Essays · Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592)

Translated from the French with AI (Claude) and edited. Parallel-text edition, Forage, October 2026. forage.com/montaigne/essays French text: the posthumous edition of 1595 (Paris: Abel L'Angelier), edited by Marie de Gournay, in its original spelling, as reprinted from the Bibliothèque nationale copy in Essais de Montaigne (self-édition), ed. G.-E. Michaud, 4 vols. (Paris: Firmin-Didot, 1907–1909), via the proofread transcription at Project Gutenberg (www.gutenberg.org/ebooks/48529) (eBooks 48529, 49168 and 58801; public domain). Michaud's modern-French version, summaries and notes are omitted. The 1595 text does not mark the layers of Montaigne's revisions. The 1595 edition printed essay I.14 as I.40; it is restored here to its usual place and number. English: translated from the French with AI (Claude), then edited for accuracy and consistency. Not reviewed by a human specialist. Free to reuse under CC BY-SA 4.0. Margin numbers are book, essay and paragraph; Montaigne's text runs on with few breaks, and the paragraphs follow the 1595 indentations and the section breaks marked in the 1907 reprint. Where the original uses a term now considered offensive, a neutral term is shown in brackets instead.

INTRODUCTION

In 1571, at thirty-eight, Michel de Montaigne retired from the law courts of Bordeaux to the tower library of his family's château, meaning to spend his remaining years in quiet among his books. Instead he started writing down whatever passed through his mind, and called the pieces essais: trials, attempts, tests of his own judgment. Two books appeared in 1580, a third in 1588, and he went on adding to all three, in the margins of his own copy, until his death in 1592.

The essays range over anything: friendship, cannibals, thumbs, coaches, sleep, cruelty, the education of children, the smell of things, the Roman Empire, kidney stones. They wander, contradict themselves and break off into anecdotes and quotations, and always come back to the one subject Montaigne claims to know: "I am myself the matter of my book." Out of that self-scrutiny comes a steady doubt about human certainty, summed up in the motto he took, with the emblem of a pair of balanced scales, "What do I know?", and a humane suspicion of anyone who calls other people's customs barbarous.

This edition gives the text of 1595, published three years after Montaigne's death by his "adopted daughter" Marie de Gournay from his final revisions, in its original spelling. The essays are numbered in the standard way, by book and chapter; the many quotations from Latin, Greek and Italian poets and historians are translated in the English column.

To the Reader

Au lecteur

Montaigne tells the reader the book has only a private, domestic aim: it is a plain portrait of himself.

Au lecteur

C’est icy vn Liure de bonne foy, Lecteur. Il t’aduertit dés l’entree, que ie ne m’y suis proposé aucune fin, que domestique et priuee: ie n’y ay eu nulle consideration de ton seruice, ny de ma gloire: mes forces ne sont pas capables d’vn tel dessein. Ie l’ay voué à la commodité particuliere de mes parens et amis: à ce que m’ayans perdu (ce qu’ils ont à faire bien tost) ils y puissent retrouuer aucuns traicts de mes conditions et humeurs, et que par ce moyen ils nourrissent plus entiere et plus vifue la connoissance qu’ils ont eu de moy. Si c’eust esté pour rechercher la faueur du monde, ie me fusse mieus paré et me presanterois en vne marche estudiee.

This is a book written in good faith, reader. It warns you from the outset that in it I have set myself no goal but a domestic and private one. I have given no thought in it either to your service or to my own glory; my powers are not equal to such a design. I have dedicated it to the private convenience of my relatives and friends, so that when they have lost me (as they soon must) they may find in it again some features of my character and temperament, and by this means keep the knowledge they have had of me more complete and more alive. Had my purpose been to seek the world’s favor, I would have adorned myself better and would present myself in a studied bearing.

Ie veux qu’on m’y voye en ma façon simple, naturelle et ordinaire, sans contantion et artifice: car c’est moy que ie peins. Mes defauts s’y liront au vif et ma forme naifue, autant que la reuerence publique me l’a permis. Que si i’eusse esté entre ces nations qu’on dit viure encore souz la douce liberté des premieres loix de nature, ie t’asseure que ie m’y fusse tres-volontiers peint tout entier, et tout nud. Ainsi, Lecteur, ie suis moy-mesme la matiere de mon liure, ce n’est pas raison que tu employes ton loisir en vn subiect si friuole et si vain. A Dieu donq. De Montaigne, ce premier de mars, mille cinq cens quattre vins.

I want to be seen here in my simple, natural, ordinary fashion, without straining or artifice; for it is myself that I portray. My faults will be read here to the life, and my natural form, as far as respect for the public has allowed me. Had I been among those nations that are said to live still in the sweet freedom of nature’s first laws, I assure you I would very gladly have portrayed myself here entire, and wholly naked. Thus, reader, I am myself the matter of my book; it is not reasonable that you should spend your leisure on so frivolous and vain a subject. So farewell. From Montaigne, this first day of March, fifteen hundred and eighty.

I.1 By Diverse Means We Arrive at the Same End

Par diuers moyens on arrive à pareille fin
Victors are sometimes softened by submission, sometimes by defiance; Montaigne finds man a marvelously vain, varied, and wavering subject.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.1.1	LA plus commune façon d'amollir les cœurs de ceux qu'on a offencez, lors qu'ayans la vengeance en main, ils nous tiennent à leur mercy, c'est de les esmouuoir par submission, à commiseration et à pitié: toutesfois la brauerie, la constance, et la resolution, moyens tous contraires, ont quelquesfois seruy à ce mesme effect.	The most common way of softening the hearts of those we have offended, when they hold vengeance in their hands and have us at their mercy, is to move them to commiseration and pity by submission. Yet defiance, steadfastness and resolution, means quite the opposite, have sometimes served to the same effect.
1.1.2	Edouard Prince de Galles, celuy qui regenta si long temps nostre Guienne: personnage duquel les conditions et la fortune ont beaucoup de notables parties de grandeur; ayant esté bien fort offencé par les Limosins, et prenant leur ville par force, ne peut estre arresté par les cris du peuple, et des femmes, et enfans abandonnez à la boucherie, luy criants mercy, et se iettans à ses pieds: iusqu'à ce que passant tousiours outre dans la ville, il apperçeut trois Gentilshommes François, qui d'vne hardiesse incroyable soustenoient seuls l'effort de son armee victorieuse. La consideration et le respect d'vne si notable vertu, reboucha premierement la pointe de sa cholere: et commença par ces trois, à faire misericorde à tous les autres habitans de la ville.	Edward, Prince of Wales, the one who governed our Guyenne for so long—a man whose character and fortune have many notable elements of greatness—having been very gravely offended by the people of Limoges, and taking their town by force, could not be stopped by the cries of the people, or of the women and children abandoned to the slaughter, who cried to him for mercy and threw themselves at his feet. That lasted until, pressing on ever farther into the town, he caught sight of three French gentlemen who, with incredible daring, were holding out alone against the onslaught of his victorious army. Consideration and respect for such remarkable valor first blunted the edge of his anger; and, beginning with these three, he showed mercy to all the other inhabitants of the town.[1]
1.1.3	Scanderberch, Prince de l'Epire, suyuant vn soldat des siens pour le tuer, et ce soldat ayant essayé par toute espece d'humilité et de supplication de l'appaiser, se resolut à toute extremité de l'attendre l'espee au poing: cette sienne resolution arresta sus bout la furie de son maistre, qui pour luy auoir veu prendre vn si honorable party, le reçeut en grace. Cet exemple pourra souffrir autre interpretation de ceux, qui n'auront leu la prodigieuse force et vaillance de ce Prince là.	Scanderbeg, prince of Epirus, was pursuing one of his soldiers to kill him; and the soldier, having tried every kind of humility and supplication to appease him, resolved as a last resort to await him sword in hand. This resolution stopped his master's fury dead, and Scanderbeg, having seen him take so honorable a course, received him back into favor. This example may admit of another interpretation from those who have not read of the prodigious strength and valor of that prince.[2]

1 Edward the Black Prince (1330–1376), eldest son of Edward III; he sacked Limoges in 1370.
2 George Kastrioti, called Scanderbeg (1405–1468), Albanian leader who resisted the Ottoman Turks.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.1.4	L'Empereur Conrad troisiesme, ayant assiegé Guelphe Duc de Bauieres, ne voulut condescendre à plus douces conditions, quelques viles et lasches satisfactions qu'on luy offrist, que de permettre seulement aux gentils-femmes qui estoient assiegees auec le Duc, de sortir leur honneur sauue, à pied, auec ce qu'elles pourroient emporter sur elles. Elles d'vn cœur magnanime, s'aduiserent de charger sur leurs espaules leurs maris, leurs enfans, et le Duc mesme. L'Empereur print si grand plaisir à voir la gentillesse de leur courage, qu'il en pleura d'aise, et amortit toute cette aigreur d'inimitié mortelle et capitale qu'il auoit portee contre ce Duc: et dés lors en auant traita humainement luy et les siens.	The Emperor Conrad III, having besieged Welf, Duke of Bavaria, would not stoop to milder terms, however base and cowardly the amends offered him, than merely to allow the gentlewomen besieged with the Duke to come out with their honor safe, on foot, with whatever they could carry on their persons. They, with magnanimous hearts, hit upon the idea of carrying on their shoulders their husbands, their children, and the Duke himself. The Emperor took such pleasure in seeing the nobility of their courage that he wept for joy, and quenched all the bitterness of the mortal and capital enmity he had borne against this Duke; and from then on he treated him and his people humanely.[3]
1.1.5	L'vn et l'autre de ces deux moyens m'emporteroit aysement: car i'ay vne merueilleuse lascheté vers la misericorde et mansuetude: tant y a, qu'à mon aduis, ie serois pour me rendre plus naturellement à la compassion, qu'à l'estimation. Si est la pitié passion vitieuse aux Stoiques: ils veulent qu'on secoure les affligez, mais non pas qu'on flechisse et compatisse auec eux. Or ces exemples me semblent plus à propos, d'autant qu'on voit ces ames assaillies et essayees par ces deux moyens, en soustenir l'vn sans s'esbranler, et courber sous l'autre. Il se peut dire, que de rompre son cœur à la commiseration, c'est l'effet de la facilité, debonnaireté, et mollesse: d'où il aduient que les natures plus foibles, comme celles des femmes, des enfans, et du vulgaire, y sont plus subiettes: mais ayant eu à desdaing les larmes et les pleurs, de se rendre à la seule reuerence de la saincte image de la vertu, que c'est l'effect d'vne ame forte et imployable, ayant en affection et en honneur vne vigueur masle, et obstinee.	Either of these two means would easily carry me away, for I have a wonderful weakness toward mercy and gentleness. So much so that, in my opinion, I would be likely to surrender more naturally to compassion than to esteem. Yet to the Stoics pity is a vicious passion: they want us to help the afflicted, but not to bend and suffer along with them. Now these examples seem to me the more to the point because we see these souls, assailed and tested by these two means, withstand one without wavering and bow beneath the other. It may be said that to let one's heart break into commiseration is the effect of easygoingness, good nature and softness; whence it comes that the weaker natures, such as those of women, children and the common people, are more subject to it. But to have disdained tears and weeping, and to yield solely to reverence for the sacred image of virtue—that, it may be said, is the effect of a strong and unbending soul, one that holds in affection and honor a manly and stubborn vigor.
1.1.6	Toutesfois és ames moins genereuses, l'estonnement et l'admiration peuuent faire naistre vn pareil effect: tesmoin le peuple Thebain, lequel ayant mis en Iustice d'accusation capitale, ses Capitaines, pour auoir continué leur charge outre le temps qui leur auoit esté prescript et preordonné, absolut à toute peine Pelopidas, qui plioit sous le faix de telles obiections, et n'employoit à se garantir que requestes et supplications: et au contraire Epaminondas, qui vint à raconter magnifiquement les choses par luy faites, et à les reprocher au peuple d'vne	Yet in less noble souls, amazement and admiration can give rise to a similar effect. Witness the people of Thebes. They had put their captains on trial on a capital charge for continuing in their command beyond the time prescribed and appointed for it. They barely acquitted Pelopidas, who bowed under the weight of such accusations and used only petitions and supplications to defend himself. Epaminondas, on the contrary, came forward to

1.1.7	Dionysius le vieil, apres des longueurs et difficultés extremes, ayant prins la ville de Rege, et en icelle le Capitaine Phyton, grand homme de bien, qui l'auoit si obstinéement defendue, voulut en tirer vn tragique exemple de vengeance. Il luy dict premierement, comment le iour auant, il auoit faict noyer son fils, et tous ceux de sa parenté. A quoy Phyton respondit seulement, qu'ils en estoient d'vn iour plus heureux que luy. Apres il le fit despouiller, et saisir à des Bourreaux, et le trainer par la ville, en le fouëttant tres ignominieusement et cruellement: et en outre le chargeant de felonnes parolles et contumelieuses. Mais il eut le courage tousiours constant, sans se perdre.	Dionysius the Elder, having taken the city of Rhegium after extreme delays and difficulties, and in it the captain Phyton, a very good man, who had defended it so stubbornly, wanted to make a tragic example of vengeance out of him. First he told him how, the day before, he had had his son drowned, and all his kinsmen. To which Phyton replied only that they were happier than he by one day. Then he had him stripped and seized by executioners and dragged through the city, whipping him most ignominiously and cruelly, and heaping cruel and insulting words on him besides. But Phyton kept his courage constant throughout, never losing himself.[5]
	Et d'vn visage ferme, alloit au contraire ramenteuant à haute voix, l'honorable et glorieuse cause de sa mort, pour n'auoir voulu rendre son païs entre les mains d'vn tyran: le menaçant d'vne prochaine punition des dieux. Dionysius, lisant dans les yeux de la commune de son armee, qu'au lieu de s'animer des brauades de cet ennemy vaincu, au mespris de leur chef, et de son triomphe, elle alloit s'amollissant par l'estonnement d'vne si rare vertu, et marchandoit de se mutiner, et mesmes d'arracher Phyton d'entre les mains de ses sergens, feit cesser ce martyre: et à cachettes l'enuoya noyer en la mer.	And with a steady face he went on, on the contrary, recalling in a loud voice the honorable and glorious cause of his death—that he had refused to deliver his country into the hands of a tyrant—and threatening Dionysius with swift punishment from the gods. Dionysius read in the eyes of the rank and file of his army that, instead of being roused by the defiance of this defeated enemy, in contempt of their leader and his triumph, they were softening in their amazement at such rare valor, and were on the verge of mutiny, even of snatching Phyton from the hands of his guards. So he put an end to this martyrdom and had him secretly drowned in the sea.
1.1.8	Certes c'est vn subiect merueilleusement vain, diuers, et ondoyant, que l'homme: il est malaisé d'y fonder iugement constant et vniforme. Voyla Pompeius qui pardonna à toute la ville des Mamertins, contre laquelle il estoit fort animé, en consideration de la vertu et magnanimité du citoyen Zenon, qui se chargeoit seul de la faute publique, et ne requeroit autre grace que d'en porter seul la peine. Et l'hoste de Sylla, ayant vsé en la ville de Peruse de semblable vertu, n'y gaigna rien, ny pour soy, ny pour les autres.	Truly, man is a marvelously vain, diverse and wavering subject; it is hard to found any constant and uniform judgment on him. Here is Pompey, who pardoned the whole city of the Mamertines, against which he was greatly incensed, in consideration of the virtue and magnanimity of the citizen Zeno, who took the public fault upon himself alone and asked no other favor than to bear the punishment for it alone. And Sulla's host, having shown similar virtue in the city of Perusia, gained nothing by it, either for himself or for the others.[6]

1.1.9 Et directement contre mes premiers exemples, le plus hardy des hommes et si gratieux aux vaincus Alexandre, forçant apres beaucoup de grandes difficultez la ville de Gaza, rencontra Betis qui y commandoit, de la valeur duquel il auoit, pendant ce siege, senty des preuues merueilleuses, lors seul, abandonné des siens, ses armes despecees, tout couuert de sang et de playes, combatant encores au milieu de plusieurs Macedoniens, qui le chamailloient de toutes parts: et luy dit, tout piqué d'vne si chere victoire: car entre autres dommages, il auoit receu deux fresches blessures sur sa personne: Tu ne mourras pas comme tu as voulu, Betis: fais estat qu'il te faut souffrir toutes les sortes de tourmens qui se pourront inuenter contre un captif.	And directly contrary to my first examples, Alexander, the boldest of men and so gracious to the vanquished, storming the city of Gaza after many great difficulties, came upon Betis, who commanded there and whose valor he had experienced in marvelous proofs during that siege. Betis was then alone, deserted by his men, his armor hacked to pieces, covered all over with blood and wounds, still fighting in the midst of a number of Macedonians who were hammering at him from every side. And Alexander, stung by so costly a victory—for among other losses he had received two fresh wounds on his own person—said to him: "You shall not die as you wished, Betis. Make up your mind that you must suffer every kind of torment that can be devised against a captive."[7]
L'autre, d'vne mine non seulement asseuree, mais rogue et altiere, se tint sans mot dire à ces menaces. Lors Alexandre voyant l'obstination à se taire: A il flechy vn genouil? luy est-il eschappé quelque voix suppliante? Vrayement ie vainqueray ce silence: et si ie n'en puis arracher parole, i'en arracheray au moins du gemissement. Et tournant sa cholere en rage, commanda qu'on luy perçast les talons, et le fit ainsi trainer tout vif, deschirer et desmembrer au cul d'vne charrette. Seroit-ce que la force de courage luy fust si naturelle et commune, que pour ne l'admirer point, il la respectast moins?	The other, with a countenance not only assured but haughty and disdainful, stood without a word in the face of these threats. Then Alexander, seeing his stubborn silence: "Has he bent a knee? Has any suppliant cry escaped him? Truly I will conquer this silence; and if I cannot wring a word from it, I will at least wring a groan." And turning his anger into rage, he ordered his heels to be pierced, and had him dragged alive in this way behind a cart, torn and dismembered. Could it be that strength of courage was so natural and commonplace to him that, not admiring it, he respected it the less?
ou qu'il l'estimast si proprement sienne, qu'en cette hauteur il ne peust souffrir de la veoir en vn autre, sans le despit d'vne passion enuieuse? ou que l'impetuosité naturelle de sa cholere fust incapable d'opposition? De vray, si elle eust receu bride, il est à croire, qu'en la prinse et desolation de la ville de Thebes elle l'eust receue: à veoir cruellement mettre au fil de l'espee tant de vaillans hommes, perdus, et n'ayans plus moyen de defence publique. Car il en fut tué bien six mille, desquels nul ne fut veu ny fuiant, ny demandant mercy: au rebours cerchans, qui çà, qui là, par les rues, à affronter les ennemis victorieux: les prouoquans à les faire mourir d'vne mort honorable.	Or that he considered it so peculiarly his own that he could not bear to see it at such a height in another without the spite of an envious passion? Or that the natural impetuosity of his anger could brook no opposition? Indeed, if it could ever have been bridled, it is likely that it would have been at the capture and destruction of the city of Thebes, at the sight of so many valiant men, lost and with no further means of common defense, being cruelly put to the sword. For a good six thousand of them were killed, of whom not one was seen fleeing or begging for mercy; on the contrary, they sought, some here, some there, through the streets, to confront the victorious enemy, provoking them to grant them an honorable death.[8]
Nul ne fut veu, qui n'essaiast en son dernier souspir, de se venger encores: et à tout les armes du desespoir consoler	Not one was seen who did not try, with his last breath, to avenge himself still, and with the

Yet the affliction of their valor found no pity, and the length of a day was not enough to sate his vengeance. I.2 Of Sadness

De la tristesse

Montaigne distrusts sadness, a passion he rarely feels, and shows how great grief strikes people dumb.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.2.1	IE suis des plus exempts de cette passion, et ne l'ayme ny l'estime: quoy que le monde ayt entrepris, comme à prix faict, de l'honorer de faueur particuliere. Ils en habillent la sagesse, la vertu, la conscience. Sot et vilain ornement. Les Italiens ont plus sortablement baptisé de son nom la malignité. Car c'est vne qualité tousiours nuisible, tousiours folle: et comme tousiours couarde et basse, les Stoïciens en defendent le sentiment à leurs sages.	I am among those most free from this passion, and I neither love nor esteem it, although the world has undertaken, as if by agreement, to honor it with special favor. They dress up wisdom, virtue and conscience in it: a foolish and ugly ornament. The Italians have more fittingly given its name to malignity. For it is a quality always harmful, always mad; and since it is always cowardly and base, the Stoics forbid their sages to feel it.[1]
1.2.2	Mais le conte dit que Psammenitus Roy d'Ægypte, ayant esté deffait et pris par Cambysez Roy de Perse, voyant passer deuant luy sa fille prisonniere habillee en seruante, qu'on enuoyoit puiser de l'eau, tous ses amis pleurans et lamentans autour de luy, se tint coy sans mot dire, les yeux fichez en terre: et voyant encore tantost qu'on menoit son fils à la mort, se maintint en cette mesme contenance: mais qu'ayant apperçeu vn de ses domestiques conduit entre les captifs, il se mit à battre sa teste, et mener vn dueil extreme.	But the story goes that Psammenitus, king of Egypt, having been defeated and captured by Cambyses, king of Persia, saw his daughter pass before him as a prisoner, dressed as a servant and sent to draw water. While all his friends wept and lamented around him, he stayed still without a word, his eyes fixed on the ground; and seeing soon after that his son was being led to his death, he kept the same countenance. But when he caught sight of one of his household servants being led among the captives, he began to beat his head and show extreme grief.[2]
1.2.3	Cecy se pourroit apparier à ce qu'on vid dernierement d'vn Prince des nostres, qui ayant ouy à Trente, où il estoit, nouuelles de la mort de son frere aisné, mais vn frere en qui consistoit l'appuy et l'honneur de toute sa maison, et bien tost apres d'vn puisné, sa seconde esperance, et ayant soustenu ces deux charges d'vne constance exemplaire, comme quelques iours apres vn de ses gens vint à mourir, il se laissa emporter à ce dernier accident; et quitant sa resolution, s'abandonna au dueil et aux regrets; en maniere qu'aucuns en prindrene argument, qu'il n'auoit esté touché au vif que de cette derniere secousse: mais à la verité ce fut, qu'estant d'ailleurs plein et comblé de tristesse, la moindre surcharge brisa les barrieres de la patience.	This might be paired with what we saw recently of one of our princes. At Trent, where he was, he heard news of the death of his elder brother—a brother on whom rested the support and honor of his whole house—and soon after of a younger brother, his second hope. He bore these two blows with exemplary constancy; but when, a few days later, one of his servants happened to die, he let himself be carried away by this last incident and, abandoning his resolution, gave himself up to grief and lamentation, so much so that some concluded from it that he had been touched to the quick only by this last shock. But in truth it was that, being otherwise full and brimming with sorrow, the least extra burden broke down the barriers of his endurance.[3]

	Il s'en pourroit, di-ie, autant iuger de nostre histoire, n'estoit qu'elle adiouste, que Cambyses s'enquerant à Psammenitus, pourquoy ne s'estant esmeu au malheur de son filz et de sa fille, il portoit si impatiemment celuy de ses amis: C'est, respondit-il, que ce seul dernier desplaisir se peut signifier par larmes, les deux premiers surpassans de bien loin tout moyen de se pouuoir exprimer.	The same judgment, I say, might be made of our story, were it not that it adds that when Cambyses asked Psammenitus why, having been unmoved by the misfortune of his son and daughter, he bore that of his friend so impatiently, he answered: "Because only this last sorrow can be expressed by tears; the first two far surpass any means of expression."
1.2.4	A l'auenture reuiendroit à ce propos l'inuention de cet ancien peintre, lequel ayant à representer au sacrifice de Iphigenia le dueil des assistans, selon les degrez de l'interest que chacun apportoit à la mort de cette belle fille innocente, ayant espuisé les derniers efforts de son art, quand ce vint au pere de la vierge, il le peignit le visage couuert, comme si nulle contenance ne pouuoit rapporter ce degré de dueil. Voyla pourquoy les Poëtes feignent cette miserable mere Niobé, ayant perdu premierement sept filz, et puis de suite autant de filles, sur-chargee de pertes, auoir esté en fin transmuee en rocher, diriguisse malis: pour exprimer cette morne, muette et sourde stupidité, qui nous transsit, lors que les accidens nous accablent surpassans nostre portee.	Perhaps the invention of that ancient painter would fit here. He had to portray, at the sacrifice of Iphigenia, the grief of the bystanders according to the degree of concern each felt in the death of that beautiful innocent girl; and having exhausted the utmost resources of his art, when he came to the maiden's father he painted him with his face covered, as if no countenance could convey that degree of grief. That is why the poets imagine that wretched mother Niobe—having lost first seven sons and then, in succession, as many daughters, overburdened with losses—to have been finally transformed into a rock, turned to stone by her sorrows, to express that dull, mute and deaf stupor which numbs us when events overwhelm us beyond what we can bear.[4]
	De vray, l'effort d'vn desplaisir, pour estre extreme, doit estonner toute l'ame, et luy empescher la liberté de ses actions: comme il nous aduient à la chaude alarme d'vne bien mauuaise nouuelle, de nous sentir saisis, transis, et comme perclus de tous mouuemens: de façon que l'ame se relaschant apres aux larmes et aux plaintes, semble se desprendre, se desmeller, et se mettre plus au large, et à son aise. Et via vix tandem voci laxata dolore est.	Indeed, the force of a grief, if it is to be extreme, must stun the whole soul and hinder its freedom of action. So it happens to us, at the sudden alarm of some very bad news, that we feel ourselves seized, numbed, and as it were paralyzed in all our movements; so that the soul, afterward giving way to tears and laments, seems to free itself, disentangle itself, and find more room and ease. And at last, and barely, grief opened a way for the voice.[5]
1.2.5	En la guerre que le Roy Ferdinand mena contre la veufue du Roy Iean de Hongrie, autour de Bude, vn gendarme fut particulierement remerqué de chacun, pour auoir excessiuement bien faict de sa personne, en certaine meslee: et incognu, hautement loué, et plaint y estant demeuré: mais de nul tant que de Raiscïac Seigneur Allemand, esprins d'vne si rare vertu: le corps estant rapporté, cetuicy d'vne commune curiosité, s'approcha	In the war that King Ferdinand waged against the widow of King John of Hungary, around Buda, a man-at-arms was particularly noticed by everyone for having borne himself exceedingly well in a certain skirmish; unknown, he was highly praised, and mourned when he fell there. Et pour vn plus notable tesmoignage de l'imbecillité humaine, il a esté remerqué par les anciens, que Diodorus le Dialecticien mourut sur le champ, espris d'vne extreme passion de honte, pour en son escole, et en public, ne se pouuoir desuelopper d'vn argument qu'on luy auoit faict. sired, fell into such an excess of joy that he was seized with fever and died of it.[9]

And as a more notable testimony to human weakness, the ancients noted that Diodorus the Dialectician died on the spot, seized with an extreme passion of shame because, in his school and in public, he could not disentangle himself from an argument that had been put to him. I am little exposed to these violent passions. My capacity for feeling is naturally tough; and I harden and thicken it every day by reasoning.[10]

I.3 Our Feelings Reach Out Beyond Us

Nos affections s'emportent au delà de nous
We always live beyond ourselves in hopes and fears; Montaigne examines wishes about burial, reputation, and acting after death.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.3.1	CEVX qui accusent les hommes d'aller tousiours beant apres les choses futures, et nous apprennent à nous saisir des biens presens, et nous rassoir en ceux-là, comme n'ayants aucune prise sur ce qui est à venir, voire assez moins que nous n'auons sur ce qui est passé, touchent la plus commune des humaines erreurs: s'ils osent appeller erreur, chose à quoy nature mesme nous achemine pour le seruice de la continuation de son ouurage, nous imprimant, comme assez d'autres, cette imagination fausse, plus ialouse de nostre action, que de nostre science. Nous ne sommes iamais chez nous, nous sommes tousiours au delà.	Those who accuse men of always gaping after future things, and teach us to seize hold of present goods and settle ourselves in them, since we have no grip on what is to come—indeed rather less than we have on what is past—touch on the most common of human errors. That is, if they dare to call an error something to which nature herself guides us for the service of the continuation of her work, imprinting in us, as she does many others, this false notion, being more jealous of our action than of our knowledge. We are never at home; we are always beyond.
	La crainte, le desir, l'esperance, nous eslancent vers l'aduenir: et nous desrobent le sentiment et la consideration de ce qui est, pour nous amuser à ce qui sera, voire quand nous ne serons plus. Calamitosus est animus futuri anxius.	Fear, desire, hope fling us toward the future, and rob us of the feeling and consideration of what is, to occupy us with what will be, even when we shall no longer be. Wretched is the mind anxious about the future.[1]
1.3.2	Ce grand precepte est souuent allegué en Platon, Fay ton faict, et te congnoy. Chascun de ces deux membres enueloppe generallement tout nostre deuoir: et semblablement enueloppe son compagnon. Qui auroit à faire son faict, verroit que sa premiere leçon, c'est cognoistre ce qu'il est, et ce qui luy est propre. Et qui se cognoist, ne prend plus l'estranger faict pour le sien: s'ayme, et se cultiue auant toute autre chose: refuse les occupations superflues, et les pensees, et propositions inutiles. Comme la folie quand on luy octroyera ce qu'elle desire, ne sera pas contente: aussi est la sagesse contente de ce qui est present, ne se desplait iamais de soy. Epicurus dispense son sage de la preuoyance et soucy de l'aduenir.	This great precept is often cited in Plato: "Do your own business, and know yourself." Each of these two parts generally embraces our whole duty, and likewise embraces its companion. Whoever had to do his own business would see that his first lesson is to know what he is and what is proper to him. And whoever knows himself no longer takes another's business for his own; he loves and cultivates himself before anything else; he refuses superfluous occupations and useless thoughts and propositions. Just as folly will not be content even when granted what it desires, so wisdom is content with what is present and is never displeased with itself. Epicurus exempts his sage from foresight and care about the future.
1.3.3	Entre les loix qui regardent les trespassez, celle icy me semble autant solide, qui oblige les actions des Princes à estre examinees apres leur mort: ils sont compagnons, sinon maistres des loix: ce que la Iustice n'a peu sur leurs	Among the laws concerning the dead, this one seems to me as sound as any: the one that requires the actions of princes to be examined after their testes, c'est raison qu'elle l'ayt sur leur reputation, et biens de leurs successeurs: choses que souuent nous preferons à la vie. C'est vne vsance qui apporte des commoditez singulieres aux nations où elle est obseruee, et desirable à tous bons Princes: qui ont à se plaindre de ce, qu'on traitte la memoire des meschants comme la leur. Nous deuons la subiection et obeïssance egalement à tous Rois: car elle regarde leur office: mais l'estimation, non plus que l'affection, nous ne la deuons qu'à leur vertu.

Donnons à l'ordre politique de les souffrir patiemment, indignes: de celer leurs vices: d'aider de nostre recommandation leurs actions indifferentes, pendant que leur auctorité a besoin de nostre appuy. Mais nostre commerce finy, ce n'est pas raison de refuser à la Iustice, et à nostre liberté, l'expression de noz vrays ressentiments: et nommément de refuser aux bons subiects, la gloire d'auoir reueremment et fidellement serui vn maistre, les imperfections duquel leur estoient si bien cognues: frustrant la posterité d'vn si vtile exemple. Et ceux, qui, par respect de quelque obligation priuee espousent iniquement la memoire d'vn Prince mesloüable, font iustice particuliere aux despends de la Iustice publique.

Titus Liuius dict vray, que le langage des hommes nourris sous la Royauté, est tousiours plein de vaines ostentations et faux tesmoignages: chascun esleuant indifferemment son Roy, à l'extreme ligne de valeur et grandeur souueraine. On peult reprouuer la magnanimité de ces deux soldats, qui respondirent à Neron, à sa barbe, l'vn enquis de luy, pourquoy il luy vouloit mal: Ie t'aimoy quand tu le valois: mais despuis que tu és deuenu parricide, boutefeu, basteleur, cochier, ie te hay, comme tu merites. death. They are companions, if not masters, of the laws; what justice could not do to their persons, it is right that it should do to their reputation and to the property of their successors—things we often prefer to life. It is a practice that brings singular benefits to the nations where it is observed, and one to be desired by all good princes, who have reason to complain that the memory of the wicked is treated like their own. We owe subjection and obedience equally to all kings, for that concerns their office; but esteem, no more than affection, we owe only to their virtue.

Let us grant to the political order that we suffer them patiently when they are unworthy, conceal their vices, and support with our commendation their actions that are neither good nor bad, while their authority needs our backing. But once our dealings with them are over, it is not reasonable to refuse justice and our own liberty the expression of our true feelings; and in particular to refuse good subjects the glory of having reverently and faithfully served a master whose imperfections were so well known to them—thus depriving posterity of so useful an example. And those who, out of regard for some private obligation, wrongfully espouse the memory of a blameworthy prince do private justice at the expense of public justice.

Livy speaks truly when he says that the language of men raised under kingship is always full of vain boasting and false testimony, each man indiscriminately exalting his king to the farthest limit of worth and sovereign greatness. One may disapprove of the magnanimity of those two soldiers who answered Nero to his face. The one, asked by him why he wished him ill: "I loved you when you deserved it; but since you have become a parricide, an arsonist, a mountebank, a charioteer, I hate you as you deserve." The other, asked why he wanted to kill him: "Because I can find no other remedy for your continual crimes."[2]

But as for the public and universal testimonies that have been given since his death, and will be forever, to him and to all wicked men like him, concerning his tyrannical and vile conduct—who in his right mind can disapprove of them?

It displeases me that in so holy a government as that of Sparta so false a ceremony should have been mixed in at the death of kings. All the allies and neighbors, and all the Helots, men and women pell-mell, gashed their foreheads in token of mourning, and said in their cries and lamentations that this king, whatever he had been, was the best king of all they had ever had—attributing to rank the praise that belonged to merit, and giving what belongs to the highest merit to the last and lowest rank.[3]

1.3.5 Aristote, qui remue toutes choses, s'enquiert sur le mot de Solon, Que nul auant mourir ne peut estre dict heureux, Si celuy la mesme, qui a vescu, et qui est mort à souhait, peut estre dict, heureux, si sa renommee va mal, si sa posterité est miserable. Pendant que nous nous remuons, nous nous portons par preoccupation où il nous plaist: mais estant hors de l'estre, nous n'auons aucune communication auec ce qui est. Et seroit meilleur de dire à Solon, que iamais homme n'est donc heureux, puis qu'il ne l'est qu'apres qu'il n'est plus. quisquam

Aristotle, who stirs up everything, inquires, concerning Solon's saying that no one can be called happy before his death, whether even the man who has lived and died as he would wish can be called happy if his reputation fares badly and his posterity is wretched. While we are in motion, we carry ourselves by anticipation wherever we please; but once out of being, we have no communication with what is. And it would be better to tell Solon that no man is ever happy, then, since he is happy only when he no longer exists. Hardly anyone

1.3.6 Bertrand du Glesquin mourut au siege du Chasteau de Rancon, pres du Puy en Auuergne: les assiegez s'estans rendus apres, furent obligez de porter les clefs de la place sur le corps du trespassé. Barthelemy d'Aluiane, General de l'armee des Venitiens, estant mort au seruice de leurs guerres en la Bresse, et son corps ayant esté rapporté à Venise par le Veronois, terre ennemie; la pluspart de ceux de l'armee estoient d'aduis, qu'on demandast sauf-conduit pour le passage à ceux de Veronne: mais Theodore Triuulce y contredit; et choisit plustost de le passer par viue force, au hazard du combat: N'estant conuenable, disoit-il, que celuy qui en sa vie n'auoit iamais eu peur de ses ennemis, estant mort fist demonstration de les craindre.

Bertrand du Guesclin died at the siege of the castle of Rancon, near Le Puy in Auvergne; the besieged, who surrendered afterward, were obliged to carry the keys of the place to the dead man's body. Bartolomeo d'Alviano, general of the Venetian army, died in the service of their wars in the region of Brescia, and his body was to be carried back to Venice through the territory of Verona, enemy land. Most of the army were of the opinion that they should ask the Veronese for a safe-conduct for the passage; but Theodore Trivulzio opposed this, and chose rather to force a passage, at the risk of battle: "For it is not fitting," he said, "that one who in his lifetime was never afraid of his enemies should, being dead, show any sign of fearing them."[5]

De vray, en chose voisine, par les loix Grecques, celuy qui demandoit à l'ennemy vn corps pour l'inhumer, renonçoit à la victoire, et ne lui estoit plus loisible d'en dresser trophee: à celuy qui en estoit requis, c'estoit tiltre de gain. Ainsi perdit Nicias l'auantage qu'il auoit nettement gaigné sur les Corinthiens: et au rebours, Agesilaus asseura celuy qui luy estoit bien doubteusement acquis sur les Bœotiens.

1.3.7 Ces traits se pourroient trouuer estranges, s'il n'estoit receu de tout temps, non seulement d'estendre le soing de nous, au delà cette vie, mais encore de croire, que bien souuent les faueurs celestes nous accompaignent au tombeau, et continuent à nos reliques. Dequoy il y a tant d'exemples anciens, laissant à part les nostres, qu'il n'est besoing que ie m'y estende.

Edouard premier Roy d'Angleterre, ayant essayé aux longues guerres d'entre luy et Robert Roy d'Escosse, combien sa presence donnoit d'aduantage à ses affaires, rapportant tousiours la victoire de ce qu'il entreprenoit en personne; mourant, obligea son fils par solennel serment, à ce qu'estant trespassé, il fist bouillir son corps pour desprendre sa chair d'auec les os, laquelle il fit enterrer: et quant aux os, qu'il les reseruast pour les porter auec luy, et en son armee, toutes les fois qu'il luy aduiendroit d'auoir guerre contre les Escossois: comme si la destinee auoit fatalement attaché la victoire à ses membres.

Iean Zischa, qui troubla la Boheme pour la deffence des erreurs de VViclef, voulut qu'on l'escorchast apres sa mort, et de sa peau qu'on fist vn tabourin à porter à la guerre contre ses ennemis: estimant que cela ayderoit à continuer les aduantages qu'il auoit eus aux guerres, par luy conduictes contre eux. Certains Indiens portoient ainsin au combat contre les Espaignols, les ossemens d'vn de leurs Capitaines, en consideration de l'heur qu'il auoit eu en viuant. Et d'autres peuples en ce mesme monde, trainent à la guerre les corps des vaillans hommes, qui sont morts en leurs batailles, pour leur seruir de bonne fortune et d'encouragement.

Les premiers exemples ne reseruent au tombeau, que la reputation acquise par leurs actions passees: mais ceux-cy y veulent encore mesler la puissance d'agir.

Indeed, in a related matter, by Greek law, whoever asked the enemy for a body to bury renounced the victory, and was no longer allowed to raise a trophy for it; for the one who was asked, it was a title to victory. Thus Nicias lost the advantage he had clearly won over the Corinthians; and conversely, Agesilaus secured the one he had very doubtfully gained over the Boeotians.

These traits might seem strange were it not accepted from all time not only to extend our concern for ourselves beyond this life, but also to believe that very often the favors of heaven accompany us to the tomb and continue to our remains. Of this there are so many ancient examples, leaving aside our own, that I need not dwell on it.

Edward I, king of England, had found by trial, in the long wars between him and Robert, king of Scotland, how much his presence gave the advantage to his affairs, for he always carried off the victory in what he undertook in person. When dying, he bound his son by solemn oath that, once he was dead, he should have his body boiled to separate the flesh from the bones, and have the flesh buried; and as for the bones, that he should keep them, to carry them with him and with his army whenever he happened to be at war with the Scots: as if destiny had fatally attached victory to his limbs.[6]

Jan Žižka, who threw Bohemia into turmoil in defense of Wycliffe's errors, wished to be flayed after his death and his skin made into a drum to be carried to war against his enemies, believing that this would help continue the advantages he had had in the wars he had led against them. Certain Indians likewise carried into battle against the Spaniards the bones of one of their captains, in consideration of the good fortune he had had in his lifetime. And other peoples in this same world drag to war the bodies of the valiant men who have died in their battles, to serve them as good luck and encouragement.[7]

The first examples reserve for the tomb only the reputation acquired by past actions; but these want to mix in the power to act as well.

The deed of Captain Bayard is of a more reasonable sort. Feeling himself mortally wounded by an harquebusade dans le corps, conseillé de se retirer de la meslee, respondit qu'il ne commenceroit point sur sa fin à tourner le dos à l'ennemy: et ayant combatu autant qu'il eut de force, se sentant defaillir, et eschapper du cheual, commanda à son maistre d'hostel, de le coucher au pied d'vn arbre: mais que ce fust en façon qu'il mourust le visage tourné vers l'ennemy: comme il fit.

1.3.9 Il me faut adiouster cet autre exemple aussi remarquable pour cette consideration, que nul des precedens. L'Empereur Maximilian bisayeul du Roy Philippes, qui est à present, estoit Prince doué de tout plein de grandes qualitez, et entre autres d'vne beauté de corps singuliere: mais parmy ces humeurs, il auoit ceste cy bien contraire à celle des Princes, qui pour despescher les plus importants affaires, font leur throsne de leur chaire percee: c'est qu'il n'eut iamais valet de chambre, si priué, à qui il permist de le voir en sa garderobbe: il se desroboit pour tomber de l'eau, aussi religieux qu'vne pucelle à ne descouurir ny à Medecin ny à qui que ce fust les parties qu'on a accoustumé de tenir cachees.

Moy qui ay la bouche si effrontée, suis pourtant par complexion touché de cette honte: si ce n'est à vne grande suasion de la necessité ou de la volupté, ie ne communique gueres aux yeux de personne, les membres et actions, que nostre coustume ordonne estre couuertes: i'y souffre plus de contrainte que ie n'estime bien seant à vn homme, et sur tout à vn homme de ma profession: mais luy en vint à telle superstition, qu'il ordonna par parolles expresses de son testament, qu'on luy attachast des calessons, quand il seroit mort. Il deuoit adiouster par codicille, que celuy qui les luy monteroit eust les yeux bandez.

L'ordonnance que Cyrus faict à ses enfans, que ny eux, ny autre, ne voye et touche son corps, apres que l'ame en sera separee: ie l'attribue à quelque sienne deuotion: car et son Historien et luy, entre leurs grandes qualitez, ont semé par tout le cours de leur vie, vn singulier soin et reuerence à la religion.

arquebus shot in the body, and advised to withdraw from the fray, he replied that he would not begin, at his end, to turn his back on the enemy. And having fought as long as he had strength, feeling himself fainting and slipping from his horse, he ordered his steward to lay him at the foot of a tree, but in such a way that he would die with his face turned toward the enemy; and so he did.[8]

I must add this other example, as remarkable in this respect as any of the preceding. The Emperor Maximilian, great-grandfather of King Philip who now reigns, was a prince endowed with a great many fine qualities, and among others a singular beauty of body. But among these traits he had one quite contrary to that of those princes who, to dispatch the most important business, make their close-stool their throne: he never had a valet de chambre so intimate that he would allow him to see him in his privy. He would steal away to pass water, as scrupulous as a maiden about uncovering, to a doctor or to anyone whatever, the parts we are accustomed to keep hidden.[9]

I, who have so bold a mouth, am nonetheless by temperament touched with this sense of shame. Unless under strong pressure from necessity or pleasure, I hardly ever expose to anyone's eyes the members and actions that our custom orders to be covered. I suffer more constraint in this than I think becoming in a man, and above all in a man of my profession. But he carried it to such superstition that he ordered, in express words in his will, that drawers be fastened on him when he was dead. He should have added by codicil that the man who pulled them on him should have his eyes blindfolded.

The order Cyrus gives his children, that neither they nor anyone else should see or touch his body after the soul has left it, I attribute to some piety of his; for both his historian and he himself, among their great qualities, sowed throughout the course of their lives a singular care and reverence for religion.[10]

I was displeased by a story a great man told me about a kinsman of mine by marriage, a man mourant bien vieil en sa cour, tourmenté de douleurs extremes de la pierre, il amusa toutes ses heures dernieres auec vn soing vehement, à disposer l'honneur et la ceremonie de son enterrement: et somma toute la noblesse qui le visitoit, de luy donner parolle d'assister à son conuoy.

A ce Prince mesme, qui le vid sur ces derniers traits, il fit vne instante supplication que sa maison fust commandee de s'y trouuer; employant plusieurs exemples et raisons, à prouuer que c'estoit chose qui appartenoit à vn homme de sa sorte: et sembla expirer content ayant retiré cette promesse, et ordonné à son gré la distribution, et ordre de sa montre. Ie n'ay guere veu de vanité si perseuerante.

1.3.11 Cette autre curiosité contraire, en laquelle ie n'ay point aussi faute d'exemple domestique, me semble germaine à ceste-cy: d'aller se soignant et passionnant à ce dernier poinct, à regler son conuoy, à quelque particuliere et inusitee parsimonie, à vn seruiteur et vne lanterne. Ie voy louer cett'humeur, et l'ordonnance de Marcus Æmylius Lepidus, qui deffendit à ses heritiers d'employer pour luy les ceremonies qu'on auoit accoustumé en telles choses. Est-ce encore temperance et frugalité, d'euiter la despence et la volupté, desquelles l'vsage et la cognoissance nous est imperceptible? Voila vne aisee reformation et de peu de coust. S'il estoit besoin d'en ordonner, ie seroy d'aduis, qu'en celle là, comme en toutes actions de la vie, chascun en rapportast la regle, au degré de sa fortune.

Et le Philosophe Lycon prescrit sagement à ses amis, de mettre son corps où ils aduiseront pour le mieux: et quant aux funerailles, de les faire ny superflues ny mechaniques. Ie lairrois purement la coustume ordonner de cette ceremonie, et m'en remettray à la discretion des premiers à qui ie tomberay en charge. Totus hic locus est contemnendus in nobis, non negligendus in nostris. Et est sainctement dict à vn sainct: Curatio funeris, conditio sepulturæ, pompa exequiarum, magis sunt viuorum solatia, quàm subsidia mortuorum. rather well known in both peace and war. It is that, dying very old at his court, tormented by extreme pains from the stone, he spent all his last hours with intense concern arranging the honor and ceremony of his burial, and called upon all the nobility who visited him to give him their word that they would attend his funeral procession.

Of this very prince, who saw him in his last moments, he made an urgent request that his household be ordered to attend, using several examples and reasons to prove that it was a thing befitting a man of his rank. And he seemed to die content, having obtained this promise and arranged to his liking the distribution and order of his parade. I have hardly ever seen so persevering a vanity.

This other, opposite fussiness, of which I also do not lack examples in my own family, seems to me close kin to this one: to go on worrying and fretting at this last moment over regulating one's funeral to some particular and unusual parsimony—one servant and one lantern. I see this temperament praised, and the instruction of Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, who forbade his heirs to employ for him the ceremonies customary in such matters. Is it still temperance and frugality to avoid an expense and a pleasure whose use and knowledge are imperceptible to us? That is an easy reform, and one of small cost. If there were need to give orders about it, I would be of the opinion that in this, as in all the actions of life, each man should measure the rule by the degree of his fortune.

And the philosopher Lycon wisely instructs his friends to put his body wherever they think best, and as for the funeral, to make it neither extravagant nor shabby. I would leave it purely to custom to order this ceremony, and I shall defer to the discretion of the first people into whose charge I fall. This whole matter is to be despised in our own case, not neglected in that of our people. And it is saintly said by a saint: The care of a funeral, the manner of burial, the pomp of obsequies, are more a consolation to the living than a help to the dead. So Socrates, when Crito asked him at the hour of his end how he wished to be buried, answered: "As you wish."[11]

Si i'auois à m'en empescher plus auant, ie trouuerois plus galand, d'imiter ceux qui entreprennent viuans et respirans, iouyr de l'ordre et honneur de leur sepulture: et qui se plaisent de voir en marbre leur morte contenance. Heureux qui sachent resiouyr et gratifier leur sens par l'insensibilité, et viure de leur mort!	If I had to concern myself any further with it, I would find it more stylish to imitate those who undertake, while alive and breathing, to enjoy the order and honor of their tomb, and who take pleasure in seeing their dead countenance in marble. Happy those who know how to delight and gratify their senses through insensibility, and to live by their death!
1.3.12 A peu, que ie n'entre en haine irreconciliable contre toute domination populaire: quoy qu'elle me semble la plus naturelle et equitable: quand il me souuient de cette inhumaine iniustice du peuple Athenien: de faire mourir sans remission, et sans les vouloir seulement ouïr en leurs defenses, ces braues Capitaines, venants de gaigner contre les Lacedemoniens la bataille naualle pres les Isles Arginenses: la plus contestee, la plus forte bataille, que les Grecs aient onques donnee en mer de leurs forces: par ce qu'apres la victoire, ils auoient suiuy les occasions que la loy de la guerre leur presentoit, plustost que de s'arrester à recueillir et inhumer leurs morts. Et rend cette execution plus odieuse, le faict de Diomedon.	I come close to conceiving an irreconcilable hatred against all popular rule—though it seems to me the most natural and equitable—when I remember that inhuman injustice of the Athenian people: putting to death without mercy, and without even being willing to hear their defense, those brave captains who had just won the naval battle against the Spartans near the Arginusae islands, the most hotly contested and the strongest battle the Greeks ever fought at sea with their own forces—because after the victory they had followed up the opportunities that the law of war offered them rather than stopping to gather and bury their dead. And what makes this execution more odious is the conduct of Diomedon.[12]
Cettuy cy est l'vn des condamnez, homme de notable vertu, et militaire et politique: lequel se tirant auant pour parler, apres auoir ouy l'arrest de leur condemnation, et trouuant seulement lors temps de paisible audience, au lieu de s'en seruir au bien de sa cause, et à descouurir l'euidente iniquité d'vne si cruelle conclusion, ne representa qu'vn soin de la conseruation de ses iuges: priant les Dieux de tourner ce iugement à leur bien: et à fin que, par faute de rendre les vœux que luy et ses compagnons auoient voué, en recognoissance d'vne si illustre fortune, ils n'attirassent l'ire des Dieux sur eux, les aduertissant quels vœux c'estoient. Et sans dire autre chose, et sans marchander, s'achemina de ce pas courageusement au supplice.	He was one of the condemned, a man of notable virtue, both military and political. He stepped forward to speak after hearing the sentence of their condemnation, finding only then time for a quiet hearing. Instead of using it for the good of his cause, and to expose the evident iniquity of so cruel a decision, he showed concern only for the preservation of his judges: he prayed the gods to turn this judgment to their good; and, lest by failing to pay the vows that he and his companions had made in gratitude for so illustrious a fortune they should bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves, he informed them what those vows were. And without saying anything more, and without haggling, he went straight off courageously to his execution.

I.4 How the Soul Discharges Its Passions on False Objects When the True Are Wanting

Comme l'ame descharge ses passions sur des obiects faux, quand les vrais luy defaillent
When the soul lacks a real target for its passions, it invents one—even lashing out at objects or itself.

1.4.1	VN Gentil-homme des nostres merueilleusement subiect à la goutte, estant pressé par les Medecins de laisser du tout l'vsage des viandes salees, auoit accoustumé de respondre plaisamment, que sur les efforts et tourments du mal, il vouloit auoir à qui s'en prendre; et que s'escriant et maudissant tantost le ceruelat, tantost la langue de bœuf et le iambon, il s'en sentoit d'autant allegé.	A gentleman of our country, marvelously subject to gout, being urged by his doctors to give up salted meats altogether, used to reply humorously that in the attacks and torments of the disease he wanted to have something to blame; and that by shouting and cursing now the sausage, now the ox tongue and the ham, he felt that much relieved.
1.4.2	Mais en bon escient, comme le bras estant haussé pour frapper, il nous deult si le coup ne rencontre, et qu'il aille au vent: aussi que pour rendre vne veuë plaisante, il ne faut pas qu'elle soit perduë et escartee dans le vague de l'air, ains qu'elle ayt butte pour la soustenir à raisonnable distance. Ventus vt amittit vires, nisi robore densæ / Occurrant siluæ spatio diffusus inani. De mesme il semble que l'ame esbranlee et esmeuë se perde en soy-mesme, si on ne luy donne prinse: et faut tousiours luy fournir d'obiect où elle s'abutte et agisse.	But in earnest: just as an arm raised to strike hurts us if the blow does not land and goes into the wind; and just as, to make a view pleasant, it must not be lost and scattered in the emptiness of the air, but must have a mark to hold it at a reasonable distance—As the wind loses its strength, scattered in empty space, / Unless dense forests stand in its way—so it seems that the soul, shaken and stirred, loses itself in itself if it is not given something to grip; and it must always be supplied with an object to aim at and act upon.[1]
1.4.3	Plutarque dit à propos de ceux qui s'affectionnent aux guenons et petits chiens, que la partie amoureuse qui est en nous, à faute de prise legitime, plustost que de demeurer en vain, s'en forge ainsin vne faulce et friuole. Et nous voyons que l'ame en ses passions se pipe plustost elle mesme, se dressant vn faux subiect et fantastique, voire contre sa propre creance, que de n'agir contre quelque chose. Ainsin emporte les bestes leur rage à s'attaquer à la pierre et au fer, qui les a blessees: et à se venger à belles dents sur soy-mesmes du mal qu'elles sentent. Pannonis haud aliter post ictum sæuior vrsa Cui iaculum parua Lybis amentauit habena, Se rotat in vulnus, telumque irata receptum Impetit, et secum fugientem circuit hastam.	Plutarch says, of those who grow fond of monkeys and little dogs, that the loving part in us, for lack of a legitimate object, rather than remain idle, forges a false and frivolous one for itself in this way. And we see that the soul, in its passions, would rather deceive itself, setting up a false and fanciful object, even against its own belief, than not act against something. Thus beasts are carried by their rage to attack the stone or the steel that has wounded them, and to take revenge on themselves with their teeth for the pain they feel. Just so the Pannonian she-bear, fiercer after the blow Of the javelin the Libyan has hurled with its slender thong, Whirls round upon her wound and, raging, attacks

Liuius parlant de l'armee Romaine en Espaigne, apres la perte des deux freres ses grands Capitaines, Flere omnes repente, et offensare capita: c'est vn vsage commun. Et le Philosophe Bion, de ce Roy, qui de dueil s'arrachoit le poil, fut plaisant, Cetuy-cy pense-il que la pelade soulage le dueil?	What causes do we not invent for the misfortunes that befall us? What do we not lay hold of, rightly or wrongly, so as to have something to fence with? It is not those blond tresses that you are tearing, nor the whiteness of that breast that you beat so cruelly in your distress, that killed that beloved brother with an unlucky bullet: take it out on something else. Livy, speaking of the Roman army in Spain after the loss of its two great captains, who were brothers: All at once they began to weep and beat their heads. It is a common practice. And the philosopher Bion was amusing about that king who tore out his hair in grief: "Does this man think baldness relieves grief?"[2]
Qui n'a veu mascher et engloutir les cartes, se gorger d'vne bale de dez, pour auoir où se venger de la perte de son argent? Xerxes foita la mer, et escriuit vn cartel de deffi au mont Athos: et Cyrus amusa toute vne armee plusieurs iours à se venger de la riuiere de Gyndus, pour la peur qu'il auoit eu en la passant: et Caligula ruina vne tresbelle maison, pour le plaisir que sa mere y auoit eu.	Who has not seen people chew and swallow the cards, or gorge themselves on a mouthful of dice, so as to have something to take revenge on for the loss of their money? Xerxes whipped the sea and wrote a letter of challenge to Mount Athos; Cyrus kept a whole army busy for several days taking revenge on the river Gyndes for the fright he had had crossing it; and Caligula ruined a very beautiful house because of the pleasure his mother had had there.
1.4.5 Le peuple disoit en ma ieunesse, qu'vn Roy de noz voysins, ayant receu de Dieu vne bastonade, iura de s'en venger: ordonnant que de dix ans on ne le priast, ny parlast de luy, ny autant qu'il estoit en son auctorité, qu'on ne creust en luy. Par où on vouloit peindre non tant la sottise, que la gloire naturelle à la nation, dequoy estoit le compte. Ce sont vices tousiours conioincts: mais telles actions tiennent, à la verité, vn peu plus encore d'outrecuidance, que de bestise.	In my youth people used to say that a king of one of our neighboring countries, having received a beating from God, swore to take revenge: he ordered that for ten years no one should pray to Him, or speak of Him, or, as far as his authority extended, believe in Him. By this they meant to depict not so much the stupidity as the vainglory natural to the nation the story was about. These are vices that always go together; but such actions, in truth, have even a little more of presumption than of stupidity.

ing out, "Varus, give me back my soldiers!" For those who direct their attacks at God himself, or at fortune, as if she had ears open to our assault, surpass all folly, since impiety is joined to it.[3]

Like the Thracians, who, when it thunders or lightens, start shooting at the sky with a Titanic vengeance, to bring God to reason with arrows. Now, as that ancient poet in Plutarch says, We must not grow angry at events: / They care nothing for all our rages. But we shall never heap enough abuse on the unruliness of our own mind.[4]

I.5 Whether the Governor of a Besieged Place Should Go Out to Parley

Si le chef d'vne place assiegee, doit sortir pour parlementer
Ancient Romans scorned trickery in war; modern soldiers prize surprise, so a besieged commander should not go out to negotiate.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.5.1	LVCIVS Marcius Legat des Romains, en la guerre contre Perseus Roy de Macedoine, voulant gaigner le temps qu'il luy falloit encore à mettre en point son armee, sema des entregets d'accord, desquels le Roy endormy accorda trefue pour quelques iours: fournissant par ce moyen son ennemy d'opportunité et loisir pour s'armer: d'où le Roy encourut sa derniere ruine. Si est-ce, que les vieux du Senat, memoratifs des mœurs de leurs Peres, accuserent cette prattique, comme ennemie de leur stile ancien: qui fut, disoient-ils, combattre de vertu, non de finesse, ny par surprinses et rencontres de nuict, ny par fuittes apostees, et recharges inopinees: n'entreprenans guerre, qu'apres l'auoir denoncee, et souuent apres auoir assigné l'heure et lieu de la bataille.	Lucius Marcius, the Roman legate in the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia, needed time to get his army ready. To gain it, he put out hints of a settlement. Lulled by these, the king granted a truce for a few days, and so gave his enemy the opportunity and leisure to arm, which brought about the king's final ruin. And yet the old men of the Senate, mindful of their fathers' ways, condemned this practice as contrary to their ancient style. That style, they said, was to fight with valor, not with cunning: not by surprises and night encounters, not by feigned flights and unexpected counterattacks. They never undertook a war until they had declared it, and often only after appointing the hour and place of battle.[1]
	De cette conscience ils renuoierent à Pyrrhus son traistre Medecin, et aux Phalisques leur desloyal maistre d'escole. C'estoient les formes vrayement Romaines, non de la Grecque subtilité et astuce Punique, où le vaincre par force est moins glorieux que par fraude. Le tromper peut seruir pour le coup: mais celuy seul se tient pour surmonté, qui scait l'auoir esté ny par ruse, ny de sort, mais par vaillance de troupe à troupe, en vne franche et iuste guerre. Il appert bien par ce langage de ces bonnes gents, qu'ils n'auoient encore receu cette belle sentence, dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat?	Out of this scruple they sent back to Pyrrhus his treacherous physician, and to the Faliscans their disloyal schoolmaster. These were the truly Roman ways, not those of Greek subtlety and Punic cunning, where conquering by force is thought less glorious than conquering by fraud. Deceit may serve for the moment. But the only one who considers himself beaten is the one who knows he was beaten neither by trickery nor by chance, but by valor, troop against troop, in an open and just war. It is clear enough from the way these good people talk that they had not yet taken up that fine maxim: who asks, of an enemy, whether it was guile or valor?[2]
1.5.2	Les Achaïens, dit Polybe, detestoient toute voye de tromperie en leurs guerres, n'estimants victoire, sinon où les courages des ennemis sont abbatus. Eam vir sanctus et sapiens sciet veram esse victoriam, quæ salua fide, et integra	The Achaeans, says Polybius, detested every kind of deceit in their wars, and counted no victory a victory except where the enemy's courage had been broken. A good and wise man will know that the

1.5.3	Au Royaume de Ternate, parmy ces nations que si à pleine bouche nous appelons Barbares, la coustume porte, qu'ils n'entreprennent guerre sans l'auoir denoncee: y adioustans ample declaration des moiens qu'ils ont à y emploier, quels, combien d'hommes, quelles munitions, quelles armes, offensiues et defensiues. Mais aussi cela faict, ils se donnent loy de se seruir à leur guerre, sans reproche, de tout ce qui aide à vaincre.	In the kingdom of Ternate, among those nations we so roundly call barbarians, custom requires that they never undertake a war without first declaring it. They add a full statement of the means they have to wage it: what kind, how many men, what munitions, what weapons, offensive and defensive. But once that is done, they also allow themselves to use in their war, without reproach, whatever helps them win.[4]
1.5.4	Les anciens Florentins estoient si esloignés de vouloir gaigner aduantage sur leurs ennemis par surprise, qu'ils les aduertissoient vn mois auant que de mettre leur exercite aux champs, par le continuel son de la cloche qu'ils nommoient, Martinella.	The old Florentines were so far from wanting to gain an advantage over their enemies by surprise that they warned them a month before taking their army into the field, by the continual ringing of the bell they called Martinella.
1.5.5	Quant à nous moins superstitieux, qui tenons celuy auoir l'honneur de la guerre, qui en a le profit, et qui apres Lysander, disons que, Où la peau du Lyon ne peut suffire, il y faut coudre vn lopin de celle du Regnard, les plus ordinaires occasions de surprise se tirent de cette praticque: et n'est heure, disons nous, où vn chef doiue auoir plus l'œil au guet, que celle des parlemens et traités d'accord. Et pour cette cause, c'est vne regle en la bouche de tous les hommes de guerre de nostre temps, Qu'il ne faut iamais que le Gouuerneur en vne place assiegee sorte luy mesmes pour parlementer.	As for us, who are less superstitious, we hold that the honor of war belongs to whoever has the profit of it, and we say, after Lysander, that where the lion's skin will not do, you must sew on a patch of the fox's. So the most common occasions for surprise are drawn from this very practice. There is no hour, we say, when a commander should keep a sharper watch than during parleys and peace talks. And for this reason it is a rule on the lips of every military man of our time that the governor of a besieged place must never go out himself to parley.[5]
1.5.6	Du temps de nos peres cela fut reproché aux Seigneurs de Montmord et de l'Assigni, deffendans Mouson contre le Comte de Nansau. Mais aussi à ce conte, celuy la seroit excusable, qui sortiroit en telle façon, que la seureté et l'audantage demeurast de son costé: comme fit en la ville de Regge, le Comte Guy de Rangon (s'il en faut croire du Bellay, car Guicciardin dit que ce fut luy mesmes) lors que le Seigneur de l'Escut s'en approcha pour parlementer: car il abandonna de si peu son fort, qu'vn trouble s'estant esmeu pendant ce parlement, non seulement Monsieur de l'Escut et sa trouppe, qui estoit approchee auec luy, se trouua le plus foible, de façon qu'Alexandre Triuulce y fut tué, mais luy mesme fut contrainct, pour le plus seur, de	In our fathers' time this was held against the Seigneurs de Montmord and de l'Assigni, who were defending Mouzon against the Count of Nassau. But by the same reckoning, a man would be excusable who went out in such a way that safety and advantage remained on his side. So did Count Guido Rangoni in the town of Reggio (if we are to believe du Bellay, for Guicciardini says it was he himself), when the Seigneur de l'Escut approached it to parley. He left his stronghold by so little that when a disturbance broke out during the parley, Monsieur de l'Escut and the troop that had come up with him found themselves the weaker,

1.5.7	Eumenes en la ville de Nora pressé par Antigonus qui l'assiegeoit, de sortir pour luy parler, alleguant que c'estoit raison qu'il vinst deuers luy, attendu qu'il estoit le plus grand et le plus fort: apres auoir faict cette noble responce: Ie n'estimeray iamais homme plus grand que moy, tant que i'auray mon espee en ma puissance, n'y consentit, qu'Antigonus ne luy eust donné Ptolemæus son propre nepueu ostage, comme il demandoit.	Eumenes, in the town of Nora, was pressed by Antigonus, who was besieging him, to come out and talk with him. Antigonus argued that it was only right for Eumenes to come to him, since he was the greater and the stronger. Eumenes first gave this noble reply: "I will never consider any man greater than I, as long as I have my sword in my power." Then he would not consent until Antigonus had given him his own nephew Ptolemy as a hostage, as he demanded.[7]
1.5.8	Si est ce qu'encores en y a-il, qui se sont tresbien trouuez de sortir sur la parole de l'assaillant: tesmoing Henry de Vaux, Cheualier Champenois, lequel estant assiegé dans le Chasteau de Commercy par les Anglois, et Barthelemy de Bonnes, qui commandoit au siege, ayant par dehors faict sapper la plus part du Chasteau, si qu'il ne restoit que le feu pour accabler les assiegez sous les ruines, somma ledit Henry de sortir à parlementer pour son profict, comme il fit luy quatriesme; et son euidente ruyne luy ayant esté montree à l'œil, il s'en sentit singulierement obligé à l'ennemy: à la discretion duquel apres qu'il se fut rendu et sa trouppe, le feu estant mis à la mine, les estansons de bois venus à faillir, le Chasteau fut emporté de fons en comble.	And yet there are some who have done very well by going out on the attacker's word. Witness Henri de Vaux, a knight of Champagne. He was besieged by the English in the castle of Commercy, and Barthélemy de Bonnes, who commanded the siege, had sapped most of the castle from outside, so that only the fire was needed to bring the ruins down on the besieged. He then summoned Henri to come out and parley for his own good. Henri did so, with three companions; and when his obvious ruin had been shown to him before his eyes, he felt singularly obliged to the enemy. He and his troop surrendered at the enemy's discretion. Then the fire was set to the mine, the wooden props gave way, and the castle was brought down from top to bottom.[8]
1.5.9	Ie me fie aysement à la foy d'autruy: mais mal-aysement le feroi-ie, lors que ie donrois à iuger l'auoir plustost faict par desespoir et faute de cœur, que par franchise et fiance de sa loyauté.	I readily trust another man's word. But I would find it hard to do so if I gave people reason to think I had done it out of despair and lack of courage, rather than out of frankness and confidence in his good faith.

6 Montaigne draws on the memoirs of Martin du Bellay and the History of Italy of Francesco Guicciardini, who was then governor of Reggio; the Seigneur de l'Escut is Thomas de Foix-Lescun, marshal of France.
7 Eumenes and Antigonus were generals who fought over Alexander's empire after his death; the story is in Plutarch's Life of Eumenes.

I.6 The Hour of Parley Is Dangerous

L'heure des parlemens dangereuse
Towns taken by surprise during truce talks show that no agreement is safe until sealed, and victorious armies are hard to restrain.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.6.1	TOVTES-FOIS ie vis dernierement en mon voysinage de Mussidan, que ceux qui en furent délogez à force par nostre armee, et autres de leur party, crioyent comme de trahison, de ce que pendant les entremises d'accord, et le traicté se continuant encores, on les auoit surpris et mis en pieces. Chose qui eust eu à l'auanture apparence en autre siecle; mais, comme ie viens de dire, nos façons sont entierement esloignées de ces regles: et ne se doit attendre fiance des vns aux autres, que le dernier seau d'obligation n'y soit passé: encores y a il lors assés affaire.	Nevertheless, I saw recently in my neighborhood, at Mussidan, that those who were driven out by force by our army, and others of their party, cried treachery: during the negotiations for a settlement, and while the treaty was still under way, they had been taken by surprise and cut to pieces. Such a complaint might perhaps have seemed reasonable in another age. But, as I have just said, our ways are entirely removed from these rules. No one should expect trust of another until the last seal of obligation has been set on the agreement; and even then there is plenty to worry about.[1]
1.6.2	Et a tousiours esté conseil hazardeux, de fier à la licence d'vne armee victorieuse l'obseruation de la foy, qu'on a donnee à vne ville, qui vient de se rendre par douce et fauorable composition, et d'en laisser sur la chaude, l'entree libre aux soldats. L. Æmylius Regillus Preteur Romain, ayant perdu son temps à essayer de prendre la ville de Phocees à force, pour la singuliere proüesse des habitants à se bien defendre, feit pache auec eux, de les receuoir pour amis du peuple Romain, et d'y entrer comme en ville confederee: leur ostant toute crainte d'action hostile.	And it has always been a risky course to trust the license of a victorious army with keeping the faith one has given to a town that has just surrendered on mild and favorable terms, and to let the soldiers in freely while their blood is still hot. Lucius Aemilius Regillus, a Roman praetor, had wasted his time trying to take the city of Phocaea by force, because its inhabitants were remarkably skilled at defending themselves. So he made a pact with them: he would receive them as friends of the Roman people and enter the city as an allied town, and he relieved them of all fear of hostile action.[2]
	Mais y ayant quand et luy introduict son armee, pour s'y faire voir en plus de pompe, il ne fut en sa puissance, quelque effort qu'il y employast, de tenir la bride à ses gents: et veit deuant ses yeux fourrager bonne partie de la ville: les droicts de l'auarice et de la vengeance suppeditant ceux de son autorité et de la discipline militaire.	But he brought his army in with him to make a grander show, and then, whatever effort he made, it was not in his power to keep his men in check. He saw a good part of the city plundered before his eyes, the claims of greed and vengeance overriding those of his authority and of military discipline.

1.6.4 Pendant le parlement, et qu'ils musoient sur leurs seurtez, la ville de Casilinum fust saisie par surprinse. Et cela pourtant au siecle et des plus iustes Capitaines et de la plus parfaicte milice Romaine: car il n'est pas dict, qu'en temps et lieu il ne soit permis de nous preualoir de la sottise de noz ennemis, comme nous faisons de leur lascheté. Et certes la guerre a naturellement beaucoup de priuileges raisonnables au preiudice de la raison. Et icy faut la regle, neminem id agere, vt ex alterius prædetur inscitia.

Mais ie m'estonne de l'estendue que Xenophon leur donne, et par les propos, et par diuers exploicts de son parfaict Empereur: autheur de merueilleux poids en telles choses, comme grand Capitaine et Philosophe des premiers disciples de Socrates; et ne consens pas à la mesure de sa dispense en tout et par tout.

Et de plus fresche memoire à Yuoy, le Seigneur Iulian Rommero, ayant fait ce pas de clerc de sortir pour parlementer auec Monsieur le Connestable, trouua au retour sa place saisie.

Mais afin que nous ne nous en allions pas sans reuanche, le Marquis de Pesquaire assiegeant Genes, où le Duc Octauian Fregose commandoit soubs nostre protection, et l'accord entre eux ayant esté poussé si auant, qu'on le tenoit pour fait, sur le point de la conclusion, les Espagnols s'estans coullés dedans, en vserent comme en vne victoire planiere: et depuis à Ligny en Barrois, où le Comte de Brienne commandoit, l'Empereur l'ayant assiegé en personne, et Bertheuille Lieutenant dudict and not subject to it, in the eyes of the gods as well as of men. Having made a seven-day truce with the Argives, on the third night he went and fell on them while they were all asleep and defeated them, claiming that nothing had been said about nights in his truce. But the gods avenged this treacherous subtlety.[3]

During a parley, while the townspeople were dawdling over their guarantees, the city of Casilinum was seized by surprise. And this, mind you, in the age of the most just captains and of the most perfect Roman military discipline. For it is not laid down that, at the right time and place, we may not take advantage of our enemies' stupidity, as we do of their cowardice. And certainly war naturally has many reasonable privileges to the prejudice of reason. Here the rule fails: that no one should seek to profit from another's ignorance.[4]

But I am astonished at how far Xenophon extends these privileges, both in the speeches and in the various exploits of his perfect commander. He is an author of marvelous weight in such matters, being both a great captain and a philosopher among the first disciples of Socrates; and yet I do not agree with the full extent of his dispensation in every respect.[5]

Monsieur d'Aubigny was besieging Capua and had subjected it to a furious bombardment. Signor Fabrizio Colonna, captain of the town, began to parley from a bastion, and as his men kept a slacker guard, ours seized the place and put everything to the sword. And in more recent memory, at Ivoy, Signor Julian Romero made the novice's blunder of going out to parley with the Constable, and on his return found his position taken.[6]

But so that we do not get off without being paid back: the Marquis of Pescara was besieging Genoa, where Duke Ottaviano Fregoso held command under our protection. The agreement between them had been pushed so far that it was considered done, but just as it was about to be concluded, the Spaniards slipped inside and treated it as an outright victory. And later, at Ligny-en-Barrois, where

But the philosopher Chrysippus would not have been of that opinion; and neither am I.[7]

For he said that those who run a race must indeed use all their strength for speed, but that they are by no means allowed to lay hands on their opponent to stop him, or to stick out a leg to trip him. And more nobly still, the great Alexander answered Polyperchon, who was urging him to use the advantage the darkness of night gave him to attack Darius: "No," he said, "it is not for me to seek stolen victories. I would rather regret my fortune than be ashamed of my victory." And he did not deign to strike down Orodes as he fled,

I.7 That Intention Is Judge of Our Actions

Que l'intention iuge nos actions
Since only our will is in our power, duty rests on intention—so wrongs repaired only by deathbed wills earn little credit.

FRENCH

ENGLISH

1.7.1 LA mort, dit-on, nous acquitte de toutes nos obligations. I'en sçay qui l'ont prins en diuerse façon. Henry septiesme Roy d'Angleterre fit composition auec Dom Philippe fils de l'Empereur Maximilian, ou pour le confronter plus honnorablement, pere de l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme, que ledict Philippe remettoit entre ses mains le Duc de Suffolc de la Rose blanche, son ennemy, lequel s'en estoit fuy et retiré au pays bas, moyennant qu'il promettoit de n'attenter rien sur la vie dudict Duc: toutesfois venant à mourir, il commanda par son testament à son fils, de le faire mourir, soudain apres qu'il seroit decedé.

Death, they say, releases us from all our obligations. I know some who have taken this in different ways. Henry VII, king of England, made an agreement with Don Philip, son of the Emperor Maximilian—or, to give him a more honorable comparison, father of the Emperor Charles V. Philip was to hand over to him the Duke of Suffolk of the White Rose, his enemy, who had fled and taken refuge in the Low Countries, in return for Henry's promise to make no attempt on the Duke's life. Yet when Henry came to die, he ordered his son in his will to have the Duke put to death immediately after his own decease.[1]

Dernierement en cette tragedie que le Duc d'Albe nous fit voir à Bruxelles és Contes de Horne et d'Aiguemond, il y eut tout plein de choses remerquables: et entre autres que ledict Comte d'Aiguemond, soubs la foy et asseurance duquel le Comte de Horne s'estoit venu rendre au Duc d'Albe, requit auec grande instance, qu'on le fist mourir le premier: affin que sa mort l'affranchist de l'obligation qu'il auoit audict Comte de Horne. Il semble que la mort n'ayt point deschargé le premier de sa foy donnee, et que le second en estoit quitte, mesmes sans mourir. Nous ne pouuons estre tenus au delà de nos forces et de nos moyens.

Recently, in that tragedy the Duke of Alba staged for us in Brussels with the Counts of Horn and Egmont, there were a great many remarkable things. Among others, Count Egmont, on whose word and assurance Count Horn had come to give himself up to the Duke of Alba, earnestly begged to be put to death first, so that his death might free him from the obligation he owed Count Horn. It seems that death did not discharge the first man of the word he had given, and that the second was quit of his even without dying. We cannot be bound beyond our strength and our means.[2]

A cette cause, par ce que les effects et executions ne sont aucunement en nostre puissance, et qu'il n'y a rien en bon escient en nostre puissance, que la volonté: en celle là se fondent par necessité et s'establissent toutes les regles du deuoir de l'homme. Par ainsi le Comte d'Aiguemond tenant son ame et volonté endebtee à sa promesse, bien que la puissance de l'effectuer ne fust pas en ses mains, estoit sans doute absous de son deuoir, quand il eust suruescu le Comte de Horne.

For this reason—since the outcomes and the carrying out of things are not in our power at all, and nothing is truly in our power but the will—all the rules of man's duty are necessarily founded and established on the will. So Count Egmont, holding his soul and will bound to his promise, although the power to carry it out was not in his hands, would undoubtedly have been absolved of his duty even if he had outlived Count Horn.

Mais le Roy d'Angleterre faillant à sa parolle par son intention, ne se peut excuser pour auoir retardé iusques

But the king of England, breaking his word in his intention, cannot be excused for having put off

1.7.2	I'ay veu plusieurs de mon temps conuaincus par leur conscience retenir de l'autruy, se disposer à y satisfaire par leur testament, et apres leur decés. Ils ne font rien qui vaille. Ny de prendre terme à chose si pressante, ny de vouloir restablir vne iniure auec si peu de leur ressentiment et interest. Ils doiuent du plus leur. Et d'autant qu'ils payent plus poisamment, et incommodéement: d'autant en est leur satisfaction plus iuste et meritoire. La penitence demande à charger. Ceux la font encore pis, qui reseruent la declaration de quelque haineuse volonté enuers le proche à leur derniere volonté, l'ayants cachee pendant la vie.	I have seen many people in my time who, convicted by their conscience of keeping what belongs to others, arranged to make amends by their will, after their death. They achieve nothing worthwhile—neither by setting a deadline on a matter so urgent, nor by trying to redress a wrong at so little cost to their feelings and their interest. They owe something more truly their own. The more heavily and inconveniently they pay, the more just and meritorious their reparation. Penitence asks to be a burden. Those do still worse who save for their last will the declaration of some spiteful intention toward a relative, having hidden it during their lifetime.

Et comme nous voyons, que les femmes produisent bien toutes seules, des amas et pieces de chair informes, mais que pour faire vne generation bonne et naturelle, il les faut embesongner d'vne autre semence: ainsin est-il des esprits; si on ne les occupe à certain subiect, qui les bride et contraigne, ils se iettent desreiglez, par-cy par-là, dans le vague champ des imaginations.

We see that fallow lands, if they are rich and fertile, teem with a hundred thousand kinds of wild and useless weeds, and that to keep them doing their job we must subdue them and put them to certain seeds for our use. And we see that women, all by themselves, produce shapeless masses and lumps of flesh, but that to make a good and natural offspring they must be set to work with another seed. So it is with minds. If we do not occupy them with some definite subject that will bridle and restrain them, they throw themselves in disorder, this way and that, into the vague field of imaginings.

As when the trembling light of water in bronze basins,

And there is no folly or raving that they do not produce in this agitation: like a sick man's dreams, they shape vain images. The mind that has no fixed goal loses itself; for, as they say, to be everywhere is to be nowhere. He who lives everywhere, Maximus, lives nowhere.[1]

1.9.1 IL n'est homme à qui il siese si mal de se mesler de parler de memoire. Car ie n'en recognoy quasi trace en moy: et ne pense qu'il y en ayt au monde, vne autre si merueilleuse en defaillance. I'ay toutes mes autres parties viles et communes, mais en cette-là ie pense estre singulier et tres-rare, et digne de gaigner nom et reputation.

There is no man it suits worse to talk about memory. For I recognize hardly a trace of it in myself, and I do not think there is another in the world so marvelously deficient. All my other faculties are mean and ordinary, but in this one I think I am singular and very rare, and worthy of earning a name and a reputation.

Outre l'inconuenient naturel que i'en souffre: car certes, veu sa necessité, Platon a raison de la nommer vne grande et puissante deesse: si en mon pays on veut dire qu'vn homme n'a point de sens, ils disent, qu'il n'a point de memoire: et quand ie me plains du defaut de la mienne, ils me reprennent et mescroient, comme si ie m'accusois d'estre insensé: ils ne voyent pas de chois entre memoire et entendement. C'est bien empirer mon marché: mais ils me font tort: car il se voit par experience plustost au rebours, que les memoires excellentes se ioignent volontiers aux iugemens debiles.

Besides the natural inconvenience I suffer from it—and indeed, given how necessary memory is, Plato is right to call it a great and powerful goddess—in my part of the country, when they want to say a man has no sense, they say he has no memory. And when I complain of the failings of mine, they reprove me and refuse to believe me, as if I were accusing myself of being witless. They see no difference between memory and understanding. That makes a bad bargain worse for me. But they do me wrong, for experience shows rather the opposite: excellent memories are often joined to feeble judgments.

Ils me font tort aussi en cecy, qui ne sçay rien si bien faire qu'estre amy, que les mesmes paroles qui accusent ma maladie, representent l'ingratitude. On se prend de mon affection à ma memoire, et d'vn defaut naturel, on en fait vn defaut de conscience. Il a oublié, dict-on, cette priere ou cette promesse: il ne se souuient point de ses amys: il ne s'est point souuenu de dire, ou faire, ou taire cela, pour l'amour de moy. Certes ie puis aysément oublier: mais de mettre à nonchalloir la charge que mon amy m'a donnee, ie ne le fay pas. Qu'on se contente de ma misere, sans en faire vne espece de malice: et de la malice autant ennemye de mon humeur.

They wrong me in this too—I who can do nothing so well as be a friend—that the same words that accuse my infirmity describe ingratitude. They blame my affection for what is the fault of my memory, and turn a natural defect into a defect of conscience. "He has forgotten," they say, "this request or that promise. He does not remember his friends. He did not remember to say, or do, or keep quiet about such and such, for my sake." Certainly I can easily forget; but to neglect a charge my friend has given me—that I do not do. Let them be content with my wretchedness, without making it into a kind of malice, and a malice so contrary to my temperament.

1.9.2 Ie me console aucunement. Premierement sur ce, que c'est vn mal duquel principallement i'ay tiré la raison de corriger vn mal pire, qui se fust facilement produit en moy: sçauoir est l'ambition, car cette deffaillance est insuportable à qui s'empestre des negotiations du monde. Que comme disent plusieurs pareils exemples du progres de nature, elle a volontiers fortifié d'autres facultés en moy, à mesure que cette-cy s'est affoiblie, et irois facilement couchant et allanguissant mon esprit et mon iugement, sur les traces d'autruy, sans exercer leurs propres forces, si les inuentions et opinions estrangieres m'estoient presentes par le benefice de la memoire.

Que mon parler en est plus court: car le magasin de la memoire, est volontiers plus fourny de matiere, que n'est celuy de l'inuention. Si elle m'eust tenu bon, i'eusse assourdi tous mes amys de babil: les subiects esueillans cette telle quelle faculté que i'ay de les manier et employer, eschauffant et attirant mes discours. C'est pitié: ie l'essaye par la preuue d'aucuns de mes priuez amys: à mesure que la memoire leur fournit la chose entiere et presente, ils reculent si arriere leur narration, et la chargent de tant de vaines circonstances, que si le conte est bon, ils en estouffent la bonté: s'il ne l'est pas, vous estes à maudire ou l'heur de leur memoire, ou le malheur de leur iugement.

Et c'est chose difficile, de fermer vn propos, et de le coupper despuis qu'on est arroutté. Et n'est rien, où la force d'vn cheual se cognoisse plus, qu'à faire vn arrest rond et net. Entre les pertinents mesmes, i'en voy qui veulent et ne se peuuent deffaire de leur course. Ce pendant qu'ils cerchent le point de clorre le pas, ils s'en vont baliuernant et trainant comme des hommes qui deffaillent de foiblesse. Sur tout les vieillards sont dangereux, à qui la souuenance des choses passees demeure, et ont perdu la souuenance de leurs redites. I'ay veu des recits bien plaisants, deuenir tres-ennuyeux, en la bouche d'vn Seigneur, chascun de l'assistance en ayant esté abbreuué cent fois.

1.9.3 Secondement qu'il me souuient moins des offences receuës, ainsi que disoit cet ancien: il me faudroit vn protocolle, comme Darius, pour n'oublier l'offense qu'il auoit receue des Atheniens, faisoit qu'vn page à touts les coups qu'il se mettoit à table, luy vinst rechanter par trois fois à l'oreille, Sire, souuienne vous des Atheniens: et que les lieux et les liures que ie reuoy, me rient tousiours d'vne fresche nouuelleté.

unbearable in anyone who gets entangled in the world's affairs. Also, as many similar examples of nature's workings show, she has readily strengthened other faculties in me as this one has weakened. If other people's ideas and opinions were present to me by the benefit of memory, I might easily let my mind and judgment lie down and languish in others' tracks, without exercising their own powers.

Also, my talk is shorter for it; for the storehouse of memory is usually better stocked with material than that of invention. If my memory had served me well, I would have deafened all my friends with chatter, since subjects rouse this faculty I have, such as it is, of handling and using them, warming up and drawing out my reasoning. It is a pity: I see it tested in some of my close friends. As their memory supplies them with the whole thing, complete and present, they start their story so far back and load it with so many pointless details that if the tale is good, they smother its goodness; and if it is not, you are left cursing either the good luck of their memory or the bad luck of their judgment.

And it is a hard thing to close a speech and cut it short once you are under way. There is nothing in which a horse's strength shows more than in making a clean, neat stop. Even among those who speak to the point, I see some who want to break off their run and cannot. While they are looking for the place to end their stride, they go rambling and trailing on like men fainting from weakness. Old men above all are dangerous: they keep the memory of things past and have lost the memory of their repetitions. I have seen very amusing stories become extremely tiresome in the mouth of a certain lord, everyone present having been regaled with them a hundred times.

Second, I remember less of the offenses I have received, as that ancient said. I would need a prompter, like Darius: to keep from forgetting the offense he had received from the Athenians, he had a page come and chant in his ear three times, every time he sat down to table, "Sire, remember the Athenians." And the places and books I see again always smile at me with fresh novelty.[1]

1 Cicero said of Caesar that he forgot nothing but injuries; the story of Darius is in Herodotus.

1.9.4 Ce n'est pas sans raison qu'on dit, que qui ne se sent point assez ferme de memoire, ne se doit pas mesler d'estre menteur. Ie sçay bien que les grammairiens font difference, entre dire mensonge, et mentir: et disent que dire mensonge, c'est dire chose fausse, mais qu'on a pris pour vraye, et que la definition du mot de mentir en Latin, d'où nostre François est party, porte autant comme aller contre sa conscience: et que par consequent cela ne touche que ceux qui disent contre ce qu'ils sçauent, desquels ie parle. Or ceux icy, ou ils inuentent marc et tout, ou ils déguisent et alterent vn fons veritable.

Lors qu'ils déguisent et changent, à les remettre souuent en ce mesme conte, il est mal-aisé qu'ils ne se desferrent: par ce que la chose, comme elle est, s'estant logée la premiere dans la memoire, et s'y estant empreincte, par la voye de la connoissance et de la science, il est mal-aisé qu'elle ne se represente à l'imagination, délogeant la fausceté, qui n'y peut auoir le pied si ferme, ny si rassis: et que les circonstances du premier aprentissage, se coulant à tous coups dans l'esprit, ne facent perdre le souuenir des pieces raportées faulses ou abastardies. En ce qu'ils inuentent tout à faict, d'autant qu'il n'y a nulle impression contraire, qui choque leur fausceté, ils semblent auoir d'autant moins à craindre de se mesconter.

Toutefois encore cecy, par ce que c'est vn corps vain, et sans prise, eschappe volontiers à la memoire, si elle n'est bien asseuree. Dequoy i'ay souuent veu l'experience, et plaisamment, aux despens de ceux qui font profession de ne former autrement leur parole, que selon qu'il sert aux affaires qu'ils negotient, et qu'il plaist aux grands à qui ils parlent.

Car ces circonstances à quoy ils veulent asseruir leur foy et leur conscience, estans subiettes à plusieurs changements, il faut que leur parole se diuersifie quand et quand: d'où il aduient que de mesme chose, ils disent, tantost gris, tantost iaune: à tel homme d'vne sorte, à tel d'vne autre: et si par fortune ces hommes rapportent en butin leurs instructions si contraires, que deuient ce bel art? Outre ce qu'imprudemment ils se desferrent eux-

It is not without reason that people say that anyone who does not feel his memory firm enough should not meddle with being a liar. I know well that the grammarians distinguish between telling a falsehood and lying. They say that telling a falsehood is saying something false that one has taken to be true, whereas the definition of the word "lie" in Latin, from which our French word comes, amounts to going against one's conscience; and that consequently it concerns only those who say the contrary of what they know. It is of these that I am speaking. Now such people either invent the whole thing outright, or they disguise and alter something that is true at bottom.

When they disguise and alter, if you bring them back often to the same story, it is hard for them not to trip themselves up. For the thing as it really is, having lodged first in the memory and imprinted itself there by way of knowledge and understanding, will hardly fail to present itself to the imagination and dislodge the falsehood, which cannot have so firm or settled a foothold there. And the circumstances of what they first learned, slipping into the mind at every turn, will make them forget the false or spurious pieces they have patched on. In what they invent outright, since there is no contrary impression to clash with their falsehood, they seem to have that much less to fear of slipping up.

Yet even this, being an empty body with nothing to grip, readily escapes the memory unless it is very sure. I have often seen proof of this, and amusingly, at the expense of those who make a profession of shaping their words only according to what serves the business they are negotiating and what pleases the great men they are speaking to.

For since these circumstances, to which they are willing to enslave their faith and their conscience, are subject to many changes, their words must vary along with them. Hence it happens that of the same thing they say now gray, now yellow; to one man one thing, to another something else. And if by chance these men pool their contradictory inmesmes si souuent: car quelle memoire leur pourroit suffire à se souuenir de tant de diuerses formes, qu'ils ont forgées en vn mesme subiect?

I'ay veu plusieurs de mon temps, enuier la reputation de cette belle sorte de prudence: qui ne voyent pas, que si la reputation y est, l'effect n'y peut estre.

1.9.5 En verité le mentir est vn maudit vice. Nous ne sommes hommes, et ne nous tenons les vns aux autres que par la parole. Si nous en connoissions l'horreur et le poids, nous le poursuiurions à feu, plus iustement que d'autres crimes. Ie trouue qu'on s'amuse ordinairement à chastier aux enfans des erreurs innocentes, tres mal à propos, et qu'on les tourmente pour des actions temeraires, qui n'ont ny impression ny suitte. La menterie seule, et vn peu au dessous, l'opiniastreté, me semblent estre celles desquelles on deuroit à toute instance combattre la naissance et le progrez, elles croissent quand et eux: et depuis qu'on a donné ce faux train à la langue, c'est merueille combien il est impossible de l'en retirer.

Par où il aduient, que nous voyons des honnestes hommes d'ailleurs, y estre subiects et asseruis. I'ay vn bon garçon de tailleur, à qui ie n'ouy iamais dire vne verité, non pas quand elle s'offre pour luy seruir vtilement. Si comme la verité, le mensonge n'auoit qu'vn visage, nous serions en meilleurs termes: car nous prendrions pour certain l'opposé de ce que diroit le menteur. Mais le reuers de la verité a cent mille figures, et vn champ indefiny. Les Pythagoriens font le bien certain et finy, le mal infiny et incertain. Mille routtes desuoyent du blanc: vne y va.

Certes ie ne m'asseure pas, que ie peusse venir à bout de moy, à guarentir vn danger euident et extresme, par vne effrontee et solenne mensonge. Vn ancien pere dit, que nous sommes mieux en la compagnie d'vn chien cognu, qu'en celle d'vn homme, duquel le langage nous est inconnu. Vt externus alieno non sit hominis vice. Et de combien est le langage faux moins sociable que le silence?

1.9.6 Le Roy François premier, se vantoit d'auoir mis au rouet par ce moyen, Francisque Tauerna, Ambassadeur de François Sforce Duc de Milan, homme tres-fameux en science de parlerie. Cettuy-cy auoit esté despesché pour formation like booty, what becomes of this fine art? Besides, they so often trip themselves up out of sheer carelessness: for what memory could be enough to remember so many different shapes they have forged on one and the same subject?

I have seen many in my time envy the reputation of this fine kind of prudence, without seeing that if the reputation is there, the effect cannot be.

Truly, lying is an accursed vice. We are men, and hold together with one another, only by our word. If we recognized its horror and its gravity, we would hunt it down with fire more justly than other crimes. I find that people commonly busy themselves punishing children for innocent mistakes, very inappropriately, and torment them for thoughtless actions that leave no mark and have no consequences. Lying alone, and a little below it obstinacy, seem to me the faults whose birth and growth we ought to fight at every turn. They grow along with the children; and once the tongue has been set on this false track, it is amazing how impossible it is to pull it back.

Hence we see men who are otherwise decent being subject and enslaved to it. I have a good lad of a tailor whom I have never heard tell a single truth, not even when it would serve him usefully. If falsehood, like truth, had only one face, we would be in better shape, for we would take as certain the opposite of what the liar said. But the reverse of truth has a hundred thousand shapes and a limitless field. The Pythagoreans make good certain and finite, evil infinite and uncertain. A thousand paths miss the target; one leads to it.

Certainly I cannot be sure that I could bring myself to ward off an obvious and extreme danger by a brazen and solemn lie. An ancient Father says that we are better off in the company of a dog we know than in that of a man whose language we do not know. So that to a stranger a foreigner is not a man. And how much less sociable is false speech than silence?[2]

King Francis I boasted of having driven to his wits' end, by this means, Francesco Taverna, ambassador of Francesco Sforza, duke of Milan, a man very famous for his skill at speechmaking. Taverna had been sent to excuse his master to His Majesty for an act of great consequence, which was as follows.[3]

The King, in order always to keep some lines of intelligence in Italy, from which he had lately been driven out, and especially in the duchy of Milan, had decided to keep a gentleman there near the Duke on his behalf: an ambassador in fact, but in appearance a private man, who would pretend to be there on his own business. For the Duke, who depended much more on the Emperor—especially at the time, when he was negotiating a marriage with the Emperor's niece, daughter of the King of Denmark, who is now dowager of Lorraine—could not let it be discovered that he had any dealings or talks with us without great harm to his interests. A Milanese gentleman, an equerry in the King's stables, named Merveille, was found suitable for this commission.[4]

Merveille was sent with secret letters of credence and an ambassador's instructions, along with other letters recommending him to the Duke in support of his private affairs, as a mask and a show. He stayed so long near the Duke that the Emperor got some inkling of it, which, we think, gave rise to what followed. It was this: on the pretext of some murder, there is the Duke having his head cut off in the dead of night, after a trial lasting two days.

Messer Francesco had come prepared with a long, fabricated account of this story—for the King had appealed for satisfaction to all the princes of Christendom, and to the Duke himself. He was given a hearing at the morning council. As the foundation of his case, he laid out several plausible versions of the facts, arranged to this end: that his master had never taken our man for anything but a private gentleman and his own subject, who had come to Milan on business and had never lived there under any other guise. He even denied having known that Merveille was in the service of the King's household, or known to the King—let alone taking him for an ambassador.

The King in his turn pressed him with various objections and questions, attacked him from every side, and finally drove him into a corner on the point of the execution carried out by night, and as it were by stealth. To which the poor embarrassed man answered, trying to be polite, that out of respect for His Majesty the Duke would have been very sorry to have such an execution carried out by day. Anyone can imagine how he was taken up on this, having contradicted himself so clumsily before such a nose as King Francis's.

1.9.7 Le Pape Iulle second, ayant enuoyé vn Ambassadeur vers le Roy d'Angleterre, pour l'animer contre le Roy François, l'Ambassadeur ayant esté ouy sur sa charge, et le Roy d'Angleterre s'estant arresté en sa response, aux difficultez qu'il trouuoit à dresser les preparatifs qu'il faudroit pour combattre vn Roy si puissant, et en alleguant quelques raisons: l'Ambassadeur repliqua mal à propos, qu'il les auoit aussi considerées de sa part, et les auoit bien dictes au Pape.

De cette parole si esloignée de sa proposition, qui estoit de le pousser incontinent à la guerre, le Roy d'Angleterre print le premier argument de ce qu'il trouua depuis par effect, que cet Ambassadeur, de son intention particuliere pendoit du costé de France, et en ayant aduerty son maistre, ses biens furent confisquez, et ne tint à guere qu'il n'en perdist la vie.

Pope Julius II had sent an ambassador to the King of England to rouse him against King Francis. The ambassador was heard on his commission, and the King of England, in his reply, dwelt on the difficulties he found in making the preparations needed to fight so powerful a king, and gave some reasons. The ambassador replied, inappropriately, that he too had considered them on his part, and had indeed told them to the Pope.

From this remark, so far removed from his mission, which was to push the King into war at once, the King of England drew the first evidence of what he later found to be a fact: that this ambassador, in his private intentions, leaned toward France. When the King informed the ambassador's master, the man's goods were confiscated, and he very nearly lost his life over it.

I.10 Of Prompt or Slow Speech

Du parler prompt ou tardif
Some speakers shine when improvising and others need preparation; Montaigne finds his own mind works best unpremeditated.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.10.1	ONC ne furent à tous toutes graces données. Aussi voyons nous qu'au don d'eloquence, les vns ont la facilité et la promptitude, et ce qu'on dit, le boutehors si aisé, qu'à chasque bout de champ ils sont prests: les autres plus tardifs ne parlent iamais rien qu'elaboure et premedité.	Never were all gifts given to all. So too we see that in the gift of eloquence some have facility and promptness, and, as they say, such an easy delivery that they are ready at every turn, while others, slower, never say anything that is not worked out and premeditated.[1]
1.10.2	Comme on donne des regles aux dames de prendre les ieux et les exercices du corps, selon l'auantage de ce qu'elles ont le plus beau. Si i'auois à conseiller de mesmes, en ces deux diuers aduantages de l'eloquence, de laquelle il semble en nostre siecle, que les Prescheurs et les Aduocats facent principalle profession, le tardif seroit mieux Prescheur, ce me semble, et l'autre mieux Aduocat: par ce que la charge de celuy-là luy donne autant qu'il luy plaist de loisir pour se preparer; et puis sa carriere se passe d'vn fil et d'vne suite, sans interruption: là où les commoditez de l'Aduocat le pressent à toute heure de se mettre en lice: et les responces improuueuës de sa partie aduerse, le reiettent de son branle, où il luy faut sur le champ prendre nouueau party.	Just as ladies are given rules for choosing games and bodily exercises so as to show off what is most beautiful in them, so, if I had to give similar advice about these two different advantages in eloquence —which in our age preachers and lawyers seem to make their chief profession—the slow speaker would make the better preacher, it seems to me, and the other the better lawyer. For the preacher's office gives him as much leisure as he likes to prepare, and then his course runs on in one thread and sequence, without interruption. The lawyer's situation, by contrast, presses him at every hour to enter the lists, and the unexpected replies of the opposing party throw him off his stride, so that he must take a new line on the spot.
1.10.3	Si est-ce qu'à l'entreueuë du Pape Clement et du Roy François à Marseille, il aduint tout au rebours, que Monsieur Poyet, homme toute sa vie nourry au barreau, en grande reputation, ayant charge de faire la harangue au Pape, et l'ayant de longue main pourpensee, voire, à ce qu'on dict, apportée de Paris toute preste, le iour mesme qu'elle deuoit estre prononcée, le Pape se craignant qu'on luy tinst propos qui peust offenser les Ambassadeurs des autres Princes qui estoyent autour de luy, manda au Roy l'argument qui luy sembloit estre le plus propre au temps et au lieu, mais de fortune, tout autre que celuy, sur lequel Monsieur Poyet s'estoit trauaillé: de façon que sa harengue demeuroit inutile, et luy en falloit promptement refaire vne autre.	And yet at the meeting of Pope Clement and King Francis at Marseille, quite the opposite happened. Monsieur Poyet, a man trained all his life at the bar and of great reputation, was charged with making the address to the Pope. He had thought it out long in advance, and had even, so they say, brought it from Paris all ready. On the very day it was to be delivered, the Pope, fearing that something might be said that could offend the ambassadors of the other princes around him, sent the King the subject that seemed to him best suited to the time and place—but, as luck would have it, quite different from the one Monsieur Poyet had worked on. So his speech was useless, and he had to make another one quickly.[2]

Mais s'en sentant incapable, il fallut que Monsieur le Cardinal du Bellay en prinst la charge. La part de l'Aduocat est plus difficile que celle du Prescheur: et nous trouuons pourtant ce m'est aduis plus de passables Aduocats que Prescheurs, au moins en France. Il semble que ce soit plus le propre de l'esprit, d'auoir son operation prompte et soudaine, et plus le propre du iugement, de l'auoir lente et posée. Mais qui demeure du tout muet, s'il n'a loisir de se preparer, et celuy aussi, à qui le loisir ne donne aduantage de mieux dire, ils sont en pareil degré d'estrangeté.

1.10.4 On recite de Seuerus Cassius, qu'il disoit mieux sans y auoir pensé: qu'il deuoit plus à la fortune qu'à sa diligence; qu'il luy venoit à proufit d'estre troublé en parlant: et que ses aduersaires craignoyent de le picquer, de peur que la colere ne luy fist redoubler son eloquence. Ie cognois par experience cette condition de nature, qui ne peut soustenir vne vehemente premeditation et laborieuse: si elle ne va gayement et librement, elle ne va rien qui vaille. Nous disons d'aucuns ouurages qu'ils puent à l'huyle et à la lampe, pour certaine aspreté et rudesse, que le trauail imprime en ceux où il a grande part.

Mais outre cela, la solicitude de bien faire, et cette contention de l'ame trop bandée et trop tendue à son entreprise, la rompt et l'empesche, ainsi qu'il aduient à l'eau, qui par force de se presser de sa violence et abondance, ne peut trouuer yssue en vn goulet ouuert. En cette condition de nature, dequoy ie parle, il y a quant et quant aussi cela, qu'elle demande à estre non pas esbranlée et picquée par ces passions fortes, comme la colere de Cassius, car ce mouuement seroit trop aspre: elle veut estre non pas secoüée, mais sollicitée: elle veut estre eschauffée et resueillée par les occasions estrangeres, presentes et fortuites.

Si elle va toute seule, elle ne fait que trainer et languir: l'agitation est sa vie et sa grace.

1.10.5 Ie ne me tiens pas bien en ma possession et disposition: le hazard y a plus de droit que moy: l'occasion, la compaignie, le branle mesme de ma voix, tire plus de mon esprit, que ie n'y trouue lors que ie le sonde et employe à part moy. Ainsi les paroles en valent mieux que les escrits, s'il y peut auoir chois où il n'y a point de prix.

ENGLISH

But he felt unable to do it, and Cardinal du Bellay had to take on the task. The lawyer's part is harder than the preacher's; and yet, in my opinion, we find more passable lawyers than preachers, at least in France. It seems that working promptly and suddenly is more the nature of wit, and working slowly and deliberately more the nature of judgment. But the man who stays utterly mute if he has no time to prepare, and the man to whom time to prepare gives no advantage in speaking better, are equally odd.[3]

It is told of Cassius Severus that he spoke better without having thought about it; that he owed more to chance than to his own diligence; that it helped him to be interrupted while speaking; and that his opponents were afraid to provoke him, for fear that anger would redouble his eloquence. I know by experience this cast of nature, which cannot bear vehement and laborious premeditation: if it does not move along cheerfully and freely, it gets nowhere worthwhile. We say of certain works that they smell of oil and the lamp, because of a certain harshness and roughness that labor imprints on those in which it has a large part.[4]

But besides that, the anxiety to do well, and the straining of a soul too taut and too intent on its undertaking, breaks it and hampers it. So it is with water that, pressing on itself through its own violence and abundance, cannot find a way out through an open bottleneck. In this cast of nature I am speaking of, there is also this: it asks not to be shaken and goaded by strong passions, like Cassius's anger, for that movement would be too harsh. It wants not to be jolted but coaxed; it wants to be warmed and roused by occasions from outside, present and fortuitous.

If it goes on its own, it merely drags and languishes. Agitation is its life and its grace.

I do not have myself well in my own possession and control: chance has more rights over me than I do. The occasion, the company, the very rhythm of my voice draw more out of my mind than I find there when I sound it and use it on my own. So my spoken words are worth more than my writings, if

I.11 Of Prognostications

Des prognostications
Oracles and omens have lost credit; Montaigne mocks divination and the anxious curiosity that seeks to know the future.

FRENCH

1.11.1 QVANT aux oracles, il est certain que bonne piece auant la venue de Iesus Christ, ils auoyent commencé à perdre leur credit: car nous voyons que Cicero se met en peine de trouuer la cause de leur defaillance.

Et ces mots sont à luy: Cur isto modo iam oracula Delphis non eduntur, non modò nostra ætate, sed iamdiu, vt nihil possit esse contemptius? Mais quant aux autres prognostiques, qui se tiroyent de l'anatomie des bestes aux sacrifices, ausquels Platon attribue en partie la constitution naturelle des membres internes d'icelles, du trepignement des poulets, du vol des oyseaux, Aues quasdam rerum augurandarum causa natas esse putamus, des fouldres, du tournoyement des riuieres, Multa cernunt aruspices: multa augures prouident: multa oraculis declarantur: multa vaticinationibus: multa somniis: multa portentis, et autres sur lesquels l'ancienneté appuyoit la pluspart des entreprises, tant publicques que priuées; nostre Religion les a abolies.

1.11.2 Et encore qu'il reste entre nous quelques moyens de diuination és astres, és esprits, és figures du corps, és songes, et ailleurs: notable exemple de la forcenée curiosité de nostre nature, s'amusant à preoccuper les choses futures, comme si elle n'auoit pas assez affaire à digerer les presentes: cur hanc tibi rector Olympi
Sollicitis visum mortalibus addere curam,
Noscant venturas vt dira per omina clades?
Sit subitum quodcunque paras, sit cæca futuri
Mens hominum fati, liceat sperare timenti:

1.11.3 Ne vtile quidem est scire quid futurum sit: Miserum est enim nihil proficientem angi: si est-ce qu'elle est de beaucoup

ENGLISH

As for oracles, it is certain that a good while before the coming of Jesus Christ they had begun to lose their credit; for we see Cicero taking pains to find the cause of their decline.

These are his words: Why are oracles no longer delivered at Delphi in this way, not only in our own age but for a long time now, so that nothing could be more despised? But as for the other kinds of prognostication—drawn from the anatomy of animals at sacrifices (to which Plato partly attributes the natural structure of their internal organs), from the stamping of chickens, from the flight of birds (We think certain birds were born for the purpose of augury), from thunderbolts, from the eddying of rivers (The haruspices see many things, the augurs foresee many; many are revealed by oracles, many by prophecies, many by dreams, many by portents), and others on which antiquity based most of its undertakings, public and private—our religion has abolished them.[1]

And although there remain among us some means of divination by the stars, by spirits, by the shapes of the body, by dreams, and in other ways—a notable example of the frenzied curiosity of our nature, which busies itself anticipating future things as if it did not have enough to do digesting present ones: Why, ruler of Olympus, did it please you to add this care to anxious mortals, that they should learn of coming disasters through dire omens?
Let whatever you are preparing come suddenly; let men's minds be blind to future fate; let the fearful be allowed to hope—[2]

It is not even useful to know what is going to happen; for it is wretched to be tormented to no purpose—still, moindre auctorité. Voylà pourquoy l'exemple de François Marquis de Sallusse m'a semblé remerquable: car Lieutenant du Roy François en son armée delà les monts, infiniment fauorisé de nostre cour, et obligé au Roy du Marquisat mesmes, qui auoit esté confisqué de son frere:

au reste ne se presentant occasion de le faire, son affection mesme y contredisant, se laissa si fort espouuanter, comme il a esté adueré, aux belles prognostications qu'on faisoit lors courir de tous costez à l'aduantage de l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme, et à nostre desauantage (mesmes en Italie, où ces folles propheties auoyent trouué tant de place, qu'à Rome fut baillée grande somme d'argent au change, pour cette opinion de nostre ruine) qu'apres s'estre souuent condolu à ses priuez, des maux qu'il voyoit ineuitablement preparez à la couronne de France, et aux amis qu'il y auoit, se reuolta, et changea de party: à son grand dommage pourtant, quelque constellation qu'il y eust.

Mais il s'y conduisit en homme combatu de diuerses passions: car ayant et villes et forces en sa main, l'armee ennemie soubs Antoine de Leue à trois pas de luy, et nous sans soupçon de son faict, il estoit en luy de faire pis qu'il ne fit. Car pour sa trahison nous ne perdismes ny homme, ny ville que Fossan: encore apres l'auoir long temps contestee. Prudens futuri temporis exitum
Caliginosa nocte premit Deus, Ridétque si mortalis vltra
Fas trepidat.
Ille potens sui
Lætúsque deget, cui licet in diem
Dixisse, vixi; cras vel atra
Nube polum pater occupato,
Vel sole puro.
Lætus in præsens animus, quod vltra est,
Oderit curare.

1.11.4 Et ceux qui croyent ce mot au contraire, le croyent à tort. Ista sic reciprocantur, vt et si diuinatio sit, dij sint: et si dij sint, sit diuinatio. Beaucoup plus sagement Pacuuius, Nam istis qui linguam auium intelligunt,
Plúsque ex alieno iecore sapiunt, quàm ex suo, Magis audiendum quàm auscultandum censeo.

such divination carries far less authority now. That is why the example of Francesco, Marquis of Saluzzo, has struck me as remarkable. He was King Francis's lieutenant in his army beyond the Alps, infinitely favored by our court, and indebted to the King for the very marquisate, which had been confiscated from his brother;[3] and though no occasion for doing so presented itself, and his own affection was against it, he let himself be so badly frightened—as has been established—by the fine prognostications then being spread on all sides in favor of the Emperor Charles V and to our disadvantage (especially in Italy, where these mad prophecies had found so much room that in Rome large sums of money were wagered on this belief in our ruin), that after often lamenting to his intimates the evils he saw inevitably in store for the crown of France and for the friends he had there, he revolted and changed sides. To his great loss, however, whatever constellation there may have been.

But he behaved in this like a man torn by conflicting passions. He had both towns and forces in his hand, the enemy army under Antonio de Leyva was a few steps away, and we had no suspicion of what he was doing, so it was in his power to do worse than he did. For through his treachery we lost neither a man nor a town, except Fossano, and that only after contesting it for a long time. The outcome of the future a prudent god buries in murky night, and laughs if a mortal beyond what is right takes fright.
He will live master of himself and happy, who can say each day,
"I have lived"; tomorrow let the Father fill the sky with black cloud or with clear sun.
A mind glad in the present will refuse to care for what lies beyond.[4]

And those who take this saying the other way round are wrong to do so. These things are so reciprocal that if there is divination, there are gods; and if there are gods, there is divination. Much more wisely Pacuvius: As for those who understand the language of birds

3 The Latin is from Cicero, On Divination. Francesco, Marquis of Saluzzo, went over to Charles V in 1536.

and learn more from another creature's liver than from their own,
I think they should be heard rather than heeded.[5]

1.11.5 Cette tant celebree art de deuiner des Toscans nasquit ainsin. Vn laboureur perçant de son coultre profondement la terre, en veid sourdre Tages demi-dieu, d'vn visage enfantin, mais de senile prudence. Chacun y accourut, et furent ses paroles et science recueillie et conseruee à plusieurs siecles, contenant les principes et moyens de cette art. Naissance conforme à son progrez. I'aymerois bien mieux regler mes affaires par le sort des dez que par ces songes. Et de vray en toutes republiques on a tousiours laissé bonne part d'auctorité au sort. Platon en la police qu'il forge à discretion, luy attribue la decision de plusieurs effects d'importance, et veut entre autres choses, que les mariages se facent par sort entre les bons.

This much-celebrated Tuscan art of divination was born like this. A ploughman, driving his ploughshare deep into the earth, saw Tages, a demigod, spring up out of it, with a child's face but an old man's wisdom. Everyone came running, and his words and his knowledge, which contained the principles and methods of this art, were gathered up and preserved for many centuries. A birth in keeping with its later progress. I would much rather regulate my affairs by a throw of the dice than by these dreams. And indeed, in all commonwealths a good share of authority has always been left to lot. Plato, in the government he shapes as he pleases, assigns to it the decision of several important matters, and wants, among other things, marriages among the good to be arranged by lot.[6]

Et donne si grand poids à cette election fortuite, que les enfans qui en naissent, il ordonne qu'ils soyent nourris au païs: ceux qui naissent des mauuais, en soyent mis hors: toutesfois si quelqu'vn de ces bannis venoit par cas d'aduenture à montrer en croissant quelque bonne esperance de soy, qu'on le puisse rappeller, et exiler aussi celuy d'entre les retenus, qui montrera peu d'esperance de son adolescence.

And he gives such weight to this chance selection that he orders the children born of these marriages to be brought up in the country, and those born of the bad to be put out of it. Yet if one of these exiles should happen, as he grows, to show some good promise of himself, he may be called back; and likewise one of those kept at home may be banished if he shows little promise in his youth.

1.11.6 I'en voy qui estudient et glosent leurs Almanacs, et nous en alleguent l'authorité aux choses qui se passent. A tant dire, il faut qu'ils dient et la verité et le mensonge. Quis est enim, qui totum diem iaculans, non aliquando conlineet? Ie ne les estime de rien mieux, pour les voir tomber en quelque rencontre. Ce seroit plus de certitude s'il y auoit regle et verité à mentir tousiours. Ioint que personne ne tient registre de leurs mescontes, d'autant qu'ils sont ordinaires et infinis: et fait-on valoir leurs diuinations de ce qu'elles sont rares, incroiables, et prodigieuses.

I see some people who study and annotate their almanacs, and cite their authority to us about whatever happens. Saying so much, they are bound to say both truth and falsehood. For who is there who, throwing his javelin all day long, does not sometimes hit the mark? I think none the better of them for seeing them hit it now and then. There would be more certainty if there were a rule and a truth in always lying. Besides, nobody keeps a record of their misses, since they are common and countless; and their predictions are prized for being rare, incredible and prodigious.[7]

Il se fait ainsi, respondit-il: ceux là ne sont pas peints qui sont demeurez noyez, en bien plus grand nombre.	ferings and pictures of people who had escaped shipwreck, and said to him: "Well now, you who think the gods do not care about human affairs, what do you say to all these men saved by their grace?" "It happens like this," he answered: "those who were drowned, and they are far more numerous, are not painted."[8]
1.11.7	Cicero dit, que le seul Xenophanes Colophonien entre tous les Philosophes, qui ont aduoué les Dieux, a essayé de desraciner toute sorte de diuination. D'autant est-il moins de merueille, si nous auons veu par fois à leur dommage, aucunes de nos ames principesques s'arrester à ces vanitez. Ie voudrois bien auoir reconnu de mes yeux ces deux merueilles, du liure de Ioachim Abbé Calabrois, qui predisoit tous les Papes futurs; leurs noms et formes; et celuy de Leon l'Empereur qui predisoit les Empereurs et Patriarches de Grece.	Cicero says that, of all the philosophers who acknowledged the gods, Xenophanes of Colophon alone tried to uproot every kind of divination. It is all the less surprising, then, if we have sometimes seen some of our princely souls dwell on these vanities, to their cost. I would very much like to have seen with my own eyes those two marvels: the book of Joachim, the Calabrian abbot, which foretold all the future popes, their names and their forms; and that of the Emperor Leo, which foretold the emperors and patriarchs of Greece.[9]
	Cecy ay-ie reconnu de mes yeux, qu'és confusions publiques, les hommes estonnez de leur fortune, se vont reiettant, comme à toute superstition, à rechercher au ciel les causes et menaces anciennes de leur malheur: et y sont si estrangement heureux de mon temps, qu'ils m'ont persuadé, qu'ainsi que c'est vn amusement d'esprits aiguz et oisifs, ceux qui sont duicts à ceste subtilité de les replier et desnouër, seroyent en tous escrits capables de trouuer tout ce qu'ils y demandent. Mais sur tout leur preste beau ieu, le parler obscur, ambigu et fantastique du iargon prophetique, auquel leurs autheurs ne donnent aucun sens clair, afin que la posterité y en puisse appliquer de tel qu'il luy plaira.	This I have seen with my own eyes: that in times of public turmoil, men stunned by their fortune throw themselves back, as on any superstition, on searching the heavens for the ancient causes and portents of their misfortune. And in my time they have been so strangely lucky at it that they have persuaded me of this: since it is a pastime for sharp and idle minds, those who are trained in this subtle art of folding and unfolding such writings would be able to find in any text whatever they look for. But what gives them most scope is the obscure, ambiguous and fanciful language of prophetic jargon, to which its authors give no clear meaning, so that posterity can apply to it whatever meaning it likes.
1.11.8	Le demon de Socrates estoit à l'aduanture certaine impulsion de volonté, qui se presentoit à luy sans le conseil de son discours. En vne ame bien espuree, comme la sienne, et preparee par continu exercice de sagesse et de vertu, il est vray-semblable que ces inclinations, quoy que temeraires et indigestes, estoyent tousiours importantes et dignes d'estre suiuies. Chacun sent en soy quelque image de telles agitations d'vne opinion prompte, vehemente et fortuite. C'est à moy de leur donner quelque authorité, qui en donne si peu à nostre prudence.	The daemon of Socrates was perhaps a certain impulse of the will that came to him without the counsel of his reasoning. In a soul as well refined as his, and prepared by continual exercise of wisdom and virtue, it is likely that these inclinations, though rash and unconsidered, were always important and worth following. Everyone feels within himself some semblance of such stirrings of a sudden, vehement and chance opinion. It is for me to give them some authority, I who give so little to our prudence.[10]

8 Diagoras of Melos, Greek poet of the 5th century BC; the anecdote is in Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods.
9 Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135–1202), Calabrian abbot and prophetic writer; Leo VI the Wise, Byzantine emperor (886–912), to whom a set of oracles was attributed.
10 The daemon was the inner divine sign that Socrates said warned him against certain actions.

Et en ay eu de pareillement foibles en raison, et violentes en persuasion, ou en dissuasion, qui estoit plus ordinaire à Socrates, ausquelles ie me laissay emporter si vtilement et heureusement, qu'elles pourroyent estre iugees tenir quelque chose d'inspiration diuine.	And I have had some that were equally weak in reason and violent in persuasion—or in dissuasion, which was more usual with Socrates—and I let myself be carried away by them so profitably and so happily that they might be judged to hold something of divine inspiration.

I.12 Of Constancy

De la constance
Constancy means bearing misfortunes that cannot be avoided, not refusing to dodge dangers—even by flinching from a cannon shot.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.12.1	LA loy de la resolution et de la constance ne porte pas que nous ne nous deuions couurir, autant qu'il est en nostre puissance, des maux et inconueniens qui nous menassent, ny par consequent d'auoir peur qu'ils nous surpreignent. Au rebours, tous moyens honnestes de se garentir des maux, sont non seulement permis, mais louables. Et le ieu de la constance se iouë principalement à porter de pied ferme, les inconueniens où il n'y a point de remede. De maniere qu'il n'y a soupplesse de corps, ny mouuement aux armes de main, que nous trouuions mauuais, s'il sert à nous garantir du coup qu'on nous rue.	The law of resolution and constancy does not require that we should not shield ourselves, as far as is in our power, from the evils and misfortunes that threaten us, nor, consequently, that we should not fear their taking us by surprise. On the contrary, all honorable means of guarding against evils are not only permitted but praiseworthy. And the game of constancy is played chiefly in bearing steadfastly the misfortunes for which there is no remedy. So there is no suppleness of body, no movement of the weapons in our hands, that we think wrong if it serves to protect us from the blow aimed at us.
1.12.2	Plusieurs nations tresbelliqueuses se seruoyent en leurs faits d'armes, de la fuite, pour aduantage principal, et montroyent le dos à l'ennemy plus dangereusement que leur visage. Les Turcs en retiennent quelque chose. Et Socrates en Platon se mocque de Laches, qui auoit definy la fortitude, se tenir ferme en son reng contre les ennemis. Quoy, feit-il, seroit ce donc lascheté de les battre en leur faisant place? Et luy allegue Homere, qui louë en Æneas la science de fuir.	Several very warlike nations used flight as their principal advantage in their feats of arms, and showed their backs to the enemy more dangerously than their faces. The Turks keep something of this. And Socrates, in Plato, mocks Laches, who had defined courage as standing firm in one's rank against the enemy. "What," he said, "would it then be cowardice to beat them by giving ground?" And he cites Homer to him, who praises in Aeneas the skill of fleeing.[1]
	Et par ce que Laches se r'aduisant, aduouë cet vsage aux Scythes, et en fin generallement à tous gens de cheual: il luy allegue encore l'exemple des gens de pied Lacedemoniens (nation sur toutes duitte à combatre de pied ferme) qui en la iournee de Platees, ne pouuant ouurir la phalange Persienne, s'aduiserent de s'escarter et sier arriere: pour, par l'opinion de leur fuitte, faire rompre et dissoudre cette masse, en les poursuiuant. Par où ils se donnerent la victoire.	And because Laches, on second thought, grants this practice to the Scythians, and finally to all horsemen in general, he cites to him further the example of the Spartan foot soldiers (a nation trained above all others to fight standing firm), who at the battle of Plataea, unable to break the Persian phalanx, hit on the idea of scattering and falling back, so that the Persians, believing they were fleeing, would break up and dissolve that mass in pursuing them. By this they won the victory.[2]
1.12.3	Touchant les Scythes, on dit d'eux, quand Darius alla pour les subiuger, qu'il manda à leur Roy force reproches,	As for the Scythians, it is said of them that when Darius went to subjugate them, he sent their king pour le voir tousiours reculant deuant luy, et gauchissant la meslee. A quoy Indathyrsez, car ainsi se nommoit-il, fit responce, que ce n'estoit pour auoir peur de luy, ny d'homme viuant: mais que c'estoit la façon de marcher de sa nation: n'ayant ny terre cultiuee, ny ville, ny maison à deffendre, et à craindre que l'ennemy en peust faire profit. Mais s'il auoit si grand faim d'en manger, qu'il approchast pour voir le lieu de leurs anciennes sepultures, et que là il trouueroit à qui parler tout son saoul.

1.12.4 Toutes-fois aux canonnades, depuis qu'on leur est planté en butte, comme les occasions de la guerre portent souuent, il est messeant de s'esbranler pour la menace du coup: d'autant que par sa violence et vitesse nous le tenons ineuitable: et en y a meint vn qui pour auoir ou haussé la main, ou baissé la teste, en a pour le moins appresté à rire à ses compagnons.

Si est-ce qu'au voyage que l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme fit contre nous en Prouence, le Marquis de Guast estant allé recognoistre la ville d'Arle, et s'estant ietté hors du couuert d'vn moulin à vent, à la faueur duquel il s'estoit approché, fut apperceu par les Seigneurs de Bonneual et Seneschal d'Agenois, qui se promenoyent sus le theatre aux arenes: lesquels l'ayant montré au Seigneur de Villiers Commissaire de l'artillerie, il braqua si à propos vne couleurine, que sans ce que ledict Marquis voyant mettre le feu se lança à quartier, il fut tenu qu'il en auoit dans le corps.

Et de mesmes quelques annees auparavant, Laurent de Medicis, Duc d'Vrbin, pere de la Royne, mere du Roy, assiegeant Mondolphe, place d'Italie, aux terres qu'on nomme du Vicariat, voyant mettre le feu à vne piece qui le regardoit, bien luy seruit de faire la cane: car autrement le coup, qui ne luy rasa que le dessus de la teste, luy donnoit sans doute dans l'estomach. Pour en dire le vray, ie ne croy pas que ces mouuements se fissent auecques discours: car quel iugement pouuez-vous faire de la mire haute ou basse en chose si soudaine?

many reproaches for always retreating before him and dodging battle. To which Indathyrsus—for that was his name—replied that it was not out of fear of him or of any man alive, but that this was the way his nation marched, having neither cultivated land, nor town, nor house to defend, nor any to fear the enemy might profit by. But if Darius was so hungry to get a bite of them, let him come close and see the place of their ancient tombs, and there he would find people to talk to as much as he liked.[3]

Yet with cannon fire, once we are set up as their target, as the circumstances of war often require, it is unbecoming to flinch at the threat of the shot, since we consider it unavoidable because of its violence and speed; and there is many a man who, for having raised his hand or ducked his head, has at the very least given his companions something to laugh at.

And yet, during the expedition that the Emperor Charles V made against us in Provence, the Marquis del Vasto went to reconnoiter the town of Arles, and came out from the cover of a windmill under which he had approached. He was spotted by the Lord of Bonneval and the Seneschal of Agenais, who were walking on the theater in the arena; they pointed him out to the Lord of Villiers, commissary of the artillery, who aimed a culverin so accurately that, had the said Marquis not leapt aside when he saw the fuse lit, it was held that he would have taken the shot in his body.[4]

And likewise, some years before, Lorenzo de' Medici, Duke of Urbino, father of the Queen who is the King's mother, was besieging Mondolfo, a stronghold in Italy in the lands called the Vicariate, when he saw the fuse put to a gun pointed at him; it served him well to duck, for otherwise the shot, which only grazed the top of his head, would doubtless have hit him in the stomach. To tell the truth, I do not believe these movements were made with any reasoning: for what judgment can you make about a high or low aim in something so sudden?[5] and it is much easier to believe that fortune favored their fright, and that another time it would be as likely a way to throw oneself into the shot as to avoid it. I cannot help starting if the crack of a harquebus shot suddenly strikes my ears in a place where I would not expect it; and I have seen this happen to others who are worth more than I am.

Nor do the Stoics mean that the soul of their sage can resist the first visions and fancies that come upon it. Rather, as to a natural subjection, they grant that he yields to a great clap of thunder, say, or a building collapsing, to the point of turning pale and shrinking; and so with the other passions, provided that his opinion remains safe and whole, that the seat of his reasoning suffers no harm or alteration whatsoever, and that he gives no consent to his fright and suffering. With one who is not a sage, it goes the same way in the first part, but quite otherwise in the second. For the impression of the passions does not remain on his surface, but penetrates to the very seat of his reason, infecting and corrupting it.

He judges according to them and conforms to them. See the state of the Stoic sage very eloquently and plainly expressed: The mind remains unmoved; the tears roll down in vain. The Peripatetic sage does not exempt himself from disturbances, but he moderates them.[6]

I.13 The Ceremony of the Meeting of Kings

Ceremonie de l'entreueuë des rois
Starting from the etiquette of royal meetings, Montaigne describes his own impatience with ceremony and the servitude of manners.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.13.1	IL n'est subiect si vain, qui ne merite vn rang en cette rapsodie. A nos regles communes, ce seroit vne notable discourtoisie et à l'endroit d'vn pareil, et plus à l'endroit d'vn grand, de faillir à vous trouuer chez vous, quand il vous auroit aduerty d'y deuoir venir: Voire adioustoit la Royne de Nauarre Marguerite à ce propos, que c'estoit inciuilité à vn Gentil-homme de partir de sa maison, comme il se faict le plus souuent, pour aller au deuant de celuy qui le vient trouuer, pour grand qu'il soit: et qu'il est plus respectueux et ciuil de l'attendre, pour le receuoir, ne fust que de peur de faillir sa route: et qu'il suffit de l'accompagner à son partement.	There is no subject so trivial that it does not deserve a place in this rhapsody. By our common rules, it would be a notable discourtesy, both toward an equal and still more toward a great man, to fail to be at home when he had told you he would come. Indeed, Queen Margaret of Navarre added on this point that it was uncivil for a gentleman to leave his house, as is most often done, to go and meet a visitor who is coming to see him, however great he may be; that it is more respectful and civil to wait for him in order to receive him, if only for fear of missing him on the road; and that it is enough to escort him when he leaves.[1]
	Pour moy i'oublie souuent l'vn et l'autre de ces vains offices: comme ie retranche en ma maison autant que ie puis de la cerimonie. Quelqu'vn s'en offence: qu'y feroisie? Il vaut mieux que ie l'offence pour vne fois, que moy tous les iours: ce seroit vne subiection continuelle. A quoy faire fuit-on la seruitude des cours, si on l'entraine iusques en sa taniere? C'est aussi vne regle commune en toutes assemblees, qu'il touche aux moindres de se trouuer les premiers à l'assignation, d'autant qu'il est mieux deu aux plus apparans de se faire attendre.	For my part, I often forget both of these empty duties, just as I cut out as much ceremony in my house as I can. Someone takes offense: what can I do about it? Better that I offend him once than myself every day: it would be a perpetual subjection. What is the point of fleeing the servitude of courts if we drag it all the way into our own den? It is also a common rule in all gatherings that it falls to the lesser to be first at the appointed place, since it is more fitting for the most eminent to be waited for.
1.13.2	Toutesfois à l'entreueuë qui se dressa du Pape Clement, et du Roy François à Marseille, le Roy y ayant ordonné les apprests necessaires, s'esloigna de la ville, et donna loisir au Pape de deux ou trois iours pour son entree et refreschissement, auant qu'il le vinst trouuer. Et de mesmes à l'entree aussi du Pape et de l'Empereur à Bouloigne, l'Empereur donna moyen au Pape d'y estre le premier et y suruint apres luy.	However, at the meeting arranged between Pope Clement and King Francis at Marseille, the King, having ordered the necessary preparations, withdrew from the city and gave the Pope two or three days' leisure for his entry and rest before he came to see him. And likewise, at the entry of the Pope and the Emperor into Bologna, the Emperor allowed the Pope to be there first, and arrived after him.[2]

I'y ay esté assez soigneusement dressé en mon enfance, et ay vescu en assez bonne compaignie, pour n'ignorer pas les loix de la nostre Françoise: et en tiendrois eschole. I'aime à les ensuiure, mais non pas si couardement, que ma vie en demeure contraincte. Elles ont quelques formes penibles, lesquelles pourueu qu'on oublie par discretion, non par erreur, on n'en a pas moins de grace. I'ay veu souuent des hommes inciuils par trop de ciuilité, et importuns de courtoisie.	Not only each country, but each city and each profession has its own particular civility. I was trained in it carefully enough in my childhood, and have lived in good enough company, not to be ignorant of the laws of our French civility; I could teach a school in them. I like to follow them, but not so timidly that my life is constrained by them. They have some tiresome forms, and provided one forgets them out of discretion and not by mistake, one is no less gracious for it. I have often seen men uncivil through too much civility, and importunate with courtesy.
1.13.4	C'est au demeurant vne tres-vtile science que la science de l'entregent. For the rest, the art of dealing with people is a very useful knowledge. Like grace and beauty, it smooths the first approaches of society and familiarity; and consequently it opens the door for us to learn from the examples of others, and to put to use and display our own example, if it has anything instructive and communicable.

I.14 That the Taste of Good and Evil Depends in Large Part on Our Opinion of Them

Que le goust des biens et des maux despend en bonne partie de l'opinion que nous en auons
If evils reach us only through our opinions, we can change their taste; Montaigne tests this on death, pain, and poverty.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.14.1	LES hommes, dit vne sentence Grecque ancienne, sont tourmentez par les opinions qu'ils ont des choses, non par les choses mesmes. Il y auroit vn grand poinct gaigné pour le soulagement de nostre miserable condition humaine, qui pourroit establir cette proposition vraye tout par tout. Car si les maux n'ont entrée en nous, que par nostre iugement, il semble qu'il soit en nostre pouuoir de les mespriser ou contourner à bien. Si les choses se rendent à nostre mercy, pourquoy n'en cheuirons nous, ou ne les accommoderons nous à nostre aduantage?	Men, says an old Greek maxim, are tormented by the opinions they have of things, not by the things themselves. A great point would be gained for the relief of our wretched human condition by anyone who could establish this proposition as true everywhere. For if evils enter us only through our judgment, it seems that it is in our power to despise them or turn them to good. If things surrender to our mercy, why shall we not master them, or adapt them to our advantage?[1]
	Si ce que nous appellons mal et tourment, n'est ny mal ny tourment de soy, ains seulement que nostre fantasie luy donne cette qualité, il est en nous de la changer: et en ayant le choix, si nul ne nous force, nous sommes estrangement fols de nous bander pour le party qui nous est le plus ennuyeux: et de donner aux maladies, à l'indigence et au mespris vn aigre et mauuais goust, si nous le leur pouuons donner bon: et si la fortune fournissant simplement de matiere, c'est à nous de luy donner la forme.	If what we call evil and torment is neither evil nor torment in itself, but only our fancy gives it that quality, it is in our power to change it. And having the choice, if nothing compels us, we are strangely foolish to strain ourselves for the side that is most painful to us, and to give sickness, poverty and contempt a bitter and bad taste if we can give them a good one—if, fortune merely supplying the matter, it is up to us to give it the form.
	Or que ce que nous appellons mal, ne le soit pas de soy, ou au moins tel qu'il soit, qu'il depende de nous de luy donner autre saueur, et autre visage, car tout reuient à vn, voyons s'il se peut maintenir.	Now, that what we call evil is not so in itself, or at least that, whatever it is, it depends on us to give it another flavor and another face—for it all comes to the same—let us see whether this can be maintained.
1.14.2	Si l'estre originel de ces choses que nous craignons, auoit credit de se loger en nous de son authorité, il logeroit pareil et semblable en tous: car les hommes sont tous d'vne espece: et sauf le plus et le moins, se trouuent garnis de pareils outils et instruments pour conceuoir et iuger. Mais la diuersité des opinions, que nous auons de ces choses là, montre clairement qu'elles n'entrent en nous que par composition. Tel à l'aduenture les loge chez soy en leur vray estre, mais mille autres leur donnent vn	If the original being of these things we fear had the power to lodge itself in us on its own authority, it would lodge alike and the same in all; for men are all of one species, and, apart from more or less, are furnished with the same tools and instruments for conceiving and judging. But the diversity of opinions we have about these things shows clearly that they enter us only on terms we agree to. One man perhaps lodges them in himself estre nouueau et contraire chez eux. Nous tenons la mort, la pauureté et la douleur pour nos principales parties.

Or cette mort que les vns appellent des choses horribles la plus horrible, qui ne sçait que d'autres la nomment l'vnique port des tourmens de cette vie? le souuerain bien de nature? seul appuy de nostre liberté? et commune et prompte recepte à tous maux? Et comme les vns l'attendent tremblans et effrayez, d'autres la supportent plus aysement que la vie. Celuy-là se plaint de sa facilité: Mors, vtinam pauidos vitæ subducere nolles, / Sed virtus te sola daret!

1.14.3 Or laissons ces glorieux courages: Theodorus respondit à Lysimachus menaçant de le tuer: Tu feras vn grand coup d'arriuer à la force d'vne cantharide. La plus part des Philosophes se trouuent auoir ou preuenu par dessein, ou hasté et secouru leur mort. Combien voit-on de personnes populaires, conduictes à la mort, et non à vne mort simple, mais meslee de honte, et quelquefois de griefs tourmens, y apporter vne telle asseurance, qui par opiniatreté, qui par simplesse naturelle, qu'on n'y apperçoit rien de changé de leur estat ordinaire: establissans leurs affaires domestiques, se recommandans à leurs amis, chantans, preschans et entretenans le peuple: voire y meslans quelquefois des mots pour rire, et beuuans à leurs cognoissans, aussi bien que Socrates?

1.14.4 Vn qu'on menoit au gibet, disoit que ce ne fust pas par telle ruë, car il y auoit danger qu'vn marchant luy fist mettre la main sur le collet, à cause d'vn vieux debte. Vn autre disoit au bourreau qu'il ne le touchast pas à la gorge, de peur de le faire tressaillir de rire, tant il estoit chatouilleux: l'autre respondit à son confesseur, qui luy promettoit qu'il soupperoit ce iour là auec nostre Seigneur, Allez vous y en vous, car de ma part ie ieusne. in their true being, but a thousand others give them a new and contrary being within themselves. We take death, poverty and pain as our principal adversaries.

Now this death, which some call the most horrible of horrible things—who does not know that others call it the only harbor from the torments of this life? the sovereign good of nature? the sole support of our liberty? and the common and ready remedy for all ills? And as some await it trembling and terrified, others bear it more easily than life. One man complains of how easy it is: O Death, would that you refused to take the cowards from life, / and that valor alone could bestow you![2]

But let us leave aside these lofty spirits: Theodorus answered Lysimachus, who was threatening to kill him, "You will have done a great feat if you match the strength of a Spanish fly." Most philosophers are found either to have forestalled their death deliberately, or to have hastened and assisted it. How many common people we see led to death—and not a simple death, but one mixed with shame and sometimes with grievous torments—who bring to it such assurance, some from obstinacy, some from natural simplicity, that one can see no change in their ordinary state: settling their household affairs, commending themselves to their friends, singing, preaching and talking to the crowd, sometimes even mixing in jokes, and drinking to their acquaintances, just as Socrates did![3]

One man being taken to the gallows said they should not go by a certain street, because there was a danger that a merchant might have him seized by the collar for an old debt. Another told the executioner not to touch his throat for fear of making him jump with laughter, he was so ticklish. Another answered his confessor, who promised him that he would sup that day with our Lord: "You go there yourself; as for me, I am fasting." Another, having asked for a drink, and the executioner having drunk first, said he would not drink after him for fear of catching the pox.

sometimes allows, his life would be spared if he would marry her. He looked at her a little, noticed that she limped, and said: "Tie the rope, tie the rope—she hobbles." And similarly it is said that in Denmark a man condemned to be beheaded, when he was on the scaffold and offered a similar condition, refused it because the girl they offered him had sagging cheeks and too pointed a nose.

A servant in Toulouse accused of heresy gave as the whole ground of his belief that of his master, a young student imprisoned with him, and preferred to die rather than let himself be persuaded that his master could be wrong. We read of the people of the town of Arras, when King Louis XI took it, that a good number were found among the common people who let themselves be hanged rather than say "Long live the King." And among those base souls the buffoons, there have been some who would not give up their jesting even in death itself. The one whom the hangman was pushing off the ladder cried, "Row on, galley!"—which was his usual refrain.[4]

And the other, who had been laid on a straw mattress along the hearth, on the point of giving up his life: when the doctor asked him where the pain held him, he answered, "Between the bench and the fire." And when the priest, to give him extreme unction, was searching for his feet, which the illness had drawn up and contracted, he said, "You'll find them at the end of my legs." To the man who was urging him to commend himself to God, he asked, "Who is going there?" And when the other answered, "You yourself, soon, if it pleases Him," he replied, "If only I were there by tomorrow evening!" "Just commend yourself to Him," the other went on, "you will soon be there." "Then it is better," he added, "that I take Him my commendations myself."

In the kingdom of Narsingue, even today, the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands. All other women are burned at their husbands' funerals, not only steadfastly but gaily. At the death of the king, his wives and concubines, his favorites and all his officers and servants, who make up a whole population,

	Pendant nos dernieres guerres de Milan, et tant de prises et récousses, le peuple impatient de si diuers changemens de fortune, print telle resolution à la mort, que i'ay ouy dire à mon pere, qu'il y veit tenir comte de bien vingt et cinq maistres de maison, qui s'estoient deffaits eux-mesmes en vne sepmaine. Accident approchant à celuy des Xanthiens, lesquels assiegez par Brutus se precipiterent pesle mesle hommes, femmes, et enfans à vn si furieux appetit de mourir, qu'on ne fait rien pour fuir la mort, que ceux-cy ne fissent pour fuir la vie: en maniere qu'à peine peut Brutus en sauuer vn bien petit nombre.	During our recent wars in the Milanese, with so many captures and recaptures, the people, unable to bear such varied changes of fortune, became so resolved on death that I heard my father say he saw a count kept of a good twenty-five heads of household who had done away with themselves in one week. An incident close to that of the Xanthians, who, besieged by Brutus, threw themselves headlong to their deaths, men, women and children together, with so furious an appetite for dying that nothing is done to escape death which these did not do to escape life; so that Brutus could barely save a very small number of them.[6]
1.14.6	Toute opinion est assez forte, pour se faire espouser au prix de la vie. Le premier article de ce courageux serment, que la Grece iura, et maintint, en la guerre Medoise, ce fut, que chacun changeroit plustost la mort à la vie, que les loix Persiennes aux leurs. Combien void on de monde en la guerre des Turcs et des Grecs, accepter plustost la mort tres-aspre, que de se descirconcire pour se baptizer? Exemple dequoy nulle sorte de religion est incapable.	Any opinion is strong enough to get itself embraced at the cost of life. The first article of that courageous oath which Greece swore and kept in the Median war was that each man would sooner exchange life for death than their own laws for Persian ones. How many people do we see, in the war between the Turks and the Greeks, accept a very harsh death rather than be uncircumcised in order to be baptized? An example of which no kind of religion is incapable.[7] resolurent à la seruitude: aucuns firent contenance de changer de religion.

Emmanuel successeur de Iehan, venu à la couronne, les meit premierement en liberté, et changeant d'aduis depuis, leur ordonna de sortir de ses païs, assignant trois ports à leur passage. Il esperoit, dit l'Euesque Osorius, non mesprisable historien Latin, de noz siecles: que la faueur de la liberté, qu'il leur auoit rendue, aiant failli de les conuertir au Christianisme, la difficulté de se commettre à la volerie des mariniers, d'abandonner vn païs, où ils estoient habituez, auec grandes richesses, pour s'aller ietter en region incognue et estrangere, les y rameineroit.

Mais se voyant decheu de son esperance, et eux tous deliberez au passage: il retrancha deux des ports, qu'il leur auoit promis: affin que la longueur et incommodité du traiect en reduisist aucuns: ou qu'il eust moien de les amonceller tous à vn lieu, pour vne plus grande commodité de l'execution qu'il auoit destinée. Ce fut, qu'il ordonna qu'on arrachast d'entre les mains des peres et des meres, tous les enfans au dessous de quatorze ans, pour les transporter hors de leur veüe et conuersation, en lieu où ils fussent instruits à nostre religion.

Il dit que cet effect produisit vn horrible spectacle: la naturelle affection d'entre les peres et enfants, et de plus, le zele à leur ancienne creance, combattant à l'encontre de cette violente ordonnance. Il fut veu communement des peres et meres se deffaisants eux mesmes: et d'vn plus rude exemple encore, precipitants par amour et compassion, leurs ieunes enfans dans des puits, pour fuir à la loy. most of them resolved on servitude; some made a show of changing their religion.

Emmanuel, John's successor, on coming to the crown, first set them free, and later, changing his mind, ordered them to leave his lands, assigning three ports for their passage. He hoped, says Bishop Osorius, a Latin historian of our times who is not to be despised, that since the favor of the freedom he had restored to them had failed to convert them to Christianity, the difficulty of exposing themselves to the plundering of the sailors, and of abandoning a country where they were settled with great wealth to go and cast themselves into an unknown and foreign region, would bring them round to it.[9]

But seeing himself disappointed in his hope, and all of them determined to make the crossing, he cut out two of the ports he had promised them, so that the length and hardship of the journey might bring some of them round, or so that he might have the means to gather them all in one place, the more conveniently to carry out what he had planned. This was that he ordered all children under fourteen to be torn from the hands of their fathers and mothers, to be carried out of their sight and company to a place where they would be instructed in our religion.

He says that this measure produced a horrible spectacle, the natural affection between parents and children, and their zeal for their ancient faith besides, fighting against this violent decree. Fathers and mothers were commonly seen doing away with themselves, and, as a still harsher example, throwing their young children down wells out of love and compassion, to escape the law. For the rest, when the term he had fixed for them expired, lacking the means to leave, they returned to servitude.

Some became Christians; and even today, a hundred years later, few Portuguese feel sure of their faith or of their descendants'—although custom and length of time are far stronger counselors for such changes than any other constraint. In the town of Castelnaudary, fifty Albigensian heretics suffered at one time, with determined courage, to be burned alive in one fire rather than disavow their opinions. How often, says Cicero, have not

Quoties non modò ductores nostri, dit Cicero, sed vniuersi etiam exercitus, ad non dubiam mortem concurrerunt?	only our leaders but whole armies rushed to certain death?[10]
1.14.8 I'ay veu quelqu'vn de mes intimes amis courre la mort à force, d'vne vraye affection, et enracinee en son cœur par diuers visages de discours, que ie ne luy sçeu rabatre: et à la premiere qui s'offrit coiffee d'vn lustre d'honneur, s'y precipiter hors de toute apparence, d'vne fin aspre et ardente. Nous auons plusieurs exemples en nostre temps de ceux, iusques aux enfans, qui de craincte de quelque legere incommodité, se sont donnez à la mort. Et à ce propos, que ne craindrons nous, dit vn ancien, si nous craignons ce que la couardise mesme a choisi pour sa retraitte?	I have seen one of my intimate friends hunt death down with all his might, out of a genuine longing, rooted in his heart by various forms of reasoning that I could not talk him out of; and at the first death that offered itself crowned with a luster of honor, throw himself into it beyond all likelihood, in a harsh and burning end. We have several examples in our time of people, even children, who for fear of some slight discomfort have put themselves to death. And on this point, what shall we not fear, says one of the ancients, if we fear what cowardice itself has chosen as its refuge?
1.14.9 D'enfiler icy vn grand rolle de ceux de tous sexes et conditions, et de toutes sectes, és siecles plus heureux, qui ont ou attendu la mort constamment, ou recerchee volontairement: et recherchee non seulement pour fuir les maux de cette vie, mais aucuns pour fuir simplement la satieté de viure: et d'autres pour l'esperance d'vne meilleure condition ailleurs, ie n'auroy iamais fait. Et en est le nombre si infini, qu'à la verité i'auroy meilleur marché de mettre en compte ceux qui l'ont crainte. Cecy seulement. Pyrrho le Philosophe se trouuant vn iour de grande tourmente dans vn batteau, montroit à ceux qu'il voyoit les plus effrayez autour de luy, et les encourageoit par l'exemple d'vn pourceau, qui y estoit, nullement soucieux de cet orage.	If I were to string out here a long list of those of every sex and condition and of every sect, in happier ages, who have either awaited death steadfastly or sought it voluntarily—and sought it not only to escape the evils of this life, but some simply to escape the satiety of living, and others in the hope of a better condition elsewhere—I would never be done. And their number is so infinite that in truth I would have an easier time counting those who have feared it. This one only. Pyrrho the philosopher, finding himself one day in a boat during a great storm, pointed out to those he saw most frightened around him a pig that was aboard, not in the least bothered by the storm, and encouraged them by its example.[11]
Oserons nous donc dire que cet aduantage de la raison, dequoy nous faisons tant de feste, et pour le respect duquel nous nous tenons maistre et Empereurs du reste des creatures, ait esté mis en nous, pour nostre tourment? A quoy faire la cognoissance des choses, si nous en deuenons plus lasches? si nous en perdons le repos et la tranquilité, où nous serions sans cela? et si elle nous rend de pire condition que le pourceau de Pyrrho? L'intelligence qui nous a esté donnée pour nostre plus grand bien, l'employerons nous à nostre ruine; combatans le dessein de nature, et l'vniuersel ordre des choses, qui porte que chacun vse de ses vtils et moyens pour sa commodité?	Shall we dare say, then, that this advantage of reason, which we make so much of, and on account of which we consider ourselves masters and emperors of the rest of creation, was put into us for our torment? What is the use of knowing things if we become more cowardly for it? if we lose the repose and tranquility we would have without it? and if it makes our condition worse than that of Pyrrho's pig? Shall we use the intelligence that was given us for our greatest good to our ruin, fighting the design of nature and the universal order of things, which requires that each use its tools and means for its own benefit?

THE OBJECTION FROM PAIN

Pain seems the hardest case, yet even pain takes up only as much room as we give it.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.14.10 Bien, me dira lon, vostre regle serue à la mort; mais que direz vous de l'indigence? que direz vous encor de la douleur, qu'Aristippus, Hieronymus et la pluspart des sages, ont estimé le dernier mal: et ceux qui le nioient de parole, le confessoient par effect? Possidonius estant extremement tourmenté d'vne maladie aigüe et douloureuse, Pompeius le fut voir, et s'excusa d'auoir prins heure si importune pour l'ouyr deuiser de la Philosophie: Ia à Dieu ne plaise, luy dit Possidonius, que la douleur gaigne tant sur moy, qu'elle m'empesche d'en discourir: et se ietta sur ce mesme propos du mespris de la douleur. Mais ce pendant elle ioüoit son rolle, et le pressoit incessamment.	"Fine," someone will tell me, "let your rule serve for death; but what will you say of poverty? And what will you say of pain, which Aristippus, Hieronymus and most of the wise considered the ultimate evil—and those who denied it in words confessed it in deeds?" When Posidonius was extremely tormented by an acute and painful illness, Pompey went to see him and apologized for having chosen so inconvenient a time to hear him discourse on philosophy. "God forbid," Posidonius said to him, "that pain should get such a hold on me as to prevent me from discussing it"; and he launched into that very subject, the contempt of pain. But meanwhile pain was playing its part and pressing him relentlessly.[12]
A quoy il s'escrioit: Tu as beau faire douleur, si ne diray-ie pas, que tu sois mal. Ce comte qu'ils font tant valoir, que porte-il pour le mespris de la douleur? il ne debat que du mot. Et ce pendant si ces pointures ne l'esmeuuent, pourquoy en rompt-il son propos? pourquoy pense-il faire beaucoup de ne l'appeller pas mal? Icy tout ne consiste pas en l'imagination. Nous opinons du reste; c'est icy la certaine science, qui iouë son rolle, nos sens mesmes en sont iuges: Qui nisi sunt veri, ratio quoque falsa sit omnis. Ferons nous accroire à nostre peau, que les coups d'estriuiere la chatoüillent? et à nostre goust que l'aloé soit du vin de Graues?	At which he cried out: "Do what you will, pain, I still will not say that you are an evil." This story that they make so much of—what does it contribute to the contempt of pain? He is only arguing about the word. And meanwhile, if these stabs do not move him, why does he break off his discourse for them? Why does he think he is doing much by not calling it an evil? Here not everything consists in imagination. On other things we hold opinions; here it is certain knowledge that plays its part; our very senses are the judges of it: For unless they are true, all reason too is false. Shall we make our skin believe that the lashes of a strap tickle it? And our palate that aloes is Graves wine?[13]
Le pourceau de Pyrrho est icy de nostre escot. Il est bien sans effroy à la mort: mais si on le bat, il crie et se tourmente. Forcerons nous la generale loy de nature, qui se voit en tout ce qui est viuant sous le ciel, de trembler sous la douleur? Les arbres mesmes semblent gemir aux offences.	Pyrrho's pig is on our side here. He is unafraid of death, to be sure; but if you beat him, he squeals and writhes. Shall we override the general law of nature, seen in everything that lives under heaven, which is to tremble under pain? Trees themselves seem to groan when they are injured.
1.14.11 La mort ne se sent que par le discours, d'autant que c'est le mouuement d'vn instant. Aut fuit, aut veniet; nihil est præsentis in illa. / Morsque minus pœnæ, quàm mora mortis habet. Mille bestes, mille hommes sont plustost morts, que menassés. Aussi ce que nous disons craindre principalement en la mort, c'est la douleur son auant-	Death is felt only through reasoning, since it is the motion of an instant. Either it has been or it is still to come; there is nothing of the present in it. / And death holds less pain than the waiting for death. A thousand beasts, a thousand men are dead before they are threatened. So too what we say we chiefly fear in coureuse coustumiere. Toutesfois, s'il en faut croire vn saint pere, malam mortem non facit, nisi quod sequitur mortem. Et ie diroy encore plus vraysemblablement, que ny ce qui va deuant, ny ce qui vient apres, n'est des appartenances de la mort. Nous nous excusons faussement.

Et ie trouue par experience, que c'est plustost l'impatience de l'imagination de la mort, qui nous rend impatiens de la douleur: et que nous la sentons doublement grieue, de ce qu'elle nous menace de mourir. Mais la raison accusant nostre lascheté, de craindre chose si soudaine, si ineuitable, si insensible, nous prenons cet autre pretexte plus excusable. Tous les maux qui n'ont autre danger que du mal, nous les disons sans danger. Celuy des dents, ou de la goutte, pour grief qu'il soit, d'autant qu'il n'est pas homicide, qui le met en conte de maladie?

1.14.12 Or bien presupposons le, qu'en la mort nous regardons principalement la douleur. Comme aussi la pauureté n'a rien à craindre, que cela, qu'elle nous iette entre ses bras par la soif, la faim, le froid, le chaud, les veilles, qu'elle nous fait souffrir. Ainsi n'ayons affaire qu'à la douleur. Ie leur donne que ce soit le pire accident de nostre estre: et volontiers. Car ie suis l'homme du monde qui luy veux autant de mal, et qui la fuis autant, pour iusques à present n'auoir pas eu, Dieu mercy, grand commerce auec elle; mais il est en nous, sinon de l'aneantir, au moins de l'amoindrir par patience: et quand bien le corps s'en esmouueroit, de maintenir ce neant-moins l'ame et la raison en bonne trampe.

Et s'il ne l'estoit, qui auroit mis en credit, la vertu, la vaillance, la force, la magnanimité et la resolution? où iouëroyent elles leur rolle, s'il n'y a plus de douleur à deffier? Auida est periculi virtus. S'il ne faut coucher sur la dure, soustenir armé de toutes pieces la chaleur du midy, se paistre d'vn cheual, et d'vn asne, se voir detailler en pieces, et arracher vne balle d'entre les os, se souffrir recoudre, cauterizer et sonder, par où s'acquerra l'aduantage que nous voulons auoir sur le vulgaire? C'est bien loing de fuir le mal et la douleur, ce que disent les Sages, que des actions égallement bonnes, celle-là est plus souhaitable à faire, où il y a plus de peine.

Non enim hilaritate, nec lasciuia, nec risu aut ioco comite leuitatis, sed sæpe etiam tristes firmitate et constantia sunt death is pain, its usual forerunner. Yet, if we are to believe a holy father, What makes death evil is only what follows death. And I would say, still more plausibly, that neither what goes before nor what comes after belongs to death. We make false excuses for ourselves.[14]

And I find by experience that it is rather our impatience at the thought of death that makes us impatient of pain, and that we feel pain doubly grievous because it threatens us with death. But since reason accuses our cowardice of fearing something so sudden, so inevitable, so imperceptible, we seize on this other, more excusable pretext. All ills that carry no danger beyond the ill itself we call without danger. Toothache or gout, however grievous, since it does not kill—who counts it as an illness?

Well then, let us suppose that in death we chiefly regard pain. Likewise poverty has nothing to fear but this: that it throws us into pain's arms through the thirst, hunger, cold, heat and sleepless nights it makes us suffer. So let us deal only with pain. I grant them that it is the worst accident of our being, and willingly. For I am the man in the world who most bears it ill will and most avoids it, since, thank God, I have not so far had much dealing with it. But it is in our power, if not to annihilate it, at least to lessen it by patience; and even if the body is shaken by it, to keep the soul and reason nevertheless in good temper.

And if it were not so, who would have brought into esteem virtue, valor, strength, magnanimity and resolution? Where would they play their part if there were no more pain to defy? Virtue is eager for danger. If we need not sleep on the hard ground, endure the noonday heat in full armor, feed on horse and donkey, see ourselves cut to pieces and a bullet pulled from between our bones, submit to being sewn up, cauterized and probed, how shall we gain the advantage we want to have over the common people? What the sages say is a long way from fleeing evil and pain: that of actions equally good, the more desirable to perform is the one that involves more pain.[15]

For it is not in gaiety, or wantonness, or laughter, or jest, the companion of frivolity, that men are happy;

beati. Et à cette cause il a esté impossible de persuader à nos peres, que les conquestes faites par viue force, au hazard de la guerre, ne fussent plus aduantageuses, que celles qu'on fait en toute seureté par pratiques et menees. Lætius est, quoties magno sibi constat honestum.

1.14.13 D'auantage cela nous doit consoler, que naturellement, si la douleur est violente, elle est courte: si elle est longue, elle est legere: si grauis, breuis: si longus, leuis. Tu ne la sentiras guere long temps, si tu la sens trop: elle mettra fin à soy, ou à toy: l'vn et l'autre reuient à vn. Si tu ne la portes, elle t'emportera. Memineris maximos morte finiri; paruos multa habere interualla requietis, mediocrium nos esse dominos: vt si tolerabiles sint, feramus: sin minus, è vita, quum ea non placeat, tanquàm è theatro exeamus.

1.14.14 Ce qui nous fait souffrir auec tant d'impatience la douleur, c'est de n'estre pas accoustumez de prendre nostre principal contentement en l'ame, de ne nous attendre point assez à elle, qui est seule et souueraine maistresse de nostre condition. Le corps n'a, sauf le plus et le moins, qu'vn train et qu'vn pli. Elle est variable en toute sorte de formes, et renge à soy, et à son estat, quel qu'il soit, les sentiments du corps, et tous autres accidents. Pourtant la faut il estudier, et enquerir; et esueiller en elle ses ressorts tout-puissants. Il n'y a raison, ny prescription, ny force, qui vaille contre son inclination et son chois.

De tant de milliers de biais, qu'elle a en sa disposition, donnons luy en vn, propre à nostre repos et conseruation: nous voyla non couuerts seulement de toute offense, mais gratifiez mesmes et flattez, si bon luy semble, des offenses et des maux. Elle faict son profit indifferemment de tout. L'erreur, les songes, luy seruent vtilement, comme vne loyale matiere, à nous mettre à garant, et en contentement. Il est aisé à voir, que ce qui aiguise en nous la douleur et la volupté, c'est la pointe de nostre esprit. Les bestes, qui le tiennent sous boucle, laissent aux corps leurs sentiments libres et naifs: et par consequent vns, à peu pres, en chasque espece, ainsi qu'elles montrent par la semblable application de leurs mouuements.

often, even in sadness, they are happy through firmness and constancy. And for this reason it was impossible to persuade our fathers that conquests made by sheer force, at the hazard of war, were not more advantageous than those made in complete safety by intrigues and schemes. Honor is the more gladdening the more it costs.[16]

Moreover, this should console us: that by nature, if pain is violent, it is short; if it is long, it is light: if severe, short; if long, light. You will not feel it very long if you feel it too much: it will put an end to itself or to you; the one and the other come to the same. If you do not carry it, it will carry you off. Remember that the greatest pains are ended by death, that small ones have many intervals of rest, and that we are masters of moderate ones; so that if they are bearable we may bear them, and if not, we may leave life, since it does not please us, as we leave a theater.[17]

What makes us endure pain so impatiently is that we are not accustomed to taking our chief contentment in the soul, and do not rely enough on it, though it is the sole and sovereign mistress of our condition. The body has, apart from more or less, only one gait and one bent. The soul can vary into every sort of form, and brings into line with itself and its state, whatever that may be, the sensations of the body and all other accidents. Therefore we must study it and inquire into it, and awaken in it its all-powerful springs. There is no reason, no prescription, no force that can prevail against its inclination and its choice.

Of the many thousands of turns it has at its disposal, let us give it one suited to our repose and preservation, and there we are, not only sheltered from all injury, but even gratified and flattered, if it so pleases, by injuries and ills. It turns everything to profit without distinction. Error and dreams serve it usefully, as legitimate material for putting us in safety and contentment. It is easy to see that what sharpens pain and pleasure in us is the keen edge of our mind. The beasts, which keep it buckled down, leave their bodies their sensations free and natural, and consequently much the same in each species, as they show by the similar use of their movements.

Si nous ne troublions en noz membres, la iurisdiction qui leur appartient en cela: il est à croire, que nous en serions mieux, et que nature leur a donné vn iuste et moderé temperament, enuers la volupté et enuers la douleur. Et ne peut faillir d'estre iuste, estant egal et commun. Mais puis que nous nous sommes emancipez de ses regles, pour nous abandonner à la vagabonde liberté de noz fantasies: au moins aydons nous à les plier du costé le plus aggreable. Platon craint nostre engagement aspre à la douleur et à la volupté, d'autant qu'il oblige et attache par trop l'ame au corps: moy plustost au rebours, d'autant qu'il l'en desprent et desclouë.

If we did not disturb the jurisdiction that belongs to our limbs in this matter, it is likely that we would be better off, and that nature has given them a just and moderate disposition toward pleasure and toward pain. And it cannot fail to be just, being equal and common. But since we have freed ourselves from its rules to abandon ourselves to the vagrant liberty of our fancies, let us at least help ourselves by bending them in the most agreeable direction. Plato fears our being too harshly committed to pain and pleasure, because it binds and attaches the soul too much to the body; I fear it rather for the opposite reason, because it detaches and unnails the soul from it.[18]

Tout ainsi que l'ennemy se rend plus aspre à nostre fuite, aussi s'enorgueillit la douleur, à nous voir trembler soubs elle. Elle se rendra de bien meilleure composition, à qui luy fera teste: il se faut opposer et bander contre. En nous acculant et tirant arriere, nous appellons à nous et attirons la ruyne, qui nous menasse. Comme le corps est plus ferme à la charge en le roidissant: ainsin est l'ame.

Just as the enemy grows fiercer at our flight, so pain grows proud at seeing us tremble under it. It will come to much better terms with anyone who stands up to it: we must set ourselves against it and brace ourselves. By backing away and retreating, we call down on ourselves and draw on the ruin that threatens us. As the body is steadier under a charge when it is stiffened, so is the soul.

1.14.15 Mais venons aux exemples, qui sont proprement du gibier des gens foibles de reins, comme moy: où nous trouuerons qu'il va de la douleur, comme des pierres qui prennent couleur, ou plus haute, ou plus morne, selon la feuille où lon les couche, et qu'elle ne tient qu'autant de place en nous, que nous luy en faisons. Tantum doluerunt, quantum doloribus se inseruerunt. Nous sentons plus vn coup de rasoir du Chirurgien, que dix coups d'espee en la chaleur du combat. Les douleurs de l'enfantement, par les Medecins, et par Dieu mesme estimees grandes, et que nous passons auec tant de ceremonies, il y a des nations entieres, qui n'en font nul compte.

But let us come to examples, which are properly the game of weak-backed people like me. There we shall find that pain is like gems, which take on a brighter or duller color according to the foil they are set on, and that it takes up only as much room in us as we make for it. They suffered as much as they gave themselves up to suffering. We feel a stroke of the surgeon's razor more than ten sword blows in the heat of battle. The pains of childbirth, judged great by doctors and by God himself, and which we go through with so many ceremonies—there are whole nations that make nothing of them.[19]

I have seen some of them swallow sand and ashes, and deliberately set about ruining their stomachs to acquire a pale complexion. To get a body slim in the Spanish fashion, what torture do they not endure, braced and strapped, with great notches cut into their sides down to the living flesh? Yes, sometimes even to the point of dying of it.[24]

1.14.18 Il est ordinaire à beaucoup de nations de nostre temps, de se blesser à escient, pour donner foy à leur parole: et nostre Roy en recite des notables exemples, de ce qu'il en a veu en Poloigne, et en l'endroit de luy mesme. Mais outre ce que ie sçay en auoir esté imité en France par aucuns, quand ie veins de ces fameux Estats de Blois, i'auois veu peu auparauant vne fille en Picardie, pour tesmoigner l'ardeur de ses promesses, et aussi sa constance, se donner du poinçon, qu'elle portoit en son poil, quatre ou cinq bons coups dans le bras, qui luy faisoient craquetter la peau, et la saignoient bien en bon escient.

It is common among many nations of our time to wound themselves deliberately to make their word believed. Our King tells of some remarkable examples of this that he saw in Poland, some of them even done in his honor. But besides the fact that I know some people in France have imitated it, when I came from those famous Estates of Blois I had seen, shortly before, a girl in Picardy who, to show the ardor of her promises and her constancy as well, gave herself four or five good stabs in the arm with the bodkin she wore in her hair. They made her skin crackle and bled her in good earnest.[25]

	feu sur la playe, et l'y tiennent vn temps incroyable, pour arrester le sang, et former la cicatrice. Gents qui l'ont veu, l'ont escrit, et me l'ont iuré. Mais pour dix aspres, il se trouue tous les iours entre eux qui se donnera vne bien profonde taillade dans le bras, ou dans les cuisses. Ie suis bien ayse que les tesmoins nous sont plus à main, où nous en auons plus affaire. Car la chrestienté nous en fournit à suffisance. Et apres l'exemple de nostre sainct guide, il y en a eu force, qui par deuotion ont voulu porter la croix.	immediately put fire to the wound and hold it there an incredibly long time, to stop the blood and form the scar. People who have seen it have written it down and sworn it to me. But for ten aspers you will find among them, any day, someone who will give himself a very deep slash in the arm or the thighs. I am very glad that the witnesses are closer at hand where we have most need of them, for Christendom supplies us with plenty. And after the example of our holy guide, there have been many who out of devotion chose to bear the cross.[26]
	Nous apprenons par tesmoing tres-digne de foy, que le Roy S. Loys porta la here iusques à ce que sur sa vieillesse, son confesseur l'en dispensa; et que tous les Vendredis, il se faisoit battre les espaules par son prestre, de cinq chainettes de fer, que pour cet effet on portoit emmy ses besongnes de nuict.	We learn from a most trustworthy witness that King Saint Louis wore a hair shirt until, in his old age, his confessor released him from it; and that every Friday he had his shoulders beaten by his priest with five small iron chains, which were carried for that purpose among his nightclothes.[27]
1.14.19	Guillaume nostre dernier Duc de Guyenne, pere de cette Alienor, qui transmit ce Duché aux maisons de France et d'Angleterre, porta les dix ou douze derniers ans de sa vie, continuellement vn corps de cuirasse, sous vn habit de religieux, par penitence. Foulques Comte d'Anjou alla iusques en Ierusalem, pour là se faire foëter à deux de ses valets, la corde au col, deuant le sepulchre de nostre Seigneur. Mais ne voit-on encore tous les iours au Vendredy S. en diuers lieux vn grand nombre d'hommes et femmes se battre iusques à se déchirer la chair et percer iusques aux os? Cela ay-ie veu souuent et sans enchantement.	William, our last Duke of Guyenne, father of that Eleanor who passed the duchy on to the houses of France and England, wore a breastplate continually for the last ten or twelve years of his life, under a monk's habit, as a penance. Fulk, Count of Anjou, went all the way to Jerusalem to have himself whipped there by two of his servants, with a rope around his neck, before the tomb of our Lord. But do we not still see nowadays, on Good Friday, in various places, a great number of men and women beating themselves until they tear their flesh and lay it open to the bone? That I have often seen, and it was no illusion.[28]
	Et disoit-on, car ils vont masquez, qu'il y en auoit, qui pour de l'argent entreprenoient en cela de garantir la religion d'autruy; par vn mespris de la douleur, d'autant plus grand, que plus peuuent les éguillons de la deuotion, que de l'auarice.	And it was said—for they go masked—that there were some who for money undertook in this way to make good other people's religion, with a contempt for pain all the greater in that the spurs of devotion are more powerful than those of avarice.
1.14.20	Q. Maximus enterra son fils Consulaire: M. Cato le sien Preteur designé: et L. Paulus les siens deux en peu de iours, d'vn visage rassis, et ne portant nul tesmoignage de deuil. singuliere du ciel. Ie n'ensuis pas ces humeurs monstrueuses: mais i'en ay perdu en nourrice, deux ou trois, sinon sans regret, au moins sans fascherie. Si n'est-il guere accident, qui touche plus au vif les hommes.

suppose, he very nearly took it as a singular favor and kindness from heaven. I do not follow these monstrous temperaments; but I have lost two or three children at nurse, if not without regret, at least without great distress. And yet there is hardly any misfortune that touches men more to the quick.[29]

Ie voy assez d'autres communes occasions d'affliction, qu'à peine sentiroy-ie, si elles me venoyent. Et en ay mesprisé quand elles me sont venues, de celles ausquelles le monde donne vne si atroce figure, que ie n'oserois m'en vanter au peuple sans rougir. Ex quo intelligitur, non in natura, sed in opinione esse ægritudinem.

I see plenty of other common occasions of affliction that I would hardly feel if they came to me. And some of those to which the world gives so atrocious a face I have scorned when they did come to me—so much so that I would not dare boast of it in public without blushing. From which it is understood that distress lies not in nature but in opinion.[30]

1.14.21 L'opinion est vne puissante partie, hardie, et sans mesure. Qui rechercha iamais de telle faim la seurté et le repos, qu'Alexandre et Cæsar ont faict l'inquietude et les difficultez? Terez le pere de Sitalcez souloit dire que quand il ne faisoit point la guerre, il luy estoit aduis qu'il n'y auoit point difference entre luy et son pallefrenier. Caton Consul, pour s'asseurer d'aucunes villes en Espaigne, ayant seulement interdict aux habitants d'icelles, de porter les armes: grand nombre se tuerent: Ferox gens, nullam vitam rati sine armis esse.

Opinion is a powerful party, bold and without measure. Who ever sought security and rest as hungrily as Alexander and Caesar sought restlessness and difficulties? Teres, the father of Sitalces, used to say that when he was not making war, he felt there was no difference between himself and his groom. When Cato, as consul, to make sure of certain towns in Spain, had merely forbidden their inhabitants to bear arms, a great number of them killed themselves: A fierce people, who thought there was no life without arms.[31]

Combien en sçauons nous qui ont fuy la douceur d'vne vie tranquille, en leurs maisons parmy leurs cognoissans, pour suiure l'horreur des desers inhabitables; et qui se sont iettez à l'abiection, vilité, et mespris du monde, et s'y sont pleuz iusques à l'affectation?

How many do we know who have fled the sweetness of a quiet life in their homes, among people they know, to pursue the horror of uninhabitable deserts; who have thrown themselves into abasement, lowliness and the contempt of the world, and have delighted in it to the point of affectation?

Le Cardinal Borrome, qui mourut dernierement à Milan, au milieu de la desbauche, à quoy le conuioyt et sa noblesse, et ses grandes richesses, et l'air de l'Italie, et sa ieunesse, se maintint en vne forme de vie si austere, que la mesme robbe qui luy seruoit en esté, luy seruoit en hyuer: n'auoit pour son coucher que la paille: et les heures qui luy restoyent des occupations de sa charge, il les passoit estudiant continuellement, planté sur ses genoux, ayant vn peu d'eau et de pain à costé de son liure: qui estoit toute la prouision de ses repas, et tout le temps qu'il y employoit.

Cardinal Borromeo, who died recently in Milan, in the midst of the debauchery to which his noble birth, his great wealth, the air of Italy and his youth all invited him, kept to a way of life so austere that the same robe that served him in summer served him in winter. He had only straw for his bed; and the hours left over from the duties of his office he spent in continual study, planted on his knees, with a little water and bread beside his book—which was the whole provision for his meals and all the time he spent on them.[32]

	I'en sçay qui à leur escient ont tiré et proffit et auancement du cocuage, dequoy le seul nom effraye tant de gens.	I know some who have knowingly drawn both profit and advancement from cuckoldry, whose very name frightens so many people.
1.14.23	Si la veuë n'est le plus necessaire de nos sens, il est au moins le plus plaisant: mais les plus plaisans et vtiles de noz membres, semblent estre ceux qui seruent à nous engendrer: toutesfois assez de gens les ont pris en hayne mortelle, pour cella seulement, qu'ils estoient trop aymables; et les ont reiettez à cause de leur prix. Autant en opina des yeux, celuy qui se les creua.	If sight is not the most necessary of our senses, it is at least the most pleasant; and the most pleasant and useful of our members seem to be those that serve to beget us. Yet a good many people have conceived a mortal hatred for them for the sole reason that they were too lovable, and have rejected them because of their value. The man who put out his own eyes held the same opinion of eyes.[33]
1.14.24	La plus commune et plus saine part des hommes, tient à grand heur l'abondance des enfants: moy et quelques autres, à pareil heur le defaut. Et quand on demande à Thales pourquoy il ne se marie point: il respond, qu'il n'ayme point à laisser lignée de soy.	The commonest and soundest part of mankind holds an abundance of children to be a great happiness; I and a few others hold the lack of them to be an equal happiness. And when Thales is asked why he does not marry, he answers that he does not like to leave any offspring of himself.
1.14.25	Que nostre opinion donne prix aux choses; il se void par celles en grand nombre, ausquelles nous ne regardons pas seulement, pour les estimer: ains à nous. Et ne considerons ny leurs qualitez, ny leurs vtilitez, mais seulement nostre coust à les recouurer: comme si c'estoit quelque piece de leur substance: et appellons valeur en elles, non ce qu'elles apportent, mais ce que nous y apportons. Sur quoy ie m'aduise, que nous sommes grands mesnagers de nostre mise. Selon qu'elle poise, elle sert, de ce mesmes qu'elle poise. Nostre opinion ne la laisse iamais courir à faux fret. L'achat donne tiltre au diamant, et la difficulté à la vertu, et la douleur à la deuotion, et l'aspreté à la medecine.	That our opinion gives things their value is seen from the great many things which, in appraising them, we do not even look at, but look at ourselves instead. We consider neither their qualities nor their usefulness, but only what it cost us to get them, as if that were some part of their substance; and we call value in them not what they bring but what we bring to them. On which I note that we are great managers of our outlay. It serves according to what it weighs, by the very fact that it weighs. Our opinion never lets it run on a voyage for nothing. The purchase gives the diamond its title, difficulty gives it to virtue, pain to devotion, and bitterness to medicine.
	Tel pour arriuer à la pauureté ietta ses escus en cette mesme mer, que tant d'autres fouillent de toutes pars pour y pescher des richesses. Epicurus dit que l'estre riche n'est pas soulagement, mais changement d'affaires. De vray, ce n'est pas la disette, c'est plustost l'abondance qui produict l'auarice. Ie veux dire mon experience autour de ce subiect.	One man, to attain poverty, threw his crowns into the very sea that so many others ransack on every side to fish up riches. Epicurus says that being rich is not a relief but a change of business. Indeed, it is not want but rather abundance that produces avarice. I want to tell my own experience on this subject.[34]

Il ne m'est oncques auenu de trouuer la bource de mes amis close: m'estant enioint au delà de toute autre necessité, la necessité de ne faillir au terme que i'auoy prins à m'acquiter, lequel ils m'ont mille fois alongé, voyant l'effort que ie me faisoy pour leur satisfaire: en maniere que i'en rendoy vne loyauté mesnagere, et aucunement piperesse. Aussi qu'il y a quelque contentement qui me chatouille à faire vne action iuste, et contenter autruy.

I'excepte les payements où il faut venir à marchander et conter: car si ie ne trouue à qui en commettre la charge, ie les esloigne honteusement et iniurieusement tant que ie puis, de peur de cette altercation, à laquelle et mon humeur et ma forme de parler est du tout incompatible. Il n'est rien que ie haysse comme à marchander: c'est vn pur commerce de trichoterie et d'impudence. Apres vne heure de debat et de barguignage, l'vn et l'autre abandonne sa parolle et ses sermens pour cinq sous d'amendement. Et si empruntons auec desaduantage. Car n'ayant point le cœur de requerir en presence, i'en renuoyois le hazard sur le papier, qui ne fait guere d'effort, et qui preste grandement la main au refuser.

Ie me remettois de la conduite de mon besoing plus gayement aux astres, et plus librement que ie n'ay faict depuis à ma prouidence et à mon sens. La plus part des mesnagers estiment horrible de viure ainsin en incertitude; et ne s'aduisent pas, premierement, que la plus part du monde vit ainsi. nearly twenty years, I spent with no means but chance ones, depending on other people's arrangements and help, without fixed status or settled allowance. My spending was all the more cheerful and carefree because it rested entirely on the rashness of Fortune. I was never better off.

It never happened to me to find my friends' purses closed, since I had laid on myself, above every other necessity, the necessity of not missing the date I had set for repaying. They extended it for me a thousand times, seeing the effort I made to satisfy them; so that I paid them back with a thrifty and somewhat crafty loyalty. I naturally feel a certain pleasure in paying, as if I were unloading an irksome weight from my shoulders, and that image of servitude. Also there is a certain satisfaction that tickles me in doing a just action and satisfying someone else.

I except payments where one has to get down to bargaining and counting: for if I find no one to whom I can hand over the task, I put them off as long as I can, shamefully and unfairly, for fear of that wrangling, with which both my temperament and my way of speaking are utterly incompatible. There is nothing I hate so much as haggling: it is sheer dealing in cheating and impudence. After an hour of debate and chaffering, both parties abandon their word and their oaths for five sous' improvement. And I borrowed at a disadvantage too. For having no heart to ask face to face, I left the chance of it to paper, which makes hardly any effort and lends a great hand to refusing.

I left the management of my needs to the stars, more cheerfully and freely than I have since left it to my own foresight and sense. Most good managers think it horrible to live in such uncertainty; and they do not consider, first, that most of the world lives that way. How many decent men have thrown all their sure possessions to the winds, and do so every day, to chase the breeze of the favor of kings and of Fortune? Caesar went a million in gold into debt beyond what he was worth, to become Caesar. And how many merchants begin their trade by selling their farm, which they send off to the Indies!

passent commodément, attendans tous les iours de la liberalité du Ciel, ce qu'il faut à eux disner.

1.14.27 Secondement, ils ne s'aduisent pas, que cette certitude, sur laquelle ils se fondent, n'est guere moins incertaine et hazardeuse que le hazard mesme. Ie voy d'aussi pres la misere au delà de deux mille escus de rente, que si elle estoit tout contre moy.

Car outre ce que le sort a dequoy ouurir cent breches à la pauureté au trauers de nos richesses, n'y ayant souuent nul moyen entre la supreme et infime fortune, Fortuna vitrea est: tum, quum splendet, frangitur; et enuoyer cul sur pointe toutes nos deffences et leuées; ie trouue que par diuerses causes, l'indigence se voit autant ordinairement logée chez ceux qui ont des biens, que chez ceux qui n'en ont point: et qu'à l'auanture est elle aucunement moins incommode, quand elle est seule, que quand elle se rencontre en compagnie des richesses. Elles viennent plus de l'ordre, que de la recepte: Faber est suæ quisque fortunæ. Et me semble plus miserable vn riche malaisé, necessiteux, affaireux, que celuy qui est simplement pauure.

In diuitiis inopes, quod genus egestatis grauissimum est. Les plus grands Princes et plus riches, sont par pauureté et disette poussez ordinairement à l'extreme necessité. Car en est-il de plus extreme, que d'en deuenir tyrans, et iniustes vsurpateurs des biens de leurs subiets?

1.14.28 Ma seconde forme, ç'a esté d'auoir de l'argent. A quoy m'estant prins, i'en fis bien tost des reserues notables selon ma condition: n'estimant pas que ce fust auoir, sinon autant qu'on possede outre sa despence ordinaire: ny qu'on se puisse fier du bien, qui est encore en esperance de recepte, pour claire qu'elle soit. Car quoy, disoy-ie, si i'estois surpris d'vn tel, ou d'vn tel accident? Et à la suitte de ces vaines et vitieuses imaginations, i'allois faisant l'ingenieux à prouuoir par cette superflue reserue à tous inconueniens. Et sçauois encore respondre à celuy qui m'alleguoit que le nombre des inconueniens estoit trop infiny; que si ce n'estoit à tous, c'estoit à aucuns et plusieurs. Cela ne se passoit pas sans penible sollicitude.

religious communities that get along comfortably, expecting every day from the liberality of heaven what they need for their dinner.[35]

Secondly, they do not consider that this certainty on which they rely is hardly less uncertain and hazardous than hazard itself. I see poverty as close to me beyond an income of two thousand crowns as if it were right next to me.

For besides the fact that fate has the means to open a hundred breaches for poverty through our riches—there often being no middle ground between the highest and the lowest fortune: Fortune is glass: just when it shines, it breaks—and to send all our defenses and ramparts tumbling head over heels, I find that for various reasons want is seen lodged as commonly with those who have property as with those who have none; and that it is perhaps somewhat less troublesome when it is alone than when it meets with riches for company. Riches come more from good order than from income: Every man is the maker of his own fortune. And a rich man who is hard up, needy and harried by business seems to me more wretched than one who is simply poor.[36]

Needy in the midst of riches, which is the most grievous kind of poverty. The greatest and richest princes are usually driven by poverty and want to extreme necessity. For is there any more extreme than to become tyrants because of it, and unjust usurpers of their subjects' property?[37]

My second form was having money. Having taken to it, I soon laid up reserves that were considerable for my station, not thinking that one has anything except what one possesses beyond one's ordinary expenses, nor that one can rely on wealth that is still only hoped-for income, however certain it may look. For what, I said, if I were caught by this accident or that? And in pursuit of these vain and vicious imaginings, I went about playing the clever man, providing against every mishap with this superfluous reserve. And I even knew how to answer anyone who argued that the number of mishaps was too infinite: if it was not

I'en faisoy vn secret: et moy, qui ose tant dire de moy, ne parloy de mon argent, qu'en mensonge: comme font les autres, qui s'appauurissent riches, s'enrichissent pauures: et dispensent leur conscience de tesmoigner iamais sincerement de ce qu'ils ont. Ridicule et honteuse prudence. Allois-ie en voyage? il ne me sembloit estre iamais suffisamment pourueu: et plus ie m'estois chargé de monnoye, plus aussi ie m'estois chargé de crainte: tantost de la seurté des chemins, tantost de la fidelité de ceux qui conduisoyent mon bagage: duquel, comme d'autres que ie cognois, ie ne m'asseurois iamais assez, si ie ne l'auois deuant mes yeux. Laissoy-ie ma boyte chez moy? combien de soupçons et pensements espineux, et qui pis est incommunicables? I'auois tousiours l'esprit de ce costé.

Tout compté, il y a plus de peine à garder l'argent qu'à l'acquerir. Si ie n'en faisois du tout tant que i'en dis, au moins il me coustoit à m'empescher de le faire. De commodité, i'en tirois peu ou rien. Pour auoir plus de moyen de despense, elle ne m'en poisoit pas moins. Car, comme disoit Bion, autant se fache le cheuelu comme le chauue, qu'on luy arrache le poil. Et depuis que vous estes accoustumé, et auez planté vostre fantasie sur certain monceau, il n'est plus à vostre seruice: vous n'oseriez l'escorner. C'est vn bastiment qui, comme il vous semble, croullera tout, si vous y touchez: il faut que la necessité vous prenne à la gorge pour l'entamer.

Et au parauant i'engageois mes hardes, et vendois vn cheual, auec bien moins de contrainte et moins enuis, que lors ie ne faisois bresche à cette bource fauorie, que ie tenois à part. Mais le danger estoit, que mal aysément peut-on establir bornes certaines à ce desir (elles sont difficiles à trouuer, és choses qu'on croit bonnes) et arrester vn poinct à l'espargne: on va tousiours grossissant cet amas, et l'augmentant d'vn nombre à autre, iusques à se priuer vilainement de la iouyssance de ses propres biens: et l'establir toute en la garde, et n'en vser point. Selon cette espece d'vsage, ce sont les plus riches gents du monde, ceux qui ont charge de la garde des portes et murs d'vne bonne ville.

against all, it was against some, and many. This did not go on without painful anxiety.

I made a secret of it; and I, who dare say so much about myself, never spoke of my money except with lies, like others who make themselves out poor when they are rich and rich when they are poor, and excuse their conscience from ever testifying honestly about what they have. A ridiculous and shameful prudence. Was I going on a journey? I never seemed to myself sufficiently provided; and the more I had loaded myself with money, the more I had loaded myself with fear: now about the safety of the roads, now about the trustworthiness of those in charge of my baggage, which, like some others I know, I never felt sure enough of unless I had it before my eyes. Did I leave my strongbox at home? How many suspicions and thorny thoughts —and, what is worse, ones I could tell no one! My mind was always turned that way.

All things considered, there is more trouble in keeping money than in getting it. If I did not do quite all I say, at least it cost me something to keep myself from doing it. Of comfort I drew little or none from it. Having more means of spending, I found spending weighed on me no less. For, as Bion said, the hairy man is as angry as the bald one at having his hair pulled out. And once you have grown used to it and have set your fancy on a certain heap, it is no longer at your service: you would not dare make a dent in it. It is a building that, as it seems to you, will all come crashing down if you touch it; necessity has to take you by the throat before you will cut into it.

And before then I would pawn my clothes and sell a horse with much less constraint and reluctance than I then felt in making a breach in that favorite purse I kept apart. But the danger was that one can hardly set fixed limits to this desire (they are hard to find in things we believe good) and fix a stopping point to saving. One goes on fattening this hoard and swelling it from one sum to another, until one meanly deprives oneself of the enjoyment of one's own goods, makes it consist entirely in guarding them, and never uses them at all. By this sort of use, the richest people in the world are the ones charged with guarding the gates and walls of a good town.

Every moneyed man is avaricious, to my mind. Plato ranks bodily or human goods thus: health, beauté, la force, la richesse: Et la richesse, dit-il, n'est pas aueugle, mais tresclair-voyante, quand elle est illuminée par la prudence. Dionysius le fils, eut bonne grace. On l'aduertit que l'vn de ses Syracusains auoit caché dans terre vn thresor; il luy manda de le luy apporter; ce qu'il fit, s'en reseruant à la desrobbée quelque partie; auec laquelle il s'en alla en vne autre ville, où ayant perdu cet appetit de thesaurizer, il se mit à viure plus liberalement. Ce qu'entendant Dionysius, luy fit rendre le demeurant de son thresor; disant que puis qu'il auoit appris à en sçauoir vser, il le luy rendoit volontiers.

1.14.29 Ie fus quelques années en ce point. Ie ne sçay quel bon dæmon m'en ietta hors tres-vtilement, comme le Syracusain; et m'enuoya toute cette conserue à l'abandon: le plaisir de certain voyage de grande despence, ayant mis au pied cette sotte imagination. Par où ie suis retombé à vne tierce sorte de vie, ie dis ce que i'en sens, certes plus plaisante beaucoup et plus reglée. C'est que ie fais courir ma despence quand et quand ma recepte; tantost l'vne deuance, tantost l'autre: mais c'est de peu qu'elles s'abandonnent. Ie vis du iour à la iournée, et me contente d'auoir dequoy suffire aux besoings presens et ordinaires: aux extraordinaires toutes les prouisions du monde n'y sçauroyent suffire.

Et est follie de s'attendre que fortune elle mesmes nous arme iamais suffisamment contre soy. C'est de noz armes qu'il la faut combattre. Les fortuites nous trahiront au bon du faict. Si i'amasse, ce n'est que pour l'esperance de quelque voisine emploite; et non pour acheter des terres, dequoy ie n'ay que faire, mais pour acheter du plaisir. Non esse cupidum, pecunia est; non esse emacem, vectigal est. Ie n'ay ny guere peur que bien me faille, ny nul desir qu'il m'augmente.

Diuitiarum fructus est in copia; copiam declarat satietas. Et me gratifie singulierement que cette correction me soit arriuée en vn aage naturellement enclin à l'auarice, et que ie me vois desfaict de cette folie si commune aux vieux, et la plus ridicule de toutes les humaines folies.

beauty, strength, wealth. And wealth, he says, is not blind but very clear-sighted when it is lit by prudence. Dionysius the Younger behaved handsomely. He was told that one of his Syracusans had hidden a treasure in the ground; he sent word to him to bring it to him. The man did so, secretly keeping back part of it, and with that he went off to another city, where, having lost this appetite for hoarding, he began to live more liberally. Hearing of this, Dionysius had the rest of his treasure given back to him, saying that since he had learned how to use it, he gladly returned it to him.[38]

I was in this state for some years. Some good daemon or other threw me out of it, very usefully, like the Syracusan, and scattered all that hoard to the winds: the pleasure of a certain very expensive journey trampled that foolish notion underfoot. By which I have fallen back into a third kind of life —I say what I feel about it—certainly much more pleasant and better ordered. It is that I make my spending keep pace with my income; sometimes one gets ahead, sometimes the other, but they never drift far apart. I live from day to day, and am content to have enough for present and ordinary needs; for extraordinary ones, all the provisions in the world could not suffice.[39]

And it is folly to expect that Fortune herself will ever arm us sufficiently against herself. It is with our own arms that we must fight her. Chance ones will betray us at the crucial moment. If I save, it is only in hope of spending it on something soon; and not to buy land, which I have no use for, but to buy pleasure. Not to be covetous is money; not to be fond of buying is an income. I have hardly any fear that my means will fail me, and no desire for them to grow.[40]

The fruit of riches lies in plenty; and plenty is shown by having enough. And I am singularly pleased that this correction came to me at an age naturally inclined to avarice, and that I find myself rid of this folly so common among the old, and the most ridiculous of all human follies.

Pheraulas had passed through both fortunes and found that an increase in wealth was no increase

So he resolved to make happy a poor young man, his faithful friend, who was hungering after riches. He made him a present of all his own, which were great and excessive, including those he was accumulating every day through the liberality of Cyrus, his good master, and through war—on condition that the young man take on the charge of keeping and feeding him decently, as his guest and friend. They lived thus very happily ever after, both equally content with the change in their condition.[41]

1.14.31 Voyla vn tour que i'imiterois de grand courage. Et louë grandement la fortune d'vn vieil Prelat, que ie voy s'estre si purement demis de sa bourse, et de sa recepte, et de sa mise, tantost à vn seruiteur choisi, tantost à vn autre, qu'il a coulé vn long espace d'années, autant ignorant cette sorte d'affaires de son mesnage, comme vn estranger. La fiance de la bonté d'autruy, est un non leger tesmoignage de la bonté propre: partant la fauorise Dieu volontiers. Et pour son regard, ie ne voy point d'ordre de maison, ny plus dignement ny plus constamment conduit que le sien.

Heureux, qui ait reglé à si iuste mesure son besoin, que ses richesses y puissent suffire sans son soing et empeschement: et sans que leur dispensation ou assemblage, interrompe d'autres occupations, qu'il suit, plus conuenables, plus tranquilles, et selon son cœur.

There is a trick I would gladly imitate. And I greatly praise the good fortune of an old prelate whom I see to have handed over his purse, his income and his spending so completely—now to one chosen servant, now to another—that he has let a long stretch of years slip by as ignorant of this side of his household affairs as a stranger. Trust in another's goodness is no slight testimony to one's own goodness; so God readily favors it. And as for him, I see no household run more worthily or more steadily than his.

Happy the man who has regulated his needs to so exact a measure that his riches can meet them without his care and trouble, and without their spending or gathering interrupting other occupations that he pursues, more fitting, more tranquil, and more after his own heart.

1.14.32 L'aisance donc et l'indigence despendent de l'opinion d'vn chacun, et non plus la richesse, que la gloire, que la santé, n'ont qu'autant de beauté et de plaisir, que leur en preste celuy qui les possede. Chascun est bien ou mal, selon qu'il s'en trouue. Non de qui on le croid, mais qui le croid de soy, est content: et en cella seul la creance se donne essence et verité. La fortune ne nous fait ny bien ny mal: elle nous en offre seulement la matiere et la semence: laquelle nostre ame, plus puissante qu'elle, tourne et applique comme il luy plaist: seule cause et maistresse de sa condition heureuse ou malheureuse.

Ease and want, then, depend on each man's opinion; and riches, no more than glory or health, have only as much beauty and pleasure as their possessor lends them. Each man is well or ill off according to how he finds himself. Not the man whom others believe content, but the man who believes it of himself, is content; and in this alone belief gives itself essence and truth. powerful than she, turns and applies as it pleases —the sole cause and mistress of its own happy or unhappy condition.

Les accessions externes prennent saueur et couleur de l'interne constitution: comme les accoustrements nous eschauffent non de leur chaleur, mais de la nostre, laquelle ils sont propres à couuer et nourrir: qui en abrieroit vn corps froid, il en tireroit mesme seruice pour la froideur? ainsi se conserue la neige et la glace. Certes tout en la maniere qu'à vn faineant l'estude sert de tourment, à vn yurongne l'abstinence du vin, la frugalité est supplice au luxurieux, et l'exercice gehenne à vn homme delicat et oisif: ainsin en est-il du reste. Les choses ne sont pas si douloureuses, ny difficiles d'elles mesmes: mais nostre foiblesse et lascheté les fait telles.

External additions take their flavor and color from the internal constitution, just as clothes warm us not with their own heat but with ours, which they are fit to brood over and nourish. If someone wrapped a cold body in them, would he not get the same service from them for keeping the cold? That is how snow and ice are preserved. Indeed, just as study is a torment to an idler and abstinence from wine to a drunkard, so frugality is torture to the sensualist and exercise to a soft and idle man; and so it is with the rest. Things are not so painful or difficult in themselves; it is our weakness and faintheartedness that make them so.

Pour iuger des choses grandes et haultes, il faut un' ame de mesme, autrement nous leur attribuons le vice, qui est le nostre. Vn auiron droit semble courbe en l'eau. Il n'importe pas seulement qu'on voye la chose, mais comment on la voye.

To judge great and lofty things, one needs a soul of the same kind; otherwise we attribute to them the vice that is ours. A straight oar looks bent in the water. It matters not only that we see the thing, but how we see it.

1.14.33 Or sus, pourquoy de tant de discours, qui persuadent diuersement les hommes de mespriser la mort, et de porter la douleur, n'en trouuons nous quelcun qui face pour nous? Et de tant d'especes d'imaginations qui l'ont persuadé à autruy, que chacun n'en applique il à soy vn le plus selon son humeur? S'il ne peut digerer la drogue forte et abstersiue, pour desraciner le mal, au moins qu'il la prenne lenitiue pour le soulager. Opinio est quædam effeminata ac leuis: nec in dolore magis, quàm eadem in voluptate: qua, quum liquescimus fluimusque mollitia, apis aculeum sine clamore ferre non possumus…

Come now: of so many arguments that persuade men in various ways to despise death and endure pain, why do we not find some one that works for us? And of so many kinds of notions that have persuaded others of it, why does each man not apply to himself the one that best suits his temperament? If he cannot digest the strong, purging drug that uproots the ill, let him at least take a soothing one to relieve it. There is a certain spineless and frivolous opinion, as much in pain as in pleasure; when we melt and flow with softness under its sway, we cannot bear a bee's sting without crying out…[42]

Totum in eo est, vt tibi imperes. Au demeurant on n'eschappe pas à la philosophie, pour faire valoir outre mesure l'aspreté des douleurs, et humaine foiblesse. Car on la contraint de se reietter à ces inuincibles repliques: S'il est mauuais de viure en necessité, au moins de viure en necessité, il n'est aucune necessité. Nul n'est mal long temps qu'à sa faute. Qui n'a le cœur de souffrir ny la mort ny la vie; qui ne veut ny resister ni fuir, que luy feroit-on?

The whole matter lies in commanding yourself. For the rest, we do not escape philosophy by exaggerating beyond measure the harshness of pain and human weakness. For we force her to fall back on these unanswerable replies: If it is bad to live in necessity, at least there is no necessity to live in necessity. No one is unhappy for long except by his own fault. He who has not the heart to endure either death or life, who will neither resist nor flee —what can be done for him?[43]

I.15 One Is Punished for Holding a Place Obstinately Without Reason

On est puny pour s'opiniastrer en vne place sans raison
Commanders who stubbornly defend an indefensible place are rightly punished, though judging what is defensible is risky.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.15.1	LA vaillance a ses limites, comme les autres vertus: lesquels franchis, on se trouue dans le train du vice: en maniere que par chez elle on se peut rendre à la temerité, obstination et folie, qui n'en sçait bien les bornes, malaisez en verité à choisir sur leurs confins. De cette consideration est nee la coustume que nous auons aux guerres, de punir, voire de mort, ceux qui s'opiniastrent à defendre vne place, qui par les regles militaires ne peut estre soustenue. Autrement soubs l'esperance de l'impunité il n'y auroit poullier qui n'arrestast vne armee.	Valor has its limits, like the other virtues; and once these are crossed, we find ourselves on the road of vice. So that through her territory one can end up in rashness, obstinacy and folly, if one does not know her boundaries well—and they are truly hard to make out where they meet. From this consideration was born the custom we have in war of punishing, even with death, those who obstinately defend a place that by the rules of war cannot be held. Otherwise, in the hope of impunity, there would be no henhouse that would not hold up an army.
1.15.2	Monsieur le Connestable de Mommorency au siege de Pauie, ayant esté commis pour passer le Tesin, et se loger aux fauxbourgs S. Antoine, estant empesché d'vne tour au bout du pont, qui s'opiniastra iusques à se faire batre, feit pendre tout ce qui estoit dedans: et encore depuis accompagnant Monsieur le Dauphin au voyage delà les monts, ayant prins par force le Chasteau de Villane, et tout ce qui estoit dedans ayant esté mis en pieces par la furie des soldats, horsmis le Capitaine et l'enseigne, il les fit pendre et estrangler pour cette mesme raison: comme fit aussi le Capitaine Martin du Bellay lors Gouuerneur de Turin, en cette mesme contree, le Capitaine de S.	The Constable de Montmorency, at the siege of Pavia, had been ordered to cross the Ticino and take up quarters in the suburb of Saint-Antoine. Being held up by a tower at the end of the bridge, which held out obstinately until it had to be battered, he had everyone inside hanged. And again later, accompanying the Dauphin on the expedition beyond the mountains, having taken the castle of Villane by storm, and everyone inside having been cut to pieces by the fury of the soldiers except the captain and the ensign, he had those two hanged and strangled for this same reason. So too did Captain Martin du Bellay, then governor of Turin, in that same region, with the captain of Saint-[1]

	Et en aduient par ces mesmes termes, que tels ont si grande opinion d'eux et de leurs moyens, que ne leur semblant raisonnable qu'il y ait rien digne de leur faire teste, ilz passent le cousteau par tout où ils trouuent resistance, autant que fortune leur dure: comme il se voit par les formes de sommation et deffi, que les Princes d'Orient et leurs successeurs, qui sont encores, ont en vsage, fiere, hautaine et pleine d'vn commandement barbaresque. Et au quartier par où les Portugaiz escornerent les Indes, ils trouuerent des estats auec cette loy vniuerselle et inuiolable, que tout ennemy vaincu par le Roy en presence, ou par son Lieutenant est hors de composition de rançon et de mercy.	And by these same terms it comes about that some have so high an opinion of themselves and their means that, since it seems unreasonable to them that anything should be worthy of standing up to them, they put to the knife everyone wherever they meet resistance, for as long as their fortune lasts. This can be seen in the forms of summons and challenge used by the princes of the East and their successors who still reign—proud, haughty and full of barbarous imperiousness. And in the region where the Portuguese broke into the Indies, they found states with this universal and inviolable law: that any enemy defeated by the King in person, or by his lieutenant, is beyond the reach of ransom or mercy.
1.15.4	Ainsi sur tout il se faut garder qui peut, de tomber entre les mains d'vn Iuge ennemy, victorieux et armé.	So above all, one must beware, if one can, of falling into the hands of a judge who is an enemy, victorious and armed.

I.16 Of the Punishment of Cowardice

De la punition de la couardise

Faults of weakness differ from faults of malice, so cowardice is better punished with shame than with death.

FRENCH

1.16.1 I'OVY autrefois tenir à vn Prince, et tresgrand Capitaine, que pour lascheté de cœur vn soldat ne pouuoit estre condamné à mort: luy estant à table fait recit du proces du Seigneur de Veruins, qui fut condamné à mort pour auoir rendu Bouloigne. A la verité c'est raison qu'on face grande difference entre les fautes qui viennent de nostre foiblesse, et celles qui viennent de nostre malice. Car en celles icy nous nous sommes bandez à nostre escient contre les regles de la raison, que nature a empreintes en nous: et en celles là, il semble que nous puissions appeller à garant cette mesme nature pour nous auoir laissé en telle imperfection et deffaillance.

De maniere que prou de gens ont pensé qu'on ne se pouuoit prendre à nous, que de ce que nous faisons contre nostre conscience: et sur cette regle est en partie fondee l'opinion de ceux qui condamnent les punitions capitales aux heretiques et mescreans: et celle qui establit qu'vn Aduocat et vn Iuge ne puissent estre tenuz de ce que par ignorance ils ont failly en leur charge.

1.16.2 Mais quant à la coüardise, il est certain que la plus commune façon est de la chastier par honte et ignominie. Et tient-on que cette regle a esté premierement mise en vsage par le legislateur Charondas: et qu'auant luy les loix de Grece punissoyent de mort ceux qui s'en estoyent fuis d'vne bataille: là où il ordonna seulement qu'ils fussent par trois iours assis emmy la place publicque, vestus de robe de femme: esperant encores s'en pouuoir seruir, leur ayant fait reuenir le courage par cette honte. Suffundere malis hominis sanguinem quàm effundere. Il semble aussi que les loix Romaines punissoyent anciennement de mort, ceux qui auoyent fuy.

Car Ammianus Marcellinus dit que l'Empereur Iulien condemna dix de ses soldats, qui auoyent tourné le dos à vne charge contre les Parthes, à estre degradez, et apres à

ENGLISH

I once heard a prince, and a very great general, maintain that a soldier could not be condemned to death for cowardice; this was at table, when he was told about the trial of the Seigneur de Vervins, who was condemned to death for having surrendered Boulogne. In truth it is right to make a great difference between the faults that come from our weakness and those that come from our malice. For in the latter we have deliberately set ourselves against the rules of reason that nature has imprinted in us; and in the former it seems we can call that same nature to vouch for us, for having left us in such imperfection and frailty.[1]

So that many people have thought we could be blamed only for what we do against our conscience. On this rule is founded in part the opinion of those who condemn capital punishment for heretics and unbelievers, and the opinion that an advocate or a judge cannot be held liable for having failed in his office through ignorance.

But as for cowardice, it is certain that the commonest way is to punish it with shame and disgrace. It is held that this rule was first put into practice by the lawgiver Charondas, and that before him the laws of Greece punished with death those who had fled from a battle; whereas he ordained only that they should sit for three days in the public square dressed in women's clothes, hoping still to make use of them once this shame had brought back their courage. To bring the blood to a man's cheeks rather than to shed it. It seems also that in ancient times the Roman laws punished with death those who had fled.[2]

For Ammianus Marcellinus says that the Emperor Julian condemned ten of his soldiers, who had turned their backs in a charge against the Parthi-

	souffrir mort, suyuant, dit-il, les loix anciennes. Toutesfois ailleurs pour vne pareille faute il en condemne d'autres, seulement à se tenir parmy les prisonniers sous l'enseigne du bagage. L'aspre chastiement du peuple Romain contre les soldats eschapez de Cannes, et en cette mesme guerre, contre ceux qui accompaignerent Cn. Fuluius en sa deffaitte, ne vint pas à la mort. Si est-il à craindre que la honte les desespere, et les rende non froids amis seulement, mais ennemis.	ans, to be cashiered and then put to death, following, he says, the ancient laws. Yet elsewhere, for a like fault, he condemns others merely to be kept among the prisoners under the baggage standard. The harsh punishment the Roman people inflicted on the soldiers who escaped from Cannae, and, in that same war, on those who had followed Gnaeus Fulvius in his defeat, did not go as far as death. Yet it is to be feared that shame may drive men to despair and make them not merely cold friends but enemies.[3]
1.16.3	Du temps de nos Peres le Seigneur de Franget, iadis Lieutenant de la compaignie de Monsieur le Mareschal de Chastillon, ayant par Monsieur le Mareschal de Chabannes esté mis Gouuerneur de Fontarabie au lieu de Monsieur du Lude, et l'ayant rendue aux Espagnols, fut condamné à estre degradé de noblesse, et tant luy que sa posterité declaré roturier, taillable et incapable de porter armes: et fut cette rude sentence executee à Lyon. Depuis souffrirent pareille punition tous les Gentils-hommes qui se trouuerent dans Guyse, lors que le Comte de Nansau y entra: et autres encore depuis.	In our fathers' time the Seigneur de Franget, formerly lieutenant of the company of the Marshal de Châtillon, was made governor of Fuenterrabía by the Marshal de Chabannes in place of Monsieur du Lude. Having surrendered it to the Spaniards, he was condemned to be stripped of his nobility, and both he and his descendants were declared commoners, liable to the taille and incapable of bearing arms; this harsh sentence was carried out at Lyon. Later, all the gentlemen who were in Guise when the Count of Nassau entered it suffered the same punishment, and others again since then.[4]
	Toutesfois quand il y auroit vne si grossiere et apparante ou ignorance ou couardise, qu'elle surpassast toutes les ordinaires, ce seroit raison de la prendre pour suffisante preuue de meschanceté et de malice, et de la chastier pour telle.	Yet if there were an ignorance or a cowardice so gross and obvious that it surpassed all ordinary ones, it would be right to take it as sufficient proof of wickedness and malice, and to punish it as such.

1.17.1 I'OBSERVE en mes voyages cette practique, pour apprendre tousiours quelque chose, par la communication d'autruy, qui est vne des plus belles escholes qui puisse estre, de ramener tousiours ceux, auec qui ie confere, aux propos des choses qu'ils sçauent le mieux. Basti al nocchiero ragionar de' venti,

Voyez combien Cesar se desploye largement à nous faire entendre ses inuentions à bastir ponts et engins: et combien au prix il va se serrant, où il parle des offices de sa profession, de sa vaillance, et conduite de sa milice. Ses exploicts le verifient assez Capitaine excellent: il se veut faire cognoistre excellent Ingenieur; qualité aucunement estrangere. Le vieil Dionysius estoit tres grand chef de guerre, comme il conuenoit à sa fortune: mais il se trauailloit à donner principale recommendation de soy, par la poësie: et si n'y sçauoit guere.

Vn homme de vacation iuridique, mené ces iours passez voir vne estude fournie de toutes sortes de liures de son mestier, et de tout autre mestier, n'y trouua nulle occasion de s'entretenir: mais il s'arresta à gloser rudement et magistralement vne barricade logee sur la vis de l'estude, que cent Capitaines et soldats recognoissent tous les iours, sans remerque et sans offense. Optat ephippia bos piger, optat arare caballus. Par ce train vous ne faictes iamais rien qui vaille. Ainsin, il faut trauailler de reietter tousiours l'architecte, le peintre, le cordonnier, et ainsi du reste chacun à son gibier.

In my travels I follow this practice, so as always to learn something from dealing with others (which is one of the finest schools there can be): I always bring the people I talk with back to the things they know best. Let the sailor be content to talk of winds, the ploughman of his bulls; and let the soldier count his wounds, the shepherd his flocks. For the opposite most often happens: each man would rather discourse on someone else's trade than his own, thinking it so much new reputation gained—witness the reproach Archidamus made to Periander, that he was giving up the glory of a good physician to acquire that of a bad poet.[1]

See how expansively Caesar spreads himself to make us understand his inventions for building bridges and engines, and how tight-lipped he becomes by comparison when he speaks of the duties of his profession, his valor and the conduct of his army. His exploits prove him an excellent general well enough; he wants to be known as an excellent engineer, a quality somewhat foreign to him. The elder Dionysius was a very great war leader, as befitted his fortune; but he labored to make poetry his chief claim to esteem—and he knew hardly anything about it.

A man of the legal profession, taken the other day to see a study furnished with all sorts of books on his own profession and every other, found nothing there to occupy him; but he stopped to criticize, roughly and magisterially, a barricade set up on the spiral staircase of the study, which a hundred captains and soldiers look over every day without remark or offense. The lazy ox longs for a saddle; the nag longs to plough. Going this way, you will never do anything worthwhile. So we must always work to send the architect, the painter, the cobbler, and the rest, each back to his own game.[2]

1.17.2 Et à ce propos, à la lecture des histoires, qui est le subiet de toutes gens, i'ay accoustumé de considerer qui en sont les escriuains: si ce sont personnes, qui ne facent autre profession que de lettres, i'en apren principalement le stile et le langage: si ce sont Medecins, ie les croy plus volontiers en ce qu'ils nous disent de la temperature de l'air, de la santé et complexion des Princes, des blessures et maladies: si Iurisconsultes, il en faut prendre les controuerses des droicts, les loix, l'establissement des polices, et choses pareilles: si Theologiens, les affaires de l'Eglise, censures Ecclesiastiques, dispences et mariages: si courtisans, les meurs et les cerimonies: si gens de guerre, ce qui est de leur charge, et principalement les deductions des exploits où ils se sont trouuez en personne: si Ambassadeurs, les menees, intelligences, et praticques, et maniere de les conduire.

And on this subject, when reading histories, which is everyone's business, I am in the habit of considering who their writers are. If they are people who profess nothing but letters, I learn chiefly their style and language from them. If physicians, I believe them more readily in what they tell us of the temperature of the air, the health and constitution of princes, wounds and diseases. If jurists, we should take from them disputes about rights, laws, the establishment of governments, and the like. If theologians, the affairs of the Church, ecclesiastical censures, dispensations and marriages. If courtiers, manners and ceremonies. If soldiers, what belongs to their charge, and chiefly their accounts of the exploits in which they took part in person. If ambassadors, intrigues, secret understandings and negotiations, and how to conduct them.

1.17.3 A cette cause, ce que i'eusse passé à vn autre, sans m'y arrester, ie l'ay poisé et remarqué en l'histoire du Seigneur de Langey, tres entendu en telles choses. C'est qu'apres auoir conté ces belles remonstrances de l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme, faictes au consistoire à Rome, present l'Euesque de Macon, et le Seigneur du Velly nos Ambassadeurs, où il auoit meslé plusieurs parolles outrageuses contre nous; et entre autres, que si ses Capitaines et soldats n'estoient d'autre fidelité et suffisance en l'art militaire, que ceux du Roy, tout sur l'heure il s'attacheroit la corde au col, pour luy aller demander misericorde.

For this reason, what I would have passed over in another writer without pausing, I have weighed and noted in the history of the Seigneur de Langey, who was very well versed in such matters. It is this. He recounts those fine harangues of the Emperor Charles V delivered in the consistory at Rome, in the presence of the Bishop of Mâcon and the Seigneur du Velly, our ambassadors, in which he had mixed several insulting words against us; among others, that if his captains and soldiers were no more loyal or competent in the art of war than the King's, he would at once tie a rope around his neck and go and beg him for mercy.[3]

Et de cecy il semble qu'il en creust quelque chose: car deux ou trois fois en sa vie depuis il luy aduint de redire ces mesmes mots. Aussi qu'il défia le Roy de le combatre en chemise auec l'espee et le poignard, dans vn batteau. Ledit Seigneur de Langey suiuant son histoire, adiouste que lesdicts Ambassadeurs faisans vne despesche au Roy de ces choses, luy en dissimulerent la plus grande partie, mesmes luy celerent les deux articles precedens. Or i'ay trouué bien estrange, qu'il fust en la puissance d'vn Ambassadeur de dispenser sur les aduertissemens qu'il doit faire à son maistre, mesme de telle consequence, venant de telle personne, et dits en si grand'assemblee.

And it seems he believed something of this, for two or three times later in his life he happened to repeat these same words. Also, he challenged the King to fight him in his shirt, with sword and dagger, in a boat. The said Seigneur de Langey, continuing his history, adds that when these ambassadors sent the King a dispatch about these things, they concealed the greater part from him, and even hid the two points just mentioned. Now I have found it very strange that it should be in an ambassador's power to pick and choose among the reports he owes his master—especially reports of Et m'eust semblé l'office du seruiteur estre, de fidelement representer les choses en leur entier, comme elles sont aduenuës: afin que la liberté d'ordonner, iuger, et choisir demeurast au maistre. Car de luy alterer ou cacher la verité, de peur qu'il ne la preigne autrement qu'il ne doit, et que cela ne le pousse à quelque mauuais party, et ce pendant le laisser ignorant de ses affaires, cela m'eust semblé appartenir à celuy, qui donne la loy, non à celuy qui la reçoit, au curateur et maistre d'eschole, non à celuy qui se doit penser inferieur, comme en authorité, aussi en prudence et bon conseil. Quoy qu'il en soit, ie ne voudroy pas estre seruy de cette façon en mon petit faict.

1.17.4 Nous nous soustrayons si volontiers du commandement sous quelque pretexte, et vsurpons sur la maistrise: chascun aspire si naturellement à la liberté et authorité, qu'au superieur nulle vtilité ne doibt estre si chere, venant de ceux qui le seruent, comme luy doit estre chere leur simple et naifue obeissance. On corrompt l'office du commander, quand on y obeit par discretion, non par subiection. Et P.

Crassus, celuy que les Romains estimerent cinq fois heureux, lors qu'il estoit en Asie Consul, ayant mandé à vn Ingenieur Grec, de luy faire mener le plus grand des deux mas de nauire, qu'il auoit veu à Athenes, pour quelque engin de batterie, qu'il en vouloit faire: celuy cy sous titre de sa science, se donna loy de choisir autrement, et mena le plus petit, et selon la raison de art, le plus commode. Crassus, ayant patiemment ouy ses raisons, luy feit tres-bien donner le fouet: estimant l'interest de la discipline plus que l'interest de l'ouurage.

1.17.5 D'autre part pourtant on pourroit aussi considerer, que cette obeïssance si contreinte, n'appartient qu'aux commandements precis et prefix. Les Ambassadeurs ont vne charge plus libre, qui en plusieurs parties depend souuerainement de leur disposition. Ils n'executent pas simplement, mais forment aussi, et dressent par leur conseil, la volonté du maistre. I'ay veu en mon temps des personnes de commandement, reprins d'auoir plustost obey aux paroles des lettres du Roy, qu'à l'occasion des such consequence, coming from such a person, and spoken before so great an assembly.

It would have seemed to me the servant's duty to represent things faithfully and in their entirety, as they happened, so that the freedom to order, judge and choose might remain with the master. For to alter or hide the truth from him, for fear he might take it otherwise than he should and that it might drive him to some bad course, and meanwhile to leave him ignorant of his own affairs—that would have seemed to me to belong to the one who gives the law, not to the one who receives it; to the guardian and the schoolmaster, not to one who must consider himself inferior in prudence and good counsel as well as in authority. However that may be, I would not want to be served that way in my own small affairs.

We so readily slip out from under command on some pretext or other, and encroach on mastery; each man aspires so naturally to liberty and authority, that to a superior no usefulness coming from those who serve him should be as dear as their simple and natural obedience. The office of commanding is corrupted when it is obeyed out of discretion and not out of subjection. And Publius

Crassus—the man the Romans esteemed five times fortunate—when he was consul in Asia, ordered a Greek engineer to bring him the larger of two ship's masts he had seen at Athens, for some battering engine he wanted to make from it. The engineer, on the strength of his expertise, took it upon himself to choose otherwise and brought the smaller one, which by the reasoning of his art was the more suitable. Crassus, having patiently heard his reasons, had him soundly flogged, valuing the interest of discipline above the interest of the work.[4]

On the other hand, however, one might also consider that such strict obedience applies only to precise and definite commands. Ambassadors have a freer charge, which in many respects depends entirely on their own judgment. They do not simply carry out the master's will; they also shape and direct it by their counsel. I have seen in my time persons in command reproached for having obeyed the words of the King's letters rather than the circumstances of the affairs at hand. Men of understanding still blame today the practice of the kings of Persia of cutting their agents' and lieutenants' portions so small that in the least matters they had to have recourse to their orders.

This delay, over so vast an extent of dominion, often did their affairs notable harm. And Crassus, writing to a man of the trade and telling him the use for which he intended this mast—did he not seem to be entering into consultation with him about his decision, and inviting him to put in his own judgment?

I.18 Of Fear

De la peur

Fear, the strangest of passions, breeds delusions, stampedes armies, and can even produce reckless courage; Montaigne fears fear most.

1.18.1 OBSTVPVI, steterúntque comæ, et vox faucibus hæsit. Ie ne suis pas bon naturaliste (qu'ils disent) et ne sçai guiere par quels ressors la peur agit en nous, mais tant y a que c'est vne estrange passion: et disent les Medecins qu'il n'en est aucune, qui emporte plustost nostre iugement hors de sa deuë assiete. De vray, i'ay veu beaucoup de gens deuenus insensez de peur: et au plus rassis il est certain pendant que son accés dure, qu'elle engendre de terribles esblouissemens.

I stood aghast; my hair stood on end, and my voice stuck in my throat. I am not a good naturalist (as they call it), and I hardly know by what springs fear works in us; but at any rate it is a strange passion, and the physicians say there is none that more quickly carries our judgment out of its proper seat. Indeed, I have seen many people driven out of their minds by fear; and even in the most level-headed, it is certain that while the fit lasts it produces terrible delusions.[1]

1.18.2 Ie laisse à part le vulgaire, à qui elle represente tantost les bisayeulx sortis du tombeau enueloppez en leur suaire, tantost des Loups-garoups, des Lutins, et des Chimeres. Mais parmy les soldats mesme, où elle deuroit trouuer moins de place, combien de fois a elle changé vn troupeau de brebis en esquadron de corselets? des roseaux et des cannes en gens-darmes et lanciers? nos amis en nos ennemis? et la croix blanche à la rouge?

I leave aside the common people, to whom it shows now their great-grandfathers risen from the tomb wrapped in their shrouds, now werewolves, goblins and chimeras. But even among soldiers, where it ought to find less room, how many times has it turned a flock of sheep into a squadron of armored men? Reeds and canes into men-at-arms and lancers? Our friends into our enemies? The white cross into the red?[2]

Lors que Monsieur de Bourbon print Rome, vn port'enseigne, qui estoit à la garde du bourg sainct Pierre, fut saisi de tel effroy à la premiere alarme, que par le trou d'vne ruine il se ietta, l'enseigne au poing, hors la ville droit aux ennemis, pensant tirer vers le dedans de la ville; et à peine en fin voyant la troupe de Monsieur de Bourbon se renger pour le soustenir, estimant que ce fust vne sortie que ceux de la ville fissent, il se recogneut, et tournant teste r'entra par ce mesme trou, par lequel il estoit sorty, plus de trois cens pas auant en la campaigne.

When Monsieur de Bourbon took Rome, a standard-bearer who was on guard at the Borgo San Pietro was seized with such terror at the first alarm that he threw himself out of the city, flag in hand, through a gap in a ruin, straight toward the enemy, thinking he was heading into the city. Only at last, seeing Monsieur de Bourbon's troops forming up to meet him, and thinking it was a sally from the city, did he come to his senses; and turning about, he went back in through the same hole by which he had gone out, having advanced more than three hundred paces into the open field.[3]

Il n'en aduint pas du tout si heureusement à l'enseigne du Capitaine Iulle, lors que Sainct Paul fut pris sur nous par le Comte de Bures et Monsieur du Reu. Car estant si fort

And at the same siege, memorable was the fear that so gripped, seized and froze the heart of a gentleman that he fell stone dead on the ground at the breach, without a single wound. A like frenzy sometimes drives a whole multitude. In one of Germanicus' encounters with the Germans, two large bodies of troops in their terror took two opposite routes: one fled toward the place the other was leaving.[4]
1.18.3	Tantost elle nous donne des aisles aux talons, comme aux deux premiers: tantost elle nous cloüe les pieds, et les entraue: comme on lit de l'Empereur Theophile, lequel en vne bataille qu'il perdit contre les Agarenes, deuint si estonné et si transi, qu'il ne pouuoit prendre party de s'enfuyr: adeò pauor etiam auxilia formidat: iusques à ce que Manuel l'vn des principaux chefs de son armee, l'ayant tirassé et secoüé, comme pour l'esueiller d'vn profond somme, luy dit: Si vous ne me suiuez ie vous tueray: car il vaut mieux que vous perdiez la vie, que si estant prisonnier vous veniez à perdre l'Empire.	Sometimes fear puts wings on our heels, as it did for the first two. Sometimes it nails our feet to the ground and shackles them. So we read of the Emperor Theophilus: in a battle he lost against the Agarenes, he was so stunned and so paralyzed that he could not bring himself to flee. So much does fear dread even help. At last Manuel, one of the chief commanders of his army, tugged at him and shook him as if to wake him from a deep sleep, and said: "If you do not follow me, I will kill you. It is better for you to lose your life than to be taken prisoner and lose the Empire."[5]
1.18.4	Lors exprime elle sa derniere force, quand pour son seruice elle nous reiette à la vaillance, qu'elle a soustraitte à nostre deuoir et à nostre honneur. En la premiere iuste bataille que les Romains perdirent contre Hannibal, sous le Consul Sempronius, vne troupe de bien dix mille hommes de pied, qui print l'espouuante, ne voyant ailleurs par où faire passage à sa lascheté, s'alla ietter au trauers le gros des ennemis: lequel elle perça d'un merueilleux effort, auec grand meurtre de Carthaginois: achetant vne honteuse fuite, au mesme prix qu'elle eust eu vne glorieuse victoire.	Fear shows its utmost strength when, for its own purposes, it throws us back on the valor it has stolen from our duty and our honor. In the first pitched battle the Romans lost to Hannibal, under the consul Sempronius, a body of a good ten thousand foot soldiers was seized with panic. Seeing no other way out for its cowardice, it hurled itself straight through the thick of the enemy and broke through with marvelous effort, with a great slaughter of Carthaginians. It bought a shameful flight at the same price it would have paid for a glorious victory.[6]
1.18.5	C'est ce dequoy i'ay le plus de peur que la peur. Aussi surmonte elle en aigreur tous autres accidents. Quelle affection peut estre plus aspre et plus iuste, que celle des amis de Pompeius, qui estoient en son nauire, spectateurs de cet horrible massacre? Tum pauor sapientiam omnem mihi ex animo expectorat. Ceux qui auront esté bien frottés en quelque estour de guerre, tous blessez encor et ensanglantez, on les rameine bien le lendemain à la charge. Mais ceux qui ont conçeu quelque bonne peur des ennemis, vous ne les leur feriez pas seulement regarder en face. Ceux qui sont en pressante crainte de perdre leur bien, d'estre exilez, d'estre subiuguez, viuent en continuelle angoisse, en perdent le boire, le manger, et le repos. Là où les pauures, les bannis, les serfs, viuent souuent aussi ioyeusement que les autres.

Et tant de gens, qui de l'impatience des pointures de la peur, se sont pendus, noyez, et precipitez, nous ont bien apprins qu'elle est encores plus importune et plus insupportable que la mort.

1.18.6 Les Grecs en recognoissent vne autre espece, qui est outre l'erreur de nostre discours: venant, disent-ils, sans cause apparente, et d'vne impulsion celeste. Des peuples entiers s'en voyent souuent frappez, et des armees entieres. Telle fut celle qui apporta à Carthage vne merueilleuse desolation. On n'y oyoit que cris et voix effrayees: on voyoit les habitans sortir de leurs maisons, comme à l'alarme; et se charger, blesser et entretuer les vns les autres, comme si ce fussent ennemis, qui vinssent à occuper leur ville. noted, they did nothing but urge the sailors to hurry and row for their lives. Only when they reached Tyre, free from fear, were they at leisure to turn their thoughts to the loss they had just suffered and give free rein to the lamentations and tears that this other, stronger passion had held in check.[7]

Then fear drives all wisdom out of my breast. Men who have been soundly thrashed in some fight, still all wounded and bloody, can easily be brought back to the charge the next day. But those who have conceived a good fear of the enemy—you could not make them so much as look him in the face. Those who are in pressing fear of losing their property, of being exiled, of being subjugated, live in continual anguish and lose their appetite for food and drink, and their rest. Whereas the poor, the banished and the serfs often live as cheerfully as anyone else.[8]

And so many people who, unable to bear the stings of fear, have hanged themselves, drowned themselves or thrown themselves from a height, have taught us well that it is even more oppressive and unbearable than death.

The Greeks recognize another kind of fear, which lies outside any error of our reasoning: it comes, they say, without apparent cause and from a heavenly impulse. Whole peoples are often seen struck by it, and whole armies. Such was the fear that brought marvelous desolation upon Carthage. Nothing was heard there but cries and terrified voices. The inhabitants were seen rushing out of their houses as at an alarm, attacking, wounding and killing one another as if they were enemies come to occupy their city. All was disorder and frenzy, until they had appeased the wrath of the gods with prayers and sacrifices. They call these Panic terrors.[9]

Truly, a man must always await his last day, and no one ought to be called happy before his death and his final funeral rites.[1]

Children know the story of King Croesus on this subject. Taken prisoner by Cyrus and condemned to death, he cried out at the moment of execution: "O Solon, Solon!" When this was reported to Cyrus and he asked what it meant, Croesus explained that he was now proving, at his own expense, the warning Solon had once given him: that men, however fair a face Fortune shows them, cannot call themselves happy until they have been seen to pass the last day of their lives, because of the uncertainty and changeability of human affairs, which with a very slight movement shift from one state to another quite different.[2]

And so Agesilaus, when someone called the King of Persia happy for having come so young to so mighty a throne, said: "Yes, but Priam at that age was not unhappy." We see kings of Macedonia, successors of the great Alexander, turned into carpenters and clerks in Rome; tyrants of Sicily into schoolmasters at Corinth; the conqueror of half the world and commander of so many armies into a wretched suppliant of the beggarly officers of a king of Egypt. That is what five or six more months of life cost the great Pompey.[3]

And in our fathers' time, Ludovico Sforza, tenth Duke of Milan, under whom all Italy had so long been shaken, was seen to die a prisoner at Loches —but only after living there ten years, which was the worst of his bargain. Has not the most beautiful queen, widow of the greatest king in Christendom, just died at the hands of an executioner? Unworthy and barbarous cruelty! And a thousand such examples. For it seems that, just as storms and tempests take offense at the pride and loftiness of our buildings, there are also spirits up above who are envious of greatness here below.[4]

So true is it that some hidden power crushes human affairs and seems to trample on the splendid rods and cruel axes and make sport of them. And it seems that Fortune sometimes lies in wait for precisely the last day of our lives, to show her power to overturn in a moment what she had built over long years; and she makes us cry out with Laberius: Clearly, on this one day I have lived one day longer than I should have.[5]

So Solon's good advice may reasonably be taken in this way. But he is a philosopher, and for philosophers the favors and disgraces of Fortune rank as neither good fortune nor bad, and greatness and power are accidents of almost indifferent quality. So I find it likely that he looked further, and meant that this same happiness of our life, which depends on the tranquility and contentment of a well-born spirit and on the resolution and assurance of a well-ordered soul, should never be attributed to a man until he has been seen to play the last act of his play—and doubtless the hardest.

In everything else there may be some mask. Either those fine reasonings of philosophy are only a pose with us, or our misfortunes, not testing us to the quick, give us leisure to keep our faces always composed. But in this last scene, between death and ourselves, there is no more pretending. We must speak plain French; we must show what is good and clean at the bottom of the pot. For only then are true words drawn from the depths of the heart; / the mask is torn away, the reality remains. That is why all the other actions of our life must be tried and tested against this final stroke.

It is the master day, the day that judges all the others. It is the day, says one of the ancients, that must judge all my past years. I leave it to death to test the fruit of my studies. We shall see then whether my reasonings come from my mouth or from my heart.[6]

I have seen many men give their whole lives a good or a bad reputation by their death. Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, by dying well repaired the poor opinion people had had of him until then. Epaminondas, asked which of three men he esteemed most, Chabrias, Iphicrates or himself, said: "You must see us die before you can decide." Indeed, we would rob that man of a great deal if we weighed him without the honor and greatness of his end. God has willed it as he pleased; but in my time three of the most execrable and infamous people I have known, steeped in every abomination of life, have had well-ordered deaths, composed to perfection in every circumstance.[7]

There are gallant and fortunate deaths. I have seen death cut the thread of one man's marvelous rise, in the very flower of his growth, with so splendid an end that in my opinion his ambitious and courageous designs had nothing so lofty about them as their interruption. Without going there, he arrived where he was aiming, more grandly and gloriously than his desire and hope had reached. By his fall he outstripped the power and the name he was aspiring to in his course. In judging another man's life, I always look at how its end went; and one of my main concerns for my own is that its end go well—that is to say, quietly and without fuss.

I.20 That to Philosophize Is to Learn to Die

Que philosopher, c'est apprendre à mourir
Philosophy teaches us not to fear death; Montaigne urges keeping death always in mind so it loses its power to terrify.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.20.1	CICERO dit que Philosopher ce n'est autre chose que s'aprester à la mort. C'est d'autant que l'estude et la contemplation retirent aucunement nostre ame hors de nous, et l'embesongnent à part du corps, qui est quelque apprentissage et ressemblance de la mort: ou bien, c'est que toute la sagesse et discours du monde se resoult en fin à ce point, de nous apprendre à ne craindre point à mourir. De vray, ou la raison se mocque, ou elle ne doit viser qu'à nostre contentement, et tout son trauail tendre en somme à nous faire bien viure, et à nostre aise, comme dict la Sainte Escriture.	Cicero says that to philosophize is nothing else than to prepare oneself for death. This is because study and contemplation draw our soul somewhat outside us and keep it busy apart from the body, which is a kind of apprenticeship and likeness of death. Or else it is because all the wisdom and reasoning in the world come down in the end to this point: to teach us not to be afraid to die. Indeed, either reason is mocking us, or it must aim solely at our contentment, and all its labor must tend, in sum, to make us live well and at our ease, as Holy Scripture says.[1]
	Toutes les opinions du monde en sont là, que le plaisir est nostre but, quoy qu'elles en prennent diuers moyens; autrement on les chasseroit d'arriuée. Car qui escouteroit celuy, qui pour sa fin establiroit nostre peine et mesaise? Les dissentions des sectes Philosophiques en ce cas, sont verbales. Transcurramus solertissimas nugas. Il y a plus d'opiniastreté et de picoterie, qu'il n'appartient à vne si saincte profession. Mais quelque personnage que l'homme entrepreigne, il iouë tousiours le sien parmy.	All the opinions in the world agree on this—that pleasure is our goal—though they take different means to it; otherwise they would be thrown out at once. For who would listen to a man who set up our pain and discomfort as his end? The disagreements of the philosophical sects on this point are merely verbal. Let us skip over these most ingenious trifles. There is more stubbornness and bickering than befits so holy a calling. But whatever role a man takes on, he always plays his own along with it.[2]
1.20.2	Quoy qu'ils dient, en la vertu mesme, le dernier but de nostre visee, c'est la volupté. Il me plaist de battre leurs oreilles de ce mot, qui leur est si fort à contrecœur: et s'il signifie quelque supreme plaisir, et excessif contentement, il est mieux deu à l'assistance de la vertu, qu'à nulle autre assistance. Cette volupté pour estre plus gaillarde, nerueuse, robuste, virile, n'en est que plus serieusement voluptueuse. Et luy deuions donner le nom du plaisir, plus fauorable, plus doux et naturel: non celuy de la vigueur, duquel nous l'auons denommee. Cette autre volupté plus basse, si elle meritoit ce beau nom: ce deuoit estre en concurrence, non par priuilege. Ie la	Whatever they say, even in virtue the ultimate goal we aim at is pleasure. I like to din this word into their ears, since they find it so distasteful. And if it means some supreme delight and surpassing contentment, it is owed more to the help of virtue than to any other help. This pleasure, for being more lusty, sinewy, robust and manly, is only the more seriously pleasurable. We ought to have given virtue the name of pleasure, a kindlier, sweeter and more natural name, not that of vigor, from which we have named it. That other, baser pleasure, if it deserved this fine name, should trouue moins pure d'incommoditez et de trauerses, que n'est la vertu.	have had it in competition, not by privilege. I find it less free of drawbacks and obstacles than virtue is.[3]

	Outre que son goust est plus momentanee, fluide et caduque, elle a ses veilles, ses ieusnes, et ses trauaux, et la sueur et le sang. Et en outre particulierement, ses passions trenchantes de tant de sortes; et à son costé vne satieté si lourde, qu'elle equipolle à penitence. Nous auons grand tort d'estimer que ses incommoditez luy seruent d'aiguillon et de condiment à sa douceur, comme en nature le contraire se viuifie par son contraire: et de dire, quand nous venons à la vertu, que pareilles suittes et difficultez l'accablent, la rendent austere et inacessible.	Besides the fact that its savor is more fleeting, fluid and perishable, it has its vigils, its fasts and its labors, its sweat and its blood; and in particular, moreover, its sharp passions of so many kinds, and at its side a satiety so heavy that it amounts to a penance. We are very wrong to think that its drawbacks serve it as a spur and a seasoning to its sweetness, as in nature one contrary is quickened by its contrary—and then to say, when we come to virtue, that similar consequences and difficulties overwhelm it and make it austere and inaccessible.
1.20.3	Là où beaucoup plus proprement qu'à la volupté, elles anoblissent, aiguisent, et rehaussent le plaisir diuin et parfaict, qu'elle nous moienne. Celuy la est certes bien indigne de son accointance, qui contrepoise son coust, à son fruict: et n'en cognoist ny les graces ny l'vsage. Ceux qui nous vont instruisant, que sa queste est scabreuse et laborieuse, sa iouïssance agréable: que nous disent-ils par là, sinon qu'elle est tousiours desagreable? Car quel moien humain arriua iamais à sa iouïssance? Les plus parfaits se sont bien contentez d'y aspirer, et de l'approcher, sans la posseder. Mais ils se trompent; veu que de tous les plaisirs que nous cognoissons, la poursuite mesme en est plaisante.	On the contrary: far more fittingly than with pleasure, they ennoble, sharpen and heighten the divine and perfect pleasure that virtue procures for us. A man is certainly unworthy of its acquaintance if he weighs its cost against its fruit; he knows neither its graces nor its use. Those who keep telling us that the quest for it is rugged and laborious, and the enjoyment of it pleasant—what are they telling us, except that it is always unpleasant? For what human means ever reached the enjoyment of it? The most perfect men have been content to aspire to it and to approach it, without possessing it. But they are wrong, seeing that of all the pleasures we know, the very pursuit is pleasant.
	L'entreprise se sent de la qualité de la chose qu'elle regarde: car c'est vne bonne portion de l'effect, et consubstancielle. L'heur et la beatitude qui reluit en la vertu, remplit toutes ses appartenances et auenues, iusques à la premiere entree et extreme barriere.	An undertaking takes on the quality of the thing it aims at, for it is a good part of the effect and of one substance with it. The happiness and bliss that shine in virtue fill all its approaches and avenues, right up to the first entrance and the outermost barrier.
1.20.4	Or des principaux bienfaicts de la vertu, c'est le mepris de la mort, moyen qui fournit nostre vie d'vne molle tranquillité, et nous en donne le goust pur et amiable: sans qui toute autre volupté est esteinte. Voyla pourquoy toutes les regles se rencontrent et conuiennent à cet article.	Now one of the chief benefits of virtue is contempt for death. It is the means that furnishes our life with a gentle tranquility and gives us a pure and pleasant taste of it; without it, all other pleasure is snuffed out. That is why all the rules meet and agree on this article.
	Et combien qu'elles nous conduisent aussi toutes d'vn commun accord à mespriser la douleur, la pauureté, et autres accidens, à quoy la vie humaine est subiecte, ce n'est pas d'vn pareil soing: tant par ce que ces accidens	And although they also all lead us with one accord to despise pain, poverty and the other accidents to which human life is subject, they do not do so with equal care. dents are not so inevitable—most men spend their lives without tasting poverty, and some even without feeling pain or sickness, like Xenophilus the musician, who lived a hundred and six years in perfect health—and partly because, at worst, death can put an end to them whenever we please and cut short all our other troubles. But death itself is inevitable.[4]

We are all driven to the same place; the lot of each is tossed in the urn, and sooner or later it will come out and put us aboard the boat bound for eternal ruin. And consequently, if death frightens us, it is a continual source of torment, and one that cannot be relieved in any way. There is no place from which it may not come at us. We can keep turning our heads this way and that, as in hostile country: it hangs over us always, like the rock over Tantalus. Our parlements often send criminals back to be executed at the place where the crime was committed. On the way, take them past fine houses, give them as good a time as you please—no Sicilian feasts will produce a sweet savor for them, nor will the song of birds and the lyre bring back their sleep. Do you think they can enjoy it?[5]

Do you not think that the final purpose of their journey, constantly before their eyes, has spoiled and dulled their taste for all these comforts? He asks about the road, counts the days, measures his life by the length / of the way, tormented by the doom to come.[6]

The goal of our course is death; it is the necessary object of our aim. If it frightens us, how is it possible to take one step forward without a fever? The remedy of ordinary people is not to think about it. But from what brutish stupidity can so gross a blindness come to them? They must be made to bridle the donkey by the tail, like one who has taken it into his head to walk backward. No wonder they are so often caught in the trap. You frighten our people merely by naming death, and most of them cross themselves as at the name of the devil. And because it is mentioned in wills, don't expect them

1.20.6 Par ce que cette syllabe frappoit trop rudement leurs oreilles, et que cette voix leur sembloit malencontreuse, les Romains auoient apris de l'amollir ou l'estendre en perifrazes. Au lieu de dire, il est mort; il a cessé de viure, disent-ils, il a vescu. Pourueu que ce soit vie, soit elle passee, ils se consolent. Nous en auons emprunté, nostre feu Maistre-Iehan. A l'aduenture est-ce, que comme on dict, le terme vaut l'argent. Ie nasquis entre vnze heures et midi le dernier iour de Feburier, mil cinq cens trente trois: comme nous contons à cette heure, commençant l'an en Ianuier. Il n'y a iustement que quinze iours que i'ay franchy trente neuf ans, il m'en faut pour le moins encore autant.

Because this syllable struck their ears too harshly and the word seemed ill-omened to them, the Romans had learned to soften it or stretch it out into circumlocutions. Instead of saying "he is dead," they say "he has ceased to live," "he has lived." As long as it is life, even life past, they take comfort. From this we have borrowed our "the late Master John." Perhaps, as the saying goes, a delay is as good as cash. I was born between eleven o'clock and noon on the last day of February, 1533, by our present reckoning, which begins the year in January. It is just two weeks since I passed thirty-nine; I need at least as many years again.[8]

Ce pendant s'empescher du pensement de chose si esloignee, ce seroit folie. Mais quoy? les ieunes et les vieux laissent la vie de mesme condition. Nul n'en sort autrement que si tout presentement il y entroit, ioinct qu'il n'est homme si décrepite tant qu'il voit Mathusalem deuant, qui ne pense auoir encore vingt ans dans le corps. D'auantage, pauure fol que tu es, qui t'a estably les termes de ta vie? Tu te fondes sur les contes des Medecins. Regarde plustost l'effect et l'experience. Par le commun train des choses, tu vis pieça par faueur extraordinaire.

Meanwhile, to trouble oneself with the thought of something so far off would be folly. But what of it? Young and old leave life in the same condition. No one leaves it otherwise than as if he were just entering it. Besides, there is no man so decrepit that, as long as he sees Methuselah ahead of him, he does not think he still has twenty years in his body. Furthermore, poor fool that you are, who has fixed the limits of your life? You rely on the tales of doctors. Look rather at the facts and at experience. By the common course of things, you have long been living by extraordinary favor.

Tu as passé les termes accoustumez de viure: et qu'il soit ainsi, conte de tes cognoissans, combien il en est mort auant ton aage, plus qu'il n'en y a qui l'ayent atteint: et de ceux mesme qui ont annobli leur vie par renommee, fais en registre, et l'entreray en gageure d'en trouuer plus qui sont morts, auant, qu'apres trente cinq ans. Il est plein de raison, et de pieté, de prendre exemple de l'humanité mesme de Iesus-Christ. Or il finit sa vie à trente et trois ans. Le plus grand homme, simplement homme, Alexandre, mourut aussi à ce terme.

You have passed the customary limits of life. To see that this is so, count among your acquaintances how many have died before your age: more than have reached it. Even among those who have ennobled their lives by renown, make a list, and I will wager to find more who died before thirty-five than after. It is full of reason and piety to take our example from the humanity of Jesus Christ himself. Now he ended his life at thirty-three. The greatest man who was simply a man, Alexander, also died at that age.

1.20.7 Combien a la mort de façons de surprise? Quid quisque vitet, nunquam homini satis / Cautum est in horas. Ie laisse à part les fiebures et les pleuresies. Qui eust iamais pensé

How many ways death has of taking us by surprise! Man can never take care enough / from hour to hour of what he should avoid. I leave aside fevers

Et entre les cuisses des femmes Cornelius Gallus Preteur, Tigillinus Capitaine du guet à Rome, Ludouic fils de Guy de Gonsague, Marquis de Mantoüe. Et d'vn encore pire exemple, Speusippus Philosophe Platonicien, et l'vn de nos Papes.

Le pauure Bebius, Iuge, cependant qu'il donne delay de huictaine à vne partie, le voyla saisi, le sien de viure estant expiré: et Caius Iulius Medecin gressant les yeux d'vn patient, voyla la mort qui clost les siens. Et s'il m'y faut mesler, vn mien frere le Capitaine S. 1.20.8 Ces exemples si frequents et si ordinaires nous passans deuant les yeux, comme est-il possible qu'on se puisse deffaire du pensement de la mort, et qu'à chasque instant il ne nous semble qu'elle nous tienne au collet? Qu'importe-il, me direz vous, comment que ce soit, pourueu qu'on ne s'en donne point de peine? and pleurisies. Who would ever have thought that a Duke of Brittany would be crushed to death in a crowd, as that one was at the entry into Lyon of Pope Clement, my neighbor? Have you not seen one of our kings killed at play? And did not one of his ancestors die from a collision with a pig?[9]

Aeschylus, warned that a falling house would kill him, may keep on his guard all he likes: there he is, knocked dead by a tortoise shell that slipped from the claws of an eagle in the air. Another died of a grape seed; an emperor, from the scratch of a comb while doing his hair; Aemilius Lepidus, from stubbing his foot on his own threshold; and Aufidius, from bumping into the door of the council chamber as he went in. And between women's thighs: Cornelius Gallus, praetor; Tigellinus, captain of the watch at Rome; Ludovico, son of Guido Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua. And, an even worse example, Speusippus, the Platonist philosopher, and one of our popes.[10]

Poor Baebius, a judge, while granting a litigant a week's adjournment, is seized himself, his own term of life having expired. And Caius Julius, a doctor, while anointing a patient's eyes—there is death closing his own. And if I may bring in my own family: a brother of mine, Captain Saint-Martin, twenty-three years old, who had already given good proof of his valor, was struck while playing tennis by a ball that hit him a little above the right ear, without any sign of bruise or wound. He did not sit down or rest; but five or six hours later he died of an apoplexy caused by that blow.[11]

With such frequent and ordinary examples passing before our eyes, how can we possibly rid ourselves of the thought of death, or help feeling at every moment that it has us by the collar? "What does it matter," you will tell me, "how it happens, as long as we don't worry about it?" I am of that opinion. Whatever way one could find to shelter from the blows, even under a calf's hide, I am not the man to shrink from it. For it is enough for me to get through life at my ease; and the best

9 John II of Brittany was killed in 1305 during the entry into Lyon of Clement V, a former archbishop of Bordeaux. Henry II died of a jousting wound in 1559; Philip, son of Louis VI, was thrown when a pig ran under his horse in 1131.
10 The grape-seed death is the poet Anacreon's, as told by Pliny. Tigellinus was Nero's prefect of the guard; Speusippus succeeded Plato as head of the Academy.

1.20.9 Mais c'est folie d'y penser arriuer par là. Ils vont, ils viennent, ils trottent, ils dansent, de mort nulles nouuelles. Tout cela est beau: mais aussi quand elle arriue, ou à eux ou à leurs femmes, enfans et amis, les surprenant en dessoude et au descouuert, quels tourmens, quels cris, quelle rage et quel desespoir les accable? Vistes vous iamais rien si rabaissé, si changé, si confus? Il y faut prouuoir de meilleure heure: et cette nonchalance bestiale, quand elle pourroit loger en la teste d'vn homme d'entendement, ce que ie trouue entierement impossible, nous vend trop cher ses denrees.	But it is folly to think of getting there that way. They come, they go, they trot, they dance—of death, no news. All that is very fine. But then, when it does come, to them or to their wives, children or friends, catching them unawares and unprotected, what torments, what cries, what rage and what despair overwhelm them! Did you ever see anything so crushed, so changed, so confused? We must make provision for it earlier. And this brutish indifference, even if it could lodge in the head of a man of understanding—which I find entirely impossible—sells us its wares too dear.
Si c'estoit ennemy qui se peust euiter, ie conseillerois d'emprunter les armes de la coüardise: mais puis qu'il ne se peut; puis qu'il vous attrappe fuyant et poltron aussi bien qu'honeste homme, Nempe et fugacem persequitur virum, Nec parcit imbellis iuuentæ Poplitibus, timidoque tergo. et que nulle trampe de cuirasse vous couure, Ille licet ferro cautus se condat in ære, Mors tamen inclusum protrahet inde caput. aprenons à le soustenir de pied ferme, et à le combatre: Et pour commencer à luy oster son plus grand aduantage contre nous, prenons voye toute contraire à la commune.	If it were an enemy that could be avoided, I would advise borrowing the weapons of cowardice. But since it cannot be; since it catches you just the same whether you run away like a coward or stand like an honorable man—Indeed, it pursues the man who flees, and does not spare the hamstrings or the timid backs of unwarlike youth—and since no temper of breastplate can protect you—Though he hide himself cautiously in iron and bronze, death will still drag his head out of its shelter—let us learn to meet it steadfastly and to fight it. And to begin by depriving it of its greatest advantage over us, let us take a road quite contrary to the common one.[12]

	Ainsi faisoient les Egyptiens, qui au milieu de leurs festins et parmy leur meilleure chere, faisoient apporter l'Anatomie seche d'vn homme, pour seruir d'auertissement aux conuiez. Omnem crede diem tibi diluxisse supremum, / Grata superueniet, quæ non sperabitur hora.	So did the Egyptians, who in the middle of their banquets and amid their best cheer had the dried skeleton of a man brought in, as a warning to the guests. Believe that every day that has dawned for you is your last; / the hour you do not hope for will come as a welcome gift.[13]
1.20.10	Il est incertain où la mort nous attende, attendons la par tout. La premeditation de la mort, est premeditation de la liberté. Qui a apris à mourir, il a desapris à seruir. Il n'y a rien de mal en la vie, pour celuy qui a bien comprins, que la priuation de la vie n'est pas mal. Le sçauoir mourir nous afranchit de toute subiection et contraincte. Paulus Æmylius respondit à celuy, que ce miserable Roy de Macedoine son prisonnier luy enuoyoit, pour le prier de ne le mener pas en son triomphe, Qu'il en face la requeste à soy mesme.	It is uncertain where death awaits us; let us await it everywhere. Premeditation of death is premeditation of freedom. He who has learned how to die has unlearned how to be a slave. There is nothing evil in life for the man who has fully understood that losing life is not an evil. Knowing how to die frees us from all subjection and constraint. Paulus Aemilius replied to the man sent by that wretched King of Macedonia, his prisoner, to beg him not to lead him in his triumph: "Let him make that request of himself."[14]
1.20.11	A la verité en toutes choses si nature ne preste vn peu, il est mal-aysé que l'art et l'industrie aillent guiere auant. Ie suis de moy-mesme non melancholique, mais songecreux: il n'est rien dequoy ie me soye des tousiours plus entretenu que des imaginations de la mort; voire en la saison la plus licentieuse de mon aage, Iucundum cùm ætas florida ver ageret. Parmy les dames et les ieux, tel me pensoit empesché à digerer à part moy quelque ialousie, ou l'incertitude de quelque esperance, cependant que ie m'entretenois de ie ne sçay qui surpris les iours precedens d'vne fieure chaude, et de sa fin au partir d'vne feste pareille, et la teste pleine d'oisiueté, d'amour et de bon temps, comme moy: et qu'autant m'en pendoit à l'oreille.	In truth, in all things, unless nature lends a little help, it is hard for art and effort to get very far. I am by nature not melancholy, but given to daydreaming. There is nothing I have always occupied myself with more than imaginings of death, even in the most licentious season of my life, when my blooming youth was enjoying its pleasant spring. Among the ladies and the games, someone would think me busy digesting some jealousy or the uncertainty of some hope, while I was actually thinking about some fellow or other who had been seized a few days before by a high fever and had died on the way home from a party just like this one, his head full of idleness, love and good times, like mine—and the same thing could happen to me.[15]

De vray les hazards et dangiers nous approchent peu ou rien de nostre fin: et si nous pensons, combien il en reste, sans cet accident qui semble nous menasser le plus, de millions d'autres sur nos testes, nous trouuerons que gaillars et fieureux, en la mer et en nos maisons, en la bataille et en repos elle nous est égallement pres. Nemo altero fragilior est: nemo in crastinum sui certior.

1.20.13 Ce que i'ay affaire auant mourir, pour l'acheuer tout loisir me semble court, fust ce d'vne heure. Quelcun feuilletant l'autre iour mes tablettes, trouua vn memoire de quelque chose, que ie vouloys estre faite apres ma mort: ie luy dy, comme il estoit vray, que n'estant qu'à vne lieuë de ma maison, et sain et gaillard, ie m'estoy hasté de l'escrire là, pour ne m'asseurer point d'arriuer iusques chez moy. Comme celuy, qui continuellement me couue de mes pensees, et les couche en moy: ie suis à toute heure preparé enuiron ce que ie le puis estre: et ne m'aduertira de rien de nouueau la suruenance de la mort.

Il faut estre tousiours botté et prest à partir, en tant que en nous est, et sur tout se garder qu'on n'aye lors affaire qu'à soy. Quid breui fortes iaculamur æuo / Multa? Car nous y aurons assez de besongne, sans autre surcrois. L'vn se pleint plus que de la mort, dequoy elle luy rompt le train d'vne belle victoire: l'autre qu'il luy faut desloger auant qu'auoir marié sa fille, ou contrerolé l'institution de ses enfans: l'vn pleint la compagnie de sa femme, l'autre de son fils, comme commoditez principales de son estre.

Ie suis pour cette heure en tel estat, Dieu mercy, que ie puis desloger quand il luy plaira, sans regret de chose quelconque: ie me desnoue par tout: mes adieux sont tantost prins de chascun, sauf de moy. them. Otherwise, for my part, I would be in continual fright and frenzy; for never did a man so distrust his life, never did a man set less store by its duration. Neither my health, which so far has been very vigorous and seldom interrupted, lengthens my hope of it, nor do illnesses shorten it. Every minute I feel I am slipping away. And I keep singing to myself: "Whatever can be done another day can be done today."

In truth, chances and dangers bring us little or no nearer to our end. And if we think how many millions of other accidents remain hanging over our heads, besides the one that seems to threaten us most, we shall find that, in vigor or in fever, at sea or at home, in battle or at rest, death is equally near us. No man is more fragile than another; no man more certain of tomorrow.

To finish what I have to do before I die, any amount of time seems short to me, even if the task is only an hour's work. The other day someone leafing through my notebooks found a memorandum about something I wanted done after my death. I told him, and it was true, that though I was only a league from my house, and healthy and in good spirits, I had hurried to write it down there because I was not sure of getting as far as home. As a man who is constantly brooding over my thoughts and laying them up within me, I am at all times about as ready as I can be; and the arrival of death will tell me nothing new.

We must always have our boots on and be ready to leave, as far as it lies in us, and above all take care that by then we have no business with anyone but ourselves. Why in our brief life do we boldly aim / at so many things? For we shall have quite enough to do then without any further load. One man complains, more than of death itself, that it breaks off the course of a fine victory; another, that he must move out before marrying off his daughter or seeing to the education of his children. One mourns his wife's company, another his son's, as the chief comforts of his existence.

I am at present in such a state, thank God, that I can move out whenever it pleases him, without regretting anything whatsoever. I am untying myself everywhere; my farewells to everyone are nearly taken, except to myself. Never did a man prepare to leave the world more purely and fully, or detach has robbed me of all the many rewards of life; and the builder: The works remain (he says) broken off, and the huge threat of the walls. We must not plan anything of such long breath, or at least not with so passionate a wish to see it finished.[16]

1.20.14 Nous sommes nés pour agir: Cùm moriar, medium soluar et inter opus. Ie veux qu'on agisse, et qu'on allonge les offices de la vie, tant qu'on peut: et que la mort me treuue plantant mes choux; mais nonchallant d'elle, et encore plus de mon iardin imparfait. I'en vis mourir vn, qui estant à l'extremité se pleignoit incessamment, dequoy sa destinee coupoit le fil de l'histoire qu'il auoit en main, sur le quinziesme ou seixiesme de nos Roys. Illud in his rebus non addunt, nec tibi earum / Iam desiderium rerum super insidet vna.

We are born to act: When I die, may it be in the midst of my work. I want us to act and to prolong the duties of life as long as we can; and I want death to find me planting my cabbages, but caring little about it, and still less about my unfinished garden. I saw one man die who, at the very end, kept complaining that his destiny was cutting the thread of the history he had in hand, at the fifteenth or sixteenth of our kings. But they do not add this: that no longer / will any longing for these things remain with you.[17]

1.20.15 Il faut se descharger de ces humeurs vulgaires et nuisibles. Tout ainsi qu'on a planté nos cimetieres ioignant les Eglises, et aux lieux les plus frequentez de la ville, pour accoustumer, disoit Lycurgus, le bas populaire, les femmes et les enfans à ne s'effaroucher point de voir vn homme mort: et affin que ce continuel spectacle d'ossemens, de tombeaux, et de conuois nous aduertisse de nostre condition. Quin etiam exhilarare viris conuiuia cæde
Mos olim, et miscere epulis spectacula dira
Certantum ferro, sæpe et super ipsa cadentum
Pocula, respersis non parco sanguine mensis.

We must rid ourselves of these common and harmful notions. Just as our cemeteries have been placed next to churches and in the busiest parts of town, in order, as Lycurgus said, to accustom the common people, women and children not to be alarmed at the sight of a dead man, and so that this continual spectacle of bones, tombs and funeral processions may remind us of our condition: Moreover, it was once the custom to enliven banquets with slaughter, and to mix with the feast the grim spectacle of men fighting with the sword, who often fell among the very cups, spattering the tables with abundant blood.[18]

1.20.16 Et comme les Egyptiens apres leurs festins, faisoient presenter aux assistans vne grande image de la mort, par vn qui leur crioit: Boy, et t'esiouy, car mort tu seras tel: aussi ay-ie pris en coustume, d'auoir non seulement en l'imagination, mais continuellement la mort en la bouche. Et n'est rien dequoy ie m'informe si volontiers, que de la mort des hommes: quelle parole, quel visage, quelle contenance ils y ont eu: ny endroit des histoires, que ie remarque si attentifuement. Il y paroist, à la farcissure de mes exemples: et que i'ay en particuliere

And as the Egyptians, after their banquets, had a large image of death shown to the guests by a man who cried out to them, "Drink and be merry, for when you are dead you will be like this," so I have made it my custom to have death not only in my imagination but constantly in my mouth. There is nothing I inquire about so willingly as men's deaths: what words, what face, what bearing they had; nor any passage in the histories that I note so attentively. It shows in the way I stuff my pages affection cette matiere. Si i'estoy faiseur de liures, ie feroy vn registre commenté des morts diuerses: qui apprendroit les hommes à mourir, leur apprendroit à viure.	with examples, and that I have a particular fondness for this subject. If I were a maker of books, I would compile a register, with commentary, of various deaths. Whoever taught men to die would teach them to live.

	Dicearchus en feit vn de pareil titre, mais d'autre et moins vtile fin.	Dicaearchus wrote a book with a similar title, but with another and less useful aim.[19]
1.20.17	On me dira, que l'effect surmonte de si loing la pensee, qu'il n'y a si belle escrime, qui ne se perde, quand on en vient là: laissez les dire; le premediter donne sans doubte grand auantage: et puis n'est-ce rien, d'aller au moins iusques là sans alteration et sans fiéure? Il y a plus: nature mesme nous preste la main, et nous donne courage. Si c'est vne mort courte et violente, nous n'avons pas loisir de la craindre: si elle est autre, ie m'apperçois qu'à mesure que ie m'engage dans la maladie, i'entre naturellement en quelque desdain de la vie.	People will tell me that the reality so far exceeds the thought of it that no fencing skill is so fine that it is not lost when it comes to that point. Let them talk. Premeditation undoubtedly gives a great advantage. And then, is it nothing to get at least that far without agitation and without fever? There is more: nature herself lends us a hand and gives us courage. If it is a short and violent death, we have no time to fear it. If it is otherwise, I notice that as I sink further into illness I naturally come to feel a certain disdain for life.
	Ie trouue que i'ay bien plus affaire à digerer cette resolution de mourir, quand ie suis en santé, que ie n'ay quand ie suis en fiéure: d'autant que ie ne tiens plus si fort aux commoditez de la vie, à raison que ie commance à en perdre l'vsage et le plaisir, i'en voy la mort d'vne veuë beaucoup moins effrayee. Cela me faict esperer, que plus ie m'eslongneray de celle-là, et approcheray de cette-cy, plus aysément i'entreray en composition de leur eschange.	I find that I have much more trouble digesting this resolution to die when I am healthy than when I am feverish. Since I no longer cling so strongly to the comforts of life, as I begin to lose the use and pleasure of them, I look on death with far less frightened eyes. This makes me hope that the farther I move from the one and the nearer I come to the other, the more easily I shall come to terms over exchanging them.
1.20.18	Tout ainsi que i'ay essayé en plusieurs autres occurrences, ce que dit Cesar, que les choses nous paroissent souuent plus grandes de loing que de pres: i'ay trouué que sain i'auois eu les maladies beaucoup plus en horreur, que lors que ie les ay senties. L'alegresse où ie suis, le plaisir et la force, me font paroistre l'autre estat si disproportionné à celuy-là, que par imagination ie grossis ces incommoditez de la moitié, et les conçoy plus poisantes, que ie ne les trouue, quand ie les ay sur les espaules. I'espere qu'il m'en aduiendra ainsi de la mort.	I have tested on several other occasions what Caesar says, that things often look bigger to us from far off than close at hand; in the same way I have found that when healthy I dreaded illnesses much more than when I actually felt them. The cheerfulness I am in, my pleasure and my strength, make the other state seem so out of proportion to this one that in imagination I magnify those discomforts by half, and conceive them as heavier than I find them when I have them on my shoulders. I hope it will be the same for me with death.[20] old! When a soldier of Caesar's guard, worn out and broken, came up to him in the street to ask leave to kill himself, Caesar looked at his decrepit appearance and answered with a joke: "So you think you are alive?"[21]

If we fell into it all at once, I do not think we could bear such a change. But nature leads us by the hand down a gentle and almost imperceptible slope, little by little, step by step; she rolls us into this wretched state and makes us used to it. So we feel no jolt when youth dies in us—which in essence and in truth is a harder death than the complete death of a languishing life, or the death of old age. For the leap is not so heavy from ill-being to non-being as it is from a sweet and flourishing being to a painful and grievous one.

A bent and stooping body has less strength to carry a load; so does our soul. We must straighten it and raise it up against the onslaught of this adversary. For just as it cannot be at rest while it fears death, so, if it can make itself secure against it, it can boast—something almost beyond the human condition—that it is impossible for anxiety, torment or fear, or even the slightest displeasure, to lodge in it. Not the face of a threatening tyrant shakes his firm mind, nor the South Wind, stormy lord of the restless Adriatic, nor the mighty hand of thundering Jove. It becomes mistress of its passions and cravings; mistress of want, shame and poverty, and of all the other injuries of Fortune.

Let whoever can gain this advantage. Here is the true and sovereign freedom, which enables us to thumb our noses at force and injustice and to laugh at prisons and chains. "In handcuffs and in shackles I will keep you, under a cruel jailer."
"God himself will set me free the moment I wish." I think he means: "I will die." Death is the final line of things.
Our religion has had no surer human foundation than contempt for life. Not only does rational argument call us to it—for why should we fear to lose a thing which, once lost, cannot be regretted?—[22]

but also, since we are threatened by so many kinds of death, is there not more harm in fearing toutes, qu'à en soustenir vne? Que chaut-il, quand ce soit, puis qu'elle est ineuitable? A celuy qui disoit à Socrates; Les trente tyrans t'ont condamné à la mort: Et nature, eux, respondit-il. Quelle sottise, de nous peiner, sur le point du passage à l'exemption de toute peine? Comme nostre naissance nous apporta la naissance de toutes choses: aussi fera la mort de toutes choses, nostre mort. Parquoy c'est pareille folie de pleurer de ce que d'icy à cent ans nous ne viurons pas, que de pleurer de ce que nous ne viuions pas, il y a cent ans.

La mort est origine d'vne autre vie: ainsi pleurasmes nous, et ainsi nous cousta-il d'entrer en cette-cy: ainsi nous despouillasmes nous de nostre ancien voile, en y entrant. Rien ne peut estre grief, qui n'est qu'vne fois. Est-ce raison de craindre si long temps, chose de si brief temps? Le long temps viure, et le peu de temps viure est rendu tout vn par la mort. Car le long et le court n'est point aux choses qui ne sont plus. Aristote dit, qu'il y a des petites bestes sur la riuiere Hypanis, qui ne viuent qu'vn iour. Celle qui meurt à huict heures du matin, elle meurt en ieunesse: celle qui meurt à cinq heures du soir, meurt en sa decrepitude.

Qui de nous ne se mocque de voir mettre en consideration d'heur ou de malheur, ce moment de durée? Le plus et le moins en la nostre, si nous la comparons à l'eternité, ou encores à la duree des montaignes, des riuieres, des estoilles, des arbres, et mesmes d'aucuns animaux, n'est pas moins ridicule.

them all than in suffering one? What does it matter when it comes, since it is inevitable? To the man who told Socrates, "The Thirty Tyrants have condemned you to death," he replied, "And nature has condemned them." What foolishness to torment ourselves at the very moment of passing into freedom from all torment! As our birth brought us the birth of all things, so our death will bring the death of all things. Therefore it is as foolish to weep because a hundred years from now we shall not be alive as to weep because we were not alive a hundred years ago.[23]

Death is the origin of another life. So we wept, so it cost us to enter this one; so we stripped off our former veil as we entered it. Nothing can be grievous that happens only once. Is it reasonable to fear for so long a thing that lasts so short a time? Living a long time and living a short time are made all one by death. For long and short do not apply to things that no longer exist. Aristotle says that there are little creatures on the river Hypanis that live only one day. The one that dies at eight in the morning dies in its youth; the one that dies at five in the evening dies in its decrepitude.[24]

Which of us would not laugh to see this moment of duration weighed in terms of happiness or unhappiness? The more and the less in our own, if we compare it with eternity, or even with the duration of mountains, rivers, stars, trees and even some animals, is no less ridiculous.

NATURE'S SPEECH ON DEATH

Nature tells us that death is part of the order of the world and nothing to fear.

But nature compels us to it. Go out of this world, she says, as you entered it. The same passage you made from death to life, without feeling and without fear, make it again from life to death. Your death is one of the parts of the order of the universe; it is a part of the life of the world. Mortals live by borrowing from one another, / and like runners they hand on the torch of life. Shall I change this fine fabric of things for your sake? It is the condition of your creation; death is a part of you; you are running away from yourselves. This being of yours that you enjoy is shared equally between death and life.

The first day of your birth sets you on the road to dying as well as to living. The first hour that gave us life took it away. / As we are born we die, and the end hangs on the beginning. All the time you live, you steal from life; it is at life's expense. The constant work of your life is to build death. You are in death while you are in life; for you are after death when you are no longer in life. Or, if you prefer it this way, you are dead after life; but during life you are dying; and death touches the dying much more roughly than the dead, and more keenly and essentially.[25]

If you have made good use of life, you have had your fill of it; go away satisfied. Why not leave like a guest who has had his fill of life? If you have not known how to use it, if it was useless to you, what does it matter to you that you have lost it? What do you still want it for? Why seek to add more, / Only to lose it badly again and have it all perish without profit? Life in itself is neither good nor evil: it is the place of good and evil, depending on the room you make for them. And if you have lived one day, you have seen everything: one day is equal to all days. There is no other light, and no other night.

This sun, this moon, these stars, this order of things, are the very same that your forefathers enjoyed and that will sustain your great-great-grandchildren. Your fathers saw no other, nor will your grandsons
Behold any other. And at worst, the distribution and variety of all the acts of my comedy is completed in a single year. If you have paid attention to the round of my four seasons, they take in the childhood, youth, manhood and old age of the world. It has played its game; it knows no other trick than to begin again; it will always be the very same thing. We turn in the same place and stay there forever,
And the year rolls back upon itself along its own tracks. I have no intention of devising other, new pastimes for you.[26]

For there is nothing more I can contrive or invent

Mais quelqu'vn qui s'en soit mal trouué, en auez vous veu? Si est-ce grande simplesse, de condamner chose que vous n'auez esprouuée ny par vous ny par autre. Pourquoy te pleins-tu de moy et de la destinée? Te faisons nous tort? Est-ce à toy de nous gouuerner, ou à nous toy? Encore que ton aage ne soit pas acheué, ta vie l'est. Vn petit homme est homme entier comme vn grand. Ny les hommes ny leurs vies ne se mesurent à l'aune.	Why do you recoil from it, if you cannot draw back? You have seen plenty of people who were the better for dying, escaping great miseries by it. But have you ever seen anyone who was the worse for it? It is very simple-minded to condemn a thing you have never experienced, either yourself or through someone else. Why do you complain of me and of destiny? Do we wrong you? Is it for you to govern us, or for us to govern you? Though your age may not be complete, your life is. A small man is a whole man just as much as a tall one. Neither men nor their lives are measured by the yard.
1.20.28	Chiron refusa l'immortalité, informé des conditions d'icelle, par le Dieu mesme du temps, et de la durée, Saturne son pere. Imaginez de vray, combien seroit vne vie perdurable, moins supportable à l'homme, et plus penible, que n'est la vie que ie luy ay donnée. Si vous n'auiez la mort, vous me maudiriez sans cesse de vous en auoir priué.	Chiron refused immortality when he was told its conditions by the very god of time and duration, Saturn, his father. Just imagine how much less bearable to man, and how much more painful, an everlasting life would be than the life I have given him. If you did not have death, you would curse me endlessly for having deprived you of it.[27]
1.20.29	I'y ay à escient meslé quelque peu d'amertume, pour vous empescher, voyant la commodité de son vsage, de l'embrasser trop auidement et indiscretement. Pour vous loger en cette moderation, ny de fuir la vie, ny de refuir à la mort, que ie demande de vous; i'ay temperé l'vne et l'autre entre la douceur et l'aigreur.	I have deliberately mixed a little bitterness into it, to keep you, when you see how convenient it is to use, from embracing it too greedily and rashly. To settle you in the moderation I ask of you—neither to flee life nor to run away from death—I have tempered both of them between sweetness and sourness.
1.20.30	I'apprins à Thales le premier de voz sages, que le viure et le mourir estoit indifferent: par où, à celuy qui luy demanda, pourquoy donc il ne mouroit, il respondit tressagement, Pour ce qu'il est indifferent. L'eau, la terre, l'air et le feu, et autres membres de ce mien bastiment, ne sont non plus instruments de ta vie, qu'instruments de ta mort. Pourquoy crains-tu ton dernier iour? Il ne confere non plus à ta mort que chascun des autres. Le dernier pas ne faict pas la lassitude: il la declaire. Tous les iours vont à la mort: le dernier y arriue. Voila les bons aduertissemens de nostre mere Nature.	I taught Thales, the first of your sages, that living and dying were all one; and so, when someone asked him why, then, he did not die, he answered very wisely: "Because it is all one." Water, earth, air and fire, and the other parts of this building of mine, are no more instruments of your life than instruments of your death. Why do you fear your last day? It contributes no more to your death than each of the others. The last step does not cause the weariness; it reveals it. Every day travels toward death; the last one arrives. Such are the good counsels of our mother Nature.[28]

27 Chiron, the wise centaur, son of Saturn (the Greek Cronus), gave up his immortality after receiving an incurable wound.

TAKING OFF DEATH'S MASK

The trappings around a deathbed frighten us more than death itself.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.20.31	Or i'ay pensé souuent d'où venoit cela, qu'aux guerres le visage de la mort, soit que nous la voyons en nous ou en autruy, nous semble sans comparaison moins effroyable qu'en nos maisons: autrement ce seroit vne armée de medecins et de pleurars: et elle estant tousiours vne, qu'il y ait toutes-fois beaucoup plus d'asseurance parmy les gens de village et de basse condition qu'és autres.	Now I have often wondered why it is that in war the face of death, whether we see it in ourselves or in others, seems to us incomparably less terrifying than in our homes—otherwise an army would be made up of doctors and weepers; and why, death being always the same, there is nevertheless far more composure among village folk and people of low condition than among others.
	Ie croy à la verité que ce sont ces mines et appareils effroyables, dequoy nous l'entournons, qui nous font plus de peur qu'elle: vne toute nouuelle forme de viure: les cris des meres, des femmes, et des enfans: la visitation de personnes estonnees, et transies: l'assistance d'vn nombre de valets pasles et éplorés: vne chambre sans iour: des cierges allumez: nostre cheuet assiegé de medecins et de prescheurs: somme tout horreur et tout effroy autour de nous. Nous voyla des-ia enseuelis et enterrez. Les enfans ont peur de leurs amis mesmes quand ils les voyent masquez; aussi auons nous. Il faut oster le masque aussi bien des choses, que des personnes.	I truly believe it is those terrifying looks and trappings with which we surround it that frighten us more than death itself: an entirely new way of living; the cries of mothers, wives and children; visits from people dazed and numb with shock; the presence of a crowd of pale, tearful servants; a room without daylight; lighted candles; our bedside besieged by doctors and preachers; in short, nothing but horror and dread all around us. There we are, already shrouded and buried. Children are afraid even of their friends when they see them masked; so are we. We must strip the mask from things as well as from people.
	Osté qu'il sera, nous ne trouuerons au dessoubs, que cette mesme mort, qu'vn valet ou simple chambriere passerent dernierement sans peur. Heureuse la mort qui oste le loisir aux apprests de tel equipage!	Once it is off, we shall find underneath only that same death which a valet or a mere chambermaid went through not long ago without fear. Happy the death that leaves no leisure for preparing such a pageant!

I.21 Of the Power of the Imagination

De la force de l'imagination

Montaigne explores how imagination produces illness, cures, impotence, and supposed miracles, in himself and others.

FRENCH

1.21.1 FORTIS imaginatio generat casum, disent les clercs. Ie suis de ceux qui sentent tresgrand effort de l'imagination. Chacun en est heurté, mais aucuns en sont renuersez. Son impression me perse; et mon art est de luy eschapper, par faute de force à luy resister. Ie viuroye de la seule assistance de personnes saines et gaies. La veuë des angoisses d'autruy m'angoisse materiellement: et a mon sentiment souuent vsurpé le sentiment d'vn tiers. Vn tousseur continuel irrite mon poulmon et mon gosier. Ie visite plus mal volontiers les malades, ausquels le deuoir m'interesse, que ceux ausquels ie m'attens moins, et que ie considere moins. Ie saisis le mal, que i'estudie, et le couche en moy.

Ie ne trouue pas estrange qu'elle donne et les fieures, et la mort, à ceux qui la laissent faire, et qui luy applaudissent. Simon Thomas estoit vn grand medecin de son temps. Il me souuient que me rencontrant vn iour à Thoulouse chez vn riche vieillard pulmonique, et traittant auec luy des moyens de sa guarison, il luy dist, que c'en estoit l'vn, de me donner occasion de me plaire en sa compagnie: et que fichant ses yeux sur la frescheur de mon visage, et sa pensée sur cette allegresse et vigueur, qui regorgeoit de mon adolescence: et remplissant tous ses sens de cet estat florissant en quoy i'estoy lors, son habitude s'en pourroit amender: mais il oublioit à dire, que la mienne s'en pourroit empirer aussi.

Gallus Vibius banda si bien son ame, à comprendre l'essence et les mouuemens de la folie, qu'il emporta son iugement hors de son siege, si qu'onques puis il ne l'y peut remettre: et se pouuoit vanter d'estre deuenu fol par sagesse. Il y en a, qui de frayeur anticipent la main du bourreau; et celuy qu'on debandoit pour luy lire sa grace, se trouua roide mort sur l'eschaffaut du seul coup de son imagination. Nous tressuons, nous tremblons, nous

ENGLISH

A strong imagination produces the event, say the learned. I am one of those who feel the very great force of the imagination. Everyone is jolted by it, but some are knocked flat. Its impression pierces me; and my art is to escape it, for lack of strength to resist it. I would like to live in the company of none but healthy and cheerful people. The sight of other people's anguish causes me real physical anguish, and my senses have often usurped the sensations of someone else. A man who coughs constantly irritates my lungs and my throat. I visit more reluctantly the sick to whom duty binds me than those I am less attached to and care less about. I catch the illness I study and lodge it in myself.

I do not find it strange that imagination brings on fevers and even death in those who give it free rein and encourage it. Simon Thomas was a great physician in his day. I remember that one day, when he met me in Toulouse at the house of a rich old man with a lung disease, and was discussing with him the means of curing him, he told him that one of them was to give me reason to enjoy his company: by fixing his eyes on the freshness of my face and his thoughts on the cheerfulness and vigor overflowing from my youth, and filling all his senses with the flourishing state I was then in, his condition might improve. But he forgot to say that mine might get worse as well.[1]

Vibius Gallus strained his mind so hard to understand the essence and the impulses of madness that he carried his judgment off its seat, so that he could never put it back again; he could boast of having gone mad through wisdom. There are some who, out of fright, forestall the executioner's hand; and one man, whose blindfold was being re-

And hot-blooded youth gets so heated in its harness, fast asleep, that it satisfies its amorous desires in dreams.[2]

1.21.2	Et encore qu'il ne soit pas nouueau de voir croistre la nuict des cornes à tel, qui ne les auoit pas en se couchant: toutesfois l'euenement de Cyppus Roy d'Italie est memorable, lequel pour auoir assisté le iour auec grande affection au combat des taureaux, et avoir eu en songe toute la nuict des cornes en la teste, les produisit en son front par la force de l'imagination. La passion donna au fils de Crœsus la voix, que nature luy auoit refusée. Et Antiochus print la fieure, par la beauté de Stratonicé trop viuement empreinte en son ame. Pline dit auoir veu Lucius Cossitius, de femme changé en homme le iour de ses nopces.	And although it is nothing new to see someone sprout horns in the night who did not have them when he went to bed, still the case of Cippus, king of Italy, is memorable: having watched a bullfight with great excitement during the day, and having had horns on his head in his dreams all night, he produced them on his forehead by the power of imagination. Passion gave the son of Croesus the voice that nature had denied him. And Antiochus caught a fever from the beauty of Stratonice, too vividly imprinted on his soul. Pliny says he saw Lucius Cossitius changed from a woman into a man on his wedding day.[4]
	Pontanus et d'autres racontent pareilles metamorphoses aduenuës en Italie ces siecles passez: et par vehement desir de luy et de sa mere, Vota puer soluit, quæ fæmina vouerat Iphis.	Pontanus and others tell of similar metamorphoses that occurred in Italy in past centuries; and through his own and his mother's vehement desire, Iphis paid as a boy the vows he had made as a girl.[5]
1.21.3	Passant à Vitry le François ie peu voir vn homme que l'Euesque de Soissons auoit nommé Germain en confirmation, lequel tous les habitans de là ont cogneu, et veu fille, iusques à l'aage de vingt deux ans, nommée Marie. Il estoit à cette heure là fort barbu, et vieil, et point marié. Faisant, dit-il, quelque effort en saultant, ses membres virils se produisirent: et est encore en vsage entre les filles de là, vne chanson, par laquelle elles s'entraduertissent de ne faire point de grandes eniambees, de peur de deuenir garçons, comme Marie Germain.	Passing through Vitry-le-François, I was able to see a man whom the Bishop of Soissons had named Germain at his confirmation. All the inhabitants there had known him, and seen him as a girl named Marie, until the age of twenty-two. He was by then heavily bearded, and old, and not married. He said that as he was straining in a jump, his male organs came out. And there is still a song current among the girls there in which they warn one another not to take long strides, for fear of becoming boys, like Marie Germain.[6]

Ce n'est pas tant de merueille que cette sorte d'accident se rencontre frequent: car si l'imagination peut en telles choses, elle est si continuellement et si vigoureusement attachée à ce subiect, que pour n'auoir si souuent à rechoir en mesme pensée et aspreté de desir, elle a meilleur compte d'incorporer, vne fois pour toutes, cette virile partie aux filles.

1.21.4 Les vns attribuent à la force de l'imagination les cicatrices du Roy Dagobert et de Sainct François. On dit que les corps s'en-enleuent telle fois de leur place. Et Celsus recite d'vn Prestre, qui rauissoit son ame en telle extase, que le corps en demeuroit longue espace sans respiration et sans sentiment. Sainct Augustin en nomme vn autre, à qui il ne falloit que faire ouïr des cris lamentables et plaintifs: soudain il defailloit, et s'emportoit si viuement hors de soy, qu'on auoit beau le tempester, et hurler, et le pincer, et le griller, iusques à ce qu'il fust resuscité: lors il disoit auoir ouy des voix, mais comme venant de loing: et s'aperceuoit de ses eschaudures et meurtrisseures.

Et que ce ne fust vne obstination apostée contre son sentiment, cela le montroit, qu'il n'auoit ce pendant ny poulx ny haleine. Il est vraysemblable, que le principal credit des visions, des enchantemens, et de tels effects extraordinaires, vienne de la puissance de l'imagination, agissant principalement contre les ames du vulgaire, plus molles. On leur a si fort saisi la creance, qu'ils pensent voir ce qu'ils ne voyent pas.

ENGLISH

It is not so very surprising that this sort of accident happens often. For if imagination has power in such matters, it is so continually and so vigorously fixed on this subject that, rather than having to fall back so often into the same thought and the same sharpness of desire, it finds it simpler to incorporate this male part into girls once and for all.

Some attribute to the power of imagination the scars of King Dagobert and of Saint Francis. It is said that bodies are sometimes lifted from their place by it. And Celsus tells of a priest who would carry his soul off into such an ecstasy that his body remained for a long time without breath or sensation. Saint Augustine names another who had only to hear cries of lament and grief to faint at once, and to go so completely out of himself that it was no use storming at him and yelling, pinching him and burning him, until he came back to life. Then he would say he had heard voices, but as if from far away; and he would notice his burns and bruises.[7]

And that this was not a stubbornness put on in defiance of his feelings was shown by the fact that meanwhile he had neither pulse nor breath. It is likely that visions, enchantments and such extraordinary effects owe most of their credit to the power of imagination, acting chiefly on the souls of the common people, which are softer. Their belief has been so firmly seized that they think they see what they do not see.

SPELLS OF IMPOTENCE

Fear and imagination cause the failures blamed on knotting spells; a playful counter-charm cures one.

1.21.5 Ie suis encore en ce doubte, que ces plaisantes liaisons dequoy nostre monde se voit si entraué qu'il ne se parle d'autre chose, ce sont volontiers des impressions de l'apprehension et de la crainte. Car ie sçay par experience, que tel de qui ie puis respondre, comme de moy-mesme, en qui il ne pouuoit choir soupçon aucun de foiblesse, et aussi peu d'enchantement, ayant ouy faire le conte à vn sien compagnon d'vne defaillance extraordinaire, en quoy il estoit tombé sur le point qu'il en auoit le moins de besoin, se trouuant en pareille occasion, l'horreur de ce conte luy vint à coup si

I am still inclined to suspect that those comical spells of tying, which hamper our world so much that people talk of nothing else, are usually the effects of apprehension and fear. For I know from experience that a certain man, for whom I can answer as for myself, and on whom no suspicion of weakness could fall, and just as little of enchantment, had heard one of his companions tell of an extraordinary failure that had come over him at the very moment he could least afford it. Et de là en hors fut subiect à y renchoir: ce villain souuenir de son inconuenient le gourmandant et tyrannisant. Il trouua quelque remede à cette resuerie, par vne autre resuerie. C'est qu'aduouant luy mesme, et preschant auant la main, cette sienne subiection, la contention de son ame se soulageoit, sur ce, qu'apportant ce mal comme attendu, son obligation en amoindrissoit, et luy en poisoit moins. Quand il a eu loy, à son chois (sa pensée desbrouillée et desbandée, son corps se trouuant en son deu) de le faire lors premierement tenter, saisir, et surprendre à la cognoissance d'autruy, il s'est guari tout net. A qui on a esté vne fois capable, on n'est plus incapable, sinon par iuste foiblesse.

Ce malheur n'est à craindre qu'aux entreprinses, où nostre ame se trouue outre mesure tendue de desir et de respect; et notamment où les commoditez se rencontrent improuueues et pressantes. On n'a pas moyen de se rauoir de ce trouble. I'en sçay, à qui il a seruy d'y apporter le corps mesme, demy rassasié d'ailleurs, pour endormir l'ardeur de cette fureur, et qui par l'aage, se trouue moins impuissant, de ce qu'il est moins puissant: et tel autre, à qui il a serui aussi qu'vn amy l'ayt asseuré d'estre fourni d'vne contrebatterie d'enchantemens certains, à le preseruer. story suddenly struck his imagination so hard that he met with the same fate.[8]

And from then on he was liable to relapse, that wretched memory of his mishap bullying and tyrannizing him. He found some remedy for this fancy in another fancy. By admitting and announcing this weakness of his in advance, he relieved the strain on his soul, because by presenting the trouble as something expected, he lessened his obligation and it weighed on him less. When he had the opportunity, at a time of his own choosing—his mind clear and relaxed, his body in proper order—to let it first be tried, taken hold of and caught unawares, with the other person's knowledge, he was completely cured. With a woman toward whom one has once been capable, one is never again incapable, except through genuine weakness.

This misfortune is only to be feared in undertakings where our soul is strained beyond measure with desire and respect, and particularly where the opportunity comes unexpectedly and urgently. There is no way to recover from that disturbance. I know one man who found it helpful to bring to the task a body already half sated elsewhere, to dull the heat of that frenzy, and who with age finds himself less impotent for being less potent; and another who was also helped when a friend assured him that he was supplied with a counterbattery of sure enchantments to protect him. I had better tell how that came about.

A count of very good family, with whom I was on very intimate terms, was marrying a beautiful lady who had been courted by a man present at the festivities. This caused his friends great anxiety, and especially an old lady, a relative of his, who was presiding over the wedding and holding it at her house, and who feared these sorceries; she told me so. I asked her to leave it to me. I happened to have in my coffers a certain small flat piece of gold engraved with some celestial figures, good against sunstroke and for taking away headaches when placed exactly on the suture of the skull; and to keep it there, it was sewn to a ribbon meant to be tied under the chin.

A fancy akin to the one we are talking about. Jacques Peletier, when he was living at my house, Ces singeries sont le principal de l'effect. Nostre pensée ne se pouuant desmesler, que moyens si estranges ne viennent de quelque abstruse science. Leur inanité leur donne poids et reuerence. Somme il fut certain, que mes characteres se trouuerent plus Veneriens que Solaires, plus en action qu'en prohibition. Ce fut vne humeur prompte et curieuse, qui me conuia à tel effect, esloigné de ma nature.

Ie suis ennemy des actions subtiles et feintes: et hay la finesse, en mes mains, non seulement recreatiue, mais aussi profitable. Si l'action n'est vicieuse, la routte l'est.

had made me this singular present. I thought of putting it to some use, and told the count that he might run the same risk as others, since there were men present who would like to play such a trick on him; but that he should go boldly to bed: I would do him a friend's turn, and would not withhold, if he needed it, a miracle that was in my power, provided he promised me on his honor to keep it most faithfully secret. Only, when they came during the night to bring him the late-night collation, if things had gone badly for him, he was to give me such-and-such a sign.[9]

His mind and ears had been so battered that he found himself tied up by the agitation of his imagination, and he gave me his sign at the appointed time. Then I whispered to him to get up, on the pretext of chasing us out, and playfully take the dressing gown I had on (we were very close in size) and put it on until he had carried out my prescription, which was this: when we had gone out, he was to withdraw to pass water, say such-and-such words three times, and make such-and-such movements. Each of those three times he was to tie around himself the ribbon I was putting into his hand, and very carefully place the medal attached to it over his loins, with the figure in such-and-such a position.

That done, and having tied the ribbon tight the last time so that it could neither come undone nor slip from its place, he was to go back to his appointed task with complete confidence, and not forget to throw my gown over his bed so that it covered them both. These monkey tricks are the main part of the effect, since our minds cannot rid themselves of the idea that such strange means must come from some abstruse science. Their very inanity gives them weight and reverence. In short, it was certain that my figures proved more Venusian than solar, more for action than for prohibition. It was a sudden and curious whim that led me to such a deed, so far removed from my nature.

I am an enemy of subtle and feigned actions, and I hate trickery in my own hands, not only when it is for amusement but even when it is profitable. If the action is not wicked, the way to it is.

Amasis Roy d'Ægypte, espousa Laodice tresbelle fille Grecque: et luy, qui se montroit gentil compagnon par tout ailleurs, se trouua court à iouïr d'elle: et menaça de la tuer, estimant que ce fust quelque sorcerie. Comme és choses qui consistent en fantasie, elle le reietta à la deuotion: et ayant faict ses vœus et promesses à Venus, il se trouua diuinement remis, dés la premiere nuict, d'apres ses oblations et sacrifices. Or elles ont tort de nous recueillir de ces contenances mineuses, querelleuses et fuyardes, qui nous esteignent en nous allumant. La bru de Pythagoras, disoit, que la femme qui se couche auec vn homme, doit auec sa cotte laisser quant et quant la honte, et la reprendre auec sa cotte.

ENGLISH

Amasis, king of Egypt, married Laodice, a very beautiful Greek girl; and he, who showed himself a lusty fellow everywhere else, found himself falling short when it came to enjoying her, and threatened to kill her, thinking it was some sorcery. As is usual in things that consist in fancy, she referred him to devotion; and having made his vows and promises to Venus, he found himself divinely restored from the very first night after his offerings and sacrifices. Now women are wrong to receive us with those coy, quarrelsome, evasive airs that put out our fire while kindling it. The daughter-in-law of Pythagoras used to say that a woman who goes to bed with a man should put off her modesty along with her petticoat, and put it back on with her petticoat.

L'ame de l'assaillant troublée de plusieurs diuerses allarmes, se perd aisement. Et à qui l'imagination a faict vne fois souffrir cette honte (et elle ne la fait souffrir qu'aux premieres accointances, d'autant qu'elles sont plus ardantes et aspres; et aussi qu'en cette premiere cognoissance qu'on donne de soy, on craint beaucoup plus de faillir) ayant mal commencé, il entre en fieure et despit de cet accident, qui luy dure aux occasions suiuantes.

The soul of the assailant, troubled by many different alarms, is easily lost. And when imagination has once made a man suffer this shame—and it does so only in first encounters, since these are more ardent and eager, and also because in this first acquaintance one gives of oneself one is far more afraid of failing—having begun badly, he falls into a fever of vexation over the accident, which stays with him on later occasions.

1.21.8 Les mariez, le temps estant tout leur, ne doiuent ny presser ny taster leur entreprinse, s'ils ne sont prests. Et vault mieux faillir indecemment, à estreiner la couche nuptiale, pleine d'agitation et de fieure, attendant vne et vne autre commodité plus priuée et moins allarmée, que de tomber en vne perpetuelle misere, pour s'estre estonné et desesperé du premier refus. Auant la possession prinse, le patient se doibt à saillies et diuers temps, legerement essayer et offrir, sans se piquer et opiniastrer, à se conuaincre definitiuement soy-mesme. Ceux qui sçauent leurs membres de nature dociles, qu'ils se soignent seulement de contre-pipper leur fantasie.

Married couples, who have all the time in the world, should neither press nor attempt their undertaking if they are not ready. It is better to fail, however unseemly, to christen the marriage bed while it is full of agitation and fever, and to wait for some other, more private and less anxious opportunity, than to fall into perpetual misery from having been stunned and driven to despair by the first refusal. Before taking possession, the patient should try and offer himself lightly, in sallies and at various times, without getting stubborn and insisting on convincing himself once and for all. Those who know their members to be naturally docile need only take care to outwit their own fancy.

Si toutesfois en ce qu'on gourmande sa rebellion, et qu'on en tire preuue de sa condemnation, il m'auoit payé pour plaider sa cause: à l'aduenture mettroy-ie en souspeçon noz autres membres ses compagnons, de luy estre allé dresser par belle enuie, de l'importance et douceur de son vsage, cette querelle apostée, et auoir par complot, armé le monde à l'encontre de luy, le chargeant malignement seul de leur faute commune.

Car ie vous donne à penser, s'il y a vne seule des parties de nostre corps, qui ne refuse à nostre volonté souuent son operation, et qui souuent ne s'exerce contre nostre volonté: elles ont chacune des passions propres, qui les esueillent et endorment, sans nostre congé. A quant de fois tesmoignent les mouuements forcez de nostre visage, les pensées que nous tenions secrettes, et nous trahissent aux assistants? Cette mesme cause qui anime ce membre, anime aussi sans nostre sceu, le cœur, le poulmon, et le pouls: la veue d'vn obiect agreable, respandant imperceptiblement en nous la flamme d'vne emotion fieureuse.

N'y a-il que ces muscles et ces veines, qui s'eleuent et se couchent, sans l'adueu non seulement de nostre volonté, mais aussi de notre pensée? Nous ne commandons pas à noz cheueux de se herisser, et à nostre peau de fremir de desir ou de crainte. La main se porte souuent où nous ne l'enuoyons pas. tunely when we have most use for it, contesting authority so imperiously with our will, and refusing with such pride and obstinacy our solicitations both mental and manual. Yet if, when its rebellion is being scolded and used as proof for its condemnation, it had paid me to plead its cause, I might perhaps cast suspicion on our other members, its fellows, of having trumped up this quarrel against it out of sheer envy of the importance and sweetness of its function, and of having conspired to arm the world against it, maliciously charging it alone with their common fault.

For I leave you to consider whether there is a single part of our body that does not often refuse to work at our will, and that does not often act against our will. Each of them has passions of its own that rouse it and put it to sleep without our leave. How often do the involuntary movements of our face bear witness to thoughts we were keeping secret, and betray us to those around us? The same cause that animates this member also animates, without our knowledge, the heart, the lungs and the pulse, the sight of a pleasing object imperceptibly spreading through us the flame of a feverish emotion.

Is it only these muscles and veins that rise and lie down without the consent not only of our will but even of our thought? We do not command our hair to stand on end, or our skin to quiver with desire or fear. Our hand often goes where we do not send it. Our tongue goes numb and our voice freezes when they please. Even when we have nothing to put in the pan and would gladly forbid it, the appetite for eating and drinking does not fail to stir the parts subject to it, just like that other appetite; and it likewise deserts us, at the wrong moment, whenever it likes.

The organs that serve to empty the bowels have their own dilations and contractions, beyond and against our wishes, just like those meant to empty the kidneys. And when, to vindicate the power of our will, Saint Augustine claims to have seen a man who could command his backside to produce as many farts as he wanted, and Vives caps this with another example from his own time, of farts arranged to follow the tone of words spoken to them, that does not imply any more perfect obedi-

	Ioint que i'en cognoy vn, si turbulent et reuesche, qu'il y a quarante ans, qu'il tient son maistre à peter d'vne haleine et d'vne obligation constante et irremittente, et le menne ainsin à la mort. Et pleust à Dieu, que ie ne le sceusse que par les histoires, combien de fois nostre ventre par le refus d'vn seul pet, nous menne iusques aux portes d'vne mort tres-angoisseuse: et que l'Empereur qui nous donna liberté de peter par tout, nous en eust donné le pouuoir.	Besides, I know of one so turbulent and unruly that for forty years it has kept its master farting with a constant and unremitting wind and compulsion, and is thus leading him to his death. And I wish to God I knew only from history books how often our belly, by refusing a single fart, brings us to the very gates of an agonizing death; and that the emperor who gave us the freedom to fart anywhere had given us the power to do so![11]
1.21.11	Mais nostre volonté, pour les droits de qui nous mettons en auant ce reproche, combien plus vray-semblablement la pouuons nous marquer de rebellion et sedition, par son des-reglement et desobeissance? Ne veut elle pas souuent ce que nous luy prohibons de vouloir; et à nostre euident dommage? se laisse elle non plus mener aux conclusions de nostre raison?	But our will, on behalf of whose rights we bring this reproach—how much more plausibly can we brand it with rebellion and sedition for its unruliness and disobedience! Does it always will what we would like it to will? Does it not often will what we forbid it to will, and to our evident harm? Does it let itself be led any better by the conclusions of our reason?

Car l'effect d'iceluy est bien de conuier inopportunement par fois, mais refuser, iamais: et de conuier encore tacitement et quietement. Partant se void l'animosité et illegalité manifeste des accusateurs. Quoy qu'il en soit, protestant, que les Aduocats et Iuges ont beau quereller et sentencier: nature tirera cependant son train: qui n'auroit faict que raison, quand elle auroit doüé ce membre de quelque particulier priuilege. Autheur du seul ouurage immortel, des mortels.	Finally, I would say on behalf of the gentleman my client: may it please the court to consider that in this matter, although his case is inseparably and indistinguishably joined with that of an associate, it is he alone who is accused, and with arguments and charges that cannot apply to his said associate. For the latter's action is indeed sometimes to invite inopportunely, but never to refuse; and to invite, moreover, silently and quietly. Hence the animosity and manifest illegality of the accusers is plain to see. Be that as it may, I protest that lawyers and judges may wrangle and pass sentence as they please: nature will meanwhile go her own way. And she would only have done right had she endowed this member with some special privilege, as the author of the only immortal work of mortals.

tant de fausses promesses de sa guerison: si ce n'est afin que l'effect de l'imagination supplee l'imposture de leur aposéme? Ils sçauent qu'vn des maistres de ce mestier leur a laissé par escrit, qu'il s'est trouué des hommes à qui la seule veuë de la medecine faisoit l'operation.

Et tout ce caprice m'est tombé presentement en main, sur le conte que me faisoit vn domestique apotiquaire de feu mon pere, homme simple et Souysse, nation peu vaine et mensongiere: d'auoir cogneu long temps vn marchand à Toulouse maladif et subiect à la pierre qui auoit, souuent besoing de clysteres, et se les faisoit diuersement ordonner aux Medecins, selon l'occurrence de son mal: apportez qu'ils estoyent, il n'y auoit rien obmis des formes accoustumées: souuent il tastoit s'ils estoyent trop chauds: le voyla couché, renuersé, et toutes les approches faictes, sauf qu'il ne s'y faisoit aucune iniection. L'apotiquaire retiré apres cette ceremonie, le patient accommodé, comme s'il auoit veritablement pris le clystere, il en sentoit pareil effect à ceux qui les prennent.

Et si le Medecin n'en trouuoit l'operation suffisante, il luy en redonnoit deux ou trois autres, de mesme forme. Mon tesmoin iure, que pour espargner la despence, car il les payoit, comme s'il les eut receus, la femme de ce malade ayant quelquefois essayé d'y faire seulement mettre de l'eau tiede, l'effect en descouurit la fourbe; et pour auoir trouué ceux-la inutiles, qu'il faulsit reuenir à la premiere façon.

1.21.14 Vne femme pensant auoir aualé vne espingle auec son pain, crioit et se tourmentoit comme ayant vne douleur insupportable au gosier, où elle pensoit la sentir arrestée: mais par ce qu'il n'y auoit ny enfleure ny alteration par le dehors, vn habil'homme ayant iugé que ce n'estoit que fantasie et opinion, prise de quelque morceau de pain qui l'auoit picquée en passant, la fit vomir, et ietta à la desrobée dans ce qu'elle rendit, vne espingle tortue. Cette femme cuidant l'auoir rendue, se sentit soudain deschargée de sa douleur.

Ie sçay qu'vn Gentil'homme ayant traicté chez luy vne bonne compagnie, se vanta trois ou quatre iours apres par maniere de ieu, car il n'en estoit rien, de leur auoir faict manger vn chat en paste: dequoy vne damoyselle de tient's credulity beforehand with so many false promises of a cure, if not so that the effect of imagination may make up for the imposture of their potion? They know that one of the masters of their profession has left it in writing that there have been men on whom the mere sight of medicine did the work.[13]

And this whole fancy has just come to hand from a story told me by an apothecary in my late father's household, a simple man and a Swiss, a nation little given to vanity and lying. He had long known a merchant in Toulouse, sickly and subject to the stone, who often needed enemas and had his doctors prescribe them in various forms according to the course of his illness. When they were brought, none of the usual formalities was left out; he would often feel them to see if they were too hot; there he lay, turned over, with all the preliminaries done—except that no injection was given. The apothecary having withdrawn after this ceremony, and the patient settled as if he had really taken the enema, he felt the same effect from it as those who actually take them.

And if the doctor did not find its effect sufficient, he would give him two or three more of the same kind. My witness swears that when the sick man's wife, to save expense (for he paid for them as if he had received them), sometimes tried having just warm water put in, the effect gave away the trick; and since those proved useless, they had to go back to the first method.

A woman who thought she had swallowed a pin with her bread was crying out and tormenting herself as if she had an unbearable pain in her throat, where she thought she felt it stuck. But because there was no swelling or change on the outside, a clever man judged that it was only fancy and imagination, caused by some piece of bread that had scratched her on the way down. He made her vomit, and slipped a bent pin into what she brought up. The woman, believing she had got rid of it, felt suddenly relieved of her pain.

I know of a gentleman who, having entertained a good company at his house, boasted three or four days later, as a joke (for there was nothing to it), that he had made them eat a cat baked in a pie. A young lady of the party was seized with such horror at this that she fell into a severe stomach disorder and fever, and it proved impossible to save her.

1.21.16 Mais tout cecy se peut rapporter à l'estroite cousture de l'esprit et du corps s'entre-communiquants leurs fortunes. C'est autre chose; que l'imagination agisse quelque fois, non contre son corps seulement, mais contre le corps d'autruy. Et tout ainsi qu'vn corps reiette son mal à son voisin, comme il se voit en la peste, en la verolle, et au mal des yeux, qui se chargent de l'vn à l'autre: Dum spectant oculi læsos, læduntur et ipsi: / Multáque corporibus transitione nocent. pareillement l'imagination esbranlée auecques vehemence, eslance des traits, qui puissent offencer l'obiect estrangier. Les tortues, et les autruches couuent leurs œufs de la seule veuë, signe qu'ils y ont quelque vertu eiaculatrice. Et quant aux sorciers, on les dit auoir des yeux offensifs et nuisans. Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos. Ce sont pour moy mauuais respondans que magiciens. Tant y a que nous voyons par experience, les femmes enuoyer aux corps des enfans, qu'elles portent au ventre, des marques de leurs fantasies: tesmoin celle qui engendra le More. Et il fut presenté à Charles Roy de Boheme et Empereur, vne fille d'aupres de Pise toute velue et herissée, que sa mere disoit auoir esté ainsi conceuë, à cause d'vn' image de Sainct Iean Baptiste pendue en son lict.

Even animals are seen to be subject, as we are, to the power of imagination: witness dogs that let themselves die of grief at the loss of their masters. We also see them yap and twitch in their dreams, and horses whinny and thrash about.

But all this may be put down to the close seam between mind and body, which share their fortunes with each other. It is another matter for the imagination sometimes to act not only on its own body but on someone else's. And just as a body passes its illness on to its neighbor, as is seen with the plague, the pox and sore eyes, which are caught from one person to another—Eyes that look on sore eyes grow sore themselves; / And many ills pass from body to body by contagion—so the imagination, when violently stirred, shoots out darts that can strike an outside object. Antiquity held that certain women in Scythia, when roused and angry with someone, could kill him with a look alone.[14]

Tortoises and ostriches hatch their eggs by sight alone, a sign that there is some ejaculatory power in their eyes. And as for sorcerers, they are said to have harmful and baneful eyes. Some eye or other is bewitching my tender lambs. Magicians are poor guarantors, as far as I am concerned. Be that as it may, we see by experience that women transmit marks of their fancies to the bodies of the children they carry in their wombs: witness the woman who gave birth to the dark-skinned child. And there was presented to Charles, king of Bohemia and emperor, a girl from near Pisa, all hairy and bristly, whose mother said she had been conceived that way because of an image of Saint John the Baptist hanging by her bed.[15]

The same is true of animals: witness Jacob's sheep, and the partridges and hares that the snow turns white in the mountains. Recently at my house a cat was seen watching a bird at the top of a tree; and after they had fixed their eyes firmly on each other for some time, the bird let itself drop as if dead between the cat's paws, either intoxicated by

1.21.18	Ceux qui ayment la volerie ont ouy faire le conte du fauconnier, qui arrestant obstinément sa veuë contre vn milan en l'air, gageoit, de la seule force de sa veuë le ramener contrebas: et le faisoit, à ce qu'on dit. Car les histoires que i'emprunte, ie les renuoye sur la conscience de ceux de qui ie les prens. Les discours sont à moy, et se tiennent par la preuue de la raison, non de l'experience; chacun y peut ioindre ses exemples: et qui n'en a point, qu'il ne laisse pas de croire qu'il en est assez, veu le nombre et varieté des accidens. Si ie ne comme bien, qu'vn autre comme pour moy.	Those who love falconry have heard the story of the falconer who, fixing his gaze stubbornly on a kite in the air, wagered that by the sole force of his gaze he would bring it down; and he did, so they say. For the stories I borrow, I leave them on the conscience of those I take them from. The reasonings are mine, and they stand by the proof of reason, not of experience; anyone can add his own examples to them; and whoever has none, let him not stop believing that there are plenty, given the number and variety of things that happen. If my comparisons are not apt, let someone else make them for me.
	Aussi en l'estude que ie traitte, de noz mœurs et mouuements, les tesmoignages fabuleux, pourueu qu'ils soient possibles, y seruent comme les vrais. Aduenu ou non aduenu, à Rome ou à Paris, à Iean ou à Pierre, c'est tousiours vn tour de l'humaine capacité: duquel ie suis vtilement aduisé par ce recit. Ie le voy, et en fay mon profit, egalement en vmbre qu'en corps. Et aux diuerses leçons, qu'ont souuent les histoires, ie prens à me seruir de celle qui est la plus rare et memorable. Il y a des autheurs, desquels la fin c'est dire les euenements. La mienne, si i'y scauoye aduenir, seroit dire sur ce qui peut aduenir.	Besides, in the study I am engaged in, of our ways and impulses, fabulous testimonies, provided they are possible, serve as well as true ones. Whether it happened or not, in Rome or in Paris, to John or to Peter, it is always a turn of human capability, of which this account usefully informs me. I see it and profit from it as much in shadow as in substance. And of the various versions that stories often have, I make a point of using the rarest and most memorable. There are authors whose aim is to relate what happened. Mine, if I could achieve it, would be to speak about what can happen.
	Il est justement permis aux Escholes, de supposer des similitudes, quand ilz n'en ont point. Ie n'en fay pas ainsi pourtant, et surpasse de ce costé là, en religion superstitieuse, toute foy historiale. Aux exemples que ie tire ceans, de ce que i'ay leu, ouï, faict, ou dict, ie me suis defendu d'oser alterer iusques aux plus legeres et inutiles circonstances, ma conscience ne falsifie pas vn iota, mon inscience ie ne sçay.	The schools are rightly allowed to invent illustrations when they have none. I do not do so, however, and in that respect I surpass all historical fidelity in superstitious scrupulousness. In the examples I bring in here from what I have read, heard, done or said, I have forbidden myself to dare to alter even the slightest and most useless circumstances. My conscience does not falsify one iota; my ignorance—I don't know.

Des actions à diuers membres, qui se passent en leur presence, ils refuseroient d'en rendre tesmoignage, assermentez par vn iuge. Et n'ont homme si familier, des intentions duquel ils entreprennent de pleinement respondre. Ie tien moins hazardeux d'escrire les choses passées, que presentes: d'autant que l'escriuain n'a à rendre compte que d'vne verité empruntée.	How can they answer for the thoughts of people they do not know, and pass off their conjectures as ready cash? Of actions involving many parties that take place in their presence, they would refuse to bear witness if put under oath by a judge; and they know no man so intimately that they would undertake to answer fully for his intentions. I consider it less hazardous to write of things past than of things present, inasmuch as the writer has only to account for a borrowed truth.
1.21.20	Aucuns me conuient d'escrire les affaires de mon temps: estimants que ie les voy d'vne veuë moins blessée de passion, qu'vn autre, et de plus pres, pour l'accés que fortune m'a donné aux chefs de diuers partis. Mais ils ne disent pas, que pour la gloire de Salluste ie n'en prendroys pas la peine: ennemy iuré d'obligation, d'assiduité, de constance: qu'il n'est rien si contraire à mon stile, qu'vne narration estendue. Ie me recouppe si souuent, à faute d'haleine. Ie n'ay ny composition ny explication, qui vaille. Ignorant au delà d'vn enfant, des frases et vocables, qui seruent aux choses plus communes. Pourtant ay-ie prins à dire ce que ie sçay dire: accommodant la matiere à ma force.	Some people urge me to write the history of my own times, believing that I see things with an eye less wounded by passion than another man's, and from closer up, because of the access fortune has given me to the leaders of various parties. But they do not mention that I would not take the trouble even for the glory of Sallust, sworn enemy that I am of obligation, assiduity and constancy; and that nothing is so contrary to my style as an extended narrative. I cut myself short so often, for lack of breath. I have neither composition nor exposition worth anything. I am more ignorant than a child of the phrases and words used for the commonest things. That is why I have undertaken to say what I know how to say, fitting the matter to my strength.[17]
	Si i'en prenois qui me guidast, ma mesure pourroit faillir à la sienne. Que ma liberté, estant si libre, i'eusse publié des iugements, à mon gré mesme, et selon raison, illegitimes et punissables.	If I took a subject that led me, my measure might fall short of its own. And my freedom being so free, I might have published judgments that, even in my own opinion and according to reason, were unlawful and punishable.
1.21.21	Plutarche nous diroit volontiers de ce qu'il en a faict, que c'est l'ouurage d'autruy, que ses exemples soient en tout et par tout veritables: qu'ils soient vtiles à la posterité, et presentez d'vn lustre, qui nous esclaire à la vertu, que c'est son ouurage. Il n'est pas dangereux, comme en vne drogue medicinale, en vn compte ancien, qu'il soit ainsin ou ainsi.	Plutarch would readily tell us, of what he has done, that if his examples are true in every respect and every detail, that is the work of others; that if they are useful to posterity, and presented with a luster that lights our way to virtue, that is his own work. In an old tale, unlike a medicinal drug, there is no danger whether it is this way or that.

I.22 One Man's Profit Is Another Man's Loss

Le profit de l'vn est dommage de l'autre
Every profit comes at someone's loss—and nature too lives by one thing's birth being another's corruption.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.22.1	DEMADES Athenien condemna vn homme de sa ville, qui faisoit mestier de vendre les choses necessaires aux enterremens, soubs tiltre de ce qu'il en demandoit trop de profit, et que ce profit ne luy pouuoit venir sans la mort de beaucoup de gens. Ce iugement semble estre mal pris; d'autant qu'il ne se faict aucun profit qu'au dommage d'autruy, et qu'à ce compte il faudroit condamner toute sorte de guain.	Demades the Athenian condemned a man of his city whose trade was selling the things needed for funerals, on the ground that he asked too much profit for them, and that this profit could not come to him without the death of many people. This judgment seems ill-founded, since no profit is made except at someone else's expense, and by that reckoning every kind of gain would have to be condemned.[1]
1.22.2	Le marchand ne faict bien ses affaires, qu'à la débauche de la ieunesse: le laboureur à la cherté des bleds: l'architecte à la ruine des maisons: les officiers de la Iustice aux procez et querelles des hommes: l'honneur mesme et pratique des Ministres de la religion se tire de nostre mort et de noz vices. Nul Medecin ne prent plaisir à la santé de ses amis mesmes, dit l'ancien Comique Grec; ny soldat à la paix de sa ville: ainsi du reste. Et qui pis est, que chacun se sonde au dedans, il trouuera que nos souhaits interieurs pour la plus part naissent et se nourrissent aux despens d'autruy.	The merchant does good business only through the extravagance of the young; the farmer through the high price of grain; the architect through the ruin of houses; officers of justice through men's lawsuits and quarrels; even the honor and practice of ministers of religion derive from our death and our vices. No doctor takes pleasure in the health even of his friends, says the ancient Greek comic poet, nor any soldier in the peace of his city; and so on with the rest. And what is worse, let each of us sound himself within, and he will find that our inmost wishes are for the most part born and nourished at the expense of others.[2]
	Ce que considerant, il m'est venu en fantasie, comme nature ne se dement point en cela de sa generale police: car les Physiciens tiennent, que la naissance, nourrissement et, augmentation de chasque chose, est l'alteration et corruption d'vn' autre. Nam quodcunque suis mutatum finibus exit, / Continuó hoc mors est illius, quod fuit antè.	As I considered this, it occurred to me that nature in this respect does not depart from her general order; for the natural philosophers hold that the birth, nourishment and growth of each thing is the alteration and corruption of another. For whatever is changed and passes beyond its bounds, / That is at once the death of what it was before.[3]

I.23 Of Custom, and Not Easily Changing an Accepted Law

De la coustume, et de ne changer aisément vne loy receüe
Custom rules us like a tyrant, shaping even conscience; yet Montaigne counsels against lightly changing established laws.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.23.1	CELVY me semble auoir tres-bien conceu la force de la coustume, qui premier forgea ce compte, qu'vne femme de village ayant appris de caresser et porter entre ses bras vn veau des l'heure de sa naissance, et continuant tousiours à ce faire, gaigna cela par l'accoustumance, que tout grand beuf qu'il estoit, elle le portoit encore. Car c'est à la verité vne violente et traistresse maistresse d'escole, que la coustume. Elle establit en nous, peu à peu, à la desrobée, le pied de son authorité: mais par ce doux et humble commencement, l'ayant rassis et planté auec l'ayde du temps, elle nous descouure tantost vn furieux et tyrannique visage, contre lequel nous n'auons plus la liberté de hausser seulement les yeux.	He seems to me to have grasped very well the power of custom who first made up this story: that a village woman, having learned to pet a calf and carry it in her arms from the hour of its birth, and continuing always to do so, gained this by habit, that even when it was a great ox she could still carry it. For custom is in truth a violent and treacherous schoolmistress. Little by little, by stealth, she establishes the foothold of her authority in us; but having by this gentle and humble beginning settled and planted it with the help of time, she soon reveals to us a furious and tyrannical face, against which we no longer have the freedom even to raise our eyes.
	Nous luy voyons forcer tous les coups les regles de nature: Vsus efficacissimus rerum omnium magister. I'en croy l'antre de Platon en sa republique, et les Medecins, qui quittent si souuent à son authorité les raisons de leur art: et ce Roy qui par son moyen rangea son estomac à se nourrir de poison: et la fille qu'Albert recite s'estre accoustumée à viure d'araignées: et en ce monde des Indes nouuelles on trouua des grands peuples, et en fort diuers climats, qui en viuoient, en faisoient prouision, et les appastoient: comme aussi des sauterelles, formiz, laizards, chauuesouriz, et fut vn crapault vendu six escus en vne necessité de viures: ils les cuisent et apprestent à diuerses sauces.	We see her force the rules of nature at every turn. Custom is the most effective teacher of all things. I take as witness Plato's cave in his Republic; and the doctors, who so often abandon the reasonings of their art in favor of her authority; and that king who by her means trained his stomach to feed on poison; and the girl Albert tells of, who accustomed herself to live on spiders. And in that world of the new Indies, great peoples were found, in very different climates, who lived on spiders, laid in stores of them and fattened them; and also on grasshoppers, ants, lizards and bats; and a toad was sold for six crowns in a time of food shortage. They cook them and serve them with various sauces.[1]
	Il en fut trouué d'autres ausquels noz chairs et noz viandes estoyent mortelles et venimeuses. Consuetudinis magna vis est. Pernoctant venatores in niue: in montibus vri se patiuntur: Pugiles, cœstibus contusi, ne ingemiscunt quidem.	Others were found to whom our meats and our foods were deadly and poisonous. Great is the power of custom. Hunters spend the night in the snow; they let themselves be scorched in the mountains. Boxers, bruised by the cestus, do not even groan.[2]
1.23.2	Ces exemples estrangers ne sont pas estranges, si nous considerons ce que nous essayons ordinairement;	These foreign examples are not strange if we consider what we commonly experience: how much combien l'accoustumance hebete noz sens. Il ne nous faut pas aller cercher ce qu'on dit des voisins des cataractes du Nil: et ce que les Philosophes estiment de la musicque celeste; que les corps de ces cercles, estants solides, polis, et venants à se lescher et frotter l'vn à l'autre en roullant, ne peuuent faillir de produire vne merueilleuse harmonie: aux couppures et muances de laquelle se manient les contours et changements des caroles des astres. Mais qu'vniuersellement les ouïes des creatures de çà bas, endormies, comme celles des Ægyptiens, par la continuation de ce son, ne le peuuent apperceuoir, pour grand qu'il soit.

Les mareschaux, meulniers, armuriers, ne sçauroient demeurer au bruit, qui les frappe, s'il les perçoit comme nous. Mon collet de fleurs sert à mon nez: mais apres que ie m'en suis vestu trois iours de suitte, il ne sert qu'aux nez assistants. Cecy est plus estrange, que, nonobstant les longs interualles et intermissions, l'accoustumance puisse ioindre et establir l'effect de son impression sur noz sens: comme essayent les voysins des clochiers. Ie loge chez moy en vne tour, où à la diane et à la retraitte vne forte grosse cloche sonne tous les iours l'Aué Maria.

Ce tintamarre estonne ma tour mesme: et aux premiers iours me semblant insupportable, en peu de temps m'appriuoise de maniere que ie l'oy sans offense, et souuent sans m'en esueiller.

1.23.3 Platon tansa vn enfant, qui iouoit aux noix. Il luy respondit: Tu me tanses de peu de chose. L'accoustumance, repliqua Platon, n'est pas chose de peu. Ie trouue que noz plus grands vices prennent leur ply des nostre plus tendre enfance, et que nostre principal gouuernement est entre les mains des nourrices. C'est passetemps aux meres de veoir vn enfant tordre le col à vn poulet, et s'esbatre à blesser vn chien et vn chat. Et tel pere est si sot, de prendre à bon augure d'vne ame martiale, quand il voit son fils gourmer iniurieusement vn païsant, ou vn laquay, qui ne se defend point: et à gentillesse, quand il le void affiner son compagnon par quelque malicieuse desloyauté, et tromperie.

Ce sont pourtant les vrayes semences et racines de la cruauté, de la tyrannie, de la trahyson. Elles se germent là, et s'esleuent apres gaillardement, et profittent à force entre les mains de la coustume. Et est vne tres-habit dulls our senses. We need not go looking for what is said of the people who live near the cataracts of the Nile, or for what the philosophers think about the music of the heavens: that the bodies of those spheres, being solid and polished, and touching and rubbing against one another as they roll, cannot fail to produce a wonderful harmony, to whose cadences and modulations the turns and changes of the stars' round dances are measured; but that the hearing of all creatures here below, lulled to sleep, like that of the Egyptians, by the unbroken continuity of this sound, cannot perceive it, however loud it may be.

Blacksmiths, millers and armorers could not stand the noise that strikes them if it pierced them as it does us. My perfumed collar serves my nose; but after I have worn it three days in a row, it serves only the noses of those around me. What is stranger is that, despite long intervals and interruptions, habit can join together and establish the effect of its impression on our senses, as people who live near belfries find. At home I lodge in a tower where at dawn and at dusk a very big bell rings the Ave Maria every day.

This din shakes my very tower; and though in the first days it seemed unbearable to me, in a short time it so tamed me that I hear it without annoyance, and often without being woken by it.

Plato once scolded a child who was playing at nuts. The child answered, "You scold me over a small thing." "Habit," Plato replied, "is no small thing." I find that our greatest vices take their bent from our tenderest childhood, and that our upbringing is chiefly in the hands of nurses. Mothers find it amusing to watch a child wring a chicken's neck, or enjoy himself hurting a dog or a cat. And many a father is foolish enough to take it as a good omen of a martial spirit when he sees his son insolently beating a peasant or a lackey who does not defend himself, and as a sign of cleverness when he sees him get the better of a playmate by some spiteful disloyalty and deceit.

Yet these are the true seeds and roots of cruelty, tyranny and treachery. They sprout there, then shoot up vigorously and thrive mightily in the hands of custom. And it is a very dangerous way to dangereuse institution, d'excuser ces villaines inclinations, par la foiblesse de l'aage, et legereté du subiect. Premierement c'est nature qui parle; de qui la voix est lors plus pure et plus naifue, qu'elle est plus gresle et plus neufue. Secondement, la laideur de la piperie ne depend pas de la difference des escutz aux espingles: elle depend de soy. Ie trouue bien plus iuste de conclurre ainsi: Pourquoy ne tromperoit il aux escutz, puis qu'il trompe aux espingles?

que, comme ils font; Ce n'est qu'aux espingles: il n'auroit garde de le faire aux escutz. Il faut apprendre soigneusement aux enfants de haïr les vices de leur propre contexture, et leur en faut apprendre la naturelle difformité, à ce qu'ils les fuient non en leur action seulement, mais sur tout en leur cœur: que la pensee mesme leur en soit odieuse, quelque masque qu'ils portent.

1.23.4 Ie sçay bien, que pour m'estre duict en ma puerilité, de marcher tousiours mon grand et plain chemin, et auoir eu à contrecœur de mesler ny tricotterie ny finesse à mes ieux enfantins, (comme de vray il faut noter, que les ieux des enfants ne sont pas ieux: et les faut iuger en eux, comme leurs plus serieuses actions) il n'est passetemps si leger, où ie n'apporte du dedans, et d'vne propension naturelle, et sans estude, vne extreme contradiction à tromper. Ie manie les chartes pour les doubles, et tien compte, comme pour les doubles doublons, lors que le gaigner et le perdre, contre ma femme et ma fille, m'est indifferent, comme lors qu'il va de bon.

En tout et par tout, il y a assés de mes yeux à me tenir en office: il n'y en a point, qui me veillent de si pres, ny que ie respecte plus.

1.23.5 Ie viens de voir chez moy vn petit homme natif de Nantes, né sans bras, qui a si bien façonné ses pieds, au seruice que luy deuoient les mains, qu'ils en ont à la verité à demy oublié leur office naturel. Au demourant il les nomme ses mains, il trenche, il charge vn pistolet et le lasche, il enfille son eguille, il coud, il escrit, il tire le bonnet, il se peigne, il iouë aux cartes et aux dez, et les remue auec autant de dexterité que sçauroit faire quelqu'autre: l'argent que luy ay donné, il l'a emporté en son pied, comme nous faisons en nostre main.

bring up children to excuse these vile inclinations on the grounds of the child's tender age and the triviality of the matter. In the first place, it is nature speaking, and her voice is all the purer and more unaffected for being still thin and new. In the second place, the ugliness of cheating does not depend on the difference between crowns and pins; it depends on itself. I think it far more right to reason like this: "Why should he not cheat for crowns, since he cheats for pins?"

rather than, as people do: "It is only for pins; he would never do it for crowns." Children must be carefully taught to hate vices for what they are in themselves, and must be taught their natural deformity, so that they shun them not only in their actions but above all in their hearts, and the very thought of them is odious to them, whatever mask the vices wear.

I know very well that, because I was trained in childhood always to walk my own broad, open road, and had a strong distaste for mixing any trickery or slyness into my childish games (and indeed it should be noted that children's games are not games, and must be judged in children as their most serious actions), there is no pastime so trivial that I do not bring to it, from within, from a natural inclination and without any effort, an extreme aversion to cheating. I play cards for pennies and keep score as if for double doubloons, when winning or losing against my wife and daughter makes no difference to me, just as I do when the stakes are real.[3]

In everything and everywhere, my own eyes are enough to keep me to my duty; there are none that watch me so closely, and none that I respect more.

I have just seen at my house a little man, a native of Nantes, born without arms, who has trained his feet so well to do the service his hands owed him that his feet have, in truth, half forgotten their natural function. What is more, he calls them his hands. He cuts his food, he loads a pistol and fires it, he threads his needle, he sews, he writes, he doffs his hat, he combs his hair, he plays cards and dice and handles them with as much dexterity as anyone could; the money I gave him he carried away in his foot, as we do in our hand.

3 His wife was Françoise de La Chassaigne; Léonor was his only daughter to survive infancy.

	I'en vy vn autre estant enfant, qui manioit vn' espee à deux mains, et vn' hallebarde, du ply du col à faute de mains, les iettoit en l'air et les reprenoit, lançoit vne dague, et faisoit craqueter vn fouët aussi bien que charretier de France.	When I was a child I saw another who, for want of hands, wielded a two-handed sword and a halberd in the crook of his neck, threw them into the air and caught them again, hurled a dagger, and cracked a whip as well as any carter in France.
1.23.6	Mais on descouure bien mieux ses effets aux estranges impressions, qu'elle faict en nos ames, où elle ne trouue pas tant de resistance. Que ne peut elle en nos iugemens et en nos creances? y a il opinion si bizarre: ie laisse à part la grossiere imposture des religions, dequoy tant de grandes nations, et tant de suffisants personnages se sont veuz enyurez: car cette partie estant hors de nos raisons humaines, il est plus excusable de s'y perdre, à qui n'y est extraordinairement esclairé par faueur diuine: mais d'autres opinions y en a il de si estranges, qu'elle n'aye planté et estably par loix és regions que bon luy a semblé?	But custom's effects are discovered far better in the strange impressions it makes on our souls, where it meets less resistance. What can it not do with our judgments and our beliefs? Is there any opinion so bizarre—I leave aside the gross imposture of religions, with which so many great nations and so many able persons have been seen intoxicated; for since that matter lies outside our human reasoning, it is more excusable for anyone to lose his way in it who is not extraordinarily enlightened by divine favor—but among other opinions, are there any so strange that custom has not planted them and established them by law in whatever regions it saw fit?
	Et est tres-iuste cette ancienne exclamation: Non pudet physicum, id est speculatorem venatorémque naturæ, ab animis consuetudine imbutis quærere testimonium veritatis?	And this ancient exclamation is very just: Is it not shameful for a natural philosopher, that is, an observer and hunter of nature, to seek testimony of the truth from minds steeped in custom?[4]

A CATALOG OF STRANGE CUSTOMS

Every notion, however wild, is somewhere a public custom: a long list of peoples' practices.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.23.7	I'estime qu'il ne tombe en l'imagination humaine aucune fantasie si forcenee qui ne rencontre l'exemple de quelque vsage public, et par consequent que nostre raison n'estaye et ne fonde. Il est des peuples où on tourne le doz à celuy qu'on saluë, et ne regarde l'on iamais celuy qu'on veut honorer. Il en est où quand le Roy crache, la plus fauorie des dames de sa Cour tend la main: et en autre nation les plus apparents qui sont autour de luy se baissent à terre, pour amasser en du linge son ordure. Desrobons icy la place d'vn compte.	I believe that no notion so mad can enter the human imagination that it does not find an example in some public practice, and consequently that our reason does not prop up and give a foundation to. There are peoples among whom you turn your back on the person you greet, and never look at the one you wish to honor. There are some among whom, when the king spits, the most favored of the ladies of his court holds out her hand; and in another nation the most eminent persons around him stoop to the ground to gather up his filth in a cloth. Let me steal room here for a story.
1.23.8	Vn Gentil-homme François se mouchoit tousiours de sa main, chose tres-ennemie de nostre vsage, defendant là dessus son faict: et estoit fameux en bonnes rencontres. Il me demanda, quel priuilege auoit ce salle excrement, que nous allassions luy appretant vn beau linge delicat à le receuoir; et puis, qui plus est, à l'empaqueter et serrer	A French gentleman always blew his nose with his hand, a thing very much against our usage, and he defended his practice on this point; he was famous for his witty sallies. soigneusement sur nous. Que cela deuoit faire plus de mal au cœur, que de le voir verser où que ce fust: comme nous faisons toutes nos autres ordures. Ie trouuay, qu'il ne parloit pas du tout sans raison: et m'auoit la coustume osté l'apperceuance de cette estrangeté, laquelle pourtant nous trouuons si hideuse, quand elle est recitee d'vn autre païs.

Les miracles sont, selon l'ignorance en quoy nous sommes de la nature, non selon l'estre de la nature. L'assuefaction endort la veuë de nostre iugement. Les Barbares ne nous sont de rien plus merueilleux que nous sommes à eux: ny auec plus d'occasion, comme chascun aduoüeroit, si chascun sçauoit, apres s'estre promené par ces loingtains exemples, se coucher sur les propres, et les conferer sainement. La raison humaine est vne teinture infuse enuiron de pareil pois à toutes nos opinions et mœurs, de quelque forme qu'elles soient: infinie en matiere, infinie en diuersité. Ie m'en retourne.

1.23.9 Il est des peuples, où sauf sa femme et ses enfans aucun ne parle au Roy que par sarbatane. En vne mesme nation et les vierges montrent à decouuert leurs parties honteuses, et les mariees les couurent et cachent soigneusement. A quoy cette autre coustume qui est ailleurs a quelque relation: la chasteté n'y est en prix que pour le seruice du mariage: car les filles se peuuent abandonner à leur poste, et engroissees se faire auorter par medicamens propres, au veu d'vn chascun.

Et ailleurs si c'est vn marchant qui se marie, tous les marchans conuiez à la nopce, couchent auec l'espousee auant luy: et plus il y en a, plus a elle d'honneur et de recommandation de fermeté et de capacité: si vn officier se marie, il en va de mesme; de mesme si c'est vn noble; et ainsi des autres: sauf si c'est vn laboureur ou quelqu'vn du bas peuple: car lors c'est au Seigneur à faire: et si on ne laisse pas d'y recommander estroitement la loyauté, pendant le mariage.

Il en est, où il se void des bordeaux publics de masles, voire et des mariages: où les femmes vont à la guerre quand et leurs maris, et ont rang, non au combat seulement, mais aussi au commandement. Où non seulement les bagues se portent au nez, aux leures, aux ioues, et aux orteils des pieds: mais des verges d'or bien prepare a fine, delicate linen to receive it, and then, what is more, wrap it up and carry it carefully about on our persons. That ought to turn the stomach more, he said, than seeing it dropped anywhere at all, as we do with all our other filth. I found that he was not speaking altogether without reason; custom had taken from me any perception of this strangeness, which we nevertheless find so hideous when it is reported of another country.

Miracles exist according to our ignorance of nature, not according to the being of nature. Habituation puts the eye of our judgment to sleep. Barbarians are no more a marvel to us than we are to them, nor with more cause—as everyone would admit if, after strolling among these far-off examples, each knew how to come back and settle on his own and compare them soundly. Human reason is a dye infused in roughly equal measure into all our opinions and customs, whatever their form: infinite in matter, infinite in diversity. I return to my subject.

There are peoples among whom no one but his wife and children speaks to the king except through a speaking tube. In one and the same nation the virgins show their private parts uncovered, and the married women cover and hide them carefully. To this another custom found elsewhere bears some relation: there chastity is prized only for the purposes of marriage, for girls may give themselves as they please and, when pregnant, may have themselves aborted with suitable drugs in full view of everyone.

And elsewhere, if it is a merchant who marries, all the merchants invited to the wedding sleep with the bride before he does; and the more of them there are, the more honor she has and the greater her reputation for stamina and capacity. If an official marries, it is the same; the same if it is a noble; and so with the rest—unless it is a laborer or someone of the common people, for then it falls to the lord to do it. And yet they do not fail to enjoin strict fidelity during the marriage.

There are some where one sees public brothels of males, and even marriages between them; where the women go to war alongside their husbands and hold rank not only in combat but also in command. Where rings are worn not only in the nose, the lips, the cheeks and the toes, but very heavy no windows, no chests that lock; and thieves are punished twice as severely as elsewhere.

Where they kill lice with their teeth, like apes, and find it horrible to see them crushed under the fingernails. Where in all their lives they cut neither hair nor nails; elsewhere, where they cut only the nails of the right hand, letting those of the left grow long out of refinement. Where they let all the hair on the right side grow as long as it will, and keep the hair on the other side close-shaven. And in neighboring provinces, one grows the hair in front and the other the hair behind, and each shaves the opposite part. Where fathers lend their children, and husbands their wives, to guests to enjoy, for payment.

Where one may honorably have children by one's mother, and fathers may lie with their daughters and with their sons. Where at gatherings for feasts they lend their children to one another without regard to kinship. Here they live on human flesh; there it is an act of piety to kill one's father at a certain age; elsewhere fathers decide, while the children are still in their mothers' wombs, which they want reared and kept and which they want abandoned and killed; elsewhere old husbands lend their wives to young men to make use of; and elsewhere women are held in common without sin —indeed, in one such country they wear, as a mark of honor, as many fine fringed tassels on the hems of their robes as they have known men.

Has custom not even made a commonwealth of women on their own? Has it not put weapons in their hands, made them raise armies and fight battles? And what all philosophy cannot plant in the heads of the wisest, does custom not teach by its decree alone to the crudest common people? For we know of whole nations where death was not only scorned but celebrated; where children of seven endured being whipped to death without changing expression; where wealth was held in such contempt that the poorest citizen in the city would not have deigned to reach down to pick up a purse full of crowns.[5]

And we know of regions very rich in every kind of food where, nevertheless, the most ordinary and the most savory dishes were bread, cress and water. Did custom not also work this miracle on

1.23.10	Et somme, à ma fantasie, il n'est rien qu'elle ne face, ou qu'elle ne puisse: et auec raison l'appelle Pindarus, à ce qu'on m'a dict, la Royne et Emperiere du monde. Celuy qu'on rencontra battant son pere, respondit, que c'estoit la coustume de sa maison: que son pere auoit ainsi batu son ayeul; son ayeul son bisayeul: et montrant son fils: Cettuy cy me battra quand il sera venu au terme de l'aage où ie suis. Et le pere que le fils tirassoit et sabouloit emmy la ruë, luy commanda de s'arrester à certain huis; car luy, n'auoit trainé son pere que iusques là: que c'estoit la borne des iniurieux traittements hereditaires, que les enfants auoient en vsage faire aux peres en leur famille.	In short, to my mind, there is nothing custom does not do, or cannot do; and Pindar, so I am told, rightly calls it the queen and empress of the world. The man who was found beating his father replied that it was the custom of his house: his father had beaten his grandfather that way, and his grandfather his great-grandfather; and pointing to his son, he said, "This one will beat me when he reaches my age." And the father whom his son was dragging and knocking about in the middle of the street ordered him to stop at a certain doorway, for he himself had dragged his father only that far: that was the limit of the hereditary abuse that the children of their family were in the habit of inflicting on their fathers.[6]
	Par coustume, dit Aristote, aussi souuent que par maladie, des femmes s'arrachent le poil, rongent leurs ongles, mangent des charbons et de la terre: et plus par coustume que par nature les masles se meslent aux masles.	Out of custom, says Aristotle, as often as out of illness, women pull out their hair, bite their nails, and eat coal and earth; and males couple with males more from custom than from nature.

CONSCIENCE BORN OF CUSTOM

What we call the laws of conscience come from custom, which keeps us from reasoning about it.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.23.11	Les loix de la conscience, que nous disons naistre de nature, naissent de la coustume: chacun ayant en veneration interne les opinions et mœurs approuuees et receuës autour de luy, ne s'en peut desprendre sans remors, ny s'y appliquer sans applaudissement. Quand ceux de Crete vouloient au temps passé maudire quelqu'vn, ils prioient les Dieux de l'engager en quelque mauuaise coustume. Mais le principal effect de sa puissance, c'est de nous saisir et empieter de telle sorte, qu'à peine soit-il en nous, de nous r'auoir de sa prinse, et de r'entrer en nous, pour discourir et raisonner de ses ordonnances.	The laws of conscience, which we say are born of nature, are born of custom. Each man, holding in inward veneration the opinions and ways approved and accepted around him, cannot break away from them without remorse, nor apply himself to them without self-approval. When the Cretans of old wished to curse someone, they prayed the gods to entangle him in some bad habit. But the principal effect of custom's power is to seize us and grip us so tightly that it is scarcely in our power to free ourselves from its grasp and return to ourselves, to reflect and reason about its decrees.
	De vray, parce que nous les humons auec le laict de nostre naissance, et que le visage du monde se presente en cet estat à nostre premiere veuë, il semble que nous soyons naiz à la condition de suyure ce train. Et les communes imaginations, que nous trouuons en credit autour de	Indeed, because we suck them in with our first milk, and because the face of the world presents itself in that state to our first sight, it seems that we are born on condition of following that course. And the common notions that we find in credit nous, et infuses en nostre ame par la semence de nos peres, il semble que ce soyent les generalles et naturelles. Par où il aduient, que ce qui est hors les gonds de la coustume, on le croid hors les gonds de la raison: Dieu sçait combien desraisonnablement le plus souuent.	around us, infused into our soul with our fathers' seed, seem to be the universal and natural ones. Hence it comes about that whatever is off the hinges of custom is believed to be off the hinges of reason—God knows how unreasonably, most of the time.

1.23.12	Si comme nous, qui nous estudions, auons apprins de faire, chascun qui oid vne iuste sentence, regardoit incontinent par où elle luy appartient en son propre: chascun trouueroit, que cette cy n'est pas tant vn bon mot comme vn bon coup de fouet à la bestise ordinaire de son iugement. Mais on reçoit les aduis de la verité et ses preceptes, comme adressés au peuple, non iamais à soy: et au lieu de les coucher sur ses mœurs, chascun les couche en sa memoire, tres-sottement et tres-inutilement. Reuenons à l'empire de la coustume.	If, as we who study ourselves have learned to do, everyone who hears a sound maxim looked at once to see how it applies to him personally, each would find that this one is not so much a witty saying as a sharp lash of the whip at the habitual stupidity of his own judgment. But people take the counsels and precepts of truth as addressed to the public, never to themselves; and instead of laying them up in their conduct, each lays them up in his memory, very foolishly and very uselessly. Let us return to the empire of custom.
1.23.13	Les peuples nourris à la liberté et à se commander eux mesmes, estiment toute autre forme de police monstrueuse et contre nature. Ceux qui sont duits à la monarchie en font de mesme. Et quelque facilité que leur preste fortune au changement, lors mesme qu'ils se sont auec grandes difficultez deffaitz de l'importunité d'vn maistre, ils courent à en replanter vn nouueau auec pareilles difficultez, pour ne se pouuoir resoudre de prendre en haine la maistrise. C'est par l'entremise de la coustume que chascun est contant du lieu où nature l'a planté: et les [montagnards] d'Escosse n'ont que faire de la Touraine, ny les Scythes de la Thessalie.	Peoples brought up in freedom and self-government consider every other form of government monstrous and against nature. Those accustomed to monarchy do the same. And whatever opportunity for change fortune offers them, even when they have rid themselves, with great difficulty, of a troublesome master, they rush to set up a new one with equal difficulty, because they cannot bring themselves to hate mastery. It is through the agency of custom that each man is content with the place where nature has planted him: the Highlanders of Scotland have no use for Touraine, nor the Scythians for Thessaly.
	Darius demandoit à quelques Grecs, pour combien ils voudroient prendre la coustume des Indes, de manger leurs peres trespassez (car c'estoit leur forme, estimans ne leur pouuoir donner plus fauorable sepulture, que dans eux-mesmes) ils luy respondirent que pour chose du monde ils ne le feroient: mais s'estant aussi essayé de persuader aux Indiens de laisser leur façon, et prendre celle de Grece, qui estoit de brusler les corps de leurs peres, il leur fit encore plus d'horreur. Chacun en fait ainsi, d'autant que l'vsage nous desrobbe le vray visage des choses. Nil adeo magnum, nec tam mirabile quicquam Principio, quod non minuant mirarier omnes Paulatim.	Darius asked some Greeks how much they would take to adopt the custom of the Indians and eat their dead fathers (for that was their practice, since they thought they could give them no more favorable burial than within themselves). They answered that they would not do it for anything in the world. But when he also tried to persuade the Indians to give up their way and adopt that of Greece, which was to burn the bodies of their fathers, he horrified them even more. Everyone does likewise, since usage robs us of the true face of things. Nothing is so great, nothing so marvelous At first, that all men do not, little by little, Come to marvel at it less.[7] autour de nous: et ne voulant point, comme il se fait, l'establir seulement par la force des loix et des exemples, mais questant tousiours iusques à son origine, i'y trouuay le fondement si foible, qu'à peine que ie ne m'en degoustasse, moy, qui auois à la confirmer en autruy. C'est cette recepte, par laquelle Platon entreprend de chasser les des-naturees et preposteres amours de son temps: qu'il estime souueraine et principale: assauoir, que l'opinion publique les condamne: que les Poëtes, que chacun en face de mauuais comptes.

Recepte, par le moyen de laquelle, les plus belles filles n'attirent plus l'amour des peres, ny les freres plus excellents en beauté, l'amour des sœurs. Les fables mesmes de Thyestes, d'Oedipus, de Macareus, ayant, auec le plaisir de leur chant, infus cette vtile creance, en la tendre ceruelle des enfants. De vray, la pudicité est vne belle vertu, et de laquelle l'vtilité est assez connuë: mais de la traitter et faire valoir selon nature, il est autant mal-aysé, comme il est aysé de la faire valoir selon l'vsage, les loix, et les preceptes. Les premieres et vniuerselles raisons sont de difficile perscrutation.

Et les passent noz maistres en escumant, ou en ne les osant pas seulement taster, se iettent d'abordee dans la franchise de la coustume: là ils s'enflent, et triomphent à bon compte. Ceux qui ne se veulent laisser tirer hors cette originelle source, faillent encore plus: et s'obligent à des opinions sauuages, tesmoin Chrysippus: qui sema en tant de lieux de ses escrits, le peu de compte en quoy il tenoit les conionctions incestueuses, quelles qu'elles fussent.

around us, and did not want merely to establish it, as is usually done, by the force of laws and examples, but kept tracing it back to its origin, I found its foundation so weak that I nearly lost my taste for it—I, who was supposed to confirm it in others. This is the remedy by which Plato undertakes to drive out the unnatural and perverse loves of his time, and which he considers sovereign and principal: namely, that public opinion should condemn them, and that the poets, and everyone, should tell bad stories about them.[8]

A remedy by means of which the most beautiful daughters no longer attract their fathers' love, nor the most handsome brothers their sisters' love, since the very fables of Thyestes, Oedipus and Macareus, along with the pleasure of their song, have instilled this useful belief into the tender brains of children. Indeed, chastity is a fine virtue, and its usefulness is well enough known; but to treat it and justify it according to nature is as hard as it is easy to justify it according to usage, laws and precepts. First and universal reasons are difficult to search out.[9]

And our masters skim over them, or, not even daring to touch them, throw themselves straight into the sanctuary of custom, where they puff themselves up and triumph cheaply. Those who will not let themselves be drawn away from that original source go even further astray and commit themselves to uncouth opinions—witness Chrysippus, who scattered through so many places in his writings how little account he made of incestuous unions, of whatever kind.

ie luy demanderay lors, quelle chose peut estre plus estrange, que de voir vn peuple obligé à suiure des loix qu'il n'entendit oncques: attaché en tous ses affaires domesticques, mariages, donations, testaments, ventes, et achapts, à des regles qu'il ne peut sçauoir, n'estans escrites ny publiees en sa langue, et desquelles par necessité il luy faille acheter l'interpretation et l'vsage.

Non selon l'ingenieuse opinion d'Isocrates, qui conseille à son Roy de rendre les trafiques et negociations de ses subiects libres, franches, et lucratiues; et leurs debats et querelles, onereuses, chargees de poisans subsides: mais selon vne opinion prodigieuse, de mettre en trafique, la raison mesme, et donner aux loix cours de marchandise. back on a much surer footing. For example, I shall then ask him what can be stranger than to see a people obliged to follow laws it never understood; bound in all its domestic affairs—marriages, gifts, wills, sales and purchases—by rules it cannot know, since they are neither written nor published in its own language, and whose interpretation and application it must of necessity buy.

Not according to the ingenious opinion of Isocrates, who advises his king to make the trade and dealings of his subjects free, unhampered and profitable, and their disputes and quarrels costly, burdened with heavy taxes; but according to a monstrous opinion: to make reason itself an article of trade and give laws the currency of merchandise. I am grateful to fortune that, as our historians say, it was a Gascon gentleman from my own region who first opposed Charlemagne when he wanted to give us Latin and imperial laws.[10]

What is more shocking than to see a nation where, by lawful custom, the office of judge is sold and judgments are paid for in ready cash; where justice is lawfully refused to anyone who has not the means to pay for it; and where this merchandise has such credit that there forms within the state a fourth estate, of people who handle lawsuits, to join the three ancient ones of the Church, the Nobility and the People;[11] an estate which, having charge of the laws and sovereign authority over property and lives, forms a body separate from that of the nobility; with the result that there are two sets of laws, those of honor and those of justice, in many things quite contrary? The former condemn a man who puts up with being called a liar as severely as the latter condemn one who takes revenge for it: by the code of arms, a man who swallows an insult is stripped of honor and nobility, and by civil duty, a man who avenges it incurs capital punishment.

He who goes to the law for satisfaction for an offense to his honor dishonors himself; and he who does not is punished and chastised by the law. And of these two so different parts, which nevertheless answer to a single head, the one has charge of peace, the other of war; the one has gain for its

1.23.17	Quant aux choses indifferentes, comme vestemens, qui les voudra ramener à leur vraye fin, qui est le seruice et commodité du corps, d'où depend leur grace et bienseance originelle, pour les plus fantasticques à mon gré qui se puissent imaginer, ie luy donray entre autres nos bonnets carrez: cette longue queuë de veloux plissé, qui pend aux testes de nos femmes, auec son attirail bigarré: et ce vain modelle et inutile, d'vn membre que nous ne pouuons seulement honnestement nommer, duquel toutesfois nous faisons montre et parade en public.	As for indifferent things such as clothes, if anyone wants to bring them back to their true purpose, which is the service and comfort of the body, on which their original grace and seemliness depend, then for the most fantastic I think one could imagine, I will offer him, among others, our square caps; that long tail of pleated velvet hanging from our women's heads, with its motley trappings; and that vain and useless model of a member we cannot even decently name, which we nevertheless show off and parade in public.[13]
1.23.18	Ces considerations ne destournent pourtant pas vn homme d'entendement de suiure le stile commun. Ains au rebours, il me semble que toutes façons escartees et particulieres partent plustost de folie, ou d'affectation ambitieuse, que de vraye raison: et que le sage doit au dedans retirer son ame de la presse, et la tenir en liberté et puissance de iuger librement des choses: mais quant au dehors, qu'il doit suiure entierement les façons et formes receuës.	These considerations do not, however, turn a man of understanding away from following the common style. On the contrary, it seems to me that all eccentric and peculiar ways spring from folly or ambitious affectation rather than from true reason; and that the wise man should inwardly withdraw his soul from the crowd and keep it free and able to judge things freely, but outwardly he should follow the accepted fashions and forms entirely.
	La societé publique n'a que faire de nos pensees: mais le demeurant, comme nos actions, nostre trauail, nos fortunes et nostre vie, il la faut prester et abandonner à son seruice et aux opinions communes: comme ce bon et grand Socrates refusa de sauuer sa vie par la desobeissance du magistrat, voire d'vn magistrat tres-iniuste et tres-inique. Car c'est la regle des regles, et generale loy des loix, que chacun obserue celles du lieu où il est: νομοις ἑπεσθαι τοισιν εγχωριοις αλον.	Public society has no business with our thoughts; but the rest—our actions, our labor, our fortunes and our life—we must lend and surrender to its service and to common opinion, as the good and great Socrates refused to save his life by disobeying the magistrate, even a very unjust and very iniquitous magistrate. For it is the rule of rules and the universal law of laws that each should observe those of the place where he is: It is good to obey the laws of one's country.[14] telle qu'elle soit, qu'il y a de mal à la remuer: d'autant qu'vne police, c'est comme vn bastiment de diuerses pieces ioinctes ensemble d'vne telle liaison, qu'il est impossible d'en esbranler vne que tout le corps ne s'en sente. Le legislateur des Thuriens ordonna, que quiconque voudroit ou abolir vne des vieilles loix, ou en establir vne nouuelle, se presenteroit au peuple la corde au col: afin que si la nouuelleté n'estoit approuuee d'vn chacun, il fust incontinent estranglé. Et celuy de Lacedemone employa sa vie pour tirer de ses citoyens vne promesse asseuree, de n'enfraindre aucune de ses ordonnances.

L'Ephore qui coupa si rudement les deux cordes que Phrinys auoit adiousté à la musique, ne s'esmoie pas, si elle en vaut mieux, ou si les accords en sont mieux remplis: il luy suffit pour les condamner, que ce soit vne alteration de la vieille façon. C'est ce que signifioit cette espee rouillee de la Iustice de Marseille.

1.23.20 Ie suis desgousté de la nouuelleté, quelque visage qu'elle porte; et ay raison, car i'en ay veu des effets tres-dommageables. Celle qui nous presse depuis tant d'ans, elle n'a pas tout exploicté: mais on peut dire auec apparence, que par accident, elle a tout produict et engendré; voire et les maux et ruines, qui se font depuis sans elle, et contre elle: c'est à elle à s'en prendre au nez, Heu patior telis vulnera facta meis! Ceux qui donnent le branle à vn Estat, sont volontiers les premiers absorbez en sa ruine. Le fruict du trouble ne demeure guere à celuy qui l'a esmeu; il bat et brouille l'eaue pour d'autres pescheurs.

La liaison et contexture de cette monarchie et ce grand bastiment, ayant esté desmis et dissout, notamment sur ses vieux ans par elle, donne tant qu'on veut d'ouuerture et d'entree à pareilles iniures. La maiesté royalle s'auale plus difficilement du sommet au milieu, qu'elle ne se precipite du milieu à fons. Mais si les inuenteurs sont plus dommageables, les imitateurs sont plus vicieux, de se ietter en des exemples, desquels ils ont senti et puni l'horreur et le mal. Et s'il y a quelque degré d'honneur, mesmes au mal faire, ceux cy doiuent aux autres, la gloire de l'inuention, et le courage du premier effort.

ging an accepted law, whatever it may be, as there is harm in disturbing it; for a government is like a building made of various parts joined together so closely that it is impossible to shake one without the whole structure feeling it. The lawgiver of the Thurians decreed that anyone who wanted either to abolish one of the old laws or to establish a new one should come before the people with a rope around his neck, so that if the novelty was not approved by everyone, he could be strangled on the spot. And the lawgiver of Sparta spent his life extracting from his citizens a firm promise not to break any of his ordinances.[15]

The ephor who so roughly cut the two strings that Phrynis had added to music does not trouble himself whether music is the better for them or its harmonies the fuller: it is enough for him, to condemn them, that they are a change from the old way. That is what the rusty sword of the court of justice at Marseille signified.[16]

I am sick of novelty, whatever face it wears, and with reason, for I have seen its very harmful effects. The one that has been oppressing us for so many years has not achieved everything; but one may plausibly say that it has, incidentally, produced and engendered everything—even the evils and ruins that have since been wrought without it and against it. It has only itself to blame: Alas, I suffer wounds made by my own arrows! Those who set a state in motion are usually the first to be swallowed up in its ruin. The fruits of disorder seldom go to the man who stirred it up; he beats and muddies the water for other fishermen.[17]

Since the bond and fabric of this monarchy, this great building, has been loosened and dissolved by it, especially in its old age, it lies as open as anyone could wish to similar injuries. Royal majesty comes down from the summit to the middle with more difficulty than it plunges from the middle to the bottom. But if the inventors do more harm, the imitators are more wicked, for rushing into examples whose horror and harm they have themselves felt and punished. And if there is any degree of honor even in wrongdoing, the imitators owe the others the glory of invention and the courage of the first attempt.

15 Charondas was the lawgiver of Thurii in southern Italy; Lycurgus, the lawgiver of Sparta.

Toutes sortes de nouuelle desbauche puysent heureusement en cette premiere et fœconde source, les images et patrons à troubler nostre police. On lit en nos loix mesmes, faictes pour le remede de ce premier mal, l'apprentissage et l'excuse de toutes sortes de mauuaises entreprises. Et nous aduient ce que Thucydides dit des guerres ciuiles de son temps, qu'en faueur des vices publiques, on les battisoit de mots nouueaux plus doux pour leur excuse, abastardissant et amollissant leurs vrais titres. C'est pourtant, pour reformer nos consciences et nos creances, honesta oratio est.

All kinds of new disorder happily draw from this first and fertile source the models and patterns for disturbing our state. In our very laws, made to remedy this first evil, one reads the apprenticeship and the excuse for every kind of wicked enterprise. And what Thucydides says of the civil wars of his time happens to us: that to favor public vices, people baptized them with new and gentler words to excuse them, debasing and softening their true names. And yet it is all to reform our consciences and our beliefs: the pretext is honorable.[18]

1.23.21 Mais le meilleur pretexte de nouuelleté est tres-dangereux. Adeo nihil motum ex antiquo probabile est. Si me semble-il, à le dire franchement, qu'il y a grand amour de soy et presomption, d'estimer ses opinions iusques-là, que pour les establir, il faille renuerser vne paix publique, et introduire tant de maux ineuitables, et vne si horrible corruption de mœurs que les guerres ciuiles apportent, et les mutations d'Estat, en chose de tel pois, et les introduire en son pays propre. Est-ce pas mal mesnagé, d'aduancer tant de vices certains et cognus, pour combattre des erreurs contestees et debatables? Est-il quelque pire espece de vices, que ceux qui choquent la propre conscience et naturelle cognoissance?

But the best pretext for novelty is very dangerous. So true is it that no change from ancient ways deserves approval. Indeed, it seems to me, to speak frankly, that there is great self-love and presumption in valuing one's opinions so highly that, to establish them, one must overturn public peace and bring in so many inevitable evils and so horrible a corruption of morals as civil wars and changes of state bring with them, in a matter of such weight—and bring them into one's own country. Is it not poor management to promote so many certain and known vices in order to combat disputed and debatable errors? Is there any worse kind of vice than those that offend one's own conscience and natural knowledge?[19]

Le Senat osa donner en payement cette deffaitte, sur le different d'entre luy et le peuple, pour le ministere de leur religion: Ad deos, id magis quàm ad se pertinere, ipsos visuros, ne sacra sua polluantur: conformément à ce que respondit l'oracle à ceux de Delphes, en la guerre Medoise, craignans l'inuasion des Perses. Ils demanderent au Dieu, ce qu'ils auoient à faire des tresors sacrez de son temple, ou les cacher, ou les emporter. Il leur respondit, qu'ils ne bougeassent rien, qu'ils se souciassent d'eux: qu'il estoit suffisant pour prouuoir à ce qui luy estoit propre.

The Senate dared to offer this evasion by way of payment in its dispute with the people over the ministry of their religion: That this concerned the gods more than themselves; the gods would see to it that their rites were not profaned. This agrees with the oracle's answer to the people of Delphi in the Median War, when they feared the Persian invasion. They asked the god what they should do with the sacred treasures of his temple—hide them or carry them away. He answered that they should move nothing and look after themselves: he was quite able to provide for what belonged to him.[20] manutention des polices. Quel merueilleux exemple nous en a laissé la sapience diuine; qui pour establir le salut du genre humain, et conduire cette sienne glorieuse victoire contre la mort et le peché, ne l'a voulu faire qu'à la mercy de nostre ordre politique: et a soubsmis son progrez et la conduicte d'vn si haut effet et si salutaire, à l'aueuglement et iniustice de nos obseruations et vsances: y laissant courir le sang innocent de tant d'esleuz ses fauoriz, et souffrant vne longue perte d'années à meurir ce fruict inestimable?

Il y a grand à dire entre la cause de celuy qui suit les formes et les loix de son pays, et celuy qui entreprend de les regenter et changer. Celuy là allegue pour son excuse, la simplicité, l'obeissance et l'exemple: quoy qu'il face ce ne peut estre malice, c'est pour le plus malheur. Quis est enim, quem non moueat clarissimis monimentis testata consignatàque antiquitas? Outre ce que dit Isocrates, que la defectuosité a plus de part à la moderation, que n'a l'exces. L'autre est en bien plus rude party. Car qui se mesle de choisir et de changer, vsurpe l'authorité de iuger: et se doit faire fort, de voir la faute de ce qu'il chasse, et le bien de ce qu'il introduit.

1.23.23 Cette si vulgaire consideration m'a fermy en mon siege: et tenu ma ieunesse mesme, plus temeraire, en bride: de ne charger mes espaules d'vn si lourd faix, que de me rendre respondant d'vne science de telle importance. Et oser en cette cy, ce qu'en sain iugement, ie ne pourroy oser en la plus facile de celles ausquelles on m'auoit instruit, et ausquelles la temerité de iuger est de nul preiudice. Me semblant tres-inique, de vouloir sousmettre les constitutions et obseruances publiques et immobiles, à l'instabilité d'vne priuée fantasie (la raison priuée n'a qu'vne iurisdiction priuée) et entreprendre sur les loix diuines, ce que nulle police ne supporteroit aux ciuiles.

Ausquelles, encore que l'humaine raison aye beaucoup plus de commerce, si sont elles souuerainement iuges de leurs iuges: et l'extreme suffisance sert à expliquer et estendre l'vsage, qui en est receu, non à le destourner et innouer. trate and uphold governments. What a marvelous example of this divine wisdom has left us! To establish the salvation of the human race and carry through its glorious victory over death and sin, it chose to act only at the mercy of our political order, and submitted the progress and conduct of so lofty and so saving an effect to the blindness and injustice of our customs and practices—letting the innocent blood of so many of its chosen favorites flow, and suffering many long years to be lost in ripening this priceless fruit.

There is a great difference between the case of a man who follows the forms and laws of his country and that of one who undertakes to dictate to them and change them. The first pleads as his excuse simplicity, obedience and example; whatever he does cannot be malice; at worst it is misfortune. For who is there who is not moved by antiquity attested and sealed by the most illustrious monuments? Besides, as Isocrates says, deficiency has more in common with moderation than excess has. The other is in a much harder position. For whoever takes it upon himself to choose and change usurps the authority to judge, and must be sure that he sees the fault in what he drives out and the good in what he brings in.[21]

This very commonplace consideration has kept me firmly in my seat, and held even my youth, which was more reckless, in check: not to load my shoulders with so heavy a burden as making myself answerable for a science of such importance, and not to dare in this one what, in sound judgment, I could not dare in the easiest of those I had been taught, where rashness of judgment does no harm. For it seems to me very unjust to want to subject public and unchanging institutions and observances to the instability of a private fancy (private reason has only a private jurisdiction), and to attempt against divine laws what no government would tolerate against civil ones.

Although human reason has much more to do with civil laws, they are still the supreme judges of their judges; and the greatest ability serves to explain and extend their accepted use, not to divert it or make innovations. If divine providence has sometimes passed over the rules to which it has necessarily bound us, it is not in order to release us from them.

Ce sont coups de sa main diuine: qu'il nous faut, non pas imiter, mais admirer: et exemples extraordinaires, marques d'vn expres et particulier adueu: du genre des miracles, qu'elle nous offre, pour tesmoignage de sa toute puissance, au dessus de noz ordres et de noz forces: qu'il est folie et impieté d'essayer à representer: et que nous ne deuons pas suiure, mais contempler auec estonnement. Actes de son personnage, non pas du nostre. Cotta proteste bien opportunément: Quum de religione agitur, T. Coruncanum, P. Scipionem, P. Scœuolam, pontifices maximos, non Zenonem, aut Cleanthem, aut Chrysippum, sequor.

These are strokes of its divine hand, which we must not imitate but admire; extraordinary examples, marks of an express and particular sanction, of the same kind as the miracles it offers us as testimony to its omnipotence, beyond our orders and our powers; which it is folly and impiety to try to reproduce, and which we must not follow but contemplate with astonishment. They are acts proper to its role, not to ours. Cotta declares very aptly: When it is a question of religion, I follow Tiberius Coruncanius, Publius Scipio and Publius Scaevola, chief pontiffs, not Zeno, Cleanthes or Chrysippus.[22]

1.23.24 Dieu le sçache en nostre presente querelle, où il y a cent articles à oster et remettre, grands et profonds articles, combien ils sont qui se puissent vanter d'auoir exactement recogneu les raisons et fondements de l'vn et l'autre party. C'est vn nombre, si c'est nombre, qui n'auroit pas grand moyen de nous troubler. Mais toute cette autre presse où va elle? soubs quelle enseigne se iette elle à quartier? Il aduient de la leur, comme des autres medecines foibles et mal appliquees: les humeurs qu'elle vouloit purger en nous, elle les a eschauffées, exasperees et aigries par le conflit, et si nous est demeurée dans le corps.

Elle n'a sçeu nous purger par sa foiblesse, et nous a cependant affoiblis: en maniere que nous ne la pouuons vuider non plus, et ne receuons de son operation que des douleurs longues et intestines.

God knows, in our present quarrel, where there are a hundred articles to remove and restore—great and deep articles—how many can boast of having precisely grasped the reasons and foundations of either side. It is a number, if it is a number at all, that would hardly be able to trouble us. But all this other crowd—where is it going? Under what banner does it break ranks? Their medicine has fared like other weak and badly administered remedies: the humors it meant to purge from us it has heated, inflamed and soured by the conflict, and it has stayed in our body all the same.

It was too weak to purge us, and meanwhile it has weakened us, so that we cannot void it either, and get nothing from its action but long, intestine pains.

WHEN NECESSITY OVERRIDES THE LAW

In extreme crises it may be wiser to bend the laws than to let violence trample them.

1.23.25 Si est-ce que la fortune reseruant tousiours son authorité au dessus de nos discours, nous presente aucunes-fois la necessité si vrgente, qu'il est besoin que les loix luy facent quelque place. Et quand on resiste à l'accroissance d'vne innouation qui vient par violence à s'introduire, de se tenir en tout et par tout en bride et en regle contre ceux qui ont la clef des champs, ausquels tout cela est loisible qui peut auancer leur dessein, qui n'ont ny loy ny ordre que de suiure leur aduantage, c'est vne dangereuse obligation et inequalité.

Still, fortune, always keeping its authority above our reasonings, sometimes confronts us with a necessity so urgent that the laws must make some room for it. And when one is resisting the growth of an innovation that is forcing its way in by violence, to keep oneself bridled and bound by rules in everything and everywhere against those who have free rein—to whom anything is permissible that can advance their design, and who have no law or order but to follow their own advantage—is a dangerous obligation and an unequal contest.

Aditum nocendi perfido præstat fides. D'autant que la discipline ordinaire d'vn Estat qui est en sa santé, ne pouruoit pas à ces accidens extraordinaires: elle presuppose vn corps qui se tient en ses principaux membres et offices, et vn commun consentement à son obseruation et obeissance. L'aller legitime, est vn aller froid, poisant et contraint: et n'est pas pour tenir bon, à vn aller licencieux et effrené.

1.23.26 On sçait qu'il est encore reproché à ces deux grands personnages, Octauius et Caton, aux guerres ciuiles, l'vn de Sylla, l'autre de Cæsar, d'auoir plustost laissé encourir toutes extremitez à leur patrie, que de la secourir aux despens de ses loix, et que de rien remuer. Car à la verité en ces dernieres necessitez, où il n'y a plus que tenir, il seroit à l'auanture plus sagement fait, de baisser la teste et prester vn peu au coup, que s'ahurtant outre la possibilité à ne rien relascher, donner occasion à la violance de fouler tout aux pieds: et vaudroit mieux faire vouloir aux loix ce qu'elles peuuent, puis qu'elles ne peuuent ce qu'elles veulent.

Ainsi fit celuy qui ordonna qu'elles dormissent vingt quatre heures: et celuy qui remua pour cette fois vn iour du calendrier: et cet autre qui du mois de Iuin fit le second May. Les Lacedemoniens mesmes, tant religieux obseruateurs des ordonnances de leur païs, estans pressez de leur loy, qui deffendoit d'eslire par deux fois Admiral vn mesme personnage, et de l'autre part leurs affaires requerans de toute necessité, que Lysander prinst de rechef cette charge, ils firent bien vn Aracus Admiral, mais Lysander surintendant de la marine.

Et de mesme subtilité, vn de leurs Ambassadeurs estant enuoyé vers les Atheniens, pour obtenir le changement de quelque ordonnance, et Pericles luy alleguant qu'il estoit deffendu d'oster le tableau, où vne loy estoit vne fois posée, luy conseilla de le tourner seulement, d'autant que cela n'estoit pas deffendu. C'est ce dequoy Plutarque loüe Philopœmen, qu'estant né pour commander, il sçauoit non seulement commander selon les loix, mais aux loix mesmes, quand la necessité publique le requeroit.

Trust gives the treacherous the opportunity to do harm. For the ordinary discipline of a state in good health does not provide for these extraordinary accidents: it presupposes a body that holds together in its principal members and functions, and a common consent to observe and obey it. The lawful pace is cold, heavy and constrained, and it is not made to hold its own against a licentious and unbridled one.[23]

We know that those two great men, Octavius and Cato, are still reproached—in the civil wars, the one of Sulla, the other of Caesar—for having let their country suffer every extremity rather than help it at the expense of its laws and change anything. For in truth, in these final necessities, where there is nothing left to hold on to, it would perhaps be wiser to bow one's head and yield a little to the blow than, by striving beyond what is possible to concede nothing, to give violence occasion to trample everything underfoot; and it would be better to make the laws will what they can do, since they cannot do what they will.[24]

So did the man who ordered the laws to sleep for twenty-four hours, and the one who moved a day of the calendar just that once, and that other who made the month of June into a second May. Even the Spartans, such scrupulous observers of their country's ordinances, being pressed on one side by their law, which forbade electing the same man admiral twice, and on the other by their affairs, which absolutely required that Lysander take that office again, did indeed make one Aracus admiral —but Lysander superintendent of the navy.[25]

And with the same subtlety, when one of their ambassadors was sent to the Athenians to obtain the change of some ordinance, and Pericles objected that it was forbidden to take down the tablet on which a law had once been set up, the ambassador advised him simply to turn it around, since that was not forbidden. This is what Plutarch praises in Philopoemen: that, being born to command, he knew how to command not only according to the laws but the laws themselves, when public necessity required it.[26]

Jacques Amyot, Grand Almoner of France, once told me this story to the honor of one of our princes (and ours he was, on very good grounds, even though his family came from abroad). During our first troubles, at the siege of Rouen, this prince was warned by the Queen Mother of a plot against his life. Her letters told him in detail who was to carry it out: a gentleman from Anjou or Maine, who at that time regularly frequented the prince's household for that very purpose. He told no one of this warning. But the next day, while walking on Mont Sainte-Catherine, from which our guns were firing on Rouen (for this was when we were besieging it), with the said Lord Grand Almoner and another bishop at his side, he caught sight of this gentleman, who had been pointed out to him, and had him called over.[1]

When the man came before him, the prince saw him already turning pale and trembling at the alarms of his conscience, and spoke to him thus: "Monsieur de So-and-so, you can well guess what I want with you, and your face shows it. You have nothing to hide from me. I am so fully informed of your business that you would only make your position worse by trying to cover it up. You know very well such and such a thing" (these were the ins and outs of the most secret parts of the plot), "so do not fail, on your life, to confess to me the whole truth of this scheme."

When this poor man found himself caught and convicted (for the whole thing had been revealed to the Queen by one of the accomplices), there was nothing left for him but to clasp his hands and beg the prince's pardon and mercy. He tried to throw himself at the prince's feet, but the prince preven-

He resolved to take revenge, and for that purpose summoned a council of his friends for the next day. But he spent the night in between in great anxiety, considering that he would have to put to death a young man of good family, a nephew of the great Pompey. And in his lamenting he turned over many different arguments. "What then," he said, "shall it be said that I am to remain in fear and alarm, and let my murderer stroll about meanwhile at his ease? Et ayant fait sortir tout le monde de sa chambre, et fait donner vn siege à Cinna, il luy parla en cette maniere: En premier lieu ie te demande Cinna, paisible audience: n'interromps pas mon parler, ie te donray temps et loysir d'y respondre.

conspirators had planned to kill him while he was performing a sacrifice. After that he kept quiet for some time, then began again in a louder voice and turned on himself: "Why do you live, if it matters to so many people that you should die? Will there be no end to your acts of vengeance and your cruelties? Is your life worth so much damage being done to preserve it?" His wife Livia, sensing his anguish, spoke to him: "And will a woman's advice be heard in this?" she said.

"Do what doctors do: when the usual remedies are of no use, they try the opposite ones. Up to now you have gained nothing by severity. Lepidus has followed Salvidienus, Murena Lepidus, Caepio Murena, Egnatius Caepio. Begin to test how gentleness and clemency will turn out for you. Cinna is convicted: pardon him. He will no longer be able to harm you, and he will add to your glory." Augustus was very glad to have found an advocate who shared his temperament. He thanked his wife, called off the friends he had summoned to the council, and ordered Cinna to be brought to him alone.

He sent everyone out of his room, had a seat given to Cinna, and spoke to him in this way: "First of all, Cinna, I ask you for a quiet hearing. Do not interrupt me; I will give you time and leisure to answer.

You know, Cinna, that when I took you in the camp of my enemies, when you had not merely become my enemy but were born one, I saved you. I put all your property back into your hands, and in the end I have made you so well off and so comfortable that the victors envy the lot of the vanquished. You asked me for the office of priest, and I granted it to you, after refusing it to others whose fathers had always fought on my side. After I had put you so deeply in my debt, you have undertaken to kill me."

At this Cinna cried out that he was far from any such wicked thought. "You are not keeping your promise, Cinna," Augustus went on. "You assured me that I would not be interrupted. Yes, you have undertaken to kill me, in such a place, on such a day, in such company, and in such a manner." And seeing him stunned by this news and silent, no longer to keep his bargain of holding his tongue but under the pressure of his conscience, he added: "Why are you doing it? Is it to be emperor?

Or so great a crowd of nobles, noble not only in name but who honor their nobility by their virtue?"
Apres plusieurs autres propos, car il parla à luy plus de deux heures entieres, Or va, luy dit-il, ie te donne, Cinna, la vie à traistre et à parricide, que ie te donnay autresfois à ennemy: que l'amitié commence de ce iourd'huy entre nous: essayons qui de nous deux de meilleure foy, moy t'aye donné ta vie, ou tu l'ayes receuë. Et se despartit d'auec luy en cette maniere. Quelque temps apres il luy donna le consulat, se pleignant dequoy il ne le luy auoit osé demander. Il l'eut depuis pour fort amy, et fut seul faict par luy heritier de ses biens.	After much more talk, for he spoke to him for more than two full hours, he said: "Now go. I give you your life, Cinna, as a traitor and a parricide, as I once gave it to you as an enemy. Let friendship begin between us from this day. Let us see which of us two acts in better faith: I in giving you your life, or you in receiving it." And with that he parted from him. Some time later he gave him the consulship, complaining that Cinna had not dared to ask him for it. From then on Cinna was a close friend to him, and made him the sole heir to his property.
Or depuis cet accident, qui aduint à Auguste au quarantiesme an de son aage, il n'y eut iamais de coniuration ny d'entreprise contre luy, et reçeut vne iuste recompense de cette sienne clemence. Mais il n'en aduint pas de mesmes au nostre: car sa douceur ne le sceut garentir, qu'il ne cheust depuis aux lacs de pareille trahison. Tant c'est chose vaine et friuole que l'humaine prudence: et au trauers de tous nos proiects, de nos conseils et precautions, la fortune maintient tousiours la possession des euenemens.	Now after this incident, which befell Augustus in the fortieth year of his age, there was never again any conspiracy or attempt against him, and he received a just reward for his clemency. But it did not turn out the same for our prince. His gentleness could not save him from falling afterward into the snares of a similar treachery. So vain and frivolous a thing is human prudence. Through all our plans, our counsels and our precautions, Fortune always keeps possession of the outcome.[3]

FORTUNE IN ART, WAR AND COUNSEL

Chance has a large share in medicine, poetry, painting and war, whatever our wisdom plans.

1.24.3 Nous appellons les medecins heureux, quand ils arriuent à quelque bonne fin: comme s'il n'y auoit que leur art, qui ne se peust maintenir d'elle mesme, et qui eust les fondemens trop frailes, pour s'appuyer de sa propre force: et comme s'il n'y auoit qu'elle, qui ayt besoin que la fortune preste la main à ses operations. Ie croy d'elle tout	We call doctors lucky when they achieve some good result. It is as if theirs were the only art that could not stand on its own, with foundations too frail to rest on its own strength, and as if it were the only one that needs Fortune to lend a hand in its operations. le pis ou le mieux qu'on voudra: car nous n'auons, Dieu mercy, nul commerce ensemble.

Ie suis au rebours des autres: car ie la mesprise bien tousiours, mais quand ie suis malade, au lieu d'entrer en composition, ie commence encore à la haïr et à la craindre: et respons à ceux qui me pressent de prendre medecine, qu'ils attendent au moins que ie sois rendu à mes forces et à ma santé, pour auoir plus de moyen de soustenir l'effort et le hazart de leur breuuage. Ie laisse faire nature, et presuppose qu'elle se soit pourueue de dents et de griffes, pour se deffendre des assaux qui luy viennent, et pour maintenir cette contexture, dequoy elle fuit la dissolution.

Ie crain au lieu de l'aller secourir, ainsi comme elle est aux prises bien estroites et bien iointes auec la maladie, qu'on secoure son aduersaire au lieu d'elle, et qu'on la recharge de nouueaux affaires.

1.24.4 Or ie dy que non en la medecine seulement, mais en plusieurs arts plus certaines, la fortune y a bonne part. Les saillies poëtiques, qui emportent leur autheur, et le rauissent hors de soy, pourquoy ne les attribuerons nous à son bon heur, puis qu'il confesse luy mesme qu'elles surpassent sa suffisance et ses forces, et les recognoit venir d'ailleurs que de soy, et ne les auoir aucunement en sa puissance: non plus que les orateurs ne disent auoir en la leur ces mouuemens et agitations extraordinaires, qui les poussent au delà de leur dessein?

Il en est de mesmes en la peinture, qu'il eschappe par fois des traits de la main du peintre surpassans sa conception et sa science, qui le tirent luy mesmes en admiration, et qui l'estonnent. Mais la fortune montre bien encores plus euidemment, la part qu'elle a en tous ces ouurages, par les graces et beautez qui s'y treuuent, non seulement sans l'intention, mais sans la cognoissance mesme de l'ouurier. Vn suffisant lecteur descouure souuent és escrits d'autruy, des perfections autres que celles que l'autheur y a mises et apperceuës, et y preste des sens et des visages plus riches.

1.24.5 Quant aux entreprises militaires, chacun void comment la fortune y a bonne part. En nos conseils mesmes et en nos deliberations, il faut certes qu'il y ayt du sort et du bonheur meslé parmy: car tout ce que nostre sagesse peut, ce n'est pas grandchose. Plus elle est aigue et viue, plus elle trouue en soy de foiblesse, et se deffie d'autant plus d'elle mesme.

ENGLISH

of it that anyone likes, for we have, thank God, no dealings with each other.

I am the opposite of other people. I always despise medicine, but when I am ill, instead of coming to terms with it, I begin to hate and fear it as well. And to those who urge me to take medicine, I answer that they should at least wait until I have recovered my strength and health, so that I will be better able to withstand the force and the risk of their potion. I leave it to nature, and assume that she has provided herself with teeth and claws to defend herself from the assaults that come upon her, and to maintain this structure whose dissolution she shuns.

When she is locked in close combat with the disease, I am afraid that people, instead of going to her aid, may aid her adversary, and load her with fresh troubles.

Now I say that Fortune has a large share not only in medicine but in many arts that are more certain. Take the flights of poetry that carry their author away and transport him out of himself. Why should we not attribute them to his good luck? He himself confesses that they surpass his ability and his powers, acknowledges that they come from somewhere other than himself, and admits that they are not at all in his control. In the same way, orators do not claim to control those extraordinary impulses and stirrings that drive them beyond what they intended.

It is the same in painting. Strokes sometimes escape from the painter's hand that surpass his conception and his knowledge, fill him with wonder, and stun him. But Fortune shows still more plainly the share she has in all these works by the graces and beauties found in them not only without the craftsman's intention but even without his knowledge. A capable reader often discovers in other people's writings perfections other than those the author put there or perceived, and lends them richer meanings and aspects.

As for military enterprises, everyone sees how large a share Fortune has in them. Even in our counsels and deliberations there must certainly be some chance and luck mixed in, for all that our wisdom can do is not much. The keener and quicker it is, the more weakness it finds in itself, and the more it distrusts itself.

Ie suis de l'aduis de Sylla: et quand ie me prens garde de pres aux plus glorieux exploicts de la guerre, ie voy, ce me semble, que ceux qui les conduisent, n'y employent la deliberation et le conseil, que par acquit; et que la meilleure part de l'entreprinse, ils l'abandonnent à la fortune; et sur la fiance qu'ils ont à son secours, passent à tous les coups au delà des bornes de tout discours. Il suruient des allegresses fortuites, et des fureurs estrangeres parmy leurs deliberations, qui les poussent le plus souuent à prendre le party le moins fondé en apparence, et qui grossissent leur courage au dessus de la raison.

D'où il est aduenu à plusieurs grands Capitaines anciens, pour donner credit à ces conseils temeraires, d'alleguer à leurs gens, qu'ils y estoyent conuiez par quelque inspiration, par quelque signe et prognostique.

Comme en ces deux exemples, que ie vien de proposer, il n'y a point de doubte, qu'il ne fust plus beau et plus genereux à celuy qui auoit receu l'offence, de la pardonner, que s'il eust fait autrement.

S'il en est mes-aduenu au premier, il ne s'en faut pas prendre à ce sien bon dessein: et ne sçait on, quand il eust pris le party contraire, s'il eust eschapé la fin, à laquelle son destin l'appelloit; et si eust perdu la gloire d'vne telle humanité.

ENGLISH

I am of Sulla's opinion. When I look closely at the most glorious exploits of war, I see, or so it seems to me, that those who conduct them use deliberation and counsel only for form's sake. They leave the better part of the enterprise to Fortune, and, trusting in her help, they go at every turn beyond the limits of all reasoning. Chance elations and strange frenzies come upon them in the midst of their deliberations. Most often these drive them to take the course that seems least well-founded, and swell their courage beyond reason.[4]

Hence many great captains of antiquity, to give credit to these rash decisions, told their men that they had been prompted to them by some inspiration, some sign or omen.

We are uncertain and perplexed, because we cannot see and choose what is most advantageous, given the difficulties raised by the various accidents and circumstances of each thing. That is why, in my opinion, the surest course, even if no other consideration drew us to it, is to fall back on the side where there is more honor and justice. And since we are in doubt about the shortest road, we should always keep to the straight one. In the two examples I have just put forward, there is no doubt that it was finer and more generous for the man who had received the offense to pardon it than to do otherwise.

If things went badly for the first of them, we must not blame his good intention. No one knows whether, had he taken the opposite course, he would have escaped the end to which his destiny called him. And in any case he would have lost the glory of such humanity.

Il a beau employer des nations estrangeres pour sa garde, et estre tousiours ceint d'vne haye d'hommes armez: Quiconque aura sa vie à mespris, se rendra tousiours maistre de celle d'autruy. Et puis ce continuel soupçon, qui met le Prince en doute de tout le monde, luy doit seruir d'vn merueilleux tourment. Pourtant Dion estant aduerty que Callippus espioit les moyens de le faire mourir, n'eut iamais le cœur d'en informer, disant qu'il aymoit mieux mourir que viure en cette misere, d'auoir à se garder non de ses ennemys seulement, mais aussi de ses amis.

not put much hope either in his strength or in his vigilance. For how hard is it to protect oneself from an enemy hidden behind the face of the most obliging friend we have? And to know the inner wishes and thoughts of those who attend us?

He may employ foreign nations as his guard and always be surrounded by a hedge of armed men, but in vain: whoever holds his own life in contempt will always make himself master of another's. And then this continual suspicion, which makes the prince doubt everyone, must be an extraordinary torment to him. So Dion, when he was warned that Callippus was looking for ways to have him killed, never had the heart to look into it. He said he would rather die than live in the misery of having to guard himself not only against his enemies but also against his friends.[5]

Alexander showed this much more vividly in action, and more boldly. He was warned by a letter from Parmenio that Philip, his dearest physician, had been bribed with Darius's money to poison him. At the same moment that he handed the letter to Philip to read, he drank down the potion Philip had brought him. Was this not to declare that if his friends wanted to kill him, he consented to their being able to do it? This prince is the supreme model of daring deeds. But I do not know whether there is any act in his life that shows more firmness than this one, or a beauty so illustrious in so many aspects.

Those who preach such watchful distrust to princes, under color of preaching their safety, are preaching their ruin and their shame. Nothing noble is done without risk. I know one prince, of a very martial and enterprising temperament by nature, whose good fortune is spoiled every day by advice of this kind: that he should keep close among his own people, listen to no reconciliation with his old enemies, keep to himself, and never trust himself to stronger hands, whatever promise is made to him and whatever advantage he sees in it. I know another who has unexpectedly advanced his fortune by taking the very opposite advice.

The boldness whose glory they seek so eagerly shows itself, when need be, as magnificently in a doublet as in armor, in a study as in a camp, with the arm hanging down as with the arm raised. Prudence so delicate and circumspect is the mortal enemy of lofty deeds. To win over Syphax, Scipio was able to leave his army and abandon Spain, still unsettled under his new conquest, and cross to Africa in two plain ships. There he entrusted himself, on enemy soil, to the power of a barbarian king and to a good faith he did not know, without obligation, without hostage, on the sole security of the greatness of his own courage, of his good fortune, and of the promise of his high hopes.[6]

Trust shown usually binds the other's trust in return. For an ambitious and famous life, one must on the contrary give little credit to suspicions and keep them on a short rein. Fear and distrust draw offense and invite it. The most distrustful of our kings set his affairs in order chiefly by voluntarily abandoning and entrusting his life and his liberty into the hands of his enemies. He showed that he had complete trust in them, so that they would come to trust him.[7]

When his legions mutinied and took up arms against him, Caesar set against them nothing but the authority of his face and the pride of his words. He trusted so much in himself and his fortune that he was not afraid to give himself up and entrust himself to a seditious and rebellious army:
He stood, upheld on a mound of turf, his face unafraid, and earned the right to be feared by fearing nothing.[8]

But it is quite true that this strong assurance can be shown whole and natural only by those who are not frightened by the thought of death and of the worst that can happen after all. To display it still trembling, doubtful and uncertain, in the service of an important reconciliation, is to do nothing worthwhile. It is an excellent way to win the heart and will of another to go and submit to him and trust him, provided it is done freely, without the constraint of any necessity, and on condition that one brings to it a pure and clear trust, with a brow at least free of all misgiving. hood I saw a gentleman who was in command of a great city hard pressed by the uprising of a furious populace.[9]

To put out this first spark of trouble, he decided to leave a very safe place where he was and go out to this mutinous mob. It went badly for him, and he was miserably killed there. But it does not seem to me that his mistake lay so much in having gone out, as people commonly hold against his memory, as in having taken a path of submission and softness. He tried to lull that rage to sleep by following rather than guiding, and by pleading rather than admonishing. I think that a gracious severity, with a soldierly command full of assurance and confidence, befitting his rank and the dignity of his office, would have served him better, or at least with more honor and propriety.

Nothing is less to be hoped for from this monster, once it is so stirred up, than humanity and gentleness; it will far more readily receive reverence and fear. I would also reproach him for this. He had taken a resolution, brave rather than rash to my mind, to throw himself, weak and in his doublet, into that stormy sea of maddened men; he ought to have seen it through to the end and not abandoned the role. Instead, once he had seen the danger up close, his nerve failed him. He then changed the submissive and flattering bearing he had adopted into a frightened one, loading his voice and his eyes with dismay and remorse. By trying to scuttle off like a rabbit and slip away, he inflamed them and drew them upon himself.

A general review of various troops under arms was being planned. (That is the place for secret acts of vengeance, and there is none where they can be carried out in greater safety.) There were public and notorious signs that things did not bode well for certain persons whose principal and necessary duty it was to inspect the troops. Various counsels were put forward, as happens in a difficult matter with much weight and many consequences.[10]

Mine was that above all we should avoid giving any sign of this suspicion, and should be there and mingle among the ranks with heads high and quoy les autres opinions visoient le plus, au contraire, l'on sollicitast les Capitaines d'aduertir les soldats de faire leurs salues belles et gaillardes en l'honneur des assistans, et n'espargner leur poudre. Cela seruit de gratification enuers ces trouppes suspectes, et engendra dés lors en auant vne mutuelle et vtile confidence.

1.24.12 La voye qu'y tint Iulius Cæsar, ie trouue que c'est la plus belle, qu'on y puisse prendre. Premierement il essaya par clemence, à se faire aymer de ses ennemis mesmes, se contentant aux coniurations qui luy estoient descouuertes, de declarer simplement qu'il en estoit aduerti. Cela faict, il print vne tres-noble resolution, d'attendre sans effroy et sans solicitude, ce qui luy en pourroit aduenir, s'abandonnant et se remettant à la garde des Dieux et de la fortune. Car certainement c'est l'estat où il estoit quand il fut tué.

1.24.13 Vn estranger ayant dict et publié par tout qu'il pourroit instruire Dionysius Tyran de Syracuse, d'vn moyen de sentir et descouurir en toute certitude, les parties que ses subiets machineroient contre luy, s'il luy vouloit donner vne bonne piece d'argent, Dionysius en estant aduerty, le fit appeller à soy, pour s'esclaircir d'vn art si necessaire à sa conseruation; cet estranger luy dict, qu'il n'y auoit pas d'autre art, sinon qu'il luy fist deliurer vn talent, et se ventast d'auoir apris de luy vn singulier secret. Dionysius trouua cette inuention bonne, et luy fit compter six cens escus.

Il n'estoit pas vray-semblable, qu'il eust donné si grande somme à vn homme incogneu, qu'en recompense d'vn tres-vtile apprentissage, et seruoit cette reputation à tenir ses ennemis en crainte. Pourtant les Princes sagement publient les aduis qu'ils reçoiuent des menées qu'on dresse contre leur vie; pour faire croire qu'ilz sont bien aduertis, et qu'il ne se peut rien entreprendre dequoy ils ne sentent le vent. Le Duc d'Athenes fit plusieurs sottises en l'establissement de sa fresche tyrannie sur Florence: mais cette-cy la plus notable, qu'ayant receu le premier aduis des monopoles que ce peuple dressoit contre luy, par Mattheo dit Morozo, complice d'icelles, il le fit mourir, pour supprimer cet aduertissement, et ne faire sentir, qu'aucun en la ville s'ennuïast de sa domination.

faces open. Instead of cutting anything out, which was what the other opinions chiefly aimed at, the captains should on the contrary be asked to tell the soldiers to make their salvos fine and lively in honor of the onlookers, and not to spare their powder. This served as a mark of favor toward those suspect troops, and from then on bred a mutual and useful confidence.

The way Julius Caesar took in this matter is, I find, the finest that can be taken. First he tried by clemency to make himself loved even by his enemies. When conspiracies were revealed to him, he was content simply to declare that he had been warned of them. That done, he took a very noble resolve: to await, without fear or anxiety, whatever might come of it, abandoning himself and committing himself to the keeping of the gods and of Fortune. For that was certainly the state he was in when he was killed.

A stranger had announced everywhere that, if Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, would give him a good sum of money, he could teach him a way to detect and discover with complete certainty the plots his subjects might devise against him. Dionysius heard of it and had him summoned, to learn about an art so necessary to his preservation. The stranger told him that there was no other art than this: he should have a talent paid out to him and boast of having learned a remarkable secret from him. Dionysius found this a good device and had six hundred crowns counted out to him.

ENGLISH

It was not likely that he would have given so large a sum to an unknown man except as reward for some very useful teaching, and this reputation served to keep his enemies in fear. So princes wisely make public the warnings they receive of plots laid against their lives, to make people believe that they are well informed and that nothing can be undertaken without their getting wind of it. The Duke of Athens committed many follies in establishing his new tyranny over Florence, but this was the most notable. He received the first warning of the conspiracies that people was hatching against him from Matteo di Morozzo, one of the accomplices; and he had him put to death, to suppress the warning and to keep anyone from feeling that there was discontent with his rule in the city.[11]

1.24.14 Il me souuient auoir leu autrefois l'histoire de quelque Romain, personnage de dignité, lequel fuyant la tyrannie du Triumuirat, auoit eschappé mille fois les mains de ceux qui le poursuiuoyent, par la subtilité de ses inuentions. Il aduint vn iour, qu'vne troupe de gens de cheual, qui auoit charge de le prendre, passa tout ioignant vn halier, où il s'estoit tapy, et faillit de le descouurir.

I remember once reading the story of a certain Roman, a man of rank, who, fleeing the tyranny of the Triumvirate, had escaped a thousand times from the hands of his pursuers by the cleverness of his devices. One day a troop of horsemen charged with capturing him passed right by a thicket where he was crouching, and just missed discovering him.

Mais luy sur ce point là, considerant la peine et les difficultez, ausquelles il auoit desia si long temps duré, pour se sauuer des continuelles et curieuses recherches, qu'on faisoit de luy par tout, le peu de plaisir qu'il pouuoit esperer d'vne telle vie, et combien il luy valoit mieux passer vne fois le pas, que demeurer tousiours en cette transe, luy-mesme les r'appella, et leur trahit sa cachette, s'abandonnant volontairement à leur cruauté, pour oster eux et luy d'vne plus longue peine. D'appeller les mains ennemies, c'est vn conseil vn peu gaillard: si croy-ie, qu'encore vaudroit-il mieux le prendre, que de demeurer en la fieure continuelle d'vn accident, qui n'a point de remede.

But at that point he considered the pain and difficulties he had already endured for so long to escape the continual, close searches being made for him everywhere, the little pleasure he could hope for from such a life, and how much better it would be to take the step once and for all than to remain forever in such terror. So he called them back himself and betrayed his hiding place to them, giving himself up willingly to their cruelty, to relieve both them and himself of further trouble. To call for the enemy's hands is a rather bold course; yet I believe it would still be better to take it than to remain in the continual fever of a danger for which there is no remedy.

Mais puis que les prouisions qu'on y peut apporter sont pleines d'inquietude, et d'incertitude, il vaut mieux d'vne belle asseurance se preparer à tout ce qui en pourra aduenir; et tirer quelque consolation de ce qu'on n'est pas asseuré qu'il aduienne.

But since the precautions one can take are full of anxiety and uncertainty, it is better to prepare oneself with fine assurance for whatever may come of it, and to draw some consolation from the fact that one is not sure it will happen.

Learned pedants stuff their memories but leave their judgment empty; true learning should make us wiser and better.

1.25.1 IE me suis souuent despité en mon enfance, de voir és comedies Italiennes, tousiours vn pedante pour badin, et le surnom de magister, n'auoir guere plus honorable signification parmi nous. Car leur estant donné en gouuernement, que pouuois-ie moins faire que d'estre ialoux de leur reputation? Ie cherchois bien de les excuser par la disconuenance naturelle qu'il y a entre le vulgaire, et les personnes rares et excellentes en iugement, et en sçauoir: d'autant qu'ils vont vn train entierement contraire les vns des autres.

Mais en cecy perdois-ie mon latin: que les plus galans hommes c'estoient ceux qui les auoyent le plus à mespris, tesmoing nostre bon du Bellay: Mais ie hay par sur tout vn sçauoir pedantesque. Et est cette coustume ancienne: car Plutarque dit que Grec et Escolier, estoient mots de reproche entre les Romains, et de mespris. Depuis auec l'aage i'ay trouué qu'on auoit vne grandissime raison, et que magis magnos clericos non sunt magis magnos sapientes.

Mais d'où il puisse aduenir qu'vne ame riche de la cognoissance de tant de choses, n'en deuienne pas plus viue, et plus esueillée; et qu'vn esprit grossier et vulgaire puisse loger en soy, sans s'amender, les discours et les iugemens des plus excellens esprits, que le monde ait porté, i'en suis encore en doute. A receuoir tant de ceruelles estrangeres, et si fortes, et si grandes, il est necessaire, me disoit vne fille, la premiere de nos Princesses, parlant de quelqu'vn, que la sienne se foule, se contraigne et rappetisse, pour faire place aux autres.

Ie dirois volontiers, que comme les plantes s'estouffent de trop d'humeur, et les lampes de trop d'huile, aussi faict l'action de l'esprit par trop d'estude et de matiere: lequel occupé et embarassé d'vne grande diuersité de choses, perde le moyen de se demesler. Et que cette charge le tienne courbe et croupy. Mais il en va autrement; car nostre ame s'eslargit d'autant plus qu'elle

In my childhood I was often vexed to see the pedant always cast as the clown in Italian comedies, and the title "magister" hardly more honorable among us. For since I had been put in the charge of such men, what less could I do than be jealous of their reputation? I did try to excuse them by the natural incompatibility between ordinary people and persons rare and excellent in judgment and learning, since the two go entirely opposite ways.

But here my Latin failed me: the finest gentlemen were the very ones who held them most in contempt. Witness our good du Bellay: But above all I hate pedantic learning. And this custom is ancient, for Plutarch says that "Greek" and "scholar" were words of reproach and contempt among the Romans. Since then, with age, I have found that people had very good reason, and that the most great clerks are not the most great wise men.[1]

But how it can happen that a soul rich in the knowledge of so many things does not become livelier and more awake for it, and that a coarse and common mind can lodge within itself, without being improved, the reasonings and judgments of the most excellent minds the world has produced, I am still in doubt. "To take in so many other people's brains, so strong and so great," a young lady, the first of our princesses, once said to me of someone, "his own must be crushed, cramped and shrunk to make room for the others."

I would readily say that just as plants are stifled by too much moisture and lamps by too much oil, so is the action of the mind by too much study and matter. Occupied and encumbered with a great diversity of things, it would lose the means of disentangling itself, and this load would keep it bent and stooping. But it is otherwise, for our soul ex-se remplit. Et aux exemples des vieux temps, il se voit tout au rebours, des suffisans hommes aux maniemens des choses publiques, des grands Capitaines, et grands conseillers aux affaires d'Estat, auoir esté ensemble tressçauans.

1.25.2 Et quant aux Philosophes retirez de toute occupation publique, ils ont esté aussi quelque fois à la verité mesprisez, par la liberté Comique de leur temps, leurs opinions et façons les rendans ridicules. Les voulez vous faire iuges des droits d'vn procés, des actions d'vn homme? Ils en sont bien prests! Ils cerchent encore s'il y a vie, s'il y a mouuement, si l'homme est autre chose qu'vn bœuf: que c'est qu'agir et souffrir, quelles bestes ce sont, que loix et iustice. Parlent-ils du magistrat, ou parlent-ils à luy? c'est d'vne liberté irreuerente et inciuile. Oyent-ils louer vn Prince ou vn Roy? c'est vn pastre pour eux, oisif comme vn pastre, occupé à pressurer et tondre ses bestes: mais bien plus rudement.

En estimez vous quelqu'vn plus grand, pour posseder deux mille arpents de terre? eux s'en moquent, accoustumés d'embrasser tout le monde, comme leur possession. Vous ventez vous de vostre noblesse, pour compter sept ayeulx riches? ils vous estiment de peu, ne conceuant l'image vniuerselle de nature, et combien chascun de nous a eu de predecesseurs, riches, pauures, Roys, valets, Grecs, Barbares. Et quand vous seriez cinquantiesme descendant de Hercules, ils vous trouuent vain, de faire valoir ce present de la fortune. Ainsi les desdeignoit le vulgaire, comme ignorants les premieres choses et communes, et comme presomptueux et insolents.

1.25.3 Mais cette peinture Platonique est bien esloignée de celle qu'il faut à noz hommes. On enuioit ceux-là comme estans au dessus de la commune façon, comme mesprisans les actions publiques, comme ayans dressé vne vie particuliere et inimitable, reglée à certains discours hautains et hors d'vsage: ceux-cy on les desdeigne, comme estans au dessoubs de la commune façon, comme incapables des charges publiques, comme trainans vne vie et des meurs basses et viles apres le vulgaire. Odi homines ignaua opera, Philosopha sententia.

pands the more it is filled. And in the examples of olden times we see quite the reverse: men capable in the handling of public affairs, great captains and great counselors in affairs of state, were at the same time very learned.

As for the philosophers who withdrew from all public occupation, it is true that they too were sometimes scorned by the comic license of their time, their opinions and ways making them ridiculous. Would you make them judges of the rights of a lawsuit, or of a man's actions? They are just the men for it! They are still inquiring whether there is life, whether there is motion, whether man is anything other than an ox; what acting and suffering are; what sort of beasts law and justice are. Do they speak of the magistrate, or to him? It is with an irreverent and uncivil freedom. Do they hear a prince or a king praised? To them he is a shepherd, idle as a shepherd, busy squeezing and shearing his flock, only far more roughly.

Do you think a man greater for owning two thousand acres of land? They laugh at it, used as they are to embracing the whole world as their possession. Do you boast of your nobility because you can count seven rich ancestors? They think little of you, for not grasping the universal picture of nature, and how many forebears each of us has had: rich, poor, kings, servants, Greeks, barbarians. And were you the fiftieth descendant of Hercules, they would think you vain for making much of this gift of Fortune. So the common people disdained them, as ignorant of the first and most ordinary things, and as presumptuous and insolent.

But this Platonic portrait is far removed from the one that fits our men. Those philosophers were envied as being above the common way, as despising public actions, as having set up a private and inimitable life, ruled by certain lofty and unusual principles. These men of ours are disdained as being beneath the common way, as incapable of public office, as dragging out a low and vile life and low and vile habits in the wake of the common people. I hate men who are idle in deed and philosophical in speech.[2]

As for those philosophers, I say, great as they were in learning, they were still greater in every kind of toute action. Et tout ainsi qu'on dit de ce Geometrien de Syracuse, lequel ayant esté destourné de sa contemplation, pour en mettre quelque chose en pratique, à la deffence de son païs, qu'il mit soudain en train des engins espouuentables, et des effects surpassans toute creance humaine; desdaignant toutefois luy mesme toute cette sienne manufacture, et pensant en cela auoir corrompu la dignité de son art, de laquelle ses ouurages n'estoient que l'apprentissage et le iouet.

Aussi eux, si quelquefois on les a mis à la preuue de l'action, on les a veu voler d'vne aisle si haulte, qu'il paroissoit bien, leur cœur et leur ame s'estre merueilleusement grossie et enrichie par l'intelligence des choses. Mais aucuns voyants la place du gouuernement politique saisie par hommes incapables, s'en sont reculés. Et celuy qui demanda à Crates, iusques à quand il faudroit philosopher, en receut cette responce: Iusques à tant que ce ne soient plus des asniers, qui conduisent noz armées. Heraclitus resigna la Royauté à son frere. Et aux Ephesiens, qui luy reprochoient, qu'il passoit son temps à ioüer auec les enfans deuant le temple: Vaut-il pas mieux faire cecy, que gouuerner les affaires en vostre compagnie?

D'autres ayans leur imagination logée au dessus de la fortune et du monde, trouuerent les sieges de la iustice, et les thrones mesmes des Roys, bas et viles. Et refusa Empedocles la royauté, que les Agrigentins luy offrirent. Thales accusant quelquefois le soing du mesnage et de s'enrichir, on luy reprocha que c'estoit à la mode du renard, pour n'y pouuoir aduenir. Il luy print enuie par passe-temps d'en montrer l'experience, et ayant pour ce coup raualé son sçauoir au seruice du proffit et du gain, dressa vne trafique, qui dans vn an rapporta telles richesses, qu'à peine en toute leur vie, les plus experimentez de ce mestier là, en pouuoient faire de pareilles.

Ce qu'Aristote recite d'aucuns, qui appelloyent et celuy là et Anaxagoras, et leurs semblables, sages et non prudents, pour n'auoir assez de soin des choses plus vtiles: outre ce que ie ne digere pas bien cette difference de mots, cela ne sert point d'excuse à mes gents, et à voir la basse et necessiteuse fortune, dequoy ils se payent, nous aurions plustost occasion de prononcer tous les deux, qu'ils sont, et non sages, et non prudents.

action. They say of that geometer of Syracuse that, when he was diverted from his contemplation to put some of it into practice in the defense of his country, he at once set going terrifying engines and effects surpassing all human belief. Yet he himself disdained all this handiwork of his, thinking that he had thereby debased the dignity of his art, of which these works were only the apprenticeship and the plaything.[3]

So too with them: whenever they were put to the test of action, they were seen to fly on so lofty a wing that it was plain their hearts and souls had been wonderfully enlarged and enriched by the understanding of things. But some, seeing the seat of political government seized by incapable men, drew back from it. The man who asked Crates how long one must go on philosophizing received this answer: "Until it is no longer donkey drivers who lead our armies." Heraclitus resigned the kingship to his brother. And to the Ephesians, who reproached him for spending his time playing with the children in front of the temple, he said: "Is it not better to do this than to govern affairs in your company?"

Others, with their imagination lodged above Fortune and the world, found the seats of justice, and even the thrones of kings, low and vile. And Empedocles refused the kingship that the people of Agrigentum offered him. When Thales once criticized the concern with household management and getting rich, he was reproached with doing it like the fox, because he could not manage it himself. He took a fancy, as a pastime, to show the contrary by experiment. Lowering his knowledge for once to the service of profit and gain, he set up a business that in one year brought in such riches that the most experienced in that trade could hardly have made as much in their whole lives.

Aristotle reports that some people called both Thales and Anaxagoras, and others like them, wise but not prudent, for not caring enough about the more useful things. Besides the fact that I do not quite digest this distinction between words, it is no excuse for the men I am speaking of. Seeing the low and needy fortune they are content with, we

LEARNING WITHOUT JUDGMENT

Schools fill the memory and leave understanding empty; pedants make their pupils worse.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.25.5	Ie quitte cette premiere raison, et croy qu'il vaut mieux dire, que ce mal vienne de leur mauuaise façon de se prendre aux sciences: et qu'à la mode dequoy nous sommes instruicts, il n'est pas merueille, si ny les escoliers, ny les maistres n'en deuiennent pas plus habiles, quoy qu'ils s'y facent plus doctes. De vray le soing et la despence de nos peres, ne vise qu'à nous meubler la teste de science: du iugement et de la vertu, peu de nouuelles. Criez d'vn passant à nostre peuple: O le sçauant homme! Et d'vn autre, O le bon homme! Il ne faudra pas à destourner les yeux et son respect vers le premier. Il y faudroit vn tiers crieur: O les lourdes testes!	I give up this first reason, and I think it better to say that this evil comes from their bad way of going about the sciences. Given the way we are taught, it is no wonder if neither pupils nor masters become any more able, though they do become more learned. Indeed, all the care and expense of our fathers aims only at furnishing our heads with knowledge; of judgment and virtue, very little news. Cry out to our people about one passerby, "Oh, what a learned man!" and about another, "Oh, what a good man!" They will not fail to turn their eyes and their respect toward the first. There ought to be a third crier: "Oh, what blockheads!"
1.25.6	Nous nous enquerons volontiers, Sçait-il du Grec ou du Latin? escrit-il en vers ou en prose? mais, s'il est deuenu meilleur ou plus aduisé, c'estoit le principal, et c'est ce qui demeure derriere. Il falloit s'enquerir qui est mieux sçauant, non qui est plus sçauant.	We readily ask, "Does he know Greek or Latin? Does he write in verse or in prose?" But whether he has become better or wiser, which was the main thing, is what gets left behind. We ought to have asked who is better learned, not who is more learned.
1.25.7	Nous ne trauaillons qu'à remplir la memoire, et laissons l'entendement et la conscience vuide. Tout ainsi que les oyseaux vont quelquefois à la queste du grain, et le portent au bec sans le taster, pour en faire bechée à leurs petits: ainsi nos pedantes vont pillotans la science dans les liures, et ne la logent qu'au bout de leurs léures, pour la dégorger seulement, et mettre au vent. C'est merueille combien proprement la sottise se loge sur mon exemple. Est-ce pas faire de mesme, ce que ie fay en la plus part de cette composition? Ie m'en vay escornifflant par-cy par-là, des liures, les sentences qui me plaisent; non pour les garder, car ie n'ay point de gardoire, mais pour les transporter en cettuy-cy; où, à vray dire, elles ne sont non plus miennes, qu'en leur premiere place. Nous ne sommes, ce croy-ie, sçauants, que de la science presente: non de la passée, aussi peu que de la future. Mais qui pis est, leurs escoliers et leurs petits ne s'en nourrissent et alimentent non plus, ains elle passe de main en main, pour cette seule fin, d'en faire parade, d'en entretenir autruy, et d'en faire des comptes, comme vne vaine monnoye inutile à tout autre	We work only to fill the memory, and leave the understanding and the conscience empty. Birds sometimes go in search of grain and carry it in their beaks without tasting it, to feed it to their young. In just the same way our pedants go pilfering knowledge from books and lodge it only on the tips of their lips, merely to spit it out again and scatter it to the wind. It is remarkable how neatly this folly fits my own case. Is not what I am doing in most of this book the very same thing? I go about cadging from books, here and there, the sayings that please me. I do not do it to keep them, for I have no storehouse, but to carry them over into this book, where, to tell the truth, they are no more mine than they were in their first place. We are learned, I believe, only in present knowledge, not in past knowledge, any more than in future. But what is worse, their pupils and their little ones do not feed or nourish themselves on it either. Instead it passes from hand to hand for this sole purpose: to make a show of it, to entertain others with

Nous sçauons dire, Cicero dit ainsi, voila les meurs de Platon, ce sont les mots mesmes d'Aristote: mais nous que disons nous nous mesmes? que faisons nous? que iugeons nous? Autant en diroit bien vn perroquet.

1.25.8 Cette façon me faict souuenir de ce riche Romain, qui auoit esté soigneux à fort grande despence, de recouurer des hommes suffisans en tout genre de science, qu'il tenoit continuellement autour de luy, affin que quand il escheoit entre ses amis, quelque occasion de parler d'vne chose ou d'autre, ils suppleassent en sa place, et fussent tous prests à luy fournir, qui d'vn discours, qui d'vn vers d'Homere, chacun selon son gibier: et pensoit ce sçauoir estre sien, par ce qu'il estoit en la teste de ses gens. Et comme font aussi ceux, desquels la suffisance loge en leurs somptueuses librairies.

I'en cognoy, à qui quand ie demande ce qu'il sçait, il me demande vn liure pour le montrer: et n'oseroit me dire, qu'il a le derriere galeux, s'il ne va sur le champ estudier en son lexicon que c'est que galeux, et que c'est que derriere.

it, and to tell tales with it, like a worthless coin of no other use or employment than counting and casting accounts. They have learned to speak with others, not with themselves.[4]

What matters is not speaking but steering. Nature, to show that there is nothing uncouth in what she guides, often brings forth, in nations less cultivated by art, productions of the mind that rival the most artful ones. Apropos of my subject, how delicate is the Gascon proverb drawn from a reed pipe: Bouha prou bouha, mas à remuda lous dits qu'em: "Blow away, blow all you like, but when it comes to moving the fingers, there we are stuck." We know how to say, "Cicero says this," "These are Plato's morals," "These are the very words of Aristotle." But what do we ourselves say? What do we do? What do we judge? A parrot could say as much.[5]

This way of doing things reminds me of that rich Roman who had taken care, at very great expense, to procure men capable in every kind of learning. He kept them continually around him, so that whenever an occasion arose among his friends to speak of one thing or another, they might fill in for him and be all ready to supply him, one with a speech, another with a line of Homer, each in his own field. And he thought this knowledge was his because it was in the heads of his people. So too do those whose ability resides in their sumptuous libraries.[6]

I know one man who, when I ask him what he knows, asks me for a book so that he can show me. He would not dare tell me that he has a mangy backside without going at once to look up in his lexicon what "mangy" is and what "backside" is.

We take the opinions and knowledge of others into our keeping, and that is all. We must make them our own. We are just like the man who, needing fire, went to fetch some from his neighbor's, found a fine big one there, and stayed there warming himself, without remembering to bring any back home. What good does it do us to have our bellies full of food if it is not digested, if it is not transformed into us, if it does not make us bigger and stronger? Do we think that Lucullus, whom letters

Veux-ie tirer de la consolation pour moy, ou pour vn autre? ie l'emprunte de Cicero: ie l'eusse prise en moy-mesme, si on m'y eust exercé. Ie n'ayme point cette suffisance relatiue et mendiée. Quand bien nous pourrions estre sçauans du sçauoir d'autruy, au moins sages ne pouuons nous estre que de nostre propre sagesse. μισω σοφιστην, ὁστις ουχ αυτω σοφος. Ex quo Ennius: Nequidquam sapere sapientem, qui ipse sibi prodesse non quiret. si cupidus, si / Vanus, et Euganea quantumuis vilior agna. Non enim paranda nobis solum, sed fruenda sapientia est.

1.25.10 Dionysius se moquoit des Grammariens, qui ont soin de s'enquerir des maux d'Vlysses, et ignorent les propres: des musiciens, qui accordent leurs fleutes, et n'accordent pas leurs mœurs: des orateurs qui estudient à dire iustice, non à la faire. Si nostre ame n'en va vn meilleur bransle, si nous n'en auons le iugement plus sain, i'aymerois aussi cher que mon escolier eut passé le temps à ioüer à la paume, au moins le corps en seroit plus allegre. Voyez le reuenir de là, apres quinze ou seize ans employez, il n'est rien si mal propre à mettre en besongne, tout ce que vous y recognoissez d'auantage, c'est que son Latin et son Grec l'ont rendu plus sot et presumptueux qu'il n'estoit party de la maison.

Il en deuoit rapporter l'ame pleine, il ne l'en rapporte que bouffie: et l'a seulement enflée, en lieu de la grossir.

shaped into so great a captain without experience, took them in our way? We lean so heavily on others' arms that we destroy our own strength.[7]

Do I want to arm myself against the fear of death? I do it at Seneca's expense. Do I want to draw consolation for myself or for another? I borrow it from Cicero. I would have drawn it from myself if I had been trained to. I do not like this borrowed, begged ability. Even if we could be learned with another's learning, at least we can be wise only with our own wisdom. I hate the wise man who is not wise for himself. Hence Ennius: Vain is the wisdom of the wise man who cannot profit himself. If he is greedy, if / vain, and more worthless than any Euganean lamb. For wisdom is not only to be acquired but to be enjoyed.[8]

Dionysius mocked the grammarians who take care to inquire into the ills of Ulysses and know nothing of their own; the musicians who tune their flutes and do not tune their morals; the orators who study how to speak of justice, not how to do it. If our soul does not move better for it, if our judgment is not made sounder by it, I would just as soon my pupil had spent the time playing tennis; at least his body would be the nimbler for it. Look at him coming back from school after fifteen or sixteen years spent there: nothing is so unfit to be put to work. All the difference you can see in him is that his Latin and his Greek have made him more foolish and presumptuous than when he left home.[9]

He ought to have brought his soul back full; he brings it back only bloated. He has merely puffed it up instead of enlarging it.

These masters, as Plato says of the Sophists, their first cousins, are of all men the ones who promise to be most useful to men. Yet they alone of all men not only fail to improve what is entrusted to them, as a carpenter or a mason does, but make it worse, and get paid for having made it worse. Protagoras proposed this rule to his pupils: either they paid him his price, or they swore in the temple how much they valued the profit they had received from his teaching, and paid him for his trouble accordingly. If that rule were followed, my pedagogues would find themselves left high and dry, if they relied on the oath of my experience.

My Périgord common folk very amusingly call these smatterers Lettre ferits, as you might say "letter-struck": men whom letters have hit with a hammer, as the saying goes. Truly, most of the time they seem to have sunk below even common sense. For the peasant and the shoemaker, you see them going about their business simply and naturally, speaking of what they know. These men, wanting to raise themselves up and swagger with this knowledge that floats on the surface of their brains, keep getting themselves tangled up and bogged down.

Fine words escape them, but let someone else put them to use. They know Galen well, but not the patient at all. They have already filled your head with laws, and yet they have not grasped the crux of the case. They know the theory of everything; go and find someone to put it into practice.[10]

I once saw a friend of mine at my house, by way of pastime, deal with one of these men by putting on a gibberish jargon: talk with no thread to it, a fabric of patched-together pieces, except that it was often larded with terms proper to their disputes. In this way he kept the fool amused and arguing for a whole day, the man always thinking he was answering the objections put to him. And yet he was a man of letters and of reputation, and he wore a fine gown.

You of patrician blood, whose lot is to live with no eyes in the back of your head, / turn round and face the mockery behind you. Whoever looks very closely at this kind of people, and it is a widespread kind, will find, as I do, that most often they understand neither themselves nor anyone else, and that their memories are full enough but their judgment entirely hollow—unless their nature has of itself fashioned it otherwise. So it was with Adrianus Turnebus, as I saw. He professed nothing but letters, and in that field he was, in my opinion, the greatest man there has been in a thousand years; yet he had nothing of the pedant about him except the way he wore his gown and a certain outward manner that was perhaps not polished in the courtier's fashion. These are things of no account.[11]

Et hay nos gens qui supportent plus mal-aysement vne robbe qu'vne ame de trauers: et regardent à sa reuerence, à son maintien et à ses bottes, quel homme il est. Car au dedans c'estoit l'ame la plus polie du monde. Ie l'ay souuent à mon escient ietté en propos eslongnez de son vsage, il y voyoit si cler, d'vne apprehension si prompte, d'vn iugement si sain, qu'il sembloit, qu'il n'eust iamais faict autre mestier que la guerre, et affaires d'Estat. Ce sont natures belles et fortes: queis arte benigna / Et meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan, qui se maintiennent au trauers d'vne mauuaise institution. Or ce n'est pas assez que nostre institution ne nous gaste pas, il faut qu'elle nous change en mieux.

And I hate people who find a gown worn askew harder to tolerate than a soul askew, and who judge what sort of man someone is by his bow, his bearing and his boots. For within, his was the most polished soul in the world. I often deliberately drew him into talk far removed from his own field, and he saw into it so clearly, with so quick an apprehension and so sound a judgment, that it seemed he had never followed any other trade than war and affairs of state. These are fine, strong natures, whose hearts the Titan fashioned with kindly art / and of a better clay, which hold their own through a bad education. Now it is not enough that our education should not spoil us; it must change us for the better.[12]

1.25.13 Il y a aucuns de noz Parlemens, quand ils ont à receuoir des officiers, qui les examinent seulement sur la science: les autres y adioustent encores l'essay du sens, en leur presentant le iugement de quelque cause. Ceux-cy me semblent auoir vn beaucoup meilleur stile. Et encore que ces deux pieces soyent necessaires, et qu'il faille qu'elles s'y trouuent toutes deux: si est-ce qu'à la verité celle du sçauoir est moins prisable, que celle du iugement; cette-cy se peut passer de l'autre, et non l'autre de cette cy. Car comme dict ce vers Grec, ως ουδεν ἡ μαθησις, ην μη νους παρη. A quoy faire la science, si l'entendement n'y est?

Some of our Parlements, when they have to admit officers, examine them only on their learning; others also add a test of their sense by giving them some case to judge. The latter seem to me to have a much better method. And although both these parts are necessary, and both must be present, still in truth learning is less to be prized than judgment. Judgment can do without learning, but not learning without judgment. For as the Greek verse says, Learning is nothing, unless there is a mind to go with it. What use is learning if understanding is not there?[13]

Pleust à Dieu que pour le bien de nostre iustice ces compagnies là se trouuassent aussi bien fournies d'entendement et de conscience, comme elles sont encore de science. Non vitæ, sed scholæ discimus. Or il ne faut pas attacher le sçauoir à l'ame, il l'y faut incorporer: il ne l'en faut pas arrouser, il l'en faut teindre; et s'il ne la change, et meliore son estat imparfaict, certainement il vaut beaucoup mieux le laisser là. C'est vn dangereux glaiue, et qui empesche et offence son maistre s'il est en main foible, et qui n'en sçache l'vsage: vt fuerit melius non didicisse.

Would to God that, for the good of our justice, those bodies were as well furnished with understanding and conscience as they still are with learning! We learn not for life but for school. Now learning must not be attached to the soul; it must be incorporated into it. The soul must not be sprinkled with it; it must be dyed in it. And if learning does not change the soul and improve its imperfect state, it is certainly much better to leave it alone. It is a dangerous sword, which hampers and wounds its master if it is in a weak hand that does not know how to use it: so that it would have been better never to have learned.[14]

	A l'aduenture est ce la cause, que et nous, et la Theologie ne requerons pas beaucoup de science aux femmes, et que François Duc de Bretaigne filz de Iean V. comme on luy parla de son mariage auec Isabeau fille d'Escosse, et qu'on luy adiousta qu'elle auoit esté nourrie simplement et sans aucune instruction de lettres, respondit, qu'il l'en aymoit mieux, et qu'vne femme estoit assez sçauante, quand elle sçauoit mettre difference entre la chemise et le pourpoint de son mary.	Perhaps this is the reason why both we and theology do not require much learning of women. And it is why Francis, Duke of Brittany, son of John V, when they spoke to him of his marriage to Isabella, a daughter of Scotland, and added that she had been brought up simply and without any instruction in letters, replied that he loved her the better for it, and that a woman was learned enough when she could tell the difference between her husband's shirt and his doublet.[15]
1.25.15	Aussi ce n'est pas si grande merueille, comme on crie, que nos ancestres n'ayent pas faict grand estat des lettres, et qu'encores auiourd'huy elles ne se trouuent que par rencontre aux principaux conseils de nos Roys: et si cette fin de s'en enrichir, qui seule nous est auiourd'huy proposée par le moyen de la Iurisprudence, de la Medecine, du pedantisme, et de la Theologie encore, ne les tenoit en credit, vous les verriez sans doubte aussi marmiteuses qu'elles furent onques. Quel dommage, si elles ne nous apprennent ny à bien penser, ny à bien faire? Postquam docti prodierunt, boni desunt. Toute autre science, est dommageable à celuy qui n'a la science de la bonté.	So it is not such a great wonder, whatever people cry, that our ancestors did not set much store by letters, and that even today they are found only by chance in the chief councils of our kings. And if the aim of growing rich by them, which is the only one held out to us today through jurisprudence, medicine, pedantry, and theology too, did not keep them in credit, you would doubtless see them as wretched as they ever were. And what a loss would that be, if they teach us neither to think well nor to act well? Since the learned have appeared, the good have vanished. All other knowledge is harmful to the man who lacks the knowledge of goodness.[16]
1.25.16	Mais la raison que ie cherchoys tantost, seroit elle point aussi de là, que nostre estude en France n'ayant quasi autre but que le proufit, moins de ceux que nature a faict naistre à plus genereux offices que lucratifs, s'adonnants aux lettres, ou si courtement (retirez auant que d'en auoir pris appetit, à vne profession qui n'a rien de commun auec les liures) il ne reste plus ordinairement, pour s'engager tout à faict à l'estude, que les gents de basse fortune, qui y questent des moyens à viure? Et de ces gents-là, les ames estans et par nature, et par institution domestique et exemple, du plus bas aloy, rapportent faucement le fruit de la science.	But might not the reason I was looking for a moment ago also come from this? Since our study in France has hardly any aim but profit, fewer of those whom nature has born for nobler offices than lucrative ones devote themselves to letters, or else they do so only briefly (withdrawn, before they have acquired a taste for them, into a profession that has nothing in common with books). And so there ordinarily remain, to commit themselves wholly to study, only people of low fortune, who are hunting in it for a means of living. And since the souls of such people are of the basest alloy, both by nature and by their home upbringing and example, they yield a false fruit of learning.

La principale ordonnance de Platon en sa republique, c'est donner à ses citoyens selon leur nature, leur charge. Nature peut tout, et fait tout. Les boiteux sont mal propres aux exercices du corps, et aux exercices de l'esprit les ames boiteuses. Les bastardes et vulgaires sont indignes de la philosophie. Quand nous voyons vn homme mal chaussé, nous disons que ce n'est pas merueille, s'il est chaussetier. De mesme il semble, que l'experience nous offre souuent, vn medecin plus mal medeciné, vn Theologien moins reformé, et coustumierement vn sçauant moins suffisant qu'vn autre.	Plato's chief ordinance in his Republic is to give his citizens their duties according to their nature. Nature can do everything and does everything. The lame are ill fitted for bodily exercises, and lame souls for exercises of the mind. Spurious and common souls are unworthy of philosophy. When we see a man badly shod, we say it is no wonder if he is a hosier. In the same way, experience often seems to offer us a doctor worse doctored than others, a theologian less reformed, and, as a rule, a learned man less competent.
Aristo Chius auoit anciennement raison de dire, que les philosophes nuisoient aux auditeurs: d'autant que la plus part des ames ne se trouuent propres à faire leur profit de telle instruction: qui, si elle ne se met à bien, se met à mal: ασωτους ex Aristippi, acerbos ex Zenonis schola exire.	Aristo of Chios was right, long ago, to say that philosophers harmed their listeners, since most souls are not fitted to profit from such instruction, which, if it does not turn to good, turns to ill: that profligates came out of the school of Aristippus, and harsh men out of Zeno's.[17]

TEACHING VIRTUE, PERSIAN AND SPARTAN

The Persians and Spartans taught their children virtue and action rather than letters.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.25.17 En cette belle institution que Xenophon preste aux Perses, nous trouuons qu'ils apprenoient la vertu à leurs enfans, comme les autres nations font les lettres. Platon dit que le fils aisné en leur succession royale, estoit ainsi nourry. Apres sa naissance, on le donnoit, non à des femmes, mais à des eunuches de la premiere authorité autour des Roys, à cause de leur vertu. Ceux-cy prenoient charge de luy rendre le corps beau et sain: et apres sept ans le duisoient à monter à cheual, et aller à la chasse. Quand il estoit arriué au quatorziesme, ils le deposoient entre les mains de quatre: le plus sage, le plus iuste, le plus temperant, le plus vaillant de la nation.	In that fine education which Xenophon lends the Persians, we find that they taught their children virtue as other nations teach letters. Plato says that the eldest son, in their royal succession, was brought up as follows. After his birth he was given not to women but to eunuchs of the highest authority about the kings, on account of their virtue. These took charge of making his body handsome and healthy, and after the age of seven they trained him to ride and to hunt. When he reached his fourteenth year, they placed him in the hands of four men: the wisest, the most just, the most temperate and the most valiant in the nation.[18]
Le premier luy apprenoit la religion: le second, à estre tousiours veritable: le tiers, à se rendre maistre des cupidités: le quart, à ne rien craindre.	The first taught him religion; the second, to be always truthful; the third, to master his desires; the fourth, to fear nothing.

17 Aristo of Chios was a Stoic philosopher of the 3rd century BC; the quotation is from Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods III. Aristippus founded the pleasure-seeking Cyrenaic school, Zeno the Stoic school.
18 Xenophon's Cyropaedia is an idealized account of the education of Cyrus the Great; the passage on the royal heir is from Plato's Alcibiades I.

C'est chose digne de tres-grande consideration, que en cette excellente police de Lycurgus, et à la verité monstrueuse par sa perfection, si songneuse pourtant de la nourriture des enfans, comme de sa principale charge, et au giste mesmes des Muses, il s'y face si peu de mention de la doctrine: comme si cette genereuse ieunesse desdaignant tout autre ioug que de la vertu, on luy aye deu fournir, au lieu de nos maistres de science, seulement des maistres de vaillance, prudence et iustice. Exemple que Platon a suiuy en ses loix.

La façon de leur discipline, c'estoit leur faire des questions sur le iugement des hommes, et de leurs actions: et s'ils condamnoient et loüoient, ou ce personnage, ou ce faict, il falloit raisonner leur dire, et par ce moyen ils aiguisoient ensemble leur entendement, et apprenoient le droit.

Astyages en Xenophon, demande à Cyrus compte de sa derniere leçon; C'est, dit-il, qu'en nostre escole vn grand garçon ayant vn petit saye, le donna à l'vn de ses compagnons de plus petite taille, et luy osta son saye qui estoit plus grand: nostre precepteur m'ayant fait iuge de ce different, ie iugeay qu'il falloit laisser les choses en cet estat, et que l'vn et l'autre sembloit estre mieux accommodé en ce point: sur quoy il me remontra que i'auois mal fait: car ie m'estois arresté à considerer la bien seance, et il falloit premierement auoir proueu à la iustice, qui vouloit que nul ne fust forcé en ce qui luy appartenoit.

Et dit qu'il en fut fouëté, tout ainsi que nous sommes en nos villages, pour auoir oublié le premier aoriste de τυπτω. Mon regent me feroit vne belle harangue in genere demonstratiuo, auant qu'il me persuadast que son escole vaut cette-là.

1.25.19 Ils ont voulu coupper chemin: et puis qu'il est ainsi que les sciences, lors mesmes qu'on les prent de droit fil, ne peuuent que nous enseigner la prudence, la preud'hommie et la resolution, ils ont voulu d'arriuée mettre leurs enfans au propre des effects, et les instruire non par ouïr dire, mais par l'essay de l'action, en les formant et moulant vifuement, non seulement de preceptes et parolles, mais principalement d'exemples et d'œuures: afin que ce ne fust pas vne science en leur ame, mais sa complexion et habitude: que ce ne fust pas vn

ENGLISH

It is a thing well worth considering that in that excellent government of Lycurgus—truly monstrous in its perfection—so careful of the rearing of children as its principal charge, and in the very home of the Muses, there is so little mention of learning. It is as if, since those noble youths disdained every yoke but that of virtue, they had to be given, instead of our masters of learning, only masters of valor, prudence and justice. Plato followed this example in his Laws.

Their method of teaching was to put questions to the children about how to judge men and their actions; and if they condemned or praised this person or that deed, they had to give reasons for what they said. By this means they sharpened their understanding and learned what was right, both at once.

Astyages, in Xenophon, asks Cyrus to give an account of his last lesson. "It was this," he says. "In our school a big boy who had a small tunic gave it to one of his companions who was smaller, and took from him his tunic, which was bigger. Our tutor made me judge of this dispute, and I judged that things should be left as they were, since each seemed better suited that way. Whereupon he showed me that I had done wrong; for I had stopped at considering what was fitting, whereas I should first have attended to justice, which required that no one be forced in what belonged to him."[19]

And he says he was whipped for it, just as we are in our villages for having forgotten the first aorist of τυπτω. My schoolmaster would have to make me a fine speech in the demonstrative genre before he persuaded me that his school is as good as that one.[20]

They wanted to take a shortcut. And since it is the case that the sciences, even when taken straight, can only teach us prudence, integrity and resolution, they chose to put their children from the outset into the thick of action, and to instruct them not by hearsay but by trying out action, forming and molding them in a lively way, not only with precepts and words but chiefly with examples and deeds. The aim was that this should be not a knowacquest, mais vne naturelle possession. A ce propos, on demandoit à Agesilaus ce qu'il seroit d'aduis, que les enfans apprinsent: Ce qu'ils doiuent faire estans hommes, respondit-il.

Ce n'est pas merueille, si vne telle institution a produit des effects si admirables.

1.25.20 On alloit, dit-on, aux autres villes de Grece chercher des Rhetoriciens, des Peintres, et des Musiciens: mais en Lacedemone des legislateurs, des magistrats, et Empereurs d'armée: à Athenes on aprenoit à bien dire, et icy à bien faire: là à se desmesler d'vn argument sophistique, et à rabattre l'imposture des mots captieusement entrelassez; icy à se desmesler des appats de la volupté, et à rabattre d'vn grand courage les menasses de la fortune et de la mort: ceux-là s'embesongnoient apres les parolles, ceux-cy apres les choses: là c'estoit vne continuelle exercitation de la langue, icy vne continuelle exercitation de l'ame.

Parquoy il n'est pas estrange, si Antipater leur demandant cinquante enfans pour ostages, ils respondirent tout au rebours de ce que nous ferions, qu'ils aymoient mieux donner deux fois autant d'hommes faicts; tant ils estimoient la perte de l'education de leur pays. Quand Agesilaus conuie Xenophon d'enuoyer nourrir ses enfans à Sparte, ce n'est pas pour y apprendre la Rhetorique, ou Dialectique: mais pour apprendre, ce dit-il, la plus belle science qui soit, asçauoir la science d'obeir et de commander.

1.25.21 Il est tres-plaisant, de voir Socrates, à sa mode se moquant de Hippias, qui luy recite, comment il a gaigné, specialement en certaines petites villettes de la Sicile, bonne somme d'argent, à regenter: et qu'à Sparte il n'a gaigné pas vn sol. Que ce sont gents idiots, qui ne sçauent ny mesurer ny compter: ne font estat ny de Grammaire ny de rythme: s'amusans seulement à sçauoir la suitte des Roys, establissement et decadence des Estats, et tels fatras de comptes. Et au bout de cela, Socrates luy faisant aduouër par le menu, l'excellence de leur forme de gouuernement publique, l'heur et vertu de leur vie priuée, luy laisse deuiner la conclusion de l'inutilité de ses arts.

ledge in their soul but its very constitution and habit; not an acquisition but a natural possession. On this subject, Agesilaus was asked what he thought children should learn. "What they should do when they are men," he answered.

It is no wonder if such an education produced such admirable results.

People went, they say, to the other cities of Greece to look for rhetoricians, painters and musicians, but to Lacedaemon for lawgivers, magistrates and generals. At Athens they learned to speak well, and here to act well. There they learned to disentangle themselves from a sophistical argument and to beat down the imposture of words cunningly interwoven; here, to disentangle themselves from the lures of pleasure and to beat down with great courage the threats of fortune and of death. Those busied themselves with words, these with things. There it was a continual exercise of the tongue; here, a continual exercise of the soul.[21]

So it is not strange that when Antipater demanded fifty children of them as hostages, they answered, quite the reverse of what we would do, that they would rather give twice as many grown men—so highly did they value the loss of their country's education. When Agesilaus invites Xenophon to send his children to be brought up in Sparta, it is not for them to learn rhetoric or dialectic there, but to learn, as he says, the finest knowledge there is: namely, the knowledge of how to obey and how to command.[22]

It is very amusing to see Socrates, in his way, mocking Hippias, who tells him how he has earned a good sum of money by teaching, especially in certain little towns in Sicily, and that at Sparta he did not earn a penny. The Spartans, he says, are simple, unlettered people who know neither how to measure nor how to count, who set no store by grammar or by rhythm, and amuse themselves only with knowing the succession of kings, the founding and decline of states, and such a jumble of tales. And at the end of all this Socrates, making him admit point by point the excellence of their form of public government and the happiness and virtue of their private life, leaves him to guess the conclusion: the uselessness of his own arts.[23]

1.25.22 Les exemples nous apprennent, et en cette martiale police, et en toutes ses semblables, que l'estude des sciences amollit et effemine les courages, plus qu'il ne les fermit et aguerrit. Le plus fort Estat, qui paroisse pour le present au monde, est celuy des Turcs, peuples egalement duicts à l'estimation des armes, et mespris des lettres. Ie trouue Rome plus vaillante auant qu'elle fust sçauante. Les plus belliqueuses nations en nos iours, sont les plus grossieres et ignorantes. Les Scythes, les Parthes, Tamburlan, nous seruent à cette preuue.

Examples teach us, both in this martial state and in all those like it, that the study of the sciences softens and enfeebles hearts more than it strengthens and toughens them. The strongest state that appears in the world at present is that of the Turks, peoples trained alike to esteem arms and to despise letters. I find Rome more valiant before it became learned. The most warlike nations of our day are the crudest and most ignorant. The Scythians, the Parthians, Tamburlaine, serve us as proof of this.[24]

Quand les Gots rauagerent la Grece, ce qui sauua toutes les librairies d'estre passées au feu, ce fut vn d'entre eux, qui sema cette opinion, qu'il failloit laisser ce meuble entier aux ennemis: propre à les destourner de l'exercice militaire, et amuser à des occupations sedentaires et oysiues. Quand nostre Roy, Charles huictieme, quasi sans tirer l'espee du fourreau, se veid maistre du Royaume de Naples, et d'vne bonne partie de la Toscane, les Seigneurs de sa suitte, attribuerent cette inesperee facilité de conqueste, à ce que les Princes et la noblesse d'Italie s'amusoient plus à se rendre ingenieux et sçauans, que vigoureux et guerriers.

When the Goths ravaged Greece, what saved all the libraries from being put to the fire was one of them who spread the opinion that these goods should be left intact for the enemy, as being apt to divert them from military exercise and keep them amused with sedentary and idle occupations. When our king, Charles VIII, almost without drawing his sword from its scabbard, found himself master of the kingdom of Naples and a good part of Tuscany, the lords of his retinue attributed this unhoped-for ease of conquest to the fact that the princes and nobility of Italy amused themselves more with becoming clever and learned than vigorous and warlike.[25]

23 The dialogue is Plato's Hippias Major; Hippias of Elis was a sophist famous for his fees.
24 Tamburlaine is Timur (1336–1405), the Central Asian conqueror.
25 The Goths raided Athens in AD 267. Charles VIII invaded Italy in 1494–1495.

I.26 Of the Education of Children

De l'Institution des enfans, à Madame Diane de Foix, Contesse de Gurson
Writing to a noblewoman, Montaigne outlines an education that trains judgment and character rather than memory or rote learning.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.26.1	IE ne vis iamais pere, pour bossé ou teigneux que fust son fils, qui laissast de l'aduoüer: non pourtant, s'il n'est du tout enyuré de cet' affection, qu'il ne s'apperçoiue de sa defaillance: mais tant y a qu'il est sien. Aussi moy, ie voy mieux que tout autre, que ce ne sont icy que resueries d'homme, qui n'a gousté des sciences que la crouste premiere en son enfance, et n'en a retenu qu'vn general et informe visage: vn peu de chaque chose, et rien du tout, à la Françoise. Car en somme, ie sçay qu'il y a vne Medecine, vne Iurisprudence, quatre parties en la Mathematique, et grossierement ce à quoy elles visent.	I never saw a father, however hunchbacked or scabby his son might be, who would refuse to acknowledge him. Not that he fails to perceive the boy's defect, unless he is utterly drunk with that affection; but the fact remains that the boy is his. So I too see better than anyone that these are only the musings of a man who in his childhood tasted only the outer crust of the sciences, and has kept only a general, shapeless picture of them: a little of everything and nothing at all, in the French manner. For in short, I know that there is such a thing as medicine, and jurisprudence, and that mathematics has four parts, and roughly what they aim at.[1]
	Et à l'aduenture encore sçay-ie la pretention des sciences en general, au seruice de nostre vie: mais d'y enfoncer plus auant, de m'estre rongé les ongles à l'estude d'Aristote monarque de la doctrine moderne, ou opiniatré apres quelque science, ie ne l'ay iamais faict: ny n'est art dequoy ie peusse peindre seulement les premiers lineaments. Et n'est enfant des classes moyennes, qui ne se puisse dire plus sçauant que moy: qui n'ay seulement pas dequoy l'examiner sur sa premiere leçon. Et si l'on m'y force, ie suis contraint assez ineptement, d'en tirer quelque matiere de propos vniuersel, sur quoy i'examine son iugement naturel: leçon, qui leur est autant incognue, comme à moy la leur.	And perhaps I also know what the sciences in general claim to do in the service of our life. But as for plunging in deeper, gnawing my nails over the study of Aristotle, monarch of modern learning, or stubbornly pursuing some science—I have never done it. Nor is there any art of which I could sketch even the first outlines. There is no child in the middle forms who could not call himself more learned than I, who do not even know enough to examine him on his first lesson. And if I am forced to, I am obliged, rather ineptly, to draw from it some matter of general discussion, on which I examine his natural judgment: a lesson as unknown to them as theirs is to me.
1.26.2	Ie n'ay dressé commerce auec aucun liure solide, sinon Plutarche et Seneque, où ie puyse comme les Danaïdes, remplissant et versant sans cesse. I'en attache quelque chose à ce papier, à moy, si peu que rien. L'histoire, c'est mon gibier en matiere de liures, ou la poësie, que i'ayme d'vne particuliere inclination: car, comme disoit Cleanthes, tout ainsi que la voix contrainte dans l'étroit canal d'vne trompette sort plus aigue et plus forte: ainsi	I have struck up an acquaintance with no solid book except Plutarch and Seneca, from whom I draw like the Danaids, endlessly filling and pouring out. Something of it sticks to this paper; to me, next to nothing. History is my quarry in the matter of books, or poetry, which I love with a particular inclination. For, as Cleanthes said, just as the voice forced through the narrow channel of a

1.26.3 Quant aux facultez naturelles qui sont en moy, dequoy c'est icy l'essay, ie les sens flechir sous la charge: mes conceptions et mon iugement ne marche qu'à tastons, chancelant, bronchant et chopant: et quand ie suis allé le plus auant que ie puis, si ne me suis-ie aucunement satisfaict. Ie voy encore du païs au delà: mais d'vne veüe trouble, et en nuage, que ie ne puis demesler.	As for the natural faculties that are in me, of which this is the trial, I feel them bending under the load. My conceptions and my judgment move only by groping, staggering, stumbling and tripping; and when I have gone as far as I can, I am still not at all satisfied. I can see more country beyond, but with a dim and clouded sight that I cannot clear.
Et entreprenant de parler indifferemment de tout ce qui se presente à ma fantasie, et n'y employant que mes propres et naturels moyens, s'il m'aduient, comme il faict souuent, de rencontrer de fortune dans les bons autheurs ces mesmes lieux, que i'ay entrepris de traiter, comme ie vien de faire chez Plutarque tout presentement, son discours de la force de l'imagination: à me recognoistre au prix de ces gens là, si foible et si chetif, si poisant et si endormy, ie me fay pitié, ou desdain à moy mesmes. Si me gratifie-ie de cecy, que mes opinions ont cet honneur de rencontrer souuent aux leurs, et que ie vays au moins de loing apres, disant que voire.	I undertake to speak indiscriminately of whatever comes into my fancy, using only my own natural means. And if I happen, as I often do, to come across by chance in the good authors those very topics I have undertaken to treat—as I have just now done in Plutarch, with his discussion of the power of the imagination—then, seeing myself so weak and puny, so heavy and sluggish compared with those men, I feel pity or disdain for myself. Still, I please myself with this: that my opinions have the honor of often coinciding with theirs, and that I at least follow behind at a distance, saying "Quite so."
Aussi que i'ay cela, que chacun n'a pas, de cognoistre l'extreme difference d'entre-eux et moy: et laisse ce neant-moins courir mes inuentions ainsi foibles et basses, comme ie les ay produites, sans en replastrer et recoudre les defaux que cette comparaison m'y a descouuert.	Also, I have this, which not everyone has: I recognize the extreme difference between them and me. And nonetheless I let my inventions run on, weak and lowly as they are, just as I produced them, without plastering over and patching up the defects this comparison has revealed to me.
1.26.4 Il faut auoir les reins bien fermes pour entreprendre de marcher front à front auec ces gens là. Les escriuains indiscrets de nostre siecle, qui parmy leurs ouurages de neant, vont semant des lieux entiers des anciens autheurs, pour se faire honneur, font le contraire. Car cett' infinie dissemblance de lustres rend vn visage si pasle, si terni, et si laid à ce qui est leur, qu'ils y perdent beaucoup plus qu'ils n'y gaignent. C'estoient deux contraires fantasies. Le Philosophe Chrysippus mesloit à ses liures, non les passages seulement, mais des ouurages entiers d'autres autheurs: et en vn la Medee d'Eurypides: et disoit Apollodorus, que, qui en retrancheroit ce qu'il y auoit d'estranger, son papier demeureroit en blanc.	You need a very strong back to undertake to march abreast of those men. The indiscreet writers of our century, who go sowing whole passages of the ancient authors among their worthless works to do themselves honor, do the opposite. For this infinite difference in brilliance makes what is their own look so pale, so tarnished and so ugly that they lose much more than they gain. There were two contrary notions on this. The philosopher Chrysippus mixed into his books not just passages but whole works of other authors, in one of them the Medea of Euripides; and Apollodorus said that if you cut out everything borrowed, his paper would be left blank.[3]

2 The Danaids, daughters of Danaus, were condemned in the underworld to fill a leaking jar forever. Cleanthes was a Stoic philosopher; the saying is reported by Seneca, Letters 108.

Epicurus au rebours, en trois cents volumes qu'il laissa, n'auoit pas mis vne seule allegation.

1.26.5 Il m'aduint l'autre iour de tomber sur vn tel passage: I'auois trainé languissant apres des parolles Françoises, si exangues, si descharnees, et si vuides de matiere et de sens, que ce n'estoient voirement que parolles Françoises: au bout d'vn long et ennuyeux chemin, ie vins à rencontrer vne piece haute, riche et esleuee iusques aux nües: si i'eusse trouué la pente douce, et la montee vn peu alongee, cela eust esté excusable: c'estoit vn precipice si droit et si coupé que des six premieres parolles ie cogneuz que ie m'enuolois en l'autre monde: de là ie descouuris la fondriere d'où ie venois, si basse et si profonde, que ie n'eus oncques puis le cœur de m'y raualer.

Si i'estoffois l'vn de mes discours de ces riches despouilles, il esclaireroit par trop la bestise des autres. Reprendre en autruy mes propres fautes, ne me semble non plus incompatible, que de reprendre, comme ie fay souuent, celles d'autruy en moy. Il les faut accuser par tout, et leur oster tout lieu de franchise. Si sçay ie, combien audacieusement i'entreprens moy-mesmes à tous coups, de m'egaler à mes larrecins, d'aller pair à pair quand et eux: non sans vne temeraire esperance, que ie puisse tromper les yeux des iuges à les discerner. Mais c'est autant par le benefice de mon application, que par le benefice de mon inuention et de ma force.

Et puis, ie ne luitte point en gros ces vieux champions là, et corps à corps: c'est par reprinses, menues et legeres attaintes. Ie ne m'y aheurte pas: ie ne fay que les taster: et ne vay point tant, comme ie marchande d'aller. Si ie leur pouuoy tenir palot, ie serois honneste homme: car ie ne les entreprens, que par où ils sont les plus roides.

Epicurus, on the contrary, in the three hundred volumes he left, had not put a single quotation.

The other day I happened to come upon such a passage. I had been dragging along languidly after French words so bloodless, so fleshless, so empty of matter and sense, that they really were nothing but French words. At the end of a long and tedious road I came upon a piece that was lofty, rich and raised to the clouds. If I had found the slope gentle and the climb a little gradual, it would have been excusable; but it was a precipice so sheer and so abrupt that from the first six words I knew I was flying off into another world. From there I saw the bog I had come from, so low and so deep that I never afterward had the heart to go down into it again.

If I stuffed one of my discourses with these rich spoils, it would show up the stupidity of the others all too clearly. To reprove my own faults in others seems to me no more inconsistent than to reprove, as I often do, the faults of others in myself. They must be denounced everywhere, and every sanctuary taken from them. Yet I know how boldly I myself try at every turn to match my thefts, to keep pace with them side by side, not without a rash hope that I may deceive the eyes of the judges who would tell them apart. But this is as much thanks to my skill in applying them as to my invention and my strength.

And then, I do not wrestle with those old champions wholesale and body to body. It is by bouts, with slight and light touches. I do not charge into them; I only feel them out. And I don't so much advance as haggle about advancing. If I could hold my own against them, I would be a man of some worth; for I take them on only where they are stiffest.

As for doing what I have found some people do—covering themselves in other men's armor until not even their fingertips show, and carrying out their design (as is easy for the learned in a common subject) under ancient inventions patched together here and there—for those who want to hide these borrowings and make them their own, it is first of all injustice and cowardice. Having nothing of their own worth showing, they seek to present

This does not concern centos that are published as centos; and I have seen some very ingenious ones in my time, among others one under the name of Capilupus, not to mention the ancients. These are minds that show themselves both elsewhere and in this, as Lipsius does in that learned and laborious web, his Politics.[4]

Be that as it may, I mean to say, and whatever these absurdities may be, I have not resolved to hide them, any more than I would a portrait of myself, bald and graying, in which the painter had put not a perfect face but mine. For these too are my own temperament and opinions. I give them as what I believe, not as what is to be believed. My only aim here is to reveal myself, who may be different tomorrow if some new learning changes me. I have no authority to be believed, nor do I wish for it, feeling myself too ill instructed to instruct others.

possession que vous auez sur ma seruitude, m'oblige assez à desirer honneur, bien et aduantage à tout ce qui vous touche. Mais à la verité ie n'y entens sinon cela, que la plus grande difficulté et importance de l'humaine science semble estre en cet endroit, où il se traitte de la nourriture et institution des enfans. Tout ainsi qu'en l'agriculture, les façons, qui vont deuant le planter, sont certaines et aysees, et le planter mesme.

Mais depuis que ce qui est planté, vient à prendre vie: à l'esleuer, il y a vne grande varieté de façons, et difficulté: pareillement aux hommes, il y a peu d'industrie à les planter: mais depuis qu'ils sont naiz, on se charge d'vn soing diuers, plein d'embesoignement et de crainte, à les dresser et nourrir. La montre de leurs inclinations est si tendre en ce bas aage, et si obscure, les promesses si incertaines et fauces, qu'il est mal-aisé d'y establir aucun solide iugement. Voyez Cimon, voyez Themistocles et mille autres, combien ils se sont disconuenuz à eux mesmes.

Les petits des ours, et des chiens, montrent leur inclination naturelle; mais les hommes se iettans incontinent en des accoustumances, en des opinions, en des loix, se changent ou se deguisent facilement. Si est-il difficile de forcer les propensions naturelles. D'où il aduient que par faute d'auoir bien choisi leur route, pour neant se trauaille on souuent, et employe lon beaucoup d'aage, à dresser des enfans aux choses, ausquelles ils ne peuuent prendre pied. Toutesfois en cette difficulté mon opinion est, de les acheminer tousiours aux meilleures choses et plus profitables; et qu'on se doit peu appliquer à ces legeres diuinations et prognostiques, que nous prenons des mouuemens de leur enfance. Platon en sa republique, me semble leur donner trop d'autorité.

1.26.8 Madame c'est vn grand ornement que la science, et vn vtil de merueilleux seruice, notamment aux personnes esleuees en tel degré de fortune, comme vous estes. A la verité elle n'a point son vray vsage en mains viles et basses. Elle est bien plus fiere, de prester ses moyens à conduire vne guerre, à commander vn peuple, à pratiquer l'amitié d'vn Prince, ou d'vne nation estrangere, qu'à dresser vn argument dialectique, ou à plaider vn appel, ou ordonner vne masse de pillules.

greatness and prosperity of all that comes of it; besides which, the long-standing claim you have on my service obliges me well enough to wish honor, good and advantage to all that concerns you. But in truth I understand nothing about it except this: that the greatest difficulty and importance in human knowledge seems to lie in the area that deals with the rearing and education of children. Just as in agriculture the tasks that come before planting are sure and easy, and so is the planting itself, but once what has been planted comes to life, there is a great variety of methods, and great difficulty, in raising it; so too with men: there is little skill in planting them, but once they are born, we take on a manifold care, full of bustle and fear, in training and rearing them. The signs of their inclinations are so faint at that early age, and so obscure, and the promises so uncertain and deceptive, that it is hard to base any solid judgment on them. Look at Cimon, look at Themistocles and a thousand others: how unlike their early selves they turned out![6]

The young of bears and dogs show their natural inclination; but men, throwing themselves straight into habits, opinions and laws, easily change or disguise themselves. Yet it is hard to force natural propensities. Hence it happens that, for want of having chosen their road well, people often toil in vain and spend many years training children for things in which they cannot get a footing. Nevertheless, in this difficulty, my opinion is that we should always steer them toward the best and most profitable things, and pay little attention to those trivial divinations and prognostications we draw from the movements of their childhood. Plato, in his Republic, seems to me to give them too much authority.

Madame, learning is a great ornament and a tool of marvelous service, notably to persons raised to such a degree of fortune as yours. In truth it does not find its true use in base and low hands. It is much prouder to lend its means to conducting a war, governing a people, or cultivating the friendship of a prince or a foreign nation, than to constructing a dialectical argument, pleading an appeal, or prescribing a mass of pills.

6 Cimon and Themistocles, Athenian statesmen of the 5th century BC, were both notorious for their dissolute youth.

C'est tout ce que ie puis conferer à vostre seruice en cela.	So, Madame, since I believe you will not forget this part in the education of your children—you who have tasted its sweetness and who come of a lettered race (for we still have the writings of those ancient Counts of Foix from whom the Count your husband and you are descended; and your uncle François, Monsieur de Candale, brings forth others every day, which will spread the knowledge of this quality of your family for many centuries)—I want to tell you one notion of mine on this subject, which runs contrary to common practice. itself: sometimes opening the way for it, sometimes letting it open the way for itself. I do not want him to think up everything and do all the talking; I want him to listen to his pupil speak in his turn. Socrates, and later Arcesilaus, first had their pupils speak, and then they spoke to them.[8]

The authority of those who teach is often an obstacle to those who want to learn. It is good that he should make the boy trot ahead of him, to judge his pace and judge how far he must come down to adapt himself to the boy's strength. For want of this proportion we spoil everything. And to know how to find it and keep within it with good measure is one of the hardest tasks I know. It is the work of a lofty and very strong soul to know how to come down to a child's gait and guide it. I walk more firmly and surely uphill than down.[9]

Those who, as our custom has it, undertake to school many minds of such different capacities and forms with the same lesson and the same measure of guidance—no wonder if, in a whole crowd of children, they scarcely find two or three who bear any proper fruit from their teaching. Let the tutor ask his pupil for an account not only of the words of his lesson but of its sense and substance. And let him judge the profit the boy has made not by the testimony of his memory but by that of his life.

Let him have the boy put what he has just learned into a hundred shapes and adapt it to as many different subjects, to see whether he has really grasped it and made it his own, taking guidance for the boy's progress from Plato's methods of teaching. It is a sign of rawness and indigestion to throw up food just as it was swallowed. The stomach has not done its work if it has not changed the condition and form of what was given it to cook. Our soul moves only on credit, bound and constrained to the appetite of other men's notions, enslaved and captive under the authority of their teaching. We have been held so long in leading strings that we no longer have a free gait. Our vigor and liberty are extinguished.

They never become their own guardians. At Pisa I knew well a decent man, but such an Aristotelian toutes imaginations solides, et de toute verité, c'est la conformité à la doctrine d'Aristote: que hors de là, ce ne sont que chimeres et inanité: qu'il a tout veu et tout dict. Cette sienne proposition, pour auoir esté vn peu trop largement et iniquement interpretee, le mit autrefois et tint long temps en grand accessoire à l'inquisition à Rome.

1.26.12 Qu'il luy face tout passer par l'estamine, et ne loge rien en sa teste par simple authorité, et à credit. Les principes d'Aristote ne luy soyent principes, non plus que ceux des Stoiciens ou Epicuriens. Qu'on luy propose cette diuersité de iugemens, il choisira s'il peut: sinon il en demeurera en doubte. Che non men che saper dubbiar m'aggrada. Car s'il embrasse les opinions de Xenophon et de Platon, par son propre discours, ce ne seront plus les leurs, ce seront les siennes. Qui suit vn autre, il ne suit rien: il ne trouue rien: voire il ne cerche rien. Non sumus sub rege, sibi quisque se vindicet. Qu'il sache, qu'il sçait, au moins. Il faut qu'il imboiue leurs humeurs, non qu'il apprenne leurs preceptes.

Et qu'il oublie hardiment s'il veut, d'où il les tient, mais qu'il se les sache approprier. La verité et la raison sont communes à vn chacun, et ne sont non plus à qui les a dites premierement, qu'à qui les dit apres. Ce n'est non plus selon Platon, que selon moy: puis que luy et moy l'entendons et voyons de mesme. Les abeilles pillotent deçà delà les fleurs, mais elles en font apres le miel, qui est tout leur; ce n'est plus thin, ny mariolaine. Ainsi les pieces empruntees d'autruy, il les transformera et confondra, pour en faire vn ouurage tout sien: à sçauoir son iugement, son institution, son trauail et estude ne vise qu'à le former.

Qu'il cele tout ce dequoy il a esté secouru, et ne produise que ce qu'il en a faict. Les pilleurs, les emprunteurs, mettent en parade leurs bastiments, leurs achapts, non pas ce qu'ils tirent d'autruy. that the most general of his dogmas is this: that the touchstone and rule of all solid ideas and of all truth is conformity to the teaching of Aristotle; that outside of it there is nothing but chimeras and emptiness; that Aristotle saw everything and said everything. This proposition of his, for having been interpreted a little too broadly and unfairly, once landed him, and long kept him, in serious trouble with the Inquisition in Rome.[10]

Let him make the boy pass everything through a sieve, and lodge nothing in his head on mere authority and trust. Let Aristotle's principles not be principles to him, any more than those of the Stoics or Epicureans. Let this diversity of judgments be set before him: he will choose if he can; if not, he will remain in doubt. For doubting pleases me no less than knowing. For if he embraces the opinions of Xenophon and Plato by his own reasoning, they will no longer be theirs; they will be his. Whoever follows another follows nothing. He finds nothing—indeed, he seeks nothing. We are not under a king; let each man claim his own freedom. Let him at least know that he knows. He must absorb their temperament, not learn their precepts.[11]

And let him boldly forget, if he likes, where he got them, but let him know how to make them his own. Truth and reason are common to everyone, and belong no more to the one who said them first than to the one who says them after. It is no more according to Plato than according to me, since he and I understand it and see it alike. The bees plunder the flowers here and there, but afterward they make of them honey, which is all their own; it is no longer thyme or marjoram. So he will transform and blend the pieces borrowed from others to make a work all his own: namely, his judgment. His education, his labor and his study aim only at forming it.

Let him conceal everything that has helped him, and show only what he has made of it. Plunderers and borrowers put their buildings and their purchases on display, not what they take from others. You do not see the fees a member of the Parlement receives; you see the alliances he has gained and the honors for his children. No one makes public his receipts; everyone makes public his acquisitions.[12]

1.26.13 Le guain de nostre estude, c'est en estre deuenu meilleur et plus sage. C'est, disoit Epicharmus, l'entendement qui voyt et qui oyt: c'est l'entendement qui approfite tout, qui dispose tout, qui agit, qui domine et qui regne: toutes autres choses sont aueugles, sourdes et sans ame. Certes nous le rendons seruile et coüard, pour ne luy laisser la liberté de rien faire de soy. Qui demanda iamais à son disciple ce qu'il luy semble de la Rhetorique et de la Grammaire, de telle ou telle sentence de Ciceron? On nous les placque en la memoire toutes empennees, comme des oracles, où les lettres et les syllabes sont de la substance de la chose.

The gain from our study is to have become better and wiser by it. It is the understanding, said Epicharmus, that sees and hears; it is the understanding that profits by everything, disposes everything, acts, dominates and reigns; all other things are blind, deaf and soulless. Truly, we make it servile and cowardly by not leaving it the freedom to do anything by itself. Who ever asked his pupil what he thinks of rhetoric and grammar, or of this or that saying of Cicero? They are stuck into our memory fully fledged, like oracles in which the letters and syllables are the substance of the thing.[13]

Sçauoir par cœur n'est pas sçauoir: c'est tenir ce qu'on a donné en garde à sa memoire. Ce qu'on sçait droittement, on en dispose, sans regarder au patron, sans tourner les yeux vers son liure. Fascheuse suffisance, qu'vne suffisance pure liuresque! Ie m'attens qu'elle serue d'ornement, non de fondement: suiuant l'aduis de Platon, qui dit, la fermeté, la foy, la sincerité, estre la vraye philosophie: les autres sciences, et qui visent ailleurs, n'estre que fard.

To know by heart is not to know; it is to retain what we have given our memory to keep. What we know rightly we can make use of without looking at the model, without turning our eyes to our book. A sorry competence, a purely bookish competence! I expect it to serve as ornament, not as foundation, following the opinion of Plato, who says that steadfastness, faith and sincerity are the true philosophy, and that the other sciences, which aim elsewhere, are mere cosmetics.

Ie voudrois que le Paluël ou Pompee, ces beaux danseurs de mon temps, apprinsent des caprioles à les voir seulement faire, sans nous bouger de nos places, comme ceux-cy veulent instruire nostre entendement, sans l'esbranler: ou qu'on nous apprinst à manier vn cheual, ou vne pique, ou vn luth, ou la voix, sans nous y exercer: comme ceux icy nous veulent apprendre à bien iuger, et à bien parler, sans nous exercer à parler ny à iuger. Or à cet apprentissage tout ce qui se presente à nos yeux, sert de liure suffisant: la malice d'vn page, la sottise d'vn valet, vn propos de table, ce sont autant de nouuelles matieres.

I would like to see Paluel or Pompey, those fine dancers of my day, teach us capers just by our watching them, without our stirring from our seats—the way these people want to train our understanding without setting it in motion. Or to see us taught to handle a horse, a pike, a lute or our voice without practicing—the way these people want to teach us to judge well and speak well without exercising us in speaking or judging. Now for this apprenticeship, everything that comes before our eyes is book enough: a page's prank, a valet's blunder, a remark at table—these are so much new material.[14]

Mais pour en rapporter principalement les humeurs de ces nations et leurs façons: et pour frotter et limer nostre ceruelle contre celle d'autruy, ie voudrois qu'on commençast à le promener dés sa tendre enfance: et premierement, pour faire d'vne pierre deux coups, par les nations voisines, où le langage est plus esloigné du nostre, et auquel si vous ne la formez de bon'heure, la langue ne se peut plier.

1.26.15 Aussi bien est-ce vne opinion receuë d'vn chacun, que ce n'est pas raison de nourrir vn enfant au giron de ses parens. Cette amour naturelle les attendrit trop, et relasche, voire les plus sages: ils ne sont capables ny de chastier ses fautes, ny de le voir nourry grossierement comme il faut, et hasardeusement. Ils ne le sçauroient souffrir reuenir suant et poudreux de son exercice, boire chaud, boire froid, ny le voir sur vn cheual rebours, ny contre vn rude tireur le floret au poing, ou la premiere harquebuse.

Car il n'y a remede, qui en veut faire vn homme de bien, sans doubte il ne le faut espargner en cette ieunesse: et faut souuent choquer les regles de la medecine: Vitámque sub dio et trepidis agat / In rebus. Ce n'est pas assez de luy roidir l'ame, il luy faut aussi roidir les muscles; elle est trop pressee, si elle n'est secondee; et a trop à faire, de seule fournir à deux offices. Ie sçay combien ahanne la mienne en compagnie d'vn corps si tendre, si sensible, qui se laisse si fort aller sur elle.

Et apperçoy souuent en ma leçon, qu'en leurs escrits, mes maistres font valoir pour magnanimité et force de courage, des exemples, qui tiennent volontiers plus de l'espessissure de la peau et durté des os.

1.26.16 I'ay veu des hommes, des femmes et des enfans, ainsi nays, qu'une bastonade leur est moins qu'à moy vne chiquenaude; qui ne remuent ny langue ny sourcil, aux coups qu'on leur donne. Quand les athletes contrefont les Philosophes en patience, c'est plustost vigueur de nerfs merely to bring back, in the fashion of our French nobility, how many paces Santa Rotonda measures, or how rich Signora Livia's drawers are, or, like others, how much longer or wider Nero's face is on some old ruin there than on some similar medal,[15] but chiefly to bring back the temperament and ways of those nations, and to rub and polish our brains against those of others. I would have him taken traveling from his tender childhood; and first, to kill two birds with one stone, among the neighboring nations whose language is farthest from ours, to which the tongue cannot bend unless you train it early.

Besides, everyone holds that it is not right to bring up a child in his parents' lap. That natural love makes them too tender and too lax, even the wisest of them. They are capable neither of punishing his faults nor of seeing him brought up roughly, as he should be, and among risks. They could not bear to see him come back sweaty and dusty from his exercise, drinking hot, drinking cold, nor see him on a restive horse, or foil in hand against a tough fencer, or with his first arquebus.

For there is no help for it: whoever wants to make a good man of him must certainly not spare him in his youth, and must often go against the rules of medicine: Let him live under the open sky / and amid dangers. It is not enough to toughen his soul; we must also toughen his muscles. The soul is too hard pressed if it is not seconded, and has too much to do in meeting two duties alone. I know how much mine labors in company with a body so tender and so sensitive, which leans so heavily on it.[16]

And in my reading I often notice that my masters, in their writings, cite as magnanimity and strength of courage examples that have more to do with thickness of skin and hardness of bones.

I have seen men, women and children so made that a beating is less to them than a flick of the finger is to me, and who move neither tongue nor eyebrow at the blows they are given. When athletes imitate the philosophers in endurance, it is

Il le faut rompre à la peine, et aspreté des exercices, pour le dresser à la peine, et aspreté de la dislocation, de la colique, du caustere: et de la geaule aussi, et de la torture. Car de ces derniers icy, encore peut-il estre en prinse, qui regardent les bons, selon le temps, comme les meschants. Nous en sommes à l'espreuue.

1.26.17 En cette escole du commerce des hommes, i'ay souuent remarqué ce vice, qu'au lieu de prendre cognoissance d'autruy, nous ne trauaillons qu'à la donner de nous: et sommes plus en peine d'emploiter nostre marchandise, que d'en acquerir de nouuelle. Le silence et la modestie sont qualitez tres-commodes à la conuersation. On dressera cet enfant à estre espargnant et mesnager de sa suffisance, quand il l'aura acquise, à ne se formalizer point des sottises et fables qui se diront en sa presence: car c'est vne inciuile importunité de choquer tout ce qui n'est pas de nostre appetit. Qu'il se contente de se corriger soy mesme. Et ne semble pas reprocher à autruy, tout ce qu'il refuse à faire: ny contraster aux mœurs publiques.

strength of sinew rather than of heart. Now, being used to bearing toil is being used to bearing pain: toil grows a callus against pain. The boy must be broken in to the hardship and harshness of exercise, to train him for the hardship and harshness of dislocation, colic and cautery—and of prison too, and of torture. For these last may also catch him, since, as times go, they threaten the good as well as the wicked. We are living through it.[17]

Whoever fights the laws threatens good men with the whip and the rope. And then, the tutor's authority, which ought to be sovereign over the boy, is interrupted and hampered by the presence of the parents. Besides, the respect the household pays him and his awareness of the wealth and greatness of his house are, in my opinion, no slight drawbacks at that age.

In this school of human dealings I have often noticed a fault: instead of getting to know others, we work only at making ourselves known, and we take more trouble to sell off our own goods than to acquire new ones. Silence and modesty are very useful qualities in conversation. This child will be trained to be sparing and thrifty with his ability once he has acquired it, and not to take offense at the foolish remarks and tall tales told in his presence; for it is a rude nuisance to attack everything that is not to our taste. Let him be content to correct himself, and not seem to reproach others for everything he declines to do himself, nor set himself against public customs.

One may be wise without ostentation and without arousing envy. Let him shun those schoolmasterly and uncivil poses toward the world, and that childish ambition of wanting to seem cleverer by being different. Let him not, as if fault-finding and novelties were wares hard to come by, try to win from them a name for some special merit. Just as only great poets are entitled to use the licenses of their art, so only great and illustrious souls may be allowed to grant themselves privileges above custom.[18]

If Socrates and Aristippus did anything contrary to custom and usage, let him not think the same is permitted to him; for they earned this license by great and divine qualities. He will be taught not to enter into discussion and dispute except where he sees a champion worthy of wrestling with him; and even there not to use every move that might serve him, but only those that can serve him best. Let him be made fastidious in choosing and sorting his arguments, and fond of relevance, and therefore of brevity. Above all, let him be taught to surrender and lay down his arms to truth as soon as he perceives it, whether it springs up in his opponent's hands or within himself through some second thought.[19]

For he will not be set up in a professor's chair to recite a prescribed part; he is committed to no cause except because he approves of it. Nor will he belong to the trade in which the freedom to change one's mind and admit one's mistakes is sold for ready cash. Nor is he forced by any necessity to defend everything that has been prescribed and commanded.[20]

If his tutor is of my temperament, he will shape his will to be a very loyal servant of his prince, very devoted and very brave; but he will cool in him any desire to attach himself to the prince otherwise than by public duty. Besides several other drawbacks of such private obligations, which wound our freedom, the judgment of a man who is hired and bought is either less whole and less free, or else tainted with both imprudence and ingratitude. A pure courtier can have neither the right nor the will to speak or think anything but favorably of a master who, among so many thousands of other subjects, has chosen him to nourish and raise up with his own hand. This favor and advantage corrupt his frankness, not without some reason, and dazzle it.

That is why we commonly see the language of such people differ from all other language in a state, and deserve little trust in such matters.

Let his conscience and his virtue shine in his speech, and have only reason as their guide. Let him be made to understand that to confess a fault he discovers in his own argument, even if no one but himself has noticed it, is an effect of judgment and sincerity, which are the chief qualities he is

He will be advised, when in company, to keep his eyes everywhere; for I find that the chief seats are commonly taken by the least capable men, and that greatness of fortune is seldom found combined with ability. son deuoir, qu'il mourust là. Qu'il ne luy apprenne pas tant les histoires, qu'à en iuger. C'est à mon gré, entre toutes, la matiere à laquelle nos esprits s'appliquent de plus diuerse mesure. I'ay leu en Tite Liue cent choses que tel n'y a pas leu. Plutarche y en a leu cent; outre ce que i'y ay sçeu lire: et à l'aduenture outre ce que l'autheur y auoit mis.

A d'aucuns c'est vn pur estude grammairien: à d'autres, l'anatomie de la Philosophie, par laquelle les plus abstruses parties de nostre nature se penetrent. Il y a dans Plutarque beaucoup de discours estendus tres-dignes d'estre sçeus: car à mon gré c'est le maistre ouurier de telle besongne: mais il y en a mille qu'il n'a que touché simplement: il guigne seulement du doigt par où nous irons, s'il nous plaist, et se contente quelquefois de ne donner qu'vne atteinte dans le plus vif d'vn propos. Il les faut arracher de là, et mettre en place marchande.

Comme ce sien mot, Que les habitans d'Asie seruoient à vn seul, pour ne sçauoir prononcer vne seule syllable, qui est, Non, donna peut estre, la matiere, et l'occasion à la Boœtie, de sa Seruitude volontaire. Cela mesme de luy voir trier vne legiere action en la vie d'vn homme, ou vn mot, qui semble ne porter pas cela, c'est vn discours. C'est dommage que les gens d'entendement, ayment tant la briefueté: sans doubte leur reputation en vaut mieux, mais nous en valons moins. Plutarque ayme mieux que nous le vantions de son iugement, que de son sçauoir: il ayme mieux nous laisser desir de soy, que satieté.

Il sçauoit qu'és choses bonnes mesmes on peut trop dire, et que Alexandridas reprocha iustement, à celuy qui tenoit aux Ephores des bons propos, mais trop longs: O estranger, tu dis ce qu'il faut, autrement qu'il ne faut. much where Marcellus died as why it was unworthy of his duty that he died there. Let him teach him not so much the histories as how to judge them. In my opinion, of all subjects this is the one to which our minds apply themselves in the most varying measure. I have read in Livy a hundred things that another man has not read there. Plutarch read a hundred there beyond what I could read, and perhaps beyond what the author had put there.[23]

For some it is a purely grammatical study; for others, the anatomy of philosophy, by which the most hidden parts of our nature are penetrated. In Plutarch there are many extended discussions well worth knowing, for in my opinion he is the master craftsman of that kind of work; but there are a thousand that he has merely touched on. He just points with his finger the way we are to go, if we like, and is sometimes content to give a single thrust at the very heart of a subject. We must pull these out of there and put them on the market.

Like that saying of his, that the inhabitants of Asia served a single man because they could not pronounce a single syllable, namely "No"—which perhaps gave La Boétie the matter and the occasion for his Voluntary Servitude. The mere fact of seeing him pick out a slight action in a man's life, or a word that seems not to carry such weight, is a discourse in itself. It is a pity that men of understanding are so fond of brevity: no doubt their reputation is the better for it, but we are the worse. Plutarch would rather we praised him for his judgment than for his learning; he would rather leave us wanting more of him than sated.[24]

He knew that even in good things one can say too much, and that Alexandridas was right to reproach a man who was making good but overlong speeches to the ephors: "Stranger, you say what you should, otherwise than you should." Those with thin bodies fill them out with padding; those with slender matter puff it out with words.[25]

Human judgment draws a marvelous clarity from frequenting the world. We are all cramped and huddled up within ourselves, and our sight is shortened to the length of our nose. Socrates was Socrates d'où il estoit, il ne respondit pas, d'Athenes, mais, du monde. Luy qui auoit l'imagination plus plaine et plus estanduë, embrassoit l'vniuers, comme sa ville, iettoit ses cognoissances, sa societé et ses affections à tout le genre humain: non pas comme nous, qui ne regardons que sous nous. Quand les vignes gelent en mon village, mon prebstre en argumente l'ire de Dieu sur la race humaine, et iuge que la pepie en tienne des-ia les Cannibales.

A voir nos guerres ciuiles, qui ne crie que cette machine se bouleuerse, et que le iour du iugement nous prent au collet: sans s'auiser que plusieurs pires choses se sont veuës, et que les dix mille parts du monde ne laissent pas de galler le bon temps cependant? Moy, selon leur licence et impunité, admire de les voir si douces et molles. A qui il gresle sur la teste, tout l'hemisphere semble estre en tempeste et orage. Et disoit le Sauoïard, que si ce sot de Roy de France, eut sçeu bien conduire sa fortune, il estoit homme pour deuenir maistre d'hostel de son Duc. Son imagination ne conceuoit autre plus esleuee grandeur, que celle de son maistre.

Nous sommes insensiblement touts en cette erreur: erreur de grande suitte et preiudice. asked where he came from; he did not answer "Athens," but "the world." He, whose imagination was fuller and broader, embraced the universe as his city, and cast his knowledge, his fellowship and his affections over the whole human race—not like us, who look only at what lies under our feet. When the vines freeze in my village, my priest argues from it the wrath of God upon the human race, and judges that the Cannibals must already be parched with thirst.

Seeing our civil wars, who does not cry out that the whole machine is being turned upside down and that the Day of Judgment has us by the collar—without reflecting that many worse things have been seen, and that ten thousand parts of the world go on having a merry time all the while? As for me, considering how lawless and unpunished these wars are, I marvel to see them so mild and soft. When it hails on a man's head, the whole hemisphere seems to be in tempest and storm. And the Savoyard said that if that fool of a King of France had known how to manage his fortune well, he was the sort of man who might have become his Duke's steward. His imagination could conceive no greater height than his master's.

We are all imperceptibly in this error—an error of great consequence and harm. But whoever pictures to himself, as in a painting, that great image of our mother nature in her full majesty; whoever reads in her face so universal and constant a variety; whoever sees himself in it—and not himself only, but a whole kingdom—as a dot made with a very fine point: he alone judges things at their true size.

This great world, which some multiply further, like species under one genus, is the mirror in which we must look at ourselves to know ourselves from the right angle. In short, I want it to be my pupil's book. So many temperaments, sects, judgments, opinions, laws and customs teach us to judge our own soundly, and teach our judgment to recognize its imperfection and its natural weakness—which is no small apprenticeship. So many upheavals of state and changes of public fortune teach us not to make a great wonder of our own.

immortalizing our name by capturing ten light horsemen and some henhouse of a fort known only from its fall. The pride and arrogance of so many foreign pageants, the swollen majesty of so many courts and grandeurs, steady and strengthen our gaze to bear the brilliance of our own without blinking. So many millions of men buried before us encourage us not to fear going to join such good company in the other world. And so with the rest. Our life, said Pythagoras, resembles the great and crowded assembly of the Olympic Games.

Some exercise their bodies there to win glory in the games; others bring goods to sell, for profit. There are some—and not the worst—who seek no other fruit there than to watch how and why each thing is done, and to be spectators of other men's lives in order to judge and regulate their own.

With these examples may fittingly be matched all the most profitable discourses of philosophy, by which human actions must be measured as by their rule. He will be told what it is right to wish for, what use

And how he may avoid or bear each hardship. What springs move us, and the cause of so many different stirrings in us. For it seems to me that the first discourses with which his understanding should be steeped must be those that regulate his conduct and his sense, that will teach him to know himself, and to know how to die well and to live well.[27]

Among the liberal arts, let us begin with the art that makes us free. They all serve in some way, it is true, to instruct our life and its use, as all other things also serve it in some way. But let us choose the one that serves it directly and expressly. If we knew how to confine what pertains to our life within its just and natural limits, we would find that most of the sciences in use are of no use to us; and that even in those that are, there are stretches and depths quite useless, which we would do better to leave alone, and, following Socrates' teaching, stop the course of our study in them where usefulness ends.

PHILOSOPHY'S CHEERFUL FACE

Philosophy is not grim but gay, and its virtue is reached by pleasant, easy paths.

1.26.28 C'est grand cas que les choses en soyent là en nostre siecle, que la philosophie soit iusques aux gens d'entendement, vn nom vain et fantastique, qui se treuue de nul vsage, et de nul pris par opinion et par effect. Ie croy que ces ergotismes en sont cause, qui ont saisi ses auenues. On a grand tort de la peindre inaccessible aux enfans, et d'vn visage renfroigné, sourcilleux et terrible: qui me l'a masquee de ce faux visage pasle et hideux? Il n'est rien plus gay, plus gaillard, plus enioué, et à peu que ie ne die follastre. Elle ne presche que feste et bon temps. Vne mine triste et transie, montre que ce n'est pas là son giste.

Demetrius le Grammairien rencontrant dans le temple de Delphes vne troupe de Philosophes assis ensemble, il leur dit: Ou ie me trompe, ou à vous voir la contenance si paisible et si gaye, vous n'estes pas en grand discours entre vous. A quoy l'vn d'eux, Heracleon le Megarien, respondit: C'est à faire à ceux qui cherchent si le futur du verbe βαλλω a double λ, ou qui cherchent la deriuation des comparatifs χειρον et βελτιον, et des superlatifs χειριστον et βελτιστον, qu'il faut rider le front s'entretenant de leur science: mais quant aux discours de la philosophie, ils ont accoustumé d'esgayer et resiouïr ceux qui les traictent, non les renfroigner et contrister.

It is a strange thing that matters have come to such a pass in our age that philosophy, even for men of understanding, is an empty and fanciful name, of no use and no value, both in opinion and in fact. I think the cause is all that logic-chopping which has taken over its approaches. It is very wrong to portray it as inaccessible to children, with a frowning, beetle-browed and terrifying face. Who has masked it for me with this false face, pale and hideous? There is nothing more cheerful, more lively, more sprightly, and I would almost say more frolicsome. It preaches nothing but feasting and good times. A sad and downcast look shows that it does not dwell there.

Demetrius the grammarian, coming upon a group of philosophers sitting together in the temple at Delphi, said to them: "Either I am mistaken, or, judging by your peaceful and cheerful faces, you are not engaged in any deep discussion." To which one of them, Heracleon of Megara, replied: "It is for those who inquire whether the future of the verb βαλλω has a double λ, or who seek the derivation of the comparatives χειρον and βελτιον and the superlatives χειριστον and βελτιστον, to furrow their brows while discussing their science. But as for the discussions of philosophy, they usually cheer and delight those who engage in them, not make them frown and grow sad."[30]

Look from that source. The soul that houses philosophy must by its health make even the body healthy. It must make its repose and its ease shine out even on the outside; it must shape the outward bearing to its own mold, and so arm it with a gracious pride, an active and lively demeanor, and a contented and kindly countenance. The surest sign of wisdom is a constant cheerfulness; its state is like that of things above the moon, always serene. It is Baroco and Baralipton that make their followers so mud-spattered and smoke-begrimed; it is not philosophy; they know it only by hearsay. What?[31]

It makes it its business to calm the storms of the soul, and to teach hunger and fevers to laugh—not by some imaginary epicycles, but by natural and palpable reasons. Its aim is virtue, which is not, as the schools say, planted on the top of a steep, rugged and inaccessible mountain. Those who have approached her hold, on the contrary, that she dwells on a fine plain, fertile and flowering, from which she sees all things well beneath her; yet anyone who knows the way can get there by shady, grassy, sweet-smelling paths, pleasantly, by an easy and smooth slope, like that of the vaults of heaven.

Because they have never frequented this supreme virtue—beautiful, triumphant, loving, delightful and courageous alike, the professed and irreconcilable enemy of sourness, displeasure, fear and constraint, with nature for her guide and fortune and pleasure for her companions—they have gone and, in their weakness, invented this foolish image, sad, quarrelsome, sullen, threatening, scowling, and set it on a rock apart, among brambles: a phantom to stun people.

My tutor, who knows he must fill his pupil's will with as much love for virtue as reverence, or more, will be able to tell him that the poets follow common temperaments, and make him see plainly that the gods have put sweat on the approaches to the chambers of Venus rather than of Pallas. And when he begins to feel his manhood, he will present him with Bradamante or Angelica as a mistress to enjoy: a natural, active, generous

1.26.30 Il luy fera cette nouuelle leçon, que le prix et hauteur de la vraye vertu, est en la facilité, vtilité et plaisir de son exercice: si esloigné de difficulté, que les enfans y peuuent comme les hommes, les simples comme les subtilz. Le reglement c'est son vtil, non pas la force. Socrates son premier mignon, quitte à escient sa force, pour glisser en la naïueté et aisance de son progrés. C'est la mere nourrice des plaisirs humains. En les rendant iustes, elle les rend seurs et purs. Les moderant, elle les tient en haleine et en appetit.

Retranchant ceux qu'elle refuse, elle nous aiguise enuers ceux qu'elle nous laisse: et nous laisse abondamment tous ceux que veut nature: et iusques à la satieté, sinon iusques à la lasseté; maternellement: si d'aduenture nous ne voulons dire, que le regime, qui arreste le beuueur auant l'yuresse, le mangeur auant la crudité, le paillard auant la pelade, soit ennemy de noz plaisirs. Si la fortune commune luy faut, elle luy eschappe; ou elle s'en passe, et s'en forge vne autre toute sienne: non plus flottante et roulante: elle sçait estre riche, et puissante, et sçauante, et coucher en des matelats musquez. Elle aime la vie, elle aime la beauté, la gloire, et la santé.

Mais son office propre et particulier, c'est sçauoir vser de ces biens là regléement, et les sçauoir perdre constamment: office bien plus noble qu'aspre, sans lequel tout cours de vie est desnaturé, turbulent et difforme: et y peut-on iustement attacher ces escueils, ces haliers, et ces monstres.

beauty, not mannish but manly, set against a soft, affected, delicate, artificial beauty; the one disguised as a boy, wearing a shining helmet, the other dressed as a girl, in a pearl-studded headdress. He will judge his love itself manly if he chooses quite differently from that soft shepherd of Phrygia.[32]

He will give him this new lesson: that the value and height of true virtue lie in the ease, usefulness and pleasure of its exercise, which is so far from difficult that children can manage it as well as men, the simple as well as the subtle. Measure is its instrument, not force. Socrates, her first favorite, deliberately gives up force, to glide into the naturalness and ease of her progress. She is the nursing mother of human pleasures. By making them just, she makes them safe and pure. By moderating them, she keeps them fresh and keen.

By cutting out those she rejects, she sharpens our appetite for those she leaves us; and she leaves us, abundantly, all those that nature wants, and to the point of satiety, if not of weariness—like a mother. Unless perhaps we mean to say that the regimen that stops the drinker before drunkenness, the eater before indigestion, the lecher before he loses his hair, is an enemy of our pleasures. If common fortune fails her, she escapes it, or does without it, and forges another wholly her own, no longer fluctuating and unstable. She knows how to be rich and powerful and learned, and to sleep on musk-scented mattresses. She loves life; she loves beauty, glory and health.[33]

But her proper and particular office is to know how to use these goods with moderation, and how to lose them with constancy—an office far more noble than harsh, without which every course of life is unnatural, turbulent and deformed; and to that kind of life one may rightly attach those reefs, those thickets and those monsters.

Suppose this pupil turns out to be of such a different disposition that he would rather hear a fairy tale than the account of a fine voyage or a wise discourse when he hears one; that at the sound of the drum that arms the young ardor of his compan-

Puis que la Philosophie est celle qui nous instruict à viure, et que l'enfance y a sa leçon, comme les autres aages, pourquoy ne la luy communique lon? Vdum et molle lutum est, nunc nunc properandus, et acri / Fingendus sine fine rota. On nous apprent à viure, quand la vie est passée. Cicero disoit, que quand il viuroit la vie de deux hommes, il ne prendroit pas le loisir d'estudier les Poëtes Lyriques. Et ie trouue ces ergotistes plus tristement encores inutiles.

Nostre enfant est bien plus pressé: il ne doit au paidagogisme que les premiers quinze ou seize ans de sa vie: le demeurant est deu à l'action. Employons vn temps si court aux instructions necessaires. Vn enfant en est capable au partir de la nourrisse, beaucoup mieux que d'apprendre à lire ou escrire. La philosophie a des discours pour la naissance des hommes, comme pour la decrepitude.

1.26.32 Ie suis de l'aduis de Plutarque, qu'Aristote n'amusa pas tant son grand disciple à l'artifice de composer syllogismes, ou aux principes de Geometrie, comme à l'instruire des bons preceptes, touchant la vaillance, proüesse, la magnanimité et temperance, et l'asseurance de ne rien craindre: et auec cette munition, il l'enuoya encores enfant subiuguer l'empire du monde à tout 30000. hommes de pied, 4000. cheuaulx, et quarante deux mille escuz seulement. ions, he turns aside to another drum that calls him to the tumblers' show; that by his own wish he does not find it more pleasant and sweet to come back dusty and victorious from a battle than from tennis or a ball with the prize for that exercise. I see no other remedy than to apprentice him to a pastry cook in some good town, were he the son of a duke—following Plato's precept that children should be placed not according to their father's faculties but according to the faculties of their soul.

Since it is philosophy that teaches us to live, and since childhood has its lesson there like the other ages, why is it not imparted to children? The clay is moist and soft: now, now we must hurry, and shape it / Without end on the swift wheel. We are taught to live when life is over. A hundred schoolboys have caught the pox before getting to their lesson on Aristotle's temperance. Cicero said that even if he lived the lives of two men, he would not take the time to study the lyric poets. And I find these logic-choppers even more sadly useless.[34]

Our child is in much more of a hurry: he owes to schooling only the first fifteen or sixteen years of his life; the rest is owed to action. Let us use so short a time for the necessary teachings. These are abuses: get rid of all those thorny subtleties of dialectic, which cannot make our lives any better; take the simple discourses of philosophy, know how to choose them and handle them aptly; they are easier to grasp than a tale of Boccaccio. A child is capable of them as soon as he leaves his nurse, much more than of learning to read or write. Philosophy has discourses for the birth of men as well as for their decrepitude.

I am of Plutarch's opinion, that Aristotle did not occupy his great pupil so much with the craft of composing syllogisms or with the principles of geometry as with instructing him in good precepts concerning valor, prowess, magnanimity and temperance, and the assurance that fears nothing. And with this provision he sent him off, still a boy, to subdue the empire of the world with only 30,000 foot soldiers, 4,000 horse and forty-two thousand crowns. The other arts and sciences, he says, Alexander honored well enough, and praised facile à se laisser surprendre à l'affection de les vouloir exercer.

Petite hinc iuuenésque senésque / Finem animo certum, miserique viatica canis. C'est ce que disoit Epicurus au commencement de sa lettre à Meniceus: Ny le plus ieune refuie à philosopher, ny le plus vieil s'y lasse. Qui fait autrement, il semble dire, ou qu'il n'est pas encores saison d'heureusement viure: ou qu'il n'en est plus saison. Pour tout cecy, ie ne veux pas qu'on emprisonne ce garçon, ie ne veux pas qu'on l'abandonne à la colere et humeur melancholique d'vn furieux maistre d'escole: ie ne veux pas corrompre son esprit, à le tenir à la gehenne et au trauail, à la mode des autres, quatorze ou quinze heures par iour, comme vn portefaiz.

Ny ne trouueroys bon, quand par quelque complexion solitaire et melancholique, on le verroit adonné d'vne application trop indiscrette à l'estude des liures, qu'on la luy nourrist. Cela les rend ineptes à la conuersation ciuile, et les destourne de meilleures occupations. Et combien ay-ie veu de mon temps, d'hommes abestis, par temeraire auidité de science? Carneades s'en trouua si affollé, qu'il n'eut plus le loisir de se faire le poil et les ongles. Ny ne veux gaster ses meurs genereuses par l'inciuilité et barbarie d'autruy. La sagesse Françoise a esté anciennement en prouerbe, pour vne sagesse qui prenoit de bon'heure, et n'auoit gueres de tenue.

A la verité nous voyons encores qu'il n'est rien si gentil que les petits enfans en France: mais ordinairement ils trompent l'esperance qu'on en a conceuë, et hommes faicts, on n'y voit aucune excellence. I'ay ouy tenir à gens d'entendement, que ces colleges où on les enuoie, dequoy ils ont foison, les abrutissent ainsin.

their excellence and refinement; but for all the pleasure he took in them, he was not easily caught by a desire to practice them.

Seek here, young and old, / A sure goal for your mind, and provision for wretched gray hairs. That is what Epicurus said at the beginning of his letter to Menoeceus: "Let neither the youngest shrink from philosophizing nor the oldest grow weary of it." Whoever does otherwise seems to be saying either that it is not yet the season for living happily, or that it is no longer the season. For all that, I do not want this boy imprisoned; I do not want him abandoned to the anger and melancholy temper of a raging schoolmaster; I do not want to corrupt his mind by keeping him on the rack and at hard labor, as others do, fourteen or fifteen hours a day, like a porter.[35]

Nor would I think it right, if through some solitary and melancholy disposition he were seen to be given to the study of books with too immoderate an application, that this should be encouraged in him. It makes them unfit for civil conversation and turns them away from better occupations. And how many men have I seen in my time made stupid by a reckless greed for learning? Carneades was so crazed by it that he no longer had time to trim his hair and nails. Nor do I want to spoil his noble manners by the incivility and barbarism of others. French wisdom was proverbial in ancient times as a wisdom that took hold early and had hardly any staying power.

In truth we still see that there is nothing so delightful as little children in France; but as a rule they disappoint the hopes placed in them, and as grown men they show no excellence. I have heard men of understanding maintain that it is these colleges they are sent to, of which there are plenty, that brutalize them so.

For our boy, a study, a garden, the table and the bed, solitude and company, morning and evening, all hours will be the same, all places will be his schoolroom; for philosophy, which, as the shaper of judgment and manners, will be his principal lesson, has the privilege of mixing in everywhere. Et autant en pourroit-on dire de toutes les autres sciences. Mais quant à la philosophie, en la partie où elle traicte de l'homme et de ses deuoirs et offices, ç'a esté le iugement commun de tous les sages, que pour la douceur de sa conuersation, elle ne deuoit estre refusée, ny aux festins, ny aux ieux. Et Platon l'ayant inuitée à son conuiue, nous voyons comme elle entretient l'assistence d'vne façon molle, et accommodée au temps et au lieu, quoy que ce soit de ses plus hauts discours et plus salutaires. Æquè pauperibus prodest, locupletibus æquè, / Et neglecta æquè pueris senibúsque nocebit.

Mais comme les pas que nous employons à nous promener dans vne galerie, quoy qu'il y en ait trois fois autant, ne nous lassent pas, comme ceux que nous mettons à quelque chemin dessigné: aussi nostre leçon se passant comme par rencontre, sans obligation de temps et de lieu, et se meslant à toutes noz actions, se coulera sans se faire sentir. Les ieux mesmes et les exercices seront vne bonne partie de l'estude: la course, la lucte, la musique, la danse, la chasse, le maniement des cheuaux et des armes. And as much could be said of all the other sciences. But as for philosophy, in the part that deals with man and his duties and obligations, it has been the common judgment of all the wise that, because of the pleasantness of its company, it should be refused neither at banquets nor at games. And when Plato invited it to his Symposium, we see how it entertains the gathering in a gentle manner suited to the time and place, though these are among its loftiest and most salutary discourses. It benefits the poor and the rich alike; / Neglected, it will harm young and old alike.[36]

In this way, no doubt, he will be idle less than the others. But just as the steps we take strolling in a gallery, even if there are three times as many, do not tire us like those we spend on some set journey, so our lesson, happening as if by chance, bound to no time or place and mingling with all our actions, will slip by without being felt. Even games and exercises will be a good part of his study: running, wrestling, music, dancing, hunting, the handling of horses and arms. I want his outward decorum, his social ease and his bodily bearing to be fashioned along with his soul.

It is not a soul, it is not a body that we are training: it is a man; we must not make two of him. And as Plato says, we must not train one without the other, but drive them equally, like a pair of horses harnessed to the same shaft. And to hear him, does he not seem to give more time and care to bodily exercises, and to think that the mind gets its exercise along with them, and not the other way around?

For the rest, this education must be conducted with a stern gentleness, not as it is now done. Instead of inviting children to letters, they are in truth offered nothing but horror and cruelty. Away with violence and force! There is nothing, in my opinion, that so debases and stupefies a well-born Enfant, homme, vieil, i'ay tousiours creu et iugé de mesme. Mais entre autres choses, cette police de la plus part de noz colleges, m'a tousiours despleu. Quelle maniere, pour esueiller l'appetit enuers leur leçon, à ces tendres ames, et craintiues, de les y guider d'vne troigne effroyable, les mains armées de fouets? Inique et pernicieuse forme. Ioint ce que Quintilian en a tres-bien remarqué, que cette imperieuse authorité, tire des suittes perilleuses: et nommément à nostre façon de chastiement. Combien leurs classes seroient plus decemment ionchées de fleurs et de feuillées, que de tronçons d'osiers sanglants? l'y feroy pourtraire la ioye, l'allegresse, et Flora, et les Graces: comme fit en son eschole le philosophe Speusippus. Où est leur profit, que là fust aussi leur esbat. On doit ensucrer les viandes salubres à l'enfant: et enfieller celles qui luy sont nuisibles.

C'est merueille combien Platon se montre soigneux en ses loix, de la gayeté et passetemps de la ieunesse de sa cité: et combien il s'arreste à leurs courses, ieux, chansons, saults et danses: desquelles il dit, que l'antiquité a donné la conduitte et le patronnage aux Dieux mesmes, Apollon, aux Muses et Minerue. Il s'estend à mille preceptes pour ses gymnases. Pour les sciences lettrées, il s'y amuse fort peu: et semble ne recommander particulierement la poësie, que pour la musique.

nature. If you want him to fear shame and punishment, do not harden him to them. Harden him to sweat and cold, to wind and sun, and to the dangers he must learn to despise.

Rid him of all softness and daintiness in dress and bed, in eating and drinking; accustom him to everything. Let him not be a pretty boy and a ladies' man, but a lusty, vigorous lad. As a child, as a man, as an old man, I have always believed and judged the same. But among other things, the discipline of most of our colleges has always displeased me. They might have erred less harmfully by leaning toward indulgence. They are real jails for captive youth. They make the young debauched by punishing them for it before they are. Go there at lesson time: you hear nothing but cries, from children being tortured and from masters drunk with anger.

What a way to awaken a taste for their lessons in those tender and timid souls—to lead them to it with a fearsome scowl and hands armed with whips! An unjust and pernicious method. Not to mention what Quintilian has very rightly observed, that this imperious authority has dangerous consequences, and especially our manner of punishment. How much more fittingly their classrooms would be strewn with flowers and leaves than with bloody stumps of willow rods! I would have joy and gladness painted there, and Flora and the Graces, as the philosopher Speusippus did in his school. Where their profit is, let their pleasure be also. Wholesome foods should be sweetened for the child, and harmful ones dosed with gall.[37]

It is remarkable how careful Plato shows himself in his Laws about the gaiety and pastimes of the youth of his city, and how much he dwells on their races, games, songs, leaps and dances, the direction and patronage of which, he says, antiquity gave to the gods themselves: Apollo, the Muses and Minerva. He goes into a thousand precepts for his gymnasiums. On literary studies he spends very little time, and seems to recommend poetry in particular only for the sake of music.

All oddity and peculiarity in our manners and ways should be avoided as hostile to social life.

Who would not be astonished at the constitution of Demophon, Alexander's steward, who sweated in the shade and shivered in the sun? I have seen men flee the smell of apples more than arquebus fire; others take fright at a mouse; others throw up at the sight of cream; others at seeing a feather bed shaken up; just as Germanicus could bear neither the sight nor the crowing of cocks. There may perhaps be some hidden property in this; but in my opinion it could be stamped out if one went about it early.

Education has won this much from me—true, not without some effort—that, except for beer, my appetite adapts itself indifferently to everything people eat.

The body is still supple; for that reason it should be bent to all fashions and customs. And provided appetite and will can be kept in check, let a young man boldly be made fit for all nations and all company, even for disorder and excess, if need be. Let his training follow usage. Let him be able to do all things, and love to do only the good. The philosophers themselves do not find it praiseworthy in Callisthenes that he lost the favor of his master, the great Alexander, by refusing to match him drink for drink. He will laugh, he will frolic, he will carouse with his prince.[38]

I want him, even in carousing, to outdo his companions in vigor and firmness, and to refrain from doing wrong not for lack of strength or knowledge, but for lack of will. There is a great difference between not wanting to do wrong and not knowing how. I thought I was paying honor to a lord as far removed from such excesses as anyone in France when I asked him, in good company, how many times in his life he had got drunk out of necessity in the King's business in Germany. He took it in that spirit, and answered that it was three times, and told us about them. I know some who, for lack of this ability, have got into great difficulty when they had to deal with that nation.[39]

I have often noted with great admiration the marvelous nature of Alcibiades, who could transform himself so easily to such different ways without harm to his health: outdoing now the sumptuousness and pomp of the Persians, now the austerity and frugality of the Lacedaemonians; as reformed in Sparta as voluptuous in Ionia. Every color, every state and circumstance became Aristippus. That is how I would like to shape my pupil: Him whom patience clothes in a doubled rag,

I shall admire if he carries a changed way of life well,
And plays both parts not without grace.[40]

These are my lessons: the one who does them has profited from them more than the one who knows them. If you see him, you hear him; if you hear him, you see him. "God forbid," says someone in Plato, "that philosophizing should mean learning many things and dabbling in the arts." This discipline of living well, the greatest of all the arts, they pursued in their lives rather than in their reading. Leon, prince of the Phliasians, asked Heraclides Ponticus what science, what art he professed. "I know neither art nor science," he said, "but I am a philosopher." Diogenes was reproached for meddling with philosophy when he was ignorant. "I meddle with it," he said, "all the more fittingly."[41]

Hegesias begged him to read him some book. "You are funny," he answered. "You choose real, natural figs, not painted ones; why do you not also choose natural, real exercises, not written ones?"

He will not so much recite his lesson as do it. He will repeat it in his actions. We shall see whether there is prudence in his undertakings, goodness and justice in his conduct, judgment and grace in his speech, fortitude in his illnesses, modesty in his games, temperance in his pleasures, order in the management of his household, indifference in his taste, whether for meat or fish, wine or water. One who regards his learning not as a display of knowledge but as a law of life, and who obeys himself and follows his own principles. The true mirror of our discourse is the course of our lives.[42]

Someone asked Zeuxidamus why the Lacedaemonians did not put the rules of valor into writing and give them to their young people to read; he answered that it was because they wanted to accustom them to deeds, not words. Compare with this pupil, after fifteen or sixteen years, one of those college Latinizers who will have spent as long merely learning to talk. The world is nothing but chatter, and I never saw a man who did not say more rather than less than he should; yet half our life goes into it.

They keep us four or five years learning to understand words and stitch them into sentences; as many again to shape them into a great body laid out in four or five parts; and another five at least to learn how to mix and weave them together concisely in some subtle fashion. Let us leave that to those who make it their express profession.

Going to Orléans one day, I met, on that plain this side of Cléry, two college teachers on their way to Bordeaux, about fifty paces apart. Farther behind them I saw a troop of riders with a master at its head, who was the late Count de La Rochefoucauld. One of my men asked the first of these teachers who the gentleman was who was coming along behind him. He had not seen the retinue following him, and thought he was being asked about his companion; he answered amusingly: "He is not a gentleman; he is a grammarian, and I am a logician."

Now we, who on the contrary are trying here to form not a grammarian or a logician but a gentleman, let us leave them to misuse their leisure: we have business elsewhere.

Ces gentilesses ne seruent que pour amuser le vulgaire, incapable de prendre la viande plus massiue et plus ferme; comme Afer montre bien clairement chez Tacitus.

Les Ambassadeurs de Samos estoyent venus à Cleomenes Roy de Sparte, preparez d'vne belle et longue oraison, pour l'esmouuoir à la guerre contre le tyran Polycrates: apres qu'il les eut bien laissez dire, il leur respondit: Quant à vostre commencement, et exorde, il ne m'en souuient plus, ny par consequent du milieu; et quant à vostre conclusion, ie n'en veux rien faire. are still only licking this half-formed matter into shape. For my part, I hold, and Socrates prescribes, that whoever has a vivid and clear idea in his mind will bring it out, whether in the dialect of Bergamo or, if he is mute, by gestures: Once the matter is foreseen, the words will follow willingly. And as that other said, just as poetically in his prose, when things have taken hold of the mind, words come crowding. And this other: the things themselves carry off the words.[43]

He does not know the ablative, the subjunctive, the substantive, or grammar; nor does his lackey, or a fishwife of the Petit-Pont. And yet they will talk with you to your heart's content, if you wish, and will perhaps trip up over the rules of their language as little as the best master of arts in France. He does not know rhetoric, nor how to capture the goodwill of the candid reader by way of a preamble, nor does he care to know it. In truth, all this fine painting is easily outshone by the luster of a simple, natural truth. These niceties serve only to amuse the common people, who cannot take more solid and firmer meat, as Afer shows very clearly in Tacitus.[44]

The ambassadors of Samos had come to Cleomenes, king of Sparta, armed with a fine long oration to stir him to war against the tyrant Polycrates. After he had let them say their piece, he answered: "As for your beginning and exordium, I no longer remember it, nor therefore the middle; and as for your conclusion, I will have none of it." That is a fine answer, it seems to me, and a pair of orators thoroughly put out of countenance. And what about this other?[45]

The Athenians had to choose between two architects to direct a great building project. The first, more polished, presented himself with a fine prepared speech on the subject of the work, and was drawing the people's judgment his way. But the other said, in three words: "Lords of Athens, what this man has said, I will do." At the height of Cicero's eloquence, many were struck with admiration, but Cato only laughed at it: "We have," he said, "an amusing consul." Whether it comes before or after, a useful maxim or a fine stroke is always in season. If it does not fit well with what goes before or what comes after, it is good in itself.[46]

1.26.42 Ie ne suis pas de ceux qui pensent la bonne rythme faire le bon poëme: laissez luy allonger vne courte syllabe s'il veut, pour cela non force; si les inuentions y rient, si l'esprit et le iugement y ont bien faict leur office: voyla vn bon poëte, diray-ie, mais vn mauuais versificateur, Emunctæ naris, durus componere versus. Qu'on face, dit Horace, perdre à son ouurage toutes ses coustures et mesures, Tempora certa modósque, et quod prius ordine verbum est,
Posterius facias, præponens vltima primis,
Inuenias etiam disiecti membra poetæ: il ne se dementira point pour cela: les pieces mesmes en seront belles.

I am not one of those who think that good rhyme makes a good poem. Let him lengthen a short syllable if he likes; no matter. If the inventions are delightful, if wit and judgment have done their work well, I will say: there is a good poet but a bad versifier, A man of keen wit, but harsh in composing verse. Let someone, says Horace, strip his work of all its seams and measures—Take away the fixed beats and meters, put the word that comes first in order Last, and set the final words before the first,
You would still find the limbs of the dismembered poet
—he will not belie himself for all that; even the pieces will be beautiful.[47]

C'est ce que respondit Menander, comme on le tensast, approchant le iour, auquel il auoit promis vne comedie, dequoy il n'y auoit encore mis la main: elle est composée et preste, il ne reste qu'à y adiouster les vers. Ayant les choses et la matiere disposée en l'ame, il mettoit en peu de compte le demeurant. Depuis que Ronsard et du Bellay ont donné credit à nostre poësie Françoise, ie ne vois si petit apprenti, qui n'enfle des mots, qui ne renge les cadences à peu pres, comme eux.

That is what Menander replied when he was scolded because the day was approaching on which he had promised a comedy, and he had not yet set his hand to it: "It is composed and ready; all that remains is to add the verses." Having the substance and the matter arranged in his mind, he made little account of the rest. Since Ronsard and du Bellay have brought our French poetry into credit, I see no apprentice so petty that he does not puff up his words and arrange his cadences more or less as they do.[48]

Plus sonat quàm valet. Pour le vulgaire, il ne fut iamais tant de poëtes: mais comme il leur a esté bien aisé de representer leurs rythmes, ils demeurent bien aussi court à imiter les riches descriptions de l'vn, et les délicates inuentions de l'autre.

More sound than substance. In the common view, there were never so many poets. But just as it has been easy for them to reproduce their rhymes, so they fall well short of imitating the rich descriptions of the one and the delicate inventions of the other.[49]

Chrysippus said to him: "Play these conjuring games with children, and do not divert the serious thoughts of a grown man to them." If these foolish quibbles, twisted and prickly sophisms, are to persuade him of a lie, that is dangerous; but if they remain without effect and move him only to laughter, I do not see why he should be on his guard against them.[50]

There are some so foolish that they go a quarter of a league out of their way to chase after a fine word: or who do not fit words to things, but fetch from outside things that the words may suit. And the other: who, charmed by the beauty of some word, are drawn on to write what they had not meant to. I am much more willing to twist a fine saying to sew it onto myself than to twist my thread out of line to go and fetch it. On the contrary, it is for words to serve and follow; and let Gascon get there if French cannot. I want the things to prevail, and to fill the imagination of the listener in such a way that he has no memory of the words.[51]

The speech I love is simple and natural, the same on paper as in the mouth: a speech succulent and sinewy, brief and compact, not so much dainty and well-combed as vehement and abrupt. Only that speech will have savor which strikes home. Rather difficult than tedious, far from affectation; irregular, disjointed and bold; each piece making a body of its own; not pedantic, not friarly, not lawyerly, but rather soldierly, as Suetonius calls that of Julius Caesar. And yet I do not quite see why he calls it that.[52]

I have gladly imitated that carelessness seen in our young men in the way they wear their clothes: a cloak worn like a sash, the cape over one shoulder, a stocking loosely pulled up, which displays a pride disdainful of these extraneous trappings and careless of art. But I find it even better employed in the manner of speaking. All affectation, especially given French gaiety and freedom, is unbecoming in a courtier. And in a monarchy every gentleman should be trained to the bearing of a courtier. So we do well to lean a little toward the natural and the disdainful. I do not like a fabric in which the joins and seams show; just as in a beau corps, il ne faut qu'on y puisse compter les os et les veines.

Quæ veritati operam dat oratio, incomposita sit et simplex. Quis accuratè loquitur, nisi qui vult putidè loqui? L'eloquence faict iniure aux choses, qui nous destourne à soy. Comme aux accoustremens, c'est pusillanimité, de se vouloir marquer par quelque façon particuliere et inusitée. De mesme au langage, la recherche des frases nouuelles, et des mots peu cogneuz, vient d'vne ambition scholastique et puerile. Peusse-ie ne me seruir que de ceux qui seruent aux hales à Paris! Aristophanes le Grammairien n'y entendoit rien, de reprendre en Epicurus la simplicité de ses mots: et la fin de son art oratoire, qui estoit, perspicuité de langage seulement. L'imitation du parler, par sa facilité, suit incontinent tout vn peuple. L'imitation du iuger, de l'inuenter, ne va pas si viste.

La plus part des lecteurs, pour auoir trouué vne pareille robbe, pensent tresfaucement tenir vn pareil corps. La force et les nerfs, ne s'empruntent point: les atours et le manteau s'empruntent. La plus part de ceux qui me hantent, parlent de mesmes les Essais: mais ie ne sçay, s'ils pensent de mesmes. Les Atheniens, dit Platon, ont pour leur part, le soing de l'abondance et elegance du parler, les Lacedemoniens de la briefueté, et ceux de Crete, de la fecundité des conceptions, plus que du langage: ceux-cy sont les meilleurs. Zenon disoit qu'il auoit deux sortes de disciples: les vns qu'il nommoit φιλολόγους, curieux d'apprendre les choses, qui estoient ses mignons: les autres λογοφιλους, qui n'auoyent soing que du langage.

Ce n'est pas à dire que ce ne soit vne belle et bonne chose que le bien dire: mais non pas si bonne qu'on la faict, et suis despit dequoy nostre vie s'embesongne toute à cela. Ie voudrois premierement bien sçauoir ma langue, et celle de mes voisins, où i'ay plus ordinaire commerce.

beautiful body one should not be able to count the bones and veins.

The speech that serves truth should be plain and unadorned. Who speaks with care unless he wants to speak affectedly? Eloquence that draws us to itself does injury to the substance. As in dress it is small-mindedness to want to mark oneself out by some peculiar and unusual fashion, so in language the hunt for new phrases and little-known words comes from a schoolboyish, childish ambition. Would that I could use only the words that are used in the markets of Paris! Aristophanes the grammarian knew nothing about it when he criticized Epicurus for the simplicity of his words, and for the aim of his art of oratory, which was simply clarity of language. The imitation of speech, because it is easy, is promptly taken up by a whole people. The imitation of judgment and invention does not go so fast.[53]

Most readers, because they have found a similar robe, very wrongly think they hold a similar body. Strength and sinews cannot be borrowed; finery and cloak can. Most of those who frequent me talk like the Essays; but I do not know whether they think like them. The Athenians, says Plato, have as their share the care for abundance and elegance of speech, the Spartans for brevity, and the Cretans for fertility of ideas rather than of language: these last are the best. Zeno said he had two kinds of disciples: those he called φιλολόγους, eager to learn things, who were his favorites; and the others, λογοφιλους, who cared only for language.[54]

This is not to say that speaking well is not a fine and good thing; but it is not so good as people make it out, and I am vexed that our whole life is taken up with it. I would want first to know my own language well, and that of my neighbors, with whom I have the most frequent dealings.

Ie ne croy pas que c'en soit la seule cause.

Tant y a que l'expedient que mon pere y trouua, ce fut qu'en nourrice, et auant le premier desnouement de ma langue, il me donna en charge à vn Allemand, qui depuis est mort fameux medecin en France, du tout ignorant de nostre langue, et tresbien versé en la Latine. will describe here a way of getting them more cheaply than usual, which was tried out on me myself; anyone who likes may use it. My late father, having made all the inquiries a man can make among learned and intelligent people about an excellent form of education, was made aware of this drawback then in practice. He was told that the long time we spent learning languages that cost the ancients nothing was the sole reason why we cannot attain the greatness of soul and of knowledge of the ancient Greeks and Romans. I do not believe it is the only reason.

Be that as it may, the expedient my father hit upon was this. While I was still at nurse and before my tongue was first loosened, he put me in the charge of a German, who has since died a famous doctor in France, wholly ignorant of our language and very well versed in Latin. This man, whom he had sent for expressly and who was very highly paid, had me constantly in his arms. He also had two others with him, less learned, to attend me and relieve the first; these spoke to me in no language but Latin.

As for the rest of his household, it was an inviolable rule that neither he himself, nor my mother, nor valet, nor chambermaid, spoke in my presence anything but as many words of Latin as each had learned in order to jabber with me. It is wonderful what profit everyone drew from it. My father and mother learned enough Latin to understand it, and acquired enough to use it when necessary, as did the other servants who were most attached to my service. In short, we Latinized ourselves so much that it overflowed into the villages all around, where there still remain, having taken root through use, several Latin names for craftsmen and their tools.

As for me, I was over six years old before I understood any more French or Perigordian than Arabic. And without art, without book, without grammar or precept, without the whip and without tears, I had learned Latin quite as pure as my schoolmaster knew it, for I could not have mixed or corrupted it. If, as a test, they wanted to set me a theme in the school fashion, where others are given it in French, it had to be given to me in bad Latin, for me to turn into good.[55]

55 Perigordian is the Occitan dialect of Montaigne's native Périgord.

Et Nicolas Grouchi, qui a escript de comitiis Romanorum, Guillaume Guerente, qui a commenté Aristote, George Bucanan, ce grand poëte Escossois, Marc Antoine Muret, que la France et l'Italie recognoist pour le meilleur orateur du temps, mes precepteurs domestiques, m'ont dit souuent, que i'auois ce langage en mon enfance, si prest et si à main, qu'ils craignoient à m'accoster. Bucanan, que ie vis depuis à la suitte de feu Monsieur le Mareschal de Brissac, me dit, qu'il estoit apres à escrire de l'institution des enfans: et qu'il prenoit l'exemplaire de la mienne: car il auoit lors en charge ce Comte de Brissac, que nous auons veu depuis si valeureux et si braue.

1.26.46 Quant au Grec, duquel ie n'ay quasi du tout point d'intelligence, mon pere desseigna me le faire apprendre par art. Mais d'vne voie nouuelle, par forme d'ébat et d'exercice: nous pelotions nos declinaisons, à la maniere de ceux qui par certains ieux de tablier apprennent l'Arithmetique et la Geometrie. Car entre autres choses, il auoit esté conseillé de me faire gouster la science et le deuoir, par vne volonté non forcée, et de mon propre desir; et d'esleuer mon ame en toute douceur et liberté, sans rigueur et contrainte.

Ie dis iusques à telle superstition, que par ce qu'aucuns tiennent, que cela trouble la ceruelle tendre des enfans, de les esueiller le matin en sursaut, et de les arracher du sommeil (auquel ils sont plongez beaucoup plus que nous ne sommes) tout à coup, et par violence, il me faisoit esueiller par le son de quelque instrument, et ne fus iamais sans homme qui m'en seruist.

And Nicolas Grouchy, who wrote On the Assemblies of the Romans, Guillaume Guérente, who wrote commentaries on Aristotle, George Buchanan, that great Scottish poet, and Marc-Antoine Muret, whom France and Italy recognize as the best orator of the age—my private tutors—have often told me that in my childhood I had that language so ready and so much at hand that they were afraid to accost me. Buchanan, whom I later saw in the retinue of the late Marshal de Brissac, told me he was busy writing on the education of children and was taking mine as his model; for he then had in his charge that Count de Brissac whom we have since seen so valiant and so brave.[56]

As for Greek, of which I have almost no understanding at all, my father planned to have me taught it by art, but in a new way, as a game and exercise: we tossed our declensions back and forth like a ball, in the manner of those who learn arithmetic and geometry through certain board games. For among other things he had been advised to make me relish knowledge and duty through my own unforced will and desire, and to bring up my soul in all gentleness and freedom, without severity or constraint.

I may say he carried this to the point of superstition. Because some hold that it disturbs the tender brains of children to wake them in the morning with a start, and to snatch them suddenly and violently from sleep (in which they are plunged much more deeply than we are), he had me woken by the sound of some instrument, and I was never without a man to do me that service.

This example will suffice to judge the rest, and also to commend both the prudence and the affection of so good a father, who is not to be blamed if he reaped no fruits answering to such exquisite cultivation. Two things were the cause. First, the field was barren and unsuitable. For though I had firm and sound health, and with it a gentle and tractable nature, I was for all that so heavy, soft and drowsy that no one could drag me out of idleness, not even to make me play. What I saw, I saw well; and beneath this sluggish constitution I

Secondement, comme ceux que presse vn furieux desir de guerison, se laissent aller à toute sorte de conseil, le bon homme, ayant extreme peur de faillir en chose qu'il auoit tant à cœur, se laissa en fin emporter à l'opinion commune, qui suit tousiours ceux qui vont deuant, comme les gruës; et se rengea à la coustume, n'ayant plus autour de luy ceux qui luy auoient donné ces premieres institutions, qu'il auoit apportées d'Italie: et m'enuoya enuiron mes six ans au college de Guienne, tres-florissant pour lors, et le meilleur de France.

Et là, il n'est possible de rien adiouster au soing qu'il eut, et à me choisir des precepteurs de chambre suffisans, et à toutes les autres circonstances de ma nourriture; en laquelle il reserua plusieurs façons particulieres, contre l'vsage des colleges: mais tant y a que c'estoit tousiours college. Mon Latin s'abastardit incontinent, duquel depuis par desaccoustumance i'ay perdu tout vsage. Et ne me seruit cette mienne inaccoustumée institution, que de me faire eniamber d'arriuée aux premieres classes. Car à treize ans, que ie sortis du college, i'auois acheué mon cours (qu'ils appellent) et à la verité sans aucun fruit, que ie peusse à present mettre en compte.

nourished bold imaginings and opinions beyond my age.

My mind was slow, and went only as far as it was led; my grasp was tardy, my invention feeble, and on top of all that I had an incredible lack of memory. With all this, it is no wonder he could get nothing worthwhile out of me.

Secondly, just as those driven by a frantic desire to be cured let themselves follow every sort of advice, the good man, being extremely afraid of failing in a thing he had so much at heart, finally let himself be carried away by common opinion, which always follows those who go ahead, like cranes. He fell in with custom, no longer having around him those who had given him those first ideas on education, which he had brought back from Italy; and he sent me, at about six, to the Collège de Guyenne, then very flourishing and the best in France.[57]

And there it is impossible to add anything to the care he took, both in choosing competent private tutors for me and in all the other circumstances of my upbringing, in which he reserved several special practices contrary to the usage of the colleges. But all the same, it was still college. My Latin promptly degenerated, and since then, through disuse, I have lost all use of it. And this unusual education of mine served only to make me skip straight into the top classes on arrival. For at thirteen, when I left the college, I had finished my course (as they call it), and in truth without any fruit that I could now take into account.

My first taste for books came from the pleasure I took in the tales of Ovid's Metamorphoses. For at about the age of seven or eight I would steal away from every other pleasure to read them, since that language was my mother tongue, and it was the easiest book I knew and, because of its subject matter, the best suited to the weakness of my age. For as to the Lancelots of the Lake, the Amadises, the Huons of Bordeaux, and such rubbishy books that amuse childhood, I did not know even their names, nor do I yet know their contents, so strict was my discipline. This made me more careless in studying my other prescribed lessons.[58]

Là il me vint singulierement à propos, d'auoir affaire à vn homme d'entendement de precepteur, qui sceust dextrement conniuer à cette mienne desbauche, et autres pareilles. Car par là, i'enfilay tout d'vn train Vergile en l'Æneide, et puis Terence, et puis Plaute, et des comedies Italiennes, leurré tousiours par la douceur du subiect. S'il eust esté si fol de rompre ce train, i'estime que ie n'eusse rapporté du college que la haine des liures, comme fait quasi toute nostre noblesse. Il s'y gouuerna ingenieusement, faisant semblant de n'en voir rien. Il aiguisoit ma faim, ne me laissant qu'à la desrobée gourmander ces liures, et me tenant doucement en office pour les autres estudes de la regle.

Car les principales parties que mon pere cherchoit à ceux à qui il donnoit charge de moy, c'estoit la debonnaireté et facilité de complexion. Aussi n'auoit la mienne autre vice, que langueur et paresse. Le danger n'estoit pas que ie fisse mal, mais que ie ne fisse rien. Nul ne prognostiquoit que ie deusse deuenir mauuais, mais inutile: on y preuoyoit de la faineantise, non pas de la malice. Ie sens qu'il en est aduenu comme cela. Les plaintes qui me cornent aux oreilles, sont telles: Il est oisif, froid aux offices d'amitié, et de parenté: et aux offices publiques, trop particulier, trop desdaigneux. Les plus iniurieux mesmes ne disent pas, Pourquoy a il prins, pourquoy n'a-il payé? mais, Pourquoy ne quitte-il, pourquoy ne donne-il?

Ie receuroy à faueur, qu'on ne desirast en moy que tels effects de supererogation. Mais ils sont iniustes, d'exiger ce que ie ne doy pas, plus rigoureusement beaucoup, qu'ils n'exigent d'eux ce qu'ils doiuent. En m'y condemnant, ils effacent la gratification de l'action, et la gratitude qui m'en seroit deuë. Là où le bien faire actif, deuroit plus peser de ma main, en consideration de ce que ie n'en ay de passif nul qui soit. Ie puis d'autant plus librement disposer de ma fortune, qu'elle est plus mienne: et de moy, que ie suis plus mien.

Toutesfois si i'estoy grand enlumineur de mes actions, à l'aduenture rembarrerois-ie bien ces reproches; et à quelques-vns apprendrois, qu'ils ne sont pas si offensez que ie ne face pas assez: que dequoy ie puisse faire assez plus que ie ne fay.

Here it was singularly fortunate for me to have as tutor an intelligent man, who knew how to wink skillfully at this unruliness of mine and at others like it. For in that way I ran straight through Virgil's Aeneid, and then Terence, and then Plautus, and some Italian comedies, lured always by the pleasure of the subject. If he had been foolish enough to break off this course, I think I would have brought nothing away from school but a hatred of books, as almost all our nobility do. He managed it ingeniously, pretending to see nothing. He sharpened my hunger, letting me gorge on these books only on the sly, and keeping me gently at my duty in the other, regular studies.

For the chief qualities my father looked for in those to whom he gave charge of me were good nature and an easy temperament. And indeed mine had no other vice than languor and laziness. The danger was not that I would do ill, but that I would do nothing. No one predicted that I would become wicked, only useless; they foresaw idleness in me, not malice. I feel that this is how it has turned out. The complaints that ring in my ears are these: "He is idle; cold in the duties of friendship and kinship; and in public duties too aloof, too disdainful." Even the most abusive do not say, "Why has he taken? Why has he not paid?" but "Why does he not forgo? Why does he not give?"

I would take it as a favor if nothing more were wanted of me than such works of supererogation. But they are unjust to exact what I do not owe much more rigorously than they exact of themselves what they do owe. By condemning me to it, they wipe out the graciousness of the act and the gratitude that would be due me for it. Whereas the good I actively do ought to weigh more coming from my hand, considering that I have received none whatever. I can dispose of my fortune the more freely because it is more my own, and of myself because I am more my own.

Still, if I were a great illuminator of my own actions, I might perhaps rebuff these reproaches well enough, and teach some people that they are not so much offended that I do not do enough as that I could do a good deal more than I do.

My soul did not fail, nevertheless, to have at the same time firm stirrings of its own, and sure and open judgments about the things it knew; and it

C'est vn exercice, que ie ne meslouë point aux ieunes enfans de maison; et ay veu nos Princes s'y addonner depuis, en personne, à l'exemple d'aucuns des anciens, honnestement et louablement. Il estoit loisible, mesme d'en faire mestier, aux gents d'honneur et en Grece, Aristoni tragico actori rem aperit: huic et genus et fortuna honesta erant: nec ars, quia nihil tale apud Græcos pudori est, ea deformabat.

digested them alone, without sharing them with anyone. And among other things, I truly believe it would have been wholly incapable of yielding to force and violence. Shall I count this faculty of my childhood: assurance of countenance, and suppleness of voice and gesture in applying myself to the parts I undertook? For before the usual age, I had barely entered my twelfth year, I played the leading roles in the Latin tragedies of Buchanan, Guérente and Muret, which were performed with dignity in our Collège de Guyenne.[59]

In this, as in all other aspects of his office, Andreas Goveanus, our principal, was beyond compare the greatest principal in France; and I was considered a master craftsman at it. It is an exercise I do not disapprove of for young children of good family; and I have since seen our princes take it up in person, after the example of some of the ancients, honorably and laudably. In Greece it was even permitted for people of rank to make a profession of it: He disclosed the matter to Aristo, the tragic actor; he was a man of good birth and fortune, and his art did not disgrace these, since nothing of the kind is shameful among the Greeks.[60]

For I have always accused of absurdity those who condemn these entertainments, and of injustice those who refuse entry into our good towns to actors who deserve it, and begrudge the people these public pleasures. Good governments take care to assemble the citizens and bring them together for sports and games, as they do for the serious duties of devotion.

Society and friendship are increased by it; and besides, one could not grant them more orderly pastimes than those that take place in everyone's presence and in the very sight of the magistrate. And I would think it reasonable for the prince now and then to treat the common people to them at his own expense, with an affection and kindness almost paternal; and that in populous towns there should be places designed and fitted out for these spectacles—some diversion from worse and hidden doings.

To return to my subject, there is nothing like whetting the appetite and the affection; otherwise all

1.27.1 CE n'est pas à l'aduenture sans raison, que nous attribuons à simplesse et ignorance, la facilité de croire et de se laisser persuader. Car il me semble auoir appris autrefois, que la creance estoit comme vne impression, qui se faisoit en nostre ame; et à mesure qu'elle se trouuoit plus molle et de moindre resistance, il estoit plus aysé à y empreindre quelque chose. Vt necesse est lancem in libra ponderibus impositis deprimi: sic animum perspicuis cedere. D'autant que l'ame est plus vuide, et sans contrepoids, elle se baisse plus facilement souz la charge de la premiere persuasion. Voylà pourquoy les enfans, le vulgaire, les femmes et les malades sont plus suiets à estre menez par les oreilles.

Mais aussi de l'autre part, c'est vne sotte presomption, d'aller desdeignant et condamnant pour faux, ce qui ne nous semble pas vray-semblable: qui est vn vice ordinaire de ceux qui pensent auoir quelque suffisance, outre la commune. It is perhaps not without reason that we attribute to simplicity and ignorance the readiness to believe and to be persuaded. For I seem to have learned once that belief was like an impression made on our soul, and that the softer and less resistant the soul was, the easier it was to imprint something on it. As the pan of a scale must sink under the weights placed in it, so the mind must yield to what is evident. The emptier the soul and the less counterweight it has, the more easily it sinks under the load of the first persuasion. That is why children, the common people, women and the sick are more apt to be led by the ears.[1]

But on the other hand, it is foolish presumption to go about disdaining and condemning as false whatever does not seem likely to us; which is a common vice of those who think they have some ability above the ordinary. I used to do so once. If I heard talk of returning spirits, or of the prediction of future things, of enchantments, of sorceries, or some other tale I could not swallow—Dreams, magic terrors, marvels, witches, / Ghosts of the night and Thessalian portents—I felt pity for the poor people deceived by these follies.[2]

And now I find that I was at least as much to be pitied myself. Not that experience has since shown me anything beyond my first beliefs—and that is not for want of curiosity on my part. But reason has taught me that to condemn a thing so decisively as false and impossible is to claim the advantage of having in one's head the bounds and limits of the will of God and of the power of our mother nature; and that there is no more notable folly in the world than to reduce them to the measure of our own capacity and ability. monsters or miracles whatever our reason cannot reach, how many of them continually present themselves to our sight?

Let us consider through what clouds, and how gropingly, we are led to the knowledge of most of the things we have in hand. We shall surely find that it is familiarity rather than knowledge that takes away their strangeness—Now no one, weary and sated with seeing, / Deigns to look up at the shining temples of the sky—and that if these things were presented to us anew, we would find them as unbelievable as any others, or more so.[3]

If now for the first time they appeared to mortals
Without warning, as if suddenly set before their eyes,
Nothing could be called more marvelous than these things,
Nor anything the nations would less have dared believe beforehand. The man who had never seen a river thought the first one he came upon was the Ocean; and the things that are greatest within our knowledge we judge to be the utmost that nature makes in that kind. Indeed, a river that is not the largest seems so to one Who has never seen a larger; and a tree, and a man,
Seem huge; and in every kind of thing,
Whatever is greatest that each has seen, he imagines to be huge.

Minds grow accustomed through the habit of the eyes, and neither marvel at nor inquire into the causes of the things they always see. The novelty of things incites us more than their greatness to seek their causes. We must judge this infinite power of nature with more reverence, and with more acknowledgment of our own ignorance and weakness. How many unlikely things there are, attested by people worthy of belief, which, if we cannot be persuaded of them, we must at least leave in suspense! For to condemn them as impossible is to claim, with rash presumption, to know how far possibility extends.[4]

If we properly understood the difference between the impossible and the unusual, and between what is contrary to the order of nature's course and what is contrary to the common opinion of men—neither believing rashly nor disbelieving si Plutarque outre plusieurs exemples, qu'il allegue de l'antiquité, dit sçauoir de certaine science, que du temps de Domitian, la nouuelle de la bataille perdue par Antonius en Allemaigne à plusieurs iournees de là, fut publiee à Rome, et semee par tout le monde le mesme iour qu'elle auoit esté perduë: et si Cæsar tient, qu'il est souuent aduenu que la renommee a deuancé l'accident: dirons-nous pas que ces simples gens là, se sont laissez piper apres le vulgaire, pour n'estre pas clair-voyans comme nous? easily—we would observe the rule of "Nothing too much," prescribed by Chilon.[5]

Car l'authorité de ces tesmoings n'a pas à l'aduenture assez de rang pour nous tenir en bride. Mais quoy?

When we find in Froissart that the Count of Foix, in Béarn, learned of the defeat of King John of Castile at Aljubarrota the day after it happened, and read the means he alleges for it, we may laugh at it; and likewise at what our annals say, that Pope Honorius, on the very day King Philip Augustus died at Mantes, had his public funeral held and ordered it held throughout Italy. For the authority of these witnesses perhaps does not rank high enough to keep us in check. But what then?[6]

Suppose Plutarch, besides several examples he cites from antiquity, says he knows for certain that in Domitian's time the news of the battle lost by Antonius in Germany, many days' journey away, was published in Rome and spread through the whole world on the very day it was lost; and suppose Caesar holds that it has often happened that rumor has outrun the event: shall we say that these simple people let themselves be fooled along with the common people, for not being as clear-sighted as we are? Is there anything more delicate, more clear and more lively than Pliny's judgment, when he cares to bring it into play? Anything further from vanity?[7]

I leave aside the excellence of his learning, which I count for less: in which of these two qualities do we surpass him? And yet there is no schoolboy so petty that he does not convict him of lying and want to lecture him on the workings of nature.

When we read in Bouchet of the miracles worked by the relics of Saint Hilary, let it pass: his credit is not great enough to deprive us of the license to contradict him. But to condemn all such stories wholesale seems to me a singular impudence.[8]

That great Saint Augustine testifies that he saw a blind child recover his sight at the relics of Saint Gervase and Saint Protasius in Milan; a woman in Carthage cured of a cancer by the sign of the cross that a newly baptized woman made over her; Hesperius, a friend of his, drive out the spirits that infested his house with a little earth from the Sepulcher of our Lord, and, when that earth was later carried to the church, a paralytic suddenly cured by it; a woman in a procession who touched Saint Stephen's reliquary with a bouquet, rubbed her eyes with that bouquet, and recovered her sight, long since lost; and several other miracles at which he says he himself was present. Of what shall we accuse him, and the two holy[9] bishops Aurelius and Maximinus whom he calls as his witnesses? Shall it be of ignorance, simplicity, credulity, or of malice and imposture? Is there any man in our century so impudent as to think himself comparable to them, whether in virtue and piety or in learning, judgment and ability? Though they gave no reason, they would overwhelm me by their authority alone. It is a dangerous and weighty boldness, besides the absurd rashness it drags along with it, to despise what we do not understand. For after you have established, by your fine understanding, the limits of truth and falsehood, and it turns out that you must necessarily believe things even stranger than what you deny, you have already obliged yourself to abandon those limits.[10]

Now what seems to me to bring just as much disorder into our consciences, in these religious troubles we are in, is the way Catholics pick and choose within their belief. They think they are being very moderate and enlightened when they concede to their adversaries some of the articles in dispute. But besides not seeing what an advantage it is to the man who attacks you when you begin to yield to him and draw back, and how much it encourages him to press his point, they fail to see that the articles they choose as the least weighty are sometimes very important. Either we must submit entirely to the authority of our ecclesiastical government, or release ourselves from it entirely.

It is not for us to determine what share of obedience we owe it. Moreover, I can say this from having tried it. I once made use of this freedom of personal choice and selection, disregarding certain points in the observance of our Church that seemed to have a more empty or a stranger look; then, coming to discuss them with learned men, I

1.28.1 CONSIDERANT la conduite de la besongne d'vn peintre que i'ay, il m'a pris enuie de l'ensuiure. Il choisit le plus bel endroit et milieu de chaque paroy, pour y loger vn tableau élabouré de toute sa suffisance; et le vuide tout au tour, il le remplit de crotesques: qui sont peintures fantasques, n'ayans grace qu'en la varieté et estrangeté. Que sont-ce icy aussi à la verité que crotesques et corps monstrueux, rappiecez de diuers membres, sans certaine figure, n'ayants ordre, suite, ny proportion que fortuite?

As I was considering the way a painter I employ goes about his work, I had a mind to follow his example. He chooses the finest spot, in the middle of each wall, to put a picture worked with all his skill; and the empty space all around it he fills with grotesques, which are fantastic paintings whose only charm lies in their variety and strangeness. And what are these here, in truth, but grotesques and monstrous bodies, patched together from various limbs, with no definite shape, having no order, sequence or proportion other than by chance?

Desinit in piscem mulier formosa supernè. Ie vay bien iusques à ce second point, auec mon peintre: mais ie demeure court en l'autre, et meilleure partie: car ma suffisance ne va pas si auant, que d'oser entreprendre vn tableau riche, poly et formé selon l'art. Ie me suis aduisé d'en emprunter vn d'Estienne de la Boitie, qui honorera tout le reste de cette besongne. C'est vn discours auquel il donna nom: La Seruitude volontaire: mais ceux qui l'ont ignoré, l'ont bien proprement depuis rebatisé, le Contre-vn. Il l'escriuit par maniere d'essay, en sa premiere ieunesse, à l'honneur de la liberté contre les tyrans.

A lovely woman above, ending in a fish below. I go along with my painter as far as this second point, but I fall short in the other and better part; for my skill does not go so far that I would dare undertake a rich, polished picture, formed according to art. It occurred to me to borrow one from Étienne de La Boétie, which will honor all the rest of this work. It is a discourse to which he gave the name Voluntary Servitude; but those who did not know this have since very aptly rebaptized it Against One. He wrote it by way of an essay in his early youth, in honor of liberty against tyrants.[1]

Il court pieça és mains des gens d'entendement, non sans bien grande et meritee recommandation: car il est gentil, et plein ce qu'il est possible. Si y a il bien à dire, que ce ne soit le mieux qu'il peust faire: et si en l'aage que ie l'ay cogneu plus auancé, il eust pris vn tel desseing que le mien, de mettre par escrit ses fantasies, nous verrions plusieurs choses rares, et qui nous approcheroient bien pres de l'honneur de l'antiquité: car notamment en cette partie des dons de nature, ie n'en cognois point qui luy soit comparable.

It has long been passing through the hands of people of understanding, not without very great and well-deserved praise; for it is fine, and as full as can be. Yet it is far from being the best he could do. If, at the more mature age when I knew him, he had taken up a plan like mine of putting his notions in writing, we would see many rare things that would bring us very close to the glory of antiquity; for especially in this matter of natural gifts, I know no one comparable to him.

Mais il n'est demeuré de luy que ce discours, encore par rencontre, et croy qu'il ne le veit oncques depuis qu'il luy

That is all I have been able to recover of his remains (I, whom he left, on his deathbed, with so loving a recommendation, by his will, heir to his library and his papers), apart from the little book of his works that I have had published. And I am particularly indebted to this piece, inasmuch as it served as the means of our first acquaintance.[2]
Car elle me fut montree longue espace auant que ie l'eusse veu; et me donna la premiere cognoissance de son nom, acheminant ainsi cette amitié, que nous auons nourrie, tant que Dieu a voulu, entre nous, si entiere et si parfaicte, que certainement il ne s'en lit guere de pareilles: et entre nos hommes il ne s'en voit aucune trace en vsage. Il faut tant de rencontre à la bastir, que c'est beaucoup si la fortune y arriue vne fois en trois siecles.	For it was shown to me long before I had seen him, and gave me my first knowledge of his name, thus starting on its way this friendship which we fostered between us, as long as God willed, so entire and so perfect that you will certainly read of few like it, and among men of our time no trace of it is to be seen in practice. So many chances must meet to build it that it is a great deal if Fortune brings it about once in three centuries.

KINDS OF FRIENDSHIP

Ties of family, love and marriage fall short of the perfect friendship he describes.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.28.2	Il n'est rien à quoy il semble que nature nous aye plus acheminés qu'à la societé. Et dit Aristote, que les bons legislateurs ont eu plus de soing de l'amitié, que de la iustice. Or le dernier point de sa perfection est cetuy-cy. Car en general toutes celles que la volupté, ou le profit, le besoin publique ou priué, forge et nourrit, en sont d'autant moins belles et genereuses, et d'autant moins amitiez, qu'elles meslent autre cause et but et fruit en l'amitié qu'elle mesme. Ny ces quatre especes anciennes, naturelle, sociale, hospitaliere, venerienne, particulierement n'y conuiennent, ny coniointement.	There is nothing to which nature seems to have led us more than to society. And Aristotle says that good lawgivers have taken more care for friendship than for justice. Now the ultimate point of its perfection is this one. For in general, all the friendships that pleasure or profit, public or private need, forge and nourish are so much the less beautiful and generous, and so much the less friendships, as they mix into friendship some cause, aim and fruit other than friendship itself. Nor do the four ancient kinds—natural, social, hospitable, erotic—come up to it, either separately or together.[3]
1.28.3	Des enfans aux peres, c'est plustost respect. L'amitié se nourrit de communication, qui ne peut se trouuer entre eux, pour la trop grande disparité, et offenceroit à l'aduenture les deuoirs de nature: car ny toutes les secrettes pensees des peres ne se peuuent communiquer aux enfans, pour n'y engendrer vne messeante priuauté: ny les aduertissemens et corrections, qui est vn des premiers offices d'amitié, ne se pourroient exercer des	From children to fathers, it is rather respect. enfans aux peres. Il s'est trouué des nations, où par vsage les enfans tuoyent leurs peres: et d'autres, où les peres tuoyent leurs enfans, pour euiter l'empeschement qu'ils se peuuent quelquesfois entreporter: et naturellement l'vn depend de la ruine de l'autre.

Il s'est trouué des philosophes desdaignans cette couſture naturelle, tesmoing Aristippus qui quand on le preſſoit de l'affection qu'il deuoit à ſes enfans pour eſtre ſortis de luy, il ſe mit à cracher, diſant, que cela en eſtoit auſſi bien ſorty: que nous engendrions bien des pouz et des vers. Et cet autre que Plutarque vouloit induire à s'accorder auec ſon frere: Ie n'en fais pas, dit-il, plus grand eſtat, pour eſtre ſorty de meſme trou.

C'eſt à la verité vn beau nom, et plein de dilection que le nom de frere, et à cette cauſe en fiſmes nous luy et moy noſtre alliance: mais ce meſlange de biens, ces partages, et que la richeſſe de l'vn ſoit la pauureté de l'autre, cela detrampe merueilleuſement et relaſche cette ſoudure fraternelle. Les freres ayants à conduire le progrez de leur auancement, en meſme ſentier et meſme train, il eſt force qu'ils ſe heurtent et choquent ſouuent. Le pere et le fils peuuent eſtre de complexion entierement eſlongnee, et les freres auſſi.

C'eſt mon fils, c'eſt mon parent: mais c'eſt vn homme farouche, vn meſchant, ou vn ſot. Et puis, à meſure que ce ſont amitiez que la loy et l'obligation naturelle nous commande, il y a d'autant moins de notre choix et liberté volontaire: et noſtre liberté volontaire n'a point de production qui ſoit plus proprement ſienne, que celle de l'affection et amitié.

arity; nor could admonitions and corrections, which are one of the first offices of friendship, be exercised by children toward their fathers. There have been nations where by custom children killed their fathers, and others where fathers killed their children, to avoid the hindrance they can sometimes be to each other; and by nature the one depends on the ruin of the other.

There have been philosophers who disdained this natural bond. Witness Aristippus: when he was pressed about the affection he owed his children for having come out of him, he began to spit, saying that this too had come out of him, and that we also breed lice and worms. And that other man, whom Plutarch was trying to bring to make peace with his brother: "I do not think any more of him," he said, "for having come out of the same hole."

It is truly a beautiful name, and full of affection, the name of brother; and for that reason he and I made it the name of our alliance. But this mingling of property, these divisions of inheritance, and the fact that the wealth of one is the poverty of the other, wonderfully dilute and loosen this brotherly solder. Brothers, having to pursue their advancement along the same path and at the same pace, must inevitably jostle and collide with each other often. Moreover, why should the harmony and affinity that beget these true and perfect friendships be found in them? Father and son may be of entirely different temperaments, and so may brothers.

"He is my son, he is my kinsman—but he is a surly man, a wicked one, or a fool." And then, insofar as these are friendships that law and natural obligation command of us, there is so much the less of our own choice and free will in them; and our free will has no product more properly its own than affection and friendship.

Not that I have not experienced all that can be found on that side, having had the best father that ever was, and the most indulgent, even into his extreme old age, and coming from a family famous from father to son, and exemplary in this matter of brotherly concord: and himself
Known for his fatherly love toward his brothers. As for affection for women, though it is born of our choice, it cannot be compared with friendship, nor put in this category. Its fire, I confess—for I am not unknown to the goddess

Who mingles a sweet bitterness with the cares of love—is more active, more burning and fiercer.[4]

But it is a rash and fickle fire, wavering and changeable, a fever's fire, subject to fits and remissions, that holds us only by one corner. In friendship there is a general and universal warmth, temperate besides and even, a constant and settled warmth, all gentleness and smoothness, with nothing sharp or stinging about it.

What is more, in love there is nothing but a frantic desire for what flees us: As the hunter pursues the hare
In cold and heat, on mountain and on shore,
And cares no more for it once he sees it caught,
And only hastens after what flees. As soon as love enters the bounds of friendship, that is to say, the harmony of wills, it fades and languishes. Enjoyment destroys it, since its end is bodily and subject to satiety. Friendship, on the contrary, is enjoyed in proportion as it is desired; it rises, feeds and grows only in enjoyment, since it is spiritual, and the soul is refined by use.[5]

Beneath this perfect friendship, those fickle affections once found a place in me—not to speak of him, who confesses only too much of them in his verses. Thus these two passions came to know each other in me, but never to be compared: the first holding its course in a lofty and proud flight, and disdainfully watching the other make its swoops far beneath it.

As for marriage, it is a bargain in which only the entry is free, since its duration is constrained and forced and depends on something other than our will; and it is a bargain ordinarily made for other ends. Besides that, a thousand foreign tangles come into it that have to be unraveled, enough to break the thread and disturb the course of a lively affection. In friendship, by contrast, there is no business or dealing except with friendship itself. Moreover, to tell the truth, the ordinary ability of women is not up to the conversation and communication that nourish this sacred bond. Nor does their soul seem firm enough to bear the strain of a knot so tight and so lasting.

And certainly, but for that, if it were possible to form such a free and voluntary relationship—one ames eussent cette entiere iouyssance, mais encores où les corps eussent part à l'alliance, où l'homme fust engagé tout entier: il est certain que l'amitié en seroit plus pleine et plus comble: mais ce sexe par nul exemple n'y est encore peu arriuer, et par les escholes anciennes en est reietté.

in which not only the souls had this complete enjoyment, but the bodies also had a share in the union, so that the whole man was engaged—it is certain that the friendship would be fuller and more complete. But this sex has never yet, by any example, been able to attain it, and the ancient schools exclude it.

1.28.5 Et cette autre licence Grecque est iustement abhorree par nos mœurs. Laquelle pourtant, pour auoir selon leur vsage, vne si necessaire disparité d'aages, et difference d'offices entre les amants, ne respondoit non plus assez à la parfaicte vnion et conuenance qu'icy nous demandons. Quis est enim iste amor amicitiæ?

And that other, Greek license is rightly abhorred by our morals. Yet it too, because by their custom it required so great a disparity of age and difference of roles between the lovers, did not sufficiently match the perfect union and harmony that we are asking for here either. For what is this love of friendship?[6] cur neque deformem adolescentem quisquam amat, neque formosum senem? Car la peinture mesme qu'en faict l'Academie ne me desaduoüera pas, comme ie pense, de dire ainsi de sa part: Que cette premiere fureur, inspiree par le fils de Venus au cœur de l'amant, sur l'obiect de la fleur d'vne tendre ieunesse, à laquelle ils permettent tous les insolents et passionnez efforts, que peut produire vne ardeur immoderee, estoit simplement fondee en vne beauté externe: fauce image de la generation corporelle. Car en l'esprit elle ne pouuoit, duquel la montre estoit encore cachee: qui n'estoit qu'en sa naissance, et auant l'aage de germer.

Why does no one love an ugly youth, or a handsome old man? For I think even the picture the Academy paints of it will not disown me if I say this on its behalf. That first frenzy, inspired by the son of Venus in the lover's heart for the flower of tender youth, was simply founded on outward beauty, a false image of bodily generation; and to it they permit all the insolent and passionate efforts that an immoderate ardor can produce. It could not be founded on the mind, whose qualities were still hidden from view, for the mind was only just being born and was not yet old enough to sprout.[7]

Que si cette fureur saisissoit vn bas courage, les moyens de sa poursuitte c'estoient richesses, presents, faueur à l'auancement des dignitez: et telle autre basse marchandise, qu'ils reprouuent. Si elle tomboit en vn courage plus genereux, les entremises estoient genereuses de mesmes: Instructions philosophiques, enseignements à reuerer la religion, obeïr aux loix, mourir pour le bien de son païs: exemples de vaillance, prudence, iustice. S'estudiant l'amant de se rendre acceptable par la bonne grace et beauté de son ame, celle de son corps estant pieça fanée: et esperant par cette societé mentale, establir vn marché plus ferme et durable.

If this frenzy seized a base heart, the means of its pursuit were riches, presents, favor in advancement to high office, and other such base merchandise, which they condemn. If it fell upon a nobler heart, the means employed were noble too: philosophical instruction, teachings to revere religion, obey the laws and die for the good of one's country, examples of valor, prudence and justice. The lover strove to make himself acceptable by the grace and beauty of his soul, the beauty of his body having long since faded, and hoped by this fellowship of minds to establish a firmer and more lasting bargain.

Quand cette poursuitte arriuoit à l'effect, en sa saison (car ce qu'ils ne requierent point en l'amant, qu'il apportast loysir et discretion en son entreprise; ils le requierent exactement en l'aimé: d'autant qu'il luy falloit iuger d'vne beauté interne, de difficile cognoissance, et abstruse descouuerte) lors naissoit en l'aymé le desir d'vne conception spirituelle, par l'entremise d'vne spirituelle beauté. Cette cy estoit icy principale: la corporelle, accidentale et seconde: tout le rebours de l'amant. A cette cause preferent ils l'aymé: et verifient, que les Dieux aussi le preferent: et tansent grandement le poëte Aischylus, d'auoir en l'amour d'Achilles et de Patroclus, donné la part de l'amant à Achilles, qui estoit en la premiere et imberbe verdeur de son adolescence, et le plus beau des Grecs.

Apres cette communauté generale, la maistresse et plus digne partie d'icelle, exerçant ses offices, et predominant: ils disent, qu'il en prouenoit des fruicts tres-vtiles au priué et au public. Que c'estoit la force des païs, qui en receuoient l'vsage: et la principale defense de l'equité et de la liberté. Tesmoin les salutaires amours de Hermodius et d'Aristogiton. Pourtant la nomment ils sacree et diuine, et n'est à leur compte, que la violence des tyrans, et lascheté des peuples, qui luy soit aduersaire: en fin, tout ce qu'on peut donner à la faueur de l'Academie, c'est dire, que c'estoit vn amour se terminant en amitié: chose qui ne se rapporte pas mal à la definition Stoique de l'amour: Amorem conatum esse amicitiæ faciendæ ex pulchritudinis specie.

1.28.6 Ie reuien à ma description, de façon plus equitable et plus equable. Omnino amicitiæ, corroboratis iam confirmatisque et ingeniis, et ætatibus, iudicandæ sunt. Au demeurant, ce que nous appellons ordinairement amis et amitiez, ce ne sont qu'accoinctances et familiaritez nouees par quelque occasion ou commodité, par le moyen de laquelle nos ames s'entretiennent. En l'amitié dequoy ie parle, elles se meslent et confondent l'vne en l'autre, d'vn meslange si vniuersel, qu'elles effacent, et ne retrouuent plus la cousture qui les a ioinctes. Si on me presse de dire pourquoy ie l'aymoys, ie sens que cela ne se peut exprimer, qu'en respondant: Par ce que c'estoit luy, par ce que c'estoit moy.

Il y a au delà de tout mon discours, et de ce que i'en puis dire particulierement, ie ne sçay quelle force inexplicable had to judge an inner beauty, hard to know and hidden from discovery—then there was born in the beloved the desire for a spiritual conception, by means of a spiritual beauty. On his side this was the main thing, and bodily beauty was accidental and secondary: the very reverse of the lover. For this reason they prefer the beloved, and prove that the gods prefer him too. And they sharply rebuke the poet Aeschylus for having given, in the love of Achilles and Patroclus, the lover's part to Achilles, who was in the first beardless bloom of his youth and the most beautiful of the Greeks.[8]

Once this general communion is established, with its master and worthier part exercising its functions and holding sway, they say that very useful fruits came of it, both private and public. It was the strength of the countries that accepted the practice, and the chief defense of equity and liberty: witness the salutary loves of Harmodius and Aristogiton. That is why they call it sacred and divine; by their account nothing is hostile to it but the violence of tyrants and the cowardice of peoples. In short, all that can be granted in favor of the Academy is that this was a love ending in friendship, which fits not badly with the Stoic definition of love: Love is an attempt to form a friendship, inspired by the appearance of beauty.[9]

I return to my own description, which is fairer and more even. Friendships can be fully judged only when characters and ages have been strengthened and matured. For the rest, what we ordinarily call friends and friendships are nothing but acquaintanceships and familiarities knotted together by some chance or convenience, by means of which our souls keep each other company. In the friendship I speak of, they mix and blend into each other in so complete a mingling that they efface the seam that joined them and can no longer find it. If I am pressed to say why I loved him, I feel that it cannot be expressed except by answering: Because it was he, because it was I.[10]

Beyond all my reasoning, and beyond anything I can say about it in particular, there is some inex-

et fatale, mediatrice de cette vnion. Nous nous cherchions auant que de nous estre veus, et par des rapports que nous oyïons l'vn de l'autre: qui faisoient en nostre affection plus d'effort, que ne porte la raison des rapports: ie croy par quelque ordonnance du ciel. Nous nous embrassions par noz noms. Et à nostre premiere rencontre, qui fut par hazard en vne grande feste et compagnie de ville, nous nous trouuasmes si prins, si cognus, si obligez entre nous, que rien des lors ne nous fut si proche, que l'vn à l'autre.

Il escriuit vne Satyre Latine excellente, qui est publiee: par laquelle il excuse et explique la precipitation de nostre intelligence, si promptement paruenue à sa perfection. Ayant si peu à durer, et ayant si tard commencé (car nous estions tous deux hommes faicts: et luy plus de quelque annee) elle n'auoit point à perdre temps. Et n'auoit à se regler au patron des amitiez molles et regulieres, ausquelles il faut tant de precautions de longue et preallable conuersation. Cette cy n'a point d'autre idee que d'elle mesme, et ne se peut rapporter qu'à soy.

1.28.7 Quand Lælius en presence des Consuls Romains, lesquels apres la condemnation de Tiberius Gracchus, poursuiuoient tous ceux qui auoient esté de son intelligence, vint à s'enquerir de Caius Blosius, qui estoit le principal de ses amis, combien il eust voulu faire pour luy, et qu'il eust respondu: Toutes choses. Comment toutes choses? suiuit-il, et quoy, s'il t'eust commandé de mettre le feu en nos temples? Il ne me l'eust iamais commandé, repliqua Blosius. Mais s'il l'eust fait? adiousta Lælius: I'y eusse obey, respondit-il. S'il estoit si parfaictement amy de Gracchus, comme disent les histoires, il n'auoit que faire d'offenser les Consuls par cette derniere et hardie confession: et ne se deuoit departir de l'asseurance qu'il auoit de la volonté de Gracchus.

plicable and fateful force that brought about this union. We were seeking each other before we had ever seen each other, through reports we heard of each other, which worked more powerfully on our affection than reports reasonably should—by some decree of heaven, I believe. We embraced each other by our names. And at our first meeting, which happened by chance at a great feast and gathering in the city, we found ourselves so taken with each other, so well acquainted, so bound together, that from then on nothing was so close to either of us as each was to the other.

He wrote an excellent Latin satire, which has been published, in which he excuses and explains the haste of our mutual understanding, which reached its perfection so quickly. Since it had so little time to last, and had begun so late (for we were both grown men, and he a year or so older), it had no time to lose. Nor did it have to follow the pattern of soft, regular friendships, which need so many precautions of long preliminary acquaintance. This one has no model but itself, and can be compared only to itself.[11]

It is not one particular consideration, nor two, nor three, nor four, nor a thousand. It is some quintessence of all this mixture which, having seized my whole will, led it to plunge and lose itself in his; which, having seized his whole will, led it to plunge and lose itself in mine, with an equal hunger, an equal eagerness. I say "lose" in all truth, for we kept nothing back that was our own, nothing that was either his or mine.

The Roman consuls, after the condemnation of Tiberius Gracchus, were prosecuting all those who had been in league with him. In their presence Laelius asked Caius Blosius, the chief of Gracchus's friends, how much he would have been willing to do for him. Blosius answered: "Everything." "What, everything?" Laelius went on. "And what if he had ordered you to set fire to our temples?" "He would never have ordered me to," replied Blosius. "But what if he had?" added Laelius. "I would have obeyed," he answered. If he was as perfect a friend of Gracchus as the histories say, he had no need to offend the consuls by this Mais toutesfois ceux qui accusent cette responce comme seditieuse, n'entendent pas bien ce mystere: et ne presupposent pas comme il est, qu'il tenoit la volonté de Gracchus en sa manche, et par puissance et par cognoissance. Ils estoient plus amis que citoyens, plus amis qu'amis ou que ennemis de leur païs, qu'amis d'ambition et de trouble. S'estans parfaittement commis, l'vn à l'autre, ils tenoient parfaittement les renes de l'inclination l'vn de l'autre: et faictes guider cet harnois, par la vertu et conduitte de la raison (comme aussi est il du tout impossible de l'atteler sans cela) la responce de Blosius est telle, qu'elle deuoit estre. Si leurs actions se demancherent, ils n'estoient ny amis, selon ma mesure, l'vn de l'autre, ny amis à eux mesmes.

Au demeurant cette response ne sonne non plus que feroit la mienne, à qui s'enquerroit à moy de cette façon: Si vostre volonté vous commandoit de tuer vostre fille, la tueriez vous? et que ie l'accordasse: car cela ne porte aucun tesmoignage de consentement à ce faire: par ce que ie ne suis point en doute de ma volonté, et tout aussi peu de celle d'vn tel amy. Il n'est pas en la puissance de tous les discours du monde, de me desloger de la certitude, que i'ay des intentions et iugemens du mien: aucune de ses actions ne me sçauroit estre presentee, quelque visage qu'elle eust, que ie n'en trouuasse incontinent le ressort.

Nos ames ont charié si vniment ensemble: elles se sont considerees d'vne si ardante affection, et de pareille affection descouuertes iusques au fin fond des entrailles l'vne à l'autre: que non seulement ie cognoissoy la sienne comme la mienne, mais ie me fusse certainement plus volontiers fié à luy de moy, qu'à moy.

last bold confession, and he should not have abandoned the assurance he had of Gracchus's will.[12]

All the same, those who condemn this answer as seditious do not properly understand the mystery of it. They fail to assume what was the fact: that he held Gracchus's will up his sleeve, both by power over it and by knowledge of it. They were more friends than citizens, more friends to each other than friends or enemies of their country, or friends of ambition and upheaval. Having committed themselves perfectly to each other, each perfectly held the reins of the other's inclination. Have this team guided by virtue and the direction of reason (as indeed it is altogether impossible to harness it without that), and Blosius's answer is just what it should have been. If their actions came apart, they were neither friends to each other, by my measure, nor friends to themselves.

Besides, this answer sounds no worse than mine would if someone asked me in this way, "If your will commanded you to kill your daughter, would you kill her?" and I said yes. For that bears no witness of any consent to doing it, because I have no doubt about my will, and just as little about the will of such a friend. It is not in the power of all the arguments in the world to dislodge me from the certainty I have about the intentions and judgments of mine. Not one of his actions could be presented to me, whatever face it wore, without my immediately finding its mainspring.

Our souls pulled together in harness so closely, they regarded each other with so ardent an affection, and with a like affection laid themselves open to each other down to their innermost depths, that not only did I know his soul as well as my own, but I would certainly have trusted myself to him more readily than to myself.

marcher en ces autres amitiez, la bride à la main, auec prudence et precaution: la liaison n'est pas nouée en maniere, qu'on n'ait aucunement à s'en deffier. Aymez le, disoit Chilon, comme ayant quelque iour à le haïr: haïssez le, comme ayant à l'aymer.

Ce precepte qui est si abominable en cette souueraine et maistresse amitié, il est salubre en l'vsage des amitiez ordinaires et coustumieres: à l'endroit desquelles il faut employer le mot qu'Aristote auoit tres familier, O mes amys, il n'y a nul amy.

1.28.9 En ce noble commerce, les offices et les bien-faicts nourrissiers des autres amitiez, ne meritent pas seulement d'estre mis en compte: cette confusion si pleine de nos volontez en est cause: car tout ainsi que l'amitié que ie me porte, ne reçoit point augmentation, pour le secours que ie me donne au besoin, quoy que dient les Stoiciens: et comme ie ne me sçay aucun gré du seruice que ie me fay: aussi l'vnion de tels amis estant veritablement parfaicte, elle leur faict perdre le sentiment de tels deuoirs, et haïr et chasser d'entre eux, ces mots de diuision et de difference, bien-faict, obligation, recognoissance, priere, remerciement, et leurs pareils.

Tout estant par effect commun entre eux, volontez, pensemens, iugemens, biens, femmes, enfans, honneur et vie: et leur conuenance n'estant qu'vne ame en deux corps, selon la tres-propre definition d'Aristote, ils ne se peuuent ny prester ny donner rien. Voila pourquoy les faiseurs de loix, pour honnorer le mariage de quelque imaginaire ressemblance de cette diuine liaison, defendent les donations entre le mary et la femme. Voulans inferer par là, que tout doit estre à chacun d'eux, et qu'ils n'ont rien à diuiser et partir ensemble.

1.28.10 Si en l'amitié dequoy ie parle, l'vn pouuoit donner à l'autre, ce seroit celuy qui receuroit le bien-fait, qui obligeroit son compagnon. Car cherchant l'vn et l'autre, plus que toute autre chose, de s'entre-bien faire, celuy qui en preste la matiere et l'occasion, est celuy là qui faict le liberal, donnant ce contentement à son amy, d'effectuer en son endroit ce qu'il desire le plus. deceived. In those other friendships one must walk with the bridle in hand, with prudence and caution: the bond is not so tied that one has no reason at all to distrust it. "Love him," said Chilon, "as if you will one day have to hate him; hate him as if you will have to love him."

This precept, so abominable in that sovereign and masterful friendship, is healthy in the practice of ordinary, customary friendships. With regard to them we must use the saying Aristotle so often had on his lips: "O my friends, there is no friend."[13]

In this noble relationship, the services and benefits that nourish other friendships do not even deserve to be taken into account. The reason is this complete fusion of our wills. For just as the friendship I bear myself receives no increase from the help I give myself in need, whatever the Stoics say, and just as I feel no gratitude to myself for the service I do myself, so the union of such friends, being truly perfect, makes them lose the sense of such duties. It makes them hate and banish from between them these words of division and difference: benefit, obligation, gratitude, request, thanks, and the like.

Everything being in effect common between them —wills, thoughts, judgments, goods, wives, children, honor and life—and their union being nothing but one soul in two bodies, according to Aristotle's very apt definition, they can neither lend nor give each other anything. That is why lawmakers, to honor marriage with some imaginary resemblance to this divine bond, forbid gifts between husband and wife. They mean to imply by this that everything should belong to each of them, and that they have nothing to divide and share out between them.

If, in the friendship I speak of, one could give to the other, it would be the one who received the benefit who would put his companion under obligation. For since each of them seeks, above all else, to do the other good, the one who provides the matter and the occasion is the one who is being generous, since he gives his friend the satisfaction of doing for him what he most desires. When the philosopher Diogenes was short of money, he used montrer comment cela se pratique par effect, i'en reciteray vn ancien exemple singulier.

Eudamidas Corinthien auoit deux amis, Charixenus Sycionien, et Aretheus Corinthien: venant à mourir estant pauure, et ses deux amis riches, il fit ainsi son testament: Ie legue à Aretheus de nourrir ma mere, et l'entretenir en sa vieillesse: à Charixenus de marier ma fille, et luy donner le doüaire le plus grand qu'il pourra: et au cas que l'vn d'eux vienne à defaillir, ie substitue en sa part celuy, qui suruiura. Ceux qui premiers virent ce testament, s'en moquerent: mais ses heritiers en ayants esté aduertis, l'accepterent auec vn singulier contentement.

Et l'vn d'eux, Charixenus, estant trespassé cinq iours apres, la substitution estant ouuerte en faueur d'Aretheus, il nourrit curieusement cette mere, et de cinq talens qu'il auoit en ses biens, il en donna les deux et demy en mariage à vne sienne fille vnique, et deux et demy pour le mariage de la fille d'Eudamidas, desquelles il fit les nopces en mesme iour.

1.28.11 Cet exemple est bien plein: si vne condition en estoit à dire, qui est la multitude d'amis. Car cette parfaicte amitié, dequoy ie parle, est indiuisible: chacun se donne si entier à son amy, qu'il ne luy reste rien à departir ailleurs: au rebours il est marry qu'il ne soit double, triple, ou quadruple, et qu'il n'ait plusieurs ames et plusieurs volontez, pour les conferer toutes à ce subiet. Les amitiez communes on les peut départir, on peut aymer en cestuy-ci la beauté, en cet autre la facilité de ses mœurs, en l'autre la liberalité, en celuy-là la paternité, en cet autre la fraternité, ainsi du reste: mais cette amitié, qui possede l'ame, et la regente en toute souueraineté, il est impossible qu'elle soit double.

Si deux en mesme temps demandoient à estre secourus, auquel courriez vous? S'ils requeroient de vous des offices contraires, quel ordre y trouueriez vous? Si l'vn commettoit à vostre silence chose qui fust vtile à l'autre de sçauoir, comment vous en desmeleriez vous? L'vnique et principale amitié descoust toutes autres obligations. Le secret que i'ay iuré ne deceller à vn autre, ie le puis sans pariure, communiquer à celuy, qui n'est pas autre, c'est moy. C'est vn assez grand miracle de se doubler: et n'en to say that he asked his friends to give it back, not to give it. And to show how this works in practice, I will relate a singular example from antiquity.

Eudamidas of Corinth had two friends, Charixenus of Sicyon and Aretheus of Corinth. When he came to die, he was poor and his two friends were rich, and he made his will as follows: "I bequeath to Aretheus the task of feeding my mother and supporting her in her old age; to Charixenus, that of marrying off my daughter and giving her the largest dowry he can. And in case one of them should die, I put the survivor in his place." Those who first saw this will laughed at it; but his heirs, when they were informed of it, accepted it with singular satisfaction.[14]

One of them, Charixenus, died five days later, and the substitution fell to Aretheus. He supported the mother with great care, and of the five talents in his estate he gave two and a half as a dowry to his own only daughter and two and a half for the marriage of Eudamidas's daughter, and he held both weddings on the same day.

This example is quite complete, but for one condition that is lacking: the number of friends. For this perfect friendship I speak of is indivisible. Each gives himself so wholly to his friend that he has nothing left to share out elsewhere; on the contrary, he is sorry not to be double, triple or quadruple, and not to have several souls and several wills to bestow them all on this one object. Common friendships can be divided: one may love in this man his beauty, in that one the ease of his manners, in another his generosity, in one his fatherliness, in another his brotherliness, and so on. But this friendship, which possesses the soul and rules it with complete sovereignty, cannot possibly be double.

If two asked to be helped at the same time, which one would you run to? If they required contrary services of you, how would you set them in order? If one entrusted to your silence something it would be useful for the other to know, how would you get out of that? The single, principal friendship unstitches all other obligations. The secret I have sworn not to reveal to another, I can without perjury communicate to the one who is not anoth-cognoissent pas la hauteur ceux qui parlent de se tripler. Rien n'est extreme, qui a son pareil.

Et qui presupposera que de deux i'en aime autant l'vn que l'autre, et qu'ils s'entr'aiment, et m'aiment autant que ie les aime: il multiplie en confrairie, la chose la plus vne et vnie, et dequoy vne seule est encore la plus rare à trouuer au monde. Le demeurant de cette histoire conuient tres-bien à ce que ie disois: car Eudamidas donne pour grace et pour faueur à ses amis de les employer à son besoin: il les laisse heritiers de cette sienne liberalité, qui consiste à leur mettre en main les moyens de luy bien-faire. Et sans doubte, la force de l'amitié se montre bien plus richement en son fait, qu'en celuy d'Aretheus.

Somme, ce sont effects inimaginables, à qui n'en a gousté: et qui me font honnorer à merueilles la responce de ce ieune soldat, à Cyrus, s'enquerant à luy, pour combien il voudroit donner vn cheual, par le moyen duquel il venoit de gaigner le prix de la course: et s'il le voudroit eschanger à vn royaume: Non certes, Sire: mais bien le lairroy ie volontiers, pour en aquerir vn amy, Si ie trouuoy homme digne de telle alliance. Il ne disoit pas mal, Si ie trouuoy.

Car on trouue facilement des hommes propres à vne superficielle accointance: mais en cettecy, en laquelle on negotie du fin fons de son courage, qui ne fait rien de reste: il est besoin, que tous les ressorts soyent nets et seurs parfaictement.

1.28.12 Aux confederations, qui ne tiennent que par vn bout, on n'a à prouuoir qu'aux imperfections, qui particulierement interessent ce bout là. Il ne peut chaloir de quelle religion soit mon medecin, et mon aduocat; cette consideration n'a rien de commun auec les offices de l'amitié, qu'ils ne doiuent. Et en l'accointance domestique, que dressent auec moy ceux qui me seruent i'en fay de mesmes: et m'enquiers peu d'vn laquay, s'il est chaste, ie cherche s'il est diligent: et ne crains pas tant vn muletier ioueur qu'imbecille: ny vn cuisinier iureur, qu'ignorant. Ie ne me mesle pas de dire ce qu'il faut faire au monde: d'autres assés s'en meslent: mais ce que i'y fay, Mihi sic vsus est: tibi, vt opus est facto, face.

er: he is myself. It is a great enough miracle to double oneself, and those who talk of tripling themselves do not know how lofty it is. Nothing is extreme that has its equal.

Whoever supposes that of two friends I love one as much as the other, and that they love each other and love me as much as I love them, turns into a brotherhood the most single and united of all things, of which even one is the rarest thing to find in the world. The rest of this story fits very well with what I was saying. For Eudamidas grants it to his friends as a grace and favor to use them for his need; he leaves them heirs to this generosity of his, which consists in putting into their hands the means of doing him good. And no doubt the force of friendship shows itself much more richly in what he did than in what Aretheus did.

In short, these are effects unimaginable to anyone who has not tasted them. They make me wonderfully honor the answer of that young soldier to Cyrus. Cyrus asked him for how much he would sell a horse on which he had just won the prize in a race, and whether he would exchange it for a kingdom. "Certainly not, Sire; but I would gladly give it up to gain a friend, if I found a man worthy of such an alliance." He was not wrong to say "if I found."[15]

For it is easy to find men fit for a superficial acquaintance. But in this kind, in which we deal from the very bottom of our heart and hold nothing back, all the springs must be perfectly clean and sound.

In alliances that hold only by one end, we need only provide against the imperfections that particularly concern that end. It cannot matter what religion my doctor or my lawyer belongs to; that consideration has nothing in common with the services of friendship, which they do not owe. And in the domestic acquaintance formed with me by those who serve me, I do the same. I inquire little whether a lackey is chaste; I look to see whether he is diligent. And I do not fear a gambling muleteer so much as a feeble one, nor a swearing cook so much as an ignorant one. I do not take it upon myself to say what should be done in the world—plenty of others do that—but only what I do in it. That is my practice; do as you see fit.[16]

1.28.13 A la familiarité de la table, i'associe le plaisant, non le prudent: au lict, la beauté auant la bonté: et en la societé du discours, la suffisance, voire sans la preud'hommie, pareillement ailleurs. Tout ainsi que cil qui fut rencontré à cheuauchons sur vn baton, se iouant auec ses enfans, pria l'homme qui l'y surprint, de n'en rien dire, iusques à ce qu'il fust pere luy-mesme, estimant que la passion qui luy naistroit lors en l'ame, le rendroit iuge equitable d'vne telle action. Ie souhaiterois aussi parler à des gens qui eussent essayé ce que ie dis: mais sçachant combien c'est chose esloignee du commun vsage qu'vne telle amitié, et combien elle est rare, ie ne m'attens pas d'en trouuer aucun bon iuge.

For the familiarity of the table I choose the amusing, not the prudent; for bed, beauty before goodness; for the fellowship of conversation, ability, even without integrity; and likewise elsewhere. A man who was found riding a stick-horse, playing with his children, begged the man who caught him at it to say nothing until he was a father himself, judging that the feeling that would then arise in his soul would make him a fair judge of such an action. In the same way, I would like to speak to people who had tried out what I am saying. But knowing how far such a friendship is from common practice, and how rare it is, I do not expect to find any good judge of it.[17]

Car les discours mesmes que l'antiquité nous a laissé sur ce subiect, me semblent lasches au prix du sentiment que i'en ay. Et en ce poinct les effects surpassent les preceptes mesmes de la philosophie. Nil ego contulerim iucundo sanus amico.

For even the discourses that antiquity has left us on this subject seem feeble to me beside what I feel. And on this point the facts surpass even the precepts of philosophy. While I am in my right mind, I would compare nothing to a delightful friend.[18]

1.28.14 L'ancien Menander disoit celuy-là heureux, qui auoit peu rencontrer seulement l'ombre d'vn amy: il auoit certes raison de le dire, mesmes s'il en auoit tasté. Car à la verité si ie compare tout le reste de ma vie, quoy qu'auec la grace de Dieu ie l'aye passee douce, aisee, et sauf la perte d'vn tel amy, exempte d'affliction poisante, pleine de tranquillité d'esprit, ayant prins en payement mes commoditez naturelles et originelles, sans en rechercher d'autres: si ie la compare, dis-ie, toute, aux quatre annees, qu'il m'a esté donné de iouyr de la douce compagnie et societé de ce personnage, ce n'est que fumee, ce n'est qu'vne nuict obscure et ennuyeuse.

Old Menander called a man happy who had been able to meet even the shadow of a friend. He was certainly right to say so, especially if he had tasted friendship. For in truth, by the grace of God, I have spent my life pleasantly and easily, free of heavy affliction except for the loss of such a friend, full of tranquility of mind, having accepted my natural and original advantages as payment without seeking others. Yet if I compare all the rest of my life—if I compare it all, I say—with the four years I was granted to enjoy the sweet company and fellowship of this man, it is nothing but smoke, nothing but a dark and sorrowful night.[19]

Depuis le iour que ie le perdy, quem semper acerbum, Semper honoratum (sic, Dii, voluistis!) habebo, ie ne fay que trainer languissant: et les plaisirs mesmes qui s'offrent à moy, au lieu de me consoler, me redoublent le regret de sa perte. Nous estions à moitié de tout: il me semble que ie luy desrobe sa part, Nec fas esse vlla me voluptate hic frui Decreui, tantisper dum ille abest meus particeps.

Since the day I lost him, a day I shall always hold bitter, always honored (such, gods, was your will!), I do nothing but drag on, languishing. The very pleasures that come my way, instead of consoling me, redouble my grief at his loss. We went halves in everything; it seems to me that I am robbing him of his share. Nor have I thought it right to enjoy any

Ille dies vtramque* Duxit ruinam. Il n'est action ou imagination, où ie ne le trouue à dire, comme si eust-il bien faict à moy: car de mesme qu'il me surpassoit d'vne distance infinie en toute autre suffisance et vertu, aussi faisoit-il au deuoir de l'amitié. Quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus Tam chari capitis? O misero frater adempte mihi! Omnia tecum vnà perierunt gaudia nostra, Quæ tuus in vita dulcis alebat amor.	I was already so formed and accustomed to being one of two in everything that I now seem to be only half a man. If an untimely blow has carried off that part of my soul, why do I, the other part, linger on, neither as dear nor surviving whole? That day brought ruin to both. There is no action or thought in which I do not miss him, as indeed he would have missed me. For just as he surpassed me by an infinite distance in every other ability and virtue, so did he in the duty of friendship. What shame or limit should there be to grief for one so dear? O brother, taken from wretched me! All our joys have perished with you, which your sweet love nourished while you lived.[21]
	/ Tu mea, tu moriens fregisti commoda, frater; Tecum vna tota est nostra sepulta anima, Cuius ego interitu tota de mente fugaui Hæc studia, atque omnes delicias animi. Shall I speak to you? Shall I never hear your voice? Shall I never, brother dearer than life, see you again? But surely I shall always love you.

WHY THE DISCOURSE IS WITHHELD

Since partisans published it for their own ends, Montaigne will print other works of La Boétie instead.

1.28.16	Mais oyons vn peu parler ce garson de seize ans. Parce que i'ay trouué que cet ouurage a esté depuis mis en lumiere, et à mauuaise fin, par ceux qui cherchent à troubler et changer l'estat de nostre police, sans se soucier s'ils l'amenderont, qu'ils ont meslé à d'autres escrits de leur farine, ie me suis dédit de le loger icy. Et affin que la memoire de l'autheur n'en soit interessee en l'endroit de ceux qui n'ont peu cognoistre de pres ses opinions et ses actions: ie les aduise que ce subiect fut traicté par luy en son enfance, par maniere d'exercitation seulement, comme subiect vulgaire et tracassé en mil endroits des liures.	But let us hear this boy of sixteen speak a little. I have found that this work has since been brought to light, and for an evil purpose, by those who seek to disturb and change the state of our government without caring whether they will improve it, and that they have mixed it with other writings ground from their own flour. So I have given up my plan to place it here. And so that the author's memory may not suffer with those who could not know his opinions and actions closely, I inform them that he treated this subject in his boyhood, merely as an exercise, as a common theme worked over in a thousand places in books.[22]

Ie ne fay nul doubte qu'il ne creust ce qu'il escriuoit: car il estoit assez conscientieux, pour ne mentir pas mesmes en se iouant: et sçay d'auantage que s'il eust eu à choisir, il eust mieux aymé estre nay à Venise qu'à Sarlac; et auec raison. Mais il auoit vn' autre maxime souuerainement empreinte en son ame, d'obeyr et de se soubmettre tres-religieusement aux loix, sous lesquelles il estoit nay. Il ne fut iamais vn meilleur citoyen, ny plus affectionné au repos de son païs, ny plus ennemy des remuëments et nouuelletez de son temps: il eust bien plustost employé sa suffisance à les esteindre, qu'à leur fournir dequoy les émouuoir d'auantage: il auoit son esprit moulé au patron d'autres siecles que ceux-cy.

I have no doubt that he believed what he wrote, for he was conscientious enough not to lie even in jest. And I know further that if he had had the choice, he would rather have been born in Venice than in Sarlat—and with reason. But he had another maxim sovereignly imprinted on his soul: to obey and submit most scrupulously to the laws under which he was born. There was never a better citizen, nor one more devoted to the peace of his country, nor more hostile to the commotions and innovations of his time. He would much rather have used his ability to extinguish them than to supply them with the means of stirring things up further. His mind was molded on the pattern of other ages than these.[23]

Or en eschange de cest ouurage serieux i'en substitueray vn autre, produit en cette mesme saison de son aage, plus gaillard et plus enioué.

Now, in exchange for this serious work, I will substitute another, produced in the same season of his life, more lighthearted and playful.

I.29 Twenty-Nine Sonnets of Étienne de La Boétie

Vingt et neuf sonnets d'Estienne de la Boetie, à Madame de Grammont Contesse de Guissen Montaigne dedicates twenty-nine love sonnets by his late friend La Boétie to the Countess of Guiche.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.29.1	MADAME ie ne vous offre rien du mien, ou par ce qu'il est desia vostre, ou pour ce que ie n'y trouue rien digne de vous. Mais i'ay voulu que ces vers en quelque lieu qu'ils se vissent, portassent vostre nom en teste, pour l'honneur que ce leur sera d'auoir pour guide cette grande Corisande d'Andoins.	MADAME, I offer you nothing of my own, either because it is already yours or because I find nothing in it worthy of you. But I wanted these verses, wherever they might be seen, to bear your name at their head, for the honor it will be for them to have as their guide the great Corisande d'Andoins.[1]
	Ce present m'a semblé vous estre propre, d'autant qu'il est peu de dames en France, qui iugent mieux, et se seruent plus à propos que vous, de la poësie: et puis qu'il n'en est point qui la puissent rendre viue et animee, comme vous faites par ces beaux et riches accords, dequoy parmy vn milion d'autres beautez, nature vous a estrenee: Madame ces vers meritent que vous les cherissiez: car vous serez de mon aduis, qu'il n'en est point sorty de Gascongne, qui eussent plus d'inuention et de gentillesse, et qui tesmoignent estre sortis d'vne plus riche main.	This present seemed fitting for you, since there are few ladies in France who judge poetry better or make more fitting use of it than you; and since there are none who can make it as lively and animated as you do with those beautiful, rich harmonies with which, among a million other beauties, nature has endowed you. Madame, these verses deserve your cherishing them. For you will agree with me that none have ever come out of Gascony with more invention and grace, or that show they came from a richer hand.
	Et n'entrez pas en ialousie, dequoy vous n'auez que le reste de ce que pieça i'en ay faict imprimer sous le nom de Monsieur de Foix, vostre bon parent: car certes ceux-cy ont ie ne sçay quoy de plus vif et de plus bouillant: comme il les fit en sa plus verte ieunesse, et eschauffé d'vne belle et noble ardeur que ie vous diray, Madame, vn iour à l'oreille. Les autres furent faits depuis, comme il estoit à la poursuitte de son mariage, en faueur de sa femme, et sentant desia ie ne sçay quelle froideur maritale. Et moy ie suis de ceux qui tiennent, que la poësie ne rid point ailleurs, comme elle faict en vn subiect folatre et desreglé.	And do not be jealous because you have only what remains after what I long ago had printed under the name of Monsieur de Foix, your good kinsman. For truly these have something livelier and more ardent about them, since he wrote them in his greenest youth, fired by a fine and noble passion that I will tell you about, Madame, one day in your ear. The others were written later, when he was courting for his marriage, in honor of his wife, and already feeling some sort of marital coldness. And I am one of those who hold that poetry never laughs anywhere as it does on a frolicsome and unruly subject.[2]

THE SONNETS

La Boétie's twenty-nine love sonnets follow, each rendered line by line.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.29.2	Pardon amour, pardon, ô Seigneur ie te voüe Le reste de mes ans, ma voix et mes escris, Mes sanglots, mes souspirs, mes larmes et mes cris: Rien, rien tenir d'aucun, que de toy ie n'aduoue. Helas comment de moy, ma fortune se ioue. De toy n'a pas long temps, amour, ie me suis ris. I'ay failly, ie le voy, ie me rends, ie suis pris. I'ay trop gardé mon cœur, or ie le desaduoüe. Si i'ay pour le garder retardé ta victoire, Ne l'en traitte plus mal, plus grande en est ta gloire.	Mercy, Love, mercy! O Lord, I vow to you The rest of my years, my voice and my writings, My sobs, my sighs, my tears and my cries: Nothing, nothing will I own to hold from anyone but you. Alas, how my fortune makes sport of me! Not long ago, Love, I laughed at you. I have erred, I see it; I surrender, I am taken. I guarded my heart too well; now I disown it. If by guarding it I delayed your victory, Do not treat it worse for that: your glory is the greater.
	/ Et si du premier coup tu ne m'as abbatu, Pense qu'vn bon vainqueur et nay pour estre grand, Son nouueau prisonnier, quand vn coup il se rend, Il prise et l'ayme mieux, s'il a bien combattu.	/ And if you did not strike me down at the first blow, Consider that a good victor, born to be great, Holds his new prisoner, once he surrenders, In higher esteem and love if he has fought well.
1.29.3	C'est amour c'est amour, c'est luy seul, ie le sens; Mais le plus vif amour, la poison la plus forte, A qui onq pauure cœur ait ouuerte la porte. Ce cruel n'a pas mis vn de ses traitz perçans, Mais arc, traits et carquois, et luy tout dans mes sens. Encor vn mois n'a pas, que ma franchise est morte, Que ce venin mortel dans mes veines ie porte, Et des-ja i'ay perdu, et le cœur et le sens. Et quoy? si cest amour à mesure croissoit, Qui en si grand tourment dedans moy se conçoit? O croistz, si tu peuz croistre, et amende en croissant.	It is Love, it is Love, it is he alone, I feel it; But the most piercing love, the strongest poison To which a poor heart ever opened the door. This cruel one has not lodged just one of his piercing arrows, But bow, arrows and quiver, and himself entire, within my senses. It is not yet a month since my freedom died, Since I have carried this deadly venom in my veins, And already I have lost both heart and reason. What then? If this love kept growing at that rate, This love conceived within me in such torment? Oh, grow, if you can grow, and improve as you grow.
	/ Tu te nourris de pleurs; des pleurs ie te prometz, Et pour te refreschir, des souspirs pour iamais. Mais que le plus grand mal soit au moings en naissant.	/ You feed on tears: tears I promise you, And to refresh you, sighs forever. But let the worst pain at least come at the start.
1.29.4	C'est faict mon cœur, quitons la liberté. Dequoy meshuy seruiroit la deffence, Que d'agrandir et la peine et l'offence? Plus ne suis fort, ainsi que i'ay esté. La raison fust vn temps de mon costé, Or reuoltée elle veut que ie pense Qu'il faut seruir, et prendre en recompence Qu'oncq d'vn tel neud nul ne fust arresté. S'il se faut rendre, alors il est saison,	It is done, my heart; let us give up our freedom. What use would defense be now, Except to increase both the pain and the offense? I am no longer strong, as I once was. Reason was on my side for a time; Now, turned rebel, she would have me think That I must serve, and take as my reward That no one was ever held by such a knot.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Quand on n'a plus deuers soy la raison. Je voy qu'amour, sans que ie le deserue, Sans aucun droict, se vient saisir de moy? Et voy qu'encor il faut à ce grand Roy Quand il a tort, que la raison luy serue.	If one must surrender, then is the time, When one no longer has reason on one's side. I see that Love, though I do not deserve it, Without any right, comes and seizes me? And I see that this great King must still Have reason serve him, even when he is wrong.
1.29.5	C'estoit alors, quand les chaleurs passées, Le sale Automne aux cuues va foulant, Le raisin gras dessoubz le pied coulant, Que mes douleurs furent encommencées. Le paisan bat ses gerbes amassées, Et aux caueaux ses bouillans muis roulant, Et des fruitiers son automne croulant, Se vange lors des peines aduancées. Seroit ce point vn presage donné Que mon espoir est des-ja moissonné? Non certes, non. Mais pour certain ie pense, I'auray, si bien à deuiner i'entends, Si l'on peut rien prognostiquer du temps, Quelque grand fruict de ma longue esperance.	It was the time when, the heats gone by, Stained Autumn goes treading in the vats The plump grape that runs beneath the foot, That my sorrows began. The peasant threshes his gathered sheaves, And, rolling his seething casks into the cellars, And shaking his autumn harvest down from the fruit trees, Takes revenge then for the labors he has spent. Could this be an omen given That my hope has already been reaped? No, surely not. But I think for certain That I shall have, if I know how to divine, If one can foretell anything from the season, Some great fruit from my long hope.
1.29.6	I'ay veu ses yeux perçans, i'ay veu sa face claire: (Nul iamais sans son dam ne regarde les dieux) Froit, sans cœur me laissa son œil victorieux, Tout estourdy du coup de sa forte lumiere. Comme vn surpris de nuit aux champs quand il esclaire Estonné, se pallist si la fleche des cieux Sifflant luy passe contre, et luy serre les yeux, Il tremble, et veoit, transi, Iupiter en colere. Dy moy Madame, au vray, dy moy si tes yeux vertz Ne sont pas ceux qu'on dit que l'amour tient couuertz? / Tu les auois, ie croy, la fois que ie t'ay veüe, Au moins il me souuient, qu'il me fust lors aduis Qu'amour, tout à vn coup, quand premier ie te vis, Desbanda dessus moy, et son arc, et sa veüe.	I have seen her piercing eyes, I have seen her radiant face (No one ever looks on the gods without harm to himself); Her victorious eye left me cold and heartless, Utterly stunned by the blow of its strong light. As a man caught at night in the fields when lightning flashes, Stunned, turns pale if the arrow of the heavens Whistles past close by him and makes him shut his eyes; He trembles, and sees, frozen with fear, Jupiter in his wrath. Tell me, Madame, truly, tell me if your green eyes Are not those that Love is said to keep covered? / You had them, I believe, the time I saw you; At least I remember that it seemed to me then That Love, all at once, when I first saw you, Loosed his bow upon me and unbound his eyes.
1.29.7	Ce dit maint vn de moy, de quoy se plaint il tant, Perdant ses ans meilleurs en chose si legiere? Qu'a il tant à crier, si encore il espere? Et s'il n'espere rien, pourquoy n'est il content? Quand i'estois libre et sain i'en disois bien autant. Mais certes celuy là n'a la raison entiere, Ains a le cœur gasté de quelque rigueur fiere, S'il se plaint de ma plainte, et mon mal il n'entend.	Many a one says of me: "What is he complaining of so much, Wasting his best years on so frivolous a thing? Why does he cry out so much, if he still has hope? And if he hopes for nothing, why is he not content?" When I was free and healthy, I used to say as

	Amour tout à vn coup de cent douleurs me point, Et puis l'on m'aduertit que ie ne crie point.	much. But surely that man is not quite in his right mind, But has his heart spoiled by some proud harshness, If he complains of my complaint and does not understand my pain. Love all at once pierces me with a hundred pains, And then I am told not to cry out.
	/ Si vain ie ne suis pas que mon mal i'agrandisse A force de parler: s'on m'en peut exempter, Ie quitte les sonnetz, ie quitte le chanter. Qui me deffend le deuil, celuy là me guerisse.	/ I am not so vain as to magnify my pain By dint of talking: if someone can free me from it, I give up sonnets, I give up singing. Let whoever forbids me to grieve cure me.
1.29.8	Quant à chanter ton los, par fois ie m'aduenture, Sans oser ton grand nom, dans mes vers exprimer, Sondant le moins profond de cette large mer, Ie tremble de m'y perdre, et aux riues m'asseure. Ie crains en loüant mal, que ie te face iniure.	Sometimes I venture to sing your praise, Without daring to set down your great name in my verse; Sounding the shallowest part of this wide sea, I tremble lest I lose myself in it, and keep safe near the shore. I fear that by praising badly I may do you wrong.
	/ Mais le peuple estonné d'ouir tant t'estimer, Ardant de te connoistre, essaie à te nommer, Et cherchant ton sainct nom ainsi à l'aduenture, Esbloui n'attaint pas à veoir chose si claire, Et ne te trouue point ce grossier populaire, Qui n'ayant qu'vn moyen, ne voit pas celuy là: C'est que s'il peut trier, la comparaison faicte Des parfaictes du monde, vne la plus parfaicte, Lors s'il a voix, qu'il crie hardimant la voyla.	/ But the people, amazed to hear you so highly esteemed, Burning to know you, try to name you, And, seeking your holy name thus at random, Dazzled, cannot manage to see a thing so bright; And the common crowd does not find you, For, having only one way, it does not see that way: Namely, if, having made the comparison Of the perfect women of the world, it can pick out the one most perfect, Then, if it has a voice, let it boldly cry, "There she is."
1.29.9	Quand viendra ce iour la, que ton nom au vray passe Par France, dans mes vers? combien et quantes fois S'en empresse mon cœur, s'en demangent mes doits? Souuent dans mes escrits de soy mesme il prend place. Maugré moy ie t'escris, maugré moy ie t'efface. Quand astrée viendroit et la foy et le droit, Alors ioyeux ton nom au monde se rendroit. Ores c'est à ce temps, que cacher il te face, C'est à ce temps maling vne grande vergogne Donc Madame tandis tu seras ma Dourdouigne.	When will that day come when your name, truly told, passes Through France in my verse? How many, many times Does my heart press for it, do my fingers itch for it? Often in my writings it takes its place of its own accord. Despite myself I write you, despite myself I erase you. If Astraea should come, and good faith, and justice, Then your name would joyfully show itself to the world. As it is, this age makes it hide you; It is a great shame on this wicked age.

		So, Madame, meanwhile you shall be my Dordogne.[3]
	/ Toutesfois laisse moy, laisse moy ton nom mettre, Ayez pitié du temps, si au iour ie te metz, Si le temps ce cognoist, lors ie te le prometz, Lors il sera doré, s'il le doit iamais estre.	/ Yet let me, let me set down your name; Take pity on the age: if I bring you into the light of day, If the age recognizes you, then I promise you, Then it will be golden, if it ever is to be.
1.29.10	O entre tes beautez, que ta constance est belle. C'est ce cœur asseuré, ce courage constant, C'est parmy tes vertus, ce que l'on prise tant: Aussi qu'est-il plus beau, qu'vne amitié fidelle? Or ne charge donc rien de ta sœur infidele, De Vesere ta sœur: elle va s'escartant Tousiours flotant mal seure en son cours inconstant. Voy tu comme à leur gré les vens se ioüent d'elle? Et ne te repens point pour droict de ton aisnage D'auoir des-ia choisi la constance en partage.	Oh, among your beauties, how beautiful your constancy is! It is that steadfast heart, that constant spirit, That people prize so highly among your virtues: And indeed what is more beautiful than a faithful love? So take on nothing from your faithless sister, From your sister the Vézère: she keeps straying, Always wavering, unsteady in her fickle course. Do you see how the winds play with her as they please? And do not regret having, by right of your seniority, Already chosen constancy as your share.[4]
	/ Mesme race porta l'amitié souueraine Des bons iumeaux, desquels l'vn à l'autre despart Du ciel et de l'enfer la moitié de sa part, Et l'amour diffamé de la trop belle Heleine.	/ The same race bore the sovereign love Of the good twins, each of whom shares with the other Half his portion of heaven and of hell, And the disgraced love of too-beautiful Helen.[5]
1.29.11	Ie voy bien, ma Dourdouigne encore humble tu vas: De te monstrer Gasconne en France, tu as honte. Si du ruisseau de Sorgue, on fait ores grand conte, Si a il bien esté quelquefois aussi bas. Voys tu le petit Loir comme il haste le pas? Comme des-ia parmy les plus grands il se conte? Comme il marche hautain d'vne course plus prompte Tout à costé du Mince, et il ne s'en plaint pas? Un seul Oliuier d'Arne enté au bord de Loire, Le faict courir plus braue et luy donne sa gloire. Laisse, laisse moy faire.	I see well, my Dordogne, that you still go humbly: You are ashamed to show yourself a Gascon in France. If the stream of the Sorgue is now held in great account, Yet it too was once just as low. Do you see how the little Loir quickens its pace? How it already counts itself among the greatest? How it marches proudly with a swifter course Right alongside the Mincio, and the Mincio does not complain? A single Olive tree from the Arno, grafted on the bank of the Loire, Makes it run more splendidly and gives it its glory. Leave it, leave it to me.[6]
	Et vn iour ma Dourdouigne, Si ie deuine bien, on te cognoistra mieux:	And one day, my Dordogne, If I guess right, you will be better known:

Qui pourra sur autruy ses douleurs limiter, Celuy pourra d'autruy les plaintes imiter: Chacun sent son tourment, et sçait ce qu'il endure. Chacun parla d'amour ainsi qu'il l'entendit. Ie dis ce que mon cœur, ce que mon mal me dict.	You who hear my sighs, do not be harsh with me If I shed my tears apart, all my own, If my love, in its changing sorrow, does not follow The languishing laments of the lovelorn Florentine, Nor those of Catullus, the playful lover, Who pierces his lady's heart while tickling it, Nor the learned love of half-Greek Propertius: They do not love for me, I do not love for them. He who can measure his sorrows by another's Will be able to imitate another's laments: Each feels his own torment and knows what he endures. Each spoke of love as he understood it. I say what my heart, what my pain tells me.[7]

Quand i'oy les vents, leur tempeste et leurs cris, De leur malice, en mon cœur ie me ris. Me pensent ils pour cela faire rendre? Face le ciel du pire, et l'air aussi: Ie veux, ie veux, et le declaire ainsi S'il faut mourir, mourir comme Leandre.	What? What is this? O winds, O clouds, O storm! Just when, as I draw near her, I see myself cutting across the woods, the mountains, the valleys, You lie in wait and hurl your rage upon me. Now my heart burns all the more. Go, go and frighten the merchant Who seeks treasures on the sea: That is not how my courage is struck down. When I hear the winds, their tempest and their cries, I laugh in my heart at their malice. Do they think they will make me give up for this? Let the sky do its worst, and the air too: I wish, I wish, and so declare, If I must die, to die like Leander.[8]

	Vn soir vaincu par les flos rigoureux, Voyant des-ia, ce vaillant amoureux, Que l'eau maistresse à son plaisir le tourne: Parlant aux flos, leur iecta cette voix: Pardonnez moy maintenant que i'y veois, Et gardez moy la mort, quand ie retourne.	Having spared the brother and the ram. One evening, overcome by the cruel waves, This valiant lover, seeing already That the water, his mistress, was turning him at its pleasure, Spoke to the waves and cast them these words: "Spare me now, as I go there, And keep my death for when I return."[9]
1.29.15	O cœur leger, ô courage mal seur, Penses-tu plus que souffrir ie te puisse? O bontez creuze, ô couuerte malice, Traitre beauté, venimeuse douceur, Tu estois donc tousiours sœur de ta sœur? Et moy trop simple il falloit que i'en fisse L'essay sur moy? et que tard i'entendisse Ton parler double et tes chants de chasseur? Depuis le iour que i'ay prins à t'aimer, I'eusse vaincu les vagues de la mer. Qu'est-ce meshuy que ie pourrais attendre? Comment de toy pourrais i'estre content? And understand too late Your double speech and your hunter's songs? Since the day I began to love you, I could have conquered the waves of the sea. What can I expect from now on? How could I be content with you? Who will teach your heart to be constant, Since mine cannot teach it?

Tu prens plaisir à ma douleur extreme: Tu me deffends de sentir mon tourment: Et si veux bien que ie meure en t'aimant. Si ie ne sens, comment veux-tu que i'ayme?	I am not one to be deceived like this: Use your tricks on some child Who has no taste and understands nothing he hears: I know how to love, I know how to hate as well. Be content with having until now Kept my eyes shut; it is time I saw clearly, And that from now on I be weary and ashamed Of having spent my time and care so badly. Would you dare, having treated me so, Ever to speak to me of constancy? You take pleasure in my extreme pain; You forbid me to feel my torment; And yet you want me to die loving you. If I do not feel, how do you expect me to love?

When, stunned, I gaze into your conquering eyes, I see in them, clearly written, all my hope; I see in them Love himself, smiling at me, And sweetly showing me the happiness he keeps for me. But when at times I venture to speak to you, It is then that my hope dries up and runs out. And to vouch, ever, for your eye that feeds me With one word of favor, cruel one, you never will. 1.29.24	Ce sont tes yeux tranchans qui me font le courage Ie veoy saulter dedans la gaye liberté, Et mon petit archer, qui mene à son costé La belle gaillardise et plaisir le volage. Mais apres, la rigueur de ton triste langage Me montre dans ton cœur la fiere honnesteté Et condamné ie veoy la dure chasteté, Là grauement assise et la vertu sauuage, Ainsi mon temps diuers par ces vagues se passe. Ores son œil m'appelle, or sa bouche me chasse. Helas, en cest estrif, combien ay i'enduré.	It is your piercing eyes that give me courage: I see gay freedom leaping in them, And my little archer, who leads at his side Lovely high spirits and fickle pleasure. But afterward the severity of your stern speech Shows me proud honor in your heart, And, condemned, I see hard chastity Gravely seated there, and fierce virtue. So my changing time passes on these waves: Now her eye calls me, now her mouth drives me off. Alas, in this strife, how much I have endured!

1.29.26	I'ay tant vescu, chetif, en ma langueur, Qu'or i'ay veu rompre, et suis encor en vie, Mon esperance auant mes yeux rauie, Contre l'escueil de sa fiere rigueur. Que m'a seruy de tant d'ans la longueur? Elle n'est pas de ma peine assouuie: Elle s'en rit, et n'a point d'autre enuie, Que de tenir mon mal en sa vigueur. I have lived so long, wretched, in my languor, That now I have seen—and am still alive— My hope, snatched away before my eyes, broken Against the reef of her proud harshness. What good to me has been the length of so many years? She is not sated with my pain: She laughs at it, and has no other wish Than to keep my suffering in full vigor. So I shall have, unhappy in loving Always one heart, always fresh torment. I feel that I am quite out of breath, Ready to give up my life under the burden: What could one do but what I am doing? Stung by suffering, I persist in my pain.
1.29.27	Puis qu'ainsi sont mes dures destinées, I'en saouleray, si ie puis, mon soucy. Si i'ay du mal, elle le veut aussi. I'accompliray mes peines ordonnées. Or si quelqu'vne à m'escouter s'encline, Oyez pour Dieu ce qu'ores ie deuine. Le iour est pres que mes forces ia vaines Ne pourront plus fournir à mon tourment. C'est mon espoir, si ie meurs en aymant, A donc, ie croy, failliray-ie à mes peines.	Since such are my hard destinies, I shall glut my care with them, if I can. If I suffer, she wills it too. I shall fulfill my appointed pains. Nymphs of the woods, who have been stunned by my sorrows Into some pity, I believe, What do you think? Can I last like this If no truce is granted to my ills? Now if one of you is inclined to hear me, Listen, for God's sake, to what I now foresee: The day is near when my strength, already spent, Will no longer be able to keep up with my torment. It is my hope that if I die loving, Then, I believe, I shall be done with my pains.
1.29.28	Lors que lasse est, de me lasser ma peine, Amour d'vn bien mon mal refreschissant, Flate au cœur mort ma playe languissant, Nourrit mon mal, et luy faict prendre alaine, Lors ie conçoy quelque esperance vaine: Mais aussi tost, ce dur tyran, s'il sent Que mon espoir se renforce en croissant, Pour l'estoufer, cent tourmens il m'ameine Encor tous frez: lors ie me veois blasmant D'auoir esté rebelle à mon tourmant. Ta main de prendre en fin se contenta: Mais la nature encor te presenta, Pour t'enrichir cette terre ou nous sommes. Tu n'en prins rien: mais en toy tu t'en ris, Te sentant bien en auoir assez pris Pour estre icy royne du cœur des hommes.	Already the blessed day was shining That nature owed the world in you, When the great key to the treasures She had kept for you was handed over to you. You took the grace meant for you alone; You plundered so many of the beauties she had That she, proud as she is, when she sees you, Is at times stunned at it herself. At last your hand was content to take no more: But nature offered you as well, To enrich you, this earth where we live. You took none of it, but laughed to yourself, Well aware that you had taken enough To be queen here of the hearts of men.

I.30 Of Moderation

De la Moderation
Even virtue can be pursued to excess; Montaigne praises temperate natures and moderation even in pleasure and devotion.

FRENCH

1.30.1 COMME si nous auions l'attouchement infect, nous corrompons par nostre maniement les choses qui d'elles mesmes sont belles et bonnes. Nous pouuons saisir la vertu, de façon qu'elle en deuiendra vicieuse: si nous l'embrassons d'vn desir trop aspre et violant. Ceux qui disent qu'il n'y a iamais d'exces en la vertu, d'autant que ce n'est plus vertu, si l'exces y est, se iouent des paroles. Insani sapiens nomen ferat, æquus iniqui, / Vltra quàm satis est, virtutem si petat ipsam. C'est vne subtile consideration de la philosophie. On peut et trop aymer la vertu, et se porter excessiuement en vne action iuste. A ce biaiz s'accommode la voix diuine, Ne soyez pas plus sages qu'il ne faut, mais soyez sobrement sages.

I'ay veu tel grand, blesser la reputation de sa religion, pour se montrer religieux outre tout exemple des hommes de sa sorte. I'ayme des natures temperees et moyennes. L'immoderation vers le bien mesme, si elle ne m'offense, elle m'estonne, et me met en peine de la baptizer. Ny la mere de Pausanias, qui donna la premiere instruction, et porta la premiere pierre à la mort de son fils: ny le dictateur Posthumius, qui feit mourir le sien, que l'ardeur de ieunesse auoit heureusement poussé sur les ennemis, vn peu auant son reng, ne me semble si iuste, comme estrange. Et n'ayme ny à conseiller, ny à suiure vne vertu si sauuage et si chere.

L'archer qui outrepasse le blanc, faut comme celuy, qui n'y arriue pas. Et les yeux me troublent à monter à coup, vers vne grande lumiere également comme à deualler à l'ombre.

1.30.2 Calliclez en Platon dit, l'extremité de la philosophie estre dommageable: et conseille de ne s'y enfoncer outre les

ENGLISH

AS if our touch were infected, we corrupt by our handling things that are fine and good in themselves. We can grasp virtue in such a way that it becomes vicious, if we embrace it with too fierce and violent a desire. Those who say that there is never excess in virtue, since it is no longer virtue if there is excess in it, are playing with words. Let the wise man bear the name of madman, and the just man of unjust, / If he pursues virtue itself beyond what is enough. This is a subtle reflection of philosophy. One can both love virtue too much and behave excessively in a just action. The divine word fits this view: "Be not wiser than you should be, but be soberly wise."[1]

I have seen a certain great man damage the reputation of his religion by showing himself religious beyond every example of men of his kind. I like natures that are temperate and middling. Immoderation even in the direction of good, if it does not offend me, astonishes me, and leaves me at a loss what to call it. Neither the mother of Pausanias, who gave the first information against her son and carried the first stone for his death, nor the dictator Postumius, who put to death his own son, whom the ardor of youth had carried successfully against the enemy a little ahead of his rank, seems to me so much just as strange. And I like neither to advise nor to follow a virtue so fierce and so costly.[2]

The archer who overshoots the target misses just as much as the one who falls short of it. And my eyes are as troubled by climbing suddenly toward a great light as by going down into the dark.

1.30.3 L'amitié que nous portons à nos femmes, elle est tres-legitime: la Theologie ne laisse pas de la brider pourtant, et de la restraindre. Il me semble auoir leu autresfois chez S. Thomas, en vn endroit où il condamne les mariages des parans és degrez deffendus, cette raison parmy les autres: Qu'il y a danger que l'amitié qu'on porte à vne telle femme soit immoderée: car si l'affection maritale s'y trouue entiere et parfaicte, comme elle doit; et qu'on la surcharge encore de celle qu'on doit à la parentele, il n'y a point de doubte, que ce surcroist n'emporte vn tel mary hors les barrieres de la raison.

1.30.4 Les sciences qui reglent les mœurs des hommes, comme la Theologie et la Philosophie, elles se meslent de tout. Il n'est action si priuée et secrette, qui se desrobbe de leur cognoissance et iurisdiction. Bien apprentis sont ceux qui syndiquent leur liberté. Ce sont les femmes qui communiquent tant qu'on veut leurs pieces à garçonner: à medeciner, la honte le deffend. Ie veux donc de leur part apprendre cecy aux maris, s'il s'en trouue encore qui y soient trop acharnez: c'est que les plaisirs mesmes qu'ils ont à l'accointance de leurs femmes, sont reprouuez, si la moderation n'y est obseruée: et qu'il y a dequoy faillir en licence et desbordement en ce subiect là, comme en vn subiect illegitime.

Ces encheriments deshontez, que la chaleur premiere nous suggere en ce ieu, sont non indecemment seulement, mais dommageablement employez enuers noz femmes. in moderation, he says, it is pleasant and useful; but in the end it makes a man uncouth and vicious, contemptuous of religion and the common laws, an enemy of civil society, an enemy of human pleasures, incapable of any political administration and of helping others or helping himself, fit to be slapped in the face with impunity. He is right: for in its excess it enslaves our natural freedom, and by a troublesome subtlety leads us astray from the fine, level road that nature marks out for us.[3]

The love we bear our wives is entirely lawful; theology nonetheless curbs and restrains it. I seem to have read once in Saint Thomas, in a passage where he condemns marriages between relatives within the forbidden degrees, this reason among others: that there is a danger that the love one bears such a wife may be immoderate. For if marital affection is found there whole and perfect, as it should be, and one loads on top of it the affection owed to kinship as well, there is no doubt that this surplus will carry such a husband beyond the barriers of reason.[4]

The sciences that regulate men's morals, such as theology and philosophy, meddle in everything. There is no action so private and secret that it escapes their knowledge and jurisdiction. Those who find fault with this freedom of theirs are mere novices. It is women who will share their private parts as freely as you please for lovemaking; for doctoring, shame forbids it. So on their behalf I want to teach husbands this, if there are still any who are too intent on it: that even the pleasures they take in intimacy with their wives are condemned if moderation is not observed, and that one can sin through license and excess in this matter as in an unlawful one.

Those shameless refinements that the first heat suggests to us in this game are employed with our wives not only indecently but harmfully. Let them learn shamelessness at least from another hand. They are always wide enough awake for our needs. For my part I have used only nature's simple instruction.

1.30.5 C’est vne religieuse liaison et deuote que le mariage: voyla pourquoy le plaisir qu’on en tire, ce doit estre vn plaisir retenu, serieux et meslé à quelque seuerité: ce doit estre vne volupté aucunement prudente et consciencieuse. Et par ce que sa principale fin c’est la generation, il y en a qui mettent en doubte, si lors que nous sommes sans l’esperance de ce fruict, comme quand elles sont hors d’aage, ou enceintes, il est permis d’en rechercher l’embrassement. C’est vn homicide à la mode de Platon. Certaines nations, et entre autres la Mahumetane, abominent la conionction auec les femmes enceintes. Plusieurs aussi auec celles qui ont leurs flueurs.

Marriage is a religious and devout bond: that is why the pleasure one takes from it should be a restrained, serious pleasure, mixed with some severity; it should be a pleasure that is in some measure prudent and conscientious. And because its principal end is procreation, there are those who question whether, when we have no hope of that fruit—as when women are past the age, or pregnant—it is permitted to seek their embrace. It is homicide, after the fashion of Plato. Certain nations, among others the Muslims, abhor intercourse with pregnant women. Many also abhor it with women who are having their periods.[5]

Zenobia ne receuoit son mary que pour vne charge; et cela fait elle le laissoit courir tout le temps de sa conception, luy donnant lors seulement loy de recommencer: braue et genereux exemple de mariage. C’est de quelque poëte diseteux et affamé de ce deduit, que Platon emprunta cette narration: Que Iuppiter fit à sa femme vne si chaleureuse charge vn iour, que ne pouuant auoir patience qu’elle eust gaigné son lict, il la versa sur le plancher: et par la vehemence du plaisir, oublia les resolutions grandes et importantes, qu’il venoit de prendre auec les autres Dieux en sa cour celeste: se ventant qu’il l’auoit trouué aussi bon ce coup là, que lors que premierement il la depucella à cachette de leurs parents.

Zenobia received her husband only for a single bout, and that done she let him roam all the while she was carrying the child, giving him leave to begin again only then: a brave and noble example of marriage. It was from some poet, needy and starved of this sport, that Plato borrowed this story: that Jupiter one day made so heated a charge on his wife that, unable to wait until she had reached her bed, he tumbled her onto the floor; and in the violence of his pleasure he forgot the great and weighty resolutions he had just taken with the other gods in his heavenly court, boasting that he had found it as good that time as when he first deflowered her behind their parents’ backs.[6]

1.30.6 Les Roys de Perse appelloient leurs femmes à la compagnie de leurs festins, mais quand le vin venoit à les eschauffer en bon escient, et qu’il falloit tout à fait, lascher la bride à la volupté, ils les r’enuoioient en leur priué; pour ne les faire participantes de leurs appetits immoderez; et faisoient venir en leur lieu, des femmes, ausquelles ils n’eussent point cette obligation de respect. Tous plaisirs et toutes gratifications ne sont pas bien logées en toutes gens. Epaminondas auoit fait emprisonner vn garçon desbauché; Pelopidas le pria de le mettre en liberté en sa faueur; il l’en refusa, et l’accorda à vne sienne garse, qui aussi l’en pria: disant, que c’estoit vne gratification deuë à vne amie, non à vn Capitaine.

The kings of Persia invited their wives to keep them company at their feasts; but when the wine began to heat them in earnest, and they had to give pleasure free rein altogether, they sent the wives back to their private quarters, so as not to make them share in their immoderate appetites, and had other women brought in their place, to whom they owed no such duty of respect. Not all pleasures and all favors are fitly bestowed on all people. Epaminondas had had a dissolute young man imprisoned; Pelopidas begged him to set him free as a favor to himself; he refused, and granted it to a girl of his who also begged it of him, saying that it was a favor due to a lady friend, not to a captain.

garçon que voyla! feit-il à Pericles. Cela seroit bon à vn autre qu'à vn Preteur, luy dit Pericles; qui doit auoir non les mains seulement, mais aussi les yeux chastes. Ælius Verus l'Empereur respondit à sa femme comme elle se plaignoit, dequoy il se laissoit aller à l'amour d'autres femmes; qu'il le faisoit par occasion consciencieuse, d'autant que le mariage estoit vn nom d'honneur et dignité, non de folastre et lasciue concupiscence. Et nostre histoire Ecclesiastique a conserué auec honneur la memoire de cette femme, qui repudia son mary, pour ne vouloir seconder et soustenir ses attouchemens trop insolens et desbordez.

Il n'est en somme aucune si iuste volupté, en laquelle l'excez et l'intemperance ne nous soit reprochable. Mais à parler en bon escient, est-ce pas vn miserable animal que l'homme? A peine est-il en son pouuoir par sa condition naturelle, de gouster vn seul plaisir entier et pur, encore se met-il en peine de le retrancher par discours: il n'est pas assez chetif, si par art et par estude il n'augmente sa misere, Fortunæ miseras auximus arte vias.

1.30.7 La sagesse humaine faict bien sottement l'ingenieuse, de s'exercer à rabattre le nombre et la douceur des voluptez, qui nous appartiennent: comme elle faict fauorablement et industrieusement, d'employer ses artifices à nous peigner et farder les maux, et en alleger le sentiment. Si i'eusse esté chef de part, i'eusse prins autre voye plus naturelle: qui est à dire, vraye, commode et saincte: et me fusse peut estre rendu assez fort pour la borner. Quoy que noz medecins spirituels et corporels, comme par complot faict entre eux, ne trouuent aucune voye à la guerison, ny remede aux maladies du corps et de l'ame, que par le tourment, la douleur et la peine.

Les veilles, les ieusnes, les haires, les exils lointains et solitaires, les prisons perpetuelles, les verges et autres afflictions, ont esté introduites pour cela. Mais en telle condition, que ce soyent veritablement afflictions, et qu'il y ait de l'aigreur poignante: et qu'il n'en aduienne point comme à vn Gallio, lequel ayant esté enuoyé en exil en l'isle de Lesbos, on fut aduerty à Rome qu'il s'y donnoit be fine for anyone but a praetor," Pericles told him, "who must keep not only his hands but his eyes chaste." The emperor Aelius Verus, when his wife complained that he let himself go in love affairs with other women, answered that he did it for reasons of conscience, since marriage was a name of honor and dignity, not of playful and lascivious lust. And our ecclesiastical history has preserved with honor the memory of the woman who repudiated her husband because she would not second and put up with his too insolent and unbridled caresses.[7]

In short, there is no pleasure so legitimate that excess and intemperance in it are not open to reproach. But, to speak in earnest, is not man a wretched animal? Scarcely is it in his power, by his natural condition, to taste a single whole and pure pleasure, and still he goes to the trouble of cutting it back by reasoning. He is not wretched enough unless he increases his misery by art and study: By art we have added to the miseries of Fortune's paths.[8]

Human wisdom very foolishly plays the clever one when it exerts itself to reduce the number and sweetness of the pleasures that belong to us, just as it acts kindly and ingeniously when it uses its artifices to comb and paint over our ills and lighten our feeling of them. If I had been the head of a sect, I would have taken another, more natural path—that is to say, true, comfortable and holy—and perhaps I would have made myself strong enough to keep it within bounds. As it is, our physicians of the soul and of the body, as if by a plot agreed among them, find no road to healing and no remedy for the diseases of body and soul except through torment, pain and suffering.

Vigils, fasts, hair shirts, distant and solitary exiles, perpetual imprisonment, the rod and other afflictions have been introduced for that purpose. But on condition that they truly be afflictions, with a sharp, stinging bitterness in them, and that it not turn out as with one Gallio. He had been sent into exile on the island of Lesbos, and word came to L'amertume et la difficulté sont circonstances seruants à leur operation. Le naturel qui accepteroit la rubarbe comme familiere, en corromproit l'vsage: il faut que ce soit chose qui blesse nostre estomac pour le guerir: et icy faut la regle commune, que les choses se guerissent par leurs contraires: car le mal y guerit le mal.

1.30.8 Cette impression se rapporte aucunement à cette autre si ancienne, de penser gratifier au Ciel et à la nature par nostre massacre et homicide, qui fut vniuersellement embrassée en toutes religions. Encore du temps de noz peres, Amurat en la prinse de l'Isthme, immola six cens ieunes hommes Grecs à l'ame de son pere: afin que ce sang seruist de propitiation à l'expiation des pechez du trespassé. Rome that he was having a fine time there, and that what had been imposed on him as a penalty was turning to his comfort. So they changed their minds and recalled him to his wife and his home, and ordered him to stay there, in order to suit their punishment to his feelings.[9]

For if fasting were to sharpen a man's health and cheerfulness, if fish were more appetizing to him than meat, it would no longer be a salutary prescription; any more than, in the other kind of medicine, drugs have any effect on someone who takes them with appetite and pleasure. Bitterness and difficulty are circumstances that serve their working. A constitution that took to rhubarb as something familiar would spoil its use: it has to be something that hurts our stomach in order to cure it. And here the common rule fails, that things are cured by their contraries; for here ill cures ill.

This notion is somewhat related to that other very ancient one, of thinking we gratify heaven and nature by our own slaughter and killing, which was universally embraced in all religions. Even in our fathers' time Amurat, at the taking of the Isthmus, sacrificed six hundred young Greeks to his father's soul, so that this blood might serve as a propitiation to expiate the dead man's sins. And in these new lands discovered in our age, still pure and virgin compared with ours, the practice is in some measure accepted everywhere. All their idols drink their fill of human blood, not without various examples of horrible cruelty. They burn the victims alive, and pull them half-roasted from the fire to tear out their hearts and entrails.[10]

Others, even women, are flayed alive, and with their skin, still bloody, they dress and mask others. And there are no fewer examples of constancy and resolve. For these poor people destined for sacrifice—old men, women, children—go about for some days beforehand begging alms themselves for the offering of their sacrifice, and present themselves at the slaughter singing and dancing with the onlookers.

The ambassadors of the King of Mexico, explaining to Hernán Cortés the greatness of their master, told him that he had thirty vassals, each of whom could raise a hundred thousand fighting men, and that he lived in the finest and strongest city under heaven; and then they added that he had fifty thousand men a year to sacrifice to the gods. Indeed, they say that he kept up war with certain great neighboring peoples not only to exercise the youth of the country but chiefly to have prisoners of war with which to supply his sacrifices. Elsewhere, in a certain town, to welcome this same Cortés, they sacrificed fifty men all at once.

I will tell this story too. Some of these peoples, having been beaten by him, sent to acknowledge him and seek his friendship. The messengers presented him with three kinds of gifts, in this manner: "Lord, here are five slaves: if you are a fierce god who feeds on flesh and blood, eat them, and we will bring you more; if you are a kindly god, here are incense and feathers; if you are a man, take these birds and fruits."

1.31.1	QVAND le Roy Pyrrhus passa en Italie, apres qu'il eut recongneu l'ordonnance de l'armée que les Romains luy enuoyoient au deuant; Ie ne sçay, dit-il, quels barbares sont ceux-cy (car les Grecs appelloyent ainsi toutes les nations estrangeres) mais la disposition de cette armée que ie voy, n'est aucunement barbare. Autant en dirent les Grecs de celle que Flaminius fit passer en leur païs: et Philippus voyant d'vn tertre, l'ordre et distribution du camp Romain, en son Royaume, sous Publius Sulpicius Galba. Voilà comment il se faut garder de s'attacher aux opinions vulgaires, et les faut iuger par la voye de la raison, non par la voix commune.	WHEN King Pyrrhus crossed into Italy, after he had surveyed the formation of the army the Romans were sending to meet him, "I do not know," he said, "what barbarians these are" (for the Greeks called all foreign nations so), "but the disposition of this army that I see is not in the least barbarous." The Greeks said as much of the army that Flamininus brought into their country; and so did Philip, when he saw from a hillock the order and layout of the Roman camp in his kingdom under Publius Sulpicius Galba. That shows how we must beware of clinging to common opinions, and must judge them by the way of reason, not by popular report.[1]
1.31.2	I'ay eu long temps auec moy vn homme qui auoit demeuré dix ou douze ans en cet autre monde, qui a esté descouuert en nostre siecle, en l'endroit où Vilegaignon print terre, qu'il surnomma la France Antartique. Cette descouuerte d'vn païs infiny, semble de grande consideration. Ie ne sçay si ie me puis respondre, qu'il ne s'en face à l'aduenir quelqu'autre, tant de personnages plus grands que nous ayans esté trompez en cette-cy. I'ay peur que nous ayons les yeux plus grands que le ventre, et plus de curiosité, que nous n'auons de capacité. Nous embrassons tout, mais nous n'estreignons que du vent.	For a long time I had with me a man who had lived ten or twelve years in that other world which has been discovered in our century, in the place where Villegaignon landed and which he named Antarctic France. This discovery of a boundless country seems a matter of great consequence. I do not know whether I can vouch that some other will not be made in the future, since so many greater men than we were mistaken about this one. I fear that our eyes are bigger than our stomachs, and that we have more curiosity than capacity. We embrace everything, but we clasp nothing but wind.[2]

Il est bien vray-semblable, que cet extreme rauage d'eau ait faict des changemens estranges aux habitations de la terre: comme on tient que la mer a retranché la Sicile d'auec l'Italie: Hæc loca vi quondam, et vasta conuulsa ruina Dissiluisse ferunt, cùm protinus vtraque tellus Vna foret; Chypre d'auec la Surie; l'Isle de Negrepont, de la terre ferme de la Bœoce: et ioint ailleurs les terres qui estoient diuisées, comblant de limon et de sable les fosses d'entre-deux.

Sterilisque diu palus aptáque remis / Vicinas vrbes alit, et graue sentit aratrum. Mais il n'y a pas grande apparence, que cette Isle soit ce monde nouueau, que nous venons de descouurir: car elle touchoit quasi l'Espaigne, et ce seroit vn effect incroyable d'inundation, de l'en auoir reculée comme elle est, de plus de douze cens lieuës. Africa as far as Egypt and the breadth of Europe as far as Tuscany, undertook to stride over into Asia and subjugate all the nations bordering the Mediterranean as far as the gulf of the Black Sea. To that end they crossed the Spains, Gaul and Italy, as far as Greece, where the Athenians held them off; but some time later the Athenians, and they, and their island were swallowed up by the Flood.[3]

It is very likely that this extreme devastation by water made strange changes in the inhabited parts of the earth, as it is held that the sea cut off Sicily from Italy—These lands, they say, once torn apart by force and vast upheaval,
Sprang asunder, when before the two countries
Had been one—Cyprus from Syria, and the island of Negropont from the mainland of Boeotia; and that elsewhere it joined lands that were divided, filling the channels between them with mud and sand:[4]

And the marsh, long barren and fit for oars, / Feeds the neighboring towns and feels the heavy plow. But there is little likelihood that this island is the new world we have just discovered. For it almost touched Spain, and it would be an incredible effect of a flood to have pushed it back as far as it is now, more than twelve hundred leagues. Besides, the voyages of the moderns have already all but established that it is not an island but mainland, continuous with the East Indies on one side and with the lands under the two poles on the other; or if it is separated from them, it is by so small a strait and gap that it does not deserve to be called an island on that account.[5]

It seems that there are movements in these great bodies, as in ours, some natural, others feverish. When I consider the inroads that my river, the Dordogne, has made in my lifetime on the right bank as it flows down, and how in twenty years it has gained so much ground and undermined the foundations of several buildings, I can see that this is an extraordinary disturbance: for if it had always gone at this rate, or were to go on so in future, the face of the world would be turned upside down. But rivers are subject to changes. Sometimes they spread to one side, sometimes to another, sometimes they keep within their banks. I am not speaking of sudden floods, whose causes we can account for.

En Medoc, le long de la mer, mon frere Sieur d'Arsac, voit vne sienne terre, enseuelie soubs les sables, que la mer vomit deuant elle: le feste d'aucuns bastimens paroist encore: ses rentes et domaines se sont eschangez en pasquages bien maigres. Les habitans disent que depuis quelque temps, la mer se pousse si fort vers eux, qu'ils ont perdu quatre lieuës de terre. Ces sables sont ses fourriers. Et voyons de grandes montioies d'arenes mouuantes, qui marchent vne demie lieuë deuant elle, et gaignent païs.

In Médoc, along the sea, my brother the Sieur d'Arsac sees one of his estates buried under the sands that the sea spews out before it; the tops of some buildings still show; his rents and lands have turned into very thin pasture. The inhabitants say that for some time now the sea has been pushing toward them so hard that they have lost four leagues of land. These sands are its advance guard. And we see great dunes of shifting sand marching half a league ahead of it and gaining ground.[6]

1.31.5 L'autre tesmoignage de l'antiquité, auquel on veut rapporter cette descouuerte, est dans Aristote, au moins si ce petit liuret des merueilles inouyes est à luy. Il raconte là, que certains Carthaginois s'estants iettez au trauers de la mer Atlantique, hors le destroit de Gibaltar, et nauigé long temps, auoient descouuert en fin vne grande isle fertile, toute reuestuë de bois, et arrousée de grandes et profondes riuieres, fort esloignée de toutes terres fermes: et qu'eux, et autres depuis, attirez par la bonté et fertilité du terroir, s'y en allerent auec leurs femmes et enfans, et commencerent à s'y habituer.

The other testimony from antiquity to which people try to relate this discovery is in Aristotle—at least if that little book of unheard-of marvels is his. He tells there that certain Carthaginians set out across the Atlantic Ocean beyond the Strait of Gibraltar and, after sailing a long time, at last discovered a great fertile island, all clothed in forest and watered by great deep rivers, very far from any mainland; and that they, and others after them, drawn by the goodness and fertility of the soil, went there with their wives and children and began to settle.[7]

Les Seigneurs de Carthage, voyans que leur pays se dépeuploit peu à peu, firent deffence expresse sur peine de mort, que nul n'eust plus à aller là, et en chasserent ces nouueaux habitans, craignants, à ce qu'on dit, que par succession de temps ils ne vinsent à multiplier tellement qu'ils les supplantassent eux mesmes, et ruinassent leur estat. Cette narration d'Aristote n'a non plus d'accord auec nos terres neufues.

The lords of Carthage, seeing their country being gradually depopulated, expressly forbade anyone, on pain of death, to go there any more, and drove out these new inhabitants, fearing, it is said, that in course of time they might multiply so much that they would supplant the Carthaginians themselves and ruin their state. This account of Aristotle's agrees no better with our new lands.

Ainsi ie me contente de cette information, sans m'enquerir de ce que les Cosmographes en disent. Il nous faudroit des topographes, qui nous fissent narration particuliere des endroits où ils ont esté. Mais pour auoir cet auantage sur nous, d'auoir veu la Palestine, ils veulent iouïr du priuilege de nous conter nouuelles de tout le demeurant du monde. Ie voudroye que chacun escriuist ce qu'il sçait, et autant qu'il en sçait: non en cela seulement, mais en tous autres subiects.

never present things to you pure; they bend and mask them according to the face they saw them wear; and to give credit to their judgment and win you over to it, they are glad to add to the matter on that side, stretching and amplifying it. We need either a very honest man, or one so simple that he has not the wherewithal to build up false inventions and make them plausible, and who is wedded to nothing.

Mine was such a man; and besides, he brought me on various occasions several sailors and merchants he had known on that voyage. So I am content with this information, without inquiring what the cosmographers say about it. We would need topographers, to give us detailed accounts of the places where they have been. But because they have this advantage over us, of having seen Palestine, they want to enjoy the privilege of telling us news of all the rest of the world. I would like everyone to write what he knows, and as much as he knows of it—not in this matter only, but in all other subjects.

For a man may have some particular knowledge or experience of the nature of a river or a spring who otherwise knows only what everyone knows; yet to get this little scrap into circulation he will undertake to write the whole science of nature. From this vice spring many great drawbacks.

BARBAROUS AND WILD

Each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice; these peoples live close to nature.

1.31.7 Or ie trouue, pour reuenir à mon propos, qu'il n'y a rien de barbare et de sauuage en cette nation, à ce qu'on m'en a rapporté: sinon que chacun appelle barbarie, ce qui n'est pas de son vsage. Now, to return to my subject, I find that there is nothing barbarous and wild in this nation, from what I have been told of it, except that each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice. For indeed we have no other test of truth and reason than the example and pattern of the opinions and customs of the country we live in. There, always, is the perfect religion, the perfect government, the perfect and accomplished practice in all things.

Et si pourtant la saueur mesme et delicatesse se trouue à nostre goust mesme excellente à l'enui des nostres, en diuers fruits de ces contrées là, sans culture: ce n'est pas raison que l'art gaigne le poinct d'honneur sur nostre grande et puissante mere nature.

Nous auons tant rechargé la beauté et richesse de ses ouurages par noz inuentions, que nous l'auons du tout estouffée. Si est-ce que par tout où sa pureté reluit, elle fait vne merueilleuse honte à noz vaines et friuoles entreprinses. Et veniunt hederæ sponte sua melius, wild. In the former, the true, most useful and natural virtues and properties are alive and vigorous; in the latter we have debased them, adapting them to the pleasure of our corrupted taste. And yet in various uncultivated fruits of those countries the flavor and delicacy are found excellent even to our own taste, rivaling ours. It is not reasonable that art should win the point of honor over our great and powerful mother nature.

Mais c'est en telle pureté, qu'il me prend quelque fois desplaisir, dequoy la cognoissance n'en soit venuë plustost, du temps qu'il y auoit des hommes qui en eussent sçeu mieux iuger que nous.

Ils n'ont peu imaginer vne naifueté si pure et simple, comme nous la voyons par experience: ny n'ont peu croire que nostre societé se peust maintenir auec si peu d'artifice, et de soudeure humaine.

We have so overloaded the beauty and richness of her works with our inventions that we have smothered her entirely. Yet wherever her purity shines forth, she puts our vain and frivolous enterprises wonderfully to shame. And ivy comes better of its own accord,
And the arbutus grows lovelier in lonely caves,
And birds sing more sweetly with no art. All our efforts cannot even manage to reproduce the nest of the tiniest little bird, its structure, its beauty and its fitness for use—nor even the web of the puny spider. All things, says Plato, are produced either by nature, by fortune, or by art:[8] the greatest and most beautiful by one or the other of the first two, the lesser and imperfect ones by the last.

These nations, then, seem to me barbarous in this sense: that they have received very little fashioning from the human mind and are still very close to their original naturalness. The laws of nature still govern them, very little debased by ours. But they are in such purity that I am sometimes sorry that knowledge of them did not come earlier, in the days when there were men who could have judged them better than we.

I am sorry that Lycurgus and Plato did not have it; for it seems to me that what we see by experience in those nations surpasses not only all the pictures with which poetry has embellished the golden age, and all its inventions in imagining a happy state of mankind, but even the conception and the very desire of philosophy. They could not imagine a naturalness so pure and simple as we see by experience; nor could they believe that our society could be maintained with so little artifice and human solder.

This is a nation, I would say to Plato, in which there is no kind of trade; no knowledge of letters;

These are the ways nature first ordained. For the rest, they live in a very pleasant and temperate stretch of country, so that, from what my witnesses have told me, it is rare to see a sick man there; and they have assured me that they never saw one there trembling, blear-eyed, toothless or bent with age. They are settled along the sea, and shut in on the landward side by great high mountains, with a stretch of about a hundred leagues in breadth between the two. They have a great abundance of fish and meat that bear no resemblance to ours, and they eat them with no other artifice than cooking.[9]

The first man who brought a horse there, though he had dealt with them on several other voyages, so horrified them, mounted as he was, that they shot him dead with arrows before they could recognize him. Their buildings are very long and can hold two or three hundred souls. They are covered with the bark of great trees, fixed in the ground at one end, and supporting and leaning on one another at the ridge, in the manner of some of our barns, whose roofs hang down to the ground and serve as sides. They have wood so hard that they cut with it and make their swords of it, and grills to cook their food.

Their beds are of woven cotton, hung from the roof like those in our ships, each person having his own: for the wives sleep apart from their husbands. They rise with the sun and eat immediately after rising, for the whole day, for they have no other meal than that one. They do not drink at that meal—like certain other peoples of the East, of whom Suidas says that they drank apart from eating—but they drink several times a day, and a great deal. Their drink is made from some root, and is the color of our light red wines. They drink it only lukewarm.[10]

This drink keeps only two or three days; it tastes a little sharp, is not at all heady, is good for the stomach, and is laxative for those not used to it; it is a very pleasant drink for anyone accustomed to it. Instead of bread they use a certain white substance like candied coriander. I have tasted it; the taste is sweet and a little flat. The whole day is spent dancing. The younger men go hunting animals with bows. Some of the women meanwhile busy themselves warming their drink, which is their chief duty.

One of the old men, in the morning before they begin to eat, preaches to the whole barnful together, walking from one end to the other and repeating the same phrase several times until he has completed the round (for these buildings are a good hundred paces long). He recommends only two things to them: valor against their enemies and love for their wives. And they never fail to point out this obligation, by way of refrain: that it is the wives who keep their drink warm and seasoned for them.

In several places, and among others in my house, one can see what their beds are like, and their ropes, their swords, and the wooden bracelets with which they cover their wrists in battle, and the great canes, open at one end, by whose sound they keep time in their dance. They are shaved all over, and remove their hair much more cleanly than we do, with no other razor than one of wood or stone. They believe that souls are eternal, and that those that have deserved well of the gods are lodged in the part of the sky where the sun rises, and the accursed ones in the west.

They have some sort of priests and prophets, who very rarely appear before the people, since they live in the mountains. On their arrival there is a great feast and solemn assembly of several villages (each barn, as I have described it, makes a village, and they are about a French league from one another). This prophet speaks to them in public, exhorting them to virtue and to their duty; but all their ethical science contains only these two articles: resoluteness in war and affection for their wives.

He foretells to them things to come and the outcome they are to expect from their undertakings; he steers them toward war or away from it. But this is on condition that if he fails to divine correctly, and if things turn out otherwise than he predicted, he is hacked into a thousand pieces if they catch him, and condemned as a false prophet. For that reason, one who has been wrong once is never seen again. Divination is a gift of God; that is why abusing it ought to be a punishable imposture. Among the Scythians, when the soothsayers had missed the mark, they were laid, shackled hand and foot, on carts full of heather drawn by oxen, and burned in them.

Those who handle matters subject to the guidance of human ability are excusable for doing what they can. But those others, who come to us deceiving us with assurances of an extraordinary faculty beyond our knowledge—should they not be punished for failing to make good their promise, and for the rashness of their imposture?

WAR AND THE EATING OF PRISONERS

1.31.11 Ils ont leurs guerres contre les nations, qui sont au delà de leurs montaignes, plus auant en la terre ferme, ausquelles ils vont tous nuds, n'ayants autres armes que des arcs ou des espées de bois, appointées par vn bout, à la mode des langues de noz espieuz. C'est chose esmerueillable que de la fermeté de leurs combats, qui ne finissent iamais que par meurtre et effusion de sang: car de routes et d'effroy, ils ne sçauent que c'est. Chacun rapporte pour son trophée la teste de l'ennemy qu'il a tué, et l'attache à l'entrée de son logis.

Apres auoir long temps bien traité leurs prisonniers, et de toutes les commoditez, dont ils se peuuent aduiser, celuy qui en est le maistre, faict vne grande assemblée de ses cognoissans. Il attache une corde à l'vn des bras du prisonnier, par le bout de laquelle il le tient, esloigné de quelques pas, de peur d'en estre offencé, et donne au plus cher de ses amis, l'autre bras à tenir de mesme; et eux deux en presence de toute l'assemblée l'assomment à coups d'espée. Cela faict ils le rostissent, et en mangent en commun, et en enuoyent des loppins à ceux de leurs amis, qui sont absens.

They wage wars against the nations beyond their mountains, further inland. They go to these wars quite naked, with no other weapons than bows or wooden swords sharpened at one end, like the tips of our boar-spears. The steadfastness of their battles is a marvel: they never end except in slaughter and bloodshed, for they do not know what routs and panic are. Each man brings back as his trophy the head of the enemy he has killed, and fixes it at the entrance of his dwelling.

After treating their prisoners well for a long time, with every comfort they can think of, the man who owns a prisoner calls a great gathering of his acquaintances. He ties a rope to one of the prisoner's arms and holds him by the end of it, a few paces away, for fear of being hurt by him. He gives his dearest friend the other arm to hold in the same way, and the two of them, in the presence of the whole gathering, beat him to death with their swords. That done, they roast him and eat him together, and send portions to those of their friends who are absent.

Ce n'est pas comme on pense, pour s'en nourrir, ainsi que faisoient anciennement les Scythes, c'est pour representer vne extreme vengeance. Et qu'il soit ainsin, ayans apperceu que les Portugais, qui s'estoient r'alliez à leurs aduersaires, vsoient d'vne autre sorte de mort contre eux, quand ils les prenoient; qui estoit, de les enterrer iusques à la ceinture, et tirer au demeurant du corps force coups de traict, et les pendre apres: ils penserent que ces gens icy de l'autre monde (comme ceux qui auoient semé la cognoissance de beaucoup de vices parmy leur voisinage, et qui estoient beaucoup plus grands maistres qu'eux en toute sorte de malice) ne prenoient pas sans occasion cette sorte de vengeance, et qu'elle deuoit estre plus aigre que la leur, dont ils commencerent de quitter leur façon ancienne, pour suiure cette-cy.

This is not, as people think, to feed themselves on him, as the Scythians did in ancient times; it is to signify an extreme revenge. And here is the proof. They noticed that the Portuguese, who had joined forces with their enemies, used another kind of death against them when they captured them: they buried them up to the waist, shot the rest of the body full of arrows, and then hanged them. They concluded that these people from the other world, being men who had spread the knowledge of many vices among their neighbors and were far greater masters than they of every kind of wickedness, did not take this kind of revenge without good reason, and that it must be more painful than their own. So they began to abandon their old way and follow this one.

Ie ne suis pas marry que nous remerquons l'horreur barbaresque qu'il y a en vne telle action, mais ouy bien dequoy iugeans à point de leurs fautes, nous soyons si aueuglez aux nostres. Ie pense qu'il y a plus de barbarie à manger vn homme viuant, qu'à le manger mort, à deschirer par tourmens et par gehennes, vn corps encore plein de sentiment, le faire rostir par le menu, le faire mordre et meurtrir aux chiens, et aux pourceaux (comme nous l'auons non seulement leu, mais veu de fresche memoire, non entre des ennemis anciens, mais entre des voisins et concitoyens, et qui pis est, sous pretexte de pieté et de religion) que de le rostir et manger apres qu'il est trespassé.

I am not sorry that we note the barbarous horror of such an act; what I am sorry about is that, while judging their faults rightly, we are so blind to our own. I think there is more barbarism in eating a man alive than in eating him dead; in tearing apart by tortures and the rack a body still full of feeling, roasting it bit by bit, having it bitten and mangled by dogs and swine (as we have not only read but seen within fresh memory, not among ancient enemies but among neighbors and fellow citizens, and what is worse, on the pretext of piety and religion), than in roasting and eating him after he is dead.[11]

1.31.12 Chrysippus et Zenon chefs de la secte Stoicque, ont bien pensé qu'il n'y auoit aucun mal de se seruir de nostre charoigne, à quoy que ce fust, pour nostre besoin, et d'en tirer de la nourriture: comme nos ancestres estans assiegez par Cæsar en la ville d'Alexia, se resolurent de soustenir la faim de ce siege par les corps des vieillars, des femmes, et autres personnes inutiles au combat. Vascones, fama est, alimentis talibus vsi / Produxere animas. Et les medecins ne craignent pas de s'en seruir à toute sorte d'vsage, pour nostre santé; soit pour l'appliquer au dedans, ou au dehors.

Chrysippus and Zeno, heads of the Stoic school, did indeed think there was no harm in using our carcass for whatever we needed, and in drawing nourishment from it; just as our ancestors, besieged by Caesar in the town of Alesia, resolved to bear the hunger of that siege by means of the bodies of the old men, the women and other persons useless for fighting. The Vascones, so the story goes, by using such food / Prolonged their lives. And physicians do not shrink from using it in every sort of way for our health, whether applied internally or externally.[12]

Mais il ne se trouua iamais aucune opinion si desreglée, qui excusast la trahison, la desloyauté, la tyrannie, la cruauté, qui sont noz fautes ordinaires. Nous les pouuons donc bien appeller barbares, eu esgard aux regles de la raison, mais non pas eu esgard à nous, qui les surpassons en toute sorte de barbarie.

1.31.13 Leur guerre est toute noble et genereuse, et a autant d'excuse et de beauté que cette maladie humaine en peut receuoir: elle n'a autre fondement parmy eux, que la seule ialousie de la vertu. Ils ne sont pas en debat de la conqueste de nouuelles terres: car ils iouyssent encore de cette vberté naturelle, qui les fournit sans trauail et sans peine, de toutes choses necessaires, en telle abondance, qu'ils n'ont que faire d'agrandir leurs limites. Ils sont encore en cet heureux point, de ne desirer qu'autant que leurs necessitez naturelles leur ordonnent: tout ce qui est au delà, est superflu pour eux.

Ils s'entr'appellent generallement ceux de mesme aage freres: enfans, ceux qui sont au dessouz; et les vieillards sont peres à tous les autres. Ceux-cy laissent à leurs heritiers en commun, cette pleine possession de biens par indiuis, sans autre titre, que celuy tout pur, que nature donne à ses creatures, les produisant au monde.

Si leurs voisins passent les montaignes pour les venir assaillir, et qu'ils emportent la victoire sur eux, l'acquest du victorieux, c'est la gloire, et l'auantage d'estre demeuré maistre en valeur et en vertu: car autrement ils n'ont que faire des biens des vaincus, et s'en retournent à leurs pays, où ils n'ont faute d'aucune chose necessaire; ny faute encore de cette grande partie, de sçauoir heureusement iouir de leur condition, et s'en contenter. Autant en font ceux-cy à leur tour. Ils ne demandent à leurs prisonniers, autre rançon que la confession et recognoissance d'estre vaincus.

Mais il ne s'en trouue pas vn en tout vn siecle, qui n'ayme mieux la mort, que de relascher, ny par contenance, ny de parole, vn seul point d'vne grandeur de courage inuincible. Il ne s'en void aucun, qui n'ayme mieux estre tué et mangé, que de requerir seulement de ne l'estre pas. Ils les traictent en toute liberté, afin que la vie leur soit d'autant plus chere: et les entretiennent communément des menasses de leur mort future, des tourmens qu'ils y auront à souffrir, des apprests qu'on dresse pour cet effect, du detranchement de leurs membres, et du festin qui se fera à leurs despens.

which are our ordinary faults. So we may well call them barbarous with regard to the rules of reason, but not with regard to ourselves, who surpass them in every kind of barbarism.

Their warfare is wholly noble and generous, and has as much excuse and beauty as this human disease can admit of. Among them it has no other basis than the mere jealous rivalry of valor. They are not quarreling over the conquest of new lands, for they still enjoy that natural abundance which supplies them, without toil and without trouble, with all necessary things in such plenty that they have no need to enlarge their borders. They are still at that happy stage of desiring only as much as their natural needs require; everything beyond that is superfluous to them.

Those of the same age generally call one another brothers; those younger they call children; and the old men are fathers to all the rest. These leave to their heirs in common this full possession of goods, held undivided, with no other title than the pure and simple one that nature gives to her creatures in bringing them into the world.

If their neighbors cross the mountains to attack them and win the victory over them, the victor's gain is glory, and the advantage of having proved the master in valor and virtue. Beyond that they have no use for the goods of the vanquished, and they go back to their own country, where they lack nothing necessary; nor do they lack that great thing, knowing how to enjoy their condition happily and be content with it. These do the same in their turn. They ask no other ransom of their prisoners than the confession and acknowledgment that they are beaten.

But in a whole century not one prisoner is to be found who would not rather die than yield a single jot of an invincible greatness of courage, by look or by word. Not one is seen who would not rather be killed and eaten than so much as ask not to be. They treat them with complete freedom, so that life may be all the dearer to them; and they commonly entertain them with threats of their coming death, of the torments they will have to suffer, of the preparations being made for it, of the cutting up of their limbs, and of the feast that will be held at their expense.

Tout cela se faict pour cette seule fin, d'arracher de leur bouche quelque parole molle ou rabaissée, ou de leur donner enuie de s'en fuyr; pour gaigner cet auantage de les auoir espouuantez, et d'auoir faict force à leur constance. Car aussi à le bien prendre, c'est en ce seul point que consiste la vraye victoire: victoria nulla est, / Quàm quæ confessos animo quoque subiugat hostes. Les Hongres tres-belliqueux combattants, ne poursuiuoient iadis leur pointe outre auoir rendu l'ennemy à leur mercy. Car en ayant arraché cette confession, ils le laissoyent aller sans offense, sans rançon; sauf pour le plus d'en tirer parole de ne s'armer des lors en auant contre eux.

1.31.14 Assez d'auantages gaignons nous sur nos ennemis, qui sont auantages empruntez, non pas nostres. C'est la qualité d'vn porte-faix, non de la vertu, d'auoir les bras et les iambes plus roides: c'est vne qualité morte et corporelle, que la disposition: c'est vn coup de la fortune, de faire broncher nostre ennemy, et de luy esblouyr les yeux par la lumiere du Soleil: c'est vn tour d'art et de science, et qui peut tomber en vne personne lasche et de neant, d'estre suffisant à l'escrime.

L'estimation et le prix d'vn homme consiste au cœur et en la volonté: c'est là où gist son vray honneur: la vaillance c'est la fermeté, non pas des iambes et des bras, mais du courage et de l'ame: elle ne consiste pas en la valeur de nostre cheual, ny de noz armes, mais en la nostre. Celuy qui tombe obstiné en son courage, si succiderit, de genu pugnat. Qui pour quelque danger de la mort voisine, ne relasche aucun point de son asseurance, qui regarde encores en rendant l'ame, son ennemy d'vne veuë ferme et desdaigneuse, il est battu, non pas de nous, mais de la fortune: il est tué, non pas vaincu: les plus vaillans sont par fois les plus infortunez.

Aussi y a-il des pertes triomphantes à l'enui des victoires. Ny ces quatre victoires sœurs, les plus belles que le Soleil aye onques veu de ses yeux, de Salamine, de Platées, de Mycale, de Sicile, n'oserent onques opposer toute leur gloire ensemble, à la gloire de la desconfiture du Roy Leonidas et des siens au pas de Thermopyles, Qui courut iamais d'vne plus glorieuse enuie, et plus ambitieuse au gain du combat, que le Capitaine Ischolas à la perte? All this is done for the sole purpose of wringing from their mouths some weak or abject word, or of making them want to run away, so as to gain the advantage of having frightened them and broken their constancy. For indeed, rightly considered, true victory consists in this alone: there is no victory / But that which subdues enemies who confess themselves beaten in their hearts as well. The Hungarians, most warlike fighters, did not in former times press their advantage beyond having brought the enemy to their mercy. Having wrung this confession from him, they let him go unharmed and without ransom, except at most for getting his word not to take up arms against them from then on.[13]

Many of the advantages we gain over our enemies are borrowed advantages, not our own. It is the quality of a porter, not of valor, to have stronger arms and legs; agility is a dead, bodily quality; it is a stroke of fortune to make our enemy stumble, or to dazzle his eyes with the light of the sun; and being good at fencing is a matter of skill and technique, which may fall to a cowardly and worthless person.

A man's worth and value lie in his heart and his will; that is where his true honor resides. Valor is firmness, not of legs and arms, but of courage and soul; it lies not in the worth of our horse or of our weapons, but in our own. He who falls with his courage unyielding, if he has fallen, fights on his knees. He who does not slacken his assurance in the least for any danger of imminent death; who, as he gives up the ghost, still looks at his enemy with a firm and scornful gaze—he is beaten not by us but by fortune; he is killed, not conquered. The most valiant are sometimes the most unfortunate.[14]

So there are also defeats that are as triumphant as victories. Not even those four sister victories, the finest the sun ever beheld with its eyes—Salamis, Plataea, Mycale and Sicily—ever dared set all their combined glory against the glory of the defeat of King Leonidas and his men at the pass of Thermopylae. Who ever rushed with a more glorious and ambitious eagerness to win a battle than Captain plus ingenieusement et curieusement s'est asseuré de son salut, que luy de sa ruine?

Il estoit commis à deffendre certain passage du Peloponnese, contre les Arcadiens; pour quoy faire, se trouuant du tout incapable, veu la nature du lieu, et inegalité des forces: et se resoluant que tout ce qui se presenteroit aux ennemis, auroit de necessité à y demeurer: d'autre part, estimant indigne et de sa propre vertu et magnanimité, et du nom Lacedemonien, de faillir à sa charge: il print entre ces deux extremités, vn moyen party, de telle sorte: Les plus ieunes et dispos de sa troupe, il les conserua à la tuition et seruice de leur païs, et les y renuoya: et auec ceux desquels le defaut estoit moindre, il delibera de soustenir ce pas: et par leur mort en faire achetter aux ennemis l'entrée la plus chere, qu'il luy seroit possible: comme il aduint.

Car estant tantost enuironné de toutes parts par les Arcadiens: apres en auoir faict vne grande boucherie, luy et les siens furent tous mis au fil de l'espée. Est-il quelque trophée assigné pour les veincueurs, qui ne soit mieux deu à ces veincus? Le vray veincre a pour son roolle l'estour, non pas le salut: et consiste l'honneur de la vertu, à combattre, non à battre.

1.31.15 Pour reuenir à nostre histoire, il s'en faut tant que ces prisonniers se rendent, pour tout ce qu'on leur fait, qu'au rebours pendant ces deux ou trois mois qu'on les garde, ils portent vne contenance gaye, ils pressent leurs maistres de se haster de les mettre en cette espreuue, ils les deffient, les iniurient, leur reprochent leur lascheté, et le nombre des battailles perduës contre les leurs.

I'ay vne chanson faicte par vn prisonnier, où il y a ce traict: Qu'ils viennent hardiment trétous, et s'assemblent pour disner de luy, car ils mangeront quant et quant leurs peres et leurs ayeulx, qui ont seruy d'aliment et de nourriture à son corps: ces muscles, dit-il, cette chair et ces veines, ce sont les vostres, pauure fols que vous estes: vous ne recognoissez pas que la substance des membres de vos ancestres s'y tient encore: sauourez les bien, vous y trouuerez le goust de vostre propre chair: inuention, qui ne sent aucunement la barbarie.

Ischolas to lose one? Who has ever secured his own safety more ingeniously and carefully than he secured his ruin?[15]

He had been charged with defending a certain pass in the Peloponnese against the Arcadians. He found himself wholly unable to do so, given the nature of the place and the inequality of the forces, and concluded that whoever faced the enemy there must of necessity stay there for good. On the other hand, he judged it unworthy both of his own valor and magnanimity and of the Spartan name to fail in his charge. Between these two extremes he took a middle course, as follows. The youngest and fittest of his troop he preserved for the protection and service of their country, and sent them back home; and with those whose loss would matter less, he resolved to hold the pass, and by their death to make the enemy pay as dearly as he possibly could for getting through. And so it turned out.[16]

For soon he was surrounded on all sides by the Arcadians, and after making a great slaughter of them, he and his men were all put to the sword. Is there any trophy assigned to the victors that is not more due to these vanquished? True victory has for its part the fight, not survival; and the honor of valor lies in fighting, not in beating.

To return to our story: these prisoners are so far from giving in, whatever is done to them, that on the contrary, during the two or three months they are kept, they bear a cheerful countenance. They urge their masters to hurry up and put them to the test; they defy them, insult them, reproach them with their cowardice and with the number of battles they have lost against their own people.

I have a song composed by a prisoner which contains this point: let them all come boldly and gather to dine on him, for at the same time they will be eating their own fathers and grandfathers, who have served as food and nourishment for his body. These muscles, he says, this flesh and these veins are yours, poor fools that you are; you do not recognize that the substance of your ancestors' limbs is still in them. Savor them well: you will Ceux qui les peignent mourans, et qui representent cette action quand on les assomme, ils peignent le prisonnier, crachant au visage de ceux qui le tuent, et leur faisant la mouë. De vray ils ne cessent iusques au dernier souspir, de les brauer et deffier de parole et de contenance. Sans mentir, au prix de nous, voila des hommes bien sauuages: car ou il faut qu'ils le soyent bien à bon escient, ou que nous le soyons: il y a vne merueilleuse distance entre leur forme et la nostre.

1.31.16 Les hommes y ont plusieurs femmes, et en ont d'autant plus grand nombre, qu'ils sont en meilleure reputation de vaillance. C'est vne beauté remarquable en leurs mariages, que la mesme ialousie que nos femmes ont pour nous empescher de l'amitié et bien-vueillance d'autres femmes, les leurs l'ont toute pareille pour la leur acquerir. Estans plus soigneuses de l'honneur de leurs maris, que de toute autre chose, elles cherchent et mettent leur solicitude à auoir le plus de compaignes qu'elles peuuent, d'autant que c'est vn tesmoignage de la vertu du mary. Les nostres crieront au miracle: ce ne l'est pas. C'est vne vertu proprement matrimoniale: mais du plus haut estage.

Et en la Bible, Lea, Rachel, Sara et les femmes de Iacob fournirent leurs belles seruantes à leurs maris, et Liuia seconda les appetits d'Auguste, à son interest: et la femme du Roy Deiotarus Stratonique, presta non seulement à l'vsage de son mary, vne fort belle ieune fille de chambre, qui la seruoit, mais en nourrit soigneusement les enfants: et leur feit espaule à succeder aux estats de leur pere. Et afin qu'on ne pense point que tout cecy se face par vne simple et seruile obligation à leur vsance, et par l'impression de l'authorité de leur ancienne coustume, sans discours et sans iugement, et pour auoir l'ame si stupide, que de ne pouuoir prendre autre party, il faut alleguer quelques traits de leur suffisance.

Outre celuy que ie vien de reciter de l'vne de leurs chansons guerrieres, i'en ay vn' autre amoureuse, qui commence en ce sens: Couleuure arreste toy, arreste toy couleuure, afin que ma sœur tire sur le patron de ta peinture, la façon et l'ouurage d'vn riche cordon, que ie puisse donner à m'amie: ainsi soit en tout temps ta beauté et ta disposition preferée à tous les autres find in them the taste of your own flesh. A notion with no whiff of barbarism about it at all.

Those who paint them dying, and depict the moment when they are killed, paint the prisoner spitting in the faces of those who are killing him and pulling faces at them. Indeed, to their last breath they never stop braving and defying them by word and look. Truly, here are men who are very wild compared with us: for either they must be so in good earnest, or we must be; there is an amazing distance between their ways and ours.

The men there have several wives, and the higher their reputation for valor, the more they have. It is a remarkable beauty in their marriages that the same jealousy our wives have in keeping us from the friendship and goodwill of other women, theirs have in exactly the same measure in winning it for them. Being more concerned for their husbands' honor than for anything else, they strive and take pains to have as many companions as they can, since that is a testimony to the husband's valor. Our wives will cry miracle; it is no miracle. It is a properly matrimonial virtue, but of the highest order.

And in the Bible, Leah, Rachel, Sarah and the wives of Jacob provided their beautiful handmaids to their husbands; Livia seconded the appetites of Augustus, to her own detriment; and Stratonice, the wife of King Deiotarus, not only lent her husband for his use a very beautiful young chambermaid who served her, but carefully brought up the children and backed them in succeeding to their father's dominions. And lest anyone think that all this is done out of a simple and servile obligation to their usage, under the weight of the authority of their ancient custom, without reasoning and without judgment, because their minds are too dull to take any other course, I must cite some instances of their ability.[17]

Besides the passage I have just recounted from one of their war songs, I have another song, a love song, which begins in this sense: Adder, stay; stay, adder, so that from the pattern of your coloring my sister may take the design and workmanship of a rich cord that I may give to my love; and so may your beauty and your grace be preferred

1.31.17	Trois d'entre eux, ignorans combien couttera vn iour à leur repos, et à leur bon heur, la cognoissance des corruptions de deçà, et que de ce commerce naistra leur ruine, comme ie presuppose qu'elle soit des-ia auancée (bien miserables de s'estre laissez pipper au desir de la nouuelleté, et auoir quitté la douceur de leur ciel, pour venir voir le nostre) furent à Roüan, du temps que le feu Roy Charles neufiesme y estoit: le Roy parla à eux long temps, on leur fit voir nostre façon, nostre pompe, la forme d'vne belle ville: apres cela, quelqu'vn en demanda leur aduis, et voulut sçauoir d'eux, ce qu'ils y auoient trouué de plus admirable: ils respondirent trois choses, dont i'ay perdu la troisiesme, et en suis bien marry; mais i'en ay encore deux en memoire.	Three of them were at Rouen at the time when the late King Charles IX was there. They did not know how dearly their peace and happiness will one day pay for the knowledge of the corruptions on this side of the ocean, nor that from this contact will come their ruin, which I suppose is already well advanced. Most wretched they were, to let themselves be lured by the desire for novelty and to leave the sweetness of their own sky to come and see ours! The king talked with them for a long time; they were shown our ways, our pomp, the layout of a fine city. After that someone asked their opinion and wanted to know what they had found most remarkable. They replied with three things, of which I have forgotten the third, and I am very sorry about it; but I still remember two.[19]
	Ils dirent qu'ils trouuoient en premier lieu fort estrange, que tant de grands hommes portans barbe, forts et armez, qui estoient autour du Roy (il est vray-semblable qu'ils parloient des Suisses de sa garde) se soubmissent à obeir à vn enfant, et qu'on ne choisissoit plustost quelqu'vn d'entre eux pour commander.	They said that, in the first place, they found it very strange that so many tall, bearded men, strong and armed, who stood around the king (it is likely they meant the Swiss of his guard), should submit to obey a child, and that one of them was not chosen to command instead.
	Secondement (ils ont vne façon de leur langage telle qu'ils nomment les hommes, moitié les vns des autres) qu'ils auoyent apperceu qu'il y auoit parmy nous des hommes pleins et gorgez de toutes sortes de commoditez, et que leurs moitiez estoient mendians à leurs portes, décharnez de faim et de pauureté; et trouuoient estrange comme ces moitiez icy necessiteuses, pouuoient souffrir vne telle iniustice, qu'ils ne prinsent les autres à la gorge, ou missent le feu à leurs maisons.	Secondly (they have a way of speaking in their language whereby they call men halves of one another), they had noticed that among us there were men full and gorged with all sorts of good things, while their halves were begging at their doors, emaciated with hunger and poverty; and they found it strange that these needy halves could put up with such injustice, and did not take the others by the throat or set fire to their houses.
1.31.18	Ie parlay à l'vn d'eux fort long temps, mais i'auois vn truchement qui me suiuoit si mal, et qui estoit si	I talked with one of them for a very long time; but I had an interpreter who followed me so badly,

When I asked him what benefit he gained from his high rank among his people (for he was a captain, and our sailors called him king), he told me it was to march first in war. How many men followed him? He pointed to a stretch of ground, to signify as many as could fit into such a space; it might have been four or five thousand men. Did all his authority lapse when there was no war? He said that this much remained to him: when he visited the villages that depended on him, they cleared paths for him through the thickets of their woods, so that he could pass through quite comfortably.

All this is not too bad. But what of it? They don't wear breeches.

1.32.1 LE vray champ et subiect de l'imposture, sont les choses inconnües: d'autant qu'en premier lieu l'estrangeté mesme donne credit, et puis n'estants point subiectes à nos discours ordinaires, elles nous ostent le moyen de les combattre. A cette cause, dit Platon, est-il bien plus aisé de satisfaire, parlant de la nature des Dieux, que de la nature des hommes: par ce que l'ignorance des auditeurs preste vne belle et large carriere, et toute liberté, au maniement d'vne matiere cachee. Il aduient de là, qu'il n'est rien creu si fermement, que ce qu'on sçait le moins, ny gens si asseurez, que ceux qui nous content des fables, comme Alchymistes, Prognostiqueurs, Iudiciaires, Chiromantiens, Medecins, id genus omne.

THE true field and subject of imposture is things unknown. In the first place, strangeness itself lends them credit; and then, since they are not subject to our ordinary reasoning, they deprive us of the means of fighting them. For this reason, says Plato, it is much easier to satisfy people when speaking of the nature of the gods than of the nature of men, because the ignorance of the hearers lends a fine wide field and complete freedom to the handling of a hidden subject. Hence it comes about that nothing is so firmly believed as what is least known, and no people are so sure of themselves as those who tell us tall tales: alchemists, prognosticators, judicial astrologers, palm-readers, physicians, all that tribe.[1]

To these I would gladly add, if I dared, a crowd of people who are the regular interpreters and auditors of God's designs, who claim to find the causes of every event and to see in the secrets of the divine will the incomprehensible motives of his works. And though the variety and continual discord of events toss them from corner to corner and from East to West, they still keep chasing their ball, and paint white and black with the same crayon.

In one Indian nation there is this praiseworthy practice: when things go badly for them in some encounter or battle, they publicly ask pardon of the Sun, who is their god, as for an unjust act, attributing their good or bad fortune to divine reason and submitting their judgment and reasoning to it. It is enough for a Christian to believe that all things come from God, to receive them with acknowledgment of his divine and inscrutable wisdom, and therefore to take them in good part, in whatever guise they are sent to him. But I disapnostre religion par la prosperité de nos entreprises. Nostre creance a assez d'autres fondemens, sans l'authoriser par les euenemens.

Car le peuple accoustumé à ces argumens plausibles, et proprement de son goust, il est danger, quand les euenemens viennent à leur tour contraires et desauantageux, qu'il en esbranle sa foi. Comme aux guerres où nous sommes pour la Religion, ceux qui eurent l'auantage au rencontre de la Rochelabeille, faisans grand feste de cet accident, et se seruans de cette fortune, pour certaine approbation de leur party: quand ils viennent apres à excuser leurs defortunes de Mont-contour et de Iarnac, sur ce que ce sont verges et chastiemens paternels, s'ils n'ont vn peuple du tout à leur mercy, ils luy font assez aisément sentir que c'est prendre d'vn sac deux moultures, et de mesme bouche souffler le chaud et le froid.

Il vaudroit mieux l'entretenir des vrays fondemens de la verité. C'est une belle bataille nauale qui s'est gaignee ces mois passez contre les Turcs, sous la conduite de dom Ioan d'Austria: mais il a bien pleu à Dieu en faire autres fois voir d'autres telles à nos despens. Somme, il est malaisé de ramener les choses diuines à nostre balance, qu'elles n'y souffrent du deschet.

Et qui voudroit rendre raison de ce que Arrius et Leon son Pape, chefs principaux de cette heresie, moururent en diuers temps, de morts si pareilles et si estranges (car retirez de la dispute par douleur de ventre à la garderobe, tous deux y rendirent subitement l'ame) et exaggerer cette vengeance diuine par la circonstance du lieu, y pourroit bien encore adiouster la mort de Heliogabalus, qui fut aussi tué en vn retraict. Mais quoy? Irenee se trouue engagé en mesme fortune.

prove of what I see commonly done, seeking to strengthen and support our religion by the success of our enterprises. Our faith has enough other foundations without being vouched for by events.

For when the people have grown used to these plausible arguments, so much to their taste, there is a danger that their faith will be shaken when events in their turn prove contrary and unfavorable. So it is in the wars we are now fighting over religion. Those who had the advantage in the encounter at La Roche-l'Abeille made a great fuss about it and used that piece of fortune as a sure sign of approval for their party. When they later come to excuse their misfortunes at Moncontour and Jarnac as fatherly rods and chastisements, unless they have a people wholly at their mercy, they easily enough make them feel that this is getting two grindings out of one sack, and blowing hot and cold with the same mouth.[2]

It would be better to instruct them in the true foundations of the truth. It was a fine naval battle that was won these past months against the Turks under the command of Don John of Austria; but at other times it has pleased God to let us see others like it at our expense. In short, it is hard to bring divine things into our scales without their losing some weight.[3]

And anyone who wanted to explain why Arius and Leo, his Pope, the principal leaders of this heresy, died at different times such similar and strange deaths (for both, having left the debate with a stomach-ache to go to the privy, suddenly gave up the ghost there), and to magnify this divine vengeance by the circumstance of the place, might well add the death of Heliogabalus, who was also killed in a latrine. But what of it? Irenaeus turns out to have met the same fate.[4]

God, wishing to teach us that the good have something other to hope for, and the wicked something other to fear, than the fortunes and misfortunes of this world, handles and dispenses them according to his hidden disposition, and deprives us of the means of foolishly turning them to our profit. Those who try to take advantage of them by human reason are only making fools of themselves.

Saint Augustine gives a fine proof of this against his adversaries. It is a conflict decided by the weapons of memory more than by those of reason.
Il se faut contenter de la lumiere qu'il plaist au Soleil nous communiquer par ses rayons, et qui esleuera ses yeux pour en prendre vne plus grande dans son corps mesme, qu'il ne trouue pas estrange, si pour la peine de son outrecuidance il y perd la veuë. Quis hominum potest scire consilium Dei? aut quis poterit cogitare, quid velit Dominus?	We must be content with the light that it pleases the sun to share with us through its rays; and whoever raises his eyes to take in more of it from its very body, let him not think it strange if, as the penalty for his presumption, he loses his sight. Who among men can know the counsel of God? Or who can conceive what the Lord wills?[5]

I.33 Of Fleeing from Pleasures at the Cost of Life

De fuir les voluptez au pris de la vie
Ancients advised death over a life of worldly ties; Montaigne finds a Christian version in Saint Hilary's prayer for his daughter.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.33.1	I'AVOIS bien veu conuenir en cecy la pluspart des anciennes opinions: Qu'il est heure de mourir lorsqu'il y a plus de mal que de bien à viure: et que de conseruer nostre vie à nostre tourment et incommodité, c'est choquer les regles mesmes de nature, comme disent ces vieilles regles, Η ζην αλυπως, η θανειν ευδαιμονως. Καλον το θνησκειν οις ηυβριν το ζην φερει. Κρεισσον το μη ζην εστιν, η ζην αθλιως.	I HAD indeed seen most of the ancient opinions agree on this: that it is time to die when there is more ill than good in living, and that to preserve our life to our own torment and discomfort is to offend against the very rules of nature, as these old precepts say: Either a life without grief, or a happy death. Death is good for those to whom life brings disgrace. It is better not to live than to live in misery.[1]
	Mais de pousser le mespris de la mort iusques à tel degré, que de l'employer pour se distraire des honneurs, richesses, grandeurs, et autres faueurs et biens que nous appellons de la fortune; comme si la raison n'auoit pas assez affaire à nous persuader de les abandonner, sans y adiouster cette nouuelle recharge, ie ne l'auois veu ny commander, ny pratiquer:	But to push contempt for death so far as to use it to get away from honors, riches, high positions and the other favors and goods that we call the goods of fortune—as if reason did not have enough to do in persuading us to give them up, without adding this fresh burden—that I had never seen either prescribed or practiced, iusques lors que ce passage de Seneca me tomba entre mains, auquel conseillant à Lucilius, personnage puissant et de grande authorité autour de l'Empereur, de changer cette vie voluptueuse et pompeuse, et de se retirer de cette ambition du monde, à quelque vie solitaire, tranquille et philosophique: sur quoy Lucilius alleguoit quelques difficultez: Ie suis d'aduis, dit-il, que tu quites cette vie là, ou la vie tout à faict: bien te conseille-ie de suiure la plus douce voye, et de destacher plustost que de rompre ce que tu as mal noüé, pourueu que s'il ne se peut autrement destacher, tu le rompes.	until this passage of Seneca fell into my hands. He is advising Lucilius, a powerful man of great authority at the emperor's court, to change his life of pleasure and pomp and to withdraw from worldly ambition to some solitary, tranquil and philosophical life; and when Lucilius raised some difficulties, he says: My advice is that you leave that life, or life altogether. I do indeed advise you to take the gentler way, and to untie rather than break what you have badly knotted, provided that, if it cannot be untied any other way, you break it.[2]
	Il n'y a homme si coüard qui n'ayme mieux tomber vne fois, que de demeurer tousiours en bransle. I'eusse trouué ce conseil sortable à la rudesse Stoïque: mais il est plus estrange qu'il soit emprunté d'Epicurus, qui escrit à ce propos, choses toutes pareilles à Idomeneus. Si est-ce que ie pense auoir remarqué quelque traict semblable parmy nos gens, mais auec la moderation Chrestienne.	There is no man so cowardly that he would not rather fall once than stay forever teetering. I would have found this advice in keeping with Stoic harshness; but it is stranger that it is borrowed from Epicurus, who writes quite similar things on this subject to Idomeneus. Still, I think I have noticed something similar among our own people, but with Christian moderation.[3]

1.33.2 Sainct Hilaire Euesque de Poitiers, ce fameux ennemy de l'heresie Arrienne, estant en Syrie fut aduerty qu'Abra sa fille vnique, qu'il auoit laissee pardeça auec sa mere, estoit poursuyuie en mariage par les plus apparens Seigneurs du païs, comme fille tres-bien nourrie, belle, riche, et en la fleur de son aage: il luy escriuit, comme nous voyons, qu'elle ostast son affection de tous ces plaisirs et aduantages qu'on luy presentoit: qu'il luy auoit trouué en son voyage vn party bien plus grand et plus digne, d'vn mary de bien autre pouuoir et magnificence, qui luy feroit presens de robes et de ioyaux, de prix inestimable. Son dessein estoit de luy faire perdre l'appetit et l'vsage des plaisirs mondains, pour la ioindre toute à Dieu.

Saint Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, that famous enemy of the Arian heresy, was in Syria when he learned that Abra, his only daughter, whom he had left at home with her mother, was being sought in marriage by the most eminent lords of the land, as a girl very well brought up, beautiful, rich, and in the flower of her youth. He wrote to her (as we can still see) that she should withdraw her affection from all these pleasures and advantages that were being offered her; that on his journey he had found her a much greater and worthier match, a husband of far greater power and magnificence, who would give her presents of robes and jewels of inestimable value. His aim was to make her lose the appetite for worldly pleasures and the habit of them, so as to join her wholly to God.[4]

Mais à cela, le plus court et plus certain moyen luy semblant estre la mort de sa fille, il ne cessa par vœux, prieres, et oraisons, de faire requeste à Dieu de l'oster de ce monde, et de l'appeller à soy: comme il aduint: car bien-tost apres son retour, elle luy mourut, dequoy il montra vne singuliere ioye. Cettuy-cy semble encherir sur les autres, de ce qu'il s'adresse à ce moyen de prime face, lequel ils ne prennent que subsidiairement, et puis que c'est à l'endroit de sa fille vnique. Mais ie ne veux obmettre le bout de cette histoire, encore qu'il ne soit pas de mon propos.

But since the shortest and surest way to this seemed to him to be his daughter's death, he never ceased, by vows, prayers and supplications, to petition God to take her from this world and call her to himself; and so it happened, for soon after his return she died, at which he showed a singular joy. This man seems to outdo the others, in that he turns to this means at the very outset, whereas they take it only as a last resort, and in that it concerns his only daughter. But I will not leave out the end of this story, even though it is beside my purpose.

La femme de Sainct Hilaire ayant entendu par luy, comme la mort de leur fille s'estoit conduite par son dessein et volonté, et combien elle auoit plus d'heur d'estre deslogee de ce monde, que d'y estre, print vne si viue apprehension de la beatitude eternelle et celeste, qu'elle solicita son mary auec extreme instance, d'en faire autant pour elle. Et Dieu à leurs prieres communes, l'ayant retiree à soy, bien tost apres, ce fut vne mort embrassée auec singulier contentement commun.

Saint Hilary's wife, having learned from him how their daughter's death had come about through his design and will, and how much happier she was to have left this world than to be in it, conceived so lively a sense of eternal and heavenly bliss that she begged her husband with the utmost insistence to do the same for her. And when God, at their joint prayers, took her to himself soon afterwards, it was a death embraced with singular contentment on both sides.

I.34 Fortune Is Often Found in the Path of Reason

La fortune se rencontre souuent au train de la raison
Fortune sometimes acts with apparent justice and skill, punishing poisoners and curing the sick by chance.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.34.1	L'INCONSTANCE du bransle diuers de la fortune, fait qu'elle nous doiue presenter toute espece de visages.	THE inconstancy of fortune's shifting motion means that she is bound to show us every kind of face.
1.34.2	Y a il action de iustice plus expresse que celle cy? Le Duc de Valentinois ayant resolu d'empoisonner Adrian Cardinal de Cornete, chez qui le Pape Alexandre sixiesme son pere, et luy alloyent soupper au Vatican: enuoya deuant, quelque bouteille de vin empoisonné, et commanda au sommelier qu'il la gardast bien soigneusement: le Pape y estant arriué auant le fils, et ayant demandé à boire, ce sommelier, qui pensoit ce vin ne luy auoir esté recommandé que pour sa bonté, en seruit au Pape, et le Duc mesme y arriuant sur le point de la collation, et se fiant qu'on n'auroit pas touché à sa bouteille, en prit à son tour; en maniere que le Pere en mourut soudain, et le fils apres auoir esté longuement tourmenté de maladie, fut reserué à vn' autre pire fortune.	Is there any act of justice more express than this? The Duke of Valentinois had resolved to poison Adrian, Cardinal of Corneto, with whom he and his father, Pope Alexander VI, were going to dine at the Vatican. He sent ahead a bottle of poisoned wine and ordered the butler to guard it very carefully. The Pope arrived before his son and asked for a drink; the butler, who thought the wine had been entrusted to him only for its quality, served some of it to the Pope. And the Duke himself, arriving just at the time of the meal and trusting that no one would have touched his bottle, drank some in his turn. So the father died suddenly, and the son, after being tormented by illness for a long time, was kept for another, worse fortune.[1]
1.34.3	Quelquefois il semble à point nommé qu'elle se ioüe à nous. Le Seigneur d'Estree, lors guidon de Monsieur de Vandosme, et le Seigneur de Liques, Lieutenant de la compagnie du Duc d'Ascot, estans tous deux seruiteurs de la sœur du Sieur de Founguesselles, quoi que de diuers partis (comme il aduient aux voisins de la frontiere) le Sieur de Licques l'emporta: mais le mesme iour des nopces, et qui pis est, auant le coucher, le marié ayant enuie de rompre vn bois en faueur de sa nouuelle espouse, sortit à l'escarmouche pres de S.	Sometimes she seems to play tricks on us on purpose. The Seigneur d'Estrées, then standard-bearer to Monsieur de Vendôme, and the Seigneur de Licques, lieutenant of the Duke of Aerschot's company, were both suitors of the sister of the Sieur de Founguesselles, though they were of different parties (as happens with neighbors on the frontier). The Sieur de Licques won her; but on the very day of the wedding, and what is worse, before the wedding night, the bridegroom, wanting to break a lance in honor of his new bride, went out to skirmish near Saint-
	Omer, où le Sieur d'Estree se trouuant le plus fort, le feit son prisonnier: et pour faire valoir son aduantage, encore fallut-il que la Damoiselle, Coniugis antè coacta noui dimittere collum, Quàm veniens vna atque altera rursus hyems Noctibus in longis auidum saturasset amorem, luy fist elle mesme requeste par courtoisie de luy rendre son	Omer, where the Sieur d'Estrées, proving the stronger, took him prisoner. And to make the most of his advantage, the young lady, Forced to let go of her new husband's neck Before one winter, and then another, coming round Had sated her eager love in the long nights, had to

1.34.4	Semble-il pas que ce soit vn sort artiste? Constantin fils d'Helene fonda l'Empire de Constantinople: et tant de siecles apres Constantin fils d'Helene le finit. Quelquefois il luy plaist enuier sur nos miracles. Nous tenons que le Roy Clouis assiegeant Angoulesme, les murailles cheurent d'elles mesmes par faueur diuine. Et Bouchet emprunte de quelqu'autheur, que le Roy Robert assiegeant vne ville, et s'estant desrobé du siege, pour aller à Orleans solemnizer la feste Sainct Aignan, comme il estoit en deuotion, sur certain point de la Messe, les murailles de la ville assiegee, s'en allerent sans aucun effort en ruine.	Does it not seem like a fate with an artist's touch? Constantine, son of Helena, founded the Empire of Constantinople; and so many centuries later Constantine, son of Helena, brought it to an end. Sometimes she likes to outdo our miracles. We hold that when King Clovis was besieging Angoulême, the walls fell of their own accord by divine favor. And Bouchet takes from some author the story that King Robert, besieging a town, slipped away from the siege to go to Orléans to celebrate the feast of Saint Aignan; and while he was at his devotions, at a certain point in the Mass, the walls of the besieged town fell into ruin without any effort.[3]
	Elle fit tout à contrepoil en nos guerres de Milan: car le Capitaine Rense assiegeant pour nous la ville d'Eronne, et ayant faict mettre la mine soubs vn grand pan de mur, et le mur en estant brusquement enleué hors de terre, recheut toutes-fois tout empenné, si droit dans son fondement, que les assiegez n'en vausirent pas moins.	She did just the opposite in our wars in Milan. Captain Renzo, besieging the town of Arona for us, had a mine laid under a great stretch of wall; and the wall, abruptly lifted off the ground, nevertheless fell back all in one piece, so squarely onto its foundation that the besieged were none the worse for it.[4]
1.34.5	Quelquefois elle fait la medecine. Iason Phereus estant abandonné des medecins, pour vne aposteme, qu'il auoit dans la poitrine, ayant enuie de s'en défaire, au moins par la mort, se ietta en vne bataille à corps perdu dans la presse des ennemis, où il fut blessé à trauers le corps, si à point, que son aposteme en creua, et guerit. Surpassa elle pas le peintre Protogenes en la science de son art?	Sometimes she plays the doctor. Jason of Pherae, given up by the physicians because of an abscess in his chest, and wanting to be rid of it, at least by death, threw himself recklessly into the thick of the enemy in a battle, where he was wounded right through the body so aptly that his abscess burst and he was cured. Did she not surpass the painter Protogenes in the mastery of his art?[5]
	Cettuy-cy ayant parfaict l'image d'vn chien las et recreu, à son contentement en toutes les autres parties, mais ne pouuant representer à son gré l'escume et la baue, despité contre sa besongne, prit son esponge, et comme elle estoit abreuuee de diuerses peintures, la ietta contre, pour tout effacer: la fortune porta tout à propos le coup à l'endroit de la bouche du chien, et y parfournit ce à quoy l'art n'auoit peu attaindre. N'adresse elle pas quelquefois nos conseils, et les corrige?	He had finished the picture of a tired, exhausted dog, and was satisfied with it in every other respect, but could not render the foam and slaver to his liking. Vexed with his work, he took his sponge, which was soaked with various paints, and threw it at the picture to wipe everything out. Fortune carried the blow precisely to the dog's mouth, and there completed what art had been unable to achieve. Does she not sometimes guide our plans and correct them?

	Isabel Royne d'Angleterre, ayant à repasser de Zelande en son Royaume, auec vne armee, en faueur de son fils contre son mary, estoit perdue, si elle fust arriuee au port qu'elle auoit proietté, y estant attendue par ses ennemis: mais la fortune la ietta contre son vouloir ailleurs, où elle print terre en toute seureté. Et cet ancien qui ruant la pierre à vn chien, en assena et tua sa marastre, eut-il pas raison de prononcer ce vers: Ταυτοματον ἡμων καλλιω βουλευεται; La fortune a meilleur aduis que nous.	Isabella, Queen of England, had to cross back from Zeeland to her kingdom with an army, on behalf of her son and against her husband. She would have been lost if she had reached the port she had planned on, for her enemies were waiting for her there; but fortune threw her elsewhere against her will, and there she landed in complete safety. And that ancient who threw a stone at a dog and struck and killed his stepmother—was he not right to pronounce this line: Chance takes better counsel than we do? Fortune has better judgment than we have.[6]
1.34.6	Icetes auoit prattiqué deux soldats, pour tuer Timoleon, seiournant à Adrane en la Sicile. Ils prindrent heure, sur le point qu'il feroit quelque sacrifice. Et se meslans parmy la multitude, comme ils se guignoyent l'vn l'autre, que l'occasion estoit propre à leur besoigne: voicy vn tiers, qui d'vn grand coup d'espee, en assene l'vn par la teste, et le rue mort par terre, et s'en fuit. Le compagnon se tenant pour descouuert et perdu, recourut à l'autel, requerant franchise, auec promesse de dire toute la verité. Ainsi qu'il faisoit le compte de la coniuration, voicy le tiers qui auoit esté attrapé, lequel comme meurtrier, le peuple pousse et saboule au trauers la presse, vers Timoleon, et les plus apparents de l'assemblee.	Hicetas had bribed two soldiers to kill Timoleon while he was staying at Adranum in Sicily. They chose their moment for when he would be performing a sacrifice. And as they were mingling with the crowd, signaling to each other that the opportunity was right for their business, along comes a third man who, with a great sword stroke, strikes one of them on the head, lays him dead on the ground, and runs off. The accomplice, thinking himself discovered and lost, ran to the altar asking for sanctuary and promising to tell the whole truth. While he was giving his account of the conspiracy, along comes the third man, who had been caught; the people, taking him for a murderer, were shoving and jostling him through the crowd toward Timoleon and the leading men of the assembly.[7]
	Là il crie mercy: et dit auoir justement tué l'assassin de son pere: verifiant sur le champ, par des tesmoings que son bon sort luy fournit, tout à propos, qu'en la ville des Leontins son pere, de vray, auoit esté tué par celuy sur lequel il s'estoit vengé. On luy ordonna dix mines Attiques, pour auoir eu cet heur, prenant raison de la mort de son pere, de retirer de mort le pere commun des Siciliens. Cette fortune surpasse en reglement, les regles de l'humaine prudence.	There he cries for mercy, and says he has justly killed his father's murderer; and he proves on the spot, through witnesses whom his good luck supplied most opportunely, that in the town of the Leontines his father had indeed been killed by the man on whom he had taken revenge. They awarded him ten Attic minas for having had the good fortune, in avenging his father's death, to rescue from death the common father of the Sicilians. This fortune surpasses in its ordering the rules of human prudence.
1.34.7	Pour la fin: en ce faict icy, se descouure il pas vne bien expresse application de sa faueur, de bonté et pieté singuliere? Ignatius Pere et fils, proscripts par les Triumuirs à Rome, se resolurent à ce genereux office, de rendre leurs vies, entre les mains l'vn de l'autre, et en frustrer la cruauté des Tyrans: ils se coururent sus,	To finish: in this case, do we not see a very express application of her favor, of singular goodness and piety? The Ignatii, father and son, proscribed at Rome by the triumvirs, resolved on this generous office: to give up their lives into each other's hands, and so cheat the cruelty of the tyrants.

l'espee au poing: elle en dressa les pointes, et en fit deux coups esgalement mortels: et donna à l'honneur d'vne si belle amitié, qu'ils eussent iustement la force de retirer encore des playes leurs bras sanglants et armés, pour s'entrembrasser en cet estat, d'vne si forte estrainte, que les bourreaux couperent ensemble leurs deux testes, laissans les corps tousiours pris en ce noble neud; et les playes iointes, humans amoureusement, le sang et les restes de la vie, l'vne de l'autre.	They ran at each other, sword in hand. She guided the points and made of them two equally mortal blows; and she granted to the honor of so beautiful a friendship that they had just enough strength left to pull their bloody arms, swords still in hand, out of the wounds, and to embrace each other in that state, so tightly that the executioners cut off both their heads together, leaving the bodies still held in that noble knot, and their wounds joined, lovingly drinking in each other's blood and the last of each other's life.[8]

I.35 Of a Lack in Our Administrations

D'vn defaut de nos polices
Montaigne's father proposed a public registry matching needs and offers; Montaigne also praises his household diary.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.35.1	FEV mon pere, homme pour n'estre aydé que de l'experience et du naturel, d'vn iugement bien net, m'a dict autrefois, qu'il auoit desiré mettre en train, qu'il y eust és villes certain lieu designé, auquel ceux qui auroient besoin de quelque chose, se peussent rendre, et faire enregistrer leur affaire à vn officier estably pour cet effect: comme, ie cherche à vendre des perles: ie cherche des perles à vendre; tel veut compagnie pour aller à Paris; tel s'enquiert d'vn seruiteur de telle qualité, tel d'vn maistre; tel demande vn ouurier: qui cecy, qui cela, chacun selon son besoing. Et semble que ce moyen de nous entr'aduertir, apporteroit non legere commodité au commerce publique.	MY late father, a man of very clear judgment for one helped only by experience and natural gifts, once told me that he had wanted to set up a scheme whereby in towns there would be a certain designated place where those who needed something could go and have their business registered with an officer appointed for the purpose. For instance: I am looking to sell some pearls; I am looking for pearls for sale; so-and-so wants company for a journey to Paris; so-and-so is looking for a servant of such a kind, another for a master; another wants a workman; one this, another that, each according to his need. And it seems that this means of informing one another would bring no slight convenience to public dealings.
	Car à tous coups, il y a des conditions, qui s'entrecherchent, et pour ne s'entr'entendre, laissent les hommes en extreme necessité.	For all the time there are situations looking for each other, and because they fail to make contact, they leave men in extreme need.
1.35.2	I'entens auec vne grande honte de nostre siecle, qu'à nostre veuë, deux tres-excellens personnages en sçauoir, sont morts en estat de n'auoir pas leur saoul à manger: Lilius Gregorius Giraldus en Italie, et Sebastianus Castalio en Allemaigne. Et croy qu'il y a mil'hommes qui les eussent appellez auec tres-aduantageuses conditions, ou secourus où ils estoient s'ils l'eussent sçeu.	I hear, to the great shame of our age, that before our very eyes two men of the greatest learning have died without having enough to eat: Lilius Gregorius Giraldus in Italy and Sebastianus Castalio in Germany. And I believe there are a thousand men who would have invited them on very advantageous terms, or helped them where they were, if they had known.[1]
	Le monde n'est pas si generalement corrompu, que ie ne sçache tel homme, qui souhaitteroit de bien grande affection, que les moyens que les siens luy ont mis en main, se peussent employer tant qu'il plaira à la fortune qu'il en iouisse, à mettre à l'abry de la necessité, les personnages rares et remarquables en quelque espece de valeur, que le mal-heur combat quelquefois iusques à l'extremité: et qui les mettroit pour le moins en tel estat, qu'il ne tiendroit qu'à faute de bon discours, s'ils n'estoyent contens.	The world is not so universally corrupt that I do not know a certain man who would wish with all his heart that the means his family has put into his hands could be used, for as long as it pleases fortune to let him enjoy them, to shelter from want those persons rare and remarkable in some kind of merit whom misfortune sometimes assails to the utmost; and who would at least put them in such a position that, if they were not content, it could only be for want of good sense.

1.35.3	En la police œconomique mon pere auoit cet ordre, que ie sçay loüer, mais nullement ensuiure. C'est qu'outre le registre des negoces du mesnage, où se logent les menus comptes, payements, marchés, qui ne requierent la main du Notaire, lequel registre, vn Receueur a en charge: il ordonnoit à celuy de ses gents, qui luy seruoit à escrire, vn papier iournal, à inserer toutes les suruenances de quelque remarque, et iour par iour les memoires de l'histoire de sa maison: tres-plaisante à veoir, quand le temps commence à en effacer la souuenance, et tres à propos pour nous oster souuent de peine.	In the management of his household my father had this practice, which I can praise but by no means follow. Besides the register of household business, where the small accounts, payments and transactions not needing a notary are entered, a register kept by a steward, he had the servant who acted as his secretary keep a journal recording every happening of any note, and day by day the memoirs of the history of his house. It is very pleasant to look at when time begins to wipe out the memory of things, and very handy for often saving us trouble.
	Quand fut entamee telle besoigne, quand acheuee: quels trains y ont passé, combien arresté: noz voyages, noz absences, mariages, morts: la reception des heureuses ou malencontreuses nouuelles: changement des seruiteurs principaux: telles matieres. Vsage ancien, que ie trouue bon à rafraichir, chacun en sa chacuniere: et me trouue vn sot d'y auoir failly.	When such a piece of work was begun, when it was finished; what households passed through, how long they stayed; our journeys, our absences, marriages, deaths; the arrival of happy or unhappy news; changes of the chief servants; matters of that kind. An ancient custom, which I think it good to revive, each in his own little home; and I think myself a fool for having failed to do it.

I.36 Of the Custom of Wearing Clothes

De l'vsage de se vestir

Were humans meant to go naked like other creatures? Montaigne argues that custom, not nature, makes cold unbearable to us.

FRENCH

1.36.1 OV que ie vueille donner, il me faut forcer quelque barriere de la coustume, tant ell'a soigneusement bridé toutes nos auenues. Ie deuisoy en cette saison frilleuse, si la façon d'aller tout nud de ces nations dernierement trouuees, est vne façon forcee par la chaude temperature de l'air, comme nous disons des Indiens, et des Mores, ou si c'est l'originelle des hommes. Les gens d'entendement, d'autant que tout ce qui est soubs le ciel, comme dit la saincte Parole, est subiect à mesmes loix, ont accoustumé en pareilles considerations à celles icy, où il faut distinguer les loix naturelles des controuuees, de recourir à la generale police du monde, où il n'y peut auoir rien de contrefaict.

Or tout estant exactement fourny ailleurs de filet et d'éguille, pour maintenir son estre, il est mécreable, que nous soyons seuls produits en estat deffectueux et indigent, et en estat qui ne se puisse maintenir sans secours estranger. Ainsi ie tiens que comme les plantes, arbres, animaux, et tout ce qui vit, se treuue naturellement equippé de suffisante couuerture, pour se deffendre de l'iniure du temps, Proptereáque ferè res omnes, aut corio sunt, / Aut seta, aut conchis, aut callo, aut cortice, tectæ, aussi estions nous: mais comme ceux qui esteignent par artificielle lumiere celle du iour, nous auons esteint nos propres moyens, par les moyens empruntez.

1.36.2 Et est aisé à voir que c'est la coustume qui nous fait impossible ce qui ne l'est pas. Car de ces nations qui n'ont aucune cognoissance de vestemens, il s'en trouue d'assises enuiron soubs mesme ciel, que le nostre, et soubs bien plus rude ciel que le nostre. Et puis la plus delicate partie de nous est celle qui se tient tousiours descouuerte: les yeux, la bouche, le nez, les oreilles; à noz contadins, comme à noz ayeulx, la partie pectorale et le ventre.

ENGLISH

WHEREVER I want to turn, I have to force some barrier of custom, so carefully has it bridled all our approaches. In this chilly season I was pondering whether the habit of going completely naked among those recently discovered nations is forced on them by the hot temperature of the air, as we say of the Indians and the Moors, or whether it is the original way of mankind. Men of understanding, since everything under heaven, as Holy Scripture says, is subject to the same laws, are accustomed, in considerations like these, where natural laws must be distinguished from invented ones, to have recourse to the general order of the world, in which there can be nothing counterfeit.

Now since everything else is precisely furnished with needle and thread to maintain its being, it is unbelievable that we alone should have been produced in a defective and needy state, a state that cannot be maintained without outside help. So I hold that, just as plants, trees, animals and everything that lives are naturally equipped with enough covering to protect themselves from the harshness of the weather, And so almost all things are covered with hide, / Or bristles, or shells, or callus, or bark, so were we too. But like those who blot out the light of day with artificial light, we have blotted out our own means with borrowed ones.[1]

And it is easy to see that it is custom that makes impossible for us what is not impossible. For among those nations that have no knowledge of clothing, some are situated under roughly the same sky as ours, and some under a much harsher sky than ours. And then, the most delicate part of us is the part that is always left uncovered: the eyes, the mouth, the nose, the ears; and for our peasants, as for our forefathers, the chest and the belly.

If we had been born needing petticoats and breeches, there is no doubt that nature would have armed with a thicker skin whatever she left exposed to the battering of the seasons, as she has done with our fingertips and the soles of our feet. Why does this seem hard to believe? Between my way of dressing and that of a peasant of my region, I find far more distance than there is between his way and that of a man dressed in nothing but his skin. How many men, especially in Turkey, go naked out of religious devotion?

Someone, I forget who, saw one of our beggars in nothing but his shirt in the depth of winter, as lively as any man muffled up to the ears in marten fur, and asked him how he could bear it. "And you, sir," he replied, "you keep your face uncovered; well, I am all face." The Italians tell a story, I believe, about the Duke of Florence's fool. His master asked him how, so poorly dressed, he could stand the cold, which the Duke himself found hard to bear. "Follow my recipe," said the fool, "and pile on all the clothes you have, as I do with mine, and you will suffer from the cold no more than I do."

King Masinissa, even in extreme old age, could not be persuaded to go about with his head covered, whatever cold, storm or rain there might be; the same is said of the Emperor Severus. In the battles fought between the Egyptians and the Persians, Herodotus says it was noticed both by others and by himself that among those left dead on the field, the skulls of the Egyptians were incomparably harder than those of the Persians. The reason was that the Persians always kept their heads covered, first with caps and then with turbans, while the Egyptians were shaved from childhood and went bareheaded. And King Agesilaus kept up, into his decrepit old age, the practice of wearing the same clothes in winter as in summer.[2]

Caesar, says Suetonius, always marched at the head of his troops, most often on foot and bareheaded, whether it was sunny or raining; and the same is said of Hannibal: then, with bare head, / to take the raging downpours and the collapse of the sky. A Venetian who lived there a long time and has only just come back writes that in the kingdom of Pegu, though the other parts of the body are clothed, men and women always go barefoot, even on horseback. And Plato strongly advises, for the health of the whole body, that we give the feet and the head no covering other than the one nature has put there.[3]

The man the Poles chose as their king after ours, who is truly one of the greatest princes of our age, never wears gloves, nor does he change, whatever the winter or the weather, the cap he wears indoors. Just as I cannot bear to go about unbuttoned and untrussed, the farm laborers of my neighborhood would feel hobbled if they were buttoned up. Varro holds that when it was decreed that we should uncover our heads in the presence of the gods or of the magistrate, it was done more for our health, and to toughen us against the harshness of the weather, than out of reverence.[4]

And since we are on the subject of cold, and since we French are used to dressing in motley (not I, for I dress almost only in black or white, in imitation of my father), let us stitch on another piece. Captain Martin du Bellay relates that on the Luxembourg campaign he saw frosts so severe that the army's wine supply was cut with axes and hatchets and handed out to the soldiers by weight, and they carried it off in baskets. And Ovid: The wine stands bare, keeping the shape of the jar; / they drink not draughts of it but chunks handed out. The frosts are so severe at the mouth of the Maeotian marshes that in the very place where Mithridates' lieutenant had fought the enemy on dry ground and defeated them, when summer came he won another battle against them there, this time at sea.[5]

The Romans were at a great disadvantage in the battle they fought against the Carthaginians near Piacenza, because they went into the charge with their blood congealed and their limbs stiff with cold. Hannibal, by contrast, had had fires lit throughout his camp to warm his soldiers, and oil handed out among the companies so that, by rubbing it on, they would make their sinews more supple and limber and coat over their pores against the blasts of air and the freezing wind that

I.37 Of Cato the Younger

Du ieune Caton

Montaigne refuses to measure others by himself and defends the greatness of heroic figures like Cato against detractors.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.37.1	IE n'ay point cette erreur commune, de iuger d'vn autre selon que ie suis. I'en croy aysément des choses diuerses à moy. Pour me sentir engagé à vne forme, ie n'y oblige pas le monde, comme chascun fait, et croy, et conçoy mille contraires façons de vie: et au rebours du commun, reçoy plus facilement la difference, que la ressemblance en nous. Ie descharge tant qu'on veut, vn autre estre, de mes conditions et principes: et le considere simplement en luy mesme, sans relation, l'estoffant sur son propre modelle. Pour n'estre continent, ie ne laisse d'aduoüer sincerement, la continence des Feuillans et des Capuchins, et de bien trouuer l'air de leur train.	I do not share that common error of judging another by what I am. I readily believe that others have qualities different from mine. Though I feel myself committed to one form, I do not oblige everyone else to follow it, as everyone does. I believe in and can conceive a thousand contrary ways of life; and, unlike most people, I more readily accept the difference between us than the likeness. I relieve another being, as much as you like, of my own qualities and principles, and consider him simply in himself, without relation to me, shaping him on his own model. Though I am not continent myself, I still sincerely acknowledge the continence of the Feuillants and the Capuchins, and think well of their way of life.[1]
	Ie m'insinue par imagination fort bien en leur place: et les ayme et les honore d'autant plus, qu'ils sont autres que moy. Ie desire singulierement, qu'on nous iuge chascun à part soy: et qu'on ne me tire en consequence des communs exemples. Ma foiblesse n'altere aucunement les opinions que ie dois auoir de la force et vigueur de ceux qui le méritent. Sunt, qui nihil suadent, quàm quod se imitari posse confidunt. Rampant au limon de la terre, ie ne laisse pas de remarquer iusques dans les nuës la hauteur inimitable d'aucunes ames heroïques. C'est beaucoup pour moy d'auoir le iugement reglé, si les effects ne le peuuent estre, et maintenir au moins cette maistresse partie, exempte de corruption.	I slip very easily in imagination into their place, and I love and honor them all the more because they are different from me. I particularly want each of us to be judged on his own, and not to be measured by the common run. My weakness in no way alters the opinions I ought to have of the strength and vigor of those who deserve it. There are those who recommend nothing but what they are confident they can imitate themselves. Crawling in the slime of the earth, I still note, up in the clouds, the inimitable loftiness of certain heroic souls. It is a great deal for me to have my judgment well ordered, if my actions cannot be, and to keep at least this sovereign part free from corruption.[2]
	C'est quelque chose d'auoir la volonté bonne, quand les iambes me faillent.	It is something to have good will, when my legs fail me.
1.37.2	Ce siecle, auquel nous viuons, au moins pour nostre climat, est si plombé, que ie ne dis pas l'execution, mais l'imagination mesme de la vertu en est à dire: et semble que ce ne soit autre chose qu'vn iargon de college.	This age we live in, at least in our part of the world, is so leaden that not merely the practice but even the idea of virtue is lacking, and it seems to be nothing but schoolroom jargon. They think

	Virtutem verba putant, vt / Lucum ligna; quam vereri deberent, etiam si percipere non possent. C'est vn affiquet à pendre en vn cabinet, ou au bout de la langue, comme au bout de l'oreille, pour parement.	virtue is mere words, as / a sacred grove is mere wood; yet they ought to revere it even if they could not grasp it. It is a trinket to hang in a cabinet, or on the tip of the tongue, as on the tip of an ear, for ornament.[3]
1.37.3	Il ne se recognoist plus d'action vertueuse: celles qui en portent le visage, elles n'en ont pas pourtant l'essence: car le profit, la gloire, la crainte, l'accoutumance, et autres telles causes estrangeres nous acheminent à les produire. La iustice, la vaillance, la debonnaireté, que nous exerçons lors, elles peuuent estre ainsi nommees, pour la consideration d'autruy, et du visage qu'elles portent en public: mais chez l'ouurier, ce n'est aucunement vertu. Il y a vne autre fin proposee, autre cause mouuante. Or la vertu n'aduoüe rien, que ce qui se faict par elle, et pour elle seule.	Virtuous action is no longer to be found: the actions that wear its face do not have its essence, for profit, glory, fear, habit and other such outside causes lead us to perform them. The justice, valor and kindness we then exercise may be called so in the eyes of others and for the face they wear in public; but in the doer it is in no way virtue. There is another end in view, another moving cause. Now virtue acknowledges nothing but what is done by it and for it alone.
1.37.4	En cette grande bataille de Potidee, que les Grecs sous Pausanias gaignerent contre Mardonius, et les Perses: les victorieux suiuant leur coustume, venants à partir entre eux la gloire de l'exploit, attribuerent à la nation Spartiate la precellence de valeur en ce combat. Les Spartiates excellents iuges de la vertu, quand ils vindrent à decider, à quel particulier de leur nation debuoit demeurer l'honneur d'auoir le mieux faict en cette iournee, trouuerent qu'Aristodemus s'estoit le plus courageusement hasardé: mais pourtant ils ne luy en donnerent point de prix, par ce que sa vertu auoit esté incitee du desir de se purger du reproche, qu'il auoit encouru au faict des Thermopyles: et d'vn appetit de mourir courageusement, pour garantir sa honte passee.	In that great battle of Potidaea, which the Greeks under Pausanias won against Mardonius and the Persians, the victors, following their custom, came to share out among themselves the glory of the exploit, and awarded the Spartan nation preeminence for valor in that battle. The Spartans, excellent judges of virtue, when they came to decide which individual of their nation should have the honor of having done best that day, found that Aristodemus had risked himself most courageously. Yet they gave him no prize for it, because his valor had been stirred by the desire to clear himself of the reproach he had incurred over Thermopylae, and by a longing to die courageously to redeem his past shame.[4]
1.37.5	Nos iugemens sont encores malades, et suyuent la deprauation de nos mœurs. Ie voy la pluspart des esprits de mon temps faire les ingenieux à obscurcir la gloire des belles et genereuses actions anciennes, leur donnant quelque interpretation vile, et leur controuuant des occasions et des causes vaines. Grande subtilité. Qu'on me donne l'action la plus excellente et pure, ie m'en vois y fournir vraysemblablement cinquante vitieuses intentions. Dieu sçait, à qui les veut estendre, quelle diuersité d'images ne souffre nostre interne volonté. Ils ne font pas tant malitieusement, que lourdement et grossierement, les ingenieux, à tout leur mesdisance.	Our judgments are still sick, and follow the depravity of our morals. I see most of the minds of my time showing off their cleverness by obscuring the glory of the fine and noble deeds of antiquity, giving them some base interpretation and inventing vain occasions and causes for them. Great subtlety! Give me the most excellent and pure action, and I will supply it with fifty plausible vicious intentions. God knows, for anyone who wants to stretch them, what a variety of images our inner will allows. These clever fellows, for all their slander, act not so much maliciously as clumsily and crudely.

1.37.6 La mesme peine, qu'on prent à detracter de ces grands noms, et la mesme licence, ie la prendroye volontiers à leur prester quelque tour d'espaule pour les hausser. Ces rares figures, et triees pour l'exemple du monde, par le consentement des sages, ie ne me feindroy pas de les recharger d'honneur, autant que mon inuention pourroit, en interpretation et fauorable circonstance. Et il faut croire, que les efforts de nostre inuention sont loing au dessous de leur merite. C'est l'office des gents de bien, de peindre la vertu la plus belle qui se puisse. Et ne messieroit pas, quand la passion nous transporteroit à la faueur de si sainctes formes.

The same pains people take to detract from these great names, and the same license, I would gladly take to lend them a shoulder and lift them higher. These rare figures, picked out by the consent of the wise as examples for the world, I would not hesitate to load with fresh honor, as far as my invention could, by interpretation and favorable circumstance. And we must believe that the efforts of our invention fall far below their merit. It is the office of good men to portray virtue as beautiful as it can be. And it would not be unseemly if passion should carry us away in favor of such holy forms.

Ce que ceux cy font au contraire, ils le font ou par malice, ou par ce vice de ramener leur creance à leur portee, dequoy ie viens de parler: ou comme ie pense plustost, pour n'auoir pas la veuë assez forte et assez nette ny dressee à conceuoir la splendeur de la vertu en sa pureté naifue. Comme Plutarque dit, que de son temps, aucuns attribuoient la cause de la mort du ieune Caton, à la crainte qu'il auoit eu de Cæsar: dequoy il se picque auecques raison: et peut on iuger par là, combien il se fust encore plus offencé de ceux qui l'ont attribuee à l'ambition. Sottes gents.

What these people do to the contrary, they do either from malice, or from that vice I have just spoken of, of bringing their belief down to their own level; or, as I rather think, because their sight is not strong enough, clear enough or trained to conceive the splendor of virtue in its natural purity. So Plutarch says that in his time some attributed the cause of the younger Cato's death to the fear he had of Caesar; and he is rightly indignant at this. We can judge from that how much more offended he would have been by those who attributed it to ambition. Foolish people![5]

Il eust bien faict vne belle action, genereuse et iuste plustost auec ignominie, que pour la gloire. Ce personnage là fut veritablement vn patron, que nature choisit, pour montrer iusques où l'humaine vertu et fermeté pouuoit atteindre.

He would have done a fine, noble and just deed in disgrace rather than for glory. That man was truly a model whom nature chose to show how far human virtue and firmness could reach.

1.37.7 Mais ie ne suis pas icy à mesmes pour traicter ce riche argument. Ie veux seulement faire luiter ensemble, les traicts de cinq poëtes Latins, sur la louange de Caton, et pour l'interest de Caton: et par incident, pour le leur aussi. Or deura l'enfant bien nourry, trouuer au prix des autres, les deux premiers trainants. Le troisiesme, plus verd: mais qui s'est abattu par l'extrauagance de sa force. Il estimera que là il y auroit place à vn ou deux degrez d'inuention encore, pour arriuer au quatriesme, sur le point duquel il ioindra ses mains par admiration. Au dernier, premier de quelque espace: mais laquelle espace, il iurera ne pouuoir estre remplie par nul esprit humain, il s'estonnera, il se transira.

But I am in no position here to treat this rich subject. I only want to set five Latin poets wrestling together in praise of Cato—for Cato's sake, and incidentally for their own as well. Now a well-brought-up child should find, compared with the others, the first two dragging; the third more vigorous, but brought down by the extravagance of its own strength. He will judge that there would be room for one or two more degrees of invention before reaching the fourth, at the high point of which he will clasp his hands in admiration. At the last—first by some distance, but a distance that he will swear no human mind could fill—he will be stunned, he will be awestruck.

1.37.8 Voicy merueilles. Nous auons bien plus de poëtes, que de iuges et interpretes de poësie. Il est plus aisé de la faire, que de la cognoistre. A certaine mesure basse, on la peut iuger par les preceptes et par art. Mais la bonne, la supreme, la diuine, est au dessus des regles et de la raison. Quiconque en discerne la beauté, d'vne veuë ferme et rassise, il ne la void pas: non plus que la splendeur d'vn esclair. Elle ne pratique point nostre iugement: elle le rauit et rauage. La fureur, qui espoinçonne celuy qui la sçait penetrer, fiert encores vn tiers, à la luy ouyr traitter et reciter.

Comme l'aymant attire non seulement vne aiguille, mais infond encores en icelle, sa faculté d'en attirer d'autres: et il se void plus clairement aux theatres, que l'inspiration sacree des muses, ayant premierement agité le poëte à la cholere, au deuil, à la hayne, et hors de soy, où elles veulent, frappe encore par le poëte, l'acteur, et par l'acteur, consecutiuement tout vn peuple. C'est l'enfileure de noz aiguilles, suspendues l'vne de l'autre. Dés ma premiere enfance, la poësie a eu cela, de me transpercer et transporter. Mais ce ressentiment bien vif, qui est naturellement en moy, a esté diuersement manié, par diuersité de formes, non tant, plus hautes et plus basses, car c'estoient tousiours des plus hautes en chasque espece, comme differentes en couleur.

Premierement, vne fluidité gaye et ingenieuse: depuis vne subtilité aiguë et releuee. En fin, vne force meure et constante. L'exemple le dira mieux. Ouide, Lucain, Vergile.

write it than to understand it. At a certain low level, it can be judged by precepts and by skill. But the good, the supreme, the divine is above rules and reason. Whoever discerns its beauty with a firm and steady gaze does not see it, any more than the splendor of a flash of lightning. It does not work on our judgment; it ravishes and ravages it. The frenzy that goads the man who can penetrate it also strikes a third person who hears him discuss and recite it.

Just as the magnet not only attracts a needle but also infuses into it its own power to attract others. And it is seen more clearly in the theater that the sacred inspiration of the Muses, having first stirred the poet to anger, grief, hatred and out of himself, wherever they please, strikes through the poet the actor, and through the actor, in turn, a whole people. It is the chain of our needles, hanging one from another. From my earliest childhood, poetry has had the power to pierce me through and carry me away. But this very lively sensitivity, which is natural in me, has been variously affected by various forms—not so much higher and lower (for they were always the highest of each kind) as different in color.

First, a gay and ingenious fluency; later, a keen and lofty subtlety; finally, a mature and steady strength. The example will say it better: Ovid, Lucan, Virgil.

But here are our poets on the racecourse. Granted, let Cato in his lifetime be greater even than Caesar, says one. And Cato unconquered, having conquered death, says another. And another, speaking of the civil wars between Caesar and Pompey: The winning cause pleased the gods, but the losing cause pleased Cato. And the fourth, praising Caesar: And all the lands subdued, / except the fierce soul of Cato. And the master of the choir, after setting out in his picture the names of the greatest Romans, ends in this way: Cato giving them laws.[6]

6 The five are Martial, Manilius, Lucan, Horace and Virgil (Aeneid VIII, on the shield of Aeneas).

When we come across in the histories that Antigonus was very displeased with his son for presenting him with the head of King Pyrrhus, his enemy, who had just been killed fighting against him, and that on seeing it he burst into tears; and that Duke René of Lorraine likewise lamented the death of Duke Charles of Burgundy, whom he had just defeated, and wore mourning at his funeral; and that at the battle of Auray (which the Count of Montfort won against Charles of Blois, his rival for the duchy of Brittany) the victor, coming upon the body of his dead enemy, mourned him greatly—we must not immediately exclaim: And so it happens that the mind hides each of its passions beneath a contrary cloak, with a face now bright, now dark. When Caesar was presented with Pompey's head, the histories say he turned his eyes away as from an ugly and unpleasant sight.[1]

There had been between them such a long understanding and partnership in managing public affairs, so much sharing of fortunes, so many mutual services and ties of kinship, that we must not believe this countenance was entirely false and feigned, as this other poet thinks: And thinking it now safe to be a good father-in-law, he shed tears that did not fall of themselves, and forced groans from a glad heart. For although in truth most of our actions are nothing but mask and paint, and it may sometimes be true that The heir's weeping is laughter behind a mask, still, in judging these events we must consider how our souls are often stirred by different passions.[2]

And just as they say that in our bodies there is a gathering of different humors, of which the masmaistresse, qui commande le plus ordinairement en nous, selon nos complexions: aussi en nostre ame, bien qu'il y ait diuers mouuements, qui l'agitent, si faut-il qu'il y en ayt vn à qui le champ demeure. Mais ce n'est pas auec si entier auantage, que pour la volubilité et soupplesse de nostre ame, les plus foibles par occasion ne regaignent encores la place, et ne facent vne courte charge à leur tour.

D'où nous voyons non seulement les enfans, qui vont tout naifuement apres la nature, pleurer et rire souuent de mesme chose: mais nul d'entre nous ne se peut vanter, quelque voyage qu'il face à son souhait, qu'encore au départir de sa famille, et de ses amis, il ne se sente frissonner le courage: et si les larmes ne luy en eschappent tout à faict, au moins met-il le pied à l'estrié d'vn visage morne et contristé.

Et quelque gentille flamme qui eschauffe le cœur des filles bien nees, encore les despend on à force du col de leurs meres, pour les rendre à leur espoux: quoy que die ce bon compagnon, Estne nouis nuptis odio Venus, ánne parentum
Frustrantur falsis gaudia lacrymulis, ter is the one that most usually commands in us, according to our constitutions, so in our soul, although various impulses stir it, one of them must hold the field. But not with so complete an advantage that, because of the volatility and suppleness of our soul, the weaker ones do not on occasion regain ground and make a brief charge in their turn.

Hence we see not only children, who follow nature quite artlessly, often crying and laughing at the same thing; but none of us can boast that, however much he may want the journey he is setting out on, he does not still feel his heart quiver at parting from his family and friends. And if tears do not quite escape him, at least he puts his foot in the stirrup with a gloomy and saddened face.

And whatever noble flame warms the hearts of well-born girls, still they have to be pried by force from their mothers' necks to be handed over to their husbands, whatever this good fellow may say: Do new brides hate Venus, or do they cheat their parents' joy with false little tears which they shed in floods inside the bedroom door?
No, so help me the gods, their groans are not true. So it is not strange to lament the death of a man whom one would by no means want alive.[3]

When I scold my valet, I scold him with all the heart I have; these are real curses, not feigned. But once that smoke has passed, let him need me and I will gladly do him good: I turn the page instantly. When I call him a buffoon, a dull calf, I do not undertake to stitch those titles on him forever; nor do I think I am contradicting myself when I call him a decent fellow shortly after. No quality embraces us purely and universally. If talking to oneself were not the mark of a fool, there is hardly a day or an hour when I would not be heard grumbling to myself and against myself, "Dung on the fool!"—and yet I do not mean that as my definition.

Anyone who, seeing me look now cold, now loving toward my wife, thinks that one or the other is feigned, is a fool. Nero, taking leave of his mother, whom he was sending to be drowned, nevertheless felt the emotion of that maternal farewell, and was struck with horror and pity. They say that the

1.38.4	Artabanus surprint Xerxes son nepueu, et le tança de la mutation soudaine de sa contenance. Il estoit à considerer la grandeur desmesurée de ses forces, au passage de l'Hellespont, pour l'entreprinse de la Grece. Il luy print premierement vn tressaillement d'aise, à veoir tant de milliers d'hommes à son seruice, et le tesmoigna par l'allegresse et feste de son visage. Et tout soudain en mesme instant, sa pensée luy suggerant, comme tant de vies auoient à defaillir au plus loing, dans vn siecle, il refroigna son front, et s'attrista iusques aux larmes.	Artabanus caught his nephew Xerxes off guard and chided him for the sudden change in his countenance. Xerxes was surveying the immeasurable size of his forces at the crossing of the Hellespont for the expedition against Greece. First a thrill of joy came over him at seeing so many thousands of men in his service, and he showed it by the gladness and festivity of his face. And all of a sudden, in the same instant, as his thoughts suggested to him that so many lives would have to perish within a century at most, he knit his brow and grew sad to the point of tears.
1.38.5	Nous auons poursuiuy auec resoluë volonté la vengeance d'vne iniure, et ressenty vn singulier contentement de la victoire; nous en pleurons pourtant: ce n'est pas de cela que nous pleurons: il n'y a rien de changé; mais nostre ame regarde la chose d'vn autre œil, et se la represente par vn autre visage: car chasque chose a plusieurs biais et plusieurs lustres.	We have pursued revenge for an injury with resolute will, and felt singular satisfaction at our victory; and yet we weep over it. It is not that we weep for; nothing has changed. But our soul looks at the thing with a different eye and pictures it to itself with a different face; for each thing has many angles and many lights.
1.38.6	La parenté, les anciennes accointances et amitiez, saisissent nostre imagination, et la passionnent pour l'heure, selon leur condition; mais le contour en est si brusque, qu'il nous eschappe. Nil adeo fieri celeri ratione videtur, Quàm si mens fieri proponit, et inchoat ipsa Ocius ergo animus, quàm res se perciet vlla, Ante oculos quarum in promptu natura videtur. Et à cette cause, voulans de toute cette suitte continuer vn corps, nous nous trompons. Quand Timoleon pleure le meurtre qu'il auoit commis d'vne si meure et genereuse deliberation, il ne pleure pas la liberté rendue à sa patrie, il ne pleure pas le Tyran, mais il pleure son frere. L'vne partie de son deuoir est iouée, laissons luy en iouer l'autre.	Kinship, old acquaintances and friendships seize our imagination and stir it for the moment according to their nature; but the turn is so abrupt that it escapes us. Nothing seems to happen as swiftly as what the mind proposes and itself begins. So the mind stirs itself more swiftly than any of the things whose nature we see plainly before our eyes. And for this reason, when we try to make one continuous body out of this whole sequence, we deceive ourselves. When Timoleon weeps for the murder he had committed after such mature and noble deliberation, he does not weep for the liberty restored to his country, he does not weep for the tyrant; he weeps for his brother. One part of his duty has been played; let us let him play the other.[5]

I.39 Of Solitude

De la solitude

True solitude is inward: Montaigne urges freeing ourselves from attachments and keeping a back room of the mind for ourselves.

FRENCH

1.39.1 LAISSONS à part cette longue comparaison de la vie solitaire à l'actiue. Et quant à ce beau mot, dequoy se couure l'ambition et l'auarice, Que nous ne sommes pas naiz pour nostre particulier, ains pour le publicq; rapportons nous en hardiment à ceux qui sont en la danse; et qu'ils se battent la conscience, si au contraire, les estats, les charges, et cette tracasserie du monde, ne se recherche plustost, pour tirer du publicq son profit particulier. Les mauuais moyens par où on s'y pousse en nostre siecle, montrent bien que la fin n'en vaut gueres. Respondons à l'ambition que c'est elle mesme qui nous donne goust de la solitude. Car que fuit elle tant que la societé?

que cherche elle tant que ses coudées franches? Il y a dequoy bien et mal faire par tout. Toutesfois si le mot de Bias est vray, que la pire part c'est la plus grande, ou ce que dit l'Ecclesiastique, que de mille il n'en est pas vn bon: Rari quippe boni: numero vix sunt totidem quot / Thebarum portæ, vel diuitis ostia Nili: la contagion est tres-dangereuse en la presse. Il faut ou imiter les vitieux, ou les haïr. Tous les deux sont dangereux; et de leur ressembler, par ce qu'ils sont beaucoup, et d'en haïr beaucoup par ce qu'ils sont dissemblables.

Et les marchands, qui vont en mer, ont raison de regarder, que ceux qui se mettent en mesme vaisseau, ne soyent dissolus, blasphemateurs, meschans: estimants telle societé infortunée. Parquoy Bias plaisamment, à ceux qui passoient auec luy le danger d'vne grande tourmente, et appelloient le secours des Dieux: Taisez vous, feit-il, qu'ils ne sentent point que vous soyez icy auec moy. Et d'vn plus pressant exemple: Albuquerque Vice-Roy en l'Inde, pour Emanuel Roy de Portugal, en vn extreme peril de fortune de mer, print sur ses espaules vn ieune garçon pour cette seule fin, qu'en la societé de leur peril, son

Let us leave aside that long comparison between the solitary life and the active one. And as for that fine saying with which ambition and avarice cloak themselves, that we are born not for our private good but for the public, let us boldly appeal to those who are in the dance; and let them search their consciences whether, on the contrary, ranks, offices and all this bustle of the world are not sought rather to draw private profit from the public. The bad means by which people push themselves forward in our age show clearly that the end is hardly worth much. Let us answer ambition that it is ambition itself that gives us a taste for solitude. For what does it shun so much as company?

What does it seek so much as elbowroom? There is room for doing good and evil everywhere. Yet if Bias's saying is true, that the worse part is the larger, or what Ecclesiastes says, that out of a thousand there is not one good: For good men are rare: there are hardly as many / as the gates of Thebes or the mouths of the rich Nile, then contagion is very dangerous in a crowd. We must either imitate the vicious or hate them. Both are dangerous: to resemble them, because they are many, and to hate many of them, because they are unlike us.[1]

And merchants who go to sea are right to make sure that those who board the same ship are not dissolute, blasphemers or wicked men, since they regard such company as unlucky. That is why Bias said wittily to those who were going through the danger of a great storm with him and calling on the gods for help: "Be quiet, so that they do not notice you are here with me." And a more pressing example: Albuquerque, viceroy in India for Manuel, king of Portugal, in extreme peril at sea,

1.39.2 Ce n'est pas que le sage ne puisse par tout viure content, voire et seul, en la foule d'vn palais: mais s'il est à choisir, il en fuira, dit-il, mesmes la veue. Il portera s'il est besoing cela, mais s'il est en luy, il eslira cecy. Il ne luy semble point suffisamment s'estre desfait des vices, s'il faut encores qu'il conteste auec ceux d'autruy. Charondas chastioit pour mauuais ceux qui estoient conuaincus de hanter mauuaise compagnie. Il n'est rien si dissociable et sociable que l'homme: l'vn par son vice, l'autre par sa nature. Et Antisthenes ne me semble auoir satisfait à celuy, qui luy reprochoit sa conuersation auec les meschants, en disant, que les medecins viuent bien entre les malades.	It is not that the wise man cannot live contented anywhere, even alone in the crowd of a palace; but if he has the choice, he will shun even the sight of it, he says. He will put up with the one if need be, but if it is up to him he will choose the other. It does not seem to him that he has sufficiently rid himself of vices if he must still contend with those of others. Charondas punished as wicked those convicted of keeping bad company. There is nothing so unsociable and so sociable as man: the one by his vice, the other by his nature. And Antisthenes does not seem to me to have satisfied the man who reproached him for associating with the wicked, when he said that doctors live well enough among the sick.
Car s'ils seruent à la santé des malades, ils deteriorent la leur, par la contagion, la veuë continuelle, et pratique des maladies.	For if they serve the health of the sick, they impair their own through contagion and through constantly seeing and handling diseases.
1.39.3 Or la fin, ce crois-ie, en est tout'vne, d'en viure plus à loisir et à son aise. Mais on n'en cherche pas tousiours bien le chemin. Souuent on pense auoir quitté les affaires, on ne les a que changez. Il n'y a guere moins de tourment au gouuernement d'vne famille que d'vn estat entier. Où que l'ame soit empeschée, elle y est toute. Et pour estre les occupations domestiques moins importantes, elles n'en sont pas moins importunes. D'auantage, pour nous estre deffaicts de la Cour et du marché, nous ne sommes pas deffaits des principaux tourmens de nostre vie.	Now the aim, I believe, is the same in every case: to live more at leisure and at ease. But people do not always look for the right road to it. Often they think they have left business behind, when they have only exchanged it. There is hardly less torment in governing a family than an entire state. Wherever the soul is occupied, it is wholly occupied. And though domestic occupations are less important, they are no less importunate. Moreover, though we have rid ourselves of the court and the marketplace, we have not rid ourselves of the principal torments of our life.
Ratio et prudentia curas, / Non locus effusi latè maris arbiter, aufert. L'ambition, l'auarice, l'irresolution, la peur et les concupiscences, ne nous abandonnent point pour changer de contrée: Et post equitem sedet atra cura. Elles nous suiuent souuent iusques dans les cloistres, et dans les escoles de Philosophie. Ny les desers, ny les rochers creusez, ny la here, ny les ieusnes, ne nous en démeslent: Hæret lateri lethalis arundo.	It is reason and wisdom that take away cares, / not a place commanding a wide view of the sea. Ambition, avarice, irresolution, fear and lusts do not leave us when we change our country: And behind the horseman sits black care. They often follow us even into cloisters and schools of philosophy. Neither deserts, nor caves hollowed out of rock, nor hair shirts, nor fasts can disentangle us from them: The deadly arrow clings to her side.[3]

it," he said; "he took himself along with him." Why do we exchange our land for lands warmed by another sun? What exile from his country has ever escaped himself as well? If we do not first unburden ourselves and our soul of the weight that oppresses it, moving about will only make it press harder; just as on a ship, cargo is less of a hindrance when it is settled. You do a sick man more harm than good by moving him. You lodge the illness deeper by stirring it, just as stakes sink further in and grow firmer when you shake and work them.

Therefore it is not enough to have withdrawn from the crowd; it is not enough to change place; we must withdraw from the crowd's dispositions that are within us; we must sequester ourselves and take possession of ourselves again. "I have broken my chains," you say.
So does a dog that struggles snap its knot; yet as it runs off, a long length of chain trails from its neck.
We carry our irons along with us. It is not complete freedom; we still turn our eyes back toward what we have left behind; our imagination is full of it. Unless the heart is purged, what battles and perils must we then enter against our will! How many sharp cares of desire tear the anxious man, and how many fears as well! And pride, filth and wantonness—what havoc they cause![4]

WITHDRAWING INTO ONESELF

True solitude is inward: keep a back shop of one's own, free of every tie.

1.39.5 Nostre mal nous tient en l'ame: or elle ne se peut eschapper à elle mesme, In culpa est animus, qui se non effugit vnquam, Ainsin il la faut ramener et retirer en soy. C'est la vraye solitude, et qui se peut ioüir au milieu des villes et des cours des Roys; mais elle se iouyt plus commodément à part. Or puis que nous entreprenons de viure seuls, et de nous passer de compagnie, faisons que nostre contentement despende de nous: desprenons nous de toutes les liaisons qui nous attachent à autruy: gaignons sur nous, de pouuoir à bon escient viure seuls, et y viure à nostr'aise.

Our ill has its grip on our soul, and the soul cannot escape from itself: The fault lies in the mind, which never escapes itself. So we must bring it back and withdraw it into itself. That is true solitude, and it can be enjoyed in the midst of cities and the courts of kings; but it is enjoyed more comfortably apart. Now since we are undertaking to live alone and to do without company, let us make our contentment depend on ourselves; let us free ourselves from all the ties that bind us to others; let us win from ourselves the power to live truly alone, and to live so at our ease.

1.39.6 Stilpon estant eschappé de l'embrasement de sa ville, où il auoit perdu femme, enfans, et cheuance; Demetrius Poliorcetes, le voyant en vne si grande ruine de sa patrie, le visage non effrayé, luy demanda, s'il n'auoit pas eu du dommage; il respondit que non, et qu'il n'y auoit Dieu mercy rien perdu de sien. C'est ce que le Philosophe Antisthenes disoit plaisamment, Que l'homme se deuoit pourueoir de munitions, qui flottassent sur l'eau, et peussent à nage auec luy eschapper du naufrage. Certes l'homme d'entendement n'a rien perdu, s'il a soy mesme.

Stilpo had escaped from the burning of his city, where he had lost wife, children and goods. Demetrius Poliorcetes, seeing him with an unshaken face amid such great ruin of his country, asked him whether he had not suffered loss. He replied no, and that, thank God, he had lost nothing of his own. That is what the philosopher Antisthenes meant when he said wittily that a man should provide himself with provisions that would float on the water and could swim with him to escape from shipwreck. Certainly the man of understanding has lost nothing if he has himself.[5]

Quand la ville de Nole fut ruinée par les Barbares, Paulinus qui en estoit Euesque, y ayant tout perdu, et leur prisonnier, prioit ainsi Dieu; Seigneur garde moy de sentir cette perte: car tu sçais qu'ils n'ont encore rien touché de ce qui est à moy. Les richesses qui le faisoyent riche, et les biens qui le faisoient bon, estoyent encore en leur entier. Voyla que c'est de bien choisir les thresors qui se puissent affranchir de l'iniure: et de les cacher en lieu, où personne n'aille, et lequel ne puisse estre trahi que par nous mesmes. Il faut auoir femmes, enfans, biens, et sur tout de la santé, qui peut, mais non pas s'y attacher en maniere que nostre heur en despende.

When the city of Nola was ruined by the barbarians, Paulinus, its bishop, having lost everything there and being their prisoner, prayed to God thus: "Lord, keep me from feeling this loss, for you know that they have not yet touched anything that is mine." The riches that made him rich and the goods that made him good were still intact. That is what it means to choose well the treasures that can be safe from harm, and to hide them in a place where no one goes and which can be betrayed only by ourselves. We should have wives, children, goods, and above all health, if we can; but not be so attached to them that our happiness depends on them.[6]

Il se faut reseruer vne arriere-boutique, toute nostre, toute franche, en laquelle nous establissions nostre vraye liberté et principale retraicte et solitude. En cette-cy faut-il prendre nostre ordinaire entretien, de nous à nous mesmes, et si priué, que nulle accointance ou communication de chose estrangere y trouue place: discourir et y rire, comme sans femme, sans enfans, et sans biens, sans train, et sans valetz: afin que quand l'occasion aduiendra de leur perte, il ne nous soit pas nouueau de nous en passer.

We must keep back for ourselves a back shop all our own, entirely free, in which to establish our real liberty and our principal retreat and solitude. Here our ordinary conversation must be between us and ourselves, and so private that no outside acquaintance or communication can find a place in it; here we must reason and laugh as if we had no wife, no children, no goods, no retinue and no servants, so that when the time comes to lose them, it will be nothing new to us to do without them.

Nous auons vne ame contournable en soy mesme; elle se peut faire compagnie, elle a dequoy assaillir et dequoy deffendre, dequoy receuoir, et dequoy donner: ne craignons pas en cette solitude, nous croupir d'oisiueté ennuyeuse, In solis sis tibi turba locis. La vertu se contente de soy: sans discipline, sans paroles, sans effects.

We have a soul that can turn in upon itself; it can keep itself company; it has the means to attack and the means to defend, the means to receive and the means to give. Let us not fear that in this solitude we shall stagnate in wearisome idleness: In lonely places, be a crowd to yourself. Virtue is content with itself, without discipline, without words, without deeds.[7]

1.39.7 En noz actions accoustumees, de mille il n'en est pas vne qui nous regarde. Celuy que tu vois grimpant contremont les ruines de ce mur, furieux et hors de soy, en bute de tant de harquebuzades: et cet autre tout cicatricé, transi et pasle de faim, deliberé de creuer plustost que de luy ouurir la porte; penses-tu qu'ils y soyent pour eux? pour tel à l'aduenture, qu'ils ne virent onques, et qui ne se donne aucune peine de leur faict, plongé cependant en l'oysiueté et aux delices. Cettuy-cy tout pituiteux, chassieux et crasseux, que tu vois sortir apres minuict d'vn estude, penses-tu qu'il cherche parmy les liures, comme il se rendra plus homme de bien, plus content et plus sage? nulles nouuelles.

In our usual actions, not one in a thousand concerns ourselves. That man you see climbing up the ruins of that wall, furious and beside himself, the target of so many arquebus shots; and that other one, covered in scars, numb and pale with hunger, determined to die rather than open the gate to him —do you think they are there for themselves? They are there perhaps for someone they have never seen, who takes no trouble over what they are doing, sunk meanwhile in idleness and pleasures. This fellow, all phlegm, bleary-eyed and grimy, whom you see coming out of his study after midnight—do you think he is searching among his books for how to become a better man, more contented and wiser? Not a bit of it.

Il y mourra, ou il apprendra à la posterité la mesure des vers de Plaute, et la vraye orthographe d'vn mot Latin. Qui ne contre-change volontiers la santé, le repos, et la vie, à la reputation et à la gloire? la plus inutile, vaine et fauce monnoye, qui soit en nostre vsage. Nostre mort ne nous faisoit pas assez de peur, chargeons nous encores de celle de nos femmes, de noz enfans, et de nos gens. Noz affaires ne nous donnoyent pas assez de peine, prenons encores à nous tourmenter, et rompre la teste, de ceux de noz voisins et amis. Vah!

He will die at it, or else he will teach posterity the meter of Plautus's verses and the correct spelling of a Latin word. Who does not gladly exchange health, rest and life for reputation and glory—the most useless, vain and false coin in circulation among us? Our own death did not frighten us enough; let us burden ourselves besides with that of our wives, our children and our household. Our own affairs did not give us enough trouble; let us take on, besides, tormenting ourselves and racking our brains over those of our neighbors and friends. Ah![8] quemquámne hominem in animum instituere, aut / Parare, quod sit charius, quàm ipse est sibi? La solitude me semble auoir plus d'apparence, et de raison, à ceux qui ont donné au monde leur aage plus actif et fleurissant, à l'exemple de Thales. C'est assez vescu pour autruy, viuons pour nous au moins ce bout de vie: ramenons à nous, et à nostre aise nos pensées et nos intentions. Ce n'est pas vne legere partie que de faire seurement sa retraicte; elle nous empesche assez sans y mesler d'autres entreprinses.

that any man should set his heart on, or / acquire, something dearer to him than he is to himself! Solitude seems to me more plausible and reasonable for those who have given the world their most active and flourishing years, following the example of Thales. We have lived enough for others; let us live for ourselves at least this tail end of life; let us bring our thoughts and intentions back to ourselves and our own ease. It is no small matter to make a safe retreat; it keeps us busy enough without mixing other undertakings with it.

Puis que Dieu nous donne loisir de disposer de notre deslogement; preparons nous y; plions bagage; prenons de bon'heure congé de la compagnie; despétrons nous de ces violentes prinses, qui nous engagent ailleurs, et esloignent de nous.

Since God gives us leisure to arrange our departure, let us prepare for it; let us pack our bags; let us take leave of the company in good time; let us break free of those violent grips that engage us elsewhere and draw us away from ourselves.

1.39.8	Il faut desnoüer ces obligations si fortes: et meshuy aymer cecy et cela, mais n'espouser rien que soy. C'est à dire, le reste soit à nous: mais non pas ioint et colé en façon, qu'on ne le puisse desprendre sans nous escorcher, et arracher ensemble quelque piece du nostre. La plus grande chose du monde c'est de sçauoir estre à soy. Il est temps de nous desnoüer de la societé, puis que nous n'y pouuons rien apporter. Et qui ne peut prester, qu'il se deffende d'emprunter. Nos forces nous faillent: retirons les, et resserrons en nous. Qui peut renuerser et confondre en soy les offices de tant d'amitiez, et de la compagnie, qu'il le face.	We must untie these strong bonds, and from now on love this and that, but be wedded to nothing but ourselves. That is to say, let the rest be ours, but not joined and glued to us so tightly that it cannot be detached without flaying us and tearing away a piece of us along with it. The greatest thing in the world is to know how to belong to oneself. It is time to untie ourselves from society, since we can bring nothing to it. And let him who cannot lend refrain from borrowing. Our strength is failing us; let us draw it back and gather it within ourselves. Whoever can turn upside down and merge within himself the offices of so many friendships and of company, let him do so.
	En cette cheute, qui le rend inutile, poisant, et importun aux autres, qu'il se garde d'estre importun à soy mesme, et poisant et inutile. Qu'il se flatte et caresse, et sur tout se regente, respectant et craignant sa raison et sa conscience: si qu'il ne puisse sans honte, broncher en leur presence. Rarum est enim, vt satis se quisque vereatur.	In this decline, which makes him useless, burdensome and troublesome to others, let him take care not to be troublesome to himself, or burdensome and useless. Let him pamper and caress himself, and above all govern himself, respecting and fearing his reason and his conscience, so that he cannot stumble in their presence without shame. For it is rare for anyone to respect himself enough.[9]
1.39.9	Socrates dit, que les ieunes se doiuent faire instruire; les hommes s'exercer à bien faire: les vieux se retirer de toute occupation ciuile et militaire, viuants à leur discretion, sans obligation à certain office. Il y a des complexions plus propres à ces preceptes de la retraite les vnes que les autres. Celles qui ont l'apprehension molle et lasche, et vn' affection et volonté delicate, et qui ne s'asseruit et ne s'employe pas aysément, desquels ie suis, et par naturelle condition et par discours, ils se plieront mieux à ce conseil, que les ames actiues et occupées, qui embrassent tout, et s'engagent par tout, qui se passionnent de toutes choses: qui s'offrent, qui se presentent, et qui se donnent à toutes occasions.	Socrates says that the young should get instruction; grown men should practice doing good; old men should withdraw from all civil and military occupation, living as they please, without obligation to any fixed office. Some temperaments are better suited than others to these precepts of retirement. Those whose apprehension is soft and slack, and whose affection and will are delicate and do not readily submit or commit themselves—and I am one of them, both by natural disposition and by reasoning—will bend more easily to this advice than active and busy souls, which embrace everything and engage themselves everywhere, which grow passionate about everything, which offer themselves, present themselves and give themselves on every occasion.

We should make use of these accidental advantages outside ourselves insofar as they are pleasant to us, but without making them our main foundation. Les natures plus roides et plus fortes facent leur cachette mesmes, glorieuse et exemplaire.

hand, as many have done out of devotion and some philosophers by reasoning; to wait on ourselves, sleep on the hard ground, put out our own eyes, throw our riches into the river, seek out pain (the former in order to win, through the torment of this life, the bliss of another; the latter in order, having settled on the lowest step, to secure themselves against a new fall)—that is the action of an excessive virtue. Let the tougher and stronger natures make even their hiding place glorious and exemplary.

I praise a safe and modest lot when means are lacking, brave enough amid cheap things; but when something better and richer comes my way, I too say that they alone are wise and live well whose money is seen invested in handsome country houses.
There is enough for me to do without going so far. It is enough for me, while I enjoy fortune's favor, to prepare for her disfavor, and, while at my ease, to picture the evil to come as far as imagination can reach; just as we train ourselves with jousts and tournaments and imitate war in the midst of peace.

I do not consider the philosopher Arcesilaus any less reformed because I know he used utensils of gold and silver, as the state of his fortune allowed him; and I esteem him more for using them moderately and generously than if he had given them up.

I see how far natural necessity goes; and considering the poor beggar at my door, often merrier and healthier than I am, I put myself in his place; I try to fit my soul to his last. And running through other examples in this way, though I imagine death, poverty, contempt and sickness at my heels, I easily resolve not to be terrified of what a lesser man than I accepts with such patience. And I refuse to believe that a lowly understanding can do more than a vigorous one, or that the effects of reasoning cannot match the effects of habit.

And knowing how little these accessory comforts hang by, I do not fail, even in full enjoyment of them, to beg God, as my supreme request, to make me content with myself and with the goods that

I see sturdy young men who nevertheless carry a mass of pills in their trunks, to use when a cold comes upon them; and they fear it all the less because they think they have the remedy at hand. That is what we must do; and further, if we feel ourselves subject to some more serious illness, we should provide ourselves with those medicines that numb and put to sleep the affected part.

HOW TO LIVE IN RETIREMENT

Choose easy occupations, spare one's health, and hold on to the pleasures that remain.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.39.12 L'occupation qu'il faut choisir à vne telle vie, ce doit estre vne occupation non penible ny ennuyeuse; autrement pour neant ferions nous estat d'y estre venuz chercher le seiour. Cela depend du goust particulier d'vn chacun. Le mien ne s'accommode aucunement au ménage. Ceux qui l'aiment, ils s'y doiuent addonner auec moderation, Conentur sibi res, non se submittere rebus. C'est autrement vn office seruile que la mesnagerie, comme le nomme Saluste. Elle a des parties plus excusables, comme le soing des iardinages que Xenophon attribue à Cyrus.	The occupation to choose for such a life must be one that is neither laborious nor tedious; otherwise there would be no point in our having come there in search of rest. That depends on each person's particular taste. Mine does not take at all to household management. Those who like it should devote themselves to it in moderation: Let them try to subject things to themselves, not themselves to things. Otherwise household management is a servile office, as Sallust calls it. It has more excusable parts, such as the care of gardens that Xenophon attributes to Cyrus.
Et se peut trouuer vn moyen, entre ce bas et vil soing, tendu et plein de solicitude, qu'on voit aux hommes qui s'y plongent du tout; et cette profonde et extreme nonchalance laissant tout aller à l'abandon, qu'on voit en d'autres: Democriti pecus edit agellos / Cultáque, dum peregrè est animus sine corpore velox. Mais oyons le conseil que donne le ieune Pline à Cornelius Rufus son amy, sur ce propos de la solitude: Ie te conseille en cette pleine et grasse retraicte, où tu es, de quitter à tes gens ce bas et abiect soing du mesnage, et t'addonner à l'estude des lettres, pour en tirer quelque chose qui soit toute tienne.	And a middle way can be found between that low and mean care, tense and full of anxiety, which we see in men who plunge into it entirely, and that deep and extreme carelessness that lets everything go to ruin, which we see in others: Democritus's flock eats up his fields / and crops, while his swift mind travels abroad without his body. But let us hear the advice that the younger Pliny gives his friend Cornelius Rufus on this subject of solitude: "I advise you, in that full and rich retreat where you are, to leave to your servants that low and abject care of the household, and devote yourself to the study of letters, so as to draw from it something that is entirely your own."[10]
Il entend la reputation: d'vne pareille humeur à celle de Cicero, qui dit vouloir employer sa solitude et seiour des affaires publiques, à s'en acquerir par ses escrits vne vie immortelle. Vsque adeóne / Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc, sciat alter? Il semble, que ce soit raison, puis qu'on parle de se retirer du monde, qu'on regarde hors de luy. Ceux-cy ne le font qu'à demy. Ils dressent bien leur	He means reputation—in a humor like that of Cicero, who says he wants to use his solitude and his rest from public affairs to win himself an immortal life through his writings. Is your knowing nothing at all / unless someone else knows that you know it? It seems reasonable, since we are talking about withdrawing from the world, that we should look outside it. These people do it only halfway. They arrange their affairs well for when they will no longer be in the world; but the fruit of their design they still expect to draw from the world then, when they are absent—a ridiculous contradiction.

1.39.13 L'imagination de ceux qui par deuotion, cerchent la solitude, remplissants leur courage, de la certitude des promesses diuines, en l'autre vie, est bien plus sainement assortie. Ils se proposent Dieu, obiect infini en bonté et en puissance. L'ame a dequoy y rassasier ses desirs, en toute liberté. Les afflictions, les douleurs, leur viennent à profit, employées à l'acquest d'vne santé et resiouyssance eternelle. La mort, à souhait: passage à vn si parfaict estat. L'aspreté de leurs regles est incontinent applanie par l'accoustumance: et les appetits charnels, rebutez et endormis par leur refus: car rien ne les entretient que l'vsage et l'exercice. Cette seule fin, d'vne autre vie heureusement immortelle, merite loyalement que nous abandonnions les commoditez et douceurs de cette vie nostre.

The notion held by those who seek solitude out of devotion, filling their hearts with the certainty of God's promises in the other life, is far more soundly matched. They set before themselves God, an object infinite in goodness and in power. There the soul has the means to satisfy its desires in complete freedom. Afflictions and sufferings turn to their profit, since they are spent on acquiring an everlasting health and joy. Death is welcome to them: a passage to so perfect a state. The harshness of their rules is soon smoothed out by habit, and their carnal appetites are rebuffed and lulled to sleep by being refused, for nothing keeps those appetites alive but use and exercise. This single end, another life of blissful immortality, truly deserves that we give up the comforts and sweetness of this life of ours.

Et qui peut embraser son ame de l'ardeur de cette viue foy et esperance, reellement et constamment, il se bastit en la solitude, vne vie voluptueuse et delicieuse, au delà de toute autre sorte de vie.

And whoever can set his soul on fire with the ardor of this living faith and hope, really and constantly, builds himself in solitude a life of pleasure and delight beyond any other kind of life.

1.39.14 Ny la fin donc ny le moyen de ce conseil ne me contente: nous retombons tousiours de fieure en chaud mal. Cette occupation des liures, est aussi penible que toute autre; et autant ennemie de la santé, qui doit estre principalement considerée. Et ne se faut point laisser endormir au plaisir qu'on y prend: c'est ce mesme plaisir qui perd le mesnager, l'auaricieux, le voluptueux, et l'ambitieux. Les sages nous apprennent assez, à nous garder de la trahison de noz appetits; et à discerner les vrays plaisirs et entiers, des plaisirs meslez et bigarrez de plus de peine.

So neither the end nor the means of this advice satisfies me: we keep falling from one fever into a worse one. This occupation with books is as laborious as any other, and as much an enemy to health, which ought to be our chief consideration. And we must not let ourselves be lulled by the pleasure we take in it: it is this same pleasure that ruins the man absorbed in his estate, the miser, the sensualist and the ambitious man. The sages teach us well enough to guard against the treachery of our appetites, and to tell true and whole pleasures from pleasures that are mixed and streaked with a greater share of pain.

Car la pluspart des plaisirs, disent ils, nous chatouillent et embrassent pour nous estrangler, comme faisoyent les larrons que les Ægyptiens appelloyent Philistas: et si la douleur de teste nous venoit auant l'yuresse, nous nous garderions de trop boire; mais la volupté, pour nous tromper, marche deuant, et nous cache sa suitte. Les liures sont plaisans: mais si de leur frequentation nous en perdons en fin la gayeté et la santé, nos meilleures pieces,

For most pleasures, they say, tickle and embrace us only to strangle us, like the thieves the Egyptians called Philistae; and if the headache came before the drunkenness, we would take care not to drink too much. But pleasure, to deceive us, walks in front and hides what follows her. Books are pleasant; but if by keeping company with them we end up losing our cheerfulness and our health, the Comme les hommes qui se sentent de long temps affoiblis par quelque indisposition, se rengent à la fin à la mercy de la medecine; et se font desseigner par art certaines regles de viure, pour ne les plus outrepasser: aussi celuy qui se retire ennuié et desgousté de la vie commune, doit former cette-cy, aux regles de la raison; l'ordonner et renger par premeditation et discours.	Men who have long felt themselves weakened by some ailment end up putting themselves at the mercy of medicine, and have its skill lay down certain rules of living for them, so as never to overstep them again. In the same way, the man who withdraws, weary and disgusted with ordinary life, should shape this new life by the rules of reason, ordering and arranging it by forethought and reasoning.

1.39.15	Il doit auoir prins congé de toute espece de trauail, quelque visage qu'il porte; et fuïr en general les passions, qui empeschent la tranquillité du corps et de l'ame; et choisir la route qui est plus selon son humeur: Vnusquisque sua nouerit ire via. Au mesnage, à l'estude, à la chasse, et tout autre exercice, il faut donner iusques aux derniers limites du plaisir; et garder de s'engager plus auant, ou la peine commence à se mesler parmy. Il faut reseruer d'embesoignement et d'occupation, autant seulement, qu'il en est besoing, pour nous tenir en haleine, et pour nous garantir des incommoditez que tire apres soy l'autre extremité d'vne lasche oysiueté et assoupie.	He must have taken leave of every kind of toil, whatever face it wears; he must shun in general the passions that disturb the tranquillity of body and soul, and choose the road that best suits his temperament: Let each one know his own way to go. In managing the household, in study, in hunting and every other exercise, we should go as far as the last limits of pleasure, and take care not to engage further, where pain begins to mingle in. We should keep only as much business and occupation as we need to keep ourselves in trim, and to protect ourselves from the troubles that the other extreme, slack and drowsy idleness, brings in its train.[11]
	Il y a des sciences steriles et épineuses, et la plus part forgées pour la presse: il les faut laisser à ceux qui sont au seruice du monde. Ie n'ayme pour moy, que des liures ou plaisans et faciles; qui me chatouillent; ou ceux qui me consolent, et conseillent à regler ma vie et ma mort. Tacitum syluas inter reptare salubres, / Curantem quidquid dignum sapiente bonòque est.	There are sterile and thorny branches of learning, most of them devised for the busy crowd: they should be left to those who are in the service of the world. For my part, I love only books that are either pleasant and easy, that tickle me, or those that console me and counsel me how to order my life and my death. To stroll in silence among the healthful woods, / Pondering whatever is worthy of a wise and good man.
1.39.16	Les gens plus sages peuuent se forger vn repos tout spirituel, ayant l'ame forte et vigoureuse. Moy qui l'ay commune, il faut que i'ayde à me soustenir par les commoditez corporelles. Et l'aage m'ayant tantost desrobé celles qui estoient plus à ma fantasie, i'instruis et aiguise mon appetit à celles qui restent plus sortables à cette autre saison. Il faut retenir à tout nos dents et nos griffes, l'vsage des plaisirs de la vie, que nos ans nous arrachent des poings, les vns apres les autres: Carpamus dulcia, nostrum est / Quod viuis, cinis et manes et fabula fies.	Wiser people, having a strong and vigorous soul, can forge themselves a wholly spiritual repose. I, whose soul is ordinary, must help hold myself up with bodily comforts. And since age has lately robbed me of those that were most to my fancy, I am training and sharpening my appetite for those that remain, which better suit this later season. We must hold on tooth and claw to the enjoyment of life's pleasures, which our years snatch from our grasp one after another. Let us pluck life's

GLORY HAS NO PLACE IN RETREAT

Pliny and Cicero seek fame from retirement; Epicurus and Seneca advise giving it up.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.39.17 Or quant à la fin que Pline et Cicero nous proposent, de la gloire, c'est bien loing de mon conte. La plus contraire humeur à la retraicte, c'est l'ambition. La gloire et le repos sont choses qui ne peuuent loger en mesme giste: à ce que ie voy, ceux-cy n'ont que les bras et les iambes hors de la presse; leur ame, leur intention y demeure engagée plus que iamais. Tun', vetule, auriculis alienis colligis escas? Ils se sont seulement reculez pour mieux sauter, et pour d'vn plus fort mouuement faire vne plus viue faucée dans la trouppe.	Now as for the end that Pliny and Cicero propose to us, glory, that is far from my reckoning. The temperament most contrary to retirement is ambition. Glory and repose are things that cannot lodge under the same roof. As far as I can see, these men have only their arms and legs out of the crowd; their soul, their intention, remains caught up in it more than ever. Are you, old man, gathering food for other people's ears? They have only stepped back to jump the better, and to make, with a stronger momentum, a livelier charge into the throng.
1.39.18 Vous plaist-il voir comme ils tirent court d'vn grain? Mettons au contrepoix, l'aduis de deux philosophes, et de deux sectes tres-differentes, escriuans l'vn à Idomeneus, l'autre à Lucilius leurs amis, pour du maniement des affaires et des grandeurs, les retirer à la solitude. Vous auez, disent-ils, vescu nageant et flottant iusques à present, venez vous en mourir au port. Vous auez donné le reste de vostre vie à la lumiere, donnez cecy à l'ombre. Il est impossible de quitter les occupations, si vous n'en quittez le fruit; à cette cause desfaictes vous de tout soing de nom et de gloire. Il est danger que la lueur de voz actions passées, ne vous esclaire que trop, et vous suiue iusques dans vostre taniere.	Would you like to see how they fall short by a hair? Let us set against them the advice of two philosophers of two very different schools, one writing to Idomeneus, the other to Lucilius, their friends, to draw them away from the handling of affairs and high office into solitude. You have lived until now, they say, swimming and floating; come and die in the harbor. You have given the rest of your life to the light; give this part to the shade. It is impossible to give up your occupations unless you give up their fruits; for this reason, rid yourself of all concern for name and glory. There is a danger that the glow of your past actions may light you up only too well and follow you right into your den.[12]
Quittez auecq les autres voluptez, celle qui vient de l'approbation d'autruy. Et quant à vostre science et suffisance, ne vous chaille, elle ne perdra pas son effect, si vous en valez mieux vous mesme. Souuienne vous de celuy, à qui comme on demandast, à quoy faire il se pénoit si fort en vn art, qui ne pouuoit venir à la cognoissance de guere de gens: I'en ay assez de peu, respondit-il, i'en ay assez d'vn, i'en ay assez de pas vn. Il disoit vray: vous et vn compagnon estes assez suffisant theatre l'vn à l'autre, ou vous à vous-mesmes. Que le peuple vous soit vn, et vn vous soit tout le peuple.	Along with the other pleasures, give up the one that comes from the approval of others. And as for your learning and ability, do not worry: they will not lose their effect if you yourself are the better for them. Remember the man who was asked why he took such pains over an art that could come to the knowledge of hardly anyone. "A few are enough for me," he replied; "one is enough for me; none at all is enough for me." He spoke the truth: you and one companion are theater enough for each other, or you for yourself. Let the people be one to you, and let one be the whole people to you.

12 Epicurus wrote to Idomeneus and Seneca to Lucilius; the advice that follows comes from Seneca's Letters to Lucilius.

FRENCH

C’est vne lâche ambition de vouloir tirer gloire de son oysiueté, et de sa cachette. Il faut faire comme les animaux, qui effacent la trace, à la porte de leur taniere. Ce n’est plus ce qu’il vous faut chercher, que le monde parle de vous, mais comme il faut que vous parliez à vous-mesmes. Retirez vous en vous, mais preparez vous premierement de vous y receuoir: ce seroit folie de vous fier à vous mesmes, si vous ne vous sçauez gouuerner.

Il y a moyen de faillir en la solitude, comme en la compagnie: iusques à ce que vous vous soyez rendu tel, deuant qui vous n’osiez clocher, et iusques à ce que vous ayez honte et respect de vous mesmes, obuersentur species honestæ animo: presentez vous tousiours en l’imagination Caton, Phocion, et Aristides, en la presence desquels les fols mesme cacheroient leurs fautes, et establissez les contrerolleurs de toutes vos intentions.

Si elles se detraquent, leur reuerence vous remettra en train: ils vous contiendront en cette voye, de vous contenter de vous mesmes, de n’emprunter rien que de vous, d’arrester et fermir vostre ame en certaines et limitées cogitations, où elle se puisse plaire: et ayant entendu les vrays biens, desquels on iouyt à mesure qu’on les entend, s’en contenter, sans desir de prolongement de vie ny de nom. Voyla le conseil de la vraye et naifue philosophie, non d’vne philosophie ostentatrice et parliere, comme est celle des deux premiers.

ENGLISH

It is a mean ambition to want to draw glory from one’s idleness and one’s hiding place. We must do as the animals do that wipe out their tracks at the entrance of their den. What you must seek is no longer that the world should talk about you, but how you should talk to yourself. Withdraw into yourself, but first prepare yourself to receive yourself there: it would be folly to trust yourself if you do not know how to govern yourself.

One can go wrong in solitude as in company. Until you have made yourself someone before whom you would not dare to limp, and until you feel shame and respect for yourself, let honorable images be kept before the mind: always picture Cato, Phocion and Aristides, in whose presence even fools would hide their faults, and make them the overseers of all your intentions.[13]

If your intentions go astray, your reverence for these men will set you back on course. They will keep you on this path: to be content with yourself, to borrow nothing except from yourself, to stop and settle your soul on definite and limited thoughts in which it can take pleasure; and, having understood the true goods, which we enjoy in proportion as we understand them, to be content with them, without any desire to prolong either life or name. That is the advice of true and natural philosophy, not of a showy and talkative philosophy like that of the first two.

13 The Latin phrase is from Cicero, Tusculan Disputations.

I.40 A Consideration upon Cicero

Consideration sur Ciceron

Cicero and Pliny's craving for literary fame is unworthy of statesmen; Montaigne also reflects on his own letters and style.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.40.1	ENCOR' vn traict à la comparaison de ces couples. Il se tire des escrits de Cicero, et de ce Pline peu retirant, à mon aduis, aux humeurs de son oncle, infinis tesmoignages de nature outre mesure ambitieuse: entre autres qu'ils sollicitent au sceu de tout le monde, les historiens de leur temps, de ne les oublier en leurs registres: et la fortune comme par despit, a faict durer iusques à nous la vanité de ces requestes, et pieça faict perdre ces histoires.	ONE more stroke for the comparison of these pairs. From the writings of Cicero, and of that Pliny who, in my opinion, takes very little after his uncle's temperament, one can draw countless testimonies of a nature ambitious beyond measure. Among others, they solicit the historians of their time, in full view of everyone, not to forget them in their records; and Fortune, as if out of spite, has made the vanity of these requests last down to us, and long ago caused those histories to be lost.[1]
1.40.2	Mais cecy surpasse toute bassesse de cœur, en personnes de tel rang, d'auoir voulu tirer quelque principale gloire du cacquet, et de la parlerie, iusques à y employer les lettres priuées escriptes à leurs amis: en maniere, que aucunes ayans failly leur saison pour estre enuoyées, ils les font ce neantmoins publier auec cette digne excuse, qu'ils n'ont pas voulu perdre leur trauail et veillées. Sied-il pas bien à deux consuls Romains, souuerains magistrats de la chose publique emperiere du monde, d'employer leur loisir, à ordonner et fagotter gentiment vne belle missiue, pour en tirer la reputation, de bien entendre le langage de leur nourrisse? Que feroit pis vn simple maistre d'escole qui en gaignast sa vie?	But this surpasses all baseness of heart in persons of such rank: to have wanted to draw some chief glory from chatter and talk, to the point of using for it the private letters written to their friends; so much so that when some of these had missed the moment for being sent, they nevertheless had them published, with this worthy excuse, that they did not want to waste their labor and their late nights. Is it not fitting for two Roman consuls, sovereign magistrates of the commonwealth that was empress of the world, to spend their leisure arranging and neatly trussing up a fine missive, so as to win the reputation of understanding their nurse's language well? What worse could a mere schoolmaster do, who earned his living by it?

mesme: et me feroit on desplaisir de me desloger de cette creance.

1.40.3 C'est vne espece de mocquerie et d'iniure, de vouloir faire valoir vn homme, par des qualitez mes-aduenantes à son rang; quoy qu'elles soient autrement loüables; et par les qualitez aussi qui ne doiuent pas estre les siennes principales. Comme qui loüeroit vn Roy d'estre bon peintre, ou bon architecte, ou encore bon arquebuzier, ou bon coureur de bague. Ces loüanges ne font honneur, si elles ne sont presentées en foule, et à la suitte de celles qui luy sont propres: à sçauoir de la iustice, et de la science de conduire son peuple en paix et en guerre. De cette façon faict honneur à Cyrus l'agriculture, et à Charlemaigne l'eloquence, et cognoissance des bonnes lettres.

I'ay veu de mon temps, en plus forts termes, des personnages, qui tiroient d'escrire, et leurs tiltres, et leur vocation, desaduoüer leur apprentissage, corrompre leur plume, et affecter l'ignorance de qualité si vulgaire, et que nostre peuple tient, ne se rencontrer guere en mains sçauantes: et prendre souci, de se recommander par meilleures qualitez. Les compagnons de Demosthenes en l'ambassade vers Philippus, loüoyent ce Prince d'estre beau, eloquent, et bon beuueur: Demosthenes disoit que c'estoient louanges qui appartenoient mieux à vne femme, à vn Aduocat, à vne esponge, qu'à vn Roy.

Imperet bellante prior, iacentem
Lenis in hostem. Ce n'est pas sa profession de sçauoir, ou bien chasser, ou bien dancer, Orabunt causas alij, cœlique meæ us

ciently prove, and Terence admits it himself; and it would displease me to be dislodged from this belief.[2]

It is a kind of mockery and insult to try to make a man look good by qualities unbecoming to his rank, however praiseworthy they may be in other respects, and also by qualities that ought not to be his principal ones. As if one were to praise a king for being a good painter, or a good architect, or even a good shot with the arquebus, or good at running at the ring. Such praises bring no honor unless they are offered in a crowd, following those that are proper to him: namely justice, and the knowledge of how to lead his people in peace and in war. In this way agriculture does honor to Cyrus, and eloquence and knowledge of good letters to Charlemagne.

In my time I have seen an even stronger case: persons who owed both their titles and their calling to writing disowning their training, spoiling their pen, and affecting ignorance of so common a skill, one that our people hold is rarely found in learned hands, and taking care to recommend themselves by better qualities. The companions of Demosthenes on the embassy to Philip praised that prince for being handsome, eloquent and a good drinker. Demosthenes said these were praises better suited to a woman, a lawyer and a sponge than to a king.

Let him rule, superior to the foe in battle,
Lenient to the fallen enemy. It is not his profession to know how to hunt well or to dance well. Others will plead causes, will trace the motions of the heavens
With the rod, and tell of the shining stars;
Let this man know how to rule the peoples with his sway.[3]

Plutarch says further that to appear so excellent in these less necessary accomplishments is to bring forward evidence against oneself of having badly spent one's leisure and the study that should have been devoted to more necessary and useful things. So when Philip, king of Macedon, heard his son, the great Alexander, sing at a feast in rivalry with the best musicians, he said to him: "Are you not ashamed to sing so well?" And to this same Philip, a musician with whom he was arguing about his art said: "God forbid, Sire, that so much harm should ever befall you that you understand these things better than I do."

Vn Roy doit pouuoir respondre, comme Iphicrates respondit à l'orateur qui le pressoit en son inuectiue de cette maniere: Et bien qu'es-tu, pour faire tant le braue? es-tu homme d'armes, es-tu archer, es-tu piquier? Ie ne suis rien de tout cela, mais ie suis celuy qui sçait commander à tous ceux-là. Et Antisthenes print pour argument de peu de valeur en Ismenias, dequoy on le vantoit d'estre excellent ioüeur de flustes.

A king should be able to answer as Iphicrates answered the orator who pressed him in his invective in this way: "Well, what are you, to swagger so much? Are you a man-at-arms? Are you an archer? Are you a pikeman?" "I am none of those, but I am the one who knows how to command all of them." And Antisthenes took it as proof of little worth in Ismenias that he was praised for being an excellent flute player.

1.40.5 Ie sçay bien, quand i'oy quelqu'vn, qui s'arreste au langage des Essais, que i'aimeroye mieux, qu'il s'en teust. Ce n'est pas tant esleuer les mots, comme deprimer le sens: d'autant plus picquamment, que plus obliquement. Si suis-ie trompé si guere d'autres donnent plus à prendre en la matiere: et comment que ce soit, mal ou bien, si nul escriuain l'a semée, ny guere plus materielle, ny au moins plus drue, en son papier. Pour en ranger d'auantage, ie n'en entasse que les testes. Que i'y attache leur suitte, ie multiplieray plusieurs fois ce volume. Et combien y ay-ie espandu d'histoires, qui ne disent mot, lesquelles qui voudra esplucher vn peu plus curieusement, en produira infinis Essais?

1.40.5 I know well, when I hear someone dwelling on the language of these Essays, that I would rather he kept quiet. It is not so much exalting the words as disparaging the sense, and all the more cuttingly for being more oblique. And yet I am much mistaken if many others give more to take hold of in their matter; and, be it bad or good, I am mistaken if any writer has sown his paper with matter much more substantial, or at any rate more thickly. To fit in more of it, I pile up only the heads. If I were to attach what follows from them, I would multiply this volume several times over. And how many stories have I scattered here that say not a word, but from which anyone who cares to pick them apart a little more carefully will produce countless essays?

Ny elles, ny mes allegations, ne seruent pas tousiours simplement d'exemple, d'authorité ou d'ornement. Ie ne les regarde pas seulement par l'vsage, que i'en tire. Elles portent souuent, hors de mon propos, la semence d'vne matiere plus riche et plus hardie: et souuent à gauche, vn ton plus delicat, et pour moy, qui n'en veux en ce lieu exprimer d'auantage, et pour ceux qui rencontreront mon air.

Neither they nor my quotations always serve simply as example, authority or ornament. I do not regard them only for the use I draw from them. They often carry, beyond my subject, the seed of a richer and bolder matter, and often, on the side, a subtler tone, both for myself, who do not wish to express more of it here, and for those who catch my drift.

1.40.6 Retournant à la vertu parliere, ie ne trouue pas grand choix, entre ne sçauoir dire que mal, ou ne sçauoir rien que bien dire. Non est ornamentum virile, concinnitas. Les Sages disent, que pour le regard du sçauoir, il n'est que la philosophie, et pour le regard des effects, que la vertu, qui generalement soit propre à tous degrez, et à tous ordres.

1.40.6 Returning to the talking virtue, I do not find much to choose between knowing how to say nothing but badly and knowing nothing but how to speak well. Elegance is no manly ornament. The sages say that in respect of knowledge there is only philosophy, and in respect of deeds only virtue, that is generally fitting for all ranks and all orders.[4]

1.40.7 Il y a quelque chose de pareil en ces autres deux philosophes: car ils promettent aussi eternité aux lettres qu'ils escriuent à leurs amis. Mais c'est d'autre façon, et s'accommodans pour vne bonne fin, à la vanité d'autruy. Car ils leur mandent, que si le soing de se faire cognoistre aux siecles aduenir, et de la renommée les arreste encore au maniement des affaires, et leur fait craindre la solitude et la retraite, où ils les veulent appeller; qu'ils ne s'en donnent plus de peine: d'autant qu'ils ont assez de credit auec la posterité, pour leur respondre, que ne fust que par les lettres qu'ils leur escriuent, ils rendront leur nom aussi cogneu et fameux que pourroient faire leurs actions publiques.

There is something similar in those other two philosophers, for they too promise eternity to the letters they write to their friends. But it is in another manner, and they accommodate themselves to the vanity of others for a good end. For they write to them that if the concern to make themselves known to future ages, and the care for renown, still keeps them in the handling of affairs and makes them fear the solitude and retirement to which they want to call them, they should trouble themselves no further about it: they themselves have credit enough with posterity to promise that, were it only through the letters they write to them, they will make their friends' names as well known and famous as their public actions could.[5]

Et outre cette difference; encore ne sont-ce pas lettres vuides et descharnées, qui ne se soustiennent que par vn delicat chois de mots, entassez et rangez à vne iuste cadence; ains farcies et pleines de beaux discours de sapience, par lesquelles on se rend non plus eloquent, mais plus sage, et qui nous apprennent non à bien dire, mais à bien faire. Fy de l'eloquence qui nous laisse enuie de soy, non des choses. Si ce n'est qu'on die que celle de Cicero, estant en si extreme perfection, se donne corps elle mesme. I'adiousteray encore vn compte que nous lisons de luy, à ce propos, pour nous faire toucher au doigt son naturel.

And besides this difference, these are not empty, fleshless letters, held up only by a delicate choice of words piled up and arranged in an exact cadence, but letters stuffed full of fine reasonings of wisdom, by which one becomes not more eloquent but wiser, and which teach us not to speak well but to do well. Shame on eloquence that leaves us longing for itself and not for things! Unless one says that Cicero's, being of such extreme perfection, gives itself a body of its own. I will add one more story we read about him on this subject, to let us put our finger on his nature.

Il auoit à orer en public, et estoit vn peu pressé du temps, pour se preparer à son aise: Eros, l'vn de ses serfs, le vint aduertir, que l'audience estoit remise au lendemain: il en fut si aise, qu'il luy donna liberté pour cette bonne nouuelle.

He was to speak in public and was a little short of time to prepare at his ease. Eros, one of his slaves, came to tell him that the hearing had been put off until the next day. He was so delighted that he set him free for this good news.

1.40.8 Sur ce subiect de lettres, ie veux dire ce mot; que c'est vn ouurage, auquel mes amis tiennent, que ie puis quelque chose. Et eusse prins plus volontiers cette forme à publier mes verues, si i'eusse eu à qui parler. Il me falloit, comme ie l'ay eu autrefois, vn certain commerce, qui m'attirast, qui me soustinst, et sousleuast. Car de negocier au vent, comme d'autres, ie ne sçauroy, que de songe: ny forger des vains noms à entretenir, en chose serieuse: ennemy iuré de toute espece de falsification. I'eusse esté plus attentif, et plus seur, ayant vne addresse forte et amie, que regardant les diuers visages d'vn peuple: et suis deçeu, s'il ne m'eust mieux succedé. I'ay naturellement vn stile comique et priué.

On this subject of letters, I want to say this: it is a kind of work in which my friends hold that I have some ability. And I would more willingly have chosen this form for publishing my whims, if I had had someone to talk to. I needed, as I once had, a certain relationship that would draw me on, sustain me and lift me up. For I could not negotiate with the wind, as others do, except in dreams; nor forge empty names to address in a serious matter, being the sworn enemy of every kind of falsification. I would have been more attentive and more confident with a strong and friendly addressee than I am looking at the various faces of a public; and I am mistaken if it would not have turned out better for me. I naturally have a comic and private style.[6]

	Mais c'est d'vne forme mienne, inepte aux negotiations publiques, comme en toutes façons est mon langage, trop serré, desordonné, couppé, particulier.	But it is a form of my own, unfit for public dealings, as my language is in every way: too compressed, disorderly, abrupt, idiosyncratic.
1.40.9	Et ne m'entens pas en lettres ceremonieuses, qui n'ont autre substance, que d'vne belle enfileure de paroles courtoises. Ie n'ay ny la faculté, ny le goust de ces longues offres d'affection et de seruice. Ie n'en crois pas tant; et me desplaist d'en dire guere, outre ce que i'en crois. C'est bien loing de l'vsage present: car il ne fut iamais si abiecte et seruile prostitution de presentations: la vie, l'ame, deuotion, adoration, serf, esclaue, tous ces mots y courent si vulgairement, que quand ils veulent faire sentir vne plus expresse volonté et plus respectueuse, ils n'ont plus de maniere pour l'exprimer.	And I have no skill in ceremonious letters that have no other substance than a fine stringing together of courteous words. I have neither the faculty nor the taste for those long offers of affection and service. I do not believe in them so much, and I dislike saying much beyond what I believe. This is far from present usage: for there was never so abject and servile a prostitution of self-offerings. Life, soul, devotion, adoration, serf, slave: all these words are bandied about so commonly that when people want to convey a more explicit and more respectful intention, they no longer have any way to express it.
1.40.10	Ie hay à mort de sentir au flateur. Qui faict que ie me iette naturellement à vn parler sec, rond et cru, qui tire à qui ne me cognoit d'ailleurs, vn peu vers le desdaigneux. I'honnore le plus ceux que i'honnore le moins: et où mon ame marche d'vne grande allegresse, i'oublie les pas de la contenance: et m'offre maigrement et fierement, à ceux à qui ie suis: et me presente moins, à qui ie me suis le plus donné. Il me semble qu'ils le doiuent lire en mon cœur, et que l'expression de mes paroles, fait tort à ma conception.	I hate like death to smack of the flatterer. This makes me fall naturally into a dry, plain and blunt way of talking that, to those who do not otherwise know me, verges a little on the disdainful. Those I honor most are the ones I show least honor to; and where my soul moves with great eagerness, I forget the steps of good form. I offer myself meagerly and proudly to those whose I am, and present myself least to those to whom I have given myself most. It seems to me that they should read it in my heart, and that the expression of my words wrongs my thought.

A bienuienner, à prendre congé, à remercier, à salüer, à presenter mon seruice, et tels compliments verbeux des loix ceremonieuses de nostre ciuilité, ie ne cognois personne si sottement sterile de langage que moy. Et n'ay iamais esté employé à faire des lettres de faueur et recommendation, que celuy pour qui c'estoit, n'aye trouuées seches et lasches. Ce sont grands imprimeurs de lettres, que les Italiens, i'en ay, ce crois-ie, cent diuers volumes. Celles de Annibale Caro me semblent les meilleures. Si tout le papier que i'ay autresfois barbouillé pour les dames, estoit en nature, lors que ma main estoit veritablement emportée par ma passion, il s'en trouueroit à l'aduenture quelque page digne d'estre communiquée à la ieunesse oysiue, embabouinée de cette fureur.

1.40.11 I'escrits mes lettres tousiours en poste, et si precipiteusement, que quoy que ie peigne insupportablement mal, i'ayme mieux escrire de ma main, que d'y en employer vn' autre, car ie n'en trouue point qui me puisse suiure, et ne les transcrits iamais. I'ay accoustumé les grands, qui me cognoissent, à y supporter des litures et des trasseures, et vn papier sans plieure et sans marge. Celles qui me coustent le plus, sont celles qui valent le moins. Depuis que ie les traine, c'est signe que ie n'y suis pas. Ie commence volontiers sans proiect; le premier traict produit le second. Les lettres de ce temps, sont plus en bordures et prefaces, qu'en matiere.

Comme i'ayme mieux composer deux lettres, que d'en clorre et plier vne; et resigne tousiours cette commission à quelque autre: de mesme quand la matiere est acheuée, ie donrois volontiers à quelqu'vn la charge d'y adiouster ces longues harangues, offres, et prieres, que nous logeons sur la fin, et desire que quelque nouuel vsage nous en descharge. Comme aussi de les inscrire d'vne legende de qualitez et tiltres, pour ausquels ne broncher, i'ay maintesfois laissé d'escrire, et notamment à gens de iustice et de finance. Tant d'innouations d'offices, vne si difficile dispensation et ordonnance de diuers noms d'honneur; lesquels estans si cherement achetez, ne peuuent estre eschangez, ou oubliez sans offence.

Ie trouue pareillement de mauuaise grace, d'en charger le front et inscription des liures, que nous faisons imprimer.

In welcoming, taking leave, thanking, greeting, offering my service, and such wordy compliments of the ceremonious laws of our civility, I know no one so stupidly barren of language as I am. And I have never been employed to write letters of favor and recommendation without the person they were for finding them dry and feeble. The Italians are great printers of letters; I have, I believe, a hundred different volumes of them. Those of Annibale Caro seem to me the best. If all the paper I once scribbled for the ladies, when my hand was truly carried away by my passion, still existed, there might perhaps be found some page worth showing to idle youth, besotted with that frenzy.[7]

I always write my letters post-haste, and so hurriedly that, although my handwriting is unbearably bad, I prefer to write with my own hand than to use another's, for I find no one who can keep up with me; and I never copy them out. I have accustomed the great who know me to put up with crossings-out and overwritings in them, and with paper without folds or margins. The letters that cost me most are the ones worth least. As soon as I drag them out, it is a sign that I am not in them. I like to begin without a plan; the first stroke produces the second. The letters of our time consist more of borders and prefaces than of matter.

Just as I would rather compose two letters than close and fold one, and always hand that task over to someone else, so too, when the matter is finished, I would gladly give someone the job of adding those long harangues, offers and prayers that we lodge at the end, and I wish some new usage would relieve us of them. Likewise with addressing them with a legend of qualities and titles: for fear of stumbling over these, I have many times given up writing, especially to men of the law and of finance. So many newly created offices, so difficult an allotment and arrangement of different titles of honor, which, being so dearly bought, cannot be exchanged or forgotten without giving offense.[8]

I likewise find it graceless to load the front and title page of the books we have printed with them.

7 Annibale Caro (1507–1566) was an Italian poet and translator whose letters were published after his death.
8 In Montaigne's France many public offices, with their titles, were bought and sold.

I.41 Of Not Sharing One's Glory

De ne communiquer sa gloire

Glory is the hardest vanity to shed, yet some men have rare greatness enough to give their glory to others.

FRENCH

1.41.1 DE toutes les resueries du monde, la plus receuë et plus vniuerselle, est le soing de la reputation et de la gloire, que nous espousons iusques à quitter les richesses, le repos, la vie et la santé, qui sont biens effectuels et substantiaux, pour suyure cette vaine image, et cette simple voix, qui n'a ny corps ny prise: La fama
ch'inuaghisce a vn dolce suono
Gli superbi mortali, et par' si bella,
E vn echo, vn sogno, anzi d'vn sogno vn' ombra
Ch' ad ogni vento si delegua et sgombra.

1.41.2 Et des humeurs des-raisonnables des hommes, il semble que les philosophes mesmes se défacent plus tard et plus enuis de cette-cy que de nulle autre: c'est la plus reuesche et opiniastre. Quia etiam bene proficientes animos tentare non cessat. Il n'en est guiere de laquelle la raison accuse si clairement la vanité: mais elle a ses racines si vifues en nous, que ie ne sçay si iamais aucun s'en est peu nettement descharger. Apres que vous auez tout dict et tout creu, pour la desaduouer, elle produict contre vostre discours vne inclination si intestine, que vous auez peu que tenir à l'encontre.

Car comme dit Cicero, ceux mesmes qui la combatent, encores veulent-ils, que les liures, qu'ils en escriuent, portent au front leur nom, et se veulent rendre glorieux de ce qu'ils ont mesprisé la gloire.

1.41.3 Toutes autres choses tombent en commerce. Nous prestons nos biens et nos vies au besoin de nos amis: mais de communiquer son honneur, et d'estrener autruy de sa gloire, il ne se voit gueres. Catulus Luctatius en la guerre contre les Cymbres, ayant faict tous efforts pour arrester ses soldats qui fuioient deuant les ennemis, se mit luy-mesmes entre les fuyards, et contrefit le coüard, affin qu'ils semblassent plustost suiure leur Capitaine, que

OF all the fancies in the world, the most accepted and most universal is concern for reputation and glory, which we espouse to the point of giving up wealth, rest, life and health, which are real and substantial goods, to follow that empty image and that mere voice that has neither body nor anything to grasp. Fame, which with sweet sound beguiles
Proud mortals and seems so fair,
Is an echo, a dream, nay, the shadow of a dream,
That at every wind melts and vanishes.[1]

And of all the unreasonable dispositions of men, it seems that even the philosophers rid themselves of this one later and more reluctantly than of any other: it is the most intractable and stubborn. Because it does not cease to tempt even souls that are making good progress. There is hardly any whose vanity reason exposes so clearly; but it has its roots so alive in us that I do not know whether anyone has ever been able to rid himself of it cleanly. After you have said everything and believed everything to disown it, it produces against your reasoning an inclination so deep within you that you have little to hold out against it.[2]

For, as Cicero says, even those who fight it still want the books they write about it to bear their name on the title page, and want to win glory from having despised glory.

All other things can be shared. We lend our goods and our lives to our friends in need; but to share one's honor and make a present of one's glory to another is hardly ever seen. Catulus Lutatius, in the war against the Cimbri, having made every effort to stop his soldiers who were fleeing before the enemy, put himself among the fugitives and played the coward, so that they would seem to be fuyr l'ennemy: c'estoit abandonner sa reputation, pour couurir la honte d'autruy.

Quand Charles cinquiesme passa en Prouence, l'an mil cinq cens trente sept, on tient que Antoine de Leue voyant l'Empereur resolu de ce voyage, et l'estimant luy estre merueilleusement glorieux, opinoit toutesfois le contraire, et le desconseilloit, à cette fin que toute la gloire et honneur de ce conseil, en fust attribué à son maistre: et qu'il fust dict, son bon aduis et sa preuoyance auoit esté telle, que contre l'opinion de tous, il eust mis à fin vne si belle entreprinse: qui estoit l'honorer à ses despens.

Les Ambassadeurs Thraciens, consolans Archileonide mere de Brasidas, de la mort de son fils, et le haut-louans, iusques à dire, qu'il n'auoit point laissé son pareil: elle refusa cette louange priuee et particuliere, pour la rendre au public: Ne me dites pas cela, fit-elle, ie sçay que la ville de Sparte a plusieurs citoyens plus grands et plus vaillans qu'il n'estoit.

En la bataille de Crecy, le Prince de Gales, encores fort ieune, auoit l'auant-garde à conduire: le principal effort du rencontre, fust en cet endroit: les Seigneurs qui l'accompagnoient se trouuans en dur party d'armes, manderent au Roy Edoüard de s'approcher, pour les secourir: il s'enquit de l'estat de son fils, et luy ayant esté respondu, qu'il estoit viuant et à cheual: Ie luy ferois, dit-il, tort de luy aller maintenant desrober l'honneur de la victoire de ce combat, qu'il a si long temps soustenu: quelque hazard qu'il y ait, elle sera toute sienne: et n'y voulut aller ny enuoyer: sçachant s'il y fust allé, qu'on eust dit que tout estoit perdu sans son secours, et qu'on luy eust attribué l'aduantage de cet exploit.

Semper enim quod postremum adiectum est, id rem totam videtur traxisse. Plusieurs estimoient à Rome, et se disoit communément que les principaux beaux-faits de Scipion estoient en partie deuz à Lælius, qui toutesfois alla tousiours promouuant et secondant la grandeur et gloire de Scipion, sans aucun soing de la sienne. following their captain rather than fleeing the enemy: that was abandoning his reputation to cover the shame of others.[3]

When Charles the Fifth came into Provence in the year 1537, it is said that Antonio de Leyva, seeing the Emperor resolved on this expedition and judging that it would bring him marvelous glory, nevertheless argued the opposite and advised against it, so that all the glory and honor of the decision would be attributed to his master, and it would be said that his good judgment and foresight had been such that, against everyone's opinion, he had carried so fine an enterprise through to the end: which was honoring him at his own expense.

When the Thracian ambassadors were consoling Archileonis, mother of Brasidas, for the death of her son, and praising him so highly as to say that he had left no equal behind him, she refused this private and personal praise in order to give it back to the public. "Do not tell me that," she said; "I know that the city of Sparta has many citizens greater and more valiant than he was."[4]

At the battle of Crécy, the Prince of Wales, still very young, had the vanguard to lead, and the main brunt of the encounter fell at that point. The lords accompanying him, finding themselves hard pressed in the fighting, sent word to King Edward to come nearer and help them. He asked how his son was, and when told that he was alive and on horseback, he said: "I would wrong him if I went now and robbed him of the honor of victory in this combat he has sustained so long; whatever the risk, it shall be all his." And he would neither go nor send anyone, knowing that if he had gone, people would have said that all was lost without his help, and the credit for this feat would have been given to him.[5]

For it is always the last thing added that seems to have accomplished the whole. Many in Rome believed, and it was commonly said, that Scipio's chief fine deeds were partly owed to Laelius, who nevertheless always went on promoting and supporting Scipio's greatness and glory, with no concern for his own. And Theopompus, king of Sparta, said to 1.41.4 Comme les femmes, qui succedoient aux pairries, auoient, nonobstant leur sexe, droit d'assister et opiner aux causes, qui appartiennent à la iurisdiction des pairs: aussi les pairs ecclesiastiques, nonobstant leur profession, estoient tenus d'assister nos Roys en leurs guerres, non seulement de leurs amis et seruiteurs, mais de leur personne. Aussi l'Euesque de Beauuais, se trouuant auec Philippe Auguste en la bataille de Bouuines, participoit bien fort courageusement à l'effect: mais il luy sembloit, ne deuoir toucher au fruit et gloire de cet exercice sanglant et violent. Il mena de sa main plusieurs des ennemis à raison, ce iour là, et les donnoit au premier Gentilhomme qu'il trouuoit, à esgosiller, ou prendre prisonniers, luy en resignant toute l'execution.

Et le feit ainsi de Guillaume Comte de Salsberi à messire Iean de Nesle. D'vne pareille subtilité de conscience, à cet autre: il vouloit bien assommer, mais non pas blesser: et pourtant ne combattoit que de masse. Quelcun en mes iours, estant reproché par le Roy d'auoir mis les mains sur vn prestre, le nioit fort et ferme: c'estoit qu'il l'auoit battu et foulé aux pieds.

the man who told him that the state stood firm because he knew how to command well: "It is rather because the people know how to obey well."[6]

Just as women who succeeded to peerages had, notwithstanding their sex, the right to attend and give their opinion in cases belonging to the jurisdiction of the peers, so the ecclesiastical peers, notwithstanding their profession, were obliged to assist our kings in their wars, not only with their friends and servants but in person. So the Bishop of Beauvais, being with Philip Augustus at the battle of Bouvines, took a very courageous part in the action; but it seemed to him that he ought not to touch the fruit and glory of that bloody and violent exercise. With his own hand he brought several of the enemy to submission that day, and handed them over to the first gentleman he found, to cut their throats or take them prisoner, leaving the whole execution to him.[7]

And so he did with William, Earl of Salisbury, whom he handed over to Sir Jean de Nesle. His was a subtlety of conscience like that of another man, who was quite willing to club men down but not to wound them, and so fought only with a mace. Someone in my day, reproached by the King for having laid hands on a priest, denied it flatly: the fact was that he had beaten him and trampled him underfoot.

7 At Bouvines (1214) Philip Augustus of France defeated the Emperor Otto IV and his allies, among them William, Earl of Salisbury.

I.42 Of the Inequality That Is Between Us

De l'inegualité qui est entre nous
Men should be valued by their own qualities, not their trappings; Montaigne shows how kingship weighs on those who hold it.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.42.1	PLVTARQVE dit en quelque lieu, qu'il ne trouue point si grande distance de beste à beste, comme il trouue d'homme à homme. Il parle de la suffisance de l'ame et qualitez internes. A la verité ie trouue si loing d'Epaminundas, comme ie l'imagine, iusques à tel que ie cognois, ie dy capable de sens commun, que i'encherirois volontiers sur Plutarque: et dirois qu'il y a plus de distance de tel à tel homme, qu'il n'y a de tel homme à telle beste: Hem! vir viro quid præstat! et qu'il y a autant de degrez d'esprits, qu'il y a d'icy au ciel de brasses, et autant innumerables.	PLUTARCH says somewhere that he does not find so great a distance between beast and beast as he finds between man and man. He is speaking of the ability of the soul and inner qualities. In truth, I find so great a distance between Epaminondas, as I imagine him, and some men I know (men capable of common sense, I mean) that I would gladly go further than Plutarch and say that there is more distance between one man and another than there is between some men and some beasts. Ah! how one man surpasses another! And I would say that there are as many degrees of minds as there are fathoms from here to heaven, and just as innumerable.[1]
1.42.2	Mais à propos de l'estimation des hommes, c'est merueille que sauf nous, aucune chose ne s'estime que par ses propres qualitez. Nous loüons vn cheual de ce qu'il est vigoureux et adroit, Volucrem Sic laudamus equum, facili cui plurima palma Feruet, et exultat rauco victoria circo, non de son harnois: vn leurier, de sa vistesse, non de son colier: vn oyseau, de son aile, non de ses longes et sonnettes. Pourquoy de mesmes n'estimons nous vn homme par ce qui est sien? Il a vn grand train, vn beau palais, tant de credit, tant de rente: tout cela est autour de luy, non en luy.	But speaking of how men are valued, it is a marvel that, except for ourselves, nothing is valued except by its own qualities. We praise a horse for being vigorous and nimble, Thus we praise The swift horse, for whom many palms Glow from easy wins, and victory exults in the roaring circus, not for its harness; a greyhound for its speed, not for its collar; a bird for its wing, not for its jesses and bells. Why do we not likewise value a man by what is his own? He has a large retinue, a fine palace, so much influence, so much income: all that is around him, not in him.[2]
	Vous n'achetez pas vn chat en poche: si vous marchandez vn cheual, vous luy ostez ses bardes, vous le voyez nud et à descouuert. Ou s'il est couuert, comme on les presentoit anciennement aux Princes à vendre, c'est par les parties moins necessaires, à fin que vous ne vous amusiez pas à la beauté de son poil, ou largeur de sa croupe, et que vous vous arrestiez principalement à considerer les iambes, les yeux, et le pied, qui sont les membres les plus vtiles, Regibus hic mos est: vbi equos mercantur, opertos Inspiciunt; ne si facies, vt sæpe, decora	You do not buy a pig in a poke. If you are bargaining for a horse, you take off its trappings and see it bare and uncovered. Or if it is covered, as horses were presented for sale to princes in former times, it is covered in the less necessary parts, so that you will not be distracted by the beauty of its coat or the breadth of its rump, and will dwell chiefly on examining the legs, the eyes and the hooves, which are the most useful members. This is the cus- tom of kings: when they buy horses, they inspect them Covered, lest, if a handsome forequarter, as often,

Is propped on a weak hoof, it should take in the gaping buyer
Because the haunches are fine, the head small, the neck high. Why, when you value a man, do you value him all wrapped up and packaged?[3]

He shows us only the parts that are in no way his own, and hides from us those by which alone one can truly judge his worth. It is the value of the sword you are after, not of the scabbard; perhaps you would not give a penny for it once you had stripped it. He must be judged by himself, not by his finery. And as one of the ancients says very wittily: "Do you know why you think him tall? You are counting the height of his thick soles." The pedestal is no part of the statue. Measure him without his stilts. Let him put aside his riches and honors, and present himself in his shirt. Has he a body fit for its functions, healthy and lively? What kind of soul has he?

Is it beautiful, capable, and happily furnished with all its parts? Is it rich with its own goods or with others'? Has Fortune nothing to do with it? Does it await drawn swords with open eyes? Does it care nothing by what way its life goes out, by the mouth or by the throat? Is it settled, even and content? That is what we must see, and by that judge the extreme differences between us.

Is he wise, and master of himself;
Whom neither poverty nor death nor chains dismay;
Who is strong to defy his desires, to scorn honors,
And complete in himself, smooth and round,
So that nothing outside can cling to his polished surface;
Against whom Fortune always charges and falls lame? Such a man is five hundred fathoms above kingdoms and duchies: he is his own empire to himself. The wise man, by Pollux, shapes his own fortune. What is left for him to desire?[4]

Do we not see
That nature clamors for nothing but that pain
Be absent and kept from the body, and that the mind enjoy
A pleasant feeling, free from care and fear? Compare with him the rabble of our men, stupid, base, diuerses, qui la poussent et repoussent, pendant toute d'autruy: il y a plus d'esloignement que du ciel à la terre: et toutefois l'aueuglement de nostre vsage est tel, que nous en faisons peu ou point d'estat.	servile, unstable, and continually tossed on the storm of conflicting passions that drive them back and forth, wholly dependent on others: there is more distance than from heaven to earth. And yet the blindness of our custom is such that we take little or no account of it.[5]

KINGS ARE ONLY MEN

Royal pomp hides an ordinary man, subject to fever, fear and passion like anyone.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.42.3 Là où, si nous considerons vn paisan et vn Roy, vn noble et vn villain, vn magistrat et vn homme priué, vn riche et vn pauure, il se presente soudain à nos yeux vn' extreme disparité, qui ne sont differents par maniere de dire qu'en leurs chausses. En Thrace, le Roy estoit distingué de son peuple d'vne plaisante maniere, et bien r'encherie. Il auoit vne religion à part: vn Dieu tout à luy, qu'il n'appartenoit à ses subiects d'adorer: c'estoit Mercure. Et luy, dedaignoit les leurs, Mars, Bacchus, Diane. Ce ne sont pourtant que peintures, qui ne font aucune dissemblance essentielle.	Whereas if we consider a peasant and a king, a noble and a commoner, a magistrate and a private man, a rich man and a poor one, an extreme disparity at once presents itself to our eyes, though they differ, so to speak, only in their breeches. In Thrace the king was distinguished from his people in an amusing and very far-fetched way. He had a religion of his own, a god all to himself, whom his subjects had no right to worship: it was Mercury. And he disdained theirs: Mars, Bacchus, Diana. Yet these are only paintings, which make no essential difference.
Car comme les ioüeurs de comedie, vous les voyez sur l'eschaffaut faire vne mine de Duc et d'Empereur, mais tantost apres, les voyla deuenuz valets et crocheteurs miserables, qui est leur nayfue et originelle condition: aussi l'Empereur, duquel la pompe vous esblouit en public: Scilicet et grandes viridi cum luce smaragdi Auro includuntur, teritúrque thalassina vestis Assiduè, et Veneris sudorem exercita potat, voyez le derriere le rideau, ce n'est rien qu'vn homme commun, et à l'aduenture plus vil que le moindre de ses subiects.	Take actors in a comedy: you see them on the stage putting on the airs of a duke or an emperor, but a moment later there they are, turned back into wretched valets and porters, which is their natural and original condition. So too with the emperor whose pomp dazzles you in public, Indeed, great emeralds with their green light Are set in gold for him, and he constantly wears The sea-green robe, which, much used, drinks up the sweat of Venus: see him behind the curtain, and he is nothing but an ordinary man, perhaps more base than the least of his subjects.
Ille beatus introrsum est: istius bracteata felicitas est. La coüardise, l'irresolution, l'ambition, le despit et l'enuie l'agitent comme vn autre: Non enim gazæ, neque consularis Summouet lictor miseros tumultus Mentis et curas laqueata circum Tecta volantes: et le soing et la crainte le tiennent à la gorge au milieu de ses armées. Re veráque metus hominum, curæque sequaces, Nec metuunt sonitus armorum, nec fera tela, Audactérque inter reges, rerúmque potentes Versantur, neque fulgorem reuerentur ab auro. La fieubre, la migraine et la goutte l'espargnent elles non plus que	That man is happy within; this one's happiness is gilt on the surface. Cowardice, irresolution, ambition, spite and envy agitate him like anyone else: For neither treasures nor the consul's Lictor can drive away the wretched tumults Of the mind, nor the cares that flit around Coffered ceilings; and care and fear hold him by the throat in the midst of his armies. And truly the fears of men and the cares that dog them Fear neither the clash of arms nor cruel weapons; They mingle boldly among kings and the masters of the world, nous? Quand la vieillesse luy sera sur les espaules, les archers de sa garde l'en deschargeront ils?	And stand in no awe of the glitter of gold. Do fever, migraine and gout spare him any more than us? When old age is on his shoulders, will the archers of his guard relieve him of it?[6]

	Quand la frayeur de la mort le transira, se r'asseurera il par l'assistance des Gentils-hommes de sa chambre? Quand il sera en ialousie et caprice, nos bonnettades le remettront elles? Ce ciel de lict tout enflé d'or et de perles, n'a aucune vertu à rappaiser les tranchées d'vne verte colique. Nec calidæ citius decedunt corpore febres, Textilibus si in picturis ostróque rubenti Iacteris, quàm si plebeia in veste cubandum est. Les flateurs du grand Alexandre, luy faisoyent à croire qu'il estoit fils de Iupiter: vn iour estant blessé, regardant escouler le sang de sa playe: Et bien qu'en dites vous? fit-il: est-ce pas icy vn sang vermeil, et purement humain?	When the terror of death chills him through, will he be reassured by the attendance of the gentlemen of his chamber? When he is in a fit of jealousy and caprice, will our doffings of the cap set him right again? That bed canopy all puffed out with gold and pearls has no power to soothe the gripes of a violent colic. Nor do hot fevers leave your body any sooner If you toss on embroidered tapestries and blushing purple Than if you must lie in a commoner's blanket. The flatterers of Alexander the Great made him believe that he was the son of Jupiter. One day, being wounded and watching the blood flow from his wound, he said: "Well, what do you say now? Is this not red blood, and purely human?
	il n'est pas de la trampe de celuy que Homere fait escouler de la playe des Dieux. Hermodorus le poëte auoit fait des vers en l'honneur d'Antigonus, où il l'appelloit fils du Soleil: et luy au contraire: Celuy, dit-il, qui vuide ma chaize percée, sçait bien qu'il n'en est rien.	It is not of the same temper as the blood that Homer makes flow from the wounds of the gods." Hermodorus the poet had written verses in honor of Antigonus in which he called him son of the Sun; and Antigonus, on the contrary, said: "The man who empties my chamber pot knows very well that there is nothing in it."
1.42.4	C'est vn homme pour tous potages. Et si de soy-mesmes c'est vn homme mal né, l'empire de l'vniuers ne le sçauroit rabiller. Puellæ Hunc rapiant; quicquid calcauerit hic, rosa fiat. Quoy pour cela, si c'est vne ame grossiere et stupide? la volupté mesme et le bon heur, ne s'apperçoiuent point sans vigueur et sans esprit. Hæc perinde sunt, vt illius animus, qui ea possidet, Qui vti scit, ei bona; illi qui non vtitur rectè, mala. Les biens de la fortune tous tels qu'ils sont, encores faut il auoir le sentiment propre à les sauourer. C'est le iouïr, non le posseder, qui nous rend heureux.	He is a man, and that is all. And if he is ill-born in himself, the empire of the universe could not mend him. Let the girls Fight over him; wherever he treads, let roses spring. So what, if his is a coarse and stupid soul? Even pleasure and happiness are not perceived without vigor and intelligence. These things are as the mind of their possessor: Good to him who knows how to use them, bad to him who does not use them rightly. The goods of fortune, such as they are, still require a sense fit to savor them. It is enjoying, not possessing, that makes us happy.[7]
	Non domus et fundus, non æris aceruus et auri, Ægroto domini deduxit corpore febres, Non animo curas; valeat possessor oportet, Qui comportatis rebus benè cogitat vti. Qui cupit, aut metuit, iuuat illum sic domus aut res, Vt lippum pictæ tabulæ, fomenta podagram. Il est vn sot, son	Neither house nor estate, nor heaps of bronze and gold, Have ever driven the fevers from their owner's sick body, Or the cares from his mind; the owner must be healthy If he means to make good use of the things he has goust est mousse et hebeté; il n'en iouït non plus qu'vn morfondu de la douceur du vin Grec, ou qu'vn cheual de la richesse du harnois, duquel on l'a paré. Tout ainsi comme Platon dit, que la santé, la beauté, la force, les richesses, et tout ce qui s'appelle bien, est egalement mal à l'iniuste, comme bien au iuste, et le mal au rebours.

Et puis, où le corps et l'ame sont en mauuais estat, à quoy faire ces commoditez externes? veu que la moindre picqueure d'espingle, et passion de l'ame, est suffisante à nous oster le plaisir de la monarchie du monde. A la premiere strette que luy donne la goutte, il a beau estre Sire et Majesté, Totus et argento conflatus, totus et auro, perd il pas le souuenir de ses palais et de ses grandeurs? S'il est en colere, sa principauté le garde elle de rougir, de paslir, de grincer les dents comme vn fol?

1.42.5 Or si c'est vn habile homme et bien né, la royauté adiouste peu à son bon heur: Si ventri bene, si lateri est, pedibúsque tuis, nil / Diuitiæ poterunt regales addere maius: il voit que ce n'est que biffe et piperie. Oui à l'aduenture il sera de l'aduis du Roy Seleucus, Que qui sçauroit le poix d'vn sceptre, ne daigneroit l'amasser quand il le trouueroit à terre: il le disoit pour les grandes et penibles charges, qui touchent vn bon Roy. Certes ce n'est pas peu de chose que d'auoir à regler autruy, puis qu'à regler nous mesmes, il se presente tant de difficultez.

Quant au commander, qui semble estre si doux; considerant l'imbecillité du iugement humain, et la difficulté du chois és choses nouuelles et doubteuses, ie suis fort de cet aduis, qu'il est bien plus aisé et plus plaisant de suiure, que de guider: et que c'est vn grand seiour d'esprit de n'auoir à tenir qu'vne voye tracée, et à respondre que de soy: Vt satiùs multo iam sit, parere quietum, / Quàm regere imperio res velle. Ioint que Cyrus disoit, qu'il n'appartenoit de commander à homme, qui ne vaille mieux que ceux à qui il commande.

The man who desires or fears enjoys his house or wealth
As a man with sore eyes enjoys paintings, or a gouty man warm compresses. He is a fool; his taste is dull and blunted; he enjoys it no more than a man with a head cold enjoys the sweetness of Greek wine, or a horse the richness of the harness it has been decked with. Just as Plato says that health, beauty, strength, riches and everything called good are as much evil to the unjust as good to the just, and evil the other way about.

And then, where body and soul are in a bad state, what good are these external comforts? For the slightest pinprick, or passion of the soul, is enough to take from us the pleasure of being monarch of the world. At the first twinge the gout gives him, it is no use his being Sire and Majesty, All cast in silver, all in gold: does he not lose the memory of his palaces and his grandeur? If he is angry, does his princely rank keep him from turning red, turning pale, gnashing his teeth like a fool?[8]

Now if he is a capable and well-born man, royalty adds little to his happiness: If your belly, your sides and your feet are well, / A king's riches can add nothing greater. He sees that it is nothing but sham and trickery. Yes, perhaps he will share the opinion of King Seleucus, that whoever knew the weight of a scepter would not deign to pick it up if he found it lying on the ground; he said this because of the great and painful responsibilities that fall on a good king. Indeed, it is no small thing to have to govern others, since in governing ourselves so many difficulties present themselves.

As for commanding, which seems so sweet: considering the weakness of human judgment and the difficulty of choosing in new and doubtful matters, I am strongly of the opinion that it is much easier and more pleasant to follow than to lead, and that it is a great rest for the mind to have only a marked-out path to keep to, and to answer only for oneself. So that it is far better to obey in peace / Than to wish to rule the state with sovereign power. Besides, Cyrus said that no man was fit to command who is not worth more than those he commands.

8 The Latin line is from Tibullus, Elegies.

THE BURDENS OF KINGSHIP

Following Xenophon's Hiero, princes are shown losing pleasure, freedom and true friendship.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.42.6	Mais le Roy Hieron en Xenophon dict d'auantage, qu'à la iouyssance des voluptez mesmes, ils sont de pire condition que les priuez: d'autant que l'aysance et la facilité, leur oste l'aigredouce pointe que nous y trouuons. Pinguis amor nimiùmque potens, in tædia nobis / Vertitur, et, stomacho dulcis vt esca, nocet. Pensons nous que les enfans de cœur prennent grand plaisir à la musique? La sacieté la leur rend plustost ennuyeuse. Les festins, les danses, les masquarades, les tournois reiouyssent ceux qui ne les voyent pas souuent, et qui ont desiré de les voir: mais à qui en faict ordinaire, le goust en deuient fade et mal plaisant: ny les dames ne chatouillent celuy qui en iouyt à cœur saoul.	But King Hiero, in Xenophon, says further that even in the enjoyment of pleasures, kings are worse off than private persons, since ease and facility take from them the bittersweet sting that we find in them. Love that is too rich and too powerful turns to tedium for us, / And harms us, as sweet food harms the stomach. Do we think choirboys take great pleasure in music? Satiety rather makes it tiresome to them. Feasts, dances, masquerades and tournaments delight those who do not see them often and have longed to see them; but for the man who makes them his daily fare, the taste becomes flat and unpleasant. Nor do women excite the man who enjoys them to his heart's content.[9]
	Qui ne se donne loisir d'auoir soif, ne sçauroit prendre plaisir à boire. Les farces des bateleurs nous resiouissent, mais aux ioüeurs elles seruent de coruée. Et qu'il soit ainsi, ce sont delices aux Princes, c'est leur feste, de se pouuoir quelque fois trauestir, et démettre à la façon de viure basse et populaire. Plerumque gratæ principibus vices, Mundæque paruo sub lare pauperum Cœnæ, sine aulæis et ostro, Solicitam explicuere frontem. Il n'est rien si empeschant, si desgouté que l'abondance. Quel appetit ne se rebuteroit, à veoir trois cents femmes à sa merci, comme les a le grand Seigneur en son serrail?	He who does not give himself time to be thirsty can take no pleasure in drinking. The farces of the mountebanks delight us, but for the players they are drudgery. And to show that this is so: it is a delight to princes, a holiday for them, to be able sometimes to disguise themselves and come down to the low, common way of living. Often a change is welcome to the great, And a neat meal beneath the humble roof of the poor, Without hangings and purple, Has smoothed the anxious brow. Nothing is so cumbersome, so cloying as abundance. What appetite would not be put off at seeing three hundred women at its mercy, as the Sultan has them in his seraglio?
	Et quel appetit et visage de chasse, s'estoit reserué celuy de ses ancestres, qui n'alloit iamais aux champs, à moins de sept mille fauconniers?	And what appetite and taste for hunting could that ancestor of his have kept for himself, who never went out into the field with fewer than seven thousand falconers?
1.42.7	Et outre cela, ie croy, que ce lustre de grandeur, apporte non legeres incommoditez à la iouyssance des plaisirs plus doux: ils sont trop esclairez et trop en butte. Et ie ne sçay comment on requiert plus d'eux de cacher et couurir leur faute. Car ce qui est à nous indiscretion, à eux le peuple iuge que ce soit tyrannie, mespris, et desdain des loix. Et outre l'inclination au vice, il semble qu'ils y adioustent encore le plaisir de gourmander, et	And besides that, I believe that this luster of greatness brings no slight inconveniences to the enjoyment of the gentler pleasures: princes are too brightly lit and too exposed. And somehow more is demanded of them in hiding and covering their faults. For what in us is indiscretion, in them the people judge to be tyranny, contempt and disdain sousmettre à leurs pieds les obseruances publiques. De vray Platon en son Gorgias, definit tyran celuy qui a licence en vne cité d'y faire tout ce qui luy plaist.

Et souuent à cette cause, la montre et publication de leur vice, blesse plus que le vice mesme. Chacun craint à estre espié et contrerollé: ils le sont iusques à leurs contenances et à leurs pensees; tout le peuple estimant auoir droict et interest d'en iuger. Outre ce que les taches s'agrandissent selon l'eminence et clarté du lieu, où elles sont assises: et qu'vn seing et vne verrue au front, paroissent plus que ne faict ailleurs vne balafre. Voyla pourquoy les poëtes feignent les amours de Iupiter conduites soubs autre visage que le sien: et de tant de practiques amoureuses qu'ils luy attribuent, il n'en est qu'vne seule, ce me semble, où il se trouue en sa grandeur et Maiesté.

1.42.8 Mais reuenons à Hieron: il recite aussi combien il sent d'incommoditez en sa royauté, pour ne pouuoir aller et voyager en liberté, estant comme prisonnier dans les limites de son païs: et qu'en toutes ses actions il se trouue enueloppé d'vne facheuse presse. De vray, à voir les nostres tous seuls à table, assiegez de tant de parleurs et regardans inconnuz, i'en ay eu souuent plus de piété que d'enuie. Le Roy Alphonse disoit que les asnes estoyent en cela de meilleure condition que les Roys: leurs maistres les laissent paistre à leur aise, là où les Roys ne peuuent pas obtenir cela de leurs seruiteurs.

Et ne m'est iamais tombé en fantasie, que ce fust quelque notable commodité à la vie d'vn homme d'entendement, d'auoir vne vingtaine de contrerolleurs à sa chaise percée: ny que les seruices d'vn homme qui a dix mille liures de rente, ou qui a pris Casal, ou defendu Siene, luy soyent plus commodes et acceptables, que d'vn bon valet et bien experimenté. Les auantages principesques sont quasi auantages imaginaires. Chaque degré de fortune a quelque image de principauté. Cæsar appelle Roytelets, tous les Seigneurs ayans iustice en France de son temps.

for the laws. And besides the inclination to vice, it seems that they add to it the pleasure of bullying public observances and trampling them underfoot. Indeed Plato, in his Gorgias, defines a tyrant as one who has license in a city to do whatever he pleases there.

And for this reason the display and publication of their vice often wounds more than the vice itself. Everyone dreads being spied on and watched. Princes are watched down to their expressions and their thoughts, since the whole people believe they have the right to judge them and a stake in doing so. Besides, stains grow larger according to the eminence and brightness of the place where they sit, and a mole or a wart on the forehead shows more than a gash does elsewhere. That is why the poets imagine Jupiter's love affairs carried on under some face other than his own; and of all the amorous intrigues they attribute to him, there is only one, it seems to me, in which he appears in his own greatness and majesty.

But let us return to Hiero. He also relates how many inconveniences he suffers in his kingship from being unable to go about and travel freely, being like a prisoner within the borders of his country, and how in all his actions he finds himself hemmed in by an irksome crowd. Indeed, when I have seen our own kings sitting alone at table, besieged by so many strangers talking and staring, I have often felt more pity for them than envy. King Alfonso used to say that in this respect donkeys were better off than kings: their masters let them graze at their ease, whereas kings cannot get that much from their servants.

And it has never entered my head that it was any notable advantage, in the life of a man of understanding, to have a score of supervisors at his close-stool. Nor that the services of a man with an income of ten thousand livres, or one who has taken Casale or defended Siena, are more convenient and acceptable to him than those of a good, well-practiced valet. Princely advantages are almost imaginary advantages. Each degree of fortune has some image of sovereignty in it. Caesar calls all the lords who held rights of justice in France in his day petty kings.[10]

10 Casale was taken from the Spanish by the Maréchal de Brissac in 1555; Siena was defended against the Imperial forces by Blaise de Monluc in 1554–1555.

1.42.9 De vray, sauf le nom de Sire, on va bien auant auec nos Roys. Et voyez aux Prouinces esloingnées de la Cour, nommons Bretaigne pour exemple, le train, les subiects, les officiers, les occupations, le seruice et cerimonie d'vn Seigneur retiré et casanier, nourry entre ses valets; et voyez aussi le vol de son imagination, il n'est rien plus royal: il oyt parler de son maistre vne fois l'an, comme du Roy de Perse: et ne le recognoit, que par quelque vieux cousinage, que son secretaire tient en registre. A la verité nos loix sont libres assez; et le pois de la souueraineté ne touche vn Gentil-homme François, à peine deux fois en sa vie.

Truly, apart from the title of "Sire," people go a long way toward matching our kings. Look at the provinces far from the court—let us take Brittany as an example. Look at the retinue, the subjects, the officers, the occupations, the service and ceremony of a retired, stay-at-home lord, brought up among his servants; and look too at the flight of his imagination: there is nothing more royal. He hears his master spoken of once a year, as if he were the King of Persia, and acknowledges him only through some old kinship that his secretary keeps on record. In truth our laws are free enough, and the weight of sovereignty touches a French gentleman barely twice in his life.

La subiection essentielle et effectuelle, ne regarde d'entre nous, que ceux qui s'y conuient, et qui ayment à s'honnorer et enrichir par tel seruice: car qui se veut tapir en son foyer, et sçait conduire sa maison sans querelle, et sans procés, il est aussi libre que le Duc de Venise. Paucos seruitus, plures seruitutem tenent.

Essential and effective subjection concerns only those among us who invite themselves to it and like to gain honor and wealth by such service. For a man who is willing to stay tucked away by his own hearth, and knows how to run his household without quarrels and without lawsuits, is as free as the Doge of Venice. Slavery holds few men; more men hold fast to slavery.[11]

1.42.10 Mais sur tout Hieron faict cas, dequoy il se voit priué de toute amitié et societé mutuelle: en laquelle consiste le plus parfait et doux fruict de la vie humaine. Car quel tesmoignage d'affection et de bonne volonté, puis-ie tirer de celuy, qui me doit, vueille il ou non, tout ce qu'il peut? Puis-ie faire estat de son humble parler et courtoise reuerence, veu qu'il n'est pas en luy de me la refuser? L'honneur que nous receuons de ceux qui nous craignent, ce n'est pas honneur: ces respects se doiuent à la Royauté, non à moy.

But above all Hiero makes much of the fact that he finds himself deprived of all friendship and mutual fellowship, in which lies the most perfect and sweetest fruit of human life. For what testimony of affection and goodwill can I draw from a man who owes me, whether he likes it or not, everything in his power? Can I set any store by his humble speech and courteous reverence, when it is not in him to refuse them to me? The honor we receive from those who fear us is not honor: these respects are due to royalty, not to me.

Maximum hoc regni bonum est,
Quod facta domini cogitur populus sui
Quâm ferre, tam laudare. Vois-ie pas que le meschant, le bon Roy, celuy qu'on haït, celuy qu'on ayme, autant en a l'vn que l'autre: de mesmes apparences, de mesme ceremonie, estoit seruy mon predecesseur, et le sera mon successeur. Si mes subiects ne m'offencent pas, ce n'est tesmoignage d'aucune bonne affection: pourquoy le prendray-ie en cette part-là, puis qu'ils ne pourroient quand ils voudroient? Nul ne me suit pour l'amitié, qui soit entre luy et moy: car il ne s'y sçauroit coudre amitié, où il y a si peu de relation et de correspondance. Ma

This is the greatest boon of kingship, that the people are forced to praise their master's deeds as much as to bear them. Do I not see that the wicked king and the good one, the hated and the loved, get as much of it, the one as the other? My predecessor was served with the same outward show and the same ceremony, and so my successor will be. If my subjects do not offend me, that is no evidence of any good affection: why should I take it that way, since they could not if they would? No one follows me for any friendship between him and me, for no friendship can be stitched together where there is so little relation Tout ce qu'ils me dient, et font, ce n'est que fard, leur liberté estant bridée de toutes parts par la grande puissance que i'ay sur eux: ie ne voy rien autour de moy que couuert et masqué. Ses courtisans loüoient vn iour Iulian l'Empereur de faire bonne iustice: Ie m'enorgueillirois volontiers, dit-il, de ces loüanges, si elles venoient de personnes, qui ozassent accuser ou mesloüer mes actions contraires, quand elles y seroient.

and correspondence. My height has put me outside the company of men: there is too much disparity and disproportion.[12]

They follow me for form's sake and out of custom —or rather they follow not me but my fortune, to increase their own. Everything they say and do to me is mere paint, their freedom being bridled on every side by the great power I have over them. I see nothing around me but what is covered and masked. His courtiers were one day praising the Emperor Julian for dispensing good justice. "I would gladly be proud of these praises," he said, "if they came from people who would dare to accuse or blame my actions when they went the other way."

All the real advantages that princes have, they share with men of middling fortune. It is for the gods to ride winged horses and feed on ambrosia. Princes have no other sleep and no other appetite than ours; their steel is of no better temper than the steel we arm ourselves with; their crown shelters them neither from the sun nor from the rain.

Diocletian, who wore one so revered and so fortunate, resigned it to retire to the pleasure of a private life. Some time later, when the necessity of public affairs required him to come back and take up the charge again, he answered those who begged him to: "You would not undertake to persuade me of this if you had seen the fine rows of trees I have planted with my own hands at home, and the fine melons I have sown there."

In the opinion of Anacharsis, the happiest state of a government would be one where, all other things being equal, precedence would be measured by virtue and rejection by vice.[13]

When King Pyrrhus was undertaking to cross into Italy, Cineas, his wise counselor, wishing to make him feel the vanity of his ambition, asked him: "Well, Sire, to what end are you setting up this great enterprise?" "To make myself master of Italy," he answered at once. "And then," Cineas went on, "once that is done?" "I shall cross into Gaul and Spain," said the other. "And after that?" "I shall go and subjugate Africa; and finally, when I

I.43 Of Sumptuary Laws

Des lois somptuaires

Laws restricting luxury to princes only make it more desirable; kings could end extravagance by giving it up themselves.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.43.1	LA façon dequoy nos loix essayent à regler les foles et vaines despences des tables, et vestemens, semble estre contraire à sa fin. Le vray moyen, ce seroit d'engendrer aux hommes le mespris de l'or et de la soye, comme de choses vaines et inutiles: et nous leur augmentons l'honneur et le prix, qui est vne bien inepte façon pour en dégouster les hommes. Car dire ainsi, Qu'il n'y aura que les Princes qui mangent du turbot, qui puissent porter du velours et de la tresse d'or, et l'interdire au peuple, qu'est-ce autre chose que mettre en credit ces choses là, et faire croistre l'enuie à chacun d'en vser?	The way in which our laws try to regulate foolish and vain spending on tables and clothes seems contrary to its own end. The true method would be to breed in men a contempt for gold and silk as vain and useless things; instead we increase their honor and value, which is a very inept way of giving men a distaste for them. For to say that only princes may eat turbot, and only they may wear velvet and gold braid, and to forbid these to the people—what is that but to bring such things into esteem and make everyone's desire to use them grow?
	Que les Roys quittent hardiment ces marques de grandeur, ils en ont assez d'autres; tels excez sont plus excusables à tout autre qu'à vn Prince. Par l'exemple de plusieurs nations, nous pouuons apprendre assez de meilleures façons de nous distinguer exterieurement, et nos degrez (ce que i'estime à la verité, estre bien requis en vn Estat) sans nourrir pour cet effect, cette corruption et incommodité si apparente.	Let kings boldly give up these marks of greatness; they have enough others. Such excesses are more excusable in anyone than in a prince. From the example of many nations we can learn plenty of better ways to distinguish ourselves and our ranks outwardly (which I truly consider very necessary in a state), without fostering for that purpose this corruption and this so evident harm.
1.43.2	C'est merueille comme la coustume en ces choses indifferentes plante aisément et soudain le pied de son authorité. A peine fusmes nous vn an, pour le dueil du Roy Henry second, à porter du drap à la Cour, il est certain que desia à l'opinion d'vn chacun, les soyes estoient venuës à telle vilité, que si vous en voyiez quelqu'vn vestu, vous en faisiez incontinent quelque homme de ville. Elles estoient demeurées en partage aux medecins et aux chirurgiens: et quoy qu'vn chacun fust à peu pres vestu de mesme, si y auoit-il d'ailleurs assez de distinctions apparentes, des qualitez des hommes.	It is a wonder how easily and how suddenly custom plants the foot of its authority in these indifferent matters. We had scarcely spent a year wearing woolen cloth at court in mourning for King Henry II when, certainly, silks had already sunk so low in everyone's opinion that if you saw someone dressed in them you immediately took him for some townsman. They had been left as the portion of physicians and surgeons; and although everyone was dressed in much the same way, there were still enough other visible marks distinguishing people's ranks.[1]
	Combien soudainement viennent en honneur parmy nos armées, les pourpoins crasseux de chamois et de toille; et la pollisseure et richesse des vestements à reproche et à mespris? Que les Roys commencent à quitter ces	How suddenly, in our armies, do greasy doublets of chamois leather and canvas come into honor, and polish and richness of dress into reproach and contempt! The law ought to say the opposite: that crimson and goldsmith's work are forbidden to every sort of person except tumblers and courtesans.
1.43.3	De pareille inuention corrigea Zeleucus, les meurs corrompuës des Locriens. Ses ordonnances estoient telles: Que la femme de condition libre, ne puisse mener apres elle plus d'vne chambriere, sinon lors qu'elle sera yure: ny ne puisse sortir hors la ville de nuict, ny porter ioyaux d'or à l'entour de sa personne, ny robbe enrichie de broderie, si elle n'est publique et putain: que sauf les ruffiens, à homme ne loise porter en son doigt anneau d'or, ny robbe delicate, comme sont celles des draps tissus en la ville de Milet. Et ainsi par ces exceptions honteuses, il diuertissoit ingenieusement ses citoyens des superfluitez et delices pernicieuses. C'estoit vne tres-vtile maniere d'attirer par honneur et ambition, les hommes à leur deuoir et à l'obeissance.	With a similar device Zaleucus corrected the corrupt morals of the Locrians. His ordinances were these: that a freeborn woman might not take more than one maid along with her, unless she was drunk; nor go out of the city at night, nor wear gold jewelry on her person, nor a gown enriched with embroidery, unless she was a public woman and a prostitute; that, except for pimps, no man might wear a gold ring on his finger, nor a delicate gown such as those made of cloth woven in the city of Miletus. And so by these shameful exceptions he ingeniously turned his citizens away from superfluities and pernicious luxuries. It was a very useful way of drawing men to their duty and to obedience through honor and ambition.[2]
1.43.4	Nos Roys peuuent tout en telles reformations externes: leur inclination y sert de loy. Quicquid principes faciunt, præcipere videntur. Le reste de la France prend pour regle la regle de la Cour. Qu'ils se desplaisent de cette vilaine chaussure, qui montre si à descouuert nos membres occultes: ce lourd grossissement de pourpoins, qui nous faict tous autres que nous ne sommes, si incommode à s'armer: ces longues tresses de poil effeminees: cet vsage de baiser ce que nous presentons à nos compaignons, et nos mains en les saluant: ceremonie deuë autresfois aux seuls Princes:	Our kings can do anything in such outward reforms: their inclination serves as law. Whatever princes do, they seem to command. The rest of France takes the court's rule as its rule. Let them take a dislike to this ugly hose that displays our hidden parts so openly; this heavy padding of doublets that makes us all quite other than we are, and is so awkward when putting on armor; these long, foppish locks of hair; this practice of kissing what we hand to our companions, and our own hands when we greet them, a ceremony once due to princes alone;[3]
	et qu'vn Gentil-homme se trouue en lieu de respect, sans espée à son costé, tout esbraillé, et destaché, comme s'il venoit de la garde-robbe: et que contre la forme de nos peres, et la particuliere liberté de la Noblesse de ce Royaume, nous nous tenons descouuerts bien loing autour d'eux, en quelque lieu qu'ils soyent: et comme autour d'eux, autour de cent autres; tant nous auons de tiercelets et quartelets de Roys: et ainsi d'autres pareilles introductions nouuelles et vitieuses: elles se verront incontinent esuanouyes et descriées.	and the fact that a gentleman will appear in a place calling for respect without a sword at his side, all unbuttoned and untrussed, as if he had just come from the privy; and that, contrary to the custom of our fathers and the particular freedom of the nobility of this kingdom, we stand bareheaded at a great distance around them, wherever they are—and as around them, so around a hundred others, so many thirds and quarters of kings we have; and other such new and corrupt innovations: they will at once be seen to vanish and fall into discredit.

sonry is giving way when we see the plaster and the outer crust of our walls cracking.

Plato, in his Laws, considers no plague in the world more harmful to his city than allowing the young the freedom to change from one form to another in dress, gestures, dances, exercises and songs: shifting their judgment now to this position, now to that, running after novelties and honoring their inventors. By this, morals are corrupted, and ancient institutions fall into disdain and contempt. In all things except simply bad ones, change is to be feared: change of seasons, of winds, of diet, of humors.

And no laws are held in true esteem except those to which God has granted some ancient duration, so that no one knows their birth, or that they were ever otherwise.

1.44.1 LA raison nous ordonne bien d'aller tousiours mesme chemin, mais non toutesfois mesme train. Et ores que le sage ne doiue donner aux passions humaines, de se fouruoyer de la droicte carriere, il peut bien sans interest de son deuoir, leur quitter aussi, d'en haster ou retarder son pas, et ne se planter comme vn colosse immobile et impassible. Quand la vertu mesme seroit incarnée, ie croy que le poux luy battroit plus fort allant à l'assaut, qu'allant disner: voire il est necessaire qu'elle s'eschauffe et s'esmeuue. A cette cause i'ay remarqué pour chose rare, de voir quelquefois les grands personnages, aux plus hautes entreprinses et importans affaires, se tenir si entiers en leur assiette, que de n'en accourcir pas seulement leur sommeil.

Reason does indeed bid us always go the same road, but not always at the same pace. And although the wise man must not allow human passions to make him stray from the right course, he may well, without prejudice to his duty, leave it to them to quicken or slow his step, and not plant himself like an immovable, impassive colossus. Were virtue itself incarnate, I believe its pulse would beat harder going into an assault than going in to dinner; indeed it must needs grow heated and stirred. For this reason I have noted it as a rare thing to see great men sometimes, in the loftiest undertakings and the most important affairs, stay so wholly composed that they do not even cut short their sleep.

1.44.2 Alexandre le grand, le iour assigné à cette furieuse bataille contre Darius, dormit si profondement, et si haute matinée, que Parmenion fut contraint d'entrer en sa chambre, et approchant de son lict, l'appeler deux ou trois fois par son nom, pour l'esueiller, le temps d'aller au combat le pressant. L'Empereur Othon ayant resolu de se tuer, cette mesme nuit, apres auoir mis ordre à ses affaires domestiques, partagé son argent à ses seruiteurs, et affilé le tranchant d'vne espée dequoy il se vouloit donner, n'attendant plus qu'à sçauoir si chacun de ses amis s'estoit retiré en seureté, se print si profondement à dormir, que ses valets de chambre l'entendoient ronfler.

Alexander the Great, on the day appointed for that furious battle against Darius, slept so soundly and so late into the morning that Parmenion was forced to enter his room and, going up to his bed, call him two or three times by name to wake him, since the time to go into battle was pressing. The Emperor Otho, having resolved to kill himself, that same night, after putting his domestic affairs in order, sharing out his money among his servants and sharpening the edge of a sword with which he meant to strike himself, and waiting only to learn whether each of his friends had withdrawn to safety, fell into so deep a sleep that his valets heard him snoring.

La mort de cet Empereur a beaucoup de choses pareilles à celle du grand Caton, et mesmes cecy: car Caton estant prest à se deffaire, cependant qu'il attendoit qu'on luy rapportast nouuelles si les Senateurs qu'il faisoit retirer, s'estoient eslargis du port d'Vtique, se mit si fort à dormir, qu'on l'oyoit souffler de la chambre voisine: et celuy qu'il auoit enuoyé vers le port, l'ayant esueillé, pour luy dire que la tourmente empeschoit les Senateurs de faire voile à leur aise, il y en renuoya encore vn autre,

The death of this emperor has many things in common with that of the great Cato, including this one. For Cato, being ready to do away with himself, while he was waiting to be told whether the senators he was sending away had put out from the port of Utica, fell so soundly asleep that he could be heard breathing from the next room. And when the man he had sent to the port woke him to tell him that the storm was keeping the senators et se r'enfonçant dans le lict, se remit encore à sommeiller, iusques à ce que ce dernier l'asseura de leur partement.

Encore auons nous dequoy le comparer au faict d'Alexandre, en ce grand et dangereux orage, qui le menassoit, par la sedition du Tribun Metellus, voulant publier le decret du rappel de Pompeius dans la ville auecques son armée, lors de l'émotion de Catilina: auquel decret Caton seul insistoit, et en auoient eu Metellus et luy, de grosses paroles et grandes menasses au Senat: mais c'estoit au lendemain en la place, qu'il falloit venir à l'execution; où Metellus, outre la faueur du peuple et de Cæsar conspirant lors aux aduantages de Pompeius, se deuoit trouuer, accompagné de force esclaues estrangers, et escrimeurs à outrance, et Caton fortifié de sa seule constance:

de sorte que ses parens, ses domestiques, et beaucoup de gens de bien, en estoyent en grand soucy: et en y eut qui passerent la nuict ensemble, sans vouloir reposer, ny boire, ny manger, pour le danger qu'ils luy voyoient preparé: mesme sa femme, et ses sœurs ne faisoyent que pleurer et se tourmenter en sa maison: là où luy au contraire, reconfortoit tout le monde: et apres auoir souppé comme de coustume, s'en alla coucher et dormir de fort profond sommeil, iusques au matin, que l'vn de ses compagnons au Tribunat, le vint esueiller pour aller à l'escarmouche.

La connoissance, que nous auons de la grandeur de courage, de cet homme, par le reste de sa vie, nous peut faire iuger en toute seureté, que cecy luy partoit d'vne ame si loing esleuée au dessus de tels accidents, qu'il n'en daignoit entrer en ceruelle, non plus que d'accidens ordinaires.

1.44.3 En la bataille nauale qu'Augustus gaigna contre Sextus Pompeius en Sicile, sur le point d'aller au combat, il se trouua pressé d'vn si profond sommeil, qu'il fallut que ses amis l'esueillassent, pour donner le signe de la bataille. Cela donna occasion à M. Antonius de luy reprocher depuis, qu'il n'auoit pas eu le cœur, seulement de regarder les yeux ouuerts, l'ordonnance de son armée; et de n'auoir osé se presenter aux soldats, iusques à ce qu'Agrippa luy vint annoncer la nouuelle de la victoire, qu'il auoit eu sur ses ennemis.

Mais quant au ieune Marius, qui fit encore pis (car le iour de sa derniere iournée contre Sylla, apres auoir ordonné son armée, et donné le mot et signe de la bataille, il se coucha dessoubs vn arbre à l'ombre, pour se reposer, et from setting sail easily, he sent another, and, burying himself back in the bed, went off to sleep again until this last one assured him of their departure.

We can also compare him to Alexander's case in that great and dangerous storm that threatened him through the sedition of the tribune Metellus, who wanted to publish the decree recalling Pompey into the city with his army at the time of Catiline's uprising. Cato alone opposed this decree, and he and Metellus had exchanged hot words and great threats over it in the Senate. But it was the next day, in the Forum, that the thing had to be carried out. There Metellus, besides the favor of the people and of Caesar, who was then conspiring to Pompey's advantage, was to appear accompanied by a host of foreign slaves and gladiators, and Cato fortified by his constancy alone; so that his relatives, his household and many good people were greatly worried, and some of them spent the night together without being willing to rest, or drink, or eat, because of the danger they saw prepared for him. Even his wife and his sisters did nothing but weep and torment themselves in his house. He, on the contrary, comforted everyone, and after supping as usual, went to bed and slept very soundly until morning, when one of his colleagues in the tribunate came to wake him to go to the skirmish.

What we know of this man's greatness of courage from the rest of his life allows us to judge with complete assurance that this came from a soul raised so far above such accidents that he did not deign to let them into his head any more than ordinary ones.

In the naval battle that Augustus won against Sextus Pompeius off Sicily, just as he was about to go into combat, he was overcome by so deep a sleep that his friends had to wake him to give the signal for battle. This later gave Mark Antony occasion to reproach him that he had not had the heart even to look with open eyes at the array of his forces, and that he had not dared to show himself to the soldiers until Agrippa came to announce the news of the victory he had won over the enemy.

But as for the young Marius, who did even worse (for on the day of his last battle against Sulla, after drawing up his army and giving the word and signal for battle, he lay down in the shade under a

1.44.4	Et à ce propos les medecins aduiseront si le dormir est si necessaire, que nostre vie en dépende; car nous trouuons bien, qu'on fit mourir le Roy Perseus de Macedoine prisonnier à Rome, luy empeschant le sommeil, mais Pline en allegue, qui ont vescu long temps sans dormir. Chez Herodote, il y a des nations, ausquelles les hommes dorment et veillent par demy années. Et ceux qui escriuent la vie du sage Epimenides, disent qu'il dormit cinquante sept ans de suitte.	And on this subject, let the physicians consider whether sleep is so necessary that our life depends on it. For we do find that King Perseus of Macedon, a prisoner in Rome, was put to death by being prevented from sleeping; but Pliny cites people who lived a long time without sleep. In Herodotus there are nations whose men sleep and wake by half-years. And those who write the life of the wise Epimenides say that he slept for fifty-seven years at a stretch.[1]

1 Epimenides of Crete was a semi-legendary seer and poet of the 6th century BC.

I.45 Of the Battle of Dreux

De la battaille de Dreux

Montaigne defends the Duke of Guise's waiting at Dreux: a soldier must aim at the whole victory, not partial rescues.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.45.1	IL y eut tout plein de rares accidens en nostre battaille de Dreux: mais ceux qui ne fauorisent pas fort la reputation de M. de Guyse, mettent volontiers en auant, qu'il ne se peut excuser d'auoir faict alte, et temporisé auec les forces qu'il commandoit, cependant qu'on enfonçoit Monsieur le Connestable chef de l'armée, auecques l'artillerie: et qu'il valoit mieux se hazarder, prenant l'ennemy par flanc, qu'attendant l'aduantage de le voir en queuë, souffrir vne si lourde perte.	There were any number of remarkable incidents in our battle of Dreux. But those who are not very favorable to the reputation of Monsieur de Guise readily put it about that he cannot be excused for having halted and held back with the forces he commanded while the Constable, commander of the army, was being overwhelmed along with the artillery; and that it would have been better to take the risk of attacking the enemy in the flank than to suffer so heavy a loss while waiting for the advantage of having him in the rear.[1]
	Mais outre ce, que l'issuë en tesmoigna, qui en debattra sans passion, me confessera aisément, à mon aduis, que le but et la visée, non seulement d'vn Capitaine, mais de chasque soldat, doit regarder la victoire en gros; et que nulles occurrences particulieres, quelque interest qu'il y ayt, ne le doiuent diuertir de ce point là.	But besides what the outcome demonstrated, anyone who debates the matter without passion will readily admit to me, I think, that the aim and target not only of a captain but of every soldier must be the victory as a whole, and that no particular occurrences, however much may be at stake in them, should divert him from that point.
	Philopœmen en vne rencontre de Machanidas, ayant enuoyé deuant pour attaquer l'escarmouche, bonne trouppe d'archers et gens de traict: et l'ennemy apres les auoir renuersez, s'amusant à les poursuiure à toute bride, et coulant apres sa victoire le long de la battaille où estoit Philopœmen, quoy que ses soldats s'en esmeussent, il ne fut d'aduis de bouger de sa place, ny de se presenter à l'ennemy, pour secourir ses gens: ains les ayant laissé chasser et mettre en pieces à sa veue, commença la charge sur les ennemis au battaillon de leurs gens de pied, lorsqu'il les vid tout à fait abandonnez de leurs gens de cheual: et bien que ce fussent Lacedemoniens, d'autant qu'il les prit à l'heure, que pour tenir tout gaigné, ils commençoient à se desordonner, il en vint aisément à bout, et cela fait se mit à poursuiure Machanidas.	Philopoemen, in an encounter with Machanidas, had sent ahead a good troop of archers and javelin men to open the skirmish. The enemy, after overthrowing them, busied themselves pursuing them at full gallop, and swept on in their victory along the main body where Philopoemen was. Though his soldiers were stirred by this, he did not see fit to budge from his position or to show himself to the enemy to rescue his men. Instead, having let them be chased and cut to pieces before his eyes, he launched the charge on the enemy's battalion of foot when he saw them completely abandoned by their cavalry. And although they were Lacedaemonians, since he caught them at the moment when, thinking the day was won, they were beginning to break ranks, he easily got the better of them; and that done, he set off in pursuit of Machanidas.[2]

1 At Dreux (19 December 1562), in the first War of Religion, François de Guise turned the battle against the Protestants after the Constable Anne de Montmorency had been routed and captured.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Ce cas est germain à celuy de Monsieur de Guise.	This case is first cousin to that of Monsieur de Guise.
1.45.2	En cette aspre battaille d'Agesilaus contre les Bœotiens, que Xenophon qui y estoit, dit estre la plus rude qu'il eust oncques veu, Agesilaus refusa l'auantage que fortune luy presentoit, de laisser passer le bataillon des Bœotiens, et les charger en queuë, quelque certaine victoire qu'il en preuist, estimant qu'il y auoit plus d'art que de vaillance; et pour montrer sa prouësse d'vne merueilleuse ardeur de courage, choisit plustost de leur donner en teste:	In that bitter battle of Agesilaus against the Boeotians, which Xenophon, who was there, says was the hardest he had ever seen, Agesilaus refused the advantage that Fortune offered him of letting the Boeotian battalion pass and then charging them from the rear, however certain the victory he foresaw from it, judging that there was more skill than valor in that. And to show his prowess with a marvelous ardor of courage, he chose instead to strike them head-on.[3]
	mais aussi fut-il bien battu et blessé, et contraint en fin de se demesler, et prendre le party qu'il auoit refusé au commencement, faisant ouurir ses gens, pour donner passage à ce torrent de Bœotiens: puis quand ils furent passez, prenant garde qu'ils marcheoyent en desordre, comme ceux qui cuidoyent bien estre hors de tout danger, il les fit suiure, et charger par les flancs: mais pour cela ne les peut-il tourner en fuitte à val de route; ains se retirerent le petit pas, montrants tousiours les dents, iusques à ce qu'ils se furent rendus à sauueté.	But he was well beaten and wounded for it, and forced in the end to disengage and adopt the course he had refused at the start, opening his ranks to let this torrent of Boeotians through. Then, when they had passed, noticing that they were marching in disorder, like men who thought themselves well out of all danger, he had them followed and charged on the flanks. But even so he could not turn them into headlong flight; instead they withdrew at a slow pace, still showing their teeth, until they had reached safety.

2 Philopoemen defeated and killed Machanidas, tyrant of Sparta, at Mantinea in 207 BC.

I.46 Of Names

Des noms

A hodgepodge on names—unlucky names, families renamed for their lands, and how glory attaches to mere words.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.46.1	QVELQVE diuersité d'herbes qu'il y ait, tout s'enueloppe sous le nom de salade. De mesme, sous la consideration des noms, ie m'en voy faire icy vne galimafrée de diuers articles.	Whatever variety of herbs there may be, it all gets wrapped up under the name of salad. In the same way, under the heading of names, I am going to make a hodgepodge of various items here.
1.46.2	Chaque nation a quelques noms qui se prennent, ie ne sçay comment, en mauuaise part: et à nous Iehan, Guillaume, Benoist. Item, il semble y auoir en la genealogie des Princes, certains noms fatalement affectez: comme des Ptolomées à ceux d'Ægypte, des Henrys en Angleterre, Charles en France, Baudoins en Flandres, et en nostre ancienne Aquitaine des Guillaumes, d'où lon dit que le nom de Guienne est venu: par vn froid rencontre, s'il n'en y auoit d'aussi cruds dans Platon mesme.	Every nation has some names that are taken, I don't know how, in a bad sense: with us, Jehan, Guillaume, Benoît. Item: in the genealogy of princes there seem to be certain names fatefully assigned, such as Ptolemy to the kings of Egypt, Henry in England, Charles in France, Baldwin in Flanders, and, in our old Aquitaine, Guillaume, from which they say the name Guienne came—a feeble play on words, were there not some just as crude in Plato himself.[1]
1.46.3	Item, c'est vne chose legere, mais toutefois digne de memoire pour son estrangeté, et escripte par tesmoin oculaire, que Henry Duc de Normandie, fils de Henry second Roy d'Angleterre, faisant vn festin en France, l'assemblée de la Noblesse y fut si grande, que pour passe-temps, s'estant diuisée en bandes par la ressemblance des noms: en la premiere troupe qui fut des Guillaumes, il se trouua cent dix Cheualiers assis à table portans ce nom, sans mettre en comte les simples Gentils-hommes et seruiteurs.	Item: it is a slight thing, but worth remembering for its strangeness, and recorded by an eyewitness, that when Henry, Duke of Normandy, son of Henry II, King of England, gave a feast in France, the gathering of nobility was so great that, having divided into groups by likeness of names for amusement, in the first troop, the Williams, there were found a hundred and ten knights seated at table bearing that name, not counting the plain gentlemen and servants.[2]
1.46.4	Il est autant plaisant de distribuer les tables par les noms des assistans, comme il estoit à l'Empereur Geta, de faire distribuer le seruice de ses mets, par la consideration des premieres lettres du nom des viandes: on seruoit celles qui se commençoient par m: mouton, marcassin, merlus, marsoin, ainsi des autres.	It is as amusing to assign the tables by the names of the guests as it was for the Emperor Geta to have the courses of his dishes assigned according to the first letters of the names of the foods: they would serve those that began with M—mutton, young boar, hake, porpoise—and so on with the others.[3]
1.46.5	Item, il se dit qu'il fait bon auoir bon nom, c'est à dire credit et reputation: mais encore à la verité est-il	Item: they say it is good to have a good name, that is, credit and reputation. But in truth it is also con-

1 These names were bywords for a dupe or simpleton (Benoît gave "benêt," a simpleton). Guillaume is the French form of William.
2 Henry the Young King (1155–1183), whose feast at Bayeux in 1171 was recorded by the chronicler Robert of Torigni.
3 Geta was Roman co-emperor in AD 211. In French the four foods all begin with M: mouton, marcassin, merlus, marsouin.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	commode, d'auoir vn nom qui aisément se puisse prononcer et mettre en memoire: car les Roys et les grands nous en cognoissent plus aisément, et oublient plus mal volontiers; et de ceux mesmes qui nous seruent, nous commandons plus ordinairement et employons ceux, desquels les noms se presentent le plus facilement à la langue.	venient to have a name that is easy to pronounce and to remember, for kings and the great know us more easily by it and are less willing to forget us; and even among those who serve us, we more usually give orders to and employ those whose names come most readily to the tongue.
	I'ay veu le Roy Henry second, ne pouuoir nommer à droit vn Gentil-homme de ce quartier de Gascongne; et à vne fille de la Royne, il fut luy mesme d'aduis de donner le nom general de la race, par ce que celuy de la maison paternelle luy sembla trop diuers. Et Socrates estime digne du soing paternel, de donner vn beau nom aux enfants.	I have seen King Henry II unable to say properly the name of a gentleman from this part of Gascony; and for one of the queen's maids of honor he himself advised giving her the general name of her family, because that of her father's house seemed to him too outlandish. And Socrates considers it worthy of a father's care to give his children fine names.
1.46.6	Item, on dit que la fondation de nostre Dame la grand' à Poitiers, prit origine de ce qu'vn ieune homme desbauché, logé en cet endroit, ayant recouuré vne garce, et luy ayant d'arriuée demandé son nom, qui estoit Marie, se sentit si viuement espris de religion et de respect de ce nom sacrosainct de la Vierge mere de nostre Sauueur, que non seulement il la chassa soudain, mais en amanda tout le reste de sa vie: et qu'en consideration de ce miracle, il fut basty en la place, où estoit la maison de ce ieune homme, vne chapelle au nom de nostre Dame, et depuis l'eglise que nous y voyons.	Item: they say that the church of Notre-Dame-la-Grande in Poitiers was founded in this way. A dissolute young man lodging on that spot had got hold of a girl and, asking her name as soon as she arrived, learned it was Marie. At that he felt himself so keenly seized with religion and with respect for that most sacred name of the Virgin Mother of our Savior that he not only sent her away at once but mended the whole rest of his life. And in consideration of this miracle there was built, on the spot where this young man's house stood, a chapel in the name of Our Lady, and later the church that we see there.
	Cette correction voyelle et auriculaire, deuotieuse, tira droit à l'ame: cette autre suiuante, de mesme genre, s'insinüa par les sens corporels. Pythagoras estant en compagnie de ieunes hommes, lesquels il sentit complotter, eschauffez de la feste, d'aller violer vne maison pudique, commanda à la menestriere, de changer de ton: et par vne musique poisante, seuere, et spondaïque, enchanta tout doucement leur ardeur, et l'endormit.	This correction, a pious one, working through voice and ear, went straight to the soul; this next one, of the same kind, worked its way in through the bodily senses. Pythagoras was in the company of some young men whom he perceived, heated by the festivities, to be plotting to go and violate a chaste household. He ordered the woman playing music to change her tune, and by a heavy, severe, spondaic music he gently charmed their ardor and lulled it to sleep.
1.46.7	Item, ne dira pas la posterité, que nostre reformation d'auiourd'huy ait esté delicate et exacte, de n'auoir pas seulement combattu les erreurs, et les vices, et rempli le monde de deuotion, d'humilité, d'obeissance, de paix, et de toute espece de vertu; mais d'auoir passé iusques à combattre ces anciens noms de nos baptesmes, Charles, Loys, François, pour peupler le monde de Mathusalem, Ezechiel, Malachie, beaucoup mieux sentans de la foy?	Item: will not posterity say that our present-day reformation has been delicate and exact, in that it not only fought errors and vices and filled the world with devotion, humility, obedience, peace and every kind of virtue, but went so far as to fight these old baptismal names of ours, Charles, Louis, François, so as to people the world with Methuselahs, Ezekiels and Malachis, which smell far more of the faith?[4]

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
	Vn Gentil-homme mien voisin, estimant les commoditez du vieux temps au prix du notre, n'oublioit pas de mettre en compte, la fierté et magnificence des noms de la Noblesse de ce temps là, Dom Grumedan, Quedragan, Agesilan, et qu'à les ouïr seulement sonner, il se sentoit qu'ils auoyent esté bien autres gens, que Pierre, Guillot, et Michel.	A gentleman, a neighbor of mine, weighing the advantages of the old days against ours, did not forget to count the pride and magnificence of the names of the nobility of that time—Dom Grumedan, Quedragan, Agesilan—and said that just hearing them ring out, one could feel they had been quite other people than Pierre, Guillot and Michel.[5]
1.46.8	Item, ie sçay bon gré à Iacques Amiot d'auoir laissé dans le cours d'vn' oraison Françoise, les noms Latins tous entiers, sans les bigarrer et changer, pour leur donner vne cadence Françoise. Cela sembloit vn peu rude au commencement: mais des-ja l'vsage par le credit de son Plutarque, nous en a osté toute l'estrangeté. I'ay souhaité souuent, que ceux qui escriuent les histoires en Latin, nous laissassent nos noms tous tels qu'ils sont: car en faisant de Vaudemont, Vallemontanus, et les metamorphosant, pour les garber à la Grecque ou à la Romaine, nous ne sçauons où nous en sommes, et en perdons la cognoissance.	Item: I am grateful to Jacques Amyot for having left the Latin names whole in the course of his French prose, without tricking them out and altering them to give them a French cadence. That seemed a little harsh at first, but usage, through the credit of his Plutarch, has already removed all their strangeness for us. I have often wished that those who write histories in Latin would leave our names just as they are. For by making Vaudemont into Vallemontanus, and metamorphosing names to dress them up in Greek or Roman fashion, they leave us not knowing where we are, and we lose all knowledge of them.[6]
1.46.9	Pour clorre nostre compte; c'est vn vilain vsage et de tres-mauuaise consequence en nostre France, d'appeller chacun par le nom de sa terre et Seigneurie, et la chose du monde, qui faict plus mesler et mescognoistre les races. Vn cadet de bonne maison, ayant eu pour son appanage vne terre, sous le nom de laquelle il a esté cognu et honnoré, ne peut honnestement l'abandonner: dix ans apres sa mort, la terre s'en va à vn estranger, qui en fait de mesmes: deuinez où nous sommes, de la cognoissance de ces hommes. Il ne faut pas aller querir d'autres exemples, que de nostre maison Royalle, où autant de partages, autant de surnoms: cependant l'originel de la tige nous est eschappé.	To close our account: it is a nasty practice, and of very bad consequence in our France, to call each man by the name of his land and lordship, and the thing in the world that most muddles families and makes them unrecognizable. A younger son of a good house, having received as his portion an estate under whose name he has been known and honored, cannot decently abandon it. Ten years after his death the estate passes to a stranger, who does the same: guess where we stand in knowing who these men are. We need look for no other examples than our royal house, where there are as many surnames as there are portions; meanwhile the origin of the stock has escaped us.
	Il y a tant de liberté en ces mutations, que de mon temps ie n'ay veu personne esleué par la fortune à quelque grandeur extraordinaire, à qui on n'ait attaché incontinent des tiltres genealogiques, nouueaux et ignorez à son pere, et qu'on n'ait anté en quelque illustre tige. Et de bonne fortune les plus obscures familles, sont plus idoynes à falsification.	There is such freedom in these changes that in my time I have not seen anyone raised by fortune to some extraordinary greatness who did not at once have genealogical titles attached to him, new and unknown to his father, and was not grafted onto some illustrious stock. And as luck would have it, the most obscure families are the best suited to falsification.
1.46.10	Combien auons nous de Gentils-hommes en France, qui sont de Royalle race selon leurs comptes? plus ce crois-ie	How many gentlemen do we have in France who are of royal blood by their own reckoning? More, I que d'autres. Fut-il pas dict de bonne grace par vn de mes amis? Ils estoyent plusieurs assemblez pour la querelle d'vn Seigneur, contre vn autre; lequel autre, auoit à la verité quelque prerogatiue de tiltres et d'alliances, esleuées au dessus de la commune Noblesse. Sur le propos de cette prerogatiue, chacun cherchant à s'esgaler à luy, alleguoit, qui vn' origine, qui vn' autre, qui la ressemblance du nom, qui des armes, qui vne vieille pancharte domestique: et le moindre se trouuoit arriere-fils de quelque Roy d'outremer.	believe, than of any other kind. Was it not neatly done by a friend of mine? A number of them had gathered over a quarrel between one lord and another. This other did in truth have some prerogative of titles and alliances raised above the common nobility. On the subject of this prerogative, each one, trying to make himself his equal, put forward one origin or another—one the resemblance of his name, another his arms, another an old family charter—and the least of them turned out to be the descendant of some king from overseas.

	Comme ce fut à disner, cettuy-cy, au lieu de prendre sa place, se recula en profondes reuerences, suppliant l'assistance de l'excuser, de ce que par temerité il auoit iusques lors vescu auec eux en compagnon: mais qu'ayant esté nouuellement informé de leurs vieilles qualitez, il commençoit à les honnorer selon leurs degrez, et qu'il ne luy appartenoit pas de se soir parmy tant de Princes.	When it came to dinner, this friend, instead of taking his place, backed away with deep bows, begging the company to excuse him for having rashly lived among them until then as an equal; but now that he had been newly informed of their ancient ranks, he was beginning to honor them according to their degrees, and it was not fitting for him to sit among so many princes.
	Apres sa farce, il leur dit mille iniures: Contentez vous de par Dieu, de ce dequoy nos peres se sont contentez: et de ce que nous sommes; nous sommes assez si nous le sçauons bien maintenir: ne desaduouons pas la fortune et condition de noz ayeulx, et ostons ces sottes imaginations, qui ne peuuent faillir à quiconque a l'impudence de les alleguer.	After his farce, he heaped abuse on them: "In God's name, be content with what our fathers were content with, and with what we are. We are enough if we know how to keep it up well. Let us not disown the fortune and condition of our ancestors, and let us get rid of these silly fancies, which are always there for anyone with the impudence to put them forward."
1.46.11	Les armoiries n'ont de seurté, non plus que les surnoms. Ie porte d'azur semé de trefles d'or, à vne pate de lyon de mesme, armée de gueules, mise en face. Quel priuilege a cette figure, pour demeurer particulierement en ma maison? vn gendre la transportera en vne autre famille; quelque chetif acheteur en fera ses premieres armes: il n'est chose où il se rencontre plus de mutation et de confusion.	Coats of arms are no more secure than surnames. My arms are azure, strewn with gold trefoils, with a lion's paw also of gold, armed in gules, set across the middle of the shield. What privilege does this figure have to remain particularly in my house? A son-in-law will carry it into another family; some paltry buyer will make it his first arms. There is nothing in which more change and confusion is to be found.
1.46.12	Mais cette consideration me tire par force à vn autre champ. Sondons vn peu de pres, et pour Dieu regardons, à quel fondement nous attachons cette gloire et reputation, pour laquelle se boulleuerse le monde: où asseons nous cette renommée, que nous allons questant auec si grand'peine? C'est en somme Pierre ou Guillaume, qui la porte, prend en garde, et à qui elle touche. O la courageuse faculté que l'esperance: qui en vn subiect	But this consideration drags me by force into another field. Let us probe a little closely and, for God's sake, look at what foundation we attach this glory and reputation to, for which the world is turned upside down. Where do we set this renown that we go questing after with such great pains? It is, in the end, Pierre or Guillaume who bears it, takes it into his keeping, and whom it concerns.

ou trois ou quatre traicts de plume, premierement si aisez à varier, que ie demanderois volontiers à qui touche l'honneur de tant de victoires, à Guesquin, à Glesquin, ou à Gueaquin? Il y auroit bien plus d'apparence icy, qu'en Lucien que Σ. mit T. en procez, car Non leuia aut ludicra petuntur / Præmia: Il y va de bon; il est question laquelle de ces lettres doit estre payée de tant de sieges, battailles, blessures, prisons et seruices faits à la couronne de France, par ce sien fameux Connestable.	or three or four strokes of the pen, so easy to vary, first of all, that I would gladly ask to whom the honor of so many victories belongs: to Guesquin, to Glesquin, or to Gueaquin? There would be far more reason for a lawsuit here than in Lucian, where Sigma (Σ) sues Tau (T), for No light or trivial prizes / are sought: this is serious business. The question is which of these spellings is to be paid for so many sieges, battles, wounds, imprisonments and services rendered to the crown of France by its famous Constable.[7]
1.46.13 Nicolas Denisot n'a eu soing que des lettres de son nom, et en a changé toute la contexture, pour en bastir le Conte d'Alsinois qu'il a estrené de la gloire de sa poësie et peinture. Et l'historien Suetone n'a aymé que le sens du sien, et en ayant priué Lénis, qui estoit le surnom de son pere, a laissé Tranquillus successeur de la reputation de ses escrits. Qui croiroit que le Capitaine Bayard n'eust honneur, que celuy qu'il a emprunté des faicts de Pierre Terrail? et qu'Antoine Escalin se laisse voler à sa veuë tant de nauigations et charges par mer et par terre au Capitaine Poulin, et au Baron de la Garde?	Nicolas Denisot cared only for the letters of his name, and rearranged them completely to build out of them the Comte d'Alsinois, whom he endowed with the glory of his poetry and painting. And the historian Suetonius cared only for the meaning of his: setting aside Lenis, his father's surname, he made Tranquillus heir to the reputation of his writings. Who would believe that Captain Bayard has no honor except what he borrowed from the deeds of Pierre Terrail? And that Antoine Escalin lets so many voyages and commands by sea and land be stolen from him before his eyes by Captain Poulin and the Baron de la Garde?[8]
1.46.14 Secondement ce sont traits de plume communs à mill'hommes. Combien y a-il en toutes les races, de personnes de mesme nom et surnom? Et en diuerses races, siecles et païs, combien? L'histoire a cognu trois Socrates, cinq Platons, huict Aristotes, sept Xenophons, vingt Demetrius, vingt Theodores: et pensez combien elle n'en a pas cognu. Qui empesche mon palefrenier de s'appeller Pompée le grand? Mais apres tout, quels moyens, quels ressors y a il qui attachent à mon palefrenier trespassé, ou à cet autre homme qui eut la teste tranchée en Ægypte, et qui ioignent à eux, cette voix glorifiée, et ces traits de plume, ainsin honnorez,	Secondly, these are pen strokes common to a thousand men. How many people in every family share the same name and surname? And across different families, ages and countries, how many? History has known three Socrateses, five Platos, eight Aristotles, seven Xenophons, twenty Demetriuses, twenty Theodores—and think how many it has not known. 1.46.16	Les suruiuants se chatouillent de la douceur de ces voix: et par icelles solicitez de ialousie et desir, transmettent inconsiderément par fantasie aux trespassez cettuy leur propre ressentiment: et d'vne pipeuse esperance se donnent à croire d'en estre capables à leur tour. 1.47.1 C'EST bien ce que dit ce vers, Επεων δε πολυς νομος ενθα και ενθα. il y a prou de loy de parler par tout, et pour et contre. Pour exemple: Vince Hannibal, et non seppe vsar' poi / Ben la vittoriosa sua ventura.

It is just as this line says: Wide is the range of words, this way and that: there is ample license to speak on every side, both for and against. For example: Hannibal conquered, but did not then know how / to make good use of his victorious fortune.[1]

1.47.2 Qui voudra estre de ce party, et faire valoir auecques nos gens, la faute de n'auoir dernierement poursuiuy nostre pointe à Moncontour; ou qui voudra accuser le Roy d'Espaigne, de n'auoir sçeu se seruir de l'aduantage qu'il eut contre nous à Sainct Quentin; il pourra dire cette faute partir d'vne ame enyurée de sa bonne fortune, et d'vn courage, lequel plein et gorgé de ce commencement de bon heur, perd le goust de l'accroistre, des-ja par trop empesché à digerer ce qu'il en a: il en a sa brassée toute comble, il n'en peut saisir dauantage: indigne que la fortune luy aye mis vn tel bien entre mains: car quel profit en sent-il, si neantmoins il donne à son ennemy moyen de se remettre sus?

Whoever wants to take this side, and make much, with our people, of the mistake of not having pressed home our advantage at Moncontour recently; or whoever wants to accuse the King of Spain of not having known how to use the advantage he had over us at Saint-Quentin, may say that this mistake comes from a soul drunk with its good fortune, and from a heart which, full and gorged with this first taste of success, loses its appetite for increasing it, already too busy digesting what it has. It has its arms full to overflowing and cannot grasp any more—unworthy that Fortune should have put such a good into its hands. For what profit does it get from it if it nonetheless gives its enemy the means to get back on his feet?[2]

Quell' esperance peut-on auoir qu'il ose vn' autre fois attaquer ceux-cy ralliez et remis, et de nouueau armez de despit et de vengeance, qui ne les a osé ou sçeu poursuiure tous rompus et effrayez? Dum fortuna calet, dum conficit omnia terror? Mais en fin, que peut-il attendre de mieux, que ce qu'il vient de perdre? Ce n'est pas comme à l'escrime, où le nombre des touches donne gain: tant que l'ennemy est en pieds, c'est à recommencer de plus belle: ce n'est pas victoire, si elle ne met fin à la guerre.

What hope can one have that he will dare attack them another time, once they are rallied and restored and newly armed with spite and vengeance, when he did not dare, or did not know how, to pursue them while they were all broken and terrified? While fortune is hot, while terror is finishing everything? But in the end, what better can he expect than what he has just lost? It is not as in fencing, where the number of hits wins the bout: as long as the enemy is on his feet, it is all to begin again, harder than ever. It is no victory if it does not put an end to the war.[3]

1.47.3 Mais pourquoy ne dira-on aussi au contraire? que c'est l'effect d'vn esprit precipiteux et insatiable, de ne sçauoir mettre fin à sa conuoitise: que c'est abuser des faueurs de Dieu, de leur vouloir faire perdre la mesure qu'il leur a prescripte: et que de se reietter au danger apres la victoire, c'est la remettre encore vn coup à la mercy de la fortune: que l'vne des plus grandes sagesses en l'art militaire, c'est de ne pousser son ennemy au desespoir. Sylla et Marius en la guerre sociale ayans défaict les Marses, en voyans encore vne trouppe de reste, qui par desespoir se reuenoient ietter à eux, comme bestes furieuses, ne furent pas d'aduis de les attendre.

Si l'ardeur de Monsieur de Foix ne l'eust emporté à poursuiure trop asprement les restes de la victoire de Rauenne, il ne l'eust pas souillée de sa mort. diers that he would have been lost if their captain had known how to win; and he put on his spurs in quite another way when it was his turn.

But why may one not also argue the contrary? That it is the mark of a headlong and insatiable mind not to know how to set a limit to its greed; that it is an abuse of God's favors to want to make them overstep the measure he has prescribed for them; that to throw oneself back into danger after the victory is to put it once more at the mercy of Fortune; that one of the greatest pieces of wisdom in the art of war is not to drive one's enemy to despair. Sulla and Marius, in the Social War, having defeated the Marsi, and seeing a band of survivors coming back out of despair to hurl themselves at them like furious beasts, did not see fit to wait for them.[4]

If Monsieur de Foix's ardor had not carried him away into pursuing the remnants of the victory at Ravenna too fiercely, he would not have sullied it with his death. Yet the fresh memory of his example served to keep Monsieur d'Enghien from a similar mishap at Ceresole. It is dangerous to attack a man whom you have deprived of every other means of escape but arms; for necessity is a violent schoolmistress: the bites of necessity, once provoked, are the most grievous.[5]

He is not conquered cheaply who offers his throat to the enemy. That is why Pharax prevented the King of Sparta, who had just won the day against the Mantineans, from going to confront a thousand Argives who had escaped intact from the rout, and had him let them slip away freely, so as not to come up against a valor stung and enraged by misfortune. Clodomir, King of Aquitaine, after his victory, pursuing Gondemar, King of Burgundy, who was beaten and in flight, forced him to turn and face him; but his stubbornness robbed him of the fruit of his victory, for he died there.[6]

Likewise, if one had to choose between keeping one's soldiers richly and sumptuously armed or armed only for necessity, there would be put forward in favor of the first course—which was the d'honneur et de gloire au soldat de se voir paré, et vn' occasion de se rendre plus obstiné au combat, ayant à sauuer ses armes, comme ses biens et heritages. Raison, dit Xenophon, pourquoy les Asiatiques menoyent en leurs guerres, femmes, concubines, auec leurs ioyaux et richesses plus cheres.

Mais il s'offriroit aussi de l'autre part, qu'on doit plustost oster au soldat le soing de se conseruer, que de le luy accroistre: qu'il craindra par ce moyen doublement à se hazarder: ioint que c'est augmenter à l'ennemy l'enuie de la victoire, par ces riches despouilles: et a lon remarqué que d'autres fois cela encouragea merueilleusement les Romains à l'encontre des Samnites. Antiochus montrant à Hannibal l'armée qu'il preparoit contr' eux pompeuse et magnifique en toute sorte d'equippage, et luy demandant. Les Romains se contenteront-ils de cette armée? S'ils s'en contenteront? respondit-il, vrayement ouy, pour auares qu'ils soyent.

Lycurgus deffendoit aux siens non seulement la sumptuosité en leur equippage, mais encore de despouiller leurs ennemis vaincus, voulant, disoit-il, que la pauureté et frugalité reluisist auec le reste de la battaille.

1.47.5 Aux sieges et ailleurs, où l'occasion nous approche de l'ennemy, nous donnons volontiers licence aux soldats de le brauer, desdaigner, et iniurier de toutes façons de reproches: et non sans apparence de raison. Car ce n'est pas faire peu, de leur oster toute esperance de grace et de composition, en leur representant qu'il n'y a plus ordre de l'attendre de celuy, qu'ils ont si fort outragé, et qu'il ne reste remede que de la victoire.

Si est-ce qu'il en mesprit à Vitellius: car ayant affaire à Othon, plus foible en valeur de soldats, des-accoustumez de longue main du faict de la guerre, et amollis par les délices de la ville, il les agassa tant en fin, par ses paroles picquantes, leur reprochant leur pusillanimité, et le regret des Dames et festes, qu'ils venoient de laisser à Rome, qu'il leur remit par ce moyen le cœur au ventre, ce que nuls enhortemens n'auoient sçeu faire: et les attira luy-mesme sur ses bras, où lon ne les pouuoit pousser.

view of Sertorius, Philopoemen, Brutus, Caesar and others—that it is always a spur of honor and glory to a soldier to see himself finely adorned, and a reason to make himself more stubborn in combat, having his arms to save as if they were his goods and inheritance. That is the reason, says Xenophon, why the Asiatics took their wives and concubines to their wars, along with their jewels and most precious riches.

But on the other side it would also be put forward that one should rather take away from a soldier his concern for preserving himself than increase it; that this way he will be doubly afraid to risk himself; and besides, that these rich spoils increase the enemy's desire for victory. It has been observed that on other occasions this wonderfully encouraged the Romans against the Samnites. Antiochus was showing Hannibal the army he was preparing against them, splendid and magnificent in every sort of equipment, and asked him: "Will the Romans be satisfied with this army?" "Will they be satisfied with it?" he replied. "Truly, yes, however greedy they may be."

Lycurgus forbade his people not only sumptuousness in their equipment but even stripping their defeated enemies, wishing, he said, that poverty and frugality should shine along with the rest of the battle.

In sieges and elsewhere, when circumstances bring us close to the enemy, we readily give our soldiers license to defy him, scorn him and insult him with every kind of taunt. And there is some show of reason in it. For it is no small thing to take away from them all hope of mercy and of terms, by showing them that they can no longer expect these from the man they have so grossly insulted, and that the only remedy left is victory.

Yet it turned out badly for Vitellius. He was up against Otho, whose soldiers were of weaker mettle, long out of the habit of war and softened by the pleasures of the city. In the end he goaded them so much with his stinging words, taunting them with their faint-heartedness and their longing for the ladies and feasts they had just left behind in Rome, that by this means he put fresh heart into them, which no exhortations had been able to do. He himself drew them down upon his own head, when no one had been able to push them forward.[7]

And indeed, when insults cut to the quick, they can easily make a man who was going sluggishly about the business in his king's quarrel go at it with quite another feeling in his own.

1.47.6 A considerer de combien d'importance est la conseruation d'vn chef en vn' armée, et que la visée de l'ennemy regarde principalement cette teste, à laquelle tiennent toutes les autres, et en dependent: il semble qu'on ne puisse mettre en doubte ce conseil, que nous voyons auoir esté pris par plusieurs grands chefs, de se trauestir et desguiser sur le point de la meslée.

Toutesfois l'inconuenient qu'on encourt par ce moyen, n'est pas moindre que celuy qu'on pense fuir: car le Capitaine venant à estre mescognu des siens, le courage qu'ils prennent de son exemple et de sa presence, vient aussi quant et quant à leur faillir; et perdant la veuë de ses marques et enseignes accoustumées, ils le iugent ou mort, ou s'estre desrobé desesperant de l'affaire. Et quant à l'experience, nous luy voyons fauoriser tantost l'vn tantost l'autre party.

L'accident de Pyrrhus en la battaille qu'il eut contre le consul Leuinus en Italie, nous sert à l'vn et l'autre visage: car pour s'estre voulu cacher sous les armes de Demogacles, et luy auoir donné les siennes, il sauua bien sans doute sa vie, mais aussi il en cuida encourir l'autre inconuenient de perdre la iournée. Alexandre, Cæsar, Lucullus, aimoient à se marquer au combat par des accoustremens et armes riches, de couleur reluisante et particuliere: Agis, Agesilaus, et ce grand Gilippus au rebours, alloyent à la guerre obscurement couuerts, et sans attour imperial.

When we consider how important it is to preserve the commander of an army, and that the enemy aims chiefly at that head, on which all the others hang and depend, it seems that no one could question the course we see several great commanders have taken: changing their dress and disguising themselves at the moment of battle.

Yet the drawback incurred this way is no less than the one you are trying to avoid. For when the captain is not recognized by his own men, the courage they draw from his example and his presence fails them along with it; and losing sight of his usual marks and insignia, they judge that he is dead, or that he has slipped away in despair of the outcome. And as for experience, we see it favor now one side, now the other.

What happened to Pyrrhus in the battle he fought against the consul Laevinus in Italy serves us on both counts. By choosing to hide under the armor of Demogacles and giving him his own, he did indeed save his life, no doubt; but he very nearly incurred the other drawback, of losing the day. Alexander, Caesar and Lucullus liked to mark themselves out in battle by rich dress and armor of a gleaming and distinctive color; Agis, Agesilaus and the great Gylippus, on the contrary, went to war plainly clad, without the trappings of command.[8]

1.47.7 A la battaille de Pharsale entre autres reproches qu'on donne à Pompeius, c'est d'auoir arresté son armée pied coy attendant l'ennemy: pour autant que cela (ie desroberay icy les mots mesmes de Plutarque, qui valent mieux que les miens) affoiblit la violence, que le courir donne aux premiers coups, et quant et quant oste l'eslancement des combattans les vns contre les autres, qui a accoustumé de les remplir d'impetuosité, et de fureur, plus qu'autre chose, quand ils viennent à s'entrechocquer de roideur, leur augmentant le courage par le cry et la course: et rend la chaleur des soldats en

At the battle of Pharsalus, among other reproaches leveled at Pompey is that he halted his army and stood still waiting for the enemy. For this (I shall steal Plutarch's very words here, which are better than mine) weakens the violence that running gives to the first blows, and at the same time removes the rush of the combatants against one another, which more than anything usually fills them with impetuosity and fury when they come to clash headlong, the shouting and the running increasing their courage; and it leaves the soldiers' maniere de dire refroidie et figée. Voyla ce qu'il dit pour ce rolle.

Mais si Cæsar eust perdu, qui n'eust peu aussi bien dire, qu'au contraire, la plus forte et roide assiette, est celle en laquelle on se tient planté sans bouger, et que qui est en sa marche arresté, resserrant et espargnant pour le besoing, sa force en soy-mesmes, a grand aduantage contre celuy qui est esbranlé, et qui a desia consommé à la course la moitié de son haleine? outre ce que l'armée estant vn corps de tant de diuerses pieces, il est impossible qu'elle s'esmeuue en cette furie, d'vn mouuement si iuste, qu'elle n'en altere ou rompe son ordonnance: et que le plus dispost ne soit aux prises, auant que son compagnon le secoure.

En cette villaine battaille des deux freres Perses, Clearchus, Lacedemonien, qui commandoit les Grecs du party de Cyrus, les mena tout bellement à la charge, sans se haster: mais à cinquante pas pres, il les mit à la course: esperant par la brieueté de l'espace, mesnager et leur ordre, et leur haleine: leur donnant cependant l'auantage de l'impetuosité, pour leurs personnes, et pour leurs armes à trait. D'autres ont reglé ce doubte en leur armée de cette maniere: Si les ennemis vous courent sus, attendez les de pied coy: s'ils vous attendent de pied coy, courez leur sus.

1.47.8 Au passage que l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme fit en Prouence, le Roy François fut au propre d'eslire, ou de luy aller au deuant en Italie, ou de l'attendre en ses terres: et bien qu'il considerast combien c'est d'auantage, de conseruer sa maison pure et nette des troubles de la guerre, afin qu'entiere en ses forces, elle puisse continuellement fournir deniers, et secours au besoing: que la necessité des guerres porte à tous les coups, de faire le gast, ce qui ne se peut faire bonnement en nos biens propres, et si le païsant ne porte pas si doucement ce rauage de ceux de son party, que de l'ennemy, en maniere qu'il s'en peut aysément allumer des seditions, et des troubles parmy nous: que la licence de desrober et piller, qui ne peut estre permise en son païs, est vn grand support aux ennuis de la guerre:

ardor, so to speak, cooled and congealed. That is what he says on this score.[9]

But if Caesar had lost, who could not just as well have said the opposite: that the strongest and firmest position is the one in which you stand planted without moving, and that the man who halts in his march, gathering and saving his strength within himself for when it is needed, has a great advantage over the man who is on the move and has already used up half his breath in running? Besides, since an army is a body made of so many different parts, it is impossible for it to move in this frenzy with such precision that it does not disturb or break its formation, and that the nimblest man is not already at grips before his comrade can come to his aid.

In that ugly battle between the two Persian brothers, Clearchus the Lacedaemonian, who commanded the Greeks on Cyrus' side, led them to the charge quite slowly, without hurrying; but at fifty paces off he set them running, hoping by the shortness of the distance to husband both their order and their breath, while still giving them the advantage of impetus, both for their persons and for their missile weapons. Others have settled this question for their armies in this way: if the enemy charge at you, wait for them standing still; if they wait for you standing still, charge at them.[10]

When the Emperor Charles V invaded Provence, King Francis was in a position to choose either to go and meet him in Italy or to wait for him in his own lands. He considered how great an advantage it is to keep one's house clean and clear of the troubles of war, so that, with its strength intact, it can continually supply money and help when needed; that the necessities of war constantly require laying waste, which cannot well be done to one's own property, and that the peasant does not bear such ravaging by his own side as meekly as by the enemy, so that seditions and troubles may easily flare up among us; that the license to steal and plunder, which cannot be allowed in one's own country, is a great support in the hardships of war;[11] steps from his wife and his home; that the one who lays the table always bears the cost; that there is more zest in attacking than in defending; and that the shock of losing a battle in our very bowels is so violent that it can hardly fail to shake the whole body, since there is no passion so contagious as fear, none so easily taken on credit, none that spreads more swiftly; and that the towns which have heard the crash of this storm at their gates, and have taken in their captains and soldiers still trembling and out of breath, are in danger, in the heat of the moment, of throwing themselves into some bad course. Nevertheless he chose to recall the forces he had beyond the mountains and to watch the enemy come.

For he could imagine, on the contrary, that being at home and among his friends, he could not fail to have plenty of every convenience; that the rivers and passes, being at his command, would bring him both provisions and money in complete safety and without need of escort; that he would find his subjects all the more devoted the closer the danger came to them; that having so many towns and barriers for his security, it would be up to him to set the terms of battle according to his opportunity and advantage; and that if he chose to play for time, he could watch from shelter and at his ease while his enemy languished and wore himself down, beset by the difficulties that would assail him as he pressed on in a hostile land, where there would be nothing in front of him, behind him or on either side that was not making war on him: no means of refreshing his army or spreading it out if sickness broke out, nor of lodging his wounded under cover; no money, no provisions, except at the point of the lance; no leisure to rest and catch his breath; no knowledge of the places or the country to protect him from ambushes and surprises; and if he came to lose a battle, no means of saving what was left.

And there was no lack of examples for either course.

Scipio found it far better to go and attack his enemy's lands in Africa than to defend his own and fight him in Italy, where he was; and it turned out

But Hannibal, on the contrary, in that same war, ruined himself by abandoning the conquest of a foreign country to go and defend his own. The Athenians, having left the enemy in their lands to cross to Sicily, had Fortune against them; but Agathocles, king of Syracuse, had her on his side, having crossed into Africa and left the war at home.[12]
1.47.10	Ainsi nous auons bien accoustumé de dire auec raison, que les euenemens et issuës dependent, notamment en la guerre, pour la plus part, de la fortune: laquelle ne se veut pas renger et assuiettir à nostre discours et prudence, comme disent ces vers. Et malè consultis pretium est prudentia fallax; Nec fortuna probat causas sequitúrque merentes, Sed vaga per cunctos nullo descrimine fertur. Scilicet est aliud quod nos cogátque regátque Maius, et in proprias ducat mortalia leges. Mais à le bien prendre, il semble que nos conseils et deliberations en despendent bien autant; et que la fortune engage en son trouble et incertitude, aussi nos discours.	So we are quite accustomed to say, and with reason, that events and outcomes depend for the most part, especially in war, on Fortune, who will not fall into line with and submit to our reasoning and prudence, as these lines say: Ill-laid plans are often rewarded, and prudence deceives; Fortune does not examine causes or follow the deserving, But roams through all without distinction. Clearly there is something greater that compels and rules us, And leads mortal things under its own laws. But, rightly taken, it seems that our counsels and deliberations depend on her just as much, and that Fortune draws our reasoning too into her turmoil and uncertainty.[13]
	Nous raisonnons hazardeusement et temerairement, dit Timæus en Platon, par ce que, comme nous, noz discours ont grande participation à la temerité du hazard.	We reason rashly and at random, says Timaeus in Plato, because, like ourselves, our reasonings have a large share in the rashness of chance.

1.48.2	Il me semble auoir ouy dire que les Romains auoient des cheuaux qu'ils appelloient funales ou dextrarios, qui se menoient à dextre ou à relais, pour les prendre tous fraiz au besoin: et de là vient que nous appellons destriers les cheuaux de seruice. Et noz romans disent ordinairement, adestrer, pour accompagner. Ils appelloyent aussi desultorios equos, des cheuaux qui estoient dressez de façon que courans de toute leur roideur, accouplez coste à coste l'vn de l'autre, sans bride, sans selle, les Gentils-hommes Romains, voire tous armez, au milieu de la course se iettoient et reiettoient de l'vn à l'autre.	I seem to have heard it said that the Romans had horses they called funales or dextrarios, which were led on the right hand or kept in relay, to be taken fresh when needed; and that is why we call warhorses destriers. And our romances commonly say adestrer for "to accompany." They also called desultorios equos horses trained in such a way that, while they galloped at full speed, coupled side by side, without bridle or saddle, Roman gentlemen, even in full armor, would leap back and forth from one to the other in the middle of the race.[1]
	Les Numides gendarmes menoient en main vn second cheual, pour changer au plus chaud de la meslée: quibus, desultorum in modum, binos trahentibus equos, inter acerrimam sæpe pugnam, in recentem equum, ex fesso, armatis transsultare mos erat. Tanta velocitas ipsis, támque docile equorum genus!	The Numidian men-at-arms led a second horse by hand, to change mounts in the thick of the fray: they were accustomed, like trick riders, to lead two horses, and often in the hottest of the fight to leap fully armed from the tired horse onto the fresh one; so great was their agility, and so docile their breed of horses![2]
1.48.3	Il se trouue plusieurs cheuaux dressez à secourir leur maistre, courir sus à qui leur presente vne espée nue; se ietter des pieds et des dents sur ceux qui les attaquent et affrontent: mais il leur aduient plus souuent de nuire aux amis, qu'aux ennemis. Ioint que vous ne les desprenez pas à vostre poste quand ils se sont vne fois harpez; et demeurez à la misericorde de leur combat. Il mesprint lourdement à Artibius general de l'armée de Perse combattant contre Onesilus Roy de Salamine, de personne à personne; d'estre monté sur vn cheual façonné en cette escole: car il fut cause de sa mort, le coustillier d'Onesilus l'ayant accueilly d'vne faulx, entre les deux espaules, comme il s'estoit cabré sur son maistre.	There are many horses trained to help their master, to rush at anyone who shows them a naked sword, and to fling themselves with hooves and teeth on those who attack and confront them; but it more often happens that they harm friends than enemies. Besides, you cannot pull them off at will once they have locked on, and you are left at the mercy of their fight. It went badly wrong for Artybius, general of the Persian army, fighting man to man against Onesilus, king of Salamis, that he was mounted on a horse schooled this way: for it caused his death, Onesilus' squire catching him with a scythe between the shoulders as the horse reared up against his master.[3]

	Et ce que les Italiens disent, qu'en la battaille de Fornuoue, le cheual du Roy Charles se deschargea à ruades et pennades des ennemis qui le pressoyent, qu'il estoit perdu sans cela: ce fut vn grand coup de hazard, s'il est vray. Les Mammelus se vantent, d'auoir les plus adroits cheuaux, de gensdarmes du monde. Que par nature, et par coustume, ils sont faits à cognoistre et distinguer l'ennemy, sur qui il faut qu'ils se ruent de dents et de pieds, selon la voix ou signe qu'on leur fait. Et pareillement, à releuer de la bouche les lances et dards emmy la place, et les offrir au maistre, selon qu'il le commande.	As for what the Italians say, that at the battle of Fornovo King Charles's horse rid him by kicking and bucking of the enemies pressing him, and that he would have been lost without it—that was a great stroke of luck, if it is true. The Mamelukes boast that they have the most skillful cavalry horses in the world: that by nature and by training they are made to recognize and distinguish the enemy, on whom they must fling themselves with teeth and hooves at the word or sign given them; and likewise to pick up lances and darts from the field with their mouths and offer them to their master at his command.[4]
1.48.4	On dit de Cæsar, et aussi du grand Pompeius, que parmy leurs autres excellentes qualitez, ils estoient fort bons hommes de cheual: et de Cæsar, qu'en sa ieunesse monté à dos sur vn cheual, et sans bride, il luy faisoit prendre carriere les mains tournées derriere le dos. Comme nature a voulu faire de ce personnage et d'Alexandre deux miracles en l'art militaire, vous diriez qu'elle s'est aussi efforcée à les armer extraordinairement: car chacun sçait, du cheual d'Alexandre Bucefal, qu'il auoit la teste retirant à celle d'vn toreau, qu'il ne se souffroit monter à personne qu'à son maistre, ne peut estre dressé que par luy mesme, fut honoré apres sa mort, et vne ville bastie en son nom.	It is said of Caesar, and also of Pompey the Great, that among their other excellent qualities they were very good horsemen; and of Caesar, that in his youth, riding bareback on a horse without a bridle, he would put it to a gallop with his hands clasped behind his back. As nature chose to make this man and Alexander two miracles in the art of war, you would say she also took pains to arm them extraordinarily. For everyone knows that Alexander's horse Bucephalus had a head like a bull's, that he would let no one but his master mount him, could be trained by no one but him, was honored after his death, and had a city built in his name.
	Cæsar en auoit aussi vn autre qui auoit les pieds de deuant comme vn homme, ayant l'ongle coupée en forme de doigts, lequel ne peut estre monté ny dressé que par Cæsar, qui dedia son image apres sa mort à la deesse Venus.	Caesar too had another, whose forefeet were like a man's, the hoof being split in the form of toes; he could be mounted and trained by no one but Caesar, who after its death dedicated its statue to the goddess Venus.
1.48.5	Ie ne demonte pas volontiers quand ie suis à cheual: car c'est l'assiette, en laquelle ie me trouue le mieux et sain et malade. Platon la recommande pour la santé: aussi dit Pline qu'elle est salutaire à l'estomach et aux iointures. Poursuiuons donc, puis que nous y sommes.	I do not willingly dismount once I am on horseback, for that is the position in which I feel best, both well and ill. Plato recommends it for health; and Pliny too says it is good for the stomach and the joints. Let us keep going, then, since we are at it.
1.48.6	On lit en Xenophon la loy deffendant de voyager à pied, à homme qui eust cheual. Trogus et Iustinus disent que les Parthes auoient accoustumé de faire à cheual, non seulement la guerre, mais aussi tous leurs affaires publiques et priuez, marchander, parlementer, s'entretenir, et se promener: et que la plus notable difference des libres, et des serfs parmy eux, c'est que les	We read in Xenophon of the law forbidding a man who had a horse to travel on foot. most notable difference between free men and slaves among them is that the one go on horseback, the others on foot: an institution that began with King Cyrus.[5]

1.48.7 Il y a plusieurs exemples en l'histoire Romaine, et Suetone le remarque plus particulierement de Cæsar, des Capitaines qui commandoient à leurs gens de cheual de mettre pied à terre, quand ils se trouuoient pressez de l'occasion, pour oster aux soldats toute esperance de fuite, et pour l'aduantage qu'ils esperoient en cette sorte de combat: quo, haud dubiè, superat Romanus, dit Tite Liue. Si est-il, que la premiere prouision, dequoy ils se seruoient à brider la rebellion des peuples de nouuelle conqueste, c'estoit leur oster armes et cheuaux. Pourtant voyons nous si souuent en Cæsar: arma proferri, iumenta produci, obsides dari iubet. Le grand Seigneur ne permet auiourd'huy ny à Chrestien, ny à Iuif, d'auoir cheual à soy, sous son empire.

There are many examples in Roman history—and Suetonius notes it particularly of Caesar—of commanders who ordered their horsemen to dismount when hard pressed, to take away from the soldiers all hope of flight, and for the advantage they hoped for in this kind of fighting, in which the Roman undoubtedly excels, says Livy. Yet the first measure they used to curb the rebellion of newly conquered peoples was to take away their arms and horses. That is why we so often see in Caesar: he orders the arms to be handed over, the beasts brought out, hostages given. The Sultan today allows neither Christian nor Jew to have a horse of his own within his empire.

1.48.8 Noz ancestres, et notamment du temps de la guerre des Anglois, és combats solennels et iournées assignées, se mettoient la plus part du temps tous à pied, pour ne se fier à autre chose qu'à leur force propre, et vigueur de leur courage, et de leurs membres, de chose si chere que l'honneur et la vie. Vous engagez, quoy qu'en die Chrysanthes en Xenophon, vostre valeur et vostre fortune, à celle de vostre cheual, ses playes et sa mort tirent la vostre en consequence, son effray ou sa fougue vous rendent ou temeraire ou lasche: s'il a faute de bouche ou d'esperon, c'est à vostre honneur à en respondre.

A cette cause ie ne trouue pas estrange, que ces combats là fussent plus fermes, et plus furieux que ceux qui se font à cheual, cædebant paritér, paritérque ruebant / Victores victique, neque his fuga nota, neque illis. Leurs battailles se voyent bien mieux contestées: ce ne sont à cette heure que routes: primus clamor atque impetus rem decernit.

Our ancestors, especially at the time of the wars with the English, in solemn combats and pitched battles, mostly all fought on foot, so as to trust nothing but their own strength and the vigor of their courage and their limbs with something as precious as honor and life. Whatever Chrysantas says in Xenophon, you pledge your valor and your fortune to your horse's. His wounds and his death bring yours in their train; his fright or his fire make you rash or cowardly; if he does not answer to the bit or the spur, it is your honor that must answer for it.

For this reason I do not find it strange that those battles were steadier and more furious than those fought on horseback: Victors and vanquished alike slew, alike fell, / And neither side knew flight. Their battles were far more stoutly contested; nowadays there is nothing but routs: the first shout and the first charge decide the matter.[6]

1.48.9 Et chose que nous appellons à la societé d'vn si grand hazard, doit estre en nostre puissance le plus qu'il se peut. Comme ie conseilleroy de choisir les armes les plus courtes, et celles dequoy nous nous pouuons le mieux respondre. 1.48.10 Mais quant à cett'arme-là, i'en parleray plus amplement, où ie feray comparaison des armes anciennes aux nostres: et sauf l'estonnement des oreilles, à quoy desormais chacun est appriuoisé, ie croy que c'est vn' arme de fort peu d'effect, et espere que nous en quitterons vn iour l'vsage. Celle dequoy les Italiens se seruoient de iet, et à feu, estoit plus effroyable.

Ils nommoient Phalarica, vne certaine espece de iaueline, armée par le bout, d'vn fer de trois pieds, affin qu'il peust percer d'outre en outre vn homme armé: et se lançoit tantost de la main, en la campagne, tantost à tout des engins pour deffendre les lieux assiegez: la hante reuestue d'estouppe empoixée et huilée, s'enflammoit de sa course: et s'attachant au corps, ou au bouclier, ostoit tout vsage d'armes et de membres. Toutesfois il me semble que pour venir au ioindre, elle portast aussi empeschement à l'assaillant, et que le champ ionché de ces tronçons bruslants, produisist en la meslée vne commune incommodité. Magnum stridens contorta Phalarica venit, / Fulminis acta modo.

1.48.11 Ils auoyent d'autres moyens, à quoy l'vsage les dressoit, et qui nous semblent incroyables par inexperience: par où ils suppleoyent au deffaut de nostre poudre et de noz boulets. Ils dardoyent leurs piles, de telle roideur, que souuent ils en enfiloyent deux boucliers et deux hommes armés, et les cousoyent. Les coups de leurs fondes n'estoient pas moins certains et loingtains: saxis globosis funda, mare apertum incessentes: coronas modici circuli, magno ex interuallo loci, assueti traijcere: non capita modó hostium vulnerabant, sed quem locum destinassent. Leurs pieces de batterie representoient, comme l'effect, aussi le tintamarre des nostres: ad ictus mœnium cum terribili sonitu editos, pauor et trepidatio cœpit.

Les Gaulois noz cousins en Asie, haïssoyent ces armes traistresses, et volantes: duits à combattre main à main auec plus de courage. Non tam patentibus plagis mouentur,

But as for that weapon, I shall speak of it more fully where I compare ancient weapons with ours. Apart from the shock to the ears, to which everyone is by now accustomed, I think it is a weapon of very little effect, and I hope we shall one day give up using it. The weapon the Italians used for throwing, with fire, was more terrifying.

They called Phalarica a certain kind of javelin, tipped with an iron head three feet long so that it could pierce an armed man right through. It was thrown sometimes by hand in the field, sometimes by engines in defense of besieged places. The shaft, wrapped in tow smeared with pitch and oil, caught fire in its flight, and sticking in the body or the shield it took away all use of weapons and limbs. Yet it seems to me that when it came to close quarters it must also have hindered the attacker, and that a field strewn with these burning stumps must have been a nuisance to both sides in the melee. Whirled, the phalarica comes with a great hiss, / Driven like a thunderbolt.[8]

They had other means, in which practice trained them, and which seem incredible to us for lack of experience; with these they made up for not having our powder and bullets. They hurled their javelins with such force that they often skewered two shields and two armed men with them and stitched them together. The shots of their slings were no less sure or far-reaching: practicing with round stones and slings over the open sea, and used to sending them through small rings from a great distance, they wounded not only the heads of their enemies but whatever spot they had aimed at. Their battering engines imitated not only the effect but also the din of ours: at the blows on the walls, delivered with a terrible noise, fear and panic seized them.[9]

The Gauls, our cousins in Asia, hated these treacherous flying weapons, being used to fighting hand to hand with more courage. They are not so troubled by gaping wounds; when a wound is broader than it is deep, they even think they are fighting more gloriously. But when the point of an arrow or a sling bullet, buried inside, burns them with a wound slight to look at, then, driven to rage and shame that so small a plague should kill them, they throw themselves on the ground. A picture very close to a harquebus wound. The Ten Thousand Greeks, in their long and famous retreat, came upon a nation that did them extraordinary damage with great strong bows and arrows so long that, picking them up by hand, one could throw them back like javelins; and they pierced right through a shield and an armed man.[10]

The engines that Dionysius invented at Syracuse, for shooting great heavy bolts and stones of horrible size with such long range and force, came very close to our inventions.

Nor must we forget the amusing seat that a certain Master Pierre Pol, doctor of theology, had on his mule: Monstrelet relates that he used to ride about the city of Paris sitting sideways like women. He also says elsewhere that the Gascons had terrible horses, trained to wheel at the gallop, at which the French, Picards, Flemish and Brabanters marveled greatly, not being used to seeing them: those are his words.[11]

Caesar, speaking of the Swedes: In cavalry encounters, he says, they often leap to the ground to fight on foot, having trained their horses not to stir from the spot meanwhile, and they run back to them quickly if need be; and according to their custom nothing is so base and cowardly as to use saddles and pads, and they despise those who use them, so that, though very few in number, they are not afraid to attack large numbers. What I once admired—seeing a horse trained to turn every way with a switch, the bridle dropped loose over its ears—was common among the Massilians, who used their horses without saddle or bridle.[12]

And the Massylian people, riding on the bare back,
Who know nothing of reins and turn their mounts' mouths with a light switch.

King Alfonso, the one who founded in Spain the order of the Knights of the Band, or of the Sash, gave them among other rules that they should not ride a mule of either sex, on pain of a fine of one mark of silver: as I have just learned from the letters of Guevara, of which those who called them Golden held a very different opinion from mine. The Courtier says that before his time it was a reproach to a gentleman to ride one. The Abyssinians, on the contrary: the closer they stand to Prester John, their prince, the more they make a point, for dignity and pomp, of riding great mules.[14]
	Xenophon recite que les Assyriens tenoient tousiours leurs cheuaux entrauez au logis, tant ils estoient fascheux et farouches: et qu'il falloit tant de temps à les destacher et harnacher, que, pour que cette longueur ne leur apportast dommage s'ils venoient à estre en desordre surprins par les ennemis, ils ne logeoient iamais en camp, qui ne fust fossoyé et remparé. Son Cyrus, si grand maistre au faict de cheualerie, mettoit les cheuaux de son escot: et ne leur faisoit bailler à manger, qu'ils ne l'eussent gaigné par la sueur de quelque exercice.	Xenophon relates that the Assyrians always kept their horses hobbled in their quarters, so vicious and wild were they; and that it took so long to untie and harness them that, so that this delay should not harm them if they were surprised by the enemy while in disorder, they never encamped in a camp that was not ditched and ramparted. His Cyrus, so great a master of horsemanship, kept his horses to the same rule as himself, and had them given nothing to eat until they had earned it by the sweat of some exercise.

To prove how much better Turkish armies are run and maintained than ours, people say that besides the fact that the soldiers drink only water and eat only rice and salt meat ground to powder, of which each man easily carries a month's supply on him, they also know how to live on the blood of their horses, like the Tartars and Muscovites, and they salt it.[15] horses to be either gods or animals nobler than their own nature. Some, after being conquered, coming to ask the men for peace and pardon and to bring them gold and food, did not fail to go and offer the same to the horses, with a speech just like the one made to the men, taking their neighing for the language of terms and truce.

In the East Indies, in former times, the chief and royal honor was to ride an elephant; the second, to go in a coach drawn by four horses; the third, to ride a camel; the last and lowest degree, to be carried or drawn by a single horse. Someone in our time writes that he saw in that region countries where people ride oxen with pack-saddles, stirrups and bridles, and that he was well pleased with how they carried him.

Quintus Fabius Maximus Rutilianus, fighting the Samnites, saw that in three or four charges his horsemen had failed to break the enemy's formation, and took this course: he had them unbridle their horses and spur them with all their might. Since nothing could stop them, they cut a way through the weapons and the men they overthrew for their foot soldiers, who completed a very bloody defeat. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus gave the same order against the Celtiberians: You will do it with greater force if you send your horses against the enemy unbridled; it is recorded that Roman cavalry have often done this to their glory. And taking off the bridles, they charged through twice, there and back, with great slaughter of the enemy, breaking all their lances.

The Duke of Muscovy formerly owed the Tartars this mark of reverence when they sent ambassadors to him: he went out to meet them on foot and presented them with a goblet of mare's milk, a drink they relish; and if, while they drank, a drop fell on their horses' manes, he was bound to lick it off with his tongue. In Russia, the army that the Emperor Bajazet had sent there was overwhelmed by so terrible a snowstorm that, to take shelter and save themselves from the cold, many of them thought of killing and disemboweling their horses and getting inside them, to enjoy that vital warmth.

Bajazet, after that fierce battle in which he was routed by Tamerlane, would have made good his

Alexander fought a nation, the Dahae: they went to war in pairs, armed, on horseback, but in the melee one would dismount, and they fought now on foot, now on horseback, one after the other.
1.48.21	Ie n'estime point, qu'en suffisance, et en grace à cheual, nulle nation nous emporte. Bon homme de cheual, à l'vsage de nostre parler, semble plus regarder au courage qu'à l'addresse. Le plus sçauant, le plus seur, le mieux aduenant à mener vn cheual à raison, que i'aye cognu, fut à mon gré Monsieur de Carneualet, qui en seruoit nostre Roy Henry second. I'ay veu homme donner carriere à deux pieds sur sa selle, demonter sa selle, et au retour la releuer, reaccommoder, et s'y rasseoir, fuyant tousiours à bride auallée: ayant passé par dessus vn bonnet, y tirer par derriere de bons coups de son arc: amasser ce qu'il vouloit, se iettant d'vn pied à terre, tenant l'autre en l'estrier; et autres pareilles singeries, dequoy il viuoit.	I do not think any nation surpasses us in ability and grace on horseback. "A good horseman," in our usage, seems to refer more to courage than to skill. The most knowing, the surest and the most graceful at schooling a horse that I have known was, to my taste, Monsieur de Carnavalet, who served our King Henry II in that capacity.[17] I have seen a man gallop standing with both feet on his saddle; take off his saddle and, on the way back, lift it up again, fit it back on and sit in it again, all the while racing with the reins loose; ride over a cap and then shoot good arrows back at it; pick up whatever he wanted, flinging himself to the ground with one foot while keeping the other in the stirrup; and other such monkey tricks, by which he made his living.
1.48.22	On a veu de mon temps à Constantinople, deux hommes sur vn cheual, lesquels en sa plus roide course, se reiettoyent à tours, à terre, et puis sur la selle, Et vn, qui seulement des dents, bridoit et harnachoit son cheual. Vn autre, qui entre deux cheuaux, vn pied sur vne selle, l'autre sur l'autre, portant vn second sur ses bras, piquoit	In my time two men were seen at Constantinople on one horse who, at its fastest gallop, would leap by turns to the ground and then back into the saddle. En mon enfance le Prince de Sulmone à Naples, maniant vn rude cheual, de toute sorte de maniemens, tenoit soubz ses genouz et soubs ses orteils des reales: comme si elles y eussent esté clouées: pour montrer la fermeté de son assiette.	When I was a child, the Prince of Sulmona, at Naples, putting a rough horse through every kind of maneuver, held reales under his knees and under his toes as if they had been nailed there, to show the firmness of his seat.[18]

I.49 Of Ancient Customs

Des coustumes anciennes

Changing fashions blind us to their absurdity; Montaigne surveys Roman customs in dress, bathing, eating, and daily life.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.49.1	I'EXCVSEROIS volontiers en nostre peuple de n'auoir autre patron et regle de perfection, que ses propres meurs et vsances: car c'est vn commun vice, non du vulgaire seulement, mais quasi de tous hommes, d'auoir leur visée et leur arrest, sur le train auquel ils sont nais. Ie suis content, quand il verra Fabritius ou Lælius, qu'il leur trouue la contenance et le port barbare, puis qu'ils ne sont ni vestus ny façonnez à nostre mode. Mais ie me plains de sa particuliere indiscretion, de se laisser si fort piper et aueugler à l'authorité de l'vsage present, qu'il soit capable de changer d'opinion et d'aduis tous les mois, s'il plaist à la coustume: et qu'il iuge si diuersement de soy-mesme.	I would willingly excuse our people for having no other pattern and rule of perfection than their own manners and usages; for it is a common vice, not only of the common people but of almost all men, to fix their aim and their limit on the ways they were born into. I am content that when they see Fabricius or Laelius they should find their looks and bearing barbarous, since they are neither dressed nor fashioned in our style. But I do complain of their particular lack of discernment in letting themselves be so thoroughly fooled and blinded by the authority of present usage that they are capable of changing opinion and judgment every month, if custom so pleases, and of judging so variously of themselves.[1]
	Quand il portoit le busc de son pourpoint entre les mammelles, il maintenoit par viues raisons qu'il estoit en son vray lieu: quelques années apres le voyla aualé iusques entre les cuisses, il se moque de son autre vsage, le trouue inepte et insupportable. La façon de se vestir presente, luy fait incontinent condamner l'ancienne, d'vne resolution si grande, et d'vn consentement si vniuersel, que vous diriez que c'est quelque espece de manie, qui luy tourneboule ainsi l'entendement.	When they wore the busk of their doublets between their breasts, they maintained with lively arguments that it was in its proper place; a few years later, there it is, slipped down between the thighs, and they mock their former practice and find it absurd and unbearable. The present way of dressing makes them at once condemn the old one, with such great conviction and such universal agreement that you would say it was some kind of mania that turns their understanding upside down like this.[2]
	Par ce que nostre changement est si subit et si prompt en cela, que l'inuention de tous les tailleurs du monde ne sçauroit fournir assez de nouuelletez, il est force que bien souuent les formes mesprisées reuiennent en credit, et celles là mesmes tombent en mespris tantost apres; et qu'vn mesme iugement prenne en l'espace de quinze ou vingt ans, deux ou trois, non diuerses seulement, mais contraires opinions, d'vne inconstance et legereté incroyable. Il n'y a si fin entre nous, qui ne se laisse	Because our changes in this are so sudden and so quick that the inventiveness of all the tailors in the world could not supply enough novelties, it necessarily follows that the despised fashions very often come back into favor, and those very ones fall into contempt shortly after; and that one and the same judgment adopts, in the space of fifteen or twenty years, two or three opinions that are not just different but contrary, with incredible inconstancy and fickleness. There is no one among us so embabouiner de cette contradiction, et esbloüyr tant les yeux internes, que les externes insensiblement.	shrewd that he does not let himself be bamboozled by this contradiction, and imperceptibly dazzled in his inner eyes as well as his outer ones.

1.49.2	Ie veux icy entasser aucunes façons anciennes, que i'ay en memoire: les vnes de mesme les nostres, les autres differentes: à fin qu'ayant en l'imagination cette continuelle variation des choses humaines, nous en ayons le iugement plus esclaircy et plus ferme.	I want to pile up here some ancient fashions that I remember—some the same as ours, others different—so that, by keeping this continual variation of human things in our imagination, we may have our judgment clearer and firmer.
1.49.3	Ce que nous disons de combatre à l'espée et la cape, il s'vsoit encores entre les Romains, ce dit Cæsar, sinistras sagis inuoluunt, gladiósque distringunt. Et remarque dés lors en nostre nation ce vice, qui y est encore d'arrester les passans que nous rencontrons en chemin, et de les forcer de nous dire qui ils sont, et de receuoir à iniure et occasion de querelle, s'ils refusent de nous respondre.	What we call fighting with sword and cloak was already practiced among the Romans, so Caesar says: they wrap their left arms in their cloaks and draw their swords. And he notes even then in our nation the vice that is still there, of stopping passers-by we meet on the road, forcing them to tell us who they are, and taking it as an insult and grounds for a quarrel if they refuse to answer us.
1.49.4	Aux bains que les anciens prenoyent tous les iours auant le repas; et les prenoyent aussi ordinairement que nous faisons de l'eau à lauer les mains, ils ne se lauoyent du commencement que les bras et les iambes, mais depuis, et d'vne coustume qui a duré plusieurs siecles et en la plus part des nations du monde, ils se lauoyent tous nudz, d'eau mixtionnée et perfumée: de maniere, qu'ils tenoient pour tesmoignage de grande simplicité de se lauer d'eau simple. Les plus affetez et delicatz se perfumoyent tout le corps bien trois ou quatre fois par iour.	At the baths the ancients took every day before their meal—and they took them as routinely as we take water to wash our hands—at first they washed only their arms and legs. But later, by a custom that lasted several centuries and in most of the nations of the world, they washed all naked in water mixed with perfumes, so that they regarded washing in plain water as a mark of great simplicity. The most refined and dainty perfumed their whole body a good three or four times a day.
	Ils se faisoyent souuent pinceter tout le poil, comme les femmes Françoises ont pris en vsage depuis quelque temps, de faire leur front, Quod pectus, quod crura tibi, quod brachia vellis, quoy qu'ils eussent des oignemens propres à cela. Psilothro nitet, aut acida latet abdita creta. Ils aymoient à se coucher mollement, et alleguent pour preuue de patience, de coucher sur le matelats. Ils mangeoyent couchez sur des lits, à peu pres en mesme assiette que les Turcs de nostre temps. Inde toro pater Æneas sic orsus ab alto. Et dit on du ieune Caton que depuis la bataille de Pharsale, estant entré en dueil du mauuais estat des affaires publiques, il mangea tousiours assis, prenant vn train de vie austere.	They often had all their hair plucked out, as French women have lately taken to doing to their foreheads—That you pluck your chest, your legs, your arms—although they had ointments suited to the purpose: She gleams with depilatory paste, or hides away under sour chalk. They liked to lie softly, and cite sleeping on a mattress as a proof of endurance. They ate lying on couches, in much the same position as the Turks of our time: Then from his high couch father Aeneas thus began. And it is said of the younger Cato that after the battle of Pharsalus, having gone into mourning over the bad state of public affairs, he always ate sitting, adopting an austere way of life.[3]
1.49.5	Ils baisoyent les mains aux grands pour les honnorer et caresser. Et entre les amis, ils s'entrebaisoyent en se saluant, comme font les Venitiens. Gratatúsque darem cum dulcibus oscula verbis. Et touchoyent aux genoux, pour	They kissed the hands of the great to honor them and show them affection. And among friends they kissed each other in greeting, as the Venetians do: And with my congratulations I would give you kisses

	requerir et saluer vn grand. Pasiclez le Philosophe, frere de Crates, au lieu de porter la main au genouil, la porta aux genitoires. Celuy à qui il s'addressoit, l'ayant rudement repoussé, Comment, dit-il, cette partie n'est elle pas vostre, aussi bien que l'autre? Ils mangeoyent comme nous, le fruict à l'yssue de la table.	and sweet words. And they touched the knees to petition or greet a great man. Pasicles the philosopher, brother of Crates, instead of putting his hand to the knee, put it to the genitals. When the man he was addressing roughly pushed him away, "What," he said, "is this part not yours as well as the other?" They ate fruit at the end of the meal, as we do.[4]
1.49.6	Ils se torchoyent le cul (il faut laisser aux femmes cette vaine superstition des parolles) auec vne esponge: voyla pourquoy spongia est vn mot obscœne en Latin: et estoit cette esponge attachée au bout d'vn baston: comme tesmoigne l'histoire de celuy qu'on menoit pour estre presenté aux bestes, deuant le peuple, qui demanda congé d'aller à ses affaires, et n'ayant autre moyen de se tuer, il se fourra ce baston et esponge dans le gosier, et s'en estouffa.	They wiped their backsides (we must leave to women this empty superstition about words) with a sponge: that is why spongia is an obscene word in Latin. This sponge was fastened to the end of a stick, as is shown by the story of the man who was being led out to be thrown to the beasts before the people. He asked leave to go and relieve himself, and having no other means of killing himself, he thrust this stick and sponge down his throat and choked himself with it.[5]
	Ils s'essuyoient le catze de laine perfumée, quand ils en auoyent faict, At tibi nil faciam, sed lota mentula lana. Il y auoit aux carrefours à Rome, des vaisseaux et demy-cuues, pour y apprester à pisser aux passans: Pusi sæpe lacum propter se ac dolia curta, / Somno deuincti, credunt extollere vestem.	They wiped their member with perfumed wool when they had done with it: I'll do nothing to you; wool will wash my member. At the crossroads in Rome there were vessels and half-tubs set out for passers-by to piss in: Little boys, bound fast in sleep, often believe they are lifting their clothes / Beside the basin and the cut-down jars.[6]
1.49.7	Ils faisoyent collation entre les repas. Et y auoit en esté, des vendeurs de nege pour refréchir le vin: et en y auoit qui se seruoyent de nege en hyuer, ne trouuans pas le vin encore lors assez froid. Les grands auoyent leurs eschançons et trenchans; et leurs fols, pour leur donner du plaisir. On leur seruoit en hyuer la viande sur les fouyers qui se portoyent sur la table: et auoyent des cuysines portatiues, comme i'en ay veu, dans lesquelles tout leur seruice se trainoit apres eux. Has vobis epulas habete lauti, / Nos offendimur ambulante cœna.	They had snacks between meals. In summer there were sellers of snow for chilling wine; and some people used snow in winter, not finding the wine cold enough even then. The great had their cupbearers and carvers, and their fools to amuse them. In winter their food was served to them on braziers carried to the table; and they had portable kitchens, such as I have seen, in which their whole service was trundled along behind them. Keep these feasts for yourselves, you fine folk; / We are put off by a dinner that walks about.
1.49.8	Et en esté ils faisoyent souuent en leurs sales basses, couler de l'eau fresche et claire, dans des canaux au dessous d'eux, où il y auoit force poisson en vie, que les assistans choisissoyent et prenoyent en la main, pour le faire aprester, chacun à sa poste. Le poisson a tousiours eu ce priuilege, comme il a encores, que les grans se meslent de le sçauoir apprester: aussi en est le goust beaucoup plus exquis, que de la chair, aumoins pour moy.	And in summer they often had cool, clear water run through channels beneath them in their ground-floor rooms, with plenty of live fish in it, which those present would choose and catch by hand, to have it cooked each to his own taste. Fish has always had this privilege, as it still has, that the great like to try their hand at cooking it; and indeed its taste is much more exquisite than that of meat, at least to me.

1.49.9 Mais en toute sorte de magnificence, desbauche, et d'inuentions voluptueuses, de mollesse et de sumptuosité, nous faisons à la verité ce que nous pouuons pour les égaler: car nostre volonté est bien aussi gastée que la leur, mais nostre suffisance n'y peut arriuer: nos forces ne sont non plus capables de les ioindre, en ces parties là vitieuses, qu'aux vertueuses: car les vnes et les autres partent d'vne vigueur d'esprit, qui estoit sans comparaison plus grande en eux qu'en nous. Et les ames à mesure qu'elles sont moins fortes, elles ont d'autant moins de moyen de faire ny fort bien, ny fort mal.

But in every sort of magnificence, debauchery and voluptuous invention, of softness and sumptuousness, we truly do what we can to equal them: for our will is quite as corrupt as theirs, but our ability cannot reach so far. Our powers are no more able to match them in these vicious qualities than in the virtuous ones, for both spring from a vigor of mind that was incomparably greater in them than in us. And the less strong souls are, the less means they have of doing either very well or very badly.

1.49.10 Le haut bout d'entre eux, c'estoit le milieu. Le deuant et derriere n'auoient en escriuant et parlant aucune signification de grandeur, comme il se voit euidemment par leurs escris: ils diront Oppius et Cæsar, aussi volontiers que Cæsar et Oppius: et diront moy et toy indifferemment, comme toy et moy. Voyla pourquoy i'ay autrefois remarqué en la vie de Flaminius de Plutarque François, vn endroit, où il semble que l'autheur parlant de la ialousie de gloire, qui estoit entre les Ætoliens et les Romains, pour le gain d'vne bataille qu'ils auoyent obtenu en commun, face quelque poix de ce qu'aux chansons Grecques, on nommoit les Ætoliens auant les Romains, s'il n'y a de l'amphibologie aux mots François.

Among them the place of honor was the middle. Front and back had no significance of rank in writing or speaking, as can plainly be seen in their writings: they will say "Oppius and Caesar" as readily as "Caesar and Oppius," and will say "me and you" as indifferently as "you and me." That is why I once noticed a passage in the life of Flamininus in the French Plutarch where the author, speaking of the jealousy over glory between the Aetolians and the Romans after a battle they had won together, seems to attach some weight to the fact that in Greek songs the Aetolians were named before the Romans—unless there is some ambiguity in the French words.[7]

1.49.11 Les Dames estans aux estuues, y receuoyent quant et quant des hommes, et se seruoyent là mesme de leurs valets à les frotter et oindre. Inguina succinctus nigra tibi seruus aluta / Stat, quoties calidis nuda fouêris aquis. Elles se saupoudroyent de quelque poudre, pour reprimer les sueurs.

Ladies at the bathhouses received men there along with them, and there they used their manservants to rub and anoint them. A slave, his groin girded with a black leather apron, / Stands by you whenever you lie naked in the warm water. They dusted themselves with some powder to check sweating.

1.49.12 Les anciens Gaulois, dit Sidonius Apollinaris, portoyent le poil long par le deuant, et le derriere de la teste tondu, qui est cette façon qui vient à estre renouuellée par l'vsage effeminé et lasche de ce siecle.

The ancient Gauls, says Sidonius Apollinaris, wore their hair long in front and the back of the head shaved, which is the very fashion now being revived by the soft and spineless usage of this age.[8]

1.49.13 Les Romains payoient ce qui estoit deu aux bateliers, pour leur naulage dez l'entrée du bateau, ce que nous faisons apres estre rendus à port. Dum as exigitur, dum mula ligatur, / Tota abit hora.

The Romans paid the boatmen what was owed for their fare upon entering the boat, which we do after reaching port. While the fare is collected and the mule harnessed, / A whole hour goes by.[9]

I.50 Of Democritus and Heraclitus

De Democritus et Heraclitus
Montaigne tests his judgment on all subjects, and prefers Democritus's laughter at human folly to Heraclitus's tears.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.50.1	LE iugement est vn vtil à tous subiects, et se mesle par tout. A cette cause aux Essais que i'en fay icy, i'y employe toute sorte d'occasion. Si c'est vn subiect que ie n'entende point, à cela mesme ie l'essaye, sondant le gué de bien loing, et puis le trouuant trop profond pour ma taille, ie me tiens à la riue. Et cette reconnoissance de ne pouuoir passer outre, c'est vn traict de son effect, ouy de ceux, dont il se vante le plus. Tantost à vn subiect vain et de neant, i'essaye voir s'il trouuera dequoy luy donner corps, et dequoy l'appuyer et l'estançonner.	Judgment is a tool for every subject, and it has a hand in everything. That is why, in these essays, the trials I make of it here, I use every kind of occasion. If it is a subject I do not understand at all, I try my judgment out on that very thing, sounding the ford from a good way off; then, finding it too deep for my height, I keep to the bank. And this recognition that I cannot go any further is one of the things it achieves, and indeed one of those it is proudest of. Sometimes, on a vain and trifling subject, I test it to see whether it will find something to give the subject body, something to prop it up and shore it up.
	Tantost ie le promene à vn subiect noble et tracassé, auquel il n'a rien à trouuer de soy, le chemin en estant si frayé, qu'il ne peut marcher que sur la piste d'autruy. Là il fait son ieu à eslire la route qui luy semble la meilleure: et de mille sentiers, il dit que cettuy-cy, ou celuy là, a esté le mieux choisi. Ie prends de la fortune le premier argument: ils me sont egalement bons: et ne desseigne iamais de les traicter entiers. Car ie ne voy le tout de rien. Ne font pas, ceux qui nous promettent de nous le faire veoir.	Sometimes I take it for a walk to a noble, well-worn subject, where it can find nothing of its own, since the road is so beaten that it can only walk in other people's tracks. There it plays its game by choosing the route that seems best to it, and out of a thousand paths it says that this one or that one was the best chosen. I take the first subject that Fortune offers me: they are all equally good to me. And I never plan to treat them whole. For I do not see the whole of anything. Nor do those who promise to show it to us.
	De cent membres et visages, qu'à chasque chose i'en prens vn, tantost à lecher seulement, tantost à effleurer: et par fois à pincer iusqu'à l'os. I'y donne vne poincte, non pas le plus largement, mais le plus profondement que ie sçay. Et aime plus souuent à les saisir par quelque lustre inusité. Ie me hazarderoy de traitter à fons quelque matiere, si ie me connoissoy moins, et me trompois en mon impuissance. Semant icy vn mot, icy vn autre, eschantillons dépris de leur piece, escartez, sans dessein, sans promesse: ie ne suis pas tenu d'en faire bon, ny de m'y tenir moy-mesme, sans varier, quand il me plaist, et me rendre au doubte et incertitude, et à ma maistresse forme, qui est l'ignorance.	Of the hundred limbs and faces that each thing has, I take one: sometimes only to lick it, sometimes to brush its surface, and sometimes to pinch it to the bone. I make a thrust at it, not as widely but as deeply as I know how. And more often I like to catch things from some unaccustomed angle. I would venture to treat some matter thoroughly if I knew myself less well and were deceived about my own incapacity. I scatter a word here, another there, samples cut from their piece, set apart, without design and without promise. I am not bound to make good on them, nor to stick to them myself without changing when I please, and giving myself up to doubt and uncertainty, and to my ruling form, which is ignorance.

1.50.2 Tout mouuement nous descouure. Cette mesme ame de Cæsar, qui se fait voir à ordonner et dresser la bataille de Pharsale, elle se fait aussi voir à dresser des parties oysiues et amoureuses. On iuge vn cheual, non seulement à le voir manier sur vne carriere, mais encore à luy voir aller le pas, voire et à le voir en repos à l'estable.

Every movement reveals us. That same soul of Caesar that shows itself in ordering and drawing up the battle of Pharsalus shows itself also in arranging idle and amorous affairs. We judge a horse not only by watching it put through its paces on a course, but also by seeing it walk, and even by seeing it at rest in the stable.

1.50.3 Entre les functions de l'ame, il en est de basses. Qui ne la void encor par là, n'acheue pas de la connoistre. Et à l'aduenture la remarque lon mieux où elle va son pas simple. Les vents des passions la prennent plus en ses hautes assiettes, ioint qu'elle se couche entiere sur chasque matiere et s'y exerce entiere; et n'en traitte iamais plus d'vne à la fois: et la traitte non selon elle, mais selon soy. Les choses à part elles, ont peut estre leurs poids et mesures, et conditions: mais au dedans, en nous, elle les leur taille comme elle l'entend. La mort est effroyable à Cicero, desirable à Caton, indifferente à Socrates.

Among the functions of the soul there are some low ones. Whoever does not see it on that side too does not fully know it. And perhaps we observe it best where it goes at its simple pace. The winds of passion catch it more in its lofty postures. Besides, it throws itself wholly into each matter and exercises itself wholly there, and never treats more than one at a time; and it treats that matter not according to the matter but according to itself. Things in themselves may have their own weights and measures and conditions; but inwardly, in us, the soul cuts them to its own pattern as it sees fit. Death is frightful to Cicero, desirable to Cato, indifferent to Socrates.

La santé, la conscience, l'authorité, la science, la richesse, la beauté, et leurs contraires, se despouillent à l'entrée, et reçoiuent de l'ame nouuelle vesture, et de la teinture qu'il luy plaist: brune, claire, verte, obscure: aigre, douce, profonde, superficielle: et qu'il plaist à chacune d'elles. Car elles n'ont pas verifié en commun leurs stiles, regles et formes: chacune est Royne en son estat. Parquoy ne prenons plus excuse des externes qualitez des choses: c'est à nous, à nous en rendre compte. Nostre bien et nostre mal ne tient qu'à nous. Offrons y nos offrandes et nos vœus, non pas à la fortune: elle ne peut rien sur nos mœurs: au rebours, elles l'entrainent à leur suitte, et la moulent à leur forme.

Health, conscience, authority, knowledge, wealth, beauty and their opposites are stripped at the entrance and receive new clothing from the soul, and whatever coloring it pleases: brown, light, green, dark; sharp, sweet, deep, superficial—whatever pleases each individual soul. For souls have not agreed among themselves on their styles, rules and forms: each is queen in her own realm. So let us no longer make excuses from the external qualities of things: it is up to us to account for them. Our good and our ill depend on ourselves alone. Let us make our offerings and our vows there, not to Fortune: she has no power over our ways; on the contrary, our ways drag her along in their train and mold her to their form.

Pourquoy ne iugeray-ie d'Alexandre à table deuisant et beuuant d'autant? Ou s'il manioit des eschecs, quelle corde de son esprit, ne touche et n'employe ce niais et puerile ieu? Ie le hay et fuy, de ce qu'il n'est pas assez ieu, et qu'il nous esbat trop serieusement; ayant honte d'y fournir l'attention qui suffiroit à quelque bonne chose. Il ne fut pas plus embesoigné à dresser son glorieux passage aux Indes: ny cet autre à desnouër vn passage, duquel depend le salut du genre humain. Voyez combien nostre ame trouble cet amusement ridicule, si touts ses

Ie ne me voy et retaste, plus vniuersellement, en nulle autre posture. Quelle passion ne nous y exerce? la cholere, le despit, la hayne, l'impatience: et vne vehemente ambition de vaincre, en chose, en laquelle il seroit plus excusable d'estre ambitieux d'estre vaincu. Car la precellence rare et au dessus du commun, messied à vn homme d'honneur, en chose friuole. Ce que ie dy en cet exemple, se peut dire en touts autres. Chasque parcelle, chasque occupation de l'homme, l'accuse, et le montre egalement qu'vn autre.

I'ayme mieux la premiere humeur, non par ce qu'il est plus plaisant de rire que de pleurer: mais par ce qu'elle est plus desdaigneuse, et qu'elle nous condamne plus que l'autre: et il me semble, que nous ne pouuons iamais estre assez mesprisez selon nostre merite.

La plainte et la commiseration sont meslées à quelque estimation de la chose qu'on plaint: les choses dequoy on se moque, on les estime sans prix. Ie ne pense point qu'il y ait tant de malheur en nous, comme il y a de vanité, ny tant de malice comme de sotise: nous ne sommes pas si pleins de mal, comme d'inanité: nous ne sommes pas si miserables, comme nous sommes vils. Ainsi Diogenes, qui baguenaudoit apart soy, roulant son tonneau, et hochant du nez le grand Alexandre, nous estimant des mouches, ou des vessies pleines de vent, estoit bien iuge plus aigre et plus poingnant, et par consequent, plus iuste à mon humeur que Timon, celuy qui fut surnommé le haisseur des hommes.

vation of the human race depends. See how much our soul complicates this ridiculous pastime, and whether every one of its sinews is not strained! How amply it allows everyone, in this, to know himself and to judge himself rightly.[1]

In no other posture do I see and probe myself more thoroughly. What passion does it not exercise in us? Anger, spite, hatred, impatience, and a vehement ambition to win, in a thing in which it would be more excusable to be ambitious of losing. For rare excellence, above the common level, ill becomes a man of honor in a frivolous thing. What I say in this example can be said in all others. Every particle, every occupation of a man betrays him and shows him as well as any other.

Democritus and Heraclitus were two philosophers. The first, finding the human condition vain and ridiculous, never went out in public without a mocking, laughing face. Heraclitus, feeling pity and compassion for this same condition of ours, wore a continually sad face, and his eyes were laden with tears. One of them laughed each time he moved a foot from his doorstep and set it forward; the other, in contrast, wept. I prefer the first temperament, not because it is pleasanter to laugh than to weep, but because it is more disdainful and condemns us more than the other; and it seems to me that we can never be despised as much as we deserve.[2]

Lamenting and pity are mixed with some esteem for the thing we lament; the things we mock we consider worthless. I do not think there is as much unhappiness in us as there is vanity, nor as much malice as foolishness. We are not so full of evil as of emptiness; we are not so wretched as we are base. Thus Diogenes, who pottered about by himself, rolling his tub and turning up his nose at the great Alexander, and who took us for flies or bladders full of wind, was a sharper and more stinging judge, and therefore, to my mind, a juster one, than Timon, the man who was nicknamed the hater of men.[3]

For what we hate, we take to heart. The latter wished us ill, was passionately eager for our ruin, and shunned our company as dangerous, as the meschans, et de nature deprauée: l'autre nous estimoit si peu, que nous ne pourrions ny le troubler, ny l'alterer par nostre contagion, nous laissoit de compagnie, non pour la crainte, mais pour le desdain de nostre commerce: il ne nous estimoit capables ny de bien ny de mal faire.

1.50.5 De mesme marque fut la response de Statilius, auquel Brutus parla pour le ioindre à la conspiration contre Cæsar: il trouua l'entreprinse iuste, mais il ne trouua pas les hommes dignes, pour lesquels on se mist aucunement en peine: conformément à la discipline de Hegesias, qui disoit, le sage ne deuoir rien faire que pour soy: d'autant que, seul il est digne, pour qui on face. Et à celle de Theodorus, que c'est iniustice, que le sage se hazarde pour le bien de son païs, et qu'il mette en peril la sagesse pour des fols. Nostre propre condition est autant ridicule, que risible.

company of wicked men with depraved natures. The other thought so little of us that we could neither disturb him nor change him by our contagion; he kept away from our company not out of fear but out of disdain for dealing with us. He did not think us capable of doing either good or evil.

Of the same stamp was the answer of Statilius, whom Brutus approached to bring him into the conspiracy against Caesar: he found the undertaking just, but he did not find men worthy of anyone taking any trouble for them. This is in keeping with the teaching of Hegesias, who said that the wise man should do nothing except for himself, since he alone is worthy to have anything done for him; and with that of Theodorus, that it is unjust for the wise man to risk himself for the good of his country and put wisdom in peril for the sake of fools. Our own condition is as ridiculous as it is laughable.[4] 4 Hegesias and Theodorus were Greek philosophers of the Cyrenaic school; Statilius's answer is reported by Plutarch in his Life of Brutus.

I.51 Of the Vanity of Words

De la vanité des paroles

Rhetoric deceives judgment and flourishes in disordered states; Montaigne also mocks inflated words, from cooks to titles.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.51.1	VN rhetoricien du temps passé, disoit que son mestier estoit, de choses petites les faire paroistre et trouuer grandes. C'est vn cordonnier qui sçait faire de grands souliers à vn petit pied. On luy eust faict donner le fouët en Sparte, de faire profession d'vn' art piperesse et mensongere: et croy qu'Archidamus qui en estoit Roy, n'ouit pas sans estonnement la response de Thucydidez, auquel il s'enqueroit, qui estoit plus fort à la luicte, ou Pericles ou luy: Cela, fit-il, seroit mal-aysé à verifier: car quand ie l'ay porté par terre en luictant, il persuade à ceux qui l'ont veu, qu'il n'est pas tombé, et le gaigne.	A rhetorician of times past said that his trade was to make small things look great and be taken for great. He is a shoemaker who knows how to make big shoes for a small foot. In Sparta they would have had him whipped for professing a deceitful and lying art. And I believe that Archidamus, who was king there, was not a little astonished to hear the reply of Thucydides, whom he had asked which was the better wrestler, Pericles or he. "That," he said, "would be hard to prove: for when I have thrown him in wrestling, he persuades those who saw it that he did not fall, and wins."[1]
	Ceux qui masquent et fardent les femmes, font moins de mal: car c'est chose de peu de perte de ne les voir pas en leur naturel: là où ceux-cy font estat de tromper, non pas nos yeux, mais nostre iugement, et d'abastardir et corrompre l'essence des choses.	Those who mask and paint women do less harm: for it is no great loss not to see them in their natural state. These men, on the other hand, make it their business to deceive not our eyes but our judgment, and to debase and corrupt the essence of things.
1.51.2	Les republiques qui se sont maintenuës en vn estat reglé et bien policé, comme la Cretense ou Lacedemonienne, elles n'ont pas faict grand compte d'orateurs. Ariston definit sagement la rhetorique, science à persuader le peuple: Socrates, Platon, art de tromper et de flatter. Et ceux qui le nient en la generale description le verifient par tout, en leurs preceptes. Les Mahometans en defendent l'instruction à leurs enfants, pour son inutilité. Et les Atheniens, s'aperceuants combien son vsage, qui auoit tout credit en leur ville, estoit pernicieux, ordonnerent, que sa principale partie, qui est, esmouuoir les affections, fust ostée, ensemble les exordes et perorations.	The republics that have kept themselves in an orderly and well-governed state, like the Cretan or the Spartan, did not think much of orators. Ariston wisely defined rhetoric as the science of persuading the people; Socrates and Plato, as an art of deceiving and flattering. And those who deny this in their general description confirm it everywhere in their precepts. The Muslims forbid teaching it to their children because it is useless. And the Athenians, perceiving how pernicious was its use, which carried all the weight in their city, ordered that its principal part, which is stirring the emotions, be removed, together with opening addresses and perorations.
	C'est vn vtil inuenté pour manier et agiter vne tourbe, et vne commune desreglée: et est vtil qui ne s'employe qu'aux Estats malades, comme la medecine. En ceux où le vulgaire, où les ignorans, où tous ont tout peu, comme	It is a tool invented to manage and stir up a mob and an unruly populace; and it is a tool that is used only in sick states, like medicine. celuy d'Athenes, de Rhodes, et de Rome, et où les choses ont esté en perpetuelle tempeste, là ont afflué les orateurs.

Et à la verité, il se void peu de personnages en ces republiques là, qui se soient poussez en grand credit sans le secours de l'eloquence: Pompeius, Cæsar, Crassus, Lucullus, Lentulus, Metellus, ont pris de là, leur grand appuy à se monter à cette grandeur d'authorité, où ils sont en fin arriuez: et s'en sont aydez plus que des armes, contre l'opinion des meilleurs temps. Car L. Volumnius parlant en public en faueur de l'election au Consulat, faitte des personnes de Q. Fabius et P. Decius: Ce sont gents nays à la guerre, grands aux effects: au combat du babil, rudes: esprits vrayement consulaires. Les subtils, eloquents et sçauants, sont bons pour la ville, Preteurs à faire iustice, dit-il.

L'eloquence a fleury le plus à Rome lors que les affaires ont esté en plus mauuais estat, et que l'orage des guerres ciuiles les agitoit; comme vn champ libre et indompté porte les herbes plus gaillardes.

Il semble par là que les polices, qui dépendent d'vn Monarque, en ont moins de besoin que les autres: car la bestise et facilité, qui se trouue en la commune, et qui la rend subiecte à estre maniée et contournée par les oreilles, au doux son de cette harmonie, sans venir à poiser et connoistre la verité des choses par la force de raison; cette facilité, dis-ie, ne se trouue pas si aisément en vn seul, et est plus aisé de le garentir par bonne institution et bon conseil, de l'impression de cette poison. On n'a pas veu sortir de Macedoine ny de Perse, aucun orateur de renom.

1.51.3 I'en ay dit ce mot, sur le subiect d'vn Italien, que ie vien d'entretenir, qui a seruy le feu Cardinal Caraffe de maistre d'hostel iusques à sa mort. Ie luy faisoy compter de sa charge. Il m'a fait vn discours de cette science de gueule, auec vne grauité et contenance magistrale, comme s'il m'eust parlé de quelque grand poinct de theologie.

Il m'a dechifré vne difference d'appetits: celuy qu'on a à ieun, qu'on a apres le second et tiers seruice: les moyens tantost de luy plaire simplement, tantost de l'eueiller et picquer: la police de ses sauces; premierement en everyone has been able to do everything, as in Athens, Rhodes and Rome, and where affairs have been in perpetual storm, there orators have flocked.

And in truth, you see few men in those republics who pushed their way to great influence without the help of eloquence. Pompey, Caesar, Crassus, Lucullus, Lentulus, Metellus drew from it their main support in climbing to the height of authority that they finally reached; and they relied on it more than on arms, contrary to the opinion of better times. For Lucius Volumnius, speaking in public in favor of the election of Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius to the consulship, said: "These are men born for war, great in deeds; in the combat of chatter, unpolished: truly consular minds. The subtle, the eloquent and the learned are good for the city, as praetors to administer justice."[2]

Eloquence flourished most in Rome when affairs were in the worst state and the storm of civil wars was tossing them about; just as a free and untamed field bears the lustiest growth.

It seems from this that governments that depend on a monarch need it less than others. For the stupidity and pliancy found in the common people, which make them liable to be managed and led by the ears by the sweet sound of this harmony, without coming to weigh and know the truth of things by the force of reason—this pliancy, I say, is not so easily found in a single person; and it is easier to protect him from the impression of this poison by good upbringing and good counsel. No orator of renown was ever seen to come out of Macedonia or Persia.

I have said this much on the subject of an Italian I have just been talking with, who served the late Cardinal Caraffa as steward until his death. I had him tell me about his duties. He gave me a discourse on this science of the gullet with a gravity and a magisterial air, as if he had been speaking to me of some great point of theology.[3]

He spelled out for me a difference in appetites: the one you have when fasting, and the one you have after the second and third courses; the means now simply of pleasing it, now of waking it up and pricking it; the government of his sauces, first in general, and then going into the qualities of the ingredients and their effects; the differences between salads according to their season, which one must be warmed, which one wants to be served cold, the way to garnish and embellish them to make them pleasing to the eye as well. After that he went on to the order of service, full of fine and important considerations.

And it surely makes no small difference with what gesture you carve a hare, and with what a hen. And all this puffed up with rich and magnificent words, the very ones used in discussing the government of an empire. I was reminded of my man: This is too salty, this is burnt, this is not washed enough; that one is right, remember to do it that way again. I give them careful

Finally, Demea, I bid them look into the dishes as into a mirror, and I advise them what needs to be done. Even so, the Greeks themselves greatly praised the order and arrangement that Paulus Aemilius observed at the feast he gave them on his return from Macedonia; but I am not speaking here of deeds, I am speaking of words.[4]

I do not know whether others are affected the way I am; but when I hear our architects puffing themselves up with those big words—pilasters, architraves, cornices of Corinthian and Doric work, and the like from their jargon—I cannot stop my imagination from immediately seizing on the palace of Apolidon; and in fact I find that they are the paltry parts of my kitchen door.[5]

When you hear people say metonymy, metaphor, allegory and other such grammatical names, does it not seem that they mean some rare and exotic form of language? They are labels that apply to your chambermaid's chatter.

A cheat close to this one is calling the offices of our state by the proud titles of the Romans, even though they bear no resemblance in function, and still less in authority and power. And this one too, which will one day, I think, be held against our age: bestowing unworthily, on anyone we please, the most glorious surnames with which antiquity honored one or two figures in the course of several centuries.

Plato carried off the surname "divine" by a universal consent that no one has tried to begrudge him. And the Italians, who boast, and with reason, of having generally livelier minds and sounder reasoning than the other nations of their time, have just bestowed it on Aretino. Yet in him, apart from a way of speaking that is inflated and bubbling over with conceits—ingenious, to be sure, but far-fetched and fanciful—and apart from his eloquence, after all, such as it may be, I do not see that there is anything above the common authors of his century; so far is he from approaching that ancient divinity. And the surname "the Great" we attach to princes who have nothing above the greatness of ordinary people.[6]

I.52 Of the Frugality of the Ancients

De la parsimonie des anciens
Romans like Regulus, Cato, and Scipio lived on little, even at the height of power and glory.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.52.1	ATTILIVS Regulus, general de l'armée Romaine en Afrique, au milieu de sa gloire et de ses victoires contre les Carthaginois, escriuit à la chose publique, qu'vn valet de labourage, qu'il auoit laissé seul au gouuernement de son bien, qui estoit en tout sept arpents de terre, s'en estoit enfuy, ayant desrobé ses vtils de labourage, et demandoit congé pour s'en retourner et y pouruoir, de peur que sa femme, et ses enfans n'en eussent à souffrir. Le Senat pourueut à commettre vn autre à la conduite de ses biens, et luy fit restablir ce qui luy auoit esté desrobé, et ordonna que sa femme et enfans seroient nourris aux despens du public.	Atilius Regulus, general of the Roman army in Africa, in the midst of his glory and his victories against the Carthaginians, wrote to the state that a farmhand whom he had left alone in charge of his property, which amounted in all to seven acres of land, had run off with his farming tools; and he asked for leave to go home and see to it, for fear that his wife and children might suffer. The Senate saw to it by appointing someone else to manage his property, had what had been stolen from him restored, and ordered that his wife and children be fed at public expense.[1]
1.52.2	Le vieux Caton reuenant d'Espaigne Consul, vendit son cheual de seruice pour espargner l'argent qu'il eust cousté à le ramener par mer en Italie: et estant au gouuernement de Sardaigne, faisoit ses visitations à pied, n'ayant auec luy autre suite qu'vn officier de la chose publique, qui luy portoit sa robbe, et vn vase à faire des sacrifices: et le plus souuent il portoit sa male luy mesme. Il se vantoit de n'auoir iamais eu robbe qui eust cousté plus de dix escus; ny auoir enuoyé au marché plus de dix sols pour vn iour: et de ses maisons aux champs, qu'il n'en auoit aucune qui fust crepie et enduite par dehors.	The elder Cato, returning from Spain as consul, sold his warhorse to save the money it would have cost to bring it back by sea to Italy. And while he was governor of Sardinia he made his tours of inspection on foot, with no other retinue than one public officer who carried his gown and a vessel for making sacrifices; and most often he carried his bag himself. He boasted that he had never had a gown that cost more than ten crowns, nor sent more than ten sous to the market for one day; and that of his country houses, none was plastered and rendered on the outside.
1.52.3	Scipion Æmylianus apres deux triomphes et deux Consulats, alla en legation auec sept seruiteurs seulement. On tient qu'Homere n'en eut iamais qu'vn, Platon trois; Zenon le chef de la secte Stoique, pas vn. Il ne fut taxé que cinq sols et demy pour iour, à Tyberius Gracchus, allant en commission pour la chose publique, estant lors le premier homme des Romains.	Scipio Aemilianus, after two triumphs and two consulships, went on an embassy with only seven servants. It is said that Homer never had more than one, Plato three, and Zeno, the head of the Stoic sect, not one. Tiberius Gracchus was allowed only five and a half sous a day when he went on a commission for the state, though he was then the foremost man among the Romans.

I.53 Of a Saying of Caesar

D'vn mot de Cæsar

Taking up a saying of Caesar, Montaigne finds we never rest content with present things and always crave the absent.

N'est-ce pas vn singulier tesmoignage d'imperfection, ne pouuoir r'assoir nostre contentement en aucune chose, et que par desir mesme et imagination il soit hors de nostre puissance de choisir ce qu'il nous faut? Dequoy porte bon tesmoignage cette grande dispute, qui a tousiours esté entre les Philosophes, pour trouuer le souuerain bien de l'homme, et qui dure encores et durera eternellement, sans resolution et sans accord.

Dum abest quod auemus, id exsuperare videtur

1.53.2 Quoy que ce soit qui tombe en nostre connoissance et iouïssance, nous sentons qu'il ne nous satisfait pas, et allons beant apres les choses aduenir et inconnuës, d'autant que les presentes ne nous soulent point. Non pas à mon aduis qu'elles n'ayent assez dequoy nous souler, mais c'est que nous les saisissons d'vne prise malade et desreglée. Nam cùm vidit hic ad vsum quæ flagitat vsus,

ENGLISH

If we sometimes took the trouble to consider ourselves, and spent in sounding ourselves the time we spend in checking up on others and in getting to know things outside us, we would easily feel how much this whole fabric of ours is built of weak and failing pieces. Is it not a singular proof of imperfection that we cannot settle our contentment on any one thing, and that even in desire and imagination it is beyond our power to choose what we need? Good evidence of this is the great dispute that has always gone on among the philosophers about finding man's sovereign good, and that still goes on and will go on forever, without resolution and without agreement.

While what we long for is absent, it seems to surpass all the rest; then, once we have it, we long for something else, and the same thirst holds us.[1]

Whatever comes within our knowledge and enjoyment, we feel that it does not satisfy us, and we go gaping after things to come and unknown, because present things do not fill us up. Not, in my opinion, that they do not have enough in them to fill us, but because we seize them with a sick and disordered grip. For when he saw that what need demands for living was nearly all already provided for mortals, that men, powerful in wealth, honor and praise, were abounding, and excelled in the good name of their children, and yet that at home no one had a heart the less anxious, and that the mind was forced to slave under hostile complaints, he understood then that the fault lay in the vessel itself, and that by its fault everything was spoiled within,

1.53.3 Nostre appetit est irresolu et incertain: il ne sçait rien tenir, ny rien iouyr de bonne façon. L'homme estimant que ce soit le vice de ces choses qu'il tient, se remplit et se paist d'autres choses qu'il ne sçait point, et qu'il ne cognoist point, où il applique ses desirs et ses esperances, les prend en honneur et reuerence: comme dit Cæsar, Communi fit vitio naturæ, vt inuisis, latitantibus atque incognitis rebus magis confidamus, vehementiùsque exterreamur.	Our appetite is irresolute and uncertain; it can neither hold on to anything nor enjoy anything in the right way. Man, thinking it is the fault of the things he holds, fills and feeds himself with other things that he does not know and does not understand, on which he sets his desires and hopes, and holds them in honor and reverence. As Caesar says: It happens through a common fault of nature that we have more confidence in things unseen, hidden and unknown, and are more violently terrified by them.

2 Lucretius again, On the Nature of Things VI, speaking of Epicurus.

I.54 Of Vain Subtleties

Des vaines subtilitez
Admiring difficult trifles shows weak judgment; Montaigne notes how extremes meet, as in ignorance before and after knowledge.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.54.1	IL est de ces subtilitez friuoles et vaines, par le moyen desquelles les hommes cerchent quelquefois de la recommandation: comme les poëtes, qui font des ouurages entiers de vers commençans par vne mesme lettre: nous voyons des œufs, des boules, des aisles, des haches façonnées anciennement par les Grecs, auec la mesure de leurs vers, en les alongeant ou accoursissant, en maniere qu'ils viennent à representer telle, ou telle figure. Telle estoit la science de celuy qui s'amusa à compter en combien de sortes se pouuoient renger les lettres de l'alphabet, et y en trouua ce nombre incroyable, qui se void dans Plutarque.	There are some frivolous and empty subtleties by means of which men sometimes seek recognition: like the poets who make whole works of lines beginning with the same letter. We see eggs, balls, wings and axes shaped long ago by the Greeks with the measure of their lines, lengthening or shortening them so that they come to represent this figure or that. Such was the science of the man who amused himself by counting in how many ways the letters of the alphabet could be arranged, and found that incredible number which you can see in Plutarch.[1]
	Ie trouue bonne l'opinion de celuy, à qui on presenta vn homme, apris à ietter de la main vn grain de mil, auec telle industrie, que sans faillir, il le passoit tousiours dans le trou d'vne esguille, et luy demanda lon apres quelque present pour loyer d'vne si rare suffisance: surquoy il ordonna bien plaisamment et iustement à mon aduis, qu'on fist donner à cet ouurier deux ou trois minots de mil, affin qu'vn si bel art ne demeurast sans exercice. C'est vn tesmoignage merueilleux de la foiblesse de nostre iugement, qu'il recommande les choses par la rareté ou nouuelleté, ou encore par la difficulté, si la bonté et vtilité n'y sont ioinctes.	I approve the view of the man to whom someone presented a man trained to throw a grain of millet with such skill that he would always pass it through the eye of a needle without missing; and afterwards he was asked for some present as a reward for so rare an ability. Whereupon he ordered, very amusingly and, in my opinion, justly, that this craftsman be given two or three bushels of millet, so that such a fine art should not go without practice. It is a marvelous testimony to the weakness of our judgment that it values things for their rarity or novelty, or even for their difficulty, if goodness and usefulness are not joined to them.[2]
1.54.2	Nous venons presentement de nous iouër chez moy, à qui pourroit trouuer plus de choses qui se tinsent par les deux bouts extremes, comme, Sire, c'est vn tiltre qui se donne à la plus esleuée personne de nostre Estat, qui est le Roy, et se donne aussi au vulgaire, comme aux marchans, et ne touche point ceux d'entre deux. Les femmes de qualité, on les nomme Dames, les moyennes Damoiselles, et Dames encore celles de la plus basse marche. Les daiz qu'on estend sur les tables, ne sont permis qu'aux maisons des Princes et aux tauernes.	We have just been playing a game at my house: who could find the most things that meet at their two extreme ends. For example, "Sire" is a title given to the most exalted person in our state, the King, and also given to the common sort, such as merchants, but it does not touch those in between. Women of rank are called Dames, those of middling rank Damoiselles, and Dames again those of the lowest grade. Canopies spread over tables are Democritus disoit, que les Dieux et les bestes auoient les sentimens plus aiguz que les hommes, qui sont au moyen estage.

Les Romains portoient mesme accoutrement les iours de dueil et les iours de feste.

1.54.3 Il est certain que la peur extreme, et l'extreme ardeur de courage troublent également le ventre, et le laschent. Le saubriquet de Tremblant, duquel le XII. Roy de Nauarre Sancho fut surnommé, aprend que la hardiesse aussi bien que la peur engendrent du tremoussement aux membres. Ceux qui armoient ou luy ou quelque autre de pareille nature, à qui la peau frissonoit, essayerent à le rasseurer; appetissans le danger auquel il s'alloit ietter: Vous me cognoissez mal, leur dit-il: si ma chair sçauoit iusques où mon courage la portera tantost, elle se transiroit tout à plat. La foiblesse qui nous vient de froideur, et desgoutement aux exercices de Venus, elle nous vient aussi d'vn appetit trop vehement, et d'vne chaleur desreglée.

L'extreme froideur et l'extreme chaleur cuisent et rotissent. Aristote dit que les cueux de plomb se fondent, et coulent de froid, et de la rigueur de l'hyuer, comme d'vne chaleur vehemente. Le desir et la satieté remplissent de douleur les sieges au dessus et au dessous de la volupté.

1.54.4 La bestise et la sagesse se rencontrent en mesme poinct de sentiment et de resolution à la souffrance des accidens humains: les sages gourmandent et commandent le mal, et les autres l'ignorent: ceux-cy sont, par maniere de dire, au deçà des accidens, les autres au delà: lesquels apres en auoir bien poisé et consideré les qualitez, les auoir mesurez et iugez tels qu'ils sont, s'eslancent au dessus, par la force d'vn vigoureux courage.

Ils les desdaignent et foulent aux pieds, ayans vne ame forte et solide, contre laquelle les traicts de la fortune venans à donner, il est force qu'ils reialissent et s'esmoussent, trouuans vn corps dans lequel ils ne peuuent faire impression: l'ordinaire et moyenne condition des hommes, loge entre ces deux extremitez: qui est de ceux qui apperçoiuent les maux, les sentent, et ne les peuuent supporter. L'enfance et la decrepitude se rencontrent en imbecillité de cerueau. L'auarice et la profusion en pareil desir d'attirer et d'acquerir.

permitted only in the houses of princes and in taverns. Democritus said that gods and beasts had keener senses than men, who are on the middle floor.[3]

The Romans wore the same clothing on days of mourning and on feast days.

It is certain that extreme fear and extreme ardor of courage equally upset the bowels and loosen them. The nickname "the Trembler," given to Sancho XII, King of Navarre, teaches us that boldness as well as fear produces trembling in the limbs. Those who were arming him, or some other man of the same nature whose skin was shivering, tried to reassure him by making light of the danger he was about to throw himself into. "You know me ill," he told them. "If my flesh knew how far my courage will soon carry it, it would freeze stiff with fright." The weakness that comes to us from coldness and distaste in the exercises of Venus comes to us also from too vehement an appetite and a disordered heat.

Extreme cold and extreme heat both cook and roast. Aristotle says that ingots of lead melt and run from the cold and rigor of winter as they do from a fierce heat. Desire and satiety fill with pain the seats above and below pleasure.

Stupidity and wisdom meet at the same point of feeling and resolution in enduring human misfortunes: the wise rebuke misfortune and command it, and the others are unaware of it. These others are, so to speak, on this side of misfortunes; the wise are beyond them. After weighing and considering their qualities well, after measuring them and judging them for what they are, the wise leap above them by the force of a vigorous courage.

They disdain them and trample them underfoot, having a strong and solid soul against which the arrows of Fortune, when they strike, must necessarily rebound and be blunted, meeting a body on which they can make no impression. The ordinary and middling condition of men lodges between these two extremes: it is that of people who perceive misfortunes, feel them, and cannot bear them. Childhood and decrepitude meet in feebleness of brain; avarice and prodigality in a like desire to draw in and acquire.

1.54.5 Il se peut dire auec apparence, qu'il y a ignorance abecedaire, qui va deuant la science: vne autre doctorale, qui vient apres la science: ignorance que la science fait et engendre, tout ainsi comme elle deffait et destruit la premiere. Des esprits simples, moins curieux et moins instruits, il s'en fait de bons Chrestiens, qui par reuerence et obeissance, croyent simplement, et se maintiennent sous les loix. En la moyenne vigueur des esprits, et moyenne capacité, s'engendre l'erreur des opinions: ils suiuent l'apparence du premier sens: et ont quelque tiltre d'interpreter à niaiserie et bestise que nous soyons arrestez en l'ancien train, regardans à nous, qui n'y sommes pas instruits par estude.

It can plausibly be said that there is an ABC ignorance that comes before knowledge, and another, doctoral ignorance that comes after knowledge: an ignorance that knowledge makes and engenders, just as it undoes and destroys the first. Out of simple minds, less curious and less instructed, good Christians are made, who out of reverence and obedience believe simply and keep themselves under the laws. In minds of middling vigor and middling capacity, erroneous opinions are engendered. They follow the appearance of the first sense, and they have some grounds for interpreting as simple-mindedness and stupidity the fact that we hold to the old ways, looking at those of us who are not instructed in these matters by study.

Les grands esprits plus rassis et clairuoyans, font vn autre genre de bien croyans: lesquels par longue et religieuse inuestigation, penetrent vne plus profonde et abstruse lumiere, és escritures, et sentent le mysterieux et diuin secret de nostre police ecclesiastique. Pourtant en voyons nous aucuns estre arriuez à ce dernier estage, par le second, auec merueilleux fruit, et confirmation: comme à l'extreme limite de la chrestienne intelligence: et iouyr de leur victoire auec consolation, action de graces, reformation de mœurs, et grande modestie.

Great minds, more settled and clear-sighted, make another kind of good believers: by long and religious investigation they penetrate a deeper and more abstruse light in the Scriptures, and sense the mysterious and divine secret of our Church's order. And so we see some of them who have reached this last stage by way of the second, with marvelous fruit and confirmation, as at the farthest limit of Christian understanding, and who enjoy their victory with consolation, thanksgiving, reformation of conduct and great modesty.

Et en ce rang n'entens-ie pas loger ces autres, qui pour se purger du soupçon de leur erreur passé, et pour nous asseurer d'eux, se rendent extremes, indiscrets, et iniustes, à la conduicte de nostre cause, et la tachent d'infinis reproches de violence. Les païsants simples, sont honnestes gents: et honnestes gents les Philosophes: ou, selon que nostre temps les nomme, des natures fortes et claires, enrichies d'vne large instruction de sciences vtiles. Les mestis, qui ont dedaigné le premier siege de l'ignorance des lettres, et n'ont peu ioindre l'autre, le cul entre deux selles (desquels ie suis, et tant d'autres) sont dangereux, ineptes, importuns: ceux-cy troublent le monde.

And in this rank I do not mean to place those others who, to purge themselves of the suspicion of their past error and to reassure us about themselves, become extreme, immoderate and unjust in the conduct of our cause, and stain it with endless charges of violence. Simple peasants are decent people, and decent people are the philosophers—or, as our age calls them, strong and clear natures, enriched with a broad instruction in useful sciences. Those in between, who have disdained the first seat, ignorance of letters, and could not reach the other—their backside between two saddles, like me and so many others—are dangerous, inept and tiresome: these are the ones who trouble the world.

Pourtant de ma part, ie me recule tant que ie puis, dans le premier et naturel siege, d'où ie me suis pour neant essayé de partir.

That is why, for my part, I draw back as far as I can into the first and natural seat, which I tried in vain to leave.

La poësie mediocre, qui s'arreste entre deux, est desdaignée, sans honneur, et sans prix.	with the principal beauty of poetry perfected according to art, as can be seen in the villanelles of Gascony and in the songs reported to us from nations that have no knowledge of any science, nor even of writing. Middling poetry, which stops between the two, is disdained, without honor and without value.
1.54.7	Mais par ce qu'apres que le pas a esté ouuert à l'esprit, i'ay trouué, comme il aduient ordinairement, que nous auions pris pour vn exercice malaisé et d'vn rare subiect, ce qui ne l'est aucunement, et qu'apres que nostre inuention a esté eschauffée, elle descouure vn nombre infiny de pareils exemples, ie n'en adiousteray que cettuy-cy: que si ces Essays estoient dignes, qu'on en iugeast, il en pourroit aduenir à mon aduis, qu'ils ne plairoient guere aux esprits communs et vulgaires, ny guere aux singuliers et excellens: ceux-là n'y entendroient pas assez, ceux-cy y entendroient trop: ils pourroient viuoter en la moyenne region.	But once the way was opened to my mind, I found, as usually happens, that we had taken for a difficult exercise and a rare subject something that is not so at all, and that once our inventiveness is warmed up it discovers an infinite number of similar examples. So I will add only this one: that if these Essays were worth judging, it might turn out, in my opinion, that they would hardly please common and ordinary minds, nor much please singular and excellent ones. The former would not understand enough in them, the latter would understand too much. They might scrape a living in the middle region.

I.55 Of Smells

Des Senteurs

The best bodily smell is none; Montaigne describes his own keen nose and the power of perfumes on the mind.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.55.1	IL se dit d'aucuns, comme d'Alexandre le grand, que leur sueur espandoit vn' odeur souefue, par quelque rare et extraordinaire complexion: dequoy Plutarque et autres recherchent la cause. Mais la commune façon des corps est au contraire: et la meilleure condition qu'ils ayent, c'est d'estre exempts de senteur. La douceur mesme des haleines plus pures, n'a rien de plus parfaict, que d'estre sans aucune odeur, qui nous offence: comme sont celles des enfans bien sains. Voyla pourquoy dit Plaute, Mulier tum benè olet, vbi nihil olet. La plus exquise senteur d'vne femme, c'est ne sentir rien.	It is said of some people, like Alexander the Great, that their sweat gave off a sweet smell, owing to some rare and extraordinary constitution; Plutarch and others look for the cause of it. But the common way of bodies is the contrary, and the best condition they can be in is to be free of smell. Even the sweetness of the purest breath has nothing more perfect about it than to be without any odor that offends us, like the breath of very healthy children. That is why, says Plautus, A woman smells good when she smells of nothing. The most exquisite scent of a woman is to smell of nothing.
	Et les bonnes senteurs estrangeres, on a raison de les tenir pour suspectes, à ceux qui s'en seruent, et d'estimer qu'elles soyent employées pour couurir quelque defaut naturel de ce costé-là. D'où naissent ces rencontres des poëtes anciens, c'est puïr que sentir bon. Rides nos, Coracine, nil olentes: / Malo quàm benè olere, nil olere. Et ailleurs, Posthume, non benè olet, qui benè semper olet.	And borrowed perfumes, however good, we are right to regard as suspect in those who use them, and to think they are used to cover some natural defect in that quarter. Hence those quips of the ancient poets: to smell good is to stink. You laugh at us, Coracinus, because we smell of nothing: / I would rather smell of nothing than smell good. And elsewhere: Postumus, he who always smells good does not smell good.[1]
1.55.2	I'ayme pourtant bien fort à estre entretenu de bonnes senteurs, et hay outre mesure les mauuaises, que ie tire de plus loing que toute autre: Namque sagacius vnus odoror, Polypus, an grauis hirsutis cubet hircus in alis, Quàm canis acer vbi lateat sus. Les senteurs plus simples et naturelles, me semblent plus aggreables.	Yet I am very fond of being surrounded by good smells, and I hate bad ones beyond measure, and I catch them from farther off than anyone else: For I alone sniff out more keenly, whether a polyp or a rank goat lurks in hairy armpits, than a keen hound sniffs out where the boar is hiding. The simplest and most natural scents seem to me the most agreeable.[2]
1.55.3	Et touche ce soing principalement les dames. En la plus espesse barbarie, les femmes Scythes, apres s'estre lauées, se saupoudrent et encroustent tout le corps et le visage, de certaine drogue, qui naist en leur terroir,	And this concern is chiefly the ladies' business. In the thickest barbarism, the Scythian women, after washing, powder and encrust their whole body and face with a certain fragrant drug that grows in their land; and when they have removed this paint odoriferante. Et pour approcher les hommes, ayans osté ce fard, elles s'en trouuent et polies et parfumées.	to approach the men, they find themselves both smooth and perfumed.

1.55.4 Quelque odeur que ce soit, c'est merueille combien elle s'attache à moy, et combien i'ay la peau propre à s'en abreuuer. Celuy qui se plaint de nature dequoy elle a laissé l'homme sans instrument à porter les senteurs au nez, a tort: car elles se portent elles mesmes. Mais à moy particulierement, les moustaches que i'ay pleines, m'en seruent: si i'en approche mes gans, ou mon mouchoir, l'odeur y tiendra tout vn iour: elles accusent le lieu d'où ie viens: les estroits baisers de la ieunesse, sauoureux, gloutons et gluans, s'y colloient autrefois, et s'y tenoient plusieurs heures apres.	Whatever smell it may be, it is marvelous how it clings to me, and how apt my skin is to soak it up. The man who complains that nature left us without an instrument for carrying smells to the nose is wrong, for smells carry themselves. But in my case particularly, my moustache, which is thick, does the job: if I bring my gloves or my handkerchief near it, the smell will stay there a whole day. It gives away where I have been. The close kisses of youth, savory, greedy and sticky, used to glue themselves to it and stay there for several hours afterwards.
Et si pourtant ie me trouue peu subiect aux maladies populaires, qui se chargent par la conuersation, et qui naissent de la contagion de l'air; et me suis sauué de celles de mon temps, dequoy il y en a eu plusieurs sortes en nos villes, et en noz armées. On lit de Socrates, que n'estant iamais party d'Athenes pendant plusieurs recheutes de peste, qui la tourmenterent tant de fois, luy seul ne s'en trouua iamais plus mal.	And yet I find myself little subject to epidemic diseases, which are caught from contact with people and arise from infection of the air; and I have escaped those of my time, of which there have been several kinds in our towns and in our armies. We read of Socrates that, though he never left Athens during the many recurrences of plague that tormented it so often, he alone was never the worse for it.
1.55.5 Les medecins pourroient, ce crois-ie, tirer des odeurs, plus d'vsage qu'ils ne font: car i'ay souuent apperçeu qu'elles me changent, et agissent en mes esprits, selon qu'elles sont. Qui me fait approuuer ce qu'on dit, que l'inuention des encens et parfuns aux Eglises, si ancienne et espandue en toutes nations et religions, regarde à cela, de nous resiouir, esueiller et purifier le sens, pour nous rendre plus propres à la contemplation.	Physicians could, I believe, make more use of smells than they do; for I have often noticed that they change me and act on my spirits according to what they are. This makes me approve what people say, that the use of incense and perfumes in churches, so ancient and so widespread among all nations and religions, aims at this: to gladden, rouse and purify our senses, to make us fitter for contemplation.
1.55.6 Ie voudrois bien pour en iuger, auoir eu ma part de l'ouurage de ces cuisiniers, qui sçauent assaisonner les odeurs estrangeres, auec la saueur des viandes. Comme on remarqua singulierement au seruice du Roy de Thunes, qui de nostre aage print terre à Naples, pour s'aboucher auec l'Empereur Charles. On farcissoit ses viandes de drogues odoriferantes, en telle somptuosité, qu'vn Paon, et deux Faisans, se trouuerent sur ses parties, reuenir à cent ducats, pour les apprester selon leur maniere. Et quand on les despeçoit, non la salle seulement, mais toutes les chambres de son Palais, et les rues d'autour, estoient remplies d'vne tres-soüefue vapeur, qui ne s'esuanouissoit pas si soudain.	In order to judge of it, I would very much have liked to have had a share in the handiwork of those cooks who know how to season foods with foreign fragrances as well as with their own flavor. This was particularly remarked in the service of the King of Tunis, who in our time landed at Naples to confer with the Emperor Charles. His dishes were stuffed with fragrant spices with such lavishness that a peacock and two pheasants came, according to his accounts, to a hundred ducats to prepare in their fashion. And when they were carved, not only the hall but all the rooms of his palace and the streets around were filled with a very sweet vapor that did not vanish quickly.[3]

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.55.7	Le principal soing que i’aye à me loger, c’est de fuir l’air puant et pesant. Ces belles villes, Venise et Paris, alterent la faueur que ie leur porte, par l’aigre senteur, l’vne de son maraits, l’autre de sa boue.	My chief concern in choosing where to live is to avoid stinking, heavy air. Those beautiful cities, Venice and Paris, spoil the affection I have for them by their sharp smell: the one from its marshes, the other from its mud.

I.56 Of Prayers

Des prieres

Montaigne recommends the Lord's Prayer and warns against praying while unrepentant and against careless use of sacred texts.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.56.1	IE propose des fantasies informes et irresolues, comme font ceux qui publient des questions doubteuses, à debattre aux escoles: non pour establir la verité, mais pour la chercher. Et les soubmets au iugement de ceux, à qui il touche de regler non seulement mes actions et mes escrits, mais encore mes pensées. Esgalement m'en sera acceptable et vtile la condemnation, comme l'approbation, tenant pour absurde et impie, si rien se rencontre ignoramment ou inaduertamment couché en cette rapsodie contraire aux sainctes resolutions et prescriptions de l'Eglise Catholique Apostolique et Romaine, en laquelle ie meurs, et en laquelle ie suis nay.	I put forward notions that are shapeless and unresolved, as do those who publish doubtful questions to be debated in the schools: not to establish the truth but to seek it. And I submit them to the judgment of those whose business it is to regulate not only my actions and my writings but even my thoughts. Condemnation will be as acceptable and as useful to me as approval, since I hold as absurd and impious anything that may be found, set down ignorantly or inadvertently in this rhapsody, contrary to the holy resolutions and prescriptions of the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman Church, in which I die and in which I was born.
	Et pourtant me remettant tousiours à l'authorité de leur censure, qui peut tout sur moy, ie me mesle ainsi temerairement à toute sorte de propos: comme icy.	And so, always submitting to the authority of their censure, which has absolute power over me, I meddle rashly in this way with every sort of subject—as here.
1.56.2	Ie ne sçay si ie me trompe: mais puis que par vne faueur particuliere de la bonté diuine, certaine façon de priere nous a esté prescripte et dictée mot à mot par la bouche de Dieu, il m'a tousiours semblé que nous en deuions auoir l'vsage plus ordinaire, que nous n'auons. Et si i'en estoy creu, à l'entrée et à l'issue de noz tables, à nostre leuer et coucher, et à toutes actions particulieres, ausquelles on a accoustumé de mesler des prieres, ie voudroy que ce fust le patenostre, que les Chrestiens y employassent, sinon seulement, au moins tousiours. L'Eglise peut estendre et diuersifier les prieres selon le besoin de nostre instruction: car ie sçay bien que c'est tousiours mesme substance, et mesme chose.	I do not know whether I am mistaken; but since, by a particular favor of divine goodness, a certain form of prayer was prescribed and dictated to us word for word by the mouth of God, it has always seemed to me that we ought to use it more commonly than we do. And if I had my way, at the beginning and end of our meals, at our rising and our going to bed, and at all the particular actions with which we are accustomed to mix prayers, I would want it to be the Lord's Prayer that Christians used—if not exclusively, at least always. The Church may extend and vary prayers according to the needs of our instruction; for I know well that it is always the same substance and the same thing.
	Mais on deuoit donner à celle là ce priuilege, que le peuple l'eust continuellement en la bouche: car il est certain qu'elle dit tout ce qu'il faut, et qu'elle est trespropre à toutes occasions. C'est l'vnique priere, dequoy ie me sers par tout, et la repete au lieu d'en changer. D'où il aduient, que ie n'en ay aussi bien en memoire, que cette là.	But that one ought to have been given the privilege of being continually in the mouths of the people; for it is certain that it says everything that needs saying and is most fitting for every occasion. It is the only prayer I use everywhere, and I repeat it instead of changing. That is why there is none I have so well by heart as that one.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.56.3	I'auoy presentement en la pensée, d'où nous venoit cett' erreur, de recourir à Dieu en tous nos desseins et entreprises, et l'appeller à toute sorte de besoing, et en quelque lieu que nostre foiblesse veut de l'aide, sans considerer si l'occasion est iuste ou iniuste; et d'escrier son nom, et sa puissance, en quelque estat, et action que nous soyons, pour vitieuse qu'elle soit.	I was just now wondering where this error of ours comes from: having recourse to God in all our plans and undertakings, calling on him in every kind of need and wherever our weakness wants help, without considering whether the occasion is just or unjust; and crying out his name and his power in whatever state or action we may be, however vicious it is.
	Il est bien nostre seul et vnique protecteur, et peut toutes choses à nous ayder: mais encore qu'il daigne nous honorer de cette douce alliance paternelle, il est pourtant autant iuste, comme il est bon, et comme il est puissant: mais il vse bien plus souuent de sa iustice, que de son pouuoir, et nous fauorise selon la raison d'icelle, non selon noz demandes.	He is indeed our sole and only protector, and can do anything to help us; but although he deigns to honor us with this sweet fatherly alliance, he is nonetheless as just as he is good and as he is powerful. And he uses his justice far more often than his power, and favors us according to the reason of that justice, not according to our requests.
1.56.4	Platon en ses loix fait trois sortes d'iniurieuse creance des Dieux, Qu'il n'y en ayt point, Qu'ils ne se meslent pas de noz affaires, Qu'ils ne refusent rien à noz vœux, offrandes et sacrifices. La premiere erreur, selon son aduis, ne dura iamais immuable en homme, depuis son enfance, iusques à sa vieillesse. Les deux suiuantes peuuent souffrir de la constance.	Plato, in his Laws, distinguishes three kinds of insulting belief about the gods: that there are none; that they do not concern themselves with our affairs; that they refuse nothing to our vows, offerings and sacrifices. The first error, in his opinion, never lasted unchanged in any man from his childhood to his old age. The two others can be held steadily.
1.56.5	Sa iustice et sa puissance sont inseparables. Pour neant implorons nous sa force en vne mauuaise cause. Il faut auoir l'ame nette, au moins en ce moment, auquel nous le prions, et deschargée de passions vitieuses: autrement nous luy presentons nous mesmes les verges, dequoy nous chastier. Au lieu de rabiller nostre faute, nous la redoublons; presentans à celuy, à qui nous auons à demander pardon, vne affection pleine d'irreuerence et de haine. Voyla pourquoy ie ne louë pas volontiers ceux, que ie voy prier Dieu plus souuent et plus ordinairement, si les actions voisines de la priere, ne me tesmoignent quelque amendement et reformation. Si nocturnus adulter, / Tempora sanctonico velas adoperta cucullo.	His justice and his power are inseparable. In vain do we implore his strength in a bad cause. We must have a clean soul, at least at the moment when we pray to him, and one unburdened of vicious passions; otherwise we ourselves hand him the rods to punish us with. Instead of mending our fault, we double it, offering to him from whom we must ask pardon a feeling full of irreverence and hatred. That is why I do not readily praise those whom I see praying to God more often and more regularly than others, if the actions close to their prayer do not show me some amendment and reformation. If, as a nighttime adulterer, / you hide your head under a Santonic hood.[1]
1.56.6	Et l'assiette d'vn homme meslant à vne vie execrable la deuotion, semble estre aucunement plus condemnable, que celle d'vn homme conforme à soy, et dissolu par tout. Pourtant refuse nostre Eglise tous les iours, la faueur de son entrée et societé, aux mœurs obstinées à quelque insigne malice.	And the position of a man who mixes devotion with an abominable life seems somewhat more condemnable than that of a man who is consistent with himself and dissolute throughout. That is why our Church every day refuses the favor of admission and fellowship to those whose ways persist obstinately in some notorious wickedness.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
1.56.7 Nous prions par vsage et par coustume: ou pour mieux dire, nous lisons ou prononçons noz prieres: ce n'est en fin que mine. Et me desplaist de voir faire trois signes de croix au Benedicite, autant à Graces (et plus m'en desplait-il de ce que c'est vn signe que i'ay en reuerence et continuel vsage, mesmement quand ie baaille) et cependant toutes les autres heures du iour, les voir occupées à la haine, l'auarice, l'iniustice. Aux vices leur heure, son heure à Dieu, comme par compensation et composition. C'est miracle, de voir continuer des actions si diuerses d'vne si pareille teneur, qu'il ne s'y sente point d'interruption et d'alteration aux confins mesmes, et passage de l'vne à l'autre.	We pray out of habit and custom; or, to put it better, we read or recite our prayers. In the end it is nothing but show. And it displeases me to see people make three signs of the cross at the Benedicite and as many at Grace (and it displeases me all the more because it is a sign I hold in reverence and use continually, even when I yawn), and meanwhile to see all the other hours of the day given over to hatred, avarice and injustice. To the vices their hour, to God his hour, as if by way of compensation and compromise. It is a miracle to see such different actions carried on in so even a tenor that no interruption or change can be felt even at the borders, in the passage from one to the other.[2]
Quelle prodigieuse conscience se peut donner repos, nourrissant en mesme giste, d'vne societé si accordante et si paisible, le crime et le iuge?	What monstrous conscience can be at rest while it harbors under the same roof, in such harmonious and peaceful fellowship, the crime and the judge?
1.56.8 Vn homme, de qui la paillardise, sans cesse regente la teste, et qui la iuge tres-odieuse à la veuë diuine, que dit-il à Dieu, quand il luy en parle? Il se rameine, mais soudain il rechoit. Si l'obiect de la diuine iustice, et sa presence frappoient, comme il dit, et chastioient son ame, pour courte qu'en fust la penitence, la crainte mesme y reietteroit si souuent sa pensée, qu'incontinent il se verroit maistre de ces vices, qui sont habitués et acharnés en luy. Mais quoy! ceux qui couchent vne vie entiere, sur le fruit et emolument du peché, qu'ils sçauent mortel? Combien auons nous de mestiers et vacations receuës, dequoy l'essence est vicieuse?	A man whose lechery rules his head without cease, and who judges it most odious in the sight of God—what does he say to God when he speaks to him about it? He pulls himself back, but suddenly falls again. If the thought of divine justice and its presence struck and chastised his soul, as he says, then however short his penance, fear itself would bring his thoughts back to it so often that he would soon find himself master of those vices that have become habitual and ingrained in him. But what of those who stake a whole life on the fruit and profit of a sin they know to be mortal? How many trades and accepted occupations do we have whose essence is vicious?
Et celuy qui se confessant à moy, me recitoit, auoir tout vn aage faict profession et les effects d'une religion damnable selon luy, et contradictoire à celle qu'il auoit en son cœur, pour ne perdre son credit et l'honneur de ses charges: comment patissoit-il ce discours en son courage? De quel langage entretiennent ils sur ce subiect, la iustice diuine? Leur repentance consistant en visible et maniable reparation, ils perdent et enuers Dieu, et enuers nous, le moyen de l'alleguer. Sont-ils si hardis de demander pardon, sans satisfaction et sans repentance? Ie tien que de ces premiers il en va, comme de ceux-cy: mais l'obstination n'y est pas si aisée à conuaincre.	And the man who, confessing to me, told me that for a whole lifetime he had professed and practiced a religion which in his view was damnable, and contrary to the one he had in his heart, so as not to lose his standing and the honor of his offices—how did his heart endure such reasoning? In what language do such people converse with divine justice on this subject? Since their repentance would have to consist in visible and tangible reparation, they lose, both toward God and toward us, the means of pleading it. Are they so bold as to ask pardon without satisfaction and without repentance? I hold that it goes with the first kind as

	Cette contrarieté et volubilité d'opinion si soudaine, si violente, qu'ils nous feignent, sent pour moy son miracle. Ils nous representent l'estat d'vne indigestible agonie.	This contrariety and volatility of opinion, so sudden and so violent, which they pretend to us, seems to me something of a miracle. They present us with the state of an indigestible agony.
1.56.9	Que l'imagination me sembloit fantastique, de ceux qui ces années passées, auoient en vsage de reprocher tout chascun, en qui il reluisoit quelque clarté d'esprit, professant la religion Catholique, que c'estoit à feinte: et tenoient mesme, pour luy faire honneur, quoy qu'il dist par apparence, qu'il ne pouuoit faillir au dedans, d'auoir sa creance reformée à leur pied. Fascheuse maladie, de se croire si fort, qu'on se persuade, qu'il ne se puisse croire au contraire: et plus fascheuse encore, qu'on se persuade d'vn tel esprit, qu'il prefere ie ne sçay quelle disparité de fortune presente, aux esperances et menaces de la vie eternelle!	How fantastic the notion seemed to me of those who, in recent years, used to reproach everyone in whom some brightness of mind shone, and who professed the Catholic religion, with doing it in pretense! They even held, to do him honor, that whatever he said outwardly, inwardly he could not fail to have his belief reformed to their pattern. A grievous disease, to believe in oneself so firmly that one is persuaded no one can believe the contrary! And more grievous still, to be persuaded that such a mind would prefer some disparity or other of present fortune to the hopes and threats of eternal life![3]
	Ils m'en peuuent croire: Si rien eust deu tenter ma ieunesse, l'ambition du hazard et difficulté, qui suiuoient cette recente entreprinse, y eust eu bonne part.	They can take my word for it: if anything could have tempted me in my youth, the ambition of facing the risk and difficulty that went with this recent enterprise would have had a good part in it.

SCRIPTURE IN THE COMMON TONGUE

Montaigne objects to the Psalms sung casually and the Bible translated for everyone.

1.56.10	Ce n'est pas sans grande raison, ce me semble, que l'Eglise deffend l'vsage promiscue, temeraire et indiscret des sainctes et diuines chansons, que le Sainct Esprit a dicté en Dauid. Il ne faut mesler Dieu en nos actions qu'auecque reuerence et attention pleine d'honneur et de respect. Cette voix est trop diuine, pour n'auoir autre vsage que d'exercer les poulmons, et plaire à nos oreilles. C'est de la conscience qu'elle doit estre produite, et non pas de la langue.	It is not without good reason, it seems to me, that the Church forbids the indiscriminate, rash and thoughtless use of the holy and divine songs that the Holy Spirit dictated to David. We should bring God into our actions only with reverence, and with an attention full of honor and respect. That voice is too divine to have no other use than to exercise our lungs and please our ears. It is from the conscience that it should come, not from the tongue.[4]
1.56.11	Ce n'est pas raison qu'on permette qu'vn garçon de boutique parmy ses vains et friuoles pensemens, s'en entretienne et s'en iouë. Ny n'est certes raison de voir tracasser par vne sale, et par vne cuysine, le Sainct liure des sacrez mysteres de nostre creance. C'estoyent autrefois mysteres, ce sont à present desduits et esbats.	It is not reasonable to allow a shop boy to toy and amuse himself with them amid his idle and frivolous thoughts. Nor, surely, is it reasonable to see the holy book of the sacred mysteries of our faith knocked about in the hall and the kitchen. They used to be mysteries. Now they are pastimes and entertainments.

1.56.12 Ce n'est pas en passant, et tumultuairement, qu'il faut manier vn estude si serieux et venerable. Ce doit estre vne action destinée, et rassise, à laquelle on doit tousiours adiouster cette preface de nostre office, sursum corda, et y apporter le corps mesme disposé en contenance, qui tesmoigne vne particuliere attention et reuerence. Ce n'est pas l'estude de tout le monde: c'est l'estude des personnes qui y sont vouées, que Dieu y appelle. Les meschans, les ignorants s'y empirent. Ce n'est pas vne histoire à compter: c'est vne histoire à reuerer, craindre et adorer. Plaisantes gents, qui pensent l'auoir rendue maniable au peuple, pour l'auoir mise en langage populaire. Ne tient-il qu'aux mots, qu'ils n'entendent tout ce qu'ils trouuent par escrit? Diray-ie plus?

So serious and venerable a study should not be handled in passing and in a hurry. It should be a deliberate and settled act. We should always add to it that preface of our service, Lift up your hearts, and bring to it even our body, composed in a bearing that shows a particular attention and reverence. It is not a study for everyone. It is the study of persons dedicated to it, whom God calls to it. The wicked and the ignorant grow worse by it. It is not a story to be told; it is a story to be revered, feared and worshipped. Amusing people, who think they have made it manageable for the common people by putting it into the common tongue! Is it only the words that keep them from understanding everything they find in writing? Shall I say more?[5]

Pour l'en approcher de ce peu, ils l'en reculent. L'ignorance pure, et remise toute en autruy, estoit bien plus salutaire et plus sçauante, que n'est cette science verbale, et vaine, nourrice de presomption et de temerité.

By bringing it this little bit closer to them, they push it further away. Pure ignorance, which relied entirely on others, was far more salutary and more learned than this verbal and empty knowledge, the nurse of presumption and rashness.

1.56.13 Ie croy aussi que la liberté à chacun de dissiper vne parole si religieuse et importante, à tant de sortes d'idiomes, a beaucoup plus de danger que d'vtilité. Les Iuifs, les Mahometans, et quasi tous autres, ont espousé, et reuerent le langage, auquel originellement leurs mysteres auoient esté conceuz, et en est deffendue l'alteration et changement; non sans apparence. Sçauons nous bien qu'en Basque, et en Bretaigne, il y ayt des Iuges assez, pour establir cette traduction faicte en leur langue? L'Eglise vniuerselle n'a point de iugement plus ardu à faire, et plus solemne. En preschant et parlant, l'interpretation est vague, libre, muable, et d'vne parcelle: ainsi ce n'est pas de mesme.

I also believe that giving everyone the freedom to scatter so religious and important a word into so many kinds of languages is much more dangerous than useful. The Jews, the Muslims and almost all others have espoused and revere the language in which their mysteries were originally conceived, and any alteration or change in it is forbidden—not without reason. Are we quite sure that in the Basque country and in Brittany there are judges enough to authorize this translation made into their language? The universal Church has no judgment to make that is more difficult or more solemn. In preaching and speaking, interpretation is loose, free, changeable, and covers only a fragment; so it is not the same thing.

1.56.14 L'vn de noz historiens Grecs accuse iustement son siecle, de ce que les secrets de la religion Chrestienne, estoient espandus emmy la place, és mains des moindres artisans: que chacun en pouuoit debattre et dire selon son sens. Et que ce nous deuoit estre grande honte, nous qui par la grace de Dieu, iouïssons des purs mysteres de la pieté, de les laisser profaner en la bouche de personnes ignorantes et populaires, veu que les Gentils interdisoient à Socrates, à Platon, et aux plus sages, de s'enquerir et parler des choses commises aux Prestres de Delphes. One of our Greek historians rightly accuses his age because the secrets of the Christian religion were spread all over the marketplace, in the hands of the meanest artisans, and anyone could debate them and say what he thought of them. crates, Plato and the wisest men to inquire into and speak of the things entrusted to the priests of Delphi. He also says that the factions of princes on the subject of theology are armed not with zeal but with anger.[6]

Zeal, he says, partakes of divine reason and justice when it conducts itself in an orderly and moderate way; but it turns into hatred and envy, and produces tares and nettles instead of wheat and grapes, when it is led by a human passion. And that other man was right too who, advising the Emperor Theodosius, said that disputes did not so much lull the schisms of the Church to sleep as wake them up and stir heresies to life; that one should therefore shun all contentions and dialectical argumentation, and simply abide by the prescriptions and formulas of the faith established by the ancients.[7]

And the Emperor Andronicus, having come upon some leading men in his palace locked in verbal combat with Lapodius over one of our points of great importance, rebuked them so sharply that he threatened to throw them into the river if they went on. In our day, children and women lecture men older and more experienced than themselves on the laws of the Church; whereas the first of Plato's laws forbids them even to inquire into the reasons for the civil laws, which are to stand in place of divine ordinances. And while allowing the old to discuss them among themselves and with the magistrate, he adds: provided it is not in the presence of the young and of the uninitiated.[8]

A bishop has left it in writing that at the other end of the world there is an island which the ancients called Dioscorides, favored with fertility in all sorts of trees and fruits and with a healthy air. Its people are Christian, with churches and altars adorned only with crosses and no other images. They are great observers of fasts and feast days, exact payers of tithes to the priests, and so chaste that none of them may know more than one woman in his life. For the rest, they are so content with their lot that, in the middle of the sea, they do not know the use of ships; and so simple that of the religion they observe so carefully they do not understand a single word.[9]

Chose incroyable, à qui ne sçauroit, les Payens si deuots idolatres, ne cognoistre de leurs Dieux, que simplement le nom et la statue. L'ancien commencement de Menalippe, tragedie d'Euripides, portoit ainsi. O Iuppiter, car de toy rien sinon / Ie ne cognois seulement que le nom.

An incredible thing to anyone who did not know it: that the pagans, such devout idolaters, knew nothing of their gods but simply their name and their statue. The original opening of Melanippe, a tragedy by Euripides, ran thus: O Jupiter, for of you I know / Nothing at all except the name.

1.56.16 I'ay veu aussi de mon temps, faire plainte d'aucuns escrits, de ce qu'ils sont purement humains et philosophiques, sans meslange de Theologie. Qui diroit au contraire, ce ne seroit pourtant sans quelque raison; Que la doctrine diuine tient mieux son rang à part, comme Royne et dominatrice: Qu'elle doit estre principale par tout, point suffragante et subsidiaire: Et qu'à l'auenture se prendroient les exemples à la Grammaire, Rhetorique, Logique, plus sortablement d'ailleurs que d'vne si sainte matiere; comme aussi les arguments des Theatres, ieux et spectacles publiques. Que les raisons diuines se considerent plus venerablement et reueremment seules, et en leur stile, qu'appariées aux discours humains.

In my time I have also heard complaints about certain writings because they are purely human and philosophical, with no admixture of theology. Yet anyone who argued the contrary would not be without some reason. He might say that divine doctrine better keeps its rank apart, as queen and sovereign; that it must be first everywhere, not subordinate and auxiliary; and that examples for grammar, rhetoric and logic might perhaps more fittingly be taken from elsewhere than from so holy a subject, as might the plots of plays, games and public spectacles. He might say that divine reasons are contemplated more venerably and reverently alone and in their own style than when paired with human reasonings.

Qu'il se voit plus souuent cette faute, que les Theologiens escriuent trop humainement, que cett'autre, que les humanistes escriuent trop peu theologalement. La Philosophie, dit Sainct Chrysostome, est pieça banie de l'escole saincte, comme seruante inutile, et estimée indigne de voir seulement en passant de l'entrée, le sacraire des saincts Thresors de la doctrine celeste. Que le dire humain a ses formes plus basses, et ne se doit seruir de la dignité, majesté, regence, du parler diuin. Ie luy laisse pour moy, dire, verbis indisciplinatis, fortune, destinée, accident, heur, et malheur, et les Dieux, et autres frases, selon sa mode.

That the fault more often seen is that theologians write too humanly, rather than the other, that humanists write too little theologically. Philosophy, says Saint Chrysostom, has long since been banished from the holy school as a useless servant, and judged unworthy even to glimpse in passing, from the entrance, the sanctuary of the holy treasures of heavenly doctrine. That human speech has its humbler forms, and should not make use of the dignity, majesty and sovereignty of divine speech. For my part, I let it say, in undisciplined words, fortune, destiny, accident, good luck and bad luck, and the gods, and other such phrases, after its own fashion.[10]

Ie propose les fantasies humaines et miennes, simplement comme humaines fantasies, et separement considerées: non comme arrestées et reglées par l'ordonnance celeste, incapable de doubte et d'altercation. Matiere d'opinion, non matiere de foy. Ce que ie discours selon moy, non ce que ie croy selon Dieu, d'vne façon laïque, non clericale: mais tousiours tres-religieuse. Comme les enfants proposent leurs essays, instruisables, non instruisants. Et ne diroit-on pas aussi

I put forward human notions, and my own, simply as human notions, considered separately—not as settled and regulated by heavenly ordinance, beyond doubt and dispute. Matter of opinion, not matter of faith. What I reason out by my own lights, not what I believe by God's; in a lay manner, not a clerical one, but always a very religious one. As children put forward their essays: to be taught, sans apparence, que l'ordonnance de ne s'entremettre que bien reseruément d'escrire de la Religion, à tous autres qu'à ceux qui en font expresse profession, n'auroit pas faute de quelque image d'vtilité et de iustice; et à moy auec, peut estre de m'en taire.

1.56.17 On m'a dict que ceux mesmes, qui ne sont pas des nostres, deffendent pourtant entre eux l'vsage du nom de Dieu, en leurs propos communs. Ils ne veulent pas qu'on s'en serue par vne maniere d'interiection, ou d'exclamation, ny pour tesmoignage, ny pour comparaison: en quoy ie trouue qu'ils ont raison. Et en quelque maniere que ce soit, que nous appelons Dieu à notre commerce et societé, il faut que ce soit serieusement, et religieusement.

1.56.18 Il y a, ce me semble, en Xenophon vn tel discours, où il montre que nous deuons plus rarement prier Dieu: d'autant qu'il n'est pas aisé, que nous puissions si souuent remettre nostre ame, en cette assiette reglée, reformée, et deuotieuse, où il faut qu'elle soit pour ce faire: autrement nos prieres ne sont pas seulement vaines et inutiles, mais vitieuses. Pardonne nous, disons nous, comme nous pardonnons à ceux qui nous ont offencez. Que disons nous par là, sinon que nous luy offrons nostre ame exempte de vengeance et de rancune? Toutesfois nous inuoquons Dieu et son ayde, au complot de noz fautes, et le conuions à l'iniustice.

Quæ, nisi seductis, nequeas committere diuis. L'auaricieux le prie pour la conseruation vaine et superflue de ses thresors: l'ambitieux pour ses victoires, et conduite de sa fortune: le voleur l'employe à son ayde, pour franchir le hazard et les difficultez, qui s'opposent à l'execution de ses meschantes entreprinses: ou le remercie de l'aisance qu'il a trouué à desgosiller vn passant. Au pied de la maison, qu'ils vont escheller ou petarder, ils font leurs prieres, l'intention et l'esperance pleine de cruauté, de luxure, et d'auarice. Hoc ipsum, quo tu Iouis aurem impellere tentas, not to teach. And might one not also say, not without reason, that a rule forbidding anyone but those who make express profession of it to meddle with writing about religion, except very guardedly, would not lack some semblance of usefulness and justice—and that perhaps I too should keep quiet about it?

I have been told that even those who are not of our persuasion forbid among themselves the use of God's name in ordinary talk. They do not want it used as a kind of interjection or exclamation, nor to swear by, nor in comparisons; and in that I find they are right. In whatever way we call God into our dealings and company, it must be done seriously and religiously.

There is, I believe, a discussion in Xenophon in which he shows that we ought to pray to God more rarely, since it is not easy for us to bring our soul so often into that ordered, reformed and devout condition in which it must be to do so; otherwise our prayers are not only vain and useless, but vicious. "Forgive us," we say, "as we forgive those who have offended us." What do we mean by that, if not that we offer him our soul free of vengeance and rancor? And yet we call on God and his help in the conspiracy of our misdeeds, and invite him to injustice.

Things you could not ask of the gods unless you took them aside. The miser prays to him for the vain and superfluous preservation of his treasures; the ambitious man for his victories and the steering of his fortune. The thief enlists him to help get past the risks and difficulties that stand in the way of his wicked schemes, or thanks him for the ease with which he managed to cut a passerby's throat. At the foot of the house they are about to scale or blow open with a petard, they say their prayers, their intention and hope full of cruelty, lust and greed. This very prayer with which you try to win Jupiter's ear,
Come, say it to Staius. "O Jupiter, O good," he would cry,
"Jupiter!" And would Jupiter himself not cry out?[11] greatness has made him recognizable enough—who, going to a lovers' rendezvous to sleep with the wife of a Paris lawyer, had a way that led him through a church; and he never passed through that holy place, going to or coming back from his enterprise, without saying his prayers and orisons. I leave you to judge, with his soul full of that fine thought, what he was using divine favor for. Yet she cites this as evidence of singular devotion. But this is not the only proof one could give that women are hardly suited to handling matters of theology.[12]

A true prayer, a religious reconciliation of ourselves with God, cannot occur in a soul that is impure and subject, at that very moment, to the dominion of Satan. The man who calls God to his aid while he is in the course of vice is like a cutpurse who would call the law to his aid, or like those who bring forward God's name to witness a lie. In a silent whisper we frame / Our wicked vows. There are few men who would dare to bring into the open the secret requests they make to God.[13]

It is not for everyone to banish murmurs and low whispers
From the temples, and to live with vows spoken aloud. That is why the Pythagoreans wanted prayers to be public and heard by all, so that no one would ask God for anything indecent and unjust, like this man: When he has clearly said "Apollo!"
He moves his lips, afraid of being heard: "Fair Laverna, Grant me to deceive, grant me to seem just and holy;
Cast night over my sins and a cloud over my frauds."[14]

The gods punished Oedipus's iniquitous wishes grievously by granting them. He had prayed that his children should settle the succession to his state between themselves by arms, and he was wretched enough to see himself taken at his word. We should not ask that all things follow our will, but that they follow wisdom.

It seems, in truth, that we use our prayers like a jargon, and like those who employ holy and divine words for sorcery and magical effects; and that we reckon their effect depends on the texture, or sound, or sequence of the words, or on our bearing. For with our soul full of concupiscence, untouched by repentance or by any fresh reconciliation with God, we go and present him with the words that memory lends our tongue, and hope to get from them an expiation of our faults.

Nothing is so easy, so gentle and so favorable as the divine law. It calls us to itself, sinful and detestable as we are; it holds out its arms to us and takes us into its bosom, however vile, foul and muddy we may be now and may be in time to come. But in return we must at least look on it kindly; we must at least receive this pardon with thanksgiving; and, at least for the moment when we address ourselves to it, have a soul sorry for its faults and hostile to the passions that drove us to offend it. Few people die of old age, so Montaigne thinks we should start careers early; the mind reaches its prime by about twenty.

1.57.1 IE ne puis receuoir la façon, dequoy nous establissons la durée de nostre vie. Ie voy que les sages l'accoursissent bien fort au prix de la commune opinion. Comment, dit le ieune Caton, à ceux qui le vouloyent empescher de se tuer, suis-ie à cette heure en aage, où lon me puisse reprocher d'abandonner trop tost la vie? Si n'auoit-il que quarante et huict ans. Il estimoit cet aage là bien meur et bien auancé, considerant combien peu d'hommes y arriuent.

Et ceux qui s'entretiennent de ce que ie ne sçay quel cours qu'ils nomment naturel, promet quelques années au delà, ils le pourroient faire, s'ils auoient priuilege qui les exemptast d'vn si grand nombre d'accidens, ausquels chacun de nous est en bute par vne naturelle subiection, qui peuuent interrompre ce cours qu'ils se promettent. Quelle resuerie est-ce de s'attendre de mourir d'vne defaillance de forces, que l'extreme vieillesse apporte, et de se proposer ce but à nostre durée: veu que c'est l'espece de mort la plus rare de toutes, et la moins en vsage?

Nous l'appellons seule naturelle, comme si c'estoit contre nature, de voir vn homme se rompre le col d'vne cheute, s'estoufer d'vn naufrage, se laisser surprendre à la peste ou à vne pleuresie, et comme si nostre condition ordinaire ne nous presentoit à tous ces inconuenients. Ne nous flattons pas de ces beaux mots: on doit à l'auenture appeler plustost naturel, ce qui est general, commun, et vniuersel.

1.57.2 Mourir de vieillesse, c'est vne mort rare, singuliere et extraordinaire, et d'autant moins naturelle que les autres: c'est la derniere et extreme sorte de mourir: plus elle est esloignée de nous, d'autant est elle moins esperable: c'est bien la borne, au delà de laquelle nous n'irons pas, et que la loy de Nature a prescript, pour n'estre point outre-passée: mais c'est vn sien rare priuilege de nous faire durer iusques là. C'est vne exemption qu'elle donne par faueur particuliere, à vn seul, en l'espace de deux ou trois siecles, le deschargeant

I cannot accept the way we fix the length of our life. I see that the wise shorten it considerably compared with common opinion. "What!" said the younger Cato to those who wanted to stop him from killing himself, "am I now of an age where I can be reproached for leaving life too early?" Yet he was only forty-eight. He considered that age quite ripe and well advanced, seeing how few men reach it.

And those who comfort themselves with the thought that some course or other, which they call natural, promises them a few more years could do so if they had a privilege exempting them from the great number of accidents to which each of us is exposed by a natural subjection, and which can interrupt the course they promise themselves. What a fantasy it is to expect to die of the failing of strength that extreme old age brings, and to set that as the goal of our lifespan, when it is the rarest kind of death of all and the least common!

We call it the only natural one, as if it were against nature to see a man break his neck in a fall, drown in a shipwreck, or be caught by the plague or a pleurisy—and as if our ordinary condition did not expose us to all these mishaps. Let us not flatter ourselves with these fine words. We ought perhaps rather to call natural what is general, common and universal.

To die of old age is a rare, singular and extraordinary death, and so much less natural than the others. It is the last and extreme way of dying; the further it is from us, the less it is to be hoped for. It is indeed the boundary beyond which we shall not go, which the law of Nature has prescribed so that it shall not be overstepped; but it is a rare privilege of hers to make us last until then. It is an exemption she grants by special favor to one man alone in the space of two or three centuries, relievdes trauerses et difficultez qu'elle a ietté entre deux, en cette longue carriere. Par ainsi mon opinion est, de regarder que l'aage auquel nous sommes arriuez, c'est vn aage auquel peu de gens arriuent.

Puis que d'vn train ordinaire les hommes ne viennent pas iusques là, c'est signe que nous sommes bien auant. Et puis que nous auons passé les limites accoustumez, qui est la vraye mesure de nostre vie, nous ne deuons esperer d'aller guere outre. Ayant eschappé tant d'occasions de mourir, où nous voyons tresbucher le monde, nous deuons recognoistre qu'vne fortune extraordinaire, comme celle-là qui nous maintient, et hors de l'vsage commun, ne nous doibt guere durer.

1.57.3 C'est vn vice des loix mesmes, d'auoir cette fauce imagination: elles ne veulent pas qu'vn homme soit capable du maniement de ses biens, qu'il n'ait vingt et cinq ans, et à peine conseruera-il iusques lors le maniment de sa vie. Auguste retrancha cinq ans des anciennes ordonnances Romaines, et declara qu'il suffisoit à ceux qui prenoient charge de iudicature, d'auoir trente ans. Seruius Tullius dispensa les Cheualiers qui auoient passé quarante sept ans des coruées de la guerre: Auguste les remit à quarante et cinq. De renuoyer les hommes au seiour auant cinquante cinq ou soixante ans, il me semble n'y auoir pas grande apparence.

Ie serois d'aduis qu'on estendist nostre vacation et occupation autant qu'on pourroit, pour la commodité publique: mais ie trouue la faute en l'autre costé, de ne nous y embesongner pas assez tost. Cettuy-cy auoit esté iuge vniuersel du monde à dixneuf ans, et veut que pour iuger de la place d'vne goutiere on en ait trente.

1.57.4 Quant à moy i'estime que nos ames sont desnoüées à vingt ans, ce qu'elles doiuent estre, et qu'elles promettent tout ce qu'elles pourront. Iamais ame qui n'ait donné en cet aage là, arre bien euidente de sa force, n'en donna depuis la preuue. Les qualitez et vertus naturelles produisent dans ce terme là, ou iamais, ce qu'elles ont de vigoureux et de beau. Si l'espine nou picque quand nai, / A pene que pique iamai, disent-ils en Daulphiné.

1.57.5 De toutes les belles actions humaines, qui sont venues à ma cognoissance, de quelque sorte qu'elles soyent, ie penserois en auoir plus grande part, à nombrer celles qui ont esté produites et aux siecles anciens et au nostre, ing him of the obstacles and difficulties she has thrown in between along this long course. So my opinion is that we should consider the age we have reached as an age few people reach.

Since in the ordinary course men do not get that far, it is a sign that we are well along. And since we have passed the usual limits, which are the true measure of our life, we should not hope to go much further. Having escaped so many occasions of death, at which we see everyone stumble, we should recognize that an extraordinary fortune like the one that keeps us going, outside the common practice, is not likely to last us much longer.

It is a fault of the laws themselves to have this false notion. They do not want a man to be capable of managing his property until he is twenty-five, and he will hardly keep the management of his life until then. Augustus cut five years off the old Roman ordinances and declared that it was enough for those taking up judicial office to be thirty. Servius Tullius exempted knights who had passed forty-seven from the toils of war; Augustus brought it down to forty-five. To send men into retirement before fifty-five or sixty does not seem to me very reasonable.[1]

I would be in favor of extending our vocation and employment as far as possible, for the public good; but I find the fault lies on the other side, in not putting us to work soon enough. He himself had been judge of the whole world at nineteen, and he wants a man to be thirty before he can rule on where to put a gutter.

As for me, I consider that at twenty our souls are fully unfolded, as they are meant to be, and that they promise all they ever can. Never has a soul that did not give a very evident pledge of its strength at that age given proof of it afterward. Natural qualities and virtues show within that term, or never, whatever vigor and beauty they have. If the thorn does not prick when it is born, / It will hardly ever prick, they say in Dauphiné.

Of all the fine human actions that have come to my knowledge, of whatever kind, I think I would find that the greater number, in ancient times and in our own, were done before the age of thirty auant l'aage de trente ans, qu'apres. Ouy, en la vie de mesmes hommes souuent. Ne le puis-ie pas dire en toute seureté, de celles de Hannibal et de Scipion son grand aduersaire? La belle moitié de leur vie, ils la vescurent de la gloire acquise en leur ieunesse: grands hommes depuis au prix de touts autres, mais nullement au prix d'eux-mesmes. Quant à moy ie tien pour certain que depuis cet aage, et mon esprit et mon corps ont plus diminué, qu'augmenté, et plus reculé, qu'auancé.

Il est possible qu'à ceux qui employent bien le temps, la science, et l'experience croissent auec la vie: mais la viuacité, la promptitude, la fermeté, et autres parties bien plus nostres, plus importantes et essentielles, se fanissent et s'allanguissent. Vbi iam validis quassatum est viribus æui
Corpus, et obtusis ceciderunt viribus artus,
Claudicat ingenium, delirat linguáque ménsque.

1.57.6 Tantost c'est le corps qui se rend le premier à la vieillesse: par fois aussi c'est l'ame: et en ay assez veu, qui ont eu la ceruelle affoiblie, auant l'estomach et les iambes. Et d'autant que c'est vn mal peu sensible à qui le souffre, et d'vne obscure montre, d'autant est-il plus dangereux. Pour ce coup, ie me plains des loix, non pas dequoy elles nous laissent trop tard à la besogne, mais dequoy elles nous y employent trop tard. Il me semble que considerant la foiblesse de nostre vie, et à combien d'escueils ordinaires et naturels elle est exposée, on n'en deuroit pas faire si grande part à la naissance, à l'oisiueté et à l'apprentissage.

rather than after. Yes, and often in the lives of the very same men. May I not say so with complete assurance of those of Hannibal and of Scipio, his great adversary? They lived the better half of their lives on the glory won in their youth: great men afterward compared with all others, but not at all compared with themselves. As for me, I hold it certain that since that age both my mind and my body have diminished more than they have grown, and gone backward more than forward.

It is possible that for those who use their time well, knowledge and experience grow with life; but liveliness, quickness, firmness and other qualities much more our own, more important and essential, wither and languish. When the body has been shaken by the hard blows of time
And the limbs have given way, their strength blunted,
The mind limps, and tongue and wits wander.[2]

Sometimes it is the body that surrenders first to old age; sometimes too it is the mind. I have seen plenty of people whose brains were enfeebled before their stomach and legs. And since it is an ailment the sufferer hardly feels, and whose signs are obscure, it is all the more dangerous. This time my complaint against the laws is not that they leave us at work too late, but that they set us to work too late. It seems to me that, considering the frailty of our life and how many ordinary and natural reefs it is exposed to, we should not give so large a share of it to infancy, idleness and apprenticeship.

II.1 Of the Inconstancy of Our Actions

De l'inconstance de nos actions
Human conduct contradicts itself so constantly that Montaigne doubts anyone can be judged by a single action—or understood as a single self.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.1.1	CEVX qui s'exercent à contreroller les actions humaines, ne se trouuent en aucune partie si empeschez, qu'à les r'apiesser et mettre à mesme lustre: car elles se contredisent communément de si estrange façon, qu'il semble impossible qu'elles soient parties de mesme boutique. Le ieune Marius se trouue tantost fils de Mars, tantost fils de Venus. Le Pape Boniface huictiesme, entra, dit-on, en sa charge comme vn renard, s'y porta comme vn lion, et mourut comme vn chien.	Those who make it their business to scrutinize human actions are never so baffled as when they try to piece them together and show them in a single light; for they commonly contradict one another so strangely that it seems impossible they came out of the same shop. The younger Marius is now a son of Mars, now a son of Venus. Pope Boniface VIII, they say, entered his office like a fox, conducted himself in it like a lion, and died like a dog.[1]
	Et qui croiroit que ce fust Neron, cette vraye image de cruauté, comme on luy presentast à signer, suyuant le stile, la sentence d'vn criminel condamné, qui eust respondu: Pleust à Dieu que ie n'eusse iamais sceu escrire: tant le cœur luy serroit de condamner vn homme à mort? Tout est si plein de tels exemples, voire chacun en peut tant fournir à soy-mesme, que ie trouue estrange, de voir quelquefois des gens d'entendement, se mettre en peine d'assortir ces pieces: veu que l'irresolution me semble le plus commun et apparent vice de nostre nature; tesmoing ce fameux verset de Publius le farseur, Malum consilium est, quod mutari non potest.	And who would believe that it was Nero, that very image of cruelty, who, when the sentence of a condemned criminal was presented to him for signature in the usual form, replied, "Would to God I had never learned to write!"—so wrung was his heart at condemning a man to death? Everything is so full of such examples—indeed each of us can supply himself with so many—that I find it strange to see men of understanding sometimes taking pains to match up these pieces, since irresolution seems to me the most common and evident vice of our nature. Witness that famous line of Publius the farce writer: It is a bad plan that cannot be changed.[2]
2.1.2	Il y a quelque apparence de faire iugement d'vn homme, par les plus communs traicts de sa vie; mais veu la naturelle instabilité de nos mœurs et opinions, il m'a semblé souuent que les bons autheurs mesmes ont tort de s'opiniastrer à former de nous vne constante et solide contexture. Ils choisissent vn air vniuersel, et suyuant cette image, vont rangeant et interpretant toutes les actions d'vn personnage, et s'ils ne les peuuent assez tordre, les renuoyent à la dissimulation. Auguste leur est eschappé: car il se trouue en cet homme vne varieté d'actions si apparente, soudaine, et continuelle, tout le cours de sa vie, qu'il s'est faict lâcher entier et indecis, aux plus hardis iuges.	There is some sense in judging a man by the most ordinary features of his life; but given the natural instability of our ways and opinions, it has often seemed to me that even good authors are wrong to insist on fashioning a constant and solid fabric out of us. They pick a general character and, following that image, go about arranging and interpreting all of a person's actions; and if they cannot twist them enough, they put them down to dissimulation. Augustus has escaped them. For in that man there is so evident, sudden and continual a variety of actions throughout the whole course of his life that even the boldest judges have had to let him go, whole and undecided.

2.1.3 Ie croy des hommes plus mal aisément la constance que toute autre chose, et rien plus aisément que l'inconstance. Qui en iugeroit en detail et distinctement, piece à piece, rencontreroit plus souuent à dire vray. En toute l'ancienneté il est malaisé de choisir vne douzaine d'hommes, qui ayent dressé leur vie à vn certain et asseuré train, qui est le principal but de la sagesse. Car pour la comprendre tout en vn mot, dit vn ancien, et pour embrasser en vne toutes les regles de nostre vie, c'est vouloir, et ne vouloir pas tousiours mesme chose: Ie ne daignerois, dit-il, adiouster, pourueu que la volonté soit iuste: car si elle n'est iuste, il est impossible qu'elle soit tousiours vne.

Nothing is harder for me to believe of men than constancy, and nothing easier than inconstancy. Whoever judged them in detail and distinctly, piece by piece, would more often hit on the truth. In all antiquity it is hard to pick out a dozen men who set their lives to a definite and steady course, which is the principal aim of wisdom. For to sum it up in a word, says an ancient, and to embrace all the rules of our life in one, it is to will and not to will always the same thing. "I would not deign," he says, "to add 'provided the will is just'; for if it is not just, it cannot always be one."[3]

De vray, i'ay autrefois appris, que le vice, n'est que desreglement et faute de mesure; et par consequent, il est impossible d'y attacher la constance. C'est vn mot de Demosthenes, dit-on, que le commencement de toute vertu, c'est consultation et deliberation, et la fin et perfection, constance. Si par discours nous entreprenions certaine voye, nous la prendrions la plus belle, mais nul n'y a pensé, Quod petiit, spernit; repetit quod nuper omisit; / Æstuat, et vitæ disconuenit ordine toto.

Indeed, I once learned that vice is nothing but disorder and lack of measure, and consequently it is impossible to attach constancy to it. It is a saying of Demosthenes, they say, that the beginning of all virtue is consultation and deliberation, and its end and perfection constancy. If we set out on a definite path by reasoning, we would choose the finest; but no one has thought of it. What he sought he spurns; he seeks again what he just left; / He seethes, and his whole life is at odds with itself.[4]

2.1.4 Nostre façon ordinaire c'est d'aller apres les inclinations de nostre appetit, à gauche, à dextre, contremont, contrebas, selon que le vent des occasions nous emporte. Nous ne pensons ce que nous voulons, qu'à l'instant que nous le voulons: et changeons comme cet animal, qui prend la couleur du lieu, où on le couche. Ce que nous auons à cett'heure proposé, nous le changeons tantost, et tantost encore retournons sur nos pas: ce n'est que branle et inconstance: Ducimur vt neruis alienis mobile lignum. Nous n'allons pas, on nous emporte: comme les choses qui flottent, ores doucement, ores auecques violence, selon que l'eau est ireuse ou bonasse.

Our ordinary way is to follow the inclinations of our appetite, left and right, uphill and down, as the wind of circumstance carries us. We think about what we want only at the moment we want it, and we change like that animal which takes the color of the place where it is laid. What we resolved just now we soon change, and soon again we retrace our steps: it is nothing but wavering and inconstancy. We are led, like a wooden puppet, by strings that others pull. We do not go; we are carried along, like things that float, now gently, now violently, as the water is angry or calm.[5]

Nonne videmus
Quid sibi quisque velit nescire, et quærere semper;
Commutare locum, quasi onus deponere possit? Chaque iour nouuelle fantasie, et se meuuent nos humeurs auecques les mouuements du temps. Tales sunt hominum mentes, quali pater ipse
Iuppiter auctifero lustrauit lumine terras.

Do we not see
That each man does not know what he wants, and is always seeking,
Changing place, as if he could lay down his burden? Every day a new notion, and our temperaments shift with the shifts of the weather. Men's minds are like the fruitful light
With which father Jupiter himself has lit the earth.[6]

2.1.5	Nous flottons entre diuers aduis: nous ne voulons rien librement, rien absoluëment, rien constamment. A qui auroit prescript et estably certaines loix et certaine police en sa teste, nous verrions tout par tout en sa vie reluire vne equalité de mœurs, vn ordre, et vne relation infallible des vnes choses aux autres. (Empedocles remarquoit cette difformité aux Agrigentins, qu'ils s'abandonnoyent aux delices, comme s'ils auoyent l'endemain à mourir: et bastissoyent, comme si iamais ils ne deuoyent mourir.) Le discours en seroit bien aisé à faire. Comme il se voit du ieune Caton: qui en a touché vne marche, a tout touché: c'est vne harmonie de sons tres-accordans, qui ne se peut démentir. A nous au rebours, autant d'actions, autant faut-il de iugemens particuliers.	We float between different opinions: we will nothing freely, nothing absolutely, nothing constantly. In anyone who had prescribed and established definite laws and a definite order of government in his head, we would see an evenness of conduct shine out everywhere in his life, an order and an unfailing relation of one thing to another. (Empedocles noticed this inconsistency in the people of Agrigentum: they abandoned themselves to pleasures as if they were to die the next day, and built as if they were never to die.) It would be easy to give an account of such a man. You can see it in the younger Cato: touch one key of him and you have touched them all; he is a harmony of perfectly concordant sounds that cannot belie itself. With us, on the contrary, as many actions, so many separate judgments are needed.
	Le plus seur, à mon opinion, seroit de les rapporter aux circonstances voisines, sans entrer en plus longue recherche, et sans en conclurre autre consequence.	The surest thing, in my opinion, would be to relate them to the immediate circumstances, without going into any longer inquiry and without drawing any further conclusion from them.
2.1.6	Pendant les débauches de nostre pauure Estat, on me rapporta, qu'vne fille de bien pres de là où i'estoy, s'estoit precipitée du haut d'vne fenestre, pour éuiter la force d'vn belitre de soldat son hoste: elle ne s'estoit pas tuée à la cheute, et pour redoubler son entreprise, s'estoit voulu donner d'vn cousteau par la gorge, mais on l'en auoit empeschée: toutefois apres s'y estre bien fort blessée, elle mesme confessoit que le soldat ne l'auoit encore pressée que de requestes, sollicitations, et presens, mais qu'elle auoit eu peur, qu'en fin il en vinst à la contrainte: et là dessus les parolles, la contenance, et ce sang tesmoing de sa vertu, à la vraye façon d'vne autre Lucrece.	During the disorders of our poor country, I was told that a girl from very near where I was had thrown herself from a high window to escape being forced by a rascal of a soldier quartered in her house. The fall had not killed her, and to renew her attempt she had tried to cut her throat with a knife, but she had been prevented. Even so, after wounding herself quite badly, she admitted herself that the soldier had so far pressed her only with requests, entreaties and gifts, but that she had been afraid he would end by using force. And on top of that, the words, the bearing, and that blood bearing witness to her virtue, in the true manner of a second Lucretia.[7]
	Or i'ay sçeu à la verité, qu'auant et depuis ell'auoit esté garse de non si difficile composition. Comme dit le compte, tout beau et honneste que vous estes, quand vous aurez failly vostre pointe, n'en concluez pas incontinent vne chasteté inuiolable en vostre maistresse: ce n'est pas à dire que le muletier n'y trouue son heure.	Now I have learned for a fact that before and since she had been a girl not so hard to come to terms with. As the tale says: handsome and honorable as you may be, when you have failed in your pursuit, do not at once conclude that your mistress is of inviolable chastity; it does not follow that the muleteer will not find his moment.

Noticing after his cure that he went into action much more coolly, he asked him what had changed him so and made him a coward. "You yourself, sire," he replied, "by relieving me of the ills that made me hold my life of no account."[8]
2.1.8	Le soldat de Lucullus ayant esté déualisé par les ennemis, fit sur eux pour se reuencher vne belle entreprise: quand il se fut remplumé de sa perte, Lucullus l'ayant pris en bonne opinion, l'emploioit à quelque exploict hazardeux, par toutes les plus belles remonstrances, dequoy il se pouuoit aduiser: Verbis quæ timido quoque possent addere mentem; Employez y, respondit-il, quelque miserable soldat déualisé: Quantumuis rusticus: Ibit, / Ibit eò, quò vis, qui zonam perdidit, inquit; et refuse resoluëment d'y aller.	A soldier of Lucullus, having been robbed by the enemy, carried out a fine exploit against them to get his revenge. When he had recouped his loss, Lucullus, who had formed a good opinion of him, wanted to use him in some risky venture, with all the finest exhortations he could think of, With words that might have put heart even into a coward. "Use some wretched soldier who has been robbed," he replied—However rustic he was: "He will go, / He will go where you wish, the man who has lost his purse," he said—and he flatly refused to go.[9]
2.1.9	Quand nous lisons, que Mahomet ayant outrageusement rudoyé Chasan chef de ses Ianissaires, de ce qu'il voyoit sa troupe enfoncée par les Hongres, et luy se porter laschement au combat, Chasan alla pour toute response se ruer furieusement seul en l'estat qu'il estoit, les armes au poing, dans le premier corps des ennemis qui se presenta, où il fut soudain englouti: ce n'est à l'aduenture pas tant iustification, que raduisement: ny tant prouësse naturelle, qu'vn nouueau despit.	We read that Mehmed harshly abused Hasan, the commander of his Janissaries, because he saw his troop broken by the Hungarians and Hasan himself fighting like a coward; and that Hasan, by way of answer, went and hurled himself furiously, alone, just as he was, weapon in hand, into the first body of enemies that came before him, where he was at once swallowed up. This was perhaps not so much self-justification as a change of heart, nor so much natural prowess as fresh spite.[10]
	Celuy que vous vistes hier si auantureux, ne trouuez pas estrange de le voir aussi poltron le lendemain: ou la cholere, ou la necessité, ou la compagnie, ou le vin, ou le son d'vne trompette, luy auoit mis le cœur au ventre, ce n'est pas vn cœur ainsi formé par discours: ces circonstances le luy ont fermy: ce n'est pas merueille, si le voyla deuenu autre par autres circonstances contraires. Cette variation et contradiction qui se void en nous, si souple, a faict qu'aucuns nous songent deux ames, d'autres deux puissances, qui nous accompaignent et agitent chacune à sa mode, vers le bien l'vne, l'autre vers le mal: vne si brusque diuersité ne se pouuant bien assortir à vn subiet simple.	That man you saw so venturesome yesterday, do not find it strange to see him just as cowardly the next day. Anger, or necessity, or company, or wine, or the sound of a trumpet had put fire in his belly; it is not a heart formed in that way by reasoning. These circumstances stiffened it for him; it is no wonder if he has become someone else through other, contrary circumstances. This variation and contradiction that we see in ourselves, so supple, has led some to imagine that we have two souls, and others two powers that accompany us and drive us each in its own way, the one toward good, the other toward evil, since so abrupt a diversity cannot well be reconciled with a single subject.

mesme par l'instabilité de ma posture; et qui y regarde primement, ne se trouue guere deux fois en mesme estat. Ie donne à mon ame tantost vn visage, tantost vn autre, selon le costé où ie la couche. Si ie parle diuersement de moy, c'est que ie me regarde diuersement.

Toutes les contrarietez s'y trouuent, selon quelque tour, et en quelque façon: Honteux, insolent, chaste, luxurieux, bauard, taciturne, laborieux, delicat, ingenieux, hebeté, chagrin, debonnaire, menteur, veritable, sçauant, ignorant, et liberal et auare et prodigue: tout cela ie le vois en moy aucunement, selon que ie me vire: et quiconque s'estudie bien attentifuement, trouue en soy, voire et en son iugement mesme, cette volubilité et discordance. Ie n'ay rien à dire de moy, entierement, simplement, et solidement, sans confusion et sans meslange, ny en vn mot. Distinguo, est le plus vniuersel membre de ma Logique.

2.1.11 Encore que ie sois tousiours d'aduis de dire du bien le bien, et d'interpreter plustost en bonne part les choses qui le peuuent estre, si est-ce que l'estrangeté de nostre condition, porte que nous soyons souuent par le vice mesme poussez à bien faire, si le bien faire ne se iugeoit par la seule intention. Parquoy vn fait courageux ne doit pas conclurre vn homme vaillant: celuy qui le seroit bien à poinct, il le seroit tousiours, et à toutes occasions.

Si c'estoit vne habitude de vertu, et non vne saillie, elle rendroit vn homme pareillement resolu à tous accidens: tel seul, qu'en compagnie: tel en camp clos, qu'en vne bataille: car quoy qu'on die, il n'y a pas autre vaillance sur le paué et autre au camp. Aussi courageusement porteroit il vne maladie en son lict, qu'vne blessure au camp: et ne craindroit non plus la mort en sa maison qu'en vn assaut. Nous ne verrions pas vn mesme homme, donner dans la bresche d'vne braue asseurance, et se tourmenter apres, comme vne femme, de la perte d'vn procez ou d'vn fils.

the instability of my stance; and anyone who looks at himself closely will hardly find himself twice in the same state. I give my soul now one face, now another, depending on which side I lay it on. If I speak of myself in different ways, it is because I look at myself in different ways.

All the contradictions are found there, in some turn and in some fashion. Bashful, insolent; chaste, lustful; talkative, taciturn; hardworking, soft; ingenious, dull-witted; morose, good-natured; lying, truthful; learned, ignorant; and liberal, and miserly, and prodigal: all this I see in myself to some extent, according to how I turn. And anyone who studies himself really attentively finds in himself, yes, even in his very judgment, this volatility and discord. I have nothing to say about myself entirely, simply and solidly, without confusion and without mixture, or in one word. I distinguish is the most universal member of my logic.[11]

Though I am always for speaking well of what is good, and for taking in a good sense whatever can be so taken, still the strangeness of our condition is such that we are often driven to do good by vice itself—were it not that doing good is judged by intention alone. So one courageous deed should not lead us to conclude that a man is valiant. A man who was truly valiant would be so always and on every occasion.

If it were a habit of virtue and not a sudden sally, it would make a man equally resolute in every circumstance: the same alone as in company, the same in single combat as in a battle. For whatever people say, there is not one kind of valor in the street and another in the field. He would bear an illness in his bed as courageously as a wound in the field, and would fear death no more at home than in an assault. We would not see the same man charge into the breach with brave assurance and afterward torment himself, like a woman, over the loss of a lawsuit or a son.

When a man who is cowardly in the face of disgrace is steadfast in poverty; when a man who is soft before the barber's razor is unflinching before the swords of his adversaries, the action is praiseworthy, not the man. Many Greeks, says Cicero, cannot look the enemy in the face, and yet are steadfast in illness; the Cimbrians and Celtiberians quite the reverse. For nothing can be consistent that does not proceed from a fixed principle.

There is no valor more extreme of its kind than Alexander's; but it is so only of its kind, and is not full enough everywhere, or universal. Incomparable as it is, it still has its blemishes. That is why we see him so frantically distraught at the slightest suspicions he conceives of plots by his own people against his life, and conducting his investigation with such vehement and indiscriminate injustice, and with a fear that overturns his natural reason. The superstition with which he was so deeply tainted also bears some mark of faintheartedness. And the excess of his penitence for the murder of Clitus is further evidence of the unevenness of his courage.[12]

Our doings are nothing but patchwork, and we want to win honor under false colors. Virtue wants to be pursued only for its own sake; and if we sometimes borrow its mask for some other purpose, it soon snatches it from our face. It is a vivid, strong dye, once the soul is steeped in it, and it does not come out without taking the cloth with it.

That is why, to judge a man, we must follow his tracks long and carefully. If constancy does not hold there on its own foundation—a man whose way of life has been considered and planned in advance—if the variety of events makes him change his pace (I mean his path, for the pace may be quickened or slowed), let him run: that man goes down the wind, as the motto of our Talbot says.[13]

It is no wonder, says an ancient, that chance has so much power over us, since we live by chance. A man who has not directed his life as a whole toward a definite end cannot possibly arrange his particular actions. A man who does not have a shape of the whole in his head cannot possibly put the pieces in order. What use is a supply of colors to someone who does not know what he is to paint? No one makes a definite plan for his life; we deliberate about it only piecemeal. The archer must first know what he is aiming at, and then adjust his hand, his bow, the string, the arrow and his movements to it. Our counsels go astray because they have no direction and no aim.[14]

No wind serves the man who has no port in view. I do not agree with the judgment made in Sophocles' favor, declaring him competent to manage his household affairs, against his son's accusation, on the strength of having seen one of his tragedies. Nor do I find the inference of the Parians, sent to reform the Milesians, sufficient for the conclusion they drew from it. Touring the island, they noted the best-cultivated lands and the best-run country houses. Having recorded the names of their owners, they assembled the citizens in the town and named those owners as the new governors and magistrates, judging that men careful of their private affairs would be careful of public ones.[15]

We are all made of scraps, and of so shapeless and varied a texture that every piece, every moment, plays its own game. And there is as much difference between us and ourselves as between us and others.

Consider it a great thing to play the part of one single man. Ambition can teach men valor, and temperance, and liberality, and even justice. Greed can plant in the heart of a shop boy, brought up in the shade and in idleness, the confidence to cast himself so far from his home, at the mercy of the waves and of angry Neptune, in a frail boat; and it also teaches discretion and prudence. Venus herself supplies resolution and boldness to young people still under discipline and the rod, and arms the tender hearts of maidens in their mothers' laps: With her as guide, the girl, stealing past her sleeping guards, / Comes alone in the dark to the young man. Since all this is so, it is not the act of a settled understanding to judge us simply by our outward actions. We must probe right into the inside and see by what springs the motion is given.[16]

But since this is a hazardous and lofty undertaking, I would wish fewer people meddled with it.

II.2 Of Drunkenness

De l'yurongnerie
Montaigne denies that all vices are equal, finds drunkenness gross but less malicious than most, and weighs the case for drink.

FRENCH

2.2.1 LE monde n'est que varieté et dissemblance. Les vices sont tous pareils en ce qu'ils sont tous vices: et de cette façon l'entendent à l'aduenture les Stoiciens: mais encore qu'ils soyent également vices, ils ne sont pas égaux vices. Et que celuy qui a franchi de cent pas les limites, Quos vltra, citráque nequit consistere rectum, ne soit pas de pire condition, que celuy qui n'en est qu'à dix pas, il n'est pas croyable: et que le sacrilege ne soit pire que le larrecin d'vn chou de nostre iardin: Nec vincet ratio, tantumdem vt peccet, idémque,
Qui teneros caules alieni fregerit horti,
Et qui nocturnus diuûm sacra legerit.

2.2.2 Il y a autant en cela de diuersité qu'en aucune autre chose. La confusion de l'ordre et mesure des pechez, est dangereuse. Les meurtriers, les traistres, les tyrans, y ont trop d'acquest: ce n'est pas raison que leur conscience se soulage, sur ce que tel autre ou est oisif, ou est lascif, ou moins assidu à la deuotion. Chacun poise sur le peché de son compagnon, et esleue le sien. Les instructeurs mesmes les rangent souuent mal à mon gré. Comme Socrates disoit, que le principal office de la sagesse estoit, distinguer les biens et les maux.

Nous autres, à qui le meilleur est tousiours en vice, deuons dire de mesme de la science de distinguer les vices: sans laquelle, bien exacte, le vertueux et le meschant demeurent meslez et incognus.

2.2.3 Or l'yurongnerie entre les autres, me semble vn vice grossier et brutal. L'esprit a plus de part ailleurs: et il y a des vices, qui ont ie ne sçay quoy de genereux, s'il le faut ainsi dire. Il y en a où la science se mesle, la diligence, la vaillance, la prudence, l'addresse et la finesse: cestuy-cy

ENGLISH

The world is nothing but variety and dissimilarity. Vices are all alike in that they are all vices, and perhaps that is how the Stoics understand it; but though they are equally vices, they are not equal vices. That the man who has overstepped the limits by a hundred paces, Beyond and short of which right cannot stand, is in no worse condition than the one who is only ten paces past them is not believable; nor that sacrilege is no worse than stealing a cabbage from our garden: Nor will reason prove that the sin is the same and as great
For one who breaks off tender cabbages in another man's garden
And for one who steals by night the sacred objects of the gods.[1]

There is as much diversity in this as in anything else. Confusing the order and measure of sins is dangerous. Murderers, traitors and tyrants gain too much by it: it is not right that their conscience should be relieved because some other man is idle, or lascivious, or less assiduous in devotion. Each man bears down on his fellow's sin and makes light of his own. Even our teachers often rank them badly, to my mind. Socrates said that the chief office of wisdom was to distinguish good things from bad.

We others, in whom even the best is always tainted with vice, ought to say the same of the science of distinguishing vices; without it, and an exact one, the virtuous and the wicked remain mixed up and unrecognized.

Now drunkenness, among others, seems to me a gross and brutish vice. The mind has more share in the others; and there are vices that have something noble about them, if one may put it so. There are some in which knowledge plays a part, and diligence, valor, prudence, skill and cunning; this one is wholly bodily and earthly. And so the grossest nation of all those that exist today is the only one that holds it in esteem. Heaviness of the limbs follows; the legs stagger

The eyes swim; shouting, hiccups and quarrels grow.[2]

The worst state of man is when he loses knowledge and control of himself. Yet Augustus, having confided his most private affairs to Lucius Piso, the conqueror of Thrace, was never let down; nor was Tiberius by Cossus, onto whom he unloaded all his plans—though we know that both were so given to wine that they often had to be carried back from the Senate, the pair of them drunk: His veins swollen, as usual, with yesterday's wine. And the plan to kill Caesar was entrusted to Cimber as faithfully as to Cassius, a water drinker, though Cimber often got drunk; hence his witty reply: "Me, bear a tyrant—I who cannot bear my wine!" We see our Germans, drowned in wine, still remember their quarters, the password and their rank.[4]

Nor is victory easy over men who are soaked, / Stammering and staggering with wine.[5] tua depuis Philippus Roy de Macedoine (Roy portant par ses belles qualitez tesmoignage de la nourriture, qu'il auoit prinse en la maison et compagnie d'Epaminondas) il le fit tant boire, qu'il peust abandonner sa beauté, insensiblement, comme le corps d'vne putain buissonniere, aux muletiers et nombre d'abiects seruiteurs de sa maison.

Et ce que m'aprint vne dame que i'honnore et prise fort, que pres de Bordeaux, vers Castres, où est sa maison, vne femme de village, veufue, de chaste reputation, sentant des premiers ombrages de grossesse, disoit à ses voisines, qu'elle penseroit estre enceinte si ell'auoit vn mary. Mais du iour à la iournee, croissant l'occasion de ce soupçon, et en fin iusques à l'euidence, ell'en vint là, de faire declarer au prosne de son eglise, que qui seroit consent de ce faict, en l'aduoüant, elle promettoit de le luy pardonner, et s'il le trouuoit bon, de l'espouser.

2.2.6 Il est certain que l'antiquité n'a pas fort descrié ce vice: les escris mesmes de plusieurs Philosophes en parlent bien mollement: et iusques aux Stoïciens il y en a qui conseillent de se dispenser quelquefois à boire d'autant, et de s'enyurer pour relascher l'ame. Hoc quoque virtutum quondam certamine magnum nity to that Pausanias who later, over this very matter, killed Philip, King of Macedon (a king whose fine qualities bore witness to the upbringing he had received in the house and company of Epaminondas), invited him to supper. He made him drink so much that he was able to hand over his beauty, without his feeling a thing, like the body of a hedgerow prostitute, to the muleteers and a crowd of the lowly servants of his household.[6]

And there is what I was told by a lady whom I honor and esteem highly. Near Bordeaux, toward Castres, where her house is, a village woman, a widow of chaste reputation, feeling the first suspicions of pregnancy, told her neighbors that she would think she was with child if she had a husband. But as the grounds for this suspicion grew from day to day, and finally to the point of being evident, she went so far as to have it announced from the pulpit of her church that whoever had been party to this deed, if he owned up to it, she promised to forgive him, and, if he was willing, to marry him.[7]

One of her young farmhands, emboldened by this proclamation, declared that one feast day, when she had taken her wine very liberally, he had found her asleep by her hearth, so deeply and in so indecent a posture that he was able to make use of her without waking her. They are still living together as man and wife.

It is certain that antiquity did not much decry this vice. The writings even of several philosophers speak of it very mildly; and even among the Stoics there are some who advise allowing oneself now and then to drink deep and get drunk, to relax the soul. In this contest of virtues too, they say, the great Socrates once won the palm. That censor and corrector of others, Cato, was reproached for drinking hard. It is told that even old Cato's virtue
Was often warmed with wine. Cyrus, that much-renowned king, among his other claims to praise, cites as a reason for ranking himself above his brother Artaxerxes that he could hold his drink far better than he. And in the best-ordered and best-governed nations this trial of drinking deep was very much in use.[8]

6 Philip II of Macedon was assassinated by Pausanias in 336 BC; the story of Attalus' outrage is told by Diodorus Siculus.

	I'ay ouy dire à Siluius excellent medecin de Paris, que pour garder que les forces de nostre estomac ne s'apparessent, il est bon vne fois le mois, les esueiller par cet excez, et les picquer pour les garder de s'engourdir. Et escrit-on que les Perses apres le vin consultoient de leurs principaux affaires.	I have heard Sylvius, an excellent Paris physician, say that to keep the powers of our stomach from growing lazy, it is good once a month to rouse them by this excess, and to prod them to keep them from going numb. And it is written that the Persians deliberated on their chief affairs after wine.[9]
2.2.7	Mon goust et ma complexion est plus ennemie de ce vice, que mon discours. Car outre ce que ie captiue aysément mes creances soubs l'authorité des opinions anciennes, ie le trouue bien vn vice lasche et stupide, mais moins malicieux et dommageable que les autres, qui choquent quasi tous de plus droit fil la societé publique. Et si nous ne nous pouuons donner du plaisir, qu'il ne nous couste quelque chose, comme ils tiennent, ie trouue que ce vice couste moins à nostre conscience que les autres: outre ce qu'il n'est point de difficile apprest, ny malaisé à trouuer: consideration non mesprisable.	My taste and constitution are more hostile to this vice than my reasoning is. For besides the fact that I readily make my beliefs captive to the authority of ancient opinions, I do indeed find it a slack and stupid vice, but less malicious and harmful than the others, which nearly all strike more directly at public society. And if we cannot give ourselves pleasure without its costing us something, as they hold, I find that this vice costs our conscience less than the others; besides which it takes no trouble to prepare and is not hard to find—a consideration not to be despised.
	Vn homme auancé en dignité et en aage, entre trois principales commoditez, qu'il me disoit luy rester, en la vie, comptoit ceste-cy, et où les veut on trouuer plus iustement qu'entre les naturelles? Mais il la prenoit mal. La delicatesse y est à fuyr, et le soigneux triage du vin. Si vous fondez vostre volupté à le boire friand, vous vous obligez à la douleur de le boire autre. Il faut auoir le goust plus lasche et plus libre. Pour estre bon beuueur, il ne faut le palais si tendre. Les Allemans boiuent quasi esgalement de tout vin auec plaisir. Leur fin c'est l'aualler, plus que le gouster. Ils en ont bien meilleur marché. Leur volupté est bien plus plantureuse et plus en main.	A man advanced in rank and in age, among three principal comforts that he told me were left to him in life, counted this one; and where would one look for them more rightly than among the natural ones? But he went about it the wrong way. Fastidiousness is to be avoided here, and the careful choosing of wine. If you base your pleasure on drinking it choice, you condemn yourself to the pain of drinking it otherwise. You need a slacker and freer taste. To be a good drinker, you must not have so tender a palate. The Germans drink almost any wine with equal pleasure. Their aim is to swallow it rather than to taste it. They get a far better bargain. Their pleasure is much more plentiful and more ready to hand.
2.2.8	Secondement, boire à la Françoise à deux repas, et moderéement, c'est trop restreindre les faueurs de ce Dieu. Il y faut plus de temps et de constance. Les anciens franchissoyent des nuicts entieres à cet exercice, et y attachoyent souuent les iours. Et si faut dresser son ordinaire plus large et plus ferme. I'ay veu vn grand Seigneur de mon temps, personnage de hautes entreprinses, et fameux succez, qui sans effort, et au train de ses repas communs, ne beuuoit guere moins de cinq lots de vin: et ne se montroit au partir de là, que trop sage et aduisé aux despens de noz affaires. Le plaisir,	Secondly, to drink in the French fashion, at two meals and in moderation, is to restrict the favors of this god too much. More time and constancy are needed. The ancients spent whole nights at this exercise, and often tacked the days on to them. And so one must set one's ordinary allowance larger and steadier. I have seen a great lord of my time, a man of lofty enterprises and famous successes, who without effort, and in the course of his everyday meals, drank hardly less than five lots of

We ought, like shop boys and laborers, to refuse no occasion to drink, and always to have this desire in our heads. It seems that every day we cut down on the practice of it, and that in our houses, as I saw in my childhood, breakfasts, afternoon snacks and light suppers were more frequent and usual than now. Could it be that in some respect we are moving toward improvement? Truly not. But it may be that we have thrown ourselves much more into lechery than our fathers did. These are two occupations that hinder each other in their vigor. Lechery has weakened our stomach on the one hand; and on the other, sobriety serves to make us more dapper and more the ladies' man for the exercise of love.

Monstrueuse foy en ses paroles: et vne conscience et religion en general, penchant plustost vers la superstition que vers l'autre bout.	It is a marvel, the accounts I have heard my father give of the chastity of his age. He was the one to speak of it, being very well suited, both by skill and by nature, to the company of ladies. He spoke little and well, and mixed into his speech some ornament from books in the vernacular, especially Spanish ones; and among the Spanish, the one they call Marcus Aurelius was a constant companion of his. His bearing had a gentle gravity, humble and very modest. Singular care for the propriety and decency of his person and his clothes, whether on foot or on horseback. Prodigious faithfulness to his word; and a conscience and religion in general leaning rather toward superstition than toward the other extreme.[11]

2.2.10 Les incommoditez de la vieillesse, qui ont besoing de quelque appuy et refreschissement, pourroyent m'engendrer auecq raison desir de cette faculté: car c'est quasi le dernier plaisir que le cours des ans nous desrobe. La chaleur naturelle, disent les bons compaignons, se prent premierement aux pieds: celle là touche l'enfance. De-là elle monte à la moyenne region, où elle se plante long temps, et y produit, selon moy, les seuls vrais plaisirs de la vie corporelle. Les autres voluptez dorment au prix. Sur la fin, à la mode d'vne vapeur qui va montant et s'exhalant, ell'arriue au gosier, où elle fait sa derniere pose.

Ie ne puis pourtant entendre comment on vienne à allonger le plaisir de boire outre la soif, et se forger en l'imagination vn appetit artificiel, et contre nature. Mon estomach n'iroit pas iusques là: il est assez empesché à venir à bout de ce qu'il prend pour son besoing. Ma constitution est, ne faire cas du boire que pour la suitte du manger: et boy à cette cause le dernier coup tousiours le plus grand. soles, to make himself lighter for running and jumping. Of his leaping he has left the memory of little miracles. I have seen him past sixty make a mockery of our nimbleness: throw himself onto a horse in his furred gown, go around the table on his thumb, and hardly ever go up to his room without bounding three or four steps at a time.

On my subject, he said that in a whole province there was hardly one woman of quality who had a bad name. He would tell of strange intimacies, notably his own, with respectable women, without any suspicion whatever. And of himself he solemnly swore that he had come a virgin to his marriage—and this after having long taken part in the wars beyond the mountains, of which he left us a journal in his own hand, following point by point what happened there, both in public matters and in his private ones. And so he married well on in age, in the year 1528, which was his thirty-third, on his way home from Italy. Let us return to our bottles.

The discomforts of old age, which need some support and refreshment, might with reason breed in me a desire for this faculty; for it is almost the last pleasure that the course of the years steals from us. Natural heat, say the boon companions, takes hold first in the feet: that belongs to childhood. From there it climbs to the middle region, where it settles for a long time and produces there, in my opinion, the only true pleasures of bodily life. The other pleasures are asleep by comparison. Toward the end, like a vapor that keeps rising and evaporating, it reaches the throat, where it makes its last halt.

Yet I cannot understand how people come to prolong the pleasure of drinking beyond thirst, and to forge in their imagination an artificial appetite, against nature. My stomach would not go that far: it has trouble enough getting through what it takes for its needs. My constitution is to care for drink only as a sequel to eating; and for this reason I always make the last draught the biggest. And because in old age we bring a palate clogged with phlegm, or altered by some other bad condition, wine seems better to us in proportion as we have opened and washed our pores.

At least it hardly ever happens that I get the taste of it properly the first time. Anacharsis was aston-

2.2.11	Platon defend aux enfants de boire vin auant dixhuict ans, et auant quarante de s'enyurer. Mais à ceux qui ont passé les quarante, il pardonne de s'y plaire, et de mesler vn peu largement en leurs conuiues l'influence de Dionysus: ce bon Dieu, qui redonne aux hommes la gayeté, et la ieunesse aux vieillards, qui adoucit et amollit les passions de l'ame, comme le fer s'amollit par le feu, et en ses loix, trouue telles assemblées à boire (pourueu qu'il y aye vn chef de bande, à les contenir et regler) vtiles: l'yuresse estant vne bonne espreuue et certaine de la nature d'vn chascun: et quand et quand propre à donner aux personnes d'aage le courage de s'esbaudir en danses, et en la musique: choses vtiles, et qu'ils n'osent entreprendre en sens rassis.	Plato forbids children to drink wine before eighteen, and to get drunk before forty. But those who have passed forty he excuses for taking pleasure in it and for mixing rather liberally into their banquets the influence of Dionysus—that good god who gives back gaiety to men and youth to the old, who softens and mollifies the passions of the soul as iron is softened by fire. And in his Laws he finds such drinking gatherings useful (provided there is a leader of the company to restrain and regulate them): drunkenness being a good and sure test of each man's nature, and at the same time apt to give elderly people the courage to make merry in dancing and music—useful things, which they dare not undertake when sober.[12]

Pareille cause, mais non du propre dessein, suffoqua aussi les forces abbatuës par l'aage du Philosophe Arcesilaüs.	That wine is capable of providing temperance for the soul and health for the body. However, these restrictions, partly borrowed from the Carthaginians, please him: that it should be avoided on military expeditions; that every magistrate and every judge should abstain from it when about to carry out his office and to deliberate on public affairs; that the day, a time owed to other occupations, should not be given to it, nor the night set aside for making children. They say that the philosopher Stilpo, weighed down by old age, deliberately hastened his end by drinking unmixed wine. The same cause, though not by his own design, also stifled the strength of the philosopher Arcesilaus, already worn down by age.[13] par terre de sa propre foiblesse. De mille il n'en est pas vne qui soit droite et rassise vn instant de sa vie: et se pourroit mettre en doubte, si selon sa naturelle condition elle y peut iamais estre. Mais d'y ioindre la constance, c'est sa derniere perfection: ie dis quand rien ne la choqueroit: ce que mille accidens peuuent faire.

Lucrece, ce grand Poëte, a beau philosopher et se bander, le voyla rendu insensé par vn breuuage amoureux. Pensent ils qu'vne apoplexie n'estourdisse aussi bien Socrates, qu'vn portefaix? Les vns ont oublié leur nom mesme par la force d'vne maladie, et vne legere blessure a renuersé le iugement à d'autres. Tant sage qu'il voudra, mais en fin c'est vn homme: qu'est il plus caduque, plus miserable, et plus de neant? La sagesse ne force pas nos conditions naturelles.

Sudores itaque et pallorem existere toto
Corpore, et infringi linguam, vocémque aboriri,
Caligare oculos, sonere aures, succidere artus,
Denique concidere, ex animi terrore, videmus. Il faut qu'il sille les yeux au coup qui le menasse: il faut qu'il fremisse planté au bord d'vn precipice, comme vn enfant: Nature ayant voulu se reseruer ces legeres marques de son authorité, inexpugnables à nostre raison, et à la vertu Stoique: pour luy apprendre sa mortalité et nostre fadeze. Il pallit à la peur, il rougit à la honte, il gemit à la colique, sinon d'vne voix desesperée et esclatante, au moins d'vne voix cassée et enroüée.

Humani à se nihil alienum putet. Les Poëtes qui feignent tout à leur poste, n'osent pas descharger seulement des larmes, leurs heros: Sic fatur lacrymans, classique immittit habenas. Luy suffise de brider et moderer ses inclinations: car de les emporter, il n'est pas en luy. Cestuy mesme nostre Plutarque, si parfaict et excellent iuge des actions humaines, à voir Brutus et Torquatus tuer leurs enfans, est entré en doubte, si la vertu pouuoit donner iusques là: et si ces personnages n'auoyent pas esté plustost agitez par quelque autre passion. Toutes actions hors les bornes ordinaires sont subiectes à sinistre interpretation: d'autant que nostre goust n'aduient non plus à ce qui est au dessus de luy, qu'à ce qui est au dessous.

most perfect soul in the world has only too much to do to stay on its feet and keep from being thrown to the ground by its own weakness. Out of a thousand there is not one that is upright and settled for a single instant of its life; and it could be doubted whether, in its natural condition, it can ever be so. But to join constancy to that is its ultimate perfection—I mean if nothing were to jolt it, which a thousand accidents can do.

Lucretius, that great poet, may philosophize and brace himself all he likes: there he is, driven mad by a love potion. Do they think an apoplexy would not stun Socrates as well as a porter? Some have forgotten even their own name through the force of an illness, and a slight wound has overturned the judgment of others. Let him be as wise as he likes, in the end he is a man: what is there more frail, more wretched, more of a nothing? Wisdom does not overpower our natural conditions.

And so we see sweat and pallor break out over the whole Body, the tongue falter and the voice fail,
The eyes grow dim, the ears ring, the limbs give way,
And in short men collapse, from terror of the mind. He must blink at the blow that threatens him; he must shudder, set at the edge of a precipice, like a child. Nature has wished to reserve for herself these slight marks of her authority, impregnable to our reason and to Stoic virtue, to teach him his mortality and our foolishness. He turns pale with fear, he blushes with shame, he groans with colic—if not in a desperate and piercing voice, at least in a broken and hoarse one.[14]

Let him think nothing human foreign to him. The poets, who invent everything as they please, dare not relieve their heroes even of tears: So he speaks, weeping, and gives the fleet free rein. Let it suffice him to bridle and moderate his inclinations; for to do away with them is not in his power. Even our Plutarch, so perfect and excellent a judge of human actions, seeing Brutus and Torquatus kill their children, came to doubt whether virtue could reach that far, and whether these men had not rather been driven by some other passion. All actions beyond the ordinary bounds are open to sinister interpretation, since our taste no more reaches what is above it than what is below it.[15]

2.2.13	Laissons cette autre secte, faisant expresse profession de fierté. Mais quand en la secte mesme estimée la plus molle, nous oyons ces ventances de Metrodorus: Occupaui te, Fortuna, atque cepi; omnésque aditus tuos interclusi, vt ad me aspirare non posses. Quand Anaxarchus, par l'ordonnance de Nicocreon tyran de Cypre, couché dans vn vaisseau de pierre, et assommé à coups de mail de fer, ne cesse de dire, Frappez, rompez, ce n'est pas Anaxarchus: c'est son estuy que vous pilez. Quand nous oyons nos martyrs, crier au Tyran au milieu de la flamme, C'est assez rosti de ce costé là, hache le, mange le, il est cuit, recommence de l'autre.	Let us leave aside that other sect, which makes an express profession of haughtiness. But when, in the very sect considered the softest, we hear these boasts of Metrodorus: I have forestalled you, Fortune, and caught you; I have blocked all your approaches, so that you cannot reach me. When Anaxarchus, laid in a stone trough by order of Nicocreon, tyrant of Cyprus, and battered with blows of iron mallets, keeps on saying: "Strike, smash: this is not Anaxarchus; it is his casing you are pounding." When we hear our martyrs cry to the tyrant in the midst of the flames: "That side is roasted enough; chop it, eat it, it is cooked; start on the other."[16]
	Quand nous oyons en Iosephe cet enfant tout deschiré de tenailles mordantes, et persé des aleines d'Antiochus, le deffier encore, criant d'vne voix ferme et asseurée: Tyran, tu pers temps, me voicy tousiours à mon aise: où est cette douleur, où sont ces tourmens, dequoy tu me menassois? n'y sçais tu que cecy? ma constance te donne plus de peine, que ie n'en sens de ta cruauté: ô lasche belistre tu te rens, et ie me renforce: fay moy pleindre, fay moy flechir, fay moy rendre si tu peux: donne courage à tes satellites, et à tes bourreaux: les voyla defaillis de cœur, ils n'en peuuent plus: arme les, acharne les.	When we hear in Josephus of that child, all torn by biting pincers and pierced by the awls of Antiochus, still defying him and crying in a firm and assured voice: "Tyrant, you are wasting your time; here I am, still at my ease. Where is that pain, where are those torments you threatened me with? Is this all you know? My constancy gives you more trouble than I feel from your cruelty. O cowardly wretch, you are giving in, and I am growing stronger. Make me complain, make me bend, make me surrender if you can. Put heart into your henchmen and your executioners: look, they have lost heart, they can do no more. Arm them, set them on."[17]

When we come to these Stoic flights—"I would rather be mad than given to pleasure," a saying of Antisthenes: Better to be mad than to feel pleasure; when Sextius tells us that he would rather be run through by pain than by pleasure; when Epicurus undertakes to have himself coddled by gout, and, refusing rest and health, light-heartedly defies ills, and, scorning lesser pains and disdaining to wrestle and fight with them, calls for and longs for strong, piercing ones worthy of him: And among the timid flocks he prays that a foaming boar / Be granted him, or that a tawny lion come down from the mountain—who does not judge that these are the thrusts of a courage that has leapt out of its lair?[18]

2.2.15 Nostre ame ne sçauroit de son siege atteindre si haut: il faut qu'elle le quitte, et s'esleue, et prenant le frein aux dents, qu'elle emporte, et rauisse son homme, si loing, qu'apres il s'estonne luy-mesme de son faict. Comme aux exploicts de la guerre, la chaleur du combat pousse les soldats genereux souuent à franchir des pas si hazardeux, qu'estans reuenuz à eux, ils en transissent d'estonnement les premiers. Comme aussi les Poëtes sont épris souuent d'admiration de leurs propres ouurages, et ne reconnoissent plus la trace, par où ils ont passé vne si belle carriere. C'est ce qu'on appelle aussi en eux ardeur et manie.

Our soul could not reach so high from its own seat: it must leave it and rise, and, taking the bit between its teeth, carry off and sweep away its man so far that afterward he is himself astonished at what he has done. So, in feats of war, the heat of battle often drives brave soldiers to cross such hazardous passes that, once they come back to themselves, they are the first to freeze with astonishment at it. So too poets are often seized with admiration for their own works, and no longer recognize the track along which they ran so fine a course. This is what is also called, in them, ardor and mania.

Et comme Platon dict, que pour neant hurte à la porte de la poësie, vn homme rassis: aussi dit Aristote qu'aucune ame excellente, n'est exempte de meslange de folie. Et a raison d'appeller folie tout eslancement, tant loüable soit-il, qui surpasse nostre propre iugement et discours. D'autant que la sagesse est vn maniment reglé de nostre ame, et qu'elle conduit auec mesure et proportion, et s'en respond. Platon argumente ainsi, que la faculté de prophetizer est au dessus de nous: qu'il faut estre hors de nous, quand nous la traittons: il faut que nostre prudence soit offusquée ou par le sommeil, ou par quelque maladie, ou enleuée de sa place par vn rauissement celeste.

And as Plato says that a sober-minded man knocks in vain at the door of poetry, so Aristotle says that no excellent soul is free from an admixture of folly. And he is right to call folly any leap, however praiseworthy, that surpasses our own judgment and reasoning, inasmuch as wisdom is a regulated management of our soul, which it conducts with measure and proportion, and for which it answers. Plato argues thus: that the faculty of prophesying is above us; that we must be outside ourselves when we exercise it; our prudence must be clouded either by sleep or by some illness, or carried off from its place by a heavenly rapture.[19]

2.3.1	SI philosopher c'est douter, comme ils disent, à plus forte raison niaiser et fantastiquer, comme ie fais, doit estre doubter: car c'est aux apprentifs à enquerir et à debatre, et au cathedrant de resoudre. Mon cathedrant, c'est l'authorité de la volonté diuine qui nous regle sans contredit, et qui a son rang au dessus de ces humaines et vaines contestations.	IF to philosophize is to doubt, as they say, then all the more must trifling and indulging fancies, as I do, be doubting; for it is for apprentices to inquire and debate, and for the master in the chair to resolve. My master in the chair is the authority of the divine will, which governs us beyond dispute and holds its rank above these vain human contentions.
2.3.2	Philippus estant entré à main armée au Peloponese, quelcun disoit à Damidas, que les Lacedemoniens auroient beaucoup à souffrir, s'ils ne se remettoient en sa grace: Et poltron, respondit-il, que peuuent souffrir ceux qui ne craignent point la mort? On demandoit aussi à Agis, comment vn homme pourroit viure libre, Mesprisant, dit-il, le mourir.	When Philip had entered the Peloponnese in arms, someone was saying to Damidas that the Lacedaemonians would have much to suffer if they did not get back into his good graces. "Why, coward," he replied, "what can they suffer who do not fear death?" Someone also asked Agis how a man could live free. "By despising death," he said.
	Ces propositions et mille pareilles qui se rencontrent à ce propos, sonnent euidemment quelque chose au delà d'attendre patiemment la mort, quand elle nous vient: car il y a en la vie plusieurs accidens pires à souffrir que la mort mesme: tesmoing cet enfant Lacedemonien, pris par Antigonus, et vendu pour serf, lequel pressé par son maistre de s'employer à quelque seruice abiect, Tu verras, dit-il, qui tu as acheté, ce me seroit honte de seruir, ayant la liberté si à main: et ce disant, se precipita du haut de la maison. Antipater menassant asprement les Lacedemoniens, pour les renger à certaine sienne demande: Si tu nous menasses de pis que la mort, respondirent-ils, nous mourrons plus volontiers.	These propositions, and a thousand like them that one comes across on this subject, clearly ring of something beyond waiting patiently for death when it comes to us; for there are in life many accidents worse to endure than death itself. Witness that Lacedaemonian boy, captured by Antigonus and sold as a slave, who, being pressed by his master to take on some menial service, said: "You will see whom you have bought; it would be a shame for me to serve, with freedom so close at hand"; and so saying, he threw himself from the top of the house. When Antipater was harshly threatening the Lacedaemonians to bring them round to a certain demand of his, they replied: "If you threaten us with worse than death, we shall die all the more willingly."
	Et à Philippus leur ayant escrit, qu'il empescheroit toutes leurs entreprinses, Quoy? nous empescheras tu aussi de mourir?	And to Philip, who had written to them that he would thwart all their undertakings: "What? Will you also prevent us from dying?"
2.3.3	C'est ce qu'on dit, que le sage vit tant qu'il doit, non pas tant qu'il peut; et que le present que Nature nous ait faict le plus fauorable, et qui nous oste tout moyen de nous	This is what is meant by the saying that the wise man lives as long as he ought, not as long as he can; and that the most favorable gift Nature has pleindre de nostre condition, c'est de nous auoir laissé la clef des champs. Elle n'a ordonné qu'vne entrée à la vie, et cent mille yssuës. Nous pouuons auoir faute de terre pour y viure, mais de terre pour y mourir, nous n'en pouuons auoir faute, comme respondit Boiocatus aux Romains. Pourquoy te plains tu de ce monde? il ne te tient pas: si tu vis en peine, ta lascheté en est cause: A mourir il ne reste que le vouloir. Vbique mors est: optimè hoc cauit Deus.

/ Eripere vitam nemo non homini potest, / At nemo mortem: mille ad hanc aditus patent.

2.3.4 Et ce n'est pas la recepte à vne seule maladie, la mort est la recepte à tous maux. C'est vn port tresasseuré, qui n'est iamais à craindre, et souuent à rechercher: tout reuient à vn, que l'homme se donne sa fin, ou qu'il la souffre, qu'il coure au deuant de son iour, ou qu'il l'attende. D'où qu'il vienne c'est tousiours le sien. En quelque lieu que le filet se rompe, il y est tout, c'est le bout de la fusée. La plus volontaire mort, c'est la plus belle. La vie despend de la volonté d'autruy, la mort de la nostre. En aucune chose nous ne deuons tant nous accommoder à nos humeurs, qu'en celle-là.

La reputation ne touche pas vne telle entreprise, c'est folie d'en auoir respect. Le viure, c'est seruir, si la liberté de mourir en est à dire. Le commun train de la guerison se conduit aux despens de la vie: on nous incise, on nous cauterise, on nous detranche les membres, on nous soustrait l'aliment, et le sang: vn pas plus outre, nous voyla gueris tout à faict. Pourquoy n'est la veine du gosier autant à nostre commandement que la mediane? Aux plus fortes maladies les plus forts remedes. Seruius le Grammairien ayant la goutte, n'y trouua meilleur conseil, que de s'appliquer du poison à tuer ses iambes: qu'elles fussent podagres à leur poste, pourueu qu'elles fussent insensibles.

Dieu nous donne assez de congé, quand il nous met en tel estat, que le viure nous est pire que le mourir. C'est foiblesse de ceder aux maux, mais c'est folie de les nourrir. Les Stoiciens disent, que c'est viure conuenablement à Nature, pour le sage, de se departir de la vie, encore qu'il soit en plein heur, s'il le faict opportunément: et au fol de maintenir sa vie, encore qu'il given us, and the one that takes away all grounds for complaining of our condition, is to have left us the key to the fields. She has ordained only one entrance into life, and a hundred thousand exits. We may lack land to live on, but land to die in we cannot lack, as Boiocalus answered the Romans. Why do you complain of this world? It does not hold you: if you live in pain, your cowardice is the cause. To die, nothing is needed but the will. Death is everywhere: God has provided well for that.[1]

/ Anyone can take a man's life from him, / But no one his death: a thousand ways lie open to it.

And it is not the remedy for one illness only: death is the remedy for all ills. It is a very safe harbor, never to be feared and often to be sought. It all comes to the same, whether a man gives himself his end or suffers it, whether he runs ahead of his day or waits for it. Wherever it comes from, it is always his own. Wherever the thread breaks, that is all of it: it is the end of the spool. The most voluntary death is the finest. Life depends on the will of others; death on our own. In nothing should we accommodate ourselves to our own temperament so much as in that.

Reputation has no bearing on such an undertaking; it is folly to pay it any regard. Living is slavery if the freedom to die is lacking. The common course of healing is carried on at the expense of life: they cut into us, they cauterize us, they lop off our limbs, they withdraw our food and our blood; one step further, and there we are, cured altogether. Why is the vein in our throat not as much at our command as the median vein? For the strongest diseases, the strongest remedies. Servius the grammarian, having gout, found no better counsel than to apply poison to kill his legs: let them be gouty as they pleased, so long as they felt nothing.[2]

God gives us leave enough when he puts us in such a state that living is worse for us than dying. It is weakness to give way to ills, but folly to nourish them. The Stoics say that it is living in accordance with Nature for the wise man to depart from life, even when he is in full happiness, if he does it at

Just as I do not break the laws made against thieves when I carry off my own property and cut my own purse, nor those against arsonists when I burn my own wood, so I am not answerable to the laws made against murderers for having taken my own life. Hegesias said that as the condition of life, so the condition of death should depend on our choice. And Diogenes, meeting the philosopher Speusippus, who was afflicted with a long dropsy and was having himself carried in a litter, was hailed by him: "Good health, Diogenes!" "None to you," he replied, "who put up with living in such a state." And indeed, some time later Speusippus had himself put to death, worn down by so painful a condition of life.

THE CASE AGAINST SUICIDE

2.3.5	Mais cecy ne s'en va pas sans contraste. Car plusieurs tiennent, que nous ne pouuons abandonner cette garnison du monde, sans le commandement expres de celuy, qui nous y a mis; et que c'est à Dieu, qui nous a icy enuoyez, non pour nous seulement, ains pour sa gloire et seruice d'autruy, de nous donner congé, quand il luy plaira, non à nous de le prendre: que nous ne sommes pas nays pour nous, ains aussi pour nostre païs: les loix nous redemandent compte de nous, pour leur interest, et ont action d'homicide contre nous. Autrement comme deserteurs de nostre charge, nous sommes punis en l'autre monde, Proxima deinde tenent mœsti loca, qui sibi lethum Insontes peperere manu, lucémque perosi Proiecere animas.	But this does not go unchallenged. For many hold that we cannot abandon this garrison of the world without the express command of him who placed us in it; and that it is for God, who sent us here not for ourselves alone but for his glory and the service of others, to give us leave when it pleases him, not for us to take it; that we are not born for ourselves, but also for our country. The laws call us to account for ourselves, in their own interest, and have an action for homicide against us. Otherwise, as deserters from our post, we are punished in the other world: Next, those sad ones hold the nearest places who, guiltless, Brought death on themselves by their own hand, and, hating the light, Flung away their lives.[3]

It is the part of cowardice, not of virtue, to go and crouch in a hole, under a massive tomb, to avoid the blows of Fortune. Virtue does not break off its road and its course, whatever storm may blow: Should the world break and fall upon him, The ruins will strike him unafraid. Most commonly, it is flight from other troubles that drives us to this one. Indeed, sometimes flight from death makes us run to it: Is it not madness, I ask, to die so as not to die? Like those who for fear of the precipice throw themselves over it. The very fear of evil to come has sent many Into the gravest dangers: the bravest man is he Who is ready to suffer what is to be feared, if it presses close, And yet can put it off.[6] ours; but it is against Nature that we despise ourselves and hold ourselves of no account. It is a peculiar malady, and one not seen in any other creature, to hate and disdain oneself.

It is from a like vanity that we desire to be something other than what we are. The fruit of such a desire does not reach us, inasmuch as it contradicts and obstructs itself: he who desires to be turned from a man into an angel does nothing for himself. He would be none the better for it; for, being no more, who will rejoice in this improvement and feel it on his behalf? For he to whom misery and suffering are to come
Must himself also exist at that time, when ill Can befall him. Security, freedom from pain, impassivity, the absence of the ills of this life, which we buy at the price of death, bring us no benefit.

In vain does he avoid war who cannot enjoy peace; and in vain does he flee toil who has nothing with which to savor rest.

Among those of the first opinion there has been great doubt as to what occasions are just enough to make a man take this course of killing himself. They call it a well-reasoned departure. For although they say that we must often die for slight causes, since those that keep us alive are hardly strong, still some measure is needed. There are fanciful and unreasoning moods that have driven not only individual men but whole peoples to do away with themselves.[8]

I have cited examples of this earlier; and we read besides of the maidens of Miletus that, by a frenzied conspiracy, they hanged themselves one after another, until the magistrate took measures, ordering that any found hanged in this way should be dragged naked through the town by the same rope.

Therycion urged Cleomenes to kill himself because of the bad state of his affairs: having escaped the more honorable death in the battle he had just lost, he should accept this other one, which is second to it in honor, and not give the victor the leisure to make him suffer either a shameful death or a shameful life. Cleomenes, with Lacedaemonian and Stoic courage, rejected this advice as cowardly and spineless. "It is a remedy," he Threicion se creut dés lors, et se tua. Cleomenes en fit aussi autant depuis, mais ce fut apres auoir essaié le dernier point de la Fortune.	Therycion took his own advice then and there, and killed himself. Cleomenes did the same later, but only after having tried Fortune to the very last.

2.3.11	Tous les inconueniens ne valent pas qu'on vueille mourir pour les euiter. Et puis y ayant tant de soudains changemens aux choses humaines, il est malaisé à iuger, à quel poinct nous sommes iustement au bout de nostre esperance: Sperat et in sæua victus gladiator arena, / Sit licet infesto pollice turba minax.	Not all troubles are worth wanting to die to escape them. And then, since there are so many sudden changes in human affairs, it is hard to judge at what point we have truly come to the end of our hope: The beaten gladiator in the cruel arena still hopes, / Though the crowd threatens him with hostile thumb.[10]
2.3.12	Toutes choses, disoit vn mot ancien, sont esperables à vn homme pendant qu'il vit. Ouy mais, respond Seneca, pourquoy auray-ie plustost en la teste cela, que la Fortune peut toutes choses pour celuy qui est viuant; que cecy, que Fortune ne peut rien sur celuy qui sçait mourir? On voit Iosephe engagé en vn si apparent danger et si prochain, tout vn peuple s'estant esleué contre luy, que par discours il n'y pouuoit auoir aucune resource: toutefois estant, comme il dit, conseillé sur ce point, par vn de ses amis de se deffaire, bien luy seruit de s'opiniastrer encore en l'esperance: car la Fortune contourna outre toute raison humaine cet accident, si qu'il s'en veid deliuré sans aucun inconuenient.	"All things," said an ancient saying, "are to be hoped for by a man while he lives." "Yes, but," replies Seneca, "why should I keep in mind this, that Fortune can do all things for the living, rather than that, that Fortune can do nothing against one who knows how to die?" We see Josephus caught in a danger so evident and so imminent, a whole people having risen against him, that by reasoning there could be no way out. Nevertheless, when, as he says, one of his friends advised him on this point to do away with himself, it served him well to persist in hope; for Fortune turned this accident around beyond all human reason, so that he found himself delivered from it without any harm.
	Et Cassius et Brutus au contraire, acheuerent de perdre les reliques de la Romaine liberté, de laquelle ils estoient protecteurs, par la precipitation et temerité, dequoy ils se tuerent auant le temps et l'occasion. A la iournée de Serisolles Monsieur d'Anguien essaïa deux fois de se donner de l'espée dans la gorge, desesperé de la fortune du combat, qui se porta mal en l'endroit où il estoit: et cuida par precipitation se priuer de la iouyssance d'vne si belle victoire. I'ay veu cent lieures se sauuer sous les dents des leuriers: Aliquis carnifici suo superstes fuit. Multa dies variúsque labor mutabilis æui Rettulit in melius; multos alterna reuisens Lusit, et in solido rursus fortuna locauit.	And Cassius and Brutus, on the contrary, completed the ruin of the last remnants of Roman liberty, of which they were the protectors, by the haste and rashness with which they killed themselves before the time and occasion. At the battle of Ceresole, Monsieur d'Enghien twice tried to stab himself in the throat with his sword, despairing of the outcome of the fight, which was going badly where he was; and by his haste he nearly deprived himself of the enjoyment of so fine a victory. I have seen a hundred hares escape from right under the greyhounds' teeth: Many a man has outlived his executioner. Time and the shifting toil of changing ages

EXAMPLES OF VOLUNTARY DEATH

2.3.13	Pline dit qu'il n'y a que trois sortes de maladie, pour lesquelles euiter on aye droit de se tuer. La plus aspre de toutes, c'est la pierre à la vessie, quand l'vrine en est retenuë. Seneque, celles seulement, qui esbranlent pour long temps les offices de l'ame. Pour euiter vne pire mort, il y en a qui sont d'aduis de la prendre à leur poste. Damocritus chef des Ætoliens mené prisonnier à Rome, trouua moyen de nuict d'eschapper. Mais suiuy par ses gardes, auant que se laisser reprendre, il se donna de l'espee au trauers le corps. Antinoüs et Theodotus, leur ville d'Epire reduitte à l'extremité par les Romains, furent d'aduis au peuple de se tuer tous.	Pliny says there are only three kinds of illness to escape which one has the right to kill oneself; the harshest of all is the stone in the bladder, when the urine is blocked by it. Seneca says only those that unsettle the functions of the soul for a long time. To avoid a worse death, some are of the opinion that one should take it at one's own choosing. Damocritus, chief of the Aetolians, brought as a prisoner to Rome, found a way to escape by night. But, pursued by his guards, rather than let himself be recaptured, he ran his sword through his body. Antinous and Theodotus, when their city in Epirus had been reduced to extremity by the Romans, advised the people to kill themselves, all of them.
	Mais le conseil de se rendre plustost, ayant gaigné, ils allerent chercher la mort, se ruants sur les ennemis, en intention de frapper, non de se couurir. L'isle de Goze forcée par les Turcs, il y a quelques années, vn Sicilien qui auoit deux belles filles prestes à marier, les tua de sa main, et leur mere apres, qui accourut à leur mort. Cela faict, sortant en ruë auec vne arbaleste et vne arquebouze, de deux coups il en tua les deux premiers Turcs, qui s'approcherent de sa porte: et puis mettant l'espée au poing, s'alla mesler furieusement, où il fut soudain enuelopé et mis en pieces: se sauuant ainsi du seruage, apres en auoir deliuré les siens.	But when the advice to surrender instead won the day, they went to seek death, hurling themselves on the enemy with the intention of striking, not of protecting themselves. When the island of Gozo was taken by the Turks a few years ago, a Sicilian who had two beautiful daughters of marriageable age killed them with his own hand, and afterward their mother, who came running at their death. That done, he went out into the street with a crossbow and an arquebus and with two shots killed the first two Turks who came near his door; and then, sword in hand, he flung himself furiously into the fray, where he was at once surrounded and cut to pieces—thus saving himself from slavery after having delivered his family from it.[12]
	Les femmes Iuifues apres auoir faict circoncire leurs enfans, s'alloient precipiter quant et eux, fuyant la cruauté d'Antiochus. Scribonia conseillant Libo son nepueu de se tuer, plustost que d'attendre la main de la Iustice, luy disoit que c'estoit proprement faire l'affaire d'autruy que de conseruer sa vie, pour la remettre entre les mains de ceux qui la viendroient chercher trois ou quatre iours apres; et que c'estoit seruir ses ennemis, de garder son sang pour leur en faire curée.

2.3.14 Il se lict dans la Bible, que Nicanor persecuteur de la Loy de Dieu, ayant enuoyé ses satellites pour saisir le bon vieillard Rasias, surnommé pour l'honneur de sa vertu, le Pere aux Iuifs, comme ce bon homme n'y veist plus d'ordre, sa porte bruslée, ses ennemis prests à le saisir, choisissant de mourir genereusement, plustost que de venir entre les mains des meschans, et de se laisser mastiner contre l'honneur de son rang, qu'il se frappa de son espée: mais le coup pour la haste, n'ayant pas esté bien assené, il courut se precipiter du haut d'vn mur, au trauers de la trouppe, laquelle s'escartant et luy faisant place, il cheut droictement sur la teste.

Ce neantmoins se sentant encore quelque reste de vie, il ralluma son courage, et s'esleuant en pieds, tout ensanglanté et chargé de coups, et fauçant la presse donna iusques à certain rocher couppé et precipiteux, où n'en pouuant plus, il print par l'vne de ses playes à deux mains ses entrailles, les deschirant et froissant, et les ietta à trauers les poursuiuans, appellant sur eux et attestant la vengeance diuine.

2.3.15 Des violences qui se font à la conscience, la plus à euiter à mon aduis, c'est celle qui se faict à la chasteté des femmes; d'autant qu'il y a quelque plaisir corporel, naturellement meslé parmy: et à cette cause, le dissentement n'y peut estre assez entier; et semble que la force soit meslée à quelque volonté. L'histoire Ecclesiastique a en reuerence plusieurs tels exemples de personnes deuotes qui appelerent la mort à garant contre les outrages que les tyrans preparoient à leur religion et conscience. ance was to commend himself to such-and-such a saint, with such-and-such vows, and to go eight days without taking any food, whatever faintness and weakness he felt. He believed him, and by this means, without thinking of it, rid himself of his life and of the danger.

Scribonia, advising her nephew Libo to kill himself rather than await the hand of justice, told him that to preserve his life only to hand it over to those who would come looking for it three or four days later was really doing someone else's business; and that to keep his blood only to throw it to his enemies as their quarry was to serve them.[13]

We read in the Bible that Nicanor, persecutor of the law of God, sent his henchmen to seize the good old man Razis, who was called, in honor of his virtue, the Father of the Jews. When this good man saw no other way out, his door burned, his enemies ready to seize him, he chose to die nobly rather than fall into the hands of the wicked and let himself be mauled against the honor of his rank, and he struck himself with his sword. But the blow, in his haste, was badly aimed, so he ran and threw himself from the top of a wall into the midst of the troop; and as they scattered and made way for him, he fell straight on his head.[14]

Nevertheless, feeling some remnant of life still in him, he rekindled his courage and, rising to his feet, all covered in blood and wounds, he broke through the crowd and reached a certain steep, sheer rock. There, at the end of his strength, he seized his entrails with both hands through one of his wounds, tearing and crushing them, and threw them at his pursuers, calling down divine vengeance upon them and calling it to witness.

Of the violences done to conscience, the one most to be avoided, in my opinion, is that done to the chastity of women, inasmuch as some bodily pleasure is naturally mixed in with it; and for that reason the refusal cannot be complete enough, and it seems that the force is mixed with some willingness. Ecclesiastical history holds in reverence many such examples of devout persons who called on death to protect them from the outrages tyrants were preparing against their religion and

And then, having ordered a great pyre to be lit and the women, children, concubines and servants to have their throats cut, he put them in the fire, and then himself.[18]
2.3.18	Ninachetuen seigneur Indois, ayant senty le premier vent de la deliberation du vice-Roy Portugais, de le deposseder, sans aucune cause apparante, de la charge qu'il auoit en Malaca, pour la donner au Roy de Campar: print à part soy, cette resolution. Il fit dresser vn eschaffault plus long que large, appuyé sur des colomnes, royallement tapissé, et orné de fleurs, et de parfuns en abondance. Et puis, s'estant vestu d'vne robbe de drap d'or chargée de quantité de pierreries de hault prix, sortit en ruë: et par des degrez monta sur l'eschaffault en vn coing duquel il y auoit vn bucher de bois aromatiques allumé. Le monde accourut voir, à quelle fin ces preparatifs inaccoustumés.	Ninachetuen, an Indian lord, having caught the first wind of the Portuguese viceroy's plan to strip him, without any apparent cause, of the office he held in Malacca, in order to give it to the King of Campar, came to this resolution on his own. He had a scaffold built, longer than it was wide, supported on columns, royally hung with tapestries and adorned with flowers and perfumes in abundance. Then, having dressed in a robe of cloth of gold loaded with a quantity of precious stones of great price, he went out into the street and climbed the steps up onto the scaffold, in one corner of which a pyre of aromatic wood had been lit. People came running to see what these unaccustomed preparations were for.[19]
	Ninachetuen remontra d'vn visage hardy et mal contant, l'obligation que la nation Portugaloise luy auoit: combien fidelement il auoit versé en sa charge: qu'ayant si souuent tesmoigné pour autruy, les armes à la main, que l'honneur luy estoit de beaucoup plus cher que la vie, il n'estoit pas pour en abandonner le soing pour soy mesme: que Fortune luy refusant tout moyen de s'opposer à l'iniure qu'on luy vouloit faire, son courage au moins luy ordonnoit de s'en oster le sentiment: et de ne seruir de fable au peuple, et de triomphe, à des personnes qui valoient moins que luy. Ce disant il se iecta dans le feu.	Ninachetuen, with a bold and angry face, set forth what the Portuguese nation owed him and how faithfully he had conducted himself in his office: having so often shown for others, weapons in hand, that honor was far dearer to him than life, he was not going to neglect it for himself; since Fortune denied him any means of resisting the injury they meant to do him, his courage at least commanded him to rid himself of the feeling of it, and not to become a tale for the people and a triumph for persons worth less than he. So saying, he threw himself into the fire.
2.3.19	Sextilia femme de Scaurus, et Paxea femme de Labeo, pour encourager leurs maris à euiter les dangers, qui les pressoient, ausquels elles n'auoyent part, que par l'interest de l'affection coniugale, engagerent volontairement la vie pour leur seruir en cette extreme necessité, d'exemple et de compagnie. Ce qu'elles firent pour leurs maris, Cocceius Nerua le fit pour sa patrie, moins vtilement, mais de pareil amour. Ce grand Iurisconsulte, fleurissant en santé, en richesses, en reputation, en credit, pres de l'Empereur, n'eut autre cause de se tuer, que la compassion du miserable estat de la chose publique Romaine. Il ne se peut rien adiouster à	Sextilia, the wife of Scaurus, and Paxaea, the wife of Labeo, wanted to encourage their husbands to escape the dangers pressing on them. The women had no share in those dangers except through the bond of married love, yet they willingly laid down their lives, to serve their husbands in that extreme necessity as example and as company. What they did for their husbands, Cocceius Nerva did for his country, less usefully but with equal love. This great jurist was flourishing in health, wealth, reputation and standing with the Emperor, and he had no other reason to kill himself than pity for la delicatesse de la mort de la femme de Fuluius, familier d'Auguste.

Auguste ayant descouuert, qu'il auoit esuenté vn secret important qu'il luy auoit fié: vn matin qu'il le vint voir, luy en fit vne maigre mine. Il s'en retourne au logis plain de desespoir, et dict tout piteusement à sa femme, qu'estant tombé en ce malheur, il estoit resolu de se tuer. Elle tout franchement, Tu ne feras que raison, veu qu'ayant assez souuent experimenté l'incontinance de ma langue, tu ne t'en és point donné de garde. Mais laisse, que ie me tue la premiere: et sans autrement marchander, se donna d'vne espée dans le corps.

Les ennemis les en auroient en honneur, et Hannibal sentiroit de combien fideles amis il auroit abandonnés.

the wretched state of the Roman commonwealth. Nothing could be more delicate than the death of the wife of Fulvius, an intimate of Augustus.[20]

Augustus discovered that Fulvius had let out an important secret he had confided to him, and one morning when Fulvius came to see him, he gave him a cold look. Fulvius goes back home full of despair and tells his wife, most piteously, that since he had fallen into this misfortune he was resolved to kill himself. She answered quite frankly: "You will only be doing what is right, since you have often enough experienced how loose my tongue is, and yet you did not guard against it. But let me kill myself first." And without further haggling she ran a sword into her body.[21]

Vibius Virius despaired both of saving his city, which the Romans were besieging, and of their mercy. At the last deliberation of their senate, after many speeches had been made to that end, he concluded that the finest course was to escape Fortune by their own hands. The enemy would honor them for it, and Hannibal would feel how faithful were the friends he had abandoned.[22]

He invited those who approved his advice to come and eat a good supper that had been prepared at his house. There, after a good feast, they would drink together whatever would be brought to him: "a drink that will deliver our bodies from torments, our souls from insults, our eyes and ears from witnessing all the vile evils that the vanquished must suffer from victors who are utterly cruel and have been offended. I have arranged," he said, "for there to be suitable people to throw us onto a pyre in front of my door once we have breathed our last." Plenty approved this lofty resolution; few imitated it.

Twenty-seven senators followed him. After trying to drown that grim thought in wine, they ended their meal with that deadly dish. They embraced one another, after lamenting together the misfortune of their country; then some went home, while others stayed to be buried with Vibius in his fire. And all of them had so long a death, since the fumes of the wine had filled their veins and

2.3.21	Taurea Iubellius, vn autre citoyen de là, le Consul Fuluius retournant de cette honteuse boucherie qu'il auoit faicte de deux cents vingtcinq Senateurs, le rappella fierement par son nom, et l'ayant arresté: Commande, fit-il, qu'on me massacre aussi apres tant d'autres, afin que tu te puisses vanter d'auoir tué vn beaucoup plus vaillant homme que toy.	Taurea Jubellius, another citizen of that place, saw the consul Fulvius returning from the shameful butchery he had made of two hundred and twenty-five senators. He called him back proudly by name and, having stopped him, said: "Order them to slaughter me too, after so many others, so that you can boast of having killed a much braver man than yourself."[23]
	Fuluius le desdaignant, comme insensé: aussi que sur l'heure il venoit de receuoir lettres de Rome contraires à l'inhumanité de son execution, qui luy lioient les mains: Iubellius continua: Puis que mon païs prins, mes amis morts, et ayant occis de ma main ma femme et mes enfants, pour les soustraire à la desolation de cette ruine, il m'est interdict de mourir de la mort de mes concitoyens: empruntons de la vertu la vengeance de cette vie odieuse. Et tirant vn glaiue, qu'il auoit caché, s'en donna au trauers la poictrine, tumbant renuersé, mourant aux pieds du Consul.	Fulvius disdained him as a madman; besides, he had just that moment received letters from Rome condemning the inhumanity of his executions, which tied his hands. Jubellius went on: "My country is taken, my friends are dead, and I have slain my wife and children with my own hand to spare them the desolation of this ruin. Since I am forbidden to die the death of my fellow citizens, let us take from courage our revenge on this hateful life." And drawing a blade he had hidden, he drove it through his chest and fell backward, dying at the consul's feet.
2.3.22	Alexandre assiegeoit vne ville aux Indes, ceux de dedans se trouuans pressez, se resolurent vigoureusement à le priuer du plaisir de cette victoire, et s'embraiserent vniuersellement tous, quand et leur ville, en despit de son humanité. Nouuelle guerre, les ennemis combattoient pour les sauuer, eux pour se perdre, et faisoient pour garentir leur mort, toutes les choses qu'on fait pour garentir sa vie.	Alexander was besieging a city in India. Those inside, finding themselves hard pressed, resolved vigorously to deprive him of the pleasure of this victory, and set themselves on fire, every one of them, together with their city, in defiance of his humanity. A new kind of war: the enemy fought to save them, they fought to destroy themselves, and to make sure of their death they did all the things one does to make sure of one's life.
2.3.23	Astapa ville d'Espaigne se trouuant foible de murs et de deffenses, pour soustenir les Romains, les habitans firent amas de leurs richesses et meubles en la place, et ayants rengé au dessus de ce monceau les femmes et les enfants, et l'ayants entouré de bois et matiere propre à prendre feu soudainement et laissé cinquante ieunes hommes d'entre eux pour l'execution de leur resolution, feirent vne sortie, où suiuant leur vœu, à faute de pouuoir vaincre, ils se feirent tous tuer.	The Spanish city of Astapa had walls and defenses too weak to withstand the Romans. So the inhabitants heaped up their riches and goods in the public square. They placed the women and children on top of this heap and surrounded it with wood and other material that would catch fire quickly. Then, leaving fifty young men from among them to carry out their resolution, they made a sortie in which, as they had vowed, since they could not conquer, they all got themselves killed.[24]

	lancerent aussi, finissants leur genereuse liberté en un estat insensible plus tost, que douloureux et honteux: et montrant aux ennemis, que si Fortune l'eust voulu, ils eussent eu aussi bien le courage de leur oster la victoire, comme ils auoient eu de la leur rendre et frustratoire et hideuse, voire et mortelle à ceux, qui amorsez par la lueur de l'or coulant en cette flamme, s'en estants approchez en bon nombre, y furent suffoquez et bruslez: le reculer leur estant interdict par la foulle, qui les suiuoit.	and threw themselves into it too. So they ended their noble liberty in a state that was insensible rather than painful and shameful. They showed the enemy that, had Fortune willed it, they would have had the courage to take the victory from them, just as they had had the courage to make it both futile and hideous for them, and even deadly. For many Romans, lured by the gleam of the gold melting in that flame, came near in great numbers and were suffocated and burned there, unable to retreat because of the crowd pressing behind them.
2.3.24	Les Abydeens pressez par Philippus, se resolurent de mesmes: mais estans prins de trop court, le Roy qui eut horreur de voir la precipitation temeraire de cette execution (les thresors et les meubles, qu'ils auoyent diuersement condamnez au feu et au naufrage, saisis) retirant ses soldats, leur conceda trois iours à se tuer, auec plus d'ordre et plus à l'aise: lesquels ils remplirent de sang et de meurtre au delà de toute hostile cruauté: et ne s'en sauua vne seule personne, qui eust pouuoir sur soy.	The people of Abydos, hard pressed by Philip, made the same resolution. But they were caught too short. The king was horrified to see the rash haste of this execution, and once the treasures and goods they had condemned some to the fire and some to the sea had been seized, he withdrew his soldiers and granted them three days to kill themselves in better order and at greater leisure. They filled those days with blood and slaughter beyond any cruelty of an enemy, and not a single person who had power over himself escaped.[25]
2.3.25	Il y a infinis exemples de pareilles conclusions populaires, qui semblent plus aspres, d'autant que l'effect en est plus vniuersel. Elles le sont moins que separées. Ce que le discours ne feroit en chacun, il le fait en tous: l'ardeur de la societé rauissant les particuliers iugements.	There are countless examples of such resolutions taken by whole peoples, which seem harsher because their effect is more universal. In fact they are less harsh than when each person acts alone. What reasoning would not achieve in each individual, it achieves in all: the ardor of the group sweeps away individual judgments.
2.3.26	Les condamnez qui attendoyent l'execution, du temps de Tibere, perdoyent leurs biens, et estoyent priuez de sepulture: ceux qui l'anticipoyent en se tuants eux mesmes, estoyent enterrez, et pouuoyent faire testament.	Under Tiberius, condemned men who waited for their execution lost their property and were denied burial; those who forestalled it by killing themselves were buried and could make a will.
2.3.27	Mais on desire aussi quelquefois la mort, pour l'esperance d'vn plus grand bien. Ie desire, dict Sainct Paul, estre dissoult, pour estre auec Iesus Christ: et, Qui me desprendra de ces liens? Cleombrotus Ambraciota ayant leu le Phædon de Platon, entra en si grand appetit de la vie aduenir, que sans autre occasion il s'alla precipiter en la mer. Par où il appert combien improprement nous appellons desespoir cette dissolution volontaire, à laquelle la chaleur de l'espoir nous porte souuent, et souuent vne tranquille et rassise inclination de iugement.	But we also sometimes desire death in the hope of a greater good. "I desire," says Saint Paul, "to be dissolved, to be with Jesus Christ"; and "Who will deliver me from these bonds?" Cleombrotus of Ambracia, having read Plato's Phaedo, was seized with so great an appetite for the life to come that, with no other reason, he went and threw himself into the sea. This shows how wrongly we call despair this voluntary dissolution, to which we are of-

2.3.28	Iacques du Chastel Euesque de Soissons, au voyage d'outremer que fit Sainct Loys, voyant le Roy et toute l'armée en train de reuenir en France, laissant les affaires de la religion imparfaictes, print resolution de s'en aller plus tost en Paradis; et ayant dict à Dieu à ses amis, donna seul à la veuë d'vn chacun, dans l'armée des ennemis, où il fut mis en pieces.	Jacques du Chastel, Bishop of Soissons, was on Saint Louis's crusade overseas. Seeing the king and the whole army on the point of returning to France with the cause of religion left unfinished, he resolved to go off to Paradise instead. He bade farewell to his friends and charged alone, in full view of everyone, into the enemy army, where he was cut to pieces.[27]

La mort de cet Euesque les armes au poing, a de la generosité plus, et moins de sentiment: l'ardeur du combat en amusant vne partie.	In a certain kingdom of these new lands, there is a solemn procession on a day when the idol they worship is paraded in public on a chariot of marvelous size. Many people can be seen cutting pieces from their own living flesh to offer to it, and besides them a number of others can be seen throwing themselves down in the middle of the square and having themselves ground and crushed under the wheels, so as to win after their death the veneration due to holiness, which is duly paid them. The death of this bishop, weapons in hand, has more nobility and less suffering, since the heat of combat took his mind off part of it.[28]
2.3.29	Il y a des polices qui se sont meslées de regler la iustice et opportunité des morts volontaires. En nostre Marseille il se gardoit au temps passé du venin preparé à tout de la cigue, aux despens publics, pour ceux qui voudroient haster leurs iours; ayants premierement approuué aux six cens, qui estoit leur Senat, les raisons de leur entreprise: et n'estoit loisible autrement que par congé du magistrat, et par occasions legitimes, de mettre la main sur soy. Cette loy estoit encor' ailleurs.	Some governments have taken it upon themselves to regulate when voluntary deaths are just and timely. In our own Marseille, in times past, poison prepared from hemlock was kept at public expense for anyone who wished to hasten his days, once he had first justified the reasons for his undertaking to the Six Hundred, which was their senate. It was not permitted to lay hands on oneself in any other way, except by leave of the magistrate and for legitimate reasons. This law existed elsewhere too.[29]

qu'vne femme de grande authorité, ayant rendu compte à ses citoyens, pourquoy elle estoit resolue de finir sa vie, pria Pompeius d'assister à sa mort, pour la rendre plus honorable: ce qu'il fit, et ayant long temps essayé pour neant, à force d'eloquence, [qui luy estoit merueilleusement à main] et de persuasion, de la destourner de ce dessein, souffrit en fin qu'elle se contentast.

Elle auoit passé quatre vingts dix ans, en tres-heureux estat d'esprit et de corps, mais lors couchée sur son lict, mieux paré que de coustume, et appuyée sur le coude: Les Dieux, dit elle, ô Sextus Pompeius, et plustost ceux que ie laisse, que ceux que ie vay trouuer, te sçachent gré dequoy tu n'as desdaigné d'estre et conseiller de ma vie, et tesmoing de ma mort. Cela faict, ayant presché et enhorté les siens à l'vnion et à la paix, leur ayant departy ses biens, et recommandé les Dieux domestiques à sa fille aisnée, elle print d'vne main asseurée la coupe, où estoit le venin, et ayant faict ses vœux à Mercure, et les prieres de la conduire en quelque heureux siege en l'autre monde, auala brusquement ce mortel breuuage. happened by chance while he was there, as one of his company tells us, that a woman of great standing, having explained to her fellow citizens why she had resolved to end her life, begged Pompeius to attend her death to make it more honorable. This he did. For a long time he tried in vain, by force of eloquence (which came to him wonderfully readily) and persuasion, to turn her from this plan; in the end he allowed her to have her way.[30]

She was over ninety and had lived in a very happy state of mind and body. Now, lying on her bed, which was more finely decked than usual, and propped on her elbow, she said: "O Sextus Pompeius, may the gods, rather those I am leaving than those I am going to meet, reward you for not disdaining to be both the counselor of my life and the witness of my death. For my part, I have always known the favorable face of Fortune; and for fear that the desire to live too long might make me see her other face, I am going, by a happy end, to dismiss what remains of my soul, leaving behind me two daughters and a legion of grandchildren."

That done, she preached to her family and urged them to unity and peace, divided her goods among them, and commended the household gods to her eldest daughter. Then she took the cup containing the poison with a steady hand, made her vows to Mercury and prayed him to guide her to some happy dwelling in the other world, and briskly swallowed the deadly drink. After that she kept the company informed of how it was working, and of how the parts of her body felt the cold seize them one after another; until at last, having said that it was reaching her heart and her innards, she called her daughters to perform the last office for her and close her eyes.

Pliny tells of a certain Hyperborean nation where, thanks to the mild temperature of the air, lives commonly end only by the inhabitants' own will. When they are weary and sated with living, at the end of a long life, it is their custom to have a good feast and then throw themselves into the sea from the top of a certain rock set aside for this purpose.[31]

II.4 Business Tomorrow

A demain les affaires
Praise for Amyot's French Plutarch leads to Montaigne's own heedlessness, and the question of whether urgent letters should ever wait.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.4.1	IE donne auec raison, ce me semble, la palme à Iacques Amiot, sur tous noz escriuains François; non seulement pour la naïfueté et pureté du langage, en quoy il surpasse tous autres, ny pour la constance d'vn si long trauail, ny pour la profondeur de son sçauoir, ayant peu deuelopper si heureusement vn autheur si espineux et ferré: car on m'en dira ce qu'on voudra, ie n'entens rien au Grec, mais ie voy vn sens si bien ioint et entretenu, par tout en sa traduction, que ou il a certainement entendu l'imagination vraye de l'autheur, ou ayant par longue conuersation, planté viuement dans son ame, vne generale idée de celle de Plutarque, il ne luy a aumoins rien presté qui le desmente, ou qui le desdie: mais sur tout, ie luy sçay bon gré, d'auoir sçeu trier et choisir vn liure si digne et si à propos, pour en faire present à son païs.	I give the palm, rightly I think, to Jacques Amyot over all our French writers. This is not only for the natural ease and purity of his language, in which he surpasses all others, nor for his perseverance in so long a labor, nor for the depth of his learning, which allowed him to unfold so happily an author so thorny and knotty. For people may tell me what they like: I understand nothing of Greek, but I see a meaning so well connected and sustained throughout his translation that either he has certainly grasped the author's true thought, or else, having by long acquaintance planted vividly in his soul a general idea of Plutarch's soul, he has at least lent him nothing that belies or contradicts him. But above all I am grateful to him for having known how to pick and choose a book so worthy and so fitting to make a present of it to his country.[1]
	Nous autres ignorans estions perdus, si ce liure ne nous eust releué du bourbier: sa mercy nous osons à cett'heure et parler et escrire: les dames en regentent les maistres d'escole: c'est nostre breuiaire. Si ce bon homme vit, ie luy resigne Xenophon pour en faire autant. C'est vn' occupation plus aisée, et d'autant plus propre à sa vieillesse. Et puis, ie ne sçay comment il me semble, quoy qu'il se desmesle bien brusquement et nettement d'vn mauuais pas, que toutefois son stile est plus chez soy, quand il n'est pas pressé, et qu'il roulle à son aise.	We ignorant folk would have been lost if this book had not pulled us out of the mire. Thanks to him we now dare to speak and to write; ladies use it to school the schoolmasters; it is our breviary. If this good man is still alive, I hand Xenophon over to him to do the same. It is an easier task, and all the more suited to his old age. And besides, I don't know how, it seems to me that although he gets out of a tight spot very briskly and neatly, his style is nonetheless more at home when it is not hurried and rolls along at its ease.
2.4.2	I'estois à cett'heure sur ce passage, où Plutarque dit de soy-mesmes, que Rusticus assistant à vne sienne declamation à Rome, y receut vn pacquet de la part de l'Empereur, et temporisa de l'ouurir, iusques à ce que tout fust faict: En quoy, dit-il, toute l'assistance loua singulierement la grauité de ce personnage.	I was just now at the passage where Plutarch says of himself that Rusticus, attending one of his lectures in Rome, received a packet from the Emperor and put off opening it until everything was over; for which, he says, the whole audience singularly praised this man's gravity.[2]

1 Amyot (1513–1593) also translated Plutarch's Moral Works (1572); he became bishop of Auxerre.
2 Arulenus Rusticus, a Stoic senator later put to death by Domitian; the passage is in Plutarch's essay On Curiosity.

De vray, estant sur le propos de la curiosité, et de cette passion auide et gourmande de nouuelles, qui nous fait auec tant d'indiscretion et d'impatience abandonner toutes choses, pour entretenir vn nouueau venu, et perdre tout respect et contenance, pour crocheter soudain, où que nous soyons, les lettres qu'on nous apporte: il a eu raison de louër la grauité de Rusticus: et pouuoit encor y ioindre la louange de sa ciuilité et courtoisie, de n'auoir voulu interrompre le cours de sa declamation. Mais ie fay doubte qu'on le peust louër de prudence: car receuant à l'improueu lettres, et notamment d'vn Empereur, il pouuoit bien aduenir que le differer à les lire, eust esté d'vn grand preiudice.

2.4.3 Le vice contraire à la curiosité, c'est la nonchalance: vers laquelle ie panche euidemment de ma complexion; et en laquelle i'ay veu plusieurs hommes si extremes, que trois ou quatre iours apres, on retrouuoit encores en leur pochette les lettres toutes closes, qu'on leur auoit enuoyées. Ie n'en ouuris iamais, non seulement de celles, qu'on m'eust commises: mais de celles mesmes que la Fortune m'eust faict passer par les mains. Et fais conscience si mes yeux desrobent par mesgarde, quelque cognoissance des lettres d'importance qu'il lit, quand ie suis à costé d'vn grand. Iamais homme ne s'enquit moins, et ne fureta moins és affaires d'autruy.

Indeed, since Plutarch was on the subject of curiosity, and of that avid and greedy passion for news which makes us so tactlessly and impatiently drop everything to talk to a newcomer, and lose all respect and composure in tearing open on the spot, wherever we are, the letters brought to us, he was right to praise Rusticus's gravity. He could have added praise for his civility and courtesy in not wanting to interrupt the course of the lecture. But I doubt whether he could be praised for prudence. For when one receives letters unexpectedly, and especially from an emperor, it could well happen that putting off reading them would do great harm.

The vice opposite to curiosity is heedlessness, toward which I plainly lean by temperament. I have seen many men so extreme in it that three or four days later the letters sent to them were still found unopened in their pockets. I have never opened any letters—not only those entrusted to me, but not even those that Fortune happened to pass through my hands. And I feel a scruple if my eyes inadvertently steal some knowledge of the important letters a great man is reading when I am beside him. Never did a man inquire less, or pry less, into other people's affairs.

In our fathers' time Monsieur de Boutières nearly lost Turin because, being in good company at supper, he put off reading a warning sent him about treacheries being plotted against that city, where he was in command. And this same Plutarch has taught me that Julius Caesar would have saved himself if, on his way to the Senate on the day the conspirators killed him there, he had read a note that was handed to him.[3]

Plutarch also tells the story of Archias, tyrant of Thebes. On the evening before Pelopidas was to carry out his plot to kill him and restore his country's liberty, another Archias, an Athenian, wrote to him, point by point, what was being prepared against him. This packet was delivered to him during supper, and he put off opening it, saying the words that afterward became a proverb in Greece: "Business tomorrow."[4]

Vn sage homme peut à mon opinion pour l'interest d'autruy, comme pour ne rompre indecemment compagnie ainsi que Rusticus, ou pour ne discontinuer vn autre affaire d'importance, remettre à entendre ce qu'on luy apporte de nouueau: mais pour son interest ou plaisir particulier, mesmes s'il est homme ayant charge publique; pour ne rompre son disner, voyre ny son sommeil, il est inexcusable de le faire. Et anciennement estoit à Rome la place Consulaire, qu'ils appelloyent, la plus honorable à table, pour estre plus à deliure, et plus accessible à ceux qui suruiendroyent, pour entretenir celuy qui y seroit assis. Tesmoignage, que pour estre à table, ils ne se departoyent pas de l'entremise d'autres affaires et suruenances.

Mais quand tout est dict, il est malaisé és actions humaines, de donner regle si iuste par discours de raison, que la Fortune n'y maintienne son droict.

ENGLISH

In my opinion a wise man may, for the sake of others—so as not to break up company unbecomingly, like Rusticus, or not to interrupt some other important business—put off hearing news brought to him. But for his own interest or private pleasure, especially if he holds public office, so as not to interrupt his dinner, or even his sleep, it is inexcusable to do so. In ancient Rome, the place at table they called the consular place was the most honorable, because it was freer and more accessible to anyone who might arrive to speak with the person sitting in it. This shows that being at table did not make them withdraw from dealing with other business and unexpected events.[5]

But when all is said, it is hard, in human actions, to lay down by rational argument a rule so exact that Fortune does not keep her rights over it.

II.5 Of Conscience

De la Conscience

A tense wartime encounter shows how a guilty conscience betrays itself, and why torture is a poor test of truth.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.5.1	VOYAGEANT vn iour, mon frere Sieur de la Brousse et moy, durant noz guerres ciuiles, nous rencontrasmes vn Gentilhomme de bonne façon: il estoit du party contraire au nostre, mais ie n'en sçauois rien, car il se contrefaisoit autre. Et le pis de ces guerres, c'est, que les chartes sont si meslées, vostre ennemy n'estant distingué d'auec vous d'aucune marque apparente, ny de langage, ny de port, nourry en mesmes loix, mœurs et mesme air, qu'il est mal-aisé d'y euiter confusion et desordre. Cela me faisoit craindre à moy-mesme de r'encontrer nos trouppes, en lieu où ie ne fusse cogneu, pour n'estre en peine de dire mon nom, et de pis à l'aduanture.	One day during our civil wars, as my brother the Sieur de la Brousse and I were traveling, we met a gentleman of good bearing. He belonged to the party opposed to ours, but I knew nothing of it, for he passed himself off as something else. And the worst of these wars is that the cards are so shuffled that it is hard to avoid confusion and disorder: your enemy is not distinguished from you by any visible mark, neither by language nor by bearing, and he was brought up under the same laws, customs and air. This made me fear, myself, to run into our own troops somewhere I was not known, and so be in trouble when I had to give my name, or worse, perhaps.[1]
	Comme il m'estoit autrefois aduenu: car en vn tel mescompte, ie perdis et hommes et cheuaux, et m'y tua lon miserablement, entre autres, vn page Gentil-homme Italien, que ie nourrissois soigneusement; et fut estainte en luy vne tresbelle enfance, et pleine de grande esperance. Mais cettuy-cy en auoit vne frayeur si esperduë, et ie le voyois si mort à chasque rencontre d'hommes à cheual, et passage de villes, qui tenoient pour le Roy, que ie deuinay en fin que c'estoient alarmes que sa conscience luy donnoit. Il sembloit à ce pauure homme qu'au trauers de son masque et des croix de sa cazaque on iroit lire iusques dans son cœur, ses secrettes intentions. Tant est merueilleux l'effort de la conscience.	That had happened to me once before: in such a mistake I lost both men and horses, and among others they pitifully killed a page of mine, an Italian of gentle birth whom I was carefully bringing up; and with him was extinguished a very fine boyhood, full of great promise. But this man was so wildly afraid, and I saw him go so deathly pale whenever we met horsemen or passed through towns that held for the King, that I finally guessed these were alarms his conscience was raising. It seemed to this poor man that through his mask and the crosses on his cloak they would read his secret intentions right into his heart. So marvelous is the power of conscience.

que ces oysillons ne cessoient de l'accuser faucement du meurtre de son pere. Ce parricide iusques lors auoit esté occulte et inconnu: mais les furies vengeresses de la conscience, le firent mettre hors à celuy mesmes qui en deuoit porter la penitence. Hesiode corrige le dire de Platon, que la peine suit de bien pres le peché: car il dit qu'elle naist en l'instant et quant et quant le peché. Quiconque attent la peine, il la souffre, et quiconque l'a meritée, l'attend. La meschanceté fabrique des tourmens contre soy.

Malum consilium consultori pessimum. Comme la mouche guespe picque et offence autruy, mais plus soy-mesme, car elle y perd son esguillon et sa force pour iamais; Vitásque in vulnere ponunt. Les cantharides ont en elles quelque partie qui sert contre leur poison de contrepoison, par vne contrarieté de nature.

Aussi à mesme qu'on prend le plaisir au vice, il s'engendre vn desplaisir contraire en la conscience, qui nous tourmente de plusieurs imaginations penibles, veillans et dormans, Quippe vbi se multi, per somnia sæpe loquentes,
Aut morbo delirantes, procraxe ferantur,
Et celata diu in medium peccata dedisse. Apollodorus songeoit qu'il se voyoit escorcher par les Scythes, et puis bouillir dedans vne marmitte, et que son cœur murmuroit en disant; Ie te suis cause de tous ces maux. Aucune cachette ne sert aux meschans, disoit Epicurus, par ce qu'ils ne se peuuent asseurer d'estre cachez, la conscience les descouurant à eux mesmes, Prima est hæc vltio, quòd se
Iudice nemo nocens absoluitur.

2.5.3 Comme elle nous remplit de crainte, aussi fait elle d'asseurance et de confiance. Et ie puis dire auoir marché en plusieurs hazards, d'vn pas bien plus ferme, en consideration de la secrette science que i'auois de ma volonté et innocence de mes desseins. Conscia mens vt cuique sua est, ita concipit intra / Pectora pro facto spémque metúmque suo. Il y en a mille exemples: il suffira d'en alleguer trois de mesme personnage. said he had been right to, because those little birds never stopped falsely accusing him of murdering his father. Until then this parricide had been hidden and unknown; but the avenging furies of conscience made it come out from the very man who was to pay the penalty for it. Hesiod corrects Plato's saying that punishment follows close upon sin: for he says it is born at the very instant, together with the sin. Whoever awaits punishment suffers it, and whoever has deserved it awaits it. Wickedness fashions torments against itself.[3]

Evil counsel is worst for the counselor. Just as the wasp stings and hurts others, but itself more, for it loses its sting and its strength forever: And they leave their lives in the wound. Blister beetles have in them some part that serves as an antidote to their own poison, by a contrariety of nature.[4]

So too, at the very moment we take pleasure in vice, an opposite displeasure is engendered in our conscience, which torments us, waking and sleeping, with many painful imaginings: For many, often talking in their dreams,
Or raving in sickness, are said to have betrayed themselves
And brought to light sins long concealed. Apollodorus dreamed that he saw himself being flayed by the Scythians and then boiled in a pot, and that his heart murmured, saying: "I am the cause of all these ills for you." No hiding place helps the wicked, said Epicurus, because they can never be sure they are hidden, since their conscience reveals them to themselves: This is the first punishment: that no guilty man
Is acquitted when he is his own judge.[5]

Just as conscience fills us with fear, so it fills us with assurance and confidence. And I can say that I have walked into many dangers with a much firmer step because of the secret knowledge I had of my own will and of the innocence of my intentions. As each man's mind knows what he has done, so within his breast / He conceives hope or fear according to his deeds. There are a thousand examples; it will be enough to cite three about the same person. Scipio was accused one day before the Roman

Et vn' autre fois, pour toute responce aux imputations que luy mettoit sus vn Tribun du peuple, au lieu de plaider sa cause: Allons, dit-il, mes citoyens, allons rendre graces aux Dieux de la victoire qu'ils me donnerent contre les Carthaginois en pareil iour que cettuy-cy. Et se mettant à marcher deuant vers le temple, voylà toute l'assemblée, et son accusateur mesmes à sa suitte.

Et Petilius ayant esté suscité par Caton pour luy demander compte de l'argent manié en la prouince d'Antioche, Scipion estant venu au Senat pour cet effect, produisit le liure des raisons qu'il auoit dessoubs sa robbe, et dit, que ce liure en contenoit au vray la recepte et la mise: mais comme on le luy demanda pour le mettre au greffe, il le refusa, disant, ne se vouloir pas faire cette honte à soy-mesme: et de ses mains en la presence du Senat le deschira et mit en pieces.

Ie ne croy pas qu'vne ame cauterizée sçeust contrefaire vne telle asseurance: il auoit le cœur trop gros de nature, et accoustumé à trop haute fortune, dit Tite Liue, pour sçauoir estre criminel, et se demettre à la bassesse de deffendre son innocence.

2.5.4 C'est vne dangereuse inuention que celle des gehennes, et semble que ce soit plustost vn essay de patience que de verité. Et celuy qui les peut souffrir, cache la verité, et celuy qui ne les peut souffrir. Car pourquoy la douleur me fera elle plustost confesser ce qui en est, qu'elle ne me forcera de dire ce qui n'est pas? Et au rebours, si celuy qui n'a pas faict ce dequoy on l'accuse, est assez patient pour supporter ces tourments, pourquoy ne le sera celuy qui l'a faict, vn si beau guerdon, que de la vie, luy estant proposé? Ie pense que le fondement de cette inuention, vient de la consideration de l'effort de la conscience.

Car au coulpable il semble qu'elle aide à la torture pour luy faire confesser sa faute, et qu'elle l'affoiblisse: et de l'autre part qu'elle fortifie l'innocent contre la torture. Pour dire vray, c'est vn moyen plein d'incertitude et de danger. Que ne diroit on, que ne feroit on pour fuyr à si people on a serious charge. Instead of excusing himself or flattering his judges, he said to them: "It would suit you well indeed to set about passing judgment on the life of the man through whom you have the authority to judge the whole world."[6]

Another time, as his only answer to the charges a tribune of the people laid against him, instead of pleading his case, he said: "Come, my fellow citizens, let us go and give thanks to the gods for the victory they gave me over the Carthaginians on this very day." And as he set off walking ahead toward the temple, off went the whole assembly after him, and even his accuser.

And when Petilius had been put up by Cato to demand an account of the money handled in the province of Antioch, Scipio came to the Senate for that purpose and produced the account book from under his robe, saying that it contained a true record of receipts and expenses. But when they asked him for it so that it could be deposited in the record office, he refused, saying he did not wish to do himself that shame; and with his own hands, in the presence of the Senate, he tore it apart and ripped it to pieces.

I do not believe that a seared soul could counterfeit such assurance. He had a heart too great by nature, says Livy, and too used to high fortune, to know how to be a criminal and to stoop to the baseness of defending his innocence.

Torture is a dangerous invention, and it seems to be a test of endurance rather than of truth. The man who can bear it hides the truth, and so does the man who cannot. For why should pain make me confess what is so, rather than force me to say what is not? And conversely, if the man who has not done what he is accused of is enduring enough to bear these torments, why should not the man who has done it be so too, when so fine a reward as his life is held out to him? I think the basis of this invention lies in a view of the power of conscience.

For in the guilty man conscience seems to help the torture make him confess his fault, and to weaken him; while on the other hand it seems to strengthen the innocent against the torture. To tell the truth, it is a means full of uncertainty and griefues douleurs? Etiam innocentes cogit mentiri dolor. D'où il aduient, que celuy que le iuge a gehenné pour ne le faire mourir innocent, il le face mourir et innocent et gehenné. Mille et mille en ont chargé leur teste de faulces confessions. Entre lesquels ie loge Philotas, considerant les circonstances du procez qu'Alexandre luy fit, et le progrez de sa gehenne.

Mais tant y a que c'est, dit-on, le moins mal que l'humaine foiblesse aye peu inuenter: bien inhumainement pourtant, et bien inutilement à mon aduis.

2.5.5 Plusieurs nations moins barbares en cela que la Grecque et la Romaine, qui les appellent ainsin, estiment horrible et cruel de tourmenter et desrompre vn homme, de la faute duquel vous estes encore en doubte. Que peut il mais de vostre ignorance? Estes vous pas iniustes, qui pour ne le tuer sans occasion, luy faites pis que le tuer? Qu'il soit ainsi, voyez combien de fois il ayme mieux mourir sans raison, que de passer par cette information plus penible que le supplice, et qui souuent par son aspreté deuance le supplice, et l'execute. Ie ne sçay d'où ie tiens ce conte, mais il rapporte exactement la conscience de nostre iustice.

Vne femme de village accusoit deuant le General d'armée, grand justicier, vn soldat, pour auoir arraché à ses petits enfants ce peu de bouillie qui luy restoit à les substanter, cette armée ayant tout rauagé. De preuue il n'y en auoit point. Le General apres auoir sommé la femme, de regarder bien à ce qu'elle disoit, d'autant qu'elle seroit coulpable de son accusation, si elle mentoit: et elle persistant, il fit ouurir le ventre au soldat, pour s'esclaircir de la verité du faict: et la femme se trouua auoir raison. danger. What would one not say, what would one not do, to escape such grievous pains? Pain forces even the innocent to lie. So it happens that the man the judge has tortured so as not to put him to death innocent, he puts to death both innocent and tortured. Thousands upon thousands have loaded their heads with false confessions. Among them I place Philotas, considering the circumstances of the trial Alexander brought against him and the course of his torture.[7]

But be that as it may, it is, they say, the least bad thing that human weakness has been able to invent; most inhumanly, however, and most uselessly, in my opinion.

Many nations, less barbarous in this respect than the Greeks and Romans who call them so, consider it horrible and cruel to torment and break a man whose guilt you are still in doubt about. Is it his fault that you do not know? Are you not unjust, you who, so as not to kill him without cause, do worse to him than kill him? To see that this is so, consider how often he would rather die without reason than go through this inquiry, which is more painful than the execution and often, by its harshness, forestalls the execution and carries it out. I do not know where I got this story, but it exactly reflects the conscience of our justice.

A village woman accused a soldier, before the general of an army who was a stern dispenser of justice, of having snatched from her little children the bit of porridge she had left to feed them, since the army had ravaged everything. There was no proof at all. The general warned the woman to be very careful what she was saying, since she would be guilty of her own accusation if she lied; and when she persisted, he had the soldier's belly cut open to establish the truth of the matter. And the woman turned out to be right. An instructive sentence.[8]

II.6 Of Practice

De l'exercitation

Montaigne recounts his near-fatal fall from a horse to show how gently dying may come, then defends writing about himself.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.6.1	IL est malaisé que le discours et l'instruction, encore que nostre creance s'y applique volontiers, soyent assez puissants pour nous acheminer iusques à l'action, si outre cela nous n'exerçons et formons nostre ame par experience au train, auquel nous la voulons renger: autrement quand elle sera au propre des effets, elle s'y trouuera sans doute empeschée. Voylà pourquoy parmy les Philosophes, ceux qui ont voulu atteindre à quelque plus grande excellence, ne se sont pas contentez d'attendre à couuert et en repos les rigueurs de la Fortune, de peur qu'elle ne les surprinst inexperimentez et nouueaux au combat: ains ils luy sont allez au deuant, et se sont iettez à escient à la preuue des difficultez.	It is hard for reasoning and instruction, however willingly our belief embraces them, to be powerful enough to carry us all the way to action, unless in addition we exercise and train our soul by experience in the course we want to set it on; otherwise, when it comes to the point of acting, it will no doubt find itself at a loss. That is why, among the philosophers, those who sought to attain some greater excellence were not content to await the rigors of Fortune in shelter and at rest, for fear she might catch them inexperienced and new to the fight. Instead they went out to meet her and deliberately threw themselves into the test of hardships.
	Les vns en ont abandonné les richesses, pour s'exercer à vne pauureté volontaire: les autres ont recherché le labeur, et vne austerité de vie penible, pour se durcir au mal et au trauail: d'autres se sont priuez des parties du corps les plus cheres, comme de la veuë et des membres propres à la generation, de peur que leur seruice trop plaisant et trop mol, ne relaschast et n'attendrist la fermeté de leur ame.	Some gave up their riches to train themselves in voluntary poverty; others sought out labor and a painful austerity of life to harden themselves to pain and toil; others deprived themselves of the dearest parts of the body, such as their sight and their organs of generation, for fear that the too pleasant and too soft service of these might slacken and soften the firmness of their soul.
2.6.2	Mais à mourir, qui est la plus grande besoigne que nous ayons à faire, l'exercitation ne nous y peut ayder. On se peut par vsage et par experience fortifier contre les douleurs, la honte, l'indigence; et tels autres accidents: mais quant à la mort, nous ne la pouuons essayer qu'vne fois: nous y sommes tous apprentifs, quand nous y venons.	But for dying, which is the greatest task we have to perform, practice cannot help us. We can fortify ourselves by habit and experience against pain, shame, poverty and other such accidents; but as for death, we can try it only once. We are all apprentices when we come to it.
2.6.3	Il s'est trouué anciennement des hommes si excellens mesnagers du temps, qu'ils ont essayé en la mort mesme, de la gouster et sauourer: et ont bandé leur esprit, pour voir que c'estoit de ce passage: mais ils ne sont pas reuenus nous en dire les nouuelles. Nemo expergitus extat, / Frigida quem semel est vitaï pausa sequuta.	There have been men in ancient times who managed their time so well that they tried to taste and savor death even as they died, and strained their minds to see what this passage was like; but they have not come back to tell us the news. No one wakes and rises again / Once the cold pause of life has overtaken him.[1]

2.6.4 Canius Iulius noble Romain, de vertu et fermeté singuliere, ayant esté condamné à la mort par ce marault de Caligula: outre plusieurs merueilleuses preuues qu'il donna de sa resolution, comme il estoit sur le poinct de souffrir la main du bourreau, vn Philosophe son amy luy demanda: Et bien Canius, en quelle démarche est à cette heure vostre ame? que fait elle? en quels pensemens estes vous?

Ie pensois, luy respondit-il, à me tenir prest et bandé de toute ma force, pour voir, si en cet instant de la mort, si court et si brief, ie pourray apperceuoir quelque deslogement de l'ame, et si elle aura quelque ressentiment de son yssuë, pour, si i'en aprens quelque chose, en reuenir donner apres, si ie puis, aduertissement à mes amis. Quelle asseurance estoit-ce, et quelle fierté de courage, de vouloir que sa mort luy seruist de leçon, et auoir loisir de penser ailleurs en vn si grand affaire? Ius hoc animi morientis habebat.

2.6.5 Il me semble toutesfois qu'il y a quelque façon de nous appriuoiser à elle, et de l'essayer aucunement. Nous en pouuons auoir experience, sinon entiere et parfaicte: aumoins telle qu'elle ne soit pas inutile, et qui nous rende plus fortifiez et asseurez. Si nous ne la pouuons ioindre, nous la pouuons approcher, nous la pouuons reconnoistre: et si nous ne donnons iusques à son fort, aumoins verrons nous et en pratiquerons les aduenuës. Ce n'est pas sans raison qu'on nous fait regarder à nostre sommeil mesme, pour la ressemblance qu'il a de la mort. Combien facilement nous passons du veiller au dormir, auec combien peu d'interest nous perdons la connoissance de la lumiere et de nous!

A l'aduenture pourroit sembler inutile et contre Nature la faculté du sommeil, qui nous priue de toute action et de tout sentiment, n'estoit que par iceluy Nature nous instruict, quelle nous a pareillement faicts pour mourir, que pour viure, et dés la vie nous presente l'eternel estat qu'elle nous garde apres icelle, pour nous y accoustumer et nous en oster la crainte.

Canius Julius, a Roman nobleman of singular virtue and firmness, was condemned to death by that scoundrel Caligula. Besides many marvelous proofs he gave of his resolution, when he was on the point of submitting to the executioner's hand, a philosopher who was his friend asked him: "Well, Canius, what state is your soul in now? What is it doing? What are your thoughts?"[2]

"I was thinking," he answered, "of holding myself ready and braced with all my strength, to see whether in this instant of death, so short and brief, I shall be able to perceive the soul moving out, and whether it will have any feeling of its departure; so that, if I learn anything about it, I may come back afterward, if I can, and let my friends know." This man philosophizes not only up to death but in death itself. What assurance it was, and what pride of courage, to want his death to serve him as a lesson, and to have the leisure to think of other things in so great a business! Such command over his mind he kept in dying.[3]

It seems to me, however, that there is some way of taming ourselves to death and trying it out in some measure. We can have an experience of it which, if not whole and perfect, is at least not useless, and makes us stronger and more assured. If we cannot reach it, we can approach it, we can reconnoiter it; and if we do not get as far as its fortress, at least we shall see and travel the roads that lead to it. It is not without reason that we are told to look at our very sleep, for the resemblance it bears to death. How easily we pass from waking to sleeping! With how little concern we lose awareness of the light and of ourselves!

Perhaps the faculty of sleep, which deprives us of all action and all feeling, might seem useless and contrary to Nature, were it not that through it Nature teaches us that she has made us for dying as much as for living, and while we are still alive shows us the eternal state she keeps for us after life, to accustom us to it and take away our fear of it.

But those who have fainted from some violent accident and lost all feeling—those, in my view, have ceux là à mon aduis ont esté bien pres de voir son vray et naturel visage. Car quant à l'instant et au poinct du passage, il n'est pas à craindre, qu'il porte auec soy aucun trauail ou desplaisir: d'autant que nous ne pouuons auoir nul sentiment, sans loisir. Nos souffrances ont besoing de temps, qui est si court et si precipité en la mort, qu'il faut necessairement qu'elle soit insensible. Ce sont les approches que nous auons à craindre: et celles-là peuuent tomber en experience.

2.6.7 Plusieurs choses nous semblent plus grandes par imagination, que par effect. I'ay passé vne bonne partie de mon aage en vne parfaite et entiere santé: ie dy non seulement entiere, mais encore allegre et bouillante. Cet estat plein de verdeur et de feste, me faisoit trouuer si horrible la consideration des maladies, que quand ie suis venu à les experimenter, i'ay trouué leurs pointures molles et lasches au prix de ma crainte. Voicy que i'espreuue tous les iours: Suis-ie à couuert chaudement dans vne bonne sale, pendant qu'il se passe vne nuict orageuse et tempesteuse: ie m'estonne et m'afflige pour ceux qui sont lors en la campaigne: y suis-ie moy-mesme, ie ne desire pas seulement d'estre ailleurs.

Cela seul, d'estre tousiours enfermé dans vne chambre, me sembloit insupportable: ie fus incontinent dressé à y estre vne semaine, et vn mois, plein d'émotion, d'alteration et de foiblesse: et ay trouué que lors de ma santé, ie plaignois les malades beaucoup plus, que ie ne me trouue à plaindre moy-mesme, quand i'en suis; et que la force de mon apprehension encherissoit pres de moitié l'essence et verité de la chose. I'espere qu'il m'en aduiendra de mesme de la mort: et qu'elle ne vaut pas la peine que ie prens à tant d'apprests que ie dresse, et tant de secours que i'appelle et assemble pour en soustenir l'effort. Mais à toutes aduantures nous ne pouuons nous donner trop d'auantage.

come very close to seeing death's true and natural face. For as to the instant and point of passing, there is no need to fear that it brings any pain or distress with it, since we can have no feeling without time. Our sufferings need time, and in death time is so short and so hurried that death must necessarily be imperceptible. It is the approaches we have to fear; and those can fall within our experience.

Many things seem greater to us in imagination than in reality. I spent a good part of my life in perfect and entire health: I say not only entire, but lively and full of fire. That state, so full of vigor and festivity, made the thought of illness so horrible to me that when I came to experience it, I found its pangs mild and feeble compared with my fear. Here is what I find every day. If I am snug and warm under cover in a good room while a stormy, tempestuous night is going on outside, I am dismayed and distressed for those who are out in the open country; if I am out there myself, I do not even wish to be elsewhere.

Just being shut up in a room all the time seemed unbearable to me; I was soon trained to stay there a week, and a month, full of agitation, disturbance and weakness. And I have found that when I was healthy I pitied the sick much more than I find myself to be pitied when I am sick, and that the force of my apprehension inflated the substance and truth of the thing by nearly half. I hope the same will happen to me with death, and that it is not worth all the trouble I take over the many preparations I make and the many aids I call up and assemble to withstand its assault. But at all events, we can never give ourselves too much of an advantage.

THE FALL FROM THE HORSE

taken a horse that was very easy to ride but not very sturdy.[4]

On my way back, a sudden occasion arose to use this horse for a task it was not much used to. One of my men, big and strong, was riding a powerful workhorse that had a desperately hard mouth but was otherwise fresh and vigorous. To show off his daring and get ahead of his companions, he spurred it at full tilt straight into my path, came down like a colossus on the little man and the little horse, and struck us like a thunderbolt with all his stiffness and weight, sending us both heels over head. So there lay the horse, knocked down and completely stunned, and there was I, ten or twelve paces beyond, stretched out on my back, my face all bruised and skinned, my sword, which I had had in my hand, more than ten paces further on, my belt in pieces, with no more movement or feeling than a log.

It is the only time I have fainted, up to now. Those who were with me tried every means they could to bring me round; then, taking me for dead, they lifted me in their arms and carried me with great difficulty toward my house, which was some way off, about half a French league. On the way, after I had been taken for dead for more than two full hours, I began to move and breathe: for so much blood had poured into my stomach that Nature had to revive her forces to get rid of it.

They set me on my feet, and I threw up a whole bucketful of clots of pure blood; and several times along the way I had to do the same. That is how I began to recover a little life; but it came bit by bit, and over so long a stretch of time that my first sensations were much closer to death than to life. For, still uncertain of its return, / The stunned mind cannot steady itself.[5]

This memory, deeply imprinted on my soul, shows me death's face and image so true to life that it somewhat reconciles me to it. When I began to see, it was with sight so blurred, so weak and so dead that I still could make out nothing but the light, —like one who now opens, now closes / His eyes, halfway between sleep and waking. As for the functions of the soul, they came back at the same pace sanglant: car mon pourpoinct estoit taché par tout du sang que i'auoy rendu. La premiere pensée qui me vint, ce fut que i'auoy vne harquebusade en la teste: de vray en mesme temps, il s'en tiroit plusieurs autour de nous.

Il me sembloit que ma vie ne me tenoit plus qu'au bout des léures: ie fermois les yeux pour ayder, ce me sembloit, à la pousser hors, et prenois plaisir à m'alanguir et à me laisser aller. C'estoit vne imagination qui ne faisoit que nager superficiellement en mon ame, aussi tendre et aussi foible que tout le reste: mais à la verité non seulement exempte de desplaisir, ains meslée à cette douceur, que sentent ceux qui se laissent glisser au sommeil.

2.6.10 Ie croy que c'est ce mesme estat, où se trouuent ceux qu'on void défaillans de foiblesse, en l'agonie de la mort: et tiens que nous les plaignons sans cause, estimans qu'ils soyent agitez de griéues douleurs, ou auoir l'ame pressée de cogitations penibles.

Ç'a esté tousiours mon aduis, contre l'opinion de plusieurs, et mesme d'Estienne de la Boetie, que ceux que nous voyons ainsi renuersez et assoupis aux approches de leur fin, ou accablez de la longueur du mal, ou par accident d'vne apoplexie, ou mal caduc, (vi morbi sæpe coactus as those of the body. I saw I was covered in blood, for my doublet was stained all over with the blood I had thrown up. The first thought that came to me was that I had taken an arquebus shot in the head; and in fact several shots were being fired around us at that same moment.

It seemed to me that my life was hanging on only by the tip of my lips. I closed my eyes in order, as it seemed to me, to help push it out, and I took pleasure in growing languid and letting myself go. It was a notion that merely floated on the surface of my soul, as tender and as feeble as all the rest; but in truth it was not only free from distress but mingled with that sweetness people feel when they let themselves slip into sleep.

I believe this is the very state in which we find those whom we see fainting from weakness in the throes of death; and I hold that we pity them without cause, thinking they are racked by grievous pains or that their souls are oppressed by painful thoughts.

It has always been my view, against the opinion of many, and even of Étienne de La Boétie, that those whom we see thus prostrate and drowsy as their end approaches, or overwhelmed by the length of their illness, or struck by apoplexy or the falling sickness, (often, overcome by the violence of the disease,
A man falls before our eyes as if struck by lightning,
And foams at the mouth; he groans, his limbs tremble,
He raves, his sinews stiffen, he writhes, he pants,
And wears out his limbs in fitful tossing.) or wounded in the head, whom we hear rattle in their throats and sometimes utter piercing sighs—although we draw from these some signs that seem to show that some awareness remains to them, as we do from certain movements we see them make with their bodies—I have always thought, I say, that both their soul and their body were buried and asleep.[6]

He lives, and is himself unaware of his life. And I could not believe that, with the limbs so stunned and the senses so far gone, the soul could keep any strength within by which to recognize itself; and so I believed that they had no reasoning to torment them and make them judge and feel the

2.6.11	Ie n'imagine aucun estat pour moy si insupportable et horrible, que d'auoir l'ame vifue, et affligée, sans moyen de se declarer. Comme ie dirois de ceux qu'on enuoye au supplice, leur ayant couppé la langue: si ce n'estoit qu'en cette sorte de mort, la plus muette me semble la mieux seante, si elle est accompaignée d'vn ferme visage et graue. Et comme ces miserables prisonniers qui tombent és mains des vilains bourreaux soldats de ce temps, desquels ils sont tourmentez de toute espece de cruel traictement, pour les contraindre à quelque rançon excessiue et impossible: tenus cependant en condition et en lieu, où ils n'ont moyen quelconque d'expression et signification de leurs pensées et de leur misere.	I can imagine no state so unbearable and horrible for me as having my soul alive and afflicted with no means of expressing itself. I would say the same of those who are sent to execution with their tongues cut out—were it not that in this kind of death the most silent seems to me the most becoming, if it is accompanied by a firm and grave countenance. And the same goes for those wretched prisoners who fall into the hands of the vile soldier-torturers of our time, who torment them with every kind of cruel treatment to force them into paying some excessive and impossible ransom, while keeping them in such a condition and place that they have no means whatever of expressing and making known their thoughts and their misery.
2.6.12	Les Poëtes ont feint quelques Dieux fauorables à la deliurance de ceux qui trainoient ainsin vne mort languissante: Hunc ego Diti / Sacrum iussa fero, téque isto corpore soluo. Et les voix et responses courtes et descousues, qu'on leur arrache quelquefois à force de crier autour de leurs oreilles, et de les tempester, ou des mouuemens qui semblent auoir quelque consentement à ce qu'on leur demande, ce n'est pas tesmoignage qu'ils viuent pourtant, au moins vne vie entiere.	The poets have imagined certain gods who favor the deliverance of those who are thus dragging out a lingering death: This I bear, as bidden, sacred to Dis, / And release you from that body. And the short, disjointed words and answers sometimes wrung from them by shouting in their ears and badgering them, or the movements that seem to show some assent to what is asked of them, are no proof that they are alive, at least not with a full life.[8]
	Il nous aduient ainsi sur le beguayement du sommeil, auant qu'il nous ait du tout saisis, de sentir comme en songe, ce qui se faict autour de nous, et suyure les voix, d'vne ouye trouble et incertaine, qui semble ne donner qu'aux bords de l'ame: et faisons des responses à la suitte des dernieres paroles, qu'on nous a dites, qui ont plus de fortune que de sens.	The same thing happens to us in the first stammerings of sleep, before it has entirely taken hold of us: we sense, as if in a dream, what is going on around us, and we follow voices with a blurred and uncertain hearing that seems to touch only the edges of the soul; and we give answers, following on from the last words spoken to us, that have more luck than sense.
2.6.13	Or à present que ie l'ay essayé par effect, ie ne fay nul doubte que ie n'en aye bien iugé iusques à cette heure. Car premierement estant tout esuanouy, ie me trauaillois d'entr'ouurir mon pourpoinct à beaux ongles, car i'estoy desarmé, et si sçay que ie ne sentois en l'imagination rien qui me blessast. Car il y a plusieurs mouuemens en nous, qui ne partent pas de nostre ordonnance.	Now that I have tested it in practice, I have no doubt that I judged rightly until now. For first, while I was quite unconscious, I was struggling to tear open my doublet with my bare nails (for I was unarmed), and yet I know that I felt nothing in my imagination that hurt me. For there are many movements in us that do not proceed from our command.

Mobilitate mali, non quit sentire dolorem. I'auoy mon estomach pressé de ce sang caillé, mes mains y couroient d'elles-memes, comme elles font souuent, où il nous demange, contre l'aduis de nostre volonté. Il y a plusieurs animaux, et des hommes mesmes, apres qu'ils sont trespassez, ausquels on voit resserrer et remuer des muscles.

Chacun sçait par experience, qu'il a des parties qui se branslent, dressent et couchent souuent sans son congé. Or ces passions qui ne nous touchent que par l'escorse, ne se peuuent dire nostres. Pour les faire nostres, il faut que l'homme y soit engagé tout entier: et les douleurs que le pied ou la main sentent pendant que nous dormons, ne sont pas à nous.

2.6.14 Comme i'approchay de chez moy, où l'alarme de ma cheute auoit desia couru, et que ceux de ma famille m'eurent rencontré, auec les cris accoustumez en telles choses: non seulement ie respondois quelque mot à ce qu'on me demandoit, mais encore ils disent que ie m'aduisay de commander qu'on donnast vn cheual à ma femme, que ie voyoy s'empestrer et se tracasser dans le chemin, qui est montueux et mal-aisé. Il semble que cette consideration deust partir d'vne ame esueillée; si est-ce que ie n'y estois aucunement: c'estoyent des pensemens vains en nuë, qui estoyent esmeuz par les sens des yeux et des oreilles: ils ne venoyent pas de chez moy.

Ie ne sçauoy pourtant ny d'où ie venoy, ny où i'aloy, ny ne pouuois poiser et considerer ce qu'on me demandoit: ce sont de legers effects, que les sens produysoyent d'eux mesmes, comme d'vn vsage: ce que l'ame y prestoit, c'estoit en songe, touchée bien legerement, et comme lechée seulement et arrosée par la molle impression des sens. Cependant mon assiette estoit à la verité tres-douce et paisible: ie n'auoy affliction ny pour autruy ny pour moy: c'estoit vne langueur et vne extreme foiblesse, sans aucune douleur. Ie vy ma maison sans la recognoistre.

front of them in this way as they fall, by a natural impulse which makes our limbs lend one another their services and have stirrings of their own, apart from our reasoning: They tell how scythe-bearing chariots lop off limbs so swiftly that what has fallen, severed from the body, is seen to quiver on the ground, while yet the man's mind and strength, through the speed of the harm, cannot feel the pain.
My stomach was oppressed with that clotted blood, and my hands ran to it of their own accord, as they often do where we itch, against the advice of our will. There are many animals, and even men, in whom muscles can be seen to contract and move after they are dead.[9]

Everyone knows from experience that he has parts that often stir, stand up and lie down without his leave. Now these passions that touch us only on the bark cannot be called ours. To make them ours, the whole man must be engaged in them; and the pains that the foot or the hand feels while we are asleep are not ours.

As I approached my house, where the alarm of my fall had already run ahead, and my household had come to meet me with the cries customary on such occasions, not only did I answer a word or two to what I was asked, but they say I even thought to order that a horse be given to my wife, whom I saw stumbling and struggling along the road, which is hilly and rough. It would seem that this consideration must have come from a soul that was awake; and yet I was not there at all. These were empty thoughts, up in the clouds, stirred up by the senses of the eyes and ears; they did not come from inside me.

Yet I did not know where I was coming from or where I was going, nor could I weigh and consider what I was asked. These are slight effects that the senses produced by themselves, as if out of habit. What the soul contributed was in a dream, touched very lightly, and as it were only licked and sprinkled by the soft impression of the senses. Meanwhile my state was in truth very gentle and peaceful. I felt no distress either for others or for myself; it was a languor and an extreme weakness, without any pain. I saw my house without recognizing it.

Quand on m'eut couché, ie senty vne infinie douceur à ce repos: car i'auoy esté vilainement tirassé par ces pauures gens, qui auoyent pris la peine de me porter sur leurs bras, par vn long et tres-mauuais chemin, et s'y estoient lassez deux ou trois fois les vns apres les autres. On me presenta force remedes, dequoy ie n'en receuz aucun, tenant pour certain, que i'estoy blessé à mort par la teste. C'eust esté sans mentir vne mort bien heureuse: car la foiblesse de mon discours me gardoit d'en rien iuger, et celle du corps d'en rien sentir. Ie me laissoy couler si doucement, et d'vne façon si molle et si aisée, que ie ne sens guere autre action moins poisante que celle-la estoit.

When they had put me to bed, I felt an infinite sweetness in that rest, for I had been wretchedly hauled about by those poor people, who had taken the trouble to carry me in their arms over a long and very bad road, and had worn themselves out two or three times, taking turns. They offered me plenty of remedies, of which I accepted none, being certain that I was mortally wounded in the head. It would truly have been a very happy death; for the weakness of my reasoning kept me from judging anything of it, and the weakness of my body from feeling anything. I was letting myself slip away so gently, in so soft and easy a manner, that I can hardly feel any action less burdensome than that one was.

2.6.15 Quand ie vins à reuiure, et à reprendre mes forces, Vt tandem sensus conualuere mei, qui fut deux ou trois heures apres, ie me senty tout d'vn train rengager aux douleurs, ayant les membres tous moulus et froissez de ma cheute, et en fus si mal deux ou trois nuits apres, que i'en cuiday remourir encore vn coup: mais d'vne mort plus vifue, et me sens encore de la secousse de cette froissure. Ie ne veux pas oublier cecy, que la derniere chose en quoy ie me peuz remettre, ce fut la souuenance de cet accident: et me fis redire plusieurs fois, où i'aloy, d'où ie venoy, à quelle heure cela m'estoit aduenu, auant que de le pouuoir conceuoir.

When I came back to life and regained my strength, When at last my senses grew strong again, which was two or three hours later, I felt myself caught up all at once in pain again, my limbs all battered and bruised from my fall; and for two or three nights afterward I was so ill from it that I thought I would die all over again, but this time a death more keenly felt; and I still feel the shock of that bruising. I do not want to forget this: the last thing I was able to recover was the memory of this accident. I had them tell me several times where I was going, where I was coming from, at what time it had happened to me, before I could take it in.[10]

Quant à la façon de ma cheute, on me la cachoit, en faueur de celuy, qui en auoit esté cause, et m'en forgeoit on d'autres. Mais long temps apres, et le lendemain, quand ma memoire vint à s'entr'ouurir, et me representer l'estat, où ie m'estoy trouué en l'instant que i'auoy aperçeu ce cheual fondant sur moy (car ie l'auoy veu à mes talons, et me tins pour mort: mais ce pensement auoit esté si soudain, que la peur n'eut pas loisir de s'y engendrer) il me sembla que c'estoit vn esclair qui me frapoit l'ame de secousse, et que ie reuenoy de l'autre monde.

As for the way I fell, they hid it from me, out of consideration for the man who had caused it, and made up other versions for me. But long afterward, the next day, when my memory began to open a little and to bring back to me the state I had been in at the instant I saw that horse bearing down on me (for I had seen it at my heels and taken myself for dead, but that thought had been so sudden that fear had no time to arise from it), it seemed to me that it was a flash of lightning striking my soul with a jolt, and that I was coming back from the other world.

2.6.16 Ce conte d'vn euénement si leger, est assez vain, n'estoit l'instruction que i'en ay tirée pour moy: car à la verité pour s'apriuoiser à la mort, ie trouue qu'il n'y a que de s'en auoisiner. Or, comme dit Pline, chacun est à soy-mesmes vne tres bonne discipline, pourueu qu'il ait la suffisance de s'espier de pres. Ce n'est pas icy ma doctrine, c'est mon estude: et n'est pas la leçon d'autruy, c'est la mienne. Et ne me doibt on pourtant sçauoir mauuais gré, si ie la communique. Ce qui me sert, peut aussi par accident seruir à vn autre. Au demeurant, ie ne gaste rien, ie n'vse que du mien.

Et si ie fay le fol, c'est à mes despends, et sans l'interest de personne: car c'est en follie, qui meurt en moy, qui n'a point de suitte. Nous n'auons nouuelles que de deux ou trois anciens, qui ayent battu ce chemin: et si ne pouuons dire, si c'est du tout en pareille maniere à cette-cy, n'en connoissant que les noms. Nul depuis ne s'est ietté sur leur trace.

C'est vne espineuse entreprinse, et plus qu'il ne semble, de suyure vne alleure si vagabonde, que celle de nostre esprit: de penetrer les profondeurs opaques de ses replis internes: de choisir et arrester tant de menus airs de ses agitations: et est vn amusement nouueau et extraordinaire, qui nous retire des occupations communes du monde: ouy, et des plus recommandées.

2.6.17 Il y a plusieurs années que ie n'ay que moy pour visée à mes pensées, que ie ne contrerolle et n'estudie que moy. Et si i'estudie autre chose, c'est pour soudain le coucher sur moy, ou en moy, pour mieux dire. Et ne me semble point faillir, si, comme il se faict des autres sciences, sans comparaison moins vtiles, ie fay part de ce que i'ay apprins en cette cy: quoy que ie ne me contente guere du progrez que i'y ay faict. Il n'est description pareille en difficulté, à la description de soy-mesmes, ny certes en vtilité. Encore se faut il testonner, encore se faut il ordonner et renger pour sortir en place.

Or ie me pare sans cesse: car ie me descris sans cesse.

This account of so trivial an event would be rather pointless, were it not for the lesson I have drawn from it for myself; for truly, to grow used to death, I find there is nothing for it but to draw near to it. Now, as Pliny says, each man is a very good schooling for himself, provided he has the ability to spy on himself from close up. What I give here is not my teaching but my study; it is not a lesson for others, but for me. And yet no one should hold it against me if I share it. What serves me may also by chance serve someone else. Besides, I spoil nothing; I use only what is mine.

And if I play the fool, it is at my own expense and without harm to anyone; for it is a folly that dies with me and has no consequences. We have word of only two or three ancients who have beaten this path; and even so we cannot say whether it was at all in the same way as this, since we know only their names. No one since has followed in their tracks.

It is a thorny undertaking, more so than it seems, to follow a course as wandering as that of our mind; to penetrate the opaque depths of its inner folds; to pick out and pin down so many slight nuances of its stirrings. And it is a new and extraordinary pastime, which draws us away from the common occupations of the world—yes, and from the most highly recommended.

For many years now I have had nothing but myself as the target of my thoughts; I examine and study nothing but myself. And if I study anything else, it is to apply it at once to myself—or rather, within myself. And I do not think I am at fault if, as is done with the other sciences, which are incomparably less useful, I share what I have learned in this one, though I am hardly satisfied with the progress I have made in it. There is no description equal in difficulty to the description of oneself, nor certainly in usefulness. Even so, one has to do one's hair, one has to tidy and arrange oneself before going out in public.

Now I am constantly dressing myself up, for I am constantly describing myself.

2.6.18 La coustume a faict le parler de soy, vicieux: et le prohibe obstinéement en hayne de la ventance, qui semble tousiours estre attachée aux propres tesmoignages. Au lieu qu'on doit moucher l'enfant, cela s'appelle l'enaser, In vicium ducit culpæ fuga. Ie trouue plus de mal que de bien à ce remede. Mais quand il seroit vray, que ce fust necessairement, presomption, d'entretenir le peuple de soy: ie ne doy pas suyuant mon general dessein, refuser vne action qui publie cette maladiue qualité, puis qu'elle est en moy: et ne doy cacher cette faute, que i'ay non seulement en vsage, mais en profession. Toutesfois à dire ce que i'en croy, cette coustume a tort de condamner le vin, par ce que plusieurs s'y enyurent.

Custom has made speaking of oneself a vice, and stubbornly forbids it out of hatred for the boasting that always seems to be attached to testimony about oneself. Where one ought to wipe the child's nose, this amounts to cutting it off. Fleeing a fault leads into vice. I find more harm than good in this remedy. But even if it were true that it is necessarily presumptuous to entertain people with talk about oneself, I must not, given my general plan, refuse an action that displays this unhealthy quality, since it is in me; and I must not hide this fault, which I not only practice but profess. Still, to say what I think of it, this custom is wrong to condemn wine because many get drunk on it.[11]

On ne peut abuser que des choses qui sont bonnes. Et croy de cette regle, qu'elle ne regarde que la populaire defaillance. Ce sont brides à veaux, desquelles ny les Saincts, que nous oyons si hautement parler d'eux, ny les Philosophes, ny les Theologiens ne se brident. Ne fay-ie moy, quoy que ie soye aussi peu l'vn que l'autre. S'ils n'en escriuent à point nommé, aumoins, quand l'occasion les y porte, ne feignent ils pas de se ietter bien auant sur le trottoir. Dequoy traitte Socrates plus largement que de soy? A quoy achemine il plus souuent les propos de ses disciples, qu'à parler d'eux, non pas de la leçon de leur liure, mais de l'estre et branle de leur ame?

Only good things can be abused. And I believe this rule concerns only the failings of ordinary people. These are bridles for calves, with which neither the saints, whom we hear speaking of themselves so loftily, nor the philosophers, nor the theologians bridle themselves. Nor do I, though I am as little the one as the other. If they do not write about themselves expressly, at least, when occasion leads them to it, they do not hesitate to step well out onto the public promenade. What does Socrates discuss more fully than himself? To what does he more often lead his disciples' talk than to speaking of themselves—not of the lesson in their book, but of the being and motion of their soul?

Nous nous disons religieusement à Dieu, et à nostre confesseur, comme noz voisins à tout le peuple. Mais nous n'en disons, me respondra-on, que les accusations. Nous disons donc tout: car nostre vertu mesme est fautiere et repentable. Mon mestier et mon art, c'est viure. Qui me defend d'en parler selon mon sens, experience et vsage: qu'il ordonne à l'architecte de parler des bastiments non selon soy, mais selon son voisin, selon la science d'vn autre, non selon la sienne. Si c'est gloire, de soy-mesme publier ses valeurs, que ne met Cicero en auant l'eloquence de Hortense; Hortense celle de Cicero? A l'aduenture entendent ils que ie tesmoigne de moy par ouurage et effects, non nuement par des paroles.

We speak of ourselves devoutly to God and to our confessor, as our neighbors do to the whole congregation. "But we tell only our accusations," someone will answer. Then we tell everything; for even our virtue is faulty and calls for repentance. My trade and my art is living. Whoever forbids me to speak of it according to my own sense, experience and practice, let him order the architect to speak of buildings not according to himself but according to his neighbor, according to someone else's knowledge and not his own. If it is glory-seeking to proclaim one's own merits oneself, why does Cicero not put forward the eloquence of Hortensius, and Hortensius that of Cicero? Perhaps they mean that I should bear witness to myself by works and deeds, not by bare words.[12] peine le puis ie coucher en ce corps aëré de la voix. Des plus sages hommes, et des plus deuots, ont vescu fuyants tous apparents effects. Les effects diroyent plus de la Fortune, que de moy. Ils tesmoignent leur roolle, non pas le mien, si ce n'est coniecturalement et incertainement. Eschantillons d'vne montre particuliere. Ie m'estalle entier: c'est vn skeletos, où d'vne veuë les veines, les muscles, les tendons paroissent, chasque piece en son siege. L'effect de la toux en produisoit vne partie: l'effect de la palleur ou battement de cœur vn' autre, et doubteusement. Ce ne sont mes gestes que i'escris; c'est moy, c'est mon essence.

Si ie me sembloy bon et sage tout à fait, ie l'entonneroy à pleine teste. De dire moins de soy, qu'il n'y en a, c'est sottise, non modestie: se payer de moins, qu'on ne vaut, c'est lascheté et pusillanimité selon Aristote. Nulle vertu ne s'ayde de la fausseté: et la verité n'est iamais matiere d'erreur. De dire de soy plus qu'il n'en y a, ce n'est pas tousiours presomption, c'est encore souuent sottise. Se complaire outre mesure de ce qu'on est, en tomber en amour de soy indiscrete, est à mon aduis la substance de ce vice.

Le supreme remede à le guarir, c'est faire tout le rebours de ce que ceux icy ordonnent, qui en défendant le parler de soy, defendent par consequent encore plus de penser à soy. L'orgueil gist en la pensée: la langue n'y peut auoir qu'vne bien legere part.

2.6.20 De s'amuser à soy, il leur semble que c'est se plaire en soy: de se hanter et prattiquer, que c'est se trop cherir. Mais cet excez naist seulement en ceux qui ne se tastent que superficiellement, qui se voyent apres leurs affaires, qui appellent resuerie et oysiueté de s'entretenir de soy, et s'estoffer et bastir, faire des chasteaux en Espaigne: s'estimants chose tierce et estrangere à eux mesmes. Si quelcun s'enyure de sa science, regardant souz soy: qu'il tourne les yeux au dessus vers les siecles passez, il baissera les cornes, y trouuant tant de milliers d'esprits, qui le foulent aux pieds.

Only with great difficulty can I set it down in this airy body of the voice. Some of the wisest and most devout men have lived avoiding all visible deeds. Deeds would say more about Fortune than about me. They bear witness to their own part, not mine, except by conjecture and uncertainly: samples that show only a single detail. I lay myself out whole: it is a skeletos, where at a single glance the veins, the muscles, the tendons appear, each part in its place. The effect of a cough would reveal one part of it; the effect of pallor or a pounding heart another, and doubtfully at that. It is not my deeds that I write; it is myself, it is my essence.[13]

I hold that one must be careful in assessing oneself, and equally conscientious in bearing witness to it, whether low or high, without distinction. If I seemed to myself good and wise through and through, I would sing it out at the top of my voice. To say less of oneself than is true is stupidity, not modesty; to rate oneself at less than one is worth is cowardice and pusillanimity, according to Aristotle. No virtue helps itself with falsehood, and truth is never matter for error. To say more of oneself than is true is not always presumption; often it is also stupidity. To be pleased beyond measure with what one is, to fall into an indiscreet love of oneself, is in my opinion the substance of this vice.

The supreme remedy to cure it is to do the exact opposite of what these people prescribe, who, by forbidding us to speak of ourselves, consequently forbid even more strongly that we think of ourselves. Pride lies in thought; the tongue can have only a very slight share in it.

To them, occupying oneself with oneself seems to mean being pleased with oneself; frequenting and keeping company with oneself seems to mean being too fond of oneself. But this excess arises only in those who feel themselves out only superficially, who look at themselves only after their business is done, who call it daydreaming and idleness to converse with oneself, to furnish and build oneself up—building castles in Spain—regarding themselves as a third party, a stranger to

If he falls into some flattering presumption about his valor, let him recall the lives of Scipio, of Epaminondas, of so many armies, so many peoples, who leave him so far behind. No particular quality will make a man proud who at the same time takes into account so many other imperfect and weak qualities that are in him, and in the end the nothingness of the human condition. Because Socrates alone had seriously taken to heart the precept of his god, to know himself, and through that study had come to despise himself, he alone was judged worthy of the name of Wise. Whoever knows himself in this way, let him boldly make himself known with his own mouth.[14]

II.7 Of Rewards of Honor

Des récompenses d'honneur

Honors without monetary value reward virtue best, Montaigne argues, but only while rare—as France's Order of Saint Michael no longer is.

2.7.1 CEVX qui escriuent la vie d'Auguste Cæsar, remerquent cecy en sa discipline militaire, que des dons il estoit merueilleusement liberal enuers ceux qui le meritoient: mais que des pures recompenses d'honneur il en estoit bien autant espargnant. Si est-ce qu'il auoit esté luy mesme gratifié par son oncle, de toutes les recompenses militaires, auant qu'il eust iamais esté à la guerre.

Ç'a esté vne belle inuention, et receuë en la plus part des polices du monde, d'establir certaines merques vaines et sans prix, pour en honnorer et recompenser la vertu: comme sont les couronnes de laurier, de chesne, de meurte, la forme de certain vestement, le priuilege d'aller en coche par ville, ou de nuit auecques flambeau, quelque assiette particuliere aux assemblées publiques, la prerogatiue d'aucuns surnoms et titres, certaines merques aux armoiries, et choses semblables dequoy l'vsage a esté diuersement receu selon l'opinion des nations, et dure encores.

Et ce qui a esté tousiours conneu par experience ancienne, et que nous auons autrefois aussi peu voir entre nous, que les gens de qualité auoyent plus de ialousie de telles recompenses, que de celles où il y auoit du guain et du profit, cela n'est pas sans raison et grande apparence.

ENGLISH

Those who write the life of Augustus Caesar note this about his military discipline: that he was marvelously generous with gifts to those who deserved them, but quite as sparing with purely honorary rewards. And yet he himself had been granted every military reward by his uncle before he had ever been to war.[1]

It was a fine invention, and one accepted in most governments of the world, to establish certain marks that are empty and of no monetary value in order to honor and reward virtue: such as crowns of laurel, of oak, of myrtle; the cut of a certain garment; the privilege of riding in a carriage through the city, or of going about at night with a torch; some special seat at public assemblies; the prerogative of certain surnames and titles; certain marks on coats of arms; and similar things, whose use has been variously received according to the opinion of nations, and still endures.

We, for our part, and several of our neighbors, have orders of knighthood, which are established for this purpose alone. It is truly a very good and profitable custom to find a way of recognizing the worth of rare and excellent men, and of contenting and satisfying them with payments that are no burden at all on the public and cost the Prince nothing. And what has always been known from ancient experience, and what we too could once see among ourselves—that people of quality were more eager for such rewards than for those that brought gain and profit—is not without reason and strong likelihood.

If with a prize that ought to be purely one of honor we mix other advantages and wealth, this mixture, instead of increasing its esteem, debases and diminishes it. The Order of Saint Michael, which was temps en credit parmy nous, n'auoit point de plus grande commodité que celle-la, de n'auoir communication d'aucune autre commodité. Cela faisoit, qu'autre-fois il n'y auoit ne charge ny estat, quel qu'il fust, auquel la Noblesse pretendist auec tant de desir et d'affection, qu'elle faisoit à l'ordre, ny qualité qui apportast plus de respect et de grandeur: la vertu embrassant et aspirant plus volontiers à vne recompense purement sienne, plustost glorieuse, qu'vtile.

2.7.3 Car à la verité les autres dons n'ont pas leur vsage si digne, d'autant qu'on les employe à toute sorte d'occasions. Par des richesses on satisfaict le seruice d'vn valet, la diligence d'vn courrier, le dancer, le voltiger, le parler, et les plus viles offices qu'on reçoiue: voire et le vice s'en paye, la flaterie, le maquerelage, la trahison: ce n'est pas merueille si la vertu reçoit et desire moins volontiers cette sorte de monnoye commune, que celle qui luy est propre et particuliere, toute noble et genereuse. Auguste auoit raison d'estre beaucoup plus mesnager et espargnant de cette-cy, que de l'autre: d'autant que l'honneur, c'est vn priuilege qui tire sa principale essence de la rareté: et la vertu mesme.

Cui malus est nemo, quis bonus esse potest? On ne remerque pas pour la recommandation d'vn homme, qu'il ait soin de la nourriture de ses enfans, d'autant que c'est vne action commune, quelque iuste qu'elle soit: non plus qu'vn grand arbre, où la forest est toute de mesmes. Ie ne pense pas qu'aucun citoyen de Sparte se glorifiast de sa vaillance: car c'estoit vne vertu populaire en leur nation: et aussi peu de la fidelité et mespris des richesses. Il n'eschoit pas de recompense à vne vertu, pour grande qu'elle soit, qui est passée en coustume: et ne sçay auec, si nous l'appellerions iamais grande, estant commune.

2.7.4 Puis donc que ces loyers d'honneur, n'ont autre prix et estimation que cette là, que peu de gens en iouyssent, il n'est, pour les aneantir, que d'en faire largesse. Quand il se trouueroit plus d'hommes qu'au temps passé, qui meritassent nostre ordre, il n'en faloit pas pourtant corrompre l'estimation. Et peut aysément aduenir que plus le meritent: car il n'est aucune des vertuz qui s'espande si aysement que la vaillance militaire.

in credit among us for so long, had no greater advantage than this: that it brought with it no other advantage. That is why there was once no office or position, whatever it might be, to which the nobility aspired with as much desire and eagerness as to the Order, nor any rank that brought more respect and grandeur: virtue more willingly embracing and aspiring to a reward that is purely its own, glorious rather than useful.[2]

For in truth other gifts are not put to so worthy a use, since they are employed on all sorts of occasions. With riches we pay for a valet's service, a courier's diligence, dancing, vaulting, speaking, and the vilest services we receive; indeed vice is paid with them too—flattery, pimping, treachery. It is no wonder if virtue accepts and desires this sort of common coin less willingly than the kind that is proper and peculiar to it, wholly noble and generous. Augustus was right to be much more thrifty and sparing with the latter than with the former, since honor is a privilege that draws its principal essence from rarity—and so does virtue itself.

If no one is bad, who can be good? We do not mention, in praise of a man, that he takes care to bring up his children, because it is a common action, however right it may be—any more than we notice a tall tree where the whole forest is the same. I do not think any citizen of Sparta prided himself on his valor, for it was a common virtue in their nation; and just as little on loyalty and contempt for riches. No reward falls due to a virtue, however great it may be, that has become customary; and I am not sure, besides, that we would ever call it great when it is common.[3]

Since, then, these rewards of honor have no other value and esteem than this, that few people enjoy them, the only way to destroy them is to hand them out freely. Even if there were more men than in times past who deserved our Order, its esteem should not therefore have been corrupted. And it may easily happen that more do deserve it; for there is no virtue that spreads so easily as military valor.

2 Founded by Louis XI in 1469, the Order was conferred so freely during the civil wars that it lost its prestige; Montaigne received it in 1571.

Il y en a vne autre vraye, perfaicte et philosophique, dequoy ie ne parle point (et me sers de ce mot, selon nostre vsage) bien plus grande que cette cy, et plus pleine: qui est vne force et asseurance de l'ame, mesprisant également toute sorte de contraires accidens; equable, vniforme et constante, de laquelle la nostre n'est qu'vn bien petit rayon.

2.7.5 L'vsage, l'institution, l'exemple et la coustume, peuuent tout ce qu'elles veulent en l'establissement de celle, dequoy ie parle, et la rendent aysement vulgaire, comme il est tres-aysé à voir par l'experience que nous en donnent nos guerres ciuiles. Et qui nous pourroit ioindre à cette heure, et acharner à vne entreprise commune tout nostre peuple, nous ferions refleurir nostre ancien nom militaire. Il est bien certain, que la recompense de l'ordre ne touchoit pas au temps passé seulement la vaillance, elle regardoit plus loing. Ce n'a iamais esté le payement d'vn valeureux soldat, mais d'vn Capitaine fameux.

La science d'obeïr ne meritoit pas vn loyer si honorable: on y requeroit anciennement vne expertise bellique plus vniuerselle, et qui embrassast la plus part et plus grandes parties d'vn homme militaire, neque enim eædem militares et imperatoriæ artes sunt, qui fust encore, outre cela de condition accommodable à vne telle dignité. Mais ie dy, quand plus de gens en seroyent dignes qu'il ne s'en trouuoit autresfois, qu'il ne falloit pas pourtant s'en rendre plus liberal: et eust mieux vallu faillir à n'en estrener pas tous ceux, à qui il estoit deu, que de perdre pour iamais, comme nous venons de faire, l'vsage d'vne inuention si vtile. Aucun homme de cœur ne daigne s'auantager de ce qu'il a de commun auec plusieurs.

Et ceux d'auiourd'huy qui ont moins merité cette recompense, font plus de contenance de la desdaigner, pour se loger par là, au reng de ceux à qui on fait tort d'espandre indignement et auilir cette marque qui leur estoit particulierement deuë.

2.7.6 Or de s'attendre en effaçant et abolissant cette-cy, de pouuoir soudain remettre en credit, et renouueller vne semblable coustume, ce n'est pas entreprinse propre à vne saison si licentieuse et malade, qu'est celle, où nous nous trouuons à present: et en aduiendra que la derniere encourra dés sa naissance, les incommoditez qui viennent de ruiner l'autre. Les regles de la dispensation

ENGLISH

There is another valor, true, perfect and philosophical, of which I am not speaking (and I use this word in our ordinary sense), much greater than this one and fuller: a strength and assurance of the soul, despising equally every kind of adverse accident; even, uniform and constant; of which ours is only a very small ray.

Practice, education, example and custom can do all they wish in establishing the kind I am speaking of, and easily make it common, as is very easy to see from the experience our civil wars give us. And if someone could unite us now and set our whole people fiercely upon a common enterprise, we would make our ancient military name flourish again. It is quite certain that in times past the reward of the Order did not concern valor alone; it looked further. It was never the pay of a valiant soldier, but of a famous captain.

The science of obeying did not deserve so honorable a reward. In former times a more universal military expertise was required for it, one that embraced most of a military man's qualities, and the greatest of them—for the skills of a soldier and those of a general are not the same—and the man was also required to be, in addition, of a rank suited to such a dignity. But I say that even if more people were worthy of it than were found in former times, one should not therefore have become more liberal with it; and it would have been better to fail to bestow it on all those to whom it was due than to lose forever, as we have just done, the use of so useful an invention. No man of spirit deigns to pride himself on what he has in common with many.[4]

And those today who have least deserved this reward make the greatest show of disdaining it, so as thereby to place themselves among those who are wronged when this mark, which was particularly due to them, is unworthily scattered about and cheapened.

Now to expect, by effacing and abolishing this order, to be able suddenly to restore a similar custom to credit and renew it is not an undertaking suited to so licentious and sick a season as the one we find ourselves in now; and the result will be that the new one will incur from its birth the drawbacks that have just ruined the other. de ce nouuel ordre, auroyent besoing d'estre extremement tendues et contraintes, pour luy donner authorité: et cette saison tumultuaire n'est pas capable d'vne bride courte et reglée. Outre ce qu'auant qu'on luy puisse donner credit, il est besoing qu'on ayt perdu la memoire du premier, et du mespris auquel il est cheut.

2.7.7 Ce lieu pourroit receuoir quelque discours sur la consideration de la vaillance, et difference de cette vertu aux autres: mais Plutarque estant souuent retombé sur ce propos, ie me meslerois pour neant de rapporter icy ce qu'il en dit. Cecy est digne d'estre consideré, que nostre nation donne à la vaillance le premier degré des vertus, comme son nom montre, qui vient de valeur: et qu'à nostre vsage, quand nous disons vn homme qui vaut beaucoup, ou vn homme de bien, au stile de nostre Cour, et de nostre Noblesse, ce n'est à dire autre chose qu'vn vaillant homme: d'vne façon pareille à la Romaine. Car la generale appellation de vertu prend chez eux etymologie de la force.

La forme propre, et seule, et essencielle, de noblesse en France, c'est la vacation militaire. Il est vray-semblable que la premiere vertu qui se soit faict paroistre entre les hommes, et qui a donné aduantage aux vns sur les autres, ç'a esté cette-cy: par laquelle les plus forts et courageux se sont rendus maistres des plus foibles, et ont acquis reng et reputation particuliere: d'où luy est demeuré cet honneur et dignité de langage: ou bien que ces nations estans tres-belliqueuses, ont donné le prix à celle des vertus, qui leur estoit plus familiere, et le plus digne tiltre.

Tout ainsi que nostre passion, et cette fieureuse solicitude que nous auons de la chasteté des femmes, fait aussi qu'vne bonne femme, vne femme de bien, et femme d'honneur et de vertu, ce ne soit en effect à dire autre chose pour nous, qu'vne femme chaste: comme si pour les obliger à ce deuoir, nous mettions à nonchaloir tous les autres, et leur laschions la bride à toute autre faute, pour entrer en composition de leur faire quitter cette-cy.

rules for dispensing this new order would need to be extremely tight and strict to give it authority; and this tumultuous season is not capable of a short, controlled rein. Besides, before it can be given credit, the memory of the first must be lost, along with the contempt into which it has fallen.[5]

This might be the place for some reasoning on the nature of valor and how this virtue differs from the others; but since Plutarch has often returned to this subject, I would be meddling to no purpose if I repeated here what he says of it. This is worth considering: that our nation gives valor the first rank among the virtues, as its name shows, for it comes from "value"; and that in our usage, when we speak of a man who is worth a great deal, or a man of worth, in the style of our court and our nobility, it means nothing other than a valiant man—in a way similar to the Romans. For with them the general term for virtue takes its etymology from strength.[6]

The proper, sole and essential form of nobility in France is the military profession. It is likely that the first virtue to show itself among men, and to give some the advantage over others, was this one, by which the strongest and most courageous made themselves masters of the weaker and acquired special rank and reputation; whence this honor and dignity of language has remained attached to it. Or else these nations, being very warlike, gave the prize and the worthiest title to the virtue that was most familiar to them.

Just as our passion and the feverish anxiety we have about the chastity of women also brings it about that a good woman, a woman of worth, a woman of honor and virtue, in effect means nothing else to us than a chaste woman: as if, to bind them to this duty, we neglected all the others and gave them free rein for every other fault, striking a bargain to make them give up this one.

5 Henry III founded the Order of the Holy Spirit in 1578.
6 Latin virtus (virtue) derives from vir, "man," and carried the sense of manly strength and courage.

II.8 Of the Affection of Fathers for Their Children

De l'affection des pères aux enfants

Madam, if strangeness and novelty, which usually give value to things, do not save me, I shall never come out of this foolish undertaking with honor; but it is so fantastic, and has a face so remote from common practice, that this may let it pass. It was a melancholy humor—and therefore a humor very hostile to my natural temperament—produced by the gloom of the solitude into which I had thrown myself some years ago, that first put into my head this daydream of meddling with writing. And then, finding myself entirely unprovided and empty of any other matter, I offered myself to myself as argument and subject.

I praise God, Madam, that it has been so well employed; for the good hopes that Monsieur d'Estissac, your son, gives of himself are sufficient assurance that when he comes of age you will receive from him the obedience and gratitude of a very good son.

But since, because of his childhood, he has not been able to notice the extreme services he has received from you in such great number, I want him—if these writings should one day fall into his hands, when I no longer have mouth or speech to say it—to receive this testimony from me in all truth (and it will be borne out still more vividly to him by the good effects he will feel, if it please God): that there is no gentleman in France who owes more to his mother than he does, and that he can give no surer proof in the future of his goodness and his virtue than by acknowledging you as such.

2.8.3 S'il y a quelque loy vrayement naturelle, c'est à dire quelque instinct, qui se voye vniuersellement et perpetuellement empreinct aux bestes et en nous, ce qui n'est pas sans controuerse, ie puis dire à mon aduis, qu'apres le soin que chasque animal a de sa conseruation, et de fuir ce qui nuit, l'affection que l'engendrant porte à son engeance, tient le second lieu en ce rang. Et parce que Nature semble nous l'auoir recommandée, regardant à estendre et faire aller auant, les pieces successiues de cette sienne machine: ce n'est pas merueille, si à reculons des enfans aux peres, elle n'est pas si grande. Ioint cette autre consideration Aristotelique: que celuy qui bien faict à quelcun, l'aime mieux, qu'il n'en est aimé.

Et celuy à qui il est deu, aime mieux, que celuy qui doibt: et tout ouurier aime mieux son ouurage, qu'il n'en seroit aimé, si l'ouurage auoit du sentiment: d'autant que nous auons cher, estre, et estre consiste en mouuement et

If there is any truly natural law, that is to say any instinct seen to be universally and perpetually imprinted in animals and in us (which is not without controversy), I can say, in my opinion, that after the care every animal has for its own preservation and for avoiding what harms it, the affection that the begetter bears its offspring holds second place in this ranking. And because Nature seems to have commended it to us, looking to extend and carry forward the successive pieces of this machine of hers, it is no wonder if, going backward from children to fathers, it is not so great. Add to this another, Aristotelian consideration: that he who does good to someone loves him more than he is loved by him.[2] action. Parquoy chascun est aucunement en son ouurage. Qui bien fait, exerce vne action belle et honneste: qui reçoit, l'exerce vtile seulement. Or l'vtile est de beaucoup moins aimable que l'honneste. L'honneste est stable et permanent, fournissant à celuy qui l'a faict, vne gratification constante. L'vtile se perd et eschappe facilement, et n'en est la memoire ny si fresche ny si douce. Les choses nous sont plus cheres, qui nous ont plus cousté. Et donner, est de plus de coust que le prendre.

2.8.4 Puis qu'il a pleu à Dieu nous doüer de quelque capacité de discours, affin que comme les bestes nous ne fussions pas seruilement assubiectis aux loix communes, ains que nous nous y appliquassions par iugement et liberté volontaire: nous deuons bien prester vn peu à la simple authorité de Nature: mais non pas nous laisser tyranniquement emporter à elle: la seule raison doit auoir la conduite de nos inclinations. I'ay de ma part le goust estrangement mousse à ces propensions, qui sont produites en nous sans l'ordonnance et entremise de nostre iugement.

Comme sur ce subiect, duquel ie parle, ie ne puis receuoir cette passion, dequoy on embrasse les enfans à peine encore naiz, n'ayants ny mouuement en l'ame, ny forme recognoissable au corps, par où ils se puissent rendre aimables: et ne les ay pas souffert volontiers nourrir pres de moy. Il en va fort souuent au rebours, et le plus communement nous nous sentons plus esmeuz des trepignemens, ieux et niaiseries pueriles de noz enfans, que nous ne faisons apres, de leurs actions toutes formées: comme si nous les auions aymez pour nostre passe-temps, comme des guenons, non comme des hommes. Et tel fournit bien liberalement de iouëts à leur enfance, qui se trouue resserré à la moindre despence qu'il leur faut estans en aage. work had feeling, since we hold being dear, and being consists in movement and action. Therefore each man is in some way in his work. He who does good performs a fine and honorable action; he who receives performs only a useful one. Now the useful is much less lovable than the honorable. The honorable is stable and permanent, furnishing the one who did it with a constant gratification. The useful is easily lost and slips away, and its memory is neither so fresh nor so sweet. Things are dearer to us the more they have cost us. And giving costs more than taking.

Since it has pleased God to endow us with some capacity for reasoning, so that we should not, like the animals, be slavishly subjected to the common laws, but should apply ourselves to them by judgment and voluntary freedom, we must indeed yield a little to the simple authority of Nature, but not let ourselves be tyrannically carried away by her: reason alone must have the guidance of our inclinations. For my part, my taste is strangely dull toward those propensities that are produced in us without the command and mediation of our judgment.

So, on the subject I am speaking of, I cannot accept that passion with which people embrace children barely born, who have neither movement in their soul nor recognizable form in their body by which they could make themselves lovable; and I have not willingly allowed them to be nursed near me. A true and well-regulated affection ought to be born and to grow with the knowledge they give us of themselves; and then, if they are worth it, natural propensity marching along with reason, we should cherish them with a truly paternal love; and we should judge likewise if they are otherwise, always submitting to reason in spite of natural force.

It very often goes the other way, and most commonly we feel more moved by the stamping, games and childish silliness of our children than we are later by their fully formed actions—as if we had loved them for our amusement, like monkeys, and not as human beings. And a man who supplies toys very liberally for their childhood turns tightfisted at the slightest expense they need once they are grown. Indeed it seems that the jealousy we feel at seeing them make their appearance and en-

As for me, I find it cruel and unjust not to admit them to a share and partnership in our goods, and as companions in the understanding of our domestic affairs when they are capable of it, and not to cut back and restrict our own comforts to provide for theirs, since we begot them for that purpose. It is unjust that an old father, broken and half dead, should enjoy alone, in a corner by the fire, goods that would suffice for the advancement and maintenance of several children, and meanwhile let them, for lack of means, lose their best years without making their way into public service and the knowledge of men. They are driven to the despair of seeking some means, however unjust, to provide for their needs.

So I have seen in my time several young men of good family so given to theft that no correction could turn them from it. I know one, well connected, to whom I once spoke for this purpose at the request of his brother, a very honorable and gallant gentleman. He answered and confessed to me quite frankly that he had been led into this filthy practice by the harshness and avarice of his father, but that now he was so used to it that he could not keep from it. And at that very time he had just been caught stealing the rings of a lady, at whose morning rising he had been present along with many others.

He reminded me of a story I had heard told about another gentleman, so practiced and trained in this fine trade in his youth that when he later came into his property and resolved to give up this traffic, he still could not keep himself, if he passed near a shop where there was something he veu plusieurs si dressez et duitz à cela, que parmy leurs compagnons mesmes, ils desrobboient ordinairement des choses qu'ils vouloient rendre. Ie suis Gascon, et si n'est vice auquel ie m'entende moins.

Ie le hay vn peu plus par complexion, que ie ne l'accuse par discours: seulement par desir, ie ne soustrais rien à personne. Ce quartier en est à la verité vn peu plus descrié que les autres de la Françoise nation. Si est-ce que nous auons veu de nostre temps à diuerses fois, entre les mains de la Iustice, des hommes de maison, d'autres contrées, conuaincus de plusieurs horribles voleries. Ie crains que de cette desbauche il s'en faille aucunement prendre à ce vice des peres.

2.8.6 Et si on me respond ce que fit vn iour vn Seigneur de bon entendement, qu'il faisoit espargne des richesses, non pour en tirer autre fruict et vsage, que pour se faire honorer et rechercher aux siens; et que l'aage luy ayant osté toutes autres forces, c'estoit le seul remede qui luy restoit pour se maintenir en authorité en sa famille, et pour euiter qu'il ne vinst à mespris et desdain à tout le monde (de vray non la vieillesse seulement, mais toute imbecillité, selon Aristote, est promotrice d'auarice) cela est quelque chose: mais c'est la medecine à vn mal, duquel on deuoit euiter la naissance.

Vn pere est bien miserable, qui ne tient l'affection de ses enfans, que par le besoin qu'ils ont de son secours, si cela se doit nommer affection: il faut se rendre respectable par sa vertu, et par sa suffisance, et aymable par sa bonté et douceur de ses mœurs. Les cendres mesmes d'vne riche matiere, elles ont leur prix: et les os et reliques des personnes d'honneur, nous auons accoustumé de les tenir en respect et reuerence.

Nulle vieillesse peut estre si caducque et si rance, à vn personnage qui a passé en honneur son aage, qu'elle ne soit venerable; et notamment à ses enfans, desquels il faut auoir reglé l'ame à leur deuoir par raison, non par necessité et par le besoin, ny par rudesse et par force. Et errat longè, mea quidem sententia, needed, from stealing it, even though he then took the trouble to send payment for it. And I have seen several so trained and broken to it that even among their own companions they habitually stole things they meant to give back. I am a Gascon, and yet there is no vice I understand less.[3]

I hate it a little more by temperament than I condemn it by reasoning; not even in desire do I take anything from anyone. This region is, truth to tell, a little more decried for it than the other parts of the French nation. And yet in our time we have seen, on various occasions, men of good family from other regions in the hands of justice, convicted of several horrible robberies. I fear that for this depravity we must to some extent blame this vice of the fathers.

And if I am answered as a lord of good understanding once answered me—that he saved up his riches not to get any other fruit or use from them than to make himself honored and sought after by his family; and that, since age had taken away all his other strengths, this was the only remedy left to him to maintain his authority in his household and to avoid falling into contempt and disdain with everyone (indeed, according to Aristotle, not only old age but every weakness promotes avarice)—that is something; but it is the medicine for an ailment whose birth one ought to have prevented.

A father is very wretched who holds his children's affection only through their need of his help—if that can be called affection. One must make oneself respected by one's virtue and ability, and loved by one's kindness and gentleness of manner. Even the ashes of a rich substance have their value; and the bones and relics of honorable persons we are accustomed to hold in respect and reverence.

No old age can be so decrepit and stale, in a man who has spent his life in honor, that it is not venerable; and especially to his children, whose souls he must have trained to their duty by reason, not by necessity and need, nor by harshness and force. And he is far mistaken, in my opinion at least, who believes that authority is weightier or more stable

AGAINST THE ROD

Montaigne condemns violence in education and recalls how gently he and his daughter were raised.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.8.7	I'accuse toute violence en l'education d'vne ame tendre, qu'on dresse pour l'honneur, et la liberté. Il y a ie ne sçay quoi de seruile en la rigueur, et en la contraincte: et tiens que ce qui ne se peut faire par la raison, et par prudence, et addresse, ne se fait iamais par la force. On m'a ainsin esleué: ils disent qu'en tout mon premier aage, ie n'ay tasté des verges qu'à deux coups, et bien mollement. I'ay deu la pareille aux enfans que i'ay eu.	I condemn all violence in the education of a tender soul that is being trained for honor and freedom. There is something servile about rigor and constraint; and I hold that what cannot be done by reason, prudence and skill is never done by force. That is how I was brought up: they say that in all my early years I tasted the rod only twice, and very softly. I owed the same to the children I have had.
	Ils me meurent tous en nourrisse: mais Leonor, vne seule fille qui est eschappée à cette infortune, a attaint six ans et plus, sans qu'on ayt employé à sa conduicte, et pour le chastiement de ses fautes pueriles, l'indulgence de sa mere s'y appliquant aysément, autre chose que parolles, et bien douces. Et quand mon desir y seroit frustré, il est assez d'autres causes ausquelles nous prendre, sans entrer en reproche auec ma discipline, que ie sçay estre iuste et naturelle. I'eusse esté beaucoup plus religieux encores en cela vers des masles, moins nais à seruir, et de condition plus libre: i'eusse aymé à leur grossir le cœur d'ingenuité et de franchise.	They all died on me while at nurse; but Léonor, an only daughter who escaped that misfortune, has reached the age of six and more without anything being used to guide her or to punish her childish faults—her mother's indulgence readily lending itself to this—other than words, and very gentle ones. And even if my hopes were disappointed in this, there are plenty of other causes to blame without finding fault with my method, which I know to be just and natural. I would have been still more scrupulous about this with boys, who are less born to serve and of a freer condition: I would have liked to swell their hearts with candor and frankness.
	Ie n'ay veu autre effect aux verges, sinon de rendre les ames plus lasches, ou plus malitieusement opiniastres.	I have seen no other effect of the rod than to make souls more cowardly, or more maliciously stubborn.
2.8.8	Voulons nous estre aymez de noz enfans? leur voulons nous oster l'occasion de souhaiter nostre mort? (combien que nulle occasion d'vn si horrible souhait, ne peut estre ny iuste ny excusable, nullum scelus rationem habet) accommodons leur vie raisonnablement, de ce qui est en nostre puissance. Pour cela, il ne nous faudroit pas marier si ieunes que nostre aage vienne quasi à se confondre auec le leur. Car cet inconuenient nous iette à plusieurs grandes difficultez.	Do we want to be loved by our children? Do we want to take away their reason for wishing us dead? (Although no reason for so horrible a wish can be either just or excusable: no crime has a reason.) Let us furnish their lives reasonably with what is in our power. For that, we ought not to marry so young that our age comes almost to merge with theirs. For this drawback throws us into many great difficulties.[5]
	Ie dy specialement à la Noblesse, qui est d'vne condition oysifue, et qui ne vit, comme on dit, que de ses rentes: car ailleurs, où la vie est questuaire, la pluralité et compagnie	I say this especially to the nobility, who are of an idle condition and live, as they say, only on their rents; for elsewhere, where life depends on earn-

2.8.9 Ie me mariay à trente trois ans, et louë l'opinion de trente cinq, qu'on dit estre d'Aristote. Platon ne veut pas qu'on se marie auant les trente: mais il a raison de se mocquer de ceux qui font les œuures de mariage apres cinquante cinq: et condamne leur engeance indigne d'aliment et de vie. Thales y donna les plus vrayes bornes: qui ieune, respondit à sa mere le pressant de se marier, qu'il n'estoit pas temps: et, deuenu sur l'aage, qu'il n'estoit plus temps. Il faut refuser l'opportunité à toute action importune.

Les anciens Gaulois estimoient à extreme reproche d'auoir eu accointance de femme, auant l'aage de vingt ans: et recommandoient singulierement aux hommes, qui se vouloient dresser pour la guerre, de conseruer bien auant en l'aage leur pucellage; d'autant que les courages s'amollissent et diuertissent par l'accouplage des femmes. Ma hor congiunto à giouinetta sposa, L'histoire Grecque remarque de Iecus Tarentin, de Chryso, d'Astylus, de Diopompus, et d'autres, que pour maintenir leurs corps fermes au seruice de la course des ieux Olympiques, de la Palæstrine, et tels exercices, ils se priuerent autant que leur dura ce soing, de toute sorte d'acte Venerien. ing, having many children around is a convenience for the household: they are so many new tools and instruments for growing rich.

I married at thirty-three, and I approve of thirty-five, the age said to be Aristotle's opinion. Plato does not want people to marry before thirty; but he is right to mock those who perform the works of marriage after fifty-five, and he condemns their offspring as unworthy of food and life. Thales set the truest limits: when he was young, he answered his mother, who was pressing him to marry, that it was not yet time; and when he was getting on in years, that it was no longer time. One must deny opportunity to every inopportune action.

The ancient Gauls considered it an extreme disgrace to have had intercourse with a woman before the age of twenty, and they particularly recommended to men who wanted to train for war that they keep their virginity until well on in years, since courage is softened and diverted by coupling with women. But now, joined to a young bride, happy at last in his children, he had grown soft in the affections of father and husband. Muleasses, King of Tunis, the one whom the Emperor Charles V restored to his states, reproached the memory of his father Mahomet for his frequenting of women, calling him a sluggard, spineless, a begetter of children.[6]

Greek history notes of Iccus of Tarentum, of Chryso, of Astylus, of Diopompus and others that, to keep their bodies firm for running in the Olympic Games, for wrestling and such exercises, they deprived themselves of every kind of act of Venus for as long as that concern lasted. In a certain region of the Spanish Indies, men were not allowed to marry until after forty, and yet girls were allowed to at ten.[7]

A gentleman of thirty-five: it is not yet time for him to make way for his son of twenty. that fathers commonly have on their lips may justly apply: "I don't want to undress before I go to bed."

2.8.10 Mais vn pere atterré d'années et de maux, priué par sa foiblesse et faute de santé, de la commune societé des hommes, il se faict tort, et aux siens, de couuer inutilement vn grand tas de richesses. Il est assez en estat, s'il est sage, pour auoir desir de se despouiller pour se coucher, non pas iusques à la chemise, mais iusques à vne robbe de nuict bien chaude: le reste des pompes, dequoy il n'a plus que faire, il doit en estrener volontiers ceux, à qui par ordonnance naturelle cela doit appartenir. C'est raison qu'il leur en laisse l'vsage, puis que Nature l'en priue: autrement sans doute il y a de la malice et de l'enuie.

But a father crushed by years and ailments, deprived by his weakness and poor health of the common company of men, wrongs himself and his family by uselessly brooding over a great heap of riches. He is in a fit state, if he is wise, to want to undress for bed—not down to his shirt, but down to a good warm nightgown. The rest of the finery, for which he has no further use, he should willingly bestow on those to whom by natural order it ought to belong. It is reasonable that he should leave them the use of it, since Nature deprives him of it; otherwise there is no doubt malice and envy in it.

La plus belle des actions de l'Empereur Charles cinquiesme fut celle-là, à l'imitation d'aucuns anciens de son qualibre, d'auoir sçeu recognoistre que la raison nous commande assez de nous despouiller, quand noz robbes nous chargent et empeschent, et de nous coucher quand les iambes nous faillent. Il resigna ses moyens, grandeur et puissance à son fils, lors qu'il sentit defaillir en soy la fermeté et la force pour conduire les affaires, auec la gloire qu'il y auoit acquise. Solue senescentem maturè sanus equum, ne / Peccet ad extremùm ridendus, et ilia ducat.

The finest of the Emperor Charles V's actions was this, in imitation of some ancients of his caliber: that he was able to recognize that reason commands us to undress when our robes weigh on us and hamper us, and to go to bed when our legs fail us. He resigned his wealth, greatness and power to his son when he felt failing in himself the firmness and strength to conduct affairs with the glory he had won in them. Be sensible and unharness the aging horse in good time, lest / at the end he stumble, a laughingstock, and heave his flanks.[8]

2.8.11 Cette faute, de ne se sçauoir recognoistre de bonne heure, et ne sentir l'impuissance et extreme alteration que l'aage apporte naturellement et au corps et à l'ame, qui à mon opinion est esgale, si l'ame n'en a plus de la moitié, a perdu la reputation de la plus part des grands hommes du monde. I'ay veu de mon temps et cognu familierement, des personnages de grande authorité, qu'il estoit bien aisé à voir, estre merueilleusement descheuz de cette ancienne suffisance, que ie cognoissois par la reputation qu'ils en auoient acquise en leurs meilleurs ans. Ie les eusse pour leur honneur volontiers souhaitez retirez en leur maison à leur aise, et deschargez des occupations publiques et guerrieres, qui n'estoient plus pour leurs espaules.

This failing has ruined the reputation of most of the great men of the world: not knowing how to recognize ourselves in good time, and not feeling the impotence and extreme alteration that age naturally brings to both body and soul. In my opinion it affects both equally, unless the soul gets more than half. In my time I have seen, and known intimately, persons of great authority who had plainly fallen a marvelous distance from that former ability which I knew from the reputation they had won in their best years. For their honor's sake I would gladly have wished them retired to their homes at their ease, relieved of public and military duties that were no longer for their shoulders.

I'ay autrefois esté priué en la maison d'vn Gentilhomme veuf et fort vieil, d'vne vieillesse toutefois assez verte. Cettuy-cy auoit plusieurs filles à marier, et vn fils desia en aage de paroistre; cela chargeoit sa maison de plusieurs despences et visites estrangeres, à quoy il prenoit peu de plaisir, non seulement pour le soin de l'espargne, mais encore plus, pour auoir, à cause de l'aage, pris vne forme de vie fort esloignée de la nostre.

I was once on intimate terms in the household of a gentleman who was a widower and very old, though his old age was still quite green. He had several daughters to marry off and a son already old enough to make his appearance in the world. This burdened his house with many expenses and with visits from outsiders, which gave him little pleasure. This was not only out of concern for economy, but still more because, on account of his age, he had adopted a way of life very far removed from ours.

Ie luy dy vn iour vn peu hardiment, comme i'ay accoustumé, qu'il luy sieroit mieux de nous faire place, et de laisser à son fils sa maison principale, car il n'auoit que celle-là de bien logée et accommodée, et se retirer en vne sienne terre voisine, où personne n'apporteroit incommodité à son repos, puis qu'il ne pouuoit autrement euiter nostre importunité, veu la condition de ses enfans. Il m'en creut depuis, et s'en trouua bien.

One day, a little boldly, as is my habit, I told him it would become him better to make way for us. He should leave his main house to his son, for it was the only one he had that was well built and well furnished, and retire to an estate of his nearby, where no one would disturb his repose. Given his children's situation, he could not otherwise escape our importunity. He took my advice afterward, and was the better for it.

2.8.12 Ce n'est pas à dire qu'on leur donne, par telle voye d'obligation, de laquelle on ne se puisse plus desdire: ie leur lairrois, moy qui suis à mesme de iouer ce rolle, la iouyssance de ma maison et de mes biens, mais auec liberté de m'en repentir, s'ils m'en donnoyent occasion: ie leur en lairrois l'vsage, par ce qu'il ne me seroit plus commode. Et de l'authorité des affaires en gros, ie m'en reseruerois autant qu'il me plairoit.

This is not to say that we should give to them by a binding deed that we could never go back on. I am in a position to play this part myself. I would leave them the enjoyment of my house and my property, but with the freedom to repent of it if they gave me cause. I would leave them the use of it because it was no longer convenient for me. And of authority over affairs in general, I would keep as much for myself as I pleased.

Ayant tousiours iugé que ce doit estre vn grand contentement à vn pere vieil, de mettre luy-mesme ses enfans en train du gouuernement de ses affaires, et de pouuoir pendant sa vie contreroller leurs deportemens: leur fournissant d'instruction et d'aduis suyuant l'experience qu'il en a, et d'acheminer luy mesme l'ancien honneur et ordre de sa maison en la main de ses successeurs, et se respondre par là, des esperances qu'il peut prendre de leur conduicte à venir. Et pour cet effect, ie ne voudrois pas fuir leur compagnie, ie voudrois les esclairer de pres, et iouyr selon la condition de mon aage, de leur allegresse, et de leurs festes.

For I have always judged that it must be a great satisfaction for an old father to set his children on the way to managing his affairs himself, and to be able to oversee their conduct during his lifetime. He can furnish them with instruction and advice from his own experience. He can hand on the ancient honor and order of his house into the hands of his successors himself, and so assure himself of the hopes he may place in their future conduct. And to that end I would not shun their company. I would want to watch over them from close by, and to enjoy their gaiety and their festivities, as far as my age allowed.

Si ie ne viuoy parmy eux (comme ie ne pourroy sans offencer leur assemblée par le chagrin de mon aage, et l'obligation de mes maladies, et sans contraindre aussi et forcer les regles et façons de viure que i'auroy lors) ie

A peine vne fois la sepmaine, vouloit-il permettre qu'aucun entrast pour le voir. Il se tenoit tousiours enfermé par le dedans de sa chambre seul, sauf qu'vn valet luy portoit vne fois le iour à manger, qui ne faisoit qu'entrer et sortir. Son occupation estoit se promener, et lire quelque liure, car il cognoissoit aucunement les lettres, obstiné au demeurant de mourir en cette desmarche, comme il fit bien tost apres.

I'essayeroy par vne douce conuersation, de nourrir en mes enfans vne viue amitié et bien-vueillance non feinte en mon endroict. Ce qu'on gaigne aisément enuers des natures bien nées: car si ce sont bestes furieuses, comme nostre siecle en produit à miliers, il les faut hayr et fuyr pour telles.

2.8.13 Ie veux mal à cette coustume, d'interdire aux enfants l'appellation paternelle, et leur en enioindre vn' estrangere, comme plus reuerentiale: Nature n'aiant volontiers pas suffisamment pourueu à nostre authorité. Nous appellons Dieu tout-puissant, pere, et desdaignons que noz enfants nous en appellent. I'ay reformé cett' erreur en ma famille. C'est aussi folie et iniustice de priuer les enfans qui sont en aage, de la familiarité des peres, et vouloir maintenir en leur endroit vne morgue austere et desdaigneuse, esperant par là, les tenir en crainte et obeissance. Car c'est vne farce tres-inutile, qui rend les peres ennuieux aux enfans, et qui pis est, ridicules.

ways of living I would then have. If so, I would at least want to live near them, in a part of my house —not the showiest, but the most comfortable. Not as I saw, some years ago, a Dean of Saint Hilary's at Poitiers, reduced to such solitude by the burden of his melancholy that when I entered his room, he had not taken a single step out of it for twenty-two years. And yet all his movements were free and easy, except for a catarrh that settled on his stomach. Barely once a week would he allow anyone to come in to see him. He always kept himself shut up alone in his room, locked from the inside, except that once a day a valet brought him his food, and the valet did nothing but come in and go out. His occupation was walking up and down and reading some book, for he had some acquaintance with letters. For the rest, he was determined to die in this way of life, as he did soon after.

I would try, by gentle conversation, to foster in my children a lively affection and an unfeigned goodwill toward me. That is easily won with well-born natures. For if they are raging beasts, such as our age produces by the thousands, they must be hated and shunned as such.

I dislike the custom of forbidding children to call their fathers "father" and requiring them to use some other title, as being more respectful—as if Nature had not sufficiently provided for our authority. We call Almighty God father, and we disdain to have our children call us so. I have reformed this error in my family. It is also folly and injustice to deprive grown children of familiarity with their fathers, and to try to keep up a stern and disdainful haughtiness toward them, hoping thereby to keep them in fear and obedience. For it is a quite useless farce, which makes fathers irksome to their children and, what is worse, ridiculous.

They have youth and strength in their hands, and consequently the wind and favor of the world. And they greet with mockery these proud and tyrannical airs of a man who has no blood left either in his heart or in his veins—real scarecrows in a hemp field. Even if I could make myself feared, I would still rather make myself loved. There are so many kinds of defects in old age, so much impotence, and it is so liable to contempt, that the best

THE DECEIVED OLD MASTER

An imperious old man believes he rules his house while everyone cheats him.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.8.14 I'en ay veu quelqu'vn, duquel la ieunesse auoit esté tres-imperieuse, quand c'est venu sur l'aage, quoy qu'il le passe sainement ce qu'il se peut, il frappe, il mord, il iure, le plus tempestatif maistre de France, il se ronge de soing et de vigilance, tout cela n'est qu'vn bastelage, auquel la famille mesme complotte: du grenier, du celier, voire et de sa bource, d'autres ont la meilleure part de l'vsage, cependant qu'il en a les clefs en sa gibbessiere, plus cherement que ses yeux. Cependant qu'il se contente de l'espargne et chicheté de sa table, tout est en desbauche en diuers reduits de sa maison, en ieu, et en despence, et en l'entretien des comptes de sa vaine cholere et prouuoyance.	I have seen one man whose youth had been very imperious. Now that he has come to old age, though he is getting through it as healthily as anyone can, he strikes, he bites, he swears—the most tempestuous master in France. He eats himself up with worry and vigilance. All of it is mere play-acting, and his own household is in on the plot. Others have the best part of the use of the granary, the cellar, and even his purse, while he keeps the keys in his pouch, dearer to him than his eyes. While he contents himself with a thrifty and stingy table, there is debauchery going on in various corners of his house—gambling, spending, and swapping tales of his futile anger and precautions.
Chacun est en sentinelle contre luy. Si par fortune quelque chetif seruiteur s'y addonne, soudain il luy est mis en soupçon: qualité à laquelle la vieillesse mord si volontiers de soy-mesme. Quantes fois s'est-il vanté à moy, de la bride qu'il donnoit aux siens, et exacte obeïssance et reuerence qu'il en receuoit; combien il voyoit clair en ses affaires! Ille solus nescit omnia. Ie ne sçache homme qui peust apporter plus de parties et naturelles et acquises, propres à conseruer la maistrise, qu'il faict, et si en est descheu comme vn enfant. Partant l'ay-ie choisi parmy plusieurs telles conditions que ie cognois, comme plus exemplaire. Ce seroit matiere à vne question scholastique, s'il est ainsi mieux, ou autrement. En presence, toutes choses luy cedent.	Everyone keeps watch against him. If by chance some wretched servant becomes devoted to him, that servant is at once made suspect in his eyes—and suspicion is a trait old age is all too ready to bite at of its own accord. How many times has he boasted to me of the tight rein he kept on his people, the exact obedience and reverence he received from them, and how clearly he saw into his affairs! He alone knows nothing of it all. I know of no man who could bring more qualities, natural and acquired, suited to keeping mastery than he does, and yet he has lost it like a child. That is why I have chosen him, among several such situations that I know, as the most instructive example. Whether he is better off this way or otherwise would make a matter for a scholastic debate. In his presence, everything gives way to him.[9]
Et laisse-on ce vain cours à son authorité, qu'on ne luy resiste iamais. On le croit, on le craint, on le respecte tout son saoul. Donne-il congé à vn valet? il plie son pacquet, le voila party: mais hors de deuant luy seulement. Les pas de la vieillesse sont si lents, les sens si troubles, qu'il viura et fera son office en mesme maison, vn an, sans estre apperceu. Et quand la saison en est, on faict venir des lettres lointaines, piteuses, suppliantes, pleines de	They let his authority run its empty course so far that no one ever resists him. He is believed, he is feared, he is respected to his heart's content. Does he dismiss a valet? The man packs his bundle, and off he goes—but only out of his sight. promesse de mieux faire, par où on le remet en grace. Monsieur fait-il quelque marché ou quelque depesche, qui desplaise? on la supprime: forgeant tantost apres, assez de causes, pour excuser la faute d'execution ou de response.

Nulles lettres estrangeres ne luy estants premierement apportées, il ne void que celles qui semblent commodes à sa science. Si par cas d'aduanture il les saisit, ayant en coustume de se reposer sur certaine personne, de les luy lire, on y trouue sur le champ ce qu'on veut: et faict-on à tous coups que tel luy demande pardon, qui l'iniurie par sa lettre. Il ne void en fin affaires, que par vne image disposée et desseignée et satisfactoire le plus qu'on peut, pour n'esueiller son chagrin et son courroux. I'ay veu souz des figures differentes, assez d'œconomies longues, constantes, de tout pareil effect.

2.8.15 Il est tousiours procliue aux femmes de disconuenir à leurs maris. Elles saisissent à deux mains toutes couuertures de leur contraster: la premiere excuse leur sert de pleniere iustification. I'en ay veu, qui desrobboit gros à son mary, pour, disoit-elle à son confesseur, faire ses aulmosnes plus grasses. Fiez vous à cette religieuse dispensation. Nul maniement leur semble auoir assez de dignité, s'il vient de la concession du mary. Il faut qu'elles l'vsurpent ou finement ou fierement, et tousiours iniurieusement, pour luy donner de la grace et de l'authorité.

Comme en mon propos, quand c'est contre vn pauure vieillard, et pour des enfants, lors empoignent elles ce tiltre, et en seruent leur passion, auec gloire: et comme en vn commun seruage, monopolent facilement contre sa domination et gouuernement. Si ce sont masles, grands et fleurissans, ils subornent aussi incontinent ou par force, ou par faueur, et maistre d'hostel et receueur, et tout le reste. Ceux qui n'ont ny femme ny fils, tombent en ce malheur plus difficilement, mais plus cruellement aussi et indignement. Le vieil Caton disoit en son temps, qu'autant de valets, autant d'ennemis. Voyez si selon la distance de la pureté de son siecle au nostre, il ne nous a pas voulu aduertir, que femme, fils, et valet, autant d'ennemis à nous.

is ripe, letters are made to arrive from far away, pitiful and pleading, full of promises to do better, and by this means he is restored to favor. Does Monsieur make some bargain or send some dispatch that others dislike? It is suppressed, and soon afterward enough reasons are forged to excuse the failure to carry it out or to reply.

Since no letters from outside are brought to him first, he sees only those that seem convenient for him to know about. If by some chance he gets hold of them, he is in the habit of relying on a certain person to read them to him, and that person finds in them on the spot whatever is wanted. Time and again they make a man beg his pardon who is insulting him in his letter. In short, he sees his affairs only through an image that has been arranged, designed, and made as satisfying as possible, so as not to stir up his ill humor and his wrath. Under different guises, I have seen plenty of households, long-lasting and steady, run with exactly the same result.

Women are always inclined to be at odds with their husbands. They seize with both hands every pretext for opposing them, and the first excuse serves them as full justification. I knew one who robbed her husband heavily so that, as she told her confessor, she could make her alms more generous. Trust that pious dispensation! No management seems to them to have enough dignity if it comes as a grant from the husband. They must usurp it, either craftily or boldly, and always wrongfully, to give it grace and authority.

This is what happens in the case I am speaking of. When it is against a poor old man and on behalf of the children, they seize on that title and serve their passion with it, and pride themselves on it. As if in a common servitude, they readily conspire against his rule and government. If the children are sons, grown and flourishing, they too promptly suborn the steward, the receiver, and all the rest, by force or by favor. Those who have neither wife nor son fall into this misfortune less easily, but also more cruelly and shamefully. Old Cato said in his day: so many servants, so many enemies. Consider the distance between the purity of his age and ours, and see whether he did not mean to warn us that wife, son, and servant are so many enemies to us.

	Bien sert à la decrepitude de nous fournir le doux benefice d'inapperceuance et d'ignorance, et facilité à nous laisser tromper. Si nous y mordions, que seroit-ce de nous; mesme en ce temps, où les Iuges qui ont à decider noz controuerses, sont communément partisans de l'enfance et interessez?	Decrepitude does us a service by supplying the sweet benefit of not noticing and not knowing, and the ease with which we let ourselves be deceived. If we took it to heart, what would become of us? Especially in these times, when the judges who have to settle our disputes are commonly partisans of the young, and interested ones.
2.8.16	Au cas que cette pipperie m'eschappe à voir, aumoins ne m'eschappe-il pas, à voir que ie suis tres-pippable. Et aura-on iamais assez dit, de quel prix est vn amy, à comparaison de ces liaisons ciuiles? L'image mesme, que i'en voy aux bestes, si pure, auec quelle religion ie la respecte! Si les autres me pippent, au moins ne me pippe-ie pas moy-mesme à m'estimer capable de m'en garder: ny à me ronger la ceruelle pour m'en rendre. Ie me sauue de telles trahisons en mon propre giron, non par vne inquiete et tumultuaire curiosité, mais par diuersion plustost, et resolution. Quand i'oy reciter l'estat de quelqu'vn, ie ne m'amuse pas à luy: ie tourne incontinent les yeux à moy, voir comment i'en suis.	If I fail to see this cheating, at least I do not fail to see that I am very easy to cheat. And can anyone ever say enough about the value of a friend, compared with these civil ties? Even the image of friendship that I see in animals, so pure—with what reverence I respect it! If others cheat me, at least I do not cheat myself into thinking I can guard against it, nor rack my brains to make myself able to. I save myself from such betrayals in my own bosom, not by an anxious and turbulent curiosity, but rather by diversion and resolution. When I hear someone's situation described, I do not dwell on him; I immediately turn my eyes on myself, to see how I stand.
	Tout ce qui le touche me regarde. Son accident m'aduertit et m'esueille de ce costé-là. Tous les iours et à toutes heures, nous disons d'vn autre ce que nous dirions plus proprement de nous, si nous sçauions replier aussi bien qu'estendre nostre consideration. Et plusieurs autheurs blessent en cette maniere la protection de leur cause, courant en auant temerairement à l'encontre de celle qu'ils attaquent, et lanceant à leurs ennemis des traits, propres à leur estre relancez plus auantageusement.	Everything that touches him concerns me. His misfortune warns me and puts me on my guard on that side. Every day and at every hour we say of another what we could more properly say of ourselves, if we knew how to turn our attention back on ourselves as well as to extend it outward. And many authors harm the defense of their own cause in this way. They charge rashly forward against the cause they attack, and hurl at their enemies darts that could be hurled back at them to better effect.
2.8.17	Feu M. le Mareschal de Monluc, ayant perdu son filz, qui mourut en l'Isle de Maderes, braue Gentil-homme à la verité et de grande esperance, me faisoit fort valoir entre ses autres regrets, le desplaisir et creue-cœur qu'il sentoit de ne s'estre iamais communiqué à luy: et sur cette humeur d'vne grauité et grimace paternelle, auoir perdu la commodité de gouster et bien cognoistre son filz; et aussi de luy declarer l'extreme amitié qu'il luy portoit, et le digne iugement qu'il faisoit de sa vertu. Et ce pauure garçon, disoit-il, n'a rien veu de moy qu'vne contenance refroignée et pleine de mespris, et a emporté cette creance, que ie n'ay sçeu ny l'aimer ny l'estimer selon son merite.	The late Marshal de Monluc had lost his son, who died on the island of Madeira, truly a brave gentleman and of great promise. Among his other regrets, he stressed to me the sorrow and heartbreak he felt at never having opened himself to him. Through that humor of paternal gravity and grimace, he had lost the chance of enjoying and truly knowing his son, and also of telling him of the extreme affection he bore him and the high opinion he had of his virtue. "And that poor boy," he said, "saw nothing of me but a scowling face full of contempt, and has carried away the belief that I could neither love him nor esteem him as he deserved."[10]

	A qui gardoy-ie à descouurir cette singuliere affection que ie luy portoy dans mon ame? estoit-ce pas luy qui en deuoit auoir tout le plaisir et toute l'obligation? Ie me suis contraint et gehenné pour maintenir ce vain masque: et y ay perdu le plaisir de sa conuersation, et sa volonté quant et quant, qu'il ne me peut auoir portée autre que bien froide, n'ayant iamais receu de moy que rudesse, ny senti qu'vne façon tyrannique. Ie trouue que cette plainte estoit bien prise et raisonnable.	"Whom was I saving it for, the revealing of that singular affection I bore him in my soul? Was it not he who should have had all the pleasure of it and all the obligation? I constrained and tormented myself to keep up this empty mask. In doing so I lost the pleasure of his company, and with it his goodwill, which can only have been very cold toward me, since he never received anything from me but harshness, nor felt anything but a tyrannical manner." I find that this complaint was well taken and reasonable.
	Car comme ie sçay par vne trop certaine experience, il n'est aucune si douce consolation en la perte de noz amis, que celle que nous apporte la science de n'auoir rien oublié à leur dire, et d'auoir eu auec eux vne parfaite et entiere communication. O mon amy! En vaux-ie mieux d'en auoir le goust, ou si i'en vaux moins? i'en vaux certes bien mieux. Son regret me console et m'honnore. Est-ce pas vn pieux et plaisant office de ma vie, d'en faire à tout iamais les obseques? Est-il iouyssance qui vaille cette priuation?	For, as I know by an all too certain experience, there is no consolation so sweet in the loss of our friends as the knowledge that we left nothing unsaid to them, and that we had a perfect and complete communication with them. O my friend! Am I the better for having had the taste of it, or am I the worse? I am certainly much the better. My grief for him consoles me and honors me. Is it not a pious and pleasant duty of my life to keep up his funeral rites forever? Is there any enjoyment worth this loss?[11]
2.8.18	Ie m'ouure aux miens tant que ie puis, et leur signifie tres-volontiers l'estat de ma volonté, et de mon iugement enuers eux, comme enuers vn chacun: ie me haste de me produire, et de me presenter: car ie ne veux pas qu'on s'y mesconte, à quelque part que ce soit. Entre autres coustumes particulieres qu'auoient noz anciens Gaulois, à ce que dit Cæsar, cette-cy en estoit l'vne, que les enfans ne se presentoyent aux peres, ny s'osoyent trouuer en public en leur compagnie, que lors qu'ils commençoyent à porter les armes; comme s'ils vouloyent dire que lors il estoit aussi saison, que les peres les receussent en leur familiarité et accointance.	I open myself to my family as much as I can, and very willingly let them know the state of my will and of my judgment toward them, as toward everyone. I hasten to bring myself forward and present myself, for I do not want anyone to be mistaken about me in any respect. Caesar tells us that our ancient Gauls had several customs of their own, and this was one of them: children did not present themselves to their fathers, nor dare appear in public in their company, until they began to bear arms. It was as if they meant that this was also the time for fathers to admit them into their familiarity and acquaintance.[12]

mesme authorité sur tous leurs biens, et loy d'en disposer à leur fantasie. Et ay cognu tel Seigneur des premiers officiers de nostre Couronne, ayant par esperance de droit à venir, plus de cinquante mille escus de rente, qui est mort necessiteux et accablé de debtes, aagé de plus de cinquante ans, sa mere en son extreme decrepitude, iouyssant encore de tous ses biens par l'ordonnance du pere, qui auoit de sa part vescu pres de quatre vingts ans.

Cela ne me semble aucunement raisonnable. Pourtant trouue-ie peu d'aduancement à vn homme de qui les affaires se portent bien, d'aller chercher vne femme qui le charge d'vn grand dot; il n'est point de debte estrangere qui apporte plus de ruyne aux maisons: mes predecesseurs ont communement suyui ce conseil bien à propos, et moy aussi. Mais ceux qui nous desconseillent les femmes riches, de peur qu'elles soyent moins traictables et recognoissantes, se trompent, de faire perdre quelque reelle commodité, pour vne si friuole coniecture. A vne femme desraisonnable, il ne couste non plus de passer par dessus vne raison, que par dessus vne autre. Elles s'ayment le mieux où elles ont plus de tort.

L'iniustice les alleche: comme les bonnes, l'honneur de leurs actions vertueuses: et en sont debonnaires d'autant plus, qu'elles sont plus riches: comme plus volontiers et glorieusement chastes, de ce qu'elles sont belles.

2.8.20 C'est raison de laisser l'administration des affaires aux meres pendant que les enfans ne sont pas en l'aage selon les loix pour en manier la charge: mais le pere les a bien mal nourris, s'il ne peut esperer qu'en leur maturité, ils auront plus de sagesse et de suffisance que sa femme, veu l'ordinaire foiblesse du sexe. Bien seroit-il toutesfois à la verité plus contre Nature, de faire despendre les meres de la discretion de leurs enfans. On leur doit donner largement, dequoy maintenir leur estat selon la condition de leur maison et de leur aage, d'autant que la necessité et l'indigence est beaucoup plus mal seante et mal-aisée à supporter à elles qu'aux masles: il faut plustost en charger les enfans que la mere.

2.8.21 En general, la plus saine distribution de noz biens en mourant, me semble estre, les laisser distribuer à l'vsage du païs. Les loix y ont mieux pensé que nous: et vaut mieux les laisser faillir en leur eslection, que de nous hazarder de faillir temerairement en la nostre. Ils ne sont same authority over all their property to their wives after them, with the right to dispose of it as they fancy. I knew a certain lord, one of the first officers of our Crown, who had expectations of inheriting more than fifty thousand crowns a year in income. Yet he died needy and buried in debt at more than fifty years of age. His mother, in her extreme decrepitude, still enjoyed all the property by the father's will—and the father had himself lived nearly eighty years.

That does not seem reasonable to me in any way. So I see little advantage for a man whose affairs are going well in seeking a wife who burdens him with a large dowry; no outside debt brings more ruin to families. My forebears commonly followed this advice, very wisely, and so have I. But those who advise us against rich wives, for fear that they may be less tractable and grateful, are mistaken. They make us lose a real advantage for the sake of so frivolous a conjecture. For an unreasonable woman, it costs no more to override one reason than another. Such women like themselves best where they are most in the wrong.

Injustice entices them, as the honor of their virtuous actions entices good women. And good women are the more gracious the richer they are, just as they are chaste more willingly and proudly for being beautiful.

It is reasonable to leave the administration of affairs to mothers while the children are not of legal age to take on the charge. But the father has brought them up very badly if he cannot hope that in their maturity they will have more wisdom and ability than his wife, given the ordinary weakness of the sex. Yet it would truly be more against Nature to make mothers depend on the discretion of their children. They should be given generously the means to keep up their station according to the rank of their house and their age. Need and want are much more unbecoming to them, and much harder for them to bear, than for men. The burden should rather be put on the children than on the mother.

In general, the soundest way of distributing our goods at death seems to me to be to let them be distributed according to the custom of the country. The laws have thought about it better than we have, and it is better to let them err in their choice

My lot has done me the favor of not presenting me with occasions that might tempt me and divert my affection from the common and lawful order. I see some people with whom it is a waste of time to spend long care on good offices. One word taken the wrong way wipes out the merit of ten years. Happy the man who is on hand at the right moment to anoint their will at that last passage! The latest act carries the day. Not the best and most frequent services, but the most recent and present ones do the trick. These are people who play with their wills as with apples or rods, to reward or punish every action of those who claim an interest in them.

remarquable et enorme difformité corporelle: vice constant inamandable: et selon nous, grands estimateurs de la beauté, d'important preiudice.

2.8.23 Le plaisant dialogue du legislateur de Platon, auec ses citoyens, fera honneur à ce passage. Comment donc, disent ils sentans leur fin prochaine, ne pourrons nous point disposer de ce qui est à nous, à qui il nous plaira? O Dieux, quelle cruauté! Qu'il ne nous soit loisible, selon que les nostres nous auront seruy en noz maladies, en nostre vieillesse, en noz affaires, de leur donner plus et moins selon noz fantasies! A quoy le legislateur respond en cette maniere: Mes amis, qui auez sans doubte bien tost à mourir, il est mal-aisé, et que vous vous cognoissiez, et que vous cognoissiez ce qui est à vous, suiuant l'inscription Delphique.

Moy, qui fay les loix, tien, que ny vous n'estes à vous, ny n'est à vous ce que vous iouyssez. Et voz biens et vous, estes à vostre famille tant passée que future: mais encore plus sont au public, et vostre famille et voz biens. Parquoy de peur que quelque flatteur en vostre vieillesse ou en vostre maladie, ou quelque passion vous sollicite mal à propos, de faire testament iniuste, ie vous en garderay. Mais ayant respect et à l'interest vniuersel de la cité, et à celuy de vostre maison, i'establiray des loix, et feray sentir, comme de raison, que la commodité particuliere doit ceder à la commune. Allez vous en ioyeusement où la necessité humaine vous appelle.

C'est à moy, qui ne regarde pas l'vne chose plus que l'autre, qui autant que ie puis, me soingne du general, d'auoir soucy de ce que vous laissez.

2.8.24 Reuenant à mon propos, il me semble en toutes façons, qu'il naist rarement des femmes à qui la maistrise soit deuë sur des hommes, sauf la maternelle et naturelle: si ce n'est pour le chastiment de ceux, qui par quelque humeur fiebureuse, se sont volontairement soubsmis à elles: mais cela ne touche aucunement les vieilles, dequoy nous parlons icy. C'est l'apparence de cette consideration, qui nous a faict forger et donner pied si volontiers, à cette loy, que nul ne veit onques, qui priue les femmes de la succession de cette couronne: et n'est guere Seigneurie au monde, où elle ne s'allegue, comme icy, par vne vray-semblance de raison qui l'authorise: mais la Fortune luy a donné plus de credit en certains lieux qu'aux autres.

able and enormous bodily deformity. That is a constant, incurable defect, and, in the eyes of people like us who prize beauty so highly, a seriously damaging one.

The pleasant dialogue between Plato's lawgiver and his citizens will do honor to this passage. "What then," they say, feeling their end approaching, "may we not dispose of what is ours to whom we please? O gods, what cruelty! That we should not be allowed to give more or less to our people, as we fancy, according to how they have served us in our illnesses, in our old age, in our affairs!" To which the lawgiver replies as follows: "My friends, who no doubt are soon to die, it is hard for you to know yourselves, and to know what is yours, as the Delphic inscription bids.[14]

"I, who make the laws, hold that neither are you your own, nor is what you enjoy your own. Both you and your goods belong to your family, past as well as future. But still more do your family and your goods belong to the public. Some flatterer in your old age or your illness, or some passion, might wrongly urge you to make an unjust will, and I will guard you against that. I will have regard both to the universal interest of the city and to that of your house. So I will establish laws, and make it felt, as is right, that private advantage must give way to the common good. Go your way cheerfully where human necessity calls you.

"It is for me, who regard no one thing more than another and who take care of the general good as far as I can, to concern myself with what you leave behind."

To return to my subject, it seems to me in every way that women are rarely born to whom mastery over men is due, except the maternal and natural kind. The exception is for the punishment of men who, from some feverish humor, have voluntarily submitted to them. But that does not apply at all to old women, whom we are speaking of here. It is the plausibility of this consideration that has made us so ready to invent this law and give it footing, though no one ever saw it: the law that excludes women from succession to this crown. There is hardly a lordship in the world where it is not alleged, as it is here, on the strength of a plausible reason that authorizes it. But Fortune has given it more credit in some places than in others.[15]

Il est dangereux de laisser à leur iugement la dispensation de nostre succession, selon le choix qu'elles feront des enfans, qui est à tous les coups inique et fantastique. Car cet appetit desreglé et goust malade, qu'elles ont au temps de leurs groisses, elles l'ont en l'ame, en tout temps. Communement on les void s'addonner aux plus foibles et malotrus, ou à ceux, si elles en ont, qui leur pendent encores au col. Car n'ayans point assez de force de discours, pour choisir et embrasser ce qui le vault, elles se laissent plus volontiers aller, où les impressions de Nature sont plus seules: comme les animaux qui n'ont cognoissance de leurs petits, que pendant qu'ils tiennent à leurs mammelles.

It is dangerous to leave the dispensing of our estate to their judgment, according to the choice they will make among the children, which is unfair and capricious every time. For that disordered appetite and sick taste they have in their pregnancies, they have in their souls at all times. Commonly you see them devote themselves to the weakest and most ill-favored, or to those, if they have any, who still hang about their necks. They do not have enough power of reasoning to choose and embrace what deserves it. So they more readily let themselves go where Nature's impulses act alone—like animals, which know their young only while they hang at their teats.

2.8.25 Au demeurant il est aisé à voir par experience, que cette affection naturelle, à qui nous donnons tant d'authorité, a les racines bien foibles. Pour vn fort leger profit, nous arrachons tous les iours leurs propres enfans d'entre les bras des meres, et leur faisons prendre les nostres en charge: nous leur faisons abandonner les leurs à quelque chetiue nourrisse, à qui nous ne voulons pas commettre les nostres, ou à quelque cheure; leur deffendant non seulement de les allaiter, quelque danger qu'ils en puissent encourir: mais encore d'en auoir aucun soin, pour s'employer du tout au seruice des nostres.

Moreover, it is easy to see by experience that this natural affection to which we give so much authority has very weak roots. For a very slight profit we tear their own children from mothers' arms every day and make them take charge of ours. We make them abandon theirs to some wretched nurse to whom we would not want to entrust ours, or to some goat. We forbid them not only to suckle their own children, whatever danger the children may run as a result, but even to take any care of them, so that they may devote themselves wholly to the service of ours.

Et voit-on en la plus part d'entre elles, s'engendrer bien tost par accoustumance vn'affection bastarde, plus vehemente que la naturelle, et plus grande sollicitude de la conseruation des enfans empruntez, que des leurs propres. Et ce que i'ay parlé des cheures, c'est d'autant qu'il est ordinaire autour de chez moy, de voir les femmes de village, lors qu'elles ne peuuent nourrir les enfans de leurs mammelles, appeller des cheures à leurs secours. Et i'ay à cette heure deux lacquais, qui ne tetterent iamais que huict iours laict de femmes.

And in most of these women we see a spurious affection soon arise through habit, more vehement than the natural one, and a greater solicitude for the preservation of the borrowed children than of their own. The reason I spoke of goats is that around my home it is common to see village women call goats to their aid when they cannot feed children at their breasts. And at this moment I have two lackeys who never sucked woman's milk for more than a week.

Ces cheures sont incontinent duites à venir allaicter ces petits enfans, recognoissent leur voix quand ils crient, et y accourent: si on leur en presente vn autre que leur nourrisson, elles le refusent, et l'enfant en fait de mesme d'vne autre cheure. I'en vis vn l'autre iour, à qui on osta la sienne, par ce que son pere ne l'auoit qu'empruntée d'vn sien voisin, il ne peut iamais s'adonner à l'autre qu'on luy presenta, et mourut sans doute, de faim. Les

These goats are quickly trained to come and suckle these little children. They recognize their voices when they cry, and come running. bestes alterent et abbastardissent aussi aisément que nous, l'affection naturelle.

Ie croy qu'en ce que recite Herodote de certain destroit de la Lybie, il y a souuent du mesconte: il dit qu'on s'y mesle aux femmes indifferemment: mais que l'enfant ayant force de marcher, trouue son pere celuy, vers lequel, en la presse, la naturelle inclination porte ses premiers pas.

to the other goat he was offered, and died, no doubt of hunger. Animals alter and corrupt natural affection as easily as we do.

I believe that in what Herodotus relates of a certain district of Libya there is often a mistake. He says that there men mate with women indiscriminately, but that when the child has the strength to walk, it takes as its father the man toward whom, in the crowd, its natural inclination carries its first steps.[16]

CHILDREN OF THE MIND

Books are offspring dearer than bodily children, as Labienus, Lucan and Epicurus show.

2.8.26 Or à considerer cette simple occasion d'aymer noz enfans, pour les auoir engendrez, pour laquelle nous les appellons autres nous mesmes: il semble qu'il y ait bien vne autre production venant de nous, qui ne soit pas de moindre recommendation. Car ce que nous engendrons par l'ame, les enfantements de nostre esprit, de nostre courage et suffisance, sont produits par vne plus noble partie que la corporelle, et sont plus nostres. Nous sommes pere et mere ensemble en cette generation: ceux-cy nous coustent bien plus cher, et nous apportent plus d'honneur, s'ils ont quelque chose de bon.

Car la valeur de nos autres enfans, est beaucoup plus leur, que nostre: la part que nous y auons est bien legere: mais de ceux-cy, toute la beauté, toute la grace et prix est nostre. Par ainsin ils nous representent et nous rapportent bien plus viuement que les autres. Platon adiouste, que ce sont icy des enfants immortels, qui immortalisent leurs peres, voire et les deïfient, comme Lycurgus, Solon, Minos. Or les Histoires estants pleines d'exemples de cette amitié commune des peres enuers les enfans, il ne m'a pas semblé hors de propos d'en trier aussi quelqu'vn de cette-cy.

Heliodorus ce bon Euesque de Tricea, ayma mieux perdre la dignité, le profit, la deuotion d'vne prelature si venerable, que de perdre sa fille: fille qui dure encore bien gentille: mais à l'aduenture pourtant vn peu trop curieusement et mollement goderonnée pour fille ecclesiastique et sacerdotale, et de trop amoureuse façon. Now consider this simple reason for loving our children: that we begot them, which is why we call them our other selves. It seems that there is indeed another production coming from us that deserves no less esteem. For what we beget by the soul—the offspring of our mind, of our courage and ability—is produced by a nobler part than the body, and is more our own. We are father and mother together in this generation. These children cost us much more dearly, and bring us more honor, if there is anything good in them.

For the worth of our other children is much more theirs than ours; the share we have in it is very slight. But in these, all the beauty, all the grace and value is ours. So they represent us and reflect us much more vividly than the others. Plato adds that these are immortal children, who immortalize their fathers and even deify them, like Lycurgus, Solon, and Minos. Now since histories are full of examples of the common love of fathers for their children, it did not seem out of place to me to pick out a few examples of this other kind too.

Heliodorus, that good bishop of Tricca, preferred to lose the dignity, the revenue, and the devotion of so venerable a prelacy rather than lose his daughter. She is a daughter who still survives, very charming, but perhaps a little too elaborately and softly frilled for the daughter of a churchman and priest, and of too amorous a fashion. There was a Labienus at Rome, a person of great worth and authority, who among other qualities excelled

Cæsar en la guerre des Gaules, et qui depuis s'estant ietté au party du grand Pompeius, s'y maintint si valeureusement iusques à ce que Cæsar le deffit en Espaigne.

Ce Labienus dequoy ie parle, eut plusieurs enuieux de sa vertu, et comme il est vray-semblable, les courtisans et fauoris des Empereurs de son temps, pour ennemis de sa franchise, et des humeurs paternelles, qu'il retenoit encore contre la tyrannie, desquelles il est croiable qu'il auoit teint ses escrits et ses liures. Ses aduersaires poursuiuirent deuant le magistrat à Rome, et obtindrent de faire condamner plusieurs siens ouurages qu'il auoit mis en lumiere, à estre bruslés. Ce fut par luy que commença ce nouuel exemple de peine, qui depuis fut continué à Rome à plusieurs autres, de punir de mort les escrits mesmes, et les estudes.

Il n'y auoit point assez de moyen et matiere de cruauté, si nous n'y meslions des choses que Nature a exemptées de tout sentiment et de toute souffrance, comme la reputation et les inuentions de nostre esprit: et si nous n'allions communiquer les maux corporels aux disciplines et monumens des Muses. Or Labienus ne peut souffrir cette perte, ny de suruiure à cette sienne si chere geniture; il se fit porter et enfermer tout vif dans le monument de ses ancestres, là où il pourueut tout d'vn train à se tuer et à s'enterrer ensemble. Il est malaisé de montrer aucune autre plus vehemente affection paternelle que celle-là.

Cassius Seuerus, homme tres-eloquent et son familier, voyant brusler ses liures, crioit que par mesme sentence on le deuoit quant et quant condamner à estre bruslé tout vif, car il portoit et conseruoit en sa memoire ce qu'ils contenoient. Pareil accident aduint à Greuntius Cordus accusé d'auoir en ses liures loué Brutus et Cassius. Ce Senat vilain, seruile, et corrompu, et digne d'vn pire maistre que Tibere, condamna ses escrits au feu. Il fut content de faire compagnie à leur mort, et se tua par abstinence de manger.

in every kind of literature. He was, I believe, the son of the great Labienus, the foremost of the captains who served under Caesar in the Gallic War. That Labienus later threw in his lot with Pompey the Great and held out valiantly until Caesar defeated him in Spain.[17]

Many people envied the virtue of the Labienus I am speaking of. As is likely, the courtiers and favorites of the emperors of his time were his enemies, hostile to his frankness and to the temper inherited from his father, which he still kept up against tyranny. It may be believed that he had tinged his writings and books with it. His adversaries prosecuted him before the magistrate at Rome and obtained a sentence condemning several of his published works to be burned. It was with him that this new kind of punishment began, which was later continued at Rome against several others: punishing with death the writings themselves, and the studies.[18]

Apparently there were not enough means and matter for cruelty unless we mixed in things that Nature has exempted from all feeling and all suffering, like reputation and the inventions of our mind. We had to go on and extend bodily ills to the disciplines and monuments of the Muses. Now Labienus could not bear this loss, nor survive his own beloved offspring. He had himself carried and shut up alive in the tomb of his ancestors, where at one stroke he saw to killing himself and burying himself together. It is hard to show any other paternal affection more vehement than that.

Cassius Severus, a very eloquent man and his friend, seeing his books burned, cried out that by the same sentence they ought to condemn him to be burned alive along with them, for he carried and preserved in his memory what they contained. A similar misfortune befell Cremutius Cordus, accused of having praised Brutus and Cassius in his books. That base, servile, and corrupt Senate, worthy of a worse master than Tiberius, condemned his writings to the fire. He was content to keep them company in their death, and killed himself by refusing food.[19] 17 Heliodorus, Greek author of the romance Aethiopica (the story of Theagenes and Chariclea), was said to have given up his bishopric rather than disown the book.

Le bon Lucanus estant iugé par ce coquin Neron; sur les derniers traits de sa vie, comme la pluspart du sang fut desia escoulé par les veines des bras, qu'il s'estoit faictes tailler à son medecin pour mourir, et que la froideur eut saisi les extremitez de ses membres, et commençast à s'approcher des parties vitales; la derniere chose qu'il eut en sa memoire, ce furent aucuns des vers de son liure de la guerre de Pharsale, qu'il recitoit, et mourut ayant cette derniere voix en la bouche.

Cela qu'estoit-ce, qu'vn tendre et paternel congé qu'il prenoit de ses enfans; representant les a-dieux et les estroits embrassemens que nous donnons aux nostres en mourant; et vn effet de cette naturelle inclination, qui r'appelle en nostre souuenance en cette extremité, les choses, que nous auons eu les plus cheres pendant nostre vie?

2.8.27 Pensons nous qu'Epicurus qui en mourant tourmenté, comme il dit, des extremes douleurs de la cholique, auoit toute sa consolation en la beauté de la doctrine qu'il laissoit au monde, eust receu autant de contentement d'vn nombre d'enfans bien nais et bien esleuez, s'il en eust eu, comme il faisoit de la production de ses riches escrits? et que s'il eust esté au chois de laisser apres luy vn enfant contrefaict et mal nay, ou vn liure sot et inepte, il ne choisist plustost, et non luy seulement, mais tout homme de pareille suffisance, d'encourir le premier mal'heur que l'autre?

Ce seroit à l'aduenture impieté en Sainct Augustin, pour exemple, si d'vn costé on luy proposoit d'enterrer ses escrits, dequoy nostre religion reçoit vn si grand fruict, ou d'enterrer ses enfans au cas qu'il en eust, s'il n'aymoit mieux enterrer ses enfans. Good Lucan was condemned by that scoundrel Nero. In the last moments of his life, most of his blood had already drained out through the veins of his arms, which he had had his doctor cut so that he might die, and the cold had seized the extremities of his limbs and was beginning to approach the vital parts. The last thing he had in his memory was some lines from his book on the war of Pharsalia. He recited them, and died with those last words on his lips.[20]

What was that but a tender, fatherly leave-taking of his children, like the farewells and close embraces we give our own when we die? And what was it but an effect of that natural inclination which, in that extremity, brings back to our memory the things we have held dearest during our life?

Epicurus, dying tormented, as he says, by the extreme pains of colic, found all his consolation in the beauty of the doctrine he was leaving to the world. Do we think he would have received as much satisfaction from a number of well-born and well-brought-up children, if he had had any, as he did from producing his rich writings? And if he had had the choice of leaving behind him a deformed and ill-born child or a foolish and inept book, do we think he would not have chosen to incur the first misfortune rather than the other? And not he alone, but any man of like ability?

Suppose Saint Augustine, for example, were offered the choice between burying his writings, from which our religion reaps such great fruit, and burying his children, if he had had any. It would perhaps be impiety in him not to prefer burying his children. And I am not sure that I would not much rather have produced one perfectly formed child from my union with the Muses than from my union with my wife. To this one, such as it is, what I give, I give purely and irrevocably, as one gives to the children of the body. The little good I have done it is no longer mine to dispose of.

It may know plenty of things that I no longer know, and hold from me what I have not retained myself, which I would have to borrow from it, just like a stranger, if I needed it. If I am wiser than it, riche que moy. Il est peu d'hommes addonnez à la poësie, qui ne se gratifiassent plus d'estre peres de l'Eneide que du plus beau garçon de Rome: et qui ne souffrissent plus aisément l'vne perte que l'autre. Car selon Aristote, de tous ouuriers le poëte est nommément le plus amoureux de son ouurage.

Il est malaisé à croire, qu'Epaminondas qui se vantoit de laisser pour toute posterité des filles qui feroyent vn iour honneur à leur pere (c'estoyent les deux nobles victoires qu'il auoit gaigné sur les Lacedemoniens) eust volontiers consenty d'eschanger celles-là, aux plus gorgiases de toute la Grece: ou qu'Alexandre et Cæsar ayent iamais souhaité d'estre priuez de la grandeur de leurs glorieux faicts de guerre, pour la commodité d'auoir des enfans et heritiers, quelques parfaicts et accompliz qu'ils peussent estre. Voire ie fay grand doubte que Phidias ou autre excellent statuaire, aymast autant la conseruation et la durée de ses enfans naturels, comme il feroit d'vne image excellente, qu'auec long trauail et estude il auroit parfaite selon l'art.

Et quant à ces passions vitieuses et furieuses, qui ont eschauffé quelque fois les peres à l'amour de leurs filles, ou les meres enuers leurs fils, encore s'en trouue-il de pareilles en cette autre sorte de parenté. Tesmoing ce que lon recite de Pygmalion, qu'ayant basty vne statue de femme de beauté singuliere, il deuint si esperduement espris de l'amour forcené de ce sien ouurage, qu'il falut, qu'en faueur de sa rage les Dieux la luy viuifiassent: Tentatum mollescit ebur, positóque rigore / Subsidit digitis.

it is richer than I. There are few men devoted to poetry who would not be more gratified to be the father of the Aeneid than of the handsomest boy in Rome, and who would not bear the loss of the boy more easily than the loss of the poem. For according to Aristotle, of all craftsmen the poet is the one most especially in love with his work.

Epaminondas boasted that he left as his only posterity daughters who would one day bring honor to their father; these were the two noble victories he had won over the Lacedaemonians. It is hard to believe that he would willingly have agreed to exchange them for the most gorgeous girls in all Greece. It is equally hard to believe that Alexander and Caesar ever wished to be deprived of the greatness of their glorious feats of war for the convenience of having children and heirs, however perfect and accomplished they might be. Indeed, I very much doubt that Phidias, or any other excellent sculptor, cared as much for the preservation and survival of his natural children as he would for an excellent statue that he had perfected by long labor and study, according to his art.[21]

And as for those vicious and frenzied passions that have sometimes inflamed fathers with love for their daughters, or mothers for their sons, similar ones are found in this other kind of parenthood too. Witness what is told of Pygmalion. Having made the statue of a woman of singular beauty, he fell so desperately and madly in love with this work of his that the gods, in favor of his frenzy, had to bring her to life for him: Touched, the ivory softens, and, its hardness gone, / Yields to his fingers.[22]

II.9 Of the Arms of the Parthians

Des armes des Parthes

Montaigne faults the nobles of his day for arming only at the last moment and compares heavy French armor with ancient practice.

FRENCH

2.9.1 C'EST vne façon vitieuse de la noblesse de nostre temps, et pleine de mollesse, de ne prendre les armes que sur le point d'vne extreme necessité: et s'en descharger aussi tost qu'il y a tant soit peu d'apparence, que le danger soit esloigné. D'où il suruient plusieurs desordres: car chacun criant et courant à ses armes, sur le point de la charge, les vns sont à lacer encore leur cuirasse, que leurs compaignons sont desia rompus. Nos peres donnoient leur salade, leur lance, et leurs gantelets à porter, et n'abandonnoient le reste de leur equippage, tant que la couruée duroit.

Nos trouppes sont à cette heure toutes troublées et difformes, par la confusion du bagage et des valets qui ne peuuent esloigner leurs maistres, à cause de leurs armes. Tite Liue parlant des nostres, Intolerantissima laboris corpora vix arma humeris gerebant. Plusieurs nations vont encore et alloient anciennement à la guerre sans se couurir: ou se couuroient d'inutiles defences. Tegmina queis capitum raptus de subere cortex. Alexandre le plus hazardeux Capitaine qui fut iamais, s'armoit fort rarement. Et ceux d'entre nous qui les mesprisent n'empirent pour cela de guere leur marché.

S'il se voit quelqu'vn tué par le defaut d'vn harnois, il n'en est guere moindre nombre, que l'empeschement des armes a faict perdre, engagés sous leur pesanteur, ou froissez et rompus, ou par vn contre-coup, ou autrement. Car il semble, à la verité, à voir le poix des nostres et leur espesseur, que nous ne cherchons qu'à nous deffendre, et en sommes plus chargez que couuers. Nous auons assez à faire à en soustenir le faix, entrauez et contraints, comme si nous n'auions à combattre que du choq de nos armes: et comme si nous n'auions pareille obligation à les deffendre, qu'elles ont à nous.

ENGLISH

It is a vicious habit of the nobility of our time, and one full of softness, not to take up arms until the point of extreme necessity, and to lay them aside as soon as there is the slightest sign that the danger has passed. Many disorders follow from this. With everyone shouting and running for his arms just as the charge begins, some are still lacing up their cuirass when their comrades are already routed. Our fathers had their helmet, lance, and gauntlets carried for them, but did not give up the rest of their equipment as long as the expedition lasted.

Our troops are now all disordered and misshapen by the jumble of baggage and of valets who cannot leave their masters because of their arms. Livy says of our people: Their bodies, utterly unable to endure toil, could scarcely carry their arms on their shoulders. Several nations still go to war without protection, and did so in ancient times, or protected themselves with useless defenses: Their helmets were bark stripped from the cork tree. Alexander, the most daring captain who ever lived, very seldom wore armor. And those of us who scorn it hardly make their bargain any worse.[1]

If one sees someone killed for lack of armor, hardly fewer have been lost through the encumbrance of armor: pinned under its weight, or bruised and broken by a jolt, or in some other way. For truly, judging by the weight and thickness of ours, it seems that we seek only to defend ourselves, and we are more loaded down than covered by it. We have enough to do just to bear its weight, hobbled and constrained, as if we were to fight only by the impact of our armor, and as if we were not as obliged to defend it as it is to defend us.

Lucullus voyant certains hommes d'armes Medois, qui faisoient front en l'armée de Tigranes, poisamment et malaisément armez, comme dans vne prison de fer, print de là opinion de les deffaire aisément, et par eux commença sa charge et sa victoire. Et à present que nos mousquetaires sont en credit, ie croy qu'on trouuera quelque inuention de nous emmurer pour nous en garentir, et nous faire trainer à la guerre enfermez dans des bastions, comme ceux que les anciens faisoient porter à leurs elephans.

2.9.2 Cette humeur est bien esloignée de celle du ieune Scipion, lequel accusa aigrement ses soldats, de ce qu'ils auoyent semé des chausse-trapes soubs l'eau à l'endroit du fossé, par où ceux d'vne ville qu'il assiegeoit, pouuoient faire des sorties sur luy: disant que ceux qui assailloient, deuoient penser à entreprendre, non pas à craindre. Et craignoit auec raison que cette prouision endormist leur vigilance à se garder. Il dict aussi à vn ieune homme, qui luy faisoit montre de son beau bouclier: Il est vrayement beau, mon fils, mais vn soldat Romain doit auoir plus de fiance en sa main dextre, qu'en la gauche.

2.9.3 Or il n'est que la coustume, qui nous rende insupportable la charge de nos armes. L'husbergo in dosso haueano, et l'elmo in testa,

Les pietons Romains portoient non seulement le morion, l'espée, et l'escu: car quant aux armes, dit Cicero, ils estoient si accoustumez à les auoir sur le dos, qu'elles ne les empeschoient non plus que leurs membres: arma enim, membra militis esse dicunt: mais quant et quant encore, ce qu'il leur falloit de viures, pour quinze iours, et certaine quantité de paux pour faire leurs rempars, iusques à soixante liures de poix. Tacitus gives an amusing picture of warriors among our ancient Gauls, armed like this merely to protect themselves, unable either to harm or to be harmed, or to get up again once knocked down. Lucullus saw certain Median men-at-arms forming the front of Tigranes' army, heavily and awkwardly armed, as if in an iron prison. He concluded that he could easily defeat them, and it was with them that he began his charge and his victory. And now that our musketeers are in favor, I expect someone will invent a way to wall us in to protect us from them, and have us dragged to war shut up in bastions, like the ones the ancients had their elephants carry.[2]

This humor is very far from that of the younger Scipio. He sharply reproached his soldiers for having laid caltrops under the water in the part of the moat through which the people of a town he was besieging could make sallies against him. Those who attack, he said, should think about attacking, not about fearing. And he rightly feared that this precaution would lull their vigilance in guarding themselves. He also said to a young man who was showing him his fine shield: "It is truly fine, my son, but a Roman soldier should put more trust in his right hand than in his left."

Now it is only custom that makes the burden of our armor unbearable to us. Hauberk on back and helmet on head
Two of the warriors I sing of wore;
Nor night nor day, since they came into this Chamber, had they once put them aside,
For they found them as easy to wear as clothing,
So long had they been used to them. The Emperor Caracalla went about the country on foot, fully armed, leading his army.[3]

The Roman foot soldiers carried not only helmet, sword, and shield—for as to arms, says Cicero, they were so used to having them on their backs that they hindered them no more than their own limbs: for they say that arms are a soldier's limbs. Along with these they also carried as much food as they needed for fifteen days, and a certain number of stakes for building their ramparts, up to sixty pounds in weight. And Marius' soldiers, loaded lieuës en cinq heures, et six s'il y auoit haste. Leur discipline militaire estoit beaucoup plus rude que la nostre: aussi produisoit elle de bien autres effects.

Le ieune Scipion reformant son armée en Espaigne, ordonna à ses soldats de ne manger que debout, et rien de cuit. Ce traict est merueilleux à ce propos, qu'il fut reproché à vn soldat Lacedemonien, qu'estant à l'expedition d'vne guerre, on l'auoit veu soubs le couuert d'vne maison: ils estoient si durcis à la peine, que c'estoit honte d'estre veu soubs vn autre toict que celuy du ciel, quelque temps qu'il fist. Nous ne menerions guere loing nos gens à ce prix là.

2.9.4 Au demeurant Marcellinus, homme nourry aux guerres Romaines, remerque curieusement la façon que les Parthes auoyent de s'armer, et la remerque d'autant qu'elle estoit esloignée de la Romaine. Ils auoyent, dit-il, des armes tissuës en maniere de petites plumes, qui n'empeschoient pas le mouuement de leur corps: et si estoient si fortes que nos dards reiallissoient venans à les hurter: ce sont les escailles, dequoy nos ancestres auoient fort accoustumé de se seruir. Et en vn autre lieu: Ils auoient, dit-il, leurs cheuaux fors et roides, couuerts de gros cuir, et eux estoient armez de cap à pied, de grosses lames de fer, rengées de tel artifice, qu'à l'endroit des iointures des membres elles prestoient au mouuement.

On eust dict que c'estoient des hommes de fer: car ils auoient des accoustremens de teste si proprement assis, et representans au naturel la forme et parties du visage, qu'il n'y auoit moyen de les assener que par des petits trous ronds, qui respondoient à leurs yeux, leur donnant vn peu de lumiere, et par des fentes, qui estoient à l'endroict des naseaux, par où ils prenoyent assez malaisément haleine, Flexilis inductis animatur lamina membris, like this and marching in battle order, were trained to cover five leagues in five hours, and six if there was need for haste. Their military discipline was much harsher than ours, and so it produced very different results.

The younger Scipio, reforming his army in Spain, ordered his soldiers to eat only standing up, and nothing cooked. On this subject, here is a marvelous touch: a Lacedaemonian soldier was reproached because, while on campaign, he had been seen under the shelter of a house. They were so hardened to toil that it was shameful to be seen under any roof but the sky's, whatever the weather. We would not lead our men very far at that price.

Moreover, Marcellinus, a man raised in the Roman wars, takes careful note of the way the Parthians armed themselves, and notes it all the more because it was so different from the Roman way. They had, he says, armor woven in the manner of little feathers, which did not hinder the movement of their bodies; and yet it was so strong that our darts rebounded when they struck it. These are the scales that our ancestors were very much in the habit of using. And in another place he says: They had strong, sturdy horses, covered with thick leather, and they themselves were armed from head to foot with thick plates of iron, arranged with such skill that at the joints of the limbs they yielded to the movement.[4]

You would have said they were men of iron. Their headpieces were so neatly fitted, and reproduced the shape and features of the face so naturally, that there was no way to strike them except through little round holes matching their eyes, which gave them a little light, and through slits at the nostrils, through which they drew breath with some difficulty. The supple plate takes life from the limbs it covers, dreadful to behold; you would think iron statues were moving, and men breathing in the metal grown onto them.
The horses wear the same: with iron brows they threaten, and, safe from wounds, they move their iron-clad shoulders. Here is a description that comes very

2.10.1	IE ne fay point de doute, qu'il ne m'aduienne souuent de parler de choses, qui sont mieux traictées chez les maistres du mestier, et plus veritablement. C'est icy purement l'essay de mes facultez naturelles, et nullement des acquises. Et qui me surprendra d'ignorance, il ne fera rien contre moy: car à peine respondroy-ie à autruy de mes discours, qui ne m'en responds point à moy, ny n'en suis satisfaict. Qui sera en cherche de science, si la pesche où elle se loge: il n'est rien dequoy ie face moins de profession.	I have no doubt that I often happen to speak of things that are better and more truthfully treated by the masters of the craft. This is purely a trial of my natural faculties, and not at all of acquired ones. Whoever catches me out in ignorance will score nothing against me. I could hardly answer to others for my reasonings, when I do not answer for them to myself and am not satisfied with them. Whoever is in search of knowledge, let him fish for it where it lives: there is nothing I make less profession of.
	Ce sont icy mes fantasies, par lesquelles ie ne tasche point à donner à connoistre les choses, mais moy: elles me seront à l'aduenture connues vn iour, ou l'ont autresfois esté, selon que la Fortune m'a peu porter sur les lieux, où elles estoient esclaircies. Mais il ne m'en souuient plus. Et si ie suis homme de quelque leçon, ie suis homme de nulle retention. Ainsi ie ne pleuuy aucune certitude, si ce n'est de faire connoistre iusques à quel poinct monte pour cette heure, la connoissance que i'en ay.	These are my notions, and through them I am not trying to make things known, but myself. The things may perhaps become known to me one day, or may have been once, depending on whether Fortune has been able to bring me to the places where they were made clear. But I no longer remember them. And if I am a man of some reading, I am a man of no retention. So I guarantee no certainty, except to make known how far my knowledge of them reaches at this moment.

Car ie fay dire aux autres, non à ma teste, mais à ma suite, ce que ie ne puis si bien dire, par foiblesse de mon langage, ou par foiblesse de mon sens. Ie ne compte pas mes emprunts, ie les poise. Et si ie les eusse voulu faire valoir par nombre, ie m'en fusse chargé deux fois autant. Ils sont touts, ou fort peu s'en faut, de noms si fameux et anciens, qu'ils me semblent se nommer assez sans moy.	Let people pay attention not to the matter but to the shape I give it. Let them see, in what I borrow, whether I have known how to choose something that properly enhances or supports the invention, which always comes from me. For I make others say—not ahead of me but following in my train—what I cannot say so well myself, through the weakness of my language or the weakness of my sense. I do not count my borrowings; I weigh them. Had I wanted them to impress by their number, I would have loaded myself with twice as many. They are all, or very nearly all, from names so famous and ancient that they seem to me to name themselves well enough without me.

I'aimeray quelqu'vn qui me sçache deplumer: ie dy par clairté de iugement, et par la seule distinction de la force et beauté des propos.

Car moy, qui, à faute de memoire, demeure court tous les coups, à les trier, par recognoissance de nation, sçay tresbien connoistre, à mesurer ma portée, que mon terroir n'est aucunement capable d'aucunes fleurs trop riches, que i'y trouue semées, et que tous les fruicts de mon creu ne les sçauroient payer. Car il eschappe souuent des fautes à nos yeux: mais la maladie du iugement consiste à ne les pouuoir apperceuoir, lors qu'vn autre nous les descouure.

La science et la verité peuuent loger chez nous sans iugement, et le iugement y peut aussi estre sans elles: voire la reconnoissance de l'ignorance est l'vn des plus beaux et plus seurs tesmoignages de iugement que ie trouue. Ie n'ay point d'autre sergent de bande, à renger mes pieces, que la Fortune. A mesme que mes resueries se presentent, ie les entasse: tantost elles se pressent en foule, tantost elles se trainent à la file. Ie veux qu'on voye mon pas naturel et ordinaire ainsi detraqué qu'il est. Ie me laisse aller comme ie me trouue. do it to rein in the rashness of those hasty verdicts that pounce on every kind of writing—especially new writings by men still living, and in the vernacular, which lets everybody talk about it and seems to convict the conception and design of being just as common. I want them to flick Plutarch on the nose when they flick mine, and to scald themselves insulting Seneca in me. I have to hide my weakness under these great reputations. I will love anyone who knows how to pluck my borrowed feathers—I mean by clearness of judgment, and solely by telling apart the strength and beauty of the remarks.

For I, who for lack of memory am caught short every time I try to sort them by recognizing where they come from, know very well, measuring my own reach, that my soil is quite incapable of producing certain overly rich flowers that I find sown in it, and that all the fruits of my own growing could never pay for them. This much I am bound to answer for: if I trip myself up; if there is vanity and fault in my reasonings that I do not perceive, or that I am incapable of perceiving when it is pointed out to me. For faults often slip past our eyes; but the sickness of judgment consists in being unable to see them when someone else reveals them to us.

Knowledge and truth can lodge in us without judgment, and judgment can also be there without them; indeed, recognizing one's ignorance is one of the finest and surest testimonies of judgment I know. I have no other drill sergeant to line up my pieces than Fortune. As my daydreams present themselves, I heap them up: sometimes they crowd in all together, sometimes they straggle in single file. I want people to see my natural, ordinary gait, as off-kilter as it is. I let myself go as I find myself. Besides, these are not matters that one is forbidden to be ignorant of, or to speak of casually and rashly.

I would like to have a more perfect understanding of things, but I do not want to buy it at the price it costs. My plan is to spend what remains of my life pleasantly and not laboriously. There is nothing I am willing to rack my brains over—not even knowledge, however great its value.

In books I seek only to give myself pleasure by a decent pastime; or if I study, I seek only the know-la science, qui traicte de la connoissance de moy-mesmes, et qui m'instruise à bien mourir et à bien viure. Has meus ad metas sudet oportet equus.

2.10.5 Les difficultez, si i'en rencontre en lisant, ie n'en ronge pas mes ongles: ie les laisse là, apres leur auoir faict vne charge ou deux. Si ie m'y plantois, ie m'y perdrois, et le temps: car i'ay vn esprit primsautier. Ce que ie ne voy de la premiere charge, ie le voy moins en m'y obstinant. Ie ne fay rien sans gayeté: et la continuation et contention trop ferme esblouït mon iugement, l'attriste, et le lasse. Ma veuë s'y confond, et s'y dissipe. Il faut que ie la retire, et que ie l'y remette à secousses. Tout ainsi que pour iuger du lustre de l'escarlatte, on nous ordonne de passer les yeux pardessus, en la parcourant à diuerses veuës, soudaines reprinses et reiterées.

Si ce liure me fasche, i'en prens vn autre, et ne m'y addonne qu'aux heures, où l'ennuy de rien faire commence à me saisir. Ie ne me prens gueres aux nouueaux, pour ce que les anciens me semblent plus pleins et plus roides: ny aux Grecs, par ce que mon iugement ne sçait pas faire ses besoignes d'vne puerile et apprantisse intelligence.

2.10.6 Entre les liures simplement plaisans, ie trouue des modernes, le Decameron de Boccace, Rabelays, et les baisers de Iean second, s'il les faut loger sous ce tiltre, dignes qu'on s'y amuse. Quant aux Amadis, et telles sortes d'escrits, ils n'ont pas eu le credit d'arrester seulement mon enfance. Ie diray encore cecy, ou hardiment, ou temerairement, que cette vieille ame poisante, ne se laisse plus chatouiller, non seulement à l'Arioste, mais encores au bon Ouide: sa facilité, et ses inuentions, qui m'ont rauy autresfois, à peine m'entretiennent elles à cette heure. Ie dy librement mon aduis de toutes choses, voire et de celles qui surpassent à l'aduenture ma suffisance, et que ie ne tiens aucunement estre de ma iurisdiction.

Ce que i'en opine, c'est aussi pour declarer la mesure de ma veuë, non la mesure des choses. Quand ie me trouue dégousté de l'Axioche de Platon, comme d'vn ouurage sans force, eu esgard à vn tel autheur, mon iugement ne s'en croit pas. ledge that deals with knowing myself, and that may teach me to die well and to live well. This is the goal my horse must sweat to reach.[1]

Difficulties, if I meet any in reading, I do not bite my nails over; I leave them there after making a charge or two at them. If I planted myself in front of them, I would lose myself, and my time too, for my mind works at the first leap. What I do not see at the first charge, I see less by persisting. I do nothing without gaiety; and too steady a persistence and strain dazzles my judgment, saddens it and tires it. My sight grows confused and scattered. I have to withdraw it and bring it back in sudden jerks—just as, to judge the sheen of scarlet cloth, we are told to pass our eyes over it, running over it with various glances, in sudden, repeated takes.

If one book annoys me, I take another; and I give myself to reading only at the hours when the weariness of doing nothing begins to seize me. I hardly ever take up the new ones, because the ancients seem to me fuller and sturdier; nor the Greek ones, because my judgment cannot do its work with a childish, apprentice's understanding.

Among books that are simply entertaining, I find, among the moderns, Boccaccio's Decameron, Rabelais, and the Kisses of Johannes Secundus (if they may be lodged under that heading) worth amusing oneself with. As for the Amadis and writings of that sort, they did not have the credit to hold even my childhood. I will say this too, either boldly or rashly: this heavy old soul of mine no longer lets itself be tickled not only by Ariosto but even by good Ovid. His facility and his inventions, which once ravished me, hardly hold my attention now. I speak my mind freely about all things, even those that perhaps exceed my competence and that I in no way consider to be within my jurisdiction.[2]

What I opine about them is meant to declare the measure of my sight, not the measure of things. When I find myself put off by Plato's Axiochus, as a work without force considering such an author, my judgment does not trust itself. It is not so presumptuous as to set itself against the authority of Il se contente de se garentir seulement du trouble et du desreglement: quant à sa foiblesse, il la reconnoist, et aduoüe volontiers.

Il pense donner iuste interpretation aux apparences, que sa conception luy presente: mais elles sont imbecilles et imparfaictes. La plus part des fables d'Esope ont plusieurs sens et intelligences: ceux qui les mythologisent, en choisissent quelque visage, qui quadre bien à la fable: mais pour la pluspart, ce n'est que le premier visage et superficiel: il y en a d'autres plus vifs, plus essentiels et internes, ausquels ils n'ont sçeu penetrer: voyla comme i'en fay.

so many other famous ancient judgments, which it regards as its tutors and masters, and with which it would rather be wrong. It blames itself and condemns itself, either for stopping at the bark, unable to get through to the core, or for looking at the thing in some false light. It is content merely to protect itself from confusion and disorder; as for its weakness, it recognizes it and readily admits it.[3]

It thinks it gives a fair interpretation of the appearances its conception presents to it; but these are feeble and imperfect. Most of Aesop's fables have several senses and meanings. Those who interpret them as allegories pick some aspect that fits the fable well; but for the most part it is only the first, superficial aspect. There are others, more vital, more essential and inward, which they have not managed to penetrate. That is how it goes with me.

THE POETS HE LOVES

Virgil, Lucretius, Catullus and Horace come first; Terence wins over Plautus, Virgil over Ariosto.

2.10.7 Mais pour suyure ma route: il m'a tousiours semblé, qu'en la poësie, Virgile, Lucrece, Catulle, et Horace, tiennent de bien loing le premier rang: et signamment Virgile en ses Georgiques, que i'estime le plus accomply ouurage de la poësie: à comparaison duquel on peut reconnoistre aysément qu'il y a des endroicts de l'Æneide, ausquels l'autheur eust donné encore quelque tour de pigne s'il en eust eu loisir. Et le cinquiesme liure en l'Æneide me semble le plus parfaict. I'ayme aussi Lucain, et le practique volontiers, non tant pour son stile, que pour sa valeur propre, et verité de ses opinions et iugemens.

Quant au bon Terence, la mignardise, et les graces du langage Latin, ie le trouue admirable à representer au vif les mouuemens de l'ame, et la condition de nos mœurs: à toute heure nos actions me reiettent à luy. Ie ne le puis lire si souuent que ie n'y trouue quelque beauté et grace nouuelle. Ceux des temps voisins à Virgile se plaignoient, dequoy aucuns luy comparoient Lucrece. Ie suis d'opinion, que c'est à la verité vne comparaison inegale: mais i'ay bien à faire à me r'asseurer en cette creance, quand ie me treuue attaché à quelque beau lieu de ceux de Lucrece.

ENGLISH

But to keep to my route: it has always seemed to me that in poetry Virgil, Lucretius, Catullus and Horace hold the first rank by a long way—and especially Virgil in his Georgics, which I consider the most accomplished work of poetry. Compared with it, one can easily see that there are places in the Aeneid to which the author would have given a few more strokes of the comb had he had the leisure. And the fifth book of the Aeneid seems to me the most perfect. I also love Lucan and read him readily, not so much for his style as for his own worth and the truth of his opinions and judgments.

As for good Terence, the very delicacy and grace of the Latin language, I find him admirable at portraying to the life the movements of the soul and the condition of our manners; at every turn our actions send me back to him. I can never read him so often that I do not find some new beauty and grace in him. Those who lived close to Virgil's time complained that some people compared Lucretius to him. I am of the opinion that it is indeed an unequal comparison; but I have a hard time holding firm in this belief when I find myself caught by some fine passage of Lucretius.

S'ils se piquoient de cette comparaison, que diroient ils de la bestise et stupidité barbaresque, de ceux qui luy comparent à cette heure Arioste: et qu'en diroit Arioste luy-mesme? O seclum insipiens et infacetum! I'estime que les anciens auoient encore plus à se plaindre de ceux qui apparioient Plaute à Terence (cestuy-cy sent bien mieux son Gentil-homme) que Lucrece à Virgile. Pour l'estimation et preference de Terence, fait beaucoup, que le pere de l'eloquence Romaine l'a si souuent en la bouche, seul de son reng: et la sentence, que le premier iuge des poëtes Romains donne de son compagnon.

If they were stung by that comparison, what would they say of the barbarous stupidity and dullness of those who now compare Ariosto to him? And what would Ariosto himself say? O age without sense or wit! I think the ancients had even more cause to complain of those who paired Plautus with Terence (the latter has much more the air of a gentleman) than of those who paired Lucretius with Virgil. For the esteem and preference given to Terence, it counts for much that the father of Roman eloquence has him so often on his lips, alone of his kind; and so does the verdict that the foremost judge of Roman poets passes on his fellow poet.[4]

2.10.8 Il m'est souuent tombé en fantasie, comme en nostre temps, ceux qui se meslent de faire des comedies, ainsi que les Italiens, qui y sont assez heureux, employent trois ou quatre argumens de celles de Terence, ou de Plaute, pour en faire vne des leurs. Ils entassent en vne seule comedie, cinq ou six contes de Boccace. Ce qui les fait ainsi se charger de matiere, c'est la deffiance qu'ils ont de se pouuoir soustenir de leurs propres graces. Il faut qu'ils trouuent vn corps où s'appuyer: et n'ayans pas du leur assez dequoy nous arrester, ils veulent que le conte nous amuse.

It has often occurred to me how, in our time, those who take to writing comedies (like the Italians, who are quite successful at it) use three or four plots from the plays of Terence or Plautus to make one of their own. They heap five or six of Boccaccio's tales into a single comedy. What makes them load themselves with so much matter is that they do not trust themselves to stand up on their own graces. They have to find a body to lean on; and not having enough of their own to hold us, they want the story to entertain us.

Il en va de mon autheur tout au contraire: les perfections et beautez de sa façon de dire, nous font perdre l'appetit de son subiect. Sa gentillesse et sa mignardise nous retiennent par tout. Il est par tout si plaisant, Liquidus, puróque simillimus amni, et nous remplit tant l'ame de ses graces, que nous en oublions celles de sa fable.

With my author it is quite the opposite: the perfections and beauties of his way of speaking make us lose our appetite for his subject. His elegance and charm hold us everywhere. He is so delightful everywhere, Flowing, and most like a pure stream, and fills our soul so full of his graces, that we forget those of his plot.[5]

2.10.9 Cette mesme consideration me tire plus auant. Ie voy que les bons et anciens poëtes ont euité l'affectation et la recherche, non seulement des fantastiques eleuations Espagnoles et Petrarchistes, mais des pointes mesmes plus douces et plus retenues, qui sont l'ornement de tous les ouurages poëtiques des siecles suyuans. Si n'y a il bon iuge qui les trouue à dire en ces anciens, et qui n'admire plus sans comparaison, l'egale polissure et cette perpetuelle douceur et beauté fleurissante des epigrammes de Catulle, que tous les esguillons, dequoy Martial esguise la queuë des siens. C'est cette mesme

This same consideration leads me further. I see that the good ancient poets avoided affectation and straining after effect—not only the fantastic flights of the Spanish and the Petrarchists, but even the gentler and more restrained conceits that are the ornament of all the poetic works of the centuries that followed. Yet there is no good judge who misses them in these ancients, or who does not admire, beyond all comparison, the even polish and the perpetual sweetness and flowering beauty of Catullus' epigrams more than all the raison que ie disoy tantost, comme Martial de soy, minus illi ingenio laborandum fuit, in cuius locum materia successerat.

Ces premiers là, sans s'esmouuoir et sans se picquer se font assez sentir: ils ont dequoy rire par tout, il ne faut pas qu'ils se chatouillent: ceux-cy ont besoing de secours estranger: à mesure qu'ils ont moins d'esprit, il leur faut plus de corps: ils montent à cheual par ce qu'ils ne sont assez forts sur leurs iambes. Tout ainsi qu'en nos bals, ces hommes de vile condition, qui en tiennent escole, pour ne pouuoir representer le port et la decence de nostre noblesse, cherchent à se recommander par des sauts perilleux, et autres mouuemens estranges et basteleresques.

Et les dames ont meilleur marché de leur contenance, aux danses où il y a diuerses descoupeures et agitation de corps, qu'en certaines autres danses de parade, où elles n'ont simplement qu'à marcher vn pas naturel, et representer vn port naïf et leur grace ordinaire. Et comme i'ay veu aussi les badins excellens, vestus en leur à tous les iours, et en vne contenance commune, nous donner tout le plaisir qui se peut tirer de leur art: les apprentifs, qui ne sont de si haute leçon, auoir besoin de s'enfariner le visage, se trauestir, se contrefaire en mouuemens de grimaces sauuages, pour nous apprester à rire. Cette mienne conception se reconnoist mieux qu'en tout autre lieu, en la comparaison de l'Æneide et du Furieux.

Celuy-là on le voit aller à tire d'aisle, d'vn vol haut et ferme, suyuant tousiours sa poincte: cestuy-cy voleter et sauteler de conte en conte, comme de branche en branche, ne se fiant à ses aisles, que pour vne bien courte trauerse: et prendre pied à chasque bout de champ, de peur que l'haleine et la force luy faille, Excursúsque breues tentat. Voyla donc quant à cette sorte de subiects, les autheurs qui me plaisent le plus.

stings with which Martial sharpens the tails of his. It is for the same reason I gave just now, as Martial said of himself: his wit had less work to do, since the subject had taken its place.

The former, without getting excited or goading themselves, make themselves felt well enough: they have something to laugh at everywhere, and need not tickle themselves. The latter need outside help: the less wit they have, the more body they need. They get on horseback because they are not strong enough on their own legs. Just so, at our balls, those men of low condition who run dancing schools, unable to reproduce the bearing and decorum of our nobility, try to recommend themselves by daring leaps and other strange, acrobatic movements.

And ladies have an easier time with their deportment in dances full of intricate steps and agitation of the body than in certain other dances of state, where they simply have to walk with a natural step and show a natural bearing and their ordinary grace. And I have also seen excellent clowns, dressed in their everyday clothes and with an ordinary countenance, give us all the pleasure that can be drawn from their art, while the apprentices, not so highly schooled, need to flour their faces, dress up in disguise, and contort themselves into wild grimaces to set us laughing. This notion of mine can be recognized better than anywhere else by comparing the Aeneid with the Orlando Furioso.[6]

The one we see soaring at full wing, in a high, steady flight, always holding its course; the other fluttering and hopping from tale to tale as from branch to branch, trusting its wings only for a very short crossing, and landing at every field's end for fear that its breath and strength might fail: And it tries short flights. There, then, as regards this kind of subject, are the authors who please me most.[7] conditions, les liures qui m'y seruent, c'est Plutarque, depuis qu'il est François, et Seneque. Ils ont tous deux cette notable commodité pour mon humeur, que la science que i'y cherche, y est traictée à pieces décousues, qui ne demandent pas l'obligation d'vn long trauail, dequoy ie suis incapable. Ainsi sont les Opuscules de Plutarque et les Epistres de Seneque, qui sont la plus belle partie de leurs escrits, et la plus profitable. Il ne faut pas grande entreprinse pour m'y mettre, et les quitte où il me plaist. Car elles n'ont point de suite et dependance des vnes aux autres.

Ces autheurs se rencontrent en la plus part des opinions vtiles et vrayes: comme aussi leur fortune les fit naistre enuiron mesme siecle: tous deux precepteurs de deux Empereurs Romains: tous deux venus de pays estranger: tous deux riches et puissans. Leur instruction est de la cresme de la philosophie, et presentée d'vne simple façon et pertinente. Plutarque est plus vniforme et constant: Seneque plus ondoyant et diuers. Cettuy-cy se peine, se roidit et se tend pour armer la vertu contre la foiblesse, la crainte, et les vitieux appetis: l'autre semble n'estimer pas tant leur effort, et desdaigner d'en haster son pas et se mettre sur sa garde.

Plutarque a les opinions Platoniques, douces et accommodables à la societé ciuile: l'autre les a Stoïques et Epicuriennes, plus esloignées de l'vsage commun, mais selon moy plus commodes en particulier, et plus fermes. Il paroist en Seneque qu'il preste vn peu à la tyrannie des Empereurs de son temps: car ie tiens pour certain, que c'est d'vn iugement forcé, qu'il condamne la cause de ces genereux meurtriers de Cæsar: Plutarque est libre par tout. Seneque est plein de pointes et saillies, Plutarque de choses. Celuy là vous eschauffe plus, et vous esmeut, cestuy-cy vous contente d'auantage, et vous paye mieux: il nous guide, l'autre nous pousse.

order my opinions and my conduct, the books that serve me are Plutarch, since he became French, and Seneca. They both have this notable advantage for my temperament: the knowledge I seek in them is treated in disconnected pieces, which do not impose the obligation of long labor, of which I am incapable. Such are Plutarch's Moral Essays and Seneca's Letters, which are the finest and most profitable part of their writings. It takes no great undertaking to get me into them, and I leave off wherever I please, for they have no sequence and do not depend on one another.

These authors agree in most of the useful and true opinions; and their fortune likewise had them born at about the same time. Both were tutors to Roman emperors; both came from foreign lands; both were rich and powerful. Their teaching is the cream of philosophy, presented in a simple and pertinent way. Plutarch is more uniform and constant; Seneca more undulating and diverse. Seneca toils, braces and strains to arm virtue against weakness, fear and vicious appetites; the other seems not to rate their power so highly, and disdains to quicken his pace or put himself on guard against them.

Plutarch's opinions are Platonic, mild and suited to civil society; the other's are Stoic and Epicurean, further removed from common practice, but in my view better suited to private life, and firmer. It shows in Seneca that he yields a little to the tyranny of the emperors of his time; for I hold it certain that it is with a forced judgment that he condemns the cause of those noble-hearted murderers of Caesar. Plutarch is free throughout. Seneca is full of points and sallies, Plutarch of substance. The former warms you more and moves you; the latter satisfies you more and repays you better. He guides us; the other pushes us.

hardiment la verité (car puis qu'on a franchi les barrieres de l'impudence, il n'y a plus de bride) sa façon d'escrire me semble ennuyeuse: et toute autre pareille façon. Car ses prefaces, definitions, partitions, etymologies, consument la plus part de son ouurage. Ce qu'il y a de vif et de moüelle, est estouffé par ces longueries d'apprets.

Si i'ay employé vne heure à le lire, qui est beaucoup pour moy, et que ie r'amentoiue ce que i'en ay tiré de suc et de substance, la plus part du temps ie n'y treuue que du vent: car il n'est pas encor venu aux argumens, qui seruent à son propos, et aux raisons qui touchent proprement le neud que ie cherche. Pour moy, qui ne demande qu'à deuenir plus sage, non plus sçauant ou eloquent, ces ordonnances logiciennes et Aristoteliques ne sont pas à propos. Ie veux qu'on commence par le dernier poinct: i'entens assez que c'est que mort, et volupté, qu'on ne s'amuse pas à les anatomizer. Ie cherche des raisons bonnes et fermes, d'arriuée, qui m'instruisent à en soustenir l'effort.

Ny les subtilitez grammairiennes, ny l'ingenieuse contexture de parolles et d'argumentations, n'y seruent. Ie veux des discours qui donnent la premiere charge dans le plus fort du doubte: les siens languissent autour du pot. Ils sont bons pour l'escole, pour le barreau, et pour le sermon, où nous auons loisir de sommeiller: et sommes encores vn quart d'heure apres, assez à temps, pour en retrouuer le fil. Il est besoin de parler ainsin aux iuges, qu'on veut gaigner à tort ou à droit, aux enfans, et au vulgaire, à qui il faut tout dire, et voir ce qui portera. Ie ne veux pas qu'on s'employe à me rendre attentif, et qu'on me crie cinquante fois, Or oyez, à la mode de nos heraux.

Les Romains disoyent en leur religion, Hoc age: que nous disons en la nostre, Sursum corda, ce sont autant de parolles perdues pour moy. I'y viens tout preparé du logis: il ne me faut point d'alechement, ny de saulse: ie mange bien la viande toute crue: et au lieu de m'esguiser l'appetit par ces preparatoires et auant-ieux, on me le lasse et affadit. La licence du temps m'excusera elle de cette sacrilege audace, d'estimer aussi trainans les dialogismes de Platon mesme, estouffans par trop sa matiere? Et de pleindre le temps que met à ces longues interlocutions vaines et preparatoires, vn homme, qui auoit tant de meilleures choses à dire?

boldly (for once you have crossed the barriers of impudence, there is no more holding back), his way of writing seems tedious to me, and so does every other way like it. His prefaces, definitions, divisions and etymologies use up most of his work. Whatever is lively and marrowy in it is smothered by these long-drawn-out preparations.

If I have spent an hour reading him, which is a lot for me, and I recall what juice and substance I have drawn from it, most of the time I find nothing but wind; for he has not yet come to the arguments that serve his purpose, or to the reasons that really touch the knot I am looking for. For me, who ask only to become wiser, not more learned or eloquent, these logical and Aristotelian arrangements are beside the point. I want a writer to begin with the last point. I understand well enough what death and pleasure are; let him not waste time dissecting them. I look for good, solid reasons from the outset, to teach me how to withstand their assault.

Neither grammatical subtleties nor the ingenious weaving of words and arguments are of any use here. I want reasonings that make their first charge at the strongest point of the doubt; his languish around the edges of the pot. They are good for the school, the bar and the pulpit, where we have leisure to doze off, and are still in good time, a quarter of an hour later, to pick up the thread. That is how one has to speak to judges whom one wants to win over, rightly or wrongly; to children; and to the common people, to whom one must say everything and see what hits home. I do not want anyone to labor to make me attentive, crying out to me fifty times, "Now hear this!" in the manner of our heralds.

The Romans said in their religion, Attend to this, as we say in ours, Lift up your hearts: these are so many words wasted on me. I come from home fully prepared; I need no enticement and no sauce; I can eat my meat quite raw. And instead of whetting my appetite, these preliminaries and preambles tire it and dull it. Will the license of our times excuse me for this sacrilegious audacity of finding even Plato's dialogues dragging too, smothering his matter far too much? And for lamenting the time that a man who had so many better things to say spends on these long, empty, preparatory exchanges?

Mon ignorance m'excusera mieux, sur ce que ie ne voy rien en la beauté de son langage. Ie demande en general les liures qui vsent des sciences, non ceux qui les dressent. Les deux premiers, et Pline, et leurs semblables, ils n'ont point de Hoc age, ils veulent auoir à faire à gens qui s'en soyent aduertis eux mesmes: ou s'ils en ont, c'est vn, Hoc age, substantiel et qui a son corps à part.

2.10.12 Ie voy aussi volontiers les Epistres ad Atticum, non seulement par ce qu'elles contiennent vne tresample instruction de l'Histoire et affaires de son temps: mais beaucoup plus pour y descouurir ses humeurs priuées. Car i'ay vne singuliere curiosité, comme i'ay dict ailleurs, de connoistre l'ame et les naïfs iugemens de mes autheurs. Il faut bien iuger leur suffisance, mais non pas leurs mœurs, ny eux par cette montre de leurs escris, qu'ils étalent au theatre du monde. I'ay mille fois regretté, que nous ayons perdu le liure que Brutus auoit escrit de la vertu: car il fait bel apprendre la theorique de ceux qui sçauent bien la practique.

Mais d'autant que c'est autre chose le presche, que le prescheur: i'ayme bien autant voir Brutus chez Plutarque, que chez luy-mesme. Ie choisiroy plustost de sçauoir au vray les deuis qu'il tenoit en sa tente, à quelqu'vn de ses priuez amis, la veille d'vne bataille, que les propos qu'il tint le lendemain à son armée: et qu'il faisoit en son cabinet et en sa chambre, que ce qu'il faisoit emmy la place et au Senat.

2.10.13 Quant à Cicero, ie suis du iugement commun, que hors la science, il n'y auoit pas beaucoup d'excellence en son ame: il estoit bon citoyen, d'vne nature debonnaire, comme sont volontiers les hommes gras, et gosseurs, tel qu'il estoit, mais de mollesse et de vanité ambitieuse, il en auoit sans mentir beaucoup. Et si ne sçay comment l'excuser d'auoir estimé sa poësie digne d'estre mise en lumiere. Ce n'est pas grande imperfection, que de mal faire des vers, mais c'est imperfection de n'auoir pas senty combien ils estoyent indignes de la gloire de son nom. Quant à son eloquence, elle est du tout hors de comparaison, ie croy que iamais homme ne l'egalera.

Le ieune Cicero, qui n'a ressemblé son pere que de nom, commandant en Asie, il se trouua vn iour en sa table plusieurs estrangers, et entre autres Cæstius assis au bas bout, comme on se fourre souuent aux tables ouuertes

ENGLISH

My ignorance will excuse me better, since I see nothing in the beauty of his language. In general I ask for books that make use of the sciences, not those that set them up. The first two, and Pliny, and their like, have no Attend to this; they want to deal with people who have alerted themselves. Or if they do have one, it is a substantial Attend to this, with a body of its own.[8]

I also enjoy reading the letters to Atticus, not only because they contain very ample instruction on the history and affairs of his time, but much more to discover his private temperament in them. For I have a singular curiosity, as I have said elsewhere, to know the soul and the natural judgments of my authors. We must indeed judge their ability, but not their character, nor themselves, by the display of their writings that they put on in the theater of the world. I have regretted a thousand times that we have lost the book Brutus wrote on virtue; for it is a fine thing to learn the theory from those who know the practice well.[9]

But since the sermon is one thing and the preacher another, I like seeing Brutus in Plutarch just as much as in his own work. I would rather know truly what he talked about in his tent with one of his intimate friends on the eve of a battle than the speech he made to his army the next day; and what he did in his study and his bedroom than what he did in the public square and the Senate.

As for Cicero, I share the common judgment that, apart from his learning, there was not much excellence in his soul. He was a good citizen, of a kindly nature, as fat and jesting men like him tend to be; but of softness and ambitious vanity he had, to tell the truth, a great deal. And I do not know how to excuse him for having thought his poetry worth publishing. It is no great imperfection to write bad verse; but it is an imperfection not to have sensed how unworthy his verses were of the glory of his name. As for his eloquence, it is wholly beyond comparison; I believe no man will ever equal it.

Young Cicero, who resembled his father only in name, was commanding in Asia when one day several strangers happened to be at his table, among them Cestius, seated at the lower end, as people des grands: Cicero s'informa qui il estoit à l'vn de ses gents, qui luy dit son nom: mais comme celuy qui songeoit ailleurs, et qui oublioit ce qu'on luy respondoit, il le luy redemanda encore dépuis deux ou trois fois: le seruiteur pour n'estre plus en peine de luy redire si souuent mesme chose, et pour le luy faire cognoistre par quelque circonstance, C'est, dit-il, ce Cæstius de qui on vous a dict, qu'il ne fait pas grand estat de l'eloquence de vostre pere au prix de la sienne: Cicero s'estant soudain picqué de cela, commanda qu'on empoignast ce pauure Cæstius, et le fit tres-bien fouëter en sa presence: voyla vn mal courtois hoste.

Entre ceux mesmes, qui ont estimé toutes choses contées cette sienne eloquence incomparable, il y en a eu, qui n'ont pas laissé d'y remerquer des fautes. Comme ce grand Brutus son amy, disoit que c'estoit vne eloquence cassée et esrenée, fractam et elumbem. Les orateurs voisins de son siecle, reprenoyent aussi en luy, ce curieux soing de certaine longue cadance, au bout de ses clauses, et notoient ces mots, esse videatur, qu'il y employe si souuent. Pour moy, i'ayme mieux vne cadance qui tombe plus court, coupée en yambes. Si mesle il par fois bien rudement ses nombres, mais rarement. I'en ay remerqué ce lieu à mes aureilles. Ego verò me minus diu senem esse mallem, quàm esse senem, antequam essem.

often push their way in at the open tables of the great. Cicero asked one of his men who he was, and the man told him his name. But like someone whose mind was elsewhere and who forgot what he was told, he asked again two or three times afterward. The servant, to spare himself the trouble of repeating the same thing so often, and to make him know the man by some circumstance, said: "It is that Cestius who, you were told, does not think much of your father's eloquence compared with his own." Cicero, suddenly stung by this, ordered that poor Cestius to be seized and had him soundly flogged in his presence. There's a discourteous host for you.[10]

Even among those who have judged this eloquence of his incomparable, all things considered, there have been some who did not fail to note faults in it. Thus the great Brutus, his friend, said that it was a broken eloquence, weak in the back: broken and loinless. Orators close to his century also criticized in him his elaborate care for a certain long cadence at the end of his periods, and remarked on the words it would seem to be, which he uses so often. For my part, I prefer a cadence that falls shorter, cut into iambs. Yet he does sometimes jumble his rhythms quite roughly, though rarely. My ears have noted this passage: For my part, I would rather be old for a shorter time than be old before my time.[11]

2.10.14 Les historiens sont ma droitte bale: car ils sont plaisans et aysez: et quant et quant l'homme en general, de qui ie cherche la cognoissance, y paroist plus vif et plus entier qu'en nul autre lieu: la varieté et verité de ses conditions internes, en gros et en detail, la diuersité des moyens de son assemblage, et des accidents qui le menacent. Or ceux qui escriuent les vies, d'autant qu'ils s'amusent plus aux conseils qu'aux euenemens: plus à ce qui part du dedans, qu'à ce qui arriue au dehors: ceux là me sont plus propres. Historians are right in my court, for they are pleasant and easy; and at the same time man in general, whom I seek to know, appears in them more alive and more whole than anywhere else: the variety and truth of his inner qualities, in the mass and in detail, the diversity of the ways he is put together, and of the accidents that threaten him. Now those who write lives, since they dwell more on intentions than on events, more on what comes from within than on what happens outside, suit me best. That is why, in every way, Plutarch is my man. I am very sorry that we do not have a dozen Laertiuses, or that he is not more ample or more able.[12]

Car ie suis pareillement curieux de cognoistre les fortunes et la vie de ces grands precepteurs du monde, comme de cognoistre la diuersité de leurs dogmes et fantasies. En ce genre d'estude des Histoires, il faut feuilleter sans distinction toutes sortes d'autheurs et vieils et nouueaux, et barragouins et François, pour y apprendre les choses, dequoy diuersement ils traictent.

For I am just as curious to know the fortunes and lives of these great teachers of the world as to know the diversity of their doctrines and notions. In this kind of historical study, one must leaf through all sorts of authors without distinction, old and new, in outlandish tongues and in French, to learn the things they treat in their various ways.

2.10.15 Mais Cæsar singulierement me semble meriter qu'on l'estudie, non pour la science de l'Histoire seulement, mais pour luy mesme: tant il a de perfection et d'excellence par dessus tous les autres: quoy que Salluste soit du nombre. Certes ie lis cet autheur auec vn peu plus de reuerence et de respect, qu'on ne lit les humains ouurages: tantost le considerant luy-mesme par ses actions, et le miracle de sa grandeur: tantost la pureté et inimitable polissure de son langage, qui a surpassé non seulement tous les historiens, comme dit Cicero, mais à l'aduenture Cicero mesme.

But Caesar in particular seems to me to deserve study, not only for the knowledge of history but for himself, so far does his perfection and excellence rise above all the others, though Sallust is one of them. Indeed I read this author with a little more reverence and respect than one reads human works: sometimes considering the man himself through his actions and the miracle of his greatness, sometimes the purity and inimitable polish of his language, which surpassed not only all historians, as Cicero says, but perhaps even Cicero himself.

Auec tant de syncerité en ses iugemens, parlant de ses ennemis, que sauf les fausses couleurs, dequoy il veut couurir sa mauuaise cause, et l'ordure de sa pestilente ambition, ie pense qu'en cela seul on y puisse trouuer à redire, qu'il a esté trop espargnant à parler de soy: car tant de grandes choses ne peuuent auoir esté executées par luy, qu'il n'y soit allé beaucoup plus du sien, qu'il n'y en met.

There is such sincerity in his judgments when he speaks of his enemies that, apart from the false colors with which he tries to cover his bad cause and the filth of his pestilent ambition, I think the only fault one can find in him is that he was too sparing in speaking of himself. For so many great things cannot have been carried out by him without his own share in them being much greater than he puts in.

2.10.16 I'ayme les historiens, ou fort simples, ou excellens. Les simples, qui n'ont point dequoy y mesler quelque chose du leur, et qui n'y apportent que le soin, et la diligence de r'amasser tout ce qui vient à leur notice, et d'enregistrer à la bonne foy toutes choses, sans chois et sans triage, nous laissent le iugement entier, pour la cognoissance de la verité. Tel est entre autres pour exemple, le bon Froissard, qui a marché en son entreprise d'vne si franche naïfueté, qu'ayant faict vne faute, il ne craint aucunement de la recognoistre et corriger, en l'endroit, où il en a esté aduerty: et qui nous represente la diuersité mesme des bruits qui couroyent, et les differens rapports qu'on luy faisoit.

I like historians who are either very simple or excellent. The simple ones, who have nothing of their own to mix in, and who bring only the care and diligence to gather everything that comes to their notice and to record everything in good faith, without choosing or sorting, leave our judgment intact for discerning the truth. Such, for example, among others, is good Froissart, who went about his undertaking with such frank naturalness that, having made a mistake, he is not in the least afraid to acknowledge and correct it at the point where he was told of it; and who gives us even the diversity of the rumors that were going around and the different reports that were made to him.[13]

C’est la matiere de l’Histoire nuë et informe: chacun en peut faire son profit autant qu’il a d’entendement. Les bien excellens ont la suffisance de choisir ce qui est digne d’estre sçeu, peuuent trier de deux rapports celuy qui est plus vray-semblable: de la condition des Princes et de leurs humeurs, ils en concluent les conseils, et leur attribuent les paroles conuenables: ils ont raison de prendre l’authorité de regler nostre creance à la leur: mais certes cela n’appartient à gueres de gens.

Ceux d’entre-deux, qui est la plus commune façon, ceux là nous gastent tout: ils veulent nous mascher les morceaux; ils se donnent loy de iuger et par consequent d’incliner l’Histoire à leur fantasie: car depuis que le iugement pend d’vn costé, on ne se peut garder de contourner et tordre la narration à ce biais. Ils entreprennent de choisir les choses dignes d’estre sçeuës, et nous cachent souuent telle parole, telle action priuée, qui nous instruiroit mieux: obmettent pour choses incroyables celles qu’ils n’entendent pas: et peut estre encore telle chose pour ne la sçauoir dire en bon Latin ou François.

Qu’ils estalent hardiment leur eloquence et leur discours: qu’ils iugent à leur poste, mais qu’ils nous laissent aussi dequoy iuger apres eux: et qu’ils n’alterent ny dispensent par leurs racourcimens et par leur choix, rien sur le corps de la matiere: ains qu’ils nous la r’enuoyent pure et entiere en toutes ses dimensions.

2.10.17 Le plus souuent on trie pour cette charge, et notamment en ces siecles icy, des personnes d’entre le vulgaire, pour cette seule consideration de sçauoir bien parler: comme si nous cherchions d’y apprendre la grammaire: et eux ont raison n’ayans esté gagez que pour cela, et n’ayans mis en vente que le babil, de ne se soucier aussi principalement que de cette partie. Ainsin à force de beaux mots ils nous vont patissant vne belle contexture des bruits, qu’ils ramassent és carrefours des villes. Les seules bonnes Histoires sont celles, qui ont esté escrites par ceux mesmes qui commandoient aux affaires, ou qui estoient participans à les conduire, ou au moins qui ont eu la fortune d’en conduire d’autres de mesme sorte.

That is the raw material of history, bare and unshaped; each person can profit from it as far as his understanding allows. The truly excellent ones have the ability to choose what is worth knowing; they can pick out, of two reports, the more likely one; from the situation and temperament of princes they infer their intentions and attribute fitting words to them. They are right to take on the authority to regulate our belief by theirs; but certainly that belongs to very few people.

Those in between, who are the commonest kind, spoil everything for us. They want to chew our food for us; they give themselves license to judge, and consequently to bend history to their own notion. For once judgment leans to one side, one cannot help turning and twisting the narrative in that direction. They take it upon themselves to choose the things worth knowing, and often hide from us some word, some private action, that would teach us more; they leave out as incredible the things they do not understand, and perhaps some things too because they cannot express them in good Latin or French.

Let them boldly display their eloquence and their reasoning; let them judge as they please; but let them also leave us something to judge after them. And let them neither alter nor rearrange anything in the body of the material by their abridgments and their choices, but hand it on to us pure and whole in all its dimensions.

Most often, and especially in these times of ours, people are chosen for this task from among the common sort, for the sole reason that they know how to speak well—as if what we were looking to learn from it were grammar! And they are right, having been hired only for that and having put nothing up for sale but their chatter, to care mainly about that part. So, by dint of fine words, they knead us a fine pastry out of the rumors they pick up at the town crossroads. The only good histories are those written by the very men who were in command of affairs, or who had a part in conducting them, or who at least had the fortune to conduct others of the same kind.

Such are almost all the Greek and Roman ones. For when several eyewitnesses have written on the same subject (as happened in those times, when greatness and learning commonly went together), Que peut on esperer d'vn medecin traictant de la guerre, ou d'vn escholier traictant les desseins des Princes?	if there is any error it must be marvelously slight, and about some very doubtful incident. What can one expect from a doctor writing about war, or a scholar writing about the designs of princes?

Si nous voulons remerquer la religion, que les Romains auoient en cela, il n'en faut que cet exemple: Asinius Pollio trouuoit és histoires mesme de Cæsar quelque mesconte, en quoy il estoit tombé, pour n'auoir peu ietter les yeux en tous les endroits de son armée, et en auoir creu les particuliers, qui luy rapportoient souuent des choses non assez verifiées, ou bien pour n'auoir esté assez curieusement aduerty par ses lieutenans des choses, qu'ils auoient conduites en son absence.	If we want to see how scrupulous the Romans were in this, we need only this example. Asinius Pollio found, even in Caesar's histories, some errors he had fallen into—either because he had not been able to cast his eyes over every part of his army and had believed individuals who often reported to him things not sufficiently verified, or because he had not been informed carefully enough by his lieutenants of the operations they had conducted in his absence.[14]
On peut voir par là, si cette recherche de la verité est delicate, qu'on ne se puisse pas fier d'vn combat à la science de celuy, qui y a commandé; ny aux soldats, de ce qui s'est passé pres d'eux, si à la mode d'vne information iudiciaire, on ne confronte les tesmoins, et reçoit les obiects sur la preuue des ponctilles, de chaque accident. Vrayement la connoissance que nous auons de nos affaires est bien plus lasche. Mais cecy a esté suffisamment traicté par Bodin, et selon ma conception.	You can see from this how delicate a thing this search for truth is, since one cannot trust the knowledge of the man who commanded a battle about that battle, nor the soldiers about what happened near them, unless, as in a judicial inquiry, the witnesses are confronted and objections are admitted on proof of the finest details of each incident. Truly, the knowledge we have of our own affairs is much looser. But this has been treated sufficiently by Bodin, and in line with my own view.[15]

Il n'y a aucune apparence que par haine, faueur, ou vanité il ayt déguisé les choses: dequoy font foy les libres iugemens qu'il donne des grands: et notamment de ceux, par lesquels il auoit esté auancé, et employé aux charges, comme du Pape Clement septiesme.

Quant à la partie dequoy il semble se vouloir preualoir le plus, qui sont ses digressions et discours, il y en a de bons et enrichis de beaux traits, mais il s'y est trop pleu. Car pour ne vouloir rien laisser à dire, ayant vn suiect si plain et ample et à peu pres infiny, il en deuient lasche, et sentant vn peu le caquet scholastique.

I'ay aussi remerqué cecy, que de tant d'ames et effects qu'il iuge, de tant de mouuemens et conseils, il n'en rapporte iamais vn seul à la vertu, religion, et conscience: comme si ces parties là estoyent du tout esteintes au monde: et de toutes les actions, pour belles par apparence qu'elles soient d'elles mesmes, il en reiecte la cause à quelque occasion vitieuse, ou à quelque proufit. Il est impossible d'imaginer, que parmy cet infiny nombre d'actions, dequoy il iuge, il n'y en ait eu quelqu'vne produite par la voye de la raison. speak, I speak to them in mine): He is a diligent historian, from whom, in my opinion, one can learn the truth about the affairs of his time as exactly as from anyone; indeed, in most of them he was himself an actor, and in an honorable rank. There is no sign that he disguised things out of hatred, favor or vanity. The free judgments he passes on the great bear witness to this, notably on those who had advanced him and employed him in office, such as Pope Clement VII.

As for the part he seems to want to pride himself on most, namely his digressions and reflections, there are good ones, enriched with fine touches; but he took too much pleasure in them. For in not wanting to leave anything unsaid, with a subject so full and ample and almost infinite, he becomes slack and smacks a little of scholastic chatter.

I have also noticed this: of all the souls and deeds he judges, of all the motives and intentions, he never attributes a single one to virtue, religion or conscience, as if those qualities were entirely extinct in the world. And for every action, however fine it may appear in itself, he throws the cause back on some vicious motive or some profit. It is impossible to imagine that among the infinite number of actions he judges there was not at least one produced by way of reason. No corruption can have seized men so universally that someone does not escape the contagion.

This makes me fear that there was some flaw in his own taste, and that he may have judged others by himself.

In my Philippe de Commynes there is this: You will find here a gentle and pleasant language, of natural simplicity; a pure narrative, in which the author's good faith shines out clearly, free of vanity when he speaks of himself and of partiality and envy when he speaks of others; his reflections and exhortations marked more by good zeal and truth than by any exquisite ability; and, throughout, authority and gravity, showing him to be a man of good family, brought up in great affairs.[16] falling-off from the frankness and freedom of writing that shine in the older writers of their kind—such as the Sire de Joinville, of the household of Saint Louis; Einhard, chancellor of Charlemagne; and, more recently, Philippe de Commynes. This is a plea for King Francis against the Emperor Charles V rather than a history.[17]

I am unwilling to believe that they changed anything in the main facts; but they make a practice of twisting the judgment of events in our favor, often against reason, and of omitting everything ticklish in their master's life. Witness the disgraces of Messieurs de Montmorency and de Brion, which are left out; indeed, the very name of Madame d'Étampes is nowhere to be found. Secret actions may be covered up; but to keep silent about what everyone knows, and about things that have had public effects of such consequence, is an inexcusable fault. In short, if you want a full knowledge of King Francis and of what happened in his time, look elsewhere, if you take my advice.[18]

Whatever profit can be had here lies in the detailed account of the battles and feats of arms in which these gentlemen took part; in some private words and actions of certain princes of their time; and in the dealings and negotiations conducted by the Seigneur de Langey, which contain plenty of things worth knowing, and reflections out of the ordinary.

17 The Memoirs (1569) were by the brothers Martin and Guillaume du Bellay; Einhard wrote a life of Charlemagne.

II.11 Of Cruelty

De la cruauté

2.11.1 IL me semble que la vertu est chose autre, et plus noble, que les inclinations à la bonté, qui naissent en nous. Les ames reglées d'elles mesmes et bien nées, elles suyuent mesme train, et representent en leurs actions, mesme visage que les vertueuses. Mais la vertu sonne ie ne sçay quoy de plus grand et de plus actif, que de se laisser par vne heureuse complexion, doucement et paisiblement conduire à la suite de la raison.

It seems to me that virtue is something different from, and nobler than, the inclinations to goodness that are born in us. Souls that are well regulated of themselves and well born follow the same course, and show the same face in their actions, as virtuous ones. But virtue has the ring of something greater and more active than letting oneself, through a happy disposition, be led gently and peacefully in the train of reason.

Celuy qui d'vne douceur et facilité naturelle, mespriseroit les offences receuës, feroit chose tresbelle et digne de loüange: mais celuy qui picqué et outré iusques au vif d'vne offence, s'armeroit des armes de la raison contre ce furieux appetit de vengeance, et apres vn grand conflict, s'en rendroit en fin maistre, feroit sans doubte beaucoup plus. Celuy-là feroit bien, et cestuy-cy vertueusement: l'vne action se pourroit dire bonté, l'autre vertu. Car il semble que le nom de la vertu presuppose de la difficulté et du contraste, et qu'elle ne peut s'exercer sans partie. C'est à l'auenture pourquoy nous nommons Dieu bon, fort, et liberal, et iuste, mais nous ne le nommons pas vertueux. Ses operations sont toutes naïfues et sans effort.

A man who, out of natural gentleness and easiness, made light of the injuries done him would do a very fine thing, worthy of praise. But a man who, stung and outraged to the quick by an injury, armed himself with the arms of reason against this furious appetite for vengeance, and after a great struggle finally mastered it, would without doubt do much more. The first would be acting well, the second virtuously; the one action might be called goodness, the other virtue. For it seems that the very name of virtue presupposes difficulty and struggle, and that it cannot be exercised without an opponent. That is perhaps why we call God good, mighty, generous and just, but we do not call him virtuous. His workings are all natural and effortless.

2.11.2 Des philosophes non seulement Stoiciens, mais encore Epicuriens (et cette enchere ie l'emprunte de l'opinion commune, qui est fauce, quoy que die ce subtil rencontre d'Arcesilaüs, à celuy qui luy reprochoit, que beaucoup de gents passoient de son eschole en l'Epicurienne, et iamais au rebours: Ie croy bien. Some philosophers—not only Stoics but even Epicureans (and this "even" I borrow from common opinion, which is false, whatever may be said for that witty retort of Arcesilaus to the man who reproached him that many people went over from his school to the Epicurean, and never the other way round: "I can well believe it. beau ieu, luy font dire ce à quoy il ne pensa iamais, contournans ses paroles à gauche, argumentans par la loy grammairienne, autre sens de sa façon de parler, et autre creance, que celle qu'ils sçauent qu'il auoit en l'ame, et en ses mœurs, dit qu'il a laissé d'estre Epicurien, pour cette consideration entre autres, qu'il trouue leur route trop hautaine et inaccessible: et ij qui φιληδονοι vocantur, sunt φιλοχαλοι et φιλοδιχαιοι, omnésque virtutes et colunt, et retinent).

Des philosophes Stoiciens et Epicuriens, dis-ie, il y en a plusieurs qui ont iugé, que ce n'estoit pas assez d'auoir l'ame en bonne assiette, bien reglée et bien disposée à la vertu: ce n'estoit pas assez d'auoir nos resolutions et nos discours, au dessus de tous les efforts de Fortune: mais qu'il falloit encore rechercher les occasions d'en venir à la preuue: ils veulent quester de la douleur, de la necessité, et du mespris, pour les combattre, et pour tenir leur ame en haleine: multum sibi adijcit virtus lacessita.

2.11.3 C'est l'vne des raisons, pourquoy Epaminondas, qui estoit encore d'vne tierce secte, refuse des richesses que la Fortune luy met en main, par vne voye tres-legitime: pour auoir, dit-il, à s'escrimer contre la pauureté, en laquelle extreme il se maintint tousiours. Socrates s'essayoit, ce me semble, encor plus rudement, conseruant pour son exercice, la malignité de sa femme, qui est vn essay à fer esmoulu.

Metellus ayant seul de tous les Senateurs Romains entrepris par l'effort de sa vertu, de soustenir la violence de Saturninus tribun du peuple à Rome, qui vouloit à toute force faire passer vne loy iniuste, en faueur de la commune: et ayant encouru par là, les peines capitales que Saturninus auoit establies contre les refusans, entretenoit ceux, qui en cette extremité, le conduisoient en la place de tels propos: Que c'estoit chose trop facile et trop lasche que de mal faire; et que de faire bien, où il n'y eust point de danger, c'estoit chose vulgaire: mais de faire bien, où il y eust danger, c'estoit le propre office d'vn homme de vertu.

themselves an easy game, make him say what he never thought, twisting his words the wrong way and arguing by the rules of grammar for another meaning in his way of speaking, and another belief, than the one they know he had in his soul and in his conduct—this Stoic says that he gave up being an Epicurean for this reason among others: that he found their road too lofty and inaccessible. And those who are called lovers of pleasure are in fact lovers of honor and lovers of justice, and they cultivate and practice all the virtues).[1]

Of these Stoic and Epicurean philosophers, I say, there are many who have judged that it was not enough to have the soul well settled, well ordered and well disposed to virtue; it was not enough to have our resolutions and our reasoning above all the assaults of Fortune; we must also seek out occasions to put them to the proof. They want to go looking for pain, need and contempt, in order to fight them and keep their soul in training: virtue gains much when it is challenged.[2]

This is one of the reasons why Epaminondas, who belonged to yet a third sect, refuses riches that Fortune puts into his hands by a perfectly legitimate means: in order, he says, to have poverty to fence with; and he always kept himself in extreme poverty. Socrates tested himself, it seems to me, still more harshly, keeping his wife's ill temper for his exercise—which is a trial with sharpened blades.[3]

Metellus, alone of all the Roman senators, undertook by the strength of his virtue to withstand the violence of Saturninus, tribune of the people at Rome, who was determined at all costs to pass an unjust law in favor of the common people. Having thereby incurred the capital penalties that Saturninus had established against those who refused, he talked in this way to those who, in this extremity, were leading him to the public square: that it was too easy and too cowardly a thing to do wrong; that to do right where there was no danger was a common thing; but that to do right where there was danger was the proper duty of a man of virtue.[4]

3 Epaminondas was a follower of the Pythagoreans. Socrates' wife was Xanthippe, proverbial for her bad temper.
4 Quintus Caecilius Metellus Numidicus refused to swear to Saturninus's agrarian law in 100 BC and went into exile.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Ces paroles de Metellus nous representent bien clairement ce que ie vouloy verifier, que la vertu refuse la facilité pour compagne; et que cette aisée, douce, et panchante voie, par où se conduisent les pas reglez d'vne bonne inclination de nature, n'est pas celle de la vraye vertu. Elle demande vn chemin aspre et espineux, elle veut auoir ou des difficultez estrangeres à luicter, comme celle de Metellus, par le moyen desquelles Fortune se plaist à luy rompre la roideur de sa course: ou des difficultez internes, que luy apportent les appetits desordonnez et imperfections de nostre condition.	These words of Metellus show us very clearly what I wanted to establish: that virtue refuses ease as a companion, and that the easy, gentle, downhill path along which the well-regulated steps of a good natural inclination are guided is not the path of true virtue. Virtue demands a rough and thorny road. It wants to have either external difficulties to wrestle with, like those of Metellus, by means of which Fortune delights in breaking the momentum of its course, or internal difficulties, brought to it by the disordered appetites and imperfections of our condition.

SOCRATES AND CATO

The greatest souls act well without struggle, which seems to unsettle the claim that virtue needs difficulty.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.11.4 Ie suis venu iusques icy bien à mon aise: mais au bout de ce discours, il me tombe en fantasie que l'ame de Socrates, qui est la plus parfaicte qui soit venuë à ma cognoissance, seroit à mon compte vne ame de peu de recommendation. Car ie ne puis conceuoir en ce personnage aucun effort de vitieuse concupiscence. Au train de sa vertu, ie n'y puis imaginer aucune difficulté ny aucune contrainte: ie cognoy sa raison si puissante et si maistresse chez luy, qu'elle n'eust iamais donné moyen à vn appetit vitieux, seulement de naistre. A vne vertu si esleuée que la sienne, ie ne puis rien mettre en teste.	I have come this far quite at my ease. But at the end of this reasoning it pops into my head that the soul of Socrates, which is the most perfect that has come to my knowledge, would by my reckoning be a soul of little merit. For I cannot conceive in that man any stirring of vicious desire. In the course of his virtue I can imagine no difficulty and no constraint: I know his reason to have been so powerful and so much the mistress in him that it would never have given a vicious appetite the means even to be born. Against a virtue as lofty as his I can set up no opponent.
Il me semble la voir marcher d'vn victorieux pas et triomphant, en pompe et à son aise, sans empeschement, ne destourbier. Si la vertu ne peut luire que par le combat des appetits contraires, dirons nous donq qu'elle ne se puisse passer de l'assistance du vice, et qu'elle luy doiue cela, d'en estre mise en credit et en honneur? Que deuiendroit aussi cette braue et genereuse volupté Epicurienne, qui fait estat de nourrir mollement en son giron, et y faire follatrer la vertu; luy donnant pour ses iouets, la honte, les fieures, la pauureté, la mort, et les gehennes?	I seem to see it marching with a victorious and triumphant step, in state and at its ease, without hindrance or disturbance. If virtue can shine only through combat with contrary appetites, shall we say, then, that it cannot do without the help of vice, and that it owes vice this much—that vice brings it credit and honor? And what, too, would become of that brave and noble Epicurean pleasure, which claims to nurse virtue tenderly in its lap and let it frolic there, giving it for toys shame, fevers, poverty, death and tortures?
Si ie presuppose que la vertu parfaite se cognoist à combattre et porter patiemment la douleur, à soustenir les efforts de la goutte, sans s'esbranler de son assiette: si ie luy donne pour son obiect necessaire l'aspreté et la difficulté, que deuiendra la vertu qui sera montée à tel poinct, que de non seulement mespriser la douleur, mais de s'en esiouyr; et de se faire chatouiller aux pointes d'vne forte colique, comme est celle que les Epicuriens ont establie, et de laquelle plusieurs d'entre eux nous ont	If I assume that perfect virtue is known by its fighting and patiently bearing pain, by withstanding the onslaughts of gout without being shaken from its seat; if I give it harshness and difficulty as its necessary object—what will become of the virtue that has risen so high as not only to despise pain but to rejoice in it, and to be tickled by the stabs of a severe colic? 2.11.5 Quand ie le voy mourir et se deschirer les entrailles, ie ne me puis contenter, de croire simplement, qu'il eust lors son ame exempte totalement de trouble et d'effroy: ie ne puis croire, qu'il se maintint seulement en cette desmarche, que les regles de la secte Stoique luy ordonnoient, rassise, sans esmotion et impassible: il y auoit, ce me semble, en la vertu de cet homme, trop de gaillardise et de verdeur, pour s'en arrester là. Ie croy sans doubte qu'il sentit du plaisir et de la volupté, en vne si noble action, et qu'il s'y aggrea plus qu'en autre de celles de sa vie.

Sic abijt è vita, vt causam moriendi nactum se esse gauderet. Ie le croy si auant, que i'entre en doubte s'il eust voulu que l'occasion d'vn si bel exploict luy fust ostée. Et si la bonté qui luy faisoit embrasser les commoditez publiques plus que les siennes, ne me tenoit en bride, ie tomberois aisément en cette opinion, qu'il sçauoit bon gré à la Fortune d'auoir mis sa vertu à vne si belle espreuue, et d'auoir fauorisé ce brigand à fouler aux pieds l'ancienne liberté de sa patrie.

Il me semble lire en cette action, ie ne sçay quelle esiouyssance de son ame, et vne esmotion de plaisir extraordinaire, et d'vne volupté virile, lors qu'elle consideroit la noblesse et haulteur de son entreprise: Deliberata morte ferocior. Non pas aiguisée par quelque esperance de gloire, comme les iugements populaires et effeminez d'aucuns hommes ont iugé: car cette consideration est trop basse, pour toucher vn cœur si genereux, si haultain et si roide, mais pour la beauté de la chose mesme en soy: laquelle il voyoit bien plus clair, et en sa perfection, luy qui en manioyt les ressorts, que nous ne pouuons faire.

La Philosophie m'a faict plaisir de iuger, qu'vne si belle action eust esté indecemment logée en toute autre vie qu'en celle de Caton: et qu'à la sienne seule il appartenoit de finir ainsi. cureans have established, and many of them have left us very certain proofs of it by their actions. So have many others, who I find surpassed in deed the very rules of their own discipline. Witness the younger Cato.

When I see him dying and tearing out his own entrails, I cannot be content simply to believe that his soul was then wholly free of turmoil and fear. I cannot believe that he merely held himself in the bearing that the rules of the Stoic sect prescribed for him—composed, without emotion and impassive. There was, it seems to me, too much gaiety and vigor in this man's virtue for it to stop there. I believe without doubt that he felt pleasure and delight in so noble an act, and that he took more satisfaction in it than in any other act of his life.

So he departed this life, rejoicing that he had found a reason to die. I believe this so far that I wonder whether he would have wanted the occasion for so fine an exploit to be taken from him. And if the goodness that made him embrace the public interest more than his own did not hold me in check, I would easily fall into this opinion: that he was grateful to Fortune for having put his virtue to so fine a test, and for having helped that brigand trample underfoot the ancient liberty of his country.[5]

I seem to read in this act some indescribable rejoicing of his soul, an emotion of extraordinary pleasure and of manly delight, as it contemplated the nobility and loftiness of its undertaking: Fiercer for having resolved on death. It was not spurred by any hope of glory, as the common and spineless judgments of some men have supposed—for that consideration is too base to touch a heart so noble, so lofty and so unbending—but by the beauty of the thing itself, which he, who handled its springs, saw far more clearly and in its perfection than we can.[6]

Philosophy has given me the pleasure of judging that so fine an action would have been unbecomingly lodged in any other life than Cato's, and that it belonged to his alone to end in this way. That is why he rightly ordered both his son and the senators who were with him to provide for their affairs roborauisset, sempérque in proposito consilio permansisset, moriendum potius, quàm tyranni vultus aspiciendus erat. Toute mort doit estre de mesmes sa vie. Nous ne deuenons pas autres pour mourir. I'interprete tousiours la mort par la vie. Et si on m'en recite quelqu'vne forte par apparence, attachée à vne vie foible: ie tiens qu'ell' est produitte de cause foible et sortable à sa vie.

2.11.6 L'aisance donc de cette mort, et cette facilité qu'il auoit acquise par la force de son ame, dirons nous qu'elle doiue rabattre quelque chose du lustre de sa vertu? Et qui de ceux qui ont la ceruelle tant soit peu teinte de la vraye Philosophie, peut se contenter d'imaginer Socrates, seulement franc de crainte et de passion, en l'accident de sa prison, de ses fers, et de sa condemnation? Et qui ne recognoist en luy, non seulement de la fermeté et de la constance, c'estoit son assiette ordinaire que celle-là, mais encore ie ne sçay quel contentement nouueau, et vne allegresse enioüée en ses propos et façons dernieres?

A ce tressaillir, du plaisir qu'il sent à gratter sa iambe, apres que les fers en furent hors: accuse-il pas vne pareille douceur et ioye en son ame, pour estre desenforgée des incommodités passées, et à mesme d'entrer en cognoissance des choses aduenir? On voit aux ames de ces deux personnages, et de leurs imitateurs (car de semblables, ie fay grand doubte qu'il y en ait eu) vne si parfaicte habitude à la vertu, qu'elle leur est passée en complexion.

Ce n'est plus vertu penible, ny des ordonnances de la raison, pour lesquelles maintenir il faille que leur ame se roidisse: c'est l'essence mesme de leur ame, c'est son train naturel et ordinaire. in some other way. Since nature had given Cato an incredible gravity, which he himself had strengthened by unfailing constancy, and since he had always held firm to his purpose, he had to die rather than look upon the face of a tyrant. Every death must be of a piece with its life. We do not become different in order to die. I always interpret the death by the life. And if I am told of some death that seems strong, attached to a weak life, I hold that it was produced by a weak cause, in keeping with that life.

Shall we say, then, that the ease of this death, and the facility he had acquired by the strength of his soul, must take something away from the luster of his virtue? And who among those whose brains are even slightly tinged with true philosophy can be content to imagine Socrates as merely free from fear and passion in the misfortune of his imprisonment, his chains and his condemnation? And who does not recognize in him not only firmness and constancy—that was his ordinary state—but also some new contentment, and a playful cheerfulness in his last words and ways?

In that thrill of pleasure he feels at scratching his leg after the irons were taken off, does he not reveal a like sweetness and joy in his soul at being unfettered from past discomforts and on the point of entering into the knowledge of things to come? Cato will forgive me, if he pleases: his death is more tragic and more strained, but this one is still, I know not how, more beautiful. Aristippus said to those who were lamenting it: "May the gods send me one like it." In the souls of these two men and of their imitators (for I very much doubt that there have been any like them) one sees so perfect a habit of virtue that it has become their very constitution.[7]

It is no longer a laborious virtue, nor the ordinances of reason, which their soul must stiffen itself to maintain: it is the very essence of their soul, its natural and ordinary gait. They made it so by long practice of the precepts of philosophy, having come upon a fine and rich nature. The vicious passions that arise in us no longer find any way into them. The strength and firmness of their soul stifles and extinguishes desires as soon as they begin to stir.

2.11.7 Or qu'il ne soit plus beau, par vne haulte et diuine resolution, d'empescher la naissance des tentations; et de s'estre formé à la vertu, de maniere que les semences mesmes des vices en soient desracinées: que d'empescher à viue force leur progrez; et s'estant laissé surprendre aux esmotions premieres des passions, s'armer et se bander pour arrester leur course, et les vaincre: et que ce second effect ne soit encore plus beau, que d'estre simplement garny d'vne nature facile et debonnaire, et desgoustée par soy mesme de la desbauche et du vice, ie ne pense point qu'il y ait doubte.

Now I do not think there is any doubt that it is finer, by a lofty and divine resolution, to prevent the birth of temptations, and to have so shaped oneself to virtue that the very seeds of the vices are uprooted, than to check their progress by main force—and, having let oneself be caught by the first stirrings of the passions, to arm and brace oneself to halt their course and overcome them. Nor is there any doubt that this second achievement is finer still than simply to be endowed with an easy and good-natured disposition, of itself averse to debauchery and vice.

Car cette tierce et derniere façon, il semble bien qu'elle rende vn homme innocent, mais non pas vertueux: exempt de mal faire, mais non assez apte à bien faire. Ioint que cette condition est si voisine à l'imperfection et à la foiblesse, que ie ne sçay pas bien comment en demesler les confins et les distinguer. Les noms mesmes de bonté et d'innocence, sont à cette cause aucunement noms de mespris.

For this third and last way does seem to make a man innocent, but not virtuous: free from doing wrong, but not apt enough to do right. Besides, this condition is so close to imperfection and weakness that I do not really know how to sort out their boundaries and tell them apart. That is why the very names of goodness and innocence are, to some extent, terms of contempt.

2.11.8 Ie voy que plusieurs vertus, comme la chasteté, sobrieté, et temperance, peuuent arriuer à nous, par deffaillance corporelle. La fermeté aux dangers, si fermeté il la faut appeller, le mespris de la mort, la patience aux infortunes, peut venir et se treuue souuent aux hommes, par faute de bien iuger de tels accidens, et ne les conceuoir tels qu'ils sont. La faute d'apprehension et la bestise, contrefont ainsi par fois les effects vertueux. Comme i'ay veu souuent aduenir, qu'on a loué des hommes, de ce, dequoy ils meritoyent du blasme.

I see that several virtues, such as chastity, sobriety and temperance, can come to us through bodily failing. Firmness in danger (if firmness it must be called), contempt of death, patience in misfortune, can come to men, and are often found in them, from a failure to judge such events rightly and to conceive them as they are. Lack of apprehension and stupidity thus sometimes counterfeit virtuous deeds. So I have often seen men praised for what deserved blame.

Vn Seigneur Italien tenoit vne fois ce propos en ma presence, au des-auantage de sa nation: Que la subtilité des Italiens et la viuacité de leurs conceptions estoit si grande, qu'ils preuoyoient les dangers et accidens qui leur pouuoyent aduenir, de si loing, qu'il ne falloit pas trouuer estrange, si on les voyoit souuent à la guerre prouuoir à leur seurté, voire auant que d'auoir recognu le peril: que nous et les Espagnols, qui n'estions pas si fins, allions plus outre; et qu'il nous falloit faire voir à l'œil et toucher à la main, le danger auant que de nous en effrayer; et que lors aussi nous n'auions plus de tenue: mais que les Allemans et les Souysses, plus grossiers et plus lourds, n'auoyent le sens de se rauiser, à peine lors mesmes qu'ils estoyent accablez soubs les coups.

An Italian lord once said this in my presence, to the disadvantage of his own nation: that the subtlety of the Italians and the quickness of their minds were so great that they foresaw the dangers and mishaps that might befall them from so far off that it should not seem strange if in war they were often seen providing for their safety even before they had perceived the peril; that we and the Spaniards, who were not so sharp, went further, and had to be made to see the danger with our own eyes and touch it with our hands before we took fright, and that even then we could no longer stand firm; but that the Germans and the Swiss, coarser and duller, hardly had the sense to think better of it even when they were already being crushed under the blows.

Ce n'estoit à l'aduenture que pour rire. Si est-il bien vray qu'au mestier de la guerre, les apprentis se iettent bien souuent aux hazards, d'autre inconsideration qu'ils ne font apres y auoir esté eschauldez. Haud ignarus, quantùm noua gloria in armis, / Et prædulce decus, primo certamine, possit. Voyla pourquoy quand on iuge d'vne action particuliere, il faut considerer plusieurs circonstances, et l'homme tout entier qui l'a produicte, auant la baptizer.	Perhaps it was only in jest. Still, it is quite true that in the profession of war beginners very often throw themselves into hazards with a heedlessness quite different from what they show after they have been burned. Not unaware how much fresh glory in arms / And the sweet honor of a first battle can do. That is why, when we judge a particular action, we must consider many circumstances, and the whole man who produced it, before we christen it.[8]

AN INNOCENCE OWED TO LUCK

Montaigne credits his own good conduct to birth and temperament rather than to effort.

2.11.9 Pour dire vn mot de moy-mesme: I'ay veu quelque fois mes amis appeller prudence en moy, ce qui estoit fortune; et estimer aduantage de courage et de patience, ce qui estoit aduantage de iugement et opinion; et m'attribuer vn tiltre pour autre; tantost à mon gain, tantost à ma perte. Au demeurant, il s'en faut tant que ie sois arriué à ce premier et plus parfaict degré d'excellence, où de la vertu il se faict vne habitude; que du second mesme, ie n'en ay faict guere de preuue. Ie ne me suis mis en grand effort, pour brider les desirs dequoy ie me suis trouué pressé. Ma vertu, c'est vne vertu, ou innocence, pour mieux dire, accidentale et fortuite.	To say a word about myself: I have sometimes seen my friends call prudence in me what was luck, and count as an advantage of courage and patience what was an advantage of judgment and opinion, and give me one title in place of another, sometimes to my gain, sometimes to my loss. For the rest, I am so far from having reached that first and most perfect degree of excellence, where virtue becomes a habit, that even of the second I have given scarcely any proof. I have not put myself to great effort to curb the desires that pressed upon me. My virtue is a virtue—or rather, to put it better, an innocence—that is accidental and fortuitous.
Si ie fusse nay d'vne complexion plus desreglée, ie crains qu'il fust allé piteusement de mon faict: car ie n'ay essayé guere de fermeté en mon ame, pour soustenir des passions, si elles eussent esté tant soit peu vehementes. Ie ne sçay point nourrir des querelles, et du debat chez moy.	If I had been born with a more unruly constitution, I fear it would have gone badly for me; for I have scarcely tested any firmness in my soul for withstanding passions, had they been even slightly violent. I do not know how to nurse quarrels and conflict within me.
2.11.10 Ainsi, ie ne me puis dire nul grand-mercy, dequoy ie me trouue exempt de plusieurs vices: Si vitiis mediocribus, et mea paucis Mendosa est natura, alioqui recta, velut si Egregio inspersos reprehendas corpore nœuos. Ie le doy plus à ma fortune qu'à ma raison.	So I can give myself no great thanks for being free of many vices: If my nature is flawed by a few middling faults, But otherwise sound, as if you were to find fault With moles scattered over a handsome body. I owe this more to my fortune than to my reason.
Elle m'a faict naistre d'vne race fameuse en preud'hommie, et d'vn tres-bon pere: ie ne sçay s'il a escoulé en moy partie de ses humeurs, ou bien si les exemples domestiques, et la bonne institution de mon enfance, y ont insensiblement aydé; ou si ie suis	Fortune caused me to be born of a family famous for integrity, and of a very good father. Ie les ay, dis-ie, en horreur, d'vne opinion si naturelle et si mienne, que ce mesme instinct et impression, que i'en ay apporté de la nourrice, ie l'ay conserué, sans qu'aucunes occasions me l'ayent sçeu faire alterer. Ie diray vn monstre: mais ie le diray pourtant. Ie trouue par là en plusieurs choses plus d'arrest et de regle en mes mœurs qu'en mon opinion: et ma concupiscence moins desbauchée que ma raison.

Aristippus establit des opinions si hardies en faueur de la volupté et des richesses, qu'il mit en rumeur toute la philosophie à l'encontre de luy. Mais quant à ses mœurs, Dionysius le tyran luy ayant presenté trois belles garses, afin qu'il en fist le chois: il respondit, qu'il les choisissoit toutes trois, et qu'il auoit mal prins à Paris d'en preferer vne à ses compaignes. Mais les ayant conduittes à son logis, il les renuoya, sans en taster. Son vallet se trouuant surchargé en chemin de l'argent qu'il portoit apres luy: il luy ordonna qu'il en versast et iettast là, ce qui luy faschoit. Et Epicurus, duquel les dogmes sont irreligieux et delicats, se porta en sa vie tres-deuotieusement et laborieusement.

Il escrit à vn sien amy, qu'il ne vit que de pain bis et d'eaue; le prie de luy enuoyer vu peu de formage, pour quand il voudra faire quelque somptueux repas. Of the western wave. But at any rate most vices I hold in horror of my own accord. The answer of Antisthenes to the man who asked him what was the best apprenticeship—"To unlearn evil"—seems to rest on this picture.[9]

I hold them in horror, I say, by a judgment so natural and so much my own that I have kept the same instinct and impression I brought away from my nurse, and no occasion has ever been able to alter it—not even my own reasonings, which, having broken away from the common road in some matters, would readily license me to actions that this natural inclination makes me hate. I will say something monstrous, but I will say it all the same: in many things I find more steadiness and rule in my conduct than in my opinions, and my desire less debauched than my reason.

Aristippus set out opinions so bold in favor of pleasure and riches that he set all philosophy in an uproar against him. But as for his conduct: when Dionysius the tyrant presented him with three beautiful girls so that he might take his pick, he replied that he picked all three, and that Paris had come to grief for preferring one over her companions. But having brought them to his lodging, he sent them away without tasting them. When his servant found himself overloaded on the road by the money he was carrying behind him, he ordered him to pour out and throw away, then and there, whatever was too much for him. And Epicurus, whose doctrines are irreligious and pleasure-loving, conducted himself in his life very devoutly and laboriously.[10]

He writes to a friend that he lives on nothing but brown bread and water, and asks him to send a little cheese for when he wants to have a sumptuous meal. Could it be true that, to be wholly good, we must be so by some hidden, natural and universal property, without law, without reason, without example?

The excesses I have found myself involved in are not, thank God, of the worst. I have duly condemned them in myself, as they deserve, for my judgment has not been infected by them. On the contrary, I accuse them more strictly in myself than in another. But that is all. For otherwise I put up too little resistance, and let myself lean too easily to the other side of the scale—except that I keep them in order and prevent them from mixing with other vices, which for the most part hold together and are chained one to another, if one does not take care. My own I have cut back and confined, as solitary and as simple as I could: nor do I indulge / My error further.[11]

2.11.12 Car quant à l'opinion des Stoiciens, qui disent, le sage œuurer quand il œuure par toutes les vertus ensemble, quoy qu'il y en ait vne plus apparente selon la nature de l'action: (et à cela leur pourroit seruir aucunement la similitude du corps humain; car l'action de la colere ne se peut exercer, que toutes les humeurs ne nous y aydent, quoy que la colere predomine) si de là ils veulent tirer pareille consequence; que quand le fautier faut, il faut par tous les vices ensemble, ie ne les en croy pas ainsi simplement; ou ie ne les entend pas: car ie sens par effect le contraire. Ce sont subtilitez aiguës, insubstantielles, ausquelles la Philosophie s'arreste par fois.

For as to the opinion of the Stoics, who say that the wise man, when he acts, acts by all the virtues together, though one is more apparent according to the nature of the action (and here the analogy of the human body might serve them somewhat, for the action of anger cannot be carried out without all the humors helping us, though choler predominates): if from this they want to draw a similar conclusion, that when the wrongdoer does wrong he does wrong by all the vices together, I do not take their word for it so simply—or else I do not understand them, for I feel the contrary in practice. These are sharp, insubstantial subtleties, on which philosophy sometimes dwells.

Ie suy quelques vices: mais i'en fuy d'autres, autant que sçauroit faire vn sainct. Aussi desaduoüent les Peripateticiens, cette connexité et couture indissoluble: et tient Aristote, qu'vn homme prudent et iuste, peut estre et intemperant et incontinant. Socrates aduoüoit à ceux qui recognoissoient en sa physionomie quelque inclination au vice, que c'estoit à la verité sa propension naturelle, mais qu'il l'auoit corrigée par discipline. Et les familiers du philosophe Stilpo disoient, qu'estant nay subject au vin et aux femmes, il s'estoit rendu par estude tresabstinent de l'vn et de l'autre.

I follow some vices, but I flee others as much as any saint could. The Peripatetics, too, disown this connection and indissoluble seam; and Aristotle holds that a man may be prudent and just and yet intemperate and incontinent. Socrates admitted to those who detected in his physiognomy some inclination to vice that this was indeed his natural propensity, but that he had corrected it by discipline. And the intimates of the philosopher Stilpo said that, though born prone to wine and women, he had made himself, by study, very abstinent in both.

innocence niaise; peu de vigueur, et point d'art. Ie hay entre autres vices, cruellement la cruauté, et par nature et par iugement, comme l'extreme de tous les vices. Mais c'est iusques à telle mollesse, que ie ne voy pas esgorger vn poulet sans desplaisir, et ois impatiemment gemir vn lieure sous les dents de mes chiens: quoy que ce soit vn plaisir violent que la chasse.

Ceux qui ont à combattre la volupté, vsent volontiers de cet argument, pour montrer qu'elle est toute vitieuse et des-raisonnable, que lors qu'elle est en son plus grand effort, elle nous maistrise de façon, que la raison n'y peut auoir accez: et alleguent l'experience que nous en sentons en l'accointance des femmes, Cùm iam præsagit gaudia corpus, / Atque in eo est Venus, vt muliebria conserat arua. où il leur semble que le plaisir nous transporte si fort hors de nous, que nostre discours ne sçauroit lors faire son office tout perclus et raui en la volupté.

2.11.14 Ie sçay qu'il en peut aller autrement; et qu'on arriuera par fois, si on veut, à reietter l'ame sur ce mesme instant, à autres pensemens: mais il la faut tendre et roidir d'aguet. Ie croy que l'exemple du plaisir de la chasse y seroit plus propre: comme il y a moins de plaisir, il y a plus de rauissement, et de surprinse, par où nostre raison estonnée perd ce loisir de se preparer à l'encontre: lors qu'apres vne longue queste, la beste vient en sursaut à se presenter, en lieu où à l'aduenture, nous l'esperions le moins. Cette secousse, et l'ardeur de ces huées, nous frappe, si qu'il seroit malaisé à ceux qui ayment cette sorte de petite chasse, de retirer sur ce point la pensée ailleurs. cept or any other apprenticeship. The innocence that is in me is a simple-minded innocence: little vigor and no skill. Among other vices, I cruelly hate cruelty, both by nature and by judgment, as the extreme of all vices. But this goes so far, and makes me so soft, that I cannot see a chicken's throat cut without distress, and cannot bear to hear a hare squeal in the teeth of my dogs—though hunting is a violent pleasure.

Those who have to combat pleasure readily use this argument to show that it is wholly vicious and unreasonable: that when it is at its height it masters us so completely that reason can have no access to it. And they cite the experience we have of it in intercourse with women, When the body already foretastes its joys, / And Venus is about to sow the woman's fields, where it seems to them that pleasure carries us so far out of ourselves that our reason, all paralyzed and ravished in pleasure, could not then do its office.[12]

I know it can go otherwise, and that one can sometimes manage, if one wants, to throw the soul back onto other thoughts at that very moment; but one must brace and stiffen it deliberately. I know that one can master the force of this pleasure—I know myself well in this—and I have not found Venus so imperious a goddess as many people, and more strait-laced than I, testify.

I do not take it for a miracle, as the Queen of Navarre does in one of the tales of her Heptameron (a fine book for its matter), nor for a thing of extreme difficulty, to spend whole nights, in all convenience and freedom, with a long-desired mistress, keeping the promise one has given her to be content with kisses and simple caresses.

I think the example of the pleasure of hunting would be more fitting here. There is less pleasure in it, but more rapture and surprise, by which our reason, stunned, loses the leisure to prepare itself against it—when, after a long search, the animal suddenly springs into view, in a place where perhaps we least expected it. That shock, and the ardor of the hallooing, strike us so that it would be hard for those who love this sort of little hunt to turn their thoughts elsewhere at that moment. And the poets make Diana victorious over Cupid's torch and arrows. Who, amid these pursuits, does not forget / The wretched cares that love brings?

2.11.15 Pour reuenir à mon propos, ie me compassionne fort tendrement des afflictions d'autruy, et pleurerois aisément par compagnie, si pour occasion que ce soit, ie sçauois pleurer. Il n'est rien qui tente mes larmes que les larmes: non vrayes seulement, mais comment que ce soit, ou feintes, ou peintes. Les morts ie ne les plains guere, et les enuierois plustost; mais ie plains bien fort les mourans. Les [peuples du Nouveau Monde] ne m'offensent pas tant, de rostir et manger les corps des trespassez, que ceux qui les tourmentent et persecutent viuans. Les executions mesme de la iustice, pour raisonnables qu'elles soient, ie ne les puis voir d'vne veuë ferme.

To return to my subject: I feel very tender compassion for the afflictions of others, and would readily weep for company, if I knew how to weep for any occasion whatever. Nothing tempts my tears but tears—not only real ones, but any kind at all, feigned or painted. The dead I scarcely pity, and would rather envy; but I pity the dying very much. The peoples of the New World do not offend me so much by roasting and eating the bodies of the dead as those do who torment and persecute them alive. Even the executions of justice, however reasonable they may be, I cannot watch with a steady eye.

Quelqu'vn ayant à tesmoigner la clemence de Iulius Cæsar: Il estoit, dit-il, doux en ses vengeances: ayant forcé les pyrates de se rendre à luy, qui l'auoient auparauant pris prisonnier et mis à rançon; d'autant qu'il les auoit menassez de les faire mettre en croix, il les y condamna; mais ce fut apres les auoir faict estrangler. Philomon son secretaire, qui l'auoit voulu empoisonner, il ne le punit pas plus aigrement que d'vne mort simple. Sans dire qui est cet autheur Latin, qui ose alleguer pour tesmoignage de clemence, de seulement tuer ceux, desquels on a esté offencé, il est aisé à deuiner qu'il est frappé des vilains et horribles exemples de cruauté, que les tyrans Romains mirent en vsage.

Someone, wishing to testify to the clemency of Julius Caesar, says: "He was mild in his revenges. Having forced the pirates who had earlier taken him prisoner and held him for ransom to surrender to him, since he had threatened to have them crucified, he condemned them to it—but only after having them strangled. His secretary Philemon, who had tried to poison him, he punished no more harshly than with a simple death." Without saying who this Latin author is who dares to cite as evidence of clemency merely killing those who have offended us, it is easy to guess that he was struck by the vile and horrible examples of cruelty that the Roman tyrants put into practice.[13]

2.11.16 Quant à moy, en la iustice mesme, tout ce qui est au delà de la mort simple, me semble pure cruauté. Et notamment à nous, qui deurions auoir respect d'en enuoyer les ames en bon estat; ce qui ne se peut, les ayant agitées et desesperées par tourmens insupportables. Ces iours passés, vn soldat prisonnier, ayant apperceu d'vne tour où il estoit, que le peuple s'assembloit en la place, et que des charpantiers y dressoient leurs ouurages, creut que c'estoit pour luy: et entré en la resolution de se tuer, ne trouua qui l'y peust secourir, qu'vn vieux clou de charrette, rouillé, que la Fortune luy offrit.

As for me, even in justice, anything beyond simple death seems to me pure cruelty—especially for us, who ought to take care to send souls off in a good state, which cannot be done once they have been agitated and driven to despair by unbearable torments. Not long ago a soldier who was a prisoner noticed from a tower where he was held that people were gathering in the square and that carpenters were putting up their structures there, and believed it was for him. Having resolved to kill himself, he found nothing to help him do it but an old rusty cart nail that Fortune offered him.

Dequoy il se donna premierement deux grands coups autour de la gorge: mais voyant que ce auoit esté sans effect: bien tost apres, il s'en donna vn tiers, dans le ventre, où il laissa le clou fiché. Le premier de ses gardes, qui entra où il estoit, le trouua en cet estat, viuant

When he heard it, and that he was condemned only to have his head cut off, he seemed to take fresh courage. He accepted some wine, which he had refused, and thanked his judges for the unexpected mildness of their sentence.

He said that he had decided to call on death for fear of a harsher and more unbearable death, having formed the opinion, from the preparations he had seen being made in the square, that they meant to torment him with some horrible torture. And he seemed to have been delivered from death by having exchanged it.

I would advise that these examples of severity, by which one seeks to keep the people in line, be carried out on the bodies of criminals. For to see them deprived of burial, to see them boiled and quartered, would strike the common people almost as much as the punishments inflicted on the living, though in fact it amounts to little or nothing, as God says: Who kill the body, and after that have nothing more that they can do. And the poets make singularly much of the horror of this picture, as something beyond death: Alas![14] that the remains of a half-burned king, his bones laid bare, / Should be foully dragged across the earth, smeared with gore. I happened to be in Rome one day just when they were executing Catena, a notorious robber. They strangled him without any emotion from the onlookers; but when they came to quarter him, the executioner gave no blow without the people following it with a plaintive cry and exclamation, as if each one had lent his own feelings to that carcass. These inhuman excesses should be practiced on the bark, not on the living wood.[15]

In the same way, in a somewhat similar case, Artaxerxes softened the harshness of the ancient laws of Persia. He ordered that lords who had failed in their office, instead of being whipped as was customary, should be stripped and their clothes whipped in their place; and that instead of having their hair torn out as was customary, they

Mais cela ne m'y a nullement appriuoisé. A peine me pouuoy-ie persuader, auant que ie l'eusse veu, qu'il se fust trouué des ames si farouches, qui pour le seul plaisir du meurtre, le voulussent commettre; hacher et destrancher les membres d'autruy; aiguiser leur esprit à inuenter des tourmens inusitez, et des morts nouuelles, sans inimitié, sans proufit, et pour cette seule fin, de iouir du plaisant spectacle, des gestes, et mouuemens pitoyables, des gemissemens, et voix lamentables, d'vn homme mourant en angoisse.

Car voyla l'extreme poinct, où la cruauté puisse atteindre. Vt homo hominem, non iratus, non timens, tantum spectaturus occidat.

I live in a time when we abound in incredible examples of this vice, through the license of our civil wars; and one sees nothing in ancient histories more extreme than what we experience every day. But this has not at all made me used to it. I could hardly persuade myself, before I had seen it, that there were souls so fierce that they would commit murder for the sheer pleasure of it: hack and lop off other people's limbs, sharpen their wits to invent unaccustomed torments and new deaths, without enmity, without profit, and for the sole purpose of enjoying the pleasant spectacle of the pitiful gestures and movements, the groans and lamentable cries, of a man dying in anguish.

For that is the furthest point cruelty can reach. That man should kill man, not in anger, not in fear, but only to watch.

KINDNESS TO ANIMALS

Our cruelty to beasts leads to cruelty to men; we owe some kindness even to animals and trees.

I hardly ever take an animal alive without giving it back to the fields. Pythagoras used to buy them from fishermen and fowlers to do the same.

slaughter of animals, they went on to men and gladiators. Nature herself, I fear, has attached to man some instinct for inhumanity. No one takes any amusement in watching animals play together and caress each other, and no one fails to take it in watching them tear each other apart and dismember each other. And lest anyone mock this sympathy I have with them, theology itself enjoins on us some kindness toward them.[17]

And considering that one and the same master has lodged us in this palace for his service, and that they, like us, are of his household, it has good reason to enjoin on us some respect and affection toward them.

Pythagoras borrowed metempsychosis from the Egyptians, but since then it has been accepted by many nations, and notably by our Druids: Souls are free from death; ever leaving their former Dwelling, they live in new homes, and dwell where they are received. The religion of our ancient Gauls held that souls, being eternal, never ceased moving and changing place from one body to another; and to this notion they added some consideration of divine justice. For according to the soul's conduct while it had been, say, in Alexander, they said God assigned it another body to live in, more or less painful, and suited to its condition: The mute bonds of beasts
He forces them to bear; he thrusts the ferocious into bears,
Robbers into wolves, adds the deceitful to foxes.[18]

/ And when through many years, through a thousand shapes,
He has driven them on, purged at last in the river of Lethe,
He calls them back again to the first beginnings of human form. If it had been valiant, they lodged it in the body of a lion; if voluptuous, in that of a pig; if cowardly, in that of a stag or a hare; if cunning, in that of a fox; and so on with the rest, until, purified by this chastisement, it took on the body of some other man again. I myself—for I remember it—in the time of the Trojan War
Was Euphorbus, son of Panthous.[19]

2.11.21 Quant à ce cousinage là d'entre nous et les bestes, ie n'en fay pas grande recepte: ny de ce aussi que plusieurs nations, et notamment des plus anciennes et plus nobles, ont non seulement receu des bestes à leur société et compagnie, mais leur ont donné vn rang bien loing au dessus d'eux; les estimans tantost familieres, et fauories de leurs Dieux, et les ayans en respect et reuerence plus qu'humaine; et d'autres ne recognoissans autre Dieu, ny autre diuinité qu'elles.

Belluæ à barbaris propter beneficium consecratæ: Crocodilon adorat
Pars hæc, illa pauet saturam serpentibus ibin, Effigies sacri hic nitet aurea cercopitheci;
hic piscem fluminis, illic
Oppida tota canem venerantur. Et l'interpretation mesme que Plutarque donne à cet erreur, qui est tresbien prise, leur est encores honorable. Car il dit, que ce n'estoit le chat, ou le bœuf, pour exemple, que les Ægyptiens adoroyent; mais qu'ils adoroyent en ces bestes là, quelque image des facultez diuines. En cette-cy la patience et l'vtilité: en cette-là, la viuacité, ou comme noz voisins les Bourguignons auec toute l'Allemaigne, l'impatience de se voir enfermez: par où ils representoyent la liberté, qu'ils aymoient et adoroient au delà de toute autre faculté diuine, et ainsi des autres.

Mais quand ie rencontre parmy les opinions plus moderées, les discours qui essayent à montrer la prochaine ressemblance de nous aux animaux: et combien ils ont de part à nos plus grands priuileges; et auec combien de vray-semblance on nous les apparie; certes i'en rabats beaucoup de nostre presomption, et me demets volontiers de cette royauté imaginaire, qu'on nous donne sur les autres creatures.

2.11.22 Quand tout cela en seroit à dire, si y a-il vn certain respect, qui nous attache, et vn general deuoir d'humanité, non aux bestes seulement, qui ont vie et sentiment, mais aux arbres mesmes et aux plantes. Nous deuons la iustice aux hommes, et la grace et la benignité aux autres creatures, qui en peuuent estre capables. Il y a quelque commerce entre elles et nous, et quelque obligation mutuelle. Ie ne crains point à dire la tendresse de ma nature si puerile, que ie ne puis pas bien refuser à mon chien la feste, qu'il m'offre hors de saison, ou qu'il me demande.

ENGLISH

As for that kinship between us and the animals, I do not set much store by it; nor by the fact that many nations, and notably some of the most ancient and noble, have not only received animals into their society and company but given them a rank far above themselves—some regarding them as familiars and favorites of their gods and holding them in more than human respect and reverence, and others recognizing no other god or divinity than them.

Animals consecrated by the barbarians for the benefits they conferred: This part Worships the crocodile, that one dreads the ibis gorged with serpents;
Here gleams the golden image of a sacred long-tailed monkey;
here they revere a river fish, there
Whole towns worship a dog. And the very interpretation Plutarch gives of this error, which is very well taken, is still honorable to them. For he says that it was not the cat or the ox, for example, that the Egyptians worshiped, but that they worshiped in those animals some image of the divine faculties: in this one patience and usefulness; in that one liveliness, or—like our neighbors the Burgundians, together with all Germany—impatience at being shut in, by which they represented liberty, which they loved and worshiped beyond every other divine faculty; and so with the others.

But when I come across, among the more moderate opinions, the arguments that try to show how closely we resemble the animals, how large a share they have in our greatest privileges, and how plausibly they are matched with us, I certainly abate much of our presumption, and willingly resign that imaginary kingship over the other creatures that we are given.

Even if all that were set aside, there is still a certain respect that binds us, and a general duty of humanity, not only to animals, which have life and feeling, but even to trees and plants. We owe justice to men, and grace and kindness to the other creatures that may be capable of them. There is some dealing between them and us, and some mutual obligation. I am not afraid to admit that my nature is so childishly tender that I cannot well refuse my dog the fuss he offers me, or asks of me, out of season.

Les Turcs ont des aumosnes et des hospitaux pour les bestes: les Romains auoient vn soing public de la nourriture des oyes, par la vigilance desquelles leur Capitole auoit esté sauué: les Atheniens ordonnerent que les mules et mulets, qui auoyent seruy au bastiment du temple appellé Hecatompedon, fussent libres, et qu'on les laissast paistre par tout sans empeschement. Les Agrigentins auoyent en vsage commun, d'enterrer serieusement les bestes, qu'ils auoient eu cheres: comme les cheuaux de quelque rare merite, les chiens et les oyseaux vtiles: ou mesme qui auoyent seruy de passe-temps à leurs enfans.

Et la magnificence, qui leur estoit ordinaire en toutes autres choses, paroissoit aussi singulierement, à la sumptuosité et nombre des monuments esleuez à cette fin: qui ont duré en parade, plusieurs siecles depuis. Les Ægyptiens enterroyent les loups, les ours, les crocodiles, les chiens, et les chats, en lieux sacrés: embausmoyent leurs corps, et portoyent le deuil à leurs trespas. Cimon fit vne sepulture honorable aux iuments, auec lesquelles il auoit gaigné par trois fois le prix de la course aux ieux Olympiques. L'ancien Xanthippus fit enterrer son chien sur vn chef, en la coste de la mer, qui en a depuis retenu le nom.

Et Plutarque faisoit, dit-il, conscience, de vendre et enuoyer à la boucherie, pour vn leger profit, vn bœuf qui l'auoit long temps seruy.

The Turks have alms and hospitals for animals. The Romans took public care of feeding the geese by whose vigilance their Capitol had been saved. The Athenians ordered that the she-mules and mules that had served in building the temple called Hecatompedon should be free, and allowed to graze anywhere without hindrance. The Agrigentines had a common custom of solemnly burying the animals they had held dear, such as horses of rare merit, useful dogs and birds, or even those that had served as playthings for their children.[20]

And the magnificence that was usual with them in all other things appeared singularly in this too, in the sumptuousness and number of the monuments raised for this purpose, which remained on display for several centuries afterward. The Egyptians buried wolves, bears, crocodiles, dogs and cats in sacred places, embalmed their bodies and went into mourning at their deaths. Cimon gave an honorable burial to the mares with which he had three times won the prize for the race at the Olympic Games. The elder Xanthippus had his dog buried on a headland by the sea, which has kept its name ever since.[21]

And Plutarch, he says, had scruples about selling an ox that had served him a long time and sending it to the butcher for a slight profit.

20 The geese of Juno's temple gave the alarm when the Gauls attacked the Capitol in 390 BC. The Hecatompedon is the Parthenon.
21 Cimon was the father of Miltiades, the victor of Marathon. Xanthippus, father of Pericles, buried the dog that had swum after his ship to Salamis.

II.12 Apology for Raymond Sebond

Apologie de Raimond de Sebonde

Defending Sebond's natural theology, Montaigne dismantles human reason's pretensions, comparing us unfavorably with animals and ending in skeptical doubt and faith.

2.12.1	C'EST à la verité vne tres-vtile et grande partie que la science: ceux qui la mesprisent tesmoignent assez leur bestise: mais ie n'estime pas pourtant sa valeur iusques à cette mesure extreme qu'aucuns luy attribuent. Comme Herillus le philosophe, qui logeoit en elle le souuerain bien, et tenoit qu'il fust en elle de nous rendre sages et contens: ce que ie ne croy pas: ny ce que d'autres ont dict, que la science est mere de toute vertu, et que tout vice est produit par l'ignorance. Si cela est vray, il est subiect à vne longue interpretation.	In truth, knowledge is a very useful and important accomplishment; those who despise it show their stupidity plainly enough. But I do not, for all that, value it to the extreme degree that some attribute to it—like Herillus the philosopher, who placed the sovereign good in it and held that it was in its power to make us wise and content, which I do not believe; nor do I believe what others have said, that knowledge is the mother of all virtue, and that all vice is produced by ignorance. If that is true, it needs a long interpretation.[1]

TRANSLATING SEBOND

His father's learned guests gave him Sebond's Natural Theology, which Montaigne translated at his request.

	FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.2	Ma maison a esté dés long temps ouuerte aux gens de sçauoir, et en est fort cogneuë; car mon pere qui l'a commandée cinquante ans, et plus, eschauffé de cette ardeur nouuelle, dequoy le Roy François premier embrassa les lettres et les mit en credit, rechercha auec grand soin et despence l'accointance des hommes doctes, les receuant chez luy, comme personnes sainctes, et ayans quelque particuliere inspiration de sagesse diuine, recueillant leurs sentences, et leurs discours comme des oracles, et auec d'autant plus de reuerence, et de religion, qu'il auoit moins de loy d'en iuger: car il n'auoit aucune cognoissance des lettres, non plus que ses predecesseurs. Moy ie les ayme bien, mais ie ne les adore pas.	My house has long been open to learned men, and is well known for it. For my father, who ruled it for fifty years and more, was fired with that new ardor with which King Francis I embraced letters and brought them into favor. He sought the acquaintance of learned men with great care and expense, receiving them in his home like holy persons who had some special inspiration of divine wisdom, collecting their sayings and discourses like oracles —and with all the more reverence and religious awe as he was less qualified to judge them, for he had no knowledge of letters, any more than his forebears. As for me, I like them well enough, but I do not worship them.
2.12.3	Entre autres, Pierre Bunel, homme de grande reputation de sçauoir en son temps, ayant arresté quelques iours à Montaigne en la compagnie de mon pere, auec d'autres hommes de sa sorte, luy fit present au desloger d'vn liure qui s'intitule Theologia naturalis; siue Liber creaturarum, magistri Raimondi de Sebonde.	Among others, Pierre Bunel, a man of great reputation for learning in his day, having stayed some days at Montaigne in my father's company, with other men of his kind, made him a present on leaving of a book entitled Natural Theology, or Book of Creatures, by Master Raymond Sebond.[2]

Et par ce que la langue Italienne et Espagnolle estoient familieres à mon pere, et que ce liure est basty d'vn Espagnol barragouiné en terminaisons Latines, il esperoit qu'auec bien peu d'ayde, il en pourroit faire son profit, et le luy recommanda, comme liure tres-vtile et propre à la saison, en laquelle il le luy donna: ce fut lors que les nouuelletez de Luther commençoient d'entrer en credit, et esbranler en beaucoup de lieux nostre ancienne creance. En quoy il auoit vn tresbon aduis; preuoyant bien par discours de raison, que ce commencement de maladie declineroit aisément en vn execrable atheisme.

Car le vulgaire n'ayant pas la faculté de iuger des choses par elles mesmes, se laissant emporter à la Fortune et aux apparences, apres qu'on luy a mis en main la hardiesse de mespriser et contreroller les opinions qu'il auoit euës en extreme reuerence, comme sont celles où il va de son salut, et qu'on a mis aucuns articles de sa religion en doubte et à la balance, il iette tantost apres aisément en pareille incertitude toutes les autres pieces de sa creance, qui n'auoient pas chez luy plus d'authorité ny de fondement, que celles qu'on luy a esbranlées: et secoue comme vn ioug tyrannique toutes les impressions, qu'il auoit receues par l'authorité des loix, ou reuerence de l'ancien vsage, Nam cupidè conculcatur nimis antè metutum; entreprenant deslors en auant, de ne receuoir rien, à quoy il n'ait interposé son decret, et presté particulier consentement.

2.12.4 Or quelques iours auant sa mort, mon pere ayant de fortune rencontré ce liure soubs vn tas d'autres papiers abandonnez, me commanda de le luy mettre en François. Il faict bon traduire les autheurs, comme celuy-là, où il n'y a guere que la matiere à representer: mais ceux qui ont donné beaucoup à la grace, et à l'elegance du langage, ils sont dangereux à entreprendre, nommément pour les rapporter à vn idiome plus foible.

And because the Italian and Spanish languages were familiar to my father, and this book is built of a Spanish jargon with Latin endings, he hoped that with very little help he could profit from it, and recommended it to him as a very useful book, suited to the time when he gave it to him. This was when Luther's novelties were beginning to gain credit and to shake our ancient belief in many places. In this he showed very good judgment, clearly foreseeing by rational reasoning that this incipient disease would easily degenerate into execrable atheism.

For the common people do not have the ability to judge things in themselves, and let themselves be carried away by chance and appearances. Once they have been given the boldness to despise and criticize the opinions they had held in extreme reverence, such as those on which their salvation depends, and once some articles of their religion have been put in doubt and in the balance, they soon easily throw all the other parts of their belief into similar uncertainty, for these had no more authority or foundation for them than the ones that have been shaken. And they shake off like a tyrannical yoke all the impressions they had received from the authority of the laws or from reverence for ancient custom, For what was too much feared before is eagerly trampled underfoot; resolving from then on to accept nothing to which they have not applied their own decree and given their particular consent.[3]

Now, a few days before his death, my father, having by chance come across this book under a heap of other discarded papers, ordered me to put it into French for him. It is good to translate authors like that one, where there is little but the matter to render; but those who have given much to grace and elegance of language are dangerous to undertake, especially when bringing them into a weaker idiom.[4]

It was a very strange and new occupation for me; but happening to have leisure at the time, and being unable to refuse anything to the command of the best father there ever was, I got through it as best I could. He took singular pleasure in it, and

2.12.5 Ie trouuay belles les imaginations de cet autheur, la contexture de son ouurage bien suyuie; et son dessein plein de pieté. Par ce que beaucoup de gens s'amusent à le lire, et notamment les dames, à qui nous deuons plus de seruice, ie me suis trouué souuent à mesme de les secourir, pour descharger leur liure de deux principales obiections qu'on luy faict. Sa fin est hardie et courageuse, car il entreprend par raisons humaines et naturelles, establir et verifier contre les atheistes tous les articles de la religion Chrestienne.

En quoy, à dire la verité, ie le trouue si ferme et si heureux, que ie ne pense point qu'il soit possible de mieux faire en cet argument là; et croy que nul ne l'a esgalé. gave orders for it to be printed—which was done after his death.

I found this author's ideas fine, the structure of his work well sustained, and his purpose full of piety. Many people enjoy reading it, especially the ladies, to whom we owe more service, so I have often found myself in a position to help them by clearing their book of the two main objections made against it. His aim is bold and courageous, for he undertakes to establish and prove all the articles of the Christian religion against the atheists by human and natural reasons.

In this, to tell the truth, I find him so firm and so successful that I do not think it possible to do better on that subject, and I believe no one has equaled him. This work seemed to me too rich and too fine for an author whose name is so little known. All we know of him is that he was a Spaniard who practiced medicine at Toulouse some two hundred years ago. So I once asked Adrianus Turnebus, who knew everything, what this book might be. He answered that he thought it was some quintessence drawn from Saint Thomas Aquinas. In truth that mind, full of boundless learning and admirable subtlety, was the only one capable of such ideas. Be that as it may, whoever its author and inventor may be, he was a very able man with many fine qualities. And it is not right to take that title away from Sebond without stronger reason.

THE FIRST OBJECTION: FAITH AND REASON

Faith alone grasps divine truth, but reason may still serve it, as Christians fail to show by their lives.

FRENCH

2.12.6 La premiere reprehension qu'on fait de son ouurage; c'est que les Chrestiens se font tort de vouloir appuyer leur creance, par des raisons humaines, qui ne se conçoit que par foy, et par vne inspiration particuliere de la grace diuine. En cette obiection, il semble qu'il y ait quelque zele de pieté: et à cette cause nous faut-il auec autant plus de douceur et de respect essayer de satisfaire à ceux qui la mettent en auant. Ce seroit mieux la charge d'vn homme versé en la theologie, que de moy, qui n'y sçay rien.

Toutefois ie iuge ainsi, qu'à vne chose si diuine et si haultaine, et surpassant de si loing l'humaine intelligence, comme est cette verité, de laquelle il a pleu à

ENGLISH

The first criticism made of his work is that Christians do themselves wrong in trying to support their belief with human reasons, since it is conceived only by faith and by a particular inspiration of divine grace. There seems to be some pious zeal in this objection, and for that reason we must try all the more gently and respectfully to satisfy those who put it forward. This task would suit a man versed in theology better than me, for I know nothing of it.

Nevertheless, this is my judgment. This truth, with which God in his goodness has been pleased to enlighten us, is so divine and so lofty, and sur-la bonté de Dieu nous esclairer, il est bien besoin qu'il nous preste encore son secours, d'vne faueur extraordinaire et priuilegiée, pour la pouuoir conceuoir et loger en nous: et ne croy pas que les moyens purement humains en soyent aucunement capables. Et s'ils l'estoient, tant d'ames rares et excellentes, et si abondamment garnies de forces naturelles és siecles anciens, n'eussent pas failly par leur discours, d'arriuer à cette cognoissance.

2.12.7 C'est la foy seule qui embrasse viuement et certainement les hauts mysteres de nostre religion. Mais ce n'est pas à dire, que ce soit vne tresbelle et treslouable entreprinse, d'accommoder encore au seruice de nostre foy, les vtils naturels et humains, que Dieu nous a donnez. Il ne faust pas doubter que ce ne soit l'vsage le plus honorable, que nous leur sçaurions donner: et qu'il n'est occupation ny dessein plus digne d'vn homme Chrestien, que de viser par tous ses estudes et pensemens à embellir, estendre et amplifier la verité de sa creance.

Nous ne nous contentons point de seruir Dieu d'esprit et d'ame: nous luy deuons encore, et rendons vne reuerence corporelle: nous appliquons noz membres mesmes, et noz mouuements et les choses externes à l'honorer. Il en faut faire de mesme, et accompaigner nostre foy de toute la raison qui est en nous: mais tousiours auec cette reseruation, de n'estimer pas que ce soit de nous qu'elle despende, ny que nos efforts et arguments puissent atteindre à vne si supernaturelle et diuine science.

passes human understanding by so far, that he must surely lend us his help as well, by an extraordinary and privileged favor, if we are to conceive it and lodge it within us. I do not believe that purely human means are in any way capable of it. If they were, so many rare and excellent souls in ancient times, so richly furnished with natural powers, would not have failed to reach this knowledge by their reasoning.

It is faith alone that embraces the high mysteries of our religion vividly and surely. But that is not to say that it is not a very fine and very praiseworthy undertaking to adapt the natural and human tools God has given us to the service of our faith as well. There is no doubt that this is the most honorable use we could put them to. No occupation or design is more worthy of a Christian than to aim, through all his studies and thoughts, at embellishing, extending and amplifying the truth of his belief.

We are not content to serve God with mind and soul. We owe him bodily reverence as well, and we render it: we apply even our limbs, our movements and external things to honoring him. We must do the same here and accompany our faith with all the reason that is in us. But we must always keep this reservation: we must not think that faith depends on us, or that our efforts and arguments can attain to so supernatural and divine a knowledge.

If it does not enter into us by an extraordinary infusion, if it enters not only by reasoning but also by human means, then it is not there in its dignity or its splendor. And yet I certainly fear that this is the only way we enjoy it.

If we held to God through a living faith, if we held to God through him and not through ourselves, if we had a divine footing and foundation, human occurrences would not have the power to shake us as they do. Our fortress would not be likely to surrender to so weak a battery. Love of novelty, the compulsion of princes, the good fortune of one party, the rash and accidental changes in our opinions would not have the strength to shake and alter our belief. We would not let it be troubled at the mercy of a new argument, or by persuasion, no, not even by all the rhetoric there ever was. We would withstand these waves with an unbending and immovable firmness: As a vast rock throws back

2.12.9 Si ce rayon de la diuinité nous touchoit aucunement, il y paroistroit par tout: non seulement nos parolles, mais encore nos operations en porteroient la lueur et le lustre. Tout ce qui partiroit de nous, on le verroit illuminé de cette noble clarté. Nous deurions auoir honte, qu'és sectes humaines il ne fut iamais partisan, quelque difficulté et estrangeté que maintinst sa doctrine, qui n'y conformast aucunement ses deportemens et sa vie: et vne si diuine et celeste institution ne marque les Chrestiens que par la langue. Voulez vous voir cela? comparez nos mœurs à vn Mahometan, à vn Payen, vous demeurez tousiours au dessoubs.

Là où au regard de l'auantage de nostre religion, nous deurions luire en excellence, d'vne extreme et incomparable distance: et deuroit on dire, sont ils si iustes, si charitables, si bons? ils sont donq Chrestiens. Toutes autres apparences sont communes à toutes religions: esperance, confiance, euenemens, ceremonies, penitence, martyres. La merque peculiere de nostre verité deuroit estre nostre vertu, comme elle est aussi la plus celeste merque, et la plus difficile: et que c'est la plus digne production de la verité. Pourtant eut raison nostre bon S.

Loys, quand ce Roy Tartare, qui s'estoit faict Chrestien, desseignoit de venir à Lyon, baiser les pieds au Pape, et y recognoistre la sanctimonie qu'il esperoit trouuer en nos mœurs, de l'en destourner instamment, de peur qu'au contraire, nostre desbordée façon de viure ne le dégoustast d'vne si saincte creance. Combien que depuis il aduint tout diuersement, à cet autre, lequel estant allé à Rome pour mesme effect, y voyant la dissolution des prelats, et peuple de ce temps là, s'establit d'autant plus fort en nostre religion, considerant combien elle deuoit auoir de force et de diuinité, à maintenir sa dignité et sa splendeur, parmy tant de corruption, et en mains si vicieuses.

2.12.10 Si nous auions vne seule goutte de foy, nous remuerions les montaignes de leur place, dict la saincte parole: nos actions qui seroient guidées et accompaignées de la diuinité, ne seroient pas simplement humaines, elles auroient quelque chose de miraculeux, comme nostre the waves that dash against it,

And scatters the various billows barking all around it
By its sheer mass.[5]

If this ray of divinity touched us at all, it would show everywhere. Our words and our deeds alike would bear its gleam and luster, and everything that came from us would be seen lit by this noble brightness. We ought to be ashamed of this. Among human sects there has never been a follower who did not to some extent conform his conduct and his life to his doctrine, however difficult and strange it was. Yet so divine and heavenly a teaching marks Christians out only by their tongues. Do you want to see this? Compare our morals with a Muslim's or a pagan's: you always come off worse.

Given the superiority of our religion, we ought instead to shine in excellence by an extreme and incomparable distance. People ought to say: "Are they so just, so charitable, so good? Then they are Christians." All other outward signs are common to all religions: hope, trust, events, ceremonies, penance, martyrdoms. The distinctive mark of our truth ought to be our virtue, for it is also the most heavenly mark and the most difficult, and the worthiest product of truth. So our good Saint

Louis was right to act as he did. That Tartar king who had become a Christian was planning to come to Lyons to kiss the Pope's feet and to see there the holiness he hoped to find in our ways. Louis earnestly urged him not to come, for fear that our dissolute way of life would instead put him off so holy a belief. Yet things later turned out quite otherwise for another man, who went to Rome for the same purpose. Seeing the dissoluteness of the prelates and people of that time, he became all the more firmly settled in our religion. He reasoned that it must have great strength and divinity to keep its dignity and splendor amid so much corruption and in such vicious hands.[6]

If we had a single drop of faith, Holy Writ says, we would move mountains from their place. Our actions, guided and accompanied by divinity, would not be merely human; they would have something miraculous about them, like our belief. The training for an honorable and happy life is short, if you believe. Some make the world believe that they believe what they do not believe. Others, a greater number, make themselves believe it, for they cannot fathom what it is to believe.[7]

2.12.11 Nous trouuons estrange si aux guerres, qui pressent à cette heure nostre Estat, nous voyons flotter les euenements et diuersifier d'vne maniere commune et ordinaire: c'est que nous n'y apportons rien que le nostre. La iustice, qui est en l'vn des partis, elle n'y est que pour ornement et couuerture: elle y est bien alleguée, mais elle n'y est ny receuë, ny logée, ny espousée: elle y est comme en la bouche de l'aduocat, non comme dans le cœur et affection de la partie. Dieu doit son secours extraordinaire à la foy et à la religion, non pas à nos passions. Les hommes y sont conducteurs, et s'y seruent de la religion: ce deuroit estre tout le contraire.

In the wars now pressing on our state, we find it strange to see events fluctuate and vary in a common and ordinary way. That is because we bring nothing to them but what is our own. Justice, which is on one of the sides, is there only as ornament and cover. It is indeed invoked, but it is not received, or lodged, or wedded there. It is there as it is in the lawyer's mouth, not as it is in the heart and affection of his client. God owes his extraordinary help to faith and religion, not to our passions. Here men are the leaders, and they make use of religion. It ought to be quite the opposite.

Feel whether it is not our own hands that steer religion, as we draw so many contrary shapes from so straight and firm a rule, as if from wax. When has this been seen more clearly than in France in our day? Some have taken it to the left and some to the right, some call it black and some call it white. Yet they all use it so alike for their violent and ambitious enterprises, and follow so similar a course of excess and injustice, that the difference of opinion they claim seems doubtful and hard to believe, on a matter on which the conduct and law of our life depends. Could you see morals more alike, more one and the same, coming from the same school and discipline?

See the horrible impudence with which we bat divine reasons back and forth like a ball. See how irreligiously we have both rejected them and taken them up again, as Fortune has shifted our place in these public storms. Take that solemn proposition: whether it is lawful for a subject to rebel and take up arms against his prince in defense of religion. Remember in whose mouths, last year, the affirmative was the buttress of one party, and which other party had the negative for its buttress. And hear now which quarter the voice and teaching of each comes from, and whether arms make less noise for this cause than for that.[8]

And we burn people who say that truth must be made to bear the yoke of our needs. How much

2.12.13 Ie voy cela euidemment, que nous ne prestons volontiers à la deuotion que les offices, qui flattent noz passions. Il n'est point d'hostilité excellente comme la Chrestienne. Nostre zele fait merueilles, quand il va secondant nostre pente vers la haine, la cruauté, l'ambition, l'auarice, la detraction, la rebellion. worse does France do than say it? Let us confess the truth. Suppose someone sifted out from the army, even the lawful one, those who march in it solely out of religious zeal, and also those who look only to the protection of their country's laws or the service of their prince. He could not make up one complete company of men-at-arms from them. How is it that so few have kept the same will and the same pace in our public upheavals? Why do we see them now merely walking, now riding at full gallop?

and the same men now spoiling our affairs by their violence and harshness, now by their coldness, softness and sluggishness? It can only be that they are driven by private and chance considerations, and they move according to how these vary.

I see this plainly: we willingly lend devotion only those services that flatter our passions. There is no hostility so excellent as Christian hostility. Our zeal works wonders when it seconds our leaning toward hatred, cruelty, ambition, avarice, slander, rebellion. Against the grain, toward goodness, kindness and temperance, it will neither walk nor fly, unless by some miracle a rare temperament carries it there. Our religion is made to root out vices; instead it covers them, nourishes them, incites them. We must not try to fob God off with a straw beard, as the saying goes.[9]

Suppose we believed in him, I do not say by faith, but with a simple belief. Indeed, and I say it to our great shame, suppose we believed in him and knew him as we do any other history, or one of our companions. Then we would love him above all other things, for the infinite goodness and beauty that shine in him. At the very least he would hold the same rank in our affection as riches, pleasures, glory and our friends. The best of us is not afraid of outraging him as he is afraid of outraging his neighbor, his kinsman or his master.

Is any mind so simple that it would trade one for the other, with the object of one of our vicious pleasures on one side, and on the other the state of immortal glory, known and believed with equal conviction? And yet we often renounce that glory enuie nous attire au blasphemer, sinon à l'aduenture l'enuie mesme de l'offense? Le philosophe Antisthenes, comme on l'initioit aux mysteres d'Orpheus, le prestre luy disant, que ceux qui se voüoyent à cette religion, auoyent à receuoir apres leur mort des biens eternels et parfaicts: Pourquoy si tu le crois ne meurs tu donc toy mesmes? luy fit-il.

Diogenes plus brusquement selon sa mode, et plus loing de nostre propos, au prestre qui le preschoit de mesme, de se faire de son ordre, pour paruenir aux biens de l'autre monde: Veux tu pas que ie croye qu'Agesilaüs et Epaminondas, si grands hommes, seront miserables, et que toy qui n'es qu'vn veau, et qui ne fais rien qui vaille; seras bien heureux, par ce que tu és prestre?

Ces grandes promesses de la beatitude eternelle si nous les receuions de pareille authorité qu'vn discours philosophique, nous n'aurions pas la mort en telle horreur que nous auons: Non iam se moriens dissolui conquereretur,
Sed magis ire foras, vestémque relinquere, vt anguis, Gauderet, prælonga senex aut cornua ceruus. Ie veux estre dissoult, dirions nous, et estre aueques Iesus-Christ. La force du discours de Platon de l'immortalité de l'ame, poussa bien aucuns de ses disciples à la mort, pour iouïr plus promptement des esperances qu'il leur donnoit.

out of pure contempt. For what desire draws us to blaspheme, unless perhaps the very desire to offend? The philosopher Antisthenes was being initiated into the mysteries of Orpheus. The priest told him that those who devoted themselves to this religion were to receive eternal and perfect goods after their death. "If you believe that," Antisthenes said to him, "why don't you die yourself?"

Diogenes, more bluntly as was his way, and further from our point, spoke to a priest who was likewise urging him to join his order so as to attain the goods of the other world: "Do you want me to believe that Agesilaus and Epaminondas, such great men, will be wretched, while you, who are nothing but a calf and do nothing worthwhile, will be blessed because you are a priest?"

If we accepted these great promises of eternal bliss on the same authority as a philosophical argument, we would not hold death in such horror as we do: The dying man would no longer complain of being dissolved,
But would rather rejoice to go out and leave his garment behind, as a snake does,
Or an old stag its overlong antlers. "I desire to be dissolved," we would say, "and to be with Jesus Christ." The force of Plato's reasoning on the immortality of the soul did indeed drive some of his disciples to their death, so that they might enjoy sooner the hopes he gave them.[10]

All this is a very clear sign that we receive our religion only in our own way and by our own hands, no differently from the way other religions are received. Either we happened to be in the country where it was practiced, or we respect its antiquity or the authority of the men who have upheld it. Or we fear the threats it holds over unbelievers, or we follow its promises. Those considerations should be applied to our belief, but only as auxiliaries; they are human ties. Another region, other witnesses, similar promises and threats could imprint a contrary belief on us in the same way. We contraire. Nous sommes Chrestiens à mesme tiltre que nous sommes ou Perigordins ou Alemans.

2.12.15 Et ce que dit Plato, qu'il est peu d'hommes si fermes en l'atheïsme, qu'vn danger pressant ne ramene à la recognoissance de la diuine puissance: ce rolle ne touche point vn vray Chrestien. C'est à faire aux religions mortelles et humaines, d'estre receuës par vne humaine conduite. Quelle foy doit ce estre, que la lascheté et la foiblesse de cœur plantent en nous et establissent? Plaisante foy, qui ne croid ce qu'elle croid, que pour n'auoir le courage de le descroire. Vne vitieuse passion, comme celle de l'inconstance et de l'estonnement, peut elle faire en nostre ame aucune production reglée?

Ils establissent, dit-il, par la raison de leur iugement, que ce qui se recite des enfers, et des peines futures est feint, mais l'occasion de l'experimenter s'offrant lors que la vieillesse ou les maladies les approchent de leur mort: la terreur d'icelle les remplit d'vne nouuelle creance, par l'horreur de leur condition à venir. Et par ce que telles impressions rendent les courages craintifs, il defend en ses Loix toute instruction de telles menaces, et la persuasion que des Dieux il puisse venir à l'homme aucun mal, sinon pour son plus grand bien quand il y eschoit, et pour vn medecinal effect.

Ils recitent de Bion, qu'infect des atheïsmes de Theodorus, il auoit esté long temps se moquant des hommes religieux: mais la mort le surprenant, qu'il se rendit aux plus extremes superstitions: comme si les Dieux s'ostoyent et se remettoyent selon l'affaire de Bion. Platon, et ces exemples, veulent conclurre, que nous sommes ramenez à la creance de Dieu, ou par raison, ou par force.

L'atheïsme estant vne proposition, comme desnaturée et monstrueuse, difficile aussi, et malaisée d'establir en l'esprit humain, pour insolent et desreglé qu'il puisse estre: il s'en est veu assez, par vanité et par fierté de conceuoir des opinions non vulgaires, et reformatrices du monde, en affecter la profession par contenance: qui, s'ils sont assez fols, ne sont pas assez forts, pour l'auoir plantée en leur conscience. Pourtant ils ne lairront de ioindre leurs mains vers le ciel, si vous leur attachez vn bon coup d'espée en la poitrine: et quand la crainte ou la maladie aura abatu et appesanti cette licentieuse ferueur d'humeur volage, ils ne lairront pas de se reuenir, et se laisser tout discretement manier aux creances et exemples publiques.

are Christians by the same title as we are Perigordians or Germans.

Plato says that few men are so firm in atheism that a pressing danger will not bring them back to acknowledging divine power. That role does not concern a true Christian. It is for mortal and human religions to be received by human means. What sort of faith must it be that cowardice and faintness of heart plant and establish in us? A fine faith, which believes what it believes only because it lacks the courage to disbelieve it! Can a vicious passion, such as inconstancy or terror, produce anything well ordered in our soul?

Such men, he says, establish by the reasoning of their judgment that what is told of hell and future punishments is invented. But the chance to test it comes when old age or illness brings them near death. Then the terror of death fills them with a new belief, through horror of their condition to come. Because such impressions make hearts fearful, he forbids in his Laws all teaching of such threats. He also forbids the belief that any harm can come to man from the gods, except for his greater good when it befalls him, and as a kind of medicine.

They tell of Bion that he was infected with the atheisms of Theodorus and had long mocked religious men. But when death overtook him, he surrendered to the most extreme superstitions, as if the gods withdrew and returned according to Bion's business. Plato and these examples mean to conclude that we are brought back to belief in God either by reason or by force.

Atheism is a proposition that is, as it were, unnatural and monstrous, and also difficult and hard to establish in the human mind, however insolent and unruly that mind may be. Yet plenty of men have been seen to profess it for show. They do it out of vanity, and from pride in conceiving opinions that are not common and would reform the world. Foolish enough they may be, but they are not strong enough to have planted it in their conscience. So they will not fail to clasp their hands toward heaven if you deal them a good sword-thrust in the chest. And once fear or sickness has crushed and weighed down the licentious fervor of their fickle temperament, they will not fail to come back. They will very discreetly let themselves be guided by public beliefs and examples.

Autre chose est, vn dogme serieusement digeré, autre chose ces impressions superficielles: lesquelles nées de la desbauche d'vn esprit desmanché, vont nageant temerairement et incertainement en la fantasie. Hommes bien miserables et esceruellez, qui taschent d'estre pires qu'ils ne peuuent!

A seriously digested doctrine is one thing; these superficial impressions are another. They are born of the debauchery of an unhinged mind and go floating rashly and uncertainly in the imagination. Truly wretched and brainless men, who try to be worse than they can!

2.12.16 L'erreur du paganisme, et l'ignorance de nostre saincte verité, laissa tomber cette grande ame: mais grande d'humaine grandeur seulement, encores en cet autre voisin abus, que les enfans et les vieillars se trouuent plus susceptibles de religion, comme si elle naissoit et tiroit son credit de nostre imbecillité. Le neud qui deuroit attacher nostre iugement et nostre volonté, qui deuroit estreindre nostre ame et ioindre à nostre Createur, ce deuroit estre vn neud prenant ses repliz et ses forces, non pas de noz considerations, de noz raisons et passions, mais d'vne estreinte diuine et supernaturelle, n'ayant qu'vne forme, vn visage, et vn lustre, qui est l'authorité de Dieu et sa grace.

The error of paganism and ignorance of our holy truth let that great soul fall into this other, neighboring error as well. He was great, but with human greatness only. The error is that children and old men are more susceptible to religion, as if religion were born of our weakness and drew its credit from it. The knot that should bind our judgment and our will, that should clasp our soul and join it to our Creator, ought to take its folds and its strength not from our considerations, our reasons and passions. It ought to take them from a divine and supernatural grip, which has only one form, one face and one luster: the authority of God and his grace.

Or nostre cœur et nostre ame estant regie et commandée par la foy, c'est raison qu'elle tire au seruice de son dessein toutes nos autres pieces selon leur portée. Aussi n'est-il pas croyable, que toute cette machine n'ait quelques merques empreintes de la main de ce grand architecte, et qu'il n'y ait quelque image és choses du monde raportant aucunement à l'ouurier, qui les a basties et formées. Il a laissé en ces hauts ouurages le charactere de sa diuinité, et ne tient qu'à nostre imbecillité, que nous ne le puissions descouurir. C'est ce qu'il nous dit luy-mesme, que ses operations inuisibles, il nous les manifeste par les visibles.

Now since our heart and our soul are ruled and commanded by faith, it is right that faith should draw all our other parts into the service of its purpose, according to their capacity. Nor is it credible that this whole machine should not bear some marks imprinted by the hand of that great architect. There must be some image in the things of the world that corresponds in some way to the workman who built and formed them. He has left the stamp of his divinity in these lofty works, and only our weakness keeps us from discovering it. He tells us so himself: he makes his invisible operations manifest to us through the visible ones.

Sebonde s'est trauaillé à ce digne estude, et nous montre comment il n'est piece du monde, qui desmente son facteur. Ce seroit faire tort à la bonté diuine, si l'vniuers ne consentoit à nostre creance. Le ciel, la terre, les elemens, nostre corps et nostre ame, toutes choses y conspirent: il n'est que de trouuer le moyen de s'en seruir: elles nous instruisent, si nous sommes capables d'entendre. Car ce monde est vn temple tressainct, dedans lequel l'homme est introduict, pour y contempler des statues, non ouurées de mortelle main, mais celles que la diuine pensée a faict sensibles, le soleil, les estoilles, les eaux et la terre, pour nous representer les intelligibles.

Sebond labored at this worthy study and shows us that no part of the world belies its maker. It would wrong divine goodness if the universe did not agree with our belief. The sky, the earth, the elements, our body and our soul all conspire to it; we have only to find the way to use them. They teach us, if we are capable of understanding. For this world is a most holy temple into which man is brought to contemplate statues. These are not wrought by mortal hand. They are the ones that divine thought has made perceptible to the senses, the sun, the stars, the waters and the earth, to represent the intelligible ones to us.

Les choses inuisibles de Dieu, dit Sainct Paul, apparoissent par la creation du monde, considerant sa sapience eternelle, et sa diuinité par ses œuures. Atque adeo faciem cœli non inuidet orbi

2.12.17 Or nos raisons et nos discours humains c'est comme la matiere lourde et sterile: la grace de Dieu en est la forme: c'est elle qui y donne la façon et le prix. Tout ainsi que les actions vertueuses de Socrates et de Caton demeurent vaines et inutiles pour n'auoir eu leur fin, et n'auoir regardé l'amour et obeyssance du vray createur de toutes choses, et pour auoir ignoré Dieu: ainsin est-il de nos imaginations et discours: ils ont quelque corps, mais vne masse informe, sans façon et sans iour, si la foy et grace de Dieu n'y sont ioinctes.

La foy venant à teindre et illustrer les argumens de Sebonde, elle les rend fermes et solides: ils sont capables de seruir d'acheminement, et de premiere guyde à vn apprentif, pour le mettre à la voye de cette cognoissance: ils le façonnent aucunement et rendent capable de la grace de Dieu, par le moyen de laquelle se parfournit et se parfaict apres nostre creance. Ie sçay vn homme d'authorité nourry aux lettres, qui m'a confessé auoir esté ramené des erreurs de la mescreance par l'entremise des argumens de Sebonde.

Et quand on les despouïllera de cet ornement, et du secours et approbation de la foy, et qu'on les prendra pour fantasies pures humaines, pour en combatre ceux qui sont precipitez aux espouuantables et horribles tenebres de l'irreligion, ils se trouueront encores lors, aussi solides et autant fermes, que nuls autres de mesme condition qu'on leur puisse opposer. De façon que nous serons sur les termes de dire à nos parties, Si melius quid habes, accerse; vel imperium fer. Qu'ils souffrent la force de nos preuues, ou qu'ils nous en facent voir ailleurs, et sur quelque autre subiect, de mieux tissuës, et mieux estoffées.

The invisible things of God, says Saint Paul, are made plain by the creation of the world, for his eternal wisdom and his divinity are seen in his works. And so God himself does not begrudge the world the sight of heaven's face;
He reveals his features and his body
By ever turning it; he impresses and offers himself,
So that he may be well known, and teach by being seen
How he moves, and teach us to heed his laws.[11]

Now our reasons and our human reasonings are like heavy, barren matter. The grace of God is their form; it is grace that gives them shape and value. The virtuous actions of Socrates and Cato remain vain and useless because they did not have their proper end. They did not look to the love and obedience of the true creator of all things, and they did not know God. It is just the same with our ideas and reasonings. They have a sort of body, but it is a shapeless mass, without form and without light, unless the faith and grace of God are joined to them.

When faith comes to tinge and illuminate Sebond's arguments, it makes them firm and solid. They can then serve an apprentice as a first step and a first guide, setting him on the road to this knowledge. They shape him somewhat and make him receptive to the grace of God, through which our belief is afterward completed and perfected. I know a man of authority, brought up in letters, who confessed to me that Sebond's arguments had brought him back from the errors of unbelief.

Now suppose they are stripped of this ornament and of the help and approval of faith, and taken as purely human notions, to fight those who have plunged into the frightful and horrible darkness of irreligion. Even then they will be found as solid and as firm as any others of the same kind that can be set against them. So we shall be in a position to say to our opponents: If you have anything better, bring it out; or else submit. Let them either accept the force of our proofs, or show us others that are better woven and of better stuff, elsewhere and on some other subject.[12]

THE SECOND OBJECTION: WEAK ARGUMENTS

Against those who call Sebond's reasons weak, Montaigne sets out to humble human reason itself.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
Ie me suis sans y penser à demy desia engagé dans la seconde obiection, à laquelle i'auois proposé de respondre pour Sebonde.	Without meaning to, I have already half engaged in the second objection, which I had set out to answer on Sebond's behalf.
2.12.18 Aucuns disent que ses argumens sont foibles et ineptes à verifier ce qu'il veut, et entreprennent de les choquer aysément. Il faut secouër ceux cy vn peu plus rudement: car ils sont plus dangereux et plus malitieux que les premiers. On couche volontiers les dicts d'autruy à la faueur des opinions qu'on a preiugées en soy. A vn atheïste tous escrits tirent à l'atheïsme. Il infecte de son propre venin la matiere innocente. Ceux cy ont quelque preoccupation de iugement qui leur rend le goust fade aux raisons de Sebonde.	Some say that his arguments are weak and unfit to prove what he intends, and they set out to knock them down easily. These people must be shaken a little more roughly, for they are more dangerous and more malicious than the first. People readily bend what others say to fit the opinions they have already formed. To an atheist, all writings lean toward atheism; he infects innocent matter with his own venom. These people have some prejudice in their judgment that dulls their palate for Sebond's reasons.
Au demeurant il leur semble qu'on leur donne beau ieu, de les mettre en liberté de combattre nostre religion par les armes pures humaines, laquelle ils n'oseroyent attaquer en sa majesté pleine d'authorité et de commandement. Le moyen que ie prens pour rabatre cette frenesie, et qui me semble le plus propre, c'est de froisser et fouler aux pieds l'orgueil, et l'humaine fierté: leur faire sentir l'inanité, la vanité, et deneantise de l'homme: leur arracher des poingts, les chetiues armes de leur raison: leur faire baisser la teste et mordre la terre, soubs l'authorité et reuerence de la majesté diuine.	Moreover, they think they are being dealt a winning hand when they are left free to fight our religion with purely human weapons. They would not dare attack it in its majesty, full of authority and command. The means I take to beat down this frenzy, and the one that seems to me most fitting, is to crush human pride and arrogance and trample it underfoot. I will make them feel the inanity, the vanity and the nothingness of man. I will wrench the puny weapons of their reason from their fists, and make them bow their heads and bite the dust under the authority and reverence of the divine majesty.
C'est à elle seule qu'appartient la science et la sapience: elle seule qui peut estimer de soy quelque chose, et à qui nous desrobons ce que nous nous contons, et ce que nous nous prisons. Ου γαρ εα φρονεεν ὁ Θεος μεγα αλλον η ἑαυτον. Abbattons ce cuider, premier fondement de la tyrannie du maling esprit. Deus superbis resistit: humilibus autem dat gratiam. L'intelligence est en touts les Dieux, dit Platon, et point ou peu aux hommes.	To that majesty alone belong knowledge and wisdom. It alone can value itself as something, and from it we steal whatever we reckon ourselves to be and whatever we prize in ourselves. For God allows no one but himself to think proud thoughts. Let us beat down this conceit, the first foundation of the tyranny of the evil spirit. God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Intelligence is in all the gods, says Plato, and in men little or none.[13]
Or c'est cependant beaucoup de consolation à l'homme Chrestien, de voir nos vtils mortels et caduques, si proprement assortis à nostre foy saincte et diuine: que lors qu'on les employe aux suiects de leur nature mortels et caduques, ils n'y soient pas appropriez plus vniement, ny auec plus de force.	Yet it is a great consolation for a Christian to see our mortal and perishable tools so fittingly matched to our holy and divine faith. When they are applied to subjects that are mortal and perishable by nature, they are no more uniformly or more forcefully suited to them.

FRENCH	ENGLISH
2.12.19 Voyons donq si l'homme a en sa puissance d'autres raisons plus fortes que celles de Sebonde: voire s'il est en luy d'arriuer à aucune certitude par argument et par discours. Car sainct Augustin plaidant contre ces gents icy, a occasion de reprocher leur iniustice, en ce qu'ils tiennent les parties de nostre creance fauces, que nostre raison faut à establir. Et pour montrer qu'assez de choses peuuent estre et auoir esté, desquelles nostre discours ne sçauroit fonder la nature et les causes: il leur met en auant certaines experiences cognuës et indubitables, ausquelles l'homme confesse rien ne veoir. Et cela faict il, comme toutes autres choses, d'vne curieuse et ingenieuse recherche.	Let us see, then, whether man has in his power other reasons stronger than Sebond's, and indeed whether it is in him to reach any certainty by argument and reasoning. Saint Augustine, pleading against these people, has occasion to reproach them for their injustice. They hold to be false those parts of our belief that our reason fails to establish. To show that many things can exist and have existed whose nature and causes our reasoning could not establish, he puts before them certain known and indubitable experiences in which man confesses he sees nothing. He does this, like everything else, with careful and ingenious research.[14]
Il faut plus faire, et leur apprendre, que pour conuaincre la foiblesse de leur raison, il n'est besoing d'aller triant des rares exemples: et qu'elle est si manque et si aueugle, qu'il n'y a nulle si claire facilité, qui luy soit assez claire: que l'aizé et le malaisé luy sont vn: que tous subiects egalement, et la nature en general desaduouë sa iurisdiction et entremise.	We must do more. We must teach them that there is no need to go picking out rare examples to convict their reason of weakness. Reason is so defective and so blind that nothing is so clear and easy as to be clear enough for it. The easy and the difficult are all one to it. All subjects equally, and nature in general, disown its jurisdiction and its meddling.
2.12.20 Que nous presche la verité, quand elle nous presche de fuir la mondaine philosophie: quand elle nous inculque si souuent, que nostre sagesse n'est que folie deuant Dieu: que de toutes les vanitez la plus vaine c'est l'homme: que l'homme qui presume de son sçauoir, ne sçait pas encore que c'est que sçauoir: et que l'homme, qui n'est rien, s'il pense estre quelque chose, se seduit soy-mesmes, et se trompe? Ces sentences du sainct Esprit expriment si clairement et si viuement ce que ie veux maintenir, qu'il ne me faudroit aucune autre preuue contre des gens qui se rendroient auec toute submission et obeyssance à son authorité.	What does truth preach to us when it preaches that we should flee worldly philosophy, when it so often drives home to us that our wisdom is but folly before God, that of all vanities the vainest is man, that the man who presumes on his knowledge does not yet know what knowing is, and that man, who is nothing, deceives and misleads himself if he thinks he is something? These sentences of the Holy Spirit express so clearly and vividly what I want to maintain that I would need no other proof against people who would surrender to his authority with all submission and obedience.[15]
Mais ceux cy veulent estre fouëtez à leurs propres despens, et ne veulent souffrir qu'on combatte leur raison que par elle mesme.	But these people want to be whipped at their own expense, and will not allow their reason to be fought except by reason itself.

Qu'il me face entendre par l'effort de son discours, sur quels fondemens il a basty ces grands auantages, qu'il pense auoir sur les autres creatures. Qui luy a persuadé que ce branle admirable de la voute celeste, la lumiere eternelle de ces flambeaux roulans si fierement sur sa teste, les mouuemens espouuentables de cette mer infinie, soyent establis et se continuent tant de siecles, pour sa commodité et pour son seruice?

Est-il possible de rien imaginer si ridicule, que cette miserable et chetiue creature, qui n'est pas seulement maistresse de soy, exposée aux offences de toutes choses, se die maistresse et emperiere de l'vniuers? duquel il n'est pas en sa puissance de cognoistre la moindre partie, tant s'en faut de la commander. Et ce priuilege qu'il s'attribuë d'estre seul en ce grand bastiment, qui ayt la suffisance d'en recognoistre la beauté et les pieces, seul qui en puisse rendre graces à l'architecte, et tenir conte de la recepte et mise du monde: qui luy a seelé ce priuilege? qu'il nous montre lettres de cette belle et grande charge. Ont elles esté ottroyées en faueur des sages seulement? Elles ne touchent guere de gents.

Les fols et les meschants sont-ils dignes de faueur si extraordinaire? et estants la pire piece du monde, d'estre preferez à tout le reste? en croirons nous cestuy-là; *Quorum igitur causa quis dixerit effectum esse mundum? and knowledge, which are his whole honor, his strength and the foundation of his being. Let us see how well he holds his ground in this fine array. Let him make me understand, by the effort of his reasoning, on what foundations he has built those great advantages he thinks he has over the other creatures. Who has persuaded him that the admirable motion of the heavenly vault was established for his convenience and service? Or the eternal light of those torches rolling so proudly over his head, or the terrifying movements of that infinite sea? Who told him that they continue through so many centuries for his sake?

Is it possible to imagine anything so ridiculous? This miserable and puny creature is not even master of himself and is exposed to injury from all things. Yet he calls himself master and emperor of the universe, when it is not in his power to know the smallest part of it, much less to command it. Then there is the privilege he claims, of being the only one in this great edifice able to recognize its beauty and its parts. He alone can give thanks to the architect and keep the accounts of the world's receipts and expenses. Who sealed this privilege for him? Let him show us his letters patent for this fine and great office. Were they granted to the wise alone? That covers very few people.

Are fools and the wicked worthy of so extraordinary a favor? Being the worst part of the world, do they deserve to be preferred to all the rest? Shall we believe the man who says: For whose sake, then, shall we say the world was made? For the sake of those living beings that use reason. These are gods and men, and surely nothing is better than they. We shall never mock enough the impudence of this pairing. But the poor wretch, what has he in himself worthy of such an advantage?[16]

Consider the incorruptible life of the heavenly bodies, their beauty, their size, their motion kept up by so exact a rule: When we look up at the heavenly temples of the great universe
Above us, and the ether set with glittering stars,
And the courses of the moon and sun come to mind.
Consider the dominion and power those bodies have, not only over our lives and the conditions of our fortune, For he makes the deeds and lives of men hang on the stars, but over our very inclinations, our reasonings, our wills. They govern, drive and stir these at the mercy of their influences, as our reason teaches and finds: Observing from afar, it perceives

That the stars rule by silent laws,
That the whole world moves in alternating cycles,
And that the turns of the fates are discerned by sure signs. See how not one man alone, not one king, but monarchies, empires and all this world below move to the swing of the slightest heavenly motions:

And how great are the changes so small a movement makes:
So great is this kingdom that rules over kings themselves! Our virtue, our vices, our ability and knowledge, even this very reasoning we make about the power of the stars and this comparison between them and us, all come, as our reason judges, through their means and by their favor: One man is mad with love,
And can swim across the sea and overthrow Troy;
Another's lot is fitted for the writing of laws;
See, sons kill fathers, and fathers kill sons,
And brothers take up arms and clash to wound each other.
This war is not ours; they are forced to stir up such turmoil,
And to be carried to their own punishment and the tearing of their limbs;
This too is fated: thus to weigh fate itself. If we hold this share of reason that we have by heaven's distribution, how can it make us equal to heaven?

How can it subject heaven's essence and conditions to our knowledge?

Everything we see in those bodies astounds us. What labor, what iron tools, what levers, what machines, what workmen were there for so great a work? Why do we deprive them of soul, of life and of reasoning? Have we found some immobile and insensible stupidity in them, we who have no dealings with them except to obey? Shall we say that we have seen the use of a rational soul in no creature but man? Quæ sunt tantæ animi angustiæ? Sont ce pas des songes de l'humaine vanité, de faire de la lune vne terre celeste? y deuiner des montaignes, des vallées, comme Anaxagoras? y planter des habitations et demeures humaines, et y dresser des colonies pour nostre commodité, comme faict Platon et Plutarque? et de nostre terre en faire vn astre esclairant et lumineux? *Inter cætera mortalitatis incommoda, et hoc est, caligo mentium: nec tantùm necessitas errandi, sed errorum amor. What great narrowness of mind is this? Are they not dreams of human vanity, to make the moon a heavenly earth? To imagine mountains and valleys there, like Anaxagoras? To set up human habitations and dwellings there and found colonies for our convenience, as Plato and Plutarch do? Or to make our earth a bright and shining star? Among the other drawbacks of our mortal state is this darkness of minds: not only the necessity of erring, but the love of errors. The corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly dwelling presses down the mind that ponders many things.[17]

PRESUMPTION, OUR NATURAL MALADY

Man sets himself above the animals without knowing their minds.

ENGLISH

2.12.24 La presomption est nostre maladie naturelle et originelle. La plus calamiteuse et fragile de toutes les creatures c'est l'homme, et quant et quant, la plus orgueilleuse. Elle se sent et se void logée icy parmy la bourbe et le fient du monde, attachée et cloüée à la pire, plus morte et croupie partie de l'vniuers, au dernier estage du logis, et le plus esloigné de la voute celeste, auec les animaux de la pire condition des trois: et se va plantant par imagination au dessus du cercle de la lune, et ramenant le ciel soubs ses pieds.

Presumption is our natural and original malady. The most calamitous and frail of all creatures is man, and at the same time the proudest. He feels and sees himself lodged here amid the mud and dung of the world. He is fastened and nailed to the worst, deadest and most stagnant part of the universe, on the lowest story of the house and the farthest from the vault of heaven, with the animals of the worst of the three conditions. And yet in imagination he sets himself up above the circle of the moon and brings the sky under his feet.[18]

2.12.25 C'est par la vanité de cette mesme imagination qu'il s'egale à Dieu, qu'il s'attribue les conditions diuines, qu'il se trie soy-mesme et separe de la presse des autres creatures, taille les parts aux animaux ses confreres et compagnons, et leur distribue telle portion de facultez et de forces, que bon luy semble. Comment cognoist il par l'effort de son intelligence, les branles internes et secrets des animaux? par quelle comparaison d'eux à nous conclud il la bestise qu'il leur attribue? Quand ie me iouë à ma chatte, qui sçait, si elle passe son temps de moy plus que ie ne fay d'elle? Nous nous entretenons de singerie reciproques. Si i'ay mon heure de commencer ou de refuser, aussi à elle la sienne.

It is by the vanity of this same imagination that he makes himself God's equal and attributes divine qualities to himself. He picks himself out and separates himself from the crowd of other creatures. He carves out the shares of the animals, his brothers and companions, and hands them whatever portion of faculties and powers he sees fit. How does he know, by the effort of his intelligence, the inner and secret stirrings of animals? By what comparison between them and us does he conclude that they are as stupid as he says? When I play with my cat, who knows whether she is not passing her time with me more than I am with her? We entertain each other with reciprocal monkey tricks. If I have my moment to begin or to refuse, so has she.

Platon en sa peinture de l'aage doré sous Saturne, compte entre les principaux aduantages de l'homme de lors, la communication qu'il auoit auec les bestes, desquelles s'enquerant et s'instruisant, il sçauoit les vrayes qualitez, et differences de chacune d'icelles: par où il acqueroit vne tres parfaicte intelligence et prudence; et en conduisoit de bien loing plus heureusement sa vie, que nous ne sçaurions faire. Nous faut il meilleure preuue à iuger l'impudence humaine sur le faict des bestes? Ce grand autheur a opiné qu'en la plus part de la forme corporelle, que Nature leur a donné, elle a regardé seulement l'vsage des prognostications, qu'on en tiroit en son temps.

In his picture of the golden age under Saturn, Plato counts among the chief advantages of the men of that time their communication with the beasts. By inquiring of them and learning from them, a man knew the true qualities and differences of each kind. In this way he acquired a very perfect understanding and prudence, and conducted his life far more happily than we could. Do we need better proof of human impudence where beasts are concerned? That great author held that in most of the bodily form Nature gave them, she considered only the prognostications people drew from them in his time.[19]

HOW ANIMALS COMMUNICATE

Beasts understand one another and us; our hands and gestures are a speech as rich as words.

ENGLISH

2.12.26 Ce defaut qui empesche la communication d'entre elles et nous, pourquoy n'est il aussi bien à nous qu'à elles? C'est à deuiner à qui est la faute de ne nous entendre point: car nous ne les entendons non plus qu'elles nous. Par cette mesme raison elles nous peuuent estimer bestes, comme nous les estimons. Ce n'est pas grand merueille, si nous ne les entendons pas, aussi ne faisons nous les Basques et les Troglodytes. Toutesfois aucuns se sont vantez de les entendre, comme Appollonius Thyaneus, Melampus, Tiresias, Thales et autres. Et puis qu'il est ainsi, comme disent les cosmographes, qu'il y a des nations qui reçoyuent vn chien pour leur Roy, il faut bien qu'ils donnent certaine interpretation à sa voix et mouuements.

Il nous faut remerquer la parité qui est entre nous. Nous auons quelque moyenne intelligence de leurs sens, aussi ont les bestes des nostres, enuiron à mesme mesure. Elles nous flattent, nous menassent, et nous requierent: et nous elles. Au demeurant nous decouurons bien euidemment, qu'entre elles il y a vne pleine et entiere communication, et qu'elles s'entr'entendent, non seulement celles de mesme espece, mais aussi d'especes diuerses: Et mutæ pecudes, et denique secla ferarum
Dissimiles suerunt voces variásque ciuere
Cùm metus aut dolor est, aut cùm iam gaudia gliscunt. En

This defect that hinders communication between them and us, why is it not as much ours as theirs? It is anyone's guess whose fault it is that we do not understand each other, for we understand them no more than they understand us. By the same reasoning they may consider us beasts, as we consider them. It is no great wonder if we do not understand them; we do not understand the Basques and the Troglodytes either. Yet some have boasted of understanding them, like Apollonius of Tyana, Melampus, Tiresias, Thales and others. And the cosmographers say there are nations that accept a dog as their king. If so, they must surely give some interpretation to its voice and movements.[20]

We must notice the parity between us. We have a middling understanding of what they mean, and the beasts have about the same understanding of what we mean. They fawn on us, threaten us and beg of us, and we do the same to them. Besides, we can see quite plainly that among themselves they have full and complete communication. They understand each other, not only those of the same species but also those of different species: And mute cattle, and even the races of wild beasts
Utter different and varied cries

Hold prayers and words.[21]

2.12.28 Quoy des mains? nous requerons, nous promettons, appellons, congedions, menaçons, prions, supplions, nions, refusons, interrogeons, admirons, nombrons, confessons, repentons, craignons, vergoignons, doubtons, instruisons, commandons, incitons, encourageons, iurons, tesmoignons, accusons, condamnons, absoluons, iniurions, mesprisons, deffions, despittons, flattons, applaudissons, benissons, humilions, moquons, reconcilions, recommandons, exaltons, festoyons, resiouïssons, complaignons, attristons, desconfortons, desesperons, estonnons, escrions, taisons: et quoy non? d'vne variation et multiplication à l'enuy de la langue. De la teste nous conuions, renuoyons, aduoüons, desaduoüons, desmentons, bienueignons, honorons, venerons, dedaignons, demandons, esconduisons, egayons, lamentons, caressons, tansons, soubsmettons, brauons, enhortons, menaçons, asseurons, enquerons. Quoy des sourcils? Quoy des espaules? Il n'est mouuement, qui ne parle, et vn langage intelligible sans discipline, et vn langage publique.

And what of the hands? We request, promise, call, dismiss, threaten, pray, entreat, deny, refuse, question, admire, count, confess, repent, fear, show shame, doubt, instruct, command, incite, encourage, swear, testify, accuse, condemn, absolve, insult, scorn, defy, vex, flatter, applaud, bless, humble, mock, reconcile, recommend, exalt, celebrate, rejoice, complain, sadden, discourage, despair, astonish, exclaim, fall silent. And what not? All with a variety and multiplicity that rival the tongue's. With the head we invite, send away, approve, disapprove, contradict, welcome, honor, venerate, disdain, ask, turn down, cheer, lament, caress, scold, submit, defy, exhort, threaten, reassure, inquire. And what of the eyebrows? What of the shoulders? There is no movement that does not speak, in a language intelligible without instruction, and a public language.

Qui fait, voyant la varieté et vsage distingué des autres, que cestuy-cy doibt plustost est iugé le propre de l'humaine nature. Ie laisse à part ce que particulierement la necessité en apprend soudain à ceux qui en ont besoing: et les alphabets des doigts, et grammaires en gestes: et les sciences qui ne s'exercent et ne s'expriment que par iceux: et les nations que Pline dit n'auoir point d'autre langue. Vn ambassadeur de la ville d'Abdere, apres auoir longuement parlé au Roy Agis de Sparte, luy

Given the variety and the distinct usage of the other languages, this one should rather be judged the language proper to human nature. I leave aside what necessity quickly teaches in particular to those who need it, the finger alphabets and grammars of gesture, and the sciences that are practiced and expressed only through gestures. I leave aside, too, the nations that Pliny says have no other language. An ambassador from the city of Ab-que ie t'ay laissé dire tout ce que tu as voulu, et tant que tu as voulu, sans iamais dire mot: voila pas vn taire parlier et bien intelligible?	"That I let you say all you wanted, and for as long as you wanted, without ever saying a word." Is that not a silence that speaks, and very intelligibly?

THE SKILLS OF ANIMALS

Bees, swallows and spiders work with an art that implies judgment, not mere instinct.

2.12.29	Au reste, quelle sorte de nostre suffisance ne recognoissons nous aux operations des animaux? est-il police reglée auec plus d'ordre, diuersifiée à plus de charges et d'offices, et plus constamment entretenuë, que celle des mouches à miel? Cette disposition d'actions et de vacations si ordonnée, la pouuons nous imaginer se conduire sans discours et sans prudence? His quidam signis atque hæc exempla sequuti, Esse apibus partem diuinæ mentis, et haustus Æthereos dixere. Les arondelles que nous voyons au retour du printemps fureter tous les coins de nos maisons, cherchent elles sans iugement, et choisissent elles sans discretion de mille places, celle qui leur est la plus commode à se loger?	For the rest, which of our abilities do we not recognize in the workings of animals? Is there any government regulated with more order, divided into more charges and offices, and more steadily maintained, than that of the honeybees? Can we imagine so orderly an arrangement of actions and occupations being conducted without reasoning and prudence? From these signs and following these examples, some Have said that bees have a share of the divine mind And draughts of the ether. On the return of spring we see the swallows ferreting through every corner of our houses. Do they search without judgment? Do they choose without discernment, out of a thousand places, the one most convenient to lodge in?[22]
	Et en cette belle et admirable contexture de leurs bastimens, les oiseaux peuuent ils se seruir plustost d'vne figure quarrée, que de la ronde, d'vn angle obtus, que d'vn angle droit, sans en sçauoir les conditions et les effects? Prennent-ils tantost de l'eau, tantost de l'argile, sans iuger que la dureté s'amollit en l'humectant? Planchent-ils de mousse leur palais, ou de duuet, sans preuoir que les membres tendres de leurs petits y seront plus mollement et plus à l'aise? Se couurent-ils du vent pluuieux, et plantent leur loge à l'orient, sans cognoistre les conditions differentes de ces vents, et considerer que l'vn leur est plus salutaire que l'autre? Pourquoy espessit l'araignée sa toile en vn endroit, et relasche en vn autre?	And in the fine and admirable structure of their buildings, can birds use a square shape rather than a round one, an obtuse angle rather than a right angle, without knowing their properties and effects? Do they take now water, now clay, without judging that moistening softens what is hard? Do they floor their palace with moss or down without foreseeing that their young's tender limbs will lie there more softly and comfortably? Do they shelter from the rainy wind and set their dwelling toward the east without knowing the different qualities of these winds, and without considering that one is healthier for them than the other? Why does the spider thicken its web in one place and slacken it in another?
	se sert à cette heure de cette sorte de neud, tantost de celle-là, si elle n'a et deliberation, et pensement, et conclusion?	Why does it use now this kind of knot, now that one, unless it has deliberation, thought and conclusion?
2.12.30	Nous recognoissons assez en la pluspart de leurs ouurages, combien les animaux ont d'excellence au	We recognize well enough, in most of their works, how far animals excel us and how feeble our skill
