dessus de nous, et combien nostre art est foible à les imiter. Nous voyons toutesfois aux nostres plus grossiers, les facultez que nous y employons, et que nostre ame s'y sert de toutes ses forces: pourquoy n'en estimons nous autant d'eux? Pourquoy attribuons nous à ie ne sçay quelle inclination naturelle et seruile, les ouurages qui surpassent tout ce que nous pouuons par nature et par art?

En quoy sans y penser nous leur donnons vn tres-grand auantage sur nous, de faire que Nature par vne douceur maternelle les accompaigne et guide, comme par la main à toutes les actions et commoditez de leur vie, et qu'à nous elle nous abandonne au hazard et à la fortune, et à quester par art, les choses necessaires à nostre conseruation; et nous refuse quant et quant les moyens de pouuoir arriuer par aucune institution et contention d'esprit, à la suffisance naturelle des bestes: de maniere que leur stupidité brutale surpasse en toutes commoditez, tout ce que peult nostre diuine intelligence. Vrayement à ce compte nous aurions bien raison de l'appeller vne tres-iniuste marastre.

Mais il n'en est rien, nostre police n'est pas si difforme et desreglée.

2.12.31 Nature a embrassé vniuersellement toutes ses creatures: et n'en est aucune, qu'elle n'ait bien plainement fourny de tous moyens necessaires à la conseruation de son estre. Car ces plaintes vulgaires que i'oy faire aux hommes (comme la licence de leurs opinions les esleue tantost au dessus des nuës, et puis les rauale aux Antipodes) que nous sommes le seul animal abandonné, nud sur la terre nuë, lié, garrotté, n'ayant dequoy s'armer et couurir que de la despouïlle d'autruy:

là où toutes les autres creatures, Nature les a reuestuës de coquilles, de gousses, d'escorse, de poil, de laine, de pointes, de cuir, de bourre, de plume, d'escaille, de toison, et de soye selon le besoin de leur estre: les a armées de griffes, de dents, de cornes, pour assaillir et pour defendre, et les a elle mesmes instruites à ce qui leur est propre, à nager, à courir, à voler, à chanter: là où l'homme ne sçait ny cheminer, ny parler, ny manger, ny rien que pleurer sans apprentissage.

Tum porro puer, vt sæuis proiectus ab vndis
Nauita, nudus humi iacet infans, indigus omni
Vitali auxilio, cùm primùm in luminis oras is at imitating them. Yet in our own cruder works we see the faculties we bring to them, and that our soul uses all its powers on them. Why do we not think the same of them? Why do we attribute to some kind of natural, servile inclination works that surpass anything we can do by nature or by skill?

ENGLISH

In doing so, without realizing it, we give them a very great advantage over us. We make Nature, with a mother's tenderness, accompany and guide them as if by the hand in all the actions and conveniences of their life, while she abandons us to chance and to fortune, to seek out by skill the things we need to survive. At the same time she denies us the means of reaching, by any amount of education and mental effort, the natural competence of beasts, so that their brutish stupidity surpasses, in every convenience, all that our divine intelligence can do. Truly, on that reckoning we would have good reason to call her a most unjust stepmother.

But nothing of the sort is true: the order that governs us is not so misshapen and unruly.

Nature has embraced all her creatures universally, and there is none she has not very fully supplied with every means necessary to preserve its being. For there are these common complaints I hear men make (as the license of their opinions now lifts them above the clouds and then drags them down to the Antipodes): that we are the only animal abandoned, naked on the naked earth, bound and tied up, with nothing to arm and cover ourselves with but the spoils of others;

whereas Nature has clothed all the other creatures in shells, husks, bark, hair, wool, spines, hide, down, feathers, scales, fleece and silk, according to the needs of their being. She has armed them with claws, teeth and horns, to attack and to defend, and has herself taught them what is proper to them: to swim, to run, to fly, to sing. Man, meanwhile, cannot walk, or speak, or eat, or do anything but cry, without being taught.

Then again the child, like a sailor cast up by the cruel waves, lies naked on the ground, speechless, lacking every 22 Virgil, Georgics IV.

FRENCH

Nexibus ex aluo matris natura profudit,
Vagitúque locum lugubri complet, vt æquum est
Cui tantùm in vita restet transire malorum.
At variæ crescunt pecudes, armenta, feræque,
Nec crepitacula eis opus est, nec cuiquam adhibenda est
Almæ nutricis blanda atque infracta loquela;
Nec varias quærunt vestes pro tempore cœli;
Denique non armis opus est, non mœnibus altis
Queis sua tutentur, quando omnibus omnia largè
Tellus ipsa parit, naturáque dædala rerum.

ENGLISH

help for life, as soon as into the shores of light nature has poured him forth with labor from his mother's womb, and he fills the place with mournful wailing, as is only fitting for one who has so many evils still to pass through in life.
But the various flocks, herds and wild beasts grow up;
they have no need of rattles, nor must any of them be given the coaxing, broken prattle of a fond nurse;
they seek no change of clothes to suit the season;
and lastly they need no weapons, no high walls to guard their own, since for all of them all things are lavishly brought forth by the earth herself and by nature, the cunning craftsman of things.[23]

2.12.32 Ces plaintes là sont fauces: il y a en la police du monde, vne egalité plus grande, et vne relation plus vniforme. Nostre peau est pourueue aussi suffisamment que la leur, de fermeté contre les iniures du temps, tesmoing plusieurs nations, qui n'ont encores essayé nul vsage de vestemens. Nos anciens Gaulois n'estoient gueres vestus, ne sont pas les Irlandois noz voisins, soubs vn ciel si froid. Mais nous le iugeons mieux par nous mesmes: car tous les endroits de la personne, qu'il nous plaist descouurir au vent et à l'air, se trouuent propres à le souffrir.

These complaints are false. There is, in the order of the world, a greater equality and a more uniform relationship. Our skin is provided as adequately as theirs with toughness against the harshness of the weather: witness several nations that have not yet tried any use of clothing. Our ancient Gauls wore hardly any clothes, nor do our neighbors the Irish, under so cold a sky. But we can judge it better from ourselves, for every part of the body that we choose to expose to the wind and the air turns out to be fit to bear it.

S'il y a partie en nous foible, et qui semble deuoir craindre la froidure, ce deuroit estre l'estomach, où se fait la digestion: noz peres le portoyent descouuert, et noz Dames, ainsi molles et delicates qu'elles sont, elles s'en vont tantost entr'ouuertes iusques au nombril. Les liaisons et emmaillottemens des enfants ne sont non plus necessaires: et les meres Lacedemoniennes esleuoient les leurs en toute liberté de mouuements de membres, sans les attacher ne plier. Nostre pleurer est commun à la plus part des autres animaux, et n'en est guere qu'on ne voye se plaindre et gemir long temps apres leur naissance: d'autant que c'est vne contenance bien sortable à la foiblesse, en quoy ils se sentent.

If there is any part of us that is weak and seems likely to fear the cold, it ought to be the stomach, where digestion takes place. Our fathers wore it uncovered, and our ladies, soft and delicate as they are, sometimes go about with their bodices open down to the navel. Binding and swaddling children is not necessary either: the Spartan mothers raised theirs in complete freedom to move their limbs, without tying them up or folding them in. Our crying is shared by most other animals, and there are hardly any that are not seen to whimper and moan long after their birth, since that is a bearing well suited to the weakness they feel themselves in.

Quant à l'vsage du manger, il est en nous, comme en eux, naturel et sans instruction. Sentit enim vim quisque suam quam possit abuti. Qui fait doute qu'vn enfant arriué à la force de se nourrir, ne sçeut quester sa nourriture? et la terre en produit, et luy en offre assez pour sa necessité, sans autre culture et artifice. Et sinon en tout temps,

As for eating, it is in us, as in them, natural and untaught. For every creature senses what its powers are and how far it can use them. Who doubts that a child, once he had the strength to feed himself, would know how to seek out his food? And the 23 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, Book V.

FRENCH

aussi ne fait elle pas aux bestes, tesmoing les prouisions, que nous voyons faire aux fourmis et autres, pour les saisons steriles de l'année.

2.12.33 Ces nations, que nous venons de descouurir, si abondamment fournies de viande et de breuuage naturel, sans soing et sans façon, nous viennent d'apprendre que le pain n'est pas nostre seule nourriture: et que sans labourage, nostre mere Nature nous auoit munis à planté de tout ce qu'il nous falloit: voire, comme il est vrayssemblable, plus plainement et plus richement qu'elle ne fait à present, que nous y auons meslé nostre artifice: Et tellus nitidas fruges, vinetáque læta
Sponte sua primùm mortalibus ipsa creauit;
Ipsa dedit dulces fœtus, et pabula læta;
Quæ nunc vix nostro grandescunt aucta labore,
Conterimúsque boues et vires agricolarum; le débordement et desreglement de nostre appetit deuançant toutes les inuentions, que nous cherchons de l'assouuir.

2.12.34 Quant aux armes, nous en auons plus de naturelles que la plus part des autres animaux, plus de diuers mouuemens de membres, et en tirons plus de seruice naturellement et sans leçon: ceux qui sont duicts à combatre nuds, on les void se ietter aux hazards pareils aux nostres. Si quelques bestes nous surpassent en cet auantage, nous en surpassons plusieurs autres. Et l'industrie de fortifier le corps et le couurir par moyens acquis, nous l'auons par vn instinct et precepte naturel. Qu'il soit ainsi, l'elephant aiguise et esmoult ses dents, desquelles il se sert à la guerre (car il en a de particulieres pour cet vsage, lesquelles il espargne, et ne les employe aucunement à ses autres seruices).

Quand les taureaux vont au combat, ils respandent et iettent la poussiere à l'entour d'eux: les sangliers affinent leurs deffences: et l'ichneumon, quand il doit venir aux prises auec le crocodile, munit son corps, l'enduit et le crouste tout à l'entour, de limon bien serré et bien paistry, comme d'vne cuirasse. Pourquoy ne dirons nous qu'il est aussi naturel de nous armer de bois et de fer?

2.12.35 Quant au parler, il est certain, que s'il n'est pas naturel, il n'est pas necessaire. Toutesfois ie croy qu'vn enfant, earth produces enough of it and offers him enough for his needs, without any further cultivation or artifice. And if it does not do so at all times, neither does it for the beasts: witness the provisions we see ants and others laying up for the barren seasons of the year.

ENGLISH

These nations we have just discovered, so abundantly supplied with natural food and drink, without effort or preparation, have just taught us that bread is not our only nourishment, and that without plowing, our mother Nature had furnished us in plenty with all we needed—indeed, as is likely, more fully and more richly than she does now that we have mixed our artifice into it: And the earth herself, of her own accord, first created for mortals shining crops and joyful vineyards;
she herself gave sweet fruits and joyful pastures, which now scarcely grow, though increased by our toil;
and we wear out our oxen and the strength of the farmers; the excess and unruliness of our appetite outrunning every invention by which we try to satisfy it.[24]

As for weapons, we have more natural ones than most other animals, more varied movements of the limbs, and we get more service from them naturally and without lessons. Those trained to fight naked are seen throwing themselves into the same dangers as we do. If some beasts surpass us in this advantage, we surpass many others. And the skill of strengthening the body and covering it by acquired means we have by a natural instinct and precept. To prove it: the elephant sharpens and grinds the tusks it uses in war (for it has special ones for this purpose, which it spares and never uses for its other tasks).

When bulls go into battle, they scatter and toss the dust around them; boars hone their tusks; and the ichneumon, when it is about to come to grips with the crocodile, fortifies its body, coating and crusting it all over with tightly packed, well-kneaded mud, as with a breastplate. Why shall we not say that it is just as natural for us to arm ourselves with wood and iron?[25]

As for speech, it is certain that if it is not natural, it is not necessary. Nevertheless I believe that a qu'on auroit nourry en pleine solitude, esloigné de tout commerce (qui seroit vn essay malaisé à faire) auroit quelque espece de parolle pour exprimer ses conceptions: et n'est pas croyable, que Nature nous ait refusé ce moyen qu'elle a donné à plusieurs autres animaux. Car qu'est-ce autre chose que parler, cette faculté, que nous leur voyons de se plaindre, de se resiouyr, de s'entr'appeller au secours, se conuier à l'amour, comme ils font par l'vsage de leur voix? Comment ne parleroient elles entr'elles? elles parlent bien à nous, et nous à elles. En combien de sortes parlons nous à nos chiens, et ils nous respondent?

FRENCH

D'autre langage, d'autres appellations, deuisons nous auec eux, qu'auec les oyseaux, auec les pourceaux, les beufs, les cheuaux: et changeons d'idiome selon l'espece. Cosi per entro loro schiera bruna
S'ammusa l'vna con l'altra formica,
Forse à spiar lor via, et lor fortuna. Il me semble que Lactance attribuë aux bestes, non le parler seulement, mais le rire encore. Et la difference de langage, qui se voit entre nous, selon la difference des contrées, elle se treuue aussi aux animaux de mesme espece.

Aristote allegue à ce propos le chant diuers des perdrix, selon la situation des lieux: Variæque volucres
Longè alias alio iaciunt in tempore voces,
Et partim mutant cum tempestatibus vna
Raucisonos cantus. Mais cela est à sçauoir, quel langage parleroit cet enfant: et ce qui s'en dit par diuination, n'a pas beaucoup d'apparence. Si on m'allegue contre cette opinion, que les sourds naturels ne parlent point: ie respons que ce n'est pas seulement pour n'auoir peu receuoir l'instruction de la parolle par les oreilles, mais plustost pource que le sens de l'ouye, duquel ils sont priuez, se rapporte à celuy du parler, et se tiennent ensemble d'vne cousture naturelle.

En façon, que ce que nous parlons, il faut que nous le parlions premierement à nous, et que nous le facions sonner au dedans à nos oreilles, auant que de l'enuoyer aux estrangeres.

2.12.36 I'ay dict tout cecy, pour maintenir cette ressemblance, qu'il y a aux choses humaines: et pour nous ramener et child raised in complete solitude, far from all company (which would be a hard experiment to make), would have some kind of speech to express his ideas; and it is not credible that Nature has refused us this means, which she has given to many other animals. For what else is speaking but this faculty we see in them of complaining, rejoicing, calling one another for help, inviting one another to love, as they do by using their voices? How could they not speak among themselves? They certainly speak to us, and we to them. In how many ways do we speak to our dogs, and they answer us?

ENGLISH

We converse with them in a different language, with different names, from those we use with birds, with pigs, oxen and horses; and we change idiom according to the species. So, within their dark troop, one ant touches snouts with another, perhaps to spy out their way and their fortune. It seems to me that Lactantius attributes to beasts not only speech but laughter as well. And the difference of language we see among ourselves, according to the difference of regions, is also found in animals of the same species.[26]

Aristotle cites on this point the song of partridges, which varies with the location: And the various birds utter very different cries at different times, and some change, along with the weather, their raucous songs. But the question is what language that child would speak; and what is said about it by guesswork is not very plausible. If someone objects to this opinion that people deaf from birth do not speak, I answer that this is not only because they could not receive instruction in speech through their ears, but rather because the sense of hearing, which they lack, is bound up with that of speech, and the two are held together by a natural seam.

So whatever we speak, we must first speak it to ourselves and make it sound within, in our own ears, before sending it out to other people's.

I have said all this to maintain the likeness that exists with human things, and to bring us back and 24 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, Book II.

25 The ichneumon is the Egyptian mongoose.
26 Dante, Purgatorio XXVI. Lactantius was a Christian writer of the late 3rd and early 4th centuries AD.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
ioindre à la presse. Nous ne sommes ny au dessus, ny au dessous du reste: tout ce qui est sous le ciel, dit le sage, court vne loy et fortune pareille. Indupedita suis fatalibus omnia vinclis. Il y a quelque difference, il y a des ordres et des degrez: mais c'est soubs le visage d'vne mesme nature: Res quæque suo ritu procedit, et omnes / Fœdere naturæ certo discrimina seruant.	join us to the crowd. We are neither above nor below the rest. All that is under heaven, says the wise man, runs under one law and one fortune. All things are bound by their own fated chains. There is some difference; there are orders and degrees; but it is under the face of one and the same nature: Each thing proceeds in its own way, and all / keep their distinctions by a fixed covenant of nature.[27]
2.12.37 Il faut contraindre l'homme, et le renger dans les barrieres de cette police. Le miserable n'a garde d'eniamber par effect au delà: il est entraué et engagé, il est assubiecty de pareille obligation que les autres creatures de son ordre, et d'vne condition fort moyenne, sans aucune prerogatiue, præexcellence vraye et essentielle. Celle qu'il se donne par opinion, et par fantasie, n'a ny corps ny goust.	We must constrain man and line him up within the barriers of this order. The poor wretch has no way of actually stepping over them: he is shackled and bound, subjected to the same obligation as the other creatures of his rank, and of a very middling condition, without any prerogative or true and essential preeminence. The preeminence he grants himself by opinion and fancy has neither body nor flavor.
Et s'il est ainsi, que luy seul de tous les animaux, ayt cette liberté de l'imagination, et ce desreglement de pensées, luy representant ce qui est, ce qui n'est pas; et ce qu'il veut; le faulx et le veritable c'est vn aduantage qui luy est bien cher vendu, et duquel il a bien peu à se glorifier: car de là naist la source principale des maux qui le pressent, peché, maladie, irresolution, trouble, desespoir.	And if it is true that he alone of all animals has this freedom of imagination and this unruliness of thought, which represent to him what is, what is not, and what he wants, the false and the true, it is an advantage sold to him very dear, and one he has very little reason to boast of. For from it springs the main source of the evils that press upon him: sin, sickness, irresolution, confusion, despair.

BEASTS REASON TOO

The fox on the ice and the dog at the crossroads reason as we would.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.38 Ie dy donc, pour reuenir à mon propos, qu'il n'y a point d'apparence d'estimer, que les bestes facent par inclination naturelle et forcée, les mesmes choses que nous faisons par nostre choix et industrie. Nous deuons conclurre de pareils effects, pareilles facultez, et de plus riches effects des facultez plus riches: et confesser par consequent, que ce mesme discours, cette mesme voye, que nous tenons à œuurer, aussi la tiennent les animaux, ou quelque autre meilleure.	I say, then, to return to my subject, that there is no likelihood in thinking that beasts do by natural and compelled inclination the same things we do by our choice and ingenuity. From like effects we must conclude like faculties, and from richer effects richer faculties; and consequently we must admit that the same reasoning, the same method we follow in working, the animals follow too—or some other, better one.
2.12.39 Pourquoy imaginons nous en eux cette contrainte naturelle, nous qui n'en esprouuons aucun pareil effect? Ioint qu'il est plus honorable d'estre acheminé et obligé à reglément agir par naturelle et ineuitable condition, et plus approchant de la diuinité, que d'agir reglément par	Why do we imagine this natural compulsion in them, we who experience nothing of the kind? Besides, it is more honorable, and closer to divinity, to be led and obliged to act in an orderly way by a natural and inevitable condition than to act in an orderly way by a rash and accidental freedom; and liberté temeraire et fortuite; et plus seur de laisser à Nature, qu'à nous les resnes de nostre conduitte.

27 The "wise man" is the author of Ecclesiastes; both Latin quotations are from Lucretius, Book V.

FRENCH

La vanité de nostre presomption faict, que nous aymons mieux deuoir à noz forces, qu'à sa liberalité, nostre suffisance: et enrichissons les autres animaux des biens naturels, et les leur renonçons, pour nous honorer et annoblir des biens acquis: par vne humeur bien simple, ce me semble: car ie priseroy bien autant des graces toutes miennes et naïfues, que celles que i'aurois esté mendier et quester de l'apprentissage. Il n'est pas en nostre puissance d'acquerir vne plus belle recommendation que d'estre fauorisé de Dieu et de Nature.

2.12.40 Par ainsi le renard, dequoy se seruent les habitans de la Thrace, quand ils veulent entreprendre de passer par dessus la glace de quelque riuiere gelée, et le laschent deuant eux pour cet effect, quand nous le verrions au bord de l'eau approcher son oreille bien pres de la glace, pour sentir s'il orra d'vne longue ou d'vne voisine distance, bruire l'eau courant au dessoubs, et selon qu'il trouue par là, qu'il y a plus ou moins d'espesseur en la glace, se reculer, ou s'auancer, n'aurions nous pas raison de iuger qu'il luy passe par la teste ce mesme discours, qu'il feroit en la nostre: que c'est vne ratiocination et consequence tirée du sens naturel: Ce qui fait bruit, se remue; ce qui se remue, n'est pas gelé; ce qui n'est pas gelé est liquide, et ce qui est liquide plie soubs le faix?

Car d'attribuer cela seulement à vne viuacité du sens de l'ouye, sans discours et sans consequence, c'est vne chimere, et ne peut entrer en nostre imagination. De mesme faut-il estimer de tant de sortes de ruses et d'inuentions, dequoy les bestes se couurent des entreprises que nous faisons sur elles.

2.12.41 Et si nous voulons prendre quelque aduantage de cela mesme, qu'il est en nous de les saisir, de nous en seruir, et d'en vser à nostre volonté, ce n'est que ce mesme aduantage, que nous auons les vns sur les autres. Nous auons à cette condition noz esclaues, et les Climacides estoient ce pas des femmes en Syrie qui seruoyent couchées à quatre pattes, de marchepied et d'eschelle aux dames à monter en coche? Et la plus part des personnes libres, abandonnent pour bien legeres commoditez, leur vie, et leur estre à la puissance d'autruy. Les femmes et concubines des Thraces plaident à qui sera choisie pour estre tuée au tumbeau de son mary.

ENGLISH

it is safer to leave the reins of our conduct to Nature than to ourselves.

The vanity of our presumption makes us prefer to owe our abilities to our own powers rather than to her bounty. So we credit the other animals with the natural goods and hand those over to them, in order to honor and ennoble ourselves with acquired goods—a very simple-minded attitude, it seems to me, for I would prize graces that were wholly mine and natural just as highly as those I had gone begging and seeking from learning. It is not in our power to acquire a finer recommendation than to be favored by God and by Nature.

Take the fox, then, which the inhabitants of Thrace use when they want to venture across the ice of some frozen river, letting it loose ahead of them for this purpose. If we saw it at the water's edge putting its ear close to the ice, to sense whether it could hear the water running beneath from far off or near by, and then, according as it found by this that the ice was thicker or thinner, drawing back or going forward—would we not be right to judge that the same reasoning passes through its head as would pass through ours, and that it is a ratiocination and inference drawn from natural sense: What makes a noise moves; what moves is not frozen; what is not frozen is liquid; and what is liquid gives way under a weight?

For to attribute this solely to a keen sense of hearing, without reasoning and without inference, is a fantasy that cannot enter our imagination. We must think the same of the many kinds of tricks and contrivances by which beasts protect themselves from the designs we have on them.

And if we want to claim some advantage from the very fact that it is in our power to seize them, make use of them and treat them as we please, that is only the same advantage we have over one another. On these terms we have our slaves. And were not the Climacides women in Syria who crouched on all fours and served as footstools and ladders for ladies getting into their carriages? And most free people surrender their life and their being into the power of others for very slight advantages. The wives and concubines of the Thracians argue over which of them will be chosen to be killed at her husband's tomb.[28]

FRENCH

Les tyrans ont-ils iamais failly de trouuer assez d'hommes vouez à leur deuotion: aucuns d'eux adioustans d'auantage cette necessité de les accompagner à la mort, comme en la vie? Des armées entieres se sont ainsin obligées à leurs Capitaines. La formule du serment en cette rude escole des escrimeurs à outrance, portoit ces promesses: Nous iurons de nous laisser enchainer, brusler, battre, et tuer de glaiue, et souffrir tout ce que les gladiateurs legitimes souffrent de leur maistre; engageant tresreligieusement et le corps et l'ame à son seruice: Vre meum, si vis, flamma caput, et pete ferro / Corpus, et intorto verbere terga seca. C'estoit vne obligation veritable, et si il s'en trouuoit dix mille telle année, qui y entroyent et s'y perdoyent.

Quand les Scythes enterroyent leur Roy, ils estrangloyent sur son corps, la plus fauorie de ses concubines, son eschanson, escuyer d'escuirie, chambellan, huissier de chambre et cuisinier. Et en son anniuersaire ils tuoyent cinquante cheuaux montez de cinquante pages, qu'ils auoyent empalé par l'espine du dos iusques au gozier, et les laissoyent ainsi plantez en parade autour de la tombe. Les hommes qui nous seruent, le font à meilleur marché, et pour vn traictement moins curieux et moins fauorable, que celuy que nous faisons aux oyseaux, aux cheuaux, et aux chiens. A quel soucy ne nous demettons nous pour leur commodité?

Il ne me semble point, que les plus abiects seruiteurs facent volontiers pour leurs maistres, ce que les Princes s'honorent de faire pour ces bestes. Diogenes voyant ses parents en peine de le rachetter de seruitude: Ils sont fols, disoit-il, c'est celuy qui me traitte et nourrit, qui me sert; et ceux qui entretiennent les bestes, se doiuent dire plustost les seruir, qu'en estre seruis. Et si elles ont cela de plus genereux, que iamais lyon ne s'asseruit à vn autre lyon, ny vn cheual à vn autre cheual par faute de cœur.

2.12.42 Comme nous allons à la chasse des bestes, ainsi vont les tigres et les lyons à la chasse des hommes: et ont vn pareil exercice les vnes sur les autres: les chiens sur les lieures, les brochets sur les tanches, les arondeles sur les cigales, les esperuiers sur les merles et sur les allouettes:
Serpente ciconia pullos
Nutrit, et inuenta per deuia rura lacerta,

ENGLISH

Have tyrants ever failed to find enough men devoted to them, some of them even adding the obligation to accompany them in death as in life? Whole armies have bound themselves in this way to their captains. The form of the oath in that harsh school of fighters to the death contained these promises: We swear to let ourselves be chained, burned, beaten and killed by the sword, and to suffer all that regular gladiators suffer from their master—pledging both body and soul most religiously to his service: Burn my head with fire, if you will, and strike my body / with the sword, and cut my back with the twisted lash. It was a real obligation, and yet in a given year there were ten thousand who entered into it and perished by it.[29]

When the Scythians buried their king, they strangled over his body the favorite among his concubines, his cupbearer, his master of the horse, his chamberlain, his usher and his cook. And on the anniversary of his death they killed fifty horses ridden by fifty pages, whom they had impaled along the spine up to the throat, and left them planted there on display around the tomb. The men who serve us do it more cheaply, and for less careful and less kindly treatment than we give our birds, horses and dogs. What trouble do we not stoop to for their comfort?

It does not seem to me that the most abject servants would willingly do for their masters what princes take pride in doing for these beasts. Diogenes, seeing his relatives troubled about ransoming him from slavery, said: "They are fools; it is the man who looks after me and feeds me who serves me." And those who keep animals should be said to serve them rather than to be served by them. Besides, the animals have this more noble trait: never did a lion enslave itself to another lion, nor a horse to another horse, for lack of courage.[30]

Just as we go hunting beasts, so tigers and lions go hunting men; and the animals practice the same exercise on one another: dogs on hares, pike on tench, swallows on cicadas, sparrowhawks on blackbirds and larks: The stork feeds her young on snakes and on lizards found in remote fields; and the noble birds, Jupiter's servants,

28 Climacides comes from the Greek klimax, "ladder"; the custom is reported by Plutarch.
29 Tibullus, Elegies I.9.
30 Diogenes was said to have been captured by pirates and sold as a slave.

FRENCH

Et leporem aut capream famulæ Iouis et generosæ
In saltu venantur aues. Nous partons le fruict de nostre chasse auec noz chiens et oyseaux, comme la peine et l'industrie.

Et au dessus d'Amphipolis en Thrace, les chasseurs et les faucons sauuages, partent iustement le butin par moitié: comme le long des palus Mæotides, si le pescheur ne laisse aux loups de bonne foy, vne part esgale de sa prise, ils vont incontinent deschirer ses rets. Et comme nous auons vne chasse, qui se conduit plus par subtilité, que par force, comme celle des colliers de noz lignes et de l'hameçon, il s'en void aussi de pareilles entre les bestes.

Aristote dit, que la Seche iette de son col vn boyau long comme vne ligne, qu'elle estand au loing en le laschant, et le retire à soy quand elle veut: à mesure qu'elle apperçoit quelque petit poisson s'approcher, elle luy laisse mordre le bout de ce boyau, estant cachée dans le sable, ou dans la vase, et petit à petit le retire iusques à ce que ce petit poisson soit si prés d'elle, que d'vn sault elle puisse l'attraper.

2.12.43 Quant à la force, il n'est animal au monde en butte de tant d'offences, que l'homme: il ne nous faut point vne balaine, vn elephant, et vn crocodile, ny tels autres animaux, desquels vn seul est capable de deffaire vn grand nombre d'hommes: les poulx sont suffisans pour faire vacquer la dictature de Sylla: c'est le desieuner d'vn petit ver, que le cœur et la vie d'vn grand et triomphant Empereur.

2.12.44 Pourquoy disons nous, que c'est à l'homme science et cognoissance bastie par art et par discours, de discerner les choses vtiles à son viure, et au secours de ses maladies, de celles qui ne le sont pas, de cognoistre la force de la rubarbe et du polypode; et quand nous voyons les cheures de Candie, si elles ont receu vn coup de traict, aller entre vn million d'herbes choisir le dictame pour leur guerison, et la tortue quand elle a mangé de la vipere, chercher incontinent de l'origanum pour se purger, le dragon fourbir et esclairer ses yeux auecques du fenoil, les cigongnes se donner elles mesmes des clysteres à tout de l'eau de marine, les elephans arracher non seulement de leur corps et de leurs compagnons, mais des corps aussi de leurs maistres, tesmoin celuy du Roy Porus qu'Alexandre deffit, les hunt the hare or the roe deer in the woodland pastures. We share the fruit of our hunting with our dogs and birds, as we share the toil and the skill.[31]

ENGLISH

And above Amphipolis in Thrace, the hunters and the wild falcons share the booty exactly half and half; just as along the Maeotian marshes, if the fisherman does not in good faith leave the wolves an equal share of his catch, they promptly go and tear his nets. And just as we have a kind of hunting conducted more by cunning than by force, such as with snares, with our lines and with the hook, similar kinds are seen among the beasts too.[32]

Aristotle says that the cuttlefish throws out from its neck a gut as long as a fishing line, which it lets out to stretch far away and draws back to itself when it wishes. As soon as it sees some little fish approaching, it lets the fish bite the end of this gut, while it lies hidden in the sand or the mud, and little by little reels it in until the little fish is so close that it can catch it in one leap.

As for strength, there is no animal in the world exposed to so many injuries as man. We do not need a whale, an elephant or a crocodile, or other such animals, any one of which can destroy a great number of men: lice are enough to vacate Sulla's dictatorship. The heart and life of a great and triumphant emperor are breakfast for a little worm.[33]

Why do we say that, in man, it is science and knowledge built up by skill and reasoning to tell the things useful for his living and for the relief of his illnesses from those that are not, and to know the power of rhubarb and polypody;[34] and yet when we see the goats of Crete, if they have been struck by an arrow, go and choose dittany out of a million herbs to cure themselves; the tortoise, when it has eaten a viper, immediately look for oregano to purge itself; the serpent polish and brighten its eyes with fennel; storks give themselves enemas of seawater; elephants pull out the javelins and darts thrown at them in battle—not only from their own bodies and their compan-

31 Juvenal, Satires XIV.
32 The Maeotian marshes are the Sea of Azov.
33 The Roman dictator Sulla was said to have died in 78 BC of a disease that bred lice in his flesh.
34 Polypody is a fern once used as a purgative.

FRENCH

iauelots et les dardz qu'on leur a iettez au combat, et les arracher si dextrement, que nous ne le sçaurions faire auec si peu de douleur: pourquoy ne disons nous de mesmes, que c'est science et prudence?

Car d'alleguer, pour les deprimer, que c'est par la seule instruction et maistrise de Nature, qu'elles le sçauent, ce n'est pas leur oster le tiltre de science et de prudence: c'est la leur attribuer à plus forte raison qu'à nous, pour l'honneur d'vne si certaine maistresse d'escole.

2.12.45 Chrysippus, bien qu'en toutes autres choses autant desdaigneux iuge de la condition des animaux, que nul autre Philosophe, considerant les mouuements du chien, qui se rencontrant en vn carrefour à trois chemins, ou à la queste de son maistre qu'il a esgaré, ou à la poursuitte de quelque proye qui fuit deuant luy, va essayant vn chemin apres l'autre, et apres s'estre asseuré des deux, et n'y auoir trouué la trace de ce qu'il cherche, s'eslance dans le troisiesme sans marchander:

il est contraint de confesser, qu'en ce chien là, vn tel discours se passe: I'ay suiuy iusques à ce carre-four mon maistre à la trace, il faut necessairement qu'il passe par l'vn de ces trois chemins: ce n'est ny par cettuy-cy, ny par celuy-là, il faut donc infailliblement qu'il passe par cet autre: et que s'asseurant par cette conclusion et discours, il ne se sert plus de son sentiment au troisiesme chemin, ny ne le sonde plus, ains s'y laisse emporter par la force de la raison.

Ce traict purement dialecticien, et cet vsage de propositions diuisées et conioinctes, et de la suffisante enumeration des parties, vaut-il pas autant que le chien le sçache de soy que de Trapezonce?

2.12.46 Si ne sont pas les bestes incapables d'estre encore instruites à nostre mode. Les merles, les corbeaux, les pies, les perroquets, nous leur apprenons à parler: et cette facilité, que nous recognoissons à nous fournir leur voix et haleine si souple et si maniable, pour la former et l'astreindre à certain nombre de lettres et de syllabes, tesmoigne qu'ils ont vn discours au dedans, qui les rend ainsi disciplinables et volontaires à apprendre.

Chacun est saoul, ce croy-ie, de voir tant de sortes de cingeries que les batteleurs apprennent à leurs chiens: les ions', but from their masters' bodies too, witness the elephant of King Porus, whom Alexander defeated—and pull them out so deftly that we could not do it with so little pain: why do we not likewise say that this is knowledge and wisdom?[35]

ENGLISH

For to allege, in order to belittle them, that they know these things solely by the instruction and mastery of Nature is not to take away from them the title of knowledge and wisdom; it is to grant it to them with more reason than to us, in honor of so reliable a schoolmistress.

Chrysippus, though in all other matters as disdainful a judge of the condition of animals as any philosopher, considered the movements of a dog that comes to a crossroads where three roads meet, either in search of its master whom it has lost or in pursuit of some prey fleeing before it. The dog tries one road after another, and after making sure of two of them and finding no trace there of what it seeks, it dashes down the third without hesitation.

Chrysippus is forced to admit that a reasoning such as this goes on in that dog: I have followed my master's trail to this crossroads; he must necessarily have gone by one of these three roads; it is neither this one nor that one; therefore he must infallibly have gone by this other. And, made sure by this conclusion and reasoning, the dog no longer relies on its senses on the third road, nor tests it any further, but lets itself be carried along by the force of reason.

This purely dialectical move, this use of disjunctive and conjunctive propositions and of sufficient enumeration of the parts—is it not worth just as much whether the dog knows it by itself or learned it from Trebizond?[36]

And yet beasts are not incapable of being taught in our manner too. Blackbirds, ravens, magpies, parrots—we teach them to speak; and the readiness we see in them to lend us their voice and breath, so supple and pliable, so that we can shape it and bind it to a certain number of letters and syllables, shows that they have a reasoning within that makes them so teachable and willing to learn.

Everyone, I believe, has had his fill of seeing the many kinds of monkey tricks that showmen teach dances, où ils ne faillent vne seule cadence du son qu'ils oyent; plusieurs diuers mouuemens et saults qu'ils leur font faire par le commandement de leur parolle: mais ie remerque auec plus d'admiration cet effect, qui est toutes-fois assez vulgaire, des chiens dequoy se seruent les aueugles, et aux champs et aux villes: ie me suis pris garde comme ils s'arrestent à certaines portes, d'où ils ont accoustumé de tirer l'aumosne, comme ils euitent le choc des coches et des charrettes, lors mesme que pour leur regard, ils ont assez de place pour leur passage: i'en ay veu le long d'vn fossé de ville, laisser vn sentier plain et vni, et en prendre vn pire, pour esloigner son maistre du fossé.

FRENCH

Comment pouuoit-on auoir faict conceuoir à ce chien, que c'estoit sa charge de regarder seulement à la seureté de son maistre, et mespriser ses propres commoditez pour le seruir? et comment auoit-il la cognoissance que tel chemin luy estoit bien assez large, qui ne le seroit pas pour vn aueugle? Tout cela se peut-il comprendre sans ratiocination?

2.12.47 Il ne faut pas oublier ce que Plutarque dit auoir veu à Rome d'vn chien, auec l'Empereur Vespasian le pere au Theatre de Marcellus. Ce chien seruoit à vn batteleur qui ioüoit vne fiction à plusieurs mines et à plusieurs personnages, et y auoit son rolle.

Il falloit entre autres choses qu'il contrefist pour vn temps le mort, pour auoir mangé de certaine drogue: apres auoir auallé le pain qu'on feignoit estre cette drogue, il commença tantost à trembler et branler, comme s'il eust esté estourdy: finalement s'estendant et se roidissant, comme mort, il se laissa tirer et trainer d'vn lieu à autre, ainsi que portoit le subject du ieu, et puis quand il cogneut qu'il estoit temps, il commença premierement à se remuer tout bellement, ainsi que s'il se fust reuenu d'vn profond sommeil, et leuant la teste regarda çà et là d'vne façon qui estonnoit tous les assistans.

2.12.48 Les bœufs qui seruoyent aux iardins Royaux de Suse, pour les arrouser et tourner certaines grandes rouës à puiser de l'eau, ausquelles il y a des baquets attachez, comme il s'en voit plusieurs en Languedoc, on leur auoit ordonné d'en tirer par iour iusques à cent tours chacun, ils estoient si accoustumez à ce nombre, qu'il estoit their dogs: the dances in which they do not miss a single beat of the music they hear, and the many different movements and leaps they are made to perform at a word of command. But I note with more wonder something that is nevertheless common enough: the dogs that blind men use, both in the country and in towns. I have noticed how they stop at certain doors where they are used to receiving alms, and how they avoid being struck by coaches and carts, even when they have room enough to pass for their own part. I have seen one, along a town moat, leave a smooth, level path and take a worse one, to keep its master away from the moat.

ENGLISH

How could anyone have made this dog understand that its duty was to look only to its master's safety and to disregard its own convenience in order to serve him? And how did it know that a path quite wide enough for itself would not be so for a blind man? Can all this be understood without ratiocination?

We must not forget what Plutarch says he saw of a dog in Rome, in the presence of the Emperor Vespasian, the father, at the Theater of Marcellus. This dog belonged to a showman who was performing a play with many scenes and many characters, and it had its own part in it.

Among other things, it had to pretend for a while to be dead, from having eaten a certain drug. After swallowing the bread that was supposed to be this drug, it soon began to tremble and stagger as if it were dazed. Finally, stretching out and stiffening as though dead, it let itself be pulled and dragged from place to place, as the plot of the play required. Then, when it knew the time had come, it began first to stir very gently, as if it were waking from a deep sleep, and raising its head, it looked this way and that in a manner that astonished all the spectators.

The oxen used in the royal gardens of Susa to water them, turning certain great wheels for drawing water with buckets attached to them, like many to be seen in Languedoc, had been ordered to make up to a hundred turns each a day. They were so accustomed to this number that it was impossible by 35 Porus, an Indian king, was defeated by Alexander the Great at the Hydaspes in 326 BC.

36 George of Trebizond (1395–1486), author of a widely used textbook of logic.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	impossible par aucune force de leur en faire tirer vn tour dauantage, et ayans faict leur tasche ils s'arrestoient tout court. Nous sommes en l'adolescence auant que nous sçachions compter iusques à cent, et venons de descouurir des nations qui n'ont aucune cognoissance des nombres.	any force to make them do a single turn more, and having done their task they stopped dead. We are in adolescence before we know how to count to a hundred, and we have just discovered nations that have no knowledge of numbers.[37]
2.12.49	Il y a encore plus de discours à instruire autruy qu'à estre instruit. Or laissant à part ce que Democritus iugeoit et prouuoit, que la plus part des arts, les bestes nous les ont apprises: comme l'araignée à tistre et à coudre, l'arondelle à bastir, le cigne et le rossignol la musique, et plusieurs animaux par leur imitation à faire la medecine: Aristote tient que les rossignols instruisent leurs petits à chanter, et y employent du temps et du soing: d'où il aduient que ceux que nous nourrissons en cage, qui n'ont point eu loisir d'aller à l'escole soubs leurs parens, perdent beaucoup de la grace de leur chant. Nous pouuons iuger par là, qu'il reçoit de l'amendement par discipline et par estude.	There is even more reasoning in teaching others than in being taught. Now, leaving aside what Democritus judged and proved—that beasts taught us most of the arts, as the spider taught us to weave and sew, the swallow to build, the swan and the nightingale music, and many animals, through our imitation of them, the practice of medicine—Aristotle holds that nightingales teach their young to sing and spend time and care on it. Hence those we raise in cages, which have not had the chance to go to school under their parents, lose much of the grace of their song. We can judge from this that their song improves through discipline and study.
	Et entre les libres mesme, il n'est pas vng et pareil; chacun en a pris selon sa capacité. Et sur la ialousie de leur apprentissage, ils se debattent à l'enuy, d'vne contention si courageuse, que par fois le vaincu y demeure mort, l'aleine luy faillant plustost que la voix. Les plus ieunes ruminent pensifs, et prennent à imiter certains couplets de chanson: le disciple escoute la leçon de son precepteur, et en rend compte auec grand soing: ils se taisent l'vn tantost, tantost l'autre: on oyt corriger les fautes, et sent-on aucunes reprehensions du precepteur.	And even among the free ones it is not one and the same: each has taken from it according to its capacity. Jealous over their learning, they compete with one another in a contest so spirited that sometimes the loser dies of it, his breath failing him before his voice does. The youngest ponder thoughtfully and set themselves to imitating certain snatches of song; the pupil listens to his teacher's lesson and repeats it back with great care; they fall silent, now one, now the other; one can hear faults being corrected and detect certain reproofs from the teacher.
2.12.50	I'ay veu, dit Arrius, autresfois vn elephant ayant à chacune cuisse vn cymbale pendu, et vn autre attaché à sa trompe, au son desquels tous les autres dançoyent en rond, s'esleuans et s'inclinans à certaines cadences, selon que l'instrument les guidoit, et y auoit plaisir à ouyr cette harmonie. Aux spectacles de Rome, il se voyoit ordinairement des elephans dressez à se mouuoir et dancer au son de la voix, des dances à plusieurs entrelasseures, coupeures et diuerses cadances tres-difficiles à apprendre. Il s'en est veu, qui en leur priué rememoroient leur leçon, et s'exerçoyent par soing et par estude pour n'estre tancez et battuz de leurs maistres.	I once saw, says Arrian, an elephant with a cymbal hanging from each thigh and another tied to its trunk, at the sound of which all the others danced in a circle, rising and bowing at certain beats as the instrument guided them; and it was a pleasure to hear this harmony. At the shows in Rome, elephants were regularly seen trained to move and dance to the sound of the voice—dances with many interweavings, breaks and varied rhythms, very hard to learn. Some have been seen rehearsing their lesson in private, practicing with care and study so as not to be scolded and beaten by their masters.[38]

37 Susa was a capital of the ancient Persian kings.
38 Arrian, Greek historian of the 2nd century AD, in his Indica.

FRENCH

2.12.51 Mais cett'autre histoire de la pie, de laquelle nous auons Plutarque mesme pour respondant, est estrange. Elle estoit en la boutique d'vn barbier à Rome, et faisoit merueilles de contrefaire auec la voix tout ce qu'elle oyoit. Vn iour il aduint que certaines trompettes s'arresterent à sonner long temps deuant cette boutique: depuis cela et tout le lendemain, voyla cette pie pensiue, muette et melancholique; dequoy tout le monde estoit esmerueillé, et pensoit-on que le son des trompettes l'eust ainsin estourdie et estonnée; et qu'auec l'ouye, la voix se fust quant et quant esteinte.

Mais on trouua en fin, que c'estoit vne estude profonde, et vne retraicte en soy-mesmes, son esprit s'exercitant et preparant sa voix, à representer le son de ces trompettes: de maniere que sa premiere voix ce fut celle là, d'exprimer parfaictement leurs reprises, leurs poses, et leurs nuances; ayant quicté par ce nouuel apprentissage, et pris à desdain tout ce qu'elle sçauoit dire auparauant.

2.12.52 Ie ne veux pas obmettre d'alleguer aussi cet autre exemple d'vn chien, que ce mesme Plutarque dit auoir veu (car quant à l'ordre, ie sens bien que ie le trouble, mais ie n'en obserue non plus à renger ces exemples, qu'au reste de toute ma besongne) luy estant dans vn nauire, ce chien estant en peine d'auoir l'huyle qui estoit dans le fond d'vne cruche, où il ne pouuoit arriuer de la langue, pour l'estroite emboucheure du vaisseau, alla querir des cailloux, et en mit dans cette cruche iusques à ce qu'il eust faict hausser l'huyle plus pres du bord, où il la peust atteindre. Cela qu'est-ce, si ce n'est l'effect d'vn esprit bien subtil?

On dit que les corbeaux de Barbarie en font de mesme, quand l'eau qu'ils veulent boire est trop basse.

2.12.53 Cette action est aucunement voisine de ce que recitoit des elephans, vn Roy de leur nation, Iuba; que quand par la finesse de ceux qui les chassent, l'vn d'entre eux se trouue pris dans certaines fosses profondes qu'on leur prepare, et les recouure lon de menues brossailles pour les tromper, ses compagnons y apportent en diligence force pierres, et pieces de bois, afin que cela l'ayde à s'en mettre hors. Mais cet animal rapporte en tant d'autres effects à l'humaine suffisance, que si ie vouloy suiure par le menu ce que l'experience en a appris, ie gaignerois aisément ce que ie maintiens ordinairement, qu'il se

ENGLISH

But that other story, about the magpie, for which we have Plutarch himself as guarantor, is a strange one. It lived in a barber's shop in Rome and did wonders at mimicking with its voice everything it heard. One day some trumpeters happened to stop and play for a long time in front of the shop. After that, and all the next day, there was the magpie, pensive, mute and melancholy. Everyone marveled at this, and people thought the sound of the trumpets had so dazed and stunned it that its voice had been extinguished along with its hearing.

But it was found in the end that this was deep study and a withdrawal into itself, its mind exercising and preparing its voice to reproduce the sound of those trumpets. So its first utterance was that one: a perfect rendering of their repeats, their pauses and their changes of tone; for the sake of this new learning, it had given up and come to scorn everything it could say before.

I do not want to leave out this other example either, of a dog that the same Plutarch says he saw (for as to order, I am well aware that I am mixing it up, but I observe it no more in arranging these examples than in all the rest of my work). He was on a ship, and this dog, struggling to get at the oil at the bottom of a jar, which it could not reach with its tongue because of the vessel's narrow mouth, went and fetched pebbles and put them into the jar until it had raised the oil close enough to the rim to reach it. What is that, if not the work of a very subtle mind?

They say that the ravens of Barbary do the same when the water they want to drink is too low.[39]

This action is somewhat akin to what Juba, a king of their own country, related of elephants: that when, through the cunning of their hunters, one of them is caught in one of the deep pits prepared for them and covered over with small brushwood to deceive them, its companions hurry to bring plenty of stones and pieces of wood to help it get out. But this animal resembles human ability in so many other actions that if I wanted to follow in detail what experience has taught about it, I would easily win the point I usually maintain: that there 39 Barbary is the coast of North Africa.

FRENCH

trouue plus de difference de tel homme à tel homme, que de tel animal à tel homme.

Le gouuerneur d'vn elephant en vne maison priuée de Syrie, desroboit à tous les repas, la moitié de la pension qu'on luy auoit ordonnée: vn iour le maistre voulut luy-mesme le penser, versa dans sa mangeoire la iuste mesure d'orge, qu'il luy auoit prescrite, pour sa nourriture: l'elephant regardant de mauuais œil ce gouuerneur, separa auec la trompe, et en mit à part la moitié, declarant par là le tort qu'on luy faisoit. Et vn autre, ayant vn gouuerneur qui mesloit dans sa mangeaille des pierres pour en croistre la mesure, s'approcha du pot où il faisoit cuyre sa chair pour son disner, et le luy remplit de cendre.

Cela ce sont des effects particuliers: mais ce que tout le monde a veu, et que tout le monde sçait, qu'en toutes les armées qui se conduisoyent du pays de Leuant, l'vne des plus grandes forces consistoit aux elephans, desquels on tiroit des effects sans comparaison plus grands que nous ne faisons à present de nostre artillerie, qui tient à peu pres leur place en vne battaille ordonnée (cela est aisé à iuger à ceux qui cognoissent les histoires anciennes) Si quidem Tyrio seruire solebant
Annibali, et nostris ducibus, regique Molosso,
Horum maiores, et dorso ferre cohortes,
Partem aliquam belli, et euntem in prælia turrim. Il falloit bien qu'on se respondist à bon escient de la creance de ces bestes et de leur discours, leur abandonnant la teste d'vne battaille;

là où le moindre arrest qu'elles eussent sçeu faire, pour la grandeur et pesanteur de leur corps, le moindre effroy qui leur eust faict tourner la teste sur leurs gens, estoit suffisant pour tout perdre.

Et s'est veu peu d'exemples, où cela soit aduenu, qu'ils se reiectassent sur leurs trouppes, au lieu que nous mesmes nous reiectons les vns sur les autres, et nous rompons. On leur donnoit charge non d'vn mouuement simple, mais de plusieurs diuerses parties au combat: comme faisoient aux chiens les Espagnols à la nouuelle conqueste des Indes; ausquels ils payoient solde, et faisoient partage au butin. Et montroient ces animaux, autant d'addresse et de iugement à poursuiure et arrester leur victoire, à charger ou à reculer, selon les occasions, à distinguer les amis des ennemis, comme ils faisoient d'ardeur et d'aspreté. Nous admirons et poisons mieux les choses is more difference between this man and that one than between this animal and that man.[40]

ENGLISH

The keeper of an elephant in a private house in Syria stole half its ration at every meal. One day the master decided to feed it himself and poured into its manger the exact measure of barley he had prescribed for its food. The elephant, glaring at the keeper, separated half of it with its trunk and set it aside, thereby declaring the wrong being done to it. And another, whose keeper mixed stones into its fodder to increase the measure, went up to the pot in which he was cooking his meat for dinner and filled it with ashes for him.

These are individual incidents. But what everyone has seen and everyone knows is that in all the armies brought from the lands of the Levant, one of the greatest strengths lay in the elephants, which achieved results incomparably greater than we now get from our artillery, which roughly takes their place in a pitched battle (this is easy to judge for those who know ancient history): Since indeed they used to serve the Tyrian Hannibal, and our generals, and the Molossian king, these beasts' ancestors, and to carry cohorts on their backs, a share of the war, and a tower going into battle.
People must surely have had complete and serious confidence in the reliability of these beasts and their reasoning, to entrust them with the front of a battle;[41] for the slightest halt they might have made, given the size and weight of their bodies, the slightest fright that turned their heads back toward their own side, was enough to lose everything.

And few cases have been seen where they turned back on their own troops, whereas we ourselves fall back on one another and break ranks. They were given not a single movement to perform but several different parts in the fighting—as the Spaniards did with their dogs in the recent conquest of the Indies, paying them wages and giving them a share of the booty. And these animals showed as much skill and judgment in pursuing and halting their victory, in charging or retreating as occasion required, in telling friends from enemies, as they 40 Juba II, king of Mauretania (died AD 23), a learned writer on Africa.

41 Juvenal, Satires XII; the Molossian king is Pyrrhus of Epirus.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
estrangeres que les ordinaires: et sans cela ie ne me fusse pas amusé à ce long registre.	did ardor and fierceness. We admire and weigh foreign things more than ordinary ones; otherwise I would not have amused myself with this long register.
Car selon mon opinion, qui contrerollera de pres ce que nous voyons ordinairement es animaux, qui viuent parmy nous, il y a dequoy y trouuer des effects autant admirables, que ceux qu'on va recueillant és pays et siecles estrangers. C'est vne mesme nature qui roule son cours. Qui en auroit suffisamment iugé le present estat, en pourroit seurement conclurre et tout l'aduenir et tout le passé.	For in my opinion, whoever looks closely at what we commonly see in the animals that live among us will find in them actions as wonderful as those that people go collecting in foreign lands and ages. It is one and the same nature that rolls on its course. Whoever had sufficiently judged its present state could safely infer from it both the whole future and the whole past.

JUDGING WHAT WE DO NOT UNDERSTAND

As we scorn foreigners we do not understand, so we misjudge the beasts.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.54 I'ay veu autresfois parmy nous, des hommes amenez par mer de loingtain pays, desquels par ce que nous n'entendions aucunement le langage, et que leur façon au demeurant et leur contenance, et leurs vestemens, estoient du tout esloignez des nostres, qui de nous ne les estimoit et [non civilisés] et brutes? qui n'attribuoit à stupidité et à bestise, de les voir muets, ignorans la langue Françoise, ignorans nos baise-mains, et nos inclinations serpentées; nostre port et nostre maintien, sur lequel sans faillir, doit prendre son patron la nature humaine? Tout ce qui nous semble estrange, nous le condamnons, et ce que nous n'entendons pas. Il nous aduient ainsin au iugement que nous faisons des bestes.	I once saw among us men brought by sea from a distant country. Because we did not understand their language at all, and because their manners, their bearing and their clothes were entirely unlike ours, which of us did not consider them uncivilized and brutish? Who did not put it down to stupidity and dullness to see them mute, ignorant of the French language, ignorant of our hand-kissings and our serpentine bows, of our carriage and our bearing—on which, of course, human nature must without fail take its model? Everything that seems strange to us, we condemn, and everything we do not understand. That is how it goes with us in the judgment we make of beasts.
Elles ont plusieurs conditions, qui se rapportent aux nostres: de celles-là par comparaison nous pouuons tirer quelque coniecture: mais de ce qu'elles ont particulier, que sçauons nous que c'est? Les cheuaux, les chiens, les bœufs, les brebis, les oyseaux, et la pluspart des animaux, qui viuent auec nous, recognoissent nostre voix, et se laissent conduire par elle: si faisoit bien encore la murene de Crassus, et venoit à luy quand il l'appelloit: et le font aussi les anguilles, qui se trouuent en la fontaine d'Arethuse: et i'ay veu des gardoirs assez, où les poissons accourent, pour manger, à certain cry de ceux qui les traictent. Nomen habent, et ad magistri / Vocem quisque sui venit citatus. Nous pouuons iuger de cela.	They have many characteristics that correspond to ours: from those, by comparison, we can draw some conjecture. But as for what is peculiar to them, what do we know of what it is? Horses, dogs, oxen, sheep, birds and most of the animals that live with us recognize our voice and let themselves be led by it. So too did Crassus's moray eel, which came to him when he called it; and so do the eels in the fountain of Arethusa; and I have seen plenty of fishponds where the fish come running to feed at a certain call from those who tend them. They have names, and each comes when summoned / at its master's voice. That much we can judge.[42]
2.12.55 Nous pouuons aussi dire, que les elephans ont quelque participation de religion, d'autant qu'apres plusieurs	We can also say that elephants have some share in religion, since after several ablutions and purifica-

FRENCH

ablutions et purifications, on les voit haussans leur trompe, comme des bras; et tenans les yeux fichez vers le soleil leuant, se planter long temps en meditation et contemplation, à certaines heures du iour; de leur propre inclination, sans instruction et sans precepte. Mais pour ne voir aucune telle apparence és autres animaux, nous ne pouuons pourtant establir qu'ils soient sans religion, et ne pouuons prendre en aucune part ce qui nous est caché.

2.12.56 Comme nous voyons quelque chose en cette action que le philosophe Cleanthes remerqua, par ce qu'elle retire aux nostres: Il vid, dit-il, des fourmis partir de leur fourmiliere, portans le corps d'vn fourmis mort, vers vne autre fourmiliere, de laquelle plusieurs autres fourmis leur vindrent au deuant, comme pour parler à eux, et apres auoir esté ensemble quelque piece, ceux-cy s'en retournerent, pour consulter, pensez, auec leurs concitoyens, et firent ainsi deux ou trois voyages pour la difficulté de la capitulation. En fin ces derniers venus, apporterent aux premiers vn ver de leur taniere comme pour la rançon du mort, lequel ver les premiers chargerent sur leur dos, et emporterent chez eux, laissans aux autres le corps du trespassé.

Voila l'interpretation que Cleanthes y donna: tesmoignant par là que celles qui n'ont point de voix, ne laissent pas d'auoir pratique et communication mutuelle; de laquelle c'est nostre deffaut que nous ne soyons participans; et nous meslons à cette cause sottement d'en opiner.

2.12.57 Or elles produisent encores d'autres effects, qui surpassent de bien loing nostre capacité, ausquels il s'en faut tant que nous puissions arriuer par imitation, que par imagination mesme nous ne les pouuons conceuoir. Plusieurs tiennent qu'en cette grande et derniere battaille nauale qu'Antonius perdit contre Auguste, sa galere capitainesse fut arrestée au milieu de sa course, par ce petit poisson, que les Latins nomment remora, à cause de cette sienne proprieté d'arrester toute sorte de vaisseaux, ausquels il s'attache.

Et l'Empereur Caligula vogant auec vne grande flotte en la coste de la Romanie, sa seule galere fut arrestée tout court, par ce mesme poisson; lequel il fit prendre attaché comme il estoit au bas de son vaisseau, tout despit dequoy vn si petit animal pouuoit forcer et la mer et les vents, et la violence de tous ses auirons, pour estre seulement attaché par le bec à sa galere, car c'est vn tions they are seen raising their trunks like arms and, with their eyes fixed on the rising sun, standing still for a long time in meditation and contemplation at certain hours of the day, of their own inclination, without instruction or precept. But because we see no such sign in other animals, we cannot for all that establish that they are without religion; we cannot grasp in any respect what is hidden from us.

ENGLISH

So too we see something in this action that the philosopher Cleanthes noticed, because it resembles ours. He saw, he says, some ants leaving their anthill carrying the body of a dead ant toward another anthill, from which several other ants came out to meet them as if to talk with them. After being together for some time, these went back to consult—just imagine—with their fellow citizens, and made two or three trips in this way because the terms were hard to settle. At last the latter brought the former a worm from their den, as if as ransom for the dead one; the first group loaded this worm on their backs and carried it home, leaving the others the body of the deceased.

That is the interpretation Cleanthes gave of it, showing thereby that creatures without voices still have dealings and communication with one another; it is our own defect that we have no share in it, and so we are foolish to meddle in giving opinions on the matter.

Now they produce still other effects that far surpass our capacity—so far beyond imitation that we cannot even conceive them in imagination. Many hold that in the great final naval battle that Antony lost to Augustus, his flagship was stopped in midcourse by the little fish the Latins call remora, because of its peculiar property of stopping every kind of vessel it attaches itself to.[43]

And when the Emperor Caligula was sailing with a great fleet along the coast of Romania, his galley alone was stopped dead by this same fish. He had it taken, attached as it was to the bottom of his vessel, quite vexed that so small an animal could overpower the sea and the winds and the force of 42 Martial, Epigrams IV.30. The fountain of Arethusa is a spring at Syracuse in Sicily.

43 The battle of Actium, 31 BC; Latin remora means "delay".

FRENCH

poisson à coquille, et s'estonna encore non sans grande raison, de ce que luy estant apporté dans le batteau, il n'auoit plus cette force, qu'il auoit au dehors. Vn citoyen de Cyzique acquit iadis reputation de bon mathematicien, pour auoir appris la condition de l'herisson.

Il a sa taniere ouuerte à diuers endroits et à diuers vents; et preuoyant le vent aduenir, il va boucher le trou du costé de ce vent-là; ce que remerquant ce citoyen, apportoit en sa ville certaines predictions du vent, qui auoit à tirer. Le cameleon prend la couleur du lieu, où il est assis: mais le poulpe se donne luy-mesme la couleur qu'il luy plaist, selon les occasions, pour se cacher de ce qu'il craint, et attrapper ce qu'il cherche. Au cameleon c'est changement de passion, mais au poulpe c'est changement d'action.

Nous auons quelques mutations de couleur, à la frayeur, la cholere, la honte, et autres passions, qui alterent le teint de nostre visage: mais c'est par l'effect de la souffrance, comme au cameleon. Il est bien en la iaunisse de nous faire iaunir, mais il n'est pas en la disposition de nostre volonté. Or ces effects que nous recognoissons aux autres animaux, plus grands que les nostres, tesmoignent en eux quelque faculté plus excellente, qui nous est occulte; comme il est vraysemblable que sont plusieurs autres de leurs conditions et puissances, desquelles nulles apparances ne viennent iusques à nous.

2.12.58 De toutes les predictions du temps passé, les plus anciennes et plus certaines estoyent celles qui se tiroient du vol des oyseaux. Nous n'auons rien de pareil ny de si admirable. Cette regle, cet ordre du bransler de leur aisle, par lequel on tire des consequences des choses à venir, il faut bien qu'il soit conduit par quelque excellent moyen à vne si noble operation; car c'est prester à la lettre, d'aller attribuant ce grand effect, à quelque ordonnance naturelle, sans l'intelligence, consentement, et discours, de qui le produit: et est vne opinion euidemment faulse.

Qu'il soit ainsi: la torpille a cette condition, non seulement d'endormir les membres qui la touchent, mais au trauers des filets, et de la scene, elle transmet vne pesanteur endormie aux mains de ceux qui la remuent et manient: voire dit-on d'auantage, que si on verse de l'eau dessus, on sent cette passion qui gaigne contremont all his oars merely by being attached by its beak to his galley—for it is a shellfish. And he was astonished besides, not without good reason, that once it was brought into the boat it no longer had the strength it had outside. A citizen of Cyzicus once gained a reputation as a good mathematician for having learned the ways of the hedgehog.[44]

ENGLISH

Its den has openings in various places, facing various winds; and foreseeing the coming wind, it goes and stops up the hole on that wind's side. Noticing this, the citizen would bring his city predictions of which wind was going to blow. The chameleon takes the color of the place where it sits; but the octopus gives itself whatever color it pleases, as occasion requires, to hide from what it fears and catch what it seeks. In the chameleon it is a change it undergoes; in the octopus it is a change it makes.

We have some changes of color in fright, anger, shame and other passions that alter the complexion of our face; but that is the effect of something we undergo, as with the chameleon. Jaundice can certainly make us turn yellow, but that is not at the disposal of our will. Now these effects we recognize in other animals, greater than ours, testify to some more excellent faculty in them that is hidden from us; as are, very likely, many other characteristics and powers of theirs, no sign of which ever reaches us.

Of all the predictions of times past, the oldest and most certain were those drawn from the flight of birds. We have nothing like it, nothing so wonderful. That rule, that order in the beating of their wings, from which people draw inferences about things to come, must surely be guided to so noble an operation by some excellent means. For it is merely playing with words to go attributing this great effect to some natural ordering, without intelligence, consent and reasoning in whatever produces it; and it is a plainly false opinion.

That this is so: the torpedo fish has this property, that it not only numbs the limbs that touch it, but also, through nets and seines, transmits a numbing heaviness to the hands of those who stir and handle it. Indeed they say further that if you pour water on it, you feel this sensation creeping up-44 Cyzicus was a Greek city on the Sea of Marmara.

FRENCH

iusques à la main, et endort l'attouchement au trauers de l'eau. Cette force est merueilleuse: mais elle n'est pas inutile à la torpille: elle la sent et s'en sert; de maniere que pour attraper la proye qu'elle queste, on la void se tapir soubs le limon, afin que les autres poissons se coulans par dessus, frappez et endormis de cette sienne froideur, tombent en sa puissance.

Les gruës, les arondeles, et autres oyseaux passagers, changeans de demeure selon les saisons de l'an, montrent assez la cognoissance qu'elles ont de leur faculté diuinatrice, et la mettent en vsage.

2.12.59 Les chasseurs nous asseurent, que pour choisir d'vn nombre de petits chiens, celuy qu'on doit conseruer pour le meilleur, il ne faut que mettre la mere au propre de le choisir elle mesme; comme si on les emporte hors de leur giste, le premier qu'elle y rapportera, sera tousiours le meilleur: ou bien si on fait semblant d'entourner de feu le giste, de toutes parts, celuy des petits, au secours duquel elle courra premierement. Par où il appert qu'elles ont vn vsage de prognostique que nous n'auons pas: ou qu'elles ont quelque vertu à iuger de leurs petits, autre et plus viue que la nostre.

2.12.60 La maniere de naistre, d'engendrer, nourrir, agir, mouuoir, viure et mourir des bestes, estant si voisine de la nostre, tout ce que nous retranchons de leurs causes motrices, et que nous adioustons à nostre condition au dessus de la leur, cela ne peut aucunement partir du discours de nostre raison.

Pour reglement de nostre santé, les medecins nous proposent l'exemple du viure des bestes, et leur façon: car ce mot est de tout temps en la bouche du peuple:
Tenez chaults les pieds et la teste,
Au demeurant viuez en beste. La generation est la principale des actions naturelles: nous auons quelque disposition de membres, qui nous est plus propre à cela: toutesfois ils nous ordonnent de nous ranger à l'assiette et disposition brutale, comme plus effectuelle: More ferarum,
Quadrupedúmque magis ritu, plerumque putantur
Concipere vxores: quia sic loca sumere possunt, Pectoribus positis, sublatis semina lumbis. Et reiettent comme nuisibles ces mouuements indiscrets, et insolents, que les femmes y ont meslé de leur creu; les ramenant à l'exemple et vsage des bestes de leur sexe, plus modeste et rassis.

ENGLISH

ward to your hand, numbing your touch through the water. This power is marvelous; but it is not useless to the torpedo. It feels it and makes use of it, so that to catch the prey it is after, it can be seen lurking under the mud, so that the other fish gliding over it, struck and numbed by this cold of its own, fall into its power.[45]

Cranes, swallows and other birds of passage, changing their abode with the seasons of the year, show plainly enough that they know they have this power of divination, and they put it to use.

Hunters assure us that to choose, out of a litter of puppies, the one that should be kept as the best, you need only let the mother choose it herself. Thus if you carry them out of their bed, the first one she brings back will always be the best; or else, if you pretend to surround the bed with fire on all sides, it will be the one she runs to rescue first. From which it appears that they have a use of prognostication that we lack, or else some power of judging their young that is different from ours and keener.

Since the way beasts are born, breed, feed, act, move, live and die is so close to our own, whatever we strip away from their motive causes and add to our own condition above theirs cannot possibly arise from any reasoning of our reason.

For the regulation of our health, doctors put before us the example of the way beasts live and their manner; for this saying has always been on the lips of the people: Keep your feet and your head warm,
For the rest, live like a beast. Generation is the chief of the natural actions. We have a certain arrangement of limbs that is better suited to us for it; yet they order us to adopt the posture and position of the brutes, as more effective: In the manner of wild beasts,
And rather in the fashion of four-footed creatures, wives are generally thought
To conceive: because so the seeds can reach their place, With breasts lowered and loins raised. And they reject as harmful those indiscreet and immodest movements that women have added of their own invention, bringing them back to the example and practice of the beasts of their sex, which are more modest and sedate.

45 The torpedo is the electric ray.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Nam mulier prohibet se concipere atque repugnat, Clunibus ipse viri Venerem si læta retractet, Atque exossato ciet omni pectore fluctus. Eijcit enim sulci recta regione viáque Vomerem, atque locis auertit seminis ictum.	For a woman prevents herself from conceiving and fights against it If in her delight she thrusts back against the man with her buttocks And stirs up waves with her whole body gone limp. For she throws the plowshare out of the straight line and path Of the furrow, and turns the stroke of the seed away from its place.

THE VIRTUES OF ANIMALS

Animals show justice, friendship, gratitude, fidelity and even religion.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.61	Si c'est iustice de rendre à chacun ce qui luy est deu, les bestes qui seruent, ayment et deffendent leurs bienfaicteurs, et qui poursuyuent et outragent les estrangers et ceux qui les offencent, elles representent en cela quelque air de nostre iustice: comme aussi en conseruant vne equalité tres-equitable en la dispensation de leurs biens à leurs petits. Quant à l'amitié, elles l'ont sans comparaison plus viue et plus constante, que n'ont pas les hommes. Hyrcanus le chien du Roy Lysimachus, son maistre mort, demeura obstiné sus son lict, sans vouloir boire ne manger: et le iour qu'on en brusla le corps, il print sa course, et se ietta dans le feu, où il fut bruslé.	If justice is giving each his due, then the beasts that serve, love and defend their benefactors, and that chase and attack strangers and those who harm them, show in this something of the look of our justice; as they also do in keeping a most fair equality in sharing out their goods among their young. As for friendship, theirs is incomparably keener and more constant than that of men. Hyrcanus, the dog of King Lysimachus, when his master died, stayed stubbornly on his bed, refusing to eat or drink; and on the day the body was burned, he took a run and threw himself into the fire, where he was burned.
	Comme fit aussi le chien d'vn nommé Pyrrhus; car il ne bougea de dessus le lict de son maistre, depuis qu'il fut mort: et quand on l'emporta, il se laissa enleuer quant et luy, et finalement se lança dans le buscher où on brusloit le corps de son maistre.	So too did the dog of a certain Pyrrhus. It did not stir from its master's bed from the time he died, and when he was carried out it let itself be lifted along with him, and finally leaped onto the pyre on which its master's body was being burned.
2.12.62	Il y a certaines inclinations d'affection, qui naissent quelquefois en nous, sans le conseil de la raison, qui viennent d'vne temerité, fortuite, que d'autres nomment sympathie: les bestes en sont capables comme nous. Nous voyons les cheuaux prendre certaine accointance des vns aux autres, iusques à nous mettre en peine pour les faire viure ou voyager separément. On les void appliquer leur affection à certain poil de leurs compagnons, comme à certain visage: et où ils le rencontrent, s'y ioindre incontinent auec feste et demonstration de bienueillance; et prendre quelque autre forme à contre-cœur et en haine. Les animaux ont choix comme nous, en leurs amours, et font quelque triage de leur femelles.	There are certain inclinations of affection that sometimes arise in us without the counsel of reason, coming from a chance rashness that others call sympathy: beasts are capable of them just as we are. We see horses form a kind of attachment to one another, to the point that we have trouble making them live or travel apart. We see them fix their affection on a certain coat in their companions, as on a certain face; and wherever they meet it, they join it at once with rejoicing and signs of goodwill, while taking some other form in dislike and hatred. Animals make choices as we do in their loves, and do some sorting among their females.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Ils ne sont pas exempts de nos ialousies et d'enuies extremes et irreconciliables.	They are not free of our jealousies, or of extreme and irreconcilable envy.
2.12.63 Les cupiditez sont ou naturelles et necessaires, comme le boire et le manger; ou naturelles et non necessaires, comme l'accointance des femelles; ou elles ne sont ny naturelles ny necessaires: de cette derniere sorte sont quasi toutes celles des hommes: elles sont toutes superfluës et artificielles. Car c'est merueille combien peu il faut à Nature pour se contenter, combien peu elle nous a laissé à desirer. Les apprests à nos cuisines ne touchent pas son ordonnance. Les Stoiciens disent qu'vn homme auroit dequoy se substanter d'vne oliue par iour. La delicatesse de nos vins, n'est pas de sa leçon, ny la recharge que nous adioustons aux appetits amoureux: Neque illa / Magno prognatum deposcit consule cunnum.	Desires are either natural and necessary, like drinking and eating; or natural and not necessary, like intercourse with females; or neither natural nor necessary. Of this last kind are nearly all the desires of men: they are all superfluous and artificial. For it is a wonder how little Nature needs to be content, how little she has left us to desire. The preparations of our kitchens are no part of her ordinance. The Stoics say that a man could sustain himself on one olive a day. The delicacy of our wines is not of her teaching, nor the extra spice we add to our amorous appetites: Nor does she / Demand private parts descended from a great consul.
2.12.64 Ces cupiditez estrangeres, que l'ignorance du bien, et vne fauce opinion ont coulées en nous, sont en si grand nombre, qu'elles chassent presque toutes les naturelles. Ny plus ny moins que si en vne cité, il y auoit si grand nombre d'estrangers, qu'ils en missent hors les naturels habitans, ou esteignissent leur authorité et puissance ancienne, l'vsurpant entierement, et s'en saisissant.	These foreign desires, which ignorance of the good and false opinion have slipped into us, are so numerous that they drive out almost all the natural ones. It is just as if in a city there were so many foreigners that they put out the native inhabitants, or extinguished their ancient authority and power, usurping it entirely and seizing it for themselves.
2.12.65 Les animaux sont beaucoup plus reglez que nous ne sommes, et se contiennent auec plus de moderation soubs les limites que Nature nous a prescripts. Mais non pas si exactement, qu'ils n'ayent encore quelque conuenance à nostre desbauche. Et tout ainsi comme il s'est trouué des desirs furieux, qui ont poussé les hommes à l'amour des bestes, elles se trouuent aussi par fois esprises de nostre amour, et reçoiuent des affections monstrueuses d'vne espece à autre.	Animals are much better regulated than we are, and keep with more moderation within the limits that Nature has prescribed for us. But not so strictly that they do not still have something in common with our debauchery. And just as there have been furious desires that drove men to love beasts, so beasts too are sometimes smitten with love for us, and conceive monstrous affections from one species to another.
Tesmoin l'elephant corriual d'Aristophanes le grammairien, en l'amour d'vne ieune bouquetiere en la ville d'Alexandrie, qui ne luy cedoit en rien aux offices d'vn poursuyuant bien passionné: car se promenant par le marché, où lon vendoit des fruicts, il en prenoit auec sa trompe, et les luy portoit: il ne la perdoit de veuë, que le moins qu'il luy estoit possible; et luy mettoit quelquefois la trompe dans le sein par dessoubs son collet, et luy tastoit les tettins. Ils recitent aussi d'vn dragon amoureux d'vne fille; et d'vne oye esprise de l'amour d'vn enfant, en la ville d'Asope; et d'vn belier seruiteur de la menestriere Glaucia: et il se void tous les iours des magots furieusement espris de l'amour des femmes.	Witness the elephant that was the rival of Aristophanes the grammarian for the love of a young flower girl in the city of Alexandria, and yielded to him in nothing in the attentions of an ardent suitor. Walking through the market where fruit was sold, he would take some with his trunk and bring it to her; he let her out of his sight as little as he possibly could; and sometimes he would put his trunk into her bosom under her collar and feel her breasts. They also tell of a serpent in love with a girl; of a goose enamored of a boy in the town of Asopus; and of a ram that courted the minstrel Glaucia; and every day we see apes furiously in love with women.[46]

FRENCH

On void aussi certains animaux s'addonner à l'amour des masles de leur sexe. Oppianus et autres recitent quelques exemples, pour montrer la reuerence que les bestes en leurs mariages portent à la parenté; mais l'experience nous fait bien souuent voir le contraire; Nec habetur turpe iuuencæ
Ferre patrem tergo; fit equo sua filia coniux;
Quásque creauit, init pecudes caper; ipsáque cuius
Semine concepta est, ex illo concipit ales.

2.12.66 De subtilité malitieuse, en est-il vne plus expresse que celle du mulet du philosophe Thales? lequel passant au trauers d'vne riuiere chargé de sel, et de fortune y estant bronché, si que les sacs qu'il portoit en furent tous mouillez, s'estant apperçeu que le sel fondu par ce moyen, luy auoit rendu sa charge plus legere, ne failloit iamais aussi tost qu'il rencontroit quelque ruisseau, de se plonger dedans auec sa charge, iusques à ce que son maistre descouurant sa malice, ordonna qu'on le chargeast de laine, à quoy se trouuant mesconté, il cessa de plus vser de cette finesse.

2.12.67 Il y en a plusieurs qui representent naïfuement le visage de nostre auarice; car on leur void vn soin extreme de surprendre tout ce qu'elles peuuent, et de le curieusement cacher, quoy qu'elles n'en tirent point vsage. Quant à la mesnagerie, elles nous surpassent non seulement en cette preuoyance d'amasser et espargner pour le temps à venir, mais elles ont encore beaucoup de parties de la science, qui y est necessaire. Les fourmis estandent au dehors de l'aire leurs grains et semences pour les esuenter, refreschir et secher, quand ils voyent qu'ils commencent à se moisir et à sentir le rance, de peur qu'ils ne se corrompent et pourrissent.

Mais la caution et preuention dont ils vsent à ronger le grain de froment, surpasse toute imagination de prudence humaine. Par ce que le froment ne demeure pas tousiours sec ny sain, ains s'amolit, se resoult et destrempe comme en laict, s'acheminant à germer et produire: de peur qu'il ne deuienne semence, et perde sa nature et proprieté de magasin pour leur nourriture, ils rongent le bout, par où le germe a coustume de sortir.

ENGLISH

We also see certain animals giving themselves to the love of males of their own sex. Oppian and others report some examples to show the respect that beasts pay to kinship in their matings; but experience very often shows us the contrary: It is not held shameful for a heifer
To bear her father on her back; the horse takes his own daughter as mate;
The goat mounts the flock he has fathered; and the bird
Conceives by the very one from whose seed she was conceived.[47]

Of malicious cunning, is there a clearer example than that of the mule of the philosopher Thales? Crossing a river loaded with salt, it happened to stumble, so that the sacks it carried were all soaked. Noticing that the salt, melted in this way, had made its load lighter, it never failed, as soon as it came to a stream, to plunge in with its load, until its master, discovering its trick, ordered it to be loaded with wool. Finding its reckoning wrong, it gave up the trick.

There are many of them that show to the life the face of our avarice; for we see in them an extreme care to snatch up everything they can and hide it carefully, though they make no use of it. As for husbandry, they surpass us not only in this foresight of gathering and saving for the time to come, but they also have many parts of the knowledge it requires. Ants spread their grain and seeds outside their storehouse to air, cool and dry them, when they see them beginning to mold and smell rancid, for fear they spoil and rot.

But the caution and foresight they show in gnawing the grain of wheat surpasses anything human prudence can imagine. Wheat does not always stay dry and sound, but softens, dissolves and turns as if to milk, on its way to sprouting and growing; so, for fear it may become seed and lose its nature and quality as a store for their food, they gnaw off the end from which the germ usually comes out.

46 Aristophanes of Byzantium, Alexandrian scholar of the 3rd–2nd century BC; the story comes from Plutarch.
47 Oppian, Greek poet of the 2nd century AD, author of poems on hunting and fishing.

HUMAN WAR, ANIMAL WAR

War, the proudest human action, rises from trivial causes and can be routed by bees.

FRENCH

2.12.68 Quant à la guerre, qui est la plus grande et pompeuse des actions humaines, ie sçaurois volontiers, si nous nous en voulons seruir pour argument de quelque prerogatiue, ou au rebours pour tesmoignage de nostre imbecillité et imperfection: comme de vray, la science de nous entre-deffaire et entretuer, de ruiner et perdre nostre propre espece, il semble qu'elle n'a pas beaucoup dequoy se faire desirer aux bestes qui ne l'ont pas. Quando leoni / Fortior eripuit vitam leo?

quo nemore vnquam
Expirauit aper maioris dentibus apri? Mais elles n'en sont pas vniuersellement exemptes pourtant: tesmoin les furieuses rencontres des mouches à miel, et les entreprinses des Princes des deux armées contraires: Sæpe duobus
Regibus incessit magno discordia motu;
Continuóque animos vulgi et trepidantia bello
Corda licet longé præsciscere. Ie ne voy iamais cette diuine description, qu'il ne m'y semble lire peinte l'ineptie et vanité humaine.

Car ces mouuemens guerriers, qui nous rauissent de leur horreur et espouuantement, cette tempeste de sons et de cris: Fulgur ibi ad cælum se tollit, totáque circum
Ære renidescit tellus, subtèrque virûm vi
Excitur pedibus sonitus, clamoréque montes
Icti reiectant voces ad sidera mundi. cette effroyable ordonnance de tant de milliers d'hommes armez, tant de fureur, d'ardeur, et de courage, il est plaisant à considerer par combien vaines occasions elle est agitée, et par combien legeres occasions esteinte. Paridis propter narratur amorem Græcia Barbariæ diro collisa duello. Toute l'Asie se perdit et se consomma en guerres pour le macquerellage de Paris.

L'enuie d'vn seul homme, vn despit, vn plaisir, vne ialousie domestique, causes qui ne deuroient pas esmouuoir deux harangeres à s'esgratigner, c'est l'ame et le mouuement de tout ce grand trouble. Voulons nous en croire ceux mesmes qui en sont les principaux autheurs

ENGLISH

As for war, which is the greatest and most pompous of human actions, I should like to know whether we mean to use it as an argument for some prerogative of ours, or, on the contrary, as evidence of our feebleness and imperfection. For indeed the science of destroying and killing one another, of ruining and wrecking our own species, does not seem to have much to make it desirable to the beasts that lack it. When has a stronger lion / ever taken a lion's life?[48]

In what forest
did a boar ever breathe his last under the tusks of a bigger boar? But they are not universally exempt from it, all the same: witness the furious clashes of honeybees, and the enterprises of the princes of the two opposing armies: Often between two kings discord arises with great upheaval; and at once you may foresee from afar the passions of the crowd and their hearts throbbing for war. I never see this divine description without seeming to read in it a painting of human folly and vanity.

For these warlike movements that carry us away with their horror and dread, this storm of sounds and cries: There the flash rises to the sky, and all the earth around gleams with bronze, and beneath, by the might of men, a sound is raised by their feet, and the mountains, struck by the clamor, hurl the voices back to the stars of heaven. this fearful array of so many thousands of armed men, so much fury, ardor and courage—it is amusing to consider by what vain occasions it is stirred up, and by what slight occasions it is put out. For the love of Paris, so the story goes,
Greece clashed with the barbarians in dire war. All Asia was lost and consumed in wars for Paris's pandering.

The envy of a single man, a grudge, a pleasure, a domestic jealousy—causes that should not move two fishwives to scratch each other—these are the soul and the motive force of all this great turmoil. Shall we believe the very men who are its princip-

48 Juvenal, Satires XV.

FRENCH

et motifs? Oyons le plus grand, le plus victorieux Empereur, et le plus puissant qui fust onques, se iouant et mettant en risée tres-plaisamment et tres-ingenieusement, plusieurs batailles hazardées et par mer et par terre, le sang et la vie de cinq cens mille hommes qui suiuirent sa fortune, et les forces et richesses des deux parties du monde espuisées pour le seruice de ses entreprinses: Quòd futuit Glaphyran Antonius, hanc mihi pœnam / Fuluia constituit, se quoque vti futuam.

/ Fuluiam ego vt futuam! quid si me Manius oret
Pædicem, faciam? non puto, si sapiam.
Aut futue, aut pugnemus, ait: quid si mihi vita Charior est ipsa mentula? signa canant. I'vse en liberté de conscience de mon Latin, auecq le congé, que vous m'en auez donné. Or ce grand corps à tant de visages et de mouuemens, qui semblent menasser le ciel et la terre: Quàm multi Lybico voluuntur marmore fluctus,
Sæuus vbi Orion hybernis conditur vndis,
Vel cùm sole nouo densæ torrentur aristæ,
Aut Hermi campo, aut Lyciæ flauentibus aruis,
Scuta sonant, pulsùque pedum tremit excita tellus: ce furieux monstre, à tant de bras et à tant de testes, c'est tousiours l'homme foyble, calamiteux, et miserable.

Ce n'est qu'vne formilliere esmeuë et eschaufée, It nigrum campis agmen: vn souffle de vent contraire, le croassement d'vn vol de corbeaux, le faux pas d'vn cheual, le passage fortuite d'vn aigle, vn songe, vne voix, vn signe, vne brouée matiniere, suffisent à le renuerser et porter par terre.

Donnez luy seulement d'vn rayon de soleil par le visage, le voyla fondu et esuanouy: qu'on luy esuente seulement vn peu de poussiere aux yeux, comme aux mouches à miel de nostre Poëte, voyla toutes nos enseignes, nos legions, et le grand Pompeius mesmes à leur teste, rompu et fracassé: car ce fut luy, ce me semble, que Sertorius battit en Espaigne à tout ces belles armes, qui ont aussi seruy à Eumenes contre Antigonus, à Surena contre Crassus: Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta /

ENGLISH

al authors and movers? Let us hear the greatest, the most victorious and the most powerful emperor who ever lived, joking and making very amusing and very witty fun of many battles risked by sea and by land, of the blood and lives of five hundred thousand men who followed his fortune, and of the forces and riches of two parts of the world exhausted in the service of his enterprises: Because Antony is screwing Glaphyra, Fulvia has set me this penalty: / that I must screw her too.[49]

/ I, screw Fulvia! What if Manius begged me to sodomize him—would I do it? Not, I think, if I had any sense.
"Either screw me or let us fight," she says. What if dearer to me than life is my prick itself? Let the trumpets sound! I use my Latin with freedom of conscience, by the leave you have given me. Now this great body with so many faces and movements, which seem to threaten heaven and earth: As many as the waves that roll on the Libyan sea when fierce Orion sets in the winter waves, or as the thick ears of corn scorched by the new sun on the plain of Hermus or in the yellow fields of Lycia, so the shields clang, and the earth trembles, roused by the tramp of feet: this furious monster with so many arms and so many heads is still, always, man—feeble, calamitous and wretched.[50]

It is only an anthill stirred up and heated: The black column moves across the plains: a gust of contrary wind, the croaking of a flight of crows, a horse's stumble, the chance passing of an eagle, a dream, a voice, a sign, a morning mist are enough to overturn it and bring it to the ground.[51]

Just strike it in the face with a ray of sunlight, and there it is, melted away and vanished. Just blow a little dust in its eyes, as with the honeybees of our Poet, and there are all our standards, our legions, and even the great Pompey at their head, broken and shattered. For it was he, I think, whom Sertorius beat in Spain with those fine weapons, which also served Eumenes against Antigonus and 49 An epigram by the emperor Augustus, preserved by Martial (XI.20); Glaphyra was Antony's mistress and Fulvia his wife.

50 Montaigne is addressing the princess, probably Margaret of Valois, for whom this essay is said to have been written; the second quotation is Virgil, Aeneid VII.
51 Virgil, Aeneid IV, describing ants.

FRENCH

Pulueris exigui iactu compressa quiescent. Qu'on descouple mesmes de noz mouches apres, elles auront et la force et le courage de le dissiper.

De fresche memoire, les Portugais assiegeans la ville de Tamly, au territoire de Xiatine, les habitans d'icelle porterent sur la muraille quantité de ruches, dequoy ils sont riches. Et auec du feu chasserent les abeilles si viuement sur leurs ennemis, qu'ils abandonnerent leur entreprinse, ne pouuans soustenir leurs assauts et piqueures. Ainsi demeura la victoire et liberté de leur ville, à ce nouueau secours: auec telle fortune, qu'au retour du combat, il ne s'en trouua vne seule à dire. Les ames des Empereurs et des sauatiers sont iettées à mesme moule. Considerant l'importance des actions des Princes et leur poix, nous nous persuadons qu'elles soyent produictes par quelques causes aussi poisantes et importantes.

Nous nous trompons: ils sont menez et ramenez en leurs mouuemens, par les mesmes ressors, que nous sommes aux nostres. La mesme raison qui nous fait tanser auec vn voisin, dresse entre les Princes vne guerre: la mesme raison qui nous fait fouëtter vn laquais, tombant en vn Roy, luy fait ruiner vne prouince. Ils veulent aussi legerement que nous, mais ils peuuent plus. Pareils appetits agitent vn ciron et vn elephant.

2.12.69 Quant à la fidelité, il n'est animal au monde traistre au prix de l'homme. Nos histoires racontent la vifue poursuitte que certains chiens ont faict de la mort de leurs maistres. Le Roy Pyrrhus ayant rencontré vn chien qui gardoit vn homme mort, et ayant entendu qu'il y auoit trois iours qu'il faisoit cet office, commanda qu'on enterrast ce corps, et mena ce chien quant et luy. Vn iour qu'il assistoit aux montres generales de son armee, ce chien apperceuant les meurtriers de son maistre, leur courut sus, auec grans aboys et aspreté de courroux, et par ce premier indice achemina la vengeance de ce meurtre, qui en fut faicte bien tost apres par la voye de la iustice.

Autant en fit le chien du sage Hesiode, ayant conuaincu les enfans de Ganistor Naupactien, du meurtre commis

ENGLISH

Surena against Crassus: These passions of the soul and these great contests / will be checked and stilled by the throwing of a little dust. Even let some of our bees loose on it afterwards: they will have the strength and the courage to scatter it.[52]

Within recent memory, when the Portuguese were besieging the town of Tamly, in the territory of Xiatine, its inhabitants brought a quantity of beehives onto the wall, for they have plenty of them. And with fire they drove the bees so fiercely onto their enemies that the Portuguese gave up their enterprise, unable to withstand their attacks and stings. Thus the victory and the freedom of their town were owed to this new kind of help—with such good fortune that on their return from the fight not a single bee was missing. The souls of emperors and of cobblers are cast in the same mold. Considering the importance and weight of the actions of princes, we persuade ourselves that they must be produced by causes equally weighty and important.[53]

We are mistaken. They are pushed this way and that in their movements by the same springs as we are in ours. The same reason that makes us quarrel with a neighbor sets off a war between princes; the same reason that makes us whip a lackey, when it falls on a king, makes him ruin a province. Their will is as light as ours, but their power is greater. The same appetites stir a mite and an elephant.

As for fidelity, there is no animal in the world as treacherous as man. Our histories tell of the eager pursuit that certain dogs have made to avenge their masters' deaths. King Pyrrhus, having come upon a dog guarding a dead man, and hearing that it had been doing this duty for three days, ordered the body to be buried and took the dog along with him. One day, when he was attending the general review of his army, the dog spotted its master's murderers and ran at them with loud barking and fierce anger; and by this first clue it set in motion the vengeance for the murder, which was carried out soon afterwards by way of justice.

So too did the dog of the wise Hesiod, which convicted the sons of Ganyctor of Naupactus of the 52 Sertorius, Roman rebel general in Spain; Eumenes and Antigonus, successors of Alexander; Surena, the Parthian general who defeated Crassus in 53 BC. The quotation is from Virgil, Georgics IV.

53 Montaigne took this episode from Simon Goulart's French version of a history of the Portuguese conquests in the East.

FRENCH

en la personne de son maistre. Vn autre chien estant à la garde d'vn temple à Athenes, ayant aperçeu vn larron sacrilege qui emportoit les plus beaux ioyaux, se mit à abbayer contre luy tant qu'il peut: mais les marguilliers ne s'estans point esueillez pour cela, il se mit à suyure, et le iour estant venu, se tint vn peu plus esloigné de luy, sans le perdre iamais de veuë: s'il luy offroit à manger, il n'en vouloit pas, et aux autres passans qu'il rencontroit en son chemin, il leur faisoit feste de la queuë, et prenoit de leurs mains ce qu'ils luy donnoient à manger: si son larron s'arrestoit pour dormir, il s'arrestoit quant et quant au lieu mesmes.

La nouuelle de ce chien estant venuë aux marguilliers de cette eglise, ils se mirent à le suiure à la trace, s'enquerans des nouuelles du poil de ce chien, et en fin le rencontrerent en la ville de Cromyon, et le larron aussi, qu'ils ramenerent en la ville d'Athenes, où il fut puny. Et les iuges en recognoissance de ce bon office, ordonnerent du public certaine mesure de bled pour nourrir le chien, et aux prestres d'en auoir soin. Plutarque tesmoigne cette histoire, comme chose tres-aueree et aduenue en son siecle.

ENGLISH

murder of its master. Another dog, guarding a temple in Athens, saw a sacrilegious thief carrying off the finest jewels and began to bark at him as loud as it could. But since the wardens did not wake up for all that, it began to follow him; and when day came, it kept a little farther off, without ever losing sight of him. If he offered it food, it would not take it; but to the other passers-by it met on the way it wagged its tail and took from their hands whatever they gave it to eat. If its thief stopped to sleep, it stopped at the same spot as well.

When news of this dog reached the wardens of that church, they set out to follow its track, asking for news of a dog of that color, and at last found it in the town of Cromyon, and the thief too, whom they brought back to the city of Athens, where he was punished. And the judges, in acknowledgment of this good service, ordered that a certain measure of grain be provided from public funds to feed the dog, and that the priests take care of it. Plutarch vouches for this story as a well-attested thing that happened in his own time.

ANDRODUS AND THE LION

A lion spares the slave who once pulled a splinter from its paw.

FRENCH

2.12.70 Quant à la gratitude, car il me semble que nous auons besoin de mettre ce mot en credit, ce seul exemple y suffira, qu'Appion recite comme en ayant esté luy mesme spectateur. Vn iour, dit-il, qu'on donnoit à Rome au peuple le plaisir du combat de plusieurs bestes estranges, et principalement de lyons de grandeur inusitee, il y en auoit vn entre autres, qui par son port furieux, par la force et grosseur de ses membres, et vn rugissement hautain et espouuantable, attiroit à soy la veuë de toute l'assistance. Entre les autres esclaues, qui furent presentez au peuple en ce combat des bestes, fut vn Androdus de Dace, qui estoit à vn Seigneur Romain, de qualité consulaire.

Ce lyon l'ayant apperceu de loing, s'arresta premierement tout court, comme estant entré en admiration, et puis s'approcha tout doucement d'vne façon molle et paisible, comme pour entrer en recognoissance auec luy. Cela faict, et s'estant asseuré de

ENGLISH

As for gratitude—for it seems to me we need to bring this word back into credit—this single example will suffice, which Apion reports as having witnessed himself. One day, he says, when the people in Rome were being given the pleasure of a fight among many strange beasts, chiefly lions of unusual size, there was one among them which, by its furious bearing, by the strength and size of its limbs, and by a proud and terrifying roar, drew the eyes of the whole audience. Among the other slaves brought before the people in this fight with the beasts was one Androdus, from Dacia, who belonged to a Roman lord of consular rank.[54]

This lion, seeing him from afar, first stopped short as if struck with wonder, and then came up very gently, in a soft and peaceful way, as if to recognize him. That done, and having made sure of what it was looking for, it began to wag its tail like 54 Apion, Greek grammarian of the 1st century AD; the story, told by Aulus Gellius, is that of the slave usually called Androclus or Androcles.

FRENCH

ce qu'il cherchoit, il commença à battre de la queuë à la mode des chiens qui flattent leur maistre, et à baiser, et lescher les mains et les cuisses de ce pauure miserable, tout transi d'effroy et hors de soy. Androdus ayant repris ses esprits par la benignité de ce lyon, et r'asseuré sa veuë pour le considerer et recognoistre: c'estoit vn singulier plaisir de voir les caresses, et les festes qu'ils s'entrefaisoient l'vn à l'autre.

Dequoy le peuple avant esleué des cris de ioye, l'Empereur fit appeller cet esclaue, pour entendre de luy le moyen d'vn si estrange euenement. Il luy recita vne histoire nouuelle et admirable. Mon maistre, dict-il, estant proconsul en Aphrique, ie fus contrainct par la cruauté et rigueur qu'il me tenoit, me faisant iournellement battre, me desrober de luy, et m'en fuir. Et pour me cacher seurement d'vn personnage ayant si grande authorité en la prouince, ie trouuay mon plus court, de gaigner les solitudes et les contrees sablonneuses et inhabitables de ce pays là, resolu, si le moyen de me nourrir venoit à me faillir, de trouuer quelque façon de me tuer moy-mesme.

Le soleil estant extrememement aspre sur le midy, et les chaleurs insupportables, ie m'embatis sur vne cauerne cachee et inaccessible, et me iettay dedans. Bien tost apres y suruint ce lyon, ayant vne patte sanglante et blessee, tout plaintif et gemissant des douleurs qu'il y souffroit: à son arriuee i'eu beaucoup de frayeur, mais luy me voyant mussé dans vn coing de sa loge, s'approcha tout doucement de moy, me presentant sa patte offencee, et me la montrant comme pour demander secours: ie luy ostay lors vn grand escot qu'il y auoit, et m'estant vn peu appriuoisé à luy, pressant sa playe en fis sortir l'ordure qui s'y amassoit, l'essuyay, et nettoyay le plus proprement que ie peux.

Luy se sentant allegé de son mal, et soulagé de cette douleur, se prit à reposer, et à dormir, ayant tousiours sa patte entre mes mains. De là en hors luy et moy vesquismes ensemble en cette cauerne trois ans entiers de mesmes viandes: car des bestes qu'il tuoit à sa chasse, il m'en apportoit les meilleurs endroits, que ie faisois cuire au soleil à faute de feu, et m'en nourrissois.

A la longue, m'estant ennuyé de cette vie brutale et sauuage, comme ce lyon estoit allé vn iour à sa queste accoustumee, ie partis de là, et à ma troisiesme iournee fus surpris par les soldats, qui me menerent d'Affrique en cette ville à mon maistre, lequel soudain me condamna à mort, et à estre abandonné aux bestes. Or à ce que ie voy dogs fawning on their master, and to kiss and lick the hands and thighs of this poor wretch, who was frozen with fright and beside himself. Androdus recovered his wits thanks to the lion's gentleness, and steadied his gaze enough to look at it and recognize it; and it was a singular pleasure to see the caresses and the welcome they gave each other.

ENGLISH

When the people raised cries of joy at this, the Emperor had the slave called, to learn from him how so strange an event had come about. He told him a new and wonderful story. When my master was proconsul in Africa, he said, I was forced by the cruelty and harshness with which he treated me, having me beaten every day, to steal away from him and flee. And to hide myself safely from a personage of such great authority in the province, I found it quickest to make for the solitudes and the sandy, uninhabitable regions of that country, resolved, if the means of feeding myself should fail me, to find some way of killing myself.

The sun being extremely fierce around noon and the heat unbearable, I came upon a hidden, inaccessible cave and threw myself into it. Soon afterwards this lion arrived, with a bloody, wounded paw, all plaintive and moaning from the pain it was suffering. At its arrival I was very frightened; but seeing me hiding in a corner of its den, it came up to me very gently, holding out its injured paw and showing it to me as if asking for help. I then pulled out a large splinter that was in it, and having grown a little used to the lion, I pressed the wound and squeezed out the matter that had collected in it, wiped it, and cleaned it as neatly as I could.

Feeling relieved of its trouble and eased of that pain, it lay down to rest and sleep, with its paw still in my hands. From then on, the lion and I lived together in that cave for three whole years on the same food; for of the beasts it killed in its hunting it brought me the best parts, which I cooked in the sun for lack of fire, and I lived on them.

In the end, having grown weary of this brutish and wild life, one day when the lion had gone off on its usual hunt, I left; and on my third day's march I was caught by soldiers, who brought me from Africa to this city, to my master, who at once condemned me to death and to be thrown to the ce lyon fut aussi pris bien tost apres, qui m'a à cette heure voulu recompenser du bien-fait et guerison qu'il auoit reçeu de moy. Voyla l'histoire qu'Androdus recita à l'Empereur, laquelle il fit aussi entendre de main à main au peuple.

FRENCH

Parquoy à la requeste de tous il fut mis en liberté, et absous de cette condamnation, et par ordonnance du peuple luy fut faict present de ce lyon. Nous voyions depuis, dit Appion, Androdus conduisant ce lyon à tout vne petite laisse, se promenant par les tauernes à Rome, receuoir l'argent qu'on luy donnoit: le lyon se laisser couurir des fleurs qu'on luy iettoit, et chacun dire en les rencontrant: Voyla le lyon hoste de l'homme, voyla l'homme medecin du lyon.

2.12.71 Nous pleurons souuent la perte des bestes que nous aymons, aussi font elles la nostre. Pòst, bellator equus, positis insignibus, Æthon / It lacrymans, guttisque humectat grandibus ora.

2.12.72 Comme aucunes de nos nations ont les femmes en commun, aucunes à chacun la sienne: cela ne se voit-il pas aussi entre les bestes, et des mariages mieux gardez que les nostres?

2.12.73 Quant à la societé et confederation qu'elles dressent entre elles pour se liguer ensemble, et s'entresecourir, il se voit des bœufs, des porceaux, et autres animaux, qu'au cry de celuy que vous offencez, toute la trouppe accourt à son aide, et se ralie pour sa deffence. L'escare, quand il a aualé l'ameçon du pescheur, ses compagnons s'assemblent en foule autour de luy, et rongent la ligne: et si d'auenture il y en a vn, qui ait donné dedans la nasse, les autres luy baillent la queuë par dehors, et luy la serre tant qu'il peut à belles dents: ils le tirent ainsin au dehors et l'entrainent.

Les barbiers, quand l'vn de leurs compagnons est engagé, mettent la ligne contre leur dos, dressant vne espine qu'ils ont dentelee comme vne scie, à tout laquelle ils la scient et coupent.

2.12.74 Quant aux particuliers offices, que nous tirons l'vn de l'autre, pour le seruice de la vie, il s'en void plusieurs pareils exemples parmy elles. Ils tiennent que la balaine ne marche iamais qu'elle n'ait au deuant d'elle vn petit poisson semblable au goujon de mer, qui s'appelle pour cela la guide: la baleine le suit, se laissant mener et tourner aussi facilement, que le timon fait retourner la beasts. Now, as far as I can see, this lion was also caught soon afterwards, and has now wished to repay me for the kindness and the cure it had received from me. That is the story Androdus told the Emperor, which he also had passed along from hand to hand to the people.

ENGLISH

So at everyone's request he was set free and absolved of his sentence, and by order of the people the lion was given to him as a present. Afterwards, says Apion, we saw Androdus leading this lion on a little leash, going round the taverns in Rome and receiving the money people gave him, the lion letting itself be covered with the flowers they threw at it, and everyone saying when they met them: "There is the lion, the man's host; there is the man, the lion's physician."

We often weep for the loss of the beasts we love; so do they for ours. Then came his warhorse Aethon, his trappings laid aside, / walking in tears, and wetting his face with great drops.

Just as some of our nations hold their women in common, and in others each man has his own, is this not also seen among beasts—and marriages better kept than ours?

As for the society and confederation they form among themselves, to league together and help one another, we see oxen, pigs and other animals where, at the cry of the one you are hurting, the whole herd runs to its aid and rallies to defend it. When the parrot fish has swallowed the fisherman's hook, its companions gather in a crowd around it and gnaw through the line; and if by chance one of them has got into the trap, the others hold out their tails to it from outside, and it grips them with its teeth as hard as it can: in this way they pull it out and drag it away.

The fish called barbers, when one of their companions is caught, set the line against their back, raising a spine they have, toothed like a saw, with which they saw through it and cut it.

As for the particular services we get from one another for the needs of life, many similar examples are seen among them. They hold that the whale never moves without having in front of it a little fish like the sea gudgeon, which for that reason is called the guide. The whale follows it, letting itself nauire: et en recompense aussi, au lieu que toute autre chose, soit beste ou vaisseau, qui entre dans l'horrible chaos de la bouche de ce monstre, est incontinent perdu et englouty, ce petit poisson s'y retire en toute seureté, et y dort, et pendant son sommeil la baleine ne bouge: mais aussi tost qu'il sort, elle se met à le suyure sans cesse: et si de fortune elle l'escarte, elle va errant çà et là, et souuent se froissant contre les rochers, comme vn vaisseau qui n'a point de gouuernail.

FRENCH

Ce que Plutarque tesmoigne auoir veu en l'isle d'Anticyre. Il y a vne pareille societé entre le petit oyseau qu'on nomme le roytelet, et le crocodile: le roytelet sert de sentinelle à ce grand animal: et si l'ichneumon son ennemy s'approche pour le combattre, ce petit oyseau, de peur qu'il ne le surprenne endormy, va de son chant et à coup de bec l'esueillant, et l'aduertissant de son danger.

Il vit des demeurans de ce monstre, qui le reçoit familierement en sa bouche, et luy permet de becqueter dans ses machoueres, et entre ses dents, et y recueillir les morceaux de chair qui y sont demeurez: et s'il veut fermer la bouche, il l'aduertit premierement d'en sortir en la serrant peu à peu sans l'estreindre et l'offencer.

Cette coquille qu'on nomme la nacre, vit aussi ainsin auec le pinnothere, qui est vn petit animal de la sorte d'vn cancre, luy seruant d'huissier et de portier assis à l'ouuerture de cette coquille, qu'il tient continuellement entrebaaillee et ouuerte, iusques à ce qu'il y voye entrer quelque petit poisson propre à leur prise: car lors il entre dans la nacre, et luy va pinsant la chair viue, et la contraint de fermer sa coquille: lors eux deux ensemble mangent la proye enfermee dans leur fort. En la maniere de viure des tuns, on y remarque vne singuliere science des trois parties de la mathematique.

Quant à l'astrologie, ils l'enseignent à l'homme: car ils s'arrestent au lieu où le solstice d'hyuer les surprend, et n'en bougent iusques à l'equinoxe ensuyuant: voyla pourquoy Aristote mesme leur concede volontiers cette science. Quant à la geometrie et arithmetique, ils font tousiours leur bande de figure cubique, carree en tout sens, et en dressent vn corps de bataillon, solide, clos, et enuironné tout à l'entour, à six faces toutes esgalles: puis nagent en cette ordonnance carree, autant large derriere que deuant, de façon que qui en void et compte vn rang, il peut aisément nombrer toute la trouppe, d'autant que be led and turned as easily as the rudder turns the ship. And in return, whereas everything else, beast or vessel, that enters the horrible chaos of this monster's mouth is at once lost and swallowed up, this little fish takes refuge there in complete safety and sleeps there; and while it sleeps the whale does not stir. But as soon as it comes out, the whale starts following it without stopping; and if by chance it loses it, it wanders here and there, often crashing against the rocks, like a ship without a rudder.

ENGLISH

Plutarch testifies that he saw this on the island of Anticyra. There is a similar partnership between the little bird called the wren and the crocodile. The wren serves as sentinel to this great animal; and if its enemy the ichneumon approaches to fight it, this little bird, for fear it may catch the crocodile asleep, wakes it with its song and with pecks of its beak, warning it of its danger.

The bird lives on this monster's leftovers; the crocodile receives it familiarly into its mouth and lets it peck about in its jaws and between its teeth, gathering the bits of flesh left there. And when it wants to close its mouth, it first warns the bird to come out by closing it little by little, without squeezing or hurting it.

The shellfish called the pinna also lives in this way with the pinnotheres, a little creature of the crab kind, which serves it as usher and doorkeeper, sitting at the opening of the shell, which it keeps continually ajar and open until it sees some little fish come in that is fit for their catch. Then it goes into the pinna and pinches its living flesh, forcing it to close its shell; and then the two of them together eat the prey shut up in their fortress. In the way tuna live, one observes a singular knowledge of the three parts of mathematics.

As for astronomy, they teach it to man: for they stop at the place where the winter solstice overtakes them and do not stir from it until the following equinox. That is why Aristotle himself readily grants them this science. As for geometry and arithmetic, they always form their school in a cubic figure, square in every direction, and make of it a solid battalion, closed and enclosed all around, with six equal faces. Then they swim in this square formation, as wide behind as in front, so that whoever sees and counts one rank can easily number the whole troop, since the number in le nombre de la profondeur est esgal à la largeur, et la largeur, à la longueur.	depth is equal to the breadth, and the breadth to the length.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.75	Quant à la magnanimité, il est malaisé de luy donner vn visage plus apparent, qu'en ce faict du grand chien, qui fut enuoyé des Indes au Roy Alexandre: on luy presenta premierement vn cerf pour le combattre, et puis vn sanglier, et puis vn ours, il n'en fit compte, et ne daigna se remuer de sa place: mais quand il veid vn lyon, il se dressa incontinent sur ses pieds, montrant manifestement qu'il declaroit celuy-là seul digne d'entrer en combat auecques luy.	As for magnanimity, it is hard to give it a more evident face than in the case of the great dog sent from the Indies to King Alexander. They first set a stag before it to fight, then a boar, then a bear: it took no notice of them and did not deign to stir from its place. But when it saw a lion, it immediately rose to its feet, showing plainly that it declared that one alone worthy to enter into combat with it.
2.12.76	Touchant la repentance et recognoissance des fautes, on recite d'vn elephant, lequel ayant tué son gouuerneur par impetuosité de cholere, en print vn dueil si extreme, qu'il ne voulut onques puis manger, et se laissa mourir.	Concerning repentance and the acknowledgment of faults, they tell of an elephant which, having killed its keeper in a fit of anger, mourned so deeply that it would never eat again, and let itself die.
2.12.77	Quant à la clemence, on recite d'vn tygre, la plus inhumaine beste de toutes, que luy ayant esté baillé vn cheureau, il souffrit deux iours la faim auant que de le vouloir offencer, et le troisiesme il brisa la cage où il estoit enfermé, pour aller chercher autre pasture, ne se voulant prendre au cheureau, son familier et son hoste.	As for clemency, they tell of a tiger, the most inhuman beast of all, which, having been given a kid, went hungry for two days rather than harm it, and on the third broke the cage in which it was shut up to go and look for other fodder, not wishing to attack the kid, its familiar and its guest.
2.12.78	Et quant aux droicts de la familiarité et conuenance, qui se dresse par la conuersation, il nous aduient ordinairement d'appriuoiser des chats, des chiens, et des lieures ensemble.	And as for the rights of familiarity and fellow-feeling that grow up from living together, we commonly tame cats, dogs and hares together.
2.12.79	Mais ce que l'experience apprend à ceux qui voyagent par mer, et notamment en la mer de Sicile, de la condition des halcyons, surpasse toute humaine cogitation. De quelle espece d'animaux a iamais Nature tant honoré les couches, la naissance, et l'enfantement? car les poëtes disent bien qu'vne seule isle de Delos, estant au parauant vagante, fut affermie pour le seruice de l'enfantement de Latone: mais Dieu a voulu que toute la mer fust arrestée, affermie et applanie, sans vagues, sans vents et sans pluye, cependant que l'halcyon fait ses petits, qui est iustement enuiron le solstice, le plus court iour de l'an: et par son priuilege nous auons sept iours et sept nuicts, au fin cœur de l'hyuer, que nous pouuons nauiguer sans danger.	But what experience teaches those who travel by sea, and notably in the Sicilian sea, about the nature of halcyons surpasses all human thought. What species of animal has Nature ever so honored in its lying-in, birth and bringing forth? The poets do say that a single island, Delos, which had drifted until then, was made fast to serve for the delivery of Latona; but God willed that the whole sea should be stilled, made firm and smooth, without waves, without winds and without rain, while the halcyon brings forth its young, which is just about the solstice, the shortest day of the year. And by its privilege we have seven days and seven nights, in the very heart of winter, when we can sail without danger.[55]
	Leurs femelles ne recognoissent autre masle que le leur propre: l'assistent toute leur vie sans iamais	Their females acknowledge no male but their own; they stay with him all their lives without

55 Latona (Leto) gave birth to Apollo and Artemis on Delos; the halcyon's calm is the origin of "halcyon days."

FRENCH

l'abandonner: s'il vient à estre debile et cassé, elles le chargent sur leurs espaules, le portent par tout, et le seruent iusques à la mort.

2.12.80 Mais aucune suffisance n'a encores peu atteindre à la cognoissance de cette merueilleuse fabrique, dequoy l'halcyon compose le nid pour ses petits, ny en deuiner la matiere.

2.12.81 Plutarque, qui en a veu et manié plusieurs, pense que ce soit des arestes de quelque poisson qu'elle conioinct et lie ensemble, les entrelassant les vnes de long, les autres de trauers, et adioustant des courbes et des arrondissemens, tellement qu'en fin elle en forme vn vaisseau rond prest à voguer: puis quand elle a paracheué de le construire, elle le porte au batement du flot marin, là où la mer le battant tout doucement, luy enseigne à radouber ce qui n'est pas bien lié, et à mieux fortifier aux endroits où elle void que sa structure se desmeut, et se lasche pour les coups de mer: et au contraire ce qui est bien ioinct, le batement de la mer le vous estreinct, et vous le serre de sorte, qu'il ne se peut ny rompre ny dissoudre, ou endommager à coups de pierre, ny de fer, si ce n'est à toute peine.

Et ce qui plus est à admirer, c'est la proportion et figure de la concauité du dedans: car elle est composée et proportionnée, de maniere qu'elle ne peut receuoir ny admettre autre chose, que l'oiseau qui l'a bastie: car à toute autre chose, elle est impenetrable, close, et fermée, tellement qu'il ny peut rien entrer, non pas l'eau de la mer seulement. Voyla vne description bien claire de ce bastiment et empruntée de bon lieu: toutesfois il me semble qu'elle ne nous esclaircit pas encore suffisamment la difficulté de cette architecture. Or de quelle vanité nous peut-il partir, de loger au dessoubs de nous, et d'interpreter desdaigneusement les effects que nous ne pouuons imiter ny comprendre?

2.12.82 Pour suyure encore vn peu plus loing cette equalité et correspondance de nous aux bestes, le priuilege dequoy nostre ame se glorifie, de ramener à sa condition, tout ce qu'elle conçoit, de despouiller de qualitez mortelles, et corporelles, tout ce qui vient à elle, de renger les choses qu'elle estime dignes de son accointance, à desuestir et despouiller leurs conditions corruptibles, et leur faire laisser à part, comme vestemens superflus et viles, l'espesseur, la longueur, la profondeur, le poids, la couleur, l'odeur, l'aspreté, la polisseure, la dureté, la mollesse, et tous accidents sensibles, pour les accommoder à sa condition immortelle et spirituelle: de ever abandoning him; if he grows weak and broken down, they carry him on their shoulders, take him everywhere, and serve him until death.

ENGLISH

But no ability has yet been able to attain knowledge of the marvelous structure from which the halcyon makes the nest for its young, nor to guess its material.

Plutarch, who saw and handled several of them, thinks it is made of the bones of some fish, which the bird joins and binds together, interlacing some lengthwise and others crosswise, and adding curves and roundings, so that in the end it forms a round vessel ready to sail. Then, when it has finished building it, it carries it to where the waves break, and there the sea, beating on it very gently, shows it how to mend what is not well bound and how to strengthen the places where it sees the structure shifting and loosening under the blows of the sea. And, on the other hand, whatever is well joined the beating of the sea tightens and presses together so that it cannot be broken or dissolved, or damaged by blows of stone or iron, except with great difficulty.

And what is most to be wondered at is the proportion and shape of the hollow inside. It is made and proportioned in such a way that it can receive or admit nothing but the bird that built it; to anything else it is impenetrable, closed and shut, so that nothing can get in, not even sea water. There is a very clear description of this building, and borrowed from a good source; and yet it seems to me that it still does not sufficiently clear up for us the difficulty of this architecture. Now, from what vanity can it come in us to rank beneath ourselves, and to interpret disdainfully, the works we can neither imitate nor understand?

To pursue this equality and correspondence between us and the beasts a little further: our soul glories in the privilege of bringing everything it conceives back to its own condition; of stripping everything that comes to it of mortal and bodily qualities; of compelling the things it deems worthy of its acquaintance to doff and strip off their corruptible conditions, and to leave aside, like superfluous and vile garments, thickness, length, depth, weight, color, smell, roughness, smoothness, hardness, softness and all sensible maniere que Rome et Paris, que i'ay en l'ame, Paris que i'imagine, ie l'imagine et le comprens, sans grandeur et sans lieu, sans pierre, sans plastre, et sans bois: ce mesme priuilege, dis-ie, semble estre bien euidemment aux bestes.

FRENCH

Car vn cheual accoustumé aux trompettes, aux harquebusades, et aux combats, que nous voyons tremousser et fremir en dormant, estendu sur sa litiere, comme s'il estoit en la meslée, il est certain qu'il conçoit en son ame vn son de tabourin sans bruict, vne armée sans armes et sans corps. Quippe videbis equos fortes, cùm membra iacebunt
In somnis, sudare tamen, spiraréque sæpe,
Et quasi de palma summas contendere vires. Ce lieure qu'vn leurier imagine en songe, apres lequel nous le voyons haleter en dormant, alonger la queuë, secoüer les iarrets, et representer parfaictement les mouuemens de sa course: c'est vn lieure sans poil et sans os.

Venantúmque canes in molli sæpe quiete,
Iactant crura tamen subitò, vocésque repente
Mittunt, et crebras reducunt naribus auras,
Vt vestigia si teneant inuenta ferarum:
Experge factique, sequuntur inania sæpe
Ceruorum simulacra, fugæ quasi dedita cernant;
Donec discussis redeant erroribus ad se. Les chiens de garde, que nous voyons souuent gronder en songeant, et puis iapper tout à faict, et s'esueiller en sursaut, comme s'ils apperceuoient quelque estranger arriuer; cet estranger que leur ame void, c'est vn homme spirituel, et imperceptible, sans dimension, sans couleur, et sans estre: Consueta domi catulorum blanda propago
Degere, sæpe leuem ex oculis volucrémque soporem
Discutere, et corpus de terra corripere instant,
Proinde quasi ignotas facies atque ora tuantur.

ENGLISH

accidents, so as to fit them to its own immortal and spiritual condition. So it is that Rome and Paris, which I have in my mind—Paris, which I imagine—I imagine and grasp without size and without place, without stone, without plaster and without wood. This same privilege, I say, seems quite evidently to belong to the beasts.

For a horse accustomed to trumpets, to arquebus fire and to battle, which we see quivering and trembling in its sleep, stretched out on its litter as if it were in the fray—it is certain that it conceives in its soul the sound of a drum without noise, an army without weapons and without bodies. Indeed you will see brave horses, when their limbs lie in sleep, sweat nonetheless, and pant again and again, and strain their utmost strength as if for the prize. That hare which a greyhound imagines in its dream, after which we see it panting in its sleep, stretching out its tail, jerking its hocks and perfectly reproducing the movements of its run: it is a hare without fur and without bones.

And hunters' dogs, often in gentle rest, suddenly toss their legs nonetheless, and all at once let out cries, and draw in quick breaths through their nostrils, as if they had found and were holding the tracks of wild beasts;
and once awake, they often chase the empty images of stags, as if they saw them in flight, until they shake off their delusions and come back to themselves. The watchdogs that we often see growling in their dreams, and then barking outright and waking with a start, as if they saw some stranger arriving: that stranger whom their soul sees is a spiritual and imperceptible man, without dimension, without color and without being. The fawning brood of puppies, used to living indoors, often hasten to shake light, fluttering sleep from their eyes and to spring up from the ground, as if they beheld unknown faces and features.

THE BEAUTY OF BODIES

Ideals of beauty vary everywhere, and many animals are more beautiful than we are.

FRENCH

2.12.83 Quant à la beauté du corps, auant passer outre, il me faudroit sçauoir si nous sommes d'accord de sa description. Il est vray-semblable que nous ne sçauons

ENGLISH

As for bodily beauty, before going further I would need to know whether we agree on how to describe it. It is likely that we hardly know what guere, que c'est que beauté en nature et en general, puisque à l'humaine et nostre beauté nous donnons tant de formes diuerses, de laquelle, s'il y auoit quelque prescription naturelle, nous la recognoistrions en commun, comme la chaleur du feu. Nous en fantasions les formes à nostre appetit.

FRENCH

Turpis Romano Belgicus ore color. Les Indes la peignent noire et basannée, aux leures grosses et enflées, au nez plat et large: et chargent de gros anneaux d'or le cartilage d'entre les nazeaux, pour le faire pendre iusques à la bouche, comme aussi la balieure, de gros cercles enrichis de pierreries, si qu'elle leur tombe sur le menton, et est leur grace de montrer leurs dents iusques au dessous des racines. Au Peru les plus grandes oreilles sont les plus belles, et les estendent autant qu'ils peuuent par artifice.

Et vn homme d'auiourdhuy, dit auoir veu en vne nation Orientale, ce soing de les agrandir, en tel credit, et de les charger de poisants ioyaux, qu'à touts coups il passoit son bras vestu au trauers d'vn trou d'oreille. Il est ailleurs des nations, qui noircissent les dents auec grand soing, et ont à mespris de les voir blanches: ailleurs ils les teignent de couleur rouge. Non seulement en Basque les femmes se trouuent plus belles la teste rase: mais assez ailleurs: et qui plus est, en certaines contrées glaciales, comme dit Pline.

Les Mexicanes content entre les beautez, la petitesse du front, et où elles se font le poil par tout le reste du corps, elles le nourrissent au front, et peuplent par art: et ont en si grande recommandation la grandeur des tetins, qu'elles affectent de pouuoir donner la mammelle à leurs enfans par dessus l'espaule. Nous formerions ainsi la laideur. Les Italiens la façonnent grosse et massiue: les Espagnols vuidée et estrillée: et entre nous, l'vn la fait blanche, l'autre brune: l'vn molle et delicate, l'autre forte et vigoureuse: qui y demande de la mignardise, et de la douceur, qui de la fierté et majesté.

Tout ainsi que la preferance en beauté, que Platon attribue à la figure spherique, les Epicuriens la donnent à la pyramidale plustost, ou carrée: et ne peuuent aualer vn Dieu en forme de boule.

2.12.84 Mais quoy qu'il en soit, Nature ne nous a non plus priuilegiez en cela qu'au demeurant, sur ses loix beauty is in nature and in general, since we give so many different forms to our own human beauty; if there were some natural rule for it, we would all recognize it in common, like the heat of fire. We fancy its forms to suit our appetite.

ENGLISH

A Belgian complexion is ugly on a Roman face. The Indies paint beauty black and swarthy, with thick, swollen lips and a flat, broad nose; and they load the cartilage between the nostrils with big gold rings to make it hang down to the mouth, and likewise the lower lip with large hoops set with precious stones, so that it falls onto the chin; and it is their idea of grace to show their teeth down below the roots. In Peru the biggest ears are the most beautiful, and they stretch them artificially as far as they can.[56]

And a man of our own day says he saw in an Eastern nation this care to enlarge them, and to load them with heavy jewels, held in such esteem that he could pass his arm, sleeve and all, through the hole of an ear whenever he liked. Elsewhere there are nations that blacken their teeth with great care and scorn to see them white; elsewhere they dye them red. Not only in the Basque country do women think themselves more beautiful with shaven heads, but in plenty of other places too; and what is more, in certain icy regions, as Pliny says.

Mexican women count a small forehead among the beauties; and while they remove the hair everywhere else on their bodies, on the forehead they cultivate it and thicken it by art. And they hold large breasts in such high regard that they make a point of being able to give their children the breast over their shoulder. That is how we would fashion ugliness. The Italians make beauty plump and massive; the Spanish, lean and spare; and among us, one makes it fair, another dark; one soft and delicate, another strong and vigorous; one asks for daintiness and sweetness in it, another for pride and majesty.

In just the same way, the preference in beauty that Plato gives to the spherical figure the Epicureans give rather to the pyramid, or the square; and they cannot swallow a god in the shape of a ball.

But however that may be, Nature has no more privileged us in this than in the rest, above her communes. Et si nous nous iugeons bien, nous trouuerons que s'il est quelques animaux moins fauorisez en cela que nous, il y en a d'autres, et en grand nombre, qui le sont plus. A multis animalibus decore vincimur: voyre des terrestres nos compatriotes. Car quant aux marins, laissant la figure, qui ne peut tomber en proportion, tant elle est autre: en couleur, netteté, polissure, disposition, nous leur cedons assez: et non moins, en toutes qualitez, aux aërées.

FRENCH

Et cette prerogatiue que les poëtes font valoir de nostre stature droicte, regardant vers le ciel son origine,
Pronáque cùm spectent animalia cætera terram,
Os homini sublime dedit, cœlúmque videre
Iussit, et erectos ad sydera tollere vultus. elle est vrayement poëtique: car il y a plusieurs bestioles, qui ont la veuë renuersée tout à faict vers le ciel: et l'encoleure des chameaux, et des austruches, ie la trouue encore plus releuée et droite que la nostre. Quels animaux n'ont la face au haut, et ne l'ont deuant, et ne regardent vis à vis, comme nous: et ne descouurent en leur iuste posture autant du ciel et de la terre que l'homme?

Et quelles qualitez de nostre corporelle constitution en Platon et en Cicero ne peuuent seruir à mille sortes de bestes? Celles qui nous retirent le plus, ce sont les plus laides, et les plus abiectes de toute la bande: car pour l'apparence exterieure et forme du visage, ce sont les magots: Simia quàm similis, turpissima bestia, nobis! pour le dedans et parties vitales, c'est le pourceau.

2.12.85 Certes quand i'imagine l'homme tout nud (ouy en ce sexe qui semble auoir plus de part à la beauté) ses tares, sa subiection naturelle, et ses imperfections, ie trouue que nous auons eu plus de raison que nul autre animal, de nous couurir. Nous auons esté excusables d'emprunter ceux que Nature auoit fauorisé en cela plus que nous, pour nous parer de leur beauté, et nous cacher soubs leur despouille, de laine, plume, poil, soye. Remerquons au demeurant, que nous sommes le seul animal, duquel le defaut offence nos propres compagnons, et seuls qui common laws. And if we judge ourselves rightly, we will find that if there are some animals less favored than we are in this respect, there are others, and many of them, that are more so. We are surpassed in beauty by many animals: indeed even by the land animals, our compatriots. For as for the creatures of the sea, leaving aside shape, which is so different that no comparison is possible, in color, clearness, smoothness and arrangement we yield to them a good deal; and no less, in all qualities, to the creatures of the air.[57]

ENGLISH

And that prerogative the poets make so much of, our upright stature, looking toward heaven, its origin: And while the other animals stoop and look at the earth, to man he gave an uplifted face, and bade him look at the sky and raise his eyes erect toward the stars. it is truly poetic. For there are many little creatures whose gaze is turned entirely toward the sky; and the necks of camels and ostriches I find even higher and more upright than ours. What animals do not have their face on top and in front, and look straight ahead as we do, and do not take in, in their natural posture, as much of sky and earth as man?

And what qualities of our bodily constitution, as described in Plato and in Cicero, cannot apply to a thousand kinds of beasts? Those that resemble us most are the ugliest and most abject of the whole crew: for outward appearance and the shape of the face, it is the apes, How like us is the ape, the ugliest of beasts! for the inside and the vital organs, it is the pig.[58]

Indeed, when I picture man stark naked (yes, even in the sex that seems to have the larger share of beauty), with his blemishes, his natural subjection and his imperfections, I find that we have had more reason than any other animal to cover ourselves. We could be excused for borrowing from the creatures Nature had favored more than us in this respect, to deck ourselves out in their beauty and hide under their spoils: wool, feathers, fur, silk. Let us note, moreover, that we are the only animal whose defects offend our own com-

56 Propertius, Elegies II.18.
57 Seneca, Letters 124.
58 A line of Ennius quoted by Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods I.

FRENCH

auons à nous desrober en nos actions naturelles, de nostre espece.

Vrayement c'est aussi vn effect digne de consideration, que les maistres du mestier ordonnent pour remede aux passions amoureuses, l'entiere veuë et libre du corps qu'on recherche: que pour refroidir l'amitié, il ne faille que voir librement ce qu'on ayme. Ille quòd obscœnas in aperto corpore partes / Viderat, in cursu qui fuit, hæsit amor. Et encore que cette recepte puisse à l'auenture partir d'vne humeur vn peu delicate et refroidie: si est-ce vn merueilleux signe de nostre defaillance, que l'vsage et la cognoissance nous dégoute les vns des autres. Ce n'est pas tant pudeur, qu'art et prudence, qui rend nos dames si circonspectes, à nous refuser l'entrée de leurs cabinets, auant qu'elles soyent peintes et parées pour la montre publique.

Nec veneres nostras hoc fallit, quò magis ipsæ
Omnia summopere hos vitæ postscenia celant,
Quos retinere volunt adstrictóque esse in amore. Là où en plusieurs animaux, il n'est rien d'eux que nous n'aimions, et qui ne plaise à nos sens: de façon que de leurs excremens mesmes et de leur descharge, nous tirons non seulement de la friandise au manger, mais nos plus riches ornemens et parfums. Ce discours ne touche que nostre commun ordre, et n'est pas si sacrilege d'y vouloir comprendre ces diuines, supernaturelles et extraordinaires beautez, qu'on voit par fois reluire entre nous, comme des astres soubs vn voile corporel et terrestre.

2.12.86 Au demeurant la part mesme que nous faisons aux animaux, des faueurs de Nature, par nostre confession, elle leur est bien auantageuse. Nous nous attribuons des biens imaginaires et fantastiques, des biens futurs et absens, desquels l'humaine capacité ne se peut d'elle mesme respondre: ou des biens que nous nous attribuons faucement, par la licence de nostre opinion, comme la raison, la science et l'honneur: et à eux, nous laissons en partage des biens essentiels, maniables et palpables, la paix, le repos, la securité, l'innocence et la santé: la santé, dis-ie, le plus beau et le plus riche present, que Nature nous sçache faire.

De façon que la Philosophie, voire la Stoïque, ose bien dire qu'Heraclitus et Pherecydes, s'ils eussent peu panions, and the only ones who must hide from our own species in our natural actions.

ENGLISH

Truly, it is also a fact worth considering that the masters of the craft prescribe, as a remedy for the passions of love, a full and free sight of the body one desires: to cool one's affection, one need only look freely at what one loves. That man, because he had seen the obscene parts of the body laid bare, / found his love, which had been in full course, stopped short. And although this prescription may perhaps come from a somewhat fastidious and chilly temperament, it is still a remarkable sign of our deficiency that familiarity and acquaintance make us disgusted with one another. It is not so much modesty as skill and prudence that makes our ladies so careful to refuse us entry to their private rooms before they are painted and dressed for public display.[59]

Nor are our Venuses unaware of this; all the more do they take the utmost pains to hide this whole backstage of life from those they wish to keep bound fast in love.
Whereas in many animals there is nothing that we do not love and that does not please our senses. From their very excrements and discharges we draw not only delicacies to eat but our richest ornaments and perfumes. This reasoning concerns only the common run of us. I am not so sacrilegious as to try to include those divine, supernatural and extraordinary beauties that we sometimes see shining among us, like stars under a bodily and earthly veil.

For the rest, the very share of Nature's favors that we allot to the animals is, by our own admission, very much to their advantage. We attribute to ourselves imaginary and fanciful goods, future and absent goods, for which human capacity cannot of itself answer. Or we falsely attribute to ourselves goods through the license of our opinion, such as reason, knowledge and honor. And to them we leave as their share essential, tangible and palpable goods: peace, rest, security, innocence and health—health, I say, the finest and richest gift that Nature can give us.

So much so that Philosophy, even the Stoic kind, dares to say this of Heraclitus and Pherecydes: if eschanger leur sagesse auecques la santé, et se deliurer par ce marché, l'vn de l'hydropisie, l'autre de la maladie pediculaire qui le pressoit, ils eussent bien faict. Par où ils donnent encore plus grand prix à la sagesse, la comparant et contrepoisant à la santé, qu'ils ne font en cette autre proposition, qui est aussi des leurs. Ils disent que si Circé eust presenté à Vlysses deux breuuages, l'vn pour faire deuenir vn homme de fol sage, l'autre de sage fol, qu'Vlysses eust deu plustost accepter celuy de la folie, que de consentir que Circé eust changé sa figure humaine en celle d'vne beste.

FRENCH

Et disent que la sagesse mesme eust parlé à luy en cette maniere: Quitte moy, laisse moy là, plustost que de me loger sous la figure et corps d'un asne. Comment? cette grande et diuine sapience, les philosophes la quittent donc, pour ce voile corporel et terrestre? Ce n'est donc plus par la raison, par le discours, et par l'ame, que nous excellons sur les bestes: c'est par nostre beauté, nostre beau teint, et nostre belle disposition de membres, pour laquelle il nous faut mettre nostre intelligence, nostre prudence, et tout le reste à l'abandon. Or i'accepte cette naïfue et franche confession. Certes ils ont cogneu que ces parties là, dequoy nous faisons tant de feste, que ce n'est vaine fantasie.

Quand les bestes auroient donc toute la vertu, la science, la sagesse et suffisance Stoique, ce seroyent tousiours des bestes: ny ne seroyent comparables à vn homme miserable, meschant et insensé. Car en fin tout ce qui n'est comme nous sommes, n'est rien qui vaille. Et Dieu pour se faire valoir, il faut qu'il y retire, comme nous dirons tantost. Par où il appert que ce n'est par vray discours, mais par vne fierté folle et opiniastreté, que nous nous preferons aux autres animaux, et nous sequestrons de leur condition et societé.

ENGLISH

they could have exchanged their wisdom for health, and by that bargain rid themselves, the one of dropsy, the other of the lice disease that afflicted him, they would have done well. In this they set an even higher value on wisdom, by comparing it and weighing it against health, than they do in another proposition that is also theirs. They say that if Circe had offered Ulysses two potions, one to make a man wise instead of foolish, the other foolish instead of wise, Ulysses ought rather to have accepted the potion of folly than consent to Circe's changing his human shape into that of a beast.

And they say that wisdom herself would have spoken to him thus: "Leave me, let me go, rather than lodge me in the shape and body of an ass." What? So the philosophers abandon this great and divine wisdom for the sake of this bodily and earthly veil? Then it is no longer by reason, by reasoning and by the soul that we excel the beasts. It is by our beauty, our fair complexion and the fine arrangement of our limbs, for which we must throw away our intelligence, our prudence and all the rest. Well, I accept this natural and frank confession. Surely they recognized that those qualities we make such a fuss about are nothing but empty fancy.

So even if the beasts had all the virtue, knowledge, wisdom and competence of the Stoics, they would still be beasts, and could not be compared with a wretched, wicked and senseless man. For in the end, whatever is not as we are is worth nothing. And God himself, to be esteemed, must resemble us, as we shall say presently. From which it is plain that it is not by true reasoning but by a foolish pride and obstinacy that we prefer ourselves to the other animals and set ourselves apart from their condition and company.

WHAT REASON COSTS US

Our share is passions, anxieties and vices, and learning eases none of them.

FRENCH

2.12.87 Mais pour reuenir à mon propos, nous auons pour nostre part, l'inconstance, l'irresolution, l'incertitude, le deuil, la superstition, la solicitude des choses à venir, voire apres nostre vie, l'ambition, l'auarice, la ialousie, l'enuie,

ENGLISH

But to return to my subject: we have for our share inconstancy, irresolution, uncertainty, grief, superstition, anxiety about things to come, even after our life, ambition, avarice, jealousy, envy, 59 Ovid, Remedies of Love.

FRENCH

les appetits desreglez, forcenez et indomptables, la guerre, la mensonge, la desloyauté, la detraction, et la curiosité. Certes nous auons estrangement surpayé ce beau discours, dequoy nous nous glorifions, et cette capacité de iuger et cognoistre, si nous l'auons achetée au prix de ce nombre infiny des passions, ausquelles nous sommes incessamment en prinse.

S'il ne nous plaist de faire encore valoir, comme fait bien Socrates, cette notable prerogatiue sur les bestes, que où Nature leur a prescript certaines saisons et limites à la volupté Venerienne, elle nous en a lasché la bride à toutes heures et occasions. Vt vinum ægrotis, quia prodest rarò, nocet sæpissime, melius est non adhibere omnino, quàm, spe dubiæ salutis, in apertam perniciem incurrere: Sic, haud scio, an melius fuerit humano generi motum istum celerem cogitationis, acumen, solertiam, quam rationem vocamus, quoniam pestifera sint multis, admodum paucis salutaria, non dari omnino, quàm tam munificè et tam largè dari. De quel fruit pouuons nous estimer auoir esté à Varro et Aristote, cette intelligence de tant de choses? Les a elle exemptez des incommoditez humaines?

ont-ils esté deschargez des accidents qui pressent vn crocheteur? ont ils tiré de la logique quelque consolation à la goute? pour auoir sçeu comme cette humeur se loge aux iointures, l'en ont ils moins sentie? sont ils entrez en composition de la mort, pour sçauoir qu'aucunes nations s'en resiouissent: et du cocuage, pour sçauoir les femmes estre communes en quelque region? Au rebours, ayans tenu le premier rang en sçauoir, l'vn entre les Romains, l'autre, entre les Grecs, et en la saison où la science fleurissoit le plus, nous n'auons pas pourtant appris qu'ils ayent eu aucune particuliere excellence en leur vie: voire le Grec a assez affaire à se descharger d'aucunes tasches notables en la sienne.

A on trouué que la volupté et la santé soyent plus sauoureuses à celuy qui sçait l'astrologie, et la grammaire: Illiterati num minus nerui rigent? et la honte et pauureté moins importunes? Scilicet et morbis et debilitate carebis,
Et luctum et curam effugies, et tempora vitæ
Longa tibi post hæc facto meliore dabuntur.

2.12.88

ENGLISH

unruly, frenzied and untamable appetites, war, lying, disloyalty, slander and curiosity. Truly, we have paid a strangely excessive price for this fine reasoning we glory in, and this capacity to judge and know, if we have bought it at the cost of this infinite number of passions that constantly have us in their grip.

Unless we also choose to make much, as Socrates indeed does, of this notable prerogative over the beasts: whereas Nature has prescribed certain seasons and limits for them in the pleasures of Venus, she has given us free rein at all hours and on all occasions. As with wine for the sick: since it seldom helps and very often harms, it is better not to give it at all than, in the hope of a doubtful recovery, to run into certain ruin. So I do not know whether it would not have been better for the human race that this swift movement of thought, this sharpness, this ingenuity that we call reason, should not have been given at all, since it is pernicious to many and wholesome to very few, rather than given so bountifully and so lavishly. What fruit can we suppose that their understanding of so many things brought Varro and Aristotle? Did it exempt them from human troubles?[60]

Were they relieved of the mishaps that weigh on a porter? Did they draw from logic any consolation for the gout? For knowing how that humor lodges in the joints, did they feel it any less? Did they come to terms with death because they knew that some nations rejoice in it, or with cuckoldry because they knew that in some region wives are held in common? On the contrary: the one held first rank in learning among the Romans, the other among the Greeks, and at the time when learning flourished most. Yet we have not heard that they had any particular excellence in their lives; indeed the Greek has his work cut out clearing himself of certain notable stains on his.

Has anyone found that pleasure and health taste better to the man who knows astrology and grammar? Are the sinews of the unlettered any less stiff? Or that shame and poverty are less troublesome? No doubt you will be free of sickness and frailty, you will escape grief and care, and a long span of life will be granted you hereafter under a better fate.[61]

60 Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods.
61 Horace, Epodes; then Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH

I'ay veu en mon temps, cent artisans, cent laboureurs, plus sages et plus heureux que des recteurs de l'vniuersité: et lesquels i'aimerois mieux ressembler. La doctrine, ce m'est aduis, tient rang entre les choses necessaires à la vie, comme la gloire, la noblesse, la dignité, ou pour le plus comme la richesse, et telles autres qualitez qui y seruent voyrement, mais de loing, et plus par fantasie que par nature. Il ne nous faut guere non plus d'offices, de regles, et de loix de viure, en nostre communauté, qu'il en faut aux grues et formis en la leur. Et neantmoins nous voyons qu'elles s'y conduisent tres ordonnément, sans erudition.

Si l'homme estoit sage, il prendroit le vray prix de chasque chose, selon qu'elle seroit la plus vtile et propre à sa vie. Qui nous contera par nos actions et deportemens, il s'en trouuera plus grand nombre d'excellens entre les ignorans, qu'entre les sçauans; ie dy en toute sorte de vertu. La vieille Rome me semble en auoir bien porté de plus grande valeur, et pour la paix, et pour la guerre, que cette Rome sçauante, qui se ruina soy-mesme. Quand le demeurant seroit tout pareil, aumoins la preud'hommie et l'innocence demeureroient du costé de l'ancienne: car elle loge singulierement bien auec la simplicité. Mais ie laisse ce discours, qui me tireroit plus loing, que ie ne voudrois suyure.

I'en diray seulement encore cela, que c'est la seule humilité et submission, qui peut effectuer vn homme de bien. Il ne faut pas laisser au iugement de chacun la cognoissance de son deuoir: il le luy faut prescrire, non pas le laisser choisir à son discours: autrement selon l'imbecillité et varieté infinie de nos raisons et opinions, nous nous forgerions en fin des deuoirs, qui nous mettroient à nous manger les vns les autres, comme dit Epicurus.

2.12.89 La premiere loy, que Dieu donna iamais à l'homme, ce fut vne loy de pure obeyssance: ce fut vn commandement, nud et simple où l'homme n'eust rien à cognoistre et à causer, d'autant que l'obeyr est le propre office d'vne ame raisonnable, recognoissant vn celeste, superieur et bienfacteur. De l'obeyr et ceder naist toute autre vertu, comme du cuider, tout peché. Et au rebours: la premiere tentation qui vint à l'humaine nature de la part du diable, sa premiere poison, s'insinua en nous, par les promesses qu'il nous fit de science et de cognoissance, Eritis sicut dij, scientes bonum et malum. Et les Sereines, pour piper Vlysse en Homere, et l'attirer en leurs dangereux et ruineux laqs, luy offrent en don la science.

ENGLISH

In my time I have seen a hundred craftsmen, a hundred plowmen, wiser and happier than university rectors, and whom I would rather resemble. Learning, in my view, ranks among the things necessary to life in the way that glory, nobility and rank do, or at most wealth, and other such qualities. They do serve life, but from a distance, and more in fancy than by nature. We need hardly more offices, rules and laws of living in our community than cranes and ants need in theirs. And yet we see that they conduct themselves in a very orderly way without any erudition.

If man were wise, he would set the true value on each thing according to how useful and suited it was to his life. If we are counted by our actions and conduct, a greater number of excellent men will be found among the ignorant than among the learned—I mean in every kind of virtue. Old Rome seems to me to have produced men of far greater worth, both for peace and for war, than that learned Rome which ruined itself. Even if all the rest were equal, at least integrity and innocence would remain on the side of the old Rome, for integrity dwells singularly well with simplicity. But I leave this subject, which would draw me further than I would care to follow.

I will say only this further: it is humility and submission alone that can make a good man. We must not leave the knowledge of his duty to each man's judgment. It must be prescribed to him, not left to the choice of his reasoning. Otherwise, given the weakness and infinite variety of our reasons and opinions, we would end by forging ourselves duties that would set us to eating one another, as Epicurus says.

The first law that God ever gave to man was a law of pure obedience. It was a bare and simple commandment, in which man had nothing to understand or to argue about, since obeying is the proper function of a rational soul that recognizes a heavenly superior and benefactor. From obeying and yielding springs every other virtue, as from presumption springs every sin. Conversely, the first temptation that came to human nature from the devil, his first poison, worked its way into us through the promises he made us of knowledge and understanding: You shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And the Sirens, to trick Ulysses in

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Homer and lure him into their dangerous and ruinous snares, offer him knowledge as a gift.[62]

La peste de l'homme c'est l'opinion de sçauoir. Voyla pourquoy l'ignorance nous est tant recommandée par nostre religion, comme piece propre à la creance et à l'obeyssance. Cauete, ne quis vos decipiat per philosophiam et inanes seductiones, secundum elementa mundi. En cecy y a il vne generalle conuenance entre tous les philosophes de toutes sectes, que le souuerain bien consiste en la tranquillité de l'ame et du corps. Mais où la trouuons nous? Ad summum sapiens vno minor est Ioue: diues,
Liber, honoratus, pulcher, rex denique regum:
Præcipuè sanus, nisi cùm pituita molesta est.

Man's plague is the opinion that he knows. That is why our religion so commends ignorance to us, as something suited to belief and obedience. Beware lest any man deceive you through philosophy and vain seductions, according to the elements of the world. On one point there is general agreement among all philosophers of all schools: the sovereign good consists in tranquillity of soul and body. But where do we find it? In short, the wise man is inferior only to Jupiter: rich, free, honored, handsome, in a word king of kings;
above all healthy—except when he is plagued by phlegm.[63]

2.12.90 Il semble à la verité, que Nature, pour la consolation de nostre estat miserable et chetif, ne nous ait donné en partage que la presumption. C'est ce que dit Epictete, que l'homme n'a rien proprement sien, que l'vsage de ses opinions. Nous n'auons que du vent et de la fumée en partage. Les Dieux ont la santé en essence, dit la philosophie, et la maladie en intelligence: l'homme au rebours, possede ses biens par fantasie, les maux en essence. Nous auons eu raison de faire valoir les forces de nostre imagination: car tous nos biens ne sont qu'en songe.

It seems indeed that Nature, to console us in our wretched and puny state, has given us nothing for our share but presumption. That is what Epictetus says: man has nothing properly his own but the use of his opinions. We have nothing but wind and smoke for our share. The gods have health in essence, says philosophy, and sickness only in understanding. Man, on the contrary, possesses his goods in fancy and his ills in essence. We have been right to make much of the powers of our imagination, for all our goods exist only in dreams.

2.12.91 Oyez brauer ce pauure et calamiteux animal. Il n'est rien, dit Cicero, si doux que l'occupation des lettres: de ces lettres, dis-ie, par le moyen desquelles l'infinité des choses, l'immense grandeur de Nature, les cieux en ce monde mesme, et les terres, et les mers nous sont descouuertes: ce sont elles qui nous ont appris la religion, la moderation, la grandeur de courage: et qui ont arraché nostre ame des tenebres, pour luy faire voir toutes choses hautes, basses, premieres, dernieres, et moyennes: ce sont elles qui nous fournissent dequoy bien et heureusement viure, et nous guident à passer nostre aage sans desplaisir et sans offence. Cestuy-cy ne semble il pas parler de la condition de Dieu tout-viuant et tout-puissant?

Listen to this poor, calamitous animal boasting. "Nothing," says Cicero, "is so sweet as the pursuit of letters—of those letters, I mean, by means of which the infinity of things, the immense grandeur of Nature, the heavens in this very world, and the lands and the seas are revealed to us. It is they that have taught us religion, moderation, greatness of courage. They have snatched our soul from the darkness to let it see all things, high, low, first, last and in between. It is they that furnish us with the means to live well and happily, and guide us to pass our lives without displeasure and without offense." Does this man not seem to be speaking of the condition of the ever-living and almighty God?

Et quant à l'effect, mille femmelettes ont vescu au village vne vie plus equable, plus douce, et plus constante, que ne fut la sienne. Deus ille fuit Deus, inclute Memmi,
Qui princeps vitæ rationem inuenit eam, quæ

And as for the result, a thousand simple village women have lived a more even, gentler and steadier life than his was. He was a god, a god, illustrious Memmius, 62 Genesis 3:5. In the Odyssey (Book XII) the Sirens promise that whoever listens to them will leave knowing more.

63 Saint Paul, Colossians 2:8; then Horace, Epistles I.1.

FRENCH

Nunc appellatur Sapientia, quique per artem
Fluctibus è tantis vitam tantisque tenebris,
In tam tranquillo et tam clara luce locauit. Voyla des paroles tresmagnifiques et belles: mais vn bien leger accident, mit l'entendement de cestuy-cy en pire estat, que celuy du moindre berger: nonobstant ce Dieu precepteur et cette diuine sapience. De mesme impudence est cette promesse du liure de Democritus: Ie m'en vay parler de toutes choses.

Et ce sot tiltre qu'Aristote nous preste, de Dieux mortels: et ce iugement de Chrysippus, que Dion estoit aussi vertueux que Dieu. Et mon Seneca recognoist, dit-il, que Dieu luy a donné le viure: mais qu'il a de soy le bien viure. Conformément à cet autre, In virtute verè gloriamur: quod non contingeret, si id donum à Deo non à nobis haberemus. Cecy est aussi de Seneca: Que le sage a la fortitude pareille à Dieu: mais en l'humaine foiblesse, par où il le surmonte. Il n'est rien si ordinaire que de rencontrer des traicts de pareille temerité.

Il n'y a aucun de nous qui s'offence tant de se voir apparier à Dieu, comme il fait de se voir deprimer au rang des autres animaux: tant nous sommes plus ialoux de nostre interest, que de celuy de nostre createur.

2.12.92 Mais il faut mettre aux pieds cette sotte vanité, et secouër viuement et hardiment les fondemens ridicules, sur quoy ces fausses opinions se bastissent. Tant qu'il pensera auoir quelque moyen et quelque force de soy, iamais l'homme ne recognoistra ce qu'il doit à son maistre: il fera tousiours de ses œufs poulles, comme on dit: il le faut mettre en chemise. Voyons quelque notable exemple de l'effect de sa philosophie. Possidonius estant pressé d'vne si douloureuse maladie, qu'elle luy faisoit tordre les bras, et grincer les dents, pensoit bien faire la figue à la douleur pour s'escrier contre elle: Tu as beau faire, si ne diray-ie pas que tu sois mal.

Il sent mesmes passions que mon laquays, mais il se braue sur ce qu'il contient aumoins sa langue sous les loix de sa secte. Re succumbere non oportebat verbis gloriantem. Archesilas estant malade de la goutte, Carneades qui le vint visiter, s'en retournoit tout fasché: il le rappella, et who first discovered that rule of life which is now called Wisdom, and who by his skill from such great storms and such great darkness set life in so calm and so clear a light. Those are very magnificent and fine words. But a very slight accident put the understanding of this man in a worse state than that of the lowliest shepherd, for all his divine teacher and his divine wisdom. Of the same impudence is the promise in Democritus's book: "I am going to speak of all things."[64]

ENGLISH

And that foolish title Aristotle lends us, of "mortal gods"; and that judgment of Chrysippus, that Dion was as virtuous as God. And my Seneca acknowledges, he says, that God gave him life, but that living well he has from himself. In keeping with that other one: We rightly glory in virtue, which would not be the case if we had it as a gift from God and not from ourselves. This too is from Seneca: the wise man has fortitude equal to God's, but in the midst of human weakness, and in that he surpasses him. There is nothing more common than to come across strokes of similar rashness.

There is not one of us who is as offended at seeing himself matched with God as he is at seeing himself lowered to the rank of the other animals: so much more jealous are we of our own interest than of our creator's.

But we must trample this foolish vanity underfoot, and shake boldly and vigorously the ridiculous foundations on which these false opinions are built. As long as he thinks he has some means and some power of his own, man will never recognize what he owes to his master. He will always be counting his eggs as hens, as the saying goes. He must be stripped down to his shirt. Let us look at some notable example of the effect of his philosophy. Posidonius was gripped by an illness so painful that it made him twist his arms and grind his teeth. He thought he was thumbing his nose at the pain by crying out against it: "Do your worst, still I will not say that you are an evil."

He feels the same sufferings as my lackey, but he prides himself on at least keeping his tongue within the laws of his school. He who boasted in words ought not to have given way in deeds. When Arcesilaus was ill with gout, Carneades, who had 64 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things V, praising Epicurus. Tradition held that Lucretius was driven mad by a love potion.

FRENCH

luy montrant ses pieds et sa poittrine: Il n'est rien venu de là icy, luy dit-il. Cestuy cy a vn peu meilleure grace: car il sent auoir du mal, et en voudroit estre depestré. Mais de ce mal pourtant son cœur n'en est pas abbatu et affoibly. L'autre se tient en sa roideur, plus, ce crains-ie, verbale qu'essentielle. Et Dionysius Heracleotes affligé d'vne cuison vehemente des yeux, fut rangé à quitter ces resolutions Stoïques.

ENGLISH

come to visit him, was going away much distressed. Arcesilaus called him back and, pointing to his feet and his chest, said: "Nothing has come from there to here." This one shows a little better grace, for he feels that he is in pain and would like to be rid of it; yet his heart is not cast down or weakened by that pain. The other holds to his stiffness, which is, I fear, more verbal than real. And Dionysius of Heraclea, afflicted with a violent burning in the eyes, was brought to give up those Stoic resolutions.

THE COMFORTS OF IGNORANCE

Simplicity spares pain better than philosophy, whose remedies end in ignorance and death.

FRENCH

2.12.93 Mais quand la science feroit par effect ce qu'ils disent, d'émousser et rabattre l'aigreur des infortunes qui nous suyuent, que fait elle, que ce que fait beaucoup plus purement l'ignorance et plus euidemment? Le philosophe Pyrrho courant en mer le hazard d'vne grande tourmente, ne presentoit à ceux qui estoyent auec luy à imiter que la securité d'vn porceau, qui voyageoit auecques eux, regardant cette tempeste sans effroy. La philosophie au bout de ses preceptes nous renuoye aux exemples d'vn athlete et d'vn muletier: ausquels on void ordinairement beaucoup moins de ressentiment de mort, de douleurs, et d'autres inconueniens, et plus de fermeté, que la science n'en fournit onques à aucun, qui n'y fust nay et preparé de soy-mesmes par habitude naturelle.

Qui fait qu'on incise et taille les tendres membres d'vn enfant et ceux d'vn cheual plus aisément que les nostres, si ce n'est l'ignorance? Combien en a rendu de malades la seule force de l'imagination? Nous en voyons ordinairement se faire saigner, purger, et medeciner pour guerir des maux qu'ils ne sentent qu'en leur discours. Lors que les vrais maux nous faillent, la science nous preste les siens: cette couleur et ce teint vous presagent quelque defluxion caterreuse: cette saison chaude vous menasse d'vne émotion fieureuse: cette coupeure de la ligne vitale de vostre main gauche, vous aduertit de quelque notable et voisine indisposition. Et en fin elle s'en addresse tout detroussément à la santé mesme.

Cette allegresse et vigueur de ieunesse, ne peut arrester en vne assiette, il luy faut desrober du sang et de la force, de peur qu'elle ne se tourne contre vous mesmes. Comparés la vie d'vn homme asseruy à telles imaginations, à celle d'vn laboureur, se laissant aller

ENGLISH

But even if learning did in fact do what they say, blunting and dulling the sharpness of the misfortunes that dog us, what does it do but what ignorance does much more purely and more evidently? The philosopher Pyrrho, caught at sea in a great storm, offered those who were with him nothing to imitate but the composure of a pig that was traveling with them, watching the tempest without fear. Philosophy, at the end of its precepts, sends us back to the examples of an athlete and a muleteer. In them we commonly see much less feeling of death, pain and other troubles, and more firmness, than learning ever supplied to anyone who was not born to it and prepared for it of himself by natural disposition.

What makes it easier to cut and carve the tender limbs of a child, or those of a horse, than ours, if not ignorance? How many has the mere power of imagination made ill? We commonly see people having themselves bled, purged and dosed to cure ills they feel only in their reasoning. When real ills fail us, learning lends us its own: this color and this complexion portend some catarrhal discharge; this hot season threatens you with a feverish attack; this break in the life line of your left hand warns you of some notable and imminent illness. And in the end it goes straight for health itself.

This liveliness and vigor of youth cannot stay settled; you must draw off some of its blood and strength, lest it turn against you. Compare the life of a man enslaved to such fancies with that of a plowman. The plowman follows his natural appetapres son appetit naturel, mesurant les choses au seul sentiment present, sans science et sans prognostique, qui n'a du mal que lors qu'il l'a: où l'autre a souuent la pierre en l'ame auant qu'il l'ait aux reins: comme s'il n'estoit point assez à temps pour souffrir le mal lors qu'il y sera, il l'anticipe par fantasie, et luy court au deuant.

FRENCH

2.12.94 Ce que ie dy de la medecine, se peut tirer par exemple generalement à toute science. De là est venuë cette ancienne opinion des philosophes, qui logeoient le souuerain bien à la recognoissance de la foiblesse de nostre iugement. Mon ignorance me preste autant d'occasion d'esperance que de crainte: et n'ayant autre regle de ma santé, que celle des exemples d'autruy, et des euenemens que ie vois ailleurs en pareille occasion, i'en trouue de toutes sortes: et m'arreste aux comparaisons, qui me sont plus fauorables.

Ie reçois la santé les bras ouuerts, libre, plaine, et entiere: et aiguise mon appetit à la iouïr, d'autant plus qu'elle m'est à present moins ordinaire et plus rare: tant s'en faut que ie trouble son repos et sa douceur, par l'amertume d'vne nouuelle et contrainte forme de viure.

2.12.95 Les bestes nous montrent assez combien l'agitation de nostre esprit nous apporte de maladies. Ce qu'on nous dit de ceux du Bresil, qu'ils ne mouroyent que de vieillesse, on l'attribue à la serenité et tranquillité de leur air, ie l'attribue plustost à la tranquillité et serenité de leur ame, deschargée de toute passion, pensée et occupation tendue ou desplaisante: comme gents qui passoyent leur vie en vne admirable simplicité et ignorance, sans lettres, sans loy, sans Roy, sans relligion quelconque.

2.12.96 Et d'où vient ce qu'on trouue par experience, que les plus grossiers et plus lourds sont plus fermes et plus desirables aux executions amoureuses? et que l'amour d'vn muletier se rend souuent plus acceptable, que celle d'vn gallant homme? sinon qu'en cettuy-cy l'agitation de l'ame trouble sa force corporelle, la rompt, et lasse: comme elle lasse aussi et trouble ordinairement soy-mesmes? Qui la desment, qui la iette plus coustumierement à la manie, que sa promptitude, sa pointe, son agilité, et en fin sa force propre? Dequoy se fait la plus subtile folie que de la plus subtile sagesse?

Comme des grandes amitiez naissent des grandes inimitiez, des santez vigoreuses les mortelles maladies:

ENGLISH

ite and measures things only by present sensation, without learning and without prognosis; he suffers only when he is ill. The other often has the stone in his soul before he has it in his kidneys. As if it were not soon enough to suffer the illness when it comes, he anticipates it in fancy and runs out to meet it.

What I say of medicine can be extended by way of example to every kind of learning. From this came that ancient opinion of the philosophers who placed the sovereign good in recognizing the weakness of our judgment. My ignorance gives me as much reason for hope as for fear. I have no other rule for my health than the examples of others and the outcomes I see elsewhere on similar occasions; I find some of every kind, and fix on the comparisons that are most favorable to me.

I welcome health with open arms, free, full and entire, and I sharpen my appetite to enjoy it, all the more because it is now less usual and rarer for me. So far am I from disturbing its rest and sweetness with the bitterness of a new and constrained way of life.

The beasts show us well enough how many illnesses the agitation of our mind brings us. We are told of the people of Brazil that they died only of old age, and this is attributed to the serenity and calm of their air. I attribute it rather to the calm and serenity of their souls, free of any passion and of any tense or unpleasant thought or occupation, as people who spent their lives in an admirable simplicity and ignorance, without letters, without law, without king, without any religion whatever.

And how else do we explain what experience shows, that the coarsest and dullest men are firmer and more desirable in the performance of love, and that a muleteer's love is often more welcome than a gentleman's? Is it not that in the gentleman the agitation of the soul disturbs his bodily strength, breaks it and wearies it, just as it also commonly wearies and disturbs itself? What unhinges the soul, what more often throws it into madness, than its own quickness, its keenness, its agility, in short its own strength? What is the subtlest folly made of, if not the subtlest wisdom?

Just as great enmities are born of great friendships, and mortal illnesses of vigorous health, so ainsi des rares et vifues agitations de noz ames, les plus excellentes manies, et plus detraquées: il n'y a qu'vn demy tour de cheuille à passer de l'vn à l'autre. Aux actions des hommes insensez, nous voyons combien proprement s'aduient la folie, auec les plus vigoureuses operations de nostre ame. Qui ne sçait combien est imperceptible le voisinage d'entre la folie auec les gaillardes eleuations d'vn esprit libre; et les effects d'vne vertu supreme et extraordinaire? Platon dit les melancholiques plus disciplinables et excellens: aussi n'en est-il point qui ayent tant de propension à la folie. Infinis esprits se treuuent ruinez par leur propre force et soupplesse.

FRENCH

Quel sault vient de prendre de sa propre agitation et allegresse, l'vn des plus iudicieux, ingenieux et plus formés à l'air de cette antique et pure poësie, qu'autre poëte Italien aye de long temps esté? N'a-t-il pas dequoy sçauoir gré à cette sienne viuacité meurtriere? à cette clarté qui l'a aueuglé? à cette exacte, et tendue apprehension de la raison, qui l'a mis sans raison? à la curieuse et laborieuse queste des sciences, qui l'a conduit à la bestise? à cette rare aptitude aux exercices de l'ame, qui l'a rendu sans exercice et sans ame?

I'eus plus de despit encore que de compassion, de le voir à Ferrare en si piteux estat suruiuant à soy-mesmes, mescognoissant et soy et ses ouurages; lesquels sans son sçeu, et toutesfois à sa veuë, on a mis en lumiere incorrigez et informes.

2.12.97 Voulez vous vn homme sain, le voulez vous reglé, et en ferme et seure posture? affublez le de tenebres d'oisiueté et de pesanteur. Il nous faut abestir pour nous assagir: et nous esblouir, pour nous guider.

Et si on me dit que la commodité d'auoir l'appetit froid et mousse aux douleurs et aux maux, tire apres soy cette incommodité, de nous rendre aussi par consequent moins aiguz et frians, à la iouyssance des biens et des plaisirs: cela est vray: mais la misere de nostre condition porte, que nous n'auons tant à iouyr qu'à fuir, et que l'extreme volupté ne nous touche pas comme vne legere douleur: Segnius homines bona quàm mala sentiunt: nous ne sentons point l'entiere santé, comme la moindre des maladies:

ENGLISH

from the rare and vivid agitations of our souls come the most remarkable and most deranged manias: it takes only half a turn of the peg to pass from the one to the other. In the actions of madmen we see how neatly folly fits in with the most vigorous operations of our soul. Who does not know how imperceptible is the borderline between folly and the lively flights of a free mind, and the effects of a supreme and extraordinary virtue? Plato says that melancholics are the most teachable and the most excellent; and indeed there are none so prone to madness. Countless minds are found ruined by their own strength and suppleness.

What a fall, through his own agitation and liveliness, has just been taken by one of the most judicious and ingenious of poets, more deeply formed in the manner of that ancient and pure poetry than any other Italian poet has been for a long time! Has he not good reason to be grateful to that murderous liveliness of his? to that brightness which has blinded him? to that exact and intense grasp of reason which has left him without reason? to that curious and laborious quest for knowledge which has led him to stupidity? to that rare aptitude for the exercises of the mind, which has left him with no exercise and no mind?[65]

I felt even more vexation than pity at seeing him in Ferrara in so pitiful a state, outliving himself, not knowing himself or his works. Without his knowledge and yet before his eyes, they have been published uncorrected and unshaped.

Do you want a man healthy? Do you want him orderly, in a firm and steady posture? Wrap him in the darkness of idleness and dullness. We must be stupefied to be made wise, and blinded to be guided.

Someone may tell me that the advantage of having a cold and blunted sensibility to pains and ills brings with it a disadvantage: it also makes us, in consequence, less keen and eager in the enjoyment of goods and pleasures. That is true. But the wretchedness of our condition is such that we have less to enjoy than to flee, and the greatest pleasure does not touch us as much as a slight 65 Torquato Tasso, confined as insane in the hospital of Sant'Anna at Ferrara from 1579 to 1586; Montaigne passed through Ferrara in 1580.

FRENCH

Pungit
In cute vix summa violatum plagula corpus,
Quando valere nihil quemquam mouet.

Hoc iuuat vnum,
Quòd me non torquet latus, aut pes: cætera quisquam
Vix queat aut sanum sese, aut sentire valentem. Nostre bien estre, ce n'est que la priuation d'estre mal. Voyla pourquoy la secte de philosophie, qui a le plus faict valoir la volupté, encore l'a elle rengée à la seule indolence. Le n'auoir point de mal, c'est le plus auoir de bien, que l'homme puisse esperer: comme disoit Ennius. Nimium boni est, cui nihil est mali.

2.12.98 Car ce mesme chatouillement et aiguisement, qui se rencontre en certains plaisirs, et semble nous enleuer au dessus de la santé simple, et de l'indolence; cette volupté actiue, mouuante, et ie ne sçay comment cuisante et mordante, celle là mesme, ne vise qu'à l'indolence, comme à son but. L'appetit qui nous rauit à l'accointance des femmes, il ne cherche qu'à chasser la peine que nous apporte le desir ardent et furieux, et ne demande qu'à l'assouuir, et se loger en repos, et en l'exemption de cette fieure. Ainsi des autres. Ie dy donc, que si la simplesse nous achemine à point n'auoir de mal, elle nous achemine à vn tres-heureux estat selon nostre condition.

Si ne la faut-il point imaginer si plombée, qu'elle soit du tout sans sentiment. Car Crantor auoit bien raison de combattre l'indolence d'Epicurus, si on la bastissoit si profonde que l'abort mesme et la naissance des maux en fust à dire. Ie ne louë point cette indolence qui n'est ny possible, ny desirable. Ie suis content de n'estre pas malade: mais si ie le suis, ie veux sçauoir que ie le suis, et si on me cauterise ou incise, ie le veux sentir. De vray, qui desracineroit la cognoissance du mal, il extirperoit quand et quand la cognoissance de la volupté, et en fin aneantiroit l'homme.

Istud nihil dolere, non sine magna mercede contingit immanitatis in animo, stuporis in corpore. Le mal est à l'homme bien à son tour. Ny la douleur ne luy est tousiours à fuïr, ny la volupté tousiours à suiure.

2.12.99

ENGLISH

pain. Men feel good things less keenly than bad. We do not feel perfect health as we feel the least of illnesses: We feel the sting when the body is hurt by a little wound that barely grazes the skin, while being well moves no one at all.[66]

This alone delights me:
that my side or my foot does not torment me; beyond that, one could hardly tell oneself to be sound or feel oneself to be well. Our well-being is nothing but the absence of being ill. That is why the school of philosophy that made the most of pleasure still reduced it to mere freedom from pain. To have no pain is to have the most good that man can hope for, as Ennius said: He has good aplenty who has nothing bad.

Consider the tickling and sharpening found in certain pleasures, which seems to lift us above simple health and freedom from pain. That active, moving pleasure, somehow burning and biting—even that aims only at freedom from pain as its goal. The appetite that carries us away into intimacy with women seeks only to drive out the torment brought on by ardent and furious desire. It asks only to satisfy it and come to rest, freed from that fever. And so with the others. I say, then, that if simplicity leads us to having no pain, it leads us to a very happy state, given our condition.

Yet we must not imagine it so leaden as to be wholly without feeling. Crantor was quite right to attack Epicurus's freedom from pain, if it were built so deep that even the approach and onset of ills were missing. I do not praise that freedom from pain which is neither possible nor desirable. I am content not to be ill; but if I am, I want to know that I am, and if I am cauterized or cut, I want to feel it. In truth, whoever rooted out the knowledge of pain would at the same time extirpate the knowledge of pleasure, and in the end annihilate man.

This freedom from all pain is not achieved without a great price: inhumanity in the mind, insensibility in the body. Pain, in its turn, is good for man. Neither is pain always to be fled, nor pleasure always to be pursued.

FRENCH

C'est vn tres-grand auantage pour l'honneur de l'ignorance, que la science mesme nous reiecte entre ses bras, quand elle se trouue empeschée à nous roidir contre la pesanteur des maux: elle est contrainte de venir à cette composition, de nous lascher la bride, et donner congé de nous sauuer en son giron, et nous mettre soubs sa faueur à l'abri des coups et iniures de la Fortune. Car que veut elle dire autre chose, quand elle nous presche de retirer notre pensée des maux qui nous tiennent, et l'entretenir des voluptez perdues; et de nous seruir pour consolation des maux presens, de la souuenance des biens passez, et d'appeller à nostre secours vn contentement esuanouy, pour l'opposer à ce qui nous presse?

Leuationes ægritudinum in auocatione à cogitanda molestia, et reuocatione ad contemplandas voluptates ponit, si ce n'est qu'où la force luy manque, elle veut vser de ruse, et donner vn tour de soupplesse et de iambe, où la vigueur du corps et des bras vient à luy faillir. Car non seulement à vn philosophe, mais simplement à vn homme rassis, quand il sent par effect l'alteration cuisante d'vne fieure chaude, quelle monnoye est-ce, de le payer de la souuenance de la douceur du vin Grec? Ce seroit plustost luy empirer son marché, Che ricordarsi il ben doppia la noia.

2.12.100 De mesme condition est cet autre conseil, que la Philosophie donne; de maintenir en la memoire seulement le bonheur passé, et d'en effacer les desplaisirs que nous auons soufferts; comme si nous auions en nostre pouuoir la science de l'oubly: et conseil duquel nous valons moins encore vn coup. Suauis est laborum præteritorum memoria. Comment? la Philosophie qui me doit mettre les armes à la main, pour combattre la Fortune; qui me doit roidir le courage pour fouller aux pieds toutes les aduersitez humaines, vient elle à cette mollesse, de me faire conniller par ces destours coüards et ridicules? Car la memoire nous represente, non pas ce que nous choisissons, mais ce qui luy plaist.

Voire il n'est rien qui imprime si viuement quelque chose en nostre souuenance, que le desir de l'oublier. C'est vne bonne maniere de donner en garde, et d'empreindre en nostre ame quelque chose, que de la solliciter de la perdre. Et cela est faulx, Est situm in nobis, vt et aduersa quasi perpetua obliuione obruamus, et secunda iucundè et suauiter meminerimus. Et cecy est vray, Memini etiam quæ

ENGLISH

It is a very great point in ignorance's honor that learning itself throws us back into its arms when it finds itself at a loss to stiffen us against the weight of our ills. Learning is forced to come to this compromise: to give us free rein, to allow us to take refuge in ignorance's lap and to shelter, under its protection, from the blows and injuries of Fortune. For what else does it mean when it preaches that we should withdraw our thoughts from the ills that grip us and occupy them with lost pleasures? Or that we should use the memory of past goods as consolation for present ills, and call to our aid a vanished contentment to set against what is pressing us?

He places the relief of distress in calling the mind away from thinking of its trouble and back to the contemplation of pleasures—unless it is that, where strength fails it, learning wants to use cunning, and to try a nimble trick and a trip of the leg where the vigor of body and arms fails it. Take not just a philosopher but simply a level-headed man, when he actually feels the burning disturbance of a high fever: what sort of coin is it to pay him with the memory of the sweetness of Greek wine? It would rather make his bargain worse: For remembering good doubles the pain.[67]

Of the same kind is that other counsel Philosophy gives: to keep in memory only past happiness and erase from it the displeasures we have suffered—as if we had the art of forgetting in our power; and a counsel that leaves us worse off yet again. The memory of past toils is sweet. What? Philosophy ought to put weapons in my hand to fight Fortune; it ought to stiffen my courage to trample underfoot all human adversities. Does it sink to such softness as to make me dodge like a rabbit through these cowardly and ridiculous byways? For memory presents to us not what we choose, but what it pleases.

Indeed, nothing imprints something so vividly on our memory as the desire to forget it. A good way to entrust something to our soul's keeping and stamp it there is to urge the soul to lose it. And this is false: It is in our power to bury adversity in an almost perpetual oblivion, and to remember prosperity pleasantly and sweetly. And this is true: I remember

66 Livy; then Latin verses by Étienne de La Boétie, Montaigne's friend.
67 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, on Epicurus.

FRENCH

nolo: obliuisci non possum quæ volo. Et de qui est ce conseil? de celuy, qui se vnus sapientem profiteri sit ausus: Qui genus humanum ingenio superauit, et omnes / Præstrinxit stellas, exortus vti ætherius sol. De vuider et desmunir la memoire, est-ce pas le vray et propre chemin à l'ignorance?

Iners malorum remedium ignorantia est. Nous voyons plusieurs pareils preceptes, par lesquels on nous permet d'emprunter du vulgaire des apparences friuoles, où la raison viue et forte ne peut assez: pourueu qu'elles nous seruent de contentement et de consolation. Où ils ne peuuent guérir la playe, ils sont contents de l'endormir et pallier. Ie croy qu'ils ne me nieront pas cecy, que s'ils pouuoyent adiouster de l'ordre, et de la constance, en vn estat de vie, qui se maintinst en plaisir et en tranquillité par quelque foiblesse et maladie de iugement, qu'ils ne l'acceptassent: Potare, et spargere flores / Incipiam, patiárque vel inconsultus haberi. Il se trouueroit plusieurs philosophes de l'aduis de Lycas.

Cettuy-cy ayant au demeurant ses mœurs bien reglées, viuant doucement et paisiblement en sa famille, ne manquant à nul office de son deuoir envers les siens et estrangers, se conseruant tresbien des choses nuisibles, s'estoit par quelque alteration de sens imprimé en la ceruelle vne resuerie. C'est qu'il pensoit estre perpetuellement aux theatres à y voir des passetemps, des spectacles, et des plus belles comedies du monde. Guery qu'il fut par les medecins, de cette humeur peccante, à peine qu'il ne les mist en procés pour le restablir en la douceur de ces imaginations. Pol!

me occidistis, amici,
Non seruastis, ait; cui sic extorta voluptas,
Et demptus per vim mentis gratissimus error. D'vne pareille resuerie à celle de Thrasylaus, fils de Pythodorus, qui se faisoit à croire que tous les nauires qui relaschoient du port de Pyrée, et y abordoient, ne trauailloyent que pour son seruice: se resiouyssant de la bonne fortune de leur nauigation, les recueillant auec ioye. Son frere Crito l'ayant faict remettre en son meilleur sens, il regrettoit cette sorte de condition, en laquelle il auoit vescu en liesse, et deschargé de tout desplaisir.

ENGLISH

even what I would rather not; I cannot forget what I would. And whose counsel is this? His who alone dared to proclaim himself wise: Who surpassed the human race in genius, and outshone / all the stars, as the sun risen in the sky. Is not emptying and stripping the memory the true and proper road to ignorance?[68]

Ignorance is a sluggish remedy for ills. We see several similar precepts by which we are allowed to borrow frivolous appearances from the common people where lively, strong reason does not suffice, provided they serve us for contentment and consolation. Where they cannot heal the wound, they are content to numb it and dress it over. I believe they will not deny me this: if they could add order and constancy to a state of life kept in pleasure and tranquillity through some weakness and sickness of judgment, they would accept it. I shall begin to drink and scatter flowers, / and even put up with being thought reckless. There would be many philosophers of Lycas's opinion.[69]

This man was otherwise well-regulated in his ways, living gently and peaceably in his household, failing in no duty toward his own people or toward strangers, and guarding himself very well against harmful things. Yet through some disorder of the senses he had got a delusion fixed in his brain: he thought he was perpetually at the theater watching entertainments, spectacles and the finest comedies in the world. When the doctors had cured him of this morbid humor, he very nearly sued them to be restored to the sweetness of those fancies. Good heavens!

you have killed me, my friends, not saved me, he said; you have wrenched my pleasure from me and taken away by force my mind's most delightful illusion. His was a delusion like that of Thrasylaus, son of Pythodorus, who made himself believe that all the ships that put out from the port of Piraeus and came into it were working only for his service. He rejoiced in the good fortune of their voyages and welcomed them with joy. When his brother Crito had him restored to his better senses, he missed that condition in which he had lived in gladness, free of all displeasure.

68 Epicurus, as described by Cicero and by Lucretius.
69 Seneca, Oedipus; then Horace, Epistles I.5. Horace tells the story that follows in Epistles II.2.

FRENCH

C'est ce que dit ce vers ancien Grec, qu'il y a beaucoup de commodité à n'estre pas si aduisé: Εν τω φρονειν γαρ μηδεν, ήδιστος βιος Et l'Ecclesiaste; En beaucoup de sagesse, beaucoup de desplaisir: et, Qui acquiert science, s'acquiert du trauail et tourment.

2.12.101 Cela mesme, à quoy la Philosophie consent en general, cette derniere recepte qu'elle ordonne à toute sorte de necessitez, qui est de mettre fin à la vie, que nous ne pouuons supporter: Placet? pare. Non placet? quacumque vis exi. Pungit dolor? vel fodiat sanè? si nudus es, da iugulum: sin tectus armis Vulcanijs, id est fortitudine, resiste: et ce mot des Grecs conuiues qu'ils y appliquent, Aut bibat, aut abeat: qui sonne plus sortablement en la langue d'vn Gascon, qu'en celle de Ciceron, qui change volontiers en V. le B: Viuere si rectè nescis, decede peritis.

/ Lusisti satis, edisti satis, atque bibisti:
Tempus abire tibi est, ne potum largius æquo
Rideat, et pulset lasciua decentius ætas. qu'est-ce autre chose qu'vne confession de son impuissance; et vn renuoy, non seulement à l'ignorance, pour y estre à couuert, mais à la stupidité mesme, au non sentir, et au non estre?

Democritum postquàm matura vetustas
Admonuit memorem, motus languescere mentis:
Sponte sua letho caput obuius obtulit ipse. C'est ce que disoit Antisthenes, qu'il falloit faire prouision ou de sens pour entendre, ou de licol pour se pendre: et ce que Chrysippus alleguoit sur ce propos du poëte Tyrtæus, De la vertu, ou de mort approcher. Et Crates disoit, que l'amour se guerissoit par la faim, sinon par le temps: et à qui ces deux moyens ne plairoyent, par la hart. Celuy Sextius, duquel Seneque et Plutarque parlent auec si grande recommandation, s'estant ietté, toutes choses laissées, à l'estude de la philosophie, delibera de se precipiter en la mer, voyant le progrez de ses estudes trop tardif et trop long.

ENGLISH

That is what this ancient Greek line says, that there is great advantage in not being so wise: For life is sweetest when one knows nothing. And Ecclesiastes: "In much wisdom is much grief"; and "He who acquires knowledge acquires toil and torment."[70]

That very thing to which Philosophy generally consents, the last remedy it prescribes for every kind of necessity, which is to put an end to the life we cannot bear: Does it please you? Bear it. Does it not? Leave by whatever way you like. Does pain sting you? Or even pierce you through? If you are naked, offer your throat; but if you are covered by the arms of Vulcan, that is, by fortitude, resist. And that saying of the Greek drinking companions which they apply to it, Let him drink or let him leave—which sounds more apt on a Gascon's tongue than on Cicero's, since a Gascon readily changes B into V: If you do not know how to live rightly, make way for those who do.[71]

/ You have played enough, eaten enough and drunk enough:
it is time for you to leave, lest, having drunk more than your share, you be laughed at and jostled by an age to which wantonness is more becoming. What is all this but a confession of Philosophy's impotence, and a referral not only to ignorance, to be sheltered there, but to stupidity itself, to not feeling and to not being?[72]

When ripe old age had warned Democritus that the motions of his mind were growing feeble, he went of his own accord to meet death and offered it his head. That is what Antisthenes said: one must lay in a supply either of sense to understand or of a halter to hang oneself. And Chrysippus cited on this subject the poet Tyrtaeus: Either to virtue or to death draw near. And Crates said that love was cured by hunger, or else by time, and for those who liked neither of these remedies, by the rope. That Sextius of whom Seneca and Plutarch speak with such high praise had left everything else and thrown himself into the study of philosophy. Seeing the progress of his studies too slow and too long, he resolved to throw himself into the sea.

70 Sophocles, Ajax; Ecclesiastes 1:18.
71 Gascons confused b and v, so bibat ("let him drink") could become vivat ("let him live"): "let him live or let him leave."
72 Horace, Epistles II.2.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Il couroit à la mort, au deffault de la science. Voicy les mots de la loy, sur ce subject: Si d'auenture il suruient quelque grand inconuenient qui ne se puisse remedier, le port est prochain: et se peut-on sauuer à nage, hors du corps, comme hors d'vn esquif qui faict eau: car c'est la crainte de mourir, non pas le desir de viure, qui tient le fol attaché au corps.	He was running to death for lack of knowledge. Here are the words of the law on this subject: "If by chance some great trouble befalls that cannot be remedied, the harbor is near, and one may save oneself by swimming out of the body as out of a leaking skiff; for it is the fear of dying, not the desire to live, that keeps the fool attached to the body."
2.12.102 Comme la vie se rend par la simplicité plus plaisante, elle s'en rend aussi plus innocente et meilleure, comme ie commençois tantost à dire. Les simples, dit S. Paul, et les ignorans, s'esleuent et se saisissent du ciel; et nous, à tout nostre sçauoir, nous plongeons aux abismes infernaux.	As life becomes pleasanter through simplicity, so it also becomes more innocent and better, as I was beginning to say a while ago. The simple and the ignorant, says Saint Paul, rise up and take hold of heaven; and we, with all our learning, plunge into the abysses of hell.[73]
Ie ne m'arreste ny à Valentian, ennemy declaré de la science et des lettres, ny à Licinius, tous deux Empereurs Romains, qui les nommoient le venin et la peste de tout estat politique: ny à Mahumet, qui, comme i'ay entendu, interdict la science à ses hommes: mais l'exemple de ce grand Lycurgus et son authorité doit certes auoir grand poix, et la reuerence de cette diuine police Lacedemonienne, si grande, si admirable, et si long temps fleurissante en vertu et en bon heur, sans aucune institution ny exercice de lettres.	I do not dwell on Valentinian, a declared enemy of learning and letters, nor on Licinius, both Roman emperors, who called them the poison and plague of every body politic; nor on Muhammad, who, as I have heard, forbade learning to his followers. But the example and authority of the great Lycurgus must certainly carry great weight. So must the reverence due to that divine Spartan government, so great, so admirable, and flourishing so long in virtue and happiness without any teaching or practice of letters.
2.12.103 Ceux qui reuiennent de ce monde nouueau qui a esté descouuert du temps de nos peres, par les Espagnols, nous peuuent tesmoigner combien ces nations, sans magistrat, et sans loy, viuent plus legitimement et plus reglément que les nostres, où il y a plus d'officiers et de loix, qu'il n'y a d'autres hommes, et qu'il n'y a d'actions. Di cittatorie piene e di libelli, D'esamine e di carte, di procure Hanno le mani e il seno, e gran fastelli Di chiose, di consigli e di letture, Per cui le facultà de pouerelli Non sono mai ne le citta sicure, Hanno dietro e dinanzi e d'ambi i lati, Notai, procuratori ed aduocati.	Those who come back from that new world discovered by the Spaniards in our fathers' time can testify to us how much more lawfully and orderly those nations live, without magistrate and without law, than ours. Here there are more officers and laws than there are other men, and than there are actions. With summonses and with writs, with examinations and papers and proxies their hands and bosoms are full, and great bundles of glosses, counsels and readings, through which the goods of poor folk are never safe in the cities; behind them, before them and on either side they have notaries, attorneys and advocates.[74]
2.12.104 C'estoit ce que disoit vn Senateur Romain des derniers siecles, que leurs predecesseurs auoyent l'aleine puante à l'ail, et l'estomach musqué de bonne conscience: et qu'au rebours, ceux de son temps ne sentoient au dehors que le parfum, puans au dedans à toute sorte de vices: c'est à dire, comme ie pense, qu'ils auoyent beaucoup de sçauoir	That is what a Roman senator of the later centuries said: their forebears had breath stinking of garlic and stomachs perfumed with the musk of a good conscience; those of his own time, on the contrary, smelled outwardly only of perfume,

73 The words are in fact Saint Augustine's (Confessions VIII.8).
74 Ariosto, Orlando Furioso XIV.

FRENCH

et de suffisance, et grand faute de preud'hommie. L'inciuilité, l'ignorance, la simplesse, la rudesse s'accompagnent volontiers de l'innocence: la curiosité, la subtilité, le sçauoir trainent la malice à leur suite: l'humilité, la crainte, l'obéissance, la debonnaireté, qui sont les pieces principales pour la conseruation de la societé humaine, demandent vne ame vuide, docile et presumant peu de soy.

2.12.105 Les Chrestiens ont vne particuliere cognoissance, combien la curiosité est vn mal naturel et originel en l'homme. Le soing de s'augmenter en sagesse et en science, ce fut la premiere ruine du genre humain; c'est la voye, par où il s'est precipité à la damnation eternelle. L'orgueil est sa perte et sa corruption: c'est l'orgueil qui iette l'homme à quartier des voyes communes, qui luy fait embrasser les nouuelletez, et aymer mieux estre chef d'vne trouppe errante, et desuoyée, au sentier de perdition, aymer mieux estre regent et precepteur d'erreur et de mensonge, que d'estre disciple en l'eschole de verité, se laissant mener et conduire par la main d'autruy, à la voye battuë et droicturiere.

C'est à l'aduanture ce que dit ce mot Grec ancien, que la superstition suit l'orgueil, et luy obeit comme à son pere: ἡ δεισιδαιμονια χαταπερ πατρι τω τυφω πειτεται. O cuider, combien tu nous empesches! Apres que Socrates fut aduerty, que le Dieu de sagesse luy auoit attribué le nom de Sage, il en fut estonné: et se recherchant et secouant par tout, n'y trouuoit aucun fondement à cette diuine sentence. Il en sçauoit de iustes, temperants, vaillants, sçauants comme luy: et plus eloquents, et plus beaux, et plus vtiles au païs.

En fin il se resolut, qu'il n'estoit distingué des autres, et n'estoit sage que par ce qu'il ne se tenoit pas tel: et que son Dieu estimoit bestise singuliere à l'homme, l'opinion de science et de sagesse: et que sa meilleure doctrine estoit la doctrine de l'ignorance, et la simplicité sa meilleure sagesse. La saincte Parole declare miserables ceux d'entre nous, qui s'estiment: Bourbe et cendre, leur dit-elle, qu'as-tu à te glorifier? et ailleurs, Dieu a faict l'homme semblable à l'ombre, de laquelle qui iugera, quand par l'esloignement de la lumiere elle sera esuanouye? Ce n'est rien que de nous.

ENGLISH

while within they stank of every kind of vice. That is to say, I think, that they had much learning and ability and a great lack of integrity. Want of polish, ignorance, simplicity and roughness readily keep company with innocence. Curiosity, subtlety and learning bring malice in their train. Humility, fear, obedience and gentleness, which are the chief elements for preserving human society, require a soul that is empty, docile and presuming little of itself.

Christians have a special knowledge of how natural and original an evil curiosity is in man. The urge to increase in wisdom and knowledge was the first ruin of the human race; it is the road by which it hurled itself into eternal damnation. Pride is its downfall and corruption. It is pride that drives man off the common roads and makes him embrace novelties. It makes him prefer to be the leader of a wandering band gone astray on the path of perdition, prefer to be master and teacher of error and falsehood, rather than a pupil in the school of truth, letting himself be led and guided by another's hand along the beaten and righteous road.

That is perhaps what the ancient Greek saying means, that superstition follows pride and obeys it as its father: Superstition obeys pride as a father. O presumption, how you hamper us! When Socrates was told that the god of wisdom had given him the name of Wise, he was stunned. Searching and shaking himself through and through, he could find no ground for this divine pronouncement. He knew men as just, temperate, valiant and learned as he, and more eloquent, handsomer and more useful to the country.

At last he concluded that he was distinguished from others, and was wise, only because he did not consider himself so; that his god regarded the opinion of knowledge and wisdom as a singular stupidity in man; and that his best teaching was the teaching of ignorance, and simplicity his best wisdom. Holy Scripture declares wretched those of us who think highly of themselves: "Mire and ashes," it says to them, "what have you to glory in?" And elsewhere: "God has made man like the shadow"—and who will judge of the shadow when, the light having gone, it has vanished? We are nothing at all.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.106 Il s'en faut tant que nos forces conçoiuent la haulteur diuine, que des ouurages de nostre createur, ceux-là portent mieux sa marque, et sont mieux siens, que nous entendons le moins. C'est aux Chrestiens vne occasion de croire, que de rencontrer vne chose incroyable. Elle est d'autant plus selon raison, qu'elle est contre l'humaine raison. Si elle estoit selon raison, ce ne seroit plus miracle; et si elle estoit selon quelque exemple, ce ne seroit plus chose singuliere. Melius scitur Deus nesciendo, dit S. Augustin. Et Tacitus, Sanctius est ac reuerentius de actis Deorum credere quàm scire. Et Platon estime qu'il y ayt quelque vice d'impieté à trop curieusement s'enquerir et de Dieu, et du monde, et des causes premieres des choses.

Our powers are so far from conceiving the divine loftiness that, of our creator's works, those that bear his mark best and are most his own are the ones we understand least. For Christians, coming upon something incredible is a reason to believe. It is all the more in accordance with reason for being against human reason. If it were in accordance with reason, it would no longer be a miracle; and if it followed some precedent, it would no longer be singular. God is better known by not knowing, says Saint Augustine. And Tacitus: It is holier and more reverent to believe in the deeds of the gods than to know them. And Plato holds that there is some taint of impiety in inquiring too curiously into God, the world and the first causes of things.

Atque illum quidem parentem huius vniuersitatis inuenire difficile: et, quum iam inueneris, indicare in vulgus, nefas, dit Ciceron. Nous disons bien puissance, verité, iustice: ce sont parolles qui signifient quelque chose de grand: mais cette chose là, nous ne la voyons aucunement, ny ne la conceuons. Nous disons que Dieu craint, que Dieu se courrouce, que Dieu ayme. Immortalia mortali sermone notantes. Ce sont toutes agitations et esmotions, qui ne peuuent loger en Dieu selon nostre forme, ny nous l'imaginer selon la sienne: c'est à Dieu seul de se cognoistre et interpreter ses ouurages: et le fait en nostre langue, improprement, pour s'aualler et descendre à nous, qui sommes à terre couchez.

To find the father of this universe is difficult; and when you have found him, to reveal him to the multitude is a sin, says Cicero. We do say power, truth, justice: these are words that signify something great; but that thing we do not see at all, nor conceive. We say that God fears, that God grows angry, that God loves. Marking immortal things with mortal words. These are all agitations and emotions that cannot dwell in God in our form, nor can we imagine him in his. It is for God alone to know himself and interpret his works. He does it in our language, improperly, to lower himself and come down to us, who lie prostrate on the ground.

La prudence comment luy peut elle conuenir, qui est l'eslite entre le bien et le mal: veu que nul mal ne le touche? Quoy la raison et l'intelligence, desquelles nous nous seruons pour par les choses obscures arriuer aux apparentes: veu qu'il n'y a rien d'obscur à Dieu? La iustice, qui distribue à chacun ce qui luy appartient, engendrée pour la société et communauté des hommes, comment est-elle en Dieu? La temperance, comment? qui est la moderation des voluptez corporelles, qui n'ont nulle place en la diuinité. La fortitude à porter la douleur, le labeur, les dangers, luy appartiennent aussi peu: ces trois choses n'ayans nul accés pres de luy. Parquoy Aristote le tient egallement exempt de vertu et de vice.

How can prudence suit him, prudence being the choice between good and evil, seeing that no evil touches him? What of reason and intelligence, which we use to arrive at what is plain by way of what is obscure, seeing that nothing is obscure to God? Justice, which gives each his due and was born for the society and community of men—how is it in God? And temperance, how? It is the moderation of bodily pleasures, which have no place in the divinity. Fortitude in bearing pain, toil and dangers belongs to him just as little, since those three things have no access to him. That is why Aristotle holds him equally exempt from virtue and from vice.

Neque gratia neque ira teneri potest, quòd quæ talia essent, imbecilla essent omnia.

He can be held by neither favor nor anger, for all such things would be marks of weakness.[75]

2.12.107 La participation que nous auons à la cognoissance de la verité, quelle qu'elle soit, ce n'est point par nos propres

Whatever share we have in the knowledge of truth, it is not by our own strength that we have 75 Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods.

FRENCH

forces que nous l'auons acquise. Dieu nous a assez appris cela par les tesmoings, qu'il a choisi du vulgaire, simples et ignorans, pour nous instruire de ses admirables secrets. Nostre foy ce n'est pas nostre acquest, c'est vn pur present de la liberalité d'autruy. Ce n'est pas par discours ou par nostre entendement que nous auons receu nostre religion, c'est par authorité et par commandement estranger. La foiblesse de nostre iugement nous y aide plus que la force, et nostre aueuglement plus que nostre clair-voyance. C'est par l'entremise de nostre ignorance, plus que de nostre science, que nous sommes sçauans de diuin sçauoir.

Ce n'est pas merueille, si nos moyens naturels et terrestres ne peuuent conceuoir cette cognoissance supernaturelle et celeste: apportons y seulement du nostre, l'obeissance et la subiection: car comme il est escrit; Ie destruiray la sapience des sages, et abbattray la prudence des prudens. Où est le sage? où est l'escriuain? où est le disputateur de ce siecle? Dieu n'a-il pas abesty la sapience de ce monde? Car puis que le monde n'a point cogneu Dieu par sapience, il luy a pleu par la vanité de la predication, sauuer les croyans.

ENGLISH

acquired it. God has taught us this plainly enough through the witnesses he chose from among the common people, simple and ignorant men, to instruct us in his wonderful secrets. Our faith is not something we have earned; it is a pure gift from another's generosity. It is not by reasoning or by our own understanding that we have received our religion; it is by outside authority and command. The weakness of our judgment helps us to it more than its strength, and our blindness more than our clear sight. It is through the agency of our ignorance, more than of our knowledge, that we are learned in divine learning.

It is no wonder if our natural, earthly means cannot grasp that supernatural, heavenly knowledge. Let us bring to it only what is ours: obedience and submission. For, as it is written: "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring down the prudence of the prudent. Where is the wise man? Where is the scribe? Where is the debater of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For since the world did not know God through wisdom, it pleased him to save those who believe through the foolishness of preaching."[76]

WHAT THE PHILOSOPHERS FOUND

After long inquiry the wisest learned only their own ignorance.

FRENCH

2.12.108 Si me faut-il voir en fin, s'il est en la puissance de l'homme de trouuer ce qu'il cherche: et si cette queste, qu'il a employé depuis tant de siecles, l'a enrichy de quelque nouuelle force, et de quelque verité solide. Ie croy qu'il me confessera, s'il parle en conscience, que tout l'acquest qu'il a retiré d'vne si longue poursuite, c'est d'auoir appris à recognoistre sa foiblesse. L'ignorance qui estoit naturellement en nous, nous l'auons par longue estude confirmée et auerée.

Il est aduenu aux gens veritablement sçauans, ce qui aduient aux espics de bled: ils vont s'esleuant et se haussant la teste droite et fiere, tant qu'ils sont vuides; mais quand ils sont pleins et grossis de grain en leur maturité, ils commencent à s'humilier et baisser les cornes. Pareillement les hommes, ayans tout essayé, tout sondé, et n'ayans trouué en cet amas de science et prouision de tant de choses diuerses, rien de massif et de

ENGLISH

Still, I must see at last whether it is in man's power to find what he is looking for, and whether this quest, on which he has spent so many centuries, has enriched him with some new strength and some solid truth. I think he will admit to me, if he speaks in good conscience, that all the gain he has drawn from so long a pursuit is to have learned to recognize his own weakness. The ignorance that was naturally in us we have, by long study, confirmed and verified.

What has happened to the truly learned is what happens to ears of wheat: they keep rising and lifting their heads, straight and proud, as long as they are empty; but when they are full and swollen with grain at their ripeness, they begin to humble themselves and lower their horns. In the same way men, having tried everything and sounded everything, and having found in that heap of 76 Saint Paul, 1 Corinthians 1:19–21, quoting Isaiah 29:14.

FRENCH

ferme, et rien que vanité, ils ont renoncé à leur presumption, et recogneu leur condition naturelle. C'est ce que Velleius reproche à Cotta, et à Cicero, qu'ils ont appris de Philo, n'auoir rien appris.

Pherecydes, l'vn des sept sages, escriuant à Thales, comme il expiroit, I'ay, dit-il, ordonné aux miens, apres qu'ils m'auront enterré, de te porter mes escrits. S'ils contentent et toy et les autres sages, publie les: sinon, supprime les. Ils ne contiennent nulle certitude qui me satisface à moy-mesme. Aussi ne fay-ie pas profession de sçauoir la verité, ny d'y atteindre. I'ouure les choses plus que ie ne les descouure. Le plus sage homme qui fut onques, quand on luy demanda ce qu'il sçauoit, respondit, qu'il sçauoit cela, qu'il ne sçauoit rien.

Il verifioit ce qu'on dit, que la plus grand part de ce que nous sçauons, est la moindre de celles que nous ignorons: c'est à dire, que ce mesme que nous pensons sçauoir, c'est vne piece, et bien petite, de nostre ignorance.

2.12.109 Nous sçauons les choses en songe, dit Platon, et les ignorons en verité. Omnes penè veteres, nihil cognosci, nihil percipi, nihil sciri posse dixerunt; angustos sensus, imbecilles animos, breuia curricula vitæ. Cicero mesme, qui deuoit au sçauoir tout son vaillant, Valerius dit que, sur sa vieillesse, il commença à desestimer les lettres. Et pendant qu'il les traictoit, c'estoit sans obligation d'aucun party: suiuant ce qui luy sembloit probable, tantost en l'vne secte, tantost en l'autre: se tenant tousiours soubs la dubitation de l'Academie. Dicendum est, sed ita vt nihil affirmem: quæram omnia, dubitans plerumque et mihi diffidens.

2.12.110 I'auroy trop beau ieu, si ie vouloy considerer l'homme en sa commune façon et en gros: et le pourroy faire pourtant par sa regle propre; qui iuge la verité non par le poids des voix, mais par le nombre. Laissons là le peuple, Qui vigilans stertit, / Mortua cui vita est propè iam viuo atque videnti, qui ne se sent point, qui ne se iuge point, qui laisse la plus part de ses facultez naturelles oisiues. Ie veux prendre l'homme en sa plus haulte assiette.

ENGLISH

knowledge and store of so many different things nothing solid and firm, nothing but vanity, have given up their presumption and recognized their natural condition. That is what Velleius reproaches Cotta and Cicero with: that they had learned from Philo that they had learned nothing.[77]

Pherecydes, one of the seven sages, writing to Thales as he was dying, said: "I have ordered my people, after they have buried me, to bring you my writings. If they satisfy you and the other sages, publish them; if not, suppress them. They contain no certainty that satisfies even me. Nor do I profess to know the truth, or to reach it. I open things up more than I uncover them." The wisest man who ever lived, when asked what he knew, answered that he knew this much: that he knew nothing.[78]

He was bearing out the saying that the greatest part of what we know is the least of the parts we do not know; that is to say, the very thing we think we know is a piece, and a very small one, of our ignorance.

We know things in a dream, says Plato, and are ignorant of them in reality. Almost all the ancients said that nothing can be known, nothing perceived, nothing understood; that the senses are narrow, minds weak, and the course of life short. As for Cicero himself, who owed all his worth to learning, Valerius says that in his old age he began to think little of letters. And while he was engaged with them, it was without allegiance to any party: he followed what seemed probable to him, now in one school, now in another, always keeping within the doubt of the Academy. I must speak, but in such a way as to affirm nothing; I will inquire into everything, mostly doubting and distrusting myself.

I would have too easy a game if I chose to consider man in his ordinary state and in the mass; and yet I could do it by his own rule, which judges truth not by the weight of the votes but by their number. Let us leave aside the people, Who snores while awake, / Whose life is all but dead while he still lives and sees, who does not feel himself, does not judge

77 Velleius and Cotta are speakers in Cicero's On the Nature of the Gods; Philo of Larissa, head of the Academy, was Cicero's teacher.
78 Pherecydes of Syros, Greek thinker of the 6th century BC. The wisest man is Socrates.

FRENCH

Considerons-le en ce petit nombre d'hommes excellens et triez, qui ayants esté douez d'vne belle et particuliere force naturelle, l'ont encore roidie et aiguisée par soin, par estude et par art, et l'ont montée au plus hault poinct de sagesse, où elle puisse atteindre. Ils ont manié leur ame à tout sens, et à tout biais, l'ont appuyée et estançonnée de tout le secours estranger, qui luy a esté propre, et enrichie et ornée de tout ce qu'ils ont peu emprunter pour sa commodité, du dedans et dehors du monde: c'est en eux que loge la haulteur extreme de l'humaine nature. Ils ont reglé le monde de polices et de loix.

Ils l'ont instruit par arts et sciences, et instruit encore par l'exemple de leurs mœurs admirables. Ie ne mettray en compte, que ces gens-là, leur tesmoignage, et leur experience. Voyons iusques où ils sont allez, et à quoy ils se sont tenus. Les maladies et les desfauts que nous trouuerons en ce college-là, le monde les pourra hardiment bien aduouër pour siens.

ENGLISH

himself, and leaves most of his natural faculties idle. I want to take man at his highest station.

Let us consider him in that small number of excellent, select men who, endowed with a fine and singular natural power, have further stiffened and sharpened it by care, study and skill, and raised it to the highest point of wisdom it can reach. They have handled their minds in every direction and from every angle; they have propped and shored them up with every outside aid that suited them, and enriched and adorned them with all they could borrow for their benefit, from within the world and outside it. It is in them that the utmost height of human nature resides. They have regulated the world with governments and laws.

They have instructed it with arts and sciences, and instructed it further by the example of their admirable conduct. I shall take into account only these men, their testimony and their experience. Let us see how far they have gone and where they have stopped. Whatever ailments and defects we find in that company, the world may boldly own as its own.

THREE ANSWERS: FOUND, UNFINDABLE, STILL SEEKING

Dogmatists, Academics and Pyrrhonists; the Pyrrhonists suspend judgment and live by appearances.

FRENCH

2.12.111 Quiconque cherche quelque chose, il en vient à ce poinct, ou qu'il dit, qu'il l'a trouuée; ou qu'elle ne se peut trouuer; ou qu'il en est encore en queste. Toute la Philosophie est despartie en ces trois genres. Son dessein est de chercher la verité, la science, et la certitude. Les Peripateticiens, Epicuriens, Stoiciens, et autres, ont pensé l'auoir trouuée. Ceux-cy ont estably les sciences, que nous auons, et les ont traictées, comme notices certaines. Clitomachus, Carneades, et les Academiciens, ont desesperé de leur queste; et iugé que la verité ne se pouuoit conceuoir par nos moyens. La fin de ceux-cy, c'est la foiblesse et humaine ignorance. Ce party a eu la plus grande suitte, et les sectateurs les plus nobles.

Pyrrho et autres Sceptiques ou Epechistes, de qui les dogmes plusieurs anciens ont tenu tirez d'Homere, des sept sages, et d'Archilochus, et d'Eurypides, et y attachent Zeno, Democritus, Xenophanes, disent, qu'ils sont encore en cherche de la verité. Ceux-cy iugent, que

ENGLISH

Whoever is looking for something comes to this point: either he says he has found it, or that it cannot be found, or that he is still searching for it. All philosophy is divided into these three kinds. Its aim is to seek truth, knowledge and certainty. The Peripatetics, Epicureans, Stoics and others thought they had found it. These established the sciences we have and treated them as certain knowledge. Clitomachus, Carneades and the Academics despaired of their quest and judged that truth could not be grasped by our means. The end these men reach is weakness and human ignorance. This party had the largest following and the noblest adherents.[79]

Pyrrho and the other Skeptics or Ephectics—whose doctrines several ancients held to be drawn from Homer, the seven sages, Archilochus and Euripides, and to whom they attach Zeno, Demo-79 Carneades (2nd century BC) led the skeptical New Academy; Clitomachus was his pupil and successor.

FRENCH

ceux-là qui pensent l'auoir trouuée, se trompent infiniement; et qu'il y a encore de la vanité trop hardie, en ce second degré, qui asseure que les forces humaines ne sont pas capables d'y atteindre. Car cela, d'establir la mesure de nostre puissance, de cognoistre et iuger la difficulté des choses, c'est vne grande et extreme science, de laquelle ils doubtent que l'homme soit capable. Nil sciri quisquis putat, id quoque nescit, / An sciri possit, quo se nil scire fatetur.

2.12.112 L'ignorance qui se sçait, qui se iuge, et qui se condamne, ce n'est pas vne entiere ignorance. Pour l'estre, il faut qu'elle s'ignore soy-mesme. De façon que la profession des Pyrrhoniens est, de bransler, doubter, et enquerir, ne s'asseurer de rien, de rien ne se respondre. Des trois actions de l'ame, l'imaginatiue, l'appetitiue, et la consentante, ils en reçoiuent les deux premieres: la derniere, ils la soustiennent, et la maintiennent ambigue, sans inclination, ny approbation d'vne part ou d'autre, tant soit-elle legere.

Zenon peignoit de geste son imagination sur cette partition des facultez de l'ame: La main espanduë et ouuerte, c'estoit apparence: la main à demy serrée, et les doigts vn peu croches, consentement: le poing fermé, comprehension: quand de la main gauche il venoit encore à clorre ce poing plus estroit, science. Or cette assiette de leur iugement droicte, et inflexible, receuant tous obiects sans application et consentement, les achemine à leur Ataraxie; qui est vne condition de vie paisible, rassise, exempte des agitations que nous receuons par l'impression de l'opinion et science, que nous pensons auoir des choses. D'où naissent la crainte, l'auarice, l'enuie, les desirs immoderez, l'ambition, l'orgueil, la superstition, l'amour de nouuelleté, la rebellion, la desobeyssance, l'opiniastreté, et la pluspart des maux corporels.

2.12.113 Voire ils s'exemptent par là, de la ialousie de leur discipline. Car ils debattent d'vne bien molle façon. Ils ne craignent point la reuenche à leur dispute. Quand ils disent que le poisant va contre-bas, ils seroient bien marris qu'on les en creust; et cherchent qu'on les contredie, pour engendrer la dubitation et surseance de critus and Xenophanes—say that they are still searching for the truth. They judge that those who think they have found it are infinitely mistaken, and that there is also too bold a vanity in the second degree, which asserts that human powers are not capable of reaching it. For that—establishing the measure of our power, knowing and judging the difficulty of things—is a great and supreme knowledge, of which they doubt that man is capable. Whoever thinks nothing can be known does not know this either: / Whether it can be known, since he admits he knows nothing.[80]

ENGLISH

Ignorance that knows itself, judges itself and condemns itself is not complete ignorance. To be complete, it must be ignorant of itself. So the profession of the Pyrrhonists is to waver, doubt and inquire, to be sure of nothing, to vouch for nothing. Of the three actions of the soul—imagining, desiring and assenting—they accept the first two; the last they hold in suspense and keep ambiguous, without inclination or approval one way or the other, however slight.

Zeno used to depict by gesture his notion of this division of the faculties of the soul. The hand spread flat and open was appearance; the hand half closed, with the fingers a little curled, assent; the closed fist, comprehension; and when he went on to clench that fist still tighter with his left hand, knowledge. Now this stance of their judgment, straight and inflexible, receiving all objects without applying itself or assenting to them, leads them to their Ataraxy, which is a condition of life that is peaceful, settled and free from the agitations we receive from the impression of the opinion and knowledge we think we have of things. From these arise fear, avarice, envy, immoderate desires, ambition, pride, superstition, love of novelty, rebellion, disobedience, obstinacy, and most bodily ills.[81]

Indeed they thereby spare themselves any jealousy on behalf of their own school. For they argue in a very easygoing way. They do not fear retaliation in debate. When they say that heavy things go downward, they would be very sorry to be believed; they want to be contradicted, so as to pro-

80 Ephectics: "those who suspend judgment," from the Greek epechein, to hold back.
81 Ataraxy: Greek ataraxia, "freedom from disturbance."

FRENCH

iugement, qui est leur fin. Ils ne mettent en auant leurs propositions, que pour combattre celles qu'ils pensent, que nous ayons en nostre creance. Si vous prenez la leur, ils prendront aussi volontiers la contraire à soustenir: tout leur est vn: ils n'y ont aucun choix. Si vous establissez que la neige soit noire, ils argumentent au rebours, qu'elle est blanche.

Si vous dites qu'elle n'est ny l'vn, ny l'autre, c'est à eux à maintenir qu'elle est tous les deux. Si par certain iugement vous tenez, que vous n'en sçauez rien, ils vous maintiendront que vous le sçauez. Ouï, et si par vn axiome affirmatif vous asseurez que vous en doutez, ils vous iront debattant que vous n'en doutez pas; ou que vous ne pouuez iuger et establir que vous en doutez.

2.12.114 Et par cette extremité de doubte, qui se secoue soy-mesme, ils se separent et se diuisent de plusieurs opinions, de celles mesmes, qui ont maintenu en plusieurs façons, le doubte et l'ignorance. Pourquoy ne leur sera-il permis, disent-ils, comme il est entre les dogmatistes, à l'vn dire vert, à l'autre iaulne, à eux aussi de doubter? Est-il chose qu'on vous puisse proposer par l'aduouer ou refuser, laquelle il ne soit pas loisible de considerer comme ambigue?

Et où les autres sont portez, ou par la coustume de leur païs, ou par l'institution des parens, ou par rencontre, comme par vne tempeste, sans iugement et sans choix, voire le plus souuent auant l'aage de discretion, à telle ou telle opinion, à la secte ou Stoïque ou Epicurienne, à laquelle ils se treuuent hypothequez, asseruiz et collez, comme à vne prise qu'ils ne peuuent desmordre: ad quamcumque disciplinam, velut tempestate, delati, ad eam, tanquam ad saxum, adhærescunt: pourquoy, à ceux-cy, ne sera-il pareillement concedé, de maintenir leur liberté, et considerer les choses sans obligation et seruitude? Hoc liberiores et solutiores, quòd integra illis est iudicandi potestas. N'est-ce pas quelque aduantage, de se trouuer desengagé de la necessité, qui bride les autres?

Vaut-il pas mieux demeurer en suspens que de s'infrasquer en tant d'erreurs que l'humaine fantasie a produictes? Vaut-il pas mieux suspendre sa persuasion, que de se mesler à ces diuisions seditieuses et querelleuses? Qu'iray-ie choisir? Ce qu'il vous plaira, pourueu que vous choisissiez. Voila vne sotte responce: à laquelle il semble pourtant que tout le dogmatisme arriue: par qui il ne nous est pas permis d'ignorer ce que duce the doubt and suspension of judgment that is their goal. They put forward their propositions only to fight those they think we hold in our belief. If you take theirs, they will just as willingly take up the opposite to defend: it is all one to them; they have no preference. If you lay it down that snow is black, they argue on the contrary that it is white.

ENGLISH

If you say it is neither one nor the other, it is up to them to maintain that it is both. If you hold, by a definite judgment, that you know nothing about it, they will maintain that you do know. Yes, and if by an affirmative axiom you assert that you doubt it, they will go on arguing that you do not doubt it, or that you cannot judge and establish that you doubt it.

And by this extreme of doubt, which shakes even itself, they separate and divide themselves from many opinions, even from those that have upheld doubt and ignorance in various ways. Why should they not be allowed, they say, to doubt as well—just as among the dogmatists one may say green and another yellow? Is there anything that can be put to you for you to accept or reject which it is not permissible to consider ambiguous?

Others are carried—by the custom of their country, or by their upbringing at their parents' hands, or by chance, as if by a storm, without judgment or choice, indeed most often before the age of discretion—to this or that opinion, to the Stoic or the Epicurean school, to which they find themselves mortgaged, enslaved and stuck fast, as to a prey they cannot let go of: to whatever doctrine they have been carried, as by a storm, they cling to it as to a rock. Why, then, should these men not likewise be granted the right to keep their freedom and to consider things without obligation and servitude? Freer and less bound in this, that their power of judging is intact. Is it not some advantage to find oneself released from the necessity that curbs others?

Is it not better to remain in suspense than to entangle oneself in all the errors human fancy has produced? Is it not better to suspend one's conviction than to get mixed up in these seditious and quarrelsome divisions? What shall I choose? "Whatever you like, as long as you choose." That is a foolish answer; and yet it seems that all dogmatism comes to it, since dogmatism does not allow nous ignorons. Prenez le plus fameux party, iamais il ne sera si seur, qu'il ne vous faille pour le deffendre, attaquer et combattre cent et cent contraires partis. Vaut-il pas mieux se tenir hors de cette meslée?

FRENCH

Il vous est permis d'espouser comme vostre honneur et vostre vie, la creance d'Aristote sur l'eternité de l'ame, et desdire et desmentir Platon là dessus, et à eux il sera interdit d'en doubter? S'il est loisible à Panætius de soustenir son iugement autour des aruspices, songes, oracles, vaticinations, desquelles choses les Stoiciens ne doubtent aucunement: pourquoy vn sage n'osera-il en toutes choses, ce que cettuy-cy ose en celles qu'il a apprinses de ses maistres: establies du commun consentement de l'eschole, de laquelle il est sectateur et professeur? Si c'est vn enfant qui iuge, il ne sçait que c'est: si c'est vn sçauant, il est præoccuppé.

2.12.115 Ils se sont reseruez vn merueilleux aduantage au combat, s'estans deschargez du soin de se couurir. Il ne leur importe qu'on les frappe, pourueu qu'ils frappent; et font leurs besongnes de tout. S'ils vainquent, vostre proposition cloche; si vous, la leur: s'ils faillent, ils verifient l'ignorance; si vous faillez, vous la verifiez: s'ils prouuent que rien ne se sçache, il va bien; s'ils ne le sçauent pas prouuer, il est bon de mesmes: Vt quum in eadem re paria contrariis in partibus momenta inueniuntur, facilius ab vtraque parte assertio sustineatur.

Et font estat de trouuer bien plus facilement, pourquoy vne chose soit fausse, que non pas qu'elle soit vraye; et ce qui n'est pas, que ce qui est: et ce qu'ils ne croyent pas, que ce qu'ils croyent. Leurs façons de parler sont, Ie n'establis rien: Il n'est non plus ainsi qu'ainsin, ou que ny l'vn ny l'autre: Ie ne le comprens point. Les apparences sont egales par tout: la loy de parler, et pour et contre, est pareille. Rien ne semble vray qui ne puisse sembler faux. Leur mot sacramental, c'est επεχω; c'est à dire, ie soustiens, ie ne bouge. Voyla leurs refreins, et autres de pareille substance. Leur effect, c'est vne pure, entiere, et tres-parfaicte surceance et suspension de iugement.

Ils se seruent de leur raison, pour enquerir et pour debattre: mais non pas pour arrester et choisir. Quiconque imaginera vne perpetuelle confession us to be ignorant of what we are ignorant of. Take the most famous party: it will never be so secure that, to defend it, you will not have to attack and fight hundreds upon hundreds of opposing parties. Is it not better to stay out of this fray?

ENGLISH

You are allowed to embrace, as you would your honor and your life, Aristotle's belief about the eternity of the soul, and to contradict and refute Plato on that point; and they are to be forbidden to doubt it? If Panaetius may withhold his judgment about haruspices, dreams, oracles and prophecies, things the Stoics do not doubt in the least, why should a wise man not dare in all things what this man dares in those he learned from his masters, established by the common consent of the school of which he is a follower and teacher? If it is a child who judges, he does not know what it is about; if it is a learned man, he is prejudiced.[82]

They have kept a marvelous advantage for themselves in combat, having relieved themselves of the trouble of guarding. It does not matter to them if they are struck, so long as they strike; and they turn everything to account. If they win, your proposition limps; if you win, theirs does. If they fail, they confirm ignorance; if you fail, you confirm it. If they prove that nothing is known, well and good; if they cannot prove it, that is just as good. So that, when equal weights are found on opposite sides of the same question, it is easier to withhold assertion on both sides.

And they claim to find far more easily why a thing is false than that it is true; what is not than what is; and what they do not believe than what they believe. Their ways of speaking are: "I establish nothing." "It is no more so than so, or than neither." "I do not grasp it." "Appearances are equal everywhere; the law of speaking for and against is the same." "Nothing seems true that cannot seem false." Their sacramental word is epechō, that is to say, "I hold back, I do not budge." Those are their refrains, and others of like substance. Their result is a pure, complete and most perfect deferral and suspension of judgment.

They use their reason to inquire and debate, but not to settle and choose. Whoever imagines a per-82 Panaetius of Rhodes, Stoic philosopher of the 2nd century BC. Haruspices were diviners who read the entrails of sacrificed animals.

FRENCH

d'ignorance, vn iugement sans pente, et sans inclination, à quelque occasion que ce puisse estre, il conçoit le Pyrrhonisme. I'exprime cette fantasie autant que ie puis, par ce que plusieurs la trouuent difficile à conceuoir; et les autheurs mesmes la representent vn peu obscurement et diuersement.

2.12.116 Quant aux actions de la vie, ils sont en cela de la commune façon. Ils se prestent et accommodent aux inclinations naturelles, à l'impulsion et contrainte des passions, aux constitutions des loix et des coustumes, et à la tradition des arts: non enim nos Deus ista scire, sed tantummodo vti voluit. Ils laissent guider à ces choses là, leurs actions communes, sans aucune opination ou iugement. Qui fait que ie ne puis pas bien assortir à ce discours, ce qu'on dit de Pyrrho. Ils le peignent stupide et immobile, prenant vn train de vie farouche et inassociable, attendant le hurt des charrettes, se presentant aux precipices, refusant de s'accommoder aux loix. Cela est encherir sur sa discipline.

Il n'a pas voulu se faire pierre ou souche: il a voulu se faire homme viuant, discourant, et raisonnant, iouyssant de tous plaisirs et commoditez naturelles, embesoignant et se seruant de toutes ses pieces corporelles et spirituelles, en regle et droicture. Les priuileges fantastiques, imaginaires, et faulx, que l'homme s'est vsurpé, de regenter, d'ordonner, d'establir, il les a de bonne foy renoncez et quittez. Si n'est-il point de secte, qui ne soit contrainte de permettre à son sage de suiure assez de choses non comprinses, ny perceuës ny consenties, s'il veut viure.

Et quand il monte en mer, il suit ce dessein, ignorant s'il luy sera vtile: et se plie, à ce que le vaisseau est bon, le pilote experimenté, la saison commode: circonstances probables seulement. Apres lesquelles il est tenu d'aller, et se laisser remuer aux apparances, pourueu qu'elles n'ayent point d'expresse contrarieté. Il a vn corps, il a vne ame: les sens le poussent, l'esprit l'agite. Encore qu'il ne treuue point en soy cette propre et singuliere marque de iuger, et qu'il s'apperçoiue, qu'il ne doit engager son consentement, attendu qu'il peut estre quelque faulx pareil à ce vray: il ne laisse de conduire les offices de sa vie pleinement et commodement.

Combien y a il d'arts, qui font profession de consister en la coniecture, plus qu'en la science? qui ne decident pas du vray et du faulx, et suiuent seulement ce qu'il semble?

ENGLISH

petual confession of ignorance, a judgment without slant or inclination on any occasion whatever, conceives Pyrrhonism. I express this notion as well as I can, because many find it hard to conceive, and the authors themselves present it somewhat obscurely and in different ways.

As for the actions of life, in these they follow the common way. They lend and adapt themselves to natural inclinations, to the impulse and constraint of the passions, to the ordinances of laws and customs, and to the tradition of the arts. For God did not want us to know these things, but only to use them. They let these things guide their ordinary actions, without any opinion or judgment. That is why I cannot quite reconcile with this account what is said of Pyrrho. They portray him as stupid and immobile, adopting a wild, unsociable way of life, waiting for carts to run into him, walking up to precipices, refusing to conform to the laws. That is going beyond his doctrine.

He did not try to make himself a stone or a stump; he tried to make himself a living man, thinking and reasoning, enjoying all natural pleasures and comforts, employing and using all his bodily and mental parts in due order and rightness. The fantastic, imaginary and false privileges man has usurped—of ruling, ordering, establishing—he renounced and gave up in good faith. And yet there is no school that is not forced to allow its wise man to follow many things not grasped, nor perceived, nor assented to, if he wants to live.

And when he goes to sea, he follows that plan without knowing whether it will be useful to him, and relies on the ship being sound, the pilot experienced, the season favorable—probable circumstances only. He is bound to go by them and let himself be moved by appearances, provided they show no express contradiction. He has a body, he has a soul; the senses push him, the mind stirs him. Although he does not find in himself that proper and distinctive mark for judging, and realizes that he must not commit his assent, since there may be some falsehood resembling this truth, he still carries out the duties of his life fully and conveniently.

How many arts are there that profess to consist in conjecture more than in knowledge, that do not decide between true and false but merely follow

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Il y a, disent-ils, et vray et faulx, et y a en nous dequoy le chercher, mais non pas dequoy l'arrester à la touche. Nous en valons bien mieux, de nous laisser manier sans inquisition, à l'ordre du monde. Vne ame garantie de preiugé, a vn merueilleux auancement vers la tranquillité. Gents qui iugent et contrerollent leurs iuges, ne s'y soubsmettent iamais deuëment.	what seems to be so? There is, they say, both true and false, and there is in us the means to seek it, but not to try it on the touchstone. We are much the better for letting ourselves be handled by the order of the world without inquiring. A soul kept free of prejudice has come a marvelous way toward tranquility. People who judge and check up on their judges never submit to them as they should.
2.12.117 Combien et aux loix de la religion, et aux loix politiques se trouuent plus dociles et aisez à mener, les esprits simples et incurieux, que ces esprits surueillants et pedagogues des causes diuines et humaines? Il n'est rien en l'humaine inuention, où il y ait tant de verisimilitude et d'vtilité. Cette-cy presente l'homme nud et vuide, recognoissant sa foiblesse naturelle, propre à receuoir d'en hault quelque force estrangere, desgarni d'humaine science, et d'autant plus apte à loger en soy la diuine, aneantissant son iugement, pour faire plus de place à la foy: ny mescreant ny establissant aucun dogme contre les loix et obseruances communes, humble, obeïssant, disciplinable, studieux; ennemy iuré d'heresie, et s'exemptant par consequent des vaines et irreligieuses opinions introduites par les fauces sectes.	How much more docile and easy to lead, under the laws both of religion and of the state, are simple and incurious minds than those minds that keep watch over causes divine and human and lecture on them? There is nothing in human invention that has so much likelihood and usefulness. This one presents man naked and empty, acknowledging his natural weakness, fit to receive some outside strength from on high; stripped of human knowledge, and all the more apt to lodge divine knowledge within him; annihilating his judgment to make more room for faith; neither disbelieving nor establishing any dogma against common laws and observances; humble, obedient, teachable, eager to learn; a sworn enemy of heresy, and consequently free of the vain and irreligious opinions introduced by false sects.
C'est vne carte blanche preparée à prendre du doigt de Dieu telles formes qu'il luy plaira d'y grauer. Plus nous nous renuoyons et commettons à Dieu, et renonçons à nous, mieux nous en valons. Accepte, dit l'Ecclesiaste, en bonne part les choses au visage et au goust qu'elles se presentent à toy, du iour à la iournée: le demeurant est hors de ta cognoissance. Dominus nouit cogitationes hominum, quoniam vanæ sunt.	It is a blank page, prepared to take from the finger of God whatever forms he pleases to engrave on it. The more we refer and commit ourselves to God and renounce ourselves, the better off we are. "Accept in good part," says Ecclesiastes, "things in the aspect and taste with which they present themselves to you, from day to day; the rest is beyond your knowledge." The Lord knows the thoughts of men, that they are vain.[83]

DOGMATISTS WHO DOUBT

Even the dogmatists, Plato and Aristotle among them, wrote in a spirit of inquiry.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.118 Voila comment, des trois generales sectes de Philosophie, les deux font expresse profession de dubitation et d'ignorance: et en celle des dogmatistes, qui est troisiesme, il est aysé à descouurir, que la plus part n'ont pris le visage de l'asseurance que pour auoir meilleure mine. Ils n'ont pas tant pensé nous establir quelque	So it is that, of the three general schools of philosophy, two make express profession of doubt and ignorance; and in that of the dogmatists, which is the third, it is easy to discover that most of them put on a face of assurance only to look better. They did not so much think to establish some certainty 83 Psalm 94:11, quoted by Saint Paul in 1 Corinthians 3:20.

FRENCH

certitude, que nous montrer iusques où ils estoient allez en cette chasse de la verité, quam docti fingunt magis quàm norunt. Timæus ayant à instruire Socrates de ce qu'il sçait des Dieux, du monde, et des hommes, propose d'en parler comme vn homme à vn homme; et qu'il suffit, si ses raisons sont probables, comme les raisons d'vn autre: car les exactes raisons n'estre en sa main, ny en mortelle main.

Ce que l'vn de ses sectateurs a ainsin imité: Vt potero, explicabo: nec tamen, vt Pythius Apollo, certa vt sint et fixa, quæ dixero: sed, vt homunculus, probabilia coniectura sequens. Et cela sur le discours du mespris de la mort: discours naturel et populaire. Ailleurs il l'a traduit, sur le propos mesme de Platon. Si fortè, de Deorum natura ortúque mundi disserentes, minus id quod habemus in animo consequimur, haud erit mirum.

Æquum est enim meminisse, et me, qui disseram, hominem esse, et vos qui iudicetis: vt, si probabilia dicentur, nihil vltrà requiratis. Aristote nous entasse ordinairement vn grand nombre d'autres opinions, et d'autres creances, pour y comparer la sienne, et nous faire voir de combien il est allé plus outre, et combien il approche de plus pres la verisimilitude. Car la verité ne se iuge point par authorité et tesmoignage d'autruy. Et pourtant euita religieusement Epicurus d'en alleguer en ses escrits.

2.12.119 Cettuy-là est le prince des dogmatistes, et si nous apprenons de luy, que le beaucoup sçauoir apporte l'occasion de plus doubter. On le void à escient se couurir souuent d'obscurité si espesse et inextricable, qu'on n'y peut rien choisir de son aduis. C'est par effect vn Pyrrhonisme soubs vne forme resolutiue. Oyez la protestation de Cicero, qui nous explique la fantasie d'autruy par la sienne. Qui requirunt, quid de quaque re ipsi sentiamus: curiosius id faciunt, quàm necesse est. Hæc in philosophia ratio, contra omnia disserendi, nullamque rem apertè iudicandi, profecta à Socrate, repetita ab Arcesila, confirmata à Carneade, vsque ad nostram viget ætatem.

Hi sumus, qui omnibus veris falsa quædam adiuncta esse dicamus, tanta similitudine, vt in ijs nulla insit certè iudicandi et assentiendi nota. Pourquoy, non Aristote for us as to show us how far they had gone in this hunt for truth, which the learned imagine rather than know. Timaeus, having to instruct Socrates in what he knows of the gods, the world and men, proposes to speak of it as a man to a man, and says it is enough if his reasons are probable, like another man's; for exact reasons are not in his hands, nor in any mortal hands.[84]

ENGLISH

One of his followers imitated this as follows: I will explain as best I can; yet not like Pythian Apollo, so that what I say is certain and fixed, but like a mere man, following probabilities by conjecture. And that on the subject of contempt for death, a natural and popular subject. Elsewhere he translated it, on the very words of Plato: If perhaps, in discussing the nature of the gods and the origin of the world, we do not attain what we have in mind, it will be no wonder.[85]

For it is right to remember that both I who discuss and you who judge are men; so that, if probable things are said, you should ask for nothing further. Aristotle usually heaps up for us a great number of other opinions and other beliefs, to compare his own with them and show us how much further he has gone and how much closer he comes to likelihood. For truth is not judged by the authority and testimony of others. And that is why Epicurus scrupulously avoided citing any in his writings.

Aristotle is the prince of the dogmatists; and yet we learn from him that knowing much brings occasion for doubting more. He can be seen deliberately wrapping himself, often, in a darkness so thick and inextricable that one cannot make out his opinion in it. It is in effect Pyrrhonism in an affirmative form. Hear the declaration of Cicero, who explains another's notion to us by his own: Those who ask what we ourselves think about each thing show more curiosity than is necessary. This method in philosophy, of arguing against everything and judging nothing openly, begun by Socrates, taken up again by Arcesilaus, confirmed by Carneades, flourishes down to our own time.

We are those who say that some falsehoods are joined to all truths, with such a likeness that there

84 Timaeus is the main speaker in Plato's dialogue of that name.
85 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations I.9; the second passage is from his Latin translation of Plato's Timaeus.

FRENCH

seulement, mais la plus part des philosophes, ont ils affecté la difficulté, si ce n'est pour faire valoir la vanité du subject, et amuser la curiosité de nostre esprit, luy donnant où se paistre, à ronger cet os creuz et descharné? Clytomachus affermoit n'auoir iamais sçeu, par les escrits de Carneades, entendre de quelle opinion il estoit. Pourquoy a euité aux siens Epicurus, la facilité, et Heraclytus en a esté surnommé σχοτεινος?

La difficulté est vne monoye que les sçauans employent, comme les joueurs de passe-passe pour ne descouurir la vanité de leur art: et de laquelle l'humaine bestise se paye aysément. Clarus ob obscuram linguam, magis inter inanes:
Omnia enim stolidi magis admirantur amántque,
Inuersis quæ sub verbis latitantia cernunt.

2.12.120 Cicero reprend aucuns de ses amis d'auoir accoustumé de mettre à l'astrologie, au droit, à la dialectique, et à la geometrie, plus de temps, que ne meritoyent ces arts: et que cela les diuertissoit des deuoirs de la vie, plus vtiles et honnestes. Les philosophes Cyrenaïques mesprisoyent esgalement la physique et la dialectique. Zenon tout au commencement des liures de la republique, declaroit inutiles toutes les liberales disciplines. Chrysippus disoit, que ce que Platon et Aristote auoyent escrit de la logique, ils l'auoyent escrit par ieu et par exercice: et ne pouuoit croire qu'ils eussent parlé à certes d'vne si vaine matiere.

2.12.121 Plutarque le dit de la metaphysique, Epicurus l'eust encores dict de la rhetorique, de la grammaire, poësie, mathematique, et hors la physique, de toutes les autres sciences: et Socrates de toutes, sauf celle des mœurs et de la vie. De quelque chose qu'on s'enquist à luy, il ramenoit en premier lieu tousiours l'enquerant à rendre compte des conditions de sa vie, presente et passée, lesquelles il examinoit et iugeoit: estimant tout autre apprentissage subsecutif à celuy-la et supernumeraire. Parum mihi placeant eæ litteræ quæ ad virtutem doctoribus nihil profuerunt. La plus part des arts ont esté ainsi mesprisés par le mesme sçauoir. Mais ils n'ont pas pensé qu'il fust hors de propos, d'exercer leur esprit és choses mesmes, où il n'y auoit nulle solidité profitable.

ENGLISH

is no sure mark in them for judging and assenting. Why have not only Aristotle but most philosophers affected difficulty, if not to enhance the worth of the vanity of the subject and to keep our mind's curiosity busy, giving it something to feed on by gnawing at this hollow, fleshless bone? Clitomachus asserted that he had never been able to understand from Carneades' writings what his opinion was. Why did Epicurus avoid ease in his writings, and why was Heraclitus nicknamed "the Obscure"?

Difficulty is a coin that the learned use, like conjurers, so as not to reveal the vanity of their art, and one with which human stupidity is easily paid. Famous for his obscure speech, especially among the empty-headed:
For fools admire and love above all
What they see hidden beneath twisted words.[86]

Cicero rebukes some of his friends for habitually spending more time on astrology, law, dialectic and geometry than these arts deserved, saying that this diverted them from the duties of life, which are more useful and honorable. The Cyrenaic philosophers despised physics and dialectic alike. Zeno, at the very beginning of his books on the Republic, declared all the liberal disciplines useless. Chrysippus said that what Plato and Aristotle had written on logic they had written in play and as an exercise, and he could not believe they had spoken in earnest about so vain a subject.

Plutarch says this of metaphysics; Epicurus would have said it also of rhetoric, grammar, poetry, mathematics and, apart from physics, of all the other sciences; and Socrates of all of them except the science of morals and of life. Whatever anyone asked him about, he always first brought the questioner back to giving an account of the conditions of his life, present and past, which he examined and judged, considering all other learning subordinate to that and superfluous. I would care little for those letters that did their teachers no good toward virtue. Most of the arts have thus been despised by learning itself. But they did not think it out of place to exercise their minds even on things in which there was no profitable solidity.

86 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, speaking of Heraclitus.

FRENCH

2.12.122 Au demeurant, les vns ont estimé Plato dogmatiste, les autres dubitateur, les autres en certaines choses l'vn, et en certaines choses l'autre. Le conducteur de ses dialogismes, Socrates, va tousiours demandant et esmouuant la dispute, iamais l'arrestant, iamais satisfaisant: et dit n'auoir autre science, que la science de s'opposer. Homere leur autheur a planté egalement les fondements à toutes les sectes de philosophie, pour montrer, combien il estoit indifferent par où nous allassions. De Platon nasquirent dix sectes diuerses, dit-on. Aussi, à mon gré, iamais instruction ne fut titubante, et rien asseuerante, si la sienne ne l'est.

2.12.123 Socrates disoit, que les sages femmes en prenant ce mestier de faire engendrer les autres, quittent le mestier d'engendrer elles. Que luy par le tiltre de sage homme, que les Dieux luy auoyent deferé, s'estoit aussi desfaict en son amour virile et mentale, de la faculté d'enfanter: se contentant d'ayder et fauorir de son secours les engendrants: ouurir leur nature; graisser leurs conduits: faciliter l'yssue de leur enfantement: iuger d'iceluy: le baptizer: le nourrir: le fortifier: l'emmaillotter, et circoncir: exerçant et maniant son engin, aux perils et fortunes d'autruy.

2.12.124 Il est ainsi de la plus part des autheurs de ce tiers genre, comme les anciens ont remerqué des escripts d'Anaxagoras, Democritus, Parmenides, Xenophanes, et autres. Ils ont vne forme d'escrire douteuse en substance et en dessein, enquerant plustost qu'instruisant: encore qu'ils entresement leur stile de cadances dogmatistes. Cela se voit il pas aussi bien en Seneque et en Plutarque? combien disent ils tantost d'vn visage, tantost d'vn autre, pour ceux qui y regardent de prez? Et les reconciliateurs des iurisconsultes deuoyent premierement les concilier chacun à soy. Platon me semble auoir aymé cette forme de philosopher par dialogues, à escient, pour loger plus decemment en diuerses bouches la diuersité et variation de ses propres fantasies.

Diuersement traitter les matieres, est aussi bien les traitter, que conformement, et mieux: à sçauoir plus copieusement et vtilement. Prenons exemple de nous. Les arrests font le point extreme du parler dogmatiste et resolutif: si est ce que ceux que noz parlements presentent au peuple, les plus exemplaires, propres à

ENGLISH

For the rest, some have considered Plato a dogmatist, others a doubter, others one in certain things and the other in others. The leader of his dialogues, Socrates, is always asking questions and stirring up the debate, never settling it, never satisfying; and he says he has no other knowledge than the knowledge of how to oppose. Homer, their author, laid the foundations equally for all the schools of philosophy, to show how little it mattered which way we went. From Plato sprang ten different schools, they say. And indeed, to my mind, no teaching was ever wavering and noncommittal if his is not.

Socrates used to say that midwives, in taking up the trade of making others give birth, give up the trade of giving birth themselves; that he, by the title of wise man that the gods had conferred on him, had likewise rid himself, in his manly and mental love, of the faculty of bearing children, content to help and favor with his aid those who were begetting: to open their nature, grease their passages, ease the issue of their delivery, judge it, baptize it, feed it, strengthen it, swaddle it and circumcise it—exercising and handling his wits at the risks and fortunes of others.[87]

So it is with most authors of this third kind, as the ancients noted of the writings of Anaxagoras, Democritus, Parmenides, Xenophanes and others. They have a way of writing that is doubtful in substance and intent, inquiring rather than teaching, even though they sprinkle their style with dogmatic cadences. Is this not seen just as clearly in Seneca and Plutarch? How much do they say now with one face, now with another, for those who look closely? And the reconcilers of the jurists ought first to reconcile each of them with himself. Plato seems to me to have liked this form of philosophizing in dialogues deliberately, so as to lodge more fittingly in different mouths the diversity and variation of his own notions.

To treat subjects in different ways is just as much treating them as to treat them uniformly, and better: that is, more abundantly and usefully. Let us take an example from ourselves. Court rulings are the extreme point of dogmatic and decisive nourrir en luy la reuerence qu'il doit à cette dignité, principalement par la suffisance des personnes qui l'exercent, prennent leur beauté, non de la conclusion, qui est à eux quotidienne, et qui est commune à tout iuge, tant comme de la disceptation et agitation des diuerses et contraires ratiocinations, que la matiere du droit souffre.

87 The French sage-femme, midwife, means literally "wise woman," hence Montaigne's play on sage homme, "wise man."

FRENCH

Et le plus large champ aux reprehensions des vns philosophes à l'encontre des autres, se tire des contradictions et diuersitez, en quoy chacun d'eux se trouue empestré: ou par dessein, pour montrer la vacillation de l'esprit humain autour de toute matiere, ou forcé ignoramment, par la volubilité et incomprehensibilité de toute matiere. Que signifie ce refrein? en vn lieu glissant et coulant suspendons nostre creance: car, comme dit Eurypides, Les œuures de Dieu en diuerses / Façons, nous donnent des trauerses. Semblable à celuy qu'Empedocles semoit souuent en ses liures, comme agité d'vne diuine fureur, et forcé de la verité.

Non non, nous ne sentons rien, nous ne voyons rien, toutes choses nous sont occultes, il n'en est aucune de laquelle nous puissions establir quelle elle est: reuenant à ce mot diuin, Cogitationes mortalium timidæ, et incertæ adinuentiones nostræ, et providentiæ.

2.12.125 Il ne faut pas trouuer estrange, si gens desesperez de la prise n'ont pas laissé d'auoir plaisir à la chasse, l'estude estant de soy vne occupation plaisante: et si plaisante, que parmy les voluptez, les Stoïciens defendent aussi celle qui vient de l'exercitation de l'esprit, y veulent de la bride, et trouuent de l'intemperance à trop sçauoir.

Democritus ayant mangé à sa table des figues, qui sentoient le miel, commença soudain à chercher en son esprit, d'où leur venoit cette douceur inusitee, et pour s'en esclaircir, s'alloit leuer de table, pour voir l'assiette du lieu où ces figues auoyent esté cueillies: sa chambriere, ayant entendu la cause de ce remuëment, luy dit en riant, qu'il ne se penast plus pour cela, car c'estoit qu'elle les auoit mises en vn vaisseau, où il y auoit eu du miel. Il se despita, dequoy elle luy auoit osté l'occasion de cette recherche, et desrobé matiere à sa curiosité. Va, luy dit-il, tu m'as faict desplaisir, ie ne lairray pourtant d'en chercher la cause, comme si elle estoit naturelle.

ENGLISH

speech; and yet the most exemplary ones that our parlements present to the people, those fit to nourish in them the reverence they owe to that dignity, chiefly through the ability of the persons who hold it, draw their beauty not so much from the conclusion, which is their daily business and common to every judge, as from the debate and agitation of the various and contrary reasonings that the matter of law admits.

And the widest field for the criticisms of some philosophers against others comes from the contradictions and inconsistencies in which each of them finds himself entangled—either by design, to show how the human mind wavers about every subject, or forced to it unwittingly by the fluidity and incomprehensibility of every subject. What is the meaning of this refrain: "In a slippery and flowing place, let us suspend our belief"? For, as Euripides says, The works of God in diverse / Ways keep thwarting us. It is like the refrain Empedocles often scattered through his books, as if stirred by a divine frenzy and compelled by the truth.

No, no, we feel nothing, we see nothing; all things are hidden from us; there is not one of which we can establish what it is. This comes back to that divine saying: The thoughts of mortals are timid, and our devices and our foresight uncertain.[88]

We should not find it strange if people who despaired of the catch have not stopped enjoying the hunt, study being in itself a pleasant occupation—so pleasant that among the pleasures the Stoics forbid also the one that comes from exercising the mind; they want it bridled, and find intemperance in knowing too much.

Democritus, having eaten at his table some figs that tasted of honey, at once began to search his mind for the source of this unusual sweetness; and to clear the matter up he was getting up from the table to go and see the lie of the place where the figs had been picked. His maidservant, having learned the reason for this stir, told him with a laugh not to trouble himself any more about it, for it was because she had put them in a vessel that had held honey. He was annoyed that she had taken away the occasion for this research and robbed his curiosity of its material. "Go," he said, 88 Wisdom of Solomon 9:14.

FRENCH

Et volontiers n'eust failly de trouuer quelque raison vraye, à vn effect faux et supposé. Cette histoire d'vn fameux et grand philosophe, nous represente bien clairement cette passion studieuse, qui nous amuse à la poursuyte des choses, de l'acquest desquelles nous sommes desesperez. Plutarque recite vn pareil exemple de quelqu'vn, qui ne vouloit pas estre esclaircy de ce, dequoy il estoit en doute, pour ne perdre le plaisir de le chercher: comme l'autre, qui ne vouloit pas que son medecin luy ostast l'alteration de la fieure, pour ne perdre le plaisir de l'assouuir en beuuant.

Satius est superuacua discere, quàm nihil. Tout ainsi qu'en toute pasture il y a le plaisir souuent seul, et tout ce que nous prenons, qui est plaisant, n'est pas tousiours nutritif, ou sain: pareillement ce que nostre esprit tire de la science, ne laisse pas d'estre voluptueux, encore qu'il ne soit ny alimentant ny salutaire.

2.12.126 Voicy comme ils disent: La consideration de la nature est vne pasture propre à nos esprits, elle nous esleue et enfle, nous fait desdaigner les choses basses et terriennes, par la comparaison des superieures et celestes: la recherche mesme des choses occultes et grandes est tresplaisante, voire à celuy qui n'en acquiert que la reuerence, et crainte d'en iuger. Ce sont des mots de leur profession. La vaine image de cette maladiue curiosité, se voit plus expressement encores en cet autre exemple, qu'ils ont par honneur si souuent en la bouche. Eudoxus souhaittoit et prioit les Dieux, qu'il peust vne fois voir le soleil de pres, comprendre sa forme, sa grandeur, et sa beauté, à peine d'en estre bruslé soudainement.

Il veut au prix de sa vie, acquerir vne science, de laquelle l'vsage et possession luy soit quand et quand ostée. Et pour cette soudaine et volage cognoissance, perdre toutes autres cognoissances qu'il a, et qu'il peut acquerir par apres.

2.12.127 Ie ne me persuade pas aysement, qu'Epicurus, Platon, et Pythagoras nous ayent donné pour argent contant leurs Atomes, leurs Idées, et leurs Nombres. Ils estoyent trop sages pour establir leurs articles de foy, de chose si incertaine, et si debattable. Mais en cette obscurité et ignorance du monde, chacun de ces grands personnages, s'est trauaillé d'apporter vne telle quelle image de

ENGLISH

"you have displeased me; I shall look for the cause all the same, as if it were natural."

And he would very likely have found some true reason for a false and supposed effect. This story of a famous and great philosopher shows us very clearly that studious passion which keeps us busy pursuing things we despair of acquiring. Plutarch tells a similar example of someone who did not want to be enlightened about what he was in doubt of, so as not to lose the pleasure of looking for it; like the other man who did not want his doctor to take away the thirst of his fever, so as not to lose the pleasure of quenching it by drinking.

It is better to learn superfluous things than nothing. Just as in all eating there is often pleasure alone, and not everything pleasant that we take is always nourishing or healthy, so what our mind draws from knowledge does not cease to be pleasurable even though it is neither nourishing nor wholesome.

This is how they put it: the contemplation of nature is food suited to our minds; it lifts us up and swells us, and makes us disdain low and earthly things by comparison with the higher and heavenly ones; the very search for hidden and great things is most pleasant, even to one who gains from it only reverence and fear of judging them. These are the words of their profession. The vain image of this sickly curiosity is seen more expressly still in this other example, which they cite so often and with honor. Eudoxus wished and prayed to the gods that he might once see the sun up close and grasp its form, its size and its beauty, even at the cost of being burned up by it at once.[89]

He wants, at the price of his life, to acquire a knowledge whose use and possession would be taken from him at the same instant; and for this sudden and fleeting knowledge, to lose all the other knowledge he has and could acquire afterward.

I am not easily persuaded that Epicurus, Plato and Pythagoras handed us their Atoms, their Ideas and their Numbers as ready cash. They were too wise to make their articles of faith out of something so uncertain and so debatable. But in this darkness and ignorance of the world, each of these great figures strove to bring some sort of image of light, 89 Eudoxus of Cnidus, Greek astronomer and mathematician of the 4th century BC.

FRENCH

lumiere: et ont promené leur ame à des inuentions, qui eussent au moins vne plaisante et subtile apparence, pourueu que toute fausse, elle se peust maintenir contre les oppositions contraires: Vnicuique ista pro ingenio finguntur, non ex scientiæ vi.

Vn ancien, à qui on reprochoit, qu'il faisoit profession de la Philosophie, de laquelle pourtant en son iugement, il ne tenoit pas grand compte, respondit que cela, c'estoit vrayement philosopher.

2.12.128 Ils ont voulu considerer tout, balancer tout, et ont trouué cette occupation propre à la naturelle curiosité qui est en nous. Aucunes choses, ils les ont escrites pour le besoin de la societé publique, comme leurs religions: et a esté raisonnable pour cette consideration, que les communes opinions, ils n'ayent voulu les esplucher au vif, aux fins de n'engendrer du trouble en l'obeyssance des loix et coustumes de leur pays.

2.12.129 Platon traitte ce mystere d'vn ieu assez descouuert. Car où il escrit selon soy, il ne prescrit rien à certes. Quand il fait le legislateur, il emprunte vn style regentant et asseuerant: et si y mesle hardiment les plus fantastiques de ses inuentions: autant vtiles à persuader à la commune, que ridicules à persuader à soy-mesme: sçachant combien nous sommes propres à receuoir toutes impressions, et sur toutes, les plus farouches et enormes.

Et pourtant en ses loix, il a grand soing, qu'on ne chante en publiq que des poësies, desquelles les fabuleuses feintes tendent à quelque vtile fin: estant si facile d'imprimer touts fantosmes en l'esprit humain, que c'est iniustice de ne le paistre plustost de mensonges profitables, que de mensonges ou inutiles ou dommageables. Il dit tout destrousseement en sa Republique, que pour le profit des hommes, il est souuent besoin de les piper. Il est aisé à distinguer, les vnes sectes auoir plus suiuy la verité, les autres l'vtilité, par où celles cy ont gaigné credit.

C'est la misere de nostre condition, que souuent ce qui se presente à nostre imagination pour le plus vray, ne s'y presente pas pour le plus vtile à nostre vie. Les plus hardies sectes, Epicurienne, Pyrrhonienne, nouuelle Academique, encore sont elles contrainctes de se plier à la loy ciuile, au bout du compte.

2.12.130

ENGLISH

and they walked their minds through inventions that would at least have a pleasing and subtle appearance, provided that, false as it was, it could hold up against opposing objections. These things are imagined by each according to his wit, not by the power of knowledge.

An ancient, who was reproached for professing philosophy when in his own judgment he took no great account of it, replied that this was truly philosophizing.

They wanted to consider everything and weigh everything, and found this occupation suited to the natural curiosity that is in us. Some things they wrote for the needs of public society, such as their religions; and it was reasonable, for that consideration, that they did not want to strip common opinions to the quick, so as not to breed trouble in the obedience owed to the laws and customs of their country.

Plato handles this mystery with a fairly open hand. For where he writes on his own account, he prescribes nothing in earnest. When he plays the legislator, he borrows a domineering and assertive style, and boldly mixes into it the most fantastic of his inventions, as useful for persuading the common people as they are ridiculous for persuading himself, knowing how apt we are to receive any impression, and above all the wildest and most monstrous.

And so in his Laws he takes great care that nothing be sung in public but poems whose fabulous fictions tend to some useful end; it being so easy to imprint any phantoms on the human mind that it is unjust not to feed it on profitable lies rather than on lies that are useless or harmful. He says quite bluntly in his Republic that for men's benefit it is often necessary to deceive them. It is easy to see that some schools have followed truth more, others usefulness, and that the latter have gained credit by it.

It is the misery of our condition that often what presents itself to our imagination as truest does not present itself as most useful to our life. The boldest schools—Epicurean, Pyrrhonian, New Academic—are still compelled, when all is said and done, to bow to civil law.

FRENCH

Il y a d'autres subiects qu'ils ont belutez, qui à gauche, qui à dextre, chacun se trauaillant d'y donner quelque visage, à tort ou à droit. Car n'ayans rien trouué de si caché, dequoy ils n'ayent voulu parler, il leur est souuent force de forger des coniectures foibles et foles: non qu'ils les prinssent eux mesmes pour fondement, ne pour establir quelque verité, mais pour l'exercice de leur estude. Non tam id sensisse quod dicerent, quàm exercere ingenia materiæ difficultate videntur voluisse. Et si on ne le prenoit ainsi, comme couuririons nous vne si grande inconstance, varieté, et vanité d'opinions, que nous voyons auoir esté produites par ces ames excellentes et admirables?

ENGLISH

There are other subjects they have sifted, some to the left, some to the right, each striving to give it some face, rightly or wrongly. For since they found nothing so hidden that they did not want to speak of it, they are often forced to forge weak and foolish conjectures—not that they themselves took them as a foundation, or to establish some truth, but as an exercise for their study. They seem not so much to have believed what they said as to have wished to exercise their wits on the difficulty of the subject. And if we did not take it so, how would we cover up so great an inconstancy, variety and vanity of opinions as we see produced by those excellent and admirable minds?

MEASURING GOD BY OURSELVES

Human opinions about God, from the philosophers to the myths, show only our own image.

FRENCH

2.12.131 Car pour exemple, qu'est-il plus vain, que de vouloir deuiner Dieu par nos analogies et coniectures: le regler, et le monde, à nostre capacité et à nos loix? et nous seruir aux despens de la diuinité, de ce petit eschantillon de suffisance qu'il luy a pleu despartir à nostre naturelle condition? et par ce que nous ne pouuons estendre nostre veuë iusques en son glorieux siege, l'auoir ramené ça bas à nostre corruption et à nos miseres?

2.12.132 De toutes les opinions humaines et anciennes touchant la religion, celle là me semble auoir eu plus de vray-semblance et plus d'excuse, qui recognoissoit Dieu comme vne puissance incomprehensible, origine et conseruatrice de toutes choses, toute bonté, toute perfection, receuant et prenant en bonne part l'honneur et la reuerence, que les humains luy rendoient soubs quelque visage, soubs quelque nom et en quelque maniere que ce fust. Iupiter omnipotens, rerum, regúmque, Deûmque, / Progenitor, genitrixque. Ce zele vniuersellement a esté veu du ciel de bon œil. Toutes polices ont tiré fruit de leur deuotion. Les hommes, les actions impies, ont eu par tout les euenements sortables.

Les histoires payennes recognoissent de la dignité, ordre, iustice, et des prodiges et oracles employez à leur profit et instruction, en leurs religions fabuleuses: Dieu par sa misericorde daignant à l'aduenture fomenter par ces

ENGLISH

For example, what is more vain than trying to divine God by our analogies and conjectures, to regulate him and the world to our capacity and our laws? And to use, at the expense of the divinity, that little sample of ability that it has pleased him to dispense to our natural condition? And, because we cannot extend our sight as far as his glorious throne, to have brought him down here to our corruption and our miseries?

Of all the human and ancient opinions concerning religion, the one that seems to me to have had the most likelihood and the most excuse is the one that recognized God as an incomprehensible power, origin and preserver of all things, all goodness, all perfection, receiving and taking in good part the honor and reverence that humans paid him under whatever face, whatever name and in whatever manner it might be. Almighty Jupiter, of things, of kings and of gods / The father and the mother. This zeal has everywhere been looked on with favor by heaven. All states have reaped fruit from their devotion. Impious men and impious actions have everywhere met with fitting outcomes.[90]

Pagan histories recognize dignity, order and justice in their fabulous religions, and prodigies and oracles employed for their benefit and instruction: God in his mercy perhaps deigning to 90 Lines of Valerius Soranus, quoted by Saint Augustine, City of God VII.9.

FRENCH

benefices temporels, les tendres principes d'vne telle quelle brute cognoissance, que la raison naturelle leur donnoit de luy, au trauers des fausses images de leurs songes. Non seulement fausses, mais impies aussi et iniurieuses, sont celles que l'homme a forgé de son inuention. Et de toutes les religions, que Sainct Paul trouua en credit à Athenes, celle qu'ils auoyent dediée à vne diuinité cachée et incognue, luy sembla la plus excusable.

2.12.133 Pythagoras adombra la verité de plus pres: iugeant que la cognoissance de cette cause premiere, et estre des estres, deuoit estre indefinie, sans prescription, sans declaration: que ce n'estoit autre chose, que l'extreme effort de nostre imagination, vers la perfection: chacun en amplifiant l'idée selon sa capacité.

2.12.134 Mais si Numa entreprint de conformer à ce proiect la deuotion de son peuple: l'attacher à vne religion purement mentale, sans obiect prefix, et sans meslange materiel: il entreprint chose de nul vsage. L'esprit humain ne se sçauroit maintenir vaguant en cet infini de pensées informes: il les luy faut compiler à certaine image à son modelle. La majesté diuine s'est ainsi pour nous aucunement laissé circonscrire aux limites corporels. Ses sacrements supernaturels et celestes, ont des signes de nostre terrestre condition. Son adoration s'exprime par offices et paroles sensibles: car c'est l'homme, qui croid et qui prie. Ie laisse à part les autres arguments qui s'employent à ce subiect.

Mais à peine me feroit on accroire, que la veuë de noz crucifix, et peinture de ce piteux supplice, que les ornements et mouuements ceremonieux de noz eglises, que les voix accommodées à la deuotion de nostre pensée, et cette esmotion des sens n'eschauffent l'ame des peuples, d'vne passion religieuse, de tres-vtile effect.

2.12.135 De celles ausquelles on a donné corps comme la necessité l'a requis, parmy cette cecité vniuerselle, ie me fusse, ce me semble, plus volontiers attaché à ceux qui adoroient le soleil, La lumiere commune, L'œil du monde: et si Dieu au chef porte des yeux,
Les rayons du soleil sont ses yeux radieux,
Qui donnent vie à tous, nous maintiennent et gardent,

ENGLISH

foster, by these temporal benefits, the tender beginnings of the crude sort of knowledge of him that natural reason gave them through the false images of their dreams. Not only false, but impious and insulting too, are those that man has forged by his own invention. And of all the religions that Saint Paul found in favor at Athens, the one they had dedicated to a hidden and unknown divinity seemed to him the most excusable.[91]

Pythagoras outlined the truth more closely, judging that the knowledge of this first cause and being of beings must be undefined, without prescription, without declaration; that it was nothing else than the utmost effort of our imagination toward perfection, each man enlarging the idea according to his capacity.

But if Numa undertook to shape the devotion of his people to this plan—to attach it to a purely mental religion, with no set object and no material admixture—he undertook something of no use. The human mind cannot keep itself wandering in this infinity of formless thoughts; it must compile them into some image on its own model. Thus the divine majesty has in some measure let itself be confined for us within bodily limits. Its supernatural and heavenly sacraments bear signs of our earthly condition. Its worship is expressed in rites and words perceptible to the senses, for it is man who believes and prays. I leave aside the other arguments used on this subject.[92]

But it would be hard to make me believe that the sight of our crucifixes and the painting of that piteous torment, that the ornaments and ceremonial movements of our churches, that the voices attuned to the devotion of our thought, and this stirring of the senses do not warm the souls of the people with a religious passion of very useful effect.

Of those religions to which a body has been given, as necessity required, amid this universal blindness, I would, it seems to me, have more willingly attached myself to those who worshiped the sun,
The common light,
The eye of the world; and if God has eyes in his head,

91 Acts 17:23, the altar "to an unknown god."
92 Numa Pompilius, the legendary second king of Rome, credited with founding its religious institutions.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Et les faicts des humains en ce monde regardent: Ce beau, ce grand soleil, qui nous faict les saisons, Selon qu'il entre ou sort de ses douze maisons: Qui remplit l'vniuers de ses vertus cognues:	The rays of the sun are his radiant eyes, Which give life to all, maintain and guard us, And watch over the deeds of humans in this world: This fine, this great sun, which makes the seasons for us, As it enters or leaves its twelve houses: Which fills the universe with its known powers:[93]
/ Qui d'vn traict de ses yeux nous dissipe les nuës: L'esprit, l'ame du monde, ardant et flamboyant, En la course d'vn iour tout le ciel tournoyant, Plein d'immense grandeur, rond, vagabond et ferme: Lequel tient dessoubs luy tout le monde pour terme: En repos sans repos, oysif, et sans seiour, Fils aisné de nature, et le pere du iour. D'autant qu'outre cette sienne grandeur et beauté, c'est la piece de cette machine, que nous descouurons la plus esloignée de nous: et par ce moyen si peu cognuë, qu'ils estoyent pardonnables, d'en entrer en admiration et reuerence.	/ Which with one glance of its eyes scatters the clouds for us: The spirit, the soul of the world, burning and blazing, In the course of one day circling the whole sky, Full of immense greatness, round, wandering and fixed: Which holds the whole world beneath it as its bound: At rest without rest, idle, and never pausing, Eldest son of nature, and the father of day. For besides its grandeur and beauty, it is the part of this machine that we find farthest from us, and therefore so little known that they were pardonable for falling into admiration and reverence of it.
2.12.136 Thales, qui le premier s'enquesta de telle matiere, estima Dieu vn esprit, qui fit d'eau toutes choses. Anaximander, que les Dieux estoyent mourants et naissants à diuerses saisons: et que c'estoyent des mondes infinis en nombre. Anaximenes, que l'air estoit Dieu, qu'il estoit produit et immense, tousiours mouuant. Anaxagoras le premier a tenu, la description et maniere de toutes choses, estre conduitte par la force et raison d'vn esprit infini. Alcmæon a donné la diuinité au soleil, à la lune, aux astres, et à l'ame. Pythagoras a faict Dieu, vn esprit espandu par la nature de toutes choses, d'où noz ames sont déprinses. Parmenide, vn cercle entournant le ciel, et maintenant le monde par l'ardeur de la lumiere.	Thales, who was the first to inquire into such matters, considered God a mind that made all things out of water. Anaximander held that the gods were dying and being born at different seasons, and that they were worlds infinite in number. Anaximenes, that air was God, that it was produced and immense, always moving. Anaxagoras was the first to hold that the design and manner of all things was directed by the power and reason of an infinite mind. Alcmaeon gave divinity to the sun, the moon, the stars and the soul. Pythagoras made God a mind spread through the nature of all things, from which our souls are detached. Parmenides, a circle encircling the sky and sustaining the world by the heat of its light.[94]
Empedocles disoit estre des Dieux, les quatre natures, desquelles toutes choses sont faittes. Protagoras, n'auoir rien que dire, s'ils sont ou non, ou quels ils sont. Democritus, tantost que les images et leurs circuitions sont Dieux: tantost cette nature, qui eslance ces images: et puis, nostre science et intelligence. Platon dissipe sa creance à diuers visages. Il dit au Timée, le pere du monde ne se pouuoir nommer. Aux Loix, qu'il ne se faut	Empedocles said that the gods were the four natures of which all things are made. Protagoras, that he had nothing to say about whether they exist or not, or what they are. Democritus said sometimes that images and their revolutions are gods; sometimes that the nature which sends forth these images is; and then, that our knowledge and understanding are. Plato scatters his belief among 93 Pierre de Ronsard, Remonstrance to the People of France (1563). The twelve houses are the signs of the zodiac.

94 This catalogue of opinions on the gods is drawn largely from Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Book I.

FRENCH

enquerir de son estre. Et ailleurs en ces mesmes liures il fait le monde, le ciel, les astres, la terre, et nos ames Dieux, et reçoit en outre ceux qui ont esté receuz par l'ancienne institution en chasque republique. Xenophon rapporte vn pareil trouble de la discipline de Socrates.

Tantost qu'il ne se faut enquerir de la forme de Dieu: et puis il luy fait establir que le soleil est Dieu, et l'ame Dieu: qu'il n'y en a qu'vn, et puis qu'il y en a plusieurs. Speusippus neueu de Platon, fait Dieu certaine force gouuernant les choses, et qu'elle est animale. Aristote, à cette heure, que c'est l'esprit, à cette heure le monde: à cette heure il donne vn autre maistre à ce monde, et à cette heure fait Dieu l'ardeur du ciel. Xenocrates en fait huict. Les cinq nommez entre les planetes, le sixiesme composé de toutes les estoiles fixes, comme de ses membres: le septiesme et huictiesme, le soleil et la lune.

Heraclides Ponticus ne fait que vaguer entre ses aduis, et en fin priue Dieu de sentiment: et le fait remuant de forme à autre, et puis dit que c'est le ciel et la terre. Theophraste se promeine de pareille irresolution entre toutes ses fantasies: attribuant l'intendance du monde tantost à l'entendement, tantost au ciel, tantost aux estoilles. Strato, que c'est Nature ayant la force d'engendrer, augmenter et diminuer, sans forme et sentiment. Zeno, la loy naturelle, commandant le bien et prohibant le mal: laquelle loy est vn animant: et oste les Dieux accoustumez, Iupiter, Iuno, Vesta, Diogenes Apolloniates, que c'est l'aage. Xenophanes faict Dieu rond, voyant, oyant, non respirant, n'ayant rien de commun auec l'humaine nature.

Aristo estime la forme de Dieu incomprenable, le priue de sens, et ignore s'il est animant ou autre chose. Cleanthes, tantost la raison, tantost le monde, tantost l'ame de Nature, tantost la chaleur supreme entourant et enuelopant tout. Perseus auditeur de Zenon, a tenu, qu'on a surnommé Dieux, ceux qui auoyent apporté quelque notable vtilité à l'humaine vie, et les choses mesmes profitables. Chrysippus faisoit vn amas confus de toutes les precedentes sentences, et compte entre mille formes de Dieux qu'il fait, les hommes aussi, qui sont various guises. In the Timaeus he says that the father of the world cannot be named; in the Laws, that we must not inquire into his being. And elsewhere in these same books he makes the world, the sky, the stars, the earth and our souls gods, and accepts besides those that have been accepted by ancient custom in each state. Xenophon reports a similar confusion in the teaching of Socrates.

ENGLISH

Sometimes he says we must not inquire into the form of God; and then Xenophon has him lay down that the sun is God, and the soul is God; that there is only one, and then that there are several. Speusippus, Plato's nephew, makes God a certain force that governs things, and says that it is a living being. Aristotle says now that it is mind, now the world; now he gives this world another master, and now he makes God the fire of the heavens. Xenocrates makes eight: the five that are named among the planets; the sixth composed of all the fixed stars, as its members; the seventh and eighth, the sun and the moon.

Heraclides Ponticus does nothing but wander among his opinions, and in the end deprives God of feeling, and makes him shift from one form to another, and then says that he is the sky and the earth. Theophrastus strolls with the same irresolution among all his notions, attributing the governance of the world now to the understanding, now to the sky, now to the stars. Strato, that it is Nature, having the power to beget, increase and diminish, without form or feeling. Zeno, that it is natural law, commanding good and forbidding evil, which law is a living being; and he does away with the customary gods, Jupiter, Juno, Vesta. Diogenes of Apollonia, that it is age. Xenophanes makes God round, seeing, hearing, not breathing, having nothing in common with human nature.[95]

Aristo considers the form of God incomprehensible, deprives him of the senses, and does not know whether he is a living being or something else. Cleanthes says sometimes reason, sometimes the world, sometimes the soul of Nature, sometimes the supreme heat that surrounds and envelops everything. Perseus, a pupil of Zeno, held that the name of gods was given to those who had brought some notable benefit to human life, and to the useful things themselves. Chrysippus made immortalisez. Diagoras et Theodorus nioyent tout sec, qu'il y eust des Dieux.

95 Cicero, Montaigne's source, has Diogenes say that God is air.

FRENCH

Epicurus faict les Dieux luisants, transparents, et perflables, logez, comme entre deux forts, entre deux mondes, à couuert des coups: reuestus d'vne humaine figure et de nos membres, lesquels membres leur sont de nul vsage. Ego Deùm genus esse semper dixi, et dicam cælitum, / Sed eos non curare opinor, quid agat humanum genus.

2.12.137 Fiez vous à vostre philosophie: vantez vous d'auoir trouué la feue au gasteau, à voir ce tintamarre de tant de ceruelles philosophiques. Le trouble des formes mondaines, a gaigné sur moy, que les diuerses mœurs et fantaisies aux miennes, ne me desplaisent pas tant, comme elles m'instruisent; ne m'enorgueillissent pas tant comme elles m'humilient en les conferant. Et tout autre choix que celuy qui vient de la main expresse de Dieu, me semble choix de peu de prerogatiue. Les polices du monde ne sont pas moins contraires en ce subiect, que les escholes: par où nous pouuons apprendre, que la Fortune mesme n'est pas plus diuerse et variable, que nostre raison, ny plus aueugle et inconsiderée.

Les choses les plus ignorées sont plus propres à estre deifiées. Parquoy de faire de nous des Dieux, comme l'ancienneté, cela surpasse l'extreme foiblesse de discours. I'eusse encore plustost suyuy ceux qui adoroient le serpent, le chien et le bœuf: d'autant que leur nature et leur estre nous est moins cognu; et auons plus de loy d'imaginer ce qu'il nous plaist de ces bestes-là, et leur attribuer des facultez extraordinaires.

Mais d'auoir faict des Dieux de nostre condition, de laquelle nous deuons cognoistre l'imperfection, leur auoir attribué le desir, la cholere, les vengeances, les mariages, les generations, et les parenteles, l'amour, et la ialousie, nos membres et nos os, nos fieures et nos plaisirs, nos morts et sepultures, il faut que cela soit party d'vne merueilleuse yuresse de l'entendement humain. Quæ procul vsque adeo diuino ab numine distant, / Inque Deûm numero quæ sint indigna videri.

ENGLISH

a confused heap of all the foregoing views, and among the thousand forms of gods he creates he counts also men who have been immortalized. Diagoras and Theodorus flatly denied that there were any gods.

Epicurus makes the gods shining, transparent and open to the passage of air, lodged, as between two forts, between two worlds, sheltered from blows; clothed in human shape and with our limbs, which limbs are of no use to them. I have always said, and will say, that there is a race of heavenly gods, / But I do not think they care what the human race does.[96]

Trust in your philosophy! Boast that you have found the bean in the cake, when you see this din from so many philosophical brains! The confusion of worldly forms has won this much from me: that customs and notions different from mine do not so much displease me as instruct me, and do not so much make me proud as humble me when I compare them. And any choice other than the one that comes from the express hand of God seems to me a choice with little claim to preference. The governments of the world are no less at odds on this subject than the schools; from which we can learn that Fortune herself is no more diverse and changeable than our reason, nor more blind and heedless.[97]

The things we know least are the fittest to be deified. Therefore to make gods of ourselves, as antiquity did, goes beyond the utmost feebleness of reasoning. I would sooner have followed those who worshipped the serpent, the dog and the ox, since their nature and their being are less known to us, and we have more license to imagine what we please about those beasts and to attribute extraordinary faculties to them.

But to have made gods of our own condition, whose imperfection we ought to know; to have attributed to them desire, anger, vengeance, marriages, procreation and kinship, love and jealousy, our limbs and our bones, our fevers and our pleasures, our deaths and burials—that must have come from an astonishing drunkenness of the human understanding. Things so very far removed from 96 Ennius, quoted by Cicero in On Divination.

97 Whoever found the bean baked into the Twelfth Night cake was crowned king of the feast.

FRENCH

Formæ, ætates, vestitus, ornatus noti sunt: genera, coniugia, cognationes, omniáque traducta ad similitudinem imbecillitatis humanæ: nam et perturbatis animis inducuntur: accipimus enim Deorum cupiditates, ægritudines, iracundias. Comme d'auoir attribué la diuinité non seulement à la foy, à la vertu, à l'honneur, concorde, liberté, victoire, pieté: mais aussi à la volupté, fraude, mort, enuie, vieillesse, misere: à la peur, à la fieure, et à la male fortune, et autres iniures de nostre vie, fresle et caduque. Quid iuuat hoc, templis nostros inducere mores? / O curuæ in terris animæ et cælestium inanes!

2.12.138 Les Ægyptiens d'vne impudente prudence, defendoyent sur peine de la hart, que nul eust à dire que Serapis et Isis leurs Dieux, eussent autres fois esté hommes: et nul n'ignoroit, qu'ils ne l'eussent esté. Et leur effigie representée le doigt sur la bouche, signifioit, dit Varro, cette ordonnance mysterieuse à leurs prestres, de taire leur origine mortelle, comme par raison necessaire anullant toute leur veneration. Puis que l'homme desiroit tant de s'apparier à Dieu, il eust mieux faict, dit Cicero, de ramener à soy les conditions diuines, et les attirer çà bas, que d'envoyer là haut sa corruption et sa misere: mais à le bien prendre, il a fait en plusieurs façons, et l'vn, et l'autre, de pareille vanité d'opinion.

2.12.139 Quand les philosophes espeluchent la hierarchie de leurs Dieux, et font les empressez à distinguer leurs alliances, leurs charges, et leur puissance, ie ne puis pas croire qu'ils parlent à certes. Quand Platon nous dechiffre le verger de Pluton, et les commoditez ou peines corporelles, qui nous attendent encore apres la ruine et aneantissement de nos corps, et les accommode au ressentiment, que nous auons en cette vie: Secreti celant calles, et myrtea circùm / Sylua tegit; curæ non ipsa in morte relinquunt. Quand Mahumet promet aux siens vn paradis tapissé, paré d'or et de pierreries, peuplé de garses d'excellente beauté, de vins, et de viures singuliers, ie voy bien que ce sont des moqueurs qui se plient à nostre bestise, pour nous emmieller et attirer par ces opinions et esperances, conuenables à nostre mortel appetit.

ENGLISH

the divine power, / And unworthy to be seen among the number of the gods.

Their forms, ages, clothing and ornaments are known; their lineages, marriages, kinships, and everything else has been made to resemble human weakness; for they are even portrayed with troubled minds: we hear of the lusts, the sorrows, the rages of the gods. It is like having attributed divinity not only to faith, virtue, honor, concord, liberty, victory and piety, but also to pleasure, fraud, death, envy, old age and misery; to fear, to fever and to ill fortune, and to the other injuries of our frail and perishable life. What good is it to bring our ways into the temples? / O souls bent down to earth and empty of heavenly things![98]

The Egyptians, with shameless prudence, forbade on pain of hanging that anyone should say that Serapis and Isis, their gods, had once been human; and no one was unaware that they had been. And their image, shown with a finger to the lips, signified, says Varro, this mysterious command to their priests to keep silent about their mortal origin, since by necessary reason that would annul all veneration for them. Since man so desired to make himself God's equal, he would have done better, says Cicero, to bring the divine qualities down to himself and draw them here below, than to send his corruption and misery up there. But rightly considered, he has done both, in several ways, with equal vanity of opinion.

When philosophers pick apart the hierarchy of their gods and bustle about distinguishing their alliances, their offices and their power, I cannot believe they are speaking in earnest. When Plato deciphers for us Pluto's orchard, and the bodily comforts or pains that still await us after the ruin and annihilation of our bodies, and fits them to the feelings we have in this life: Hidden paths conceal them, and a myrtle wood / Surrounds them; their cares do not leave them even in death. When Muhammad promises his followers a paradise hung with tapestries, adorned with gold and precious stones, peopled with girls of surpassing beauty, with wines and choice foods, I see clearly that these are mockers who bend to our stupidity, 98 The prose is from Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods; the verse is from Persius, Satires II.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

to sweeten us with honey and lure us with these notions and hopes suited to our mortal appetite.[99]

Si sont aucuns des nostres tombez en pareil erreur, se promettants apres la resurrection vne vie terrestre et temporelle, accompagnée de toutes sortes de plaisirs et commoditez mondaines. Croyons nous que Platon, luy qui a eu ses conceptions si celestes, et si grande accointance à la diuinité, que le surnom luy en est demeuré, ait estimé que l'homme, cette pauure creature, eust rien en luy d'applicable à cette incomprehensible puissance? et qu'il ait creu que nos prises languissantes fussent capables, ny la force de nostre sens assez robuste, pour participer à la beatitude, ou peine eternelle?

Indeed some of our own have fallen into the same error, promising themselves after the resurrection an earthly and temporal life, accompanied by every kind of worldly pleasure and comfort. Do we believe that Plato—he whose conceptions were so heavenly, and whose acquaintance with divinity was so close that the surname has stayed with him—thought that man, that poor creature, had anything in him applicable to that incomprehensible power? And that he believed our feeble grasp capable, or the strength of our senses robust enough, to share in eternal bliss or eternal pain?[100]

2.12.140 Il faudroit luy dire de la part de la raison humaine: Si les plaisirs que tu nous promets en l'autre vie, sont de ceux que i'ay senti çà bas, cela n'a rien de commun auec l'infinité. Quand tous mes cinq sens de nature, seroient combles de liesse, et cette ame saisie de tout le contentement qu'elle peut desirer et esperer, nous sçauons ce qu'elle peut: cela, ce ne seroit encore rien. S'il y a quelque chose du mien, il n'y a rien de diuin: si cela n'est autre, que ce qui peut appartenir à cette nostre condition presente, il ne peut estre mis en compte. Tout contentement des mortels est mortel.

One would have to tell him, on behalf of human reason: If the pleasures you promise us in the other life are of the kind I have felt here below, that has nothing in common with infinity. Even if all five of my natural senses were filled to the brim with joy, and this soul seized with all the contentment it can desire and hope for—and we know what it is capable of—that would still be nothing. If there is anything of mine in it, there is nothing divine in it; if it is nothing other than what can belong to this present condition of ours, it cannot be taken into account. All the contentment of mortals is mortal.

La recognoissance de nos parens, de nos enfans, et de nos amis, si elle nous peut toucher et chatouïller en l'autre monde, si nous tenons encores à vn tel plaisir, nous sommes dans les commoditez terrestres et finies. Nous ne pouuons dignement conceuoir la grandeur de ces hautes et diuines promesses, si nous les pouuons aucunement conceuoir. Pour dignement les imaginer, il les faut imaginer inimaginables, indicibles et incomprehensibles, et parfaictement autres, que celles de nostre miserable experience. Oeuil ne sçauroit voir, dit Sainct Paul: et ne peut monter en cœur d'homme, l'heur que Dieu prepare aux siens.

If recognizing our parents, our children and our friends can touch and tickle us in the other world, if we still cling to such a pleasure, then we are among earthly and finite comforts. We cannot worthily conceive the greatness of those lofty and divine promises, if we can conceive them at all. To imagine them worthily, we must imagine them unimaginable, unspeakable and incomprehensible, and wholly different from those of our wretched experience. Eye cannot see, says Saint Paul, nor can it enter into the heart of man, the happiness that God prepares for his own.[101]

Et si pour nous en rendre capables, on reforme et rechange nostre estre, comme tu dis Platon par tes purifications, ce doit estre d'vn si extreme changement et si vniuersel, que par la doctrine physique, ce ne sera plus nous: Hector erat tunc cùm bello certabat, at ille Tractus ab Æmonio non erat Hector equo; ce sera quelque

And if, to make us capable of them, our being is reshaped and changed, as you say, Plato, by your purifications, it must be by so extreme and so universal a change that, by the teaching of physics, it will no longer be us: Hector he was while he fought in war; but the one

99 Virgil, Aeneid VI, on the lovers in the underworld.
100 Plato was traditionally called "the divine Plato."
101 1 Corinthians 2:9.

FRENCH

autre chose qui receura ces recompenses. Quod mutatur, dissoluitur, interit ergo:
Traiiciuntur enim partes atque ordine migrant.

2.12.141 Car en la Metempsycose de Pythagoras, et changement d'habitation qu'il imaginoit aux ames, pensons nous que le lyon, dans lequel est l'ame de Cæsar, espouse les passions, qui touchoient Cæsar, ny que ce soit luy? Si c'estoit encore luy, ceux là auroyent raison, qui combattants cette opinion contre Platon, luy reprochent que le fils se pourroit trouuer à cheuaucher sa mere, reuestuë d'vn corps de mule, et semblables absurditez. Et pensons nous qu'és mutations qui se font des corps des animaux en autres de mesme espece, les nouueaux venus ne soyent autres que leurs predecesseurs? Des cendres d'vn phœnix s'engendre, dit-on, vn ver, et puis vn autre phœnix: ce second phœnix, qui peut imaginer, qu'il ne soit autre que le premier?

Les vers qui font nostre soye, on les void comme mourir et assecher, et de ce mesme corps se produire vn papillon, et de là vn autre ver, qu'il seroit ridicule estimer estre encores le premier. Ce qui a cessé vne fois d'estre, n'est plus: Nec si materiam nostram collegerit ætas
Post obitum, rursúmque redegerit, vt sita nunc est,
Atque iterum nobis fuerint data lumina vitæ,
Pertineat quidquam tamen ad nos id quoque factum,
Interrupta semel cùm sit repetentia nostra. Et quand tu dis ailleurs Platon, que ce sera la partie spirituelle de l'homme, à qui il touchera de iouyr des recompenses de l'autre vie, tu nous dis chose d'aussi peu d'apparence.

Scilicet auolsus radicibus vt nequit vllam
Dispicere ipse oculus rem seorsum corpore toto. Car à ce compte ce ne sera plus l'homme, ny nous par consequent, à qui touchera cette iouyssance. Car nous sommes bastis de deux pieces principales essentielles, desquelles la separation, c'est la mort et ruyne de nostre estre. Inter enim iacta est vitaï pausa, vagèque
Deerrarunt passim motus ab sensibus omnes. Nous ne disons pas que l'homme souffre, quand les vers luy rongent ses membres, dequoy il viuoit, et que la terre les consomme: Et nihil hoc ad nos, qui coitu coniugióque
Corporis atque animæ consistimus vniter apti.

ENGLISH

Dragged behind the Thessalian horses was not Hector; it will be something else that receives those rewards. What is changed is dissolved, and therefore perishes;
For its parts are shifted and move out of their order.[102]

For in the metempsychosis of Pythagoras, the change of dwelling he imagined for souls, do we think that the lion in which Caesar's soul dwells takes on the passions that moved Caesar, or that it is he? If it were still he, those would be right who, attacking this opinion in Plato, reproach him that a son might find himself riding his mother, clothed in the body of a mule, and similar absurdities. And do we think that in the changes made from the bodies of animals into others of the same species, the newcomers are no different from their predecessors? From the ashes of a phoenix, they say, is born a worm, and then another phoenix: who can imagine that this second phoenix is no other than the first?

The worms that make our silk—we see them, as it were, die and dry up, and from that same body a moth come forth, and from that another worm, which it would be ridiculous to think is still the first. What has once ceased to be is no more: Nor, if time should gather up our matter after death
And put it back again as it is now arranged,
And the light of life were given to us once more,
Would that event concern us in the least,
Once the thread of our memory had been broken. And when you say elsewhere, Plato, that it will be the spiritual part of man that is to enjoy the rewards of the other life, you tell us something just as improbable.

Just as the eye, torn out by its roots, Cannot see anything when separated from the whole body. For on that reckoning it will no longer be the man, nor consequently us, to whom that enjoyment will fall. For we are built of two principal, essential parts, whose separation is the death and ruin of our being. For a break in life has been thrust between, and all the motions
Have wandered off, scattered far and wide, away from the senses. We do not say that the man suffers when the worms gnaw the limbs he lived by, and the earth consumes them: And this is nothing to us, who 102 The first quotation is from Ovid, Tristia III; the second from Lucretius.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

exist as one whole
Formed by the union and marriage of body and soul.

2.12.142 D'auantage, sur quel fondement de leur iustice peuuent les Dieux recognoistre et recompenser à l'homme apres sa mort ses actions bonnes et vertueuses: puis que ce sont eux mesmes, qui les ont acheminées et produites en luy? Et pourquoy s'offencent ils et vengent sur luy les vitieuses, puis qu'ils l'ont eux-mesmes produict en cette condition fautiue, et que d'vn seul clin de leur volonté, ils le peuuent empescher de faillir? Epicurus opposeroit-il pas cela à Platon, auec grand'apparence de l'humaine raison, s'il ne se couuroit souuent par cette sentence. Qu'il est impossible d'establir quelque chose de certain, de l'immortelle nature, par la mortelle? Elle ne fait que fouruoyer par tout, mais specialement quand elle se mesle des choses diuines.

Moreover, on what foundation of their justice can the gods recognize and reward man after his death for his good and virtuous actions, since it was they themselves who set them going and produced them in him? And why are they offended by his vicious actions and why do they avenge them on him, since they themselves produced him in this faulty condition, and with a single wink of their will they could keep him from going wrong? Would not Epicurus set this against Plato, with great plausibility in human reason, if he did not often shelter behind this maxim: that it is impossible to establish anything certain about immortal nature by means of mortal nature? Mortal nature does nothing but go astray everywhere, but especially when it meddles with divine things.

Qui le sent plus euidemment que nous? Car encores que nous luy ayons donné des principes certains et infallibles, encore que nous esclairions ses pas par la saincte lampe de la verité, qu'il a pleu à Dieu nous communiquer: nous voyons pourtant iournellement, pour peu qu'elle se démente du sentier ordinaire, et qu'elle se destourne ou escarte de la voye tracée et battuë par l'Eglise, comme tout aussi tost elle se perd, s'embarrasse et s'entraue, tournoyant et flotant dans cette mer vaste, trouble, et ondoyante des opinions humaines, sans bride et sans but. Aussi tost qu'elle pert ce grand et commun chemin, elle se va diuisant et dissipant en mille routes diuerses.

Who feels this more plainly than we do? For although we have given it certain and infallible principles, although we light its steps with the holy lamp of truth that it has pleased God to impart to us, we nevertheless see every day that as soon as it strays ever so little from the ordinary path, and turns aside or wanders from the road traced and trodden by the Church, at once it loses itself, entangles and fetters itself, whirling and drifting on this vast, troubled and billowing sea of human opinions, without bridle and without goal. As soon as it loses that great common highway, it goes dividing and scattering into a thousand different routes.

2.12.143 L'homme ne peut estre que ce qu'il est, ny imaginer que selon sa portée. C'est plus grande presomption, dit Plutarque, à ceux qui ne sont qu'hommes, d'entreprendre de parler et discourir des Dieux, et des demy-Dieux, que ce n'est à vn homme ignorant de musique, vouloir iuger de ceux qui chantent: ou à vn homme qui ne fut iamais au camp, vouloir disputer des armes et de la guerre, en presumant comprendre par quelque legere coniecture, les effects d'vn art qui est hors de sa cognoissance.

Man can be only what he is, and imagine only according to his reach. It is greater presumption, says Plutarch, for those who are only men to undertake to speak and reason about gods and demigods than it is for a man ignorant of music to try to judge singers, or for a man who was never in an army camp to try to argue about arms and war, presuming to understand by some slight conjecture the workings of a skill that lies outside his knowledge.

2.12.144 L'ancienneté pensa, ce croy-ie, faire quelque chose pour la grandeur diuine, de l'apparier à l'homme, la vestir de ses facultez, et estrener de ses belles humeurs et plus honteuses necessitez: luy offrant de nos viandes à manger, de nos danses, mommeries et farces à la resiouïr: de nos vestemens à se couurir, et maisons à loger, la

Antiquity thought, I believe, that it was doing something for the divine greatness by likening it to man, clothing it with his faculties, and presenting it with his fine moods and his most shameful necessities: offering it our foods to eat, our dances, caressant par l'odeur des encens et sons de la musique, festons et bouquets, et pour l'accommoder à noz vicieuses passions, flatant sa iustice d'vne inhumaine vengeance: l'esiouïssant de la ruine et dissipation des choses par elle creées et conseruées.

FRENCH

Comme Tiberius Sempronius, qui fit brusler pour sacrifice à Vulcan, les riches despouilles et armes qu'il auoit gaigné sur les ennemis en la Sardeigne: et Paul Æmyle, celles de Macedoine, à Mars et à Minerue. Et Alexandre, arriué à l'Ocean Indique, ietta en mer en faueur de Thetis, plusieurs grands vases d'or: remplissant en outre ses autels d'vne boucherie non de bestes innocentes seulement, mais d'hommes aussi: ainsi que plusieurs nations, et entre autres la nostre, auoyent en vsage ordinaire. Et croy qu'il n'en est aucune exempte d'en auoir faict essay. Sulmone creatos Quattuor hic iuuenes totidem, quos educat Vfens, Viuentes rapit, inferias quos immolet vmbris. Les Getes se tiennent immortels, et leur mourir n'est que s'acheminer vers leur Dieu Zamolxis.

De cinq en cinq ans ils depeschent vers luy quelqu'vn d'entre eux, pour le requerir des choses necessaires. Ce deputé est choisi au sort. Et la forme de le depescher apres l'auoir de bouche informé de sa charge, est, que de ceux qui l'assistent, trois tiennent debout autant de iauelines, sur lesquelles les autres le lancent à force de bras. S'il vient à s'enferrer en lieu mortel, et qu'il trespasse soudain, ce leur est certain argument de faueur diuine: s'il en eschappe, ils l'estiment meschant et execrable, et en deputent encore vn autre de mesmes.

Amestris mere de Xerxes, deuenuë vieille, fit pour vne fois enseuelir touts vifs quatorze iouuenceaux des meilleures maisons de Perse, suyuant la religion du pays, pour gratifier à quelque Dieu sousterrain. Encore auiourd'huy les idoles de Themixtitan se cimentent du sang des petits enfants: et n'aiment sacrifice que de ces pueriles et pures ames: iustice affamée du sang de l'innocence. Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum! Les Carthaginois immoloient leurs propres enfans à Saturne:

ENGLISH

mummeries and farces to amuse it, our clothes to cover itself and our houses to live in; caressing it with the scent of incense and the sound of music, with garlands and nosegays; and, to fit it to our vicious passions, flattering its justice with an inhuman vengeance, delighting it with the ruin and destruction of the things it had created and preserved.

Like Tiberius Sempronius, who had the rich spoils and arms he had won from the enemy in Sardinia burned as a sacrifice to Vulcan; and Paulus Aemilius those of Macedonia, to Mars and Minerva. And Alexander, having reached the Indian Ocean, threw several great golden vessels into the sea in honor of Thetis, filling his altars besides with a slaughter not only of innocent beasts but of men too—as several nations, and among others our own, commonly practiced. And I believe there is none that has not tried it. Four young men born at Sulmo,
And as many reared by the Ufens, he seizes here
Alive, to sacrifice them as offerings to the shades. The Getae consider themselves immortal, and for them dying is merely setting out toward their god Zamolxis.[103]

Every five years they dispatch one of their number to him, to ask him for the things they need. This envoy is chosen by lot. And the manner of dispatching him, after he has been told his errand by word of mouth, is this: of those attending him, three hold up as many javelins, onto which the others hurl him with all the strength of their arms. If he happens to be pierced in a mortal spot and dies at once, that is a sure sign to them of divine favor; if he survives, they consider him wicked and accursed, and send off yet another in the same way.

Amestris, mother of Xerxes, having grown old, once had fourteen young men from the best families of Persia buried alive at one time, following the religion of the country, to gratify some underground god. Even today the idols of Temixtitan are cemented with the blood of little children, and they like no sacrifice but these young and pure souls: a justice starved for the blood of innocence. So many evils could religion prompt! The Carthagini-

103 The verse is Virgil, Aeneid X, on Aeneas taking captives to sacrifice at Pallas's funeral; the Getae, a Thracian people, are described by Herodotus.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
et qui n'en auoit point, en achetoit, estant cependant le pere et la mere tenus d'assister à cet office, auec contenance gaye et contente.	ans sacrificed their own children to Saturn, and anyone who had none bought some; the father and mother, meanwhile, were obliged to attend this rite with a cheerful and contented face.[104]
2.12.145 C'estoit vne estrange fantasie, de vouloir payer la bonté diuine, de nostre affliction. Comme les Lacedemoniens qui mignardoient leur Diane, par bourrellement des ieunes garçons, qu'ils faisoyent fouëter en sa faueur, souuent iusques à la mort.	It was a strange notion, to want to pay divine goodness with our affliction. Like the Lacedaemonians, who pampered their Diana by tormenting young boys, whom they had whipped in her honor, often to death.
C'estoit vne humeur farouche, de vouloir gratifier l'architecte de la subuersion de son bastiment: et de vouloir garentir la peine deuë aux coulpables, par la punition des non coulpables: et que la pauure Iphigenia au port d'Aulide, par sa mort et par son immolation deschargeast enuers Dieu l'armée des Grecs des offences qu'ils auoyent commises: Et casta incestè nubendi tempore in ipso / Hostia concideret mactatu mœsta parentis: et ces deux belles et genereuses ames des deux Decius, pere et fils, pour propitier la faueur des Dieux enuers les affaires Romaines, s'allassent ietter à corps perdu à trauers le plus espez des ennemis. Quæ fuit tanta Deorum iniquitas, vt placari populo Romano non possent, nisi tales viri occidissent?	It was a ferocious notion, to want to gratify the architect by overthrowing his building; and to want to spare the guilty their due penalty by punishing the guiltless; and that poor Iphigenia, at the port of Aulis, should by her death and sacrifice absolve the Greek army before God of the offenses they had committed: And that, a chaste victim, at the very time of her marriage, she should fall unchastely, / A sorrowing sacrifice, slain by her father's stroke; and that those two fine and noble souls, the two Decii, father and son, to win the gods' favor for Roman affairs, should go and hurl themselves headlong into the thickest of the enemy. What great injustice was it in the gods that they could not be appeased toward the Roman people unless such men had died?[105]
2.12.146 Ioint que ce n'est pas au criminel de se faire fouëter à sa mesure, et à son heure: c'est au iuge, qui ne met en compte de chastiment, que la peine qu'il ordonne: et ne peut attribuer à punition ce qui vient à gré à celuy qui le souffre. La vengeance diuine presuppose nostre dissentiment entier, pour sa iustice, et pour nostre peine. Et fut ridicule l'humeur de Polycrates tyran de Samos, lequel pour interrompre le cours de son continuel bon heur, et le compenser, alla ietter en mer le plus cher et precieux ioyau qu'il eust, estimant que par ce malheur aposté, il satisfaisoit à la reuolution et vissicitude de la Fortune.	Besides, it is not for the criminal to have himself whipped by his own measure and at his own time; it is for the judge, who counts as chastisement only the penalty he orders, and cannot regard as punishment what is welcome to the one who suffers it. Divine vengeance presupposes our complete unwillingness, for its justice and for our penalty. And ridiculous was the whim of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, who, to interrupt the course of his continual good fortune and make up for it, went and threw into the sea the dearest and most precious jewel he had, thinking that by this staged misfortune he was paying his due to the turns and vicissitudes of Fortune.
Et elle pour se moquer de son ineptie, fit que ce mesme ioyau reuinst encore en ses mains, trouué au ventre d'vn poisson. Et puis à quel vsage, les deschirements et desmembrements des Corybantes, des Menades, et en noz temps des Mahometans, qui s'esbalaffrent le visage, l'estomach, les membres, pour gratifier leur prophete:	And she, to mock his foolishness, made that same jewel come back into his hands, found in the belly of a fish. And then, what is the use of the tearings and dismemberings of the Corybantes, of the Maenads, and in our own times of the Muslims who slash their faces, chests and limbs to gratify

104 Temixtitan is Tenochtitlan, the Aztec capital (now Mexico City); the Latin line is Lucretius, On the Nature of Things I.
105 Publius Decius Mus, father and son, each vowed himself to death in battle (340 and 295 BC) to win victory for Rome; the prose quotation is from Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods III.

FRENCH

veu que l'offence consiste en la volonté, non en la poictrine, aux yeux, aux genitoires, en l'embonpoinct, aux espaules, et au gosier?

Tantus est perturbatæ mentis et sedibus suis pulsæ furor, vt sic Dij placentur, quemadmodum ne homines quidem sæuiunt. Cette contexture naturelle regarde par son vsage, non seulement nous, mais aussi le seruice de Dieu et des autres hommes: c'est iniustice de l'affoler à notre escient, comme de nous tuer pour quelque pretexte que ce soit. Ce semble estre grand lascheté et trahison, de mastiner et corrompre les functions du corps, stupides et serues, pour espargner à l'ame, la solicitude de les conduire selon raison. Vbi iratos Deos timent, qui sic propitios habere merentur? In regiæ libidinis voluptatem castrati sunt quidam; sed nemo sibi, ne vir esset, iubente Domino, manus intulit. Ainsi remplissoyent ils leur religion de plusieurs mauuais effects.

Sæpius olim / Religio peperit scelerosa atque impia facta.

ENGLISH

their prophet—seeing that the offense lies in the will, not in the breast, the eyes, the genitals, the fleshiness, the shoulders or the throat?[106]

Such is the frenzy of the mind when it is disturbed and driven from its seat that the gods are appeased in ways in which not even men rage. This natural fabric of ours, by its use, concerns not only ourselves but also the service of God and of other men; it is injustice to damage it knowingly, as it is to kill ourselves on any pretext whatever. It seems great cowardice and treachery to maul and corrupt the functions of the body, dull and servile as they are, in order to spare the soul the trouble of directing them according to reason. Where do they fear the gods' anger, who think they earn their favor in this way? Some men have been castrated for the pleasure of a king's lust; but no one, at a master's command, has laid hands on himself so as not to be a man. Thus they filled their religion with many evil effects.[107]

All too often in the past / Religion has given birth to criminal and impious deeds.

SETTING BOUNDS TO GOD

We tie God to our laws of nature and our grammar, though nothing of ours fits him.

FRENCH

2.12.147 Or rien du nostre ne se peut apparier ou raporter en quelque façon que ce soit, à la nature diuine, qui ne la tache et marque d'autant d'imperfection. Cette infinie beauté, puissance, et bonté, comment peut elle souffrir quelque correspondance et similitude à chose si abiecte que nous sommes, sans vn extreme interest et dechet de sa diuine grandeur? Infirmum Dei fortius est hominibus: et stultum Dei sapientius est hominibus. Stilpon le philosophe interrogé si les Dieux s'esiouïssent de nos honneurs et sacrifices: Vous estes indiscret, respondit il: retirons nous à part, si vous voulez parler de cela.

Toutesfois nous luy prescriuons des bornes, nous tenons sa puissance assiegée par nos raisons (i'appelle raison nos resueries et nos songes, auec la dispense de la philosophie, qui dit, le fol mesme et le meschant, forcener par raison: mais que c'est vne raison de particuliere forme) nous le voulons asseruir aux apparences vaines et foibles de nostre entendement, luy

ENGLISH

Now nothing of ours can be likened or related in any way whatsoever to the divine nature without staining and marking it with just so much imperfection. How can that infinite beauty, power and goodness admit any correspondence and likeness to so abject a thing as we are, without extreme injury and loss to its divine greatness? The weakness of God is stronger than men, and the foolishness of God is wiser than men. Stilpo the philosopher, asked whether the gods rejoice in our honors and sacrifices, replied: "You are indiscreet; let us step aside if you want to talk about that."[108]

Yet we prescribe limits to him, we hold his power besieged by our reasons (I call reason our ravings and our dreams, with the dispensation of philosophy, which says that even the fool and the wicked man rave by reason, but that it is a reason of a particular kind); we want to subject him to the vain and feeble appearances of our understanding 106 The Corybantes were the frenzied priests of Cybele; the Maenads, the ecstatic women followers of Bacchus.

107 Both Latin passages are from Saint Augustine, City of God VI, quoting Seneca.
108 1 Corinthians 1:25.

FRENCH

qui a faict et nous et nostre cognoissance. Par ce que rien ne se fait de rien, Dieu n'aura sçeu bastir le monde sans matiere. Quoy, Dieu nous a-il mis en main les clefs et les derniers ressorts de sa puissance? S'est-il obligé à n'outrepasser les bornes de nostre science?

Mets le cas, ô homme, que tu ayes peu remarquer icy quelques traces de ses effects: penses-tu qu'il y ayt employé tout ce qu'il a peu, et qu'il ayt mis toutes ses formes et toutes ses idées, en cet ouurage? Tu ne vois que l'ordre et la police de ce petit caueau où tu és logé, au moins si tu la vois: sa diuinité a vne iurisdiction infinie au delà: cette piece n'est rien au prix du tout: Omnia cùm cœlo terráque marique, / Nil sunt ad summam summaï totius omnem. C'est vne loy municipale que tu allegues, tu ne sçays pas quelle est l'vniuerselle.

Attache toy à ce à quoy tu és subiect, mais non pas luy: il n'est pas ton confraire, ou concitoyen, ou compaignon. S'il s'est aucunement communiqué à toy, ce n'est pas pour se raualer à ta petitesse, ny pour te donner le contrerolle de son pouuoir. Le corps humain ne peut voler aux nuës, c'est pour toy: le soleil bransle sans seiour sa course ordinaire: les bornes des mers et de la terre ne se peuuent confondre: l'eau est instable et sans fermeté: vn mur est sans froissure impenetrable à un corps solide; l'homme ne peut conseruer sa vie dans les flammes: il ne peut estre et au ciel et en la terre, et en mille lieux ensemble corporellement.

C'est pour toy qu'il a faict ces regles: c'est toy qu'elles attaquent. Il a tesmoigné aux Chrestiens qu'il les a toutes franchies quand il luy a pleu. De vray pourquoy tout puissant, comme il est, auroit il restreint ses forces à certaine mesure? en faueur de qui auroit il renoncé son priuilege?

2.12.148 Ta raison n'a en aucune autre chose plus de verisimilitude et de fondement, qu'en ce qu'elle te persuade la pluralité des mondes, Terrámque, et solem, lunam, mare, cætera quæ sunt,
Non esse vnica, sed numero magis innumerali. Les plus fameux esprits du temps passé, l'ont creuë; et aucuns des nostres mesmes, forcez par l'apparence de la raison humaine. D'autant qu'en ce bastiment, que nous voyons, il n'y a rien seul et vn, Cùm in summa res nulla sit vna, Vnica quæ gignatur, et vnica soláque crescat: et que toutes les especes sont multipliées en quelque nombre. Par où il

ENGLISH

—him who made both us and our knowledge. Because nothing is made from nothing, God will not have been able to build the world without matter. What! Has God put into our hands the keys and the ultimate springs of his power? Has he bound himself not to go beyond the limits of our knowledge?

Suppose, O man, that you have been able to make out a few traces of his works here: do you think he has spent on this work all that he could, and put into it all his forms and all his ideas? You see only the order and government of this little cell in which you are lodged—at least if you see that much; his divinity has an infinite jurisdiction beyond it; this piece is nothing compared to the whole: All things, with sky and earth and sea, / Are nothing beside the total sum of the whole sum. It is a local bylaw that you cite; you do not know what the universal law is.

Bind yourself to what you are subject to, but do not bind him: he is not your colleague, or fellow citizen, or companion. If he has revealed himself to you in some degree, it is not to lower himself to your littleness, nor to give you oversight of his power. The human body cannot fly to the clouds: that is for you. The sun moves ceaselessly on its ordinary course; the boundaries of sea and land cannot be confounded; water is unstable and without firmness; a wall without a breach is impenetrable to a solid body; man cannot preserve his life in flames; he cannot be bodily in heaven and on earth and in a thousand places at once.

It is for you that he made these rules; it is you they bind. He has shown Christians that he has overstepped them all whenever it pleased him. Indeed, why, all-powerful as he is, would he have restricted his strength to a certain measure? In whose favor would he have renounced his privilege?

There is nothing in which your reason has more probability and foundation than when it persuades you of the plurality of worlds: That the earth and the sun, the moon, the sea, and all the rest that exist,
Are not unique, but rather numberless in number. The most famous minds of the past believed it, and even some of our own, compelled by the appearance of human reason. For in this structure that we see there is nothing single and alone, Since in the sum of things there is no one thing semble n'estre pas vray-semblable, que Dieu ait faict ce seul ouurage sans compaignon?

FRENCH

et que la matiere de cette forme ayt esté toute espuisée en ce seul indiuidu. Quare etiam atque etiam tales fateare necesse est,
Esse alios alibi congressus materiaï,
Qualis hic est auido complexu quem tenet æther. Notamment si c'est vn animant, comme ses mouuemens le rendent si croyable, que Platon l'asseure, et plusieurs des nostres ou le confirment, ou ne l'osent infirmer: non plus que cette ancienne opinion, que le ciel, les estoilles, et autres membres du monde, sont creatures composées de corps et ame: mortelles, en consideration de leur composition: mais immortelles par la determination du createur.

Or s'il y a plusieurs mondes, comme Democritus, Epicurus et presque toute la philosophie a pensé, que sçauons nous si les principes et les regles de cestuy-cy touchent pareillement les autres? Ils ont à l'auanture autre visage et autre police. Epicurus les imagine ou semblables, ou dissemblables. Nous voyons en ce monde vne infinie difference et varieté, pour la seule distance des lieux. Ny le bled ny le vin se voit, ny aucun de nos animaux, en ce nouueau coin du monde, que nos peres ont descouuert: tout y est diuers. Et au temps passé, voyez en combien de parties du monde on n'auoit cognoissance ny de Bacchus, ny de Ceres.

Qui en voudra croire Pline et Herodote, il y a des especes d'hommes en certains endroits, qui ont fort peu de ressemblance à la nostre. Et y a des formes mestisses et ambigues, entre l'humaine nature et la brutale.

Il y a des contrées où les hommes naissent sans teste, portant les yeux et la bouche en la poitrine: où ils sont tous androgynes: où ils marchent de quatre pates: où ils n'ont qu'vn œil au front, et la teste plus semblable à celle d'vn chien qu'à la nostre: où ils sont moitié poisson par embas, et viuent en l'eau: où les femmes accouchent à cinq ans, et n'en viuent que huict: où ils ont la teste si dure et la peau du front, que le fer n'y peut mordre, et rebouche contre: où les hommes sont sans barbe: des nations, sans vsage de feu: d'autres qui rendent le sperme de couleur noire.

ENGLISH

That is born unique and grows unique and alone, and all species are multiplied in some number. From which it seems improbable that God made this one work without a companion?

and that the matter of this form has been entirely used up in this single individual. Wherefore you must admit again and again
That there are elsewhere other gatherings of matter
Like this one, which the ether holds in its greedy embrace. Especially if it is a living being, as its movements make so credible that Plato affirms it, and many of our own either confirm it or dare not deny it; no more than they deny that ancient opinion that the sky, the stars and the other members of the world are creatures composed of body and soul: mortal by reason of their composition, but immortal by the decree of the creator.

Now if there are several worlds, as Democritus, Epicurus and almost all philosophy have thought, how do we know whether the principles and rules of this one apply likewise to the others? Perhaps they have a different face and a different order. Epicurus imagines them either similar or dissimilar. We see in this world an infinite difference and variety merely from distance of place. Neither wheat nor wine is to be seen, nor any of our animals, in that new corner of the world which our fathers discovered; everything there is different. And in times past, see in how many parts of the world people had no knowledge of either Bacchus or Ceres.

If you will believe Pliny and Herodotus, there are species of men in certain places that bear very little resemblance to ours. And there are mixed and ambiguous forms between human nature and that of beasts.

There are regions where men are born without heads, with their eyes and mouth in their chests; where they are all androgynous; where they walk on all fours; where they have only one eye, in the forehead, and a head more like a dog's than ours; where they are half fish from the waist down and live in the water; where the women give birth at five years old and live only to eight; where their heads and the skin of their foreheads are so hard that iron cannot bite into them but is blunted against them; where the men are beardless; nations without the use of fire; others that emit black sperm.

FRENCH

Quoy ceux qui naturellement se changent en loups, en iumens, et puis encore en hommes? Et s'il est ainsi, comme dit Plutarque, qu'en quelque endroit des Indes, il y aye des hommes sans bouche, se nourrissans de la senteur de certaines odeurs, combien y a il de nos descriptions faulces? Il n'est plus risible, ny à l'aduanture capable de raison et de societé. L'ordonnance et la cause de nostre bastiment interne, seroyent pour la plus part hors de propos.

2.12.149 Dauantage, combien y a il de choses en nostre cognoissance, qui combattent ces belles regles que nous auons taillées et prescriptes à Nature? Et nous entreprendrons d'y attacher Dieu mesme! Combien de choses appellons nous miraculeuses, et contre Nature? Cela se fait par chaque homme, et par chasque nation, selon la mesure de son ignorance. Combien trouuons nous de proprietez occultes et de quint'essences? car aller selon Nature pour nous, ce n'est qu'aller selon nostre intelligence, autant qu'elle peut suiure, et autant que nous y voyons: ce qui est audelà, est monstrueux et desordonné.

Or à ce compte, aux plus aduisez et aux plus habiles tout sera donc monstrueux: car à ceux là, l'humaine raison a persuadé, qu'elle n'auoit ny pied, ny fondement quelconque: non pas seulement pour asseurer si la neige est blanche: et Anaxagoras la disoit noire: s'il y a quelque chose, ou s'il n'y a nulle chose: s'il y a science, ou ignorance: ce que Metrodorus Chius nioit l'homme pouuoir dire. Ou si nous viuons; comme Eurypides est en doubte, si la vie que nous viuons est vie, ou si c'est ce que nous appellons mort, qui soit vie: Τις δ' οιδεν ει ζην τουθ' ο κεκληται θανειν, / Το ζην δε θνεισκειν εστι? Et non sans apparence.

Car pourquoy prenons nous tiltre d'estre, de cet instant, qui n'est qu'vne eloise dans le cours infini d'vne nuict eternelle, et vne interruption si briefue de nostre perpetuelle et naturelle condition? la mort occupant tout le deuant et tout le derriere de ce moment, et encore vne bonne partie de ce moment. D'autres iurent qu'il n'y a point de mouuement, que rien ne bouge: comme les suiuants de Melissus. Car s'il n'y a qu'vn, ny ce mouuement sphærique ne luy peut seruir, ny le mouuement de lieu à autre, comme Platon preuue. Qu'il n'y a ny generation ny corruption en Nature. Protagoras dit qu'il n'y a rien en Nature, que le doubte.

ENGLISH

What about those who naturally change into wolves, into mares, and then back into men? And if it is true, as Plutarch says, that in some part of the Indies there are men without mouths who feed on the smell of certain scents, how many of our descriptions are false? Man is no longer capable of laughter, nor perhaps of reason and society. The arrangement and purpose of our inner structure would for the most part be beside the point.[109]

Moreover, how many things are there within our knowledge that run counter to these fine rules we have cut out and prescribed for Nature? And we will undertake to tie God himself to them! How many things do we call miraculous and contrary to Nature? Every man and every nation does so according to the measure of its ignorance. How many occult properties and quintessences do we find? For to go according to Nature, for us, is only to go according to our understanding, as far as it can follow and as far as we can see; whatever lies beyond is monstrous and disordered.

Now on that reckoning, to the most perceptive and the ablest, everything will be monstrous; for human reason has persuaded them that it had no footing or foundation whatsoever—not even to determine whether snow is white (and Anaxagoras said it was black); whether there is something or nothing; whether there is knowledge or ignorance, which Metrodorus of Chios denied man could say; or whether we are alive—as Euripides is in doubt whether the life we live is life, or whether it is what we call death that is life: Who knows whether living is what is called dying, / And dying is living? And not without plausibility.

For why do we claim the title of being on the strength of this instant, which is but a flash of lightning in the infinite course of an eternal night, and so brief an interruption of our perpetual and natural condition—death occupying all that comes before and all that comes after this moment, and a good part of the moment as well? Others swear that there is no movement, that nothing stirs, like the followers of Melissus. For if there is only One, neither spherical motion can serve it, nor movement from one place to another, as Plato proves. Others, that there is neither generation nor corruption in Nature. Protagoras says there is nothing in Nature but doubt.

109 The schools defined man as the animal capable of laughter, reason and society.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Que de toutes choses on peut esgalement disputer: et de cela mesme, si on peut egalement disputer de toutes choses. Mansiphanes, que des choses, qui semblent, rien est non plus que non est. Qu'il n'y a autre certain que l'incertitude. Parmenides, que de ce qu'il semble, il n'est aucune chose en general. Qu'il n'est qu'vn. Zenon, qu'vn mesme n'est pas. Et qu'il n'y a rien. Si vn estoit, il seroit ou en vn autre, ou en soy-mesme. S'il est en vn autre, ce sont deux. S'il est en soy-mesme, ce sont encore deux, le comprenant, et le comprins. Selon ces dogmes, la nature des choses n'est qu'vne ombre ou fausse ou vaine.

That one can argue equally about everything, and about that very point, whether one can argue equally about everything. Nausiphanes, that of the things that seem to be, none is any more than it is not; that nothing is certain but uncertainty. Parmenides, that of what seems to be, nothing exists in general; that there is only One. Zeno, that not even One exists, and that there is nothing. If One existed, it would be either in another or in itself. If it is in another, there are two. If it is in itself, there are still two, the container and the contained. According to these doctrines, the nature of things is nothing but a shadow, either false or empty.[110]

2.12.150 Il m'a tousiours semblé qu'à vn homme Chrestien cette sorte de parler est pleine d'indiscretion et d'irreuerence: Dieu ne peut mourir, Dieu ne se peut desdire, Dieu ne peut faire cecy, ou cela. Ie ne trouue pas bon d'enfermer ainsi la puissance diuine soubs les loix de nostre parolle. Et l'apparence qui s'offre à nous, en ces propositions, il la faudroit representer plus reueremment et plus religieusement.

It has always seemed to me that for a Christian this way of speaking is full of indiscretion and irreverence: God cannot die, God cannot go back on his word, God cannot do this or that. I do not think it right to confine the divine power in this way under the laws of our speech. And the appearance that presents itself to us in these propositions ought to be expressed more reverently and more religiously.

2.12.151 Nostre parler a ses foiblesses et ses deffaults, comme tout le reste. La plus part des occasions des troubles du monde sont Grammariens. Noz procez ne naissent que du debat de l'interpretation des loix; et la plus part des guerres, de cette impuissance de n'auoir sçeu clairement exprimer les conuentions et traictez d'accord des Princes. Combien de querelles et combien importantes a produit au monde le doubte du sens de cette syllabe, Hoc? Prenons la clause que la logique mesmes nous presentera pour la plus claire. Si vous dictes, Il faict beau temps, et que vous dissiez verité, il faict donc beau temps. Voyla pas vne forme de parler certaine? Encore nous trompera elle.

Our speech has its weaknesses and its defects, like everything else. Most of the occasions of the world's troubles are grammatical. Our lawsuits arise only from debate over the interpretation of laws, and most wars from the inability to express clearly the conventions and treaties of agreement between princes. How many quarrels, and how momentous, have been produced in the world by doubt about the meaning of that one syllable, Hoc? Let us take the clause that logic itself will present to us as the clearest. If you say, "The weather is fine," and you are telling the truth, then the weather is fine. Is that not a sure form of speech? Yet even it will deceive us.[111]

Qu'il soit ainsi, suyuons l'exemple: si vous dites, Ie ments, et que vous dissiez vray, vous mentez donc. L'art, la raison, la force de la conclusion de cette-cy, sont pareilles à l'autre, toutesfois nous voyla embourbez. Ie voy les philosophes Pyrrhoniens qui ne peuuent exprimer leur generale conception en aucune maniere de parler: car il leur faudroit vn nouueau langage. Le nostre est tout

To show that this is so, let us follow the example: if you say, "I am lying," and you are telling the truth, then you are lying. The method, the reasoning and the force of the conclusion are the same in this one as in the other; and yet here we are stuck in the mud. I see that the Pyrrhonist philosophers cannot express their general conception in any 110 The French has "Mansiphanes," a slip for Nausiphanes, a teacher of Epicurus; these views come from Seneca, Letters 88.

111 Hoc ("this") opens the words of consecration, "This is my body," whose meaning Catholics and Protestants disputed.

FRENCH

formé de propositions affirmatiues, qui leur sont du tout ennemies. De façon que quand ils disent, Ie doubte, on les tient incontinent à la gorge, pour leur faire auouër, qu'aumoins assurent et sçauent ils cela, qu'ils doubtent. Ainsin on les a contraints de se sauuer dans cette comparaison de la medecine, sans laquelle leur humeur seroit inexplicable.

Quand ils prononcent, I'ignore, ou, Ie doubte, ils disent que cette proposition s'emporte elle mesme quant et quant le reste: ny plus ny moins que la rubarbe, qui pousse hors les mauuaises humeurs, et s'emporte hors quant et quant elle mesmes. Cette fantasie est plus seurement conceuë par interrogation: Que sçay-ie? comme ie la porte à la deuise d'vne balance.

2.12.152 Voyez comment on se preuault de cette sorte de parler pleine d'irreuerence. Aux disputes qui sont à present en nostre religion, si vous pressez trop les aduersaires, ils vous diront tout destroussément, qu'il n'est pas en la puissance de Dieu de faire que son corps soit en paradis et en la terre, et en plusieurs lieux ensemble. Et ce mocqueur ancien comment il en faict son profit.

Au moins, dit-il, est-ce vne non legere consolation à l'homme, de ce qu'il voit Dieu ne pouuoir pas toutes choses: car il ne se peut tuer quand il le voudroit, qui est la plus grande faueur que nous ayons en nostre condition: il ne peut faire les mortels immortels, ny reuiure les trespassez, ny que celuy qui a vescu n'ait point vescu, celuy qui a eu des honneurs, ne les ait point eus, n'ayant autre droit sur le passé que de l'oubliance. Et afin que cette societé de l'homme à Dieu, s'accouple encore par des exemples plaisans, il ne peut faire que deux fois dix ne soyent vingt. Voyla ce qu'il dit, et qu'vn Chrestien deuroit euiter de passer par sa bouche.

Là où au rebours, il semble que les hommes recherchent cette folle fierté de langage pour ramener Dieu à leur mesure. Cras vel atra
Nube polum Pater occupato,
Vel sole puro, non tamen irritum
Quodcumque retro est efficiet, neque
Diffinget infectúmque reddet,
Quod fugiens semel hora vexit. Quand nous disons que l'infinité des siecles tant passez qu'auenir n'est à Dieu manner of speech, for they would need a new language. Ours is made up entirely of affirmative propositions, which are wholly hostile to them. So that when they say "I doubt," they are at once seized by the throat and made to admit that at least they affirm and know this: that they doubt. Thus they have been forced to take refuge in this comparison from medicine, without which their attitude would be inexplicable.

ENGLISH

When they pronounce "I do not know" or "I doubt," they say that this proposition carries itself away along with the rest, no more and no less than rhubarb, which expels the bad humors and carries itself out along with them. This notion is more surely grasped in the form of a question: "What do I know?"—as I bear it as my motto, with a pair of scales.[112]

See how people take advantage of this irreverent way of speaking. In the disputes now going on in our religion, if you press your opponents too hard, they will tell you point-blank that it is not in God's power to make his body be in paradise and on earth and in several places at once. And see how that ancient mocker makes use of it.[113]

At least, he says, it is no slight consolation to man to see that God cannot do everything: for he cannot kill himself when he wishes, which is the greatest favor we have in our condition; he cannot make mortals immortal, nor bring the dead back to life, nor make one who has lived not to have lived, nor one who has had honors not to have had them, having no other power over the past than forgetfulness. And so that this fellowship between man and God may be coupled further by amusing examples, he cannot make twice ten not be twenty. That is what he says, and what a Christian ought to avoid letting pass his lips.

Whereas, on the contrary, it seems that men seek out this mad arrogance of language to bring God down to their measure. Tomorrow let the Father fill the sky
With black cloud,
Or with pure sunlight; yet he will not make void Whatever lies behind us, nor Reshape and render undone

112 In 1576 Montaigne had a medal struck showing a balance with the motto "Que sais-je?"
113 The Protestants denied Christ's bodily presence in the Eucharist; the "ancient mocker" is Pliny the Elder, Natural History II.

FRENCH

qu'vn instant: que sa bonté, sapience, puissance sont mesme chose auecques son essence; nostre parole le dit, mais nostre intelligence ne l'apprehende point.

2.12.153 Et toutesfois nostre outrecuidance veut faire passer la diuinité par nostre estamine. Et de là s'engendrent toutes les resueries et erreurs, desquelles le monde se trouue saisi, ramenant et poisant à sa balance, chose si esloignée de son poix. Mirum quò procedat improbitas cordis humani, paruulo aliquo inuitata successu. Combien insolemment rabroüent Epicurus les Stoiciens, sur ce qu'il tient l'estre veritablement bon et heureux, n'appartenir qu'à Dieu, et l'homme sage n'en auoir qu'vn ombrage et similitude? Combien temerairement ont ils attaché Dieu à la destinée! (à la mienne volonté qu'aucuns du surnom de Chrestiens ne le facent pas encore) et Thales, Platon, et Pythagoras, l'ont asseruy à la necessité.

Cette fierté de vouloir descouurir Dieu par nos yeux, a faict qu'vn grand personnage des nostres a attribué à la diuinité vne forme corporelle. Et est cause de ce qui nous aduient tous les iours, d'attribuer à Dieu, les euenements d'importance, d'vne particuliere assignation. Par ce qu'ils nous poisent, il semble qu'ils luy poisent aussi, et qu'il y regarde plus entier et plus attentif, qu'aux euenemens qui nous sont legers, ou d'vne suitte ordinaire. Magna Dij curant, parua negligunt. Escoutez son exemple: il vous esclaircira de sa raison: Nec in regnis quidem reges omnia minima curant.

Comme si à ce Roy là, c'estoit plus et moins de remuer vn empire, ou la feuille d'vn arbre: et si sa prouidence s'exerçoit autrement, inclinant l'euenement d'vne battaille, que le sault d'vne puce. La main de son gouuernement, se preste à toutes choses de pareille teneur, mesme force, et mesme ordre: nostre interest n'y apporte rien: noz mouuements et noz mesures ne le touchent pas. Deus ita artifex magnus in magnis, vt minor non sit in paruis. Nostre arrogance nous remet tousiours en auant cette blasphemeuse appariation. Par ce que noz

ENGLISH

What the fleeting hour has once carried off. When we say that the infinity of ages, past as well as to come, is but an instant to God; that his goodness, wisdom and power are one and the same thing as his essence—our speech says it, but our understanding does not grasp it.[114]

And yet our presumption insists on passing the divinity through our sieve. And from this arise all the ravings and errors that have taken hold of the world, as it brings down and weighs on its own scales a thing so far removed from its weight. It is wonderful how far the wickedness of the human heart will go, when lured on by the slightest success. How insolently the Stoics rebuke Epicurus for holding that being truly good and happy belongs only to God, and that the wise man has only a shadow and likeness of it? How rashly they have bound God to destiny! (Would to God that some who bear the name of Christians did not still do so.) And Thales, Plato and Pythagoras have enslaved him to necessity.[115]

This arrogance of wanting to discover God with our eyes led a great man of our faith to attribute a bodily form to the divinity. And it is the cause of what happens to us every day: attributing important events to God by special assignment. Because they weigh on us, it seems they weigh on him too, and that he watches them more fully and attentively than events that are light to us or follow an ordinary course. The gods attend to great things and neglect small ones. Listen to his example; it will make his reasoning clear to you: Nor indeed do kings attend to all the smallest matters in their kingdoms.[116]

As if, to that King, moving an empire or moving the leaf of a tree were more or less of a task; and as if his providence worked differently in tipping the outcome of a battle than in the leap of a flea. The hand of his government lends itself to all things with the same tenor, the same force and the same order; our interest adds nothing to it; our motions and our measures do not touch it. God is so great an artificer in great things that he is no lesser one in small. Our arrogance always brings this blasphemous comparison back to the fore. Because our oc-

114 Horace, Odes III.29.
115 Pliny the Elder, Natural History II.
116 The "great man" is Tertullian; the Latin is from Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods II.

FRENCH

occupations nous chargent, Straton a estreiné les Dieux de toute immunité d'offices, comme sont leurs prestres.

Il fait produire et maintenir toutes choses à Nature: et de ses poids et mouuements construit les parties du monde: deschargeant l'humaine nature de la crainte des iugements diuins. Quod beatum æternúmque sit, id nec habere negotij quicquam, nec exhibere alteri. Nature veut qu'en choses pareilles il y ait relation pareille. Le nombre donc infini des mortels conclud vn pareil nombre d'immortels: les choses infinies, qui tuent et ruinent, en presupposent autant qui conseruent et profitent.

Comme les ames des Dieux, sans langue, sans yeux, sans oreilles, sentent entre elles chacune, ce que l'autre sent, et iugent noz pensées: ainsi les ames des hommes, quand elles sont libres et déprinses du corps, par le sommeil, ou par quelque rauissement, deuinent, prognostiquent, et voyent choses, qu'elles ne sçauroyent veoir meslées aux corps. Les hommes, dit Sainct Paul, sont deuenus fols cuidans estre sages, et ont mué la gloire de Dieu incorruptible, en l'image de l'homme corruptible.

2.12.154 Voyez vn peu ce bastelage des deifications anciennes. Apres la grande et superbe pompe de l'enterrement, comme le feu venoit à prendre au hault de la pyramide, et saisir le lict du trespassé, ils laissoient en mesme temps eschapper vn aigle, lequel s'en volant à mont, signifioit que l'ame s'en alloit en paradis. Nous auons mille medailles, et notamment de cette honneste femme de Faustine, où cet aigle est representé, emportant à la cheuremorte vers le ciel ces ames deifiées. C'est pitié que nous nous pippons de nos propres singeries et inuentions, Quod finxere timent; comme les enfans qui s'effrayent de ce mesme visage qu'ils ont barbouillé et noircy à leur compagnon.

Quasi quicquam infelicius sit homine, cui sua figmenta dominantur. C'est bien loin d'honorer celuy qui nous a faicts, que d'honorer celuy que nous auons faict. Auguste eut plus de temples que Iupiter, seruis auec autant de religion et creance de miracles. Les Thasiens en recompense des biensfaicts qu'ils auoyent receuz d'Agesilaus, luy vindrent dire qu'ils l'auoyent canonisé: Vostre nation, leur dit-il, a elle ce pouuoir de faire Dieu cupations burden us, Strato granted the gods complete exemption from duties, as their priests have.[117]

ENGLISH

He has Nature produce and maintain all things, and constructs the parts of the world out of its weights and motions, relieving human nature of the fear of divine judgments. What is blessed and eternal neither has any trouble itself nor causes any to another. Nature wills that in like things there should be like proportion. The infinite number of mortals therefore implies an equal number of immortals; the infinite things that kill and destroy presuppose as many that preserve and benefit.

Just as the souls of the gods, without tongues, without eyes, without ears, each feel among themselves what the other feels, and judge our thoughts, so the souls of men, when they are free and released from the body by sleep or by some trance, divine, foretell and see things they could not see when mingled with bodies. Men, says Saint Paul, have become fools thinking themselves wise, and have changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the image of corruptible man.[118]

Just look at the trickery of the ancient deifications. After the grand and splendid pomp of the funeral, as the fire began to catch the top of the pyramid and seize the bier of the deceased, they released at that same moment an eagle, which, flying upward, signified that the soul was going to paradise. We have a thousand medals, notably of that respectable woman Faustina, on which this eagle is shown carrying these deified souls up to heaven piggyback. It is a pity that we fool ourselves with our own monkey tricks and inventions, They fear what they have invented, like children who are frightened by the very face they have daubed and blackened on their playmate.[119]

As if anything could be more wretched than man, ruled by his own fictions. Honoring the one we have made is a far cry from honoring the one who made us. Augustus had more temples than Jupiter, served with as much devotion and belief in miracles. The Thasians, in return for the benefits they had received from Agesilaus, came to tell him that they had canonized him. "Has your nation," he said to

117 Saint Augustine, City of God XI.
118 Romans 1:22–23.
119 Faustina, wife of Marcus Aurelius, was reputed to be unfaithful; the Latin is from Lucan, Pharsalia I.

FRENCH

qui bon luy semble? Faictes en pour voir l'vn d'entre vous, et puis quand i'auray veu comme il s'en sera trouué, ie vous diray grand-mercy de vostre offre. L'homme est bien insensé: il ne sçauroit forger vn ciron, et forge des Dieux à douzaines.

Oyez Trismegiste louant nostre suffisance: De toutes les choses admirables a surmonté l'admiration, que l'homme ayt peu trouuer la diuine nature, et la faire.

2.12.155 Voicy des arguments de l'escole mesme de la philosophie. Nosse cui Diuos et cœli numina soli, / Aut soli nescire, datum. Si Dieu est, il est animal, s'il est animal, il a sens, et s'il a sens, il est subject à corruption. S'il est sans corps, il est sans ame, et par consequent sans action: et s'il a corps, il est perissable. Voyla pas triomphé? Nous sommes incapables d'auoir faict le monde: il y a donc quelque nature plus excellente, qui y a mis la main. Ce seroit vne sotte arrogance de nous estimer la plus parfaicte chose de cet vniuers. Il y a donc quelque chose de meilleur. Cela c'est Dieu.

Quand vous voyez vne riche et pompeuse demeure, encore que vous ne sçachiez qui en est le maistre; si ne direz vous pas qu'elle soit faicte pour des rats. Et cette diuine structure, que nous voyons du palais celeste, n'auons nous pas à croire, que ce soit le logis de quelque maistre plus grand que nous ne sommes? Le plus hault est-il pas tousiours le plus digne? Et nous sommes placez au plus bas. Rien sans ame et sans raison ne peut produire vn animant capable de raison. Le monde nous produit: il a donc ame et raison. Chasque part de nous est moins que nous. Nous sommes part du monde.

Le monde est donc fourny de sagesse et de raison, et plus abondamment que nous ne sommes. C'est belle chose que d'auoir vn grand gouuernement. Le gouuernement du monde appartient donc à quelque heureuse nature. Les astres ne nous font pas de nuisance: ils sont donc pleins de bonté. Nous auons besoing de nourriture, aussi ont donc les Dieux, et se paissent des vapeurs de ça bas. Les biens mondains ne sont pas biens à Dieu: ce ne sont donc pas biens à nous. L'offenser, et l'estre offencé sont egalement tesmoignages d'imbecillité: c'est donc follie de them, "the power to make a god of whomever it pleases? Make one of one of yourselves, by way of trial, and then, when I have seen how he fares, I will thank you heartily for your offer." Man is truly out of his mind: he could not make a mite, and he makes gods by the dozen.[120]

ENGLISH

Hear Trismegistus praising our ability: Of all wonderful things, the one that has surpassed all wonder is that man should have been able to find the divine nature and to make it.[121]

Here are some arguments from the school of philosophy itself. To whom alone it is given to know the gods and the powers of heaven, / or alone not to know them. If God exists, he is a living being; if he is a living being, he has senses; and if he has senses, he is subject to corruption. If he is without a body, he is without a soul, and therefore without action; and if he has a body, he is perishable. Isn't that a triumph? We are incapable of having made the world; so there is some more excellent nature that put its hand to it. It would be foolish arrogance to think ourselves the most perfect thing in this universe. So there is something better. That is God.

When you see a rich and magnificent dwelling, even if you do not know who its master is, you will still not say that it was built for rats. And this divine structure that we see of the celestial palace—must we not believe that it is the home of some master greater than we are? Is the highest not always the most worthy? And we are placed at the very bottom. Nothing without soul and reason can produce a living being capable of reason. The world produces us; so it has soul and reason. Each part of us is less than we are. We are part of the world.

So the world is endowed with wisdom and reason, and more abundantly than we are. It is a fine thing to hold great power of government. So the government of the world belongs to some blessed nature. The stars do us no harm; so they are full of goodness. We need nourishment; so the gods need it too, and they feed on the vapors from down here. Worldly goods are not goods to God; so they are not goods to us. To offend and to be offended are

120 Pliny the Elder, Natural History II.
121 Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary author of the Hermetic writings; the passage is from the Asclepius.

FRENCH

craindre Dieu. Dieu est bon par sa nature: l'homme par son industrie, qui est plus. La sagesse diuine, et l'humaine sagesse n'ont autre distinction, sinon que celle-la est eternelle.

Or la durée n'est aucune accession à la sagesse. Parquoy nous voyla compagnons. Nous auons vie, raison et liberté, estimons la bonté, la charité, et la iustice: ces qualitez sont donc en luy. Somme le bastiment et le desbastiment, les conditions de la diuinité, se forgent par l'homme selon la relation à soy. Quel patron et quel modele! Estirons, esleuons, et grossissons les qualitez humaines tant qu'il nous plaira. Enfle toy pauure homme, et encore, et encore, et encore, Non, si te ruperis, inquit. Profectò non Deum, quem cogitare non possunt, sed semetipsos pro illo cogitantes, non illum, sed seipsos, non illi, sed sibi comparant.

2.12.156 Es choses naturelles les effects ne rapportent qu'à demy leurs causes. Quoy cette-cy? elle est au dessus de l'ordre de Nature, sa condition est trop hautaine, trop esloignée, et trop maistresse, pour souffrir que noz conclusions l'attachent et la garottent. Ce n'est par nous qu'on y arriue, cette routte est trop basse. Nous ne sommes non plus pres du ciel sur le mont Senis, qu'au fond de la mer: consultez en pour voir auec vostre astrolabe.

2.12.157 Ils ramenent Dieu iusques à l'accointance charnelle des femmes, à combien de fois, à combien de generations. Paulina femme de Saturninus, matrone de grande reputation à Rome, pensant coucher auec le Dieu Serapis, se trouue entre les bras d'vn sien amoureux, par le macquerellage des prestres de ce temple. Varro le plus subtil et le plus sçauant autheur Latin, en ses liures de la Theologie, escrit, que le secrestin de Hercules, iectant au sort d'vne main pour soy, de l'autre, pour Hercules, ioüa contre luy vn soupper et vne garse: s'il gaignoit, aux despens des offrandes: s'il perdoit, aux siens. Il perdit, paya son soupper et sa garse.

Son nom fut Laurentine, qui veid de nuict ce Dieu entre ses bras, luy disant au surplus, que le lendemain, le premier qu'elle rencontreroit, la payeroit celestement de equally signs of weakness; so it is folly to fear God. God is good by his nature, man by his own effort, which is more. Divine wisdom and human wisdom differ in nothing except that the former is eternal.

ENGLISH

Now duration adds nothing to wisdom. So there we are, partners. We have life, reason and liberty, and we value goodness, charity and justice; so these qualities are in him. In short, the building up and the pulling down of divinity, its very conditions, are forged by man according to their relation to himself. What a pattern, what a model! Let us stretch, raise and swell human qualities as much as we please. Puff yourself up, poor man, and more, and more, and more: "Not even if you burst," he said. Surely it is not God, whom they cannot conceive, but themselves, conceiving themselves in his place; it is not him but themselves that they compare, and not with him but with themselves.[122]

In natural things, effects only half reflect their causes. What about this cause? It is above the order of Nature; its condition is too lofty, too remote and too sovereign to allow our conclusions to bind and fetter it. It is not through ourselves that we reach it; that road runs too low. We are no nearer to heaven on Mont Cenis than at the bottom of the sea: just check it with your astrolabe.[123]

They bring God down even to carnal intercourse with women—how many times over, how many generations of offspring! Paulina, wife of Saturninus, a matron of high repute in Rome, thinking she was sleeping with the god Serapis, found herself in the arms of one of her admirers, through the pandering of the priests of that temple. Varro, the subtlest and most learned of Latin authors, writes in his books on theology that the sacristan of Hercules, casting lots with one hand for himself and with the other for Hercules, played the god for a supper and a girl: if he won, at the expense of the offerings; if he lost, at his own. He lost, and paid for his supper and his girl.[124]

Her name was Larentia, and at night she saw this god in her arms; he told her besides that the first 122 The first words echo Horace's fable of the frog who puffed herself up to rival an ox (Satires II.3); the rest is from Augustine, City of God XII.15.

123 Mont Cenis: a high Alpine pass between Savoy and Italy.
124 The story of Paulina is told by the Jewish historian Josephus (Jewish Antiquities XVIII).

FRENCH

son salaire. Ce fut Taruncius, ieune homme riche, qui la mena chez luy, et auec le temps la laissa heritiere. Elle à son tour, esperant faire chose aggreable à ce Dieu, laissa heritier le peuple Romain. Pourquoy on luy attribua des honneurs diuins. Comme s'il ne suffisoit pas, que par double estoc Platon fust originellement descendu des Dieux, et auoir pour autheur commun de sa race, Neptune: il estoit tenu pour certain à Athenes, qu'Ariston ayant voulu iouïr de la belle Perictyone, n'auoit sçeu.

Et fut aduerti en songe par le Dieu Apollo, de la laisser impollue et intacte, iusques à ce qu'elle fust accouchée. C'estoient les pere et mere de Platon. Combien y a il és histoires, de pareils cocuages, procurez par les Dieux, contre les pauures humains? et des maris iniurieusement descriez en faueur des enfants? En la religion de Mahomet, il se trouue par la croyance de ce peuple, assés de Merlins: assauoir enfants sans pere, spirituels, nays diuinement au ventre des pucelles: et portent vn nom, qui le signifie en leur langue.

2.12.158 Il nous faut noter, qu'à chasque chose, il n'est rien plus cher, et plus estimable que son estre (le lyon, l'aigle, le daulphin, ne prisent rien au dessus de leur espece) et que chacune rapporte les qualitez de toutes autres choses à ses propres qualitez. Lesquelles nous pouuons bien estendre et racourcir, mais c'est tout; car hors de ce rapport, et de ce principe, nostre imagination ne peut aller, ne peut rien diuiner autre, et est impossible qu'elle sorte de là, et qu'elle passe au delà. D'où naissent ces anciennes conclusions. De toutes les formes, la plus belle est celle de l'homme: Dieu donc est de cette forme.

Nul ne peut estre heureux sans vertu: ny la vertu estre sans raison: et nulle raison loger ailleurs qu'en l'humaine figure: Dieu est donc reuestu de l'humaine figure. Ita est informatum anticipatumque mentibus nostris, vt homini, quum de Deo cogitet, forma occurrat humana. Pourtant disoit plaisamment Xenophanes, que si les animaux se forgent des Dieux, comme il est vray-semblable qu'ils facent, ils les forgent certainement de mesme eux, et se glorifient, comme nous.

ENGLISH

man she met the next day would pay her wages on heaven's behalf. It was Taruncius, a rich young man, who took her home with him and in time left her his heir. She in turn, hoping to do something pleasing to the god, left the Roman people her heir. For which she was granted divine honors. As if it were not enough that Plato was descended from the gods on both sides of his family, and had Neptune as the common founder of his line, it was held for certain in Athens that Ariston, wanting to enjoy the beautiful Perictione, had been unable to.[125]

And he was warned in a dream by the god Apollo to leave her unsullied and untouched until she had given birth. These were Plato's father and mother. How many such cuckoldings are there in the histories, contrived by the gods against poor human beings? And how many husbands insultingly disparaged to glorify the children? In the religion of Muhammad, according to the belief of that people, there are plenty of Merlins: that is, children without fathers, spiritual, born divinely in the wombs of virgins; and they bear a name that means this in their language.[126]

We must note that to each thing nothing is dearer or more estimable than its own being (the lion, the eagle, the dolphin prize nothing above their own species), and that each relates the qualities of all other things to its own qualities. These we can certainly stretch or shorten, but that is all; for outside this relation and this principle our imagination cannot go, cannot divine anything else, and it is impossible for it to get out of there and pass beyond. Hence these ancient conclusions. Of all forms, the most beautiful is that of man; so God has this form.

No one can be happy without virtue, nor can virtue exist without reason, and no reason can lodge anywhere but in human shape; so God is clothed in human shape. So firmly is it shaped and fixed beforehand in our minds that when a man thinks of God, a human form comes to him. That is why Xenophanes said wittily that if animals forge gods for themselves, as it is likely they do, they surely forge them in their own image, and glorify themselves as we do.[127]

125 Acca Larentia, honored at the Roman festival of the Larentalia; Montaigne follows Augustine's account (City of God VI.7).
126 Merlin, the enchanter of Arthurian romance, was said to have been fathered by a spirit on a mortal woman.

FRENCH

Car pourquoy ne dira un oyson ainsi: Toutes les pieces de l'vniuers me regardent, la terre me sert à marcher, le soleil à m'esclairer, les estoilles à m'inspirer leurs influances: i'ay telle commodité des vents, telle des eaux: il n'est rien que cette voute regarde si fauorablement que moy: ie suis le mignon de Nature? Est-ce pas l'homme qui me traicte, qui me loge, qui me sert: C'est pour moy qu'il fait et semer et moudre: s'il me mange, aussi fait-il bien l'homme son compagnon; et si fay-ie moy les vers qui le tuent, et qui le mangent. Autant en diroit une gruë; et plus magnifiquement encore pour la liberté de son vol, et la possession de cette belle et haulte region.

Tam blanda conciliatrix, et tam sui est Iena ipsa natura.

2.12.159 Or donc par ce mesme train, pour nous sont les destinées, pour nous le monde, il luict, il tonne pour nous; et le createur, et les creatures, tout est pour nous. C'est le but et le poinct où vise l'vniuersité des choses. Regardés le registre que la philosophie a tenu deux mille ans, et plus, des affaires celestes: les Dieux n'ont agi, n'ont parlé, que pour l'homme: elle ne leur attribue autre consultation, et autre vacation. Les voyla contre nous en guerre.

Domitósque Herculea manu
Telluris iuuenes, vnde periculum
Fulgens contremuit domus
Saturni veteris. Les voicy partisans de noz troubles, pour nous rendre la pareille de ce que tant de fois nous sommes partisans des leurs: Neptunus muros magnóque emula tridenti
Fundamenta quatit, totámque à sedibus vrbem
Eruit: hîc Iuno Scæas sæuissima portas
Prima tenet. Les Cauniens, pour la ialousie de la domination de leurs Dieux propres, prennent armes en dos, le iour de leur deuotion, et vont courant toute leur banlieue, frappant l'air par-cy par-là, à tout leurs glaiues, pourchassant ainsin à outrance, et bannissant les Dieux estrangers de leur territoire. Leurs puissances sont retranchées selon nostre necessité.

Qui guerit les cheuaux, qui les hommes, qui la peste, qui la teigne, qui la toux, qui vne sorte de gale, qui vne autre:

ENGLISH

For why should a gosling not say this: "All the parts of the universe look to me; the earth serves me to walk on, the sun to light my way, the stars to breathe their influences into me; I get such-and-such a benefit from the winds, such-and-such from the waters; there is nothing this vault looks on so favorably as me; I am Nature's darling. Is it not man who tends me, houses me, serves me? It is for me that he has the sowing and the milling done. If he eats me, so too does man eat his fellow man; and so do I eat the worms that kill and eat him"? A crane would say as much, and still more grandly, because of the freedom of its flight and its possession of that fine high region.

So flattering a go-between, and so much her own procuress, is nature herself.

Well then, by this same line of reasoning, the fates are for us, the world is for us; it shines, it thunders for us; creator and creatures alike, everything is for us. That is the goal and the target at which the whole universe of things aims. Look at the record of heavenly affairs that philosophy has kept for two thousand years and more: the gods have acted, have spoken, only for man; philosophy gives them no other deliberation and no other occupation. Here they are at war against us.

And the sons of Earth tamed by Hercules' hand, a peril at which the shining house of old Saturn trembled. Here they are taking sides in our troubles, to pay us back for the many times we have taken sides in theirs: Neptune shakes the walls and the foundations loosened by his great trident, and tears the whole city from its seat and overturns it; here Juno, most cruel, is first to seize the Scaean gates. The Caunians, jealous for the dominion of their own gods, put on their armor on their feast day and go running all over their surrounding district, striking the air here and there with their swords, thus hunting the foreign gods down to the last and driving them out of their territory. The gods' powers are cut down to suit our needs.[128]

One heals horses, another men, one the plague, one ringworm, one the cough, one one kind of 127 Xenophanes: Greek poet and philosopher of the 6th century BC, a critic of gods made in human likeness.

FRENCH

adeo minimis etiam rebus praua religio inserit Deos: qui fait naistre les raisins, qui les aux: qui a la charge de la paillardise, qui de la marchandise: à chasque race d'artisans, vn Dieu: qui a sa prouince en Orient, et son credit, qui en Ponant, Hîc illius arma, Hîc currus fuit.
O Sancte Apollo, qui vmbilicum certum terrarum obtines!

/ Pallada Cecropidæ, Minoïa Creta Dianam,
Vulcanum tellus Hipsipylæa colit,
Iunonem Sparte, Pelopeïadèsque Micenæ;
Pinigerum Fauni Mænalis ora caput,
Mars Latio venerandus. Qui n'a qu'vn bourg ou vne famille en sa possession: qui loge seul, qui en compagnie, ou volontaire ou necessaire. Iunctáque sunt magno templa nepotis auo. Il en est de si chetifs et populaires, car le nombre s'en monte iusques à trente six mille, qu'il en faut entasser bien cinq ou six à produire vn espic de bled, et en prennent leurs noms diuers. Trois à vne porte: celuy de l'ais, celuy du gond, celuy du seuil. Quatre à vn enfant, protecteurs de son maillot, de son boire, de son manger, de son tetter.

Aucuns certains, aucuns incertains et doubteux. Aucuns, qui n'entrent pas encore en paradis. Quos, quoniam cœli nondum dignamur honore, / Quas dedimus, certè terras habitare sinamus. Il en est de physiciens, de poëtiques, de ciuils. Aucuns, moyens entre la diuine et humaine nature, mediateurs, entremetteurs de nous à Dieu. Adorez par certain second ordre d'adoration, et diminutif. Infinis en tiltres et offices: les vns bons, les autres mauuais. Il en est de vieux et cassez, et en est de mortels. Car Chrysippus estimoit qu'en la derniere conflagration du monde tous les Dieux auroyent à finir, sauf Iuppiter. L'homme forge mille plaisantes societez entre Dieu et luy. Est-il pas son compatriote? Iouis incunabula Creten.

2.12.160 Voicy l'excuse, que nous donnent, sur la consideration de ce subject, Sceuola grand pontife, et Varron grand itch, another another: so far does perverse religion thrust gods even into the smallest things; one makes grapes grow, another garlic; one is in charge of lechery, another of trade; for each kind of craftsman a god; one has his province and his authority in the East, another in the West: Here were her arms, here her chariot.

ENGLISH

O holy Apollo, who hold the sure navel of the earth!

/ The sons of Cecrops worship Pallas, Minoan Crete Diana, the land of Hypsipyle Vulcan, Sparta and Pelops' Mycenae Juno;
the land of Maenalus the pine-crowned head of Faunus;
Mars is to be revered in Latium. One has only a village or a family in his possession; one lives alone, another in company, by choice or by necessity. And the grandson's temple is joined to his great-grandfather's. Some are so puny and plebeian (for their number rises to thirty-six thousand) that five or six of them have to be heaped together to produce one ear of wheat, and they take their various names from it. Three for a door: the god of the panel, the god of the hinge, the god of the threshold. Four for a child: protectors of its swaddling clothes, its drinking, its eating, its suckling.

Some certain, some uncertain and doubtful. Some who are not yet admitted to paradise: Since we do not yet deem them worthy of the honor of heaven, / let us at least allow them to dwell in the lands we have given them. There are gods of the natural philosophers, gods of the poets, gods of the state. Some are midway between divine and human nature, mediators, go-betweens between us and God, worshiped with a certain secondary, lesser order of worship. Endless in titles and offices: some good, others bad. There are old, broken-down ones, and there are mortal ones. For Chrysippus held that in the final conflagration of the world all the gods would come to an end except Jupiter. Man forges a thousand amusing partnerships between God and himself. Is God not his fellow countryman? Crete, the cradle of Jove.

Here is the excuse given us, on reflecting about this subject, by Scaevola, the high pontiff, and theologien, en leur temps: Qu'il est besoin que le peuple ignore beaucoup de choses vrayes, et en croye beaucoup de fausses. Quum veritatem, qua liberetur, inquirat: credatur ei expedire, quod fallitur. Les yeux humains ne peuuent apperceuoir les choses que par les formes de leur cognoissance. Et ne nous souuient pas quel sault print le miserable Phaëthon pour auoir voulu manier les renes des cheuaux de son pere, d'vne main mortelle. Nostre esprit retombe en pareille profondeur, se dissipe et se froisse de mesme, par sa temerité.

FRENCH

Si vous demandez à la philosophie de quelle matiere est le soleil, que vous respondra elle, sinon, de fer, et de pierre, ou autre estoffe de son vsage? S'enquiert-on à Zenon que c'est que Nature? Vn feu, dit-il, artiste, propre à engendrer, procedant reglément. Archimedes maistre de cette science qui s'attribue la presseance sur toutes les autres en verité et certitude: Le soleil, dit-il, est vn Dieu de fer enflammé. Voyla pas vne belle imagination produicte de l'ineuitable necessité des demonstrations geometriques?

Non pourtant si ineuitable et vtile, que Socrates n'ayt estimé, qu'il suffisoit d'en sçauoir, iusques à pouuoir arpenter la terre qu'on donnoit et receuoit: et que Polyænus, qui en auoit esté fameux et illustre docteur, ne les ayt prises à mespris, comme pleines de fauceté, et de vanité apparente, après qu'il eut gousté les doux fruicts des iardins poltronesques d'Epicurus. Socrates en Xenophon sur ce propos d'Anaxagoras, estimé par l'antiquité entendu au dessus de touts autres, és choses celestes et diuines, dit, qu'il se troubla du cerueau, comme font tous hommes, qui perscrutent immoderément les cognoissances, qui ne sont de leur appartenance.

Sur ce qu'il faisoit le soleil vne pierre ardente, il ne s'aduisoit pas, qu'vne pierre ne luit point au feu, et, qui pis est, qu'elle s'y consomme. En ce qu'il faisoit vn, du soleil et du feu, que le feu ne noircit pas ceux qu'il regarde: que nous regardons fixement le feu: que le feu tue les plantes et les herbes. C'est à l'aduis de Socrates, et au mien aussi, le plus sagement iugé du ciel, que n'en iuger point. Platon ayant à parler des daimons au Timée: C'est entreprinse, dit-il, qui surpasse nostre portée: il en faut croire ces anciens, qui se sont dicts engendrez d'eux.

ENGLISH

Varro, the great theologian of their day: that the people must be ignorant of many true things and believe many false ones. Since he seeks the truth that would set him free, let us believe it is good for him to be deceived. Human eyes can perceive things only through the forms of their own knowledge. And we do not remember what a fall wretched Phaethon took for trying to handle the reins of his father's horses with a mortal hand. Our mind falls back into a like abyss, and is scattered and shattered in the same way, by its rashness.[129]

If you ask philosophy what the sun is made of, what will it answer, if not iron and stone, or some other stuff it is used to? Ask Zeno what Nature is: "A fire," he says, "artful, fit for generating, proceeding methodically." Archimedes, master of that science which claims precedence over all others in truth and certainty, says: "The sun is a god of red-hot iron." Isn't that a fine notion, produced by the inescapable necessity of geometrical demonstrations?

Not so inescapable and useful, however, that Socrates did not think it enough to know as much of it as would let one survey the land one gave and received; or that Polyaenus, who had been a famous and illustrious teacher of it, did not come to scorn these demonstrations as full of falsity and obvious vanity, once he had tasted the sweet fruits of Epicurus' idle gardens. Socrates, in Xenophon, speaking of Anaxagoras, whom antiquity considered more expert than anyone else in heavenly and divine matters, says that he went wrong in the head, as do all men who pry immoderately into kinds of knowledge that are not their business.[130]

When he made the sun a burning stone, he did not notice that a stone does not shine in fire and, what is worse, is consumed by it. When he made the sun and fire one and the same, he did not notice that fire does not blacken those it looks upon; that we can stare at fire; that fire kills plants and grasses. In the opinion of Socrates, and in mine too, the wisest judgment about heaven is to make none. Plato, having to speak of daimons in the Timaeus, says: "It is an undertaking beyond our 128 The Caunians lived at Caunus in Caria, in Asia Minor; the custom is reported by Herodotus (I.172).

129 Quintus Mucius Scaevola, Roman jurist and chief pontiff; Montaigne takes both opinions from Augustine, City of God IV.
130 Polyaenus: a mathematician who became a disciple and friend of Epicurus.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

reach; we must believe those ancients who said they were begotten by them.

C'est contre raison de refuser foy aux enfants des Dieux, encore que leur dire ne soit estably par raisons necessaires, ny vray-semblables: puis qu'ils nous respondent, de parler de choses domestiques et familieres.

It is against reason to refuse belief to the children of the gods, even though what they say is not established by necessary or even probable reasons, since they assure us they are speaking of domestic, family matters."

THE HEAVENS AND THE BODY

Our sciences of the stars and of man are poetic fictions built on guesses.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.161 Voyons si nous auons quelque peu plus de clarté en la cognoissance des choses humaines et naturelles. N'est-ce pas vne ridicule entreprinse, à celles ausquelles par nostre propre confession nostre science ne peut atteindre, leur aller forgeant vn autre corps, et prestant vne forme faulce de nostre inuention: comme il se void au mouuement des planetes, auquel d'autant que nostre esprit ne peut arriuer, ny imaginer sa naturelle conduite, nous leur prestons du nostre, des ressors materiels, lourds, et corporels: Temo aureus, aurea summæ / Curuatura rotæ, radiorum argenteus ordo. Vous diriez que nous auons eu des cochers, des charpentiers, et des peintres, qui sont allez dresser là hault des engins à diuers mouuemens, et ranger les roüages et entrelassemens des corps celestes bigarrez en couleur, autour du fuseau de la necessité, selon Platon.

Let us see whether we have a little more clarity in our knowledge of human and natural things. Is it not a ridiculous undertaking, for things that by our own admission our knowledge cannot reach, to go forging them another body and lending them a false form of our own invention? We see this in the movement of the planets: since our mind cannot reach it or imagine how it naturally proceeds, we lend them something of our own—material springs, heavy and corporeal: Golden was the pole, golden the curve / of the wheel's rim, silver the row of spokes. You would think we had had coachmen, carpenters and painters who went up there to set up machines with various motions, and to arrange the wheelwork and interlacings of the heavenly bodies, painted in many colors, around the spindle of Necessity, as Plato has it.

Mundus domus est maxima rerum,
Quam quinque altitonæ fragmine zonæ
Cingunt, per quam limbus pictus bis sex signis
Stellimicantibus, altus in obliquo æthere, lunæ
Bigas acceptat. Ce sont tous songes et fanatiques folies. Que ne plaist-il vn iour à Nature nous ouurir son sein, et nous faire voir au propre, les moyens et la conduicte de ses mouuements, et y preparer nos yeux? O Dieu quels abus, quels mescomtes nous trouuerions en nostre pauure science! Ie suis trompé, si elle tient vne seule chose, droictement en son poinct: et m'en partiray d'icy plus ignorant toute autre chose, que mon ignorance.

The world is the greatest house of all things, which five high-thundering zones in their segments gird, and through which a band painted with twice six star-glittering signs, high in the slanting ether, receives the moon's two-horse chariot. These are all dreams and frenzied follies. Why will Nature not be pleased one day to open her bosom to us, show us exactly the means and workings of her movements, and prepare our eyes for it? O God, what errors, what miscalculations we would find in our poor science! I am much mistaken if it holds a single thing exactly right; and I shall leave this place more ignorant of everything else than of my ignorance.[131]

2.12.162 Ay-ie pas veu en Platon ce diuin mot, que Nature n'est rien qu'vne poësie ainigmatique? Comme, peut estre, qui diroit, vne peinture voilée et tenebreuse, entreluisant

Did I not see in Plato that divine saying, that Nature is nothing but an enigmatic poem? As one might say, perhaps, a veiled and shadowy paint-131 Lines attributed to Varro.

FRENCH

d'vne infinie varieté de faux iours à exercer noz coniectures. Latent ista omnia crassis occultata et circumfusa tenebris: vt nulla acies humani ingenij tanta sit, quæ penetrare in cœlum, terram intrare possit. Et certes la philosophie n'est qu'vne poësie sophistiquée. D'où tirent ces autheurs anciens toutes leurs authoritez, que des poëtes? Et les premiers furent poetes eux mesmes, et la traicterent en leur art. Platon n'est qu'vn poete descousu. Toutes les sciences sur-humaines s'accoustrent du stile poetique.

Tout ainsi que les femmes employent des dents d'yuoire, où les leurs naturelles leur manquent, et au lieu de leur vray teint, en forgent vn de quelque matiere estrangere: comme elles font des cuisses de drap et de feutre, et de l'embonpoinct de coton: et au veu et sçeu d'vn chacun s'embellissent d'vne beauté fauce et empruntée: ainsi fait la science (et nostre droict mesme a, dit-on, des fictions legitimes sur lesquelles il fonde la verité de sa iustice) elle nous donne en payement et en presupposition, les choses qu'elle mesmes nous apprend estre inuentées: car ces epicycles, excentriques, concentriques, dequoy l'astrologie s'aide à conduire le bransle de ses estoilles, elle nous les donne, pour le mieux qu'elle ait sçeu inuenter en ce subject: comme aussi au reste, la philosophie nous presente, non pas ce qui est, ou ce qu'elle croit, mais ce qu'elle forge ayant plus d'apparence et de gentillesse.

Platon sur le discours de l'estat de nostre corps et de celuy des bestes: Que ce, que nous auons dict, soit vray, nous en asseurerions, si nous auions sur cela confirmation d'vn oracle. Seulement nous asseurons, que c'est le plus vray-semblablement, que nous ayons sçeu dire.

2.12.163 Ce n'est pas au ciel seulement qu'elle enuoye ses cordages, ses engins et ses rouës: considerons vn peu ce qu'elle dit de nous mesmes et de nostre contexture. Il n'y a pas plus de retrogradation, trepidation, accession, reculement, rauissement, aux astres et corps celestes, qu'ils en ont forgé en ce pauure petit corps humain. Vrayement ils ont eu par là, raison de l'appeller le petit monde, tant ils ont employé de pieces, et de visages à le maçonner et bastir. Pour accommoder les mouuemens qu'ils voyent en l'homme, les diuerses functions et facultez que nous sentons en nous, en combien de parties ont ils diuisé nostre ame? en combien de sieges logée?

ENGLISH

ing, glimmering with an infinite variety of false lights to exercise our conjectures. All these things lie hidden, concealed and wrapped in thick darkness, so that no human intellect is keen enough to penetrate heaven or to enter the earth. And certainly philosophy is nothing but adulterated poetry. Where do those ancient authors get all their authorities, if not from the poets? And the first philosophers were poets themselves, and treated philosophy in their art. Plato is nothing but a rambling poet. All the superhuman sciences dress themselves up in the poetic style.

Women use ivory teeth where their natural ones are missing, and instead of their true complexion forge one out of some foreign material; they make thighs of cloth and felt, and plumpness out of cotton, and in full view and knowledge of everyone embellish themselves with a false and borrowed beauty. Science does just the same. (Even our law, they say, has legitimate fictions on which it founds the truth of its justice.) Science hands us, as payment and as premises, the very things it tells us are invented. For those epicycles, eccentrics and concentrics with which astronomy helps itself to steer the motion of its stars—it gives them to us as the best it has been able to invent on that subject; just as, for the rest, philosophy presents us not with what is, or with what it believes, but with what it forges as having the most plausibility and charm.

Plato, discussing the state of our body and that of beasts, says: "That what we have said is true, we would affirm if we had confirmation of it from an oracle. We affirm only that it is the most probable thing we have been able to say."

It is not only to the heavens that philosophy sends its ropes, its machines and its wheels; let us consider a little what it says about ourselves and our makeup. There is no more retrogradation, trepidation, accession, recession and rapture in the stars and heavenly bodies than they have forged in this poor little human body. Truly they had good reason to call it the little world, so many pieces and facets did they use to build and put it together. To account for the movements they see in man, and the various functions and faculties we feel in ourselves, into how many parts have they divided our soul? In how many seats have they lodged it?

FRENCH

à combien d'ordres et d'estages ont-ils departy ce pauure homme, outre les naturels et perceptibles? et à combien d'offices et de vacations? Ils en font vne chose publique imaginaire. C'est vn subject qu'ils tiennent et qu'ils manient: on leur laisse toute puissance de le descoudre, renger, rassembler, et estoffer, chacun à sa fantasie; et si ne le possedent pas encore. Non seulement en verité, mais en songe mesmes, ils ne le peuuent regler, qu'il ne s'y trouue quelque cadence, ou quelque son, qui eschappe à leur architecture, toute enorme qu'elle est, et rapiecée de mille lopins faux et fantastiques. Et ce n'est pas raison de les excuser.

Car aux peintres, quand ils peignent le ciel, la terre, les mers, les monts, les isles escartées, nous leur condonons, qu'ils nous en rapportent seulement quelque marque legere: et comme de choses ignorées, nous contentons d'vn tel quel ombrage et feint. Mais quand ils nous tirent apres le naturel, ou autre subject, qui nous est familier et cognu, nous exigeons d'eux vne parfaicte et exacte representation des lineaments, et des couleurs: et les mesprisons, s'ils y faillent.

2.12.164 Ie sçay bon gré à la garce Milesienne, qui voyant le philosophe Thales s'amuser continuellement à la contemplation de la voute celeste, et tenir tousiours les yeux esleuez contre-mont, luy mit en son passage quelque chose à le faire broncher, pour l'aduertir, qu'il seroit temps d'amuser son pensement aux choses qui estoient dans les nues, quand il auroit pourueu à celles qui estoient à ses pieds. Elle luy conseilloit certes bien, de regarder plustost à soy qu'au ciel.

Car, comme dit Democritus par la bouche de Cicero, Quod est ante pedes, nemo spectat: cœli scrutantur plagas. Mais nostre condition porte, que la cognoissance de ce que nous auons entre mains, est aussi esloignée de nous, et aussi bien au dessus des nuës, que celle des astres. Comme dit Socrates en Platon, qu'à quiconque se mesle de la philosophie, on peut faire le reproche que fait cette femme à Thales, qu'il ne void rien de ce qui est deuant luy. Car tout philosophe ignore ce que fait son voisin: ouï et ce qu'il fait luy-mesme, et ignore ce qu'ils sont tous deux, ou bestes, ou hommes.

2.12.165 Ces gens icy, qui trouuent les raisons de Sebonde trop foibles, qui n'ignorent rien, qui gouuernent le monde, qui sçauent tout: Quæ mare compescant causæ, quid temperet annum,

ENGLISH

Into how many orders and stories have they divided up this poor man, beyond the natural and perceptible ones? And into how many offices and occupations? They make him an imaginary commonwealth. He is a subject they hold and handle; they are given full power to unstitch him, arrange him, reassemble him and stuff him, each according to his fancy; and still they do not master him. Not only in reality but even in dreams, they cannot regulate him without some cadence or some sound escaping their architecture, enormous as it is, and patched together from a thousand false and fantastic scraps. And it is not right to excuse them.

For with painters, when they paint the sky, the earth, the seas, the mountains, the distant islands, we let them off with giving us only some slight indication; and since these things are unknown to us, we are content with any sort of shadowy, imagined rendering. But when they draw us from life, or some other subject that is familiar and known to us, we demand of them a perfect and exact representation of the lines and colors, and we despise them if they fail.

I am grateful to the Milesian girl who, seeing the philosopher Thales constantly absorbed in contemplating the vault of heaven, his eyes always raised upward, put something in his path to make him stumble, to warn him that it would be time to occupy his thoughts with things in the clouds once he had seen to those at his feet. She certainly gave him good advice: to look at himself rather than at the sky.

For, as Democritus says through the mouth of Cicero, No one looks at what lies before his feet; they scan the regions of the sky. But our condition is such that the knowledge of what we have in our hands is as far from us, and as high above the clouds, as that of the stars. As Socrates says in Plato, anyone who meddles with philosophy may be reproached as that woman reproached Thales: he sees nothing of what is in front of him. For every philosopher is ignorant of what his neighbor is doing—yes, and of what he himself is doing—and is ignorant of what they both are, beasts or men.

These people who find Sebond's arguments too weak, who are ignorant of nothing, who govern the world, who know everything—What causes restrain the sea, what governs the year,

FRENCH

Stellæ sponte sua, iussæue vagentur et errent:
Quid premat obscurum Lunæ, quid proferat orbem,
Quid velit et possit rerum concordia discors: n'ont ils pas quelquesfois sondé parmy leurs liures, les difficultez qui se presentent, à cognoistre leur estre propre?

Nous voyons bien que le doigt se meut, et que le pied se meut, qu'aucunes parties se branslent d'elles mesmes sans nostre congé, et que d'autres nous les agitons par nostre ordonnance, que certaine apprehension engendre la rougeur, certaine autre la palleur, telle imagination agit en la rate seulement, telle autre au cerueau, l'vne nous cause le rire, l'autre le pleurer, telle autre transit et estonne tous noz sens, et arreste le mouuement de noz membres, à tel object l'estomach se sousleue, à tel autre quelque partie plus basse.

Mais comme vne impression spirituelle, face vne telle faucée dans vn subject massif, et solide, et la nature de la liaison et cousture de ces admirables ressorts, iamais homme ne l'a sçeu: Omnia incerta ratione, et in naturæ maiestate abdita, dit Pline; et S. Augustin, Modus, quo corporibus adhærent spiritus, omnino mirus est, nec comprehendi ab homine potest: et hoc ipse homo est. Et si ne le met on pas pourtant en doubte: car les opinions des hommes, sont receuës à la suitte des creances anciennes, par authorité et à credit, comme si c'estoit religion et loy.

On reçoit comme vn iargon ce qui en est communement tenu: on reçoit cette verité, auec tout son bastiment et attelage d'argumens et de preuues, comme vn corps ferme et solide, qu'on n'esbranle plus, qu'on ne iuge plus. Au contraire, chacun à qui mieux mieux, va plastrant et confortant cette creance receue, de tout ce que peut sa raison, qui est vn vtil soupple contournable, et accommodable à toute figure. Ainsi se remplit le monde et se confit en fadeze et en mensonge.

2.12.166 Ce qui fait qu'on ne doubte de guere de choses, c'est que les communes impressions on ne les essaye iamais; on n'en sonde point le pied, où git la faute et la foiblesse: on ne debat que sur les branches: on ne demande pas si cela est vray, mais s'il a esté ainsin ou ainsin entendu. On ne demande pas si Galen a rien dict qui vaille: mais s'il a dict ainsin, ou autrement. Vrayement c'estoit bien raison que cette bride et contrainte de la liberté de noz iugements, et cette tyrannie de noz creances, s'estendist iusques aux whether the stars wander and stray of their own will or by command, what darkens the moon's orb, what brings it forth, what the discordant concord of things intends and can do—have they never, among their books, sounded the difficulties that arise in knowing their own being?

ENGLISH

We see well enough that the finger moves and the foot moves; that some parts stir by themselves without our leave, while others we move at our command; that a certain apprehension makes us blush, another turn pale; one notion acts only on the spleen, another on the brain; one makes us laugh, another weep; another chills and stuns all our senses and stops the movement of our limbs; at one sight the stomach heaves, at another some lower part.

But how a spiritual impression can make such a breach in a massive and solid substance, and what is the nature of the linkage and stitching of these wonderful springs, no man has ever known. All things uncertain to reason and hidden in the majesty of nature, says Pliny; and Saint Augustine: The manner in which spirits cling to bodies is altogether marvelous and cannot be comprehended by man; and this is man himself. And yet no one calls it into question; for men's opinions are accepted in the wake of ancient beliefs, on authority and on credit, as if they were religion and law.

What is commonly held about it is taken in like a jargon; this truth is accepted, with its whole structure and apparatus of arguments and proofs, as a firm and solid body that is no longer shaken, no longer judged. On the contrary, everyone vies with everyone else in plastering and propping up this accepted belief with all that his reason can do—and reason is a pliant tool, bendable and adaptable to any shape. Thus the world is filled with, and steeped in, nonsense and lies.

What makes us doubt so few things is that we never test common impressions; we do not probe their footing, where the fault and weakness lie; we argue only about the branches. We do not ask whether a thing is true, but whether it was understood this way or that. We do not ask whether Galen said anything worthwhile, but whether he said it this way or otherwise. Truly it was very reasonable that this curb and constraint on the freedom escholes et aux arts. Le Dieu de la science scholastique, c'est Aristote: c'est religion de debattre de ses ordonnances, comme de celles de Lycurgus à Sparte.

FRENCH

Sa doctrine nous sert de loy magistrale: qui est à l'aduanture autant faulce que vne autre. Ie ne sçay pas pourquoy ie n'acceptasse autant volontiers ou les idées de Platon, ou les atomes d'Epicurus, ou le plein et le vuide de Leucippus et Democritus, ou l'eau de Thales, ou l'infinité de Nature d'Anaximander, ou l'air de Diogenes, ou les nombres et symmetrie de Pythagoras, ou l'infiny de Parmenides, ou l'vn de Musæus, ou l'eau et le feu d'Apollodorus, ou les parties similaires d'Anaxagoras, ou la discorde et amitié d'Empedocles, ou le feu de Heraclitus, ou toute autre opinion, (de cette confusion infinie d'aduis et de sentences, que produit cette belle raison humaine par sa certitude et clair-voyance, en tout ce dequoy elle se mesle) que ie feroy l'opinion d'Aristote, sur ce subject des principes des choses naturelles: lesquels principes il bastit de trois pieces, matiere, forme, et priuation.

Et qu'est-il plus vain que de faire l'inanité mesme, cause de la production des choses? La priuation c'est vne negatiue: de quelle humeur en a-il peu faire la cause et origine des choses qui sont? Cela toutesfois ne s'oseroit esbranler que pour l'exercice de la logique. On n'y debat rien pour le mettre en doute, mais pour deffendre l'autheur de l'escole des obiections estrangeres: son authorité c'est le but, au delà duquel il n'est pas permis de s'enquerir.

2.12.167 Il est bien aisé sur des fondemens auouez, de bastir ce qu'on veut; car selon la loy et ordonnance de ce commencement, le reste des pieces du bastiment se conduit aisément, sans se dementir. Par cette voye nous trouuons nostre raison bien fondée, et discourons à boule-veuë. Car nos maistres præoccupent et gaignent auant main, autant de lieu en nostre creance, qu'il leur en faut pour conclurre apres ce qu'ils veulent; à la mode des geometriens par leurs demandes auouées: le consentement et approbation que nous leurs prestons, leur donnant dequoy nous trainer à gauche et à dextre, et nous pyrouetter à leur volonté.

ENGLISH

of our judgments, and this tyranny over our beliefs, should extend even to the schools and the arts. The god of scholastic learning is Aristotle; it is a religious offense to debate his decrees, as it was those of Lycurgus at Sparta.

His doctrine serves us as magisterial law, though it may well be as false as any other. I do not see why I should not accept just as readily the Ideas of Plato, or the atoms of Epicurus, or the plenum and void of Leucippus and Democritus, or the water of Thales, or Anaximander's infinity of Nature, or the air of Diogenes, or the numbers and proportion of Pythagoras, or the infinite of Parmenides, or the One of Musaeus, or the water and fire of Apollodorus, or the like parts of Anaxagoras, or the discord and friendship of Empedocles, or the fire of Heraclitus, or any other opinion (out of that infinite confusion of views and pronouncements that this fine human reason produces, through its certainty and clear-sightedness, in everything it meddles with)—as readily as I would the opinion of Aristotle on this subject of the principles of natural things. These principles he builds out of three pieces: matter, form and privation.

And what is more vain than to make emptiness itself the cause of the production of things? Privation is a negative: what notion could have led him to make it the cause and origin of things that exist? Yet no one would dare to shake that, except as an exercise in logic. Nothing is debated there in order to cast doubt on it, but to defend the founder of the school against outside objections; his authority is the goal, beyond which no inquiry is permitted.

It is very easy to build whatever you like on agreed foundations; for in keeping with the law and ordering of this beginning, the remaining parts of the building go up easily without contradicting one another. By this route we find our reason well founded, and we reason away blindly. For our masters occupy and win in advance as much ground in our belief as they need in order to conclude afterward whatever they like, in the manner of geometers with their granted postulates: the consent and approval we lend them gives them the means to drag us left and right and spin us around at their will.

FRENCH

Quiconque est creu de ses presuppositions, il est nostre maistre et nostre Dieu: il prendra le plant de ses fondemens si ample et si aisé, que par iceux il nous pourra monter, s'il veut, iusques aux nuës. En cette pratique et negotiation de science, nous auons pris pour argent content le mot de Pythagoras, que chaque expert doit estre creu en son art. Le dialecticien se rapporte au grammairien de la signification des mots: le rhetoricien emprunte du dialecticien les lieux des argumens: le poëte, du musicien les mesures: le geometrien, de l'arithmeticien les proportions: les metaphysiciens prennent pour fondement les coniectures de la physique. Car chasque science a ses principes presupposez, par où le iugement humain est bridé de toutes parts.

Si vous venez à chocquer cette barriere, en laquelle gist la principale erreur, ils ont incontinent cette sentence en la bouche; qu'il ne faut pas debattre contre ceux qui nient les principes. Or n'y peut-il auoir des principes aux hommes, si la diuinité ne les leur a reuelez: de tout le demeurant, et le commencement, et le milieu et la fin, ce n'est que songe et fumée. A ceux qui combattent par presupposition, il leur faut presupposer au contraire, le mesme axiome, dequoy on debat. Car toute presupposition humaine, et toute enunciation, a autant d'authorité que l'autre, si la raison n'en faict la difference. Ainsin il les faut toutes mettre à la balance: et premierement les generalles, et celles qui nous tyrannisent.

La persuasion de la certitude, est vn certain tesmoignage de folie, et d'incertitude extreme. Et n'est point de plus folles gents, ny moins philosophes, que les Philodoxes de Platon. Il faut sçauoir si le feu est chault, si la neige est blanche, s'il y a rien de dur ou de mol en nostre cognoissance.

2.12.168 Et quant à ces responses, dequoy il se fait des comtes anciens: comme à celuy qui mettoit en doubte la chaleur, à qui on dit qu'il se iettast dans le feu: à celuy qui nioit la froideur de la glace, qu'il s'en mist dans le sein: elles sont tres-indignes de la profession philosophique. S'ils nous eussent laissé en nostre estat naturel, receuans les apparences estrangeres selon qu'elles se presentent à nous par nos sens; et nous eussent laissé aller apres nos appetits simples, et reglez par la condition de nostre naissance, ils auroient raison de parler ainsi.

ENGLISH

Whoever is believed in his presuppositions is our master and our God: he will lay out the ground plan of his foundations so broad and easy that by them he can lift us, if he wishes, up to the clouds. In this practice and business of knowledge we have taken at face value Pythagoras' saying that every expert should be believed in his own field. The logician refers to the grammarian for the meaning of words; the rhetorician borrows the topics of argument from the logician; the poet borrows his meters from the musician; the geometer his proportions from the arithmetician; the metaphysicians take the conjectures of physics as their foundation. For each science has its presupposed principles, by which human judgment is reined in on every side.

If you happen to run into this barrier, where the principal error lies, they immediately have this maxim on their lips: that one must not argue with those who deny first principles. Now there can be no principles for men unless the divinity has revealed them; all the rest—beginning, middle and end—is nothing but dream and smoke. Against those who fight by presupposition, we must presuppose the contrary of the very axiom under dispute. For every human presupposition, and every proposition, has as much authority as any other, unless reason makes the difference. So they must all be put on the scales—and first the general ones, and those that tyrannize over us.

The conviction of certainty is a certain sign of folly and of extreme uncertainty. And there are no people more foolish, or less philosophical, than Plato's philodoxes. We need to know whether fire is hot, whether snow is white, whether there is anything hard or soft within our knowledge.[132]

As for those retorts told in old stories—as to the man who doubted heat, who was told to throw himself into the fire, or to the man who denied that ice was cold, who was told to put some in his bosom—they are thoroughly unworthy of the philosophical profession. If they had left us in our natural state, receiving outward appearances as they present themselves to us through our senses, and had let us follow our simple appetites, regulated by the condition of our birth, they would be right to talk like that.

132 Philodoxes: Plato's term (Republic V) for "lovers of opinion," as opposed to philosophers, lovers of wisdom.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Mais c'est d'eux que nous auons appris de nous rendre iuges du monde: c'est d'eux que nous tenons cette fantasie, que la raison humaine est contrerolleuse generalle de tout ce qui est au dehors et au dedans de la voute celeste, qui embrasse tout, qui peut tout: par le moyen de laquelle tout se sçait, et cognoist. Cette response seroit bonne parmy les Canibales, qui iouyssent l'heur d'vne longue vie, tranquille, et paisible, sans les preceptes d'Aristote, et sans la cognoissance du nom de la physique. Cette response vaudroit mieux à l'aduenture, et auroit plus de fermeté, que toutes celles qu'ils emprunteront de leur raison et de leur inuention.

But it is from them that we have learned to set ourselves up as judges of the world; it is from them that we get this notion that human reason is controller-general of all that is outside and inside the vault of heaven, that it embraces everything, can do everything, and that through it everything is known and understood. That retort would do well among the Cannibals, who enjoy the happiness of a long, tranquil and peaceful life without the precepts of Aristotle and without even knowing the name of physics. That retort would perhaps be worth more, and have more firmness, than all those they will borrow from their reason and their invention.[133]

De cette-cy seroient capables auec nous, tous les animaux, et tout ce, où le commandement est encor pur et simple de la loy naturelle: mais eux ils y ont renoncé. Il ne faut pas qu'ils me dient, il est vray, car vous le voyez et sentez ainsin: il faut qu'ils me dient, si ce que ie pense sentir, ie le sens pourtant en effect: et si ie le sens, qu'ils me dient apres pourquoy ie le sens, et comment, et quoy: qu'ils me dient le nom, l'origine, les tenans et aboutissans de la chaleur, du froid; les qualitez de celuy qui agit, et de celuy qui souffre: ou qu'ils me quittent leur profession, qui est de ne receuoir ny approuuer rien, que par la voye de la raison: c'est leur touche à toutes sortes d'essais.

All animals would be capable of this retort along with us, and everything in which the command of natural law is still pure and simple; but these men have renounced it. They must not tell me, "It is true, for you see it and feel it so"; they must tell me whether what I think I feel I actually do feel; and if I feel it, let them then tell me why I feel it, and how, and what; let them tell me the name, the origin, the bounds and boundaries of heat and cold, the qualities of what acts and of what is acted upon; or else let them give up their profession, which is to accept or approve nothing except by way of reason. That is their touchstone for every kind of trial.

Mais certes c'est vne touche pleine de fauceté, d'erreur, de foiblesse, et defaillance.

But truly it is a touchstone full of falsity, error, weakness and failure.

2.12.169 Par où la voulons nous mieux esprouuer, que par elle mesme? S'il ne la faut croire parlant de soy, à peine sera elle propre à iuger des choses estrangeres: si elle cognoist quelque chose, aumoins sera-ce son estre et son domicile. Elle est en l'ame, et partie, ou effect d'icelle: car la vraye raison et essentielle, de qui nous desrobons le nom à fauces enseignes, elle loge dans le sein de Dieu, c'est là son giste et sa retraite, c'est de là où elle part, quand il plaist à Dieu nous en faire voir quelque rayon: comme Pallas saillit de la teste de son pere, pour se communiquer au monde.

How better can we test it than by itself? If it is not to be believed when speaking of itself, it will hardly be fit to judge of things outside it; if it knows anything, it must at least be its own being and dwelling. It is in the soul, and is a part or an effect of it; for true and essential reason, whose name we steal under false colors, lodges in the bosom of God. That is its home and its retreat; it is from there that it sets out when God is pleased to show us some ray of it, as Pallas sprang from her father's head to communicate herself to the world.

133 The Cannibals: the Brazilian peoples described in "Of Cannibals" (I.31).

WHAT IS THE SOUL?

The philosophers disagree about the soul's nature, seat, origin and survival.

FRENCH

2.12.170 Or voyons ce que l'humaine raison nous a appris de soy et de l'ame: non de l'ame en general, de laquelle quasi toute la philosophie rend les corps celestes et les premiers corps participants: ny de celle que Thales attribuoit aux choses mesmes, qu'on tient inanimées, conuié par la consideration de l'aimant: mais de celle qui nous appartient, que nous deuons mieux cognoistre. Ignoratur enim quæ sit natura animaï:
Nata sit, an contrà nascentibus insinuetur,
Et simul intereat nobiscum morte dirempta;
An tenebras Orci visat, vastásque lacunas,
An pecudes alias diuinitus insinuet se.

2.12.171 A Crates et Dicæarchus, qu'il n'y en auoit du tout point, mais que le corps s'esbranloit ainsi d'vn mouuement naturel: à Platon, que c'estoit vne substance se mouuant de soy-mesme: à Thales, vne nature sans repos: à Asclepiades, vne exercitation des sens: à Hesiodus et Anaximander, chose composée de terre et d'eau: à Parmenides, de terre et de feu: à Empedocles, de sang: Sanguineam vomit ille animam: à Possidonius, Cleanthes et Galen, vne chaleur ou complexion chaleureuse, Igneus est ollis vigor, et cœlestis origo: à Hippocrates, vn esprit espandu par le corps: à Varro, vn air receu par la bouche, eschauffé au poulmon, attrempé au cœur, et espandu par tout le corps: à Zeno, la quint'-essence des quatre elemens: à Heraclides Ponticus, la lumiere: à Xenocrates, et aux Ægyptiens, vn nombre mobile: aux Chaldées, vne vertu sans forme determinée.

Habitum quemdam vitalem corporis esse, / Harmoniam Græci quam dicunt. N'oublions pas Aristote, ce qui naturellement fait mouuoir le corps, qu'il nomme entelechie: d'vne autant froide inuention que nulle autre: car il ne parle ny de l'essence, ny de l'origine, ny de la nature de l'ame, mais en remerque seulement l'effect. Lactance, Seneque, et la meilleure part entre les dogmatistes, ont confessé que c'estoit chose qu'ils n'entendoient pas. Et apres tout ce denombrement d'opinions: Harum sententiarum quæ vera sit, Deus aliquis viderit, dit Cicero. Ie connoy par moy, dit S. Bernard,

ENGLISH

Now let us see what human reason has taught us about itself and about the soul: not the soul in general, in which nearly all philosophy makes the heavenly bodies and the primary bodies share; nor the soul that Thales attributed even to things considered inanimate, prompted by thinking about the magnet; but the soul that belongs to us, which we ought to know better. For no one knows what the nature of the soul is:
whether it is born, or on the contrary slips into us at birth, and whether it perishes together with us, torn apart by death, or visits the darkness of Orcus and its vast pools, or by divine will slips into other creatures.

According to Crates and Dicaearchus, there was no soul at all, but the body moved thus by a natural motion; to Plato, it was a substance moving of itself; to Thales, a nature without rest; to Asclepiades, an exercise of the senses; to Hesiod and Anaximander, a thing composed of earth and water; to Parmenides, of earth and fire; to Empedocles, of blood: He vomits forth his blood-red soul; to Posidonius, Cleanthes and Galen, a heat or a hot constitution: Fiery is their vigor, and heavenly their origin; to Hippocrates, a spirit spread through the body; to Varro, an air taken in through the mouth, warmed in the lungs, tempered in the heart and spread throughout the body; to Zeno, the quintessence of the four elements; to Heraclides Ponticus, light; to Xenocrates and the Egyptians, a moving number; to the Chaldeans, a power without determinate form.

That it is a certain vital disposition of the body, / which the Greeks call harmony. Let us not forget Aristotle: the soul is what naturally makes the body move, which he calls entelechy—an invention as frigid as any other; for he speaks neither of the essence, nor of the origin, nor of the nature of the soul, but merely notes its effect. Lactantius, Seneca and most of the dogmatists have confessed that it was something they did not understand. And after this whole roll call of opinions: Which of these opinions is true, some god must see, says Cicero.

FRENCH

combien Dieu est incomprehensible, puis que les pieces de mon estre propre, ie ne les puis comprendre.

Heraclitus, qui tenoit, tout estre plein d'ames et de daimons, maintenoit pourtant, qu'on ne pouuoit aller tant auant vers la cognoissance de l'ame, qu'on y peust arriuer, si profonde estre son essence.

2.12.172 Il n'y a pas moins de dissension, ny de debat à la loger. Hippocrates et Hierophilus la mettent au ventricule du cerueau: Democritus et Aristote, par tout le corps: Vt bona sæpe valet udo cùm dicitur esse Corporis, et non est tamen hæc pars vlla valentis. Epicurus, en l'estomach: Hîc exultat enim pauor ac metus, hæc loca circúm Lætitiæ mulcent. Les Stoïciens, autour et dedans le cœur: Erasistratus, ioignant la membrane de l'epicrane: Empedocles, au sang: comme aussi Moyse, qui fut la cause pourquoy il defendit de manger le sang des bestes, auquel leur ame est iointe: Galen a pensé que chaque partie du corps ait son ame: Strato l'a logée entre les deux sourcils: Qua facie quidem sit animus, aut vbi habitet, ne quærendum quidem est: dit Cicero.

Ie laisse volontiers à cet homme ses mots propres. Iroy-ie à l'éloquence alterer son parler? Ioint qu'il y a peu d'acquest à desrober la matiere de ses inuentions. Elles sont et peu frequentes, et peu roides, et peu ignorées. Mais la raison pourquoy Chrysippus l'argumente autour du cœur, comme les autres de sa secte, n'est pas pour estre oubliée: C'est par ce, dit-il, que quand nous voulons asseurer quelque chose, nous mettons la main sur l'estomach: et quand nous voulons prononcer, εγω, qui signifie moy, nous baissons vers l'estomach la machouër d'embas.

Ce lieu ne se doit passer, sans remerquer la vanité d'vn si grand personnage: car outre ce que ces considerations sont d'elles mesmes infiniment legeres, la derniere ne preuue qu'aux Grecs, qu'ils ayent l'ame en cet endroit là. Il n'est iugement humain, si tendu, qui ne sommeille par fois. Que craignons nous à dire? Voyla les Stoiciens peres de l'humaine prudence, qui trouuent, que l'ame d'vn homme accablé sous vne ruine, traine et ahanne long temps à sortir, ne se pouuant desmesler de la charge, comme vne sourix prinse à la trapelle.

ENGLISH

"I know from myself," says Saint Bernard, "how incomprehensible God is, since I cannot comprehend the parts of my own being."[134]

Heraclitus, who held that everything was full of souls and daimons, nevertheless maintained that one could not go far enough toward knowledge of the soul to reach it, so deep was its essence.

There is no less dissension and debate about where to lodge it. Hippocrates and Herophilus put it in the ventricle of the brain; Democritus and Aristotle throughout the body: As health is often said to belong to the body, and yet it is no part of the healthy man. Epicurus in the stomach: For here dread and fear leap up; around these parts joys soothe us. The Stoics around and within the heart; Erasistratus next to the membrane of the epicranium; Empedocles in the blood, as did Moses too, which was why he forbade eating the blood of beasts, to which their soul is joined. Galen thought that each part of the body has its own soul. Strato lodged it between the two eyebrows. What form the mind may have, or where it dwells, should not even be asked, says Cicero.

I gladly leave this man his own words. Should I go altering the speech of eloquence itself? Besides, there is little to gain by stealing the substance of his ideas: they are neither frequent, nor forceful, nor unknown. But the reason why Chrysippus argues that the soul is around the heart, like the others of his sect, deserves not to be forgotten. It is because, he says, when we want to affirm something we put our hand on our chest; and when we want to pronounce εγω, which means "I," we drop our lower jaw toward the chest.

This passage must not be passed over without remarking the vanity of so great a man: for besides the fact that these considerations are in themselves infinitely trivial, the last one proves only for the Greeks that they have their soul in that spot. There is no human judgment so taut that it does not doze at times. Why are we afraid to say it? There are the Stoics, fathers of human wisdom, who find that the soul of a man crushed under a collapsed building drags and labors a long time to get out, unable to free itself from the weight, like a mouse caught in a trap.

134 Entelechy: Aristotle's term for the realized form of a thing; he defined the soul as the first entelechy of a natural body.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Aucuns tiennent, que le monde fut faict pour donner corps par punition, aux esprits decheus par leur faute, de la pureté en quoy ils auoyent esté creés: la premiere creation n'ayant esté qu'incorporelle: et que selon qu'ils se sont plus ou moins esloignez de leur spiritualité, on les incorpore plus et moins alaigrement ou lourdement. De là vient la varieté de tant de matiere creée. Mais l'esprit, qui fut pour sa peine inuesti du corps du soleil, deuoit auoir vne mesure d'alteration bien rare et particuliere.

Some hold that the world was made to give bodies, as punishment, to spirits that had fallen by their own fault from the purity in which they had been created—the first creation having been only incorporeal—and that according as they have strayed more or less from their spirituality, they are embodied more or less lightly or heavily. Hence the variety of so much created matter. But the spirit that was clothed, as its penalty, with the body of the sun must have undergone a very rare and peculiar degree of alteration.[135]

2.12.173 Les extremitez de nostre perquisition tombent toutes en esblouyssement. Comme dit Plutarque de la teste des histoires, qu'à la mode des chartes, l'orée des terres cognuës est saisie de marests, forests profondes, deserts et lieux inhabitables. Voyla pourquoy les plus grossieres et pueriles rauasseries, se trouuent plus en ceux qui traittent les choses plus hautes, et plus auant: s'abysmants en leur curiosité et presomption. La fin et le commencement de science, se tiennent en pareille bestise. Voyez prendre à mont l'essor à Platon en ses nuages poëtiques. Voyez chez luy le iargon des Dieux. Mais à quoy songeoit-il, quand il definit l'homme, vn animal à deux pieds, sans plume: fournissant à ceux qui auoyent enuie de se moquer de luy, vne plaisante occasion?

The outer limits of our inquiry all end in dazzlement. As Plutarch says of the earliest parts of histories, it is as on maps, where the edges of the known lands are taken up by marshes, deep forests, deserts and uninhabitable places. That is why the crudest and most childish ravings are found most in those who treat the highest matters and go furthest, sinking into the abyss of their curiosity and presumption. The end and the beginning of knowledge are equally stupid. Watch Plato take flight upward into his poetic clouds; see in his works the jargon of the gods. But what was he dreaming of when he defined man as a two-footed animal without feathers, giving those who wanted to make fun of him an amusing opportunity?[136] car ayans plumé vn chapon vif, ils alloyent le nommant, l'homme de Platon.

for, having plucked a live capon, they went about calling it "Plato's man."

2.12.174 Et quoy les Epicuriens, de quelle simplicité estoyent ils allez premierement imaginer, que leurs atomes, qu'ils disoyent estre des corps ayants quelque pesanteur, et vn mouuement naturel contre bas, eussent basti le monde: iusques à ce qu'ils fussent auisez par leurs aduersaires, que par cette description, il n'estoit pas possible qu'ils se ioignissent et se prinsent l'vn à l'autre, leur cheute estant ainsi droite et perpendiculaire, et engendrant par tout des lignes paralleles? Parquoy il fut force, qu'ils y adioustassent depuis vn mouuement de costé, fortuite: et qu'ils fournissent encore à leurs atomes, des queuës courbes et crochuës, pour les rendre aptes à s'attacher et se coudre. Et lors mesme, ceux qui les poursuyuent de cette autre consideration, les mettent ils pas en peine?

And what of the Epicureans? How simple-minded they were, first to imagine that their atoms, which they said were bodies having some weight and a natural downward motion, had built the world—until their opponents pointed out to them that by this description the atoms could not possibly join and cling to one another, since their fall was straight and perpendicular and produced parallel lines everywhere. So they were forced to add afterward a chance sideways motion, and to furnish their atoms besides with curved and hooked tails, to make them fit to attach and stitch themselves together. And even then, do not those who press

135 This is the view of Origen (3rd century AD), as reported by Augustine, City of God XI.23.
136 Plutarch makes this comparison at the opening of his Life of Theseus.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

them with this other consideration put them in difficulty?

Si les atomes ont par sort formé tant de sortes de figures, pourquoy ne se sont ils iamais rencontrez à faire vne maison et vn soulier? Pourquoy de mesme ne croid on, qu'vn nombre infini de lettres Grecques versées emmy la place, seroyent pour arriuer à la contexture de l'Iliade?

If the atoms have by chance formed so many kinds of shapes, why have they never happened to come together to make a house or a shoe? Why, by the same token, do we not believe that an infinite number of Greek letters poured out in the middle of the marketplace might arrive at the text of the Iliad?

2.12.175 Ce qui est capable de raison, dit Zenon, est meilleur, que ce qui n'en est point capable: il n'est rien meilleur que le monde: il est donc capable de raison. Cotta par cette mesme argumentation fait le monde mathematicien: et le fait musicien et organiste, par cette autre argumentation aussi de Zenon: Le tout est plus que la partie: nous sommes capables de sagesse, et sommes parties du monde: il est donc sage. Il se void infinis pareils exemples, non d'argumens faux seulement, mais ineptes, ne se tenans point, et accusans leurs autheurs non tant d'ignorance que d'imprudence, és reproches que les philosophes se font les vns aux autres sur les dissentions de leurs opinions, et de leurs sectes.

"That which is capable of reason," says Zeno, "is better than that which is not capable of it; there is nothing better than the world; therefore it is capable of reason." Cotta, by this same argument, makes the world a mathematician; and he makes it a musician and organ player by this other argument, also Zeno's: "The whole is more than the part; we are capable of wisdom, and we are parts of the world; therefore it is wise." There are countless similar examples—of arguments not just false but inept, that do not hold together and accuse their authors not so much of ignorance as of imprudence—in the reproaches philosophers throw at one another over the disagreements between their opinions and their sects.

2.12.176 Qui fagoteroit suffisamment vn amas des asneries de l'humaine sapience, il diroit merueilles. I'en assemble volontiers, comme vne montre, par quelque biais non moins vtile que les instructions plus moderees. Iugeons par là ce que nous auons à estimer de l'homme, de son sens et de sa raison, puis qu'en ces grands personnages, et qui ont porté si haut l'humaine suffisance, il s'y trouue des deffauts si apparens et si grossiers. Moy i'aime mieux croire qu'ils ont traitté la science casuelement ainsi, qu'vn iouët à toutes mains, et se sont esbatus de la raison, comme d'vn instrument vain et friuole, mettans en auant toutes sortes d'inuentions et de fantasies tantost plus tenduës, tantost plus lasches.

Anyone who bundled together a good heap of the follies of human wisdom would have wonders to tell. I gladly collect some of them, as a sample, from an angle that is no less useful than more measured teachings. Let us judge from this what we are to think of man, of his sense and his reason, since these great figures, who carried human ability so high, show such obvious and gross defects. For my part, I would rather believe that they treated knowledge casually, as a toy for any hand to play with. They amused themselves with reason as with an idle and frivolous instrument, putting forward all sorts of inventions and notions, some more taut, some more slack.

Ce mesme Platon, qui definit l'homme comme vne poulle, dit ailleurs apres Socrates, qu'il ne sçait à la verité que c'est que l'homme, et que c'est l'vne des pieces du monde d'autant difficile cognoissance. Par cette varieté et instabilité d'opinions, ils nous menent comme par la main tacitement à cette resolution de leur irresolution. Ils font profession de ne presenter pas tousiours leur auis à visage descouuert et apparent: ils l'ont caché tantost soubs des vmbrages fabuleux de la poësie, tantost soubs quelque autre masque: car nostre imperfection porte

This same Plato, who defines man as if he were a hen, says elsewhere, following Socrates, that he truly does not know what man is, and that man is one of the parts of the world hardest to know. By this variety and instability of opinions they lead us silently, as if by the hand, to this resolution of their irresolution. They make a point of not always presenting their views openly, with their faces uncovered. They have hidden them sometimes under the fabulous shadows of poetry, sometimes encores cela, que la viande crue n'est pas tousiours propre à nostre estomach: il la faut assecher, alterer et corrompre.

FRENCH

Ils font de mesmes: ils obscurcissent par fois leurs naïfues opinions et iugemens, et les falsifient pour s'accommoder à l'vsage publique. Ils ne veulent pas faire profession expresse d'ignorance, et de l'imbecillité de la raison humaine, pour ne faire peur aux enfans: mais ils nous la descouurent assez soubs l'apparence d'vne science trouble et inconstante.

2.12.177 Ie conseillois en Italie à quelqu'vn qui estoit en peine de parler Italien, que pourueu qu'il ne cherchast qu'à se faire entendre, sans y vouloir autrement exceller, qu'il employast seulement les premiers mots qui luy viendroyent à la bouche, Latins, François, Espagnols, ou Gascons, et qu'en y adioustant la terminaison Italienne, il ne faudroit iamais à rencontrer quelque idiome du pays, ou Thoscan, ou Romain, ou Venetien, ou Piemontois, ou Napolitain, et de se ioindre à quelqu'vne de tant de formes. Ie dis de mesme de la philosophie: elle a tant de visages et de varieté, et a tant dict, que tous nos songes et resueries s'y trouuent.

L'humaine phantasie ne peut rien conceuoir en bien et en mal qui n'y soit: Nihil tam absurdè dici potest, quod non dicatur ab aliquo philosophorum. Et i'en laisse plus librement aller mes caprices en public: d'autant que bien qu'ils soyent nez chez moy, et sans patron, ie sçay qu'ils trouueront leur relation à quelque humeur ancienne, et ne faudra quelqu'vn de dire: Voyla d'où il le print. Mes mœurs sont naturelles: ie n'ay point appellé à les bastir, le secours d'aucune discipline.

Mais toutes imbecilles qu'elles sont, quand l'enuie m'a prins de les reciter, et que pour les faire sortir en publiq, vn peu plus decemment, ie me suis mis en deuoir de les assister, et de discours, et d'exemples: ç'a esté merueille à moy mesme, de les rencontrer par cas d'aduenture, conformes à tant d'exemples et discours philosophiques. De quel regiment estoit ma vie, ie ne l'ay appris qu'apres qu'elle est exploittée et employée. Nouuelle figure: Vn philosophe impremedité et fortuit.

2.12.178 Pour reuenir à nostre ame, ce que Platon a mis la raison au cerueau, l'ire au cœur, et la cupidité au foye, il est under some other mask. For our imperfection also means that raw food does not always suit our stomach: it has to be dried, altered and corrupted.

ENGLISH

They do the same: they sometimes obscure their natural opinions and judgments, and falsify them to suit public usage. They do not want to make an express profession of ignorance and of the feebleness of human reason, so as not to frighten the children; but they reveal it to us clearly enough under the appearance of a muddled and inconstant knowledge.

When I was in Italy, I advised someone who was struggling to speak Italian that, provided he sought only to make himself understood and had no wish to excel at it, he should simply use the first words that came to his mouth, Latin, French, Spanish or Gascon. By adding the Italian ending he would never fail to hit upon some dialect of the country, Tuscan, Roman, Venetian, Piedmontese or Neapolitan, and to fall in with one of its many forms. I say the same of philosophy: it has so many faces and so much variety, and has said so much, that all our dreams and ravings are to be found in it.

Human fancy can conceive nothing, good or bad, that is not in it: Nothing can be said so absurd that it has not been said by some philosopher. And so I let my whims go out in public all the more freely. Although they were born at home and without a model, I know they will find some link with an ancient temperament, and someone will not fail to say: "That is where he took it from." My ways are natural: I have not called on the help of any discipline to build them.[137]

But feeble as they are, when the desire took me to set them down, and when, to send them out in public a little more decently, I undertook to support them with both reasonings and examples, it was a marvel even to me to find them, quite by chance, in conformity with so many philosophical examples and reasonings. Which rule my life was governed by I learned only after it had been lived and spent. A new figure: an unpremeditated and accidental philosopher.

To return to our soul: when Plato placed reason in the brain, anger in the heart and appetite in the 137 Cicero, On Divination.

FRENCH

vray-semblable que ç'a esté plustost vne interpretation des mouuemens de l'ame, qu'vne diuision, et separation qu'il en ayt voulu faire, comme d'vn corps en plusieurs membres.

Et la plus vray-semblable de leurs opinions est, que c'est tousiours vne ame, qui par sa faculté ratiocine, se souuient, comprend, iuge, desire et exerce toutes ses autres operations par diuers instrumens du corps, comme le nocher gouuerne son nauire selon l'experience qu'il en a, ores tendant ou laschant vne corde, ores haussant l'antenne, ou remuant l'auiron, par vne seule puissance conduisant diuers effets: et qu'elle loge au cerueau: ce qui appert de ce que les blessures et accidens qui touchent cette partie, offensent incontinent les facultez de l'ame: de là il n'est pas inconuenient qu'elle s'escoule par le reste du corps: Medium non deserit vnquam / Cœli Phœbus iter: radiis tamen omnia lustrat. comme le soleil espand du ciel en hors sa lumiere et ses puissances, et en remplit le monde.

Cætera pars animæ, per totum dissita corpus / Paret, et ad numen mentis moménque mouetur.

2.12.179 Aucuns ont dict, qu'il y auoit vne ame generale, comme vn grand corps, duquel toutes les ames particulieres estoyent extraictes, et s'y en retournoyent, se remeslant tousiours à cette matiere vniuerselle: Deum namque ire per omnes
Terrásque, tractúsque maris, cœlúmque profundum:
Hinc pecudes, armenta, viros, genus omne ferarum,
Quemque sibi tenues nascentem arcessere vitas:
Scilicet huc reddi deinde, ac resoluta referri
Omnia: nec morti esse locum: d'autres, qu'elles ne faisoyent que s'y resioindre et r'attacher: d'autres, qu'elle estoyent produites de la substance diuine: d'autres, par les anges, de feu et d'air. Aucuns, de toute ancienneté: aucuns, sur l'heure mesme du besoin. Aucuns les font descendre du rond de la lune, et y retourner.

Le commun des anciens, qu'elles sont engendrées de pere en fils, d'vne pareille maniere et production que toutes autres choses naturelles: argumentants cela par la ressemblance des enfans aux peres, Instillata patris virtus tibi:

ENGLISH

liver, it is likely that this was an interpretation of the movements of the soul rather than a division and separation he meant to make of it, as of a body into several limbs.

And the most likely of their opinions is that it is always one soul which, by its faculty, reasons, remembers, understands, judges, desires and performs all its other operations through various instruments of the body. So a helmsman steers his ship according to his experience of it, now tightening or slackening a rope, now raising the yard, now plying the oar, bringing about different effects by a single power. And it lodges in the brain: this is evident from the fact that wounds and injuries affecting that part immediately impair the faculties of the soul. From there it is not inconsistent that it should flow through the rest of the body: Phoebus never leaves the middle / course of the sky, yet with his rays he lights up all things, as the sun spreads its light and its powers outward from the sky and fills the world with them.[138]

The rest of the soul, spread throughout the body, / obeys, and moves at the will and impulse of the mind.

Some have said that there was a universal soul, like a great body, from which all individual souls were drawn and to which they returned, always mingling again with that universal matter: For God, they say, pervades all lands, the stretches of the sea and the depths of the sky;
from him flocks, herds, men, every kind of wild beast, each at its birth, draws its slender life;
to him, surely, all things are afterwards returned and, dissolved, carried back; and there is no room for death. Others, that they merely rejoined and reattached themselves to it; others, that they were produced from the divine substance; others, that they were made by the angels, out of fire and air. Some say they have existed from all antiquity; some, that they are made at the very hour of need. Some make them come down from the circle of the moon and return there.[139]

The common view of the ancients was that they are begotten from father to son, in the same way and by the same process as all other natural things. They argued this from the likeness of chil-

138 Claudian, On the Sixth Consulship of Honorius.
139 Virgil, Georgics.

FRENCH

Fortes creantur fortibus et bonis: et qu'on void escouler des peres aux enfans, non seulement les marques du corps, mais encores vne ressemblance d'humeurs, de complexions, et inclinations de l'ame: Denique cur acris violentia triste leonum
Seminium sequitur? dolus vulpibus, et fuga ceruis
A patribus datur, et patrius pauor incitat artus?

/ Si non certa suo quia semine seminióque, / Vis animi pariter crescit cum corpore toto? que là dessus se fonde la iustice diuine, punissant aux enfans la faute des peres: d'autant que la contagion des vices paternels est aucunement empreinte en l'ame des enfans, et que le desreglement de leur volonté les touche.

2.12.180 Dauantage, que si les ames venoyent d'ailleurs, que d'vne suitte naturelle, et qu'elles eussent esté quelque autre chose hors du corps, elles auroyent recordation de leur estre premier; attendu les naturelles facultez, qui luy sont propres, de discourir, raisonner et se souuenir. Si in corpus nascentibus insinuatur,
Cur super anteactam ætatem meminesse nequimus,
Nec vestigia gestarum rerum vlla tenemus? Car pour faire valoir la condition de nos ames, comme nous voulons, il les faut presupposer toutes sçauantes, lors qu'elles sont en leur simplicité et pureté naturelle. Par ainsin elles eussent esté telles, estans exemptes de la prison corporelle, aussi bien auant que d'y entrer, comme nous esperons qu'elles seront apres qu'elles en seront sorties.

Et de ce sçauoir, il faudroit qu'elles se ressouuinssent encore estans au corps, comme disoit Platon, que ce que nous apprenions, n'estoit qu'vn ressouuenir de ce que nous auions sçeu: chose que chacun par experience peut maintenir estre fauce. En premier lieu d'autant qu'il ne nous ressouuient iustement que de ce qu'on nous apprend: et que si la memoire faisoit purement son office, aumoins nous suggereroit elle quelque traict outre l'apprentissage.

Secondement ce qu'elle sçauoit estant en sa pureté, c'estoit vne vraye science, cognoissant les choses comme elles sont, par sa diuine intelligence: là où icy on luy fait dren to their fathers: Your father's virtue was instilled in you;

ENGLISH

the brave are born of the brave and good. They argued it also from the fact that we see passing from fathers to children not only bodily marks but also a resemblance of temperaments, constitutions and inclinations of the soul: Why, then, does fierce violence go with the grim breed of lions? Why are cunning to foxes and flight to deer handed down by their fathers, and why does inherited fear quicken their limbs?[140]

/ Is it not because a fixed power of mind, from its own seed and breed, / grows along with the whole body? They held that divine justice is founded on this, punishing in the children the fault of the fathers, inasmuch as the contagion of the fathers' vices is in some measure imprinted on the children's souls, and the disorder of their fathers' will affects them.

Moreover, they held that if souls came from anywhere other than natural succession, and had been something else outside the body, they would remember their first existence, given the natural faculties proper to it of reasoning, arguing and remembering: If the soul is slipped into us at birth, why can we not remember the time gone by, nor keep any traces of things done? For to give our souls the standing we want them to have, we must suppose them all-knowing when they are in their natural simplicity and purity. So they would have been such, being free of the bodily prison, before entering it, just as we hope they will be after they have left it.

And they would have to remember this knowledge while still in the body, as Plato said, claiming that what we learned was only a remembering of what we had known—a thing that anyone can maintain from experience to be false. In the first place, because we remember precisely only what we are taught; and if memory performed its office purely, it would at least prompt us with some item beyond what we had learned.

Secondly, what the soul knew when it was in its purity was true knowledge, knowing things as they are by its divine intelligence; whereas here it 140 The second line is from Horace, Odes; the poems that follow are Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

FRENCH

receuoir la mensonge et le vice, si on l'en instruit; en quoy elle ne peut employer sa reminiscence, cette image et conception n'ayant iamais logé en elle.

2.12.181 De dire que la prison corporelle estouffe de maniere ses facultez naifues, qu'elles y sont toutes esteintes: cela est premierement contraire à cette autre creance, de recognoistre ses forces si grandes, et les operations que les hommes en sentent en cette vie, si admirables, que d'en auoir conclu cette diuinité et eternité passée, et l'immortalité à venir; Nam si tantopere est animi mutata potestas,
Omnis vt actarum exciderit retinentia rerum,
Non, vt opinor, ea ab letho iam longior errat.

2.12.182 En outre, c'est icy chez nous, et non ailleurs, que doiuent estre considerées les forces et les effects de l'ame: tout le reste de ses perfections, luy est vain et inutile: c'est de l'estat present, que doit estre payée et recognue toute son immortalité, et de la vie de l'homme, qu'elle est comtable seulement.

Ce seroit iniustice de luy auoir retranché ses moyens et ses puissances, de l'auoir desarmée, pour du temps de sa captiuité et de sa prison, de sa foiblesse et maladie, du temps où elle auroit esté forcée et contrainte, tirer le iugement et vne condemnation de durée infinie et perpetuelle: et de s'arrester à la consideration d'vn temps si court, qui est à l'aduenture d'vne ou de deux heures, ou au pis aller, d'vn siecle (qui n'ont non plus de proportion à l'infinité qu'vn instant) pour de ce moment d'interualle, ordonner et establir definitiuement de tout son estre. Ce seroit vne disproportion inique, de tirer vne recompense eternelle en consequence d'vne si courte vie.

Platon, pour se sauuer de cet inconuenient, veut que les payements futurs se limitent à la durée de cent ans, relatiuement à l'humaine durée: et des nostres assez leur ont donné bornes temporelles.

2.12.183 Par ainsin ils iugeoyent, que sa generation suyuoit la commune condition des choses humaines: comme aussi sa vie, par l'opinion d'Epicurus et de Democritus, qui a esté la plus receuë, suyuant ces belles apparences: Qu'on la voyoit naistre; à mesme que le corps en estoit capable; on voyoit esleuer ses forces comme les corporelles; on y recognoissoit la foiblesse de son enfance, et auec le temps is made to receive falsehood and vice, if it is taught them. In this it cannot use its reminiscence, since that image and conception never lodged in it.

ENGLISH

To say that the bodily prison so stifles its natural faculties that they are all extinguished there: this is, first, contrary to that other belief, which recognizes its powers as so great, and the operations men feel of them in this life as so admirable, that it has concluded from them that the soul possesses that past divinity and eternity, and the immortality to come. For if the power of the mind has been so changed that all memory of things done has slipped away, that, I think, is not far from death.

Besides, it is here, at home with us, and nowhere else, that the powers and effects of the soul must be considered; all the rest of its perfections are vain and useless to it. It is from its present state that its whole immortality must be paid for and acknowledged, and it is to the life of man alone that it is accountable.

It would be unjust to have cut off its means and powers, to have disarmed it, and then, from the time of its captivity and imprisonment, of its weakness and sickness, the time when it had been forced and constrained, to draw a judgment and a condemnation of infinite and perpetual duration. It would be unjust to dwell on so short a time—perhaps an hour or two, or at worst a century, which bear no more proportion to infinity than an instant—in order to ordain and settle definitively its whole being on the strength of that moment's interval. It would be an unfair disproportion to draw an eternal reward as the consequence of so short a life.

Plato, to escape this difficulty, would have future payments limited to a hundred years, in proportion to the human span; and many of our own writers have given them limits in time.

Thus they judged that its generation followed the common condition of human things; and so did its life, according to the opinion of Epicurus and Democritus, which has been the most widely received, following these fine appearances: that it was seen to be born as soon as the body was capable of it; its powers were seen to grow like the sa vigueur et sa maturité: et puis sa declination et sa vieillesse, et en fin sa decrepitude:

FRENCH

Gigni pariter cum corpore, et vnà
Crescere sentimus, paritérque senescere mentem. Ils l'apperceuoient capable de diuerses passions et agitée de plusieurs mouuemens penibles, d'où elle tomboit en lassitude et en douleur, capable d'alteration et de changement, d'allegresse, d'assopissement, et de langueur, subjecte à ses maladies et aux offences, comme l'estomach ou le pied: Mentem sanari, corpus vt ægrum Cernimus, et flecti medicina posse videmus: esblouye et troublée par la force du vin: desmue de son assiette, par les vapeurs d'vne fieure chaude: endormie par l'application d'aucuns medicamens, et reueillée par d'autres.

Corpoream naturam animi esse necesse est,
Corporeis quoniam telis ictúque laborat. On luy voyoit estonner et renuerser toutes ses facultez par la seule morsure d'vn chien malade, et n'y auoir nulle si grande fermeté de discours, nulle suffisance, nulle vertu, nulle resolution philosophique, nulle contention de ses forces, qui la peust exempter de la subjection de ces accidens: la saliue d'vn chetif mastin versée sur la main de Socrates, secouër toute sa sagesse et toutes ses grandes et si reglées imaginations, les aneantir de maniere qu'il ne restast aucune trace de sa cognoissance premiere:
Vis. . . . . animaï Conturbatur, et . . . . .

diuisa seorsum
Disiectatur, eodem illo distracta veneno: et ce venin ne trouuer non plus de resistance en cette ame, qu'en celle d'vn enfant de quatre ans: venin capable de faire deuenir toute la philosophie, si elle estoit incarnée, furieuse et insensée: si que Caton, qui tordoit le col à la mort mesme et à la fortune, ne peust souffrir la veuë d'vn miroir, ou de l'eau, accablé d'espouuantement et d'effroy, quand il seroit tombé par la contagion d'vn chien enragé, en la maladie que les medecins nomment Hydroforbie. Vis morbi distracta per artus
Turbat agens animam, spumantes æquore salso
Ventorum vt validis feruescunt viribus vndæ.

ENGLISH

bodily ones; one recognized in it the weakness of its childhood, and in time its vigor and maturity; and then its decline and old age, and at last its decrepitude:

We feel that the mind is born together with the body, grows along with it, and with it grows old. They perceived it to be capable of various passions and stirred by many painful movements, from which it fell into weariness and pain; capable of alteration and change, of cheerfulness, torpor and languor; subject to its own diseases and injuries, like the stomach or the foot: We see that the mind is healed, just like a sick body, and see that it can be swayed by medicine. They saw it dazzled and disturbed by the strength of wine; dislodged from its seat by the vapors of a burning fever; put to sleep by the application of certain drugs, and woken by others.

The nature of the mind must be bodily, since it suffers from bodily weapons and blows. It was seen to have all its faculties stunned and overthrown by the mere bite of a sick dog. No firmness of reasoning was so great, no ability, no virtue, no philosophical resolution, no straining of its powers, that could exempt it from subjection to these accidents. The saliva of a wretched cur dropped on Socrates' hand could shake all his wisdom and all his great and well-ordered thoughts, and annihilate them so that no trace of his former knowledge remained: The power . . . . . of the soul is thrown into confusion and . . . . .

split apart,
is scattered, torn asunder by that same poison. And this venom would meet no more resistance in that soul than in the soul of a child of four: a venom capable of making all philosophy, if it were made flesh, raving and mad. So Cato, who wrung the neck of death itself and of Fortune, could not have borne the sight of a mirror or of water, overwhelmed with terror and dread, had he fallen, through the contagion of a mad dog, into the disease that physicians call hydrophobia. The force of the disease, spread through the limbs, drives the soul and throws it into turmoil, as on the salt sea the waves foam and seethe under the mighty force of the winds.

2.12.184

FRENCH

Or quant à ce poinct, la philosophie a bien armé l'homme pour la souffrance de tous autres accidens, ou de patience, ou si elle couste trop à trouuer, d'vne deffaitte inffallible, en se desrobant tout à faict du sentiment: mais ce sont moyens, qui seruent à vne ame estant à soy, et en ses forces, capable de discours et de deliberation: non pas à cet inconuenient, où chez vn philosophe, vne ame deuient l'ame d'vn fol, troublée, renuersée, et perdue.

Ce que plusieurs occasions produisent, comme vne agitation trop vehemente, que, par quelque forte passion, l'ame peut engendrer en soy-mesme: ou vne blessure en certain endroit de la personne: ou vne exhalation de l'estomach, nous iectant à vn esblouyssement et tournoyement de teste: Morbis in corporis auius errat
Sæpe animus; dementit enim, deliráque fatur,
Interdúmque graui lethargo fertur in altum
Æternúmqùe soporem, oculis nutúque cadenti.

2.12.185 Les philosophes n'ont, ce me semble, guere touché cette corde, non plus qu'vne autre de pareille importance. Ils ont ce dilemme tousiours en la bouche, pour consoler nostre mortelle condition: Ou l'ame est mortelle, ou immortelle: Si mortelle, elle sera sans peine: Si immortelle, elle ira en amendant. Ils ne touchent iamais l'autre branche: Quoy, si elle va en empirant? Et laissent aux poëtes les menaces des peines futures. Mais par là ils se donnent vn beau ieu. Ce sont deux omissions qui s'offrent à moy souvent en leurs discours. Ie reuiens à la premiere.

2.12.186 Cette ame pert l'vsage du souuerain bien Stoïque, si constant et si ferme. Il faut que nostre belle sagesse se rende en cet endroit, et quitte les armes. Au demeurant, ils consideroient aussi par la vanité de l'humaine raison, que le meslange et société de deux pieces si diuerses, comme est le mortel et l'immortel, est inimaginable: Quippe etenim mortale æterno iungere, et vnà
Consentire putare, et fungi mutua posse,
Desipere est. Quid enim diuersius esse putandum est,
Aut magis inter se disiunctum discrepitánsque,
Quàm, mortale quod est, immortali atque perenni
Iunctum in concilio sœuas tolerare procellas?

ENGLISH

Now on this point, philosophy has indeed armed man to endure all other accidents, either with patience or, if that costs too much to find, with an infallible way out, by escaping feeling altogether. But these are means that serve a soul that is its own master and in full possession of its powers, capable of reasoning and deliberation. They do not serve in this misfortune, where in a philosopher a soul becomes the soul of a fool, disturbed, overturned and lost.

This can be produced by many causes: by too violent an agitation, which the soul can generate within itself through some strong passion; or by a wound in a certain part of the person; or by an exhalation from the stomach, throwing us into dizziness and a spinning of the head: In diseases of the body the mind often wanders astray;
for it loses its reason and speaks wild words, and sometimes, under a heavy lethargy, is carried off into a deep and endless sleep, with drooping eyes and nodding head.

Philosophers have hardly touched this string, it seems to me, any more than another of equal importance. They always have this dilemma in their mouths to console our mortal condition: either the soul is mortal or immortal; if mortal, it will be free of suffering; if immortal, it will go on improving. They never touch the other branch: what if it goes on getting worse? And they leave the threats of future punishment to the poets. But in this way they give themselves an easy game. These are two omissions that often strike me in their discourses. I return to the first.

This soul loses the use of the Stoic sovereign good, so constant and so firm. Our fine wisdom must surrender at this point and lay down its arms. For the rest, they also considered, through the vanity of human reason, that the mixture and partnership of two pieces as different as the mortal and the immortal is unimaginable: For to join the mortal to the eternal, and to think that they can agree together and serve each other in turn, is madness. For what can be thought more unlike, or more disjoined and at odds with itself, than that a mortal thing, joined to the immortal and

FRENCH

ENGLISH

everlasting, should endure fierce storms in union?

2.12.187 Dauantage ils sentoyent l'ame s'engager en la mort, comme le corps. Simul æuo fessa fatiscit. Ce que, selon Zeno, l'image du sommeil nous montre assez. Car il estime que c'est vne defaillance et cheute de l'ame aussi bien que du corps.

Contrahi animum, et quasi labi putat atque decidere. Et ce qu'on aperceuoit en aucuns, sa force, et sa vigueur se maintenir en la fin de la vie, ils le rapportoyent à la diuersité des maladies, comme on void les hommes en cette extremité, maintenir, qui vn sens, qui vn autre, qui l'ouïr, qui le fleurer, sans alteration: et ne se voit point d'affoiblissement si vniuersel, qu'il n'y reste quelques parties entieres et vigoureuses: Non alio pacto, quàm si pes cùm dolet ægri, / In nullo caput interea sit fortè dolore.

Moreover, they felt that the soul was drawn into death, like the body: Worn out by age, it gives way along with it. This, according to Zeno, the image of sleep shows us clearly enough; for he holds that sleep is a fainting and falling of the soul as well as of the body.

He thinks the mind contracts, and as it were slips and falls. And when the soul's strength and vigor were seen in some people to hold up at the end of life, they attributed this to the diversity of diseases. So we see men in that extremity keep one sense or another unimpaired, one hearing, another smell; and no weakening is so universal that some parts do not remain whole and vigorous: Just as when a sick man's foot hurts, / his head meanwhile may happen to feel no pain.

2.12.188 La veuë de nostre iugement se rapporte à la verité, comme fait l'œil du chat-huant, à la splendeur du soleil, ainsi que dit Aristote. Par où le sçaurions nous mieux conuaincre que par si grossiers aueuglemens en vne si apparente lumiere? Car l'opinion contraire, de l'immortalité de l'ame, laquelle Cicero dit auoir esté premierement introduitte, au moins du tesmoignage des liures, par Pherecydes Syrius du temps du Roy Tullus (d'autres en attribuent l'inuention à Thales: et autres à d'autres) c'est la partie de l'humaine science traictée auec plus de reseruation et de doute. Les dogmatistes les plus fermes, sont contraints en cet endroit principalement, de se reietter à l'abry des ombrages de l'Academie.

Nul ne sçait ce qu'Aristote a estably de ce subiect, non plus que touts les anciens en general, qui le manient d'vne vacillante creance: rem gratissimam promittentium magis quàm probantium. Il s'est caché soubs le nuage des paroles et sens difficiles, et non intelligibles, et a laissé à ses sectateurs, autant à debattre sur son iugement que sur la matiere.

The sight of our judgment relates to truth as the owl's eye does to the brightness of the sun, as Aristotle says. How could we better convict it than by such gross blindness in so evident a light? For the contrary opinion, the immortality of the soul, is the part of human knowledge treated with the most reserve and doubt. Cicero says it was first introduced, at least on the testimony of books, by Pherecydes of Syros in the time of King Tullus (others attribute its invention to Thales, and others to others). The firmest dogmatists are forced, at this point above all, to fall back on the shelter of the shades of the Academy.[141]

No one knows what Aristotle laid down on this subject, any more than the ancients in general, who handle it with wavering belief: promising a most welcome thing rather than proving it. He hid behind a cloud of difficult and unintelligible words and meanings, and left his followers as much to debate about his judgment as about the matter itself.[142]

2.12.189 Deux choses leur rendoient cette opinion plausible: l'vne, que sans l'immortalité des ames, il n'y auroit plus dequoy asseoir les vaines esperances de la gloire, qui est vne consideration de merueilleux credit au monde: l'autre, que c'est vne tres-vtile impression, comme dit Platon,

Two things made this opinion plausible to them. One was that without the immortality of souls there would no longer be anything on which to rest the vain hopes of glory, a consideration that carries wonderful weight in the world. The other 141 Tullus Hostilius, legendary third king of Rome.

142 Seneca, Letters.

FRENCH

que les vices, quand ils se desroberont de la veuë et cognoissance de l'humaine iustice, demeurent tousiours en butte à la diuine, qui les poursuyura, voire apres la mort des coulpables. Vn soing extreme tient l'homme d'alonger son estre; il y a pourueu par toutes ses pieces. Et pour la conseruation du corps, sont les sepultures: pour la conseruation du nom, la gloire. Il a employé toute son opinion à se rebastir, impatient de sa fortune, et à s'estançonner par ses inuentions.

L'ame par son trouble et sa foiblesse, ne pouuant tenir sur son pied, va questant de toutes parts des consolations, esperances et fondements, et des circonstances estrangeres, où elle s'attache et se plante. Et pour legers et fantastiques que son inuention les luy forge, s'y repose plus seurement qu'en soy, et plus volontiers. Mais les plus aheurtez à cette si iuste et claire persuasion de l'immortalité de nos esprits; c'est merueille comme ils se sont trouuez courts et impuissans à l'establir par leurs humaines forces. Somnia sunt non docentis, sed optantis: disoit vn ancien.

L'homme peut recognoistre par ce tesmoignage, qu'il doit à la fortune et au rencontre, la verité qu'il descouure luy seul; puis que lors mesme, qu'elle luy est tombée en main, il n'a pas dequoy la saisir et la maintenir, et que sa raison n'a pas la force de s'en preualoir. Toutes choses produites par nostre propre discours et suffisance, autant vrayes que fauces, sont subiectes à incertitude et debat. C'est pour le chastiment de nostre fierté, et instruction de nostre misere et incapacité, que Dieu produisit le trouble, et la confusion de l'ancienne tour de Babel. Tout ce que nous entreprenons sans son assistance, tout ce que nous voyons sans la lampe de sa grace, ce n'est que vanité et folie.

L'essence mesme de la verité, qui est vniforme et constante, quand la fortune nous en donne la possession, nous la corrompons et abastardissons par nostre foiblesse. Quelque train que l'homme prenne de soy, Dieu permet qu'il arriue tousiours à cette mesme confusion, de laquelle il nous represente si viuement l'image par le iuste chastiement, dequoy il batit l'outrecuidance de Nemroth, et aneantit les vaines entreprinses du was that it is a very useful impression, as Plato says, that vices, when they slip out of the sight and knowledge of human justice, always remain a target for divine justice, which will pursue them even after the death of the guilty. Man is gripped by an extreme concern to prolong his being; he has provided for it with every means he has. For the preservation of the body there are tombs; for the preservation of the name, glory. Impatient of his lot, he has spent all his imagination on rebuilding himself and propping himself up with his inventions.

ENGLISH

The soul, unable to stand on its own feet because of its turmoil and weakness, goes searching on every side for consolations, hopes and foundations, and for outside circumstances to which it can cling and in which it can take root. And however flimsy and fantastic the things its invention forges for it, it rests on them more securely than on itself, and more willingly. But as for those most obstinately attached to this just and clear persuasion of the immortality of our spirits, it is a wonder how short and powerless they have found themselves when trying to establish it by their human powers. These are the dreams not of one who teaches, but of one who wishes, said an ancient.[143]

Man can recognize from this testimony that he owes to fortune and chance any truth he discovers on his own, since even when it has fallen into his hands he lacks the means to grasp it and hold on to it, and his reason lacks the strength to make use of it. All things produced by our own reasoning and ability, the true as well as the false, are subject to uncertainty and debate. It was to punish our pride and to teach us our misery and incapacity that God produced the turmoil and confusion of the ancient tower of Babel. All that we undertake without his help, all that we see without the lamp of his grace, is nothing but vanity and folly.

The very essence of truth, which is uniform and constant, we corrupt and debase by our weakness when fortune grants us possession of it. Whatever course man takes on his own, God allows him always to arrive at that same confusion. He shows us its image so vividly in the just punishment with which he struck down the presumption of Nimrod and brought to nothing the vain enterprise of bastiment de sa pyramide. Perdam sapientiam sapientium, et prudentiam prudentium reprobabo. La diuersité d'idiomes et de langues, dequoy il troubla cet ouurage, qu'est-ce autre chose, que cette infinie et perpetuelle altercation et discordance d'opinions et de raisons, qui accompaigne et embrouille le vain bastiment de l'humaine science? Et l'embrouille vtilement.

143 Cicero, Academica.

FRENCH

Qui nous tiendroit, si nous auions un grain de connoissance? Ce sainct m'a faict grand plaisir: Ipsa vtilitatis occultatio, aut humilitatis exercitatio est, aut elationis attritio. Iusques à quel poinct de presomption et d'insolence, ne portons nous nostre aueuglement et nostre bestise?

2.12.190 Mais pour reprendre mon propos: c'estoit vrayement bien raison, que nous fussions tenus à Dieu seul, et au benefice de sa grace, de la verité d'vne si noble creance, puis que de sa seule liberalité, nous receuons le fruict de l'immortalité, lequel consiste en la iouyssance de la beatitude eternelle. Confessons ingenuement, que Dieu seul nous l'a dict, et la foy: car leçon n'est-ce pas de Nature et de nostre raison. Et qui retentera son estre et ses forces, et dedans et dehors, sans ce priuilege diuin: qui verra l'homme, sans le flatter, il n'y verra ny efficace, ny faculté, qui sente autre chose que la mort et la terre. Plus nous donnons, et deuons, et rendons à Dieu, nous en faisons d'autant plus chrestiennement.

Ce que ce philosophe Stoïcien dit tenir du fortuit consentement de la voix populaire, valoit-il pas mieux qu'il le tinst de Dieu? Cùm de animorum æternitate disserimus, non leue momentum apud nos habet consensus hominum, aut timentium inferos, aut colentium. Vtor hac publica persuasione.

2.12.191 Or la foiblesse des argumens humains sur ce subiect, se connoist singulierement par les fabuleuses circonstances, qu'ils ont adioustees à la suite de cette opinion, pour trouuer de quelle condition estoit cette nostre immortalité. Laissons les Stoïciens, Vsuram nobis largiuntur tanquam cornicibus; diu mansuros aiunt animos, semper negant: qui donnent aux ames vne vie au delà de ceste cy, mais finie.

ENGLISH

building his pyramid. I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and reject the understanding of the prudent. The diversity of idioms and tongues with which he confounded that work—what else is it but this infinite and perpetual wrangling and discord of opinions and reasons that accompanies and entangles the vain edifice of human knowledge? And entangles it usefully.[144]

Who could hold us back if we had a grain of knowledge? This saint has given me great pleasure: The very concealment of what is useful serves either to exercise humility or to wear down pride. To what pitch of presumption and insolence do we not carry our blindness and our stupidity?[145]

But to take up my subject again: it was truly most reasonable that we should be beholden to God alone, and to the gift of his grace, for the truth of so noble a belief, since it is from his liberality alone that we receive the fruit of immortality, which consists in the enjoyment of eternal bliss. Let us frankly confess that God alone has told us so, and faith; for this is no lesson of Nature or of our reason. Whoever re-examines man's being and powers, within and without, apart from this divine privilege, whoever looks at man without flattering him, will see in him no efficacy or faculty that smells of anything but death and earth. The more we give, and owe, and render to God, the more Christianly we act.

What that Stoic philosopher says he takes from the chance agreement of popular opinion—would it not have been better for him to take it from God? When we discuss the eternity of souls, the consensus of men who either fear or worship the powers of the underworld carries no slight weight with us. I make use of this general persuasion.[146]

Now the weakness of human arguments on this subject shows most clearly in the fabulous details they have added in the wake of this opinion, in trying to find out what kind of condition this immortality of ours was. Let us leave aside the Stoics —They grant us a long lease of life, like crows: they say our souls will last a long time, but deny that they will 144 The quotation is from Saint Paul, 1 Corinthians 1:19; tradition made Nimrod the builder of the tower of Babel.

145 Saint Augustine, The City of God.
146 Seneca, Letters.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

last forever—who give souls a life beyond this one, but a finite one.[147]

La plus vniuerselle et plus receuë fantaisie, et qui dure iusques à nous, ç'a esté celle, de laquelle on fait autheur Pythagoras; non qu'il en fust le premier inuenteur, mais d'autant qu'elle receut beaucoup de poix, et de credit, par l'authorité de son approbation: C'est que les ames au partir de nous, ne faisoient que rouler de l'vn corps à vn autre, d'vn lyon à un cheual, d'vn cheual à vn Roy, se promenants ainsi sans cesse, de maison en maison. Et luy, disoit se souuenir auoir esté Æthalides, depuis Euphorbus, en apres Hermotimus, en fin de Pyrrhus estre passé en Pythagoras: ayant memoire de soy de deux cents six ans.

The most universal and most widely received fancy, which has lasted down to our time, was the one attributed to Pythagoras—not that he invented it, but because it gained much weight and credit from the authority of his approval. It is that souls, on leaving us, merely rolled from one body to another, from a lion to a horse, from a horse to a king, wandering thus endlessly from house to house. And he himself said that he remembered having been Aethalides, then Euphorbus, after that Hermotimus, and finally that he had passed from Pyrrhus into Pythagoras, so that his memory of himself went back two hundred and six years.

Adioustoyent aucuns, que ces mesmes ames remontent au ciel par fois, et en deuallent encores: O pater, ànne aliquas ad cœlum hinc ire putandum est
Sublimes animas, iterúmque ad tarda reuerti
Corpora? quæ lucis miseris tam dira cupido?

Some added that these same souls sometimes go back up to heaven and come down again: O father, must we think that some souls go up from here to the sky, on high, and come back again to sluggish bodies? What dreadful longing for the light do these wretches have?[148]

2.12.192 Origene les fait aller et venir eternellement du bon au mauuais estat. L'opinion que Varro recite, est, qu'en quatre cens quarante ans de reuolution elles se reioignent à leur premier corps. Chrysippus, que cela doibt aduenir apres certain espace de temps incognu et non limité. Platon (qui dit tenir de Pindare et de l'ancienne poësie cette croyance) des infinies vicissitudes de mutation, ausquelles l'ame est preparée, n'ayant ny les peines, ny les recompenses en l'autre monde, que temporelles, comme sa vie en cestuy-cy n'est que temporelle, conclud en elle vne singuliere sçience des affaires du ciel, de l'enfer, et d'icy, où elle a passé, repassé, et seiourné à plusieurs voyages: matiere à sa reminiscence.

Origen makes them come and go eternally between a good and a bad state. The opinion Varro reports is that after a cycle of four hundred and forty years they rejoin their first body; Chrysippus, that this must happen after a certain space of time, unknown and unlimited. Plato says he takes this belief from Pindar and the ancient poets. From the infinite vicissitudes of change to which the soul is destined—since in the other world its punishments and rewards are only temporary, as its life in this one is only temporary—he concludes that it has a singular knowledge of the affairs of heaven, of hell and of this world, through which it has passed, passed again, and sojourned on many journeys: matter for its reminiscence.

2.12.193 Voicy son progrés ailleurs: Qui a bien vescu, il se reioint à l'astre, auquel il est assigné: qui mal, il passe en femme: et si lors mesme il ne se corrige point, il se rechange en beste de condition conuenable à ses mœurs vicieuses: et ne verra fin à ses punitions, qu'il ne soit reuenu à sa naïue constitution, s'estant par la force de la raison défaict des qualitez grossieres, stupides, et elementaires, qui estoyent en luy. Mais ie ne veux oublier l'obiection

Here is its progress as he describes it elsewhere: whoever has lived well rejoins the star to which he is assigned; whoever has lived badly passes into a woman. And if even then he does not mend his ways, he changes again into a beast whose nature suits his vicious habits, and he will see no end to his punishments until he has returned to his natural constitution, having rid himself by the force que font les Epicuriens à cette transmigration de corps en autre. Elle est plaisante. Ils demandent quel ordre il y auroit, si la presse des mourans venoit à estre plus grande que des naissans.

147 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations; crows were proverbially long-lived.
148 Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

Car les ames deslogées de leur giste seroyent à se fouler à qui prendroit place la premiere dans ce nouuel estuy. Et demandent aussi, à quoy elles passeroient leur temps, ce pendant qu'elles attendroient qu'vn logis leur fust appresté: ou au rebours s'il naissoit plus d'animaux, qu'il n'en mourroit, ils disent que les corps seroient en mauuais party, attendant l'infusion de leur ame, et en aduiendroit qu'aucuns d'iceux se mourroient auant que d'auoir esté viuans.

Denique connubia ad veneris, partúsque ferarum,
Esse animas præsto deridiculum esse videtur,
Et spectare immortales mortalia membra
Innumero numero, certaréque præproperanter
Inter se, quæ prima potissimáque insinuetur. D'autres ont arresté l'ame au corps des trespassez, pour en animer les serpents, les vers, et autres bestes, qu'on dit s'engendrer de la corruption de nos membres, voire et de nos cendres. D'autres la diuisent en vne partie mortelle, et l'autre immortelle. Autres la font corporelle, et ce neantmoins immortelle. Aucuns la font immortelle, sans science et sans cognoissance. Il y en a aussi des nostres mesmes qui ont estimé, que des ames des condamnez, il s'en faisoit des diables: comme Plutarque pense, qu'il se face des dieux de celles qui sont sauuées.

Car il est peu de choses que cet autheur là establisse d'vne façon de parler si resolue, qu'il fait ceste-cy: maintenant par tout ailleurs vne maniere dubitatrice et ambigue. Il faut estimer, dit-il, et croire fermement, que les ames des hommes vertueux selon nature et selon iustice diuine, deuiennent d'hommes saincts, et de saincts demy-dieux, et de demy-dieux, apres qu'ils sont parfaictement, comme és sacrifices de purgation, nettoyez et purifiez, estans deliurez de toute passibilité et de toute mortalité, ils deuiennent, non par aucune ordonnance ciuile, mais à la verité, et selon raison vraysemblable, dieux entiers et parfaicts, en receuant vne fin tres heureuse et tres-glorieuse.

ENGLISH

of reason of the gross, stupid and elemental qualities that were in him. But I do not want to forget the objection the Epicureans raise to this transmigration from one body to another. It is amusing. They ask what order there would be if the crowd of the dying happened to be greater than that of the newborn.[149]

For the souls turned out of their lodging would be jostling one another over who should take the first place in this new case. They also ask how the souls would pass their time while waiting for a lodging to be got ready for them. Or, conversely, if more animals were born than died, they say the bodies would be in a bad way waiting for their soul to be poured in, and it would happen that some of them would die before they had ever been alive.

Lastly, it seems ridiculous that souls should stand ready at the matings of Venus and the births of beasts, and that immortal souls should wait for mortal limbs in numberless numbers, and compete in headlong haste among themselves as to which shall be the first and chief to slip in. Others have kept the soul in the bodies of the dead, to animate the snakes, worms and other creatures said to be generated from the decay of our limbs, and even from our ashes. Others divide it into a mortal part and an immortal part. Others make it bodily and yet immortal. Some make it immortal but without knowledge or understanding. There are even some of our own who have thought that devils were made from the souls of the damned, just as Plutarch thinks that gods are made from the souls of the saved.

For there are few things that this author asserts in as decided a manner as he does this one; everywhere else he keeps to a doubtful and ambiguous manner. We must judge, he says, and firmly believe, that the souls of virtuous men, according to nature and divine justice, become saints after being men, and demigods after being saints. And from demigods, once they have been perfectly cleansed and purified, as in sacrifices of purification, and delivered from all liability to suffering and all mortality, they become, not by any civil decree but in truth and according to probable 149 Plato, Timaeus.

FRENCH

Mais qui le voudra voir, luy, qui est des plus retenus pourtant et moderez de la bande, s'escarmoucher auec plus de hardiesse, et nous conter ses miracles sur ce propos, ie le renuoye à son discours de la lune, et du Dæmon de Socrates, là où aussi euidemment qu'en nul autre lieu, il se peut aduerer, les mysteres de la philosophie auoir beaucoup d'estrangetez communes auec celles de la poësie: l'entendement humain se perdant à vouloir sonder et contreroller toutes choses iusques au bout: tout ainsi comme, lassez et trauaillez de la longue course de nostre vie, nous retombons en enfantillage. Voyla les belles et certaines instructions, que nous tirons de la science humaine, sur le subiect de nostre ame.

ENGLISH

reason, whole and perfect gods, receiving a most happy and most glorious end.[150]

But whoever wants to see him—though he is one of the most restrained and moderate of the band—skirmishing more boldly and telling us his marvels on this subject, I refer to his discourse on the moon and on the daemon of Socrates. There, as evidently as anywhere, it can be verified that the mysteries of philosophy have many oddities in common with those of poetry: the human understanding loses itself in trying to sound and scrutinize all things to the very end. Just so, weary and worn out by the long course of our life, we fall back into childishness. Those are the fine and certain teachings we draw from human knowledge on the subject of our soul.[151]

DOCTORS AND GENERATION

Even about our own bodies, physicians and philosophers contradict one another.

FRENCH

2.12.194 Il n'y a point moins de temerité en ce qu'elle nous apprend des parties corporelles. Choisissons en vn, ou deux exemples: car autrement nous nous perdrions dans cette mer trouble et vaste des erreurs medecinales. Sçachons, si on s'accorde au moins en cecy, de quelle matiere les hommes se produisent les vns des autres. Car quant à leur premiere production, ce n'est pas merueille, si en chose si haute et ancienne, l'entendement humain se trouble et dissipe. Archelaüs le physicien, duquel Socrates fut le disciple et le mignon, selon Aristoxenus, disoit, et les hommes et les animaux auoir esté faicts d'vn limon laicteux, exprimé par la chaleur de la terre.

Pythagoras dit nostre semence estre l'escume de nostre meilleur sang: Platon, l'escoulement de la moëlle de l'espine du dos: ce qu'il argumente de ce, que cet endroit se sent le premier, de la lasseté de la besongne: Alcmeon, partie de la substance du cerueau: et qu'il soit ainsi, dit-il, les yeux troublent à ceux qui se trauaillent outre mesure à cet exercice: Democritus, vne substance extraite de toute la masse corporelle: Epicurus, extraicte de l'ame et du corps: Aristote, vn excrement tiré de l'aliment du sang le dernier qui s'espand en nos membres: autres, du sang, cuit et digeré par la chaleur des genitoires: ce qu'ils iugent de ce qu'aux extremes efforts, on rend des gouttes

ENGLISH

There is no less rashness in what it teaches us about the parts of the body. Let us pick one or two examples, for otherwise we would lose ourselves in this vast and murky sea of medical errors. Let us find out whether there is agreement at least on this: from what matter men produce one another. For as to their first production, it is no wonder if, in a matter so lofty and so ancient, the human understanding is confused and scattered. Archelaus the natural philosopher, whose disciple and favorite Socrates was, according to Aristoxenus, said that both men and animals had been made from a milky slime squeezed out by the heat of the earth.

Pythagoras says our seed is the foam of our best blood; Plato, that it is the outflow of the marrow of the spine, which he argues from the fact that this place is the first to feel the fatigue of the work; Alcmaeon, that it is part of the substance of the brain—and to show that this is so, he says, the eyes of those who exert themselves beyond measure at this exercise grow dim. Democritus says it is a substance extracted from the whole mass of the body; Epicurus, extracted from the soul and the body; Aristotle, a residue drawn from the final nourishment of the blood, the last to spread 150 Plutarch, Life of Romulus.

151 Plutarch's dialogues On the Face in the Moon and On the Sign of Socrates.

FRENCH

de pur sang: enquoy il semble qu'il y ayt plus d'apparence, si on peut tirer quelque apparence d'vne confusion si infinie.

Or pour mener à effect cette semence, combien en font-ils d'opinions contraires? Aristote et Democritus tiennent que les femmes n'ont point de sperme: et que ce n'est qu'vne sueur qu'elles eslancent par la chaleur du plaisir et du mouuement, qui ne sert de rien à la generation. Galen au contraire, et ses suyuans, que sans la rencontre des semences, la generation ne se peut faire. Voyla les medecins, les philosophes, les iurisconsultes, et les theologiens, aux prises pesle mesle auec nos femmes, sur la dispute, à quels termes les femmes portent leur fruict. Et moy ie secours par l'exemple de moy-mesme, ceux d'entre eux, qui maintiennent la grossesse d'onze moys.

Le monde est basty de cette experience, il n'est si simple femmelette qui ne puisse dire son aduis sur toutes ces contestations, et si nous n'en sçaurions estre d'accord.

2.12.195 En voyla assez pour verifier que l'homme n'est non plus instruit de la cognoissance de soy, en la partie corporelle, qu'en la spirituelle. Nous l'auons proposé luy mesmes à soy, et sa raison, à sa raison, pour voir ce qu'elle nous en diroit. Il me semble assez auoir montré combien peu elle s'entend en elle mesme. Et, qui ne s'entend en soy, en quoy se peut il entendre? Quasi veró mensuram vllius rei possit agere, qui sui nesciat. Vrayement Protagoras nous en comtoit de belles, faisant l'homme la mesure de toutes choses, qui ne sçeut iamais seulement la sienne. Si ce n'est luy, sa dignité ne permettra pas qu'autre creature ayt cet aduantage.

Or luy estant en soy si contraire, et l'vn iugement subuertissant l'autre sans cesse, cette fauorable proposition n'estoit qu'vne risée, qui nous menoit à conclurre par necessité la neantise du compas et du compasseur. Quand Thales estime la cognoissance de l'homme tres-difficile à l'homme, il luy apprend, la cognoissance de toute autre chose luy estre impossible.

ENGLISH

through our limbs. Others say it comes from the blood, cooked and digested by the heat of the genitals, which they judge from the fact that in extreme efforts drops of pure blood are emitted. This seems the most likely, if any likelihood can be drawn from so infinite a confusion.

Now as for bringing this seed to fruition, how many contrary opinions do they hold! Aristotle and Democritus hold that women have no sperm, and that it is only a sweat they emit through the heat of pleasure and movement, which plays no part in generation. Galen, on the contrary, and his followers hold that generation cannot take place without the meeting of the two seeds. There you have the physicians, the philosophers, the jurists and the theologians grappling pell-mell with our women over the question of the term for which women carry their fruit. And I, for my part, come to the aid, with my own example, of those among them who uphold the eleven-month pregnancy.

The world is built on this experience; there is no woman so simple that she cannot give her opinion on all these disputes; and yet we cannot agree about them.

That is enough to show that man is no better instructed in knowledge of himself in his bodily part than in his spiritual part. We have set him before himself, and his reason before his reason, to see what it would tell us about it. I think I have shown well enough how little it understands itself. And he who does not understand himself, what can he understand? As if indeed one could take the measure of anything who does not know his own. Truly, Protagoras told us fine tales when he made man, who never even knew his own measure, the measure of all things. If it is not man, his dignity will not allow any other creature to have this advantage.[152]

Now since man is so self-contradictory, one judgment ceaselessly overturning another, this flattering proposition was only a joke, which forced us to conclude the nothingness of both the measure and the measurer. When Thales holds that knowledge of man is very difficult for man, he teaches him that knowledge of everything else is impossible for him.

152 Pliny the Elder, Natural History.

A WARNING TO HIS READER

This desperate argument is for extreme need; keep to the common road and bridle the mind.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.196 Vous, pour qui i'ay pris la peine d'estendre vn si long corps, contre ma coustume, ne refuyrez point de maintenir vostre Sebonde, par la forme ordinaire d'argumenter, dequoy vous estes tous les iours instruite, et exercerez en cela vostre esprit et vostre estude: car ce dernier tour d'escrime icy, il ne le faut employer que comme vn extreme remede. C'est vn coup desesperé, auquel il faut abandonner vos armes, pour faire perdre à vostre aduersaire les siennes: et vn tour secret, duquel il se faut seruir rarement et reseruément. C'est grande temerité de vous perdre pour perdre vn autre. Il ne faut pas vouloir mourir pour se venger, comme fit Gobrias.	You, for whom I have taken the trouble to stretch out so long a body, contrary to my habit, will not shrink from defending your Sebond by the ordinary form of argument in which you are instructed every day, and you will exercise your mind and your study in that. For this last fencing trick should be used only as an extreme remedy. It is a desperate thrust, in which you must abandon your own weapons to make your adversary lose his; and a secret trick, to be used rarely and with reserve. It is great rashness to destroy yourself in order to destroy another. One must not wish to die to take revenge, as Gobryas did.[153]
Car estant aux prises bien estroictes auec vn Seigneur de Perse, Darius y suruenant l'espée au poing, qui craignoit de frapper, de peur d'assener Gobrias: il luy cria, qu'il donnast hardiment, quand il deuroit donner au trauers tous les deux. I'ay veu reprouuer pour iniustes, des armes et conditions de combat singulier desesperées, et ausquelles celuy qui les offroit, mettoit luy et son compaignon en termes d'vne fin à tous deux ineuitable.	For he was locked in a close struggle with a Persian lord when Darius came up sword in hand and was afraid to strike for fear of hitting Gobryas; and Gobryas shouted to him to strike boldly, even if he ran them both through. I have seen weapons and conditions of single combat condemned as unjust because they were desperate, and because the man who proposed them put himself and his opponent in a position where an end for both was inevitable.[154]
Les Portugais prindrent en la mer des Indes certains Turcs prisonniers: lesquels impatiens de leur captiuité, se resolurent, et leur succeda, frottant des clous de nauire l'vn à l'autre, et faisans tomber vne estincelle de feu dans les caques de poudre (qu'il y auoit en l'endroit où ils estoyent gardez) d'embraser et mettre en cendre eux, leurs maistres et le vaisseau. Nous secouons icy les limites et dernieres clostures des sciences: ausquelles l'extremité est vitieuse, comme en la vertu. Tenez vous dans la route commune, il ne fait mie bon estre si subtil et si fin.	The Portuguese captured some Turks in the Indian Ocean. These prisoners, impatient of their captivity, resolved to set fire to themselves, their masters and the ship and burn them all to ashes—and they succeeded—by rubbing ship's nails against one another and letting a spark fall into the kegs of powder in the place where they were kept. We are shaking here the limits and last enclosures of the sciences, in which extremity is a vice, as it is in virtue. Keep to the common road; it is no good at all being so subtle and so clever.
Souuienne vous de ce que dit le prouerbe Thoscan, Chi troppo s'assottiglia, si scauezza. Ie vous conseille en vos opinions et en vos discours, autant qu'en vos mœurs, et en toute autre chose, la moderation et l'attrempance, et la fuite de la nouuelleté et de l'estrangeté. Toutes les voyes extrauagantes me faschent. Vous qui par l'authorité que vostre grandeur vous apporte, et encores plus par les auantages que vous donnent les qualitez plus	Remember what the Tuscan proverb says: Whoever makes himself too fine breaks. I recommend to you, in your opinions and your reasonings as much as in your conduct and in everything else, moderation and temperance, and the avoidance of novelty and strangeness. All roads that stray off the beaten track annoy me. You who, by the authority your greatness brings you, and still more by the advant-

153 The unnamed lady addressed here is traditionally identified as Margaret of Valois, Queen of Navarre.
154 Gobryas was one of the Persian nobles who helped Darius overthrow the usurper known as the false Smerdis, in 522 BC.

FRENCH

vostres, pouuez d'vn clin d'œil commander à qui il vous plaist, deuiez donner cette charge à quelqu'un, qui fist profession des lettres, qui vous eust bien autrement appuyé et enrichy cette fantasie. Toutesfois en voicy assez, pour ce que vous en auez à faire.

2.12.197 Epicurus disoit des loix, que les pires nous estoyent si necessaires, que sans elles, les hommes s'entremangeroient les vns les autres. Et Platon verifie que sans loix, nous viurions comme bestes. Nostre esprit est vn vtil vagabond, dangereux et temeraire: il est malaisé d'y ioindre l'ordre et la mesure: de mon temps ceux qui ont quelque rare excellence au dessus des autres, et quelque viuacité extraordinaire, nous les voyons quasi tous, desbordez en licence d'opinions, et de mœurs: c'est miracle s'il s'en rencontre vn rassis et sociable. On a raison de donner à l'esprit humain les barrieres les plus contraintes qu'on peut.

En l'estude, comme au reste, il luy faut compter et regler ses marches: il luy faut tailler par art les limites de sa chasse. On le bride et garotte de religions, de loix, de coustumes, de science, de preceptes, de peines, et recompenses mortelles et immortelles: encores voit-on que par sa volubilité et dissolution, il eschappe à toutes ces liaisons. C'est vn corps vain, qui n'a par où estre saisi et assené: vn corps diuers et difforme, auquel on ne peut asseoir nœud ny prise.

Certes il est peu d'ames si reglées, si fortes et bien nées, à qui on se puisse fier de leur propre conduicte: et qui puissent auec moderation et sans temerité, voguer en la liberté de leurs iugemens, au delà des opinions communes. Il est plus expedient de les mettre en tutelle. C'est vn outrageux glaiue à son possesseur mesme, que l'esprit, à qui ne sçait s'en armer ordonnément et discrettement. Et n'y a point de beste, à qui il faille plus iustement donner des orbieres, pour tenir sa veuë subjecte, et contrainte deuant ses pas; et la garder d'extrauaguer ny çà ny là, hors les ornieres que l'vsage et les loix luy tracent.

Parquoy il vous siera mieux de vous resserrer dans le train accoustumé, quel qu'il soit, que de ietter vostre vol à cette licence effrenée. Mais si quelqu'vn de ces nouueaux docteurs, entreprend de faire l'ingenieux en ages that the qualities more truly your own give you, can command anyone you please with a wink, should have given this task to someone who made a profession of letters; he would have supported and enriched this notion for you quite differently. However, here is enough for what you need of it.

ENGLISH

Epicurus said of laws that even the worst were so necessary to us that without them men would eat one another. And Plato confirms that without laws we would live like beasts. Our mind is a wandering, dangerous and reckless tool; it is hard to join order and measure to it. In my time, those who have some rare excellence above the rest, and some extraordinary liveliness, we see almost all of them overflowing into license of opinions and of morals. It is a miracle if one of them turns out settled and sociable. There is good reason to set the tightest barriers we can around the human mind.

In study, as in everything else, its steps must be counted and regulated for it; the limits of its hunting ground must be marked out for it by art. It is bridled and bound with religions, laws, customs, knowledge, precepts, and punishments and rewards both mortal and immortal; and still we see that by its volatility and looseness it escapes all these bonds. It is an empty body with nothing by which it can be seized or struck; a varied and shapeless body on which no knot or hold can be fastened.

Certainly there are few souls so well ordered, so strong and so well born that they can be trusted to their own guidance, and that can sail with moderation and without rashness in the freedom of their judgments beyond common opinions. It is more expedient to put them under guardianship. The mind is a dangerous sword, even to its owner, for anyone who does not know how to arm himself with it in an orderly and discreet way. And there is no beast that more rightly needs blinkers, to keep its gaze subject and confined to what is in front of its feet, and to keep it from straying here or there out of the ruts that usage and the laws trace for it.

Therefore it will suit you better to keep within the accustomed track, whatever it may be, than to launch your flight into this unbridled license. But if one of these new doctors undertakes to play the vostre presence, aux despens de son salut et du vostre: pour vous deffaire de cette dangereuse peste, qui se respand tous les iours en vos cours, ce preseruatif à l'extreme necessité, empeschera que la contagion de ce venin n'offencera, ny vous, ny vostre assistance.

FRENCH

2.12.198 La liberté donc et gaillardise de ces esprits anciens, produisoit en la philosophie et sciences humaines, plusieurs sectes d'opinions differentes, chacun entreprenant de iuger et de choisir pour prendre party. Mais à present, que les hommes vont tous vn train: qui certis quibusdam destinatisque sententiis addicti et consecrati sunt, vt étiam, quæ non probant, cogantur defendere: et que nous receuons les arts par ciuile authorité et ordonnance: si que les escholes n'ont qu'vn patron et pareille institution et discipline circonscripte, on ne regarde plus ce que les monnoyes poisent et valent, mais chacun à son tour, les reçoit selon le prix, que l'approbation commune et le cours leur donne: on ne plaide pas de l'alloy, mais de l'vsage: ainsi se mettent egallement toutes choses.

On reçoit la medecine, comme la geometrie; et les battelages, les enchantemens, les liaisons, le commerce des esprits des trespassez, les prognostications, les domifications, et iusques à cette ridicule poursuitte de la pierre philosophale, tout se met sans contredict.

Il ne faut que sçauoir, que le lieu de Mars loge au milieu du triangle de la main, celuy de Venus au pouce, et de Mercure au petit doigt: et que quand la mensale couppe le tubercle de l'enseigneur, c'est signe de cruauté: quand elle faut soubs le mitoyen, et que la moyenne naturelle fait vn angle auec la vitale, soubs mesme endroit, que c'est signe d'vne mort miserable: que si à vne femme, la naturelle est ouuerte, et ne ferme point l'angle auec la vitale, cela denote qu'elle sera mal chaste. Ie vous appelle vous mesme à tesmoin, si auec cette science, vn homme ne peut passer auec reputation et faueur parmy toutes compagnies.

ENGLISH

clever man in your presence, at the expense of his salvation and of yours, then, to rid yourself of this dangerous plague that is spreading every day in your courts, this preservative, used in extreme necessity, will prevent the contagion of this venom from harming either you or your company.

So the freedom and boldness of those ancient minds produced in philosophy and the human sciences many sects of differing opinions, each man undertaking to judge and choose in order to take sides. But now men all go the same way: they are bound and dedicated to certain fixed and settled opinions, so that they are forced to defend even what they do not approve. We receive the arts by civil authority and decree, so that the schools have only one pattern and a like, circumscribed education and discipline. Now people no longer look at what the coins weigh and are worth; each in turn accepts them at the value that common approval and currency give them. People argue not about the alloy but about the use. And so all things pass on equal terms.[155]

Medicine is accepted like geometry; and conjuring tricks, enchantments, binding spells, dealings with the spirits of the dead, prognostications, the casting of astrological houses, and even that ridiculous quest for the philosopher's stone—everything passes without contradiction.

You need only know that the place of Mars lies in the middle of the triangle of the hand, that of Venus at the thumb, and that of Mercury at the little finger. When the table line cuts the mount of the forefinger, it is a sign of cruelty; when it stops short below the middle finger, and the natural middle line makes an angle with the life line at the same spot, it is a sign of a wretched death; if in a woman the natural line is open and does not close the angle with the life line, this shows that she will not be very chaste. I call you yourself to witness whether, with this science, a man cannot pass with reputation and favor in any company.

155 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.

WHERE KNOWLEDGE STOPS

Neither the Academics' probability nor any rule can fix the limits of what we know.

FRENCH

2.12.199 Theophrastus disoit, que l'humaine cognoissance, acheminée par les sens, pouuoit iuger des causes des choses iusques à certaine mesure, mais qu'estant arriuée aux causes extremes et premieres, il falloit qu'elle s'arrestast, et qu'elle rebouchast: à cause ou de sa foiblesse, ou de la difficulté des choses. C'est vne opinion moyenne et douce; que nostre suffisance nous peut conduire iusques à la cognoissance d'aucunes choses, et qu'elle a certaines mesures de puissance, outre lesquelles c'est temerité de l'employer. Cette opinion est plausible, et introducte par gens de composition: mais il est malaisé de donner bornes à nostre esprit: il est curieux et auide, et n'a point occasion de s'arrester plus tost à mille pas qu'à cinquante.

Ayant essayé par experience, que ce à quoy l'vn s'estoit failly, l'autre y est arriué: et que ce qui estoit incogneu à vn siecle, le siecle suyuant l'a esclaircy: et que les sciences et les arts ne se iettent pas en moule, ains se forment et figurent peu à peu, en les maniant et pollissant à plusieurs fois, comme les ours façonnent leurs petits en les leschant à loisir: ce que ma force ne peut descouurir, ie ne laisse pas de le sonder et essayer:

et en retastant et pestrissant cette nouuelle matiere, la remuant et l'eschauffant, i'ouure à celuy qui me suit, quelque facilité pour en iouyr plus à son ayse, et la luy rends plus soupple, et plus maniable: Vt Hymettia sole
Cera remollescit, tractatáque pollice multas
Vertitur in facies, ipsóque fit vtilis vsu. Autant en fera le second au tiers: qui est cause que la difficulté ne me doit pas desesperer; ny aussi peu mon impuissance, car ce n'est que la mienne.

2.12.200 L'homme est capable de toutes choses, comme d'aucunes. Et s'il aduouë, comme dit Theophrastus, l'ignorance des causes premieres et des principes, qu'il me quitte hardiment tout le reste de sa science. Si le fondement luy faut, son discours est par terre. Le disputer et l'enquerir, n'a autre but et arrest que les principes: si cette fin n'arreste son cours, il se iecte à vne irresolution infinie. Non potest aliud alio magis minùsue comprehendi, quoniam

ENGLISH

Theophrastus said that human knowledge, guided by the senses, could judge the causes of things up to a certain point, but that on reaching the ultimate and first causes it had to stop and be blunted, either because of its weakness or because of the difficulty of things. It is a moderate and gentle opinion: that our ability can lead us to the knowledge of some things, and that its power has certain limits, beyond which it is rash to use it. This opinion is plausible and was put forward by people of a conciliatory disposition. But it is hard to set bounds to our mind: it is curious and greedy, and has no reason to stop at a thousand paces rather than at fifty.

I have found by experience that where one man failed, another has succeeded; that what was unknown to one century, the following century has made clear; and that the sciences and the arts are not cast in a mold, but are formed and shaped little by little, by being handled and polished many times over, as bears shape their cubs by licking them at leisure. So what my strength cannot discover, I still keep probing and trying out; and by handling and kneading this new matter again, stirring and warming it, I give the one who comes after me some ease in enjoying it more comfortably, and make it more supple and more manageable for him: As Hymettian wax softens in the sun, and, worked by the thumb, turns into many shapes, and is made useful by use itself. The second will do as much for the third. That is why difficulty must not make me despair, nor my powerlessness either, for it is only mine.[156]

Man is capable of all things just as much as of some. And if he admits, as Theophrastus says, that he is ignorant of first causes and principles, let him boldly hand over to me all the rest of his knowledge. If the foundation fails him, his reasoning lies flat on the ground. Disputing and inquiring have no other goal or stopping point than principles; if that end does not halt his course, he 156 Ovid, Metamorphoses.

FRENCH

omnium rerum vna est definitio comprehendendi. Or il est vray-semblable que si l'ame sçauoit quelque chose, elle se sçauroit premierement elle mesme; et si elle sçauoit quelque chose hors d'elle, ce seroit son corps et son estuy, auant toute autre chose.

Si on void iusques auiourd'huy les dieux de la medecine se debattre de nostre anatomie, Mulciber in Troiam, pro Troia stabat Apollo: quand attendons nous qu'ils en soyent d'accord? Nous nous sommes plus voisins, que ne nous est la blancheur de la nege, ou la pesanteur de la pierre. Si l'homme ne se cognoist, comment cognoist-il ses functions et ses forces? Il n'est pas à l'aduanture, que quelque notice veritable ne loge chez nous; mais c'est par hazard. Et d'autant que par mesme voye, mesme façon et conduitte, les erreurs se reçoiuent en nostre ame, elle n'a pas dequoy les distinguer, ny dequoy choisir la verité du mensonge.

2.12.201 Les Academiciens receuoyent quelque inclination de iugement; et trouuoyent trop crud, de dire qu'il n'estoit pas plus vray-semblable que la nege fust blanche, que noire; et que nous ne fussions non plus asseurez du mouuement d'vne pierre, qui part de nostre main, que de celuy de la huictiesme sphere. Et pour euiter cette difficulté et estrangeté, qui ne peut à la verité loger en nostre imagination, que malaisément; quoy qu'ils establissent que nous n'estions aucunement capables de sçauoir, et que la verité est engoufrée dans des profonds abysmes, où la veuë humaine ne peut penetrer: si aduouoyent ils, les vnes choses plus vray-semblables que les autres; et receuoyent en leur iugement cette faculté, de se pouuoir incliner plustost à vne apparence, qu'à vne autre.

Ils luy permettoyent cette propension, luy deffendant toute resolution. L'aduis des Pyrrhoniens est plus hardy, et quant et quant plus vray-semblable. Car cette inclination Academique, et cette propension à vne proposition plustost qu'à vne autre, qu'est-ce autre chose que la recognoissance de quelque plus apparente verité, en cette-cy qu'en celle-là? Si nostre entendement est capable de la forme, des lineamens, du port, et du visage, de la verité, il la verroit entiere, aussi bien que demie, naissante, et imperfaicte.

ENGLISH

plunges into endless irresolution. One thing cannot be grasped more or less than another, since there is one single definition of grasping for all things. Now it is likely that if the soul knew anything, it would first of all know itself; and if it knew anything outside itself, that would be its body and its case, before anything else.[157]

If we see the gods of medicine still quarreling to this day over our anatomy, Mulciber was against Troy, Apollo stood for Troy: when can we expect them to agree? We are nearer to ourselves than the whiteness of snow or the weight of stone is to us. If man does not know himself, how can he know his functions and his powers? It is not impossible, perhaps, that some true notion lodges in us; but if so, it is by chance. And since errors are received into our soul by the same road, in the same manner and by the same conduct, the soul has nothing by which to tell them apart, nor to choose truth over falsehood.[158]

The Academics allowed some inclination of judgment. They found it too crude to say that it was no more likely that snow was white than black, and that we were no more certain of the motion of a stone leaving our hand than of that of the eighth sphere. To avoid this difficulty and strangeness, which in truth can find room in our imagination only with great difficulty, they did lay it down that we were in no way capable of knowing, and that truth is swallowed up in deep abysses where human sight cannot penetrate. Yet they admitted that some things are more likely than others, and granted their judgment the faculty of inclining toward one appearance rather than another.[159]

They allowed it this leaning, while forbidding it any decision. The view of the Pyrrhonists is bolder, and at the same time more likely. For this Academic inclination, this leaning toward one proposition rather than another—what else is it but the recognition of some more apparent truth in this one than in that? If our understanding were capable of grasping the form, the features, the bearing and the face of truth, it would see it whole just as well as half, nascent and imperfect.

157 Cicero, Academica.
158 Ovid, Tristia; Mulciber is Vulcan, who sided with the Greeks against Troy.
159 In ancient astronomy the eighth sphere was the sphere of the fixed stars.

FRENCH

Cette apparence de verisimilitude, qui les fait prendre plustost à gauche qu'à droite, augmentez la; cette once de verisimilitude, qui incline la balance, multipliez la de cent, de mille onces; il en aduiendra en fin, que la balance prendra party tout à faict, et arrestera vn chois et vne verité entiere. Mais comment se laissent ils plier à la vray-semblance, s'ils ne cognoissent le vray? Comment cognoissent ils la semblance de ce, dequoy ils ne cognoissent pas l'essence? Ou nous pouuons iuger tout à faict, ou tout à faict nous ne le pouuons pas.

Si noz facultez intellectuelles et sensibles, sont sans fondement et sans pied, si elles ne font que flotter et vanter, pour neant laissons nous emporter nostre iugement à aucune partie de leur operation, quelque apparence qu'elle semble nous presenter. Et la plus seure assiette de nostre entendement, et la plus heureuse, ce seroit celle-là, où il se maintiendroit rassis, droit, inflexible, sans bransle et sans agitation. Inter visa vera, aut falsa, ad animi assensum, nihil interest. Que les choses ne logent pas chez nous en leur forme et en leur essence, et n'y facent leur entrée de leur force propre et authorité, nous le voyons assez.

Par ce que s'il estoit ainsi, nous les receurions de mesme façon: le vin seroit tel en la bouche du malade, qu'en la bouche du sain. Celuy qui a des creuasses aux doigts, ou qui les a gourdz, trouueroit vne pareille durté au bois ou au fer, qu'il manie, que fait vn autre. Les subjets estrangers se rendent donc à nostre mercy, ils logent chez nous, comme il nous plaist. Or si de nostre part nous receuions quelque chose sans alteration, si les prises humaines estoient assez capables et fermes, pour saisir la verité par noz propres moyens, ces moyens estans communs à tous les hommes, cette verité se reiecteroit de main en main de l'vn à l'autre.

Et au moins se trouueroit-il vne chose au monde, de tant qu'il y en a, qui se croiroit par les hommes d'vn consentement vniuersel. Mais ce, qu'il ne se void aucune proposition, qui ne soit debattue et controuersée entre nous, ou qui ne le puisse estre, montre bien que nostre iugement naturel ne saisit pas bien clairement ce qu'il saisit: car mon iugement ne le peut faire receuoir au iugement de mon compagnon: qui est signe qui ie l'ay saisi par quelque autre moyen, que par vne naturelle puissance, qui soit en moy et en tous les hommes.

ENGLISH

That appearance of likelihood which makes them turn left rather than right: increase it. That ounce of likelihood which tips the scale: multiply it by a hundred, by a thousand ounces. In the end the scale will come down wholly on one side and settle on one choice and one whole truth. But how do they let themselves be bent toward what is like the truth, if they do not know the true? How do they know the likeness of something whose essence they do not know? Either we can judge absolutely, or absolutely we cannot.

If our intellectual and sensory faculties have no foundation and no footing, if all they do is float and drift with the wind, then it is pointless to let our judgment be carried along by any part of their operation, whatever appearance it may seem to present to us. The surest and happiest position for our understanding would be one in which it kept itself settled, upright, unbending, without wavering and without agitation. Between true and false appearances there is no difference as far as the mind's assent is concerned. That things do not lodge in us in their own form and essence, and do not make their entry by their own force and authority, we see clearly enough.

For if that were so, we would all receive them in the same way: wine would taste the same in the mouth of a sick man as in the mouth of a healthy one. A man with chapped or numb fingers would find the wood or iron he handles just as hard as another man does. Outside objects therefore surrender to our mercy; they lodge in us as we please. Now if for our part we received anything without altering it, if the human grip were capable and firm enough to seize truth by our own means, then, since those means are common to all men, this truth would be passed from hand to hand, from one man to another.

And there would be at least one thing in the world, out of all there are, that men would believe by universal consent. But the fact that no proposition can be found that is not debated and disputed among us, or could not be, shows clearly that our natural judgment does not grasp very clearly what it grasps. For my judgment cannot make my companion's judgment accept it—which is a sign that I have grasped it by some other means than a natural power that is in me and in all men.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.202 Laissons à part cette infinie confusion d'opinions, qui se void entre les philosophes mesmes, et ce debat perpetuel et vniuersel en la cognoissance des choses. Car cela est presupposé tres-veritablement, que d'aucune chose les hommes, ie dy les sçauans, les mieux nais, les plus suffisans, ne sont d'accord: non pas que le ciel soit sur nostre teste: car ceux qui doubtent de tout, doubtent aussi de cela: et ceux qui nient que nous puissions comprendre aucune chose, disent que nous n'auons pas compris que le ciel soit sur nostre teste: et ces deux opinions sont, en nombre, sans comparaison les plus fortes.

Let us leave aside the infinite confusion of opinions that is seen even among the philosophers, and this perpetual and universal debate about the knowledge of things. For it is taken for granted, and very truly, that men—I mean the learned, the best-born, the most able—agree about nothing: not even that the sky is over our heads. For those who doubt everything doubt that too; and those who deny that we can comprehend anything say that we have not comprehended that the sky is over our heads. And these two opinions are, in numbers, incomparably the strongest.

A JUDGMENT THAT SHIFTS WITH THE BODY

Health, mood, passion and argument change what we hold true from hour to hour.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.203 Outre cette diuersité et diuision infinie, par le trouble que nostre iugement nous donne à nous mesmes, et l'incertitude que chacun sent en soy, il est aysé à voir qu'il a son assiette bien mal asseurée. Combien diuersement iugeons nous des choses? combien de fois changeons nous noz fantasies? Ce que ie tiens auiourd'huy, et ce que ie croy, ie le tiens, et le croy de toute ma croyance: tous mes vtils et tous mes ressorts empoignent cette opinion, et m'en respondent, sur tout ce qu'ils peuuent: ie ne sçaurois embrasser aucune verité ny conseruer auec plus d'asseurance, que ie fay cette-cy.

Besides this infinite diversity and division, it is easy to see, from the confusion our judgment throws us into and the uncertainty each man feels within himself, that its footing is very insecure. How variously we judge things! How often we change our notions! What I hold today and what I believe, I hold and believe with all my belief; all my tools and all my springs seize on this opinion and vouch for it as far as they can. I could not embrace any truth, or keep hold of it, with more assurance than I do this one.

I'y suis tout entier; i'y suis voyrement: mais ne m'est-il pas aduenu non vne fois, mais cent, mais mille, et tous les iours, d'auoir embrassé quelque autre chose à tout ces mesmes instrumens, en cette mesme condition, que depuis i'ay iugée fauce? Au moins faut-il deuenir sage à ses propres despens. Si ie me suis trouué souuent trahy soubs cette couleur, si ma touche se trouue ordinairement faulce, et ma balance inegale et iniuste, quelle asseurance en puis-ie prendre à cette fois, plus qu'aux autres? N'est-ce pas sottise, de me laisser tant de fois pipper à vn guide?

I am wholly in it; I am truly in it. But has it not happened to me—not once, but a hundred times, a thousand times, every day—that I embraced some other thing with these same instruments, in this same condition, which I have since judged to be false? At least one ought to grow wise at one's own expense. If I have often found myself betrayed under this guise, if my touchstone usually proves false and my scale uneven and unjust, what assurance can I take from it this time, more than the others? Isn't it foolish to let myself be cheated so many times by the same guide?

Toutesfois, que la Fortune nous remue cinq cens fois de place, qu'elle ne face que vuyder et remplir sans cesse, comme dans vn vaisseau, dans nostre croyance, autres et autres opinions, tousiours la presente et la derniere c'est la certaine, et l'infaillible. Pour cette-cy, il faut abandonner les biens, l'honneur, la vie, et le salut, et tout, Posterior res illa reperta, / Perdit, et immutat sensus ad pristina quæque. Quoy qu'on nous presche, quoy que nous

And yet let Fortune move us five hundred times from our place, let her do nothing but empty and refill our belief endlessly, as she might a vessel, with one opinion after another: always the present and latest one is the certain, the infallible one. For this one we must give up goods, honor, life, salvation, everything. The thing found later spoils the old, / And turns our feelings against all that came be- apprenions, il faudroit tousiours se souuenir que c'est l'homme qui donne, et l'homme qui reçoit; c'est vne mortelle main qui nous le presente; c'est vne mortelle main qui l'accepte.

FRENCH

Les choses qui nous viennent du ciel, ont seules droict et authorité de persuasion, seules merque de verité: laquelle aussi ne voyons nous pas de nos yeux, ny ne la receuons par nos moyens: cette saincte et grande image ne pourroit pas en vn si chetif domicile, si Dieu pour cet vsage ne le prepare, si Dieu ne le reforme et fortifie par sa grace et faueur particuliere et supernaturelle. Aumoins deuroit nostre condition fautiue, nous faire porter plus moderément et retenuement en nos changemens. Il nous deuroit souuenir, quoy que nous receussions en l'entendement, que nous receuons souuent des choses fauces, et que c'est par ces mesmes vtils qui se dementent et qui se trompent souuent.

2.12.204 Or n'est-il pas merueille, s'ils se dementent, estans si aysez à incliner et à tordre par bien legeres occurrences. Il est certain que nostre apprehension, nostre iugement et les facultez de nostre ame en general, souffrent selon les mouuemens et alterations du corps, lesquelles alterations sont continuelles. N'auons nous pas l'esprit plus esueillé, la memoire plus prompte, le discours plus vif, en santé qu'en maladie? La ioye et la gayeté ne nous font elles pas receuoir les subjects qui se presentent à nostre ame, d'vn tout autre visage, que le chagrin et la melancholie? Pensez vous que les vers de Catulle ou de Sappho, rient à vn vieillard auaricieux et rechigné, comme à vn ieune homme vigoureux et ardent?

Cleomenes fils d'Anaxandridas estant malade, ses amis luy reprochoyent qu'il auoit des humeurs et fantasies nouuelles, et non accoustumées: le croy bien, fit-il, aussi ne suis-ie pas celuy que ie suis estant sain: estant autre, aussi sont autres mes opinions et fantasies. En la chicane de nos palais, ce mot est en vsage, qui se dit des criminels qui rencontrent les iuges en quelque bonne trampe, douce et debonnaire, gaudeat de bona fortuna. Car il est certain que les iugemens se rencontrent par fois plus tendus à la condemnation, plus espineux et aspres, tantost plus faciles, aysez, et enclins à l'excuse.

ENGLISH

fore. Whatever we are preached, whatever we learn, we should always remember that it is man who gives and man who receives; it is a mortal hand that offers it to us; it is a mortal hand that accepts it.[160]

Only the things that come to us from heaven have the right and authority to persuade; only they bear the mark of truth. And that truth, too, we do not see with our own eyes, nor receive by our own means: that great and holy image could not dwell in so wretched a lodging unless God prepares it for that use, unless God reforms and strengthens it by his particular and supernatural grace and favor. At the least, our faulty condition ought to make us behave with more moderation and restraint in our changes. We ought to remember, whatever we take into our understanding, that we often take in false things, and that we do so by these same tools, which often contradict themselves and are often deceived.

Now it is no wonder if they contradict themselves, since they are so easily bent and twisted by very slight occurrences. It is certain that our apprehension, our judgment and the faculties of our soul in general are affected by the movements and alterations of the body, and those alterations are continual. Is our mind not more alert, our memory quicker, our reasoning livelier, in health than in sickness? Do joy and gaiety not make us receive whatever presents itself to our soul with quite another face than gloom and melancholy do? Do you think the verses of Catullus or Sappho smile on a miserly, crabbed old man as they do on a vigorous and ardent young one?

When Cleomenes, son of Anaxandridas, was ill, his friends reproached him for having new and unaccustomed moods and fancies. "I can well believe it," he said; "I am not the same man I am when I am well. Being someone else, my opinions and fancies are something else too." In the wrangling of our law courts a phrase is in use, said of criminals who find the judges in a good temper, mild and kindly: let him rejoice in his good fortune. For it is certain that judgments are at times more bent on condemnation, thornier and harsher, and 160 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

FRENCH

Tel qui rapporte de sa maison la douleur de la goutte, la ialousie, ou le larrecin de son valet, ayant toute l'ame teinte et abbreuuée de colere, il ne faut pas doubter que son iugement ne s'en altere vers cette part là. Ce venerable Senat d'Areopage, iugeoit de nuict, de peur que la veue des poursuiuans corrompist sa iustice. L'air mesme et la serenité du ciel, nous apporte quelque mutation, comme dit ce vers Grec en Cicero, Tales sunt hominum mentes, quali pater ipse / Iuppiter, auctifera lustrauit lampade terras. Ce ne sont pas seulement les fieures, les breuuages, et les grands accidens, qui renuersent nostre iugement: les moindres choses du monde le tourneuirent.

Et ne faut pas doubter, encores que nous ne le sentions pas, que si la fieure continue peut atterrer nostre ame, que la tierce n'y apporte quelque alteration selon la mesure et proportion. Si l'apoplexie assoupit et esteint tout à faict la veuë de nostre intelligence, il ne faut pas doubter que le morfondement ne l'esblouisse. Et par consequent, à peine se peut-il rencontrer vne seule heure en la vie, où nostre iugement se trouue en sa deuë assiette, nostre corps estant subiect à tant de continuelles mutations, et estoffé de tant de sortes de ressorts, que i'en croy les medecins, combien il est malaisé, qu'il n'y en ayt tousiours quelq'vn qui tire de trauers.

2.12.205 Au demeurant, cette maladie ne se descouure pas si aisément, si elle n'est du tout extreme et irremediable: d'autant que la raison va tousiours torte, boiteuse, et deshanchée: et auec le mensonge comme auec la verité. Par ainsin, il est malaisé de descouurir son mescompte, et desreglement. I'appelle tousiours raison, cette apparence de discours que chacun forge en soy: cette raison, de la condition de laquelle, il y en peut avoir cent contraires autour d'vn mesme subject: c'est vn instrument de plomb, et de cire, alongeable, ployable, et accommodable à tout biais et à toutes mesures: il ne reste que la suffisance de le sçauoir contourner.

Quelque bon dessein qu'ait vn iuge, s'il ne s'escoute de pres, à quoy peu de gens s'amusent; l'inclination à l'amitié, à la parenté, à la beauté, et à la vengeance, et non pas seulement choses si poisantes, mais cet instinct at other times more lenient, easygoing and inclined to excuse.

ENGLISH

When a man brings back from home the pain of gout, or jealousy, or a theft by his servant, and his whole soul is tinged and soaked with anger, there is no doubt that his judgment is altered in that direction. That venerable senate of the Areopagus judged by night, for fear that the sight of the petitioners might corrupt its justice. Even the air and the clearness of the sky bring about some change in us, as that Greek verse in Cicero says: Men's minds are such as the light with which Father Jupiter himself / Has lit the lands with his fruitful torch. It is not only fevers, drinks and great accidents that overturn our judgment: the slightest things in the world spin it around.[161]

And there is no doubt, though we do not feel it, that if a continuous fever can lay our soul low, a tertian fever brings it some alteration in due measure and proportion. If apoplexy puts the sight of our intelligence to sleep and puts it out altogether, there is no doubt that a chill dims it. And consequently there can hardly be found a single hour in life when our judgment is in its proper seat, our body being subject to so many continual changes, and furnished with so many kinds of springs, that—I take the physicians' word for it—it is hard for there not always to be one of them pulling askew.

Moreover, this sickness is not easily detected unless it is utterly extreme and past remedy, since reason always goes crooked, lame and out of joint, and with falsehood as readily as with truth. So it is hard to discover its miscalculations and disorders. I always call reason that semblance of reasoning that each man forges within himself: that reason of which, by its very nature, there can be a hundred contrary versions about one and the same subject. It is an instrument of lead and of wax, stretchable, bendable, adaptable to every bias and every measure; all that is needed is the skill to know how to shape it.

However good a judge's intentions, if he does not listen closely to himself—which few people bother to do—then the pull of friendship, of kinship, of beauty and of revenge can imperceptibly slip into 161 The Areopagus was the ancient council and court of Athens; the verse is Cicero's rendering of Homer, Odyssey XVIII.

FRENCH

fortuite, qui nous fait fauoriser vne chose plus qu'vne autre, et qui nous donne sans le congé de la raison, le choix, en deux pareils subjects, ou quelque vmbrage de pareille vanité, peuuent insinuer insensiblement en son iugement, la recommendation ou deffaueur d'vne cause, et donner pente à la balance.

2.12.206 Moy qui m'espie de plus prez, qui ay les yeux incessamment tendus sur moy, comme celuy qui n'a pas fort affaire ailleurs, Quis sub Arcto
Rex gelidæ metuatur oræ,
Quid Tyridatem terreat, vnicè
Securus, à peine oseroy-ie dire la vanité et la foiblesse que ie trouue chez moy. I'ay le pied si instable et si mal assis, ie le trouue si aysé à crouler, et si prest au branle, et ma veue si desreglée, qu'à iun ie me sens autre, qu'apres le repas: si ma santé me rid, et la clarté d'vn beau iour, me voyla honneste homme: si i'ay vn cor qui me presse l'orteil, me voylà renfroigné, mal plaisant et inaccessible.

Vn mesme pas de cheual me semble tantost rude, tantost aysé; et mesme chemin à cette heure plus court, vne autre fois plus long: et vne mesme forme ores plus ores moins aggreable. Maintenant ie suis à tout faire, maintenant à rien faire: ce qui m'est plaisir à cette heure, me sera quelquefois peine. Il se fait mille agitations indiscrettes et casueles chez moy. Ou l'humeur melancholique me tient, ou la cholerique; et de son authorité priuée, à cett'heure le chagrin predomine en moy, à cette heure l'allegresse.

Quand ie prens des liures, i'auray apperceu en tel passage des graces excellentes, et qui auront feru mon ame; qu'vn'autre fois i'y retombe, i'ay beau le tourner et virer, i'ay beau le plier et le manier, c'est vne masse incognue et informe pour moy. En mes escris mesmes, ie ne retrouue pas tousiours l'air de ma premiere imagination: ie ne sçay ce que i'ay voulu dire: et m'eschaude souuent à corriger, et y mettre vn nouueau sens, pour auoir perdu le premier qui valloit mieux.

Ie ne fay qu'aller et venir: mon iugement ne tire pas tousiours auant, il flotte, il vague, Velut minuta magno / Deprensa nauis in mari, vesaniente vento. Maintes-fois, comme il m'aduient de faire volontiers, ayant pris pour exercice et pour esbat, à maintenir vne contraire opinion his judgment a bias for or against a case, and tip the scale. And not only such weighty things: so can that random instinct which makes us favor one thing over another, and which gives us, without reason's leave, the choice between two like objects, or some shadow of a similar vanity.

ENGLISH

I who spy on myself more closely, who keep my eyes constantly fixed on myself, like a man who has not much business elsewhere—What king of the frozen shore
Beneath the Bear is feared,
What alarms Tiridates—wholly Unconcerned—I would hardly dare tell the vanity and weakness I find in myself. My footing is so unsteady and so poorly set, I find it so quick to give way and so ready to wobble, and my sight so unruly, that fasting I feel myself a different man from what I am after a meal. If my health smiles on me, and the brightness of a fine day, I am a perfectly decent fellow; if I have a corn pinching my toe, I am sullen, disagreeable and unapproachable.[162]

The same pace of my horse seems to me now rough, now easy; the same road now shorter, another time longer; the same shape now more, now less pleasing. One moment I am ready to do anything, the next to do nothing; what is a pleasure to me now will at some other time be a burden. A thousand heedless, haphazard stirrings go on inside me. Either the melancholy humor has hold of me, or the choleric; and on its own private authority, now gloom prevails in me, now cheerfulness.

When I take up books, I may have seen in some passage excellent graces that struck my soul; let me come back to it another time, and turn it and twist it as I may, bend it and handle it as I may, it is an unknown and shapeless lump to me. Even in my own writings I do not always recover the drift of my first conception: I do not know what I meant to say. And I often burn my fingers correcting it and putting in a new meaning, because I have lost the first one, which was better.

I do nothing but come and go. My judgment does not always move forward; it floats, it wanders, Like a tiny boat caught on the great sea / In a raging wind. Many times—as I often like to do—I have taken it up as an exercise and a pastime to defend an opin-à la mienne, mon esprit s'appliquant et tournant de ce costé-là, m'y attache si bien, que ie ne trouue plus la raison de mon premier aduis, et m'en despars. Ie m'entraine quasi où ie panche, comment que ce soit, et m'emporte de mon poix.

162 Horace, Odes I.26; Tiridates was a pretender to the Parthian throne.

FRENCH

2.12.207 Chacun à peu pres en diroit autant de soy, s'il se regardoit comme moy. Les prescheurs sçauent, que l'emotion qui leur vient en parlant, les anime vers la creance: et qu'en cholere nous nous addonnons plus à la deffence de nostre proposition, l'imprimons en nous, et l'embrassons auec plus de vehemence et d'approbation, que nous ne faisons estans en nostre sens froid et reposé. Vous recitez simplement vne cause à l'aduocat, il vous y respond chancellant et doubteux: vous sentez qu'il luy est indifferent de prendre à soustenir l'vn ou l'autre party: l'auez vous bien payé pour y mordre, et pour s'en formaliser, commence-il d'en estre interessé, y a-il eschauffé sa volonté?

sa raison et sa science s'y eschauffent quant et quant: voylà vne apparente et indubitable verité, qui se presente à son entendement: il y descouure vne toute nouuelle lumiere, et le croit à bon escient, et se le persuade ainsi. Voire ie ne sçay si l'ardeur qui naist du despit, et de l'obstination, à l'encontre de l'impression et violence du magistrat, et du danger: ou l'interest de la reputation, n'ont enuoyé tel homme soustenir iusques au feu, l'opinion pour laquelle entre ses amys, et en liberté, il n'eust pas voulu s'eschauder le bout du doigt.

2.12.208 Les secousses et esbranlemens que nostre ame reçoit par les passions corporelles, peuuent beaucoup en elle: mais encore plus les siennes propres: ausquelles elle est si fort prinse, qu'il est à l'aduanture soustenable, qu'elle n'a aucune autre alleure et mouuement, que du souffle de ses vents, et que sans leur agitation elle resteroit sans action, comme vn nauire en pleine mer, que les vents abandonnent de leur secours. Et qui maintiendroit cela, suiuant le party des Peripateticiens, ne nous feroit pas beaucoup de tort, puis qu'il est cognu, que la pluspart des plus belles actions de l'ame, procedent et ont besoin de cette impulsion des passions. La vaillance, disent-ils, ne se peut parfaire sans l'assistance de la cholere.

Semper Aiax fortis, fortissimus tamen in furore. Ny ne court on sus aux meschants, et aux ennemis, assez ion contrary to my own, and my mind, applying itself and turning that way, ties me to it so firmly that I can no longer find the reason for my first view, and I give it up. I am carried almost wherever I lean, whatever the case, and swept away by my own weight.[163]

ENGLISH

Almost anyone would say as much of himself if he looked at himself as I do. Preachers know that the emotion that comes over them as they speak quickens them toward belief, and that in anger we throw ourselves harder into the defense of our proposition, stamp it on ourselves and embrace it with more vehemence and approval than we do in our cool and calm senses. You lay out your case plainly to a lawyer: he answers you hesitant and doubtful; you feel that it makes no difference to him whether he takes up one side or the other. Have you paid him well to get his teeth into it and take it to heart? Does he begin to have a stake in it, has his will warmed to it?

his reason and his learning warm to it at the same time. Here is an evident and indubitable truth presenting itself to his understanding; he discovers an entirely new light in it, believes it in earnest, and so persuades himself. Indeed, I do not know whether the ardor born of spite and obstinacy against the pressure and violence of the magistrate and of danger, or concern for reputation, has not sent many a man to uphold, all the way to the stake, an opinion for which, among his friends and at liberty, he would not have been willing to burn the tip of his finger.

The jolts and shocks our soul receives from bodily passions can do much to it; but its own passions can do still more. It is so firmly in their grip that it is perhaps arguable that it has no other gait or motion than what comes from the breath of their winds, and that without their stirring it would lie inactive, like a ship on the open sea that the winds have deserted. And anyone who maintained this, following the party of the Peripatetics, would do us no great wrong, since it is known that most of the finest actions of the soul proceed from this impulse of the passions and need it. Valor, they say, cannot be perfected without the help of anger.

Ajax was always brave, but bravest in his fury. Nor do we fall upon the wicked and our enemies vigorvigoureusement, si on n'est courroucé. Et veulent que l'aduocat inspire le courroux aux iuges, pour en tirer iustice.

FRENCH

2.12.209 Les cupiditez emeurent Themistocles, emeurent Demosthenes: et ont poussé les philosophes aux trauaux, veillées, et peregrinations: nous meinent à l'honneur, à la doctrine, à la santé, fins vtiles. Et cette lascheté d'ame à souffrir l'ennuy et la fascherie, sert à nourrir en la conscience, la penitence et la repentance: et à sentir les fleaux de Dieu, pour nostre chastiment, et les fleaux de la correction politique. La compassion sert d'aiguillon à la clemence; et la prudence de nous conseruer et gouuerner, est esueillée par nostre crainte: et combien de belles actions par l'ambition? combien par la presomption? Aucune eminente et gaillarde vertu en fin, n'est sans quelque agitation desreglée.

Seroit-ce pas l'vne des raisons qui auroit meu les Epicuriens, à descharger Dieu de tout soin et sollicitude de nos affaires: d'autant que les effects mesmes de sa bonté ne se pouuoient exercer enuers nous, sans esbranler son repos, par le moyen des passions, qui sont comme des piqueures et sollicitations acheminans l'ame aux actions vertueuses? ou bien ont ils creu autrement, et les ont prinses, comme tempestes, qui desbauchent honteusement l'ame de sa tranquillité? Vt maris tranquillitas intelligitur, nulla, ne minima quidem, aura fluctus commouente: sic animi quietus et placatus status cernitur, quum perturbatio nulla est, qua moueri queat.

2.12.210 Quelles differences de sens et de raison, quelle contrarieté d'imaginations nous presente la diuersité de nos passions? Quelle asseurance pouuons nous doncq prendre de chose si instable et si mobile, subjecte par sa condition à la maistrise du trouble, n'allant iamais qu'vn pas forcé et emprunté? Si nostre iugement est en main à la maladie mesmes, et à la perturbation, si c'est de la folie et de la temerité, qu'il est tenu de receuoir l'impression des choses, quelle seurté pouuons nous attendre de luy?

2.12.211 N'y a il point de hardiesse à la philosophie, d'estimer des hommes qu'ils produisent leurs plus grands effects, et plus approchans de la diuinité, quand ils sont hors d'eux, et furieux et insensez? Nous nous amendons par la priuation de nostre raison, et son assoupissement. Les ously enough unless we are angry. And they would have the advocate stir up anger in the judges, to get justice out of them.[164]

ENGLISH

Desires moved Themistocles, moved Demosthenes, and have driven philosophers to labors, sleepless nights and travels; they lead us to honor, to learning, to health—useful ends. And that weakness of soul in bearing grief and vexation serves to nourish penance and repentance in the conscience, and to make us feel the scourges of God for our chastisement, and the scourges of public punishment. Compassion serves as a spur to clemency; and the prudence to preserve and govern ourselves is awakened by our fear. And how many fine actions come from ambition? How many from presumption? In short, no eminent and spirited virtue is without some unruly agitation.

Might this not be one of the reasons that moved the Epicureans to relieve God of all care and concern for our affairs? For even the effects of his goodness could not be exercised toward us without disturbing his repose, by means of the passions, which are like goads and promptings that lead the soul to virtuous actions. Or did they think otherwise, and take the passions for storms that shamefully lure the soul away from its tranquillity? As the calm of the sea is understood when not even the slightest breeze stirs the waves, so the quiet and peaceful state of the soul is discerned when there is no disturbance that can move it.

What differences of sense and reason, what contrary imaginings the diversity of our passions presents to us! What assurance, then, can we take from a thing so unstable and so changeable, by its very condition subject to the mastery of disturbance, never moving except at a forced and borrowed pace? If our judgment is in the hands of sickness itself and of disturbance, if it is from folly and rashness that it must receive the impression of things, what security can we expect from it?

Is it not rather bold of philosophy to hold that men produce their greatest effects, those closest to divinity, when they are beside themselves, frenzied and out of their minds? We improve through the loss of our reason and its slumber. The two natural deux voies naturelles, pour entrer au cabinet des Dieux, et y preueoir le cours des destinées, sont la fureur et le sommeil. Cecy est plaisant à considerer. Par la dislocation, que les passions apportent à nostre raison, nous deuenons vertueux: par son extirpation, que la fureur ou l'image de la mort apporte, nous deuenons prophetes et deuins. Iamais plus volontiers ie ne l'en creu.

163 Catullus.
164 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.

FRENCH

C'est vn pur enthousiasme, que la saincte verité a inspiré en l'esprit philosophique, qui luy arrache contre sa proposition, que l'estat tranquille de nostre ame, l'estat rassis, l'estat plus sain, que la philosophie luy puisse acquerir, n'est pas son meilleur estat. Nostre veillée est plus endormie que le dormir: nostre sagesse moins sage que la folie: noz songes vallent mieux, que noz discours: la pire place, que nous puissions prendre, c'est en nous.

Mais pense elle pas, que nous ayons l'aduisement de remarquer, que la voix, qui fait l'esprit, quand il est deprins de l'homme, si clair-voyant, si grand, si parfaict, et pendant qu'il est en l'homme, si terrestre, ignorant et tenebreux, c'est vne voix partant de l'esprit qui est en l'homme terrestre, ignorant et tenebreux: et à cette cause voix infiable et incroyable?

2.12.212 Ie n'ay point grande experience de ces agitations vehementes, estant d'vne complexion molle et poisante; desquelles la pluspart surprennent subitement nostre ame, sans luy donner loisir de se recognoistre. Mais cette passion, qu'on dit estre produite par l'oisiueté, au cœur des ieunes hommes, quoy qu'elle s'achemine auec loisir et d'vn progrés mesuré, elle represente bien euidemment, à ceux qui ont essayé de s'opposer à son effort, la force de cette conuersion et alteration, que nostre iugement souffre.

I'ay autrefois entrepris de me tenir bandé pour la soutenir et rabattre: car il s'en faut tant que ie sois de ceux, qui conuient les vices, que ie ne les suis pas seulement, s'ils ne m'entrainent: ie la sentois naistre, croistre, et s'augmenter en despit de ma resistance: et en fin tout voyant et viuant, me saisir et posseder, de façon que, comme d'vne yuresse, l'image des choses me commençoit à paroistre autre que de coustume:

ie voyois euidemment grossir et croistre les aduantages du subject que i'allois desirant, et aggrandir et enfler par ways of entering the cabinet of the gods and foreseeing there the course of destiny are frenzy and sleep. This is amusing to consider. By the dislocation the passions bring to our reason, we become virtuous; by its uprooting, which frenzy or the image of death brings, we become prophets and soothsayers. Never have I been more glad to take philosophy's word for it.

ENGLISH

It is a pure enthusiasm, breathed by holy truth into the philosophical mind, that wrings from it, against its own thesis, the admission that the tranquil state of our soul—the settled state, the healthiest state that philosophy can win for it—is not its best state. Our waking is more asleep than sleep; our wisdom less wise than folly; our dreams are worth more than our reasonings; the worst place we can take is in ourselves.[165]

But does philosophy not think we have the wit to notice that the voice which makes the spirit so clear-sighted, so great, so perfect when it is detached from man, and so earthly, ignorant and dark while it is in man, is a voice coming from the spirit that is in earthly, ignorant and dark man—and for that very reason a voice not to be trusted or believed?

I have no great experience of these violent agitations, being of a soft and sluggish constitution; most of them seize our soul suddenly, without giving it time to collect itself. But that passion which is said to be bred by idleness in the hearts of young men, although it advances at leisure and at a measured pace, shows very plainly, to those who have tried to resist its force, the power of the conversion and alteration our judgment undergoes.

I once undertook to keep myself braced to withstand it and beat it back; for I am so far from being one of those who invite vices that I do not even follow them unless they drag me along. I felt it being born, growing and increasing in spite of my resistance, and at last, fully seeing and alive as I was, seizing and possessing me, so that, as in drunkenness, the image of things began to look different to me than usual:

I clearly saw the attractions of the object I was pursuing swell and grow, enlarged and puffed up 165 "Enthusiasm" in its Greek sense: possession or inspiration by a god.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

le vent de mon imagination: les difficultez de mon entreprise, s'aiser et se planir; mon discours et ma conscience, se tirer arriere: mais ce feu estant euaporé, tout à vn instant, comme de la clarté d'un esclair, mon ame reprendre vne autre sorte de veuë, autre estat, et autre iugement: les difficultez de la retraite, me sembler grandes et inuincibles, et les mesmes choses de bien autre goust et visage, que la chaleur du desir ne me les auoit presentées.

by the wind of my imagination; the difficulties of my enterprise ease and level out; my reason and my conscience draw back. But once that fire had burned off, all in an instant, as with a flash of lightning, my soul took on another kind of sight, another state and another judgment: the difficulties of retreat seemed to me great and insurmountable, and the same things had quite another taste and face than the heat of desire had shown me.

Lequel plus veritablement, Pyrrho n'en sçait rien. Nous ne sommes iamais sans maladie. Les fieures ont leur chaud et leur froid: des effects d'une passion ardente, nous retombons aux effects d'vne passion frilleuse.

Which of the two views is the truer? Pyrrho knows nothing about it. We are never free of sickness. Fevers have their hot and their cold: from the effects of a burning passion we fall back into the effects of a shivering one.

2.12.213 Autant que ie m'estois ietté en auant, ie me relance d'autant en arriere. Qualis vbi alterno procurrens gurgite pontus,
Nunc ruit ad terras, scopulosque superiacit vndam,
Spumeus, extremámque sinu perfùndit arenam;
Nunc rapidus retro atque æstu reuoluta resorbens
Saxa, fugit, littúsque vado labente relinquit.

As far as I had thrown myself forward, I throw myself back just as far. As when the sea, surging on in alternating flood,
Now rushes upon the land and flings its foaming wave over the rocks,
And floods the farthest sand with its curve;
Now runs swiftly back, sucking in the stones rolled by the surge,
And flees, leaving the shore as the shallows slip away.[166]

HOLDING TO THE OLD BELIEFS

Knowing his own fickleness, he keeps his first opinions; Copernicus shows how doctrines rise and fall.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.214 Or de la cognoissance de cette mienne volubilité, i'ay par accident engendré en moy quelque constance d'opinions: et n'ay guere alteré les miennes premieres et naturelles. Car quelque apparence qu'il y ayt en la nouuelleté, ie ne change pas aisément, de peur que i'ay de perdre au change. Et puis que ie ne suis pas capable de choisir, ie prens le choix d'autruy, et me tiens en l'assiette où Dieu m'a mis. Autrement ie ne me sçauroy garder de rouler sans cesse. Ainsi me suis-ie, par la grace de Dieu, conserué entier, sans agitation et trouble de conscience, aux anciennes creances de nostre religion, au trauers de tant de sectes et de diuisions, que nostre siecle a produites.

Now from knowing this changeableness of mine I have, by accident, bred in myself a certain constancy of opinion, and I have scarcely altered my first and natural opinions. For however attractive novelty may look, I do not change easily, for fear of losing in the exchange. And since I am not capable of choosing, I take the choice of others, and stay in the position where God has put me. Otherwise I could not keep myself from rolling about endlessly. In this way, by the grace of God, I have kept myself whole, without agitation or trouble of conscience, in the ancient beliefs of our religion, through all the sects and divisions our age has produced.

Les escrits des anciens, ie dis les bons escrits, pleins et solides, me tentent, et remuent quasi où ils veulent: celuy que i'oy, me semble tousiours le plus roide: ie les trouue auoir raison chacun à son tour, quoy qu'ils se contrarient. Cette aisance que les bons esprits ont, de rendre ce qu'ils veulent vray-semblable; et qu'il n'est rien si estrange, à quoy ils n'entreprennent de donner assez de couleur, pour tromper vne simplicité pareille à la mienne, cela montre euidemment la foiblesse de leur preuue.

The writings of the ancients—I mean the good writings, full and solid—tempt me and move me 166 Virgil, Aeneid XI.

FRENCH

Le ciel et les estoilles ont branslé trois mille ans, tout le monde l'auoit ainsi creu, iusques à ce que Cleanthes le Samien, ou, selon Theophraste, Nicetas Syracusien s'aduisa de maintenir que c'estoit la terre qui se mouuoit, par le cercle oblique du Zodiaque tournant à l'entour de son aixieu. Et de nostre temps Copernicus a si bien fondé cette doctrine, qu'il s'en sert tres-reglément à toutes les consequences astrologiennes. Que prendrons nous de là, sinon qu'il ne nous doit chaloir lequel ce soit des deux? Et qui sçait qu'vne tierce opinion d'icy à mille ans, ne renuerse les deux precedentes?

Sic voluenda ætas commutat tempora rerum:
Quod fuit in pretio, fit nullo denique honore;
Porro aliud succedit, et è contemptibus exit,
Inque dies magis appetitur, florétque repertum
Laudibus, et miro est mortales inter honore.

2.12.215 Ainsi quand il se presente à nous quelque doctrine nouuelle, nous auons grande occasion de nous en deffier, et de considerer qu'auant qu'elle fust produite, sa contraire estoit en vogue: et comme elle a esté renuersée par cette-cy, il pourra naistre à l'aduenir vne tierce inuention, qui choquera de mesme la seconde. Auant que les principes qu'Aristote a introduicts, fussent en credit, d'autres principes contentoient la raison humaine, comme ceux-cy nous contentent à cette heure. Quelles lettres ont ceux-cy, quel priuilege particulier, que le cours de nostre inuention s'arreste à eux, et qu'à eux appartient pour tout le temps aduenir, la possession de nostre creance? ils ne sont non plus exempts du boute-hors, qu'estoient leurs deuanciers.

Quand on me presse d'vn nouuel argument, c'est à moy à estimer que ce, à quoy ie ne puis satisfaire, vn autre y almost wherever they please. The one I am listening to always seems to me the strongest; I find each of them right in turn, though they contradict one another. This ease that good minds have in making whatever they like seem probable, and the fact that there is nothing so strange that they will not undertake to give it enough color to deceive a simplicity like mine, show plainly the weakness of their proof.

ENGLISH

The heavens and the stars had been moving for three thousand years; everyone had believed so, until Cleanthes of Samos or, according to Theophrastus, Nicetas of Syracuse took it into his head to maintain that it was the earth that moved, turning about its axis along the oblique circle of the zodiac. And in our time Copernicus has grounded this doctrine so well that he uses it quite systematically for all astronomical deductions. What are we to conclude from this, except that we need not care which of the two it is? And who knows whether, a thousand years from now, a third opinion will not overturn the two before it?[167]

Thus rolling time changes the seasons of things:
What was prized falls at last into no esteem;
Then something else takes its place and rises out of contempt,
And is sought more every day, and once found it flourishes
With praise, and is held in wondrous honor among mortals.[168]

So when some new doctrine presents itself to us, we have good reason to distrust it, and to consider that before it was put forward its opposite was in vogue; and that, just as that one was overturned by this one, a third invention may arise in the future that will knock down the second in the same way. Before the principles Aristotle introduced were accepted, other principles satisfied human reason, as these satisfy us now. What letters patent do these hold, what special privilege, that the course of our invention should stop at them, and that possession of our belief should belong to them for all time to come? They are no more exempt from eviction than their predecessors were.

When someone presses me with a new argument, it is up to me to reckon that what I cannot answer, someone else will. For to believe every appear-satisfera. Car de croire toutes les apparences, desquelles nous ne pouuons nous deffaire, c'est vne grande simplesse. Il en aduiendroit par là, que tout le vulgaire, et nous sommes tous du vulgaire, auroit sa creance contournable, comme vne girouette: car son ame estant molle et sans resistance, seroit forcée de receuoir sans cesse, autres et autres impressions, la derniere effaçant tousiours la trace de la precedente. Celuy qui se trouue foible, il doit respondre suiuant la pratique, qu'il en parlera à son conseil, ou s'en rapporter aux plus sages, desquels il a receu son apprentissage.

FRENCH

Combien y a-t-il que la medecine est au monde? On dit qu'vn nouueau venu, qu'on nomme Paracelse, change et renuerse tout l'ordre des regles anciennes, et maintient que iusques à cette heure, elle n'a seruy qu'à faire mourir les hommes. Ie croy qu'il verifiera aisément cela. Mais de mettre ma vie à la preuue de sa nouuelle experience, ie trouue que ce ne seroit pas grand'sagesse. Il ne faut pas croire à chacun, dit le precepte, par ce que chacun peut dire toutes choses.

Vn homme de cette profession de nouuelletez, et de reformations physiques, me disoit, il n'y a pas long temps, que tous les anciens s'estoient notoirement mescontez en la nature et mouuemens des vents, ce qu'il me feroit tres-euidemment toucher à la main, si ie voulois l'entendre. Apres que i'euz eu vn peu de patience à ouyr ses arguments, qui auoient tout plein de verisimilitude: Comment donc, luy fis-ie, ceux qui nauigeoient soubs les loix de Theophraste, alloient-ils en Occident, quand ils tiroient en Leuant? alloient-ils à costé, ou à reculons? C'est la fortune, me respondit-il: tant y a qu'ils se mescontoient. Ie luy repliquay lors, que i'aymois mieux suiure les effects, que la raison.

Or ce sont choses, qui se choquent souuent: et m'a lon dict qu'en la geometrie, qui pense auoir gaigné le hault poinct de certitude parmy les sciences, il se trouue des demonstrations ineuitables, subuertissans la verité de l'experience. Comme Iacques Peletier me disoit chez moy, qu'il auoit trouué deux lignes s'acheminans l'vne vers l'autre pour se ioindre, qu'il verifioit toutefois ne pouuoir iamais iusques à l'infinité, arriuer à se toucher. Et les Pyrrhoniens ne se seruent de leurs argumens et de leur raison, que pour ruiner l'apparence de l'experience: et ance we cannot shake off is great simple-mindedness. It would follow that all the common people—and we are all common people—would have a belief that turned like a weathervane; for their soul, being soft and without resistance, would be forced to receive impression after impression endlessly, the last always wiping out the trace of the one before. A man who finds himself weak should answer, as they do in legal practice, that he will speak to his counsel about it, or else refer the matter to the wisest, from whom he received his training.

ENGLISH

How long has medicine been in the world? They say that a newcomer called Paracelsus is changing and overturning the whole order of the ancient rules, and maintains that until now medicine has served only to kill people. I believe he will easily prove that. But to stake my life on the test of his new experiments would not, I think, be great wisdom. We must not believe everyone, says the precept, because everyone can say anything.[169]

A man who made a profession of novelties and reforms in natural science told me not long ago that all the ancients had plainly been wrong about the nature and movements of the winds, and that he would make me touch it with my own hand, most evidently, if I would listen to him. After I had patiently heard his arguments, which were full of plausibility, I said to him: "How then did those who sailed under the laws of Theophrastus go west when they were heading east? Did they go sideways, or backward?" "It was chance," he answered; "in any case, they were mistaken." I replied then that I would rather follow the results than the reasoning.

Now these are things that often clash. I have been told that in geometry, which thinks it has reached the highest point of certainty among the sciences, there are irrefutable demonstrations that subvert the truth of experience. Jacques Peletier, for instance, told me in my own house that he had found two lines moving toward each other to meet, which he nevertheless proved could never, even to infinity, come to touch. And the Pyrrhon-

167 The Samian astronomer who moved the earth was in fact Aristarchus, whom Cleanthes attacked; Copernicus (1473–1543) published On the Revolutions in 1543.
168 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.
169 Paracelsus (1493–1541), Swiss physician and alchemist who attacked the medicine of Galen.

FRENCH

est merueille, iusques où la soupplesse de nostre raison, les a suiuis à ce dessein de combattre l'euidence des effects.

Car ils verifient que nous ne nous mouuons pas, que nous ne parlons pas, qu'il n'y a point de poisant ou de chault, auecques vne pareille force d'argumentations, que nous verifions les choses plus vray-semblables. Ptolomeus, qui a esté vn grand personnage, auoit estably les bornes de nostre monde: tous les philosophes anciens ont pensé en tenir la mesure, sauf quelques isles escartées, qui pouuoient eschapper à leur cognoissance: c'eust esté pyrrhoniser, il y a mille ans, que de mettre en doubte la science de la cosmographie, et les opinions qui en estoient receuës d'vn chacun: c'estoit heresie d'aduouer des Antipodes: voila de nostre siecle vne grandeur infinie de terre ferme, non pas vne isle, ou vne contrée particuliere, mais vne partie esgale à peu pres en grandeur, à celle que nous cognoissions, qui vient d'estre descouuerte.

Les geographes de ce temps, ne faillent pas d'asseurer, que mes-huy tout est trouué et que tout est veu; Nam quod adest præsto, placet, et pollere videtur. Sçauoir mon si Ptolomée s'y est trompé autrefois, sur les fondemens de sa raison, si ce ne seroit pas sottise de me fier maintenant à ce que ceux-cy en disent: et s'il n'est pas plus vraysemblable, que ce grand corps, que nous appellons le monde, est chose bien autre que nous ne iugeons.

2.12.216 Platon dit, qu'il change de visage à tout sens: que le ciel, les estoilles et le soleil, renuersent par fois le mouuement, que nous y voyons: changeant l'Orient à l'Occident. Les prestres Ægyptiens dirent à Herodote, que depuis leur premier Roy, dequoy il y auoit onze mille tant d'ans (et de tous leurs Roys ils luy feirent veoir les effigies en statues tirées apres le vif) le soleil auoit changé quatre fois de routte: que la mer et la terre se changent alternatiuement, l'vne en l'autre: que la naissance du monde est indeterminée. Aristote, Cicero de mesmes.

Et quelqu'vn d'entre nous, qu'il est de toute eternité, mortel et renaissant, à plusieurs vicissitudes: appellant à tesmoins Salomon et Isaïe: pour euiter ces oppositions, que Dieu a esté quelque fois createur sans creature: qu'il a esté oisif: qu'il s'est desdict de son oisiueté, mettant la ists use their arguments and their reason only to ruin the evidence of experience; and it is a marvel how far the suppleness of our reason has followed them in this design of fighting against the evidence of facts.[170]

ENGLISH

For they prove that we do not move, that we do not speak, that nothing is heavy or hot, with the same force of argument with which we prove the most probable things. Ptolemy, who was a great man, had set the bounds of our world; all the ancient philosophers thought they had its measure, except for a few remote islands that might escape their knowledge. A thousand years ago it would have been Pyrrhonizing to cast doubt on the science of cosmography and the opinions everyone had accepted from it; it was heresy to admit the Antipodes. And now, in our own century, an infinite expanse of mainland—not an island or a particular region, but a part roughly equal in size to the one we knew—has just been discovered.[171]

The geographers of our time do not fail to assure us that by now everything has been found and everything seen; For what is at hand pleases us, and seems the best. The question is whether, since Ptolemy was once mistaken on the foundations of his reasoning, it would not be foolish of me to trust now what these men say about it; and whether it is not more likely that this great body we call the world is something quite other than we judge.

Plato says that it changes its face in every respect; that the heavens, the stars and the sun sometimes reverse the motion we see in them, changing east into west. The Egyptian priests told Herodotus that since their first king, eleven thousand and some years earlier (and they showed him the likenesses of all their kings in statues taken from life), the sun had changed its course four times; that sea and land turn alternately into each other; that the birth of the world cannot be determined. Aristotle and Cicero say the same.

And one of our own writers says that the world has existed from all eternity, dying and being reborn through many vicissitudes, calling Solomon and Isaiah as witnesses, so as to avoid these objections: that God was once a creator without a 170 Peletier is describing an asymptote.

171 Claudius Ptolemy (2nd century AD), astronomer and geographer of Alexandria.

FRENCH

main à cet ouurage: et qu'il est par consequent subiect au changement. En la plus fameuse des Grecques escholes, le monde est tenu vn Dieu, faict par vn autre Dieu plus grand: et est composé d'vn corps et d'vne ame, qui loge en son centre, s'espandant par nombres de musique, à sa circonference: diuin, tres-heureux, tres-grand, tres-sage, eternel.

En luy sont d'autres Dieux, la mer, la terre, les astres, qui s'entretiennent d'vne harmonieuse et perpetuelle agitation et danse diuine: tantost se rencontrans, tantost s'esloignans: se cachans, montrans, changeans de rang, ores auant, et ores derriere. Heraclitus establissoit le monde estre composé par feu, et par l'ordre des destinées, se deuoir enflammer et resoudre en feu quelque iour, et quelque iour encore renaistre. Et des hommes dit Apulée: sigillatim mortales, cunctim perpetui. Alexandre escriuit à sa mere, la narration d'vn prestre Ægyptien, tirée de leurs monuments, tesmoignant l'ancienneté de cette nation infinie, et comprenant la naissance et progrez des autres païs au vray. Cicero et Diodorus disent de leur temps, que les Chaldeens tenoient registre de quatre cens mille tant d'ans.

Aristote, Pline, et autres, que Zoroastre viuoit six mille ans auant l'aage de Platon. Platon dit, que ceux de la ville de Saïs, ont des memoires par escrit, de huict mille ans: et que la ville d'Athenes fut bastie mille ans auant ladicte ville de Saïs. Epicurus, qu'en mesme temps que les choses sont icy comme nous les voyons, elles sont toutes pareilles, et en mesme façon, en plusieurs autres mondes. Ce qu'il eust dict plus asseurément, s'il eust veu les similitudes, et conuenances de ce nouueau monde des Indes Occidentales, auec le nostre, present et passé, en si estranges exemples.

2.12.217 En verité considerant ce qui est venu à nostre science du cours de cette police terrestre, ie me suis souuent esmerueillé de voir en vne tres-grande distance de lieux et de temps, les rencontres d'un si grand nombre d'opinions populaires, sauuages, et des mœurs et creances sauuages, et qui par aucun biais ne semblent tenir à nostre naturel discours. C'est vn grand ouurier de creature; that he was idle; that he went back on his idleness by setting his hand to this work; and that he is consequently subject to change. In the most famous of the Greek schools, the world is held to be a god, made by another, greater god. It is composed of a body and a soul, which dwells at its center and spreads out in musical numbers to its circumference: divine, most happy, most great, most wise, eternal.[172]

ENGLISH

Within it are other gods—the sea, the earth, the stars—which keep one another company in a harmonious and perpetual motion, a divine dance: now meeting, now moving apart; hiding and showing themselves, changing rank, now in front, now behind. Heraclitus held that the world was made of fire and that, by the order of the fates, it was bound one day to burst into flame and dissolve into fire, and one day to be born again. And of men Apuleius says: mortal one by one, everlasting all together. Alexander wrote to his mother the account of an Egyptian priest, drawn from their records, attesting the boundless antiquity of that nation and giving the true birth and progress of other countries. Cicero and Diodorus say that in their time the Chaldeans kept records going back four hundred thousand and some years.

Aristotle, Pliny and others say that Zoroaster lived six thousand years before Plato's time. Plato says that the people of the city of Saïs have written records going back eight thousand years, and that the city of Athens was built a thousand years before the said city of Saïs. Epicurus says that at the same time as things are here as we see them, they are exactly alike, and in the same fashion, in many other worlds. He would have said so with more confidence if he had seen the similarities and correspondences between this new world of the West Indies and ours, present and past, in such strange examples.[173]

Truly, considering what has come to our knowledge of the course of human affairs on this earth, I have often marveled to see, across very great distances of place and time, the agreement of so great a number of wild popular opinions, and of wild customs and beliefs, which by no route seem to derive from our natural reasoning. The human 172 The school is Plato's Academy; the description follows Plato's Timaeus.

173 Saïs was an ancient city in the Nile delta; Plato reports this in the Timaeus.

FRENCH

miracles que l'esprit humain. Mais cette relation a ie ne sçay quoy encore de plus heteroclite: elle se trouue aussi en noms, et en mille autres choses.

Car on y trouua des nations, n'ayans, que nous sçachions, iamais ouy nouuelles de nous, où la circoncision estoit en credit: où il y auoit des estats et grandes polices maintenuës par des femmes, sans hommes: où nos ieusnes et nostre caresme estoit representé, y adioustant l'abstinence des femmes: où nos croix estoient en diuerses façons en credit, icy on en honoroit les sepultures, on les appliquoit là, et nommément celle de S.

André, à se deffendre des visions nocturnes, et à les mettre sur les couches des enfans contre les enchantements: ailleurs ils en rencontrerent vne de bois de grande hauteur, adorée pour Dieu de la pluye, et celle là bien fort auant dans la terre ferme: on y trouua vne bien expresse image de nos penitentiers: l'vsage des mitres, le cœlibat des prestres, l'art de deuiner par les entrailles des animaux sacrifiez: l'abstinence de toute sorte de chair et poisson, à leur viure, la façon aux prestres d'vser en officiant de langue particuliere, et non vulgaire: et cette fantasie, que le premier Dieu fut chassé par vn second son frere puisné; qu'ils furent creés auec toutes commoditez, lesquelles on leur a depuis retranchées pour leur peché; changé leur territoire, et empiré leur condition naturelle: qu'autresfois ils ont esté submergez par l'inondation des eaux celestes, qu'il ne s'en sauua que peu de familles, qui se ietterent dans les haults creux des montagnes, lesquels creux ils boucherent, si que l'eau n'y entra point, ayans enfermé là dedans, plusieurs sortes d'animaux; que quand ils sentirent la pluye cesser, ils mirent hors des chiens, lesquels estans reuenus nets et mouillez, ils iugerent l'eau n'estre encore guere abaissée; depuis en ayans faict sortir d'autres, et les voyans reuenir bourbeux, ils sortirent repeupler le monde, qu'ils trouuerent plein seulement de serpens.

On rencontra en quelque endroit, la persuasion du iour du iugement, si qu'ils s'offençoient merueilleusement contre les Espagnols qui espandoient les os des trespassez, en fouillant les richesses des sepultures, disans que ces os escartez ne se pourroient facilement reioindre: la trafique par eschange, et non autre, foires et marchez pour cet effect: des nains et personnes mind is a great worker of miracles. But this correspondence has something still more extraordinary about it: it is found in names as well, and in a thousand other things.

ENGLISH

For nations were found there that had never, as far as we know, heard any news of us, where circumcision was held in honor; where there were states and great governments maintained by women, without men; where our fasts and our Lent were reproduced, with abstinence from women added; where our crosses were held in honor in various ways: here graves were honored with them, there they were used—and in particular that of Saint Andrew—to protect people from visions in the night, and were placed on children's beds against enchantments; elsewhere they came upon a very tall wooden one, worshipped as the god of rain, and that one far inland. There they found a very clear likeness of our confessors; the use of miters, the celibacy of priests, the art of divining by the entrails of sacrificed animals; abstinence from every kind of meat and fish in their diet; the practice of priests using a special language in their services, not the common tongue; and this notion, that the first god was driven out by a second, his younger brother; that they were created with every comfort, which has since been cut off from them for their sin; that their territory was changed and their natural condition made worse; that they were once submerged by a flood of waters from the sky, and only a few families were saved, who took refuge in the high caves of the mountains and stopped up those caves so that the water did not get in, having shut up several kinds of animals inside with them; that when they felt the rain stop, they let out some dogs, and when these came back clean and wet, they judged that the water had not yet gone down much; later, having let out others and seeing them come back muddy, they went out to repeople the world, which they found full of nothing but serpents.

In one place they came upon belief in the day of judgment, so that the people were wonderfully offended at the Spaniards who scattered the bones of the dead while rifling the riches of the graves, saying that these scattered bones could not easily be put back together; trade by barter and no other kind, with fairs and markets for the purpose; difformes, pour l'ornement des tables des Princes: l'vsage de la fauconnerie selon la nature de leurs oyseaux; subsides tyranniques: delicatesses de iardinages; dances, saults bateleresques; musique d'instrumens; armoiries; ieux de paulme; ieu de dez et de sort, auquel ils s'eschauffent souuent, iusques à s'y iouer eux mesmes, et leur liberté: medecine non autre que de charmes: la forme d'escrire par figures: creance d'vn seul premier homme pere de tous les peuples;

FRENCH

adoration d'vn Dieu qui vesquit autrefois homme en parfaicte virginité, ieusne, et pœnitence, preschant la loy de nature, et des ceremonies de la religion, et qui disparut du monde, sans mort naturelle: l'opinion des geants: l'vsage de s'enyurer de leurs breuuages, et de boire d'autant: ornemens religieux peints d'ossemens et testes de morts, surplys, eau-beniste, aspergez; femmes et seruiteurs, qui se presentent à l'enuy à se brusler et enterrer, auec le mary ou maistre trespassé: loy que les aisnez succedent à tout le bien, et n'est reserué aucune part au puisné, que d'obeissance: coustume à la promotion de certain office de grande authorité, que celuy qui est promeu prend vn nouueau nom, et quitte le sien: de verser de la chaulx sur le genou de l'enfant freschement nay, en luy disant, Tu és venu de pouldre, et retourneras en pouldre: l'art des augures.

Ces vains ombrages de nostre religion, qui se voient en aucuns de ces exemples, en tesmoignent la dignité et la diuinité. Non seulement elle s'est aucunement insinuée en toutes les nations infideles de deça, par quelque imitation, mais à ces barbares aussi comme par vne commune et supernaturelle inspiration: car on y trouua aussi la creance du purgatoire, mais d'vne forme nouuelle; ce que nous donnons au feu, ils le donnent au froid, et imaginent les ames, et purgées, et punies, par la rigueur d'vne extreme froidure.

Et m'aduertit cet exemple, d'vne autre plaisante diuersité: car comme il s'y trouua des peuples qui aymoyent à deffubler le bout de leur membre, et en retranchoyent la peau à la Mahumetane et à la Iuifue, il s'en trouua d'autres, qui faisoient si grande conscience de le deffubler, qu'à tout des petits cordons, ils portoient leur peau bien soigneusement estiree et attachee au dessus, de peur que ce bout ne vist l'air.

Et de cette diuersité aussi, que comme nous honorons les Roys et les festes, en nous parant des plus honnestes dwarfs and deformed persons kept to adorn princes' tables; the practice of falconry suited to the nature of their birds; tyrannical taxes; refinements of gardening; dances and acrobats' leaps; instrumental music; coats of arms; ball games; games of dice and chance, in which they often get so heated that they stake themselves and their liberty; medicine consisting of nothing but charms; writing by means of pictures; belief in a single first man, father of all peoples;

ENGLISH

the worship of a god who once lived as a man in perfect virginity, fasting and penance, preaching the law of nature and the ceremonies of religion, and who vanished from the world without a natural death; the belief in giants; the habit of getting drunk on their drinks and drinking deep; religious ornaments painted with bones and skulls, surplices, holy water, sprinklers; wives and servants vying with one another to offer themselves to be burned and buried with their dead husband or master; a law that the eldest inherits all the property, and nothing is left to the younger but obedience; a custom that on promotion to a certain office of great authority the man promoted takes a new name and gives up his own; the custom of pouring lime on the knee of a newborn child, saying to him, "You came from dust, and to dust you shall return"; the art of augury.

These empty shadows of our religion that can be seen in some of these examples bear witness to its dignity and divinity. Not only has it in some way worked its way, by a kind of imitation, into all the infidel nations on this side of the world, but into these barbarous peoples too, as if by a common and supernatural inspiration. For they also found there a belief in purgatory, but in a new form: what we assign to fire, they assign to cold, and they imagine souls both purged and punished by the rigor of extreme cold.

And this example reminds me of another amusing diversity. Just as some peoples were found there who liked to uncover the end of their member, and cut off the skin in the Muslim and Jewish fashion, others were found who had such scruples about uncovering it that they wore the skin very carefully stretched over it and tied on top with little cords, for fear that the end should see the air.

And this diversity too: just as we honor kings and festivals by dressing in the finest clothes we have, vestements que nous ayons: en aucunes regions, pour montrer toute disparité et submission à leur Roy, les subiects se presentoyent à luy, en leurs plus viles habillements, et entrants au palais prennent quelque vieille robe deschiree sur la leur bonne, à ce que tout le lustre, et l'ornement soit au maistre. Mais suyuons.	in some regions, to show their complete inequality and submission to their king, subjects presented themselves to him in their meanest clothes, and on entering the palace they put some old torn robe over their good one, so that all the luster and ornament should belong to the master. But let us go on.

FRENCH	ENGLISH

CLIMATE, DESIRE AND THE SOVEREIGN GOOD

Our minds vary with the soil, and we cannot even agree on what to wish for.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.218 Si Nature enserre dans les termes de son progrez ordinaire, comme toutes autres choses, aussi les creances, les iugemens, et opinions des hommes: si elles ont leur reuolution, leur saison, leur naissance, leur mort, comme les choux: si le ciel les agite, et les roule à sa poste, quelle magistrale authorité et permanante, leur allons nous attribuant?	If Nature encloses men's beliefs, judgments and opinions within the bounds of her ordinary progress, as she does all other things; if they have their cycle, their season, their birth and their death, like cabbages; if the heavens stir them and roll them about as they please, what masterly and permanent authority are we going to attribute to them?
Si par experience nous touchons à la main que la forme de nostre estre despend de l'air, du climat, et du terroir où nous naissons: non seulement le tainct, la taille, la complexion et les contenances, mais encore les facultez de l'ame: Et plaga cæli non solùm ad robur corporum, sed etiam animorum facit, dit Vegece: et que la Deesse fundatrice de la ville d'Athenes, choisit à la situer, vne temperature de pays, qui fist les hommes prudents, comme les prestres d'Ægypte apprindrent à Solon: Athenis tenue cælum: ex quo etiam acutiores putantur Attici: crassum Thebis: itaque pingues Thebani, et valentes: en maniere qu'ainsi que les fruicts naissent diuers, et les animaux, les hommes naissent aussi plus et moins belliqueux, iustes, temperans et dociles:	Experience lets us touch with our own hands that the form of our being depends on the air, the climate and the soil where we are born. This holds not only for our complexion, our build, our constitution and our bearing, but also for the faculties of the soul: And the climate contributes not only to the strength of the body but also to that of the mind, says Vegetius. The goddess who founded the city of Athens chose for its site a climate that would make men wise, as the priests of Egypt taught Solon: At Athens the air is thin, which is also why the Athenians are thought sharper; at Thebes it is thick, and so the Thebans are dull and sturdy. So, just as fruits and animals are born different, men too are born more or less warlike, just, temperate and docile:[174] icy subiects au vin, ailleurs au larecin ou à la paillardise: icy enclins à superstition, ailleurs à la mescreance: icy à la liberté, icy à la seruitude: capables d'vne science ou d'vn art: grossiers ou ingenieux: obeyssans ou rebelles: bons ou mauuais, selon que porte l'inclination du lieu où ils sont assis, et prennent nouuelle complexion, si on les change de place, comme les arbres: qui fut la raison, pour laquelle Cyrus ne voulut accorder aux Perses d'abandonner leur pays aspre et bossu, pour se transporter en vn autre doux et plain: disant que les terres grasses et molles font les hommes mols, et les fertiles les esprits infertiles.	here given to wine, elsewhere to theft or lechery; here inclined to superstition, elsewhere to unbelief; here to liberty, here to servitude; capable of one science or one art; dull or clever; obedient or rebellious; good or bad, according to the inclination of the place where they are set; and they take on a new constitution if they are moved, like trees. That was why Cyrus would not allow the Persians to leave their harsh and hilly country for another that was gentle and flat. Rich, soft lands, he said, make soft men, and fertile lands make infertile minds.

174 Vegetius was a Roman writer on military matters (late 4th century AD); the second quotation is from Cicero, On Fate.

FRENCH

Si nous voyons tantost fleurir vn art, vne creance, tantost vne autre, par quelque influance celeste: tel siecle produire telles natures, et incliner l'humain genre à tel ou tel ply: les esprits des hommes tantost gaillars, tantost maigres, comme nos champs: que deuiennent toutes ces belles prerogatiues dequoy nous allons flattants? Puis qu'vn homme sage se peut mesconter, et cent hommes, et plusieurs nations: voire et l'humaine nature selon nous, se mesconte plusieurs siecles, en cecy ou en cela: quelle seureté auons nous que par fois elle cesse de se mesconter, et qu'en ce siecle elle ne soit en mescompte?

2.12.219 Il me semble entre autres tesmoignages de nostre imbecillité, que celuy-cy ne merite pas d'estre oublié, que par desir mesme, l'homme ne sçache trouuer ce qu'il luy faut: que non par iouyssance, mais par imagination et par souhait, nous ne puissions estre d'accord de ce dequoy nous auons besoing pour nous contenter. Laissons à nostre pensée tailler et coudre à son plaisir: elle ne pourra pas seulement desirer ce qui luy est propre, et le satisfaire. Quid enim ratione timemus
Aut cupimus? quid tam dextro pede concipis, vt te Conatus non pœniteat, votique peracti? C'est pourquoy Socrates ne requeroit les Dieux, sinon de luy donner ce qu'ils sçauoient luy estre salutaire.

Et la priere des Lacedemoniens publique et priuée portoit, simplement les choses bonnes et belles leur estre octroyées: remettant à la discretion de la puissance supreme le tirage et choix d'icelles. Coniugium petimus, partúmque vxoris; at illi / Notum qui pueri, qualisque futura sit vxor. Et le Chrestien supplie Dieu que sa volonté soit faicte: pour ne tomber en l'inconuenient que les poëtes feignent du Roy Midas.

Il requit les Dieux que tout ce qu'il toucheroit se conuertist en or: sa priere fut exaucée, son vin fut or, son pain or, et la plume de sa couche, et d'or sa chemise et son vestement: de façon qu'il se trouua accablé soubs la iouyssance de son desir, et estrené d'vne insupportable commodité: il luy falut desprier ses prieres: Attonitus nouitate mali, diuésque misérque, / Effugere optat opes, et, quæ modò vouerat, odit. Disons de moy-mesme. Ie demandois à la Fortune autant qu'autre chose, l'ordre Sainct Michel estant ieune: car c'estoit lors l'extreme marque d'honneur de la noblesse Françoise, et tres-rare. Elle me l'a plaisamment accordé.

ENGLISH

We see one art or one belief flourish now, another later, through some influence of the heavens. We see one age produce one kind of nature and bend the human race this way or that, and men's minds grow now lush, now lean, like our fields. If so, what becomes of all those fine prerogatives we keep flattering ourselves with? One wise man can be mistaken, and so can a hundred men and many nations. Indeed, by our own account, human nature itself has been mistaken for many centuries about this or that. So what assurance have we that at some point it stops being mistaken, and that it is not in error in this century?

Among the other proofs of our feebleness, it seems to me that this one deserves not to be forgotten: that even in desire man cannot find what he needs; that not in enjoyment, but in imagination and in wishing, we cannot agree on what we need to content us. Let our thought cut and sew as it pleases: it will not even be able to desire what is right for it, and satisfy itself. For what do we fear
Or desire with reason? What do you plan so auspiciously that you Do not regret the attempt and the wish fulfilled? That is why Socrates asked the gods only to give him what they knew to be good for him.[175]

And the prayer of the Spartans, public and private, simply asked that good and beautiful things be granted them, leaving the selection and choice of them to the discretion of the supreme power. We ask for a wife and for children by her; but he alone knows / What the children will be, and what kind of wife. And the Christian prays God that his will be done, so as not to fall into the trouble that the poets invent about King Midas.

He asked the gods that everything he touched should turn to gold. His prayer was granted: his wine was gold, his bread gold, and the feathers of his bed, and gold his shirt and his clothes. He found himself crushed under the fulfillment of his desire, presented with an unbearable convenience, and he had to unpray his prayers: Stunned by the strangeness of the evil, both rich and wretched, / He longs to escape his wealth, and hates what he had just prayed for. Let me speak of myself. When I was young I asked Fortune for the Order of Saint Michael as much as for anything else, for it was then the highest mark of honor of the French nobility, and very rare. She granted it to me, in an amusing way.[176]

175 Juvenal, Satires X; the Latin quotations in the next chunks up to "Man is dearer to them" come from the same satire.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Au lieu de me monter et hausser de ma place, pour y aueindre, elle m'a bien plus gratieusement traitté, elle l'a rauallé et rabaissé iusques à mes espaules et au dessoubs. Cleobis et Biton, Trophonius et Agamedes, ayans requis ceux là leur Deesse, ceux-cy leur Dieu, d'vne recompense digne de leur pieté, eurent la mort pour present: tant les opinions celestes sur ce qu'il nous faut, sont diuerses aux nostres.

Instead of raising me and lifting me from my place to reach it, she treated me far more graciously: she lowered it and brought it down to my shoulders, and below. Cleobis and Biton asked their goddess, and Trophonius and Agamedes their god, for a reward worthy of their piety, and they received death as their gift: so different are the opinions of heaven about what we need from our own.[177]

Dieu pourroit nous ottroyer les richesses, les honneurs, la vie et la santé mesme, quelquefois à nostre dommage: car tout ce qui nous est plaisant, ne nous est pas tousiours salutaire: si au lieu de la guerison, il nous envoye la mort, ou l'empirement de nos maux: Virga tua et baculus tuus ipsa me consolata sunt: il le fait par les raisons de sa providence, qui regarde bien plus certainement ce qui nous est deu, que nous ne pouuons faire: et la deuons prendre en bonne part, comme d'vne main tres-sage et tres-amie.

God could grant us riches, honors, life and even health, sometimes to our harm, for not everything that pleases us is always good for us. If instead of healing he sends us death, or a worsening of our ills—Your rod and your staff, they have comforted me —he does it for reasons of his providence, which sees far more surely than we can what is due to us. We must take it in good part, as coming from a most wise and most loving hand.[178]

Si consilium vis
Permittes ipsis expendere numinibus, quid
Conueniat nobis, rebúsque sit vtile nostris:
Charior est illis homo quàm sibi. Car de les requerir des honneurs, des charges, c'est les requerir, qu'ils vous iettent à vne bataille, ou au ieu des dez, ou telle autre chose, de laquelle l'issue vous est incognue, et le fruict doubteux.

If you want advice,
You will leave it to the gods themselves to weigh what Suits us and what is useful for our affairs:
Man is dearer to them than he is to himself. For to ask them for honors and offices is to ask them to throw you into a battle, or a game of dice, or some such thing whose outcome is unknown to you and whose fruit is doubtful.

2.12.220 Il n'est point de combat si violent entre les philosophes, et si aspre, que celuy qui se dresse sur la question du souuerain bien de l'homme: duquel par le calcul de Varro, nasquirent deux cens quatre vingtz sectes. Qui autem de summo bono dissentit, de tota philosophiæ ratione disputat.
Tres mihi conuiuæ propè dissentire videntur,
Poscentes vario multum diuersa palato:
Quid dem? quid non dem? Renuis tu quod iubet alter;
Quod petis, id sanè est inuisum acidúmque duobus. Nature deuroit ainsi respondre à leurs contestations, et à leurs debats.

There is no combat among philosophers so violent and so bitter as the one that arises over the question of man's sovereign good, from which, by Varro's reckoning, two hundred and eighty sects were born. But whoever disagrees about the supreme good disagrees about the whole system of philosophy.
Three guests seem to me almost at odds,
Calling for very different things with their different palates:
What should I give? What not give? You refuse what the other orders;
What you ask for is surely odious and sour to the other two. This is how Nature ought to answer their disputes and their debates.[179]

176 Ovid, Metamorphoses XI.
177 Cleobis and Biton, sons of a priestess of Hera, and Trophonius and Agamedes, builders of Apollo's temple at Delphi, each died peacefully after asking for the best gift the gods could give.
178 Psalm 23 (22 in the Latin Bible).

FRENCH

Les uns disent nostre bien estre, loger en la vertu: d'autres, en la volupté: d'autres, au consentir à Nature: qui en la science: qui à n'auoir point de douleur: qui à ne se laisser emporter aux apparences: et à cette fantasie semble retirer cet' autre, de l'ancien Pythagoras: Nil admirari, propè res est vna, Numaci, / Soláque, quæ possit facere et seruare beatum, qui est la fin de la secte Pyrrhonienne. Aristote attribue à magnanimité, rien n'admirer. Et disoit Archésilas, les soustenemens et l'estat droit et inflexible du iugement, estre les biens: mais les consentemens et applications estre les vices et les maux. Il est vray qu'en ce qu'il l'establissoit par axiome certain, il se départoit du Pyrrhonisme.

Les Pyrrhoniens, quand ils disent que le souuerain bien c'est l'Ataraxie, qui est l'immobilité du iugement, ils ne l'entendent pas dire d'vne façon affirmatiue, mais le mesme bransle de leur ame, qui leur fait fuir les precipices, et se mettre à couuert du serein, celuy là mesme leur presente cette fantasie, et leur en fait refuser vne autre.

2.12.221 Combien ie desire, que pendant que ie vis, ou quelque autre, ou Iustus Lipsius, le plus sçauant homme qui nous reste, d'vn esprit tres-poly et iudicieux, vrayement germain à mon Turnebus, eust et la volonté, et la santé, et assez de repos, pour ramasser en vn registre, selon leurs diuisions et leurs classes, sincerement et curieusement, autant que nous y pouuons voir, les opinions de l'ancienne philosophie sur le subiect de nostre estre et de nos mœurs, leurs controuerses, le credit et suitte des pars, l'application de la vie des autheurs et sectateurs, à leurs preceptes, és accidens memorables et exemplaires! Le bel ouurage et vtile que ce seroit!

ENGLISH

Some say our good lies in virtue; others, in pleasure; others, in consenting to Nature; one says in knowledge, one in having no pain, one in not letting oneself be carried away by appearances. And this notion seems to resemble that other one of ancient Pythagoras: To marvel at nothing is almost the one and only thing, Numicius, / That can make a man happy and keep him so, which is the goal of the Pyrrhonist sect. Aristotle ascribes marveling at nothing to magnanimity. And Arcesilaus said that suspensions of judgment, and its upright and unbending state, were goods, while assents and adherences were vices and evils. True, by establishing this as a certain axiom he departed from Pyrrhonism.[180]

When the Pyrrhonists say that the sovereign good is Ataraxia, which is the immobility of judgment, they do not mean to say it in an affirmative way. The same motion of their soul that makes them flee precipices and take shelter from the evening damp presents this notion to them and makes them reject another.

How I wish that, while I am alive, someone—or Justus Lipsius, the most learned man we have left, with a most polished and judicious mind, a true brother to my Turnebus—had the will, the health and enough leisure to gather into a register, according to their divisions and classes, sincerely and carefully, as far as we can see into it, the opinions of ancient philosophy on the subject of our being and our conduct! It would set out their controversies, the standing and following of each party, and how the lives of the authors and their followers matched their precepts in memorable and exemplary circumstances. What a fine and useful work that would be![181]

LAWS AND NATURAL LAW

Laws change from country to country; no natural law is accepted everywhere.

FRENCH

2.12.222 Au demeurant, si c'est de nous que nous tirons le reglement de nos mœurs, à quelle confusion nous reiettons nous? Car ce que nostre raison nous y conseille

ENGLISH

For the rest, if it is from ourselves that we draw the rule of our conduct, into what confusion do we cast ourselves? For the most probable advice our 179 Varro (116–27 BC) was the most learned Roman scholar of his day. The quotations are from Cicero, On Ends, and Horace, Epistles II.2.

180 Horace, Epistles I.6.
181 Justus Lipsius (1547–1606), Flemish humanist who corresponded with Montaigne.

FRENCH

de plus vray-semblable, c'est generalement à chacun d'obeyr aux loix de son pays, comme est l'aduis de Socrates inspiré, dit-il, d'vn conseil diuin. Et par là que veut elle dire, sinon que nostre deuoir n'a autre regle que fortuite? La verité doit auoir vn visage pareil et vniuersel. La droiture et la iustice, si l'homme en cognoissoit, qui eust corps et veritable essence, il ne l'attacheroit pas à la condition des coustumes de cette contrée, ou de celle là: ce ne seroit pas de la fantasie des Perses ou des Indes, que la vertu prendroit sa forme.

Il n'est rien subiect à plus continuelle agitation que les loix. Depuis que ie suis nay, i'ay veu trois et quatre fois, rechanger celles des Anglois noz voisins, non seulement en subiect politique, qui est celuy qu'on veut dispenser de constance, mais au plus important subiect qui puisse estre, à sçauoir de la religion. Dequoy i'ay honte et despit, d'autant plus que c'est vne nation, à laquelle ceux de mon quartier ont eu autrefois vne si priuée accointance, qu'il reste encore en ma maison aucunes traces de nostre ancien cousinage.

Et chez nous icy, i'ay veu telle chose qui nous estoit capitale, deuenir legitime: et nous qui en tenons d'autres, sommes à mesmes, selon l'incertitude de la fortune guerriere, d'estre vn iour criminels de læse majesté humaine et diuine, nostre iustice tombant à la mercy de l'iniustice: et en l'espace de peu d'années de possession, prenant vne essence contraire. Comment pouuoit ce Dieu ancien plus clairement accuser en l'humaine cognoissance l'ignorance de l'estre diuin: et apprendre aux hommes, que leur religion n'estoit qu'vne piece de leur inuention, propre à lier leur societé, qu'en declarant, comme il fit, à ceux qui en recherchoient l'instruction de son trepied, que le vray culte à chacun, estoit celuy qu'il trouuoit obserué par l'vsage du lieu, où il estoit?

O Dieu, quelle obligation n'auons nous à la benignité de nostre souuerain createur, pour auoir desniaisé nostre creance de ces vagabondes et arbitraires deuotions, et l'auoir logée sur l'eternelle base de sa saincte parolle? Que nous dira donc en cette necessité la philosophie? que nous suyuions les loix de nostre pays? c'est à dire cette mer flottante des opinions d'vn peuple, ou d'vn Prince, reason gives us on this is, in general, that each man should obey the laws of his country, as was the opinion of Socrates, inspired, he says, by divine counsel. And what does reason mean by that, except that our duty has no rule but a fortuitous one? Truth must have a face that is the same everywhere and universal. If man knew any rectitude and justice that had body and true essence, he would not tie it to the condition of the customs of this region or that; virtue would not take its shape from the notions of the Persians or the Indians.

ENGLISH

Nothing is subject to more continual agitation than laws. Since I was born I have seen the laws of the English, our neighbors, change three and four times. This happened not only in political matters, which is the area people like to excuse from constancy, but in the most important matter there can be, namely religion. It makes me ashamed and vexed, all the more because the people of my region once had so close an acquaintance with that nation that some traces of our old kinship still remain in my house.[182]

And here at home I have seen something that was a capital crime for us become lawful; and we who hold to other things are liable, depending on the uncertain fortunes of war, to be one day guilty of high treason against human and divine majesty, our justice falling to the mercy of injustice and, after a few years of possession, taking on a contrary essence. How could that ancient god more clearly expose human knowledge's ignorance of the divine being, and teach men that their religion was only a piece of their own invention, fit to bind their society together, than by declaring, as he did, to those who sought instruction about it from his tripod, that the true worship for each man was the one he found observed by the practice of the place where he was?[183]

O God, what an obligation we owe to the kindness of our sovereign Creator for having cured our belief of those wandering and arbitrary devotions and set it on the eternal foundation of his holy word! What then will philosophy tell us in this necessity? That we should follow the laws of our country? That is, that drifting sea of the opinions

182 Guyenne, Montaigne's region, was ruled by the English crown from 1152 until 1453.
183 Apollo, whose oracle at Delphi spoke through a priestess seated on a tripod; Xenophon reports this answer.

FRENCH

qui me peindront la iustice d'autant de couleurs, et la reformeront en autant de visages, qu'il y aura en eux de changemens de passion. Ie ne puis pas auoir le iugement si flexible. Quelle bonté est-ce, que ie voyois hyer en credit, et demain ne l'estre plus: et que le traiect d'vne riuiere fait crime?

Quelle verité est-ce que ces montaignes bornent mensonge au monde qui se tient au delà?

2.12.223 Mais ils sont plaisans, quand pour donner quelque certitude aux loix, ils disent qu'il y en a aucunes fermes, perpetuelles et immuables, qu'ils nomment naturelles, qui sont empreintes en l'humain genre par la condition de leur propre essence: et de celles là, qui en fait le nombre de trois, qui de quatre, qui plus, qui moins: signe, que c'est vne marque aussi douteuse que le reste. Or ils sont si defortunez (car comment puis-ie nommer cela, sinon defortune, que d'vn nombre de loix si infiny, il ne s'en rencontre aumoins vne que la fortune et temerité du sort ait permis estre vniuersellement receuë par le consentement de toutes les nations?)

ils sont, dis-ie, si miserables, que de ces trois ou quatre loix choisies, il n'en y a vne seule, qui ne soit contredite et desaduoüee, non par vne nation, mais par plusieurs. Or c'est la seule enseigne vray-semblable, par laquelle ils puissent argumenter aucunes loix naturelles, que l'vniuersité de l'approbation: car ce que Nature nous auroit veritablement ordonné, nous l'ensuyurions sans doubte d'vn commun consentement: et non seulement toute nation, mais tout homme particulier, ressentiroit la force et la violence, que luy feroit celuy, qui le voudroit pousser au contraire de cette loy. Qu'ils m'en montrent pour voir, vne de cette condition.

Protagoras et Ariston ne donnoyent autre essence à la iustice des loix, que l'authorité et opinion du legislateur: et que cela mis à part, le bon et l'honneste perdoyent leurs qualitez, et demeuroyent des noms vains, de choses indifferentes. Thrasymachus en Platon estime qu'il n'y a point d'autre droit que la commodité du superieur. Il n'est chose, en quoy le monde soit si diuers qu'en coustumes et loix. Telle chose est icy abominable, qui apporte recommandation ailleurs: comme en Lacedemone la subtilité de desrober.

Les mariages entre les proches sont capitalement defendus entre nous, ils sont ailleurs en honneur, Gentes of a people or a prince, which will paint justice for me in as many colors, and reshape it into as many faces, as there are changes of passion in them? I cannot have so flexible a judgment. What kind of goodness is it that I saw esteemed yesterday and will see discredited tomorrow, and that crossing a river turns into a crime?

ENGLISH

What kind of truth is it that these mountains bound, and that becomes a lie in the world beyond them?

But they are amusing when, to give some certainty to the laws, they say that there are some laws that are firm, perpetual and immutable, which they call natural, imprinted on the human race by the condition of its very essence. Of these, one man makes the number three, another four, one more, one less—a sign that this mark is as doubtful as the rest. Now they are so unlucky (for what can I call it but bad luck, that out of so infinite a number of laws there should not be found even one that the fortune and rashness of chance has allowed to be universally accepted by the consent of all nations?)

they are, I say, so wretched that of these three or four chosen laws there is not a single one that is not contradicted and disavowed, not by one nation but by several. Now the only plausible sign by which they could argue for any natural laws is universal approval. For what Nature had truly ordained for us we would undoubtedly follow by common consent; and not only every nation but every individual would feel the force and violence done to him by anyone who tried to push him against that law. Let them show me one of that kind, just so I can see it.

Protagoras and Ariston gave the justice of laws no other essence than the authority and opinion of the legislator. Set that aside, they said, and the good and the honorable lost their qualities and remained empty names for indifferent things. Thrasymachus, in Plato, holds that there is no other right than the advantage of the stronger. There is nothing in which the world is so diverse as in customs and laws. A thing that is abominable here wins commendation elsewhere, as skill in stealing did in Sparta.

Marriages between close relatives are forbidden among us on pain of death; elsewhere they are esse feruntur,

FRENCH

In quibus et nato genitrix, et nata parenti
Iungitur, et pietas geminato crescit amore. Le meurtre des enfans, meurtre des peres, communication de femmes, trafique de voleries, licence à toutes sortes de voluptez: il n'est rien en somme si extreme, qui ne se trouue receu par l'vsage de quelque nation.

2.12.224 Il est croyable qu'il y a des loix naturelles: comme il se voit és autres creatures: mais en nous elles sont perduës, cette belle raison humaine s'ingerant par tout de maistriser et commander, brouillant et confondant le visage des choses, selon sa vanité et inconstance. Nihil itaque amplius nostrum est: quod nostrum dico, artis est. Les subiets ont diuers lustres et diuerses considerations: c'est de là que s'engendre principalement la diversité d'opinions. Vne nation regarde vn subiect par vn visage, et s'arreste à celuy là: l'autre par vn autre.

2.12.225 Il n'est rien si horrible à imaginer, que de manger son pere. Les peuples qui auoyent anciennement cette coustume, la prenoyent toutesfois pour tesmoignage de pieté et de bonne affection, cherchant par là à donner à leurs progeniteurs la plus digne et honorable sepulture: logeants en eux mesmes et comme en leurs moelles, les corps de leurs peres et leurs reliques: les viuifiants aucunement et regenerants par la transmutation en leur chair viue, au moyen de la digestion et du nourrissement. Il est aysé à considerer quelle cruauté et abomination c'eust esté à des hommes abreuuez et imbus de cette superstition, de ietter la despouille des parens à la corruption de la terre, et nourriture des bestes et des vers.

2.12.226 Lycurgus considera au larrecin, la viuacité, diligence, hardiesse, et adresse, qu'il y a à surprendre quelque chose de son voisin, et l'vtilité qui reuient au public, que chacun en regarde plus curieusement à la conseruation de ce qui est sien: et estima que de cette double institution, à assaillir et à defendre, il s'en tiroit du fruit à la discipline militaire (qui estoit la principale science et vertu, à quoy il vouloit duire cette nation) de plus grande consideration, que n'estoit le desordre et l'iniustice de se preualoir de la chose d'autruy.

ENGLISH

held in honor. There are said to be peoples
Among whom mother is joined to son, and daughter to father,
And their devotion grows with doubled love. The murder of children, the murder of fathers, the sharing of wives, the trade in stolen goods, license for every kind of pleasure: in short, there is nothing so extreme that it is not found accepted by the practice of some nation.[184]

It is credible that there are natural laws, as can be seen in other creatures; but in us they are lost, because that fine human reason meddles everywhere to master and command, muddling and confusing the face of things according to its vanity and inconstancy. So nothing is ours any longer; what I call ours is the product of art. Subjects have different lights and different aspects, and it is chiefly from this that diversity of opinions arises. One nation looks at a subject from one side and stops there; another from another side.

There is nothing so horrible to imagine as eating one's father. Yet the peoples who had this custom in ancient times took it as a mark of piety and good affection. By it they sought to give their forebears the worthiest and most honorable burial, lodging the bodies and remains of their fathers in themselves, as if in their very marrow. In some way they brought them back to life and regenerated them by transforming them into their own living flesh through digestion and nourishment. It is easy to see what a cruelty and abomination it would have been for men steeped and imbued in this superstition to throw their parents' remains to rot in the earth and feed the beasts and the worms.

Lycurgus considered, in theft, the quickness, diligence, boldness and skill it takes to snatch something from one's neighbor. He also weighed the benefit to the public, since everyone then looks more carefully to the keeping of what is his. He judged that this double training, in attack and in defense, brought benefits to military discipline (which was the principal science and virtue in which he wanted to train that nation) of greater consequence than the disorder and injustice of seizing another's property.

184 Ovid, Metamorphoses X.

FRENCH

2.12.227 Dionysius le tyran offrit à Platon vne robbe à la mode de Perse, longue, damasquinée, et parfumée: Platon la refusa, disant, qu'estant nay homme, il ne vestiroit pas volontiers de robbe de femme: mais Aristippus l'accepta, auec cette responce, que nul accoustrement ne pouuoit corrompre vn chaste courage. Ses amis tançoient sa lascheté de prendre si peu à cœur, que Dionysius luy eust craché au visage: Les pescheurs, dit-il, souffrent bien d'estre baignés des ondes de la mer, depuis la teste iusqu'aux pieds, pour attraper vn goujon. Diogenes lauoit ses choulx, et le voyant passer, Si tu sçavois viure de choulx, tu ne ferois pas la cour à vn tyran.

A quoy Aristippus, Si tu sçauois viure entre les hommes, tu ne lauerois pas des choulx. Voylà comment la raison fournit d'apparence à diuers effects. C'est vn pot à deux ances, qu'on peut saisir à gauche et à dextre. Bellum, ô terra hospita, portas:
Bello armantur equi, bellum hæc armenta minantur:
Sed tamen ijdem olim curru succedere sueti
Quadrupedes, et frena iugo concordia ferre,
Spes est pacis.

2.12.228 On preschoit Solon de n'espandre pour la mort de son fils des armes impuissantes et inutiles: Et c'est pour cela, dit-il, que plus iustement ie les espans, qu'elles sont inutiles et impuissantes. La femme de Socrates rengregeoit son deuil par telle circonstance, O qu'iniustement le font mourir ces meschants iuges! Aimerois tu donc mieux que ce fust iustement? luy repliqua il. Nous portons les oreilles percées, les Grecs tenoient cela pour vne marque de seruitude. Nous nous cachons pour iouïr de nos femmes, les Indiens le font en public. Les Scythes immoloyent les estrangers en leurs temples, ailleurs les temples seruent de franchise. Inde furor vulgi, quòd numina vicinorum
Odit quisque locus, cùm solos credat habendos
Esse Deos quos ipse colit.

2.12.229 I'ay ouy parler d'vn iuge, lequel où il rencontroit vn aspre conflit entre Bartolus et Baldus, et quelque matiere agitée de plusieurs contrarietez, mettoit en marge de son

ENGLISH

Dionysius the tyrant offered Plato a robe in the Persian fashion, long, damasked and perfumed. Plato refused it, saying that, having been born a man, he would not willingly wear a woman's robe; but Aristippus accepted it, replying that no attire could corrupt a chaste heart. His friends reproached him for his spinelessness in taking so lightly the fact that Dionysius had spat in his face. "Fishermen," he said, "put up with being drenched by the sea waves from head to foot to catch a gudgeon." Diogenes was washing his cabbages and, seeing him pass by, said: "If you knew how to live on cabbages, you would not pay court to a tyrant."

To which Aristippus replied: "If you knew how to live among men, you would not be washing cabbages." That is how reason lends plausibility to different courses. It is a pot with two handles, which can be grabbed by the left or by the right. It is war you bring us, O land that receives us:
Horses are armed for war; war is what these herds threaten.
But still, these same beasts were once used to drawing the chariot,
And to bearing the bridle in harmony under the yoke:
There is hope of peace.[185]

Solon was urged not to shed powerless and useless tears for the death of his son. "That is exactly why I am right to shed them," he said, "because they are useless and powerless." Socrates' wife was aggravating her grief with this circumstance: "Oh, how unjustly these wicked judges are putting him to death!" "Would you rather it were justly, then?" he replied. We wear pierced ears; the Greeks considered that a mark of slavery. We hide to enjoy our wives; the Indians do it in public. The Scythians sacrificed foreigners in their temples; elsewhere temples serve as sanctuaries. Hence the fury of the crowd: each place hates
The gods of its neighbors, believing that the only gods to be held
As gods are those it worships itself.[186]

I have heard of a judge who, wherever he came across a sharp conflict between Bartolus and Baldus, or some matter tossed about by many contraliure. Question pour l'amy, c'est à dire que la verité estoit si embrouillée et debatue, qu'en pareille cause, il pourroit fauoriser celle des parties que bon luy sembleroit. Il ne tenoit qu'à faute d'esprit et de suffisance, qu'il ne peust mettre par tout, Question pour l'amy. Les aduocats et les iuges de nostre temps, trouuent à toutes causes, assez de biais pour les accommoder où bon leur semble. A vne science si infinie, dépendant de l'authorité de tant d'opinions, et d'vn subiect si arbitraire, il ne peut estre, qu'il n'en naisse vne confusion extreme de iugemens.

185 Virgil, Aeneid III.
186 Juvenal, Satires XV.

FRENCH

Aussi n'est-il guere si clair procés, auquel les aduis ne se trouuent diuers: ce qu'vne compaignie a iugé, l'autre le iuge au contraire, et elle mesmes au contraire vne autre fois. Dequoy nous voyons des exemples ordinaires, par cette licence, qui tache merueilleusement la cerimonieuse authorité et lustre de nostre iustice, de ne s'arrester aux arrests, et courir des vns aux autres iuges, pour decider d'vne mesme cause.

2.12.230 Quant à la liberté des opinions philosophiques, touchant le vice et la vertu, c'est chose où il n'est besoing de s'estendre: et où il se trouue plusieurs aduis, qui valent mieux teus que publiez aux foibles esprits. Arcesilaus disoit n'estre considerable en la paillardise, de quel costé et par où on le fust. Et obscœnas voluptates, si natura requirit non genere, aut loco, aut ordine, sed forma, ætate, figura metiendas Epicurus putat. Ne amores quidem sanctos à sapiente alienos esse arbitrantur. Quæramus ad quam vsque ætatem iuuenes amandi sint. Ces deux derniers lieux Stoïques, et sur ce propos, le reproche de Diogarchus à Platon mesme, montrent combien la plus saine philosophie souffre de licences esloignées de l'vsage commun, et excessiues.

2.12.231 Les loix prennent leur authorité de la possession et de l'vsage: il est dangereux de les ramener à leur naissance: elles grossissent et s'annoblissent en roulant, comme nos riuieres: suyuez les contremont iusques à leur source, ce n'est qu'vn petit surjon d'eau à peine recognoissable, qui s'enorgueillit ainsin, et se fortifie, en vieillissant. Voyez les anciennes considerations, qui ont donné le premier branle à ce fameux torrent, plein de dignité, d'horreur et de reuerence: vous les trouuerez si legeres et si delicates, dictions, would write in the margin of his book: "Question for a friend." That is to say, the truth was so tangled and disputed that in a similar case he could favor whichever party he pleased. It was only for lack of wit and ability that he did not write "Question for a friend" everywhere. The lawyers and judges of our time find in every case enough angles to bend it wherever they please. In a science so infinite, depending on the authority of so many opinions, and in so arbitrary a subject, an extreme confusion of judgments cannot fail to arise.[187]

ENGLISH

So there is hardly a lawsuit so clear that opinions do not differ on it: what one court has judged, another judges the opposite way, and the same court judges the opposite way another time. We see ordinary examples of this in that license—which marvelously stains the ceremonious authority and luster of our justice—of not resting content with rulings, and of running from one set of judges to another to decide the same case.

As for the freedom of philosophical opinions on vice and virtue, I need not enlarge on it; there are many views on it that are better kept quiet than published to weak minds. Arcesilaus said that in lechery it was of no importance from which side, or by which way, one was taken. And as for obscene pleasures, if nature requires them, Epicurus thinks they should be measured not by birth, place or rank, but by beauty, age and figure. Nor do they think holy loves are foreign to the wise man. Let us inquire up to what age young men may be loved. These last two Stoic passages, and on this subject the reproach of Dicaearchus to Plato himself, show how much excessive license, far removed from common practice, even the soundest philosophy allows.[188]

Laws take their authority from possession and usage; it is dangerous to trace them back to their birth. They swell and grow nobler as they roll along, like our rivers: follow them upstream to their source, and it is only a little trickle of water, barely recognizable, that grows proud in this way and gathers strength as it ages. Look at the ancient considerations that gave the first push to this fam-

187 Bartolus of Sassoferrato and his pupil Baldus de Ubaldis, 14th-century Italian jurists whose commentaries on Roman law were standard authorities.

188 The Latin passages are from Cicero and Seneca. Dicaearchus was a pupil of Aristotle.

FRENCH

que ces gens icy qui poisent tout, et le ramenent à la raison, et qui ne reçoiuent rien par authorité et à credit, il n'est pas merueille s'ils ont leurs iugements souuent tres-esloignez des iugemens publiques.

Gens qui prennent pour patron l'image premiere de Nature, il n'est pas merueille, si en la pluspart de leurs opinions, ils gauchissent la voye commune. Comme pour exemple: peu d'entre eux eussent approuué les conditions contrainctes de nos mariages: et la plus part ont voulu les femmes communes, et sans obligation. Ils refusoient nos ceremonies. Chrysippus disoit, qu'vn philosophe fera vne douzaine de culebutes en public, voire sans haut de chausses, pour vne douzaine d'oliues. A peine eust il donné aduis à Clisthenes de refuser la belle Agariste sa fille, à Hippoclides, pour luy auoir veu faire l'arbre fourché sur vne table.

Metrocles lascha vn peu indiscretement vn pet en disputant, en presence de son eschole: et se tenoit en sa maison caché de honte, iusques à ce que Crates le fut visiter: et adioustant à ses consolations et raisons, l'exemple de sa liberté, se mettant à peter à l'enuy auec luy, il luy osta ce scrupule: et de plus, le retira à sa secte Stoïque, plus franche, de la secte Peripatetique plus ciuile, laquelle iusque lors il auoit suiuy. Ce que nous appellons honnesteté, de n'oser faire à descouuert, ce qui nous est honneste de faire à couuert, ils l'appelloient sottise: et de faire le fin à taire et desaduoüer ce que nature, coustume, et nostre desir publient et proclament de nos actions, ils l'estimoyent vice.

Et leur sembloit, que c'estoit affoller les mysteres de Venus, que de les oster du retiré sacraire de son temple, pour les exposer à la veuë du peuple: et que tirer ses jeux hors du rideau, c'estoit les perdre. C'est chose de poix, que la honte: la recelation, reseruation, circonscription, parties de l'estimation. Que la volupté tres ingenieusement faisoit instance, sous le masque de la vertu, de n'estre prostituée au milieu des quarrefours, foulée des pieds et des yeux de la commune, trouuant à dire la dignité et commodité de ses cabinets accoustumez.

ENGLISH

ous torrent, full of dignity, awe and reverence: you will find them so light and so flimsy that it is no wonder these people here, who weigh everything and bring it back to reason, and accept nothing on authority and on trust, often hold judgments very far from public ones.

People who take as their model the original image of Nature—it is no wonder if in most of their opinions they swerve from the common path. For example, few of them would have approved of the constrained conditions of our marriages, and most of them wanted women to be held in common and without obligation. They rejected our ceremonies. Chrysippus said that a philosopher will turn a dozen somersaults in public, even without breeches, for a dozen olives. He would hardly have advised Cleisthenes to refuse his beautiful daughter Agariste to Hippocleides for having seen him stand on his head on a table.[189]

Metrocles, while disputing in front of his school, rather indiscreetly let out a fart, and kept himself hidden at home for shame until Crates came to visit him. Crates added to his consolations and arguments the example of his own freedom, starting to fart in competition with him. In this way he rid Metrocles of his scruple, and moreover drew him over to his own Stoic sect, which was freer, from the Peripatetic sect, more polite, which he had followed until then. What we call decency—not daring to do openly what it is decent for us to do in private—they called foolishness. And to play the sly one by concealing and disowning what nature, custom and our desire publish and proclaim of our actions, they considered a vice.[190]

And it seemed to them that it was spoiling the mysteries of Venus to take them out of the secluded sanctuary of her temple and expose them to the people's view, and that to bring her games out from behind the curtain was to ruin them. Shame is a weighty thing; concealment, reserve and limits are part of what gives a thing its value. It also seemed to them that pleasure, very cleverly, under the mask of virtue, pleaded not to be prostituted in the middle of the crossroads and trampled by the feet and eyes of the common

189 Herodotus tells how Hippocleides, the favored suitor, lost Agariste by dancing on his head on a table at the wedding feast.
190 The story is told by Diogenes Laertius; Crates was in fact a Cynic.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

people, since it missed the dignity and comfort of its usual private rooms.

De là disent aucuns, que d'oster les bordels publiques, c'est non seulement espandre par tout la paillardise, qui estoit assignée à ce lieu là, mais encore esguillonner les hommes vagabonds et oisifs à ce vice, par la malaisance. Mœchus es Aufidiæ, qui vir, Coruine, fuisti;
Riualis fuerat qui tuus, ille vir est.
Cur aliena placet tibi, quæ tua non placet vxor?
Nunquid securus non potes arrigere? Cette experience se diuersifie en mille exemples. Nullus in vrbe fuit tota, qui tangere vellet Vxorem gratis Cæciliane tuam,
Dum licuit: sed nunc, positis custodibus, ingens
Turba fututorum est.

Hence some say that abolishing public brothels not only spreads everywhere the lechery that was confined to those places, but also goads idle, wandering men into this vice by the very difficulty. You are Aufidia's lover, Corvinus, you who were her husband;
The man who was your rival is now her husband.
Why does another man's wife please you, when as your own she did not?
Is it that you cannot get an erection when you feel safe? This experience varies in a thousand examples. There was no one in the whole city willing to touch
Your wife, Caecilianus, even for free,
As long as it was allowed; but now that you have set guards, a huge Crowd of men is eager to bed her.[191]

Ingeniosus homo es. On demanda à vn philosophe qu'on surprit à mesme, ce qu'il faisoit: il respondit tout froidement, Ie plante vn homme: ne rougissant non plus d'estre rencontré en cela, que si on l'eust trouué plantant des aulx.

You are a clever man. A philosopher who was caught in the act was asked what he was doing. He answered quite coolly, "I am planting a man," blushing no more at being found at it than if he had been caught planting garlic.

2.12.232 C'est, comme i'estime, d'vne opinion tendre, respectueuse, qu'vn grand et religieux autheur tient cette action, si necessairement obligée à l'occultation et à la vergongne, qu'en la licence des embrassements Cyniques, il ne se peut persuader, que la besoigne en vinst à sa fin: ains qu'elle s'arrestoit à representer des mouuements lascifs seulement, pour maintenir l'impudence de la profession de leur eschole: et que pour eslancer ce que la honte auoit contrainct et retiré, il leur estoit encore apres besoin de chercher l'ombre. Il n'auoit pas veu assez auant en leur desbauche. Car Diogenes exerçant en publiq sa masturbation, faisoit souhait en presence du peuple assistant, de pouuoir ainsi saouler son ventre en le frottant.

It is, I believe, out of a tender and respectful opinion that a great and religious author holds this act to be so necessarily bound to concealment and shame that he cannot persuade himself that, in the license of the Cynics' embraces, the business ever came to its end. He believes instead that it stopped at merely representing lascivious movements, to keep up the impudence their school professed, and that to release what shame had constrained and held back, they still needed afterwards to seek the shade. He had not looked far enough into their debauchery. For Diogenes, masturbating in public, expressed the wish, in front of the people standing around, that he could satisfy his belly in the same way by rubbing it.[192]

A ceux qui luy demandoyent, pourquoy il ne cherchoit lieu plus commode à manger, qu'en pleine ruë: C'est, respondoit il, que i'ay faim en pleine ruë. Les femmes philosophes, qui se mesloyent à leur secte, se mesloyent aussi à leur personne, en tout lieu, sans discretion: et Hipparchia ne fut receuë en la societé de Crates, qu'en condition de suyure en toutes choses les vz et coustumes

To those who asked him why he did not look for a more convenient place to eat than the middle of the street, he replied: "Because I am hungry in the middle of the street." The women philosophers who mingled with their sect also mingled with their persons, anywhere, without discretion; and 191 Martial, Epigrams III.70 and I.73.

192 Saint Augustine, City of God XIV.20.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
de sa regle. Ces philosophes icy donnoient extreme prix à la vertu: et refusoyent toutes autres disciplines que la morale: si est-ce qu'en toutes actions ils attribuoyent la souueraine authorité à l'election de leur sage, et au dessus des loix: et n'ordonnoyent aux voluptez autre bride, que la moderation, et la conseruation de la liberté d'autruy.	Hipparchia was admitted into Crates' company only on condition that she follow the usages and customs of his rule in all things. These philosophers set extreme value on virtue and rejected all disciplines other than ethics. Yet in all actions they gave sovereign authority to the choice of their wise man, even above the laws, and put no other bridle on pleasures than moderation and respect for the freedom of others.[193]

INTERPRETING TEXTS

Any meaning can be drawn from a text, as Homer and Plato show.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.233 Heraclitus et Protagoras, de ce que le vin semble amer au malade, et gracieux au sain: l'auiron tortu dans l'eau, et droit à ceux qui le voyent hors de là: et de pareilles apparences contraires qui se trouuent aux subiects, argumenterent que tous subiects auoyent en eux les causes de ces apparences: et qu'il y auoit au vin quelque amertume, qui se rapportoit au goust du malade; l'auiron, certaine qualité courbe, se rapportant à celuy qui le regarde dans l'eau. Et ainsi de tout le reste. Qui est dire, que tout est en toutes choses, et par consequent rien en aucune: car rien n'est, où tout est.	Heraclitus and Protagoras observed that wine seems bitter to the sick man and pleasant to the healthy one, that an oar looks bent in the water and straight to those who see it out of the water, and that similar contrary appearances are found in objects. From this they argued that all objects contained in themselves the causes of these appearances: that there was some bitterness in the wine that answered to the sick man's taste, and in the oar a certain bent quality that answered to the person looking at it in the water. And so with all the rest. Which is to say that everything is in all things, and consequently nothing is in any; for nothing is where everything is.
2.12.234 Cette opinion me ramentoit l'experience que nous auons, qu'il n'est aucun sens ny visage, ou droict, ou amer, ou doux, ou courbe, que l'esprit humain ne trouue aux escrits, qu'il entreprend de fouïller. En la parole la plus nette, pure, et parfaicte, qui puisse estre, combien de fauceté et de mensonge a lon faict naistre? quelle heresie n'y a trouué des fondements assez, et tesmoignages, pour entreprendre et pour se maintenir? C'est pour cela, que les autheurs de telles erreurs, ne se veulent iamais departir de cette preuue du tesmoignage de l'interpretation des mots.	This opinion reminds me of what experience shows us: there is no sense or aspect, straight or bitter or sweet or bent, that the human mind does not find in the writings it sets out to dig into. In the clearest, purest and most perfect word there can be, how much falsehood and lying have people made to spring up? What heresy has not found in it foundations and testimonies enough to launch itself and keep itself going? That is why the authors of such errors never want to give up this proof by the testimony of the interpretation of words.
Vn personnage de dignité, me voulant approuuer par authorité, cette queste de la pierre philosophale, où il est tout plongé: m'allegua dernierement cinq ou six passages de la Bible, sur lesquels, il disoit, s'estre premierement fondé pour la descharge de sa conscience: (car il est de profession ecclesiastique) et à la verité l'inuention n'en	A person of rank, wanting to justify to me by authority this quest for the philosopher's stone in which he is completely immersed, recently cited five or six passages of the Bible on which, he said, he had first based himself to clear his conscience (for he is a churchman by profession). And to tell 193 Hipparchia of Maroneia (4th century BC), Cynic philosopher and wife of Crates.

FRENCH

estoit pas seulement plaisante, mais encore bien proprement accommodée à la deffence de cette belle science.

2.12.235 Par cette voye, se gaigne le credit des fables diuinatrices. Il n'est prognostiqueur, s'il a cette authorité, qu'on le daigne feuilleter, et rechercher curieusement tous les plis et lustres de ses paroles, à qui on ne face dire tout ce qu'on voudra, comme aux Sybilles. Il y a tant de moyens d'interpretation, qu'il est malaisé que de biais, ou de droit fil, vn esprit ingenieux ne rencontre en tout subiect, quelque air, qui luy serue à son poinct. Pourtant se trouue vn stile nubileux et doubteux, en si frequent et ancien vsage. Que l'autheur puisse gaigner cela, d'attirer et embesoigner à soy la posterité. Ce que non seulement la suffisance, mais autant, ou plus, la faueur fortuite de la matiere peut gaigner.

Qu'au demeurant il se presente par bestise ou par finesse, vn peu obscurement et diuersement: ne luy chaille. Nombre d'esprits le belutants et secoüants, en exprimeront quantité de formes, ou selon, ou à costé, ou au contraire de la sienne, qui luy feront toutes honneur. Il se verra enrichi des moyens de ses disciples, comme les regents du Landit. C'est ce qui a faict valoir plusieurs choses de neant, qui a mis en credit plusieurs escrits, et chargé de toute sorte de matiere qu'on a voulu: vne mesme chose receuant mille et mille, et autant qu'il nous plaist d'images et considerations diuerses.

2.12.236 Est-il possible qu'Homere aye voulu dire tout ce qu'on luy fait dire: et qu'il se soit presté à tant et si diuerses figures, que les theologiens, legislateurs, capitaines, philosophes, toute sorte de gents, qui traittent sciences, pour diuersement et contrairement qu'ils les traittent, s'appuyent de luy, s'en rapportent à luy: Maistre general à touts offices, ouurages, et artisans: General Conseiller à toutes entreprises? Quiconque a eu besoing d'oracles et de predictions, en y a trouué pour son faict.

Vn personnage sçauant et de mes amis, c'est merueille quels rencontres et combien admirables il y faict naistre, en faueur de nostre religion: et ne se peut aysément departir de cette opinion, que ce ne soit le dessein d'Homere, (si luy est cet autheur aussi familier qu'à the truth, the idea was not only amusing but also very aptly suited to the defense of that fine science.

ENGLISH

This is how prophetic fables win credit. Take any prognosticator with enough authority that people deign to leaf through him and search carefully through all the folds and glints of his words: he can be made to say anything one likes, as with the Sibyls. There are so many ways of interpreting that it is hard for an ingenious mind not to find, on any subject, obliquely or straight on, some air that serves its purpose. That is why a cloudy and ambiguous style has been in such frequent and ancient use. Let the author only manage to attract posterity and keep it busy with him—something that not only ability but as much, or more, the fortuitous favor of the subject matter can achieve.

For the rest, whether he presents himself somewhat obscurely and ambiguously out of stupidity or out of cunning, let him not care. Many minds sifting and shaking him will squeeze out a quantity of forms, in line with his own, or beside it, or contrary to it, and all of them will do him honor. He will find himself enriched by his disciples' means, like the schoolmasters at the Lendit fair. This is what has given value to many worthless things, what has brought many writings into credit and loaded them with every kind of matter one wanted: one and the same thing receiving thousands upon thousands of different images and interpretations, as many as we please.[194]

Is it possible that Homer meant to say everything he is made to say, and that he lent himself to so many and such different shapes? Theologians, legislators, captains, philosophers, every sort of people who deal with the sciences, however differently and contrarily they treat them, lean on him and appeal to him: General Master of all offices, works and craftsmen; General Counselor in all undertakings. Whoever has needed oracles and predictions has found in him what suited his case.

A learned man, a friend of mine—it is a wonder what coincidences, and how admirable, he brings out of Homer in favor of our religion. He cannot easily be shaken from the opinion that this was Homer's design (and yet he knows this author as homme de nostre siecle). Et ce qu'il trouue en faueur de la nostre, plusieurs anciennement l'auoient trouué en faueur des leurs.

194 The Lendit fair at Saint-Denis, near Paris, was the occasion on which students brought their masters their yearly fees.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

well as any man of our century). And what he finds in favor of our religion, many in ancient times had found in favor of theirs.

2.12.237 Voyez demener et agiter Platon, chacun s'honorant de l'appliquer à soy, le couche du costé qu'il le veut. On le promeine et l'insere à toutes les nouuelles opinions, que le monde reçoit: et le differente lon à soy-mesmes selon le different cours des choses. On fait desaduoüer à son sens, les mœurs licites en son siecle, d'autant qu'elles sont illicites au nostre. Tout cela, viuement et puissamment, autant qu'est puissant et vif l'esprit de l'interprete.

See how Plato is tossed and turned about: everyone, honoring himself by applying Plato to himself, lays him on whatever side he wants. He is paraded about and inserted into all the new opinions the world takes up, and made to differ from himself according to the different course of things. His meaning is made to disavow morals that were lawful in his century, because they are unlawful in ours. All this is done vividly and powerfully, as powerfully and vividly as the interpreter's mind allows.

Sur ce mesme fondement qu'auoit Heraclitus, et cette sienne sentence, Que toutes choses auoyent en elles les visages qu'on y trouuoit, Democritus en tiroit vne toute contraire conclusion: c'est que les subiects n'auoient du tout rien de ce que nous y trouuions: et de ce que le miel estoit doux à l'vn, et amer à l'autre, il argumentoit, qu'il n'estoit ny doux, ny amer. Les Pyrrhoniens diroient qu'ils ne sçauent s'il est doux ou amer, ou ny l'vn ny l'autre, ou tous les deux: car ceux-cy gaignent tousiours le haut poinct de la dubitation.

From the same foundation as Heraclitus, and from that maxim of his that all things had in them the aspects people found in them, Democritus drew an entirely contrary conclusion: that objects had absolutely nothing of what we found in them. Because honey was sweet to one person and bitter to another, he argued that it was neither sweet nor bitter. The Pyrrhonists would say that they do not know whether it is sweet or bitter, or neither, or both; for they always reach the highest point of doubt.

Les Cyrenayens tenoyent, que rien n'estoit perceptible par le dehors, et que cela estoit seulement perceptible, qui nous touchoit par l'interne attouchement, comme la douleur et la volupté: ne recognoissants ny ton, ny couleur, mais certaines affections seulement, qui nous en venoyent: et que l'homme n'auoit autre siege de son iugement. Protagoras estimoit estre vray à chacun, ce qui semble à chacun. Les Epicuriens logent aux sens tout iugement, et en la notice des choses, et en la volupté. Platon a voulu, le iugement de la verité, et la verité mesme retirée des opinions et des sens, appartenir à l'esprit et à la cogitation.

The Cyrenaics held that nothing was perceptible from outside, and that only what touched us by internal contact was perceptible, such as pain and pleasure. They recognized neither sound nor color, but only certain affections that came to us from them, and they held that man had no other seat for his judgment. Protagoras thought that whatever seems true to each man is true for him. The Epicureans place all judgment in the senses, both in the knowledge of things and in pleasure. Plato wanted the judgment of truth, and truth itself, withdrawn from opinions and from the senses, to belong to the mind and to thought.

THE SENSES

All knowledge comes through the senses, which may be too few and are easily deceived.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.12.238 Ce propos m'a porté sur la consideration des sens, ausquels git le plus grand fondement et preuue de nostre ignorance. Tout ce qui se cognoist, il se cognoist sans doubte par la faculté du cognoissant: car puis que le iugement vient de l'operation de celuy qui iuge, c'est

This discussion has brought me to consider the senses, in which lies the greatest foundation and proof of our ignorance. Whatever is known is undoubtedly known through the faculty of the knower. For since judgment comes from the operation raison que cette operation il la parface par ses moyens et volonté, non par la contraincte d'autruy: comme il aduiendroit, si nous cognoissions les choses par la force et selon la loy de leur essence. Or toute cognoissance s'achemine en nous par les sens, ce sont nos maistres: Via qua munita fidei / Proxima fert humanum in pectus, templáque mentis. La science commence par eux, et se resout en eux.

FRENCH

Apres tout, nous ne sçaurions non plus qu'vne pierre, si nous ne sçauions, qu'il y a son, odeur, lumiere, faueur, mesure, poix, mollesse, durté, aspreté, couleur, polisseure, largeur, profondeur. Voyla le plant et les principes de tout le bastiment de nostre science. Et selon aucuns, science n'est rien autre chose, que sentiment. Quiconque me peut pousser à contredire les sens, il me tient à la gorge, il ne me sçauroit faire reculer plus arriere. Les sens sont le commencement et la fin de l'humaine cognoissance. Inuenies primis ab sensibus esse creatam / Notitiam veri, neque sensus posse refelli.

/ Quid maiore fide porro quàm sensus haberi / Debet? Qu'on leur attribue le moins qu'on pourra, tousiours faudra il leur donner cela, que par leur voye et entremise s'achemine toute nostre instruction. Cicero dit que Chrysippus ayant essayé de rabattre de la force des sens et de leur vertu, se representa à soy-mesmes des argumens au contraire, et des oppositions si vehementes, qu'il n'y peut satisfaire. Surquoy Carneades, qui maintenoit le contraire party, se vantoit de se seruir des armes mesmes et paroles de Chrysippus, pour le combattre: et s'escrioit à cette cause contre luy: O miserable, ta force t'a perdu.

Il n'est aucun absurde, selon nous, plus extreme, que de maintenir que le feu n'eschauffe point, que la lumiere n'esclaire point, qu'il n'y a point de pesanteur au fer, ny de fermeté, qui sont notices que nous apportent les sens; ny creance, ou science en l'homme, qui se puisse comparer à celle-là en certitude.

2.12.239 La premiere consideration que i'ay sur le subiect des sens, est que ie mets en doubte que l'homme soit prouueu de tous sens naturels. Ie voy plusieurs animaux, qui viuent vne vie entiere et parfaicte, les vns sans la veuë, of the one who judges, it stands to reason that he carries out this operation by his own means and will, not under constraint from something else—as would happen if we knew things by the force and according to the law of their essence. Now all knowledge makes its way into us through the senses; they are our masters: The paved road by which belief / Most directly enters the human heart and the temples of the mind. Knowledge begins with them and is resolved into them.[195]

ENGLISH

After all, we would know no more than a stone if we did not know that there are sound, smell, light, taste, measure, weight, softness, hardness, roughness, color, smoothness, breadth and depth. There you have the ground plan and the principles of the whole edifice of our knowledge. And according to some, knowledge is nothing but sensation. Whoever can push me into contradicting the senses has me by the throat; he could not drive me back any farther. The senses are the beginning and the end of human knowledge. You will find that the notion of truth was first created / By the senses, and that the senses cannot be refuted.

/ What, then, should be held more worthy of belief / Than the senses? However little we may grant them, we must always grant them this: all our learning makes its way through their channel and mediation. Cicero says that Chrysippus, having tried to reduce the force and power of the senses, put to himself arguments to the contrary and objections so vehement that he could not answer them. Whereupon Carneades, who maintained the opposite side, boasted of using Chrysippus' very weapons and words to fight him, and so cried out against him: "Wretch, your own strength has undone you."

There is no absurdity, in our view, more extreme than to maintain that fire does not heat, that light does not illuminate, that there is no weight or solidity in iron—notions the senses bring us; nor is there any belief or knowledge in man that can compare with these in certainty.

My first consideration on the subject of the senses is that I doubt whether man is provided with all the natural senses. I see many animals that live a complete and perfect life, some without sight, oth-

195 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things V.

FRENCH

autres sans l'ouye: qui sçait si à nous aussi il ne manque pas encore vn, deux, trois, et plusieurs autres sens? Car s'il en manque quelqu'vn, nostre discours n'en peut découurir le défaut. C'est le priuilege des sens, d'être l'extreme borne de nostre aperceuance. Il n'y a rien au delà d'eux, qui nous puisse seruir à les descouurir: voire ny l'vn sens n'en peut descouurir l'autre.

An poterunt oculos aures reprehendere, an aures
Tactus, an hunc porro tactum sapor arguet oris,
An confutabunt nares, oculiue reuincent? Ils font trestous, la ligne extreme de nostre faculté. Seorsum cuique potestas
Diuisa est, sua vis cuique est. Il est impossible de faire conceuoir à vn homme naturellement aueugle, qu'il n'y void pas, impossible de luy faire desirer la veuë et regretter son defaut. Parquoy, nous ne deuons prendre aucune asseurance de ce que nostre ame est contente et satisfaicte de ceux que nous auons: veu qu'elle n'a pas dequoy sentir en cela sa maladie et son imperfection, si elle y est.

Il est impossible de dire chose à cet aueugle, par discours, argument, ny similitude, qui loge en son imagination aucune apprehension, de lumiere, de couleur, et de veuë. Il n'y a rien plus arriere, qui puisse pousser le sens en euidence. Les aueugles nais, qu'on void desirer à voir, ce n'est pas pour entendre ce qu'ils demandent: ils ont appris de nous, qu'ils ont à dire quelque chose, qu'ils ont quelque chose à desirer, qui est en nous, laquelle ils nomment bien, et ses effects et consequences: mais ils ne sçauent pourtant pas que c'est, ny ne l'apprehendent ny pres ny loing.

2.12.240 I'ay veu vn Gentil-homme de bonne maison, aueugle nay, aumoins aueugle de tel aage, qu'il ne sçait que c'est que de veuë: il entend si peu ce qui luy manque, qu'il vse et se sert comme nous, des paroles propres au voir, et les applique d'vne mode toute sienne et particuliere. On luy presentoit vn enfant duquel il estoit parrain, l'ayant pris entre ses bras: Mon Dieu, dit-il, le bel enfant, qu'il le fait beau voir, qu'il a le visage gay. Il dira comme l'vn d'entre nous, Cette sale a vne belle veuë, il fait clair, il fait beau soleil.

ENGLISH

ers without hearing. Who knows whether we too may not still lack one, two, three or many other senses? For if we lack one, our reason cannot discover the lack. It is the privilege of the senses to be the outermost limit of our perception. There is nothing beyond them that can help us discover them; indeed, not even one sense can discover another.

Can the ears correct the eyes, or touch
Correct the ears? Or will the taste of the mouth refute this touch,
Or will the nose confute it, or the eyes overturn it?
Every one of them marks the outermost line of our faculty. Each has its own separate power,
Each its own force. It is impossible to make a man born blind conceive that he does not see; impossible to make him desire sight and regret its absence. Therefore we should take no assurance from the fact that our soul is content and satisfied with the senses we have, since it has no means of feeling its sickness and imperfection in this respect, if there is any.

It is impossible to tell this blind man anything, by reasoning, argument or comparison, that will lodge in his imagination any apprehension of light, color or sight. There is nothing further back that can bring the sense into evidence. As for those born blind whom we see wishing they could see, it is not because they understand what they are asking for. They have learned from us that they lack something, that there is something in us for them to desire. They name it well enough, along with its effects and consequences; but they still do not know what it is, and do not grasp it, either closely or from afar.

I have seen a gentleman of good family who was born blind, or at least blind from such an early age that he does not know what sight is. He understands so little what he lacks that he uses words that belong to seeing just as we do, and applies them in a way entirely his own. When they presented him with a child to whom he was godfather, he took it in his arms and said: "My God, what a beautiful child! How lovely it is to see! What a cheerful face he has!" He will say, like any one of us: "This room has a fine view"; "It is bright"; "The sun is shining beautifully."

FRENCH

Il y a plus: car par ce que ce sont nos exercices que la chasse, la paume, la bute, et qu'il l'a ouy dire, il s'y affectionne et s'y embesoigne: et croid y auoir la mesme part, que nous y auons: il s'y picque et s'y plaist, et ne les reçoit pourtant que par les oreilles. On luy crie, que voyla vn liéure, quand on est en quelque belle splanade, où il puisse picquer: et puis on luy dit encore, que voyla vn lieure pris: le voyla aussi fier de sa prise, comme il oit dire aux autres, qu'ils le sont.

L'esteuf, il le prend à la main gauche, et le pousse à tout sa raquette: de la harquebouse, il en tire à l'aduenture, et se paye de ce que ses gens luy disent, qu'il est ou haut, ou costier.

2.12.241 Que sçait-on si le genre humain fait vne sottise pareille, à faute de quelque sens, et que par ce defaut, la plus part du visage des choses nous soit caché? Que sçait-on, si les difficultez que nous trouuons en plusieurs ouurages de Nature, viennent de là? et si plusieurs effets des animaux qui excedent nostre capacité, sont produicts par la faculté de quelque sens, que nous ayons à dire? et si aucuns d'entre eux ont vne vie plus pleine par ce moyen, et entiere que la nostre?

Nous saisissons la pomme quasi par tous nos sens: nous y trouuons de la rougeur, de la polisseure, de l'odeur et de la douceur: outre cela, elle peut auoir d'autres vertus, comme d'asseicher ou restreindre, ausquelles nous n'auons point de sens qui se puisse rapporter. Les proprietez que nous appellons occultes en plusieurs choses, comme à l'aymant d'attirer le fer, n'est-il pas vraysemblable qu'il y a des facultez sensitiues en Nature propres à les iuger et à les apperceuoir, et que le defaut de telles facultez, nous apporte l'ignorance de la vraye essence de telles choses?

C'est à l'auanture quelque sens particulier, qui descouure aux coqs l'heure du matin et de minuict, et les esmeut à chanter: qui apprend aux poulles, avaut tout vsage et experience, de craindre vn esparuier, et non vne oye, ny vn paon, plus grandes bestes: qui aduertit les poulets de la qualité hostile, qui est au chat contr'eux, et à ne se deffier du chien: s'armer contre le miaulement, voix aucunement flatteuse, non contre l'abayer, voix aspre et quereleuse. Aux freslons, aux formis, et aux rats, de choisir tousiours le meilleur formage et la meilleure poire, auant que d'y auoir tasté, et qui achemine le cerf,

ENGLISH

There is more. Because hunting, tennis and target shooting are our pastimes, and he has heard about them, he grows fond of them and takes part in them, and believes he has the same share in them that we have. He gets keen and takes pleasure in them, and yet he receives them only through his ears. Someone shouts to him that there is a hare, when they are on some fine open ground where he can spur his horse on; and then they tell him that the hare has been caught, and there he is, as proud of his catch as he hears others say they are.

He takes the ball in his left hand and strikes it with his racket; he fires the arquebus at random, and is satisfied when his people tell him he has shot high or wide.

How do we know that the human race is not committing a similar folly for lack of some sense, and that through this defect most of the face of things is not hidden from us? How do we know whether the difficulties we find in many works of Nature come from this? Or whether many feats of animals that exceed our capacity are produced by the faculty of some sense we lack? Or whether some of them have, by this means, a fuller and more complete life than ours?

We grasp the apple with almost all our senses: we find in it redness, smoothness, smell and sweetness. Beyond that, it may have other properties, such as drying or binding, to which no sense we have can correspond. As for the properties we call occult in many things, such as the magnet's power to attract iron, is it not likely that there are sensory faculties in Nature suited to judge and perceive them, and that our lack of such faculties leaves us ignorant of the true essence of such things?

Perhaps it is some particular sense that reveals to roosters the hour of morning and of midnight and moves them to crow. Perhaps such a sense teaches hens, before any practice or experience, to fear a sparrowhawk and not a goose or a peacock, which are larger creatures. It may warn chicks of the hostility the cat bears them, and teach them not to distrust the dog—to arm themselves against the mewing, a rather flattering voice, and not against the barking, a harsh and quarrelsome one. It may teach hornets, ants and rats always to choose the best cheese and the best pear before having tasted l'elephant et le serpent à la cognoissance de certaine herbe propre à leur guerison.

FRENCH

2.12.242 Il n'y a sens, qui n'ait vne grande domination, et qui n'apporte par son moyen vn nombre infiny de cognoissances. Si nous auions à dire l'intelligence des sons, de l'harmonie, et de la voix, cela apporteroit vne confusion inimaginable à tout le reste de nostre science. Car outre ce qui est attaché au propre effect de chaque sens, combien d'argumens, de consequences, et de conclusions tirons nous aux autres choses par la comparaison de l'vn sens à l'autre?

Qu'vn homme entendu, imagine l'humaine nature produicte originellement sans la veuë, et discoure combien d'ignorance et de trouble luy apporteroit vn tel defaut, combien de tenebres et d'aueuglement en nostre ame: on verra par là, combien nous importe, à la cognoissance de la verité, la priuation d'vn autre tel sens, ou de deux, ou de trois, si elle est en nous. Nous auons formé vne verité par la consultation et concurrence de nos cinq sens: mais à l'aduenture falloit-il l'accord de huict, ou de dix sens, et leur contribution, pour l'apperceuoir certainement et en son essence.

2.12.243 Les sectes qui combatent la science de l'homme, elles la combatent principalement par l'incertitude et foiblesse de nos sens. Car puis que toute cognoissance vient en nous par leur entremise et moyen, s'ils faillent au rapport qu'ils nous font, s'ils corrompent ou alterent ce, qu'ils nous charrient du dehors, si la lumiere qui par eux s'écoule en nostre ame est obscurcie au passage, nous n'auons plus que tenir.

De cette extreme difficulté sont nées toutes ces fantasies: que chaque subiect a en soy tout ce que nous y trouuons: qu'il n'a rien de ce que nous y pensons trouuer: et celle des Epicuriens, que le soleil n'est non plus grand que ce que nostre veuë le iuge: Quicquid id est, nihilo fertur maiore figura, Quàm, nostris oculis quam cernimus, esse videtur: que les apparences, qui representent vn corps grand, à celuy qui en est voisin, et plus petit, à celuy qui en est esloigné, sont toutes deux vrayes: Nec tamen hic oculos falli concedimus hilum;
Proinde animi vitium hoc oculis adfingere noli: et resolument qu'il n'y a aucune tromperie aux sens: qu'il faut passer à leur mercy, et chercher ailleurs des raisons pour excuser la difference et contradiction que nous y trouuons.

ENGLISH

them, and lead the stag, the elephant and the snake to know a certain herb fit to heal them.

There is no sense that does not hold great sway, and that does not bring us, by its means, an infinite number of pieces of knowledge. If we lacked the understanding of sounds, of harmony and of the voice, it would bring unimaginable confusion into all the rest of our knowledge. For besides what is bound up with the proper effect of each sense, how many arguments, inferences and conclusions do we draw about other things by comparing one sense with another?

Let an intelligent man imagine human nature produced originally without sight. Let him work out how much ignorance and confusion such a lack would bring it, how much darkness and blindness in our soul. From that we shall see how much it matters to our knowledge of the truth to be deprived of another such sense, or of two, or of three, if we are. We have formed a truth by the consultation and concurrence of our five senses. But perhaps it would take the agreement and contribution of eight or ten senses to perceive it with certainty and in its essence.

The sects that attack human knowledge attack it chiefly through the uncertainty and weakness of our senses. For all knowledge comes into us by their agency and means. So if they fail in the report they give us, if they corrupt or alter what they carry in to us from outside, if the light that flows through them into our soul is darkened on the way, we have nothing left to hold on to.

From this extreme difficulty have arisen all these notions: that each object has in itself everything we find in it; that it has nothing of what we think we find in it; and the notion of the Epicureans, that the sun is no bigger than our sight judges it to be: Whatever it is, it moves with no greater shape
Than it seems to have to our eyes that see it: that the appearances that show a body as large to someone near it, and as smaller to someone far from it, are both true: Yet we do not grant that the eyes are deceived one whit;
So do not pin this fault of the mind on the eyes: and, resolutely, that there is no deception at all in the senses; that we must put ourselves at their mercy, and look elsewhere for reasons to excuse the difference and contradiction we find in them.

FRENCH

2.12.244 Voyre inuenter toute autre mensonge et resuerie (ils en viennent iusques là) plustost que d'accuser les sens. Timagoras iuroit, que pour presser ou biaiser son œuil, il n'auoit iamais apperceu doubler la lumiere de la chandelle: et que cette semblance venoit du vice de l'opinion, non de l'instrument. De toutes les absurditez la plus absurde aux Epicuriens, est, desauoüer la force et l'effect des sens. Proinde quod in quoque est his visum tempore, verum est.

/ Et, si non potuit ratio dissoluere causam,
Cur ea quæ fuerint iuxtim quadrata, procul sint
Visa rotunda: tamen præstat rationis egentem
Reddere mendosè causas vtriusque figuræ,
Quàm manibus manifesta suis emittere quæquam,
Et violare fidem primam, et conuellere tota
Fundamenta, quibus nixatur vita salúsque.

/ Non modò enim ratio ruat omnis, vita quoque ipsa
Concidat extemplo, nisi credere sensibus ausis, Præcipitésque locos vitare, et cætera quæ sint
In genere hoc fugienda. Ce conseil desesperé et si peu philosophique, ne represente autre chose, sinon que l'humaine science ne se peut maintenir que par raison des-raisonnable, folle et forcenée: mais qu'encore vaut-il mieux, que l'homme, pour se faire valoir, s'en serue, et de tout autre remede, tant fantastique soit-il, que d'aduoüer sa necessaire bestise: verité si desaduantageuse. Il ne peut fuïr, que les sens ne soyent les souuerains maistres de sa cognoissance: mais ils sont incertains et falsifiables à toutes circonstances.

C'est-là, où il faut battre à outrance: et, si les forces iustes nous faillent, comme elles font, y employer l'opiniastreté, la temerité, l'impudence. Au cas, que ce que disent les Epicuriens soit vray, à sçauoir, que nous n'auons pas de science, si les apparences des sens sont fauces: et ce que disent les Stoïciens, s'il est aussi vray, que les apparences des sens sont si fauces qu'elles ne nous peuuent produire aucune science: nous concluerons aux despens de ces deux grandes sectes dogmatistes, qu'il n'y a point de science.

2.12.245 Quant à l'erreur et incertitude de l'operation des sens, chacun s'en peut fournir autant d'exemples qu'il luy

ENGLISH

Indeed, they would invent any other lie or fantasy whatever (they go that far) rather than accuse the senses. Timagoras swore that, however he pressed or twisted his eye, he had never seen the candle's light double, and that this appearance came from a fault of opinion, not of the instrument. Of all absurdities, the most absurd for the Epicureans is to deny the force and effect of the senses. Therefore whatever is seen by them at any time is true.[196]

/ And if reason cannot unravel the cause
Why things that were square close at hand
Seem round from afar, still it is better, for want of reason,
To give faulty causes for each of the two shapes
Than to let slip from our hands things plain to see,
And violate our first trust, and tear up all
The foundations on which life and safety rest.

/ For not only would all reason collapse; life itself
Would fall at once, unless you dared to trust the senses
And shun steep places and the other things
Of this kind that must be avoided. This desperate and so unphilosophical advice amounts to nothing but this: that human knowledge can only maintain itself by unreasonable, mad and frenzied reason. But even so, it is better for man, in order to make himself count for something, to use that reason, and any other remedy however fantastic, than to admit his necessary stupidity—a truth so much to his disadvantage. He cannot escape the fact that the senses are the sovereign masters of his knowledge; but they are uncertain and open to falsification in every circumstance.

That is the point where we must strike with all our might, and, if legitimate strength fails us, as it does, bring in stubbornness, rashness and impudence. Suppose what the Epicureans say is true, namely that we have no knowledge if the appearances of the senses are false; and suppose what the Stoics say is also true, that the appearances of the senses are so false that they cannot produce any knowledge for us. Then we shall conclude, at the expense of these two great dogmatist sects, that there is no knowledge.

As for the error and uncertainty in the working of the senses, anyone can furnish himself with as 196 Timagoras: an Epicurean philosopher mentioned by Cicero in the Academica.

FRENCH

plaira: tant les faultes et tromperies qu'ils nous font, sont ordinaires. Au retentir d'vn valon, le son d'vne trompette semble venir deuant nous, qui vient d'vne lieuë derriere.
Extantésque procul medio de gurgite montes,
Ïidem apparent, longè diuersi licet.
Et fugere ad puppim colles campique videntur
Quos agimus propter nauim.

/ Vbi in medio nobis equus acer obhæsit
Flumine, equi corpus transuersum ferre videtur
Vis, et in aduersum flumen contrudere raptim. A manier vne balle d'arquebuse, soubs le second doigt, celuy du milieu estant entrelassé par dessus, il faut extremement se contraindre, pour aduoüer, qu'il n'y en ait qu'vne, tant le sens nous en represente deux. Car que les sens soyent maintesfois maistres du discours, et le contraignent de receuoir des impressions qu'il sçait et iuge estre faulces, il se void à tous coups.

Ie laisse à part celuy de l'attouchement, qui a ses functions plus voisines, plus viues et substantielles, qui renuerse tant de fois par l'effect de la douleur qu'il apporte au corps, toutes ces belles resolutions Stoïques, et contraint de crier au ventre, celuy qui a estably en son ame ce dogme auec toute resolution, que la colique, comme toute autre maladie et douleur, est chose indifferente, n'ayant la force de rien rabbattre du souuerain bon-heur et felicité, en laquelle le sage est logé par sa vertu.

Il n'est cœur si mol, que le son de nos tabourins et de nos trompettes n'eschauffe, ny si dur que la douceur de la musique n'esueille et ne chatouille: ny ame si reuesche, qui ne se sente touchée de quelque reuerence, à considerer cette vastité sombre de noz eglises, la diuersité d'ornemens, et ordre de noz ceremonies, et ouyr le son deuotieux de noz orgues, et l'harmonie si posée, et religieuse de noz voix. Ceux mesme qui y entrent auec mespris, sentent quelque frisson dans le cœur, et quelque horreur, qui les met en deffiance de leur opinion.

Quant à moy, ie ne m'estime point assez fort, pour ouyr en sens rassis, des vers d'Horace, et de Catulle, chantez d'vne voix suffisante, par vne belle et ieune bouche. Et Zenon auoit raison de dire, que la voix estoit la fleur de la beauté. On m'a voulu faire accroire, qu'vn homme que many examples as he likes, so common are the faults and deceptions they practice on us. When a valley echoes, the sound of a trumpet seems to come from in front of us when it comes from a league behind. And mountains rising far off from the middle of the sea Appear as one, though they are far apart.

ENGLISH

And the hills and plains seem to flee toward the stern
As we drive our ship past them.

/ When our spirited horse has stuck fast in mid-stream,
A force seems to carry the horse's body sideways
And to thrust it swiftly upstream. If you handle an arquebus ball under your forefinger, with the middle finger crossed over it, you have to strain yourself extremely to admit that there is only one, so strongly does the sense show us two. For that the senses are often masters of our reasoning, and force it to receive impressions it knows and judges to be false, is seen at every turn.

I leave aside the sense of touch, whose functions are closer, more lively and substantial. By the effect of the pain it brings the body it so often overturns all those fine Stoic resolutions. It forces a man to cry out over his belly—a man who has established in his soul, with all resolution, the dogma that colic, like every other illness and pain, is a matter of indifference, having no power to diminish in any way the sovereign happiness and felicity in which the wise man is lodged by his virtue.

There is no heart so soft that the sound of our drums and trumpets does not fire it, nor so hard that the sweetness of music does not rouse and tickle it. There is no soul so crabbed that it does not feel touched by some reverence as it considers the dark vastness of our churches, the variety of ornaments and the order of our ceremonies, and hears the devout sound of our organs and the so composed and religious harmony of our voices. Even those who enter with contempt feel a certain shiver in the heart, and a certain awe, which makes them distrust their own opinion.

As for me, I do not reckon myself strong enough to hear verses of Horace and Catullus sung in an accomplished voice by a lovely young mouth and keep a level head. And Zeno was right to say that the voice was the flower of beauty. Someone once tous nous autres François cognoissons, m'auoit imposé, en me recitant des vers, qu'il auoit faicts: qu'ils n'estoyent pas tels sur le papier, qu'en l'air: et que mes yeux en feroyent contraire iugement à mes oreilles: tant la prononciation a de credit à donner prix et façon aux ouurages, qui passent à sa mercy.

FRENCH

Surquoy Philoxenus ne fut pas fascheux, en ce, qu'oyant vn, donner mauuais ton à quelque sienne composition, il se print à fouler aux pieds, et casser de la brique, qui estoit à luy: disant, Ie romps ce qui est à toy, comme tu corromps ce qui est à moy. A quoy faire, ceux mesmes qui se sont donnez la mort d'vne certaine resolution, destournoyent-ils la face, pour ne voir le coup qu'ils se faisoyent donner? et ceux qui pour leur santé desirent et commandent qu'on les incise et cauterise, ne peuuent soustenir la veuë des apprests, vtils et operation du chirurgien, attendu que la veuë ne doit auoir aucune participation à cette douleur?

Cela ne sont ce pas propres exemples à verifier l'authorité que les sens ont sur le discours? Nous auons beau sçauoir que ces tresses sont empruntées d'vn page ou d'vn lacquais: que cette rougeur est venue d'Espaigne, et cette blancheur et polisseure, de la mer Oceane: encore faut-il que la veuë nous force d'en trouuer le subject plus aimable et plus agreable, contre toute raison. Car en cela il n'y a rien du sien. Auferimur cultu, gemmis: auróque teguntur / Crimina, pars minima est ipsa puella sui.

/ Sæpe vbi sit quod ames inter tam multa requiras:
Decipit hac oculos ægide, diues amor. Combien donnent à la force des sens les poëtes, qui font Narcisse esperdu de l'amour de son ombre: Cunctáque miratur, quibus est mirabilis ipse;
Se cupit imprudens; et qui probat, ipse probatur;
Dûmque petit, petitur: paritérque accendit et ardent: et l'entendement de Pygmalion si troublé par l'impression de la veuë de sa statue d'iuoire, qu'il l'aime et la serue pour viue:
Oscula dat reddique putat, sequitúrque tenétque,
Et credit tactis digitos infidere membris,
Et metuit pressos veniat ne liuor in artus.

ENGLISH

tried to make me believe that a man whom all of us French know had taken me in by reciting to me verses he had written; that they were not the same on paper as in the air; and that my eyes would judge them otherwise than my ears had. So much credit has delivery in giving value and shape to the works that pass into its hands.

On which point Philoxenus was not being unreasonable when, hearing someone give a bad tone to one of his compositions, he began trampling and breaking some bricks that belonged to the man, saying: "I am breaking what is yours, as you are spoiling what is mine." Why did even those who put themselves to death with firm resolution turn their faces away so as not to see the blow they were having dealt them? And why can those who for their health desire and order that they be cut and cauterized not bear the sight of the surgeon's preparations, instruments and operation, given that sight is to have no share in that pain?[197]

Are these not apt examples to prove the authority the senses have over reasoning? It is no use our knowing that these tresses were borrowed from a page or a lackey, that this rosiness came from Spain, and this whiteness and smoothness from the Ocean sea: our sight still forces us to find their owner more lovable and more pleasing, against all reason. For in all this there is nothing of her own. We are carried away by finery; gems and gold cover / Faults; the girl herself is the smallest part of herself.

/ Often you must search, amid so much, for where the thing you love is:
With this aegis rich Love deceives the eyes. How much the poets grant to the power of the senses when they make Narcissus distraught with love for his reflection: He admires everything for which he himself is admired;
Unwittingly he desires himself; he who approves is himself approved;
While he seeks, he is sought; he kindles and burns at once: and Pygmalion's understanding so disturbed by the impression the sight of his ivory statue makes on him that he loves it and serves it as if it were alive: He gives it kisses and thinks they are returned; he pursues it and holds it,
And believes his fingers sink into the limbs he 197 Philoxenus: Greek dithyrambic poet (c. 435–380 BC).

FRENCH

ENGLISH

touches,
And fears a bruise may appear on the limbs he presses.

2.12.246 Qu'on loge vn philosophe dans vne cage de menus filets de fer clair-semez, qui soit suspendue au hault des tours nostre Dame de Paris; il verra par raison euidente, qu'il est impossible qu'il en tombe; et si ne se sçauroit garder, s'il n'a accoustumé le mestier des couureurs, que la veuë de cette haulteur extreme, ne l'espouuante et ne le transisse. Car nous auons assez affaire de nous asseurer aux galeries, qui sont en nos clochers, si elles sont façonnées à iour, encores qu'elles soyent de pierre. Il y en a qui n'en peuuent pas seulement porter la pensée.

Put a philosopher in a cage made of thin, widely spaced iron bars, and hang it from the top of the towers of Notre-Dame in Paris. He will see by evident reason that it is impossible for him to fall out of it; and yet, unless he is used to the roofer's trade, he could not keep the sight of that extreme height from terrifying and paralyzing him. For we have quite enough trouble feeling safe in the galleries of our bell towers if they are of openwork, even though they are made of stone. There are some who cannot even bear the thought of it.

Qu'on iette vne poultre entre ces deux tours d'vne grosseur telle qu'il nous la faut à nous promener dessus, il n'y a sagesse philosophique de si grande fermeté, qui puisse nous donner courage d'y marcher, comme nous ferions si elle estoit à terre. I'ay souuent essayé cela, en noz montaignes de deça, et si suis de ceux qui ne s'effrayent que mediocrement de telles choses, que ie ne pouuoy souffrir la veuë de cette profondeur infinie, sans horreur et tremblement de iarrets et de cuisses, encores qu'il s'en fallust bien ma longueur, que ie ne fusse du tout au bord, et n'eusse sçeu choir, si ie ne me fusse porté à escient au danger.

Lay a beam between those two towers, as wide as we need to walk on it: there is no philosophical wisdom so firm that it could give us the courage to walk along it as we would if it were on the ground. I have often tried this in our mountains hereabouts. And yet, though I am one of those who are only moderately frightened by such things, I could not bear the sight of that infinite depth without horror and trembling in my hams and thighs—even though I was a good full body's length from the very edge, and could not have fallen unless I had deliberately put myself in danger.

I'y remarquay aussi, quelque haulteur qu'il y eust, pourueu qu'en cette pente il s'y presentast vn arbre, ou bosse de rocher, pour soustenir vn peu la veuë, et la diuiser, que cela nous allege et donne asseurance; comme si c'estoit chose dequoy à la cheute nous peussions receuoir secours: mais que les precipices coupez et vniz, nous ne les pouuons pas seulement regarder sans tournoyement de teste: vt despici sine vertigine simul oculornm animique non possit: qui est vne euidente imposture de la veuë. Ce fut pourquoy ce beau philosophe se creua les yeux, pour descharger l'ame de la desbauche qu'elle en receuoit, et pouuoir philosopher plus en liberté.

I also noticed there that, however great the height, provided some tree or jutting rock appeared on the slope to support the eye a little and break up the view, this relieves us and gives us confidence, as if it were something that could help us when we fell. But sheer, smooth precipices we cannot even look at without our heads spinning: so that one cannot look down without dizziness of eyes and mind alike: which is an evident imposture of sight. That was why that fine philosopher put out his eyes: to free his soul of the debauchery it received from them, and to be able to philosophize more freely.[198]

Mais à ce comte, il se deuoit aussi faire estoupper les oreilles, que Theophrastus dit estre le plus dangereux instrument que nous ayons pour receuoir des impressions violentes à nous troubler et changer; et se deuoit priuer en fin de tous les autres sens; c'est à dire de son estre et de sa vie. Car ils ont tous cette puissance, de commander nostre discours et nostre ame. Fit etiam sæpe

But by that reckoning he should also have had his ears stopped, which Theophrastus says are the most dangerous instrument we have for receiving violent impressions that disturb and change us; and in the end he should have deprived himself of all the other senses too—that is to say, of his being and his life. For they all have this power of com-

198 The Latin is from Livy. The philosopher is Democritus, who according to legend blinded himself to think more freely.

FRENCH

specie quadam, sæpe vocum grauitate et cantibus, vt pellantur animi vehementius: sæpe etiam cura et timore. Les medecins tiennent, qu'il y a certaines complexions, qui s'agitent par aucuns sons et instrumens iusques à la fureur.

I'en ay veu, qui ne pouuoient ouyr ronger vn os soubs leur table sans perdre patience: et n'est guere homme, qui ne se trouble à ce bruit aigre et poignant, que font les limes en raclant le fer: comme à ouyr mascher pres de nous, ou ouyr parler quelqu'vn, qui ayt le passage du gosier ou du nez empesché, plusieurs s'en esmeuuent, iusques à la colere et la haine. Ce flusteur protocole de Gracchus, qui amollissoit, roidissoit, et contournoit la voix de son maistre, lors qu'il haranguoit à Rome, à quoy seruoit il, si le mouuement et qualité du son, n'auoit force à esmouuoir et alterer le iugement des auditeurs?

Vrayement il y a bien dequoy faire si grande feste de la fermeté de cette belle piece, qui se laisse manier et changer au bransle et accidens d'vn si leger vent.

ENGLISH

manding our reasoning and our soul. It also often happens that minds are stirred more powerfully by some sight, often by the gravity of voices and by songs; often too by care and fear. Physicians hold that there are certain constitutions which are agitated to the point of frenzy by certain sounds and instruments.[199]

I have seen people who could not hear a bone being gnawed under their table without losing patience. And there is hardly a man who is not upset by that sharp, piercing noise files make when they scrape iron; just as, on hearing someone chew near us, or hearing someone talk whose throat or nose is blocked, many people are moved to anger and hatred. That flute-player who prompted Gracchus, who softened, stiffened and modulated his master's voice when he was haranguing in Rome—what was he for, if the movement and quality of sound had no power to move and alter the judgment of the listeners?[200]

Truly, there is good reason to make such a fuss about the firmness of this fine piece of work, which lets itself be handled and changed by the motion and chance gusts of so light a wind.

WAKING AND DREAMING

Passions alter what we perceive, and our waking may be another kind of sleep.

FRENCH

2.12.247 Cette mesme pipperie, que les sens apportent à nostre entendement, ils la reçoiuent à leur tour. Nostre ame par fois s'en reuenche de mesme, ils mentent, et se trompent à l'enuy. Ce que nous voyons et oyons agitez de colere, nous ne l'oyons pas tel qu'il est. Et solem geminum, et duplices se ostendere Thebas. L'obiect que nous aymons, nous semble plus beau qu'il n'est: Multimodis igitur prauas turpésque videmus / Esse in deliciis, summóque in honore vigere: et plus laid celuy que nous auons à contre-cœur. A vn homme ennuyé et affligé, la clarté du iour semble obscurcie et tenebreuse. Noz sens sont non seulement alterez, mais souuent hebetez du tout, par les passions de l'ame.

Combien de choses voyons nous, que nous n'apperceuons pas, si nous auons nostre esprit empesché ailleurs? In

ENGLISH

This same cheating that the senses bring to our understanding, they receive in their turn. Our soul sometimes takes its revenge in the same way: they vie with each other in lying and deceiving. What we see and hear when stirred by anger, we do not hear as it is. And the sun appears double, and Thebes twofold. The object we love seems to us more beautiful than it is: So we see women misshapen and ugly in many ways / Being adored and flourishing in the highest honor: and the one we dislike seems uglier. To a man in grief and affliction, the light of day seems dimmed and dark. Our senses are not only altered but often utterly dulled by the passions of the soul.[201]

How many things do we see that we do not notice, if our mind is busy elsewhere? Even in things

199 Theophrastus (c. 371–287 BC), Aristotle's successor as head of his school. The Latin is from Cicero, On Divination.
200 Gaius Gracchus, Roman tribune (2nd century BC), kept a flute-player behind him to give him the pitch while he spoke, as Plutarch reports.

FRENCH

rebus quoque apertis noscere possis,
Si non aduertas animum, proinde esse, quasi omni
Tempore semotæ fuerint, longéque remotæ. Il semble que l'ame retire au dedans, et amuse les puissances des sens. Par ainsin et le dedans et le dehors de l'homme est plein de foiblesse et de mensonge.

2.12.248 Ceux qui ont apparié nostre vie à vn songe, ont eu de la raison, à l'aduanture plus qu'ils ne pensoyent. Quand nous songeons, nostre ame vit, agit, exerce toutes ses facultez, ne plus ne moins que quand elle veille; mais si plus mollement et obscurement; non de tant certes, que la difference y soit, comme de la nuict à vne clarté vifue: ouy, comme de la nuict à l'ombre: là elle dort, icy elle sommeille: plus et moins; ce sont tousiours tenebres, et tenebres Cymmeriennes. Nous veillons dormants, et veillants dormons. Ie ne voy pas si clair dans le sommeil: mais quant au veiller, ie ne le trouue iamais assez pur et sans nuage.

Encore le sommeil en sa profondeur, endort par fois les songes: mais nostre veiller n'est iamais si esueillé, qu'il purge et dissipe bien à poinct les resueries, qui sont les songes des veillants, et pires que songes. Nostre raison et nostre ame receuant les fantasies et opinions, qui luy nayssent en dormant, et authorizant les actions de noz songes de pareille approbation, qu'elle fait celles du iour: pourquoy ne mettons nous en doubte, si nostre penser, nostre agir, est pas vn autre songer, et nostre veiller, quelque espece de dormir?

ENGLISH

plainly in view you can perceive
That, if you do not turn your mind to them, it is as if They had been all the time apart and far removed. It seems that the soul draws the powers of the senses inward and keeps them occupied. Thus both the inside and the outside of man are full of weakness and falsehood.

Those who have likened our life to a dream were right—perhaps more than they thought. When we dream, our soul lives, acts and exercises all its faculties neither more nor less than when it is awake. If it does so more softly and dimly, it is certainly not by so much that the difference is like that between night and bright daylight—rather, like that between night and shade. There it sleeps, here it dozes: more and less; it is always darkness, and Cimmerian darkness. We wake sleeping, and waking sleep. I do not see so clearly in sleep; but as for waking, I never find it pure and cloudless enough.[202]

Sleep, in its depths, even puts dreams to sleep at times; but our waking is never so wide awake that it properly purges and dispels the reveries, which are the dreams of the waking, and worse than dreams. Our reason and our soul accept the notions and opinions that arise in them while sleeping, and authorize the actions of our dreams with the same approval they give to those of the day. Why, then, do we not call in doubt whether our thinking and our acting are not another kind of dreaming, and our waking some kind of sleep?

ANIMALS AND THE SENSES

Beasts perceive differently from us, so we cannot know which perception is true.

FRENCH

2.12.249 Si les sens sont noz premiers iuges, ce ne sont pas les nostres qu'il faut seuls appeller au conseil: car en cette faculté, les animaux ont autant ou plus de droit que nous. Il est certain qu'aucuns ont l'ouye plus aigue que l'homme, d'autres la veue, d'autres le sentiment, d'autres l'attouchement ou le goust. Democritus disoit que les Dieux et les bestes auoyent les facultez sensitiues beaucoup plus parfaictes que l'homme. Or entre les effects de leurs sens, et les nostres, la difference est extreme. Nostre saliue nettoye et asseche noz playes, elle

ENGLISH

If the senses are our first judges, it is not ours alone that we must call into council; for in this faculty animals have as much right as we have, or more. It is certain that some have keener hearing than man, others keener sight, others keener smell, others keener touch or taste. Democritus said that the gods and the beasts had far more perfect sensory faculties than man. Now between the effects of their senses and ours the difference is 201 The first Latin line is from Virgil, Aeneid, describing the madness of Pentheus.

202 In Homer's Odyssey the Cimmerians live in perpetual mist and darkness at the edge of the world.

FRENCH

tue le serpent. Tantáque in his rebus distantia differitásque est, / Vt quod aliis cibus est, aliis fuat acre venenum.

/ Sæpe etenim serpens, hominis contacta saliua, / Disperit, ac sese mandendo conficit ipsa. Quelle qualité donnerons nous à la saliue, ou selon nous, ou selon le serpent? Par quel des deux sens verifierons nous sa veritable essence que nous cherchons? Pline dit qu'il y a aux Indes certains lieures marins, qui nous sont poison, et nous à eux: de maniere que du seul attouchement nous les tuons. Qui sera veritablement poison, ou l'homme, ou le poisson? à qui en croirons nous, ou au poisson de l'homme, ou à l'homme du poisson? Quelque qualité d'air infecte l'homme qui ne nuit point au bœuf; quelque autre le bœuf, qui ne nuit point à l'homme; laquelle des deux sera en verité et en nature pestilente qualité?

Ceux qui ont la iaunisse, ils voyent toutes choses iaunastres et plus pasles que nous: Lurida præterea fiunt quæcunque tuentur / Arquati. Ceux qui ont cette maladie que les medecins nomment Hyposphragma, qui est vne suffusion de sang soubs la peau, voient toutes choses rouges et sanglantes. Ces humeurs, qui changent ainsi les operations de nostre veuë, que sçauons nous si elles predominent aux bestes, et leur sont ordinaires? Car nous en voyons les vnes, qui ont les yeux iaunes, comme noz malades de iaunisse, d'autres qui les ont sanglans de rougeur: à celles là, il est vray-semblable, que la couleur des obiects paroist autre qu'à nous: quel iugement des deux sera le vray?

Car il n'est pas dict, que l'essence des choses, se rapporte à l'homme seul. La dureté, la blancheur, la profondeur, et l'aigreur, touchent le seruice et science des animaux, comme la nostre: Nature leur en a donné l'vsage comme à nous. Quand nous pressons l'œil, les corps que nous regardons, nous les apperceuons plus longs et estendus: plusieurs bestes ont l'œil ainsi pressé: cette longueur est donc à l'aduanture la veritable forme de ce corps, non pas celle que noz yeux luy donnent en leur assiette ordinaire.

Si nous serrons l'œil par dessoubs, les choses nous semblent doubles: Bina lucernarum florentia lumina flammis, / Et duplices hominum facies, et corpora bina. Si nous auons les oreilles empeschées de quelque chose, ou le passage de l'ouye resserré, nous receuons le son autre, que nous ne faisons ordinairement: les animaux qui ont extreme. Our saliva cleans and dries our wounds; it kills the snake. And so great is the distance and difference in these things / That what is food for some is bitter poison for others.

ENGLISH

/ For often a snake, touched by human saliva, / Perishes and destroys itself by biting itself. What quality shall we assign to saliva—the one it has for us, or the one it has for the snake? By which of the two senses shall we verify the true essence we are looking for? Pliny says that in the Indies there are certain sea hares that are poison to us, and we to them, so that we kill them by a mere touch. Which will truly be poison, the man or the fish? Whom shall we believe, the fish about the man, or the man about the fish? Some quality of the air infects man that does no harm to the ox; some other infects the ox that does no harm to man. Which of the two will be, in truth and in nature, a pestilent quality?

Those who have jaundice see everything as yellowish and paler than we do: Besides, whatever the jaundiced look at / Turns sallow. Those who have the illness physicians call hyposphragma, which is an effusion of blood under the skin, see everything as red and bloody. These humors that thus change the workings of our sight—how do we know whether they predominate in animals and are normal for them? For we see some that have yellow eyes, like our jaundice patients, and others that have them bloodshot with redness. To these it is likely that the color of objects appears different from what it is to us. Which of the two judgments will be the true one?

For it is nowhere laid down that the essence of things relates to man alone. Hardness, whiteness, depth and sourness concern the use and knowledge of animals as they do ours: Nature has given them the use of these as she has given it to us. When we press on the eye, we perceive the bodies we look at as longer and stretched out. Many beasts have their eyes pressed like that; so this length is perhaps the true form of that body, not the one our eyes give it in their ordinary position.

If we squeeze the eye from below, things seem double to us: The lamps' flowering lights with twin flames, / And men's faces double, and bodies twofold. If our ears are blocked by something, or the passage of hearing is narrowed, we receive sound differently from usual. Animals that have hairy ears, or les oreilles velues, ou qui n'ont qu'vn bien petit trou au lieu de l'oreille, ils n'oyent par consequent pas ce que nous oyons, et reçoiuent le son autre.

FRENCH

Nous voyons aux festes et aux theatres, qu'opposant à la lumiere des flambeaux, vne vitre teinte de quelque couleur, tout ce qui est en ce lieu, nous appert ou vert, ou iaune, ou violet: Et vulgò faciunt id lutea russáque vela,
Et ferrugina, cùm, magnis intenta theatris,
Per malos volgata trabésque trementia pendent:
Namque ibi consessum caueai subter, et omnem
Scenai speciem, patrum, matrúmque, deroúmque
Inficiunt, cogùntque suo volitare colore. Il est vray-semblable que les yeux des animaux, que nous voyons estre de diuerse couleur, leur produisent les apparences des corps de mesmes leurs yeux.

2.12.250 Pour le iugement de l'operation des sens, il faudroit donc que nous en fussions premierement d'accord auec les bestes, secondement entre nous mesmes. Ce que nous ne sommes aucunement: et entrons en debat tous les coups de ce que l'vn oyt, void, ou gouste, quelque chose autrement qu'vn autre: et debattons autant que d'autre chose, de la diuersité des images que les sens nous rapportent. Autrement oit, et voit par la regle ordinaire de nature, et autrement gouste, vn enfant qu'vn homme de trente ans: et cettuy-cy autrement qu'vn sexagenaire. Les sens sont aux vns plus obscurs et plus sombres, aux autres plus ouuerts et plus aigus. Nous receuons les choses autres et autres selon que nous sommes, et qu'il nous semble.

Or nostre sembler estant si incertain et controuersé, ce n'est plus miracle, si on nous dit, que nous pouuons auouër que la neige nous apparoist blanche, mais que d'establir si de son essence elle est telle, et à la verité, nous ne nous en sçaurions respondre: et ce commencement esbranlé, toute la science du monde s'en va necessairement à vau-l'eau. Quoy, que noz sens mesmes s'entr'empeschent l'vn l'autre? vne peinture semble esleuée à la veue, au maniement elle semble plate: dirons nous que le musque soit aggreable ou non, qui resiouit nostre sentiment, et offence nostre goust?

Il y a des herbes et des vnguens propres à vne partie du corps, qui en blessent vne autre: le miel est plaisant au goust, mal plaisant à la veue. Ces bagues qui sont entaillées en forme de plumes, qu'on appelle en deuise, pennes sans fin, il n'y a œil qui en puisse discerner la have only a tiny hole instead of an ear, consequently do not hear what we hear, and receive sound differently.

ENGLISH

We see at festivals and in theaters that when a pane of glass tinted some color is placed before the light of the torches, everything in the place appears to us green, or yellow, or violet: And yellow, red and dark purple awnings commonly do this,
When, stretched over great theaters,
Spread across masts and beams, they hang quivering:
For there they stain the seated crowd below in the tiers,
And the whole show of the stage, the senators, the matrons, the gods,
And make them flutter in their own color. It is likely that the eyes of animals, which we see to be of various colors, produce for them appearances of bodies in the same color as their eyes.

To judge the working of the senses, then, we would first have to agree about it with the beasts, and second among ourselves. This we do not do at all. We fall into dispute every time one person hears, sees or tastes something differently from another, and we argue about the diversity of the images the senses bring us as much as about anything else. By the ordinary rule of nature a child hears, sees and tastes otherwise than a man of thirty, and he otherwise than a man of sixty. In some people the senses are duller and darker, in others more open and keener. We receive things differently, and differently again, according to what we are and how they seem to us.

Now since our seeming is so uncertain and disputed, it is no longer a wonder if we are told that we may admit that snow appears white to us, but that as to establishing whether it is so in its essence and in truth, we could not vouch for it. And with this starting point shaken, all the knowledge in the world is necessarily swept away downstream. What of the fact that our senses themselves get in each other's way? A painting seems raised to the eye; to the touch it seems flat. Shall we say that musk is pleasant or not, when it delights our smell and offends our taste?

There are herbs and ointments good for one part of the body that injure another. Honey is pleasant to the taste, unpleasant to the sight. Those rings carved in the form of feathers, which in the language of devices are called "endless feathers":

FRENCH

largeur, et qui se sçeust deffendre de cette pipperie, que d'vn costé elle n'aille en eslargissant, et s'appointant et estressissant par l'autre, mesmes quand on la roulle autour du doigt: toutesfois au maniement elle vous semble equable en largeur et par tout pareille.

Ces personnes qui pour aider leur volupté, se seruoyent anciennement de miroirs, propres à grossir et aggrandir l'obiect qu'ils representent, affin que les membres qu'ils auoient à embesongner, leur pleussent d'auantage par cette accroissance oculaire: auquel des deux sens donnoient-ils gaigné, ou à la veue qui leur representoit ces membres gros et grands à souhait, ou à l'attouchement qui les leur presentoit petits et desdaignables? Sont-ce nos sens qui prestent au subject ces diuerses conditions, et que les subjects n'en ayent pourtant qu'vne?

Comme nous voyons du pain que nous mangeons; ce n'est que pain, mais nostre vsage en fait des os, du sang, de la chair, des poils, et des ongles: Vt cibus, in membra atque artus cùm diditur omnes, / Disperit, atque aliam naturam sufficit ex se. L'humeur que succe la racine d'vn arbre, elle se fait tronc, feuille et fruict: l'air n'estant qu'vn, il se fait par l'application à vne trompette, diuers en mille sortes de sons. Sont-ce, dis-ie, noz sens qui façonnent de mesme, de diuerses qualitez ces subjects; ou s'ils les ont telles? Et sur ce doubte, que pouuons nous resoudre de leur veritable essence?

D'auantage puis que les accidens des maladies, de la resuerie, ou du sommeil, nous font paroistre les choses autres, qu'elles ne paroissent aux sains, aux sages, et à ceux qui veillent: n'est-il pas vray-semblable que nostre assiette droicte, et noz humeurs naturelles, ont aussi dequoy donner vn estre aux choses, se rapportant à leur condition, et les accommoder à soy, comme font les humeurs desreglées: et nostre santé aussi capable de leur fournir son visage, comme la maladie? Pourquoy n'a le temperé quelque forme des obiects relatiue à soy, comme l'intemperé: et ne leur imprimera-il pareillement son charactere? Le desgousté charge la fadeur au vin; le sain la saueur; l'alteré la friandise.

ENGLISH

there is no eye that can make out their width, and that could defend itself against the illusion that the ring widens on one side and narrows to a point on the other, even when you turn it around your finger. Yet to the touch it seems to you of even width and the same all around.[203]

Those people who in ancient times, to aid their pleasure, used mirrors designed to swell and enlarge the object they reflected, so that the members they had to put to work might please them more through this increase to the eye: to which of the two senses did they award the victory? To sight, which showed them those members as big and large as they could wish, or to touch, which presented them as small and contemptible? Is it our senses that lend the object these various conditions, while the objects nevertheless have only one?[204]

It is as we see with the bread we eat: it is only bread, but our use of it makes it into bones, blood, flesh, hair and nails: As food, when distributed into all the limbs and members, / Perishes and supplies from itself another nature. The sap that the root of a tree sucks up becomes trunk, leaf and fruit; and air, though it is one, becomes, when applied to a trumpet, varied into a thousand kinds of sounds. Is it, I say, our senses that likewise fashion these objects with various qualities, or do the objects really have them? And in this doubt, what can we decide about their true essence?

Moreover, the accidents of illness, of delirium or of sleep make things appear to us otherwise than they appear to the healthy, the wise and the waking. Is it not likely, then, that our upright condition and our natural humors also have the means to give things a being that corresponds to their own condition, and to adapt them to themselves, as disordered humors do; and that our health is as capable of lending them its own face as illness is? Why should the temperate man not have some form of objects relative to himself, as the intemperate man has, and why should he not likewise stamp them with his own character? The man with no appetite blames the wine for being flat; the healthy man credits it with flavor; the thirsty man with deliciousness.

203 A lover's emblem punning on pennes (feathers) and peines (pains): "endless pains."
204 Montaigne has in mind Hostius Quadra, whose mirrors Seneca describes in his Natural Questions.

FRENCH

Or nostre estat accommodant les choses à soy, et les transformant selon soy, nous ne sçauons plus quelles sont les choses en verité, car rien ne vient à nous que falsifié et alteré par noz sens. Où le compas, l'esquarre, et la regle sont gauches, toutes les proportions qui s'en tirent, tous les bastimens qui se dressent à leur mesure, sont aussi necessairement manques et deffaillans. L'incertitude de noz sens rend incertain tout ce qu'ils produisent.

Denique vt in fabrica, si praua est regula prima,
Normáque si fallax rectis regionibus exit,
Et libella aliqua si ex parte claudicat hilum,
Omnia mendosè fieri, atque obstipa necessum est,
Praua, cubantia, prona, supina, atque absona tecta,
Iam ruere vt quædam videantur velle, ruántque
Prodita iudiciis fallacibus omnia primis.
Hic igitur ratio tibi rerum praua necesse est,
Falsáque sit falsis quæcumque à sensibus orta est. Au demeurant, qui sera propre à iuger de ces differences?

Comme nous disons aux debats de la religion, qu'il nous faut vn iuge non attaché à l'vn ny à l'autre party, exempt de choix et d'affection, ce qui ne se peut parmy les Chrestiens: il aduient de mesme en cecy: car s'il est vieil, il ne peut iuger du sentiment de la vieillesse, estant luy mesme partie en ce debat: s'il est ieune, de mesme: sain, de mesme, de mesme malade, dormant, et veillant: il nous faudroit quelqu'vn exempt de toutes ces qualitez, afin que sans præoccupation de iugement, il iugeast de ces propositions, comme à luy indifferentes: et à ce compte il nous faudroit vn iuge qui ne fust pas.

ENGLISH

Now since our condition adapts things to itself and transforms them according to itself, we no longer know what things are in truth; for nothing comes to us except falsified and altered by our senses. Where the compass, the square and the rule are crooked, all the proportions drawn from them, all the buildings put up to their measure, are also necessarily faulty and defective. The uncertainty of our senses makes uncertain everything they produce.

Finally, as in a building, if the first rule is warped,
And if the square is false and departs from straight lines,
And if the level is off in any part the least bit,
Everything must be made faulty and askew,
The roofs warped, leaning, tilting forward and back, out of all proportion,
So that some parts seem about to fall, and do fall,
All betrayed by those first false judgments:
So too your reasoning about things must be warped
And false, whatever springs from false senses. For the rest, who will be fit to judge these differences?

We say in religious disputes that we need a judge attached to neither party, free of preference and affection—which is not possible among Christians. It is the same in this matter. For if he is old, he cannot judge of the perception of old age, being himself a party to the dispute; if he is young, the same; healthy, the same; and the same if he is sick, sleeping or waking. We would need someone free of all these qualities, so that, without prejudgment, he might judge these propositions as matters indifferent to him. And by that reckoning we would need a judge who did not exist.

NO FIRM GROUND

Neither senses nor reason can settle the dispute; everything flows and changes.

FRENCH

2.12.251 Pour iuger des apparences que nous receuons des subjects, il nous faudroit vn instrument iudicatoire: pour verifier cet instrument, il nous y faut de la demonstration: pour verifier la demonstration, vn instrument, nous voila au rouet. Puis que les sens ne peuuent arrester nostre dispute, estans pleins eux-mesmes d'incertitude, il faut que ce soit la raison: aucune raison ne s'establira sans vne autre raison, nous voyla à reculons iusques à l'infiny.

ENGLISH

To judge the appearances we receive from objects, we would need a judging instrument; to verify that instrument, we need demonstration; to verify the demonstration, an instrument: there we are, going around in a circle. Since the senses cannot settle our dispute, being full of uncertainty themselves, it must be reason. But no reason can be established without another reason: there we are, going backward to infinity.

FRENCH

Nostre fantasie ne s'applique pas aux choses estrangeres, ains elle est conceue par l'entremise des sens, et les sens ne comprennent pas le subject estranger, ains seulement leurs propres passions: et par ainsi la fantasie et apparence n'est pas du subject, ains seulement de la passion et souffrance du sens; laquelle passion, et subject, sont choses diuerses: parquoy qui iuge par les apparences, iuge par chose autre que le subject. Et de dire que les passions des sens, rapportent à l'ame, la qualité des subjects estrangers par ressemblance; comment se peut l'ame et l'entendement asseurer de cette ressemblance, n'ayant de soy nul commerce, auec les subjects estrangers? Tout ainsi comme, qui ne cognoist pas Socrates, voyant son pourtraict, ne peut dire qu'il luy ressemble.

Or qui voudroit toutesfois iuger par les apparences: si c'est par toutes, il est impossible, car elles s'entr'empeschent par leurs contrarietez et discrepances, comme nous voyons par experience. Sera ce qu'aucunes apparences choisies reglent les autres? Il faudra verifier cette choisie par vne autre choisie, la seconde par la tierce: et par ainsi ce ne sera iamais faict. Finalement, il n'y a aucune constante existence, ny de nostre estre, ny de celuy des obiects. Et nous, et nostre iugement, et toutes choses mortelles, vont coulant et roulant sans cesse. Ainsin il ne se peut establir rien de certain de l'vn à l'autre, et le iugeant, et le iugé, estans en continuelle mutation et branle.

ENGLISH

Our notion is not applied to external things; rather, it is conceived through the medium of the senses. And the senses do not grasp the external object, but only their own affections. So the notion and appearance is not of the object, but only of the affection and impression received by the sense; and that affection and the object are different things. Therefore whoever judges by appearances judges by something other than the object. And as for saying that the affections of the senses convey to the soul the quality of external objects by resemblance: how can the soul and the understanding be sure of that resemblance, having of themselves no dealings with external objects? Just so, someone who does not know Socrates cannot, on seeing his portrait, say that it resembles him.

Now suppose someone wanted to judge by appearances nevertheless. If by all of them, it is impossible, for they get in each other's way by their contradictions and discrepancies, as we see by experience. Shall it be that some selected appearances govern the others? This selected one will have to be verified by another selected one, the second by a third, and so it will never be done. Finally, there is no constant existence, either of our being or of that of objects. And we, and our judgment, and all mortal things, go flowing and rolling ceaselessly. Thus nothing certain can be established from one to the other, both the judging and the judged being in continual change and motion.

BEING AND PASSING

Only God truly is; man can rise above himself only by God's grace.

FRENCH

2.12.252 Nous n'auons aucune communication à l'estre, par ce que toute humaine nature est tousiours au milieu, entre le naistre et le mourir, ne baillant de soy qu'vne obscure apparence et ombre, et vne incertaine et debile opinion. Et si de fortune vous fichez vostre pensée à vouloir prendre son estre, ce sera ne plus ne moins que qui voudroit empoigner l'eau: car tant plus il serrera et pressera ce qui de sa nature coule par tout, tant plus il perdra ce qu'il vouloit tenir et empoigner.

Ainsi veu que toutes choses sont subjectes à passer d'vn changement en autre, la raison qui y cherche vne reelle

ENGLISH

We have no communication with being, because all human nature is always midway between birth and death, offering of itself only a dim appearance and shadow, and an uncertain and feeble opinion. And if by chance you fix your thought on trying to grasp its being, it will be neither more nor less than if someone tried to grip water: for the more he squeezes and presses what by its nature flows everywhere, the more he will lose what he wanted to hold and grip.[205]

Thus, since all things are subject to pass from one change to another, reason, seeking a real subsubsistance, se trouue deceuë, ne pouuant rien apprehender de subsistant et permanant: par ce que tout ou vient en estre, et n'est pas encore du tout, ou commence à mourir auant qu'il soit nay. Platon disoit que les corps n'auoient iamais existence, ouy bien naissance, estimant qu'Homere eust faict l'Ocean pere des Dieux, et Thetis la mere: pour nous montrer, que toutes choses sont en fluxion, muance et variation perpetuelle. Opinion commune à tous les philosophes auant son temps, comme il dit: sauf le seul Parmenides, qui refusoit mouuement aux choses: de la force duquel il fait grand cas.

FRENCH

Pythagoras, que toute matiere est coulante et labile. Les Stoiciens, qu'il n'y a point de temps present, et que ce que nous appellons present, n'est que la iointure et assemblage du futur et du passé: Heraclitus, que iamais homme n'estoit deux fois entré en mesme riuiere: Epicharmus, que celuy qui a pieça emprunté de l'argent, ne le doit pas maintenant; et que celuy qui cette nuict a esté conuié à venir ce matin disner, vient auiourd'huy non conuié; attendu que ce ne sont plus eux, ils sont deuenus autres: et qu'il ne se pouuoit trouuer vne substance mortelle deux fois en mesme estat: car par soudaineté et legereté de changement, tantost elle dissipe tantost elle rassemble, elle vient, et puis s'en va, de façon, que ce qui commence à naistre, ne paruient iamais iusques à perfection d'estre.

Pourautant que ce naistre n'acheue iamais, et iamais n'arreste, comme estant à bout, ains depuis la semence, va tousiours se changeant et muant d'vn à autre. Comme de semence humaine se fait premierement dans le ventre de la mere vn fruict sans forme: puis vn enfant formé, puis estant hors du ventre, vn enfant de mammelle; apres il deuient garçon; puis consequemment vn iouuenceau; apres vn homme faict; puis vn homme d'aage; à la fin decrepite vieillard. De maniere que l'aage et generation subsequente va tousiours deffaisant et gastant la precedente.

Mutat enim mundi naturam totius ætas,
Ex alióque alius status excipere omnia debet,
Nec manet vlla sui similis res: omnia migrant,
Omnia commutat natura et vertere cogit. Et puis nous autres sottement craignons vne espece de mort, là où nous en stance in them, finds itself disappointed, being unable to apprehend anything subsistent and permanent; because everything is either coming into being and does not yet entirely exist, or is beginning to die before it is born. Plato said that bodies never had existence, but only birth, believing that Homer had made Ocean the father of the gods and Thetis the mother in order to show us that all things are in perpetual flux, change and variation. This, as he says, was an opinion common to all the philosophers before his time—except Parmenides alone, who denied motion to things, and whose force he makes much of.[206]

ENGLISH

Pythagoras said that all matter is flowing and unstable; the Stoics, that there is no present time, and that what we call present is only the joint and junction of future and past; Heraclitus, that no man had ever stepped twice into the same river; Epicharmus, that he who borrowed money long ago does not owe it now, and that he who was invited last night to come to dinner this morning comes today uninvited, since they are no longer themselves: they have become others. And he said that a mortal substance could not be found twice in the same state: for by the suddenness and lightness of its change, now it scatters, now it gathers again; it comes, and then it goes; so that what begins to be born never reaches the perfection of being.

For this birth is never completed and never stops, as if it had reached its end; rather, from the seed onward it is always changing and shifting from one thing to another. Thus from human seed there is first made, in the mother's womb, a formless fruit; then a formed child; then, once out of the womb, a nursing infant; after that he becomes a boy; then in turn a youth; after that a grown man; then a man of years; and at last a decrepit old man. So that each later age and generation is always undoing and spoiling the one before.

For time changes the nature of the whole world,
And one state must succeed another in all things,
Nor does anything remain like itself: all things move on,
Nature alters all things and compels them to turn. And 205 From here to the end of the essay's argument Montaigne follows, almost word for word, Amyot's French translation of Plutarch's essay On the E at Delphi.

206 Homer (Iliad, Book XIV) actually names Tethys, the wife of Ocean, as the mother of the gods.

FRENCH

auons desia passé et en passons tant d'autres. Car non seulement, comme disoit Heraclitus, la mort du feu est generation de l'air, et la mort de l'air, generation de l'eau. Mais encor plus manifestement le pouuons nous voir en nous mesmes.

La fleur d'aage se meurt et passe quand la vieillesse suruient: et la ieunesse se termine en fleur d'aage d'homme faict: l'enfance en la ieunesse: et le premier aage meurt en l'enfance: et le iour d'hier meurt en celuy du iourd'huy, et le iourd'huy mourra en celuy de demain: et n'y a rien qui demeure, ne qui soit tousiours vn. Car qu'il soit ainsi, si nous demeurons tousiours mesmes et vns, comment est-ce que nous nous esiouyssons maintenant d'vne chose, et maintenant d'vne autre? comment est-ce que nous aymons choses contraires, ou les hayssons, nous les louons, ou nous les blasmons? comment auons nous differentes affections, ne retenants plus le mesme sentiment en la mesme pensée?

Car il n'est pas vray-semblable que sans mutation nous prenions autres passions: et ce qui souffre mutation ne demeure pas vn mesme: et s'il n'est pas vn mesme, il n'est donc pas aussi: ains quant et l'estre tout vn, change aussi l'estre simplement, deuenant tousiours autre d'vn autre. Et par consequent se trompent et mentent les sens de nature, prenans ce qui apparoist, pour ce qui est, à faute de bien sçauoir que c'est qui est.

2.12.253 Mais qu'est-ce donc qui est veritablement? ce qui est eternel: c'est à dire, qui n'a iamais eu de naissance, ny n'aura iamais fin, à qui le temps n'apporte iamais aucune mutation. Car c'est chose mobile que le temps, et qui apparoist comme en ombre, auec la matiere coulante et fluante tousiours, sans iamais demeurer stable ny permanente: à qui appartiennent ces mots, deuant et apres, et, a esté, ou sera. Lesquels tout de prime face montrent euidemment, que ce n'est pas chose qui soit: car ce seroit grande sottise et fauceté toute apparente, de dire que cela soit, qui n'est pas encore en estre, ou qui desia a cessé d'estre.

Et quant à ces mots, present, instant, maintenant, par lesquels il semble que principalement nous soustenons et fondons l'intelligence du temps, la raison le descouurant, le destruit tout sur le champ: car elle le fend incontinent, et le partit en futur et en passé: comme le voulant voir necessairement desparty en deux. Autant en aduient-il à la nature, qui est mesurée, comme au temps, qui la mesure: car il n'y a non plus en elle rien qui demeure, ne then we foolishly fear one kind of death, when we have already passed through so many others, and are passing through them still. For not only, as Heraclitus said, is the death of fire the birth of air, and the death of air the birth of water; we can see it even more plainly in ourselves.

ENGLISH

The prime of life dies and passes when old age comes on; youth ends in the prime of the grown man; childhood in youth; infancy dies in childhood; yesterday dies in today, and today will die in tomorrow; and there is nothing that remains or is always one. For that this is so: if we remain always the same and one, how is it that we take delight now in one thing and now in another? How is it that we love contrary things, or hate them, praise them or blame them? How do we have different affections, no longer retaining the same feeling in the same thought?

For it is not likely that we take on different passions without changing; and what undergoes change does not remain one and the same; and if it is not one and the same, then it also is not. Rather, together with its being one and the same, its being outright changes too, as it becomes ever other from another. And consequently our natural senses deceive and lie, taking what appears for what is, for want of really knowing what it is that is.

But what, then, truly is? What is eternal: that is to say, what has never had birth and will never have an end, and to which time never brings any change. For time is a mobile thing, which appears as if in shadow, along with matter that is forever flowing and running, never stable or permanent. To time belong these words, before and after, and has been, or will be. These show plainly at first sight that it is not a thing that is; for it would be great folly and manifest falsehood to say that something is which is not yet in being, or which has already ceased to be.

And as for these words, present, instant, now, on which it seems we chiefly support and ground our understanding of time: reason, discovering what it is, destroys it on the spot. For it immediately splits it and divides it into future and past, as if wishing to see it necessarily parted in two. The same happens to nature, which is measured, as to time, which measures it: for there is nothing in nature qui soit subsistant, ains y sont toutes choses ou nées, ou naissantes, ou mourantes.

FRENCH

Au moyen dequoy ce seroit peché de dire de Dieu, qui est le seul qui est, que il fut, ou il sera: car ces termes là sont declinaisons, passages, ou vicissitudes de ce qui ne peut durer, ny demeurer en estre. Parquoy il faut conclure Dieu seul est, non point selon aucune mesure du temps, mais selon vne eternité immuable et immobile, non mesurée par temps, ny subjecte à aucune declinaison: deuant lequel rien n'est, ny ne sera apres, ny plus nouueau ou plus recent; ains vn realement estant, qui par vn seul maintenant emplit le tousiours, et n'y a rien, qui veritablement soit, que luy seul: sans qu'on puisse dire, il a esté, ou, il sera, sans commencement et sans fin.

2.12.254 A cette conclusion si religieuse, d'vn homme payen, ie veux ioindre seulement ce mot, d'vn tesmoing de mesme condition, pour la fin de ce long et ennuyeux discours, qui me fourniroit de matiere sans fin. O la vile chose, dit-il, et abiecte, que l'homme, s'il ne s'esleue au dessus de l'humanité! Voyla vn bon mot, et vn vtile desir: mais pareillement absurde. Car de faire la poignée plus grande que le poing, la brassée plus grande que le bras, et d'esperer eniamber plus que de l'estenduë de noz iambes, cela est impossible et monstrueux: ny que l'homme se monte au dessus de soy et de l'humanité: car il ne peut voir que de ses yeux, ny saisir que de ses prises.

Il s'esleuera si Dieu luy preste extraordinairement la main. Il s'esleuera abandonnant et renonçant à ses propres moyens, et se laissant hausser et sousleuer par les moyens purement celestes. C'est à nostre foy Chrestienne, non à sa vertu Stoïque, de pretendre à cette diuine et miraculeuse metamorphose.

ENGLISH

either that remains or that subsists; rather, all things in it are either born, or being born, or dying.

For which reason it would be a sin to say of God, who is the only one who is, that he was or he will be: for those terms are declensions, passages or vicissitudes of what cannot endure or remain in being. Therefore we must conclude that God alone is —not according to any measure of time, but according to an eternity immutable and immobile, not measured by time nor subject to any declension; before whom nothing is, nor will be after, nor is anything newer or more recent; but one who really is, who with a single now fills the always; and there is nothing that truly is but he alone—without our being able to say he has been, or he will be—without beginning and without end.

To this so religious conclusion of a pagan I want only to add this saying of a witness of the same condition, to bring to an end this long and tiresome discourse, which could supply me with endless matter. "Oh, what a vile and abject thing man is," he says, "if he does not raise himself above humanity!" That is a good saying and a useful desire, but equally absurd. For to make the handful bigger than the hand, the armful bigger than the arm, and to hope to stride farther than our legs can reach, is impossible and monstrous; nor can man mount above himself and humanity. For he can see only with his own eyes, and seize only with his own grip.[207]

He will rise if God, by special favor, lends him a hand. He will rise by abandoning and renouncing his own means, and letting himself be raised and lifted up by purely heavenly ones. It is for our Christian faith, not for his Stoic virtue, to aspire to that divine and miraculous metamorphosis.

207 The saying is Seneca's, from the preface to his Natural Questions.

II.13 Of Judging Another's Death

De iuger de la mort d'autruy
A good death is hard to judge, since few believe their end has come; Montaigne weighs Cato's suicide and other deliberate deaths.

FRENCH

2.13.1 QVAND nous iugeons de l'asseurance d'autruy en la mort, qui est sans doubte la plus remerquable action de la vie humaine, il se faut prendre garde d'vne chose, que malaisément on croit estre arriué à ce poinct. Peu de gens meurent resolus, que ce soit leur heure derniere: et n'est endroit où la pipperie de l'esperance nous amuse plus. Elle ne cesse de corner aux oreilles: D'autres ont bien esté plus malades sans mourir, l'affaire n'est pas si desesperé qu'on pense: et au pis aller, Dieu a bien faict d'autres miracles. Et aduient cela de ce que nous faisons trop de cas de nous. Il semble que l'vniuersité des choses souffre aucunement de nostre aneantissement, et qu'elle soit compassionnée à nostre estat.

D'autant que nostre veuë alterée se represente les choses de mesmes, et nous est aduis qu'elles luy faillent à mesure qu'elle leur faut. Comme ceux qui voyagent en mer, à qui les montagnes, les campagnes, les villes, le ciel, et la terre vont mesme bransle, et quant et quant eux: Prouehimur portu, terræque vrbésque recedunt. Qui vit iamais vieillesse qui ne louast le temps passé, et ne blasmast le present, chargeant le monde et les mœurs des hommes, de sa misere et de son chagrin? Iámque caput quassans, grandis suspirat arator,
Et cùm tempora temporibus præsentia confert
Præteritis, laudat fortunas sæpe parentis,
Et crepat antiquum genus vt pietate repletum.

2.13.2 Nous entrainons tout auec nous: d'où il s'ensuit que nous estimons grande chose nostre mort, et qui ne passe pas si aisément, ny sans solemne consultation des astres: tot circa vnum caput tumultuantes deos. Et le pensons d'autant plus, que plus nous nous prisons. Comment, tant de science se perdroit elle auec tant de dommage, sans particulier soucy des destinées? vne ame si rare et

ENGLISH

When we judge another man's assurance in death, which is without doubt the most noteworthy action of human life, we must beware of one thing: that people find it hard to believe they have reached that point. Few men die convinced that it is their last hour, and there is no situation in which the deception of hope beguiles us more. It never stops trumpeting in our ears: "Others have been much sicker than this without dying; the case is not as hopeless as people think; and at worst, God has worked other miracles." And this comes about because we make too much of ourselves. It seems that the universe somehow suffers from our annihilation, and that it takes pity on our condition.

For our altered sight pictures things in the same way, and we suppose that they are failing it as fast as it fails them—like those who travel by sea, for whom the mountains, the fields, the towns, the sky and the earth move with the same motion, and along with them: We sail out from harbor, and lands and cities recede. Who ever saw old age that did not praise times past and blame the present, charging the world and the manners of men with its own misery and sullenness? And now the old plowman shakes his head and sighs,
And when he compares the present times with times
Past, he often praises his father's fortunes,
And harps on how the old race was full of piety.[1]

We drag everything along with us. From this it follows that we regard our death as a great thing, one that does not pass so easily, nor without solemn consultation of the stars: so many gods in an uproar over one head. And we think so all the more, the more highly we prize ourselves. What! Should so much learning be lost, with so much harm,

1 The first quotation is from Virgil, Aeneid; the second from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

FRENCH

exemplaire ne couste elle non plus à tuer, qu'vne ame populaire et inutile? cette vie, qui en couure tant d'autres, de qui tant d'autres vies dependent, qui occupe tant de monde par son vsage, remplit tant de place, se desplace elle comme celle qui tient à son simple nœud? Nul de nous ne pense assez n'estre qu'vn.

De là viennent ces mots de Cæsar à son pilote, plus enflez que la mer qui le menassoit: Italiam si cœlo authore recusas,
Me pete: sola tibi causa hæc est iusta timoris,
Vectorem non nosse tuum, perrumpe procellas
Tutela secure mei: et ceux-cy, Credit iam digna pericula Cæsar
Fatis esse suis: tantúsque euertere, dixit,
Me superis labor est, parua quem puppe sedentem,
Tam magno petiere mari? Et cette resuerie publique, que le soleil porta en son front tout le long d'vn an le deuil de sa mort: Ille etiam extincto miseratus Cæsare Romam, Cùm caput obscura nitidum ferrugini texit. Et mille semblables; dequoy le monde se laisse si aysément pipper, estimant que noz interests alterent le ciel, et que son infinité se formalise de noz menues actions.

Non tanta cœlo societas nobiscum est, vt nostro fato mortalis sit ille quoque siderum fulgor.

2.13.3 Or de iuger la resolution et la constance, en celuy qui ne croit pas encore certainement estre au danger, quoy qu'il y soit, ce n'est pas raison: et ne suffit pas qu'il soit mort en cette desmarche, s'il ne s'y estoit mis iustement pour cet effect. Il aduient à la plus part, de roidir leur contenance et leurs parolles, pour en acquerir reputation, qu'ils esperent encore iouir viuans. D'autant que i'en ay veu mourir, la fortune a disposé les contenances, non leur dessein. Et de ceux mesmes qui se sont anciennement donnez la mort, il y a bien à choisir, si c'est vne mort soudaine, ou mort qui ait du temps.

Ce cruel Empereur Romain, disoit de ses prisonniers, qu'il leur vouloit faire sentir la mort, et si quelqu'vn se without the special concern of the Fates? Does so rare and exemplary a soul cost no more to kill than a common, useless one? This life, which shelters so many others, on which so many other lives depend, which keeps so many people busy in its service and fills so much space—is it dislodged like one that hangs by its own single knot? None of us thinks enough that he is only one.[2]

ENGLISH

From this come those words of Caesar to his pilot, more swollen than the sea that threatened him: If you refuse Italy with heaven as your guide,
Make for it with me as guide: the only just cause of fear for you
Is not knowing whom you carry; break through the storms, Secure in my protection: and these: Caesar now believes these dangers worthy
Of his destiny: "Is it so great a labor," he said,
"For the gods above to overthrow me, that they assail me, sitting in a little boat,
With so vast a sea?" And that public fancy that the sun wore mourning for his death on its brow for a whole year: He too took pity on Rome when Caesar was extinguished,
And covered his shining head in dark rust. And a thousand like ones, by which the world lets itself be so easily fooled, thinking that our interests disturb heaven, and that its infinity takes offense at our petty actions.[3]

Heaven has no such fellowship with us that the brightness of the stars should be mortal through our fate as well.[4]

Now it is not reasonable to judge resolution and constancy in a man who does not yet firmly believe he is in danger, even though he is. Nor is it enough that he died in that situation, unless he had put himself there precisely for that purpose. Most men stiffen their bearing and their words to win a reputation that they still hope to enjoy while alive. Of those I have seen die, it was Fortune that arranged their bearing, not their own design. And even among those who took their own lives in ancient times, there is a great difference between a sudden death and a death that takes its time.

That cruel Roman emperor said of his prisoners that he wanted to make them feel death; and if one

2 Seneca the Elder, Suasoriae.

FRENCH

deffaisoit en prison, Celuy là m'est eschappé, disoit-il. Il vouloit estendre la mort, et la faire sentir par les tourmens. Vidimus et toto quamuis in corpore cæso, Nil animæ lethale datum, morémque nefandæ
Durum sæuitiæ, pereuntis parcere morti. De vray, ce n'est pas si grande chose, d'establir tout sain et tout rassis, de se tuer; il est bien aisé de faire le mauuais, auant que de venir aux prises.

De maniere que le plus effeminé homme du monde Heliogabalus, parmy ses plus lasches voluptez, desseignoit bien de se faire mourir delicatement, où l'occasion l'en forceroit: et afin que sa mort ne dementist point le reste de sa vie, auoit faict bastir expres vne tour somptueuse, le bas et le deuant de laquelle estoit planché d'ais enrichis d'or et de pierrerie pour se precipiter: et aussi fait faire des cordes d'or et de soye cramoisie pour s'estrangler: et battre vne espée d'or pour s'enferrer: et gardoit du venin dans des vaisseaux d'emeraude et de topaze, pour s'empoisonner, selon que l'enuie luy prendroit de choisir de toutes ces façons de mourir.

Impiger et fortis virtute coacta. Toutefois quant à cettuy-cy, la mollesse de ses apprests rend plus vray-semblable que le nez luy eust saigné, qui l'en eust mis au propre. Mais de ceux mesmes, qui plus vigoureux, se sont resolus à l'execution, il faut voir, dis-ie, si ç'a esté d'vn coup, qui ostait le loisir d'en sentir l'effect. Car c'est à deuiner, à voir escouler la vie peu à peu, le sentiment du corps se meslant à celuy de l'ame, s'offrant le moyen de se repentir, si la constance s'y fust trouuée, et l'obstination en vne si dangereuse volonté. Aux guerres ciuiles de Cæsar, Lucius Domitius pris en la Prusse, s'estant empoisonné, s'en repentit apres.

Il est aduenu de nostre temps que tel resolu de mourir, et de son premier essay n'ayant donné assez auant, la demangéson de la chair luy repoussant le bras, se reblessa bien fort à deux ou trois fois apres, mais ne peut iamais gaigner sur luy d'enfoncer le coup. Pendant qu'on of them did away with himself in prison, "That one has escaped me," he would say. He wanted to stretch death out and make it felt through torments. We have seen, though the whole body was slashed,

ENGLISH

No fatal blow dealt to the life, and the harsh custom
Of unspeakable cruelty: to withhold death from the dying. In truth, it is no great thing to decide to kill yourself while you are perfectly healthy and perfectly calm. It is very easy to act tough before coming to grips.[5]

So it was that Heliogabalus, the softest man in the world, amid his most dissolute pleasures, fully intended to put himself to death delicately should occasion force him to. So that his death should not belie the rest of his life, he had a sumptuous tower built on purpose to throw himself from, its base and front floored with boards inlaid with gold and precious stones. He also had cords of gold and crimson silk made to strangle himself, and a sword of gold forged to run himself through. And he kept poison in vessels of emerald and topaz to poison himself, depending on which of all these ways of dying he might feel like choosing.[6]

Vigorous and brave with a courage forced upon him. Still, as for this one, the softness of his preparations makes it more likely that he would have lost his nerve had it come to the point. But even among those who were more vigorous and resolved to carry the deed through, we must see, I say, whether it was done at a single stroke, which left no leisure to feel its effect. For it is anyone's guess whether, watching life drain away little by little, with the feeling of the body mingling with that of the soul and the chance to repent presenting itself, they would have shown constancy and obstinacy in so dangerous a resolve. In Caesar's civil wars, Lucius Domitius, captured in Prussia, poisoned himself and then repented of it.[7]

It has happened in our time that a man resolved to die did not strike deep enough at his first attempt, the shrinking of his flesh pushing back his arm. He wounded himself again quite badly two or three times afterward, but could never bring him-

3 The first two quotations are from Lucan, Pharsalia; the third from Virgil, Georgics.
4 Pliny the Elder, Natural History.
5 Montaigne combines sayings that Suetonius gives to Caligula and to Tiberius; the verses are from Lucan's Pharsalia.
6 The story comes from the Augustan History.
7 "Prussia" is Montaigne's slip; in Plutarch, Domitius was taken at Corfinium in Italy in 49 BC.

FRENCH

faisoit le procés à Plantius Syluanus, Vrgulania sa meregrand luy enuoya vn poignard, duquel n'ayant peu venir à bout de se tuer, il se feit coupper les veines à ses gents. Albucilla du temps de Tibere, s'estant pour se tuer frappée trop mollement, donna encores à ses parties moyen de l'emprisonner et faire mourir à leur mode. Autant en fit le Capitaine Demosthenes apres sa route en la Sicile. Et C.

Fimbria s'estant frappé trop foiblement, impetra de son vallet de l'acheuer. Au rebours, Ostorius, lequel pour ne se pouuoir seruir de son bras, desdaigna d'employer celuy de son seruiteur à autre chose qu'à tenir le poignard droit et ferme: et se donnant le branle, porta luy mesme sa gorge à l'encontre, et la transperça.

2.13.4 C'est vne viande à la verité qu'il faut engloutir sans macher, qui n'a le gosier ferré à glace. Et pourtant l'Empereur Adrianus feit que son medecin merquast et circonscriuist en son tetin iustement l'endroit mortel, où celuy eust à viser, à qui il donna la charge de le tuer. Voyla pourquoy Cæsar, quand on luy demandoit quelle mort il trouuoit la plus souhaitable, La moins premeditée, respondit-il, et la plus courte. Si Cæsar l'a osé dire, ce ne m'est plus lascheté de le croire. Vne mort courte, dit Pline, est le souuerain heur de la vie humaine. Il leur fasche de la recognoistre.

Nul ne se peut dire estre resolu à la mort, qui craint à la marchander, qui ne peut la soustenir les yeux ouuerts. Ceux qu'on voit aux supplices courir à leur fin, et haster l'execution, et la presser, ils ne le font pas de resolution, ils se veulent oster le temps de la considerer: l'estre morts ne les fasche pas, mais ouy bien le mourir. Emori nolo, sed me esse mortuum, nihili æstimo. C'est vn degré de fermeté, auquel i'ay exprimenté que ie pourrois arriuer, comme ceux qui se iettent dans les dangers, ainsi que dans la mer, à yeux clos.

ENGLISH

self to drive the blow home. While Plautius Silvanus was on trial, his grandmother Urgulania sent him a dagger; unable to finish himself off with it, he had his servants cut his veins. Albucilla, in the time of Tiberius, struck herself too feebly in trying to kill herself, and so gave her enemies the chance to imprison her and put her to death in their own way. The general Demosthenes did the same after his rout in Sicily. And C.[8]

Fimbria, having struck himself too weakly, begged his servant to finish him off. Ostorius, on the contrary, being unable to use his own arm, disdained to use his servant's for anything but holding the dagger straight and firm; and, launching himself, he drove his throat onto it himself and pierced it through.[9]

Death, in truth, is a dish that must be swallowed without chewing, unless your throat is lined with iron. And so the Emperor Hadrian had his physician mark and circle on his breast, just by the nipple, the exact mortal spot at which the man he charged with killing him was to aim. That is why Caesar, when asked what death he thought most desirable, answered: "The least premeditated, and the shortest." If Caesar dared to say it, it is no longer cowardice in me to believe it. "A short death," says Pliny, "is the supreme good fortune of human life." People hate to look it over closely.

No one can be called resolved to die who is afraid to haggle with death, who cannot endure it with open eyes. Those we see at executions running to their end, hurrying the execution and pressing it on, do not do so out of resolution: they want to deprive themselves of the time to consider it. Being dead does not trouble them, but dying certainly does. I do not want to die, but being dead I count as nothing. This is a degree of firmness that I have found by experience I could reach—like those who throw themselves into danger as into the sea, with their eyes shut.[10]

8 Plautius Silvanus and Albucilla are from Tacitus' Annals; Demosthenes was the Athenian general defeated at Syracuse in 413 BC.
9 Gaius Fimbria, a Marian general, died in 85 BC; Ostorius Scapula was condemned under Nero in AD 66 (Tacitus).
10 A line of Epicharmus, in Cicero's Latin (Tusculan Disputations).

DEATHS THAT TAKE THEIR TIME

Socrates spent thirty days with his sentence; Atticus, Cleanthes and Marcellinus chose to die slowly and calmly.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.13.5	Il n'y a rien, selon moy, plus illustre en la vie de Socrates, que d'auoir eu trente iours entiers à ruminer le decret de sa mort: de l'auoir digerée tout ce temps là, d'vne tres-certaine esperance, sans esmoy, sans alteration: et d'vn train d'actions et de parolles, rauallé plustost et anonchally, que tendu et releué par le poids d'vne telle cogitation.	Nothing in Socrates' life, in my opinion, is more illustrious than his having had thirty whole days to ruminate on the sentence of his death; than his having digested it all that time, in most certain expectation, without anxiety, without change; and with a course of actions and words that was lowered and easygoing rather than strained and heightened by the weight of such a thought.
2.13.6	Ce Pomponius Atticus, à qui Cicero escrit, estant malade, fit appeller Agrippa son gendre, et deux ou trois autres de ses amys; et leur dit, qu'ayant essayé qu'il ne gaignoit rien à se vouloir guerir, et que tout ce qu'il faisoit pour allonger sa vie, allongeoit aussi et augmentoit sa douleur; il estoit deliberé de mettre fin à l'vn et à l'autre, les priant de trouuer bonne sa deliberation, et au pis aller, de ne perdre point leur peine à l'en destourner. Or ayant choisi de se tuer par abstinence, voyla sa maladie guerie par accident: ce remede qu'il auoit employé pour se deffaire, le remet en santé.	That Pomponius Atticus to whom Cicero writes, being ill, sent for Agrippa, his son-in-law, and two or three other friends. He told them that he had found by trial that he gained nothing by trying to get well, and that everything he did to lengthen his life also lengthened and increased his pain; so he was determined to put an end to both. He begged them to approve his decision and, at worst, not to waste their efforts trying to dissuade him. Now, having chosen to kill himself by fasting, lo and behold, his illness was cured by chance: the remedy he had used to do away with himself restored him to health.[11]
	Les medecins et ses amis faisans feste d'vn si heureux euenement, et s'en resiouyssans auec luy, se trouuerent bien trompez: car il ne leur fut possible pour cela de luy faire changer d'opinion, disant qu'ainsi comme ainsi luy falloit il vn iour franchir ce pas, et qu'en estant si auant, il se vouloit oster la peine de recommencer vn' autre fois. Cestuy-cy ayant recognu la mort tout à loisir, non seulement ne se descourage pas au ioindre, mais il s'y acharne: car estant satisfaict en ce pourquoy il estoit entré en combat, il se picque par brauerie d'en voir la fin. C'est bien loing au delà de ne craindre point la mort, que de la vouloir taster et sauourer.	The physicians and his friends, celebrating so happy an outcome and rejoicing with him, found themselves sorely disappointed. For all that, they could not make him change his mind: he said that one way or another he would have to take that step someday, and that, being so far along, he wanted to spare himself the trouble of starting over another time. This man, having surveyed death at full leisure, not only is not discouraged on coming to grips with it, but presses on relentlessly; for, having got what he entered the fight for, he makes it a point of bravado to see it through to the end. It is far beyond not fearing death to want to taste and savor it.
2.13.7	L'histoire du philosophe Cleanthes est fort pareille. Les gengiues luy estoyent enflées et pourries: les medecins luy conseillerent d'vser d'vne grande abstinence. Ayant ieuné deux iours, il est si bien amendé, qu'ils luy declarent sa guarison, et permettent de retourner à son train de viure accoustumé. Luy au rebours, goustant desia quelque douceur en cette defaillance, entreprend de ne	The story of the philosopher Cleanthes is very similar. His gums were swollen and rotting; the physicians advised him to fast strictly. After fasting two days he was so much better that they declared him cured and allowed him to return to his usual way of life. He, on the contrary, already tasting some sweetness in this faintness, resolved not

11 Titus Pomponius Atticus (d. 32 BC), Cicero's friend and correspondent; the story is told by Cornelius Nepos.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
se retirer plus arriere, et franchir le pas, qu'il auoit fort auancé.	to draw back again but to take the step toward which he had already come so far.[12]
2.13.8 Tullius Marcellinus ieune homme Romain, voulant anticiper l'heure de sa destinée, pour se deffaire d'vne maladie, qui le gourmandoit, plus qu'il ne vouloit souffrir: quoy que les medecins luy en promissent guerison certaine, sinon si soudaine, appella ses amis pour en deliberer: les vns, dit Seneca, luy donnoyent le conseil que par lascheté ils eussent prins pour eux mesmes, les autres par flaterie, celuy qu'ils pensoyent luy deuoir estre plus aggreable: mais vn Stoïcien luy dit ainsi: Ne te trauaille pas Marcellinus, comme si tu deliberois de chose d'importance: ce n'est pas grand'chose que viure, tes valets et les bestes viuent: mais c'est grand'chose de mourir honestement, sagement, et constamment.	Tullius Marcellinus, a young Roman, wished to anticipate the hour of his destiny so as to rid himself of an illness that was tormenting him more than he was willing to endure, even though the physicians promised him a sure cure, if not a quick one. He called his friends to deliberate about it. Some, says Seneca, gave him the advice that they themselves would have taken out of cowardice; others, out of flattery, the advice they thought he would like best. But a Stoic spoke to him thus: "Do not trouble yourself, Marcellinus, as if you were deliberating about something important. It is no great thing to live; your servants and the beasts live. But it is a great thing to die honorably, wisely, and steadfastly."[13]
Songe combien il y a que tu fais mesme chose, manger, boire, dormir: boire, dormir, et manger. Nous roüons sans cesse en ce cercle. Non seulement les mauuais accidens et insupportables, mais la satieté mesme de viure donne enuie de la mort.	"Think how long you have been doing the same thing: eating, drinking, sleeping; drinking, sleeping, and eating. We go round and round endlessly in this circle. Not only bad and unbearable misfortunes, but even being sated with living, make one long for death."
Marcellinus n'auoit besoing d'homme qui le conseillast, mais d'homme qui le secourust: les seruiteurs craignoyent de s'en mesler: mais ce philosophe leur fit entendre que les domestiques sont soupçonnez, lors seulement qu'il est en doubte, si la mort du maistre a esté volontaire: autrement qu'il seroit d'aussi mauuais exemple de l'empescher, que de le tuer, d'autant que Inuitum qui seruat, idem facit occidenti. Apres il aduertit Marcellinus, qu'il ne seroit pas messeant, comme le dessert des tables se donne aux assistans, nos repas faicts, aussi la vie finie, de distribuer quelque chose à ceux qui en ont esté les ministres. Or estoit Marcellinus de courage franc et liberal: il fit departir quelque somme à ses seruiteurs, et les consola.	Marcellinus did not need a man to advise him but a man to help him. His servants were afraid to get involved; but this philosopher made them understand that members of a household are suspected only when there is doubt whether the master's death was voluntary. Otherwise, he said, it would set as bad an example to prevent him as to kill him, since he who saves a man against his will does the same as one who kills him. Then he advised Marcellinus that it would not be unseemly, just as the dessert is given to those standing by when our meal is over, so too, at the end of life, to distribute something to those who had served it. Now Marcellinus was of a frank and generous heart: he had a sum divided among his servants and comforted them.[14]
Au reste, il n'y eut besoing de fer, ny de sang: il entreprit de s'en aller de cette vie, non de s'en fuyr: non d'eschapper à la mort, mais de l'essayer. Et pour se donner loisir de la marchander, ayant quitté toute nourriture, le troisiesme iour suyuant, apres s'estre faict arroser d'eau tiede, il defaillit peu à peu, et non sans	For the rest, there was no need of steel or blood. He set out to depart from this life, not to flee from it; not to escape death but to try it out. And to give himself leisure to haggle with it, he gave up all food; on the third day after, having had himself sprinkled with warm water, he faded away little 12 The story is in Diogenes Laertius.

13 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius 77.
14 Horace, The Art of Poetry.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	quelque volupté, à ce qu'il disoit. De vray, ceux qui ont eu ces deffaillances de cœur, qui prennent par foiblesse, disent n'y sentir aucune douleur, ains plustost quelque plaisir comme d'vn passage au sommeil et au repos. Voyla des morts estudiées et digerées.	by little, and not without some pleasure, as he said. Indeed, those who have had these faintings of the heart that come from weakness say they feel no pain in them, but rather a kind of pleasure, as of a passage into sleep and rest. Those are deaths studied and digested.
2.13.9	Mais à fin que le seul Caton peust fournir à tout exemple de vertu, il semble que son bon destin luy fit auoir mal en la main, dequoy il se donna le coup: à ce qu'il eust loisir d'affronter la mort et de la colleter, renforceant le courage au danger, au lieu de l'amollir. Et si ç'eust esté à moy, de le representer en sa plus superbe assiete, ç'eust esté deschirant tout ensanglanté ses entrailles, plustost que l'espée au poing, comme firent les statuaires de son temps. Car ce second meurtre, fut bien plus furieux, que le premier.	But so that Cato alone might furnish every example of virtue, it seems his good destiny gave him a sore hand—the one he struck himself with—so that he had leisure to confront death and grapple with it, his courage growing stronger in the danger instead of softer. And if it had been up to me to portray him in his proudest posture, I would have shown him all bloodied, tearing out his entrails, rather than sword in hand, as the sculptors of his time did. For that second killing was far more furious than the first.[15]

15 When his first wound was bandaged, Cato tore it open with his own hands (46 BC).

II.14 How Our Mind Hinders Itself

Comme nostre esprit s'empesche soy-mesmes
A brief puzzle about a mind poised between two equal desires, which Montaigne turns into a reflection on reason's limits.

FRENCH

2.14.1 C'EST vne plaisante imagination, de conceuoir vn esprit balancé iustement entre-deux pareilles enuyes. Car il est indubitable, qu'il ne prendra iamais party: d'autant que l'application et le choix porte inequalité de prix: et qui nous logeroit entre la bouteille et le iambon, auec egal appetit de boire et de manger, il n'y auroit sans doute remede, que de mourir de soif et de faim.

Pour pouruoir à cet inconuenient, les Stoïciens, quand on leur demande d'où vient en nostre ame l'election de deux choses indifferentes (et qui fait que d'vn grand nombre d'escus nous en prenions plustost l'vn que l'autre, n'y ayant aucune raison qui nous incline à la preference) respondent, que ce mouuement de l'ame est extraordinaire et desreglé, venant en nous d'vne impulsion estrangere, accidentale, et fortuite. Il se pourroit dire, ce me semble, plustost, que aucune chose ne se presente à nous, où il n'y ait quelque difference, pour legere qu'elle soit: et que ou à la veuë, ou à l'attouchement, il y a tousiours quelque choix, qui nous tente et attire, quoy que ce soit imperceptiblement.

Pareillement qui presupposera vne fisselle egallement forte par tout, il est impossible de toute impossibilité qu'elle rompe, car par où voulez vous que la faucée commence? et de rompre par tout ensemble, il n'est pas en nature. Qui ioindroit encore à cecy les propositions geometriques, qui concluent par la certitude de leurs demonstrations, le contenu plus grand que le contenant, le centre aussi grand que sa circonference: et qui trouuent deux lignes s'approchans sans cesse l'vne de l'autre, et ne se pouuans iamais ioindre: et la pierre philosophale, et quadrature du cercle, où la raison et l'effect sont si opposites: en tireroit à l'aduenture quelque argument pour secourir ce mot hardy de Pline, solum certum nihil esse certi, et homine nihil miserius aut superbius.

ENGLISH

It is an amusing notion to imagine a mind balanced exactly between two equal desires. For it is beyond doubt that it will never make up its mind, since leaning toward one and choosing it imply that they are unequal in value. If we were placed between the bottle and the ham, with an equal appetite for drinking and eating, there would doubtless be no remedy but to die of thirst and hunger.

To get round this difficulty, the Stoics, when asked where our soul gets its choice between two indifferent things (and what makes us take one coin rather than another from a large pile of crowns, when there is no reason to incline us to prefer one), answer that this movement of the soul is extraordinary and irregular, coming into us from an external, accidental, and fortuitous impulse. It might rather be said, it seems to me, that nothing presents itself to us in which there is not some difference, however slight; and that, either to the sight or to the touch, there is always something to choose that tempts and attracts us, even if imperceptibly.

Likewise, if you suppose a cord equally strong throughout, it is utterly and absolutely impossible for it to break; for where would you have the break begin? And to break everywhere at once is not in nature. Suppose someone added to this the geometrical propositions that conclude, with all the certainty of their demonstrations, that the contents are greater than the container and the center as large as its circumference; and that find two lines forever approaching each other and never able to meet; and the philosophers' stone, and the squaring of the circle, where reason and result are so opposed. He might perhaps draw from them some argument in support of that bold saying of Pliny: the only certainty is that nothing is certain, and nothing is more wretched or more arrogant than man.

II.15 That Our Desire Is Increased by Difficulty

Que nostre desir s'accroist par la malaisance
Montaigne shows how opposition and difficulty sharpen desire, in love and in everything else, and why he leaves his house unguarded.

FRENCH

2.15.1 IL n'y a raison qui n'en aye vne contraire, dit le plus sage party des philosophes. Ie remaschois tantost ce beau mot, qu'vn ancien allegue pour le mespris de la vie: Nul bien nous peut apporter plaisir, si ce n'est celuy, à la perte duquel nous sommes preparez: In æquo est dolor amissæ rei, et timor amittendæ. Voulant gaigner par là, que la fruition de la vie ne nous peut estre vrayement plaisante, si nous sommes en crainte de la perdre. Il se pourroit toutesfois dire au rebours, que nous serrons et embrassons ce bien, d'autant plus estroit, et auecques plus d'affection, que nous le voyons nous estre moins seur, et craignons qu'il nous soit osté.

Car il se sent euidemment, comme le feu se picque à l'assistance du froid, que nostre volonté s'aiguise aussi par le contraste: Si numquam Danaen habuisset ahenea turris, / Non esset Danae de Ioue facta parens: et qu'il n'est rien naturellement si contraire à nostre goust que la satieté, qui vient de l'aisance: ny rien qui l'aiguise tant que la rareté et difficulté. Omnium rerum voluptas ipso quo debet fugare periculo crescit. Galla, nega; satiatur amor, nisi gaudia torquent.

2.15.2 Pour tenir l'amour en haleine, Lycurgue ordonna que les mariez de Lacedemone ne se pourroient prattiquer qu'à la desrobée, et que ce seroit pareille honte de les rencontrer couchés ensemble qu'auecques d'autres. La difficulté des assignations, le danger des surprises, la honte du lendemain, Et languor, et silentium, / Et latere petitus imo spiritus, c'est ce qui donne pointe à la sauce. Combien de ieux tres-lasciuement plaisants, naissent de l'honneste et vergongneuse maniere de parler des ouurages de l'Amour? La volupté mesme cherche à s'irriter par la douleur. Elle est bien plus sucrée, quand elle cuit, et quand elle escorche. La courtisane Flora disoit n'auoir iamais couché auec Pompeius, qu'elle ne luy eust faict porter les merques de ses morsures.

ENGLISH

There is no reason that does not have its contrary, says the wisest school of philosophers. I was just now chewing over that fine saying which an ancient cites in contempt of life: no good can bring us pleasure except the one we are prepared to lose. The pain of losing a thing and the fear of losing it are equal. He means to show by this that the enjoyment of life cannot be truly pleasant to us if we are afraid of losing it. Yet it might be said, on the contrary, that we clasp and embrace this good all the more tightly and fondly the less secure we see it to be, and the more we fear it may be taken from us.[1]

For it is plainly felt that, just as fire is quickened by the presence of cold, our will too is sharpened by opposition: If the bronze tower had never held Danaë, / Danaë would never have been made a mother by Jupiter; and that nothing is naturally so contrary to our taste as the satiety that comes from ease, nor anything that sharpens it so much as rarity and difficulty. In all things, pleasure grows with the very danger that ought to make us shun it. Galla, say no: love is soon sated unless its joys are torture.[2]

To keep love on its toes, Lycurgus decreed that married couples in Sparta could have relations only by stealth, and that it would be as shameful to find them in bed together as with others. The difficulty of assignations, the danger of being caught, the shame of the next morning, And languor, and silence, / And sighs drawn from deep within —that is what gives the sauce its spice. How many very lasciviously amusing games arise from the decent and bashful way of speaking about the works of Love? Pleasure itself seeks to be stimulated by pain. It is much sweeter when it smarts and when it chafes the skin. The courtesan Flora

1 The wisest school is the Pyrrhonists; the ancient is Seneca (Letters to Lucilius).
2 Ovid, Amores; then Seneca, On Benefits, and Martial, Epigrams.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

said she had never slept with Pompey without making him carry the marks of her bites.[3]

Quod petiere, premunt arctè, faciúntque dolorem
Corporis, et dentes inlidunt sæpe labellis:
Et stimuli subsunt, qui instigant lædere id ipsum Quodcunque est, rabies vnde illæ germina surgunt.

What they have sought they squeeze tight, and cause pain
To the body, and often drive their teeth into the lips;
And there are goads beneath that drive them to hurt that very thing,
Whatever it is, from which those seeds of frenzy spring.[4]

2.15.3 Il en va ainsi par tout: la difficulté donne prix aux choses. Ceux de la Marque d'Ancone font plus volontiers leurs vœuz à Sainct Iaques, et ceux de Galice à nostre Dame de Lorete: on fait au Liege grande feste des bains de Luques, et en la Toscane de ceux d'Aspa: il ne se voit guere de Romains en l'escole de l'escrime à Rome, qui est pleine de François. Ce grand Caton se trouua aussi bien que nous, desgousté de sa femme tant qu'elle fut sienne, et la desira quand elle fut à vn autre. I'ay chassé au haras vn vieil cheual, duquel à la senteur des iuments, on ne pouuoit venir à bout.

It is the same everywhere: difficulty gives things their value. People from the March of Ancona would rather make their vows to Saint James, and people from Galicia to Our Lady of Loreto. In Liège they make a great fuss over the baths of Lucca, and in Tuscany over those of Spa. Hardly any Romans are to be seen in the fencing school at Rome, which is full of Frenchmen. The great Cato, too, just like us, was tired of his wife as long as she was his, and desired her when she belonged to another. I have put out to stud an old horse that could not be controlled at the scent of mares.[5]

La facilité l'a incontinent saoulé enuers les siennes: mais enuers les estrangeres et la premiere qui passe le long de son pastis, il reuient à ses importuns hannissements, et à ses chaleurs furieuses comme deuant. Nostre appetit mesprise et outrepasse ce qui luy est en main, pour courir apres ce qu'il n'a pas. Transuolat in medio posita, et fugientia captat. Nous defendre quelque chose, c'est nous en donner enuie. Nisi tu seruare puellam / Incipis, incipiet desinere esse mea. Nous l'abandonner tout à faict, c'est nous en engendrer mespris. La faute et l'abondance retombent en mesme inconuenient: Tibi quod superest, mihi quod defit, dolet. Le desir et la iouyssance nous mettent pareillement en peine.

Ease soon sated him with his own mares; but with strange ones, and the first that passes along his pasture, he goes back to his tiresome neighing and his furious heats as before. Our appetite scorns and passes over what it has in hand, to run after what it does not have. He flies past what lies in reach and chases what runs away. To forbid us something is to make us want it. Unless you begin to guard your girl, / She will begin to stop being mine. To hand it over to us entirely is to breed contempt for it in us. Lack and abundance come to the same trouble: You suffer from what you have too much of, I from what I lack. Desire and enjoyment torment us equally.[6]

La rigueur des maistresses est ennuyeuse, mais l'aisance et la facilité l'est, à vray dire, encores plus, d'autant que le mescontentement et la cholere naissent de l'estimation, en quoy nous auons la chose desirée, aiguisent l'amour, et le reschauffent: mais la satieté engendre le dégoust: c'est vne passion mousse, hebetée, lasse, et endormie. Si qua volet regnare diu, contemnat amantem,

The harshness of mistresses is painful; but ease and compliance are, to tell the truth, even more so. For discontent and anger arise from the high value we set on the thing desired; they sharpen love and rekindle it. Satiety, by contrast, breeds distaste: it is a blunt passion, dulled, weary, and asleep. If a woman wants to reign long, let her scorn her lover.

3 Horace, Epodes.
4 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.
5 Saint James's shrine is at Compostela in Galicia; Loreto is near Ancona. Cato gave his wife Marcia to Hortensius and remarried her after his death.
6 Horace, Satires; Ovid, Amores; Terence, Phormio.

FRENCH

Contemnite amantes,
Sic hodie veniet, si qua negauit heri.

2.15.4 Pourquoy inuenta Popæa de masquer les beautez de son visage, que pour les rencherir à ses amants? Pourquoy a lon voilé iusques au dessoubs des talons ces beautez, que chacun desire montrer, que chacun desire voir? Pourquoy couurent elles de tant d'empeschemens, les vns sur les autres, les parties, où loge principallement nostre desir et le leur? Et à quoy seruent ces gros bastions, dequoy les nostres viennent d'armer leurs flancs, qu'à leurrer nostre appetit, et nous attirer à elles en nous esloignant? Et fugit ad salices, et se cupit antè videri. / Interdum tunica duxit operta moram. A quoy sert l'art de cette honte virginalle?

cette froideur rassise, cette contenance seuere, cette profession d'ignorance des choses, qu'elles sçauent mieux, que nous qui les en instruisons, qu'à nous accroistre le desir de vaincre, gourmander, et fouler à nostre appetit, toute cette ceremonie, et ces obstacles? Car il y a non seulement du plaisir, mais de la gloire encore, d'affolir et desbaucher cette molle douceur, et cette pudeur infantine, et de ranger à la mercy de nostre ardeur vne grauité froide et magistrale. C'est gloire, disent-ils, de triompher de la modestie, de la chasteté, et de la temperance: et qui desconseille aux Dames, ces parties là, il les trahit, et soy-mesmes.

Il faut croire que le cœur leur fremit d'effroy, que le son de nos mots blesse la pureté de leurs oreilles, qu'elles nous en haissent et s'accordent à nostre importunité d'vne force forcée. La beauté, toute puissante qu'elle est, n'a pas dequoy se faire sauourer sans cette entremise. Voyez en Italie, où il y a plus de beauté à vendre, et de la plus fine, comment il faut qu'elle cherche d'autres moyens estrangers, et d'autres arts pour se rendre aggreable: et si à la verité, quoy qu'elle face estant venale et publique, elle demeure foible et languissante.

Tout ainsi que mesme en la vertu, de deux effects pareils, nous tenons neantmoins celuy-là, le plus beau et plus digne, auquel il y a plus d'empeschement et de hazard proposé.

ENGLISH

Scorn your lovers,
And she who refused yesterday will come today.[7]

Why did Poppaea think of masking the beauties of her face, if not to make them dearer to her lovers? Why have those beauties that everyone wishes to show, that everyone wishes to see, been veiled right down below the heels? Why do women cover with so many obstacles, one on top of another, the parts where our desire and theirs chiefly dwell? And what are those great bastions with which our women have lately taken to arming their hips for, if not to lure our appetite and draw us to them by keeping us at a distance? And she flees to the willows, and hopes first to be seen. / Sometimes, kept covered by her tunic, she has made me wait. What is the use of the art of this maidenly shame?[8] this sedate coldness, this severe countenance, this professed ignorance of things they know better than we who instruct them—what is all this ceremony, and all these obstacles, for, if not to increase our desire to conquer, master, and trample them under our appetite? For there is not only pleasure but glory as well in maddening and corrupting that soft sweetness and that childlike modesty, and in bringing a cold and magisterial gravity to the mercy of our ardor. It is a glory, they say, to triumph over modesty, chastity, and temperance; and whoever advises ladies against those qualities betrays both them and himself.

We must believe that their hearts tremble with fright, that the sound of our words wounds the purity of their ears, that they hate us for it and yield to our importunity only under duress. Beauty, all-powerful as it is, cannot make itself relished without this go-between. Look at Italy, where there is more beauty for sale, and of the finest, and see how it has to seek other outside means and other arts to make itself attractive. And yet, in truth, whatever it does, being for sale and public, it remains feeble and languid.

In just the same way, even in virtue, of two equal deeds we nevertheless consider the finer and worthier the one that faced more obstacles and risk.

7 Ovid, Amores, and Propertius.
8 Poppaea Sabina, wife of Nero (Tacitus). The verses are from Virgil's Eclogues and Propertius.

DIFFICULTY IN FAITH AND MARRIAGE

Persecution wakes the Church; Roman marriages lasted because divorce was allowed; punishment sharpens vice.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.15.5	C'est vn effect de la prouidence diuine, de permettre sa saincte Eglise estre agitée, comme nous la voyons de tant de troubles et d'orages, pour esueiller par ce contraste les ames pies, et les r'auoir de l'oisiueté et du sommeil, où les auoit plongees vne si longue tranquillité. Si nous contrepoisons la perte que nous auons faicte, par le nombre de ceux qui se sont desuoyez, au gain qui nous vient pour nous estre remis en haleine, resuscité nostre zele et nos forces, à l'occasion de ce combat, Ie ne sçay si l'vtilité ne surmonte point le dommage.	It is an effect of divine providence to allow its holy Church to be shaken, as we see it, by so many troubles and storms, in order to awaken pious souls by this opposition and rouse them from the idleness and sleep into which so long a tranquillity had plunged them. If we weigh the loss we have suffered, in the number of those who have gone astray, against the gain that comes to us from having been put back on our mettle, with our zeal and strength revived by this combat, I do not know whether the benefit does not outweigh the harm.
2.15.6	Nous auons pensé attacher plus ferme le nœud de nos mariages, pour auoir osté tout moyen de les dissoudre, mais d'autant s'est dépris et relasché le nœud de la volonté et de l'affection, que celuy de la contraincte s'est estrecy. Et au rebours, ce qui tint les mariages à Rome, si long temps en honneur et en seurté, fut la liberté de les rompre, qui voudroit. Ils gardoient mieux leurs femmes, d'autant qu'ils les pouuoient perdre: et en pleine licence de diuorces, il se passa cinq cens ans et plus, auant que nul s'en seruist. Quod licet, ingratum est: quod non licet, acrius vrit.	We thought we were tying the knot of our marriages more firmly by removing every means of dissolving them. But the knot of will and affection has loosened and slackened as much as the knot of constraint has been tightened. On the contrary, what kept marriages at Rome so long in honor and security was the freedom of anyone who wished to break them off. The Romans took better care of their wives because they could lose them; and with full license to divorce, five hundred years and more went by before anyone made use of it. What is allowed has no charm; what is not allowed burns more fiercely.[9]
2.15.7	A ce propos se pourroit ioindre l'opinion d'vn ancien, que les supplices aiguisent les vices plustost qu'ils ne les amortissent: qu'ils n'engendrent point le soing de bien faire, c'est l'ouurage de la raison, et de la discipline: mais seulement vn soing de n'estre surpris en faisant mal. Latius excisæ pestis contagia serpunt Ie ne sçay pas qu'elle soit vraye, mais cecy sçay-ie par experience, que iamais police ne se trouua reformée par là. L'ordre et reglement des mœurs, dépend de quelque autre moyen.	To this point might be added the opinion of an ancient: that punishments sharpen vices rather than deaden them; that they do not produce the concern to do well—that is the work of reason and discipline—but only the concern not to be caught doing ill. The contagion of a plague that has been cut out spreads more widely. I do not know that this opinion is true; but this I do know by experience, that no government was ever reformed by that means. The order and regulation of morals depend on some other means.[10]
2.15.8	Les histoires Grecques font mention des Argippees voisins de la Scythie, qui viuent sans verge et sans baston à offenser: que non seulement nul n'entreprend d'aller attaquer: mais quiconque s'y peut sauuer, il est en franchise, à cause de leur vertu et saincteté de vie: et	The Greek histories mention the Argippaeans, neighbors of Scythia, who live without rod or stick to strike with. Not only does no one undertake to attack them, but whoever can take refuge among them is in sanctuary, because of their virtue and

9 Ovid, Amores.
10 The ancient is Seneca (On Clemency); the verse is from Rutilius Namatianus, On His Return.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	n'est aucun si osé d'y toucher. On recourt à eux pour appoincter les differents, qui naissent entre les hommes d'ailleurs. Il y a nation, où la closture des iardins et des champs, qu'on veut conseruer, se faict d'vn filet de coton, et se trouue bien plus seure et plus ferme que nos fossez et nos hayes. Furem signata sollicitant. Aperta effractarius præterit.	holiness of life, and no one is bold enough to touch him. People turn to them to settle the disputes that arise among men elsewhere. There is a nation where the gardens and fields people want to protect are enclosed with a cotton thread, and this proves much safer and firmer than our ditches and hedges. Things under seal tempt the thief. The burglar passes by what is open.[11]

AN UNGUARDED HOUSE

Montaigne keeps his house open and unfortified through the civil wars, trusting its safety to heaven.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.15.9	A l'aduenture sert entre autres moyens, l'aisance, à couurir ma maison de la violence de noz guerres ciuiles. La defense attire l'entreprise, et la deffiance l'offense. I'ay affoibly le dessein des soldats, ostant à leur exploit, le hazard, et toute matiere de gloire militaire, qui a accoustumé de leur seruir de titre et d'excuse. Ce qui est faict courageusement, est tousiours faict honorablement, en temps où la iustice est morte. Ie leur rens la conqueste de ma maison lasche et traistresse. Elle n'est close à personne, qui y heurte. Il n'y a pour toute prouision, qu'vn portier, d'ancien vsage et ceremonie: qui ne sert pas tant à defendre ma porte, qu'à l'offrir plus decemment et gratieusement.	Perhaps, among other things, its very openness helps to shield my house from the violence of our civil wars. Defense invites attack, and distrust invites offense. I have weakened the soldiers' purpose by taking from their exploit all risk and all matter for military glory, which usually serves them as title and excuse. Whatever is done courageously is always done honorably, in times when justice is dead. I make the conquest of my house a cowardly and treacherous act for them. It is closed to no one who knocks. For all its defenses there is only a porter, kept by ancient usage and ceremony, who serves not so much to defend my door as to offer it more decently and graciously.
	Ie n'ay ny garde ny sentinelle, que celle que les astres font pour moy. Vn Gentil-homme a tort de faire montre d'estre en deffense, s'il ne l'est bien à poinct. Qui est ouuert d'vn costé, l'est par tout. Noz peres ne penserent pas à bastir des places frontieres. Les moyens d'assaillir, ie dy sans batterie et sans armée, et de surprendre noz maisons, croissent touts les iours, au dessus des moyens de se garder. Les esprits s'aiguisent generalement de ce costé là. L'inuasion touche touts, la defense non, que les riches. La mienne estoit forte selon le temps qu'elle fut faitte: ie n'y ay rien adiousté de ce costé là, et craindroy que sa force se tournast contre moy-mesme.	I have no guard or sentinel but the one the stars keep for me. A gentleman is wrong to make a show of being in a state of defense unless he is fully so. Whoever is open on one side is open everywhere. Our fathers did not think of building frontier fortresses. The means of assaulting and surprising our houses—I mean without artillery and without an army—are growing every day beyond the means of guarding them. Men's wits are generally being sharpened in that direction. Invasion concerns everyone; defense, only the rich. My house was strong for the time when it was built. I have added nothing to it in that respect, and I would fear that its strength might be turned against me myself.
	Ioint qu'vn temps paisible requerra, qu'on les defortifie. Il est dangereux de ne les pouuoir regaigner: et est difficile de s'en asseurer. Car en matiere de guerres intestines, vostre vallet peut estre du party que vous craignez. Et où la religion sert de pretexte, les parentez mesmes deuiennent infiables auec couuerture de iustice.	Besides, peaceful times will require such houses to be dismantled. It is dangerous to be unable to win them back, and it is hard to be sure of them. For in civil wars your own servant may belong to the party you fear. And where religion serves as a pretext, even kinsmen become untrustworthy un-

11 Herodotus, Histories IV; the Latin is from Seneca's Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

Les finances publiques n'entretiendront pas noz garnisons domestiques. Elles s'y espuiseroient. Nous n'auons pas dequoy le faire sans nostre ruine: ou plus incommodeement et iniurieusement encore, sans celle du peuple. L'estat de ma perte ne seroit guere pire. Au demeurant, vous y perdez vous, voz amis mesmes s'amusent à accuser vostre inuigilance et improuidence, plus qu'à vous pleindre, et l'ignorance ou nonchalance aux offices de vostre profession.

Ce que tant de maisons gardées se sont perduës, où ceste cy dure: me fait soupçonner, qu'elles se sont perduës de ce, qu'elles estoyent gardées. Cela donne et l'enuie et la raison à l'assaillant. Toute garde porte visage de guerre. Qui se iettera, si Dieu veut, chez moy: mais tant y a, que ie ne l'y appelleray pas. C'est la retraitte à me reposer des guerres. I'essaye de soustraire ce coing, à la tempeste publique, comme ie fay vn autre coing en mon ame. Nostre guerre a beau changer de formes, se multiplier et diuersifier en nouueaux partis: pour moy ie ne bouge.

Entre tant de maisons armées, moy seul, que ie sçache, de ma condition, ay fié purement au ciel la protection de la mienne. Et n'en ay iamais osté ny vaisselle d'argent, ny titre, ny tapisserie. Ie ne veux ny me craindre, ny me sauuer à demy. Si vne pleine recognoissance acquiert la faueur diuine, elle me durera iusqu'au bout: sinon, i'ay tousiours assez duré, pour rendre ma durée remerquable et enregistrable. Comment? Il y a bien trente ans.

ENGLISH

der cover of justice. Public funds will not maintain our household garrisons; they would be drained by it. We do not have the means to do it without ruining ourselves—or, more harmfully and unjustly still, without ruining the people. Losing my house would leave me hardly worse off. Moreover, if you do come to grief, even your friends are busier blaming your lack of vigilance and foresight, and your ignorance or carelessness in the duties of your profession, than pitying you.

That so many guarded houses have been lost while this one survives makes me suspect that they were lost because they were guarded. That gives the attacker both the desire and the justification. Every guard wears the face of war. Anyone may hurl himself into my house, if God so wills; but at any rate I shall not invite him. It is my retreat, where I rest from the wars. I try to keep this corner out of the public storm, as I do another corner in my soul. Our war may change its forms as it likes, multiply and split into new factions: as for me, I do not budge.

Among so many armed houses, I alone of my rank, as far as I know, have entrusted the protection of mine purely to heaven. And I have never removed from it either silver plate, or title deeds, or tapestry. I want neither to be afraid for myself nor to save myself by halves. If full gratitude wins divine favor, it will last me to the end; if not, I have still lasted long enough to make my lasting remarkable and worth recording. How long? A good thirty years.

II.16 Of Glory

De la gloire

Glory belongs to God alone, Montaigne argues; human fame is fickle and accidental, and virtue should be pursued for conscience, not reputation.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.16.1	IL y a le nom et la chose: le nom, c'est vne voix qui remerque et signifie la chose: le nom, ce n'est pas vne partie de la chose, ny de la substance: c'est vne piece estrangere ioincte à la chose, et hors d'elle.	There is the name and there is the thing. The name is a sound that marks and signifies the thing. The name is not a part of the thing, nor of its substance; it is a foreign piece attached to the thing, and outside it.
2.16.2	Dieu qui est en soy toute plenitude, et le comble de toute perfection, il ne peut s'augmenter et accroistre au dedans: mais son nom se peut augmenter et accroistre, par la benediction et loüange, que nous donnons à ses ouurages exterieurs. Laquelle loüange, puis que nous ne la pouuons incorporer en luy, d'autant qu'il n'y peut auoir accession de bien, nous l'attribuons à son nom, qui est la piece hors de luy, la plus voisine. Voylà comment c'est à Dieu seul, à qui gloire et honneur appartient.	God, who is in himself all fullness and the summit of all perfection, cannot increase or grow within. But his name can increase and grow through the blessing and praise we give to his outward works. Since we cannot incorporate this praise in him, inasmuch as no good can be added to him, we attribute it to his name, which is the part outside him that is nearest to him. That is how glory and honor belong to God alone.
	Et n'est rien si esloigné de raison, que de nous en mettre en queste pour nous: car estans indigens et necessiteux au dedans, nostre essence estant imparfaicte, et ayant continuellement besoing d'amelioration, c'est là, à quoy nous nous deuons trauailler. Nous sommes tous creux et vuides: ce n'est pas de vent et de voix que nous auons à nous remplir: il nous faut de la substance plus solide à nous reparer. Vn homme affamé seroit bien simple de chercher à se pouruoir plustost d'vn beau vestement, que d'vn bon repas: il faut courir au plus pressé. Comme disent nos ordinaires prieres, Gloria in excelcis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus.	And nothing is so contrary to reason as for us to go in quest of glory for ourselves. For since we are needy and destitute within, and our essence is imperfect and continually in need of improvement, that is what we ought to be working at. We are all hollow and empty. It is not with wind and sound that we have to fill ourselves; we need more solid substance to restore us. A starving man would be very foolish to try to provide himself with a fine garment rather than a good meal: we must run to what is most urgent. As our daily prayers say, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men.[1]
	Nous sommes en disette de beauté, santé, sagesse, vertu, et telles parties essentieles: les ornemens externes se chercheront apres que nous aurons proueu aux choses necessaires. La theologie traicte amplement et plus pertinemment ce subiect, mais ie n'y suis guere versé.	We are short of beauty, health, wisdom, virtue, and such essential qualities. Outward ornaments can be sought once we have provided for necessary things. Theology treats this subject at length and more pertinently, but I am hardly versed in it.
2.16.3	Chrysippus et Diogenes ont esté les premiers autheurs et les plus fermes du mespris de la gloire. Et entre toutes les voluptez, ils disoient qu'il n'y en auoit point de plus	Chrysippus and Diogenes were the first and firmest advocates of contempt for glory. And among all pleasures, they said, there was none

1 Luke 2:14, sung in the Gloria of the Mass.

FRENCH

dangereuse, ny plus à fuir, que celle qui nous vient de l'approbation d'autruy. De vray l'experience nous en fait sentir plusieurs trahisons bien dommageables. Il n'est chose qui empoisonne tant les Princes que la flatterie, ny rien par où les meschans gaignent plus aiséement credit autour d'eux: ny maquerelage si propre et si ordinaire à corrompre la chasteté des femmes, que de les paistre et entretenir de leurs loüanges.

Le premier enchantement que les Sirenes employent à piper Vlysses, est de cette nature: Deça vers nous, deça, ô tresloüable Vlysse, / Et le plus grand honneur dont la Grece fleurisse. Ces philosophes là disoient, que toute la gloire du monde ne meritoit pas qu'vn homme d'entendement estendist seulement le doigt pour l'acquerir: Gloria quantalibet quid erit, si gloria tantúm est? Ie dis pour elle seule: car elle tire souuent à sa suite plusieurs commoditez, pour lesquelles elle se peut rendre desirable: elle nous acquiert de la bienvueillance: elle nous rend moins exposez aux iniures et offences d'autruy, et choses semblables.

2.16.4 C'estoit aussi des principaux dogmes d'Epicurus: car ce precepte de sa secte, cache ta vie, qui deffend aux hommes de s'empescher des charges et negotiations publiques, presuppose aussi necessairement qu'on mesprise la gloire: qui est vne approbation que le monde fait des actions que nous mettons en euidence. Celuy qui nous ordonne de nous cacher, et de n'auoir soing que de nous, et qui ne veut pas que nous soyons connus d'autruy, il veut encores moins que nous en soyons honorez et glorifiez. Aussi conseille il à Idomeneus, de ne regler aucunement ses actions, par l'opinion ou reputation commune: si ce n'est pour euiter les autres incommoditez accidentales, que le mespris des hommes luy pourroit apporter.

2.16.5 Ces discours là sont infiniment vrais, à mon aduis, et raisonnables. Mais nous sommes, ie ne sçay comment, doubles en nous mesmes, qui fait que ce que nous croyons, nous ne le croyons pas: et ne nous pouuons deffaire de ce que nous condamnons. Voyons les dernieres paroles d'Epicurus, et qu'il dit en mourant: elles sont grandes et dignes d'vn tel philosophe: mais si ont elles quelque merque de la recommendation de son nom, et de cette humeur qu'il auoit descriée par ses more dangerous or more to be avoided than the one that comes to us from others' approval. Indeed, experience makes us feel many very harmful betrayals from it. Nothing poisons princes so much as flattery, nor is there anything by which the wicked more easily gain credit around them. Nor is there any pandering so apt and so common for corrupting women's chastity as feeding and entertaining them with their own praises.[2]

ENGLISH

The first enchantment the Sirens use to beguile Ulysses is of this kind: Come this way, come to us, O most praiseworthy Ulysses, / The greatest honor that makes Greece flourish. Those philosophers said that all the glory in the world did not deserve that a man of understanding should so much as stretch out a finger to acquire it: Glory, however great, what will it be, if it is only glory? I mean for itself alone; for it often draws in its train many advantages for which it may become desirable: it wins us goodwill; it makes us less exposed to the insults and injuries of others; and the like.[3]

This was also one of Epicurus' chief doctrines. For that precept of his school, "Hide your life," which forbids men to burden themselves with public offices and business, also necessarily presupposes contempt for glory, which is the world's approval of the actions we bring into view. He who orders us to hide ourselves and to care only for ourselves, and who does not want us to be known by others, wants still less that we be honored and glorified by them. So he advises Idomeneus not to regulate his actions in any way by common opinion or reputation, except to avoid the other incidental inconveniences that men's contempt might bring him.[4]

Those arguments are infinitely true, in my opinion, and reasonable. But we are, I know not how, double within ourselves, so that what we believe we do not believe, and we cannot rid ourselves of what we condemn. Let us look at Epicurus' last words, what he said as he was dying. They are great and worthy of such a philosopher; and yet they bear some mark of concern for the renown of his name, and of that disposition he had decried in

2 Diogenes of Babylon, a Stoic of the 2nd century BC; Montaigne follows Cicero, On Ends.
3 Homer, Odyssey XII, in Montaigne's own French verse; the Latin is from Juvenal, Satires.
4 The advice is reported by Seneca.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	preceptes. Voicy vne lettre qu'il dicta vn peu auant son dernier souspir. Epicvrvs a Hermachvs salvt.	his precepts. Here is a letter he dictated a little before his last breath. Epicurus to Hermarchus, greeting.[5]
2.16.6	Ce pendant que ie passois l'heureux, et celuy-là mesmes le dernier iour de ma vie, i'escriuois cecy, accompaigné toutesfois de telle douleur en la vessie et aux intestins, qu'il ne peut rien estre adiousté à sa grandeur. Mais elle estoit compensée par le plaisir qu'apportoit à mon ame la souuenance de mes inuentions et de mes discours. Or toy comme requiert l'affection que tu as eu dés ton enfance enuers moy, et la philosophie, embrasse la protection des enfans de Metrodorus.	While I was passing the happy day of my life, which is also the last, I wrote this, though accompanied by such pain in the bladder and intestines that nothing could be added to its intensity. But it was offset by the pleasure my soul took in remembering my discoveries and my reasonings. Now you, as the affection you have shown since childhood toward me and toward philosophy requires, take upon yourself the protection of the children of Metrodorus.[6]
2.16.7	Voila sa lettre. Et ce qui me fait interpreter que ce plaisir qu'il dit sentir en son ame, de ses inuentions, regarde aucunement la reputation qu'il en esperoit acquerir apres sa mort, c'est l'ordonnance de son testament, par lequel il veut que Aminomachus et Timocrates ses heritiers, fournissent pour la celebration de son iour natal tous les mois de Ianuier, les frais que Hermachus ordonneroit: et aussi pour la despence qui se feroit le vingtiesme iour de chasque lune, au traittement des philosophes ses familiers, qui s'assembleroient à l'honneur de la memoire de luy et de Metrodorus.	That is his letter. And what makes me interpret this pleasure he says he felt in his soul from his discoveries as having something to do with the reputation he hoped to gain from them after his death is a provision of his will. By it he directs that Amynomachus and Timocrates, his heirs, should furnish, for the celebration of his birthday every January, whatever expenses Hermarchus might prescribe; and also the cost, on the twentieth day of each moon, of entertaining the philosophers of his circle who would gather in honor of his memory and that of Metrodorus.

GLORY FOR ITS OWN SAKE

Carneades and Aristotle defend glory, but virtue that works only for show is no virtue.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.16.8	Carneades a esté chef de l'opinion contraire: et a maintenu que la gloire estoit pour elle mesme desirable, tout ainsi que nous embrassons nos posthumes pour eux-mesmes, n'en ayans aucune cognoissance ny iouyssance. Cette opinion n'a pas failly d'estre plus communement suyuie, comme sont volontiers celles qui s'accommodent le plus à nos inclinations. Aristote luy donne le premier rang entre les biens externes: Euite, comme deux extremes vicieux, l'immoderation, et à la rechercher, et à la fuyr. Ie croy que si nous auions les liures que Cicero auoit escrit sur ce subiect, il nous en conteroit de belles: car cet homme là fut si forcené de cette passion, que s'il eust osé, il fust, ce crois-ie, volontiers tombé en l'excez où tomberent d'autres, que la vertu mesme n'estoit	Carneades was the leader of the opposite opinion. He maintained that glory was desirable for its own sake, just as we cherish those who will come after our death for their own sake, though we shall have no knowledge or enjoyment of them. This opinion has not failed to be more commonly followed, as those that best suit our inclinations readily are. Aristotle gives glory first rank among external goods. He shuns, as two vicious extremes, immoderation both in seeking it and in fleeing it. I believe that if we had the books Cicero wrote on this subject, he would tell us some fine things. For that man was so frantic with this passion that, had he dared, he would, I believe, readily have fallen into the excess others fell into: that virtue itself

5 Hermarchus succeeded Epicurus as head of his school; Montaigne takes the letter from Cicero, On Ends.
6 Metrodorus died before Epicurus.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	desirable, que pour l'honneur qui se tenoit tousiours à sa suitte: Paulum sepultæ distat inertiæ / Celata virtus. Qui est vn' opinion si fauce, que ie suis dépit qu'elle ait iamais peu entrer en l'entendement d'homme, qui eust cet honneur de porter le nom de philosophe.	was desirable only for the honor that always followed in its train. Hidden virtue differs little / From buried sloth. This is an opinion so false that I am vexed it could ever have entered the understanding of a man who had the honor of bearing the name of philosopher.[7]
2.16.9	Si cela estoit vray, il ne faudroit estre vertueux qu'en public: et les operations de l'ame, où est le vray siege de la vertu, nous n'aurions que faire de les tenir en regle et en ordre, sinon autant qu'elles deburoient venir à la cognoissance d'autruy. N'y va il donc que de faillir finement et subtilement? Si tu sçais, dit Carneades, vn serpent caché en ce lieu, auquel sans y penser, se va seoir celuy, de la mort duquel tu esperes profit: tu fais meschamment, si tu ne l'en aduertis: et d'autant plus que ton action ne doibt estre cognuë que de toy.	If that were true, we would need to be virtuous only in public; and the workings of the soul, where the true seat of virtue lies, we would need to keep in rule and order only insofar as they were going to come to others' knowledge. Is it, then, only a matter of doing wrong cleverly and subtly? If you know, says Carneades, of a snake hidden in a place where, without a thought, a man is about to sit whose death you hope to profit from, you act wickedly if you do not warn him—and all the more so since your action can be known by no one but you.
	Si nous ne prenons de nous mesmes la loy de bien faire: si l'impunité nous est iustice, à combien de sortes de meschancetez auons nous tous les iours à nous abandonner? Ce que S. Peduceus fit, de rendre fidelement cela que C. Plotius auoit commis à sa seule science, de ses richesses, et ce que i'en ay faict souuent de mesme, ie ne le trouue pas tant loüable, comme ie trouueroy execrable, que nous y eussions failly. Et trouue bon et vtile à ramenteuoir en noz iours, l'exemple de P. Sextilius Ruffus, que Cicero accuse pour auoir recueilly vne heredité contre sa conscience: non seulement, non contre les loix, mais par les loix mesmes. Et M. Crassus, et Q.	If we do not take the law of doing good from ourselves, if impunity counts as justice for us, to how many kinds of wickedness must we abandon ourselves every day? What S. Peducaeus did, in faithfully returning that part of his wealth which C. Plotius had entrusted to him alone without anyone's knowledge—and I have often done the same—I do not find so praiseworthy as I would find it execrable to have failed to do it. And I find it good and useful to recall in our day the example of P. Sextilius Rufus, whom Cicero accuses of having taken up an inheritance against his conscience—not merely not against the laws, but by the laws themselves. And M. Crassus and Q.[8]
	Hortensius, lesquels à cause de leur authorité et puissance, ayants esté pour certaines quotitez appellez par vn estranger à la succession d'vn testament faux, à fin que par ce moyen il y establist sa part: se contenterent de n'estre participants de la fauceté, et ne refuserent d'en tirer du fruit: assez couuerts, s'ils se tenoient à l'abry des accusations, et des tesmoins, et des loix. Meminerint Deum se habere testem, id est, vt ego arbitror, mentem suam.	Hortensius, who, because of their authority and power, were named by a foreigner as heirs for certain shares of a forged will, so that he might secure his own share by this means. They were content not to be party to the forgery, and did not refuse to reap its fruit—well enough covered, they thought, if they kept sheltered from accusations, from witnesses, and from the laws. Let them remember that they have God as their witness, that is, as I take it, their own mind.[9]
2.16.10	La vertu est chose bien vaine et friuole, si elle tire sa recommendation de la gloire. Pour neant	Virtue is a very vain and frivolous thing if it draws its worth from glory. In vain would we try to give

7 Cicero's treatise On Glory is lost; the verses are from Horace, Odes.
8 These Roman examples come from Cicero, On Ends II and On Duties III.
9 Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

entreprendrions nous de luy faire tenir son rang à part, et la déioindrions de la Fortune: car qu'est-il plus fortuite que la reputation? Profectò fortuna in omni re dominatur: ea res cunctas ex libidine magis quàm ex vero celebrat obscurátque. De faire que les actions soyent cognues et veuës, c'est le pur ouurage de la Fortune. C'est le sort qui nous applique la gloire, selon sa temerité. Ie l'ay veuë fort souuent marcher auant le merite: et souuent outrepasser le merite d'vne longue mesure. Celuy qui premier s'aduisa de la ressemblance de l'ombre à la gloire, fit mieux qu'il ne vouloit. Ce sont choses excellemment vaines.

Elle va aussi quelque fois deuant son corps: et quelque fois l'excede de beaucoup en longueur. Ceux qui apprennent à la noblesse de ne chercher en la vaillance que l'honneur: quasi non sit honestum quod nobilitatum non sit: que gaignent-ils par là, que de les instruire de ne se hazarder iamais, si on ne les voit, et de prendre bien garde, s'il y a des tesmoins, qui puissent rapporter nouuelles de leur valeur, là où il se presente mille occasions de bien faire, sans qu'on en puisse estre remerqué? Combien de belles actions particulieres s'enseuelisent dans la foule d'vne bataille?

Quiconque s'amuse à contreroller autruy pendant vne telle meslée, il n'y est guere embesoigné: et produit contre soy mesmes le tesmoignage qu'il rend des deportemens de ses compaignons. Vera et sapiens animi magnitudo, honestum illud quod maximè naturam sequitur, in factis positum, non in gloria, iudicat. Toute la gloire, que ie pretens de ma vie, c'est de l'auoir vescue tranquille. Tranquille non selon Metrodorus, ou Arcesilas, ou Aristippus, mais selon moy. Puisque la philosophie n'a sçeu trouuer aucune voye pour la tranquillité, qui fust bonne en commun, que chacun la cherche en son particulier.

ENGLISH

it a rank of its own and separate it from Fortune; for what is more fortuitous than reputation? Truly, Fortune rules in all things: she makes everything famous or obscure according to her whim rather than the truth. Making actions known and seen is purely the work of Fortune. It is chance that bestows glory on us, as blindly as it pleases. I have very often seen glory walk ahead of merit, and often outstrip merit by a long way. The man who first noticed the resemblance between shadow and glory did better than he meant to. They are supremely vain things.[10]

A shadow, too, sometimes goes ahead of its body, and sometimes far exceeds it in length. Those who teach the nobility to seek nothing in valor but honor—as if nothing were honorable that is not famous—what do they gain by it, except to teach them never to take a risk unless they are seen, and to take good care that there are witnesses who can carry back news of their valor, when a thousand occasions present themselves for doing well without anyone being able to notice? How many fine individual deeds are buried in the crush of a battle?[11]

Whoever amuses himself checking up on others in the middle of such a melee is hardly busy fighting himself; the testimony he gives of his comrades' conduct is evidence against himself. True and wise greatness of soul judges that the honorable, which most closely follows nature, lies in deeds, not in glory. All the glory I aspire to from my life is to have lived it in tranquillity—tranquillity not according to Metrodorus, or Arcesilaus, or Aristippus, but according to me. Since philosophy has not been able to find any road to tranquillity that would be good for everyone in common, let each man seek it for himself.[12]

FORTUNE MAKES REPUTATIONS

Countless brave deeds die without witnesses; only Fortune decides whose name survives.

FRENCH

2.16.11 A qui doiuent Cæsar et Alexandre cette grandeur infinie de leur renommée, qu'à la Fortune? Combien d'hommes a elle esteint, sur le commencement de leur progrés,

ENGLISH

To whom do Caesar and Alexander owe the infinite greatness of their renown, if not to Fortune? How many men has she snuffed out at the very 10 Sallust, The War with Catiline.

11 Cicero, On Duties.
12 Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

desquels nous n'auons aucune cognoissance, qui y apportoient mesme courage que le leur, si le malheur de leur sort ne les eust arrestez tout court, sur la naissance mesme de leurs entreprinses? Au trauers de tant et si extremes dangers il ne me souuient point auoir leu que Cæsar ait esté iamais blessé. Mille sont morts de moindres perils, que le moindre de ceux qu'il franchit. Infinies belles actions se doiuent perdre sans tesmoignage, auant qu'il en vienne vne à profit.

On n'est pas tousiours sur le haut d'vne bresche, ou à la teste d'vne armée, à la veuë de son general, comme sur vn eschaffaut. On est surpris entre la haye et le fossé: il faut tenter fortune contre vn poullailler: il faut dénicher quatre chetifs harquebusiers d'vne grange: il faut seul s'escarter de la trouppe et entreprendre seul, selon la necessité qui s'offre. Et si on prend garde, on trouuera, à mon aduis, qu'il aduient par experience, que les moins esclattantes occasions sont les plus dangereuses: et qu'aux guerres, qui se sont passées de notre temps, il s'est perdu plus de gens de bien, aux occasions legeres et peu importantes, et à la contestation de quelque bicoque, qu'és lieux dignes et honnorables.

2.16.12 Qui tient sa mort pour mal employée, si ce n'est en occasion signalée: au lieu d'illustrer sa mort, il obscurcit volontiers sa vie: laissant eschapper ce pendant plusieurs iustes occasions de se hazarder. Et toutes les iustes sont illustres assez: sa conscience les trompettant suffisamment à chacun. Gloria nostra est testimonium conscientiæ nostræ. Qui n'est homme de bien que par ce qu'on le sçaura, et par ce qu'on l'en estimera mieux, apres l'auoir sçeu, qui ne veut bien faire qu'en condition que sa vertu vienne à la cognoissance des hommes, celuy-là n'est pas personne de qui on puisse tirer beaucoup de seruice.

Credo che'l resto di quel verno cose
Facesse degne di tener ne conto;
Ma fur sin'à quel tempo si nascose,
Che non è colpa mia s'hor' non le conto:
Perche Orlando a far l'opre virtuose,
Piu ch'à narrarle poi, sempre era pronto,
Nè mai fu alcun'de li suoi fatti espresso,
Senon quando hebbe i testimonij appresso. Il faut aller à la guerre pour son deuoir, et en attendre cette recompense, qui ne peut faillir à toutes belles actions, pour occultes start of their progress, men of whom we know nothing, who brought to it the same courage as theirs, had not the misfortune of their lot stopped them short at the very birth of their enterprises? Through so many and such extreme dangers, I do not remember reading that Caesar was ever wounded. A thousand men have died from perils smaller than the least of those he came through. Countless fine deeds must be lost without witness before one of them yields any profit.

ENGLISH

You are not always at the top of a breach or at the head of an army, in sight of your general, as if on a stage. You are caught between hedge and ditch; you have to try your luck against a henhouse; you have to dislodge four wretched arquebusiers from a barn; you have to break away from the troop and act alone, as necessity arises. And if you pay attention, you will find, in my opinion, that experience shows the least brilliant occasions to be the most dangerous; and that in the wars of our time more good men have been lost on slight and unimportant occasions, and in the struggle over some petty shack of a fort, than in worthy and honorable places.

The man who considers his death ill spent unless it comes on some signal occasion is apt, instead of making his death illustrious, to obscure his life, letting slip meanwhile many just occasions for risking himself. And all just occasions are illustrious enough, since each man's conscience trumpets them loudly enough to him. Our glory is the testimony of our conscience. The man who is good only because people will know it, and because they will think better of him once they know it; who will do good only on condition that his virtue comes to men's knowledge—that is not a person from whom much service can be expected.[13]

I believe that for the rest of that winter he did Things worthy of being recorded;
But up to that time they were so hidden
That it is not my fault if I do not tell them now:
For Orlando was always readier
To do valiant deeds than to tell of them afterward,
Nor was any of his deeds ever made known Except when he had witnesses at hand. We must go to war out of duty and expect from it the reward that 13 Saint Paul, 2 Corinthians 1:12.

FRENCH

qu'elles soyent, non pas mesmes aux vertueuses pensées: c'est le contentement qu'vne conscience bien reglée reçoit en soy, de bien faire.

Il faut estre vaillant pour soy-mesmes, et pour l'auantage que c'est d'auoir son courage logé en vne assiette ferme et asseurée, contre les assauts de la Fortune. Virtus,
repulsæ nescia sordidæ,
Intaminatis fulget honoribus:
Nec sumit aut ponit secures
Arbitrio popularis auræ. Ce n'est pas pour la montre, que nostre ame doit iouër son rolle, c'est chez nous au dedans, où nuls yeux ne donnent que les nostres: là elle nous couure de la crainte de la mort, des douleurs et de la honte mesme: elle nous asseure là, de la perte de nos enfans, de nos amis, et de nos fortunes: et quand l'opportunité s'y presente, elle nous conduit aussi aux hazards de la guerre.

Non emolumento aliquo, sed ipsius honestatis decore. Ce profit est bien plus grand, et bien plus digne d'estre souhaité et esperé, que l'honneur et la gloire, qui n'est autre chose qu'vn fauorable iugement qu'on fait de nous.

2.16.13 Il faut trier de toute vne nation, vne douzaine d'hommes, pour iuger d'vn arpent de terre, et le iugement de nos inclinations, et de nos actions, la plus difficile matiere, et la plus importante qui soit, nous la remettons à la voix de la commune et de la tourbe, mere d'ignorance, d'iniustice, et d'inconstance. Est-ce raison de faire dependre la vie d'vn sage, du iugement des fols? An quidquam stultius, quàm quos singulos contemnas, eos aliquid putare esse vniuersos? Quiconque vise à leur plaire, il n'a iamais faict, c'est vne bute qui n'a ny forme ny prise.

Nil tam inæstimabile est, quàm animi multitudinis. Demetrius disoit plaisamment de la voix du peuple, qu'il ne faisoit non plus de recette, de celle qui luy sortoit par en haut, que de celle qui luy sortoit par en bas. Celuy la dit encore plus: Ego hoc iudico, si quando turpe non sit, tamen non esse non turpe, quum id à multitudine laudetur. Null'art, nulle soupplesse d'esprit pourroit conduire nos pas à la suitte d'vn guide si desuoyé et si desreglé. En cette confusion venteuse de bruits de rapports et opinions vulgaires, qui cannot fail any fine deed, however hidden, nor even virtuous thoughts: the contentment that a well-ordered conscience feels within itself at doing well.[14]

ENGLISH

We must be valiant for our own sake, and for the advantage of having our courage lodged in a firm and secure position against the assaults of Fortune. Virtue, knowing nothing of shameful defeat,
Shines with untarnished honors,
And neither takes up nor lays down the axes
At the whim of the popular breeze. It is not for show that our soul must play its part; it is at home, within, where no eyes reach but our own. There it shields us from the fear of death, of pain, and even of shame; there it steadies us against the loss of our children, our friends, and our fortunes; and when the opportunity arises, it also leads us into the hazards of war.[15]

Not for any gain, but for the beauty of honor itself. This profit is far greater, and far more worth wishing and hoping for, than honor and glory, which is nothing but a favorable judgment others make of us.[16]

To judge an acre of land, a dozen men are picked out of a whole nation. Yet the judgment of our inclinations and our actions, the most difficult and the most important matter there is, we leave to the voice of the common people and the mob, mother of ignorance, injustice and inconstancy. Is it reasonable to make a wise man's life depend on the judgment of fools? Is anything more foolish than to think that those whom you despise one by one amount to something all together? Whoever aims to please them will never be done: it is a target with neither shape nor hold.[17]

Nothing is so incalculable as the minds of the multitude. Demetrius said wittily of the voice of the people that he set no more store by the sound it let out from above than by the sound it let out from below. Another goes further still: My judgment is this: even if a thing is not shameful, it cannot help being shameful when it is praised by the multitude. No skill, no suppleness of mind could guide our steps in the wake of so wayward and disorderly a guide.

14 Ariosto, Orlando Furioso.
15 Horace, Odes; the axes are the fasces carried before Roman magistrates.
16 Cicero, On Ends.
17 The Latin is Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	nous poussent, il ne se peut establir aucune route qui vaille.	In this windy confusion of rumors, reports and common opinions that push us about, no route worth anything can be laid down.[18]
	Ne nous proposons point vne fin si flotante et volage: allons constamment apres la raison: que l'approbation publique nous suyue par là, si elle veut: et comme elle despend toute de la Fortune, nous n'auons point loy de l'esperer plustost par autre voye que par celle là.	Let us not set ourselves so floating and fickle an end. Let us follow reason steadily, and let public approval follow us along that path if it will. And since it depends entirely on Fortune, we have no ground to hope for it by any other road than that one.
2.16.14	Quand pour sa droiture ie ne suyurois le droit chemin, ie le suyurois pour auoir trouué par experience, qu'au bout du compte, c'est communement le plus heureux, et le plus vtile. Dedit hoc prouidentia hominibus munus, vt honesta magis iuuarent. Le marinier ancien disoit ainsin à Neptune, en vne grande tempeste: O Dieu tu me sauueras si tu veux, si tu veux tu me perdras: mais si tiendray-ie tousiours droit mon timon.	Even if I did not follow the straight road because it is straight, I would follow it because I have found by experience that in the end it is usually the happiest and the most useful. Providence has granted men this gift: that honorable things should be the most profitable. The sailor of old spoke thus to Neptune in a great storm: "O God, you will save me if you will; if you will, you will destroy me; but still I shall always hold my tiller straight."[19]
	I'ay veu de mon temps mill' hommes soupples, mestis, ambigus, et que nul ne doubtoit plus prudens mondains que moy, se perdre où ie me suis sauué: Risi successu posse carere dolos. Paul Æmyle allant en sa glorieuse expedition de Macedoine, aduertit sur tout le peuple à Rome, de contenir leur langue de ses actions, pendant son absence. Que la licence des iugements, est vn grand destourbier aux grands affaires! D'autant que chacun n'a pas la fermeté de Fabius à l'encontre des voix communes, contraires et iniurieuses qui ayma mieux laisser desmembrer son authorité aux vaines fantasies des hommes, que faire moins bien sa charge, auec fauorable reputation, et populaire consentement.	In my time I have seen a thousand men, supple, two-faced, ambiguous, whom no one doubted to be more worldly-wise than I, come to ruin where I came through safe: I laughed to see that cunning can fail of success. Paulus Aemilius, setting out on his glorious expedition to Macedonia, warned the people of Rome above all to hold their tongues about his actions while he was away. What a great hindrance the license of judgments is to great affairs! For not everyone has the firmness of Fabius against the common voices, hostile and abusive: he preferred to let his authority be torn to pieces by men's idle notions rather than do his task less well with a favorable reputation and popular consent.[20]
2.16.15	Il y a ie ne sçay quelle douceur naturelle à se sentir louër, mais nous luy prestons trop de beaucoup. Laudari haud metuam, neque enim mihi cornea fibra es; Sed recti finémqve extremúmque esse recuso Euge tuum et bellè. Ie ne me soucie pas tant, quel ie sois chez autruy, comme ie me soucie quel ie sois en moy-mesme. Ie veux estre riche par moy, non par emprunt. Les estrangers ne voyent que les euenemens et apparences externes: chacun peut faire bonne mine par	There is some natural sweetness in feeling oneself praised, but we lend it far too much. I would not fear praise, for my heart is not made of horn; But I refuse to take your "Bravo!" and your "Well done!" As the end and the limit of what is right. I do not care so much what I am in other people's eyes as I care what I am in myself. I want to be rich through myself, not by borrowing. Outsiders see only outcomes and outward appearances; anyone can put

18 The first Latin is Livy, History of Rome 31; Demetrius is the Cynic philosopher whose saying Seneca reports. The second Latin is Cicero, On Ends 2.
19 The Latin is Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory 1. The sailor's prayer is reported by Seneca in his Letters.
20 The Latin is Ovid, Heroides 1. Fabius Maximus, called the Delayer, held to his cautious strategy against Hannibal although he was mocked for it at Rome.

FRENCH

le dehors, plein au dedans de fiebure et d'effroy. Ils ne voyent pas mon cœur, ils ne voyent que mes contenances.

On a raison de descrier l'hypocrisie, qui se trouue en la guerre: car qu'est il plus aisé à vn homme pratic, que de gauchir aux dangers, et de contrefaire le mauuais, ayant le cœur plein de mollesse? Il y a tant de moyens d'euiter les occasions de se hazarder en particulier, que nous aurons trompé mille fois le monde, auant que de nous engager à vn dangereux pas: et lors mesme, nous y trouuant empétrez, nous sçaurons bien pour ce coup, couurir nostre ieu d'vn bon visage, et d'vne parolle asseurée, quoy que l'ame nous tremble au dedans.

Et qui auroit l'vsage de l'anneau Platonique, rendant inuisible celuy qui le portoit au doigt, si on luy donnoit le tour vers le plat de la main: assez de gents souuent se cacheroyent, où il se faut presenter le plus: et se repentiroyent d'estre placez en lieu si honorable, auquel la necessité les rend asseurez. Falsus honor iuuat, et mendax infamia terret / Quem, nisi mendosum et mendacem? Voyla comment tous ces iugemens qui se font des apparences externes, sont merueilleusement incertains et douteux: et n'est aucun si asseuré tesmoing, comme chacun à soy-mesme. En celles là combien auons nous de goujats, compaignons de nostre gloire?

Celuy qui se tient ferme dans vne tranchée descouuerte, que fait il en cela, que ne facent deuant luy cinquante pauures pionniers, qui luy ouurent le pas, et le couurent de leurs corps, pour cinq sols de paye par iour? Non quicquid turbida Roma
Eleuet, accedas, examénque improbum in illa
Castiges trutina: nec te quæsiueris extrà.

ENGLISH

a good face on things outside while full of fever and terror inside. They do not see my heart; they see only my bearing.[21]

People are right to decry the hypocrisy found in war. For what is easier for a practiced man than to dodge dangers and play the fierce fighter while his heart is full of softness? There are so many ways of avoiding occasions to risk ourselves individually that we will have deceived the world a thousand times before committing ourselves to a dangerous pass. And even then, finding ourselves caught in it, we will know well enough how to cover our game for the moment with a bold face and a confident word, though our soul trembles within.

And if anyone had the use of Plato's ring, which made its wearer invisible when it was turned toward the palm of the hand, plenty of people would often hide just where they most ought to show themselves, and would regret being placed in so honorable a post, where it is necessity that makes them steady. False honor delights, and lying slander frightens / Whom but the faulty and the liar? See how wonderfully uncertain and doubtful all these judgments made from outward appearances are; and there is no witness so sure as each man to himself. In those appearances, how many camp servants do we have as partners in our glory?[22]

The man who stands firm in an open trench—what does he do there that fifty poor sappers have not done before him, who open the way for him and cover him with their bodies for five sous' pay a day? If muddled Rome makes light of something,
Do not side with it, nor try to set right the faulty needle
On that scale; do not look for yourself outside yourself.

TO BE TALKED ABOUT

Men want to be talked about at any price, though fame cannot reach us after death.

FRENCH

2.16.16 Nous appellons aggrandir nostre nom, l'estendre et semer en plusieurs bouches: nous voulons qu'il y soit receu en bonne part, et que cette sienne accroissance luy vienne à profit: voyla ce qu'il y peut auoir de plus excusable en ce dessein. Mais l'exces de cette maladie en va iusques là, que plusieurs cherchent de faire parler d'eux en quelque façon que ce soit. Trogus Pompeius dit

ENGLISH

We call it enlarging our name to spread it and sow it in many mouths. We want it to be well received there, and we want this growth of it to bring it profit: that is what may be most excusable in this design. But the excess of this malady goes so far that many seek to get themselves talked about in any way whatever. Trogus Pompeius says of Hero-

21 Persius, Satires 1.
22 The ring of Gyges, told in Plato's Republic, Book 2. The Latin is Horace, Epistles 1.16.

FRENCH

de Herostratus, et Titus Liuius de Manlius Capitolinus, qu'ils estoyent plus desireux de grande, que de bonne reputation. Ce vice est ordinaire. Nous nous soignons plus qu'on parle de nous, que comment on en parle: et nous est assez que nostre nom coure par la bouche des hommes, en quelque condition qu'il y coure.

Il semble que l'estre conneu, ce soit aucunement auoir sa vie et sa durée en la garde d'autruy.

2.16.17 Moy, ie tiens que ie ne suis que chez moy, et de cette autre mienne vie qui loge en la cognoissance de mes amis, à la considerer nuë, et simplement en soy, ie sçay bien que ie n'en sens fruict ny iouyssance, que par la vanité d'vne opinion fantastique. Et quand ie seray mort, ie m'en resentiray encores beaucoup moins. Et si perdray tout net, l'vsage des vrayes vtilitez, qui accidentalement la suyuent par fois: ie n'auray plus de prise par où saisir la reputation: ny par où elle puisse me toucher ny arriuer à moy.

Car de m'attendre que mon nom la reçoiue: premierement ie n'ay point de nom qui soit assez mien: de deux que i'ay, l'vn est commun à toute ma race, voire encore à d'autres. Il y a vne famille à Paris et à Montpelier, qui se surnomme Montaigne: vne autre en Bretaigne, et en Xaintonge, de la Montaigne. Le remuement d'vne seule syllabe, meslera noz fusées, de façon que i'auray part à leur gloire, et eux à l'aduenture à ma honte. Et si, les miens se sont autresfois surnommez Eyquem, surnom qui touche encore vne maison cogneuë en Angleterre. Quant à mon autre nom, il est, à quiconque aura enuie de le prendre. Ainsi i'honoreray peut estre, vn crocheteur en ma place.

Et puis quand i'aurois vne merque particuliere pour moy, que peut elle merquer quand ie n'y suis plus? peut elle designer et fauorir l'inanité? Nunc leuior cippus non imprimit ossa
Laudat posteritas, nunc non è manibus illis,
Nunc non è tumulo fortunatáque fauilla
Nascuntur violæ? Mais de cecy i'en ay parlé ailleurs.

2.16.18 Au demeurant en toute vne bataille où dix mill' hommes sont stropiez ou tuez, il n'en est pas quinze dequoy lon parle. Il faut que ce soit quelque grandeur bien eminente, stratus, and Livy of Manlius Capitolinus, that they were more eager for a great reputation than for a good one. This vice is common. We care more that people talk about us than how they talk about us; and it is enough for us that our name runs in men's mouths, in whatever condition it runs.[23]

ENGLISH

It seems that to be known is in some way to have one's life and its duration in other people's keeping.

For my part, I hold that I exist only within myself. As for that other life of mine that lodges in my friends' knowledge, considered bare and simply in itself, I know well that I get no fruit or enjoyment from it except through the vanity of a fanciful opinion. And when I am dead I shall feel it much less still. Besides, I shall lose outright the use of the real benefits that sometimes follow it by accident: I shall no longer have any handle by which to seize reputation, nor any by which it can touch me or reach me.

For if I expect my name to receive it—first of all, I have no name that is sufficiently my own. Of the two I have, one is common to my whole line, and indeed to others as well. There is a family in Paris and Montpellier called Montaigne, another in Brittany and Saintonge called de la Montaigne. Shifting a single syllable will tangle our skeins, so that I shall have a share in their glory, and they perhaps in my shame. What is more, my people were once surnamed Eyquem, a surname that also belongs to a well-known house in England. As for my other name, it belongs to anyone who cares to take it. So I may perhaps be honoring a porter in my place.[24]

And then, even if I had a mark of my own, what can it mark when I am no longer there? Can it designate and favor emptiness? Does the gravestone not press more lightly on his bones now?
Posterity praises him: do not violets now spring
From those remains, from that tomb
And those blessed ashes? But I have spoken of this elsewhere.

For the rest, in a whole battle where ten thousand men are maimed or killed, there are not fifteen who get talked about. It must be some very emin-

23 Herostratus burned the temple of Artemis at Ephesus in 356 BC to make himself famous; Manlius Capitolinus, who saved the Capitol from the Gauls, was later put to death for aiming at kingship.
24 Eyquem was the surname of Montaigne's merchant ancestors; his "other name" is his Christian name, Michel.

FRENCH

ou quelque consequence d'importance, que la Fortune y ait iointe, qui face valoir vn' action priuée, non d'vn harquebuzier seulement, mais d'vn Capitaine: car de tuer vn homme, ou deux, ou dix, de se presenter courageusement à la mort, c'est à la verité quelque chose à chacun de nous, car il y va de tout: mais pour le monde, ce sont choses si ordinaires, il s'en voit tant tous les iours, et en faut tant de pareilles pour produire vn effect notable, que nous n'en pouuons attendre aucune particuliere recommendation.

Casus multis hic cognitus, ac iam / Tritus, et è medio fortunæ ductus aceruo.

2.16.19 De tant de miliasses de vaillans hommes qui sont morts depuis quinze cens ans en France, les armes en la main, il n'y en a pas cent, qui soyent venus à nostre cognoissance. La memoire non des chefs seulement, mais des battailles et victoires est enseuelie. Les fortunes de plus de la moitié du monde, à faute de registre, ne bougent de leur place, et s'esuanoüissent sans durée. Si i'auois en ma possession les euenemens incognus, i'en penserois tresfacilement supplanter les cognus, en toute espece d'exemples. Quoy, que des Romains mesmes, et des Grecs, parmy tant d'escriuains et de tesmoings, et tant de rares et nobles exploicts, il en est venu si peu iusques à nous?

Ad nos vix tenuis famæ perlabitur aura. Ce sera beaucoup si d'icy à cent ans on se souuient en gros, que de nostre temps il y a eu des guerres ciuiles en France. Les Lacedemoniens sacrifioient aux Muses entrans en battaille, afin que leurs gestes fussent bien et dignement escris, estimants que ce fust vne faueur diuine, et non commune, que les belles actions trouuassent des tesmoings qui leur sçeussent donner vie et memoire.

2.16.20 Pensons nous qu'à chasque harquebusade qui nous touche, et à chasque hazard que nous courons, il y ait soudain vn greffier qui l'enrolle? et cent greffiers outre cela le pourront escrire, desquels les commentaires ne dureront que trois iours, et ne viendront à la veuë de personne. Nous n'auons pas la milliesme partie des escrits anciens; c'est la Fortune qui leur donne vie, ou plus courte, ou plus longue, selon sa faueur: et ce que nous en auons, il nous est loisible de doubter, si c'est le pire, n'ayans pas veu le demeurant.

ENGLISH

ent greatness, or some important consequence that Fortune has attached to it, that gives value to a private action—not only of an arquebusier, but of a captain. For to kill a man, or two, or ten, to face death bravely, is indeed something to each of us, since everything is at stake; but for the world these are such ordinary things, so many of them are seen every day, and it takes so many like them to produce a notable effect, that we cannot expect any special recognition from them.

A case known to many, already / Worn threadbare, drawn from the middle of Fortune's heap.[25]

Of the many thousands upon thousands of valiant men who have died in France over the last fifteen hundred years with arms in their hands, not a hundred have come to our knowledge. The memory not only of the leaders but of battles and victories is buried. The fortunes of more than half the world, for lack of a record, never stir from their place and vanish without lasting. If I had the unknown events in my possession, I think I could very easily supplant the known ones with them, in every kind of example. What! Even of the Romans and the Greeks, with so many writers and witnesses and so many rare and noble exploits, so few have come down to us?

Barely a faint breath of their fame drifts down to us. It will be a great deal if, a hundred years from now, people remember in a general way that in our time there were civil wars in France. The Spartans sacrificed to the Muses as they went into battle, so that their deeds might be well and worthily written, considering it a divine and uncommon favor that fine actions should find witnesses able to give them life and memory.[26]

Do we think that at every arquebus shot that hits us, and every risk we run, there is suddenly a clerk on hand to enter it in the rolls? And besides, a hundred clerks may write it down, and their accounts will last only three days and come before no one's eyes. We do not have a thousandth part of ancient writings; it is Fortune who gives them life, shorter or longer according to her favor. And as for what we do have, we may well doubt whether it is the worst, since we have not seen the rest.

25 Juvenal, Satires 13.
26 Virgil, Aeneid 7.

FRENCH

On ne fait pas des histoires de choses de si peu: il faut auoir esté chef à conquerir vn Empire, ou vn Royaume, il faut auoir gaigné cinquante deux battailles assignées, tousiours plus foible en nombre, comme Cæsar. Dix mille bons compagnons et plusieurs grands Capitaines, moururent à sa suitte, vaillamment et courageusement, desquels les noms n'ont duré qu'autant que leurs femmes et leurs enfans vesquirent: Quos fama obscura recondit. De ceux mesme, que nous voyons bien faire, trois mois, ou trois ans apres qu'ils y sont demeurez, il ne s'en parle non plus que s'ils n'eussent iamais esté.

Quiconque considerera auec iuste mesure et proportion, de quelles gens et de quels faits, la gloire se maintient en la memoire des liures, il trouuera qu'il y a de nostre siecle, fort peu d'actions, et fort peu de personnes, qui y puissent pretendre nul droict. Combien auons nous veu d'hommes vertueux, suruiure à leur propre reputation, qui ont veu et souffert esteindre en leur presence, l'honneur et la gloire tres-iustement acquise en leurs ieunes ans? Et pour trois ans de cette vie fantastique et imaginaire, allons nous perdant nostre vraye vie et essentielle, et nous engager à vne mort perpetuelle? Les sages se proposent vne plus belle et plus iuste fin, à vne si importante entreprise.

Rectè facti, fecisse merces est: Officij fructus, ipsum officium est. Il seroit à l'aduanture excusable à vn peintre ou autre artisan, ou encores à vn rhetoricien ou grammairien, de se trauailler pour acquerir nom, par ses ouurages: mais les actions de la vertu, elles sont trop nobles d'elles mesmes, pour rechercher autre loyer, que de leur propre valeur: et notamment pour la chercher en la vanité des iugemens humains.

ENGLISH

Histories are not written about such trifles. One must have been the leader in conquering an empire or a kingdom; one must have won fifty-two pitched battles, always outnumbered, like Caesar. Ten thousand good comrades and many great captains died valiantly and courageously in his service, and their names lasted only as long as their wives and children lived: Whom an obscure fame hides away. Even of those we see do well, three months or three years after they have fallen, there is no more talk than if they had never existed.

Whoever considers, with fair measure and proportion, what kind of people and what kind of deeds glory keeps alive in the memory of books will find that in our age there are very few actions and very few persons that can claim any right to it. How many virtuous men have we seen outlive their own reputation, who have seen and endured the extinction, before their very eyes, of the honor and glory they very justly earned in their youth? And for three years of this fanciful and imaginary life, are we to go and lose our true and essential life, and commit ourselves to a perpetual death? The wise set themselves a finer and juster end for so important an undertaking.

The reward of a good deed is to have done it. The fruit of duty is duty itself. It might perhaps be excusable for a painter or some other craftsman, or even for a rhetorician or grammarian, to labor to win a name through his works. But the actions of virtue are too noble in themselves to seek any other wage than their own worth—and above all to seek it in the vanity of human judgments.[27]

A USEFUL FALSEHOOD

If the love of glory keeps men dutiful, lawgivers may feed it, as they fed people religious fables.

FRENCH

2.16.21 Si toute-fois cette fauce opinion sert au public à contenir les hommes en leur deuoir: si le peuple en est esueillé à la vertu: si les Princes sont touchez, de voir le monde benir la memoire de Traian, et abominer celle de Neron: si cela les esmeut, de voir le nom de ce grand pendart, autresfois si effroyable et si redoubté, maudit et outragé si librement par le premier escolier qui l'entreprend: qu'elle accroisse hardiment, et qu'on la nourrisse entre nous le plus qu'on pourra. Et Platon employant toutes

ENGLISH

If, however, this false opinion serves the public by keeping men to their duty; if the people are roused by it to virtue; if princes are moved to see the world bless the memory of Trajan and abhor that of Nero; if it stirs them to see the name of that great scoundrel, once so frightful and so dreaded, cursed and reviled so freely by the first schoolboy who takes it on—then let it grow boldly, and let us

27 Seneca, Letters 81, and Cicero, On Ends 2.

FRENCH

choses à rendre ses citoyens vertueux, leur conseille aussi, de ne mespriser la bonne estimation des peuples.

Et dit, que par quelque diuine inspiration il aduient, que les meschans mesmes sçauent souuent tant de parole, que d'opinion, iustement distinguer les bons des mauuais. Ce personnage et son pedagogue sont merueilleux, et hardis ouuriers à faire ioindre les operations et reuelations diuines tout par tout où faut l'humaine force. Et pour cette cause peut estre, l'appelloit Timon en l'iniuriant, le grand forgeur de miracles. Vt traijei poetæ confugiunt ad Deum, cùm explicare argumenti exitum non possunt.

2.16.22 Puis que les hommes par leur insuffisance ne se peuuent assez payer d'vne bonne monnoye, qu'on y employe encore la fauce. Ce moyen a esté practiqué par tous les legislateurs: et n'est police, où il n'y ait quelque meslange, ou de vanité ceremonieuse, ou d'opinion mensongere, qui serue de bride à tenir le peuple en office. C'est pour cela que la pluspart ont leurs origines et commencemens fabuleux, et enrichis de mysteres supernaturels. C'est cela, qui a donné credit aux religions bastardes, et les a faictes fauorir aux gens d'entendement.

Et pour cela, que Numa et Sertorius, pour rendre leurs hommes de meilleure creance, les paissoyent de cette sottise, l'vn que la nymphe Egeria, l'autre que sa biche blanche, luy apportoit de la part des Dieux, tous les conseils qu'il prenoit. Et l'authorité que Numa donna à ses loix soubs tiltre du patronage de cette Deesse, Zoroastre legislateur des Bactrians et des Perses, la donna aux siennes, soubs le nom du Dieu Oromazis: Trismegiste des Ægyptiens, de Mercure: Zamolxis des Scythes, de Vesta: Charondas des Chalcides, de Saturne: Minos des Candiots, de Iuppiter: Lycurgus des Lacedemoniens, d'Apollo: Dracon et Solon des Atheniens, de Minerue.

Et toute police a vn Dieu à sa teste: faucement les autres: veritablement celle, que Moïse dressa au peuple de Iudée sorty d'Ægypte. La religion des Bedoins, comme dit le sire de Iouinuille, portoit entre autres choses, que l'ame de celuy d'entre eux qui mouroit pour son Prince, s'en alloit en vn autre corps plus heureux, plus beau et plus fort que nourish it among us as much as we can. And Plato, using every means to make his citizens virtuous, also advises them not to despise the good esteem of the people.

ENGLISH

And he says that by some divine inspiration it happens that even the wicked often know how to distinguish the good from the bad rightly, both in word and in opinion. This man and his teacher are wonderful and bold workmen at bringing in divine operations and revelations wherever human strength falls short. And that is perhaps why Timon, insulting him, called him the great forger of miracles. As tragic poets take refuge in a god when they cannot work out the ending of their plot.[28]

Since men, through their inadequacy, cannot be paid well enough in good coin, let counterfeit be used as well. This method has been practiced by all lawgivers, and there is no government without some admixture either of ceremonial vanity or of lying opinion, to serve as a bridle to keep the people to their duty. That is why most of them have fabulous origins and beginnings, enriched with supernatural mysteries. That is what has given credit to spurious religions and made men of understanding favor them.

That is also why Numa and Sertorius, to make their men more believing, fed them this nonsense: the one that the nymph Egeria, the other that his white doe, brought him from the gods all the counsel he followed. And the authority that Numa gave his laws under the title of this goddess's patronage, Zoroaster, lawgiver of the Bactrians and the Persians, gave to his under the name of the god Oromazes; Trismegistus of the Egyptians, under that of Mercury; Zamolxis of the Scythians, of Vesta; Charondas of the Chalcidians, of Saturn; Minos of the Cretans, of Jupiter; Lycurgus of the Spartans, of Apollo; Draco and Solon of the Athenians, of Minerva.[29]

And every state has a god at its head: falsely, all the others; truly, the one that Moses set up for the people of Judea when they came out of Egypt. The religion of the Bedouins, as the Sire de Joinville says, held among other things that the soul of any one of them who died for his prince went into an-

28 His teacher is Socrates; Timon of Phlius was a skeptic poet who mocked the philosophers. The Latin is Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 1.

29 Oromazes is Ahura Mazda, the supreme god of the Persians.

FRENCH

le premier: au moyen dequoy ils en hazardoyent beaucoup plus volontiers leur vie; In ferrum mens prona viris, animæque capaces / Mortis, et ignauum est redituræ parcere vitæ. Voyla vne creance tressalutaire, toute vaine qu'elle soit. Chasque nation a plusieurs tels exemples chez soy: mais ce subject meriteroit vn discours à part.

2.16.23 Pour dire encore vn mot sur mon premier propos: ie ne conseille non plus aux Dames, d'appeller honneur, leur deuoir, vt enim consuetudo loquitur, id solum dicitur honestum, quod est populari fama gloriosum: leur deuoir est le marc: leur honneur n'est que l'escorce. Ny ne leur conseille de nous donner cette excuse en payement de leur refus: car ie presuppose, que leurs intentions, leur desir, et leur volonté, qui sont pieces où l'honneur n'a que voir, d'autant qu'il n'en paroist rien au dehors, soyent encore plus reglées que les effects. Quæ, quia non liceat, non facit, illa facit. L'offence et enuers Dieu, et en la conscience, seroit aussi grande de le desirer que de l'effectuer.

Et puis ce sont actions d'elles mesmes cachées et occultes, il seroit bien-aysé qu'elles en desrobassent quelqu'vne à la cognoissance d'autruy, d'où l'honneur depend, si elles n'auoyent autre respect à leur deuoir, et à l'affection qu'elles portent à la chasteté, pour elle mesme. Toute personne d'honneur choisit de perdre plus tost son honneur, que de perdre sa conscience.

ENGLISH

other body, happier, more beautiful and stronger than the first; and for that reason they risked their lives much more willingly: Men's minds are eager for the sword, their souls able to face / Death, and it is cowardly to spare a life that will return. There is a very salutary belief, empty as it may be. Every nation has many such examples at home; but this subject would deserve a discussion of its own.[30]

To say one more word on my first subject: no more do I advise ladies to call their duty honor—for, as common usage has it, only that is called honorable which is glorious in popular repute. Their duty is the pith; their honor is only the bark. Nor do I advise them to give us this excuse in payment for their refusal. For I presuppose that their intentions, their desire and their will—parts honor has nothing to do with, since nothing of them shows outwardly—are even better regulated than their deeds. She who does not do it because she may not, does it. The offense, both toward God and in conscience, would be as great in desiring it as in doing it.[31]

And then these are actions hidden and secret in themselves. It would be easy for women to steal some of them from the knowledge of others, on which honor depends, if they had no other regard for their duty and for the love they bear chastity for its own sake. Every person of honor chooses to lose his honor rather than to lose his conscience.

30 The Latin is Lucan, Pharsalia 1.
31 The first Latin is Cicero, On Ends 2; the verse is Ovid, Amores 3.

II.17 Of Presumption

De la presumption

Montaigne examines the opposite fault of underrating oneself, then sketches a candid, often unflattering self-portrait of his body, mind and talents.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.17.1 IL y a vne autre sorte de gloire, qui est vne trop bonne opinion, que nous conceuons de nostre valeur. C'est vn'affection inconsiderée, dequoy nous nous cherissons, qui nous represente à nous mesmes, autres que nous ne sommes. Comme la passion amoureuse preste des beautez, et des graces, au subject qu'elle embrasse, et fait que ceux qui en sont espris, trouuent d'vn iugement trouble et alteré, ce qu'ils ayment, autre et plus parfaict qu'il n'est.

There is another kind of glory, which is an over-good opinion we form of our own worth. It is an ill-considered affection with which we cherish ourselves, which represents us to ourselves as other than we are. It is like the passion of love, which lends beauties and graces to the object it embraces, and makes those smitten with it find what they love, with troubled and altered judgment, other and more perfect than it is.

2.17.2 Ie ne veux pas, que de peur de faillir de ce costé là, vn homme se mescognoisse pourtant, ny qu'il pense estre moins que ce qu'il est: le iugement doit tout par tout maintenir son droit. C'est raison qu'il voye en ce subject comme ailleurs, ce que la verité luy presente. Si c'est Cæsar, qu'il se treuue hardiment le plus grand Capitaine du monde. Nous ne sommes que ceremonie, la ceremonie nous emporte, et laissons la substance des choses: nous nous tenons aux branches et abandonnons le tronc et le corps.

I do not want a man, for fear of erring on that side, to fail to know himself on that account, or to think he is less than he is: judgment must maintain its rights everywhere. It is right that he should see in this matter, as elsewhere, what truth shows him. If he is Caesar, let him boldly find himself the greatest captain in the world. We are nothing but ceremony; ceremony carries us away, and we leave the substance of things. We cling to the branches and abandon the trunk and the body.

Nous auons appris aux Dames de rougir, oyants seulement nommer, ce qu'elles ne craignent aucunement à faire: nous n'osons appeller à droict noz membres, et ne craignons pas de les employer à toute sorte de desbauche.

We have taught ladies to blush at merely hearing named what they are not in the least afraid to do. We dare not call our members by their right names, and we are not afraid to use them in every kind of debauchery.

2.17.3 La ceremonie nous deffend d'exprimer par parolles les choses licites et naturelles, et nous l'en croyons: la raison nous deffend de n'en faire point d'illicites et mauuaises, et personne ne l'en croit. Ie me trouue icy empestré és loix de la ceremonie: car elle ne permet, ny qu'on parle bien de soy, ny qu'on en parle mal. Nous la lairrons là pour ce coup. Ceux de qui la Fortune, bonne ou mauuaise qu'on la doiue appeller, a faict passer la vie en quelque eminent degré, ils peuuent par leurs actions publiques tesmoigner quels ils sont.

Ceremony forbids us to express in words things that are lawful and natural, and we believe it; reason forbids us to do things that are unlawful and wicked, and no one believes it. I find myself entangled here in the laws of ceremony, for it allows us neither to speak well of ourselves nor to speak ill. We shall leave it aside for this once. Those whose lives Fortune—whether we should call it good or bad—has made pass in some eminent rank can show by their public actions what they are.

Mais ceux qu'elle n'a employez qu'en foule, et de qui personne ne parlera, si eux mesmes n'en parlent, ils sont excusables, s'ils prennent la hardiesse de parler d'eux,

But those whom she has employed only in the crowd, and of whom no one will speak unless they speak themselves, are excusable if they make bold

FRENCH

mesmes enuers ceux qui ont interest de les cognoistre; à l'exemple de Lucilius: Ille velut fidis arcana sodalibus olim
Credebat libris, neque si malè cesserat, vsquam
Decurrens alio, neque si benè: quo fit, vt omnis
Votiua pateat veluti descripta tabella
Vita senis. Celuy la commettoit à son papier ses actions et ses pensées, et s'y peignoit tel qu'il se sentoit estre. Nec id Rutilio et Scauro citra fidem, aut obtrectationi fuit.

ENGLISH

to speak of themselves to those who have an interest in knowing them, following the example of Lucilius: He used to confide his secrets to his books as to faithful friends, Never turning elsewhere, whether things had gone badly
Or well; so that the old man's whole life
Lies open to view, as if painted
On a votive tablet. That man entrusted his actions and his thoughts to his paper, and portrayed himself there as he felt himself to be. Nor did Rutilius and Scaurus lose credit or meet with disparagement for doing so.[1]

GESTURES OF PRIDE

Montaigne asks whether his bearing betrayed pride, and notes the unconscious mannerisms of great men.

FRENCH

2.17.4 Il me souuient donc, que dés ma plus tendre enfance, on remerquoit en moy ie ne sçay quel port de corps, et des gestes tesmoignants quelque vaine et sotte fierté. I'en veux dire premierement cecy, qu'il n'est pas inconuenient d'auoir des conditions et des propensions, si propres et si incorporées en nous, que nous n'ayons pas moyen de les sentir et recognoistre. Et de telles inclinations naturelles, le corps en retient volontiers quelque ply, sans nostre sçeu et consentement.

C'estoit vne affetterie consente de sa beauté, qui faisoit vn peu pancher la teste d'Alexandre sur vn costé, et qui rendoit le parler d'Alcibiades mol et gras: Iulius Cæsar se grattoit la teste d'vn doigt, qui est la contenance d'vn homme remply de pensemens penibles: et Cicero, ce me semble, auoit accoustumé de rincer le nez, qui signifie vn naturel mocqueur. Tels mouuemens peuuent arriuer imperceptiblement en nous. Il y en a d'autres artificiels, dequoy ie ne parle point. Comme les salutations, et reuerences, par où on acquiert le plus souuent à tort, l'honneur d'estre bien humble et courtois: on peut estre humble de gloire.

Ie suis assez prodigue de bonnettades, notamment en esté, et n'en reçois iamais sans reuenche, de quelque qualité d'hommes que ce soit, s'il n'est à mes gages. Ie desirasse d'aucuns Princes que ie cognois, qu'ils en fussent plus espargnans et iustes dispensateurs; car

ENGLISH

I remember, then, that from my earliest childhood people noticed in me a certain bearing of the body, and gestures that betrayed some vain and foolish pride. First I want to say this about it: it is quite possible to have qualities and propensities so much our own and so built into us that we have no means of sensing and recognizing them. And the body readily keeps some crease from such natural inclinations, without our knowledge or consent.

It was an affectation conscious of his beauty that made Alexander tilt his head a little to one side, and that made Alcibiades' speech soft and lisping. Julius Caesar scratched his head with one finger, which is the gesture of a man full of painful thoughts; and Cicero, it seems to me, had the habit of wrinkling his nose, which signifies a mocking nature. Such movements can arise in us imperceptibly. There are others, artificial ones, which I am not talking about, such as salutations and bows, by which people most often win, undeservedly, the honor of being very humble and courteous: one can be humble out of vainglory.

I am rather lavish with raising my hat, especially in summer, and I never receive such a greeting without returning it, whatever the rank of the man, unless he is in my pay. I could wish that some princes I know were more sparing with them and fairer in dispensing them; for, scattered

1 Horace, Satires 2.1, on the satirist Lucilius (2nd century BC). The last Latin is Tacitus, Agricola 1, on Romans who wrote their own lives.

FRENCH

ainsin indiscretement espanduës, elles ne portent plus de coup: si elles sont sans esgard, elles sont sans effect.

Entre les contenances desreglées, n'oublions pas la morgue de l'Empereur Constantius, qui en publicq tenoit tousiours la teste droicte, sans la contourner ou flechir ny çà ny là, non pas seulement pour regarder ceux qui le saluoient à costé, ayant le corps planté immobile, sans se laisser aller au bransle de son coche, sans oser ny cracher, ny se moucher, n'y essuyer le visage deuant les gens. Ie ne sçay si ces gestes qu'on remerquoit en moy, estoient de cette premiere condition, et si à la verité i'auoy quelque occulte propension à ce vice; comme il peut bien estre: et ne puis pas respondre des bransles du corps. Mais quant aux bransles de l'ame, ie veux icy confesser ce que i'en sens.

ENGLISH

so indiscriminately, they no longer carry any weight. If they are given without regard, they are without effect.

Among unruly bearings, let us not forget the haughtiness of the Emperor Constantius, who in public always held his head straight, without turning or bending it this way or that, not even to look at those who greeted him from the side; he kept his body planted motionless, not letting himself sway with the motion of his coach, not daring to spit, or blow his nose, or wipe his face in front of people. I do not know whether those gestures people noticed in me were of that first kind, and whether in truth I had some hidden propensity to this vice, as may well be; and I cannot answer for the movements of the body. But as for the movements of the soul, I want to confess here what I feel about them.[2]

VALUING WHAT IS NOT MINE

He rates his own things below others' and embraces the opinions that most humble mankind.

FRENCH

2.17.5 Il y a deux parties en cette gloire: sçauoir est, de s'estimer trop, et n'estimer pas assez autruy. Quant à l'vne, il me semble premierement, ces considerations deuoir estre mises en compte. Ie me sens pressé d'vne erreur d'ame, qui me desplaist, et comme inique, et encore plus comme importune. I'essaye à la corriger: mais l'arracher ie ne puis. C'est, que ie diminue du iuste prix des choses, que ie possede: et hausse le prix aux choses, d'autant qu'elles sont estrangeres, absentes, et non miennes. Cette humeur s'espand bien loing. Comme la prerogatiue de l'authorité fait, que les maris regardent les femmes propres d'vn vicieux desdein, et plusieurs peres leurs enfants: ainsi fay-ie: et entre deux pareils ouurages, poiseroy tousiours contre le mien.

Non tant que la ialousie de mon auancement et amendement trouble mon iugement, et m'empesche de me satisfaire, comme que, d'elle mesme la maistrise engendre mespris de ce qu'on tient et regente. Les polices, les mœurs loingtaines me flattent, et les langues. Et m'apperçoy que le Latin me pippe par la faueur de sa dignité, au delà de ce qui luy appartient, comme aux enfants et au vulgaire. L'œconomie, la maison, le cheual de mon voisin, en egale valeur, vault mieux que le mien,

ENGLISH

There are two parts to this glory: namely, to esteem oneself too highly, and not to esteem others highly enough. As to the first, it seems to me that these considerations should be taken into account first. I feel myself burdened by an error of the soul that displeases me, both as unjust and still more as troublesome. I try to correct it, but I cannot root it out. It is that I lower the just value of the things I possess, and raise the value of things because they are foreign, absent and not mine. This temperament spreads very far. Just as the prerogative of authority makes husbands look upon their own wives with a vicious disdain, and many fathers their children, so do I; and between two equal works I would always weigh against my own.

Not so much because jealousy for my progress and improvement troubles my judgment and keeps me from being satisfied with myself, as because mastery in itself breeds contempt for what one holds and governs. Distant governments and manners appeal to me, and so do distant languages. And I notice that Latin beguiles me, through the favor of its dignity, beyond what is its due, as it does children and the common people. My neighbor's man-

2 Constantius II, Roman emperor (AD 337–361), as described by the historian Ammianus Marcellinus.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	de ce qu'il n'est pas mien. Dauantage, que ie suis tres-ignorant en mon faict: i'admire l'asseurance et promesse, que chacun a de soy: là où il n'est quasi rien que ie sçache sçauoir, ny que i'ose me respondre pouuoir faire.	agement, his house, his horse, though of equal value, are better than mine because they are not mine. Moreover, I am very ignorant about my own affairs. I admire the assurance and confidence that everyone has in himself, whereas there is hardly anything that I know I know, or that I dare promise myself I can do.
	Ie n'ay point mes moyens en proposition et par estat: et n'en suis instruit qu'apres l'effect: autant doubteux de ma force que d'vne autre force. D'où il aduient, si ie rencontre louablement en vne besongne, que ie le donne plus à ma fortune, qu'à mon industrie: d'autant que ie les desseigne toutes au hazard et en crainte.	I do not have my capacities set out and itemized in advance; I learn of them only after the event, as doubtful of my own strength as of anyone else's. Hence, if I succeed creditably in some task, I put it down more to my luck than to my skill, since I plan every task at random and in fear.
2.17.6	Pareillement i'ay en general cecy, que de toutes les opinions que l'ancienneté a euës de l'homme en gros, celles que i'embrasse plus volontiers, et ausquelles ie m'attache le plus, ce sont celles qui nous mesprisent, auilissent, et aneantissent le plus. La philosophie ne me semble iamais auoir si beau ieu, que quand elle combat nostre presomption et vanité; quand elle recognoist de bonne foy son irresolution, sa foiblesse, et son ignorance. Il me semble que la mere nourrice des plus fausses opinions, et publiques et particulieres, c'est la trop bonne opinion que l'homme a de soy.	Likewise I have this in general: of all the opinions antiquity has held of man as a whole, those I embrace most willingly and cling to most are those that most despise, debase and annihilate us. Philosophy never seems to me to have so fine a game as when it combats our presumption and vanity, when it acknowledges in good faith its irresolution, its weakness and its ignorance. It seems to me that the nursing mother of the falsest opinions, both public and private, is man's overgood opinion of himself.
	Ces gens qui se perchent à cheuauchons sur l'epicycle de Mercure, qui voient si auant dans le ciel, ils m'arrachent les dents: car en l'estude que ie fay, duquel le subject, c'est l'homme, trouuant vne si extreme varieté de iugemens, vn si profond labyrinthe de difficultez les vnes sur les autres, tant de diuersité et incertitude, en l'eschole mesme de la sapience: vous pouuez penser, puis que ces gens là n'ont peu se resoudre de la cognoissance d'eux mesmes, et de leur propre condition, qui est continuellement presente à leurs yeux, qui est dans eux; puis qu'ils ne sçauent comment bransle ce qu'eux mesmes font bransler, ny comment nous peindre et deschiffrer les ressorts qu'ils tiennent et manient eux mesmes, comment ie les croirois de la cause du flux et reflux de la riuiere du Nil.	Those people who perch astride the epicycle of Mercury, who see so far into the heavens, set my teeth on edge. For in the study I pursue, whose subject is man, I find so extreme a variety of judgments, so deep a labyrinth of difficulties piled one upon another, so much diversity and uncertainty in the very school of wisdom. You can imagine, then: since those people have not been able to settle the knowledge of themselves and of their own condition, which is continually before their eyes and within them; since they do not know how that moves which they themselves set moving, nor how to portray and decipher for us the springs they themselves hold and handle—how could I believe them about the cause of the rise and fall of the river Nile?[3]
	La curiosité de cognoistre les choses, a esté donnée aux hommes pour fleau, dit la saincte Escriture.	The curiosity to know things was given to men as a scourge, says Holy Scripture.[4]
2.17.7	Mais pour venir à mon particulier, il est bien difficile, ce me semble, qu'aucun autre s'estime moins, voire	But to come to my own case, it is very hard, it seems to me, for anyone else to esteem himself

3 In Ptolemaic astronomy an epicycle was the small circle on which a planet was thought to move while that circle itself circled the earth.
4 Ecclesiastes 1:13.

FRENCH

qu'aucun autre m'estime moins, que ce que ie m'estime. Ie me tien de la commune sorte, sauf en ce que ie m'en tiens: coulpable des deffectuositez plus basses et populaires: mais non desaduoüées, non excusées. Et ne me prise seulement que de ce que ie sçay mon prix. S'il y a de la gloire, elle est infuse en moy superficiellement, par la trahison de ma complexion: et n'a point de corps, qui comparoisse à la veuë de mon iugement. I'en suis arrosé, mais non pas teint.

Car à la verité, quant aux effects de l'esprit, en quelque façon que ce soit, il n'est iamais party de moy chose qui me contentast. Et l'approbation d'autruy ne me paye pas. I'ay le iugement tendre et difficile, et notamment en mon endroit. Ie me sens flotter et fleschir de foiblesse. Ie n'ay rien du mien, dequoy satisfaire mon iugement: i'ay la veue assez claire et reglée, mais à l'ouurer elle se trouble: comme i'essaye plus euidemment en la poësie. Ie l'ayme infiniment; ie me cognois assez aux ouurages d'autruy: mais ie fay à la verité l'enfant quand i'y veux mettre la main; ie ne me puis souffrir. On peut faire le sot par tout ailleurs, mais non en la poësie.

Mediocribus esse poetis
Non dij, non homines, non concessere columnæ. Pleust à Dieu que cette sentence se trouuast au front des boutiques de tous noz imprimeurs, pour en deffendre l'entrée à tant de versificateurs. Verùm
Nil securius est malo poeta.

2.17.8 Que n'auons nous de tels peuples? Dionysius le pere n'estimoit rien tant de soy, que sa poësie. A la saison des jeux Olympiques, auec des chariots surpassant tous autres en magnificence, il enuoya aussi des poëtes et des musiciens, pour presenter ses vers, auec des tentes et pauillons dorez et tapissez royalement. Quand on vint à mettre ses vers en auant, la faueur et excellence de la prononciation attira sur le commencement l'attention du peuple. Mais quand par apres il vint à poiser l'ineptie de l'ouurage, il entra premierement en mespris: et continuant d'aigrir son iugement, il se ietta tantost en furie, et courut abbattre et deschirer par despit tous ces pauillons.

ENGLISH

less—or indeed for anyone else to esteem me less—than I esteem myself. I hold myself to be of the common sort, except in holding myself so; guilty of the lowest and most commonplace defects, but not disowning them, not excusing them. And I value myself only in that I know my value. If there is any glory in me, it is infused superficially, by the treachery of my constitution, and has no body that appears before the eye of my judgment. I am sprinkled with it, but not dyed in it.

For in truth, as regards the products of the mind, of whatever kind, nothing has ever come from me that satisfied me. And other people's approval does not repay me. My judgment is tender and hard to please, especially about myself. I feel myself wavering and bending with weakness. I have nothing of my own with which to satisfy my judgment. My sight is clear and orderly enough, but when I set to work it grows blurred, as I find most plainly in poetry. I love it infinitely; I am a fair judge of other people's work; but in truth I act like a child when I try to set my own hand to it; I cannot bear myself. One may play the fool anywhere else, but not in poetry.

Neither gods, nor men, nor booksellers' columns
Have allowed poets to be mediocre. Would to God this maxim were posted over the doors of all our printers' shops, to bar the way to so many versifiers! But Nothing is more self-assured than a bad poet.[5]

Why do we not have peoples like that? Dionysius the Elder valued nothing in himself so much as his poetry. At the season of the Olympic Games, along with chariots surpassing all others in magnificence, he also sent poets and musicians to present his verses, with tents and pavilions gilded and royally hung with tapestries. When they came to put his verses forward, the charm and excellence of the delivery at first caught the people's attention. But when afterward the people came to weigh the ineptitude of the work, they first turned to contempt; and as their judgment grew ever more sour, they soon flew into a fury and rushed to pull down and tear up all those pavilions in spite.

5 Horace, Art of Poetry; the columns were pillars on which booksellers posted their wares. The second Latin is Martial, Epigrams 12.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Et ce que ces chariots ne feirent non plus, rien qui vaille en la course, et que la nauire, qui rapportoit ses gents, faillit la Sicile, et fut par la tempeste poussée et fracassée contre la coste de Tarante: il tint pour certain que c'estoit l'ire des Dieux irritez comme luy, contre ce mauuais poëme: et les mariniers mesmes, eschappez du naufrage, alloient secondant l'opinion de ce peuple: à laquelle, l'oracle qui predit sa mort, sembla aussi aucunement soubscrire. Il portoit, que Dionysius seroit pres de sa fin, quand il auroit vaincu ceux qui vaudroyent mieux que luy. Ce qu'il interpreta des Carthaginois, qui le surpassoyent en puissance.	And since those chariots likewise did nothing worthwhile in the race, and the ship bringing his people home missed Sicily and was driven by the storm and smashed against the coast of Taranto, the people held it for certain that this was the wrath of the gods, angered as they were against that bad poem. And the very sailors who escaped the shipwreck went about seconding the people's opinion, to which the oracle that foretold his death also seemed in some way to subscribe. It declared that Dionysius would be near his end when he had defeated those who were better than he. This he took to mean the Carthaginians, who surpassed him in power.
	Et ayant affaire à eux, gauchissoit souuent la victoire, et la temperoit, pour n'encourir le sens de cette prediction. Mais il l'entendoit mal: car le Dieu marquoit le temps de l'aduantage, que par faueur et iniustice il gaigna à Athenes sur les poëtes tragiques, meilleurs que luy: ayant faict iouer à l'enuy la sienne, intitulée les Leneïens. Soudain apres laquelle victoire, il trepassa: et en partie pour l'excessiue ioye, qu'il en conceut.	And in dealing with them he often sidestepped victory and tempered it, so as not to incur the meaning of this prediction. But he misunderstood it: for the god was marking the moment of the advantage he won at Athens, by favor and injustice, over tragic poets better than himself, when he had his tragedy, entitled The Lenaeans, performed in the competition. Immediately after this victory he died—and partly from the excessive joy it gave him.[6]
2.17.9	Ce que ie treuue excusable du mien, ce n'est pas de soy, et à la verité: mais c'est à la comparaison d'autres choses pires, ausquelles ie voy qu'on donne credit. Ie suis enuieux du bon-heur de ceux, qui se sçauent resiouyr et gratifier en leur besongne; car c'est vn moyen aysé de se donner du plaisir, puis qu'on le tire de soy-mesmes. Specialement s'il y a vn peu de fermeté en leur opiniastrise. Ie sçay vn poëte, à qui fort et foible, en foulle et en chambre, et le ciel et la terre, crient qu'il n'y entend guere. Il n'en rabat pour tout cela rien de la mesure à quoy il s'est taillé.	What I find excusable in my own work is not excusable in itself and in truth, but only in comparison with other, worse things that I see given credit. I envy the good fortune of those who know how to rejoice in their work and take pleasure in it, for it is an easy way to give oneself pleasure, since one draws it from oneself—especially if there is a little firmness in their stubbornness. I know a poet to whom strong and weak, in public and in private, heaven and earth, all cry out that he knows little about it. For all that, he takes nothing off the measure he has cut himself to.
	Tousiours recommence, tousiours reconsulte: et tousiours persiste, d'autant plus ahurté en son aduis, qu'il touche à luy seul, de le maintenir.	He is always starting again, always reconsidering, and always persisting, all the more stubborn in his opinion because it is up to him alone to uphold it.

NEVER PLEASED WITH MY WORK

His writings never satisfy him; he describes his rough, unruly style and his Gascon and Latin.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.17.10	Mes ouurages, il s'en faut tant qu'ils me rient, qu'autant de fois que ie les retaste, autant de fois ie m'en despite.	As for my works, they are so far from smiling on me that every time I go over them again, I am

6 His play won at the Athenian festival of the Lenaea in 367 BC; Montaigne's source takes the festival's name for the play's title.

FRENCH

Cùm relego, scripsisse pudet, quia plurima cerno, / Me quoque qui feci, iudice, digna lini. I'ay tousiours vne idée en l'ame, qui me presente vne meilleure forme, que celle que i'ay mis en besongne, mais ie ne la puis saisir ny exploicter. Et cette idée mesme n'est que du moyen estage. I'argumente par là, que les productions de ces riches et grandes ames du temps passé, sont bien loing au delà de l'extreme estenduë de mon imagination et souhaict. Leurs escris ne me satisfont pas seulement et me remplissent, mais ils m'estonnent et transissent d'admiration.

Ie iuge leur beauté, ie la voy, sinon iusques au bout, au moins si auant qu'il m'est impossible d'y aspirer. Quoy que i'entreprenne, ie doibs vn sacrifice aux Graces, comme dit Plutarque de quelqu'vn, pour practiquer leur faueur. Si quid enim placet,
Si quid dulce hominum sensibus influit,
Debentur lepidis omnia Gratiis. Elles m'abandonnent par tout. Tout est grossier chez moy, il y a faute de polissure et de beauté. Ie ne sçay faire valoir les choses pour le plus que ce qu'elles valent. Ma façon n'ayde rien à la matiere. Voyla pourquoy il me la faut forte, qui aye beaucoup de prise, et qui luyse d'elle mesme.

Quand i'en saisi des populaires et plus gayes, c'est pour me suiure, moy, qui n'aime point vne sagesse ceremonieuse et triste, comme fait le monde: et pour m'egayer, non pour egayer mon stile, qui les veut plustost graues et seueres. Aumoins si ie doy nommer stile, vn parler informe et sans regle: vn iargon populaire, et vn proceder sans definition, sans partition, sans conclusion, trouble, à la façon de celuy d'Amafanius et de Rabirius. Ie ne sçay ny plaire, ny resiouyr, ny chatouiller. Le meilleur compte du monde se seche entre mes mains, et se ternit. Ie ne sçay parler qu'en bon escient.

Et suis du tout desnué de cette facilité, que ie voy en plusieurs de mes compagnons, d'entretenir les premiers venus, et tenir en haleine toute vne trouppe, ou amuser sans se lasser, l'oreille d'vn Prince, de toute sorte de propos; la matiere ne leur faillant iamais, pour cette grace qu'ils ont de sçauoir employer la premiere venue, et l'accommoder à l'humeur et portée de ceux à qui ils ont affaire. Les Princes n'ayment guere les discours vexed with them. When I reread, I am ashamed to have written, for I see much / That even I, who wrote it, judge worth erasing. I always have an idea in my soul that presents me with a better form than the one I have put to work, but I cannot grasp it or make use of it. And that very idea is only of the middling sort. I conclude from this that the productions of those rich and great souls of times past lie far beyond the farthest reach of my imagination and my wishes. Their writings not only satisfy and fill me; they stun me and transfix me with admiration.[7]

ENGLISH

I judge their beauty; I see it, if not to the very end, at least so far that it is impossible for me to aspire to it. Whatever I undertake, I owe a sacrifice to the Graces, as Plutarch says of someone, to win their favor. For if anything pleases,
If anything sweet flows into men's senses,
All of it is owed to the charming Graces. They forsake me everywhere. Everything is coarse with me; there is a lack of polish and beauty. I do not know how to make things worth more than they are worth. My manner adds nothing to the matter. That is why I need matter that is strong, that has plenty of grip, and that shines of itself.[8]

When I seize on popular and lighter subjects, it is to follow my own bent—I do not love a ceremonious and gloomy wisdom, as the world does—and to cheer myself, not to cheer my style, which would rather have them grave and severe. At least, if I should call style a formless, unruled way of talking, a popular jargon, a way of proceeding without definition, without division, without conclusion, muddled, after the fashion of Amafanius and Rabirius. I do not know how to please, or delight, or tickle. The best story in the world dries up in my hands and goes dull. I know how to speak only in earnest.[9]

And I am wholly lacking in that facility I see in many of my companions, of entertaining all comers, holding a whole company in suspense, or tirelessly amusing a prince's ear with all sorts of talk. Matter never fails them, thanks to the gift they have of knowing how to use the first that comes to hand and suit it to the temperament and 7 Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 1.

8 Plutarch tells how Plato urged the austere Xenocrates to sacrifice to the Graces. The author of the Latin verses is unknown.
9 Amafanius and Rabirius were early Latin writers on Epicurean philosophy whom Cicero faulted for their artless style.

FRENCH

fermes, ny moy à faire des comptes. Les raisons premieres et plus aisées, qui sont communément les mieux prinses, ie ne sçay pas les employer. Mauuais prescheur de commune. De toute matiere ie dy volontiers les plus extremes choses, que i'en sçay.

Cicero estime, qu'és traictez de la philosophie, le plus difficile membre soit l'exorde. S'il est ainsi, ie me prens à la conclusion sagement. Si faut-il sçauoir relascher la corde à toute sorte de tons: et le plus aigu est celuy qui vient le moins souuent en ieu. Il y a pour le moins autant de perfection à releuer vne chose vuide, qu'à en soutenir vne poisante. Tantost il faut superficiellement manier les choses, tantost les profonder. Ie sçay bien que la plus part des hommes se tiennent en ce bas estage, pour ne conceuoir les choses que par cette premiere escorse.

Mais ie sçay aussi que les plus grands maistres, et Xenophon et Platon, on les void souuent se relascher à cette basse façon, et populaire, de dire et traitter les choses, la soustenans des graces qui ne leur manquent iamais.

2.17.11 Au demeurant mon langage n'a rien de facile et fluide: il est aspre, ayant ses dispositions libres et desreglées. Et me plaist ainsi; sinon par mon iugement, par mon inclination. Mais ie sens bien que par fois ie m'y laisse trop aller, et qu'à force de vouloir euiter l'art et l'affection, i'y retombe d'vne autre part; Breuis esse laboro, / Obscurus fio. Platon dit que le long ou le court, ne sont proprietez qui ostent ny qui donnent prix au langage. Quand i'entreprendrois de suiure cet autre stile æquable, vny et ordonné, ie n'y sçaurois aduenir. Et encore que les coupures et cadences de Saluste reuiennent plus à mon humeur, si est-ce que ie treuue Cæsar et plus grand, et moins aisé à representer.

Et si mon inclination me porte plus à l'imitation du parler de Seneque, ie ne laisse pas d'estimer dauantage celuy de Plutarque. Comme à taire, à dire aussi, ie suy tout simplement ma forme naturelle. D'où c'est à l'aduanture que ie puis plus, à parler qu'à escrire. Le mouuement et action animent les parolles, notamment à ceux qui se remuent brusquement, comme ie fay, et qui s'eschauffent. Le port, le visage, la voix, la robbe, l'assiette, peuuent donner quelque prix aux choses, qui d'elles mesmes n'en ont guere, comme le babil. Messala capacity of the people they are dealing with. Princes do not much like solid discourse, nor do I like telling stories. The first and easiest reasons, which are usually the best received, I do not know how to use. A poor preacher for the common crowd. On any subject I am inclined to say the most extreme things I know about it.

ENGLISH

Cicero holds that in philosophical treatises the hardest part is the opening. If so, I am wise to take hold of the conclusion. Yet one must know how to tune the string to every kind of pitch; and the highest is the one that comes into play least often. There is at least as much perfection in raising up an empty thing as in holding up a weighty one. Sometimes one must handle things on the surface, sometimes go deep into them. I know well that most men stay on this low level, grasping things only by that outer bark.

But I also know that the greatest masters, Xenophon and Plato, are often seen relaxing into this low and popular way of speaking about things and treating them, sustaining it with graces that never fail them.

For the rest, my language has nothing easy or fluent about it; it is rough, with its free and unruly arrangements. And I like it so—if not by my judgment, then by my inclination. But I clearly feel that I sometimes let myself go too far that way, and that by dint of trying to avoid art and affectation I fall back into them from another side: I strive to be brief, / I become obscure. Plato says that length or brevity are not qualities that take away or give value to language. Even if I undertook to follow that other style, even, smooth and orderly, I could not attain it. And although the clipped phrases and cadences of Sallust suit my temperament better, still I find Caesar both greater and harder to imitate.

And though my inclination leads me more to imitate Seneca's way of speaking, I nonetheless esteem Plutarch's more highly. As in keeping silent, so in speaking, I simply follow my natural form. That is perhaps why I am better at speaking than at writing. Movement and action bring words to life, especially in those who move about briskly, as I do, and grow heated. Bearing, face, voice, dress, posture can give some value to things that have little of their own, such as chatter. Messala complains se pleint en Tacitus de quelques accoustremens estroits de son temps, et de la façon des bancs où les orateurs auoient à parler, qui affoiblissoient leur eloquence.

FRENCH

2.17.12 Mon langage François est alteré, et en la prononciation et ailleurs, par la barbarie de mon creu. Ie ne vis iamais homme des contrées de deçà, qui ne sentist bien euidemment son ramage, et qui ne blessast les oreilles qui sont pures Françoises. Si n'est-ce pas pour estre fort entendu en mon Perigourdin: car ie n'en ay non plus d'vsage que de l'Allemand; et ne m'en chault gueres. C'est vn langage, comme sont autour de moy d'vne bande et d'autre, le Poitteuin, Xaintongeois, Angoulemoisin, Lymosin, Auuergnat, brode, trainant, esfoiré.

Il y a bien au dessus de nous, vers les montagnes, vn Gascon, que ie treuue singulierement beau, sec, bref, signifiant, et à la verité vn langage masle et militaire, plus qu'aucun autre, que i'entende: autant nerueux, et puissant, et pertinent, comme le François est gracieux, delicat, et abondant. Quant au Latin, qui m'a esté donné pour maternel, i'ay perdu par des-accoustumance, la promptitude de m'en pouuoir seruir à parler: ouï, et à escrire, en quoy autrefois ie me faisoy appeller maistre Iean. Voylla combien peu ie vaux de ce costé là.

ENGLISH

in Tacitus of certain tight garments of his day, and of the arrangement of the benches from which orators had to speak, which weakened their eloquence.[10]

My French is corrupted, both in pronunciation and otherwise, by the barbarism of my native soil. I never saw a man from these parts who did not quite plainly smack of his local warble, and who did not grate on purely French ears. Yet this is not because I am well versed in my Périgord dialect, for I have no more use of it than of German, and I hardly care. It is a language—like those around me on every side, Poitevin, Saintongeais, Angoumois, Limousin, Auvergnat—limp, drawling, flabby.

Above us, toward the mountains, there is indeed a Gascon that I find singularly beautiful: dry, brief, expressive, and in truth a manly and military language, more than any other I understand; as sinewy, powerful and to the point as French is graceful, delicate and abundant. As for Latin, which was given me as my mother tongue, I have lost through disuse the readiness to use it in speaking—yes, and in writing, in which I once got myself called Master John. That shows how little I am worth on that side.[11]

BEAUTY AND THE BODY

Body and soul must not be separated; Montaigne regrets his short stature and describes his build.

FRENCH

2.17.13 La beauté est vne piece de grande recommendation au commerce des hommes. C'est le premier moyen de conciliation des vns aux autres; et n'est homme si barbare et si rechigné, qui ne se sente aucunement frappé de sa douceur. Le corps a vne grand'part à nostre estre, il y tient vn grand rang: ainsi sa structure et composition sont de bien iuste consideration. Ceux qui veulent desprendre noz deux pieces principales, et les sequestrer l'vne de l'autre, ils ont tort. Au rebours, il les faut r'accoupler et reioindre.

Il faut ordonner à l'ame, non de se tirer à quartier, de s'entretenir à part, de mespriser et abandonner le corps (aussi ne le sçauroit elle faire que par quelque singerie contrefaicte) mais de se r'allier à luy, de l'embrasser, le

ENGLISH

Beauty is a quality of great recommendation in human dealings. It is the first means by which people are won over to one another, and there is no man so barbarous and so surly as not to feel himself somewhat struck by its sweetness. The body has a great share in our being; it holds a high rank there; so its structure and composition deserve very careful consideration. Those who want to detach our two principal parts and sequester them from each other are wrong. On the contrary, they must be coupled and joined together again.

We must order the soul not to withdraw to one side, not to keep its own company apart, not to despise and abandon the body (nor could it do so

10 Tacitus, Dialogue on Orators.
11 Montaigne's father had him taught Latin from infancy as his first language. "Master John" was a nickname for a schoolmaster or learned clerk.

FRENCH

cherir, luy assister, le contreroller, le conseiller, le redresser, et ramener quand il fouruoye; l'espouser en somme, et luy seruir de mary: à ce que leurs effects ne paroissent pas diuers et contraires, ains accordans et vniformes.

Les Chrestiens ont vne particuliere instruction de cette liaison, car ils sçauent, que la iustice diuine embrasse cette societé et ioincture du corps et de l'ame, iusques à rendre le corps capable des recompenses eternelles: et que Dieu regarde agir tout l'homme, et veut qu'entier il reçoiue le chastiement, ou le loyer, selon ses demerites.

La secte Peripatetique, de toutes sectes la plus sociable, attribue à la sagesse ce seul soing, de pouruoir et procurer en commun, le bien de ces deux parties associées: et montre les autres sectes, pour ne s'estre assez attachées à la consideration de ce meslange, s'estre partializées, cette-cy pour le corps, cette autre pour l'ame, d'vne pareille erreur: et auoir escarté leur subject, qui est l'homme; et leur guide, qu'ils aduouent en general estre Nature. La premiere distinction, qui aye esté entre les hommes, et la premiere consideration, qui donna les præeminences aux vns sur les autres, il est vraysemblable que ce fut l'aduantage de la beauté. Agros
diuisere atque dedere
Pro facie cuiusque et viribus ingenióque:
Nam facies multum valuit, virésque vigebant.

2.17.14 Or ie suis d'vne taille vn peu au dessoubs de la moyenne. Ce deffaut n'a pas seulement de la laideur, mais encore de l'incommodité: à ceux mesmement, qui ont des commandements et des charges: car l'authorité que donne vne belle presence et majesté corporelle, en est à dire. C. Marius ne receuoit pas volontiers des soldats, qui n'eussent six pieds de haulteur. Le Courtisan a bien raison de vouloir pour ce Gentilhomme qu'il dresse, vne taille commune, plustost que toute autre: et de refuser pour luy, toute estrangeté, qui le face montrer au doigt. Mais de choisir, s'il faut à cette mediocrité, qu'il soit plustost au deçà, qu'au delà d'icelle, ie ne le ferois pas, à vn homme militaire.

Les petits hommes, dit Aristote, sont bien iolis, mais non pas beaux: et se cognoist en la grandeur, la grande ame, comme la beauté, en vn grand corps et hault. Les Æthiopes et les Indiens, dit-il, elisants leurs Roys et except by some counterfeit aping), but to rally to it, embrace it, cherish it, assist it, supervise it, counsel it, set it right and bring it back when it goes astray—in short, to marry it and serve it as a husband, so that their actions may not appear different and contrary, but harmonious and uniform.

ENGLISH

Christians have special instruction about this bond, for they know that divine justice embraces this union and joining of body and soul, even to making the body capable of eternal rewards; and that God watches the whole man act, and wills that he receive punishment or reward whole, according to his deserts.

The Peripatetic school, the most sociable of all schools, assigns to wisdom this one care: to provide for and procure in common the good of these two associated parts. And it shows that the other schools, through not having attached themselves enough to the consideration of this mixture, have taken sides, this one for the body, that one for the soul, with equal error, and have lost sight of their subject, which is man, and of their guide, which they generally acknowledge to be Nature. The first distinction there ever was among men, and the first consideration that gave some preeminence over others, was probably the advantage of beauty. They divided the fields and gave them out
According to each man's looks and strength and wit;
For looks counted for much, and strength was prized.[12]

Now, I am a little below average height. This defect is not only ugly but also inconvenient, especially for those who hold commands and offices, for they lack the authority that a fine presence and bodily majesty confer. Gaius Marius was reluctant to accept soldiers who were not six feet tall. The Courtier is quite right to want, for the gentleman he is shaping, an ordinary stature rather than any other, and to reject for him any oddity that would make people point at him. But if he must miss that middle measure, to choose that he fall short of it rather than go beyond it—that I would not do, for a military man.[13]

Little men, says Aristotle, are pretty but not handsome; and a great soul shows itself in greatness, as beauty does in a large, tall body. The Ethiopians 12 The Peripatetics were the school of Aristotle. The Latin is Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 5.

13 Gaius Marius (157–86 BC) was a Roman general.

FRENCH

Magistrats, auoyent esgard à la beauté et procerité des personnes.

Ils auoient raison: car il y a du respect pour ceux qui le suiuent, et pour l'ennemy de l'effroy, de voir à la teste d'vne trouppe, marcher vn chef de belle et riche taille: Ipse inter primos præstanti corpore Turnus / Vertitur, arma tenens, et toto vertice suprà est. Nostre grand Roy diuin et celeste, duquel toutes les circonstances doiuent estre remerquées auec soing, religion et reuerence, n'a pas refusé la recommandation corporelle, speciosus forma præ filiis hominum. Et Platon auec la temperance et la fortitude, desire la beauté aux conseruateurs de sa republique.

C'est vn grand despit qu'on s'addresse à vous parmy voz gens, pour vous demander où est Monsieur: et que vous n'ayez que le reste de la bonnetade, qu'on fait à vostre barbier ou à vostre secretaire. Comme il aduint au pauure Philopœmen: estant arriué le premier de sa trouppe en vn logis, où on l'attendoit, son hostesse, qui ne le cognoissoit pas, et le voyoit d'assez mauuaise mine, l'employa d'aller vn peu aider à ses femmes à puiser de l'eau, ou attiser du feu, pour le seruice de Philopœmen.

Les Gentils-hommes de sa suitte estans arriuez, et l'ayants surpris embesongné à cette belle vacation, car il n'auoit pas failly d'obeïr au commandement qu'on luy auoit faict, luy demanderent ce qu'il faisoit-là: Ie paie, leur respondit-il, la peine de ma laideur. Les autres beautez, sont pour les femmes: la beauté de la taille, est la seule beauté des hommes.

Où est la petitesse, ny la largeur et rondeur du front, ny la blancheur et douceur des yeux, ny la mediocre forme du nez, ny la petitesse de l'oreille, et de la bouche, ny l'ordre et blancheur des dents, ny l'espesseur bien vnie d'vne barbe brune à escorce de chataigne, ny le poil releué, ny la iuste proportion de teste, ny la fraischeur du teint, ny l'air du visage aggreable, ny vn corps sans senteur, ny la iuste proportion de membres, peuuent faire vn bel homme.

2.17.15 I'ay au demeurant, la taille forte et ramassée, le visage, non pas gras, mais plein, la complexion entre le iovial et le melancholique, moyennement sanguine et chaude, Vnde rigent setis mihi crura, et pectora villis: la santé, forte et and the Indians, he says, when electing their kings and magistrates, paid attention to people's beauty and tallness.

ENGLISH

They were right. For it inspires respect in those who follow him, and terror in the enemy, to see a leader of fine, ample stature marching at the head of a troop: Turnus himself, of surpassing frame, moves among the foremost, / Weapons in hand, and towers a whole head above the rest. Our great King, divine and heavenly, every circumstance of whose life should be noted with care, devotion and reverence, did not reject bodily commendation: fairer than the children of men. And Plato, along with temperance and fortitude, wants beauty in the guardians of his republic.[14]

It is very galling when someone comes up to you among your own people to ask where the master is, and you get only the leftovers of the hat-doffing they make to your barber or your secretary. That is what happened to poor Philopoemen. Having arrived first of his party at a lodging where he was expected, his hostess, who did not know him and thought him rather unprepossessing, set him to go and help her women draw water or stoke the fire, to serve Philopoemen.[15]

When the gentlemen of his retinue arrived and caught him busy at this fine task—for he had not failed to obey the order he had been given—they asked him what he was doing there. "I am paying," he answered, "the penalty for my ugliness." Other kinds of beauty are for women; beauty of stature is the only beauty of men.

Where there is smallness, neither a broad, rounded forehead, nor clear, gentle eyes, nor a well-proportioned nose, nor a small ear and mouth, nor even, white teeth, nor a thick, smooth beard brown as chestnut bark, nor hair that curls up, nor a well-proportioned head, nor a fresh complexion, nor a pleasing face, nor a body free of odor, nor well-proportioned limbs, can make a handsome man.

For the rest, I have a strong, compact build; a face not fat but full; a temperament between the jovial and the melancholic, moderately sanguine and warm, Whence my legs bristle with hairs, and my 14 Virgil, Aeneid VII; then Psalm 45 (44 in the Vulgate), applied to Christ.

15 The story is from Plutarch's Life of Philopoemen.

FRENCH

allegre, iusques bien auant en mon aage, rarement troublée par les maladies. I'estois tel, car ie ne me considere pas à cette heure, que ie suis engagé dans les auenues de la vieillesse, ayant pieça franchy les quarante ans. Minutatim vires et robur adultum / Frangit, et in partem peiorem liquitur ætas. Ce que ie seray doresnauant, ce ne sera plus qu'vn demy estre: ce ne sera plus moy. Ie m'eschappe tous les iours, et me desrobbe à moy: Singula de nobis anni prædantur euntes.

ENGLISH

chest with shaggy fleece; health strong and lively until well on in years, rarely troubled by illness. I was like that—for I am not considering myself as I am now, when I have entered the approaches of old age, having long since passed forty. Little by little age breaks down our strength and full-grown vigor, / And melts away into a worse condition. What I shall be from now on will be no more than half a being; it will no longer be me. Every day I escape and steal away from myself: One by one the passing years rob us of what is ours.[16]

CLUMSY HANDS, A FREE SOUL

He has no bodily skills and will work only of his own free will, never under constraint.

FRENCH

2.17.16 D'addresse et de disposition, ie n'en ay point eu; et si suis fils d'vn pere dispost, et d'vne allegresse qui luy dura iusques à son extreme vieillesse. Il ne trouua guere homme de sa condition, qui s'egalast à luy en tout exercice de corps: comme ie n'en ay trouué guere aucun, qui ne me surmontast; sauf au courir, en quoy i'estoy des mediocres. De la musique, ny pour la voix, que i'y ay tres-inepte, ny pour les instrumens, on ne m'y a iamais sçeu rien apprendre. A la danse, à la paulme, à la lucte, ie n'y ay peu acquerir qu'vne bien fort legere et vulgaire suffisance: à nager, à escrimer, à voltiger, et à saulter, nulle du tout.

Les mains, ie les ay si gourdes, que ie ne sçay pas escrire seulement pour moy; de façon, que ce que i'ay barbouillé, i'ayme mieux le refaire que de me donner la peine de le demesler, et ne ly guere mieux. Ie me sens poiser aux escoutans: autrement bon clerc. Ie ne sçay pas clorre à droit vne lettre, ny ne sçeuz iamais tailler plume, ny trancher à table, qui vaille, ny equipper vn cheval de son harnois, ny porter à poinct vn oyseau, et le lascher: ny parler aux chiens, aux oyseaux, aux cheuaux. Mes conditions corporelles sont en somme tresbien accordantes à celles de l'ame, il n'y a rien d'allegre: il y a seulement vne vigueur pleine et ferme.

Ie dure bien à la peine, mais i'y dure, si ie m'y porte moy-mesme, et autant que mon desir m'y conduit: Molliter austerum studio fallente laborem. Autrement, si ie n'y suis alleché par quelque plaisir, et si i'ay autre guide que ma

ENGLISH

Of dexterity and agility I have had none; and yet I am the son of a very agile father, whose liveliness lasted him into extreme old age. He scarcely found a man of his rank who could equal him in any bodily exercise, just as I have found scarcely any who did not surpass me—except at running, at which I was middling. In music, no one has ever managed to teach me anything, either in singing, for which my voice is very unapt, or in playing instruments. At dancing, tennis and wrestling, I have been able to acquire only a very slight and ordinary competence; at swimming, fencing, vaulting and jumping, none at all.[17]

My hands are so clumsy that I cannot even write legibly for myself, so that what I have scrawled I would rather write over again than take the trouble to make it out; and I read aloud hardly any better: I feel I weigh on my listeners. Otherwise, a good scholar. I do not know how to fold and close a letter properly, and I could never cut a pen, or carve at table to any purpose, or saddle and harness a horse, or carry a hawk properly and fly it, or speak to dogs, birds or horses. In short, my bodily qualities are very much in keeping with those of my soul. There is nothing lively about them; there is only a full, firm vigor.

I endure hard work well, but only if I go to it of my own accord, and as far as my desire leads me: Eagerness gently beguiling the harshness of the toil. Otherwise, if I am not lured to it by some pleasure, 16 The quotations are from Martial, Lucretius (On the Nature of Things) and Horace (Epistles).

17 The "tennis" is real tennis, the old indoor game (jeu de paume).

FRENCH

pure et libre volonté, ie n'y vauls rien. Car i'en suis là, que sauf la santé et la vie, il n'est chose pourquoy ie vueille ronger mes ongles, et que ie vueill' acheter au prix du tourment d'esprit et de la contrainte: Tanti mihi non sit opaci / Omnis arena Tagi, quódque in mare voluitur aurum. Extrememement oisif, extrememement libre, et par nature et par art. Ie presteroy aussi volontiers mon sang, que mon soing.

I'ay vne ame libre et toute sienne, accoustumée à se conduire à sa mode. N'ayant eu iusques à cett' heure ny commandant ny maistre forcé, i'ay marché aussi auant, et le pas qu'il m'a pleu. Cela m'a amolli et rendu inutile au seruice d'autruy, et ne m'a faict bon qu'à moy.

2.17.17 Et pour moy, il n'a esté besoin de forcer ce naturel poisant, paresseux et fay-neant. Car m'estant trouué en tel degré de fortune dés ma naissance, que i'ay eu occasion de m'y arrester: (vne occasion pourtant, que mille autres de ma cognoissance eussent prinse, pour planche plustost, à se passer à la queste, à l'agitation et inquietude) ie n'ay rien cherché, et n'ay aussi rien pris: Non agimur tumidis velis Aquilone secundo,
Non tamen aduersis ætatem ducimus Austris:
Viribus, ingenio, specie, virtute, loco, re,
Extremi primorum, extremis vsque priores. Ie n'ay eu besoin que de la suffisance de me contenter.

Qui est toutesfois vn reglement d'ame, à le bien prendre, esgalement difficile en toute sorte de condition, et que par vsage, nous voyons se trouuer plus facilement encores en la disette qu'en l'abondance. D'autant, à l'aduanture, que selon le cours de noz autres passions, la faim des richesses est plus aiguisée par leur vsage, que par leur besoin: et la vertu de la moderation, plus rare, que celle de la patience. Et n'ay eu besoin que de iouyr doucement des biens que Dieu par sa liberalité m'auoit mis entre mains. Ie n'ay gousté aucune sorte de trauail ennuieux.

Ie n'ay eu guere en maniement que mes affaires: ou, si i'en ay eu, ç'a esté en condition de les manier à mon heure et à ma façon: commis par gents, qui s'en fioyent à moy, et qui ne me pressoyent pas, et me cognoissoyent.

ENGLISH

and if I have any other guide than my own pure and free will, I am good for nothing. For I have come to this: except for health and life, there is nothing for which I am willing to bite my nails, nothing I am willing to buy at the price of torment of mind and constraint: Not at such a price would I have all the sands of shady Tagus / And the gold it rolls down to the sea. Extremely idle, extremely free, both by nature and by art. I would as soon lend my blood as my care.[18]

I have a free soul, entirely its own, used to conducting itself in its own way. Having had until now neither commander nor master forced on me, I have gone as far as I pleased, and at the pace I pleased. That has made me soft and useless in the service of others, and good for no one but myself.

And for my part, there has been no need to force this heavy, lazy, do-nothing nature of mine. For having found myself from birth at such a level of fortune that I had reason to stop there (a reason, however, which a thousand others I know would rather have taken as a plank to cross over to seeking, agitation and restlessness), I have sought nothing, and have also taken nothing: We are not borne along with swelling sails by a favoring north wind,
Nor yet do we pass our lives against contrary winds from the south:
In strength, wit, looks, virtue, rank and wealth,
Last of the first, but still ahead of the last. I have needed only the ability to be content.[19]

Which is, however, rightly understood, a discipline of the soul equally difficult in every kind of condition, and one that experience shows us is found more easily still in want than in plenty. Perhaps because, following the course of our other passions, the hunger for riches is sharpened more by having them than by needing them, and the virtue of moderation is rarer than that of patience. And I have needed only to enjoy quietly the goods that God in his bounty had put into my hands. I have never tasted any kind of irksome toil.

I have had scarcely anything to manage except my own affairs; or if I have had others, it has been on condition of managing them in my own time and 18 Horace, Satires; then Juvenal, Satires. The Tagus, in Spain and Portugal, was famed for its gold-bearing sands.

19 Horace, Epistles.

FRENCH

Car encore tirent les experts, quelque seruice d'vn cheual restif et poussif.

2.17.18 Mon enfance mesme a esté conduicte d'vne façon molle et libre, et lors mesme exempte de subjection rigoureuse. Tout cela m'a donné vne complexion delicate et incapable de sollicitude; iusques là, que i'ayme qu'on me cache mes pertes, et les desordres qui me touchent. Au chapitre de mes mises, ie loge ce que ma nonchalance me couste à nourrir et entretenir: Hæc nempe supersunt, / Quæ dominum fallunt, quæ prosint furibus. I'ayme à ne sçauoir pas le compte de ce que i'ay, pour sentir moins exactement ma perte. Ie prie ceux qui viuent auec moy, où l'affection leur manque, et les bons effects, de me pipper et payer de bonnes apparences.

A faute d'auoir assez de fermeté, pour souffrir l'importunité des accidens contraires, ausquels nous sommes subjects, et pour ne me pouuoir tenir tendu à regler et ordonner les affaires, ie nourris autant que ie puis en moy cett' opinion: m'abandonnant du tout à la Fortune, de prendre toutes choses au pis; et ce pis là, me resoudre à le porter doucement et patiemment. C'est à cela seul, que ie trauaille, et le but auquel i'achemine tous mes discours. A vn danger, ie ne songe pas tant comment i'en eschapperay, que combien peu il importe que i'en eschappe. Quand i'y demeurerois, que seroit ce? Ne pouuant regler les euenements, ie me regle moy-mesme: et m'applique à eux, s'ils ne s'appliquent à moy.

Ie n'ay guere d'art pour sçauoir gauchir la Fortune, et luy eschapper, ou la forcer; et pour dresser et conduire par prudence les choses à mon poinct. I'ay encore moins de tolerance, pour supporter le soing aspre et penible qu'il faut à cela. Et la plus penible assiette pour moy, c'est estre suspens és choses qui pressent, et agité entre la crainte et l'esperance.

2.17.19 Le deliberer, voire és choses plus legeres, m'importune. Et sens mon esprit plus empesché à souffrir le bransle, et les secousses diuerses du doute, et de la consultation, qu'à se rassoir et resoudre à quelque party que ce soit, apres que la chance est liurée. Peu de passions m'ont troublé le sommeil, mais des deliberations, la moindre me le trouble. Tout ainsi que des chemins, i'en euite volontiers my own way, entrusted to me by people who relied on me, who did not press me, and who knew me. For experts can still get some service out of a restive, broken-winded horse.

ENGLISH

Even my childhood was conducted in a gentle, free way, and even then exempt from strict subjection. All this has given me a delicate temperament, incapable of worry—so much so that I like my losses, and the disorders that concern me, to be kept from me. Under the heading of my expenses I enter what my carelessness costs me to feed and maintain: That, surely, is what is left over: / What escapes the master's notice and benefits the thieves. I like not knowing the count of what I have, so as to feel my loss less exactly. I beg those who live with me, where they lack affection and good deeds, to cheat me and pay me in good appearances.[20]

For want of firmness enough to bear the vexation of the adverse accidents we are subject to, and because I cannot keep myself keyed up to regulating and ordering my affairs, I nurture in myself, as much as I can, this attitude: abandoning myself wholly to Fortune, I expect the worst in everything, and resolve to bear that worst gently and patiently. That is the only thing I work at, and the goal toward which I direct all my reasoning. In a danger, I do not think so much about how I shall escape it as about how little it matters whether I escape it. Suppose I were to stay there for good—what of it? Being unable to rule events, I rule myself, and I adapt myself to them if they do not adapt to me.

I have hardly any skill at dodging Fortune and escaping her, or at forcing her, or at arranging and steering things my way by prudence. I have even less patience to bear the harsh and painful care that this requires. And the most painful position for me is to be in suspense about pressing matters, tossed between fear and hope.

Deliberating, even about the slightest things, bothers me. And I feel my mind more hampered in enduring the swaying and the various jolts of doubt and consultation than in settling down and resolving on any course whatever, once the die is cast. Few passions have disturbed my sleep; but of deliberations, the least disturbs it. Just as with roads, 20 Horace, Epistles.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
les costez pendants et glissans, et me iette dans le battu, le plus boüeux, et enfondrant, d'où ie ne puisse aller plus bas, et y cherche seurté. Aussi i'ayme les malheurs tous purs, qui ne m'exercent et tracassent plus, apres l'incertitude de leur rabillage: et qui du premier saut me poussent droictement en la souffrance.	I gladly avoid the sloping and slippery edges and throw myself into the beaten track, however muddy and boggy, where I cannot sink any lower, and there I look for safety. So too I like misfortunes that are pure and simple, which no longer try and harass me with uncertainty about whether they can be mended, and which at the first leap push me straight into suffering.
Dubia plus torquent mala.	Uncertain evils torment us more.[21]
2.17.20 Aux euenemens, ie me porte virilement, en la conduicte puerilement. L'horreur de la cheute me donne plus de fiebure que le coup. Le ieu ne vaut pas la chandelle. L'auaritieux a plus mauvais conte de sa passion, que n'a le pauure: et le ialoux, que le cocu. Et y a moins de mal souuent, à perdre sa vigne, qu'à la plaider. La plus basse marche, est la plus ferme: c'est le siege de la constance. Vous n'y auez besoing que de vous. Elle se fonde là, et appuye toute en soy. Cet exemple, d'vn Gentil-homme que plusieurs ont cogneu, a il pas quelque air philosophique? Il se marya bien auant en l'aage, ayant passé en bon compaignon sa ieunesse, grand diseur, grand gaudisseur.	In the face of events I bear myself manfully; in the handling of them, childishly. The dread of the fall gives me more fever than the blow. The game is not worth the candle. The miser has a worse time of it from his passion than the poor man, and the jealous man than the cuckold. And there is often less harm in losing your vineyard than in going to law over it. The lowest step is the firmest: it is the seat of constancy. There you need no one but yourself. Constancy is founded there and rests wholly on itself. This example of a gentleman whom many people knew—does it not have something of the philosopher about it? He married well on in years, having spent his youth as a jolly fellow, a great talker, a great joker.
Se souuenant combien la matiere de cornardise luy auoit donné dequoy parler et se moquer des autres: pour se mettre à couuert, il espousa vne femme, qu'il print au lieu, où chacun en trouue pour son argent, et dressa auec elle ses alliances: Bon iour putain, bon iour cocu: et n'est chose dequoy plus souuent et ouuertement, il entretinst chez luy les suruenans, que de ce sien dessein: par où il bridoit les occultes caquets des moqueurs, et esmoussoit la poincte de ce reproche.	Remembering how much the subject of cuckoldry had given him to talk about and to mock others for, he took cover by marrying a woman he found in the place where anyone can get one for his money, and with her he set up the terms of their alliance: "Good day, hussy; good day, cuckold." And there was nothing he talked about more often and more openly with visitors to his house than this plan of his. In this way he curbed the mockers' secret gossip and blunted the point of that reproach.

WITHOUT AMBITION

Content with his inheritance, Montaigne never sought advancement; his frank virtues would be useless at court anyway.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.17.21 Quant à l'ambition, qui est voisine de la presumption, ou fille plustost, il eust fallu pour m'aduancer, que la Fortune me fust venu querir par le poing: car de me mettre en peine pour vn' esperance incertaine, et me soubmettre à toutes les difficultez, qui accompaignent ceux qui cherchent à se pousser en credit, sur le	As for ambition, which is a neighbor of presumption, or rather its daughter, Fortune would have had to come and take me by the hand to advance me. For to put myself to trouble for an uncertain hope, and to submit to all the difficulties that beset those who are trying to push their way into fa-

21 Seneca, Agamemnon.

FRENCH

commencement de leur progrez, ie ne l'eusse sçeu faire, Spem pretio non emo. Ie m'attache à ce que ie voy, et que ie tiens, et ne m'eslongne guere du port: Alter remus aquas, alter tibi radat arenas. Et puis on arriue peu à ces auancements, qu'en hazardant premierement le sien.

Et ie suis d'aduis, que si ce qu'on a, suffit à maintenir la condition en laquelle on est nay, et dressé, c'est folie d'en lascher la prise, sur l'incertitude de l'augmenter. Celuy à qui la Fortune refuse dequoy planter son pied, et establir vn estre tranquille et reposé, il est pardonnable s'il iette au hazard ce qu'il a, puis qu'ainsi comme ainsi la necessité l'enuoye à la queste. Capienda rebus in malis præceps via est. Et i'excuse plustost vn cabdet, de mettre sa legitime au vent, que celuy à qui l'honneur de la maison est en charge, qu'on ne peut point voir necessiteux qu'à sa faute.

I'ay bien trouué le chemin plus court et plus aisé, auec le conseil de mes bons amis du temps passé, de me défaire de ce desir, et de me tenir coy: Cui sit conditio dulcis, sine puluere palmæ. Iugeant aussi bien sainement, de mes forces, qu'elles n'estoient pas capables de grandes choses. Et me souuenant de ce mot du feu Chancelier Oliuier, que les François semblent des guenons, qui vont grimpant contremont vn arbre, de branche en branche, et ne cessent d'aller, iusques à ce qu'elles soyent arriuées à la plus haute branche: et y montrent le cul, quand elles y sont. Turpe est, quòd nequeas, capiti committere pondus, / Et pressum inflexo mox dare terga genu.

2.17.22 Les qualitez mesmes qui sont en moy non reprochables, ie les trouuois inutiles en ce siecle. La facilité de mes mœurs, on l'eust nommée lascheté et foiblesse: la foy et la conscience s'y feussent trouuées scrupuleuses et superstitieuses: la franchise et la liberté, importune, inconsiderée et temeraire. A quelque chose sert le mal'heur. Il fait bon naistre en vn siecle fort depraué: car par comparaison d'autruy, vous estes estimé vertueux à bon marché.

Qui n'est que parricide en nos iours et sacrilege, il est homme de bien et d'honneur: Nunc, si depositum non inficiatur amicus, vor at the start of their career—that I could never have done: I do not pay cash for hope. I cling to what I see and hold, and I hardly stray from port: Let one oar sweep the water, and the other the sand. And besides, one seldom attains such advancement except by first risking what one has.[22]

ENGLISH

And I am of the opinion that if what you have is enough to maintain the condition in which you were born and brought up, it is folly to let go of it on the uncertain chance of increasing it. The man to whom Fortune refuses a place to set his foot and establish a quiet, settled existence is pardonable if he gambles what he has, since one way or another necessity sends him out on the quest. In bad times one must take the headlong road. And I would sooner excuse a younger son for throwing his portion to the winds than the man charged with the honor of the house, who cannot be seen in want except through his own fault.[23]

I did indeed find it the shorter and easier way, with the advice of my good friends of times past, to rid myself of this desire and keep still: Whose happy lot is the palm without the dust. Judging also, quite soundly, that my powers were not capable of great things. And remembering that saying of the late Chancellor Olivier, that the French are like monkeys that go climbing up a tree from branch to branch and never stop until they have reached the highest branch—and there, once they are up, they show their backside. It is shameful to load on your head a weight you cannot bear, / And soon, buckling at the knee, to turn your back and give way.[24]

Even those qualities in me that are not blameworthy I found useless in this age. The easiness of my manners would have been called cowardice and weakness; good faith and conscience would have been thought scrupulous and superstitious; frankness and freedom, tiresome, thoughtless and rash. Misfortune is good for something. It is a fine thing to be born in a thoroughly depraved age, for by comparison with others you are reckoned virtuous at a bargain price.

Anyone who in our day is no worse than a parricide and a desecrator of churches is a good and honorable man: Now, if a friend does not deny a de-

22 Terence, The Brothers; then Propertius, Elegies.
23 Seneca, Agamemnon.
24 Horace, Epistles; then Propertius. François Olivier (1497–1560) was Chancellor of France.

FRENCH

Si reddat veterem cum tota ærugine follem,
Prodigiosa fides, et Tuscis digna libellis,
Quæque coronata lustrari debeat agna. Et ne fut iamais temps et lieu, où il y eust pour les Princes loyer plus certain et plus grand, proposé à la bonté, et à la iustice. Le premier qui s'auisera de se pousser en faueur, et en credit par cette voye là, ie suis bien deçeu si à bon compte il ne deuance ses compaignons. La force, la violence, peuuent quelque chose: mais non pas tousiours tout.

Les marchans, les iuges de village, les artisans, nous les voyons aller à pair de vaillance et science militaire, auec la noblesse. Ils rendent des combats honorables et publiques et priuez: ils battent, ils defendent villes en noz guerres presentes. Vn Prince estouffe sa recommendation emmy cette presse. Qu'il reluise d'humanité, de verité, de loyauté, de temperance, et sur tout de iustice: marques rares, incognuës et exilées. C'est la seule volonté des peuples dequoy il peut faire ses affaires: et nulles autres qualitez ne peuuent attirer leur volonté comme celles là: leur estant les plus vtiles. Nihil est tam populare quàm bonitas.

2.17.23 Par cette proportion ie me fusse trouué grand et rare: comme ie me trouue pygmée et populaire, à la proportion d'aucuns siecles passez: ausquels il estoit vulgaire, si d'autres plus fortes qualitez n'y concurroient, de veoir vn homme moderé en ses vengeances, mol au ressentiment des offences, religieux en l'obseruance de sa parolle: ny double ny soupple, ny accommodant sa foy à la volonté d'autruy et aux occasions. Plustost lairrois-ie rompre le col aux affaires, que de plier ma foy pour leur seruice.

ENGLISH

posit,
If he returns an old purse with all its rust,
That is prodigious honesty, worthy of the Etruscan books,
And calls for purification with a garlanded lamb. And there was never a time or place where a surer and greater reward was offered to princes for goodness and justice. The first who takes it into his head to push his way into favor and credit by that road, I am much mistaken if he does not easily outstrip his fellows. Force and violence can do something, but not always everything.[25]

Merchants, village judges, artisans—we see them matching the nobility in valor and military science. They fight honorable combats, both public and private; they batter and defend towns in our present wars. A prince's distinction is smothered in this throng. Let him shine with humanity, truthfulness, loyalty, temperance, and above all justice: rare marks, unknown and exiled. It is solely through the goodwill of the peoples that he can get his business done, and no other qualities can win their goodwill like those, since they are the most useful to them. Nothing is so popular as goodness.[26]

By that measure I would have found myself great and rare, just as I find myself a pygmy and commonplace by the measure of certain past ages, in which it was ordinary—unless other, stronger qualities went with it—to see a man moderate in his revenge, slow to resent offenses, scrupulous in keeping his word, neither double nor pliant, nor fitting his faith to the will of others and to circumstances. I would rather let affairs break their necks than bend my faith to serve them.

AGAINST DISSIMULATION

Montaigne hates the new art of feigning and holds that a prince who breaks his word ruins himself.

FRENCH

2.17.24 Car quant à cette nouuelle vertu de faintise et dissimulation, qui est à cett'heure si fort en credit, ie la hay capitalement: et de tous les vices, ie n'en trouue aucun qui tesmoigne tant de lascheté et bassesse de cœur. C'est vn' humeur coüarde et seruile de s'aller desguiser et cacher sous vn masque, et de n'oser se faire veoir tel

ENGLISH

For as for this new virtue of feigning and dissimulation, which is now so highly in favor, I hate it mortally; and of all the vices, I find none that shows so much cowardice and baseness of heart. It is a cowardly and servile disposition to go dis-

25 Juvenal, Satires. The "Etruscan books" recorded prodigies and the rites for expiating them.
26 Cicero, For Ligarius.

FRENCH

qu'on est. Par là nos hommes se dressent à la perfidie. Estans duicts à produire des parolles fauces, ils ne font pas conscience d'y manquer. Vn cœur genereux ne doit point desmentir ses pensées: il se veut faire voir iusques au dedans: tout y est bon, ou aumoins, tout y est humain.

Aristote estime office de magnanimité, hayr et aymer à descouuert: iuger, parler auec toute franchise: et au prix de la verité, ne faire cas de l'approbation ou reprobation d'autruy. Apollonius disoit que c'estoit aux serfs de mentir, et aux libres de dire verité. C'est la premiere et fondamentale partie de la vertu. Il la faut aymer pour elle mesme. Celuy qui dit vray, par ce qu'il y est d'ailleurs obligé, et par ce qu'il sert: et qui ne craind point à dire mensonge, quand il n'importe à personne, il n'est pas veritable suffisamment. Mon ame de sa complexion refuit la menterie, et haït mesme à la penser.

I'ay vn' interne vergongne et vn remors piquant, si par fois elle m'eschappe, comme par fois elle m'eschappe, les occasions me surprenans et agitans impremeditement. Il ne faut pas tousiours dire tout, car ce seroit sottise. Mais ce qu'on dit, il faut qu'il soit tel qu'on le pense: autrement, c'est meschanceté.

2.17.25 Ie ne sçay quelle commodité ils attendent de se faindre et contrefaire sans cesse: si ce n'est, de n'en estre pas creus, lors mesmes qu'ils disent verité. Cela peut tromper vne fois ou deux les hommes: mais de faire profession de se tenir couuert: et se vanter, comme ont faict aucuns de nos Princes, qu'ils ietteroient leur chemise au feu, si elle estoit participante de leurs vrayes intentions, qui est vn mot de l'ancien Metellus Macedonicus: et qui ne sçait se faindre, ne sçait pas regner: c'est tenir aduertis ceux qui ont à les praticquer, que ce n'est que piperie et mensonge qu'ils disent.

Quo quis versutior et callidior est, hoc inuisior et suspectior, detracta opinione probitatis. Ce seroit vne grande simplesse à qui se lairroit amuser ny au visage ny aux parolles de celuy, qui fait estat d'estre tousiours autre au dehors, qu'il n'est au dedans: comme faisoit Tibere. Et ne sçay guising oneself and hiding behind a mask, not daring to let oneself be seen as one is. That is how our men train themselves for treachery. Being practiced at uttering false words, they have no qualms about breaking them. A generous heart should not belie its thoughts; it wants to be seen right to its depths. Everything there is good, or at least everything is human.

ENGLISH

Aristotle considers it the part of magnanimity to hate and love openly, to judge and speak with complete frankness, and, compared with the truth, to set no store by the approval or disapproval of others. Apollonius used to say that lying was for slaves and telling the truth for free men. Truthfulness is the first and fundamental part of virtue. We must love it for its own sake. The man who tells the truth because he is obliged to for some other reason, and because it serves him, and who is not afraid to tell a lie when it matters to nobody, is not truthful enough. My soul by its very nature shrinks from lying and hates even to think of it.

I feel an inward shame and a stinging remorse if a lie sometimes slips out of me—as sometimes it does, when occasions take me by surprise and stir me before I can think. We need not always say everything, for that would be foolish. But what we do say must be what we think; otherwise it is wickedness.

I do not know what advantage they expect from constantly feigning and dissembling, unless it is not to be believed even when they tell the truth. That may deceive people once or twice. But to make a profession of keeping oneself covered, and to boast, as some of our princes have done, that they would throw their shirt into the fire if it were privy to their true intentions (a saying of the ancient Metellus Macedonicus), and that he who does not know how to dissemble does not know how to reign—this is to give fair warning to those who have to deal with them that everything they say is nothing but trickery and lies.[27]

The craftier and more cunning a man is, the more he is hated and suspected, once his reputation for honesty is gone. It would be great simplicity in anyone to let himself be taken in by either the face or the words 27 Quintus Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus was a Roman general of the 2nd century BC. The maxim about dissembling and reigning was attributed to Louis XI.

FRENCH

quelle part telles gens peuuent auoir au commerce des hommes, ne produisans rien qui soit receu pour comptant. Qui est desloyal enuers la verité, l'est aussi enuers le mensonge.

2.17.26 Ceux qui de nostre temps ont consideré en l'establissement du deuoir d'vn Prince, le bien de ses affaires seulement: et l'ont preferé au soing de sa foy et conscience, diroyent quelque chose à vn Prince, de qui la Fortune auroit rengé à tel poinct les affaires, que pour tout iamais il les peust establir par vn seul manquement et faute à sa parole. Mais il n'en va pas ainsin. On rechet souuent en pareil marché: on fait plus d'vne paix, plus d'vn traitté en sa vie.

Le gain, qui les conuie à la premiere desloyauté, et quasi tousiours il s'en presente, comme à toutes autres meschancetez: les sacrileges, les meurtres, les rebellions, les trahisons, s'entreprennent pour quelque espece de fruit: mais ce premier gain apporte infinis dommages suyuants: iettant ce Prince hors de tout commerce, et de tout moyen de negotiation par l'exemple de cette infidelité.

Solyman de la race des Ottomans, race peu soigneuse de l'obseruance des promesses et paches, lors que de mon enfance, il fit descendre son armée à Otrante, ayant sçeu que Mercurin de Gratinare, et les habitants de Castro, estoyent detenus prisonniers, apres auoir rendu la place, contre ce qui auoit esté capitulé par ses gents auec eux, manda qu'on les relaschast: et qu'ayant en main d'autres grandes entreprises en cette contrée là, cette desloyauté, quoy qu'elle eust apparence d'vtilité presente, luy apporteroit pour l'aduenir, vn descri et vne deffiance d'infini preiudice.

2.17.27 Or de moy i'ayme mieux estre importun et indiscret, que flateur et dissimulé. I'aduoüe qu'il se peut mesler quelque poincte de fierté, et d'opiniastreté, à se tenir ainsin entier et ouuert comme ie suis sans consideration d'autruy. Et me semble que ie deuiens vn peu plus libre, où il le faudroit moins estre: et que ie m'eschauffe par l'opposition du respect. Il peut estre aussi, que ie me laisse aller apres ma nature à faute d'art. Presentant aux of a man who makes a point of always being different outside from what he is within, as Tiberius did. And I do not know what part such people can have in human dealings, since they produce nothing that is accepted as ready money. Whoever is disloyal to truth is disloyal to falsehood too.[28]

ENGLISH

Those in our time who, in establishing a prince's duty, have considered only the good of his affairs, and have put it ahead of care for his good faith and conscience, would have something to say to a prince whose affairs Fortune had so arranged that he could settle them forever by a single breach and failure of his word. But that is not how things go. You often fall back into the same kind of bargain; you make more than one peace, more than one treaty, in your life.[29]

The gain that tempts them to the first breach of faith—and some gain almost always presents itself, as with every other kind of wickedness: sacrilege, murder, rebellion and treason are all undertaken for some sort of profit—this first gain brings countless losses after it, shutting that prince out of all dealings and every means of negotiation because of the example of this faithlessness.

Suleiman, of the Ottoman race—a race not very careful about keeping promises and pacts—when in my childhood he landed his army at Otranto, learned that Mercurino de Gattinara and the inhabitants of Castro were being held prisoner after surrendering the place, contrary to the terms his men had agreed with them. He sent orders that they be released, saying that since he had other great enterprises in hand in that region, this breach of faith, though it looked advantageous for the moment, would bring him in future a discredit and a distrust that would do him infinite harm.[30]

As for me, I would rather be tiresome and indiscreet than a flatterer and a dissembler. I admit that some touch of pride and stubbornness may be mixed in with keeping myself as whole and open as I do, without regard for others. And it seems to me that I become a little freer where I ought to be less so, and that the respect I am expected to show

28 Cicero, On Duties.
29 Montaigne is probably thinking of Machiavelli's The Prince (1532) and its followers.
30 Suleiman the Magnificent (reigned 1520–1566); his forces raided the coast near Otranto, in southern Italy, in 1537. Castro is a small town nearby.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	grands cette mesme licence de langue et de contenance que i'apporte de ma maison: ie sens combien elle decline vers l'indiscretion et inciuilité.	provokes me by contrast. It may also be that, for lack of art, I let myself follow my nature. Bringing to the great the same freedom of tongue and bearing that I bring from my own house, I feel how much it tends toward indiscretion and incivility.
	Mais outre ce que ie suis ainsi faict, ie n'ay pas l'esprit assez souple pour gauchir à vne prompte demande, et pour en eschapper par quelque destour: ny pour feindre vne verité, ny assez de memoire pour la retenir ainsi feinte: ny certes assez d'asseurance pour la maintenir: et fais le braue par foiblesse. Parquoy ie m'abandonne à la nayfueté, et à tousiours dire ce que ie pense, et par complexion, et par dessein: laissant à la Fortune d'en conduire l'euenement. Aristippus disoit le principal fruit, qu'il eust tiré de la philosophie, estre, qu'il parloit librement et ouuertement à chacun.	But besides the fact that I am made this way, I do not have a mind supple enough to sidestep a sudden question and slip out of it by some detour, nor to make up a truth, nor memory enough to retain it once made up, nor, certainly, assurance enough to keep it up; and I play the bold man out of weakness. So I give myself up to naturalness and to always saying what I think, both by temperament and by design, leaving it to Fortune to manage the outcome. Aristippus used to say that the chief fruit he had drawn from philosophy was that he spoke freely and openly to everyone.

A MEMORY FULL OF HOLES

His memory fails him constantly, along with a slow wit and ignorance of everyday household matters.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.17.28	C'est vn outil de merueilleux seruice, que la memoire, et sans lequel le iugement fait bien à peine son office: elle me manque du tout. Ce qu'on me veut proposer, il faut que ce soit à parcelles: car de respondre à vn propos, où il y eust plusieurs diuers chefs, il n'est pas en ma puissance. Ie ne sçaurois receuoir vne charge sans tablettes. Et quand i'ay vn propos de consequence à tenir, s'il est de longue haleine, ie suis reduit à cette vile et miserable necessité, d'apprendre par cœur mot à mot ce que i'ay à dire: autrement ie n'auroy ny façon, ny asseurance, estant en crainte que ma memoire vinst à me faire vn mauuais tour. Mais ce moyen m'est non moins difficile.	Memory is a tool of wonderful service, without which judgment can barely do its job; and I lack it entirely. Whatever anyone wants to put to me must come in small pieces, for answering a proposal with several different heads is beyond my power. I could not take on a commission without notebooks. And when I have a speech of some consequence to make, if it is a long one, I am reduced to the vile and wretched necessity of learning by heart, word for word, what I have to say; otherwise I would have neither poise nor assurance, being afraid that my memory might play me a nasty trick. But this method is no less difficult for me.
	Pour apprendre trois vers, il m'y faut trois heures. Et puis en vn propre ouurage la liberté et authorité de remuer l'ordre, de changer vn mot, variant sans cesse la matiere, la rend plus malaisée à arrester en la memoire de son autheur. Or plus ie m'en defie, plus elle se trouble: elle me sert mieux par rencontre, il faut que ie la solicite nonchalamment: car si ie la presse, elle s'estonne: et depuis qu'ell' a commencé à chanceler, plus ie la sonde, plus elle s'empestre et embarrasse: elle me sert à son heure, non pas à la mienne.	To learn three lines of verse takes me three hours. And then, in one's own work, the freedom and authority to shift the order and change a word, constantly varying the material, make it harder for the author to fix in his memory. Now, the more I distrust my memory, the more confused it gets. It serves me better when I happen upon things; I have to court it casually, for if I press it, it is stunned; and once it has begun to falter, the more I sound it, the more it tangles and muddles itself. It serves me in its own time, not in mine.
2.17.29	Cecy que ie sens en la memoire, ie le sens en plusieurs autres parties. Ie fuis le commandement, l'obligation, et	What I feel in my memory I feel in several other parts. I flee command, obligation and constraint.

FRENCH

la contrainte. Ce que ie fais aysément et naturellement, si ie m'ordonne de le faire, par vne expresse et prescrite ordonnance, ie ne sçay plus le faire. Au corps mesme, les membres qui ont quelque liberté et iurisdiction plus particuliere sur eux, me refusent par fois leur obeyssance, quand ie les destine et attache à certain poinct et heure de seruice necessaire. Cette preordonnance contraincte et tyrannique les rebute: ils se croupissent d'effroy ou de despit, et se transissent.

Autresfois estant en lieu, où c'est discourtoisie barbaresque, de ne respondre à ceux qui vous conuient à boire: quoy qu'on m'y traitast auec toute liberté, i'essaiay de faire le bon compagnon, en faueur des Dames qui estoyent de la partie, selon l'vsage du pays. Mais il y eut du plaisir: car cette menasse et preparation, d'auoir à m'efforcer outre ma coustume, et mon naturel, m'estoupa de maniere le gosier, que ie ne sçeuz aualler vne seule goute: et fus priué de boire, pour le besoing mesme de mon repas. Ie me trouuay saoul et desalteré, par tant de breuuage que mon imagination auoit preoccupé.

Cet effaict est plus apparent en ceux qui ont l'imagination plus vehemente et puissante: mais il est pourtant naturel: et n'est aucun qui ne s'en ressente aucunement. On offroit à vn excellent archer condamné à la mort, de luy sauuer la vie, s'il vouloit faire voir quelque notable preuue de son art: il refusa de s'en essayer, craignant que la trop grande contention de sa volonté, luy fist fouruoyer la main, et qu'au lieu de sauuer sa vie, il perdist encore la reputation qu'il auoit acquise au tirer de l'arc.

Vn homme qui pense ailleurs, ne faudra point, à vn pousse pres, de refaire tousiours vn mesme nombre et mesure de pas, au lieu où il se promene: mais s'il y est auec attention de les mesurer et compter, il trouuera que ce qu'il faisoit par nature et par hazard, il ne le fera pas si exactement par dessein.

2.17.30 Ma librairie, qui est des belles entre les librairies de village, est assise à vn coin de ma maison: s'il me tombe en fantasie chose que i'y vueille aller chercher ou escrire, de peur qu'elle ne m'eschappe en trauersant seulement ma cour, il faut que ie la donne en garde à quelqu'autre. Si ie m'enhardis en parlant, à me destourner tant soit peu, de mon fil, ie ne faux iamais de le perdre: qui fait que ie me tiens en mes discours, contrainct, sec, et

ENGLISH

What I do easily and naturally, if I order myself to do it by an express and prescribed order, I can no longer do. Even in the body, those members that have some freedom and a more particular jurisdiction of their own sometimes refuse to obey me when I assign and tie them to a fixed time and place of required service. This forced and tyrannical prearrangement puts them off; they shrink back in fright or spite, and go numb.

Once, when I was in a place where it is barbarous discourtesy not to respond to those who invite you to drink, I tried, although I was treated there with every freedom, to play the good fellow, to please the ladies who were of the party, according to the custom of the country. But it was quite comical: for this threat and preparation, the prospect of having to force myself beyond my habit and my nature, so stopped up my throat that I could not swallow a single drop, and I was deprived of drinking even what I needed with my meal. I found myself sated and my thirst quenched by all the drink my imagination had swallowed in advance.

This effect is more apparent in those whose imagination is more vehement and powerful; but it is natural nonetheless, and there is no one who does not feel it to some degree. An excellent archer condemned to death was offered his life if he would give some notable proof of his skill. He refused to try, fearing that the excessive strain of his will would make his hand go astray, and that instead of saving his life he would lose, besides, the reputation he had won in archery.

A man whose mind is elsewhere will never fail, within an inch, to repeat the same number and length of steps in the place where he walks up and down; but if he sets about it with the intention of measuring and counting them, he will find that what he did by nature and by chance he will not do so exactly by design.

My library, which is one of the fine ones among village libraries, is set in a corner of my house. If something comes into my head that I want to go and look up or write down there, I have to entrust it to someone else for safekeeping, for fear it may escape me just in crossing my courtyard. If, while speaking, I make bold to stray ever so little from my thread, I never fail to lose it; which is why I resserré. Les gens, qui me seruent, il faut que ie les appelle par le nom de leurs charges, ou de leur pays: car il m'est tres-malaisé de retenir des noms.

FRENCH

Ie diray bien qu'il y a trois syllabes, que le son en est rude, qu'il commence ou termine par telle lettre. Et si ie durois à viure long temps, ie ne croy pas que ie n'oubliasse mon nom propre, comme ont faict d'autres. Messala Coruinus fut deux ans n'ayant trace aucune de memoire. Ce qu'on dit aussi de George Trapezonce. Et pour mon interest, ie rumine souuent, quelle vie c'estoit que la leur: et si sans cette piece, il me restera assez pour me soustenir auec quelque aisance. Et y regardant de pres, ie crains que ce defaut, s'il est parfaict, perde toutes les functions de l'ame.

Plenus rimarum sum, hac atque illac perfluo. Il m'est aduenu plus d'vne fois, d'oublier le mot que i'auois trois heures au parauant donné ou receu d'vn autre: et d'oublier où i'auoy caché ma bourse, quoy qu'en die Cicero. Ie m'ayde à perdre, ce que ie serre particulierement. Memoria certè non modò philosophiam, sed omnis vitæ vsum, omnésque artes, vnà maximè continet. C'est le receptacle et l'estuy de la science, que la memoire: l'ayant si deffaillante ie n'ay pas fort à me plaindre, si ie ne sçay guere. Ie sçay en general le nom des arts, et ce dequoy ils traictent, mais rien au delà. Ie feuillete les liures, ie ne les estudie pas.

Ce qui m'en demeure, c'est chose que ie ne reconnoy plus estre d'autruy. C'est cela seulement, dequoy mon iugement a faict son profit: les discours et les imaginations, dequoy il s'est imbu. L'autheur, le lieu, les mots, et autres circonstances, ie les oublie incontinent. Et suis si excellent en l'oubliance, que mes escripts mesmes et compositions, ie ne les oublie pas moins que le reste. On m'allegue tous les coups à moy-mesme, sans que ie le sente.

Qui voudroit sçauoir d'où sont les vers et exemples, que i'ay icy entassez, me mettroit en peine de le luy dire: et si ne les ay mendiez qu'és portes cognuës et fameuses: ne me contentant pas qu'ils fussent riches, s'ils ne venoient encore de main riche et honorable: l'authorité y concurre quant et la raison. Ce n'est pas grande merueille si mon liure suit la fortune des autres liures: et si ma memoire keep my talk constrained, dry and terse. The people who serve me I have to call by the names of their jobs or of their home regions, for I find it very hard to retain names.[31]

ENGLISH

I can tell you that a name has three syllables, that it sounds harsh, that it begins or ends with such-and-such a letter. And if I were to live long, I do not doubt that I would forget my own name, as others have done. Messala Corvinus spent two years without a trace of memory. The same is said of George of Trebizond. And on my own account I often ponder what sort of life theirs was, and whether, without this faculty, I shall have enough left to keep me going with some ease. And looking at it closely, I fear that this defect, if it becomes complete, ruins all the functions of the soul.[32]

I am full of cracks; I leak out on every side. More than once I have forgotten the password I had given or received three hours before, and forgotten where I had hidden my purse, whatever Cicero may say. I help myself lose what I put away with special care. Memory, surely, is the one faculty that holds not only philosophy but the whole conduct of life and all the arts. Memory is the receptacle and casket of knowledge; having one so defective, I have no great cause to complain if I know little. I know the names of the arts in general, and what they deal with, but nothing beyond that. I leaf through books; I do not study them.[33]

What stays with me from them is something I no longer recognize as belonging to anyone else. It is only what my judgment has profited from: the reasonings and ideas it has soaked up. The author, the place, the words and the other circumstances I forget at once. And I am so excellent at forgetting that I forget my own writings and compositions no less than everything else. People are always quoting me to myself without my noticing.

Anyone who wanted to know where the verses and examples I have heaped up here come from would put me hard to it to tell him. And yet I have begged them only at well-known and famous doors, not content that they should be rich unless they also came from a rich and honorable hand: authority goes along with reason there. It is no great wonder 31 Montaigne's library was in the tower of his château, across the courtyard from the main house.

32 Marcus Valerius Messala Corvinus (64 BC–AD 8), Roman orator and statesman.
33 Terence, The Eunuch; then Cicero, Academica. In On Old Age Cicero says no old man forgets where he has hidden his treasure.

FRENCH

desempare ce que i'escry, comme ce que ie ly: et ce que ie donne, comme ce que ie reçoy.

2.17.31 Outre le deffaut de la memoire, i'en ay d'autres, qui aydent beaucoup à mon ignorance. I'ay l'esprit tardif, et mousse, le moindre nuage luy arreste sa poincte: en façon que, pour exemple, ie ne luy proposay iamais enigme si aisé, qu'il sçeust desuelopper. Il n'est si vaine subtilité qui ne m'empesche. Aux ieux, où l'esprit a sa part; des échets, des cartes, des dames, et autres, ie n'y comprens que les plus grossiers traicts. L'apprehension, ie l'ay lente et embrouillée: mais ce qu'elle tient vne fois, elle le tient bien, et l'embrasse bien vniuersellement, estroitement et profondement, pour le temps qu'elle le tient. I'ay la veuë longue, saine et entiere, mais qui se lasse aiséement au trauail, et se charge.

A cette occasion ie ne puis auoir long commerce auec les liures, que par le moyen du seruice d'autruy. Le ieune Pline instruira ceux qui ne l'ont essayé, combien ce retardement est important à ceux qui s'adonnent à cette occupation.

2.17.32 Il n'est point ame si chetifue et brutale, en laquelle on ne voye reluire quelque faculté particuliere: il n'y en a point de si enseuelie, qui ne face vne saillie par quelque bout. Et comment il aduienne qu'vne ame aueugle et endormie à toutes autres choses, se trouue vifue, claire, et excellente, à certain particulier effect, il s'en faut enquerir aux maistres. Mais les belles ames, ce sont les ames vniuerselles, ouuertes, et prestes à tout: si non instruites, au moins instruisables. Ce que ie dy pour accuser la mienne.

Car soit par foiblesse ou nonchalance (et de mettre à nonchaloir ce qui est à nos pieds, ce que nous auons entremains, ce qui regarde de plus pres l'vsage de la vie, c'est chose bien eslongnée de mon dogme), il n'en est point vne si inepte et si ignorante que la mienne, de plusieurs telles choses vulgaires, et qui ne se peuuent sans honte ignorer. Il faut que i'en conte quelques exemples.

2.17.33 Ie suis né et nourry aux champs, et parmy le labourage: i'ay des affaires, et du mesnage en main, depuis que ceux qui me deuançoient en la possession des biens que ie iouys, m'ont quitté leur place. Or ie ne sçay conter ny à get, ny à plume: la pluspart de nos monnoyes ie ne les connoy pas: ny ne sçay la difference de l'vn grain à if my book shares the fate of other books, and if my memory lets go of what I write as well as what I read, of what I give as well as what I receive.

ENGLISH

Besides the defect of memory, I have others that contribute a good deal to my ignorance. My mind is slow and blunt; the slightest cloud stops its point, so that, for example, I never set it a riddle so easy that it could unravel it. There is no subtlety so empty that it does not baffle me. In games where the mind plays a part—chess, cards, checkers and the like—I grasp only the crudest features. My understanding is slow and muddled; but what it once grasps it holds well, and embraces quite fully, closely and deeply, for as long as it holds it. My sight is long, sound and perfect, but it tires easily with work and grows heavy.

For this reason I cannot have long dealings with books except with the help of others. The younger Pliny will teach those who have not experienced it how much this hindrance matters to those who devote themselves to this occupation.[34]

There is no soul so wretched and brutish that some particular faculty is not seen shining in it; there is none so buried that it does not break out at some point. And how it comes about that a soul blind and asleep to everything else is found lively, clear and excellent in some particular activity—we must ask the masters. But the fine souls are the universal souls, open and ready for everything: if not taught, at least teachable. I say this to accuse my own.

For whether through weakness or carelessness (and to disregard what lies at our feet, what we have in our hands, what most closely concerns the business of living, is something very far from my doctrine), there is no soul so inept and ignorant as mine about many such ordinary things, which one cannot be ignorant of without shame. I must give a few examples.

I was born and brought up in the country, among farming; I have had business and the management of a household in my hands ever since those who preceded me in possession of the property I enjoy gave up their place to me. Now, I cannot reckon either with counters or with a pen; most of our 34 Pliny the Younger's letters mention his trouble with his eyes.

FRENCH

l'autre, ny en la terre, ny au grenier, si elle n'est par trop apparente: ny à peine celle d'entre les choux et les laictues de mon iardin.

Ie n'entens pas seulement les noms des premiers outils du mesnage, ny les plus grossiers principes de l'agriculture, et que les enfans sçauent: moins aux arts mechaniques, en la trafique, et en la cognoissance des marchandises, diuersité et nature des fruicts, de vins, de viandes: ny à dresser vn oiseau, ny à medeciner vn cheual, ou vn chien. Et puis qu'il me faut faire la honte toute entiere, il n'y a pas vn mois qu'on me surprint ignorant dequoy le leuain seruoit à faire du pain; et que c'estoit que faire cuuer du vin. On coniectura anciennement à Athenes, vne aptitude à la mathematique, en celuy à qui on voyoit ingenieusement agencer et fagotter vne charge de brossailles.

Vrayement on tireroit de moy vne bien contraire conclusion: car qu'on me donne tout l'apprest d'vne cuisine, me voila à la faim. Par ces traits de ma confession, on en peut imaginer d'autres à mes despens. Mais quel que ie me face cognoistre, pourueu que ie me face cognoistre tel que ie suis, ie fay mon effect. Et si ne m'excuse pas, d'oser mettre par escrit des propos si bas et friuoles que ceux-cy. La bassesse du suiet m'y contrainct. Qu'on accuse si on veut mon proiect, mais mon progrez, non. Tant y a que sans l'aduertissement d'autruy, ie voy assez le peu que tout cecy vaut et poise, et la folie de mon dessein.

C'est prou que mon iugement ne se deffere point, duquel ce sont icy les essais. Nasutus sis vsque licet, sis denique nasus,
Quantum noluerit ferre rogatus Atlas:
Et possis ipsum tu deridere Latinum,
Non potes in nugas dicere plura meas,
Ipse ego quàm dixi: quid dentem dente iuuabit
Rodere? carne opus est, si satur esse velis.
Ne perdas operam: qui se mirantur, in illos
Virus habe; nos hæc nouimus esse nihil. Ie ne suis pas obligé à ne dire point de sottises, pourueu que ie ne me trompe pas à les cognoistre. Et de faillir à mon escient, cela m'est si ordinaire, que ie ne faux guere d'autre façon, ie ne faux guere fortuitement.

ENGLISH

coins I do not know; nor do I know the difference between one grain and another, either in the field or in the granary, unless it is too obvious; nor, scarcely, the difference between the cabbages and the lettuces in my garden.

I do not even understand the names of the most basic farm tools, or the crudest principles of agriculture, which children know; still less the mechanical arts, trade, and knowledge of goods, of the variety and nature of fruits, wines and foods; nor how to train a bird or doctor a horse or a dog. And since I must make my shame complete, not a month ago I was caught not knowing what yeast was used for in making bread, and what it meant to let wine ferment in the vat. In Athens long ago they guessed at an aptitude for mathematics in a man they saw cleverly arranging and tying up a load of brushwood.

Truly, one would draw quite the opposite conclusion from me: for give me the whole equipment of a kitchen and there I am, starving. From these features of my confession one can imagine others at my expense. But whatever I make myself known as, provided I make myself known as I am, I achieve my purpose. And yet I make no apology for daring to put into writing such low and frivolous remarks as these. The lowness of my subject forces me to it. Let them blame my project if they like, but not the way I carry it out. Be that as it may, without anyone's telling me, I see well enough how little all this is worth and weighs, and the folly of my design.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

It is enough that my judgment does not come apart, for it is my judgment that these essays put to the test. Be as sharp-nosed as you like, be all nose,
Such a nose as Atlas, if asked, would refuse to carry;
And you could even mock Latinus himself:
You cannot say more against my trifles
Than I have said myself. What good will it do to gnaw tooth against tooth?
You need meat if you want to be filled.
Don't waste your effort: against those who admire themselves
Keep your venom; I know these things are nothing. I am not obliged not to say foolish things, provided I am not deceived in recognizing them. And to go wrong knowingly is so ordinary with me that I hardly ever go wrong in any other way; I hardly ever go wrong by chance.[35]

C'est peu de chose de prester à la temerité de mes humeurs les actions ineptes, puis que ie ne me puis pas deffendre d'y prester ordinairement les vitieuses.

It is a small matter to let the rashness of my temperament have its way in foolish actions, since I cannot help letting it have its way, as a rule, in wicked ones.

IRRESOLUTION

He cannot choose between opinions and prefers to follow, holding that old institutions are better than change.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.17.34 Ie vis vn iour à Barleduc, qu'on presentoit au Roy François second, pour la recommandation de la memoire de René Roy de Sicile, vn pourtraict qu'il auoit luy-mesmes fait de soy. Pourquoy n'est-il loisible de mesme à vn chacun, de se peindre de la plume, comme il se peignoit d'vn creon? Ie ne veux donc pas oublier encor cette cicatrice, bien mal propre à produire en public. C'est l'irresolution: defaut tres-incommode à la negociation des affaires du monde. Ie ne sçay pas prendre party és entreprinses doubteuses: Ne si, ne no, net cor mi suona intero. Ie sçay bien soustenir vne opinion, mais non pas la choisir.

I once saw at Bar-le-Duc a portrait being presented to King Francis II, in remembrance of René, King of Sicily, which René had made of himself. Why is it not equally permissible for everyone to portray himself with the pen, as he portrayed himself with a crayon? So I do not want to leave out this scar either, though it is hardly fit to be shown in public. It is irresolution: a very awkward defect in negotiating the affairs of the world. I do not know how to take sides in doubtful undertakings: Neither yes nor no rings clear in my heart. I can hold up an opinion well enough, but not choose it.[36]

Par ce qu'és choses humaines, à quelque bande qu'on panche, il se presente force apparences, qui nous y confirment: et le philosophe Chrysippus disoit, qu'il ne vouloit apprendre de Zenon et Cleanthez ses maistres, que les dogmes simplement: car quant aux preuues et raisons, il en fourniroit assez de luy mesme. De quelque costé que ie me tourne, ie me fournis tousiours assez de cause et de vray-semblance pour m'y maintenir. Ainsi

Because in human affairs, whichever side one leans to, plenty of appearances present themselves to confirm us in it. And the philosopher Chrysippus said that he wanted to learn from his masters Zeno and Cleanthes only their doctrines, pure and simple; as for proofs and reasons, he would supply enough of them himself. Whichever way I turn, I always supply myself with enough 35 Martial, Epigrams. Latinus was a famous comic actor in Rome.

36 René of Anjou (1409–1480), titular king of Sicily and Naples, and a painter; Francis II reigned 1559–1560. The line is from Petrarch.

FRENCH

i'arreste chez moy le doubte, et la liberté de choisir, iusques à ce que l'occasion me presse. Et lors, à confesser la verité, ie iette le plus souuent la plume au vent, comme on dit, et m'abandonne à la mercy de la Fortune. Vne bien legere inclination et circonstance m'emporte.

Dum in dubio est animus, paulo momento huc atque / Illuc impellitur. L'incertitude de mon iugement, est si également balancée en la pluspart des occurrences, que ie compromettrois volontiers à la decision du sort et des dets. Et remarque auec grande consideration de nostre foiblesse humaine, les exemples que l'histoire diuine mesme nous a laissé de cet vsage, de remettre à la Fortune et au hazard, la determination des eslections és choses doubteuses: Sors cecidit super Matthiam. La raison humaine est vn glaiue double et dangereux. Et en la main mesme de Socrates son plus intime et plus familier amy: voyez à quants de bouts c'est vn baston. Ainsi, ie ne suis propre qu'à suyure, et me laisse aysément emporter à la foule.

Ie ne me fie pas assez en mes forces, pour entreprendre de commander, ny guider. Ie suis bien ayse de trouuer mes pas trassez par les autres. S'il faut courre le hazard d'vn choix incertain, i'ayme mieux que ce soit soubs tel, qui s'asseure plus de ses opinions, et les espouse plus, que ie ne fay les miennes, ausquelles ie trouue le fondement et le plant glissant.

2.17.35 Et si ne suis pas trop facile pourtant au change, d'autant que i'apperçois aux opinions contraires vne pareille foiblesse. Ipsa consuetudo assentiendi periculosa esse videtur, et lubrica. Notamment aux affaires politiques, il y a vn beau champ ouuert au bransle et à la contestation. Iusta pari premitur veluti cum pondere libra / Prona, nec hac plus parte sedet, nec surgit ab illa. Les discours de Machiauel, pour exemple, estoient assez solides pour le subiect, si y a-il eu grand'aisance à les combattre; et ceux qui l'ont faict, n'ont pas laissé moins de facilité à combattre les leurs.

Il s'y trouueroit tousiours à vn tel argument, dequoy y fournir responces, dupliques, repliques, tripliques, quadrupliques, et cette infinie contexture de debats, que nostre chicane a alongé tant qu'elle a peu en faueur des procez: Cædimur, et totidem plagis consumimus hostem: les raisons n'y ayant guere autre fondement que l'experience, et la diuersité des euenemens humains, cause and plausibility to hold to it. So I keep doubt and freedom of choice at home until the occasion presses me. And then, to tell the truth, I most often throw the feather to the wind, as they say, and abandon myself to the mercy of Fortune. A very slight inclination or circumstance carries me away.

ENGLISH

While the mind is in doubt, the slightest impulse drives it this way / And that. The uncertainty of my judgment is so evenly balanced in most situations that I would willingly leave the decision to lot and dice. And I note, reflecting deeply on our human weakness, the examples that even sacred history has left us of this practice of leaving to Fortune and chance the decision of choices in doubtful matters: The lot fell upon Matthias. Human reason is a two-edged and dangerous sword. Even in the hand of Socrates, its most intimate and familiar friend, see how many ends this stick has. So I am fit only to follow, and I easily let myself be carried along by the crowd.[37]

I do not trust my powers enough to undertake to command or to guide. I am very glad to find my path traced out by others. If I must run the risk of an uncertain choice, I would rather it be under someone who is surer of his opinions and more wedded to them than I am to mine, whose foundation and footing I find slippery.

And yet I am not too quick to change, for all that, since I see the same weakness in the opposing opinions. The very habit of assenting seems to be dangerous and slippery. Especially in political affairs there is a wide field open for wavering and dispute. As when a true balance is pressed down by equal weight, / and neither sinks on this side nor rises on that. Machiavelli's reasonings, for example, were solid enough for the subject; yet it has been very easy to attack them, and those who did so have left it no less easy to attack their own.[38]

In such an argument there would always be material for answers, rejoinders, replies, surrejoinders, rebutters, and that endless web of disputes which our legal quibbling has stretched out as far as it could in favor of lawsuits: We are struck, and we wear out the enemy with as many blows. For the reas-

37 Terence, The Woman of Andros; then Acts 1:26, on the choice of the apostle to replace Judas.
38 Cicero, Academica; the verse is from the Panegyric of Messalla in the collection of Tibullus.

FRENCH

nous presentant infinis exemples à toutes sortes de formes.

Vn sçauant personnage de nostre temps, dit qu'en nos almanacs, où ils disent chaud, qui voudra dire froid, et au lieu de sec, humide: et mettre tousiours le rebours de ce qu'ils pronostiquent, s'il deuoit entrer en gageure de l'euenement de l'vn ou l'autre, qu'il ne se soucieroit pas quel party il prinst, sauf és choses où il n'y peut escheoir incertitude: comme de promettre à Noël des chaleurs extremes, et à la sainct Iean, des rigueurs de l'hyuer. I'en pense de mesmes de ces discours politiques: à quelque rolle qu'on vous mette, vous auez aussi beau ieu que vostre compagnon, pourueu que vous ne veniez à choquer les principes trop grossiers et apparens.

Et pourtant, selon mon humeur, és affaires publiques, il n'est aucun si mauuais train, pourueu qu'il aye de l'aage et de la constance, qui ne vaille mieux que le changement et le remuement. Nos mœurs sont extrememement corrompuës, et panchent d'vne merueilleuse inclination vers l'empirement: de nos loix et vsances, il y en a plusieurs barbares et monstrueuses: toutesfois pour la difficulté de nous mettre en meilleur estat, et le danger de ce croullement, si ie pouuoy planter vne cheville à nostre rouë, et l'arrester en ce poinct, ie le ferois de bon cœur.

Nunquam adeo fœdis adeóque pudendis / Vtimur exemplis, vt non peiora supersint. Le pis que ie trouue en nostre estat, c'est l'instabilité: et que nos loix, non plus que nos vestemens, ne peuuent prendre aucune forme arrestée. Il est bien aysé d'accuser d'imperfection vne police: car toutes choses mortelles en sont pleines: il est bien aysé d'engendrer à vn peuple le mespris de ses anciennes obseruances: iamais homme n'entreprint cela, qui n'en vinst à bout: mais d'y restablir vn meilleur estat en la place de celuy qu'on a ruiné, à cecy plusieurs se sont morfondus, de ceux qui l'auoient entreprins. Ie fay peu de part à ma prudence, de ma conduite: ie me laisse volontiers mener à l'ordre public du monde.

Heureux peuple, qui fait ce qu'on commande, mieux que ceux qui commandent, sans se tourmenter des causes: qui se laisse mollement rouller apres le roullement celeste. L'obeyssance n'est iamais pure ny tranquille en celuy qui raisonne et qui plaide.

ENGLISH

ons there have hardly any foundation but experience, and the diversity of human events offers us infinite examples in every sort of form.[39]

A learned man of our time says that in our almanacs, where they say hot, a man might say cold, and wet instead of dry, and always put the opposite of what they forecast; and if he had to bet on the outcome of one or the other, he would not care which side he took—except in matters where there can be no uncertainty, such as promising extreme heat at Christmas and the rigors of winter on Saint John's Day at midsummer. I think the same of these political arguments: whatever part you are cast in, you have as good a game as your opponent, provided you do not run up against principles that are too gross and obvious.

And yet, to my way of thinking, in public affairs there is no course so bad, provided it has age and constancy, that it is not better than change and upheaval. Our morals are extremely corrupt and lean with a remarkable inclination toward the worse; among our laws and customs there are many that are barbarous and monstrous. Nevertheless, because of the difficulty of putting ourselves in a better state, and the danger of such a collapse, if I could drive a peg into our wheel and stop it at this point, I would gladly do it.

Never do we use examples so foul and so shameful / that worse ones do not remain. The worst thing I find in our state is instability, and that our laws, any more than our clothes, cannot take on any settled form. It is very easy to accuse a government of imperfection, for all mortal things are full of it. It is very easy to breed in a people contempt for its ancient observances; no man ever undertook that without succeeding. But as for establishing a better state in place of the one that has been ruined—at this, many of those who undertook it have worn themselves out in vain. I give my prudence little share in my conduct; I willingly let myself be led by the public order of the world.[40]

Happy the people who do what they are commanded better than those who command, without tormenting themselves about the reasons; who let themselves roll gently along with the rolling of the 39 Horace, Epistles.

40 Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
	heavens. Obedience is never pure or tranquil in one who reasons and argues.

THE ONE THING I VALUE IN MYSELF

Everyone thinks his own judgment sufficient; Montaigne looks inward and trusts opinions born with him.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.17.36 Somme pour reuenir à moy, ce seul, par où ie m'estime quelque chose, c'est ce, en quoy iamais homme ne s'estima deffaillant: ma recommendation est vulgaire, commune, et populaire: car qui a iamais cuidé auoir faute de sens? Ce seroit vne proposition qui impliqueroit en soy de la contradiction. C'est vne maladie, qui n'est iamais où elle se voit: elle est bien tenace et forte, mais laquelle pourtant, le premier rayon de la veuë du patient, perce et dissipe: comme le regard du soleil vn brouïllas opaque. S'accuser, ce seroit s'excuser en ce subiect là: et se condamner, ce seroit s'absoudre. Il ne fut iamais crocheteur ny femmelette, qui ne pensast auoir assez de sens pour sa prouision.	In sum, to come back to myself: the one thing for which I think something of myself is the very thing in which no man ever thought himself deficient. My claim to distinction is ordinary, common and popular; for who ever believed he lacked sense? That would be a proposition containing its own contradiction. It is a sickness that is never present where it is seen. It is very tenacious and strong, and yet the first ray of the patient's sight pierces and dispels it, as the sun's gaze does a thick fog. To accuse oneself, in this matter, would be to excuse oneself, and to condemn oneself would be to acquit oneself. There was never a street porter or a silly woman who did not think they had sense enough for their needs.
Nous recognoissons aysément és autres, l'aduantage du courage, de la force corporelle, de l'experience, de la disposition, de la beauté: mais l'aduantage du iugement, nous ne le cedons à personne. Et les raisons qui partent du simple discours naturel en autruy, il nous semble qu'il n'a tenu qu'à regarder de ce costé là, que nous ne les ayons trouuees.	We readily recognize that others have the advantage in courage, bodily strength, experience, agility, beauty; but the advantage in judgment we yield to no one. And as for the reasonings that come from plain natural reason in someone else, it seems to us that we would have found them ourselves if we had only looked in that direction.
2.17.37 La science, le stile, et telles parties, que nous voyons és ouurages estrangers, nous touchons bien aysément si elles surpassent les nostres: mais les simples productions de l'entendement, chacun pense qu'il estoit en luy de les rencontrer toutes pareilles, et en apperçoit malaisement le poids et la difficulté, si ce n'est, et à peine, en vne extreme et incomparable distance. Et qui verroit bien à clair la hauteur d'vn iugement estranger, il y arriueroit et y porteroit le sien. Ainsi, c'est vne sorte d'exercitation, de laquelle on doit esperer fort peu de recommandation et de loüange, et vne maniere de composition, de peu de nom. Et puis, pour qui escriuez vous?	Learning, style and such qualities that we see in other people's works, we readily perceive when they surpass our own. But the simple products of the understanding—everyone thinks it was in him to hit upon exactly the same, and he can hardly perceive their weight and difficulty, except, and barely then, at an extreme and incomparable distance. And whoever could see clearly the height of another's judgment would reach it and bring his own up to it. So this is a kind of exercise from which one must hope for very little commendation and praise, and a kind of composition of little renown. And then, for whom are you writing?
Les sçauants, à qui appartient la iurisdiction liuresque, ne cognoissent autre prix que de la doctrine; et n'aduoüent autre proceder en noz esprits, que celuy de l'erudition, et de l'art. Si vous auez prins l'vn des Scipions pour l'autre, que vous reste il à dire, qui vaille? Qui ignore Aristote, selon eux, s'ignore quand et quand soy-mesme. Les ames	The learned, to whom jurisdiction over books belongs, know no other value than learning, and acknowledge no other way of proceeding in our minds than that of erudition and skill. If you have taken one of the Scipios for the other, what is left for you to say that is worth anything? Whoever is grossieres et populaires ne voyent pas la grace d'vn discours delié. Or ces deux especes occupent le monde. La tierce, à qui vous tombez en partage, des ames reglées et fortes d'elles mesmes, est si rare, que iustement elle n'a ny nom, ny rang entre nous: c'est à demy temps perdu, d'aspirer, et de s'efforcer à luy plaire.

FRENCH

2.17.38 On dit communément que le plus iuste partage que Nature nous aye fait de graces, c'est celuy du sens: car il n'est aucun qui ne se contente de ce qu'elle luy en a distribué, n'est-ce pas raison? qui verroit au delà, il verroit au delà de sa veuë. Ie pense auoir les opinions bonnes et saines, mais qui n'en croit autant des siennes? L'vne des meilleures preuues que i'en aye, c'est le peu d'estime que ie fay de moy, car si elles n'eussent esté bien asseurées, elles se fussent aisément laissé piper à l'affection que ie me porte, singuliere, comme celuy qui la ramene quasi toute à moy, et qui ne l'espands gueres hors de là.

Tout ce que les autres en distribuent à vne infinie multitude d'amis, et de cognoissans, à leur gloire, à leur grandeur, ie le rapporte tout au repos de mon esprit, et à moy. Ce qui m'en eschappe ailleurs, ce n'est pas proprement de l'ordonnance de mon discours: Mihi nempe valere et viuere doctus.

2.17.39 Or mes opinions, ie les trouue infiniement hardies et constantes à condamner mon insuffisance. De vray c'est aussi vn subiect, auquel i'exerce mon iugement autant qu'à nul autre. Le monde regarde tousiours vis à vis: moy, ie replie ma veuë au dedans, ie la plante, ie l'amuse là. Chacun regarde deuant soy, moy ie regarde dedans moy. Ie n'ay affaire qu'à moy, ie me considere sans cesse, ie me contrerolle, ie me gouste. Les autres vont tousiours ailleurs, s'ils y pensent bien: ils vont tousiours auant, Nemo in sese tentat descendere: moy, ie me roulle en moy-mesme.

Cette capacité de trier le vray, quelle qu'elle soit en moy, et cett'humeur libre de n'assubiectir aysément ma creance, ie la dois principalement à moy: car les plus ignorant of Aristotle, according to them, is at the same time ignorant of himself. Coarse and common souls do not see the grace of a finely spun argument. Now these two kinds fill the world. The third, into whose lot you fall—souls well ordered and strong in themselves—is so rare that it rightly has neither name nor rank among us. It is half time wasted to aspire and strive to please it.[41]

ENGLISH

It is commonly said that the fairest share of her gifts that Nature has given us is that of sense; for there is no one who is not content with what she has allotted him of it. Isn't that reasonable? Whoever saw beyond it would be seeing beyond his own sight. I think my opinions are good and sound; but who does not believe as much of his own? One of the best proofs I have of it is the low esteem in which I hold myself. For if they had not been well grounded, they would easily have let themselves be tricked by the affection I bear myself—a singular affection, since I bring it almost entirely back to myself and hardly spread it beyond.

All that others distribute of it to an infinite multitude of friends and acquaintances, to their glory, to their greatness, I refer entirely to the repose of my mind and to myself. What escapes from me elsewhere is not strictly by the command of my reason: Taught, indeed, to live and thrive for myself.[42]

Now my opinions I find infinitely bold and constant in condemning my own inadequacy. In truth, this too is a subject on which I exercise my judgment as much as on any other. The world always looks straight ahead; as for me, I turn my gaze inward, I fix it there, I keep it busy there. Everyone looks in front of him; I look inside myself. I have no business but with myself; I consider myself unceasingly, I inspect myself, I taste myself. Others always go elsewhere, if they think about it; they always go forward. No one tries to descend into himself. As for me, I roll about inside myself.[43]

This capacity for sifting out the truth, whatever it amounts to in me, and this free temperament that does not easily subject my belief, I owe chiefly to 41 Scipio Africanus the Elder and Scipio Aemilianus the Younger, Roman generals easily confused.

42 Adapted from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.
43 Persius, Satires.

FRENCH

fermes imaginations que i'aye, et generalles, sont celles qui par maniere de dire, nasquirent auec moy: elles sont naturelles, et toutes miennes. Ie les produisis crues et simples, d'vne production hardie et forte, mais vn peu trouble et imparfaicte: depuis ie les ay establies et fortifiées par l'authorité d'autruy, et par les sains exemples des anciens, ausquels ie me suis rencontré conforme en iugement. Ceux-là m'en ont asseuré de la prinse, et m'en ont donné la iouyssance et possession plus claire.

La recommandation que chacun cherche, de viuacité et promptitude d'esprit, ie la pretends du reglement, d'vne action esclatante et signalée, ou de quelque particuliere suffisance: ie la pretends de l'ordre, correspondance, et tranquillité d'opinions et de mœurs. Omnino si quidquam est decorum, nihil est profectò magis quàm æquabilitas vniuersæ vitæ, tum singularum actionum: quam conseruare non possis, si, aliorum naturam imitans, omittas tuam.

ENGLISH

myself. For the firmest and most general notions I have are those which, so to speak, were born with me: they are natural and entirely mine. I produced them raw and simple, in a bold and strong birth, but a little confused and imperfect. Since then I have established and fortified them by the authority of others, and by the sound examples of the ancients, with whom I found myself in agreement in judgment. These confirmed my hold on them and gave me a clearer enjoyment and possession of them.

The commendation everyone seeks for liveliness and quickness of mind, I claim for steadiness; the commendation for a brilliant and signal action, or for some particular ability, I claim for order, consistency and tranquility of opinions and conduct. Assuredly, if anything is becoming, nothing is more so than consistency in one's whole life and in each of one's actions; and you cannot maintain it if you imitate the nature of others and abandon your own.[44]

NOT ESTEEMING OTHERS ENOUGH

Montaigne has met no truly great man except La Boétie, and judges the learned harshly.

FRENCH

2.17.40 Voyla donq iusques où ie me sens coulpable de cette premiere partie, que ie disois estre au vice de la presomption. Pour la seconde, qui consiste à n'estimer point assez autruy, ie ne sçay si ie m'en puis si bien excuser: car quoy qu'il me couste, ie delibere de dire ce qui en est. A l'aduenture que le commerce continuel que i'ay auec les humeurs anciennes, et l'idée de ces riches ames du temps passé, me dégouste, et d'autruy, et de moy-mesme: ou bien qu'à la verité nous viuons en vn siecle qui ne produict les choses que bien mediocres. Tant y a que ie ne connoy rien digne de grande admiration.

Aussi ne connoy-ie guere d'hommes, auec telle priuauté, qu'il faut pour en pouuoir iuger: et ceux ausquels ma condition me mesle plus ordinairement, sont pour la pluspart, gens qui ont peu de soing de la culture de l'ame, et ausquels on ne propose pour toute beatitude que l'honneur, et pour toute perfection, que la vaillance.

2.17.41 Ce que ie voy de beau en autruy, ie le louë et l'estime tres-volontiers. Voire i'enrichis souuent sur ce que i'en pense,

ENGLISH

That, then, is how far I feel myself guilty of the first part, which I said there was in the vice of presumption. As for the second, which consists in not esteeming others enough, I do not know whether I can excuse myself so well; for whatever it costs me, I am resolved to tell the truth of it. Perhaps the continual company I keep with the temperaments of the ancients, and the idea of those rich souls of times past, gives me a distaste both for others and for myself; or else, in truth, we live in an age that produces only very mediocre things. At any rate, I know of nothing worthy of great admiration.

Nor do I know many men with the intimacy needed to be able to judge them. And those with whom my station most commonly throws me are for the most part people who care little for the cultivation of the soul, and who are offered honor as the whole of bliss and valor as the whole of perfection.

What I see that is fine in others I very willingly praise and esteem. Indeed I often go beyond what 44 Cicero, On Duties.

FRENCH

et me permets de mentir iusques là. Car ie ne sçay point inuenter vn subiect faux. Ie tesmoigne volontiers de mes amis, par ce que i'y trouue de loüable. Et d'vn pied de valeur, i'en fay volontiers vn pied et demy. Mais de leur prester les qualitez qui n'y sont pas, ie ne puis: ny les defendre ouuertement des imperfections qu'ils ont. Voyre à mes ennemis, ie rends nettement ce que ie dois de tesmoignage d'honneur. Mon affection se change, mon iugement non. Et ne confons point ma querelle auec autres circonstances qui n'en sont pas.

Et suis tant ialoux de la liberté de mon iugement, que mal-ayséement la puis-ie quitter pour passion que ce soit. Ie me fay plus d'iniure en mentant, que ie n'en fay à celuy, de qui ie mens. On remarque cette loüable et genereuse coustume de la nation Persienne, qu'ils parloient de leurs mortels ennemis, et à qui ils faisoyent la guerre à outrance, honorablement et equitablement autant que portoit le merite de leur vertu.

2.17.42 Ie connoy des hommes assez, qui ont diuerses parties belles: qui l'esprit, qui le cœur, qui l'adresse, qui la conscience, qui le langage, qui vne science, qui vn'autre: mais de grand homme en general, et ayant tant de belles pieces ensemble, ou vne, en tel degré d'excellence, qu'on le doiue admirer, ou le comparer à ceux que nous honorons du temps passé, ma fortune ne m'en a faict voir nul.

Et le plus grand que i'aye conneu au vif, ie di des parties naturelles de l'ame, et le mieux né, c'estoit Estienne de la Boitie: c'estoit vrayement vn' ame pleine, et qui montroit vn beau visage à tout sens: vn' ame à la vieille marque: et qui eust produit de grands effects, si sa fortune l'eust voulu: ayant beaucoup adiousté à ce riche naturel, par science et estude.

2.17.43 Mais ie ne sçay comment il aduient, et si aduient sans doubte, qu'il se trouue autant de vanité et de foiblesse d'entendement, en ceux qui font profession d'auoir plus de suffisance, qui se meslent de vacations lettrées, et de charges qui despendent des liures, qu'en nulle autre sorte de gens. Ou bien par ce que lon requiert et attend plus d'eux, et qu'on ne peut excuser en eux les fautes communes: ou bien que l'opinion du sçauoir leur donne plus de hardiesse de se produire, et de se descouurir trop auant, par où ils se perdent, et se trahissent.

ENGLISH

I think of it, and allow myself to lie that far. For I do not know how to invent a false subject. I readily bear witness for my friends as to what I find praiseworthy in them, and out of one foot of worth I gladly make a foot and a half. But lend them qualities that are not there, I cannot; nor openly defend them from the imperfections they have. Even to my enemies I plainly render the testimony of honor that I owe. My affection changes; my judgment does not. And I do not confuse my quarrel with other circumstances that have nothing to do with it.

And I am so jealous of the freedom of my judgment that I can hardly give it up for any passion whatever. I do myself more harm by lying than I do the man I lie about. People remark on that praiseworthy and generous custom of the Persian nation: they spoke of their mortal enemies, against whom they waged war to the bitter end, honorably and fairly, as far as the merit of their virtue warranted.

I know plenty of men who have various fine parts: one has wit, another courage, another skill, another conscience, another eloquence, one a certain branch of learning, another a different one. But as for a great man overall, having so many fine pieces together, or one of them in such a degree of excellence that he ought to be admired or compared with those we honor from times past—my fortune has shown me none.

And the greatest I have known in the flesh—I mean in the natural qualities of the soul—and the best born, was Étienne de La Boétie. His was truly a full soul, which showed a fine face from every side: a soul of the old stamp, which would have achieved great things if his fortune had willed it, for he had added much to that rich nature by learning and study.

But I do not know how it comes about—and come about it certainly does—that there is as much vanity and weakness of understanding in those who profess to have more ability, who take up literary callings and offices that depend on books, as in any other sort of people. Either because more is required and expected of them, and common faults cannot be excused in them; or because the reputation for learning gives them more boldness

FRENCH

Comme vn artisan tesmoigne bien mieux sa bestise, en vne riche matiere, qu'il ait entre mains, s'il l'accommode et mesle sottement, et contre les regles de son ouurage, qu'en vne matiere vile: et s'offence lon plus du defaut, en vne statue d'or, qu'en celle qui est de plastre. Ceux cy en font autant, lors qu'ils mettent en auant des choses qui d'elles mesmes, et en leur lieu, seroyent bonnes: car ils s'en seruent sans discretion, faisans honneur à leur memoire, aux despens de leur entendement: et faisans honneur à Cicero, à Galien, à Vlpian, et à sainct Hierosme, pour se rendre eux ridicules.

2.17.44 Ie retombe volontiers sur ce discours de l'ineptie de nostre institution. Elle a eu pour sa fin, de nous faire, non bons et sages, mais sçauans: elle y est arriuée. Elle ne nous a pas appris de suyure et embrasser la vertu et la prudence: mais elle nous en a imprimé la deriuation et l'etymologie. Nous sçauons decliner vertu, si nous ne sçauons l'aymer. Si nous ne sçauons que c'est que prudence par effect, et par experience, nous le sçauons par iargon et par cœur.

De nos voisins, nous ne nous contentons pas d'en sçauoir la race, les parentelles, et les alliances, nous les voulons auoir pour amis, et dresser auec eux quelque conuersation et intelligence: elle nous a appris les definitions, les diuisions, et partitions de la vertu, comme des surnoms et branches d'vne genealogie, sans auoir autre soing de dresser entre nous et elle, quelque pratique de familiarité et priuée accointance. Elle nous a choisi pour nostre apprentissage, non les liures qui ont les opinions plus saines et plus vrayes, mais ceux qui parlent le meilleur Grec et Latin: et parmy ses beaux mots, nous a fait couler en la fantasie les plus vaines humeurs de l'antiquité.

2.17.45 Vne bonne institution, elle change le iugement et les mœurs: comme il aduint à Polemon: ce ieune homme Grec desbauché, qui estant allé ouïr par rencontre, vne leçon de Xenocrates, ne remerqua pas seulement l'éloquence et la suffisance du lecteur, et n'en rapporta pas seulement en la maison, la science de quelque belle matiere: mais vn fruit plus apparent et plus solide: qui fut, le soudain changement et amendement de sa to put themselves forward and expose themselves too far, whereby they ruin and betray themselves.

ENGLISH

Just as a craftsman shows his stupidity much better in a rich material he has in hand, if he arranges and combines it foolishly and against the rules of his craft, than in a base one; and people are more offended by a flaw in a golden statue than in one of plaster. These men do the same when they put forward things that in themselves and in their place would be good. For they use them without discretion, doing honor to their memory at the expense of their understanding, and doing honor to Cicero, Galen, Ulpian and Saint Jerome only to make themselves ridiculous.[45]

I readily fall back on this theme of the ineptitude of our education. Its aim has been to make us not good and wise, but learned; and it has succeeded. It has not taught us to follow and embrace virtue and prudence, but it has stamped on us their derivation and etymology. We know how to decline virtue, even if we do not know how to love it. If we do not know what prudence is in fact and by experience, we know it by jargon and by heart.

With our neighbors, we are not content to know their lineage, their kin and their connections by marriage; we want to have them as friends and establish some conversation and understanding with them. Our education has taught us the definitions, divisions and subdivisions of virtue, like the surnames and branches of a family tree, without any further concern to establish between us and her some practice of familiarity and private acquaintance. It has chosen for our learning not the books with the soundest and truest opinions, but those that speak the best Greek and Latin; and amid their fine words it has slipped into our minds the emptiest fancies of antiquity.

A good education changes judgment and conduct, as happened to Polemon, that debauched young Greek who, having gone by chance to hear a lecture by Xenocrates, did not merely notice the eloquence and ability of the lecturer, nor merely bring home the knowledge of some fine subject, but a more evident and more solid fruit: the sudden change and amendment of his former life.

45 Ulpian, the Roman jurist, and Saint Jerome, the Church Father, were, with Galen, the chief authorities in law, theology and medicine.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	premiere vie. Qui a iamais senti vn tel effect de nostre discipline? Faciásne quod olim Mutatus Polemon? ponas insignia morbi, Fasciolas, cubital, focalia, potus vt ille Dicitur ex collo furtim carpsisse coronas, Postquam est impransi correptus voce magistri?	Who has ever felt such an effect from our schooling? Would you do what once the reformed Polemon did? Would you lay aside the badges of your sickness, your leg-bands, your elbow cushion, your neck-wraps, as he, in his cups, is said to have stealthily plucked the garlands from his neck after he was rebuked by the voice of the fasting master?[46]
2.17.46	La moins dedeignable condition de gents, me semble estre, celle qui par simplesse tient le dernier rang: et nous offrir vn commerce plus reglé. Les mœurs et les propos des paysans, ie les trouue communement plus ordonnez selon la prescription de la vraye philosophie, que ne sont ceux de noz philosophes. Plus sapit vulgus, quia tantum, quantum opus est, sapit.	The least contemptible class of people seems to me to be the one that, through simplicity, holds the lowest rank, and that offers us more orderly dealings. The conduct and talk of peasants I commonly find more in keeping with the prescriptions of true philosophy than those of our philosophers. The common people are wiser, because they are only as wise as they need to be.[47]

THE NOTABLE MEN OF HIS TIME

Montaigne names the soldiers, statesmen and poets of his age he admires, and Marie de Gournay.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.17.47	Les plus notables hommes que i'aye iugé, par les apparences externes, car pour les iuger à ma mode, il les faudroit esclairer de plus pres, c'ont esté, pour le faict de la guerre, et suffisance militaire, le Duc de Guyse, qui mourut à Orleans, et le feu Mareschal Strozzi. Pour gens suffisans, et de vertu non commune, Oliuier, et l'Hospital Chanceliers de France. Il me semble aussi de la poësie qu'elle a eu sa vogue en nostre siecle. Nous auons abondance de bons artisans de ce mestier-là, Aurat, Beze, Buchanan, l'Hospital, Mont-doré, Turnebus.	The most notable men I have judged by outward appearances—for to judge them in my own way I would have to examine them more closely—have been, in matters of war and military ability, the Duke of Guise, who died at Orléans, and the late Marshal Strozzi. As men of ability and uncommon virtue, Olivier and L'Hospital, Chancellors of France. It seems to me also that poetry has had its heyday in our century. We have an abundance of good craftsmen in that trade: Dorat, Beza, Buchanan, L'Hospital, Montdoré, Turnebus.[48]
	Quant aux François, ie pense qu'ils l'ont montée au plus haut degré où elle sera iamais: et aux parties, en quoy Ronsart et du Bellay excellent, ie ne les treuue gueres esloignez de la perfection ancienne. Adrianus Turnebus sçauoit plus, et sçauoit mieux ce qu'il sçauoit, qu'homme qui fust de son siecle, ny loing au delà. Les vies du Duc d'Albe dernier mort, et de nostre Connestable de Mommorancy, ont esté des vies nobles, et qui ont eu plusieurs rares ressemblances de fortune.	As for those who write in French, I think they have raised it to the highest degree it will ever reach; and in the qualities in which Ronsard and du Bellay excel, I find them hardly far from the perfection of the ancients. Adrianus Turnebus knew more, and knew better what he knew, than any man of his century or long before. The lives of the Duke of Alba, recently dead, and of our Constable de Montmorency were noble lives, and had several rare resemblances of fortune.[49]

46 Polemon (4th century BC) later succeeded Xenocrates as head of Plato's Academy. The verse is from Horace, Satires.
47 Lactantius, Divine Institutes.
48 Piero Strozzi, Marshal of France, was killed at Thionville in 1558. Michel de L'Hospital succeeded Olivier as chancellor; the poets named wrote in Latin.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Mais la beauté, et la gloire de la mort de cettuy-cy, à la veuë de Paris, et de son Roy; pour leur seruice contre ses plus proches; à la teste d'vne armée victorieuse par sa conduitte; et d'vn coup de main, en si extreme vieillesse, me semble meriter qu'on la loge entre les remerquables euenemens de mon temps. Comme aussi, la constante bonté, douceur de mœurs, et facilité consciencieuse de Monsieur de la Nouë, en vne telle iniustice de parts armées, vraye eschole de trahison, d'inhumanité, et de brigandage, où tousiours il s'est nourry, grand homme de guerre, et tres-experimenté.	But the beauty and glory of the latter's death—in sight of Paris and of his King, in their service against his nearest kin, at the head of an army victorious under his leadership, and in hand-to-hand fighting, at so extreme an age—seem to me to deserve a place among the remarkable events of my time. So too do the constant goodness, gentleness of manners and conscientious affability of Monsieur de La Noue, amid such injustice of armed factions—a true school of treachery, inhumanity and brigandage—in which he was raised all his life, a great and very experienced man of war.[50]
2.17.48	I'ay pris plaisir à publier en plusieurs lieux, l'esperance que i'ay de Marie de Gournay le Iars ma fille d'alliance: et certes aymée de moy beaucoup plus que paternellement, et enueloppée en ma retraitte et solitude, comme l'vne des meilleures parties de mon propre estre. Ie ne regarde plus qu'elle au monde.	I have taken pleasure in making public in several places the hope I have for Marie de Gournay le Jars, my adopted daughter—and certainly loved by me far more than as a father loves—enfolded in my retirement and solitude as one of the best parts of my own being. She is all I care for in the world now.[51]
	Si l'adolescence peut donner presage, cette ame sera quelque iour capable des plus belles choses, et entre autres de la perfection de cette tressaincte amitié, où nous ne lisons point que son sexe ait peu monter encores: la sincerité et la solidité de ses mœurs, y sont desia bastantes, son affection vers moy plus que surabondante: et telle en somme qu'il n'y a rien à souhaiter, sinon que l'apprehension qu'elle a de ma fin, par les cinquante et cinq ans ausquels elle m'a rencontré, la trauaillast moins cruellement.	If youth can give any presage, this soul will one day be capable of the finest things, and among others of the perfection of that most holy friendship to which we do not read that her sex has yet been able to rise. The sincerity and solidity of her character are already sufficient for it; her affection for me more than superabundant—such, in short, that there is nothing left to wish for, except that her fear of my end, given the fifty-five years at which she met me, would torment her less cruelly.
	Le iugement qu'elle fit des premiers Essays, et femme, et en ce siecle, et si ieune, et seule en son quartier, et la vehemence fameuse dont elle m'ayma et me desira long temps sur la seule estime qu'elle en print de moy, auant m'auoir veu, c'est vn accident de tres-digne consideration.	The judgment she formed of the first Essays—she a woman, and in this century, and so young, and alone in her part of the country—and the famous vehemence with which she loved me and long yearned to meet me, solely on the esteem she conceived for me before she had ever seen me, is an occurrence most worthy of consideration.
2.17.49	Les autres vertus ont eu peu, ou point de mise en cet aage: mais la vaillance, elle est deuenue populaire par noz guerres ciuiles: et en cette partie, il se trouue parmy nous, des ames fermes, iusques à la perfection, et en grand nombre, si que le triage en est impossible à faire.	The other virtues have had little or no currency in this age; but valor has become common through our civil wars. In this respect there are among us souls firm to the point of perfection, and in such great numbers that it is impossible to sort out the best.
2.17.50

49 The Duke of Alba, Spanish general, died in 1582.
50 Anne de Montmorency was mortally wounded in 1567, aged about seventy-four, at the battle of Saint-Denis against the Protestants led by his nephews. François de La Noue was a Protestant commander.
51 Marie de Gournay (1565–1645), Montaigne's devoted admirer, who prepared this 1595 edition of the Essays.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Voila tout ce que i'ay cognu, iusques à cette heure, d'extraordinaire grandeur et non commune.	That is all I have known, up to this hour, of extraordinary and uncommon greatness.

II.18 Of Giving the Lie

Du desmentir

Montaigne justifies a book about an ordinary man, condemns lying as his age's vice, and asks why "you lie" provokes such outrage.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.18.1 VOIRE mais, on me dira, que ce dessein de se seruir de soy, pour subject à escrire, seroit excusable à des hommes rares et fameux, qui par leur reputation auroyent donné quelque desir de leur cognoissance. Il est certain, ie l'adoüe, et sçay bien que pour voir vn homme de la commune façon, à peine qu'vn artisan leue les yeux de sa besongne: là où pour voir vn personnage grand et signalé, arriuer en vne ville, les ouuroirs et les boutiques s'abandonnent. Il messiet à tout autre de se faire cognoistre, qu'à celuy qui a dequoy se faire imiter; et duquel la vie et les opinions peuuent seruir de patron.

Yes, but someone will tell me that this plan of using oneself as a subject to write about would be excusable in rare and famous men, who by their reputation had given people some desire to know them. That is certain, I admit; and I know very well that to see a man of the common sort, an artisan will hardly raise his eyes from his work, whereas to see a great and distinguished personage arrive in a town, workshops and stores are left empty. It ill becomes anyone to make himself known except one who has something worth imitating, and whose life and opinions can serve as a model.

Cæsar et Xenophon ont eu dequoy fonder et fermir leur narration, en la grandeur de leurs faicts, comme en vne baze iuste et solide. Ainsi sont à souhaiter les papiers iournaux du grand Alexandre, les Commentaires qu'Auguste, Caton, Sylla, Brutus, et autres auoyent laissé de leurs gestes. De telles gens, on ayme et estudie les figures, en cuyure mesmes et en pierre.

Caesar and Xenophon had something on which to found and fix their narrative in the greatness of their deeds, as on a just and solid base. So too one could wish for the journals of Alexander the Great, and the Commentaries that Augustus, Cato, Sulla, Brutus and others had left of their exploits. The likenesses of such men we love and study, even in copper and in stone.

2.18.2 Cette remontrance est tres-vraye; mais elle ne me touche que bien peu. Non recito cuiquam, nisi amicis, idque rogatus.
Non vbiuis, corámve quibuslibet. In medio qui Scripta foro recitent sunt multi, quique lauantes. Ie ne dresse pas icy vne statue à planter au carrefour d'vne ville, ou dans vne eglise, ou place publique: Non equidem hoc studeo bullatis vt mihi nugis
Pagina turgescat:
Secreti loquimur. C'est pour le coin d'vne librairie, et pour en amuser vn voisin, vn parent, vn amy qui aura plaisir à me racointer et repratiquer en cett' image.

This remonstrance is very true; but it touches me only very little. I recite to no one but my friends, and then only when asked; not everywhere, or before just anyone. There are many who recite their writings in the middle of the forum, and in the baths. I am not setting up a statue here to be planted at a city crossroads, or in a church or public square. Indeed, this is not my aim, that my page should swell with bubbling trifles:
we are talking in private. It is for a corner of a library, and to amuse a neighbor, a relative, a friend, who will take pleasure in renewing acquaintance and familiarity with me in this image.[1]

1 Horace, Satires; then Persius, Satires.

FRENCH

Les autres ont pris cœur de parler d'eux, pour y auoir trouué le subject digne et riche; moy au rebours, pour l'auoir trouué si sterile et si maigre, qu'il n'y peut eschoir soupçon d'ostentation. Ie iuge volontiers des actions d'autruy: des miennes, ie donne peu à iuger, à cause de leur nihilité. Ie ne trouue pas tant de bien en moy, que ie ne le puisse dire sans rougir. Quel contentement me seroit-ce d'ouyr ainsi quelqu'vn, qui me recitast les mœurs, le visage, la contenance, les plus communes parolles, et les fortunes de mes ancestres, combien i'y serois attentif. Vrayement cela partiroit d'vne mauuaise nature, d'auoir à mespris les portraits mesmes de noz amis et predecesseurs, la forme de leurs vestements, et de leurs armes.

I'en conserue l'escriture, le seing et vne espée peculiere: et n'ay point chassé de mon cabinet, des longues gaules, que mon pere portoit ordinairement en la main. Paterna vestis et annulus, tanto charior est posteris, quanto ergo parentes maior affectus. Si toutefois ma posterité est d'autre appetit, i'auray bien dequoy me reuencher: car ils ne sçauroyent faire moins de comte de moy, que i'en feray d'eux en ce temps là. Tout le commerce que i'ay en cecy auec le publicq, c'est que i'emprunte les vtils de son escriture, plus soudaine et plus aisée. En recompense, i'empescheray peut estre, que quelque coin de beurre ne se fonde au marché. Ne toga cordyllis, ne penula desit oliuis, / Et laxas scombris sæpe dabo tunicas.

ENGLISH

Others have taken heart to speak of themselves because they found the subject worthy and rich; I, on the contrary, because I found it so barren and so meager that no suspicion of ostentation can fall on it. I readily judge the actions of others; of my own I give little to judge, because of their nothingness. I do not find so much good in myself that I cannot tell it without blushing. What satisfaction it would be to me to hear someone tell me, in this way, of the habits, the face, the bearing, the most commonplace words and the fortunes of my ancestors! How attentive I would be! Truly it would come from a bad nature to despise even the portraits of our friends and forebears, the cut of their clothes and of their armor.

I keep their handwriting, their signature, and a sword that was peculiar to them; and I have not banished from my study the long canes my father usually carried in his hand. A father's coat and ring are dearer to his descendants the greater their affection for their parent. If, however, my posterity has other tastes, I shall have the means to get my revenge: for they could not think less of me than I shall think of them at that time. All the dealings I have with the public in this are that I borrow the tools of its writing, which are quicker and easier. In return, I shall perhaps prevent some pat of butter from melting in the market. So that young tunny may not lack a toga, nor olives a cloak, / and I shall often supply loose tunics for mackerel.[2]

THE BOOK THAT MADE ME

Even if no one reads it, writing the book has shaped its author and helped him know himself.

FRENCH

2.18.3 Et quand personne ne me lira, ay-ie perdu mon temps, de m'estre entretenu tant d'heures oisiues, à pensements si vtiles et aggreables? Moulant sur moy cette figure, il m'a fallu si souuent me testonner et composer, pour m'extraire, que le patron s'en est fermy, et aucunement formé soy-mesme. Me peignant pour autruy, ie me suis peint en moy, de couleurs plus nettes, que n'estoyent les miennes premieres. Ie n'ay pas plus faict mon liure, que mon liure m'a faict. Liure consubstantiel à son autheur: d'vne occupation propre: membre de ma vie: non d'vne occupation et fin, tierce et estrangere, comme tous autres

ENGLISH

And if no one reads me, have I wasted my time in entertaining myself for so many idle hours with such useful and agreeable thoughts? In molding this figure on myself, I have had to groom and compose myself so often to bring myself out that the model itself has grown firmer and in some sort taken shape. Painting myself for others, I have painted myself within, in clearer colors than my original ones were. I have no more made my book than my book has made me—a book consubstantial with its author, with no business but its own, a 2 Augustine, City of God; then Martial, Epigrams, on unsold books used as wrapping paper in the market. The "tools of its writing" are printing.

FRENCH

liures. Ay-ie perdu mon temps, de m'estre rendu compte de moy, si continuellement, si curieusement?

Car ceux qui se repassent par fantasie seulement, et par langue, quelque heure, ne s'examinent pas si primement, ny ne se penetrent, comme celuy, qui en fait son estude, son ouurage, et son mestier: qui s'engage à vn registre de durée, de toute sa foy, de toute sa force. Les plus delicieux plaisirs, si se digerent ils au dedans: fuyent à laisser trace de soy: et fuyent la veuë, non seulement du peuple, mais d'vn autre. Combien de fois m'a cette besongne diuerty de cogitations ennuieuses? Et doiuent estre comptées pour ennuyeuses toutes les friuoles.

Nature nous a estrenez d'vne large faculté à nous entretenir à part: et nous y appelle souuent, pour nous apprendre, que nous nous deuons en partie à la societé, mais en la meilleure partie, à nous. Aux fins de renger ma fantasie, à resuer mesme, par quelque ordre et proiect, et la garder de se perdre et extrauaguer au vent, il n'est que de donner corps, et mettre en registre, tant de menues pensées, qui se presentent à elle. I'escoutte à mes resueries, par ce que i'ay à les enroller. Quantes-fois, estant marry de quelque action, que la ciuilité et la raison me prohiboient de reprendre à descouuert, m'en suis-ie icy desgorgé, non sans dessein de publique instruction!

Et si ces verges poëtiques: Zon sus l'œil, zon sur le groin, / Zon sur le dos du Sagoin, s'impriment encore mieux en papier, qu'en la chair viue. Quoy si ie preste vn peu plus attentiuement l'oreille aux liures, depuis que ie guette, si i'en pourray friponner quelque chose dequoy esmailler ou estayer le mien? Ie n'ay aucunement estudié pour faire vn liure: mais i'ay aucunement estudié, pour ce que ie l'auoy faict: si c'est aucunement estudier, qu'effleurer et pincer, par la teste, ou par les pieds, tantost vn autheur, tantost vn autre: nullement pour former mes opinions: ouï, pour les assister, pieça formées, seconder et seruir.

ENGLISH

member of my life; not with some third-party, alien business and purpose, like all other books. Have I wasted my time in taking stock of myself so continually, so carefully?

For those who go over themselves only in thought and in speech, for an hour or so, do not examine themselves so thoroughly, nor penetrate themselves, as one who makes it his study, his work and his trade, who binds himself to a lasting record with all his faith and all his strength. The most delicious pleasures, even so, are digested inwardly; they avoid leaving any trace of themselves, and avoid the sight not only of the public but of any other person. How many times has this task diverted me from troublesome thoughts! And all frivolous thoughts should be counted as troublesome.

Nature has endowed us with a broad faculty for keeping our own company apart, and often calls us to it, to teach us that we owe ourselves in part to society, but for the better part to ourselves. In order to train my fancy to dream, even, with some order and purpose, and to keep it from losing itself and wandering off in the wind, there is nothing like giving body to and putting on record all the little thoughts that present themselves to it. I listen to my reveries because I have to enroll them. How many times, annoyed by some action that civility and reason forbade me to reprove openly, have I unburdened myself of it here—not without an eye to public instruction!

And indeed these poetic lashes, Whack on the eye, whack on the snout, / whack on the back of the Monkey, stamp themselves even better on paper than on living flesh. What if I lend my ear a little more attentively to books, now that I am watching to see whether I can filch something from them to enamel or prop up my own? I have not studied in the least in order to make a book; but I have studied in some measure because I had made it—if it is studying in any measure to skim and pinch, by the head or by the feet, now one author, now another; in no way to form my opinions; yes, to assist them, long since formed, to second and serve them.[3] 3 From Clément Marot's satirical poem against the poet François de Sagon, punning on his name with "Sagoin" (monkey).

LYING AND GIVING THE LIE

Truth is banished from the age; being called a liar is the worst insult because lying is cowardly.

FRENCH

2.18.4 Mais à qui croirons nous parlant de soy, en vne saison si gastée? veu qu'il en est peu, ou point, à qui nous puissions croire parlants d'autruy, où il y a moins d'interest à mentir. Le premier traict de la corruption des mœurs, c'est le bannissement de la verité; car comme disoit Pindare, l'estre veritable, est le commencement d'vne grande vertu, et le premier article que Platon demande au gouuerneur de sa republique. Nostre verité de maintenant, ce n'est pas ce qui est, mais ce qui se persuade à autruy: comme nous appellons monnoye, non celle qui est loyalle seulement, mais la fauce aussi, qui a mise. Nostre nation est de long temps reprochée de ce vice.

Car Saluianus Massiliensis, qui estoit du temps de l'Empereur Valentinian, dit qu'aux François le mentir et se pariurer n'est pas vice, mais vne façon de parler. Qui voudroit encherir sur ce tesmoignage, il pourroit dire que ce leur est à present vertu. On s'y forme, on s'y façonne, comme à vn exercice d'honneur: car la dissimulation est des plus notables qualitez de ce siecle.

2.18.5 Ainsi i'ay souuent consideré d'où pouuoit naistre cette coustume, que nous obseruons si religieusement, de nous sentir plus aigrement offencez du reproche de ce vice, qui nous est si ordinaire, que de nul autre: et que ce soit l'extreme iniure qu'on nous puisse faire de parolle, que de nous reprocher la mensonge. Sur cela, ie treuue qu'il est naturel, de se deffendre le plus, des deffaux, dequoy nous sommes le plus entachez. Il semble qu'en nous ressentans de l'accusation, et nous en esmouuans, nous nous deschargeons aucunement de la coulpe: si nous l'auons par effect, aumoins nous la condamnons par apparence. Seroit-ce pas aussi, que ce reproche semble enuelopper la couardise et lascheté de cœur?

En est-il de plus expresse, que se desdire de sa parolle? quoy se desdire de sa propre science? C'est vn vilain vice, que le mentir; et qu'vn ancien peint bien honteusement, quand il dit, que c'est donner tesmoignage de mespriser Dieu, et quand et quand de craindre les hommes. Il n'est pas possible d'en representer plus richement l'horreur, la

ENGLISH

But whom shall we believe when he speaks of himself, in so corrupt an age, seeing that there are few or none whom we can believe when they speak of others, where there is less to gain by lying? The first sign of the corruption of morals is the banishment of truth; for, as Pindar said, being truthful is the beginning of a great virtue, and it is the first article that Plato requires of the governor of his republic. Our truth nowadays is not what is, but what others can be persuaded of—just as we call money not only the genuine coin but also the counterfeit that passes current. Our nation has long been reproached with this vice.

For Salvian of Marseille, who lived in the time of the Emperor Valentinian, says that for the French, lying and perjuring themselves is not a vice but a manner of speaking. Anyone who wanted to go one better than this testimony could say that for them it is now a virtue. People train themselves in it, shape themselves to it, as to an honorable exercise; for dissimulation is among the most notable qualities of this age.[4]

So I have often wondered where this custom could spring from, which we observe so religiously, of feeling more bitterly offended at being reproached with this vice, so ordinary among us, than with any other; so that to reproach us with lying is the worst insult that can be done to us in words. On this I find that it is natural to defend ourselves most against the faults with which we are most tainted. It seems that by resenting the accusation and getting worked up about it, we unburden ourselves somewhat of the guilt: if we have it in fact, at least we condemn it in appearance. Might it not also be that this reproach seems to imply cowardice and faintness of heart?

Is there any more express cowardice than to go back on one's word? What, go back on what one knows? Lying is an ugly vice, and one that an ancient paints in most shameful colors when he says that it is giving proof of despising God and at the same time fearing men. It is not possible to repres-

4 Salvian, a 5th-century priest of Marseilles, said this of the Franks in his On the Government of God.

FRENCH

vilité, et le desreglement. Car que peut on imaginer plus vilain, que d'estre couart à l'endroit des hommes, et braue à l'endroit de Dieu? Nostre intelligence se conduisant par la seule voye de la parolle, celuy qui la fauce, trahit la societé publique.

C'est le seul vtil, par le moyen duquel se communiquent noz volontez et noz pensées: c'est le truchement de nostre ame: s'il nous faut, nous ne nous tenons plus, nous ne nous entrecognoissons plus. S'il nous trompe, il rompt tout nostre commerce, et dissoult toutes les liaisons de nostre police. Certaines nations des nouuelles Indes (on n'a que faire d'en remerquer les noms, ils ne sont plus; car iusques à l'entier abolissement des noms, et ancienne cognoissance des lieux, s'est estendue la desolation de cette conqueste, d'vn merueilleux exemple, et inouy) offroyent à leurs Dieux, du sang humain, mais non autre, que tiré de leur langue, et oreilles, pour expiation du peché de la mensonge, tant ouye que prononcée.

Ce bon compagnon de Grece disoit, que les enfans s'amusent par les osselets, les hommes par les parolles.

2.18.6 Quant aux diuers vsages de noz desmentirs, et les loix de nostre honneur en cela, et les changemens qu'elles ont reçeu, ie remets à vne autre-fois d'en dire ce que i'en sçay; et apprendray cependant, si ie puis, en quel temps print commencement cette coustume, de si exactement poiser et mesurer les parolles, et d'y attacher nostre honneur: car il est aisé à iuger qu'elle n'estoit pas anciennement entre les Romains et les Grecs. Et m'a semblé souuent nouueau et estrange, de les voir se dementir et s'iniurier, sans entrer pourtant en querelle. Les loix de leur deuoir, prenoient quelque autre voye que les nostres. On appelle Cæsar, tantost voleur, tantost yurongne à sa barbe.

Nous voyons la liberté des inuectiues, qu'ils font les vns contre les autres; ie dy les plus grands chefs de guerre, de l'vne et l'autre nation, où les parolles se reuenchent seulement par les parolles, et ne se tirent à autre consequence.

ENGLISH

ent more fully its horror, its baseness and its disorder. For what can one imagine more vile than to be a coward toward men and bold toward God? Since our mutual understanding is conducted solely by way of speech, he who falsifies it betrays public society.[5]

It is the only tool by which our wills and thoughts are communicated; it is the interpreter of our soul. If it fails us, we no longer hold together, we no longer know one another. If it deceives us, it breaks off all our dealings and dissolves all the bonds of our public order. Certain nations of the new Indies—there is no point in recording their names, they no longer exist; for the desolation of that conquest, a marvelous and unheard-of example, has gone as far as the complete abolition of names and of the former knowledge of places—offered their gods human blood, but only such as was drawn from their tongues and ears, in expiation of the sin of lying, whether heard or uttered.

That good fellow from Greece used to say that children are beguiled with knucklebones, men with words.[6]

As for the various uses of our giving the lie, the laws of our honor in that matter, and the changes they have undergone, I put off to another time saying what I know of them. Meanwhile I will find out, if I can, at what time this custom began of weighing and measuring words so exactly and attaching our honor to them; for it is easy to judge that it did not exist in ancient times among the Romans and the Greeks. And it has often seemed to me new and strange to see them give each other the lie and insult each other without, for all that, coming to a quarrel. The laws of their duty took some other path than ours. Caesar is called now a thief, now a drunkard, to his face.[7]

We see the freedom of the invectives they hurl at one another—I mean the greatest war leaders of both nations—where words are answered only by words and lead to no further consequence.

5 Plutarch, in his Life of Lysander.
6 The Spartan commander Lysander, as reported by Plutarch.
7 To "give the lie" was to accuse someone of lying, an insult that in Montaigne's day called for a duel.

II.19 Of Freedom of Conscience

De la liberté de conscience
Julian the Apostate shows how zeal drives good men to injustice, and why religious liberty may weaken faction.

FRENCH

2.19.1 IL est ordinaire, de voir les bonnes intentions, si elles sont conduites sans moderation, pousser les hommes à des effects tres-vitieux. En ce desbat, par lequel la France est à present agitée de guerres ciuiles, le meilleur et le plus sain party, est sans doubte celuy, qui maintient et la religion et la police ancienne du pays.

Entre les gens de bien toutesfois, qui le suyuent (car ie ne parle point de ceux, qui s'en seruent de pretexte, pour, ou exercer leurs vengeances particulieres, ou fournir à leur auarice, ou suiure la faueur des Princes: mais de ceux qui le font par vray zele enuers leur religion, et saincte affection, à maintenir la paix et l'estat de leur patrie) de ceux-cy, dis-ie, il s'en voit plusieurs, que la passion pousse hors les bornes de la raison, et leur faict par fois prendre des conseils iniustes, violents, et encore temeraires.

2.19.2 Il est certain, qu'en ces premiers temps, que nostre religion commença de gaigner authorité auec les loix, le zele en arma plusieurs contre toute sorte de liures payens; dequoy les gens de lettre souffrent vne merueilleuse perte. I'estime que ce desordre ait plus porté de nuysance aux lettres, que tous les feux des barbares. Cornelius Tacitus en est vn bon tesmoing: car quoy que l'Empereur Tacitus son parent, en eust peuplé par ordonnances expresses toutes les librairies du monde: toutes-fois vn seul exemplaire entier n'a peu eschapper la curieuse recherche de ceux qui desiroyent l'abolir, pour cinq ou six vaines clauses, contraires à nostre creance.

ENGLISH

It is common to see good intentions, if they are pursued without moderation, drive men to very vicious acts. In this dispute by which France is now torn with civil wars, the best and soundest party is no doubt the one that upholds both the religion and the ancient government of the country.

Among the good men who follow it, however—for I am not speaking of those who use it as a pretext either to carry out their private vengeances, or to feed their avarice, or to court the favor of princes, but of those who do so out of true zeal for their religion and a holy desire to maintain the peace and the state of their country—among these, I say, we see many whom passion drives beyond the bounds of reason, and sometimes leads to adopt unjust, violent and even rash counsels.

It is certain that in those early times when our religion began to gain authority with the laws, zeal armed many against every sort of pagan book, by which men of letters suffer an extraordinary loss. I reckon this disorder did more harm to letters than all the fires of the barbarians. Cornelius Tacitus is a good witness of this: for although the Emperor Tacitus, his kinsman, had by express ordinances stocked all the libraries in the world with him, nevertheless not a single complete copy could escape the diligent search of those who wanted to abolish him for five or six idle clauses contrary to our belief.[1]

THE EMPEROR JULIAN

Montaigne defends Julian the Apostate's chastity, justice and courage against the slanders of Christian writers.

FRENCH

2.19.3 Ils ont aussi eu cecy, de prester aisément des louanges fauces, à tous les Empereurs, qui faisoyent pour nous, et

ENGLISH

They also had this habit: readily lending false praise to all the emperors who favored us, and

1 The Emperor Marcus Claudius Tacitus (reigned AD 275–276) claimed descent from the historian.

FRENCH

condamner vniuersellement toutes les actions de ceux, qui nous estoyent aduersaires, comme il est aisé à voir en l'Empereur Iulian, surnommé l'Apostat. C'estoit à la verité vn tres-grand homme et rare; comme celuy, qui auoit son ame viuement tainte des discours de la philosophie, ausquels il faisoit profession de regler toutes ses actions: et de vray il n'est aucune sorte de vertu, dequoy il n'ait laissé de tres-notables exemples.

En chasteté, de laquelle le cours de sa vie donne bien clair tesmoignage, on lit de luy vn pareil traict, à celuy d'Alexandre et de Scipion, que de plusieurs tresbelles captiues, il n'en voulut pas seulement voir vne, estant en la fleur de son aage: car il fut tué par les Parthes aagé de trente vn an seulement. Quant à la iustice, il prenoit luy-mesme la peine d'ouyr les parties: et encore que par curiosité il s'informast à ceux qui se presentoient à luy, de quelle religion ils estoient: toutes-fois l'inimitié qu'il portoit à la nostre, ne donnoit aucun contrepoix à la balance. Il fit luy mesme plusieurs bonnes loix, et retrancha vne grande partie des subsides et impositions, que leuoyent ses predecesseurs.

2.19.4 Nous auons deux bons historiens tesmoings oculaires de ses actions: l'vn desquels, Marcellinus, reprend aigrement en diuers lieux de son histoire, cette sienne ordonnance, par laquelle il deffendit l'escole, et interdit l'enseigner à tous les rhetoriciens et grammairiens Chrestiens, et dit, qu'il souhaiteroit cette sienne action estre enseuelie soubs le silence. Il est vray-semblable, s'il eust faict quelque chose de plus aigre contre nous, qu'il ne l'eust pas oublié, estant bien affectionné à nostre party. Il nous estoit aspre à la verité, mais non pourtant cruel ennemy.

Car noz gens mesmes recitent de luy cette histoire, que se promenant vn iour autour de la ville de Chalcedoine, Maris Euesque du lieu, osa bien l'appeller meschant, traistre à Christ, et qu'il n'en fit autre chose, sauf luy respondre: Va miserable, pleure la perte de tes yeux: à quoy l'Euesque encore repliqua: Ie rends graces à Iesus Christ, de m'auoir osté la veuë, pour ne voir ton visage impudent: affectant en cela, disent-ils, vne patience philosophique. Tant y a que ce faict là, ne se peut pas bien rapporter aux cruautez qu'on le dit auoir exercées contre nous. Il estoit, dit Eutropius mon autre tesmoing, ennemy de la Chrestienté, mais sans toucher au sang.

ENGLISH

condemning wholesale all the actions of those who were our adversaries, as is easy to see in the case of the Emperor Julian, surnamed the Apostate. He was in truth a very great and rare man, as one whose soul was deeply dyed with the reasonings of philosophy, by which he professed to rule all his actions; and indeed there is no kind of virtue of which he has not left very notable examples.

In chastity, of which the course of his life gives very clear testimony, we read of him a trait like that of Alexander and Scipio: that of many very beautiful captives he would not so much as look at one, though he was in the flower of his age—for he was killed by the Parthians at only thirty-one. As for justice, he took the trouble of hearing the parties himself; and although out of curiosity he asked those who came before him what religion they were, nonetheless the hostility he bore ours put no weight in the scales. He himself made several good laws, and cut a great part of the subsidies and taxes his predecessors had levied.

We have two good historians who were eyewitnesses of his actions. One of them, Marcellinus, sharply censures in several places of his history that edict of his by which he closed the schools and forbade all Christian rhetoricians and grammarians to teach, and says he wishes this action of Julian's could be buried in silence. It is likely that if Julian had done anything harsher against us, Marcellinus would not have forgotten it, being well disposed to our side. He was harsh toward us, in truth, but not a cruel enemy.[2]

For our own people tell this story of him: that as he was walking one day around the city of Chalcedon, Maris, the bishop of the place, dared to call him wicked, a traitor to Christ, and that he did nothing about it except answer: "Go, wretch, weep for the loss of your eyes." To which the bishop replied in turn: "I give thanks to Jesus Christ for having taken away my sight, so that I need not see your impudent face." In this, they say, Julian was affecting a philosophical patience. At any rate, this act cannot well be squared with the cruelties he is said to have practiced against us. He was, says Eu-

2 Ammianus Marcellinus, 4th-century historian who served in Julian's army.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

tropius, my other witness, an enemy of Christianity, but without shedding blood.[3]

2.19.5 Et pour reuenir à sa iustice, il n'est rien qu'on y puisse accuser, que les rigueurs, dequoy il vsa au commencement de son empire, contre ceux qui auoyent suiuy le party de Constantius son predecesseur. Quant à sa sobrieté, il viuoit tousiours vn viure soldatesque: et se nourrissoit en pleine paix, comme celuy qui se preparoit et accoustumoit à l'austerité de la guerre. La vigilance estoit telle en luy, qu'il departoit la nuict à trois ou à quatre parties, dont la moindre estoit celle qu'il donnoit au sommeil: le reste, il l'employoit à visiter luy mesme en personne, l'estat de son armée et ses gardes, ou à estudier: car entre autres siennes rares qualitez, il estoit tres-excellent en toute sorte de literature.

And to return to his justice, there is nothing in it to find fault with except the severity he showed at the beginning of his reign toward those who had followed the party of Constantius, his predecessor. As for his sobriety, he always lived a soldier's life, and in full peacetime fed himself like one who was preparing and accustoming himself to the austerity of war. His vigilance was such that he divided the night into three or four parts, the smallest of which was the one he gave to sleep. The rest he spent either inspecting in person the state of his army and his guards, or studying; for among his other rare qualities, he was most excellent in every kind of literature.

On dit d'Alexandre le grand, qu'estant couché, de peur que le sommeil ne le desbauchast de ses pensemens, et de ses estudes, il faisoit mettre vn bassin ioignant son lict, et tenoit l'vne de ses mains au dehors, auec vne boulette de cuiure: affin que le dormir le surprenant, et relaschant les prises de ses doigts, cette boullette par le bruit de sa cheutte dans le bassin, le reueillast. Cettuy-cy auoit l'ame si tendue à ce qu'il vouloit, et si peu empeschée de fumées, par sa singuliere abstinence, qu'il se passoit bien de cet artifice.

It is said of Alexander the Great that when he lay down, for fear that sleep might lure him away from his thoughts and studies, he had a basin placed beside his bed and held one hand out over it with a little copper ball, so that if sleep overtook him and loosened the grip of his fingers, the noise of the ball falling into the basin would wake him. Julian had his soul so intent on what he wanted, and so little clouded with fumes, thanks to his singular abstinence, that he could easily do without this device.

Quant à la suffisance militaire, il fut admirable en toutes les parties d'vn grand Capitaine: aussi fut-il quasi toute sa vie en continuel exercice de guerre: et la pluspart, auec nous, en France contre les Allemans et Francons. Nous n'auons guere memoire d'homme, qui ait veu plus de hazards, ny qui ait plus souuent faict preuue de sa personne.

As for military ability, he was admirable in every part of a great captain. Indeed he spent almost his whole life in continual warfare, and most of it with us, in France, against the Alemanni and the Franks. We hardly remember any man who faced more dangers or more often put his own person to the test.

2.19.6 Sa mort a quelque chose de pareil à celle d'Epaminondas: car il fut frappé d'vn traict, et essaya de l'arracher, et l'eust fait, sans ce que le traict estant tranchant, il se couppa et affoiblit la main. Il demandoit incessamment qu'on le repportast en ce mesme estat, en la meslée, pour y encourager ses soldats; lesquels contesterent cette battaille sans luy, trescourageusement, iusques à ce que la nuict separa les armées. Il deuoit à la philosophie, vn singulier mespris, en quoy il auoit sa vie, et les choses humaines. Il auoit ferme creance de l'eternité des ames.

His death has something in common with that of Epaminondas. For he was struck by a dart and tried to pull it out, and would have done so had not the dart, being sharp-edged, cut and weakened his hand. He kept asking to be carried back, just as he was, into the fray, to encourage his soldiers there; and they contested that battle very bravely without him until night separated the armies. He owed to philosophy a singular contempt in which he held his life and human things. He firmly believed in the eternity of souls.[4]

3 Eutropius, Roman historian who took part in Julian's Persian campaign.
4 Epaminondas was killed at the battle of Mantinea in 362 BC.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.19.7 En matiere de religion, il estoit vicieux par tout; on l'a surnommé l'Apostat, pour auoir abandonné la nostre: toutesfois cette opinion me semble plus vray-semblable, qu'il ne l'auoit iamais euë à cœur, mais que pour l'obeïssance des loix il s'estoit feint iusques à ce qu'il tinst l'empire en sa main. Il fut si superstitieux en la sienne, que ceux mesmes qui en estoyent de son temps, s'en mocquoient: et disoit-on, s'il eust gaigné la victoire contre les Parthes, qu'il eust fait tarir la race des bœufs au monde, pour satisfaire à ses sacrifices. Il estoit aussi embabouyné de la science diuinatrice, et donnoit authorité à toute façon de prognostics.

In matters of religion he was wrong all round. He was surnamed the Apostate for having abandoned ours; yet the more likely opinion, to my mind, is that he had never held it at heart, but had feigned it in obedience to the laws until he held the empire in his hand. He was so superstitious in his own that even those who shared it in his time mocked him; and it was said that if he had won the victory against the Parthians he would have made the race of oxen die out in the world to supply his sacrifices. He was also besotted with the art of divination and lent authority to every kind of prognostication.

Il dit entre autres choses, en mourant, qu'il sçauoit bon gré aux Dieux et les remercioit, dequoy ils ne l'auoyent pas voulu tuer par surprise, l'ayant de long temps aduerty du lieu et heure de sa fin, ny d'vne mort molle ou lasche, mieux conuenable aux personnes oysiues et delicates, ny languissante, longue et douloureuse: et qu'ils l'auoyent trouué digne de mourir de cette noble façon, sur le cours de ses victoires, et en la fleur de sa gloire. Il auoit eu vne pareille vision à celle de Marcus Brutus, qui premierement le menassa en Gaule, et depuis se representa à luy en Perse, sur le point de sa mort.

Among other things, he said as he was dying that he was grateful to the gods and thanked them for not having chosen to kill him by surprise, since they had long warned him of the place and hour of his end; nor by a soft or cowardly death, better suited to idle and delicate people; nor by a lingering, long and painful one; and that they had found him worthy of dying in this noble way, in the course of his victories and in the flower of his glory. He had had a vision like that of Marcus Brutus, which first threatened him in Gaul and later appeared to him again in Persia, on the point of his death.

Ce langage qu'on luy fait tenir, quand il se sentit frappé: Tu as veincu, Nazareen: ou, comme d'autres, Contente toy, Nazareen; à peine eust il esté oublié, s'il eust esté creu par mes tesmoings: qui estants presens en l'armée ont remarqué iusques aux moindres mouuements et parolles de sa fin: non plus que certains autres miracles, qu'on y attache.

The words they put in his mouth when he felt himself struck—"You have conquered, Nazarene," or, as others have it, "Be content, Nazarene"—would hardly have been forgotten if my witnesses had believed them, for they were present in the army and noted even the slightest movements and words of his end; nor would certain other miracles that are attached to it.

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE

Julian granted religious freedom to divide the Christians; French kings now grant it to bring peace.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.19.8 Et pour venir au propos de mon theme: il couuoit, dit Marcellinus, de long temps en son cœur, le paganisme; mais par ce que toute son armée estoit de Chrestiens, il ne l'osoit descouurir. En fin, quand il se vit assez fort pour oser publier sa volonté, il fit ouurir les temples des Dieux, et s'essaya par tous moyens de mettre sus l'idolatrie. Pour paruenir à son effect, ayant rencontré en Constantinople, le peuple descousu, auec les prelats de l'Eglise Chrestienne diuisez, les ayant faict venir à luy au

And to come to the point of my subject: he had long nursed paganism in his heart, says Marcellinus, but because his whole army was made up of Christians, he did not dare reveal it. At last, when he saw himself strong enough to make his will public, he had the temples of the gods opened and tried by every means to set up idolatry. To achieve his aim, he found the people of Constantinople at odds and the prelates of the Christian Church di-palais, les admonesta instamment d'assoupir ces dissentions ciuiles, et que chacun sans empeschement et sans crainte seruist à la religion.

FRENCH

Ce qu'il sollicitoit auec grand soing, pour l'esperance que cette licence augmenteroit les parts et les brigues de la diuision, et empescheroit le peuple de se reünir, et de se fortifier par consequent, contre luy, par leur concorde, et vnanime intelligence: ayant essayé par la cruauté d'aucuns Chrestiens, qu'il n'y a point de beste au monde tant à craindre à l'homme, que l'homme.

2.19.9 Voyla ses mots à peu pres: en quoy cela est digne de consideration, que l'Empereur Iulian se sert pour attiser le trouble de la dissention ciuile, de cette mesme recepte de liberté de conscience, que noz Roys viennent d'employer pour l'estaindre. On peut dire d'vn costé, que de lascher la bride aux pars d'entretenir leur opinion, c'est espandre et semer la diuision, c'est prester quasi la main à l'augmenter, n'y ayant aucune barriere ny coërction des loix, qui bride et empesche sa course. Mais d'autre costé, on diroit aussi, que de lascher la bride aux pars d'entretenir leur opinion, c'est les amollir et relascher par la facilité, et par l'aisance, et que c'est esmousser l'eguillon qui s'affine par la rareté, la nouuelleté, et la difficulté.

Et si croy mieux, pour l'honneur de la deuotion de noz Roys; c'est, que n'ayans peu ce qu'ils vouloient, ils ont fait semblant de vouloir ce qu'ils pouuoient.

ENGLISH

vided. So he summoned them to the palace and earnestly urged them to calm these civil dissensions, and to let each man follow his religion without hindrance and without fear.

He pressed this with great care, hoping that such license would increase the factions and intrigues of the division. It would keep the people from uniting, and so from strengthening themselves against him through their concord and unanimous understanding. For he had learned by experience, from the cruelty of some Christians, that there is no beast in the world so much to be feared by man as man.

Those are roughly his words. What deserves consideration here is that the Emperor Julian uses, to stir up the trouble of civil dissension, the very same remedy of freedom of conscience that our kings have just employed to extinguish it. One can say, on the one hand, that to give the factions free rein to hold their opinions is to spread and sow division; it is almost to lend a hand in increasing it, since there is no barrier or constraint of the laws to curb and check its course. But on the other hand one could also say that to give the factions free rein to hold their opinions is to soften and slacken them through ease and facility. It is to blunt the spur that is sharpened by rarity, novelty and difficulty.[5]

And yet, for the honor of our kings' piety, I prefer to believe this: that being unable to do what they wanted, they pretended to want what they could do.

5 The French kings' edicts of pacification during the Wars of Religion granted the Protestants limited freedom of worship.

II.20 We Taste Nothing Pure

Nous ne goustons rien de pur
No pleasure or virtue reaches us unmixed, Montaigne argues; even our best goodness and sharpest wisdom carry some taint.

FRENCH

2.20.1 LA foiblesse de nostre condition, fait que les choses en leur simplicité et pureté naturelle ne puissent pas tomber en nostre vsage. Les elemens que nous iouyssons, sont alterez: et les metaux de mesme, et l'or, il le faut empirer par quelque autre matiere, pour l'accommoder à nostre seruice. Ny la vertu ainsi simple, qu'Ariston et Pyrrho, et encore les Stoiciens faisoient fin de la vie, ny a peu seruir sans composition: ny la volupté Cyrenaique et Aristippique. Des plaisirs, et biens que nous auons, il n'en est aucun exempt de quelque meslange de mal et d'incommodité: Medio de fonte leporum / Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angat. Nostre extreme volupté a quelque air de gemissement, et de plainte.

Diriez vous pas qu'elle se meurt d'angoisse? Voire quand nous en forgeons l'image en son excellence, nous la fardons d'epithetes et qualitez maladifues, et douloureuses: langueur, mollesse, foiblesse, deffaillance, morbidezza, grand tesmoignage de leur consanguinité, et consubstantialité. La profonde ioye a plus de seuerité, que de gayeté. L'extreme et plein contentement, plus de rassis que d'enioué. Ipsa felicitas, se nisi temperat, premit. L'aise nous masche. C'est ce que dit vn verset Grec ancien, de tel sens: Les Dieux nous vendent tous les biens qu'ils nous donnent: c'est à dire, ils ne nous en donnent aucun pur et parfaict, et que nous n'achetions au prix de quelque mal.

2.20.2 Le trauail et le plaisir, tres-dissemblables de nature, s'associent pourtant de ie ne sçay quelle ioincture naturelle. Socrates dit, que quelque Dieu essaya de mettre en masse, et confondre la douleur et la volupté: mais, que n'en pouuant sortir, il s'aduisa de les accouppler au moins par la queuë. Metrodorus disoit qu'en la tristesse,

ENGLISH

The weakness of our condition means that things in their natural simplicity and purity cannot come into our use. The elements we enjoy are altered; so are the metals; and gold itself must be debased with some other substance to fit it for our service. Neither virtue in the simple form that Ariston and Pyrrho, and the Stoics too, made the end of life has been able to serve us without admixture, nor the pleasure of the Cyrenaics and Aristippus. Of all the pleasures and goods we have, there is none free from some mixture of evil and discomfort: From the very fountain of delights / Something bitter rises, to torment us among the flowers themselves. Our extreme pleasure has something of the air of groaning and lament.[1]

Wouldn't you say it is dying of anguish? Indeed, when we forge its image at its finest, we paint it with sickly and painful epithets and qualities: languor, softness, weakness, faintness, morbidezza—strong evidence of their kinship and common substance. Deep joy has more seriousness than gaiety. Extreme and complete contentment has more calm than playfulness. Happiness itself, unless it tempers itself, crushes us. Ease chews us up. That is what an ancient Greek verse says, in this sense: The gods sell us all the goods they give us. That is to say, they give us none pure and perfect, none that we do not buy at the price of some evil.[2]

Toil and pleasure, very unlike in nature, are nonetheless joined by some natural link I cannot explain. Socrates says that some god tried to knead pain and pleasure into one mass and fuse them, but, unable to manage it, decided at least to couple them by the tail. Metrodorus said that in sadness

1 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things. Ariston of Chios was a Stoic; the Cyrenaic school of Aristippus made pleasure the highest good.
2 Morbidezza is Italian for delicacy or softness, literally "sickliness." The Latin is Seneca, Letters; the Greek verse is attributed to the comic poet Epicharmus.

FRENCH

il y a quelque alliage de plaisir. Ie ne sçay s'il vouloit dire autre chose; mais moy, i'imagine bien, qu'il y a du dessein, du consentement, et de la complaisance, à se nourrir en la melancholie. Ie dis outre l'ambition, qui s'y peut encore mesler: il y a quelque ombre de friandise et delicatesse, qui nous rit et qui nous flatte, au giron mesme de la melancholie.

Y a-il pas des complexions qui en font leur aliment? Est quædam flere voluptas. Et dit vn Attalus en Seneque, que la memoire de noz amis perdus nous aggrée comme l'amer au vin trop vieil: Minister veteris, puer, falerni / Ingere mi calices amariores: et comme des pommes doucement aigres. Nature nous descouure cette confusion. Les peintres tiennent, que les mouuemens et plis du visage, qui seruent au pleurer, seruent aussi au rire. De vray, auant que l'vn ou l'autre soyent acheuez d'exprimer, regardez à la conduitte de la peinture, vous estes en doubte, vers lequel c'est qu'on va. Et l'extremité du rire se mesle aux larmes. Nullum sine auctoramento malum est.

2.20.3 Quand i'imagine l'homme assiegé de commoditez desirables: mettons le cas, que touts ses membres fussent saisis pour tousiours, d'vn plaisir pareil à celuy de la generation en son poinct plus excessif: ie le sens fondre soubs la charge de son aise: et le voy du tout incapable de porter vne si pure, si constante volupté, et si vniuerselle. De vray il fuit, quand il y est, et se haste naturellement d'en eschapper, comme d'vn pas, où il ne se peut fermir, où il craind d'enfondrer.

2.20.4 Quand ie me confesse à moy religieusement, ie trouue que la meilleure bonté que i'aye, a quelque teinture vicieuse. Et crains que Platon en sa plus nette vertu (moy qui en suis autant sincere et loyal estimateur, et des vertus de semblable marque, qu'autre puisse estre) s'il y eust escouté de pres (et il y escoutoit de pres) il y eust senty quelque ton gauche, de mixtion humaine: mais ton obscur, et sensible seulement à soy. L'homme en tout et par tout, n'est que rappiessement et bigarrure. Les loix mesmes de la iustice, ne peuuent subsister sans quelque meslange d'iniustice. Et dit Platon, que ceux-là entreprennent de couper la teste de Hydra, qui pretendent oster des loix toutes incommoditez et inconueniens.

ENGLISH

there is some alloy of pleasure. I do not know whether he meant something else; but for my part I can well imagine that there is intent, consent and self-indulgence in feeding on melancholy. I mean that, besides ambition, which may also mingle in it, there is some shadow of daintiness and delicacy that smiles on us and flatters us in the very lap of melancholy.[3]

Are there not temperaments that make it their food? There is a certain pleasure in weeping. And a certain Attalus in Seneca says that the memory of our lost friends pleases us as bitterness does in wine that is too old: Boy, you who pour the old Falernian, / Fill my cups with the more bitter wine—and like sweetly sour apples. Nature reveals this mixture to us. Painters hold that the movements and folds of the face that serve for weeping serve also for laughing. Indeed, before either one is fully expressed, look at how the painting proceeds: you are in doubt which way it is heading. And the extreme of laughter mingles with tears. No evil is without its compensation.[4]

When I imagine a man besieged by desirable comforts—let us suppose that all his limbs were seized forever by a pleasure like that of generation at its most extreme point—I feel him melting under the burden of his ease, and I see him wholly incapable of bearing so pure, so constant and so universal a pleasure. Indeed, he flees it when he is in it, and naturally hastens to escape from it, as from ground where he cannot stand firm, where he fears he will sink.

When I confess myself to myself scrupulously, I find that the best goodness I have has some tinge of vice. And I fear that Plato, in his purest virtue (I who am as sincere and loyal an admirer of it, and of virtues of that stamp, as anyone can be), if he had listened closely (and he did listen closely), would have heard in it some false note of human admixture—but an obscure note, perceptible only to himself. Man, in everything and everywhere, is nothing but patchwork and motley. The very laws of justice cannot subsist without some mixture of injustice. And Plato says that those who claim to 3 Socrates speaks thus in Plato's Phaedo.

4 The quotations are from Ovid, Tristia; Catullus; and Seneca, Letters.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
		remove all drawbacks and disadvantages from the laws are trying to cut off the Hydra's head.[5]
	Omne magnum exemplum habet aliquid ex iniquo, quod contra singulos vtilitate publica rependitur, dit Tacitus.	Every great example has in it something unjust, which is compensated, at the expense of individuals, by the public good, says Tacitus.[6]

MINDS TOO SHARP FOR AFFAIRS

Overly subtle minds manage business badly; ordinary, blunter minds succeed better at practical life.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.20.5	Il est pareillement vray, que pour l'vsage de la vie, et seruice du commerce public, il y peut auoir de l'excez en la pureté et perspicacité de noz esprits. Cette clarté penetrante, a trop de subtilité et de curiosité. Il les faut appesantir et esmousser, pour les rendre plus obeissans à l'exemple et à la pratique; et les espessir et obscurcir, pour les proportionner à cette vie tenebreuse et terrestre. Pourtant se trouuent les esprits communs et moins tendus, plus propres et plus heureux à conduire affaires. Et les opinions de la philosophie esleuées et exquises, se trouuent ineptes à l'exercice. Cette pointue viuacité d'ame, et cette volubilité soupple et inquiete, trouble nos negotiations.	It is likewise true that, for the practice of life and the service of public dealings, there can be excess in the purity and sharpness of our minds. That penetrating clarity has too much subtlety and curiosity. Our minds must be weighed down and blunted to make them more obedient to example and practice, and thickened and darkened to fit them to this murky, earthly life. That is why common, less strained minds turn out to be more fit and more successful at conducting affairs, and the lofty, exquisite opinions of philosophy turn out to be unsuited to practice. This sharp liveliness of soul, this supple, restless volubility, disturbs our negotiations.
	Il faut manier les entreprises humaines, plus grossierement et superficiellement; et en laisser bonne et grande part, pour les droits de la Fortune. Il n'est pas besoin d'esclairer les affaires si profondement et si subtilement. On s'y perd à la consideration de tant de lustres contraires et formes diuerses, volutantibus res inter se pugnantes, obtorpuerant animi.	Human undertakings must be handled more roughly and superficially, and a good large share of them left to the rights of Fortune. There is no need to shine a light into affairs so deeply and so subtly. One gets lost considering so many contrary lights and different forms: as they turned over these conflicting matters, their minds were numbed.[7]
2.20.6	C'est ce que les anciens disent de Simonides: par ce que son imagination luy presentoit sur la demande que luy auoit faict le Roy Hieron, pour à laquelle satisfaire il auoit eu plusieurs iours de pensement, diuerses considerations, aiguës et subtiles: doubtant laquelle estoit la plus vray-semblable, il desespera du tout de la verité.	That is what the ancients say of Simonides. On the question King Hiero had put to him—to answer which he had taken several days of thought—his imagination presented him with various sharp and subtle considerations; and doubting which was the most probable, he despaired of the truth altogether.[8]
2.20.7	Qui en recherche et embrasse toutes les circonstances, et consequences, il empesche son eslection. Vn engin moyen, conduit esgallement, et suffit aux executions, de grand, et de petit poix. Regardez que les meilleurs	Whoever seeks out and embraces all the circumstances and consequences of a matter hampers his choice. A middling mind proceeds evenly and is adequate to carrying out affairs of great and small

5 Plato, Republic IV. Each head of the mythical Hydra grew back double when cut off.
6 Tacitus, Annals XIV, on the execution of all the slaves of a household after one of them murdered their master.
7 Livy, History of Rome.
8 The Greek poet Simonides of Ceos, asked by Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, what God is, kept asking for more time (Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods).

FRENCH

mesnagers, sont ceux qui nous sçauent moins dire comme ils le sont; et que ces suffisans conteurs, n'y font le plus souuent rien qui vaille. Ie sçay vn grand diseur, et tres excellent peintre de toute sorte de mesnage, qui a laissé bien piteusement, couler par ses mains, cent mille liures de rente.

I'en sçay vn autre, qui dit, qu'il consulte mieux qu'homme de son conseil, et n'est point au monde vne plus belle montre d'ame, et de suffisance, toutesfois aux effects, ses seruiteurs trouuent, qu'il est tout autre; ie dy sans mettre le malheur en conte.

ENGLISH

weight. Notice that the best managers are those who can least tell us how they do it, and that those able talkers most often achieve nothing worthwhile. I know a great talker, a most excellent describer of every kind of household management, who has very pitifully let a hundred thousand livres of income slip through his hands.

I know another who says he gives better counsel than any man in his council, and there is no finer display of mind and ability in the world; yet in practice his servants find him quite another man—and I say this without counting his bad luck.

II.21 Against Idleness

Contre la faineantise

Rulers should labor until death, Montaigne argues, citing Vespasian and a Moorish king who directed a battle with his last breath.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.21.1 L'EMPEREVR Vespasien estant malade de la maladie, dont il mourut, ne laissoit pas de vouloir entendre l'estat de l'Empire: et dans son lict mesme, despeschoit sans cesse plusieurs affaires de consequence: et son medecin l'en tançant, comme de chose nuisible à sa santé: Il faut, disoit-il, qu'vn Empereur meure debout. Voilà vn beau mot, à mon gré, et digne d'vn grand Prince.

The Emperor Vespasian, sick with the illness that killed him, still insisted on hearing the state of the Empire; even in his bed he kept dispatching many matters of consequence. When his physician scolded him for it as harmful to his health, he said: "An emperor must die standing." That, to my mind, is a fine saying, and worthy of a great prince.[1]

Adrian l'Empereur s'en seruit depuis à ce mesme propos: et le deuroit on souuent ramenteuoir aux Roys, pour leur faire sentir, que cette grande charge, qu'on leur donne du commandement de tant d'hommes, n'est pas vne charge oisiue; et qu'il n'est rien qui puisse si iustement desgouster vn subject, de se mettre en peine et en hasard pour le seruice de son Prince, que de le voir appoltronny cependant luy-mesme, à des occupations lasches et vaines: et d'auoir soing de sa conseruation, le voyant si nonchalant de la nostre.

The Emperor Hadrian later used it for the same purpose. It ought often to be recalled to kings, to make them feel that this great charge they are given, the command of so many men, is not an idle charge. Nothing can so justly discourage a subject from taking pains and running risks in his prince's service as seeing the prince himself meanwhile sunk in sloth, in lax and futile occupations—nor from caring for his safety, when he sees him so careless of ours.

2.21.2 Quand quelqu'vn voudra maintenir, qu'il vaut mieux que le Prince conduise ses guerres par autre que par soy: la Fortune luy fournira assez d'exemples de ceux, à qui leurs lieutenans ont mis à chef des grandes entreprises: et de ceux encore desquels la presence y eust esté plus nuisible, qu'vtile. Mais nul Prince vertueux et courageux pourra souffrir, qu'on l'entretienne de si honteuses instructions. Soubs couleur de conseruer sa teste, comme la statue d'vn sainct, à la bonne fortune de son estat, ils le degradent de son office, qui est tout en action militaire, et l'en declarent incapable.

If someone wants to maintain that it is better for a prince to conduct his wars through others than in person, Fortune will supply him with plenty of examples of princes whose lieutenants brought great enterprises to completion, and also of princes whose presence would have done more harm than good. But no virtuous and courageous prince could bear to be fed such shameful instruction. Under color of preserving his head, like a saint's statue, for the good fortune of his state, they demote him from his office, which consists entirely in military action, and declare him incapable of it.

I'en sçay vn, qui aymeroit bien mieux estre battu, que de dormir, pendant qu'on se battroit pour luy: et qui ne vid iamais sans ialousie, ses gents mesmes, faire quelque chose de grand en son absence. Et Selym premier disoit auec raison, ce me semble, que les victoires, qui se gaignent sans le maistre, ne sont pas completes. De tant

I know one who would much rather be beaten than sleep while others fought for him, and who never saw even his own men do something great in his absence without jealousy. And Selim I said, rightly it seems to me, that victories won without the master are not complete. All the more readily

1 Vespasian, Roman emperor, died in AD 79; the anecdote comes from Suetonius.

FRENCH

plus volontiers eust-il dit, que ce maistre deuroit rougir de honte, d'y pretendre part pour son nom, n'y ayant embesongné que sa voix et sa pensée. Ny cela mesme, veu qu'en telle besongne, les aduis et commandemens, qui apportent l'honneur, sont ceux-là seulement, qui se donnent sur le champ, et au propre de l'affaire. Nul pilote n'exerce son office de pied ferme.

Les Princes de la race Hottomane, la premiere race du monde en fortune guerriere, ont chauldement embrassé cette opinion. Et Baiazet second auec son filz, qui s'en despartirent, s'amusants aux sciences et autres occupations casanieres, donnerent aussi de bien grands soufflets à leur Empire: et celuy qui regne à present, Ammurath troisiesme, à leur exemple, commence assez bien de s'en trouuer de mesme. Fust-ce pas le Roy d'Angleterre, Edouard troisiesme, qui dit de nostre Roy Charles cinquiesme, ce mot? Il n'y eut onques Roy, qui moins s'armast, et si n'y eut onques Roy, qui tant me donnast à faire. Il auoit raison de le trouuer estrange, comme vn effect du sort, plus que de la raison.

Et cherchent autre adherent, que moy, ceux qui veulent nombrer entre les belliqueux et magnanimes conquerants, les Roys de Castille et de Portugal, de ce qu'à douze cents lieuës de leur oisiue demeure, par l'escorte de leurs facteurs, ils se sont rendus maistres des Indes d'vne et d'autre part: desquelles c'est à sçauoir, s'ils auroyent seulement le courage d'aller iouyr en presence.

2.21.3 L'Empereur Iulian disoit encore plus, qu'vn philosophe et vn galant homme, ne deuoient pas seulement respirer: c'est à dire, ne donner aux necessitez corporelles, que ce qu'on ne leur peut refuser; tenant tousiours l'ame et le corps embesongnez à choses belles, grandes et vertueuses. Il auoit honte si en public on le voyoit cracher ou suer (ce qu'on dit aussi de la ieunesse Lacedemonienne, et Xenophon de la Persienne) par ce qu'il estimoit que l'exercice, le trauail continuel, et la sobrieté, deuoient auoir cuit et asseché toutes ces superfluitez. Ce que dit Seneque ne ioindra pas mal en cet endroict, que les anciens Romains maintenoient leur ieunesse droite: ils n'apprenoient, dit-il, rien à leurs enfans, qu'ils deussent apprendre assis.

ENGLISH

would he have said that the master ought to blush with shame at claiming a share in them for his name, when he has put to work only his voice and his thoughts. Not even those, since in such work the advice and commands that bring honor are only those given on the field and in the thick of the action. No pilot does his job from dry land.[2]

The princes of the Ottoman line, the foremost line in the world for fortune in war, have warmly embraced this opinion. And Bayezid II and his son, who departed from it, amusing themselves with learning and other stay-at-home occupations, dealt their Empire some very hard blows; and the present ruler, Murad III, following their example, is beginning to fare much the same. Was it not the King of England, Edward III, who said this of our King Charles V: "There was never a king who took up arms less, and yet there was never a king who gave me so much trouble"? He was right to find it strange, as an effect of chance rather than of reason.[3]

Those who want to count the kings of Castile and Portugal among the warlike and magnanimous conquerors, because twelve hundred leagues from their idle residence, under the escort of their agents, they made themselves masters of the Indies East and West, must look for some supporter other than me. As for those Indies, it remains to be seen whether they would even have the courage to go and enjoy them in person.

The Emperor Julian said even more: that a philosopher and a man of honor ought not even to breathe—that is, ought to give bodily needs only what cannot be refused them, keeping soul and body always busy with fine, great and virtuous things. He was ashamed to be seen spitting or sweating in public (which is also said of the Spartan youth, and by Xenophon of the Persian youth), because he thought that exercise, continual toil and sobriety ought to have cooked and dried up all those superfluities. What Seneca says will fit in not badly here: that the ancient Romans kept their young people upright. They taught their children nothing, he says, that had to be learned sitting down.

2 Selim I, Ottoman sultan (r. 1512–1520), conqueror of Syria and Egypt.
3 Bayezid II reigned 1481–1512; Murad III, 1574–1595. Charles V of France (r. 1364–1380) won back much of what the English had taken while leaving the fighting to his captains.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.21.4 C'est vne genereuse enuie, de vouloir mourir mesme vtilement et virilement: mais l'effect n'en gist pas tant en nostre bonne resolution, qu'en nostre bonne fortune. Mille ont proposé de vaincre, ou de mourir en combattant, qui ont failli à l'vn et à l'autre: les blesseures, les prisons, leur trauersant ce dessein, et leur prestant vne vie forcée. Il y a des maladies, qui atterrent iusques à noz desirs, et nostre cognoissance. Fortune ne deuoit pas seconder la vanité des legions Romaines, qui s'obligerent par serment, de mourir ou de vaincre.

It is a noble wish to want to die even usefully and manfully; but the outcome lies not so much in our good resolution as in our good fortune. A thousand have resolved to conquer or die fighting who failed at both: wounds and captivity thwarted their design and lent them a forced life. There are diseases that lay low even our desires and our awareness. Fortune was under no obligation to back the vanity of the Roman legions who bound themselves by oath to die or conquer.

Victor, Marce Fabi, reuertar ex acie: si fallo, Iouem patrem Gradiuúmque Martem aliósque iratos inuoco Deos. Les Portugais disent, qu'en certain endroit de leur conqueste des Indes ils rencontrerent des soldats, qui s'estoyent condamnez auec horribles execrations, de n'entrer en aucune composition, que de se faire tuer, ou demeurer victorieux: et pour marque de ce vœu, portoyent la teste et la barbe rase. Nous auons beau nous hazarder et obstiner. Il semble que les coups fuyent ceux, qui s'y presentent trop alaigrement: et n'arriuent volontiers à qui s'y presente trop volontiers, et corrompt leur fin.

I shall return from the battle victorious, Marcus Fabius; if I break my word, I call down upon myself the wrath of Father Jupiter, Mars Gradivus and the other gods. The Portuguese say that at a certain point in their conquest of the Indies they met soldiers who had condemned themselves, with horrible curses, to accept no terms but to be killed or to win; and as a sign of this vow they wore their heads and beards shaved. It is no use our taking risks and being stubborn. Blows seem to flee those who offer themselves too eagerly, and not to come readily to the man who offers himself too readily and so spoils their aim.[4]

Tel ne pouuant obtenir de perdre sa vie, par les forces aduersaires, apres auoir tout essayé, a esté contraint, pour fournir à sa resolution, d'en r'apporter l'honneur, ou de n'en rapporter pas la vie: se donner soy mesme la mort, en la chaleur propre du combat. Il en est d'autres exemples. Mais en voicy vn. Philistus, chef de l'armée de mer du ieune Dionysius contre les Syracusains, leur presenta la battaille, qui fut asprement contestée, les forces estants pareilles. En icelle il eut du meilleur au commencement, par sa prouësse.

Mais les Syracusains se rengeans autour de sa galere, pour l'inuestir, ayant faict grands faicts d'armes de sa personne, pour se desuelopper, n'y esperant plus de ressource, s'osta de sa main la vie, qu'il auoit si liberalement abandonnée, et frustratoirement, aux mains ennemies.

Many a man, unable to get himself killed by the enemy after trying everything, has been forced—to fulfill his resolution to bring back honor or not to bring back his life—to put himself to death in the very heat of combat. There are other examples, but here is one. Philistus, commander of the younger Dionysius's fleet against the Syracusans, offered them battle, which was fiercely contested, the forces being equal. At first he had the upper hand through his prowess.[5]

But as the Syracusans closed in around his galley to surround it, after performing great feats of arms in person to break free, and no longer hoping for any way out, he took with his own hand the life he had so freely, and so vainly, abandoned to enemy hands.

THE DEATH OF MOLEY MOLUCH

The dying King of Fez commands his army to victory and dies with a finger on his lips.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.21.5 Moley Moluch, Roy de Fais, qui vient de gaigner contre Sebastian Roy de Portugal, cette iournée, fameuse par la

Moley Moluch, King of Fez, who has just won against Sebastian, King of Portugal, that battle

4 Livy, History of Rome: the oath sworn by the soldiers to the consul Marcus Fabius in 480 BC.

FRENCH

mort de trois Roys, et par la transmission de cette grande couronne, à celle de Castille: se trouua grieuement malade dés lors que les Portugalois entrerent à main armée en son estat; et alla tousiours depuis en empirant vers la mort, et la preuoyant. Iamais homme ne se seruit de soy plus vigoureusement, et brauement. Il se trouua foible, pour soustenir la pompe ceremonieuse de l'entrée de son camp, qui est selon leur mode, pleine de magnificence, et chargée de tout plein d'action: et resigna cet honneur à son frere.

Mais ce fut aussi le seul office de Capitaine qu'il resigna: touts les autres necessaires et vtiles, il les feit tres-glorieusement et exactement. Tenant son corps couché: mais son entendement, et son courage, debout et ferme, iusques au dernier souspir: et aucunement au-delà. Il pouuoit miner ses ennemis, indiscretement aduancez en ses terres: et luy poisa merueilleusement, qu'à faute d'vn peu de vie, et pour n'auoir qui substituer à la conduitte de cette guerre, et affaires d'vn estat troublé, il eust à chercher la victoire sanglante et hazardeuse, en ayant vne autre pure et nette entre ses mains.

Toutesfois il mesnagea miraculeusement la durée de sa maladie, à faire consumer son ennemy, et l'attirer loing de son armée de mer, et des places maritimes qu'il auoit en la coste d'Affrique: iusques au dernier iour de sa vie, lequel par dessein, il employa et reserua à cette grande iournée. Il dressa sa bataille en rond, assiegeant de toutes pars l'ost des Portugais; lequel rond venant à se courber et serrer, les empescha non seulement au conflict, qui fut tres aspre par la valeur de ce ieune Roy assaillant, veu qu'ils auoient à montrer visage à tous sens: mais aussi les empescha à la fuitte apres leur routte.

Et trouuants toutes les issues saisies, et closes; furent contraints de se reietter à eux mesmes: coaceruantûrque non solùm cæde, sed etiam fuga, et s'amonceller les vns sur les autres, fournissants aux vaincueurs vne tres-meurtriere victoire, et tres-entiere. Mourant, il se feit porter et tracasser où le besoing l'appelloit: et coulant le long des files, enhortoit ses Capitaines et soldats, les vns apres les autres. Mais vn coing de sa battaille se laissant enfoncer, on ne le peut tenir, qu'il ne montast à cheual l'espée au poing. Il s'efforçoit pour s'aller mesler, ses famous for the death of three kings and for the passing of that great crown to the crown of Castile, was gravely ill from the moment the Portuguese invaded his state; and from then on he kept growing worse, heading toward death and foreseeing it. Never did a man make more vigorous and gallant use of himself. He found himself too weak to sustain the ceremonial pomp of entering his camp, which in their fashion is full of magnificence and laden with a great deal of ritual; and he handed that honor over to his brother.[6]

ENGLISH

But that was also the only duty of a commander that he handed over: all the others, necessary and useful, he carried out most gloriously and exactly. He kept his body lying down, but his understanding and his courage upright and firm until his last breath—and in a way beyond it. He could have worn down his enemies, who had advanced rashly into his lands; and it weighed on him terribly that, for want of a little more life and having no one to take his place in conducting this war and the affairs of a troubled state, he had to seek a bloody and hazardous victory when he held another, pure and clean, in his hands.

Nevertheless he managed the length of his illness miraculously, to wear his enemy down and draw him far from his fleet and from the strongholds he held on the coast of Africa, until the last day of his life, which he deliberately reserved and used for this great battle. He drew up his army in a circle, besieging the Portuguese host on all sides. As this circle bent and tightened, it hampered them not only in the fighting—which was very fierce thanks to the valor of that young attacking king, since they had to face in every direction—but also in their flight after their rout.

Finding all the exits seized and closed, they were forced to fall back on themselves—and they were heaped up not only by the slaughter but also by their flight—and to pile up on one another, giving the victors a most murderous and most complete victory. Dying, he had himself carried and hauled wherever need called him, and moving along the ranks he exhorted his captains and soldiers one after another. But when one corner of his battle

5 Philistus, Greek historian and admiral of Dionysius II of Syracuse, died in this sea battle in 356 BC (Plutarch, Life of Dion).
6 Abd al-Malik, Sultan of Morocco, defeated King Sebastian at Alcácer Quibir in 1578, the "Battle of the Three Kings"; Philip II of Spain took the Portuguese crown in 1580.

FRENCH

gents l'arrestants, qui par la bride, qui par sa robbe, et par ses estriers. Cet effort acheua d'accabler ce peu de vie, qui luy restoit. On le recoucha.

Luy se resuscitant comme en sursaut de cette pasmoison, toute autre faculté luy deffaillant; pour aduertir qu'on teust sa mort (qui estoit le plus necessaire commandement, qu'il eust lors à faire, affin de n'engendrer quelque desespoir aux siens, par cette nouuelle) expira, tenant le doigt contre sa bouche close: signe ordinaire de faire silence. Qui vescut oncques si long temps, et si auant en la mort? qui mourut oncques si debout? L'extreme degré de traitter courageusement la mort, et le plus naturel, c'est la veoir, non seulement sans estonnement, mais sans soucy: continuant libre le train de la vie, iusques dedans elle.

Comme Caton, qui s'amusoit à estudier et à dormir, en ayant vne violente et sanglante, presente en son cœur, et la tenant en sa main.

ENGLISH

line gave way, there was no holding him back from mounting his horse sword in hand. He struggled to go and join the fray, while his men held him back, some by the bridle, some by his robe and his stirrups. This effort finished off what little life he had left. They laid him down again.

He came round from this swoon as if with a start, and with every other faculty failing him, to give warning that his death should be kept quiet (the most necessary command he had to give at that moment, so as not to breed despair among his men with the news), he died holding his finger against his closed lips, the usual sign for silence. Who ever lived so long and so far into death? Who ever died so upright? The highest degree of meeting death courageously, and the most natural, is to look on it not only without dismay but without concern, freely continuing the course of life right into it.

Like Cato, who occupied himself with studying and sleeping while he had a violent and bloody death present in his heart and held it in his hand.[7]

7 Before stabbing himself at Utica, Cato read Plato's Phaedo and slept soundly.

II.22 Of Riding Post

Des Postes

From his own riding to Cyrus's relay stations and Caecina's swallows, Montaigne collects stories of how news was carried at speed.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.22.1	IE n'ay pas esté des plus foibles en cet exercice, qui est propre à gens de ma taille, ferme et courte: mais i'en quitte le mestier: il nous essaye trop, pour y durer long temps.	I have not been one of the weakest at this exercise, which suits people of my build, stocky and short; but I am giving up the trade: it tests us too hard to keep it up for long.[1]
2.22.2	Ie lisois à cette heure, que le Roy Cyrus, pour receuoir plus facilement nouuelles de tous les costez de son Empire, qui estoit d'vne fort grande estenduë, fit regarder combien vn cheual pouuoit faire de chemin en vn iour, tout d'vne traicte, et à cette distance il establit des hommes, qui auoient charge de tenir des cheuaux prests, pour en fournir à ceux qui viendroient vers luy. Et disent aucuns, que cette vistesse d'aller, reuient à la mesure du vol des gruës.	I was just reading that King Cyrus, to receive news more easily from every quarter of his Empire, which was very extensive, had it measured how far a horse could go in a day at one stretch; and at that distance he stationed men whose task was to keep horses ready to supply those riding to him. And some say that this speed of travel matches the speed of the flight of cranes.[2]
2.22.3	Cæsar dit que Lucius Vibulus Rufus, ayant haste de porter vn aduertissement à Pompeius, s'achemina vers luy iour et nuict, changeant de cheuaux, pour faire diligence. Et luy mesme, à ce que dit Suetone, faisoit cent mille par iour, sur vn coche de louage. Mais c'estoit vn furieux courrier: car où les riuieres luy tranchoient son chemin, il les franchissoit à nage: et ne se destourna iamais pour querir vn pont, ou vn gué. Tiberius Nero allant voir son frere Drusus, malade en Allemaigne, fit deux cens mille, en vingt quatre heures, ayant trois coches. En la guerre des Romains contre le Roy Antiochus, T.	Caesar says that Lucius Vibullius Rufus, in haste to carry a warning to Pompey, rode toward him day and night, changing horses to make speed. And Caesar himself, according to Suetonius, covered a hundred miles a day in a hired carriage. But he was a furious courier: where rivers cut across his road, he swam across them, and never turned aside to look for a bridge or a ford. Tiberius Nero, going to see his brother Drusus, who was sick in Germany, covered two hundred miles in twenty-four hours, using three carriages. In the Romans' war against King Antiochus, T.[3]
	Sempronius Gracchus, dit Tite-Liue, per dispositos equos propè incredibili celeritate ab Amphissa tertio die Pellam peruenit: et appert à veoir le lieu, que c'estoient postes assises, non freschement ordonnées pour cette course.	Sempronius Gracchus, says Livy, using relays of horses, reached Pella from Amphissa on the third day, at an almost incredible speed; and from the passage it appears that these were established posts, not ones newly arranged for this ride.
2.22.4	L'inuention de Cecinna à renuoyer des nouuelles à ceux de sa maison, auoit bien plus de promptitude: il emporta quand et soy des arondelles, et les relaschoit vers leurs nids, quand il vouloit r'enuoyer de ses nouuelles, en les	Caecina's device for sending news back to his household was much quicker still. He took swallows along with him and released them toward

1 The essay is titled "Of Riding Post," that is, traveling fast with relays of post-horses.
2 Xenophon, Cyropaedia.
3 Tiberius Nero is the future emperor Tiberius; his brother Drusus died in Germany in 9 BC (Pliny, Natural History).

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	teignant de marque de couleur propre à signifier ce qu'il vouloit, selon qu'il auoit concerté auec les siens.	their nests when he wanted to send back news, dyeing them with a colored mark that signified what he wished, as he had agreed with his people.[4]
2.22.5	Au theatre à Rome, les maistres de famille, auoient des pigeons dans leur sein, ausquels ils attachoyent des lettres, qu'ils vouloient mander quelque chose à leurs gens au logis: et estoient dressez à en rapporter response. D. Brutus en vsa assiegé à Mutine, et autres ailleurs.	At the theater in Rome, heads of households kept pigeons in the folds of their robes, to which they tied letters when they wanted to send some message to their people at home; and the birds were trained to bring back an answer. D. Brutus used them when he was besieged at Mutina, and others did elsewhere.[5]
2.22.6	Au Peru, ils couroyent sur les hommes, qui les chargeoient sur les espaules à tout des portoires, par telle agilité, que tout en courant, les premiers porteurs reiettoyent aux seconds leur charge, sans arrester vn pas.	In Peru they traveled post on men, who carried them on their shoulders in litters with such agility that, while still running, the first bearers passed their load on to the second without stopping a step.
2.22.7	I'entends que les Valachi, courriers du grand Seigneur, font des extremes diligences: d'autant qu'ils ont loy de desmonter le premier passant qu'ils trouuent en leur chemin, en luy donnant leur cheual recreu. Pour se garder de lasser, ils se serrent à trauers le corps bien estroittement, d'vne bande large comme font assez d'autres. Ie n'ay trouué nul seiour à cet vsage.	I hear that the Valachi, the Sultan's couriers, travel at extreme speed, since they are entitled by law to unhorse the first passerby they meet on their road, giving him their own exhausted horse. To keep from tiring, they bind themselves very tightly around the body with a broad band, as many others do. I have found no relief in this practice.[6]

4 Caecina of Volaterrae, a Roman knight, owner of racing chariots, who sent home the results this way (Pliny, Natural History).
5 Decimus Brutus, one of Caesar's assassins, was besieged by Mark Antony at Mutina (modern Modena) in 43 BC.
6 The Valachi (Wallachians) served as couriers for the Ottoman sultan.

II.23 Of Bad Means Used for a Good End

Des mauuais moyens employez à bonne fin
Montaigne compares states with diseased bodies and considers whether foreign wars and gladiator shows are justified ways to purge civic ills.

FRENCH

2.23.1 IL se trouue vne merueilleuse relation et correspondance, en cette vniuerselle police des ouurages de Nature: qui montre bien qu'elle n'est ny fortuite ny conduite par diuers maistres. Les maladies et conditions de nos corps, se voyent aussi aux estats et polices: les royaumes, les republiques naissent, fleurissent et fanissent de vieillesse, comme nous.

Nous sommes subiects à vne repletion d'humeurs inutile et nuysible, soit de bonnes humeurs, (car cela mesme les medecins le craignent: et par ce qu'il n'y a rien de stable chez nous, ils disent que la perfection de santé trop allegre et vigoureuse, il nous la faut essimer et rabatre par art, de peur que nostre nature ne se pouuant rassoir en nulle certaine place, et n'ayant plus où monter pour s'ameliorer, ne se recule en arriere en desordre et trop à coup: ils ordonnent pour cela aux atletes les purgations et les saignées, pour leur soustraire cette superabondance de santé) soit repletion de mauuaises humeurs, qui est l'ordinaire cause des maladies.

2.23.2 De semblable repletion se voyent les estats souuent malades: et a lon accoustumé d'vser de diuerses sortes de purgation. Tantost on donne congé à vne grande multitude de familles, pour en descharger le païs, lesquelles vont chercher ailleurs où s'accommoder aux despens d'autruy. De cette façon nos anciens Francons partis du fons d'Alemaigne, vindrent se saisir de la Gaule, et en deschasser les premiers habitans: ainsi se forgea cette infinie marée d'hommes, qui s'escoula en Italie soubs Brennus et autres: ainsi les Gots et Vuandales: comme aussi les peuples qui possedent à present la Grece, abandonnerent leur naturel païs pour s'aller loger ailleurs plus au large: et à peine est il deux ou trois coins au monde, qui n'ayent senty l'effect d'vn tel remuement.

Les Romains bastissoient par ce moyen leurs colonies: car sentans leur ville se grossir outre mesure, ils la

ENGLISH

There is a wonderful relationship and correspondence in this universal government of Nature's works, which shows clearly that it is neither a matter of chance nor directed by several masters. The diseases and conditions of our bodies are seen also in states and governments: kingdoms and republics are born, flourish and wither with age, as we do.

We are subject to a useless and harmful surfeit of humors. It may be of good humors: for even this the physicians fear, and because nothing in us is stable, they say that a perfection of health too buoyant and vigorous must be trimmed and reduced by art, lest our nature, unable to settle in any fixed place and having nowhere higher to climb to improve, should fall back in disorder and too suddenly; that is why they prescribe purges and bleedings for athletes, to draw off that superabundance of health. Or it may be a surfeit of bad humors, which is the ordinary cause of diseases.

States are often seen to be sick with a similar surfeit, and various kinds of purgation are customarily used. Sometimes a great multitude of families are sent off to relieve the country of them, and they go seeking a place to settle elsewhere at others' expense. In this way our ancient Franks, setting out from the depths of Germany, came to seize Gaul and drive out its first inhabitants; so was formed that boundless tide of men that poured into Italy under Brennus and others; so the Goths and Vandals; and so, too, the peoples who now possess Greece left their native country to settle elsewhere with more room. There are hardly two or three corners in the world that have not felt the effect of such a migration.[1]

The Romans founded their colonies by this means: feeling their city swell beyond measure, they redeschargeoient du peuple moins necessaire, et l'enuoyoient habiter et cultiuer les terres par eux conquises. Par fois aussi ils ont à escient nourry des guerres auec aucuns leurs ennemis, non seulement pour tenir leurs hommes en haleine, de peur que l'oysiueté mere de corruption, ne leur apportast quelque pire inconuenient: Et patimur longæ pacis mala; sæuior armis, / Luxuria incumbit. Mais aussi pour seruir de saignée à leur Republique, et esuanter vn peu la chaleur trop vehemente de leur ieunesse: escourter et esclaircir le branchage de ce tige abondant en trop de gaillardise: à cet effect se sont ils autrefois seruis de la guerre contre les Carthaginois.

FRENCH

2.23.3 Au traité de Bretigny, Edoüard troisiesme Roy d'Angleterre, ne voulut comprendre en cette paix generalle, qu'il fit auec nostre Roy, le different du Duché de Bretaigne, affin qu'il eust où se descharger, de ses hommes de guerre, et que cette foulle d'Anglois, dequoy il s'estoit seruy aux affaires de deça, ne se reiettast en Angleterre. Ce fut l'vne des raisons, pourquoy nostre Roy Philippe consentit d'enuoyer Iean son fils à la guerre d'outre-mer: à fin d'emmener quand et luy vn grand nombre de ieunesse bouïllante, qui estoit en sa gendarmerie.

Il y en a plusieurs en ce temps, qui discourent de pareille façon, souhaitans que cette esmotion chaleureuse, qui est parmy nous, se peust deriuer à quelque guerre voisine, de peur que ces humeurs peccantes, qui dominent pour cette heure nostre corps, si on ne les escoulle ailleurs, maintiennent nostre fiebure tousiours en force, et apportent en fin nostre entiere ruine. Et de vray, vne guerre estrangere est vn mal bien plus doux que la ciuile: mais ie ne croy pas que Dieu fauorisast vne si iniuste entreprise, d'offencer et quereler autruy pour nostre commodité. Nil mihi tam valdè placeat, Rhamnusia virgo, / Quòd temerè inuitis suscipiatur heris.

ENGLISH

lieved it of the less necessary people and sent them to live on and farm the lands they had conquered. Sometimes, too, they deliberately kept wars going with some of their enemies, not only to keep their men in trim, for fear that idleness, the mother of corruption, might bring them some worse trouble—We suffer the evils of a long peace; luxury, more cruel than arms, / Weighs upon us—but also to serve as a bloodletting for their Republic, to vent a little of the too vehement heat of their youth, to lop and thin the branches of a trunk that grew too lustily. That is what they once used the war against the Carthaginians for.[2]

At the Treaty of Brétigny, Edward III, King of England, refused to include the dispute over the Duchy of Brittany in the general peace he made with our king, so that he would have somewhere to unload his men of war, and so that the throng of Englishmen he had used in his affairs over here would not spill back into England. This was one of the reasons why our King Philip agreed to send his son John to the war overseas: so that he would take with him a great number of hot-blooded young men who were among his men-at-arms.[3]

There are many in our time who reason in the same way, wishing that the feverish agitation among us could be diverted into some neighboring war, for fear that the noxious humors now dominating our body, unless drained off elsewhere, will keep our fever always at full strength and in the end bring about our complete ruin. And indeed, a foreign war is a much milder evil than civil war; but I do not believe that God would favor so unjust an enterprise as to injure others and pick quarrels with them for our own convenience. Rhamnusian maiden, may nothing please me so much / That I would rashly seize it against its owners' will.[4]

GLADIATORS

Rome trained its people in courage by gladiatorial combats, a bad means used for a good end.

FRENCH

2.23.4 Toutesfois la foiblesse de nostre condition, nous pousse souuent à cette necessité, de nous seruir de mauuais

ENGLISH

Yet the weakness of our condition often drives us to the necessity of using bad means for a good

1 Brennus led the Gauls who sacked Rome around 390 BC; the peoples now holding Greece are the Turks.
2 Juvenal, Satires.
3 The Treaty of Brétigny (1360) halted the Hundred Years' War for a time. Philip VI of France planned a crusade in the 1330s.

FRENCH

moyens pour vne bonne fin. Lycurgus, le plus vertueux et parfaict legislateur qui fut onques, inuenta cette tres-iniuste façon, pour instruire son peuple à la temperance, de faire enyurer par force les Elotes, qui estoyent leurs serfs: à fin qu'en les voyant ainsi perdus et enseuelis dans le vin, les Spartiates prinsent en horreur le desbordement de ce vice.

Ceux là auoyent encore plus de tort, qui permettoyent anciennement que les criminels, à quelque sorte de mort qu'ils fussent condamnez, fussent deschirez tous vifs par les medecins, pour y voir au naturel nos parties interieures, et en establir plus de certitude en leur art: car s'il se faut desbaucher, on est plus excusable, le faisant pour la santé de l'ame, que pour celle du corps: comme les Romains dressoient le peuple à la vaillance et au mespris des dangers, et de la mort, par ces furieux spectacles de gladiateurs et escrimeurs à outrance, qui se combattoient, détailloient, et entretuoyent en leur presence: Quid vesani aliud sibi vult ars impia ludi, / Quid mortes iuuenum, quid sanguine pasta voluptas? Et dura cet vsage iusques à Theodosius l'Empereur.

Arripe dilatam tua, dux, in tempora famam,
Quódque patris superest, successor laudis habeto.
Nullus in vrbe cadat, cuius sit pœna voluptas.
Iam solis contenta feris, infamis arena
Nulla cruentatis homicidia ludat in armis. C'estoit à la verité vn merueilleux exemple, et de tres-grand fruict, pour l'institution du peuple, de voir tous les iours en sa presence, cent, deux cents, voire mille coupples d'hommes armez les vns contre les autres, se hacher en pieces, auec vne si extreme fermeté de courage, qu'on ne leur vist lascher vne parolle de foiblesse ou commiseration, iamais tourner le dos, ny faire seulement vn mouuemont lasche, pour gauchir au coup de leur aduersaire: ains tendre le col à son espee, et se presenter au coup.

Il est aduenu à plusieurs d'entre eux, estans blessez à mort de force playes, d'enuoyer demander au peuple, s'il estoit content de leur deuoir, auant que se coucher pour rendre l'esprit sur la place. Il ne falloit pas seulement qu'ils combattissent et mourussent constamment, mais end. Lycurgus, the most virtuous and perfect lawgiver who ever lived, devised this very unjust method of teaching his people temperance: he had the Helots, who were their serfs, made drunk by force, so that the Spartans, seeing them thus lost and buried in wine, would come to abhor the excess of this vice.

ENGLISH

Those were even more in the wrong who in ancient times allowed criminals, whatever kind of death they had been condemned to, to be cut open alive by physicians, so as to see our internal parts in their natural state and establish greater certainty in their art. For if we must go astray, it is more excusable to do so for the health of the soul than for that of the body. Thus the Romans trained the people in valor and in contempt of dangers and death through those furious spectacles of gladiators and fencers fighting to the death, who fought, carved up and killed one another before their eyes: What else does the impious art of these mad games mean, / What these deaths of young men, what this pleasure fed on blood? And this practice lasted until the Emperor Theodosius.[5]

Seize, prince, the glory reserved for your reign,
And be heir to what remains of your father's praise.
Let no one fall in the city whose punishment is a pleasure.
Let the infamous arena, content now with wild beasts alone,
No longer stage murders with bloodstained weapons. It was, in truth, a wonderful example, and most fruitful for the education of the people, to see every day before their eyes a hundred, two hundred, even a thousand pairs of armed men set against one another hack each other to pieces with such extreme firmness of courage that they were never seen to let slip a word of weakness or pity, never to turn their backs, nor even to make a cowardly movement to dodge their opponent's blow, but rather to stretch out their necks to his sword and offer themselves to the stroke.

Many of them, mortally wounded many times over, sent to ask the people whether they were satisfied with their performance before lying down to give up the ghost on the spot. It was not enough that they fight and die steadfastly; they had to do it

4 Catullus. The "Rhamnusian maiden" is Nemesis, goddess of retribution, worshipped at Rhamnus in Attica.
5 Prudentius, Against Symmachus; the poet addresses the Emperor Honorius.

FRENCH

encore allegrement: en maniere qu'on les hurloit et maudissoit, si on les voyoit estriuer à receuoir la mort. Les filles mesmes les incitoient: Consurgit ad ictus;
Et, quoties victor ferrum iugulo inserit, illa
Delicias ait esse suas, pectúsque iacentis
Virgo modesta iubet conuerso pollice rumpi. Les premiers Romains employoient à cet exemple les criminels.

Mais depuis on y employa des serfs innocens, et des libres mesmes, qui se vendoyent pour cet effect: iusques à des Senateurs et Cheualiers Romains: et encores des femmes:
Nunc caput in mortem vendunt, et funus arenæ,
Atque hostem sibi quisque parat, cùm bella quiescunt.
Hos inter fremitus nouósque lusus,
Stat sexus rudis insciúsque ferri,
Et pugnas capit improbus viriles. Ce que ie trouuerois fort estrange et incroyable, si nous n'estions accoustumez de voir tous les iours en nos guerres, plusieurs miliasses d'hommes estrangers, engageants pour de l'argent leur sang et leur vie, à des querelles, où ils n'ont aucun interest.

ENGLISH

cheerfully too, so that they were howled at and cursed if they were seen to resist receiving death. Even the young women urged them on: She rises at each blow;
And every time the victor plunges his sword into a throat,
She calls it her delight, and, turning her thumb,
The modest virgin bids the fallen man's breast be pierced. The early Romans used criminals for this example.

But later they used innocent slaves, and even free men who sold themselves for the purpose—even Roman senators and knights—and women as well:
Now men sell their lives to death and to burial in the arena,
And each, when wars are at rest, makes himself an enemy.
Amid this uproar and these new games
Stands the sex untrained and ignorant of the sword,
And shamelessly takes up men's combats. I would find this very strange and incredible, if we were not used to seeing every day in our wars many thousands of foreigners pledging their blood and their lives for money in quarrels in which they have no stake.[6]

6 Manilius, Astronomica; and Statius, Silvae.

II.24 Of the Greatness of Rome

De la grandeur Romaine

A short essay using Cicero's letters and other anecdotes to show how far Rome's power exceeded the paltry grandeurs of Montaigne's time.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.24.1	IE ne veux dire qu'vn mot de cet argument infiny, pour montrer la simplesse de ceux, qui apparient à celle là, les chetiues grandeurs de ce temps.	I want to say only a word on this infinite subject, to show the simple-mindedness of those who compare the paltry grandeurs of our time with that one.
2.24.2	Au septiesme liure des epistres familieres de Cicero (et que les grammairiens en ostent ce surnom, de familieres, s'ils veulent, car à la verité il n'y est pas fort à propos: et ceux qui au lieu de familieres y ont substitué ad familiares, peuuent tirer quelque argument pour eux, de ce que dit Suetone en la vie de Cæsar, qu'il y auoit vn volume de lettres de luy ad familiares) il y en a vne, qui s'adresse à Cæsar estant lors en la Gaule, en laquelle Cicero redit ces mots, qui estoyent sur la fin d'vn' autre lettre, que Cæsar luy auoit escrit: Quant à Marcus Furius, que tu m'as recommandé, ie le feray Roy de Gaule, et si tu veux, que i'aduance quelque autre de tes amis, enuoye le moy.	In the seventh book of Cicero's familiar letters (and let the grammarians remove that epithet "familiar" if they like, for in truth it is not very apt; and those who have substituted ad familiares for "familiar" can draw some argument for their side from what Suetonius says in his life of Caesar, that there was a volume of his letters ad familiares), there is one addressed to Caesar, who was then in Gaul. In it Cicero repeats these words, which came at the end of another letter Caesar had written him: "As for Marcus Furius, whom you recommended to me, I will make him king of Gaul; and if you want me to promote some other friend of yours, send him to me."[1]
	Il n'estoit pas nouueau à vn simple citoyen Romain, comme estoit lors Cæsar, de disposer des Royaumes, car il osta bien au Roy Deiotarus le sien, pour le donner à vn Gentil-homme de la ville de Pergame nommé Mithridates. Et ceux qui escriuent sa vie enregistrent plusieurs Royaumes par luy vendus: et Suetone dit qu'il tira pour vn coup, du Roy Ptolomæus, trois millions six cens mill' escus, qui fut bien pres de luy vendre le sien. Tot Galatæ, tot Pontus eat, tot Lydia nummis.	It was nothing new for a simple Roman citizen, as Caesar then was, to dispose of kingdoms: he took his kingdom away from King Deiotarus to give it to a gentleman of the city of Pergamum named Mithridates. Those who write his life record several kingdoms sold by him; and Suetonius says that he extracted from King Ptolemy, at one stroke, three million six hundred thousand crowns, which came very close to selling him his own. So many coins for Galatia, so many for Pontus, so many for Lydia.[2]
2.24.3	Marcus Antonius disoit que la grandeur du peuple Romain ne se montrait pas tant, par ce qu'il prenoit, que par ce qu'il donnoit. Si en auoit il quelque siecle auant Antonius, osté vn entre autres, d'authorité si merueilleuse, qu'en toute son histoire, ie ne sçache marque, qui porte plus haut le nom de son credit.	Mark Antony said that the greatness of the Roman people showed itself not so much by what it took as by what it gave. Yet some century before Antony it had taken away one kingdom among others with such wondrous authority that in all its history I know of no mark that raises the name of its

1 Ad familiares means "to his friends," the title now usual for this collection of Cicero's letters.
2 Claudian, Against Eutropius.

FRENCH

Antiochus possedoit toute l'Ægypte, et estoit apres à conquerir Cypre, et autres demeurants de cet empire. Sur le progrez de ses victoires, C. Popilius arriua à luy de la part du Senat: et d'abordée, refusa de luy toucher à la main, qu'il n'eust premierement leu les lettres qu'il luy apportoit.

Le Roy les ayant leuës, et dict, qu'il en delibereroit: Popilius circonscrit la place où il estoit auec sa baguette, en luy disant: Ren moy responce, que ie puisse rapporter au Senat, auant que tu partes de ce cercle. Antiochus estonné de la rudesse d'vn si pressant commandement, apres y auoir vn peu songé: Ie feray, dit-il, ce que le Senat me commande. Lors le salüa Popilius, comme amy du peuple Romain. Auoir renoncé à vne si grande Monarchie, et cours d'vne si fortunée prosperité, par l'impression de trois traits d'escriture! Il eut vrayement raison, comme il fit, d'enuoyer depuis dire au Senat par ses ambassadeurs, qu'il auoit receu leur ordonnance, de mesme respect, que si elle fust venuë des Dieux immortels.

2.24.4 Tous les Royaumes qu'Auguste gaigna par droict de guerre, il les rendit à ceux qui les auoyent perdus, ou en fit present à des estrangers. Et sur ce propos Tacitus parlant du Roy d'Angleterre Cogidunus, nous fait sentir par vn merueilleux traict cette infinie puissance. Les Romains, dit-il, auoyent accoustumé de toute ancienneté, de laisser les Roys, qu'ils auoyent surmontez, en la possession de leurs Royaumes, soubs leur authorité: à ce qu'ils eussent des Roys mesmes, vtils de la seruitude: Vt haberent instrumenta seruitutis et reges.

Il est vray-semblable, que Solyman, à qui nous auons veu faire liberalité du Royaume d'Hongrie, et autres estats, regardoit plus à cette consideration, qu'à celle qu'il auoit accoustumé d'alleguer; Qu'il estoit saoul et chargé, de tant de Monarchies et de domination, que sa vertu, ou celle de ses ancestres, luy auoyent acquis.

ENGLISH

power higher. Antiochus held all of Egypt and was about to conquer Cyprus and other remnants of that empire. In the course of his victories C. Popilius came to him on behalf of the Senate, and on first meeting him refused to take his hand until he had first read the letters he was bringing.[3]

When the king had read them and said that he would deliberate on them, Popilius drew a circle with his rod around the spot where he stood, saying: "Give me an answer I can take back to the Senate before you step out of this circle." Antiochus, stunned by the harshness of so urgent a command, thought for a moment and said: "I will do what the Senate commands me." Then Popilius greeted him as a friend of the Roman people. To have given up so great a monarchy, and the course of such fortunate prosperity, at the impression of three strokes of writing! He was truly right, as he did, to send word afterward to the Senate through his ambassadors that he had received their order with the same respect as if it had come from the immortal gods.

All the kingdoms that Augustus won by right of war he either gave back to those who had lost them or made presents of to foreigners. On this subject Tacitus, speaking of the English king Cogidunus, makes us feel this infinite power with a marvelous stroke. The Romans, he says, had been accustomed from the most ancient times to leave the kings they had conquered in possession of their kingdoms, under their authority, so as to have even kings as tools of servitude: So that they might have even kings as instruments of servitude.[4]

It is likely that Suleiman, whom we have seen make a gift of the kingdom of Hungary and other states, was looking more to this consideration than to the one he used to allege: that he was sated and overloaded with all the monarchies and dominion that his valor, or that of his ancestors, had won him.[5]

3 Antiochus IV, king of Syria, was forced out of Egypt by the envoy Gaius Popilius Laenas in 168 BC.
4 Tacitus, Agricola; Cogidunus was a king of the Britons allied to Rome in the 1st century AD.
5 Suleiman left Hungary to vassal rulers after his victory at Mohács in 1526.

II.25 Of Not Pretending to Be Sick

De ne contrefaire le malade

Stories of people who faked gout or blindness and then truly got it lead Montaigne to warn against counterfeiting illness.

FRENCH

2.25.1 IL y a vn epigramme en Martial qui est des bons, car il y en a chez luy de toutes sortes: où il recite plaisamment l'histoire de Cælius, qui pour fuir à faire la cour à quelques grans à Rome, se trouuer à leur leuer, les assister et les suyure, fit la mine d'auoir la goute: et pour rendre son excuse plus vray-semblable, se faisoit oindre les iambes, les auoit enueloppees, et contre-faisoit entierement le port et la contenance d'vn homme gouteux. En fin la Fortune luy fit ce plaisir de l'en rendre tout à faict. Tantum cura potest et ars doloris! / Desiit fingere Cœlius podagram.

2.25.2 I'ay veu en quelque lieu d'Appian, ce me semble, vne pareille histoire, d'vn qui voulant eschapper aux proscriptions des triumvirs de Rome, pour se desrober de la cognoissance de ceux qui le poursuyuoient, se tenant caché et trauesti, y adiousta encore cette inuention, de contre-faire le borgne: quand il vint à recouurer vn peu plus de liberté, et qu'il voulut deffaire l'emplatre qu'il auoit long temps porté sur son œil, il trouua que sa veuë estoit effectuellement perdue soubs ce masque. Il est possible que l'action de la veuë s'estoit hebetée, pour auoir esté si long temps sans exercice, et que la force visiue s'estoit toute reietée en l'autre œil.

Car nous sentons euidemment que l'œil que nous tenons couuert, r'enuoye à son compaignon quelque partie de son effect: en maniere que celuy qui reste, s'en grossit et s'en enfle. Comme aussi l'oisiueté, auec la chaleur des liaisons et des medicamens, auoit bien peu attirer quelque humeur podagrique au gouteux de Martial.

2.25.3 Lisant chez Froissard, le vœu d'vne troupe de ieunes Gentils-hommes Anglois, de porter l'œil gauche bandé, iusques à ce qu'ils eussent passé en France, et exploité quelque faict d'armes sur nous: ie me suis souuent

ENGLISH

There is an epigram in Martial—one of the good ones, for he has all kinds—in which he amusingly tells the story of Caelius. To avoid paying court to certain great men in Rome, attending their levees, waiting on them and following them about, Caelius pretended to have gout; and to make his excuse more convincing, he had his legs anointed and kept them wrapped up, and imitated the bearing and demeanor of a gouty man in every detail. In the end Fortune did him the favor of making him one in earnest. So much can care and the art of pain achieve! / Caelius has stopped pretending to have gout.

I have read somewhere in Appian, I think, a similar story of a man who wanted to escape the proscriptions of the triumvirs at Rome. To keep from being recognized by those pursuing him, he stayed hidden and disguised, and added a further trick: he pretended to be blind in one eye. When he came to recover a little more freedom and wanted to remove the plaster he had long worn over his eye, he found that his sight had actually been lost under this mask. It is possible that the action of sight had been dulled by going so long without exercise, and that the power of seeing had all been transferred into the other eye.[1]

For we clearly feel that the eye we keep covered sends some part of its function to its companion, so that the remaining one grows stronger and swells from it. Just as, too, idleness, together with the heat of the bandages and ointments, may well have drawn some gouty humor to Martial's gouty man.

Reading in Froissart of the vow of a troop of young English gentlemen to wear their left eye bandaged until they had crossed into France and performed

1 The triumvirs Antony, Octavian and Lepidus outlawed their enemies in 43 BC.

FRENCH

chatouïllé de ce pensement, qu'il leur eust pris, comme à ces autres, et qu'ils se fussent trouuez tous éborgnez au reuoir des maistresses, pour lesquelles ils auoyent faict l'entreprise.

2.25.4 Les meres ont raison de tancer leurs enfans, quand ils contrefont les borgnes, les boiteux et les bicles, et tels autres defauts de la personne: car outre ce que le corps ainsi tendre en peut receuoir vn mauuais ply, ie ne sçay comment il semble que la Fortune se ioüe à nous prendre au mot: et i'ay ouy reciter plusieurs exemples de gens deuenus malades ayant dessigné de feindre l'estre. De tout temps i'ay apprins de charger ma main et à cheual et à pied, d'vne baguette ou d'vn baston: iusques à y chercher de l'elegance, et m'en seiourner, d'vne contenance affettée. Plusieurs m'ont menacé, que Fortune tourneroit vn iour cette mignardise en necessité.

Ie me fonde sur ce que ie seroy le premier goutteux de ma race.

2.25.5 Mais alongeons ce chapitre et le bigarrons d'vne autre piece, à propos de la cecité. Pline dit d'vn, qui songeant estre aueugle en dormant, se le trouua l'endemain, sans aucune maladie precedente. La force de l'imagination peut bien ayder à cela, comme i'ay dit ailleurs, et semble que Pline soit de cet aduis: mais il est plus vray-semblable, que les mouuemens que le corps sentoit au dedans, desquels les medecins trouueront, s'ils veulent, la cause, qui luy ostoient la veuë, furent occasion du songe.

2.25.6 Adioustons encore vn' histoire voisine de ce propos, que Seneque recite en l'vne de ses lettres: Tu sçais, dit-il, escriuant à Lucilius, que Harpasté la folle de ma femme, est demeurée chez moy pour charge hereditaire: car de mon goust ie suis ennemy de ces montres, et si i'ay enuie de rire d'vn fol, il ne me le faut chercher guere loing, ie ris de moy-mesme. Cette folle, a subitement perdu la veuë. Ie te recite chose estrange, mais veritable: elle ne sent point qu'elle soit aueugle, et presse incessamment son gouuerneur de l'emmener, par ce qu'elle dit que ma maison est obscure.

Ce que nous rions en elle, ie te prie croire, qu'il aduient à chacun de nous: nul ne cognoist estre auare, nul some feat of arms against us, I have often been tickled by the thought that it might have happened to them as to those others, and that they might all have found themselves one-eyed when they saw again the ladies for whose sake they had undertaken the enterprise.

ENGLISH

Mothers are right to scold their children when they mimic the one-eyed, the lame, the cross-eyed and other such physical defects. Besides the fact that a body so tender may take a bad bent from it, I don't know how, but Fortune seems to enjoy taking us at our word; and I have heard many examples of people who fell ill after planning to pretend to be. I have always been in the habit of carrying a switch or a stick in my hand, on horseback and on foot—even going so far as to seek elegance in it and to lean on it with an affected air. Many have warned me that Fortune would one day turn this affectation into necessity.

I rely on the fact that I would be the first of my line to have gout.

But let us lengthen this chapter and patch it with another piece, on the subject of blindness. Pliny tells of a man who dreamed in his sleep that he was blind and found that he was so the next day, without any previous illness. The power of imagination may well help in that, as I have said elsewhere, and Pliny seems to be of this opinion. But it is more likely that the movements the body felt within, which were taking away his sight—the physicians will find their cause if they care to—were what occasioned the dream.[2]

Let us add one more story related to this subject, which Seneca tells in one of his letters. "You know," he says, writing to Lucilius, "that Harpaste, my wife's fool, has stayed on in my house as a burden I inherited. For my own taste is against such spectacles; and if I want to laugh at a fool, I need not look far: I laugh at myself. This fool has suddenly lost her sight. I am telling you something strange but true: she does not feel that she is blind, and keeps pressing her attendant to take her out, because she says my house is dark.[3]

What we laugh at in her, believe me, happens to every one of us. No one knows that he is avari-

2 Montaigne refers to his essay "Of the Power of the Imagination" (I.21).

FRENCH

conuoiteux. Encore les aueugles demandent vn guide, nous nous fouruoions de nous mesmes. Ie ne suis pas ambitieux, disons nous, mais à Rome on ne peut viure autrement: ie ne suis pas sumptueux, mais la ville requiert vne grande despence: ce n'est pas ma faute, si ie suis cholere, si ie n'ay encore establi aucun train asseuré de vie, c'est la faute de la ieunesse. Ne cherchons pas hors de nous nostre mal, il est chez nous: il est planté en nos entrailles. Et cela mesme, que nous ne sentons pas estre malades, nous rend la guerison plus malaisée.

Si nous ne commençons de bonne heure à nous penser, quand aurons nous pourueu à tant de playes et à tant de maux? Si auons nous vne tres-douce medecine, que la philosophie: car des autres, on n'en sent le plaisir, qu'apres la guerison, cette cy plaist et guerit ensemble. Voyla ce que dit Seneque, qui m'a emporté hors de mon propos: mais il y a du profit au change.

ENGLISH

cious, no one that he is covetous. The blind at least ask for a guide; we go astray of our own accord. 'I am not ambitious,' we say, 'but in Rome one cannot live otherwise. I am not extravagant, but the city demands great expense. It is not my fault if I am irascible; if I have not yet settled on any fixed way of life, it is the fault of youth.' Let us not look outside ourselves for our ailment: it is within us, planted in our vitals. And the very fact that we do not feel we are sick makes the cure harder.

If we do not begin early to tend ourselves, when will we have dealt with so many wounds and so many ills? Yet we have a very sweet medicine in philosophy: with the others, we feel the pleasure only after the cure; this one pleases and cures at the same time." That is what Seneca says, and he has carried me away from my subject; but there is profit in the exchange.

3 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius 50; Harpaste was a female household jester.

II.26 Of Thumbs

Des pouces

A brief gathering of ancient lore about thumbs: their names, their role in oaths and spectacles, and their deliberate mutilation.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.26.1	TACITVS recite que parmy certains Roys barbares, pour faire vne obligation asseurée, leur maniere estoit, de joindre estroictement leurs mains droites l'vne à l'autre, et s'entrelasser les pouces: et quand à force de les presser le sang en estoit monté au bout, ils les blessoient de quelque legere pointe, et puis se les entresuçoient.	Tacitus relates that among certain barbarian kings, to make a binding pledge, their custom was to clasp their right hands tightly together and interlace their thumbs; and when by dint of squeezing the blood had risen to the tips, they pricked them with some light point and then sucked each other's.[1]
2.26.2	Les medecins disent, que les pouces sont les maistres doigts de la main, et que leur etymologie Latine vient de pollere. Les Grecs l'appellent αντιχειρ, comme qui diroit vne autre main. Et il semble que par fois les Latins les prennent aussi en ce sens, de main entiere: Sed nec vocibus excitata blandis, / Molli pollice nec rogata, surgit.	Physicians say that the thumbs are the master fingers of the hand, and that their Latin name comes from pollere. The Greeks call it αντιχειρ, as if to say "another hand." And it seems that the Latins sometimes also take them in this sense, for the whole hand: But neither roused by coaxing words / nor urged by a gentle thumb, does it rise.[2]
2.26.3	C'estoit à Rome vne signification de faueur, de comprimer et baisser les pouces: Fautor vtroque tuum laudabit pollice ludum: et de desfaueur de les hausser et contourner au dehors: Conuerso pollice vulgi, / Quemlibet occidunt populariter.	In Rome it was a sign of favor to press down and lower the thumbs: Your backer will praise your game with both thumbs; and of disfavor to raise them and turn them outward: When the crowd turns its thumb, / they kill whomever the people please.[3]
2.26.4	Les Romains dispensoient de la guerre, ceux qui estoient blessez au pouce, comme s'ils n'auoient plus la prise des armes assez ferme. Auguste confisqua les biens à vn Cheualier Romain, qui auoit par malice couppé les pouces à deux siens ieunes enfans, pour les excuser d'aller aux armées: et auant luy, le Senat du temps de la guerre Italique, auoit condamné Caius Vatienus à prison perpetuelle, et luy auoit confisqué tous ses biens, pour s'estre à escient couppé le pouce de la main gauche, pour s'exempter de ce voyage.	The Romans exempted from war those who were wounded in the thumb, as if they no longer had a firm enough grip on their weapons. Augustus confiscated the property of a Roman knight who had maliciously cut off the thumbs of two of his young children to excuse them from serving in the armies. And before him, the Senate, at the time of the Italic War, had condemned Caius Vatienus to life imprisonment and confiscated all his property for having deliberately cut off the thumb of his left hand to exempt himself from that campaign.
2.26.5	Quelqu'vn, dont il ne me souuient point, ayant gaigné vne bataille nauale, fit coupper les pouces à ses ennemis vaincus pour leur oster le moyen de combattre et de tirer	Someone, I do not remember who, having won a naval battle, had the thumbs of his defeated enemies cut off, to take away their means of fighting

1 Tacitus, Annals XII, on the kings of Armenia and Iberia (in the Caucasus).
2 Latin pollex, "thumb," was derived from pollere, "to be strong." The verse is from Martial, Epigrams.
3 Horace, Epistles; then Juvenal, Satires.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	la rame. Les Atheniens les firent coupper aux Æginetes, pour leur oster la preference en l'art de marine.	and of pulling an oar. The Athenians had them cut off the Aeginetans, to take away their superiority in seamanship.
2.26.6	En Lacedemone le maistre chastioit les enfans en leur mordant le pouce.	In Sparta the schoolmaster punished children by biting their thumbs.

II.27 Cowardice, the Mother of Cruelty

Coüardise mere de la cruauté
Montaigne traces cruelty to cowardice and fear, from tyrants who weep easily to duelists who rely on fencing skill instead of courage.

FRENCH

2.27.1 I'AY souuent ouy dire, que la coüardise est mere de la cruauté: et si ay par experience apperçeu, que cette aigreur, et aspreté de courage malitieux et inhumain, s'accompaigne coustumierement de mollesse feminine. I'en ay veu des plus cruels, subiets à pleurer aiséement, et pour des causes friuoles. Alexandre tyran de Pheres, ne pouuoit souffrir d'ouyr au theatre le ieu des tragedies, de peur que ses cytoyens ne le vissent gemir aux malheurs d'Hecuba, et d'Andromache, luy qui sans pitié, faisoit cruellement meurtrir tant de gens tous les iours. Seroit-ce foiblesse d'ame qui les rendist ainsi ployables à toutes extremitez? La vaillance, de qui c'est l'effect de s'exercer seulement contre la resistence, Nec nisi bellantis gaudet ceruice iuuenci, s'arreste à voir l'ennemy à sa mercy.

Mais la pusillanimité, pour dire qu'elle est aussi de la feste, n'ayant peu se mesler à ce premier rolle, prend pour sa part le second, du massacre et du sang. Les meurtres des victoires, s'exercent ordinairement par le peuple, et par les officiers du bagage. Et ce qui fait voir tant de cruautez inouies aux guerres populaires, c'est que cette canaille de vulgaire s'aguerrit, et se gendarme, à s'ensanglanter iusques aux coudes, et deschiqueter vn corps à ses pieds, n'ayant resentiment d'autre vaillance. Et lupus et turpes instant morientibus vrsi, / Et quæcunque minor nobilitate fera est. Comme les chiens coüards, qui deschirent en la maison, et mordent les peaux des bestes sauuages, qu'ils n'ont osé attaquer aux champs.

Qu'est-ce qui faict en ce temps, nos querelles toutes mortelles? et que là où nos peres auoyent quelque degré de vengeance, nous commençons à cette heure par le

ENGLISH

I have often heard it said that cowardice is the mother of cruelty. And I have indeed noticed by experience that this bitterness and harshness of a malicious and inhuman heart is usually accompanied by a spineless softness. I have seen some of the cruelest men prone to weep easily, and for trivial reasons. Alexander, tyrant of Pherae, could not bear to watch tragedies performed in the theater, for fear his citizens would see him groan at the misfortunes of Hecuba and Andromache—he who pitilessly had so many people cruelly murdered every day. Could it be weakness of soul that makes them so pliable to every extreme? Valor, whose nature is to exercise itself only against resistance—Nor does it delight except in the neck of a bullock that fights back—stops when it sees the enemy at its mercy.[1]

But cowardice, so as to say that it too was at the party, having been unable to take part in that first role, takes for its share the second, that of massacre and blood. The killings that follow victories are usually carried out by the common people and the officers of the baggage train. And what causes so many unheard-of cruelties to be seen in popular wars is that this rabble of common people plays the warrior and the man-at-arms by bloodying itself up to the elbows and hacking to pieces a body at its feet, having no feeling for any other kind of valor. Both the wolf and the foul bears set upon the dying, / and every beast of lesser nobility. Like cowardly dogs, which in the house tear and bite the skins of wild beasts they did not dare attack in the fields.[2]

What is it that makes all our quarrels mortal nowadays? And that, where our fathers had some gradation in revenge, we now begin with the last

1 Alexander ruled Pherae in Thessaly in the 4th century BC. The verse is from Claudian, describing a lion.
2 Ovid, Tristia.

FRENCH

dernier: et ne se parle d'arriuée que de tuer? Qu'est-ce, si ce n'est coüardise?

2.27.2 Chacun sent bien, qu'il y a plus de brauerie et desdain, à battre son ennemy, qu'à l'acheuer, et de le faire bouquer, que de le faire mourir. D'auantage que l'appetit de vengeance s'en assouuit et contente mieux: car elle ne vise qu'à donner ressentiment de soy. Voyla pourquoy, nous n'attaquons pas vne beste, ou vne pierre, quand elle nous blesse, d'autant qu'elles sont incapables de sentir nostre reuenche. Et de tuer vn homme, c'est le mettre à l'abry de nostre offence.

Et tout ainsi comme Bias crioit à vn meschant homme, le sçay que tost ou tard tu en seras puny, mais ie crains que ie ne le voye pas: et plaignoit les Orchomeniens, de ce que la penitence que Lyciscus eut de la trahison contre eux commise, venoit en saison, qu'il n'y auoit personne de reste, de ceux qui en auoient esté interessez, et ausquels deuoit toucher le plaisir de cette penitence. Tout ainsin est à plaindre la vengeance, quand celuy enuers lequel elle s'employe, pert le moyen de la souffrir. Car comme le vengeur y veut voir, pour en tirer du plaisir, il faut que celuy sur lequel il se venge, y voye aussi, pour en receuoir du desplaisir, et de la repentance.

Il s'en repentira, disons nous. Et pour luy auoir donné d'une pistolade en la teste, estimons nous qu'il s'en repente? Au rebours, si nous nous en prenons garde, nous trouuerons qu'il nous fait la mouë en tombant. Il ne nous en sçait pas seulement mauuais gré, c'est bien loing de s'en repentir. Et luy prestons le plus fauorable de touts les offices de la vie, qui est de le faire mourir promptement et insensiblement. Nous sommes à conniller, à trotter, et à fuir les officiers de la iustice, qui nous suyuent: et luy est en repos. Le tuer, est bon pour euiter l'offence à venir, non pour venger celle qui est faicte.

C'est vne action plus de crainte, que de brauerie: de precaution, que de courage: de defense, que d'entreprinse. Il est apparent que nous quittons par là, et la vraye fin de la vengeance, et le soing de nostre reputation. Nous craignons, s'il demeure en vie, qu'il nous recharge d'vne pareille. Ce n'est pas contre luy, c'est pour toy, que tu t'en deffais.

2.27.3 Au Royaume de Narsingue cet expedient nous demeureroit inutile. Là, non seulement les gents de guerre, mais aussi les artisans, demeslent leurs querelles degree, and from the very outset there is talk of nothing but killing? What is it, if not cowardice?

ENGLISH

Everyone can feel that there is more boldness and disdain in beating one's enemy than in finishing him off, and in making him knuckle under than in making him die. Moreover, the appetite for revenge is better satisfied and contented that way, for revenge aims only at making itself felt. That is why we do not attack an animal or a stone when it hurts us: they are incapable of feeling our revenge. And to kill a man is to put him beyond the reach of our injury.

Bias cried out to a wicked man, "I know that sooner or later you will be punished for it, but I fear I shall not see it." And he pitied the Orchomenians because the repentance Lyciscus felt for the treachery he had committed against them came at a time when no one was left of those who had been harmed by it, and to whom the pleasure of that repentance should have fallen. In just the same way revenge is to be pitied when the man against whom it is directed loses the means of feeling it. For just as the avenger wants to see it, so as to get pleasure from it, so the man on whom he takes revenge must see it too, so as to receive pain and repentance from it.

"He'll be sorry for it," we say. And because we have put a pistol shot in his head, do we think he is sorry? On the contrary, if we pay attention, we will find that he is making a face at us as he falls. He does not even bear us a grudge for it, let alone repent of it. And we do him the kindest of all life's services, which is to make him die quickly and without feeling. We are left hiding in burrows, scurrying about and fleeing the officers of justice who are after us, while he is at rest. Killing him is good for avoiding a future injury, not for avenging one already done.

It is an act more of fear than of bravado, of precaution than of courage, of defense than of attack. It is plain that by it we abandon both the true end of revenge and the care of our reputation. We fear that if he stays alive he will come back at us with the same. It is not against him, it is for your own sake, that you get rid of him.

In the kingdom of Narsinga this expedient would be of no use to us. There not only soldiers but artisans too settle their quarrels with the sword. The à coups d'espée. Le Roy ne refuse point le camp à qui se veut battre: et assiste, quand ce sont personnes de qualité: estrenant le victorieux d'vne chaisne d'or: mais pour laquelle conquerir, le premier, à qui il en prend enuie, peut venir aux armes auec celuy qui la porte. Et pour s'estre desfaict d'vn combat, il en a plusieurs sur les bras.	king never refuses a field to anyone who wants to fight, and he attends when they are persons of rank, presenting the victor with a gold chain. But to win that chain, the first man who feels like it may come to arms with the one who wears it. And by getting clear of one fight, he has several on his hands.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.27.4	Si nous pensions par vertu estre tousiours maistres de nostre ennemy, et le gourmander à nostre poste, nous serions bien marris qu'il nous eschappast, comme il faict en mourant. Nous voulons vaincre plus seurement qu'honorablement. Et cherchons plus la fin, que la gloire, en nostre querelle.	If we thought that by our valor we would always be masters of our enemy and could lord it over him at our pleasure, we would be very sorry to have him escape us, as he does by dying. We want to win more safely than honorably. And in our quarrel we seek the end rather than the glory.
2.27.5	Asinius Pollio, pour vn honneste homme moins excusable, representa vne erreur pareille: qui ayant escript des inuectiues contre Plancus, attendoit qu'il fust mort, pour les publier. C'estoit faire la figue à vn aueugle et dire des pouïlles à vn sourd, et offenser vn homme sans sentiment plustost que d'encourir le hazard de son ressentiment. Aussi disoit on pour luy, que ce n'estoit qu'aux lutins de luitter les morts. Celuy qui attend à veoir trespasser l'autheur, duquel il veut combattre les escrits, que dit-il, sinon qu'il est foible et noisif? On disoit à Aristote, que quelqu'vn auoit mesdit de luy: Qu'il face plus, dit-il, qu'il me fouëtte, pourueu que ie n'y soy pas.	Asinius Pollio, less excusable in that he was an honorable man, displayed a similar error: having written invectives against Plancus, he waited until Plancus was dead to publish them. That was making rude gestures at a blind man and hurling insults at a deaf one, and offending a man without feeling rather than running the risk of his resentment. So it was said on Plancus's behalf that only goblins wrestle with the dead. The man who waits to see an author die before attacking his writings—what is he saying, except that he is weak and quarrelsome? Aristotle was told that someone had spoken ill of him. "Let him do more," he said; "let him whip me, so long as I am not there."[3]

SECONDS IN DUELS

Bringing seconds into duels is a kind of cowardice; Montaigne's brother was jailed in Rome for it.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.27.6	Nos peres se contentoyent de reuencher vne iniure par vn démenti, vn démenti par vn coup, et ainsi par ordre. Ils estoient assez valeureux pour ne craindre pas leur aduersaire, viuant, et outragé. Nous tremblons de frayeur, tant que nous le voyons en pieds. Et qu'il soit ainsi, nostre belle pratique d'auiourdhuy, porte elle pas de poursuyure à mort, aussi bien celuy que nous auons offencé, que celuy qui nous a offencez? C'est aussi vne espece de lascheté, qui a introduit en nos combats singuliers, cet vsage, de nous accompagner de seconds, et tiers, et quarts. C'estoit anciennement des duels, ce sont à cette heure rencontres, et batailles. La solitude faisoit peur aux premiers qui l'inuenterent: Quum in se cuique minimum fiduciæ esset.	Our fathers were content to repay an insult by giving the lie, the lie by a blow, and so on in order. They were valiant enough not to fear their adversary when he was alive and outraged. We tremble with fright as long as we see him on his feet. And to prove that this is so, does not our fine present-day practice require us to pursue to the death the man we have offended just as much as the man who has offended us? It is also a sort of cowardice that has brought into our single combats this custom of taking along seconds, and thirds, and fourths. In the old days these were duels; now they are skirmishes and battles.

3 Lucius Munatius Plancus was a Roman statesman of the late Republic.

FRENCH

Car naturellement quelque compagnie que ce soit, apporte confort, et soulagement au danger. On se seruoit anciennement de personnes tierces, pour garder qu'il ne s'y fist desordre et desloyauté, et pour tesmoigner de la fortune du combat. Mais depuis qu'on a pris ce train, qu'ils s'engagent eux mesmes, quiconque y est conuié, ne peut honnestement s'y tenir comme spectateur, de peur qu'on ne luy attribue, que ce soit faute ou d'affection, ou de cœur.

Outre l'iniustice d'vne telle action, et vilenie, d'engager à la protection de vostre honneur, autre valeur et force que la vostre, ie trouue du desaduantage à vn homme de bien, et qui pleinement se fie de soy, d'aller mesler sa fortune, à celle d'vn second: chacun court assez de hazard pour soy, sans le courir encore pour vn autre: et a assez à faire à s'asseurer en sa propre vertu, pour la deffence de sa vie, sans commettre chose si chere en mains tierces. Car s'il n'a esté expressement marchandé au contraire, des quatre, c'est vne partie liée. Si vostre second est à terre, vous en auez deux sus les bras, auec raison.

Et de dire que c'est supercherie, elle l'est voirement: comme de charger bien armé, vn homme qui n'a qu'vn tronçon d'espée; ou tout sain, vn homme qui est desia fort blessé. Mais si ce sont auantages, que vous ayez gaigné en combatant, vous vous en pouuez seruir sans reproche. La disparité et inegalité ne se poise et considere, que de l'estat en quoy se commence la meslée: du reste prenez vous en à la Fortune. Et quand vous en aurez tout seul, trois sur vous, vos deux compaignons s'estant laissez tuer, on ne vous fait non plus de tort, que ie ferois à la guerre, de donner vn coup d'espee à l'ennemy, que ie verrois attaché à l'vn des nostres, de pareil auantage.

La nature de la societé porte, où il y a trouppe contre trouppe (comme où nostre Duc d'Orleans, deffia le Roy d'Angleterre Henry, cent contre cent, trois cents contre autant, comme les Argiens contre les Lacedemoniens: trois à trois, comme les Horatiens contre les Curiatiens) que la multitude de chasque part, n'est considerée que pour vn homme seul. Par tout où il y a compagnie, le hazard y est confus et meslé.

ENGLISH

Solitude frightened the first men who invented this: Since each had very little confidence in himself.

For naturally any company whatever brings comfort and relief in danger. In the old days third persons were used to make sure that no disorder or foul play took place, and to bear witness to the outcome of the combat. But since the practice has taken hold that they join in themselves, whoever is invited cannot honorably stand by as a spectator, for fear it be put down to a lack either of affection or of courage.

Besides the injustice and baseness of such an action—committing to the protection of your honor a valor and strength other than your own—I find it a disadvantage for a good man, who fully trusts himself, to go and mix his fortune with that of a second. Each man runs enough risk for himself without running it for another as well. And he has enough to do to rely on his own valor in defense of his life, without putting so precious a thing into a third party's hands. For unless it has been expressly agreed otherwise, the four of them make one combined match. If your second is down, you have two on your hands, and rightly so.

And as for saying that this is foul play—so it is indeed, like charging fully armed at a man who has only a stump of a sword, or, unhurt, at a man who is already badly wounded. But if these are advantages you have won in fighting, you may use them without reproach. Disparity and inequality are weighed and considered only according to the state in which the fight begins; for the rest, blame Fortune. And when you alone have three upon you, your two companions having let themselves be killed, you are done no more wrong than I would do in war by running my sword into an enemy I saw grappling with one of our men, with a like advantage.

Where there is troop against troop—as when our Duke of Orléans challenged King Henry of England, a hundred against a hundred; three hundred against as many, like the Argives against the Spartans; three against three, like the Horatii against the Curiatii—the nature of such a fellowship requires that the number on each side be regarded only as one single man. Wherever there is company, the risk is pooled and mingled.[4]

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.27.7 I'ay interest domestique à ce discours. Car mon frere sieur de Matecoulom, fut conuié à Rome, à seconder vn Gentil-homme qu'il ne cognoissoit guere, lequel estoit deffendeur, et appellé par vn autre. En ce combat, il se trouua de fortune auoir en teste, vn qui luy estoit plus voisin et plus cogneu (ie voudrois qu'on me fist raison de ces loix d'honneur, qui vont si souuent choquant et troublant celles de la raison). Apres s'estre desfaict de son homme, voyant les deux maistres de la querelle, en pieds encores, et entiers, il alla descharger son compaignon. Que pouuoit il moins? deuoit-il se tenir coy, et regarder deffaire, si le sort l'eust ainsi voulu, celuy pour la deffence duquel, il estoit là venu?	I have a family interest in this discussion. For my brother, the Sieur de Mattecoulon, was invited in Rome to act as second to a gentleman he hardly knew, who was the defendant, having been challenged by another. In this combat he happened by chance to find himself facing a man who was closer to him and better known to him. (I wish someone would explain to me these laws of honor, which so often go clashing with and disturbing those of reason.) Having disposed of his man, and seeing the two principals in the quarrel still on their feet and unhurt, he went to relieve his companion. What less could he do? Should he have kept still and watched the defeat, if fate had so willed it, of the man he had come there to defend? [5]
Ce qu'il auoit faict iusques alors, ne seruoit rien à la besongne: la querelle estoit indecise. La courtoisie que vous pouuez, et certes deuez faire à vostre ennemy, quand vous l'auez reduict en mauuais termes, et à quelque grand desaduantage, ie ne vois pas comment vous la puissiez faire, quand il va de l'interest d'autruy, où vous n'estes que suiuant, où la dispute n'est pas vostre. Il ne pouuoit estre ny iuste, ny courtois, au hazard de celuy auquel il s'estoit presté. Aussi fut-il deliuré des prisons d'Italie, par vne bien soudaine et solemne recommandation de nostre Roy. Indiscrette nation.	What he had done until then had done nothing for the business: the quarrel was undecided. The courtesy you can, and certainly should, show your enemy when you have brought him to a bad pass and put him at some great disadvantage—I do not see how you can show it when another man's interest is at stake, where you are only a follower, where the dispute is not yours. He could be neither just nor courteous at the risk of the man to whom he had lent himself. And so he was freed from the prisons of Italy by a very prompt and solemn intercession from our king. Reckless nation!

LEARNING TO FENCE

The French go to Italy to learn fencing, a skill unworthy of true valor and useless in war.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Nous ne nous contentons pas de faire sçauoir nos vices, et folies, au monde, par reputation: nous allons aux nations estrangeres, pour les leur faire voir en presence. Mettez trois François aux deserts de Lybie, ils ne seront pas vn mois ensemble, sans se harceler et esgratigner. Vous diriez que cette peregrination, est vne partie dressée, pour donner aux estrangers le plaisir de nos tragedies: et le plus souuent à tels, qui s'esiouyssent de nos maux, et qui s'en moquent. Nous allons apprendre en Italie à escrimer: et l'exerçons aux despends de nos vies, auant que de le sçauoir. Si faudroit-il suyuant l'ordre de la discipline, mettre la theorique auant la pratique. Nous	We are not content to make our vices and follies known to the world by report; we go to foreign nations to show them off in person. Put three Frenchmen in the deserts of Libya, and they will not be together a month without harassing and scratching one another. You would think these travels of ours were a show put on to give foreigners the pleasure of our tragedies—and most often to those who rejoice in our misfortunes and laugh at them. We go to Italy to learn fencing, and we practice it at the cost of our lives before we know how. Yet the proper order of instruction would re-

4 Louis, Duke of Orléans, challenged Henry IV of England in 1402. In legend the three Roman Horatii brothers fought the three Curiatii of Alba to decide a war.

5 Bertrand de Montaigne, Sieur de Mattecoulon, was Montaigne's youngest brother; the duel took place in 1583.

FRENCH

trahissons nostre apprentissage: Primitiæ iuuenum miseræ, bellique futuri / Dura rudimenta!

2.27.8 Ie sçay bien que c'est vn art vtile à sa fin (au duel des deux Princes, cousins germains, en Hespaigne, le plus vieil, dit Tite Liue, par l'addresse des armes et par ruse, surmonta facilement les forces estourdies du plus ieune) et comme i'ay cognu par experience, duquel la cognoissance a grossi le cœur à aucuns, outre leur mesure naturelle. Mais ce n'est pas proprement vertu, puis qu'elle tire son appuy de l'addresse, et qu'elle prend autre fondement que de soy-mesme. L'honneur des combats consiste en la ialousie du courage, non de la science.

Et pourtant ay-ie veu quelqu'vn de mes amis, renommé pour grand maistre en cet exercice, choisir en ses querelles, des armes, qui luy ostassent le moyen de cet aduantage: et lesquelles dépendoient entierement de la Fortune, et de l'asseurance: à fin qu'on n'attribuast sa victoire, plustost à son escrime, qu'à sa valeur. Et en mon enfance, la noblesse fuyoit la reputation de bon escrimeur comme iniurieuse: et se desroboit pour l'apprendre, comme mestier de subtilité, desrogeant à la vraye et naïfue vertu.

Non schiuar, non parar, non ritirarsi,
Voglion costor, nè qui destrezza ha parte;
Non danno i colpi finti hor pieni, hor scarsi,
Toglie l'ira e il furor l'vso de l'arte,
Odi le spade horribilmente vrtarsi
A mezzo il ferro, il piè d'orma non parte,
Sempre è il piè fermo, é la man sempre in moto;
Nè scende taglio in van, ne punta a voto.

2.27.9 Les butes, les tournois, les barrieres, l'image des combats guerriers, estoyent l'exercice de nos peres. Cet autre exercice, est d'autant moins noble, qu'il ne regarde qu'vne fin priuée: qui nous apprend à nous entreruyner, contre les loix et la iustice: et qui en toute façon, produict tousiours des effects dommageables. Il est bien plus digne et mieux seant, de s'exercer en choses qui asseurent, non qui offencent nostre police: qui regardent la publique seurté et la gloire commune. Publius Rutilius Consus fut le premier, qui instruisit le soldat, à manier ses armes par adresse et science, qui conioignit l'art à la vertu: non pour l'vsage de querelle priuée, ce fut pour la guerre et querelles du peuple Romain. Escrime populaire et ciuile.

ENGLISH

quire us to put theory before practice. We betray our apprenticeship: Wretched first fruits of youth, harsh schooling / for the war to come![6]

I know well that it is a skill useful for its purpose (in the duel between the two princes, first cousins, in Spain, the elder, says Livy, easily overcame the reckless strength of the younger by skill in arms and by cunning), and, as I have learned by experience, one whose mastery has swelled the courage of some men beyond its natural measure. But it is not properly valor, since it draws its support from skill and rests on some foundation other than itself. The honor of combat lies in rivalry of courage, not of knowledge.

And so I have seen one of my friends, renowned as a great master of this exercise, choose for his quarrels weapons that deprived him of the means of this advantage, weapons that depended entirely on Fortune and on steadiness, so that his victory would not be put down to his fencing rather than to his valor. And in my childhood the nobility shunned the reputation of being a good fencer as an insult, and learned it in secret, as a trade of cunning, unworthy of true and natural valor.

These men will not dodge, nor parry, nor give ground, nor has dexterity any part here;
they deal no feinting blows, now full, now light;
rage and fury take away the use of skill.
Hear the swords clash horribly blade on blade; no foot stirs from its print, the foot is ever firm, the hand ever moving;
no cut falls in vain, no thrust into empty air.[7]

Shooting at the butts, tournaments, jousting at the barriers—the image of warlike combat—were the exercises of our fathers. This other exercise is all the less noble in that it looks only to a private end. It teaches us to destroy one another, against the laws and justice, and in every way it always produces harmful effects. It is far more worthy and fitting to exercise ourselves in things that strengthen our government rather than harm it, things that look to public safety and the common glory. Publius Rutilius Consus was the first to teach the soldier to handle his weapons with skill and knowledge, who joined art to valor—not for

6 Virgil, Aeneid.
7 Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

use in private quarrels, but for war and the quarrels of the Roman people. Public and civic fencing.[8]

Et outre l'exemple de Cæsar, qui ordonna aux siens de tirer principalement au visage des gensdarmes de Pompeius en la bataille de Pharsale: mille autres chefs de guerre se sont ainsin aduisez, d'inuenter nouuelle forme d'armes, nouuelle forme de frapper et de se couurir, selon le besoing de l'affaire present.

And besides the example of Caesar, who ordered his men to strike chiefly at the faces of Pompey's horsemen at the battle of Pharsalus, a thousand other commanders have likewise thought of inventing new kinds of weapons, new ways of striking and of covering themselves, according to the needs of the business at hand.

2.27.10 Mais tout ainsi que Philopœmen condamna la lucte, en quoy il excelloit, d'autant que les preparatifs qu'on employoit à cet exercice, estoient diuers à ceux, qui appartiennent à la discipline militaire, à laquelle seule il estimoit les gens d'honneur, se deuoir amuser: il me semble aussi, que cette adresse à quoy on façonne ses membres, ces destours et mouuements, à quoy on dresse la ieunesse, en cette nouuelle eschole, sont non seulement inutiles, mais contraires plustost, et dommageables à l'vsage du combat militaire. Aussi y employent communement noz gents, des armes particulieres, et peculierement destinées à cet vsage. Et i'ay veu, qu'on ne trouuoit guere bon, qu'vn Gentilhomme, conuié à l'espée et au poignard, s'offrist en equipage de gendarme.

Philopoemen condemned wrestling, at which he excelled, because the training used for that exercise was different from what belongs to military discipline, to which alone he thought men of honor should devote themselves. In just the same way it seems to me that this dexterity to which we shape our limbs, these dodges and movements in which young men are trained in this new school, are not only useless but rather contrary and harmful to the practice of military combat. And so our people commonly use special weapons for it, intended specifically for that purpose. And I have seen it thought hardly proper for a gentleman challenged to sword and dagger to present himself in the equipment of a man-at-arms.

Ny qu'vn autre offrist d'y aller auec sa cape, au lieu du poignard. Il est digne de consideration, que Lachez, en Platon, parlant d'vn apprentissage de manier les armes, conforme au nostre, dit n'auoir iamais de cette eschole veu sortir nul grand homme de guerre, et nommément des maistres d'icelle. Quant à ceux là, nostre experience en dit bien autant. Du reste, aumoins pouuons nous tenir que ce sont suffisances de nulle relation et correspondance. Et en l'institution des enfants de sa police, Platon interdit les arts de mener les poings, introduittes par Amycus et Epeius: et de lucter, par Antæus et Cecyo: par ce qu'elles ont autre but, que de rendre la ieunesse apte au seruice bellique, et n'y conferent point.

Or for another to offer to go with his cloak instead of a dagger. It is worth noting that Laches, in Plato, speaking of a training in handling weapons like ours, says he has never seen any great soldier come out of that school, and especially not from among its masters. As for those masters, our experience says as much. For the rest, at least we can hold that these are abilities with no relation or correspondence to each other. And in the education of the children of his commonwealth, Plato forbids the arts of fighting with the fists, introduced by Amycus and Epeius, and of wrestling, introduced by Antaeus and Cercyon, because they have an aim other than making the young fit for military service, and contribute nothing to it.[9]

Mais ie m'en vois vn peu bien à gauche de mon theme.

But I am drifting rather a long way off course from my theme.

8 Publius Rutilius Rufus was consul in 105 BC; "Consus" is Montaigne's slip for "consul."
9 Plato, Laches and Laws.

WHY TYRANTS KILL

Fear makes tyrants cruel; Philip of Macedon's killings drive Theoxena to drown herself and her children.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.27.11	L'Empereur Maurice, estant aduerty par songes, et plusieurs prognostiques, qu'vn Phocas, soldat pour lors incognu, le deuoit tuer: demandoit à son gendre Philippus, qui estoit ce Phocas, sa nature, ses conditions et ses mœurs: et comme entre autres choses Philippus luy dict, qu'il estoit lasche et craintif, l'Empereur conclud incontinent par là, qu'il estoit doncq meurtrier et cruel. Qui rend les tyrans si sanguinaires? c'est le soing de leur seurté, et que leur lasche cœur, ne leur fournit d'autres moyens de s'asseurer, qu'en exterminant ceux qui les peuuent offencer, iusques aux femmes, de peur d'vne esgratigneure.	The Emperor Maurice, warned by dreams and several omens that one Phocas, a soldier then unknown, was to kill him, asked his son-in-law Philippicus who this Phocas was, and about his nature, character and habits. And when, among other things, Philippicus told him that he was cowardly and fearful, the emperor at once concluded from this that he must therefore be murderous and cruel. What makes tyrants so bloodthirsty? It is concern for their own safety, and the fact that their cowardly hearts give them no other means of securing themselves than by exterminating those who can harm them—even women, for fear of a scratch.[10]
	Cuncta ferit, dum cuncta timet. Les premieres cruautez s'exercent pour elles mesmes, de là s'engendre la crainte d'vne iuste reuanche, qui produict apres vne enfileure de nouuelles cruautez, pour les estouffer les vnes par les autres. Philippus Roy de Macedoine, celuy qui eust tant de fusées à demesler auec le peuple Romain, agité de l'horreur de meurtres commis par son ordonnance: ne se pouuant resoudre contre tant de familles, en diuers temps offensées: print party de se saisir de touts les enfants de ceux qu'il auoit faict tuer, pour de iour en iour les perdre l'vn apres l'autre, et ainsin establir son repos.	He strikes at everything, because he fears everything. The first cruelties are committed for their own sake. From them is born the fear of a just revenge, which then produces a string of new cruelties, to smother the one with the other. Philip, King of Macedon—the one who had so many tangles to unravel with the Roman people—troubled by the horror of the murders committed by his order, and seeing no way to secure himself against so many families injured at various times, decided to seize all the children of those he had had killed, so as to do away with them day by day, one after another, and thus establish his peace.[11]
2.27.12	Les belles matieres siesent bien en quelque place qu'on les seme. Moy, qui ay plus de soin du poids et vtilité des discours, que de leur ordre et suite, ne doy pas craindre de loger icy vn peu à l'escart, vne tres-belle histoire. Quand elles sont si riches de leur propre beauté, et se peuuent seules trop soustenir, ie me contente du bout d'vn poil, pour les ioindre à mon propos.	Fine material sits well wherever it is sown. I, who care more about the weight and usefulness of my reflections than about their order and sequence, need not fear to lodge a very fine story here, a little off to one side. When such stories are so rich in their own beauty and can more than stand on their own, I am content with the end of a hair to tie them to my subject.
2.27.13	Entre les autres condamnez par Philippus, auoit esté vn Herodicus, Prince des Thessaliens. Apres luy, il auoit encore depuis faict mourir ses deux gendres, laissants chacun vn fils bien petit. Theoxena et Archo estoyent les deux vefues. Theoxena ne peut estre induicte à se remarier, en estant fort poursuyuie. Archo espousa Poris,	Among others condemned by Philip had been one Herodicus, a prince of the Thessalians. After him, Philip had later put to death his two sons-in-law as well, each of whom left a very small son. Theoxena and Archo were the two widows. Theoxena could not be induced to remarry, though she was 10 Maurice, Byzantine emperor, was overthrown and killed by Phocas in AD 602.

11 Claudian, Against Eutropius.

FRENCH

le premier homme d'entre les Æniens, et en eut nombre d'enfants, qu'elle laissa tous en bas aage. Theoxena, espoinçonnée d'vne charité maternelle enuers ses nepueux, pour les auoir en sa conduitte et protection, espousa Poris. Voicy venir la proclamation de l'edict du Roy.

Cette courageuse mere, se deffiant et de la cruauté de Philippus, et de la licence de ses satellites enuers cette belle et tendre ieunesse, osa dire, qu'elle les tueroit plustost de ses mains, que de les rendre. Poris effrayé de cette protestation, luy promet de les desrober, et emporter à Athenes, en la garde d'aucuns siens hostes fidelles. Ils prennent occasion d'vne feste annuelle, qui se celebroit à Ænie en l'honneur d'Æneas, et s'y en vont. Ayans assisté le iour aux ceremonies et banquet publique, la nuict ils s'escoulent en vn vaisseau preparé, pour gaigner païs par mer. Le vent leur fut contraire: et se trouuans l'endemain à la veuë de la terre, d'où ils auoyent desmaré, furent suyuis par les gardes des ports.

Au ioindre, Poris s'embesoignant à haster les mariniers pour la fuitte, Theoxena forcenée d'amour et de vengeance, se reiettant à sa premiere proposition, fait apprest d'armes et de poison, et les presentant à leur veuë: Or sus mes enfants, la mort est meshuy le seul moyen de vostre defense et liberté, et sera matiere aux Dieux de leur saincte iustice: ces espées traictes, ces couppes pleines vous en ouurent l'entrée. Courage. Et toy mon fils, qui es plus grand, empoigne ce fer, pour mourir de la mort plus forte. Ayants d'vn costé cette vigoureuse conseillere, les ennemis de l'autre, à leur gorge, ils coururent de furie chacun à ce qui luy fut le plus à main. Et demy morts furent iettez en la mer.

Theoxena fiere d'auoir si glorieusement pourueu à la seureté de tous ses enfants, accollant chaudement son mary: Suyuons ces garçons, mon amy, et iouyssons de mesme sepulture auec eux. Et se tenants ainsin embrassez, se precipiterent: de maniere que le vaisseau fut ramené à bord, vuide de ses maistres.

ENGLISH

much courted. Archo married Poris, the leading man among the Aenians, and had a number of children by him, all of whom she left very young. Theoxena, spurred by a mother's love for her nephews, married Poris so as to have them under her guidance and protection. Then came the proclamation of the king's edict.

This courageous mother, distrusting both Philip's cruelty and the license of his henchmen toward these fine and tender young people, dared to say that she would kill them with her own hands rather than hand them over. Poris, alarmed at this declaration, promised her to steal them away and take them to Athens, into the keeping of some faithful friends of his. They seized the occasion of an annual festival held at Aenia in honor of Aeneas, and went there. Having attended the ceremonies and the public banquet by day, at night they slipped away in a ship made ready to carry them to safety by sea. The wind was against them; and finding themselves the next day within sight of the land they had set out from, they were pursued by the harbor guards.

As the guards closed in, while Poris was busy urging the sailors on in their flight, Theoxena, frantic with love and vengeance, went back to her first resolve. She got weapons and poison ready and, setting them before the children's eyes, said: "Come now, my children, death is now the only means of your defense and your liberty, and it will give the gods matter for their holy justice. These drawn swords, these full cups, open the way to it for you. Courage! And you, my son, who are the eldest, take hold of this blade, to die the stronger death." With this vigorous counselor on one side and the enemy at their throats on the other, they rushed in a frenzy, each to whatever was nearest to hand. And half dead, they were thrown into the sea.

Theoxena, proud of having so gloriously provided for the safety of all her children, embraced her husband warmly: "Let us follow these boys, my love, and share the same grave with them." And holding each other thus, they threw themselves overboard, so that the ship was brought back to shore empty of its masters.

TORMENTS BEYOND DEATH

Everything beyond plain death is cruelty; Montaigne recalls atrocious tortures from history and his own century.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.27.14	Les tyrans pour faire tous les deux ensemble, et tuer, et faire sentir leur colere, ils ont employé toute leur suffisance, à trouuer moyen d'allonger la mort. Ils veulent que leurs ennemis s'en aillent, mais non pas si viste, qu'ils n'ayent loisir de sauourer leur vengeance. Là dessus ils sont en grand peine: car si les tourmens sont violents, ils sont cours: s'ils sont longs, ils ne sont pas assez douloureux à leur gré: les voyla à dispenser leurs engins. Nous en voyons mille exemples en l'antiquité; et ie ne sçay si sans y penser, nous ne retenons pas quelque trace de cette barbarie.	Tyrants, in order to do both things at once—kill and make their anger felt—have used all their ingenuity to find ways of drawing out death. They want their enemies to go, but not so fast that they themselves lack the leisure to savor their revenge. Here they are in great difficulty: for if the torments are violent, they are short; if they are long, they are not painful enough to suit them. So there they are, measuring out their devices. We see a thousand examples of this in antiquity; and I do not know whether, without realizing it, we do not retain some trace of this barbarism.
2.27.15	Tout ce qui est au delà de la mort simple, me semble pure cruauté. Nostre iustice ne peut esperer, que celuy que la crainte de mourir et d'estre decapité, ou pendu, ne gardera de faillir; en soit empesché, par l'imagination d'vn feu languissant, ou des tenailles, ou de la roue. Et ie ne sçay cependant, si nous les iettons au desespoir. Car en quel estat peut estre l'ame d'vn homme, attendant vingt-quatre heures la mort, brisé sur vne rouë, ou à la vieille façon cloué à vne croix?	Everything beyond plain death seems to me pure cruelty. Our justice cannot hope that a man whom the fear of dying, of being beheaded or hanged, will not keep from wrongdoing will be stopped by the thought of a slow fire, or pincers, or the wheel. And I do not know, meanwhile, whether we are not driving such men to despair. For what state can a man's soul be in, waiting twenty-four hours for death, broken on a wheel, or, in the old fashion, nailed to a cross?
	Iosephe recite, que pendant les guerres des Romains en Iudée, passant où lon auoit crucifié quelques Iuifs, trois iours y auoit, il recogneut trois de ses amis, et obtint de les oster de là; les deux moururent, dit-il, l'autre vescut encore depuis.	Josephus relates that during the Romans' wars in Judea, passing a place where some Jews had been crucified three days before, he recognized three of his friends and obtained leave to take them down. Two of them died, he says; the other lived on afterward.[12]
2.27.16	Chalcondyle homme de foy, aux memoires qu'il a laissé des choses aduenues de son temps, et pres de luy, recite pour extreme supplice, celuy que l'Empereur Mechmed pratiquoit souuent, de faire trancher les hommes en deux parts, par le faux du corps, à l'endroit du diaphragme, et d'vn seul coup de simeterre: d'où il arriuoit, qu'ils mourussent comme de deux morts à la fois: et voyoit-on, dit-il, l'vne et l'autre part pleine de vie, se demener long temps apres pressée de tourment. Ie n'estime pas, qu'il y eust grand'souffrance en ce mouuement. Les supplices plus hideux à voir, ne sont pas tousiours les plus forts à souffrir.	Chalcondyles, a trustworthy man, in the memoirs he left of the things that happened in his time and near him, relates as the most extreme punishment one that the Emperor Mehmed often practiced: having men cut in two through the waist, at the diaphragm, with a single stroke of the scimitar. As a result they died, as it were, two deaths at once; and one could see, he says, both parts, full of life, thrashing about for a long time afterward in torment. I do not think there was much suffering in that movement. The punishments most hideous to see are not always the hardest to bear.[13]
	Et trouue plus atroce ce que d'autres historiens en recitent contre des Seigneurs Epirotes, qu'il les feit	And I find more atrocious what other historians relate of his treatment of certain lords of Epirus:

12 The episode is in Josephus' Life.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	escorcher par le menu, d'vne dispensation si malicieusement ordonnée, que leur vie dura quinze iours à cette angoisse.	that he had them flayed bit by bit, in stages so maliciously arranged that their lives lasted fifteen days in that agony.
2.27.17	Et ces deux autres. Crœsus avant faict prendre vn Gentilhomme fauori de Pantaleon son frere, le mena en la boutique d'vn foullon, où il le feit gratter et carder, à coups de cardes et peignes de ce mestier, iusques à ce qu'il en mourut. George Sechel chef de ces paysans de Polongne, qui soubs tiltre de la Croysade, firent tant de maux, deffaict en battaille par le Vayuode de Transsiluanie, et prins, fut trois iours attaché nud sur vn cheualet; exposé à toutes les manieres de tourmens que chacun pouuoit apporter contre luy: pendant lequel temps on fit ieusner plusieurs autres prisonniers.	And these two others. Croesus, having had a gentleman who was a favorite of his brother Pantaleon seized, took him to a fuller's shop, where he had him scraped and carded with the cards and combs of that trade until he died. George Sechel, leader of those peasants of Poland who did so much harm under the name of the Crusade, was defeated in battle by the Voivode of Transylvania and captured. He was tied naked for three days on a wooden horse, exposed to every kind of torment that anyone could bring against him; during which time several other prisoners were made to fast.[14]
	En fin, luy viuant et voyant, on abbreuua de son sang Lucat son cher frere, et pour le salut duquel seul il prioit, tirant sur soy toute l'enuie de leurs meffaits: et fit on paistre vingt de ses plus fauoris Capitaines, deschirans à belles dents sa chair, et en engloutissants les morceaux. Le reste du corps, et parties du dedans, luy expiré, furent mises bouillir, qu'on fit manger à d'autres de sa suitte.	Finally, while he was still alive and watching, they made Lucat, his dear brother, drink his blood—Lucat, for whose safety alone he was pleading, drawing upon himself all the blame for their misdeeds. And they made twenty of his most favored captains feed on him, tearing his flesh with their teeth and swallowing the pieces. The rest of his body and his inner parts, once he had expired, were put to boil and given to others of his followers to eat.

13 Laonicus Chalcondyles was a 15th-century Byzantine historian of the Ottoman conquests.
14 This is György Dózsa (Székely), leader of the Hungarian peasant revolt of 1514, which began as a crusade against the Turks.

II.28 All Things Have Their Season

Toutes choses ont leur saison
Learning Greek in old age, as Cato the Censor did, strikes Montaigne as unseemly; he himself is now winding down his hopes.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.28.1	CEVX qui apparient Caton le Censeur, au ieune Caton meurtrier de soy-mesme, apparient deux belles natures et de formes voisines. Le premier exploitta la sienne à plus de visages, et precelle en exploits militaires, et en vtilité de ses vacations publiques. Mais la vertu du ieune, outre ce que c'est blaspheme de luy en apparier nulle en vigueur, fut bien plus nette. Car qui deschargeroit d'enuie et d'ambition, celle du Censeur, ayant osé chocquer l'honneur de Scipion, en bonté et en toutes parties d'excellence, de bien loing plus grand que luy, et que tout autre homme de son siecle?	Those who pair Cato the Censor with the younger Cato, who killed himself, are pairing two fine natures of similar form. The first exercised his in more ways, and excels in military exploits and in the usefulness of his public offices. But the virtue of the younger—besides the fact that it is blasphemy to set any beside it in vigor—was far purer. For who could clear the Censor's virtue of envy and ambition, when he dared to attack the honor of Scipio, a man far greater than he, in goodness and in every quality of excellence, and greater than any other man of his age?[1]
2.28.2	Ce qu'on dit entre autres choses de luy, qu'en son extreme vieillesse, il se mit à apprendre la langue Grecque, d'vn ardant appetit, comme pour assouuir vne longue soif, ne me semble pas luy estre fort honnorable. C'est proprement ce que nous disons, retomber en enfantillage. Toutes choses ont leur saison, les bonnes et tout. Et ie puis dire mon patenostre hors de propos. Comme on defera T. Quintius Flaminius, de ce qu'estant general d'armée, on l'auoit veu à quartier sur l'heure du conflict, s'amusant à prier Dieu, en vne battaille, qu'il gaigna. Imponit finem sapiens et rebus honestis.	What is said of him, among other things, that in his extreme old age he set about learning the Greek language with an ardent appetite, as if to quench a long thirst, does not seem to me much to his honor. It is precisely what we call falling back into childhood. All things have their season, good ones and all. And I can say my Paternoster at the wrong time. Thus Titus Quinctius Flamininus was accused because, when he was general of an army, he had been seen off to one side at the moment of the clash, busy praying to God, in a battle that he won. The wise man sets a limit even to good things.[2]
2.28.3	Eudemonidas voyant Xenocrates fort vieil s'empresser aux leçons de son escole: Quand sçaura cettuy-cy, dit-il, s'il apprend encore? Et Philopœmen, à ceux qui hault-louoyent le Roy Ptolomæus, de ce qu'il durcissoit sa personne tous les iours à l'exercice des armes: Ce n'est, dit-il, pas chose louable à vn Roy de son aage, de s'y exercer, il les deuoit hormais reellement employer. Le ieune doit faire ses apprests, le vieil en iouïr, disent les sages. Et le plus grand vice qu'ils remerquent en nous, c'est que noz desirs raieunissent sans cesse. Nous recommençons tousiours à viure.	Eudemonidas, seeing Xenocrates, very old, eagerly attending the lessons of his school, said: "When will this man know, if he is still learning?" And Philopoemen, to those who were highly praising King Ptolemy for hardening his body every day in the exercise of arms: "It is not a praiseworthy thing," he said, "for a king of his age to practice with them; by now he ought to be using them in earnest." The young should make their preparations, the old enjoy them, say the wise. And the greatest vice they note in us is that our de-

1 Cato the Censor (234–149 BC) was the great-grandfather of Cato the Younger.
2 Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

sires keep growing young again. We are always beginning to live.

2.28.4 Nostre estude et nostre enuie deuroyent quelque fois sentir la vieillesse. Nous auons le pied à la fosse, et noz appetis et poursuites ne font que naistre. Tu secanda marmora
Locas sub ipsum funus, et, sepulcri
Immemor, struis domos. Le plus long de mes desseins n'a pas vn an d'estenduë: ie ne pense desormais qu'à finir: me deffay de toutes nouuelles esperances et entreprinses: prens mon dernier congé de tous les lieux, que ie laisse: et me depossede tous les iours de ce que i'ay. Olim iam nec perit quicquam mihi, nec acquiritur, plus superest viatici quàm viæ. Vixi, et quem dederat cursum fortuna peregi.

Our studies and our desires ought sometimes to smack of old age. We have one foot in the grave, and our appetites and pursuits are only just being born. You contract for marble to be cut on the very brink of death, and, forgetful of the tomb, you build houses. The longest of my plans does not extend a year. I think now only of ending; I am getting rid of all new hopes and undertakings; I take my last leave of every place I depart from; and every day I strip myself of what I have. For a long time now I have neither lost nor gained anything; I have more provisions for the journey than journey left. I have lived, and finished the course that Fortune gave me.[3]

2.28.5 C'est en fin tout le soulagement que ie trouue en ma vieillesse, qu'elle amortist en moy plusieurs desirs et soings, dequoy la vie est inquietée. Le soing du cours du monde, le soing des richesses, de la grandeur, de la science, de la santé, de moy. Cettuy-cy apprend à parler, lors qu'il luy faut apprendre à se taire pour iamais. On peut continuer à tout temps l'estude, non pas l'escholage. La sotte chose, qu'vn vieillard abecedaire! Diuersos diuersa iuuant, non omnibus annis / Omnia conueniunt.

This, in short, is all the relief I find in my old age: that it deadens in me many desires and cares by which life is disturbed—care for the course of the world, care for riches, for greatness, for knowledge, for health, for myself. This man is learning to speak when he ought to be learning to be silent forever. One can go on studying at any age, but not going to school. What a silly thing, an old man learning his ABCs! Different things please different men; not all things / suit all ages.[4]

2.28.6 S'il faut estudier, estudions vn estude sortable à nostre condition: afin que nous puissions respondre, comme celuy, à qui quand on demanda à quoy faire ces estudes en sa decrepitude: A m'en partir meilleur, et plus à mon aise, respondit-il. Tel estude fut celuy du ieune Caton, sentant sa fin prochaine, qui se rencontra au discours de Platon, de l'eternité de l'ame. Non, comme il faut croire, qu'il ne fust de long temps garny de toute sorte de munition pour vn tel deslogement. D'asseurance, de volonté ferme, et d'instruction, il en auoit plus que Platon n'en a en ses escrits. Sa science et son courage estoient pour ce regard, au dessus de la philosophie.

If we must study, let us take up a study suited to our condition, so that we may answer like the man who, when asked what he wanted these studies for in his decrepitude, replied: "To leave this world better and more at ease." Such was the study of the younger Cato when, feeling his end approaching, he came upon Plato's discourse on the eternity of the soul. Not, we must believe, that he had not long been furnished with every kind of provision for such a departure. Of assurance, firm will and learning he had more than Plato has in his writings. His knowledge and his courage were, in this respect, above philosophy.[5]

Il print cette occupation, non pour le seruice de sa mort, mais comme celuy qui n'interrompit pas seulement son sommeil, en l'importance d'vne telle deliberation, il continua aussi sans choix et sans changement, ses estudes, auec les autres actions accoustumées de sa vie.

He took up this occupation not for the sake of his death. Rather, as a man who did not even interrupt his sleep for the gravity of such a decision, he also went on with his studies, without choosing and without changing, along with the other customary

3 Horace, Odes; then Seneca, Letters; then Virgil, Aeneid.
4 Maximianus, Elegies.
5 Plato's Phaedo, on the immortality of the soul.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
La nuict, qu'il vint d'estre refusé de la Preture, il la passa à iouer. Celle en laquelle il deuoit mourir, il la passa à lire. La perte ou de la vie, ou de l'office, tout luy fut vn.	actions of his life. The night after he was refused the praetorship he spent playing games. The night on which he was to die he spent reading. Losing life or losing office—it was all one to him.

II.29 Of Virtue

De la vertu

Heroic virtue comes in fits and starts, Montaigne finds, rarely becoming settled habit, and fanatics' readiness to die proves little.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.29.1	IE trouue par experience, qu'il y a bien à dire entre les boutées et saillies de l'ame, ou vne resolue et constante habitude: et voy bien qu'il n'est rien que nous ne puissions, voire iusques à surpasser la diuinité mesme, dit quelqu'vn, d'autant que c'est plus, de se rendre impassible de soy, que d'estre tel, de sa condition originelle: et iusques à pouuoir ioindre à l'imbecillité de l'homme, vne resolution et asseurance de Dieu. Mais c'est par secousse.	I find by experience that there is a great difference between the sallies and bursts of the soul and a settled and constant habit. And I see well that there is nothing we cannot do—even to the point of surpassing divinity itself, as someone says, since it is more to make oneself impassive by one's own effort than to be so by one's original condition—and even to the point of joining to man's weakness a resolution and assurance worthy of God. But it comes in fits and starts.[1]
	Et és vies de ces heros du temps passé, il y a quelque fois des traits miraculeux, et qui semblent de bien loing surpasser noz forces naturelles: mais ce sont traits à la verité: et est dur à croire, que de ces conditions ainsin esleuées, on en puisse teindre et abbreuuer l'ame, en maniere, qu'elles luy deuiennent ordinaires, et comme naturelles. Il nous eschoit à nous mesmes, qui ne sommes qu'auortons d'hommes, d'eslancer par fois nostre ame, esueillée par les discours, ou exemples d'autruy, bien loing au delà de son ordinaire.	And in the lives of those heroes of times past there are sometimes miraculous strokes that seem to surpass our natural strength by far. But they are only strokes, to tell the truth; and it is hard to believe that the soul can be so dyed and steeped in these lofty qualities that they become ordinary to it, and as if natural. It happens even to us, who are only stunted specimens of men, to launch our soul at times far beyond its ordinary range, when it is roused by the reasonings or examples of others.
	Mais c'est vne espece de passion, qui la pousse et agite, et qui la rauit aucunement hors de soy: car ce tourbillon franchi, nous voyons, que sans y penser elle se desbande et relasche d'elle mesme, sinon iusques à la derniere touche; au moins iusques à n'estre plus celles-là: de façon que lors, à toute occasion, pour vn oyseau perdu, ou vn verre cassé, nous nous laissons esmouuoir à peu pres comme l'vn du vulgaire. Sauf l'ordre, la moderation, et la constance, i'estime que toutes choses soient faisables par vn homme bien manque et deffaillant en gros.	But it is a kind of passion that drives and stirs it, and carries it somewhat out of itself. For once that whirlwind is past, we see that it unbends and slackens of its own accord, without our thinking about it—if not down to the lowest note, at least to the point of no longer being up there; so that then, on every occasion, for a lost bird or a broken glass, we let ourselves be upset almost like one of the common people. Except for order, moderation and constancy, I think that all things are within reach of a man who is quite lacking and deficient on the whole.
	A cette cause disent les sages, il faut pour iuger bien à poinct d'vn homme, principalement contreroller ses actions communes, et le surprendre en son à tous les iours.	That is why, say the wise, to judge a man properly we must chiefly examine his common actions and catch him in his everyday life.

1 Seneca, Letters.

PYRRHO'S CONSISTENCY

Pyrrho tried to live his skepticism, yet admitted that it is hard to strip off the man entirely.

FRENCH

2.29.2 Pyrrho, celuy qui bastit de l'ignorance vne si plaisante science, essaya, comme tous les autres vrayement philosophes, de faire respondre sa vie à sa doctrine. Et par ce qu'il maintenoit la foiblesse du iugement humain, estre si extreme, que de ne pouuoir prendre party ou inclination: et le vouloit suspendre perpetuellement balancé, regardant et accueillant toutes choses, comme indifferentes, on conte qu'il se maintenoit tousiours de mesme façon, et visage: s'il auoit commencé vn propos, il ne laissoit pas de l'acheuer, quand celuy à qui il parloit s'en fust allé: s'il alloit, il ne rompoit son chemin pour empeschement qui se presentast, conserué des precipices, du heurt des charrettes, et autres accidens par ses amis.

Car de craindre ou euiter quelque chose, c'eust esté choquer ses propositions, qui ostoient au sens mesmes, toute eslection et certitude. Quelquefois il souffrit d'estre incisé et cauterisé, d'vne telle constance, qu'on ne luy en veit pas seulement siller les yeux. C'est quelque chose de ramener l'ame à ces imaginations, c'est plus d'y ioindre les effects, toutesfois il n'est pas impossible: mais de les ioindre auec telle perseuerance et constance, que d'en establir son train ordinaire, certes en ces entreprinses si esloignées de l'vsage commun, il est quasi incroyable qu'on le puisse. Voyla pourquoy comme il fust quelquefois rencontré en sa maison, tançant bien asprement auecques sa sœur, et luy estant reproché de faillir en cela à son indifferance: Quoy?

dit-il, faut-il qu'encore cette femmelette serue de tesmoignage à mes regles? Vn'autre fois, qu'on le veit se deffendre d'vn chien: Il est, dit-il, tres-difficile de despouiller entierement l'homme: et se faut mettre en deuoir, et efforcer de combattre les choses, premierement par les effects; mais au pis aller par la raison et par les discours.

2.29.3 Il y a enuiron sept ou huict ans, qu'à deux lieuës d'icy, vn homme de village, qui est encore viuant, ayant la teste de long temps rompue par la ialousie de sa femme, reuenant vn iour de la besongne, et elle le bien-veignant de ses crialleries accoustumées, entra en telle furie, que sur le champ à tout la serpe qu'il tenoit encore en ses mains,

ENGLISH

Pyrrho, who built so amusing a science out of ignorance, tried, like all other true philosophers, to make his life match his doctrine. He maintained that the weakness of human judgment was so extreme that it could not take sides or lean either way, and he wanted it held perpetually suspended in balance, regarding and receiving all things as indifferent. And so it is said that he always kept the same manner and the same countenance. If he had begun saying something, he did not fail to finish it even if the person he was speaking to had gone away. If he was walking, he would not turn from his path for any obstacle that came up, and had to be kept from precipices, from collisions with carts and other accidents by his friends.

For to fear or avoid anything would have clashed with his propositions, which took away all choice and certainty even from the senses. Sometimes he endured being cut and cauterized with such constancy that he was not even seen to blink. It is something to bring the soul to these notions; it is more to join deeds to them; and yet it is not impossible. But to join them with such perseverance and constancy as to make them one's ordinary way of life—truly, in undertakings so remote from common practice, it is almost unbelievable that anyone could do it. That is why, when he was once caught at home scolding his sister very sharply, and was reproached for failing in his indifference in this: "What?" he said. "Must this little woman too serve as a test of my rules?" Another time, when he was seen defending himself against a dog: "It is very difficult," he said, "to strip off the man entirely; and one must make it one's duty and strive to fight against things, first by deeds, but at worst by reason and argument."

About seven or eight years ago, two leagues from here, a villager who is still alive, whose head had long been pounded by his wife's jealousy, came home from work one day and was greeted by her usual shrieking. He flew into such a fury that on the spot, with the billhook he still had in his hands, he cleanly harvested from himself the s'estant moissonné tout net les pieces qui la mettoyent en fieure, les luy ietta au nez.

FRENCH

Et il se dit, qu'vn ieune Gentil-homme des nostres, amoureux et gaillard, ayant par sa perseuerance amolli en fin le cœur d'vne belle maistresse, desesperé, de ce que sur le point de la charge, il s'estoit trouué mol luy mesmes et deffailly, et que, Non viriliter / Iners senile penis extulerat caput, il s'en priua soudain reuenu au logis, et l'enuoya, cruelle et sanglante victime pour la purgation de son offence. Si c'eust esté par discours et religion, comme les prestres de Cibele, que ne dirions nous d'vne si hautaine entreprise?

2.29.4 Depuis peu de iours à Bragerac à cinq lieuës de ma maison, contremont la riuiere de Dordoigne, vne femme, ayant esté tourmentée et battue le soir auant, de son mary chagrin et fascheux de sa complexion, delibera d'eschapper à sa rudesse au prix de sa vie, et s'estant à son leuer accointée de ses voisines comme de coustume, leur laissa couler quelque mot de recommendation de ses affaires, prit vne sienne sœur par la main, la mena auec elle sur le pont, et apres auoir pris congé d'elle, comme par maniere de ieu, sans montrer autre changement ou alteration, se precipita du hault en bas, en la riuiere, où elle se perdit.

Ce qu'il y a de plus en cecy, c'est que ce conseil meurit vne nuict entiere dans sa teste.

ENGLISH

parts that put her in such a fever, and threw them in her face.

And it is said that a young gentleman of our parts, amorous and lusty, having by his perseverance at last softened the heart of a beautiful mistress, was in despair because at the very moment of the charge he had found himself soft and failing, and because not manfully / had his sluggish penis raised its aged head. As soon as he got home he deprived himself of it, and sent it to her, a cruel and bloody victim in atonement for his offense. If he had done it out of reasoning and religion, like the priests of Cybele, what would we not say of so lofty an undertaking?[2]

A few days ago at Bergerac, five leagues from my house, up the river Dordogne, a woman who had been tormented and beaten the evening before by her husband, a morose man, ill-tempered by nature, resolved to escape his harshness at the cost of her life. On getting up she chatted with her neighbors as usual, let slip a few words commending her affairs to them, took one of her sisters by the hand and led her onto the bridge. And after taking leave of her, as if in jest, without showing any other change or disturbance, she threw herself headlong from the top into the river, where she was lost.

What is more remarkable in this is that the resolve ripened for a whole night in her head.

THE WIDOWS OF INDIA

Indian widows and Gymnosophists burn themselves, a lifelong resolve that Montaigne finds miraculous.

FRENCH

2.29.5 C'est bien autre chose, des femmes Indiennes; car estant leur coustume aux maris d'auoir plusieurs femmes, et à la plus chere d'elles, de se tuer apres son mary, chacune par le dessein de toute sa vie, vise à gaigner ce poinct, et cet aduantage sur ses compagnes: et les bons offices qu'elles rendent à leur mary, ne regardent autre recompence que d'estre preferées à la compagnie de sa mort. Vbi mortifero iacta est fax vltima lecto,
Vxorum fusis stat pia turba comis:
Et certamen habent lethi, quæ viua sequatur
Coniugium: pudor est non licuisse mori.

ENGLISH

It is quite another thing with the women of India. For since it is their custom for husbands to have several wives, and for the dearest of them to kill herself after her husband, each one aims, by the design of her whole life, to win this point and this advantage over her companions. And the good services they render their husband look for no other reward than to be chosen to keep him company in death. When the last torch has been thrown on the funeral bed, the dutiful throng of wives stands with streaming hair, and they contend in death, which of them shall follow

2 The verse is from the Priapea, once attributed to Tibullus. The priests of the goddess Cybele castrated themselves in her honor.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Ardent victrices, et flammæ pectora præbent, Imponúntque suis ora perusta viris.	her husband alive: it is a disgrace not to be allowed to die. The winners burn, and offer their breasts to the flames, and lay their scorched lips upon their husbands.[3]
2.29.6 Vn homme escrit encore en noz iours, auoir veu en ces nations Orientales, cette coustume en credit, que non seulement les femmes s'enterrent apres leurs maris, mais aussi les esclaues, desquelles il a eu iouïssance. Ce qui se faict en cette maniere. Le mary estant trespassé, la vefue peut, si elle veut, mais peu le veulent, demander deux ou trois mois d'espace à disposer de ses affaires. Le iour venu elle monte à cheual, parée comme à nopces: et d'vne contenance gaye, va, dit elle, dormir auec son espoux, tenant en sa main gauche vn miroüer, vne flesche en l'autre.	A man writes, in our own day too, that he saw in those Eastern nations this custom held in honor: that not only do wives bury themselves after their husbands, but also the slave women he has enjoyed. It is done in this manner. When the husband has died, the widow may, if she wishes—but few wish it—ask for two or three months' time to settle her affairs. When the day comes, she mounts a horse, dressed as for a wedding, and with a cheerful face goes, as she says, to sleep with her husband, holding a mirror in her left hand and an arrow in the other.[4]
S'estant ainsi promenée en pompe, accompagnée de ses amis et parents, et de grand peuple, en feste, elle est tantost rendue au lieu public, destiné à tels spectacles. C'est vne grande place, au milieu de laquelle il y a vne fosse pleine de bois: et ioignant icelle, vn lieu releué de quatre ou cinq marches: sur lequel elle est conduitte, et seruie d'vn magnifique repas. Apres lequel, elle se met à baller et à chanter: et ordonne, quand bon luy semble, qu'on allume le feu.	Having paraded thus in pomp, accompanied by her friends and relatives and a great crowd in festive mood, she is soon brought to the public place set aside for such spectacles. It is a large square, in the middle of which there is a pit full of wood, and next to it a platform raised four or five steps, onto which she is led and served a magnificent meal. After it she begins to dance and sing, and orders the fire to be lit when she sees fit.
Cela faict, elle descent, et prenant par la main le plus proche des parents de son mary, ils vont ensemble à la riuiere voisine, où elle se despouille toute nue, et distribue ses ioyaux et vestements à ses amis, et se va plongeant en l'eau, comme pour y lauer ses pechez. Sortant de là, elle s'enveloppe d'vn linge iaune de quatorze brasses de long, et donnant de rechef la main à ce parent de son mary, s'en reuont sur la motte, où elle parle au peuple, et recommande ses enfans, si elle en a. Entre la fosse et la motte, on tire volontiers vn rideau, pour leur oster la veuë de cette fournaise ardente: ce qu'aucunes deffendent, pour tesmoigner plus de courage.	That done, she comes down and, taking by the hand her husband's nearest relative, goes with him to the river nearby, where she strips quite naked, distributes her jewels and clothes to her friends, and plunges into the water as if to wash away her sins. Coming out of it, she wraps herself in a yellow cloth fourteen fathoms long and, again giving her hand to this relative of her husband, goes back with him to the mound, where she speaks to the people and commends her children to them, if she has any. Between the pit and the mound a curtain is usually drawn, to keep them from seeing that blazing furnace; some of the women forbid it, to show greater courage.
Finy qu'elle a de dire, vne femme luy presente vn vase plein d'huile à s'oindre la teste et tout le corps, lequel elle iette dedans le feu, quand elle en a faict: et en l'instant s'y lance elle mesme. Sur l'heure, le peuple renuerse sur elle quantité de busches, pour l'empescher de languir: et se change toute leur ioye en deuil et tristesse.	When she has finished speaking, a woman presents her with a vessel full of oil to anoint her head and her whole body, and she throws it into the fire when she has done; and in that instant she throws herself in. At once the people heap a quant-

3 Propertius, Elegies.
4 Montaigne's source is the Venetian Gasparo Balbi's account of his travels in the East Indies (1590).

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
		ity of logs on her, to keep her from lingering; and all their joy turns to mourning and sadness.
	Si ce sont personnes de moindre estoffe, le corps du mort est porté au lieu où on le veut enterrer, et là mis en son seant, la vefue à genoux deuant luy, l'embrassant estroittement: et se tient en ce poinct, pendant qu'on bastit au tour d'eux, vn mur, qui venant à se hausser iusques à l'endroit des espaules de la femme, quelqu'vn des siens par le derriere prenant sa teste, luy tort le col: et rendu qu'elle a l'esprit, le mur est soudain monté et clos, où ils demeurent enseuelis.	If they are persons of lesser standing, the dead man's body is carried to the place where they wish to bury him and there set upright in a sitting position, with the widow on her knees before him, embracing him tightly. She stays in that position while a wall is built around them. When it has risen to the height of the woman's shoulders, one of her people takes her head from behind and wrings her neck; and once she has given up the ghost, the wall is quickly raised and closed over, and there they remain buried.
2.29.7	En ce mesme païs, il y auoit quelque chose de pareil en leurs Gymnosophistes: car non par la contrainte d'autruy, non par l'impetuosité d'vn' humeur soudaine: mais par expresse profession de leur regle, leur façon estoit, à mesure qu'ils auoyent attaint certain aage, ou qu'ils se voyoient menassez par quelque maladie, de se faire dresser vn bucher, et au dessus, vn lict bien paré, et apres auoir festoyé joyeusement leurs amis et cognoissans, s'aller planter dans ce lict, en telle resolution, que le feu y estant mis, on ne les vist mouuoir, ny pieds ny mains: et ainsi mourut l'vn d'eux, Calanus, en presence de toute l'armée d'Alexandre le Grand.	In that same country there was something similar among their Gymnosophists. Not under constraint from others, nor from the impulse of a sudden mood, but by express profession of their rule, their custom was this: once they had reached a certain age, or saw themselves threatened by some illness, they had a pyre built, and on top of it a richly adorned bed. After joyfully feasting their friends and acquaintances, they went and settled themselves on that bed with such resolution that, when the fire was lit, they were not seen to move either foot or hand. That is how one of them, Calanus, died in the presence of the whole army of Alexander the Great.[5]
	Et n'estoit estimé entre eux, ny sainct ny bien heureux, qui ne s'estoit ainsi tué: enuoyant son ame purgée et purifiée par le feu, apres auoir consommé tout ce qu'il y auoit de mortel et terrestre. Cette constante premeditation de toute la vie, c'est ce qui fait le miracle.	Among them no one was thought either holy or blessed who had not killed himself in this way, sending forth his soul purged and purified by the fire once it had consumed all that was mortal and earthly in him. What makes the miracle is this constant premeditation throughout a whole life.

FATE AND FOREKNOWLEDGE

God's foreknowledge does not force events; belief in fixed destiny steadies Turks, Bedouins and assassins.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.29.8	Parmy noz autres disputes, celle du Fatum, s'y est meslée: et pour attacher les choses aduenir et nostre volonté mesme, à certaine et ineuitable necessité, on est encore sur cet argument, du temps passé: Puis que Dieu preuoit toutes choses deuoir ainsin aduenir, comme il fait, sans doubte: il faut donc qu'elles aduiennent ainsin. A quoy noz maistres respondent, que le voir que quelque chose aduienne, comme nous faisons, et Dieu de mesmes (car	Among our other disputes, the dispute over Fatum has got mixed in. To tie future things, and even our will, to a certain and inevitable necessity, people still rely on this argument from times past: since God foresees that all things are to happen thus, as he undoubtedly does, they must therefore happen thus. To which our masters reply that to 5 The Gymnosophists ("naked philosophers") were Indian ascetics, so named by the Greeks. Calanus burned himself alive in 323 BC.

FRENCH

tout luy estant present, il voit plustost qu'il ne preuoit) ce n'est pas la forcer d'aduenir: voire nous voyons, à cause que les choses aduiennent, et les choses n'aduiennent pas, à cause que nous voyons. L'aduenement fait la science, non la science l'aduenement.

Ce que nous voyons aduenir, aduient: mais il pouuoit autrement aduenir: et Dieu, au registre des causes des aduenements qu'il a en sa prescience, y a aussi celles qu'on appelle fortuites, et les volontaires, qui despendent de la liberté qu'il a donné à nostre arbitrage, et sçait que nous faudrons, par ce que nous auons voulu faillir.

2.29.9 Or i'ay veu assez de gens encourager leurs troupes de cette necessité fatale: car si nostre heure est attachée à certain point, ny les harquebusades ennemies, ny nostre hardiesse, ny nostre fuite et couardise, ne la peuuent auancer ou reculer. Cela est beau à dire, mais cherchez qui l'effectuera: et s'il est ainsi, qu'vne forte et viue creance, tire apres soy les actions de mesme, certes cette foy, dequoy nous remplissons tant la bouche, est merueilleusement legere en noz siecles: sinon que le mespris qu'elle a des œuures, luy face desdaigner leur compagnie.

Tant y a, qu'à ce mesme propos, le sire de Ioinuille tesmoing croyable autant que tout autre, nous racomte des Bedoins, nation meslée aux Sarrasins, ausquels le Roy sainct Louys eut affaire en la terre saincte, qu'ils croyoient si fermement en leur religion les iours d'vn chacun estre de toute eternité prefix et contez, d'vne preordonnance ineuitable, qu'ils alloyent à la guerre nudz, sauf vn glaiue à la turquesque, et le corps seulement couuert d'vn linge blanc: et pour leur plus extreme maudisson, quand ils se courroussoient aux leurs, ils auoyent tousiours en la bouche: Maudit sois tu, comme celuy, qui s'arme de peur de la mort. Voyla bien autre preuue de creance, et de foy, que la nostre.

Et de ce rang est aussi celle que donnerent ces deux religieux de Florence, du temps de nos peres. Estans en quelque controuerse de science, ils s'accorderent, d'entrer tous deux dans le feu, en presence de tout le peuple, et en la place publique, pour la verification see something happen, as we do, and as God does likewise (for since everything is present to him, he sees rather than foresees), is not to force it to happen. Indeed, we see because things happen, and things do not happen because we see. The happening makes the knowledge, not the knowledge the happening.[6]

ENGLISH

What we see happen, happens; but it could have happened otherwise. In the register of the causes of events that God holds in his foreknowledge, he also has the causes called fortuitous, and the voluntary ones, which depend on the freedom he has given to our free will; and he knows that we shall go wrong, because we will have willed to go wrong.

Now I have seen plenty of people encourage their troops with this fatal necessity: if our hour is fixed at a certain point, neither the enemy's arquebus shots, nor our boldness, nor our flight and cowardice can bring it forward or put it back. That is fine to say, but look for someone who will act on it. And if it is true that a strong and lively belief draws actions of the same kind after it, then certainly this faith we are forever mouthing is wonderfully light in our times—unless its contempt for works makes it disdain their company.

Be that as it may, on this very subject the Sire de Joinville, as credible a witness as any, tells us something about the Bedouins, a nation mixed with the Saracens, with whom King Saint Louis had dealings in the Holy Land. They believed so firmly, in their religion, that each man's days were fixed and numbered from all eternity by an inevitable preordination, that they went to war naked except for a Turkish-style sword, their bodies covered only with a white linen cloth. And for their most extreme curse, when they were angry with their own people, they always had on their lips: "Cursed be you, like the man who arms himself for fear of death." That is a very different proof of belief and faith from ours.

Of the same rank, too, is the proof given by those two friars of Florence in our fathers' time. Being in some dispute over a point of learning, they agreed that both would walk into the fire, in the presence of all the people and in the public square, each to 6 Fatum is Latin for "fate." "Our masters" are the theologians.

FRENCH

chacun de son party: et en estoyent des-ia les apprests tous faicts, et la chose iustement sur le poinct de l'execution, quand elle fut interrompue par vn accident improuueu.

2.29.10 Vn ieune Seigneur Turc, ayant faict vn signalé fait d'armes de sa personne, à la veuë des deux battailles, d'Amurath et de l'Huniade, prestes à se donner: enquis par Amurath, qui l'auoit en si grande ieunesse et inexperience (car c'estoit la premiere guerre qu'il eust veu) remply d'vne si genereuse vigueur de courage: respondit, qu'il auoit eu pour souuerain percepteur de vaillance, vn lieure. Quelque iour estant à la chasse, dit-il, ie descouury vn lieure en forme: et encore que i'eusse deux excellents leuriers à mon costé: si me sembla-il, pour ne le faillir point, qu'il valloit mieux y employer encore mon arc: car il me faisoit fort beau ieu.

Ie commençay à descocher mes flesches: et iusques à quarante, qu'il y en auoit en ma trousse: non sans l'assener seulement, mais sans l'esueiller. Apres tout, ie descoupplay mes leuriers apres, qui n'y peurent non plus. I'apprins par là, qu'il auoit esté couuert par sa destinée: et que, ny les traits, ny les glaiues ne portent, que par le congé de nostre fatalité, laquelle il n'est en nous de reculer ny d'auancer. Ce compte doit seruir, à nous faire veoir en passant, combien nostre raison est flexible à toute sorte d'images.

Vn personnage grand d'ans, de nom, de dignité, et de doctrine, se vantoit à moy d'auoir esté porté à certaine mutation tres-importante de sa foy, par vne incitation estrangere, aussi bizarre: et au reste si mal concluante, que ie la trouuoy plus forte au reuers. Luy l'appelloit miracle: et moy aussi, à diuers sens. Leurs historiens disent, que la persuasion, estant populairement semée entre les Turcs de la fatale et imployable prescription de leurs iours, ayde apparemment à les asseurer aux dangers. Et ie cognois vn grand Prince, qui en fait heureusement son proffit: soit qu'il la croye, soit qu'il la prenne pour excuse, à se hazarder extraordinairement: pourueu que Fortune ne se lasse trop tost, de luy faire espaule.

2.29.11 Il n'est point aduenu de nostre memoire, vn plus admirable effect de resolution, que de ces deux qui verify his own side. The preparations were already all made, and the thing was just on the point of being carried out, when it was interrupted by an unforeseen accident.[7]

ENGLISH

A young Turkish lord had performed a remarkable feat of arms in person, in sight of the two armies of Amurath and Hunyadi, which were ready to engage. Amurath asked him what had filled him, so young and inexperienced as he was (for it was the first war he had seen), with such noble vigor of courage. He replied that his supreme teacher of valor had been a hare. One day when I was out hunting, he said, I came upon a hare in its form; and although I had two excellent greyhounds at my side, it still seemed better to me, so as not to miss it, to use my bow as well, for it offered me a very fine shot.[8]

I began to loose my arrows, all forty that were in my quiver, not only without hitting it but without even waking it. After all that, I unleashed my greyhounds on it, and they could do no better. I learned from this that it had been protected by its destiny, and that neither arrows nor swords strike home except by leave of our fate, which it is not in our power to put back or bring forward. This story should serve to show us, in passing, how pliable our reason is to every sort of image.

A man great in years, in name, in rank and in learning boasted to me that he had been led to a certain very important change in his faith by an outside prompting just as bizarre, and moreover so unconvincing that I found it stronger the other way round. He called it a miracle, and so did I, in a different sense. Their historians say that the conviction, widely spread among the common people of the Turks, that the span of their days is fatally and inflexibly prescribed, evidently helps to make them steady in danger. And I know a great prince who profits from it nicely, whether he believes it or takes it as an excuse, to run extraordinary risks —provided Fortune does not tire too soon of backing him.[9]

Within our memory there has been no more admirable instance of resolution than that of the two

7 The ordeal by fire proposed in Florence in 1498 between a Franciscan and a Dominican follower of Savonarola; it was called off.
8 John Hunyadi, Hungarian general, fought the Ottomans in the 1440s.
9 The prince is probably Henry of Navarre, the future Henry IV.

FRENCH

conspirerent la mort du Prince d'Orenge. C'est merueille, comment on peut eschauffer le second, qui l'executa, à vne entreprinse, en laquelle il estoit si mal aduenu à son compagnon, y ayant apporté tout ce qu'il pouuoit. Et sur cette trace, et de mesmes armes, aller entreprendre vn Seigneur, armé d'vne si fraiche instruction de deffiance, puissant de suitte d'amis, et de force corporelle, en sa sale, parmy ses gardes, en vne ville toute à sa deuotion. Certes il y employa vne main bien determinée, et vn courage esmeu d'vne vigoreuse passion.

Vn poignard est plus seur, pour assener, mais d'autant qu'il a besoing de plus de mouuement, et de vigueur de bras, que n'a vn pistolet, son coup est plus subject à estre gauchy, ou troublé. Que celuy là, ne courust à vne mort certaine, ie n'y fay pas grand doubte: car les esperances, dequoy on eust sçeu l'amuser, ne pouuoient loger en entendement rassis: et la conduite de son exploit, montre qu'il n'en auoit pas faute, non plus que de courage. Les motifs d'vne si puissante persuasion, peuuent estre diuers, car nostre fantasie fait de soy et de nous, ce qu'il luy plaist.

L'execution qui fut faicte pres d'Orleans, n'eut rien de pareil, il y eut plus de hazard que de vigueur: le coup n'estoit pas à la mort, si la Fortune ne l'eust rendu tel: et l'entreprise de tirer estant à cheual, et de loing, et à vn qui se mouuoit au bransle de son cheual, fut l'entreprise d'vn homme, qui aymoit mieux faillir son effect, que faillir à se sauuer. Ce qui suyuit apres le montra. Car il se transit et s'enyura de la pensée de si haute execution, si qu'il perdit entierement son sens, et à conduire sa fuite, et à conduire sa langue, en ses responces. Que luy falloit-il, que recourir à ses amis au trauers d'vne riuiere?

C'est vn moyen, où ie me suis ietté à moindres dangers, et que i'estime de peu de hazard, quelque largeur qu'ait le passage, pourueu que vostre cheual trouue l'entrée facile, et que vous preuoyez au delà, vn bord aysé selon le cours de l'eau. L'autre, quand on luy prononça son horrible sentence: I'y estois preparé, dit-il, ie vous estonneray de ma patience.

2.29.12 Les Assassins, nation dependant de la Phœnicie, sont estimes entre les Mahumetans, d'vne souueraine men who plotted the death of the Prince of Orange. It is a marvel how anyone could fire up the second, who carried it out, for an undertaking in which his companion had fared so badly after putting into it all he could. And how he could, on the same track and with the same weapons, go and attack a lord armed with so fresh a lesson in distrust, powerful in his following of friends and in bodily strength, in his own hall, among his guards, in a town wholly devoted to him. Certainly he brought to it a very determined hand and a courage stirred by a vigorous passion.[10]

ENGLISH

A dagger is surer for striking home, but since it needs more movement and strength of arm than a pistol, its blow is more liable to be deflected or disturbed. I have little doubt that this man was running to certain death; for the hopes with which he might have been beguiled could not lodge in a settled mind, and the conduct of his exploit shows that he lacked a settled mind no more than he lacked courage. The motives for so powerful a conviction may be various, for our fancy makes of itself and of us whatever it pleases.

The deed done near Orléans had nothing like it; there was more luck than vigor in it. The wound was not mortal, had Fortune not made it so. And the plan of shooting on horseback, from a distance, at a man moving with the motion of his horse, was the plan of a man who would rather miss his aim than fail to save himself. What followed showed it. For he was so transfixed and intoxicated by the thought of so lofty a deed that he entirely lost his wits, both in managing his flight and in managing his tongue in his answers. What did he need to do but reach his friends across a river?[11]

It is a means I have resorted to in lesser dangers, and I consider it of little risk, whatever the width of the crossing, provided your horse finds the way in easy and you foresee on the far side an easy bank, given the current. The other man, when his horrible sentence was pronounced, said: "I was prepared for it; I shall stun you with my endurance."

The Assassins, a nation dependent on Phoenicia, are reputed among the Muslims to be of supreme 10 William of Orange was wounded by a pistol shot in 1582 and killed by Balthasar Gérard at Delft in 1584.

FRENCH

deuotion et pureté de mœurs. Ils tiennent, que le plus court chemin à gaigner Paradis, c'est de tuer quelqu'vn de religion contraire. Parquoy, on l'a veu souuent entreprendre, à vn ou deux, en pourpoinct, contre des ennemis puissans, au prix d'vne mort certaine, et sans aucun soing de leur propre danger. Ainsi fut assassiné (ce mot est emprunté de leur nom) nostre Comte Raimond de Tripoli, au milieu de sa ville: pendant noz entreprinses de la guerre saincte. Et pareillement Conrad Marquis de Mont-ferrat, les meurtriers conduits au supplice, tous enflez et fiers d'vn si beau chef d'œuure.

ENGLISH

devotion and purity of morals. They hold that the shortest road to winning Paradise is to kill someone of the opposite religion. That is why they have often been seen to attack powerful enemies, one or two at a time, without armor, at the price of certain death and without any concern for their own danger. In this way our Count Raymond of Tripoli was assassinated (the word is borrowed from their name) in the middle of his city, during our enterprises in the holy war; and likewise Conrad, Marquis of Montferrat, his murderers going to their execution all swollen and proud of so fine a masterpiece.[12]

11 Poltrot de Méré's shooting of the Duke of Guise in 1563.
12 The Nizari Ismailis of Syria; Raymond II of Tripoli was killed in 1152, Conrad of Montferrat in 1192.

II.30 Of a Monstrous Child

D'vn enfant monstrueux
A plain description of conjoined twins Montaigne saw, ending with the claim that nothing is contrary to nature, only to custom.

FRENCH

2.30.1 CE comte s'en ira tout simple: car ie laisse aux medecins d'en discourir. Ie vis auant hier vn enfant que deux hommes et vne nourrisse, qui se disoient estre le pere, l'oncle, et la tante, conduisoient, pour tirer quelque soul de le montrer, à cause de son estrangeté. Il estoit en tout le reste d'vne forme commune, et se soustenoit sur ses pieds, marchoit et gasouilloit, enuiron comme les autres de mesme aage: il n'auoit encore voulu prendre autre nourriture, que du tetin de sa nourrisse: et ce qu'on essaya en ma presence de luy mettre en la bouche, il le maschoit vn peu, et le rendoit sans aualler: ses cris sembloient bien auoir quelque chose de particulier: il estoit aagé de quatorze mois iustement.

Au dessoubs de ses tetins, il estoit pris et collé à vn autre enfant, sans teste, et qui auoit le conduit du dos estouppé, le reste entier: car il auoit bien l'vn bras plus court, mais il luy auoit esté rompu par accident, à leur naissance; ils estoyent ioints face à face, et comme si vn plus petit enfant en vouloit accoler vn plus grandelet. La ioincture et l'espace par où ils se tenoient n'estoit que de quatre doigts, ou enuiron, en maniere, que si vous retroussiez cet enfant imparfaict, vous voyiez au dessoubs le nombril de l'autre: ainsi la cousture se faisoit entre les tetins et son nombril.

Le nombril de l'imparfaict ne se pouuoit voir, mais ouy bien tout le reste de son ventre. Voyla comme ce qui n'estoit pas attaché, comme bras, fessier, cuisses et iambes, de cet imparfaict, demouroient pendants et branslans sur l'autre, et luy pouuoit aller sa longueur iusques à my iambe. La nourrice nous adioustoit, qu'il vrinoit par tous les deux endroicts: aussi estoient les membres de cet autre nourris, et viuans, et en mesme poinct que les siens, sauf qu'ils estoient plus petits et menus. Ce double corps, et ces membres diuers, se rapportans à vne seule teste, pourroient bien fournir de fauorable prognostique au Roy, de maintenir soubs

ENGLISH

This story will go out plain, for I leave it to the physicians to discuss it. The day before yesterday I saw a child being led about by two men and a nurse, who said they were his father, uncle and aunt, to make a little money by showing him because of his strangeness. In all the rest he was of a common shape: he stood on his feet, walked and babbled more or less like other children of the same age. He had not yet been willing to take any nourishment except from his nurse's breast; what they tried to put in his mouth in my presence he chewed a little and gave back without swallowing. His cries did seem to have something peculiar about them. He was exactly fourteen months old.

Below his nipples he was attached and stuck to another child, without a head, whose back passage was stopped up, the rest being whole; for though one of its arms was shorter, it had been broken by accident at their birth. They were joined face to face, as if a smaller child were trying to hug a slightly bigger one. The joint and the space by which they held together was only four fingers wide or thereabouts, so that if you lifted up this imperfect child you could see the other's navel beneath; thus the seam ran between his nipples and his navel.

The navel of the imperfect one could not be seen, but all the rest of his belly could. So the parts of this imperfect one that were not attached, such as arms, buttocks, thighs and legs, hung dangling on the other, and might reach down to his mid-leg. The nurse added that he urinated through both places. The limbs of the other were also nourished and alive, and in the same condition as his own, except that they were smaller and thinner. This double body and these various limbs, connected to a single head, might well provide a favorable omen for the King, that he will maintain these l'vnion de ses loix, ces parts et pieces diuerses de nostre Estat.	various parts and pieces of our State under the union of his laws.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Mais de peur que l'euenement ne le desmente, il vaut mieux le laisser passer deuant: car il n'est que de deuiner en choses faictes, Vt quum facta sunt, tum ad coniecturam aliqua interpretatione reuocentur: comme on dit d'Epimenides qu'il deuinoit à reculons.	But for fear that the outcome may give it the lie, it is better to let the event go first; for there is nothing like divining things already done, so that, once they have happened, they may then be brought back to the prophecy by some interpretation—as they say of Epimenides that he prophesied backward.[1]
2.30.2	Ie vien de voir vn pastre en Medoc, de trente ans ou enuiron, qui n'a aucune montre des parties genitales: il a trois trous par où il rend son eau incessamment, il est barbu, a desir, et recherche l'attouchement des femmes.	I have just seen a shepherd in Médoc, about thirty years old, who has no sign of genital parts. He has three holes through which he passes water continually. He is bearded, has desire, and seeks the touch of women.

WHAT WE CALL MONSTERS

Nothing is against nature; we call monstrous only what is contrary to our custom.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.30.3	Ce que nous appellons monstres, ne le sont pas à Dieu, qui voit en l'immensité de son ouurage, l'infinité des formes, qu'il y a comprinses. Et est à croire, que cette figure qui nous estonne, se rapporte et tient, à quelque autre figure de mesme genre, incognu à l'homme. De sa toute sagesse, il ne part rien que bon, et commun, et reglé: mais nous n'en voyons pas l'assortiment et la relation. Quod crebrò videt, non miratur, etiam si, cur fiat nescit. Quod antè non vidit, id, si euenerit, ostentum esse censet. Nous appellons contre Nature, ce qui aduient contre la coustume. Rien n'est que selon elle, quel qu'il soit.	What we call monsters are not so to God, who sees in the immensity of his work the infinity of forms he has included in it. And it is to be believed that this figure that astonishes us relates and belongs to some other figure of the same kind, unknown to man. From his all-wisdom nothing proceeds but what is good, common and regular; but we do not see its arrangement and relation. What he sees often he does not wonder at, even if he does not know why it happens. What he has not seen before, if it happens, he thinks a portent. We call contrary to nature what happens contrary to custom. Nothing whatever exists that is not in accordance with nature.
	Que cette raison vniuerselle et naturelle, chasse de nous l'erreur et l'estonnement que la nouuelleté nous apporte.	Let this universal and natural reason drive out of us the error and astonishment that novelty brings us.

1 Cicero, On Divination. Aristotle says that Epimenides divined not the future but the past.

II.31 Of Anger

De la cholere

Starting with parents who beat children in anger, Montaigne studies anger's effects and the folly of punishing while angry.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.31.1	PLVTARQVE est admirable par tout: mais principalement, où il iuge des actions humaines. On peut voir les belles choses, qu'il dit en la comparaison de Lycurgus, et de Numa, sur le propos de la grande simplesse que ce nous est, d'abandonner les enfans au gouuernement et à la charge de leurs peres. La plus part de noz polices, comme dit Aristote, laissent à chascun, en maniere des Cyclopes, la conduitte de leurs femmes et de leurs enfants, selon leur folle et indiscrete fantasie. Et quasi les seules, Lacedemonienne et Cretense, ont commis aux loix la discipline de l'enfance. Qui ne voit qu'en vn Estat tout despend de son education et nourriture?	Plutarch is admirable everywhere, but especially where he judges human actions. You can see the fine things he says in his comparison of Lycurgus and Numa about our great foolishness in abandoning children to the government and charge of their fathers. Most of our states, as Aristotle says, leave to each man, in the manner of the Cyclopes, the management of his wife and children according to his own foolish and thoughtless fancy; and almost the only ones that have committed the discipline of childhood to the laws are the Spartan and the Cretan. Who does not see that in a State everything depends on its education and upbringing?[1] et cependant sans aucune discretion, on la laisse à la mercy des parens, tant fols et meschants qu'ils soient.	And yet, without any discernment, it is left at the mercy of parents, however foolish and wicked they may be.
2.31.2	Entre autres choses combien de fois m'a-il prins enuie, passant par nos ruës, de dresser vne farce, pour venger des garçonnetz, que ie voyoy escorcher, assommer, et meurtrir à quelque pere ou mere furieux, et forcenez de colere? Vous leur voyez sortir le feu et la rage des yeux, Rabie iecur incendente feruntur Præcipites, vt saxa iugis abrupta, quibus mons Subtrahitur, cliuóque latus pendente recedit: (et selon Hippocrates les plus dangereuses maladies sont celles qui desfigurent le visage) à tout vne voix tranchante et esclatante, souuent contre qui ne fait que sortir de nourrisse. Et puis les voyla estroppiez, estourdis de coups: et nostre iustice qui n'en fait compte, comme si ces esboittements et eslochements n'estoient pas des membres de nostre chose publique.	Among other things, how many times, as I passed through our streets, have I felt like putting on a farce to avenge little boys whom I saw being flayed, beaten senseless and battered by some father or mother raging and mad with anger! You see fire and fury coming out of their eyes, With rage inflaming their liver, they rush Headlong, like rocks torn from the ridges when the mountain Gives way beneath them and the side falls away from the overhanging slope (and according to Hippocrates the most dangerous diseases are those that disfigure the face), with a sharp and piercing voice, often against a child just out of the nurse's hands. And then there they are, maimed, stunned by blows; and our justice takes no account of it, as if these dislocations and sprains were not of members of our commonwealth.[2]

1 In Homer each Cyclops lays down the law for his own wife and children; Aristotle cites them in the Ethics.
2 Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Gratum est quòd patriæ ciuem populóque dedisti, Si facis vt patriæ sit idoneus, vtilis agris, Vtilis et bellorum et pacis rebus agendis.	It is a welcome thing that you have given a citizen to your country and people, If you make him fit for his country, useful in the fields, Useful in carrying out the affairs of both war and peace.

NEVER PUNISH IN ANGER

Punishment given in anger is vengeance; Plutarch, Archytas and Plato refused to punish while angry.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.31.3 Il n'est passion qui esbranle tant la sincerité des iugements, que la cholere. Aucun ne feroit doubte de punir de mort, le iuge, qui par cholere auroit condamné son criminel: pourquoy est-il non plus permis aux peres, et aux pedantes, de fouetter les enfans, et les chastier estans en cholere? Ce n'est plus correction, c'est vengeance. Le chastiement tient lieu de medecine aux enfans; et souffririons nous vn medecin, qui fust animé et courroucé contre son patient?	There is no passion that so shakes the soundness of our judgments as anger. No one would hesitate to punish with death a judge who had condemned his criminal out of anger; why then is it any more permitted to fathers and schoolmasters to whip children and punish them while angry? It is no longer correction; it is vengeance. Punishment serves as medicine for children; and would we put up with a doctor who was worked up and angry with his patient?
2.31.4 Nous mesmes, pour bien faire, ne deurions iamais mettre la main sur noz seruiteurs, tandis que la cholere nous dure. Pendant que le pouls nous bat, et que nous sentons de l'esmotion, remettons la partie: les choses nous sembleront à la verité autres, quand nous serons r'accoisez et refroidis. C'est la passion qui commande lors, c'est la passion qui parle, ce n'est pas nous. Au trauers d'elle, les fautes nous apparoissent plus grandes, comme les corps au trauers d'vn brouillas. Celuy qui a faim, vse de viande, mais celuy qui veut vser de chastiement, n'en doit auoir faim ny soif. Et puis, les chastiemens, qui se font auec poix et discretion, se reçoiuent bien mieux, et auec plus de fruit, de celuy qui les souffre.	We ourselves, to do right, should never lay a hand on our servants while our anger lasts. While our pulse is racing and we feel agitated, let us put off the match. Things will truly seem different to us when we have calmed and cooled down. It is passion that commands then, passion that speaks, not we. Through it, faults look larger to us, like bodies seen through a fog. He who is hungry makes use of food; but he who would make use of punishment must have neither hunger nor thirst for it. And besides, punishments carried out with weight and discretion are much better received, and with more benefit, by the one who suffers them.
Autrement, il ne pense pas auoir esté iustement condamné, par vn homme agité d'ire et de furie: et allegue pour sa iustification, les mouuements extraordinaires de son maistre, l'inflammation de son visage, les sermens inusitez, et cette sienne inquietude, et precipitation temeraire. Ora tument ira, nigrescunt sanguine venæ, / Lumina Gorgoneo sœuius igne micant. Suetone recite, que Caïus Rabirius ayant esté condamné par Cæsar, ce qui luy seruit le plus enuers le peuple (auquel il appella) pour luy faire gaigner sa cause, ce fut l'animosité et l'aspreté que Cæsar auoit apporté en ce iugement.	Otherwise he does not think he has been justly condemned by a man shaken with wrath and fury; and he alleges in his own justification his master's extraordinary movements, the inflamed face, the unusual oaths, and that restlessness and rash haste of his. Faces swell with anger, veins grow black with blood, / Eyes flash more fiercely than a Gorgon's fire. Suetonius relates that when Gaius Rabirius had been condemned by Caesar, what helped him most with the people (to whom he appealed) in winning his case was the animosity and harshness Caesar had brought to the judgment.[3]

3 Ovid, The Art of Love.

THE PREACHER AND THE SERMON

Saying and doing differ, yet words carry more weight when the speaker lives by them.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.31.5	Le dire est autre chose que le faire, il faut considerer le presche à part, et le prescheur à part. Ceux-là se sont donnez beau ieu en nostre temps, qui ont essayé de choquer la verité de nostre Eglise, par les vices des ministres d'icelle: elle tire ses tesmoignages d'ailleurs. C'est vne sotte façon d'argumenter, et qui reietteroit toutes choses en confusion. Vn homme de bonnes mœurs, peut auoir des opinions faulces, et vn meschant peut prescher verité, voire celuy qui ne la croit pas.	Saying is one thing and doing another; we must consider the sermon apart and the preacher apart. Those in our time who have tried to shake the truth of our Church through the vices of its ministers have given themselves an easy game; the Church draws its testimonies from elsewhere. It is a foolish way of arguing, and one that would throw everything back into confusion. A man of good morals may hold false opinions, and a wicked man may preach the truth—even one who does not believe it.
	C'est sans doubte vne belle harmonie, quand le faire, et le dire vont ensemble: et ie ne veux pas nier, que le dire, lors que les actions suyuent, ne soit de plus d'authorité et efficace: comme disoit Eudamidas, oyant vn Philosophe discourir de la guerre; Ces propos sont beaux, mais celuy qui les dit, n'en est pas croyable, car il n'a pas les oreilles accoustumées au son de la trompette. Et Cleomenes oyant vn rhetoricien harenguer de la vaillance, s'en print fort à rire: et l'autre s'en scandalizant, il luy dit; I'en ferois de mesmes, si c'estoit vne arondelle qui en parlast: mais si c'estoit vne aigle, ie l'orrois volontiers.	It is no doubt a fine harmony when doing and saying go together; and I do not wish to deny that saying, when actions follow, carries more authority and effect. As Eudamidas said, hearing a philosopher discourse on war: "These remarks are fine, but the man who makes them is not to be believed, for his ears are not used to the sound of the trumpet." And Cleomenes, hearing a rhetorician harangue about valor, burst out laughing; and when the other was offended, he said to him: "I would do the same if it were a swallow talking about it; but if it were an eagle, I would gladly listen."[4]
	I'apperçois, ce me semble, és escrits des anciens, que celuy qui dit ce qu'il pense, l'assene bien plus viuement, que celuy qui se contrefaict. Oyez Cicero parler de l'amour de la liberté: oyez en parler Brutus, les escrits mesmes vous sonnent que cettuy-cy estoit homme pour l'achepter au prix de la vie. Que Cicero pere d'eloquence, traitte du mespris de la mort, que Seneque en traite aussi, celuy là traine languissant, et vous sentez qu'il vous veut resoudre de chose, dequoy il n'est pas resolu. Il ne vous donne point de cœur, car luy-mesmes n'en a point: l'autre vous anime et enflamme.	I notice, it seems to me, in the writings of the ancients, that the man who says what he thinks strikes home far more vividly than the one who is pretending. Listen to Cicero speak of the love of liberty; listen to Brutus speak of it: the very writings ring out to you that this man was one to buy it at the price of his life. Let Cicero, the father of eloquence, treat of the contempt of death; let Seneca treat of it too: the former drags along languidly, and you feel that he wants to make you resolved about something on which he is not resolved himself. He gives you no heart, for he has none himself; the other rouses and inflames you.
	Ie ne voy iamais autheur, mesmement de ceux qui traictent de la vertu et des actions, que ie ne recherche curieusement quel il a esté. Car les Ephores à Sparte voyans vn homme dissolu proposer au peuple vn aduis vtile, luy commanderent de se taire, et prierent vn homme de bien, de s'en attribuer l'inuention, et le proposer.	I never look at an author, especially one of those who write about virtue and actions, without inquiring curiously what kind of man he was. For the ephors at Sparta, seeing a dissolute man propose a useful piece of advice to the people, ordered him to be silent, and asked a good man to claim the idea as his own and propose it.

4 Eudamidas was a king of Sparta; both sayings come from Plutarch.

FRENCH

2.31.6 Les escrits de Plutarque, à les bien sauourer, nous le descouurent assez; et ie pense le cognoistre iusques dans l'ame: si voudrois-ie que nous eussions quelques memoires de sa vie. Et me suis ietté en ce discours à quartier, à propos du bon gré que ie sens à Aul. Gellius de nous auoir laissé par escrit ce compte de ses mœurs, qui reuient à mon subject de la cholere.

Vn sien esclaue mauuais homme et vicieux, mais qui auoit les oreilles aucunement abbreuuées des leçons de philosophie, ayant esté pour quelque sienne faute despouillé par le commandement de Plutarque; pendant qu'on le fouettoit, grondoit au commencement, que c'estoit sans raison, et qu'il n'auoit rien faict: mais en fin, se mettant à crier et iniurier bien à bon escient son maistre, luy reprochoit qu'il n'estoit pas philosophe, comme il s'en vantoit: qu'il luy auoit souuent ouy dire, qu'il estoit laid de se courroucer, voire qu'il en auoit faict vn liure: et ce que lors tout plongé en la colere, il le faisoit si cruellement battre, desmentoit entierement ses escrits.

A cela Plutarque, tout froidement et tout rassis; Comment, dit-il, rustre, à quoy iuges tu que ie sois à cette heure courroucé? mon visage, ma voix, ma couleur, ma parolle, te donne elle quelque tesmoignage que ie sois esmeu? Ie ne pense auoir ny les yeux effarouchez, ny le visage troublé, ny vn cry effroyable: rougis-ie? escume-ie? m'eschappe-il de dire chose, dequoy i'aye à me repentir? tressaulx-ie? fremis-ie de courroux? car pour te dire, ce sont là les vrais signes de la cholere. Et puis se destournant à celuy qui fouettoit: Continuez, luy dit-il, tousiours vostre besongne, pendant que cettuy-cy et moy disputons. Voyla son comte.

2.31.7 Archytas Tarentinus reuenant d'vne guerre, où il auoit esté Capitaine general, trouua tout plein de mauuais mesnage en sa maison, et ses terres en friche, par le mauuais gouuernement de son receueur: et l'ayant fait appeller: Va, luy dit-il, que si ie n'estois en cholere, ie t'estrillerois bien. Platon de mesme, s'estant eschauffé contre l'vn de ses esclaues, donna à Speusippus charge de le chastier, s'excusant d'y mettre la main luy-mesme, sur ce qu'il estoit courroucé. Charillus Lacedemonien, à vn Elote qui se portoit trop insolemment et audacieusement enuers luy: Par les Dieux, dit-il, si ie n'estois courroucé, ie te ferois tout à cette heure mourir.

ENGLISH

Plutarch's writings, if we savor them well, reveal him to us well enough, and I think I know him to the very soul; yet I wish we had some record of his life. And I have launched into this digression because of the gratitude I feel toward Aulus Gellius for leaving us in writing this story about his character, which brings me back to my subject of anger.[5]

A slave of his, a bad and vicious man, but whose ears were somewhat steeped in the lessons of philosophy, had been stripped by Plutarch's order for some fault of his. While he was being whipped, he grumbled at first that it was without reason and that he had done nothing. But in the end, starting to shout and insult his master in good earnest, he reproached him for not being the philosopher he boasted of being: he had often heard him say that it was ugly to get angry, indeed he had written a book about it; and the fact that he was now, wholly plunged in anger, having him so cruelly beaten, flatly contradicted his writings.

To this Plutarch replied, quite coolly and calmly: "What, you lout, what makes you judge that I am angry now? Does my face, my voice, my color, my speech give you any sign that I am agitated? I do not think my eyes are wild, or my face troubled, or my voice a frightful cry. Am I flushing? Am I foaming? Does anything escape me that I shall have to repent of? Am I trembling? Am I shaking with rage? For let me tell you, those are the true signs of anger." And then, turning to the man doing the whipping: "Carry on with your work," he said, "while this fellow and I argue." That is his story.

Archytas of Tarentum, returning from a war in which he had been commander-in-chief, found his household in a thorough mess and his lands lying fallow through the bad management of his steward. He had him summoned and said: "Go—if I were not angry, I would give you a good thrashing." Plato likewise, having grown heated against one of his slaves, gave Speusippus the job of punishing him, excusing himself from laying a hand on him himself on the ground that he was angry. Charillus, a Spartan, said to a helot who was behaving too insolently and boldly toward him: "By 5 Aulus Gellius, Roman author of the 2nd century AD, wrote the Attic Nights.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

the gods, if I were not angry, I would have you put to death this very moment."[6]

2.31.8 C'est vne passion qui se plaist en soy, et qui se flatte. Combien de fois nous estans esbranlez soubs vne fauce cause, si on vient à nous presenter quelque bonne deffence ou excuse, nous despitons nous contre la verité mesme et l'innocence? I'ay retenu à ce propos vn merueilleux exemple de l'antiquité. Piso personnage par tout ailleurs de notable vertu, s'estant esmeu contre vn sien soldat, dequoy reuenant seul du fourrage, il ne luy sçauoit rendre compte, où il auoit laissé vn sien compagnon, tinst pour aueré qu'il l'auoit tué, et le condamna soudain à la mort.

It is a passion that delights in itself and flatters itself. How many times, when we have been stirred up on a false cause, if someone comes and offers us some good defense or excuse, do we get annoyed at truth itself and innocence? I have kept in mind a wonderful example of this from antiquity. Piso, a man of notable virtue in every other respect, grew angry with one of his soldiers because, coming back alone from foraging, he could not tell him where he had left a comrade. Piso took it as proven that he had killed him and condemned him to death on the spot.[7]

Ainsi qu'il estoit au gibet, voicy arriuer ce compagnon esgaré: toute l'armée en fit grand'feste, et apres force caresses et accollades des deux compagnons, le bourreau meine l'vn et l'autre, en la presence de Piso, s'attendant bien toute l'assistance que ce luy seroit à luy-mesmes vn grand plaisir: mais ce fut au rebours, car par honte et despit, son ardeur qui estoit encore en son effort, se redoubla: et d'vne subtilité que sa passion luy fournit soudain, il en fit trois coulpables, par ce qu'il en auoit trouué vn innocent: et les fit depescher tous trois: Le premier soldat, par ce qu'il y auoit arrest contre luy: le second qui s'estoit esgaré, par ce qu'il estoit cause de la mort de son compagnon; et le bourreau pour n'auoir obey au commandement qu'on luy auoit faict.

Just as he was at the gallows, along came the lost comrade. The whole army made a great celebration of it, and after many embraces and hugs between the two comrades, the executioner brought them both before Piso, the whole company fully expecting that it would be a great pleasure to him too. But it was quite the reverse: out of shame and spite, his fury, which was still at its height, redoubled; and with a subtlety his passion suddenly supplied, he made three guilty men out of finding one innocent, and had all three dispatched: the first soldier, because there was a sentence against him; the second, who had got lost, because he was the cause of his comrade's death; and the executioner, for not having obeyed the order he had been given.

2.31.9 Ceux qui ont à negocier auec des femmes testues, peuuent auoir essayé à quelle rage on les iette, quand on oppose à leur agitation, le silence et la froideur, et qu'on desdaigne de nourrir leur courroux. L'orateur Celius estoit merueilleusement cholere de sa nature. A vn, qui souppoit en sa compagnie, homme de molle et douce conuersation, et qui pour ne l'esmouuoir, prenoit party d'approuuer tout ce qu'il disoit, et d'y consentir: luy ne pouuant souffrir son chagrin, se passer ainsi sans aliment: Nie moy quelque chose, de par les Dieux, dit-il, affin que nous soyons deux. Elles de mesmes, ne se courroucent, qu'affin qu'on se contre-courrouce, à l'imitation des loix de l'amour.

Those who have to deal with stubborn women may have found out into what a rage they are thrown when you meet their agitation with silence and coldness and disdain to feed their wrath. The orator Caelius was wonderfully hot-tempered by nature. A man was supping in his company, a man of soft and gentle conversation, who, so as not to provoke him, had decided to approve and agree with everything he said. Caelius, unable to bear having his ill humor pass thus without fuel, said: "Deny me something, by the gods, so that there may be two of us!" Women likewise get angry only so that you will get angry back, in imitation of the laws of love.[8]

6 Archytas of Tarentum was a Pythagorean philosopher and general.
7 Gnaeus Calpurnius Piso; the story is told by Seneca in On Anger.
8 Marcus Caelius Rufus, Roman orator and friend of Cicero; the story is in Seneca's On Anger.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Phocion à vn homme qui luy troubloit son propos, en l'iniuriant asprement, n'y fit autre chose que se taire, et luy donner tout loisir d'espuiser sa cholere: cela faict, sans aucune mention de ce trouble, il recommença son propos, en l'endroict où il l'auoit laissé. Il n'est replique si piquante comme est vn tel mespris.	Phocion, faced with a man who was interrupting his speech with harsh insults, did nothing but keep silent and give him all the time he wanted to exhaust his anger; that done, without any mention of this disturbance, he resumed his speech at the point where he had left off. There is no retort so stinging as such contempt.[9]

HIDDEN ANGER AND MY OWN

Suppressed anger gnaws within; Montaigne explains how he manages his own sudden but brief outbursts.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.31.10	Du plus cholere homme de France (et c'est tousiours imperfection, mais plus excusable à vn homme militaire: car en cet exercice il y a certes des parties, qui ne s'en peuuent passer) ie dy souuent, que c'est le plus patient homme que ie cognoisse à brider sa cholere: elle l'agite de telle violence et fureur, Magno veluti cùm flamma sonore Virgea suggeritur costis vndantis aheni, Exultántque æstu latices, furit intus aquai Fumidus atque altè spumis exuberat amnis, Nec iam se capit vnda, volat vapor ater ad auras, qu'il faut qu'il se contraingne cruellement, pour la moderer. Et pour moy, ie ne sçache passion, pour laquelle couurir et soustenir, ie peusse faire vn tel effort.	Of the most hot-tempered man in France (and it is always a flaw, but more excusable in a military man, for in that profession there are certainly parts that cannot do without it) I often say that he is the most patient man I know at bridling his anger. It shakes him with such violence and fury, As when a fire of twigs, with a great roar, is heaped Beneath the ribs of a seething cauldron, And the water leaps with the heat; within, the smoking flood Rages and boils up high with foam, And the water can no longer contain itself; black steam flies up into the air, that he has to restrain himself cruelly to moderate it. For my part, I know of no passion that I could make such an effort to hide and withstand.[10]
	Ie ne voudrois mettre la sagesse à si haut prix. Ie ne regarde pas tant ce qu'il fait, que combien il luy couste à ne faire pis. Vn autre se vantoit à moy, du reglement et douceur de ses mœurs, qui est, à la verité singuliere: ie luy disois, que c'estoit bien quelque chose, notamment à ceux, comme luy, d'eminente qualité, sur lesquels chacun a les yeux, de se presenter au monde tousiours bien temperez: mais que le principal estoit de prouuoir au dedans, et à soy-mesme: et que ce n'estoit pas à mon gré, bien mesnager ses affaires, que de se ronger interieurement: ce que ie craignois qu'il fist, pour maintenir ce masque, et cette reglée apparence par le dehors.	I would not want to set so high a price on wisdom. I look not so much at what he does as at how much it costs him not to do worse. Another man boasted to me of the orderliness and gentleness of his manners, which is truly remarkable. I told him that it was indeed something, especially for people like him of eminent rank, on whom all eyes are fixed, always to present themselves to the world well tempered; but that the main thing was to provide for the inside and for oneself; and that it was not, to my mind, managing one's affairs well to be gnawing at oneself inwardly—which I feared he was doing in order to keep up that mask and that orderly outward appearance.
2.31.11	On incorpore la cholere en la cachant: comme Diogenes dit à Demosthenes, lequel de peur d'estre apperceu en vne tauerne, se reculoit au dedans: Tant plus tu te recules	By hiding anger we drive it into our body—as Diogenes said to Demosthenes, who, for fear of being seen in a tavern, was drawing back inside: "The 9 Phocion, Athenian general and statesman of the 4th century BC.

10 Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

arriere, tant plus tu y entres. Ie conseille qu'on donne plustost vne buffe à la iouë de son valet, vn peu hors de saison, que de gehenner sa fantasie, pour representer cette sage contenance. Et aymerois mieux produire mes passions, que de les couuer à mes despens. Elles s'alanguissent en s'esuantant, et en s'exprimant. Il vaut mieux que leur poincte agisse au dehors, que de la plier contre nous. Omnia vitia in aperto leuiora sunt: et tunc perniciosissima, quum simulata sanitate subsidunt.

2.31.12 I'aduertis ceux, qui ont loy de se pouuoir courroucer en ma famille, premierement qu'ils mesnagent leur cholere, et ne l'espandent pas à tout prix: car cela en empesche l'effect et le poids. La criaillerie temeraire et ordinaire, passe en vsage, et fait que chacun la mesprise: celle que vous employez contre vn seruiteur pour son larcin, ne se sent point, d'autant que c'est celle mesme qu'il vous a veu employer cent fois contre luy, pour auoir mal rinsé vn verre, ou mal assis vne escabelle.

Secondement, qu'ils ne se courroussent point en l'air, et regardent que leur reprehension arriue à celuy de qui ils se plaignent: car ordinairement ils crient, auant qu'il soit en leur presence, et durent à crier vn siecle apres qu'il est party. Et secum petulans amentia certat. Ils s'en prennent à leur ombre, et poussent cette tempeste, en lieu, où personne n'en est ny chastié ny interessé, que du tintamarre de leur voix, tel qui n'en peut mais. I'accuse pareillement aux querelles, ceux qui brauent et se mutinent sans partie: il faut garder ces Rodomontades, où elles portent.

Mugitus veluti cùm prima in prælia taurus
Terrificos ciet, atque irasci in cornua tentat,
Arboris obnixus trunco, ventósque lacessit
Ictibus, et sparsa ad pugnam proludit arena.

2.31.13 Quand ie me courrouce, c'est le plus vifuement, mais aussi le plus briefuement et secretement que ie puis: ie me pers bien en vistesse, et en violence, mais non pas en trouble: si que i'aille iettant à l'abandon, et sans choix, toute sorte de parolles iniurieuses, et que ie ne regarde d'assoir pertinemment mes pointes, où i'estime qu'elles blessent le plus: car ie n'y employe communement, que la langue. Mes valets en ont meilleur marché aux grandes occasions qu'aux petites. Les petites me surprennent: et further back you go, the further in you are." I advise giving your valet a slap on the cheek, a bit unseasonably, rather than torturing your mind to put on this wise countenance. And I would rather bring my passions out than brood on them at my own expense. They weaken by being vented and expressed. It is better that their point should act outward than that we bend it against ourselves. All vices are lighter in the open, and most pernicious when they lurk beneath a pretense of health.[11]

ENGLISH

I warn those in my household who have the right to get angry, first, to husband their anger and not scatter it about at every turn, for that hinders its effect and weight. Rash and constant scolding becomes routine and makes everyone despise it. The scolding you use against a servant for his theft is not felt, since it is the very same he has seen you use against him a hundred times for rinsing a glass badly or setting a stool down wrong.

Secondly, not to get angry into thin air, and to see that their reproof reaches the person they are complaining of; for usually they shout before he is in their presence and go on shouting for an age after he has gone. And wanton madness quarrels with itself. They take on their own shadow and drive this storm to a place where no one is punished or touched by it, except, by the din of their voice, someone who is not to blame. I likewise blame, in quarrels, those who bluster and rebel with no opponent present: one must keep these rodomontades for where they strike home.[12]

As when a bull, before his first battle, raises Terrifying bellows and tries to put anger into his horns,
Butting against a tree trunk, and lashes the winds
With blows, and paws the sand in prelude to the fight.

When I get angry, it is as sharply, but also as briefly and privately, as I can. I do lose myself in speed and violence, but not in confusion—not so far as to go flinging every sort of insult about recklessly and at random, without taking care to plant my barbs pointedly where I think they will wound most; for usually I use only my tongue. My servants get off more cheaply on big occasions than on small ones. The small ones take me by sur-

11 Seneca, Letters.
12 The Latin is Claudian, Against Eutropius. Rodomontades: from Rodomonte, the boastful warrior of Boiardo and Ariosto.

FRENCH

le mal'heur veut, que depuis que vous estes dans le precipice, il n'importe, qui vous ayt donné le bransle: vous allez tousiours iusques au fons. La cheute se presse, s'esmeut, et se haste d'elle mesme.

Aux grandes occasions cela me paye, qu'elles sont si iustes, que chacun s'attend d'en voir naistre vne raisonnable cholere: ie me glorifie à tromper leur attente: ie me bande et prepare contre celles cy, elles me mettent en ceruelle, et menassent de m'emporter bien loing si ie les suiuoy. Ayséement ie me garde d'y entrer, et suis assez fort, si ie l'attens, pour repousser l'impulsion de cette passion, quelque violente cause qu'elle aye: mais si elle me preoccupe, et saisit vne fois, elle m'emporte, quelque vaine cause qu'elle aye. Ie marchande ainsin auec ceux qui peuuent contester auec moy: Quand vous me sentirez esmeu le premier, laissez moy aller à tort ou à droict, i'en feray de mesme à mon tour.

La tempeste ne s'engendre que de la concurrence des choleres, qui se produisent volontiers l'vne de l'autre, et ne naissent en vn poinct. Donnons à chacune sa course, nous voyla tousiours en paix. Vtile ordonnance, mais de difficile execution. Par fois m'aduient il aussi, de representer le courroussé, pour le reiglement de ma maison, sans aucune vraye emotion. A mesure que l'aage me rend les humeurs plus aigres, i'estudie à m'y opposer, et feray si ie puis que ie seray d'oresenauant d'autant moins chagrin et difficile, que i'auray plus d'excuse et d'inclination à l'estre: quoy que parcydeuant ie l'aye esté, entre ceux qui le sont le moins.

2.31.14 Encore vn mot pour clorre ce pas. Aristote dit, que la colere sert par fois d'armes à la vertu et à la vaillance. Cela est vray-semblable: toutesfois ceux qui y contredisent, respondent plaisamment, que c'est vn' arme de nouuel vsage: car nous remuons les autres armes, ceste cy nous remue: nostre main ne la guide pas, c'est elle qui guide nostre main: elle nous tient, nous ne la tenons pas.

ENGLISH

prise; and the misfortune is that once you are over the precipice, it does not matter who gave you the push: you always go right to the bottom. The fall presses on, gathers speed and hurries of itself.

On big occasions I am repaid by this: they are so just that everyone expects to see a reasonable anger arise from them, and I pride myself on cheating their expectation. I brace and prepare myself against these; they put me on my guard and threaten to carry me very far if I followed them. I easily keep myself from entering into it, and I am strong enough, if I am expecting it, to repel the impulse of this passion, however violent its cause; but if it catches me unawares and once seizes me, it carries me away, however trivial its cause. So I strike this bargain with those who may have words with me: "When you feel that I am the first to be roused, let me run on, rightly or wrongly; I will do the same for you in my turn."

The storm arises only from the clash of angers, which readily breed one from the other and are not born at the same moment. Let us give each its run, and we are always at peace. A useful rule, but hard to carry out. Sometimes I also happen to play the angry man, for the good order of my household, without any real emotion. As age makes my temper sourer, I study to resist it; and if I can, I shall make myself henceforth all the less peevish and difficult, the more excuse and inclination I have to be so—although hitherto I have been among those who are least so.

One more word to close this topic. Aristotle says that anger sometimes serves as a weapon for virtue and valor. That is plausible; yet those who contradict it reply amusingly that it is a weapon of a novel kind: for we wield other weapons, but this one wields us. Our hand does not guide it; it guides our hand. It holds us; we do not hold it.

II.32 A Defense of Seneca and Plutarch

Defence de Seneque et de Plutarque
Montaigne defends Seneca against a Protestant pamphlet likening him to a hated cardinal, and Plutarch against Jean Bodin's charges.

FRENCH

2.32.1 LA familiarité que i'ay auec ces personnages icy, et l'assistance qu'ils font à ma vieillesse, et à mon liure massonné purement de leurs despouïlles, m'oblige à espouser leur honneur.

2.32.2 Quant à Seneque, parmy vne miliasse de petits liurets, que ceux de la Religion pretendue reformée font courir pour la deffence de leur cause, qui partent par fois de bonne main, et qu'il est grand dommage n'estre embesoignée à meilleur subiect, i'en ay veu autres-fois vn, qui pour alonger et remplir la similitude qu'il veut trouuer, du gouuernement de nostre pauure feu Roy Charles neufiesme, auec celuy de Neron, apparie feu Monsieur le Cardinal de Lorraine auec Seneque, leurs fortunes, d'auoir esté tous deux les premiers au gouuernement de leurs Princes, et quant et quant leurs mœurs, leurs conditions, et leurs deportemens.

Enquoy à mon opinion il fait bien de l'honneur audict Seigneur Cardinal: car encore que ie soys de ceux qui estiment autant son esprit, son eloquence, son zele enuers sa religion et seruice de son Roy, et sa bonne fortune, d'estre nay en vn siecle, où il fust si nouueau, et si rare, et quant et quant si necessaire pour le bien public, d'auoir vn personnage ecclesiastique de telle noblesse et dignité, suffisant et capable de sa charge: si est-ce qu'à confesser la verité, ie n'estime sa capacité de beaucoup pres telle, ny sa vertu si nette et entiere, ny si ferme, que celle de Seneque.

2.32.3 Or, ce liure dequoy ie parle, pour venir à son but, fait vne description de Seneque tres-iniurieuse, ayant emprunté ces reproches de Dion l'historien, duquel ie ne crois aucunement le tesmoignage. Car outre qu'il est inconstant, qui apres auoir appellé Seneque tres-sage tantost, et tantost ennemy mortel des vices de Neron, le fait ailleurs, auaritieux, vsurier, ambitieux, lasche, voluptueux, et contrefaisant le philosophe à fauces

ENGLISH

The familiarity I have with these two figures, and the help they give to my old age and to my book, built purely out of their spoils, oblige me to take up the defense of their honor.

As for Seneca: among the myriad little pamphlets that those of the so-called Reformed Religion circulate in defense of their cause—some of which come from a good hand, and it is a great pity that it is not employed on a better subject—I once saw one which, to stretch out and fill in the likeness it seeks to find between the government of our poor late King Charles IX and that of Nero, pairs the late Cardinal of Lorraine with Seneca: their fortunes, in that both were first in the government of their princes, and along with that their characters, their conditions and their conduct.[1]

In which, in my opinion, he does the said Lord Cardinal great honor. For although I am one of those who greatly esteem his mind, his eloquence, his zeal for his religion and for the service of his King, and his good fortune in being born in an age when it was so novel and so rare, and at the same time so necessary for the public good, to have a churchman of such nobility and rank who was competent and equal to his office—still, to confess the truth, I do not consider his ability anywhere near Seneca's, nor his virtue so clean, so whole or so firm.

Now this book I am speaking of, to reach its goal, gives a very insulting description of Seneca, having borrowed these reproaches from Dio the historian, whose testimony I do not believe at all. For besides being inconsistent—after calling Seneca at one moment most wise and at another a mortal enemy of Nero's vices, he elsewhere makes him

1 Charles de Guise, Cardinal of Lorraine (1524–1574), chief adviser to the French crown under Francis II and Charles IX.

FRENCH

enseignes: sa vertu paroist si viue et vigoureuse en ses escrits, et la defence y est si claire à aucunes de ces imputations, comme de sa richesse et despence excessiue, que ie n'en croiroy aucun tesmoignage au contraire. Et d'auantage, il est bien plus raisonnable, de croire en telles choses les historiens Romains, que les Grecs et estrangers.

Or Tacitus et les autres, parlent tres-honorablement, et de sa vie et de sa mort: et nous le peignent en toutes choses personnage tres-excellent et tres-vertueux. Et ie ne veux alleguer autre reproche contre le iugement de Dion, que cestuy-cy, qui est ineuitable: c'est qu'il a le sentiment si malade aux affaires Romaines, qu'il ose soustenir la cause de Iulius Cæsar contre Pompeius, et d'Antonius contre Cicero.

ENGLISH

avaricious, a usurer, ambitious, cowardly, given to pleasure, and a philosopher under false colors—Seneca's virtue appears so lively and vigorous in his writings, and his defense against some of these charges, such as his wealth and excessive spending, is so clear there, that I would believe no testimony to the contrary. Moreover, it is much more reasonable in such matters to believe the Roman historians than the Greeks and foreigners.[2]

Now Tacitus and the others speak very honorably both of his life and of his death, and portray him to us as in all things a most excellent and virtuous man. And I will allege no other reproach against Dio's judgment than this one, which is unanswerable: his feeling for Roman affairs is so unsound that he dares to uphold the cause of Julius Caesar against Pompey, and of Antony against Cicero.

BODIN AGAINST PLUTARCH

Montaigne answers Jean Bodin's charges that Plutarch told incredible tales and favored the Greeks.

FRENCH

2.32.4 Venons à Plutarque. Iean Bodin est vn bon autheur de nostre temps, et accompagné de beaucoup plus de iugement que la tourbe des escriuailleurs de son siecle, et merite qu'on le iuge et considere. Ie le trouue vn peu hardy en ce passage de sa Methode de l'histoire, où il accuse Plutarque non seulement d'ignorance (surquoy ie l'eusse laissé dire: car cela n'est pas de mon gibier), mais aussi en ce que cet autheur escrit souuent des choses incroyables et entierement fabuleuses (ce sont ses mots).

S'il eust dit simplement, les choses autrement qu'elles ne sont, ce n'estoit pas grande reprehension: car ce que nous n'auons pas veu, nous le prenons des mains d'autruy et à credit: et ie voy qu'à escient il recite par fois diuersement mesme histoire: comme le iugement des trois meilleurs capitaines qui eussent onques esté, faict par Hannibal, il est autrement en la vie de Flaminius, autrement en celle de Pyrrhus. Mais de le charger d'auoir pris pour argent content, des choses incroyables et impossibles, c'est accuser de faute de iugement, le plus iudicieux autheur du monde.

2.32.5 Et voicy son exemple: Comme, ce dit-il, quand il recite qu'vn enfant de Lacedemone se laissa deschirer tout le

ENGLISH

Let us come to Plutarch. Jean Bodin is a good author of our time, endowed with far more judgment than the mob of scribblers of his age, and he deserves to be judged and considered. I find him a little bold in the passage of his Method of History where he accuses Plutarch not only of ignorance (on which I would have let him have his say, for that is not my game), but also of often writing "things incredible and entirely fabulous" (those are his words).[3]

If he had simply said "things otherwise than they are," it would not have been a great reproach; for what we have not seen we take from the hands of others and on credit. And I see that he sometimes knowingly tells the same story in different ways: for instance, Hannibal's judgment of the three best captains who ever lived is given one way in the Life of Flamininus and another in that of Pyrrhus. But to charge him with having taken incredible and impossible things for ready cash is to accuse the most judicious author in the world of a lack of judgment.

And here is his example: "As," he says, "when he relates that a Spartan boy let his whole belly be

2 Cassius Dio, Greek historian of Rome, early 3rd century AD.

FRENCH

ventre à vn renardeau, qu'il auoit desrobé, et le tenoit caché soubs sa robe, iusques à mourir plustost que de descouurir son larecin. Ie trouue en premier lieu cet exemple mal choisi: d'autant qu'il est bien malaisé de borner les efforts des facultez de l'ame, là où des forces corporelles, nous auons plus de loy de les limiter et cognoistre. Et à cette cause, si c'eust esté à moy à faire, i'eusse plustost choisi vn exemple de cette seconde sorte: et il y en a de moins croyables.

Comme entre autres, ce qu'il recite de Pyrrhus, que tout blessé qu'il estoit, il donna si grand coup d'espée à vn sien ennemy armé de toutes pieces, qu'il le fendit du haut de la teste iusques au bas, si que le corps se partit en deux parts. En son exemple, ie n'y trouue pas grand miracle, ny ne reçois l'excuse de quoy il couure Plutarque, d'auoir adiousté ce mot, comme on dit, pour nous aduertir, et tenir en bride nostre creance. Car si ce n'est aux choses receuës par authorité et reuerence d'ancienneté ou de religion, il n'eust voulu ny recevoir luy mesme, ny nous proposer à croire, choses de foy incroyables.

Et que ce mot, comme on dit, il ne l'employe pas en ce lieu pour cet effect, il est aysé à voir par ce que luy mesme nous raconte ailleurs sur ce subiect de la patience des enfans Lacedemoniens, des exemples aduenuz de son temps plus malaisez à persuader. Comme celuy que Cicero a tesmoigné aussi autant luy, pour auoir, à ce qu'il dit, esté sur les lieux: Que iusques à leur temps, il se trouuoit des enfans en cette preuue de patience, à quoy on les essayoit deuant l'autel de Diane, qui souffroyent d'y estre fouëtez iusques à ce que le sang leur couloit par tout non seulement sans s'escrier, mais encores sans gemir, et aucuns iusques à y laisser volontairement la vie.

Et ce que Plutarque aussi recite, auec cent autres tesmoins, qu'au sacrifice, vn charbon ardent s'estant coulé dans la manche d'vn enfant Lacedemonien, ainsi qu'il encensoit, il se laissa brusler tout le bras, iusques à ce que la senteur de la chair cuyte en vint aux assistans. Il n'estoit rien selon leur coustume, où il leur allast plus de la reputation, ny dequoy ils eussent à souffrir plus de blasme et de honte, que d'estre surpris en larecin. Ie suis si imbu de la grandeur de ces hommes là, que non seulement il ne me semble, comme à Bodin, que son torn open by a fox cub he had stolen and was keeping hidden under his robe, going so far as to die rather than reveal his theft." I find this example badly chosen in the first place, because it is very hard to set bounds to the efforts of the faculties of the soul, whereas with bodily strength we have more right to limit and know it. For that reason, if it had been up to me, I would rather have chosen an example of this second kind; and there are some less believable ones.

ENGLISH

For instance, among others, what he relates of Pyrrhus: that, wounded as he was, he dealt an enemy armed from head to foot such a blow with his sword that he split him from the top of his head to the bottom, so that the body fell apart in two pieces. In Bodin's example I find no great miracle; nor do I accept the excuse with which he covers Plutarch, that he added the words "as they say" to warn us and keep a rein on our belief. For except in matters received on authority and out of reverence for antiquity or religion, Plutarch would not have wanted either to accept himself, or to offer us for belief, things incredible in themselves.

And that he does not use these words "as they say" here for that purpose is easy to see from what he himself tells us elsewhere on this subject of the endurance of Spartan children—examples that occurred in his own time and are harder to credit. Such is the one that Cicero also attested before him, having, as he says, been on the spot: that even in their time there were children to be found, in that test of endurance to which they were put before the altar of Diana, who let themselves be whipped there until the blood ran all over them, not only without crying out but even without groaning, and some to the point of willingly giving up their lives there.

And there is what Plutarch also relates, along with a hundred other witnesses: that at a sacrifice, a burning coal slipped into the sleeve of a Spartan boy while he was burning incense, and he let his whole arm burn until the smell of cooked flesh reached the bystanders. By their custom there was nothing in which their reputation was more at stake, nor for which they had to suffer more blame and shame, than being caught stealing. I am so steeped in the greatness of those men that not

3 Bodin's Method for the Easy Understanding of History appeared in 1566.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	conte soit incroyable, que ie ne le trouue pas seulement rare et estrange.	only does Plutarch's story not seem incredible to me, as it does to Bodin, but I do not even find it rare or strange.
	L'histoire Spartaine est pleine de mille plus aspres exemples et plus rares: elle est à ce prix toute miracle.	Spartan history is full of a thousand harsher and rarer examples; by that standard it is all miracle.
2.32.6	Marcellinus recite sur ce propos du larecin, que de son temps il ne s'estoit encores peu trouuer aucune sorte de tourment, qui peust forcer les Egyptiens surpris en ce mesfaict: qui estoit fort en vsage entre eux, à dire seulement leur nom.	Marcellinus relates, on this subject of theft, that in his time no kind of torture had yet been found that could force Egyptians caught in this crime, which was very common among them, even to tell their name.
2.32.7	Vn paisan Espagnol estant mis à la gehenne sur les complices de l'homicide du præteur Lucius Piso, crioit au milieu des tourmens, que ses amis ne bougeassent, et l'assistassent en toute seureté, et qu'il n'estoit pas en la douleur, de luy arracher vn mot de confession, et n'en eut on autre chose, pour le premier iour. Le lendemain, ainsi qu'on le ramenoit pour recommencer son tourment, s'esbranlant vigoureusement entre les mains de ses gardes, il alla froisser sa teste contre vne paroy, et s'y tua.	A Spanish peasant, put to torture to name the accomplices in the murder of the praetor Lucius Piso, cried out in the midst of his torments that his friends should not budge but should stand by and watch in complete safety, and that it was not in the power of pain to wring from him one word of confession; and nothing else was got from him the first day. The next day, as they were bringing him back to begin his torture again, he wrenched himself vigorously out of his guards' hands, dashed his head against a wall and killed himself.
2.32.8	Epicharis ayant saoulé et lassé la cruauté des satellites de Neron, et soustenu leur feu, leurs batures, leurs engins, sans aucune voix de reuelation de sa coniuration, tout vn iour: rapportée à la gehenne l'endemain, les membres touts brisez, passa vn lasset de sa robbe dans l'vn bras de sa chaize, à tout vn nœud coulant, et y fourrant sa teste, s'estrangla du pois de son corps. Ayant le courage d'ainsi mourir, et se desrober aux premiers tourments, semble elle pas à escient auoir presté sa vie à cette espreuue de sa patience du iour precedent, pour se moquer de ce tyran, et encourager d'autres à semblable entreprinse contre luy?	Epicharis glutted and wearied the cruelty of Nero's henchmen, withstanding their fire, their beatings and their instruments for a whole day without a word revealing her conspiracy. Carried back to the torture the next day, her limbs all broken, she passed a cord from her dress through one arm of her chair, with a running knot, put her head into it, and strangled herself with the weight of her body. Having the courage to die thus and escape the earlier torments, does she not seem to have deliberately lent her life to that trial of her endurance the day before, in order to mock the tyrant and encourage others to a similar enterprise against him?[4]
2.32.9	Et qui s'enquerra à nos argoulets, des experiences qu'ils ont euës en ces guerres ciuiles, il se trouuera des effets de patience, d'obstination et d'opiniastreté, parmy nos miserables siecles, et en cette tourbe molle et effeminée, encore plus que l'Egyptienne, dignes d'estre comparez à ceux que nous venons de reciter de la vertu Spartaine. Ie sçay qu'il s'est trouué des simples paysans, s'estre laissez griller la plante des pieds, ecrazer le bout des doigts à tout le chien d'vne pistole, pousser les yeux sanglants	And if you ask our light horsemen about what they have seen in these civil wars, you will find instances of endurance, obstinacy and stubbornness, in our wretched age and among this soft and spineless rabble, softer even than the Egyptian one, worthy of comparison with the examples of Spartan virtue we have just related. I know that there have been simple peasants who let the soles of their feet be roasted, the ends of their fingers crushed with the hammer of a pistol, and their

4 Epicharis, a freedwoman involved in the conspiracy of Piso against Nero in AD 65, as told by Tacitus.

FRENCH

hors de la teste, à force d'auoir le front serré d'vne corde, auant que de s'estre seulement voulu mettre à rançon.

I'en ay veu vn, laissé pour mort tout nud dans vn fossé, ayant le col tout meurtry et enflé, d'vn licol qui y pendoit encore, auec lequel on l'auoit tirassé toute la nuict, à la queuë d'vn cheual, le corps percé en cent lieux, à coups de dague, qu'on luy auoit donné, non pas pour le tuer, mais pour luy faire de la douleur et de la crainte: qui auoit souffert tout cela, et iusques à y auoir perdu parolle et sentiment, resolu, à ce qu'il me dit, de mourir plustost de mille morts (comme de vray, quant à sa souffrance, il en auoit passé vne toute entiere) auant que rien promettre: et si estoit vn des plus riches laboureurs de toute la contrée.

Combien en a lon veu se laisser patiemment brusler et rotir, pour des opinions empruntées d'autruy, ignorées et incognues? I'ay cogneu cent et cent femmes (car ils disent que les testes de Gascongne ont quelque prerogatiue en cela) que vous eussiez plustost faict mordre dans le fer chaut, que de leur faire desmordre vne opinion qu'elles eussent conçeuë en cholere. Elles s'exasperent à l'encontre des coups et de la contrainte.

Et celuy qui forgea le conte de la femme, qui pour aucune correction de menaces, et bastonnades, ne cessoit d'appeller son mary pouïlleux, et qui precipitée dans l'eau haussoit encores en s'estouffant, les mains, et faisoit au dessus de sa teste, signe de tuer des poux: forgea vn conte, duquel en verité tous les iours, on voit l'image expresse en l'opiniastreté des femmes. Et est l'opiniastreté sœur de la constance, au moins en vigueur et fermeté.

2.32.10 Il ne faut pas iuger ce qui est possible, et ce qui ne l'est pas, selon ce qui est croyable et incroyable à nostre sens, comme i'ay dit ailleurs. Et est vne grande faute, et en laquelle toutesfois la plus part des hommes tombent: ce que ie ne dis pas pour Bodin: de faire difficulté de croire d'autruy, ce qu'eux ne sçauroient faire, ou ne voudroient. Il semble à chacun que la maistresse forme de l'humaine nature est en luy: selon elle, il faut regler tous les autres. Les allures qui ne se rapportent aux siennes, sont faintes et fauces. Luy propose lon quelque chose des actions ou facultez d'vn autre?

la premiere chose qu'il appelle à la consultation de son iugement, c'est son exemple: selon qu'il en va chez luy, selon cela va l'ordre du monde. O l'asnerie dangereuse et bloody eyes forced out of their heads by a cord drawn tight around their foreheads, before they would so much as agree to pay a ransom.

ENGLISH

I have seen one left for dead, stark naked in a ditch. His neck was all bruised and swollen from a halter still hanging from it, by which he had been dragged all night at a horse's tail. His body had been pierced in a hundred places with dagger thrusts, given him not to kill him but to cause him pain and fear. He had endured all this, to the point of losing speech and feeling, resolved, as he told me, to die a thousand deaths (and indeed, so far as suffering goes, he had gone through one entire death) rather than promise anything. And yet he was one of the richest farmers in the whole region.

How many have we seen let themselves be patiently burned and roasted for opinions borrowed from others, which they did not understand and did not know? I have known hundreds upon hundreds of women (for they say that Gascon heads have some special privilege in this) whom you could sooner have made sink their teeth into red-hot iron than make them let go of an opinion they had formed in anger. Blows and constraint only make them more furious.

The man who made up the tale of the woman who, for all the correction of threats and beatings, would not stop calling her husband lousy, and who, thrown into the water and choking, still raised her hands and made above her head the sign of cracking lice, made up a tale of which, in truth, we see the exact image every day in the stubbornness of women. And stubbornness is the sister of constancy, at least in vigor and firmness.

We must not judge what is possible and what is not by what is credible or incredible to our own mind, as I have said elsewhere. It is a great fault, and yet one into which most men fall (I do not say this about Bodin), to balk at believing of others what they themselves could not do, or would not. Each man thinks that the master pattern of human nature is in himself, and that all others must be measured by it. Ways of going that do not match his own are feigned and false. Is he told something about another man's actions or faculties?

The first thing he calls in to consult his judgment is his own example: as things go with him, so goes the order of the world. Oh, what dangerous and ininsupportable! Moy ie considere aucuns hommes fort loing au dessus de moy, notamment entre les anciens: et encores que ie recognoisse clairement mon impuissance à les suyure de mille pas, ie ne laisse pas de les suyure à veuë, et iuger les ressorts qui les haussent ainsi, desquels i'apperçoy aucunement en moy les semences: comme ie fay aussi de l'extreme bassesse des esprits, qui ne m'estonne, et que ie ne mescroy non plus.

FRENCH

Ie voy bien le tour que celles là se donnent pour se monter, et i'admire leur grandeur: et ces eslancemens que ie trouue tres-beaux, ie les embrasse: et si mes forces n'y vont, au moins mon iugement s'y applique tres-volontiers.

2.32.11 L'autre exemple qu'il allegue des choses incroyables, et entierement fabuleuses, dictes par Plutarque: c'est qu'Agesilaus fut mulcté par les Ephores pour auoir attiré à soy seul, le cœur et la volonté de ses citoyens. Ie ne sçay quelle marque de fauceté il y treuue: mais tant y a, que Plutarque parle là des choses qui luy deuoyent estre beaucoup mieux cognuës qu'à nous: et n'estoit pas nouueau en Grece, de voir les hommes punis et exilez, pour cela seul, d'agreer trop à leurs citoyens: tesmoin l'Ostracisme et le Petalisme.

2.32.12 Il y a encore en ce mesme lieu, vn' autre accusation qui me pique pour Plutarque, où il dit qu'il a bien assorty de bonne foy, les Romains aux Romains, et les Grecs entre eux, mais non les Romains aux Grecz, tesmoin, dit-il, Demosthenes et Cicero, Caton et Aristides, Sylla et Lisander, Marcellus et Pelopidas, Pompeius et Agesilaus, estimant qu'il a fauorisé les Grecz, de leur auoir donné des compagnons si dispareils. C'est iustement attaquer ce que Plutarque a de plus excellent et loüable. Car en ses comparaisons (qui est la piece plus admirable de ses œuvres, et en laquelle à mon aduis il s'est autant pleu) la fidelité et syncerité de ses iugemens, esgale leur profondeur et leur poix.

C'est vn philosophe, qui nous apprend la vertu. Voyons si nous le pourrons garentir de ce reproche de preuarication et fauceté. Ce que ie puis penser auoir donné occasion à ce iugement, c'est ce grand et esclatant lustre des noms Romains, que nous auons en la teste: il ne tolerable asininity! As for me, I regard some men as far above me, notably among the ancients. And though I clearly recognize that I am powerless to follow them within a thousand paces, I still follow them with my eyes and judge the springs that raise them so high, the seeds of which I perceive in myself to some degree. I do the same with the extreme baseness of some minds, which does not stun me, and which I do not disbelieve either.

ENGLISH

I can see the swing those lofty souls give themselves to rise, and I admire their greatness; and those leaps, which I find very beautiful, I embrace. If my strength does not reach that far, at least my judgment applies itself to them most willingly.

The other example he cites of incredible and wholly fabulous things told by Plutarch is that Agesilaus was fined by the ephors for having drawn to himself alone the hearts and goodwill of his fellow citizens. I do not know what mark of falsehood he finds in that. But at all events Plutarch is speaking there of things that must have been far better known to him than to us. And it was nothing new in Greece to see men punished and exiled for this alone, for being too pleasing to their fellow citizens: witness ostracism and petalism.[5]

In this same passage there is another accusation that stings me on Plutarch's behalf. Bodin says that Plutarch matched Romans with Romans and Greeks with Greeks in good faith, but not Romans with Greeks: witness, he says, Demosthenes and Cicero, Cato and Aristides, Sulla and Lysander, Marcellus and Pelopidas, Pompey and Agesilaus. He holds that Plutarch favored the Greeks by giving them such ill-matched companions. That is to attack precisely what is most excellent and praiseworthy in Plutarch. For in his comparisons (which are the most admirable part of his works, and the part in which, in my opinion, he took most pleasure) the fidelity and sincerity of his judgments equal their depth and their weight.

He is a philosopher who teaches us virtue. Let us see whether we can defend him against this charge of bad faith and falsehood. What I imagine gave rise to this judgment is the great and dazzling luster of Roman names that we carry in our heads:

5 Petalism was the Syracusan counterpart of Athenian ostracism, with the names of those to be banished written on olive leaves.

FRENCH

nous semble point, que Demosthenes puisse esgaler la gloire d'vn consul, proconsul, et questeur de cette grande republique. Mais qui considerera la verité de la chose, et les hommes en eux mesmes, à quoy Plutarque a plus visé, et à balancer leurs mœurs, leurs naturels, leur suffisance, que leur fortune: ie pense au rebours de Bodin, que Ciceron et le vieux Caton, en doiuent de reste à leurs compaignons.

Pour son dessein, i'eusse plustost choisi l'exemple du ieune Caton comparé à Phocion: car en ce pair, il se trouueroit vne plus vray-semblable disparité à l'aduantage du Romain. Quant à Marcellus, Sylla, et Pompeius, ie voy bien que leurs exploits de guerre sont plus enflez, glorieux, et pompeux, que ceux des Grecs, que Plutarque leur apparie: mais les actions les plus belles et vertueuses, non plus en la guerre qu'ailleurs, ne sont pas tousiours les plus fameuses. Ie voy souuent des noms de capitaines, estouffez soubs la splendeur d'autres noms, de moins de merite: tesmoin Labienus, Ventidius, Telesinus et plusieurs autres.

Et à le prendre par là, si i'auois à me plaindre pour les Grecs, pourrois-ie pas dire, que beaucoup moins est Camillus comparable à Themistocles, les Gracches à Agis et Cleomenes, Numa à Lycurgus? Mais c'est folie de vouloir iuger d'vn traict, les choses à tant de visages.

2.32.13 Quand Plutarque les compare, il ne les esgale pas pourtant. Qui plus disertement et conscientieusement, pourroit remarquer leurs differences? Vient-il à parangonner les victoires, les exploits d'armes, la puissance des armées conduites par Pompeius, et ses triumphes, auec ceux d'Agesilaus? Ie ne croy pas, dit-il, que Xenophon mesme, s'il estoit viuant, encore qu'on luy ait concedé d'escrire tout ce qu'il a voulu à l'aduantage d'Agesilaus, osast le mettre en comparaison. Parle-il de conferer Lysander à Sylla: Il n'y a, dit-il, point de comparaison, ny en nombre de victoires, ny en hazard de batailles: car Lysander ne gaigna seulement que deux batailles nauales, etc. Cela, ce n'est rien desrober aux Romains.

Pour les auoir simplement presentez aux Grecz, il ne leur peut auoir fait iniure, quelque disparité qui y puisse estre. Et Plutarque ne les contrepoise pas entiers: il n'y a en gros aucune preference: il apparie les pieces et les circonstances, l'vne apres l'autre, et les iuge separément.

ENGLISH

it does not seem to us that Demosthenes can equal the glory of a consul, proconsul and quaestor of that great republic. But if one considers the truth of the matter, and the men in themselves (which is what Plutarch chiefly aimed at, weighing their characters, their natures and their abilities rather than their fortune), I think, contrary to Bodin, that Cicero and the elder Cato fall short of their companions.

For his purpose I would rather have chosen the example of the younger Cato compared with Phocion: in that pair there would be a more plausible disparity to the Roman's advantage. As for Marcellus, Sulla and Pompey, I can see that their feats of war are grander, more glorious and more showy than those of the Greeks whom Plutarch pairs with them. But the finest and most virtuous actions, in war no more than elsewhere, are not always the most famous. I often see the names of commanders smothered beneath the splendor of other names of less merit: witness Labienus, Ventidius, Telesinus and many others.

And taking it from that angle, if I had to complain on behalf of the Greeks, could I not say that Camillus is much less comparable to Themistocles, the Gracchi to Agis and Cleomenes, Numa to Lycurgus? But it is folly to try to judge with a single stroke things that have so many faces.

When Plutarch compares them, he does not for all that make them equal. Who could point out their differences more clearly and conscientiously? Does he come to compare the victories, the feats of arms, the strength of the armies led by Pompey, and his triumphs, with those of Agesilaus? I do not believe, he says, that Xenophon himself, if he were alive, even though he was allowed to write whatever he liked to the advantage of Agesilaus, would dare to set them side by side. Does he speak of comparing Lysander with Sulla? There is no comparison, he says, either in the number of victories or in the hazard of battles: for Lysander won only two naval battles, etc. That is not robbing the Romans of anything.

By merely setting them beside the Greeks he cannot have wronged them, whatever disparity there may be. And Plutarch does not weigh them against each other as wholes; there is no overall preference. He matches the parts and the circumstances

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Parquoy, si on le vouloit conuaincre de faueur, il falloit en esplucher quelque iugement particulier: ou dire en general, qu'il auroit failly d'assortir tel Grec à tel Romain: d'autant qu'il y en auroit d'autres plus correspondans pour les apparier, et se rapportans mieux.	one after another and judges them separately. So if anyone wanted to convict him of partiality, he should have picked apart some particular judgment, or said in general that Plutarch was wrong to match such a Greek with such a Roman, since there were others better suited to the pairing and more alike.

II.33 The Story of Spurina

L'histoire de Spurina

A handsome youth who disfigured his face to escape women's desire leads Montaigne to Caesar's ambition and the mastery of passions.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.33.1	LA philosophie ne pense pas auoir mal employé ses moyens, quand elle a rendu à la raison, la souueraine maistrise de nostre ame, et l'authorité de tenir en bride nos appetits. Entre lesquels ceux qui iugent qu'il n'en y a point de plus violens, que ceux que l'amour engendre, ont cela pour leur opinion, qu'ils tiennent au corps et à l'ame, et que tout l'homme en est possedé: en maniere que la santé mesmes en depend, et est la medecine par fois contrainte de leur seruir de maquerellage. Mais au contraire, on pourroit aussi dire, que le meslange du corps y apporte du rabais, et de l'affoiblissement: car tels desirs sont subiects à satieté, et capables de remedes materiels.	Philosophy does not think it has used its means badly when it has given reason sovereign mastery over our soul and the authority to hold our appetites in check. Among these appetites, those who judge that none are more violent than the ones love engenders base their opinion on the fact that they belong to both body and soul, and that the whole man is possessed by them, so much so that even health depends on them and medicine is sometimes forced to act as their procurer. But on the contrary, one could also say that the admixture of the body brings them some abatement and weakening: for such desires are subject to satiety and can be cured by material remedies.
2.33.2	Plusieurs ayans voulu deliurer leurs ames des alarmes continuelles que leur donnoit cet appetit, se sont seruis d'incision et destranchement des parties esmeuës et alterées. D'autres en ont du tout abatu la force, et l'ardeur, par frequente application de choses froides, comme de neige, et de vinaigre. Les haires de nos aieulx estoient de cet vsage: c'est vne matiere tissue de poil de cheual, dequoy les vns d'entr'eux faisoient des chemises, et d'autres des ceintures à gehenner leurs reins.	Many who wanted to free their souls from the continual alarms this appetite gave them have resorted to cutting and amputating the aroused and disordered parts. Others have entirely beaten down its force and ardor by frequent application of cold things, such as snow and vinegar. The hair shirts of our forefathers served this purpose: it is a fabric woven of horsehair, of which some of them made shirts, and others belts to torment their loins.
	Vn Prince me disoit, il n'y a pas long temps, que pendant sa ieunesse, vn iour de feste solemne, en la cour du Roy François premier, où tout le monde estoit paré, il luy print enuie de se vestir de la haire, qui est encore chez luy, de monsieur son pere: mais quelque deuotion qu'il eust, qu'il ne sceut auoir la patience d'attendre la nuict pour se despouïller, et en fut long temps malade: adioustant qu'il ne pensoit pas qu'il y eust chaleur de ieunesse si aspre, que l'vsage de cette recepte ne peust amortir: toutesfois à l'aduanture ne les a-il pas essayées les plus cuisantes.	A prince told me not long ago that in his youth, on a solemn feast day at the court of King Francis I, when everyone was dressed in finery, he took a fancy to put on his father's hair shirt, which is still in his house. But whatever devotion he had, he could not find the patience to wait until night to take it off, and he was ill from it for a long time. He added that he did not think there was any heat of youth so fierce that this remedy could not quench it. Still, perhaps he has never felt the most burning ones.
	Car l'experience nous faict voir, qu'vne telle esmotion, se maintient bien souuent soubs des habits rudes et	For experience shows us that such a stirring very often persists under rough and shabby clothes,

FRENCH	ENGLISH
marmiteux: et que les haires ne rendent pas tousiours heres ceux qui les portent.	and that hair shirts do not always make sorry wretches of those who wear them.[1]
2.33.3 Xenocrates y proceda plus rigoureusement: car ses disciples pour essayer sa continence, luy ayants fourré dans son lict, Laïs, cette belle et fameuse courtisane toute nuë, sauf les armes de sa beauté et folasres apasts, ses phyltres: sentant qu'en despit de ses discours, et de ses regles, le corps reuesche commençoit à se mutiner, il se fit brusler les membres, qui auoient presté l'oreille à cette rebellion. Là où les passions qui sont toutes en l'ame, comme l'ambition, l'avarice, et autres, donnent bien plus à faire à la raison: car elle n'y peut estre secourue, que de ses propres moyens: ny ne sont ces appetits là, capables de satieté: voire ils s'esguisent et augmentent par la iouyssance.	Xenocrates went about it more rigorously. His disciples, to test his continence, had slipped into his bed Lais, that beautiful and famous courtesan, quite naked except for the weapons of her beauty and her wanton lures, her love potions. Feeling that in spite of his reasonings and his rules his unruly body was beginning to mutiny, he had the members that had lent an ear to this rebellion burned. Whereas the passions that are wholly in the soul, such as ambition, avarice and the rest, give reason much more trouble: for there it can be helped only by its own means; nor are those appetites capable of satiety; indeed they are sharpened and increased by enjoyment.

CAESAR'S TWO PASSIONS

Caesar loved women passionately, but ambition always mastered his pleasures and finally ruined him.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.33.4 Le seul exemple de Iulius Cæsar, peut suffire à nous montrer la disparité de ces appetits: car iamais homme ne fut plus addonné aux plaisirs amoureux. Le soin curieux qu'il auoit de sa personne, en est vn tesmoignage, iusques à se seruir à cela, des moyens les plus lascifs qui fussent lors en vsage: comme de se faire pinceter tout le corps, et farder de parfums d'vne extreme curiosité: et de soy il estoit beau personnage, blanc, de belle et allegre taille, le visage plein, les yeux bruns et vifs, s'il en faut croire Suetone: car les statues, qui se voyent de luy à Rome ne rapportent pas bien par tout, à cette peinture.	The single example of Julius Caesar may suffice to show us the disparity between these appetites: for never was a man more given to amorous pleasures. The meticulous care he took of his person is evidence of it, to the point of using for that purpose the most lascivious means then in fashion, such as having his whole body plucked and anointing himself with perfumes of extreme refinement. And by nature he was a handsome figure, fair-skinned, tall and nimble, with a full face and dark, keen eyes, if we are to believe Suetonius: for the statues of him to be seen in Rome do not everywhere match this portrait.
Outre ses femmes, qu'il changea quatre fois, sans conter les amours de son enfance, auec le Roy de Bithynie Nicomedes, il eut le pucelage de cette tant renommée Royne d'Ægypte, Cleopatra: tesmoin le petit Cæsarion, qui en nasquit. Il fit aussi l'amour à Eunoé Royne de Mauritanie: et à Rome, à Posthumia, femme de Seruius Sulpitius: à Lollia, de Gabinius: à Tertulla, de Crassus, et à Mutia mesme, femme du grand Pompeius. Qui fut la cause, disent les historiens Romains, pourquoy son mary la repudia, ce que Plutarque confesse auoir ignoré. Et les Curions pere et fils reprocherent depuis à Pompeius, quand il espousa la fille de Cæsar, qu'il se faisoit gendre	Besides his wives, whom he changed four times, and not counting the loves of his boyhood with the King of Bithynia, Nicomedes, he had the maidenhead of that so famous Queen of Egypt, Cleopatra: witness little Caesarion, who was born of it. He also had affairs with Eunoe, Queen of Mauritania, and in Rome with Postumia, wife of Servius Sulpicius; with Lollia, wife of Gabinius; with Tertulla, wife of Crassus; and even with Mucia, wife of the great Pompey. That was the reason, say the Roman historians, why her husband divorced her, though Plutarch admits he did not know it. And the 1 Montaigne puns on haire (hair shirt) and here (poor wretch).

FRENCH

d'vn homme qui l'auoit fait coqu, et que luy-mesme auoit accoustumé d'appeller Ægysthus.

ENGLISH

Curios, father and son, later reproached Pompey, when he married Caesar's daughter, with making himself son-in-law to a man who had made him a cuckold, and whom he himself used to call Aegisthus.[2]

Il entretint outre tout ce nombre, Seruilia sœur de Caton, et mere de Marcus Brutus, dont chacun tient que proceda cette grande affection qu'il portoit à Brutus: par ce qu'il estoit nay en temps, auquel il y auoit apparence qu'il fust issu de luy. Ainsi i'ai raison, ce me semble, de le prendre pour homme extremement addonné à cette desbauche, et de complexion tres-amoureuse. Mais l'autre passion de l'ambition, dequoy il estoit aussi infiniment blessé, venant à combattre celle là, elle luy fit incontinent perdre place.

Besides all these, he kept Servilia, Cato's sister and the mother of Marcus Brutus, and everyone holds that this was the source of the great affection he bore Brutus, since Brutus was born at a time when it seemed likely that he was his son. So I am right, it seems to me, to take him for a man extremely given to this kind of debauchery and of a very amorous constitution. But the other passion, ambition, by which he was also infinitely wounded, coming to fight against that one, at once made it give ground.

2.33.5 Me ressouuenant sur ce propos de Mehemed, celuy qui subiugua Constantinople, et apporta la finale extermination du nom Grec: ie ne sçache point où ces deux passions se trouuent plus egalement balancées: pareillement indefatigable ruffien, et soldat. Mais quand en sa vie, elles se presentent en concurrence l'vne de l'autre, l'ardeur querelleuse gourmande tousiours l'amoureuse ardeur. Et ceste-cy, encore que ce fust hors sa naturelle saison, ne regaigna pleinement l'authorité souueraine, que quand il se trouua en grande vieillesse, incapable de plus soutenir le faix des guerres.

Recalling on this subject Mehmed, the one who subjugated Constantinople and brought about the final extermination of the Greek name, I know of no one in whom these two passions are more evenly balanced: he was as tireless a rake as he was a soldier. But when in his life they compete with each other, the quarrelsome ardor always masters the amorous ardor. And the latter, though it was out of its natural season, regained full sovereign authority only when he was in great old age and no longer able to bear the burden of war.

2.33.6 Ce qu'on recite pour vn exemple contraire de Ladislaus Roy de Naples, est remarquable: Que bon capitaine, courageux, et ambitieux, il se proposoit pour fin principale de son ambition, l'execution de sa volupté, et iouïssance de quelque rare beauté. Sa mort fut de mesme. Ayant rengé par vn siege bien poursuiuy, la ville de Florence si à destroit, que les habitants estoient apres à composer de sa victoire: il la leur quitta pourueu qu'ils luy liurassent vne fille de leur ville dequoy il auoit ouy parler, de beauté excellente. Force fut de la luy accorder, et garantir la publique ruine par vne iniure priuée.

What is told as a contrary example about Ladislaus, King of Naples, is remarkable: that, though a good commander, courageous and ambitious, he set as the chief end of his ambition the satisfaction of his pleasure and the enjoyment of some rare beauty. His death was of a piece with this. Having by a well-pressed siege reduced the city of Florence to such straits that its inhabitants were about to negotiate the terms of his victory, he let them off on condition that they hand over to him a girl of their city, of excellent beauty, of whom he had heard. They had no choice but to grant her to him, and to avert the public ruin by a private wrong.[3]

Elle estoit fille d'vn medecin fameux de son temps; lequel se trouuant engagé en si villaine necessité, se resolut à vne haute entreprinse. Comme chacun paroit sa fille et l'attournoit d'ornements et ioyaux, qui la peussent

She was the daughter of a physician famous in his time, who, finding himself caught in so vile a necessity, resolved on a bold undertaking. While everyone was adorning his daughter and decking

2 Aegisthus seduced Clytemnestra, wife of Agamemnon, while her husband was away at Troy.
3 Ladislaus of Anjou-Durazzo, King of Naples (r. 1386–1414).

FRENCH

rendre aggreable à ce nouuel amant, luy aussi luy donna vn mouchoir exquis en senteur et en ouurage, duquel elle eust à se seruir en leurs premieres approches: meuble, qu'elles n'y oublient guere en ces quartiers là. Ce mouchoir empoisonné selon la capacité de son art, venant à se frotter à ces chairs esmeuës et pores ouuerts, inspira son venin si promptement, qu'ayant soudain changé leur sueur chaude en froide, ils expirerent entre les bras l'vn de l'autre.

2.33.7 Ie m'en reuay à Cæsar. Ses plaisirs ne luy firent iamais desrober vne seule minute d'heure, ny destourner vn pas des occasions qui se presentoient pour son agrandissement. Cette passion regenta en luy si souuerainement toutes les autres, et posseda son ame d'vne authorité si pleine, qu'elle l'emporta où elle voulut. Certes i'en suis despit: quand ie considere au demeurant, la grandeur de ce personnage, et les merueilleuses parties qui estoient en luy: tant de suffisance en toute sorte de sçauoir, qu'il n'y a quasi science en quoy il n'ait escrit: il estoit tel orateur, que plusieurs ont preferé son eloquence à celle de Cicero: et luy-mesmes, à mon aduis, n'estimoit luy deuoir guere en cette partie.

Et ses deux Anticatons, furent principalement escrits pour contre-balancer le bien dire, que Cicero auoit employé en son Caton. Au demeurant, fut-il iamais ame si vigilante, si actiue, et si patiente de labeur que la sienne? Et sans doubte, encore estoit elle embellie de plusieurs rares semences de vertu, ie dy viues, naturelles, et non contrefaictes. Il estoit singulierement sobre, et si peu delicat en son manger, qu'Oppius recite, qu'vn iour luy ayant esté presenté à table, en quelque sauce de l'huyle medecinée, au lieu d'huyle simple, il en mangea largement, pour ne faire honte à son hoste. Vne autrefois, il fit fouëtter son boulenger, pour luy auoir seruy d'autre pain que celuy du commun.

Caton mesme auoit accoustumé de dire de luy, que c'estoit le premier homme sobre, qui se fust acheminé à la ruyne de son pays. Et quant à ce que ce mesme Caton l'appella vn iour yurongne, cela aduint en cette façon. Estans tous deux au Senat, où il se parloit du fait de la coniuration de Catilina, de laquelle Cæsar estoit soupçonné, on luy vint apporter de dehors, vn breuet à cachetes: Caton estimant que ce fust quelque chose, dequoy les coniurez l'aduertissent, le somma de le luy her out with ornaments and jewels that might make her pleasing to this new lover, he too gave her a handkerchief, exquisite in scent and workmanship, which she was to use in their first embraces, an article women in those parts hardly ever forget. This handkerchief, poisoned with all the skill of his art, rubbing against those heated bodies and open pores, breathed its venom into them so swiftly that their warm sweat suddenly turned cold, and they expired in each other's arms.

ENGLISH

I come back to Caesar. His pleasures never made him steal a single minute of an hour, or turn a single step aside from the opportunities that offered for his advancement. This passion, ambition, ruled all the others in him so sovereignly, and possessed his soul with such complete authority, that it carried him wherever it wished. Indeed it vexes me, when I consider otherwise the greatness of the man and the marvelous gifts he had: such ability in every kind of learning that there is hardly a science on which he did not write. He was such an orator that many have preferred his eloquence to Cicero's; and he himself, in my opinion, thought he owed him little in this respect.

His two Anti-Catos were written chiefly to counterbalance the fine speaking that Cicero had used in his Cato. For the rest, was there ever a soul so vigilant, so active and so enduring of toil as his? And it was certainly adorned as well with many rare seeds of virtue, living, natural ones, I mean, not counterfeit. He was singularly sober, and so little fastidious in his eating that Oppius relates that one day, when he was served at table some sauce made with medicinal oil instead of plain oil, he ate a good deal of it so as not to shame his host. Another time he had his baker whipped for serving him different bread from what was served to everyone else.

Cato himself used to say of him that he was the first sober man to set out to ruin his country. As for this same Cato calling him a drunkard one day, it happened in this way. They were both in the Senate, where Catiline's conspiracy, of which Caesar was suspected, was being discussed, when someone brought him a sealed note from outside. Cato, thinking it was something the conspirators were informing him of, demanded that he hand it donner: ce que Cæsar fut contrainct de faire, pour euiter vn plus grand soupçon.

FRENCH

C'estoit de fortune vne lettre amoureuse, que Seruilia sœur de Caton luy escriuoit: Caton l'ayant leuë, la luy reietta, en luy disant: Tien yurongne. Cela, dis-ie, fut plustost vn mot de desdain et de colere, qu'vn expres reproche de ce vice: comme souuent nous iniurions ceux qui nous faschent, des premieres iniures qui nous viennent à la bouche, quoy qu'elles ne soyent nullement deuës à ceux à qui nous les attachons. Ioinct que ce vice que Caton luy reproche, est merueilleusement voisin de celuy, auquel il auoit surpris Cæsar: car Venus et Bacchus se conuiennent volontiers, à ce que dit le prouerbe: mais chez moy Venus est bien plus allegre, accompaignée de la sobrieté.

2.33.8 Les exemples de sa douceur, et de sa clemence, enuers ceux qui l'auoient offencé sont infinis: ie dis outre ceux qu'il donna, pendant le temps que la guerre ciuile estoit encore en son progrés, desquels il fait luy-mesmes assez sentir par ses escrits, qu'il se seruoit pour amadouër ses ennemis, et leur faire moins craindre sa future domination et sa victoire. Mais si faut il dire que ces exemples là s'ils ne sont suffisans à nous tesmoigner sa naïue douceur, ils nous montrent au moins vne merueilleuse confiance et grandeur de courage, en ce personnage.

Il luy est aduenu souuent, de renuoyer des armées toutes entieres à son ennemy, apres les auoir vaincuës, sans daigner seulement les obliger par serment, sinon de le fauoriser, aumoins de se contenir sans luy faire la guerre: il a prins trois et quatre fois tels capitaines de Pompeius, et autant de fois remis en liberté. Pompeius declaroit ses ennemis, tous ceux qui ne l'accompaignoient à la guerre: et luy fit proclamer qu'il tenoit pour amis tous ceux qui ne bougeoient, et qui ne s'armoyent effectuellement contre luy. A ceux de ses capitaines, qui se desroboient de luy pour aller prendre autre condition, il r'enuoioit encore les armes, cheuaux, et equipages.

Les villes qu'il auoit prinses par force, il les laissoit en liberté de suyure tel party qu'il leur plairoit, ne leur donnant autre garnison, que la memoire de sa douceur et clemence. Il deffendit le iour de sa grande bataille de Pharsale, qu'on ne mist qu'à toute extremité, la main sur les citoyens Romains. Voyla des traits bien hazardeux selon mon iugement: et n'est pas merueilles si aux guerres ciuiles, que nous sentons, ceux qui combattent, comme luy, l'estat ancien de leur pays, n'en imitent l'exemple. Ce sont moyens extraordinaires, et qu'il over, which Caesar was forced to do to avoid greater suspicion.

ENGLISH

It happened to be a love letter that Servilia, Cato's sister, had written him. Cato, having read it, threw it back at him, saying, "Take it, drunkard." That, I say, was rather a word of disdain and anger than a deliberate reproach for that vice: just as we often insult those who annoy us with the first insults that come to our lips, though they are in no way deserved by the people we pin them on. Besides, the vice Cato reproaches him with is wonderfully close to the one in which he had caught Caesar: for Venus and Bacchus readily get along, as the proverb says. But with me Venus is much livelier in the company of sobriety.

The examples of his gentleness and clemency toward those who had offended him are countless. I mean besides those he gave while the civil war was still in progress, which, as he himself makes clear enough in his writings, he used to win over his enemies and make them less afraid of his future rule and victory. But it must still be said that if those examples are not enough to prove his natural gentleness, they at least show us a marvelous confidence and greatness of heart in the man.

He often sent whole armies back to his enemy after defeating them, without even deigning to bind them by oath, if not to support him, at least to refrain from making war on him. He captured certain of Pompey's commanders three and four times, and as many times set them free. Pompey declared as his enemies all those who did not follow him to the war; Caesar had it proclaimed that he held as friends all those who stayed put and did not actually take up arms against him. To those of his officers who slipped away from him to take service elsewhere, he even sent back their arms, horses and baggage.

The towns he had taken by force he left free to follow whatever side they pleased, giving them no other garrison than the memory of his gentleness and clemency. On the day of his great battle of Pharsalus he forbade anyone to lay hands on Roman citizens except in the last extremity. These are very risky strokes, in my judgment; and it is no wonder if, in the civil wars we are suffering, those who, like him, are fighting against the ancient n'appartient qu'à la fortune de Cæsar, et à son admirable pouruoyance, d'heureusement conduire.	state of their country do not follow his example. These are extraordinary means, and only Caesar's fortune and his admirable foresight could carry them off successfully.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Quand ie considere la grandeur incomparable de cette ame, i'excuse la victoire, de ne s'estre peu depestrer de luy, voire en cette tres-iniuste et tres-inique cause.	When I consider the incomparable greatness of that soul, I excuse victory for being unable to break free of him, even in that most unjust and iniquitous cause.
2.33.9	Pour reuenir à sa clemence, nous en auons plusieurs naifs exemples, au temps de sa domination, lors que toutes choses estants reduites en sa main, il n'auoit plus à se feindre. Caius Memmius auoit escrit contre luy des oraisons tres-poignantes, ausquelles il auoit bien aigrement respondu: si ne laissa-il bien tost apres d'ayder à le faire Consul. Caius Caluus qui auoit faict plusieurs epigrammes iniurieux contre luy, ayant employé de ses amis pour le reconcilier, Cæsar se conuia luy-mesme à luy escrire le premier. Et nostre bon Catulle, qui l'auoit testonné si rudement sous le nom de Mamurra, s'en estant venu excuser à luy, il le fit ce iour mesme soupper à sa table.	To return to his clemency, we have many unfeigned examples of it from the time of his rule, when everything was in his hands and he no longer had to pretend. Gaius Memmius had written very stinging speeches against him, to which he had replied very sharply; yet soon afterward he did not fail to help make him consul. Gaius Calvus, who had written several abusive epigrams against him, had used some of his friends to bring about a reconciliation, and Caesar took it upon himself to write to him first. And our good Catullus, who had roughed him up so harshly under the name of Mamurra, came to apologize to him, and Caesar had him to supper at his table that very day.[4]
	Ayant esté aduerty d'aucuns qui parloient mal de luy, il n'en fit autre chose, que declarer en vne sienne harangue publique, qu'il en estoit aduerty. Il craignoit encore moins ses ennemis, qu'il ne les haissoit. Aucunes coniurations et assemblees, qu'on faisoit contre sa vie, luy ayants esté descouuertes, il se contenta de publier par edit qu'elles luy estoient cognuës, sans autrement en poursuyure les autheurs. Quant au respect qu'il auoit à ses amis: Caius Oppius voyageant auec luy, et se trouuant mal, il luy quitta vn seul logis qu'il y auoit, et coucha toute la nuict sur la dure et au descouuert.	When he was told of some people who were speaking ill of him, all he did was declare in one of his public speeches that he had been told of it. He feared his enemies even less than he hated them. When certain conspiracies and meetings formed against his life were revealed to him, he was content to publish an edict saying that he knew of them, without otherwise prosecuting those responsible. As for the regard he had for his friends: when Gaius Oppius, traveling with him, fell ill, he gave up to him the only lodging there was and slept all night on the hard ground in the open.
	Quant à sa iustice, il fit mourir vn sien seruiteur, qu'il aimoit singulierement, pour auoir couché auecques la femme d'vn cheualier Romain, quoy que personne ne s'en plaignist. Iamais homme n'apporta, ny plus de moderation en sa victoire, ny plus de resolution en sa fortune contraire.	As for his justice, he had a servant of his whom he was exceptionally fond of put to death for having slept with the wife of a Roman knight, though no one had complained. Never did a man show either more moderation in victory or more resolution in adverse fortune.
2.33.10	Mais toutes ces belles inclinations furent alterées et estouffées, par cette furieuse passion ambitieuse: à laquelle il se laissa si fort emporter, qu'on peut aisément maintenir, qu'elle tenoit le timon et le gouuernail de toutes ses actions.	But all these fine inclinations were spoiled and stifled by that furious passion of ambition, by which he let himself be carried away so far that one may easily maintain it held the tiller and the rudder of all his actions.

4 Mamurra, Caesar's chief engineer, is attacked together with Caesar in several of Catullus's poems.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
D'vn homme liberal, elle en rendit vn voleur publique, pour fournir à cette profusion et largesse, et luy fit dire ce vilain et tres-iniuste mot, que si les plus meschans et perdus hommes du monde, luy auoyent esté fidelles, au seruice de son agrandissement, il les cheriroit et auanceroit de son pouuoir, aussi bien que les plus gens de bien: l'enyura d'vne vanité si extreme, qu'il osoit se vanter en presence de ses concitoyens, d'auoir rendu cette grande Republique Romaine, vn nom sans forme et sans corps: et dire que ses responces deuoyent meshuy seruir de loix: et receuoir assis, le corps du Senat venant vers luy: et souffrir qu'on l'adorast, et qu'on luy fist en sa presence des honneurs diuins.	Out of a liberal man it made a public robber, to supply all that profusion and largesse. It made him utter that base and most unjust remark, that if the most wicked and abandoned men in the world had been faithful to him in the service of his advancement, he would cherish them and promote them as far as his power allowed, just as much as the best of men. It intoxicated him with so extreme a vanity that he dared to boast in the presence of his fellow citizens that he had made that great Roman Republic a name without form or body; to say that his answers should henceforth serve as laws; to receive the body of the Senate seated when it came to him; and to allow himself to be worshiped and divine honors to be paid him in his presence.
Somme, ce seul vice, à mon aduis, perdit en luy le plus beau, et le plus riche naturel qui fut onques: et a rendu sa memoire abominable à tous les gens de bien, pour auoir voulu chercher sa gloire de la ruyne de son païs, et subuersion de la plus puissante, et fleurissante chose publique que le monde verra iamais. Il se pourroit bien au contraire, trouuer plusieurs exemples de grands personnages, ausquels la volupté a faict oublier la conduicte de leurs affaires, comme Marcus Antonius, et autres: mais où l'amour et l'ambition seroient en esgale balance, et viendroient à se choquer de forces pareilles, ie ne fay aucun doubte, que ceste-cy ne gaignast le prix de la maistrise.	In sum, this one vice, in my opinion, ruined in him the finest and richest nature there ever was, and has made his memory abominable to all good men, for having sought his glory in the ruin of his country and the overthrow of the most powerful and flourishing republic the world will ever see. One could, on the other hand, find many examples of great men whom pleasure made forget the conduct of their affairs, such as Mark Antony and others. But where love and ambition were evenly balanced and came to clash with equal force, I have no doubt that ambition would carry off the prize of mastery.

SPURINA'S FACE

A beautiful young Tuscan scars his own face; Montaigne admires the act more than he honors it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.33.11 Or pour me remettre sur mes brisées, c'est beaucoup de pouuoir brider nos appetits, par le discours de la raison, ou de forcer nos membres, par violence, à se tenir en leur deuoir. Mais de nous fouëtter pour l'interest de nos voisins, de non seulement nous deffaire de cette douce passion, qui nous chatouïlle, du plaisir que nous sentons de nous voir aggreables à autruy, et aymez et recherchez d'vn chascun: mais encore de prendre en haine, et à contre-cœur nos graces, qui en sont cause, et condamner nostre beauté, par ce que quelque autre s'en eschauffe, ie n'en ay veu guere d'exemples: cestuy-cy en est.	Now, to get back on my track: it is a great deal to be able to curb our appetites by the reasoning of reason, or to force our members by violence to keep to their duty. But to scourge ourselves for the sake of our neighbors; not only to rid ourselves of that sweet passion that tickles us, the pleasure we feel in seeing ourselves pleasing to others, loved and sought after by everyone, but even to take a hatred and aversion to the graces that cause it, and to condemn our own beauty because someone else is inflamed by it—of that I have seen few examples. Here is one.
Spurina ieune homme de la Toscane, Qualis gemma micat, fuluum quæ diuidit aurum,	Spurina, a young man of Tuscany, As a gem sparkles that parts the tawny gold,

FRENCH

Aut collo decus aut capiti, vel quale per artem
Inclusum buxo aut Oricia terebintho
Lucet ebur, estant doüé d'vne singuliere beauté, et si excessiue, que les yeux plus continents, ne pouuoient en souffrir l'esclat continemment, ne se contentant point de laisser sans secours tant de fiéure et de feu, qu'il alloit attisant par tout, entra en furieux despit contre soy-mesmes, et contre ces riches presens, que Nature luy auoit faits: comme si on se deuoit prendre à eux, de la faute d'autruy: et détailla, et troubla à force de playes, qu'il se fit à escient, et de cicatrices, la parfaicte proportion et ordonnance que Nature auoit si curieusement obseruée en son visage.

2.33.12 Pour en dire mon aduis: i'admire telles actions, plus que ie ne les honnore. Ces excez sont ennemis de mes regles. Le dessein en fut beau, et conscientieux: mais, à mon aduis, vn peu manque de prudence. Quoy? si sa laideur seruit depuis à en ietter d'autres au peché de mespris et de haine, ou d'enuie, pour la gloire d'vne si rare recommandation: ou de calomnie, interpretant cette humeur, à vne forcenée ambition. Y a-il quelque forme, de laquelle le vice ne tire, s'il veult, occasion à s'exercer en quelque maniere? Il estoit plus iuste, et aussi plus glorieux, qu'il fist de ces dons de Dieu, vn subiect de vertu exemplaire, et de reglement.

2.33.13 Ceux, qui se desrobent aux offices communs, et à ce nombre infini de regles espineuses, à tant de visages, qui lient vn homme d'exacte preud'hommie, en la vie ciuile: font, à mon gré, vne belle espargne: quelque pointe d'aspreté peculiere qu'ils s'enioignent. C'est aucunement mourir, pour fuir la peine de bien viure. Ils peuuent auoir autre prix, mais le prix de la difficulté, il ne m'a iamais semblé qu'ils l'eussent. Ny qu'en malaisance, il y ait rien audelà, de se tenir droit emmy les flots de la presse du monde, respondant et satisfaisant loyalement à touts les membres de sa charge.

Il est à l'aduenture plus facile, de se passer nettement de tout le sexe, que de se maintenir deuëment de tout poinct, en la compagnie de sa femme. Et a l'on dequoy couler plus incurieusement, en la pauureté, qu'en l'abondance, iustement dispensée. L'vsage, conduit selon raison, a plus d'aspreté, que n'a l'abstinence. La moderation est vertu bien plus affaireuse, que n'est la an ornament for neck or head, or as, by art inlaid in boxwood or Orician terebinth, ivory gleams, was endowed with a singular beauty, so excessive that the most continent eyes could not continently bear its brilliance. Not content to leave without relief all the fever and fire he went kindling everywhere, he fell into a furious rage against himself and against those rich gifts Nature had given him, as if they were to blame for the faults of others. And with wounds he deliberately inflicted on himself, and with scars, he slashed and spoiled the perfect proportion and order that Nature had so carefully observed in his face.[5]

ENGLISH

To give my own opinion: I admire such actions more than I honor them. These excesses are enemies of my rules. The intention was fine and conscientious, but, in my view, somewhat lacking in prudence. What if his ugliness afterward served to cast others into the sin of contempt and hatred, or of envy at the glory of so rare a distinction, or of slander, interpreting his temperament as a frenzied ambition? Is there any form from which vice cannot, if it wishes, draw an occasion to exercise itself in some way? It would have been more just, and also more glorious, for him to make of these gifts of God a subject of exemplary virtue and self-control.

Those who slip away from the common duties, and from that infinite number of thorny, many-faced rules that bind a man of strict integrity in civil life, make, to my mind, a nice saving, whatever sharp point of peculiar austerity they impose on themselves. It is in a way dying to escape the trouble of living well. They may have some other merit; but the merit of difficulty I have never thought they had. Nor have I thought that anything is harder than to keep upright amid the waves of the world's throng, loyally answering and meeting all the parts of one's charge.

It is perhaps easier to do without the whole sex altogether than to conduct oneself properly in every respect in the company of one's wife. And one can slip along more carelessly in poverty than in abundance justly dispensed. Use guided by reason is harder than abstinence. Moderation is a far more demanding virtue than endurance. The good

5 Virgil, Aeneid. The story of Spurina comes from Valerius Maximus.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
souffrance. Le bien viure du ieune Scipion, a mille façons. Le bien viure de Diogenes, n'en a qu'vne. Ceste-cy surpasse d'autant en innocence les vies ordinaires, comme les exquises et accomplies la surpassent en vtilité et en force.	life of the younger Scipio has a thousand forms; the good life of Diogenes has only one. Diogenes' life surpasses ordinary lives in innocence by as much as the most exquisite and accomplished lives surpass it in usefulness and strength.

II.34 Observations on Julius Caesar's Methods of Making War

Obseruation sur les moyens de faire la guerre, de Iulius Cæsar Montaigne gathers rare traits of Caesar's generalship from his Commentaries—his speed, daring, discipline and personal courage.

FRENCH

2.34.1 ON recite de plusieurs chefs de guerre, qu'ils ont eu certains liures en particuliere recommandation, comme le grand Alexandre, Homere: Scipion Aphricain, Xenophon: Marcus Brutus, Polybius: Charles cinquiesme, Philippe de Comines. Et dit-on de ce temps, que Machiauel est encores ailleurs en credit. Mais le feu Mareschal Strossy, qui auoit pris Cæsar pour sa part, auoit sans doubte bien mieux choisi: car à la verité ce deuroit estre le breuiaire de tout homme de guerre, comme estant le vray et souuerain patron de l'art militaire.

Et Dieu sçait encore de quelle grace, et de quelle beauté il a fardé cette riche matiere, d'vne façon de dire si pure, si delicate, et si parfaicte, qu'à mon goust, il n'y a aucuns escrits au monde, qui puissent estre comparables aux siens, en cette partie. Ie veux icy enregistrer certains traicts particuliers et rares, sur le faict de ses guerres, qui me sont demeurez en memoire.

2.34.2 Son armée estant en quelque effroy, pour le bruit qui couroit des grandes forces, que menoit contre luy le Roy Iuba, au lieu de rabattre l'opinion que ses soldats en auoyent prise, et appetisser les moyens de son ennemy, les ayant faict assembler pour les r'asseurer et leur donner courage, il print vne voye toute contraire à celle que nous auons accoustumé: car il leur dit qu'ils ne se missent plus en peine de s'enquerir des forces que menoit l'ennemy, et qu'il en auoit eu bien certain aduertissement: et lors il leur en fit le nombre surpassant de beaucoup, et la verité, et la renommée, qui en couroit en son armée. Suiuant ce que conseille Cyrus en Xenophon.

D'autant que la tromperie n'est pas de tel interest, de trouuer les ennemis par effect plus foibles qu'on n'auoit esperé: que de les trouuer à la verité bien forts, apres les auoir iugez foibles par reputation.

ENGLISH

It is told of several military leaders that they held certain books in particular esteem: Alexander the Great, Homer; Scipio Africanus, Xenophon; Marcus Brutus, Polybius; Charles V, Philippe de Commynes. And it is said that in our time Machiavelli is still in favor elsewhere. But the late Marshal Strozzi, who had taken Caesar for his share, certainly chose much better: for in truth he ought to be the breviary of every soldier, as being the true and supreme model of the military art.

And God knows, besides, with what grace and what beauty he has embellished this rich matter, with a style so pure, so delicate and so perfect that, to my taste, there are no writings in the world that can be compared to his in this respect. I want to record here certain particular and rare traits concerning his wars that have stayed in my memory.

His army was in some alarm at the rumor going around of the great forces King Juba was leading against him. Instead of beating down the opinion his soldiers had formed of them and belittling his enemy's means, he had them assembled to reassure them and give them courage, and took a path quite contrary to the one we usually take. He told them they need no longer trouble to inquire about the forces the enemy was bringing, since he had very reliable information about them; and then he gave them a number far exceeding both the truth and the reports going around his army. This follows what Cyrus advises in Xenophon.[1]

For being deceived does not matter so much when we find the enemy actually weaker than we had expected, as when we find him truly very strong after judging him weak by report.

1 Juba I, King of Numidia, ally of Pompey's party in Africa (46 BC).

FRENCH

2.34.3 Il accoustumoit sur tout ses soldats à obeyr simplement, sans se mesler de contreroller, ou parler des desseins de leur Capitaine; lesquels il ne leur communiquoit que sur le poinct de l'execution: et prenoit plaisir s'ils en auoyent descouuert quelque chose, de changer sur le champ d'aduis, pour les tromper: et souuent pour cet effect ayant assigné vn logis en quelque lieu, il passoit outre, et allongeoit la iournée, notamment s'il faisoit mauuais temps et pluuieux.

2.34.4 Les Souisses, au commencement de ses guerres de Gaule, ayans enuoyé vers luy pour leur donner passage au trauers des terres des Romains; estant deliberé de les empescher par force, il leur contrefit toutesfois vn bon visage, et print quelques iours de delay à leur faire responce, pour se seruir de ce loisir, à assembler son armée. Ces pauures gens ne sçauoyent pas combien il estoit excellent mesnager du temps: car il redit maintesfois, que c'est la plus souueraine partie d'vn capitaine, que la science de prendre au poinct les occasions, et la diligence, qui est en ses exploicts, à la verité, inouye et incroyable.

2.34.5 S'il n'estoit pas fort conscientieux en cela, de prendre aduantage sur son ennemy, sous couleur d'vn traicté d'accord: il l'estoit aussi peu, en ce qu'il ne requeroit en ses soldats autre vertu que la vaillance, ny ne punissoit guere autres vices, que la mutination, et la desobeyssance. Souuent apres ses victoires, il leur laschoit la bride à toute licence, les dispensant pour quelque temps des regles de la discipline militaire, adioustant à cela, qu'il auoit des soldats si bien creez, que tous perfumez et musquez, ils ne laissoyent pas d'aller furieusement au combat.

De vray, il aymoit qu'ils fussent richement armez, et leur faisoit porter des harnois grauez, dorez et argentez: afin que le soing de la conseruation de leurs armes, les rendist plus aspres à se deffendre. Parlant à eux, il les appelloit du nom de compagnons, que nous vsons encore: ce qu'Auguste son successeur reforma, estimant qu'il l'auoit faict pour la necessité de ses affaires, et pour flatter le cœur de ceux qui ne le suyuoient que volontairement: Rheni mihi Cæsar in vndis / Dux erat: hic socius; facinus quos inquinat, æquat; mais que cette façon estoit trop rabbaissée, pour la dignité d'vn Empereur et general d'armée, et remit en train de les appeller seulement soldats.

ENGLISH

Above all he accustomed his soldiers to obey simply, without meddling in criticizing or discussing their commander's plans, which he told them only at the moment of execution. And if they had found out something about them, he took pleasure in changing his mind on the spot to deceive them. Often, for this purpose, having fixed a camp in some place, he would go on past it and lengthen the day's march, especially if the weather was bad and rainy.

At the beginning of his Gallic wars, the Swiss sent to him asking for passage through Roman territory. He was determined to stop them by force, but he nevertheless put on a pleasant face and took a few days' delay before answering them, so as to use that time to assemble his army. These poor people did not know how excellent a manager of time he was: for he said many times that the most supreme quality of a commander is the knowledge of seizing opportunities at the right moment, and speed, which in his own exploits is, in truth, unheard-of and incredible.[2]

If he was not very scrupulous about taking advantage of his enemy under color of a treaty, he was just as unscrupulous in requiring of his soldiers no other virtue than valor and hardly punishing any vices but mutiny and disobedience. Often after his victories he gave them free rein for every license, dispensing them for a time from the rules of military discipline, and adding that his soldiers were so well trained that, all perfumed and musked as they were, they still went furiously into battle.

Indeed he liked them to be richly armed, and made them wear engraved, gilded and silvered armor, so that their concern to keep their arms would make them fiercer in defending themselves. When he spoke to them he called them by the name of comrades, which we still use. Augustus, his successor, changed this, judging that Caesar had done it out of the necessity of his affairs and to flatter the hearts of those who followed him only voluntarily: On the waters of the Rhine Caesar was my general; / here he is my comrade; crime makes equal those it stains; but that this form of address was too lowly for the dignity of an emperor and commander of armies, and he went back to calling them simply soldiers.[3]

2 The Helvetii, in 58 BC.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

2.34.6 A cette courtoisie, Cæsar mesloit toutesfois vne grande seuerité, à les reprimer. La neufiesme legion s'estant mutinée au pres de Plaisance, il la cassa auec ignominie, quoy que Pompeius fust lors encore en pieds, et ne la reçeut en grace qu'auec plusieurs supplications. Il les rappaisoit plus par authorité et par audace, que par douceur.

With this courtesy, however, Caesar mixed great severity in keeping them in check. When the Ninth Legion mutinied near Piacenza, he disbanded it with ignominy, though Pompey was still standing at the time, and took it back into favor only after many entreaties. He calmed them more by authority and boldness than by gentleness.

2.34.7 Là où il parle de son passage de la riuiere du Rhin, vers l'Allemaigne, il dit qu'estimant indigne de l'honneur du peuple Romain, qu'il passast son armée à nauires, il fit dresser vn pont, afin qu'il passast à pied ferme. Ce fut là, qu'il bastit ce pont admirable, dequoy il dechiffre particulierement la fabrique: car il ne s'arreste si volontiers en nul endroit de ses faits, qu'à nous representer la subtilité de ses inuentions, en telle sorte d'ouurages de main.

Where he speaks of his crossing of the Rhine into Germany, he says that, judging it unworthy of the honor of the Roman people for him to take his army across in boats, he had a bridge built so that it might cross on firm footing. It was there that he built that admirable bridge whose construction he describes in detail: for there is no point in the account of his deeds where he lingers so willingly as in showing us the ingenuity of his inventions in such kinds of handiwork.

2.34.8 I'y ay aussi remarqué cela, qu'il fait grand cas de ses exhortations aux soldats auant le combat: car où il veut montrer auoir esté surpris, ou pressé, il allegue tousiours cela, qu'il n'eut pas seulement loisir de haranguer son armée.

I have also noticed that he sets great store by his exhortations to his soldiers before battle: for where he wants to show that he was taken by surprise or hard pressed, he always pleads that he did not even have time to harangue his army.

Auant cette grande battaille contre ceux de Tournay; Cæsar, dict-il, ayant ordonné du reste, courut soudainement, où la fortune le porta, pour exhorter ses gens; et rencontrant la dixiesme legion, il n'eut loisir de leur dire, sinon, qu'ils eussent souuenance de leur vertu accoustumée, qu'ils ne s'estonnassent point, et soustinsent hardiment l'effort des aduersaires: et par ce que l'ennemy estoit des-ia approché à vn iect de traict, il donna le signe de la battaille: et de là estant passé soudainement ailleurs pour en encourager d'autres, il trouua qu'ils estoyent des-ia aux prises: voyla ce qu'il en dit en ce lieu là.

Before that great battle against the people of Tournai, Caesar, he says, having arranged everything else, ran swiftly wherever fortune took him to exhort his men; and coming upon the Tenth Legion, he had time only to tell them to remember their customary valor, not to be dismayed, and to withstand the enemy's attack boldly. And because the enemy had already come within a javelin's throw, he gave the signal for battle; and having then gone quickly elsewhere to encourage others, he found that they were already engaged. That is what he says of it in that passage.[4]

De vray, sa langue luy a faict en plusieurs lieux de bien notables seruices, et estoit de son temps mesme, son eloquence militaire en telle recommendation, que plusieurs en son armée recueilloyent ses harangues: et par ce moyen, il en fut assemblé des volumes, qui ont duré long temps apres luy. Son parler auoit des graces particulieres; si que ses familiers, et entre autres Auguste, oyant reciter ce qui en auoit esté recueilly,

Indeed, his tongue did him very notable service on many occasions, and even in his own time his military eloquence was so highly esteemed that many in his army collected his harangues; in this way volumes of them were compiled which survived long after him. His speech had a particular grace, so that his intimates, among them Augus-

3 Lucan, Pharsalia.

4 The Nervii, at the battle of the Sambre (57 BC), whom Montaigne places around Tournai.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
recognoissoit iusques aux phrases, et aux mots, ce qui n'estoit pas du sien.	tus, hearing what had been collected read aloud, could recognize, down to the phrases and the words, what was not his.
2.34.9 La premiere fois qu'il sortit de Rome, auec charge publique, il arriua en huict iours à la riuiere du Rhone, ayant dans son coche deuant luy vn secretaire ou deux qui escriuoyent sans cesse, et derriere luy, celuy qui portoit son espée.	The first time he left Rome with a public office, he reached the river Rhône in eight days, with a secretary or two in front of him in his carriage writing continuously, and behind him the man who carried his sword.
Et certes quand on ne feroit qu'aller, à peine pourroit-on atteindre à cette promptitude, dequoy tousiours victorieux ayant laissé la Gaule, et suiuant Pompeius à Brindes, il subiuga l'Italie en dix huict iours; reuint de Brindes à Rome; de Rome il s'en alla au fin fond de l'Espaigne; où il passa des difficultez extremes, en la guerre contre Affranius et Petreius, et au long siege de Marseille: de là il s'en retourna en la Macedoine, battit l'armée Romaine à Pharsale; passa de là, suiuant Pompeius, en Ægypte, laquelle il subiuga; d'Ægypte il vint en Syrie, et au pays de Pont, où il combattit Pharnaces; de là en Afrique, où il deffit Scipion et Iuba; et rebroussa encore par l'Italie en Espaigne, où il deffit les enfans de Pompeius.	And certainly, even if one did nothing but travel, one could hardly match the speed with which, ever victorious, he left Gaul, pursued Pompey to Brindisi and subjugated Italy in eighteen days; came back from Brindisi to Rome; went from Rome to the farthest end of Spain, where he got through extreme difficulties in the war against Afranius and Petreius and in the long siege of Marseille; went back from there to Macedonia and beat the Roman army at Pharsalus; went on from there in pursuit of Pompey to Egypt, which he subjugated; came from Egypt to Syria and the country of Pontus, where he fought Pharnaces; from there to Africa, where he defeated Scipio and Juba; and doubled back once more through Italy into Spain, where he defeated Pompey's sons.
Ocior et cœli flammis et tigride fœta. Ac veluti montis saxum de vertice præceps Cùm ruit auulsum vento, seu turbidus imber Proluit, aut annis soluit sublapsa vetustas, Fertur in abruptum magno mons improbus actu, Exultátque solo, siluas, armenta, virósque, Inuoluens secum.	Swifter than the lightning of heaven or a tigress with young. And as a rock plunging headlong from a mountain's top, when it crashes down, torn away by the wind, or a stormy rain washes it loose, or the slow lapse of years undermines it, the relentless mass is borne down the steep with mighty force and bounds along the ground, sweeping forests, herds and men along with it. [5]

CAESAR'S DARING

Caesar reconnoitered in person and took enormous risks, from storms at sea to the siege of Alesia.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.34.10 Parlant du siege d'Auaricum, il dit, que c'estoit sa coustume, de se tenir nuict et iour pres des ouuriers, qu'il auoit en besoigne. En toutes entreprises de consequence, il faisoit tousiours la descouuerte luy mesme, et ne passa	Speaking of the siege of Avaricum, he says it was his custom to stay night and day near the workmen he had at work. In all undertakings of consequence he always did the reconnoitering him-

5 The first line is from Lucan, Pharsalia; the rest from Virgil, Aeneid.

FRENCH

iamais son armée en lieu, qu'il n'eust premierement recognu. Et si nous croyons Suetone; quand il fit l'entreprise de traietter en Angleterre, il fut le premier à sonder le gué.

2.34.11 Il auoit accoustumé de dire, qu'il aimoit mieux la victoire qui se conduisoit par conseil que par force. Et en la guerre contre Petreius et Afranius, la Fortune luy presentant vne bien apparante occasion d'aduantage; il la refusa, dit-il, esperant auec vn peu plus de longueur, mais moins de hazard, venir à bout de ses ennemis. Il fit aussi là vn merueilleux traict, de commander à tout son ost, de passer à nage la riuiere sans aucune necessité, Rapuitque ruens in prælia miles,
Quod fugiens timuisset iter: mox vda receptis
Membra fouent armis, gelidósque a gurgite, cursu
Restituunt artus.

2.34.12 Ie le trouue vn peu plus retenu et consideré en ses entreprinses, qu'Alexandre: car cettuy-cy semble rechercher et courir à force les dangers, comme vn impetueux torrent, qui choque et attaque sans discretion et sans chois, tout ce qu'il rencontre. Sic tauriformis voluitur Aufidus,
Qui regna Dauni perfluit Appuli
Dum sœuit, horrendámque cultis
Diluuiem meditatur agris. Aussi estoit-il embesongné en la fleur et premiere chaleur de son aage; là où Cæsar s'y print estant desia meur et bien auancé. Outre ce, qu'Alexandre estoit d'vne temperature plus sanguine, cholere, et ardente: et si esmouuoit encore cette humeur par le vin, duquel Cæsar estoit tres-abstinent.

2.34.13 Mais où les occasions de la necessité se presentoyent, et où la chose le requeroit, il ne fut iamais homme faisant meilleur marché de sa personne. Quant à moy, il me semble lire en plusieurs de ses exploicts, vne certaine resolution de se perdre, pour fuyr la honte d'estre vaincu. En cette grande battaille qu'il eut contre ceux de Tournay, il courut se presenter à la teste des ennemis, sans bouclier, comme il se trouua, voyant la pointe de son armée s'esbranler: ce qui luy est aduenu plusieurs autres fois. Oyant dire que ses gens estoyent assiegez, il passa self, and he never took his army through a place he had not first examined. And if we believe Suetonius, when he undertook the crossing to England, he was the first to sound the ford.[6]

ENGLISH

He used to say that he preferred a victory won by counsel to one won by force. In the war against Petreius and Afranius, when Fortune offered him a very evident opportunity of gaining the advantage, he refused it, he says, hoping, with a little more time but less risk, to get the better of his enemies. He also performed a wonderful stroke there, ordering his whole army to swim across the river without any necessity: The soldier, rushing into battle, seized the path he would have feared in flight; then they warm their wet limbs in the armor they take up again, and by running restore their bodies chilled by the flood.

I find him somewhat more restrained and deliberate in his undertakings than Alexander: for Alexander seems to seek out dangers and run at them full tilt, like an impetuous torrent that strikes and attacks everything it meets, without discernment and without choice. So rolls the bull-shaped Aufidus, that flows through the realm of Apulian Daunus, when it rages and plots a fearful deluge for the tilled fields. And he was engaged in this in the flower and first heat of his youth, whereas Caesar took it up when already mature and well on in years. Besides, Alexander was of a more sanguine, choleric and ardent temperament, and he stirred up this humor still further with wine, from which Caesar abstained most strictly.[7]

But when occasions of necessity arose and the situation demanded it, there was never a man who held his own person cheaper. As for me, I seem to read in several of his exploits a certain resolve to throw away his life to escape the shame of defeat. In that great battle he fought against the people of Tournai, seeing the front of his army wavering, he ran to place himself facing the enemy's front ranks, without a shield, just as he was; and this happened to him several other times. Hearing that his men were besieged, he passed in disguise

6 Avaricum is modern Bourges (52 BC).
7 Horace, Odes.

FRENCH

desguisé au trauers l'armée ennemie, pour les aller fortifier de sa presence.

Ayant trauersé à Dirrachium, auec bien petites forces, et voyant que le reste de son armée qu'il auoit laissée à conduire à Antonius, tardoit à le suiure, il entreprit luy seul de repasser la mer par vne tres-grande tormente: et se desroba, pour aller reprendre le reste de ses forces; les ports de delà, et toute la mer estant saisie par Pompeius. Et quant aux entreprises qu'il a faictes à main armée, il y en a plusieurs, qui surpassent en hazard tout discours de raison militaire: car auec combien foibles moyens, entreprint-il de subiuger le Royaume d'Ægypte: et depuis d'aller attaquer les forces de Scipion et de Iuba, de dix parts plus grandes que les siennes?

Ces gens là ont eu ie ne sçay quelle plus qu'humaine confiance de leur fortune: et disoit-il, qu'il falloit executer, non pas consulter les hautes entreprises. Apres la battaille de Pharsale, comme il eust enuoyé son armée deuant en Asie, et passast auec vn seul vaisseau, le destroit de l'Hellespont, il rencontra en mer Lucius Cassius, auec dix gros nauires de guerre: il eut le courage non seulement de l'attendre, mais de tirer droit vers luy, et le sommer de se rendre: et en vint à bout.

2.34.14 Ayant entrepris ce furieux siege d'Alexia, où il y auoit quatre vingts mille hommes de deffence, toute la Gaule s'estant esleuée pour luy courre sus, et leuer le siege, et dressé vn' armée de cent neuf mille cheuaux, et de deux cens quarante mille hommes de pied, quelle hardiesse et maniacle confiance fut-ce, de n'en vouloir abandonner son entreprise, et se resoudre à deux si grandes difficultez ensemble? Lesquelles toutesfois il soustint: et apres auoir gaigné cette grande battaille contre ceux de dehors, rengea bien tost à sa mercy ceux qu'il tenoit enfermez. Il en aduint autant à Lucullus, au siege de Tigranocerta contre le Roy Tigranes, mais d'vne condition dispareille, veu la mollesse des ennemis, à qui Lucullus auoit affaire.

2.34.15 Ie veux icy remarquer deux rares euenemens et extraordinaires, sur le faict de ce siege d'Alexia, l'vn, que les Gaulois s'assemblans pour venir trouuer là Cæsar, ayans faict denombrement de toutes leurs forces, resolurent en leur conseil, de retrancher vne bonne partie de cette grande multitude, de peur qu'ils n'en tombassent en confusion. Cet exemple est nouueau, de through the enemy army to strengthen them with his presence.

ENGLISH

Having crossed to Dyrrachium with very small forces, and seeing that the rest of his army, which he had left Antony to bring over, was slow to follow him, he undertook to cross the sea back again alone in a tremendous storm, and he stole away to go and fetch the rest of his forces, though the ports on the other side and the whole sea were held by Pompey. As for the enterprises he undertook by force of arms, there are several that go beyond all the reasoning of military science in their risk. For with what slender means did he undertake to subjugate the kingdom of Egypt, and afterward to go and attack the forces of Scipio and Juba, ten times larger than his own?

Such men have had some more than human confidence in their fortune; and he used to say that great enterprises must be carried out, not deliberated. After the battle of Pharsalus, having sent his army ahead into Asia, he was crossing the strait of the Hellespont with a single vessel when he met Lucius Cassius at sea with ten great warships. He had the courage not only to wait for him but to make straight for him and summon him to surrender—and he carried it off.

He undertook that furious siege of Alesia, where there were eighty thousand men defending the town. All Gaul had risen to fall upon him and raise the siege, and had raised an army of a hundred and nine thousand horse and two hundred and forty thousand foot. What boldness, what manic confidence was it, to refuse to give up his undertaking and to resolve to take on two such great difficulties at once? Yet he withstood them both. After winning that great battle against those outside, he soon brought those he held shut in to his mercy. The same thing happened to Lucullus at the siege of Tigranocerta against King Tigranes, but under very unequal conditions, given the softness of the enemies Lucullus had to deal with.

I want to note here two rare and extraordinary events concerning this siege of Alesia. One is that the Gauls, gathering to come and confront Caesar there, took a count of all their forces and resolved in their council to cut off a good part of that great multitude, for fear of falling into confusion. This is a new kind of example: to be afraid of being too craindre à estre trop: mais à le bien prendre, il est vraysemblable, que le corps d'vne armée doit auoir vne grandeur moderée, et reglée à certaines bornes, soit pour la difficulté de la nourrir, soit pour la difficulté de la conduire et tenir en ordre. Aumoins seroit il bien aisé à verifier par exemple, que ces armées monstrueuses en nombre, n'ont guere rien fait qui vaille.

FRENCH

Suiuant le dire de Cyrus en Xenophon, ce n'est pas le nombre des hommes, ains le nombre des bons hommes, qui faict l'aduantage: le demeurant servant plus de destourbier que de secours. Et Baiazet print le principal fondement à sa resolution, de liurer iournée à Tamburlan, contre l'aduis de tous ses Capitaines, sur ce, que le nombre innombrable des hommes de son ennemy luy donnoit certaine esperance de confusion. Scanderbech bon iuge et tres expert, auoit accoustumé de dire, que dix ou douze mille combattans fideles, deuoient baster à vn suffisant chef de guerre, pour garantir sa reputation en toute sorte de besoing militaire.

L'autre poinct, qui semble estre contraire, et à l'vsage, et à la raison de la guerre, c'est que Vercingentorix, qui estoit nommé chef et general de toutes les parties des Gaules, reuoltées, print party de s'aller enfermer dans Alexia. Car celuy qui commande à tout vn pays ne se doit iamais engager qu'au cas de cette extremité, qu'il y allast de sa derniere place, et qu'il n'y eust rien plus à esperer qu'en la deffence d'icelle. Autrement il se doit tenir libre, pour auoir moyen de prouuoir en general à toutes les parties de son gouuernement.

2.34.16 Pour reuenir à Cæsar, il deuint auec le temps vn peu plus tardif et plus consideré, comme tesmoigne son familier Oppius: estimant, qu'il ne deuoit aisément hazarder l'honneur de tant de victoires, lequel, vne seule defortune luy pourroit faire perdre. C'est ce que disent les Italiens, quand ils veulent reprocher cette hardiesse temeraire, qui se void aux ieunes gens, les nommants necessiteux d'honneur, bisognosi d'honore: et qu'estans encore en cette grande faim et disette de reputation, ils ont raison de la chercher à quelque prix que ce soit: ce que ne doiuent pas faire ceux qui en ont desia acquis à suffisance.

Il y peut auoir quelque iuste moderation en ce desir de gloire, et quelque sacieté en cet appetit comme aux autres: assez de gens le pratiquent ainsin.

ENGLISH

many. But taken rightly, it is likely that the body of an army should be of moderate size, kept within certain bounds, whether because of the difficulty of feeding it or the difficulty of leading it and keeping it in order. At least it would be easy to show by examples that those armies monstrous in number have hardly ever done anything worthwhile.

As Cyrus says in Xenophon, it is not the number of men but the number of good men that gives the advantage; the rest are more of a hindrance than a help. And Bajazet based his resolution to give battle to Tamburlaine, against the advice of all his captains, chiefly on this: that the countless number of his enemy's men gave him sure hope that they would fall into confusion. Scanderbeg, a good judge and very expert, used to say that ten or twelve thousand loyal fighting men should be enough for a competent commander to secure his reputation in every kind of military need.

The other point, which seems contrary both to the practice and to the reason of war, is that Vercingetorix, who had been named leader and general of all the rebellious parts of Gaul, chose to go and shut himself up in Alesia. For whoever commands a whole country should never commit himself except in that extremity where his last stronghold is at stake and there is nothing more to hope for but in defending it. Otherwise he must keep himself free, so as to be able to provide generally for every part of his command.

To return to Caesar: with time he became somewhat slower and more deliberate, as his intimate friend Oppius testifies, judging that he should not lightly risk the honor of so many victories, which a single misfortune could make him lose. This is what the Italians mean when they want to reproach the reckless boldness seen in young men: they call them needy of honor, in want of honor, and say that, being still in that great hunger and dearth of reputation, they are right to seek it at any price—which those who have already acquired enough of it should not do.[8]

There can be some just measure in this desire for glory, and some point of fullness in this appetite

8 Gaius Oppius, Caesar's friend and agent, wrote about him; Montaigne takes this from Plutarch.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
		as in the others: plenty of people practice it that way.
2.34.17	Il estoit bien esloigné de cette religion des anciens Romains, qui ne se vouloyent preualoir en leurs guerres, que de la vertu simple et nayfue. Mais encore y apportoit il plus de conscience que nous ne ferions à cette heure, et n'approuuoit pas toutes sortes de moyens, pour acquerir la victoire. En la guerre contre Ariouistus, estant à parlementer auec luy, il y suruint quelque remuement entre les deux armées, qui commença par la faute des gens de cheual d'Ariouistus. Sur ce tumulte, Cæsar se trouua auoir fort grand aduantage sur ses ennemis, toutes-fois il ne s'en voulut point preualoir, de peur qu'on luy peust reprocher d'y auoir procedé de mauuaise foy.	He was far removed from that scrupulousness of the ancient Romans, who would make use in their wars only of plain, unaffected valor. Still, he brought more conscience to it than we would nowadays, and did not approve of every kind of means for gaining victory. In the war against Ariovistus, while he was parleying with him, some disturbance arose between the two armies, started through the fault of Ariovistus's horsemen. In this tumult Caesar found himself with a very great advantage over his enemies; yet he would not use it, for fear that he might be reproached with having acted in bad faith.[9]
2.34.18	Il auoit accoustumé de porter vn accoustrement riche au combat, et de couleur esclatante, pour se faire remarquer.	He used to wear rich clothing in battle, of a brilliant color, to make himself noticed.
2.34.19	Il tenoit la bride plus estroite à ses soldats, et les tenoit plus de court estants pres des ennemis.	He kept a tighter rein on his soldiers, and held them more closely in check, when they were near the enemy.
2.34.20	Quand les anciens Grecs vouloient accuser quelqu'vn d'extreme insuffisance, ils disoyent en commun prouerbe, qu'il ne sçauoit ny lire ny nager: il auoit cette mesme opinion, que la science de nager estoit tres-vtile à la guerre, et en tira plusieurs commoditez: s'il auoit à faire diligence, il franchissoit ordinairement à nage les riuieres qu'il rencontroit: car il aymoit à voyager à pied, comme le grand Alexandre.	When the ancient Greeks wanted to accuse someone of utter incompetence, they would say, as a common proverb, that he could neither read nor swim. He held this same opinion, that skill in swimming was very useful in war, and he drew several advantages from it. If he had to move fast, he usually swam across the rivers he came upon; for he liked to travel on foot, like Alexander the Great.
	En Ægypte, ayant esté forcé pour se sauuer, de se mettre dans vn petit batteau, et tant de gens s'y estants lancez quant et luy, qu'il estoit en danger d'aller à fons, il ayma mieux se ietter en la mer, et gaigna sa flotte à nage, qui estoit plus de deux cents pas au delà, tenant en sa main gauche ses tablettes hors de l'eau, et trainant à belles dents sa cotte d'armes, afin que l'ennemy n'en iouyst, estant desia bien auancé sur l'aage.	In Egypt he was forced to get into a small boat to save himself, and so many people jumped in along with him that it was in danger of sinking. He preferred to throw himself into the sea, and swam to his fleet, which was more than two hundred paces off, holding his writing tablets out of the water in his left hand and dragging his coat of armor along in his teeth so that the enemy should not have it—and this when he was already well on in years.

CAESAR'S LOYAL SOLDIERS

His soldiers served him unpaid, died rather than desert him, and the besieged of Salona broke out.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.34.21	Iamais chef de guerre n'eut tant de creance sur ses soldats. Au commencement de ses guerres ciuiles, les	Never did a commander have such credit with his soldiers. At the beginning of his civil wars, the centeniers luy offrirent de soudoyer chacun sur sa bourse, vn homme d'armes, et les gens de pied, de le seruir à leurs despens: ceux qui estoyent plus aysez, entreprenants encore à deffrayer les plus necessiteux. Feu Monsieur l'Admiral de Chastillon nous fit veoir dernierement vn pareil cas en noz guerres ciuiles: car les François de son armée, fournissoient de leurs bourses au payement des estrangers, qui l'accompagnoient. Il ne se trouueroit guere d'exemples d'affection si ardente et si preste, parmy ceux qui marchent dans le vieux train, soubs l'ancienne police des loix. La passion nous commande bien plus viuement que la raison.

FRENCH

Il est pourtant aduenu en la guerre contre Annibal, qu'à l'exemple de la liberalité du peuple Romain en la ville, les gendarmes et Capitaines refuserent leur paye; et appelloit on au camp de Marcellus, mercenaires, ceux qui en prenoient. Ayant eu du pire aupres de Dyrrachium, ses soldats se vindrent d'eux mesmes offrir à estre chastiez et punis, de façon qu'il eut plus à les consoler qu'à les tancer. Vne sienne seule cohorte, soustint quatre legions de Pompeius plus de quatre heures, iusques à ce qu'elle fut quasi toute deffaicte à coups de trait, et se trouua dans la tranchée, cent trente mille flesches.

Vn soldat nommé Scæua, qui commandoit à l'vne des entrées, s'y maintint inuincible ayant vn œil creué, vne espaule et vne cuisse percées, et son escu faucé en deux cens trente lieux. Il est aduenu à plusieurs de ses soldats pris prisonniers, d'accepter plustost la mort, que de vouloir promettre de prendre autre party. Granius Petronius, pris par Scipion en Affrique, Scipion apres auoir faict mourir ses compagnons, luy manda qu'il luy donnoit la vie, car il estoit homme de reng et questeur: Petronius respondit que les soldats de Cæsar auoyent accoustumé de donner la vie aux autres, non la receuoir; et se tua tout soudain de sa main propre.

2.34.22 Il y a infinis exemples de leur fidelité: il ne faut pas oublier le traict de ceux qui furent assiegez à Salone, ville partizane pour Cæsar contre Pompeius, pour vn rare accident qui y aduint. Marcus Octauius les tenoit assiegez; ceux de dedans estans reduits en extreme centurions offered each to pay for a man-at-arms out of his own purse, and the foot soldiers offered to serve him at their own expense, the better-off even undertaking to support the neediest. The late Admiral de Châtillon showed us a similar case recently in our own civil wars: the Frenchmen in his army contributed from their own purses to pay the foreigners who were with him. Hardly any examples of such ardent and ready affection would be found among those who march along the old road, under the ancient government of the laws. Passion commands us far more forcefully than reason.[10]

ENGLISH

Yet it did happen in the war against Hannibal that, following the example of the generosity of the Roman people in the city, the men-at-arms and captains refused their pay; and in Marcellus's camp those who took it were called mercenaries. When Caesar had had the worst of it near Dyrrachium, his soldiers came of their own accord to offer themselves to be chastised and punished, so that he had more need to console them than to scold them. A single cohort of his held off four of Pompey's legions for more than four hours, until it was almost entirely destroyed by missiles; and a hundred and thirty thousand arrows were found in the trench.

A soldier named Scaeva, who commanded at one of the entrances, held out there unconquered with one eye put out, a shoulder and a thigh pierced, and his shield pierced in two hundred and thirty places. Many of his soldiers who were taken prisoner chose to accept death rather than promise to change sides. Granius Petronius was captured by Scipio in Africa. Scipio, having put his companions to death, sent him word that he would spare his life, since he was a man of rank and a quaestor. Petronius answered that Caesar's soldiers were accustomed to give life to others, not to receive it; and immediately killed himself with his own hand.

There are countless examples of their loyalty. We must not forget the deed of those who were besieged at Salona, a town that took Caesar's side against Pompey, because of a rare event that happened there. Marcus Octavius held them un-

9 Ariovistus, a Germanic king, was defeated by Caesar in 58 BC.
10 Gaspard de Coligny, Admiral of France and Protestant leader, killed in the Saint Bartholomew's Day Massacre of 1572.

FRENCH

necessité de toutes choses, en maniere que pour suppleer au deffaut qu'ils auoyent d'hommes, la plus part d'entre eux y estans morts et blessez, ils auoyent mis en liberté tous leurs esclaues, et pour le seruice de leurs engins auoient esté contraints de coupper les cheueux de toutes les femmes, affin d'en faire des cordes; outre vne merueilleuse disette de viures; et ce neantmoins resolus de iamais ne se rendre.

Apres auoir trainé ce siege en grande longueur, d'où Octauius estoit deuenu plus nonchalant, et moins attentif à son entreprinse, ils choisirent vn iour sur le midy, et comme ils eurent rangé les femmes et les enfans sur leurs murailles, pour faire bonne mine, sortirent en telle furie, sur les assiegeans, qu'ayants enfoncé le premier, le second, et tiers corps de garde, et le quatriesme, et puis le reste, et ayants faict du tout abandonner les tranchées, les chasserent iusques dans les nauires: et Octauius mesmes se sauua à Dyrrachium, où estoit Pompeius.

Ie n'ay point memoire pour cett' heure, d'auoir veu aucun autre exemple, où les assiegez battent en gros les assiegeans, et gaignent la maistrise de la campaigne; ny qu'vne sortie ait tiré en consequence, vne pure et entiere victoire de battaille.

ENGLISH

der siege. Those inside were reduced to extreme want of everything. To make up for their lack of men, most of them having been killed or wounded, they had freed all their slaves; and to work their siege engines they had been forced to cut off the hair of all the women to make ropes from it—on top of a terrible shortage of food. And yet they were resolved never to surrender.[11]

The siege had dragged on a long time, which made Octavius more careless and less attentive to his enterprise. They chose a day, around noon, and after lining up the women and children on their walls to keep up appearances, they sallied out against the besiegers in such fury that they broke through the first, the second and the third guard posts, and the fourth, and then the rest; they made them abandon the trenches altogether and chased them right into their ships. Octavius himself escaped to Dyrrachium, where Pompey was.

I cannot remember for now having seen any other example where the besieged beat the besiegers wholesale and won mastery of the field, or where a sally resulted in a pure and complete victory in battle.

11 Salona, on the Dalmatian coast near modern Split; the siege took place in 48 BC.

II.35 Of Three Good Women

De trois bonnes femmes

Montaigne praises three wives—a humble neighbor of Pliny's, Arria and Seneca's Paulina—who chose to die alongside their husbands.

FRENCH

2.35.1 IL n'en est pas à douzaines, comme chacun sçait; et notamment aux deuoirs de mariage: car c'est vn marché plein de tant d'espineuses circonstances, qu'il est malaisé que la volonté d'vne femme, s'y maintienne entiere long temps. Les hommes, quoy qu'ils y soyent auec vn peu meilleure condition, y ont trop affaire. La touche d'vn bon mariage, et sa vraye preuue, regarde le temps que la societé dure; si elle a esté constamment douce, loyalle, et commode. En nostre siecle, elles reseruent plus communément, à estaller leurs bons offices, et la vehemence de leur affection, enuers leurs maris perdus: cherchent au moins lors, à donner tesmoignage de leur bonne volonté. Tardif tesmoignage, et hors de saison.

Elles preuuent plustost par là, qu'elles ne les ayment que morts. La vie est pleine de combustion, le trespas d'amour, et de courtoisie. Comme les peres cachent l'affection enuers leurs enfans, elles volontiers de mesmes, cachent la leur enuers le mary, pour maintenir vn honneste respect. Ce mystere n'est pas de mon goust. Elles ont beau s'escheueler et s'esgratigner; ie m'en vois à l'oreille d'vne femme de chambre, et d'vn secretaire: comment estoient-ils, Comment ont-ils vescu ensemble? il me souuient tousiours de ce bon mot, iactantius mœrent, quæ minus dolent. Leur rechigner est odieux aux viuans, et vain aux morts. Nous dispenserons volontiers qu'on rie apres, pourueu qu'on nous rie pendant la vie.

Est-ce pas de quoy resusciter de despit: qui m'aura craché au nez pendant que i'estoy, me vienne frotter les pieds, quand ie ne suis plus? S'il y a quelque honneur à pleurer les maris, il n'appartient qu'à celles qui leur ont ry: celles qui ont pleuré en la vie, qu'elles rient en la mort, au dehors comme au dedans. Aussi, ne regardez pas à ces yeux moites, et à cette piteuse voix: regardez ce port, ce teinct, et l'embonpoinct de ces iouës, soubs ces grands voiles: c'est par là qu'elle parle François. Il en est peu, de

ENGLISH

They do not come by the dozen, as everyone knows, and especially not in the duties of marriage. For it is a bargain full of so many thorny circumstances that it is hard for a woman's will to stay whole in it for long. Men, though they are in a somewhat better position in it, have their hands full. The touchstone of a good marriage, and its true proof, concerns the time the partnership lasts: whether it has been constantly gentle, loyal and agreeable. In our age, women more commonly save the display of their good offices and the vehemence of their affection for their lost husbands; at least then they try to give evidence of their goodwill. Late evidence, and out of season.

Rather, they prove by this that they love them only dead. Life is full of strife; death, full of love and courtesy. As fathers hide their affection for their children, so wives willingly hide theirs for their husbands, to maintain a decorous respect. This mystery is not to my taste. They may tear their hair and scratch their faces all they like; I go and whisper in the ear of a chambermaid or a secretary: "How were they? How did they live together?" I always remember that good saying: Those who grieve least make the most show of it. Their sour faces are odious to the living and useless to the dead. We will gladly let them laugh afterward, provided they smile on us while we live.[1]

Isn't it enough to make a man rise from the dead in vexation, that a woman who spat in my face while I lived should come and rub my feet when I am no more? If there is any honor in weeping for husbands, it belongs only to those who smiled on them: let those who wept during their life laugh at their death, outwardly as well as inwardly. So do not look at those moist eyes and that pitiful voice;

1 Adapted from Tacitus, Annals.

FRENCH

qui la santé n'aille en amendant, qualité qui ne sçait pas mentir. Cette ceremonieuse contenance ne regarde pas tant derriere soy, que deuant; c'est acquest, plus que payement.

En mon enfance, vne honneste et tresbelle dame, qui vit encores, vefue d'vn Prince, auoit ie ne sçay quoy plus en sa parure, qu'il n'est permis par les loix de nostre vefuage: à ceux qui le luy reprochoient: C'est, disoit elle, que ie ne practique plus de nouuelles amitiez, et suis hors de volonté de me remarier.

2.35.2 Pour ne disconuenir du tout à nostre vsage, i'ay icy choisi trois femmes, qui ont aussi employé l'effort de leur bonté, et affection, autour la mort de leurs maris. Ce sont pourtant exemples vn peu autres, et si pressans, qu'ils tirent hardiment la vie en consequence.

ENGLISH

look at that bearing, that complexion, and the plumpness of those cheeks under those great veils: that is where she speaks plain French. There are few whose health does not improve, and that is a quality that cannot lie. That ceremonious demeanor looks not so much behind as ahead; it is an investment rather than a repayment.

In my childhood, a virtuous and very beautiful lady, who is still living, the widow of a prince, wore something more in her attire than the laws of our widowhood allow. To those who reproached her for it she said: "It is because I am no longer making new friendships, and have no wish to remarry."

So as not to depart entirely from our custom, I have chosen here three women who also exerted all the force of their goodness and affection around the death of their husbands. Yet these are rather different examples, and so pressing that they boldly bring life itself into the bargain.

A HUMBLE WIFE

A woman of low station ties herself to her incurably sick husband and leaps with him into the sea.

FRENCH

2.35.3 Pline le ieune auoit pres d'vne sienne maison en Italie, vn voisin merueilleusement tourmenté de quelques vlceres, qui luy estoient suruenues és parties honteuses. Sa femme le voyant si longuement languir, le pria de permettre, qu'elle veist à loisir et de pres l'estat de son mal, et qu'elle luy diroit plus franchement qu'aucun autre ce qu'il auoit à en esperer. Apres auoir obtenu cela de luy, et l'auoir curieusement consideré, elle trouua qu'il estoit impossible, qu'il en peust guerir, et que tout ce qu'il auoit à attendre, c'estoit de trainer fort long temps vne vie douloureuse et languissante: si luy conseilla pour le plus seur et souuerain remede, de se tuer.

Et le trouuant vn peu mol, à vne si rude entreprise: Ne pense point, luy dit-elle, mon amy, que les douleurs que ie te voy souffrir ne me touchent autant qu'à toy, et que pour m'en deliurer, ie ne me vueille seruir moy-mesme, de cette medecine que ie t'ordonne. Ie te veux accompagner à la guerison, comme i'ay faict à la maladie: oste cette crainte, et pense que nous n'aurons que plaisir en ce passage, qui nous doit deliurer de tels tourmens:

ENGLISH

Pliny the Younger had, near one of his houses in Italy, a neighbor terribly tormented by some ulcers that had appeared on his private parts. His wife, seeing him languish so long, begged him to let her examine the state of his illness closely and at leisure, saying she would tell him more frankly than anyone else what he had to hope for. Having obtained this from him and examined him carefully, she found that it was impossible for him to recover, and that all he had to look forward to was dragging out a painful and languishing life for a very long time. So she advised him, as the surest and sovereign remedy, to kill himself.[2]

And finding him a little faint-hearted at so hard an undertaking, she said: "Do not think, my love, that the pains I see you suffer do not touch me as much as you, or that, to free myself from them, I do not mean to use the very medicine I prescribe for you. I want to go with you in the cure as I have in the illness. Put away this fear, and think that we shall have nothing but pleasure in this passage which is

2 He tells the story in his Letters (VI.24).

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	nous nous en irons heureusement ensemble. Cela dit, et ayant rechauffé le courage de son mary, elle resolut qu'ils se precipiteroient en la mer, par vne fenestre de leur logis, qui y respondoit.	to free us from such torments: we shall go away happily together." That said, and having rekindled her husband's courage, she decided that they would throw themselves into the sea from a window of their house that overlooked it.
	Et pour maintenir iusques à sa fin, cette loyale et vehemente affection, dequoy elle l'auoit embrassé pendant sa vie, elle voulut encore qu'il mourust entre ses bras; mais de peur qu'ils ne luy faillissent, et que les estraintes de ses enlassemens, ne vinssent à se relascher par la cheute et la crainte, elle se fit lier et attacher bien estroitement auec luy, par le faux du corps; et abandonna ainsi sa vie, pour le repos de celle de son mary. Celle-là estoit de bas lieu; et parmy telle condition de gens, il n'est pas si nouueau d'y voir quelque traict de rare bonté, Extrema per illos / Iustitia excedens terris vestigia fecit.	And to keep up to the end the loyal and vehement affection with which she had embraced him during his life, she wanted him also to die in her arms. But for fear that her arms might fail her, and that the grip of her embrace might loosen in the fall and the fright, she had herself tied and bound very tightly to him by the waist; and so she gave up her life for the repose of her husband's. She was of low station; and among people of that condition it is not so unusual to see some act of rare goodness: Justice, as she left the earth, / left her last footprints among them.[3]
2.35.4	Les autres deux sont nobles et riches, où les exemples de vertu se logent rarement.	The other two are noble and rich, a station where examples of virtue rarely lodge.

ARRIA

Arria follows her condemned husband, then stabs herself first and tells him, "Paetus, it does not hurt."

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.35.5	Arria femme de Cecinna Pætus, personnage consulaire, fut mere d'vne autre Arria femme de Thrasea Pætus, celuy duquel la vertu fut tant renommée du temps de Neron; et par le moyen de ce gendre, mere-grand de Fannia; car la ressemblance des noms de ces hommes et femmes, et de leurs fortunes, en a fait mesconter plusieurs.	Arria, wife of Caecina Paetus, a man of consular rank, was the mother of another Arria, wife of Thrasea Paetus—the man whose virtue was so renowned in Nero's time—and through this son-in-law she was the grandmother of Fannia. For the likeness of the names of these men and women, and of their fortunes, has led many people astray.[4]
	Cette premiere Arria, Cecinna Pætus, son mary, ayant esté prins prisonnier par les gens de l'Empereur Claudius, apres la deffaicte de Scribonianus, duquel il auoit suiuy le party: supplia ceux qui l'emmenoient prisonnier à Rome, de la receuoir dans leur nauire, où elle leur seroit de beaucoup moins de despence et d'incommodité, qu'vn nombre de personnes, qu'il leur faudroit, pour le seruice de son mary: et qu'elle seule fourniroit à sa chambre, à sa cuisine, et à tous autres offices. Ils l'en refuserent: et elle s'estant iettée dans vn batteau de pescheur, qu'elle loua sur le champ, le suyuit en cette sorte depuis la Sclauonie.	This first Arria's husband, Caecina Paetus, was taken prisoner by the Emperor Claudius's men after the defeat of Scribonianus, whose party he had followed. She begged those who were taking him prisoner to Rome to take her aboard their ship, where she would cost them much less expense and trouble than the number of people they would need to serve her husband; she alone would see to his room, his kitchen and every other duty. They refused her; and throwing herself into a fishing boat that she hired on the spot, she followed him in this way all the way from Dalmatia.[5]
	Comme ils furent à Rome, vn iour, en presence de l'Empereur, Iunia vefue de Scribonianus, s'estant accostée	When they were in Rome, one day, in the Emperor's presence, Junia, Scribonianus's widow, came

3 Virgil, Georgics II.473–474, of country folk.
4 Arria the Elder died in AD 42; Thrasea Paetus, a Stoic senator, was forced to die by Nero in AD 66.

FRENCH

d'elle familierement, pour la societé de leurs fortunes, elle la repoussa rudement auec ces parolles: Moy, dit-elle, que ie parle à toy, ny que ie t'escoute, à toy, au giron de laquelle Scribonianus fut tué, et tu vis encores? Ces paroles, auec plusieurs autres signes, firent sentir à ses parents, qu'elle estoit pour se deffaire elle mesme, impatiente de supporter la fortune de son mary. Et Thrasea son gendre, la suppliant sur ce propos de ne se vouloir perdre, et luy disant ainsi: Quoy? si ie courois pareille fortune à celle de Cecinna, voudriez vous que ma femme vostre fille en fist de mesme? Comment donc?

si ie le voudrois, respondit-elle: ouy, ouy, ie le voudrois, si elle auoit vescu aussi long temps, et d'aussi bon accord auec toy, que i'ay faict auec mon mary. Ces responces augmentoient le soing, qu'on auoit d'elle, et faisoient qu'on regardoit de plus pres à ses deportemens.

Vn iour apres auoir dict à ceux qui la gardoient, Vous auez beau faire, vous me pouuez bien faire plus mal mourir, mais de me garder de mourir, vous ne sçauriez: s'eslançant furieusement d'vne chaire, où elle estoit assise, elle s'alla de toute sa force chocquer la teste contre la paroy voisine: duquel coup, estant cheute de son long esuanouye, et fort blessée apres qu'on l'eut à toute peine faite reuenir: Ie vous disois bien, dit-elle, que si vous me refusiez quelque façon aisée de me tuer, i'en choisirois quelque autre pour mal-aisée qu'elle fust.

La fin d'vne si admirable vertu fut telle: Son mary Pætus, n'ayant pas le cœur assez ferme de soy-mesme, pour se donner la mort, à laquelle la cruauté de l'Empereur le rengeoit; vn iour entre autres, apres auoir premierement employé les discours et enhortements, propres au conseil, qu'elle luy donnoit à ce faire, elle print le poignart, que son mary portoit: et le tenant traict en sa main, pour la conclusion de son exhortation; Fais ainsi Pætus, luy dit-elle. Et en mesme instant, s'en estant donné vn coup mortel dans l'estomach, et puis l'arrachant de sa playe, elle le luy presenta, finissant quant et quant sa vie: auec cette noble, genereuse, et immortelle parole, Pæte non dolet.

Elle n'eust loisir que de dire ces trois parolles d'vne si belle substance; Tien Pætus, il ne m'a point faict mal.
Casta suo gladium cùm traderet Arria Pæto,
Quem de visceribus traxerat ipsa suis:
Si qua fides, vulnus quod feci, non dolet, inquit, up to her familiarly because of the fortunes they shared. Arria pushed her away roughly with these words: "I," she said, "speak to you, or listen to you? You, in whose lap Scribonianus was killed, and you are still alive?" These words, along with many other signs, made her relatives realize that she meant to do away with herself, unable to bear her husband's fate. And Thrasea, her son-in-law, begged her on this account not to throw her life away, saying to her: "What? If I ran the same risk as Caecina, would you want my wife, your daughter, to do the same?" "What then?

ENGLISH

Would I want it?" she replied. "Yes, yes, I would want it, if she had lived as long and in as good harmony with you as I have with my husband." These answers increased the care taken of her, and made them watch her conduct more closely.

One day, after saying to those who were guarding her, "It's no use: you can make me die a worse death, but you cannot keep me from dying," she sprang furiously from the chair where she was sitting and went and dashed her head with all her strength against the wall nearby. The blow laid her out full length in a faint, badly hurt; and after they had with great difficulty brought her round, she said: "I told you that if you refused me some easy way of killing myself, I would choose some other, however hard it might be."

The end of so admirable a virtue was this. Her husband Paetus did not have a heart firm enough of itself to give himself the death to which the Emperor's cruelty was driving him. One day, after first using the reasonings and exhortations suited to the advice she was giving him to do it, she took the dagger her husband wore and, holding it drawn in her hand as the conclusion of her exhortation, she said to him: "Do this, Paetus." And at the same instant, having struck herself a mortal blow in the breast and then pulled the dagger from the wound, she handed it to him, ending her life at that very moment, with these noble, generous and immortal words: Paetus, it does not hurt.

She had time only to say those three words of such fine substance: "Here, Paetus, it did not hurt me."
When chaste Arria handed Paetus the sword she herself had drawn from her own flesh,
"Believe me," she said, "the wound I made does not

5 Scribonianus, governor of Dalmatia, rebelled against Claudius in AD 42.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Sed quod tu facies, id mihi Pæte dolet. Il est bien plus vif en son naturel, et d'vn sens plus riche: car et la playe, et la mort de son mary, et les siennes, tant s'en faut qu'elles luy poisassent, qu'elle en auoit esté la conseillere et promotrice: mais ayant fait cette haulte et courageuse entreprinse pour la seule commodité de son mary, elle ne regarde qu'à luy, encore au dernier traict de sa vie, et à luy oster la crainte de la suiure en mourant.	hurt; it is the one you will make, Paetus, that hurts me." The saying is much more vivid in its natural form, and richer in meaning. For the wound and death of her husband, and her own, were so far from weighing on her that she had been their counselor and promoter. But having undertaken this lofty and courageous deed solely for her husband's sake, she thinks only of him, even at the last moment of her life, and of taking away his fear of following her in death.[6]
Pætus se frappa tout soudain, de ce mesme glaiue; honteux à mon aduis, d'auoir eu besoin d'vn si cher et pretieux enseignement.	Paetus immediately struck himself with that same blade—ashamed, in my opinion, to have needed so dear and precious a lesson.

PAULINA AND SENECA

Seneca's young wife chooses to die with him when Nero orders his death, but is saved against her will.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.35.6 Pompeia Paulina, ieune et tres-noble Dame Romaine, auoit espousé Seneque, en son extreme vieillesse. Neron, son beau disciple, enuoya ses satellites vers luy, pour luy denoncer l'ordonnance de sa mort, ce qui se faisoit en cette maniere.	Pompeia Paulina, a young and very noble Roman lady, had married Seneca in his extreme old age. Nero, his fine pupil, sent his henchmen to him to announce his sentence of death, which was done in this way.[7]
Quand les Empereurs Romains de ce temps, auoyent condamné quelque homme de qualité, ils luy mandoyent par leurs officiers de choisir quelque mort à sa poste, et de la prendre dans tel, ou tel delay, qu'ils luy faisoyent prescrire selon la trempe de leur cholere, tantost plus pressé, tantost plus long, luy donnant terme pour disposer pendant ce temps là, de ses affaires, et quelque fois luy ostant le moyen de ce faire, par la briefueté du temps: et si le condamné estriuoit à leur ordonnance, ils menoyent des gens propres à l'executer, ou luy couppant les veines des bras, et des iambes, ou luy faisant aualler du poison par force.	When the Roman emperors of that time had condemned some man of rank, they sent their officers to tell him to choose whatever death he liked and to take it within such and such a period, which they had set for him according to the temper of their anger—sometimes shorter, sometimes longer—giving him time during that period to put his affairs in order, and sometimes taking away the means of doing so by the shortness of the time. And if the condemned man resisted their order, they brought men fit to carry it out, either cutting the veins of his arms and legs or forcing him to swallow poison.
Mais les personnes d'honneur, n'attendoyent pas cette necessité, et se seruoyent de leurs propres medecins et chirurgiens à cet effect. Seneque ouyt leur charge, d'vn visage paisible et asseuré, et apres, demanda du papier pour faire son testament: ce que luy ayant esté refusé par le Capitaine, il se tourne vers ses amis: Puis que ie ne puis, leur dit-il, vous laisser autre chose en recognoissance de ce que ie vous doy, ie vous laisse au moins ce que i'ay de plus beau, à sçauoir l'image de mes	But people of honor did not wait for this necessity, and used their own physicians and surgeons for the purpose. Seneca heard their message with a calm and steady face, and then asked for paper to make his will. When the captain refused him, he turned to his friends: "Since I cannot," he said, "leave you anything else in acknowledgment of what I owe you, I leave you at least the finest thing I have, namely the image of my character and my

6 Martial, Epigrams I.13.
7 Seneca was forced to die in AD 65; Montaigne follows Tacitus, Annals XV.

FRENCH

mœurs et de ma vie, laquelle ie vous prie conseruer en vostre memoire: affin qu'en ce faisant, vous acqueriez la gloire de sinceres et veritables amis.

Et quant et quant, appaisant tantost l'aigreur de la douleur, qu'il leur voyoit souffrir, par douces paroles, tantost roidissant sa voix, pour les tancer: Où sont, disoit-il, ces beaux preceptes de la philosophie? que sont deuenuës les prouisions, que par tant d'années nous auons faictes, contre les accidens de la fortune? la cruauté de Neron nous estoit elle incognue? que pouuions nous attendre de celuy, qui auoit tué sa mere et son frere, sinon qu'il fist encor mourir son gouuerneur, qui l'a nourry et esleué?

Apres auoir dit ces paroles en commun, il se destourne à sa femme, et l'embrassant estroittement, comme par la pesanteur de la douleur elle deffailloit de cœur et de forces; la pria de porter vn peu plus patiemment cet accident, pour l'amour de luy; et que l'heure estoit venue, où il auoit à montrer, non plus par discours et par disputes, mais par effect, le fruict qu'il auoit tiré de ses estudes: et que sans doubte il embrassoit la mort, non seulement sans douleur, mais auecques allegresse.

Parquoy m'amie, disoit-il, ne la deshonnore par tes larmes, affin qu'il ne semble que tu t'aimes plus que ma reputation: appaise ta douleur, et te console en la connoissance, que tu as eu de moy, et de mes actions, conduisant le reste de ta vie, par les honnestes occupations, ausquelles tu és addonnée.

A quoy Paulina ayant vn peu repris ses esprits, et reschauffé la magnanimité de son courage, par vne tres-noble affection: Non Seneca, respondit-elle, ie ne suis pas pour vous laisser sans ma compagnie en telle necessité: ie ne veux pas que vous pensiez, que les vertueux exemples de vostre vie, ne m'ayent encore appris à sçauoir bien mourir: et quand le pourroy-ie ny mieux, ny plus honnestement, ny plus à mon gré qu'auecques vous? ainsi faictes estat que ie m'en voy quant et vous.

Lors Seneque prenant en bonne part vne si belle et glorieuse deliberation de sa femme; et pour se deliurer aussi de la crainte de la laisser apres sa mort, à la mercy et cruauté de ses ennemis: Ie t'auoy, Paulina, dit-il, conseillé ce qui seruoit à conduire plus heureusement ta vie: tu aymes donc mieux l'honneur de la mort: vrayement ie ne te l'enuieray point: la constance et la resolution, soyent pareilles à nostre commune fin, mais la beauté et la gloire soit plus grande de ta part.

ENGLISH

life. I beg you to keep it in your memory, so that in doing so you may win the glory of sincere and true friends."

And at the same time, now soothing with gentle words the bitterness of the grief he saw them suffering, now hardening his voice to scold them, he said: "Where are those fine precepts of philosophy? What has become of the provisions we have laid in for so many years against the accidents of fortune? Was Nero's cruelty unknown to us? What could we expect from a man who had killed his mother and his brother, but that he should also put to death his tutor, who brought him up and raised him?"

Having said these words to them all, he turned to his wife and held her tightly in his arms, as she was failing in heart and strength under the weight of her grief. He begged her to bear this misfortune a little more patiently, for love of him; he said that the hour had come when he must show, no longer by reasoning and debate but in deed, the fruit he had drawn from his studies, and that he was undoubtedly embracing death not only without pain but with gladness.

"Therefore, my dear," he said, "do not dishonor it with your tears, lest it seem that you love yourself more than my reputation. Calm your grief, and console yourself with the knowledge you have had of me and of my actions, spending the rest of your life in the honorable occupations to which you are devoted."

Paulina, having recovered her spirits a little and rekindled the greatness of her courage through a most noble affection, replied: "No, Seneca, I am not one to leave you without my company in such a need. I do not want you to think that the virtuous examples of your life have not yet taught me how to die well; and when could I do it better, or more honorably, or more to my liking, than with you? So count on it: I am going with you."

Then Seneca took his wife's fine and glorious resolution in good part; besides, it freed him from the fear of leaving her after his death at the mercy and cruelty of his enemies. "I had advised you, Paulina," he said, "what would help you lead your life more happily; so you prefer the honor of death. Truly, I will not begrudge it you. Let our constancy and resolution be equal in our common

FRENCH

Cela fait, on leur couppa en mesme temps les veines des bras: mais par ce que celles de Seneque reserrées tant par la vieillesse, que par son abstinence, donnoyent au sang le cours trop long et trop lasche, il commanda qu'on luy couppast encore les veines des cuisses: et de peur que le tourment qu'il en souffroit, n'attendrist le cœur de sa femme, et pour se deliurer aussi soy-mesme de l'affliction, qu'il portoit de la veoir en si piteux estat: apres auoir tres-amoureusement pris congé d'elle, il la pria de permettre qu'on l'emportast en la chambre voisine, comme on feit.

Mais toutes ces incisions estans encore insuffisantes pour le faire mourir, il commanda à Statius Anneus son medecin, de luy donner vn breuuage de poison; qui n'eut guere non plus d'effect: car par la foiblesse et froideur des membres, elle ne peut arriuer iusques au cœur. Par ainsin on luy fit en outre apprester vn baing fort chauld: et lors sentant sa fin prochaine, autant qu'il eut d'halene, il continua des discours tres-excellens sur le subiect de l'estat où il se trouuoit, que ses secretaires recueillirent tant qu'ils peurent ouyr sa voix; et demeurerent ses parolles dernieres long temps depuis en credit et honneur, és mains des hommes: ce nous est vne bien fascheuse perte, qu'elles ne soyent venues iusques à nous.

Comme il sentit les derniers traicts de la mort, prenant de l'eau du baing toute sanglante, il en arrousa sa teste, en disant; Ie vouë cette eau à Iuppiter le liberateur. Neron aduerty de tout cecy, craignant que la mort de Paulina, qui estoit des mieux apparentées dames Romaines, et enuers laquelle il n'auoit nulles particulieres inimitiez, luy vinst à reproche; renuoya en toute diligence luy faire r'atacher ses playes: ce que ses gens d'elle, firent sans son sçeu, estant desia demy morte, et sans aucun sentiment. Et ce que contre son dessein, elle vesquit depuis, ce fut tres-honnorablement, et comme il appartenoit à sa vertu, montrant par la couleur blesme de son visage, combien elle auoit escoulé de vie par ses blessures.

2.35.7 Voyla mes trois comtes tres-veritables, que ie trouue aussi plaisans et tragiques que ceux que nous forgeons à nostre poste, pour donner plaisir au commun: et m'estonne que ceux qui s'addonnent à cela, ne s'auisent de choisir plustost dix mille tres-belles histoires, qui se end, but let the beauty and the glory be greater on your side."

ENGLISH

That done, the veins of their arms were cut at the same time. But because Seneca's veins, shrunk both by old age and by his abstemious diet, let the blood flow too slowly and too sluggishly, he ordered the veins of his thighs to be cut as well. And for fear that the torment he suffered might weaken his wife's heart, and also to free himself from the distress he felt at seeing her in so pitiful a state, he took a most loving leave of her and begged her to let herself be carried into the next room, which was done.

But since all these incisions were still not enough to kill him, he ordered Statius Annaeus, his physician, to give him a draught of poison, which had hardly any more effect: because of the weakness and coldness of his limbs, it could not reach his heart. So they also had a very hot bath prepared for him. Then, feeling his end near, as long as he had breath he went on with most excellent discourses on the state in which he found himself, which his secretaries took down as long as they could hear his voice; and his last words long remained in credit and honor in men's hands. It is a very grievous loss to us that they have not come down to us.

As he felt the last throes of death, he took some of the bathwater, all bloody, and sprinkled his head with it, saying: "I dedicate this water to Jupiter the Liberator." Nero, informed of all this, feared that the death of Paulina, who was among the best-connected ladies of Rome and against whom he had no particular enmity, might bring reproach upon him; he sent back in all haste to have her wounds bound up again. Her own servants did this without her knowledge, for she was already half dead and without any feeling. And as for living on afterward, against her intention, she did so most honorably and as befitted her virtue, showing by the pallor of her face how much life had drained out of her through her wounds.

There are my three very true tales, which I find as pleasing and as tragic as those we invent at our pleasure to entertain the common people. And I am amazed that those who devote themselves to that work do not think of choosing instead from the ten thousand very fine stories to be found in rencontrent dans les liures, où ils auroyent moins de peine, et apporteroient plus de plaisir et profit.

FRENCH

Et qui en voudroit bastir vn corps entier et s'entretenant, il ne faudroit qu'il fournist du sien que la liaison, comme la soudure d'vn autre metal: et pourroit entasser par ce moyen force veritables euenemens de toutes sortes, les disposant et diuersifiant, selon que la beauté de l'ouurage le requerroit, à peu pres comme Ouide a cousu et r'apiecé sa Metamorphose, de ce grand nombre de fables diuerses.

ENGLISH

books, where they would have less trouble and would bring more pleasure and profit.

And whoever wanted to build a whole, connected body out of them would need to supply of his own only the joining, like the solder of another metal. In this way he could pile up plenty of true events of all kinds, arranging and varying them as the beauty of the work required, much as Ovid stitched and patched together his Metamorphoses out of that great number of various fables.

LIVING FOR ANOTHER'S SAKE

Seneca's letter shows that prolonging one's life for a loved one can itself be magnanimity.

FRENCH

2.35.8 En ce dernier couple, cela est encore digne d'estre consideré, que Paulina offre volontiers à quitter la vie pour l'amour de son mary, et que son mary auoit autrefois quitté aussi la mort pour l'amour d'elle. Il n'y a pas pour nous grand contre-poix en cet eschange: mais selon son humeur Stoïque, ie croy qu'il pensoit auoir autant faict pour elle, d'alonger sa vie en sa faueur, comme s'il fust mort pour elle.

En l'vne des lettres, qu'il escrit à Lucilius; apres qu'il luy a fait entendre, comme la fiebure l'ayant pris à Rome, il monta soudain en coche, pour s'en aller à vne sienne maison aux champs, contre l'opinion de sa femme, qui le vouloit arrester; et qu'il luy auoit respondu, que la fiebure qu'il auoit, ce n'estoit pas fiebure du corps, mais du lieu: il suit ainsin: Elle me laissa aller me recommandant fort ma santé.

Or moy, qui sçay que ie loge sa vie en la mienne, ie commence de pouruoir à moy, pour pouruoir à elle: le priuilege que ma vieillesse m'auoit donné, me rendant plus ferme et plus resolu à plusieurs choses, ie le pers, quand il me souuient qu'en ce vieillard, il y en a vne ieune à qui ie profite.

Puis que ie ne la puis ranger à m'aymer plus courageusement, elle me renge à m'aymer moy mesme plus curieusement: car il faut prester quelque chose aux honnestes affections: et par fois, encore que les occasions nous pressent au contraire, il faut r'appeler la vie, voire auec que tourment: il faut arrester l'ame entre les dents, puis que la loy de viure aux gens de bien, ce n'est pas autant qu'il leur plaist, mais autant qu'ils doiuent.

ENGLISH

In this last couple, this too is worth considering: that Paulina willingly offers to give up life for love of her husband, and that her husband had once also given up death for love of her. To us there is no great counterweight in this exchange; but given his Stoic temperament, I believe he thought he had done as much for her in prolonging his life for her sake as if he had died for her.

In one of the letters he writes to Lucilius, he tells him how, having been taken with fever in Rome, he immediately got into a carriage to go to a country house of his, against the opinion of his wife, who wanted to keep him back; and how he had answered her that the fever he had was not a fever of the body but of the place. He goes on thus: She let me go, urging me strongly to look after my health.[8]

Now I, knowing that I lodge her life in mine, begin to take care of myself in order to take care of her. The privilege my old age had given me, making me firmer and more resolute about many things, I lose when I remember that in this old man there is a young woman whom I benefit.

Since I cannot bring her to love me more bravely, she brings me to love myself more carefully. For we must grant something to honorable affections; and sometimes, even though circumstances urge us the other way, we must call life back, even in torment; we must hold the soul between our teeth, since the law of living for good men is not as long as they please but as long as they ought.

8 Seneca, Letters to Lucilius 104.

FRENCH

Celuy qui n'estime pas tant sa femme ou vn sien amy, que d'en allonger sa vie, et qui s'opiniastre à mourir, il est trop delicat et trop mol: il faut que l'ame se commande cela, quand l'vtilité des nostres le requiert: il faut par fois nous prester à noz amis: et quand nous voudrions mourir pour nous, interrompre nostre dessein pour eux.

C'est tesmoignage de grandeur de courage, de retourner en la vie pour la consideration d'autruy, comme plusieurs excellens personnages ont faict: et est vn traict de bonté singuliere, de conseruer la vieillesse, (de laquelle la commodité la plus grande, c'est la nonchalance de sa durée, et vn plus courageux et desdaigneux vsage de la vie,) si on sent que cet office soit doux, aggreable, et profitable à quelqu'vn bien affectionné. Et en reçoit on vne tres-plaisante recompense: car qu'est-il plus doux, que d'estre si cher à sa femme, qu'en sa consideration, on en deuienne plus cher à soy-mesme? Ainsi ma Paulina m'a chargé, non seulement sa crainte, mais encore la mienne.

Ce ne m'a pas esté assez de considerer, combien resolument ie pourrois mourir, mais i'ay aussi consideré, combien irresoluement elle le pourroit souffrir. Ie me suis contrainct a viure, et c'est quelquefois magnanimité que viure. Voyla ses mots excellens, comme est son vsage.

ENGLISH

He who does not value his wife or a friend enough to prolong his life for them, and who obstinately insists on dying, is too fastidious and too soft. The soul must command itself to do this when the needs of those close to us require it. We must sometimes lend ourselves to our friends, and when we would like to die for our own sake, interrupt our plan for theirs.

It is a sign of greatness of heart to return to life out of regard for another, as many excellent men have done; and it is a mark of singular goodness to preserve one's old age (whose greatest advantage is indifference to how long it lasts, and a bolder and more disdainful use of life) if one feels that this service is sweet, agreeable and useful to someone who loves us dearly. And one receives a very pleasant reward for it: for what is sweeter than to be so dear to one's wife that, for her sake, one becomes dearer to oneself? So my Paulina has burdened me not only with her fear but also with my own.

It was not enough for me to consider how resolutely I could die; I have also considered how irresolutely she could bear it. I have forced myself to live, and sometimes it is magnanimity to live. Those are his words, excellent as always.

II.36 Of the Most Excellent Men

Des plus excellens hommes
Montaigne ranks Homer, Alexander and above all Epaminondas as the most excellent men he knows, weighing each one's gifts and faults.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.36.1	SI on me demandoit le choix de tous les hommes qui sont venus à ma cognoissance, il me semble en trouuer trois excellens au dessus de tous les autres.	If I were asked to choose among all the men who have come to my knowledge, I think I find three who excel above all the others.

HOMER

Homer is the first of the three most excellent men, the master of all later poets and thinkers.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.36.2	L'vn Homere; non pas qu'Aristote ou Varro, pour exemple, ne fussent à l'aduenture aussi sçauans que luy; ny possible encore qu'en son art mesme, Virgile ne luy soit comparable. Ie le laisse à iuger à ceux, qui les cognoissent tous deux. Moy qui n'en cognoy que l'vn, puis seulement dire cela, selon ma portée, que ie ne croy pas que les Muses mesmes allassent au delà du Romain. Tale facit carmen docta testudine, quale / Cynthius impositis temperat articulis. Toutesfois en ce iugement, encore ne faudroit il pas oublier, que c'est principalement d'Homere que Virgile tient sa suffisance, que c'est son guide, et maistre d'escole; et qu'vn seul traict de l'Iliade, a fourny de corps et de matiere, à cette grande et diuine Eneide.	One is Homer. Not that Aristotle or Varro, for example, were not perhaps as learned as he; nor even, possibly, that Virgil is not comparable to him in his own art. I leave that to be judged by those who know them both. I, who know only one of them, can say only this, as far as my capacity goes: I do not believe the Muses themselves went beyond the Roman. He makes such a song on his learned lyre / as the Cynthian god tunes with his fingers on the strings. Yet in this judgment we must still not forget that it is chiefly from Homer that Virgil gets his ability, that Homer is his guide and schoolmaster, and that a single stroke of the Iliad supplied the body and matter for that great and divine Aeneid.[1]
	Ce n'est pas ainsi que ie compte: i'y mesle plusieurs autres circonstances, qui me rendent ce personnage admirable, quasi au dessus de l'humaine condition. Et à la verité, ie m'estonne souuent, que luy qui a produit, et mis en credit au monde plusieurs deitez, par son auctorité, n'a gaigné reng de Dieu luy mesme. Estant aueugle, indigent; estant auant que les sciences fussent redigées en regle, et obseruations certaines, il les a tant cognues, que tous ceux qui se sont meslez depuis d'establir des polices, de conduire guerres, et d'escrire ou de la religion, ou de la philosophie, en quelque secte que ce soit, ou des arts, se sont seruis de luy, comme d'vn maistre tres-parfaict en la cognoissance de toutes choses.	That is not how I reckon: I add many other circumstances that make this man admirable to me, almost above the human condition. And indeed I am often astonished that he, who by his authority produced so many deities and brought them into credit in the world, did not himself win the rank of a god. Blind, poor, living before the sciences were set down in rules and sure observations, he knew them so well that all those who have since undertaken to establish governments, conduct wars, or write about religion or philosophy, of whatever school, or about the arts, have used him as a most perfect master in the knowledge of all things.

1 The verse is from Propertius II.34; the "Cynthian god" is Apollo.

FRENCH

Et de ses liures, comme d'vne pepiniere de toute espece de suffisance, Qui quid sit pulchrum, quid turpe, quid vtile, quid non,
Plenius ac melius Chrysippo ac Crantore dicit: Et comme dit l'autre, A quo, ceu fonte perenni, Vatum Pieriis labra rigantur aquis. Et l'autre, Adde Heliconiadum comites, quorum vnus Homerus Astra potitus. Et l'autre, Cuiúsque ex ore profuso
Omnis posteritas latices in carmina duxit,
Amnémque in tenues ausa est deducere riuos,
Vnius fœcunda bonis.

2.36.3 C'est contre l'ordre de Nature, qu'il a faict la plus excellente production qui puisse estre: car la naissance ordinaire des choses, elle est imparfaicte: elles s'augmentent, se fortifient par l'accroissance. L'enfance de la poësie, et de plusieurs autres sciences, il l'a rendue meure, parfaicte, et accomplie. A cette cause le peut on nommer le premier et dernier des poëtes, suyuant ce beau tesmoignage que l'antiquité nous a laissé de luy, que n'ayant eu nul qu'il peust imiter auant luy, il n'a eu nul apres luy qui le peust imiter. Ses parolles, selon Aristote, sont les seules parolles, qui ayent mouuement et action: ce sont les seuls mots substantiels.

Alexandre le grand ayant rencontré parmy les despouïlles de Darius, vn riche coffret, ordonna qu'on le luy reseruast pour y loger son Homere: disant, que c'estoit le meilleur et plus fidelle conseiller qu'il eust en ses affaires militaires. Pour cette mesme raison disoit Cleomenes fils d'Anaxandridas, que c'estoit le Poëte des Lacedemoniens, par ce qu'il estoit tres-bon maistre de la discipline guerriere. Cette loüange singuliere et particuliere luy est aussi demeurée au iugement de Plutarque, que c'est le seul autheur du monde, qui n'a iamais soulé ne dégousté les hommes, se montrant aux lecteurs tousiours tout autre, et fleurissant tousiours en nouuelle grace.

Ce folastre d'Alcibiades, ayant demandé à vn, qui faisoit profession des lettres, vn liure d'Homere, luy donna vn soufflet, par ce qu'il n'en auoit point: comme qui trouueroit vn de nos prestres sans breuiaire.

2.36.4 Xenophanes se pleignoit vn iour à Hieron, tyran de Syracuse, de ce qu'il estoit si pauure, qu'il n'auoit dequoy

ENGLISH

And they have drawn on his books as on a nursery of every kind of ability: He tells us what is fine, what is foul, what is useful and what is not, more fully and better than Chrysippus and Crantor. And as another says: From whom, as from an everlasting spring, the lips of poets are moistened with Pierian waters. And another: Add the companions of the Heliconian Muses, among whom Homer alone has won the stars. And another: From whose overflowing mouth all posterity has drawn its waters for its songs, and dared to divert the river into slender streams, rich in the wealth of one man.[2]

It is against the order of Nature that he produced the most excellent work there can be. For the ordinary birth of things is imperfect; they grow and grow stronger as they develop. The infancy of poetry, and of several other sciences, he made mature, perfect and complete. For this reason he may be called the first and last of poets, in keeping with the fine testimony antiquity has left us about him: that having had no one before him whom he could imitate, he has had no one after him who could imitate him. His words, according to Aristotle, are the only words that have movement and action; they are the only words of substance.

Alexander the Great, having found a rich casket among the spoils of Darius, ordered it to be kept for him to hold his Homer, saying that it was the best and most faithful counselor he had in his military affairs. For this same reason Cleomenes, son of Anaxandridas, said that he was the poet of the Spartans, because he was a very good master of the discipline of war. This singular and special praise has also remained his in Plutarch's judgment: that he is the only author in the world who has never sated or wearied people, always showing himself quite different to his readers, and always flowering with new grace.

That madcap Alcibiades, having asked a man who professed letters for a book of Homer, slapped him because he had none—as if one found one of our priests without a breviary.

Xenophanes complained one day to Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, that he was so poor he could not af-

2 Horace, Epistles I.2; Ovid, Amores III.9; Lucretius III.1037–1038; Manilius, Astronomica II.8–11.

FRENCH

nourrir deux seruiteurs: Et quoy, luy respondit-il, Homere qui estoit beaucoup plus pauure que toy, en nourrit bien plus de dix mille, tout mort qu'il est. Que n'estoit ce dire, à Panætius, quand il nommoit Platon l'Homere des philosophes? Outre cela, quelle gloire se peut comparer à la sienne? Il n'est rien qui viue en la bouche des hommes, comme son nom et ses ouurages: rien si cogneu, et si reçeu que Troye, Helene, et ses guerres, qui ne furent à l'aduenture iamais. Nos enfans s'appellent encore des noms qu'il forgea, il y a plus de trois mille ans. Qui ne cognoist Hector, et Achilles?

Non seulement aucunes races particulieres, mais la plus part des nations, cherchent origine en ses inuentions. Mahumet second de ce nom, Empereur des Turcs, escriuant à nostre Pape Pie second: Ie m'estonne, dit-il, comment les Italiens se bandent contre moy, attendu que nous auons nostre origine commune des Troyens: et que i'ay comme eux interest de venger le sang d'Hector sur les Grecs, lesquels ils vont fauorisant contre moy. N'est-ce pas vne noble farce, de laquelle les Roys, les choses publiques, et les Empereurs, vont ioüant leur personnage tant de siecles, et à laquelle tout ce grand vniuers sert de theatre?

Sept villes Grecques entrerent en debat du lieu de sa naissance, tant son obscurité mesmes luy apporta d'honneur: Smyrna, Rhodos, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenæ.

ENGLISH

ford to feed two servants. "What?" Hiero answered. "Homer, who was much poorer than you, feeds more than ten thousand, dead as he is." What else did Panaetius mean when he called Plato the Homer of philosophers? Besides, what glory can compare with Homer's? Nothing lives in men's mouths like his name and his works; nothing is so well known and so accepted as Troy, Helen and her wars, which perhaps never happened. Our children are still called by names he coined more than three thousand years ago. Who does not know Hector and Achilles?

Not only certain particular families but most nations seek their origin in his inventions. Mehmed, second of that name, Emperor of the Turks, writing to our Pope Pius II, said: "I am astonished that the Italians band together against me, given that we have our common origin in the Trojans, and that I, like them, have an interest in avenging the blood of Hector on the Greeks, whom they keep favoring against me." Is it not a noble farce, in which kings, commonwealths and emperors have been playing their parts for so many centuries, and for which this whole great universe serves as the theater?[3]

Seven Greek cities disputed the place of his birth, so much honor did even his obscurity bring him: Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athens.[4]

ALEXANDER

Alexander is the second, admired for his deeds and virtues and preferred even to Caesar.

FRENCH

2.36.5 L'autre, Alexandre le grand. Car qui considerera l'aage qu'il commença ses entreprises: le peu de moyen auec lequel il fit vn si glorieux dessein: l'authorité qu'il gaigna en cette sienne enfance, parmy les plus grands et experimentez capitaines du monde, desquels il estoit suyui: la faueur extraordinaire, dequoy Fortune embrassa, et fauorisa tant de siens exploits hazardeux, et à peu que ie ne die temeraires: Impellens quicquid sibi summa petenti / Obstaret, gaudénsque viam fecisse ruina: cette grandeur, d'auoir à l'aage de trente trois ans, passé victorieux toute la terre habitable, et en vne demie vie auoir atteint tout l'effort de l'humaine nature:

ENGLISH

The second is Alexander the Great. For consider the age at which he began his enterprises; the scant means with which he carried out so glorious a design; the authority he won, in this childhood of his, among the greatest and most experienced captains in the world, who followed him; the extraordinary favor with which Fortune embraced and favored so many of his hazardous—I almost said rash—exploits, Overthrowing whatever stood in the way of his reaching for the heights, / and rejoicing to have made his path through ruin; that greatness of having, at the age of thirty-three, passed victori-

3 Pius II was pope from 1458 to 1464.
4 A verse quoted by Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights III.11.

FRENCH

si que vous ne pouuez imaginer sa durée legitime, et la continuation de son accroissance, en vertu et en fortune, iusques à vn iuste terme d'aage, que vous n'imaginiez quelque chose au dessus de l'homme: d'auoir faict naistre de ses soldats tant de branches Royales: laissant apres sa mort le monde en partage à quatre successeurs, simples capitaines de son armée, desquels les descendans ont depuis si long temps duré, maintenans cette grande possession: tant d'excellentes vertus qui estoient en luy, iustice, tempérance, liberalité, foy en ses paroles, amour enuers les siens, humanité enuers les vaincus: car ses mœurs semblent à la verité n'auoir aucun iuste reproche: ouy bien aucunes de ses actions particulieres, rares, et extraordinaires.

Mais il est impossible de conduire si grands mouuemens, auec les regles de la iustice. Telles gens veulent estre iugez en gros, par la maistresse fin de leurs actions. La ruyne de Thebes, le meurtre de Menander, et du medecin d'Ephestion: de tant de prisonniers Persiens à vn coup, d'vne trouppe de soldats Indiens non sans interest de sa parolle, des Cosseïens iusques aux petits enfans: sont saillies vn peu mal excusables.

Car quant à Clytus, la faute en fut amendée outre son poix: et tesmoigne cette action autant que toute autre, la debonnaireté de sa complexion, et que c'estoit de soy vne complexion excellemment formée à la bonté, et a esté ingenieusement dict de luy, qu'il auoit de la Nature ses vertus, de la Fortune ses vices. Quant à ce qu'il estoit vn peu vanteur, vn peu trop impatient d'ouyr mesdire de soy, et quant à ses mangeoires, armes, et mors, qu'il fit semer aux Indes: toutes ces choses me semblent pouuoir estre condonées à son aage, et à l'estrange prosperité de sa fortune.

Qui considerera quand et quand, tant de vertus militaires, diligence, pouruoyance, patience, discipline, subtilité, magnanimité, resolution, bonheur, en quoy, quand l'authorité d'Hannibal ne nous l'auroit appris, il a esté le premier des hommes: les rares beautez et conditions de sa personne, iusques au miracle: ce port, et ce venerable maintien, soubs vn visage si ieune, vermeil, et ous through the whole habitable earth, and of having reached in half a life the utmost power of human nature,[5]

ENGLISH

so that you cannot imagine his natural span, and the continuation of his growth in virtue and fortune up to a proper term of age, without imagining something above man; having caused so many royal branches to spring from his soldiers, leaving the world after his death divided among four successors, mere captains of his army, whose descendants lasted so long afterward, holding on to that great possession; so many excellent virtues that were in him—justice, temperance, generosity, faithfulness to his word, love for his own people, humanity toward the vanquished. For his character truly seems to deserve no just reproach—though some of his particular actions, rare and extraordinary ones, do.

But it is impossible to conduct such great movements within the rules of justice. Such men must be judged as a whole, by the chief end of their actions. The destruction of Thebes; the murder of Menander and of Hephaestion's physician; of so many Persian prisoners at once; of a troop of Indian soldiers, not without damage to his word; of the Cossaeans, down to the little children—these are outbursts that are rather hard to excuse.

As for Clitus, the fault was atoned for beyond its weight; and this action testifies, as much as any other, to the gentleness of his temperament, and shows that his was in itself a nature excellently formed for goodness. It has been cleverly said of him that he had his virtues from Nature and his vices from Fortune. As for his being somewhat boastful, somewhat too impatient of hearing himself spoken ill of, and as for the mangers, weapons and bits he had scattered about in India—all these things seem to me pardonable in view of his age and the strange prosperity of his fortune.[6]

Consider at the same time so many military virtues—diligence, foresight, endurance, discipline, subtlety, magnanimity, resolution, good fortune—in which, even if Hannibal's authority had not taught us so, he was the first of men; the rare beauty and qualities of his person, amounting to a miracle; that bearing and that venerable demean-

5 Lucan, Pharsalia I.149–150, said there of Caesar.
6 Alexander left oversized arms and horse gear in India to impress posterity.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
flamboyant: Qualis, vbi Oceani perfusus Lucifer vnda, Quem Venus ante alios astrorum diligit ignes, Extulit os sacrum cœlo, tenebrásque resoluit: l'excellence de son sçauoir et capacité:	or beneath so young, ruddy and radiant a face: As when the Morning Star, bathed in the Ocean's wave, whom Venus loves above all the other fires of the stars, lifts his sacred face to the sky and dispels the darkness; the excellence of his learning and capacity;[7]
la durée et grandeur de sa gloire, pure, nette, exempte de tache et d'enuie: et qu'encore long temps apres sa mort, ce fust vne religieuse croyance, d'estimer que ses medailles portassent bon-heur à ceux qui les auoyent sur eux: et que plus de Roys, et Princes ont escrit ses gestes, qu'autres historiens n'ont escrit les gestes d'autre Roy ou Prince que ce soit: et qu'encores à present, les Mahumetans, qui mesprisent toutes autres histoires, reçoiuent et honnorent la sienne seule par special priuilege: il confessera, tout cela mis ensemble, que i'ay eu raison de le preferer à Cæsar mesme, qui seul m'a peu mettre en doubte du choix.	the duration and greatness of his glory, pure, clean, free of stain and envy; and that long after his death it was a religious belief that his medals brought luck to those who carried them; and that more kings and princes have written of his deeds than other historians have written of the deeds of any other king or prince whatever; and that even now the Muslims, who despise all other histories, accept and honor his alone by special privilege. Whoever considers all this taken together will admit that I was right to prefer him even to Caesar, who alone could make me hesitate in my choice.
Et il ne se peut nier, qu'il n'y aye plus du sien en ses exploits, plus de la Fortune en ceux d'Alexandre. Ils ont eu plusieurs choses esgales, et Cæsar à l'aduenture aucunes plus grandes. Ce furent deux feux, ou deux torrens, à rauager le monde par diuers endroits.	And it cannot be denied that there is more of Caesar's own in his exploits, and more of Fortune in Alexander's. They had many things equal, and Caesar perhaps some greater. They were two fires, or two torrents, ravaging the world in different places.
Et velut immissi diuersis partibus ignes Arentem in siluam, et virgulta sonantia lauro: Aut vbi decursu rapido de montibus altis Dant sonitum spumosi amnes, et in æquora currunt, Quisque suum populatus iter. Mais quand l'ambition de Cæsar auroit de soy plus de moderation, elle a tant de mal'heur, ayant rencontré ce vilain subiect de la ruyne de son pays, et de l'empirement vniuersel du monde, que toutes pieces ramassées et mises en la balance, ie ne puis que ie ne panche du costé d'Alexandre.	And as fires let loose from different sides into a dry forest and thickets crackling with laurel; or as when foaming rivers, rushing headlong down from the high mountains, roar and run to the sea, each having laid waste its own path. But even if Caesar's ambition had more moderation in itself, it has such ill fortune, having met with that vile object, the ruin of his country and the universal worsening of the world, that with all the pieces gathered up and put in the scales, I cannot help leaning to Alexander's side.[8]

EPAMINONDAS

Epaminondas, the third and greatest, joined valor and ability to a conscience without stain.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.36.6 Le tiers, et le plus excellent, à mon gré, c'est Epaminondas. De gloire, il n'en a pas à beaucoup pres tant que d'autres (aussi n'est-ce pas vne piece de la substance de la chose,) de resolution et de vaillance, non pas de celle qui est esguisée par ambition, mais de celle	The third, and in my opinion the most excellent, is Epaminondas. Of glory he has nowhere near as much as others (nor is it any part of the substance of the thing). Of resolution and valor he had all that can be imagined: not the kind that ambition

7 Virgil, Aeneid VIII.589–591.
8 Virgil, Aeneid XII.521–525.

FRENCH

que la sapience et la raison peuuent planter en vne ame bien reglée, il en auoit tout ce qui s'en peut imaginer.

De preuue de cette sienne vertu, il en a faict autant, à mon aduis, qu'Alexandre mesme, et que Cæsar: car encore que ses exploits de guerre, ne soyent ny si frequens, ny si enflez, ils ne laissent pas pourtant, à les bien considerer et toutes leurs circonstances, d'estre aussi poisants et roides, et portant autant de tesmoignage de hardiesse et de suffisance militaire. Les Grecs luy ont faict cet honneur, sans contredit, de le nommer le premier homme d'entre eux: mais estre le premier de la Grece, c'est facilement estre le prime du monde. Quant à son sçauoir et suffisance, ce iugement ancien nous en est resté, que iamais homme ne sceut tant, et parla si peu que luy. Car il estoit Pythagorique de secte.

Et ce qu'il parla, nul ne parla iamais mieux: excellent orateur et tres persuasif. Mais quant à ses mœurs et conscience, il a de bien loing surpassé tous ceux, qui se sont iamais meslez de manier affaires: car en cette partie, qui doit estre principalement considerée, qui seule marque veritablement, quels nous sommes: et laquelle ie contrepoise seule à toutes les autres ensemble, il ne cede à aucun philosophe, non pas à Socrates mesmes. En cestuy-cy l'innocence est vne qualité, propre, maistresse, constante, vniforme, incorruptible. Au parangon de laquelle, elle paroist en Alexandre subalterne, incertaine, bigarrée, molle, et fortuite.

2.36.7 L'ancienneté iugea, qu'à esplucher par le menu touts les autres grands capitaines, il se trouue en chascun quelque speciale qualité, qui le rend illustre. En cestuy-cy seul, c'est vne vertu et suffisance pleine par tout, et pareille: qui en touts les offices de la vie humaine ne laisse rien à desirer de soy: soit en occupation publique ou priuée, ou paisible, ou guerriere: soit à viure soit à mourir grandement et glorieusement. Ie ne cognoy nulle ny forme ny fortune d'homme, que ie regarde auec tant d'honneur et d'amour.

2.36.8 Il est bien vray, que son obstination à la pauureté, ie la trouue aucunement scrupuleuse: comme elle est peinte par ses meilleurs amis. Et cette seule action, haute pourtant et tres digne d'admiration, ie la sens vn peu aigrette, pour par souhait mesme en la forme qu'elle estoit en luy, m'en desirer l'imitation.

2.36.9 Le seul Scipion Æmylian, qui luy donneroit vne fin aussi fiere et magnifique, et la cognoissance des sciences autant profonde et vniuerselle, se pourroit mettre à l'encontre à l'autre plat de la balance. O quel desplaisir le sharpens, but the kind that wisdom and reason can plant in a well-ordered soul.

ENGLISH

Of proof of this virtue of his, he gave as much, in my view, as Alexander himself, and as Caesar. His feats of war are neither so frequent nor so swollen. Yet if you consider them well, with all their circumstances, they are just as weighty and hard-fought, and bear as much witness to boldness and military skill. The Greeks paid him the honor, without dispute, of calling him the first man among them; but to be the first of Greece is easily to be the foremost in the world. As for his learning and ability, this ancient judgment has come down to us: that no man ever knew so much and spoke so little. For he was of the Pythagorean sect.

And when he did speak, no one ever spoke better: he was an excellent orator and highly persuasive. But in his character and conscience he far surpassed all who have ever had a hand in managing affairs. In this respect, which ought to be considered above all, which alone truly marks what we are, and which alone I weigh against all the others put together, he yields to no philosopher, not even to Socrates. In him innocence is a quality that is his own, ruling, constant, uniform, incorruptible. Set beside his, Alexander's looks subordinate, uncertain, motley, soft, and accidental.

Antiquity judged that if you examine all the other great captains in detail, you find in each some special quality that makes him illustrious. In this one alone there is a virtue and ability that is full and even throughout. In all the offices of human life it leaves nothing to be desired: in public or private occupation, in peace or in war, in living or in dying grandly and gloriously. I know of no form or fortune of man that I regard with so much honor and love.

It is true that I find his obstinacy in poverty somewhat overscrupulous, as his best friends portray it. And this one action, lofty though it is and most worthy of admiration, I find a little too sharp for me to wish, even in wishing, to imitate it in the form it took in him.

Only Scipio Aemilianus, if we granted him an end as proud and magnificent and a knowledge of the sciences as deep and universal, could be set against him in the other pan of the scale. Oh, what temps m'a faict, d'oster de nos yeux à poinct nommé, des premieres, la couple de vies iustement la plus noble, qui fust en Plutarque, de ces deux personnages: par le commun consentement du monde, l'vn le premier des Grecs, l'autre des Romains! Quelle matiere, quelle œuurier!

FRENCH

2.36.10 Pour vn homme non saint, mais que nous disons, galant homme, de mœurs ciuiles et communes: d'vne hauteur moderée: la plus riche vie, que ie sçache, à estre vescue entre les viuants, comme on dit: et estoffée de plus de riches parties et desirables, c'est, tout consideré, celle d'Alcibiades à mon gré.

2.36.11 Mais quant à Epaminondas, pour exemple d'vne excessiue bonté, ie veux adiouster icy aucunes de ses opinions. Le plus doux contentement qu'il eut en toute sa vie, il tesmoigna que c'estoit le plaisir qu'il auoit donné à son pere, et à sa mere, de sa victoire de Leuctres: il couche de beaucoup, preferant leur plaisir, au sien si iuste et si plein d'vne tant glorieuse action. Il ne pensoit pas qu'il fust loisible pour recouurer mesmes la liberté de son pays, de tuer vn homme sans cognoissance de cause. Voyla pourquoy il fut si froid à l'entreprise de Pelopidas son compaignon, pour la deliurance de Thebes.

Il tenoit aussi, qu'en vne bataille il falloit fuyr la rencontre d'vn amy, qui fust au party contraire, et l'espargner. Et son humanité à l'endroit des ennemis mesmes, l'ayant mis en soupçon enuers les Bœotiens, de ce qu'apres auoir miraculeusement forcé les Lacedemoniens de luy ouurir le pas, qu'ils auoyent entreprins de garder à l'entrée de la Morée pres de Corinthe, il s'estoit contenté de leur auoir passé sur le ventre, sans les poursuyure à toute outrance: il fut deposé de l'estat de Capitaine general.

Tres honorablement pour vne telle cause: et pour la honte que ce leur fut d'auoir par necessité à le remonter tantost apres en son degré, et recognoistre, combien dependoit de luy leur gloire et leur salut: la victoire le suyuant comme son ombre par tout où il guidast, la prosperité de son pays mourut aussi luy mort, comme elle estoit née par luy.

ENGLISH

a vexation time has caused me by taking from our sight, as if on purpose and among the very first, precisely the pair of lives that was rightly the noblest in Plutarch: those of these two men, by the common consent of the world the one the first of the Greeks, the other of the Romans! What material, and what a craftsman![9]

For a man who is no saint, but what we call a fine gentleman, of civil and ordinary ways and moderate elevation, the richest life I know of to be lived among the living, as they say, and the one furnished with the most rich and desirable qualities, is, all things considered, that of Alcibiades, in my opinion.[10]

But as for Epaminondas, as an example of an excessive goodness, I want to add here some of his opinions. The sweetest satisfaction he had in all his life, he declared, was the pleasure he had given his father and mother by his victory at Leuctra. That is going very far, to prefer their pleasure to his own, so just and so full of so glorious an action. He did not think it permissible, even to recover his country's liberty, to kill a man without knowing the case against him. That is why he was so cool toward the enterprise of his companion Pelopidas for the deliverance of Thebes.[11]

He also held that in battle one should avoid meeting a friend who was on the opposing side, and spare him. And his humanity even toward his enemies made the Boeotians suspicious of him. After miraculously forcing the Spartans to open to him the pass they had undertaken to guard at the entrance to the Morea, near Corinth, he had been content to ride over them without pursuing them to the bitter end. For this he was deposed from his office of commander-in-chief.[12]

Very honorably for him, given such a cause; and to their shame, since necessity soon forced them to restore him to his rank and to acknowledge how much their glory and their safety depended on him. Victory followed him like his shadow wherever he led; and the prosperity of his country

9 Scipio Aemilianus (185–129 BC) destroyed Carthage in 146 BC. Plutarch's paired Lives of Epaminondas and Scipio are lost.
10 Alcibiades (c. 450–404 BC), brilliant and unstable Athenian statesman and general, a companion of Socrates.
11 At Leuctra (371 BC) Epaminondas defeated the Spartans. In 379 BC Pelopidas led the conspiracy that freed Thebes from its Spartan garrison.
12 The Morea is the medieval and later name for the Peloponnese.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
	died when he died, as it had been born through him.

II.37 Of the Resemblance of Children to Their Fathers

De la ressemblance des enfans aux peres
Suffering from kidney stones like his father, Montaigne marvels at inherited traits and mounts a long, mocking attack on medicine and doctors.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.37.1	CE fagotage de tant de diuerses pieces, se faict en cette condition, que ie n'y mets la main, que lors qu'vne trop lasche oysiueté me presse, et non ailleurs que chez moy. Ainsin il s'est basty à diuerses poses et interualles, comme les occasions me detiennent ailleurs par fois plusieurs moys. Au demeurant, ie ne corrige point mes premieres imaginations par les secondes, ouy à l'auenture quelque mot: mais pour diuersifier, non pour oster. Ie veux representer le progrez de mes humeurs, et qu'on voye chasque piece en sa naissance. Ie prendrois plaisir d'auoir commencé plustost, et à recognoistre le train de mes mutations.	This bundle of so many different pieces is made on this condition: I set my hand to it only when too slack an idleness presses me, and nowhere but at home. So it has been built up in various stages and intervals, as occasions sometimes keep me elsewhere for several months. For the rest, I do not correct my first notions by my second ones—well, perhaps a word here and there, but to vary, not to remove. I want to show the progress of my moods, and to let each piece be seen as it was born. I would have liked to have begun sooner, so as to recognize the course of my changes.
	Vn valet qui me seruoit à les escrire soubs moy, pensa faire vn grand butin de m'en desrober plusieurs pieces choisies à sa poste. Cela me console, qu'il n'y fera pas plus de gain, que i'y ay fait de perte.	A servant who used to write them down at my dictation thought he had made a fine haul by stealing several pieces from me, picked as he pleased. It consoles me that he will gain no more from it than I have lost.

THE STONE ARRIVES

Montaigne describes his kidney stone and how he is learning to live with the pain.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.37.2	Ie me suis enuieilly de sept ou huict ans depuis que ie commençay. Ce n'a pas esté sans quelque nouuel acquest. I'y ay pratiqué la colique, par la liberalité des ans: leur commerce et longue conuersation, ne se passe aysément sans quelque tel fruit. Ie voudroy bien, de plusieurs autres presens, qu'ils ont à faire, à ceux qui les hantent long temps, qu'ils en eussent choisi quelqu'vn qui m'eust esté plus acceptable: car ils ne m'en eussent sçeu faire, que i'eusse en plus grande horreur, des mon enfance. C'estoit à poinct nommé, de tous les accidens de la vieillesse, celuy que ie craignois le plus.	I have grown older by seven or eight years since I began. It has not been without some new acquisition. Through the liberality of the years I have made the acquaintance of the colic: their company and long familiarity seldom pass without some such fruit. Of the many other presents they have to give to those who keep company with them long, I could wish they had chosen one more acceptable to me; for they could not have given me any that I had held in greater horror since my childhood. Of all the accidents of old age, it was precisely the one I feared most.[1]
2.37.3	I'auoy pensé mainte-fois à part moy, que i'alloy trop auant: et qu'à faire vn si long chemin, ie ne faudroy pas	I had often thought to myself that I was going too far, and that on so long a road I would not fail to

1 By "the colic" Montaigne means the kidney stone and its attacks, from which he suffered from about 1578.

FRENCH

de m'engager en fin, en quelque malplaisant rencontre. Ie sentois et protestois assez, qu'il estoit heure de partir, et qu'il falloit trencher la vie dans le vif, et dans le sein, suyuant la regle des chirurgiens, quand ils ont à coupper quelque membre. Qu'à celuy, qui ne la rendoit à temps, Nature auoit accoustumé de faire payer de bien rudes vsures. Il s'en faloit tant, que i'en fusse prest lors, qu'en dix-huict mois ou enuiron qu'il y a que ie suis en ce malplaisant estat, i'ay desia appris à m'y accommoder.

I'entre desia en composition de ce viure coliqueux: i'y trouue dequoy me consoler, et dequoy esperer. Tant les hommes sont accoquinez à leur estre miserable, qu'il n'est si rude condition qu'ils n'acceptent pour s'y conseruer. Oyez Mæcenas. Debilem facito manu,
Debilem pede, coxa,
Lubricos quate dentes:
Vita dum superest, bene est. Et couuroit Tamburlan d'vne sotte humanité, la cruauté fantastique qu'il exerçoit contre les ladres, en faisant mettre à mort autant qu'il en venoit à sa coignoissance, pour, disoit-il, les deliurer de la vie qu'ils viuoient si penible. Car il n'y auoit nul d'eux, qui n'eust mieux aymé estre trois fois ladre, que de n'estre pas. Et Antisthenes le Stoïcien, estant fort malade, et s'escriant: Qui me deliurera de ces maux?

Diogenes, qui l'estoit venu veoir, luy presentant vn couteau: Cestuy-cy, si tu veux, bien tost: Ie ne dy pas de la vie, repliqua il, ie dy des maux. Les souffrances qui me touchent simplement par l'ame, m'affligent beaucoup moins qu'elles ne font la pluspart des autres hommes: partie par iugement: car le monde estime plusieurs choses horribles, ou euitables au prix de la vie, qui me sont à peu pres indifferentes: partie, par vne complexion stupide et insensible, que i'ay aux accidents qui ne donnent à moy de droit fil: laquelle complexion i'estime l'vne des meilleures pieces de ma naturelle condition. Mais les souffrances vrayment essentielles et corporelles, ie les gouste bien vifuement.

Si est-ce pourtant, que les preuoyant autrefois d'vne veuë foible, delicate, et amollie par la iouyssance de cette longue et heureuse santé et repos, que Dieu m'a presté, la meilleure part de mon aage: ie les auoy couceuës par run at last into some unpleasant encounter. I felt and declared often enough that it was time to leave, and that life should be cut off in the living and sound flesh, following the rule surgeons observe when they have to amputate a limb; and that from the man who did not give it back in time, Nature was accustomed to exact very harsh interest. So far was I from being ready then, that in the eighteen months or so that I have been in this unpleasant state, I have already learned to adapt myself to it.

ENGLISH

I am already coming to terms with this colicky life; I find in it something to console me and something to hope for. So firmly are men attached to their miserable existence that there is no condition so harsh that they will not accept it in order to stay alive. Listen to Maecenas: Make me maimed in the hand,
Lame in the foot and hip,
Shake my loosened teeth:
So long as life remains, all is well. And Tamburlaine cloaked in a foolish humanity the fantastic cruelty he practiced on lepers, having as many put to death as came to his knowledge, in order, he said, to deliver them from the painful life they were living. For there was not one of them who would not rather have been a leper three times over than not be at all. And Antisthenes the Stoic, being very ill, cried out: "Who will deliver me from these ills?"[2]

Diogenes, who had come to see him, held out a knife: "This will do it, if you like, and soon." "I don't mean from life," he replied, "I mean from my ills." Sufferings that touch me only through the soul afflict me much less than they do most other men. Partly this comes from judgment: the world thinks many things horrible, or to be avoided at the cost of life, that are almost indifferent to me. Partly it comes from a dull and insensible constitution I have toward accidents that do not strike me head-on—a constitution I consider one of the best parts of my natural condition. But sufferings that are truly essential and bodily I feel very keenly.

And yet, foreseeing them in the past with a weak and delicate sight, softened by the enjoyment of the long and happy health and repose that God lent me for the better part of my life, I had ima-

2 Maecenas, Augustus's minister and patron of Virgil and Horace; his lines are quoted by Seneca, Letters 101.

FRENCH

imagination, si insupportables, qu'à la verité i'en auois plus de peur, que ie n'y ay trouué de mal. Par où i'augmente tousiours cette creance, que la pluspart des facultez de nostre ame, comme nous les employons, troublent plus le repos de la vie, qu'elles n'y seruent.

2.37.4 Ie suis aux prises auec la pire de toutes les maladies, la plus soudaine, la plus douloureuse, la plus mortelle, et la plus irremediable. I'en ay desia essayé cinq ou six bien longs accez et penibles: toutesfois ou ie me flatte, ou encores y a-t-il en cet estat, dequoy se soustenir, à qui a l'ame deschargée de la crainte de la mort, et deschargée des menasses, conclusions et consequences, dequoy la medecine nous enteste. Mais l'effect mesme de la douleur, n'a pas cette aigreur si aspre et si poignante, qu'vn homme rassis en doiue entrer en rage et en desespoir.

I'ay aumoins ce profit de la cholique, que ce que ie n'auoy encore peu sur moy, pour me concilier du tout, et m'accointer à la mort, elle le parfera: car d'autant plus elle me pressera, et importunera, d'autant moins me sera la mort à craindre. I'auoy desia gaigné cela, de ne tenir à la vie, que par la vie seulement: elle desnouëra encore cette intelligence. Et Dieu vueille qu'en fin, si son aspreté vient à surmonter mes forces, elle ne me reiette à l'autre extremité non moins vitieuse, d'aymer et desirer mourir. Summum nec metuas diem, nec optes. Ce sont deux passions à craindre, mais l'vne a son remede bien plus prest que l'autre.

2.37.5 Au demeurant, i'ay tousiours trouué ce precepte ceremonieux, qui ordonne si exactement de tenir bonne contenance et vn maintien desdaigneux, et posé, à la souffrance des maux. Pourquoy la philosophie, qui ne regarde que le vif, et les effects, se va elle amusant à ces apparences externes? Qu'elle laisse ce soing aux farceurs et maistres de rhetorique, qui font tant d'estat de nos gestes. Qu'elle condone hardiment au mal, cette lascheté voyelle, si elle n'est ny cordiale, ny stomacale: et preste ses pleintes volontaires au genre des souspirs, sanglots, palpitations, pallissements, que Nature a mis hors de nostre puissance. Pourueu que le courage soit sans effroy, les parolles sans desespoir, qu'elle se contente.

ENGLISH

gined them so unbearable that in truth I was more afraid of them than I have found them painful. This keeps strengthening my belief that most of the faculties of our soul, as we use them, disturb the repose of life more than they serve it.

I am grappling with the worst of all diseases: the most sudden, the most painful, the most deadly, and the most incurable. I have already gone through five or six very long and painful bouts of it. Yet either I flatter myself, or there is still something in this state to hold a man up, if his soul is freed from the fear of death, and freed from the threats, conclusions and consequences that medicine stuffs into our heads. And even the actual effect of the pain does not have so harsh and piercing a sting that a settled man should be driven by it to rage and despair.

I gain at least this profit from the colic: what I had not yet managed to do with myself, to reconcile myself wholly to death and become familiar with it, the colic will complete. For the more it presses and harasses me, the less I shall have to fear death. I had already gained this much: to hold on to life only by life itself. The colic will untie even this bond. And God grant that in the end, if its harshness comes to overpower my strength, it does not throw me to the other extreme, no less vicious: loving and desiring to die. Neither fear your last day nor long for it. These are two passions to be feared, but one has its remedy much closer to hand than the other.[3]

For the rest, I have always found that precept merely ceremonious which so strictly orders us to keep a good face and a disdainful, composed bearing when we suffer pain. Why does philosophy, which looks only at the living substance and at effects, waste its time on these external appearances? Let it leave that care to actors and teachers of rhetoric, who set such store by our gestures. Let it boldly grant to pain this cowardice of the voice, if it is neither of the heart nor of the stomach; and let it count our voluntary complaints among the sighs, sobs, palpitations and pallors that Nature has put beyond our control. Provided the heart is without fright and the words without despair, let it be content.

3 Martial, Epigrams.

FRENCH

Qu'importe que nous tordions nos bras, pourueu que nous ne tordions nos pensées? elle nous dresse pour nous, non pour autruy, pour estre, non pour sembler. Qu'elle s'arreste à gouuerner nostre entendement, qu'elle a pris à instruire. Qu'aux efforts de la cholique, elle maintienne l'ame capable de se recognoistre, de suyure son train accoustumé: combatant la douleur et la soustenant, non se prosternant honteusement à ses pieds: esmeuë et eschauffée du combat, non abatue et renuersée: capable d'entretien et d'autre occupation, iusques à certaine mesure. En accidents si extremes, c'est cruauté de requerir de nous vne démarche si composée. Si nous auons beau ieu, c'est peu que nous ayons mauuaise mine.

Si le corps se soulage en se plaignant, qu'il le face; si l'agitation luy plaist, qu'il se tourneboule et tracasse à sa fantasie: s'il luy semble que le mal s'euapore aucunement (comme aucuns medecins disent que cela aide à la deliurance des femmes enceintes) pour pousser hors la voix auec plus grande violence: ou s'il en amuse son tourment, qu'il crie tout à faict. Ne commandons point à cette voix, qu'elle aille, mais permettons le luy. Epicurus ne pardonne pas seulement à son sage de crier aux tourments, mais il le luy conseille. Pugiles etiam quum feriunt, in iactandis cæstibus ingemiscunt, quia profundenda voce omne corpus intenditur, venitque plaga vehementior. Nous auons assez de travail du mal, sans nous trauailler à ces regles superflues.

2.37.6 Ce que ie dis pour excuser ceux, qu'on voit ordinairement se tempester, aux secousses et assaux de cette maladie: car pour moy, ie l'ay passée iusques à cette heure auec vn peu meilleure contenance et me contente de gemir sans brailler. Non pourtant que ie me mette en peine, pour maintenir cette decence exterieure: car ie fay peu de compte d'vn tel aduantage. Ie preste en cela au mal autant qu'il veut: mais ou mes douleurs ne sont pas si excessiues, ou i'y apporte plus de fermeté que le commun.

Ie me plains, Ie me despite, quand les aigres pointures me pressent, mais ie n'en viens point au desespoir, comme celuy là: Eiulatu, questu, gemitu, fremitibus / Resonando multum flebiles voces refert. Ie me taste au plus espais du mal: et ay tousiours trouué que i'estoy capable de dire, de penser, de respondre aussi sainement qu'en vne autre

ENGLISH

What does it matter if we twist our arms, provided we do not twist our thoughts? Philosophy trains us for ourselves, not for others; to be, not to seem. Let it confine itself to governing our understanding, which it has undertaken to instruct. In the onslaughts of the colic, let it keep the soul able to know itself and to follow its accustomed course: fighting the pain and bearing up under it, not prostrating itself shamefully at its feet; stirred and heated by the combat, not beaten down and overthrown; capable of conversation and other occupation, up to a certain point. In accidents so extreme, it is cruelty to require of us so composed a bearing. If we hold a good hand, it matters little that we pull a long face.

If the body finds relief in complaining, let it complain. If agitation pleases it, let it toss and thrash about as it likes. If it seems that the pain somehow evaporates when the voice is forced out more violently (as some physicians say this helps pregnant women in delivery), or if the body distracts its torment that way, let it shout outright. Let us not order this voice to come out, but let us allow it. Epicurus not only forgives his wise man for crying out under torture; he advises him to. Boxers too, when they strike, groan as they swing their gauntlets, because in letting out the voice the whole body is braced and the blow lands harder. We have labor enough from the pain without laboring over these superfluous rules.[4]

I say this to excuse those we commonly see raging under the shocks and assaults of this disease. For my part, I have so far gone through it with a somewhat better countenance, and I content myself with groaning without bawling. Not that I take any pains to maintain this outward decency, for I set little store by such an advantage. In this I give the pain as much as it wants; but either my pains are not so extreme, or I bring more firmness to them than most people.

I complain, I fret, when the sharp stabs press me, but I do not come to despair, like that man: With wailing, lament, groaning and roaring, / Making all resound, he utters doleful cries. I sound myself out in the thick of the pain, and I have always found that I could speak, think and answer as sanely as at any

4 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.

FRENCH

heure, mais non si constamment: la douleur me troublant et destournant. Quand on me tient le plus atterré, et que les assistans m'espargnent, i'essaye souuent mes forces et leur entame moy-mesme des propos les plus esloignez de mon estat. Ie puis tout par vn soudain effort: mais ostez en la durée.

O que n'ay ie la faculté de ce songeur de Cicero, qui, songeant embrasser vne garse, trouua qu'il s'estoit deschargé de sa pierre emmy ses draps! Les miennes me desgarsent estrangement. Aux interualles de cette douleur excessiue lors que mes vreteres languissent sans me ronger, ie me remets soudain en ma forme ordinaire: d'autant que mon ame ne prend autre alarme, que la sensible et corporelle.

Ce que ie doy certainement au soing que i'ay eu à me preparer par discours à tels accidens: Laborum
Nulla mihi noua nunc facies inopináque surgit;
Omnia præcepi, atque animo mecum antè peregi. Ie suis essayé pourtant vn peu bien rudement pour vn apprenti, et d'vn changement bien soudain et bien rude: estant cheu tout à coup, d'vne tres-douce condition de vie, et tres-heureuse, à la plus douloureuse, et penible, qui se puisse imaginer. Car outre ce que c'est vne maladie bien fort à craindre d'elle mesme, elle fait en moy ses commencemens beaucoup plus aspres et difficiles qu'elle n'a accoustumé.

Les accés me reprennent si souuent, que ie ne sens quasi plus d'entiere santé: ie maintien toutesfois, iusques à cette heure, mon esprit en telle assiette, que pourueu que i'y puisse apporter de la constance, ie me treuue en assez meilleure condition de vie, que mille autres, qui n'ont ny fiéure, ny mal, que celuy qu'ils se donnent eux mesmes, par la faute de leurs discours.

ENGLISH

other time, but not as steadily, for the pain disturbs and distracts me. When I am thought to be most crushed and those around me spare me, I often test my strength and myself start them on subjects as remote as can be from my condition. I can do anything by a sudden effort; but don't ask it to last.[5]

Oh, why don't I have the gift of that dreamer in Cicero who, dreaming he was embracing a girl, found he had passed his stone among his sheets! Mine cure me of girls wonderfully. In the intervals of this excessive pain, when my ureters slacken without gnawing at me, I at once return to my ordinary form, since my soul takes no alarm but the physical, bodily one.[6]

This I certainly owe to the care I have taken to prepare myself by reasoning for such accidents: No new or unexpected face of hardship
Rises before me now; I have foreseen everything
And gone through it all in my mind beforehand. All the same, I am being tried rather roughly for an apprentice, and by a very sudden and harsh change, having fallen all at once from a very sweet and happy condition of life into the most painful and wretched one imaginable. For besides being a disease much to be feared in itself, in me it makes its beginnings far harsher and more difficult than usual.[7]

The attacks return so often that I hardly ever feel completely healthy any more. Yet so far I keep my mind in such a state that, provided I can bring constancy to it, I find myself in a much better condition of life than a thousand others who have no fever or ill but what they give themselves through the fault of their own reasoning.

THE MYSTERY OF HEREDITY

How a drop of seed carries a father's traits, including the stone, across many years.

FRENCH

2.37.7 Il est certaine façon d'humilité subtile, qui naist de la presomption: comme ceste-cy: Que nous recognoissons nostre ignorance, en plusieurs choses, et sommes si courtois d'auoüer, qu'il y ait és ouurages de Nature, aucunes qualitez et conditions, qui nous sont

ENGLISH

There is a certain kind of subtle humility that springs from presumption, such as this: we acknowledge our ignorance in many things, and are courteous enough to admit that in the works of Nature there are some qualities and conditions

5 Lines from Accius's tragedy Philoctetes, quoted by Cicero.
6 The anecdote is in Cicero, On Divination.
7 Virgil, Aeneid (Aeneas to the Sibyl).

FRENCH

imperceptibles, et desquelles nostre suffisance ne peut descouurir les moyens et les causes. Par cette honneste et conscientieuse declaration, nous esperons gaigner qu'on nous croira aussi de celles, que nous dirons, entendre. Nous n'auons que faire d'aller trier des miracles et des difficultez estrangeres: il me semble que parmy les choses que nous voyons ordinairement, il y a des estrangetez si incomprehensibles, qu'elles surpassent toute la difficulté des miracles.

Quel monstre est-ce, que cette goutte de semence, dequoy nous sommes produits, porte en soy les impressions, non de la forme corporelle seulement, mais des pensemens et des inclinations de nos peres? Cette goutte d'eau, où loge elle ce nombre infiny de formes? et comme portent elles ces ressemblances, d'vn progrez si temeraire et si desreglé, que l'arriere fils respondra à son bisayeul, le nepueu à l'oncle? En la famille de Lepidus à Rome, il y en a eu trois, non de suite, mais par interualles, qui nasquirent vn mesme œuil couuert de cartilage. A Thebes il y auoit vne race qui portoit dés le ventre de la mere, la forme d'vn fer de lance, et qui ne le portoit, estoit tenu illegitime.

Aristote dit qu'en certaine nation, où les femmes estoient communes, on assignoit les enfans à leurs peres, par la ressemblance.

2.37.8 Il est à croire que ie dois à mon pere cette qualité pierreuse: car il mourut merueilleusement affligé d'vne grosse pierre, qu'il auoit en la vessie. Il ne s'apperceut de son mal, que le soixante septiesme an de son aage: et auant cela il n'en auoit eu aucune menasse ou ressentiment, aux reins, aux costez, ny ailleurs: et auoit vescu iusques lors, en vne heureuse santé, et bien peu subiette à maladies, et dura encores sept ans en ce mal, trainant vne fin de vie bien douloureuse. I'estoy nay vingt cinq ans et plus, auant sa maladie, et durant le cours de son meilleur estat, le troisiesme de ses enfans en rang de naissance. Où se couuoit tant de temps, la propension à ce defaut?

Et lors qu'il estoit si loing du mal, cette legere piece de sa substance, dequoy il me bastit, comment en portoit elle pour sa part, vne si grande impression? Et comment encore si couuerte, que quarante cinq ans apres, i'aye commencé à m'en ressentir? seul iusques à cette heure, entre tant de freres, et de sœurs, et tous d'vne mere. Qui m'esclaircira de ce progrez, ie le croiray d'autant d'autres miracles qu'il voudra: pourueu que, comme ils font, il ne that we cannot perceive, and whose means and causes our ability cannot discover. By this honest and conscientious declaration we hope to be believed about those we say we do understand. We have no need to go picking out miracles and remote difficulties. It seems to me that among the things we see every day there are oddities so incomprehensible that they surpass all the difficulty of miracles.

ENGLISH

What a prodigy it is that this drop of seed from which we are produced carries in itself the impressions not only of bodily form but of the thoughts and inclinations of our fathers! This drop of water—where does it lodge that infinite number of forms? And how does it carry these resemblances by a course so random and irregular that the great-grandson will take after his great-grandfather, the nephew after his uncle? In the family of Lepidus at Rome there were three, not one after another but at intervals, who were born with the same eye covered with cartilage. At Thebes there was a family whose members bore from their mother's womb the shape of a spearhead, and anyone who did not bear it was held to be illegitimate.

Aristotle says that in a certain nation where women were held in common, children were assigned to their fathers by resemblance.

It is likely that I owe this stony quality to my father, for he died terribly afflicted by a large stone in his bladder. He did not notice his illness until the sixty-seventh year of his age. Before that he had had no threat or twinge of it, in the kidneys, the sides, or anywhere else; he had lived until then in happy health, very little subject to illness; and he lasted another seven years with this disease, dragging out a very painful end of life. I was born more than twenty-five years before his illness, while he was in his best condition, the third of his children in order of birth. Where was the propensity to this defect brooding all that time?

And when he was so far from the disease, how did that slight bit of his substance from which he built me carry so great an impression of it for its share? And how did it keep it so hidden that I began to feel it only forty-five years later—alone so far among so many brothers and sisters, all of one mother? Whoever can enlighten me about this process, I will believe him about as many other me donne en payement, vne doctrine beaucoup plus difficile et fantastique, que n'est la chose mesme.	miracles as he likes, provided he does not pay me, as they do, with a doctrine far more difficult and fantastic than the thing itself.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH

A FAMILY WITHOUT DOCTORS

Montaigne's forebears lived long without medicine, and he inherited their distrust of it.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.37.9	Que les medecins excusent vn peu ma liberté: car par cette mesme infusion et insinuation fatale, i'ay receu la haine et le mespris de leur doctrine. Cette antipathie, que i'ay à leur art, m'est hereditaire. Mon pere a vescu soixante et quatorze ans, mon ayeul soixante et neuf, mon bisayeul pres de quatre vingts, sans auoir gousté aucune sorte de medecine. Et entre eux, tout ce qui n'estoit de l'vsage ordinaire, tenoit lieu de drogue. La medecine se forme par exemples et experience: aussi fait mon opinion. Voyla pas vne bien expresse experience, et bien aduantageuse? Ie ne sçay s'ils m'en trouueront trois en leurs registres, nais, nourris, et trespassez, en mesme fouïer, mesme toict, ayans autant vescu par leur conduite.	Let the physicians forgive my freedom a little, for by this same fatal infusion and insinuation I have received my hatred and contempt for their doctrine. This antipathy I have for their art is hereditary. My father lived seventy-four years, my grandfather sixty-nine, my great-grandfather nearly eighty, without having tasted any kind of medicine; and among them anything that was not in ordinary use counted as a drug. Medicine is formed by examples and experience; so is my opinion. Is this not a very clear experience, and a very favorable one? I do not know whether they will find me three people in their records, born, raised and dead at the same hearth, under the same roof, who have lived as long under their guidance.
	Il faut qu'ils m'aduoüent en cela, que si ce n'est la raison, aumoins que la Fortune est de mon party: or chez les medecins, Fortune vaut bien mieux que la raison. Qu'ils ne me prennent point à cette heure à leur aduantage, qu'ils ne me menassent point, atterré comme ie suis: ce seroit supercherie. Aussi à dire la verité, i'ay assez gaigné sur eux par mes exemples domestiques, encore qu'ils s'arrestent là. Les choses humaines n'ont pas tant de constance: il y a deux cens ans, il ne s'en faut que dix-huict, que cet essay nous dure: car le premier nasquit l'an mil quatre cens deux. C'est vrayment bien raison, que cette experience commence à nous faillir.	They must admit that in this, if reason is not on my side, at least Fortune is; and with physicians Fortune counts for much more than reason. Let them not take advantage of me now; let them not threaten me, laid low as I am: that would be foul play. Besides, to tell the truth, I have won enough against them with my family examples, even if those stop here. Human things do not have so much constancy: this trial has lasted us two hundred years, all but eighteen, for the first was born in the year 1402. It is quite reasonable, really, that this experience should begin to fail us.[8]
	Qu'ils ne me reprochent point les maux, qui me tiennent asteure à la gorge: d'auoir vescu sain quarante sept ans pour ma part, n'est-ce pas assez? Quand ce sera le bout de ma carriere, elle est des plus longues.	Let them not reproach me with the ills that now have me by the throat. Is it not enough to have lived healthy, for my part, for forty-seven years? Even if this is the end of my course, it is one of the longer ones.
2.37.10	Mes ancestres auoient la medecine à contre-cœur par quelque inclination occulte et naturelle, car la veuë mesme des drogues faisoit horreur à mon pere. Le Seigneur de Gauiac mon oncle paternel, homme d'Eglise, maladif dés sa naissance, et qui fit toutesfois durer cette vie debile, iusques à soixante sept ans, estant tombé	My ancestors disliked medicine through some hidden and natural inclination, for the very sight of drugs horrified my father. The Seigneur de Gaviac, my paternal uncle, a churchman, was sickly from birth and yet made that feeble life last until sixty-seven. Once, when he had fallen into a severe and

8 Montaigne's great-grandfather Ramon Eyquem, the Bordeaux merchant who bought the estate of Montaigne in 1477.

FRENCH

autrefois en vne grosse et vehemente fiéure continue, il fut ordonné par les medecins, qu'on luy declaireroit, s'il ne se vouloit ayder (ils appellent secours ce qui le plus souuent est empeschement) qu'il estoit infailliblement mort. Ce bon homme, tout effrayé comme il fut de cette horrible sentence: Si, respondit-il, ie suis donq mort: mais Dieu rendit tantost apres vain ce prognostique.

Le dernier des freres, ils estoyent quatre, Sieur de Bussaguet, et de bien loing le dernier, se soubmit seul, à cet art: pour le commerce, ce croy-ie, qu'il auoit auec les autres arts: car il estoit conseiller en la cour de parlement: et luy succeda si mal, qu'estant par apparence de plus forte complexion, il mourut pourtant long temps auant les autres, sauf vn, le Sieur de Sainct Michel.

2.37.11 Il est possible que i'ay receu d'eux cette dyspathie naturelle à la medecine: mais s'il n'y eust eu que cette consideration, i'eusse essayé de la forcer. Car toutes ces conditions, qui naissent en nous sans raison, elles sont vitieuses: c'est vne espece de maladie qu'il faut combattre. Il peult estre, que i'y auois cette propension, mais ie l'ay appuyée et fortifiée par les discours, qui m'en ont estably l'opinion que i'en ay. Car ie hay aussi cette consideration de refuser la medecine pour l'aigreur de son goust. Ce ne seroit aysément mon humeur, qui trouue la santé digne d'estre r'achetée, par tous les cauteres et incisions les plus penibles qui se facent.

Et suyuant Epicurus, les voluptez me semblent à euiter, si elles tirent à leurs suittes des douleurs plus grandes: et les douleurs à rechercher, qui tirent à leur suitte des voluptez plus grandes. C'est vne pretieuse chose, que la santé: et la seule qui merite à la verité qu'on y employe, non le temps seulement, la sueur, la peine, les biens, mais encore la vie à sa poursuite: d'autant que sans elle, la vie nous vient à estre iniurieuse. La volupté, la sagesse, la science et la vertu, sans elle se ternissent et esuanouyssent.

Et aux plus fermes et tendus discours, que la philosophie nous veuille imprimer au contraire, nous n'auons qu'à opposer l'image de Platon, estant frappé du haut mal, ou d'vne apoplexie: et en cette presupposition le deffier d'appeller à son secours les riches facultez de son ame. Toute voye qui nous meneroit à la santé, ne se peut dire pour moy ny aspre, ny chere. Mais i'ay quelques autres apparences, qui me font estrangement deffier de toute cette marchandise. Ie ne dy pas qu'il n'y en puisse auoir quelque art: qu'il n'y ait parmy tant d'ouurages de violent continuous fever, the physicians ordered that he be told that if he would not let himself be helped (they call "help" what is most often a hindrance) he was a dead man for certain. The good man, terrified as he was by this horrible sentence, answered: "Then I'm dead." But God soon after made this prognosis vain.

ENGLISH

The youngest of the brothers—there were four—the Sieur de Bussaguet, younger by a long way, alone submitted to this art, because of his dealings, I believe, with the other arts, for he was a counselor in the court of Parlement. It turned out so badly for him that, though to all appearances of stronger constitution, he died long before the others, except one, the Sieur de Saint-Michel.

It is possible that I received from them this natural dislike of medicine; but if there had been only that consideration, I would have tried to overcome it. For all those dispositions that arise in us without reason are vicious; they are a kind of disease that must be fought. It may be that I had this propensity, but I have supported and strengthened it by the reasonings that have established in me the opinion I hold. For I also hate the attitude of refusing medicine because of its bitter taste. That would hardly be my temperament, which finds health worth buying back by all the most painful cauteries and incisions there are.

And following Epicurus, I think pleasures should be avoided if they bring greater pains in their train, and pains sought if they bring greater pleasures in their train. Health is a precious thing, and in truth the only one that deserves our spending on its pursuit not only time, sweat, trouble and goods, but even life itself; for without it life becomes a burden and an injury to us. Pleasure, wisdom, knowledge and virtue tarnish and vanish without it.

And to the firmest and most strenuous arguments that philosophy may try to impress on us to the contrary, we need only oppose the image of Plato struck down by epilepsy or apoplexy, and on that supposition challenge him to call on the rich faculties of his soul for help. To me, no road that would lead us to health can be called either harsh or costly. But I have some other indications that make me strangely distrustful of all this merchandise. I do not say there cannot be some art in Nature, des choses propres à la conseruation de nostre santé, cela est certain.

FRENCH

I'entends bien, qu'il y a quelque simple qui humecte, quelque autre qui asseche: ie sçay par experience, et que les refforts produisent des vents, et que les feuilles du sené laschent le ventre: ie sçay plusieurs telles experiences: comme ie sçay que le mouton me nourrit, et que le vin m'eschauffe. Et disoit Solon, que le manger estoit, comme les autres drogues, vne medecine contre la maladie de la faim. Ie ne desaduouë pas l'vsage, que nous tirons du monde, ny ne doubte de la puissance et vberté de Nature, et de son application à nostre besoing. Ie vois bien que les brochets, et les arondes se trouuent bien d'elle.

Ie me deffie des inuentions de nostre esprit: de nostre science et art: en faueur duquel nous l'auons abandonnée, et ses regles: et auquel nous ne sçauons tenir moderation, ny limite. Comme nous appellons iustice, le pastissage des premieres loix qui nous tombent en main, et leur dispensation et pratique, tres inepte souuent et tres inique. Et comme ceux, qui s'en moquent, et qui l'accusent, n'entendent pas pourtant iniurier cette noble vertu: ains condamner seulement l'abus et profanation de ce sacré titre. De mesme, en la medecine, i'honore bien ce glorieux nom, sa proposition, sa promesse, si vtile au genre humain: mais ce qu'il designe entre nous, ie ne l'honore, ny l'estime it. That there are, among so many works of Nature, things suited to preserving our health—that is certain.

ENGLISH

I quite understand that there is some herb that moistens and some other that dries. I know by experience that horseradish produces wind and that senna leaves loosen the bowels; I know several such experiences, just as I know that mutton nourishes me and wine warms me. And Solon said that eating was, like other drugs, a medicine against the disease of hunger. I do not disown the use we make of the world, nor do I doubt the power and fertility of Nature and its fitness for our needs. I can see that pikes and swallows do well by it.

What I distrust are the inventions of our mind, of our science and art, for whose sake we have abandoned Nature and her rules, and in which we cannot keep to any moderation or limit. We call justice the hodgepodge of the first laws that fall into our hands, and their administration and practice, which are often very inept and very unjust; and those who mock it and accuse it do not mean to insult that noble virtue, but only to condemn the abuse and profanation of that sacred title. In the same way, with medicine, I do honor that glorious name, its aim, and its promise, so useful to mankind; but what the name stands for among us I neither honor nor esteem.

AGAINST THE PHYSICIANS

Doctors make the healthy sick, claim nature's cures as their own and blame their failures on patients.

FRENCH

2.37.12 En premier lieu l'experience me le fait craindre: car de ce que i'ay de cognoissance, ie ne voy nulle race de gens si tost malade, et si tard guerie, que celle qui est soubs la iurisdiction de la medecine. Leur santé mesme est alterée et corrompue, par la contrainte des regimes. Les medecins ne se contentent point d'auoir la maladie en gouuernement, ils rendent la santé malade, pour garder qu'on ne puisse en aucune saison eschapper leur authorité. D'vne santé constante et entiere, n'en tirent ils pas l'argument d'vne grande maladie future?

I'ay esté assez souuent malade: i'ay trouué sans leurs secours, mes maladies aussi douces à supporter (et en ay essayé quasi de toutes les sortes) et aussi courtes, qu'à nul autre: et si n'y ay point meslé l'amertume de leurs

ENGLISH

In the first place, experience makes me fear it; for as far as my knowledge goes, I see no kind of people so soon sick and so slow to be cured as those under the jurisdiction of medicine. Their very health is altered and corrupted by the constraint of regimens. Physicians are not content to have illness under their governance; they make health sick, to make sure that no one can escape their authority at any season. From steady and complete health, do they not draw the argument for a great illness to come?

I have been ill often enough. Without their help I have found my illnesses (and I have tried almost every kind) as easy to bear and as short as anyone's, and I have not mixed into them the bitterordonnances. La santé, ie l'ay libre et entiere, sans regle, et sans autre discipline, que de ma coustume et de mon plaisir. Tout lieu m'est bon à m'arrester: car il ne me faut autres commoditez estant malade, que celles qu'il me faut estant sain. Ie ne me passionne point d'estre sans medecin, sans apotiquaire, et sans secours: dequoy i'en voy la plus part plus affligez que du mal. Quoy?

FRENCH

eux mesmes nous font ils voir de l'heur et de la durée en leur vie, qui nous puisse tesmoigner quelque apparent effect de leur science?

2.37.13 Il n'est nation qui n'ait esté plusieurs siecles sans la medecine: et les premiers siecles, c'est à dire les meilleurs et les plus heureux: et du monde la dixiesme partie ne s'en sert pas encores à cette heure. Infinies nations ne la cognoissent pas, où l'on vit et plus sainement, et plus longuement, qu'on ne fait icy: et parmy nous, le commun peuple s'en passe heureusement.

Les Romains auoyent esté six cens ans, auant que de la receuoir: mais apres l'auoir essayée, ils la chasserent de leur ville, par l'entremise de Caton le Censeur, qui montra combien aysément il s'en pouuoit passer, ayant vescu quatre vingts et cinq ans: et faict viure sa femme iusqu'à l'extreme vieillesse, non pas sans medecine: mais ouy bien sans medecin: car toute chose qui se trouue salubre à nostre vie, se peut nommer medecine. Il entretenoit, ce dit Plutarque, sa famille en santé, par l'vsage, ce me semble, du lieure. Comme les Arcades, dit Pline, guerissent toutes maladies auec du laict de vache.

Et les Lybiens, dit Herodote, iouyssent populairement d'vne rare santé, par cette coustume qu'ils ont: apres que leurs enfants ont atteint quatre ans, de leur causterizer et brusler les veines du chef et des temples: par où ils coupent chemin pour leur vie, à toute defluxion de rheume. Et les gens de village de ce pays, à tous accidens n'employent que du vin le plus fort qu'ils peuuent, meslé à force safran et espice: tout cela auec vne fortune pareille.

2.37.14 Et à dire vray, de toute cette diuersité et confusion d'ordonnances, quelle autre fin et effect apres tout y a il, que de vuider le ventre? ce que mille simples domestiques peuuent faire. Et si ne sçay si c'est si vtilement qu'ils disent: et si nostre nature n'a point besoing de la residence de ses excremens, iusques à certaine mesure, comme le vin a de sa lie pour sa ness of their prescriptions. My health I have free and whole, without rules and without any other discipline than my habit and my pleasure. Any place is good for me to stop in, for when I am sick I need no comforts other than those I need when I am well. It does not upset me to be without a physician, without an apothecary, and without help—things I see most people more distressed about than about the illness. What?

ENGLISH

Do they themselves show us any happiness or length of life that could bear witness to some visible effect of their science?

There is no nation that has not gone several centuries without medicine—and those the first centuries, that is to say the best and happiest; and even now a tenth of the world does not use it. Countless nations do not know it, where people live both more healthily and longer than they do here; and among us the common people get along happily without it.

The Romans had gone six hundred years before accepting it. But after trying it, they drove it out of their city through the agency of Cato the Censor, who showed how easily he could do without it: he lived eighty-five years and kept his wife alive to extreme old age—not without medicine, but certainly without a physician, for anything found healthful to our life can be called medicine. He kept his household in health, Plutarch says, by the use, if I remember rightly, of hare. Just as the Arcadians, says Pliny, cure all illnesses with cow's milk.

And the Libyans, says Herodotus, generally enjoy rare health thanks to a custom of theirs: when their children reach the age of four, they cauterize and burn the veins of their heads and temples, thereby blocking for life the way to any flow of catarrh. And the village people of this country use nothing for every ailment but the strongest wine they can get, mixed with plenty of saffron and spice—all with the same success.

And to tell the truth, from all this variety and confusion of prescriptions, what other end and effect is there, after all, than emptying the belly? A thousand household herbs can do that. And I do not even know whether it is as useful as they say, or whether our nature does not need its excrements to stay in it up to a point, as wine needs its lees to conseruation. Vous voyez souuent des hommes sains, tomber en vomissemens, ou flux de ventre par accident estranger, et faire vn grand vuidange d'excremens sans besoin aucun precedent, et sans aucune vtilité suyuante, voire auec empirement et dommage.

FRENCH

C'est du grand Platon, que i'apprins n'agueres, que de trois sortes de mouuements, qui nous appartiennent, le dernier et le pire est celuy des purgations: que nul homme, s'il n'est fol, ne doit entreprendre, qu'à l'extreme necessité. On va troublant et esueillant le mal par oppositions contraires. Il faut que ce soit la forme de viure, qui doucement l'allanguisse et reconduise à sa fin. Les violentes harpades de la drogue et du mal, sont tousiours à nostre perte, puis que la querelle se desmesle chez nous, et que la drogue est vn secours infiable: de sa nature ennemy à nostre santé, et qui n'a accez en nostre estat que par le trouble. Laissons vn peu faire.

L'ordre qui pouruoid aux puces et aux taulpes, pouruoid aussi aux hommes, qui ont la patience pareille, à se laisser gouuerner, que les puces et les taulpes. Nous auons beau crier bihore: c'est bien pour nous enroüer, mais non pour l'auancer. C'est vn ordre superbe et impiteux. Nostre crainte, nostre desespoir, le desgouste et retarde de nostre ayde, au lieu de l'y conuier. Il doibt au mal son cours, comme à la santé. De se laisser corrompre en faueur de l'vn, au preiudice des droits de l'autre, il ne le fera pas: il tomberoit en desordre. Suyuons de par Dieu, suyuons. Il meine ceux qui suyuent: ceux qui ne le suyuent pas, il les entraine, et leur rage, et leur medecine ensemble.

Faittes ordonner vne purgation à vostre ceruelle. Elle y sera mieux employée, qu'à vostre estomach.

2.37.15 On demandoit à vn Lacedemonien, qui l'auoit fait viure sain si long temps: L'ignorance de la medecine, respondit-il. Et Adrian l'Empereur crioit sans cesse en mourant, que la presse des medecins l'auoit tué. Vn mauuais luicteur se fit medecin: Courage, luy dit Diogenes, tu as raison, tu mettras à cette heure en terre ceux qui t'y ont mis autresfois. Mais ils ont cet heur, selon Nicocles, que le soleil esclaire leur succez, et la terre cache leur faute.

2.37.16

ENGLISH

keep. You often see healthy men fall into vomiting or diarrhea from some accident from outside and make a great discharge of excrement without any previous need and without any benefit afterward—indeed, to their harm and detriment.

It was from the great Plato that I learned not long ago that of the three kinds of movement proper to us, the last and worst is that of purgations, which no man, unless he is a fool, should undertake except in extreme necessity. We go on stirring up and rousing the illness by opposing it with contraries. It must be our way of life that gently weakens it and brings it to its end. The violent grapplings between drug and disease are always at our expense, since the quarrel is fought out inside us, and the drug is an ally not to be trusted: by its nature an enemy to our health, with no access to our system except through disturbance. Let us leave things alone a little.[9]

The order that provides for fleas and moles provides also for men who have the same patience as fleas and moles in letting themselves be governed. We may shout "Gee up!" all we like: it will make us hoarse, but it will not hurry it on. It is a proud and pitiless order. Our fear and our despair disgust it and slow its help, instead of inviting it. It owes its course to illness as much as to health. It will not let itself be bribed in favor of the one to the prejudice of the other's rights; that would throw it into disorder. Let us follow, in God's name, let us follow! It leads those who follow; those who do not, it drags along, rage, medicine and all.

Have a purge prescribed for your brain. It will be better spent there than on your stomach.

A Spartan was asked what had kept him healthy so long. "Ignorance of medicine," he replied. And the Emperor Hadrian kept crying out as he was dying that the crowd of physicians had killed him. A bad wrestler became a physician. "Well done," Diogenes told him, "you're right: now you will put into the ground those who once put you there." But they have this good luck, according to Nicocles, that the sun shines on their successes and the earth hides their mistakes.

FRENCH

Et outre cela, ils ont vne façon bien auantageuse, à se seruir de toutes sortes d'euenemens: car ce que la Fortune, ce que la Nature, ou quelque autre cause estrangere, desquelles le nombre est infini, produit en nous de bon et de salutaire, c'est le priuilege de la medecine de se l'attribuer. Tous les heureux succez qui arriuent au patient, qui est soubs son regime, c'est d'elle qu'il les tient. Les occasions qui m'ont guery moy, et qui guerissent mille autres, qui n'appellent point les medecins à leurs secours, ils les vsurpent en leurs subiects.

Et quant aux mauuais accidens, ou ils les desaduoüent tout à fait, en attribuant la coulpe au patient, par des raisons si vaines, qu'ils n'ont garde de faillir d'en trouuer tousiours assez bon nombre de telles: Il a descouuert son bras, il a ouy le bruit d'vn coche: Rhedarum transitus arcto / Vicorum inflexu: on a entrouuert sa fenestre, il s'est couché sur le costé gauche, ou passé par sa teste quelque pensement penible. Somme vne parolle, vn songe, vne œuillade, leur semble suffisante excuse pour se descharger de faute.

Ou, s'il leur plaist, ils se seruent encore de cet empirement, et en font leurs affaires, par cet autre moyen qui ne leur peut iamais faillir: c'est de nous payer lors que la maladie se trouue reschaufee par leurs applications, de l'asseurance qu'ils nous donnent, qu'elle seroit bien autrement empirée sans leurs remedes. Celuy qu'ils ont ietté d'vn morfondement en vne fieure quotidienne, il eust eu sans eux, la continue. Ils n'ont garde de faire mal leurs besongnes, puis que le dommage leur reuient à profit. Vrayement ils ont raison de requerir du malade, vne application de creance fauorable: il faut qu'elle le soit à la verité en bon escient, et bien souple, pour s'appliquer à des imaginations si mal aisées à croire.

Platon disoit bien à propos, qu'il n'appartenoit qu'aux medecins de mentir en toute liberté, puis que nostre salut despend de la vanité, et fauceté de leurs promesses. Æsope autheur de tres-rare excellence, et duquel peu de gens descouurent toutes les graces, est plaisant à nous representer cette authorité tyrannique, qu'ils vsurpent sur ces pauures ames affoiblies et abatuës par le mal, et la crainte: car il conte, qu'un malade estant interrogé par son medecin, quelle operation il sentoit des medicamens, qu'il luy auoit donnez: I'ay fort sué, respondit-il. Cela est bon, dit le medecin. Vne autre fois il luy demanda encore, comme il s'estoit porté depuis: I'ay eu vn froid extreme, fit-il, et si ay fort tremblé.

ENGLISH

Besides that, they have a very advantageous way of making use of every kind of outcome. Whatever good and healthful effect Fortune, Nature, or some other outside cause (and there are infinitely many) produces in us, it is the privilege of medicine to take credit for it. All the happy successes that befall the patient under its regimen, he owes to medicine. The causes that have cured me, and that cure a thousand others who never call in physicians, they appropriate in their own patients.

As for bad outcomes, either they disown them entirely and put the blame on the patient, with reasons so empty that they never run any risk of failing to find plenty of them: he uncovered his arm; he heard the noise of a coach—carriages passing / In the narrow bend of the streets; someone opened his window a crack; he lay on his left side; or some painful thought passed through his head. In short, a word, a dream, a glance seems to them excuse enough to clear themselves of blame.[10]

Or, if they please, they use even the worsening and turn it to account by another means that can never fail them: when the illness is found to be inflamed by their treatments, they pay us with the assurance that it would have been far worse without their remedies. The man they have thrown from a chill into a daily fever would have had the continuous fever without them. They have no fear of doing their work badly, since the damage turns to their profit. Truly they are right to require of the patient a favorable disposition to believe; it must indeed be favorable in earnest, and very supple, to bend itself to notions so hard to believe.

Plato said very aptly that only physicians had the right to lie with complete freedom, since our health depends on the vanity and falseness of their promises. Aesop, an author of very rare excellence, whose graces few people discover in full, is amusing in the way he shows us the tyrannical authority they usurp over these poor souls weakened and cast down by illness and fear. He tells how a sick man, asked by his physician what effect he felt from the medicines he had given him, answered: "I have sweated a great deal." "That is good," said the physician. Another time

9 Plato, Timaeus.
10 Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

the physician asked him again how he had been since. "I have been extremely cold," he said, "and I shivered a lot."

Cela est bon, suyuit le medecin: à la troisieme fois, il luy demanda de rechef, comment il se portoit: Ie me sens, dit-il, enfler et bouffir comme d'hydropisie. Voyla qui va bien, adiousta le medecin. L'vn de ses domestiques venant apres à s'enquerir à luy de son estat: Certes mon amy, respond-il, à force de bien estre, ie me meurs.

"That is good," the physician went on. The third time he asked him once more how he was. "I feel myself swelling and puffing up," he said, "as if with dropsy." "That is going well," added the physician. Afterward one of his household came to ask him how he was. "Truly, my friend," he replies, "I am dying of being so well."

2.37.17 Il y auoit en Ægypte vne loy plus iuste, par laquelle le medecin prenoit son patient en charge les trois premiers iours, aux perils et fortunes du patient: mais les trois iours passez, c'estoit aux siens propres. Car quelle raison y a-il, qu'Æsculapius leur patron ait esté frappé du foudre, pour auoir r'amené Hypolitus de mort à vie, Nam Pater omnipotens aliquem indignatus ab vmbris
Mortalem infernis, ad lumina surgere vitæ,
Ipse repertorem medicinæ talis et artis,
Fulmine Phœbigenam Stygias detrusit ad vndas: et ses suyuans soyent absous, qui enuoyent tant d'ames de la vie à la mort? Vn medecin vantoit à Nicoclés, son art estre de grande auctorité: Vrayement c'est mon, dit Nicoclés, qui peut impunement tuer tant de gens.

In Egypt there was a juster law, by which the physician took charge of his patient for the first three days at the patient's risk and peril, but once the three days were past, at his own. For what reason is there that Aesculapius, their patron, should have been struck by lightning for bringing Hippolytus back from death to life, For the almighty Father, indignant that any mortal
Should rise from the shades below to the light of life, Himself hurled down with his thunderbolt to the Stygian waters
The son of Phoebus, discoverer of such healing and such skill, while his followers, who send so many souls from life to death, go free? A physician was boasting to Nicocles that his art carried great authority. "Indeed it does," said Nicocles, "since it can kill so many people with impunity."[11]

2.37.18 Au demeurant, si i'eusse esté de leur conseil, i'eusse rendu ma discipline plus sacrée et mysterieuse: ils auoyent assez bien commencé, mais ils n'ont pas acheué de mesme. C'estoit vn bon commencement, d'auoir fait des dieux et des dæmons autheurs de leur science, d'auoir pris vn langage à part, vne escriture à part. Quoy qu'en sente la philosophie, que c'est folie de conseiller vn homme pour son profit, par maniere non intelligible: Vt sî quis medicus imperet vt sumat Terrigenam, herbigradam, domiportam, sanguine cassam. C'estoit vne bonne regle en leur art, et qui accompagne toutes les arts fanatiques, vaines, et supernaturelles, qu'il faut que la foy du patient, preoccupe par bonne esperance et asseurance, leur effect et operation.

For the rest, if I had been in their counsels, I would have made my discipline more sacred and mysterious. They had made a fairly good start, but they did not finish in the same way. It was a good beginning to have made gods and daemons the authors of their science, and to have adopted a language of its own and a script of its own—whatever philosophy may think of it, holding that it is folly to advise a man for his own good in a way he cannot understand: As if a physician were to order a patient to take an earth-born, grass-walking, house-carrying, bloodless creature. It was a good rule in their art, and one that goes with all fanatical, vain and supernatural arts, that the patient's faith must anticipate their effect and operation with good hope and assurance.[12]

Laquelle regle ils tiennent iusques là, que le plus ignorant et grossier medecin, ils le trouuent plus propre à celuy,

They keep to this rule so far that they consider the most ignorant and crude physician better suited to 11 Aesculapius, son of Apollo (Phoebus), was the god of medicine. The lines are from Virgil, Aeneid.

12 A riddling description of a snail, from the poet Pacuvius, quoted by Cicero, On Divination.

FRENCH

qui a fiance en luy, que le plus experimenté, et incognu. Le choix mesmes de la plus part de leurs drogues est aucunement mysterieux et diuin. Le pied gauche d'vne tortue, l'vrine d'vn lezart, la fiante d'vn elephant, le foye d'vne taupe, du sang tiré soubs l'aile droite d'vn pigeon blanc: et pour nous autres coliqueux (tant ils abusent desdaigneusement de nostre misere) des crottes de rat puluerisées, et telles autres singeries, qui ont plus le visage d'vn enchantement magicien, que de science solide.

Ie laisse à part le nombre imper de leurs pillules: la destination de certains iours et festes de l'année: la distinction des heures, à cueillir les herbes de leurs ingrediens: et cette grimace rebarbatiue et prudente, de leur port et contenance, dequoy Pline mesme se mocque. Mais ils ont failly, veux-ie dire, de ce qu'à ce beau commencement, ils n'ont adiousté cecy, de rendre leurs assemblées et consultations plus religieuses et secretes: aucun homme profane n'y deuoit auoir accez, non plus qu'aux secretes ceremonies d'Æsculape.

Car il aduient de cette faute, que leur irresolution, la foiblesse de leurs argumens, diuinations et fondements, l'aspreté de leurs contestations, pleines de haine, de ialousie, et de consideration particuliere, venants à estre descouuertes à vn chacun, il faut estre merueilleusement aueugle, si on ne se sent bien hazardé entre leurs mains. Qui vid iamais medecin se seruir de la recepte de son compagnon, sans y retrancher ou adiouster quelque chose? Ils trahissent assez par là leur art: et nous font voir qu'ils y considerent plus leur reputation, et par consequent leur profit, que l'interest de leurs patiens.

Celuy là de leurs docteurs est plus sage, qui leur a anciennement prescript, qu'vn seul se mesle de traiter vn malade: car s'il ne fait rien qui vaille, le reproche à l'art de la medecine, n'en sera pas fort grand pour la faute d'vn homme seul: et au rebours, la gloire en sera grande, s'il vient à bien rencontrer: là où quand ils sont beaucoup, ils descrient à tous les coups le mestier: d'autant qu'il leur aduient de faire plus souuent mal que bien.

Ils se deuoient contenter du perpetuel desaccord, qui se trouue és opinions des principaux maistres et autheurs anciens de cette science, lequel n'est cogneu que des hommes versez aux liures, sans faire voir encore au a patient who trusts him than the most experienced one whom he does not know. Even the choice of most of their drugs is somewhat mysterious and divine: the left foot of a tortoise, the urine of a lizard, elephant dung, the liver of a mole, blood drawn from under the right wing of a white pigeon; and for us colic sufferers (so disdainfully do they abuse our misery), powdered rat droppings, and other such monkey tricks that look more like a magic spell than solid science.

ENGLISH

I leave aside the odd number of their pills, the assigning of certain days and feasts of the year, the distinguishing of hours for gathering the herbs for their ingredients, and that forbidding, knowing grimace of their bearing and countenance, which even Pliny mocks. But where they failed, I mean, was in not adding to this fine beginning one more thing: making their meetings and consultations more religious and secret. No profane man should have been admitted to them, any more than to the secret ceremonies of Aesculapius.

For from this fault it comes about that their irresolution, the weakness of their arguments, divinations and foundations, and the bitterness of their disputes, full of hatred, jealousy and private interest, are laid open to everyone. And then one must be wonderfully blind not to feel oneself in great danger in their hands. Who ever saw a physician use a colleague's prescription without taking something out or putting something in? By this they give their art away plainly enough, and show us that they care more about their reputation, and therefore their profit, than about the interest of their patients.

Wiser was that one of their teachers who long ago laid down for them that only one physician should take charge of treating a patient. For if he does nothing worthwhile, the reproach to the art of medicine will not be very great for one man's fault; and conversely, the glory will be great if he happens to hit the mark. Whereas when there are many of them, they discredit the profession every time, since they happen to do harm more often than good.

They should have been content with the perpetual disagreement found in the opinions of the chief masters and ancient authors of this science, which is known only to men versed in books, without also showing the common people the controver-

FRENCH	ENGLISH
peuple les controuerses et inconstances de iugement, qu'ils nourrissent et continuent entre eux	sies and inconsistencies of judgment that they nourish and keep up among themselves.

A SCIENCE AT WAR WITH ITSELF

Ancient and modern physicians overturn one another's doctrines, and the patient pays.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.37.19 Voulons nous vn exemple de l'ancien debat de la medecine? Hierophilus loge la cause originelle des maladies aux humeurs: Erasistratus, au sang des arteres: Asclepiades, aux atomes inuisibles s'escoulants en noz pores: Alcmæon, en l'exuperance ou deffaut des forces corporelles: Diocles, en l'inequalité des elemens du corps, et en la qualité de l'air, que nous respirons: Strato, en l'abondance, crudité, et corruption de l'alimant que nous prenons: Hippocrates la loge aux esprits. Il y a l'vn de leurs amis, qu'ils cognoissent mieux que moy, qui s'escrie à ce propos, que la science la plus importante qui soit en nostre vsage, comme celle qui a charge de nostre conseruation et santé, c'est de mal'heur, la plus incertaine, la plus trouble, et agitée de plus de changemens.	Do we want an example of the ancient debate in medicine? Herophilus places the original cause of diseases in the humors; Erasistratus, in the blood of the arteries; Asclepiades, in invisible atoms flowing through our pores; Alcmaeon, in the excess or deficiency of bodily strength; Diocles, in the imbalance of the body's elements and in the quality of the air we breathe; Strato, in the abundance, crudeness and corruption of the food we eat; Hippocrates places it in the spirits. One of their friends, whom they know better than I do, exclaims on this subject that the most important science we have in use, since it has charge of our preservation and health, is unfortunately the most uncertain, the most confused, and the most shaken by changes.[13]
Il n'y a pas grand danger de nous mescomter à la hauteur du soleil, ou en la fraction de quelque supputation astronomique: mais icy, où il va de tout nostre estre, ce n'est pas sagesse, de nous abandonner à la mercy de l'agitation de tant de vents contraires.	There is no great danger if we miscalculate the height of the sun, or a fraction in some astronomical computation. But here, where our whole being is at stake, it is not wisdom to abandon ourselves to the mercy of so many contrary winds.
2.37.20 Auant la guerre Peloponnesiaque, il n'estoit pas grands nouuelles de cette science: Hippocrates la mit en credit: tout ce que cettuy-cy auoit estably, Chrysippus le renuersa: depuis Erasistratus petit fils d'Aristote, tout ce que Chrysippus en auoit escrit. Apres ceux-cy, suruindrent les Empiriques, qui prindrent vne voye toute diuerse des anciens, au maniement de cet art. Quand le credit de ces derniers commença à s'enuieillir, Herophilus mit en vsage vne autre sorte de medecine, qu'Asclepiades vint à combattre et aneantir à son tour. A leur reng gaignerent authorité les opinions de Themison, et depuis de Musa, et encore apres celles de Vexius Valens, medecin fameux par l'intelligence qu'il auoit auec Messalina.	Before the Peloponnesian War there was little news of this science. Hippocrates brought it into repute. Everything he had established, Chrysippus overturned; then Erasistratus, Aristotle's grandson, overturned everything Chrysippus had written on it. After these came the Empirics, who took a path quite different from the ancients' in practicing this art. When the credit of these last began to grow old, Herophilus brought another kind of medicine into use, which Asclepiades in turn came to attack and destroy. Next the opinions of Themison gained authority, then those of Musa, and after that those of Vettius Valens, a physician famous for his intimacy with Messalina.[14]
L'empire de la medecine tomba du temps de Neron à Thessalus, qui abolit et condamna tout ce qui en auoit esté tenu iusques à luy. La doctrine de cettuy-cy fut	In Nero's time the empire of medicine fell to Thessalus, who abolished and condemned everything

13 These are Greek physicians and natural philosophers of the 6th–3rd centuries BC. The "friend" is Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, book 29.

14 Messalina was the wife of the emperor Claudius; Vettius Valens was one of her lovers.

FRENCH

abbattue par Crinas de Marseille, qui apporta de nouueau, de regler toutes les operations medecinales, aux ephemerides et mouuemens des astres, manger, dormir, et boire à l'heure qu'il plairoit à la lune et à Mercure. Son authorité fut bien tost apres supplantée par Charinus, medecin de cette mesme ville de Marseille. Cettuy-cy combattoit non seulement la medecine ancienne, mais encore l'vsage des bains chauds, public, et tant de siecles auparauant accoustumé. Il faisoit baigner les hommes dans l'eau froide, en hyuer mesme, et plongeoit les malades dans l'eau naturelle des ruisseaux.

Iusques au temps de Pline aucun Romain n'auoit encore daigné exercer la medecine: elle se faisoit par des estrangers, et Grecs: comme elle se fait entre nous François, par des Latineurs. Car comme dit vn tres-grand medecin, nous ne receuons pas aisément la medecine que nous entendons; non plus que la drogue que nous cueillons. Si les nations, desquelles nous retirons le gayac, la salseperille, et le bois d'esquine, ont des medecins, combien pensons nous par cette mesme recommendation de l'estrangeté, la rareté, et la cherté, qu'ils façent feste de noz choulx, et de nostre persil? car qui oseroit mespriser les choses recherchées de si loing, au hazard d'vne si longue peregrination et si perilleuse?

Depuis ces anciennes mutations de la medecine, il y en a eu infinies autres iusques à nous; et le plus souuent mutations entieres et vniuerselles; comme sont celles que produisent de nostre temps, Paracelse, Fiorauanti et Argenterius: car ils ne changent pas seulement vne recepte, mais, à ce qu'on me dit, toute la contexture et police du corps de la medecine, accusans d'ignorance et de pipperie, ceux qui en ont faict profession iusques à eux. Ie vous laisse à penser où en est le pauure patient.

2.37.21 Si encor nous estions asseurez, quand ils se mescontent, qu'il ne nous nuisist pas, s'il ne nous profite; ce seroit vne bien raisonnable composition, de se hazarder d'acquerir du bien, sans se mettre en danger de perte. Æsope faict ce comte, qu'vn qui auoit acheté vn More esclaue, estimant que cette couleur luy fust venue par accident, et mauuais that had been held about it until his day. His doctrine was overthrown by Crinas of Marseille, who brought in the novelty of regulating all medical operations by the ephemerides and movements of the stars: eating, sleeping and drinking at whatever hour pleased the moon and Mercury. His authority was soon afterward supplanted by Charinus, a physician of that same city of Marseille. This man attacked not only the old medicine but also the use of hot baths, which was public and had been customary for so many centuries before. He had men bathe in cold water, even in winter, and plunged the sick into the natural water of streams.[15]

ENGLISH

Until Pliny's time no Roman had yet deigned to practice medicine. It was done by foreigners and Greeks, just as among us French it is done by people who talk Latin. For, as a very great physician says, we do not readily accept a medicine we understand, any more than a drug we gather ourselves. If the nations from which we bring guaiacum, sarsaparilla and chinaroot have physicians, how highly must they prize our cabbages and our parsley, do we suppose, on the same recommendation of strangeness, rarity and costliness? For who would dare scorn things sought from so far away, at the risk of so long and so perilous a journey?[16]

Since these ancient changes in medicine there have been countless others down to our own day, and most often complete and universal changes, such as those produced in our time by Paracelsus, Fioravanti and Argenterius. For they change not merely a prescription but, so I am told, the whole structure and government of the body of medicine, accusing of ignorance and fraud all who practiced it before them. I leave you to imagine where that leaves the poor patient.[17]

If at least we were sure that, when they make a mistake, it would not harm us even if it did not help us, that would be a very reasonable bargain: to risk gaining some good without putting ourselves in danger of loss. Aesop tells the story of a man who had bought a dark-skinned slave and,

15 Ephemerides are astronomical tables giving the daily positions of the heavenly bodies.
16 Guaiacum, sarsaparilla and chinaroot were costly imported remedies, used chiefly against syphilis.
17 Leonardo Fioravanti and Giovanni Argenterio were Italian physicians who, like Paracelsus, attacked the established medicine of Galen.

FRENCH

traictement de son premier maistre, le fit medeciner de plusieurs bains et breuuages, auec grand soing: il aduint, que le More n'en amenda aucunement sa couleur basanee, mais qu'il en perdit entierement sa premiere santé. Combien de fois nous aduient-il, de voir les medecins imputans les vns aux autres, la mort de leurs patiens?

Il me souuient d'vne maladie populaire, qui fut aux villes de mon voisinage, il y a quelques années, mortelle et tres-dangereuse: cet orage estant passé, qui auoit emporté vn nombre infiny d'hommes; l'vn des plus fameux medecins de toute la contrée, vint à publier vn liuret, touchant cette matiere, par lequel il se rauise, de ce qu'ils auoyent vsé de la saignée, et confesse que c'est l'vne des causes principales du dommage, qui en estoit aduenu. Dauantage leurs autheurs tiennent, qu'il n'y a aucune medecine, qui n'ait quelque partie nuisible. Et si celles mesmes qui nous seruent, nous offencent aucunement, que doiuent faire celles qu'on nous applique du tout hors de propos?

De moy, quand il n'y auroit autre chose, i'estime qu'à ceux qui hayssent le goust de la medecine, ce soit vn dangereux effort, et de preiudice, de l'aller aualler à vne heure si incommode, auec tant de contre-cœur: et croy que cela essaye merueilleusement le malade, en vne saison, où il a tant besoin de repos. Outre ce, qu'à considerer les occasions, surquoy ils fondent ordinairement la cause de noz maladies, elles sont si legeres et si delicates, que i'argumente par là, qu'vne bien petite erreur en la dispensation de leurs drogues, peut nous apporter beaucoup de nuisance.

Or si le mescomte du medecin est dangereux, il nous va bien mal: car il est bien mal-aisé qu'il n'y retombe souuent: il a besoin de trop de pieces, considerations, et circonstances, pour affuster iustement son dessein. Il faut qu'il cognoisse la complexion du malade, sa temperature, ses humeurs, ses inclinations, ses actions, ses pensements mesmes, et ses imaginations.

Il faut qu'il se responde des circonstances externes, de la nature du lieu, condition de l'air et du temps, assiette des planetes, et leurs influances: qu'il sçache en la maladie les causes, les signes, les affections, les iours critiques: en la drogue, le poix, la force, le pays, la figure, l'aage, la dispensation: et faut que toutes ces pieces, il les sçache proportionner et rapporter l'vne à l'autre, pour en engendrer vne parfaicte symmetrie. A quoy s'il faut tant soit peu, si de tant de ressorts, il y en a vn tout seul, qui tire à gauche, en voyla assez pour nous perdre.

ENGLISH

thinking that his color had come to him by accident and from ill treatment by his first master, had him doctored with great care with many baths and potions. It turned out that the slave's dark complexion was not improved in the least, but he entirely lost the good health he had had before. How often do we see physicians blaming one another for the death of their patients?

I remember an epidemic that struck the towns in my neighborhood some years ago, deadly and very dangerous. When this storm had passed, after carrying off countless people, one of the most famous physicians in the whole region published a little book on the subject, in which he has second thoughts about their having used bloodletting, and admits that it was one of the chief causes of the harm that resulted. Moreover their authors hold that there is no medicine without some harmful part. And if even those that help us do us some harm, what must those do that are applied to us quite wrongly?

For my part, even if there were nothing else, I think that for those who hate the taste of medicine it is a dangerous and damaging strain to have to swallow it at such an inconvenient hour and with such loathing; and I believe it tries the patient terribly, at a time when he so needs rest. Besides, if we consider the occasions on which they usually ground the cause of our illnesses, they are so slight and so delicate that I conclude from this that a very small error in dispensing their drugs can do us a great deal of harm.

Now if the physician's mistake is dangerous, we are in a bad way, for it is very hard for him not to fall into it often: he needs too many pieces, considerations and circumstances to aim his plan accurately. He must know the patient's constitution, his temperament, his humors, his inclinations, his actions, even his thoughts and his fancies.

He must take account of external circumstances: the nature of the place, the condition of the air and the weather, the position of the planets and their influences. He must know, in the disease, its causes, its symptoms, its effects, its critical days; in the drug, its weight, strength, country, shape, age and dispensing. And he must know how to proportion all these pieces and relate them to one another so as to produce a perfect symmetry. If he falls short in this in the slightest, if out of so many springs one single one pulls the wrong way, that is enough to finish us.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Dieu sçait, de quelle difficulté est la cognoissance de la pluspart de ces parties: car pour exemple, comment trouuera-il le signe propre de la maladie; chacune estant capable d'vn infiny nombre de signes? Combien ont ils de debats entr'eux et de doubtes, sur l'interpretation des vrines? Autrement d'où viendroit cette altercation continuelle que nous voyons entr'eux sur la cognoissance du mal? Comment excuserions nous cette faute, où ils tombent si souuent, de prendre martre pour renard? Aux maux, que i'ay eu, pour peu qu'il y eust de difficulté, ie n'en ay iamais trouué trois d'accord. Ie remarque plus volontiers les exemples qui me touchent.

God knows how hard it is to know most of these parts. For example, how will he find the proper symptom of the disease, when each one admits of an infinite number of symptoms? How many disputes and doubts do they have among themselves over the reading of urine? Otherwise where would it come from, this continual wrangling we see among them over identifying the illness? How could we excuse the mistake they so often fall into, of taking a marten for a fox? In the illnesses I have had, if there was the least difficulty, I have never found three of them in agreement. I note most readily the examples that concern me.

Dernierement à Paris vn Gentil-homme fut taillé par l'ordonnance des medecins, auquel on ne trouua de pierre non plus à la vessie, qu'à la main; et là mesmes, vn Euesque qui m'estoit fort amy, auoit esté instamment sollicité par la pluspart des medecins, qu'il appelloit à son conseil, de se faire tailler: i'aydoy moy mesme soubs la foy d'autruy, à le luy suader: quand il fut trespassé, et qu'il fut ouuert, on trouua qu'il n'auoit mal qu'aux reins. Ils sont moins excusables en cette maladie, d'autant qu'elle est aucunement palpable. C'est par là que la chirurgie me semble beaucoup plus certaine, par ce qu'elle voit et manie ce qu'elle fait; il y a moins à coniecturer et à deuiner.

Recently in Paris a gentleman was cut for the stone on the physicians' orders, and no more stone was found in his bladder than in his hand. And in the same city a bishop who was a close friend of mine had been urgently pressed by most of the physicians he called into consultation to have himself cut; I myself, trusting others' word, helped persuade him. When he had died and was opened, it was found that his trouble was only in the kidneys. They are less excusable with this disease in that it is to some extent palpable. That is why surgery seems to me much more certain: it sees and handles what it is doing; there is less to conjecture and guess.[18]

Là où les medecins n'ont point de speculum matricis, qui leur descouure nostre cerueau, nostre poulmon, et nostre foye.

Whereas physicians have no speculum for the womb to show them our brain, our lungs and our liver.[19]

2.37.22 Les promesses mesmes de la medecine sont incroyables. Car ayant à prouuoir à diuers accidents et contraires, qui nous pressent souuent ensemble, et qui ont vne relation quasi necessaire, comme la chaleur du foye, et froideur de l'estomach, ils nous vont persuadant que de leurs ingrediens, cettuy-cy eschauffera l'estomach, cet autre refraichira le foye: l'vn a sa charge d'aller droit aux reins, voire iusques à la vessie, sans estaler ailleurs ses operations; et conseruant ses forces et sa vertu, en ce long chemin et plein de destourbiers, iusques au lieu, au seruice duquel il est destiné, par sa proprieté occulte: l'autre assechera le cerueau: celuy là humectera le poulmon.

Even the promises of medicine are incredible. They have to provide against various and contrary ailments that often press on us together and are almost necessarily linked, such as heat in the liver and coldness in the stomach. So they try to persuade us that, of their ingredients, this one will warm the stomach and that one will cool the liver; one has the task of going straight to the kidneys, or even to the bladder, without spreading its effects anywhere else, keeping its strength and virtue along that long road full of obstacles until it reaches the place it is destined to serve by its occult property; another will dry the brain; that one will moisten the lungs.

18 To be "cut" was to undergo lithotomy, the surgical removal of a stone from the bladder.
19 Montaigne's Latin, speculum matricis, names the surgeon's instrument for looking inside the womb.

FRENCH

De tout cet amas, ayant fait vne mixtion de breuuage, n'est-ce pas quelque espece de resuerie, d'esperer que ces vertus s'aillent diuisant, et triant de cette confusion et meslange, pour courir à charges si diuerses? Ie craindrois infiniement qu'elles perdissent, ou eschangeassent leurs ethiquettes, et troublassent leurs quartiers. Et qui pourroit imaginer, qu'en cette confusion liquide, ces facultez ne se corrompent, confondent, et alterent l'vne l'autre? Quoy, que l'execution de cette ordonnance despend d'vn autre officier, à la foy et mercy duquel nous abandonnons encore vn coup nostre vie?

2.37.23 Comme nous auons des pourpointiers, des chaussetiers pour nous vestir; et en sommes d'autant mieux seruis, que chacun ne se mesle que de son subiect, et a sa science plus restreinte et plus courte, que n'a vn tailleur, qui embrasse tout. Et comme, à nous nourrir, les grands, pour plus de commodité ont des offices distinguez de potagers et de rostisseurs, dequoy vn cuisinier, qui prend la charge vniuerselle, ne peut si exquisement venir à bout. De mesme à nous guairir, les Ægyptiens auoient raison de reiecter ce general mestier de medecin, et descoupper cette profession à chasque maladie, à chasque partie du corps son œuurier.

Car cette partie en estoit bien plus proprement et moins confusement traictée, de ce qu'on ne regardoit qu'à elle specialement. Les nostres ne s'aduisent pas, que, qui pouruoid à tout, ne pouruoid à rien: que la totale police de ce petit monde, leur est indigestible. Cependant qu'ils craignent d'arrester le cours d'vn dysenterique, pour ne luy causer la fieure, ils me tuerent vn amy, qui valoit mieux, que tout tant qu'ils sont. Ils mettent leurs diuinations au poids, à l'encontre des maux presents: et pour ne guarir le cerueau au preiudice de l'estomach, offencent l'estomach, et empirent le cerueau, par ces drogues tumultuaires et dissentieuses.

2.37.24 Quant à la varieté et foiblesse des raisons de cet' art, elle est plus apparente qu'en aucun' autre art. Les choses aperitiues sont vtiles à vn homme coliqueux, d'autant qu'ouurans les passages et les dilatans, elles acheminent cette matiere gluante, de laquelle se bastit la graue, et la pierre, et conduisent contre-bas, ce qui se commence à

ENGLISH

When they have made a single potion out of this whole heap, is it not a kind of madness to hope that these virtues will divide and sort themselves out of this confusion and mixture, to run off on such different errands? I should be terribly afraid that they might lose or swap their labels and mix up their quarters. And who could imagine that in this liquid confusion these faculties do not corrupt, confound and alter one another? And what of the fact that carrying out this prescription depends on yet another officer, to whose good faith and mercy we once again abandon our life?

We have doublet-makers and hose-makers to clothe us, and we are all the better served because each deals only with his own subject and has a narrower and shorter range of knowledge than a tailor who takes in everything. And to feed us, great people have, for greater convenience, separate offices of soup-cooks and roasters, which a cook who takes on the whole charge cannot manage so exquisitely. In the same way, for curing us, the Egyptians were right to reject the general trade of physician and to cut the profession up: for each disease, for each part of the body, its own workman.[20]

For that part was treated much more properly and less confusedly because it alone received special attention. Ours do not realize that he who provides for everything provides for nothing; that the total government of this little world is more than they can digest. While they were afraid to stop the flux of a man with dysentery, so as not to give him a fever, they killed a friend of mine who was worth more than the whole lot of them put together. They weigh their guesses against the present ills; and so as not to cure the brain at the expense of the stomach, they injure the stomach and make the brain worse with these turbulent and quarrelsome drugs.[21]

As for the variety and weakness of the reasoning of this art, it is more obvious than in any other art. Aperients are useful to a man with colic, because by opening and dilating the passages they move along that sticky matter from which gravel and stone are built, and carry downward what is be-20 Montaigne follows Herodotus, Histories 2.84.

21 Probably La Boétie, who died of dysentery in 1563.

FRENCH

durcir et amasser aux reins. Les choses aperitiues sont dangereuses à vn homme coliqueux, d'autant qu'ouurans les passages et les dilatans, elles acheminent vers les reins, la matiere propre à bastir la graue, lesquels s'en saisissans volontiers pour cette propension qu'ils y ont, il est mal aisé qu'ils n'en arrestent beaucoup de ce qu'on y aura charrié.

D'auantage, si de fortune il s'y rencontre quelque corps, vn peu plus grosset qu'il ne faut pour passer tous ces destroicts, qui restent à franchir pour l'expeller au dehors, ce corps estant esbranlé par ces choses aperitiues, et ietté dans ces canaux estroits, venant à les boucher, acheminera vne certaine mort et tres-douloureuse.

Ils ont vne pareille fermeté aux conseils qu'ils nous donnent de nostre regime de viure: il est bon de tomber souuent de l'eau, car nous voyons par experience, qu'en la laissant croupir, nous luy donnons loisir de se descharger de ses excremens, et de sa lye, qui seruira de matiere à bastir la pierre en la vessie: il est bon de ne tomber point souuent de l'eau, car les poisans excrements qu'elle traine quant et elle, ne s'emporteront point, s'il n'y a de la violence, comme on void par experience, qu'vn torrent qui roule auecques roideur, baloye bien plus nettement le lieu où il passe, que ne fait le cours d'vn ruisseau mol et lasche.

Pareillement, il est bon d'auoir souuent affaire aux femmes, car cela ouure les passages, et achemine la graue et le sable. Il est bien aussi mauuais, car cela eschauffe les reins, les lasse et affoiblit. Il est bon de se baigner aux eaux chaudes, d'autant que cela relasche et amollit les lieux, où se croupit le sable et la pierre. Mauuais aussi est-il, d'autant que cette application de chaleur externe, aide les reins à cuire, durcir, et petrifier la matiere qui y est disposée. A ceux qui sont aux bains, il est plus salubre de manger peu le soir, affin que le breuuage des eaux qu'ils ont à prendre lendemain matin, face plus d'operation, rencontrant l'estomach vuide, et non empesché.

Au rebours, il est meilleur de manger peu au disner, pour ne troubler l'operation de l'eau, qui n'est pas encore parfaite, et ne charger l'estomach si soudain, apres cet autre trauail, et pour laisser l'office de digerer, à la nuict, qui le sçait mieux faire que ne fait le iour, où le corps et ginning to harden and collect in the kidneys. Aperients are dangerous to a man with colic, because by opening and dilating the passages they move toward the kidneys the matter suited to building gravel; and since the kidneys readily seize on it, from the propensity they have for it, they can hardly fail to keep back much of what has been carried there.[22]

ENGLISH

Moreover, if by chance some body is lodged there that is a little too large to pass through all the narrows still to be crossed before it is expelled, this body, set moving by these aperients and thrown into those narrow channels, will block them and bring on a certain and very painful death.

They show the same firmness in the advice they give us about our way of life. It is good to pass water often, for we see by experience that by letting it stagnate we give it leisure to deposit its sediment and dregs, which will serve as material for building a stone in the bladder. It is good not to pass water often, for the heavy sediment it carries with it will not be swept away without some force; as we see by experience that a torrent rushing down vigorously sweeps the place it passes over much cleaner than the course of a soft and sluggish brook.

Likewise, it is good to have frequent intercourse with women, for that opens the passages and moves the gravel and sand along. It is also very bad, for it heats the kidneys, tires them and weakens them. It is good to bathe in hot springs, because that relaxes and softens the places where the sand and stone lie stagnating. It is also bad, because this application of external heat helps the kidneys bake, harden and petrify the matter lying ready in them. For those taking the waters, it is healthier to eat little in the evening, so that the water they are to drink the next morning may work better, finding the stomach empty and unencumbered.

On the contrary, it is better to eat little at the midday meal, so as not to disturb the working of the water, which is not yet complete, and not to burden the stomach so soon after that other labor, and to leave the task of digesting to the night, which 22 Aperients are medicines that "open" the body's passages, as laxatives or diuretics; Montaigne's colic was caused by kidney stones.

FRENCH

l'esprit, sont en perpetuel mouuement et action. Voila comment ils vont bastelant, et baguenaudant à noz despens en tous leurs discours, et ne me sçauroient fournir proposition, à laquelle ie n'en rebastisse vne contraire, de pareille force. Qu'on ne crie donc plus apres ceux qui en ce trouble, se laissent doucement conduire à leur appetit et au conseil de Nature, et se remettent à la fortune commune.

ENGLISH

does it better than the day, when body and mind are in perpetual movement and action. That is how they juggle and trifle at our expense in all their reasoning; and they could not offer me a single proposition against which I could not build a contrary one of equal force. So let no one rail any more at those who, in this confusion, let themselves be gently led by their appetite and the counsel of Nature, and commit themselves to common fortune.

TAKING THE WATERS

Montaigne's experience of the spas of Europe: harmless, pleasant, and of uncertain effect.

FRENCH

2.37.25 I'ay veu par occasion de mes voyages, quasi tous les bains fameux de Chrestienté; et depuis quelques années ay commencé à m'en seruir. Car en general i'estime le baigner salubre, et croy que nous encourons non legeres incommoditez, en nostre santé, pour auoir perdu cette coustume, qui estoit generalement obseruée au temps passé, quasi en toutes les nations, et est encores en plusieurs, de se lauer le corps tous les iours: et ne puis pas imaginer que nous ne vaillions beaucoup moins de tenir ainsi noz membres encroustez, et noz pores estouppez de crasse.

Et quant à leur boisson, la Fortune a faict premierement, qu'elle ne soit aucunement ennemie de mon goust: secondement elle est naturelle et simple, qui aumoins n'est pas dangereuse, si elle est vaine. Dequoy ie prens pour respondant, cette infinité de peuples de toutes sortes et complexions, qui s'y assemble.

Et encores que ie n'y aye apperceu aucun effect extraordinaire et miraculeux: ains que m'en informant vn peu plus curieusement qu'il ne se faict, i'aye trouué mal fondez et faux, tous les bruits de telles operations, qui se sement en ces lieux là, et qui s'y croyent (comme le monde va se pippant aisément de ce qu'il desire) toutesfois aussi, n'ay-ie veu guere de personnes que ces eaux ayent empiré; et ne leur peut-on sans malice refuser cela, qu'elles n'esueillent l'appetit, facilitent la digestion, et nous prestent quelque nouuelle allegresse, si on n'y va par trop abbatu de forces; ce que ie desconseille de faire.

Elles ne sont pas pour releuer vne poisante ruyne: elles peuuent appuyer vne inclination legere, ou prouuoir à la menace de quelque alteration. Qui n'y apporte assez d'allegresse, pour pouuoir iouyr le plaisir des compagnies

ENGLISH

In the course of my travels I have seen almost all the famous baths of Christendom, and for some years now I have begun to use them. For in general I consider bathing healthy, and I believe we incur no slight harm to our health from having lost this custom of washing the body every day, which was generally observed in times past in almost all nations and still is in many. And I cannot imagine that we are not much the worse for keeping our limbs encrusted like this and our pores stopped up with dirt.

And as for drinking the waters, Fortune has arranged, first, that it is not at all disagreeable to my taste; second, it is natural and simple, and so at least not dangerous, even if it is useless. As guarantee of this I take the countless people of every sort and constitution who gather there.

And yet I have not noticed any extraordinary or miraculous effect there. On the contrary, inquiring into it a little more carefully than people usually do, I have found ill-founded and false all the reports of such cures that are spread about in those places and believed there (as the world easily deceives itself about what it desires). Still, I have also seen hardly anyone whom these waters have made worse; and one cannot without malice deny them this: that they awaken the appetite, aid digestion and lend us some fresh liveliness, provided one does not go there too worn down in strength, which I advise against.

They are not meant to raise up a heavy ruin; they can prop up a slight decline or ward off the threat of some disorder. Whoever does not bring enough qui s'y trouuent, et des promenades et exercices, à quoy nous conuie la beauté des lieux, où sont communément assises ces eaux, il perd sans doubte la meilleure piece et plus asseurée de leur effect.

FRENCH

A cette cause i'ay choisi iusques à cette heure, à m'arrester et à me seruir de celles, où il y auoit plus d'amœnité de lieu, commodité de logis, de viures et de compagnies, comme sont en France, les bains de Banieres: en la frontiere d'Allemaigne, et de Lorraine, ceux de Plombieres: en Souysse, ceux de Bade: en la Toscane, ceux de Lucques; et specialement ceux della Villa, desquels i'ay vsé plus souuent, et à diuerses saisons.

2.37.26 Chasque nation a des opinions particulieres, touchant leur vsage, et des loix et formes de s'en seruir, toutes diuerses: et selon mon experience l'effect quasi pareil. Le boire n'est aucunement receu en Allemaigne. Pour toutes maladies, ils se baignent, et sont à grenouiller dans l'eau, quasi d'vn soleil à l'autre. En Italie, quand ils boiuent neuf iours, ils s'en baignent pour le moins trente; et communément boiuent l'eau mixtionnée d'autres drogues, pour secourir son operation. On nous ordonne icy, de nous promener pour la digerer: là on les arreste au lict, où ils l'ont prise, iusques à ce qu'ils l'ayent vuidée, leur eschauffant continuellement l'estomach, et les pieds.

Comme les Allemans ont de particulier, de se faire generalement tous corneter et vantouser, auec scarification dans le bain: ainsin ont les Italiens leurs doccie, qui sont certaines gouttieres de cette eau chaude, qu'ils conduisent par des cannes, et vont baignant vne heure le matin, et autant l'apres disnée, par l'espace d'vn mois, ou la teste, ou l'estomach, ou autre partie du corps, à laquelle ils ont affaire. Il y a infinies autres differences de coustumes, en chasque contrée: ou pour mieux dire, il n'y a quasi aucune ressemblance des vnes aux autres.

Voylà comment cette partie de medecine, à laquelle seule ie me suis laissé aller, quoy qu'elle soit la moins artificielle, si a elle sa bonne part de la confusion et incertitude, qui se voit par tout ailleurs en cet art.

2.37.27 Les poëtes disent tout ce qu'ils veulent, auec plus d'emphase et de grace; tesmoing ces deux epigrammes. Alcon hesterno signum Iouis attigit. Ille, liveliness to enjoy the pleasure of the company found there, and of the walks and exercise to which we are invited by the beauty of the places where these waters usually lie, undoubtedly loses the best and surest part of their effect.

ENGLISH

For this reason I have so far chosen to stop at and use those where there was the greatest pleasantness of setting and convenience of lodging, food and company: in France, the baths of Bagnères; on the border of Germany and Lorraine, those of Plombières; in Switzerland, those of Baden; in Tuscany, those of Lucca, and especially those at La Villa, which I have used most often and in different seasons.[23]

Each nation has its own opinions about using them, and its own laws and ways of taking them, all different; and in my experience the effect is about the same. Drinking is not accepted at all in Germany. For every illness they bathe, and stay paddling about in the water like frogs almost from sunrise to sunset. In Italy, when they drink for nine days, they bathe for at least thirty; and they usually drink the water mixed with other drugs to assist its working. Here we are told to walk about to digest it; there they keep people in bed, where they drank it, until they have voided it, keeping their stomachs and feet continually warmed.

Just as the Germans have the peculiarity of having themselves almost all cupped and bled, with scarification, in the bath, so the Italians have their doccie, which are certain streams of this hot water that they bring through pipes; with them, for a month, they bathe for an hour in the morning and as long in the afternoon either the head, or the stomach, or whatever other part of the body they are dealing with. There are countless other differences of custom in each region; or, to put it better, there is almost no resemblance between them.

So you see how this branch of medicine, the only one I have let myself go along with, though it is the least artificial, still has its fair share of the confusion and uncertainty seen everywhere else in this art.

The poets say whatever they please with more emphasis and grace: witness these two epigrams. Yesterday Alcon touched the statue of Jove. It, 23 La Villa is one of the spa villages of Bagni di Lucca, where Montaigne took the waters in 1581, as his Travel Journal records.

FRENCH

Quamuis marmoreus, vim patitur medici.
Ecce hodie iussus transferri ex æde vetusta, Effertur, quamuis sit Deus atque lapis. Et l'autre, Lotus nobiscum est, hilaris cænauit, et idem
Inuentus mane est mortuus Andragoras.
Tam subitæ mortis causam, Faustine, requiris?
In somnis medicum viderat Hermocratem. Sur quoy ie veux faire deux comtes.

ENGLISH

Though marble, suffers the physician's power.
Look: today, ordered moved from its ancient temple,
It is carried out for burial, though it is a god and a stone. And the other: Andragoras bathed with us, dined merrily, and yet
In the morning he was found dead.
You ask, Faustinus, the cause of so sudden a death?
In his sleep he had seen the doctor Hermocrates. On this subject I want to tell two stories.[24]

TWO STORIES

A mountain village loses its health with its first doctor, and a goat bred for its blood turns out to have stones.

FRENCH

2.37.28 Le Baron de Caupene en Chalosse, et moy, auons en commun le droit de patronage d'vn benefice, qui est de grande estenduë, au pied de noz montaignes, qui se nomme Lahontan. Il est des habitans de ce coin, ce qu'on dit de ceux de la valée d'Angrougne; ils auoient vne vie à part, les façons, les vestemens, et les mœurs à part: regis et gouuernez par certaines polices et coustumes particulieres, receuës de pere en filz, ausquelles ils s'obligeoient sans autre contrainte, que de la reuerence de leur vsage.

Ce petit estat s'estoit continué de toute ancienneté en vne condition si heureuse, qu'aucun iuge voisin n'auoit esté en peine de s'informer de leur affaire; aucun aduocat employé à leur donner aduis, ny estranger appellé pour esteindre leurs querelles; et n'auoit on iamais veu aucun de ce destroit à l'aumosne.

Ils fuyoient les alliances et le commerce de l'autre monde, pour n'alterer la pureté de leur police: iusques à ce, comme ils recitent, que l'vn d'entre eux, de la memoire de leurs peres, ayant l'ame espoinçonnée d'vne noble ambition, alla s'aduiser pour mettre son nom en credit et reputation, de faire l'vn de ses enfans maistre Iean, ou maistre Pierre: et l'ayant faict instruire à escrire en quelque ville voisine, en rendit en fin vn beau notaire de village. Cettuy-cy, deuenu grand, commença à desdaigner leurs anciennes coustumes, et à leur mettre en teste la pompe des regions de deça.

Le premier de ses comperes, à qui on escorna vne cheure, il luy conseilla d'en demander raison aux iuges Royaux

ENGLISH

The Baron de Caupène in Chalosse and I share the right of patronage of a benefice of wide extent at the foot of our mountains, called Lahontan. It is with the inhabitants of this corner as is said of those of the valley of Angrogna: they had a life of their own, their own ways, dress and manners, ruled and governed by certain particular laws and customs handed down from father to son, which they bound themselves to obey with no other constraint than reverence for their own practice.[25]

This little state had continued since time immemorial in so happy a condition that no neighboring judge had ever had to trouble himself to inquire into their business, no lawyer had been employed to advise them, no outsider called in to settle their quarrels; and no one from that district had ever been seen begging.

They shunned marriages and dealings with the outside world so as not to alter the purity of their way of governing themselves. Then, as they tell it, one of them, within their fathers' memory, his soul spurred by a noble ambition, took it into his head, in order to bring his name into credit and repute, to make one of his children Master John or Master Peter; and having had him taught to write in some neighboring town, he at last made him a fine village notary. This man, once grown up, began to scorn their ancient customs and to fill their heads with the pomp of the regions on our side.[26]

The first of his fellow villagers who had a horn knocked off his goat, he advised to seek redress

24 The first epigram is by Ausonius; the second is Martial, Epigrams 6.53.
25 Lahontan is a parish in Béarn, near the Pyrenees; the valley of Angrogna in Piedmont was a stronghold of the Waldensians.

FRENCH

d'autour de là; et de cettuy-cy à vn autre, iusques à ce qu'il eust tout abastardy. A la suitte de cette corruption, ils disent, qu'il y en suruint incontinent vn' autre, de pire consequence, par le moyen d'vn medecin, à qui il print enuie d'espouser vne de leurs filles, et de s'habituer parmy eux.

Cettuy-cy commença à leur apprendre premierement le nom des fiebures, des rheumes, et des apostemes, la situation du cœur, du foye, et des intestins, qui estoit vne science iusques lors tres esloignée de leur cognoissance: et au lieu de l'ail, dequoy ils auoyent apris à chasser toutes sortes de maux, pour aspres et extremes qu'ils fussent, il les accoustuma pour vne toux, ou pour vn morfondement, à prendre les mixtions estrangeres, et commença à faire trafique, non de leur santé seulement, mais aussi de leur mort.

Ils iurent que depuis lors seulement, ils ont apperçeu que le serain leur appesantissoit la teste, que le boire ayant chault apportoit nuisance, et que les vents de l'automne estoyent plus griefs que ceux du printemps: que depuis l'vsage de cette medecine, ils se trouuent accablez d'vne legion de maladies inaccoustumées, et qu'ils apperçoiuent vn general deschet, en leur ancienne vigueur, et leurs vies de moitié raccourcies. Voyla le premier de mes comtes.

2.37.29 L'autre est, qu'auant ma subiection graueleuse, oyant faire cas du sang de bouc à plusieurs, comme d'vne manne celeste enuoyée en ces derniers siecles, pour la tutelle et conseruation de la vie humaine; et en oyant parler à des gens d'entendement comme d'vne drogue admirable, et d'vne operation infaillible: moy qui ay tousiours pensé estre en bute à tous les accidens, qui peuuent toucher tout autre homme, prins plaisir en pleine santé à me prouuoir de ce miracle; et commanday chez moy qu'on me nourrist vn bouc selon la recepte. Car il faut que ce soit aux mois les plus chaleureux de l'esté, qu'on le retire: et qu'on ne luy donne à manger que des herbes aperitiues, et à boire que du vin blanc.

Ie me rendis de fortune chez moy le iour qu'il deuoit estre tué: on me vint dire que mon cuysinier trouuoit dans la panse deux ou trois grosses boules, qui se chocquoient l'vne l'autre parmy sa mangeaille. Ie fus curieux de faire apporter toute cette tripaille en ma presence, et fis ouurir cette grosse et large peau: il en sortit trois gros corps, legers comme des esponges, de façon qu'il semble qu'ils soyent creuz, durs au demeurant from the royal judges thereabouts; and so from one to another, until he had corrupted everything. Following this corruption, they say, another soon came of worse consequence, by means of a physician who took a fancy to marry one of their daughters and settle among them.

ENGLISH

This man began by teaching them the names of fevers, colds and abscesses, and the location of the heart, the liver and the intestines, a science until then very remote from their knowledge. And instead of garlic, with which they had learned to drive out all sorts of ills, however harsh and extreme, he got them used to taking foreign mixtures for a cough or a chill, and began to traffic not only in their health but also in their death.

They swear that only since then have they noticed that the evening dew made their heads heavy, that drinking when hot did harm, and that the autumn winds were more harmful than those of spring; that since they began using this medicine they find themselves overwhelmed by a legion of unaccustomed diseases, and notice a general decline in their old vigor and their lives cut short by half. That is the first of my stories.

The other is this. Before I was subject to the gravel, I heard many people prize goat's blood as a heavenly manna sent in these latter centuries for the protection and preservation of human life, and heard men of good understanding speak of it as an admirable drug of infallible effect. I, who have always thought myself exposed to all the accidents that can befall any other man, took pleasure, while in perfect health, in providing myself with this miracle, and ordered a goat to be raised for me at home according to the recipe. For it must be shut away in the hottest months of summer, and given nothing to eat but aperient herbs and nothing to drink but white wine.

I happened to come home on the day it was to be killed. They came to tell me that my cook was finding in its paunch two or three large balls knocking against each other among its food. I was curious enough to have all these tripes brought before me, and had that big, broad skin opened. Out came three large bodies, light as sponges, so that they seemed hollow, but otherwise hard and firm on 26 "Master" was the title given to lawyers and men of letters.

FRENCH

par le dessus et fermes, bigarrez de plusieurs couleurs mortes: l'vn parfaict en rondeur, à la mesure d'vne courte boule: les autres deux, vn peu moindres, ausquels l'arrondissement est imparfaict, et semble qu'il s'y acheminast.

I'ai trouué, m'en estant faict enquerir à ceux, qui ont accoustumé d'ouurir de ces animaux, que c'est vn accident rare et inusité. Il est vray-semblable que ce sont des pierres cousines des nostres. Et s'il est ainsi, c'est vne esperance bien vaine aux graueleux, de tirer leur guerison du sang d'vne beste, qui s'en alloit elle mesme mourir d'vn pareil mal. Car de dire que le sang ne se sent pas de cette contagion, et n'en altere sa vertu accoustumée, il est plustost à croire, qu'il ne s'engendre rien en vn corps que par la conspiration et communication de toutes les parties: la masse agist tout' entiere, quoy que l'vne piece y contribue plus que l'autre, selon la diuersité des operations.

Parquoy il y a grande apparence qu'en toutes les parties de ce bouc, il y auoit quelque qualité petrifiante. Ce n'estoit pas tant pour la crainte de l'aduenir, et pour moy, que i'estoy curieux de cette experience: comme c'estoit, qu'il aduient chez moy, ainsi qu'en plusieurs maisons, que les femmes y font amas de telles menues drogueries, pour en secourir le peuple: vsant de mesme recepte à cinquante maladies, et de telle recepte, qu'elles ne prennent pas pour elles, et si triomphent en bons euenemens.

2.37.30 Au demeurant, i'honore les medecins, non pas suiuant le precepte, pour la necessité (car à ce passage on en oppose vn autre du prophete, reprenant le Roy Asa d'auoir eu recours au medecin) mais pour l'amour d'eux mesmes, en ayant veu beaucoup d'honnestes hommes et dignes d'estre aymez. Ce n'est pas à eux que i'en veux, c'est à leur art, et ne leur donne pas grand blasme de faire leur profit de nostre sottise, car la plus part du monde faict ainsi. Plusieurs vacations et moindres et plus dignes que la leur, n'ont fondement, et appuy qu'aux abuz publiques.

Ie les appelle en ma compagnie, quand ie suis malade, s'ils se rencontrent à propos, et demande à en estre entretenu, et les paye comme les autres. Ie leur donne loy, de me commander de m'abrier chauldement, si ie l'ayme mieux ainsi, que d'autre sorte: ils peuuent choisir the surface, mottled with several dull colors: one perfectly round, the size of a ball for short bowls; the other two a little smaller, imperfectly rounded, as though they were on their way to it.

ENGLISH

Having had inquiries made of those who are used to opening up these animals, I found that it is a rare and unusual occurrence. It is likely that these are stones, cousins to ours. And if so, it is a very vain hope for sufferers from the gravel to draw their cure from the blood of a beast that was itself about to die of a similar disease. For as to saying that the blood is not touched by this contagion and does not have its usual virtue altered, it is rather to be believed that nothing is produced in a body except by the conspiracy and communication of all the parts: the mass acts as a whole, though one piece contributes more than another, according to the diversity of operations.

Therefore it is very likely that in all the parts of this goat there was some petrifying quality. It was not so much out of fear for the future, and for myself, that I was curious about this experiment, as because in my house, as in many others, the women gather a store of such petty drugs to help the common people. They use the same recipe for fifty diseases, and a recipe they do not take themselves; and yet they triumph in good results.

For the rest, I honor physicians—not according to the precept, out of necessity (for against that passage another is set, from the prophet reproving King Asa for having had recourse to the physician), but for their own sake, having seen many of them who were decent men and worthy of being loved. It is not them I have a quarrel with; it is their art. And I do not much blame them for profiting from our folly, for most of the world does the same. Many callings, both lesser and worthier than theirs, have no foundation or support but public deception.[27]

I call them in to keep me company when I am ill, if they happen to be at hand; I ask to be entertained by them, and I pay them as others do. I give them leave to order me to cover up warmly, if I prefer that to the alternative. They can choose between 27 The precept is Ecclesiasticus 38:1, which bids us honor the physician because we need him; 2 Chronicles 16:12 blames King Asa for seeking physicians rather than God.

FRENCH

d'entre les porreaux et les laictues, dequoy il leur plaira que mon bouillon se face, et m'ordonner le blanc ou le clairet: et ainsi de toutes autres choses, qui sont indifferentes à mon appetit et vsage. I'entens bien que ce n'est rien faire pour eux, d'autant que l'aigreur et l'estrangeté sont accidens de l'essence propre de la medecine. Lycurgus ordonnoit le vin aux Spartiates malades. Pourquoy? par ce qu'ils en haissoyent l'vsage, sains.

Tout ainsi qu'vn Gentil-homme mon voisin s'en sert pour drogue tressalutaire à ses fiebures, par ce que de sa nature il en hait mortellement le goust. Combien en voyons nous d'entr' eux, estre de mon humeur? desdaigner la medecine pour leur seruice, et prendre vne forme de vie libre, et toute contraire à celle qu'ils ordonnent à autruy? Qu'est-ce cela, si ce n'est abuser tout destroussément de nostre simplicité? Car ils n'ont pas leur vie et leur santé moins chere que nous; et accommoderoient leurs effects à leur doctrine, s'ils n'en cognoissoyent eux mesmes la faulceté.

2.37.31 C'est la crainte de la mort et de la douleur, l'impatience du mal, vne furieuse et indiscrete soif de la guerison, qui nous aueugle ainsi. C'est pure lascheté qui nous rend nostre croyance si molle et maniable. La plus part pourtant ne croyent pas tant, comme ils endurent et laissent faire: car ie les oy se plaindre et en parler, comme nous. Mais ils se resoluent en fin: Que feroy-ie donc? Comme si l'impatience estoit de soy quelque meilleur remede, que la patience. Y a il aucun de ceux qui se sont laissez aller à cette miserable subiection, qui ne se rende esgalement à toute sorte d'impostures?

qui ne se mette à la mercy de quiconque a cette impudence, de luy donner promesse de sa guerison? Les Babyloniens portoyent leurs malades en la place: le medecin c'estoit le peuple: chacun des passants ayant par humanité et ciuilité à s'enquerir de leur estat: et, selon son experience, leur donner quelque aduis salutaire. Nous n'en faisons guere autrement: il n'est pas vne simple femmelette, de qui nous n'employons les barbottages et les breuets: et selon mon humeur, si i'auoy à en accepter quelqu'vne, i'accepterois plus volontiers cette medecine qu'aucune autre: d'autant qu'aumoins il n'y a nul dommage à craindre. Ce qu'Homere et Platon disoyent des Ægyptiens, qu'ils estoyent tous medecins, il se doit dire de tous peuples.

ENGLISH

leeks and lettuce for what my broth is to be made of, and prescribe white wine or claret; and so with all other things that are indifferent to my appetite and habits. I fully understand that this is doing nothing for them, since bitterness and strangeness are accidents of the very essence of medicine. Lycurgus prescribed wine for sick Spartans. Why? Because when healthy they hated drinking it.

In just the same way a gentleman, a neighbor of mine, uses it as a most beneficial drug for his fevers, because by nature he mortally hates its taste. How many of them do we see who are of my temperament? who scorn medicine for their own use, and adopt a free way of life, quite contrary to the one they prescribe for others? What is that but brazenly abusing our simplicity? For they hold their life and health no less dear than we do, and would match their actions to their doctrine if they did not themselves know its falsity.

It is fear of death and of pain, impatience with illness, a furious and reckless thirst for cure, that blinds us so. It is pure cowardice that makes our belief so soft and pliable. Most people, however, do not so much believe as endure and let things be done; for I hear them complain and talk about it as we do. But in the end they make up their minds: "What else am I to do?" As if impatience were in itself a better remedy than patience. Is there anyone who has let himself fall into this miserable subjection who does not surrender equally to every kind of imposture?

who does not put himself at the mercy of anyone with the impudence to promise him a cure? The Babylonians carried their sick into the public square: the physician was the people, each passer-by being bound by humanity and civility to ask about their condition and, according to his experience, give them some healthy advice. We do hardly otherwise. There is not a simple little woman whose mumbled charms and amulets we do not make use of; and to my mind, if I had to accept any medicine, I would accept this kind more willingly than any other, since at least there is no harm to fear from it. What Homer and Plato said of the Egyptians, that they were all physicians, ought to be said of every people.[28]

FRENCH

Il n'est personne, qui ne se vante de quelque recepte, et qui ne la hazarde sur son voisin, s'il l'en veut croire. I'estoy l'autre iour en vne compagnie, où ie ne sçay qui, de ma confrairie, apporta la nouuelle d'vne sorte de pillules compilées de cent, et tant d'ingrediens de comte fait: il s'en esmeut vne feste et vne consolation singuliere: car quel rocher soustiendroit l'effort d'vne si nombreuse batterie? I'entens toutesfois par ceux qui l'essayerent, que la moindre petite graue ne daigna s'en esmouuoir.

ENGLISH

There is no one who does not boast of some recipe and try it out on his neighbor, if he will believe him. The other day I was in a gathering where someone or other of my fraternity brought news of a kind of pill compounded of a hundred-odd ingredients, duly counted. It set off a celebration and a singular comfort: for what rock could withstand the force of so numerous a battery? I hear, however, from those who tried it, that not the smallest grain of gravel deigned to stir for it.[29]

HOW REMEDIES ARE FOUND

Montaigne doubts that chance experiments could ever establish a reliable cure.

FRENCH

2.37.32 Ie ne me puis desprendre de ce papier, que ie n'en die encore ce mot, sur ce qu'ils nous donnent pour respondant de la certitude de leurs drogues, l'experience qu'ils ont faicte. La plus part, et ce croy-ie, plus des deux tiers des vertus medecinales, consistent en la quinte essence, ou proprieté occulte des simples; de laquelle nous ne pouuons auoir autre instruction que l'vsage. Car quinte essence, n'est autre chose qu'vne qualité, de laquelle par nostre raison nous ne sçauons trouuer la cause.

En telles preuues, celles qu'ils disent auoir acquises par l'inspiration de quelque dæmon, ie suis content de les receuoir, (car quant aux miracles, ie n'y touche iamais) ou bien encore les preuues qui se tirent des choses, qui pour autre consideration tombent souuent en nostre vsage: comme si en la laine, dequoy nous auons accoustumé de nous vestir, il s'est trouué par accident, quelque occulte proprieté desiccatiue, qui guerisse les mules au talon; et si au reffort, que nous mangeons pour la nourriture, il s'est rencontré quelque operation aperitiue. Galen recite, qu'il aduint à vn ladre de receuoir guerison par le moyen du vin qu'il beut, d'autant que de fortune, vne vipere s'estoit coulée dans le vaisseau.

Nous trouuons en cet exemple le moyen, et vne conduitte vray-semblable à cette experience. Comme aussi en celles, ausquelles les medecins disent, auoir esté acheminez par l'exemple d'aucunes bestes. Mais en la plus part des autres experiences, à quoy ils disent auoir esté conduis par la fortune, et n'auoir eu autre guide que le hazard, ie trouue le progrez de cette information incroyable. I'imagine l'homme, regardant au tour de luy le nombre infiny des choses, plantes, animaux, metaulx.

ENGLISH

I cannot leave this paper without saying one more word about this: that as guarantee of the certainty of their drugs they offer us the experiments they have made. Most medicinal virtues, and I believe more than two-thirds of them, consist in the quintessence or occult property of medicinal plants, about which we can learn nothing except by use. For quintessence is nothing but a quality whose cause we cannot find by our reason.

Among such proofs, those they say they have acquired by the inspiration of some daemon I am content to accept (for as to miracles, I never touch them); or again the proofs drawn from things that for other reasons often come into our use: as when some occult drying property is found by accident in the wool we usually wear, which cures chilblains on the heel; or when some aperient effect turns up in the horseradish we eat as food. Galen tells how a leper happened to be cured by the wine he drank, because by chance a viper had crept into the jar.

In this example we find the means and a likely path to the discovery; as also in those to which physicians say they were led by the example of certain animals. But in most other experiments, to which they say they were led by fortune, with no other guide than chance, I find the progress of this discovery incredible. I imagine a man looking around him at the infinite number of things—

28 The Babylonian custom is from Herodotus, Histories 1.197; Homer speaks of the Egyptians in the Odyssey, book 4.
29 His "fraternity" are his fellow sufferers from the stone.

FRENCH

Ie ne sçay par où luy faire commencer son essay: et quand sa premiere fantasie se iettera sur la corne d'vn elan, à quoy il faut prester vne creance bien molle et aisée: il se trouue encore autant empesché en sa seconde operation.

Il luy est proposé tant de maladies, et tant de circonstances, qu'auant qu'il soit venu à la certitude de ce poinct, où doit ioindre la perfection de son experience, le sens humain y perd son Latin: et auant qu'il ait trouué parmy cette infinité de choses, que c'est cette corne: parmy cette infinité de maladies, l'epilepsie: tant de complexions, au melancholique: tant de saisons, en hyuer: tant de nations, au François: tant d'aages, en la vieillesse: tant de mutations celestes, en la conionction de Venus et de Saturne: tant de parties du corps au doigt.

A tout cela n'estant guidé ny d'argument, ny de coniecture, ny d'exemple, ny d'inspiration diuine, ains du seul mouuement de la fortune, il faudroit que ce fust par vne fortune, parfaictement artificielle, reglée et methodique. Et puis, quand la guerison fut faicte, comment se peut il asseurer, que ce ne fust, que le mal estoit arriué à sa periode; ou vn effect du hazard? ou l'operation de quelque autre chose, qu'il eust ou mangé, ou beu, ou touché ce iour là? ou le merite des prieres de sa mere-grand? Dauantage, quand cette preuue auroit esté parfaicte, combien de fois fut elle reiterée? et cette longue cordée de fortunes et de rencontres, r'enfilée, pour en conclure vne regle? Quand elle sera conclue, par qui est-ce?

de tant de millions, il n'y a que trois hommes qui se meslent d'enregistrer leurs experiences. Le sort aura il r'encontré à poinct nommé l'vn de ceux-cy? Quoy si vn autre, et si cent autres, ont faict des experiences contraires? A l'aduanture y verrions nous quelque lumiere, si tous les iugements, et raisonnements des hommes, nous estoyent cogneuz. Mais que trois tesmoings et trois docteurs, regentent l'humain genre, ce n'est pas la raison: il faudroit que l'humaine nature les eust deputez et choisis, et qu'ils fussent declarez nos syndics par expresse procuration.

ENGLISH

plants, animals, metals. I do not know where to have him begin his trial. And when his first fancy lights on an elk's horn, which requires a very soft and easy belief, he finds himself just as perplexed in his second step.

He is faced with so many diseases and so many circumstances that, before he has reached certainty on the point where his experiment must come to completion, human sense is at its wits' end. And before he has found, among this infinity of things, that it is this horn; among this infinity of diseases, epilepsy; among so many constitutions, the melancholic; among so many seasons, winter; among so many nations, the French; among so many ages, old age; among so many celestial changes, the conjunction of Venus and Saturn; among so many parts of the body, the finger.

Since in all this he is guided neither by argument, nor conjecture, nor example, nor divine inspiration, but only by the movement of fortune, it would have to happen by a fortune perfectly skillful, regular and methodical. And then, when the cure was done, how can he be sure that it was not because the illness had reached its term? or an effect of chance? or the working of something else he had eaten, drunk or touched that day? or the merit of his grandmother's prayers? Moreover, even if this proof had been perfect, how many times was it repeated? and this long string of chances and coincidences strung together again, to conclude a rule from it? When it is concluded, by whom?

Out of so many millions there are only three men who take the trouble to record their experiments. Will chance have hit exactly on one of these? What if another, and a hundred others, have made contrary experiments? We might perhaps see some light if all the judgments and reasonings of men were known to us. But that three witnesses and three doctors should rule the human race is not reasonable: human nature would have had to depute and choose them, and declare them our representatives by express power of attorney.

TO MADAME DE DURAS

An address to a friend: he wants his book to show him as he naturally is.

FRENCH

2.37.33 A Madame de Dvras.

2.37.34 Madame, vous me trouuastes sur ce pas dernierement, que vous me vinstes voir. Par ce qu'il pourra estre, que ces inepties se rencontreront quelque fois entre vos mains: ie veux aussi qu'elles portent tesmoignage, que l'autheur se sent bien fort honoré de la faueur que vous leur ferez. Vous y recognoistrez ce mesme port, et ce mesme air, que vous auez veu en sa conuersation. Quand i'eusse peu prendre quelque autre façon que la mienne ordinaire, et quelque autre forme plus honorable et meilleure, ie ne l'eusse pas faict: car ie ne veux tirer de ces escrits, sinon qu'ils me representent à vostre memoire, au naturel.

Ces mesmes conditions et facultez, que vous auez pratiquées et recueillies, Madame, auec beaucoup plus d'honneur et de courtoisie qu'elles ne meritent, ie les veux loger, mais sans alteration et changement, en vn corps solide, qui puisse durer quelques années, ou quelques iours apres moy, où vous les retrouuerez, quand il vous plaira vous en refreschir la memoire, sans prendre autrement la peine de vous en souuenir: aussi ne le vallent elles pas. Ie desire que vous continuez en moy, la faueur de vostre amitié, par ces mesmes qualitez, par le moyen desquelles, elle a esté produite.

2.37.35 Ie ne cherche aucunement qu'on m'ayme et estime mieux, mort, que viuant. L'humeur de Tybere est ridicule, et commune pourtant, qui auoit plus de soin d'estendre sa renommée à l'aduenir, qu'il n'auoit de se rendre estimable et aggreable aux hommes de son temps. Si i'estoy de ceux, à qui le monde peut deuoir loüange, ie l'en quitteroy pour la moitié, et qu'il me la payast d'auance. Qu'elle se hastast et ammoncelast tout autour de moy, plus espesse qu'alongée, plus pleine que durable. Et qu'elle s'euanouit hardiment, quand et ma cognoissance, et quand ce doux son ne touchera plus mes oreilles. Ce seroit vne sotte humeur, d'aller à cet'heure, que ie suis prest d'abandonner le commerce des hommes, me produire à eux, par vne nouuelle recommandation.

Ie ne fay nulle recepte des biens que ie n'ay peu employer à l'vsage de ma vie. Quel que ie soye, ie le veux estre ailleurs qu'en papier. Mon art et mon industrie ont esté

ENGLISH

To Madame de Duras.[30]

Madame, you found me at this very point the last time you came to see me. Since these absurdities may perhaps fall into your hands some day, I want them also to bear witness that their author feels very greatly honored by the favor you will show them. You will recognize in them the same bearing and the same air you have seen in his conversation. Even if I could have adopted some manner other than my usual one, and some other, more honorable and better form, I would not have done so; for all I want from these writings is that they bring me back to your memory as I naturally am.

These same qualities and faculties that you have known and welcomed, Madame, with much more honor and courtesy than they deserve, I want to lodge—but without alteration or change—in a solid body that may last a few years, or a few days, after me, where you will find them again whenever you please to refresh your memory of them, without otherwise taking the trouble to remember them; nor indeed are they worth it. I wish you to continue the favor of your friendship toward me by means of the same qualities that brought it about.

I do not in the least seek to be loved and esteemed more dead than alive. The temperament of Tiberius is ridiculous, and yet common: he cared more about extending his fame into the future than about making himself esteemed and agreeable to the men of his own time. If I were one of those to whom the world may owe praise, I would let it off for half, provided it paid me in advance. Let the praise hurry and pile up all around me, thicker rather than longer, fuller rather than lasting. And let it boldly vanish along with my awareness of it, when that sweet sound no longer reaches my ears. It would be a silly whim, now that I am about to give up the company of men, to go and present myself to them with a new recommendation.

I set no store by goods I have not been able to put to use in my life. Whatever I am, I want to be it elsewhere than on paper. My skill and my industry 30 Marguerite de Gramont, wife of Jean de Durfort, lord of Duras, and a friend of Montaigne.

FRENCH

employez à me faire valoir moy-mesme. Mes estudes, à m'apprendre à faire, non pas à escrire. I'ay mis tous mes efforts à former ma vie. Voyla mon mestier et mon ouurage. Ie suis moins faiseur de liures, que de nulle autre besongne. I'ay desiré de la suffisance, pour le seruice de mes commoditez presentes et essentielles, non pour en faire magasin, et reserue à mes heritiers.

Qui a de la valeur, si le face cognoistre en ses mœurs, en ses propos ordinaires: à traicter l'amour, ou des querelles, au ieu, au lict, à la table, à la conduicte de ses affaires, à son œconomie. Ceux que ie voy faire des bons liures sous des meschantes chausses, eussent premierement faict leurs chausses, s'ils m'en eussent creu. Demandez à vn Spartiate, s'il ayme mieux estre bon rhetoricien que bon soldat: non pas moy, que bon cuisinier, si ie n'auoy qui m'en seruist. Mon Dieu, Madame, que ie haïrois vne telle recommandation, d'estre habile homme par escrit, et estre vn homme de neant, et vn sot, ailleurs.

I'ayme mieux encore estre vn sot, et icy, et là, que d'auoir si mal choisi, où employer ma valeur. Aussi il s'en faut tant que i'attende à me faire quelque nouuel honneur par ces sottises, que ie feray beaucoup, si ie n'y en pers point, de ce peu que i'en auois aquis. Car, outre ce que cette peinture morte, et muete, desrobera à mon estre naturel, elle ne se raporte pas à mon meilleur estat, mais beaucoup descheu de ma premiere vigueur et allegresse, tirant sur le flestry et le rance. Ie suis sur le fond du vaisseau, qui sent tantost le bas et la lye.

2.37.36 Au demeurant, Madame, ie n'eusse pas osé remuer si hardiment les mysteres de la medecine, attendu le credit que vous et tant d'autres luy donnez, si ie n'y eusse esté acheminé par ses autheurs mesmes. Ie croy qu'ils n'en n'ont que deux anciens Latins, Pline, et Celsus. Si vous les voyez quelque iour, vous trouuerez qu'ils parlent bien plus rudement à leur art, que ie ne fay: ie ne fay que la pincer, ils l'esgorgent. Pline se mocque entre autres choses, dequoy quand ils sont au bout de leur corde, ils ont inuenté cette belle deffaite, de r'enuoyer les malades qu'ils ont agitez et tormentez pour neant, de leurs drogues et regimes, les vns, au secours des vœuz, et miracles, les autres aux eaux chaudes.

ENGLISH

have been employed in making myself worth something; my studies, in teaching me to do, not to write. I have put all my efforts into shaping my life. That is my trade and my work. I am less a maker of books than of anything else. I have wanted ability for the service of my present and essential needs, not to lay it up in store as a reserve for my heirs.

Whoever has worth, let him show it in his conduct and his ordinary talk: in making love or in quarrels, at play, in bed, at table, in managing his affairs, in running his household. Those I see writing good books in shabby breeches would have seen to their breeches first, if they had listened to me. Ask a Spartan whether he would rather be a good rhetorician than a good soldier; ask me whether I would rather be one than a good cook, if I had no one to cook for me—I would not. My God, Madame, how I would hate such a reputation: to be an able man on paper, and a nobody and a fool everywhere else.

I would still rather be a fool both here and there than have chosen so badly where to employ my worth. And so far am I from expecting to win any new honor by these follies that I shall do well if I lose none of the little I had acquired. For besides what this dead and mute painting will steal from my natural being, it does not correspond to my best condition, but to one much fallen from my former vigor and liveliness, turning withered and stale. I am at the bottom of the cask, which will soon taste of the dregs and lees.

For the rest, Madame, I would not have dared stir up the mysteries of medicine so boldly, given the credit you and so many others give it, if I had not been led to it by its own authors. I believe they have only two among the ancient Latins, Pliny and Celsus. If you look at them some day, you will find that they speak much more harshly to their art than I do: I only pinch it; they cut its throat. Pliny mocks, among other things, the fine way out they have invented when they are at the end of their rope: sending the patients they have harassed and tormented for nothing with their drugs and regimens, some to the help of vows and miracles, others to the hot springs.[31] 31 Celsus (1st century AD) wrote On Medicine; Pliny the Elder attacks physicians in book 29 of his Natural History.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Ne vous courroussez pas, Madame, il ne parle pas de celles de deça, qui sont soubs la protection de vostre maison, et toutes Gramontoises. Ils ont vne tierce sorte de deffaite, pour nous chasser d'aupres d'eux, et se descharger des reproches, que nous leur pouuons faire du peu d'amendement, à noz maux, qu'ils ont eu si long temps en gouuernement, qu'il ne leur reste plus aucune inuention à nous amuser: c'est de nous enuoyer chercher la bonté de l'air de quelque autre contrée.	Do not be angry, Madame: he is not speaking of those on this side, which are under the protection of your house and all belong to the Gramonts. They have a third sort of way out, to drive us away from them and clear themselves of the reproaches we can make them for the little improvement in our ills, which they have had in their charge so long that they have no device left to keep us amused: it is to send us off to seek the good air of some other region.[32]
2.37.37	Madame en voyla assez: vous me donnez bien congé de reprendre le fil de mon propos, duquel ie m'estoy destourné, pour vous entretenir.	Madame, that is enough. You will surely give me leave to pick up the thread of my subject again, which I had left in order to talk with you.
2.37.38	Ce fut ce me semble, Pericles, lequel estant enquis, comme il se portoit: Vous le pouuez, dit-il, iuger par là: montrant des breuets, qu'il auoit attachez au col et au bras. Il vouloit inferer, qu'il estoit bien malade, puis qu'il en estoit venu iusques-là, d'auoir recours à choses si vaines, et de s'estre laissé equipper en cette façon.	It was Pericles, I think, who, when asked how he was, said: "You can judge by this," showing the amulets he had tied around his neck and arm. He meant that he must be very ill, since he had come to the point of turning to such empty things and letting himself be rigged out in that way.
	Ie ne dy pas que ie ne puisse estre emporté vn iour à cette opinion ridicule, de remettre ma vie, et ma santé, à la mercy et gouuernement des medecins: ie pourray tomber en cette resuerie: ie ne me puis respondre de ma fermeté future: mais lors aussi si quelqu'vn s'enquiert à moy, comment ie me porte, ie luy pourray dire, comme Pericles: Vous le pouuez iuger par là, montrant ma main chargée de six dragmes d'opiate: ce sera vn bien euident signe d'vne maladie violente: i'auray mon iugement merueilleusement desmanché. Si l'impatience et la frayeur gaignent cela sur moy, on en pourra conclure vne bien aspre fiéure en mon ame.	I do not say that I may not one day be carried away into this ridiculous notion of putting my life and health at the mercy and under the rule of doctors. I may fall into that delusion; I cannot answer for my future firmness. But then, if someone asks me how I am, I too can tell him, like Pericles: "You can judge by this," showing my hand loaded with six drams of medicinal paste. That will be a very clear sign of a violent illness: my judgment will be wonderfully unhinged. If impatience and fear win that much ground over me, people may conclude that there is a very sharp fever in my soul.
2.37.39	I'ay pris la peine de plaider cette cause, que i'entens assez mal, pour appuyer vn peu et conforter la propension naturelle, contre les drogues, et pratique de nostre medecine: qui s'est deriuée en moy, par mes ancestres: à fin que ce ne fust pas seulement vne inclination stupide et temeraire, et qu'elle eust vn peu plus de forme. Aussi que ceux qui me voyent si ferme contre les exhortemens et menaces, qu'on me fait, quand mes maladies me pressent, ne pensent pas que ce soit simple opiniastreté: qu'il y ait quelqu'vn si fascheux, qui iuge encore, que ce soit quelque esguillon de gloire. Ce seroit vn desir bien assené, de vouloir tirer honneur d'vne action, qui m'est commune, auec mon iardinier et mon muletier.	I have taken the trouble to plead this cause, which I understand rather poorly, in order to prop up and strengthen a little the natural bent against the drugs and practice of our medicine that has come down to me from my ancestors. I wanted it to be not merely a dull and rash inclination, but to have a little more shape. I also wanted those who see me so firm against the urgings and threats I receive when my illnesses press me hard not to think it simple obstinacy—or anyone to be so disagreeable as to judge that it is some spur of glory. That would be a fine target to aim at: to want to win honor from an action I share with my gardener and my muleteer.

32 Madame de Duras was born into the Gramont family, whose lands in the Pyrenean foothills included hot springs.

FRENCH

Certes ie n'ay point le cœur si enflé, ny si venteux, qu'vn plaisir solide, charnu, et moëlleux, comme la santé, ie l'allasse eschanger, pour vn plaisir imaginaire, spirituel, et aëré. La gloire, voire celle des quatre fils Aymon, est trop cher achetée à vn homme de mon humeur, si elle luy couste trois bons accez de colique. La santé de par Dieu! Ceux qui ayment nostre medecine, peuuent auoir aussi leurs considerations bonnes, grandes, et fortes: ie ne hay point les fantasies contraires aux miennes.

Il s'en faut tant que ie m'effarouche, de voir de la discordance de mes iugemens à ceux d'autruy, et que ie me rende incompatible à la société des hommes, pour estre d'autre sens et party que le mien: qu'au rebours, (comme c'est la plus generale façon que Nature aye suiuy, que la varieté, et plus aux esprits, qu'aux corps: d'autant qu'ils sont de substance plus souple et susceptible de formes) ie trouue bien plus rare, de voir conuenir nos humeurs, et nos desseins. Et ne fut iamais au monde, deux opinions pareilles, non plus que deux poils, ou deux grains. Leur plus vniuerselle qualité, c'est la diuersité.

ENGLISH

Truly, my heart is not so puffed up or so windy that I would go and exchange a solid, fleshy, marrowy pleasure like health for an imaginary, spiritual, airy one. Glory, even the glory of the four sons of Aymon, is too dearly bought by a man of my temperament if it costs him three good bouts of colic. Health, in God's name! Those who love our medicine may also have their own reasons, good, great and strong. I do not hate notions contrary to my own.[33]

I am so far from being startled to see my judgments at odds with other people's, or from making myself unfit for the company of men because they hold another opinion and party than mine, that on the contrary I find it much rarer to see our temperaments and our designs agree. For variety is the most general pattern Nature has followed, and more in minds than in bodies, since minds are of a more supple substance and more receptive to forms. There never were in the world two identical opinions, any more than two hairs or two grains. Their most universal quality is diversity.

33 The four sons of Aymon, led by Renaud de Montauban, are the heroes of a popular medieval French epic.

III.1 Of the Useful and the Honorable

De l'vtile et de l'honeste

Montaigne asks whether private morality yields to public expediency and refuses treachery, keeping his own dealings open and honest.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.1	PERSONNE n'est exempt de dire des fadaises: le malheur est, de les dire curieusement: Næ iste magno conatu magnas nugas dixerit.	No one is exempt from talking nonsense; the misfortune is to talk it with great care: Indeed, this man will have taken great pains to say great trifles.[1]
3.1.2	Cela ne me touche pas; les miennes m'eschappent aussi nonchallamment qu'elles le valent. D'où bien leur prend. Ie les quitterois soudain, à peu de coust qu'il y eust. Et ne les achette, ny ne les vends, que ce qu'elles poisent. Ie parle au papier, comme ie parle au premier que ie rencontre. Qu'il soit vray, voicy dequoy.	That does not concern me. My trifles slip out of me as carelessly as they deserve, which is lucky for them. I would drop them at once if they cost me anything at all. I neither buy nor sell them for more than they weigh. I speak to paper as I speak to the first person I meet. To prove this is true, here is an example.
3.1.3	A qui ne doit estre la perfidie detestable, puis que Tybere la refusa à si grand interest? On luy manda d'Allemaigne, que s'il le trouuoit bon, on le defferoit d'Arminius par poison. C'estoit le plus puissant ennemy que les Romains eussent, qui les auoit si vilainement traictez soubs Varus, et qui seul empeschoit l'accroissement de sa domination en ces contrees là. Il fit responce, que le peuple Romain auoit accoustumé de se venger de ses ennemis par voye ouuerte, les armes en main, non par fraude, et en cachette: il quitta l'vtile pour l'honeste. C'estoit, me direz-vous, vn affronteur. Ie le croy: ce n'est pas grand miracle, à gens de sa profession.	Who could fail to find treachery detestable, since Tiberius refused it when so much was at stake? Word was sent to him from Germany that, if he approved, Arminius could be got rid of for him by poison. Arminius was the most powerful enemy the Romans had; he had treated them so shamefully under Varus, and he alone was blocking the growth of Tiberius's dominion in those regions. Tiberius replied that the Roman people were accustomed to take vengeance on their enemies openly, weapons in hand, not by fraud and in secret: he gave up the useful for the honorable. He was a hypocrite, you will tell me. I believe it: that is no great miracle in people of his profession.[2]
	Mais la confession de la vertu, ne porte pas moins en la bouche de celuy qui la hayt: d'autant que la verité la luy arrache par force, et que s'il ne la veult receuoir en soy, aumoins il s'en couure, pour s'en parer.	But the confession of virtue carries no less weight in the mouth of one who hates it, since truth wrests it from him by force, and if he will not take virtue into himself, at least he cloaks himself in it as an ornament.

1 Terence, The Self-Tormentor.

2 Arminius was the German chief who destroyed Varus's legions in AD 9.

NECESSARY VICES

Society needs treachery and lying, but those tasks should be left to others more pliable.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.4	Nostre bastiment et public et priué, est plein d'imperfection: mais il n'y a rien d'inutile en Nature, non pas l'inutilité mesmes, rien ne s'est ingeré en cet vniuers, qui n'y tienne place opportune. Nostre estre est simenté de qualitez maladiues: l'ambition, la ialousie, l'enuie, la vengeance, la superstition, le desespoir, logent en nous, d'vne si naturelle possession, que l'image s'en recognoist aussi aux bestes.	Our structure, both public and private, is full of imperfection. But there is nothing useless in nature, not even uselessness itself. Nothing has worked its way into this universe that does not hold a fitting place in it. Our being is cemented with sickly qualities: ambition, jealousy, envy, vengeance, superstition, despair dwell in us with so natural a possession that their image can be recognized in the beasts as well.
	Voire et la cruauté, vice si desnaturé: car au milieu de la compassion, nous sentons dedans, ie ne sçay quelle aigre-douce poincte de volupté maligne, à voir souffrir autruy: et les enfans la sentent: Suaue, mari magno, turbantibus æquora ventis, / E terra magnum alterius spectare laborem. Desquelles qualitez, qui osteroit les semences en l'homme, destruiroit les fondamentales conditions de nostre vie. De mesme, en toute police: il y a des offices necessaires, non seulement abiects, mais encores vicieux. Les vices y trouuent leur rang, et s'employent à la cousture de nostre liaison: comme les venins à la conseruation de nostre santé.	Even cruelty, so unnatural a vice: for in the midst of compassion we feel within us some bittersweet prick of malicious pleasure at seeing others suffer, and children feel it too: It is sweet, when the winds are churning the waters of the great sea, / To watch from land another's great struggle. Whoever removed the seeds of these qualities from man would destroy the fundamental conditions of our life. Likewise, in every government there are necessary offices that are not only abject but even vicious. Vices find their place there and are put to work stitching our society together, as poisons are used to preserve our health.[3]
	S'ils deuiennent excusables, d'autant qu'ils nous font besoing, et que la necessité commune efface leur vraye qualité: il faut laisser iouer cette partie, aux citoyens plus vigoureux, et moins craintifs, qui sacrifient leur honneur et leur conscience, comme ces autres anciens sacrifierent leur vie, pour le salut de leur pays. Nous autres plus foibles prenons des rolles et plus aysez et moins hazardeux. Le bien public requiert qu'on trahisse, et qu'on mente, et qu'on massacre: resignons cette commission à gens plus obeissans et plus soupples.	If they become excusable because we need them and common necessity wipes out their true quality, we must leave this part to be played by the more vigorous and less fearful citizens, who sacrifice their honor and their conscience as those men of old sacrificed their lives for the safety of their country. We weaker ones take roles that are both easier and less risky. The public good requires that men betray, and lie, and massacre: let us hand over that commission to people more obedient and more pliable.
3.1.5	Certes i'ay eu souuent despit, de voir des iuges, attirer par fraude et fauces esperances de faueur ou pardon, le criminel à descouurir son fait, et y employer la piperie et l'impudence. Il seruiroit bien à la iustice, et à Platon mesme, qui fauorise cet vsage, de me fournir d'autres moyens plus selon moy. C'est vne iustice malicieuse: et ne l'estime pas moins blessee par soy-mesme, que par autruy.	Truly, I have often been vexed to see judges lure a criminal into revealing his deed by fraud and false hopes of favor or pardon, using trickery and impudence to do it. It would be of good service to justice, and to Plato himself, who favors this practice, to supply me with other means more to my liking. It is a malicious kind of justice, and I consider it no less wounded by itself than by others.

3 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

AN HONEST NEGOTIATOR

Montaigne describes his own open, uncommitted way of dealing between hostile princes.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.6	Ie respondy, n'y a pas long temps, qu'à peine trahirois-ie le Prince pour vn particulier, qui serois tres-marry de trahir aucun particulier, pour le Prince. Et ne hay pas seulement à piper, mais ie hay aussi qu'on se pipe en moy: ie n'y veux pas seulement fournir de matiere et d'occasion. En ce peu que i'ay eu à negocier entre nos Princes, en ces diuisions, et subdiuisions, qui nous deschirent auiourd'huy: i'ay curieusement euité, qu'ils se mesprinssent en moy, et s'enferrassent en mon masque. Les gens du mestier se tiennent les plus couuerts, et se presentent et contrefont les plus moyens, et les plus voysins qu'ils peuuent: moy, ie m'offre par mes opinions les plus viues, et par la forme plus mienne.	Not long ago I answered that I would hardly betray my prince for a private individual, I who would be very sorry to betray any private individual for my prince. And I do not only hate deceiving; I also hate people deceiving themselves about me. I do not want even to supply the material or the occasion for it. In the little I have had to negotiate between our princes, in these divisions and subdivisions that are tearing us apart today, I have carefully avoided letting them be mistaken about me and impale themselves on my mask. People in the trade keep themselves as covered as they can, and present and disguise themselves as being as moderate and as close to the other side's views as possible. I offer myself with my most lively opinions and in the form most my own.
	Tendre negotiateur et nouice: qui ayme mieux faillir à l'affaire, qu'à moy. Ç'a esté pourtant iusques à cette heure, auec tel heur, car certes Fortune y a la principalle part, que peu ont passé de main à autre, auec moins de soupçon, plus de faueur et de priuauté. I'ay vne façon ouuerte, aisee à s'insinuer, et à se donner credit, aux premieres accointances. La naifueté et la verité pure, en quelque siecle que ce soit, trouuent encore leur opportunité et leur mise. Et puis de ceux-là est la liberté peu suspecte, et peu odieuse, qui besongnent sans aucun leur interest.	A tender and novice negotiator, who would rather fail in the business than fail myself! Yet up to now it has gone with such luck (for Fortune certainly has the principal share in it) that few have passed from one side to the other with less suspicion, and with more favor and intimacy. I have an open manner, quick to make its way in and win trust at first acquaintance. Naturalness and pure truth, in whatever century, still find their opening and their currency. And then, the freedom of those who work with no interest of their own is little suspected and little resented.
	Et peuuent veritablement employer la responce de Hipperides aux Atheniens, se plaignans de l'aspreté de son parler: Messieurs, ne considerez pas si ie suis libre, mais si ie le suis, sans rien prendre, et sans amender par là mes affaires. Ma liberté m'a aussi aiséement deschargé du soupçon de faintise, par sa vigueur (n'espargnant rien à dire pour poisant et cuisant qu'il fust: ie n'eusse peu dire pis absent) et en ce, qu'elle a vne montre apparente de simplesse et de nonchalance. Ie ne pretens autre fruict en agissant, que d'agir, et n'y attache longues suittes et propositions. Chasque action fait particulierement son ieu: porte s'il peut.	They can truly use the reply of Hyperides to the Athenians, who complained of the harshness of his speech: "Gentlemen, do not consider whether I am outspoken, but whether I am so without taking anything and without bettering my own affairs by it." My outspokenness has also easily cleared me of any suspicion of pretense, by its vigor (I spared nothing I had to say, however weighty and stinging; I could not have said worse behind their backs) and by its evident look of simplicity and nonchalance. I seek no other fruit from acting than the acting itself, and I attach no long sequels and proposals to it. Each action plays its own game separately: let it hit home if it can.[4]

4 Hyperides was an Athenian orator and statesman of the 4th century BC.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.7	Au demeurant, ie ne suis pressé de passion, ou hayneuse, ou amoureuse, enuers les grands: ny n'ay ma volonté garrotee d'offence, ou d'obligation particuliere. Ie regarde nos Roys d'vne affection simplement legitime et ciuile, ny emeuë ny demeuë par interest priué, dequoy ie me sçay bon gré. La cause generale et iuste ne m'attache non plus, que moderément et sans fiéure. Ie ne suis pas subiet à ces hypoteques et engagemens penetrans et intimes. La cholere et la hayne sont au delà du deuoir de la iustice: et sont passions seruans seulement à ceux, qui ne tiennent pas assez à leur deuoir, par la raison simple: Vtatur motu animi, qui vti ratione non potest.	For the rest, I am not driven by any passion, either of hatred or of love, toward the great, nor is my will tied by any particular offense or obligation. I regard our kings with an affection that is simply lawful and civil, neither moved toward them nor moved away by private interest, and I am pleased with myself for it. Nor does the general and just cause bind me except moderately and without fever. I am not subject to those penetrating and intimate mortgages and pledges. Anger and hatred go beyond the duty of justice; they are passions useful only to those who are not held firmly enough to their duty by plain reason: Let him use the impulse of passion who cannot use reason.[5]
	Toutes intentions legitimes sont d'elles mesmes temperees: sinon, elles s'alterent en seditieuses et illegitimes. C'est ce qui me faict marcher par tout, la teste haute, le visage, et le cœur ouuert. A la verité, et ne crains point de l'aduouer, ie porterois facilement au besoing, vne chandelle à Sainct Michel, l'autre à son serpent, suiuant le dessein de la vieille. Ie suiuray le bon party iusques au feu, mais exclusiuement si ie puis. Que Montaigne s'engouffre quant et la ruyne publique, si besoing est: mais s'il n'est pas besoing, ie sçauray bon gré à la Fortune qu'il se sauue: et autant que mon deuoir me donne de corde, ie l'employe à sa conseruation.	All legitimate intentions are temperate in themselves; otherwise they turn seditious and illegitimate. That is what makes me walk everywhere with my head high, my face and my heart open. In truth—and I am not afraid to admit it—I would readily, if need be, carry one candle to Saint Michael and the other to his serpent, like the old woman in the story. I will follow the right side up to the fire, but not into it, if I can. Let Montaigne be swallowed up along with the public ruin, if need be; but if there is no need, I will be grateful to Fortune for saving him, and all the rope my duty allows me I use to preserve him.[6]
	Fut-ce pas Atticus, lequel se tenant au iuste party, et au party qui perdit, se sauua par sa moderation, en cet vniuersel naufrage du monde, parmy tant de mutations et diuersitez? Aux hommes, comme luy priuez, il est plus aisé. Et en telle sorte de besongne, ie trouue qu'on peut iustement n'estre pas ambitieux à s'ingerer et conuier soy-mesmes.	Was it not Atticus who, holding to the just side, and to the side that lost, saved himself by his moderation in that universal shipwreck of the world, amid so many changes and upheavals? For men who, like him, are private persons, it is easier. And in that kind of business I find that one may rightly lack the ambition to thrust oneself forward and invite oneself in.[7]
3.1.8	De se tenir chancelant et mestis, de tenir son affection immobile, et sans inclination aux troubles de son pays, et en vne diuision publique, ie ne le trouue ny beau, ny honneste: Ea non media, sed nulla via est, velut euentum expectantium, quò fortunæ consilia sua applicent. Cela peut estre permis enuers les affaires des voysins: et Gelon tyran de Syracuse, suspendoit ainsi son inclination en la guerre des Barbares contre les Grecs, tenant vne Ambassade à Delphes, auec des presents pour estre en	To stay wavering and half-and-half, to keep one's affection unmoved and leaning nowhere in the troubles of one's country and in a public division—this I find neither handsome nor honorable: That is not a middle way, but no way at all, like those who wait on the outcome in order to fit their plans to fortune. That may be permitted in the affairs of neighbors. Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse, thus held back his

5 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.
6 The proverbial old woman lit one candle to Saint Michael and another to the devil, shown as a serpent or dragon at his feet, to be safe either way.
7 Atticus survived the Roman civil wars of the 1st century BC by staying on good terms with all sides.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
eschauguette, à veoir de quel costé tomberoit la fortune, et prendre l'occasion à poinct, pour le concilier aux victorieux.	leanings in the war of the barbarians against the Greeks: he kept an embassy at Delphi with presents, to be on the lookout to see which way fortune would fall, and to seize the right moment to win the victors over to him.[8]
Ce seroit vne espece de trahison, de le faire aux propres et domestiques affaires, ausquels necessairement il faut prendre party: mais de ne s'embesongner point, à homme qui n'a ny charge, ny commandement exprez qui le presse, ie le trouue plus excusable (et si ne practique pour moy cette excuse) qu'aux guerres estrangeres: desquelles pourtant, selon nos loix, ne s'empesche qui ne veut. Toutesfois ceux encore qui s'y engagent tout à faict, le peuuent, auec tel ordre et attrempance, que l'orage debura couler par dessus leur teste, sans offence. N'auions nous pas raison de l'esperer ainsi du feu Euesque d'Orleans, sieur de Moruilliers?	It would be a kind of treason to do this in one's own domestic affairs, in which one must necessarily take sides. But for a man who has no office or express command pressing him, staying out of it I find more excusable (though I do not use this excuse for myself) than in foreign wars—in which, however, by our laws, no one need take part who does not wish to. Yet even those who commit themselves wholly can do so with such order and moderation that the storm will pass over their heads without harm. Were we not right to hope so in the case of the late Bishop of Orléans, the sieur de Morvilliers?[9]
Et i'en cognois entre ceux qui y ouurent valeureusement à cette heure, de mœurs ou si equables, ou si douces, qu'ils seront, pour demeurer debout, quelque iniurieuse mutation et cheute que le ciel nous appreste. Ie tiens que c'est aux Roys proprement, de s'animer contre les Roys: et me moque de ces esprits, qui de gayeté de cœur se presentent à querelles si disproportionnees. Car on ne prend pas querelle particuliere auec vn Prince, pour marcher contre luy ouuertement et courageusement, pour son honneur, et selon son deuoir: s'il n'aime vn tel personnage, il fait mieux, il l'estime.	And I know some of those working valiantly at it now whose characters are so even or so gentle that they will remain standing, whatever damaging upheaval and fall heaven may be preparing for us. I hold that it is properly for kings to take up arms against kings, and I laugh at those minds who light-heartedly throw themselves into such disproportionate quarrels. For marching against a prince openly and courageously, for one's honor and according to one's duty, is not picking a private quarrel with him. If he does not love such a man, he does better: he esteems him.
Et notamment la cause des loix, et defence de l'ancien estat, a tousiours cela, que ceux mesmes qui pour leur dessein particulier le troublent, en excusent les defenseurs, s'ils ne les honorent.	In particular, the cause of the laws and the defense of the established order always have this about them: even those who disturb that order for their own designs excuse its defenders, if they do not honor them.
3.1.9 Mais il ne faut pas appeller deuoir, comme nous faisons tous les iours, vne aigreur et vne intestine aspreté, qui naist de l'interest et passion priuee, ny courage, vne conduitte traistresse et malitieuse. Ils nomment zele, leur propension vers la malignité, et violence. Ce n'est pas la cause qui les eschauffe, c'est leur interest. Ils attisent la guerre, non par ce qu'elle est iuste: mais par ce que c'est guerre.	But we must not call duty, as we do every day, a sourness and inner harshness born of private interest and passion; nor call courage a treacherous and malicious way of acting. They call their propensity to malice and violence zeal. It is not the cause that inflames them, it is their interest. They stir up war not because it is just but because it is war.
3.1.10 Rien n'empesche qu'on ne se puisse comporter commodément entre des hommes qui se sont ennemis, et	Nothing prevents one from conducting oneself agreeably and loyally among men who are en-

8 Livy. The war is Xerxes' Persian invasion of Greece in 480 BC.
9 Jean de Morvillier (1506–1577), bishop of Orléans and keeper of the seals, a moderate royal statesman during the Wars of Religion.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	loyalement: conduisez vous y d'vne, sinon par tout esgale affection (car elle peut souffrir differentes mesures) au moins temperee, et qui ne vous engage tant à l'vn, qu'il puisse tout requerir de vous. Et vous contentez aussi d'vne moienne mesure de leur grace: et de couler en eau trouble, sans y vouloir pescher.	emies to one another. Conduct yourself there with an affection which, if not equal everywhere (for it can admit different measures), is at least temperate, and does not commit you so much to one side that he can demand everything of you. Content yourself, too, with a moderate measure of their favor, and with gliding through troubled waters without trying to fish in them.
3.1.11	L'autre maniere de s'offrir de toute sa force aux vns et aux autres, a encore moins de prudence que de conscience. Celuy enuers qui vous en trahissez vn, duquel vous estes pareillement bien venu: sçait-il pas, que de soy vous en faites autant à son tour? Il vous tient pour vn meschant homme: ce pendant il vous oit, et tire de vous, et fait ses affaires de vostre desloyauté. Car les hommes doubles sont vtiles, en ce qu'ils apportent: mais il se faut garder, qu'ils n'emportent que le moins qu'on peut.	The other way, offering oneself with all one's strength to both sides, shows even less prudence than conscience. The man for whom you betray another, by whom you are equally welcome—does he not know that you do as much to him in his turn? He holds you for a wicked man; meanwhile he listens to you, draws information from you, and does his business by your disloyalty. For double-dealers are useful in what they bring, but one must take care that they carry away as little as possible.
3.1.12	Ie ne dis rien à l'vn, que ie ne puisse dire à l'autre, à son heure, l'accent seulement vn peu changé: et ne rapporte que les choses ou indifferentes, ou cogneuës, ou qui seruent en commun. Il n'y a point d'vtilité, pour laquelle ie me permette de leur mentir. Ce qui a esté fié à mon silence, ie le cele religieusement: mais ie prens à celer le moins que ie puis. C'est vne importune garde, du secret des Princes, à qui n'en a que faire. Ie presente volontiers ce marché, qu'ils me fient peu: mais qu'ils se fient hardiment, de ce que ie leur apporte. I'en ay tousiours plus sceu que ie n'ay voulu.	I say nothing to one side that I could not say to the other at the proper time, with only the tone a little changed; and I report only things that are either indifferent, or already known, or of common use. There is no advantage for which I allow myself to lie to them. What has been entrusted to my silence I keep religiously hidden; but I take on as little to hide as I can. Guarding the secrets of princes is a tiresome duty for someone who has no use for them. I readily offer this bargain: let them confide little to me, but let them boldly trust what I bring them. I have always known more than I wanted to.
	Vn parler ouuert, ouure vn autre parler, et le tire hors, comme fait le vin et l'amour. Philippides respondit sagement à mon gré, au Roy Lysimachus, qui luy disoit, Que veux-tu que ie te communique de mes biens? Ce que tu voudras, pourueu que ce ne soit de tes secrets. Ie voy que chacun se mutine, si on luy cache le fonds des affaires ausquels on l'employe, et si on luy en a desrobé quelque arriere-sens. Pour moy, ie suis content qu'on ne m'en die non plus, qu'on veut que i'en mette en besoigne: et ne desire pas, que ma science outrepasse et contraigne ma parole. Si ie dois seruir d'instrument de tromperie, que ce soit aumoins sauue ma conscience.	Open speech opens up another's speech and draws it out, as wine and love do. Philippides, to my mind, answered wisely when King Lysimachus asked him, "What would you like me to share with you of my possessions?" "Whatever you like, so long as it is not your secrets." I see that everyone bristles if the heart of the business he is employed in is hidden from him, and if some ulterior meaning has been kept from him. For my part, I am content to be told no more than they want me to put to use, and I do not want my knowledge to outrun and constrain my speech. If I must serve as an instrument of deception, let it at least be with my conscience safe.[10]
	Ie ne veux estre tenu seruiteur, ny si affectionné, ny si loyal, qu'on me treuue bon à trahir personne. Qui est	I do not want to be thought a servant so devoted or so loyal that I would be found fit to betray anyone.

FRENCH

infidelle à soy-mesme, l'est excusablement à son maistre. Mais ce sont Princes, qui n'acceptent pas les hommes à moytié, et mesprisent les seruices limitez et conditionnez. Il n'y a remede: ie leur dis franchement mes bornes: car esclaue, ie ne le doibs estre que de la raison, encore n'en puis-ie bien venir à bout. Et eux aussi ont tort, d'exiger d'vn homme libre, telle subiection à leur seruice, et telle obligation, que de celuy, qu'ils ont faict et achetté: ou duquel la fortune tient particulierement et expressement à la leur.

Les loix m'ont osté de grand peine, elles m'ont choisi party, et donné vn maistre: toute autre superiorité et obligation doibt estre relatiue à celle-là, et retranchee. Si n'est-ce pas à dire, quand mon affection me porteroit autrement, qu'incontinent i'y portasse la main: la volonté et les desirs se font loy eux mesmes, les actions ont à la receuoir de l'ordonnance publique.

3.1.13 Tout ce mien proceder, est vn peu bien dissonant à nos formes: ce ne seroit pas pour produire grands effets, ny pour y durer: l'innocence mesme ne sçauroit à cette heure ny negotier sans dissimulation, ny marchander sans menterie. Aussi ne sont aucunement de mon gibier, les occupations publiques: ce que ma profession en requiert, ie l'y fournis, en la forme que ie puis la plus priuee. Enfant, on m'y plongea iusques aux oreilles, et il succedoit: si m'en desprins ie de belle heure.

I'ay souuent depuis éuité de m'en mesler, rarement accepte, iamais requis, tenant le dos tourné à l'ambition: mais sinon comme les tireurs d'auiron, qui s'auancent ainsin à reculons: tellement toutesfois, que de ne m'y estre poinct embarqué, i'en suis moins obligé à ma resolution, qu'à ma bonne fortune. Car il y a des voyes moins ennemyes de mon goust, et plus conformes à ma portee, par lesquelles si elle m'eust appellé autrefois au seruice public, et à mon auancement vers le credit du monde, ie sçay que i'eusse passé par dessus la raison de mes discours, pour la suyure.

Ceux qui disent communement contre ma profession, que ce que i'appelle franchise, simplesse, et naifueté, en mes mœurs, c'est art et finesse: et plustost prudence, que bonté: industrie, que nature: bon sens, que bonheur: me font plus d'honneur qu'ils ne m'en ostent.

ENGLISH

A man who is unfaithful to himself is excusably so to his master. But these are princes who do not accept men by halves and who despise limited and conditional services. There is no help for it: I tell them frankly where my limits lie. For a slave I should be only to reason, and even that I cannot quite manage. And they too are wrong to demand of a free man the same subjection to their service, and the same obligation, as of a man they have made and bought, or whose fortune is particularly and expressly bound up with theirs.

The laws have relieved me of great trouble: they have chosen my side for me and given me a master. Every other authority and obligation must be relative to that one and subordinate to it. That is not to say that if my affection carried me another way, I would at once lend a hand to it. Will and desires make a law for themselves; actions must receive theirs from public ordinance.

All this way of proceeding of mine is rather out of tune with our customs. It would not be the way to produce great effects, nor to last long: innocence itself could not today negotiate without dissimulation or bargain without lying. So public occupations are by no means my game. What my profession requires of them I supply, in the most private form I can. As a youth I was plunged into them up to my ears, and it was going well; yet I got myself out of them early.

Since then I have often avoided getting involved, rarely accepted, never asked, keeping my back turned to ambition—if not exactly like rowers, who move forward that way, backwards—yet in such a way that for not having embarked on it I owe less to my resolution than to my good luck. For there are paths less hostile to my taste and better suited to my capacity by which, had fortune once called me to public service and to advancement in the world's esteem, I know I would have overridden the reasoning of my reflections to follow it.

Those who commonly say, against what I profess, that what I call frankness, simplicity and naturalness in my ways is art and cunning—prudence rather than goodness, contrivance rather than 10 Philippides was an Athenian comic poet.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

nature, good sense rather than good luck—do me more honor than they take away.

3.1.14 Mais certes ils font ma finesse trop fine. Et qui m'aura suyui et espié de pres, ie luy donray gaigné, s'il ne confesse, qu'il n'y a point de regle en leur escole, qui sçeust rapporter ce naturel mouuement, et maintenir vne apparence de liberté, et de licence, si pareille, et inflexible, parmy des routes si tortues et diuerses: et que toute leur attention et engin, ne les y sçauroit conduire. La voye de la verité est vne et simple, celle du profit particulier, et de la commodité des affaires, qu'on a en charge, double, inegale, et fortuite. I'ay veu souuent en vsage, ces libertez contrefaites, et artificielles, mais le plus souuent, sans succez.

But they certainly make my cunning too cunning. Whoever has followed me and watched me closely, I will grant him the game if he does not admit that there is no rule in their school that could reproduce this natural movement, and keep up an appearance of freedom and license so consistent and so unbending along such twisting and varied paths; and that all their attention and ingenuity could not bring them to it. The way of truth is one and simple; the way of private profit and of convenience in the affairs one has in hand is double, uneven and haphazard. I have often seen these counterfeit and artificial freedoms in use, but most often without success.

Elles sentent volontiers leur asne d'Esope: lequel par emulation du chien, vint à se ietter tout gayement, à deux pieds, sur les espaules de son maistre: mais autant que le chien receuoit de caresses, de pareille feste, le pauure asne, en reçeut deux fois autant de bastonnades. Id maximè quemque decet, quod est cuiusque suum maximè. Ie ne veux pas priuer la tromperie de son rang, ce seroit mal entendre le monde: ie sçay qu'elle a seruy souuent profitablement, et qu'elle maintient et nourrit la plus part des vacations des hommes. Il y a des vices legitimes, comme plusieurs actions, ou bonnes, ou excusables, illegitimes.

They tend to smack of Aesop's ass, which, in emulation of the dog, gaily threw itself with both forefeet onto its master's shoulders; but for the same welcome for which the dog received caresses, the poor ass received twice as many blows of the stick. What best becomes each man is what is most his own. I do not want to deprive deception of its rank; that would be to misunderstand the world. I know that it has often served profitably, and that it maintains and feeds most of men's occupations. There are lawful vices, just as there are many actions, either good or excusable, that are unlawful.

3.1.15 La iustice en soy, naturelle et vniuerselle, est autrement reglee, et plus noblement, que n'est cette autre iustice speciale, nationale, contrainte au besoing de nos polices: Veri iuris germanæque iustitiæ solidam et expressam effigiem nullam tenemus: vmbra et imaginibus vtimur. Si que le sage Dandamys, oyant reciter les vies de Socrates, Pythagoras, Diogenes, les iugea grands personnages en toute autre chose, mais trop asseruis à la reuerence des loix. Pour lesquelles auctoriser, et seconder, la vraye vertu a beaucoup à se desmettre de sa vigueur originelle: et non seulement par leur permission, plusieurs actions vitieuses ont lieu, mais encores à leur suasion.

Justice in itself, natural and universal, is regulated otherwise, and more nobly, than that other special, national justice, which is bound to the needs of our governments: We possess no solid and exact likeness of true law and genuine justice; we make use of shadows and images. So that the sage Dandamis, hearing the lives of Socrates, Pythagoras and Diogenes recounted, judged them great men in every other respect, but too enslaved to reverence for the laws. To give the laws authority and support, true virtue has to give up much of its original vigor; and many vicious actions take place not only with their permission but even at their urging.[11]

Ex Senatusconsultis plebisquescitis scelera exercentur. Ie suy le langage commun, qui fait difference entre les choses vtiles, et les honnestes: si que d'aucunes actions naturelles, non seulement vtiles, mais necessaires, il les nomme deshonnestes et sales.

Crimes are committed by decrees of the Senate and of the people. I follow common language, which distinguishes between useful things and honorable ones, so that some natural actions, not only useful but necessary, it calls dishonorable and dirty.[12]

11 Dandamis was an Indian sage said to have met Alexander the Great.

TRAITORS BETRAYED

Rulers who profit from treachery often punish the traitors they have used.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.16	Mais continuons nostre exemple de la trahison. Deux pretendans au royaume de Thrace, estoient tombez en debat de leurs droicts, l'Empereur les empescha de venir aux armes: mais l'vn d'eux, sous couleur de conduire vn accord amiable, par leur entreueuë, ayant assigné son compagnon, pour le festoyer en sa maison, le fit emprisonner et tuer. La iustice requeroit, que les Romains eussent raison de ce forfaict: la difficulté en empeschoit les voyes ordinaires. Ce qu'ils ne peurent legitimement, sans guerre, et sans hazard, ils entreprindrent de le faire par trahison: ce qu'ils ne peurent honnestement, ils le firent vtilement. A quoy se trouua propre vn Pomponius Flaccus.	But let us continue with our example of treachery. Two claimants to the kingdom of Thrace had fallen into dispute over their rights. The emperor prevented them from taking up arms; but one of them, under color of arranging a friendly settlement at a meeting, invited his rival to a feast at his house and had him imprisoned and killed. Justice required that the Romans obtain satisfaction for this crime, but the difficulty blocked the ordinary ways. What they could not do lawfully, without war and without risk, they undertook to do by treachery: what they could not do honorably, they did usefully. A certain Pomponius Flaccus proved fit for the job.[13]
	Cettuy-cy, soubs feintes parolles, et asseurances, ayant attiré cest homme dans ses rets: au lieu de l'honneur et faueur qu'il luy promettoit, l'enuoya pieds et poings liez à Rome. Vn traistre y trahit l'autre, contre l'vsage commun. Car ils sont pleins de desfiance, et est mal-aisé de les surprendre par leur art: tesmoing la poisante experience, que nous venons d'en sentir.	By false words and assurances he drew the man into his nets, and instead of the honor and favor he had promised him, sent him to Rome bound hand and foot. Here one traitor betrayed another, contrary to the usual practice; for traitors are full of distrust, and it is hard to catch them by their own art—witness the painful experience we have just had of it.
3.1.17	Sera Pomponius Flaccus qui voudra, et en est assez qui le voudront. Quant à moy, et ma parolle et ma foy, sont, comme le demeurant, pieces de ce commun corps: leur meilleur effect, c'est le seruice public: ie tiens cela pour presupposé. Mais comme si on me commandoit, que ie prinse la charge du Palais, et des plaids, ie respondroy, Ie n'y entens rien: ou la charge de conducteur de pionniers, ie diroy, Ie suis appellé à vn rolle plus digne: de mesmes, qui me voudroit employer, à mentir, à trahir, et à me pariurer, pour quelque seruice notable, non que d'assassiner ou empoisonner: ie diroy, Si i'ay volé ou desrobé quelqu'vn, enuoyez moy plustost en gallere.	Let whoever wants be Pomponius Flaccus, and there are plenty who will want to. As for me, both my word and my faith are, like the rest of me, parts of this common body; their best use is public service; I take that for granted. But if I were ordered to take charge of the law courts and lawsuits, I would reply, "I know nothing about it"; or the post of leader of sappers, I would say, "I am called to a worthier role." In the same way, if someone wanted to employ me to lie, to betray and to perjure myself for some notable service—not to mention assassinating or poisoning—I would say, "If I have robbed or stolen from anyone, send me to the galleys instead."
	Car il est loysible à vn homme d'honneur, de parler ainsi que les Lacedemoniens, ayants esté deffaicts par Antipater, sur le poinct de leurs accords: Vous nous pouuez commander des charges poisantes et dommageables, autant qu'il vous plaira: mais de honteuses, et deshonnestes, vous perdrez vostre temps	For a man of honor may speak as the Spartans did when, defeated by Antipater, they were about to come to terms: "You may impose on us burdens as heavy and damaging as you please; but as for shameful and dishonorable ones, you will be wast-

12 Seneca, Letters.

13 The story is told by Tacitus: Rhescuporis of Thrace murdered his nephew Cotys in AD 19, under Tiberius.

FRENCH

de nous en commander. Chacun doit auoir iuré à soy mesme, ce que les Roys d'Ægypte faisoient solennellement iurer à leurs iuges, qu'ils ne se desuoyeroient de leur conscience, pour quelque commandement qu'eux mesmes leur en fissent. A telles commissions il y a note euidente d'ignominie, et de condemnation. Et qui vous la donne, vous accuse, et vous la donne, si vous l'entendez bien, en charge et en peine.

Autant que les affaires publiques s'amendent de vostre exploict, autant s'en empirent les vostres: vous y faictes d'autant pis, que mieux vous y faictes. Et ne sera pas nouueau, ny à l'auanture sans quelque air de iustice, que celuy mesmes vous ruïne, qui vous aura mis en besongne.

3.1.18 Si la trahison doit estre en quelque cas excusable: lors seulement elle l'est, qu'elle s'employe à chastier et trahir la trahison. Il se trouue assez de perfidies, non seulement refusees, mais punies, par ceux en faueur desquels elles auoient esté entreprises. Qui ne sçait la sentence de Fabritius, à l'encontre du medecin de Pyrrhus?

3.1.19 Mais cecy encore se trouue: que tel l'a commandee, qui par apres l'a vengee rigoureusement, sur celuy qu'il y auoit employé: refusant vn credit et pouuoir si effrené, et desaduouant vn seruage et vne obeïssance si abandonnee, et si lasche. Iaropelc Duc de Russie, practiqua vn Gentil-homme de Hongrie, pour trahir le Roy de Poulongne Boleslaus, en le faisant mourir, ou donnant aux Russiens moyen de luy faire quelque notable dommage. Cettuy-cy s'y porta en galand homme: s'addonna plus que deuant au seruice de ce Roy, obtint d'estre de son conseil, et de ses plus feaux.

Auec ces aduantages, et choisissant à point l'opportunité de l'absence de son maistre, il trahit aux Russiens Visilicie, grande et riche cité: qui fut entierement saccagee, et arse par eux, auec occision totale, non seulement des habitans d'icelle, de tout sexe et aage, mais de grand nombre de noblesse de là autour, qu'il y auoit assemblé à ces fins.

Iaropelc assouuy de sa vengeance, et de son courroux, qui pourtant n'estoit pas sans tiltre, (car Boleslaus l'auoit fort ing your time ordering them." Each of us should have sworn to himself what the kings of Egypt made their judges solemnly swear: that they would not stray from their conscience for any command the kings themselves might give them. In such commissions there is an evident mark of ignominy and condemnation. Whoever gives you one is accusing you, and, if you understand it rightly, gives it to you as a burden and a penalty.[14]

ENGLISH

As much as public affairs improve through your exploit, so much do your own grow worse: the better you do the job, the worse you do for yourself. And it will be nothing new, nor perhaps without some air of justice, if the very man who put you to work ruins you.

If treachery can be excusable in any case, it is so only when it is used to punish and betray treachery. There are plenty of perfidies that were not only refused but punished by those in whose favor they had been undertaken. Who does not know the sentence Fabricius passed on Pyrrhus's physician?[15]

But this is also found: a man has ordered treachery and afterward avenged it harshly on the one he had used for it, rejecting so unbridled an authority and power, and disowning so abject and abandoned a servitude and obedience. Yaropolk, Duke of Russia, suborned a Hungarian gentleman to betray King Bolesław of Poland, either by having him killed or by giving the Russians the means to do him some notable damage. This fellow went about it like a smart man: he devoted himself more than before to the king's service, and won a place on his council and among his most trusted men.[16]

With these advantages, and choosing just the right moment when his master was away, he betrayed to the Russians Wiślica, a great and rich city, which they sacked and burned completely, slaughtering not only all its inhabitants, of every sex and age, but a great number of the nobility from the surrounding area, whom he had gathered there for that purpose.

Yaropolk had sated his vengeance and his anger, which was not without grounds (for Bolesław had 14 Antipater defeated the Spartans in 331 BC.

15 Fabricius sent back to King Pyrrhus the physician who had offered to poison him (278 BC).

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	offencé, et en pareille conduitte) et saoul du fruict de cette trahison, venant à en considerer la laideur nuë et seule, et la regarder d'vne veuë saine, et non plus troublee par sa passion, la print à vn tel remors, et contre-cœur, qu'il en fit creuer les yeux, et couper la langue, et les parties honteuses, à son executeur.	greatly offended him, and by similar conduct), and was glutted with the fruit of this treachery. But when he came to consider its ugliness, bare and by itself, and to look at it with a sound eye no longer clouded by passion, he was seized with such remorse and revulsion that he had his agent's eyes put out and his tongue and private parts cut off.
3.1.20	Antigonus persuada les soldats Argyraspides, de luy trahir Eumenes, leur capitaine general, son aduersaire. Mais l'eut-il faict tuer, apres qu'ils le luy eurent liuré, il desira luy mesme estre commissaire de la iustice diuine, pour le chastiment d'vn forfaict si detestable: et les consigna entre les mains du gouuerneur de la prouince, luy donnant tres-expres commandement, de les perdre, et mettre à male fin, en quelque maniere que ce fust. Tellement que de ce grand nombre qu'ils estoient, aucun ne vit onques puis, l'air de Macedoine. Mieux il en auoit esté seruy, d'autant le iugea il auoir esté plus meschamment et punissablement.	Antigonus persuaded the soldiers of the Silver Shields to betray to him Eumenes, their commander-in-chief and his adversary. But no sooner had he had Eumenes killed, after they handed him over, than he wished to act himself as the agent of divine justice in punishing so detestable a crime. He consigned them to the governor of the province, with the most express order to destroy them and bring them to a bad end by any means whatsoever. So that of all their great number, not one ever saw the air of Macedonia again. The better he had been served by them, the more wicked and punishable he judged the service to have been.[17]
3.1.21	L'esclaue qui trahit la cachette de P. Sulpicius son maistre, fut mis en liberté, suiuant la promesse de la proscription de Sylla: mais suiuant la promesse de la raison publique, tout libre, il fut precipité du roc Tarpeien.	The slave who betrayed the hiding place of his master, P. Sulpicius, was set free, in keeping with the promise of Sulla's proscription; but in keeping with the promise of public reason, once free, he was thrown from the Tarpeian Rock.[18]
3.1.22	Et nostre Roy Clouis, au lieu des armes d'or qu'il leur auoit promis, fit pendre les trois seruiteurs de Cannacre, apres qu'ils luy eurent trahy leur maistre, à quoy il les auoit pratiquez. Ils les font pendre auec la bourse de leur payement au col. Ayant satisfaict à leur seconde foy, et speciale, ils satisfont à la generale et premiere.	And our King Clovis, instead of the golden arms he had promised them, had the three servants of Cannacre hanged after they had betrayed their master to him, as he had suborned them to do. They have such men hanged with the purse of their payment around their necks. Having honored their second and special pledge, they honor the general and first one.[19]
3.1.23	Mahomed second, se voulant deffaire de son frere, pour la ialousie de la domination, suiuant le stile de leur race, y employa l'vn de ses officiers: qui le suffoqua, l'engorgeant de quantité d'eau, prinse trop à coup. Cela faict, il liura, pour l'expiation de ce meurtre, le meurtrier entre les mains de la mere du trespassé (car ils n'estoient freres que de pere): elle, en sa presence, ouurit à ce meurtrier l'estomach: et tout chaudement de ses mains,	Mehmed II, wanting to get rid of his brother out of jealousy for power, as is the custom of their dynasty, used one of his officers for the purpose, who suffocated the boy by making him swallow a great quantity of water too fast. That done, to expiate the murder, he delivered the murderer into the hands of the dead boy's mother (for they were brothers only on the father's side). In Mehmed's

16 Yaropolk, a 12th-century Rus' prince, and Bolesław III of Poland; the city in the next passage is Wiślica.
17 The Silver Shields were Alexander's veteran infantry; they handed Eumenes over to Antigonus in 316 BC.
18 Publius Sulpicius Rufus, tribune, was killed in 88 BC; the Tarpeian Rock was the cliff in Rome from which traitors were thrown.
19 Cannacre is Ragnachar, a Frankish king of Cambrai whom Clovis had killed around AD 509, as told by Gregory of Tours.

FRENCH

fouillant et arrachant son cœur, le ietta manger aux chiens.

Et à ceux mesmes qui ne valent rien, il est si doux, ayant tiré l'vsage d'vne action vicieuse, y pouuoir hormais coudre en toute seureté, quelque traict de bonté, et de iustice: comme par compensation, et correction conscientieuse. Ioint qu'ils regardent les ministres de tels horribles malefices, comme gents, qui les leur reprochent: et cherchent par leur mort d'estouffer la cognoissance et tesmoignage de telles menees.

3.1.24 Or si par fortune on vous en recompence, pour ne frustrer la necessité publique, de cet extreme et desesperé remede: celuy qui le fait, ne laisse pas de vous tenir, s'il ne l'est luy-mesme, pour vn homme maudit et execrable: et vous tient plus traistre, que ne faict celuy, contre qui vous l'estes: car il touche la malignité de vostre courage, par voz mains, sans desadueu, sans obiect. Mais il vous employe, tout ainsi qu'on faict les hommes perdus, aux executions de la haute iustice: charge autant vtile, comme elle est peu honneste. Outre la vilité de telles commissions, il y a de la prostitution de conscience.

La fille à Seïanus ne pouuant estre punie à mort, en certaine forme de iugement à Rome, d'autant qu'elle estoit vierge, fut, pour donner passage aux loix, forcee par le bourreau, auant qu'il l'estranglast. Non sa main seulement, mais son ame, est esclaue à la commodité publique.

3.1.25 Quand le premier Amurath, pour aigrir la punition contre ses subiects, qui auoient donné support à la parricide rebellion de son fils, ordonna, que leurs plus proches parents presteroient la main à cette execution: ie trouue tres-honeste à aucuns d'iceux, d'auoir choisi plustost, d'estre iniustement tenus coulpables du parricide d'vn autre, que de seruir la iustice de leur propre parricide. Et où en quelques bicoques forcees de mon temps, i'ay veu des coquins, pour garantir leur vie, accepter de pendre leurs amis et consorts, ie les ay tenus de pire condition que les pendus.

On dit que Vuitolde Prince de Lituanie, introduisit en cette nation, que le criminel condamné à mort, eust luy presence she cut open the murderer's belly and, while it was still warm, groped with her hands, tore out his heart and threw it to the dogs to eat.

ENGLISH

Even to worthless men it is so sweet, once they have drawn the profit from a vicious action, to be able henceforth to stitch onto it, in complete safety, some touch of goodness and justice, as a kind of compensation and correction of conscience. Besides, they regard the agents of such horrible crimes as people who reproach them with those crimes, and they seek by their death to stifle the knowledge and evidence of such dealings.

Now if by chance you are rewarded for it, so as not to cheat the public need of this extreme and desperate remedy, the man who rewards you still holds you, unless he is one himself, for an accursed and execrable man. He holds you more a traitor than does the man you betray; for he touches the wickedness of your heart with his own hands, with nothing to deny it, nothing to stand in the way. But he employs you just as desperate men are employed to carry out sentences of death: a post as useful as it is dishonorable. Besides the baseness of such commissions, there is a prostitution of conscience in them.

The daughter of Sejanus could not be put to death under a certain form of judgment in Rome, because she was a virgin; so, to let the laws take their course, she was raped by the executioner before he strangled her. Not only his hand but his soul is a slave to public convenience.[20]

When Murad I, to sharpen the punishment of his subjects who had supported his son's parricidal rebellion, ordered that their nearest relatives should lend a hand in the execution, I find it most honorable in some of them to have chosen to be unjustly held guilty of another's parricide rather than serve justice by a parricide of their own. And where, in some small forts taken by storm in my time, I have seen scoundrels agree to hang their friends and comrades to save their own lives, I have held them to be in a worse condition than the men they hanged.[21]

They say that Vytautas, Prince of Lithuania, introduced into that nation the rule that a criminal con-

20 Sejanus, Tiberius's chief minister, was executed in AD 31; Tacitus records his young daughter's fate.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
mesme de sa main, à se deffaire: trouuant estrange, qu'vn tiers innocent de la faute, fust employé et chargé d'vn homicide.	demned to death should do away with himself with his own hand, finding it strange that a third party, innocent of the offense, should be employed and burdened with a homicide.[22]

WHEN NECESSITY OVERRIDES FAITH

A prince forced to break his word acts from misfortune, not virtue, and should grieve over it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.1.26 Le Prince, quand vne vrgente circonstance, et quelque impetueux et inopiné accident, du besoing de son estat, luy fait gauchir sa parolle et sa foy, ou autrement le iette hors de son deuoir ordinaire, doibt attribuer cette necessité, à vn coup de la verge diuine. Vice n'est-ce pas, car il a quitté sa raison, à vne plus vniuerselle et puissante raison: mais certes c'est malheur. De maniere qu'à quelqu'vn qui me demandoit: Quel remede? nul remede, fis-ie, s'il fut veritablement gehenné entre ces deux extremes (sed videat ne quæratur latebra periurio) il le falloit faire: mais s'il le fit, sans regret, s'il ne luy greua de le faire, c'est signe que sa conscience est en mauuais termes.	When an urgent circumstance, some violent and unforeseen event arising from the needs of his state, makes a prince bend his word and his faith, or otherwise throws him out of his ordinary duty, he must attribute that necessity to a stroke of the divine rod. It is not vice, for he has given up his own reason for a more universal and powerful reason; but it is certainly misfortune. So when someone asked me, "What remedy?" "No remedy," I said. "If he was truly racked between these two extremes (but let him take care not to seek a pretext for perjury), he had to do it. But if he did it without regret, if it did not grieve him to do it, that is a sign that his conscience is in a bad way."
Quand il s'en trouueroit quelqu'vn de si tendre conscience, à qui nulle guarison ne semblast digne d'vn si poisant remede, ie ne l'en estimeroy pas moins. Il ne se sçauroit perdre plus excusablement et decemment. Nous ne pouuons pas tout. Ainsi comme ainsi nous faut-il souuent, comme à la derniere anchre, remettre la protection de nostre vaisseau à la pure conduitte du ciel. A quelle plus iuste necessité se reserue il? Que luy est-il moins possible à faire que ce qu'il ne peut faire, qu'aux despens de sa foy et de son honneur? choses, qui à l'auenture luy doiuent estre plus cheres que son propre salut, et que le salut de son peuple.	If there were someone of so tender a conscience that no cure seemed to him worth so heavy a remedy, I would not esteem him the less for it. He could not be ruined more excusably and decently. We cannot do everything. Be that as it may, we must often, as with our last anchor, commit the protection of our ship to the guidance of heaven alone. For what more just necessity is he saving himself? What is less possible for him to do than what he can do only at the expense of his faith and his honor—things that perhaps ought to be dearer to him than his own safety, and than the safety of his people?
Quand les bras croisez il appellera Dieu simplement à son aide, n'aura-il pas à esperer, que la diuine bonté n'est pour refuser la faueur de sa main extraordinaire à vne main pure et iuste? Ce sont dangereux exemples, rares, et maladifues exceptions, à nos regles naturelles: il y faut ceder, mais auec grande moderation et circonspection. Aucune vtilité priuee, n'est digne pour laquelle nous facions cet effort à nostre conscience: la publique bien, lors qu'elle est et tres-apparente, et tres-importante.	When, with folded arms, he simply calls on God for help, may he not hope that divine goodness will not refuse the favor of its extraordinary hand to a hand that is pure and just? These are dangerous examples, rare and sickly exceptions to our natural rules. We must yield to them, but with great moderation and circumspection. No private advantage is worth our doing this violence to our conscience; the public advantage is, when it is both very evident and very important.

21 Murad I, Ottoman sultan (reigned 1362–1389), put down a revolt by his son Savcı.
22 Vytautas the Great, Grand Duke of Lithuania (died 1430).

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.1.27 Timoleon se garantit à propos, de l'estrangeté de son exploit, par les larmes qu'il rendit, se souuenant que c'estoit d'vne main fraternelle qu'il auoit tué le tyran. Et cela pinça iustement sa conscience, qu'il eust esté necessité d'achetter l'vtilité publique, à tel prix de l'honnesteté de ses mœurs. Le Senat mesme deliuré de seruitude par son moyen, n'osa rondement decider d'vn si haut faict, et deschiré en deux si poisants et contraires visages.

Timoleon fittingly cleared himself of the strangeness of his deed by the tears he shed, remembering that it was with a brother's hand that he had killed the tyrant. And it rightly pricked his conscience that he had been forced to buy the public good at such a cost to the integrity of his conduct. Even the Senate, freed from servitude by his means, dared not decide outright on so lofty a deed, torn between two such weighty and contrary aspects.

Mais les Syracusains ayans tout à point, à l'heure mesme, enuoyé requerir les Corinthiens de leur protection, et d'vn chef digne de restablir leur ville en sa premiere dignité, et nettoyer la Sicile de plusieurs tyranneaux, qui l'oppressoient: il y deputa Timoleon, auec cette nouuelle deffaitte et declaration: Que selon qu'il se porteroit bien ou mal en sa charge, leur arrest prendroit party, à la faueur du liberateur de son païs, ou à la desfaueur du meurtrier de son frere. Cette fantastique conclusion, a quelque excuse, sur le danger de l'exemple et importance d'vn faict si diuers. Et feirent bien, d'en descharger leur iugement, ou de l'appuier ailleurs, et en des considerations tierces.

But the Syracusans, at that very moment and most opportunely, had sent to ask the Corinthians for their protection and for a leader fit to restore their city to its former dignity and to rid Sicily of several petty tyrants who were oppressing it. The Senate sent Timoleon there, with this novel evasion and declaration: that according to whether he conducted himself well or badly in his charge, their verdict would come down in favor of the liberator of his country or against the murderer of his brother. This fanciful conclusion has some excuse, given the danger of the example and the weight of so ambiguous a deed. And they did well to relieve their judgment of it, or to rest it elsewhere, on outside considerations.

Or les deportements de Timoleon en ce voyage rendirent bien tost sa cause plus claire, tant il s'y porta dignement et vertueusement, en toutes façons. Et le bon heur qui l'accompagna aux aspretez qu'il eut à vaincre en cette noble besongne, sembla luy estre enuoyé par les Dieux conspirants et fauorables à sa iustification.

Now Timoleon's conduct on this expedition soon made his cause clearer, so worthily and virtuously did he bear himself in every way. And the good fortune that attended him through the hardships he had to overcome in this noble task seemed to have been sent to him by the gods, conspiring and favorable to his justification.

3.1.28 La fin de cettuy cy est excusable, si aucune le pouuoit estre. Mais le profit de l'augmentation du reuenu publique, qui seruit de pretexte au Senat Romain à cette orde conclusion, que ie m'en vay reciter, n'est pas assez fort pour mettre à garand vne telle iniustice. Certaines citez s'estoient rachetees à prix d'argent, et remises en liberté, auec l'ordonnance et permission du Senat, des mains de L. Sylla. La chose estant tombee en nouueau iugement, le Senat les condamna à estre taillables comme auparauant: et que l'argent qu'elles auoyent employé pour se rachetter, demeureroit perdu pour elles. Les guerres ciuiles produisent souuent ces vilains exemples: Que nous punissons les priuez, de ce qu'ils nous ont creu, quand nous estions autres.

This man's aim is excusable, if any could be. But the profit of increasing the public revenue, which served the Roman Senate as a pretext for the foul decision I am about to relate, is not strong enough to warrant such an injustice. Certain cities had bought back their freedom for money from L. Sulla, by order and with the permission of the Senate. When the matter came up for judgment again, the Senate condemned them to pay tribute as before, and ruled that the money they had spent to buy themselves back would remain lost to them. Civil wars often produce these vile examples: we punish private persons for having believed us when we were different.

Et vn mesme magistrat fait porter la peine de son changement, à qui n'en peut mais. Le maistre foitte son

And the same magistrate makes those who can do nothing about it bear the penalty for his change.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

disciple de docilité, et la guide son aueugle. Horrible image de iustice.

The master whips his pupil for being docile, and the guide his blind man for following. A horrible image of justice.

3.1.29 Il y a des regles en la philosophie et faulses et molles. L'exemple qu'on nous propose, pour faire preualoir l'vtilité priuee, à la foy donnee, ne reçoit pas assez de poids par la circonstance qu'ils y meslent. Des voleurs vous ont prins, ils vous ont remis en liberté, ayans retiré de vous serment du paiement de certaine somme. On a tort de dire, qu'vn homme de bien, sera quitte de sa foy, sans payer, estant hors de leurs mains. Il n'en est rien. Ce que la crainte m'a fait vne fois vouloir, ie suis tenu de le vouloir encore sans crainte. Et quand elle n'aura forcé que ma langue, sans la volonté: encore suis ie tenu de faire la maille bonne de ma parole.

There are rules in philosophy that are both false and soft. The example put to us to make private advantage prevail over a pledged word does not gain enough weight from the circumstance they mix into it. Robbers have captured you; they have set you free after extracting an oath from you to pay a certain sum. It is wrong to say that a good man will be released from his word without paying, once he is out of their hands. Not at all. What fear once made me will, I am bound to will still without fear. And even if fear forced only my tongue, without my will, I am still bound to make good my word to the last penny.

Pour moy, quand par fois ell'a inconsiderément deuancé ma pensee, i'ay faict conscience de la desaduoüer pourtant. Autrement de degré en degré, nous viendrons à abolir tout le droit qu'vn tiers prend de nos promesses. Quasi verò forti viro vis possit adhiberi. En cecy seulement a loy, l'interest priué, de nous excuser de faillir à nostre promesse, si nous auons promis chose meschante, et inique de soy. Car le droit de la vertu doibt preualoir le droit de nostre obligation.

For my part, when my tongue has sometimes thoughtlessly run ahead of my thought, I have still made it a matter of conscience not to disown it. Otherwise, step by step, we will come to abolish all the right a third party gains from our promises. As if indeed force could be applied to a brave man. Private interest has the right to excuse us for failing in our promise in this case only: if we have promised something wicked and unjust in itself. For the right of virtue must prevail over the right of our obligation.

EPAMINONDAS AGAIN

Epaminondas shows that even in war some things remain unlawful against an enemy.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.1.30 I'ay autrefois logé Epaminondas au premier rang des hommes excellens: et ne m'en desdy pas. Iusques où montoit-il la consideration de son particulier deuoir? qui ne tua iamais homme qu'il eust vaincu: qui pour ce bien inestimable, de rendre la liberté à son païs, faisoit conscience de tuer vn tyran, ou ses complices, sans les formes de la iustice: et qui iugeoit meschant homme, quelque bon citoyen qu'il fust, celuy qui entre les ennemis, et en la bataille, n'espargnoit son amy et son hoste. Voyla vne ame de riche composition. Il marioit aux plus rudes et violentes actions humaines, la bonté et l'humanité, voire la plus delicate, qui se treuue en l'escole de la philosophie.

I once placed Epaminondas in the first rank of excellent men, and I do not take it back. To what heights did he carry his regard for his own personal duty? He never killed a man he had defeated. Even for that inestimable good, giving his country back its freedom, he scrupled to kill a tyrant or his accomplices without the forms of justice. And he judged a wicked man, however good a citizen he might be, anyone who, among the enemy and in battle, did not spare his friend and his host. There is a soul of rich composition. He wedded to the roughest and most violent of human actions goodness and humanity—indeed the most delicate kind to be found in the school of philosophy.

Ce courage si gros, enflé, et obstiné contre la douleur, la mort, la pauureté, estoit-ce nature, ou art, qui l'eust

That courage, so great, so swollen and stubborn against pain, death and poverty—was it nature or attendry, iusques au poinct d'vne si extreme douceur, et debonnaireté de complexion? Horrible de fer et de sang, il va fracassant et rompant vne nation inuincible contre tout autre, que contre luy seul: et gauchit au milieu d'vne telle meslee, au rencontre de son hoste et de son amy. Vrayment celuy là proprement commandoit bien à la guerre, qui luy faisoit souffrir le mors de la benignité, sur le point de sa plus forte chaleur: ainsin enflammee qu'elle estoit, et toute escumeuse de fureur et de meurtre.

FRENCH

C'est miracle, de pouuoir mesler à telles actions quelque image de iustice: mais il n'appartient qu'à la roideur d'Epaminondas, d'y pouuoir mesler la douceur et la facilité des mœurs les plus molles, et la pure innocence. Et où l'vn dit aux Mammertins, que les statuts n'auoient point de mise enuers les hommes armez: l'autre, au Tribun du peuple, que le temps de la iustice, et de la guerre estoient deux: le tiers, que le bruit des armes l'empeschoit d'entendre la voix des loix: cettuy-cy n'estoit pas seulement empesché d'entendre celles de la ciuilité, et pure courtoisie. Auoit-il pas emprunté de ses ennemis, l'vsage de sacrifier aux Muses, allant à la guerre, pour destremper par leur douceur et gayeté, cette furie et aspreté martiale?

Ne craignons point apres vn si grand precepteur, d'estimer qu'il y a quelque chose illicite contre les ennemys mesmes: que l'interest commun ne doibt pas tout requerir de tous, contre l'interest priué: manente memoria, etiam in dissidio publicorum fœderum, priuati iuris: Et nulla potentia vires / Præstandi, ne quid peccet amicus, habet: et que toutes choses ne sont pas loisibles à vn homme de bien, pour le seruice de son Roy, ny de la cause generale et des loix. Non enim patria præstat omnibus officijs, et ipsi conducit pios habere ciues in parentes. C'est vne instruction propre au temps.

Nous n'auons que faire de durcir nos courages par ces lames de fer, c'est assez que nos espaules le soyent: c'est assez de tramper nos plumes en ancre, sans les tramper en sang. Si c'est grandeur de courage, et l'effect d'vne vertu rare et singuliere, de mespriser l'amitié, les obligations priuees, sa parolle, et la parenté, pour le bien commun, et obeïssance du magistrat: c'est assez art that had softened it to the point of such extreme gentleness and kindness of temperament? Terrible with iron and blood, he goes smashing and shattering a nation invincible against anyone but him alone; and in the midst of such a fray he swerves aside when he meets his host and his friend. Truly, that man was properly in command of war who made it bear the bit of kindness at the moment of its greatest heat, inflamed as it was and all foaming with fury and slaughter.

ENGLISH

It is a miracle to be able to mix some image of justice into such actions; but it belongs only to the firmness of Epaminondas to be able to mix into them the gentleness and ease of the mildest manners, and pure innocence. One man told the Mamertines that statutes had no currency with armed men; another told the tribune of the people that the time for justice and the time for war were two different things; a third said that the din of arms kept him from hearing the voice of the laws. This man was not even kept from hearing the voice of civility and pure courtesy. Had he not borrowed from his enemies the custom of sacrificing to the Muses when going to war, to temper that martial fury and harshness with their sweetness and gaiety?[23]

After so great a teacher, let us not be afraid to hold that there is something unlawful even against enemies; that the common interest must not demand everything of everyone against private interest: the memory of private right remaining even amid the rupture of public treaties: And no power has the strength / To warrant a friend in doing wrong; and that not everything is permissible to a good man in the service of his king, or of the general cause and of the laws. For our country does not take precedence over all other duties, and it is to its own advantage to have citizens who are dutiful toward their parents. This is a lesson suited to our times.[24]

We have no need to harden our hearts with these iron plates; it is enough that our shoulders are armored. It is enough to dip our pens in ink without dipping them in blood. If it is greatness of courage, and the effect of a rare and singular virtue, to despise friendship, private obligations, one's word and kinship for the common good and obedience

23 The three are Pompey, Julius Caesar and Marius, in anecdotes told by Plutarch; the enemies are the Spartans.
24 The verse lines are from Ovid, Letters from Pontus.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	vrayement pour nous en excuser, que c'est vne grandeur, qui ne peut loger en la grandeur du courage d'Epaminondas.	to the magistrate, truly it is excuse enough for us that this is a greatness that could find no room in the greatness of Epaminondas's courage.
3.1.31	I'abomine les exhortemens enragez, de cette autre ame desreglee, Dum tela micant, non vos pietatis imago Vlla, nec aduersa conspecti fronte parentes Commoueant, vultus gladio turbate verendos. Ostons aux meschants naturels, et sanguinaires, et traistres, ce pretexte de raison: laissons là cette iustice enorme, et hors de soy: et nous tenons aux plus humaines imitations. Combien peut le temps et l'exemple? En vne rencontre de la guerre ciuile contre Cinna, vn soldat de Pompeius, ayant tué sans y penser son frere, qui estoit au party contraire, se tua sur le champ soy-mesme, de honte et de regret. Et quelques annees apres, en vne autre guerre ciuile de ce mesme peuple, vn soldat, pour auoir tué son frere, demanda recompense à ses capitaines.	I abhor the frenzied exhortations of that other unruly soul: While the weapons flash, let no image of filial love, Nor the sight of your fathers facing you in the opposing line, Move you: slash with the sword those faces you should revere. Let us take this pretext of reason away from wicked, bloodthirsty and treacherous natures. Let us leave aside that monstrous justice, which is out of its mind, and hold to the most humane models. How much time and example can do! In one engagement of the civil war against Cinna, a soldier of Pompeius who had unwittingly killed his brother, who was on the other side, killed himself on the spot from shame and grief. And some years later, in another civil war of this same people, a soldier demanded a reward from his captains for having killed his brother.[25]
3.1.32	On argumente mal l'honneur et la beauté d'vne action, par son vtilité: et conclud-on mal, d'estimer que chacun y soit obligé, et qu'elle soit honeste à chacun, si elle est vtile. Omnia non pariter rerum sunt omnibus apta. Choisissons la plus necessaire et plus vtile de l'humaine societé, ce sera le mariage. Si est-ce que le conseil des saincts, trouue le contraire party plus honeste, et en exclut la plus venerable vacation des hommes: comme nous assignons au haras, les bestes qui sont de moindre estime.	It is bad reasoning to argue the honor and beauty of an action from its usefulness. It is also a bad conclusion to think that everyone is obliged to it, and that it is honorable for everyone, if it is useful. All things are not equally fitting for all. Let us choose the most necessary and most useful institution of human society: that will be marriage. And yet the counsel of the saints finds the opposite course more honorable, and excludes from marriage the most venerable calling among men, just as we put the animals of least value out to stud.[26]

25 Lucan, Pharsalia 7.320–322, from Caesar's speech to his troops before Pharsalus. Both soldiers' stories are told by Tacitus, Histories 3.51; Cinna was opposed by Pompeius Strabo in 87 BC.
26 Propertius, Elegies 3.9.7. The "most venerable calling" is the priesthood, bound to celibacy.

III.2 Of Repentance

Du repentir

Montaigne portrays himself as ever-changing and argues that true repentance must reach the self, not just regret particular acts.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.2.1 LES autres forment l'homme, ie le recite: et en represente vn particulier, bien mal formé; et lequel si i'auoy à façonner de nouueau, ie ferois vrayement bien autre qu'il n'est: mes-huy c'est fait. Or les traits de ma peinture, ne se fouruoyent point, quoy qu'ils se changent et diuersifient. Le monde n'est qu'vne branloire perenne. Toutes choses y branlent sans cesse, la terre, les rochers du Caucase, les pyramides d'Ægypte: et du branle public, et du leur. La constance mesme n'est autre chose qu'vn branle plus languissant. Ie ne puis asseurer mon obiect: il va trouble et chancelant, d'vne yuresse naturelle. Ie le prens en ce poinct, comme il est, en l'instant que ie m'amuse à luy.

Ie ne peinds pas l'estre, ie peinds le passage: non vn passage d'aage en autre, ou comme dict le peuple, de sept en sept ans, mais de iour en iour, de minute en minute. Il faut accommoder mon histoire à l'heure. Ie pourray tantost changer, non de fortune seulement, mais aussi d'intention. C'est vn contrerolle de diuers et muables accidens, et d'imaginations irresoluës, et quand il y eschet, contraires: soit que ie sois autre moy-mesme, soit que ie saisisse les subiects, par autres circonstances, et considerations. Tant y a que ie me contredis bien à l'aduanture, mais la verité, comme disoit Demades, ie ne la contredy point.

Si mon ame pouuoit prendre pied, ie ne m'essaierois pas, ie me resoudrois: elle est tousiours en apprentissage, et en espreuue.

Others form man; I tell of him, and portray a particular one, very badly formed. If I had to fashion him anew, I would truly make him very different from what he is. But by now it is done. Still, the strokes of my portrait do not go astray, though they change and vary. The world is nothing but a perpetual see-saw. All things in it are constantly swaying: the earth, the rocks of the Caucasus, the pyramids of Egypt, both with the common motion and with their own. Constancy itself is nothing but a more languid swaying. I cannot keep my subject still. It goes along muddled and staggering, with a natural drunkenness. I take it at this point, as it is, at the moment I give it my attention.

I do not portray being; I portray passing: not a passing from one age to another, or, as the people say, from seven years to seven years, but from day to day, from minute to minute. I must suit my story to the hour. I may soon change, not only by fortune but also by intention. This is a record of various and changeable occurrences, and of notions that are unsettled and, when it so happens, contradictory, whether because I myself am different or because I grasp my subjects in other circumstances and from other points of view. At any rate, I may well contradict myself now and then; but the truth, as Demades said, I do not contradict.

If my soul could find its footing, I would not be trying myself out; I would be making up my mind. It is always in apprenticeship and on trial.

3.2.2 Ie propose vne vie basse, et sans lustre. C'est tout vn. On attache aussi bien toute la philosophie morale, à vne vie populaire et priuee, qu'à vne vie de plus riche estoffe. Chaque homme porte la forme entiere, de l'humaine condition. Les autheurs se communiquent au peuple par quelque marque speciale et estrangere: moy le premier, par mon estre vniuersel: comme, Michel de Montaigne: non comme grammairien ou poëte, ou iurisconsulte. Si le

I set forth a humble life, without luster. It makes no difference. You can attach the whole of moral philosophy to a common and private life just as well as to a life of richer stuff. Every man bears the whole form of the human condition. Authors communicate with the public through some special and extraneous mark. I am the first to do so through my universal being, as Michel de Mon-monde se plaint dequoy ie parle trop de moy, ie me plains dequoy il ne pense seulement pas à soy. Mais est-ce raison, que si particulier en vsage, ie pretende me rendre public en cognoissance?

FRENCH

Est-il aussi raison, que ie produise au monde, où la façon et l'art ont tant de credit et de commandement, des effects de nature et crus et simples, et d'vne nature encore bien foiblette? Est-ce pas faire vne muraille sans pierre, ou chose semblable, que de bastir des liures sans science? Les fantasies de la musique, sont conduites par art, les miennes par sort. Aumoins i'ay cecy selon la discipline, que iamais homme ne traicta subiect, qu'il entendist ne cogneust mieux, que ie fay celuy que i'ay entrepris: et qu'en celuy là ie suis le plus sçauant homme qui viue.

Secondement, que iamais aucun ne penetra en sa matiere plus auant, ny en esplucha plus distinctement les membres et suittes: et n'arriua plus exactement et plus plainement, à la fin qu'il s'estoit proposé à sa besongne. Pour la parfaire, ie n'ay besoing d'y apporter que la fidelité: celle-là y est, la plus sincere et pure qui se trouue. Ie dy vray, non pas tout mon saoul: mais autant que ie l'ose dire. Et l'ose vn peu plus en vieillissant: car il semble que la coustume concede à cet aage, plus de liberté de bauasser, et d'indiscretion à parler de soy. Il ne peut aduenir icy, ce que ie voy aduenir souuent, que l'artizan et sa besongne se contrarient.

Vn homme de si honneste conuersation, a-t-il faict vn si sot escrit? Ou, des escrits si sçauans, sont-ils partis d'vn homme de si foible conuersation? Qui a vn entretien commun, et ses escrits rares: c'est à dire, que sa capacité est en lieu d'où il l'emprunte, et non en luy. Vn personnage sçauant n'est pas sçauant par tout. Mais le suffisant est par tout suffisant, et à ignorer mesme. Icy nous allons conformément, et tout d'vn train, mon liure et moy. Ailleurs, on peut recommander et accuser l'ouurage, à part de l'ouurier: icy non: qui touche l'vn, touche l'autre. Celuy qui en iugera sans le congnoistre, se fera plus de tort qu'à moy: celuy qui l'aura cogneu, m'a du tout satisfaict.

Heureux outre mon merite, si i'ay seulement cette part à l'approbation publique, que ie face sentir aux gens d'entendement, que i'estoy capable de faire mon profit de taigne, not as a grammarian or a poet or a jurist. If the world complains that I speak too much of myself, I complain that it does not even think of itself. But is it reasonable that I, so private in my way of life, should claim to make myself known to the public?

ENGLISH

Is it reasonable, too, that I should set before the world, where fashion and art have so much credit and command, products of nature that are crude and simple, and of a nature that is rather feeble at that? Is it not like making a wall without stone, or something of the kind, to build books without learning? The fantasias of music are guided by art; my fancies, by chance. At least I have this much according to the rules: that no man ever treated a subject he understood and knew better than I do the one I have undertaken, and that in this subject I am the most learned man alive.

Second, that no one ever went deeper into his material, or picked apart its parts and consequences more distinctly, or reached more exactly and fully the goal he had set for his work. To complete it, I need bring to it only faithfulness, and that is there, the most sincere and pure to be found. I speak the truth, not my fill of it, but as much as I dare to speak. And I dare a little more as I grow old, for it seems that custom grants this age more freedom to babble and more indiscretion in talking about oneself. What I often see happen cannot happen here: that the craftsman and his work contradict each other.

Has a man so decent in conversation written so foolish a book? Or have such learned writings come from a man so feeble in conversation? If a man's talk is commonplace and his writings exceptional, that means his ability lies in the place he borrows it from, and not in himself. A learned man is not learned in everything; but the able man is able in everything, even in being ignorant. Here we go in step and at the same pace, my book and I. Elsewhere one can commend or condemn the work apart from the workman; not here: whoever touches the one touches the other. He who judges it without knowing it will do more wrong to himself than to me; he who has come to know it has satisfied me completely.

I shall be happy beyond my deserts if I have only this share of public approval: that I make men of understanding feel that I would have been capable la science, si i'en eusse eu: et que ie meritoy que la memoire me secourust mieux.	of profiting from learning, if I had had any, and that I deserved better help from my memory.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH

WHY I RARELY REPENT

True vice brings its own repentance, and a good conscience its own reward.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.2.3	Excusons icy ce que ie dy souuent, que ie me repens rarement, et que ma conscience se contente de soy: non comme de la conscience d'vn ange, ou d'vn cheual, mais comme de la conscience d'vn homme. Adioustant tousiours ce refrein, non vn refrein de ceremonie, mais de naifue et essentielle submission: Que ie parle enquerant et ignorant, me rapportant de la resolution, purement et simplement, aux creances communes et legitimes. Ie n'enseigne point, ie raconte.	Let me excuse here what I often say, that I rarely repent and that my conscience is content with itself, not as the conscience of an angel or of a horse, but as the conscience of a man. I always add this refrain, not a refrain of ceremony but of genuine and essential submission: that I speak as one who inquires and does not know, referring the decision purely and simply to the common and lawful beliefs. I do not teach; I tell.
3.2.4	Il n'est vice veritablement vice, qui n'offence, et qu'vn iugement entier n'accuse. Car il a de la laideur et incommodité si apparente, qu'à l'aduanture ceux-là ont raison, qui disent, qu'il est principalement produict par bestise et ignorance: tant est-il mal-aisé d'imaginer qu'on le cognoisse sans le haïr. La malice hume la pluspart de son propre venin, et s'en empoisonne. Le vice laisse comme vn vlcere en la chair, vne repentance en l'ame, qui tousiours s'esgratigne, et s'ensanglante elle mesme. Car la raison efface les autres tristesses et douleurs, mais elle engendre celle de la repentance: qui est plus griefue, d'autant qu'elle naist au dedans: comme le froid et le chaud des fiéures est plus poignant, que celuy qui vient du dehors.	There is no vice truly a vice that does not offend, and that a sound judgment does not condemn. For its ugliness and harmfulness are so evident that perhaps those are right who say it is chiefly produced by stupidity and ignorance, so hard is it to imagine that anyone could know it without hating it. Wickedness sucks up most of its own venom and poisons itself with it. Vice leaves in the soul, like an ulcer in the flesh, a repentance that is always scratching itself and making itself bleed. For reason wipes out other sadnesses and sorrows, but it engenders that of repentance, which is the more grievous because it is born within, just as the cold and heat of fevers are sharper than those that come from outside.
	Ie tiens pour vices, mais chacun selon sa mesure, non seulement ceux que la raison et la nature condamnent, mais ceux aussi que l'opinion des hommes a forgé, voire fauce et erronee, si les loix et l'vsage l'auctorise.	I count as vices (but each according to its measure) not only those that reason and nature condemn, but also those that the opinion of men has forged, even false and mistaken opinion, if laws and usage give it authority.
3.2.5	Il n'est pareillement bonté, qui ne resiouysse vne nature bien nee. Il y a certes ie ne sçay quelle congratulation, de bien faire, qui nous resiouit en nous mesmes, et vne fierté genereuse, qui accompagne la bonne conscience. Vne ame courageusement vitieuse, se peut à l'aduenture garnir de securité: mais de cette complaisance et satisfaction, elle ne s'en peut fournir.	Likewise, there is no goodness that does not gladden a wellborn nature. There is indeed a certain self-congratulation in doing well that gladdens us within, and a noble pride that goes with a good conscience. A boldly vicious soul may perhaps arm itself with a sense of security; but this contentment and satisfaction it cannot supply for itself.
	Ce n'est pas vn leger plaisir, de se sentir preserué de la contagion d'vn siecle si gasté, et de dire en soy: Qui me verroit iusques dans l'ame, encore ne me trouueroit-il	It is no slight pleasure to feel oneself preserved from the contagion of so corrupt an age, and to say to oneself: "Whoever could see right into my soul coupable, ny de l'affliction et ruyne de personne: ny de vengeance ou d'enuie, ny d'offence publique des loix: ny de nouuelleté et de trouble: ny de faute à ma parole: et quoy que la licence du temps permist et apprinst à chacun, si n'ay-ie mis la main ny és biens, ny en la bourse d'homme François, et n'ay vescu que sur la mienne non plus en guerre qu'en paix: ny ne me suis seruy du trauail de personne, sans loyer.

FRENCH

Ces tesmoignages de la conscience, plaisent, et nous est grand benefice que cette esiouyssance naturelle: et le seul payement qui iamais ne nous manque.

3.2.6 De fonder la recompence des actions vertueuses, sur l'approbation d'autruy, c'est prendre vn trop incertain et trouble fondement, signamment en vn siecle corrompu et ignorant, comme cettuy cy: la bonne estime du peuple est iniurieuse. A qui vous fiez vous, de veoir ce qui est louable? Dieu me garde d'estre homme de bien, selon la description que ie voy faire tous les iours par honneur, à chacun de soy. Quæ fuerant vitià, mores sunt. Tels de mes amis, ont par fois entreprins de me chapitrer et mercurializer à cœur ouuert, ou de leur propre mouuement, ou semons par moy, comme d'vn office, qui à vne ame bien faicte, non en vtilité seulement, mais en douceur aussi, surpasse tous les offices de l'amitié.

Ie l'ay tousiours accueilli des bras de la courtoisie et recognoissance, les plus ouuerts. Mais, à en parler à cette heure en conscience, i'ay souuent trouué en leurs reproches et louanges, tant de fauce mesure, que ie n'eusse guere failly, de faillir plustost, que de bien faire à leur mode. Nous autres principalement, qui viuons vne vie priuee, qui n'est en montre qu'à nous, deuons auoir estably vn patron au dedans, auquel toucher nos actions: et selon iceluy nous caresser tantost, tantost nous chastier. I'ay mes loix et ma cour, pour iuger de moy, et m'y adresse plus qu'ailleurs. Ie restrains bien selon autruy mes actions, mais ie ne les estends que selon moy.

Il n'y a que vous qui sçache si vous estes lâche et cruel, ou loyal et deuotieux: les autres ne vous voyent point, ils vous deuinent par coniectures incertaines: ils voyent, non tant vostre naturel, que vostre art. Par ainsi, ne vous tenez pas à leur sentence, tenez vous à la vostre. Tuo tibi would still not find me guilty of anyone's affliction or ruin, or of vengeance or envy, or of any public offense against the laws, or of innovation and disturbance, or of breaking my word. And whatever the license of the times allowed and taught everyone, I have never laid hands on the goods or the purse of any Frenchman, and have lived on my own purse alone, in war as in peace. Nor have I used anyone's labor without paying for it."

ENGLISH

These testimonies of conscience give pleasure; and this natural rejoicing is a great boon to us, and the only payment that never fails us.

To base the reward of virtuous actions on the approval of others is to choose too uncertain and murky a foundation, especially in a corrupt and ignorant age like this one: the good opinion of the people is an insult. Whom do you trust to see what is praiseworthy? God keep me from being a good man according to the description I see everyone giving of himself every day, to his own honor. What were vices are now morals. Some of my friends have at times undertaken to take me to task and lecture me frankly, either of their own accord or at my invitation, as a service which, to a well-made soul, surpasses all the services of friendship, not only in usefulness but in sweetness too.[1]

I have always welcomed it with the most open arms of courtesy and gratitude. But to speak of it now in all conscience, I have often found such false measure in their reproaches and their praises that I would hardly have erred in erring rather than in doing well their way. We especially, who live a private life that is on show only to ourselves, must have set up a pattern within us against which to test our actions, and by which we now make much of ourselves, now punish ourselves. I have my own laws and my own court to judge me, and I turn to them more than anywhere else. I do restrain my actions according to others, but I extend them only according to myself.

No one but you knows whether you are cowardly and cruel, or loyal and devout. Others do not see you; they guess at you by uncertain conjectures; they see not so much your nature as your art. Therefore do not hold to their verdict; hold to your iudicio est vtendum. Virtutis et vitiorum graue ipsius conscientiæ pondus est: qua sublata, iacent omnia.

1 Seneca, Letters 39.6.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

own. You must use your own judgment. Great is the weight of one's own conscience in matters of virtue and vice: take it away, and everything collapses.[2]

3.2.7 Mais ce qu'on dit, que la repentance suit de pres le peché, ne semble pas regarder le peché qui est en son haut appareil: qui loge en nous comme en son propre domicile. On peut desauouër et desdire les vices, qui nous surprennent, et vers lesquels les passions nous emportent: mais ceux qui par longue habitude, sont enracinez et ancrez en vne volonté forte et vigoureuse, ne sont subiects à contradiction. Le repentir n'est qu'vne desdicte de nostre volonté, et opposition de nos fantasies, qui nous pourmene à tout sens. Il faict desaduouër à celuy-là, sa vertu passee et sa continence. Quæ mens est hodie, cur eadem non puero fuit, / Vel cur his animis incolumes non redeunt genæ?

But the saying that repentance follows close upon sin does not seem to concern sin in its full regalia, sin that lodges in us as in its own home. We can disown and retract the vices that take us by surprise and toward which our passions sweep us. But those that, through long habit, are rooted and anchored in a strong and vigorous will are not open to contradiction. Repentance is nothing but a retraction of our will and a contradiction of our notions, and it leads us about in every direction. It makes this man disown his past virtue and continence: Why did I not have as a boy the mind I have today? / Or why, with this mind, do my smooth cheeks not come back?[3]

ORDER AT HOME

The real test of a life is its private, ordinary conduct, not its public show.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.2.8 C'est vne vie exquise, celle qui se maintient en ordre iusques en son priué. Chacun peut auoir part au battelage, et representer vn honneste personnage en l'eschaffaut: mais au dedans, et en sa poictrine, où tout nous est loisible, où tout est caché, d'y estre reglé, c'est le poinct. Le voysin degré, c'est de l'estre en sa maison, en ses actions ordinaires, desquelles nous n'auons à rendre raison à personne: où il n'y a point d'estude, point d'artifice. Et pourtant Bias peignant vn excellent estat de famille: de laquelle, dit-il, le maistre soit tel au dedans, par luy-mesme, comme il est au dehors, par la crainte de la loy, et du dire des hommes.

It is an exceptional life that keeps itself in order even in private. Anyone can take part in the mountebank show and play a decent character on the stage. But to be well-ordered within, in one's own breast, where everything is permitted to us and everything is hidden: that is the point. The next step is to be so in one's own house, in one's ordinary actions, for which we need give account to no one, where there is no studied effort, no artifice. And so Bias, describing an excellent household, says it is one whose master is the same within, by himself, as he is outside, through fear of the law and of what people say.

Et fut vne digne parole de Iulius Drusus, aux ouuriers qui luy offroient pour trois mille escus, mettre sa maison en tel poinct, que ses voysins n'y auroient plus la veuë qu'ils y auoient: Ie vous en donneray, dit-il, six mille, et faictes que chacun y voye de toutes parts. On remarque auec honneur l'vsage d'Agesilaus, de prendre en voyageant son logis dans les eglises, affin que le peuple, et les Dieux mesmes, vissent dans ses actions priuees. Tel a esté miraculeux au monde, auquel sa femme et son valet n'ont rien veu seulement de remercable. Peu d'hommes ont esté admirez par leurs domestiques. Nul a esté prophete

And it was a worthy remark of Julius Drusus to the workmen who offered, for three thousand crowns, to fix his house so that his neighbors would no longer have the view into it they had: "I will give you six thousand," he said, "and make it so that everyone can see in from every side." Agesilaus' practice is recorded to his honor: when traveling he lodged in temples, so that the people, and the gods themselves, might see into his private actions. Many a man has seemed a marvel to the 2 Both sentences are from Cicero; the second is from On the Nature of the Gods 3.35.

3 Horace, Odes 4.10.7–8.

FRENCH

non seulement en sa maison, mais en son païs, dit l'experience des histoires.

De mesmes aux choses de neant. Et en ce bas exemple, se void l'image des grands. En mon climat de Gascongne, on tient pour drolerie de me veoir imprimé. D'autant que la cognoissance, qu'on prend de moy, s'esloigne de mon giste, i'en vaux d'autant mieux. I'achette les imprimeurs en Guienne: ailleurs ils m'achettent. Sur cet accident se fondent ceux qui se cachent viuants et presents, pour se mettre en credit, trepassez et absents. I'ayme mieux en auoir moins. Et ne me iette au monde, que pour la part que i'en tire. Au partir de là, ie l'en quitte.

Le peuple reconuoye celuy-là, d'vn acte public, auec estonnement, iusqu'à sa porte: il laisse auec sa robbe ce rolle: il en retombe d'autant plus bas, qu'il s'estoit plus haut monté. Au dedans chez luy, tout est tumultuaire et vil. Quand le reglement s'y trouueroit, il faut vn iugement vif et bien trié, pour l'apperceuoir en ces actions basses et priuees. Ioint que l'ordre est vne vertu morne et sombre. Gaigner vne bresche, conduire vne ambassade, regir vn peuple, ce sont actions esclatantes: tancer, rire, vendre, payer, aymer, hayr, et conuerser auec les siens, et auec soy-mesme, doucement et iustement: ne relascher point, ne se desmentir point, c'est chose plus rare, plus difficile, et moins remerquable.

Les vies retirees soustiennent par là, quoy qu'on die, des deuoirs autant ou plus aspres et tendus, que ne font les autres vies. Et les priuez, dit Aristote, seruent la vertu plus difficilement et hautement, que ne font ceux qui sont en magistrat. Nous nous preparons aux occasions eminentes, plus par gloire que par conscience. La plus courte façon d'arriuer à la gloire, ce seroit faire pour la conscience ce que nous faisons pour la gloire. Et la vertu d'Alexandre me semble representer assez moins de vigueur en son theatre, que ne fait celle de Socrates, en cette exercitation basse et obscure. Ie conçois aisément Socrates, en la place d'Alexandre; Alexandre en celle de Socrates, ie ne puis.

Qui demandera à celuy-là, ce qu'il sçait faire, il respondra, Subiuguer le monde: qui le demandera à cettuy-cy, il dira, Mener l'humaine vie conformément à world in whom his wife and his valet saw nothing even remarkable. Few men have been admired by their own households. No one has been a prophet, not only in his own house but in his own country, says the experience of history.[4]

ENGLISH

The same holds in things of no account, and in this lowly example one can see the image of the great. In my region of Gascony, people think it a joke to see me in print. The farther the knowledge of me travels from my lair, the more I am worth. In Guyenne I pay the printers; elsewhere they pay me. This is what those people count on who hide themselves while they are alive and present, in order to win credit once they are dead and absent. I would rather have less of it. I throw myself upon the world only for the share I get out of it. Once I am out of it, we are quits.

The people escort that man back to his door in awe after some public act. He leaves this role behind with his robe, and falls back all the lower for having climbed so high. Within, in his own house, everything is disorderly and base. Even if there were order there, it would take a keen and discriminating judgment to perceive it in these lowly and private actions. Besides, order is a dull and somber virtue. To take a breach, conduct an embassy, govern a people: these are brilliant actions. To scold, laugh, sell, pay, love, hate, and deal gently and justly with one's household and with oneself, not to let oneself go, not to belie oneself: that is rarer, more difficult, and less noticed.

Retired lives therefore carry duties, whatever people say, as harsh and strenuous as other lives do, or more so. And private persons, says Aristotle, serve virtue with more difficulty and in a higher way than those in office. We prepare ourselves for eminent occasions more for glory than for conscience. The shortest way to reach glory would be to do for conscience what we do for glory. And the virtue of Alexander seems to me to show much less vigor on its stage than that of Socrates in his lowly and obscure activity. I can easily imagine Socrates in Alexander's place; Alexander in Socrates', I cannot.

Ask the one what he knows how to do, and he will answer, "Conquer the world"; ask the other, and he will say, "Lead human life in conformity with its

4 Marcus Livius Drusus, Roman tribune (91 BC); both anecdotes are told by Plutarch.

FRENCH

sa naturelle condition: science bien plus generale, plus poisante, et plus legitime.

3.2.9 Le prix de l'ame ne consiste pas à aller haut, mais ordonnément. Sa grandeur ne s'exerce pas en la grandeur: c'est en la mediocrité. Ainsi que ceux qui nous iugent et touchent au dedans, ne font pas grand'recette de la lueur de noz actions publiques: et voyent que ce ne sont que filets et pointes d'eau fine reiallies d'vn fond au demeurant limonneux et poisant. En pareil cas, ceux qui nous iugent par cette braue apparence du dehors, concluent de mesmes de nostre constitution interne: et ne peuuent accoupler des facultez populaires et pareilles aux leurs, à ces autres facultez, qui les estonnent, si loin de leur visee. Ainsi donnons nous aux demons des formes sauuages.

Et qui non à Tamburlan des sourcils esleuez, des nazeaux ouuerts, vn visage afreux, et vne taille desmesuree, comme est la taille de l'imagination qu'il en a conceuë par le bruit de son nom? Qui m'eust faict veoir Erasme autrefois, il eust esté mal-aisé, que ie n'eusse prins pour adages et apophthegmes, tout ce qu'il eust dit à son vallet et à son hostesse. Nous imaginons bien plus sortablement vn artisan sur sa garderobe ou sur sa femme qu'vn grand President, venerable par son maintien et suffisance. Il nous semble que de ces hauts thrones ils ne s'abaissent pas iusques à viure. Comme les ames vicieuses sont incitees souuent à bien faire, par quelque impulsion estrangere? aussi sont les vertueuses à faire mal.

Il les faut doncq iuger par leur estat rassis: quand elles sont chez elles, si quelquefois elles y sont: ou au moins quand elles sont plus voysines du repos, et en leur naifue assiette.

3.2.10 Les inclinations naturelles s'aident et fortifient par institution: mais elles ne se changent gueres et surmontent. Mille natures, de mon temps, ont eschappé vers la vertu, ou vers le vice, au trauers d'vne discipline contraire. Sic vbi desuetæ siluis in carcere clausæ Mansueuêre feræ, et vultus posuere minaces,
Atque hominem didicere pati, si torrida paruus
Venit in ora cruor, redeunt rabiésque furórque,
Admonitæque tument gustato sanguine fauces;
Feruet, et à trepido vix abstinet ira magistro. On n'extirpe pas ces qualitez originelles, on les couure, on les cache. Le langage Latin m'est comme naturel: ie l'entends mieux natural condition": a far more general, weightier, and more legitimate knowledge.

ENGLISH

The worth of the soul consists not in going high, but in going in good order. Its greatness is exercised not in greatness but in the middle range. Those who judge and probe us within make little account of the luster of our public actions, and see that these are only jets and spurts of clear water springing from a bed that is otherwise muddy and heavy. In the same way, those who judge us by this fine outward show draw the same conclusion about our inner constitution, and cannot couple faculties that are ordinary and like their own with those other faculties that astonish them, so far beyond their range of sight. So it is that we give demons wild shapes.

And who does not give Tamburlaine raised eyebrows, flaring nostrils, a frightful face, and an enormous stature, as enormous as the image he has formed of him from the fame of his name? If someone had shown me Erasmus in former days, it would have been hard for me not to take for adages and apophthegms everything he said to his valet and his landlady. We imagine much more fittingly a craftsman on his privy or on his wife than a great presiding judge, venerable for his bearing and ability. It seems to us that from those lofty thrones they do not stoop so low as to live. Just as vicious souls are often incited to do good by some outside impulse, so are virtuous ones to do evil.[5]

So we must judge them in their settled state, when they are at home, if ever they are; or at least when they are nearest to repose and in their natural posture.

Natural inclinations are helped and strengthened by education, but they are hardly ever changed or overcome. A thousand natures in my time have broken away toward virtue or toward vice in spite of a contrary training. So when wild beasts, grown unused to the forests and shut in a cage,
Have become tame, and laid aside their threatening looks,
And learned to put up with man, if a little hot blood
Comes to their burning mouths, their rage and fury return,
And their jaws, reminded by the taste of blood, swell;

5 Erasmus (c. 1466–1536) compiled famous collections of Adages and Apophthegms.

FRENCH

que le François: mais il y a quarante ans, que ie ne m'en suis du tout poinct seruy à parler, ny guere à escrire.

Si est-ce qu'à des extremes et soudaines esmotions, où ie suis tombé, deux ou trois fois en ma vie: et l'vne, voyant mon pere tout sain, se renuerser sur moy pasmé: i'ay tousiours eslancé du fonds des entrailles, les premieres paroles Latines: Nature se sourdant et s'exprimant à force, à l'encontre d'vn si long vsage: et cet exemple se dit d'assez d'autres.

3.2.11 Ceux qui ont essaié de r'auiser les mœurs du monde, de mon temps, par nouuelles opinions, reforment les vices de l'apparence, ceux de l'essence ils les laissent là, s'ils ne les augmentent. Et l'augmentation y est à craindre. On se seiourne volontiers de tout autre bien faire, sur ces reformations externes, de moindre coust et de plus grand merite: et satisfait-on à bon marché par là, les autres vices naturels consubstantiels et intestins. Regardez vn peu, comment s'en porte nostre experience. Il n'est personne, s'il s'escoute, qui ne descouure en soy, vne forme sienne, vne forme maistresse, qui lucte contre l'institution: et contre la tempeste des passions, qui luy sont contraires.

De moy, ie ne me sens gueres agiter par secousse: ie me trouue quasi tousiours en ma place, comme font les corps lourds et poisans. Si ie ne suis chez moy, i'en suis tousiours bien pres: mes desbauches ne m'emportent pas fort loing: il n'y a rien d'extreme et d'estrange: et si ay des rauisemens sains et vigoureux.

3.2.12 La vraye condamnation, et qui touche la commune façon de nos hommes, c'est, que leur retraicte mesme est pleine de corruption, et d'ordure: l'idée de leur amendement chafourree, leur penitence malade, et en coulpe, autant à peu pres que leur peché. Aucuns, ou pour estre collez au vice d'vne attache naturelle, ou par longue accoustumance, n'en trouuent plus la laideur. A d'autres, duquel regiment ie suis, le vice poise, mais ils le contrebalancent auec le plaisir, ou autre occasion: et le souffrent et s'y prestent, à certain prix. Vitieusement pourtant, et laschement. Si se pourroit-il à l'aduanture

ENGLISH

Their anger boils, and barely spares their trembling keeper. These original qualities are not uprooted; they are covered over and hidden. Latin is almost my native tongue; I understand it better than French. But for forty years I have not used it at all for speaking, and hardly at all for writing.[6]

And yet in extreme and sudden emotions, which I have fallen into two or three times in my life (one of them when I saw my father, in perfect health, fall back on me in a faint), the first words I have poured out from the depths of my entrails have always been Latin: Nature welling up and expressing itself by force, against so long a habit. And this example is told of many others.

Those who in my time have tried to correct the world's morals by new opinions reform the vices of appearance; those of essence they leave alone, if they do not increase them. And their increase is to be feared. People readily rest from all other good-doing on these external reforms, which cost less and win more credit; and in this way they cheaply pay off the other vices, which are natural, consubstantial and internal. Just look a little at what our experience shows. There is no one who, if he listens to himself, does not discover in himself a form of his own, a ruling form, that struggles against education and against the storm of the passions that oppose it.

As for me, I hardly feel myself shaken by jolts. I find myself almost always in my place, as heavy and weighty bodies do. If I am not at home, I am always very near it. My excesses do not carry me very far; there is nothing extreme or strange about them. And besides, I have sound and vigorous recoveries.

The true condemnation, and one that applies to the common run of our men, is that even their retreat from vice is full of corruption and filth: their idea of amendment is smudged, their penance diseased and almost as much at fault as their sin. Some, either because they are glued to vice by a natural attachment or through long habit, no longer see its ugliness. For others, of whose regiment I am, vice weighs heavily, but they counterbalance it with pleasure or some other consideration, and put up with it and lend themselves to it

6 Lucan, Pharsalia 4.237–242. Montaigne's father had him taught Latin as his first language (see I.26).

FRENCH

imaginer, si esloignee disproportion de mesure, où auec iustice, le plaisir excuseroit le peché, comme nous disons de l'vtilité.

Non seulement s'il estoit accidental, et hors du peché, comme au larrecin, mais en l'exercice mesme d'iceluy, comme en l'accointance des femmes, où l'incitation est violente, et, dit-on, par fois inuincible. En la terre d'vn mien parent, l'autre iour que i'estois en Armaignac, ie vis vn paisant, que chacun surnomme le Larron.

Il faisoit ainsi le conte de sa vie: Qu'estant nay mendiant, et trouuant, qu'à gaigner son pain au trauail de ses mains, il n'arriueroit iamais à se fortifier assez contre l'indigence, il s'aduisa de se faire larron: et auoit employé à ce mestier toute sa ieunesse, en seureté, par le moyen de sa force corporelle: car il moissonnoit et vendangeoit des terres d'autruy: mais c'estoit au loing, et à si gros monceaux, qu'il estoit inimaginable qu'vn homme en eust tant emporté en vne nuict sur ses espaules: et auoit soing outre cela, d'egaler, et disperser le dommage qu'il faisoit, si que la foule estoit moins importable à chaque particulier.

Il se trouue à cette heure en sa vieillesse, riche pour vn homme de sa condition, mercy à cette trafique: de laquelle il se confesse ouuertement. Et pour s'accommoder auec Dieu, de ses acquests, il dit, estre tous les iours apres à satisfaire par bien-faicts, aux successeurs de ceux qu'il a desrobez: et s'il n'acheue (car d'y pouruoir tout à la fois, il ne peut) qu'il en chargera ses heritiers, à la raison de la science qu'il a luy seul, du mal qu'il a faict à chacun.

Par cette description, soit vraye ou fauce, cettuy-cy regarde le larrecin, comme action des-honneste, et le hayt, mais moins que l'indigence: s'en repent bien simplement, mais en tant qu'elle estoit ainsi contrebalancee et compensee, il ne s'en repent pas. Cela, ce n'est pas cette habitude, qui nous incorpore au vice, et y conforme nostre entendement mesme: ny n'est ce vent impetueux qui va troublant et aueuglant à secousses nostre ame, et nous precipite pour l'heure, iugement et tout, en la puissance du vice.

ENGLISH

at a certain price, viciously, however, and basely. Yet one could perhaps imagine so vast a disproportion of measure that pleasure might justly excuse the sin, as we say of usefulness.

And not only if the pleasure were incidental and separate from the sin, as in theft, but in the very exercise of it, as in intercourse with women, where the urge is violent and, they say, sometimes invincible. On the estate of a kinsman of mine, the other day when I was in Armagnac, I saw a peasant whom everyone nicknames the Thief.

This is how he told the story of his life. Born a beggar, and finding that by earning his bread with the work of his hands he would never manage to arm himself well enough against want, he decided to become a thief. He had spent his whole youth at this trade in safety, thanks to his bodily strength. For he harvested grain and grapes from other people's lands, but far away and in such huge loads that it was unimaginable that one man could have carried off so much on his shoulders in one night. And besides, he took care to even out and spread the damage he did, so that the burden was less unbearable for each individual.

Now, in his old age, he finds himself rich for a man of his station, thanks to this traffic, which he openly confesses. And to make his peace with God over his acquisitions, he says he is busy every day making amends, by good deeds, to the heirs of those he robbed; and if he does not finish (for he cannot provide for it all at once), he will charge his own heirs with it, according to the knowledge, which he alone has, of the harm he did to each.

By this description, whether true or false, this man regards theft as a dishonorable action and hates it, but less than poverty. He repents of it quite simply; but insofar as it was counterbalanced and compensated in this way, he does not repent of it. That is not the habit which incorporates us into vice and conforms even our understanding to it; nor is it that impetuous wind which keeps troubling and blinding our soul in gusts, and hurls us for the moment, judgment and all, into the power of vice.

ALL OF A PIECE

Montaigne cannot repent of what he is, only regret it; he blames fortune, not his choices.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.2.13	Ie fay coustumierement entier ce que ie fay, et marche tout d'vne piece: ie n'ay guere de mouuement qui se cache et desrobe à ma raison, et qui ne se conduise à peu pres, par le consentement de toutes mes parties: sans diuision, sans sedition intestine: mon iugement en a la coulpe, ou la louange entiere: et la coulpe qu'il a vne fois, il l'a tousiours: car quasi dés sa naissance il est vn, mesme inclination, mesme routte, mesme force. Et en matiere d'opinions vniuerselles, dés l'enfance, ie me logeay au poinct où i'auois à me tenir.	Usually I do wholly what I do, and move all in one piece. I have hardly any impulse that hides and steals away from my reason, and that is not guided, more or less, by the consent of all my parts, without division, without internal sedition. My judgment takes the whole blame or the whole praise for it; and the blame it once has, it always has, for almost from its birth it has been one: the same inclination, the same road, the same strength. And on general questions, from childhood I settled at the point where I was to hold.
	Il y a des pechez impetueux, prompts et subits, laissons les à part: mais en ces autres pechez, à tant de fois reprins, deliberez, et consultez, ou pechez de complexion, ou pechez de profession et de vacation: ie ne puis pas conceuoir, qu'ils soient plantez si long temps en vn mesme courage, sans que la raison et la conscience de celuy qui les possede, le vueille constamment, et l'entende ainsin. Et le repentir qu'il se vante luy en venir à certain instant prescript, m'est vn peu dur à imaginer et former. Ie ne suy pas la secte de Pythagoras, que les hommes prennent vne ame nouuelle, quand ils approchent des simulacres des Dieux, pour recueillir leurs oracles.	There are impetuous, prompt and sudden sins; let us leave them aside. But as for those other sins, so many times repeated, deliberated and pondered, whether sins of temperament or sins of profession and calling, I cannot conceive that they can be planted so long in the same heart without the reason and conscience of their possessor constantly willing it and understanding it so. And the repentance which he boasts comes to him at a certain prescribed moment is a little hard for me to imagine and picture. I do not follow the school of Pythagoras, that men take on a new soul when they approach the images of the gods to receive their oracles.
	Sinon qu'il voulust dire cela mesme, qu'il faut bien qu'elle soit estrangere, nouuelle, et prestee pour le temps: la nostre montrant si peu de signe de purification et netteté condigne à cet office.	Unless he meant just this: that it must indeed be a foreign soul, new and lent for the occasion, since ours shows so little sign of a purification and cleanness worthy of that office.
3.2.14	Ils font tout à l'opposite des preceptes Stoiques: qui nous ordonnent bien, de corriger les imperfections et vices que nous recognoissons en nous, mais nous defendent d'en alterer le repos de nostre ame. Ceux-cy nous font à croire, qu'ils en ont grande desplaisance, et remors au dedans, mais d'amendement et correction ny d'interruption, ils ne nous en font rien apparoir. Si n'est-ce pas guerison, si on ne se descharge du mal. Si la repentance pesoit sur le plat de la balance, elle emporteroit le peché. Ie ne trouue aucune qualité si aysee à contrefaire, que la deuotion, si on n'y conforme les mœurs et la vie: son essence est abstruse et occulte, les apparences faciles et pompeuses.	They do just the opposite of the Stoic precepts, which do bid us correct the imperfections and vices we recognize in ourselves, but forbid us to disturb the repose of our soul over them. These people make us believe that they feel great displeasure and remorse within; but of amendment and correction, or even of a pause, they show us nothing. Yet it is no cure if one does not get rid of the disease. If repentance were weighed in the scale, it would outweigh the sin. I find no quality so easy to counterfeit as devoutness, if one does not make one's morals and life conform to it. Its essence is abstruse and hidden; its appearances are easy and showy.
3.2.15

FRENCH

Quant à moy, ie puis desirer en general estre autre: ie puis condamner et me desplaire de ma forme vniuerselle, et supplier Dieu pour mon entiere reformation, et pour l'excuse de ma foiblesse naturelle: mais cela, ie ne le doibs nommer repentir, ce me semble, non plus que le desplaisir de n'estre ny Ange ny Caton. Mes actions sont reglees, et conformes à ce que ie suis, et à ma condition. Ie ne puis faire mieux: et le repentir ne touche pas proprement les choses qui ne sont pas en nostre force: ouy bien le regret. I'imagine infinies natures plus hautes et plus reglees que la mienne.

Ie n'amende pourtant mes facultez: comme ny mon bras, ny mon esprit, ne deuiennent plus vigoureux, pour en conceuoir vn autre qui le soit. Si l'imaginer et desirer vn agir plus noble que le nostre, produisoit la repentance du nostre, nous aurions à nous repentir de nos operations plus innocentes: d'autant que nous iugeons bien qu'en la nature plus excellente, elles auroyent esté conduictes d'vne plus grande perfection et dignité: et voudrions faire de mesme. Lors que ie consulte des deportemens de ma ieunesse auec ma vieillesse, ie trouue que ie les ay communement conduits auec ordre, selon moy. C'est tout ce que peut ma resistance. Ie ne me flatte pas: à circonstances pareilles, ie seroy tousiours tel.

Ce n'est pas macheure, c'est plustost vne teinture vniuerselle qui me tache. Ie ne cognoy pas de repentance superficielle, moyenne, et de ceremonie. Il faut qu'elle me touche de toutes parts, auant que ie la nomme ainsin: et qu'elle pinse mes entrailles, et les afflige autant profondement, que Dieu me voit, et autant vniuersellement.

3.2.16 Quand aux negoces, il m'est eschappé plusieurs bonnes auantures, à faute d'heureuse conduitte: mes conseils ont pourtant bien choisi, selon les occurrences qu'on leur presentoit. Leur façon est de prendre tousiours le plus facile et seur party. Ie trouue qu'en mes deliberations passees, i'ay, selon ma regle, sagement procedé, pour l'estat du subiect qu'on me proposoit: et en ferois autant d'icy à mille ans, en pareilles occasions. Ie ne regarde pas, quel il est à cette heure, mais quel il estoit, quand i'en consultois. La force de tout conseil gist au temps: les occasions et les matieres roulent et changent sans cesse. I'ay encouru quelques lourdes erreurs en ma vie, et importantes: non par faute de bon aduis, mais par faute de bon heur.

ENGLISH

As for me, I may desire in general to be other than I am; I may condemn and dislike my form as a whole, and pray God for my entire reformation and for pardon for my natural weakness. But this, it seems to me, I ought not to call repentance, any more than my displeasure at being neither an angel nor Cato. My actions are regulated by and conform to what I am and to my condition. I cannot do better. And repentance does not properly concern things that are not in our power; regret certainly does. I imagine countless natures loftier and better ordered than mine.

Yet I do not improve my faculties by doing so, just as neither my arm nor my mind becomes more vigorous by imagining another that is. If imagining and desiring a nobler way of acting than ours produced repentance for ours, we would have to repent of our most innocent operations, since we judge well enough that in a more excellent nature they would have been carried out with greater perfection and dignity; and we would want to do the same. When I consult my old age about the conduct of my youth, I find that I generally conducted myself in an orderly way, according to my own lights. That is all my resistance can do. I do not flatter myself: in similar circumstances, I would always be the same.

It is not a smudge; it is rather a universal dye that stains me. I know no repentance that is superficial, middling and ceremonial. It must touch me in every part before I call it that, and it must pinch my entrails and afflict them as deeply as God sees me, and as universally.

As for business, many good opportunities have slipped from me for want of successful handling; yet my decisions chose well, according to the circumstances presented to them. Their way is always to take the easiest and safest course. I find that in my past deliberations I have proceeded wisely, according to my rule, given the state of the matter put before me; and I would do the same a thousand years from now on similar occasions. I do not look at what the matter is now, but at what it was when I was deliberating on it. The force of all counsel lies in its time: occasions and matters roll and change ceaselessly. I have fallen into some gross and important errors in my life, not for lack of good judgment but for lack of good luck.

FRENCH

Il y a des parties secrettes aux obiects, qu'on manie, et indiuinables: signamment en la nature des hommes: des conditions muettes, sans montre, incognues par fois du possesseur mesme: qui se produisent et esueillent par des occasions suruenantes. Si ma prudence ne les a peu penetrer et profetizer, ie ne luy en sçay nul mauuais gré: sa charge se contient en ses limites. Si l'euenement me bat, et s'il fauorise le party que i'ay refusé: il n'y a remede, ie ne m'en prens pas à moy, i'accuse ma fortune, non pas mon ouurage: cela ne s'appelle pas repentir.

3.2.17 Phocion auoit donné aux Atheniens certain aduis, qui ne fut pas suiuy: l'affaire pourtant se passant contre son opinion, auec prosperité, quelqu'vn luy dit: Et bien Phocion, es tu content que la chose aille si bien? Bien suis-ie content, fit-il, qu'il soit aduenu cecy, mais ie ne me repens point d'auoir conseillé cela. Quand mes amis s'adressent à moy, pour estre conseillez, ie le fay librement et clairement, sans m'arrester comme faict quasi tout le monde, à ce que la chose estant hazardeuse, il peut aduenir au rebours de mon sens, par où ils ayent à me faire reproche de mon conseil: dequoy il ne me chaut. Car ils auront tort, et ie n'ay deu leur refuser cet office.

3.2.18 Ie n'ay guere à me prendre de mes fautes ou infortunes, à autre qu'à moy. Car en effect, ie me sers rarement des aduis d'autruy, si ce n'est par honneur de ceremonie: sauf où i'ay besoing d'instruction de science, ou de la cognoissance du faict. Mais és choses où ie n'ay à employer que le iugement: les raisons estrangeres peuuent seruir à m'appuyer, mais peu à me destourner. Ie les escoute fauorablement et decemment toutes. Mais, qu'il m'en souuienne, ie n'en ay creu iusqu'à cette heure que les miennes. Selon moy, ce ne sont que mouſches et atomes, qui promeinent ma volonté. Ie prise peu mes opinions: mais ie prise aussi peu celles des autres, fortune me paye dignement.

Si ie ne reçoy pas de conseil, i'en donne aussi peu. I'en suis peu enquis, et encore moins creu: et ne sache nulle entreprinse publique ny priuee, que mon aduis aye redressee et ramenee. Ceux mesmes que la fortune y auoit aucunement attachez, se sont laissez plus volontiers manier à toute autre ceruelle qu'à la mienne. Comme cil qui suis bien autant ialoux des droits de mon

ENGLISH

There are secret and unguessable parts in the matters we handle, especially in the nature of men: silent qualities, without outward show, sometimes unknown even to their possessor, which are brought out and awakened by unforeseen occasions. If my prudence could not see into them and foretell them, I bear it no ill will: its charge is confined within its limits. If the outcome beats me, and favors the course I rejected, there is no help for it. I do not blame myself; I blame my fortune, not my work. That is not called repentance.

Phocion had given the Athenians some advice which was not followed. When the affair nevertheless turned out prosperously, contrary to his opinion, someone said to him: "Well, Phocion, are you pleased that things are going so well?" "I am indeed pleased," he said, "that this has happened, but I do not repent of having advised that." When my friends come to me for advice, I give it freely and clearly, without stopping, as almost everyone does, to think that since the matter is risky it may turn out contrary to my view, so that they may reproach me for my advice. I do not care about that. For they will be wrong, and I could not refuse them that service.[7]

I have hardly anyone but myself to blame for my faults or misfortunes. For in fact I rarely use other people's advice, except out of ceremonious courtesy, save where I need expert instruction or knowledge of the facts. But in matters where I have only my judgment to apply, other people's reasons can serve to support me, but hardly to turn me aside. I listen to them all favorably and courteously; but, as far as I can remember, I have never yet believed any but my own. To my mind they are mere flies and motes that set my will wandering. I set little value on my opinions, but I set just as little on those of others. Fortune pays me as I deserve.

If I do not take advice, I give just as little. I am seldom asked for it, and even more seldom believed; and I know of no public or private undertaking that my advice has set right and brought back on course. Even those whom fortune had in some way bound to it have more willingly let themselves be guided by any other brain than mine. Be-

7 The anecdote is from Plutarch.

FRENCH

repos, que des droits de mon auctorité, ie l'ayme mieux ainsi. Me laissant là, on fait selon ma profession, qui est, de m'establir et contenir tout en moy. Ce m'est plaisir, d'estre desinteressé des affaires d'autruy, et desgagé de leur gariement.

ENGLISH

ing a man quite as jealous of the rights of my repose as of the rights of my authority, I prefer it so. In leaving me alone, people act according to my profession, which is to settle and contain myself wholly within myself. It is a pleasure to me to have no stake in other people's affairs and to be free from answering for them.

3.2.19 En tous affaires quand ils sont passés, comment que ce soit, i'ay peu de regret: car cette imagination me met hors de peine, qu'ils deuoyent ainsi passer: les voyla dans le grand cours de l'vniuers, et dans l'encheineure des causes Stoïques. Vostre fantasie n'en peut, par souhait et imagination, remuer vn poinct, que tout l'ordre des choses ne renuerse et le passé et l'aduenir.

In all affairs, once they are past, however they turned out, I feel little regret. For this thought puts me out of pain: that they were bound to pass that way. There they are, in the great course of the universe and in the chain of Stoic causes. Your fancy cannot, by wishing and imagining, move a single point of them without the whole order of things overturning both past and future.

THE FALSE REPENTANCE OF AGE

Montaigne refuses to credit old age with virtue for the vices it can no longer commit.

FRENCH

3.2.20 Au demeurant, ie hay cet accidental repentir que l'aage apporte. Celuy qui disoit anciennement, estre obligé aux annees, dequoy elles l'auoyent deffait de la volupté, auoit autre opinion que la mienne. Ie ne sçauray iamais bon gré à l'impuissance, de bien qu'elle me face. Nec tam auersa vnquam videbitur ab opere suo prouidentia, vt debilitas inter optima inuenta sit. Nos appetits sont rares en la vieillesse: vne profonde satieté nous saisit apres le coup. En cela ie ne voy rien de conscience. Le chagrin, et la foiblesse nous impriment vne vertu lasche, et caterreuse. Il ne nous faut pas laisser emporter si entiers, aux alterations naturelles, que d'en abastardir notre iugement.

La ieunesse et le plaisir n'ont pas faict autrefois que i'aye mescogneu le visage du vice en la volupté: ny ne fait à cette heure, le degoust que les ans m'apportent, que ie mescognoisse celuy de la volupté au vice. Ores que ie n'y suis plus, i'en iuge comme si i'y estoy. Moy qui la secouë viuement et attentiuement, trouue que ma raison est celle mesme que i'auoy en l'aage plus licencieux: sinon à l'auanture, d'autant qu'elle s'est affoiblie et empiree, en vieillissant. Et trouue que ce qu'elle refuse de m'enfourner à ce plaisir, en consideration de l'interest de ma santé corporelle, elle ne le feroit non plus qu'autrefois, pour la santé spirituelle. Pour la voir hors de combat, ie ne l'estime pas plus valeureuse.

ENGLISH

For the rest, I hate that incidental repentance that age brings. The man who said long ago that he was obliged to the years for having rid him of sensual pleasure held a different opinion from mine. I shall never be grateful to impotence for any good it may do me. Nor will Providence ever seem so hostile to its own work that weakness should be counted among the best things. Our appetites are few in old age; a profound satiety seizes us after the act. In this I see nothing of conscience. Peevishness and weakness stamp on us a slack and rheumy virtue. We must not let ourselves be carried away so entirely by natural changes as to let them debase our judgment.[8]

Youth and pleasure did not once make me fail to recognize the face of vice in pleasure; nor does the distaste that the years bring me now make me fail to recognize the face of pleasure in vice. Now that I am no longer in it, I judge it as if I were. Shaking my reason briskly and attentively, I find that it is the very same as I had in my more licentious years, except perhaps that it has grown weaker and worse with age. And I find that if it refuses to plunge me into this pleasure, it does so out of concern for my bodily health; for the sake of spiritual

8 The ancient was Sophocles, as reported in Plato's Republic, Book 1. The Latin is from Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory 5.12.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

health it would do no more than it did before. I do not think it any braver for seeing it out of the fight.

Mes tentations sont si cassees et mortifiees, qu'elles ne valent pas qu'elle s'y oppose: tendant seulement les mains au deuant, ie les coniure. Qu'on luy remette en presence, cette ancienne concupiscence, ie crains qu'elle auroit moins de force à la soustenir, qu'elle n'auoit autrefois. Ie ne luy voy rien iuger à part soy, que lors elle ne iugeast, ny aucune nouuelle clarté. Parquoy s'il y a conualescence, c'est vne conualescence maleficiee. Miserable sorte de remede, deuoir à la maladie sa santé. Ce n'est pas à nostre malheur de faire cet office: c'est au bon heur de nostre iugement. On ne me fait rien faire par les offenses et afflictions, que les maudire. C'est aux gents, qui ne s'esueillent qu'à coups de fouët.

My temptations are so broken and deadened that they are not worth its opposing them. Merely by holding out my hands before me, I conjure them away. Let that old lust be set before it again, and I fear it would have less strength to withstand it than it once had. I do not see it judge anything on its own that it did not judge then, nor see any new light in it. Therefore, if there is convalescence, it is a blighted convalescence. A miserable kind of remedy, to owe one's health to sickness! It is not for our misfortune to perform this office; it is for the good fortune of our judgment. Offenses and afflictions can make me do nothing but curse them. That is for people who wake up only under the whip.

Ma raison a bien son cours plus deliure en la prosperité: elle est bien plus distraitte et occupee à digerer les maux, que les plaisirs. Ie voy bien plus clair en temps serain. La santé m'aduertit, comme plus alaigrement, aussi plus vtilement, que la maladie. Ie me suis auancé le plus que i'ay peu, vers ma reparation et reglement, lors que i'auoy à en iouïr. Ie seroy honteux et enuieux, que la misere et l'infortune de ma vieillesse eust à se preferer à mes bonnes annees, saines, esueillees, vigoureuses. Et qu'on eust à m'estimer, non par où i'ay esté, mais par où i'ay cesse d'estre.

My reason runs a freer course in prosperity. It is much more distracted and taken up with digesting ills than pleasures. I see much more clearly in fair weather. Health admonishes me more cheerfully, and therefore more usefully, than sickness. I advanced as far as I could toward my reform and regulation while I had health to enjoy it. I would be ashamed and vexed if the misery and misfortune of my old age were to be preferred to my good years, healthy, wakeful and vigorous; and if people were to value me not for what I have been but for what I have ceased to be.

3.2.21 A mon aduis, c'est le viure heureusement, non, comme disoit Antisthenes, le mourir heureusement, qui fait l'humaine felicité. Ie ne me suis pas attendu d'attacher monstrueusement la queuë d'vn philosophe à la teste et au corps d'vn homme perdu: ny que ce chetif bout eust à desaduoüer et desmentir la plus belle, entiere et longue partie de ma vie. Ie me veux presenter et faire veoir par tout vniformément. Si i'auois à reuiure, ie reuiurois comme i'ay vescu. Ny ie ne pleins le passé, ny ie ne crains l'aduenir: et si ie ne me deçoy, il est allé du dedans enuiron comme du dehors.

In my opinion it is living happily, not, as Antisthenes said, dying happily, that makes human happiness. I have not set out to attach, monstrously, the tail of a philosopher to the head and body of a profligate; nor have I intended this sorry remnant to disown and belie the finest, fullest and longest part of my life. I want to present myself and be seen everywhere in the same way. If I had to live again, I would live as I have lived. I neither lament the past nor fear the future; and unless I deceive myself, things have gone much the same within as without.

C'est vne des principales obligations, que i'aye à ma fortune, que le cours de mon estat corporel ayt esté conduit, chasque chose en sa saison, i'en ay veu l'herbe, et les fleurs, et le fruit: et en voy la secheresse. Heureusement, puisque c'est naturellement. Ie porte bien plus doucement les maux que i'ay, d'autant qu'ils sont en leur poinct: et qu'ils me font aussi plus fauorablement

It is one of the chief debts I owe my fortune that the course of my bodily life has run each thing in its season. I have seen its grass, its flowers and its fruit; and now I see it drying up. Happily, since it is naturally. I bear the ills I have much more gently because they come in their proper time, and because they also make me remember more souuenir de la longue felicité de ma vie passee. Pareillement, ma sagesse peut bien estre de mesme taille, en l'vn et en l'autre temps: mais elle estoit bien de plus d'exploit, et de meilleure grace, verte, gaye, naïue, qu'elle n'est à present, cassee, grondeuse, laborieuse. Ie renonce donc à ces reformations casuelles et douloureuses.

FRENCH

Il faut que Dieu nous touche le courage: il faut que nostre conscience s'amende d'elle mesme, par renforcement de nostre raison, non par l'affoiblissement de nos appetits. La volupté n'en est en soy, ny pasle, ny descoulouree, pour estre apperceuë par des yeux chassieux et troubles.

3.2.22 On doibt aymer la temperance par elle mesme, et pour le respect de Dieu qui nous l'a ordonnee, et la chasteté: celle que les caterres nous prestent, et que ie doibs au benefice de ma cholique, ce n'est ny chasteté, ny temperance. On ne peut se vanter de mespriser et combatre la volupté, si on ne la voit, si on l'ignore, et ses graces, et ses forces, et sa beauté plus attrayante. Ie cognoy l'vne et l'autre, c'est à moy de le dire. Mais il me semble qu'en la vieillesse, nos ames sont subiectes à des maladies et imperfections plus importunes, qu'en la ieunesse.

Ie le disois estant ieune, lors on me donnoit de mon menton par le nez: ie le dis encore à cette heure, que mon poil gris m'en donne le credit. Nous appellons sagesse, la difficulté de nos humeurs, le desgoust des choses presentes: mais à la verité, nous ne quittons pas tant les vices, comme nous les changeons: et, à mon opinion, en pis. Outre vne sotte et caduque fierté, vn babil ennuyeux, ces humeurs espineuses et inassociables, et la superstition, et vn soin ridicule des richesses, lors que l'vsage en est perdu, i'y trouue plus d'enuie, d'iniustice et de malignité.

Elle nous attache plus de rides en l'esprit qu'au visage: et ne se void point d'ames, ou fort rares, qui en vieillissant ne sentent l'aigre et le moisi. L'homme marche entier, vers son croist et vers son décroist. A voir la sagesse de Socrates, et plusieurs circonstances de sa condamnation, i'oseroy croire, qu'il s'y presta aucunement luy mesme, par preuarication, à dessein: ayant de si prés, aagé de soixante et dix ans, à souffrir l'engourdissement des riches allures de son esprit, et l'esblouïssement de sa clairté accoustumée. Quelles metamorphoses luy voy-ie faire tous les iours, en plusieurs de mes cognoissans?

ENGLISH

fondly the long happiness of my past life. Likewise my wisdom may well be of the same size in both periods; but it was far more accomplished and more graceful then, green, gay and natural, than it is now, broken, grumbling and laborious. I therefore renounce these chance and painful reformations.

God must touch our heart. Our conscience must amend of itself, through the strengthening of our reason, not through the weakening of our appetites. Pleasure is not in itself pale or discolored because it is seen by bleary and clouded eyes.

We should love temperance for its own sake, and out of respect for God who has ordained it for us, and chastity too. What catarrhs lend us, and what I owe to the kindness of my colic, is neither chastity nor temperance. One cannot boast of despising and fighting pleasure if one does not see it, if one does not know it, its graces, its powers, and its most alluring beauty. I know both the one and the other; it is for me to say. But it seems to me that in old age our souls are subject to more troublesome ailments and imperfections than in youth.

I said so when I was young, and then people threw my beardless chin in my face. I say it again now that my gray hair gives me credit. We call wisdom the crabbedness of our temperament, our distaste for present things. But in truth we do not so much give up our vices as change them, and, in my opinion, for the worse. Besides a foolish and decrepit pride, tedious chatter, prickly and unsociable moods, superstition, and a ridiculous concern for riches when we have lost the use of them, I find more envy, injustice and malice in it.

Old age attaches more wrinkles to our minds than to our faces; and one sees no souls, or very rare ones, that do not smell sour and musty as they grow old. Man moves all of a piece toward his growth and toward his decline. Considering the wisdom of Socrates and several circumstances of his condemnation, I would venture to believe that he lent himself to it to some extent, by deliberate collusion, being so close, at seventy years of age, to suffering the numbing of the rich movements of his mind and the dimming of its accustomed brightness. What metamorphoses I see it work every day in many of my acquaintances!

FRENCH	ENGLISH
c’est vne puissante maladie, et qui se coule naturellement et imperceptiblement: il y faut grande prouision d’estude, et grande precaution, pour euiter les imperfections qu’elle nous charge: ou aumoins affoiblir leur progrez. Ie sens que nonobstant tous mes retranchemens, elle gaigne pied à pied sur moy. Ie soustien tant que ie puis, mais ie ne sçay en fin, où elle me menera moy-mesme. A toutes auantures, ie suis content qu’on sçache d’où ie seray tombé.	It is a powerful disease, and one that creeps on naturally and imperceptibly. It takes a great store of study and great precaution to avoid the imperfections it loads us with, or at least to slow their progress. I feel that, despite all my entrenchments, it is gaining on me foot by foot. I hold out as long as I can; but I do not know where in the end it will lead even me. At all events, I am content that people should know from where I shall have fallen.

III.3 Of Three Kinds of Company

De trois commerces

Montaigne weighs the three kinds of company he enjoys—friends, women, and books—and describes the library in his tower.

FRENCH

3.3.1 IL ne faut pas se cloüer si fort à ses humeurs et complexions. Nostre principalle suffisance, c'est, sçauoir s'appliquer à diuers vsages. C'est estre, mais ce n'est pas viure que se tenir attaché et obligé par necessité, à vn seul train. Les plus belles ames sont celles qui ont plus de varieté et de souplesse. Voyla vn honorable tesmoignage du vieil Caton: Huic versatile ingenium sic pariter ad omnia fuit, vt natum ad id vnum diceres, quodcumque ageret. Si c'estoit à moy à me dresser à ma mode, il n'est aucune si bonne façon, où ie voulusse estre fiché, pour ne m'en sçauoir desprendre. La vie est vn mouuement inegal, irregulier, et multiforme.

Ce n'est pas estre amy de soy, et moins encore maistre; c'est en estre esclaue, de se suiure incessamment: et estre si pris à ses inclinations, qu'on n'en puisse fouruoyer, qu'on ne les puisse tordre. Ie le dy à cette heure, pour ne me pouuoir facilement despestrer de l'importunité de mon ame, en ce qu'elle ne sçait communément s'amuser, sinon où elle s'empesche, ny s'employer, que bandee et entiere. Pour leger subiect qu'on luy donne, elle le grossit volontiers, et l'estire, iusques au poinct où elle ayt à s'y embesongner de toute sa force. Son oysiueté m'est à cette cause vne penible occupation, et qui offense ma santé.

La plus part des esprits ont besoing de matiere estrangere, pour se desgourdir et exercer: le mien en a besoing, pour se rassoir plustost et seiourner, vitia otij negotio discutienda sunt. Car son plus laborieux et principal estude, c'est, s'estudier soy. Les liures sont, pour luy, du genre des occupations, qui le desbauchent de son estude. Aux premieres pensees qui luy viennent, il s'agite, et fait preuue de sa vigueur à tout sens: exerce son maniement tantost vers la force, tantost vers l'ordre et la grace, se range, modere, et fortifie. Il a dequoy esueiller ses facultez par luy mesme. Nature luy a donné

ENGLISH

We should not rivet ourselves so firmly to our temperaments and dispositions. Our chief ability is knowing how to apply ourselves to various uses. To stay tied and bound by necessity to a single course is to exist, but it is not to live. The finest souls are those that have the most variety and suppleness. Here is an honorable testimony about old Cato: His mind was so versatile, so equally suited to everything, that whatever he was doing you would have said he had been born for that alone. If it were up to me to train myself in my own way, there is no way of being so good that I would want to be fixed in it and unable to get free of it. Life is an uneven, irregular and multiform motion.[1]

To follow oneself incessantly is not to be a friend to oneself, still less a master; it is to be a slave to oneself. So is being so caught by one's inclinations that one cannot stray from them or bend them. I say this now because I cannot easily rid myself of the importunity of my mind. It usually cannot amuse itself except where it gets entangled, nor apply itself except tense and whole. However slight a subject you give it, it readily enlarges and stretches it until it has to work at it with all its strength. For this reason its idleness is a painful occupation for me, and one that harms my health.

Most minds need outside matter to rouse and exercise them; mine needs it rather to settle and rest. The vices of idleness must be shaken off by activity. For its most laborious and principal study is to study itself. Books, for it, are among the occupations that lure it away from that study. At the first thoughts that come to it, it bestirs itself and proves its vigor in every direction. It exercises its handling now toward force, now toward order and grace; it marshals, moderates and strengthens it-

1 Livy, History of Rome 39.40, on Cato the Censor.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	comme à tous, assez de matiere sienne, pour son vtilité, et des subiects propres assez, où inuenter et iuger.	self. It has the means to awaken its faculties by itself. Nature has given it, as to all, enough matter of its own for its use, and enough subjects of its own on which to invent and judge.[2]
3.3.2	Le mediter est vn puissant estude et plein, à qui sçait se taster et employer vigoureusement. I'ayme mieux forger mon ame, que la meubler. Il n'est point d'occupation ny plus foible, ny plus forte, que celle d'entretenir ses pensees, selon l'ame que c'est. Les plus grandes en font leur vacation, quibus viuere est cogitare. Aussi l'a nature fauorisee de ce priuilege, qu'il n'y a rien, que nous puissions faire si long temps: ny action à laquelle nous nous addonnions plus ordinairement et facilement. C'est la besongne des Dieux, dit Aristote, de laquelle naist et leur beatitude et la nostre.	Meditation is a powerful and full study for anyone who knows how to probe himself and put himself vigorously to work. I would rather forge my mind than furnish it. There is no occupation either weaker or stronger than entertaining one's own thoughts, depending on what the mind is. The greatest minds make it their vocation, for whom to live is to think. And so nature has favored it with this privilege: there is nothing we can do for so long, and no action we devote ourselves to more habitually and easily. It is the work of the gods, says Aristotle, and from it is born both their blessedness and ours.[3]
3.3.3	La lecture me sert specialement à esueiller par diuers obiects mon discours: à embesongner mon iugement, non ma memoyre. Peu d'entretiens doncq m'arrestent sans vigueur et sans effort. Il est vray que la gentillesse et la beauté me remplissent et occupent, autant ou plus, que le pois et la profondeur. Et d'autant que ie sommeille en toute autre communication, et que ie n'y preste que l'escorce de mon attention, il m'aduient souuent, en telle sorte de propos abatus et lasches, propos de contenance, de dire et respondre des songes et bestises, indignes d'vn enfant, et ridicules: ou de me tenir obstiné en silence, plus ineptement encore et inciuilement.	Reading serves me especially to awaken my reasoning through various objects, to occupy my judgment, not my memory. So few conversations hold me if they lack vigor and force. It is true that charm and beauty fill and occupy me as much as weight and depth, or more. And since I doze in every other kind of conversation and lend it only the bark of my attention, it often happens to me, in that sort of feeble, slack talk, talk for form's sake, that I say and answer dreamy nonsense and silly things, unworthy of a child, and ridiculous. Or else I keep obstinately silent, which is still more inept and uncivil.
	I'ay vne façon resueuse, qui me retire à moy: et d'autre part vne lourde ignorance et puerile, de plusieurs choses communes. Par ces deux qualitez, i'ay gaigné, qu'on puisse faire au vray, cinq ou six contes de moy, aussi niais que d'autre quel qu'il soit.	I have a dreamy way that withdraws me into myself; and on the other hand a dense and childish ignorance of many ordinary things. Thanks to these two qualities I have earned the distinction that five or six stories can truthfully be told about me as foolish as about anyone at all.
3.3.4	Or suyuant mon propos, cette complexion difficile me rend delicat à la pratique des hommes: il me les faut trier sur le volet: et me rend incommode aux actions communes. Nous viuons, et negotions auec le peuple: si sa conuersation nous importune, si nous desdaignons à nous appliquer aux ames basses et vulgaires: et les basses et vulgaires sont souuent aussi reglees que les plus déliees: et toute sapience est insipide qui ne s'accommode à l'insipience commune: il ne nous faut	Now, to continue with my subject, this difficult temperament makes me fastidious in dealing with men—I have to pick them out with great care—and makes me unfit for ordinary activities. We live and deal with the people. If their conversation bores us, if we disdain to adapt ourselves to low and common souls—and the low and common are often as well ordered as the most refined, and all wisdom is insipid that does not accommodate it-

2 Seneca, Letters 56.
3 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.38; Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 10.8.

FRENCH

plus entremettre ny de nos propres affaires, ny de ceux d'autruy: et les publiques et les priuez se demeslent auec ces gens là. Les moins tendues et plus naturelles alleures de nostre ame, sont les plus belles: les meilleures occupations, les moins efforcees.

Mon Dieu, que la sagesse faict vn bon office à ceux, de qui elle renge les desirs à leur puissance! Il n'est point de plus vtile science. Selon qu'on peut: c'estoit le refrain et le mot fauory de Socrates. Mot de grande substance: il faut adresser et arrester nos desirs, aux choses les plus aysees et voysines. Ne m'est-ce pas vne sotte humeur, de disconuenir auec vn milier à qui ma fortune me ioint, de qui ie ne me puis passer, pour me tenir à vn ou deux, qui sont hors de mon commerce: ou plustost à vn desir fantastique, de chose que ie ne puis recouurer? Mes mœurs molles, ennemies de toute aigreur et aspreté, peuuent aysement m'auoir deschargé d'enuies et d'inimitiez.

D'estre aymé, ie ne dy, mais de n'estre point hay, iamais homme n'en donna plus d'occasion. Mais la froideur de ma conuersation, m'a desrobé auec raison, la bien-vueillance de plusieurs, qui sont excusables de l'interpreter à autre, et pire sens.

3.3.5 Ie suis tres-capable d'acquerir et maintenir des amitiez rares et exquises. D'autant que ie me harpe auec si grande faim aux accointances qui reuiennent à mon goust, ie m'y produis, ie m'y iette si auidement, que ie ne faux pas aysement de m'y attacher, et de faire impression où ie donne: j'en ay faict souuent heureuse preuue. Aux amitiez communes, ie suis aucunement sterile et froid: car mon aller n'est pas naturel, s'il n'est à pleine voyle. Outre ce, que ma fortune m'ayant duit et affriandé de ieunesse, à vne amitié seule et parfaicte, m'a à la verité aucunement desgousté des autres: et trop imprimé en la fantasie, qu'elle est beste de compagnie, non pas de troupe, comme disoit cet ancien.

Aussi, que i'ay naturellement peine à me communiquer à demy: et auec modification, et cette seruile prudence et soupçonneuse, qu'on nous ordonne, en la conuersation de ces amitiez nombreuses, et imparfaictes. Et nous l'ordonne lon principalement en ce temps, qu'il ne se self to common unwisdom—then we must no longer meddle in our own affairs or in other people's; for both public and private affairs are worked out with those people. The least strained and most natural motions of our soul are the finest; the best occupations are the least forced.

ENGLISH

My God, what a good service wisdom does for those whose desires it brings into line with their power! There is no more useful knowledge. "As far as one can": that was Socrates' refrain and favorite saying. A saying of great substance: we must direct and fix our desires on the easiest and nearest things. Is it not a foolish disposition in me to be at odds with a thousand people to whom my fortune joins me, and whom I cannot do without, in order to cling to one or two who are outside my company—or rather to a fanciful desire for something I cannot recover? My gentle ways, enemies of all sourness and harshness, may easily have spared me envy and enmity.

No man ever gave more reason—I do not say to be loved, but not to be hated. But the coldness of my manner has rightly robbed me of the goodwill of many, who may be excused for interpreting it in another, worse sense.

I am very capable of acquiring and keeping rare and exquisite friendships. I seize with such hunger on the acquaintances that suit my taste, I put myself forward and throw myself into them so avidly, that I rarely fail to attach myself and to make an impression where I strike; I have often had happy proof of it. In ordinary friendships I am somewhat barren and cold, for my going is not natural unless it is under full sail. Besides, my fortune trained me from youth for a single, perfect friendship and gave me a taste for it. That has in truth somewhat put me off the others, and impressed too deeply on my mind that friendship is a companionable creature, not a herd animal, as that ancient said.[4]

Also, I find it naturally hard to communicate myself by halves and with reservations, with that servile and suspicious prudence prescribed for us in the dealings of these numerous and imperfect friendships. And it is prescribed especially in 4 His friendship with La Boétie (I.28). The ancient is Plutarch, On Having Many Friends.

FRENCH

peut parler du monde, que dangereusement, ou faucement.

3.3.6 Si voy-ie bien pourtant, que qui a comme moy, pour sa fin, les commoditez de sa vie, ie dy les commoditez essentielles, doibt fuyr comme la peste, ces difficultez et delicatesse d'humeur. Ie louerois vn' ame à diuers estages, qui sçache et se tendre et se desmonter: qui soit bien par tout où sa fortune la porte: qui puisse deuiser auec son voisin, de son bastiment, de sa chasse et de sa querelle: entretenir auec plaisir vn charpentier et vn iardinier. I'enuie ceux, qui sçauent s'apriuoiser au moindre de leur suitte, et dresser de l'entretien en leur propre train.

Et le conseil de Platon ne me plaist pas, de parler tousiours d'vn langage maistral à ses seruiteurs, sans ieu, sans familiarité: soit enuers les masles, soit enuers les femelles. Car outre ma raison, il est inhumain et iniuste, de faire tant valoir cette telle quelle prerogatiue de la fortune: et les polices, où il se souffre moins de disparité entre les valets et les maistres, me semblent les plus equitables. Les autres s'estudient à eslancer et guinder leur esprit: moy à le baisser et coucher: il n'est vicieux qu'en extention. Narras et genus Æaci,
Et pugnata sacro bella sub Ilio:
Quo Chium pretio cadum
Mercemur, quis aquam temperet ignibus,
Quo præbente domum, et quota
Pelignis caream frigoribus, taces.

3.3.7 Ainsi comme la vaillance Lacedemonienne auoit besoing de moderation, et du son doux et gratieux du ieu des flustes, pour la flatter en la guerre, de peur qu'elle ne se iettast à la temerité, et à la furie: là où toutes autres nations ordinairement employent des sons et des voix aigues et fortes, qui esmeuuent et qui eschauffent à outrance le courage des soldats: il me semble de mesme, contre la forme ordinaire, qu'en l'vsage de nostre esprit, nous auons pour la plus part, plus besoing de plomb, que d'ailes: de froideur et de repos, que d'ardeur et d'agitation.

Sur tout, c'est à mon gré bien faire le sot, que de faire l'entendu, entre ceux qui ne le sont pas: parler tousjours bandé, fauellar in punta di forchetta. Il faut se desmettre au train de ceux auec qui vous estes, et par fois affecter these times, when one cannot speak of the world except dangerously or falsely.

ENGLISH

And yet I see clearly that anyone who, like me, has for his aim the comforts of his life—I mean its essential comforts—should flee these difficulties and this fastidiousness of temperament like the plague. I would praise a soul with several stories, one that knows how both to tighten and to unbend itself. It should be at ease wherever its fortune carries it. It should be able to chat with its neighbor about his building, his hunting and his quarrel, and to converse with pleasure with a carpenter and a gardener. I envy those who know how to be at ease with the least of their retinue and to make conversation within their own household.

And I do not like Plato's advice always to speak to one's servants in a masterly tone, without banter, without familiarity, whether to the men or the women. For, apart from my own reason, it is inhuman and unjust to make so much of this paltry prerogative of fortune. And the governments that tolerate less disparity between servants and masters seem to me the most equitable. Others strive to launch their minds aloft and hoist them up; I, to lower mine and lay it down. It goes wrong only when it stretches. You tell of the line of Aeacus and the wars fought beneath sacred Troy;
but at what price we may buy a jar of Chian, who will warm the water over the fire,
who will lend a house, and at what hour
I shall escape the Pelignian cold, you do not say.[5]

Spartan valor needed moderation, and the soft, gracious sound of flutes to soothe it in war, for fear it should throw itself into rashness and fury; whereas all other nations usually employ shrill, strong sounds and voices that stir the soldiers' courage and inflame it to excess. In the same way, it seems to me, contrary to the usual pattern, that in the use of our mind we mostly need lead more than wings, coolness and rest more than ardor and agitation.

Above all, to my taste, it is playing the fool to play the expert among those who are not: to speak always under strain, to talk on the point of a fork. You must come down to the level of those you are 5 Plato, Laws 6; Horace, Odes 3.19.

FRENCH

l'ignorance. Mettez à part la force et la subtilité: en l'vsage commun, c'est assez d'y reseruer l'ordre: trainez vous au demeurant à terre, s'ils veulent.

3.3.8 Les sçauans chopent volontiers à cette pierre: ils font tousiours parade de leur magistere, et sement leurs liures par tout. Ils en ont en ce temps entonné si fort les cabinets et oreilles des dames, que si elles n'en ont retenu la substance, au moins elles en ont la mine. A toute sorte de propos, et matiere, pour basse et populaire qu'elle soit, elles se seruent d'vne façon de parler et d'escrire, nouuelle et sçauante. Hoc sermone pauent, hoc iram, gaudia, curas,
Hoc cuncta effundunt animi secreta, quid vltrà?
Concumbunt doctè. Et alleguent Platon et sainct Thomas, aux choses ausquelles le premier rencontré, seruiroit aussi bien de tesmoing.

La doctrine qui ne leur a peu arriuer en l'ame, leur est demeuree en la langue. Si les bien-nees me croient, elles se contenteront de faire valoir leurs propres et naturelles richesses. Elles cachent et couurent leurs beautez, soubs des beautez estrangeres: c'est grande simplesse, d'estouffer sa clarté pour luire d'vne lumiere empruntee. Elles sont enterrees et enseuelies soubs l'art de Capsula totæ. C'est qu'elles ne se cognoissent point assez: le monde n'a rien de plus beau: c'est à elles d'honnorer les arts, et de farder le fard. Que leur faut-il, que viure aymees et honnorees? Elles n'ont, et ne sçauent que trop, pour cela. Il ne faut qu'esueiller vn peu, et reschauffer les facultez qui sont en elles.

Quand ie les voy attachees à la rhetorique, à la iudiciaire, à la logique, et semblables drogueries, si vaines et inutiles à leur besoing: i'entre en crainte, que les hommes qui le leur conseillent, le facent pour auoir loy de les regenter soubs ce tiltre. Car quelle autre excuse leur trouuerois-ie? Baste, qu'elles peuuent sans nous, renger la grace de leurs yeux, à la gayeté, à la seuerité, et à la douceur: assaisonner vn nenny, de rudesse, de doubte, et de faueur: et qu'elles ne cherchent point d'interprete aux discours qu'on faict pour leur seruice. Auec cette science, with, and sometimes affect ignorance. Put force and subtlety aside; in ordinary use it is enough to keep order. For the rest, crawl along the ground, if they wish.[6]

ENGLISH

Learned men readily stumble on this stone: they always parade their mastery and scatter their books everywhere. In these times they have poured them so heavily into the studies and ears of the ladies that if the ladies have not retained the substance, at least they have the look of it. On every sort of topic and subject, however low and popular, they use a new and learned way of speaking and writing. In this language they voice their fears, their anger, joys, cares;
in this they pour out all their soul's secrets. What more?
They make love learnedly. And they cite Plato and Saint Thomas on matters for which the first person they met would serve just as well as a witness.[7]

The learning that could not reach their souls has stayed on their tongues. If well-born women will believe me, they will be content to make the most of their own natural riches. They hide and cover their beauties under foreign beauties. It is great simplicity to smother one's own brightness in order to shine with borrowed light. They are buried and entombed under the art of being all out of a box. That is because they do not know themselves well enough. The world has nothing more beautiful; it is for them to do honor to the arts and to paint the paint. What do they need but to live loved and honored? For that they have and know all too much. They need only awaken a little and rekindle the faculties that are in them.[8]

When I see them taken up with rhetoric, judicial astrology, logic and similar trumpery, so vain and useless for their needs, I begin to fear that the men who advise them to it do so in order to have the right to rule over them under that pretext. For what other excuse could I find for them? Enough that they can, without us, set the grace of their eyes to gaiety, to severity and to sweetness. They can season a "no" with harshness, with doubt, and with favor. They need no interpreter for the 6 An Italian expression for affected, overly precise speech.

7 Juvenal, Satires 6, where the language in question is Greek.
8 Seneca, Letters 115, said of fops groomed as if taken straight out of a box.

FRENCH

elles commandent à baguette, et regentent les regents et l'escole.

3.3.9 Si toutesfois il leur fasche de nous ceder en quoy que ce soit, et veulent par curiosité auoir part aux liures: la poësie est vn amusement propre à leur besoin: c'est vn art follastre, et subtil, desguisé, parlier, tout en plaisir, tout en montre, comme elles. Elles tireront aussi diuerses commoditez de l'histoire. En la philosophie, de la part qui sert à la vie, elles prendront les discours qui les dressent à iuger de nos humeurs et conditions, à se deffendre de nos trahisons: à regler la temerité de leurs propres desirs: à mesnager leur liberté: allonger les plaisirs de la vie, et à porter humainement l'inconstance d'vn seruiteur, la rudesse d'vn mary, et l'importunité des ans, et des rides, et choses semblables.

Voyla pour le plus, la part que ie leur assignerois aux sciences.

3.3.10 Il y a des naturels particuliers, retirez et internes. Ma forme essentielle, est propre à la communication, et à la production: ie suis tout au dehors et en euidence, nay à la societé et à l'amitié. La solitude que i'ayme, et que ie presche, ce n'est principallement, que ramener à moy mes affections, et mes pensees: restreindre et resserrer, non mes pas, ains mes desirs et mon soucy, resignant la solicitude estrangere, et fuyant mortellement la seruitude, et l'obligation: et non tant la foule des hommes, que la foule des affaires. La solitude locale, à dire verité, m'estend plustost, et m'eslargit au dehors: ie me iette aux affaires d'estat, et à l'vniuers, plus volontiers quand ie suis seul.

Au Louure et en la presse, ie me resserre et contraints en ma peau. La foule me repousse à moy. Et ne m'entretiens iamais si folement, si licentieusement et particulierement, qu'aux lieux de respect, et de prudence ceremonieuse. Nos folies ne me font pas rire, ce sont nos sapiences. De ma complexion, ie ne suis pas ennemy de l'agitation des cours: i'y ay passé partie de la vie: et suis faict à me porter allaigrement aux grandes compagnies: pourueu que ce soit par interualles, et à mon poinct. Mais cette mollesse de iugement, dequoy ie parle, m'attache par force à la solitude.

Voire chez moy, au milieu d'vne famille peuplee, et maison des plus frequentees, i'y voy des gens assez, mais speeches made to court them. With this knowledge they command imperiously and rule over the teachers and the school.

ENGLISH

If, however, it vexes them to yield to us in anything at all, and out of curiosity they want a share in books, poetry is an amusement suited to their need. It is a playful and subtle art, disguised, talkative, all pleasure, all show, like them. They will also draw various benefits from history. In philosophy, from the part that serves life, they will take the reasonings that train them to judge our temperaments and characters and to defend themselves against our betrayals. These will teach them to regulate the rashness of their own desires, to manage their freedom, to prolong the pleasures of life, and to bear with humanity a suitor's inconstancy, a husband's rudeness, the burden of years and wrinkles, and the like.

That, at most, is the share in learning I would assign them.

There are some particular natures, retiring and inward. My essential form is suited to communication and to bringing forth: I am all outward and in view, born for society and friendship. The solitude that I love and preach is chiefly nothing but bringing my affections and thoughts back to myself. It means restraining and narrowing not my steps but my desires and cares, resigning concern for outside things, and shunning servitude and obligation like death—and not so much the crowd of men as the crowd of affairs. Solitude of place, to tell the truth, rather extends me and enlarges me outward: I throw myself into affairs of state and into the universe more willingly when I am alone.

At the Louvre and in the crowd, I draw in and shrink into my skin. The crowd pushes me back into myself. And I never entertain myself so foolishly, so licentiously and privately, as in places that call for respect and ceremonious prudence. It is not our follies that make me laugh; it is our wisdoms. By constitution I am no enemy to the bustle of courts. I have spent part of my life there, and I am used to carrying myself cheerfully in great gatherings, provided it is at intervals and when I choose. But that softness of judgment I speak of ties me by force to solitude.

Even at home, in the midst of a populous household and one of the most frequented of houses, I

FRENCH	ENGLISH
rarement ceux, auecq qui i'ayme à communiquer. Et ie reserue là, et pour moy, et pour les autres, vne liberté inusitee. Il s'y faict trefue de ceremonie, d'assistance, et conuoiemens, et telles autres ordonnances penibles de nostre courtoisie (ô la seruile et importune vsance) chacun s'y gouuerne à sa mode, y entretient qui veut ses pensees: ie m'y tiens muet, resueur, et enfermé, sans offence de mes hostes.	see people enough, but rarely those with whom I like to converse. And there I reserve, both for myself and for others, an unusual freedom. There is a truce there from ceremony, from attendance and escorting, and other such painful rules of our courtesy (oh, what a servile and tiresome custom!). Everyone conducts himself as he pleases; whoever wishes entertains his own thoughts. I keep silent, dreamy and shut up in myself, without offense to my guests.

MEN OF WORTH

The first kind of company: conversation with able, honorable men.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.3.11 Les hommes, de la societé et familiarité desquels ie suis en queste, sont ceux qu'on appelle honnestes et habiles hommes: l'image de ceux icy me degouste des autres. C'est à le bien prendre, de nos formes, la plus rare: et forme qui se doit principallement à la nature. La fin de ce commerce, c'est simplement la priuauté, frequentation, et conference: l'exercice des ames, sans autre fruit. En nos propos, tous subiects me sont égaux: il ne me chaut qu'il y ayt ny poix, ny profondeur: la grace et la pertinence y sont tousiours: tout y est teinct d'vn iugement meur et constant, et meslé de bonté, de franchise, de gayeté et d'amitié.	The men whose society and familiarity I seek are those called honorable and capable men; the image of these spoils my taste for the others. Rightly considered, it is the rarest of our types, and a type owed chiefly to nature. The aim of this association is simply intimacy, company and conversation: the exercise of souls, with no other fruit. In our talk all subjects are alike to me. I do not care whether there is weight or depth in it; grace and pertinence are always there. Everything is tinged with a mature and steady judgment, and mingled with goodness, frankness, gaiety and friendship.
Ce n'est pas au subiect des substitutions seulement, que nostre esprit montre sa beauté et sa force, et aux affaires des Roys: il la montre autant aux confabulations priuees. Ie congnois mes gens au silence mesme, et à leur soubsrire, et les descouure mieux à l'aduanture à table, qu'au conseil. Hippomachus disoit bien qu'il congnoissoit les bons lucteurs, à les voir simplement marcher par vne ruë. S'il plaist à la doctrine de se mesler à nos deuis, elle n'en sera point refusee: non magistrale, imperieuse, et importune, comme de coustume, mais suffragante et docile elle mesme. Nous n'y cherchons qu'à passer le temps: à l'heure d'estre instruicts et preschez, nous l'irons trouuer en son throsne.	It is not only on the subject of entails, or in the affairs of kings, that our mind shows its beauty and strength; it shows them just as much in private conversations. I know my people even by their silence and their smiles, and perhaps discover them better at table than in council. Hippomachus rightly said that he could recognize good wrestlers just by seeing them walk down a street. If learning cares to join our talk, it will not be refused—not magisterial, imperious and tiresome, as it usually is, but itself deferential and docile. We seek there only to pass the time. When it is time to be instructed and preached to, we will go and find it on its throne.[9]
Qu'elle se demette à nous pour ce coup s'il lui plaist: car toute vtile et desirable qu'elle est, ie presuppose, qu'encore au besoing nous en pourrions nous bien du tout passer, et faire nostre effect sans elle. Vne ame bien nee, et exercee à la practique des hommes, se rend plainement aggreable d'elle mesme. L'art n'est autre	Let it come down to our level for this once, if it pleases. For useful and desirable as it is, I presume that even at need we could do entirely without it and achieve our purpose without it. A well-born soul, practiced in dealing with men, makes itself thoroughly agreeable on its own. Art is nothing

9 Hippomachus was a Greek wrestling master; the remark is in Plutarch.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
chose que le contrerolle, et le registre des productions de telles ames.	but the record and register of the productions of such souls.

WOMEN

The second kind: the company of beautiful and honorable women, enjoyed with care.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.3.12 C'est aussi pour moy vn doux commerce, que celuy des belles et honnestes femmes: nam nos quoque oculos eruditos habemus. Si l'ame n'y a pas tant à iouyr qu'au premier, les sens corporels qui participent aussi plus à cettuy-cy, le ramenent à vne proportion voisine de l'autre: quoy que selon moy, non pas esgalle. Mais c'est vn commerce où il se faut tenir vn peu sur ses gardes: et notamment ceux en qui le corps peut beaucoup, comme en moy. Ie m'y eschauday en mon enfance: et y souffris toutes les rages, que les poëtes disent aduenir à ceux qui s'y laissent aller sans ordre et sans iugement. Il est vray que ce coup de fouët m'a seruy depuis d'instruction.	Another sweet association for me is that of beautiful and decent women: for we too have learned eyes. If the soul has not as much to enjoy here as in the first, the bodily senses, which have a greater share in this one, bring it to a proportion close to the other, though in my view not equal. But it is an association in which one must stay a little on one's guard, especially those in whom the body has great power, as in me. I scalded myself at it in my youth, and suffered all the frenzies that the poets say befall those who abandon themselves to it without order and without judgment. It is true that this whipping has since served me as a lesson.
Quicumque Argolica de classe Capharea fugit, / Semper ab Euboicis vela retorquet aquis. C'est folie d'y attacher toutes ses pensees, et s'y engager d'vne affection furieuse et indiscrete. Mais d'autre part, de s'y mesler sans amour, et sans obligation de volonté, en forme de comediens, pour iouer vn rolle commun, de l'aage et de la coustume, et n'y mettre du sien que les parolles: c'est de vray pouruoir à sa seureté: mais bien laschement, comme celuy qui abandonneroit son honneur ou son proffit, ou son plaisir, de peur du danger. Car il est certain, que d'vne telle pratique, ceux qui la dressent, n'en peuuent esperer aucun fruict, qui touche ou satisface vne belle ame.	Whoever of the Argive fleet has escaped Caphareus / always turns his sails away from Euboean waters. It is folly to fasten all one's thoughts on it and to engage in it with a furious and indiscreet passion. But on the other hand, to mix in it without love and without commitment of the will, like actors, playing a common part of one's age and of custom, putting nothing of one's own into it but words—that is indeed providing for one's safety, but in a very cowardly way, like a man who would abandon his honor, his profit or his pleasure for fear of danger. For it is certain that those who go in for such a practice can expect from it no fruit that touches or satisfies a fine soul.[10]
Il faut auoir en bon escient desiré, ce qu'on veut prendre en bon escient plaisir de iouyr. Ie dy quand iniustement fortune fauoriseroit leur masque: ce qui aduient souuent, à cause de ce qu'il n'y a aucune d'elles, pour malotrüe qu'elle soit, qui ne pense estre bien aymable, qui ne se recommande par son aage, ou par son poil, ou par son mouuement (car de laides vniuersellement, il n'en est non plus que de belles) et les filles Brachmanes, qui ont faute d'autre recommendation, le peuple assemblé à cri publiq pour cet effect, vont en la place, faisans montre de leurs parties matrimoniales: veoir, si par là aumoins elles ne valent pas d'acquerir vn mary.	One must have truly desired what one wants truly to take pleasure in enjoying. I mean this even if fortune should unjustly favor their mask. That often happens, because there is no woman, however ill-favored, who does not think herself quite lovable, and who does not commend herself by her age, or her hair, or her way of moving (for there are no more women universally ugly than universally beautiful). And the Brahmin girls who lack other recommendation go into the square, the people having been assembled for the purpose by public crier, and display their matrimonial parts, 10 Ovid, Tristia 1.1. Caphareus, a cape of Euboea, is where the Greek fleet was wrecked on its return from Troy.

FRENCH

Par consequent il n'en est pas vne qui ne se laisse facilement persuader au premier serment qu'on luy fait de la seruir. Or de cette trahison commune et ordinaire des hommes d'auiourd'huy, il faut qu'il aduienne, ce que desia nous montre l'experience: c'est qu'elles se r'allient et reiettent à elles mesmes, ou entre elles, pour nous fuyr: ou bien qu'elles se rengent aussi de leur costé, à cet exemple que nous leur donnons: qu'elles ioüent leur part de la farce, et se prestent à cette negociation, sans passion, sans soing et sans amour: Neque affectui suo aut alieno obnoxiæ. Estimans, suyuant la persuasion de Lysias en Platon, qu'elles se peuuent addonner vtilement et commodement à nous, d'autant plus, que moins nous les aymons.

Il en ira comme des comedies, le peuple y aura autant ou plus de plaisir que les comediens. De moy, ie ne connois non plus Venus sans Cupidon, qu'vne maternité sans engeance. Ce sont choses qui s'entreprestent et s'entredoiuent leur essence. Ainsi cette piperie reiallit sur celuy qui la fait: il ne luy couste guere, mais il n'acquiert aussi rien qui vaille. Ceux qui ont faict Venus Deesse, ont regardé que sa principale beauté estoit incorporelle et spirituelle. Mais celle que ces gens cy cerchent, n'est pas seulement humaine, ny mesme brutale: les bestes ne la veulent si lourde et si terrestre.

Nous voyons que l'imagination et le desir les eschauffe souuent et solicite, auant le corps: nous voyons en l'vn et l'autre sexe, qu'en la presse elles ont du choix et du triage en leurs affections, et qu'elles ont entre-elles des accointances de longue bien-vueillance. Celles mesmes à qui la vieillesse refuse la force corporelle, fremissent encores, hannissent et tressaillent d'amour. Nous les voyons auant le faict, pleines d'esperance et d'ardeur: et quand le corps a ioué son ieu, se chatouiller encor de la douceur de cette souuenance: et en voyons qui s'enflent de fierté au partir de là, et qui en produisent des chants de feste et de triomphe, lasses et saoules.

Qui n'a qu'à descharger le corps d'vne necessité naturelle, n'a que faire d'y embesongner autruy auec des apprests si curieux. Ce n'est pas viande à vne grosse et lourde faim.

ENGLISH

to see whether by that at least they are not worth a husband.

Consequently there is not one who does not easily let herself be persuaded by the first vow made to her to serve her. Now from this common and ordinary treachery of the men of today, there must follow what experience already shows us. Either women rally and fall back on themselves, or on one another, to avoid us; or else they too, on their side, fall in with the example we give them. They play their part in the farce and lend themselves to this transaction without passion, without care and without love: in thrall neither to their own feelings nor to another's. They reckon, following the argument of Lysias in Plato, that they can give themselves to us profitably and conveniently, all the more as we love them less.[11]

It will be as with comedies: the audience will get as much pleasure from them as the actors, or more. For my part, I no more know Venus without Cupid than motherhood without offspring. They are things that lend and owe each other their essence. So this cheating rebounds on the one who practices it: it costs him little, but he gains nothing worth having either. Those who made Venus a goddess took into account that her principal beauty was incorporeal and spiritual. But the beauty these people seek is not merely human, nor even animal: the beasts do not want it so gross and earthy.

We see that imagination and desire often heat and stir the beasts before the body does. We see in both sexes that, in the herd, they have choice and discrimination in their affections, and that they form attachments among themselves of long goodwill. Even those to whom old age denies bodily strength still quiver, neigh and tremble with love. We see them before the act full of hope and ardor, and when the body has played its part, still tickling themselves with the sweetness of that memory. And we see some who swell with pride on leaving it, and who produce songs of festivity and triumph, weary and sated.

Whoever has only to relieve his body of a natural necessity has no need to involve another in it with such elaborate preparations. This is no food for a gross and heavy hunger.

11 Tacitus, Annals 13.45, of Poppaea. Lysias' speech in Plato's Phaedrus argues that one should favor a non-lover over a lover.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.3.13 Comme celuy qui ne demande point qu'on me tienne pour meilleur que ie suis, ie diray cecy des erreurs de ma ieunesse: non seulement pour le danger qu'il y a, de la santé, (si n'ay-ie sceu si bien faire, que ie n'en aye eu deux atteintes, legeres toutesfois, et preambulaires) mais encores par mespris, ie ne me suis guere adonné aux accointances venales et publiques. I'ay voulu aiguiser ce plaisir par la difficulté, par le desir et par quelque gloire. Et aymois la façon de l'Empereur Tibere, qui se prenoit en ses amours, autant par la modestie et noblesse, que par autre qualité.

Et l'humeur de la courtisane Flora, qui ne se prestoit à moins, que d'vn Dictateur, ou Consul, ou Censeur: et prenoit son deduit, en la dignité de ses amoureux. Certes les perles et le brocadel y conferent quelque chose: et les tiltres, et le train.

As one who does not ask to be thought better than I am, I will say this about the errors of my youth. I hardly ever went in for paid, public liaisons—not only because of the danger to health (and yet I did not manage so well that I escaped two touches of it, light ones, however, and preliminary), but also out of contempt. I wanted to sharpen that pleasure by difficulty, by desire and by some glory. And I liked the way of the Emperor Tiberius, who was captivated in his loves as much by modesty and nobility as by any other quality.

And the disposition of the courtesan Flora, who would give herself to no one less than a dictator, a consul or a censor, and took her delight in the dignity of her lovers. Certainly pearls and brocade contribute something to it, and titles, and a retinue.[12]

3.3.14 Au demeurant, ie faisois grand compte de l'esprit, mais pourueu que le corps n'en fust pas à dire. Car à respondre en conscience, si l'vne ou l'autre des deux beautez deuoit necessairement y faillir, i'eusse choisi de quitter plustost la spirituelle. Elle a son vsage en meilleures choses. Mais au subiect de l'amour, subiect qui principallement se rapporte à la veuë et à l'atouchement, on faict quelque chose sans les graces de l'esprit, rien sans les graces corporelles. C'est le vray aduantage des dames que la beauté: elle est si leur, que la nostre, quoy qu'elle desire des traicts vn peu autres, n'est en son point, que confuse auec la leur, puerile et imberbe.

On dit que chez le grand Seigneur, ceux qui le seruent sous titre de beauté, qui sont en nombre infini, ont leur congé, au plus loing, à vingt et deux ans. Les discours, la prudence, et les offices d'amitié, se trouuent mieux chez les hommes: pourtant gouuernent-ils les affaires du monde.

For the rest, I set great store by the mind, but provided the body was not lacking. For, to answer in conscience, if one or the other of the two beauties had necessarily to be missing, I would sooner have chosen to give up the spiritual one. It has its use in better things. But in the matter of love, a matter that relates chiefly to sight and touch, something can be done without the graces of the mind, nothing without the graces of the body. Beauty is the true advantage of women. It is so much theirs that ours, though it calls for somewhat different features, is at its best only when it is mixed with theirs, boyish and beardless.

They say that at the court of the Grand Signor, those who serve him by reason of their beauty, who are infinite in number, are dismissed at twenty-two at the latest. Reasoning, prudence and the offices of friendship are found better among men; that is why they govern the affairs of the world.[13]

BOOKS

The third and surest kind: books, always at hand, which console and divert.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.3.15 Ces deux commerces sont fortuites, et despendans d'autruy: l'vn est ennuyeux par sa rareté, l'autre se flestrit auec l'aage: ainsin ils n'eussent pas assez prouueu

These two kinds of association are fortuitous and depend on others. One is distressing in its rarity; the other withers with age; so they would not have 12 Flora was a Roman courtesan whom Plutarch says Pompey loved.

13 The Ottoman sultan.

FRENCH

au besoing de ma vie. Celuy des liures, qui est le troisiesme, est bien plus seur et plus à nous. Il cede aux premiers les autres aduantages: mais il a pour sa part la constance et facilité de son seruice. Cettuy-cy costoye tout mon cours, et m'assiste par tout: il me console en la vieillesse et en la solitude: il me descharge du poix d'vne oisiueté ennuyeuse: et me deffait à toute heure des compagnies qui me faschent: il emousse les pointures de la douleur, si elle n'est du tout extreme et maistresse.

Pour me distraire d'vne imagination importune, il n'est que de recourir aux liures, ils me destournent facilement à eux, et me la desrobent. Et si ne se mutinent point, pour voir que ie ne les recherche, qu'au deffaut de ces autres commoditez, plus reelles, viues et naturelles: ils me reçoiuent tousiours de mesme visage. Il a bel aller à pied, dit-on, qui meine son cheual par la bride.

Et nostre Iacques Roy de Naples, et de Sicile, qui beau, ieune, et sain, se faisoit porter par pays en ciuiere, couché sur vn meschant oriller de plume, vestu d'vne robe de drap gris, et vn bonnet de mesme: suiuy ce pendant d'vne grande pompe royalle, lictieres, cheuaux à main de toutes sortes, gentils-hommes et officiers: representoit vne austerité tendre encores et chancellante. Le malade n'est pas à plaindre, qui a la guarison en sa manche. En l'experience et vsage de cette sentence, qui est tres-veritable, consiste tout le fruict que ie tire des liures. Ie ne m'en sers en effect, quasi non plus que ceux qui ne les cognoissent poinct.

I'en iouys, comme les auaritieux des tresors, pour sçauoir que i'en iouyray quand il me plaira: mon ame se rassasie et contente de ce droict de possession. Ie ne voyage sans liures, ny en paix, ny en guerre. Toutesfois il se passera plusieurs iours, et des mois, sans que ie les employe. Ce sera tantost, dis-ie, ou demain, ou quand il me plaira: le temps court et s'en va ce pendant sans me blesser. Car il ne se peut dire, combien ie me repose et seiourne en cette consideration, qu'ils sont à mon costé pour me donner du plaisir à mon heure: et à reconnoistre, combien ils portent de secours à ma vie.

ENGLISH

provided sufficiently for the needs of my life. That of books, which is the third, is much more secure and more our own. It yields the other advantages to the first two, but it has for its share the constancy and ease of its service. It goes along beside my whole course and attends me everywhere. It consoles me in old age and in solitude. It relieves me of the weight of a wearisome idleness, and rids me at any hour of company that annoys me. It blunts the stings of pain, unless the pain is altogether extreme and in command.

To divert me from a troublesome fancy, I need only turn to books: they easily draw me to them and steal it away from me. And yet they do not mutiny on seeing that I seek them only for lack of those other pleasures, more real, lively and natural; they always receive me with the same face. He may well go on foot, they say, who leads his horse by the bridle.

And our Jacques, king of Naples and Sicily, handsome, young and healthy, had himself carried about the country on a stretcher, lying on a wretched feather pillow, dressed in a gown of gray cloth with a cap to match. Meanwhile he was followed by great royal pomp, litters, led horses of all sorts, gentlemen and officers. He displayed an austerity still tender and wavering. The sick man is not to be pitied who has his cure up his sleeve. In the experience and practice of this maxim, which is very true, lies all the fruit I draw from books. In fact I make hardly more use of them than those who do not know them at all.[14]

I enjoy them as misers enjoy their treasures, knowing that I shall enjoy them when I please; my soul is sated and contented with this right of possession. I do not travel without books, either in peace or in war. Yet many days will pass, and months, without my using them. Soon, I say, or tomorrow, or when I please; meanwhile time runs on and goes by without hurting me. For it is impossible to say how much I rest and take my ease in the thought that they are at my side to give me pleasure when I choose, and in recognizing how much help they bring to my life.

14 Jacques de Bourbon, count of La Marche (d. 1438), husband of Queen Joanna II of Naples, who later became a Franciscan.

THE LIBRARY IN THE TOWER

Montaigne describes the round library where he reads, dreams and dictates.

FRENCH

C'est la meilleure munition que i'aye trouué à cet humain voyage: et plains extremement les hommes d'entendement, qui l'ont à dire. I'accepte plustost toute autre sorte d'amusement, pour leger qu'il soit: d'autant que cettuy-cy ne me peut faillir. Chez moy, ie me destourne vn peu plus souuent à ma librairie, d'où, tout d'vne main, ie commande mon mesnage. Ie suis sur l'entree, et vois soubs moy, mon iardin, ma basse cour, ma cour, et dans la plus part des membres de ma maison. Là ie feuillette à cette heure vn liure, à cette heure vn autre, sans ordre et sans dessein, à pieces descousues. Tantost ie resue, tantost i'enregistre et dicte, en me promenant, mes songes que voicy. Elle est au troisiesme estage d'vne tour.

Le premier, c'est ma chapelle, le second vne chambre et sa suitte, où ie me couche souuent, pour estre seul. Au dessus, elle a vne grande garderobe. C'estoit au temps passé, le lieu plus inutile de ma maison. Ie passe là et la plus part des iours de ma vie, et la plus part des heures du iour. Ie n'y suis iamais la nuict. A sa suitte est vn cabinet assez poly, capable à receuoir du feu pour l'hyuer, tres-plaisamment percé.

Et si ie ne craignoy non plus le soing que la despense, le soing qui me chasse de toute besongne: i'y pourroy facilement coudre à chasque costé vne gallerie de cent pas de long, et douze de large, à plein pied: ayant trouué tous les murs montez, pour autre vsage, à la hauteur qu'il me faut. Tout lieu retiré requiert vn proumenoir. Mes pensees dorment, si ie les assis. Mon esprit ne va pas seul, comme si les iambes l'agitent. Ceux qui estudient sans liure, en sont tous là.

La figure en est ronde, et n'a de plat, que ce qu'il faut à ma table et à mon siege: et vient m'offrant en se courbant, d'vne veuë, tous mes liures, rengez sur des pulpitres à cinq degrez tout à l'enuiron. Elle a trois veuës de riche et libre prospect, et seize pas de vuide en diametre. En hyuer i'y suis moins continuellement: car ma maison est iuchee sur vn tertre, comme dit son nom: et n'a point de piece plus euentee que cette cy: qui me

ENGLISH

It is the best provision I have found for this human journey, and I greatly pity men of intelligence who lack it. I take up any other sort of amusement first, however slight, since this one cannot fail me. At home I turn aside a little more often to my library, from which I direct my household at the same time. It is over the entrance, and I see below me my garden, my farmyard, my courtyard, and into most parts of my house. There I leaf through now one book, now another, without order and without plan, in disconnected pieces. Now I muse; now I record and dictate, walking up and down, these musings of mine you have here. It is on the third floor of a tower.[15]

The first floor is my chapel, the second a bedroom with its adjoining rooms, where I often lie down to be alone. Above it is a large wardrobe room. In times past it was the most useless place in my house. There I spend most of the days of my life and most of the hours of the day. I am never there at night. Next to it is a rather elegant little study, with a fireplace for the winter, very pleasantly windowed.

And if I feared the trouble no more than the expense—the trouble that drives me from every task—I could easily join on to each side a gallery a hundred paces long and twelve wide, on the same level, for I have found all the walls already built, for another purpose, to the height I need. Every secluded place needs a walk. My thoughts fall asleep if I make them sit down. My mind does not go on its own, as it does when my legs move it. Those who study without a book are all in the same case.

Its shape is round, with no flat part except what is needed for my table and chair. Curving around me, it offers me at a glance all my books, arranged on shelves five tiers high all the way round. It has three views with a rich and open prospect, and sixteen paces of free space across. In winter I am there less continually, for my house is perched on a hillock, as its name says, and has no room more 15 The tower still stands at the château de Montaigne in the Périgord, with the Latin and Greek maxims he had painted on the library beams.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	plaist d'estre vn peu penible et à l'esquart, tant pour le fruit de l'exercice, que pour reculer de moy la presse. C'est là mon siege.	exposed to the wind than this one. I like it for being a little hard to reach and out of the way, both for the benefit of the exercise and to keep the crowd at a distance. That is my seat.[16]
	I'essaye à m'en rendre la domination pure: et à soustraire ce seul coing, à la communauté et coniugale, et filiale, et ciuile. Par tout ailleurs ie n'ay qu'vne auctorité verbale: en essence, confuse. Miserable à mon gré, qui n'a chez soy, où estre à soy: où se faire particulierement la cour: où se cacher. L'ambition paye bien ses gents, de les tenir tousiours en montre, comme la statue d'vn marché. Magna seruitus est magna fortuna. Ils n'ont pas seulement leur retraict pour retraitte.	I try to make my rule there absolute, and to withdraw this one corner from all community, conjugal, filial and civil. Everywhere else I have only a verbal authority, in essence confused. Wretched, to my mind, is the man who has nowhere in his own home where he can be by himself, where he can pay court to himself in private, where he can hide. Ambition pays its people well by keeping them always on display, like a statue in a marketplace. A great fortune is a great servitude. They cannot even have their privy for privacy.
	Ie n'ay rien iugé de si rude en l'austerité de vie, que nos religieux affectent, que ce que ie voy en quelqu'vne de leurs compagnies, auoir pour regle vne perpetuelle societé de lieu: et assistance nombreuse entre eux, en quelque action que ce soit. Et trouue aucunement plus supportable, d'estre tousiours seul, que ne le pouuoir iamais estre.	I have found nothing so harsh in the austerity of life our monks affect as what I see in some of their orders: a rule of perpetual sharing of place, and numerous company among them in every action whatever. And I find it somewhat more bearable to be always alone than never to be able to be so.
3.3.16	Si quelqu'vn me dit, que c'est auillir les muses, de s'en seruir seulement de iouet, et de passetemps, il ne sçait pas comme moy, combien vaut le plaisir, le ieu et le passetemps: à peine que ie ne die toute autre fin estre ridicule. Ie vis du iour à la iournee, et parlant en reuerence, ne vis que pour moy: mes desseins se terminent là. I'estudiay ieune pour l'ostentation; depuis, vn peu pour m'assagir: à cette heure pour m'esbattre: iamais pour le quest. Vne humeur vaine et despensiere que i'auois, apres cette sorte de meuble: non pour en prouuoir seulement mon besoing, mais de trois pas au dela, pour m'en tapisser et parer: ie l'ay pieça abandonnee.	If someone tells me that it is degrading the Muses to use them only as a toy and a pastime, he does not know, as I do, how much pleasure, play and pastime are worth. I would almost say that any other aim is ridiculous. I live from day to day, and, saving your reverence, I live only for myself; my plans end there. In youth I studied for show; later, a little to make myself wiser; now for amusement; never for gain. I once had a vain, spendthrift humor for this sort of furniture—not merely to provide for my need, but to go three steps beyond it, to deck and adorn myself with it. I gave it up long ago.
3.3.17	Les liures ont beaucoup de qualitez aggreables à ceux qui les sçauent choisir. Mais aucun bien sans peine. C'est vn plaisir qui n'est pas net et pur, non plus que les autres: il a ses incommoditez, et bien poisantes. L'ame s'y exerce, mais le corps, duquel ie n'ay non plus oublié le soing, demeure ce pendant sans action, s'atterre et s'attriste. Ie ne sçache excez plus dommageable pour moy, ny plus à euiter, en cette declinaison d'aage.	Books have many qualities pleasing to those who know how to choose them. But no good without pain. It is a pleasure no more clean and pure than the others; it has its drawbacks, and heavy ones. The mind exercises itself, but the body, whose care I have not forgotten either, meanwhile remains inactive, grows heavy and dejected. I know of no excess more harmful to me, or more to be avoided, in this decline of age.
3.3.18

16 "Montaigne" means "mountain."

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Voyla mes trois occupations fauories et particulieres. Ie ne parle point de celles que ie doibs au monde par obligation ciuile.	Those are my three favorite and particular occupations. I do not speak of those I owe to the world by civic obligation.

III.4 Of Diversion

De la Diuersion

Montaigne shows that grief, fear, and passion are better eased by turning the mind aside than by facing them head-on.

FRENCH

3.4.1 I'AY autresfois esté employé à consoler vne dame vrayement affligee. La plus part de leurs deuils sont artificiels et ceremonieux. Vberibus semper lacrymis, sempérque paratis
In statione sua, atque expectantibus illam
Quo iubeat manare modo. On y procede mal, quand on s'oppose à cette passion: car l'opposition les pique et les engage plus auant à la tristesse. On exaspere le mal par la ialousie du debat. Nous voyons des propos communs, que ce que i'auray dit sans soing, si on vient à me le contester, ie m'en formalise, ie l'espouse: beaucoup plus ce à quoy i'aurois interest.

Et puis en ce faisant, vous vous presentez à vostre operation d'vne entree rude: là où les premiers accueils du medecin enuers son patient, doiuent estre gracieux, gays, et aggreables. Iamais medecin laid, et rechigné n'y fit œuure. Au contraire doncq, il faut ayder d'arriuee et fauoriser leur plaincte, et en tesmoigner quelque approbation et excuse. Par cette intelligence, vous gaignez credit à passer outre, et d'vne facile et insensible inclination, vous vous coulez aux discours plus fermes et propres à leur guerison. Moy, qui ne desirois principalement que de piper l'assistance, qui auoit les yeux sur moy, m'aduisay de plastrer le mal. Aussi me trouue-ie par experience, auoir mauuaise main et infructueuse à persuader.

Ou ie presente mes raisons trop pointues et trop seiches: ou trop brusquement: ou trop nonchalamment. Apres que ie me fus appliqué vn temps à son tourment, ie n'essayay pas de le guarir par fortes et viues raisons: par ce que i'en ay faute, ou que ie pensois autrement faire mieux mon effect. Ny n'allay choisissant les diuerses manieres, que la philosophie prescrit à consoler: Que ce qu'on plaint n'est pas mal, comme Cleanthes: Que c'est vn leger mal, comme les Peripateticiens: Que se plaindre n'est action, ny iuste, ny loüable, comme Chrysippus: Ny

ENGLISH

I was once employed to console a lady who was truly afflicted. Most of their mourning is artificial and ceremonious. Tears always abundant, always ready at their post, waiting for her to command them how to flow. It is a mistake to oppose this passion, for opposition goads them and drives them further into sadness. One aggravates the ill by the jealousy of debate. We see from ordinary conversation that if something I have said carelessly comes to be contested, I take offense and embrace it—much more so something in which I have an interest.[1]

And then, in doing so, you begin your operation with a rough approach, whereas the physician's first greetings to his patient should be gracious, cheerful and pleasant. No ugly, sullen physician ever achieved anything. So, on the contrary, you must from the start help and encourage their lament, and show some approval and excuse for it. By this understanding you gain credit to go further, and by an easy and imperceptible inclination you slide into firmer arguments, fitter to cure them. I, who wanted chiefly to beguile the company, who had their eyes on me, decided to plaster over the ill. And indeed I find by experience that I have a poor and unfruitful hand at persuading.

Either I present my reasons too sharp and too dry, or too abruptly, or too casually. After I had applied myself to her torment for a while, I did not try to cure it with strong and lively reasons, because I lack them, or because I thought I could achieve my purpose better otherwise. Nor did I go choosing among the various methods of consolation that philosophy prescribes: that what one laments is not an evil, like Cleanthes; that it is a slight evil,

1 Juvenal, Satires 6.

FRENCH

cette cy d'Epicurus, plus voisine à mon style, de transferer la pensee des choses fascheuses aux plaisantes: Ny faire vne charge de tout cet amas, le dispensant par occasion, comme Cicero.

Mais declinant tout mollement noz propos, et les gauchissant peu à peu, aux subiects plus voysins, et puis vn peu plus eslongnez, selon qu'elle se prestoit plus à moy, ie luy desrobay imperceptiblement cette pensee douloureuse: et la tins en bonne contenance et du tout r'apaisee autant que i'y fus. I'vsay de diuersion. Ceux qui me suyuirent à ce mesme seruice, n'y trouuerent aucun amendement: car ie n'auois pas porté la coignee aux racines.

ENGLISH

like the Peripatetics; that lamenting is an action neither just nor praiseworthy, like Chrysippus. Nor did I use this one of Epicurus, closer to my style, of transferring one's thoughts from unpleasant things to pleasant ones; nor did I make a load of this whole heap and dispense it as occasion arose, like Cicero.[2]

But steering our talk very gently, and turning it little by little to nearby subjects and then to ones a little further away, as she lent herself more to me, I imperceptibly stole that painful thought from her, and kept her composed and entirely calm for as long as I was there. I used diversion. Those who followed me in the same service found no improvement in her, for I had not laid the axe to the roots.

DIVERSIONS PUBLIC AND PRIVATE

Generals, Atalanta's suitor and physicians all succeed by turning attention elsewhere.

FRENCH

3.4.2 A l'aduenture ay-ie touché quelque espece de diuersions publiques. Et l'vsage des militaires, dequoy se seruit Pericles en la guerre Peloponnesiaque: et mille autres ailleurs, pour reuoquer de leurs païs les forces contraires, est trop frequent aux histoires. Ce fut vn ingenieux destour, dequoy le Sieur d'Himbercourt sauua et soy et d'autres, en la ville du Liege: où le Duc de Bourgongne, qui la tenoit assiegee, l'auoit fait entrer, pour executer les conuenances de leur reddition accordee. Ce peuple assemblé de nuict pour y pouruoir, commence à se mutiner contre ces accords passez: et delibererent plusieurs, de courre sus aux negociateurs, qu'ils tenoient en leur puissance.

Luy, sentant le vent de la premiere ondee de ces gens, qui venoient se ruer en son logis, lascha soudain vers eux, deux des habitans de la ville, (car il y en auoit aucuns auec luy) chargez de plus douces et nouuelles offres, à proposer en leur conseil, qu'il auoit forgees sur le champ pour son besoing. Ces deux arresterent la premiere tempeste, ramenant cette tourbe esmeüe en la maison de ville, pour ouyr leur charge, et y deliberer. La deliberation fut courte.

Voicy desbonder vn second orage, autant animé que l'autre: et luy à leur despecher en teste, quatre nouueaux

ENGLISH

Perhaps I have touched here on some sort of public diversions. And the military practice that Pericles used in the Peloponnesian War, and a thousand others elsewhere, to draw enemy forces away from their own countries, is all too frequent in the histories. It was an ingenious ruse by which the Sieur d'Himbercourt saved both himself and others in the city of Liège. The Duke of Burgundy, who was besieging it, had sent him in to carry out the terms of their agreed surrender. The people, assembled by night to deal with this, began to rebel against the agreements made, and many resolved to fall upon the negotiators, whom they held in their power.[3]

He, getting wind of the first wave of these people, who were coming to storm his lodging, at once sent out to them two of the city's inhabitants (for he had some with him). They carried new and milder offers, which he had invented on the spot for his need, to be put before their council. These two stopped the first storm, leading the agitated mob back to the town hall to hear their message and deliberate on it. The deliberation was short.

Then a second storm broke loose, as fierce as the first; and he sent four new and similar inter-

2 Cicero reviews these methods of consolation in Tusculan Disputations 3.
3 Guy de Brimeu, lord of Humbercourt, envoy of Charles the Bold at Liège in 1467; the story is from Commynes' Memoirs.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	et semblables intercesseurs, protestans auoir à leur declarer à ce coup, des presentations plus grasses, du tout à leur contentement et satisfaction: par où ce peuple fut de rechef repoussé dans le conclaue. Somme, que par telle dispensation d'amusemens, diuertissant leur furie, et la dissipant en vaines consultations, il l'endormit en fin, et gaigna le iour, qui estoit son principal affaire.	cessors out to meet them, declaring that this time they had richer proposals to put to them, entirely to their content and satisfaction. By this the people were driven back once more into the conclave. In short, by such a dispensing of distractions, turning aside their fury and dissipating it in vain consultations, he finally lulled it to sleep and held out until daylight, which was his main concern.
3.4.3	Cet autre comte est aussi de ce predicament. Atalante fille de beauté excellente, et de merueilleuse disposition, pour se deffaire de la presse de mille poursuiuants, qui la demandoient en mariage, leur donna cette loy, qu'elle accepteroit celuy qui l'egalleroit à la course, pourueu que ceux qui y faudroient, en perdissent la vie. Il s'en trouua assez, qui estimerent ce prix digne d'vn tel hazard, et qui encoururent la peine de ce cruel marché. Hippomenes ayant à faire son essay apres les autres, s'adressa à la deesse tutrice de cette amoureuse ardeur, l'appellant à son secours: qui exauçant sa priere, le fournit de trois pommes d'or, et de leur vsage.	This other story also falls into the same category. Atalanta, a girl of excellent beauty and wonderful agility, wanted to rid herself of the throng of a thousand suitors who sought her in marriage. She gave them this law: she would accept the one who equaled her in a race, provided that those who failed lost their lives. There were enough who judged that prize worth such a risk, and who incurred the penalty of this cruel bargain. Hippomenes, who had to make his trial after the others, turned to the goddess who is guardian of this amorous ardor and called on her for help. She granted his prayer and supplied him with three golden apples and with instructions for their use.
	Le champ de la course ouuert, à mesure qu'Hippomenes sent sa maistresse luy presser les talons, il laisse eschapper, comme par inaduertance, l'vne de ces pommes: la fille amusee de sa beauté, ne faut point de se destourner pour l'amasser: Obstupuit virgo, nitidique cupidine pomi / Declinat cursus, aurúmque volubile tollit. Autant en fit-il à son poinct, et de la seconde et de la tierce: iusques à ce que par ce fouruoyement et diuertissement, l'aduantage de la course luy demeura.	When the race began, as Hippomenes feels his beloved pressing on his heels, he lets one of the apples drop as if by inadvertence. The girl, beguiled by its beauty, does not fail to turn aside to pick it up: The maiden was dazzled, and in her desire for the shining fruit / she swerves from her course and picks up the rolling gold. He did the same at the right moment with the second and the third, until by this straying and diversion the advantage in the race remained his.[4]
3.4.4	Quand les medecins ne peuuent purger le caterrhe, ils le diuertissent, et desuoyent à vne autre partie moins dangereuse. Ie m'apperçoy que c'est aussi la plus ordinaire recepte aux maladies de l'ame. Abducendus etiam nonnunquam animus est ad alia studia, solicitudines, curas, negotia: loci denique mutatione, tanquam ægroti non conualescentes, sæpe curandus est. On luy fait peu choquer les maux de droit fil: on ne luy en fait ny soustenir ny rabatre l'atteinte: on la luy fait decliner et gauchir.	When physicians cannot purge a catarrh, they divert it and shift it to another, less dangerous part. I notice that this is also the most usual remedy for the diseases of the soul. The mind must sometimes be drawn away to other pursuits, concerns, cares, business; and finally it must often be treated by a change of place, like sick people who are not recovering. We seldom make it meet ills head-on; we make it neither withstand their attack nor beat it back; we make it dodge and sidestep them.[5]
3.4.5	Cette autre leçon est trop haute et trop difficile. C'est à faire à ceux de la premiere classe, de s'arrester purement	That other lesson is too lofty and too difficult. It is for those of the first rank to keep purely to the 4 Ovid, Metamorphoses 10; the goddess is Venus.

5 Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 4.35.

FRENCH

à la chose, la considerer, la iuger. Il appartient à vn seul Socrates, d'accointer la mort d'vn visage ordinaire, s'en appriuoiser et s'en iouer. Il ne cherche point de consolation hors de la chose: le mourir luy semble accident naturel et indifferent: il fiche là iustement sa veuë, et s'y resoult, sans regarder ailleurs.

Les disciples d'Hegesias, qui se font mourir de faim, eschauffez des beaux discours de ses leçons, et si dru que le Roy Ptolomee luy fit defendre de plus entretenir son eschole de ces homicides discours: ceux là ne considerent point la mort en soy, ils ne la iugent point: ce n'est pas là où ils arrestent leur pensee: ils courent, ils visent à vn estre nouueau.

3.4.6 Ces pauures gens qu'on void sur l'eschaffaut, remplis d'vne ardente deuotion, y occupants tous leurs sens autant qu'ils peuuent: les aureilles aux instructions qu'on leur donne; les yeux et les mains tendues au ciel: la voix à des prieres hautes, auec vne esmotion aspre et continuelle, font certes chose louable et conuenable à vne telle necessité. On les doibt louer de religion: mais non proprement de constance. Ils fuyent la lucte: ils destournent de la mort leur consideration: comme on amuse les enfans pendant qu'on leur veut donner le coup de lancette. I'en ay veu, si par fois leur veuë se raualoit à ces horribles asprets de la mort, qui sont autour d'eux, s'en transir, et reietter auec furie ailleurs leur pensee.

A ceux qui passent vne profondeur effroyable, on ordonne de clorre ou destourner leurs yeux.

3.4.7 Subrius Flauius, ayant par le commandement de Neron, à estre deffaict, et par les mains de Niger, tous deux chefs de guerre: quand on le mena au champ, où l'execution deuoit estre faicte, voyant le trou que Niger auoit fait cauer pour le mettre, inegal et mal formé: Ny cela, mesme, dit-il, se tournant aux soldats qui y assistoyent, n'est selon la discipline militaire. Et à Niger, qui l'exhortoit de tenir la teste ferme: Frapasses tu seulement aussi ferme. Et deuina bien: car le bras tremblant à Niger, il la luy coupa à diuers coups. Cettuy-cy semble auoir eu sa pensee droittement et fixement au subiect.

ENGLISH

thing itself, to consider it, to judge it. It belongs to Socrates alone to meet death with an ordinary face, to grow familiar with it and play with it. He seeks no consolation outside the thing itself. Dying seems to him a natural and indifferent accident; he fixes his gaze precisely there and makes up his mind to it, without looking elsewhere.

The disciples of Hegesias, who starved themselves to death, fired by the fine discourses of his lessons —and in such numbers that King Ptolemy had him forbidden to entertain his school any longer with these murderous discourses—those people do not consider death in itself; they do not judge it; that is not where they fix their thought. They run, they aim at a new existence.[6]

Those poor people we see on the scaffold, filled with ardent devotion, occupy all their senses with it as much as they can: their ears with the instructions given to them, their eyes and hands raised to heaven, their voices in loud prayers, with a harsh and continual emotion. They are certainly doing something praiseworthy and fitting for such a necessity. We should praise them for religion, but not properly for steadfastness. They flee the struggle; they turn their attention away from death, as we distract children when we are about to give them the stroke of the lancet. I have seen some who, if their gaze sometimes dropped to the horrible harshness of death around them, froze with fear and furiously threw their thoughts elsewhere.

Those who cross over a frightful depth are told to close or avert their eyes.

Subrius Flavus had been condemned by Nero's command to be put to death at the hands of Niger, both of them military commanders. When he was led out to the field where the execution was to take place, he saw that the pit Niger had had dug to put him in was uneven and badly shaped. "Not even this," he said, turning to the soldiers who were present, "is according to military discipline." And to Niger, who was urging him to hold his head steady: "If only you strike as steadily." He guessed right, for Niger's arm trembled and he cut off his head in several blows. This man seems to have 6 Hegesias was nicknamed "the death-persuader"; the story is in Cicero.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

kept his thought squarely and fixedly on the matter.[7]

3.4.8 Celuy qui meurt en la meslee, les armes à la main, il n'estudie pas lors la mort, il ne la sent, ny ne la considere: l'ardeur du combat l'emporte. Vn honneste homme de ma cognoissance, estant tombé comme il se batoit en estocade, et se sentant daguer à terre par son ennemy de neuf ou dix coups, chacun des assistans luy crioit qu'il pensast à sa conscience, mais il me dit depuis, qu'encores que ces voix luy vinssent aux oreilles, elles ne l'auoient aucunement touché, et qu'il ne pensa iamais qu'à se descharger et à se venger. Il tua son homme en ce mesme combat. Beaucoup fit pour L.

The man who dies in the thick of the fight, weapons in hand, is not studying death at that moment; he neither feels it nor considers it: the heat of combat carries him away. A decent man of my acquaintance fell while fighting with the sword, and felt his enemy stab him with a dagger nine or ten times as he lay on the ground. Every one of the bystanders was shouting at him to think of his conscience. But he told me afterward that although these voices reached his ears, they had not touched him at all, and that he thought of nothing but getting free and taking revenge. He killed his man in that same fight. A great service was done to L.

Syllanus, celuy qui luy apporta sa condamnation: de ce qu'ayant ouy sa response, qu'il estoit bien preparé à mourir, mais non pas de mains scelerees: il se rua sur luy, auec ses soldats pour le forcer: et comme luy tout desarmé, se defendoit obstinement de poingts et de pieds, il le fit mourir en ce debat: dissipant en prompte cholere et tumultuaire, le sentiment penible d'vne mort longue et preparee, à quoy il estoit destiné.

Silanus by the man who brought him his sentence. Having heard his reply, that he was well prepared to die, but not at the hands of criminals, this man rushed at him with his soldiers to overpower him; and as Silanus, completely unarmed, stubbornly defended himself with fists and feet, he had him killed in the struggle. So he dissipated, in a quick and tumultuous anger, the painful feeling of the long, prepared death to which Silanus had been destined.[8]

3.4.9 Nous pensons tousiours ailleurs: l'esperance d'vne meilleure vie nous arreste et appuye: ou l'esperance de la valeur de nos enfans: ou la gloire future de nostre nom: ou la fuitte des maux de cette vie: ou la vengeance qui menasse ceux qui nous causent la mort: Spero equidem mediis, si quid pia numina possunt,
Supplicia hausurum scopulis, et nomine Dido
Sæpe vocaturum.
Audiam, et hæc manes veniet mihi fama sub imos. Xenophon sacrifioit couronné quand on luy vint annoncer la mort de son fils Gryllus, en la bataille de Mantinee. Au premier sentiment de cette nouuelle, il ietta sa couronne à terre: mais par la suitte du propos, entendant la forme d'vne mort tres-valeureuse, il l'amassa, et remit sur sa teste.

We are always thinking of something else. The hope of a better life stops us and props us up; or the hope of our children's worth; or the future glory of our name; or escape from the ills of this life; or the vengeance that threatens those who cause our death: I hope indeed, if the righteous powers can do anything, that amid the rocks
You will drain your punishment to the dregs, and call on Dido by name Again and again.
I shall hear it, and the news will reach me down among the shades. Xenophon was offering a sacrifice, wearing a garland, when they came to tell him of the death of his son Gryllus at the battle of Mantinea. At the first impression of the news he threw his garland to the ground; but as the account went on, hearing how very valiant a death it

7 Subrius Flavus, a tribune of the praetorian guard, was executed in AD 65 for his part in the Pisonian conspiracy against Nero; the story is in Tacitus, Annals XV.
8 Lucius Junius Silanus was killed on Nero's orders in AD 65 (Tacitus, Annals XVI).

FRENCH	ENGLISH
	had been, he picked it up and put it back on his head.[9]
Epicurus mesme se console en sa fin, sur l'eternité et l'vtilité de ses escrits. Omnes clari et nobilitati labores, fiunt tolerabiles. Et la mesme playe, le mesme trauail, ne poise pas, dit Xenophon, à vn general d'armee, comme à vn soldat. Epaminondas print sa mort bien plus alaigrement, ayant esté informé, que la victoire estoit demeuree de son costé. Hæc sunt solatia, hæc fomenta summorum dolorum. Et telles autres circonstances nous amusent, diuertissent et destournent de la consideration de la chose en soy. Voire les arguments de la philosophie, vont à touts coups costoyans et gauchissans la matiere, et à peine essuyans sa crouste.	Epicurus himself, at his end, consoles himself with the eternity and usefulness of his writings. All labors that bring fame and renown become bearable. And the same wound, the same toil, does not weigh as heavily, says Xenophon, on a general as on a soldier. Epaminondas took his death far more cheerfully once he had been told that the victory had remained on his side. These are the consolations, these the soothing remedies for the greatest pains. And other such circumstances amuse, divert and turn us away from considering the thing itself. Even the arguments of philosophy are forever skirting and sidestepping the matter, barely brushing its crust.[10]
Le premier homme de la premiere eschole philosophique, et surintendante des autres, ce grand Zenon, contre la mort: Nul mal n'est honorable: la mort l'est: elle n'est pas donc mal. Contre l'yurongnerie: Nul ne fie son secret à l'yurongne: chacun le fie au sage: le sage ne sera donc pas yurongne. Cela est-ce donner au blanc? I'ayme à veoir ces ames principales, ne se pouuoir desprendre de nostre consorce. Tant parfaicts hommes qu'ils soyent, ce sont tousiours bien lourdement des hommes.	The foremost man of the foremost school of philosophy, the one that presides over all the others, the great Zeno, argues against death: "No evil is honorable; death is honorable; therefore death is not an evil." Against drunkenness: "No one entrusts his secret to a drunkard; everyone entrusts it to the wise man; therefore the wise man will not be a drunkard." Is that hitting the target? I like to see these leading souls unable to break free of our common fellowship. However perfect they may be, they are still, very clumsily, men.

DIVERTING PASSIONS

Revenge and love can be weakened by turning them aside rather than fighting them head-on.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.4.10 C'est vne douce passion que la vengeance, de grande impression et naturelle: ie le voy bien, encore que ie n'en aye aucune experience. Pour en distraire dernierement vn ieune Prince, ie ne luy allois pas disant, qu'il falloit prester la iouë à celuy qui vous auoit frappé l'autre, pour le deuoir de charité: ny ne luy allois representer les tragiques euenements que la poësie attribue à cette passion. Ie la laissay là, et m'amusay à luy faire gouster la beauté d'vne image contraire: l'honneur, la faueur, la bien-vueillance qu'il acquerroit par clemence et bonté: ie le destournay à l'ambition. Voyla comme lon en faict.	Revenge is a sweet passion, one that strikes deep and comes naturally: I can see that well enough, though I have no experience of it. Recently, to draw a young prince away from it, I did not go telling him that out of the duty of charity he must offer his cheek to the man who had struck him on the other one; nor did I go setting before him the tragic outcomes that poetry attributes to this passion. I left it alone and busied myself making him savor the beauty of a contrary picture: the honor, the favor, the goodwill he would gain by clemency and kindness. I diverted him toward ambition. That is how it is done.

9 Virgil, Aeneid IV: Dido cursing the departing Aeneas. The battle of Mantinea was fought in 362 BC.
10 Both Latin quotations are from Cicero, Tusculan Disputations II.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.4.11 Si vostre affection en l'amour est trop puissante, dissipez la, disent-ils. Et disent vray, car ie l'ay souuent essayé auec vtilité. Rompez la à diuers desirs, desquels il y en ayt vn regent et vn maistre, si vous voulez, mais de peur qu'il ne vous gourmande et tyrannise, affoiblissez-le, seiournez-le, en le diuisant et diuertissant. Cùm morosa vago singultiet inguine vena, Coniicito humorem collectum in corpora quæque. Et pouruoyez y de bonne heure, de peur que vous n'en soyez en peine, s'il vous a vne fois saisi. Si non prima nouis conturbes vulnera plagis, Volgiuagáque vagus Venere ante recentia cures.

If your affection in love is too powerful, disperse it, they say. And they are right, for I have often tried it to good effect. Break it up into various desires; one of them may be ruler and master, if you like, but for fear it should bully and tyrannize you, weaken it, hold it in check by dividing and diverting it. When the peevish vein throbs in your restless groin, Discharge the gathered fluid into any body you please. And see to it early, for fear you will be in trouble once it has seized you. Unless you confound the first wounds with fresh blows,
And heal them while still new, roaming after a roving Venus.[11]

3.4.12 Ie fus autrefois touché d'vn puissant desplaisir, selon ma complexion: et encores plus iuste que puissant: ie m'y fusse perdu à l'aduenture, si ie m'en fusse simplement fié à mes forces. Ayant besoing d'vne vehemente diuersion pour m'en distraire, ie me fis par art amoureux et par estude: à quoy l'aage m'aydoit. L'amour me soulagea et retira du mal, qui m'estoit causé par l'amitié. Par tout ailleurs de mesme. Vne aigre imagination me tient: ie trouue plus court, que de la dompter, la changer: ie luy en substitue, si ie ne puis vne contraire, aumoins vn' autre. Tousiours la variation soulage, dissout et dissipe. Si ie ne puis la combatre, ie luy eschappe: et en la fuïant, ie fouruoye, ie ruse.

I was once struck by a powerful grief, powerful for a temperament like mine, and even more just than powerful. I might well have been lost in it if I had simply relied on my own strength. Needing a vehement diversion to draw me away from it, I made myself fall in love, by art and by study, in which my age helped me. Love relieved me and drew me out of the pain that friendship had caused me. It is the same everywhere else. A bitter notion takes hold of me: I find it quicker to change it than to subdue it. I put another in its place, if not a contrary one, at least a different one. Variation always relieves, dissolves and dissipates. If I cannot fight it, I escape it; and in fleeing it I take detours and play tricks.[12]

Muant de lieu, d'occupation, de compagnie, ie me sauue dans la presse d'autres amusemens et pensees, où elle perd ma trace, et m'esgare.

Changing place, occupation, company, I slip away into the crowd of other amusements and thoughts, where it loses my trail and loses track of me.

3.4.13 Nature procede ainsi, par le benefice de l'inconstance. Car le temps qu'elle nous a donné pour souuerain medecin de nos passions, gaigne son effect principalement par là, que fournissant autres et autres affaires à nostre imagination, il demesle et corrompt cette premiere apprehension, pour forte qu'elle soit. Vn sage ne voit guere moins, son amy mourant, au bout de vingt et cinq ans, qu'au premier an; et suiuant Epicurus, de rien moins: car il n'attribuoit aucun leniment des fascheries, ny à la preuoyance, ny à l'antiquité d'icelles. Mais tant d'autres cogitations trauersent cette-cy, qu'elle s'alanguit, et se lasse en fin.

Nature proceeds this way, by the benefit of inconstancy. For time, which she has given us as the sovereign physician of our passions, achieves its effect chiefly by this: by supplying our imagination with one matter after another, it unravels and breaks down that first impression, however strong it may be. A wise man sees his friend dying hardly less after twenty-five years than in the first year; and according to Epicurus, not a bit less, for he attributed no easing of troubles either to foreseeing them or to their being old. But so many other thoughts cut across this one that it languishes and at last grows weary.

11 Persius, Satires VI; Lucretius, On the Nature of Things IV.
12 Generally taken to be the death of La Boétie in 1563.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.4.14 Pour destourner l'inclination des bruits communs, Alcibiades couppa les oreilles et la queuë à son beau chien, et le chassa en la place: afin que donnant ce subiect pour babiller au peuple, il laissast en paix ses autres actions. I'ay veu aussi, pour cet effect de diuertir les opinions et coniectures du peuple, et desuoyer les parleurs, des femmes, couurir leurs vrayes affections, par des affections contrefaictes. Mais i'en ay veu telle, qui en se contrefaisant s'est laissee prendre à bon escient, et a quitté la vraye et originelle affection pour la feinte: et aprins par elle, que ceux qui se trouuent bien logez, sont des sots de consentir à ce masque.

To turn the drift of common gossip elsewhere, Alcibiades cut off the ears and tail of his beautiful dog and drove it out into the public square, so that, having given the people this to chatter about, they would leave his other actions in peace. I have also seen women, for this same purpose of diverting public opinion and conjecture and throwing the talkers off the scent, cover their true affections with counterfeit ones. But I have seen one who, while counterfeiting, let herself be caught in earnest, and abandoned her true and original affection for the feigned one. From her I learned that those who find themselves well placed are fools to consent to this masquerade.

Les accueils et entretiens publiques estans reseruez à ce seruiteur aposté, croyez qu'il n'est guere habile, s'il ne se met en fin en vostre place, et vous envoye en la sienne. Cela c'est proprement tailler et coudre vn soulier, pour qu'vn autre le chausse.

Since the public welcomes and conversations are reserved for this planted suitor, believe me, he is not very clever if he does not end up putting himself in your place and sending you to his. That is truly cutting and stitching a shoe for someone else to wear.

LITTLE THINGS MOVE US

Small images and sounds stir our grief more than the thing itself.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.4.15 Peu de chose nous diuertit et destourne: car peu de chose nous tient. Nous ne regardons gueres les subiects en gros et seuls: ce sont des circonstances ou des images menues et superficielles qui nous frappent: et des vaines escorces qui reiallissent des subiects. Folliculos vt nunc teretes æstate cicadæ / Linquunt. Plutarque mesme regrette sa fille par des singeries de son enfance. Le souuenir d'vn adieu, d'vne action, d'vne grace particuliere, d'vne recommandation derniere, nous afflige. La robe de Cæsar troubla toute Romme, ce que sa mort n'auoit pas faict. Le son mesme des noms, qui nous tintoüine aux oreilles: Mon pauure maistre, ou mon grand amy: helas mon cher pere, ou ma bonne fille.

Little things divert and distract us, for little things hold us. We hardly ever look at subjects as a whole and by themselves; it is circumstances, or small, superficial images, that strike us, and the empty husks that peel off from subjects. As cicadas in summer / Leave behind their smooth husks. Even Plutarch mourns his daughter through the little antics of her childhood. The memory of a farewell, of an action, of some particular grace, of a last request, afflicts us. Caesar's robe threw all Rome into turmoil, which his death had not done. The very sound of names ringing in our ears: "My poor master," or "My great friend," "Alas, my dear father," or "My good daughter."[13]

Quand ces redites me pinsent, et que i'y regarde de pres, ie trouue que c'est vne pleinte grammairiene, le mot et le ton me blesse. Comme les exclamations des prescheurs, esmouuent leur auditoire souuent, plus que ne font leurs raisons: et comme nous frappe la voix piteuse d'vne beste qu'on tue pour nostre seruice: sans que ie poise ou penetre ce pendant, la vraye essence et massiue de mon

When these refrains pinch me and I look at them closely, I find it is a grammarian's lament: the word and the tone wound me. Just as preachers' exclamations often move their audience more than their reasons do, and as the pitiful cry of an animal being killed for our use strikes us—all without my weighing or getting to the bottom, 13 Lucretius, On the Nature of Things IV. Caesar's bloodstained robe was displayed by Mark Antony at the funeral in 44 BC.

FRENCH

subiect. His se stimulis dolor ipse lacessit. Ce sont les fondemens de nostre deuil.

3.4.16 L'opiniastreté de mes pierres, specialement en la verge, m'a par fois ietté en longues suppressions d'vrine, de trois, de quatre iours: et si auant en la mort, que c'eust esté follie d'esperer l'euiter, voyre desirer, veu les cruels efforts que cet estat m'apporte. O que ce bon Empereur, qui faisoit lier la verge à ses criminels, pour les faire mourir à faute de pisser, estoit grand maistre en la science de bourrellerie! Me trouuant là, ie consideroy par combien legeres causes et obiects, l'imagination nourrissoit en moy le regret de la vie: de quels atomes se bastissoit en mon ame, le poids et la difficulté de ce deslogement: à combien friuoles pensees nous donnions place en vn si grand affaire.

Vn chien, vn cheual, vn liure, vn verre, et quoy non? tenoient compte en ma perte. Aux autres, leurs ambitieuses esperances, leur bourse, leur science, non moins sottement à mon gré. Ie voy nonchalamment la mort, quand ie la voy vniuersellement, comme fin de la vie. Ie la gourmande en bloc: par le menu, elle me pille. Les larmes d'vn laquais, la dispensation de ma desferre, l'attouchement d'vne main cognue, vne consolation commune, me desconsole et m'attendrit.

Ainsi nous troublent l'ame, les plaintes des fables: et les regrets de Didon, et d'Ariadné passionnent ceux mesmes qui ne les croyent point en Virgile et en Catulle: c'est vne exemple de nature obstinee et dure, n'en sentir aucune emotion: comme on recite, pour miracle, de Polemon: mais aussi ne pallit il pas seulement à la morsure d'vn chien enragé, qui luy emporta le gras de la iambe. Et nulle sagesse ne va si auant, de conceuoir la cause d'vne tristesse, si viue et entiere, par iugement, qu'elle ne souffre accession par la presence, quand les yeux et les oreilles y ont leur part: parties qui ne peuuent estre agitees que par vains accidens.

3.4.17 Est-ce raison que les arts mesmes se seruent et facent leur proufit, de nostre imbecillité et bestise naturelle? L'orateur, dit la rhetorique, en cette farce de son plaidoier, s'esmouuera par le son de sa voix, et par ses agitations feintes; et se lairra piper à la passion qu'il

ENGLISH

meanwhile, of the true and solid essence of my subject. With these goads grief spurs itself on. These are the foundations of our mourning.[14]

The stubbornness of my stones, especially in the penis, has sometimes thrown me into long retentions of urine, of three or four days, and brought me so far into death that it would have been folly to hope to avoid it—indeed, to wish to, given the cruel agonies this condition brings me. Oh, what a great master in the science of torture was that good emperor who had his criminals' penises tied up so as to make them die for want of pissing! Finding myself in that state, I considered by what slight causes and objects imagination fed my regret for life in me; out of what atoms the weight and difficulty of this departure were built up in my soul; to what frivolous thoughts we gave room in so great an affair.[15]

A dog, a horse, a book, a glass, and what not, counted in my loss. For others, their ambitious hopes, their purse, their learning—no less foolishly, to my mind. I look at death nonchalantly when I look at it universally, as the end of life. Wholesale, I lord it over death; retail, it robs me. The tears of a lackey, the giving away of my cast-off clothes, the touch of a familiar hand, an ordinary word of consolation, disconsole me and melt me.

In the same way, the laments of fables trouble our soul; and the grief of Dido and of Ariadne stirs even those who do not believe in them, in Virgil and in Catullus. It is a sign of an obstinate, hard nature to feel no emotion at them, as is told of Polemon as a marvel; but then he did not even turn pale when a mad dog bit him and tore away the calf of his leg. And no wisdom goes so far as to grasp the cause of a sadness so vividly and completely by judgment that it is not increased by presence, when the eyes and ears have their share —parts that can be stirred only by superficial incidents.

Is it reasonable that even the arts should make use of our natural weakness and stupidity and profit by them? The orator, says rhetoric, in the farce of his pleading, will be moved by the sound of his own voice and by his feigned agitations, and will

14 Lucan, Pharsalia II.
15 The emperor is Tiberius, according to Suetonius.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
represente. Il s'imprimera vn vray deuil et essentiel, par le moyen de ce battelage qu'il iouë, pour le transmettre aux iuges, à qui il touche encore moins. Comme font ces personnes qu'on loüe aux mortuaires, pour ayder à la ceremonie du deuil, qui vendent leurs larmes à poix et à mesure, et leur tristesse.	let himself be taken in by the passion he is portraying. By means of the act he is putting on, he will impress on himself a true and essential grief, in order to pass it on to the judges, whom it concerns even less. Just like those people who are hired at funerals to help with the ceremony of mourning, who sell their tears and their sadness by weight and measure.
Car encore qu'ils s'esbranlent en forme empruntee, toutesfois en habituant et rengeant la contenance, il est certain qu'ils s'emportent souuent tous entiers, et reçoiuent en eux vne vraye melancholie. Ie fus entre plusieurs autres de ses amis, conduire à Soissons le corps de monsieur de Grammont, du siege de la Fere, où il fut tué. Ie consideray que par tout où nous passions, nous remplissions de lamentation et de pleurs, le peuple que nous rencontrions, par la seule montre de l'appareil de nostre conuoy: car seulement le nom du trespassé n'y estoit pas cogneu.	For although they set themselves going in a borrowed form, still, by adjusting and arranging their countenance, it is certain that they are often carried away entirely and take into themselves a real melancholy. I was one of several of his friends who escorted the body of Monsieur de Gramont to Soissons from the siege of La Fère, where he was killed. I observed that everywhere we passed, we filled the people we met with lamentation and tears, merely by the outward show of our funeral procession; for not even the dead man's name was known there.[16]
Quintilian dit auoir veu des comediens si fort engagez en vn rolle de deuil, qu'ils en pleuroient encore au logis: et de soy mesme, qu'ayant prins à esmouuoir quelque passion en autruy, il l'auoit espousee, iusques à se trouuer surprins, non seulement de larmes, mais d'vne palleur de visage et port d'homme vrayement accablé de douleur.	Quintilian says he has seen actors so deeply caught up in a role of mourning that they were still weeping over it at home; and says of himself that, having set out to stir some passion in others, he had so embraced it that he found himself overcome not only by tears but by a pallor of face and the bearing of a man truly crushed by grief.
3.4.18 En vne contree pres de nos montaignes, les femmes font le prestre-martin: car comme elles agrandissent le regret du mary perdu, par la souuenance des bonnes et agreables conditions qu'il auoit, elles font tout d'vn train aussi recueil et publient ses imperfections: comme pour entrer d'elles mesmes en quelque compensation, et se diuertir de la pitié au desdain. De bien meilleure grace encore que nous, qui à la perte du premier cognu, nous piquons à luy prester des louanges nouuelles et fauces: et à le faire tout autre, quand nous l'auons perdu de veuë, qu'il ne nous sembloit estre, quand nous le voyions. Comme si le regret estoit vne partie instructiue: ou que les larmes en lauant nostre entendement, l'esclaircissent.	In a region near our mountains, the women play both parts at once. For as they magnify their grief for the husband they have lost by recalling the good and pleasant qualities he had, they also, in the same breath, gather up and proclaim his imperfections, as if to strike some balance of their own accord and turn themselves from pity to disdain. They do it with much better grace than we do, who, on losing any acquaintance at all, make a point of lending him new and false praises, and of making him, once he is out of our sight, quite different from what he seemed to us when we could see him. As if regret were something that teaches, or as if tears, by washing our understanding, made it clearer.[17]
Ie renonce dés à present aux fauorables tesmoignages, qu'on me voudra donner, non par ce que i'en seray digne, mais par ce que ie seray mort.	I renounce here and now any favorable testimonies people may want to give me, not because I shall deserve them but because I shall be dead.

16 Philibert de Gramont, husband of Diane d'Andoins, was killed at the siege of La Fère in 1580.
17 "Faire le prestre-martin" was a proverb for playing both parts, after a priest Martin who said Mass and gave the responses himself.

THE POWER OF IMAGINATION

Empty fancies inflame and torment us as much as real causes.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.4.19	Qui demandera à celuy là, Quel interest auez vous à ce siege? L'interest de l'exemple, dira-il, et de l'obeyssance commune du Prince: ie n'y pretens proffit quelconque: et de gloire, ie sçay la petite part qui en peut toucher vn particulier comme moy: ie n'ay icy ny passion ny querelle. Voyez le pourtant le lendemain, tout changé, tout bouillant et rougissant de cholere, en son rang de bataille pour l'assaut. C'est la lueur de tant d'acier, et le feu et tintamarre de nos canons et de nos tambours, qui luy ont ietté cette nouuelle rigueur et hayne dans les veines. Friuole cause, me direz vous. Comment cause? il n'en faut point, pour agiter nostre ame.	Ask that man: "What is your interest in this siege?" "The interest of setting an example," he will say, "and of common obedience to the prince. I claim no profit from it whatever; and as for glory, I know how small a share of it can come to a private person like me. I have neither passion nor quarrel here." Yet look at him the next day, completely changed, boiling over and red with anger, in his place in the battle line for the assault. It is the gleam of so much steel, and the fire and din of our cannons and drums, that have thrown this new harshness and hatred into his veins. A frivolous cause, you will tell me. What do you mean, cause? None is needed to stir our soul.
	Vne resuerie sans corps et sans subiect la regente et l'agite. Que ie me mette à faire des chasteaux en Espaigne, mon imagination m'y forge des commoditez et des plaisirs, desquels mon ame est reellement chatouillee et resiouye. Combien de fois embrouillons nous nostre esprit de cholere ou de tristesse, par telles ombres, et nous inserons en des passions fantastiques, qui nous alterent et l'ame et le corps? Quelles grimaces, estonnees, riardes, confuses, excite la resuerie en noz visages! Quelles saillies et agitations de membres et de voix! Semble-il pas de cet homme seul, qu'il aye des visions fauces, d'vne presse d'autres hommes, auec qui il negocie: ou quelque demon interne, qui le persecute? Enquerez vous à vous, où est l'obiect de cette mutation?	A fancy without body or subject governs and stirs it. Let me start building castles in Spain, and my imagination forges comforts and pleasures for me there by which my soul is really tickled and gladdened. How many times do we cloud our mind with anger or sadness through such shadows, and throw ourselves into imaginary passions that alter both our soul and our body? What grimaces—astonished, laughing, bewildered—daydreaming calls up in our faces! What starts and agitations of limbs and voice! Doesn't it seem, of this man alone, that he is having false visions of a crowd of other men he is dealing with, or that some inner demon is persecuting him? Ask yourself where the object of this change is.
	Est-il rien sauf nous, en nature, que l'inanité substante, sur quoy elle puisse? Cambyses pour auoir songé en dormant, que son frere deuoit deuenir Roy de Perse, le fit mourir, vn frere qu'il aymoit, et duquel il s'estoit tousiours fié. Aristodemus Roy des Messeniens se tua, pour vne fantasie qu'il print de mauuais augure, de ie ne sçay quel hurlement de ses chiens. Et le Roy Midas en fit autant, troublé et fasché de quelque mal plaisant songe qu'il auoit songé. C'est priser sa vie iustement ce qu'elle est, de l'abandonner pour vn songe. Oyez pourtant nostre ame, triompher de la misere du corps, de sa foiblesse, de ce qu'il est en butte à toutes offences et alterations: vrayement elle a raison d'en parler.	Is there anything in nature but us that emptiness feeds, anything over which it has power? Cambyses, having dreamed in his sleep that his brother was to become king of Persia, put him to death—a brother whom he loved and had always trusted. Aristodemus, king of the Messenians, killed himself over a notion that some howling or other of his dogs was a bad omen. And King Midas did the same, troubled and vexed by some unpleasant dream he had dreamed. To abandon one's life for a dream is to value it at exactly what it is worth. And yet listen to our soul triumphing over the wretchedness of the body, over its weakness, over its being exposed to every injury and change. Truly, it has good reason to talk![18]

FRENCH	ENGLISH
O prima infelix fingenti terra Prometheo! Ille parum cauti pectoris egit opus. Corpora disponens, mentem non vidit in arte, Recta animi primùm debuit esse via.	O luckless earth, first shaped by Prometheus! He did his work with too little care. In arranging bodies, his craft gave no thought to the mind; The soul's path should have been made straight first.[19]

18 Cambyses II of Persia had his brother Smerdis killed (Herodotus III).
19 Propertius, Elegies III.

III.5 On Some Verses of Virgil

Sur des vers de Virgile

Prompted by Virgil and Lucretius, an aging Montaigne writes frankly about sex, marriage, and the hypocrisy surrounding desire.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

3.5.1 A mesure que les pensemens vtiles sont plus pleins, et solides, ils sont aussi plus empeschans, et plus onereux. Le vice, la mort, la pauureté, les maladies, sont subiects graues, et qui greuent. Il faut auoir l'ame instruitte des moyens de soustenir et combatre les maux, et instruite des regles de bien viure, et de bien croire: et souuent l'esueiller et exercer en cette belle estude. Mais à vne ame de commune sorte, il faut que ce soit auec relasche et moderation: elle s'affolle, d'estre trop continuellement bandee. I'auoy besoing en ieunesse, de m'aduertir et solliciter pour me tenir en office. L'alegresse et la santé ne conuiennent pas tant bien, dit-on, auec ces discours serieux et sages. Ie suis à present en vn autre estat.

The fuller and more solid useful thoughts are, the more cumbersome and burdensome they are too. Vice, death, poverty, illness are weighty subjects, and they weigh us down. The soul must be instructed in the means of bearing and fighting ills, and instructed in the rules of living well and believing well; and it must often be roused and exercised in this fine study. But for a soul of the common sort, this must be done with relaxation and moderation: it goes mad from being too continuously strained. In my youth I needed to warn and urge myself to keep to my duty. Cheerfulness and health, they say, do not go so well with these serious and wise reasonings. I am now in a different state.

Les conditions de la vieillesse, ne m'aduertissent que trop, m'assagissent et me preschent. De l'excez de la gayeté, ie suis tombé en celuy de la seuerité: plus fascheux. Parquoy, ie me laisse à cette heure aller vn peu à la desbauche, par dessein: et employe quelque fois l'ame, à des pensemens folastres et ieunes, où elle se seiourne. Ie ne suis meshuy que trop rassis, trop poisant, et trop meur. Les ans me font leçon tous les iours, de froideur, et de temperance. Ce corps fuyt le desreiglement, et le craint: il est à son tour de guider l'esprit vers la reformation: il regente à son tour: et plus rudement et imperieusement.

The conditions of old age warn me only too much; they make me wise and preach to me. From an excess of gaiety I have fallen into an excess of severity, which is more disagreeable. Therefore I now let myself go a little toward license, on purpose, and sometimes occupy my soul with playful, youthful thoughts, where it takes its rest. I am by now only too settled, too heavy and too ripe. The years lecture me every day on coldness and temperance. This body flees disorder and fears it. It is its turn to guide the mind toward reform; it rules in its turn, and more harshly and imperiously.

Il ne me laisse pas vne heure, ny dormant ny veillant, chaumer d'instruction, de mort, de patience, et de pœnitence. Ie me deffens de la temperance, comme i'ay faict autresfois de la volupté: elle me tire trop arriere, et iusques à la stupidité. Or ie veux estre maistre de moy, à tout sens. La sagesse a ses excez, et n'a pas moins besoing de moderation que la folie. Ainsi, de peur que ie ne seche, tarisse, et m'aggraue de prudence, aux interualles que mes maux me donnent, Mens intenta suis ne siet vsque malis, ie gauchis tout doucement, et desrobe ma veuë de ce ciel orageux et nubileux que i'ay deuant moy.

It does not leave me one hour, sleeping or waking, free from lessons on death, patience and penitence. I defend myself against temperance as I once did against pleasure: it pulls me too far back, even to the point of dullness. Now I want to be master of myself in every direction. Wisdom has its excesses, and needs moderation no less than folly does. So, for fear that I may dry up, wither and grow heavy with prudence, in the intervals my ills allow me, So that my mind may not be forever bent on its ills, I swerve aside very gently and steal my gaze

FRENCH

Lequel, Dieu mercy, ie considere bien sans effroy, mais non pas sans contention, et sans estude. Et me vay amusant en la recordation des ieunesses passees: Animus quod perdidit, optat, Atque in præterita se totus imagine versat. Que l'enfance regarde deuant elle, la vieillesse derriere: estoit ce pas ce que signifioit le double visage de Ianus? Les ans m'entrainnent s'ils veulent, mais à reculons. Autant que mes yeux peuuent recognoistre cette belle saison expiree, ie les y destourne à secousses. Si elle eschappe de mon sang et de mes veines, aumoins n'en veux-ie déraciner l'image de la memoire. Hoc est
Viuere bis, vita posse priore frui.

3.5.2 Platon ordonne aux vieillards d'assister aux exercices, danses, et ieux de la ieunesse, pour se resiouyr en autruy, de la soupplesse et beauté du corps, qui n'est plus en eux: et rappeller en leur souuenance, la grace et faueur de cet aage verdissant. Et veut qu'en ces esbats, ils attribuent l'honneur de la victoire, au ieune homme, qui aura le plus esbaudi et resioui, et plus grand nombre d'entre eux. Ie merquois autresfois les iours poisans et tenebreux, comme extraordinaires. Ceux-là sont tantost les miens ordinaires: les extraordinaires sont les beaux et serains. Ie m'en vay au train de tressaillir, comme d'vne nouuelle faueur, quand aucune chose ne me deult.

Que ie me chatouille, ie ne puis tantost plus arracher vn pauure rire de ce meschant corps. Ie ne m'esgaye qu'en fantasie et en songe: pour destourner par ruse, le chagrin de la vieillesse. Mais certes il faudroit autre remede, qu'en songe. Foible lucte, de l'art contre la nature. C'est grand simplesse, d'alonger et anticiper, comme chacun fait, les incommoditez humaines. I'ayme mieux estre moins long temps vieil, que d'estre vieil, auant que de l'estre. Iusques aux moindres occasions de plaisir que ie puis rencontrer, ie les empoigne. Ie congnois bien par ouyr dire, plusieurs especes de voluptez prudentes, fortes et glorieuses: mais l'opinion ne peut pas assez sur moy pour m'en mettre en appetit.

Ie ne les veux pas tant magnanimes, magnifiques et fastueuses, comme ie les veux doucereuses, faciles et prestes. A natura discedimus: populo nos damus, nullius rei away from the stormy, cloudy sky that lies before me.[1]

ENGLISH

That sky, thank God, I can contemplate without dread, but not without effort and study. And I keep amusing myself by recalling my bygone youth:
The mind longs for what it has lost,
And loses itself entirely in images of the past. That childhood looks ahead and old age behind—was that not the meaning of Janus' double face? The years may drag me along if they will, but backward. As long as my eyes can make out that lovely season now gone, I turn them toward it by fits and starts. If it escapes from my blood and my veins, at least I will not root out its image from my memory. This is
To live twice: to be able to enjoy one's former life.[2]

Plato orders old men to attend the exercises, dances and games of the young, so as to delight in others in the suppleness and beauty of body that is no longer in themselves, and to call back to memory the grace and charm of that green age. And he wants them, in these sports, to award the honor of victory to the young man who has most delighted and cheered the greatest number of them. I used to mark the heavy, gloomy days as extraordinary. These are now becoming my ordinary ones; the extraordinary ones are the fine, clear ones. I am on the way to thrilling, as at some new favor, when nothing hurts me.

Tickle myself as I may, I can now hardly wring a poor laugh out of this wretched body. I make merry only in fancy and in dreams, to divert by cunning the gloom of old age. But truly it would take some other remedy than a dream. A feeble struggle, art against nature. It is great simplicity to lengthen and anticipate human discomforts, as everyone does. I would rather be old for a shorter time than be old before I am. I seize even the slightest occasions for pleasure I can come across. I know well enough by hearsay several kinds of prudent, strong and glorious pleasures, but opinion has not enough power over me to give me an appetite for them.

I do not want them so much magnanimous, magnificent and showy as I want them sweet, easy and

1 Ovid, Tristia IV.
2 Petronius, Satyricon, and Martial, Epigrams X.

FRENCH

bono auctori. Ma philosophie est en action, en vsage naturel et present: peu en fantasie. Prinssé-ie plaisir à iouer aux noisettes et à la toupie! Non ponebat enim rumores ante salutem. La volupté est qualité peu ambitieuse; elle s'estime assez riche de soy, sans y mesler le prix de la reputation: et s'ayme mieux à l'ombre. Il faudroit donner le foüet à vn ieune homme, qui s'amuseroit à choisir le goust du vin, et des sauces. Il n'est rien que i'aye moins sçeu, et moins prisé: à cette heure ie l'apprens. I'en ay grand honte, mais qu'y feroy-ie?

I'ay encor plus de honte et de despit, des occasions qui m'y poussent. C'est à nous, à resuer et baguenauder, et à la ieunesse à se tenir sur la reputation et sur le bon bout. Elle va vers le monde, vers le credit: nous en venons. Sibi arma, sibi equos, sibi hastas, sibi clauam, sibi pilam, sibi natationes et cursus habeant: nobis senibus, ex lusionibus multis, talos relinquant et tesseras. Les loix mesme nous enuoyent au logis. Ie ne puis moins en faueur de cette chetiue condition, où mon aage me pousse, que de luy fournir de ioüets et d'amusoires, comme à l'enfance: aussi y retombons nous.

Et la sagesse et la folie, auront prou à faire, à m'estayer et secourir par offices alternatifs, en cette calamité d'aage. Misce stultitiam consiliis breuem. Ie fuis de mesme les plus legeres pointures: et celles qui ne m'eussent pas autresfois esgratigné, me transpercent à cette heure. Mon habitude commence de s'appliquer si volontiers au mal: in fragili corpore odiosa omnis offensio est. Ménsque pati durum sustinet ægra nihil. I'ay esté tousiours chatouilleux et delicat aux offences, ie suis plus tendre à cette heure, et ouuert par tout. Et minimæ vires frangere quassa valent. Mon iugement m'empesche bien de regimber et gronder contre les inconuenients que Nature m'ordonne à souffrir, mais non pas de les sentir.

Ie courrois d'vn bout du monde à l'autre, chercher vn bon an de tranquillité plaisante et eniouee, moy, qui n'ay autre fin que viure et me resiouyr. La tranquillité sombre et stupide, se trouue assez pour moy, mais elle m'endort ready to hand. We depart from nature; we give ourselves over to the people, who are a good authority on nothing. My philosophy is in action, in natural and present use; little in fancy. If only I could take pleasure in playing at cobnuts and spinning tops! For he did not put rumors before safety. Pleasure is a quality with little ambition: it considers itself rich enough on its own without mixing in the value of reputation, and prefers to be in the shade. A young man who amused himself by fussing over the taste of wine and sauces ought to be whipped. There is nothing I have known less or valued less. Now I am learning it. I am very ashamed of it, but what can I do?[3]

ENGLISH

I am even more ashamed and vexed at the reasons that drive me to it. It is for us to daydream and fool around, and for youth to stand on its reputation and keep its dignity. Youth is heading toward the world, toward standing; we are coming back from them. Let them keep for themselves arms, horses, spears, clubs, balls, swimming and running; and of their many games let them leave us old men knuckle-bones and dice. Even the laws send us home. I can do no less for this wretched condition into which my age is pushing me than provide it with toys and playthings, as for childhood; and indeed we fall back into it.[4]

Both wisdom and folly will have plenty to do to prop me up and help me, taking turns, in this calamity of age. Mix a little folly with your counsels. Likewise I shun the slightest pricks; and those that once would not even have scratched me now pierce me through. My constitution is beginning to take so readily to ailments: In a frail body every shock is painful. And a sick mind can bear nothing harsh. I have always been ticklish and sensitive to injuries; I am more tender now, and open on every side. And the slightest force can break what is already cracked. My judgment keeps me from kicking and grumbling against the discomforts that Nature orders me to suffer, but not from feeling them.[5]

I would run from one end of the world to the other in search of one good year of pleasant, cheerful tranquillity—I who have no other aim than to live and be merry. Gloomy, dull tranquillity I can find

3 Seneca, Letters 99; the second line is from Ennius on Fabius Maximus, quoted by Cicero in On Old Age.
4 Cicero, On Old Age.
5 Horace, Odes IV; then Cicero, On Old Age, and Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
et enteste: ie ne m'en contente pas. S'il y a quelque personne, quelque bonne compagnie, aux champs, en la ville, en France, ou ailleurs, resseante, ou voyagere, à qui mes humeurs soient bonnes, de qui les humeurs me soyent bonnes, il n'est que de siffler en paume, ie leur iray fournir des Essays, en chair et en os.	enough of, but it puts me to sleep and fogs my head; it does not satisfy me. If there is any person, any good company, in the country or in town, in France or elsewhere, settled or traveling, who likes my temperament and whose temperament I like, they have only to whistle in their palm and I will go and supply them with Essays in flesh and bone.

THE MIND FOLLOWS THE BODY

In old age Montaigne lets his mind play, since it can no longer rise above the body.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.5.3 Puisque c'est le priuilege de l'esprit, de se r'auoir de la vieillesse, ie luy conseille autant que ie puis, de le faire: qu'il verdisse, qu'il fleurisse ce pendant, s'il peut, comme le guy sur vn arbre mort. Ie crains que c'est vn traistre: il s'est si estroittement affreté au corps, qu'il m'abandonne à tous coups, pour le suiure en sa necessité. Ie le flatte à part, ie le practique pour neant: i'ay beau essayer de le destourner de cette colligence, et luy presenter et Seneque et Catulle, et les dames et les dances royalles: si son compagnon a la cholique, il semble qu'il l'ayt aussi.	Since it is the mind's privilege to recover from old age, I advise it as strongly as I can to do so: let it grow green, let it flourish meanwhile if it can, like mistletoe on a dead tree. I fear it is a traitor. It has bound itself so tightly to the body that it abandons me at every turn to follow the body in its need. I flatter it in private, I work on it to no purpose; it is no use my trying to turn it away from this collusion, and offering it Seneca and Catullus, and the ladies and the royal dances: if its companion has colic, it seems to have it too.
Les puissances mesmes qui luy sont particulieres et propres, ne se peuuent lors sousleuer: elles sentent euidemment le morfondu: il n'y a poinct d'allegresse en ses productions, s'il n'en y a quand et quand au corps.	Even the faculties that are peculiar and proper to it cannot rise up then; they plainly smell of a chill. There is no liveliness in what it produces unless there is some in the body at the same time.
3.5.4 Noz maistres ont tort, dequoy cherchants les causes des eslancements extraordinaires de nostre esprit, outre ce qu'ils en attribuent à vn rauissement diuin, à l'amour, à l'aspreté guerriere, à la poësie, au vin: ils n'en ont donné sa part à la santé. Vne santé bouillante, vigoureuse, pleine, oysiue, telle qu'autrefois la verdeur des ans et la securité, me la fournissoient par venuës. Ce feu de gayeté suscite en l'esprit des eloises viues et claires outre nostre clairté naturelle: et entre les enthousiasmes, les plus gaillards, sinon les plus esperdus. Or bien, ce n'est pas merueille, si vn contraire estat affesse mon esprit, le clouë, et en tire vn effect contraire.	Our masters are wrong in this: seeking the causes of the extraordinary flights of our mind, besides what they attribute to divine rapture, to love, to warlike fierceness, to poetry, to wine, they have not given health its share—a boiling, vigorous, full, idle health, such as the greenness of my years and my freedom from care once supplied me with now and then. This fire of gaiety kindles in the mind flashes of lightning, vivid and bright beyond our natural brightness, and among enthusiasms the lustiest, if not the most frenzied. Well then, it is no wonder if a contrary state weighs my mind down, nails it to the ground, and produces a contrary effect.
Ad nullum consurgit opus cum corpore languet. Et veut encores que ie luy sois tenu, dequoy il preste, comme il dit, beaucoup moins à ce consentement, que ne porte l'vsage ordinaire des hommes. Aumoins pendant que nous auons trefue, chassons les maux et difficultez de nostre commerce, Dum licet, obducta soluatur fronte	It rises to no task when it languishes with the body. And still it wants me to be obliged to it because, as it says, it gives much less to this complicity than is the ordinary way with men. At least while we have a truce, let us drive ills and difficulties out of our company: While we may, let old age smooth its senectus: tetrica sunt amœnanda iocularibus. I'ayme vne sagesse gaye et ciuile, et fuis l'aspreté des mœurs, et l'austerité: ayant pour suspecte toute mine rebarbatiue: Tristémque vultus tetrici arrogantiam; / Et habet tristis quoque turba cynædos. Ie croy Platon de bon cœur, qui dit les humeurs faciles ou difficiles, estre vn grand preiudice à la bonté ou mauuaistié de l'ame. Socrates eut vn visage constant, mais serein et riant.

FRENCH

Non fascheusement constant, comme le vieil Crassus, qu'on ne veit iamais rire. La vertu est qualité plaisante et gaye.

ENGLISH

clouded brow; gloomy things must be sweetened with jests. I love a gay and sociable wisdom, and I shun harshness of manners and austerity, holding every forbidding face suspect: And the gloomy arrogance of a grim countenance; / The solemn crowd, too, has its debauchees. I heartily believe Plato, who says that easy or difficult temperaments are a strong indication of the goodness or badness of the soul. Socrates had a steady face, but serene and smiling.[6]

Not disagreeably steady, like old Crassus, whom no one ever saw laugh. Virtue is a pleasant and cheerful quality.

DARING TO SAY IT

Montaigne resolves to say whatever he dares to do, and confesses himself in public.

FRENCH

3.5.5 Ie sçay bien que fort peu de gens rechigneront à la licence de mes escrits, qui n'ayent plus à rechigner à la licence de leur pensee. Ie me conforme bien à leur courage: mais i'offence leurs yeux. C'est vne humeur bien ordonnee, de pinser les escrits de Platon, et couler ses negociations pretendues auec Phedon, Dion, Stella, Archeanassa. Non pudeat dicere, quod non pudet sentire. Ie hay vn esprit hargneux et triste, qui glisse par dessus les plaisirs de sa vie, et s'empoigne et paist aux malheurs. Comme les mouches, qui ne peuuent tenir contre vn corps bien poly, et bien lissé, et s'attachent et reposent aux lieux scabreux et raboteux. Et comme les vantouses, qui ne hument et appetent que le mauuais sang.

3.5.6 Au reste, ie me suis ordonné d'oser dire tout ce que i'ose faire: et me desplaist des pensees mesmes impubliables. La pire de mes actions et conditions, ne me semble pas si laide, comme ie trouue laid et lasche, de ne l'oser aduouer. Chacun est discret en la confession, on le deuroit estre en l'action. La hardiesse de faillir, est aucunement compensee et bridee, par la hardiesse de le confesser. Qui s'obligeroit à tout dire, s'obligeroit à ne rien faire de ce qu'on est contraint de taire.

Dieu vueille que cet excés de ma licence, attire nos hommes iusques à la liberté: par dessus ces vertus

ENGLISH

I know very well that very few people will frown at the license of my writings who do not have more reason to frown at the license of their own thoughts. I suit their hearts well enough, but I offend their eyes. It is a well-ordered temperament indeed that carps at Plato's writings and glides over his alleged dealings with Phaedo, Dion, Stella and Archeanassa. Let us not be ashamed to say what we are not ashamed to think. I hate a surly, gloomy mind that slides over the pleasures of its life and seizes on misfortunes and feeds on them—like flies, which cannot hold on to a well-polished, smooth body, and cling to and settle on rough, uneven spots; and like cupping-glasses, which suck in and crave only bad blood.[7]

For the rest, I have ordered myself to dare to say whatever I dare to do; and I am displeased even by thoughts that cannot be made public. The worst of my actions and qualities does not seem to me as ugly as I find it ugly and cowardly not to dare to own it. Everyone is discreet in confession; we ought to be so in action. The boldness of doing wrong is to some extent offset and curbed by the boldness of confessing it. Whoever bound himself to tell everything would bind himself to do nothing of what we are forced to keep quiet.

God grant that this excess of license in me may draw our men toward freedom, beyond these cow-

6 The quotations are from Maximianus, Horace (Epodes XIII), Sidonius Apollinaris, George Buchanan and Martial.

FRENCH

couardes et mineuses, nees de nos imperfections: qu'aux despens de mon immoderation, ie les attire iusques au point de la raison. Il faut voir son vice, et l'estudier, pour le redire: ceux qui le celent à autruy, le celent ordinairement à eux mesmes: et ne le tiennent pas pour assés couuert, s'ils le voyent. Ils le soustrayent et desguisent à leur propre conscience. Quare vitia sua nemo confitetur? Quia etiam nunc in illis est, somnium narrare vigilantis est. Les maux du corps s'esclaircissent en augmentant. Nous trouuons que c'est goutte, ce que nous nommions rheume ou foulleure.

Les maux de l'ame s'obscurcissent en leurs forces: le plus malade les sent le moins. Voyla pourquoy il les faut souuent remanier au iour, d'vne main impiteuse: les ouurir et arracher du creus de nostre poitrine. Comme en matiere de biens faicts, de mesme en matiere de mesfaicts, c'est par fois satisfaction que la seule confession. Est-il quelque laideur au faillir, qui nous dispense de nous en confesser? Ie souffre peine à me feindre: si que i'euite de prendre les secrets d'autruy en garde, n'ayant pas bien le cœur de desaduouer ma science. Ie puis la taire, mais la nyer, ie ne puis sans effort et desplaisir. Pour estre bien secret, il le faut estre par nature, non par obligation.

C'est peu, au seruice des Princes, d'estre secret, si on n'est menteur encore. Celuy qui s'enquestoit à Thales Milesius, s'il deuoit solemnellement nyer d'auoir paillardé, s'il se fust addressé à moy, ie luy eusse respondu, qu'il ne le deuoit pas faire, car le mentir me semble encore pire que la paillardise. Thales luy conseilla tout autrement, et qu'il iurast, pour garentir le plus, par le moins. Toutesfois ce conseil n'estoit pas tant election de vice, que multiplication. Sur quoy disons ce mot en passant, qu'on fait bon marché à vn homme de conscience, quand on luy propose quelque difficulté au contrepoids du vice: mais quand on l'enferme entre deux vices, on le met à vn rude choix.

Comme on fit Origene: ou qu'il idolatrast, ou qu'il se souffrist iouyr charnellement, à vn grand vilain Æthiopien qu'on luy presenta. Il subit la premiere condition: et vitieusement, dit-on. Pourtant ne seroient pas sans goust, selon leur erreur, celles qui nous ardly, put-on virtues born of our imperfections; that at the expense of my immoderation I may draw them as far as the point of reason. One must see one's vice and study it in order to tell it. Those who hide it from others usually hide it from themselves, and do not think it well enough covered if they themselves can see it; they withdraw it from their own conscience and disguise it. Why does no one confess his vices? Because he is still in them; it takes a man awake to tell his dream. The ills of the body become clearer as they grow. We find that what we were calling a cold or a sprain is gout.[8]

ENGLISH

The ills of the soul grow darker as they gain strength; the sickest man feels them least. That is why they must often be handled again in daylight with a pitiless hand, opened up and torn out of the hollow of our breast. As with good deeds, so with misdeeds: confession alone is sometimes amends. Is there any ugliness in doing wrong that excuses us from confessing it? I find it painful to dissemble, so much so that I avoid taking other people's secrets into my keeping, not having the heart to deny what I know. I can keep quiet about it, but deny it I cannot, without effort and displeasure. To be truly secret, one must be so by nature, not by obligation.

In the service of princes it is not much to be secret if one is not also a liar. If the man who asked Thales of Miletus whether he should solemnly deny having committed adultery had come to me, I would have answered that he should not do so, for lying seems to me even worse than lechery. Thales advised him quite otherwise: that he should swear it, so as to cover the greater by the lesser. Yet this advice was not so much a choice of vice as a multiplication of it. On which, let us say a word in passing: a man of conscience is let off cheaply when he is offered some difficulty to set against a vice; but when he is shut in between two vices, he is put to a hard choice.

As was done to Origen: either he must commit idolatry or let himself be carnally enjoyed by a big, ugly Ethiopian who was brought before him. He submitted to the first condition—and sinfully, they say. And yet, by their own error, those women would not be without taste who protest to us these

7 Love epigrams addressed to these persons were attributed to Plato (Diogenes Laertius III); "Stella" renders the Greek name Aster.
8 Seneca, Letters 53.

FRENCH

protestent en ce temps, qu'elles aymeroient mieux charger leur conscience de dix hommes, que d'vne messe.

3.5.7 Si c'est indiscretion de publier ainsi ses erreurs, il n'y a pas grand danger qu'elle passe en exemple et vsage. Car Ariston disoit, que les vens que les hommes craignent le plus, sont ceux qui les descouurent. Il faut rebrasser ce sot haillon qui cache nos mœurs. Ils enuoyent leur conscience au bordel, et tiennent leur contenance en regle. Iusques aux traistres et assassins, ils espousent les loix de la ceremonie, et attachent là leur deuoir. Si n'est-ce, ny à l'iniustice de se plaindre de l'inciuilité, ny à la malice de l'indiscretion. C'est dommage qu'vn meschant homme ne soit encore vn sot, et que la decence pallie son vice. Ces incrustations n'appartiennent qu'à vne bonne et saine paroy, qui merite d'estre conseruee, d'être blanchie.

3.5.8 En faueur des Huguenots, qui accusent nostre confession auriculaire et priuee, ie me confesse en publiq, religieusement et purement. Sainct Augustin, Origene, et Hippocrates, ont publié les erreurs de leurs opinions: moy encore de mes mœurs. Ie suis affamé de me faire congnoistre: et ne me chaut à combien, pourueu que ce soit veritablement. Ou pour dire mieux, ie n'ay faim de rien: mais ie fuis mortellement, d'estre pris en eschange, par ceux à qui il arriue de congnoistre mon nom. Celuy qui fait tout pour l'honneur et pour la gloire, que pense-il gaigner, en se produisant au monde en masque, desrobant son vray estre à la congnoissance du peuple?

Louez un bossu de sa belle taille, il le doit receuoir à iniure: si vous estes couard, et qu'on vous honnore pour vn vaillant homme, est-ce de vous qu'on parle? On vous prend pour vn autre. I'aymeroy aussi cher, que celuy-là se gratifiast des bonnetades qu'on luy faict, pensant qu'il soit maistre de la trouppe, luy qui est des moindres de la suitte. Archelaus Roy de Macedoine, passant par la ruë, quelqu'vn versa de l'eau sur luy: les assistans disoient qu'il deuoit le punir. Voyre mais, fit-il, il n'a pas versé l'eau sur moy, mais sur celuy qu'il pensoit que ie fusse. Socrates à celuy, qui l'aduertissoit: qu'on mesdisoit de luy. Point, dit-il: il n'y a rien en moy de ce qu'ils disent.

ENGLISH

days that they would rather burden their conscience with ten men than with one Mass.[9]

If it is indiscretion to publish one's faults this way, there is not much danger of its becoming an example and a practice. For Ariston used to say that the winds men fear most are those that uncover them. We must pull back this foolish rag that hides our morals. They send their conscience to the brothel and keep their countenance in good order. Even traitors and assassins espouse the laws of ceremony and fasten their duty there. Still, it is not for injustice to complain of incivility, nor for malice to complain of indiscretion. It is a pity that a wicked man is not also a fool, and that decency should cloak his vice. Such plasterwork belongs only on a good, sound wall that deserves to be preserved and whitewashed.

As a favor to the Huguenots, who condemn our private, whispered confession, I confess myself in public, religiously and purely. Saint Augustine, Origen and Hippocrates published the errors of their opinions; I, besides, those of my morals. I am hungry to make myself known, and I do not care to how many, provided it is truly. Or, to put it better, I am hungry for nothing; but I have a mortal fear of being mistaken for someone else by those who happen to know my name. The man who does everything for honor and glory, what does he think he gains by showing himself to the world in a mask, hiding his true being from people's knowledge?

Praise a man with a crooked back for his fine figure: he ought to take it as an insult. If you are a coward and people honor you as a valiant man, is it you they are talking about? They take you for someone else. I would as soon see a man take pleasure in the caps doffed to him, thinking he is master of the troop, when he is one of the least in the retinue. As Archelaus, king of Macedon, was passing along the street, someone poured water on him; the bystanders said he ought to punish the man. "Yes, but," said he, "he did not pour the water on me, but on the man he thought I was." Socrates, to someone who told him that people were speaking ill of him: "Not at all," he said, "there is nothing in me of what they say."

9 The women are Protestants of Montaigne's day.

FRENCH

Pour moy, qui me loüeroit d'estre bon pilote, d'estre bien modeste, ou d'estre bien chaste, ie ne luy en deurois nul grammercy. Et pareillement, qui m'appelleroit traistre, voleur, ou yurongne, ie me tiendroy aussi peu offencé. Ceux qui se mescognoissent, se peuuent paistre de fauces approbations: non pas moy, qui me voy, et qui me recherche iusques aux entrailles, qui sçay bien ce qu'il m'appartient. Il me plaist d'estre moins loué, pourueu que ie soy mieux congneu. On me pourroit tenir pour sage en telle condition de sagesse, que ie tien pour sottise. Ie m'ennuye que mes Essais seruent les dames de meuble commun seulement, et de meuble de sale: ce chapitre me fera du cabinet.

I'ayme leur commerce vn peu priué: le publique est sans faueur et saueur. Aux adieux, nous eschauffons outre l'ordinaire l'affection enuers les choses que nous abandonnons. Ie prens l'extreme congé des ieux du monde: voicy nos dernieres accolades.

ENGLISH

For my part, if someone praised me for being a good pilot, or very modest, or very chaste, I would owe him no thanks. And likewise, if someone called me a traitor, a thief or a drunkard, I would consider myself just as little offended. Those who do not know themselves can feed on false approval; not I, who see myself and search myself to the very entrails, and know well what belongs to me. I am content to be less praised, provided I am better known. I might be taken for wise in a kind of wisdom that I consider folly. It annoys me that my Essays serve the ladies only as a common piece of furniture, furniture for the drawing room. This chapter will get me into the boudoir.

I like their company when it is somewhat private; in public it has neither favor nor flavor. At farewells we feel more than ordinary warmth toward the things we are leaving. I am taking my final leave of the world's games: these are our last embraces.

THE UNSPOKEN ACT

Why the sexual act, so natural and necessary, is the one thing we dare not name.

FRENCH

3.5.9 Mais venons à mon theme. Qu'a faict l'action genitale aux hommes, si naturelle, si necessaire, et si iuste, pour n'en oser parler sans vergongne, et pour l'exclurre des propos serieux et reglez? Nous prononçons hardiment, tuer, desrober, trahir: et cela, nous n'oserions qu'entre les dents. Est-ce à dire, que moins nous en exhalons en parole, d'autant nous auons loy d'en grossir la pensee? Car il est bon, que les mots qui sont le moins en vsage, moins escrits, et mieux teuz, sont les mieux sceus, et plus generalement cognus. Nul aage, nulles mœurs l'ignorent non plus que le pain. Ils s'impriment en chascun, sans estre exprimez, et sans voix et sans figure.

Et le sexe qui le fait le plus, a charge de le taire le plus. C'est vne action, que nous auons mis en la franchise du silence, d'où c'est crime de l'arracher. Non pas pour l'accuser et iuger. Ny n'osons la fouëtter, qu'en periphrase et peinture. Grand faueur à vn criminel, d'estre si execrable, que la iustice estime iniuste, de le toucher et de le veoir: libre et sauué par le benefice de l'aigreur de sa condamnation. N'en va-il pas comme en matiere de liures, qui se rendent d'autant plus venaux et

ENGLISH

But let us come to my theme. What has the sexual act, so natural, so necessary and so just, done to men, that they dare not speak of it without shame and exclude it from serious and orderly conversation? We boldly pronounce "kill," "rob," "betray"; and this we would dare to say only between our teeth. Does that mean that the less we breathe of it in words, the more right we have to swell it in our thoughts? For it is a fine joke that the words least used, least written and best kept quiet are the best known and the most widely understood. No age, no manners are ignorant of them, any more than of bread. They imprint themselves on each of us without being expressed, without voice and without shape.

And the sex that does it most is charged with keeping most quiet about it. It is an act we have placed in the sanctuary of silence, from which it is a crime to drag it—even in order to accuse and judge it. Nor do we dare to whip it except in roundabout phrases and pictures. A great favor to a criminal, to be so execrable that justice thinks it unjust to touch him or look at him: free and saved by the publiques, de ce qu'ils sont supprimez? Ie m'en vay pour moy, prendre au mot l'aduis d'Aristote, qui dit, L'estre honteux, seruir d'ornement à la ieunesse, mais de reproche à la vieillesse.

FRENCH

Ces vers se preschent en l'escole ancienne: escole à laquelle ie me tien bien plus qu'à la moderne: ses vertus me semblent plus grandes, ses vices moindres. Ceux qui par trop fuyant Venus estriuent,
Faillent autant que ceux qui trop la suiuent.
Tu, Dea, tu rerum naturam sola gubernas,
Nec sine te quicquam dias in luminis oras
Exoritur, neque fit lætum, nec amabile quicquam.

3.5.10 Ie ne sçay qui a peu mal mesler Pallas et les Muses, auec Venus, et les refroidir enuers l'amour: mais ie ne voy aucunes deitez qui s'auiennent mieux, ny qui s'entredoiuent plus. Qui ostera aux muses les imaginations amoureuses, leur desrobera le plus bel entretien qu'elles ayent, et la plus noble matiere de leur ouurage: et qui fera perdre à l'amour la communication et seruice de la poësie l'affoiblira de ses meilleures armes. Par ainsin on charge le Dieu d'accointance, et de bien-vueillance, et les Deesses protectrices d'humanité et de iustice, du vice d'ingratitude et de mescognoissance.

Ie ne suis pas de si long temps cassé de l'estat et suitte de ce Dieu, que ie n'aye la memoire informee de ses forces et valeurs: Agnosco veteris vestigia flammæ. Il y a encore quelque demeurant d'emotion et chaleur apres la fiéure. Nec mihi deficiat calor hic, hyemantibus annis. Tout asseché que ie suis, et appesanty, ie sens encore quelques tiedes restes de cette ardeur passee.

Qual l'alto Ægeo per che Aquilone o Noto
Cessi, che tutto prima il vuolse et scosse,
Non s'accheta ei perto, ma'l sono el' moto,
Ritien dell' onde anco agitate è grosse. Mais de ce que ie m'y entends, les forces et valeur de ce Dieu, se trouuent plus vifues et plus animees, en la peinture de la poësie, qu'en leur propre essence. Et versus digitos habet. Elle represente ie ne sçay quel air, plus amoureux que l'amour mesme. Venus n'est pas si belle toute nüe, et viue, et haletante, benefit of the harshness of his condemnation. Isn't it as with books, which become all the more salable and public for being suppressed? For my part, I am going to take Aristotle at his word when he says that bashfulness is an ornament to youth but a reproach to old age.

ENGLISH

These lines are preached in the ancient school, a school to which I hold much more than to the modern one: its virtues seem to me greater, its vices smaller. Those who strive too hard to flee from Venus
Go as far wrong as those who follow her too much.
You, Goddess, you alone govern the nature of things,
Nor without you does anything rise into the shining shores of light,
Nor is anything made joyful or lovely.[10]

I do not know who can have set Pallas and the Muses at odds with Venus and made them cool toward love; but I see no deities that suit each other better or owe each other more. Whoever takes amorous imaginings away from the Muses will rob them of the finest subject they have and the noblest matter of their work; and whoever deprives love of the fellowship and service of poetry will strip it of its best weapons. In this way the god of intimacy and goodwill, and the goddesses who protect humanity and justice, are charged with the vice of ingratitude and of failing to acknowledge what they owe.

I have not been so long dismissed from the service and train of this god that my memory is not informed of his strength and worth: I recognize the traces of the old flame. There is still some remnant of emotion and heat after the fever. May this warmth not fail me in my wintry years. Dried up and weighed down as I am, I still feel some lukewarm remains of that past ardor.[11]

As the deep Aegean, though the north or south wind
Has died down that first tossed and shook it all,
Does not grow calm for that, but keeps the roar and motion
Of its waves still stirred and swollen. But from what I understand of it, the strength and worth of this god are found more lively and animated in the painting of poetry than in their own essence. And

10 The French couplet comes from Amyot's translation of Plutarch; the Latin is Lucretius, On the Nature of Things I.
11 Virgil, Aeneid IV, then Johannes Secundus.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	comme elle est icy chez Virgile. Dixerat, et niueis hinc atque hinc Diua lacertis Cunctantem amplexu molli fouet.	verse has fingers. Poetry conveys some air or other more amorous than love itself. Venus is not so beautiful all naked, alive and panting, as she is here in Virgil: She had spoken; and, as he hesitated, the goddess, flinging her snowy arms around him on either side, Warms him in a soft embrace.[12]
	Ille repente Accepit solitam flammam, notúsque medullas Intrauit calor, et labefacta per ossa cucurrit. Non secus atque olim tonitru cùm rupta corusco Ignea rima micans percurrit lumine nimbos. . . . . . Ea verba loquutus, Optatos dedit amplexus, placidúmque petiuit Coniugis infusus gremio per membra soporem.	He suddenly Caught the familiar flame, and the well-known heat Entered his marrow and ran through his melting bones, Just as sometimes, when the thunder bursts, a fiery rift Runs flashing with light through the storm clouds. . . . . . Having spoken these words, He gave her the embraces she longed for, and sought calm sleep Through his limbs, lying poured out on his wife's lap.

MARRIAGE AND LOVE

A good marriage is built on friendship, not on love, which hates any other bond.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.5.11	Ce que i'y trouue à considerer, c'est qu'il la peinct vn peu bien esmeüe pour vne Venus maritale. En ce sage marché, les appetits ne se trouuent pas si follastres: ils sont sombres et plus mousses. L'amour hait qu'on se tienne par ailleurs que par luy, et se mesle laschement aux accointances qui sont dressees et entretenues soubs autre titre: comme est le mariage. L'alliance, les moyens, y poisent par raison, autant ou plus, que les graces et la beauté. On ne se marie pas pour soy, quoy qu'on die: on se marie autant ou plus, pour sa posterité, pour sa famille. L'vsage et l'interest du mariage touche nostre race, bien loing par delà nous.	What I find worth noting here is that he paints her as rather too aroused for a married Venus. In this sensible bargain the appetites are not so frolicsome; they are somber and duller. Love hates people to be bound to each other by anything but itself, and takes only a slack part in relationships formed and kept up under some other title, as marriage is. Connections and means rightly weigh as much there as charms and beauty, or more. We do not marry for ourselves, whatever people say; we marry as much or more for our posterity, for our family. The use and interest of marriage concern our line, far beyond ourselves.
	Pourtant me plaist cette façon, qu'on le conduise plustost par main tierce, que par les propres: et par le sens d'autruy, que par le sien. Tout cecy, combien à l'opposite des conuentions amoureuses? Aussi est-ce vne espece d'inceste, d'aller employer à ce parentage venerable et sacré, les efforts et les extrauagances de la licence amoureuse, comme il me semble auoir dict ailleurs. Il faut, dit Aristote, toucher sa femme prudemment et	That is why I like the practice of having it arranged by a third hand rather than by one's own, and by someone else's sense rather than one's own. How opposite all this is to the conventions of love! And so it is a kind of incest to bring into this venerable and sacred kinship the efforts and extravagances of amorous license, as I think I have said elsewhere. One must, says Aristotle, touch 12 Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered XII; Juvenal, Satires VI; Virgil, Aeneid VIII, where Venus coaxes her husband Vulcan to forge arms for Aeneas.

FRENCH

seuerement, de peur qu'en la chatouillant trop lasciuement, le plaisir ne la face sortir hors des gons de raison. Ce qu'il dit pour la conscience, les medecins le disent pour la santé. Qu'vn plaisir excessiuement chaud, voluptueux, et assidu, altere la semence, et empesche la conception.

Disent d'autre part, qu'à vne congression languissante, comme celle là est de sa nature: pour la remplir d'vne iuste et fertile chaleur, il s'y faut presenter rarement, et à notables interualles; Quo rapiat sitiens Venerem interiúsque recondat. Ie ne voy point de mariages qui faillent plustost, et se troublent, que ceux qui s'acheminent par la beauté, et desirs amoureux. Il y faut des fondemens plus solides, et plus constans, et y marcher d'aguet: cette boüillante allegresse n'y vaut rien.

3.5.12 Ceux qui pensent faire honneur au mariage, pour y ioindre l'amour, font, ce me semble, de mesme ceux, qui pour faire faueur à la vertu, tiennent que la noblesse n'est autre chose que vertu. Ce sont choses qui ont quelque cousinage: mais il y a beaucoup de diuersité: on n'a que faire de troubler leurs noms et leurs tiltres. On fait tort à l'vne ou à l'autre de les confondre. La noblesse est vne belle qualité, et introduite auec raison: mais d'autant que c'est vne qualité dependant d'autruy, et qui peut tomber en vn homme vicieux et de neant, elle est en estimation bien loing au dessoubs de la vertu.

C'est vne vertu, si ce l'est, artificielle et visible: dependant du temps et de la fortune: diuerse en forme selon les contrees, viuante et mortelle: sans naissance, non plus que la riuiere du Nil: genealogique et commune; de suite et de similitude: tiree par consequence, et consequence bien foible. La science, la force, la bonté, la beauté, la richesse, toutes autres qualitez, tombent en communication et en commerce: cetty-cy se consomme en soy, de nulle emploite au seruice d'autruy.

On proposoit à l'vn de nos Roys, le choix de deux competiteurs, en vne mesme charge, desquels l'vn estoit Gentil'homme, l'autre ne l'estoit point: il ordonna que sans respect de cette qualité, on choisist celuy qui auroit le plus de merite: mais où la valeur seroit entierement pareille, qu'alors on eust respect à la noblesse: c'estoit iustement luy donner son rang. Antigonus à vn ieune one's wife prudently and soberly, for fear that if she is tickled too lasciviously, pleasure may carry her off the hinges of reason. What he says for conscience's sake, the doctors say for health's sake: that excessively hot, voluptuous and assiduous pleasure alters the seed and hinders conception.

ENGLISH

They say on the other hand that in a languid coupling, as that one is by nature, if it is to be filled with a proper and fruitful heat, one must present oneself rarely and at considerable intervals: So that it may seize Venus thirstily and store her deep within. I see no marriages that fail sooner, or are more troubled, than those that are brought about by beauty and amorous desire. Marriage needs more solid and more constant foundations, and must be approached warily; that boiling ardor is no good for it.[13]

Those who think they honor marriage by joining love to it act, it seems to me, like those who, to do virtue a favor, hold that nobility is nothing other than virtue. These things are related, but there is a great deal of difference between them, and there is no point in mixing up their names and titles. We wrong one or the other by confusing them. Nobility is a fine quality, and introduced for good reason. But since it is a quality that depends on others, and can fall to a vicious and worthless man, it is valued far below virtue.

It is a virtue, if it is one at all, that is artificial and visible. It depends on time and fortune, differs in form from country to country, and is living and mortal. Like the river Nile, it has no source. It is genealogical and shared, a matter of succession and resemblance, drawn by inference, and a very weak inference at that. Learning, strength, goodness, beauty, wealth, all other qualities, can be communicated and exchanged. This one is used up in itself, and is of no use in the service of others.[14]

One of our kings was offered the choice between two candidates for the same office, one a gentleman and the other not. He ordered that they should choose the one with more merit, without regard to that quality. Only where their worth was entirely equal should nobility be taken into ac-

13 Virgil, Georgics III, on the breeding of mares.
14 The source of the Nile was unknown to the ancients.

FRENCH

homme incogneu, qui luy demandoit la charge de son pere, homme de valeur, qui venoit de mourir: Mon amy, dit-il, en tels bien faicts, ie ne regarde pas tant la noblesse de mes soldats, comme ie fais leur proüesse.

De vray, il n'en doibt pas aller comme des officiers des Roys de Sparte, trompettes, menestriers, cuisiniers, à qui en leurs charges succedoient les enfants, pour ignorants qu'ils fussent, auant les mieux experimentez du mestier. Ceux de Callicut font des nobles, vne espece par dessus l'humaine. Le mariage leur est interdit, et toute autre vacation que bellique. De concubines, ils en peuuent auoir leur saoul: et les femmes autant de ruffiens: sans ialousie les vns des autres. Mais c'est vn crime capital et irremissible, de s'accoupler à personne d'autre condition que la leur. Et se tiennent pollus, s'ils en sont seulement touchez en passant: et, comme leur noblesse en estant merueilleusement iniuriee et interessee, tuent ceux qui seulement ont approché vn peu trop pres d'eux.

De maniere que les ignobles sont tenus de crier en marchant, comme les gondoliers de Venise, au contour des ruës, pour ne s'entreheurter: et les nobles leur commandent de se ietter au quartier qu'ils veulent. Ceux cy euitent par là, cette ignominie, qu'ils estiment perpetuelle; ceux là vne mort certaine. Nulle duree de temps, nulle faueur de Prince, nul office, ou vertu, ou richesse peut faire qu'vn roturier deuienne noble. A quoy ayde cette coustume, que les mariages sont defendus de l'vn mestier à l'autre. Ne peut vne de race cordonniere, espouser vn charpentier: et sont les parents obligez de dresser les enfants à la vacation des peres, precisement, et non à autre vacation: par où se maintient la distinction et continuation de leur fortune.

3.5.13 Vn bon mariage, s'il en est, refuse la compagnie et conditions de l'amour: il tasche à representer celles de l'amitié. C'est vne douce societé de vie, pleine de constance, de fiance, et d'vn nombre infiny d'vtiles et solides offices, et obligations mutuelles. Aucune femme qui en sauoure le goust, Optato quam iunxit lumine tæda, ne voudroit tenir lieu de maistresse à son mary. Si elle est count. That was giving it exactly its proper rank. An unknown young man asked Antigonus for the post of his father, a man of valor who had just died. "My friend," he said, "in granting such favors I do not look so much at my soldiers' nobility as at their prowess."[15]

ENGLISH

Indeed, it should not be as it was with the officers of the kings of Sparta, the trumpeters, minstrels and cooks. Their children succeeded to their posts, however ignorant they might be, ahead of the most experienced in the trade. The people of Calicut make their nobles a species above the human. Marriage is forbidden to them, and so is every calling but war. They may have their fill of concubines, and the women as many lovers, with no jealousy among them. But it is a capital and unpardonable crime to couple with anyone of a different condition from their own. They consider themselves polluted if such a person merely brushes against them in passing. And, as if their nobility were wonderfully insulted and injured by it, they kill those who have merely come a little too close to them.[16]

So the commoners are obliged to call out as they walk, like the gondoliers of Venice at street corners, so as not to collide. The nobles then order them to step aside to whatever side they please. In this way the nobles avoid a disgrace they consider permanent, and the commoners avoid certain death. No length of time, no prince's favor, no office, virtue or wealth can make a commoner noble. They are helped in this by the custom that forbids marriage between one trade and another. A girl from a family of shoemakers may not marry a carpenter. And parents are obliged to train their children for their fathers' calling, precisely that one and no other. By this means the distinction and continuance of their lot is kept up.

A good marriage, if there is such a thing, rejects the company and conditions of love and tries to reproduce those of friendship. It is a sweet partnership in life, full of constancy and trust, and of countless useful and solid services and mutual obligations. No woman who savors its taste, whom the marriage torch has joined with its longed-for light, would want to stand as a mistress to her husband.

15 Antigonus I (c. 382–301 BC), one of Alexander's generals and later king; the story is in Plutarch.
16 Calicut (Kozhikode), on the Malabar coast of India; the nobles described are the Nairs.

FRENCH

logee en son affection, comme femme, elle y est bien plus honorablement et seurement logee.

Quand il fera l'esmeu ailleurs, et l'empressé, qu'on luy demande pourtant lors, à qui il aymeroit mieux arriuer vne honte, ou à sa femme ou à sa maistresse, de qui la desfortune l'affligeroit le plus, à qui il desire plus de grandeur: ces demandes n'ont aucun doubte en vn mariage sain.

3.5.14 Ce qu'il s'en voit si peu de bons, est signe de son prix et de sa valeur. A le bien façonner et à le bien prendre, il n'est point de plus belle piece en notre societé. Nous ne nous en pouuons passer, et l'allons auilissant. Il en aduient ce qui se voit aux cages, les oyseaux qui en sont dehors, desesperent d'y entrer; et d'vn pareil soing en sortir, ceux qui sont au dedans. Socrates, enquis, qui estoit plus commode, prendre, ou ne prendre point de femme: Lequel des deux, dit-il, on face, on s'en repentira. C'est vne conuention à laquelle se rapporte bien à point ce qu'on dit, homo homini, ou Deus, ou lupus.

Il faut le rencontre de beaucoup de qualitez à le bastir. Il se trouue en ce temps plus commode aux ames simples et populaires, où les delices, la curiosité, et l'oysiueté, ne le troublent pas tant. Les humeurs desbauchees, comme est la mienne, qui hay toute sorte de liaison et d'obligation, n'y sont pas si propres. Et mihi dulce magis resoluto viuere collo.

3.5.15 De mon dessein, i'eusse fuy d'espouser la sagesse mesme, si elle m'eust voulu. Mais nous auons beau dire: la coustume et l'vsage de la vie commune, nous emporte. La plus part de mes actions se conduisent par exemple, non par choix. Toutesfois ie ne m'y conuiay pas proprement. On m'y mena, et y fus porté par des occasions estrangeres. Car non seulement les choses incommodes, mais il n'en est aucune si laide et vitieuse et euitable, qui ne puisse deuenir acceptable par quelque condition et accident, tant l'humaine posture est vaine. Et y fus porté, certes plus preparé lors, et plus rebours, que ie ne suis à present, apres l'auoir essayé.

Et tout licencieux qu'on me tient, i'ay en verité plus seuerement obserué les loix de mariage, que ie n'auois ny promis ny esperé. Il n'est plus temps de regimber quand on s'est laissé entrauer. Il faut prudemment mesnager sa liberté: mais depuis qu'on s'est submis à l'obligation, il s'y

ENGLISH

If she is lodged in his affection as a wife, she is lodged there far more honorably and securely.[17]

When he plays the smitten and eager lover elsewhere, let him be asked even then which of the two he would rather have suffer some shame, his wife or his mistress. Whose misfortune would grieve him more? For whom does he wish greater advancement? In a sound marriage these questions leave no room for doubt.

That so few good ones are to be seen is a sign of its price and its worth. Well fashioned and rightly taken, there is no finer piece in our society. We cannot do without it, and yet we keep debasing it. What happens with it is what we see with cages: the birds outside despair of getting in, and those inside are just as anxious to get out. Socrates was asked which was better, to take a wife or not. "Whichever you do," he said, "you will regret it." It is an arrangement to which the saying fits very aptly: man to man is either a god or a wolf.

Building it takes the meeting of many qualities. In these times it suits simple, ordinary souls better, where luxuries, curiosity and idleness do not trouble it so much. Unruly temperaments like mine, which hate every sort of tie and obligation, are not so well fitted for it. And to me it is sweeter to live with my neck unyoked.[18]

Left to my own design, I would have avoided marrying wisdom herself, if she had wanted me. But say what we will, custom and the practice of ordinary life carry us along. Most of my actions are guided by example, not by choice. Still, I did not really invite myself to it. I was led to it, carried there by outside circumstances. For not only inconvenient things, but anything at all, however ugly, vicious and avoidable, can become acceptable through some condition or chance, so empty is the human stance. And I was carried there certainly more braced against it then, and more contrary, than I am now that I have tried it.

And licentious as I am thought to be, I have in truth kept the laws of marriage more strictly than I had either promised or hoped. It is too late to kick once you have let yourself be hobbled. You must manage your liberty prudently. But once you

17 Catullus, LXVI.
18 Maximianus (known in Montaigne's day as Cornelius Gallus), Elegies.

FRENCH

faut tenir soubs les loix du debuoir commun, aumoins s'en efforcer. Ceux qui entreprennent ce marché pour s'y porter auec hayne et mespris, font iniustement et incommodément.

Et cette belle regle que ie voy passer de main en main entre elles, comme vn sainct oracle, Sers ton mary comme ton maistre, / Et t'en garde comme d'vn traistre: qui est à dire: Porte toy enuers luy, d'vne reuerence contrainte, ennemye, et deffiante (cry de guerre et de deffi) est pareillement iniurieuse et difficile. Ie suis trop mol pour desseins si espineux. A dire vray, ie ne suis pas arriué à cette perfection d'habileté et galantise d'esprit, que de confondre la raison auec l'iniustice, et mettre en risee tout ordre et regle qui n'accorde à mon appetit. Pour hayr la superstition, ie ne me iette pas incontinent à l'irreligion.

Si on ne fait tousiours son debuoir, au moins le faut il tousiours aymer et recognoistre: c'est trahison, se marier sans s'espouser. Passons outre.

3.5.16 Nostre poëte represente vn mariage plein d'accord et de bonne conuenance, auquel pourtant il n'y a pas beaucoup de loyauté. A il voulu dire, qu'il ne soit pas impossible de se rendre aux efforts de l'amour, et ce neantmoins reseruer quelque deuoir enuers le mariage: et qu'on le peut blesser, sans le rompre tout à faict? Tel valet ferre la mule au maistre qu'il ne hayt pas pourtant.

La beauté, l'oportunité, la destinee (car la destinee y met aussi la main) Fatum est in partibus illis
Quas sinus abscondit: nam si tibi sidera cessent,
Nil faciet longi mensura incognita nerui, l'ont attachée à vn estranger: non pas si entiere peut estre, qu'il ne luy puisse rester quelque liaison par où elle tient encore à son mary. Ce sont deux desseins, qui ont des routes distinguees, et non confondues. Vne femme se peut rendre à tel personnage, que nullement elle ne voudroit auoir espousé: ie ne dy pas pour les conditions de la fortune, mais pour celles mesmes de la personne. Peu de gens ont espousé des amies qui ne s'en soient repentis.

Et iusques en l'autre monde, quel mauuais mesnage fait Iupiter avec sa femme, qu'il auoit premierement pratiquee et iouyë par amourettes? C'est ce qu'on dit, have submitted to the obligation, you must hold to it under the laws of common duty, or at least try to. Those who enter into this bargain only to conduct themselves in it with hatred and contempt act unjustly, and to their own harm.

ENGLISH

And there is that fine rule which I see passed from hand to hand among the women like a holy oracle: Serve your husband as your master, / And guard yourself from him as from a traitor. That is to say: "Bear yourself toward him with a reverence that is forced, hostile and distrustful" (a war cry and a challenge). It is just as insulting as it is hard. I am too soft for such thorny designs. To tell the truth, I have not reached that perfection of cleverness and gallantry of mind that confuses reason with injustice and laughs at every order and rule that does not suit my appetite. Hating superstition does not make me rush straight into irreligion.

If we do not always do our duty, we must at least always love it and acknowledge it. It is treachery to marry without espousing. Let us move on.

Our poet portrays a marriage full of harmony and good understanding, in which, however, there is not much loyalty. Did he mean that it is not impossible to yield to the assaults of love and still keep some duty toward marriage? That one can wound it without breaking it altogether? Many a servant skims off his master without hating him for all that.

Beauty, opportunity and destiny have attached her to a stranger, for destiny too has a hand in it: Fate rules those parts
That the clothing hides: for if the stars desert you,
The unheard-of length of your member will do nothing. Yet perhaps not so wholly that there cannot remain some bond by which she still holds to her husband. These are two designs that travel separate roads, not one. A woman may give herself to a man she would by no means have wanted to marry. I do not mean because of his fortune, but because of the qualities of the person himself. Few men have married their mistresses without regretting it.[19]

And even in the other world, what a bad household Jupiter keeps with his wife, whom he had first courted and enjoyed in a love affair! That is 19 Juvenal, Satire IX.

FRENCH

chier dans le panier, pour apres le mettre sur sa teste. I'ay veu de mon temps en quelque bon lieu, guerir honteusement et deshonnestement, l'amour, par le mariage: les considerations sont trop autres. Nous aymons, sans nous empescher deux choses diuerses, et qui se contrarient. Isocrates disoit, que la ville d'Athenes plaisoit à la mode que font les dames qu'on sert par amour, chacun aymoit à s'y venir promener, et y passer son temps: nul ne l'aymoit pour l'espouser: c'est à dire, pour s'y habituer et domicilier.

I'ay auec despit, veu des maris hayr leurs femmes, de ce seulement, qu'ils leur font tort. Aumoins ne les faut il pas moins aymer, de nostre faute: par repentance et compassion aumoins, elles nous en deuroient estre plus cheres.

3.5.17 Ce sont fins differentes, et pourtant compatibles, dit-il, en quelque façon. Le mariage a pour sa part, l'vtilité, la iustice, l'honneur, et la constance: vn plaisir plat, mais plus vniuersel. L'amour se fonde au seul plaisir: et l'a de vray plus chatouilleux, plus vif, et plus aigu: vn plaisir attizé par la difficulté: il y faut de la piqueure et de la cuison. Ce n'est plus amour, s'il est sans fleches et sans feu. La liberalité des dames est trop profuse au mariage, et esmousse la poincte de l'affection et du desir. Pour fuïr à cet inconuenient, voyez la peine qu'y prennent en leurs loix Lycurgus et Platon.

ENGLISH

what the saying calls fouling the basket and then putting it on your head. In my time I have seen love shamefully and dishonorably cured by marriage, in a certain good family. The considerations are too different. We love two different and opposed things without being troubled by it. Isocrates said that the city of Athens pleased people the way ladies do whom men court for love. Everyone liked to come and stroll there and pass the time; no one loved it enough to marry it, that is, to settle there and make it his home.

It has made me indignant to see husbands hate their wives simply because they are wronging them. At least we should not love them less for our own fault. Out of repentance and compassion, at least, they ought to be dearer to us for it.

These are different ends, he says, and yet compatible in some way. Marriage has as its share utility, justice, honor and constancy: a flat pleasure, but a more universal one. Love is founded on pleasure alone, and its pleasure is in truth more tickling, livelier and keener, a pleasure stirred up by difficulty. There must be sting and smart in it. It is no longer love if it is without arrows and without fire. The ladies' generosity is too lavish in marriage and blunts the edge of affection and desire. See what pains Lycurgus and Plato take in their laws to avoid this drawback.

RULES MADE BY MEN

Men demand of women a chastity they neither practice nor make easy.

FRENCH

3.5.18 Les femmes n'ont pas tort du tout, quand elles refusent les regles de vie, qui sont introduites au monde: d'autant que ce sont les hommes qui les ont faictes sans elles. Il y a naturellement de la brigue et riotte entre elles et nous. Le plus estroit consentement que nous ayons auec elles, encores est-il tumultuaire et tempestueux. A l'aduis de nostre autheur, nous les traictons inconsiderément en cecy.

Apres que nous auons cogneu, qu'elles sont sans comparaison plus capables et ardentes aux effects de l'amour que nous, et que ce prestre ancien l'a ainsi tesmoigné, qui auoit esté tantost homme, tantost femme: Venus huic erat vtraque nota. Et en outre, que nous auons appris de leur propre bouche, la preuue qu'en firent autrefois, en diuers siecles, vn Empereur et vne

ENGLISH

Women are not entirely wrong when they reject the rules of life that have been introduced into the world, since it is men who made them, without women. There is naturally intrigue and squabbling between them and us. Even the closest agreement we have with them is turbulent and stormy. In our author's opinion, we treat them thoughtlessly in this matter.

We have recognized that they are incomparably more capable and ardent than we are in the acts of love. That ancient priest who had been now a man, now a woman, bore witness to it: Venus of both kinds was known to him. Besides, we have learned from their own mouths the proof given long ago, in different centuries, by an emperor

FRENCH

Emperiere de Rome, maistres ouuriers et fameux en cette besongne: luy despucela bien en vne nuict dix vierges Sarmates ses captiues: mais elle fournit reelement en vne nuict, à vingt et cinq entreprinses, changeant de compagnie selon son besoing et son goust, Adhuc ardens rigidæ tentigine vuluæ: / Et lassata viris, nondum satiata recessit. Et que sur le different aduenu à Cateloigne, entre vne femme, se plaignant des efforts trop assiduelz de son mary (non tant à mon aduis qu'elle en fust incommodee, car ie ne crois les miracles qu'en foy, comme pour retrancher soubs ce pretexte, et brider en ce mesme, qui est l'action fondamentale du mariage, l'authorité des maris enuers leurs femmes:

et pour montrer que leurs hergnes, et leur malignité passent outre la couche nuptiale, et foulent aux pieds graces et douceurs mesmes de Venus) à laquelle plainte, le mary respondoit, homme vrayement brutal et desnaturé, qu'aux iours mesme de ieusne il ne s'en sçauroit passer à moins de dix: interuint ce notable arrest de la Royne d'Aragon: par lequel, apres meure deliberation de conseil, cette bonne Royne, pour donner regle et exemple à tout temps, de la moderation et modestie requise en vn iuste mariage: ordonna pour bornes legitimes et necessaires, le nombre de six par iour: relaschant et quitant beaucoup du besoing et desir de son sexe, pour establir, disoit-elle, vne forme aysee, et par consequent permanante et immuable.

En quoy s'escrient les docteurs, quel doit estre l'appetit et la concupiscence feminine, puisque leur raison, leur reformation, et leur vertu, se taille à ce prix? considerans le diuers iugement de nos appetits. Car Solon patron de l'eschole legiste ne taxe qu'à trois fois par mois, pour ne faillir point, cette hantise coniugale. Apres avoir creu, dis-ie, et presché cela, nous sommes allez, leur donner la continence peculierement en partage: et sur peines dernieres et extremes.

3.5.19 Il n'est passion plus pressante, que cette cy, à laquelle nous voulons qu'elles resistent seules: non simplement, comme à vn vice de sa mesure: mais comme à l'abomination et execration plus qu'à l'irreligion et au parricide: et nous nous y rendons ce pendant sans coulpe et reproche. Ceux mesme d'entre nous, qui ont essayé and an empress of Rome, master craftsmen famous in this work. He did indeed deflower ten Sarmatian virgins, his captives, in one night. But she actually took on twenty-five bouts in one night, changing company as her need and taste required, Still burning with the stiff tension of her vulva, / She withdrew exhausted by men, but not yet satisfied. Then there was the dispute that arose in Catalonia. A woman complained of her husband's too frequent efforts. In my opinion this was not so much because they troubled her, for I believe in miracles only in matters of faith. It was rather to curtail, on this pretext, the authority of husbands over their wives, and to curb it in the very act that is fundamental to marriage;[20] and to show that women's sulks and malice go beyond the marriage bed and trample underfoot even the graces and sweetnesses of Venus. To her complaint the husband, a truly brutish and unnatural man, replied that even on fast days he could not make do with fewer than ten. Then came that notable decree of the Queen of Aragon. After mature deliberation in council, this good queen, to give all ages a rule and example of the moderation and modesty required in a proper marriage, set the number at six a day as the legitimate and necessary limit. In doing so she gave up and relinquished much of the need and desire of her sex, in order, she said, to establish an easy standard, and therefore a lasting and unchangeable one.

ENGLISH

At which the learned exclaim: what must female appetite and lust be, if their reason, their reform and their virtue are cut to this measure? They are thinking of how differently our own appetites are judged. For Solon, the master of the school of law, rates this conjugal intercourse at only three times a month, so as not to fall short. After believing and preaching all this, I say, we have gone and given them continence as their special portion, and under the last and most extreme penalties.

There is no passion more pressing than this one, and we want them alone to resist it. Not simply as a vice of its own size, but as an abomination and an execration, worse than irreligion and parricide; and meanwhile we give in to it ourselves without guilt or reproach. Even those of us who have tried 20 The priest is Tiresias (Ovid, Metamorphoses III); the emperor is Proculus, and the empress Messalina, described in Juvenal, Satire VI.

FRENCH

d'en venir à bout, ont assez auoué quelle difficulté, ou plustost impossibilité il y auoit, vsant de remedes materiels, à mater, affoiblir et refroidir le corps. Nous au contraire, les voulons saines, vigoreuses, en bon point, bien nourries, et chastes ensemble: c'est à dire, et chaudes et froides. Car le mariage, que nous disons auoir charge de les empescher de bruler, leur aporte peu de refraichissement selon nos mœurs.

Si elles en prennent vn, à qui la vigueur de l'aage boult encores, il fera gloire de l'espandre ailleurs. Sit tandem pudor, aut eamus in ius,
Multis mentula millibus redempta,
Non est hæc tua, Basse, vendidisti. Le philosophe Polemon fut iustement appellé en iustice par sa femme, de ce qu'il alloit semant en vn champ sterile le fruict deu au champ genital. Si c'est de ces autres cassez, les voyla en plein mariage, de pire condition que vierges et vefues. Nous les tenons pour bien fournies, par ce qu'elles ont vn homme aupres. Comme les Romains tindrent pour viollee Clodia Læta, vestale, que Caligula auoit approchée, encore qu'il fust aueré, qu'il ne l'auoit qu'approchée.

Mais au rebours; on recharge par là, leur necessité: d'autant que l'attouchement et la compagnie de quelque masle que ce soit, esueille leur chaleur, qui demeureroit plus quiete en la solitude. Et à cette fin, comme il est vray-semblable, de rendre par cette circonstance et consideration, leur chasteté plus meritoire. Boleslaus et Kinge sa femme, Roys de Poulongne, la vouërent d'vn commun accord, couchez ensemble, le iour mesme de leurs nopces: et la maintindrent à la barbe des commoditez maritales.

3.5.20 Nous les dressons dés l'enfance, aux entremises de l'amour: leur grace, leur attiffeure, leur science, leur parole, toute leur instruction, ne regarde qu'à ce but. Leurs gouuernantes ne leur impriment autre chose que le visage de l'amour, ne fust qu'en le leur representant continuellement pour les en desgouster. Ma fille, c'est tout ce que i'ay d'enfans, est en l'aage auquel les loix excusent les plus eschauffees de se marier. Elle est d'vne complexion tardiue, mince et molle, et a esté par sa mere esleuee de mesme, d'vne forme retiree et particuliere: si qu'elle ne commence encore qu'à se desniaiser de la naifueté de l'enfance.

ENGLISH

to master it have admitted readily enough how difficult, or rather impossible, it was to subdue, weaken and cool the body with material remedies. We, on the contrary, want them healthy, vigorous, plump, well fed and chaste all at once, that is to say, both hot and cold. For marriage, which we say has the task of keeping them from burning, brings them little cooling, as our ways go.[21]

If they take a man in whom the vigor of youth still boils, he will make it his glory to spend it elsewhere. Have some shame at last, or let us go to court:
Your member, bought by me for many thousands,
Is not yours, Bassus; you have sold it. The philosopher Polemon was rightly sued by his wife for going about sowing in a barren field the fruit owed to the field of generation. If they take one of those other, worn-out men, there they are, in full marriage, worse off than virgins and widows. We consider them well provided for because they have a man beside them. In the same way the Romans held that Clodia Laeta, a Vestal, had been violated because Caligula had approached her, though it was proved that he had only approached her.[22]

But on the contrary, this only increases their need, since the touch and company of any male whatever awakens their heat, which would stay quieter in solitude. And it was probably to this end, to make their chastity more meritorious through this circumstance and consideration, that Boleslaus and his wife Kinga, king and queen of Poland, vowed it by common accord. They did so lying together on their very wedding day, and kept it in the teeth of marital opportunities.[23]

We train them from childhood in the business of love. Their grace, their finery, their learning, their speech, all their instruction aims at that one goal. Their governesses imprint nothing on them but the face of love, if only by depicting it to them continually to put them off it. My daughter (she is the only child I have) is at the age at which the laws allow the most hot-blooded girls to marry. She is of a slow-developing constitution, slight and soft, and her mother has brought her up accordingly, in a secluded and private way. So she is only now beginning to shed the innocence of childhood.

21 An allusion to Saint Paul: "it is better to marry than to burn" (1 Corinthians 7:9).
22 Martial, Epigrams XII.
23 Boleslaus V the Chaste of Poland (1226–1279) and his wife Saint Kinga.

FRENCH

Elle lisoit vn liure François deuant moy: le mot de, fouteau, s'y rencontra, nom d'vn arbre cogneu: la femme qu'ell' a pour sa conduitte, l'arresta tout court, vn peu rudement, et la fit passer par dessus ce mauuais pas. Ie la laissay faire, pour ne troubler leurs regles: car ie ne m'empesche aucunement de ce gouuernement. La police feminine a vn train mysterieux, il faut le leur quitter. Mais si ie ne me trompe, le commerce de vingt laquays, n'eust sçeu imprimer en sa fantasie, de six moys, l'intelligence et vsage, et toutes les consequences du son de ces syllabes scelerees, comme fit cette bonne vieille, par sa reprimende et son interdiction.

Motus doceri gaudet Ionicos
Matura virgo, et frangitur artubus,
Iam nunc, et incestos amores
De tenero meditatur vngui, Qu'elles se dispensent vn peu de la ceremonie, qu'elles entrent en liberté de discours, nous ne sommes qu'enfans au prix d'elles, en cette science. Oyez leur representer nos poursuittes et nos entretiens: elles vous font bien cognoistre que nous ne leur apportons rien, qu'elles n'ayent sçeu et digeré sans nous. Seroit-ce ce que dit Platon, qu'elles ayent esté garçons desbauchez autresfois? Mon oreille se rencontra vn iour en lieu, où elle pouuoit desrober aucun des discours faicts entre elles sans soupçon: que ne puis-ie le dire?

Nostre dame, (fis-ie), allons à cette heure estudier des frases d'Amadis, et des registres de Boccace et de l'Aretin, pour faire les habiles: nous employons vrayement bien notre temps: il n'est ny parole, ny exemple, ny démarche qu'elles ne sçachent mieux que nos liures. C'est vne discipline qui naist dans leurs veines, Et mentem Venus ipsa dedit, que ces bons maistres d'escole, nature, ieunesse, et santé, leur soufflent continuellement dans l'ame. Elles n'ont que faire de l'apprendre, elles l'engendrent. Nec tantum niueo gauisa est ulla columbo
Compar, vel si quid dicitur improbius,
Oscula mordenti semper decerpere rostro,
Quantum præcipuè multiuola est mulier.

3.5.21 Qui n'eust tenu vn peu en bride cette naturelle violence de leur desir, par la crainte et honneur, dequoy on les a pourueuës, nous estions diffamez. Tout le mouuement du

ENGLISH

She was reading a French book in front of me when the word fouteau came up, the name of a well-known tree. The woman she has as her governess stopped her short, rather roughly, and made her skip over that bad step. I let her do it, so as not to upset their rules, for I do not meddle in that government at all. Feminine administration has a mysterious way of proceeding; we must leave it to them. But if I am not mistaken, the company of twenty lackeys could not in six months have imprinted on her mind the meaning, the use and all the implications of the sound of those wicked syllables as well as that good old woman did with her reprimand and her prohibition.[24]

The ripening maiden loves to be taught Ionian dances,
And makes her limbs supple,
And even now, from her tenderest years,
Dreams of unchaste loves. Let them drop the ceremony a little and talk freely, and we are mere children compared with them in this science. Listen to them describe our pursuits and our conversations: they make it quite plain that we bring them nothing they have not known and digested without us. Could it be, as Plato says, that they were once dissolute boys? One day my ear happened to be in a place where it could steal some of their talk among themselves without their suspecting. If only I could repeat it![25]

By Our Lady, I said, let us go now and study phrases from Amadis and the stories of Boccaccio and Aretino, to make ourselves clever! We are really putting our time to good use! There is no word, no example, no move that they do not know better than our books. It is a discipline born in their veins, And Venus herself gave them the mind, which those good schoolmasters, nature, youth and health, keep breathing into their souls. They do not need to learn it; they generate it. No dove ever so delighted in her snow-white mate—
Or any creature said to be more wanton—
Always plucking kisses with her biting beak,
As does a woman whose desires are many.[26]

If this natural violence of their desire had not been held a little in check by the fear and honor they have been given, we men would be disgraced.

24 Fouteau means "beech tree," but sounds like a coarse French verb for sexual intercourse.
25 Horace, Odes III.6. Plato's idea is in the Timaeus, where cowardly men are reborn as women.
26 The quotations are from Virgil, Georgics III, and Catullus, LXVIII.

FRENCH

monde se resoult et rend à cet accouplage: c'est vne matiere infuse par tout: c'est vn centre où toutes choses regardent. On void encore des ordonnances de la vieille et sage Rome, faictes pour le seruice de l'amour: et les preceptes de Socrates, à instruire les courtisanes. Necnon libelli Stoici inter sericos / Iacere puluillos amant. Zenon parmy les loix, regloit aussi les escarquillemens, et les secousses du depucelage. De quel sens estoit le liure du philosophe Strato, de la conionction charnelle? Et dequoy traittoit Theophraste, en ceux qu'il intitula, l'vn l'Amoureux, l'autre de l'Amour?

Dequoy Aristippus au sien, des anciennes delices? Que veulent pretendre les descriptions si estendues et viues en Platon, des amours de son temps? Et le liure de l'Amoureux, de Demetrius Phalereus: et Clinias, ou l'Amoureux forcé de Heraclides Ponticus? Et d'Antisthenes, celuy de faire les enfants, ou des nopces: et l'autre, du maistre ou de l'Amant? Et d'Aristo, celuy, des exercices amoureux? de Cleanthes, vn de l'Amour, l'autre de l'art d'aymer? Les dialogues amoureux de Spherus? Et la fable de Iupiter et Iuno de Chrysippus, eshontee au delà de toute souffrance? Et ses cinquante epistres si lasciues? Ie veux laisser à part les escrits des philosophes, qui ont suiuy la secte d'Epicurus protectrice de la volupté.

Cinquante deitez estoient au temps passé asseruies à cet office. Et s'est trouué nation, où pour endormir la concupiscence de ceux qui venoient à la deuotion, on tenoit aux temples des garses à iouyr et estoit acte de ceremonie de s'en seruir auant venir à l'office: Nimirum propter continentiam incontinentia necessaria est, incendium ignibus extinguitur.

3.5.22 En la plus part du monde, cette partie de nostre corps estoit deifiee. En mesme prouince, les vns se l'escorchoient pour en offrir et consacrer vn lopin: les autres offroient et consacroient leur semence. En vne autre, les ieunes hommes se le perçoient publiquement, et ouuroient en diuers lieux entre chair et cuir, et trauersoient par ces ouuertures, des brochettes, les plus longues et grosses qu'ils pouuoient souffrir: et de ces brochettes faisoient apres du feu, pour offrande à leurs Dieux: estimez peu vigoureux et peu chastes, s'ils

ENGLISH

All the motion of the world resolves itself into this coupling and yields to it. It is a matter infused everywhere, a center toward which all things look. We can still see ordinances of old and wise Rome made for the service of love, and Socrates' precepts for instructing courtesans. And Stoic pamphlets love / To lie among silken cushions. Zeno, among his laws, also regulated the spreading of legs and the thrusts of deflowering. What was the drift of the philosopher Strato's book on carnal union? And what did Theophrastus treat in the books he entitled, one The Lover, the other On Love?[27]

What did Aristippus treat in his On Ancient Pleasures? What are Plato's long and vivid descriptions of the loves of his time meant to convey? And the book The Lover by Demetrius of Phalerum, and Clinias, or The Lover Forced, by Heraclides of Pontus? And Antisthenes' book On Begetting Children, or On Weddings, and his other one, On the Master, or The Lover? And Aristo's On Amorous Exercises? And Cleanthes' two books, one On Love, the other On the Art of Loving? The amorous dialogues of Sphaerus? And Chrysippus' fable of Jupiter and Juno, shameless beyond all bearing? And his fifty letters, so lascivious? I mean to leave aside the writings of the philosophers who followed the sect of Epicurus, the protector of pleasure.[28]

In times past, fifty deities were bound to this office. And there was once a nation where, to lull the lust of those who came to worship, young women were kept in the temples for enjoyment, and it was a ceremonial act to make use of them before attending the service: Doubtless incontinence is necessary for the sake of continence; a blaze is put out by fire.

In most of the world, this part of our body was deified. In one and the same province, some flayed it to offer and consecrate a piece of it, while others offered and consecrated their seed. In another, the young men pierced it publicly, opening it in various places between the flesh and the skin. Through these openings they passed skewers, the longest and thickest they could bear, and afterward they burned these skewers as an offering to their gods. Anyone who fainted from the force of 27 Horace, Epodes VIII. Socrates' advice to the courtesan Theodote is in Xenophon, Memorabilia III.

28 These titles come from Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers.

FRENCH

venoient à s'estonner par la force de cette cruelle douleur. Ailleurs, le plus sacré magistrat, estoit reueré et recogneu par ces parties là.

Et en plusieurs ceremonies l'effigie en estoit portee en pompe, à l'honneur de diuerses diuinitez. Les dames Ægyptiennes en la feste des Bacchanales, en portoient au col vn de bois, exquisement formé, grand et pesant, chacune selon sa force: outre ce que la statue de leur Dieu, en representoit, qui surpassoit en mesure le reste du corps. Les femmes mariées icy pres, en forgent de leur couurechef vne figure sur leur front, pour se glorifier de la iouyssance qu'elles en ont: et venant à estre vefues, le couchent en arriere, et enseuelissent soubs leur coiffure. Les plus sages matrones à Rome, estoient honnorees d'offrir des fleurs et des couronnes au Dieu Priapus.

Et sur ses parties moins honnestes, faisoit-on soir les vierges, au temps de leurs nopces. Encore ne sçay-ie si i'ay veu en mes iours quelque air de pareille deuotion. Que vouloit dire cette ridicule piece de la chaussure de nos peres, qui se voit encore en nos Suysses? A quoy faire, la montre que nous faisons à cette heure de nos pieces en forme, soubs nos grecgues: et souuent, qui pis est, outre leur grandeur naturelle, par fauceté et imposture? Il me prend enuie de croire, que cette sorte de vestement fut inuentee aux meilleurs et plus conscientieux siecles, pour ne piper le monde: pour que chacun rendist en publiq compte de son faict. Les nations plus simples, l'ont encore aucunement rapportant au vray.

Lors on instruisoit la science de l'ouurier, comme il se faict, de la mesure du bras ou du pied. Ce bon homme qui en ma ieunesse, chastra tant de belles et antiques statues en sa grande ville, pour ne corrompre la veuë, suyuant l'aduis de cet autre antien bon homme, Flagitij principium est nudare inter ciues corpora: se deuoit aduiser, comme aux mysteres de la bonne Deesse, toute apparence masculine en estoit forclose, que ce n'estoit rien auancer, s'il ne faisoit encore chastrer, et cheuaux, et asnes, et nature en fin.

Omne adeo genus in terris, hominùmque, ferarúmque,
Et genus æquoreum, pecudes pictæque volucres, that cruel pain was thought to have little vigor and little chastity. Elsewhere the most sacred magistrate was revered and recognized by those parts.

ENGLISH

In several ceremonies its effigy was carried in procession in honor of various divinities. At the feast of the Bacchanalia, the Egyptian ladies wore one around their necks, exquisitely carved in wood, large and heavy, each according to her strength. Besides this, the statue of their god displayed one that was bigger than the rest of his body. The married women in these parts fashion a figure of it on their foreheads out of their kerchiefs, to glory in the enjoyment they have of it. When they become widows, they lay it back and bury it under their headdress. In Rome the most virtuous matrons were honored to offer flowers and garlands to the god Priapus.

And at the time of their weddings, virgins were made to sit on his less decent parts. And I wonder whether I have not seen in my own day some trace of a similar devotion. What was the meaning of that ridiculous piece of our fathers' breeches, which can still be seen on our Swiss? Why do we now make a display of our parts, shaped, under our breeches, and often, what is worse, larger than their natural size, by falsehood and imposture? I am tempted to believe that this sort of garment was invented in better and more conscientious ages so as not to cheat people, so that each man should give a public account of his case. The simpler nations still wear it in a form that corresponds somewhat to the truth.[29]

In those days people were informed of the workman's capacity as one is by measuring an arm or a foot. That good man who, in my youth, castrated so many fine ancient statues in his great city, so as not to corrupt the eye, followed the advice of that other good man of antiquity: It is the beginning of vice to bare bodies among citizens. He should have reflected that, just as in the mysteries of the Good Goddess every masculine semblance was shut out, he was getting nowhere unless he also had horses and asses castrated, and in the end nature itself.[30]

So it is that every race on earth, of men and beasts,
The race of the sea, the flocks and the painted birds,

29 The codpiece.
30 Probably Pope Paul IV, in Rome; the line is Ennius, quoted by Cicero, Tusculan Disputations IV. Men were excluded from the rites of the Bona Dea, the "Good Goddess."

FRENCH

In furias ignémque ruunt. Les Dieux, dit Platon, nous ont fourni d'vn membre inobedient et tyrannique: qui, comme vn animal furieux, entreprend par la violence de son appetit, sousmettre tout à soy. De mesmes aux femmes le leur, comme vn animal glouton et auide, auquel si on refuse aliments en sa saison, il forcene impatient de delay; et soufflant sa rage en leurs corps, empesche les conduits, arreste la respiration, causant mille sortes de maux: iusques à ce qu'ayant humé le fruit de la soif commune, il en ayt largement arrousé et ensemencé le fond de leur matrice.

3.5.23 Or se deuoit aduiser aussi mon legislateur, qu'à l'auanture est-ce vn plus chaste et fructueux vsage, de leur faire de bonne heure cognoistre le vif, que de le leur laisser deuiner, selon la liberté, et chaleur de leur fantasie. Au lieu des parties vrayes, elles en substituent par desir et par esperance, d'autres extrauagantes au triple. Et tel de ma cognoissance s'est perdu, pour auoir faict la descouuerte des siennes, en lieu où il n'estoit encore au propre de les mettre en possession de leur plus serieux vsage. Quel dommage ne font ces enormes pourtraicts, que les enfants vont semant aux passages et escalliers des maisons Royalles? De là leur vient vn cruel mespris de nostre portee naturelle.

Que sçait-on, si Platon ordonnant apres d'autres republiques bien instituees que les hommes, femmes, vieux, ieunes, se presentent nuds à la veuë les vns des autres, en ses gymnastiques, n'a pas regardé à cela? Les Indiennes qui voyent les hommes à crud, ont aumoins refroidy le sens de la veuë.

Et quoy que dient les femmes de ce grand royaume du Pegu, qui au dessous de la ceinture, n'ont à se couurir qu'vn drap fendu par le deuant: et si estroit, que quelque cerimonieuse decence qu'elles y cerchent, à chasque pas on les void toutes; que c'est vne inuention trouuee aux fins d'attirer les hommes à elles, et les retirer des masles, à quoy cette nation est du tout abandonnee: il se pourroit dire, qu'elles y perdent plus qu'elles n'auancent: et qu'vne faim entiere, est plus aspre, que celle qu'on a rassasiee, au moins par les yeux. Aussi disoit Liuia, qu'à vne femme de bien, vn homme nud, n'est non plus qu'vne image.

Les Lacedemoniennes, plus vierges femmes, que ne sont noz filles, voyoyent tous les iours les ieunes hommes de

ENGLISH

Rush into this fury and fire. The gods, says Plato, have furnished us with a disobedient and tyrannical member, which, like a furious animal, tries by the violence of its appetite to bring everything under its sway. In the same way, women's member is like a greedy and ravenous animal. If it is refused food in its season, it goes mad, impatient of delay, and breathes its rage into their bodies. It blocks the passages and stops the breathing, causing a thousand kinds of ills, until it has drunk in the fruit of the common thirst and abundantly watered and sown the depths of their womb.

Now my lawgiver should also have considered that it may be a more chaste and fruitful practice to let them know the living thing early than to leave them to guess at it according to the freedom and heat of their fancy. In place of the real parts, they substitute, through desire and hope, others three times as extravagant. And a man I know ruined his chances by revealing his in a situation where it was not yet proper to put them to their most serious use. What harm those enormous drawings do, which boys scatter over the passages and staircases of royal houses! From them women get a cruel contempt for our natural capacity.

Who knows whether Plato did not have this in mind when, following other well-ordered republics, he ordained that men and women, old and young, should present themselves naked to one another's view in his gymnastics? The Indian women, who see men in the raw, have at least cooled the sense of sight.

Then there are the women of that great kingdom of Pegu. Below the waist they have nothing to cover themselves with but a cloth slit in front, and so narrow that, whatever ceremonious decency they try for, they can be seen entirely at every step. They say it is a device invented to draw men to them and away from males, to whom that nation is wholly given over. Whatever they may say, it could be argued that they lose more by it than they gain, and that a total hunger is sharper than one that has been satisfied, if only by the eyes. So Livia said that to a virtuous woman a naked man is no more than a statue.[31]

The Spartan women, more virginal as wives than our girls are, saw the young men of their city leur ville, despouillez en leurs exercices: peu exactes elles mesmes à couurir leurs cuisses en marchant: s'estimants, comme dit Platon, assez couuertes de leur vertu sans vertugade. Mais ceux là, desquels parle Sainct Augustin, ont donné vn merueilleux effort de tentation à la nudité, qui ont mis en doubte, si les femmes au iugement vniuersel, resusciteront en leur sexe, et non plustost au nostre, pour ne nous tenter encore en ce sainct estat. On les leurre en somme, et acharne, par tous moyens. Nous eschauffons et incitons leur imagination sans cesse, et puis nous crions au ventre.

FRENCH

Confessons le vray, il n'en est guere d'entre nous, qui ne craigne plus la honte, qui luy vient des vices de sa femme, que des siens: qui ne se soigne plus (esmerueillable charité) de la conscience de sa bonne espouse, que de la sienne propre: qui n'aymast mieux estre voleur et sacrilege, et que sa femme fust meurtriere et heretique, que si elle n'estoit plus chaste que son mary. Inique estimation de vices. Nous et elles sommes capables de mille corruptions plus dommageables et desnaturees, que n'est la lasciueté. Mais nous faisons et poisons les vices, non selon nature, mais selon nostre interest. Par où ils prennent tant de formes inegales.

3.5.24 L'aspreté de noz decrets, rend l'application des femmes à ce vice, plus aspre et plus vicieuse, que ne porte sa condition: et l'engage à des suittes pires que n'est leur cause. Elles offriront volontiers d'aller au palais querir du gain, et à la guerre de la reputation, plustost que d'auoir au milieu de l'oisiueté, et des delices, à faire vne si difficile garde. Voyent-elles pas, qu'il n'est ny marchant ny procureur, ny soldat, qui ne quitte sa besongne pour courre à cette autre: et le crocheteur, et le sauetier, tout harassez et hallebrenez qu'ils sont de trauail et de faim?

Num tu, quæ tenuit diues Achæmenes,
Aut pinguis Phrygiæ Mygdonias opes,
Permutare velis crine Licymniæ,
Plenas aut Arabum domos,
Dum fragrantia detorquet ad oscula

ENGLISH

every day, stripped for their exercises. They themselves were not very particular about covering their thighs as they walked, considering themselves, as Plato says, covered enough by their virtue without a farthingale. But those Saint Augustine speaks of attributed a marvelous power of temptation to nakedness. They questioned whether women, at the Last Judgment, will rise again in their own sex and not rather in ours, so as not to tempt us even in that holy state. In short, we lure them and goad them on by every means. We ceaselessly heat and stir up their imagination, and then we cry out against the belly.[32]

Let us confess the truth. There is hardly one of us who does not fear the shame that comes to him from his wife's vices more than from his own. Hardly one who does not take more care (wonderful charity!) of his good wife's conscience than of his own. Hardly one who would not rather be a thief and a committer of sacrilege, and have his wife a murderess and a heretic, than have her be no more chaste than her husband. An unjust valuation of vices! Both we and they are capable of a thousand corruptions more harmful and unnatural than lasciviousness. But we create and weigh vices not according to nature but according to our interest. That is why they take on so many unequal forms.

The harshness of our decrees makes women's devotion to this vice harsher and more vicious than its nature warrants, and leads it to consequences worse than their cause. They would willingly offer to go to the law courts to seek gain, and to war to seek reputation, rather than have to keep so difficult a guard in the midst of idleness and pleasures. Do they not see that there is no merchant, no attorney, no soldier who does not leave his work to run to this other business? And the porter and the cobbler too, however harassed and worn out they are with labor and hunger?

Would you exchange all that rich Achaemenes possessed,
Or the Mygdonian wealth of fertile Phrygia,
For a lock of Licymnia's hair,
Or the full houses of the Arabs,

31 Livia was the wife of the emperor Augustus.
32 The French plays on vertu (virtue) and vertugade (farthingale, a hooped petticoat). Augustine discusses the question in The City of God XXII.

FRENCH

Ceruicem, aut facili sœuitia negat,
Quæ poscente magis gaudeat eripi,
Interdum rapere occupet? Ie ne sçay si les exploicts de Cæsar et d'Alexandre surpassent en rudesse la resolution d'vne belle ieune femme, nourrie à nostre façon, à la lumiere et commerce du monde, battue de tant d'exemples contraires, se maintenant entiere, au milieu de mille continuelles et fortes poursuittes. Il n'y a point de faire, plus espineux, qu'est ce non faire, ny plus actif. Ie trouue plus aysé, de porter vne cuirasse toute sa vie, qu'vn pucelage.

Et est le vœu de la virginité, le plus noble de tous les vœux, comme estant le plus aspre. Diaboli virtus in lumbis est: dict Sainct Ierosme.

3.5.25 Certes le plus ardu et le plus vigoureux des humains deuoirs, nous l'auons resigné aux dames, et leur en quittons la gloire. Cela leur doit seruir d'vn singulier esguillon à s'y opiniastrer. C'est vne belle matiere à nous brauer, et à fouler aux pieds, cette vaine preeminence de valeur et de vertu, que nous pretendons sur elles. Elles trouueront, si elles s'en prennent garde, qu'elles en seront non seulement tres-estimees, mais aussi plus aymees. Vn galant homme n'abandonne point sa poursuitte, pour estre refusé, pourueu que ce soit vn refus de chasteté, non de choix. Nous auons beau iurer et menasser, et nous plaindre: nous mentons, nous les en aymons mieux. Il n'est point de pareil leurre, que la sagesse, non rude, et renfrongnee.

C'est stupidité et lascheté, de s'opiniastrer contre la hayne et le mespris. Mais contre vne resolution vertueuse et constante, meslee d'vne volonté recognoissante, c'est l'exercice d'vne ame noble et genereuse. Elles peuuent recognoistre nos seruices, iusques à certaine mesure, et nous faire sentir honnestement qu'elles ne nous desdaignent pas. Car cette loy qui leur commande de nous abominer, par ce que nous les adorons, et nous hayr de ce que nous les aymons: elle est certes cruelle, ne fust que de sa difficulté. Pourquoy n'orront elles noz offres et noz demandes, autant qu'elles se contiennent sous le deuoir de la modestie? Que va lon deuinant, qu'elles sonnent au dedans, quelque sens plus libre?

ENGLISH

While she bends her neck toward your burning kisses,
Or with easy cruelty refuses
What she would rather have snatched from her than asked for,
And sometimes is the first to snatch? I do not know whether the exploits of Caesar and Alexander surpass in toughness the resolution of a beautiful young woman. She has been brought up in our fashion, in the light and company of the world, assailed by so many contrary examples, and yet keeps herself intact in the midst of a thousand continual and strong pursuits. There is no doing more thorny, or more active, than this not doing. I find it easier to wear a suit of armor all one's life than a virginity.

And the vow of virginity is the noblest of all vows, as being the hardest. The devil's strength is in the loins, says Saint Jerome.

Certainly we have handed over to the ladies the most arduous and vigorous of human duties, and we leave them the glory of it. That ought to serve them as a singular spur to persist in it. It is a fine occasion for them to defy us and trample underfoot that empty pre-eminence in valor and virtue that we claim over them. They will find, if they take note, that it will make them not only highly esteemed but also more loved. A gallant man does not abandon his pursuit because he is refused, provided it is a refusal of chastity, not of choice. We may swear and threaten and complain all we like: we are lying; we love them the better for it. There is no lure like virtue, so long as it is not harsh and scowling.

It is stupidity and cowardice to persist against hatred and contempt. But to persist against a virtuous and constant resolution mingled with a grateful will is the exercise of a noble and generous soul. They may acknowledge our services up to a certain point and let us feel, decently, that they do not disdain us. For that law which commands them to abominate us because we adore them, and to hate us because we love them, is certainly cruel, if only because it is so hard. Why should they not listen to our offers and our requests, so long as they keep within the bounds of modesty? Why go guessing that inwardly they hear some freer meaning?

FRENCH

Vne Royne de nostre temps, disoit ingenieusement, que de refuser ces abbors, c'est tesmoignage de foiblesse, et accusation de sa propre facilité: et qu'vne dame non tentee, ne se pouuoit venter de sa chasteté. Les limites de l'honneur ne sont pas retranchez du tout si court: il a dequoy se relascher, il peut se dispenser aucunement sans se forfaire. Au bout de sa frontiere, il y a quelque estendue, libre, indifferente, et neutre. Qui l'a peu chasser et acculer à force, iusques dans son coin et son fort: c'est vn mal habile homme s'il n'est satisfaict de sa fortune. Le prix de la victoire se considere par la difficulté. Voulez vous sçauoir quelle impression a faict en son cœur, vostre seruitude et vostre merite?

mesurez-le à ses mœurs. Telle peut donner plus, qui ne donne pas tant. L'obligation du bien-faict, se rapporte entierement à la volonté de celuy qui donne: les autres circonstances qui tombent au bien faire, sont muettes, mortes et casueles. Ce peu luy couste plus à donner, qu'à sa compaigne son tout. Si en quelque chose la rareté sert d'estimation, ce doit estre en cecy. Ne regardez pas combien peu c'est, mais combien peu l'ont. La valeur de la monnoye se change selon le coin et, la merque du lieu. Quoy que le despit et l'indiscretion d'aucuns leur puisse faire dire, sur l'excez de leur mescontentement: tousiours la vertu et la verité regaigne son auantage.

I'en ay veu, desquelles la reputation a esté long temps interessee par iniure, s'estre remises en l'approbation vniuerselle des hommes, par leur seule constance, sans soing et sans artifice: chacun se repent et se desment, de ce qu'il en a creu. De filles vn peu suspectes, elles tiennent le premier rang entre les dames d'honneur. Quelqu'vn disoit à Platon: Tout le monde mesdit de vous. Laissez les dire, fit-il: ie viuray de façon, que ie leur feray changer de langage. Outre la crainte de Dieu, et le prix d'vne gloire si rare, qui les doibt inciter à se conseruer, la corruption de ce siecle les y force.

Et si i'estois en leur place, il n'est rien que ie ne fisse plustost que de commettre ma reputation en mains si dangereuses. De mon temps, le plaisir d'en comter (plaisir qui ne doit guere en douceur à celuy mesme de l'effect) n'estoit permis qu'à ceux qui auoient quelque amy fidelle et vnique: à present les entretiens ordinaires des assemblees et des tables, ce sont les vanteries des faueurs receuës, et liberalité secrette des dames.

ENGLISH

A queen of our time used to say, ingeniously, that refusing these approaches is a sign of weakness and an admission of one's own easiness, and that a lady who has not been tempted cannot boast of her chastity. The limits of honor are not cut so very short. It has room to relax; it can take some liberties without forfeiting itself. At the edge of its frontier there is a stretch that is free, indifferent and neutral. Whoever has managed to chase it and drive it by force right into its corner and its stronghold is a clumsy fellow if he is not satisfied with his luck. The prize of victory is measured by its difficulty. Do you want to know what impression your devotion and your merit have made on her heart?

Measure it by her character. One woman may give more who does not give as much. The obligation created by a benefit depends entirely on the will of the giver; the other circumstances that attend the giving are mute, dead and accidental. That little costs her more to give than her all costs her companion. If rarity is a ground for esteem in anything, it must be in this. Look not at how little it is, but at how few have had it. The value of a coin changes with the stamp and mark of the place. Whatever spite and indiscretion may make some men say in the excess of their discontent, virtue and truth always regain the advantage.

I have seen women whose reputation had long been damaged by slander win back the universal approval of men by their constancy alone, without effort and without artifice. Everyone repents and retracts what he had believed of them. From being girls under some suspicion, they hold the first rank among ladies of honor. Someone said to Plato, "Everyone speaks ill of you." "Let them talk," he said. "I will live in such a way that I make them change their tune." Besides the fear of God and the prize of so rare a glory, which should incite them to preserve themselves, the corruption of this age forces them to it.

And if I were in their place, there is nothing I would not do sooner than entrust my reputation to such dangerous hands. In my time, the pleasure of telling about it (a pleasure hardly less sweet than that of the act itself) was permitted only to those who had a single faithful friend. Nowadays the ordinary talk at gatherings and at table is all boasting about favors received and the secret generos-

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Vrayement c'est trop d'abiection, et de bassesse de cœur, de laisser ainsi fierement persecuter, paistrir, et fourrager ces tendres et mignardes douceurs, à des personnes ingrates, indiscretes, et si volages.	ity of ladies. Truly it is too abject and base-hearted to let those tender, dainty sweetnesses be so fiercely persecuted, kneaded and plundered by people so ungrateful, indiscreet and fickle.

JEALOUSY

Jealousy, the most futile of passions, makes cuckoldry worse and cannot be cured.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.5.26 Cette nostre exasperation immoderee, et illegitime, contre ce vice, naist de la plus vaine et tempesteuse maladie qui afflige les ames humaines, qui est la ialousie. Quis vetat apposito lumen de lumine sumi? / Dent licet assiduè, nil tamen inde perit. Celle-là, et l'enuie sa sœur, me semblent des plus ineptes de la trouppe. De cette-cy, ie n'en puis gueres parler: cette passion qu'on peint si forte et si puissante, n'a de sa grace aucune addresse en moy. Quant à l'autre, ie la cognois, au moins de veuë. Les bestes en ont ressentiment. Le pasteur Cratis estant tombé en l'amour d'vne cheure, son bouc, ainsi qu'il dormoit, luy vint par ialousie choquer la teste, de la sienne, et la luy escraza.	This immoderate and illegitimate exasperation of ours against this vice is born of the most futile and stormy malady that afflicts human souls, which is jealousy. Who forbids taking light from a light set beside it? / Though they give constantly, nothing is lost by it. Jealousy and its sister envy seem to me among the most foolish of the troop. Of envy I can hardly speak: that passion, painted as so strong and powerful, has kindly found no way into me. As for the other, I know it, at least by sight. Animals feel it. The shepherd Cratis fell in love with a she-goat, and while he slept her billy goat came out of jealousy and butted his head with its own, and crushed it.[33]
Nous auons monté l'excez de cette fieure, à l'exemple d'aucunes nations barbares. Les mieux disciplinees en ont esté touchees: c'est raison: mais non pas transportees: Ense maritali nemo confossus adulter, / Purpureo Stygias sanguine tinxit aquas. Lucullus, Cæsar, Pompeius, Antonius, Caton, et d'autres braues hommes, furent cocus, et le sçeurent, sans en exciter tumulte. Il n'y eut en ce temps là, qu'vn sot de Lepidus, qui en mourut d'angoisse. Ah!	We have raised the excess of this fever after the example of certain barbarous nations. The best-disciplined nations have been touched by it, which is reasonable, but not carried away by it: No adulterer, pierced by a husband's sword, / Has dyed the waters of the Styx with his crimson blood. Lucullus, Caesar, Pompey, Antony, Cato and other brave men were cuckolds and knew it, without making a commotion about it. In those days there was only one fool, Lepidus, who died of anguish over it. Ah![34]
tum te miserum malique fati, Quem attractis pedibus, patente porta, Percurrent mugilésque raphanique. Et le Dieu de nostre poëte, quand il surprint auec sa femme l'vn de ses compagnons, se contenta de leur en faire honte: Atque aliquis de Diis non tristibus optat, Sic fieri turpis. Et ne laisse pourtant de s'eschauffer des molles caresses, qu'elle luy offre: se plaignant qu'elle soit pour cela entree en deffiance de son affection: Quid causas petis ex alto? fiducia cessit Quo tibi, Diua, mei? Voyre elle luy fait requeste pour vn sien bastard, Arma rogo genitrix nato: qui luy est liberalement accordee. Et parle Vulcan d'Æneas auec honneur: Arma acri	then, poor wretch, of evil fate, With your legs pulled apart and the door wide open, Mullets and radishes will run you through! And our poet's god, when he caught one of his companions with his wife, was content to put them to shame: And one of the gods, not among the gloomy ones, wishes He might be so disgraced. Yet he still warms to the soft caresses she offers him, and complains that she has come to distrust his affection on that account: Why seek reasons from so far back? Where, goddess, Has your trust in me gone? She even makes a request

33 Ovid, The Art of Love III.
34 Johannes Secundus, Elegies. Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, consul in 78 BC.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	facienda viro. D'vne humanité à la verité plus qu'humaine.	of him for an illegitimate son of hers, Arms I ask, a mother for her son, which he generously grants. And Vulcan speaks of Aeneas with honor: Arms must be made for a valiant man. A humanity, in truth, more than human.[35]
	Et cet excez de bonté, ie consens qu'on le quitte aux Dieux: Nec diuis homines componier æquum est.	And this excess of goodness I agree to leave to the gods: Nor is it right to compare men with gods.
3.5.27	Quant à la confusion des enfans, outre ce que les plus graues legislateurs l'ordonnent et l'affectent en leurs republiques, elle ne touche pas les femmes, où cette passion est ie ne sçay comment encore mieux en siege. Sæpe etiam Iuno, maxima cælicolum, / Coniugis in culpa flagrauit quotidiana. Lors que la ialousie saisit ces pauures ames, foibles, et sans resistance, c'est pitié, comme elle les tirasse et tyrannise cruellement. Elle s'y insinue sous tiltre d'amitié: mais depuis qu'elle les possede, les mesmes causes qui seruoient de fondement à la bien-vueillance, seruent de fondement de hayne capitale: c'est des maladies d'esprit celle, à qui plus de choses seruent d'aliment, et moins de choses de remede.	As for the confusion of children, the gravest law-givers ordain and favor it in their republics. Besides, it does not concern women, in whom this passion is, I know not how, even more firmly seated. Often even Juno, greatest of the heaven-dwellers, / Has blazed with anger at her husband's daily faults. When jealousy seizes these poor souls, weak and without resistance, it is pitiful to see how cruelly it pulls them about and tyrannizes them. It creeps in under the name of affection. But once it possesses them, the very causes that served as the foundation of goodwill serve as the foundation of mortal hatred. Of all the diseases of the mind, it is the one that the most things feed and the fewest things cure.[36]
	La vertu, la santé, le merite, la reputation du mary, sont les boutefeux de leur maltalent et de leur rage. Nullæ sunt inimicitiæ, nisi amoris, acerbæ. Cette fiéure laidit et corrompt tout ce qu'elles ont de bel et de bon d'ailleurs. Et d'vne femme ialouse, quelque chaste qu'elle soit, et mesnagere, il n'est action qui ne sente l'aigre et l'importun. C'est vne agitation enragee, qui les reiette à vne extremité du tout contraire à sa cause. Il fut bon d'vn Octauius à Rome. Ayant couché auec Pontia Posthumia, il augmenta son affection par la iouyssance, et poursuyuit à toute instance de l'espouser: ne la pouuant persuader, cet amour extreme le precipita aux effects de la plus cruelle et mortelle inimitié: il la tua.	The husband's virtue, health, merit and reputation are the firebrands of their spite and their rage. No enmities are bitter but those of love. This fever disfigures and corrupts all that is otherwise fine and good in them. In a jealous woman, however chaste and however good a housekeeper she may be, there is no action that does not smack of sourness and nagging. It is a frenzied agitation that throws them to an extreme wholly contrary to its cause. A fine example was one Octavius in Rome. He had lain with Pontia Postumia, and his affection grew through enjoyment, so that he pressed her with all urgency to marry him. Unable to persuade her, this extreme love drove him headlong into acts of the cruelest and deadliest enmity: he killed her.[37]
	Pareillement les symptomes ordinaires de cette autre maladie amoureuse, ce sont haines intestines, monopoles, coniurations: Notumque, furens quid fœmina possit: et vne rage, qui se ronge d'autant plus, qu'elle est contraincte de s'excuser du pretexte de bien-vueillance.	Likewise, the usual symptoms of this other amorous malady are internal hatreds, cabals and conspiracies, And it is known what a raging woman can do, and a rage that gnaws at itself all the more for being forced to excuse itself under the pretext of goodwill.
3.5.28	Or le deuoir de chasteté, a vne grande estendue. Est-ce la volonté que nous voulons qu'elles brident? C'est vne	Now the duty of chastity covers a lot of ground. Is it the will that we want them to rein in? That is a piece bien soupple et actiue. Elle a beaucoup de promptitude pour la pouuoir arrester. Comment? si les songes les engagent par fois si auant, qu'elles ne s'en puissent desdire. Il n'est pas en elles, ny à l'aduanture en la chasteté mesme, puis qu'elle est femelle, de se deffendre des concupiscences et du desirer. Si leur volonté seule nous interesse où en sommes nous? Imaginez la grand' presse, à qui auroit ce priuilege, d'estre porté tout empenné, sans yeux, et sans langue, sur le poinct de chacune qui l'accepteroit.

35 Catullus, XV. Vulcan caught his wife Venus with Mars; the lines are from Ovid, Metamorphoses IV, and Virgil, Aeneid VIII.
36 Plato's Republic prescribes that children be held in common. The verse is from Catullus, LXVIII.

FRENCH

Les femmes Scythes creuoyent les yeux à touts leurs esclaues et prisonniers de guerre, pour s'en seruir plus librement et couuertement. O le furieux aduantage que l'opportunité! Qui me demanderoit la premiere partie en l'amour, ie respondrois, que c'est sçauoir prendre le temps: la seconde de mesme: et encore la tierce. C'est vn poinct qui peut tout. I'ay eu faute de fortune souuent, mais par fois aussi d'entreprise. Dieu gard' de mal qui peut encores s'en moquer. Il y faut en ce siecle plus de temerité: laquelle nos ieunes gens excusent sous pretexte de chaleur. Mais si elles y regardoyent de pres, elles trouueroyent qu'elle vient plustost de mespris. Ie craignois superstitieusement d'offenser: et respecte volontiers, ce que i'ayme.

Outre ce qu'en cette marchandise, qui en oste la reuerence, en efface le lustre. I'ayme qu'on y face vn peu l'enfant, le craintif et le seruiteur. Si ce n'est du tout en cecy, i'ay d'ailleurs quelques airs de la sotte honte dequoy parle Plutarque: et en a esté le cours de ma vie blessé et taché diuersement. Qualité bien mal auenante à ma forme vniuerselle. Qu'est-il de nous aussi, que sedition et discrepance? I'ay les yeux tendres à soustenir vn refus, comme à refuser. Et me poise tant de poiser à autruy, qu'és occasions où le deuoir me force d'essayer la volonté de quelqu'vn, en chose doubteuse et qui lui couste, ie le fais maigrement et enuis.

Mais si c'est pour mon particulier, (quoy que die veritablement Homere, qu'à vn indigent c'est vne sotte vertu que la honte) i'y commets ordinairement vn tiers, qui rougisse en ma place: et esconduis ceux qui m'emploient, de pareille difficulté: si qu'il m'est aduenu very supple and active piece, far too quick to be stopped. What then, if dreams sometimes engage them so deeply that they cannot disown them? It is not in their power, nor perhaps in the power of Chastity herself, since she is female, to defend themselves against lusts and desiring. If their will alone concerns us, where are we? Imagine the great crush of men competing for the privilege of being carried, fully winged, with no eyes and no tongue, to each woman at the moment she would accept him.

ENGLISH

The Scythian women put out the eyes of all their slaves and prisoners of war, so as to make use of them more freely and secretly. Oh, what a tremendous advantage opportunity is! If anyone asked me what comes first in love, I would answer: knowing how to seize the moment. The second thing likewise, and the third as well. It is a point that can do everything. I have often lacked luck, but sometimes also enterprise. God keep from harm anyone who can still laugh at that! In this age it takes more boldness, which our young men excuse on the pretext of ardor. But if women looked at it closely, they would find that it comes rather from contempt. I was superstitiously afraid of giving offense, and I gladly respect what I love.

Besides, in this traffic, take away reverence and you rub off its luster. I like a man to play the child a little in it, the timid one, the servant. If not altogether in this, then in other respects I have something of that foolish bashfulness Plutarch speaks of, and it has wounded and stained the course of my life in various ways. It is a quality that fits very badly with my general make-up. But then, what are we but sedition and discord? My eyes are as tender at bearing a refusal as at giving one. And it weighs on me so much to be a weight on others that when duty forces me to test someone's willingness in a doubtful matter that costs him something, I do it sparingly and reluctantly.[38]

But if it is for my own sake (though Homer truly says that in a needy man shame is a foolish virtue), I usually hand the task to a third party, who blushes in my place. And I turn down those who call on my services with the same difficulty, so 37 Propertius, Elegies II. The story of Octavius is in Tacitus, Annals XIII.

38 Plutarch's essay "On Compliancy" (or "On False Shame").

FRENCH

par fois, d'auoir la volonté de nier, que ie n'en auois pas la force.

3.5.29 C'est donc folie, d'essayer à brider aux femmes vn desir qui leur est si cuysant et si naturel. Et quand ie les oye se vanter d'auoir leur volonté si vierge et si froide, ie me moque d'elles. Elles se reculent trop arriere. Si c'est vne vieille esdentee decrepite, ou vne ieune seche et pulmonique: s'il n'est du tout croyable, aumoins elles ont apparence de le dire. Mais celles qui se meuuent et qui respirent encores, elles en empirent leur marché. D'autant que les excuses inconsiderees seruent d'accusation.

Comme vn Gentilhomme de mes voysins, qu'on soupçonnoit d'impuissance: Languidior tenera cui pendens sicula beta, / Numquam se mediam sustulit ad tunicam: trois ou quatre iours apres ses nopces, alla iurer tout hardiment, pour se iustifier, qu'il auoit faict vingt postes la nuict precedente: dequoy on s'est seruy depuis à le conuaincre de pure ignorance, et à le desmarier. Outre, que ce n'est rien dire qui vaille. Car il n'y a ny continence ny vertu, s'il n'y a de l'effort au contraire. Il est vray, faut-il dire, mais ie ne suis pas preste à me rendre. Les saincts mesmes parlent ainsi.

S'entend, de celles qui se vantent en bon escient, de leur froideur et insensibilité, et qui veulent en estre creuës d'vn visage serieux: car quand c'est d'vn visage affeté, où les yeux dementent leurs parolles, et du iargon de leur profession, qui porte coup à contrepoil, ie le trouue bon. Ie suis fort seruiteur de la nayfueté et de la liberté: mais il n'y a remede, si elle n'est du tout niaise ou enfantine, elle est inepte, et messeante aux dames en ce commerce: elle gauchit incontinent sur l'impudence. Leurs desguisements et leurs figures ne trompent que les sots: le mentir y est en siege d'honneur: c'est vn destour qui nous conduit à la verité, par vne fauce porte.

Si nous ne pouuons contenir leur imagination, que voulons nous d'elles? les effects? Il en est assez qui eschappent à toute communication estrangere, par lesquels la chasteté peult estre corrompue. Illud sæpe facit, quod sine teste facit. Et ceux que nous craignons le moins, sont à l'auanture les plus à craindre. Leurs pechez muets sont les pires. Offendor mœcha simpliciore minus. Il est des effects, qui peuuent perdre sans impudicité leur pudicité:

ENGLISH

that it has sometimes happened that I had the will to refuse but not the strength.[39]

It is folly, then, to try to bridle in women a desire so burning and so natural to them. And when I hear them boast that their will is so virginal and so cold, I laugh at them. They draw back too far. If it is a toothless, decrepit old woman, or a young one who is dried up and consumptive, then even if it is not quite believable, at least they have some plausibility in saying it. But those who still move and breathe only make their bargain worse, since rash excuses serve as accusations.

Take a gentleman, a neighbor of mine, who was suspected of impotence: whose little dagger, hanging limper than a tender beet, / never once rose as high as the middle of his tunic. Three or four days after his wedding he went and swore quite boldly, to clear himself, that he had ridden twenty stages the night before. This was later used to convict him of sheer ignorance and to unmarry him. Besides, such talk is worth nothing. For there is neither continence nor virtue if there is no effort to the contrary. "It is true," they should say, "but I am not ready to surrender." Even the saints talk like this.[40]

I mean those who boast in earnest of their coldness and insensibility and want to be believed with a straight face. When it is with an affected face, where the eyes give the lie to their words, and in the jargon of their profession, which hits home by working against the grain, I find it fine. I am a great devotee of naturalness and freedom; but there is no help for it: unless it is altogether simple or childlike, it is inept and unbecoming to ladies in these dealings, and it swerves at once into impudence. Their disguises and figures of speech deceive only fools. Lying there holds the place of honor: it is a detour that leads us to the truth by a back door.

If we cannot restrain their imagination, what do we want from them? Deeds? There are plenty that escape any outside knowledge, by which chastity can be corrupted. She often does it—the thing she does without a witness. And the deeds we fear least are perhaps the most to be feared. Their silent sins are the worst. A more open adulteress offends me less.

39 Homer, Odyssey XVII.
40 The Latin is from Catullus.

FRENCH

et qui plus est, sans leur sçeu. Obstetrix, virginis cuiusdam integritatem manu velut explorans, siue maleuolentia, siue inscitia, siue casu, dum inspicit, perdidit. Telle a adiré sa virginité, pour l'auoir cerchee: telle s'en esbattant l'a tuee. Nous ne sçaurions leur circonscrire precisement les actions que nous leur deffendons.

Il faut conceuoir nostre loy, soubs parolles generalles et incertaines. L'idee mesme que nous forgeons à leur chasteté est ridicule. Car entre les extremes patrons que i'en aye, c'est Fatua femme de Faunus, qui ne se laissa voir oncques puis ses nopces à masle quelconque. Et la femme de Hieron, qui ne sentoit pas son mary punais, estimant que ce fust vne qualité commune à tous hommes. Il faut qu'elles deuiennent insensibles et inuisibles, pour nous satisfaire.

3.5.30 Or confessons que le neud du iugement de ce deuoir, gist principallement en la volonté. Il y a eu des maris qui ont souffert cet accident, non seulement sans reproche et offence enuers leurs femmes, mais auec singuliere obligation et recommandation de leur vertu. Telle, qui aymoit mieux son honneur que sa vie, l'a prostitué à l'appetit forcené d'vn mortel ennemy, pour sauuer la vie à son mary: et a faict pour luy ce qu'elle n'eust aucunement faict pour soy. Ce n'est pas icy le lieu d'estendre ces exemples: ils sont trop hauts et trop riches, pour estre representez en ce lustre: gardons-les à vn plus noble siege.

Mais pour des exemples de lustre plus vulgaire: est-il pas tous les iours des femmes entre nous qui pour la seule vtilité de leurs maris se prestent, et par leur expresse ordonnance et entremise? Et anciennement Phaulius l'Argien offrit la sienne au Roy Philippus par ambition: tout ainsi que par ciuilité ce Galba qui auoit donné à souper à Mecenas, voyant que sa femme et luy commançoient à comploter d'œuillades et de signes, se laissa couler sur son coussin, representant vn homme aggraué de sommeil: pour faire espaule à leurs amours.

Ce qu'il aduoua d'assez bonne grace: car sur ce poinct, vn valet ayant pris la hardiesse de porter la main sur les vases, qui estoient sur la table: il luy cria tout franchement: Comment coquin? vois tu pas que ie ne

ENGLISH

There are acts by which they can lose their chastity without unchastity, and what is more, without their knowledge. A midwife, testing a certain virgin's integrity by hand, whether through malice, clumsiness or accident, destroyed it while examining it. One woman has lost her virginity by looking for it; another has killed it by toying with it. We could never precisely mark out for them the actions we forbid them.[41]

We have to frame our law in general and vague terms. The very idea we forge of their chastity is ridiculous. For among the most extreme models of it that I know are Fatua, wife of Faunus, who after her marriage never let herself be seen by any male whatever; and the wife of Hiero, who did not notice that her husband's breath stank, thinking it a quality common to all men. They must become insensible and invisible to satisfy us.[42]

Now let us admit that the crux in judging this duty lies chiefly in the will. There have been husbands who suffered this mishap not only without reproaching or resenting their wives, but with singular gratitude and praise for their virtue. Some woman who loved her honor more than her life has prostituted it to the frenzied appetite of a mortal enemy to save her husband's life, and has done for him what she would never have done for herself. This is not the place to expand on these examples: they are too lofty and too rich to be shown in this light. Let us keep them for a nobler setting.

But for examples of a more ordinary light: are there not women among us every day who lend themselves out solely for their husbands' profit, and by their express order and arrangement? And in ancient times Phaulius of Argos offered his wife to King Philip out of ambition; just as, out of courtesy, that Galba who had given a supper for Maecenas, seeing his wife and his guest begin to conspire with glances and signs, let himself slide down onto his cushion, playing a man heavy with sleep, to give their love affair a helping hand.[43]

He owned up to this with rather good grace: for at that point, when a servant made bold to lay hands on the vessels on the table, he cried out to him quite frankly: "What, you rascal? Can't you see I 41 The first two quotations are from Martial; the prose passage is from Saint Augustine, City of God.

42 Fatua was an old Roman goddess, wife of the rustic god Faunus; Hiero was a tyrant of Syracuse in the 5th century BC.
43 Philip II of Macedon, father of Alexander.

FRENCH

dors que pour Mecenas? Telle a les mœurs desbordees, qui a la volonté plus reformee que n'a cet' autre, qui se conduit soubs vne apparence reglee. Comme nous en voyons, qui se plaignent d'auoir esté vouees à chasteté, auant l'aage de cognoissance: i'en ay veu aussi, se plaindre veritablement, d'auoir esté vouees à la desbauche, auant l'aage de cognoissance. Le vice des parens en peut estre cause: ou la force du besoing, qui est vn rude conseiller.

Aux Indes Orientales, la chasteté y estant en singuliere recommandation, l'vsage pourtant souffroit, qu'vne femme mariee se peust abandonner à qui luy presentoit vn elephant: et cela, auec quelque gloire d'auoir esté estimee à si haut prix. Phedon le philosophe, homme de maison, apres la prinse de son païs d'Elide, feit mestier de prostituer, autant qu'elle dura, la beauté de sa ieunesse, à qui en voulut, à prix d'argent, pour en viure. Et Solon fut le premier en la Grece, dit-on, qui par ses loix, donna liberté aux femmes aux despens de leur pudicité de prouuoir au besoing de leur vie: coustume qu'Herodote dit auoir esté receuë auant luy, en plusieurs polices. Et puis, quel fruit de cette penible sollicitude?

Car quelque iustice, qu'il y ayt en cette passion, encore faudroit-il voir si elle nous charie vtilement. Est-il quelqu'vn, qui les pense boucler par son industrie? Pone seram, cohibe: sed quis custodiet ipsos / Custodes? cauta est, et ab illis incipit vxor. Quelle commodité ne leur est suffisante, en vn siecle si sçauant?

3.5.31 La curiosité est vicieuse par tout: mais elle est pernicieuse icy. C'est folie de vouloir s'esclaircir d'vn mal, auquel il n'y a point de medecine, qui ne l'empire et le rengrege: duquel la honte s'augmente et se publie principalement par la ialousie: duquel la vengeance blesse plus nos enfans, qu'elle ne nous guerit. Vous assechez et mourez à la queste d'vne si obscure verification. Combien piteusement y sont arriuez ceux de mon temps, qui en sont venus à bout? Si l'aduertisseur n'y presente quand et quand le remede et son secours, c'est vn aduertissement iniurieux, et qui merite mieux vn coup de poignard, que ne faict vn dementir.

ENGLISH

am only sleeping for Maecenas?" One woman whose morals are loose may have a more reformed will than another who conducts herself with an orderly appearance. Just as we see some women complain of having been vowed to chastity before the age of discretion, I have also seen some complain, truthfully, of having been vowed to debauchery before the age of discretion. The vice of the parents may be the cause, or the force of need, which is a harsh counselor.

In the East Indies, though chastity was held in singular esteem, custom nevertheless allowed a married woman to give herself to anyone who presented her with an elephant, and that with some glory at having been valued at so high a price. Phaedo the philosopher, a man of good family, after his homeland, Elis, was captured, made a trade of prostituting the beauty of his youth, as long as it lasted, to anyone who wanted it, for money, in order to live. And Solon was the first in Greece, they say, to give women by his laws the freedom to provide for their livelihood at the expense of their chastity—a custom that Herodotus says had been accepted before him in several states. And then, what comes of all this painful anxiety?[44]

For whatever justice there may be in this passion, we should still see whether it carries us anywhere useful. Is there anyone who thinks he can lock them up by his own ingenuity? Put on a bolt, keep her confined; but who will guard / the guards themselves? Your wife is crafty and begins with them. What opportunity is not enough for them, in so knowing an age?[45]

Curiosity is a vice everywhere, but here it is pernicious. It is folly to want to get to the bottom of an ill for which there is no medicine that does not worsen and aggravate it; whose shame is increased and made public chiefly by jealousy; whose revenge wounds our children more than it heals us. You wither and die in pursuit of so obscure a verification. How pitifully those in my time who succeeded in it have fared! If the informer does not offer the remedy and his help at the same time, his warning is an insult, and deserves a dagger thrust more than being called a liar does.

44 Phaedo of Elis was a disciple of Socrates.
45 Juvenal, Satires.

FRENCH

On ne se moque pas moins de celuy qui est en peine d'y pouruoir, que de celuy qui l'ignore. Le charactere de la cornardise est indelebile: à qui il est vne fois attaché, il l'est tousiours. Le chastiement l'exprime plus, que la faute. Il faict beau voir, arracher de l'ombre et du doubte, nos malheurs priuez, pour les trompeter en eschaffaux tragiques: et malheurs, qui ne pinsent, que par le rapport. Car bonne femme et bon mariage, se dit, non de qui l'est, mais duquel on se taist. Il faut estre ingenieux à euiter cette ennuyeuse et inutile cognoissance. Et auoyent les Romains en coustume, reuenans de voyage, d'enuoyer au deuant en la maison, faire sçauoir leur arriuee aux femmes, pour ne les surprendre.

Et pourtant a introduit certaine nation, que le prestre ouure le pas à l'espousee, le iour des nopces: pour oster au marié, le doubte et la curiosité, de cercher en ce premier essay, si elle vient à luy vierge, ou blessee d'vne amour estrangere.

3.5.32 Mais le monde en parle. Ie sçay cent honnestes hommes coquus, honnestement et peu indecemment. Vn galant homme en est pleint, non pas desestimé. Faites que vostre vertu estouffe votre malheur: que les gens de bien en maudissent l'occasion: que celuy qui vous offence, tremble seulement à le penser. Et puis, de qui ne parle on en ce sens, depuis le petit iusques au plus grand? Tot qui legionibus imperitauit, / Et melior quàm tu multis fuit, improbe, rebus. Voys tu qu'on engage en ce reproche tant d'honnestes hommes en ta presence, pense qu'on ne t'espargne non plus ailleurs. Mais iusques aux dames elles s'en moqueront. Et dequoy se moquent elles en ce temps plus volontiers, que d'vn mariage paisible et bien composé?

Chacun de vous a fait quelqu'vn coqu: or nature est toute en pareilles, en compensation et vicissitude. La frequence de cet accident, en doibt mes-huy auoir moderé l'aigreur: le voyla tantost passé en coustume.

3.5.33 Miserable passion, qui a cecy encore, d'estre incommunicable. Fors etiam nostris inuidit questibus aures. Car à quel amy osez vous fier vos doleances: qui, s'il ne

ENGLISH

People laugh no less at the man who goes to the trouble of remedying it than at the man who knows nothing about it. The mark of cuckoldry is indelible: once it is attached to a man, it stays with him forever. The punishment shows it more than the fault does. It is a fine sight, to drag our private misfortunes out of shadow and doubt and trumpet them on tragic stages—misfortunes that sting only by being reported. For a good wife and a good marriage are so called not when they are so, but when nobody talks about them. We must be clever at avoiding this distressing and useless knowledge. The Romans had the custom, when returning from a journey, of sending someone ahead to the house to let their wives know they were coming, so as not to surprise them.

And that is why a certain nation introduced the practice that the priest opens the way for the bride on the wedding day, to spare the groom the doubt and the curiosity of trying to find out, in this first trial, whether she comes to him a virgin or wounded by another's love.

"But people talk about it." I know a hundred honorable men who are cuckolds, honorably and with little indecency. A gallant man is pitied for it, not thought less of. See to it that your virtue smothers your misfortune; that good men curse the occasion of it; that the man who wrongs you trembles merely to think of it. And then, who is not talked of in this way, from the least to the greatest? He who commanded so many legions, / and was a better man than you, scoundrel, in many ways. When you see so many honorable men implicated in this reproach in your presence, consider that you are not spared elsewhere either. "But even the ladies will laugh at it." And what do they laugh at more readily these days than a peaceful and well-ordered marriage?[46]

Each of you has made someone a cuckold; and nature deals entirely in like for like, in compensation and turn about. The frequency of this mishap must by now have tempered its bitterness: it will soon have passed into custom.

A wretched passion, which has this further feature: that it cannot be shared. Fortune has even begrudged ears to our complaints. For what friend do 46 Adapted from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things.

FRENCH

s'en rit, ne s'en serue d'acheminement et d'instruction pour prendre luy-mesme sa part à la curee? Les aigreurs comme les douceurs du mariage se tiennent secrettes par les sages. Et parmy les autres importunes conditions, qui se trouuent en iceluy, cette cy à vn homme languager, comme ie suis, est des principales: que la coustume rende indecent et nuisible, qu'on communique à personne tout ce qu'on en sçait, et qu'on en sent.

3.5.34 De leur donner mesme conseil à elles, pour les desgouter de la ialousie, ce seroit temps perdu: leur essence est si confite en soupçon, en vanité et en curiosité, que de les guarir par voye legitime, il ne faut pas l'esperer. Elles s'amendent souuent de cet inconuenient, par vne forme de santé, beaucoup plus à craindre que n'est la maladie mesme. Car comme il y a des enchantemens, qui ne sçauent pas oster le mal, qu'en le rechargeant à vn autre, elles reiettent ainsi volontiers cette fieure à leurs maris, quand elles la perdent. Toutesfois à dire vray, ie ne sçay si on peut souffrir d'elles pis que la ialousie. C'est la plus dangereuse de leurs conditions, comme de leurs membres, la teste.

Pittacus disoit, que chacun auoit son defaut: que le sien estoit la mauuaise teste de sa femme: hors cela, il s'estimeroit de tout point heureux. C'est vn bien poisant inconuenient, duquel vn personnage si iuste, si sage, si vaillant, sentoit tout l'estat de sa vie alteré. Que deuons nous faire nous autres hommenets? Le Senat de Marseille eut raison, d'interiner sa requeste à celuy qui demandoit permission de se tuer, pour s'exempter de la tempeste de sa femme: car c'est vn mal, qui ne s'emporte iamais qu'en emportant la piece: et qui n'a autre composition qui vaille, que la fuitte, ou la souffrance: quoy que toutes les deux, tres-difficiles.

Celuy là s'y entendoit, ce me semble, qui dit qu'vn bon mariage se dressoit d'vne femme aueugle, auec vn mary sourd.

3.5.35 Regardons aussi que cette grande et violente aspreté d'obligation, que nous leur enioignons, ne produise deux effects contraires à nostre fin: à sçauoir, qu'elle aiguise les poursuyuants, et face les femmes plus faciles à se rendre. Car quant au premier point, montant le prix de la place, nous montons le prix et le desir de la conqueste.

ENGLISH

you dare confide your grievances to, who, if he does not laugh at them, will not use them as a lead and a lesson for taking his own share of the spoils? The bitternesses of marriage, like its sweetnesses, are kept secret by the wise. And among the other troublesome conditions found in it, this one, for a talkative man like me, is among the chief: that custom makes it indecent and harmful to tell anyone all that one knows and feels about it.[47]

As for giving advice to the women themselves, to wean them from jealousy, that would be time lost. Their essence is so steeped in suspicion, vanity and curiosity that we must not hope to cure them by legitimate means. They often recover from this affliction through a kind of health much more to be feared than the illness itself. For as there are spells that can remove an ailment only by loading it onto someone else, so they readily throw this fever back onto their husbands when they lose it. Yet, to tell the truth, I do not know whether one can suffer anything worse from them than jealousy. It is the most dangerous of their conditions, as the head is of their members.

Pittacus said that everyone had his defect, and that his was his wife's bad head; apart from that, he would think himself happy in every respect. It is a very heavy affliction, if so just, so wise, so valiant a personage felt the whole state of his life altered by it. What are we little manikins to do? The Senate of Marseille was right to grant the request of the man who asked permission to kill himself to escape his wife's storms. For it is an ill that is never removed except by removing the whole piece, and that admits of no settlement worth anything but flight or endurance—though both are very hard.[48]

He knew what he was talking about, it seems to me, who said that a good marriage was made of a blind wife and a deaf husband.

Let us also take care that this great and violent harshness of obligation that we impose on them does not produce two effects contrary to our purpose: namely, that it whets the pursuers and makes the women readier to surrender. As to the first point, by raising the value of the fortress we

47 Catullus.
48 Pittacus, ruler of Mytilene, was one of the Seven Sages of Greece.

FRENCH

Seroit-ce pas Venus mesme, qui eust ainsi finement haussé le cheuet à sa marchandise, par le maquerelage des loix: cognoissant combien c'est vn sot desduit, qui ne le feroit valoir par fantasie et par cherté? En fin c'est toute chair de porc, que la sauce diuersifie, comme disoit l'hoste de Flaminius. Cupidon est vn Dieu felon. Il fait son ieu, à luitter la deuotion et la iustice.

C'est sa gloire, que sa puissance chocque tout' autre puissance, et que toutes autres regles cedent aux siennes. Materiam culpæ prosequitúrque suæ. Et quant au second poinct: serions nous pas moins coqus, si nous craignions moins de l'estre? suyuant la complexion des femmes: car la deffence les incite et conuie. Vbi velis nolunt, vbi nolis volunt vltrò: / Concessa pudet ire via. Quelle meilleure interpretation trouuerions nous au faict de Messalina? Elle fit au commencement son mary coqu à cachetes, comme il se faict: mais conduisant ses parties trop aysément, par la stupidité qui estoit en luy, elle desdaigna soudain cet vsage: la voyla à faire l'amour à la descouuerte, aduoüer des seruiteurs, les entretenir et les fauoriser à la veüe d'vn chacun.

Elle vouloit qu'il s'en ressentist. Cet animal ne se pouuant esueiller pour tout cela, et luy rendant ses plaisirs mols et fades, par cette trop lasche facilité, par laquelle il sembloit qu'il les authorisast et legitimast: que fit elle? Femme d'vn Empereur sain et viuant, et à Rome, au theatre du monde, en plein midy, en feste et ceremonie publique, et auec Silius, duquel elle iouyssoit long temps deuant, elle se marie vn iour que son mary estoit hors de la ville. Semble-il pas qu'elle s'acheminast à deuenir chaste, par la nonchallance de son mary? Ou qu'elle cherchast vn autre mary, qui luy aiguisast l'appetit par sa ialousie, et qui en luy insistant, l'incitast? Mais la premiere difficulté qu'elle rencontra, fut aussi la derniere.

Cette beste s'esueilla en sursaut. On a souuent pire marché de ces sourdaux endormis. I'ay veu par experience, que cette extreme souffrance, quand elle vient à se desnoüer, produit des vengeances plus aspres. Car prenant feu tout à coup, la cholere et la fureur s'emmoncelant en vn, esclatte tous ses efforts à la raise the value of the conquest and the desire for it. Might it not be Venus herself who so cleverly raised the price of her wares through the pimping of the laws, knowing what a silly pastime it is unless fancy and costliness give it value? In the end it is all pork, varied only by the sauce, as Flamininus's host used to say. Cupid is a treacherous god. His game is to wrestle with devotion and justice.[49]

ENGLISH

It is his glory that his power clashes with every other power, and that all other rules give way to his. And he goes after the occasion of his own offense. As to the second point: would we not be cuckolded less if we were less afraid of it, given the temperament of women? For prohibition incites and invites them. Where you will, they won't; where you won't, they want to of their own accord. / They are ashamed to go by the permitted road. What better interpretation could we find for the case of Messalina? At first she cuckolded her husband on the sly, as is done; but since she managed her affairs too easily, thanks to his stupidity, she suddenly scorned that practice. There she was, making love in the open, acknowledging her lovers, keeping them and favoring them in everyone's sight.[50]

She wanted him to feel it. When the beast could not be roused for all that, and made her pleasures soft and insipid by this too lax indulgence, by which he seemed to authorize and legitimize them, what did she do? Wife of an emperor alive and in good health, in Rome, the theater of the world, at high noon, amid public feast and ceremony, she married Silius, whom she had long been enjoying, one day when her husband was out of the city. Does it not seem that she was on her way to becoming chaste through her husband's indifference? Or that she was looking for another husband who would whet her appetite by his jealousy, and spur her on by resisting her? But the first difficulty she met was also the last.

The beast woke with a start. One often gets the worst of the bargain with these sleepy deaf fellows. I have seen by experience that this extreme forbearance, when it comes to break loose, produces the harshest revenges. For catching fire all at once, with anger and fury heaped into one, it 49 The story is in Plutarch: a host at Chalcis served the Roman general Flamininus a feast of many dishes, all made from pork.

50 The quotations are from Ovid, Terence and Lucan.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
premiere charge. Irarúmque omnes effundit habenas. Il la fit mourir, et grand nombre de ceux de son intelligence: iusques à tel qui n'en pouuoit mais, et qu'elle auoit conuié à son lict à coups d'escourgee.	bursts out with all its force at the first charge. And he lets loose all the reins of his wrath. He put her to death, along with a great number of those in her confidence—even one who could not help it, and whom she had summoned to her bed with lashes of the whip.[51]

THE LANGUAGE OF THE POETS

Virgil and Lucretius show how vigor of thought makes words full and living.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.5.36 Ce que Virgile dit de Venus et de Vulcan, Lucrece l'auoit dict plus sortablement, d'vne iouyssance desrobee, d'elle et de Mars. Belli fera mœnera Mauors Armipotens regit, in gremium qui sæpe tuum se Reiicit, æterno deuinctus vulnere amoris Pascit amore auidos inhians in te, Dea, visus, Eque tuo pendet resupini spiritus ore: Hunc tu, Diua, tuo recubantem corpore sancto Circumfusa super, suaueis ex ore loquelas Funde. Quand ie rumine ce, reiicit, pascit, inhians, molli, fouet, medullas, labefacta, pendet, percurrit, et cette noble, circumfusa, mere du gentil infusus, i'ay desdain de ces menues pointes et allusions verballes, qui nasquirent depuis. A ces bonnes gens, il ne falloit d'aigue et subtile rencontre.	What Virgil says of Venus and Vulcan, Lucretius had said more fittingly of a stolen enjoyment between her and Mars. Mars, mighty in arms, governs the fierce works of war; often he flings himself back into your lap, bound by the eternal wound of love; gazing open-mouthed at you, goddess, he feeds his greedy eyes with love, and as he lies back his breath hangs upon your lips. As he reclines upon your holy body, goddess, pour yourself around him from above, and pour sweet words from your lips. When I ruminate on that reiicit, pascit, inhians, molli, fouet, medullas, labefacta, pendet, percurrit, and that noble circumfusa, mother of the fine infusus, I disdain those petty conceits and verbal plays that were born since. These good people had no need of sharp and subtle wit.[52]
Leur langage est tout plein, et gros d'vne vigueur naturelle et constante. Ils sont tout epigramme: non la queuë seulement, mais la teste, l'estomach, et les pieds. Il n'y a rien d'efforcé, rien de trainant: tout y marche d'vne pareille teneur. Contextus totus virilis est, non sunt circa flosculos occupati. Ce n'est pas vne eloquence molle, et seulement sans offence: elle est nerueuse et solide, qui ne plaist pas tant, comme elle remplit et rauit: et rauit le plus, les plus forts esprits. Quand ie voy ces braues formes de s'expliquer, si vifues, si profondes, ie ne dis pas que c'est bien dire, ie dis que c'est bien penser. C'est la gaillardise de l'imagination, qui esleue et enfle les parolles.	Their language is wholly full and pregnant with a natural and steady vigor. They are all epigram: not the tail only, but the head, the stomach and the feet. There is nothing strained, nothing dragging: everything moves at the same pace. The whole texture is manly; they are not busy with little flowers. It is not a soft eloquence, merely inoffensive: it is sinewy and solid, and it does not so much please as fill and ravish; and it ravishes the strongest minds most. When I see these splendid ways of expressing oneself, so lively, so deep, I do not say "this is speaking well," I say "this is thinking well." It is the vigor of the imagination that lifts and swells the words.[53]
Pectus est quod disertum facit. Nos gens appellent iugement, langage, et beaux mots, les pleines	It is the heart that makes one eloquent. Our people call judgment "language" and full conceptions

51 Virgil, Aeneid.

52 The words listed come from this passage of Lucretius and from Virgil's scene of Venus and Vulcan in Aeneid VIII, which Montaigne has quoted earlier in this essay.

FRENCH

conceptions. Cette peinture est conduitte, non tant par dexterité de la main, comme pour auoir l'obiect plus vifuement empreint en l'ame. Gallus parle simplement, par ce qu'il conçoit simplement. Horace ne se contente point d'vne superficielle expression, elle le trahiroit: il voit plus clair et plus outre dans les choses: son esprit crochette et furette tout le magasin des mots et des figures, pour se representer: et les luy faut outre l'ordinaire, comme sa conception est outre l'ordinaire. Plutarque dit, qu'il veid le langage Latin par les choses. Icy de mesme: le sens esclaire et produit les parolles: non plus de vent, ains de chair et d'os.

Elles signifient, plus qu'elles ne disent. Les imbecilles sentent encores quelque image de cecy. Car en Italie ie disois ce qu'il me plaisoit en deuis communs: mais aux propos roides, ie n'eusse osé me fier à vn idiome, que ie ne pouuois plier ny contourner, outre son alleure commune. I'y veux pouuoir quelque chose du mien.

3.5.37 Le maniement et employte des beaux esprits, donne prix à la langue: non pas l'innouant, tant, comme la remplissant de plus vigoreux et diuers seruices, l'estirant et ployant. Ils n'y apportent point des mots: mais ils enrichissent les leurs, appesantissent et enfoncent leur signification et leur vsage: luy apprenent des mouuements inaccoustumés: mais prudemment et ingenieusement. Et combien peu cela soit donné à tous, il se voit par tant d'escriuains François de ce siecle. Ils sont assez hardis et dédaigneux, pour ne suyure la route commune: mais faute d'inuention et de discretion les pert. Il ne s'y voit qu'vne miserable affectation d'estrangeté: des desguisements froids et absurdes, qui au lieu d'esleuer, abbattent la matiere.

Pourueu qu'ils se gorgiasent en la nouuelleté, il ne leur chaut de l'efficace. Pour saisir vn nouueau mot, ils quittent l'ordinaire, souuent plus fort et plus nerueux.

3.5.38 En nostre langage ie trouue assez d'estoffe, mais vn peu faute de façon. Car il n'est rien, qu'on ne fist du iargon de nos chasses, et de nostre guerre, qui est vn genereux terrein à emprunter. Et les formes de parler, comme les herbes, s'amendent et fortifient en les transplantant. Ie le

ENGLISH

"fine words." This painting is guided not so much by dexterity of hand as by having the object more vividly imprinted on the mind. Gallus speaks simply because he conceives simply. Horace is not content with a superficial expression; it would betray him. He sees more clearly and further into things; his mind picks the locks of the whole storehouse of words and figures and ferrets through it to express itself; and he needs them beyond the ordinary, as his conception is beyond the ordinary. Plutarch says that he learned the Latin language through things. It is the same here: the sense illuminates and produces the words—words no longer of wind, but of flesh and bone.[54]

They signify more than they say. Even the feeble get some glimpse of this. For in Italy I said what I pleased in ordinary conversation, but in serious discussion I would not have dared trust myself to an idiom that I could not bend or turn beyond its common gait. I want to be able to put something of my own into it.

It is the handling and use by fine minds that give value to a language: not so much by innovating as by filling it out with more vigorous and varied services, stretching and bending it. They do not bring words to it, but they enrich their own words, give weight and depth to their meaning and use, and teach the language unaccustomed movements—but prudently and ingeniously. How little this is granted to everyone can be seen in so many French writers of this century. They are bold and scornful enough not to follow the common road; but lack of invention and discretion ruins them. All one sees is a wretched affectation of strangeness, cold and absurd disguises which, instead of raising the subject matter, bring it down.

So long as they can strut in novelty, they care nothing for effectiveness. To seize on a new word they abandon the ordinary one, which is often stronger and more sinewy.

In our language I find plenty of material, but a slight lack of fashioning. For there is nothing that could not be made out of the jargon of our hunting and our warfare, which is a generous ground to borrow from. And forms of speech, like plants, im-

53 Seneca, Letters.
54 Quintilian. Gallus is Cornelius Gallus, a Roman love poet of the 1st century BC.

FRENCH

trouue suffisamment abondant, mais non pas maniant et vigoureux suffisamment. Il succombe ordinairement à vne puissante conception. Si vous allez tendu, vous sentez souuent qu'il languit soubs vous, et fleschit: et qu'à son deffaut le Latin se presente au secours, et le Grec à d'autres.

D'aucuns de ces mots que ie viens de trier, nous en apperçeuons plus mal-aysement l'energie, d'autant que l'vsage et la frequence, nous en ont aucunement auily et rendu vulgaire la grace. Comme en nostre commun, il s'y rencontre des frases excellentes, et des metaphores, desquelles la beauté flestrit de vieillesse, et la couleur s'est ternie par maniement trop ordinaire. Mais cela n'oste rien du goust, à ceux qui ont bon nez: ny ne desroge à la gloire de ces anciens autheurs, qui, comme il est vraysemblable, mirent premierement ces mots en ce lustre.

3.5.39 Les sciences traictent les choses trop finement, d'vne mode artificielle, et differente à la commune et naturelle. Mon page fait l'amour, et l'entend: lisez luy Leon Hebreu, et Ficin: on parle de luy, de ses pensees, et de ses actions, et si n'y entend rien. Ie ne recognois chez Aristote, la plus part de mes mouuemens ordinaires. On les a couuers et reuestus d'vne autre robbe, pour l'vsage de l'eschole. Dieu leur doint bien faire: si i'estois du mestier, ie naturaliserois l'art, autant comme ils artialisent la nature. Laissons là Bembo et Equicola.

3.5.40 Quand i'escris, ie me passe bien de la compagnie, et souuenance des liures: de peur qu'ils n'interrompent ma forme. Aussi qu'à la verité, les bons autheurs m'abbattent par trop, et rompent le courage. Ie fais volontiers le tour de ce peintre, lequel ayant miserablement representé des coqs, deffendoit à ses garçons, qu'ils ne laissassent venir en sa boutique aucun coq naturel. Et auroy plustost besoing, pour me donner vn peu de lustre, de l'inuention du musicien Antinonydes, qui, quand il auoit à faire la musique, mettoit ordre que deuant ou apres luy, son auditoire fust abbreuué de quelques autres mauuais chantres.

Mais ie me puis plus malaisément deffaire de Plutarque: il est si vniuersel et si plain, qu'à toutes occasions, et quelque suiect extrauagant que vous ayez pris, il s'ingere prove and grow stronger by being transplanted. I find our language abundant enough, but not pliable and vigorous enough. It usually gives way under a powerful conception. If you are going at full stretch, you often feel it flag and buckle beneath you, and when it fails you, Latin comes to your aid, and Greek to others.

ENGLISH

In some of the words I have just picked out, we perceive their force less easily because use and frequency have somewhat cheapened their grace and made it common. Just so, in our everyday speech there are excellent phrases and metaphors whose beauty has withered with age and whose color has been tarnished by too common handling. But that takes nothing away from their savor for those who have a good nose, nor does it detract from the glory of those ancient authors who, very likely, first brought these words into such luster.

The sciences treat things too subtly, in an artificial way, different from the common and natural one. My page makes love and understands it. Read him Leo Hebraeus and Ficino: they talk about him, his thoughts and his actions, and yet he understands nothing of it. I do not recognize in Aristotle most of my ordinary emotions. They have been covered and dressed in another robe for the use of the schools. God grant them success! If I were in the trade, I would naturalize art as much as they artify nature. Let us leave Bembo and Equicola aside.[55]

When I write, I prefer to do without the company and memory of books, for fear they may interfere with my form. Also because, in truth, good authors humble me too much and dash my courage. I gladly play the trick of that painter who, having painted roosters wretchedly, forbade his apprentices to let any real rooster into his shop. And to give myself a little luster, I would rather need the device of the musician Antinonydes, who, when he had to perform, arranged for his audience to be plied, before or after him, with some other bad singers.[56]

But I can less easily rid myself of Plutarch. He is so universal and so full that on every occasion, however eccentric the subject you have taken up, he 55 Leo Hebraeus (Judah Abravanel), Marsilio Ficino, Pietro Bembo and Mario Equicola were Italian Renaissance writers on the philosophy of love.

56 Antinonydes is Montaigne's form of Antigenidas, a Theban musician mentioned by Plutarch.

FRENCH

à vostre besonge, et vous tend vne main liberale et inespuisable de richesses, et d'embellissemens. Il m'en fait despit, d'estre si fort exposé au pillage de ceux qui le hantent. Ie ne le puis si peu racointer, que ie n'en tire cuisse ou aile.

3.5.41 Pour ce mien dessein, il me vient aussi à propos, d'escrire chez moy, en pays sauuage, où personne ne m'aide, ny me releve: où ie ne hante communément homme, qui entende le Latin de son patenostre; et de François vn peu moins. Ie l'eusse faict meilleur ailleurs, mais l'ouurage eust esté moins mien. Et sa fin principale et perfection, c'est d'estre exactement mien. Ie corrigerois bien vne erreur accidentale, dequoy ie suis plein, ainsi que ie cours inaduertemment: mais les imperfections qui sont en moy ordinaires et constantes, ce seroit trahison de les oster.

Quand on m'a dict ou que moy-mesme me suis dict: Tu es trop espais en figures, voyla vn mot du cru de Gascongne: voyla vne phrase dangereuse: (ie n'en refuis aucune de celles qui s'vsent emmy les rues Françoises: ceux qui veulent combatre l'vsage par la grammaire se moquent) voylà vn discours ignorant: voylà vn discours paradoxe, en voylà vn trop fol: tu te ioues souuent, on estimera que tu dies à droit, ce que tu dis à feinte. Oüy, fais-ie, mais ie corrige les fautes d'inaduertence, non celles de coustume. Est-ce pas ainsi que ie parle par tout? me represente-ie pas viuement? suffit. I'ay faict ce que i'ay voulu: tout le monde me recognoist en mon liure, et mon liure en moy.

3.5.42 Or i'ay vne condition singeresse et imitatrice. Quand ie me meslois de faire des vers, et n'en fis iamais que des Latins, ils accusoient euidemment le poëte que ie venois dernierement de lire. Et de mes premiers Essays, aucuns puent vn peu l'estranger. A Paris ie parle vn langage aucunement autre qu'à Montaigne. Qui que ie regarde auec attention, m'imprime facilement quelque chose du sien. Ce que ie considere, ie l'vsurpe: vne sotte contenance, vne desplaisante grimace, vne forme de parler ridicule. Les vices plus. D'autant qu'ils me poingnent, ils s'acrochent à moy, et ne s'en vont pas sans secouer. On m'a veu plus souuent iurer par similitude, que par complexion.

Imitation meurtriere, comme celle des singes horribles en grandeur et en force, que le Roy Alexandre rencontra en certaine contree des Indes. Desquels il eust esté thrusts himself into your work and holds out to you a generous hand, inexhaustible in riches and embellishments. It vexes me that he is so exposed to plunder by those who frequent him. I cannot have the slightest dealings with him without making off with a leg or a wing.

ENGLISH

For this design of mine, it also suits me to write at home, in wild country, where no one helps me or sets me right; where I do not usually associate with anyone who understands the Latin of his Paternoster, and French a little less. I would have done it better elsewhere, but the work would have been less mine; and its principal end and perfection is to be exactly mine. I would gladly correct an accidental error, of which I am full, since I run on carelessly; but the imperfections that are ordinary and constant in me—it would be treachery to remove them.

When I have been told, or have told myself, "You are too thick with figures of speech. Here is a word of Gascon growth. Here is a risky phrase" (I reject none of those used in the streets of France; those who would fight usage with grammar are not serious), "Here is an ignorant piece of reasoning. Here is a paradoxical one. Here is one too foolish. You are often joking; people will think you mean in earnest what you say in jest"—"Yes," I say, "but I correct the faults of inadvertence, not those of habit. Isn't this how I speak everywhere? Do I not portray myself to the life? Enough. I have done what I wanted: everyone recognizes me in my book, and my book in me."

Now I have an apish, imitative disposition. When I dabbled in writing verse (and I never wrote any but Latin), it plainly betrayed the poet I had last been reading. And some of my first essays smell a little of other people. In Paris I speak a somewhat different language than at Montaigne. Anyone I look at attentively easily imprints something of his on me. Whatever I observe, I appropriate: a foolish bearing, an unpleasant grimace, a ridiculous way of speaking. Vices even more: because they prick me, they cling to me and will not go away unless shaken off. I have more often been seen to swear by imitation than by temperament.

A murderous imitation, like that of the apes, horrible in size and strength, that King Alexander came upon in a certain region of India. They autrement difficile de venir à bout. Mais ils en presterent le moyen par cette leur inclination à contrefaire tout ce qu'ils voyent faire. Car par là les chasseurs apprindrent de se chausser des souliers à leur veuë, auec force nœuds de liens: de s'affubler d'accoustremens de teste à tout des lacs courants, et oindre par semblant, leurs yeux de glux. Ainsi mettoyent imprudemment à mal, ces pauures bestes, leur complexion singeresse. Ils s'engluoient, s'encheuestroyent et garrotoyent eux mesmes.

FRENCH

Cette autre faculté, de representer ingenieusement les gestes et parolles d'vn autre, par dessein qui apporte souuent plaisir et admiration, n'est en moy, non plus qu'en vne souche. Quand ie iure selon moy, c'est seulement, par Dieu, qui est le plus droit de touts les serments. Ils disent, que Socrates iuroit le chien: Zenon cette mesme interiection, qui sert à cette heure aux Italiens, Cappari: Pythagoras, l'eau et l'air. Ie suis si aisé à receuoir sans y penser ces impressions superficielles, que si i'ay eu en la bouche, Sire ou Altesse, trois iours de suite, huict iours apres ils m'eschappent, pour excellence, ou pour seigneurie. Et ce que i'auray pris à dire en battelant et en me moquant, ie le diray lendemain serieusement.

Parquoy, à escrire, i'accepte plus enuis les argumens battus, de peur que ie les traicte aux despens d'autruy. Tout argument m'est egallement fertile. Ie les prens sur vne mouche. Et Dieu vueille que celuy que i'ay icy en main, n'ait pas esté pris, par le commandement d'vne volonté autant volage. Que ie commence par celle qu'il me plaira, car les matieres se tiennent toutes enchesnees les vnes aux autres.

3.5.43 Mais mon ame me desplaist, de ce qu'elle produit ordinairement ses plus profondes resueries, plus folles, et qui me plaisent le mieux, à l'improuueu, et lors que ie les cherche moins: lesquelles s'esuanouissent soudain, n'ayant sur le champ où les attacher. A cheual, à la table, au lict. Mais plus à cheual, où sont mes plus larges entretiens. I'ay le parler vn peu delicatement ialoux d'attention et de silence, si ie parle de force. Qui m'interrompt, m'arreste. En voyage, la necessité mesme des chemins couppe les propos. Outre ce, que ie voyage plus souuent sans compagnie, propre à ces entretiens de suite: par où ie prens tout loisir de m'entretenir moy-mesme.

ENGLISH

would otherwise have been hard to overcome. But they supplied the means through their inclination to mimic everything they see done. For by this the hunters learned to put on shoes in their sight, tying them with many knots of laces; to rig themselves out in headgear fitted with running nooses; and to pretend to smear their eyes with birdlime. Thus these poor beasts imprudently turned their apish nature to their own harm: they stuck themselves in lime, tangled themselves in halters and trussed themselves up.

That other faculty, of deliberately and cleverly reproducing another person's gestures and words, which often brings pleasure and admiration, is no more in me than in a tree stump. When I swear in my own way, it is only "by God," which is the most straightforward of all oaths. They say that Socrates swore by the dog; Zeno by the same interjection the Italians use nowadays, "Cappari"; Pythagoras by water and air. I am so apt to take on these superficial impressions without thinking that if I have had "Sire" or "Highness" in my mouth three days running, a week later they slip out of me in place of "Excellency" or "Lordship." And what I have taken to saying in fooling and mockery, I will say the next day in earnest.[57]

That is why, in writing, I am more reluctant to take up well-worn subjects, for fear of treating them at someone else's expense. Any subject is equally fertile for me. I take them up from a fly. And God grant that the one I have in hand here was not taken up at the command of a will just as flighty! Let me begin with whichever I please, for subjects are all linked to one another in a chain.

But my mind displeases me in that it usually produces its deepest musings, its maddest and those I like best, unexpectedly and when I am least looking for them; and they vanish at once, since I have nothing on the spot to fasten them to. On horseback, at table, in bed—but most on horseback, where my thoughts range widest. My speech is somewhat delicately jealous of attention and silence, if I am speaking in earnest: whoever interrupts me stops me. When traveling, the very demands of the road break off conversation. Besides, I more often travel without company suited to 57 "Cappari" means "capers," a mild oath.

FRENCH

Il m'en aduient comme de mes songes: en songeant, ie les recommande à ma memoire, car ie songe volontiers que ie songe, mais le lendemain, ie me represente bien leur couleur, comme elle estoit, ou gaye, ou triste, ou estrange, mais quels ils estoient au reste, plus i'ahane à le trouuer, plus ie l'enfonce en l'oubliance. Aussi des discours fortuites qui me tombent en fantasie, il ne m'en reste en memoire qu'vne vaine image: autant seulement qu'il m'en faut pour me faire ronger, et despiter apres leur queste, inutilement.

ENGLISH

these sustained conversations; so I take all the leisure I want to converse with myself.

It is the same with these as with my dreams. While dreaming, I commend them to my memory (for I often dream that I am dreaming); but the next day I can picture their color well enough, as it was, gay or sad or strange, but as for what they were otherwise, the more I labor to find it, the deeper I plunge it into oblivion. So too with the chance thoughts that drop into my head: all that stays in my memory is a vague image, just enough to make me fret and chafe in fruitless pursuit of them.

THE RIDICULOUS ACT

Love is mere appetite, and its absurd motions show that the gods made man their plaything.

FRENCH

3.5.44 Or donc, laissant les liures à part, et parlant plus materiellement et simplement: ie trouue apres tout, que l'amour n'est autre chose, que la soif de cette iouyssance en vn subiect desiré: ny Venus autre chose, que le plaisir à descharger ses vases: comme le plaisir que nature nous donne à descharger d'autres parties: qui deuient vicieux ou par immoderation, ou par indiscretion. Pour Socrates, l'amour est appetit de generation par l'entremise de la beauté.

Et considerant maintefois la ridicule titillation de ce plaisir, les absurdes mouuemens esceruelez et estourdis, dequoy il agite Zenon et Cratippus: cette rage indiscrete, ce visage enflammé de fureur et de cruauté, au plus doux effect de l'amour: et puis cette morgue graue, seuere, et ecstatique, en vne action si folle, qu'on ayt logé pesle-mesle nos delices et nos ordures ensemble: et que la supreme volupté aye du transy et du plaintif, comme la douleur: ie crois qu'il est vray, ce que dit Platon, que l'homme a esté faict par les Dieux pour leur iouët.

Quænam ista iocandi
Sœuitia? Et que c'est par moquerie, que Nature nous a laissé la plus trouble de nos actions, la plus commune: pour nous esgaller par là, et apparier les fols et les sages, et nous et les bestes. Le plus contemplatif, et prudent homme, quand ie l'imagine en cette assiette, ie le tiens pour affronteur, de faire le prudent et le contemplatif. Ce sont les pieds du paon, qui abbatent son orgueil. Ridentem dicere verum

ENGLISH

So then, leaving books aside and speaking more materially and simply: I find, after all, that love is nothing but the thirst for this enjoyment in a desired object, and Venus nothing but the pleasure of discharging one's vessels, like the pleasure nature gives us in discharging other parts; which becomes vicious through either immoderation or indiscretion. For Socrates, love is the appetite for generation through the mediation of beauty.

And considering many times the ridiculous titillation of this pleasure; the absurd, giddy, harebrained motions with which it shakes a Zeno or a Cratippus; that reckless frenzy, that face inflamed with fury and cruelty in the sweetest act of love; and then that grave, severe and ecstatic solemnity in so mad an action; and that our delights and our filth should have been lodged pell-mell together; and that the supreme pleasure should have something of swooning and moaning about it, like pain —I believe it is true, as Plato says, that man was made by the gods as their plaything.[58]

What cruelty
in jest is this? And that it is in mockery that Nature has left us the most disorderly of our actions as the most common, to make us equal by it and pair off fools and wise men, and us and the beasts. The most contemplative and prudent man, when I imagine him in that position, I consider an impostor for playing the prudent and contemplative 58 Cratippus was a Peripatetic philosopher; with Zeno he stands here for the gravest of sages.

FRENCH

Quid vetat? Ceux qui parmi les ieux, refusent les opinions serieuses, font, dit quelqu'vn, comme celuy qui craint d'adorer la statuë d'vn sainct, si elle est sans deuantiere.

Nous mangeons bien et beuuons comme les bestes: mais ce ne sont pas actions qui empeschent les offices de nostre ame. En celles-là, nous gardons nostre auantage sur elles: cette-cy met toute autre pensee soubs le ioug: abrutit et abestit par son imperieuse authorité, toute la theologie et philosophie qui est en Platon: et si ne s'en plaint pas. Par tout ailleurs vous pouuez garder quelque decence: toutes autres operations souffrent des regles d'honnesteté: cette-cy ne se peut pas seulement imaginer, que vicieuse ou ridicule. Trouuez y pour voir vn proceder sage et discret.

Alexandre disoit qu'il se connoissoit principallement mortel, par cette action, et par le dormir: le sommeil suffoque et supprime les facultez de nostre ame, la besongne les absorbe et dissipe de mesme. Certes c'est vne marque non seulement de nostre corruption originele: mais aussi de nostre vanité et deformité.

3.5.45 D'vn costé Nature nous y pousse, ayant attaché à ce desir, la plus noble, vtile, et plaisante de toutes ses functions: et la nous laisse d'autre part accuser et fuyr, comme insolente et deshonneste, en rougir et recommander l'abstinence. Sommes nous pas bien bruttes, de nommer brutale l'operation qui nous faict? Les peuples, és religions, se sont rencontrez en plusieurs conuenances: comme sacrifices, luminaires, encensements, ieusnes, offrandes: et entre autres, en la condemnation de cette action. Toutes les opinions y viennent, outre l'vsage si estendu des circoncisions. Nous auons à l'auanture raison, de nous blasmer, de faire vne si sotte production que l'homme: d'appeller l'action honteuse, et honteuses les parties qui y seruent (à cette heure sont les miennes proprement honteuses).

Les Esseniens, dequoy parle Pline, se maintenoient sans nourrice, sans maillot, plusieurs siecles: de l'abbord des estrangers, qui, suiuants cette belle humeur, se rengeoient continuellement à eux: ayant toute vne nation, hazardé de s'exterminer plustost, que s'engager à vn embrassement feminin, et de perdre la suitte des hommes plustost, que d'en forger vn. Ils disent que man. It is the peacock's feet that bring down its pride. To tell the truth while laughing—what forbids it? Those who refuse serious opinions in the midst of play are like, as someone says, the man who is afraid to worship the statue of a saint if it has no loincloth.[59]

ENGLISH

We eat and drink just as the beasts do, but these are not actions that hinder the functions of our soul. In them we keep our advantage over the beasts. This one brings every other thought under the yoke, and by its imperious authority stupefies and brutalizes all the theology and philosophy there is in Plato; and yet he does not complain of it. Everywhere else you can keep some decency; all other operations allow rules of propriety. This one cannot even be imagined except as vicious or ridiculous. Just try to find a wise and discreet way of going about it.

Alexander said that he knew himself to be mortal chiefly by this act and by sleep. Sleep stifles and suppresses the faculties of our soul; this business likewise absorbs and dissipates them. Certainly it is a mark not only of our original corruption but also of our vanity and deformity.

On the one hand Nature drives us to it, having attached to this desire the noblest, most useful and most pleasant of all her functions; and on the other she leaves us to condemn it and shun it as insolent and indecent, to blush at it and recommend abstinence. Are we not real brutes to call brutish the act that makes us? Peoples in their religions have agreed on many points—sacrifices, lamps, incense, fasts, offerings—and, among others, on condemning this act. All opinions come round to it, not to mention the widespread practice of circumcision. We are perhaps right to blame ourselves for making so foolish a product as man; to call the act shameful, and shameful the parts that serve it (at present mine are truly shameful).

The Essenes, of whom Pliny speaks, kept themselves going for several centuries without wet nurses or swaddling clothes, through the arrival of strangers who, following this fine humor, kept joining them; a whole nation preferred to risk extinction rather than engage in a woman's embrace, and to lose the succession of men rather than 59 The quotations are from Claudian and Horace, Satires.

FRENCH

Zenon n'eut affaire à femme, qu'vne fois en sa vie: et que ce fut par ciuilité, pour ne sembler dedaigner trop obstinement le sexe. Chacun fuit à le voir naistre, chacun court à le voir mourir. Pour le destruire, on cerche vn champ spacieux en pleine lumiere: pour le construire, on se musse dans vn creux tenebreux, et le plus contraint qu'il se peut.

C'est le deuoir, de se cacher pour le faire, et c'est gloire, et naissent plusieurs vertus, de le sçauoir deffaire. L'vn est iniure, l'autre est faueur: car Aristote dit, que bonifier quelqu'vn, c'est le tuer, en certaine phrase de son païs. Les Atheniens, pour apparier la deffaueur de ces deux actions, ayants à mundifier l'isle de Delos, et se iustifier enuers Apollo, defendirent au pourpris d'icelle, tout enterrement, et tout enfantement ensemble. Nostri nosmet pœnitet.

3.5.46 Il y a des nations qui se couurent en mangeant. Ie sçay vne dame, et des plus grandes, qui a cette mesme opinion, que c'est vne contenance desagreable, de mascher: qui rabat beaucoup de leur grace, et de leur beauté: et ne se presente pas volontiers en public auec appetit. Et sçay vn homme, qui ne peut souffrir de voir manger, ny qu'on le voye: et fuyt toute assistance, plus quand il s'emplit, que s'il se vuide. En l'empire du Turc, il se void grand nombre d'hommes, qui, pour exceller les autres, ne se laissent iamais veoir, quand ils font leur repas; qui n'en font qu'vn la sepmaine: qui se deschiquettent et decoupent la face et les membres: qui ne parlent iamais à personne.

Gens fanatiques, qui pensent honnorer leur nature en se desnaturant: qui se prisent de leur mespris, et s'amendent de leur empirement. Quel monstrueux animal, qui se fait horreur à soy-même, à qui ses plaisirs poisent: qui se tient à mal-heur? Il y en a qui cachent leur vie, Exilióque domos et dulcia limina mutant, Et la desrobent de la veuë des autres hommes: qui euitent la santé et l'allegresse, comme qualitez ennemies et dommageables. Non seulement plusieurs sectes, mais plusieurs peuples maudissent leur naissance, et benissent leur mort. Il en est où le soleil est abominé, les tenebres adorees. Nous ne sommes ingenieux qu'à nous mal mener: c'est le vray forge one. They say that Zeno had to do with a woman only once in his life, and that it was out of politeness, so as not to seem to disdain the sex too obstinately. Everyone shuns seeing a man born; everyone runs to see him die. To destroy him we seek a spacious field in broad daylight; to construct him we hide in a dark hole, as cramped as can be.[60]

ENGLISH

It is our duty to hide in order to make him, and it is glory, and the birth of many virtues, to know how to unmake him. The one is an offense, the other a favor: for Aristotle says that "to do someone good," in a certain expression of his country, means to kill him. The Athenians, to put the disfavor of these two actions on an equal footing, when they had to purify the island of Delos and justify themselves to Apollo, forbade within its precincts all burials and all childbirths alike. We are ashamed of ourselves.[61]

There are nations that cover themselves while eating. I know a lady, one of the greatest, who holds this same opinion, that chewing is an unpleasant sight which greatly detracts from women's grace and beauty; and she does not willingly appear in public with an appetite. And I know a man who cannot bear to see people eat, or to be seen eating, and who shuns all onlookers more when he is filling himself than when he is emptying himself. In the Turkish empire one sees a great number of men who, to outdo the others, never let themselves be seen when they take their meals; who take only one a week; who slash and cut their faces and limbs; who never speak to anyone.

Fanatical people, who think they honor their nature by denaturing themselves; who prize themselves for their self-contempt, and improve themselves by making themselves worse. What a monstrous animal, that horrifies itself, whose pleasures weigh on it, that regards itself as a misfortune! There are some who hide their life, And exchange their homes and sweet thresholds for exile, and steal it from the sight of other men; who avoid health and cheerfulness as hostile and harmful qualities. Not only many sects but many peoples curse their birth and bless their death. There are some where the sun is abhorred and darkness

60 The Essenes were a celibate Jewish sect of antiquity.
61 Terence, Phormio.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
gibbier de la force de nostre esprit: dangereux vtil en desreglement.	worshiped. We are ingenious only at mistreating ourselves; that is the true quarry of our mind's power—a dangerous tool when it runs out of control.[62]
O miseri quorum gaudia crimen habent! Hé pauure homme, tu as assez d'incommoditez necessaires, sans les augmenter par ton inuention: et és assez miserable de condition, sans l'estre par art: tu as des laideurs reelles et essentielles à suffisance, sans en forger d'imaginaires. Trouues tu que tu sois trop à l'aise si la moitié de ton aise ne te fasche? Trouues tu que tu ayes remply tous les offices necessaires, à quoy Nature t'engage, et qu'elle soit oysiue chez toy, si tu ne t'obliges à nouueaux offices? Tu ne crains point d'offencer ses lois vniuerselles et indubitables, et te piques aux tiennes partisanes et fantastiques. Et d'autant plus qu'elles sont particulieres, incertaines, et plus contredictes, d'autant plus tu fais là ton effort.	O wretches, whose joys are counted a crime! Ah, poor man, you have enough unavoidable ills without adding to them by your own invention; you are wretched enough by condition without being so by art. You have real and essential ugliness enough without forging imaginary ones. Do you find yourself too comfortable unless half your comfort vexes you? Do you find you have fulfilled all the necessary duties to which Nature binds you, and that she is idle in you, unless you bind yourself to new duties? You are not afraid to offend her universal and indubitable laws, and you pride yourself on your own partisan and fanciful ones; and the more particular, uncertain and disputed they are, the more effort you put into them.[63]
Les ordonnances positiues de ta paroisse t'attachent: celles du monde ne te touchent point. Cours vn peu par les exemples de cette consideration: ta vie en est toute.	The man-made ordinances of your parish bind you; those of the world do not touch you. Run through a few examples of this reflection: your whole life is made of them.

CONCEALMENT AND DESIRE

Veiled poetry and slow, measured favors make desire keener than frankness.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
3.5.47 Les vers de ces deux poëtes, traictans ainsi reseruément et discrettement de la lasciueté, comme ils font, me semblent la descouurir et esclairer de plus pres. Les dames couurent leur sein d'vn reseul, les prestres plusieurs choses sacrees, les peintres ombragent leur ouurage, pour luy donner plus de lustre. Et dict-on que le coup du soleil et du vent, est plus poisant par reflexion qu'à droit fil. L'Ægyptien respondit sagement à celuy qui luy demandoit, Que portes-tu là, caché soubs ton manteau? Il est caché soubs mon manteau, affin que tu ne sçaches pas que c'est. Mais il y a certaines autres choses qu'on cache pour les montrer. Oyez cetuy-là plus ouuert, Et nudam pressi corpus adusque meum. Il me semble qu'il me chapone.	The verses of these two poets, treating lasciviousness with as much reserve and discretion as they do, seem to me to reveal it and light it up more closely. Ladies cover their bosoms with a net, priests cover many sacred things, painters shade their work to give it more luster. And they say that the force of the sun and wind strikes harder by reflection than directly. The Egyptian gave a wise answer to the man who asked him, "What are you carrying hidden under your cloak?" "It is hidden under my cloak so that you will not know what it is." But there are certain other things that are hidden in order to show them. Listen to this one, who is more open: And I pressed her naked body to my own. I feel as if he were gelding me.[64]
Que Martial retrousse Venus à sa poste, il n'arriue pas à la faire paroistre si entiere. Celuy qui dit tout, il nous saoule	Let Martial hitch up Venus's skirts as he pleases, he does not succeed in showing her so completely.

62 Virgil, Georgics.
63 From an elegy then attributed to Cornelius Gallus.
64 Ovid, Amores. "These two poets" are Virgil and Lucretius.

FRENCH

et nous desgouste. Celuy qui craint à s'exprimer, nous achemine à en penser plus qu'il n'en y a. Il y a de la trahison en cette sorte de modestie: et notamment nous entr'ouurant comme font ceux cy, vne si belle route à l'imagination. Et l'action et la peinture doiuent sentir leur larrecin.

3.5.48 L'amour des Espagnols, et des Italiens, plus respectueuse et craintifue, plus mineuse et couuerte, me plaist. Ie ne sçay qui, anciennement, desiroit le gosier allongé comme le col d'vne gruë, pour sauourer plus long temps ce qu'il aualloit. Ce souhait est mieux à propos en cette volupté, viste et precipiteuse. Mesmes à telles natures comme est la mienne, qui suis vicieux en soudaineté. Pour arrester sa fuitte, et l'estendre en preambules; entre-eux, tout sert de faueur et de recompense: vne œillade, vne inclination, vne parolle, vn signe. Qui se pourroit disner de la fumee du rost, feroit-il pas vne belle espargne?

C'est vne passion qui mesle à bien peu d'essence solide, beaucoup plus de vanité et resuerie fieureuse: il la faut payer et seruir de mesme. Apprenons aux dames à se faire valoir, à s'estimer, à nous amuser, et à nous piper. Nous faisons nostre charge extreme la premiere: il y a tousiours de l'impetuosité Françoise. Faisant filer leurs faueurs, et les estallant en detail: chacun, iusques à la vieillesse miserable, y trouue quelque bout de lisiere, selon son vaillant et son merite. Qui n'a iouyssance, qu'en la iouyssance: qui ne gaigne que du haut poinct: qui n'ayme la chasse qu'en la prise: il ne luy appartient pas de se mesler à nostre escole.

Plus il y a de marches et degrez, plus il y a de hauteur et d'honneur au dernier siege. Nous nous deurions plaire d'y estre conduicts, comme il se faict aux palais magnifiques, par diuers portiques, et passages, longues et plaisantes galleries, et plusieurs destours. Cette dispensation reuiendroit à nostre commodité: nous y arresterions, et nous y aymerions plus long temps. Sans esperance, et sans desir, nous n'allons plus rien qui vaille. Nostre maistrise et entiere possession, leur est infiniement à craindre. Depuis qu'elles sont du tout rendues à la mercy de nostre foy, et constance, elles sont vn peu bien hasardees. Ce sont vertus rares et difficiles: soudain qu'elles sont à nous, nous ne sommes plus à elles.

ENGLISH

He who says everything gluts us and puts us off. He who is afraid to express himself leads us to imagine more than there is. There is treachery in this sort of modesty, especially when, like these two, it half opens so fine a road for the imagination. Both the act and its depiction should have a whiff of theft about them.

The love of the Spaniards and the Italians, more respectful and timid, more coy and covert, pleases me. Someone in ancient times, I forget who, wished for a throat as long as a crane's neck, to savor longer what he swallowed. That wish is more apt for this quick and hasty pleasure, especially for natures like mine, which have the fault of suddenness. To check its flight and spin it out in preambles, everything among them serves as favor and reward: a glance, a bow, a word, a sign. If someone could dine on the smoke of the roast, would he not make a fine saving?

It is a passion that mixes with very little solid substance a great deal more vanity and feverish dreaming; it must be paid and served in the same coin. Let us teach ladies to make themselves valued, to esteem themselves, to keep us dangling and to lure us on. We make our final charge first: there is always some French impetuosity in it. If they spin out their favors and display them piece by piece, everyone, even into wretched old age, will find some scrap of the hem, according to his means and merit. He who finds enjoyment only in the enjoyment, who wins only with the highest throw, who likes the hunt only in the kill, has no business joining our school.

The more steps and stairs there are, the more height and honor in the topmost seat. We should be glad to be led there, as one is in magnificent palaces, through various porticoes and passages, long and pleasant galleries, and many windings. This arrangement would work to our advantage: we would linger there and love longer. Without hope and without desire, we are no longer good for much. Our mastery and full possession is something they have infinite reason to fear. Once they have surrendered entirely to the mercy of our faith and constancy, they are running quite a risk. Those are rare and difficult virtues: as soon as they are ours, we are no longer theirs.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Postquam cupidæ mentis satiata libido est, / Verba nihil metuere, nihil periuria curant. Et Thrasonidez ieune homme Grec, fut si amoureux de son amour, qu'il refusa, ayant gaigné le cœur d'vne maistresse, d'en iouyr: pour n'amortir, rassasier et allanguir par la iouyssance cette ardeur inquiete, de laquelle il se glorifioit et se paissoit.

Once the lust of the eager mind is sated, / they fear nothing of their words, care nothing for their perjuries. And Thrasonides, a young Greek, was so in love with his love that, having won a mistress's heart, he refused to enjoy her, so as not to deaden, sate and enfeeble through enjoyment that restless ardor in which he gloried and on which he fed.[65]

3.5.49 La cherté donne goust à la viande. Voyez combien la forme des salutations, qui est particuliere à nostre nation, abastardit par sa facilité, la grace des baisers, lesquels Socrates dit estre si puissans et dangereux à voler nos cœurs. C'est vne desplaisante coustume, et iniurieuse aux dames, d'auoir à prester leurs leures, à quiconque a trois valets à sa suitte, pour mal plaisant qu'il soit, Cuius liuida naribus caninis,
Dependet glacies, rigétque barba:
Centum occurrere malo culilingis. Et nous mesme n'y gaignons guere: car comme le monde se voit party, pour trois belles, il nous en faut baiser cinquante laides. Et à vn estomach tendre, comme sont ceux de mon aage, vn mauuais baiser en surpaie vn bon.

Costliness gives food its relish. See how the form of greeting peculiar to our nation, by its very easiness, debases the grace of kisses, which Socrates says are so powerful and dangerous for stealing our hearts. It is an unpleasant custom, and insulting to the ladies, to have to lend their lips to any man with three footmen in his train, however disagreeable he may be: From whose dog-like nostrils hangs a livid icicle, and whose beard is stiff with frost: I would rather meet a hundred lickers of backsides. And we ourselves gain little by it: for as the world is divided, for three pretty women we have to kiss fifty ugly ones. And to a delicate stomach, such as men of my age have, one bad kiss is too high a price for a good one.[66]

3.5.50 Ils font les poursuyuans en Italie, et les transis, de celles mesmes qui sont à vendre: et se defendent ainsi: Qu'il y a des degrez en la iouyssance: et que par seruices ils veulent obtenir pour eux, celle qui est la plus entiere. Elles ne vendent que le corps. La volonté ne peut estre mise en vente, elle est trop libre et trop sienne. Ainsi ceux cy disent, que c'est la volonté qu'ils entreprennent, et ont raison. C'est la volonté qu'il faut seruir et practiquer. I'ay horreur d'imaginer mien, vn corps priué d'affection. Et me semble, que cette forcenerie est voisine à celle de ce garçon, qui alla saillir par amour, la belle image de Venus que Praxiteles auoit faicte.

In Italy they play the suitor and the lovesick swain even with women who are for sale. They defend themselves this way: there are degrees of enjoyment, and by their attentions they want to obtain for themselves the most complete kind. Those women sell only the body. The will cannot be put up for sale; it is too free and too much its own. So these men say it is the will they are setting out to win, and they are right. It is the will that must be served and courted. I am horrified to imagine as mine a body without affection. And it seems to me that this frenzy is close to that of the boy who, out of love, went and mounted the beautiful statue of Venus that Praxiteles had made.[67]

Ou de ce furieux Ægyptien, eschauffé apres la charongne d'vne morte qu'il embaumoit et ensueroit. Lequel donna occasion à la loy, qui fut faicte depuis en Ægypte, que les corps des belles et ieunes femmes, et de celles de bonne maison, seroient gardez trois iours, auant qu'on les mist entre les mains de ceux qui auoient charge de prouuoir à leur enterrement. Periander fit plus merueilleusement: qui estendit l'affection coniugale, plus reglee et legitime, à la iouyssance de Melissa sa femme trespassee. Ne

Or that of the frenzied Egyptian who was inflamed with lust for the corpse of a dead woman he was embalming and shrouding. He gave occasion for the law later made in Egypt that the bodies of beautiful young women, and of women of good family, should be kept for three days before being handed over to those whose task was to prepare their burial. Periander did something more aston-

65 Catullus.
66 Martial.
67 Praxiteles, the Athenian sculptor of the 4th century BC, made the famous Aphrodite of Cnidus.

FRENCH

semble ce pas estre vne humeur lunatique de la Lune, ne pouuant autrement iouyr d'Endymion son mignon, l'aller endormir pour plusieurs mois: et se paistre de la iouyssance d'vn garçon, qui ne se remuoit qu'en songe?

Ie dis pareillement, qu'on ayme vn corps sans ame, quand on ayme vn corps sans son consentement, et sans son desir. Toutes iouyssances ne sont pas vnes. Il y a des iouyssances ethiques et languissantes. Mille autres causes que la bien-vueillance, nous peuuent acquerir cet octroy des dames. Ce n'est suffisant tesmoignage d'affection. Il y peut eschoir de la trahison, comme ailleurs: elles n'y vont par fois que d'vne fesse; Tanquam thura merûmque parent: / Absentem marmoreàmue putes. I'en sçay, qui ayment mieux prester cela, que leur coche: et qui ne se communiquent, que par là.

Il faut regarder si vostre compagnie leur plaist pour quelque autre fin encores, ou pour celle là seulement, comme d'vn gros garson d'estable: en quel rang et à quel prix vous y estes logé, Tibi si datur vni / Quo lapide illa diem candidiore notet. Quoy, si elle mange vostre pain, à la sauce d'vne plus agreable imagination? Te tenet, absentes alios suspirat amores. Comment? auons nous pas veu quelqu'vn en nos iours, s'estre seruy de cette action, à l'vsage d'vne horrible vengeance: pour tuer par là, et empoisonner, comme il fit, vne honneste femme?

3.5.51 Ceux qui cognoissent l'Italie, ne trouueront iamais estrange, si pour ce subiect, ie ne cherche ailleurs des exemples. Car cette nation se peut dire regente du reste du monde en cela. Ils ont plus communément des belles femmes, et moins de laydes que nous: mais des rares et excellentes beautez, i'estime que nous allons à pair. Et en iuge autant des esprits: de ceux de la commune façon, ils en ont beaucoup plus, et euidemment. La brutalité y est sans comparaison plus rare: d'ames singulieres et du plus haut estage, nous ne leur en deuons rien.

Si i'auois à estendre cette similitude, il me sembleroit pouuoir dire de la vaillance, qu'au rebours, elle est au prix d'eux, populaire chez nous, et naturelle: mais on la ishing: he extended his conjugal affection, which is more regulated and lawful, to the enjoyment of his dead wife Melissa. Does it not seem a lunatic whim of the Moon that, unable to enjoy Endymion, her darling, in any other way, she went and put him to sleep for several months, and feasted on the enjoyment of a boy who moved only in his dreams?[68]

ENGLISH

I say likewise that one loves a body without a soul when one loves a body without its consent and without its desire. Not all enjoyments are alike. There are consumptive and languid enjoyments. A thousand causes other than goodwill can win us this grant from the ladies. It is not sufficient evidence of affection. There may be treachery in it, as anywhere else: sometimes they go at it with only one buttock; As if they were preparing incense and wine: / you would think her absent, or made of marble. I know some who would rather lend that than their coach, and who give themselves only that way.

You must look to see whether your company pleases them for some other purpose too, or only for that one, as with a strapping stable-boy; at what rank and at what value you are lodged there, whether to you alone / she grants the days she marks with a whiter stone. What if she is eating your bread with the sauce of a more pleasing fancy? She holds you, but sighs for other, absent loves. What? Have we not seen someone in our own day use this act for a horrible revenge, to kill and poison by this means, as he did, an honorable woman?

Those who know Italy will never find it strange if, on this subject, I look nowhere else for examples. For that nation can be called the teacher of the rest of the world in this matter. They commonly have more beautiful women and fewer ugly ones than we do; but in rare and excellent beauties I reckon we are even. And I judge the same of minds: of the ordinary sort they have far more, and obviously so. Brutishness is incomparably rarer there; but in singular souls of the highest rank, we owe them nothing.

If I had to extend this comparison, it seems to me I could say of valor that, on the contrary, compared 68 Periander was tyrant of Corinth (7th–6th century BC); Endymion was the shepherd whom the Moon loved and cast into endless sleep.

FRENCH

voit par fois, en leurs mains, si pleine et si vigoreuse, qu'elle surpasse tous les plus roides exemples que nous en ayons.

3.5.52 Les mariages de ce pays là, clochent en cecy. Leur coustume donne communement la loy si rude aux femmes, et si serue, que la plus esloignee accointance auec l'estranger, leur est autant capitalle que la plus voisine. Cette loy fait, que toutes les approches se rendent necessairement substantieles. Et puis que tout leur reuient à mesme compte, elles ont le choix bien aysé. Et ont elles brisé ces cloisons? Croyez qu'elles font feu: Luxuria ipsis vinculis, sicut fera bestia, irritata, deinde emissa. Il leur faut vn peu lascher les resnes. Vidi ego nuper equum, contra sua frena tenacem, / Ore reluctanti fulminis ire modo. On alanguit le desir de la compagnie, en luy donnant quelque liberté.

C'est vn bel vsage de nostre nation, qu'aux bonnes maisons, nos enfans soyent receuz, pour y estre nourris et esleuez pages comme en vne escole de noblesse. Et est discourtoisie, dit-on, et iniure, d'en refuser vn Gentilhomme. I'ay apperçeu, car autant de maisons autant de diuers stiles et formes, que les dames qui ont voulu donner aux filles de leur suite, les regles plus austeres, n'y ont pas eu meilleure aduanture. Il y faut de la moderation. Il faut laisser bonne partie de leur conduitte, à leur propre discretion: car ainsi comme ainsi n'y a il discipline qui les sçeut brider de toutes parts.

Mais il est bien vray, que celle qui est eschappee bagues sauues, d'vn escolage libre, apporte bien plus de fiance de soy, que celle qui sort saine, d'vne escole seuere et prisonniere.

3.5.53 Nos peres dressoient la contenance de leurs filles à la honte et à la crainte (les courages et les desirs tousiours pareils), nous à l'asseurance: nous n'y entendons rien. C'est à faire aux Sarmates, qui n'ont loy de coucher auec homme, que de leurs mains elles n'en ayent tué vn autre en guerre. A moy qui n'y ay droit que par les oreilles, suffit, si elles me retiennent pour le conseil, suyuant le priuilege de mon aage. Ie leur conseille donc, et à nous aussi, l'abstinence: mais si ce siecle en est trop ennemy, aumoins la discretion et la modestie.

ENGLISH

with them it is common among us, and natural; but one sometimes sees it in their hands so full and so vigorous that it surpasses all the sternest examples we have.

Marriages in that country limp in this respect. Their custom commonly lays down so harsh and servile a law for women that the most distant acquaintance with a stranger is as much a capital offense for them as the closest. This law makes every approach necessarily substantial. And since it all comes to the same reckoning for them, they have an easy choice. And once they have broken through those partitions? Believe me, they catch fire: Lust, like a wild beast, first provoked by its very chains, then let loose. You must slacken the reins on them a little. I saw lately a horse fighting stubbornly against its bit / rush off like a thunderbolt, its mouth resisting. The desire for company is dulled by allowing it some freedom.

It is a fine custom of our nation that our children are received into good houses to be brought up and trained there as pages, as in a school of nobility. And it is a discourtesy and an insult, they say, to refuse a gentleman this. I have noticed (for there are as many different styles and ways as there are houses) that the ladies who have tried to give the girls in their train the most austere rules have had no better luck for it. Moderation is needed here. A good part of their conduct must be left to their own discretion; for, one way or another, there is no discipline that could curb them on every side.

But it is quite true that the girl who has come out of a free schooling unscathed inspires much more confidence in herself than the one who comes out sound from a strict, prison-like school.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

Our fathers trained their daughters' bearing to shame and fear (hearts and desires being always the same); we train it to self-assurance. We understand nothing about it. That is a matter for the Sarmatian women, who are not allowed to sleep with a man until they have killed another with their own hands in war. For me, who have no rights there except through my ears, it is enough if they keep me on as counsel, according to the privilege of my age. So I counsel them, and us too, abstinence; but if this age is too hostile to it, at least discretion and modesty.[69]

Car, comme dit le compte d'Aristippus, parlant à des ieunes hommes, qui rougissoient de le veoir entrer chez vne courtisane: Le vice est, de n'en pas sortir, non pas d'y entrer. Qui ne veut exempter sa conscience, qu'elle exempte son nom: si le fons n'en vaut guere, que l'apparence tienne bon.

For, as the story goes of Aristippus, speaking to some young men who blushed to see him go into a courtesan's house: "The vice is in not coming out, not in going in." Let her who will not keep her conscience clear keep her name clear; if the substance is not worth much, let the appearance hold firm.

3.5.54 Ie loüe la gradation et la longueur, en la dispensation de leurs faueurs. Platon montre, qu'en toute espece d'amour, la facilité et promptitude est interdicte aux tenants. C'est vn traict de gourmandise, laquelle il faut qu'elles couurent de tout leur art, de se rendre ainsi temerairement en gros, et tumultuairement. Se conduisant en leur dispensation, ordonnement et mesurement, elles pipent bien mieux nostre desir, et cachent le leur. Qu'elles fuyent tousiours deuant nous: ie dis celles mesmes qui ont à se laisser attraper. Elles nous battent mieux en fuyant, comme les Scythes. De vray, selon la loy que Nature leur donne, ce n'est pas proprement à elles de vouloir et desirer: leur rolle est souffrir, obeyr, consentir.

I commend gradualness and slowness in the dispensing of their favors. Plato shows that in every kind of love, easiness and promptness are forbidden to the defenders. To surrender like that, rashly, wholesale and in a rush, is a mark of greed, which they must hide with all their art. By conducting themselves in an orderly and measured way in dispensing their favors, they lure our desire far better and conceal their own. Let them always flee before us—I mean even those who intend to let themselves be caught. They beat us better by fleeing, like the Scythians. In truth, by the law Nature gives them, it is not properly their part to will and desire; their role is to submit, obey, consent.

C'est pourquoy Nature leur a donné vne perpetuelle capacité; à nous, rare et incertaine. Elles ont tousiours leur heure, afin qu'elles soyent tousiours prestes à la nostre Pati natæ. Et où elle a voulu que nos appetis eussent montre et declaration prominante, ell' a faict que les leurs fussent occultes et intestins. Et les a fournies de pieces impropres à l'ostentation: et simplement pour la defensiue. Il faut laisser à la licence Amazonienne pareils traits à cettuy cy. Alexandre passant par l'Hyrcanie, Thalestris Royne des Amazones le vint trouuer auec trois cents gens-darmes de son sexe: bien montez et bien armez: ayant laissé le demeurant d'vne grosse armee, qui la suyuoit, au delà des voisines montaignes.

That is why Nature has given them a perpetual capacity, and us a rare and uncertain one. They always have their hour, so that they may always be ready for ours: born to be passive. And whereas she wanted our appetites to have a prominent display and declaration, she made theirs hidden and internal; and she furnished them with parts unsuited for display, made simply for defense. We must leave to Amazonian license strokes like this one. When Alexander was passing through Hyrcania, Thalestris, queen of the Amazons, came to find him with three hundred warriors of her sex, well mounted and well armed, having left the 69 Herodotus tells this of the Sauromatian women, neighbors of the Scythians.

FRENCH

Et luy dit tout haut, et en publiq, que le bruit de ses victoires et de sa valeur, l'auoit menee là, pour le veoir, luy offrir ses moyens et sa puissance au secours de ses entreprinses. Et que le trouuant si beau, ieune, et vigoureux, elle, qui estoit parfaitte en toutes ses qualitez, luy conseilloit qu'ils couchassent ensemble: afin qu'il nasquist de la plus vaillante femme du monde, et du plus vaillant homme, qui fust lors viuant, quelque chose de grand et de rare, pour l'aduenir. Alexandre la remercia du reste: mais pour donner temps à l'accomplissement de sa derniere demande, il arresta treize iours en ce lieu, lesquels il festoya le plus alaigrement qu'il peut, en faueur d'vne si courageuse Princesse.

3.5.55 Nous sommes quasi par tout iniques iuges de leurs actions, comme elles sont des nostres. I'aduoüe la verité lors qu'elle me nuit, de mesme que si elle me sert. C'est vn vilain desreglement, qui les pousse si souuent au change, et les empesche de fermir leur affection en quelque subiect que ce soit: comme on voit de cette Deesse, à qui lon donne tant de changemens et d'amis. Mais si est-il vray, que c'est contre la nature de l'amour, s'il n'est violant, et contre la nature de la violance, s'il est constant.

Et ceux qui s'en estonnent, s'en escrient, et cherchent les causes de cette maladie en elles, comme desnaturee et incroyable: que ne voyent ils, combien souuent ils la reçoyuent en eux, sans espouuantement et sans miracle? Il seroit à l'aduenture plus estrange d'y voir de l'arrest. Ce n'est pas vne passion simplement corporelle. Si on ne trouue point de bout en l'auarice, et en l'ambition, il n'y en a non plus en paillardise. Elle vit encore apres la satieté: et ne luy peut on prescrire ny satisfaction constante, ny fin: elle va tousiours outre sa possession. Et si l'inconstance leur est à l'aduenture aucunement plus pardonnable qu'à nous.

Elles peuuent alleguer comme nous, l'inclination qui nous est commune à la varieté et à la nouuelleté: et alleguer secondement sans nous, qu'elles achetent chat en sac. Ieanne Royne de Naples, feit estrangler Andreosse son premier mary, aux grilles de sa fenestre, auec un laz d'or et de soye, tissu de sa main propre: sur ce qu'aux couruees matrimoniales, elle ne luy trouuoit ny les rest of a large army that followed her beyond the neighboring mountains.[70]

ENGLISH

And she told him aloud, in public, that the fame of his victories and his valor had brought her there to see him and to offer him her means and her power in support of his enterprises; and that, finding him so handsome, young and vigorous, she, who was perfect in all her qualities, advised that they sleep together, so that from the most valiant woman in the world and the most valiant man then living there might be born something great and rare for the future. Alexander thanked her for the rest; but to give time for the fulfillment of her last request he stayed thirteen days in that place, which he celebrated as merrily as he could in honor of so courageous a princess.

We are almost everywhere unfair judges of their actions, as they are of ours. I admit the truth when it hurts me just as when it serves me. It is an ugly disorder that drives them so often to change and prevents them from fixing their affection firmly on any object whatever, as we see with that goddess to whom so many changes and lovers are attributed. But it is true, all the same, that it is against the nature of love not to be violent, and against the nature of violence to be constant.

And those who are amazed at this, who cry out against it and seek the causes of this malady in women as something unnatural and incredible—why do they not see how often they harbor it in themselves without alarm and without marvel? It would perhaps be stranger to find any stability in it. It is not simply a bodily passion. If there is no limit to be found in avarice and ambition, there is none in lechery either. It lives on even after satiety; no constant satisfaction and no end can be prescribed for it; it always goes beyond what it possesses. And yet inconstancy is perhaps somewhat more pardonable in them than in us.

They can plead, as we can, the inclination we share for variety and novelty; and they can plead secondly, as we cannot, that they buy a cat in a sack. Joanna, queen of Naples, had Andrew, her first husband, strangled at the bars of her window with a cord of gold and silk woven by her own hand, because in the labors of marriage she found 70 Hyrcania was a region on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea; the story of Thalestris is told by Quintus Curtius and others.

FRENCH

parties, ny les efforts, assez respondants à l'esperance qu'elle en auoit couçeuë, à veoir sa taille, sa beauté, sa ieunesse et disposition: par où elle auoit esté prinse et abusee. Que l'action a plus d'effort que n'a la souffrance: ainsi que de leur part tousiours aumoins il est pourueu à la necessité: de nostre part il peut auenir autrement.

Platon à cette cause establit sagement par ses loix, auant tout mariage, pour decider de son opportunité, que les iuges voient les garçons, qui y pretendent, touts fins nuds: et les filles nuës iusqu'à la ceinture seulement. En nous essayant, elles ne nous trouuent à l'aduenture pas digne de leur choix: Experta latus, madidoque simillima loro
Inguina, nec lassa stare coacta manu, Deserit imbelles thalamos. Ce n'est pas tout, que la volonté charrie droict. La foiblesse et l'incapacité, rompent legitimement vn mariage: Et quærendum aliunde foret neruosius illud, Quod posset zonam soluere virgineam. Pourquoy non, et selon sa mesure, vne intelligence amoureuse, plus licentieuse et plus actiue? Si blando nequeat superesse labori.

3.5.56 Mais n'est-ce pas grande impudence, d'apporter nos imperfections et foiblesses, en lieu où nous desirons plaire, et y laisser bonne estime de nous et recommandation? Pour ce peu qu'il m'en faut à cette heure, Ad vnum
Mollis opus, ie ne voudrois importuner vne personne, que i'ay a reuerer et craindre. Fuge suspicari,
Cuius vndenum trepidauit ætas
