. There are works in Plutarch where he forgets his theme, where the subject of his argument turns up only incidentally, all smothered in foreign matter.[79]

Look at his ways in The Daemon of Socrates. O God, what beauty there is in these lively escapades, this variation, and all the more the more careless and fortuitous it seems! It is the inattentive reader who loses my subject, not I. There will always be some word about it in a corner, which is still sufficient, though it is tightly packed. I go off on a fresh scent indiscriminately and tumultuously; my style and my mind go wandering alike. A man must have a little folly if he does not want to have more stupidity: so say the precepts of our masters, and still more their examples.[80]

A thousand poets drag along and languish in a prosaic way; but the best ancient prose (and I sow it here indiscriminately as if it were verse) shines everywhere with poetic vigor and boldness, and conveys some air of poetry's frenzy. We must certainly concede to poetry mastery and preeminence in speech. The poet, says Plato, seated on the tripod of the Muses, pours out in a frenzy whatever comes into his mouth, like the spout of a fountain, without chewing it over or weighing it; and things escape him of different colors, of contrary substance, and in a broken flow. And the old theology is all poetry, say the learned, and so was the first philosophy. It is the original language of 79 The dialogue is the Phaedrus; the Andria and the Eunuch are comedies by Terence.

80 A dialogue by Plutarch.

FRENCH

Elle montre assez où elle se change, où elle conclud, où elle commence, où elle se reprend: sans l'entrelasser de parolles, de liaison, et de couſture, introduictes pour le ſeruice des oreilles foibles, ou nonchallantes: et ſans me gloſer moy-meſme. Qui eſt celuy, qui n'ayme mieux n'eſtre pas leu, que de l'eſtre en dormant ou en fuyant? Nihil eſt tam vtile, quod in transitu prosit. Si prendre des liures, eſtoit les apprendre: et ſi les veoir, eſtoit les regarder: et les parcourir, les ſaiſir, i'auroy tort de me faire du tout ſi ignorant que ie dy. Puiſque ie ne puis arreſter l'attention du lecteur par le poix: manco male, s'il aduient que ie l'arreſte par mon embrouïlleure.

Voire mais, il ſe repentira par apres, de s'y eſtre amuſé. C'eſt mon: mais il s'y ſera touſiours amuſé. Et puis il eſt des humeurs comme cela, à qui l'intelligence porte desdain: qui m'en eſtimeront mieux de ce qu'ils ne ſçauront ce que ie dis: ils conclurront la profondeur de mon ſens, par l'obſcurité. Laquelle à parler en bon eſcient, ie hay bien fort: et l'euiterois, ſi ie me ſçauois euiter. Ariſtote ſe vante en quelque lieu, de l'affecter. Vitieuſe affectation.

Par ce que la coupure ſi frequente des chapitres, dequoy i'vſoy au commencement, m'a ſemblé rompre l'attention auant qu'elle ſoit née, et la diſſoudre: dedaignant s'y coucher pour ſi peu, et ſe recueillir: ie me ſuis mis à les faire plus longs: qui requierent de la propoſition et du loiſir aſſigné. En telle occupation, à qui on ne veut donner vne ſeule heure, on ne veut rien donner. Et ne fait on rien pour celuy, pour qui on ne fait, qu'autre choſe faiſant. Ioint, qu'à l'aduenture ay-ie quelque obligation particuliere, à ne dire qu'à demy, à dire confuſement, à dire diſcordamment. Ie veux donq mal à cette raiſon trouble-feſte.

Et ces proiects extrauagants qui trauaillent la vie, et ces opinions ſi fines, ſi elles ont de la verité; ie la trouue trop chere et trop incommode. Au rebours: ie m'employe à faire valoir la vanité meſme, et l'aſnerie, ſi elle m'apporte du plaiſir. Et me laiſſe aller apres mes inclinations naturelles ſans les contreroller de ſi pres.

ENGLISH

the gods. I intend my matter to mark its own divisions.

It shows clearly enough where it changes, where it concludes, where it begins, where it resumes, without my interlacing it with words of linkage and stitching brought in for the benefit of weak or careless ears, and without my glossing myself. Who would not rather not be read at all than be read by someone dozing or hurrying off? Nothing is so useful that it can be of profit in passing. If taking up books were taking them in, and seeing them were looking at them, and running through them were grasping them, I would be wrong to make myself out quite as ignorant as I say. Since I cannot hold the reader's attention by weight, it is not so bad if I happen to hold it by my muddle.[81]

"Yes, but he will be sorry afterward that he spent his time on it." Quite so; but he will have spent his time on it all the same. And then there are temperaments of that kind, for whom understanding brings disdain, who will think the better of me for not knowing what I am saying: they will infer the depth of my meaning from its obscurity. Obscurity, to speak in earnest, I hate very much, and I would avoid it if I knew how to avoid myself. Aristotle boasts somewhere of affecting it. A vicious affectation.

Because the very frequent cutting up of chapters that I practiced at the start seemed to me to break attention before it was born and to dissolve it, since it disdains to settle down for so little and collect itself, I have taken to making them longer, so that they require purpose and leisure set aside for them. In such an occupation, if you will not give it a single hour, you will not give it anything. And you do nothing for someone for whom you do something only while doing something else. Besides, perhaps I have some particular obligation to say things only by halves, to say them confusedly, to say them discordantly. So I bear a grudge against this killjoy reason.

And as for these extravagant projects that torment our lives, and these very subtle opinions, if they have truth in them, I find it too costly and too inconvenient. On the contrary, I make it my business to give value to vanity itself, and to asininity, if it brings me pleasure. And I let myself follow my natural inclinations without checking them so closely.

81 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

LOVE OF ANCIENT ROME

Montaigne explains his devotion to Rome and copies out the bull making him a Roman citizen.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.9.60 I'ay veu ailleurs des maisons ruynées, et des statues, et du ciel et de la terre: ce sont tousiours des hommes. Tout cela est vray: et si pourtant ne sçauroy reuoir si souuent le tombeau de cette ville, si grande, et si puissante, que ie ne l'admire et reuere. Le soing des morts nous est en recommandation. Or i'ay esté nourry des mon enfance, auec ceux icy. I'ay eu cognoissance des affaires de Rome, longtemps auant que ie l'ay euë de ceux de ma maison. Ie sçauois le Capitole et son plant, auant que ie sceusse le Louure: et le Tibre auant la Seine. J'ay eu plus en teste, les conditions et fortunes de Lucullus, Metellus, et Scipion, que ie n'ay d'aucuns hommes des nostres.

I have seen ruined houses elsewhere, and statues, and sky and earth: it is always just men. All that is true; and yet, however often I revisit the tomb of that city, so great and so mighty, I cannot help admiring and revering it. The care of the dead is commended to us. Now I have been brought up from childhood with these people. I knew the affairs of Rome long before I knew those of my own house. I knew the Capitol and its layout before I knew the Louvre, and the Tiber before the Seine. I have had the circumstances and fortunes of Lucullus, Metellus and Scipio more in my head than those of any men of our own time.

Ils sont tres passez. Si est bien mon pere: aussi entierement qu'eux: et s'est esloigné de moy, et de la vie, autant en dixhuict ans, que ceux-là ont faict en seize cens: duquel pourtant ie ne laisse pas d'embrasser et practiquer la memoire, l'amitié et societé, d'vne parfaicte vnion et tres-viue. Voire, de mon humeur, ie me rends plus officieux enuers les trespassez. Ils ne s'aydent plus, ils en requierent ce me semble d'autant plus mon ayde. La gratitude est là, iustement en son lustre. Le bien-faict est moins richement assigné, où il y a retrogradation, et reflexion. Arcesilaus visitant Ctesibius malade, et le trouuant en pauure estat, luy fourra tout bellement soubs le cheuet du lict, de l'argent qu'il luy donnoit.

They are long dead. So too is my father, as completely as they; and he has gone as far from me and from life in eighteen years as they have in sixteen hundred. Yet I do not cease to embrace and cultivate his memory, his friendship and his company, in a perfect and very lively union. Indeed, by temperament I make myself more serviceable to the dead. They can no longer help themselves; so, it seems to me, they need my help all the more. That is where gratitude is in its true luster. A benefit is less richly placed where it comes back and is returned. Arcesilaus, visiting Ctesibius when he was ill and finding him in a poor state, quietly slipped under his pillow the money he was giving him.[82]

Et en le luy celant, luy donnoit en outre, quittance de luy en sçauoir gré. Ceux qui ont merité de moy, de l'amitié et de la recognoissance, ne l'ont iamais perdue pour n'y estre plus: ie les ay mieux payez, et plus soigneusement, absens et ignorans. Ie parle plus affectueusement de mes amis, quand il n'y a plus de moyen qu'ils le sçachent. Or i'ay attaqué cent querelles pour la deffence de Pompeius, et pour la cause de Brutus. Cette accointance dure encore entre nous. Les choses presentes mesmes, nous ne les tenons que par la fantasie. Me trouuant inutile à ce siecle ie me reiecte à cet autre.

And by hiding it from him, he also gave him a release from having to be grateful for it. Those who have earned friendship and gratitude from me have never lost them by no longer being here: I have repaid them better and more carefully when they were absent and unaware. I speak more affectionately of my friends when there is no longer any way for them to know it. Now I have taken up a hundred quarrels in defense of Pompey and for the cause of Brutus. That acquaintance between us still lasts. Even present things we hold only by 82 Montaigne's father died in 1568.

FRENCH

Et en suis si embabouyné, que l'estat de cette vieille Rome, libre, iuste, et florissante, car ie n'en ayme, ny la naissance, ny la vieillesse, m'interesse et me passionne. Parquoy ie ne sçauroy reuoir si souuent, l'assiette de leurs rues, et de leurs maisons, et ces ruynes profondes iusques aux Antipodes, que ie ne m'y amuse. Est-ce par nature, ou par erreur de fantasie, que la veuë des places, que nous sçauons auoir esté hantées et habitées par personnes, desquelles la memoire est en recommendation, nous emeut aucunement plus, qu'ouïr le recit de leurs faicts, ou lire leurs escrits? Tanta vis admonitionis inest in locis!

Et id quidem in hac vrbe infinitum: quacumque enim ingredimur, in aliquam historiam vestigium ponimus. Il me plaist de considerer leur visage, leur port, et leurs vestements. Ie remasche ces grands noms entre les dents, et les fais retentir à mes oreilles. Ego illos veneror, et tantis nominibus semper assurgo. Des choses qui sont en quelque partie grandes et admirables, i'en admire les parties mesmes communes. Ie les visse volontiers deuiser, promener, et soupper. Ce seroit ingratitude, de mespriser les reliques, et images de tant d'honnestes hommes, et si valeureux lesquels i'ay veu viure et mourir: et qui nous donnent tant de bonnes instructions par leur exemple, si nous les sçauions suyure.

3.9.61 Et puis cette mesme Rome que nous voyons, merite qu'on l'ayme. Confederée de si long temps, et par tant de tiltres, à nostre couronne. Seule ville commune, et vniuerselle. Le magistrat souuerain qui y commande, est recognu pareillement ailleurs: c'est la ville metropolitaine de toutes les nations Chrestiennes. L'Espaignol et le François, chacun y est chez soy. Pour estre des Princes de cet estat, il ne faut qu'estre de Chrestienté, où qu'elle soit. Il n'est lieu çà bas, que le ciel ayt embrassé auec telle influence de faueur, et telle constance. Sa ruyne mesme est glorieuse et enflée. Laudandis preciosior ruinis. Encore retient elle au tombeau des marques et image d'empire.

Vt palam sit vno in loco gaudentis opus esse naturæ. Quelqu'vn se blasmeroit, et se mutineroit en soy-mesme, de se sentir chatouïller d'vn si vain plaisir. Nos humeurs imagination. Finding myself useless to this age, I throw myself back on that other one.

ENGLISH

And I am so besotted with it that the condition of that old Rome, free, just and flourishing (for I love neither its birth nor its old age), interests me and stirs my passion. And so, however often I revisit the site of their streets and their houses, and those ruins that reach down to the Antipodes, I cannot help lingering over them. Is it by nature, or by an error of imagination, that the sight of places we know to have been frequented and inhabited by people whose memory is held in esteem moves us somewhat more than hearing the account of their deeds or reading their writings? Such is the power of association that lies in places![83]

And in this city it is infinite: wherever we walk, we set our foot on some piece of history. I like to consider their faces, their bearing and their clothes. I chew those great names over between my teeth and make them ring in my ears. I venerate them, and always rise to my feet at such great names. Of things that are in some part great and admirable, I admire even the common parts. I would gladly see these men converse, walk and dine. It would be ingratitude to despise the relics and images of so many decent and valiant men, whom I have seen live and die, and who give us so many good lessons by their example, if only we knew how to follow it.[84]

And then this same Rome that we see deserves to be loved: allied for so long and by so many titles to our crown; the only common and universal city. The sovereign magistrate who commands there is recognized elsewhere as well: it is the metropolitan city of all Christian nations. Spaniard and Frenchman, each is at home there. To be one of the princes of that state, one need only belong to Christendom, wherever it may be. There is no place here below that heaven has embraced with such an influence of favor and such constancy. Even its ruin is glorious and grand. All the more precious for its praiseworthy ruins. Even in the tomb it still keeps marks and images of empire.[85]

So that it is plain that in this one place nature has delighted in her own work. Some might blame themselves, and rebel inwardly, at feeling tickled by so

83 Cicero, On Ends V.
84 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.
85 Sidonius Apollinaris, Poems.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	ne sont pas trop vaines, qui sont plaisantes. Quelles qu'elles soyent qui contentent constamment vn homme capable de sens commun, ie ne sçaurois auoir le cœur de le plaindre.	vain a pleasure. Our fancies are not too vain if they give us pleasure. Whatever they may be, if they constantly satisfy a man capable of common sense, I could not have the heart to pity him.[86]
3.9.62	Ie doibs beaucoup à la Fortune, dequoy iusques à cette heure, elle n'a rien fait contre moy d'outrageux au delà de ma portée. Seroit ce pas sa façon, de laisser en paix, ceux de qui elle n'est point importunée? Quanto quisque sibi plura negauerit, A Diis plura feret: nil cupientium Nudus castra peto: multa petentibus, Desunt multa. Si elle continue, elle me r'enuoyera tres-content et satisfaict, Nihil supra Deos lacesso. Mais gare le heurt. Il en est mille qui rompent au port. Ie me console aiséement, de ce qui aduiendra icy, quand ie n'y seray plus.	I owe much to Fortune, in that up to now she has done nothing outrageous against me beyond what I can bear. Might it not be her way to leave in peace those who do not pester her? The more a man denies himself, the more he will receive from the gods. Stripped bare, I seek the camp of those who desire nothing; those who ask for much lack much. If she goes on like this, she will send me off well content and satisfied. I importune the gods for nothing more. But beware the crash. There are a thousand who are wrecked in port. I console myself easily for what will happen here when I am no longer here.[87]
	Les choses presentes m'embesongnent assez, Fortunæ cætera mando. Aussi n'ay-ie point cette forte liaison, qu'on dit attacher les hommes à l'aduenir, par les enfans qui portent leur nom, et leur honneur. Et en doibs desirer à l'auanture d'autant moins, s'ils sont si desirables. Ie ne tiens que trop au monde, et à cette vie par moy-mesme. Ie me contente d'estre en prise de la Fortune, par les circonstances proprement necessaires à mon estre, sans luy alonger par ailleurs sa iurisdiction sur moy. Et n'ay iamais estimé qu'estre sans enfans, fust vn defaut qui deust rendre la vie moins complete, et moins contente. La vacation sterile, a bien aussi ses commoditez.	Present things keep me busy enough: The rest I leave to Fortune. Nor do I have that strong bond that is said to attach men to the future through children who bear their name and their honor. And perhaps I should wish for them all the less if they are so desirable. I am attached only too much to the world and to this life by myself. I am content to be in Fortune's grip through the circumstances strictly necessary to my existence, without extending her jurisdiction over me in other ways. And I have never thought that being without children was a defect that should make life less complete and less contented. The sterile state has its advantages too.[88]
	Les enfans sont du nombre des choses, qui n'ont pas fort dequoy estre desirées, notamment à cette heure, qu'il seroit si difficile de les rendre bons. Bona iam nec nasci licet, ita corrupta sunt semina. Et si ont iustement dequoy estre regrettées, à qui les perd, apres les auoir acquises.	Children are among the things that have little to make them desirable, especially at this time, when it would be so difficult to make them good. Nothing good can even be born now, so corrupted are the seeds. And yet they give just cause for regret to those who lose them after having had them.[89]
3.9.63	Celuy qui me laissa ma maison en charge, prognostiquoit que ie la deusse ruyner, regardant à mon humeur, si peu casaniere. Il se trompa; me voicy comme i'y entray: sinon vn peu mieux. Sans office pourtant et sans benefice. Au demeurant, si la Fortune ne m'a faict aucune offence	The man who left my house in my charge predicted that I would ruin it, considering my temperament, so little inclined to stay at home. He was wrong: here I am as I was when I came into it,

86 Pliny the Elder, Natural History III.
87 Horace, Odes III.16 and II.18.
88 Ovid, Metamorphoses II.
89 Tertullian.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	violente, et extraordinaire, aussi n'a-elle pas de grace. Tout ce qu'il y a de ses dons chez nous, il y est auant moy, et au delà de cent ans. Ie n'ay particulierement aucun bien essentiel, et solide, que ie doiue à sa liberalité. Elle m'a faict quelques faueurs venteuses, honnoraires, et titulaires, sans substance. Et me les a aussi à la verité, non pas accordées, mais offertes.	if not a little better off. Without office, however, and without benefice. As for the rest, if Fortune has done me no violent and extraordinary injury, neither has she done me any favor. Whatever there is of her gifts in our house was there before me, and more than a hundred years before. I have no essential and solid good of my own that I owe to her liberality. She has done me some windy favors, honorary and titular, without substance. And in truth she has not granted them to me but offered them;[90]
	Dieu sçait, à moy: qui suis tout materiel, qui ne me paye que de la realité, encores bien massiue: et qui, si ie l'osois confesser, ne trouuerois l'auarice, guere moins excusable que l'ambition: ny la douleur, moins euitable que la honte: ny la santé, moins desirable que la doctrine: ou la richesse, que la noblesse.	offered them, God knows, to me, who am entirely material, who will be paid only in reality, and pretty solid reality at that; and who, if I dared confess it, would find avarice hardly less excusable than ambition, nor pain less to be avoided than shame, nor health less desirable than learning, or wealth than nobility.
3.9.64	Parmy ses faueurs vaines, ie n'en ay point qui plaise tant à cette niaise humeur, qui s'en paist chez moy, qu'vne bulle authentique de bourgeoisie Romaine: qui me fut octroyée dernierement que i'y estois, pompeuse en seaux, et lettres dorées: et octroyée auec toute gratieuse liberalité. Et par ce qu'elles se donnent en diuers stile, plus ou moins fauorable: et qu'auant que i'en eusse veu, i'eusse esté bien aise, qu'on m'en eust montré vn formulaire: ie veux, pour satisfaire à quelqu'vn, s'il s'en trouue malade de pareille curiosité à la mienne, la transcrire icy en sa forme. Quod Horatius Maximus, Martius Cecius, Alexander Mutus, almæ	Among her vain favors there is none that so pleases that silly temperament in me which feeds on them as an authentic bull of Roman citizenship, which was granted me when I was last there, pompous with seals and gilt lettering, and granted with all gracious liberality. And because these are issued in different styles, more or less favorable, and because before I had seen one I would have been glad to be shown a specimen, I want, to satisfy anyone who may be sick with a curiosity like mine, to transcribe it here in its exact form. As to the report that Horatius Maximus, Martius Cecius and Alexander Mutus, Conservators of the bountiful[91]
3.9.65	vrbis conseruatores de Illustrissimo viro Michaèle Montano equite sancti Michaèlis, et à cubiculo Regis Christianissimi, Romana Ciuitate donando, ad Senatum retulerunt, S. P. Q. R. de ea re ita fieri censuit. CVM, veteri more et instituto, cupidè illi semper studioséque suscepti sint, qui, virtute ac nobilitate præstantes, magno Reip. nostræ vsui atque ornamento fuissent, vel esse aliquando possent: Nos, maiorum nostrorum exemplo atque auctoritate permoti, præclaram hanc consuetudinem nobis imitandam ac seruandam fore censemus. Quamobrem cum Illustrissimus Michaèl Montanus, Eques sancti Michaèlis, et a cubiculo Regis Christianissimi Romani nominis studiosissimus, et familiæ laude atque splendore et propriis virtutum meritis dignissimus sit, qui summo Senatus Populique Romani iudicio ac studio	City, made to the Senate concerning the conferring of Roman citizenship on the most illustrious Michel de Montaigne, Knight of the Order of Saint Michael and Gentleman of the Chamber of the Most Christian King, the Senate and People of Rome decreed on this matter as follows. WHEREAS, by ancient custom and practice, those who, excelling in virtue and nobility, had been or might one day be of great use and ornament to our Republic, have always been eagerly and zealously welcomed among us, We, moved by the example and authority of our ancestors, decree that this noble custom ought to be imitated and preserved by us. Therefore, since the most illustrious Michel

90 That is, his father.
91 The Latin of the bull is given here in English.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	in Romanam Ciuitatem adsciscatur; placere Senatui P. Q. R.	de Montaigne, Knight of Saint Michael and Gentleman of the Chamber of the Most Christian King, most devoted to the Roman name, is, by the renown and splendor of his family and by the merits of his own virtues, most worthy to be admitted into Roman citizenship by the supreme judgment and favor of the Senate and People of Rome, it pleases the Senate and People of Rome
	Illustrissimum Michaèlem Montanum rebus omnibus ornatissimum, atque huic inclyto populo charissimum, ipsum posterosque in Romanam Ciuitatem adscribi, ornarique omnibus et præmiis et honoribus, quibus illi fruuntur, qui Ciues Patriciique Romani nati aut iure optimo facti sunt. In quo censere Senatum P. Q. R. se non tam illi Ius Ciuitatis largiri quàm debitum tribuere, neque magis beneficium dare quám ab ipso accipere, qui hoc Ciuitatis munere accipiendo, singulari Ciuitatem ipsam ornamento atque honore affecerit. Quam quidem S. C. auctoritatem iidem Conseruatores per Senatus P. Q. R. scribas in acta referri atque in Capitolij curia seruari, priuilegiumque huiusmodi fieri, solitoque vrbis sigillo communiri curarunt. Anno ab vrbe condita CXƆCCCXXXI, post Christum natum M. D. LXXXI. III. Idus Martij. Horatius Fuscus sacri S. P. Q. R. scriba.	that the most illustrious Michel de Montaigne, adorned with every distinction and most dear to this renowned people, be enrolled, himself and his descendants, in Roman citizenship, and be graced with all the rewards and honors enjoyed by those who were born citizens and patricians of Rome or were made so by the best of rights. In which the Senate and People of Rome consider that they are not so much bestowing the right of citizenship on him as paying what is due, nor so much conferring a favor as receiving one from him, who, by accepting this gift of citizenship, has conferred singular distinction and honor upon the City itself. The said Conservators have caused this decree of the Senate to be entered in the records by the clerks of the Senate and People of Rome and kept in the Senate house of the Capitol, and this charter to be drawn up and sealed with the customary seal of the City. In the year 2331 from the founding of the City, 1581 after the birth of Christ, on the third day before the Ides of March. Horatius Fuscus, clerk of the sacred Senate and People of Rome.[92]
	/ Vincent. Martholus sacri S. P. Q. R. scriba.	/ Vincentius Martholus, clerk of the sacred Senate and People of Rome.
3.9.66	N'estant bourgeois d'aucune ville, ie suis bien aise de l'estre de la plus noble qui fut et qui sera onques. Si les autres se regardoient attentiuement, comme ie fay, ils se trouueroient comme ie fay, pleins d'inanité et de fadaise. De m'en deffaire, ie ne puis, sans me deffaire moy-mesmes. Nous en sommes tous confits, tant les vns que les autres. Mais ceux qui le sentent, en ont vn peu meilleur compte: encore ne sçay-ie.	Not being a citizen of any city, I am very glad to be a citizen of the noblest city that ever was or ever will be. If others looked at themselves attentively, as I do, they would find themselves, as I do, full of inanity and nonsense. I cannot get rid of it without getting rid of myself. We are all steeped in it, one as much as another. But those who are aware of it are a little better off—and yet I do not know.

LOOK INTO YOURSELF

The Delphic command turns our gaze inward, where we find only emptiness and vanity.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.9.67	Cette opinion et vsance commune, de regarder ailleurs qu'à nous, a bien pourueu à nostre affaire. C'est vn obiect	This common opinion and practice of looking elsewhere than at ourselves has served our turn plein de mescontentement. Nous n'y voyons que misere et vanité. Pour ne nous desconforter, Nature a reietté bien à propos, l'action de nostre veuë, au dehors. Nous allons en auant à vau l'eau, mais de rebrousser vers nous, nostre course, c'est vn mouuement penible: la mer se brouille et s'empesche ainsi, quand elle est repoussée à soy. Regardez, dict chacun, les branles du ciel: regardez au public: à la querelle de cestuy-là: au pouls d'vn tel: au testament de cet autre: somme regardez tousiours haut ou bas, ou à costé, ou deuant, ou derriere vous.

FRENCH

C'estoit vn commandement paradoxe, que nous faisoit anciennement ce Dieu à Delphes: Regardez dans vous, recognoissez vous, tenez vous à vous. Vostre esprit, et vostre volonté, qui se consomme ailleurs, ramenez la en soy: vous vous escoulez, vous vous respandez: appilez vous, soustenez vous: on vous trahit, on vous dissipe, on vous desrobe à vous. Voy tu pas, que ce monde tient toutes ses veuës contraintes au dedans, et ses yeux ouuerts à se contempler soy-mesme? C'est tousiours vanité pour toy, dedans et dehors: mais elle est moins vanité, quand elle est moins estendue. Sauf toy, ô homme, disoit ce Dieu, chasque chose s'estudie la premiere, et a selon son besoin, des limites à ses trauaux et desirs.

Il n'en est vne seule si vuide et necessiteuse que toy, qui embrasses l'vniuers. Tu és le scrutateur sans cognoissance: le magistrat sans iuridiction: et apres tout, le badin de la farce.

ENGLISH

well. We are an object full of discontent; we see in it nothing but misery and vanity. So as not to dishearten us, Nature has very aptly thrown the action of our sight outward. We go forward with the current; but to turn our course back toward ourselves is a painful movement: the sea too grows turbid and churns when it is driven back on itself. Look, says everyone, at the motions of the heavens; look at public affairs, at this man's quarrel, at that man's pulse, at that other man's will; in short, always look up or down, or to the side, or in front of you, or behind you.

It was a paradoxical command that the god at Delphi gave us long ago: Look into yourselves, know yourselves, keep to yourselves. Bring back into itself your mind and your will, which are being spent elsewhere; you are draining away, you are scattering yourselves; gather yourselves together, hold yourselves up; you are being betrayed, dispersed, stolen from yourselves. Do you not see that this world keeps its gaze all turned inward, and its eyes open to contemplate itself? It is always vanity for you, within and without; but it is less vanity when it is less extended. Except for you, O man, said that god, each thing studies itself first, and has, according to its need, limits to its labors and desires.[93]

There is not one so empty and needy as you, who embrace the universe. You are the investigator without knowledge, the magistrate without jurisdiction, and, when all is said and done, the clown in the farce.

92 That is, 13 March 1581.
93 "Know yourself" was inscribed on Apollo's temple at Delphi.

III.10 Of Husbanding Your Will

De mesnager sa volonté

Recalling his years as mayor of Bordeaux, Montaigne argues for lending yourself to public duties without giving yourself away.

FRENCH

3.10.1 AV prix du commun des hommes, peu de choses me touchent: ou pour mieux dire, me tiennent. Car c'est raison qu'elles touchent, pourueu qu'elles ne nous possedent. I'ay grand soin d'augmenter par estude, et par discours, ce priuilege d'insensibilité, qui est naturellement bien auancé en moy. I'espouse, et me passionne par consequent, de peu de choses. I'ay la veuë clere: mais ie l'attache à peu d'obiects: le sens delicat et mol: mais l'apprehension et l'application, ie l'ay dure et sourde. Ie m'engage difficilement. Autant que ie puis ie m'employe tout à moy.

Et en ce subiect mesme, ie briderois pourtant et soustiendrois volontiers, mon affection, qu'elle ne s'y plonge trop entiere: puis que c'est vn subiect, que ie possede à la mercy d'autruy, et sur lequel la Fortune a plus de droict que ie n'ay. De maniere, que iusques à la santé, que i'estime tant, il me seroit besoing, de ne la pas desirer, et m'y addonner si furieusement, que i'en trouue les maladies importables. On se doibt moderer, entre la haine de la douleur, et l'amour de la volupté. Et ordonne Platon vne moyenne route de vie entre les deux. Mais aux affections qui me distrayent de moy, et attachent ailleurs, à celles là certes m'oppose-ie de toute ma force.

Mon opinion est, qu'il se faut prester à autruy, et ne se donner qu'à soy-mesme. Si ma volonté se trouuoit aysée à s'hypothequer et à s'appliquer, ie n'y durerois pas. Ie suis trop tendre, et par nature et par vsage, Fugax rerum, securâque in otia natus. Les debats contestez et opiniastrez, qui donneroient en fin aduantage à mon aduersaire; l'issue qui rendroit honteuse ma chaulde poursuitte, me rongeroit à l'aduanture bien cruellement. Si ie mordois à mesme, comme font les autres; mon ame n'auroit iamais la force de porter les alarmes, et emotions, qui suyuent ceux qui embrassent tant. Elle seroit incontinent disloquée par cette agitation intestine.

ENGLISH

Compared with most men, few things touch me, or, to put it better, hold me. For it is reasonable that things should touch us, provided they do not possess us. I take great care to increase by study and reasoning this privilege of insensibility, which is naturally well advanced in me. Consequently there are few things I espouse and feel passionate about. My sight is clear, but I fix it on few objects; my feeling is delicate and tender, but my grasp and application are tough and dull. I commit myself with difficulty. As much as I can, I employ myself entirely on myself.

And even in this subject I would still gladly bridle and hold back my affection, so that it does not plunge into it too wholly, since it is a subject I possess at the mercy of others, and over which Fortune has more right than I have. So that even health, which I value so highly, I ought not to desire and give myself up to so furiously as to find illnesses unbearable. We should moderate ourselves between hatred of pain and love of pleasure; and Plato prescribes a middle course of life between the two. But the affections that distract me from myself and attach me elsewhere, those I certainly oppose with all my strength.[1]

My opinion is that we should lend ourselves to others and give ourselves only to ourselves. If my will found it easy to mortgage and commit itself, I would not last. I am too tender, both by nature and by habit: Shunning affairs, and born for carefree leisure. Hotly contested and stubborn disputes that ended by giving my opponent the advantage, an outcome that made my heated pursuit shameful, might perhaps gnaw at me quite cruelly. If I bit into things as deeply as others do, my soul would never have the strength to bear the alarms and emotions that pursue those who embrace so much. It would at once be dislocated by this internal agitation.[2]

1 Plato, Laws.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Si quelquefois on m'a poussé au maniement d'affaires estrangeres, i'ay promis de les prendre en main, non pas au poulmon et au foye; de m'en charger, non de les incorporer: de m'en soigner, ouy; de m'en passionner, nullement: i'y regarde, mais ie ne les couue point. I'ay assez affaire à disposer et ranger la presse domestique que i'ay dans mes entrailles, et dans mes veines, sans y loger, et me fouler d'vne presse estrangere. Et suis assez interessé de mes affaires essentiels, propres, et naturels, sans en conuier d'autres forains. Ceux qui sçauent combien ils se doiuent, et de combien d'offices ils sont obligez à eux, trouuent que Nature leur a donné cette commission plaine assez, et nullement oysifue.

If I have sometimes been pushed into managing other people's affairs, I have promised to take them in hand, not into my lungs and liver; to take them on, not to incorporate them; to take care of them, yes; to be passionate about them, not at all. I watch over them, but I do not brood on them. I have enough to do in arranging and ordering the domestic throng I have in my bowels and in my veins, without lodging a foreign throng there and getting crushed by it. And I am concerned enough with my own essential, proper and natural affairs without inviting others in from outside. Those who know how much they owe themselves, and by how many duties they are bound to themselves, find that Nature has given them a commission quite full enough, and by no means idle.

Tu as bien largement affaire chez toy, ne t'esloigne pas.

You have plenty to do at home; do not go far away.

3.10.2 Les hommes se donnent à louage. Leurs facultez ne sont pas pour eux; elles sont pour ceux, à qui ils s'asseruissent; leurs locataires sont chez eux, ce ne sont pas eux. Cette humeur commune ne me plaist pas. Il faut mesnager la liberté de nostre ame, et ne l'hypotequer qu'aux occasions iustes. Lesquelles sont en bien petit nombre, si nous iugeons sainement. Voyez les gens appris à se laisser emporter et saisir, ils le font par tout. Aux petites choses comme aux grandes; à ce qui ne les touche point, comme à ce qui les touche. Ils s'ingerent indifferemment où il y a de la besongne; et sont sans vie, quand ils sont sans agitation tumultuaire.

Men hire themselves out. Their faculties are not for themselves; they are for those to whom they enslave themselves; it is their tenants who are at home in them, not they. This common temperament does not please me. We must husband the freedom of our soul and mortgage it only on just occasions, which are very few in number if we judge soundly. Look at people who have learned to let themselves be carried away and seized: they do it everywhere, in small things as in great, in what does not concern them as in what does. They thrust themselves in indiscriminately wherever there is work to be done, and they are lifeless when they are without tumultuous agitation.

In negotiis sunt, negotij causa. Ils ne cherchent la besongne que pour embesongnement. Ce n'est pas, qu'ils vueillent aller, tant, comme c'est, qu'ils ne se peuuent tenir. Ne plus ne moins, qu'vne pierre esbranlée en sa cheute, qui ne s'arreste iusqu'à tant qu'elle se couche. L'occupation est à certaine maniere de gents, marque de suffisance et de dignité. Leur esprit cherche son repos au bransle, comme les enfans au berceau. Ils se peuuent dire autant seruiables à leurs amis, comme importuns à eux mesmes. Personne ne distribue son argent à autruy, chacun y distribue son temps et sa vie. Il n'est rien dequoy nous soyons si prodigues, que de ces choses là, desquelles seules l'auarice nous seroit vtile et louable.

They are busy for the sake of being busy. They seek work only to keep themselves busy. It is not so much that they want to go as that they cannot keep still: just like a stone set rolling as it falls, which does not stop until it comes to rest. For a certain kind of people, being occupied is a mark of ability and dignity. Their mind seeks its rest in motion, like children in the cradle. They may call themselves as serviceable to their friends as they are troublesome to themselves. No one gives away his money to others; everyone gives away his time and his life. There is nothing we are so prodigal

2 Ovid, Tristia III.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

with as those things in which alone avarice would be useful and praiseworthy.[3]

Ie prens vne complexion toute diuerse. Ie me tiens sur moy. Et communément desire mollement ce que ie desire, et desire peu: m'occupe et embesongne de mesme, rarement et tranquillement. Tout ce qu'ils veulent et conduisent, ils le font de toute leur volonté et vehemence. Il y a tant de mauuais pas, que pour le plus seur, il faut vn peu legerement et superficiellement couler ce monde: et le glisser, non pas l'enfoncer. La volupté mesme, est douloureuse en sa profondeur. Incedis per ignes / Subpositos cineri doloso.

My constitution is quite different. I keep myself to myself. And usually what I desire I desire mildly, and I desire little; I occupy and busy myself in the same way, rarely and calmly. Whatever they want and undertake, they do with all their will and vehemence. There are so many bad passes that, to be safest, we must skim over this world a little lightly and on the surface, and slide over it, not sink into it. Even pleasure is painful in its depths. You are walking over fires / hidden beneath treacherous ash.[4]

MAYOR OF BORDEAUX

Montaigne recounts his election and tells the citizens plainly what to expect of him.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.10.3 Messieurs de Bordeaux m'esleurent Maire de leur ville, estant esloigné de France; et encore plus esloigné d'vn tel pensement. Ie m'en excusay. Mais on m'apprint que i'auois tort; le commandement du Roy s'y interposant aussi. C'est vne charge, qui doit sembler d'autant plus belle, qu'elle n'a, ny loyer ny gain, autre que l'honneur de son execution. Elle dure deux ans; mais elle peut estre continuée par seconde eslection. Ce qui aduient tres rarement. Elle le fut à moy; et ne l'auoit esté que deux fois auparauant: quelques années y auoit, à Monsieur de Lansac; et fraichement à Monsieur de Biron Mareschal de France. En la place duquel ie succeday; et laissay la mienne, à Monsieur de Matignon aussi Mareschal de France.

The gentlemen of Bordeaux elected me mayor of their city while I was far from France, and still farther from any such thought. I excused myself. But I was told that I was wrong, the king's command also intervening. It is an office that should seem all the finer for having no pay or gain other than the honor of performing it. It lasts two years, but it can be extended by a second election, which happens very rarely. It happened to me, and had happened only twice before: some years earlier to Monsieur de Lansac, and recently to Monsieur de Biron, Marshal of France, whom I succeeded; and I left my place to Monsieur de Matignon, also Marshal of France.[5]

Glorieux de si noble assistance. Vterque bonus pacis bellique minister. La Fortune voulut part à ma promotion, par cette particuliere circonstance qu'elle y mit du sien. Non vaine du tout. Car Alexandre desdaigna les Ambassadeurs Corinthiens qui lui offroyent la bourgeoisie de leur ville; mais quand ils vindrent à luy deduire, comme Bacchus et Hercules estoyent aussi en ce registre, il les en remercia gratieusement.

Proud of such noble company. Both good servants in peace and in war. Fortune wanted a share in my promotion through this particular circumstance, which she contributed on her own account. Not altogether vain. For Alexander scorned the Corinthian ambassadors who offered him the citizenship of their city; but when they went on to explain to him that Bacchus and Hercules were also on that register, he thanked them graciously.[6]

3.10.4 A mon arriuée, ie me deschiffray fidelement, et conscientieusement, tout tel que ie me sens estre: sans memoire, sans vigilance, sans experience, et sans

On my arrival I deciphered myself to them faithfully and conscientiously, exactly as I feel I am: without memory, without vigilance, without ex-

3 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.
4 Horace, Odes II.1.
5 Montaigne was elected in 1581 while traveling in Italy, reelected in 1583, and served until 1585.
6 Adapted from Virgil, Aeneid XI.

FRENCH

vigueur: sans hayne aussi, sans ambition, sans auarice, et sans violence: à ce qu'ils fussent informez et instruicts de ce qu'ils auoyent à attendre de mon seruice. Et par ce que la cognoissance de feu mon pere les auoit seule incitez à cela, et l'honneur de sa memoire: ie leur adioustay bien clairement, que ie serois tres-marry que chose quelconque fist autant d'impression en ma volonté, comme auoyent faict autrefois en la sienne, leurs affaires, et leur ville, pendant qu'il l'auoit en gouuernement, en ce lieu mesme auquel ils m'auoyent appellé.

Il me souuenoit, de l'auoir veu vieil, en mon enfance, l'ame cruellement agitée de cette tracasserie publique; oubliant le doux air de sa maison, où la foiblesse des ans l'auoit attaché long temps auant; et son mesnage, et sa santé; et mesprisant certes sa vie, qu'il y cuida perdre, engagé pour eux, à des longs et penibles voyages. Il estoit tel; et luy partoit cette humeur d'vne grande bonté de nature. Il ne fut iamais ame plus charitable et populaire. Ce train, que ie louë en autruy, ie n'ayme point à le suiure. Et ne suis pas sans excuse. Il auoit ouy dire, qu'il se falloit oublier pour le prochain; que le particulier ne venoit en aucune consideration au prix du general.

La plus part des regles et preceptes du monde prennent ce train, de nous pousser hors de nous, et chasser en la place, à l'vsage de la societé publique. Ils ont pensé faire vn bel effect, de nous destourner et distraire de nous; presupposans que nous n'y tinsions que trop, et d'vne attache trop naturelle; et n'ont espargné rien à dire pour cette fin. Car il n'est pas nouueau aux sages, de prescher les choses comme elles seruent, non comme elles sont. La verité a ses empeschements, incommoditez et incompatibilitez auec nous. Il nous faut souuent tromper, afin que nous ne nous trompions. Et siller nostre veuë, estourdir nostre entendement, pour les redresser et amender.

Imperiti enim iudicant, et qui frequenter in hoc ipsum fallendi sunt, ne errent. Quand ils nous ordonnent, d'aymer auant nous, trois, quatre, et cinquante degrez de choses; ils representent l'art des archers, qui pour arriuer au poinct, vont prenant leur visée grande espace au dessus de la perience and without vigor; also without hatred, without ambition, without avarice and without violence; so that they would be informed and instructed about what they had to expect from my service. And because it was knowledge of my late father alone that had moved them to this, and the honor of his memory, I added very clearly that I would be very sorry if anything whatever made as much impression on my will as their affairs and their city had once made on his, while he was governing it, in the very place to which they had called me.[7]

ENGLISH

I remembered having seen him in my childhood, an old man, his soul cruelly agitated by this public turmoil, forgetting the sweet air of his home, to which the weakness of age had long since attached him, and his household, and his health; and truly despising his life, which he nearly lost through it, committed on their behalf to long and painful journeys. That is how he was; and this temperament came from a great goodness of nature. There was never a more charitable and public-spirited soul. This course, which I praise in others, I do not like to follow. And I am not without excuse. He had heard it said that one must forget oneself for one's neighbor, that the individual counted for nothing compared with the general.

Most of the world's rules and precepts take this course: they push us out of ourselves and drive us into the public square, for the use of public society. They thought they would achieve a fine effect by turning us away and distracting us from ourselves, presupposing that we cling to ourselves only too much, and with too natural a bond; and they have spared no words to that end. For it is nothing new for the wise to preach things as they serve, not as they are. Truth has its obstacles, inconveniences and incompatibilities with us. We must often be deceived so that we may not deceive ourselves, and have our sight blindfolded and our understanding stunned in order to straighten and correct them.

For it is the ignorant who judge, and they must often be deceived on this very point, so that they may not err. When they order us to love three, four and fifty grades of things before ourselves, they imitate the skill of archers who, to hit the mark, take their 7 Pierre Eyquem was mayor of Bordeaux from 1554 to 1556.

FRENCH

bute. Pour dresser vn bois courbe, on le recourbe au rebours.

3.10.5 I'estime qu'au temple de Pallas, comme nous voyons en toutes autres religions, il y auoit des mysteres apparens, pour estre montrez au peuple; et d'autres mysteres plus secrets, et plus haults, pour estre montrés seulement à ceux qui en estoyent profez. Il est vray-semblable qu'en ceux-cy, se trouue le vray poinct de l'amitié que chacun se doit. Non vne amitié faulce, qui nous faict embrasser la gloire, la science, la richesse, et telles choses, d'vne affection principalle et immoderée, comme membres de nostre estre; ny vne amitié molle et indiscrette; en laquelle il aduient ce qui se voit au lierre, qu'il corrompt et ruyne la paroy qu'il accole. Mais vne amitié salutaire et reglée; esgalement vtile et plaisante.

Qui en sçait les deuoirs, et les exerce, il est vrayement du cabinet des Muses; il a attaint le sommet de la sagesse humaine, et de nostre bon heur. Cettuy-cy, sçachant exactement ce qu'il se doit, trouue dans son rolle, qu'il doit appliquer à soy, l'vsage des autres hommes, et du monde; et pour ce faire, contribuer à la societé publique les deuoirs et offices qui le touchent. Qui ne vit aucunement à autruy, ne vit guere à soy. Qui sibi amicus est, scito hunc amicum omnibus esse. La principale charge que nous ayons, c'est à chacun sa conduite. Et est ce pourquoy nous sommes icy.

Comme qui oublieroit de bien et saintement viure; et penseroit estre quitte de son deuoir, en y acheminant et dressant les autres; ce seroit vn sot. Tout de mesme, qui abandonne en son propre, le sainement et gayement viure, pour en seruir autruy, prent à mon gré vn mauuais et desnaturé party.

3.10.6 Ie ne veux pas, qu'on refuse aux charges qu'on prend, l'attention, les pas, les parolles, et la sueur, et le sang au besoing: Non ipse pro charis amicis / Aut patria timidus perire. Mais c'est par emprunt et accidentalement; l'esprit se tenant tousiours en repos et en santé: non pas sans action, mais sans vexation, sans passion. L'agir simplement, luy couste si peu, qu'en dormant mesme il aim a great distance above the target. To straighten a crooked stick, you bend it back the other way.[8]

ENGLISH

I believe that in the temple of Pallas, as we see in all other religions, there were outward mysteries to be shown to the people, and other mysteries, more secret and higher, to be shown only to those who were initiated into them. It is likely that in these is found the true point of the friendship that each man owes himself. Not a false friendship that makes us embrace glory, learning, riches and such things with a principal and immoderate affection, as if they were members of our being; nor a soft and indiscriminate friendship, in which there happens what we see with ivy, which corrupts and ruins the wall it clings to; but a wholesome and well-ordered friendship, equally useful and pleasant.

Whoever knows its duties and practices them truly belongs to the inner chamber of the Muses; he has reached the summit of human wisdom and of our happiness. Such a man, knowing exactly what he owes himself, finds in his part that he must apply to himself the use of other men and of the world, and to do so must contribute to public society the duties and services that fall to him. He who in no way lives for others hardly lives for himself. Know that he who is a friend to himself is a friend to all. The principal charge we have is, for each of us, his own conduct. And that is what we are here for.[9]

Just as anyone who forgot to live well and holily, and thought he had discharged his duty by guiding and training others to do so, would be a fool, so likewise anyone who gives up living healthily and cheerfully in his own person in order to serve others with it makes, to my mind, a bad and unnatural choice.

I do not want anyone to refuse to the charges he takes on his attention, his steps, his words, his sweat, and his blood if need be: Not himself afraid to die / for dear friends or for his country. But this is by way of loan and incidentally, the mind keeping itself always in repose and in health: not without action, but without vexation, without passion.

8 Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory.
9 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

agit. Mais il luy faut donner le bransle, auec discretion. Car le corps reçoit les charges qu'on luy met sus, iustement selon qu'elles sont: l'esprit les estend et les appesantit souuent à ses despens, leur donnant la mesure que bon luy semble. On faict pareilles choses auec diuers efforts, et differente contention de volonté.

L'vn va bien sans l'autre. Car combien de gens se hazardent tous les iours aux guerres, dequoy il ne leur chault: et se pressent aux dangers des battailles, desquelles la perte, ne leur troublera pas le voisin sommeil? Tel en sa maison, hors de ce danger, qu'il n'oseroit auoir regardé, est plus passionné de l'yssue de cette guerre, et en a l'ame plus trauaillée, que n'a le soldat qui y employe son sang et sa vie. I'ay peu me mesler des charges publiques, sans me despartir de moy, de la largeur d'vne ongle, et me donner à autruy sans m'oster à moy. Cette aspreté et violence de desirs, empesche plus, qu'elle ne sert à la conduitte de ce qu'on entreprend.

Nous remplit d'impatience enuers les euenemens, ou contraires, ou tardifs: et d'aigreur et de soupçon enuers ceux, auec qui nous negotions. Nous ne conduisons iamais bien la chose de laquelle nous sommes possedez et conduicts. Malè cuncta ministrat / Impetus. Celuy qui n'y employe que son iugement, et son addresse, il y procede plus gayement: il feint, il ploye, il differe tout à son aise, selon le besoing des occasions: il faut d'atteinte, sans tourment, et sans affliction, prest et entier pour vne nouuelle entreprise: il marche tousiours la bride à la main. En celuy qui est enyuré de cette intention violente et tyrannique, on voit par necessité beaucoup d'imprudence et d'iniustice. L'impetuosité de son desir l'emporte.

Ce sont mouuements temeraires, et, si Fortune n'y preste beaucoup, de peu de fruict. La philosophie veut qu'au chastiement des offences receuës, nous en distrayons la cholere: non afin que la vengeance en soit moindre, ains au rebours, afin qu'elle en soit d'autant mieux assenee et plus poisante. A quoy il luy semble que cette impetuosité porte empeschement. Non seulement la cholere trouble:

ENGLISH

Simply acting costs it so little that it acts even in sleep. But it must be set in motion with discretion. For the body receives the burdens laid on it exactly as they are; the mind often extends them and makes them heavier at its own expense, giving them whatever measure it pleases. We do the same things with different efforts and different strains of will.[10]

The one goes perfectly well without the other. For how many people risk themselves every day in wars that mean nothing to them, and press into the dangers of battles whose loss will not trouble their next night's sleep? Meanwhile another man at home, out of this danger, which he would not have dared to look at, is more passionate about the outcome of the war, and has his soul more tormented by it, than the soldier who spends his blood and his life in it. I have been able to take part in public offices without departing from myself by the breadth of a fingernail, and to give myself to others without taking myself away from myself. This harshness and violence of desire hinders more than it helps in carrying out what we undertake.

It fills us with impatience toward events that are adverse or slow, and with bitterness and suspicion toward those we are dealing with. We never conduct well a thing by which we are possessed and conducted. Everything is badly handled / by impetuosity. He who brings only his judgment and his skill to it proceeds more cheerfully: he feints, he bends, he postpones, entirely at his ease, as occasions require; he misses his stroke without torment and without affliction, ready and whole for a new undertaking; he always walks with the bridle in his hand. In the man who is drunk with this violent and tyrannical purpose, one necessarily sees much imprudence and injustice. The impetuosity of his desire carries him away.[11]

These are rash movements, and, unless Fortune contributes a great deal, of little fruit. Philosophy wants us to remove anger from the punishment of offenses we have received: not so that the vengeance should be less, but on the contrary so that it should be all the better aimed and heavier. To which, in its view, this impetuosity is an obstacle.

10 Horace, Odes IV.9.
11 Statius, Thebaid X.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	mais de soy, elle lasse aussi les bras de ceux qui chastient. Ce feu estourdit et consomme leur force. Comme en la precipitation, festinatio tarda est. La hastiueté se donne elle mesme la iambe, s'entraue et s'arreste. Ipsa se velocitas implicat. Pour exemple. Selon ce que i'en vois par vsage ordinaire, l'auarice n'a point de plus grand destourbier que soy-mesme.	Not only does anger confuse, but of itself it also tires the arms of those who punish. This fire stuns them and consumes their strength. As in precipitation, haste is slow. Hastiness trips itself up, hobbles itself and brings itself to a stop. Speed entangles itself. For example: from what I see in ordinary experience, avarice has no greater hindrance than itself.[12]
	Plus elle est tendue et vigoureuse, moins elle en est fertile. Communement elle attrape plus promptement les richesses, masquée d'vn' image de liberalité.	The more taut and vigorous it is, the less fruitful it is. Usually it catches riches more quickly when masked with an image of liberality.
3.10.7	Vn Gentilhomme tres-homme de bien, et mon amy, cuyda brouiller la santé de sa teste, par vne trop passionnée attention et affection aux affaires d'vn Prince, son maistre. Lequel maistre, s'est ainsi peinct soy-mesmes à moy: Qu'il voit le poix des accidens, comme vn autre: mais qu'à ceux qui n'ont point de remede, il se resoult soudain à la souffrance: aux autres, apres y auoir ordonné les prouisions necessaires, ce qu'il peut faire promptement par la viuacité de son esprit, il attend en repos ce qui s'en peut ensuiure. De vray, ie l'ay veu à mesme, maintenant vne grande nonchalance et liberté d'actions et de visage, au trauers de bien grands affaires et bien espineux.	A gentleman of great worth, and a friend of mine, nearly unsettled his mind through too passionate an attention and devotion to the affairs of a prince, his master. This master once described himself to me in these terms: he sees the weight of misfortunes as well as anyone, but for those that have no remedy he resigns himself at once to enduring them. For the others, he orders the necessary measures, which he can do quickly thanks to the liveliness of his mind, and then waits calmly for whatever may follow. And indeed I have watched him at it, keeping a great unconcern and freedom in his actions and in his face through some very great and very thorny affairs.[13]
	Ie le trouue plus grand et plus capable, en vne mauuaise, qu'en vne bonne fortune. Ses pertes luy sont plus glorieuses, que ses victoires, et son deuil que son triomphe.	I find him greater and more capable in bad fortune than in good. His losses do him more honor than his victories, and his mourning more than his triumph.
3.10.8	Considerez, qu'aux actions mesmes qui sont vaines et friuoles: au ieu des eschecs, de la paulme, et semblables, cet engagement aspre et ardant d'vn desir impetueux, iette incontinent l'esprit et les membres, à l'indiscretion, et au desordre. On s'esblouit, on s'embarasse soy mesme. Celuy qui se porte plus moderément enuers le gain, et la perte, il est tousiours chez soy. Moins il se pique et passionne au ieu, il le conduit d'autant plus auantageusement et seurement.	Consider how even in actions that are idle and frivolous—at chess, at tennis and the like—this sharp and ardent engagement of an impetuous desire at once throws mind and limbs into rashness and disorder. We dazzle ourselves; we trip ourselves up. The man who takes winning and losing more moderately is always in command of himself. The less he gets nettled and worked up over the game, the more advantageously and surely he plays it.

NATURE'S NEEDS AND HABIT'S

Nature asks little; habit becomes a second nature he will not change in old age.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.10.9	Nous empeschons au demeurant, la prise et la serre de l'ame, à luy donner tant de choses à saisir. Les vnes, il les	For the rest, we hinder the soul's grip and hold by giving it so many things to seize. Some things need luy faut seulement presenter, les autres attacher, les autres incorporer. Elle peut voir et sentir toutes choses, mais elle ne se doit paistre que de soy. Et doit estre instruicte, de ce qui la touche proprement, et qui proprement est de son auoir, et de sa substance. Les loix de Nature nous apprennent ce que iustement, il nous faut. Apres que les sages nous ont dit, que selon elle personne n'est indigent, et que chacun l'est selon l'opinion, ils distinguent ainsi subtilement, les desirs qui viennent d'elle, de ceux qui viennent du desreglement de nostre fantasie.

FRENCH

Ceux desquels on voit le bout, sont siens, ceux qui fuyent deuant nous, et desquels nous ne pouuons ioindre la fin, sont nostres. La pauureté des biens, est aisée à guerir; la pauureté de l'ame, impossible. Nam si, quod satis est homini, id satis esse potesset,
Hoc sat erat: nunc, quum hoc non est, quî credimus porro, Diuitias vllas animum m'i explere potesse? Socrates voyant porter en pompe par sa ville, grande quantité de richesse, ioyaux et meubles de prix: Combien de choses, dit-il, ie ne desire point! Metrodorus viuoit du poix de douze onces par iour, Epicurus à moins: Metroclez dormoit en hyuer auec les moutons, en esté aux cloistres des Eglises.

Sufficit ad id natura, quod poscit. Cleanthes viuoit de ses mains, et se vantoit, que Cleanthes, s'il vouloit, nourriroit encore vn autre Cleanthes.

3.10.10 Si ce que Nature exactement, et originelement nous demande, pour la conseruation de nostre estre, est trop peu (comme de vray combien ce l'est, et combien à bon comte nostre vie se peut maintenir, il ne se doit exprimer mieux que par cette consideration: Que c'est si peu, qu'il eschappe la prise et le choc de la Fortune, par sa petitesse) dispensons nous de quelque chose plus outre; appellons encore nature, l'vsage et condition de chacun de nous; taxons nous, traitons nous à cette mesure; estendons noz appartenances et noz comtes iusques là. Car iusques là, il me semble bien, que nous auons quelque excuse. L'accoustumance est vne seconde nature, et non moins puissante. Ce qui manque à ma coustume ie tiens qu'il me manque.

ENGLISH

only be presented to it, others fastened to it, others made part of it. It can see and feel all things, but it should feed only on itself. And it should be taught what properly concerns it, what is properly its own possession and its own substance. The laws of Nature teach us exactly what we need. The sages tell us that by Nature's standard no one is poor, and by opinion's standard everyone is; then they subtly distinguish the desires that come from Nature from those that come from the disorder of our fancy.

Those whose end we can see are hers; those that flee before us and whose end we can never reach are ours. Poverty of goods is easy to cure; poverty of soul, impossible. For if what is enough for a man could be enough for him, that would suffice; but since it is not, how can we believe that any riches could ever fill my soul? Socrates, seeing a great quantity of riches, jewels and precious furnishings carried in procession through his city, said: "How many things I do not desire!" Metrodorus lived on twelve ounces of food a day, Epicurus on less. Metrocles slept among the sheep in winter, and in summer in the cloisters of the churches.[14]

Nature is sufficient for what she demands. Cleanthes lived by the work of his hands, and boasted that Cleanthes, if he wished, could feed yet another Cleanthes.[15]

Suppose that what Nature strictly and originally asks of us for the preservation of our being is too little. (And indeed how little it is, and how cheaply our life can be kept going, cannot be better expressed than by this consideration: it is so little that its very smallness puts it beyond the grip and the blows of Fortune.) Then let us allow ourselves something more. Let us also call nature the habits and condition of each of us; let us rate ourselves and treat ourselves by that measure; let us stretch our belongings and our accounts that far. For that far, it seems to me, we have some excuse. Habit is a second nature, and no less powerful. Whatever my habit lacks, I consider that I lack.

12 Quintus Curtius, History of Alexander; Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.
13 The prince is generally taken to be Henry of Navarre.
14 The verses are from the Roman satirist Lucilius. Metrocles was a Cynic philosopher.
15 Seneca, Letters.

FRENCH

Et i'aymerois presque esgalement qu'on m'ostast la vie, que si on me l'essimoit et retranchoit bien loing de l'estat auquel ie l'ay vescue si long temps. Ie ne suis plus en termes d'vn grand changement, ny de me ietter à vn nouueau train et inusité; non pas mesme vers l'augmentation: il n'est plus temps de deuenir autre. Et comme ie plaindrois quelque grande aduenture, qui me tombast à cette heure entre mains, qu'elle ne seroit venuë en temps que i'en peusse iouyr, Quo mihi fortunæ, si non conceditur vti? Ie me plaindroy de mesme, de quelque acquest interne. Il vault quasi mieux iamais, que si tard, deuenir honneste homme. Et bien entendu à viure, lors qu'on n'a plus de vie.

Moy, qui m'en vay, resigneroy facilement à quelqu'vn, qui vinst, ce que i'apprends de prudence, pour le commerce du monde. Moustarde apres disner. Ie n'ay que faire du bien, duquel ie ne puis rien faire. A quoy la science, à qui n'a plus de teste? C'est iniure et deffaueur de Fortune, de nous offrir des presents, qui nous remplissent d'vn iuste despit de nous auoir failly en leur saison. Ne me guidez plus: ie ne puis plus aller. De tant de membres, qu'a la suffisance, la patience nous suffit. Donnez la capacité d'vn excellent dessus, au chantre qui a les poulmons pourris! Et d'eloquence à l'eremite relegué aux deserts d'Arabie. Il ne faut point d'art, à la cheute.

La fin se trouue de soy, au bout de chasque besongne. Mon monde est failly, ma forme expirée. Ie suis tout du passé. Et suis tenu de l'authorizer et d'y conformer mon issue. Ie veux dire cecy par maniere d'exemple. Que l'eclipsement nouueau des dix iours du Pape, m'ont prins si bas, que ie ne m'en puis bonnement accoustrer. Ie suis des années, ausquelles nous comtions autrement. Vn si ancien et long vsage, me vendique et rappelle à soy. Ie suis contraint d'estre vn peu heretique par là. Incapable de nouuelleté, mesme correctiue. Mon imagination en despit de mes dents se iette tousiours dix iours plus auant, ou plus arriere: et grommelle à mes oreilles. Cette regle touche ceux, qui ont à estre.

Si la santé mesme, si succrée vient à me retrouuer par boutades, c'est pour me donner regret plustost que possession de soy. Ie n'ay plus où la retirer. Le temps me

ENGLISH

And I would almost as soon have my life taken from me as have it pared down and cut back far below the state in which I have lived it for so long. I am no longer in a condition for any great change, or for throwing myself into a new and unaccustomed way of life—not even toward improvement. It is too late to become someone else. And just as I would complain of some great stroke of luck that fell into my hands now, because it had not come at a time when I could enjoy it—What good is fortune to me, if I am not allowed to use it?—so I would complain of any inner gain. It is almost better never to become a decent man than to become one so late, and to understand how to live when there is no more life left.[16]

I, who am on my way out, would readily hand over to someone just arriving whatever wisdom I am learning for dealing with the world. Mustard after dinner. I have no use for a good that I can do nothing with. What is knowledge to a man who no longer has a head? It is an insult and an unkindness of Fortune to offer us gifts that fill us with a just resentment for having failed us in their season. Guide me no longer: I can no longer walk. Of all the parts that make up ability, patience is enough for us. Give the voice of a superb treble to a singer whose lungs are rotten! Or eloquence to a hermit banished to the deserts of Arabia! Falling needs no skill.

The end comes of itself at the close of every task. My world is over, my form has run its course. I belong wholly to the past, and I am bound to sanction it and to make my exit conform to it. Let me say this by way of example: the recent eclipse of ten days by the Pope caught me so late in life that I cannot really adjust to it. I belong to the years when we counted otherwise. So ancient and long a usage claims me and calls me back to itself. In this I am forced to be something of a heretic, incapable of novelty, even corrective novelty. My imagination, in spite of myself, keeps leaping ten days ahead or ten days behind, and grumbles in my ears. This rule concerns those who are yet to be.[17]

If health itself, so sweet, comes back to me now and then in fits and starts, it is to give me regret for it rather than possession of it. I no longer have

16 Horace, Epistles.

17 The Gregorian reform of the calendar in 1582 removed ten days, 15 October following directly on 4 October.

FRENCH

laisse. Sans luy rien ne se possede. O que ie feroy peu d'estat de ces grandes dignitez electiues, que ie voy au monde, qui ne se donnent qu'aux hommes prests à partir: ausquelles on ne regarde pas tant, combien deuëment on les exercera, que combien peu longuement on les exercera: dés l'entrée on vise à l'issue. Somme: me voicy apres d'acheuer cet homme, non d'en refaire vn autre. Par long vsage, cette forme m'est passée en substance, et fortune en nature.

ENGLISH

anywhere to lodge it. Time is leaving me, and without time nothing is possessed. Oh, how little I would think of those great elective dignities I see in the world, which are given only to men about to depart! In them people look not so much at how properly the holder will exercise them as at how briefly; from the moment of entry they have their eye on the exit. In short: here I am, finishing off this man, not making another. By long usage this form of mine has turned into substance, and fortune into nature.[18]

3.10.11 Ie dis donc, que chacun d'entre nous foiblets, est excusable d'estimer sien, ce qui est compris soubs cette mesure. Mais aussi au delà de ces limites, ce n'est plus que confusion. C'est la plus large estandue que nous puissions octroyer à noz droicts. Plus nous amplifions nostre besoing et possession, d'autant plus nous engageons nous aux coups de la Fortune, et des aduersitez. La carriere de noz desirs doit estre circonscripte, et restraincte, à vn court limite, des commoditez les plus proches et contigues. Et doit en outre, leur course, se manier, non en ligne droicte, qui face bout ailleurs, mais en rond, duquel les deux pointes se tiennent et terminent en nous, par vn brief contour.

I say, then, that each of us feeble creatures is excusable for considering his own whatever falls within this measure. But beyond these limits there is nothing but confusion. This is the widest extent we can grant to our rights. The more we enlarge our needs and possessions, the more we expose ourselves to the blows of Fortune and adversity. The course of our desires should be circumscribed and restricted to a short limit, to the nearest and most adjoining comforts. Moreover, their course should run not in a straight line that ends somewhere else, but in a circle whose two ends hold together and terminate in ourselves after a short sweep.

Les actions qui se conduisent sans cette reflexion, s'entend voisine reflexion et essentielle, comme sont celles des auaricieux, des ambitieux, et tant d'autres, qui courent de pointe, desquels la course les emporte tousiours deuant eux, ce sont actions erronées et maladiues.

Actions carried on without this bending back—I mean a close and essential bending back upon ourselves—such as those of the avaricious, the ambitious and so many others who run straight ahead, whose course always carries them on in front of themselves, are erroneous and sickly actions.

THE MAYOR AND MONTAIGNE

We must play our part in the world without mistaking the mask for the face.

FRENCH

3.10.12 La plus part de noz vacations sont farcesques. Mundus vniuersus exercet histrioniam. Il faut iouer deuement nostre rolle, mais comme rolle d'vn personnage emprunté. Du masque et de l'apparence, il n'en faut pas faire vne essence réelle, ny de l'estranger le propre. Nous ne sçauons pas distinguer la peau de la chemise. C'est assés de s'enfariner le visage, sans s'enfariner la poictrine. I'en vois qui se transforment et se transsubstantient en autant de nouuelles figures, et de nouueaux estres, qu'ils entreprennent de charges: et qui se prelatent iusques au

ENGLISH

Most of our occupations are farcical. The whole world plays a part. We must play our part properly, but as the part of a borrowed character. We must not make the mask and the appearance into a real essence, nor what is foreign into what is our own. We cannot tell the skin from the shirt. It is enough to whiten our face with flour without whitening our breast. I see some who transform and transubstantiate themselves into as many new shapes and 18 He is thinking chiefly of the papacy, frequently conferred on elderly men.

FRENCH

foye et aux intestins: et entrainent leur office iusques en leur garderobe. Ie ne puis leur apprendre à distinguer les bonnetades, qui les regardent, de celles qui regardent leur commission, ou leur suitte, ou leur mule.

Tantum se fortunæ permittunt, etiam vt naturam dediscant. Ils enflent et grossissent leur ame, et leur discours naturel, selon la haulteur de leur siege magistral. Le Maire et Montaigne, ont tousiours esté deux, d'vne separation bien claire. Pour estre aduocat ou financier, il n'en faut pas mescognoistre la fourbe, qu'il y a en telles vacations. Vn honneste homme n'est pas comtable du vice ou sottise de son mestier; et ne doit pourtant en refuser l'exercice. C'est l'vsage de son pays, et il y a du proffit. Il faut viure du monde, et s'en preualoir, tel qu'on le trouue. Mais le iugement d'vn Empereur, doit estre au dessus de son empire; et le voir et considerer, comme accident estranger.

Et luy doit sçauoir iouyr de soy à part; et se communicquer comme Iacques et Pierre: au moins à soy-mesmes.

ENGLISH

new beings as the offices they take on; who are prelates right down to the liver and bowels, and drag their office with them even onto the privy. I cannot teach them to distinguish the bows and doffed caps meant for them from those meant for their commission, or their retinue, or their mule.[19]

They give themselves up so far to fortune that they even unlearn nature. They swell and puff up their soul and their natural reasoning to match the height of their magisterial seat. The Mayor and Montaigne have always been two, very clearly separated. If one is a lawyer or a financier, one must not ignore the trickery there is in such callings. A decent man is not accountable for the vice or folly of his trade, and need not refuse to practice it on that account. It is the custom of his country, and there is profit in it. We must live by the world and make use of it as we find it. But the judgment of an emperor should stand above his empire, and see and consider it as an external accident.[20]

And he should know how to enjoy himself apart, and to show himself as plain Jack or Peter—to himself, at least.

JUDGING ONE'S OWN PARTY

In civil war he sees the merits of opponents and the faults of his own side.

FRENCH

3.10.13 Ie ne sçay pas m'engager si profondement, et si entier. Quand ma volonté me donne à vn party, ce n'est pas d'vne si violente obligation, que mon entendement s'en infecte. Aux presens brouillis de cet estat, mon interest ne m'a faict mescognoistre, ny les qualitez louables en noz aduersaires, ny celles qui sont reprochables en ceux que i'ay suiuy. Ils adorent tout ce qui est de leur costé: moy ie n'excuse pas seulement la plus part des choses, qui sont du mien. Vn bon ouurage, ne perd pas ses graces, pour plaider contre moy. Hors le nœud du debat, ie me suis maintenu en equanimité, et pure indifference.

Neque extra necessitates belli, præcipuum odium gero. Dequoy ie me gratifie, d'autant que ie voy communément faillir au contraire. Ceux qui allongent leur cholere, et leur haine au delà des affaires, comme faict la plus part, montrent qu'elle leur part d'ailleurs, et de cause

ENGLISH

I do not know how to commit myself so deeply and so entirely. When my will gives me to a party, it is not with so violent a bond that my understanding is infected by it. In the present troubles of this state, my interest has not made me blind either to the praiseworthy qualities in our adversaries or to the blameworthy ones in those I have followed. They adore everything on their own side; I do not even excuse most of the things on mine. A good work does not lose its graces for pleading against me. Outside the heart of the dispute, I have kept myself in equanimity and pure indifference.

Nor do I bear any special hatred beyond the necessities of war. For this I congratulate myself, all the more since I commonly see people err the other way. Those who stretch their anger and hatred beyond the matters at issue, as most do, show that it 19 The Latin is attributed to Petronius.

20 Quintus Curtius, History of Alexander.

FRENCH

particuliere. Tout ainsi comme, à qui estant guary de son vlcere, la fiebure demeure encore, montre qu'elle auoit vn autre principe plus caché. C'est qu'ils n'en ont point à la cause, en commun: et entant qu'elle blesse l'interest de touts, et de l'estat. Mais luy en veulent, seulement en ce, qu'elle leur masche en priué. Voyla pourquoy, ils s'en picquent de passion particuliere, et au delà de la iustice, et de la raison publique.

Non tam omnia vniuersi, quàm ea, quæ ad quemque pertinerent, singuli carpebant. Ie veux que l'aduantage soit pour nous: mais ie ne forcene point, s'il ne l'est. Ie me prens fermement au plus sain des partis. Mais ie n'affecte pas qu'on me remarque specialement, ennemy des autres, et outre la raison generalle. I'accuse merueilleusement cette vitieuse forme d'opiner: Il est de la Ligue: car il admire la grace de Monsieur de Guyse. L'actiueté du Roy de Nauarre l'estonne: il est Huguenot. Il trouue cecy à dire aux mœurs du Roy: il est seditieux en son cœur. Et ne conceday pas au magistrat mesme, qu'il eust raison, de condamner vn liure, pour auoir logé entre les meilleurs poëtes de ce siecle, vn heretique.

N'oserions nous dire d'vn voleur, qu'il a belle greue? Faut-il, si elle est putain, qu'elle soit aussi punaise? Aux siecles plus sages, reuoqua-on le superbe tiltre de Capitolinus, qu'on auoit auparauant donné à Marcus Manlius, comme conseruateur de la religion et liberté publique? Estouffa-on la memoire de sa liberalité, et de ses faicts d'armes, et recompenses militaires ottroyées à sa vertu, par ce qu'il affecta depuis la Royauté, au preiudice des loix de son pays? S'ils ont prins en haine vn aduocat, l'endemain il leur deuient ineloquent. I'ay touché ailleurs le zele, qui poulsa des gens de bien à semblables fautes. Pour moy, ie sçay bien dire: Il faict meschamment cela, et vertueusement cecy.

De mesmes, aux prognostiques ou euenements sinistres des affaires, ils veulent, que chacun en son party soit aueugle ou hebeté: que nostre persuasion et iugement, serue non à la verité, mais au proiect de nostre desir. Ie faudroy plustost vers l'autre extremité: tant ie crains, que springs from elsewhere, from some private cause —just as when a man is cured of his ulcer and the fever still remains, it shows that the fever had another, more hidden origin. The fact is that they have nothing against the cause as a common cause, insofar as it injures the interest of all and of the state; they hold it against it only insofar as it galls them in private. That is why they are stung by it with a private passion, beyond justice and public reason.

ENGLISH

It was not so much that they all found fault with everything as that each found fault with what concerned himself. I want the advantage to be on our side, but I do not go mad if it is not. I hold firmly to the soundest of the parties, but I do not seek to be singled out as an enemy of the others beyond what general reason requires. I strongly condemn this vicious way of judging: "He is of the League, for he admires the grace of Monsieur de Guise." "The King of Navarre's energy amazes him: he is a Huguenot." "He finds this to criticize in the King's conduct: he is seditious at heart." And I did not grant even to the magistrate that he was right to condemn a book for having placed a heretic among the best poets of this century.[21]

May we not say of a thief that he has a shapely leg? If she is a prostitute, must she also have foul breath? In wiser ages, did they revoke the proud title of Capitolinus formerly given to Marcus Manlius as preserver of religion and public liberty? Did they smother the memory of his generosity, his feats of arms and the military rewards granted to his valor, because he later aspired to kingship, to the detriment of his country's laws? If they have taken a dislike to a lawyer, by the next day he has lost his eloquence for them. I have touched elsewhere on the zeal that drove good men into similar errors. For my part, I can quite well say: "He does that wickedly, and this virtuously."[22]

Likewise, in forecasts or in ill turns of affairs, they want each man in his own party to be blind or dull-witted, and our convictions and judgment to serve not the truth but the design of our desire. I would rather err toward the other extreme, so much do I fear that my desire may suborn me. Be-

21 Livy. Henri, Duke of Guise, led the Catholic League. The book is probably the Essays themselves, faulted by the papal censors in 1581 for naming heretic poets.

22 Marcus Manlius saved the Capitol from the Gauls in 390 BC and was later executed for aiming at tyranny.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
mon desir me suborne. Ioint, que ie me deffie vn peu tendrement, des choses que ie souhaitte.	sides, I am a little tenderly distrustful of the things I wish for.
3.10.14 I'ay veu de mon temps, merueilles en l'indiscrette et prodigieuse facilité des peuples, à se laisser mener et manier la creance et l'esperance, où il a pleu et seruy à leurs chefs: par dessus cent mescomtes, les vns sur les autres: par dessus les fantosmes, et les songes. Ie ne m'estonne plus de ceux, que les singeries d'Apollonius et de Mahumed embufflerent. Leur sens et entendement, est entierement estouffé en leur passion. Leur discretion n'a plus d'autre choix, que ce qui leur rit, et qui conforte leur cause. I'auoy remarqué souuerainement cela, au premier de noz partis fiebureux. Cet autre, qui est nay depuis, en l'imitant, le surmonte. Par où ie m'aduise, que c'est vne qualité inseparable des erreurs populaires.	In my time I have seen marvels in the indiscriminate and prodigious readiness of peoples to let their belief and their hope be led and handled wherever it pleased and suited their leaders—despite a hundred disappointments one on top of another, despite phantoms and dreams. I am no longer amazed at those who were hoodwinked by the antics of Apollonius and Muhammad. Their sense and understanding are entirely smothered in their passion. Their discernment no longer has any choice but what smiles on them and comforts their cause. I had noticed this to the highest degree in the first of our feverish parties. This other one, born since, imitates it and outdoes it. From which I gather that it is a quality inseparable from popular errors.[23]
Apres la premiere qui part, les opinions s'entrepoussent, suiuant le vent, comme les flotz. On n'est pas du corps, si on s'en peut desdire: si on ne vague le train commun. Mais certes on faict tort aux partis iustes, quand on les veut secourir de fourbes. I'y ay tousiours contredict. Ce moyen ne porte qu'enuers les testes malades. Enuers les saines, il y a des voyes plus seures, et non seulement plus honnestes, à maintenir les courages, et excuser les accidents contraires.	Once the first opinion sets off, the others push one another along with the wind, like waves. You are not of the body if you can take back what you said, if you do not drift along with the common course. But surely we wrong just parties when we try to help them with frauds. I have always spoken against it. This method works only on sick heads. With healthy ones there are surer ways, and not merely more honest ones, of keeping up people's courage and explaining away setbacks.
3.10.15 Le ciel n'a point veu vn si poisant desaccord, que celuy de Cæsar, et de Pompeius; ny ne verra pour l'aduenir. Toutesfois il me semble recognoistre en ces belles ames, vne grande moderation de l'vn enuers l'autre. C'estoit vne ialousie d'honneur et de commandement, qui ne les emporta pas à hayne furieuse et indiscrette; sans malignité et sans detraction. En leurs plus aigres exploicts, ie descouure quelque demeurant de respect, et de bien-vueillance. Et iuge ainsi; que s'il leur eust esté possible, chacun d'eux eust desiré de faire son affaire sans la ruyne de son compagnon, plustost qu'auec sa ruyne. Combien autrement il en va de Marius, et de Sylla: prenez y garde.	Heaven has never seen so weighty a discord as that between Caesar and Pompey, nor ever will. Yet I seem to recognize in those fine souls a great moderation toward each other. It was a rivalry for honor and command that did not carry them away into furious and reckless hatred; it was without malice and without disparagement. In their bitterest exploits I discover some remnant of respect and goodwill. And so I judge that, had it been possible, each of them would have wished to achieve his aim without ruining his comrade rather than by ruining him. How differently it went with Marius and Sulla: take note of it.

23 The two parties are the Huguenots and the Catholic League.

STOPPING PASSIONS AT THE START

It is easier to keep out of passions and quarrels than to master them once begun.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.10.16	Il ne faut pas se precipiter si esperduement apres nos affections, et interestz. Comme estant ieune, ie m'opposois au progrez de l'amour, que ie sentoy trop auancer sur moy; et m'estudiois qu'il ne me fust si aggreable, qu'il vinst à me forcer en fin, et captiuer du tout à sa mercy. I'en vse de mesme à toutes autres occasions, où ma volonté se prend auec trop d'appetit. Ie me panche à l'opposite de son inclination, comme ie la voy se plonger, et enyurer de son vin. Ie fuis à nourrir son plaisir si auant, que ie ne l'en puisse plus r'auoir, sans perte sanglante. Les ames qui par stupidité ne voyent les choses qu'à demy, iouissent de cet heur, que les nuisibles les blessent moins.	We must not rush so headlong after our affections and interests. When I was young, I resisted the progress of love when I felt it gaining too much ground on me, and took pains that it should not become so pleasant to me as to overpower me in the end and hold me captive entirely at its mercy. I do the same on all other occasions where my will takes hold with too much appetite. I lean the opposite way from its inclination when I see it plunging in and getting drunk on its own wine. I avoid feeding its pleasure so far that I can no longer get it back without bloody loss. Souls that through dullness see things only by halves enjoy this good fortune: harmful things wound them less.
	C'est vne ladrerie spirituelle, qui a quelque air de santé; et telle santé, que la philosophie ne mesprise pas du tout. Mais pourtant, ce n'est pas raison de la nommer sagesse: ce que nous faisons souuent. Et de cette maniere se moqua quelqu'vn anciennement de Diogenes, qui alloit embrassant en plein hyuer tout nud, vne image de neige pour l'essay de sa patience. Celuy-là le rencontrant en cette desmarche: As tu grand froid à cette heure, luy dit-il? Du tout point, respond Diogenes. Or suiuit l'autre: Que penses-tu donc faire de difficile, et d'exemplaire à te tenir là? Pour mesurer la constance, il faut necessairement sçauoir la souffrance.	It is a spiritual leprosy that has some look of health—and such health as philosophy does not wholly despise. But even so it is not right to call it wisdom, as we often do. And in this vein someone in ancient times mocked Diogenes, who in the dead of winter went about stark naked hugging a figure of snow to test his endurance. Coming upon him in this posture, the man said: "Are you very cold right now?" "Not at all," answered Diogenes. "Then," the other went on, "what do you think you are doing that is difficult or exemplary by standing there?" To measure fortitude, one must necessarily know the suffering.
3.10.17	Mais les ames qui auront à voir les euenemens contraires, et les iniures de la Fortune, en leur profondeur et aspreté, qui auront à les poiser et gouster, selon leur aigreur naturelle, et leur charge, qu'elles emploient leur art, à se garder d'en enfiler les causes, et en destournent les aduenues. Que fit le Roy Cotys? il paya liberalement la belle et riche vaisselle qu'on lui auoit presentée: mais parce qu'elle estoit singulierement fragile, il la cassa incontinent luy-mesme; pour s'oster de bonne heure vne si aisée matiere de courroux contre ses seruiteurs.	But souls that are to see adverse events and the injuries of Fortune in all their depth and harshness, that are to weigh and taste them in their natural bitterness and weight, should use their skill to keep from getting caught up in their causes, and should block the approaches to them. What did King Cotys do? He paid generously for the beautiful and rich tableware that had been presented to him; but because it was exceptionally fragile, he broke it all himself at once, to rid himself in good time of so ready an occasion for anger against his servants.[24]
	Pareillement, i'ay volontiers euité de n'auoir mes affaires confus: et n'ay cherché, que mes biens fussent contigus à	In the same way I have gladly avoided having my affairs entangled, and have not sought to have my 24 Cotys, a king of Thrace; the story is in Plutarch.

FRENCH

mes proches: et ceux à qui i'ay à me ioindre d'vne estroitte amitié: d'où naissent ordinairement matieres d'alienation et dissociation. I'aymois autresfois les ieux hazardeux des cartes et detz; ie m'en suis deffaict, il y a long temps; pour cela seulement, que quelque bonne mine que ie fisse en ma perte, ie ne laissois pas d'en auoir au dedans de la picqueure. Vn homme d'honneur, qui doit sentir vn desmenti, et vne offence iusques au cœur, qui n'est pour prendre vne mauuaise excuse en payement et consolation, qu'il euite le progrez des altercations contentieuses. Ie fuis les complexions tristes, et les hommes hargneux, comme les empestez.

Et aux propos que ie ne puis traicter sans interest, et sans emotion, ie ne m'y mesle, si le deuoir ne m'y force. Melius non incipient, quàm desinent. La plus seure façon est donc, se preparer auant les occasions.

3.10.18 Ie sçay bien, qu'aucuns sages ont pris autre voye; et n'ont pas crainct de se harper et engager iusques au vif, à plusieurs obiects. Ces gens là s'asseurent de leur force, soubs laquelle ils se mettent à couuert en toute sorte de succez ennemis, faisant lucter les maux, par la vigueur de la patience: Velut rupes vastum quæ prodit in æquor,
Obuia ventorum furiis, expostâque ponto
Vim cunctam atque minas perfert cælique marisque, Ipsa immota manens.

3.10.19 N'attaquons pas ces exemples; nous n'y arriuerions point. Ils s'obstinent à voir resoluement, et sans se troubler, la ruyne de leur pays, qui possedoit et commandoit toute leur volonté. Pour noz ames communes, il y a trop d'effort, et trop de rudesse à cela. Caton en abandonna la plus noble vie, qui fut onques. A nous autres petis, il faut fuyr l'orage de plus loing: il faut pouruoir au sentiment, non à la patience; et escheuer aux coups que nous ne sçaurions parer. Zenon voyant approcher Chremonidez ieune homme qu'il aymoit, pour se seoir au pres de luy: se leua soudain. Et Cleanthes, luy en demandant la raison: I'entendz, dit-il, que les medecins ordonnent le repos principalement, et deffendent l'emotion à toutes tumeurs.

ENGLISH

property adjoin that of my relatives and of those with whom I must be joined in close friendship; that is where occasions for estrangement and separation usually arise. I used to love games of chance with cards and dice. I gave them up long ago, for this reason alone: however good a face I put on my losses, I still felt the sting of them inside. A man of honor, who is bound to feel being given the lie or an insult to the quick, and who is not one to accept a poor excuse as payment and consolation, should keep contentious arguments from going any further. I flee gloomy temperaments and surly men as I would the plague-stricken.

And in discussions that I cannot handle without personal interest and emotion, I do not get involved unless duty forces me. They will do better not to begin than to have to stop. The safest way, then, is to prepare oneself before the occasions arise.[25]

I know well that some sages have taken another path, and have not been afraid to grapple and engage themselves to the quick with many objects. These men are sure of their strength, under which they take cover against every kind of hostile outcome, making their ills wrestle with the vigor of their endurance: Like a cliff that juts out into the vast sea, facing the fury of the winds and exposed to the waves, it bears all the violence and threats of sky and sea, itself remaining unmoved.[26]

Let us not take on these examples; we would never reach them. They persist in watching, resolutely and unperturbed, the ruin of their country, which possessed and commanded their whole will. For our common souls there is too much effort and too much harshness in that. Cato gave up for it the noblest life that ever was. We little folk must flee the storm from further off; we must take measures against feeling, not rely on endurance, and dodge the blows we could not parry. Zeno, seeing Chremonides, a young man he loved, approaching to sit beside him, rose at once. And when Cleanthes asked him the reason, he said: "I understand

25 Seneca, Letters.
26 Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

that physicians prescribe rest above all and forbid agitation for all swellings."

Socrates ne dit point: Ne vous rendez pas aux attraicts de la beauté; soustenez la, efforcez vous au contraire. Fuyez la, faict-il, courez hors de sa veuë et de son rencontre, comme d'vne poison puissante qui s'eslance et frappe de loing. Et son bon disciple feignant ou recitant; mais, à mon aduis, recitant plustost que feignant, les rares perfections de ce grand Cyrus, le fait deffiant de ses forces à porter les attraicts de la diuine beauté de cette illustre Panthée sa captiue, et en commettant la visite et garde à vn autre, qui eust moins de liberté que luy. Et le Sainct Esprit de mesme, ne nos inducas in tentationem.

Socrates does not say: "Do not yield to the attractions of beauty; stand up to it, strive against it." "Flee it," he says, "run out of its sight and out of its way, as from a powerful poison that darts out and strikes from afar." And his good disciple, inventing or recounting—but in my opinion recounting rather than inventing—the rare perfections of the great Cyrus, shows him distrusting his strength to withstand the attractions of the divine beauty of the illustrious Panthea, his captive, and entrusting the visiting and guarding of her to another who had less freedom than he. And the Holy Spirit likewise: lead us not into temptation.[27]

Nous ne prions pas que nostre raison ne soit combatue et surmontée par la concupiscence, mais qu'elle n'en soit pas seulement essayée: que nous ne soyons conduits en estat où nous ayons seulement à souffrir les approches, solicitations, et tentations du peché: et supplions nostre Seigneur de maintenir nostre conscience tranquille, plainement et parfaictement deliurée du commerce du mal.

We do not pray that our reason may not be fought and overcome by concupiscence, but that it may not even be tested by it; that we may not be led into a state where we have even to suffer the approaches, solicitations and temptations of sin; and we beseech our Lord to keep our conscience tranquil, fully and perfectly delivered from all dealings with evil.

3.10.20 Ceux qui disent auoir raison de leur passion vindicatiue, ou de quelqu'autre espece de passion penible: disent souuent vray: comme les choses sont, mais non pas comme elles furent. Ils parlent à nous, lors que les causes de leur erreur sont nourries et auancées par eux mesmes. Mais reculez plus arriere, r'appelez ces causes à leur principe: là, vous les prendrez sans vert. Veulent ils que leur faute soit moindre, pour estre plus vieille: et que d'vn iniuste commencement la suitte soit iuste? Qui desirera du bien à son païs comme moy, sans s'en vlcerer ou maigrir, il sera desplaisant, mais non pas transi, de le voir menassant, ou sa ruine, ou vne durée non moins ruineuse.

Those who say they are in the right in their vindictive passion, or in some other kind of painful passion, often speak the truth—as things are, but not as they were. They speak to us when the causes of their error have been fed and advanced by themselves. But go further back, trace these causes to their origin: there you will catch them off guard. Do they want their fault to be the smaller for being older, and the sequel of an unjust beginning to be just? Whoever wishes his country well, as I do, without getting ulcers or growing thin over it, will be grieved, but not paralyzed, to see it threatened either with ruin or with a survival no less ruinous.

Pauure vaisseau, que les flots, les vents, et le pilote, tirassent à si contraires desseins! In tam diuersa, magister, / Ventus et vnda trahunt. Qui ne bee point apres la faueur des Princes, comme apres chose dequoy il ne se sçauroit passer; ne se picque pas beaucoup de la froideur de leur recueil, et de leur visage, ny de l'inconstance de leur volonté. Qui ne couue point ses enfans, ou ses honneurs, d'vne propension esclaue, ne laisse pas de viure commodément apres leur perte. Qui fait bien principalement pour sa propre satisfaction, ne s'altere

Poor ship, which waves, winds and pilot pull toward such contrary aims! So differently do the helmsman, / the wind and the wave pull. Whoever does not gape after the favor of princes as after something he could not do without is not much stung by the coldness of their welcome and their looks, nor by the inconstancy of their will. Whoever does not brood over his children or his honors with a slavish attachment does not cease to 27 The disciple is Xenophon; Panthea was the captive wife of the king Abradatas.

FRENCH

guere pour voir les hommes iuger de ses actions contre son merite. Vn quart d'once de patience, prouuoit à tels inconuenients.

Ie me trouue bien de cette recepte; me racheptant des commencemens, au meilleur compte que ie puis. Et me sens auoir eschappé par son moyen beaucoup de trauail et de difficultez. Auec bien peu d'effort, i'arreste ce premier bransle de mes esmotions. Et abandonne le subject, qui me commence à poiser, et auant qu'il m'emporte. Qui n'arreste le partir, n'a garde d'arrester la course. Qui ne sçait leur fermer la porte, ne les chassera pas entrées. Qui ne peut venir à bout du commencement, ne viendra pas à bout de la fin. Ny n'en soustiendra la cheute, qui n'en a peu soustenir l'esbranslement.

Etenim ipsæ se impellunt, vbi semel à ratione discessum est: ipsáque sibi imbecillitas indulget, in altùmque prouehitur imprudens, nec reperit locum consistendi. Ie sens à temps, les petits vents qui me viennent taster et bruire au dedans, auant-coureurs de la tempeste: Ceu flamina prima
Cùm deprensa fremunt syluis, et cæca volutant
Murmura, venturos nautis prodentia ventos.

3.10.21 A combien de fois me suis-ie faict vne bien euidente iniustice, pour fuyr le hazard de la receuoir encore pire des iuges, apres vn siecle d'ennuys, et d'ordes et viles practiques, plus ennemies de mon naturel, que n'est la gehenne et le feu? Conuenit à litibus quantum licet, et nescio an paulo plus etiam quàm licet, abhorrentem esse: Est enim non modo liberale, paululum nonnunquam de suo iure decedere, sed interdum etiam fructuosum. Si nous estions bien sages, nous nous deurions resiouir et venter, ainsi que i'ouy vn iour bien naïuement, vn enfant de grande maison, faire feste à chacun, dequoy sa mere venoit de perdre son procés: comme sa toux, sa fiebure, ou autre chose d'importune garde.

Les faueurs mesmes, que la Fortune pouuoit m'auoir donné, parentez, et accointances, enuers ceux, qui ont souueraine authorité en ces choses là: i'ay beaucoup faict selon ma conscience, de fuyr instamment de les employer au preiudice d'autruy, et de ne monter par dessus leur droicte valeur, mes droicts. En fin i'ay tant fait par mes iournées, à la bonne heure le puisse-ie dire, que me voicy live comfortably after losing them. Whoever does good chiefly for his own satisfaction is hardly upset to see men judge his actions contrary to his merit. A quarter of an ounce of patience takes care of such inconveniences.

ENGLISH

I do well with this recipe, buying myself off at the beginnings as cheaply as I can; and I feel that by this means I have escaped a great deal of trouble and difficulty. With very little effort I stop this first stirring of my emotions, and I drop the subject that is beginning to weigh on me, before it carries me away. He who does not stop the start will hardly stop the race. He who cannot shut the door on them will not drive them out once they are in. He who cannot master the beginning will not master the end. Nor will he withstand the fall who could not withstand the first shock.

For they drive themselves on once reason has been left behind; weakness indulges itself, is carried unawares out into the deep, and finds no place to stand. I feel in time the little winds that come to probe me and murmur within me, forerunners of the storm: As when the first gusts, caught in the woods, roar and roll their blind murmurs, betraying to sailors the coming winds.[28]

How many times have I done myself a quite evident injustice to avoid the risk of receiving a worse one from the judges, after an age of vexations and of filthy, base practices more hostile to my nature than torture and fire? It is fitting to shrink from lawsuits as much as one may, and perhaps even a little more than one may; for it is not only generous but sometimes even profitable to give up a little of one's rights now and then. If we were really wise, we should rejoice and boast, as I once heard a child of a great house, quite artlessly, celebrating to everyone that his mother had just lost her lawsuit—as if she had lost her cough, her fever, or something else troublesome to keep.[29]

Even the favors Fortune may have given me—kinship and acquaintance with those who have sovereign authority in such matters—I have done my utmost, in conscience, to avoid using to the prejudice of others, and I have not raised my rights above their true value. In short, I have managed so 28 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations; the verses are from Virgil's Aeneid.

29 Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

encore vierge de procés, qui n'ont pas laissé de se conuier plusieurs fois à mon seruice, par bien iuste tiltre, s'il m'eust pleu d'y entendre. Et vierge de querelles. I'ay sans offence de poix, passiue ou actiue, escoulé tantost vne longue vie: et sans auoir ouy pis que mon nom. Rare grace du ciel.

3.10.22 Noz plus grandes agitations, ont des ressorts et causes ridicules. Combien encourut de ruyne nostre dernier Duc de Bourgongne, pour la querelle d'vne charretée de peaux de mouton! Et l'engraueure d'vn cachet, fust-ce pas la premiere et maistresse cause, du plus horrible croullement, que cette machine aye onques souffert? Car Pompeius et Cæsar, ce ne sont que les reiectons et la suitte, des deux autres. Et i'ay veu de mon temps, les plus sages testes de ce royaume, assemblées auec grande ceremonie, et publique despence, pour des traictez et accords, desquels la vraye decision, despendoit ce pendant en toute souueraineté, des deuis du cabinet des dames, et inclination de quelque femmelette.

Les poëtes ont bien entendu cela, qui ont mis, pour vne pomme, la Grece et l'Asie à feu et à sang. Regardez pourquoy celuy-là s'en va courre fortune de son honneur et de sa vie, à tout son espée et son poignart; qu'il vous die d'où vient la source de ce debat, il ne le peut faire sans rougir; tant l'occasion en est vaine, et friuole.

3.10.23 A l'enfourner, il n'y va que d'vn peu d'auisement, mais depuis que vous estes embarqué, toutes les cordes tirent. Il y faict besoing de grandes prouisions, bien plus difficiles et importantes. De combien est il plus aisé, de n'y entrer pas que d'en sortir? Or il faut proceder au rebours du roseau, qui produict vne longue tige et droicte, de la premiere venue; mais apres, comme s'il s'estoit allanguy et mis hors d'haleine, il vient à faire des nœuds frequens et espais, comme des pauses; qui montrent qu'il n'a plus cette premiere vigueur et constance. Il faut plustost commencer bellement et froidement; et garder son haleine et ses vigoureux eslans, au fort et perfection de la besongne.

Nous guidons les affaires en leurs commencemens, et les tenons à nostre mercy: mais par apres, quand ils sont well in my day—may I say it without tempting fate—that here I am still a virgin of lawsuits, though they have more than once offered themselves to my service on very good grounds, had I cared to listen. And a virgin of quarrels. I have now spent a long life without any serious offense, suffered or given, and without having been called anything worse than my own name. A rare grace of heaven.

ENGLISH

Our greatest agitations have ridiculous springs and causes. How much ruin our last Duke of Burgundy brought on himself over a quarrel about a cartload of sheepskins! And the engraving of a seal—was that not the first and principal cause of the most horrible collapse this machine has ever suffered? For Pompey and Caesar are only the offshoots and sequel of those other two. And in my time I have seen the wisest heads of this kingdom assembled with great ceremony and at public expense for treaties and agreements whose real decision meanwhile depended, in complete sovereignty, on the chatter of the ladies' chamber and the inclination of some little woman.[30]

The poets understood this well, who put Greece and Asia to fire and sword for an apple. Look at why that man is off to risk his honor and his life with his sword and dagger; let him tell you the source of the dispute—he cannot do it without blushing, so idle and frivolous is the occasion.[31]

Getting into it takes only a little forethought; but once you are embarked, all the ropes pull. Great provisions are needed then, much more difficult and important. How much easier it is not to go in than to get out! Now we must do the opposite of the reed, which at first shoots up a long, straight stem; but afterward, as if it had grown languid and out of breath, it starts making frequent thick knots, like pauses, which show that it no longer has its first vigor and steadiness. We should rather begin gently and coolly, and save our breath and our vigorous bursts for the thick of the task and its completion.

We guide affairs in their beginnings and hold them at our mercy; but afterward, once they are 30 Charles the Bold's fatal war with the Swiss arose from a dispute over sheepskins; the seal is the one on which Sulla had Jugurtha's surrender engraved, which inflamed his quarrel with Marius.

31 The golden apple awarded by Paris, which led to the Trojan War.

FRENCH

esbranlez, ce sont eux qui nous guident et emportent, et auons à les suyure.

3.10.24 Pourtant n'est-ce pas à dire, que ce conseil m'aye deschargé de toute difficulté; et que ie n'aye eu affaire souuent à gourmer et brider mes passions. Elles ne se gouuernent pas tousiours selon la mesure des occasions: et ont leurs entrées mesmes, souuent aspres et violentes. Tant y a, qu'il s'en tire vne belle espargne, et du fruict. Sauf pour ceux, qui au bien faire, ne se contentent de nul fruict, si la reputation en est à dire. Car à la verité, vn tel effect, n'est en comte qu'à chacun en soy. Vous en estes plus content; mais non plus estimé: vous estant reformé, auant que d'estre en danse, et que la matiere fust en veuë.

Toutesfois aussi, non en cecy seulement, mais en tous autres deuoirs de la vie, la route de ceux qui visent à l'honneur, est bien diuerse à celle que tiennent ceux qui se proposent l'ordre et la raison. I'en trouue, qui se mettent inconsiderément et furieusement en lice, et s'alentissent en la course. Comme Plutarque dit, que ceux qui par le vice de la mauuaise honte, sont mols et faciles, à accorder quoy qu'on leur demande, sont faciles apres à faillir de parole, et à se desdire. Pareillement qui entre legerement en querelle, est subiect d'en sortir aussi legerement. Cette mesme difficulté, qui me garde de l'entamer, m'inciteroit d'y tenir ferme, quand ie serois esbranlé et eschauffé. C'est une mauuaise façon.

Depuis qu'on y est, il faut aller ou creuer. Entreprenez froidement, disoit Bias, mais poursuiuez ardamment. De faute de prudence, on retombe en faute de cœur; qui est encore moins supportable.

3.10.25 La plus part des accords de noz querelles du iourd'hui, sont honteux et menteurs. Nous ne cherchons qu'à sauuer les apparences et trahissons cependant, et desaduouons noz vrayes intentions. Nous plastrons le faict. Nous sçauons comment nous l'auons dict, et en quel sens, et les assistans le sçauent, et noz amis à qui nous auons voulu faire sentir nostre aduantage. C'est aux despens de nostre franchise, et de l'honneur de nostre courage, que nous desaduouons nostre pensée, et cherchons des conillieres en la fauceté, pour nous accorder. Nous nous desmentons nous mesmes, pour sauuer vn desmentir que nous auons donné à vn autre.

Il ne faut pas regarder si vostre action ou vostre parole, peut auoir autre interpretation, c'est vostre vraye et sincere interpretation, qu'il faut mes-huy maintenir; set in motion, it is they that guide us and carry us away, and we have to follow them.

ENGLISH

This is not to say that this counsel has relieved me of all difficulty, or that I have not often had to curb and bridle my passions. They do not always govern themselves by the measure of the occasions, and even their onsets are often harsh and violent. Still, a fine saving and profit come of it—except for those who in doing good are content with no profit if reputation is missing. For in truth such an outcome counts only for each man within himself. You are more content, but not more esteemed, having reformed yourself before you joined the dance and before the matter came into view.

And yet, not in this alone but in all the other duties of life, the path of those who aim at honor is very different from the one taken by those who set themselves order and reason as their goal. I find some who rush into the lists recklessly and furiously, and slow down in the race. Plutarch says that those who through the vice of false shame are soft and easy in granting whatever is asked of them are easy afterward in breaking their word and going back on it; in the same way, whoever enters lightly into a quarrel is apt to leave it just as lightly. That same difficulty which keeps me from starting one would spur me to hold firm once I was stirred and heated. That is a bad way to go about it.

Once you are in, you must go on or burst. "Undertake coolly," said Bias, "but pursue ardently." From want of prudence we fall into want of courage, which is still less bearable.

Most of the settlements of our quarrels nowadays are shameful and lying. We seek only to save appearances, and meanwhile we betray and disavow our true intentions. We plaster over the fact. We know how we said it and in what sense; the bystanders know it, and so do our friends, to whom we wanted to make our advantage felt. It is at the expense of our frankness and of the honor of our courage that we disavow our thought and look for rabbit holes in falsehood in order to come to terms. We give ourselves the lie to save a lie we have given another.

You must not look to see whether your act or your word can bear another interpretation; it is your true and sincere interpretation that you must up-quoy qu'il vous couste. On parle à vostre vertu, et à vostre conscience: ce ne sont parties à mettre en masque. Laissons ces vils moyens, et ces expediens, à la chicane du palais. Les excuses et reparations, que ie voy faire tous les iours, pour purger l'indiscretion, me semblent plus laides que l'indiscretion mesme. Il vaudroit mieux l'offencer encore vn coup, que de s'offencer soy mesme, en faisant telle amende à son aduersaire.

FRENCH

Vous l'auez braué esmeu de cholere, et vous l'allez rappaiser et flatter en vostre froid et meilleur sens: ainsi vous vous soubsmettez plus, que vous ne vous estiez aduancé. Ie ne trouue aucun dire si vicieux à vn Gentilhomme, comme le desdire me semble luy estre honteux: quand c'est vn desdire, qu'on luy arrache par authorité. D'autant que l'opiniastreté, luy est plus excusable, que la pusillanimité. Les passions, me sont autant aisées à euiter, comme elles me sont difficiles à moderer. Excinduntur facilius animo, quàm temperantur. Qui ne peut atteindre à cette noble impassibilité Stoique, qu'il se sauue au giron de cette mienne stupidité populaire. Ce que ceux-là faisoyent par vertu, ie me duits à le faire par complexion.

La moyenne region loge les tempestes; les deux extremes, des hommes philosophes, et des hommes ruraux, concurrent en tranquillité et en bon heur; Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
Atque metus omnes et inexorabile fatum
Subiecit pedibus, strepitúmque Acherontis auari!
Fortunatus et ille, Deos qui nouit agrestes, Panáque, Syluanúmque senem, Nymphásque sorores!

3.10.26 De toutes choses les naissances sont foibles et tendres. Pourtant faut-il auoir les yeux ouuerts aux commencements. Car comme lors en sa petitesse, on n'en descouure pas le danger, quand il est accreu, on n'en descouure plus le remede. I'eusse rencontré vn million de trauerses, tous les iours, plus mal aisées à digerer, au cours de l'ambition, qu'il ne m'a esté mal-aysé d'arrester l'inclination naturelle qui m'y portoit. Iure perhorrui / Latè conspicuum tollere verticem.

ENGLISH

hold from now on, whatever it costs you. It is your virtue and your conscience that are being addressed; these are not parts to be put behind a mask. Let us leave these base means and expedients to the chicanery of the law courts. The excuses and reparations I see made every day to purge an indiscretion seem to me uglier than the indiscretion itself. It would be better to offend your adversary once more than to offend yourself by making him such amends.

You defied him when moved by anger, and now you go and appease and flatter him in your cool and better sense: thus you abase yourself further than you had advanced. I find no saying so wrong in a gentleman as unsaying seems to me shameful for him—when it is an unsaying wrung from him by authority; for obstinacy is more excusable in him than faintheartedness. The passions are as easy for me to avoid as they are hard for me to moderate. They are more easily cut out of the soul than tempered. Whoever cannot attain that noble Stoic impassibility, let him take refuge in the lap of this common dullness of mine. What those men did by virtue, I train myself to do by temperament.

The middle region houses the storms; the two extremes, philosophers and country folk, meet in tranquility and happiness. Happy the man who has been able to know the causes of things, and has trampled underfoot all fears and inexorable fate and the roar of greedy Acheron!
Fortunate too is he who knows the gods of the countryside,
Pan, and old Silvanus, and the sister Nymphs![32]

The births of all things are weak and tender. Therefore we must keep our eyes open at the beginnings; for just as at that stage, in its smallness, we do not discover the danger, so once it has grown we no longer discover the remedy. In the course of ambition I would have met a million obstacles every day, harder to digest than it has been hard for me to check the natural inclination that drew me toward it. Rightly have I dreaded / to raise my head to be seen far and wide.

32 Virgil, Georgics.

HIS RECORD AS MAYOR

Critics say his term left no trace; he answers that keeping the peace was the task.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.10.27 Toutes actions publiques sont subiectes à incertaines, et diuerses interpretations: car trop de testes en iugent. Aucuns disent, de cette mienne occupation de ville (et ie suis content d'en parler vn mot: non qu'elle le vaille, mais pour seruir de montre de mes mœurs en telles choses) que ie m'y suis porté en homme qui s'esmeut trop laschement, et d'vne affection languissante: et ils ne sont pas du tout esloignez d'apparence. I'essaye à tenir mon ame et mes pensées en repos. Cùm semper natura, tum etiam ætate iam quietus. Et si elles se desbauchent par fois, à quelque impression rude et penetrante, c'est à la verité sans mon conseil.

All public actions are subject to uncertain and varied interpretations, for too many heads judge them. Some say of this municipal office of mine (and I am glad to say a word about it—not that it is worth it, but to serve as a sample of my ways in such things) that I conducted myself in it like a man too sluggish to be stirred, with a languid zeal; and they are not altogether wide of the appearances. I try to keep my soul and my thoughts at rest. Always quiet by nature, and now also by age. And if they sometimes break loose under some rough and piercing impression, it is, in truth, without my consent.[33]

De cette langueur naturelle, on ne doibt pourtant tirer aucune preuue d'impuissance: car faute de soing, et faute de sens, ce sont deux choses: et moins de mes-cognoissance et d'ingratitude enuers ce peuple, qui employa tous les plus extremes moyens qu'il eust en ses mains, à me gratifier: et auant m'auoir cogneu, et apres. Et fit bien plus pour moy, en me redonnant ma charge, qu'en me la donnant premierement. Ie luy veux tout le bien qui se peut. Et certes si l'occasion y eust esté, il n'est rien que i'eusse espargné pour son seruice. Ie me suis esbranlé pour luy, comme ie fais pour moy.

From this natural languor, however, one should not draw any proof of incapacity—for want of care and want of sense are two different things—and still less of unawareness or ingratitude toward this people, who used all the most extreme means in their power to gratify me, both before they knew me and after, and did far more for me in giving me my office again than in giving it to me the first time. I wish them every possible good. And certainly, had the occasion arisen, there is nothing I would have spared in their service. I bestirred myself for them as I do for myself.

C'est vn bon peuple, guerrier et genereux: capable pourtant d'obeyssance et discipline, et de seruir à quelque bon vsage, s'il y est bien guidé. Ils disent aussi, cette mienne vacation s'estre passée sans marque et sans trace. Il est bon. On accuse ma cessation, en vn temps, où quasi tout le monde estoit conuaincu de trop faire. I'ay vn agir trepignant où la volonté me charrie. Mais cette pointe est ennemye de perseuerance. Qui se voudra seruir de moy, selon moy, qu'il me donne des affaires où il face besoing de vigueur, et de liberté: qui ayent vne conduitte droicte, et courte: et encores hazardeuse: i'y pourray quelque chose. S'il la faut longue, subtile, laborieuse, artificielle, et tortue, il fera mieux de s'addresser à quelqu'autre.

They are a good people, warlike and generous, yet capable of obedience and discipline and of serving some good purpose if well led. They also say that this term of mine passed without mark or trace. Very well. They accuse me of inaction at a time when almost everybody was guilty of doing too much. I have an impatient, foot-stamping way of acting where my will carries me along. But that keenness is hostile to perseverance. Whoever wants to make use of me in accordance with myself, let him give me affairs that call for vigor and freedom, that have a straight and short course, and even a risky one: there I may be able to do something. If the course must be long, subtle, laborious, artful and tortuous, he would do better to turn to someone else.

Toutes charges importantes ne sont pas difficiles. I'estois preparé à m'embesongner plus rudement vn peu, s'il en

Not all important offices are difficult. I was prepared to set to work a little more roughly if there 33 Quintus Cicero, Handbook of Electioneering.

FRENCH

eust esté grand besoing. Car il est en mon pouuoir, de faire quelque chose plus que ie ne fais, et que ie n'ayme à faire. Ie ne laissay que ie sçache, aucun mouuement, que le deuoir requist en bon escient de moy. I'ay facilement oublié ceux, que l'ambition mesle au deuoir, et couure de son tiltre. Ce sont ceux, qui le plus souuent remplissent les yeux et les oreilles, et contentent les hommes. Non pas la chose, mais l'apparence les paye. S'ils n'oyent du bruict, il leur semble qu'on dorme. Mes humeurs sont contradictoires aux humeurs bruyantes.

I'arresterois bien vn trouble, sans me troubler, et chastierois vn desordre sans alteration. Ay-ie besoing de cholere, et d'inflammation? ie l'emprunte, et m'en masque. Mes mœurs sont mousses, plustost fades, qu'aspres. Ie n'accuse pas vn magistrat qui dorme, pourueu que ceux qui sont soubs sa main, dorment quand et luy. Les loix dorment de mesme. Pour moy, ie louë vne vie glissante, sombre et muette. Neque submissam et abiectam, neque se efferentem. Ma fortune le veut ainsi. Ie suis nay d'vne famille, qui a coulé sans esclat, et sans tumulte: et de longue memoire, particulierement ambitieuse de preud'hommie. Nos hommes sont si formez à l'agitation et ostentation, que la bonté, la moderation, l'equabilité, la constance, et telles qualitez quietes et obscures, ne se sentent plus.

Les corps raboteux se sentent, les polis se manient imperceptiblement. La maladie se sent, la santé, peu ou point: ny les choses qui nous oignent, au prix de celles qui nous poignent. C'est agir pour sa reputation, et proffit particulier, non pour le bien, de remettre à faire en la place, ce qu'on peut faire en la chambre du conseil: et en plain midy, ce qu'on eust faict la nuict precedente: et d'estre ialoux de faire soy-mesme, ce que son compaignon faict aussi bien. Ainsi faisoyent aucuns chirurgiens de Grece, les operations de leur art, sur des eschaffaux à la veuë des passans, pour en acquerir plus de practique, et de chalandise.

Ils iugent, que les bons reglemens ne se peuuent entendre, qu'au son de la trompette. L'ambition n'est pas vn vice de petis compaignons, et de tels efforts que les nostres. On disoit à Alexandre: Vostre pere vous lairra vne grande domination, aysée, et pacifique: ce garçon estoit enuieux des victoires de son pere, et de la iustice de son gouuernement. Il n'eust pas voulu iouyr l'empire du monde, mollement et paisiblement. Alcibiades en Platon, ayme mieux mourir, ieune, beau, riche, noble, sçauant, had been great need. For it is in my power to do somewhat more than I do, and than I like to do. I did not omit, so far as I know, any action that duty seriously required of me. I easily forgot those that ambition mixes with duty and covers with its title. It is these that most often fill people's eyes and ears and satisfy them. Not the thing but the appearance pays them. If they hear no noise, it seems to them that we are asleep. My temperament is the opposite of noisy temperaments.

ENGLISH

I could well stop a disturbance without being disturbed, and punish a disorder without losing my composure. Do I need anger and fire? I borrow them and wear them as a mask. My manners are blunt, insipid rather than harsh. I do not blame a magistrate who sleeps, provided those under his hand sleep along with him: the laws sleep likewise. For my part, I commend a life that glides along, obscure and silent, neither abject and groveling nor self-exalting. My fortune wills it so. I was born of a family that has flowed along without brilliance and without tumult, and within long memory particularly ambitious of integrity. Our men are so shaped to agitation and ostentation that goodness, moderation, evenness, constancy and such quiet and obscure qualities are no longer felt.

Rough bodies are felt; smooth ones are handled imperceptibly. Sickness is felt; health little or not at all—nor are the things that salve us felt, compared with those that stab us. It is acting for one's reputation and private profit, not for the common good, to put off doing in the public square what can be done in the council chamber, and at broad noon what could have been done the night before, and to insist jealously on doing oneself what one's colleague does just as well. That is how some surgeons in Greece performed the operations of their art on platforms in view of passers-by, to gain more practice and custom.

They judge that good regulations cannot be appreciated except to the sound of the trumpet. Ambition is not a vice for petty fellows and for efforts like ours. People said to Alexander: "Your father will leave you a great dominion, easy and peaceful." This boy was envious of his father's victories and of the justice of his government; he would not have wanted to enjoy the empire of the world softly and peacefully. Alcibiades, in Plato, would tout cela par excellence, que de s'arrester en l'estat de cette condition. Cette maladie est à l'auanture excusable, en vne ame si forte et si plaine.

FRENCH

Quand ces ametes naines, et chetiues, s'en vont embabouynant: et pensent espandre leur nom, pour auoir iugé à droict vn affaire, ou continué l'ordre des gardes d'vne porte de ville: ils en montrent d'autant plus le cul, qu'ils esperent en hausser la teste. Ce menu bien faire, n'a ne corps ne vie. Il va s'esuanouyssant en la premiere bouche: et ne se promeine que d'vn carrefour de ruë à l'autre. Entretenez en hardiment vostre fils et vostre valet. Comme cet ancien, qui n'ayant autre auditeur de ses loüanges, et consent de sa valeur, se brauoit auec sa chambriere, en s'escriant: O Perrete, le galant et suffisant homme de maistre que tu as! Entretenez vous en vous-mesme, au pis aller.

Comme vn conseiller de ma cognoissance, ayant desgorgé vne battelée de paragraphes, d'vne extreme contention, et pareille ineptie: s'estant retiré de la chambre du conseil, au pissoir du palais: fut ouy marmotant entre les dents tout conscientieusement: Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam. Qui ne peut d'ailleurs, si se paye de sa bourse.

3.10.28 La renommée ne se prostitue pas à si vil comte. Les actions rares et exemplaires, à qui elle est deuë ne souffriroient pas la compagnie de cette foule innumerable de petites actions iournalieres. Le marbre esleuera vos titres tant qu'il vous plaira, pour auoir faict repetasser vn pan de mur, ou descroter vn ruisseau public: mais non pas les hommes, qui ont du sens. Le bruit ne suit pas toute bonté, si la difficulté et estrangeté n'y est ioincte. Voyre ny la simple estimation, n'est deuë à toute action, qui n'ait de la vertu, selon les Stoïciens. Et ne veulent, qu'on sçache seulement gré, à celuy qui par temperance, s'abstient d'vne vieille chassieuse.

Ceux qui ont cognu les admirables qualitez de Scipion l'Africain, refusent la gloire, que Panætius luy attribue d'auoir esté abstinent de dons: comme gloire non tant sienne comme de son siecle. Nous auons les voluptez sortables à nostre fortune: n'vsurpons pas celles de la rather die young, handsome, rich, noble, learned —all of it to the highest degree—than stop at the state he had reached. This sickness is perhaps excusable in a soul so strong and so full.[34]

ENGLISH

When these dwarfish, puny little souls go about making monkeys of themselves, and think they will spread their name for having judged a case rightly or kept up the rota of the guards at a city gate, the more they hope to raise their head, the more they show their backside. This petty well-doing has neither body nor life. It vanishes in the first mouth that tells it, and travels only from one street corner to the next. By all means talk about it to your son and your valet. Like that man of old who, having no other audience for his praises and no other witness to his worth, swaggered before his chambermaid, crying: "O Perrette, what a gallant and able man of a master you have!" At worst, talk about it to yourself.

Like a councilor I know who, having disgorged a boatload of paragraphs with extreme effort and equal ineptitude, and having withdrawn from the council chamber to the urinal of the Palace of Justice, was heard muttering most conscientiously between his teeth: Not to us, Lord, not to us, but to your name give glory. Whoever cannot get paid elsewhere pays himself out of his own purse.[35]

Fame does not prostitute herself at so cheap a rate. The rare and exemplary actions to which it is due would not put up with the company of that countless crowd of petty everyday actions. Marble will raise your titles as high as you please for having had a stretch of wall patched or a public gutter cleaned out; but men of sense will not. Renown does not follow every good deed unless difficulty and strangeness are joined to it. Indeed, according to the Stoics, not even simple esteem is due to every action that has no virtue in it. And they will not have us even feel grateful to the man who, out of temperance, abstains from a bleary-eyed old woman.

Those who knew the admirable qualities of Scipio Africanus deny him the glory that Panaetius attributes to him of having refused gifts, as a glory not so much his as his age's. We have the pleasures 34 Plato, First Alcibiades.

35 Psalm 115 (113 in the Vulgate).

FRENCH

grandeur. Les nostres sont plus naturelles. Et d'autant plus solides et seures, qu'elles sont plus basses. Puis que ce n'est par conscience, aumoins par ambition refusons l'ambition. Desdaignons cette faim de renommée et d'honneur, basse et belistresse, qui nous le faict coquiner de toute sorte de gens: Quæ est ista laus quæ possit è macello peti? par moyens abiects, et à quelque vil prix que ce soit. C'est deshonneur d'estre ainsin honnoré.

Apprenons à n'estre non plus auides, que nous sommes capables de gloire. De s'enfler de toute action vtile et innocente, c'est à faire à gens à qui elle est extraordinaire et rare. Ils la veulent mettre, pour le prix qu'elle leur couste. A mesure, qu'vn bon effect est plus esclatant: ie rabats de sa bonté, le soupçon en quoy i'entre, qu'il soit produict, plus pour estre esclatant, que pour estre bon. Estalé, il est à demy vendu. Ces actions là, ont bien plus de grace, qui eschappent de la main de l'ouurier, nonchalamment et sans bruict: et que quelque honneste homme, choisit apres, et releue de l'ombre, pour les pousser en lumiere: à cause d'elles mesmes.

Mihi quidem laudabiliora videntur omnia, quæ sine venditatione, et sine populo teste fiunt: dit le plus glorieux homme du monde. Ie n'auois qu'à conseruer et durer, qui sont effects sourds et insensibles. L'innouation est de grand lustre. Mais elle est interdicte en ce temps, où nous sommes pressez, et n'auons à nous deffendre que des nouuelletez. L'abstinence de faire, est souuent aussi genereuse, que le faire: mais elle est moins au iour. Et ce peu, que ie vaux, est quasi tout de cette espece. En somme les occasions en cette charge ont suiuy ma complexion: dequoy ie leur sçay tresbon gré. Est-il quelqu'vn qui desire estre malade, pour voir son medecin en besongne?

Et faudroit-il pas fouëter le medecin, qui nous desireroit la peste, pour mettre son art en practique? Ie n'ay point eu cett'humeur inique et assez commune, de desirer que le trouble et maladie des affaires de cette cité, rehaussast et honnorast mon gouuernement. I'ay presté de bon cœur, l'espaule à leur aysance et facilité. Qui ne me voudra sçauoir gré de l'ordre, de la douce et muette that suit our fortune; let us not usurp those of greatness. Ours are more natural, and all the more solid and secure for being lower. Since it is not out of conscience, let us at least out of ambition refuse ambition. Let us disdain this hunger for fame and honor, base and beggarly, which makes us go begging for it from all sorts of people—What sort of praise is this, that can be sought in the market?—by abject means and at whatever vile price. It is dishonor to be honored in this way.[36]

ENGLISH

Let us learn to be no greedier for glory than we are capable of it. Puffing oneself up over every useful and innocent action is for people to whom such action is extraordinary and rare: they want to value it at the price it cost them. The more dazzling a good deed is, the more I deduct from its goodness, because of the suspicion I come to have that it was done more to dazzle than to be good. Put on display, it is half sold. Far more graceful are those actions that slip from the workman's hand carelessly and without noise, and that some decent man later picks out and raises from the shadows to push them into the light—for their own sake.

To me, indeed, all things seem more praiseworthy that are done without ostentation and without the people as witness, says the most vainglorious man in the world. I had only to preserve and endure, which are quiet, imperceptible achievements. Innovation has great luster; but it is forbidden in these times, when we are hard pressed and have nothing to defend ourselves against but novelties. Refraining from doing is often as noble as doing, but it is less in the open; and what little I am worth is almost all of this kind. In short, the occasions in this office have suited my constitution, for which I am most grateful to them. Is there anyone who wishes to be ill so as to see his physician at work?[37]

And should we not whip the physician who wished the plague on us so as to put his skill into practice? I have never had that unjust and rather common temper of wishing that the disorder and sickness of this city's affairs would exalt and honor my administration. I have gladly put my shoulder to making them easy and smooth. Who-

36 This is Scipio Aemilianus (Africanus the Younger), Panaetius' friend. The Latin is Cicero, On Ends II.15.
37 The Latin is Cicero, Tusculan Disputations II.26.

FRENCH

tranquillité, qui a accompaigné ma conduitte: aumoins ne peut-il me priuer de la part qui m'en appartient, par le tiltre de ma bonne fortune. Et ie suis ainsi faict: que i'ayme autant estre heureux que sage: et deuoir mes succez, purement à la grace de Dieu, qu'à l'entremise de mon operation.

I'auois assez disertement publié au monde mon insuffisance, en tels maniemens publiques. I'ay encore pis, que l'insuffisance: c'est qu'elle ne me desplaist guere: et que ie ne cherche guere à la guarir, veu le train de vie que i'ay desseigné. Ie ne me suis en cette entremise, non plus satisfaict à moy-mesme. Mais à peu pres, i'en suis arriué à ce que ie m'en estois promis: et si ay de beaucoup surmonté, ce que i'en auois promis à ceux, à qui i'auois à faire. Car ie promets volontiers vn peu moins de ce que ie puis, et de ce que i'espere tenir. Ie m'asseure, n'y auoir laissé ny offence ny haine.

D'y laisser regret et desir de moy: ie sçay à tout le moins bien cela, que ie ne l'ay pas fort affecté: Méne huic confidere monstro!
Méne salis placidi vultum, fluctúsque quietos Ignorare!

ENGLISH

ever will not give me credit for the order, the gentle and silent tranquility that accompanied my conduct of office, cannot at least deprive me of the share of it that belongs to me by right of my good fortune. And I am so made that I like being lucky as much as being wise, and owing my successes purely to the grace of God as much as to the agency of my own work.

I had proclaimed to the world eloquently enough my incompetence in such public dealings. I have something still worse than incompetence: it hardly displeases me, and I hardly try to cure it, given the course of life I have planned for myself. Nor did I satisfy myself in this undertaking. But I have arrived at roughly what I had promised myself, and I have far surpassed what I had promised those I had to deal with; for I readily promise a little less than I can do and than I hope to deliver. I am sure I left behind neither offense nor hatred.

As for leaving behind regret and a desire for me, I know at least this much: that I did not much aim at it. I, trust this monster?
I, not know the look of the calm salt sea and the quiet waves
For what they are?[38]

38 Virgil, Aeneid V.849–51: the helmsman Palinurus refusing to trust a calm sea.

III.11 Of the Lame

Des boyteux

Starting from the calendar reform, Montaigne mocks credulity about witches and miracles and urges suspended judgment.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.11.1 IL y a deux ou trois ans, qu'on accoursit l'an de dix iours en France. Combien de changemens doiuent suyure cette reformation! Ce fut proprement remuer le ciel et la terre à la fois. Ce neantmoins, il n'est rien qui bouge de sa place. Mes voisins trouuent l'heure de leurs semences, de leur recolte, l'opportunité de leurs negoces, les iours nuisibles et propices, au mesme poinct iustement, où ils les auoyent assignez de tout temps. Ny l'erreur ne se sentoit en nostre vsage, ny l'amendement ne s'y sent. Tant il y a d'incertitude par tout: tant nostre apperceuance est grossiere, obscure et obtuse.

Two or three years ago the year was shortened by ten days in France. How many changes ought to follow from this reform! It was literally moving heaven and earth at once. And yet nothing has budged from its place. My neighbors find the time for their sowing and their harvest, the right moment for their business, the unlucky and lucky days, at exactly the same point where they had always placed them. Neither was the error felt in our practice, nor is the correction felt now. So much uncertainty is there everywhere; so coarse, dim and dull is our perception.[1]

On dit, que ce reglement se pouuoit conduire d'vne façon moins incommode: soustraiant à l'exemple d'Auguste, pour quelques années, le iour du bissexte: qui ainsi comme ainsin, est vn iour d'empeschement et de trouble: iusques à ce qu'on fust arriué à satisfaire exactement ce debte. Ce que mesme on n'a pas faict, par cette correction: et demeurons encores en arrerages de quelques iours. Et si par mesme moyen, on pouuoit prouuoir à l'aduenir, ordonnant qu'apres la reuolution de tel ou tel nombre d'années, ce iour extraordinaire seroit tousiours eclipsé: si que nostre mesconte ne pourroit d'ores-enauant exceder vingt et quatre heures. Nous n'auons autre comte du temps, que les ans.

They say this adjustment could have been carried out less inconveniently, by omitting the leap day for a few years, following the example of Augustus —a day that, one way or another, is a day of hindrance and confusion—until the debt had been exactly paid off. Which in fact has not even been done by this correction: we are still a few days in arrears. And by the same means provision could have been made for the future, by ordering that after the cycle of such-and-such a number of years this extra day would always be dropped, so that our miscount could never thereafter exceed twenty-four hours. We have no other reckoning of time than years.[2]

Il y a tant de siecles que le monde s'en sert: et si c'est vne mesure que nous n'auons encore acheué d'arrester. Et telle, que nous doubtons tous les iours, quelle forme les autres nations luy ont diuersement donné: et quel en estoit l'vsage. Quoy ce que disent aucuns, que les cieux se compriment vers nous en vieillissant, et nous iettent en incertitude des heures mesme et des iours? Et des moys, ce que dit Plutarque: qu'encore de son temps l'astrologie n'auoit sçeu borner le mouuement de la lune? Nous voyla bien accommodez, pour tenir registre des choses passées.

The world has used them for so many centuries, and yet it is a measure we have not yet finished fixing—so much so that every day we wonder what different forms other nations have given it and how they used it. And what of the claim some make, that the heavens are contracting toward us as they grow old, and throwing us into uncertainty even about hours and days? And about months, what Plutarch says: that even in his time astronomy had not managed to determine the mo-

1 France adopted the reformed calendar in December 1582.

2 Augustus suspended leap years for a period to correct errors made in applying Julius Caesar's calendar.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

tion of the moon? A fine position we are in for keeping records of things past!

3.11.2 Ie resuassois presentement, comme ie fais souuent, sur ce, combien l'humaine raison est vn instrument libre et vague. Ie vois ordinairement, que les hommes, aux faicts qu'on leur propose, s'amusent plus volontiers à en chercher la raison, qu'à en chercher la verité. Ils passent par dessus les presuppositions, mais ils examinent curieusement les consequences. Ils laissent les choses, et courent aux causes. Plaisans causeurs. La cognoissance des causes touche seulement celuy, qui a la conduitte des choses: non à nous, qui n'en auons que la souffrance. Et qui en auons l'vsage parfaictement plein et accompli, selon nostre besoing, sans en penetrer l'origine et l'essence. Ny le vin n'en est plus plaisant à celuy qui en sçait les facultez premieres.

I was musing just now, as I often do, on what a free and vague instrument human reason is. I commonly see that men, when facts are put before them, would rather amuse themselves by looking for the reason for them than by looking for the truth of them. They pass over the premises, but examine the consequences with great care. They leave the things and run to the causes. Fine talkers about causes they are! Knowledge of causes concerns only the one who has the direction of things, not us, who only undergo them, and who have the full and complete use of them, according to our need, without penetrating their origin and essence. Nor is wine any more pleasant to the man who knows its primary properties.

Au contraire: et le corps et l'ame, interrompent et alterent le droit qu'ils ont de l'vsage du monde, et de soy-mesmes, y meslant l'opinion de science. Les effectz nous touchent, mais les moyens, nullement. Le determiner et le distribuer, appartient à la maistrise, et à la regence: comme à la subiection et apprentissage, l'accepter. Reprenons nostre coustume. Ils commencent ordinairement ainsi: Comment est-ce que cela se fait? mais, se fait-il? faudroit il dire. Nostre discours est capable d'estoffer cent autres mondes, et d'en trouuer les principes et la contexture. Il ne luy faut ny matiere ny baze.

On the contrary: both body and soul disturb and impair the right they have to the use of the world and of themselves by mixing into it the conceit of knowledge. Effects concern us, but the means not at all. Determining and distributing belong to mastery and rule, just as accepting belongs to subjection and apprenticeship. To return to our habit: they usually begin like this: "How does this happen?" What they should say is: "But does it happen?" Our reasoning is capable of furnishing a hundred other worlds and finding their principles and structure. It needs neither matter nor foundation.

Laissez le courre: il bastit aussi bien sur le vuide que sur le plain, et de l'inanité que de matiere, Dare pondus idonea fumo. Ie trouue quasi par tout, qu'il faudroit dire: Il n'en est rien. Et employerois souuent cette responce: mais ie n'ose: car ils crient, que c'est vne deffaicte produicte de foiblesse d'esprit et d'ignorance. Et me faut ordinairement basteler par compaignie, à traicter des subiects, et contes friuoles, que ie mescrois entierement. Ioinct qu'à la verité, il est vn peu rude et quereleux, de nier tout sec, vne proposition de faict. Et peu de gens faillent: notamment aux choses malaysées à persuader, d'affermer qu'ils l'ont veu: ou d'alleguer des tesmoins, desquels l'authorité arreste notre contradiction.

Let it run: it builds as well on the empty as on the full, and out of nothingness as out of matter, fit to give weight to smoke. I find almost everywhere that we ought to say: "There is nothing to it." And I would often use this answer, but I dare not, for they cry that it is an evasion born of weakness of mind and ignorance. So I usually have to play the clown for company's sake, discussing subjects and frivolous tales that I entirely disbelieve. Besides, to tell the truth, it is a bit rude and quarrelsome to flatly deny a statement of fact. And few people fail —especially in things hard to make others believe —to assert that they have seen it, or to cite witnesses whose authority stops our contradiction.[3]

Suyuant cet vsage, nous sçauons les fondemens, et les moyens, de mille choses qui ne furent onques. Et

Following this practice, we know the foundations and the means of a thousand things that never ex-

3 Persius, Satires V.20.

FRENCH

s'escarmouche le monde, en mille questions, desquelles, et le pour et le contre, est faux. Ita finitima sunt falsa veris, vt in præcipitem locum non debeat se sapiens committere. La verité et le mensonge ont leurs visages conformes, le port, le goust, et les alleures pareilles: nous les regardons de mesme œil. Ie trouue que nous ne sommes pas seulement lasches à nous defendre de la piperie: mais que nous cherchons, et conuions à nous y enferrer. Nous aymons à nous embrouïller en la vanité, comme conforme à nostre estre.

ENGLISH

isted. And the world skirmishes over a thousand questions in which both the pro and the con are false. The false is so close to the true that the wise man should not venture onto such a precipitous slope. Truth and falsehood have matching faces; their bearing, taste and gait are alike; we look at them with the same eye. I find that we are not only slack in defending ourselves against deception, but that we seek it out and invite it to run us through. We love to entangle ourselves in vanity, as something in keeping with our being.[4]

HOW MIRACLES ARE BORN

Rumor grows from small beginnings as each teller adds something of his own.

FRENCH

3.11.3 I'ay veu la naissance de plusieurs miracles de mon temps. Encore qu'ils s'estouffent en naissant, nous ne laissons pas de preuoir le train qu'ils eussent pris, s'ils eussent vescu leur aage. Car il n'est que de trouuer le bout du fil, on en desuide tant qu'on veut. Et y a plus loing, de rien, à la plus petite chose du monde, qu'il n'y a de celle là, iusques à la plus grande. Or les premiers qui sont abbreuuez de ce commencement d'estrangeté, venans à semer leur histoire, sentent par les oppositions qu'on leur fait, où loge la difficulté de la persuasion, et vont calfeutrant cet endroict de quelque piece fauce.

Outre ce que, insita hominibus libidine alendi de industria rumores, nous faisons naturellement conscience, de rendre ce qu'on nous a presté, sans quelque vsure, et accession de nostre creu. L'erreur particuliere, fait premierement l'erreur publique: et à son tour apres, l'erreur publique fait l'erreur particuliere. Ainsi va tout ce bastiment, s'estoffant et formant, de main en main: de maniere que le plus eslongné tesmoin, en est mieux instruict que le plus voisin: et le dernier informé, mieux persuadé que le premier. C'est vn progrez naturel. Car quiconque croit quelque chose, estime que c'est ouurage de charité, de la persuader à vn autre.

Et pour ce faire, ne craint point d'adiouster de son inuention, autant qu'il voit estre necessaire en son compte, pour suppleer à la resistance et au deffaut qu'il pense estre en la conception d'autruy. Moy-mesme, qui

ENGLISH

I have seen the birth of several miracles in my time. Even though they are smothered at birth, we can still foresee the course they would have taken if they had lived out their span. For you need only find the end of the thread, and you can unwind as much as you like. And there is a greater distance from nothing to the smallest thing in the world than from that to the greatest. Now the first people who have drunk in this beginning of strangeness, when they come to spread their story, sense from the objections raised against them where the difficulty of persuading lies, and go about caulking that spot with some false patch.

Besides which, through men's innate desire to feed rumors deliberately, we naturally feel it a matter of conscience not to return what has been lent us without some interest and some addition of our own growing. Private error first creates public error; and afterward, in its turn, public error creates private error. So this whole edifice goes on filling out and taking shape from hand to hand, so that the remotest witness is better informed about it than the nearest, and the last to be told more convinced than the first. It is a natural progression. For whoever believes something thinks it a work of charity to persuade another of it.[5]

And to do so he is not afraid to add of his own invention as much as he sees is needed in his account to make up for the resistance and the deficiency he thinks he finds in the other person's un-

4 Cicero, Academica II.21.
5 Livy XXVIII.24.

FRENCH

fais singuliere conscience de mentir: et qui ne me soucie guere de donner creance et authorité à ce que ie dis, m'apperçoy toutesfois, aux propos que i'ay en main, qu'estant eschauffé ou par la resistance d'vn autre, ou par la propre chaleur de ma narration, ie grossis et enfle mon subiect, par voix, mouuemens, vigueur et force de parolles: et encore par extention et amplification: non sans interest de la verité nayfue.

Mais ie le fais en condition pourtant, qu'au premier qui me rameine, et qui me demande la verité nuë et cruë: ie quitte soudain mon effort, et la luy donne, sans exaggeration, sans emphase, et remplissage. La parole viue et bruyante, comme est la mienne ordinaire, s'emporte volontiers à l'hyperbole. Il n'est rien à quoy communement les hommes soyent plus tendus, qu'à donner voye à leurs opinions. Où le moyen ordinaire nous faut, nous y adioustons, le commandement, la force, le fer, et le feu. Il y a du mal'heur, d'en estre là, que la meilleure touche de la verité, ce soit la multitude des croyans, en vne presse où les fols surpassent de tant, les sages, en nombre.

Quasi verò quidquam sit tam valdè, quàm nil sapere vulgare. Sanitatis patrocinium est, insanientium turba. C'est chose difficile de resouldre son iugement contre les opinions communes. La premiere persuasion prinse du subiect mesme, saisit les simples: de là elle s'espand aux habiles, soubs l'authorité du nombre et ancienneté des tesmoignages. Pour moy, de ce que ie n'en croirois pas vn, ie n'en croirois pas cent vns. Et ne iuge pas les opinions, par les ans.

Il y a peu de temps, que l'vn de nos Princes, en qui la goute auoit perdu vn beau naturel, et vne allegre composition: se laissa si fort persuader, au rapport qu'on faisoit des merueilleuses operations d'vn prestre, qui par la voye des parolles et des gestes, guerissoit toutes maladies: qu'il fit vn long voyage pour l'aller trouuer: et par la force de son apprehension, persuada, et endormit ses iambes pour quelques heures, si qu'il en tira du seruice, qu'elles auoyent desapris luy faire, il y auoit long temps. Si la Fortune eust laissé emmonceler cinq ou six telles aduantures, elles estoient capables de mettre ce miracle en nature.

On trouua depuis, tant de simplesse, et si peu d'art, en l'architecte de tels ouurages, qu'on le iugea indigne derstanding. I myself, who make a particular point of conscience about lying, and who hardly care about giving credence and authority to what I say, nevertheless notice, in the matters I have in hand, that when I am heated either by someone else's resistance or by the very warmth of my telling, I swell and inflate my subject by voice, gestures, vigor and force of words, and also by extension and amplification—not without harm to the plain truth.

ENGLISH

But I do it on this condition, however: that for the first person who brings me back and asks me for the naked, raw truth, I immediately drop my effort and give it to him, without exaggeration, without emphasis or padding. Lively, loud speech, such as mine usually is, readily runs away into hyperbole. There is nothing men are commonly more bent on than making way for their opinions. Where the ordinary means fail us, we add command, force, steel and fire. It is a misfortune to have come to this: that the best touchstone of truth should be the number of believers, in a crowd where fools so far outnumber the wise.

As if anything were as common as lack of wisdom! A crowd of madmen is the advocate of sanity. It is a hard thing to settle one's judgment against common opinions. The first persuasion, drawn from the subject itself, seizes the simple; from there it spreads to the clever, under the authority of the number and age of the testimonies. For my part, what I would not believe from one, I would not believe from a hundred and one. And I do not judge opinions by their years.[6]

Not long ago one of our princes, in whom gout had spoiled a fine nature and a cheerful disposition, let himself be so thoroughly persuaded by the reports of the marvelous cures of a priest who healed every disease by means of words and gestures that he made a long journey to find him. And by the force of his imagination he persuaded his legs and numbed them for a few hours, so that he got out of them a service they had long since forgotten how to give him. If Fortune had let five or six such incidents pile up, they could have made this miracle part of nature.

Afterward so much simplicity and so little skill were found in the architect of these works that he

6 Cicero, On Divination II.39, and Augustine, The City of God VI.10.

FRENCH

d'aucun chastiement. Comme si feroit on, de la plus part de telles choses, qui les recognoistroit en leur giste. Miramur ex interuallo fallentia. Nostre veuë represente ainsi souuent de loing, des images estranges, qui s'esuanouyssent en s'approchant. Nunquam ad liquidum fama perducitur.

3.11.4 C'est merueille, de combien vains commencemens, et friuoles causes, naissent ordinairement si fameuses impressions. Cela mesmes en empesche l'information. Car pendant qu'on cherche des causes, et des fins fortes, et poisantes, et dignes d'vn si grand nom, on pert les vrayes. Elles eschapent de nostre veuë par leur petitesse. Et à la verité, il est requis vn bien prudent, attentif, et subtil inquisiteur, en telles recherches: indifferent, et non preoccupé. Iusques à cette heure, tous ces miracles, et euenemens estranges, se cachent deuant moy. Ie n'ay veu monstre et miracle au monde, plus expres, que moy-mesme. On s'appriuoise à toute estrangeté par l'vsage et le temps: mais plus ie me hante et me cognois, plus ma difformité m'estonne: moins ie m'entens en moy.

Le principal droict d'auancer et produire tels accidens, est reserué à la Fortune. Passant auant hier dans vn village, à deux lieuës de ma maison, ie trouuay la place encore toute chaude, d'vn miracle qui venoit d'y faillir: par lequel le voisinage auoit esté amusé plusieurs mois, et commençoient les prouinces voisines, de s'en esmouuoir, et y accourir à grosses troupes, de toutes qualitez.

Vn ieune homme du lieu, s'estoit ioüé à contrefaire vne nuict en sa maison, la voix d'vn esprit, sans penser à autre finesse, qu'à ioüir d'vn badinage present: cela luy ayant vn peu mieux succedé qu'il n'esperoit, pour estendre sa farce à plus de ressorts, il y associa vne fille de village, du tout stupide, et niaise: et furent trois en fin, de mesme aage et pareille suffisance: et de presches domestiques en firent des presches publics, se cachans soubs l'autel de l'Église, ne parlans que de nuict, et deffendans d'y apporter aucune lumiere.

De paroles, qui tendoient à la conuersion du monde, et menace du iour du iugement (car ce sont subiects soubs l'authorité et reuerence desquels, l'imposture se tapit was judged unworthy of any punishment. As would be done with most such things, if one tracked them down in their lair. We marvel at things that deceive us from a distance. In the same way our sight often presents strange images from afar that vanish as we draw near. Rumor is never brought to clarity.[7]

ENGLISH

It is a marvel from what empty beginnings and frivolous causes such famous impressions usually arise. That very fact hinders the investigation of them; for while we look for strong, weighty causes and ends, worthy of so great a name, we lose the true ones. They escape our sight by their smallness. And truly, such inquiries require a very prudent, attentive and subtle investigator, impartial and unprejudiced. Up to now all these miracles and strange events hide from me. I have seen no more manifest monster or miracle in the world than myself. We grow used to any strangeness through habit and time; but the more I frequent myself and know myself, the more my deformity stuns me, and the less I understand myself.

The chief right to bring forward and produce such incidents is reserved to Fortune. Passing through a village two leagues from my house the day before yesterday, I found the place still quite warm from a miracle that had just come to nothing there. It had kept the neighborhood busy for several months, and the neighboring provinces were beginning to be stirred by it and to flock there in large bands of every rank.

A young man of the place had amused himself one night by imitating the voice of a spirit in his house, with no further trick in mind than enjoying a joke on the spot. This having worked a little better than he hoped, he took on as partner, to give his farce more machinery, a village girl, utterly dull and simple; and in the end there were three of them, of the same age and similar wits. And from sermons at home they went on to public sermons, hiding under the altar of the church, speaking only at night, and forbidding anyone to bring any light there.

From words aimed at the conversion of the world and threats of the Day of Judgment (for these are subjects under whose authority and reverence im-

7 Seneca, Letters 118; Quintus Curtius IX.2.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	plus aisément) ils vindrent à quelques visions et mouuements, si niais, et si ridicules: qu'à peine y a-il rien si grossier au ieu des petits enfans. Si toutesfois la Fortune y eust voulu prester vn peu de faueur, qui sçait, iusques où se fust accreu ce battelage? Ces pauures diables sont à cette heure en prison; et porteront volontiers la peine de la sottise commune: et ne sçay si quelque iuge se vengera sur eux, de la sienne.	posture most easily lurks), they went on to certain visions and movements so silly and ridiculous that there is hardly anything so crude in little children's games. Yet if Fortune had been willing to lend them a little favor, who knows how far this juggling act might have grown? These poor devils are now in prison, and will probably pay the penalty for the common folly; and I do not know whether some judge will take revenge on them for his own.
	On voit clair en cette-cy, qui est descouuerte: mais en plusieurs choses de pareille qualité, surpassant nostre cognoissance: ie suis d'aduis, que nous soustenions nostre iugement, aussi bien à reieter, qu'à receuoir.	We see clearly in this case, which has been exposed; but in many things of the same kind that are beyond our knowledge, I am of the opinion that we should hold back our judgment, as much from rejecting as from accepting.

PROFESSING IGNORANCE

Words like "perhaps" and "it seems" are wiser than confident assertions.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.11.5	Il s'engendre beaucoup d'abus au monde: ou pour dire plus hardiment, tous les abus du monde s'engendrent, de ce, qu'on nous apprend à craindre de faire profession de nostre ignorance; et sommes tenus d'accepter, tout ce que nous ne pouuons refuter. Nous parlons de toutes choses par preceptes et resolution. Le stile à Rome portoit, que cela mesme, qu'vn tesmoin deposoit, pour l'auoir veu de ses yeux, et ce qu'vn iuge ordonnoit de sa plus certaine science, estoit conceu en cette forme de parler: Il me semble. On me faict haïr les choses vray-semblables, quand on me les plante pour infaillibles. I'aime ces mots, qui amollissent et moderent la temerité de nos propositions: à l'auanture, aucunement, quelque, on dit, ie pense, et semblables.	Many abuses are bred in the world—or, to put it more boldly, all the abuses in the world are bred—from our being taught to be afraid of professing our ignorance, and being obliged to accept whatever we cannot refute. We speak about everything by precept and decision. The usage at Rome required that even what a witness deposed as having seen with his own eyes, and what a judge decreed from his most certain knowledge, be couched in this form of words: "It seems to me." People make me hate probable things when they plant them on me as infallible. I love those words that soften and moderate the rashness of our propositions: "perhaps," "to some extent," "some," "they say," "I think," and the like.
	Et si i'eusse eu à dresser des enfans, ie leur eusse tant mis en la bouche, cette façon de respondre: enquestente, non resolutiue: Qu'est-ce à dire? ie ne l'entens pas; il pourroit estre: est-il vray? qu'ils eussent plustost gardé la forme d'apprentis à soixante ans, que de representer les docteurs à dix ans: comme ils font. Qui veut guerir de l'ignorance, il faut la confesser.	And if I had had children to bring up, I would have put this way of answering into their mouths so often—inquiring, not decisive: "What does that mean? I do not understand it. It might be so. Is it true?"—that they would sooner have kept the manner of apprentices at sixty than play the learned doctors at ten, as they do. Whoever would be cured of ignorance must confess it.
3.11.6	Iris est fille de Thaumantis. L'admiration est fondement de toute philosophie: l'inquisition, le progrez: l'ignorance, le bout. Voire dea, il y a quelque ignorance forte et genereuse, qui ne doit rien en honneur et en	Iris is the daughter of Thaumas. Wonder is the foundation of all philosophy, inquiry its progress, ignorance its end. Yes indeed, there is a strong and noble ignorance that owes nothing in honor and courage to knowledge—an ignorance that takes no courage à la science, ignorance pour laquelle conceuoir, il n'y a pas moins de science, qu'à conceuoir la science.

FRENCH

Ie vy en mon enfance, vn procez que Corras conseiller de Thoulouze fit imprimer, d'vn accident estrange; de deux hommes, qui se presentoient l'vn pour l'autre: il me souuient, et ne me souuient aussi d'autre chose, qu'il me sembla auoir rendu l'imposture de celuy qu'il iugea coulpable, si merueilleuse et excedant de si loing nostre cognoissance, et la sienne, qui estoit iuge, que ie trouuay beaucoup de hardiesse en l'arrest qui l'auoit condamné à estre pendu. Receuons quelque forme d'arrest qui die: La Cour n'y entend rien; plus librement et ingenuëment, que ne firent les Areopagites: lesquels se trouuans pressez d'vne cause, qu'ils ne pouuoient desuelopper, ordonnerent que les parties en viendroient à cent ans.

ENGLISH

less knowledge to conceive than it takes to conceive knowledge.[8]

In my childhood I saw the account of a trial that Coras, a councilor of Toulouse, had printed, about a strange case of two men who each passed himself off as the other. I remember (and I remember nothing else) that he seemed to me to have made the imposture of the man he judged guilty so marvelous, and so far beyond our knowledge and his own, who was the judge, that I found great boldness in the sentence that had condemned the man to be hanged. Let us adopt some form of sentence that says: "The court does not understand the matter at all"—more freely and candidly than the Areopagites did, who, finding themselves pressed by a case they could not unravel, ordered the parties to come back in a hundred years.[9]

WITCHES

Montaigne refuses to see people burned on charges that lie beyond human proof.

FRENCH

Les sorcieres de mon voisinage, courent hazard de leur vie, sur l'aduis de chasque nouuel autheur, qui vient donner corps à leurs songes. Pour accommoder les exemples que la diuine parolle nous offre de telles choses; tres-certains et irrefragables exemples; et les attacher à nos euenemens modernes: puisque nous n'en voyons, ny les causes, ny les moyens: il y faut autre engin que le nostre. Il appartient à l'auanture, à ce seul tres-puissant tesmoignage, de nous dire: Cettuy-cy en est, et celle-là: et non cet autre. Dieu en doit estre creu: c'est vrayement bien raison.

Mais non pourtant vn d'entre nous, qui s'estonne de sa propre narration (et necessairement il s'en estonne, s'il n'est hors du sens) soit qu'il l'employe au faict d'autruy: soit qu'il l'employe contre soy-mesme.

3.11.7 Ie suis lourd, et me tiens vn peu au massif, et au vrayssemblable: euitant les reproches anciens. Maiorem fidem homines adhibent ijs quæ non intelligunt. Cupidine humani ingenij libentius obscura creduntur. Ie vois bien qu'on se courrouce: et me deffend-on d'en doubter, sur peine d'iniures execrables. Nouuelle façon de persuader. Pour

ENGLISH

The witches in my neighborhood risk their lives on the opinion of each new author who comes along to give body to their dreams. To adapt the examples that the divine Word offers us of such things—most certain and irrefutable examples—and to attach them to our modern events, since we see neither their causes nor their means, requires another kind of wit than ours. It belongs perhaps to that sole and most powerful testimony to tell us: "This man is one of them, and that woman, but not this other." God must be believed in this; that is indeed entirely right.

But not, for all that, one of us, who is astonished at his own story (and he must necessarily be astonished at it, if he is not out of his mind), whether he applies it to someone else's doings or against himself.

I am heavy-minded, and keep somewhat to the solid and the probable, avoiding the ancient reproaches: Men put more faith in what they do not understand. Through a craving of the human mind, obscure things are more readily believed. I see plainly that people get angry, and forbid me to doubt it on 8 Plato, Theaetetus 155d: Iris, messenger of the gods, is the daughter of Thaumas, whose name evokes wonder (thauma).

9 Jean de Coras published (1561) his account of the Martin Guerre case; the impostor Arnaud du Tilh was hanged in 1560.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Dieu mercy. Ma creance ne se manie pas à coups de poing. Qu'ils gourmandent ceux qui accusent de fauceté leur opinion: ie ne l'accuse que de difficulté et de hardiesse. Et condamne l'affirmation opposite, egallement auec eux: sinon si imperieusement. Qui establit son discours par brauerie et commandement, montre que la raison y est foible. Pour vne altercation verbale et scholastique, qu'ils ayent autant d'apparence que leurs contradicteurs.

pain of execrable insults. A new way of persuading! Thank God, my belief is not handled with fists. Let them berate those who accuse their opinion of falsehood; I accuse it only of being difficult and bold. And I condemn the opposite assertion just as they do, though not so imperiously. Whoever establishes his reasoning by bravado and command shows that reason is weak in it. In a verbal, scholastic dispute, let them have as much plausibility as their opponents.[10]

Videantur sanè, non affirmentur modo. Mais en la consequence effectuelle qu'ils en tirent, ceux-cy ont bien de l'auantage.

By all means let them be put forward as seeming true, but not affirmed. But in the practical consequence they draw from it, these people have much the advantage.[11]

3.11.8 A tuer les gens: il faut vne clairté lumineuse et nette. Et est nostre vie trop réelle et essentielle, pour garantir ces accidens, supernaturels et fantastiques. Quant aux drogues et poisons, ie les mets hors de mon conte: ce sont homicides, et de la pire espece. Toutesfois en cela mesme, on dit qu'il ne faut pas tousiours s'arrester à la propre confession de ces gens icy. Car on leur a veu par fois s'accuser d'auoir tué des personnes, qu'on trouuoit saines et viuantes. En ces autres accusations extrauagantes, ie dirois volontiers; que c'est bien assez; qu'vn homme, quelque recommendation qu'il aye, soit creu de ce qui est humain.

To kill people, there must be a bright, clear light. And our life is too real and substantial to stand surety for these supernatural and fantastic incidents. As for drugs and poisons, I leave them out of my account: those are homicides, and of the worst kind. Yet even there, they say, one must not always rely on these people's own confession; for they have sometimes been seen to accuse themselves of having killed people who were found healthy and alive. As for these other extravagant accusations, I would readily say that it is quite enough for a man, whatever recommendation he may have, to be believed about what is human.

De ce qui est hors de sa conception, et d'vn effect supernaturel: il en doit estre creu, lors seulement, qu'vne approbation supernaturelle l'a authorisé. Ce priuilege qu'il a pleu à Dieu, donner à aucuns de nos tesmoignages, ne doit pas estre auily, et communiqué legerement. I'ay les oreilles battuës de mille tels contes. Trois le virent vn tel iour, en leuant: trois le virent lendemain, en occident: à telle heure, tel lieu, ainsi vestu: certes ie ne m'en croirois pas moy-mesme. Combien trouué-ie plus naturel, et plus vray-semblable, que deux hommes mentent: que ie ne fay qu'vn homme en douze heures, passe, quant et les vents, d'orient en occident?

As for what is beyond his comprehension and has a supernatural effect, he should be believed only when a supernatural approval has authorized him. This privilege that it has pleased God to give to some of our testimonies must not be cheapened and passed around lightly. My ears are battered with a thousand such tales: "Three people saw him on such a day in the east; three saw him the next day in the west, at such an hour, in such a place, dressed thus." Truly, I would not believe it of myself. How much more natural and likely I find it that two men are lying than that one man should pass with the winds from east to west in twelve hours!

Combien plus naturel que nostre entendement soit emporté de sa place, par la volubilité de notre esprit detraqué; que cela, qu'vn de nous soit enuolé sur vn balay, au long du tuiau de sa cheminée, en chair et en os, par vn esprit estranger? Ne cherchons pas des illusions

How much more natural that our understanding should be carried off its base by the whirling of our unhinged minds than that one of us should be flown up his chimney flue on a broomstick, in 10 The second Latin sentence is Tacitus, Histories I.22.

11 Cicero, Academica II.27.

FRENCH

du dehors, et incogneuës: nous qui sommes perpetuellement agitez d'illusions domestiques et nostres. Il me semble qu'on est pardonnable, de mescroire vne merueille, autant au moins qu'on peut en destourner et elider la verification, par voye non merueilleuse. Et suis l'aduis de S. Augustin: qu'il vaut mieux pancher vers le doute, que vers l'asseurance, és choses de difficile preuue, et dangereuse creance.

3.11.9 Il y a quelques années, que ie passay par les terres d'vn Prince souuerain: lequel en ma faueur, et pour rabattre mon incredulité, me fit cette grace, de me faire voir en sa presence, en lieu particulier, dix ou douze prisonniers de ce genre; et vne vieille entre autres, vrayment bien sorciere en laideur et deformité, tres-fameuse de longue main en cette profession. Ie vis et preuues, et libres confessions, et ie ne sçay quelle marque insensible sur cette miserable vieille: et m'enquis, et parlay tout mon saoul, y apportant la plus saine attention que ie peusse: et ne suis pas homme qui me laisse guere garroter le iugement par preoccupation.

En fin et en conscience, ie leur eusse plustost ordonné de l'ellebore que de la ciguë. Captisque res magis mentibus, quàm consceleratis similis visa. La iustice a ses propres corrections pour telles maladies. Quant aux oppositions et arguments, que des honnestes hommes m'ont faict, et là, et souuent ailleurs: ie n'en ay point senty, qui m'attachent: et qui ne souffrent solution tousiours plus vray-semblable, que leurs conclusions. Bien est vray que les preuues et raisons qui se fondent sur l'experience et sur le faict: celles-là, ie ne les desnouë point; aussi n'ont elles point de bout: ie les tranche souuent, comme Alexandre son nœud. Apres tout c'est mettre ses coniectures à bien haut prix, que d'en faire cuire vn homme tout vif.

3.11.10 On recite par diuers exemples (et Prestantius de son pere) qu'assoupy et endormy bien plus lourdement, que d'vn parfaict sommeil: il fantasia estre iument, et seruir de sommier à des soldats: et, ce qu'il fantasioit, il l'estoit. Si les sorciers songent ainsi materiellement: si les songes par fois se peuuent ainsin incorporer en effects: encore ne croy-ie pas, que nostre volonté en fust tenuë à la iustice. Ce que ie dis, comme celuy qui n'est pas iuge ny conseiller des Roys; ny s'en estime de bien loing digne:

ENGLISH

flesh and blood, by some alien spirit! Let us not look for illusions from outside and unknown, we who are perpetually shaken by illusions that are domestic and our own. It seems to me pardonable to disbelieve a marvel, at least as far as one can divert and evade its verification by non-marvelous means. And I follow the opinion of Saint Augustine, that it is better to lean toward doubt than toward certainty in things difficult to prove and dangerous to believe.

Some years ago I passed through the lands of a sovereign prince, who, as a favor to me and to beat down my incredulity, did me the kindness of showing me, in his presence and in a private place, ten or twelve prisoners of this kind. Among them was an old woman, truly a witch in ugliness and deformity, long very famous in that profession. I saw proofs and free confessions, and some mark or other on that wretched old woman that could feel nothing; and I questioned and talked to my heart's content, bringing to it the soundest attention I could. And I am not a man who lets his judgment be much tied up by prejudice.

In the end, and in all conscience, I would rather have prescribed them hellebore than hemlock. Their case seemed more like madness than crime. Justice has its own remedies for such illnesses. As for the objections and arguments that decent men have put to me, both there and often elsewhere, I have felt none that held me fast, or that did not admit a solution always more plausible than their conclusions. It is true that the proofs and reasons founded on experience and fact—those I do not untie; besides, they have no end to them. I often cut them, as Alexander did his knot. After all, it is putting a very high price on one's conjectures to have a man roasted alive for them.[12]

It is told in various examples (and Praestantius tells it of his father) that, drowsy and asleep much more heavily than in a proper sleep, he imagined he was a mare and was serving as a packhorse for soldiers; and what he imagined, he was. If sorcerers dream so materially, if dreams can sometimes take bodily form in deeds like this, still I do not believe our will should be held accountable for it to justice. I say this as one who is neither a judge nor 12 Hellebore was the classic remedy for madness, hemlock a deadly poison. The Latin is Livy VIII.18.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

ains homme du commun: nay et voüé à l'obeïssance de la raison publique, et en ses faicts, et en ses dicts.

a counselor of kings, nor thinks himself remotely worthy of being one, but a man of the common sort, born and vowed to obedience to public reason, in both his deeds and his words.[13]

Qui mettroit mes resueries en conte, au preiudice de la plus chetiue loy de son village, ou opinion, ou coustume, il se feroit grand tort, et encores autant à moy. Car en ce que ie dy, ie ne pleuuis autre certitude, sinon que c'est ce, que lors i'en auoy en la pensée. Pensée tumultuaire et vacillante. C'est par maniere de deuis, que ie parle de tout, et de rien par maniere d'aduis. Nec me pudet, vt istos, fateri nescire quod nesciam. Ie ne serois pas si hardy à parler, s'il m'appartenoit d'en estre creu. Et fut, ce que ie respondis à vn grand, qui se plaignoit de l'aspreté et contention de mes enhortemens.

Anyone who took my musings into account to the prejudice of the paltriest law, opinion or custom of his village would do himself a great wrong, and me just as much. For in what I say I guarantee no other certainty than that it is what I had in mind at the time—a tumultuous, wavering mind. I speak of everything by way of conversation, and of nothing by way of advice. Nor am I ashamed, as they are, to confess that I do not know what I do not know. I would not be so bold in speaking if I had any right to be believed. And that is what I answered a great man who complained of the harshness and vehemence of my exhortations:[14]

Vous sentant bandé et preparé d'vne part, ie vous propose l'autre, de tout le soing que ie puis: pour esclarcir vostre iugement, non pour l'obliger. Dieu tient vos courages, et vous fournira de choix. Ie ne suis pas si presomptueux, de desirer seulement, que mes opinions donnassent pente, à chose de telle importance. Ma fortune, ne les a pas dressées à si puissantes et si esleuées conclusions. Certes, i'ay non seulement des complexions en grand nombre: mais aussi des opinions assez, desquelles ie dégouterois volontiers mon fils, si i'en auois. Quoy? si les plus vrayes ne sont pas tousiours les plus commodes à l'homme; tant il est de sauuage composition.

"Feeling you braced and prepared on one side, I set the other before you with all the care I can, to clarify your judgment, not to bind it. God holds your hearts and will provide you with a choice. I am not so presumptuous as even to wish that my opinions should tip the balance in a matter of such importance; my fortune has not trained them for such powerful and lofty conclusions." Indeed, I have not only a great many traits of temperament but also a fair number of opinions that I would gladly put my son off, if I had one. What if the truest are not always the most suitable for man, so wild is his makeup?

THE LAME

An Italian proverb about lame women shows how readily reason invents causes for anything.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.11.11 A propos, ou hors de propos, il n'importe. On dit en Italie en commun prouerbe, que celuy-là ne cognoist pas Venus en sa parfaicte douceur, qui n'a couché auec la boiteuse. La fortune, ou quelque particulier accident, ont mis il y a long temps ce mot en la bouche du peuple; et se dict des masles comme des femelles. Car la Royne des Amazones, respondit au Scythe qui la conuioit à l'amour, αριστα χωλος οιφει, le boiteux le faict le mieux. En cette republique feminine, pour fuir la domination des masles, elles les stropioient dés l'enfance, bras, iambes, et autres membres qui leur donnoient auantage sur elles, et se

Apropos or not, it does not matter. They say in Italy, as a common proverb, that he does not know Venus in her perfect sweetness who has not lain with a lame woman. Fortune, or some particular incident, put this saying into the people's mouths long ago; and it is said of males as well as females. For the queen of the Amazons answered the Scythian who invited her to love: The lame man does it best. In that female republic, to escape the domination of males, they maimed them from childhood—arms, legs and other limbs that gave 13 Augustine tells the story of Praestantius in The City of God XVIII.18.

14 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations I.25.

FRENCH

seruoient d'eux, à ce seulement, à quoy nous nous seruons d'elles par deçà.

I'eusse dit, que le mouuement detraqué de la boiteuse, apportast quelque nouueau plaisir à la besoigne, et quelque poincte de douceur, à ceux qui l'essayent: mais ie viens d'apprendre, que mesme la philosophie ancienne en a decidé. Elle dict, que les iambes et cuisses des boiteuses, ne receuans à cause de leur imperfection, l'aliment qui leur est deu, il en aduient que les parties genitales, qui sont au dessus, sont plus plaines, plus nourries, et vigoureuses. Ou bien que ce defaut empeschant l'exercice, ceux qui en sont entachez, dissipent moins leurs forces, et en viennent plus entiers aux ieux de Venus.

Qui est aussi la raison, pourquoy les Grecs descrioient les tisserandes, d'estre plus chaudes, que les autres femmes: à cause du mestier sedentaire qu'elles font, sans grand exercice du corps. Dequoy ne pouuons nous raisonner à ce prix-là? De celles icy, ie pourrois aussi dire; que ce tremoussement que leur ouurage leur donne ainsin assises, les esueille et sollicite: comme faict les dames, le croulement et tremblement de leurs coches.

3.11.12 Ces exemples, seruent-ils pas à ce que ie disois au commencement: Que nos raisons anticipent souuent l'effect, et ont l'estenduë de leur iurisdiction si infinie, qu'elles iugent et s'exercent en l'inanité mesme, et au non estre? Outre la flexibilité de nostre inuention, à forger des raisons à toutes sortes de songes; nostre imagination se trouue pareillement facile, à receuoir des impressions de la fauceté, par bien friuoles apparences. Car par la seule authorité de l'vsage ancien, et publique de ce mot: ie me suis autresfois faict accroire, auoir receu plus de plaisir d'vne femme, de ce qu'elle n'estoit pas droicte, et mis cela au compte de ses graces.

3.11.13 Torquato Tasso, en la comparaison qu'il faict de la France à l'Italie; dit auoir remarqué cela, que nous auons les iambes plus gresles, que les Gentils-hommes Italiens; et en attribue la cause, à ce que nous sommes continuellement à cheual. Qui est celle-mêmes de laquelle Suetone tire vne toute contraire conclusion. Car il dit au rebours, que Germanicus auoit grossi les siennes, par continuation de ce mesme exercice. Il n'est rien si soupple et erratique, que nostre entendement. C'est le soulier de Theramenez, bon à tous pieds. Et il est double et diuers, et les matieres doubles, et diuerses. Donne moy vne dragme d'argent, disoit vn philosophe Cynique à them an advantage over the women—and used them only for what we use women for over here.

ENGLISH

I would have said that the irregular movement of a lame woman brought some new pleasure to the business, and some spice of sweetness to those who try it; but I have just learned that even ancient philosophy has settled the question. It says that since the legs and thighs of lame women do not receive, because of their imperfection, the nourishment due to them, the result is that the genital parts, which are just above, are fuller, better nourished and more vigorous. Or else that, since this defect hinders exercise, those who have it dissipate their strength less and come more whole to the games of Venus.

Which is also the reason why the Greeks decried women weavers as being hotter than other women: because of the sedentary trade they practice, without much bodily exercise. What can we not reason about at that rate? Of these women I could also say that the jiggling their work gives them, sitting like that, arouses and stirs them, as the jolting and shaking of their coaches does the ladies.

Do not these examples serve what I was saying at the beginning: that our reasons often run ahead of the fact, and have so infinite an extent of jurisdiction that they judge and operate even in emptiness and non-being? Besides the flexibility of our invention in forging reasons for all sorts of dreams, our imagination is likewise found to be easy in receiving impressions of falsehood from very frivolous appearances. For on the sole authority of the ancient and public use of this saying, I once made myself believe that I had received more pleasure from a woman because she was not straight, and counted that among her charms.

Torquato Tasso, in the comparison he makes between France and Italy, says he has noticed that we have thinner legs than Italian gentlemen, and attributes the cause to our being continually on horseback. That is the very cause from which Suetonius draws an entirely opposite conclusion: for he says, on the contrary, that Germanicus had made his legs thicker by persistent practice of this same exercise. There is nothing so supple and erratic as our understanding. It is the shoe of Theramenes, good for any foot. And it is double and diverse, and so are its materials. "Give me a

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Antigonus. Ce n'est pas present de Roy, respondit-il. Donne moy donc vn talent.	drachma of silver," said a Cynic philosopher to Antigonus. "That is not a king's gift," he replied. "Then give me a talent."[15]
3.11.14	Ce n'est pas present pour Cynique. Seu plures calor ille vias, et cæca relaxat Spiramenta, nouas veniat qua succus in herbas: Seu durat magis, et venas astringit hiantes, Ne tenues pluuiæ, rapidiue potentia solis Acrior, aut Boreæ penetrabile frigus adurat.	"That is not a gift for a Cynic." Whether that heat loosens more channels and hidden Pores, through which the sap may reach the new plants, Or rather hardens the soil and binds its gaping veins, So that neither fine rains nor the scorching sun's fiercer Power nor the North Wind's piercing cold may sear it.[16]
3.11.15	Ogni medaglia ha il suo riuerso. Voila pourquoy Clitomachus disoit anciennement, que Carneades auoit surmonté les labeurs d'Hercules; pour auoir arraché des hommes le consentement: c'est à dire, l'opinion, et la temerité de iuger. Cette fantasie de Carneades, si vigoureuse, nasquit à mon aduis anciennement, de l'impudence de ceux qui font profession de sçauoir, et de leur outre-cuidance desmesurée.	Every medal has its reverse. That is why Clitomachus said long ago that Carneades had surpassed the labors of Hercules, for having torn assent from men—that is, opinion and rashness in judging. This idea of Carneades, so vigorous, was born long ago, in my view, from the impudence of those who profess to know, and from their boundless arrogance.
	On mit Æsope en vente, auec deux autres esclaues: l'acheteur s'enquit du premier ce qu'il sçauoit faire, celuy-la pour se faire valoir, respondit monts et merueilles, qu'il sçauoit et cecy et cela: le deuxiesme en respondit de soy autant ou plus: quand ce fut à Æsope, et qu'on luy eust aussi demandé ce qu'il sçauoit faire: Rien, dit-il, car ceux cy ont tout preoccupé: ils sçauent tout. Ainsin est-il aduenu en l'escole de la philosophie. La fierté, de ceux qui attribuoient à l'esprit humain la capacité de toutes choses, causa en d'autres, par despit et par emulation, cette opinion, qu'il n'est capable d'aucune chose. Les vns tiennent en l'ignorance, cette mesme extremité, que les autres tiennent en la science.	Aesop was put up for sale with two other slaves. The buyer asked the first what he could do; to make himself valued, that one promised wonders —he knew this and he knew that. The second said as much of himself, or more. When it came to Aesop's turn, and he too was asked what he could do: "Nothing," he said, "for these two have taken everything already: they know everything." So it has happened in the school of philosophy. The pride of those who attributed to the human mind the capacity for all things produced in others, out of spite and rivalry, the opinion that it is capable of nothing. Some hold the same extreme in ignorance that others hold in knowledge.
	Afin qu'on ne puisse nier, que l'homme ne soit immoderé par tout: et qu'il n'a point d'arrest, que celuy de la necessité, et impuissance d'aller outre.	So that no one can deny that man is immoderate everywhere, and that he has no stopping point but that of necessity and the inability to go further.

15 Theramenes, Athenian politician of the late 5th century BC, was nicknamed "the buskin," a boot that fits either foot. The Cynic and Antigonus anecdote is from Seneca, On Benefits II.17.
16 Virgil, Georgics I.89–93, giving opposite explanations of why burning stubble benefits a field.

III.12 Of Physiognomy

De la Physionomie

Montaigne praises Socrates' natural simplicity, recounts the civil wars and plague, and asks whether a good face shows a good soul.

FRENCH

3.12.1 QVASI toutes les opinions que nous auons, sont prinses par authorité et à credit. Il n'y a point de mal. Nous ne sçaurions pirement choisir, que par nous, en vn siecle si foible. Cette image des discours de Socrates, que ses amis nous ont laissée, nous ne l'approuuons, que pour la reuerence de l'approbation publique. Ce n'est pas par nostre cognoissance: ils ne sont pas selon nostre vsage. S'il naissoit à cette heure, quelque chose de pareil, il est peu d'hommes qui le prisassent. Nous n'apperceuons les graces que pointues, bouffies, et enflées d'artifice. Celles qui coulent soubs la naïfueté, et la simplicité, eschappent aisément à vne veuë grossiere comme est la nostre.

Elles ont vne beauté delicate et cachée: il faut la veuë nette et bien purgée, pour descouurir cette secrette lumiere. Est pas, la naïfueté, selon nous, germaine à la sottise, et qualité de reproche? Socrates faict mouuoir son ame, d'vn mouuement naturel et commun. Ainsi dict vn païsan, ainsi dict vne femme. Il n'a iamais en la bouche, que cochers, menuisiers, sauetiers et maisons. Ce sont inductions et similitudes, tirées des plus vulgaires et cogneuës actions des hommes: chacun l'entend. Sous vne si vile forme, nous n'eussions iamais choisi la noblesse et splendeur de ses conceptions admirables: nous qui estimons plates et basses, toutes celles que la doctrine ne releue; qui n'apperceuons la richesse qu'en montre et en pompe. Nostre monde n'est formé qu'à l'ostentation.

Les hommes ne s'enflent que de vent: et se manient à bonds, comme les balons. Cettuy-cy ne se propose point des vaines fantasies. Sa fin fut, nous fournir de choses et de preceptes, qui reellement et plus ioinctement seruent à la vie: Seruare modum, finémque tenere, / Naturámque sequi. Il fut aussi tousiours vn et pareil. Et se monta, non par boutades, mais par complexion, au dernier poinct de vigueur. Ou pour mieux dire: il ne monta rien, mais rauala plustost et ramena à son poinct, originel et

ENGLISH

Almost all the opinions we hold are taken on authority and on credit. There is no harm in that: we could not choose worse than by ourselves, in so feeble an age. That image of Socrates' discourses which his friends have left us, we approve only out of reverence for public approval. It is not from our own knowledge: they are not in keeping with our usage. If something like them were born now, few men would prize it. We perceive graces only when they are pointed, puffed up and swollen with artifice. Those that flow beneath naturalness and simplicity easily escape a coarse sight like ours.[1]

They have a delicate and hidden beauty; it takes a clear, well-purged sight to discover that secret light. Is not naturalness, in our view, akin to foolishness, and a quality to be reproached? Socrates makes his soul move with a natural and common motion. So says a peasant, so says a woman. He never has anything in his mouth but coachmen, joiners, cobblers and houses. These are inductions and similes drawn from the commonest and most familiar actions of men; everyone understands him. Under so humble a form we would never have picked out the nobility and splendor of his admirable conceptions—we who consider flat and low all those that learning does not elevate, who perceive richness only in display and pomp. Our world is formed only for ostentation.

Men puff themselves up with nothing but wind, and move by leaps and bounds, like inflated balls. This man does not set himself vain fancies. His aim was to provide us with things and precepts that really and more directly serve life: To keep the mean, to hold to the limit, / And to follow nature. He was also always one and the same. And he rose to the highest point of vigor not by fits and starts but naturel, et luy soubmit la vigueur, les aspretez et les difficultez. Car en Caton, on void bien à clair, que c'est vne alleure tenduë bien loing au dessus des communes.

1 Socrates' friends who left accounts of his talk are chiefly Plato and Xenophon.

FRENCH

Aux braues exploits de sa vie, et en sa mort, on le sent tousiours monté sur ses grands cheuaux. Cettuy-cy ralle à terre: et d'vn pas mol et ordinaire, traicte les plus vtiles discours, et se conduict et à la mort et aux plus espineuses trauerses, qui se puissent presenter au train de la vie humaine. Il est bien aduenu, que le plus digne homme d'estre cogneu, et d'estre presenté au monde pour exemple, ce soit celuy duquel nous ayons plus certaine cognoissance. Il a esté esclairé par les plus clair-voyans hommes, qui furent onques. Les tesmoins que nous auons de luy, sont admirables en fidelité et en suffisance.

C'est grand cas, d'auoir peu donner tel ordre, aux pures imaginations d'vn enfant, que sans les alterer ou estirer, il en ait produict les plus beaux effects de nostre ame. Il ne la represente ny esleuée ni riche: il ne la represente que saine: mais certes d'vne bien allegre et nette santé. Par ces vulguaires ressorts et naturels: par ces fantasies ordinaires et communes: sans s'esmouuoir et sans se piquer, il dressa non seulement les plus reglées, mais les plus hautes et vigoureuses creances, actions et mœurs, qui furent onques. C'est luy, qui ramena du ciel, où elle perdoit son temps, la sagesse humaine, pour la rendre à l'homme: où est sa plus iuste et plus laborieuse besoigne.

Voyez-le plaider deuant ses iuges: voyez par quelles raisons, il esueille son courage aux hazards de la guerre, quels argumens fortifient sa patience, contre la calomnie, la tyrannie, la mort, et contre la teste de sa femme: il n'y a rien d'emprunté de l'art, et des sciences. Les plus simples y recognoissent leurs moyens et leur force: il n'est possible d'aller plus arriere et plus bas. Il a faict grand faueur à l'humaine nature, de montrer combien elle peut d'elle mesme.

ENGLISH

by temperament. Or rather, he raised nothing, but instead brought down and led back to his own original and natural level, and subjected to it, vigor, harshness and difficulties. For in Cato one sees quite clearly that it is a pace strained far above the common.[2]

In the brave exploits of his life, and in his death, one feels him always mounted on his high horses. This man keeps to the ground, and at a gentle, ordinary pace treats the most useful subjects, and bears himself both toward death and toward the thorniest hardships that can arise in the course of human life. It has turned out well that the man most worthy to be known and to be held up to the world as an example should be the one of whom we have the most certain knowledge. He has been illuminated by the most clear-sighted men who ever lived. The witnesses we have of him are admirable in fidelity and in ability.

It is a great thing to have been able to give such order to the pure imaginings of a child that, without altering or stretching them, he produced from them the finest effects of our soul. He represents it neither as elevated nor as rich; he represents it only as healthy, but certainly with a very lively and clean health. By these common and natural springs, by these ordinary and familiar notions, without getting agitated or worked up, he set up not only the most orderly but the loftiest and most vigorous beliefs, actions and morals that ever were. It is he who brought human wisdom back down from heaven, where it was wasting its time, to restore it to man, where its most proper and most laborious work lies.

See him plead before his judges; see by what reasons he rouses his courage to the hazards of war, what arguments fortify his patience against calumny, tyranny, death, and against his wife's temper: there is nothing borrowed from art and the sciences. The simplest people recognize in it their own means and strength; it is impossible to go further back or lower. He has done human nature a great favor by showing how much it can do by itself.

2 Lucan, Pharsalia II.381–82, describing Cato the Younger.

RICHER THAN WE THINK

Natural wisdom is enough to live by; learning burdens us more than it helps.

FRENCH

3.12.2 Nous sommes chacun plus riche, que nous ne pensons: mais on nous dresse à l'emprunt, et à la queste: on nous duict à nous seruir plus de l'autruy, que du nostre. En aucune chose l'homme ne sçait s'arrester au poinct de son besoing. De volupté, de richesse, de puissance, il en embrasse plus qu'il n'en peut estreindre. Son auidité est incapable de moderation. Ie trouue qu'en curiosité de sçauoir, il en est de mesme: il se taille de la besoigne bien plus qu'il n'en peut faire, et bien plus qu'il n'en a affaire. Estendant l'vtilité du sçauoir, autant qu'est sa matiere.

Vt omnium rerum, sic litterarum quoque, intemperantia laboramus. Et Tacitus a raison, de louer la mere d'Agricola, d'auoir bridé en son fils, vn appetit trop bouillant de science.

3.12.3 C'est vn bien, à le regarder d'yeux fermes, qui a, comme les autres biens des hommes, beaucoup de vanité, et foiblesse propre et naturelle: et d'vn cher coust. L'acquisition en est bien plus hazardeuse, que de toute autre viande ou boisson. Car ailleurs, ce que nous auons achetté, nous l'emportons au logis, en quelque vaisseau, et là nous auons loy d'en examiner la valeur: combien, et à quelle heure, nous en prendrons. Mais les sciences, nous ne les pouuons d'arriuee mettre en autre vaisseau, qu'en nostre ame: nous les auallons en les achettans, et sortons du marché ou infects desia, ou amendez.

Il y en a, qui ne font que nous empescher et charger, au lieu de nourrir: et telles encore, qui sous tiltre de nous guarir, nous empoisonnent. I'ay pris plaisir de voir en quelque lieu, des hommes par deuotion, faire vœu d'ignorance, comme de chasteté, de pauureté, de pœnitence. C'est aussi chastrer nos appetits desordonnez, d'esmousser cette cupidité qui nous espoinçonne à l'estude des liures: et priuer l'ame de cette complaisance voluptueuse, qui nous chatouille par l'opinion de science. Et est richement accomplir le vœu de pauureté, d'y ioindre encore celle de l'esprit. Il ne nous faut guere de doctrine, pour viure à nostre aise. Et Socrates nous apprend qu'elle est en nous, et la maniere de l'y trouuer, et de s'en ayder.

Toute cette nostre suffisance, qui est au delà de la naturelle, est à peu pres vaine et superflue. C'est

ENGLISH

Each of us is richer than we think; but we are trained to borrow and to beg; we are taught to use what belongs to others more than our own. In nothing does man know how to stop at the point of his need. Of pleasure, wealth, power, he takes up more than he can hold. His greed is incapable of moderation. I find it is the same with curiosity for knowledge: he cuts out for himself far more work than he can do, and far more than he has any use for, extending the utility of knowledge as far as its subject matter goes.

As in all things, so in letters too, we suffer from intemperance. And Tacitus is right to praise Agricola's mother for having curbed in her son an overheated appetite for learning.[3]

Looked at with a steady eye, it is a good that, like the other goods of men, has much vanity and weakness inherent in its nature; and it comes at a high cost. Acquiring it is far more hazardous than acquiring any other food or drink. For with anything else, what we have bought we carry home in some vessel, and there we are free to examine its worth: how much of it we will take, and when. But branches of knowledge we cannot, from the start, put into any vessel but our soul. We swallow them as we buy them, and we leave the market already either infected or improved.

Some of them only hinder and burden us instead of nourishing us; and some, under the pretext of curing us, poison us. I have been pleased to see, somewhere, men who out of devotion took a vow of ignorance, as others do of chastity, poverty and penitence. It is also a way of gelding our unruly appetites to blunt this craving that goads us on to the study of books, and to deprive the soul of that voluptuous self-satisfaction which tickles us with the belief that we know something. And it is a rich fulfillment of the vow of poverty to add poverty of mind to it as well. We need little learning to live at our ease. And Socrates teaches us that it is in us, and how to find it there and make use of it.

All this ability of ours that goes beyond the natural kind is more or less vain and superfluous. We beaucoup si elle ne nous charge et trouble plus qu'elle ne nous sert. Paucis opus est litteris ad mentem bonam. Ce sont des excez fieureux de nostre esprit: instrument brouillon et inquiete. Recueillez vous, vous trouuerez en vous, les argumens de la Nature, contre la mort, vrais, et les plus propres à vous seruir à la necessité. Ce sont ceux qui font mourir vn paysan et des peuples entiers, aussi constamment qu'vn philosophe. Fusse ie mort moins allegrement auant qu'auoir veu les Tusculanes? I'estime que non. Et quand ie me trouue au propre, ie sens, que ma langue s'est enrichie, mon courage de peu.

FRENCH

Il est comme Nature me le forgea. Et se targue pour le conflict, non que d'vne marche naturelle et commune. Les liures m'ont serui non tant d'instruction que d'exercitation. Quoy, si la science, essayant de nous armer de nouuelles deffences, contre les inconueniens naturels, nous a plus imprimé en la fantasie, leur grandeur et leur poix, qu'elle n'a ses raisons et subtilitez, à nous en couurir? Ce sont voirement subtilitez: par où elle nous esueille souuent bien vainement. Les autheurs mesmes plus serrez et plus sages, voyez autour d'vn bon argument, combien ils en sement d'autres legers, et, qui y regarde de pres, incorporels. Ce ne sont qu'arguties verbales, qui nous trompent.

Mais d'autant que ce peut estre vtilement, ie ne les veux pas autrement esplucher. Il y en a ceans assez de cette condition, en diuers lieux: ou par emprunt, ou par imitation. Si se faut il prendre vn peu garde, de n'appeller pas force, ce qui n'est que gentilesse: et ce, qui n'est qu'aigu, solide: ou bon, ce qui n'est que beau: quæ magis gustata quàm potata delectant. Tout ce qui plaist, ne paist pas, vbi non ingenij sed animi negotium agitur.

A veoir les efforts que Seneque se donne pour se preparer contre la mort, à le voir suer d'ahan, pour se roider et pour s'asseurer, et se debattre si long temps en cette perche, i'eusse esbranlé sa reputation, s'il ne l'eust en mourant, tresuaillamment maintenuë. Son agitation si ardante, si frequente, montre qu'il estoit chaud et impetueux luy mesme. Magnus animus remissius loquitur, et securius. Non est alius ingenio, alius animo color. Il le faut are doing well if it does not burden and trouble us more than it serves us. Little learning is needed for a sound mind. These are feverish excesses of our mind, a meddlesome and restless instrument. Collect yourself: you will find in yourself Nature's arguments against death—true ones, and the best suited to serve you in your need. They are what make a peasant, and whole peoples, die as steadfastly as a philosopher. Would I have died less cheerfully before I had read the Tusculans? I think not. And when I come down to the point, I feel that my tongue has been enriched, my courage hardly at all.[4]

ENGLISH

My courage is just as Nature forged it for me, and for the fight it shields itself only in the natural, common way. Books have served me not so much for instruction as for exercise. What if learning, in trying to arm us with new defenses against natural ills, has imprinted their magnitude and weight on our imagination more deeply than it has its arguments and subtleties to shield us from them? Subtleties they are indeed, and with them it often rouses us quite pointlessly. Even in the tightest and wisest authors, see how many other flimsy arguments they scatter around one good one—arguments which, if you look closely, have no body to them. They are mere verbal quibbles that deceive us.

But since this may be done to some purpose, I do not want to pick them apart any further. There are enough of that sort in here, in various places, either borrowed or imitated. Still, we must take a little care not to call strength what is only elegance, or solid what is only sharp, or good what is only beautiful: things that delight more when sipped than when drunk down. Not everything that pleases nourishes, where the business at hand concerns not the wit but the soul.[5]

Seeing the efforts Seneca makes to prepare himself against death, seeing him sweat and strain to stiffen and reassure himself, and struggle so long on that perch, I would have shaken his reputation if he had not upheld it most valiantly in dying. His agitation, so ardent and so frequent, shows that he himself was hot-tempered and impetuous. A great

3 Seneca, Letters 106; Tacitus' praise is in his Agricola, chapter 4.
4 Cicero's Tusculan Disputations, whose first book deals with the contempt of death.
5 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations; then Seneca.

FRENCH

conuaincre à ses despens. Et montre aucunement qu'il estoit pressé de son aduersaire. La façon de Plutarque, d'autant qu'elle est plus desdaigneuse, et plus destendue, elle est selon moy, d'autant plus virile et persuasiue. Ie croirois aysément, que son ame auoit les mouuemens plus asseurez, et plus reglez.

L'vn plus aigu, nous pique et nous eslance en sursaut: touche plus l'esprit. L'autre plus solide, nous informe, establit et conforte constamment: touche plus l'entendement. Celuy là rauit nostre iugement: cestuy-ci le gaigne. I'ay veu pareillement d'autres escrits, encore plus reuerez, qui en la peinture du combat qu'ils soustiennent contre les aiguillons de la chair, les representent si cuisants, si puissants et inuincibles, que nous mesmes, qui sommes de la voirie du peuple, auons autant à admirer l'estrangeté et vigueur incognuë de leur tentation, que leur resistance. A quoy faire nous allons gendarmant par ces efforts de la science?

ENGLISH

soul speaks more calmly and more securely. The wit has not one color and the soul another. He must be convicted at his own expense. And it shows to some extent that he was hard pressed by his adversary. Plutarch's way, being more disdainful and more relaxed, is in my view all the more manly and persuasive. I would readily believe that his soul had more assured and more orderly movements.

The one, sharper, pricks us and makes us leap with a start; it touches the mind more. The other, more solid, informs us, settles us and comforts us steadily; it touches the understanding more. The former ravishes our judgment; the latter wins it. I have likewise seen other writings, even more revered, which, in depicting the struggle they put up against the goads of the flesh, represent those goads as so burning, so powerful and invincible, that we ourselves, who belong to the common refuse of the people, have as much cause to marvel at the strangeness and unheard-of vigor of their temptation as at their resistance. What is the point of our getting up in arms like this with these exertions of learning?

PEASANTS AND DEATH

Unlearned country people bear poverty, illness and death more steadily than philosophers.

FRENCH

Regardons à terre, les pauures gens que nous y voyons espandus, la teste panchante apres leur besongne: qui ne sçauent ny Aristote ny Caton, ny exemple ny precepte. De ceux-là, tire Nature tous les iours, des effects de constance et de patience, plus purs et plus roides, que ne sont ceux que nous estudions si curieusement en l'escole. Combien en vois ie ordinairement, qui mescognoissent la pauureté: combien qui desirent la mort, ou qui la passent sans alarme et sans affliction? Celui là qui fouït mon iardin, il a ce matin enterré son pere ou son fils. Les noms mesme, dequoy ils appellent les maladies, en addoucissent et amollissent l'aspreté.

La phthysie, c'est la toux pour eux: la dysenterie, deuoyement d'estomach: vn pleuresis, c'est vn morfondement: et selon qu'ils les nomment doucement, ils les supportent aussi. Elles sont bien griefues, quand elles rompent leur trauail ordinaire: ils ne s'allitent que pour mourir. Simplex illa et aperta virtus in obscuram et solertem scientiam versa est.

ENGLISH

Let us look down at the poor people we see scattered over the ground, heads bent over their work, who know neither Aristotle nor Cato, neither example nor precept. From them Nature draws every day deeds of constancy and patience purer and sterner than those we study so carefully in the schools. How many do I commonly see who take no notice of poverty? How many who long for death, or go through it without alarm or distress? The man who is digging my garden buried his father or his son this morning. Even the names they call diseases by sweeten and soften their harshness.

Consumption, for them, is a cough; dysentery, an upset stomach; pleurisy, a chill; and as they name them gently, so they bear them. They are serious indeed when they interrupt their usual work; they take to their beds only to die. That simple and open virtue has been turned into an obscure and clever science.

WAR ON HIS DOORSTEP

Civil war ravages his lands, and suspicion falls on him from both sides.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.12.4	I'escriuois cecy enuiron le temps, qu'vne forte charge de nos troubles, se croupit plusieurs mois, de tout son poix, droict sur moy. I'auois d'vne part, les ennemis à ma porte: d'autre part, les picoreurs, pires ennemis, non armis, sed vitiis, certatur. Et essayois toute sorte d'iniures militaires, à la fois: Hostis adest dextra læuàque à parte timendus. / Vicinóque malo terret vtrumque latus. Monstrueuse guerre. Les autres agissent au dehors, ceste-cy encore contre soy: se ronge et se desfaict, par son propre venin. Elle est de nature si maligne et ruineuse, qu'elle se ruine quand et quand le reste: et se deschire et despece de rage.	I was writing this at about the time when a heavy load of our troubles settled for several months, with all its weight, right on top of me. On one side I had the enemy at my door; on the other, the marauders, worse enemies: the fight is waged not with arms but with vices. And I was experiencing every kind of military outrage at once: An enemy to be feared is at hand on the right and on the left, / And with harm close by he menaces both flanks. A monstrous war! Other wars act outward; this one acts against itself as well, eating away and destroying itself with its own poison. It is by nature so malignant and ruinous that it ruins itself along with everything else, and tears and rends itself in its fury.[6]
	Nous la voyons plus souuent, se dissoudre par elle mesme, que par disette d'aucune chose necessaire, ou par la force ennemie. Toute discipline la fuït. Elle vient guerir la sedition, et en est pleine. Veut chastier la desobeissance, et en montre l'exemple: et employee à la deffence des loix, faict sa part de rebellion à l'encontre des siennes propres. Où en sommes nous? Nostre medecine porte infection. Nostre mal s'empoisonne Du secours qu'on luy donne. Exuperat magis ægrescitque medendo. Omnia fanda nefanda, malo permista furore, Iustificam nobis mentem auertêre deorum.	We see it more often dissolve of itself than through scarcity of any necessity or through enemy force. All discipline flees from it. It comes to cure sedition and is full of it. It means to punish disobedience and sets the example of it; and, employed in defense of the laws, it plays its part in rebellion against its own. What have we come to? Our medicine carries infection. Our sickness is poisoned By the help it is given. It grows worse and sicker with the treatment. Right and wrong, all confounded in our wicked frenzy, Have turned from us the just will of the gods.[7]
3.12.5	En ces maladies populaires, on peut distinguer sur le commencement, les sains des malades: mais quand elles viennent à durer, comme la nostre, tout le corps s'en sent, et la teste et les talons: aucune partie n'est exempte de corruption. Car il n'est air, qui se hume si gouluement: qui s'espande et penetre, comme faict la licence. Nos armees ne se lient et tiennent plus que par simant estranger: des François on ne sçait plus faire vn corps d'armee, constant et reglé. Quelle honte? Il n'y a qu'autant de discipline, que nous en font voir des soldats empruntez. Quant à nous, nous nous conduisons à discretion, et non pas du chef; chacun selon la sienne: il a plus affaire au dedans qu'au dehors.	In these epidemic diseases one can tell the healthy from the sick at the beginning; but when they come to last, as ours has, the whole body feels it, head and heels alike: no part is free from corruption. For there is no air that is breathed in so greedily, that spreads and penetrates so, as license. Our armies are bound and held together now only by foreign cement; out of Frenchmen no one knows any longer how to make a steady, disciplined army. What a disgrace! There is only as much discipline as borrowed soldiers show us. As for us, we conduct ourselves at our own discretion, not the commander's—each at his own; the

6 The campaigns of 1585–1586 in Guyenne during the Wars of Religion, fought around Montaigne's lands. The verses are from Ovid, Letters from Pontus.
7 Virgil, Aeneid; then Catullus.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

commander has more to deal with inside than outside.

C'est au commandement de suiure, courtizer, et plier: à luy seul d'obeïr: tout le reste est libre et dissolu. Il me plaist de voir, combien il y a de lascheté et de pusillanimité en l'ambition: par combien d'abiection et de seruitude, il luy faut arriuer à son but. Mais cecy me deplaist-il de voir, des natures debonnaires, et capables de iustice, se corrompre tous les iours, au maniement et commandement de cette confusion. La longue souffrance, engendre la coustume; la coustume, le consentement et l'imitation. Nous auions assez d'ames mal nées, sans gaster les bonnes et genereuses. Si que, si nous continuons, il restera mal-ayseement à qui fier la santé de cet estat, au cas que Fortune nous la redonne.

It is for the command to follow, to court and to bend; it alone has to obey; all the rest are free and dissolute. It pleases me to see how much cowardice and faintheartedness there is in ambition, and through how much abjection and servility it must reach its goal. But this it displeases me to see: good-natured characters, capable of justice, being corrupted every day in managing and commanding this chaos. Long toleration breeds custom; custom, consent and imitation. We had enough ill-born souls without spoiling the good and noble ones. So that, if we go on like this, there will hardly be anyone left to whom we can entrust the health of this state, should Fortune give it back to us.

Hunc saltem euerso iuuenem succurrere seclo, / Ne prohibete!

At least do not prevent this young man / From coming to the aid of a world turned upside down![8]

3.12.6 Qu'est deuenu cet ancien precepte: Que les soldats ont plus à craindre leur chef, que l'ennemy? Et ce merueilleux exemple: Qu'vn pommier s'estant trouué enfermé dans le pourpris du camp de l'armee Romaine, elle fut veuë l'endemain en desloger, laissant au possesseur, le comte entier de ses pommes, meures et delicieuses? I'aymeroy bien, que nostre ieunesse, au lieu du temps qu'elle employe, à des peregrinations moins vtiles, et apprentissages moins honorables, elle le mist, moitié à veoir de la guerre sur mer, sous quelque bon capitaine commandeur de Rhodes: moitié à recognoistre la discipline des armees Turkesques. Car elle a beaucoup de differences, et d'auantages sur la nostre. Cecy en est: que nos soldats deuiennent plus licentieux aux expeditions: là, plus retenus et craintifs.

What has become of that ancient precept, that soldiers should fear their commander more than the enemy? And of that marvelous example: when an apple tree was found enclosed within the bounds of a Roman army's camp, the army was seen the next day moving off and leaving the owner the full count of his apples, ripe and delicious? I would much like our young men, instead of spending their time on less useful travels and less honorable apprenticeships, to put half of it into seeing war at sea under some good captain, a Knight Commander of Rhodes, and half into studying the discipline of the Turkish armies. For it differs from ours in many ways and has many advantages over it. This is one: our soldiers become more licentious on campaign; theirs, more restrained and fearful.[9]

Car les offenses ou larrecins sur le menu peuple, qui se punissent de bastonades en la paix, sont capitales en la guerre. Pour vn œuf prins sans payer, ce sont de conte prefix, cinquante coups de baston. Pour toute autre chose, tant legere soit elle, non necessaire à la nourriture, on les empale, ou decapite sans deport. Ie me suis estonné, en l'histoire de Selim, le plus cruel conquerant qui fut onques, veoir, que lors qu'il subiugua l'Ægypte, les beaux iardins d'autour de la ville de Damas,

For offenses or thefts against the common people, which are punished with a beating in peacetime, are capital crimes in war. For an egg taken without paying, the fixed count is fifty strokes of the stick. For anything else, however slight, that is not needed for food, they are impaled or beheaded without delay. I was astonished to see, in the history of Selim, the cruelest conqueror that ever was, that when he subjugated Egypt, the fine gar-

8 Virgil, Georgics, of the young Octavian; readers have seen here an allusion to Henry of Navarre.
9 The apple-tree story is told by Frontinus of the army of Marcus Scaurus. The Knights of Saint John, once of Rhodes, then held Malta.

FRENCH

tous ouuers, et en terre de conqueste, son armee campant sur le lieu mesmes, furent laissés vierges des mains des soldats, parce qu'ils n'auoient pas eu le signe de piller.

3.12.7 Mais est-il quelque mal en vne police, qui vaille estre combatu par vne drogue si mortelle? Non pas, disoit Fauonius, l'vsurpation de la possession tyrannique d'vne republique. Platon de mesme ne consent pas qu'on face violence au repos de son païs, pour le guerir: et n'accepte pas l'amendement qui trouble et hazarde tout, et qui couste le sang et ruine des citoyens. Establissant l'office d'vn homme de bien, en ce cas, de laisser tout là: seulement prier Dieu qu'il y porte sa main extraordinaire. Et semble sçauoir mauuais gré à Dion son grand amy, d'y auoir vn peu autrement procedé. I'estois Platonicien de ce costé là, avant que ie sçeusse qu'il y eust de Platon au monde.

Et si ce personnage, doit purement estre refusé de nostre consorce: (luy, qui par la sincerité de sa conscience, merita enuers la faueur diuine, de penetrer si auant en la Chrestienne lumiere, au trauers des tenebres publiques, du monde de son temps,) ie ne pense pas, qu'il nous sie bien, de nous laisser instruire à vn payen. Combien c'est d'impieté, de n'atendre de Dieu, nul secours simplement sien, et sans nostre cooperation.

Ie doubte souuent, si entre tant de gens, qui se meslent de telle besoigne, nul s'est rencontré, d'entendement si imbecille, à qui on aye en bon escient persuadé, qu'il alloit vers la reformation, par la derniere des difformations: qu'il tiroit vers son salut, par les plus expresses causes que nous ayons de tres certaine damnation: que renuersant la police, le magistrat, et les loix, en la tutelle desquelles Dieu l'a colloqué: remplissant de haines parricides, les courages fraternels: appellant à son ayde, les diables et les furies: il puisse apporter secours à la sacrosaincte douceur et iustice, de la loy diuine.

L'ambition, l'auarice, la cruauté, la vengeance, n'ont point assez de propre et naturelle impetuosité: amorçons-les et les attisons, par le glorieux titre de iustice et deuotion. Il ne se peut imaginer vn pire estat des choses, qu'où la meschanceté vient à estre legitime:

ENGLISH

dens around the city of Damascus—wide open, in conquered land, with his army camped on the very spot—were left untouched by the soldiers' hands, because they had not been given the signal to plunder.

But is there any ill in a government worth fighting with so deadly a drug? Not even, said Favonius, the usurpation of a commonwealth by a tyrant's seizure. Plato likewise does not consent to doing violence to the peace of one's country in order to cure it, and does not accept the reform that disturbs and endangers everything and costs the citizens their blood and their ruin. He lays down that the duty of a good man, in that case, is to leave everything be, and only pray God to set his extraordinary hand to it. And he seems to bear a grudge against Dion, his great friend, for having proceeded somewhat differently. I was a Platonist on this point before I knew there was any Plato in the world.[10]

And if this man is to be flatly excluded from our fellowship (he who, through the sincerity of his conscience, deserved divine favor to penetrate so far into the Christian light through the general darkness of the world of his time), I do not think it becomes us to let ourselves be taught by a pagan how impious it is to expect from God no help that is simply his own, without our cooperation.

I often wonder whether, among so many people who meddle in such business, there has been anyone of so feeble an understanding as to have been seriously persuaded that he was moving toward reformation by the worst of deformations; that he was heading for his salvation by the most explicit causes we have of most certain damnation; that by overturning the government, the magistracy and the laws under whose protection God has placed him, by filling brotherly hearts with parricidal hatreds, by calling the devils and the Furies to his aid, he could bring help to the sacrosanct gentleness and justice of the divine law.

Ambition, avarice, cruelty and vengeance do not have enough impetuosity of their own: let us bait them and fan them with the glorious title of justice and devotion. No worse state of affairs can 10 Marcus Favonius, a follower of Cato, held that civil war was worse than tyranny. Dion overthrew the tyrant Dionysius II of Syracuse by force.

FRENCH

et prendre auec le congé du magistrat, le manteau de la vertu: Nihil in speciem fallacius quàm praua religio, vbi deorum numen prætenditur sceleribus. L'extreme espece d'iniustice, selon Platon, c'est que, ce qui est iniuste, soit tenu pour iuste.

3.12.8 Le peuple y souffrit bien largement lors, non les dommages presens seulement, Vndique totis Vsque adeo turbatur agris, mais les futurs aussi. Les viuans y eurent à patir, si eurent ceux qui n'estoient encore nays. On le pilla, et moy par consequent, iusques à l'esperance: luy rauissant tout ce qu'il auoit à s'apprester à viure pour longues annees, Quæ nequeunt secum ferre aut abducere, perdunt;
Et cremat insontes turba scelesta casas.
Muris nulla fides, squallent populatibus agri.

3.12.9 Outre cette secousse, i'en souffris d'autres. I'encourus les inconueniens, que la moderation apporte en telles maladies. Ie fus pelaudé à toutes mains. Au Gibelin i'estois Guelphe, au Guelphe Gibelin. Quelqu'vn de mes poetes dict bien cela, mais ie ne sçay où c'est. La situation de ma maison, et l'accointance des hommes de mon voisinage, me presentoient d'vn visage: ma vie et mes actions d'vn autre. Il ne s'en faisoit point des accusations formées: car il n'y auoit où mordre. Ie ne desempare iamais les loix: et qui m'eust recherché, m'en eust deu de reste. C'estoient suspicions muettes, qui couroient sous main, ausquelles il n'y a iamais faute d'apparence, en vn meslange si confus, non plus que d'espris ou enuieux ou ineptes.

I'ayde ordinairement aux presomptions iniurieuses, que la Fortune seme contre moy: par vne façon, que i'ay dés tousiours, de fuyr à me iustifier, excuser et interpreter: estimant que c'est mettre ma conscience en compromis, de playder pour elle. Perspicuitas enim argumentatione eleuatur. Et comme, si chacun voyoit en moy, aussi cler que ie fay: au lieu de me tirer arriere de l'accusation, ie m'y auance; et la renchery plustost, par vne confession ironique et moqueuse: si ie ne m'en tais tout à plat, comme de chose indigne de response. Mais ceux qui le prennent pour vne trop hautaine confiance, ne m'en be imagined than where wickedness becomes legitimate and, with the magistrate's leave, puts on the cloak of virtue: Nothing is more deceptive in appearance than a depraved religion, where the will of the gods is made a cloak for crimes. The extreme form of injustice, according to Plato, is for what is unjust to be held just.[11]

ENGLISH

The people suffered greatly then, not only the present damage, such turmoil there is Everywhere, in all the fields, but the future damage as well. The living had to suffer from it, and so did those not yet born. They plundered the people—and me, consequently—right down to their hope, robbing them of everything they had laid by to live on for many years: What they cannot carry or drive off, they destroy;
And the criminal mob burns innocent cottages.
Walls give no security; the fields lie waste from the raids.

Besides this shock, I suffered others. I incurred the troubles that moderation brings in such diseases. I was mauled on every side. To the Ghibelline I was a Guelph, to the Guelph a Ghibelline. One of my poets puts it well, but I do not know where. The location of my house and my acquaintance with the men of my neighborhood presented me in one light, my life and my actions in another. No formal accusations were made, for there was nothing to bite on. I never abandon the laws, and anyone who had investigated me would have ended up in my debt. They were silent suspicions circulating underhand, which never lack some plausibility in so confused a mixture—any more than there is ever a lack of envious or foolish minds.[12]

I usually lend a hand to the damaging presumptions that Fortune sows against me, through a habit I have always had of shunning to justify, excuse or explain myself, for I think that to plead for my conscience is to put it up for arbitration. For clarity is diminished by argument. And as if everyone could see into me as clearly as I do, instead of drawing back from the accusation I step forward to meet it, and rather heighten it with an ironic, mocking confession—unless I keep flatly silent about it, as a thing unworthy of an answer. But

11 Livy.
12 Guelphs and Ghibellines: the rival factions of medieval Italy, supporting the papacy and the emperor respectively.

FRENCH

veulent gueres moins de mal, que ceux, qui le prennent pour foiblesse d'vne cause indefensible.

Nommeement les grands, enuers lesquels faute de sommission, est l'extreme faute. Rudes à toute iustice, qui se cognoist, qui se sent: non demise, humble et suppliante. I'ay souuent heurté à ce pillier. Tant y a que de ce qui m'aduint lors, vn ambitieux s'en fust pendu: si eust faict vn auaritieux. Ie n'ay soing quelconque d'acquerir. Sit mihi quod nunc est, etiam minus; vt mihi viuam / Quod superest æui, si quid superesse volent dij. Mais les pertes qui me viennent par l'iniure d'autruy, soit larrecin, soit violence, me pincent, enuiron comme vn homme malade et gehenné d'auarice. L'offence a sans mesure plus d'aigreur, que n'a la perte. Mille diuerses sortes de maux accoururent à moy à la file.

Ie les eusse plus gaillardement soufferts, à la foule. Ie pensay desia, entre mes amis, à qui ie pourrois commettre vne vieillesse necessiteuse et disgratiee. Apres auoir rodé les yeux par tout, ie me trouuay en pourpoint. Pour se laisser tomber à plomb, et de si haut, il faut que ce soit entre les bras d'vne affection solide, vigoureuse et fortunee. Elles sont rares, s'il y en a. En fin ie cogneus que le plus seur, estoit de me fier à moy-mesme de moy, et de ma necessité. Et s'il m'aduenoit d'estre froidement en la grace de la Fortune, que ie me recommandasse de plus fort à la mienne: m'attachasse, regardasse de plus pres à moy.

En toutes choses les hommes se iettent aux appuis estrangers, pour espargner les propres: seuls certains et seuls puissans, qui sçait s'en armer. Chacun court ailleurs, et à l'aduenir, d'autant que nul n'est arriué à soy. Et me resolus, que c'estoient vtiles inconueniens: d'autant premierement qu'il faut aduertir à coups de foyt, les mauuais disciples, quand la raison n'y peut assez, comme par le feu et violence des coins, nous ramenons vn bois tortu à sa droicteur. Ie me presche, il y a si long temps, de me tenir à moy, et separer des choses estrangeres: toutesfois, ie tourne encores tousiours les yeux à costé. L'inclination, vn mot fauorable d'vn grand, vn bon visage, me tente.

ENGLISH

those who take this for overweening confidence bear me hardly less ill will than those who take it for the weakness of an indefensible cause.

Especially the great, with whom lack of submission is the ultimate fault. They are harsh toward any justice that knows itself and feels its own worth, and is not submissive, humble and suppliant. I have often bumped against this pillar. Be that as it may, over what happened to me then an ambitious man would have hanged himself; so would a greedy one. I have no concern whatever for acquiring. Let me have what I have now, or even less, and live for myself / What remains of my life, if the gods will that any remain. But losses that come to me through another's wrongdoing, whether theft or violence, pinch me much as they would a man sick and tortured with avarice. The offense is immeasurably more bitter than the loss. A thousand different kinds of ills came rushing at me one after another.[13]

I would have borne them more cheerfully all together in a crowd. I was already considering which of my friends I could entrust with a needy and unfortunate old age. After casting my eyes all around, I found myself stripped bare. To let oneself fall straight down, and from such a height, one must fall into the arms of a solid, vigorous and fortunate affection. Such are rare, if there are any. In the end I realized that the safest course was to trust myself with myself and with my need; and that if I happened to stand coldly in Fortune's favor, I should commend myself more strongly to my own, cling to myself, look more closely to myself.

In all things men throw themselves on outside supports to spare their own, which alone are sure and alone powerful, for one who knows how to arm himself with them. Everyone runs elsewhere, and into the future, because no one has arrived at himself. And I concluded that these were useful misfortunes: first, because bad pupils must be warned with strokes of the whip when reason is not enough, just as with fire and the force of wedges we bring a crooked piece of wood back to straightness. I have been preaching to myself for so long to hold on to myself and keep apart from outside things; yet I still keep turning my eyes aside. A great man's goodwill, a favorable word from him, a kindly look, tempts me.

13 Horace, Epistles.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Dieu sçait s'il en est cherté en ce temps, et quel sens il porte. I'oys encore sans rider le front, les subornemens qu'on me faict, pour me tirer en place marchande: et m'en deffens si mollement, qu'il semble, que ie souffrisse plus volontiers d'en estre vaincu. Or à vn esprit si indocile, il faut des bastonnades: et faut rebattre et reserrer, à bons coups de mail, ce vaisseau qui se desprent, se descout, qui s'eschappe et desrobe de soy. Secondement, que cet accident me seruoit d'exercitation, pour me preparer à pis: si moy, qui et par le benefice de la Fortune, et par la condition de mes mœurs, esperois estre des derniers, venois à estre des premiers attrappé de cette tempeste.

God knows whether there is any shortage of those these days, and what meaning such things carry! I still listen without a frown to the inducements offered me to draw me into the marketplace, and I defend myself against them so feebly that it seems I would rather willingly let myself be won over. Now a mind so unteachable needs beatings; and this vessel that is coming apart, coming unstitched, slipping away and escaping from itself, must be hammered back and tightened with good blows of the mallet. Secondly, this misfortune served me as an exercise to prepare me for worse, in case I, who through the kindness of Fortune and the nature of my character hoped to be among the last, should come to be among the first caught by this storm.

M'instruisant de bonne heure, à contraindre ma vie, et la renger pour vn nouuel estat. La vraye liberté c'est pouuoir toute chose sur soy. Potentissimus est qui se habet in potestate. En vn temps ordinaire et tranquille, on se prepare à des accidens moderez et communs: mais en cette confusion, où nous sommes depuis trente ans, tout homme François, soit en particulier, soit en general, se voit à chaque heure, sur le poinct de l'entier renuersement de sa fortune. D'autant faut-il tenir son courage fourny de prouisions plus fortes et vigoureuses. Sçachons gré au sort, de nous auoir faict viure en vn siecle, non mol, languissant, ny oisif. Tel qui ne l'eust esté par autre moyen, se rendra fameux par son malheur.

It taught me early to constrain my life and set it in order for a new condition. True freedom is to have power over oneself in all things. Most powerful is he who has himself in his own power. In ordinary, peaceful times one prepares for moderate and common mishaps; but in this confusion we have been in for thirty years, every Frenchman, whether individually or collectively, sees himself at every hour on the verge of the complete overthrow of his fortune. All the more must we keep our courage stocked with stronger and more vigorous provisions. Let us be grateful to fate for having made us live in an age that is not soft, languid or idle. Many a man who would not have become famous by any other means will make himself famous by his misfortune.

Comme ie ne ly guere és histoires, ces confusions, des autres estats, sans regret de ne les auoir peu mieux considerer present. Ainsi faict ma curiosité, que ie m'aggree aucunement, de veoir de mes yeux, ce notable spectacle de nostre mort publique, ses symptomes et sa forme. Et puis que ie ne la sçaurois retarder, suis content d'estre destiné à y assister, et m'en instruire. Si cherchons nous euidemment de recognoistre en ombre mesme, et en la fable des Theatres, la montre des ieux tragiques de l'humaine fortune. Ce n'est pas sans compassion de ce que nous oyons: mais nous nous plaisons d'esueiller nostre desplaisir, par la rareté de ces pitoyables euenemens. Rien ne chatouille, qui ne pince.

Just as I rarely read in histories of such upheavals in other states without regretting that I could not have observed them better in person, so my curiosity makes me take some satisfaction in seeing with my own eyes this notable spectacle of our public death, its symptoms and its form. And since I could not delay it, I am content to be destined to witness it and learn from it. Indeed we plainly seek to see, even in shadow and in the fictions of the theater, the representation of the tragic play of human fortune. It is not without compassion for what we hear; but we take pleasure in arousing our distress through the rarity of these pitiful events. Nothing tickles that does not pinch.

FRENCH

Et les bons historiens, fuyent comme vne eaue dormante, et mer morte, des narrations calmes: pour regaigner les seditions, les guerres, où ils sçauent que nous les appellons. Ie doute si ie puis assez honnestement aduouër, à combien vil prix du repos et tranquillité de ma vie, ie l'ay plus de moitié passee en la ruine de mon pays. Ie me donne vn peu trop bon marché de patience, és accidens qui ne me saisissent au propre: et pour me plaindre à moy, regarde non tant ce qu'on m'oste, que ce qui me reste de sauue, et dedans et dehors. Il y a de la consolation, à escheuer tantost l'vn, tantost l'autre, des maux qui nous guignent de suitte, et assenent ailleurs, autour de nous.

Aussi, qu'en matiere d'interests publiques, à mesure, que mon affection est plus vniuersellement espandue, elle en est plus foible. Ioinct qu'il est vray à demy, Tantum ex publicis malis sentimus, quantum ad priuatas res pertinet. Et que la santé, d'où nous partismes estoit telle, qu'elle soulage elle mesme le regret, que nous en deurions auoir. C'estoit santé, mais non qu'à la comparaison de la maladie, qui l'a suyuie. Nous ne sommes cheus de gueres haut. La corruption et le brigandage, qui est en dignité et en office, me semble le moins supportable. On nous volle moins iniurieusement dans vn bois, qu'en lieu de seureté.

C'estoit vne iointure vniuerselle de membres gastez en particulier à l'enuy les vns des autres: et la plus part, d'vlceres enuieillis, qui ne receuoient plus, ny ne demandoient guerison.

3.12.10 Ce croulement donq m'anima certes plus, qu'il ne m'atterra, à l'aide de ma conscience, qui se portoit non paisiblement seulement, mais fierement; et ne trouuois en quoy me plaindre de moy. Aussi, comme Dieu n'enuoye iamais non plus les maux, que les biens tous purs aux hommes, ma santé tint bon ce temps-là, outre son ordinaire. Et ainsi que sans elle ie ne puis rien, il est peu de choses, que ie ne puisse auec elle. Elle me donna moyen d'esueiller toutes mes prouisions, et de porter la main au deuant de la playe, qui eust passé volontiers plus outre. Et esprouuay en ma patience, que i'auois quelque tenue contre la Fortune: et qu'à me faire perdre mes arçons, il falloit vn grand heurt.

Ie ne le dis pas, pour l'irriter à me faire vne charge plus vigoureuse. Ie suis son seruiteur: ie luy tends les mains. Pour Dieu qu'elle se contente. Si ie sens ses assaux? si

ENGLISH

And good historians shun calm narratives like stagnant water and a dead sea, to get back to seditions and wars, where they know we are calling them. I doubt whether I can decently admit at how low a cost to the repose and tranquility of my life I have spent more than half of it amid the ruin of my country. I get my patience a little too cheaply in misfortunes that do not seize me personally; and when I come to complain to myself, I look not so much at what is taken from me as at what remains safe, both within and without. There is some consolation in dodging, now one, now another, of the ills that keep eyeing us one after another and land their blows elsewhere, all around us.

Also, in matters of public interest, the more widely my affection is spread, the weaker it is. Add that it is half true that we feel public misfortunes only insofar as they touch our private affairs. And that the health from which we started was such that it itself eases the regret we ought to feel for it. It was health, but only by comparison with the sickness that followed it. We have not fallen from very high. Corruption and brigandage that hold rank and office seem to me the least bearable. Being robbed in a wood is less of an outrage than being robbed in a place of safety.

It was a general assemblage of limbs, each rotten in its own way, vying with one another, and most of them with inveterate ulcers that no longer admitted or asked for a cure.

So this collapse certainly roused me more than it crushed me, with the help of my conscience, which bore itself not only peacefully but proudly; and I found nothing to reproach myself with. Also, since God never sends men evils, any more than goods, that are wholly unmixed, my health held up during that time better than usual. And just as without it I can do nothing, there are few things I cannot do with it. It enabled me to rouse all my reserves and to put my hand up against the wound, which might well have gone deeper. And I found, by testing my patience, that I had some grip against Fortune, and that it would take a heavy blow to knock me out of the saddle.

I do not say this to provoke her into charging me more vigorously. I am her servant; I hold out my hands to her. For God's sake, let her be satisfied!

FRENCH

fais. Comme ceux que la tristesse accable et possede, se laissent pourtant par interualles tastonner à quelque plaisir, et leur eschappe vn sousrire: ie puis aussi assez sur moy, pour rendre mon estat ordinaire, paisible, et deschargé d'ennuyeuse imagination: mais ie me laisse pourtant à boutades, surprendre des morsures de ces malplaisantes pensees, qui me batent, pendant que ie m'arme pour les chasser, ou pour les luicter. Voicy vn autre rengregement de mal, qui m'arriua à la suitte du reste.

ENGLISH

Do I feel her assaults? I certainly do. Just as those overwhelmed and possessed by sadness still let themselves be touched at intervals by some pleasure, and a smile escapes them, so I have enough power over myself to make my ordinary state peaceful and free of distressing thoughts; but still I let myself be caught off guard now and then by the bites of these unpleasant thoughts, which strike me while I am arming myself to drive them away or wrestle with them. Here is another aggravation of my troubles that came to me on the heels of the rest.

THE PLAGUE

Plague drives his household from home, and the dying peasants show him true resolution.

FRENCH

Et dehors et dedans ma maison, ie fus accueilly d'vne peste, vehemente au prix de toute autre. Car comme les corps sains sont subiects à plus griefues maladies, d'autant qu'ils ne peuuent estre forcez que par celles-là: aussi mon air tressalubre, où d'aucune memoire, la contagion, bien que voisine, n'auoit sçeu prendre pied, venant à s'empoisonner, produisit des effects estranges. Mista senum et iuuenum densantur funera, nullum / Sæua caput Proserpina fugit. I'euz à souffrir cette plaisante condition, que la veue de ma maison m'estoit effroyable. Tout ce qui y estoit, estoit sans garde, et à l'abandon de qui en auoit enuie. Moy qui suis si hospitalier, fus en tres penible queste de retraicte, pour ma famille.

Vne famille esgaree, faisant peur à ses amis, et à soy-mesme, et horreur où qu'elle cherchast à se placer: ayant à changer de demeure, soudain qu'vn de la trouppe commençoit à se douloir du bout du doigt. Toutes maladies sont alors prises pour peste: on ne se donne pas le loysir de les recognoistre. Et c'est le bon: que selon les regles de l'art, à tout danger qu'on approche, il faut estre quarante iours en transe de ce mal: l'imagination vous exerceant cependant à sa mode, et enfleurant vostre santé mesme. Tout cela m'eust beaucoup moins touché, si ie n'eusse eu à me ressentir de la peine d'autruy, et seruir six mois miserablement, de guide à cette carauane.

Car ie porte en moy mes preseruatifs, qui sont, resolution et souffrance. L'apprehension ne me presse guere:

ENGLISH

Both outside and inside my house I was greeted by a plague more violent than any other. For just as healthy bodies are subject to more serious diseases, because only those can overcome them, so my very healthy air, where within anyone's memory the contagion, though close by, had never been able to gain a foothold, produced strange effects when it came to be poisoned. The funerals of old and young crowd thick together; no head / Does cruel Proserpina pass by. I had to endure this pleasant predicament: the sight of my house filled me with dread. Everything in it was unguarded and abandoned to anyone who wanted it. I, who am so hospitable, was put to a very painful search for a refuge for my household.[14]

A household gone astray, frightening its friends and itself, and causing horror wherever it tried to settle, having to change lodgings as soon as one of the band began to feel a pain in the tip of a finger. All illnesses are then taken for plague; no one takes the time to identify them. And the best of it is that, by the rules of medicine, whenever you come near any danger you must spend forty days in dread of the disease, your imagination meanwhile working on you in its own way and making even your health feverish. All this would have affected me much less if I had not had to feel the sufferings of others and serve wretchedly for six months as guide to this caravan.

FRENCH

laquelle on craint particulierement en ce mal. Et si estant seul, ie l'eusse voulu prendre, c'eust esté vne suitte, bien plus gaillarde et plus esloignee. C'est vne mort, qui ne me semble des pires. Elle est communément courte, d'estourdissement, sans douleur, consolee par la condition publique: sans ceremonie, sans deuil, sans presse. Mais quant au monde des enuirons, la centiesme partie des ames ne se peut sauuer. Videas desertáque regna / Pàstorum, et longè saltus latéque vacantes. En ce lieu, mon meilleur reuenu est manuel. Ce que cent hommes trauailloient pour moy, chauma pour long temps.

Or lors, quel exemple de resolution ne vismes nous, en la simplicité de tout ce peuple? Generalement, chacun renonçoit au soing de la vie. Les raisins demeurerent suspendus aux vignes, le bien principal du pays: tous indifferemment se preparans et attendans la mort, à ce soir, ou au lendemain: d'vn visage et d'vne voix si peu effroyee, qu'il sembloit qu'ils eussent compromis à cette necessité, et que ce fust vne condemnation vniuerselle et ineuitable. Elle est tousiours telle. Mais à combien peu, tient la resolution au mourir? La distance et difference de quelques heures: la seule consideration de la compagnie, nous en rend l'apprehension diuerse.

Voyez ceux-cy: pour ce qu'ils meurent en mesme mois: enfans, ieunes, vieillards, ils ne s'estonnent plus, ils ne se pleurent plus. I'en vis qui craignoient de demeurer derriere, comme en vne horrible solitude. Et n'y cogneu communément, autre soing que des sepultures: il leur faschoit de voir les corps espars emmy les champs, à la mercy des bestes: qui y peuplerent incontinent. Comment les fantasies humaines se descouppent! Les Neorites, nation qu'Alexandre subiugua, iettent les corps des morts au plus profond de leurs bois, pour y estre mangez. Seule sepulture estimee entr'eux heureuse. Tel sain faisoit desia sa fosse: d'autres s'y couchoient encore viuans. Et vn maneuure des miens, auec ses mains, et ses pieds, attira sur soy la terre en mourant.

Estoit ce pas s'abrier pour s'endormir plus à son aise? D'vne entreprise en hauteur aucunement pareille à celle

ENGLISH

For I carry my preservatives within me: resolution and endurance. Apprehension, which is particularly feared in this disease, hardly troubles me. And if I had been alone and had wanted to take flight, it would have been a much more cheerful flight, and much farther away. It is a death that does not seem to me among the worst. It is usually short, a stupor, without pain, consoled by the common lot, without ceremony, without mourning, without a crowd. But as for the people round about, not one soul in a hundred could be saved. You would see the shepherds' realms deserted, / And the pastures empty far and wide. In this place my best income comes from manual labor. What a hundred men worked for me lay idle for a long time.

Now what an example of resolution did we not see then in the simplicity of all these people! Generally, everyone gave up caring for life. The grapes, the chief wealth of the region, remained hanging on the vines; all alike were preparing for and awaiting death that evening or the next day, with faces and voices so little frightened that it seemed they had come to terms with this necessity, and that it was a universal and inevitable sentence. It always is. But on how little does resolution in dying depend! The gap and difference of a few hours, the mere thought of company, changes our apprehension of it.

Look at these people: because they are dying in the same month—children, young people, old people—they are no longer stunned, they no longer weep for themselves. I saw some who were afraid of being left behind, as in a horrible solitude. And generally I saw no concern among them but for burial: it grieved them to see the bodies scattered across the fields at the mercy of the animals, which promptly swarmed there. How differently human notions are cut! The Neorites, a nation that Alexander subjugated, throw the bodies of the dead into the depths of their woods to be eaten there—the only burial they consider happy. One man, still healthy, was already digging his grave; others lay down in theirs while still alive. And one of my laborers, as he was dying, pulled the earth over himself with his hands and feet.[15]

Was that not tucking himself in to sleep more comfortably? An undertaking somewhat comparable 14 The plague of 1585–1586 in Guyenne, which drove Montaigne and his household from their home for six months.

FRENCH

des soldats Romains, qu'on trouua apres la iournee de Cannes, la teste plongee dans des trous, qu'ils auoient faicts et comblez de leurs mains, en s'y suffoquant. Somme toute vne nation fut incontinent par vsage, logee en vne marche, qui ne cede en roideur à aucune resolution estudiee et consultee.

3.12.11 La plus part des instructions de la science, à nous encourager, ont plus de montre que de force, et plus d'ornement que de fruict. Nous auons abandonné Nature, et luy voulons apprendre sa leçon: elle, qui nous menoit si heureusement et si seurement. Et ce pendant, les traces de son instruction, et ce peu qui par le benefice de l'ignorance, reste de son image, empreint en la vie de cette tourbe rustique d'hommes impollis: la science est contrainte, de l'aller tous les iours empruntant, pour en faire patron à ses disciples, de constance, d'innocence, et de tranquillité. Il fait beau voir, que ceux-cy plains de tant de belle cognoissance, ayent à imiter cette sotte simplicité: et à l'imiter, aux premieres actions de la vertu.

Et que nostre sapience, apprenne des bestes mesmes, les plus vtiles enseignemens, aux plus grandes et necessaires parties de nostre vie. Comme il nous faut viure et mourir, mesnager nos biens, aymer et esleuer nos enfans, entretenir iustice. Singulier tesmoignage de l'humaine maladie: et que cette raison qui se manie à nostre poste, trouuant tousiours quelque diuersité et nouuelleté, ne laisse chez nous aucune trace apparente de la Nature. Et en ont faict les hommes, comme les parfumiers de l'huile: ils l'ont sophistiquee de tant d'argumentations, et de discours appellez du dehors, qu'elle en est deuenue variable, et particuliere à chacun: et a perdu son propre visage, constant, et vniuersel.

Et nous faut en chercher tesmoignage des bestes, non subiect à faueur, corruption, ny à diuersité d'opinions. Car il est bien vray, qu'elles mesmes ne vont pas tousiours exactement dans la route de Nature, mais ce qu'elles en desuoyent, c'est si peu, que vous en apperceuez tousiours l'orniere. Tout ainsi que les cheuaux qu'on meine en main, font bien des bonds, et des escapades, mais c'est à la longueur de leurs longes: et suyuent neantmoins tousiours les pas de celuy qui les guide: et comme l'oiseau prend son vol, mais sous la bride de sa filiere.

ENGLISH

in loftiness to that of the Roman soldiers who were found after the battle of Cannae with their heads plunged into holes they had dug and filled in with their own hands, suffocating themselves in them. In short, a whole nation was promptly brought by habit to a pitch that yields in firmness to no studied and deliberated resolution.[16]

Most of learning's instructions for encouraging us have more show than force, and more ornament than fruit. We have abandoned Nature and want to teach her her lesson—she who guided us so happily and so surely. And meanwhile the traces of her teaching, and the little of her image that, thanks to ignorance, remains imprinted on the life of this rustic crowd of unpolished men—these learning is forced to go borrowing every day, to make of them a model of constancy, innocence and tranquility for its pupils. It is a fine thing to see these men, full of so much fine knowledge, having to imitate this foolish simplicity, and to imitate it in the very first actions of virtue; and to see our wisdom learn from the very beasts the most useful teachings for the greatest and most necessary parts of our life: how we should live and die, manage our property, love and raise our children, maintain justice. A singular testimony to human sickness; and proof that this reason, which we handle as we please, always finding some diversity and novelty, leaves in us no visible trace of Nature. And men have done with Nature as perfumers do with oil: they have adulterated her with so many arguments and reasonings brought in from outside that she has become variable and particular to each person, and has lost her own constant and universal face.

And we must seek testimony of her from the beasts, testimony not subject to favor, corruption or diversity of opinions. For it is quite true that they themselves do not always go exactly along Nature's road; but they stray from it so little that you can always see the rut. Just as horses led by hand do plenty of bucking and breaking away, but only to the length of their halters, and still always follow the steps of the one leading them; and as the hawk takes flight, but under the restraint of its tether line.

15 A people of Gedrosia, on the coast of modern Pakistan, described by Diodorus Siculus.
16 Hannibal's great victory over the Romans in 216 BC.

FORETHOUGHT OF ILLS

Rehearsing misfortunes torments more than suffering them; nature will teach us to die.

FRENCH

Exilia, tormenta, bella, morbos, naufragia meditare, vt nullo sis malo tyro. A quoy nous sert cette curiosité, de preoccuper tous les inconueniens de l'humaine nature, et nous preparer auec tant de peine à l'encontre de ceux mesme, qui n'ont à l'auanture point à nous toucher? (Parem passis tristitiam facit, pati posse. Non seulement le coup, mais le vent et le pet nous frappe). Ou comme les plus fieureux, car certes c'est fieure, aller dés à cette heure vous faire donner le fouët, par ce qu'il peut aduenir, que Fortune vous le fera souffrir vn iour: et prendre vostre robe fourree dés la S. Iean, pour ce que vous en aurez besoing à Noel?

Iettez vous à l'experience de tous les maux qui vous peuuent arriuer, nommement des plus extremes: esprouuez vous là, disent-ils, asseurez vous là. Au rebours; le plus facile et plus naturel, seroit en descharger mesme sa pensee. Ils ne viendront pas assez tost, leur vray estre ne nous dure pas assez, il faut que nostre esprit les estende et les allonge, et qu'auant la main il les incorpore en soy, et s'en entretienne, comme s'ils ne poisoient pas raisonnablement à nos sens.

Ils poiseront assez, quand ils y seront (dit vn des maistres, non de quelque tendre secte, mais de la plus dure) cependant fauorise toy: croy ce que tu aimes le mieux: que te sert il d'aller recueillant et preuenant ta male fortune: et de perdre le present, par la crainte du futur: et estre dés cette heure miserable, par ce que tu le dois estre auec le temps? Ce sont ses mots. La science nous faict volontiers vn bon office, de nous instruire bien exactement des dimensions des maux. Curis acuens mortalia corda. Ce seroit dommage, si partie de leur grandeur eschappoit à nostre sentiment et cognoissance.

Il est certain, qu'à la plus part, la preparation à la mort, a donné plus de torment, que n'a faict la souffrance. Il fut iadis veritablement dict, et par vn bien iudicieux autheur: Minus afficit sensus fatigatio, quàm cogitatio. Le sentiment de la mort presente, nous anime par fois de soy mesme,

ENGLISH

Meditate on exile, torture, war, disease, shipwreck, so that you may be a novice to no misfortune. What good does it do us, this eagerness to anticipate all the ills of human nature and to prepare ourselves with so much trouble even against those that may perhaps never touch us? (The possibility of suffering makes us as sad as those who suffer. Not only the blow, but the wind and the fart of it strike us.) Or, like the most feverish—for it certainly is a fever—to go and have yourself whipped right now because it may happen that Fortune will make you suffer it one day, and to put on your fur-lined gown on Saint John's Day in June because you will need it at Christmas?

"Throw yourselves into the experience of all the ills that can befall you, especially the most extreme," they say; "test yourselves there, make yourselves secure there." On the contrary: the easiest and most natural thing would be to unburden even our thoughts of them. They will not come soon enough; their real existence does not last long enough for us; our mind must stretch them out and lengthen them, absorb them into itself beforehand and dwell on them, as if they did not weigh heavily enough on our senses.

"They will weigh enough when they are here," says one of the masters—not of some soft sect, but of the hardest. "Meanwhile, favor yourself; believe what you like best. What good does it do you to go gathering up and anticipating your ill fortune, to lose the present for fear of the future, and to be miserable now because you are bound to be so in time?" Those are his words. Learning certainly does us a fine service by instructing us very precisely in the dimensions of our ills. Sharpening mortal hearts with cares. It would be a pity if any part of their magnitude escaped our feeling and knowledge.[17]

It is certain that for most people preparing for death has caused more torment than undergoing it. It was truly said long ago, and by a very judicious author: Exertion affects the senses less than brooding does. The sense of death at hand some-

17 Seneca, the Stoic, in his Letters.

FRENCH

d'vne prompte resolution, de ne plus euiter chose du tout ineuitable. Plusieurs gladiateurs se sont veus au temps passé, apres auoir couardement combattu, aualler courageusement la mort; offrans leur gosier au fer de l'ennemy, et le conuians. La veue esloignee de la mort aduenir, a besoing d'vne fermeté lente, et difficile par consequent à fournir. Si vous ne sçauez pas mourir, ne vous chaille.

Nature vous en informera sur le champ, plainement et suffisamment; elle fera exactement cette besongne pour vous, n'en empeschez vostre soing. Incertam frustra, mortales, funeris horam Quæritis, et qua sit mors aditura via.
Pœna minor certam subito perferre ruinam,
Quod timeas grauius sustinuisse diu. Nous troublons la vie par le soing de la mort, et la mort par le soing de la vie. L'vne nous ennuye, l'autre nous effraye. Ce n'est pas contre la mort, que nous nous preparons, c'est chose trop momentanee. Vn quart d'heure de passion sans consequence, sans nuisance, ne merite pas des preceptes particuliers. A dire vray, nous nous preparons contre les preparations de la mort.

La philosophie nous ordonne, d'auoir la mort tousiours deuant les yeux, de la preuoir et considerer auant le temps: et nous donne apres, les regles et les precautions, pour prouuoir à ce, que cette preuoyance, et cette pensee ne nous blesse. Ainsi font les medecins qui nous iettent aux maladies, afin qu'ils ayent où employer leurs drogues et leur art. Si nous n'auons sçeu viure, c'est iniustice de nous apprendre à mourir et difformer la fin de son total. Si nous auons sçeu viure, constamment et tranquillement, nous sçaurons mourir de mesme. Ils s'en venteront tant qu'il leur plaira. Tota philosophorum vita commentatio mortis est. Mais il m'est aduis, que c'est bien le bout, non pourtant le but de la vie.

C'est sa fin, son extremité, non pourtant son obiect. Elle doit estre elle mesme à soy, sa visee, son dessein. Son droit estude est se regler, se conduire, se souffrir. Au nombre de plusieurs autres offices, que comprend le general et principal chapitre de sçauoir viure, est cet article de sçauoir mourir. Et des plus legers, si nostre crainte ne luy donnoit poids.

ENGLISH

times inspires us of itself with a prompt resolution no longer to avoid what is utterly inevitable. Many gladiators were seen in times past who, after fighting like cowards, swallowed death courageously, offering their throats to the enemy's sword and inviting it. The distant prospect of death to come requires a slow firmness, and one therefore hard to sustain. If you do not know how to die, never mind.[18]

Nature will teach you on the spot, fully and adequately; she will do this job for you exactly; do not trouble yourself about it. In vain, mortals, you seek the uncertain hour
Of your end, and by what road death will come.
It is less pain to suffer a sudden, certain ruin
Than to endure for long what you fear. We trouble life with concern about death, and death with concern about life. The one distresses us, the other frightens us. It is not against death that we prepare ourselves; that is too momentary a thing. A quarter of an hour of suffering, without consequence and without harm, does not deserve special precepts. To tell the truth, we are preparing ourselves against the preparations for death.[19]

Philosophy orders us to keep death always before our eyes, to foresee it and consider it ahead of time, and then gives us rules and precautions to see to it that this foresight and this thought do not wound us. That is what physicians do who throw us into illnesses so that they will have something to use their drugs and their skill on. If we have not known how to live, it is unjust to teach us how to die and to make the end out of keeping with the whole. If we have known how to live steadfastly and tranquilly, we will know how to die the same way. They may boast about it as much as they like: The whole life of philosophers is a meditation on death. But it seems to me that death is indeed the end of life, yet not its aim.

It is its end, its extremity, yet not its object. Life should be its own aim, its own purpose. Its proper study is to regulate itself, guide itself, bear with itself. Among the many other duties comprised in the general and principal chapter of knowing how to live is this article of knowing how to die—and 18 Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory.

19 Maximianus, Elegies, once attributed to Cornelius Gallus.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

one of the lightest, if our fear did not give it weight.

3.12.12 A les iuger par l'vtilité, et par la verité naifue, les leçons de la simplicité, ne cedent gueres à celles que nous presche la doctrine au contraire. Les hommes sont diuers en sentiment et en force: il les faut mener à leur bien, selon eux: et par routes diuerses. Quò me cumque rapit tempestas, deferor hospes. Ie ne vy iamais paysan de mes voisins, entrer en cogitation de quelle contenance, et asseurance, il passeroit cette heure derniere. Nature luy apprend à ne songer à la mort, que quand il se meurt. Et lors il y a meilleure grace qu'Aristote: lequel la mort presse doublement, et par elle, et par vne si longue premeditation.

Judged by their usefulness and by their natural truth, the lessons of simplicity hardly yield to those that learning preaches to us to the contrary. Men differ in feeling and in strength; they must be led to their good according to what they are, and by different roads. Wherever the storm drives me, I put in as a guest. I never saw any peasant among my neighbors start pondering with what countenance and assurance he would pass that last hour. Nature teaches him not to think about death except when he is dying. And then he does it with better grace than Aristotle, whom death presses doubly, both by itself and by such long premeditation.

Pourtant fut-ce l'opinion de Cæsar, que la moins premeditee mort, estoit la plus heureuse, et plus deschargee. Plus dolet quàm necesse est, qui antê dolet quàm necesse est. L'aigreur de cette imagination, naist de nostre curiosité. Nous nous empeschons tousiours ainsi: voulans deuancer et regenter les prescriptions naturelles. Ce n'est qu'aux docteurs, d'en disner plus mal, tous sains, et se renfroigner de l'image de la mort. Le commun, n'a besoing ny de remede ny de consolation, qu'au heurt, et au coup. Et n'en considere qu'autant iustement qu'il en souffre. Est-ce pas ce que nous disons, que la stupidité, et faute d'apprehension, du vulgaire, luy donne cette patience aux maux presens, et cette profonde nonchalance des sinistres accidens futurs?

That is why it was Caesar's opinion that the least premeditated death was the happiest and the least burdened. He suffers more than necessary who suffers before it is necessary. The bitterness of this imagining springs from our curiosity. This is how we always encumber ourselves, wanting to anticipate and lord it over nature's prescriptions. It is only for learned doctors to dine the worse for it while in perfect health, and to scowl at the image of death. Ordinary people need neither remedy nor consolation except at the impact, at the blow, and they consider it exactly as much as they suffer from it. Is that not what we say: that the stupidity and lack of apprehension of the common people give them this patience in present ills and this profound unconcern about sinister future events? [20]

Que leur ame pour estre plus crasse, et obtuse, est moins penetrable et agitable? Pour Dieu s'il est ainsi, tenons d'ores en auant escole de bestise. C'est l'extreme fruit, que les sciences nous promettent, auquel ceste-cy conduict si doucement ses disciples.

That their souls, being coarser and duller, are less easily penetrated and stirred? For God's sake, if that is so, let us from now on hold a school of stupidity. It is the ultimate fruit that the sciences promise us, and this school leads its pupils to it so gently.

SOCRATES' DEFENSE

Montaigne paraphrases Socrates' plea to his judges as a model of natural simplicity.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.12.13 Nous n'aurons pas faute de bons regens, interpretes de la simplicité naturelle. Socrates en sera l'vn. Car de ce qu'il

We will not lack good teachers to interpret natural simplicity. Socrates will be one. For, as far as I re-20 Plutarch reports that Caesar said this at supper on the eve of his assassination.

FRENCH

m'en souuient, il parle enuiron en ce sens, aux iuges qui deliberent de sa vie: I'ay peur, messieurs, si ie vous prie de ne me faire mourir, que ie m'enferre en la delation de mes accusateurs; qui est: Que ie fais plus l'entendu que les autres: comme ayant quelque cognoissance plus cachee, des choses qui sont au dessus et au dessous de nous. Ie sçay que ie n'ay ni frequenté, ny recogneu la mort, ni n'ay veu personne qui ait essayé ses qualitez, pour m'en instruire.

Ceux qui la craignent presupposent la cognoistre: quant à moy, ie ne sçay ny quelle elle est, ny quel il faict en l'autre monde. A l'auanture est la mort chose indifferente, à l'auanture desirable. Il est à croire pourtant, si c'est vne transmigration d'vne place à autre, qu'il y a de l'amendement, d'aller viure auec tant de grands personnages trespassez: et d'estre exempt d'auoir plus affaire à iuges iniques et corrompus. Si c'est vn aneantissement de nostre estre, c'est encore amendement d'entrer en vne longue et paisible nuit. Nous ne sentons rien de plus doux en la vie, qu'vn repos et sommeil tranquille, et profond sans songes.

Les choses que ie sçay estre mauuaises, comme d'offencer son prochain, et desobeir au superieur, soit Dieu, soit homme, ie les euite soigneusement: celles desquelles ie ne sçay, si elles sont bonnes ou mauuaises, ie ne les sçaurois craindre. Si ie m'en vay mourir, et vous laisse en vie: les Dieux seuls voyent, à qui, de vous ou de moy, il en ira mieux. Parquoy pour mon regard, vous en ordonnerez, comme il vous plaira. Mais selon ma façon de conseiller les choses iustes et vtiles, ie dy bien, que pour vostre conscience vous ferez mieux de m'eslargir, si vous ne voyez plus auant que moy en ma cause.

Et iugeant selon mes actions passees, et publiques, et priuees, selon mes intentions, et selon le profit, que tirent tous les iours de ma conuersation tant de nos citoyens, ieunes et vieux, et le fruit, que ie vous fay à tous, vous ne pouuez duëment vous descharger enuers mon merite, qu'en ordonnant, que ie sois nourry, attendu ma pauureté, au Prytanee, aux despens publiques: ce que souuent ie vous ay veu à moindre raison, octroyer à d'autres. Ne prenez pas à obstination ou desdaing, que, suyuant la coustume, ie n'aille vous suppliant et esmouuant à commiseration.

I'ay des amis et des parents, n'estant, comme dict Homere, engendré ny de bois, ny de pierre non plus que member, he speaks roughly to this effect to the judges deliberating on his life: I am afraid, gentlemen, that if I beg you not to put me to death, I will entangle myself in the charge my accusers bring, which is that I set myself up as knowing more than others, as having some more hidden knowledge of things above and below us. I know that I have neither frequented nor explored death, nor seen anyone who has tested its qualities so as to instruct me about it.[21]

ENGLISH

Those who fear it presuppose that they know it; as for me, I know neither what it is nor what things are like in the other world. Perhaps death is a thing indifferent, perhaps a thing desirable. It is to be believed, however, that if it is a migration from one place to another, there is improvement in going to live with so many great men who have passed away, and in being exempt from having anything more to do with unjust and corrupt judges. If it is an annihilation of our being, it is still an improvement to enter a long and peaceful night. We feel nothing sweeter in life than a tranquil rest and a sleep deep and without dreams.

The things I know to be bad, such as wronging one's neighbor and disobeying one's superior, whether God or man, I carefully avoid; those I do not know to be good or bad, I could not fear. If I go off to die and leave you alive, the gods alone see which of us, you or I, will fare better. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, you will decide as you please. But, in keeping with my way of advising what is just and useful, I do say that for the sake of your conscience you will do better to set me free, unless you see further into my case than I do.

And judging by my past actions, both public and private, by my intentions, by the profit that so many of our citizens, young and old, draw every day from my conversation, and by the benefit I bring to you all, you cannot duly acquit yourselves toward my deserts except by ordering that, in view of my poverty, I be fed in the Prytaneum at public expense—which I have often seen you grant to others on lesser grounds. Do not take it for obstinacy or disdain that I do not, following custom, go about beseeching you and moving you to pity.[22]

I have friends and relatives—for I was not, as Homer says, begotten of wood or stone any more 21 A free paraphrase of Socrates' defense in Plato's Apology.

FRENCH

les autres: capables de se presenter, avec des larmes, et le dueil: et ay trois enfans esplorez, dequoy vous tirer à pitié. Mais ie feroy honte à nostre ville, en l'aage que ie suis, et en telle reputation de sagesse, que m'en voyci en preuention, de m'aller desmettre à si lasches contenances. Que diroit-on des autres Atheniens? I'ay tousiours admonnesté ceux qui m'ont ouy parler, de ne racheter leur vie, par vne action deshonnete.

Et aux guerres de mon pays à Amphipolis, à Potidee, à Delie, et autres où ie me suis trouué, i'ay montré par effect, combien i'estoy loing de garantir ma seureté par ma honte. D'auantage i'interesserois vostre deuoir, et vous conuierois à choses laydes: car ce n'est pas à mes prieres de vous persuader: c'est aux raisons pures et solides de la iustice. Vous auez iuré aux Dieux d'ainsi vous maintenir. Il sembleroit, que ie vous vousisse soupçonner et recriminer, de ne croire pas, qu'il y en aye. Et moy mesme tesmoigneroy contre moy, de ne croire point en eux, comme ie doy: me deffiant de leur conduicte, et ne remettant purement en leurs mains mon affaire.

Ie m'y fie du tout: et tiens pour certain, qu'ils feront en cecy, selon qu'il sera plus propre à vous et à moy. Les gens de bien ny viuans, ny morts, n'ont aucunement à se craindre des Dieux. Voyla pas vn playdoyé puerile, d'vne hauteur inimaginable et employé en quelle necessité? Vrayement ce fut raison, qu'il le preferast à celuy, que ce grand orateur Lysias, auoit mis par escrit pour luy: excellemment façonné au stile iudiciaire: mais indigne d'vn si noble criminel. Eust on ouï de la bouche de Socrates vne voix suppliante? Cette superbe vertu, eust elle calé, au plus fort de sa montre?

Et sa riche et puissante nature, eust elle commis à l'art sa defense: et en son plus haut essay, renoncé à la verité et naïueté, ornemens de son parler, pour se parer du fard, des figures, et feintes, d'vne oraison apprinse? Il feit tressagement, et selon luy, de ne corrompre vne teneur de vie incorruptible, et vne si saincte image de l'humaine forme, pour allonger d'vn an sa decrepitude: et trahir l'immortelle memoire de cette fin glorieuse. Il deuoit sa vie, non pas à soy, mais à l'exemple du monde. Seroit ce than others are—who are capable of appearing in tears and mourning; and I have three weeping children with whom to move you to pity. But I would bring shame on our city, at my age and with such a reputation for wisdom that I stand accused because of it, if I stooped to such base displays. What would people say of the other Athenians? I have always admonished those who have heard me speak not to buy back their lives by a dishonorable act.

ENGLISH

And in my country's wars, at Amphipolis, at Potidaea, at Delium and others where I was present, I showed in deed how far I was from securing my safety by my shame. Moreover, I would be compromising your duty and inviting you to ugly acts; for it is not for my entreaties to persuade you, but for the pure and solid reasons of justice. You have sworn to the gods to conduct yourselves thus. It would seem that I wanted to suspect you and accuse you of not believing that there are any. And I would be bearing witness against myself that I do not believe in them as I should, by distrusting their guidance and not placing my case simply in their hands.[23]

I trust in them entirely, and hold it certain that in this matter they will do what is most fitting for you and for me. Good men, whether living or dead, have nothing whatever to fear from the gods. Is that not a childlike plea, of unimaginable loftiness—and used in what an extremity! Truly it was right that he should prefer it to the one the great orator Lysias had written out for him, excellently fashioned in the judicial style but unworthy of so noble a defendant. Would anyone have heard a pleading voice from the mouth of Socrates? Would that proud virtue have struck its sails at the height of its display?[24]

And would his rich and powerful nature have entrusted its defense to art, and in its supreme trial renounced truth and naturalness, the ornaments of his speech, to deck itself out with the makeup, the figures and the feints of a memorized oration? He acted very wisely, and true to himself, in not corrupting an incorruptible tenor of life and so holy an image of human form in order to prolong 22 The Prytaneum: the public hall in Athens where honored citizens were fed at the city's expense.

23 Battles of the Peloponnesian War in the 430s and 420s BC, at which Socrates served as a foot soldier.
24 Lysias (c. 445–380 BC), Athenian orator and writer of speeches for litigants.

FRENCH

pas dommage publique, qu'il eust acheuee d'vne oysiue et obscure façon? Certes vne si nonchallante et molle consideration de sa mort, meritoit que la posterité la considerast d'autant plus pour luy.

Ce qu'elle fit. Et il n'y a rien en la iustice si iuste, que ce que la Fortune ordonna pour sa recommandation. Car les Atheniens eurent en telle abomination ceux, qui en auoient esté cause, qu'on les fuyoit comme personnes excommuniees. On tenoit pollu tout ce, à quoy ils auoient touché: personne à l'estuue ne lauoit auec eux, personne ne les saluoit ni accointoit: si qu'en fin ne pouuant plus porter cette haine publique, ils se pendirent eux mesmes.

3.12.14 Si quelqu'vn estime, que parmy tant d'autres exemples que i'auois à choisir pour le seruice de mon propos, és dits de Socrates, i'aye mal trié cestuy-cy: et qu'il iuge, ce discours estre esleué au dessus des opinions communes: ie l'ay faict à escient: car ie iuge autrement. Et tiens que c'est vn discours, en rang, et en naïfueté bien plus arriere, et plus bas, que les opinions communes. Il represente en vne hardiesse inartificielle et securité enfantine la pure et premiere impression et ignorance de nature. Car il est croyable, que nous auons naturellement crainte de la douleur; mais non de la mort, à cause d'elle. C'est vne partie de nostre estre, non moins essentielle que le viure.

A quoy faire, nous en auroit Nature engendré la haine et l'horreur, veu qu'elle luy tient rang de tres-grande vtilité, pour nourrir la succession et vicissitude de ses ouurages? Et qu'en cette republique vniuerselle, elle sert plus de naissance et d'augmentation, que de perte ou ruyne: Sic rerum summa nouatur: / Mille animas vna necata dedit. La deffaillance d'vne vie, est le passage à mille autres vies. Nature a empreint aux bestes, le soing d'elles et de leur conseruation. Elles vont iusques-là, de craindre leur empirement: de se heurter et blesser: que nous les encheuestrions et battions, accidents subiects à leur sens et experience. Mais que nous les tuions, elles ne le peuuent craindre, ny n'ont la faculté d'imaginer et conclurre la mort.

ENGLISH

his decrepitude by a year, and in not betraying the immortal memory of that glorious end. He owed his life not to himself but to the example of the world. Would it not have been a public loss if he had ended it in an idle and obscure way? Certainly so unconcerned and easy a consideration of his own death deserved that posterity should consider it all the more on his behalf.

And so it did. And there is nothing in justice so just as what Fortune ordained to honor his memory. For the Athenians held those who had caused his death in such abomination that people shunned them like excommunicated persons. Everything they had touched was held polluted; no one would bathe with them at the baths, no one greeted them or had any dealings with them; so that in the end, unable to bear this public hatred any longer, they hanged themselves.

Someone may think that, of all the examples I could have chosen from the sayings of Socrates to serve my purpose, I picked this one badly, and judge that this reasoning rises above common opinion. I did it deliberately, for I judge otherwise. I hold that, in rank and in naturalness, it is a reasoning that stands much further back and lower than common opinion. With an artless boldness and a childlike assurance, it shows nature's pure and first impression, and nature's ignorance. For it is believable that we naturally fear pain, but not death for its own sake. Death is a part of our being no less essential than living.

Why would Nature have bred in us a hatred and horror of it, when it is so very useful to her in sustaining the succession and alternation of her works? And when, in this universal commonwealth, it serves birth and increase more than loss or ruin: Thus the sum of things is renewed: / One life put to death has given a thousand. The failing of one life is the passage to a thousand other lives. Nature has imprinted on animals the care of themselves and of their preservation. They go so far as to fear being impaired: knocking and hurting themselves, our haltering and beating them, accidents within the reach of their senses and experience. But they cannot fear that we will kill them, nor do they have the faculty to imagine death or reason their way to it.[25]

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Si dit-on encore qu'on les void, non seulement la souffrir gayement: la plus-part des cheuaux hannissent en mourant, les cygnes la chantent: mais de plus, la rechercher à leur besoing; comme portent plusieurs exemples des elephans.	And yet it is said that they are seen not only to bear it cheerfully (most horses neigh as they die, and swans sing it), but also to seek it out when they need to, as many examples of elephants show.

BORROWED FLOWERS

He admits his book gathers other men's flowers, though he borrows far less than he could.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.12.15 Outre ce, la façon d'argumenter, de laquelle se sert icy Socrates, est-elle pas admirable esgallement, en simplicité et en vehemence? Vrayment il est bien plus aisé, de parler comme Aristote, viure comme Cæsar, qu'il n'est aisé de parler et viure comme Socrates. Là, loge l'extreme degré de perfection et de difficulté: l'art n'y peut ioindre. Or nos facultez ne sont pas ainsi dressées. Nous ne les essayons, ny ne les cognoissons: nous nous inuestissons de celles d'autruy, et laissons chomer les nostres. Comme quelqu'vn pourroit dire de moy: que i'ay seulement faict icy vn amas de fleurs estrangeres, n'y ayant fourny du mien, que le filet à les lier.	Besides, the way of arguing that Socrates uses here: is it not equally admirable for its simplicity and its force? Truly it is much easier to speak like Aristotle and live like Caesar than to speak and live like Socrates. There lies the extreme degree of perfection and of difficulty; art cannot reach it. Now our faculties are not trained that way. We neither try them out nor know them; we clothe ourselves in other people's and let our own lie idle. Someone might say of me, for instance, that here I have merely made a heap of other people's flowers, supplying nothing of my own but the thread to tie them.
Certes i'ay donné à l'opinion publique, que ces parements empruntez m'accompaignent: mais ie n'entends pas qu'ils me couurent, et qu'ils me cachent: c'est le rebours de mon dessein. Qui ne veux faire montre que du mien et de ce qui est mien par nature. Et si ie m'en fusse creu, à tout hazard, i'eusse parlé tout fin seul. Ie m'en charge de plus fort, tous les iours, outre ma proposition et ma forme premiere, sur la fantasie du siecle: et par oisiueté. S'il me messied à moy, comme ie le croy, n'importe: il peut estre vtile à quelque autre. Tel allegue Platon et Homere, qui ne les vid onques: et moy, ay prins des lieux assez, ailleurs qu'en leur source.	It is true that I have yielded to public opinion in letting these borrowed ornaments go along with me; but I do not mean them to cover me and hide me. That is the reverse of my design, since I want to show nothing but what is my own, and mine by nature. If I had trusted myself, I would have taken the risk and spoken entirely on my own. Every day I load myself with them more heavily, beyond my intention and my original form, to suit the fancy of the age, and out of idleness. If it does not become me, as I believe, no matter: it may be useful to someone else. Some people quote Plato and Homer who never set eyes on them; and I have taken plenty of passages from places other than their source.
Sans peine et sans suffisance, ayant mille volumes de liures, autour de moy, en ce lieu où i'escris, i'emprunteray presentement s'il me plaist, d'vne douzaine de tels rauaudeurs, gens que ie ne fueillette guere, dequoy esmailler le traicté de la Physionomie. Il ne faut que l'epitre liminaire d'vn Allemand pour me farcir d'allegations: et nous allons quester par là vne friande gloire, à piper le sot monde. Ces pastissages de lieux communs, dequoy tant de gents mesnagent leur estude,	Without effort and without ability, having a thousand volumes around me in this place where I write, I could borrow right now, if I pleased, from a dozen such patchers of old cloth (people I hardly ever leaf through) enough to enamel this treatise on Physiognomy. All it takes is the prefatory epistle of some German to stuff me with quotations; and that is how we go begging for a tooth-

25 The first line is from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things; the second from Ovid, Fasti.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

ne seruent guere qu'à subiects communs: et seruent à nous montrer, non à nous conduire: ridicule fruict de la science, que Socrates exagite si plaisamment contre Euthydemus.

some glory, to fool the silly world. These hodge-podges of commonplaces, with which so many people husband their studies, are hardly any use except for commonplace subjects. They serve to show us off, not to guide us: a ridiculous fruit of learning, which Socrates mocks so amusingly in his exchange with Euthydemus.[26]

I'ay veu faire des liures de choses, ny iamais estudiées ny entenduës: l'autheur commettant à diuers de ses amis sçauants, la recherche de cette-cy, et de cette autre matiere, à le bastir: se contentant pour sa part, d'en auoir proietté le dessein, et lié par son industrie, ce fagot de prouisions incogneuës: au moins est sien l'ancre, et le papier. Cela, c'est achetter, ou emprunter vn liure, non pas le faire. C'est apprendre aux hommes, non qu'on sçait faire vn liure, mais, ce dequoy ils pouuoient estre en doute, qu'on ne le sçait pas faire. Vn president se ventoit où i'estois, d'auoir amoncelé deux cens tant de lieux estrangers, en vn sien arrest presidental. En le preschant, il effaçoit la gloire qu'on luy en donnoit.

I have seen books made about things their authors had never studied or understood. The author hands over to various learned friends the research on this subject and that, to build it up, and contents himself with having drawn up the plan and bound together, by his own ingenuity, this bundle of provisions unknown to him. At least the ink and the paper are his. That is buying or borrowing a book, not making one. It teaches people not that you know how to make a book but, on a point they might have been in doubt about, that you do not. A presiding judge boasted in my presence of having piled up two hundred and some passages from other authors in one of his presidential rulings. By proclaiming it, he wiped out the glory people gave him for it.

Pusillanime et absurde venterie à mon gré, pour vn tel subiect et telle personne. Ie fais le contraire: et parmy tant d'emprunts, suis bien aise d'en pouuoir desrober quelqu'vn: le desguisant et difformant à nouueau seruice. Au hazard, que ie laisse dire, que c'est par faute d'auoir entendu son naturel vsage, ie luy donne quelque particuliere adresse de ma main, à ce qu'il en soit d'autant moins purement estranger. Ceux-cy mettent leurs larrecins en parade et en conte. Aussi ont-ils plus de credit aux loix que moy. Nous autres naturalistes, estimons, qu'il y aye grande et incomparable preference, de l'honneur de l'inuention, à l'honneur de l'allegation.

A petty and absurd boast, to my taste, for such a subject and such a person. I do the opposite. Among so many borrowings, I am very glad when I can steal one, disguising and reshaping it for new service. At the risk of letting people say that it is because I failed to understand its natural use, I give it some particular twist of my own hand, so that it may be that much less purely foreign. These people put their thefts on parade and on record; so they stand better with the law than I do. We naturalists consider that the honor of invention is greatly and incomparably to be preferred to the honor of quotation.

3.12.16 Si i'eusse voulu parler par science, i'eusse parlé plustost. I'eusse escrit du temps plus voisin de mes estudes, que i'auois plus d'esprit et de memoire. Et me fusse plus fié à la vigueur de cet aage là, qu'à cettuy-cy, si i'eusse voulu faire mestier d'escrire. Et quoy, si cette faueur gratieuse, que la Fortune m'a n'aguere offerte par l'entremise de cet ouurage, m'eust peu rencontrer en telle saison au lieu de celle-cy; où elle est egallement desirable à posseder, et preste à perdre? Deux de mes cognoissans, grands hommes en cette faculté, ont perdu par moitié, à mon aduis, d'auoir refusé de se mettre au iour, à quarante ans,

If I had wanted to speak from learning, I would have spoken sooner. I would have written at a time closer to my studies, when I had more wit and memory; and if I had wanted to make a profession of writing, I would have trusted the vigor of that age more than this one. And what if this gracious favor that Fortune has lately offered me through this work had come my way in that season, instead of this one, when it is as desirable to possess as it is ready to be lost? Two of my acquaintances, 26 Euthydemus is the target of Socrates' teasing both in Plato's dialogue of that name and in Xenophon's Memorabilia.

FRENCH

pour attendre les soixante. La maturité a ses deffaux, comme la verdeur, et pires.

Et autant est la vieillesse incommode à cette nature de besongne, qu'à toute autre. Quiconque met sa decrepitude soubs la presse, faict folie, s'il espere en espreindre des humeurs, qui ne sentent le disgratié, le resueur et l'assoupy. Nostre esprit se constipe et s'espessit en vieillissant. Ie dis pompeusement et opulemment l'ignorance, et dis la science maigrement et piteusement. Accessoirement cette-cy, et accidentalement: celle-là expressément, et principallement. Et ne traicte à poinct nommé de rien, que du rien: ny d'aucune science, que de celle de l'inscience. I'ay choisi le temps, où ma vie, que i'ay à peindre, ie l'ay toute deuant moy: ce qui en reste, tient plus de la mort.

Et de ma mort seulement, si ie la rencontrois babillarde, comme font d'autres, donrois-ie encores volontiers aduis au peuple, en deslogeant.

ENGLISH

great men in this field, lost half their worth, in my opinion, by refusing to go before the public at forty so as to wait for sixty. Maturity has its defects, as greenness does, and worse ones.[27]

And old age is as ill-suited to this kind of work as to any other. Whoever puts his decrepitude under the press is a fool if he hopes to squeeze out of it juices that do not smack of the dismal, the dreamy and the drowsy. Our mind gets constipated and thickens as it ages. I speak of ignorance pompously and lavishly, and of learning meagerly and pitifully: of learning secondarily and incidentally, of ignorance expressly and principally. And I deal specifically with nothing but nothing, and with no knowledge but the knowledge of unknowing. I have chosen the time when the life I have to portray lies entirely before me; what remains of it has more to do with death.

And as for my death, if I found it talkative, as others do, I would still gladly give people notice of it as I moved out.

BEAUTY AND THE FACE

Socrates' ugliness hid a beautiful soul; beauty is powerful, but faces are poor guarantees.

FRENCH

3.12.17 Socrates a esté vn exemplaire parfaict en toutes grandes qualitez. I'ay despit, qu'il eust rencontré vn corps si disgratié, comme ils disent, et si disconuenable à la beauté de son ame, luy si amoureux et si affolé de la beauté. Nature luy fit iniustice. Il n'est rien plus vray-semblable, que la conformité et relation du corps à l'esprit.

Ipsi animi, magni refert, quali in corpore locati sint: multa enim è corpore existunt, quæ acuant mentem: multa, quæ obtundant. Cettuy-cy parle d'vne laideur desnaturée, et difformité de membres: mais nous appellons laideur aussi, vne mesauenance au premier regard, qui loge principallement au visage: et nous desgoute par le teint, vne tache, vne rude contenance, par quelque cause souuent inexplicable, en des membres pourtant bien ordonnez et entiers. La laideur, qui reuestoit vne ame tres-belle en la Boittie, estoit de ce predicament. Cette laideur superficielle, qui est toutesfois la plus imperieuse, est de moindre preiudice à l'estat de l'esprit: et a peu de certitude en l'opinion des hommes. L'autre, qui d'vn plus

ENGLISH

Socrates was a perfect model in all great qualities. It vexes me that he met with a body so ill-favored, as they say, and so ill-matched to the beauty of his soul: he who was so in love with beauty, so mad about it. Nature did him an injustice. Nothing is more likely than that the body should match and correspond to the mind.

It matters greatly to the mind itself in what kind of body it is lodged; for many things arise from the body to sharpen the mind, and many to blunt it. This writer is speaking of an unnatural ugliness and deformity of limbs. But we also call ugliness an unattractiveness at first sight, which lies chiefly in the face and puts us off by the complexion, a blemish, a rough bearing, often for some inexplicable reason, in limbs that are nevertheless well ordered and whole. The ugliness that clothed a very beautiful soul in La Boétie was of this kind. This superficial ugliness, though it is the most imperious, does less harm to the state of the mind, and car-

27 The "gracious favor" is probably the friendship of Marie de Gournay, who sought Montaigne out after reading the Essays and became his "adopted daughter."

FRENCH

propre nom, s'appelle difformité plus substantielle, porte plus volontiers coup iusques au dedans.

Non pas tout soulier de cuir bien lissé, mais tout soulier bien formé, montre l'interieure forme du pied. Comme Socrates disoit de la sienne, qu'elle en accusoit iustement, autant en son ame, s'il ne l'eust corrigée par institution. Mais en le disant, ie tiens qu'il se mocquoit, suiuant son vsage: et iamais ame si excellente, ne se fit elle-mesme.

3.12.18 Ie ne puis dire assez souuent, combien i'estime la beauté, qualité puissante et aduantageuse. Il l'appelloit, vne courte tyrannie: et Platon, le priuilege de nature. Nous n'en auons point qui la surpasse en credit. Elle tient le premier rang au commerce des hommes. Elle se presente au deuant: seduict et preoccupe nostre iugement, auec grande authorité et merueilleuse impression. Phryné perdoit sa cause, entre les mains d'vn excellent aduocat, si, ouurant sa robbe, elle n'eust corrompu ses iuges, par l'esclat de sa beauté. Et ie trouue, que Cyrus, Alexandre, Cæsar, ces trois maistres du monde, ne l'ont pas oubliée à faire leurs grands affaires. Non a pas le premier Scipion. Vn mesme mot embrasse en Grec le bel et le bon. Et le S.

Esprit appelle souuent bons, ceux qu'il veut dire beaux. Ie maintiendroy volontiers le rang des biens, selon que portoit la chanson, que Platon dit auoir esté triuiale, prinse de quelque ancien poëte: La santé, la beauté, la richesse. Aristote dit, appartenir aux beaux, le droict de commander: et quand il en est, de qui la beauté approche celle des images des Dieux, que la veneration leur est pareillement deuë. A celuy qui luy demandoit, pourquoy plus long temps, et plus souuent, on hantoit les beaux: Cette demande, feit-il, n'appartient à estre faicte, que par vn aueugle. La plus-part et les plus grands philosophes, payerent leur escholage, et acquirent la sagesse, par l'entremise et faueur de leur beauté.

Non seulement aux hommes qui me seruent, mais aux bestes aussi, ie la considere à deux doigts pres de la bonté.

3.12.19 Si me semble-il, que ce traict et façon de visage, et ces lineaments, par lesquels on argumente aucunes ries little certainty in people's opinion. The other, more properly called deformity, being more substantial, more readily strikes home to the inside.[28]

ENGLISH

Not every shoe of well-polished leather, but every well-shaped shoe, shows the inner shape of the foot. So Socrates said of his ugliness that it accurately revealed as much in his soul, had he not corrected it by education. But in saying so, I think he was joking, as was his habit; never did so excellent a soul make itself.

I cannot say often enough how highly I value beauty, a powerful and advantageous quality. Socrates called it a short-lived tyranny, and Plato the privilege of nature. We have no quality that surpasses it in credit. It holds the first rank in human dealings. It steps forward in front; it seduces and prejudges our judgment with great authority and a wondrous impression. Phryne would have lost her case, in the hands of an excellent advocate, had she not opened her robe and corrupted her judges with the radiance of her beauty. And I find that Cyrus, Alexander and Caesar, those three masters of the world, did not forget it in conducting their great affairs. Nor did the first Scipio. In Greek a single word embraces the beautiful and the good. And the Holy[29]

Spirit often calls good those it means to call beautiful. I would gladly keep the ranking of goods given in the song that Plato says was commonly sung, taken from some ancient poet: health, beauty, wealth. Aristotle says that the right to command belongs to the beautiful, and that when there are people whose beauty approaches that of the images of the gods, veneration is likewise due to them. To someone who asked him why people spent more time, and more often, with the beautiful, he said: "That is a question only a blind man would ask." Most philosophers, and the greatest, paid for their schooling and acquired wisdom through the help and favor of their beauty.

Not only in the men who serve me but in animals too, I consider it within two fingers of goodness.

Yet it seems to me that the cast and shape of the face, and the features from which people infer cer-

28 The quotation is from Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.
29 Phryne was a famous Athenian courtesan of the 4th century BC, tried for impiety and acquitted.

FRENCH

complexions internes, et nos fortunes à venir, est chose qui ne loge pas bien directement et simplement, soubs le chapitre de beauté et de laideur. Non plus que toute bonne odeur, et serenité d'air, n'en promet pas la santé: ny toute espesseur et puanteur, l'infection, en temps pestilent. Ceux qui accusent les dames, de contre-dire leur beauté par leurs mœurs, ne rencontrent pas tousiours. Car en vne face qui ne sera pas trop bien composée, il peut loger quelque air de probité et de fiance. Comme au rebours, i'ay leu par fois entre deux beaux yeux, des menasses d'vne nature maligne et dangereuse.

Il y a des physionomies fauorables: et en vne presse d'ennemis victorieux, vous choisirez incontinent parmy des hommes incogneus, l'vn plustost que l'autre, à qui vous rendre et fier vostre vie: et non proprement par la consideration de la beauté.

3.12.20 C'est vne foible garantie que la mine, toutesfois elle a quelque consideration. Et si i'auois à les foyter, ce seroit plus rudement, les meschans qui dementent et trahissent les promesses que Nature leur auoit plantées au front. Ie punirois plus aigrement la malice, en vne apparence debonnaire. Il semble qu'il y ait aucuns visages heureux, d'autres malencontreux. Et crois, qu'il y a quelque art, à distinguer les visages debonnaires des niais, les seueres des rudes, les malicieux des chagrins, les desdaigneux des melancholiques, et telles autres qualitez voisines. Il y a des beautez, non fieres seulement, mais aigres: il y en a d'autres douces, et encores au delà, fades. D'en prognostiquer les auantures futures, ce sont matieres que ie laisse indecises.

ENGLISH

tain inner dispositions and our future fortunes, do not fall very directly and simply under the heading of beauty and ugliness. Any more than every pleasant smell and every clear sky promises health, or every heaviness and stench promises infection, in time of plague. Those who accuse ladies of belying their beauty by their character do not always hit the mark. For a face that is not very well composed may harbor an air of honesty and trustworthiness; just as, conversely, I have sometimes read between two beautiful eyes the threat of a malignant and dangerous nature.

There are favorable physiognomies. In a crowd of victorious enemies, among men you do not know, you will immediately choose one rather than another to surrender to and entrust your life to, and not strictly on account of beauty.

Looks are a weak guarantee; still, they count for something. If I had to whip the wicked, I would whip more harshly those who belie and betray the promises that Nature had planted on their brows. I would punish malice more severely in a kindly appearance. It seems that some faces are lucky and others unlucky. And I believe there is some skill in telling kindly faces from simple ones, stern from rough, malicious from sullen, disdainful from melancholy, and other such neighboring qualities. There are beauties that are not only proud but sour; there are others that are sweet, and beyond that, insipid. As for foretelling future events from them, those are matters I leave undecided.

GOODNESS FROM NATURE

Goodness should grow from nature and reason, not from hope and fear.

FRENCH

3.12.21 I'ay pris, comme i'ay dict ailleurs, bien simplement et cruëment, pour mon regard, ce precepte ancien: Que nous ne sçaurions faillir à suiure Nature: que le souuerain precepte, c'est de se conformer à elle. Ie n'ay pas corrigé comme Socrates, par la force de la raison, mes complexions naturelles: et n'ay aucunement troublé par art, mon inclination. Ie me laisse aller, comme ie suis venu. Ie ne combats rien. Mes deux maistresses pieces viuent de leur grace en paix et bon accord: mais le laict de ma nourrice a esté, Dieu mercy, mediocrement sain et temperé.

ENGLISH

As I have said elsewhere, I have taken quite simply and crudely, for my own part, this ancient precept: that we cannot go wrong in following Nature, that the sovereign precept is to conform to her. I have not, like Socrates, corrected my natural dispositions by force of reason, nor in any way disturbed my inclination by art. I let myself go as I came. I fight nothing. My two chief parts live of their own accord in peace and good harmony; but my nurse's milk was, thank God, reasonably healthy and temperate.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Diray-ie cecy en passant: que ie voy tenir en plus de prix qu'elle ne vaut, qui est seule quasi en vsage entre nous, certaine image de preud'hommie scholastique, serue des preceptes, contraincte soubs l'esperance et la crainte? Ie l'aime telle que loix et religions, non facent, mais parfacent, et authorisent: qui se sente dequoy se soustenir sans aide: née en nous de ses propres racines, par la semence de la raison vniuerselle, empreinte en tout homme non desnaturé. Cette raison, qui redresse Socrates de son vicieux ply, le rend obeïssant aux hommes et aux Dieux, qui commandent en sa ville: courageux en la mort, non parce que son ame est immortelle, mais parce qu'il est mortel.	May I say this in passing? I see a certain image of school-taught goodness held in higher esteem than it is worth, though it is almost the only kind in use among us: a slave to precepts, held down by hope and fear. I love goodness of the kind that laws and religions do not make but perfect and authorize; that feels it has the means to stand without help; that is born in us from its own roots, from the seed of universal reason imprinted in every man who is not unnatural. This reason, which straightens Socrates out of his vicious bent, makes him obedient to the men and gods who command in his city, and courageous in death, not because his soul is immortal but because he is mortal.
Ruineuse instruction à toute police, et bien plus dommageable qu'ingenieuse et subtile, qui persuade aux peuples, la religieuse creance suffire seule, et sans les mœurs, à contenter la diuine iustice. L'vsage nous faict veoir, vne distinction enorme, entre la deuotion et la conscience.	It is a ruinous teaching for any government, and much more harmful than it is ingenious and subtle, that persuades peoples that religious belief alone, without morals, is enough to satisfy divine justice. Experience shows us an enormous difference between devotion and conscience.

SAVED BY HIS FACE

Twice his open face and frank speech disarmed men who meant to seize him.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.12.22 I'ay vne apparence fauorable, et en forme et en interpretation. Quid dixi habere me? Imò habui Chreme! / Heu tantùm attriti corporis ossa vides! Et qui faict vne contraire montre à celle de Socrates. Il m'est souuent aduenu, que sur le simple credit de ma presence, et de mon air, des personnes qui n'auoient aucune cognoissance de moy, s'y sont grandement fiées, soit pour leurs propres affaires, soit pour les miennes. Et en ay tiré és païs estrangers des faueurs singulieres et rares. Mais ces deux experiences, valent à l'auanture, que ie les recite particulierement. Vn quidam delibera de surprendre ma maison et moy. Son art fut, d'arriuer seul à ma porte, et d'en presser vn peu instamment l'entrée.	I have a favorable appearance, both in its features and in how it is read. Did I say I have? No, I had, Chremes! / Alas, you see only the bones of a worn-out body! And it makes the opposite impression to Socrates'. It has often happened that people who did not know me at all have relied on me greatly, on the mere credit of my presence and my air, whether in their own affairs or in mine. And in foreign countries I have obtained singular and rare favors from it. But the following two experiences are perhaps worth telling in detail. A certain fellow made a plan to take my house and me by surprise. His trick was to arrive alone at my gate and press rather urgently to be let in.[30]
Ie le cognoissois de nom, et auois occasion de me fier de luy, comme de mon voisin et aucunement mon allié. Ie luy fis ouurir comme ie fais à chacun. Le voicy tout effroyé, son cheual hors d'haleine, fort harassé. Il m'entretint de cette fable: Qu'il venoit d'estre rencontré à vne demie lieuë de là, par vn sien ennemy, lequel ie cognoissois aussi, et auois ouy parler de leur querelle:	I knew him by name, and had reason to trust him as my neighbor and in some degree my relation by marriage. I had the gate opened for him, as I do for everyone. There he is, all terrified, his horse out of breath, very worn out. He regaled me with this tale: that he had just been set upon half a league

30 The first line is from Terence, The Self-Tormentor; the second from the elegies of Maximianus.

FRENCH

que cet ennemy luy auoit merueilleusement chaussé les esperons: et qu'ayant esté surpris en desarroy et plus foible en nombre, il s'estoit ietté à ma porte à sauueté. Qu'il estoit en grand peine de ses gens, lesquels il disoit tenir pour morts ou prins. I'essayay tout naïfuement de le conforter, asseurer, et refreschir.

Tantost apres, voila quatre ou cinq de ses soldats, qui se presentent en mesme contenance, et effroy, pour entrer: et puis d'autres, et d'autres encores apres, bien equippez, et bien armez: iusques à vingt cinq ou trante, feignants auoir leur ennemy aux talons. Ce mystere commençoit à taster mon soupçon. Ie n'ignorois pas en quel siecle ie viuois, combien ma maison pouuoit estre enuiée, et auois plusieurs exemples d'autres de ma cognoissance, à qui il estoit mes-aduenu de mesme. Tant y a, que trouuant qu'il n'y auoit point d'acquest d'auoir commencé à faire plaisir, si ie n'acheuois, et ne pouuant me deffaire sans tout rompre; ie me laissay aller au party le plus naturel et le plus simple, comme ie fais tousiours: commendant qu'ils entrassent.

Aussi à la verité, ie suis peu deffiant et soupçonneux de ma nature. Ie panche volontiers vers l'excuse, et l'interpretation plus douce. Ie prens les hommes selon le commun ordre, et ne croy pas ces inclinations peruerses et desnaturées, si ie n'y suis forcé par grand tesmoignage; non plus que les monstres et miracles. Et suis homme en outre, qui me commets volontiers à la Fortune, et me laisse aller à corps perdu, entre ses bras. Dequoy iusques à cette heure i'ay eu plus d'occasion de me louër, que de me plaindre. Et l'ay trouuée et plus auisée, et plus amie de mes affaires, que ie ne suis.

Il y a quelques actions en ma vie, desquelles on peut iustement nommer la conduite difficile; ou, qui voudra, prudente. De celles-là mesmes, posez, que la tierce partie soit du mien, certes les deux tierces sont richement à elle. Nous faillons, ce me semble, en ce que nous ne nous fions pas assez au ciel de nous. Et pretendons plus de nostre conduite, qu'il ne nous appartient. Pourtant fouruoyent si souuent nos desseins. Il est enuieux de l'estenduë, que nous attribuons aux droicts de l'humaine prudence, au preiudice des siens. Et nous les racourcit d'autant plus, que nous les amplifions.

Ceux-cy se tindrent à cheual, en ma cour: le chef auec moy dans ma sale, qui n'auoit voulu qu'on establast son away by an enemy of his, whom I also knew (I had heard about their quarrel); that this enemy had chased him hard; and that, having been caught in disarray and outnumbered, he had thrown himself at my gate for safety. He was very worried about his men, he said, whom he believed dead or captured. I quite innocently tried to comfort, reassure and refresh him.

ENGLISH

Soon after, here come four or five of his soldiers, with the same bearing and the same fright, asking to come in; then others, and still others after them, well equipped and well armed, up to twenty-five or thirty, pretending to have their enemy at their heels. This mystery began to stir my suspicion. I knew very well what age I was living in, and how much my house might be coveted, and I knew several people of my acquaintance to whom the same misfortune had happened. Be that as it may, finding that there was nothing to be gained by beginning to do a kindness if I did not finish it, and unable to get out of it without breaking off entirely, I let myself go along the most natural and simplest course, as I always do, and ordered that they be let in.

Besides, to tell the truth, I am by nature not very distrustful or suspicious. I readily lean toward excuse and the gentler interpretation. I take men according to the common order, and I do not believe in perverse and unnatural inclinations unless strong evidence forces me to, any more than in monsters and miracles. Moreover, I am a man who readily commits himself to Fortune and throws himself headlong into her arms. So far I have had more cause to congratulate myself on this than to complain. I have found her both wiser and better disposed toward my affairs than I am.

There are some actions in my life whose conduct may justly be called difficult, or, if you like, prudent. Even of those, suppose a third is my own: the other two thirds are certainly and richly hers. We go wrong, it seems to me, in not entrusting ourselves enough to heaven, and in claiming more for our own conduct than is our due. That is why our plans so often go astray. Heaven is jealous of the scope we give to the rights of human prudence at the expense of its own, and it cuts them down for us all the more, the more we enlarge them.

These men stayed on horseback in my courtyard. The leader was with me in my hall; he had refused cheual, disant auoir à se retirer incontinent qu'il auroit eu nouuelles de ses hommes. Il se veid maistre de son entreprinse: et n'y restoit sur ce poinct, que l'execution. Souuent depuis il a dict, car il ne craignoit pas de faire ce conte, que mon visage, et ma franchise, luy auoient arraché la trahison des poings. Il remonte à cheual, ses gens ayants continuellement les yeux sur luy, pour voir quel signe il leur donneroit: bien estonnez de le voir sortir et abandonner son aduantage.

FRENCH

3.12.23 Vne autre fois, me fiant à ie ne sçay quelle treue, qui venoit d'estre publiée en nos armées, ie m'acheminay à vn voyage, par païs estrangement chatoüilleux. Ie ne fus pas si tost esuenté, que voila trois ou quatre caualcades de diuers lieux pour m'attraper. L'vne me ioignit à la troisieme iournée: où ie fus chargé par quinze ou vingt Gentils-hommes masquez, suiuis d'vne ondée d'argoulets. Me voila pris et rendu, retiré dans l'espais d'vne forest voisine, desmonté, deualizé, mes cofres fouillez, ma boite prise, cheuaux et esquipage dispersé à nouueaux maistres. Nous fusmes long temps à contester dans ce halier, sur le faict de ma rançon: qu'ils me tailloient si haute, qu'il paroissoit bien que ie ne leur estois guere cogneu.

Ils entrerent en grande contestation de ma vie. De vray, il y auoit plusieurs circonstances, qui me menassoyent du danger où i'en estois. Tunc animis opus, Ænea, tunc pectore firmo. Ie me maintins tousiours sur le tiltre de ma trefue, à leur quitter seulement le gain qu'ils auoient faict de ma despouille, qui n'estoit pas à mespriser, sans promesse d'autre rançon.

Apres deux ou trois heures, que nous eusmes esté là, et qu'ils m'eurent faict monter sur vn cheual, qui n'auoit garde de leur eschapper, et commis ma conduicte particuliere à quinze ou vingt harquebusiers, et dispersé mes gens à d'autres, ayant ordonné qu'on nous menast prisonniers, diuerses routes, et moy desia acheminé à deux ou trois harquebusades de là, Iam prece Pollucis, iam Castoris implorata: voicy vne soudaine et tres-inopinée mutation qui leur print. Ie vis reuenir à moy le chef, auec paroles plus douces: se mettant en peine de rechercher en la trouppe mes hardes escartées, et me les faisant to have his horse stabled, saying he would have to leave as soon as he had news of his men. He saw himself master of his enterprise, and at that point nothing remained but the execution. He has often said since (for he was not afraid to tell this story) that my face and my frankness had wrested the treachery from his grip. He gets back on his horse, his men keeping their eyes on him constantly to see what signal he would give them, and quite stunned to see him ride out and abandon his advantage.

ENGLISH

Another time, trusting to some truce or other that had just been proclaimed in our armies, I set out on a journey through strangely ticklish country. No sooner had word of me got out than three or four troops of horsemen set off from various places to catch me. One of them overtook me on the third day, and I was charged by fifteen or twenty masked gentlemen, followed by a wave of mounted arquebusiers. There I am, taken and surrendered, led into the thick of a nearby forest, unhorsed, robbed, my chests searched, my money box taken, my horses and gear shared out among new masters. We spent a long time arguing in that thicket over my ransom, which they set so high that it was quite plain they hardly knew who I was.

They fell into a great argument over my life. And in truth there were several circumstances that showed me the danger I was in. Then was the time for courage, Aeneas, then for a steady heart. I kept standing on the terms of my truce, offering to leave them only what they had gained by stripping me, which was not to be despised, with no promise of any other ransom.[31]

We had been there two or three hours; they had put me on a horse that had no chance of getting away from them, assigned fifteen or twenty arquebusiers to guard me in particular, and split my people among others, with orders to take us away as prisoners by different roads; and I was already two or three arquebus shots away, after prayers to Pollux, after pleas to Castor, when suddenly a most unexpected change came over them. I saw the leader come back to me with gentler words, taking pains to search through the troop for my scattered rendre, selon qu'il s'en pouuoit recouurer, iusques à ma boite.

31 Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

Le meilleur present qu'ils me firent, ce fut en fin ma liberté: le reste ne me touchoit gueres en ce temps-là. La vraye cause d'vn changement si nouueau, et de ce rauisement, sans aucune impulsion apparente, et d'vn repentir si miraculeux, en tel temps, en vne entreprinse pourpensée et deliberée, et deuenue iuste par l'vsage, (car d'arriuée ie leur confessay ouuertement le party duquel i'estois, et le chemin que ie tenois) certes ie ne sçay pas bien encores quelle elle est. Le plus apparent qui se demasqua, et me fit cognoistre son nom, me redist lors plusieurs fois, que ie deuoy cette deliurance à mon visage, liberté, et fermeté de mes parolles, qui me rendoient indigne d'vne telle mes-aduenture, me demanda asseurance d'vne pareille.

Il est possible, que la bonté diuine se voulut seruir de ce vain instrument pour ma conseruation. Elle me deffendit encore lendemain d'autres pires embusches, desquelles ceux-cy mesme m'auoient aduerty. Le dernier est encore en pieds, pour en faire le conte: le premier fut tué il n'y a pas long temps.

3.12.24 Si mon visage ne respondoit pour moy, si on ne lisoit en mes yeux, et en ma voix, la simplicité de mon intention, ie n'eusse pas duré sans querelle, et sans offence, si long temps: auec cette indiscrette liberté, de dire à tort et à droict, ce qui me vient en fantasie, et iuger temerairement des choses. Cette façon peut paroistre auec raison inciuile, et mal accommodée à nostre vsage: mais outrageuse et malitieuse, ie n'ay veu personne qui l'en ait iugée: ny qui se soit piqué de ma liberté, s'il l'a receuë de ma bouche. Les paroles redites, ont comme autre son, autre sens. Aussi ne hay-ie personne.

Et suis si lasche à offencer, que pour le seruice de la raison mesme, ie ne le puis faire. Et lors que l'occasion m'a conuié aux condemnations criminelles, i'ay plustost manqué à la iustice. Vt magis peccari nolim, quàm satis animi ad vindicanda peccata habeam. On reprochoit, dit-on, à Aristote, d'auoir esté trop misericordieux enuers vn meschant homme: I'ay esté de vray, dit-il, misericordieux belongings and having them returned to me, as far as they could be recovered, right down to my money box.[32]

ENGLISH

The best present they gave me, in the end, was my freedom; the rest hardly mattered to me at the time. The true cause of so novel a change, of this second thought without any apparent impulse, of so miraculous a repentance at such a time, in an enterprise planned and deliberate and made legitimate by common practice (for at the outset I openly admitted to them which party I belonged to and which road I was taking): truly I still do not quite know what it was. The most prominent of them, who took off his mask and told me his name, said to me several times then that I owed my deliverance to my face and to the freedom and firmness of my words, which made me undeserving of such a misadventure; and he asked me to pledge him the same in return.

It is possible that divine goodness chose to use this vain instrument for my preservation. It protected me again the next day from other, worse ambushes, of which these very men had warned me. The leader of the second band is still on his feet to tell the story; the man in the first was killed not long ago.

If my face did not answer for me, if people did not read the simplicity of my intentions in my eyes and my voice, I would not have lasted so long without quarrels and without giving offense, given this indiscreet freedom of mine to say, rightly or wrongly, whatever comes into my head, and to judge things rashly. This manner may reasonably seem uncivil and ill-suited to our customs; but I have never seen anyone judge it outrageous or malicious, nor anyone take offense at my freedom if he heard it from my own mouth. Words repeated have, as it were, a different sound and a different sense. Besides, I hate nobody.

And I am so slack at giving offense that I cannot do it even in the service of reason. When occasion has called me to pass criminal sentences, I have rather fallen short of justice. So that I would rather sins were not committed than have the heart to punish them. Aristotle, they say, was reproached for having been too merciful to a wicked man. "I have in-32 Catullus. Castor and Pollux were invoked as protectors of travelers in danger.

FRENCH

enuers l'homme, non enuers la meschanceté. Les iugements ordinaires, s'exasperent à la punition par l'horreur du meffaict. Cela mesme refroidit le mien. L'horreur du premier meurtre, m'en faict craindre vn second. Et la laideur de la premiere cruauté m'en faict abhorrer toute imitation.

A moy, qui ne suis qu'escuyer de trefles, peut toucher, ce qu'on disoit de Charillus Roy de Sparte: Il ne sçauroit estre bon, puis qu'il n'est pas mauuais aux meschans. Ou bien ainsi: car Plutarque le presente en ces deux sortes, comme mille autres choses diuersement et contrairement: Il faut bien qu'il soit bon, puis qu'il l'est aux meschants mesme. De mesme qu'aux actions legitimes, ie me fasche de m'y employer, quand c'est enuers ceux qui s'en desplaisent: aussi à dire verité, aux illegitimes, ie ne fay pas assez de conscience, de m'y employer, quand c'est enuers ceux qui y consentent.

ENGLISH

deed been merciful," he said, "to the man, not to the wickedness." Ordinary judgments are stirred to punish by the horror of the crime. That very horror cools mine. The horror of the first murder makes me fear a second; and the ugliness of the first cruelty makes me abhor any imitation of it.[33]

To me, who am only the jack of clubs, may apply what was said of Charillus, king of Sparta: "He cannot be good, since he is not bad to the wicked." Or else this way, for Plutarch gives it both ways, as he gives a thousand other things in different and contrary forms: "He must indeed be good, since he is good even to the wicked." Just as, in lawful actions, I am reluctant to take part when it is against people who dislike it, so too, to tell the truth, in unlawful ones I am not scrupulous enough about taking part when it is with people who consent to it.[34]

33 Livy, History of Rome.
34 Charillus was an early king of Sparta; the sayings come from Plutarch. The jack of clubs, a low court card, stands for a person of no consequence.

III.13 Of Experience

De l'Experience

Montaigne finds laws and reason too weak to capture life's variety and turns to self-knowledge, health, and enjoying ordinary living.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.13.1 IL n'est desir plus naturel que le desir de cognoissance. Nous essayons tous les moyens qui nous y peuuent mener. Quand la raison nous faut, nous y employons l'experience. Per varios vsus artem experientia fecit: / Exemplo monstrante viam. Qui est vn moyen de beaucoup plus foible et plus vil. Mais la verité est chose si grande, que nous ne deuons desdaigner aucune entremise qui nous y conduise. La raison a tant de formes, que nous ne sçauons à laquelle nous prendre. L'experience n'en a pas moins. La consequence que nous voulons tirer de la conference des euenemens, est mal seure, d'autant qu'ils sont tousiours dissemblables. Il n'est aucune qualité si vniuerselle, en cette image des choses, que la diuersité et varieté.

There is no desire more natural than the desire for knowledge. We try every means that can lead us to it. When reason fails us, we use experience: Through various trials experience created art, / Example showing the way. It is a much weaker and humbler means. But truth is so great a thing that we must not disdain any channel that leads us to it. Reason has so many forms that we do not know which one to take hold of. Experience has no fewer. The inference we try to draw from comparing events is unreliable, because they are always unlike. In this image of things, no quality is so universal as diversity and variety.[1]

Et les Grecs, et les Latins, et nous, pour le plus expres exemple de similitude, nous seruons de celuy des œufs. Toutesfois il s'est trouué des hommes, et notamment vn en Delphes, qui recognoissoit des marques de difference entre les œufs, si qu'il n'en prenoit iamais l'vn pour l'autre. Et y ayant plusieurs poules, sçauoit iuger de laquelle estoit l'œuf. La dissimilitude s'ingere d'elle-mesme en nos ouurages, nul art peut arriuer à la similitude. Ny Perrozet ny autre, ne peut si soigneusement polir et blanchir l'enuers de ses cartes, qu'aucuns ioueurs ne les distinguent, à les voir seulement couler par les mains d'vn autre. La ressemblance ne faict pas tant, vn, comme la difference faict, autre.

The Greeks, the Latins and we ourselves all use eggs as the most telling example of likeness. Yet there have been men, notably one at Delphi, who could recognize marks of difference between eggs, so that he never took one for another; and when there were several hens, he could tell which one an egg came from. Dissimilarity intrudes of itself into our works; no art can achieve similarity. Neither Perrozet nor anyone else can polish and whiten the backs of his cards so carefully that some players cannot tell them apart just by watching them slip through another player's hands. Resemblance does not make things one so much as difference makes them other.[2]

Nature s'est obligée à ne rien faire autre, qui ne fust dissemblable.

Nature has bound herself to make nothing that is not unlike everything else.

LAWS AND INTERPRETATION

Multiplying laws and glosses breeds more doubt and more lawsuits, not fewer.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.13.2 Pourtant, l'opinion de celuy-là ne me plaist guere, qui pensoit par la multitude des loix, brider l'authorité des

That is why I hardly like the opinion of the man who thought he could curb the authority of judges iuges, en leur taillant leurs morceaux. Il ne sentoit point, qu'il y a autant de liberté et d'estenduë à l'interpretation des loix, qu'à leur façon. Et ceux-là se moquent, qui pensent appetisser nos debats, et les arrester, en nous r'appellant à l'expresse parolle de la Bible. D'autant que nostre esprit ne trouue pas le champ moins spatieux, à contre-roller le sens d'autruy, qu'à representer le sien: et comme s'il y auoit moins d'animosité et d'aspreté à gloser qu'à inuenter. Nous voyons, combien il se trompoit.

FRENCH

Car nous auons en France, plus de loix que tout le reste du monde ensemble; et plus qu'il n'en faudroit à regler tous les mondes d'Epicurus: Vt olim flagitijs, sic nunc legibus laboramus: et si auons tant laissé à opiner et decider à nos iuges, qu'il ne fut iamais liberté si puissante et si licencieuse. Qu'ont gaigné nos legislateurs à choisir cent mille especes et faicts particuliers, et y attacher cent mille loix? Ce nombre n'a aucune proportion, auec l'infinie diuersité des actions humaines. La multiplication de nos inuentions, n'arriuera pas à la variation des exemples.

Adioustez y en cent fois autant: il n'aduiendra pas pourtant, que des euenemens à venir, il s'en trouue aucun, qui en tout ce grand nombre de milliers d'euenemens choisis et enregistrez, en rencontre vn, auquel il se puisse ioindre et apparier, si exactement, qu'il n'y reste quelque circonstance et diuersité, qui requiere diuerse consideration de iugement. Il y a peu de relation de nos actions, qui sont en perpetuelle mutation, auec les loix fixes et immobiles. Les plus desirables, ce sont les plus rares, plus simples, et generales. Et encore crois-ie, qu'il vaudroit mieux n'en auoir point du tout, que de les auoir en tel nombre que nous auons. Nature les donne tousiours plus heureuses, que ne sont celles que nous nous donnons.

Tesmoing la peinture de l'aage doré des poëtes: et l'estat où nous voyons viure les nations, qui n'en ont point d'autres. En voila, qui pour tous iuges, employent en leurs causes, le premier passant, qui voyage le long de leurs montaignes. Et ces autres, eslisent le iour du marché, quelqu'vn d'entr'eux, qui sur le champ decide by a multitude of laws, cutting up their portions for them. He did not perceive that there is as much freedom and latitude in interpreting laws as in making them. And those people are making fun of us who think they can reduce and halt our disputes by calling us back to the express words of the Bible: as if our mind did not find as wide a field in checking someone else's meaning as in presenting its own, and as if there were less animosity and bitterness in glossing than in inventing. We can see how mistaken he was.

ENGLISH

For we have more laws in France than all the rest of the world put together, and more than would be needed to govern all the worlds of Epicurus: As once we suffered from crimes, so now we suffer from laws. And yet we have left so much to our judges' opinion and decision that there was never a liberty so powerful and so licentious. What have our legislators gained by singling out a hundred thousand particular kinds of cases and facts and attaching a hundred thousand laws to them? That number bears no proportion to the infinite diversity of human actions. Multiplying our inventions will never catch up with the variety of cases.[3]

Add a hundred times as many: still it will not happen that any future event finds, among all those many thousands of events selected and recorded, one that it can be joined and matched with so exactly that there does not remain some circumstance or difference requiring a different judgment. There is little relation between our actions, which are in perpetual change, and fixed, immovable laws. The most desirable laws are the fewest, the simplest and the most general. And even so, I believe it would be better to have none at all than to have them in such numbers as we do. Nature always gives happier ones than those we give ourselves.

Witness the poets' picture of the golden age, and the state in which we see nations live that have no laws but hers. Here are some who, for their only judge, use in their disputes the first passerby traveling along their mountains. And these others choose one of their number on market day, who

2 Perrozet was a well-known card maker of Montaigne's time.
1 Manilius, Astronomica.
3 Tacitus, Annals. Epicurus taught that there are innumerable worlds.

FRENCH

tous leurs proces. Quel danger y auroit-il, que les plus sages vuidassent ainsi les nostres, selon les occurrences, et à l'œil; sans obligation d'exemple, et de consequence? A chaque pied son soulier. Le Roy Ferdinand, enuoyant des colonies aux Indes, prouueut sagement qu'on n'y menast aucuns escholiers de la jurisprudence: de crainte, que les proces ne peuplassent en ce nouueau monde.

Comme estant science de sa nature, generatrice d'altercation et diuision, iugeant auec Platon, que c'est vne mauuaise prouision de païs, que iurisconsultes, et medecins.

3.13.3 Pourquoy est-ce, que notre langage commun, si aisé à tout autre vsage, deuient obscur et non intelligible, en contract et testament: et que celuy qui s'exprime si clairement, quoy qu'il die et escriue, ne trouue en cela, aucune maniere de se declarer, qui ne tombe en doute et contradiction?

Si ce n'est, que les Princes de cet art s'appliquans d'vne peculiere attention, à trier des mots solemnes, et former des clauses artistes, ont tant poisé chasque syllabe, espluché si primement chasque espece de couture, que les voila enfrasquez et embrouillez en l'infinité des figures, et si menuës partitions: qu'elles ne peuuent plus tomber soubs aucun reglement et prescription, ny aucune certaine intelligence: Confusum est quidquid vsque in puluerem sectum est. Qui a veu des enfans, essayans de renger à certain nombre, vne masse d'argent vif: plus ils le pressent et pestrissent, et s'estudient à le contraindre à leur loy, plus ils irritent la liberté de ce genereux metal: il fuit à leur art, et se va menuisant et esparpillant, au delà de tout conte.

C'est de mesme; car en subdiuisant ces subtilitez, on apprend aux hommes d'accroistre les doubtes: on nous met en train, d'estendre et diuersifier les difficultez: on les allonge, on les disperse. En semant les questions et les retaillant, on faict fructifier et foisonner le monde, en incertitude et en querelle. Comme la terre se rend fertile, plus elle est esmiée et profondement remuée. Difficultatem facit doctrina. Nous doutions sur Vlpian, et redoutons encore sur Bartolus et Baldus. Il falloit effacer la trace de cette diuersité innumerable d'opinions: non point s'en parer, et en entester la posterité. Ie ne sçay decides all their lawsuits on the spot. What danger would there be in having the wisest settle ours in the same way, case by case and by eye, without being bound by precedent and consequence? For each foot its own shoe. King Ferdinand, when he sent colonists to the Indies, wisely provided that no students of law should be taken there, for fear that lawsuits would breed in that new world.[4]

ENGLISH

He regarded it as a science that by its very nature breeds altercation and division, and judged with Plato that lawyers and physicians are a poor stock for a country.

Why is it that our common language, so easy for every other use, becomes obscure and unintelligible in contracts and wills, and that a man who expresses himself so clearly in whatever he says or writes can find no way of stating his meaning in these that does not fall into doubt and contradiction?

Unless it is that the princes of this art, applying themselves with special care to picking solemn words and framing artful clauses, have weighed every syllable and examined every kind of seam so minutely that they are now tangled and muddled in an infinity of figures and in such fine distinctions that these can no longer come under any rule or prescription, or any definite understanding. Whatever is cut up into dust is confused. Whoever has seen children trying to divide a mass of quicksilver into a set number of parts knows that the more they press and knead it and strive to force it to their law, the more they provoke the freedom of this noble metal: it eludes their skill and keeps breaking up and scattering beyond all count.[5]

It is the same here: by subdividing these subtleties, people are taught to multiply doubts; we are set on the road to extending and diversifying difficulties; we lengthen them, we scatter them. By sowing questions and pruning them, we make the world bear fruit and teem with uncertainty and quarrels, just as the earth grows more fertile the more finely it is broken up and the more deeply it is turned. Learning creates difficulty. We had doubts about Ulpian, and we have doubts all

4 Ferdinand II of Aragon (1452–1516), who with Isabella of Castile sponsored Columbus.
5 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

qu'en dire: mais il se sent par experience, que tant d'interpretations dissipent la verité, et la rompent.

Aristote a escrit pour être entendu; s'il ne l'a peu, moins le fera vn moins habille: et vn tiers, que celuy qui traicte sa propre imagination. Nous ouurons la matiere, et l'espandons en la destrempant. D'vn subiect nous en faisons mille: et retombons en multipliant et subdiuisant, à l'infinité des atomes d'Epicurus. Iamais deux hommes ne iugerent pareillement de mesme chose. Et est impossible de voir deux opinions semblables exactement: non seulement en diuers hommes, mais en mesme homme, à diuerses heures. Ordinairement ie trouue à doubter, en ce que le commentaire n'a daigné toucher. Ie bronche plus volontiers en païs plat: comme certains cheuaux, que ie cognois, qui choppent plus souuent en chemin vny.

3.13.4 Qui ne diroit que les gloses augmentent les doubtes et l'ignorance, puis qu'il ne se voit aucun liure, soit humain, soit diuin, sur qui le monde s'embesongne, duquel l'interpretation face tarir la difficulté? Le centiesme commentaire, le renuoye à son suiuant, plus espineux, et plus scabreux, que le premier ne l'auoit trouué. Quand est-il conuenu entre nous, ce liure en a assez, il n'y a meshuy plus que dire? Cecy se voit mieux en la chicane. On donne authorité de loy à infinis docteurs, infinis arrests, et à autant d'interpretations. Trouuons nous pourtant quelque fin au besoin d'interpreter? s'y voit-il quelque progrez et aduancement vers la tranquillité?

nous faut-il moins d'aduocats et de iuges, que lors que cette masse de droict, estoit encore en sa premiere enfance? Au contraire, nous obscurcissons et enseuelissons l'intelligence. Nous ne la descouurons plus, qu'à la mercy de tant de clostures et barrieres. Les hommes mescognoissent la maladie naturelle de leur esprit. Il ne faict que fureter et quester; et va sans cesse, tournoyant, bastissant, et s'empestrant, en sa besongne: comme nos vers à soye, et s'y estouffe. Mus in pice. Il pense remarquer de loing, ie ne sçay quelle apparence de over again about Bartolus and Baldus. The traces of this countless diversity of opinions should have been wiped out, not paraded as ornaments and drummed into posterity's heads. I do not know what to say about it; but experience makes us feel that so many interpretations dissipate the truth and break it.[6]

ENGLISH

Aristotle wrote to be understood. If he could not manage it, a less able man will manage it even less, and a third party less than the man who was treating his own ideas. We open up the matter and spread it out by diluting it. Out of one subject we make a thousand, and by multiplying and subdividing we end up in the infinity of Epicurus's atoms. Never did two men judge the same thing alike. And it is impossible to find two opinions exactly alike, not only in different men but in the same man at different times. I usually find something to doubt in what the commentary has not deigned to touch. I stumble more readily on flat ground, like certain horses I know that trip more often on a smooth road.

Who would not say that glosses increase doubt and ignorance, since there is no book, human or divine, that the world busies itself with whose interpretation makes the difficulty dry up? The hundredth commentary hands it on to the next one thornier and more rugged than the first had found it. When have we ever agreed among ourselves: this book has had enough, there is nothing more to say about it now? This is best seen in legal wrangling. We give the authority of law to countless doctors, countless rulings and as many interpretations. Do we find any end, for all that, to the need to interpret? Is there any progress or advance toward tranquility to be seen?

Do we need fewer lawyers and judges than when this mass of law was still in its first infancy? On the contrary, we obscure and bury understanding. We can no longer reach it except at the mercy of so many fences and barriers. Men do not recognize the natural sickness of their mind. It does nothing but ferret and search, and goes on endlessly circling, building and entangling itself in its own work, like our silkworms, and suffocates in it. A mouse in pitch. It thinks it can make out in the dis-

6 Quintilian, The Orator's Education. Ulpian was a Roman jurist of the 3rd century AD; Bartolus and Baldus were famous 14th-century Italian commentators on Roman law.

FRENCH

clarté et verité imaginaire: mais pendant qu'il y court, tant de difficultez luy trauersent la voye, d'empeschemens et de nouuelles questes, qu'elles l'esgarent et l'enyurent.

Non guere autrement, qu'il aduint aux chiens d'Esope, lesquels descouurans quelque apparence de corps mort flotter en mer, et ne le pouuans approcher, entreprindrent de boire cette eau, d'asseicher le passage, et s'y estoufferent. A quoy se rencontre, ce qu'vn Crates disoit des escrits de Heraclitus, qu'ils auoient besoin d'vn lecteur bon nageur, afin que la profondeur et pois de sa doctrine, ne l'engloutist et suffoquast.

3.13.5 Ce n'est rien que foiblesse particuliere, qui nous faict contenter de ce que d'autres, ou que nous-mesmes auons trouué en cette chasse de cognoissance: vn plus habile ne s'en contentera pas. Il y a tousiours place pour vn suiuant, ouy et pour nous mesmes, et route par ailleurs. Il n'y a point de fin en nos inquisitions. Nostre fin est en l'autre monde. C'est signe de racourcissement d'esprit, quand il se contente: ou signe de lasseté. Nul esprit genereux, ne s'arreste en soy. Il pretend tousiours, et va outre ses forces. Il a des eslans au delà de ses effects. S'il ne s'auance, et ne se presse, et ne s'accule, et ne se choque et tourneuire, il n'est vif qu'à demy.

Ses poursuites sont sans terme, et sans forme. Son aliment, c'est admiration, chasse, ambiguité. Ce que declaroit assez Apollo, parlant tousiours à nous doublement, obscurement et obliquement: ne nous repaissant pas, mais nous amusant et embesongnant. C'est vn mouuement irregulier, perpetuel, sans patron et sans but. Ses inuentions s'eschauffent, se suiuent, et s'entreproduisent l'vne l'autre. Ainsi voit-on en vn ruisseau coulant,
Sans fin l'vne eau, apres l'autre roulant,
Et tout de rang, d'vn eternel conduict;
L'vne suit l'autre, et l'vne l'autre fuit.
Par cette-cy, celle-là est poussée,
Et cette-cy, par l'autre est deuancée:
Tousiours l'eau va dans l'eau, et tousiours est ce
Mesme ruisseau, et tousiours eau diuerse.

3.13.6 Il y a plus affaire à interpreter les interpretations, qu'à interpreter les choses: et plus de liures sur les liures, que

ENGLISH

tance some sort of glimmer of light and imaginary truth; but while it runs toward it, so many difficulties, obstacles and new quests cross its path that they lead it astray and make it drunk.[7]

It is not much different from what happened to Aesop's dogs. Spotting what looked like a dead body floating in the sea, and being unable to get near it, they set about drinking up the water to dry a path to it, and choked. This fits with what one Crates said of the writings of Heraclitus: that they needed a reader who was a good swimmer, so that the depth and weight of his doctrine would not swallow him up and drown him.

It is nothing but individual weakness that makes us content with what others, or we ourselves, have found in this hunt for knowledge; an abler man will not be content with it. There is always room for a successor, yes, and for ourselves, and a road somewhere else. There is no end to our inquiries; our end is in the other world. It is a sign of a shrunken mind when the mind is content, or a sign of weariness. No noble mind stops within itself; it is always reaching and goes beyond its strength; its leaps outrun its achievements. If it does not push forward, press on, back itself into a corner, collide and wheel about, it is only half alive.

Its pursuits are without limit and without form. Its food is wonder, the chase, ambiguity. Apollo made this plain enough by always speaking to us in double, obscure and oblique terms, not feeding us but amusing and occupying us. It is an irregular, perpetual motion, without model and without goal. Its inventions excite one another, follow one another and give birth to one another. So in a running stream we see
One water rolling after another without end,
All in order, in an eternal course;
One follows another, and one flees another.
By this one, that one is pushed along,
And this one by the other is outrun:
Always water flows into water, and always it is
The same stream, and always different water.[8]

There is more work in interpreting interpretations than in interpreting things, and more books about 7 A Latin proverb for someone hopelessly stuck, collected in Erasmus's Adages.

8 The verses are by La Boétie.

FRENCH

sur autre subiect. Nous ne faisons que nous entregloser. Tout fourmille de commentaires: d'autheurs, il en est grand cherté. Le principal et plus fameux sçauoir de nos siecles, est-ce pas sçauoir entendre les sçauants? Est-ce pas la fin commune et derniere de touts estudes? Nos opinions s'entent les vnes sur les autres. La premiere sert de tige à la seconde: la seconde à la tierce. Nous eschellons ainsi de degré en degré. Et aduient de là, que le plus haut monté, a souuent plus d'honneur, que de merite. Car il n'est monté que d'vn grain, sur les espaules du penultime.

3.13.7 Combien souuent, et sottement à l'auanture, ay-ie estendu mon liure à parler de soy? Sottement, quand ce ne seroit que pour cette raison: Qu'il me deuoit souuenir, de ce que ie dy des autres, qui en font de mesmes. Que ces œillades si frequentes à leurs ouurages, tesmoignent que le cœur leur frissonne de son amour, et les rudoyements mesmes, desdaigneux dequoy ils le battent, que ce ne sont que mignardises, et affetteries, d'vne faueur maternelle. Suiuant Aristote, à qui, et se priser et se mespriser, naissent souuent de pareil air d'arrogance.

Car mon excuse: Que ie doy auoir en cela plus de liberté que les autres, d'autant qu'à poinct nommé, i'escry de moy, et de mes escrits, comme de mes autres actions: que mon theme se renuerse en soy: ie ne sçay, si chacun la prendra.

3.13.8 I'ay veu en Allemagne, que Luther a laissé autant de diuisions et d'altercations, sur le doubte de ses opinions, et plus, qu'il n'en esmeut sur les escritures sainctes. Nostre contestation est verbale. Ie demande que c'est que nature, volupté, cercle, et substitution. La question est de parolles, et se paye de mesme. Vne pierre c'est vn corps: mais qui presseroit: Et corps qu'est-ce? substance: et substance quoy? ainsi de suitte: acculeroit en fin le respondant au bout de son Calepin. On eschange vn mot pour vn autre mot, et souuent plus incogneu. Ie sçay mieux que c'est qu'homme, que ie ne sçay que c'est animal, ou mortel, ou raisonnable. Pour satisfaire à vn doute, ils m'en donnent trois. C'est la teste d'Hydra.

Socrates demandoit à Memnon, que c'estoit que vertu: Il y a, dist Memnon, vertu d'homme et de femme, de books than about any other subject. We do nothing but gloss one another. Everything swarms with commentaries; of authors there is a great shortage. Is not the principal and most celebrated learning of our times the learning to understand the learned? Is that not the common and final goal of all study? Our opinions are grafted onto one another. The first serves as stock for the second, the second for the third. So we climb from rung to rung. And so it happens that the man who has climbed highest often has more honor than merit, for he has climbed only a grain's height above the shoulders of the one before him.

ENGLISH

How often, and perhaps how foolishly, have I stretched my book to talk about itself? Foolishly, if only for this reason: I ought to have remembered what I say of others who do the same, that these frequent fond glances at their works show that their hearts quiver with love for them, and that even the disdainful roughness with which they beat them is nothing but the coddling and affectation of a mother's fondness. As Aristotle has it, prizing oneself and despising oneself often spring from the same air of arrogance.

As for my excuse, that I ought to have more freedom in this than others, since I write expressly about myself and my writings as about my other actions, and my theme turns back upon itself: I do not know whether everyone will accept it.

I have seen in Germany that Luther has left behind as many divisions and altercations over the doubtful meaning of his opinions as he stirred up over the Holy Scriptures, and more. Our disputes are about words. I ask what nature, pleasure, circle and substitution are. The question is one of words, and is paid in the same coin. A stone is a body. But if someone pressed: "And what is a body?" "Substance." "And what is substance?" and so on, he would end up driving the respondent to the last page of his Calepino. One word is exchanged for another, and often for one less known. I know better what man is than I know what animal is, or mortal, or rational. To settle one doubt, they give me three: it is the Hydra's head.[9]

Socrates asked Meno what virtue was. "There is," said Meno, "the virtue of a man and of a woman, 9 Ambrogio Calepino's Latin dictionary (1502) was so widely used that "calepin" came to mean any dictionary.

FRENCH

magistrat et d'homme priué, d'enfant et de vieillart. Voicy qui va bien, s'escria Socrates: nous estions en cherche d'vne vertu, tu nous en apporte vn exaim. Nous communiquons vne question, on nous en redonne vne ruchée. Comme nul euenement et nulle forme, ressemble entierement à vne autre, aussi ne differe l'vne de l'autre entierement. Ingenieux meslange de Nature. Si nos faces n'estoient semblables, on ne sçauroit discerner l'homme de la beste: si elles n'estoient dissemblables, on ne sçauroit discerner l'homme de l'homme. Toutes choses se tiennent par quelque similitude. Tout exemple cloche. Et la relation qui se tire de l'experience, est tousiours defaillante et imparfaicte.

On ioinct toutesfois les comparaisons par quelque bout. Ainsi seruent les loix; et s'assortissent ainsin, à chacun de nos affaires, par quelque interpretation destournée, contrainte et biaise.

ENGLISH

of a magistrate and of a private person, of a child and of an old man." "That's splendid!" cried Socrates. "We were looking for one virtue, and you bring us a whole swarm." We put forward one question, and we are handed back a hiveful. Just as no event and no form entirely resembles another, so none entirely differs from another. An ingenious blend of Nature's. If our faces were not alike, we could not tell man from beast; if they were not unlike, we could not tell man from man. All things hold together by some likeness. Every example limps. And the correspondence drawn from experience is always defective and imperfect.[10]

Still, we join our comparisons together at some end. That is how laws serve, and that is how they are fitted to each of our affairs: by some roundabout, forced and slanted interpretation.

THE INJUSTICE OF JUSTICE

Courts condemn the innocent and serve forms over truth; laws are obeyed because they are laws.

FRENCH

3.13.9 Puisque les loix ethiques, qui regardent le deuoir particulier de chacun en soy, sont si difficiles à dresser: comme nous voyons qu'elles sont: ce n'est pas merueille, si celles qui gouuernent tant de particuliers, le sont d'auantage. Considerez la forme de cette iustice qui nous regit; c'est vn vray tesmoignage de l'humaine imbecillité: tant il y a de contradiction et d'erreur. Ce que nous trouuons faueur et rigueur en la iustice: et y en trouuons tant, que ie ne sçay si l'entre-deux s'y trouue si souuent: ce sont parties maladiues, et membres iniustes, du corps mesmes et essence de la iustice.

Des païsans, viennent de m'aduertir en haste, qu'ils ont laissé presentement en vne forest qui est à moy, vn homme meurtry de cent coups, qui respire encores, et qui leur a demandé de l'eau par pitié, et du secours pour le sousleuer. Disent qu'ils n'ont osé l'approcher, et s'en sont fuis, de peur que les gens de la iustice ne les y attrapassent: et comme il se faict de ceux qu'on rencontre pres d'vn homme tué, ils n'eussent à rendre conte de cet accident, à leur totale ruyne: n'ayans ny suffisance, ny argent, pour deffendre leur innocence. Que leur eussé-ie dict? Il est certain, que cet office d'humanité, les eust mis en peine.

ENGLISH

Since ethical laws, which concern each person's individual duty in himself, are so hard to frame, as we see they are, it is no wonder if those that govern so many individuals are harder still. Consider the form of this justice that rules us: it is a true testimony to human weakness, so full is it of contradiction and error. What we find to be favor and severity in justice (and we find so much of both that I do not know whether the middle way is found there as often) are diseased parts and unjust members of the very body and essence of justice.

Some peasants have just come in haste to tell me that a moment ago, in a forest of mine, they left a man battered with a hundred blows, still breathing, who begged them for water out of pity and for help to lift him up. They say they did not dare go near him and ran away, for fear that the officers of the law would catch them there and that, as happens to people found near a murdered man, they would have to answer for this incident, to their utter ruin, having neither the ability nor the money to defend their innocence. What could I have said to them? It is certain that this act of humanity would have got them into trouble.

10 The exchange is from Plato's dialogue Meno.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.13.10 Combien auons nous descouuert d'innocens auoir esté punis: ie dis sans la coulpe des iuges; et combien en y a-il eu, que nous n'auons pas descouuert? Cecy est aduenu de mon temps. Certains sont condamnez à la mort pour vn homicide; l'arrest sinon prononcé, au moins conclud et arresté. Sur ce poinct, les iuges sont aduertis par les officiers d'vne cour subalterne, voisine, qu'ils tiennent quelques prisonniers, lesquels aduoüent disertement cet homicide, et apportent à tout ce faict, vne lumiere indubitable. On delibere, si pourtant on doit interrompre et differer l'execution de l'arrest donné contre les premiers. On considere la nouuelleté de l'exemple, et sa consequence, pour accrocher les iugemens: Que la condemnation est iuridiquement passée; les iuges priuez de repentance.

How many innocent people have we discovered to have been punished, and I mean without any fault on the judges' part? And how many more have there been whom we have not discovered? This happened in my time. Certain men are condemned to death for a homicide. The sentence, if not yet pronounced, has at least been reached and settled. At this point the judges are informed by the officers of a lower court nearby that they are holding some prisoners who openly confess to this homicide and cast an unmistakable light on the whole affair. The judges deliberate whether they ought nonetheless to interrupt and postpone the execution of the sentence passed on the first men. They consider the novelty of the precedent and what it would mean for holding up judgments. The condemnation has been passed in due legal form, and judges are denied any right to change their minds.

Somme, ces pauures diables sont consacrez aux formules de la iustice. Philippus, ou quelque autre, prouueut à vn pareil inconuenient, en cette maniere. Il auoit condamné en grosses amendes, vn homme enuers vn autre, par vn iugement resolu. La verité se descouurant quelque temps apres, il se trouua qu'il auoit iniquement iugé. D'vn costé estoit la raison de la cause: de l'autre costé la raison des formes iudiciaires. Il satisfit aucunement à toutes les deux, laissant en son estat la sentence, et recompensant de sa bourse, l'interest du condamné. Mais il auoit affaire à vn accident reparable; les miens furent pendus irreparablement. Combien ay-ie veu de condemnations, plus crimineuses que le crime?

In short, these poor devils are offered up to the formulas of justice. Philip, or someone else, dealt with a similar difficulty in this way. He had condemned a man, by a final judgment, to pay heavy damages to another. When the truth came out some time later, it turned out that he had judged unjustly. On one side stood the justice of the case; on the other, the logic of judicial forms. He satisfied both to some extent: he left the sentence as it stood and made good the condemned man's loss out of his own purse. But he was dealing with a mishap that could be repaired. My men were hanged beyond repair. How many condemnations have I seen that were more criminal than the crime?[11]

3.13.11 Tout cecy me faict souuenir de ces anciennes opinions: Qu'il est force de faire tort en detail, qui veut faire droict en gros; et iniustice en petites choses, qui veut venir à chef de faire iustice és grandes: Que l'humaine iustice est formée au modelle de la medecine, selon laquelle, tout ce qui est vtile est aussi iuste et honneste. Et de ce que tiennent les Stoïciens, que Nature mesme procede contre iustice, en la plus-part de ses ouurages. Et de ce que tiennent les Cyrenaïques, qu'il n'y a rien iuste de soy: que les coustumes et loix forment la iustice. Et les Theodoriens, qui trouuent iuste au sage le larrecin, le

All this reminds me of those ancient opinions. One is that whoever wants to do right on the whole must do wrong in the details, and whoever wants to succeed in doing justice in great things must do injustice in small ones. Another is that human justice is formed on the model of medicine, by which everything useful is also just and honorable. Then there is what the Stoics hold, that Nature herself goes against justice in most of her works. There is what the Cyrenaics hold, that nothing is just in itself and that customs and laws make justice. And there are the Theodorians, who

11 Philip II of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great; the story is in Plutarch.

FRENCH

sacrilege, toute sorte de paillardise, s'il cognoist qu'elle luy soit profitable.

Il n'y a remede. I'en suis là, comme Alcibiades, que ie ne me representeray iamais, que ie puisse, à homme qui decide de ma teste: où mon honneur, et ma vie, depende de l'industrie et soing de mon procureur, plus que de mon innocence. Ie me hazarderois à vne telle iustice, qui me recogneust du bien faict, comme du mal faict: où i'eusse autant à esperer, qu'à craindre. L'indemnité n'est pas monnoye suffisante, à vn homme qui faict mieux, que de ne faillir point. Nostre iustice ne nous presente que l'vne de ses mains; et encore la gauche. Quiconque il soit, il en sort auecques perte.

3.13.12 En la Chine, duquel royaume la police et les arts, sans commerce et cognoissance des nostres, surpassent nos exemples, en plusieurs parties d'excellence: et duquel l'histoire m'apprend, combien le monde est plus ample et plus diuers, que ny les anciens, ny nous, ne penetrons: les officiers deputez par le Prince, pour visiter l'estat de ses prouinces, comme ils punissent ceux, qui maluersent en leur charge, ils remunerent aussi de pure liberalité, ceux qui s'y sont bien portez outre la commune sorte, et outre la necessité de leur deuoir: on s'y presente, non pour se garantir seulement, mais pour y acquerir: ny simplement pour estre payé, mais pour y estre estrené.

3.13.13 Nul iuge n'a encore, Dieu mercy, parlé à moy comme iuge, pour quelque cause que ce soit, ou mienne, ou tierce, ou criminelle, ou ciuile. Nulle prison m'a receu, non pas seulement pour m'y promener. L'imagination m'en rend la veuë mesme du dehors, desplaisante. Ie suis si affady apres la liberté, que qui me deffendroit l'accez de quelque coin des Indes, i'en viurois aucunement plus mal à mon aise. Et tant que ie trouueray terre, ou air ouuert ailleurs, ie ne croupiray en lieu, où il me faille cacher.

Mon Dieu, que mal pourroy-ie souffrir la condition, où ie vois tant de gens, clouez à vn quartier de ce royaume, priuez de l'entrée des villes principales, et des courts, et de l'vsage des chemins publics, pour auoir querellé nos loix. Si celles que ie sers, me menassoient seulement le think theft, sacrilege and every kind of lechery just for the wise man, if he knows it to be profitable to him.

ENGLISH

There is no remedy. I am in the same position as Alcibiades: I will never, if I can help it, put myself in the hands of a man who is to decide on my head, where my honor and my life depend more on the skill and diligence of my attorney than on my innocence. I would take my chances with a justice that took account of my good deeds as well as my bad ones, where I had as much to hope for as to fear. Going unpunished is not sufficient payment for a man who does better than merely not doing wrong. Our justice holds out only one of its hands to us, and the left one at that. Whoever a man may be, he comes out of it the loser.[12]

Consider China. Its government and arts, without any dealings with ours or knowledge of them, surpass our examples in several kinds of excellence, and its history teaches me how much wider and more varied the world is than either the ancients or we can fathom. There the officers sent by the Prince to inspect the state of his provinces punish those who abuse their office, and they also reward, out of pure liberality, those who have conducted themselves better than the common run and beyond what their duty required. People present themselves to these officers not merely to protect themselves but to gain something, and not simply to be paid but to receive a gift.[13]

No judge, thank God, has yet spoken to me as a judge, in any case whatever, my own or another's, criminal or civil. No prison has ever received me, not even for a stroll. The very thought of one makes even the sight of its outside unpleasant to me. I am so infatuated with liberty that if anyone barred me from some corner of the Indies, I would live somewhat less at ease for it. And as long as I can find earth or open air elsewhere, I will not lie stagnating in a place where I have to hide.

My God, how badly I would bear the condition in which I see so many people! They are nailed to one district of this kingdom, barred from entering the principal cities and the courts and from using the public roads, for having quarreled with our laws.

12 Alcibiades fled rather than stand trial at Athens, saying he would not trust even his own mother with his life (Plutarch).
13 Montaigne's source was probably Juan González de Mendoza's History of China (1585), translated into French in 1588.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
bout du doigt, ie m'en irois incontinent en trouuer d'autres, où que ce fust. Toute ma petite prudence, en ces guerres ciuiles où nous sommes, s'employe à ce, qu'elles n'interrompent ma liberté d'aller et venir.	If the laws I serve threatened so much as the tip of my finger, I would immediately go off and find others, wherever it might be. All my little prudence, in these civil wars we are in, goes into keeping them from interrupting my freedom to come and go.
3.13.14 Or les loix se maintiennent en credit, non par ce qu'elles sont iustes, mais par ce qu'elles sont loix. C'est le fondement mystique de leur authorité: elles n'en ont point d'autre. Qui bien leur sert. Elles sont souuent faictes par des sots. Plus souuent par des gens, qui en haine d'equalité ont faute d'equité. Mais tousiours par des hommes, autheurs vains et irresolus. Il n'est rien si lourdement, et largement fautier, que les loix: ny si ordinairement. Quiconque leur obeit par ce qu'elles sont iustes, ne leur obeyt pas iustement par où il doit. Les nostres Françoises, prestent aucunement la main, par leur desreiglement et deformité, au desordre et corruption, qui se voit en leur dispensation, et execution.	Now laws keep their credit not because they are just, but because they are laws. That is the mystical foundation of their authority; they have no other. And it serves them well. They are often made by fools. More often they are made by people who, out of hatred of equality, are wanting in equity. But always by men, vain and irresolute authors. There is nothing so grossly and widely faulty as the laws, nor so regularly. Whoever obeys them because they are just does not obey them for the right reason. Our French laws, by their irregularity and deformity, rather lend a hand to the disorder and corruption that can be seen in the way they are administered and carried out.

STUDYING MYSELF

Self-study is his physics and metaphysics, and it teaches him his own fallibility.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Le commandement est si trouble, et inconstant, qu'il excuse aucunement, et la desobeissance, et le vice de l'interpretation, de l'administration, et de l'obseruation. Quel que soit donq le fruict que nous pouuons auoir de l'experience, à peine seruira beaucoup à nostre institution, celle que nous tirons des exemples estrangers, si nous faisons si mal nostre profit, de celle, que nous auons de nous mesme, qui nous est plus familiere: et certes suffisante à nous instruire de ce qu'il nous faut. Ie m'estudie plus qu'autre subiect. C'est ma metaphysique, c'est ma physique.	The command is so muddled and inconsistent that it partly excuses both disobedience and faults of interpretation, administration and observance. Whatever fruit, then, we can draw from experience, the experience we take from foreign examples will hardly do much for our education if we make such poor use of the experience we have of ourselves. That experience is more familiar to us, and certainly sufficient to teach us what we need. I study myself more than any other subject. That is my metaphysics; that is my physics.
Qua Deus hanc mundi temperet arte domum: Qua venit exoriens, qua deficit, vnde coactis Cornibus in plenum menstrua luna redit: Vnde salo superant venti, quid flamine captet Eurus, et in nubes vnde perennis aqua: Sit ventura dies mundi quæ subruat arces, Quærite quos agitat mundi labor. En cette vniuersité, ie me laisse ignoramment et negligemment manier à la loy generale du monde. Ie la sçauray assez, quand ie la sentiray. Ma science ne luy peut faire changer de routte. Elle ne se diuersifiera pas pour moy: c'est folie de l'esperer. Et plus grande folie, de s'en mettre en peine:	By what art God governs this house of the world; whence the moon comes rising, where it wanes, how with its horns drawn together it returns each month to the full; whence the winds prevail over the sea, what the east wind seeks with its blast, and whence the clouds draw their unceasing water; whether a day will come to topple the citadels of the world— inquire, you who are tormented by the toil of knowing the world. In this universe I let myself be handled, puis qu'elle est necessairement semblable, publique, et commune.

FRENCH

La bonté et capacité du gouuerneur nous doit à pur et à plein descharger du soing de gouuernement. Les inquisitions et contemplations philosophiques, ne seruent que d'aliment à nostre curiosité. Les philosophes, auec grande raison, nous renuoyent aux regles de Nature. Mais elles n'ont que faire de si sublime cognoissance. Ils les falsifient, et nous presentent son visage peint, trop haut en couleur, et trop sophistiqué: d'où naissent tant de diuers pourtraits d'vn subiect si vniforme. Comme elle nous a fourny de pieds à marcher, aussi a elle de prudence à nous guider en la vie. Prudence non tant ingenieuse, robuste et pompeuse, comme celle de leur inuention: mais à l'aduenant, facile, quiete et salutaire.

Et qui faict tresbien ce que l'autre dit: en celuy, qui a l'heur, de sçauoir l'employer naïuement et ordonnément: c'est à dire naturellement. Le plus simplement se commettre à Nature, c'est s'y commettre le plus sagement. O que c'est vn doux et mol cheuet, et sain, que l'ignorance et l'incuriosité, à reposer vne teste bien faicte.

3.13.15 I'aymerois mieux m'entendre bien en moy, qu'en Ciceron. De l'experience que i'ay de moy, ie trouue assez dequoy me faire sage, si i'estoy bon escholier. Qui remet en sa memoire l'excez de sa cholere passee, et iusques où cette fieure l'emporta, voit la laideur de cette passion, mieux que dans Aristote, et en conçoit vne haine plus iuste. Qui se souuient des maux qu'il a couru, de ceux qui l'ont menassé, des legeres occasions qui l'ont remué d'vn estat à autre, se prepare par là, aux mutations futures, et à la recognoissance de sa condition. La vie de Cæsar n'a point plus d'exemple, que la nostre pour nous. Et emperiere, et populaire: c'est tousiours vne vie, que tous accidents humains regardent.

Escoutons y seulement: nous nous disons, tout ce, dequoy nous auons principalement besoing. Qui se souuient de ignorantly and negligently, by the general law of the world. I shall know it well enough when I feel it. My knowledge cannot make it change its course. It will not vary for my sake; it is folly to hope so. And it is greater folly to trouble oneself about it, since it is necessarily uniform, public and common.[14]

ENGLISH

The goodness and capacity of the governor ought to relieve us purely and fully of the care of governing. Philosophical inquiries and contemplations serve only to feed our curiosity. The philosophers, with good reason, refer us to the rules of Nature. But those rules have no need of such sublime knowledge. The philosophers falsify them and show us Nature's face painted, too high in color and too elaborately made up; hence so many different portraits of so uniform a subject. As she has given us feet to walk with, so has she given us prudence to guide us through life. It is not a prudence as ingenious, robust and pompous as the one they invented, but correspondingly easy, quiet and wholesome.

And it does very well what the other only talks about, in the man who has the good fortune to know how to use it simply and in good order, that is to say, naturally. To commit oneself to Nature most simply is to commit oneself to her most wisely. Oh, what a soft, gentle and wholesome pillow ignorance and incuriosity are for resting a well-made head!

I would rather understand myself well by studying myself than by studying Cicero. In the experience I have of myself I find enough to make me wise, if I were a good scholar. Whoever recalls the excess of his past anger, and how far that fever carried him away, sees the ugliness of this passion better than in Aristotle and conceives a more justified hatred of it. Whoever remembers the ills he has run into, those that have threatened him, and the slight occasions that have shifted him from one state to another, prepares himself by that for future changes and for recognizing his own condition. Caesar's life holds no more of an example for us than our own. Imperial or common, it is always a life exposed to all human accidents.

Let us only listen: we tell ourselves everything we chiefly need. Whoever remembers having been s'estre tant et tant de fois mesconté de son propre iugement: est-il pas vn sot, de n'en entrer pour iamais en deffiance? Quand ie me trouue conuaincu par la raison d'autruy, d'vne opinion fauce; ie n'apprens pas tant, ce qu'il m'a dit de nouueau, et cette ignorance particuliere: ce seroit peu d'acquest: comme en general i'apprens ma debilité, et la trahison de mon entendement: d'où ie tire la reformation de toute la masse. En toutes mes autres erreurs, ie fais de mesme: et sens de cette regle grande vtilité à la vie. Ie ne regarde pas l'espece et l'indiuidu, comme vne pierre où i'aye bronché.

FRENCH

I'apprens à craindre mon alleure par tout, et m'attens à la regler. D'apprendre qu'on a dit ou fait vne sottise, ce n'est rien que cela. Il faut apprendre, qu'on n'est qu'vn sot. Instruction bien plus ample, et importante. Les faux pas, que ma memoire m'a fait si souuent, lors mesme qu'elle s'asseure le plus de soy, ne se sont pas inutilement perduz. Elle a beau me iurer à cette heure et m'asseurer: ie secoüe les oreilles: la premiere opposition qu'on faict à son tesmoignage, me met en suspens. Et n'oserois me fier d'elle, en chose de poix: ny la garentir sur le faict d'autruy.

Et n'estoit, que ce que ie fay par faute de memoire, les autres le font encore plus souuent, par faute de foy, ie prendrois tousiours en chose de faict, la verité de la bouche d'vn autre, plustost que de la mienne. Si chacun espioit de pres les effects et circonstances des passions qui les regentent, comme i'ay faict de celle à qui i'estois tombé en partage: il les verroit venir: et rallentiroit vn peu leur impetuosité et leur course. Elles ne nous sautent pas tousiours au collet d'vn prinsault, il y a de la menasse et des degrez.

Fluctus vti primó cœpit cùm albescere vento,
Paulatim sese tollit mare, et altius vndas
Erigit, inde imo consurgit ad æthera fundo. Le iugement tient chez moy vn siege magistral, au moins il s'en efforce soigneusement. Il laisse mes appetis aller leur train: et la haine et l'amitié, voire et celle que ie me porte à moy mesme, sans s'en alterer et corrompre. S'il ne peut reformer les autres parties selon soy, au moins ne se laisse il pas difformer à elles: il faict son ieu à part.

ENGLISH

mistaken in his own judgment so many, many times, is he not a fool if he does not distrust it ever after? When I find myself convinced of a false opinion by another man's reasoning, what I learn is not so much the new thing he has told me and my ignorance on this particular point; that would be small gain. What I learn is my weakness in general and the treachery of my understanding, and from that I draw a reform of the whole mass. I do the same with all my other errors, and I find this rule of great use in life. I do not look on the particular kind and instance as just a stone I have tripped over.

I learn to fear my footing everywhere, and I set about regulating it. To learn that one has said or done something foolish is nothing. One must learn that one is nothing but a fool, a far fuller and more important lesson. The false steps my memory has so often made me take, even when it was surest of itself, have not been wasted. It may swear and assure me all it likes now; I shake my ears. The first objection raised against its testimony leaves me in doubt. I would not dare trust it in a matter of weight, nor vouch for it where someone else is concerned.

And were it not that what I do from lack of memory, others do still more often from lack of good faith, I would always take the truth in matters of fact from another man's mouth rather than from my own. If each man watched closely the effects and circumstances of the passions that rule him, as I have done with the one whose share I fell to, he would see them coming and would slow their violence and their course a little. They do not always leap at our throats in a single bound; there are warnings and stages.

As when a wave first begins to whiten under the wind, little by little the sea swells and lifts its waves higher, then rises from its lowest depths up to the sky. In me judgment holds a magisterial seat; at least it carefully tries to. It lets my appetites go their way, hatred and friendship alike, even the friendship I bear myself, without being altered and corrupted by them. If it cannot reform the other parts to its own pattern, at least it does not let itself be deformed by them. It plays its game apart.[15]

14 Propertius, Elegies III.5.
15 Virgil, Aeneid VII.

FRENCH

3.13.16 L'aduertissement à chacun de se cognoistre, doit estre d'vn important effect, puisque ce Dieu de science et de lumiere le fit planter au front de son temple: comme comprenant tout ce qu'il auoit à nous conseiller. Platon dict aussi, que prudence n'est autre chose, que l'execution de cette ordonnance: et Socrates, le verifie par le menu en Xenophon. Les difficultez et l'obscurité, ne s'apperçoyuent en chacune science, que par ceux qui y ont entree. Car encore faut il quelque degré d'intelligence, à pouuoir remarquer qu'on ignore: et faut pousser à vne porte, pour sçauoir qu'elle nous est close.

D'où naist cette Platonique subtilité, que ny ceux qui sçauent, n'ont à s'enquerir, d'autant qu'ils sçauent: ny ceux qui ne sçauent, d'autant que pour s'enquerir, il faut sçauoir, dequoy on s'enquiert. Ainsin, en cette cy de se cognoistre soy-mesme: ce que chacun se voit si resolu et satisfaict, ce que chacun y pense estre suffisamment entendu, signifie que chacun n'y entend rien du tout, comme Socrates apprend à Euthydeme. Moy, qui ne fais autre profession, y trouue vne profondeur et varieté si infinie, que mon apprentissage n'a autre fruict, que de me faire sentir, combien il me reste à apprendre.

A ma foiblesse si souuent recognuë, ie dois l'inclination que i'ay à la modestie: à l'obeïssance des creances qui me sont prescrites: à vne constante froideur et moderation d'opinions: et la haine de cette arrogance importune et quereleuse, se croyant et fiant toute à soy, ennemie capitale de discipline et de verité. Oyez les regenter. Les premieres sottises qu'ils mettent en auant, c'est au style qu'on establit les religions et les loix. Nihil est turpius, quàm cognitioni et perceptioni assertionem approbationémque præcurrere. Aristarchus disoit, qu'anciennement, à peine se trouua-il sept sages au monde: et que de son temps à peine se trouuoit-il sept ignorans. Aurions nous pas plus de raison que luy, de le dire en nostre temps?

L'affirmation et l'opiniastreté, sont signes exprez de bestise. Cestuy-ci aura donné du nez à terre, cent fois pour vn iour: le voyla sur ses ergots, aussi resolu et entier

ENGLISH

The advice that each man should know himself must have an important effect, since that god of knowledge and light had it planted on the front of his temple, as containing all he had to counsel us. Plato also says that prudence is nothing other than carrying out this command, and Socrates proves it point by point in Xenophon. The difficulties and obscurities of any science are perceived only by those who have gained entry to it. For it still takes some degree of intelligence to be able to notice that one is ignorant, and one must push at a door to know that it is closed to us.[16]

From this comes that Platonic subtlety: neither those who know need inquire, since they know, nor those who do not know, since to inquire one must know what one is inquiring about. So it is with this matter of knowing oneself. The fact that each man seems to himself so resolved and satisfied, and thinks himself expert enough in it, means that no one understands anything about it at all, as Socrates teaches Euthydemus. I, who profess nothing else, find in it a depth and variety so infinite that my apprenticeship bears no other fruit than to make me feel how much I still have to learn.[17]

To my weakness, so often recognized, I owe my inclination to modesty, to obedience to the beliefs prescribed to me, and to a constant coolness and moderation in my opinions. I owe it also my hatred of that importunate and quarrelsome arrogance which believes and trusts wholly in itself, the mortal enemy of learning and of truth. Listen to them laying down the law. The very first follies they come out with are delivered in the style in which religions and laws are established. Nothing is more shameful than for assertion and approval to run ahead of knowledge and perception. Aristarchus said that in ancient times there were scarcely seven wise men to be found in the world, and that in his own time there were scarcely seven ignorant ones. Would we not have more reason than he to say so in our time?[18]

Assertiveness and obstinacy are express signs of stupidity. This fellow will have fallen flat on his nose a hundred times in a day, and there he is, up

16 Apollo, whose temple at Delphi bore the inscription "Know yourself."
17 Xenophon, Memorabilia IV.2.
18 Cicero, Academica I. Aristarchus of Samothrace was a scholar at Alexandria in the 2nd century BC.

FRENCH

que deuant. Vous diriez qu'on luy a infus depuis, quelque nouuelle ame, et vigueur d'entendement. Et qu'il luy aduient, comme à cet ancien fils de la terre, qui reprenoit nouuelle fermeté, et se renforçoit par sa cheute. Cui cum tetigere parentem, / Iam defecta vigent renouato robore membra. Ce testu indocile, pense-il pas reprendre vn nouuel esprit, pour reprendre vne nouuelle dispute? C'est par mon experience, que i'accuse l'humaine ignorance. Qui est, à mon aduis, le plus seur party de l'escole du monde.

Ceux qui ne la veulent conclure en eux, par vn si vain exemple que le mien, ou que le leur, qu'ils la recognoissent par Socrates, le maistre des maistres. Car le philosophe Antisthenes, à ses disciples, Allons, disoit-il, vous et moy ouyr Socrates. Là ie seray disciple auec vous. Et soustenant ce dogme, de sa secte Stoïque, que la vertu suffisoit à rendre vne vie plainement heureuse, et n'ayant besoin de chose quelconque, sinon de la force de Socrates, adioustoit-il.

ENGLISH

on his spurs again, as resolute and unbending as before. You would think someone had since poured into him a new soul and a new vigor of understanding, and that it is with him as with that ancient son of the earth who regained his firmness and grew stronger by his fall: Whose limbs, when they touched their mother, / exhausted as they were, grew strong again with renewed vigor. Does this unteachable, stubborn man not think he takes on a new mind when he takes up a new argument? It is from my own experience that I accuse human ignorance, which is, in my opinion, the surest position in the school of the world.[19]

Those who will not reach this conclusion in themselves from so vain an example as mine or their own, let them recognize it through Socrates, the master of masters. For the philosopher Antisthenes used to say to his disciples: "Let us go, you and I, and hear Socrates. There I shall be a disciple with you." And upholding the dogma of his Stoic sect, that virtue was enough to make a life fully happy and in need of nothing whatever, he would add: "except the strength of Socrates."

JUDGING OTHERS, ADVISING KINGS

Long self-observation helps him read his friends; kings most need someone to tell them the truth.

FRENCH

3.13.17 Cette longue attention que i'employe à me considerer, me dresse à iuger aussi passablement des autres. Et est peu de choses, dequoy ie parle plus heureusement et excusablement. Il m'aduient souuent, de voir et distinguer plus exactement les conditions de mes amis, qu'ils ne font eux mesmes. I'en ay estonné quelqu'vn, par la pertinence de ma description: et l'ay aduerty de soy. Pour m'estre dés mon enfance, dressé à mirer ma vie dans celle d'autruy, i'ay acquis vne complexion studieuse en cela. Et quand i'y pense, ie laisse eschaper autour de moy peu de choses qui y seruent: contenances, humeurs, discours. I'estudie tout: ce qu'il me faut fuïr, ce qu'il me faut suyure. Ainsin à mes amis, ie descouure par leurs productions, leurs inclinations internes.

Non pour renger cette infinie varieté d'actions si diuerses et si descouppees, à certains genres et chapitres, et distribuer distinctement mes partages et diuisions, en

ENGLISH

This long attention I devote to considering myself trains me to judge others fairly well too, and there are few things I speak about more successfully and more defensibly. It often happens that I see and distinguish my friends' characters more exactly than they do themselves. I have astonished more than one by the aptness of my description and shown him things about himself. Having trained myself from childhood to mirror my life in that of others, I have acquired a studious bent in this. And when I put my mind to it, I let few things that serve this purpose slip by me: bearing, temperament, talk. I study everything: what I must avoid, what I must follow. So I reveal to my friends, from what they show outwardly, their inner inclinations.

I do not do it to arrange this infinite variety of such diverse and disconnected actions into fixed kinds and chapters, or to distribute my lots and di-19 Antaeus, the giant son of Earth, who regained his strength whenever he touched the ground; Lucan, Pharsalia IV.

FRENCH

classes et regions cognuës, Sed neque quàm multæ species, et nomina quæ sint, / Est numerus. Les sçauans parlent, et denotent leurs fantasies, plus specifiquement, et par le menu. Moy, qui n'y voy qu'autant que l'vsage m'en informe, sans regle, presente generalement les miennes, et à tastons. Comme en cecy: Ie prononce ma sentence par articles descousus: c'est chose qui ne se peut dire à la fois, et en bloc. La relation, et la conformité, ne se trouuent point en telles ames que les nostres, basses et communes.

La sagesse est vn bastiment solide et entier, dont chaque piece tient son rang et porte sa marque. Sola sapientia in se tota conuersa est. Ie laisse aux artistes, et ne sçay s'ils en viennent à bout, en chose si meslee, si menue et fortuite, de renger en bandes, cette infinie diuersité de visages; et arrester nostre inconstance, et la mettre par ordre. Non seulement ie trouue malaysé, d'attacher nos actions les vnes aux autres: mais chacune à part soy, ie trouue malaysé, de la designer proprement, par quelque qualité principale: tant elles sont doubles et bigarrees à diuers lustres.

Ce qu'on remarque pour rare, au Roy de Macedoine, Perseus, que son esprit, ne s'attachant à aucune condition, alloit errant par tout genre de vie: et representant des mœurs, si essorees et vagabondes qu'il n'estoit cogneu ny de luy ny d'autre, quel homme ce fust, me semble à peu pres conuenir à tout le monde. Et par dessus tous, i'ay veu quelque autre de sa taille, à qui cette conclusion s'appliqueroit plus proprement encore, ce croy-ie. Nulle assiette moyenne: s'emportant tousiours de l'vn à l'autre extreme, par occasions indiuinables: nulle espece de train, sans trauerse, et contrarieté merueilleuse: nulle faculté simple: si que le plus vray-semblablement qu'on en pourra feindre vn iour, ce sera, qu'il affectoit, et estudioit de se rendre cogneu, par estre mescognoissable.

Il faict besoin d'oreilles bien fortes, pour s'ouyr franchement iuger. Et par ce qu'il en est peu, qui le puissent souffrir sans morsure: ceux qui se hazardent de l'entreprendre enuers nous, nous montrent vn singulier effect d'amitié. Car c'est aimer sainement, d'entreprendre à blesser et offencer, pour profiter. Ie trouue rude de iuger celuy là, en qui les mauuaises visions neatly into known classes and regions: But how many kinds there are, and what their names, / there is no counting. The learned speak and set down their notions more specifically and in detail. I, who see into the matter only as far as practice informs me, without rule, present mine in general terms and gropingly. As here: I pronounce my opinion in disjointed articles; it is something that cannot be said all at once and in a block. Coherence and consistency are not to be found in souls as low and common as ours.[20]

ENGLISH

Wisdom is a solid and complete building, each piece of which keeps its place and bears its mark. Wisdom alone is wholly turned in upon itself. I leave it to the professionals, and I do not know whether they will succeed in a thing so mixed, so minute and so fortuitous, to sort this infinite diversity of aspects into groups, to pin down our inconstancy and set it in order. Not only do I find it hard to link our actions to one another; I find it hard to designate each one, taken by itself, properly by some principal quality, so double and motley are they, seen in different lights.[21]

It is noted as a rare thing in Perseus, King of Macedonia, that his mind, attaching itself to no one condition, went wandering through every kind of life, and showed a character so flighty and vagrant that neither he nor anyone else knew what sort of man he was. This seems to me to fit almost everyone. And above all I have seen another man of his stature to whom this conclusion would apply still more properly, I believe. No middle position; always swinging from one extreme to the other for reasons no one could guess; no course of any kind without twists and astonishing contradictions; no single faculty. So the most plausible thing that will one day be imagined about him is that he affected and studied to make himself known by being unknowable.

It takes very strong ears to hear oneself judged frankly. And because there are few who can bear it without being stung, those who venture to undertake it with us show us a singular act of friendship. For it is a healthy love that sets out to wound and offend in order to do good. I find it hard to judge a man in whom the bad qualities outweigh 20 Virgil, Georgics II.

21 Cicero, On Ends III.

FRENCH

qualitez surpassent les bonnes. Platon ordonne trois parties, à qui veut examiner l'ame d'vn autre, science, bienueillance, hardiesse.

3.13.18 Quelquefois on me demandoit, à quoy i'eusse pensé estre bon, qui se fust aduisé de se seruir de moy, pendant que i'en auois l'aage: Dum melior vires sanguis dabat, æmula necdum / Temporibus geminis canebat sparsa senectus. A rien, fis-ie. Et m'excuse volontiers de ne sçauoir faire chose, qui m'esclaue à autruy. Mais i'eusse dit ses veritez à mon maistre, et eusse contrerollé ses mœurs, s'il eust voulu. Non en gros, par leçons scholastiques, que ie ne sçay point, et n'en vois naistre aucune vraye reformation, en ceux qui les sçauent. Mais les obseruant pas à pas, à toute opportunité: et en iugeant à l'œil, piece à piece, simplement et naturellement. Luy faisant voir quel il est en l'opinion commune: m'opposant à ses flatteurs.

Il n'y a nul de nous, qui ne valust moins que les Roys, s'il estoit ainsi continuellement corrompu, comme ils sont, de cette canaille de gens. Comment, si Alexandre, ce grand et Roy et philosophe, ne peut s'en deffendre? I'eusse eu assez de fidelité, de iugement, et de liberté, pour cela. Ce seroit vn office sans nom; autrement il perdroit son effect et sa grace. Et est vn roolle qui ne peut indifferemment appartenir à tous. Car la verité mesme, n'a pas ce priuilege, d'estre employee à toute heure, et en toute sorte: son vsage tout noble qu'il est, a ses circonscriptions, et limites.

Il aduient souuent, comme le monde est, qu'on la lasche à l'oreille du Prince, non seulement sans fruict, mais dommageablement, et encore iniustement. Et ne me fera lon pas accroire, qu'vne sainte remonstrance, ne puisse estre appliquee vitieusement: et que l'interest de la substance, ne doyue souuent ceder à l'interest de la forme. Ie voudrois à ce mestier, vn homme contant de sa fortune, Quod sit, esse velit, nihilque malit: et nay de moyenne fortune. D'autant, que d'vne part, il n'auroit point de crainte de toucher viuement et profondement le cœur du maistre, pour ne perdre par là, le cours de son auancement. Et d'autre part, pour estre d'vne condition the good. Plato prescribes three qualities for anyone who would examine another's soul: knowledge, goodwill, boldness.[22]

ENGLISH

I was sometimes asked what I would have thought myself good for, if someone had taken it into his head to make use of me while I was still of an age for it: While better blood gave me strength, and envious old age / had not yet sprinkled white over both my temples. "For nothing," I said. And I readily excuse myself for not knowing how to do anything that would make me a slave to another. But I would have told my master the truth about himself and kept watch on his conduct, if he had wanted it. Not wholesale, through scholastic lessons, which I do not know, and from which I see no true reform arise in those who do. But by observing his conduct step by step, at every opportunity, judging it by eye, piece by piece, simply and naturally, making him see what he is in common opinion, standing up to his flatterers.[23]

There is not one of us who would not be worth less than kings if he were continually corrupted, as they are, by that rabble. How could it be otherwise, when even Alexander, that great king and philosopher, could not defend himself against them? I would have had enough loyalty, judgment and freedom for the task. It would be an office without a name; otherwise it would lose its effect and its grace. And it is a role that cannot belong indiscriminately to everyone. For truth itself does not have the privilege of being used at any hour and in any manner. Its use, noble as it is, has its bounds and limits.

It often happens, the world being what it is, that truth is let slip into the Prince's ear not only fruitlessly but harmfully, and unjustly besides. And no one will make me believe that a holy remonstrance cannot be applied wrongly, or that the interest of substance must not often give way to the interest of form. For this trade I would want a man content with his fortune, Who would wish to be what he is, and prefer nothing else, and born of middling fortune. For on the one hand he would not hold back from touching his master's heart keenly and deeply for fear of losing his chances of advancement. And on the other, being of middling

22 Plato, Gorgias.
23 Virgil, Aeneid V.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
moyenne, il auroit plus aysee communication à toute sorte de gens.	condition, he would have easier communication with all sorts of people.[24]
Ie le voudroy à vn homme seul: car respandre le priuilege de cette liberté et priuauté à plusieurs, engendreroit vne nuisible irreuerence. Ouy, et de celuy là, ie requerroy sur tout la fidelité du silence.	I would want this given to one man only, for spreading the privilege of such freedom and familiarity among several would breed a harmful irreverence. Yes, and from that man I would require above all the loyalty of silence.
3.13.19 Vn Roy n'est pas à croire, quand il se vante de sa constance, à attendre le rencontre de l'ennemy, pour sa gloire: si pour son profit et amendement, il ne peut souffrir la liberté des parolles d'vn amy, qui n'ont autre effort, que de luy pincer l'ouye: le reste de leur effect estant en sa main. Or il n'est aucune condition d'homme, qui ait si grand besoing, que ceux-là, de vrais et libres aduertissemens.	A king is not to be believed when he boasts of his steadfastness in awaiting the enemy's attack for the sake of his glory, if for his own profit and improvement he cannot bear a friend's free words, which have no other force than to sting his ears, the rest of their effect being in his own hands. Now there is no condition of men that needs true and free admonitions as much as kings do.
Ils soutiennent vne vie publique, et ont à agreer à l'opinion de tant de spectateurs, que comme on a accoustumé de leur taire tout ce qui les diuertit de leur route, ils se trouuent sans le sentir, engagez en la haine et detestation de leurs peuples, pour des occasions souuent, qu'ils eussent peu euiter, à nul interest de leurs plaisirs mesme, qui les en eust aduisez et redressez à temps. Communement leurs fauorits regardent à soy, plus qu'au maistre. Et il leur va de bon: d'autant qu'à la verité, la plus part des offices de la vraye amitié, sont enuers le souuerain, en vn rude et perilleux essay.	They sustain a public life and have to please the opinion of so many spectators that, since people are in the habit of keeping quiet before them about anything that might turn them from their course, they find themselves, without noticing it, caught up in the hatred and detestation of their peoples. Often this is for reasons they could have avoided at no cost even to their pleasures, if someone had warned them and set them right in time. Their favorites commonly look out for themselves more than for their master. And they do well by it, since in truth most of the offices of true friendship toward a sovereign are a rough and perilous trial.
De maniere, qu'il y fait besoin, non seulement de beaucoup d'affection et de franchise, mais encore de courage.	So what is needed is not only a great deal of affection and frankness, but courage as well.

MY EXPERIENCE OF HEALTH

Distrusting medicine, Montaigne describes the habits by which he has kept his health.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.20 En fin, toute cette fricassee que ie barbouille ici, n'est qu'vn registre des essais de ma vie: qui est pour l'interne santé exemplaire assez, à prendre l'instruction à contrepoil. Mais quant à la santé corporelle, personne ne peut fournir d'experience plus vtile que moy: qui la presente pure, nullement corrompue et alteree par art, et par opination. L'experience est proprement sur son fumier au subiect de la medecine, où la raison luy quitte toute la place. Tybere disoit, que quiconque auoit vescu	In the end, all this hodgepodge I am scribbling here is only a record of the trials of my life. For inner health it is exemplary enough, if one takes its lessons the other way round. But as for bodily health, no one can furnish more useful experience than I, who present it pure, in no way corrupted or altered by art or by opinion. In the matter of medicine, experience is truly on its own dunghill, where reason yields it the whole field. Tiberius

24 Martial, Epigrams X.47.

FRENCH

vingt ans, se deuoit respondre des choses qui luy estoient nuisibles ou salutaires, et se sçauoir conduire sans medecine.

Et le pouuoit auoir apprins de Socrates: lequel conseillant à ses disciples soigneusement, et comme vn tres principal estude, l'estude de leur santé, adioustoit, qu'il estoit malaisé, qu'vn homme d'entendement, prenant garde à ses exercices à son boire et à son manger, ne discernast mieux que tout medecin, ce qui luy estoit bon ou mauuais. Si fait la medecine profession d'auoir tousiours l'experience, pour touche de son operation. Ainsi Platon auoit raison de dire, que pour estre vray medecin, il seroit necessaire que celuy qui l'entreprendroit, eust passé par toutes les maladies, qu'il veut guerir, et par tous les accidens et circonstances dequoy il doit iuger. C'est raison qu'ils prennent la verole, s'ils la veulent sçauoir penser. Vrayement ie m'en fierois à celuy là.

Car les autres nous guident, comme celuy qui peint les mers, les escueils et les ports, estant assis, sur sa table, et y faict promener le modele d'vn nauire en toute seurté. Iettez-le à l'effect, il ne sçait par où s'y prendre. Ils font telle description de nos maux, que faict vn trompette de ville, qui crie vn cheual ou vn chien perdu, tel poil, telle hauteur, telle oreille: mais presentez le luy, il ne le cognoit pas pourtant.

Pour Dieu, que la medecine me face vn iour quelque bon et perceptible secours, voir comme ie crieray de bonne foy, Tandem efficaci do manus scientiæ! Les arts qui promettent de nous tenir le corps en santé, et l'ame en santé, nous promettent beaucoup: mais aussi n'en est-il point, qui tiennent moins ce qu'elles promettent. Et en nostre temps, ceux qui font profession de ces arts entre nous, en montrent moins les effects que tous autres hommes. On peut dire d'eux, pour le plus, qu'ils vendent les drogues medecinales: mais qu'ils soient medecins, cela ne peut on dire. I'ay assez vescu, pour mettre en comte l'vsage, qui m'a conduict si loing. Pour qui en voudra gouster: i'en ay faict l'essay, son eschançon.

En voyci quelques articles, comme la souuenance me les fournira. Ie n'ay point de façon, qui ne soit allee variant selon les accidents. Mais i'enregistre celles, que i'ay plus souuent veu en train: qui ont eu plus de possession en moy iusqu'à cette heure.

ENGLISH

used to say that anyone who had lived twenty years ought to be able to answer for himself about what was harmful or wholesome to him, and to know how to manage himself without medicine.

He may have learned this from Socrates. Socrates earnestly advised his disciples to study their health as a most important study, and added that it was hard for a man of understanding who paid attention to his exercise, his drinking and his eating not to discern better than any physician what was good or bad for him. And indeed medicine professes always to use experience as the touchstone of its practice. So Plato was right to say that to be a true physician, whoever took it up would need to have gone through all the illnesses he wants to cure, and all the accidents and circumstances he has to judge. It is only reasonable that physicians should catch the pox if they want to know how to treat it. That is a physician I would truly trust.

For the others guide us like a man who paints seas, reefs and harbors while sitting at his table, and moves a model ship about on it in perfect safety. Throw him into the real thing, and he does not know where to begin. They describe our ills the way a town crier cries a lost horse or dog: such a coat, such a height, such ears. But bring the animal to him, and he still does not recognize it.

For God's sake, let medicine some day give me some real and perceptible help, and see how I will cry out in good faith: At last I surrender to an effective science! The arts that promise to keep the body in health and the soul in health promise us a great deal; but there are none that keep their promises less. And in our time those among us who profess these arts show their results less than any other men. The most one can say of them is that they sell medicinal drugs; that they are physicians, one cannot say. I have lived long enough to give an account of the habits that have brought me so far. For anyone who wants a taste of them, I have tried them first, as their cupbearer.[25]

Here are some articles of it, as my memory supplies them. I have no habit that has not kept varying with circumstances. But I record those I have most often seen at work, which have had the strongest hold on me up to now.

25 Horace, Epodes 17.

FRENCH

3.13.21 Ma forme de vie, est pareille en maladie comme en santé: mesme lict, mesmes heures, mesmes viandes me seruent, et mesme breuuage. Ie n'y adiouste du tout rien, que la moderation du plus et du moins, selon ma force et appetit. Ma santé, c'est maintenir sans destourbier mon estat accoustumé. Ie voy que la maladie m'en desloge d'vn costé: si ie crois les medecins, ils m'en destourneront de l'autre: et par fortune, et par art, me voyla hors de ma routte. Ie ne crois rien plus certainement que cecy: que ie ne sçauroy estre offencé par l'vsage des choses que i'ay si long temps accoustumees. C'est à la coustume de donner forme à nostre vie, telle qu'il luy plaist, elle peult tout en cela.

C'est le breuuage de Circé, qui diuersifie nostre nature, comme bon luy semble. Combien de nations, et à trois pas de nous, estiment ridicule la craincte du serein, qui nous blesse si apparemment: et nos bateliers et nos paysans s'en moquent. Vous faites malade vn Alleman, de le coucher sur vn matelas: comme vn Italien sur la plume, et vn François sans rideau et sans feu. L'estomach d'vn Espagnol, ne dure pas à nostre forme de manger, ny le nostre à boire à la Souysse. Vn Allemand me feit plaisir à Auguste, de combattre l'incommodité de nos fouyers, par ce mesme argument, dequoy nous nous seruons ordinairement à condamner leurs poyles.

Car à la verité, cette chaleur croupie, et puis la senteur de cette matiere reschauffée, dequoy ils sont composez, enteste la plus part de ceux qui n'y sont experimentez: moy non. Mais au demeurant, estant cette chaleur egale, constante et vniuerselle, sans lueur, sans fumée, sans le vent que l'ouuerture de nos cheminées nous apporte, elle a bien par ailleurs, dequoy se comparer à la nostre. Que n'imitons nous l'architecture Romaine? Car on dit, qu'anciennement, le feu ne se faisoit en leurs maisons que par le dehors, et au pied d'icelles: d'où s'inspiroit la chaleur à tout le logis, par les tuyaux practiquez dans l'espais du mur, lesquels alloient embrassant les lieux qui en deuoient estre eschauffez.

Ce que i'ay veu clairement signifié, ie ne sçay où, en Seneque. Cestuy-cy, m'oyant louër les commoditez, et beautez de sa ville: qui le merite certes: commença à me plaindre, dequoy i'auois à m'en eslongner. Et des

ENGLISH

My way of life is the same in sickness as in health: the same bed, the same hours, the same food serve me, and the same drink. I add nothing at all to it except moderation in the more or the less, according to my strength and appetite. For me, health means keeping my accustomed state undisturbed. I see that sickness dislodges me from it on one side; if I believe the physicians, they will turn me away from it on the other; and so, by fortune and by art, I am thrown off my course. I believe nothing more firmly than this: that I cannot be harmed by using things I have been accustomed to for so long. It is for custom to give our life whatever form it pleases; in this it can do everything.

It is Circe's potion, which varies our nature as it sees fit. How many nations, even three steps away from us, think ridiculous our fear of the evening damp, which so plainly harms us; and our boatmen and peasants laugh at it. You make a German ill by putting him to bed on a mattress, as you make an Italian ill on a feather bed and a Frenchman without curtains and without a fire. A Spaniard's stomach cannot stand our way of eating, nor ours drinking in the Swiss manner. A German at Augsburg amused me by attacking the inconvenience of our fireplaces with the very argument we usually use to condemn their stoves.[26]

For in truth that stagnant heat, and then the smell of the heated material the stoves are made of, gives a headache to most people who are not used to them, though not to me. But otherwise, since this heat is even, constant and spread throughout, without glare, without smoke, without the draft that the opening of our chimneys lets in, it bears comparison with ours on other counts. Why do we not imitate Roman architecture? For they say that in ancient times the fire in their houses was made only outside, at the foot of the house, and from there the heat was breathed into the whole dwelling through pipes built into the thickness of the walls, which ran around the rooms that were to be heated.

I have seen this clearly indicated somewhere in Seneca, I don't know where. This German, hearing me praise the conveniences and beauties of his city, which certainly deserves it, began to pity me 26 Montaigne passed through Augsburg in 1580 on his journey to Italy.

FRENCH

premiers inconueniens qu'il m'allega, ce fut la poisanteur de teste, que m'apporteroient les cheminées ailleurs. Il auoit ouï faire cette plainte à quelqu'vn, et nous l'attachoit, estant priué par l'vsage de l'apperceuoir chez luy. Toute chaleur qui vient du feu, m'affoiblit et m'appesantit. Si disoit Euenus, que le meilleur condiment de la vie, estoit le feu. Ie prens plustost toute autre façon d'eschaper au froid.

3.13.22 Nous craignons les vins au bas: en Portugal, cette fumée est en delices, et est le breuuage des Princes. En somme, chasque nation a plusieurs coustumes et vsances, qui sont non seulement incognues, mais farouches et miraculeuses à quelque autre nation. Que ferons nous à ce peuple, qui ne fait recepte que de tesmoignages imprimez, qui ne croit les hommes s'ils ne sont en liure, ny la verité, si elle n'est d'aage competant? Nous mettons en dignité nos sottises, quand nous les mettons en moule. Il y a bien pour luy, autre poix, de dire; ie l'ay leu: que si vous dictes: ie l'ay ouy dire.

Mais moy, qui ne mescrois non plus la bouche, que la main des hommes: et qui sçay qu'on escript autant indiscretement qu'on parle: et qui estime ce siecle, comme vn autre passé, i'allegue aussi volontiers vn mien amy, que Aulugelle, et que Macrobe: et ce que i'ay veu, que ce qu'ils ont escrit. Et comme ils tiennent de la vertu, qu'elle n'est pas plus grande, pour estre plus longue: i'estime de mesme de la verité, que pour estre plus vieille, elle n'est pas plus sage. Ie dis souuent que c'est pure sottise, qui nous fait courir apres les exemples estrangers et scholastiques. Leur fertilité est pareille à cette heure à celle du temps d'Homere et de Platon.

Mais n'est-ce pas, que nous cherchons plus l'honneur de l'allegation, que la verité du discours? Comme si c'estoit plus d'emprunter, de la boutique de Vascosan, ou de Plantin, nos preuues, que de ce qui se voit en nostre village. Ou bien certes, que nous n'auons pas l'esprit, d'esplucher, et faire valoir, ce qui se passe deuant nous, et le iuger assez vifuement, pour le tirer en exemple. Car si nous disons, que l'authorité nous manque, pour donner foy à nostre tesmoignage, nous le disons hors de propos.

D'autant qu'à mon aduis, des plus ordinaires choses, et plus communes, et cognuës, si nous sçauons trouuer leur for having to leave it. And among the first drawbacks he cited was the heaviness of head that the fireplaces elsewhere would give me. He had heard someone make this complaint and was pinning it on us, since habit kept him from noticing it at home. All heat that comes from a fire weakens me and makes me heavy. And yet Evenus said that fire was the best seasoning of life. I prefer any other way of escaping the cold.[27]

ENGLISH

We are wary of wine from the bottom of the cask; in Portugal that heady flavor is a delight and the drink of princes. In short, each nation has many customs and usages that are not only unknown but strange and astonishing to some other nation. What are we to do with people who accept only printed testimony, who do not believe men unless they are in a book, nor truth unless it is of a respectable age? We dignify our follies when we put them into print. For such people it carries quite another weight to say "I have read it" than to say "I have heard it said."

But I do not disbelieve men's mouths any more than their hands. I know that people write as rashly as they speak, and I think this age as good as any past one. So I cite a friend of mine as readily as Aulus Gellius or Macrobius, and what I have seen as readily as what they have written. And as they hold that virtue is no greater for lasting longer, so I hold that truth is no wiser for being older. I often say that it is sheer folly that makes us run after foreign and scholastic examples. They are as plentiful now as in the time of Homer and Plato.[28]

But is it not that we seek the honor of quoting more than the truth of the argument? As if it counted for more to borrow our proofs from the shop of Vascosan or Plantin than from what can be seen in our own village. Or else, surely, that we do not have the wit to sift and make the most of what happens before our eyes, and to judge it keenly enough to make an example of it. For if we say that we lack the authority to make our testimony believed, we are speaking beside the point.[29]

Because in my opinion the greatest miracles of nature and the most marvelous examples, espe-

27 Evenus of Paros, Greek elegiac poet of the 5th century BC.
28 Aulus Gellius (2nd century AD) and Macrobius (5th century AD), Latin authors of miscellanies full of anecdotes and quotations.
29 Michel de Vascosan and Christophe Plantin, leading printers of Paris and Antwerp.

FRENCH

iour, se peuuent former les plus grands miracles de nature, et les plus merueilleux exemples, notamment sur le subiect des actions humaines.

3.13.23 Or sur mon subiect, laissant les exemples que ie sçay par les liures: et ce que dit Aristote d'Andron Argien, qu'il trauersoit sans boire les arides sablons de la Lybie: vn Gentil-homme qui s'est acquitté dignement de plusieurs charges, disoit où i'estois qu'il estoit allé de Madrid à Lisbonne, en plain esté, sans boire. Il se porte vigoureusement pour son aage, et n'a rien d'extraordinaire en l'vsage de sa vie, que cecy, d'estre deux ou trois mois, voire vn an, ce m'a-il dit, sans boire. Il sent de l'alteration, mais il la laisse passer: et tient, que c'est vn appetit qui s'alanguit aiséement de soy-mesme: et boit plus par caprice, que pour le besoing, ou pour le plaisir.

3.13.24 En voicy d'vn autre. Il n'y a pas long temps, que ie rencontray l'vn des plus sçauans hommes de France, entre ceux de non mediocre fortune, estudiant au coin d'vne sale, qu'on luy auoit rembarré de tapisserie: et autour de luy, vn tabut de ses valets, plain de licence. Il me dit, et Seneque quasi autant de soy, qu'il faisoit son profit de ce tintamarre: comme si battu de ce bruict, il se ramenast et reserrast plus en soy, pour la contemplation, et que cette tempeste de voix repercutast ses pensées au dedans.

Estant escholier à Padoüe, il eut son estude si long temps logé à la batterie des coches, et du tumulte de la place, qu'il se forma non seulement au mespris, mais à l'vsage du bruit, pour le seruice de ses estudes. Socrates respondit à Alcibiades, s'estonnant comme il pouuoit porter le continuel tintamarre de la teste de sa femme: Comme ceux, qui sont accoustumez à l'ordinaire bruit des rouës à puiser de l'eau. Ie suis bien au contraire: i'ay l'esprit tendre et facile à prendre l'essor. Quand il est empesché à part soy, le moindre bourdonnement de mousche l'assassine.

3.13.25 Seneque en sa ieunesse, ayant mordu chaudement, à l'exemple de Sextius, de ne manger chose, qui eust prins mort, s'en passoit dans vn an, auec plaisir, comme il dit. Et s'en deporta seulement, pour n'estre soupçonné, d'emprunter cette regle d'aucunes religions nouuelles, qui la semoyent. Il print quand et quand des preceptes d'Attalus, de ne se coucher plus sur des loudiers, qui enfondrent: et employa iusqu'à la vieillesse ceux qui ne cedent point au corps. Ce que l'vsage de son temps, luy cially on the subject of human actions, can be made out of the most ordinary, common and familiar things, if we know how to see them in the right light.

ENGLISH

Now, on my subject, leaving aside the examples I know from books, and what Aristotle says of Andron of Argos, that he crossed the arid sands of Libya without drinking: a gentleman who has worthily discharged several offices said in my presence that he had gone from Madrid to Lisbon in midsummer without drinking. He is vigorous for his age and has nothing extraordinary in his way of life except this: he goes two or three months, even a year, he told me, without drinking. He feels thirst, but lets it pass, and holds that it is an appetite that easily dies down of itself. He drinks more from whim than from need or for pleasure.

Here is an example of another kind. Not long ago I came upon one of the most learned men in France, among those of no mean fortune, studying in a corner of a hall that had been partitioned off for him with tapestry, and around him an uproar of his servants, taking every liberty. He told me, and Seneca says almost as much of himself, that he profited from this din: as if, battered by the noise, he drew back and gathered himself more closely into himself for contemplation, and this storm of voices drove his thoughts back inward.

When he was a student at Padua, his study was lodged so long amid the clatter of coaches and the tumult of the square that he trained himself not only to scorn noise but to make use of it in the service of his studies. Alcibiades once wondered how Socrates could bear the endless din of his wife's temper, and Socrates answered: "As those do who are used to the ordinary noise of wheels drawing water." I am quite the opposite. My mind is delicate and quick to take flight. When it is busy on its own, the slightest buzzing of a fly murders it.

Seneca in his youth eagerly took up the example of Sextius and ate nothing that had been killed. He did without it for a year, with pleasure, as he says, and gave it up only so as not to be suspected of borrowing this rule from certain new religions that were spreading it. At the same time he adopted Attalus's precept of no longer lying on mattresses that sink under you, and used, right into faict compter à rudesse, le nostre, nous le faict tenir à mollesse.

FRENCH

3.13.26 Regardez la difference du viure de mes valets à bras, à la mienne: les Scythes et les Indes n'ont rien plus eslongné de ma force, et de ma forme. Ie sçay, auoir retiré de l'aumosne, des enfans pour m'en seruir, qui bien tost apres m'ont quicté et ma cuisine, et leur liurée: seulement, pour se rendre à leur premiere vie. Et en trouuay vn, amassant depuis, des moules, emmy la voirie, pour son disner, que par priere, ny par menasse, ie ne sçeu distraire de la saueur et douceur, qu'il trouuoit en l'indigence. Les gueux ont leurs magnificences, et leurs voluptez, comme les riches: et, dit-on, leurs dignitez et ordres politiques. Ce sont effects de l'accoustumance.

Elle nous peut duire, non seulement à telle forme qu'il luy plaist (pourtant, disent les sages, nous faut-il planter à la meilleure, qu'elle nous facilitera incontinent) mais aussi au changement et à la variation: qui est le plus noble, et le plus vtile de ses apprentissages. La meilleure de mes complexions corporelles, c'est d'estre flexible et peu opiniastre. I'ay des inclinations plus propres et ordinaires, et plus aggreables, que d'autres. Mais auec bien peu d'effort, ie m'en destourne, et me coule aiséement à la façon contraire. Vn ieune homme, doit troubler ses regles, pour esueiller sa vigueur: la garder de moisir et s'apoltronir. Et n'est train de vie, si sot et si debile, que celuy qui se conduict par ordonnance et discipline.

Ad primum lapidem vectari cùm placet, hora
Sumitur ex libro; si prurit frictus ocelli
Angulus, inspecta genesi collyria quærit. Il se reiettera souuent aux excez mesme, s'il m'en croit: autrement, la moindre desbauche le ruyne. Il se rend incommode et desaggreable en conuersation. La plus contraire qualité à vn honneste homme, c'est la delicatesse et obligation à certaine façon particuliere. Et elle est particuliere, si elle n'est ployable, et soupple. Il y a de la honte, de laisser à faire par impuissance, ou de n'oser, ce qu'on voit faire à ses compaignons. Que telles gens gardent leur cuisine. Par tout ailleurs, il est indecent: mais à vn homme de guerre, il est vitieux et insupportable.

ENGLISH

old age, the kind that do not yield to the body. What the usage of his time made him count as hardness, ours makes us consider softness.[30]

Look at the difference between my laborers' way of living and mine: the Scythians and the Indians have nothing further removed from my strength and my ways. I know that I have taken children off begging to serve me, who soon afterward left me, my kitchen and their livery, simply to go back to their former life. And later I found one of them gathering mussels in the refuse for his dinner, and neither by entreaty nor by threat could I draw him away from the savor and sweetness he found in poverty. Beggars have their magnificences and their pleasures, like the rich, and, they say, their dignities and political orders. These are the effects of habit.

Habit can shape us not only to whatever form it pleases (and that is why, say the wise, we must fix ourselves on the best, which habit will at once make easy for us), but also to change and variation, which is the noblest and most useful of its lessons. The best of my bodily qualities is that I am flexible and not very obstinate. I have inclinations that are more my own, more usual and more agreeable than others; but with very little effort I turn away from them and slip easily into the opposite way. A young man should upset his rules to rouse his vigor and keep it from going moldy and slack. And there is no way of life so foolish and so feeble as one conducted by prescription and discipline.

If he wants to ride out as far as the first milestone, the hour is taken from his book; if the corner of his eye itches from rubbing, he consults his horoscope before seeking eye-salve. He will often throw himself even into excess, if he takes my advice; otherwise the slightest indulgence will ruin him. He becomes awkward and disagreeable in company. The quality most contrary to a man of good breeding is fastidiousness and being tied to some particular way of doing things. And it is particular if it is not pliable and supple. It is shameful to leave undone, from incapacity or from not daring, what one sees one's 30 Attalus was a Stoic philosopher whose teaching Seneca followed.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
	companions doing. Let such people stay in their kitchens. Everywhere else this is unbecoming; but in a soldier it is a vice and intolerable.[31]
Lequel, comme disoit Philopœmen, se doit accoustumer à toute diuersité, et inegalité de vie.	For a soldier, as Philopoemen said, should accustom himself to every variety and unevenness of life.

THE HOLD OF HABIT

Habit has made him depend on certain comforts, though flexibility is the better rule.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.27 Quoy que i'aye esté dressé autant qu'on a peu, à la liberté et à l'indifference, si est-ce que par nonchalance, m'estant en vieillissant, plus arresté sur certaines formes (mon aage est hors d'institution, et n'a desormais dequoy regarder ailleurs qu'à se maintenir) la coustume a desia sans y penser, imprimé si bien en moy son charactere, en certaines choses, que i'appelle excez de m'en despartir.	I was trained as much as possible to freedom and indifference. Nevertheless, through carelessness, I have settled more on certain ways as I grew old (my age is past education and has nothing left to look to but keeping itself going), and custom has already, without my noticing, so stamped its character on me in certain things that I call it excess to depart from them.
Et sans m'essayer, ne puis, ny dormir sur iour, ny faire collation entre les repas, ny desieuner, ny m'aller coucher sans grand interualle, comme de trois heures, apres le soupper, ny faire des enfans, qu'auant le sommeil: ny les faire debout: ny porter ma sueur: ny m'abreuuer d'eau pure ou de vin pur: ny me tenir nud teste long temps: ny me faire tondre apres disner. Et me passerois autant mal-aisément de mes gans, que de ma chemise: et de me lauer à l'issuë de table, et à mon leuer: et de ciel et rideaux à mon lict, comme de choses bien necessaires. Ie disnerois sans nape: mais à l'Alemande sans seruiette blanche, tres-incommodéement.	And without an effort I cannot sleep by day, nor eat between meals, nor have breakfast, nor go to bed without a long interval, of some three hours, after supper, nor make children except before sleeping, nor make them standing up, nor bear my own sweat, nor quench my thirst with pure water or pure wine, nor stay bareheaded for long, nor have my hair cut after dinner. And I would do without my gloves as uneasily as without my shirt, and without washing when I leave the table and when I get up, and without a canopy and curtains on my bed, as things quite necessary. I could dine without a tablecloth; but without a clean napkin, in the German manner, very uncomfortably.
Ie les souïlle plus qu'eux et les Italiens ne font: et m'ayde peu de cullier, et de fourchete. Ie plains qu'on n'aye suyuy vn train, que i'ay veu commencer à l'exemple des Roys: Qu'on nous changeast de seruiette, selon les seruices, comme d'assiette. Nous tenons de ce laborieux soldat Marius, que vieillissant, il deuint delicat en son boire: et ne le prenoit qu'en vne sienne couppe particuliere. Moy ie me laisse aller de mesme à certaine forme de verres, et ne boy pas volontiers en verre commun. Non plus que d'vne main commune. Tout metail m'y desplaist au prix d'vne matiere claire et transparante. Que mes yeux y tastent aussi selon leur capacité. Ie dois plusieurs telles mollesses à l'vsage.	I soil napkins more than the Germans and the Italians do, and I make little use of spoon and fork. I regret that people have not kept up a practice I saw begun after the example of kings: that our napkins should be changed with each course, like our plates. We are told of that hardworking soldier Marius that as he grew old he became fastidious about his drink and would take it only from a particular cup of his own. I too let myself favor a certain shape of glass, and I do not like drinking from a common glass, any more than from a common hand. All metal displeases me compared with a clear, transparent material. Let my eyes taste as well, as far as they can. I owe several such softnesses to habit.

31 Juvenal, Satires VI.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Nature m'a aussi d'autre part apporté les siennes: comme de ne soustenir plus deux plains repas en vn iour, sans surcharger mon estomach: ny l'abstinence pure de l'vn des repas: sans me remplir de vents, assecher ma bouche, estonner mon appetit. De m'offenser d'vn long serein. Car depuis quelques années, aux couruées de la guerre, quand toute la nuict y court, comme il aduient communément, apres cinq ou six heures, l'estomach me commence à troubler, auec vehemente douleur de teste: et n'arriue point au iour, sans vomir. Comme les autres s'en vont desieuner, ie m'en vay dormir: et au partir de là, aussi gay qu'au parauant.

Nature, on the other hand, has also brought me her own: for instance, I can no longer stand two full meals in one day without overloading my stomach, nor go without one of the meals entirely without filling up with wind, drying my mouth and stunning my appetite. And I am harmed by long exposure to the night air. For some years now, on night expeditions in the wars, when they last all night, as commonly happens, after five or six hours my stomach begins to be upset, with a violent headache, and I do not reach daylight without vomiting. When the others go off to breakfast, I go off to sleep, and afterward I am as cheerful as before.

I'auois tousiours appris, que le serein ne s'espandoit qu'à la naissance de la nuict: mais hantant ces années passées familierement, et long temps, vn seigneur imbu de cette creance, que le serein est plus aspre et dangereux sur l'inclination du soleil, vne heure ou deux auant son coucher: lequel il euite songneusement, et mesprise celuy de la nuict: il a cuidé m'imprimer, non tant son discours, que son sentiment. Quoy, que le doubte mesme, et l'inquisition frappe nostre imagination, et nous change? Ceux qui cedent tout à coup à ces pentes, attirent l'entiere ruine sur eux. Et plains plusieurs Gentilshommes, qui par la sottise de leurs medecins, se sont mis en chartre tous ieunes et entiers.

I had always been taught that the evening damp spread only at nightfall. But in these past years I spent much time, and for a long while, with a lord imbued with the belief that the damp is harsher and more dangerous as the sun goes down, an hour or two before it sets. He carefully avoids it and scorns the damp of the night. He very nearly impressed on me not so much his reasoning as his feeling. What! Can mere doubt and inquiry strike our imagination and change us? Those who give in all at once to these tendencies bring complete ruin on themselves. And I pity several gentlemen who, through the folly of their physicians, have shut themselves up like prisoners while still young and sound.

Encores vaudroit-il mieux souffrir vn reume, que de perdre pour iamais, par desaccoustumance, le commerce de la vie commune, en action de si grand vsage. Fascheuse science: qui nous descrie les plus douces heures du iour. Estendons nostre possession iusques aux derniers moyens. Le plus souuent on s'y durcit, en s'opiniastrant, et corrige lon sa complexion: comme fit Cæsar le haut mal, à force de le mespriser et corrompre. On se doit adonner aux meilleures regles, mais non pas s'y asseruir: si ce n'est à celles, s'il y en a quelqu'vne, ausquelles l'obligation et seruitude soit vtile.

Even so, it would be better to suffer a cold than to lose forever, through disuse, the company of ordinary life in an activity of such common use. A troublesome science, that spoils for us the sweetest hours of the day! Let us stretch our hold on life to its very last means. Most often one hardens oneself by persisting, and corrects one's constitution, as Caesar did with his epilepsy, by dint of scorning and thwarting it. One should devote oneself to the best rules, but not enslave oneself to them, except to those, if there are any, to which obligation and servitude are useful.

3.13.28 Et les Roys et les philosophes fientent, et les dames aussi. Les vies publiques se doiuent à la ceremonie: la mienne obscure et priuée, iouït de toute dispence naturelle. Soldat et Gascon, sont qualitez aussi, vn peu subiettes à l'indiscretion. Parquoy, ie diray cecy de cette action: qu'il

Kings and philosophers defecate, and so do ladies. Public lives are owed to ceremony; mine, obscure and private, enjoys every natural dispensation. Soldier and Gascon are also qualities a little given to indiscretion. So I will say this of that function: it est besoing de la renuoyer à certaines heures, prescriptes et nocturnes, et s'y forcer par coustume, et assubiectir, comme i'ay faict. Mais non s'assuiectir, comme i'ay faict en vieillissant, au soing de particuliere commodité de lieu, et de siege, pour ce seruice: et le rendre empeschant par longueur et mollesse. Toutesfois aux plus sales offices, est-il pas aucunement excusable, de requerir plus de soing et de netteté?

FRENCH

Naturâ homo mundum et elegans animal est. De toutes les actions naturelles, c'est celle, que ie souffre plus mal volontiers m'estre interrompue. I'ay veu beaucoup de gens de guerre, incommodez du desreiglement de leur ventre. Tandis que le mien et moy, ne nous faillions iamais au poinct de nostre assignation: qui est au sault du lict, si quelque violente occupation, ou maladie ne nous trouble.

3.13.29 Ie ne iuge donc point, comme ie disois, où les malades se puissent mettre mieux en seurté, qu'en se tenant coy, dans le train de vie, où ils se sont esleuez et nourris. Le changement, quel qu'il soit, estonne et blesse. Allez croire que les chastaignes nuisent à vn Perigourdin, ou à vn Lucquois: et le laict et le fromage aux gens de la montaigne. On leur va ordonnant, vne non seulement nouuelle, mais contraire forme de vie. Mutation qu'vn sain ne pourroit souffrir. Ordonnez de l'eau à vn Breton de soixante dix ans: enfermez dans vne estuue vn homme de marine: deffendez le promener à vn laquay Basque: ils les priuent de mouuement et en fin d'air et de lumiere. An viuere tanti est?

/ Cogimur à suetis animum suspendere rebus,
Atque, vt viuamus, viuere desinimus:
Hos superesse reor, quibus et spirabilis aer,
Et lux, qua regimur, redditur ipsa grauis. S'ils ne font autre bien, ils font aumoins cecy, qu'ils preparent de bonne heure les patiens à la mort, leur sapant peu à peu et retranchant l'vsage de la vie.

ENGLISH

should be put off to certain set hours, at night, and one should force and subject oneself to them by habit, as I have done. But one should not subject oneself, as I have done in growing old, to worrying about a particular comfort of place and seat for this service, and make it a nuisance by dawdling and softness. Still, in the dirtiest functions, is it not somewhat excusable to require more care and cleanliness?

By nature man is a clean and dainty animal. Of all natural functions, it is the one I least willingly allow to be interrupted. I have seen many soldiers inconvenienced by the irregularity of their bowels. Mine and I, on the other hand, never fail to keep our appointment, which is the moment I jump out of bed, unless some violent business or illness disturbs us.[32]

So I do not think, as I was saying, that sick people can put themselves anywhere safer than by keeping quietly to the way of life in which they were raised and brought up. Change of any kind stuns and wounds. Go and believe that chestnuts harm a man from Périgord or from Lucca, and milk and cheese the mountain people! They go about prescribing for them a way of life that is not just new but contrary—a change a healthy man could not bear. Prescribe water to a Breton of seventy, shut a sailor up in a steam room, forbid a Basque footman to walk: they deprive them of movement, and in the end of air and light. Is life worth so much?

/ We are forced to wean our minds from the things we are used to,
and to stay alive we cease to live.
Shall I count those still living for whom the air they breathe and the very light that rules us have become a burden? If physicians do no other good, they at least do this: they prepare their patients for death in good time, undermining and cutting back, little by little, their enjoyment of life.[33]

32 Seneca, Letters 92.
33 Maximianus, Elegies I, then attributed to the Roman poet Cornelius Gallus.

TRUSTING APPETITE

He trusts his desires over physicians and finds pleasure the best medicine.

FRENCH

3.13.30 Et sain et malade, ie me suis volontiers laissé aller aux appetits qui me pressoient. Ie donne grande authorité à mes desirs et propensions. Ie n'ayme point à guarir le mal par le mal. Ie hay les remedes qui importunent plus que la maladie. D'estre subiect à la colique, et subiect à m'abstenir du plaisir de manger des huitres, ce sont deux maux pour vn. Le mal nous pinse d'vn costé, la regle de l'autre. Puis-qu'on est au hazard de se mesconter, hasardons nous plustost à la suitte du plaisir. Le monde faict au rebours, et ne pense rien vtile, qui ne soit penible. La facilité luy est suspecte.

Mon appetit en plusieurs choses, s'est assez heureusement accommodé par soy-mesme, et rangé à la santé de mon estomach. L'acrimonie et la pointe des sauces m'agréerent estant ieune: mon estomach s'en ennuyant depuis, le goust l'a incontinent suyuy. Le vin nuit aux malades: c'est la premiere chose, dequoy ma bouche se desgouste, et d'vn degoust inuincible. Quoy que ie reçoiue desagreablement, me nuyt; et rien ne me nuyt, que ie face auec faim, et allegresse. Ie n'ay iamais receu nuysance d'action, qui m'eust esté bien plaisante. Et si ay fait ceder à mon plaisir, bien largement, toute conclusion medicinalle.

Et me suis ieune, Quem circumcursans huc atque huc sæpe Cupido / Fulgebat crocina splendidus in tunica, presté autant licentieusement et inconsidérement qu'autre, au desir qui me tenoit saisi: Et militaui non sine gloria. Plus toutesfois en continuation et en durée, qu'en saillie. Sex me vix memini sustinuisse vices. Il y a du malheur certes, et du miracle, à confesser, en quelle foiblesse d'ans, ie me rencontray premierement en sa subiection. Ce fut bien rencontre: car ce fut long temps auant l'aage de choix et de cognoissance. Il ne me souuient point de moy de si loing. Et peut on marier ma fortune à celle de Quartilla, qui n'auoit point memoire de son fillage.

Inde tragus celerésque pili, mirandáque matri / Barba meæ. Les medecins ployent ordinairement auec vtilité, leurs regles, à la violence des enuies aspres, qui suruiennent

ENGLISH

Sick or well, I have readily let myself follow the appetites that pressed me. I give great authority to my desires and inclinations. I do not like to cure one ill with another. I hate remedies that are more troublesome than the illness. To be subject to the colic and subject to abstaining from the pleasure of eating oysters—that is two ills for one. The illness pinches us on one side, the rule on the other. Since we run the risk of getting it wrong, let us rather take the risk in pursuit of pleasure. The world does the opposite, and thinks nothing useful that is not painful. Ease is suspect to it.

My appetite has, in many things, adjusted itself quite happily on its own and fallen in with the health of my stomach. Sharp, pungent sauces pleased me when I was young; when my stomach later tired of them, my taste promptly followed suit. Wine harms the sick: it is the first thing my mouth loses its taste for, and with an invincible distaste. Whatever I take with displeasure harms me; and nothing harms me that I do with hunger and gusto. I have never been harmed by anything I did that was really pleasant to me. And yet I have made every medical conclusion give way, and very liberally, to my pleasure.

And when I was young, When Cupid, darting about me this way and that, / shone radiant in his saffron tunic, I gave myself up as licentiously and thoughtlessly as anyone to the desire that had me in its grip, And I campaigned, not without glory, more, however, in staying power and endurance than in sudden dashes: I barely remember managing six bouts. There is certainly something unfortunate, and something miraculous, in confessing how young I was when I first found myself in its subjection. It was indeed by chance, for it was long before the age of choice and knowledge. I do not remember myself so far back. And my fortune can be paired with that of Quartilla, who had no memory of her maidenhood.[34]

Hence the goatish smell, the early hair, and a beard / that amazed my mother. Physicians usually bend their rules, and usefully, to the violence of the 34 Quotations from Catullus, Horace (Odes III.26) and Ovid (Amores III.7); Quartilla is a character in Petronius' Satyricon.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	aux malades. Ce grand desir ne se peut imaginer, si estranger et vicieux, que Nature ne s'y applique. Et puis, combien est-ce de contenter la fantasie? A mon opinion cette piece là importe de tout: au moins, au delà de toute autre. Les plus griefs et ordinaires maux, sont ceux que la fantasie nous charge. Ce mot Espagnol me plaist à plusieurs visages: Defienda me Dios de my. Ie plains estant malade, dequoy ie n'ay quelque desir qui me donne ce contentement de l'assouuir: à peine m'en destourneroit la medecine. Autant en fay-ie sain.	sharp cravings that come over the sick. This great desire cannot be imagined so strange and perverse that Nature is not at work in it. And then, what a thing it is to satisfy the fancy! In my opinion this part matters above all—at least more than any other. The most grievous and common ills are those that fancy loads on us. This Spanish saying pleases me from many angles: God defend me from myself. When I am sick, I regret not having some desire that would give me the satisfaction of fulfilling it; medicine would hardly turn me from it. I do as much when I am well.[35]
	Ie ne voy guere plus qu'esperer et vouloir. C'est pitié d'estre alanguy et affoibly, iusques au souhaiter.	I can see little more left to me than hoping and wishing. It is a pitiful thing to be so languid and weakened that it reaches even one's wishes.
3.13.31	L'art de medecine, n'est pas si resolue, que nous soyons sans authorité, quoy que nous facions. Elle change selon les climats, et selon les Lunes: selon Fernel et selon l'Escale. Si vostre medecin ne trouue bon, que vous dormez, que vous vsez de vin, ou de telle viande: ne vous chaille: ie vous en trouueray vn autre qui ne sera pas de son aduis. La diuersité des arguments et opinions medicinales, embrasse toute sorte de formes. Ie vis vn miserable malade, creuer et se pasmer d'alteration, pour se guarir: et estre moqué depuis par vn autre medecin: condamnant ce conseil comme nuisible. Auoit-il pas bien employé sa peine?	The art of medicine is not so settled that we cannot find some authority for whatever we do. It changes with climates and with moons, with Fernel and with Scaliger. If your physician does not think it good for you to sleep, to drink wine, or to eat a certain food, don't worry: I will find you another who will not agree with him. The diversity of medical arguments and opinions covers every possible form. I saw a wretched sick man bursting and fainting with thirst in order to be cured, and afterward mocked by another physician who condemned that advice as harmful. Had he not put his suffering to good use?[36]
	Il est mort freschement de la pierre, vn homme de ce mestier, qui s'estoit seruy d'extreme abstinence à combattre son mal: ses compagnons disent, qu'au rebours, ce ieusne l'auoit asseché, et luy auoit cuit le sable dans les rongnons.	A man of that profession recently died of the stone who had used extreme abstinence to fight his illness; his colleagues say that, on the contrary, the fasting had dried him out and baked the sand in his kidneys.
3.13.32	I'ay apperceu qu'aux blesseures, et aux maladies, le parler m'esmeut et me nuit, autant que desordre que ie face. La voix me couste, et me lasse: car ie l'ay haute et efforcée. Si que, quand ie suis venu à entretenir l'oreille des grands, d'affaires de poix, ie les ay mis souuent en soing de moderer ma voix.	I have noticed that when I am wounded or ill, talking excites me and harms me as much as any excess I might commit. My voice costs me effort and tires me, for it is loud and strained; so that when I have had occasion to hold the ear of the great on weighty matters, I have often made them anxious to get me to moderate my voice.
3.13.33	Ce compte merite de me diuertir. Quelqu'vn, en certaine eschole Grecque, parloit haut comme moy: le maistre des ceremonies luy manda qu'il parlast plus bas: Qu'il m'enuoye, fit-il, le ton auquel il veut que ie parle. L'autre luy repliqua, qu'il prinst son ton des oreilles de celuy à	This story deserves a digression. Someone in a certain Greek school spoke loudly, as I do; the master of ceremonies sent word to him to speak lower. "Let him send me," he said, "the pitch at

35 Martial, Epigrams.
36 Jean Fernel (1497–1558), physician to Henry II; Julius Caesar Scaliger (1484–1558), physician and scholar.

FRENCH

qui il parloit. C'estoit bien dit, pourueu qu'il s'entende: Parlez selon ce que vous auez affaire à vostre auditeur. Car si c'est à dire, suffise vous qu'il vous oye: ou, reglez vous par luy: ie ne trouue pas que ce fust raison. Le ton et mouuement de la voix, a quelque expression, et signification de mon sens: c'est à moy à le conduire, pour me representer.

Il y a voix pour instruire, voix pour flater, ou pour tancer. Ie veux que ma voix non seulement arriue à luy, mais à l'auanture qu'elle le frappe, et qu'elle le perse. Quand ie mastine mon laquay, d'vn ton aigre et poignant: il seroit bon qu'il vinst à me dire: Mon maistre parlez plus doux, ie vous oy bien. Est quædam vox ad auditum accommodata, non magnitudine, sed proprietate. La parole est moitié à celuy qui parle, moitié à celuy qui l'escoute. Cestuy-cy se doibt preparer à la receuoir, selon le branle qu'elle prend. Comme entre ceux qui ioüent à la paume, celuy qui soustient, se desmarche et s'appreste, selon qu'il voit remuer celuy qui luy iette le coup, et selon la forme du coup.

ENGLISH

which he wants me to speak." The other replied that he should take his pitch from the ears of the person he was speaking to. That was well said, provided it is understood to mean: "Speak according to what you have to do with your listener." For if it means "Be content that he hears you," or "Regulate yourself by him," I do not find that reasonable. The tone and movement of the voice carry some expression and signification of my meaning; it is up to me to direct it so as to represent myself.

There is a voice for instructing, a voice for flattering, or for scolding. I want my voice not only to reach him but, as it may be, to strike him and pierce him. When I am berating my footman in a sharp, cutting tone, it would be a fine thing if he were to come and tell me, "Master, speak more softly; I can hear you perfectly well." There is a kind of voice suited to the hearing, not by its volume but by its quality. Speech belongs half to the one who speaks, half to the one who listens. The listener must prepare to receive it according to the motion it takes. So among tennis players, the one who receives steps back and gets ready according to how he sees the one hitting the ball to him move, and according to the kind of stroke.[37]

LETTING ILLNESS RUN ITS COURSE

Diseases have their own life span, and impatience only prolongs them.

FRENCH

3.13.34 L'experience m'a encores appris cecy, que nous nous perdons d'impatience. Les maux ont leur vie, et leurs bornes, leurs maladies et leur santé. La constitution des maladies, est formée au patron de la constitution des animaux. Elles ont leur fortune limitée dès leur naissance: et leurs iours. Qui essaye de les abbreger imperieusement, par force, au trauers de leur course, il les allonge et multiplie: et les harselle, au lieu de les appaiser. Ie suis de l'aduis de Crantor, qu'il ne faut ny obstinéement s'opposer aux maux, et à l'estourdi: ny leur succomber de mollesse: mais qu'il leur faut ceder naturellement, selon leur condition et la nostre. On doit donner passage aux maladies: et ie trouue qu'elles arrestent moins chez moy, qui les laisse faire.

ENGLISH

Experience has also taught me this: that we ruin ourselves through impatience. Ills have their life and their limits, their sicknesses and their health. The constitution of diseases is formed on the pattern of the constitution of animals. Their fortune is limited from their birth, and so are their days. Whoever tries to cut them short imperiously, by force, in the middle of their course, lengthens and multiplies them, and harasses them instead of calming them. I agree with Crantor that we must neither oppose our ills obstinately and recklessly nor succumb to them from weakness, but give way to them naturally, according to their condition and ours. We must let diseases pass through; and I find they stay less long with me, because I let them run their course.[38]

37 Quintilian, Training of the Orator XI.3.
38 Crantor (c. 335–275 BC), philosopher of Plato's Academy, author of a famous work On Grief.

FRENCH

Et en ay perdu de celles qu'on estime plus opiniastres et tenaces, de leur propre decadence: sans ayde et sans art, et contre ses regles. Laissons faire vn peu à Nature: elle entend mieux ses affaires que nous. Mais vn tel en mourut. Si ferez vous: sinon de ce mal là, d'vn autre. Et combien n'ont pas laissé d'en mourir, ayants trois medecins à leur cul? L'exemple est vn miroüer vague, vniuersel et à tout sens. Si c'est vne medecine voluptueuse, acceptez la; c'est tousiours autant de bien present. Ie ne m'arresteray ny au nom ny à la couleur, si elle est delicieuse et appetissante. Le plaisir est des principales especes du profit.

I'ay laissé enuieillir et mourir en moy, de mort naturelle, des rheumes; defluxions goutteuses; relaxation; battement de cœur; micraines; et autres accidens, que i'ay perdu, quand ie m'estois à demy formé à les nourrir. On les coniure mieux par courtoisie, que par brauerie. Il faut souffrir doucement les loix de nostre condition. Nous sommes pour vieillir, pour affoiblir, pour estre malades, en despit de toute medecine. C'est la premiere leçon, que les Mexicains font à leurs enfans; quand au partir du ventre des meres, ils les vont saluant, ainsin: Enfant, tu és venu au monde pour endurer: endure, souffre, et tais toy. C'est iniustice de se douloir qu'il soit aduenu à quelqu'vn, ce qui peut aduenir à chacun.

Indignare si quid in te iniquè propriè constitutum est.

3.13.35 Voyez vn vieillart, qui demande à Dieu qu'il luy maintienne sa santé entiere et vigoureuse; c'est à dire qu'il le remette en ieunesse. Stulte, quid hæc frustra votis puerilibus optas? N'est-ce pas folie? Sa condition ne le porte pas. La goutte, la grauelle, l'indigestion, sont symptomes des longues années; comme des longs voyages, la chaleur, les pluyes, et les vents. Platon ne croit pas, qu'Æsculape se mist en peine, de prouuoir par regimes, à faire durer la vie, en vn corps gasté et imbecille: inutile à son pays, inutile à sa vacation: et à produire des enfants sains et robustes: et ne trouue pas ce soing conuenable à la iustice et prudence diuine, qui doit conduire toutes choses à l'vtilité.

ENGLISH

And I have lost some of those considered most stubborn and tenacious through their own decline, without help and without the art of medicine, and against its rules. Let us leave things a little to Nature: she understands her business better than we do. "But so-and-so died of it." So will you—if not of that illness, then of another. And how many have nonetheless died of it with three physicians at their backsides? Example is a hazy mirror, universal, reflecting every way. If it is a pleasant medicine, accept it; it is always so much present good. I will not dwell on the name or the color if it is delicious and appetizing. Pleasure is one of the chief kinds of profit.

I have let colds, gouty discharges, looseness, palpitations of the heart, migraines and other ailments grow old in me and die a natural death—ailments I lost just when I had half trained myself to nurse them. They are better conjured away by courtesy than by bravado. We must gently endure the laws of our condition. We are made to grow old, to grow weak, to be sick, in spite of all medicine. That is the first lesson the Mexicans give their children, when, as they come out of their mothers' wombs, they greet them thus: "Child, you have come into the world to endure: endure, suffer, and be quiet." It is unjust to lament that something has happened to someone which can happen to anyone.

Be indignant if any decree has been unjustly made against you alone.[39]

Look at an old man asking God to keep his health whole and vigorous—that is to say, to make him young again. Fool, why do you vainly wish for these things with childish prayers? Is it not folly? His condition does not allow it. Gout, gravel and indigestion are symptoms of long years, as heat, rain and wind are of long journeys. Plato does not believe that Aesculapius troubled to provide, by regimens, for prolonging life in a spoiled and feeble body, useless to its country, useless to its calling and to producing healthy and robust children; nor does he find such care fitting to divine justice and wisdom, which must guide all things toward what is useful.[40]

39 Seneca, Letters 91.
40 Ovid, Tristia III.8; Plato, Republic III.

FRENCH

Mon bon homme, c'est faict: on ne vous sçauroit redresser: on vous plastrera pour le plus, et estançonnera vn peu, et allongera-lon de quelque heure vostre misere. Non secus instantem cupiens fulcire ruinam,
Diuersis contrà nititur obijcibus,
Donec certa dies, omni compage soluta,
Ipsum cum rebus subruat auxilium. Il faut apprendre à souffrir, ce qu'on ne peut euiter. Nostre vie est composée, comme l'harmonie du monde, de choses contraires, aussi de diuers tons, doux et aspres, aigus et plats, mols et graues. Le musicien qui n'en aymeroit que les vns, que voudroit il dire? Il faut qu'il s'en sçache seruir en commun, et les mesler. Et nous aussi, les biens et les maux, qui sont consubstantiels à nostre vie.

ENGLISH

My good man, it's over: no one can set you straight again; at most they will plaster you up and prop you a little, and prolong your misery by an hour or so. Just so, a man who wants to shore up a building about to fall sets various supports against it, until the fixed day comes and, with every joint loosened, brings down the props themselves along with the house. We must learn to endure what we cannot avoid. Our life is composed, like the harmony of the world, of contrary things, and also of different tones, sweet and harsh, sharp and flat, soft and deep. What would a musician mean who liked only some of them? He must know how to use them all together and blend them. And so must we with the goods and ills that are consubstantial with our life.

Nostre estre ne peut sans ce meslange; et y est l'vne bande non moins necessaire que l'autre. D'essayer à regimber contre la necessité naturelle, c'est representer la folie de Ctesiphon, qui entreprenoit de faire à coups de pied auec sa mule.

Our being cannot do without this mixture, and one side is no less necessary to it than the other. To try to kick against natural necessity is to reenact the folly of Ctesiphon, who took it upon himself to have a kicking match with his mule.[41]

CONSOLING MYSELF FOR THE STONE

His mind argues that the kidney stone is mild, deserved and a lesson in dying.

FRENCH

3.13.36 Ie consulte peu, des alterations, que ie sens. Car ces gens icy sont auantageux, quand ils vous tiennent à leur misericorde. Ils vous gourmandent les oreilles, de leurs prognostiques, et me surprenant autre fois affoibly du mal, m'ont iniurieusement traicté de leurs dogmes, et troigne magistrale: me menassant tantost de grandes douleurs, tantost de mort prochaine. Ie n'en estois abbatu, ny deslogé de ma place, mais i'en estois heurté et poussé. Si mon iugement n'en est ny changé, ny troublé: au moins il en estoit empesché. C'est tousiours agitation et combat. Or ie traicte mon imagination le plus doucement que ie puis; et la deschargerois si ie pouuois, de toute peine et contestation. Il la faut secourir, et flatter, et pipper qui peut.

Mon esprit est propre à cet office. Il n'a point faute d'apparences par tout. S'il persuadoit, comme il presche, il me secourroit heureusement. Vous en plaist-il vn exemple? Il dict, que c'est pour mon mieux, que i'ay la

ENGLISH

I seldom consult anyone about the changes I feel. For these people are overbearing when they have you at their mercy. They batter your ears with their prognoses; and once, catching me weakened by illness, they treated me insultingly with their dogmas and their magisterial frowns, threatening me now with great pains, now with approaching death. I was not knocked down by it or dislodged from my position, but I was jostled and pushed. If my judgment was neither changed nor troubled by it, at least it was hindered. It is always agitation and combat. Now, I treat my imagination as gently as I can, and would relieve it, if I could, of all pain and strife. One must help it, and flatter it, and fool it if one can.

My mind is well suited to this task. It never lacks plausible arguments about anything. If it persuaded as well as it preaches, it would help me ad-

41 Plutarch tells of Ctesiphon, a wrestler, who kicked back at his mule (On Controlling Anger).

FRENCH

grauele. Que les bastimens de mon aage, ont naturellement à souffrir quelque gouttiere. Il est temps qu'ils commencent à se lascher et desmentir. C'est vne commune necessité. Et n'eust on pas faict pour moy, vn nouueau miracle. Ie paye par là, le loyer deu à la vieillesse; et ne sçaurois en auoir meilleur comte. Que la compagnie me doit consoler; estant tombé en l'accident le plus ordinaire des hommes de mon temps. I'en vois par tout d'affligez de mesme nature de mal.

Et m'en est la societé honorable, d'autant qu'il se prend plus volontiers aux grands: son essence a de la noblesse et de la dignité. Que des hommes qui en sont frappez, il en est peu de quittes à meilleure raison: et si, il leur couste la peine d'vn facheux regime, et la prise ennuieuse, et quotidienne, des drogues medecinales. Là où, ie le doy purement à ma bonne fortune. Car quelques bouillons communs de l'eringium, et herbe du Turc, que deux ou trois fois i'ay aualé, en faueur des dames, qui plus gracieusement que mon mal n'est aigre, m'en offroyent la moitié du leur, m'ont semblé egalement faciles à prendre, et inutiles en operation.

Ils ont à payer mille vœux à Æsculape, et autant d'escus à leur medecin, de la profluuion de sable aisée et abondante, que ie reçoy souuent par le benefice de Nature. La decence mesme de ma contenance en compagnie, n'en est pas troublée: et porte mon eau dix heures, et aussi long temps qu'vn sain. La crainte de ce mal, dit-il, t'effrayoit autresfois, quand il t'estoit incogneu. Les cris et le desespoir, de ceux qui l'aigrissent par leur impatience, t'en engendroient l'horreur. C'est vn mal, qui te bat les membres, par lesquels tu as le plus failly. Tu és homme de conscience: Quæ venit indignè pœna, dolenda venit. Regarde ce chastiement; il est bien doux au prix d'autres, et d'vne faueur paternelle.

Regarde sa tardifueté: il n'incommode et occupe, que la saison de ta vie, qui ainsi comme ainsin est mes-huy perdue et sterile; ayant faict place à la licence et plaisirs de ta ieunesse, comme par composition. La crainte et pitié, que le peuple a de ce mal, te sert de matiere de gloire. Qualité, de laquelle si tu as le iugement purgé, et mirably. Would you like an example? It says that it is for my own good that I have the gravel; that buildings of my age naturally have to suffer some leaks; that it is time they began to loosen and give way. It is a common necessity, and no new miracle would have been worked for my sake. By this I pay the rent due to old age, and I could not get a better bargain. And the company, it says, ought to console me, since I have fallen into the most common ailment of men of my time. Everywhere I see men afflicted with the same kind of illness.[42]

ENGLISH

And I find its fellowship honorable, all the more since it prefers to attack the great: its essence has nobility and dignity. Of the men who are stricken with it, few get off more cheaply; and even so it costs them the trouble of an irksome diet and the tedious daily taking of medicinal drugs, whereas I owe it purely to my good fortune. For a few ordinary broths of eryngo and Turkish herb, which I have swallowed two or three times to oblige the ladies—who, more graciously than my illness is bitter, offered me half of theirs—seemed to me as easy to take as they were useless in their effect.[43]

They have to pay a thousand vows to Aesculapius, and as many crowns to their physician, for the easy and abundant flow of sand that I often receive by the bounty of Nature. Even the decorum of my bearing in company is not disturbed by it, and I can hold my water for ten hours, as long as a healthy man. The fear of this illness, it says, used to frighten you when you did not know it. The cries and despair of those who make it worse by their impatience bred in you a horror of it. It is an illness that strikes you in the members through which you have sinned most. You are a man of conscience: The punishment that comes undeserved is the one to grieve over. Look at this chastisement: it is very mild compared with others, and shows a fatherly favor.[44]

Look at how late it came: it troubles and occupies only that season of your life which, one way or another, is by now lost and barren, having made way for the license and pleasures of your youth, as if by agreement. The fear and pity people feel for this illness give you matter for glory—a quality

42 The gravel: small kidney stones.
43 Eryngo (sea holly) and "Turkish herb" (rupturewort) were remedies for the stone.
44 Ovid, Heroides V.

FRENCH

en as guery ton discours, tes amis pourtant en recognoissent encore quelque teinture en ta complexion. Il y a plaisir à ouyr dire de soy: Voyla bien de la force: voila bien de la patience.

On te voit suer d'ahan, pallir, rougir, trembler, vomir iusques au sang, souffrir des contractions et conuulsions estranges, degoutter par fois de grosses larmes des yeux, rendre les vrines espesses, noires, et effroyables, ou les auoir arrestées par quelque pierre espineuse et herissée qui te poinct, et escorche cruellement le col de la verge, entretenant cependant les assistans, d'vne contenance commune; bouffonant à pauses auec tes gens: tenant ta partie en vn discours tendu: excusant de parolle ta douleur, et rabbatant de ta souffrance. Te souuient-il de ces gens du temps passé, qui recherchoyent les maux auec si grand faim, pour tenir leur vertu en haleine, et en exercice?

mets le cas que Nature te porte, et te pousse à cette glorieuse escole, en laquelle tu ne fusses iamais entré de ton gré. Si tu me dis, que c'est vn mal dangereux et mortel: quels autres ne le sont? Car c'est vne pipperie medecinale, d'en excepter aucuns; qu'ils disent n'aller point de droict fil à la mort. Qu'importe, s'ils y vont par accident; et s'ils glissent, et gauchissent aisément, vers la voye qui nous y meine? Mais tu ne meurs pas de ce que tu es malade: tu meurs de ce que tu es viuant. La mort te tue bien, sans le secours de la maladie.

Et à d'aucuns, les maladies ont esloigné la mort: qui ont plus vescu, de ce qu'il leur sembloit s'en aller mourants. Ioint qu'il est, comme des playes, aussi des maladies medecinales et salutaires. La colique est souuent non moins viuace que vous. Il se voit des hommes, ausquels elle a continué depuis leur enfance iusques à leur extreme vieillesse; et s'ils ne luy eussent failly de compagnie, elle estoit pour les assister plus outre. Vous la tuez plus souuent qu'elle ne vous tue. Et quand elle te presenteroit l'image de la mort voisine, seroit-ce pas vn bon office, à vn homme de tel aage, de le ramener aux cogitations de sa fin? Et qui pis est, tu n'as plus pour quoy guerir.

Ainsi comme ainsin, au premier jour la commune necessité t'appelle. Considere combien artificielement et doucement, elle te desgouste de la vie, et desprend du monde: non te forçant, d'vne subiection tyrannique, from which, even if you have purged your judgment and cured your reasoning of it, your friends still recognize some tinge in your temperament. There is pleasure in hearing people say of you: "What strength! What patience!"

ENGLISH

You are seen sweating with strain, turning pale, turning red, trembling, vomiting until you bring up blood, suffering strange contractions and convulsions, sometimes letting great tears drip from your eyes, passing thick, black, frightful urine, or having it stopped by some sharp, bristling stone that pricks and cruelly flays the neck of your penis —while all the while you entertain those present with an ordinary countenance, joke now and then with your people, hold your own in a strenuous discussion, make excuses for your pain in words and play down your suffering. Do you remember those men of old who sought out ills with such hunger, to keep their virtue in breath and in practice?

Suppose that Nature is carrying and pushing you into that glorious school, which you would never have entered of your own accord. If you tell me that it is a dangerous and mortal illness, which others are not? For it is a medical trick to except some, which they say do not lead straight to death. What does it matter if they get there by accident, and slip and veer easily toward the road that leads us there? But you do not die because you are sick; you die because you are alive. Death kills you well enough without the help of illness.

And for some, illnesses have kept death at a distance: they have lived longer because they thought they were dying. Besides, just as with wounds, there are illnesses that are medicinal and wholesome. The colic often has as tenacious a life as you do. There are men in whom it has continued from childhood to extreme old age; and if they had not deserted its company, it was ready to keep them company longer still. You kill it more often than it kills you. And even if it showed you the image of approaching death, would it not be doing a good service to a man of such an age to bring him back to thoughts of his end? And what is worse, you no longer have anything to get well for.

One way or another, the common necessity will call you any day now. Consider how artfully and gently your illness gives you a distaste for life and detaches you from the world: not forcing you with comme tant d'autres maux, que tu vois aux vieillards, qui les tiennent continuellement entrauez, et sans relasche de foiblesses et douleurs: mais par aduertissemens, et instructions reprises à interualles; entremeslant des longues pauses de repos, comme pour te donner moyen de mediter et repeter sa leçon à ton aise. Pour te donner moyen de iuger sainement, et prendre party en homme de cœur, elle te presente l'estat de ta condition entiere, et en bien et en mal; et en mesme iour, vne vie tres-alegre tantost, tantost insupportable.

FRENCH

Si tu n'accoles la mort, au moins tu luy touches en paume, vne fois le mois. Par où tu as de plus à esperer, qu'elle t'attrappera vn iour sans menace. Et qu'estant si souuent conduit iusques au port: te fiant d'estre encore aux termes accoustumez, on t'aura et ta fiance, passé l'eau vn matin, inopinément. On n'a point à se plaindre des maladies, qui partagent loyallement le temps auec la santé.

3.13.37 Ie suis obligé à la Fortune, dequoy elle m'assaut si souuent de mesme sorte d'armes. Elle m'y façonne, et m'y dresse par vsage, m'y durcit et habitue: ie sçay à peu pres mes-huy, en quoy i'en dois estre quitte. A faute de memoire naturelle, i'en forge de papier. Et comme quelque nouueau symptome suruient à mon mal, ie l'escris: d'où il aduient, qu'à cette heure, estant quasi passé par toute sorte d'exemples: si quelque estonnement me menace: feuilletant ces petits breuets descousus, comme des feuilles Sybillines, ie ne faux plus de trouuer où me consoler, de quelque prognostique fauorable, en mon experience passée. Me sert aussi l'accoustumance, à mieux esperer pour l'aduenir.

Car la conduicte de ce vuidange, ayant continué si long temps; il est à croire, que Nature ne changera point ce train, et n'en aduiendra autre pire accident, que celuy que ie sens. En outre; la condition de cette maladie n'est point mal aduenante à ma complexion prompte et soudaine. Quand elle m'assault mollement, elle me faict peur, car c'est pour long temps. Mais naturellement, elle a des excez vigoureux et gaillarts. Elle me secouë à outrance, pour vn iour ou deux. Mes reins ont duré vn aage, sans alteration; il y en a tantost vn autre, qu'ils ont changé d'estat. Les maux ont leur periode comme les biens: à l'aduanture est cet accident à sa fin.

ENGLISH

tyrannical subjection, like so many other ills you see in old men, which keep them continually shackled, with no respite from weakness and pain, but by warnings and instructions repeated at intervals, mingled with long pauses of rest, as if to give you the chance to meditate and rehearse its lesson at your leisure. To give you the chance to judge soundly and make up your mind like a man of courage, it shows you the state of your whole condition, both good and bad, and on the same day a life now very cheerful, now unbearable.

If you do not embrace death, at least you shake hands with it once a month. So you have the further hope that it will catch you one day without warning; and that, having been brought so often to the harbor, while you trust that you are still within the usual limits, you and your trust will one morning, unexpectedly, have been ferried across the water. We have no cause to complain of illnesses that share our time fairly with health.

I am obliged to Fortune for assailing me so often with the same kind of weapons. She shapes me and trains me to them by practice, hardens and accustoms me; by now I know more or less what it will cost me to get off. For lack of natural memory, I make myself one out of paper. And whenever some new symptom appears in my illness, I write it down; so that now, having been through almost every kind of example, if some alarm threatens me, I leaf through these little loose notes, like the Sibyl's leaves, and never fail to find some favorable prognosis in my past experience to console me. Being used to it also helps me hope for better in the future.[45]

For since this discharge has kept up its course for so long, it is likely that Nature will not change its pace and that no worse ailment will come of it than the one I feel. Moreover, the character of this illness is not ill-suited to my quick and sudden temperament. When it attacks me gently, it frightens me, for then it will last a long time. But by nature it has vigorous and lusty fits. It shakes me violently for a day or two. My kidneys lasted an age without change; it will soon be another since they changed their state. Ills have their cycles, like goods: perhaps this ailment is near its end.

45 The Sibyl of Cumae was said to write her prophecies on leaves (Virgil, Aeneid III).

FRENCH

L'aage affoiblit la chaleur de mon estomach; sa digestion en estant moins parfaicte, il renuoye cette matiere cruë à mes reins. Pourquoy ne pourra estre à certaine reuolution, affoiblie pareillement la chaleur de mes reins; si qu'ils ne puissent plus petrifier mon flegme; et Nature s'acheminer à prendre quelque autre voye de purgation? Les ans m'ont euidemment faict tarir aucuns rheumes. Pourquoy ces excremens, qui fournissent de matiere à la graue? Mais est-il rien doux, au prix de cette soudaine mutation; quand d'vne douleur extreme, ie viens par le vuidange de ma pierre, à recouurer, comme d'vn esclair, la belle lumiere de la santé: si libre, et si pleine: comme il aduient en noz soudaines et plus aspres coliques?

Y a il rien en cette douleur soufferte, qu'on puisse contrepoiser au plaisir d'vn si prompt amendement? De combien la santé me semble plus belle apres la maladie, si voisine et si contigue, que ie les puis recognoistre en presence l'vne de l'autre, en leur plus hault appareil: où elles se mettent à l'enuy, comme pour se faire teste et contrecarre! Tout ainsi que les Stoïciens disent, que les vices sont vtilement introduicts, pour donner prix et faire espaule à la vertu: nous pouuons dire, auec meilleure raison, et coniecture moins hardie, que Nature nous a presté la douleur, pour l'honneur et seruice de la volupté et indolence.

Lors que Socrates apres qu'on l'eust deschargé de ses fers, sentit la friandise de cette demangeaison, que leur pesanteur auoit causé en ses iambes: il se resiouit, à considerer l'estroitte alliance de la douleur à la volupté: comme elles sont associées d'vne liaison necessaire: si qu'à tours, elles se suyuent, et entr'engendrent: et s'escrioit au bon Esope, qu'il deust auoir pris, de cette consideration, vn corps propre à vne belle fable.

3.13.38 Le pis que ie voye aux autres maladies, c'est qu'elles ne sont pas si griefues en leur effect, comme elles sont en leur yssue. On est vn an à se rauoir, tousiours plein de foiblesse, et de crainte. Il y a tant de hazard, et tant de degrez, à se reconduire à sauueté, que ce n'est iamais faict. Auant qu'on vous aye deffublé d'vn couurechef, et puis d'vne calote, auant qu'on vous aye rendu l'vsage de l'air, et du vin, et de vostre femme, et des melons, c'est grand cas si vous n'estes recheu en quelque nouuelle misere. Cette-cy a ce priuilege, qu'elle s'emporte tout net.

ENGLISH

Age is weakening the heat of my stomach; since its digestion is less perfect, it sends this raw matter on to my kidneys. Why, at some turn of time, might not the heat of my kidneys be weakened likewise, so that they can no longer petrify my phlegm, and Nature set about finding some other way of purging? The years have plainly dried up certain catarrhs in me. Why not these excretions that supply the matter for the gravel? But is there anything as sweet as that sudden change, when from extreme pain I come, by voiding my stone, to recover as if in a flash the fair light of health, so free and so full, as happens in our sudden and sharpest attacks of colic?

Is there anything in the pain endured that can be weighed against the pleasure of so swift an improvement? How much more beautiful health seems to me after illness, when the two are so near and so close together that I can recognize them face to face, each in its finest array, where they vie with each other as if to stand up to and defy each other! Just as the Stoics say that vices were usefully introduced to give value and support to virtue, we can say, with better reason and less bold conjecture, that Nature has lent us pain for the honor and service of pleasure and freedom from pain.

When Socrates, after his chains had been taken off, felt the delicious itching that their weight had caused in his legs, he rejoiced to consider the close alliance between pain and pleasure, how they are bound together by a necessary link, so that they follow each other in turn and engender each other; and he exclaimed that good Aesop ought to have taken from this consideration the material for a fine fable.[46]

The worst thing I see in other illnesses is that they are not so grievous in their effect as in their aftermath. It takes a year to recover, always full of weakness and fear. There is so much risk, and there are so many steps in getting back to safety, that it is never over. Before they have stripped you of a kerchief and then of a skullcap, before they have given you back the use of fresh air, and wine, and your wife, and melons, it is a wonder if you 46 Plato, Phaedo, on the day of Socrates' execution.

FRENCH

Là où les autres laissent tousiours quelque impression, et alteration, qui rend le corps susceptible de nouueau mal, et se prestent la main les vns aux autres. Ceux là sont excusables, qui se contentent de leur possession sur nous, sans l'estendre, et sans introduire leur sequele. Mais courtois et gratieux sont ceux, de qui le passage nous apporte quelque vtile consequence. Depuis ma colique, ie me trouue deschargé d'autres accidens: plus ce me semble que ie n'estois auparauant, et n'ay point eu de fiebure depuis.

I'argumente, que les vomissemens extremes et frequens que ie souffre, me purgent: et d'autre costé, mes degoustemens, et les ieusnes estranges, que ie passe, digerent mes humeurs peccantes: et Nature vuide en ces pierres, ce qu'elle a de superflu et nuysible. Qu'on ne me die point, que c'est vne medecine trop cher vendue. Car quoy tant de puans breuuages, cauteres, incisions, suées, sedons, dietes, et tant de formes de guarir, qui nous apportent souuent la mort, pour ne pouuoir soustenir leur violence, et importunité? Par ainsi, quand ie suis attaint, ie le prens à medecine: quand ie suis exempt, ie le prens à constante et entiere deliurance.

3.13.39 Voicy encore vne faueur de mon mal, particuliere. C'est qu'à peu pres, il faict son ieu à part, et me laisse faire le mien; où il ne tient qu'à faute de courage. En sa plus grande esmotion, ie l'ay tenu dix heures à cheual. Souffrez seulement, vous n'auez que faire d'autre regime. Iouez, disnez, courez, faictes cecy, et faictes encore cela, si vous pouuez; vostre desbauche y seruira plus, qu'elle n'y nuira. Dictes en autant à vn verolé, à vn goutteux, à vn hernieux. Les autres maladies, ont des obligations plus vniuerselles; gehennent bien autrement noz actions; troublent tout nostre ordre, et engagent à leur consideration, tout l'estat de la vie.

Cette-cy ne faict que pinser la peau; elle vous laisse l'entendement, et la volonté en vostre disposition, et la langue, et les pieds, et les mains. Elle vous esueille plustost qu'elle ne vous assoupit. L'ame est frapée de l'ardeur d'vne fiebure, et atterrée d'vne epilepsie, et disloquée par vne aspre micraine, et en fin estonnée par toutes les maladies qui blessent la masse, et les plus nobles parties. Icy, on ne l'attaque point. S'il luy va mal, à sa coulpe. Elle se trahit elle mesme, s'abandonne, et se have not relapsed into some new misery. This one has the privilege of clearing out completely.

ENGLISH

The others, by contrast, always leave some imprint and change that makes the body susceptible to new illness, and they lend each other a hand. Those are excusable that are content with their hold on us without extending it and without bringing their train in after them. But courteous and gracious are those whose passage brings us some useful consequence. Since my colic, I find myself relieved of other ailments, more so, it seems to me, than I was before, and I have not had a fever since.

I argue that the extreme and frequent vomiting I suffer purges me; that, on the other hand, my losses of appetite and the strange fasts I go through digest my morbid humors; and that Nature voids in these stones whatever she has that is superfluous and harmful. Let no one tell me that it is a medicine sold too dear. For what about so many stinking potions, cauteries, incisions, sweatings, setons, diets, and so many methods of cure that often bring us death because we cannot stand their violence and harassment? So when I am attacked, I take it as medicine; when I am free, I take it as a lasting and complete deliverance.

Here is yet another particular favor of my illness: it more or less plays its own game and lets me play mine, and if I do not, it is only for want of courage. At its most violent, I have stayed on horseback with it for ten hours. Just endure; you need no other regimen. Play, dine, run, do this, and do that too if you can; your excesses will help more than they harm. Say as much to a man with the pox, to a man with gout, to a man with a hernia. Other illnesses impose more universal obligations, constrain our actions in quite another way, disturb our whole order, and make the whole conduct of our life revolve around them.

This one only pinches the skin; it leaves your understanding and your will at your disposal, and your tongue, and your feet, and your hands. It wakes you up rather than putting you to sleep. The soul is struck by the burning of a fever, felled by epilepsy, dislocated by a sharp migraine, and in short stunned by all the illnesses that wound the whole mass and the noblest parts. Here it is not attacked. If things go badly with it, that is its own desmonte. Il n'y a que les fols qui se laissent persuader, que ce corps dur et massif, qui se cuyt en noz rognons, se puisse dissoudre par breuuages.

FRENCH

Parquoy depuis qu'il est esbranlé, il n'est que de luy donner passage, aussi bien le prendra-il.

3.13.40 Ie remarque encore cette particuliere commodité, que c'est vn mal, auquel nous auons peu à deuiner. Nous sommes dispensez du trouble, auquel les autres maux nous iettent, par l'incertitude de leurs causes, et conditions, et progrez. Trouble infiniement penible. Nous n'auons que faire de consultations et interpretations doctorales: les sens nous montrent que c'est, et où c'est.

3.13.41 Par tels argumens, et forts et foibles, comme Cicero le mal de sa vieillesse, i'essaye d'endormir et amuser mon imagination, et graisser ses playes. Si elles s'empirent demain, demain nous y pouruoyrons d'autres eschappatoires. Qu'il soit vray. Voicy depuis de nouueau, que les plus legers mouuements espreignent le pur sang de mes reins. Quoy pour cela? ie ne laisse de me mouuoir comme deuant, et picquer apres mes chiens, d'vne iuuenile ardeur, et insolente. Et trouue que i'ay grand raison, d'vn si important accident: qui ne me couste qu'vne sourde poisanteur, et alteration en cette partie.

C'est quelque grosse pierre, qui foulle et consomme la substance de mes roignons: et ma vie, que ie vuide peu à peu: non sans quelque naturelle douceur, comme vn excrement hormais superflu et empeschant. Or sens-ie quelque chose qui crousle; ne vous attendez pas que i'aille m'amusant à recognoistre mon poux, et mes vrines, pour y prendre quelque preuoyance ennuyeuse. Ie seray assez à temps à sentir le mal, sans l'allonger par le mal de la peur. Qui craint de souffrir, il souffre desia de ce qu'il craint. Ioint que la dubitation et ignorance de ceux, qui se meslent d'expliquer les ressorts de Nature, et ses internes progrez: et tant de faux prognostiques de leur art: nous doit faire cognoistre, qu'ell'a ses moyens infiniment incognuz.

Il y a grande incertitude, varieté et obscurité, de ce qu'elle nous promet ou menace. Sauf la vieillesse, qui est vn signe indubitable de l'approche de la mort: de tous les autres accidents, ie voy peu de signes de l'aduenir, surquoy nous ayons à fonder nostre diuination. Ie ne me fault: it betrays itself, abandons itself and falls apart. Only fools let themselves be persuaded that this hard, massive body that is baked in our kidneys can be dissolved by potions.

ENGLISH

So once it has been set moving, there is nothing to do but let it pass; it will take its passage anyway.

I note yet another particular advantage: it is an illness about which we have little to guess. We are spared the disturbance that other ills throw us into through the uncertainty of their causes, conditions and progress—an infinitely painful disturbance. We have no need of consultations and learned interpretations: our senses show us what it is and where it is.

With such arguments, both strong and weak, as Cicero did with the ill of his old age, I try to lull and beguile my imagination and grease its wounds. If they get worse tomorrow, tomorrow we will find other ways out. And so it proves: here, lately, the slightest movements squeeze pure blood from my kidneys. What of it? I do not stop moving as before and riding after my hounds with youthful, insolent ardor. And I find I am getting off very well from so serious an accident, which costs me only a dull heaviness and discomfort in that part.[47]

It is some big stone crushing and consuming the substance of my kidneys, and my life, which I am voiding little by little, not without some natural pleasure, like an excrement now superfluous and in the way. Now, if I feel something crumbling, do not expect me to start amusing myself by checking my pulse and my urine so as to take some distressing precaution. I will be in time enough to feel the pain without prolonging it with the pain of fear. He who fears suffering already suffers from what he fears. Besides, the doubt and ignorance of those who take it upon themselves to explain the springs of Nature and her inner workings, and so many false prognoses of their art, should make us realize that her means are infinitely unknown.

There is great uncertainty, variety and obscurity in what she promises or threatens us with. Except for old age, which is an indubitable sign that death is approaching, I see in all other accidents few signs of the future on which we can base our 47 Cicero, On Old Age.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
iuge que par vray sentiment, non par discours. A quoy faire? puisque ie n'y veux apporter que l'attente et la patience. Voulez vous sçauoir combien ie gaigne à cela? Regardez ceux qui font autrement, et qui dependent de tant de diuerses persuasions et conseils: combien souuent l'imagination les presse sans le corps. I'ay maintesfois prins plaisir estant en seurté, et deliure de ces accidens dangereux, de les communiquer aux medecins, comme naissans lors en moy.	divination. I judge myself only by actual feeling, not by reasoning. What would be the point, since I mean to bring to it nothing but waiting and patience? Do you want to know how much I gain by this? Look at those who do otherwise and who depend on so many different opinions and counsels: how often their imagination oppresses them when their body does not. I have many times taken pleasure, when I was safe and free of these dangerous symptoms, in describing them to the physicians as if they were just starting in me.
Ie souffrois l'arrest de leurs horribles conclusions, bien à mon aise; et en demeurois de tant plus obligé à Dieu de sa grace, et mieux instruict de la vanité de cet art.	I heard the sentence of their horrible conclusions quite at my ease, and came away all the more obliged to God for his grace, and better instructed in the vanity of that art.

SLEEP, FOOD AND DAILY HABITS

A portrait of how he sleeps, eats, drinks and dresses as he grows old.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.42 Il n'est rien qu'on doiue tant recommander à la ieunesse, que l'actiueté et la vigilance. Nostre vie, n'est que mouuement. Ie m'esbransle difficilement, et suis tardif par tout: à me leuer, à me coucher, et mes repas. C'est matin pour moy que sept heures: et où ie gouuerne, ie ne disne, ny auant onze, ny ne souppe, qu'apres six heures. I'ay autrefois attribué la cause des fiebures, et maladies où ie suis tombé, à la pesanteur et assoupissement, que le long sommeil m'auoit apporté. Et me suis tousiours repenty de me rendormir le matin. Platon veut plus de mal à l'excés du dormir, qu'à l'excés du boire. I'ayme à coucher dur, et seul; voire sans femme, à la royalle: vn peu bien couuert.	There is nothing we should recommend so strongly to the young as activity and wakefulness. Our life is nothing but movement. I am hard to get moving, and slow in everything: getting up, going to bed, and at my meals. Seven o'clock is early morning for me; and where I am in charge, I do not dine before eleven or sup until after six. I used to attribute the fevers and illnesses I fell into to the heaviness and drowsiness that long sleep had brought on me; and I have always regretted going back to sleep in the morning. Plato condemns excess in sleeping more than excess in drinking. I like to sleep on a hard bed, and alone—even without a wife, in royal fashion—and fairly well covered.[48]
On ne bassine iamais mon lict; mais depuis la vieillesse, on me donne quand i'en ay besoing, des draps, à eschauffer les pieds et l'estomach. On trouuoit à redire au grand Scipion, d'estre dormart, non à mon aduis pour autre raison, sinon qu'il faschoit aux hommes, qu'en luy seul, il n'y eust aucune chose à redire. Si i'ay quelque curiosité en mon traictement, c'est plustost au coucher qu'à autre chose; mais ie cede et m'accommode en general, autant que tout autre, à la necessité. Le dormir a occupé vne grande partie de ma vie: et le continuë encores en cet aage, huict ou neuf heures, d'vne haleine.	My bed is never warmed with a warming pan; but since I have grown old, I am given warm cloths when I need them for my feet and stomach. The great Scipio was criticized for being a sleepyhead —for no other reason, in my opinion, than that it annoyed people that in him alone there was nothing to criticize. If I am at all fussy about how I am looked after, it is about my bed more than anything else; but in general I yield and adapt to necessity as well as anyone. Sleep has taken up a large part of my life, and at this age I still sleep eight or nine hours at a stretch. I am usefully

48 Plato, Laws VII.

FRENCH

Ie me retire auec vtilité, de cette propension paresseuse: et en vaulx euidemment mieux.

Ie sens vn peu le coup de la mutation: mais c'est faict en trois iours. Et n'en voy gueres, qui viue à moins, quand il est besoin: et qui s'exerce plus constamment, ny à qui les coruées poisent moins. Mon corps est capable d'vne agitation ferme; mais non pas vehemente et soudaine. Ie fuis meshuy, les exercices violents, et qui me meinent à la sueur: mes membres se lassent auant qu'ils s'eschauffent. Ie me tiens debout, tout le long d'vn iour, et ne m'ennuye point à me promener. Mais sur le paué, depuis mon premier aage, ie n'ay aymé d'aller qu'à cheual.

A pied, ie me crotte iusques aux fesses: et les petites gens, sont subiects par ces ruës, à estre chocquez et coudoyez à faute d'apparence. Et ay aymé à me reposer, soit couché, soit assis, les iambes autant ou plus haultes que le siege.

3.13.43 Il n'est occupation plaisante comme la militaire: occupation et noble en execution (car la plus forte, genereuse, et superbe de toutes les vertus, est la vaillance) et noble en sa cause. Il n'est point d'vtilité, ny plus iuste, ny plus vniuerselle, que la protection du repos, et grandeur de son pays.

La compagnie de tant d'hommes vous plaist, nobles, ieunes, actifs: la veuë ordinaire de tant de spectacles tragiques: la liberté de cette conuersation, sans art, et vne façon de vie, masle et sans ceremonie: la varieté de mille actions diuerses: cette courageuse harmonie de la musique guerriere, qui vous entretient et eschauffe, et les oreilles, et l'ame: l'honneur de cet exercice: son aspreté mesme et sa difficulté, que Platon estime si peu, qu'en sa republique il en faict part aux femmes et aux enfants.

Vous vous conuiez aux rolles, et hazards particuliers, selon que vous iugez de leur esclat, et de leur importance: soldat volontaire: et voyez quand la vie mesme y est excusablement employée, Pulchrùmque mori succurrit in armis. De craindre les hazards communs, qui regardent vne si grande presse; de n'oser ce que tant de sortes d'ames osent, et tout vn peuple, c'est à faire à vn cœur mol, et bas outre mesure. La compagnie asseure iusques aux enfans. Si d'autres vous surpassent en science, en grace, en force, en fortune; vous auez des causes tierces, à weaning myself from this lazy propensity, and I am plainly the better for it.

ENGLISH

I feel the shock of the change a little, but it is over in three days. And I hardly see anyone who can live on less when need be, or who exercises more steadily, or on whom hard duties weigh less. My body is capable of steady exertion, but not of violent and sudden exertion. I now avoid violent exercise that makes me sweat: my limbs tire before they warm up. I can stay on my feet all day long, and I do not tire of walking. But on paved streets, since my earliest years, I have liked to go only on horseback.

On foot I get muddy up to my buttocks; and short people are liable, in these streets, to be jostled and elbowed for lack of an imposing presence. And I have liked to rest, lying or sitting, with my legs as high as the seat or higher.

There is no occupation as pleasant as soldiering—an occupation noble in its execution (for the strongest, most generous and proudest of all the virtues is valor) and noble in its cause. There is no service more just or more universal than protecting the peace and greatness of one's country.

You enjoy the company of so many men, noble, young, active; the daily sight of so many tragic spectacles; the freedom of that artless conversation, and a manly way of life without ceremony; the variety of a thousand different actions; that courageous harmony of martial music, which sustains you and warms both your ears and your soul; the honor of this occupation; its very harshness and difficulty, which Plato thinks so little of that in his Republic he gives women and children a share in it.[49]

You volunteer for particular roles and risks according to your judgment of their brilliance and importance, as a volunteer soldier; and you see when life itself can be excusably spent there: And it comes to mind how fine it is to die in arms. To fear the common dangers that concern so great a crowd, not to dare what so many kinds of souls dare, and a whole people, is for a heart soft and base beyond measure. Company reassures even children. If others surpass you in knowledge, in grace, in strength, in fortune, you have outside 49 Plato, Republic V.

FRENCH

qui vous en prendre; mais de leur ceder en fermeté d'ame, vous n'auez à vous en prendre qu'à vous.

La mort est plus abiecte, plus languissante, et penible dans vn lict, qu'en vn combat: les fiebures et les caterrhes, autant douloureux et mortels, qu'vne harquebuzade. Qui seroit faict, à porter valeureusement, les accidens de la vie commune, n'auroit point à grossir son courage, pour se rendre gendarme. Viuere, mi Lucilli, militare est.

3.13.44 Il ne me souuient point de m'estre iamais veu galleux. Si est la gratterie, des gratifications de Nature les plus douces, et autant à main. Mais ell'a la penitence trop importunément voisine. Ie l'exerce plus aux oreilles, que i'ay au dedans pruantes, par secousses.

3.13.45 Ie suis nay de tous les sens, entiers quasi à la perfection. Mon estomach est commodément bon, comme est ma teste: et le plus souuent, se maintiennent au trauers de mes fiebures, et aussi mon haleine. I'ay outrepassé l'aage auquel des nations, non sans occasion, auoient prescript vne si iuste fin à la vie, qu'elles ne permettoyent point qu'on l'excedast. Si ay-ie encore des remises: quoy qu'inconstantes et courtes, si nettes, qu'il y a peu à dire de la santé et indolence de ma ieunesse. Ie ne parle pas de la vigueur et allegresse: ce n'est pas raison qu'elle me suyue hors ses limites: Non hoc amplius est liminis, aut aquæ / Cœlestis, patiens latus. Mon visage et mes yeux me descouurent incontinent.

Tous mes changemens commencent par là: et vn peu plus aigres, qu'ils ne sont en effect. Ie fais souuent pitié à mes amis, auant que i'en sente la cause. Mon miroüer ne m'estonne pas: car en la ieunesse mesme, il m'est aduenu plus d'vne fois, de chausser ainsin vn teinct, et vn port trouble, et de mauuais prognostique, sans grand accident: en maniere que les medecins, qui ne trouuoyent au dedans cause qui respondist à cette alteration externe, l'attribuoient à l'esprit, et à quelque passion secrette, qui me rongeast au dedans. Ils se trompoyent. Si le corps se gouuernoit autant selon moy, que faict l'ame, nous marcherions vn peu plus à nostre aise.

Ie l'auois lors, non seulement exempte de trouble, mais encore pleine de satisfaction, et de feste: comme elle est causes to blame; but if you yield to them in firmness of soul, you have only yourself to blame.[50]

ENGLISH

Death is more abject, more lingering and painful in bed than in battle; fevers and catarrhs are as painful and deadly as a arquebus shot. Anyone trained to bear the accidents of ordinary life valiantly would not need to swell his courage to become a man-at-arms. To live, my Lucilius, is to be a soldier.[51]

I do not remember ever having had the itch. Yet scratching is among the sweetest of Nature's gratifications, and as handy as any. But its penance follows too annoyingly close behind. I practice it most on my ears, which itch inside from time to time.

I was born with all my senses sound, almost to perfection. My stomach is comfortably good, as is my head; and most of the time they hold up through my fevers, and so does my breath. I have passed the age at which certain nations, not without reason, had prescribed so fitting an end to life that they did not allow anyone to exceed it. Yet I still have remissions, irregular and short though they are, so clear that they fall little short of the health and painlessness of my youth. I do not speak of vigor and sprightliness; it is not reasonable that they should follow me beyond their limits: No longer can this body bear lying at a threshold / or the rain from heaven. My face and eyes give me away at once.[52]

All my changes begin there, and look somewhat worse than they really are. My friends often pity me before I feel the cause. My mirror does not alarm me, for even in my youth it happened more than once that I took on a murky complexion and bearing, of bad omen, without any serious ailment; so that the physicians, finding no cause within to account for this outward change, attributed it to the mind and to some secret passion gnawing at me inside. They were wrong. If the body governed itself according to my will as much as my soul does, we would get along a little more comfortably.

My soul at that time was not only free from trouble but full of satisfaction and gaiety, as it

50 Virgil, Aeneid II.
51 Seneca, Letters 96.

FRENCH

le plus ordinairement: moytié de sa complexion, moytié de son dessein: Nec vitiant artus ægræ contagia mentis. Ie tiens, que cette sienne temperature, a releué maintesfois le corps de ses cheutes. Il est souuent abbatu; que si elle n'est enioüée, elle est au moins en estat tranquille et reposé. I'euz la fiebure quarte, quatre ou cinq mois, qui m'auoit tout desuisagé: l'esprit alla tousiours non paisiblement, mais plaisamment. Si la douleur est hors de moy, l'affoiblissement et langueur ne m'attristent guere. Ie vois plusieurs deffaillances corporelles, qui font horreur seulement à nommer, que ie craindrois moins que mille passions d'esprit que ie vois en vsage.

Ie prens party de ne plus courre, c'est assez que ie me traine; ny ne me plains de la decadance naturelle qui me tient, Quis tumidum guttur miratur in Alpibus? Non plus, que ie ne regrette, que ma durée ne soit aussi longue et entiere que celle d'vn chesne.

3.13.46 Ie n'ay point à me plaindre de mon imagination: i'ay eu peu de pensées en ma vie qui m'ayent seulement interrompu le cours de mon sommeil, si elles n'ont esté du desir, qui m'esueillast sans m'affliger. Ie songe peu souuent; et lors c'est des choses fantastiques et des chimeres, produictes communément de pensées plaisantes: plutost ridicules que tristes. Et tiens qu'il est vray, que les songes sont loyaux interpretes de noz inclinations; mais il y a de l'art à les assortir et entendre. Res quæ in vita vsurpant homines, cogitant, curant, vident, Quæque agunt vigilantes, agitántque, ea sicut in somno accidunt,
Minus mirandum est. Platon dit dauantage, que c'est l'office de la prudence d'en tirer des instructions diuinatrices pour l'aduenir.

Ie ne voy rien à cela, sinon les merueilleuses experiences, que Socrates, Xenophon, Aristote en recitent, personnages d'authorité irreprochable. Les histoires disent, que les Atlantes ne songent iamais: qui ne mangent aussi rien, qui aye prins mort. Ce que i'adiouste, d'autant que c'est à l'aduenture l'occasion, pourquoy ils ne songent point. Car Pythagoras ordonnoit certaine most usually is, half by its nature, half by its design: Nor does the contagion of a sick mind infect my limbs. I believe that this temper of my soul has many times lifted my body up from its falls. The body is often low; and if the soul is not merry, it is at least in a tranquil and restful state. I had a quartan fever for four or five months, which had quite disfigured me; my mind kept going all the while, not just peacefully but pleasantly. If the pain is outside me, weakness and languor hardly sadden me. I see many bodily failings, horrible merely to name, which I would fear less than a thousand passions of the mind that I see in common use.[53]

ENGLISH

I have made up my mind to run no longer—it is enough that I can drag myself along; nor do I complain of the natural decline that has hold of me—Who is surprised at a swollen throat in the Alps?—any more than I regret that my lifespan is not as long and sound as an oak's.[54]

I have no complaint about my imagination: I have had few thoughts in my life that have so much as interrupted the course of my sleep, unless they were thoughts of desire, which woke me without distressing me. I seldom dream, and then it is of fantastic things and chimeras, usually produced by pleasant thoughts, more ridiculous than sad. And I hold it true that dreams are faithful interpreters of our inclinations; but there is skill in sorting and understanding them. What men busy themselves with in life, what they think of, care for and see, what they do and pursue when awake—if this happens to them in sleep, it is less to be wondered at. Plato says, moreover, that it is the office of wisdom to draw from them prophetic instructions for the future.[55]

I see nothing in that, except the marvelous experiences that Socrates, Xenophon and Aristotle relate of it, persons of irreproachable authority. The histories say that the Atlantes never dream; they also never eat anything that has been killed. I add this because it is perhaps the reason why they do not dream. For Pythagoras prescribed a certain pre-52 Horace, Odes III.10, a lover's complaint at his mistress's door.

53 Ovid, Tristia III.8.
54 Juvenal, Satires XIII; goiter was common in Alpine regions.
55 Accius, quoted by Cicero, On Divination I; Plato, Timaeus.

FRENCH

preparation de nourriture, pour faire les songes à propos. Les miens sont tendres: et ne m'apportent aucune agitation de corps, ny expression de voix. I'ay veu plusieurs de mon temps, en estre merueilleusement agitez. Theon le philosophe, se promenoit, en songeant: et le valet de Pericles sur les tuilles mesmes et faiste de la maison.

3.13.47 Ie ne choisis guere à table; et me prens à la premiere chose et plus voisine: et me remue mal volontiers d'vn goust à vn autre. La presse des plats, et des seruices me desplaist, autant qu'autre presse. Ie me contente aisément de peu de mets; et hay l'opinion de Fauorinus, qu'en vn festin, il faut qu'on vous desrobe la viande où vous prenez appetit, et qu'on vous en substitue tousiours vne nouuelle: et que c'est vn miserable soupper, si on n'a saoullé les assistans de crouppions de diuers oyseaux; et que le seul bequefigue merite qu'on le mange entier. I'vse familierement de viandes sallées; si ayme-ie mieux le pain sans sel.

Et mon boulanger chez moy, n'en sert pas d'autre pour ma table, contre l'vsage du pays. On a eu en mon enfance principalement à corriger, le refus, que ie faisois des choses que communément on ayme le mieux, en cet aage; succres, confitures, pieces de four. Mon gouuerneur combatit cette hayne de viandes delicates, comme vne espece de delicatesse. Aussi n'est elle autre chose, que difficulté de goust, où qu'il s'applique. Qui oste à vn enfant, certaine particuliere et obstinée affection au pain bis, et au lard, ou à l'ail, il luy oste la friandise. Il en est, qui font les laborieux, et les patiens pour regretter le bœuf, et le iambon, parmy les perdris.

Ils ont bon temps: c'est la delicatesse des delicats; c'est le goust d'vne molle fortune, qui s'affadit aux choses ordinaires et accoustumées, Per quæ luxuria diuitiarum tædio ludit. Laisser à faire bonne chere de ce qu'vn autre la faict; auoir vn soing curieux de son traictement; c'est l'essence de ce vice; Si modica cœnare times olus omne patella. Il y a bien vrayement cette difference, qu'il vaut mieux obliger son desir, aux choses plus aisées à recouurer; mais c'est tousiours vice de s'obliger. I'appellois autresfois, delicat vn mien parent, qui auoit paration of food so as to have dreams to the purpose. Mine are mild, and bring me no agitation of body or utterance of voice. I have seen several people in my time wonderfully agitated by theirs. Theon the philosopher walked about while dreaming, and Pericles' servant did so even on the tiles and the ridge of the house.[56]

ENGLISH

I am not very choosy at table. I take the first thing and the nearest, and I am reluctant to move from one taste to another. A crowd of dishes and courses displeases me as much as any other crowd. I am easily content with few dishes, and I hate the opinion of Favorinus that at a feast they should snatch away the dish you are getting an appetite for and always put a new one in its place; that it is a wretched supper if the guests have not been glutted with the rumps of various birds; and that the beccafico alone deserves to be eaten whole. I regularly eat salted meats; yet I prefer bread without salt.[57]

My baker at home serves no other kind for my table, against the custom of the region. In my childhood, the main thing they had to correct was my refusal of the things children of that age usually like best: sugar, preserves, pastries. My tutor fought this dislike of dainty foods as a kind of daintiness in itself. And indeed it is nothing else but fussiness of taste, wherever it is applied. Whoever cures a child of a particular, stubborn fondness for brown bread and bacon, or garlic, cures him of being finicky about food. There are some who play the long-sufferers and make a show of patience by pining for beef and ham among the partridges.

They have it easy. It is the daintiness of the dainty; it is the taste of a soft fortune that grows jaded with ordinary, everyday things, By which luxury beguiles its weariness of riches. To stop relishing what another man relishes, to take fastidious care over one's fare: that is the essence of this vice. If you are afraid to dine on a plain dish of greens. There is indeed this difference: it is better to bind one's desire to things that are easier to come by. But it is always a vice to bind oneself. I used to call a kinsman of mine dainty because in our galleys he had 56 The Atlantes, a people of North Africa, are described by Herodotus (IV.184).

57 Favorinus of Arles, a 2nd-century AD orator and philosopher whose table talk is reported by Aulus Gellius. The beccafico ("fig-pecker") is a small songbird prized as a delicacy.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	desapris en noz galeres, à se seruir de noz licts, et se despouiller pour se coucher.	unlearned how to use our beds and to undress before lying down.[58]
3.13.48	Si i'auois des enfans masles, ie leur desirasse volontiers ma fortune. Le bon pere que Dieu me donna (qui n'a de moy que la recognoissance de sa bonté, mais certes bien gaillarde) m'enuoya dés le berceau, nourrir à vn pauure village des siens, et m'y tint autant que ie fus en nourrisse, et encores au delà: me dressant à la plus basse et commune façon de viure: Magna pars libertatis est benè moratus venter. Ne prenez iamais, et donnez encore moins à vos femmes, la charge de leur nourriture: laissez les former à la fortune, souz des loix populaires et naturelles: laissez à la coustume, de les dresser à la frugalité et à l'austerité; qu'ils ayent plustot à descendre de l'aspreté, qu'à monter vers elle.	If I had sons, I would gladly wish them my own lot. The good father God gave me (who has nothing from me but my gratitude for his goodness—though a very hearty gratitude) sent me from the cradle to be nursed in a poor village of his. He kept me there as long as I was at nurse, and even longer, training me to the lowliest and commonest way of living: A well-disciplined belly is a large part of freedom. Never take on yourselves, and still less give to your wives, the charge of bringing up your children. Let them be shaped by fortune, under the laws of the common people and of nature. Let custom train them to frugality and austerity, so that they have to come down from hardship rather than climb up to it.[59]
	Son humeur visoit encore à vne autre fin. De me rallier auec le peuple, et cette condition d'hommes, qui a besoin de nostre ayde: et estimoit que ie fusse tenu de regarder plustost, vers celuy qui me tend les bras, que vers celuy, qui me tourne le dos. Et fut cette raison, pourquoy aussi il me donna à tenir sur les fons, à des personnes de la plus abiecte fortune, pour m'y obliger et attacher.	His temperament aimed at yet another end: to bind me to the people and to that class of men who need our help. He thought I ought to look toward the man who holds out his arms to me rather than toward the man who turns his back on me. And this was why he also had me held at the font by people of the humblest station: to oblige and attach me to them.
3.13.49	Son dessein n'a pas du tout mal succedé. Ie m'adonne volontiers aux petits; soit pour ce qu'il y a plus de gloire: soit par naturelle compassion, qui peut infiniement en moy. Le party que ie condemneray en noz guerres, ie le condemneray plus asprement, fleurissant et prospere. Il sera pour me concilier aucunement à soy quand ie le verray miserable et accablé. Combien volontiers ie considere la belle humeur de Chelonis, fille et femme de Roys de Sparte! Pendant que Cleombrotus son mary, aux desordres de sa ville, eut auantage sur Leonidas son pere, elle fit la bonne fille: se r'allie auec son pere, en son exil, en sa misere, s'opposant au victorieux. La chance vint elle à tourner?	His plan has not altogether failed. I readily take the side of the little people, whether because there is more glory in it or out of a natural compassion that has infinite power over me. The party I condemn in our wars I shall condemn more harshly when it is flourishing and prosperous; it will go some way toward winning me over when I see it wretched and crushed. How gladly I contemplate the fine disposition of Chelonis, daughter and wife of kings of Sparta! While Cleombrotus, her husband, had the upper hand over Leonidas, her father, in the disorders of her city, she played the good daughter: she joined her father in his exile and his misery, opposing the victor. Did luck happen to turn?[60]
	la voila changée de vouloir avec la fortune, se rangeant courageusement à son mary: lequel elle suiuit par tout, où sa ruine le porta: n'ayant ce me semble autre choix, que de se ietter au party, où elle faisoit le plus de besoin,	There she is, changing her will along with fortune, bravely taking her husband's side, and following him wherever his ruin carried him. She had no other choice, it seems to me, than to throw herself

58 The first quotation is from Seneca's Letters; the second adapts Horace, Epistles.
59 The quotation is from Seneca's Letters.
60 The story is told in Plutarch's Life of Agis; it took place in the 3rd century BC.

FRENCH

et où elle se montroit plus pitoyable. Ie me laisse plus naturellement aller apres l'exemple de Flaminius, qui se prestoit à ceux qui auoyent besoin de luy, plus qu'à ceux qui luy pouuoient bien-faire: que ie ne fais à celuy de Pyrrhus, propre à s'abaisser soubs les grands, et à s'enorgueillir sur les petits.

3.13.50 Les longues tables m'ennuyent, et me nuisent: car soit pour m'y estre accoustumé enfant, à faute de meilleure contenance, ie mange autant que i'y suis. Pourtant chez moy, quoy qu'elle soit des courtes, ie m'y mets volontiers vn peu apres les autres; sur la forme d'Auguste: mais ie ne l'imite pas, en ce qu'il en sortoit aussi auant les autres. Au rebours, i'ayme à me reposer long temps apres, et en ouyr comter: pourueu que ie ne m'y mesle point; car ie me lasse et me blesse de parler, l'estomach plain: autant comme ie trouue l'exercice de crier, et contester, auant le repas, tressalubre et plaisant.

3.13.51 Les anciens Grecs et Romains auoyent meilleure raison que nous, assignans à la nourriture, qui est vne action principale de la vie, si autre extraordinaire occupation ne les en diuertissoit, plusieurs heures, et la meilleure partie de la nuict: mangeans et beuuans moins hastiuement que nous, qui passons en poste toutes noz actions: et estendans ce plaisir naturel, à plus de loisir et d'vsage, y entresemans diuers offices de conuersation, vtiles et aggreables.

3.13.52 Ceux qui doiuent auoir soing de moy, pourroyent à bon marché me desrober ce qu'ils pensent m'estre nuisible: car en telles choses, ie ne desire iamais, ny ne trouue à dire, ce que ie ne vois pas: mais aussi de celles qui se presentent, ils perdent leur temps de m'en prescher l'abstinence. Si que quand ie veux ieusner, il me faut mettre à part des souppeurs; et qu'on me presente iustement, autant qu'il est besoin pour vne reglée collation: car si ie me mets à table, i'oublie ma resolution. Quand i'ordonne qu'on change d'apprest à quelque viande; mes gens sçauent, que c'est à dire, que mon appetit est allanguy, et que ie n'y toucheray point.

En toutes celles qui le peuuent souffrir, ie les ayme peu cuittes. Et les ayme fort mortifiées: et iusques à l'alteration de la senteur, en plusieurs. Il n'y a que la dureté qui generalement me fasche (de toute autre qualité, ie suis aussi nonchalant et souffrant qu'homme que i'aye cogneu) si que contre l'humeur commune, entre into the party where she was most needed and where she could show the most compassion. I am more naturally inclined to follow the example of Flamininus, who gave himself to those who needed him rather than to those who could do him good, than that of Pyrrhus, who was apt to stoop before the great and swagger over the small.

ENGLISH

Long meals weary me and do me harm. For, perhaps because I got used to it as a child for lack of anything better to do with myself, I eat as long as I am at table. So at home, though my table is one of the short ones, I like to sit down a little after the others, in the manner of Augustus; but I do not imitate him in leaving before the others as well. On the contrary, I like to sit on for a long while afterward and listen to the talk, provided I take no part in it. For talking on a full stomach tires me and does me harm, just as I find the exercise of shouting and arguing before a meal very healthy and pleasant.

The ancient Greeks and Romans were wiser than we are. Unless some other extraordinary occupation diverted them, they gave several hours and the better part of the night to eating, which is one of the principal actions of life. They ate and drank less hurriedly than we do, who rush through all our actions post-haste. They stretched out this natural pleasure with more leisure and enjoyment, interspersing it with various kinds of useful and agreeable conversation.

Those who have to look after me could easily steal from me whatever they think is bad for me, for in such matters I never want or miss what I do not see. But as for things that are set before me, they waste their time preaching abstinence to me. So when I want to fast, I must be kept apart from the supper-eaters and served exactly as much as a measured light meal requires; for if I sit down at table, I forget my resolution. When I order a dish to be prepared some other way, my people know that this means my appetite has flagged and I shall not touch it.

I like all meats that can stand it underdone. And I like them well hung, in many cases even to the point where the smell changes. Only toughness generally bothers me (about every other quality I am as indifferent and tolerant as any man I have les poissons mesme, il m'aduient d'en trouuer, et de trop frais, et de trop fermes. Ce n'est pas la faute de mes dents, que i'ay eu tousiours bonnes iusques à l'excellence; et que l'aage ne commence de menasser qu'à cette heure. I'ay apprins dés l'enfance, à les frotter de ma seruiette, et le matin, et à l'entrée et issuë de la table.	known), so that, contrary to the common taste, I find even some fish both too fresh and too firm. It is not the fault of my teeth. They have always been good, to the point of excellence, and age is only now beginning to threaten them. I learned in childhood to rub them with my napkin, both in the morning and on sitting down to table and rising from it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH

DYING BY DEGREES

Losing a tooth, he welcomes a death that comes piece by piece.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.53 Dieu faict grace à ceux à qui il soustrait la vie par le menu. C'est le seul benefice de la vieillesse. La derniere mort en sera d'autant moins plaine et nuisible: elle ne tuera plus qu'vn demy, ou vn quart d'homme. Voila vne dent qui me vient de choir, sans douleur, sans effort: c'estoit le terme naturel de sa durée. Et cette partie de mon estre, et plusieurs autres, sont desia mortes, autres demy mortes, des plus actiues, et qui tenoyent le premier rang pendant la vigueur de mon aage. C'est ainsi que ie fons, et eschappe à moy. Quelle bestise sera-ce à mon entendement, de sentir le sault de cette cheute, desia si auancée, comme si elle estoit entiere? Ie ne l'espere pas.	God shows favor to those from whom he takes life away bit by bit. That is the only benefit of old age. The final death will be all the less complete and harmful for it: it will kill no more than half a man, or a quarter. Here is a tooth that has just fallen out, without pain, without effort: it had reached the natural term of its life. And that part of my being, and several others, are already dead, and others half dead—some of the most active ones, which held first rank in the vigor of my prime. That is how I melt away and slip from myself. What stupidity it would be in my understanding to feel the final drop of this fall, already so far advanced, as if it were the whole fall! I hope it will not.
A la verité, ie reçoy vne principale consolation aux pensées de ma mort, qu'elle soit des iustes et naturelles: et que mes-huy ie ne puisse en cela, requerir ni esperer de la destinée, faueur qu'illegitime. Les hommes se font accroire, qu'ils ont eu autres-fois, comme la stature, la vie aussi plus grande. Mais ils se trompent: et Solon, qui est de ces vieux temps-là, en taille pourtant l'extreme durée à soixante et dix ans. Moy qui ay tant adoré et si vniuersellement cet αριστον μετρον, du temps passé: et qui ay tant pris pour la plus parfaicte, la moyenne mesure: pretendray-ie vne desmesurée et prodigieuse vieillesse?	In truth, my chief consolation when I think of my death is that it will be of the just and natural kind, and that from now on I cannot ask or hope from destiny for any favor in this matter that would not be illegitimate. Men persuade themselves that in former times they had longer lives, as they had greater stature. But they are mistaken: Solon, who belongs to those old times, nevertheless sets the extreme limit of life at seventy years. I, who have so worshiped, and in all things, that measure is best of ancient times, and who have taken the middle measure as the most perfect—am I to aspire to an immoderate and prodigious old age?[61]
Tout ce qui vient au reuers du cours de nature, peut estre fascheux: mais ce, qui vient selon elle, doibt estre tousiours plaisant. Omnia, quæ secundum naturam fiunt, sunt habenda in bonis. Par ainsi, dit Platon, la mort, que les playes ou maladies apportent, soit violente: mais celle, qui nous surprend, la vieillesse nous y conduisant, est de toutes la plus legere, et aucunement delicieuse. Vitam	Whatever goes against the course of nature may be unpleasant, but what comes in accordance with it should always be pleasant. All things that happen according to nature are to be counted among goods. Thus, says Plato, the death brought by wounds or illness may be violent; but the death that comes upon us with old age leading us to it is the lightest

61 "Measure is best" was the motto of Cleobulus, one of the Seven Sages.

FRENCH

adolescentibus vis aufert, senibus maturitas. La mort se mesle et confond par tout à nostre vie: le declin præoccupe son heure, et s'ingere au cours de nostre auancement mesme. I'ay des portraits de ma forme de vingt et cinq, et de trente cinq ans: ie les compare auec celuy d'asteure.

Combien de fois, ce n'est plus moy: combien est mon image presente plus eslongnée de celles là, que de celle de mon trespas. C'est trop abusé de nature, de la tracasser si loing, qu'elle soit contrainte de nous quitter: et abandonner nostre conduite, nos yeux, nos dens, nos iambes, et le reste, à la mercy d'vn secours estranger et mandié: et nous resigner entre les mains de l'art, las de nous suyure.

3.13.54 Ie ne suis excessiuement desireux, ny de salades, ny de fruits: sauf les melons. Mon pere haïssoit toute sorte de sauces, ie les ayme toutes. Le trop manger m'empesche: mais par sa qualité, ie n'ay encore cognoissance bien certaine, qu'aucune viande me nuise: comme aussi ie ne remarque, ny lune plaine, ny basse, ny l'automne du printemps. Il y a des mouuemens en nous, inconstans et incognuz. Car des refors, pour exemple, ie les ay trouuez premierement commodes, depuis fascheux, à present de rechef commodes. En plusieurs choses, ie sens mon estomach et mon appetit aller ainsi diuersifiant. I'ay rechangé du blanc au clairet, et puis du clairet au blanc.

3.13.55 Ie suis friand de poisson, et fais mes iours gras des maigres: et mes festes des iours de ieusne. Ie croy ce qu'aucuns disent, qu'il est de plus aisée digestion que la chair. Comme ie fais conscience de manger de la viande, le iour de poisson: aussi fait mon goust, de mesler le poisson à la chair. Cette diuersité me semble trop eslongnée.

3.13.56 Dés ma ieunesse, ie desrobois par fois quelque repas: ou à fin d'esguiser mon appetit au lendemain (car comme Epicurus ieusnoit et faisoit des repas maigres, pour accoustumer sa volupté à se passer de l'abondance: moy au rebours, pour dresser ma volupté, à faire mieux son profit, et se seruir plus alaigrement, de l'abondance) ou ie ieusnois, pour conseruer ma vigueur au seruice de quelque action de corps ou d'esprit: car et l'vn et l'autre, s'apparesse cruellement en moy, par la repletion: (et sur tout, ie hay ce sot accouplage, d'vne Deesse si saine et si alegre, auec ce petit Dieu indigest et roteur, tout bouffy of all, and in a way delightful. Violence takes life from the young, ripeness from the old. Death mingles and blends everywhere with our life. Decline anticipates its hour and thrusts itself into the very course of our growth. I have portraits of myself at twenty-five and at thirty-five; I compare them with the one of today.[62]

ENGLISH

How many times over it is no longer I! How much farther my present image is from those than from the image of my death! It is abusing nature too much to drag her so far that she is forced to leave us, to abandon our guidance—our eyes, our teeth, our legs, and the rest—to the mercy of outside help we have to beg for, and, weary of following us, to hand us over to the hands of art.

I am not excessively fond of salads or of fruit, except melons. My father hated every kind of sauce; I like them all. Eating too much bothers me; but as for the nature of foods, I do not yet know for certain that any food harms me. Nor do I notice full moon or waning moon, or autumn as against spring. There are movements in us that are inconstant and unknown. Radishes, for example: first I found them agreeable, then troublesome, and now agreeable again. In several things I feel my stomach and my appetite varying like this. I have switched from white wine to claret, and then from claret back to white.

I am fond of fish, and I make my meat days of the lean days and my feasts of the fast days. I believe what some say, that it is easier to digest than meat. Just as my conscience balks at eating meat on a fish day, so my taste balks at mixing fish with meat. The gap between them seems to me too wide.

Since my youth I have sometimes skipped a meal. Sometimes it was to sharpen my appetite for the next day: for as Epicurus fasted and ate lean meals to accustom his pleasure to do without abundance, I did the opposite, to train my pleasure to make better profit and more cheerful use of abundance. Sometimes I fasted to keep my vigor for some action of body or mind, for both grow cruelly sluggish in me from a full stomach (and above all I hate that foolish coupling of so healthy de la fumée de sa liqueur) ou pour guarir mon estomach malade: ou pour estre sans compaignie propre.

62 Both quotations are from Cicero, On Old Age.

FRENCH

Car ie dy comme ce mesme Epicurus, qu'il ne faut pas tant regarder ce qu'on mange, qu'auec qui on mange. Et louë Chilon, de n'auoir voulu promettre de se trouuer au festin de Periander, auant que d'estre informé, qui estoyent les autres conuiez. Il n'est point de si doux apprest pour moy, ny de sauce si appetissante, que celle qui se tire de la societé. Ie croys qu'il est plus sain, de manger plus bellement et moins: et de manger plus souuent. Mais ie veux faire valoir l'appetit et la faim: ie n'aurois nul plaisir à trainer à la medecinale, trois ou quatre chetifs repas par iour, ainsi contrains. Qui m'asseureroit que le goust ouuert, que i'ay ce matin, ie le retrouuasse encore à souper?

Prenons, sur tout les vieillards: le premier temps opportun qui nous vient. Laissons aux faiseurs d'almanachs les esperances et les prognostiques. L'extreme fruict de ma santé, c'est la volupté: tenons nous à la premiere presente et cognuë. I'euite la constance en ces loix de ieusne. Qui veut qu'vne forme luy serue, fuye à la continuer: nous nous y durcissons, nos forces s'y endorment: six mois apres, vous y aurez si bien acoquiné vostre estomach, que vostre proffit, ce ne sera que d'auoir perdu la liberté d'en vser autrement sans dommage.

3.13.57 Ie ne porte les iambes, et les cuisses, non plus couuertes en hyuer qu'en esté, vn bas de soye tout simple. Ie me suis laissé aller pour le secours de mes reumes, à tenir la teste plus chaude, et le ventre, pour ma colique. Mes maux s'y habituerent en peu de iours, et desdaignerent mes ordinaires prouisions. I'estois monté d'vne coiffe à vn couurechef, et d'vn bonnet à vn chapeau double. Les embourreures de mon pourpoint, ne me seruent plus que de galbe: ce n'est rien: si ie n'y adiouste vne peau de lieure ou de vautour: vne calote à ma teste. Suyuez cette gradation, vous irez beau train. Ie n'en feray rien. Et me dedirois volontiers du commencement que i'y ay donné, si i'osois.

Tombez vous en quelque inconuenient nouueau? cette reformation ne vous sert plus: vous y estes accoustumé, cherchez en vne autre. Ainsi se ruinent ceux qui se and lively a goddess with that little indigestible, belching god, all bloated with the fumes of his liquor). Sometimes it was to cure my sick stomach, or because I lacked suitable company.[63]

ENGLISH

For I say, like that same Epicurus, that we should look not so much at what we eat as at whom we eat with. And I praise Chilon for refusing to promise to attend Periander's feast before he had been told who the other guests were. For me there is no dressing so sweet, no sauce so appetizing, as the one that comes from company. I believe it is healthier to eat more gently and less, and to eat more often. But I want to give appetite and hunger their due. I would get no pleasure from dragging out three or four meager meals a day, medicinally, under such constraint. Who could assure me that I would find the keen appetite I have this morning again at supper?

Let us seize—old men above all—the first opportune moment that comes our way. Let us leave hopes and forecasts to the almanac-makers. The ultimate fruit of my health is pleasure: let us hold on to the first pleasure that is present and known. I avoid constancy in these laws of fasting. Whoever wants a regimen to serve him should avoid keeping it up. We grow hardened to it, and our powers fall asleep in it. Six months later you will have got your stomach so used to it that your only profit will be to have lost the freedom to do otherwise without harm.

I keep my legs and thighs no more covered in winter than in summer: a single plain silk stocking. To help with my colds I let myself keep my head warmer, and my belly for my colic. My ailments got used to it in a few days and scorned my ordinary provisions. I had moved up from a cap to a kerchief, and from a bonnet to a double hat. The padding of my doublet now serves only for show. That is nothing, unless I add a hare's skin or a vulture's skin, and a skullcap on my head. Follow this progression and you will go at a fine pace. I shall do nothing of the sort. And I would gladly take back the start I gave it, if I dared.

Do you fall into some new trouble? This adjustment is no use to you anymore; you are used to it; look for another. That is how those people ruin 63 The goddess and the god are Venus and Bacchus.

FRENCH

laissent empestrer à des regimes contraincts, et s'y astreignent superstitieusement: il leur en faut encore, et encore apres, d'autres au delà: ce n'est iamais fait.

3.13.58 Pour nos occupations, et le plaisir: il est beaucoup plus commode, comme faisoyent les anciens, de perdre le disner, et remettre à faire bonne chere à l'heure de la retraicte et du repos, sans rompre le iour: ainsi le faisois-ie autresfois. Pour la santé, ie trouue depuis par experience au contraire, qu'il vaut mieux disner, et que la digestion se faict mieux en veillant. Ie ne suis guere subiect à estre alteré ny sain ny malade: i'ay bien volontiers lors la bouche seche, mais sans soif. Et communement, ie ne bois que du desir qui m'en vient en mangeant, et bien auant dans le repas. Ie bois assez bien, pour vn homme de commune façon.

En esté, et en vn repas appetissant, ie n'outrepasse point seulement les limites d'Auguste, qui ne beuuoit que trois fois precisement: mais pour n'offenser la regle de Democritus, qui deffendoit de s'arrester à quattre, comme à vn nombre mal fortuné, ie coule à vn besoing, iusques à cinq: trois demysetiers, enuiron. Car les petis verres sont les miens fauoris: et me plaist de les vuider, ce que d'autres euitent comme chose mal seante. Ie trempe mon vin plus souuent à moitié, par fois au tiers d'eau. Et quand ie suis en ma maison, d'vn ancien vsage que son medecin ordonnoit à mon pere, et à soy, on mesle celuy qu'il me faut, des la sommelerie, deux ou trois heures auant qu'on serue.

Ils disent, que Cranaus Roy des Atheniens fut inuenteur de cet vsage, de tremper le vin: vtilement ou non, i'en ay veu debattre. I'estime plus decent et plus sain, que les enfans n'en vsent qu'apres seize ou dix-huict ans. La forme de viure plus vsitée et commune, est la plus belle. Toute particularité, m'y semble à euiter: et haïrois autant vn Aleman qui mist de l'eau au vin, qu'vn François qui le buroit pur. L'vsage publiq donne loy à telles choses.

3.13.59 Ie crains vn air empesché, et fuys mortellement la fumée: (la premiere reparation où ie courus chez moy, ce fut aux cheminées, et aux retraicts, vice commun des vieux bastimens, et insupportable) et entre les difficultez de la guerre, comte ces espaisses poussieres, dans lesquelles on nous tient enterrez au chault, tout le long d'vne iournée.

ENGLISH

themselves who let themselves get entangled in strict regimens and bind themselves to them superstitiously. They need more, and more again after that, and still others beyond: it is never done.

For our occupations, and for pleasure, it is much more convenient to skip the midday meal, as the ancients did, and put off feasting until the hour of retirement and rest, without breaking up the day. That is what I used to do. For health, on the contrary, I have since found by experience that it is better to eat at midday, and that digestion goes better when one is awake. I am hardly ever thirsty, sick or well. At such times I do often have a dry mouth, but without thirst. As a rule I drink only from the desire that comes to me while eating, and well into the meal. I drink fairly well for a man of ordinary make.

In summer, and at an appetizing meal, I not only exceed the limit of Augustus, who drank precisely three times and no more, but, so as not to break the rule of Democritus, who forbade stopping at four as an unlucky number, I slip on when need be to five: about three half-pints. For small glasses are my favorites, and I like to empty them, which others avoid as unseemly. Most often I dilute my wine half with water, sometimes with a third. And when I am at home, following an old practice that his physician prescribed for my father and for himself, the wine I need is mixed in the pantry two or three hours before it is served.

They say that Cranaus, king of the Athenians, invented this practice of watering wine; whether usefully or not, I have heard it debated. I think it more seemly and healthier for children not to drink wine until after sixteen or eighteen. The most usual and common way of life is the finest. All singularity seems to me something to avoid in it; and I would hate a German who put water in his wine as much as a Frenchman who drank it neat. Public usage lays down the law in such things.[64]

I dread stuffy air and avoid smoke like death (the first repairs I rushed to make in my house were to the chimneys and privies, a common and unbearable fault of old buildings). And among the hardships of war I count those thick clouds of dust in which they keep us buried in the heat all day long.

64 Cranaus, a legendary early king of Athens.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	I'ay la respiration libre et aysée: et se passent mes morfondements le plus souuent sans offence du poulmon, et sans toux.	My breathing is free and easy, and my colds usually pass without affecting the lungs and without a cough.
3.13.60	L'aspreté de l'esté m'est plus ennemie que celle de l'hyuer: car outre l'incommodité de la chaleur, moins remediable que celle du froid, et outre le coup que les rayons du soleil donnent à la teste: mes yeux s'offencent de toute lueur esclatante: ie ne sçaurois à cette heure disner assiz, vis à vis d'vn feu ardent, et lumineux.	The harshness of summer is more hostile to me than that of winter. For besides the discomfort of heat, which is harder to remedy than that of cold, and besides the blow the sun's rays deal to the head, my eyes are hurt by any glaring light. I could not now dine sitting opposite a bright, blazing fire.
3.13.61	Pour amortir la blancheur du papier, au temps que i'auois plus accoustumé de lire, ie couchois sur mon liure, vne piece de verre, et m'en trouuois fort soulagé. I'ignore iusques à present, l'vsage des lunettes: et vois aussi loing, que ie fis onques, et que tout autre. Il est vray, que sur le declin du iour, ie commence à sentir du trouble, et de la foiblesse à lire: dequoy l'exercice a tousiours trauaillé mes yeux: mais sur tout nocturne. Voyla vn pas en arriere: à toute peine sensible. Ie reculeray d'vn autre; du second au tiers, du tiers au quart, si coïement qu'il me faudra estre aueugle formé, auant que ie sente la decadence et vieillesse de ma veuë.	To dull the whiteness of the paper, when I was more in the habit of reading, I used to lay a piece of glass over my book, and found it a great relief. To this day I know nothing of the use of spectacles, and I see as far as I ever did, and as far as anyone. It is true that as the day declines I begin to feel some blurring and weakness when I read—an exercise that has always strained my eyes, but especially at night. That is one step backward, barely perceptible. I shall go back another, from the second to the third, from the third to the fourth, so quietly that I shall have to be fully blind before I feel the decline and aging of my sight.
	Tant les Parques destordent artificiellement nostre vie. Si suis-ie en doubte, que mon ouïe marchande à s'espaissir: et verrez que ie l'auray demy perdue, que ie m'en prendray encore à la voix de ceux qui parlent à moy. Il faut bien bander l'ame, pour luy faire sentir, comme elle s'escoule.	So artfully do the Fates unwind our life. And yet I suspect that my hearing is beginning to grow dull; and you will see that when I have half lost it I shall still be blaming the voices of the people speaking to me. One must strain the soul hard indeed to make it feel how it is ebbing away.
3.13.62	Mon marcher est prompt et ferme: et ne sçay lequel des deux, ou l'esprit ou le corps, i'ay arresté plus malaisément, en mesme poinct. Le prescheur est bien de mes amys, qui oblige mon attention, tout vn sermon. Aux lieux de ceremonie, où chacun est si bandé en contenance, où i'ay veu les dames tenir leurs yeux mesmes si certains, ie ne suis iamais venu à bout, que quelque piece des miennes n'extrauague tousiours: encore que i'y sois assis, i'y suis peu rassis.	My walk is quick and firm; and I do not know which of the two, mind or body, I have found harder to keep fixed on one spot. The preacher who holds my attention through a whole sermon is a good friend of mine indeed. At ceremonies, where everyone keeps his countenance so stiff, where I have seen ladies hold even their eyes so steady, I have never managed to stop some part of me from forever wandering off. Though I am seated, I am hardly settled.
	Comme la chambriere du Philosophe Chrysippus, disoit de son maistre, qu'il n'estoit yure que par les iambes: car il auoit cette coustume de les remuer, en quelque assiette qu'il fust: et elle le disoit, lors que le vin esmouuant ses compaignons, luy n'en sentoit aucune alteration. On a peu dire aussi dés mon enfance, que i'auoy de la follie aux pieds, ou de l'argent vif: tant i'y ay de remuement et d'inconstance naturelle, en quelque lieu, que ie les place.	The maidservant of the philosopher Chrysippus said of her master that he was drunk only in his legs, for he had the habit of moving them whatever position he was in; and she said it at times when the wine was stirring his companions and he felt no change from it. In the same way it could have been said of me since childhood that I had folly in my feet, or quicksilver, so much fidgeting and natural restlessness do I have in them, wherever I put them.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.13.63 C'est indecence, outre ce qu'il nuit à la santé, voire et au plaisir, de manger gouluement, comme ie fais. Ie mors souuent ma langue, par fois mes doigts, de hastiueté. Diogenes, rencontrant vn enfant qui mangeoit ainsin, en donna vn soufflet à son precepteur. Il y auoit des hommes à Rome, qui enseignoyent à mascher, comme à marcher, de bonne grace. I'en pers le loisir de parler, qui est vn si doux assaisonnement des tables, pourueu que ce soyent des propos de mesme, plaisans et courts.

It is unseemly, besides being bad for one's health and even for one's pleasure, to eat greedily, as I do. I often bite my tongue, and sometimes my fingers, in my haste. Diogenes, meeting a boy who was eating like that, gave his tutor a slap. There were men in Rome who taught people to chew gracefully, as they taught them to walk. Eating this way I lose the leisure to talk, which is such a sweet seasoning to a meal, provided the talk is of the same sort, pleasant and short.

3.13.64 Il y a de la ialousie et enuie entre nos plaisirs, ils se choquent et empeschent l'vn l'autre. Alcibiades, homme bien entendu à faire bonne chere, chassoit la musique mesme des tables, pour qu'elle ne troublast la douceur des deuis, par la raison, que Platon luy preste. Que c'est vn vsage d'hommes populaires, d'appeller des ioüeurs d'instruments et des chantres aux festins, à faute de bons discours et aggreables entretiens, dequoy les gens d'entendement sçauent s'entrefestoyer. Varro demande cecy au conuiue: l'assemblée de personnes belles de presence, et aggreables de conuersation, qui ne soyent ny muets ny bauarts: netteté et delicatesse aux viures, et au lieu: et le temps serein. Ce n'est pas vne feste peu artificielle, et peu voluptueuse, qu'vn bon traittement de table.

There is jealousy and envy among our pleasures: they clash and get in each other's way. Alcibiades, a man who well understood good living, banished even music from the table, so that it would not disturb the sweetness of conversation, for the reason Plato gives him: that it is a custom of common men to call in instrument players and singers to their feasts, for lack of the good talk and pleasant conversation with which people of understanding know how to regale one another. Varro asks this of a banquet: a gathering of people handsome in appearance and agreeable in conversation, who are neither mute nor chatterboxes; cleanliness and delicacy in the food and the place; and fine weather. A good table is no small work of art and no small pleasure.[65]

Ny les grands chefs de guerre, ny les grands philosophes, n'en ont desdaigné l'vsage et la science. Mon imagination en a donné trois en garde à ma memoire, que la fortune me rendit de souueraine douceur, en diuers temps de mon aage plus fleurissant. Mon estat present m'en forclost. Car chacun pour soy y fournit de grace principale, et de saueur, selon la bonne trampe de corps et d'ame, en quoy lors il se trouue. Moy qui ne manie que terre à terre, hay cette inhumaine sapience, qui nous veut rendre desdaigneux et ennemis de la culture du corps. I'estime pareille iniustice, de prendre à contre cœur les voluptez naturelles, que de les prendre trop à cœur.

Neither great generals nor great philosophers have disdained its practice and its science. My imagination has entrusted to my memory three such meals, which fortune made supremely sweet for me at various times in the flower of my life. My present state shuts me out of them, for each person supplies the chief charm and savor according to the good temper of body and soul he finds himself in at the time. I, who deal only in things down to earth, hate that inhuman wisdom that would make us disdainful of the care of the body and hostile to it. I think it equally unjust to set our hearts against natural pleasures as to set our hearts on them too much.

65 Varro's rules for a dinner party are reported by Aulus Gellius.

ACCEPTING PLEASURE

Natural pleasures should be received, neither chased nor fled; when I dance, I dance.

FRENCH

Xerxes estoit un fat, qui enueloppé en toutes les voluptez humaines, alloit proposer prix à qui luy en trouueroit d'autres. Mais non guere moins fat est celuy, qui retranche celles, que nature luy a trouuées. Il ne les faut ny suyure ny fuyr: il les faut receuoir. Ie les reçois vn peu plus grassement et gratieusement, et me laisse plus volontiers aller vers la pente naturelle. Nous n'auons que faire d'exaggerer leur inanité: elle se faict assez sentir, et se produit assez. Mercy à nostre esprit maladif, rabat-ioye, qui nous desgouste d'elles, comme de soy-mesme.

Il traitte et soy, et tout ce qu'il reçoit, tantost auant, tantost arriere, selon son estre insatiable, vagabond et versatile: Sincerum est nisi vas, quodcunque infundis, acescit. Moy, qui me vente d'embrasser si curieusement les commoditez de la vie, et si particulierement: n'y trouue, quand i'y regarde ainsi finement, à peu pres que du vent. Mais quoy? nous sommes par tout vent. Et le vent encore, plus sagement que nous s'ayme à bruire, à s'agiter: et se contente en ses propres offices: sans desirer la stabilité, la solidité, qualitez non siennes.

3.13.65 Les plaisirs purs de l'imagination, ainsi que les desplaisirs, disent aucuns, sont les plus grands: comme l'exprimoit la balance de Critolaüs. Ce n'est pas merueille. Elle les compose à sa poste, et se les taille en plein drap. I'en voy tous les iours, des exemples insignes, et à l'aduenture desirables. Mais moy, d'vne condition mixte, grossier, ne puis mordre si à faict, à ce seul obiect, si simple: que ie ne me laisse tout lourdement aller aux plaisirs presents, de la loy humaine et generale. Intellectuellement sensibles, sensiblement intellectuels. Les philosophes Cyrenaïques veulent, que comme les douleurs, aussi les plaisirs corporels soyent plus puissants: et comme doubles, et comme plus iustes. Il en est, comme dit Aristote, qui d'vne farouche stupidité, en font les desgoustez.

I'en cognoy d'autres qui par ambition le font. Que ne renoncent ils encore au respirer? que ne viuent-ils du

ENGLISH

Xerxes was a fool: wrapped in every human pleasure, he went and offered a prize to whoever could find him others. But hardly less a fool is the man who cuts off those that nature has found for him. We should neither pursue them nor flee them; we should accept them. I accept them a little more amply and graciously, and more readily let myself follow the natural slope. We have no need to exaggerate their emptiness: it makes itself felt enough and shows itself enough. Thanks to our sickly, killjoy mind, which puts us off them as it puts us off itself.

It treats both itself and everything it receives now well, now badly, according to its insatiable, wandering, and fickle nature: Unless the vessel is clean, whatever you pour into it turns sour. I, who boast of embracing the comforts of life so carefully and so particularly, find in them, when I look at them that closely, little more than wind. But what of it? We are wind through and through. And even the wind, more wisely than we, likes to make a noise and move about, and is content with its own functions, without wishing for stability and solidity, qualities that are not its own.[66]

The pure pleasures of the imagination, some say, like its displeasures, are the greatest, as the scales of Critolaus expressed. No wonder: the imagination composes them as it pleases and cuts them out of whole cloth. Every day I see striking examples of this, and perhaps enviable ones. But I, being of a mixed condition and coarse, cannot bite so wholly into this single, simple object that I do not let myself go, quite heavily, to the present pleasures of the general human law—intellectually sensual, sensually intellectual. The Cyrenaic philosophers hold that bodily pleasures, like bodily pains, are the more powerful, both as being double and as being more just. There are some, as Aristotle says, who out of a fierce insensibility make a show of disdaining them.[67]

I know others who do it out of ambition. Why don't they give up breathing too? Why don't they live on 66 Horace, Epistles.

FRENCH

leur, et ne refusent la lumiere, de ce qu'elle est gratuite: ne leur coutant ny inuention ny vigueur? Que Mars, ou Pallas, ou Mercure, les substantent pour voir, au lieu de Venus, de Cerez, et de Bacchus. Chercheront ils pas la quadrature du cercle, iuchez sur leurs femmes? Ie hay, qu'on nous ordonne d'auoir l'esprit aux nues, pendant que nous auons le corps à table. Ie ne veux pas que l'esprit s'y clouë, ny qu'il s'y veautre: mais ie veux qu'il s'y applique: qu'il s'y see, non qu'il s'y couche.

Aristippus ne defendoit que le corps, comme si nous n'auions pas d'ame: Zenon n'embrassoit que l'ame, comme si nous n'auions pas de corps. Touts deux vicieusement. Pythagoras, disent-ils, a suiuy vne philosophie toute en contemplation: Socrates, toute en mœurs et en action: Platon en a trouué le temperament entre les deux. Mais ils le disent, pour en conter. Et le vray temperament se trouue en Socrates; et Platon est plus Socratique, que Pythagorique: et luy sied mieux. Quand ie dance, ie dance: quand ie dors, ie dors.

Voire, et quand ie me promeine solitairement en vn beau verger, si mes pensees se sont entretenuës des occurrences estrangeres quelque partie du temps: quelque autre partie, ie les rameine à la promenade, au verger, à la douceur de cette solitude, et à moy.

3.13.66 Nature a maternellement obserué cela, que les actions qu'elle nous a enioinctes pour nostre besoing, nous fussent aussi voluptueuses. Et nous y conuie, non seulement par la raison: mais aussi par l'appetit: c'est iniustice de corrompre ses regles. Quand ie vois, et Cæsar, et Alexandre, au plus espaiz de sa grande besongne, iouïr si plainement des plaisirs humains et corporels, ie ne dis pas que ce soit relascher son ame, ie dis que c'est la roidir: sousmettant par vigueur de courage, à l'vsage de la vie ordinaire, ces violentes occupations et laborieuses pensées. Sages, s'ils eussent creu, que c'estoit là leur ordinaire vocation, cette-cy, l'extraordinaire. Nous sommes de grands fols. Il a passé sa vie en oisiueté, disons-nous: ie n'ay rien faict d'auiourd'huy. Quoy?

auez-vous pas vescu? C'est non seulement la fondamentale, mais la plus illustre de vos occupations. Si on m'eust mis au propre des grands maniements, i'eusse montré ce que ie sçauoy faire. Auez vous sceu mediter et manier vostre vie? vous auez faict la plus grande their own resources, and refuse the light because it is free and costs them neither invention nor vigor? Let Mars or Pallas or Mercury feed them, just to see, instead of Venus, Ceres, and Bacchus. Won't they be seeking to square the circle while perched on their wives? I hate being told to keep our minds in the clouds while our bodies are at table. I do not want the mind to be nailed to the table or to wallow there, but I want it to attend to it: to sit at it, not lie down at it.

ENGLISH

Aristippus defended only the body, as if we had no soul; Zeno embraced only the soul, as if we had no body. Both were at fault. Pythagoras, they say, followed a philosophy that was all contemplation, Socrates one that was all morals and action; Plato found the balance between the two. But they say this just to tell a story. The true balance is found in Socrates; and Plato is more Socratic than Pythagorean, and it suits him better. When I dance, I dance; when I sleep, I sleep.

Yes, and when I walk alone in a beautiful orchard, if my thoughts have been occupied with outside matters for part of the time, for another part I bring them back to the walk, to the orchard, to the sweetness of this solitude, and to myself.

Nature has seen to it, like a mother, that the actions she has enjoined on us for our needs should also give us pleasure. She invites us to them not only through reason but also through appetite: it is wrong to corrupt her rules. When I see both Caesar and Alexander, in the thick of their great task, enjoying human and bodily pleasures so fully, I do not say that they are relaxing their souls; I say they are toughening them, by strength of spirit subjecting those violent occupations and laborious thoughts to the practice of ordinary life. Wise men they would have been, had they believed that ordinary life was their regular calling and the other their extraordinary one. We are great fools. "He has spent his life in idleness," we say; "I have done nothing today." What?

Have you not lived? That is not only the most fundamental of your occupations but the most illustrious. "If I had been put in charge of great affairs, I would have shown what I could do." Have you 67 Critolaus, a Peripatetic philosopher of the 2nd century BC, held that goods of the soul would outweigh in a balance all goods of the body and of fortune.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
besoigne de toutes. Pour se montrer et exploicter, nature n'a que faire de fortune. Elle se montre egallement en tous estages: et derriere, comme sans rideau. Auez-vous sceu composer vos mœurs: vous auez bien plus faict que celuy qui a composé des liures. Auez-vous sceu prendre du repos: vous auez plus faict, que celuy qui a pris des Empires et des villes.	known how to think over and manage your life? You have done the greatest task of all. To show and exert herself, nature has no need of fortune. She shows herself equally at every level, and behind a curtain as well as without one. Have you known how to compose your character? You have done much more than the man who has composed books. Have you known how to take rest? You have done more than the man who has taken empires and cities.

LIVING FITTINGLY

To live well is man's masterpiece, and Socrates is its model.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.67 Le glorieux chef-d'œuure de l'homme, c'est viure à propos. Toutes autres choses: regner, thesauriser, bastir, n'en sont qu'appendicules et adminicules, pour le plus. Ie prens plaisir de voir vn general d'armée au pied d'vne breche qu'il veut tantost attaquer, se prestant tout entier et deliure, à son disner, au deuis, entre ses amis. Et Brutus, ayant le ciel et la terre conspirez à l'encontre de luy, et de la liberté Romaine, desrober à ses rondes, quelque heure de nuict, pour lire et breueter Polybe en toute securité. C'est aux petites ames enseuelies du poix des affaires, de ne s'en sçauoir purement desmesler: de ne les sçauoir et laisser et reprendre.	The glorious masterpiece of man is to live fittingly. All other things—ruling, hoarding, building—are only little appendages and props, at most. I enjoy seeing a general at the foot of a breach he is about to attack, giving himself wholly and freely to his dinner and to conversation among his friends. And Brutus, with heaven and earth conspiring against him and against Roman liberty, stealing an hour of the night from his rounds to read and summarize Polybius in perfect calm. It is for little souls, buried under the weight of business, not to know how to disentangle themselves from it cleanly, not to know how to set it aside and take it up again.[68]
O fortes peioràque passi Mecum sæpe viri, nunc vino pellite curas, Cras ingens iterabimus æquor.	O brave men, who have often suffered worse things with me, now drive away your cares with wine; tomorrow we shall set out again on the vast sea.[69]
3.13.68 Soit par gosserie, soit à certes, que le vin theologal et Sorbonique est passé en prouerbe, et leurs festins: ie trouue que c'est raison, qu'ils en disnent d'autant plus commodément et plaisamment, qu'ils ont vtilement et serieusement employé la matinée à l'exercice de leur eschole. La conscience d'auoir bien dispensé les autres heures, est vn iuste et sauoureux condiment des tables. Ainsin ont vescu les sages. Et cette inimitable contention à la vertu, qui nous estonne en l'vn et l'autre Caton, cette humeur seuere iusques à l'importunité, s'est ainsi mollement submise, et pleuë aux loix de l'humaine condition, et de Venus et de Bacchus.	Whether in jest or in earnest, the wine of the theologians and the Sorbonne has become proverbial, and their feasts too. I think it only right that they dine all the more comfortably and pleasantly for having spent the morning usefully and seriously in the work of their school. The consciousness of having spent the other hours well is a just and savory condiment at table. That is how the sages lived. And that inimitable striving for virtue which astounds us in both Catos, that disposition severe to the point of being tiresome, submitted thus gently and yielded to the laws of the human condition, and of Venus and Bacchus.[70]

68 Plutarch tells how Brutus spent the night before the battle of Pharsalus (48 BC) making a summary of the historian Polybius.
69 Horace, Odes; Teucer is speaking to his companions.
70 The Sorbonne was the theology faculty of Paris.

FRENCH

Suiuant les preceptes de leur secte, qui demandent le sage parfaict, autant expert et entendu à l'vsage des voluptez qu'en tout autre deuoir de la vie. Cui cor sapiat, ei et sapiat palatus.

3.13.69 Le relaschement et facilité honore ce semble à merueilles, et sied mieux à vne ame forte et genereuse. Epaminondas n'estimoit pas que de se mesler à la dance des garçons de sa ville, de chanter, de sonner, et s'y embesongner auec attention, fust chose qui derogeast à l'honneur de ses glorieuses victoires, et à la parfaicte reformation des mœurs qui estoit en luy. Et parmy tant d'admirables actions de Scipion l'ayeul, personnage digne de l'opinion d'vne geniture celeste, il n'est rien qui luy donne plus de grace, que de le voir nonchalamment et puerilement baguenaudant à amasser et choisir des coquilles, et ioüer à cornichon va deuant, le long de la marine auec Lælius.

Et s'il faisoit mauuais temps, s'amusant et se chatouillant, à representer par escript en comedies, les plus populaires et basses actions des hommes. Et la teste pleine de cette merueilleuse entreprinse d'Annibal et d'Afrique; visitant les escholes en Sicile, et se trouuant aux leçons de la philosophie, iusques à en auoir armé les dents de l'aueugle enuie de ses ennemis à Rome. Ny chose plus remarquable en Socrates, que ce que tout vieil, il trouue le temps de se faire instruire à baller, et iouër des instrumens: et le tient pour bien employé. Cettuy-cy, s'est veu en ecstase debout, vn iour entier et vne nuict, en presence de toute l'armée Grecque, surpris et rauy par quelque profonde pensée.

Il s'est veu le premier parmy tant de vaillants hommes de l'armée, courir au secours d'Alcibiades, accablé des ennemis: le couurir de son corps, et le descharger de la presse, à viue force d'armes. En la bataille Delienne, releuer et sauuer Xenophon, renuersé de son cheual. Et emmy tout le peuple d'Athenes, outré, comme luy, d'vn si indigne spectacle, se presenter le premier à recourir Theramenes, que les trente tyrans faisoient mener à la mort par leurs satellites: et ne desista cette hardie entreprinse, qu'à la remontrance de Theramenes mesme: quoy qu'il ne fust suiuy que de deux, en tout. Il s'est veu, recherché par vne beauté, de laquelle il estoit esprins, maintenir au besoing vne seuere abstinence.

ENGLISH

They were following the precepts of their sect, which require the perfect sage to be as expert and skilled in the enjoyment of pleasures as in every other duty of life. Let him whose heart is discerning have a discerning palate too.[71]

Ease and relaxation, it seems, do a strong and generous soul wonderful honor and suit it best. Epaminondas did not think that joining in the dance of the young men of his city, singing, playing music, and giving his whole attention to it, in any way detracted from the honor of his glorious victories or from the perfect reform of morals that was in him. And among so many admirable actions of Scipio the grandfather, a man worthy of being thought of heavenly birth, nothing gives him more charm than to see him idly and childishly fooling about, gathering and choosing shells and playing ducks and drakes along the seashore with Laelius.

And in bad weather he amused and tickled himself by portraying in writing, in comedies, the most common and lowly actions of men. And with his head full of that marvelous enterprise against Hannibal and Africa, he visited the schools in Sicily and attended lectures in philosophy, so much so that he armed the blind envy of his enemies in Rome with teeth. Nor is there anything more remarkable in Socrates than that, quite old, he found time to have himself taught dancing and playing instruments, and thought it time well spent. This same man was seen in an ecstasy, standing, for a whole day and a night, in the presence of the whole Greek army, overtaken and enraptured by some profound thought.

He was seen, first among so many valiant men in the army, running to rescue Alcibiades when he was overwhelmed by the enemy, covering him with his body, and freeing him from the throng by sheer force of arms. In the battle of Delium he was seen lifting up and saving Xenophon, who had been thrown from his horse. And amid all the people of Athens, outraged as he was by so shameful a spectacle, he was the first to come forward to rescue Theramenes, whom the Thirty Tyrants were having their henchmen lead to his death; and he gave up this bold attempt only at the urging of Theramenes himself, though only two men in all had followed him. He was seen, when courted by a beauty with whom he was smitten, to keep, when need be, a strict abstinence.[72]

71 Cicero, On Ends, playing on the Latin sapere, "to be wise" and "to taste".

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Il s'est veu continuellement marcher à la guerre, et fouler la glace les pieds nuds; porter mesme robbe en hyuer et en esté: surmonter tous ses compaignons en patience de trauail, ne manger point autrement en festin qu'en son ordinaire. Il s'est veu vingt et sept ans, de pareil visage, porter la faim, la pauureté, l'indocilité de ses enfants, les griffes de sa femme. Et en fin la calomnie, la tyrannie, la prison, les fers, et le venin. Mais cet homme là estoit-il conuié de boire à lut par deuoir de ciuilité? c'estoit aussi celuy de l'armée, à qui en demeuroit l'aduantage.

He was seen continually marching to war and treading the ice barefoot, wearing the same robe in winter and summer, surpassing all his companions in endurance of toil, and eating no differently at a feast than at his ordinary meals. He was seen for twenty-seven years, with the same countenance, bearing hunger, poverty, the unruliness of his children, the claws of his wife; and in the end calumny, tyranny, prison, fetters, and poison. But was this man invited by the duty of civility to a drinking contest? He was also the one in the army who came off best.

Et ne refusoit ny à iouër aux noisettes auec les enfans, ny à courir auec eux sur vn cheual de bois, et y auoit bonne grace: car toutes actions, dit la philosophie, sieent egallement bien et honnorent egallement le sage. On a dequoy, et ne doit-on iamais se lasser de presenter l'image de ce personnage à tous patrons et formes de perfection. Il est fort peu d'exemples de vie, pleins et purs. Et faict-on tort à nostre instruction, de nous en proposer tous les iours, d'imbecilles et manques: à peine bons à vn seul ply: qui nous tirent arriere plustost: corrupteurs plustost que correcteurs.

And he did not refuse to play at nuts with the children, or to ride a hobbyhorse with them, and he did it gracefully; for all actions, says philosophy, equally become and equally honor the wise man. We have every reason, and we should never tire, to present the image of this man as the pattern and model of every kind of perfection. There are very few examples of a life that is full and pure. And it harms our instruction to be offered every day examples that are feeble and defective, barely good for a single purpose, which pull us backward instead—corrupters rather than correctors.

Le peuple se trompe: on va bien plus facilement par les bouts, où l'extremité sert de borne, d'arrest et de guide, que par la voye du milieu large et ouuerte, et selon l'art, que selon nature; mais bien moins noblement aussi, et moins recommendablement.

People are mistaken. It is much easier to travel along the edges, where the outer limit serves as boundary, stop, and guide, than by the broad, open middle way; and according to art than according to nature. But it is also much less noble and less commendable.

3.13.70 La grandeur de l'ame n'est pas tant, tirer à mont, et tirer auant, comme sçauoir se ranger et circonscrire. Elle tient pour grand, tout ce qui est assez. Et montre sa hauteur, à aimer mieux les choses moyennes, que les eminentes. Il n'est rien si beau et legitime, que de faire bien l'homme et deuëment. Ny science si arduë que de bien sçauoir viure cette vie. Et de nos maladies la plus sauuage, c'est mespriser nostre estre.

Greatness of soul lies not so much in pressing upward and forward as in knowing how to order and limit oneself. It regards as great whatever is enough, and shows its height by preferring moderate things to eminent ones. There is nothing so fine and legitimate as to play the man well and properly, nor any knowledge so hard as knowing how to live this life well. And the wildest of our maladies is to despise our own being.

3.13.71 Qui veut escarter son ame, le face hardiment s'il peut, lors que le corps se portera mal, pour la descharger de cette contagion. Ailleurs au contraire: qu'elle l'assiste et

Whoever wants to send his soul elsewhere, let him do it boldly if he can, when the body is ailing, to free it from that contagion. At other times, on the 72 The beauty is Alcibiades.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
fauorise, et ne refuse point de participer à ses naturels plaisirs, et de s'y complaire coniugalement: y apportant, si elle est plus sage, la moderation, de peur que par indiscretion, ils ne se confondent auec le desplaisir. L'intemperance, est peste de la volupté: et la temperance n'est pas son fleau: c'est son assaisonnement. Eudoxus, qui en establissoit le souuerain bien, et ses compaignons, qui la monterent à si haut prix, la sauourerent en sa plus gracieuse douceur, par le moyen de la temperance, qui fut en eux singuliere et exemplaire.	contrary, let the soul assist and favor the body, and not refuse to share in its natural pleasures and to delight in them as a spouse would, bringing to them moderation, if it is the wiser of the two, for fear that through lack of discretion they may become mixed up with displeasure. Intemperance is the plague of pleasure; and temperance is not its scourge but its seasoning. Eudoxus, who made pleasure the sovereign good, and his companions, who set so high a value on it, savored it in its most gracious sweetness by means of temperance, which was singular and exemplary in them.
3.13.72 I'ordonne à mon ame, de regarder et la douleur, et la volupté, de veuë pareillement reglée: eodem enim vitio est effusio animi in lætitia, quo in dolore contractio: et pareillement ferme: mais gayement l'vne, l'autre seuerement. Et selon ce qu'elle y peut apporter, autant soigneuse d'en esteindre l'vne, que d'estendre l'autre. Le voir sainement les biens, tire apres soy le voir sainement les maux. Et la douleur a quelque chose de non euitable, en son tendre commencement: et la volupté quelque chose d'euitable en sa fin excessiue. Platon les accouple: et veut, que ce soit pareillement l'office de la fortitude combattre à l'encontre de la douleur, et à l'encontre des immoderées et charmeresses blandices de la volupté.	I order my soul to look upon both pain and pleasure with an equally regulated gaze—for it is as much a fault for the soul to overflow in joy as to contract in grief—and an equally firm one: but upon the one cheerfully, upon the other sternly. And, as far as it can contribute, it is to be as careful to extinguish the one as to extend the other. Seeing good things sanely brings with it seeing bad things sanely. Pain has something unavoidable in its tender beginning, and pleasure something avoidable in its excessive end. Plato couples them together, and holds that it is equally the function of fortitude to fight against pain and against the immoderate and bewitching blandishments of pleasure.[73]
Ce sont deux fontaines, ausquelles, qui puise, d'où, quand et combien il faut, soit cité, soit homme, soit beste, il est bien heureux. La premiere, il la faut prendre par medecine et par necessité, plus escharsement: l'autre par soif, mais non iusques à l'yuresse. La douleur, la volupté, l'amour, la haine, sont les premieres choses, que sent vn enfant: si la raison suruenant elles s'appliquent à elle: cela c'est vertu.	These are two fountains: whoever draws from them where, when, and as much as he should, be it a city, a man, or a beast, is very fortunate. The first must be taken as medicine and of necessity, more sparingly; the other for thirst, but not to the point of drunkenness. Pain, pleasure, love, and hatred are the first things a child feels; if, when reason arrives, they fall in with it, that is virtue.

PASSING THE TIME

He savors life all the more closely as it grows short.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.73 I'ay vn dictionaire tout à part moy: ie passe le temps, quand il est mauuais et incommode; quand il est bon, ie ne le veux pas passer, ie le retaste, ie m'y tiens. Il faut courir le mauuais, et se rassoir au bon. Cette fraze ordinaire de passe-temps, et de passer le temps, represente l'vsage de ces prudentes gens, qui ne pensent	I have a dictionary all my own. I "pass the time" when it is bad and disagreeable; when it is good I do not want to pass it, I taste it again, I hold on to it. We must run through the bad and settle down in the good. This ordinary phrase "pastime" and "passing the time" reflects the habit of those

73 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.

FRENCH

point auoir meilleur conte de leur vie, que de la couler et eschaper: de la passer, gauchir, et autant qu'il est en eux, ignorer et fuir; comme chose de qualité ennuyeuse et desdaignable. Mais ie la cognois autre: et la trouue, et prisable et commode, voire en son dernier decours, où ie la tiens.

Et nous l'a nature mise en main, garnie de telles circonstances et si fauorables, que nous n'auons à nous plaindre qu'à nous, si elle nous presse; et si elle nous eschappe inutilement. Stulti vita ingrata est, trepida est, tota in futurum fertur. Ie me compose pourtant à la perdre sans regret: mais comme perdable de sa condition, non comme moleste et importune. Aussi ne sied-il proprement bien, de ne se desplaire à mourir qu'à ceux, qui se plaisent à viure. Il y a du mesnage à la iouyr: ie la iouis au double des autres: car la mesure en la iouissance, depend du plus ou moins d'application, que nous y prestons.

Principalement à cette heure, que i'apperçoy la mienne si briefue en temps, ie la veux estendre en poix. Ie veux arrester la promptitude de sa fuite par la promptitude de ma saisie: et par la vigueur de l'vsage, compenser la hastiueté de son escoulement. A mesure que la possession du viure est plus courte, il me la faut rendre plus profonde, et plus pleine.

3.13.74 Les autres sentent la douceur d'vn contentement, et de la prosperité: ie la sens ainsi qu'eux: mais ce n'est pas en passant et glissant. Si la faut-il estudier, sauourer et ruminer, pour en rendre graces condignes à celuy qui nous l'ottroye. Ils iouyssent les autres plaisirs, comme ils font celuy du sommeil, sans les cognoistre. A celle fin que le dormir mesme ne m'eschappast ainsi stupidement, i'ay autresfois trouué bon qu'on me le troublast, afin que ie l'entreuisse. Ie consulte d'vn contentement auec moy: ie ne l'escume pas, ie le sonde, et plie ma raison à le recueillir, deuenuë chagrigne et desgoustée.

Me trouué-ie en quelque assiette tranquille, y a il quelque volupté qui me chatouille, ie ne la laisse pas friponner aux sens; i'y associe mon ame. Non pas pour s'y engager, mais pour s'y agreer; non pas pour s'y perdre, mais pour s'y trouuer. Et l'employe de sa part, à se mirer dans ce prospere estat, à en poiser et estimer le bon heur, et l'amplifier. Elle mesure combien c'est qu'elle doit à Dieu, prudent people who think they can make no better use of their life than to let it slip by and escape it, to pass it, sidestep it, and, as far as they can, ignore it and flee it, as something irksome and contemptible. But I know it to be otherwise, and find it both worth prizing and agreeable, even in its last decline, where I now hold it.

ENGLISH

And nature has put it into our hands furnished with such favorable circumstances that we have only ourselves to blame if it weighs on us and if it slips away from us uselessly. The fool's life is joyless and anxious, wholly borne toward the future. Even so, I am preparing myself to lose it without regret, but as something by its nature losable, not as something burdensome and troublesome. Besides, not minding death is truly fitting only for those who take pleasure in living. There is husbandry in enjoying it. I enjoy it twice as much as others, for the measure of enjoyment depends on the greater or lesser attention we give to it.[74]

Especially now that I see mine so short in time, I want to extend it in weight. I want to check the speed of its flight by the speed of my grasp, and by the vigor of my use of it to make up for the haste of its ebbing away. The shorter my possession of life, the deeper and fuller I must make it.

Others feel the sweetness of contentment and prosperity; I feel it as they do, but not in passing and gliding by. Rather, it must be studied, savored, and ruminated, so as to give due thanks for it to him who grants it to us. They enjoy their other pleasures as they enjoy that of sleep, without being aware of them. So that even sleep should not escape me so stupidly, I once thought it a good idea to have it disturbed, so that I might catch a glimpse of it. I deliberate with myself about a contentment; I do not skim it, I sound its depths, and I bend my reason, which has grown peevish and fastidious, to gather it in.

Do I find myself in some tranquil state? Is there some pleasure tickling me? I do not let my senses filch it; I bring my soul into it—not to bind itself to it, but to enjoy it; not to lose itself in it, but to find itself there. And I set it, for its part, to see itself mirrored in this prosperous state, to weigh and ap-d'estre en repos de sa conscience et d'autres passions intestines; d'auoir le corps en sa disposition naturelle: iouissant ordonnément et competemment, des functions molles et flatteuses, par lesquelles il luy plaist compenser de sa grace, les douleurs, dequoy sa iustice nous bat à son tour.

74 Seneca, Letters.

FRENCH

Combien luy vaut d'estre logee en tel poinct, que où qu'elle iette sa veuë, le ciel est calme autour d'elle: nul desir, nulle crainte ou doubte, qui luy trouble l'air: aucune difficulté passée, presente, future, par dessus laquelle son imagination ne passe sans offence. Cette consideration prend grand lustre de la comparaison des conditions differentes. Ainsi, ie me propose en mille visages, ceux que la fortune, ou que leur propre erreur emporte et tempeste. Et encores ceux cy plus pres de moy, qui reçoiuent si laschement, et incurieusement leur bonne fortune.

Ce sont gens qui passent voirement leur temps; ils outrepassent le present, et ce qu'ils possedent, pour seruir à l'esperance, et pour des ombrages et vaines images, que la fantasie leur met au deuant, Morte obita quales fama est volitare figuras, / Aut quæ sopitos deludunt somnia sensus; lesquelles hastent et allongent leur fuitte, à mesme qu'on les suit. Le fruict et but de leur poursuitte, c'est poursuiure: comme Alexandre disoit que la fin de son trauail, c'estoit trauailler. Nihil actum credens, cùm quid superesset agendum.

3.13.75 Pour moy donc, i'ayme la vie, et la cultiue, telle qu'il a pleu à Dieu nous l'octroyer. Ie ne vay pas desirant, qu'elle eust à dire la necessité de boire et de manger. Et me sembleroit faillir non moins excusablement, de desirer qu'elle l'eust double. Sapiens diuitiarum naturalium quæsitor acerrimus. Ny que nous nous substantassions, mettans seulement en la bouche vn peu de cette drogue par laquelle Epimenides se priuoit d'appetit, et se maintenoit. Ny qu'on produisist stupidement des enfans, par les doigts, ou par les talons, ains parlant en reuerence, que plustost encores, on les produisist voluptueusement, par les doigts, et par les talons. Ny que le corps fust sans desir et sans chatouillement. Ce sont plaintes ingrates et iniques.

ENGLISH

praise its happiness, and to amplify it. It measures how much it owes to God for being at peace with its conscience and free from other inner passions, and for having the body in its natural condition, enjoying in an orderly and fitting way the soft and pleasing functions with which he is pleased, by his grace, to compensate for the pains with which his justice in its turn chastises us.

How much it is worth to it to be lodged in such a place that, wherever it casts its eyes, the sky is calm around it: no desire, no fear or doubt to trouble its air, no difficulty past, present, or future over which its imagination cannot pass without harm! This reflection gains great luster from comparison with different conditions. So I set before me, in a thousand guises, those whom fortune or their own error carries away and buffets with storms; and also those, closer to me, who receive their good fortune so slackly and incuriously.

These are people who really do "pass their time." They overleap the present and what they possess, to serve hope, and for the sake of shadows and vain images that fancy sets before them, Like the shapes that, rumor says, flit about after death, / Or the dreams that delude our slumbering senses; and these images hasten and lengthen their flight the more they are pursued. The fruit and goal of their pursuit is to pursue, as Alexander said that the end of his labor was to labor. Thinking nothing done while anything remained to do.[75]

As for me, then, I love life and cultivate it just as it has pleased God to grant it to us. I do not go around wishing that it lacked the need to eat and drink; and it would seem to me no less excusable an error to wish that need doubled. The wise man is the keenest seeker after natural riches. Nor do I wish that we could sustain ourselves just by putting into our mouths a little of that drug by which Epimenides took away his appetite and kept himself alive. Nor that we should produce children insensibly, through our fingers or our heels—but rather, saving your reverence, that we might also produce them with pleasure through our fingers and our heels. Nor that the body should be without desire and without titillation. These are ungrateful and unjust complaints.[76]

75 The first quotation is from Virgil, Aeneid; the second from Lucan, Pharsalia.
76 Seneca, Letters.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	I'accepte de bon cœur et recognoissant, ce que nature a faict pour moy: et m'en aggree et m'en loue. On faict tort à ce grand et tout puissant donneur, de refuser son don, l'annuller et desfigurer, tout bon, il a faict tout bon. Omnia, quæ secundum naturam sunt, æstimatione digna sunt.	I accept with a glad and grateful heart what nature has done for me, and I am pleased with it and proud of it. We wrong that great and all-powerful giver by refusing his gift, nullifying it, and disfiguring it. All good himself, he has made all things good. All things that are according to nature are worthy of esteem.[77]

BODY AND MIND TOGETHER

Mind and body belong together; those who would rise above man sink below him.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.13.76	Des opinions de la philosophie, i'embrasse plus volontiers celles qui sont les plus solides: c'est à dire les plus humaines, et nostres. Mes discours sont conformément à mes mœurs, bas et humbles. Elle faict bien l'enfant à mon gré, quand elle se met sur ses ergots, pour nous prescher. Que c'est vne farrouche alliance, de marier le diuin auec le terrestre, le raisonnable auec le desraisonnable, le seuere à l'indulgent, l'honneste au des-honneste. Que la volupté, est qualité brutale, indigne que le sage la gouste. Le seul plaisir, qu'il tire de la iouyssance d'vne belle ieune espouse, que c'est le plaisir de sa conscience, de faire vne action selon l'ordre. Comme de chausser ses bottes pour vne vtile cheuauchee.	Among the opinions of philosophy, I more readily embrace those that are most solid, that is to say, the most human and most our own. My reasonings, in keeping with my ways, are low and humble. To my mind philosophy is being very childish when she struts up on her spurs to preach to us: that it is an uncouth alliance to marry the divine with the earthly, the reasonable with the unreasonable, the severe with the indulgent, the honorable with the dishonorable; that pleasure is a brutish quality, unworthy of being tasted by the wise man; that the only pleasure he draws from the enjoyment of a beautiful young wife is the pleasure of his conscience at performing an action according to order, like pulling on his boots for a useful ride.
	N'eussent ses suyuans, non plus de droit, et de nerfs, et de suc, au despucelage de leurs femmes, qu'en a sa leçon.	May her followers have no more right, nerve, and sap for deflowering their wives than her lesson has!
3.13.77	Ce n'est pas ce que dit Socrates, son precepteur et le nostre. Il prise, comme il doit, la volupté corporelle: mais il prefere celle de l'esprit, comme ayant plus de force, de constance, de facilité, de varieté, de dignité. Cette cy ne va nullement seule, selon luy; il n'est pas si fantastique: mais seulement, premiere. Pour luy, la temperance est moderatrice, non aduersaire des voluptez. Nature est vn doux guide: mais non pas plus doux, que prudent et iuste. Intrandum est in rerum naturam, et penitus quid ea postulet, peruidendum. Ie queste par tout sa piste: nous l'auons confondüe de traces artificielles. Et ce souuerain bien Academique, et Peripatetique, qui est viure selon icelle: deuient à cette cause difficile à borner et expliquer.	That is not what Socrates says, her tutor and ours. He values bodily pleasure as he should, but he prefers that of the mind, as having more force, constancy, ease, variety, and dignity. According to him, the pleasure of the mind by no means goes alone—he is not so fanciful—but only first. For him temperance is the moderator of pleasures, not their adversary. Nature is a gentle guide, but no more gentle than prudent and just. We must penetrate into the nature of things and see thoroughly what it demands. I seek her track everywhere; we have muddled it with artificial tracks. And for this reason that sovereign good of the Academics and Peripatetics, which is to live according to nature, becomes hard to define and explain.[78]

77 Cicero, On Ends.

FRENCH

Et celuy des Stoïciens, voisin à celuy-là, qui est, consentir à nature. Est-ce pas erreur, d'estimer aucunes actions moins dignes de ce qu'elles sont necessaires? Si ne m'osteront-ils pas de la teste, que ce ne soit vn tres-conuenable mariage, du plaisir auec la necessité, auec laquelle, dit vn ancien, les Dieux complottent tousiours. A quoy faire desmembrons nous en diuorce, vn bastiment tissu d'vne si ioincte et fraternelle correspondance? Au rebours, renouons le par mutuels offices: que l'esprit esueille et viuifie la pesanteur du corps, le corps arreste la legereté de l'esprit, et la fixe, Qui velut summum bonum laudat animæ naturam, et tanquam malum naturam carnis accusat, profectò et animam carnaliter appetit et carnem carnaliter fugit, quoniam id vanitate sentit humana, non veritate diuina.

Il n'y a piece indigne de nostre soing, en ce present que Dieu nous a faict: nous en deuons comte iusques à vn poil. Et n'est pas vne commission par acquit à l'homme, de conduire l'homme selon sa condition. Elle est expresse, naïfue et tres-principale: et nous l'a le Createur donnee serieusement et seuerement. L'authorité peut seule enuers les communs entendemens: et poise plus en langage peregrin. Reschargeons en ce lieu. Stultitiæ proprium quis non dixerit, ignauè et contumaciter facere quæ facienda sunt: et alio corpus impellere, alio animum: distrahique inter diuersissimos motus?

3.13.78 Or sus pour voir, faictes vous dire vn iour, les amusemens et imaginations, que celuy-là met en sa teste, et pour lesquelles il destourne sa pensee d'vn bon repas, et plainct l'heure qu'il employe à se nourrir: vous trouuerez qu'il n'y a rien si fade, en tous les mets de vostre table, que ce bel entretien de son ame (le plus souuent il nous vaudroit mieux dormir tout à faict, que de veiller à ce, à quoy nous veillons) et trouuerez que son discours et intentions, ne valent pas vostre capirotade. Quand ce seroient les rauissemens d'Archimedes mesme, que seroit-ce?

Ie ne touche pas icy, et ne mesle point à cette marmaille d'hommes que nous sommes, et à cette vanité de desirs et

ENGLISH

So does that of the Stoics, close to it, which is to consent to nature. Is it not an error to consider some actions less worthy because they are necessary? They will never get it out of my head that the marriage of pleasure with necessity is a most fitting one—necessity, with whom, says an ancient, the gods always conspire. Why do we tear apart in divorce a structure woven of so close and brotherly a correspondence? On the contrary, let us bind it together again by mutual services. Let the mind awaken and quicken the heaviness of the body, and the body check the lightness of the mind and steady it. He who praises the nature of the soul as the sovereign good and condemns the nature of the flesh as evil, assuredly both desires the soul carnally and flees the flesh carnally, since he feels this from human vanity, not from divine truth.[79]

There is no part of this present God has given us that is unworthy of our care; we must account for it down to a single hair. And the commission given to man to guide man according to his condition is no perfunctory one. It is express, plain, and of the first importance, and the Creator gave it to us seriously and sternly. Authority alone carries weight with common minds, and it weighs more in a foreign language. Let us charge again here. Who would not say that it is the mark of folly to do lazily and rebelliously what has to be done, to push the body one way and the mind another, and to be torn between the most contrary motions?[80]

Come now, just to see, have such a man tell you one day the amusements and imaginings he fills his head with, for whose sake he turns his thoughts away from a good meal and begrudges the hour he spends feeding himself. You will find that there is nothing so insipid among all the dishes on your table as this fine entertainment of his soul (most often we would do better to be sound asleep than awake for the things we stay awake for). And you will find that his reasonings and intentions are not worth your stew. Even if they were the raptures of Archimedes himself, what would they amount to?

I am not touching here, nor mixing in with this rabble of men that we are and this vanity of de-

78 Cicero, On Ends.
79 Saint Augustine, The City of God.
80 Seneca, Letters.

FRENCH

cogitations, qui nous diuertissent, ces ames venerables, esleuees par ardeur de deuotion et religion, à vne constante et conscientieuse meditation des choses diuines, lesquelles preoccupans par l'effort d'vne viue et vehemente esperance, l'vsage de la nourriture eternelle, but final, et dernier arrest des Chrestiens desirs: seul plaisir constant, incorruptible: desdaignent de s'attendre à nos necessiteuses commoditez, fluides et ambigues: et resignent facilement au corps, le soin et l'vsage, de la pasture sensuelle et temporelle. C'est vn estude priuilegé. Entre nous, ce sont choses, que i'ay tousiours veuës de singulier accord: les opinions supercelestes, et les mœurs sousterraines.

3.13.79 Esope ce grand homme vid son maistre qui pissoit en se promenant, Quoy donq, fit-il, nous faudra-il chier en courant? Mesnageons le temps, encore nous en reste-il beaucoup d'oisif, et mal employé. Nostre esprit n'a volontiers pas assez d'autres heures, à faire ses besongnes, sans se desassocier du corps en ce peu d'espace qu'il luy faut pour sa necessité. Ils veulent se mettre hors d'eux, et eschapper à l'homme. C'est folie: au lieu de se transformer en Anges, ils se transforment en bestes: au lieu de se hausser, ils s'abbattent. Ces humeurs transcendentes m'effrayent, comme les lieux hautains et inaccessibles. Et rien ne m'est facheux à digerer en la vie de Socrates, que ses ecstases et ses demoneries.

Rien si humain en Platon, que ce pourquoy ils disent, qu'on l'appelle diuin. Et de nos sciences, celles-là me semblent plus terrestres et basses, qui sont les plus haut montees. Et ie ne trouue rien si humble et si mortel en la vie d'Alexandre, que ses fantasies autour de son immortalisation. Philotas le mordit plaisamment par sa responce. Il s'estoit coniouy auec luy par lettre, de l'oracle de Iupiter Hammon, qui l'auoit logé entre les Dieux. Pour ta consideration, i'en suis bien ayse: mais il y a dequoy plaindre les hommes, qui auront à viure auec vn homme, et luy obeyr, lequel outrepasse, et ne se contente de la mesure d'vn homme.

Diis te minorem quòd geris, imperas. La gentille inscription, dequoy les Atheniens honnorerent la venue de Pompeius en leur ville, se conforme à mon sens: D'autant es tu Dieu, comme / Tu te recognois homme.

ENGLISH

sires and musings that distract us, those venerable souls raised by the ardor of devotion and religion to a constant and conscientious meditation on divine things. By the force of a lively and vehement hope they anticipate the enjoyment of eternal nourishment, the final goal and last resting place of Christian desires, the only constant and incorruptible pleasure; and so they disdain to concern themselves with our needy comforts, fluid and uncertain, and readily leave to the body the care and use of sensual and temporal fodder. That is a privileged study. Between ourselves, there are two things I have always seen in singular agreement: supercelestial opinions and subterranean morals.

Aesop, that great man, saw his master pissing as he walked. "What," he said, "are we to shit as we run?" Let us husband our time; even so, a great deal of it remains to us idle and ill spent. Does our mind not have enough other hours to do its business without dissociating itself from the body in the little space the body needs for its necessities? They want to get outside themselves and escape from the man. That is folly: instead of changing into angels, they change into beasts; instead of raising themselves, they bring themselves down. These transcendent humors frighten me, like high and inaccessible places. And nothing in the life of Socrates is so hard for me to digest as his ecstasies and his dealings with his daemon.[81]

Nothing in Plato is so human as the very things for which, they say, he is called divine. And of our sciences, those that have climbed highest seem to me the most earthly and low. And I find nothing so humble and mortal in the life of Alexander as his fancies about his immortalization. Philotas stung him wittily with his reply. He had congratulated him by letter on the oracle of Jupiter Ammon that had placed him among the gods: "For your sake I am very glad of it; but there is reason to pity the men who will have to live with, and obey, a man who exceeds the measure of a man and is not content with it."[82]

It is because you hold yourself lesser than the gods that you rule. The fine inscription with which the Athenians honored Pompey's arrival in their city

81 Aesop's master was the philosopher Xanthus, in the legendary Life of Aesop.
82 The oracle of Ammon was at the Siwa oasis in Egypt.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

agrees with my view: You are a god just so far / As you know yourself a man.[83]

3.13.80 C'est vne absoluë perfection, et comme diuine, de sçauoir iouyr loyallement de son estre. Nous cherchons d'autres conditions, pour n'entendre l'vsage des nostres: et sortons hors de nous, pour ne sçauoir quel il y faict. Si auons nous beau monter sur des eschasses, car sur des eschasses encores faut-il marcher de nos iambes. Et au plus esleué throne du monde, si ne sommes nous assis, que sus nostre cul. Les plus belles vies, sont à mon gré celles, qui se rangent au modelle commun et humain auec ordre: mais sans miracle, sans extrauagance. Or la vieillesse a vn peu besoin d'estre traictee plus tendrement.

It is an absolute perfection, and as it were divine, to know how to enjoy our being rightly. We seek other conditions because we do not understand the use of our own, and go outside ourselves because we do not know what it is like within. Yet it is no use our mounting on stilts, for on stilts we must still walk with our own legs. And on the loftiest throne in the world we are still sitting on our own backside. The finest lives, to my mind, are those that conform to the common human pattern, with order, but without miracle and without extravagance. Now old age needs to be treated a little more tenderly.

Recommandons la à ce Dieu protecteur de santé et de sagesse: mais gaye et sociale: Frui paratis et valido mihi, Latoe, dones; et precor, integra
Cum mente, nec turpem senectam
Degere, nec Cythara carentem.

Let us commend it to that god who is protector of health and wisdom—but a cheerful and sociable wisdom: Grant me, son of Latona, to enjoy what I have in good health, and, I pray, with my mind unimpaired, to pass an old age not shameful, nor lacking the lyre.[84]

83 The Latin line is from Horace, Odes; the inscription is reported by Plutarch in his Life of Pompey.
84 Horace, Odes, addressed to Apollo, son of Latona.